d left Marke Anth. Colonno for the gard of Modona with an hundred men at armes, foure huned light horfemen and two thousand fine hundred footemen, went and incamped before Conrda, which they forced the same day the artillerie was planted: and taking immediatly afterardes the castell by composition they approched neare to Mirandola: it drew now towards the d of September, and haply the feafon of that yeare was much more sharpe then ordinarily it had ont to be . In which respectes, and that the towne was strong, and being also beleeved that the ench would not leave a place fo convenient, the Captaines began to distrust of the victorie, not uing regard to the felicity of the Pope which made all things fall out well to him, but judged acrding to experience & pollicie, which in matters of enterprise ought principally to guide men of arre Neuerthelesse the Pope promising to hunselse so assuredly the victorie of the whole warre, at fending Cardinall Sunagale a new Legate into the armie, for the discord that was betweene e Duke of Urbin and the Cardinall of Pania, he charged him in the presence of many, that aoue all things who the armie should enter into Ferrara they should looke to the keeping of that itie. The fourth day after the armie approched neare Mirandola, the artilleric began to execute, Mirandola beotwithstanding with no leffe trauell then discommoditie, aswell for regard of the present season, seged. for want of victuals which came very sparingly from Modona: the reason of this restraint of ctuals grew by the impediments that the French gaue, who having bestowed fistie Launces ithin Gnastallo, as many within Corregia, and two hundred and fiftie in Carpie, & having withll cast downe all the bridges and occupied all the passages by the which reliefe might come from Maneua, they kept the armie no leffe diffressed with want of foode, then the hardnesse of the seaon hindred their other actions. But as necessitie is mightie to make men resolute, so their extreuitie stirred the vp to a deuise that diminished their scarcities, for that deliuering out a false brute

On the other fide, the Popes armie, after they had made with great delayes, necessarie prouisios, not by compulsion but by feare.

About the end of this yeare there fell vpon the person of the Pope some imputation and in samie, as though it was conspired by his prinitie, and consenting that by the meane of Cardina de Medicis , there was practise with Marke Anth . Colonno and certaine young Gentleme of Florence, to kill Pe. Soderin Gonfalonnier, by whose working it was supposed that the Florence times followed the French faction. This suspition was aggrauated by this confecture, that the Pop notwithstanding he laboured by all his meanes & authoritie to winne that common weale, yet hwas neuer able to bring that to passe by practise, by policie, nor by compulsion, which they rest fed for want of affection, opinion, and liking. Besides, a little before at the French kings requel and to the Popes discontentment, they were broken offs the truce with the people of Stenna, a though they had refused to moue armes wrill fix moneths after: a thing which the king desire to hold the people in search, Andlassy, they had sent to the king two hundred men at armse for the gard of the Duchie of Mullan, a matter demanded by the king by vertue of their confederation not so much for the importance and necessitie of such a success, as for desire to make them entonies with the Pope. In this estate of affaires did end the yeare a thousand such and the hundred and ten.

But the beginning of the new yeare was made notable by a matter not expected according to the time prefent, nor neuer read of in any the actions or examples of ages past: The Por was jealous that there was not yfed that diligence in the fernice of Mirandola that was either in cessarie to such an enterprise, or able to satisfie his defre, wherein taking occasion of their slo proceedings, he interpreted to the ignorance and infidelitic of his Captaines, but chiefly to Nephew, that which reasonablic proceeded of many difficulties. For these respectes togethwith his ambition which held him altogether subjected, he determined to go thither and a naunce things by his prefence, preferring the importunitie and violence of his minde afore alle therregardes: he confidered not how daungerous and vinworthy it was for the majestic of suc a degree, that a Pope of Rome should in person leade armies against townes of Christians, a much leffe was he carefull of the opinion and judgement that the world would make of him, 1 giue an apparant colour and almost a manifest justification to those factions as were in practif to call a Councelland stirre vp Princes against him, making their suggestion that his gouern ment was hurtfull to the Church, and his vices infamous and incorrigible. Such speeches rank through the Court: fuch conjectures were made: fome matuelled at his furie: fome blamed! intemperance: some seared the thing they durst not vtter: and enery one comparing his ac ons with the importance of his place and calling , accused his indiffrction , wherein the $\mathcal{D} lpha$ tran Embassadours were no lesse forward then the residue: the Cardinals belought him wi great instance: his fauorites made reasons to perswade, but durst not displease him: and his who Court objected against the vieworthinesse of the journey, but his obstinate resolution made vays all their labours and deurfes: his fingular paffion was invincible against all reason: in which disp fition he parted from Bolognia the fecond of Ianuarie, accompanied with three Cardinals, and ing come to the campe, the necessitie of the place compelled him to be lodged in a little country cottage subject and open to the artilleries of the enemics, for that it was no further from the was of Mirandola then a common crosbow will shoot at twife: There he dispensed with no trauof his body norforbare any care or studie of minde, there he was no lesse prodigall of his author tie, then of his prefence, and riding continually through and about the campe, he had almost fir shed the planting of the artillerie, whereof till that day the lesser part could not be employed so the impediments which the vnscasonable time and snowes gaue to allactions of war, Besides, tl pioners and labourers could not do their office, who the more they were viged and put for ward, the more they shrunke and gaue backe, the daunger of the shot that came out of the towne being greater then their vertue. And for this reason being thought necessarie to rayle nev rampiers in the places where the artilleries were to be planted, and to refurnish the campe wit new pioners, the Pope, in that respite of time, withdrew himself to Concorda, somewhat to eschi the Incommodities of the armie. At this place Chaumont addressed vnto him Albert Pio to mal many offers and meanes of accord, which, (notwithstanding the many labours and meetings the one and other fide) grew to no refolution or effect, either for his accustomed hardnesse ar

offinacie, or else for the infidelitie of Aibert, who was more and more fulpected not to negoate with that finceritie that appertained. The Pope remained not log at Cocorda, the same impaece & violence of mind causing him to returne, which first procured him to come to the campo: cither was his furie any thing abated by the hurtfull fnowes that cotinually fell fro heave whilest was in the field, nor his rigour the more restrained by the sharpe cold, whole bitternesse the puldiers could not endure but with great paine: he was lodged in a little Church neare to his arlleries, but somwhat nearer the wals then was his former lodging: and being discontented with I things that either were already done, or flood to be done, he complained with bitter wordes ainft all his Captaines, except onely Mark Amb Colonno who he had newly fent for from Modothe trauelled with great impacience about the armic, enforcing him to perfwade a diligence in me in whose slownesse he tooke griese, he accomplished both in words & action the office of Captaine, promising the fouldiers for the reward of their valours the spoile of Mirandola, which fayd he would not take to copolition, but leave it to their libertieto rafack or ransome to their vne profit. In this action he forbare nothing which he thought might aduaunce his defire, not aring to make that lawfull to the fouldiers by his graunt and proper administration, which of it f was injurious, impious, & of example hatefull, This proueth that there is nothing more vnworthen to adde to a naturall crueltie, a great authoritie, and that which we call choller in private, en, deferueth the name of furic in him that exercileth publike charge. Truly it was a thing notaand to the eyes of men straunge and new, that a French king, a Prince secular, in an age and epolition florishing, trayned from his first yeares in warres, should take his rest in his Court and namber at home, and administer by Captaines a warre that was made against his abroad: and the other fide to see a soueraigne Bishop, a supreme Pastour, a Vicar of Christin earth beag a body difeafed, aged, and deiected, and nourifhed in a calling contrary to armes and war, to in person to a warre stirred up by himself against Christian Princes, and to lye in campe afore a ce of little name, where fubmitting himfelfe as a leader of fouldiers to paines and daungers, he nined no other thing of the Pope then the habite & the name. By his extreame diligece and laur, by his complaints and threats, and by his offers and promifes all things were more aduaun-Ithen otherwise they would have bene: and yet, for the refistance of many difficulties, they I but flow proceeding, both for the finall numbers of pyoners, and also for that the campe bare great proportion of artilleries, and withall the wetnesse of the season was an impediment to powder to do his office. They that were within, made a valiant defence, having for their gonour Alexander Triunice with foure hundred footenen forreiners |: and they supported all ingers with fo much the more valour and resolution, by how much they had hope in the sucrspromised by M. Chaumont, who, being commaunded from his king not to suffer the Pope ake that towne, had fent for all the bands of Spanish footmen that were at Verona, and making rtinuall leavies of men from all parts, wherin was concurrant with him the Duke of Ferrara, he mised to set vpo the enemies in their campe before the twentie day of Ianuary. But these diffities made that promise both hard and daungerous, the little time he had to make so great proons, the leafure given to the enemies to fortific their campe, the much ado to conney the artiles, municions, and victuals in a feafon fo hurtfull, by wayes fo troublefome, and through fo great wes as had not bene feene of long time:laftly, by him were augmented the difficulties, in who s expectation to diminish them by recompecing the time lost with a new diligence: for, Chanvpổ the fuddé made a posting journey to Milla, promising that the cause of his going thither s to make provision of money & other things necessarie for the warre: but it was beleeved that he amorous passion towards a Lady of Atallan caried him more then any other regard. This ty journey (not with stading his returne was speedy) abated greatly the courages of the souldiers, so lesse diminished the hopes of such as desended Mirandola: amongst whom as their opinios re diuerfe touching the delayes he vied, so some were bold to vie this libertie of judgemet, that r lesse did hurt the negligence of Chaumont then the hate he bare to John Lacques Truuslee, in vich regard, inclining more to his proper passion, then to the profit of his king, they supposed it vs not disagreeable to him that the Nephewes of Trunlee should be deprived of Mirandola. And on the other fide, the Pope dispenced with nothing that might be made a furtherer of

And on the other fide, the Pope dispensed with nothing that might be made a furtherer of lyickotie, wherein his furie was so much the more renewed, by how much the Cannon from thin the towne slue two of his men in his kitchin: for which daunger for saking that lodging, and

eftsoones returning thither againe being caried with his intemperances, he was likewise constra ned by new perils to take the lodging of the Cardinall of Regina, against the which, they withi the towne (haply suspecting that he was there arrived) braked a great peece not without the dar ger of his life. At the last, the defendants standing desperate to be succoured on all sides, and seeir what great execution the artilletie of the enemy had made, and fearing with all that by the har frozen ditch being able to beare the fouldiers, they should not be able to resist the assault that we to be given within two dayes, fent, the selfe same day that Chaumont had promised to succo them, Embassadours to the Pope, to yeeld themselues, their goods and liues saued. To whoma beit the Pope made answere in the beginning that he would not be bound to saue the liues of the Teeldesh to the fouldiers, yet in the end he suffered himselfe to be wonne by the petitions of his Court, and acce ted the towne under fuch conditions as were offered, fauing that Alexander Tribulce with a taine other Captaines of fooremen, should remaine his prisoners, and the towne to pay a certain rate of money, to redeeme the spoyle which he had promised to the souldiers: and yet the sou diers feeming to vrge that as due which was promifed, and which by their valour they had we the Pope had much to do to fatisfie the fouldiers and keepe the towne from facking. By the e ample of the towne, the castell also yeelded, with this permission to suffer the Countesse to dep with all her goods, one fortune at one instant subjecting both the towne and the castell, ast glorie of one man reversed with one kinde of calamitie a whole estate and famulie of great ar quitie. The Pope restored Mirandola to Count John Francisquo, and indued him with all rights of the sonnes of Count Lodowike, as gotten by him in iust warres: he received of him bor and for performance the perfon of his fonne, to pay within a certaine time for all defraymer twentie thoufand duckets: and, not to lofe that by negligence, which had bin won with fo gr paine and perill, but chiefly to keepe the French from reconquering it after the armie was to red, he left within it a strength of flue hundred sootemen Spaniards, and three hundred Italia from Mirandolahe went to Sermidie, a borough vpon the limites of Mantua standing neare river of Pam, and being by the victoric of Mirandola puffed vp into affured hopes to have Fer ra, he gaue resolute answere to Albert Pio, that he would heare no more of any offers or speec of peace, if, for the first condition, he were not made possessed of Ferrara.

ration of the French according to the Pope.

But those thoughts were chaunged by a new deliberation of the French: for, the king c A new dalibe- fidering how much the losse of Alirandola had diminished his reputation, and now fully payring that the minde of the Pope would be raunged to counfels payfible, addressed press direction to Monsieur Chaumont not onely to looke well to the defending of Ferrara, but hings direction, not to forbeare upon convenient occasion to offend the state of the Church According to whi commission, he made present leavies of mension all partes, and so really entred into the act; that the Pope by the counsell of his Captaines, retited to Bolognia, and abiding there but very 1 dayes, either for feare, or to aduaunce (as he fayd) more speedily the battring of the bastillio Genusola, against the which he determined to send certaine bands of souldiers which he has Romania, he came to Lugo, and from thence lastly to Rauenna, thinking perhaps that so is an expedition was not worthy his presence. The Venetia armie, who, for the nearenesse of the emies, could not well be employed in the flege of Ferrara, were flayed at Bondin, as the Spanit Ecclefiastikes remained distributed betweene Cento and Finalo: They, notwithstanding the te-of three moneths was palt, surceassed at the request of the Pope.

On the other fide, Monsieur Chaumont, having affembled his armie which was aboue his cmics in footemen, and farreaboue them as touching the valour of the horsemen, but inferior n numbers & multitudes, tooke counfel with his Captaines what were best to be done. The Fre h Captaines perswaded that the companies of the Duke of Ferrara being loyned to the armie it were best to march directly to seeke the enemies, who notwithstanding were lodged in plis strong and sure, yet there was hope that with the vertue of armes and importunitie of the art. ries, they would be driven to dislodge & retire: a matter that would not onely make Ferrara livered and acquited of daunger, but also in this expedition would be won againe the reputar n that had bin loft till that day. They alleaged also for the same opinion, that the army passing by marches of Mantua, they should take from the Marquis all the excuses and impediments for 10 which he professed to be retained to take armes as Feodater of Casar, and souldier to the kg. and that it was a thing profitable for the furetie of Ferrara, that he should come in and decle: tly, that he being declared, the enemie would find many discommodities in this warre, both restraint of victuals, and annoyances of bridges and passages of rivers which thereby should be ken away from the Venetian armies, and also the Marquisse shold reuoke immediatly the soulers which he had in the campe of the Church. But Trinules being returned out of Fraunce aut the same time that Mirandola was lost, gaue counsell to the contrarie: he declared what nger it were to go fecke the enemies and fet vpon them in their campe, and how hurtfull it old be to be referred and governed by necessitie, to proceed day by day according to the proedings and doings of the enemie: that it was far more profitable and better affured, to turne armic to Modona or to Bolognia, for that, if the enemies removed for feare to lose the one of fe two townes, then were wonnethe way that was fought to deliuer Ferrara from the war: d if they did not stirre, there was yet this benefite in the counfell, that the one or the other of oferwotownes would be eafily caried: in which case as a great necessitie would draw them et to defend their owne, fo in leaning their place of strength, the armie should be subject to maoccasions to obtaine an honorable victorie. This was the perswasion of Triunico, and these re the reasons he occupied, such, as for their granitie expressed his great wisdome, but for set enuie and partiality, were neither embraced nor followed: for the other opinion was allow-Chammont and the other French Captaines bearing an inclination to diminish his authoritie, fon fo d'Este being also concurrant for hope that the enemics would be constrained to dissolve, at least retire from his estate, which being so afflicted and consumed, he said was vnable any iger to susteine so heavie burthens: he feared, that if the Frenchmen went away, the enees would make entrie vpon Polisena de Ferrara, a thing which would so much haue increa-I the calamities of that citie depriued of all hope and spirit, that there remained no more comf t not remedie: so the French armie marched by the way of Lusero and Gonsagno, to encampe a Raffoul a and at Orlora, where they remained three dayes for the ill weather that fell, rejecting counsell of such as perswaded to goassaile Mirandolis, both for the incommodity to incampe he fields, and also that at the Popes going away, the suburbs were burnt and all the houabout: they supposed it in like fort neither convenient nor honorable to charge upon Concorfine miles from them, holding it but lost time to entertaine action in a matter of so small imr trance: the armic therefore came to Quistello, and making passage over the river of Secchia on a bridge of boates, they lodged the day after at Rouera vpon the river of Paw: the fame Ing the cause that Andre Grutt, who having afore recovered Polisena Rouigno, and left e part of the Venetian souldiers at Montagnana under Bernardin Montono, to make test-Ince against the garrisons that kept Verona, was withdrawne to Montagnana with three hunc:d men at armes, a thousand light horsmen, & a thousand footmen: these were already drawne r tre the river of Paw to joine with the armic of the Church, having afore facked the towne of draffalle from Rouero the Frenchmen went to Sermidy, and dispersed themselves in good order i the viliages thereabouts: from thence At. Chaumont accompanied with certaine Captaines ut not with Trivalco) went to the towne of Stellata, being there expected by Alfonso a Este, take counfell in what maner they were to proceed against their enemies, who were now loded altogether at Finalo: it was there agreed that the bands of Alfonjo should be joyned with the I inch army about Bondin, and lo to march altogether and encampe in cettaine villages three les from Finalo, to proceed afterwards according to the nature of places, and occasions offered the enemies: but as Chaumont was returned to Sermidy, it was told him how hard it was to go that place, both for the impediment of waters, whereof the country was full about Finalo, and that by necessity, he was to take the high way along the risings of che canall, which the ene-17 had cut offin many places, and bestowed gard to hinder passage: a matter also which seemed much the more hard and troublesome, by how much the ill weather and season was joined to 12 other impediments: the confideration of these perils bringing Chaumont into no small doubt, Ifon 6 that had about him certaine discouerers and men knowing the country, and by the well formed of the fituation and disposition of places, laboured to perswade the contrarie, assuring mthat with the force of artillerie, such as manned the passages that were cut off, would be comelled to them abandoned, by which meane it would be verie easie to cast bridges for passage in y place where it should be necessarie. These reasons being brought by Chaumone into counsel debated, the opinion of Alfonso was approued, to whom Trinulco was rather not contrary the confenting, his filence leaving to the companie a more occasion of murmure, then if he had wreely impugned the deutletfor, what with the greatnesse of the difficulties, which still augmeted, and authoritie of that captaine carying long experience, and had alwayes reproued that the pedition, it was thought that the harmes and inconveniences hapning, the king would lay the upon the authors of that opinion: in which respect CAL Chaumont affer bling another day is Councell for the same matter, defired Trivulce, that not with shence as he did before, but fratly and simply as appertained to him, he would expresse by opinion, which he delivered in the fort, having no lesse regard to the gravitie and importace of such a Councell, then to the great of stream expectation of the affistants so well disposed to heare him.

I vsed silence yesterday, not bearing a mind prejudiciall to the present businesse, and mu leffe to arrogate to my felfe any fingularitie of counfell; and yet if my opinion had found imita con in the beginning, we had not now stood possessed with doubts, nor this gallant armie h " fpent fo many dayes in vaine, which might have bene employed with more profit; and I could continue in silence, if, suppressing all other respects, I were not spurred on with the important " of the matter, being now vpon termes to let vpo one incertaine cast of a die, both this flourishing " armie, the flate of Ferrara, and the Duchie of Millan, matters too great to be put all to aduc se ture without retaining some part from chaunce and fortune. Now did the whole affifiance, by the reasons of this grane Captaine, discerne the difficulties at twere present, which he had found and seene when they were farre officin which regard his a nion was allowed of eneric one. And Chaumont leaving to the Duke of Ferrara for his betture is a greater strength of men, he drew towards (arpy by the same way, having not yet cained that the Marquisle of Mantua should cone in, which was one of the principallest reasons that had bene alleaged by those that gaue counfell against the opinion of Trivusco: for the arquisle destring to stand indifferent, & as a person neuter during the troubles, when the time on wherein he had given hope to declare himselfe, he folicited with many excuses to be a considered for certaine dayes, debating with the Pope the daunger of the French armse that eatned him, & befeeching Ma. Chaumont not to take sho him the hope he had that the Pope yold restore to him his some within a very short time. But the deusse to take Modona tooke no odd successe, the suttle and secret counsels of the king of Aragon giving greater impediments

en the armies of the Pope.

Cafur shewed himselie ill contented that the Pope vsurped Modona, a citie esteemed in all nes of the iurisdiction of the Empire, & holden by long continuance by the family of Este with unledges and inactitures from the Emperours; and albeit he had made request with many implaints to haue it deliutered to him, yet the Pope, nourishing another opinion touching the this of that citie, had alwayes resulted it, but principally so long as he hoped to be able to take the affoone as the French armies began to discouer more manifestly in fauour of them Ester and that he had no abilitie to defend Modona without making great expences & defrayents; he began to raste the counsell of the king of Aragon, who encouraged him to redeliuer both to avoid so many present troubles, and to appeare the mind of Casa, and also by that those kindle some alteration between him and the French king; he induced him besides with a comfort, that if he desired to have it againe in another time more convenient, it would be a matter of no great difficulty, contenting Cafar with a reasonable summe of mony. This debate was prolonged for many dayes, for that, according to the diucrfitie of hopes, the deliberation the Pope chaunged; onely they flucke alwayes vpon this one difficultie, that Cafar refuseco receive it, vnlesse in the instrument of assignation it were clearely expressed, that that Citie . pertained to the Empire : a matter whereunto albeit the Pope would not conferrat the first, feeing after the taking of Mirandola that M. Chaumont was the strongest in the field, and t the wonted expences and difficulties for the defence of Modona returned vp6 him againe, he i the disputation of words, & consented to have it set downe in writing, that Modona should e restored to Cafar, of whose jurisdiction it was. And as Vinfruch the Embassador of Cafar telect with the Pope had received the possession of it, and that he might remaine there in furety by e authoritie of Cafar, he dismissed Mark Anth. Colonno with the other bands with whom he d it afore in the name of the Chutch, advertifing Monficur Chaumont that Modona was no me the Popes, but was justly renerted to the jurisdiction of Cafar. This was not believed of (b. mont, who still continued to worke the Cardinall of Este to put in execution the conspiracie intelligence which he entertained with that Citie : in so much that according to direction, e French bands which Chaumont had left in gatrifen within Rubiero, were made out one night, t notwithstanding they marched with as litle brute as they could within a mile of Wodona 11 returned the fame night to Rubiero, either for that the order of their faction within was not co respondent, or else the Frenchmen had preuented their time and were come too soone: nertheleffe they gaue no place to this ill fuccesse, but made another sallie out of Rubsero to com; Modona, falling notwithstanding into the same impediments they did before, aggravated to by the depth & rage of the waters to passe the riner of Seckehie which runneth before Rubieris last Vitruch became suspicious, and committing to imprisonment certaine of the city, vpon vi he imposed an intelligence with the Cardinal of Este, he obtained of the Pope that Widrke A Colonio should estloons returne thither with the garrison that was there before: a matter wil had not stayed M. Chaumont (being now come to Carpy) to march and encampe before it, i e quality & scason of the time had not taken from him the drawing of his artillerie along the betweene Ruolo & Carpy, a way not more then ten miles from thence, but even the worlfel the wayes in Lombardy, not with standing their overflowing with waters and marish natures. fides all this, Chaumont was every day more & more advertised, that Modona was redelivere o Cafar simply & absolutely, which made him make this couenant with I itsruch, not to of d Modona nor his territories, receiving reciprocally his promife, that in the actions between e Pope & his king, he should not fauor the one nor the other partie. But such is the destiny and d of all flesh, that all men borne in humaine nature, must in their time appointed refigre to the ch the life they had of the earth: it hapned not manie dayes after that Chaumont fell into a grieis maladie, & being caried to Correge, ended his life within 15 dayes, expressing demoutly some in afore his death, how greatly he was repented and remorfed of the vexations he had done to Church, & befought the Pope by a publike instrument to give him pardon & absolution, wh being granted while he yet lived, could not come to his knowledge by reason of the society nesse of his death. He was a captain that in his life bare great authority in Italy, both by to fingular credit of the Cardinal Amboyle, & also for that he managed almost absolutely the dry of Millan & all the armies of the king: but touching his ability or valour, it was far interiour to great a butthe, the greatnes of his place carying him into fuch fingularity of mind & weening at not knowing of himselse the arte and order of warre, he would not give faith to such as were le to instruct him : by which it hapned that after the death of his vncle, his infussiciencie b g no more supported by countenance and fauour, he fell in his latter dayes almost into the sdaine of the fouldiers, notwithstanding he suffred in them wonderfull insolencies and lice ious behaviours to flop them from ill reporting him to the king: in so much as Triunlee 2 Captaine trained in ancient discipline, would oftentimes protest by oath, that he would neet go more into the French armies, vnleffe the king marched in person, or at least himselfe enmaunded as chiefe. Neuerthelesse the king was determined afore to send for his success to Monsieur Longueuslie, descended of the bloud toyall, but a bastard borne, and not so much elemed for his vertue, as for his descending and riches. By the death of Chaumont, John Ia. 17nulce remained gouernor of the army by the prerogative that he was one of the 4 Marsha of raunce, to whom, the Generall being dead, the rule of the armic appertaineth by the statutes Fraunce vittill the king do otherwise dispose of it. And albeit, not knowing how long he hould be continued in that gouernement, he durit not attempt any matter of confequence : yet returned with the armie to Sermidi to go to the succors of Geniuola, afore the which the Pope nd not onely fent his bands that were in Romagnia, but also had procured the Venetian fleet, to prochat the fame instant, which came thither with thirteen light gallies, and many other vef-Is of meaner burthen : but he had no necessitie to passe further, for whilest the land-men inimped about it with very litle obedience and order, there was discouered vpon a fudden the puke of Ferrara and the Lord of Chastellon with the French souldiers that were ledde out of errara in greater numbers then were the enemies: and marching along the brinke of theriucr of Par, and being come vp as farre as the riuer of Santerno, they cast the bridge which they adbrought with them, and in one moment charged and confused the enemies, who, by reason ftheir ditorder being not able to make refiltance, fell into one generall and voluntarie flying, uing three hundred Spanish footemen which garded the artillerie. In which confusion they ft their enlignes and artilleries, many chieftaines of the horsemen finding more sasetie in the rtune and swiftnesse of their horses, then in their proper valours. By reason of this adversitie e Venetian fleete, to avoide the dainger that threatned, hoyfed faile into the winde, and fo tyred into the ryuer of Paw.

The affayres of the warres had these diverse proceedings, not expressing any assured token indge what would be the issue of it. The thoughts also of Princes were no lesse diverse, and no se incertaine specially the cogitation, of Cosar, who contrarie to all expectation, determined fend the Bilhop of Garcito Mantha to negociate a peace.

It is fet downe before that by the working of the Bishop of Gurci, it was resolved between efar and the French king, to make strong warre upon the Venetians in the spring time, and ichal, to call a Councell, if the Pope consented not to the observation of the league of Cambray. this Cafar bearing a very vehement inclination, had fince the returning of the Bishop of arci, fent to all his prelats of his estates patrimomiall to debate in what maner and in what ace the Councell should be celebrated. But as he was of naturall condition variable and inconint, and an enuier of the greatnesse and name of the French, so making no lesse vaine his proper omifes then the expectation that others had of him, he declined afterwards to inconstancie, d liftned to the perswasions of the king of Aragon, who considering that what by the vnitie Cafar with the French king, and the embaling of the Venetians by their common armies, and ithall the ruine of the Pope by meane of the Counfell, the French might rife into a greatnes o icloufe and suspected, laboured to perswade him that an universall peace would fall out tter for his purposes, so farreforth as by it he obtained either the whole or the greatest part those peeces which the Venetians vsurped vpon him: he admised him to send to this effect, me notable personage to Maneua with full power, and sabouring to induce the French king do the like, he promifed that he would also fend thither, by which examples he alleaged that ePope could not refufe to lovine in the action, and lastly that he would not go against the ill of so many great Princes: he told him that upon the resolution of the Pope, depended all e deliberations of the Venetians, in whom was a necessitie, to followe his authoritie, as not ing able to stand alone: for which reasons it was to be hoped, that Gesar without difficulwithout armes, & without increasing the reputation & might of the French king, should to sperpetuall praise, reobtaine his estate, together with an universall peace. And be, it that it ought not forth that successe which reasonably may be expected, yet he should not be deprid of meanes to moue the warre at the time appointed, & with the fame comodities & hopes: at being chiefe of all Christian Princes, & protector of the Church, his instifications would be emore augmeted, as also by such a Councel would come the exaltation of his glory, for that it ould appeare to every one, that as he principally had fought and defired the peace & vnitie of hristians, so by the obstinacie & wicked counsels of others he was constrained to make warre. hefereasons no less by the granitic of matter they expressed, then by the authoritic of the perouage from whom they came, were right acceptable to Cafar, who at the fame in that addressed atters to the Pope & to the French king: to the Pope, that he had determined to send the bishop Gurcinto Italie, for that (as appertained to a Prince religious, being protector of the Church, and chiefe aboue Princes Christian) he was resolved in all that he might, to procure the trangu litie of the sea Apostolike, and the universall peace of Christende me : summoning him, bearing the office of the high vicar of Christ, to joyne and proceede with him in the same intention, an to do that which belonged to the place & name of Pope, to the end he were not confirmed have recourfe to other remedies, to establish the peace of Christendome. That he did not allo the practife that was made to deprine the Cardinals that were abfent, of their hely digniti for that being absent not to any euill ende, nor for hatred they bare to him, neither could the deserve so great a paine, neither was the authoritie of the Pope onely able to impose it vpc them: He told him befides, that it was a matter very vnworthy and vnprofitable, in fo gre troubles to make creation of new Cardinals, fince he was specially forbidden by the capitular ons which the Cardinals made with him when he was elected Pope: He defired him to refen that office till times of better tranquilitie, when he should either have no necessitie or no caus to preferre to fo great dignities none but persons well allowed of for their discretion, their de ctrine, and good life. To the French king he wrote, that according to his vertuous disposition alwayes inclined to embrace a good and affured peace, he was resolved to fend to Mantual Bishop of Gurci to solicite a peace vniuerfall, wherevnto he beleeved (with reasons and four dations not light nor vaine) that the Pope (whose authoritie the Venetians were constrained follow) would readily incline, the Embassadors of the king of Aragon concurring in the actic and promifing the like on the behalfe of their king: Therefore he defired him to fend thid likewise his Embassadors with full power, and in the generall affembly, the Bishop of Gu should befeech the Pope to do the like, wherunto if he made refusal, the Bishop should denour the Councelinthe names of them all having also given order that to make their procedings me iushfiable, and to put ende to all controversies, the Bishop of Guees should indifferently vnd fland the reasons of every one; onely in all accidents, that he should hold this for certaine, no to make any agreement with the Venctians, if at the same time were not resolved the control fies which he had with the Pope. This folicitation pleased well the Pope, not for any defire had to peace and concord, but for that he perswaded him selfe to be able to dispose the Sen of Venice to compound with Cefar, and to delivering him from necessitie to remaine vnited w the French king: he supposed to separate him from him, and the same easily to be made a ca of confederation of many Princes against him. But the French king stood not a little disconten with these resolutions both new and vnexpected, for that nothing hoping that an unjust peace would proceede of them, he judged that the least euill that might happen, would be ap tracting and delaying of the execution of those things which he had agreed with Cafar, he fea also that the Pope promising to help Casar to reconquer the Duchie of Millan, & to indue Bishop of Gures with the dignitie of Cardinall and other graces ecclesiallike, would separ him from him: or at least, being the worker of the composition with the Venerians to the adu tage of Cafar, he might be put into necessitie to accept the peace with conditions dishon wherein one thing also that encreased his suspition, was, that Casar was newly confedered w the Swiffers, notwithstanding for desence onely. Besides, he occupied in himselfe this pers. fion that the king Catholike had bene the author of this new counsell, of whose intention doubted much for many reasons; for he was not ignorant that his Embassador resident w Cafar, made open travell and folicitation to establish an accord betweene Cafar and the netians: he beleeued that he gaue secrete encouragement to the Pope, in whose armie his ecpanies and bands of fouldiers had remained a longer time then he was bound vnto by the catulations made touching the inuestiture of the kingdome of Naples: he was not ignorant that give impediment to his actions, he objected himselfe manifestly against the convocation of: Councell, and under colour of modestie he blamed apparantly that with armed hand & in a 🗈 🗀 when Italie burned with an universal fire of warre, there should be such negociation of a matt, which without the concord and confent of all Princes, could not bring foorth but fruites full ! venime and infection. Laftly, he was well aduertifed that he prepared a strong armie by with the which, albeit he published a brute, that he would passe in person into Affrike, yet could not be decided, whether he leauied that force for other ends: wherein he was fo much more suspicious, by how much his words were alwaies full of sweetnesse and affabilitie: for e alwaies befought the king (as it were with a brotherly affection) to make peace with the Pc;

orfaking (if otherwise it could not be wrought) some piece of his owne rights, both, not to shew imselse a persecutor of the Church, contrarie to the auncient pietie and deuotion of the house f Fraunce: and also not to turne him from the warre which he had determined to make vpon ne Mores in Affrike for the exaltation of the name of Christ. He added lastly, that albeit it had ene a perpetuall custome amongst Christian Princes, when they prepared armies against infidels o demaund succors of others in a cause so holy and honorable, yet for his part it sufficed him ot to be hindred, and was content to require no other aide, but that Italie might remaine in eace: which words, notwith standing they were carried to the French king by his Embassador, nd pronounced by his owne mouth to the French Embassador resident with him, & that with reat demonstration of amitie: yet it seemed that they contained a secrete protestation to take rmesin fauor of the Pope: a matter which feemed not likely to the king that he durst do withuthope to be able to induce Cafar to the fame. These things troubled much the kings minde, nd filled him full of many fuspitions, fearing that to worke the peace by the meane of the Bishop f Gurci, would be a thing no leffe vaine then prejudiciall vnto him: and yet, not to stirre vp Cafar, he determined to send to Mantua the Bishop of Paris, a Prelate of great authoritie and eepe knowledge in the science of the Lawes. These were the doubts of the one king & the deeits of the other, the one full of deuises, and the other not void of distrust: they both open in ords,& yet kept both their intentions diffembled: a matter of familiar custome with Princes entertaine one another with vaine hopes and artificiall feares.

All this while lohn lacques Truntee remained with the armie at Sermidi dispersed into may places thereabouts for the better commoditie of lodging and victuals. And in this time hereined fignification from the king, that it was his will that the warre should be administed by m, with this limitation, that expecting the comming of the Bishop of Garci, he should abstaine om all violent action vpon the state Ecclesiastike, the hardnesse of the season being also against by reason whereof it was impossible to incampe in the field, not withstanding March was now gun. Therefore Truulce, both for that he had no occasion to attempt any other enterprise, & r that he was in places so verie neare, determined to denise how he might offend the armie of e enemies, who being dispersed abroad when Al Chaumont returned from Sermeds to Carpy, oft part of their footemen were lodged at Bondin, & the horfemen in the townes neare about male. But assoone as he had received his commission from the king, he marched the day after to relluta, and the day following fomewhat further, where he bestowed the armie abrode in the llages thereabouts, and raifed a bridge of boates vpon the riner of Paw betweene Stellata and uquerolla, having given direction to the Duke of Ferrara, to make another a mile lower, at e place which is called the point, being that breach or branch of Pan which goeth to Ferrara, id that also he should march with the attillerie to the hospitall, a place right ouer against Bonn. In this meane while Triunlee was aduertised by his espials, that many troupes of light orlemen of that part of the Venetian armie which lay on the other fide Paw, were the next ght to approch Mirandola to dreffe fome ambush: against whome he fent out secretly cerine hotlemen, who being come vp to Belair, a plaine house in the countrey of Mirandola, und within it Leonard Napolitam captaine of the Venetran light horsemen, and a man of great ace and reputation in the armie: he nothing doubting that his enemies would descend so farre to that place, was withdrawne thither onely with fiftie horse, and there expecting a greater ength that was to follow, he with many of his were flaine, their valout not being able to rethe malice of their fortune, Alfonso d'Este came to the Hospitall according to his direction, egianing the night following to camploy his artillerie against Bondan: and at the fame time, or omitting the oportunitie of their felicitie, Triunice fent Guaffonlord of Foix the kings fifters nne, a man very young and newly come to the armie the yeare before, to runne vp euen to the irres of the enemies campe, with an hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen, and ue hundred footmen, with whome he put to flight fine hundred footmen appointed to gard at front or part of the campe. By this example, bringing diffrust of greater perill, all the residue auing Bondin under good gard, retired into places of Itrength on the other fide the Canall. The ounfels of warre & enterprise carrie with them for the most part a succeesse variable & differing orm expectation, for that no more in those actions, then in any other mortall causes, the euises of man can not be separate from their imperfections; not one of the plots of Trivalce succeeded as was looked for, for that the artilleric planted against Bondin made little exploit both for the distance of the place (Paw being betweene them) and also the river being swelled and the rifing part cut off by them of Bondin, it fo drowned the countrey, that there was n possibilitie of passage from the front of the French campe to Bondin but vpon barkes. In so muc as the Captaine dispairing eftsoones to vse the commoditie of that way to distresse the lodging c the enemies, called from Verona two thousand Launceknights, giving also direction to leavi three thousand Grisons, the better to draw neare them by the waies of Saint Felix, in case th peace proceeded not by the working of the Bishop of Gurci, whose comming had benemiad somewhat the more slowe and delitorie, for that at Sale vpon the lake of Garde he had in vair. expected aunswere from the Pope, whome he had prayed by letters to send Embassadors t negociate. At last he came to Mantua accompanied with Dom Peter de Vree ordinarily resi dent with Cafar for the king of Aragon: not many daies after arrived there the Bishop of Paris the French king (who to be more neare the folicitations of peace, and the better to furnish hi provisions for the warre, was now come to Lyon) perswading him selfe that the Pope woul also send thither and joyne frankly in the action. But such was his obstinacie against the deuot willes of all these great Princes, that he made great instance to have the Bishop of Gures to con. to him: not so much that he thought it aunswered the expectation of his dignitie Pontificall, for that he hoped, that in loading him with honors, ceremonies, and promifes, joyned to the eff cacie and authoritie of his presence, he might raunge him, and make him conformable toh will, being now more estranged then euer from peace and agreement; wherein to make thek bour more easie, and the successe agreable to his desire, he solicited Hierome Vich which was Valence and Embassadour resident for the king Catholike, to go on his behalfe to the Bishop Gurci. The Bishop of Gurci refused not to condiscend to the Popes will, but he obiceted, th it were good he would first take order for that that was to be done afterwards, affuring that the difficulties would be more easily diffolued and decided, if the negociation were first manage at Mantua, with intention to go afterwards to the Pope with matters well debated, and almo resolued. He alleaged that this course he was bound to take, no lesse for the necessitie thense the facilitie of things: For, asit could not be convenient for him to leave alone the Bishop Paris, whome the French king had fent to Mantua at the instance of Casar, so there was a hope he should debate in the affaires of his king, and no lesse inconvenient to require him to with him to the Pope, feeing that neither it aunswered his commission, nor the dignitic of i king, to go to the house of the enimic afore their controversies were accorded, or at least ver neare to beresolued. Of the contrarie, the two Embassadors of Aragon, declared that t whole hope of peace making, depended upon the agreement & composing of the affaires of Fe rara, for that they being determined, and no more cause remaining to the Pope to sustainet Venetians, they should be constrained to yeeld to peace with such lawes and conditions as Cal would: That the Pope pretended that the sea Apostolike had great & strong rights ouer the cie of Ferrara, & did esteeme Alfonso to haue vied towards him a great ingratitude, & had do him many vnworthie injuries: that to abate & qualifie the rigor of his mind which was now fi of displeasure, it was more convenient that the subject or vasfall should implore the elemencie his Lord, then to come & dispute of his instice. For which reasons they perswaded that it was n only comly & honest, but also convenient & necessarie, to go to him, in which just humilitie a fubmission they doubted not but he would diminish a great part of his rigour. They thought not profitable that that diligence, that industrie, that authoritie which was to be employed disposethe Pope to peace, should be consumed in perswasions tending to endes doubtsu Lastly, they added with very sweete words, that neither could matters have their full disput tion, northe quarrels fufficiently fearched into, valeffe all the parties were together in full al stance. And that within Mantna was onely but one part, for that Cefar, the French king, and t king Catholike, were in such vnitie of leagues, parentages, & antities, that in this action they we to be reputed as brethren, the interests of every particular being common to them all. What! these persuasions and other respectes more specialland private, the Bishop of Gurci suffred linfelfeto be wonne to goe thither, with intention that the Bishop of Paris should expect: Parma, what would be the successe of his voyage. During these actions, the Pope notwilstanding all solicitation made appertaining to the peace, had not yet altered his thoughts from

warre, entertaining the one with shewes diffembled, and embracing the other with defires burg and importunate: he supposed to surprise of new the bastillion of Geniuola, recommending charge of that enterprise to John Vitelli: but aswell for the small and flow payments that were de, the numbers of footenen were farre inferiour to the appointment, as also that all the couny thereabouts flood ouerflowed both by the plentic of raynes that fell, and by the cutting of rilings of the tiuer of Pam, there was nothing aduquiced . Befides; Alphonfo d'Este was the onger by water, who, with an armie of gallies and brigantines fo charged the Venetian fleete are S. Albert, that what with the furie of that encounter, and with the feare of another fleete of er vessels which they discerned sayling from Comaccho, they retired to the port of Ranena with loffe of two fulles, two barbots, & more then fourtie smaller vessels. This accident disappointhe Popes hope to take the bastillion, and therefore he returned those companies to the campe ichlodged at Finalo, very much weakned of the firength of footemen for that the pay was to all. About this time the Pope created eight Cardinals, partly to allure to him the mindes of nces, and partly to arme him against the threatnings of the Councell. Such as he created were lates learned and experienced, & as they bare in the Court of Rome a great authoritie, fo they repersonages of specials election, such as he reposed most suretie in: of the number of this crea-1 was the Archbishop of Yorke Embassadour for the king of England, and the Bishop of Syon, one being a man of importance to flirre vp the Smiffers, and the other being gracious with his whom he hoped to kindle against the Frenchmen. And to draw on the Bishop of Gurci as it e with an earnest penny certaine of the same dignitie, & with that hope to make him the more hable to his defire, he referued to himfelfe with the coffent of the Confistorie, a power to name ther, fuch a one as he had fashioned already in his minde. After he vnderstood that the Bishop Parce had confented to come to him, he determined to receive him with great honour, whereexpresse more office then the estate of a Bishop of Gurci could chalenge, and lesse respect 1 appertamed to so supreme a dignitic as a high Bishop of Rome, he went from Rauenna to ogma, to the end to joyne the magnificence of the place to the refidue of honours he preten-.There he received him with pompes and ceremonies equall to the estate and dignitie of any the glory of his demonstrations and shewes giving great detection of his diffembled minde. Bi hop also for his part expressed no lesse pompe and magnificence, for that descending into se with the title of Cafars Lieutenant, he came accompanied with a very great trayne of nobiall their bands and followers being fumptuoufly apparelled. The Embaffadour of Verice rent with the Pope came to meete him at the gate of the towne, making fignes of very great million: but he, with a wonderfull pride and arrogancie both in his gestures & wordes, shewed felfe not a litle discontenced, that he that represented the enemies of Casar, could not so much le his impudencie and boldnesse, as to forbeare to come in his presence. With this pompehe t vp to the publike Confistorie, where the person of the Pope attended him with all the Carils: there he expressed in short speech, but with very hawtie and proud wordes, that as Cafar fent him into Italie, in a defire to obtaine that that appertained to him, more by the way of te then by the rigour of warre: so neuerthelesse, there was no place or possibilitie for peace, if Venetians made not franke restitution of those things that belonged to him in any fort soe-. A'ter he had declared thus much in publike audience, he deliuered no lesse in private to the e, nothing abating his hawtineffe: and the day following he accompanied thefe feuere begins with actions no lesse proud & arrogant: for the Pope having by his consent appointed three dinals to negociate with him, the Cardinall S. George, Cardinall Regina, & Cardinall de Mewho attended him at the houre affigned to meete together: he fent three of his Gentlemen egociate with them excusing himselfe to have other businesse, holding it indeede a matter of is indignitie to debate with any other then the Pope. This indignitie with many others the e swallowed sweetly the incredible hatred which he bare to the French, surmounting the diftion of his nature. But in the accord betweene Cefar and the Venetians which began first to leawne into disputation, there were many difficulties: for albeit the Cardinall of Gures who in beginning had demanded all the townes, confented in the end that Padoa and Treuisa should nine to them with all their partes and apertenances, yet he stucke to have them give to Cain recompence a very great quantitie of money, and that they should hold them of himin efe,& resigne to him the rights of the other townes. Matters which could neuer be agreed yato

by the Senate of Venice, wherein it was vniuerfally cottcluded, that it was better for their cot mon weale, having already fo fortified Padoa and Trenifa that they feared not to loofe them, preserve and keepe their money, for that if ever that tempest passed over, there might fall out for occasion to recouer easily all the residue of their dominion. On the other side the Pope nou shed an importunate defire to have them agreed with Colar, hoping to make that an occasion to estraunge him from the French king, in which regard he pressed them partly by requestes, a partly by threates, to accept the conditions that were offred them: but his authoritie was no me To great with them, not so much for that they were not ignerat from where proceeded so great defire, as for that they knew that their affociation and companie was fo necessary to him if he we not reconciled with the French king, that they made affured reckenings that he would never bandon them. Neuertheleffe, after the trauell of many dayes and much disputation made, thele Thop of Guree abating formewhat of the hard conditions which he offered, and the Venetians ye. ding more to the vehement inflance of the Pope then they had determined, and withail the E bassadours of the king of Aragon interposing in the action, it seemed they came at last to accomp the Venetians (the better to retaine Padou and Trenifa by the confent of Cafar) paying hi fummes of money, but referred to long termes. There refled onely a meane to recencile the Pe and the French king, betweene whom appeared no other difference then for the quarrels of Duke of Ferrara: and to resolve them with the residue of the controversics (for without t Cafar was determined to establish nothing) the Bishop of Garci went to speake with the Pe (to whom he went but feldome) being perfwaded by the hopes which the Cardinall of Pa and the Catholike kings Embassadours had put him in , that it would be a matter of very e action : and on the other fide he knew, that the French king having leffe regard to dignitie the tranquilitie, was disposed to consent to many things, which base but little presudice to the D of Ferrara. But the Pope on the contrary cutting him offat the first, began to exhort him, agreeing with the Venetians, he should leave at libertic the matters of Ferrara, seeming to forie that Cefar knew not the occasion that offered, to be reuenged with the forces and mo of another, of so many great injuries done against him by the French; and withall that he ried to be required in a matter wherein reasonably he should be seech others with great insta To which things when the Bishop of Gures had replyed with many reasons, seeing he was: able to turne him from his opinion, he told him he would depart without giving other perfect to the peace with the Venetians: and at the instant, having according to the custome, killer feete, he departed the same day (being the sisteenth after his arrivall at Bolognia) to Modona: Pope sending after him in vayne to call him againe, assoone as he was departed the Citie: fro . . dona he tooke his way towards Milla, complaining of the Pope for many things, but specially t that whilest by his comming into Italy there was almost a generall surccasing fro armes, the P: had fent fectetly the Bishop of Vinteraille, sonne to the late Cardinall Fregosa, to trouble the I: of Genes: neuertheleffe the Frenchmen fet fuch good espiall of his journey, that they tooke his a the countrey of Montferat all difguifed and voknowen as he was, and from thence carried hir Millan, where he made manifest detection of the cause of his going, and the whole enterprise s present perill driving him to seeke his safetie more by disclosing then by excusing. When the shop of Gurci departed from Bolognia, he required the Embassadours of Aragon (secuings a litle discotented with the Popes obstinacie) to see returned to the realme of Naples the three! dred Spanish Launces: whereunto they condiscended readily: a matter which made me to mail the more, for that at the same time that the general Councell was in negociation, with expects n that the armies of Fraunce & Germanie accompanied with the prefence of their Princes, shoule most mighty in Italie, the Pope, besides the ill will of the French king, separated Cafar from 1, and stood deprived of the succours of the king Catholike, Some doubted that in this action (a most in all others) the counsels of the king of Aragon were different fro his demonstrations, & it his Embaffadours had practifed one thing in publike, & another thing in fecret with the Pope x that having provoked the Frech king by new offences, & in the fame given a new memory to 1ciet wrongs, it seemed he ought to seare least the peace with all others came not to be the caul of great perils against him, the Venetias remaining weakned of estate, of money, & reputatio, & 1-Jar no more mighty in Italie, & more variable & prodigall then ever. Others that discoursed no futtelly and deepely of things, made this interpretation, that not with flanding all protestations at thing Catholike made to abandon the Pope, year though he reuoked his bands, yet the Pope evelt firmely in this confidence, that he would alwayes support and defend him in his greatest a cellities, confidering that the embacing of him could not but be prejudiciall to the king. Within foure dayes after the departing of the Bithop of Gures, the Pope fent after him the Scoth Embaliadour to debate of the peace with the French king, wherein the effect was no leffe frufate, then the deuise and hope of the Pope were vayne. And as by his departing the hopes of repeace were left troubled, and leffe expectation of agreement in fo great a discord of wils: fo his going away also did cease the causes that had so long lingred tohn lacques Triunlee, who rifled in an honest ambition to do something worthy his vertue and anneient glorie, and by the vich he might induce the king to know, how hurtfull it is to recommende the government of virres (a matter about all other humaine actions most painefull and hard, and most requiring difection and experience) not to Captaines able and trayned, but to young men vnexperienced, ed of whose vertue there is none other thing to give testimonie then favour and countenaunce. dierefore continuing in his first resolutions, not withstanding the soote bands of the Grissia were rt yet arrined(for the Generall of Normandie, vpon whom depended the expeditions, had defred to fend men to leanie them, both hoping that the peace would go forward, and alfo feekig to anoyd expenses to the king) he brought the campe afore Concorda in the beginning of by, containing a thousand two hundred Launces and seuen thousand sootemen: he tooke it fanie day he prefented his campe afore it, wherein the fecuritie of the townefmen helped no ethen his owne valour, for that being made fearefull with the first execution of the artillerie, lilest they fent Embassadours to make their composition with him, the footemen of his arentred the towne and facked it, the townefinen being negligent in their gard, by the be they had in their Embassadours that were sent out to capitulate for their safeties . After the ing of Concorda, to the end to give no occasion to such as envied him to charge him with tialitie, as respecting more his proper profite, then the kings service, he lest Mirandola sindhim, and drew towardes Bonport (a village vpon the river of Panaro) to approch fo re the enemie, as either to constraine them to dislodge, or to fight out of their strength, by the same meane to cut off their victuals and prouisions. As he was entred into the counof Modona and lodged in the Village of Caueffe, he sent Gaston de Foix with three hun-I footemen and fine hundred horfemen, to do an enterptife vpon Iohn Paule Manfron, that at Maffa neare to Finale with three hundred light horsemen of the Venetians, who hearing heir comming put himselfe in battell array vpon a bridge: but the valour of his souldiers not vering his vertue and courage, he was made prisoner, being abandoned both of his foreand faith of his people. After this the armie drawing neare to Bonport, Triunlee had an inion to call a bridge there where the channell which is drawne from aboue Modona out of the r of Paniro, entreth into the river: but the enemie, to give impediment to his passage over the r, was already incomped in a place so neare, that they distressed him with their artilleries, wherh Captaine Perault a Spaniard & commaunder within the Church army, was killed, as he walalong the rifing of the river. In that place the banke is very high, by which helpe as it was easie he enemic to diffresse him: so Trivalce, meeting with these impediments by a new counsell, his bridge formewhat higher, a myle onely aboue the channell: and hauing paffed the channell lrew towardes Modona, marching along the rifing of Panaro, and feeking out a place where night more eafily cast his bridge. But because he saw alwayes afore him, bands of horsemen & men of his enemies, who were incamped neare to Frankcastell vp6 the way of Romagnia (but ir lodgings all enuironed with bankes and waters) he came by the same way to the bridge of Talto two myles neare to Modona, and there turning on the left hand towardes the moune, he passed without impedimet the foord of Panaro, which in that place hath his channels very le & without banks: fro thence he encamped in a place called the beach of Panaro three myles n the army Ecclefiallike. The day after he drew towards Plumacce, being refurnished with vials fro them of Modona by the cofent of Vufruch. And likewife the fame day the army Eccletike, which durst not present theselues in plaine field, supposing it very necessary to draw neare Bolognia, the better to preuet all mutinies & flirres in that citie, the rather for that the family of Betwole's followed the Frech army, went & incaped at the bridge of Cafalecquo three myles pue Bolognia, a place very strog & sure, having his situation betweene the river of Rene and the chanell & by the commoditie of the mountaine at his backe, it defendes Bolognia fro all privati, of the reliefe of the channell, which coming from the river, passeth into that Citie: this is that ple wherein in the dayes of our aunceftours John Galeas Viscount the mightie Duke of Millan c. tained a most great victorie against the Florentines, the Bologmans and other states confeden his numbers farre exceeding the enemies. The day following Frankcastell was rendred to T. nulce, who, after he had remained three dayes in the lodging of Plumacce, both for the inj. diment of the raines that fell, and alfo to reuichuall his people being then in great necessitie, came to incampe upon the high way betweene Samoggia and Frankeaftell, where he floor great doubt what he were belt to do for many difficulties that appeared to him in all delibers, ons: for, he knew well enough that it would be to no purpose to execute any thing against Bo gnia, if the people made no tumult within: and if he should draw neare to it vndcr hope of pop. lar emotios, he feared he should be compelled to retire as Chaumont did, not without diminut of his reputation: and he knew that it would be a matter of greater perill and indifferction, to fight with the enemies incomped in places of strength and of advantage: and to make his appre to Bologma on that fide below, there was no other hope, fauing that haply the enemies might moue for feare leaft he affailed Romagnia, in which might be offered fome occasion, either to h to fight or to the people of Bologma to make some tumult. Neuerthelesse in the end after hell resolued to make triall, if either the universall disposition of the Citie, or the particular intelligit of the Bentinoleis, would fland him in any fleed, he led the armie, the vauntgard guided by Th. dore Triulce the maine battell by himselfe, and the rearegard by Gaston de Foix, to incamp the bridge of Laine, which is a place upon the high way five myles from Bolognia, and bearing perpetuall renowme for the memoric of the enterview of Lepidus, Marke Anth. & Ottanius, N by the testimonie of histories, under the name of Triumniral, established in that place the tyr nie of Rome, together with that profeription which can never be blamed and detelled enough The Pope was not at this time at Bolognia, but fince the departure of the Bishop of Gures be perplexed in varietie of thoughts and counfels, fomerimes courage and fometimes feare bear dominion in him, affoone as he heard Triunlee began to march (notwithstanding the Spa Launces were gone) he went from Bolognia to the armic, to the end by his prefence to encour the Captaines to give battell to the enemies, to the which he could never dispose them, either his letters, or labour of his Embassadors: he departed with intetion to lodge the first day at Ce but he was compelled to lodge within the towne of Piena, for that a thousand of his footer which were entred within Cente, refused to depart till they were satisfied of their payes: whe pon being either made angry with this contempt, or haply looking more deepely into the predaunger, he altered his resolution, returning estsoones to Bolognia, where his seares so redouble pon him by the approching of Trunlee, that being determined to go to R auenna, he fent for Magistrates, to whom he occupied these perswasions: That by the benefite of the sca Apostol & by his meane & labour, they had shaken off a yoke of most grieuous tyrannie, and had obtain libertie with many exemptios, befides many graces both publike & private which they had reued & were to receive of him in particular: by which meane, in place where before they were l den oppressed with most hard seruitude, & so embased and troden down by tyrants, that in or parts of Italy there was no reputation of them, now they were raifed into honour & riches, t't Citie replenished with all fortes of trades & marchandises,& some of the established in right v thy & high dignities. In fo much as now, their fortune being changed, they bare an universallputation in every place, they flood free of the felues, absolute Lords of Bolognia, & the whole ritorie, the offices & honors being in their hands, & the publike revenues of their citie in their c distribution onely the Church hath but the name, & keepeth there for signe of superioritie a Les or governour, who much lesse that without the can deliberate of any matter of importance, less that for fuch causes as are referred to his arbitration, he comunicateth ordinarily with them, 1)iecting himselfe to their adulse and wils. That if for these benefites & prosperities, there remaid in them any defire to defend their proper libertie, they should receive of him no worse success. comfort, and protection, then he would minister to the Citie of Rome, standing in the like necestie: That though the importace of the present affaires costrained him to go to Rome, yet, he nei or did nor would forget to prouide for the furetie & safetie of Bolognia: That for that regard, he id giue direction, that the Venersan bands which lay on the other fide Pam with Andrew Gritts & the end cast the bridge at Sermidy, should come to joyne with the armie: That albeit his prouihas were very able and sufficient to defend them, yet he could not rest contented, nor satisfiif withall he left them not deliuered from the troubles of the warre. In which respect, to die the Frenchmen into necessitie to defend their owne things, there were already leanyed thousand Swiffers to descend upon the Duchie of Willan: and for their better provision expedition, he had fent twenty thousand duckats to Venice, the Venetians preparing the fumme. Neuerthelesse if they had rather returne under the servitude of the Bentinoless, then daioy the sweetenesse of the libertie of the Church, he defired them to expresse frankely what ids they bare, for that he would make himselfe conformable to their likings : onely he told han that if they had any resolution to defend themselues, the time now was very contienient onely to expresse their vertue, but also to make bound to them for euer, the sea Apostolike, felfe, and all the succession of Popes that should come after him. To this forme of perswasipronounced (according to his cultome) with more feruency then eloquence, after they had cated amongest themselues in councell, the President of the government made answer in hame of the whole, not forgetting with words of great boatting to magnific their faith, their hikfulnesse to benefits, and their perpetuall and infinit deuotion of his holinesse and name: That were not ignorant of the happy estate wherein they stood, and how much, since the expulof Tyrants, their wealth had bene augmented, together with the worship of their city: That re before their liues and haujors were miserably subjected to the commandement of others, by the benefit of peace and tranquilitie they live in furctie, their lives without feare, and goods without perill of execution, their persons pertaking in the government and in the mues: That there was not one amongeft them who had not particularly received of him maraces & honors: That they fawe renewed in their citie the dignity of Cardinalship, and many icir Citizer's furnished with the principall officer of the Court of Rome. In recompence of ch fingular benefits, they bare minds disposed to consume all their goods, to weare and wast proper lives, and to put in perill the honor & fafety of their wives & children, rather then to nyiote from the deuotion of the sea Apostolike. Therefore they desired him to depart, no happy then glad, nourishing neither feare nor leasousie touching the things of Bolognia, for he should sooner heare that all the channell should swim with the bloud of the people of Boia, then that city should call upon other name or obey other Lord then Pope Iulio, The man, aspireth is credulous in all things that are conformable to his hope, yea sometimes his am-, on makes him beleeue contrary to reason or wildome. These words protested more in glory, with good meaning, gaue to the Pope a greater hopethen was conuenient : and leauing the Cardinall of Paula, he went to Rauenna, not by the high way, although he was accomed with the Spanish lances which returned to the realme of Naples, but for feare of the Duke errara, he tooke the way of Furly, which further about, he went from Bolognia better fatisthen well affared, and could not but expect of them fidelitie and confidence whom he had screetly left to their liberty and discretion . After Truulce was come to the bridge of Laine, ity of Bologma began to declare an univertall murinure, the minds of men being replenished diuetle impressions and thoughts: some accustomed to the liberty of tyrannie, and to liue of goods of the flates of others, defined vehemently the returne of Bentynoleis, hating already jouernement Ecclesiastike: some, as well for the harmes they had already received, as for the : of further hurts, feeing two fuch armies vpon their lands and ready to cut downe their hardefired all things by the which they might be deliuered from fuch ruines: others, affore whose stood yet the memory of the french insolencies, executed in their city vnder Monsieur Chaue, and fearing now least by their well speeding, the city drawing into tumult, might come to ucked, seemed not to care into what gouernement or intildiction they fell, so that in it they at be affured to be deliuered from fuch daungers. There were very few that affore had deed themselues enemies to the familie of Bentuoley, which now favored the iurisdiction of Church, and that more in shew then in good meaning. In so much that the whole being whe into armes, some for defire of innouation and change, and some for their proper surety; things were full of feare and confusion: the Cardinall of Pania and Legat resident in Bologhad neither courage nor councell sufficient for such a daunger. Besides, in a city so great and Julous, he having no more but two hundred light horfemen and a thoufand footemen, and beat that time more then euer at variance with the Duke of Vrbyn, who lay with the army as

Cafalecqua, he had either at aduenture or by destinic leauyed and payed fisteene Captaines the Citizens, to whom, together with their companies and with the people, he had committed is gard of the towne: it feemed he yied no great regard in the election of these Captaines, forth the most part of them were of the faction of the Bentinoleis, but principally Lawrence Ario, who, being first imprisoned and racked at Rome for suspition of conspiracie with the famulies Bentinoles, suffered afterwards a long imprisonment in the castle of S. Ange. The people after they had once their weapons in their hands, began to draw to affemblies, & make fecret conne ticles, spreading through the towne new slanders: Their manifest rebellion began to make the se gat fee too late into his owne indifferetion, and to anoide the perill whereinto he had broug himselfe, he appointed that the new Captaines with their bands should go to the army, faynight too late that the Duke of From would it fo : but they answering that it was not reasonable the should abandon the gard of their towne, he proved to bring in Captaine Ramaffete with a the fand footmen, which the people would not suffer. These manifest contempts made the Cardin both a coward & desperate, being vnable by perswasion & pollicie to releene the perill which had put vpon himselfe, not by fortune, but by negligence. Therefore remembring how hateful; gouernement was to the people, and himselse no lesse detested of the Nobles, for that not lone fore vnder the Popes comandement, & power royall as he fayd, he had cut off the heads of th honourable Citizens: he stole out of the pallace by a secret way and in disguised habits, and fuddenly withdrew himfelfe into the Citadell, that he forgot to cary with him his Iewels & n ney, which he fent for in hafte after, and so went out by the gate towards I mola, accompan with a band of horimen led by Guido Vaine who had maried his fifter, and was Captaine of horsmen appointed for his gard, A little after him went out of the Citadell Olla. Fregofa with other company then a guide, they both fuffering one fortune as they were both followers of cause. The flying of the Legat was no sooner known ein the towne, then throughout the whole ty the name of the people was cried and called ypon with great tumult and emotion: an occal which Ariofto not willing to lose, together with Frauncis Rusacci one of the fifteene Captaine affected to the Bentinoless, they tooke many of their followers and faction, and ran to the gate: S. Felix and Lama most convenient for the campe of the Frenchmen, which they brake o with barres and hatchets, and being possessed of them they fent immediatly to call Bentiuoleis: and they receiving of Triunlee, many French horiemen to avoid the high wa the bridge of Rene which was garded by Raphaell de Passi one of the Captaines of the Chu they palled the river more low, and approching the gate of Lama were let in, their gladneffe ing nothing inferior to their fortune. To this rebellion of Bolognia was added the breaking & ing away of the army: for, about three of the clocke in the night, the Duke of Irbin whole be of fouldiers firetched out from the bridge of Cafaleequa vntill the gate of Saragoffe, heatin the flying of the Legar and mutinies of the people, left the molt part of his tents and paul pitched, and in great half went away with the whole armie, except those that being appoint for the gard of the campe, were on that fide the river towards the Frenchmen, to whom s " haste would not suffer him to give knowledge of his discamping ; it is seldome scene that one " uerfity commeth alone, and it is found in all ages and times then when illes begin to fall, ty "thunder all at once. For, the Bentuoless being now entred the towne, hearing of the breaking of the campe, gaue present aduertisement to Triunice, & sent out of the towne a part of the ple to difftesse them: by whom and by the multitudes of paysants which descended on all s with rude cries and brutes, their campe that passed along the wals was assailed, their artillers & munitions taken from them, and the most part of their baggage spoyled: not with slanding is Frenchthat by this time were come to the medley took from the people & payfants by fore violence, the things they had rauished from others with the perill of their lines. By this time o Theoder Triunice with the vaunt guard was arrived at the bridge of Rene, where Raphaell Fis with fingular valour made head long time against his enemies, but being ouercharged both th numbers and fortune, he was at last taken prisoner, having given by the resistance he made, a >table oportunity to the Churchfouldiers to faue themselves. But the Venetian companies & ie bands of Raffotte which lay vpo the hill aboue S. Luke, having but very late knowledge of the ying of the Duke of Vrbin, fought their fafeties by the waies of the mountaines, by the which the wich flanding they received great harmes, they got at last into Romagma. In this victory won v hout fighting, were taken 15 peeces of great artillery, & many of leffer fort, belonging both to be be and to the Venetians: certainemen at armes of the Church spoiled and stripped together h an hundred and fiftie of the Venetians, and almost all the sootemen of both the one & the er armie dispersed. There remained prisoners Vrsin de Mugnano, Iulia Manfron, with ny other Captaines of meane condition: within Bolognia there was not a manslaine, not a violence done either to the Nobles or to the Commons, onely there were made prisoners, Bishop of Cluso together with many other Prelats, Secretaries, and officers which were aat the Cardinall and remained still in his pallace, for that he had kept from them his depar-. The same night and the day following the people fell vpon an image of brasse being the people fell vpon an image of brasse being the people fell vpon an image of brasse being the people fell vpon an image of brasse being the rereuerence to the Image, then they bare affectio to the person that it represented the cause his insolencie was referred either to the souldiers of Bentinoley who could not be gouerned, He to the humout of the people, who bearing a nature vnthankfull & defirous of new things, no lesse weary with the trauels and harmes of the warre, bare hatred to the name and merie of him that had bene the cause of the libertie and selicitie of their countrey. The day after ch was the xxij of May Tryunice stayed in his lodging, and the day following, leaning Bogia behind him, he drew to the river of Adice, & afterward stayed at the borough of S. Peter ch is a frontier upon the territories of Bologma, expecting before he marched further, what ald be the intention of the French king, whether he would execute any further action vpon state of the Pope, or else contenting him selse to have reassured Ferrara, and taken from the irch the citie of Bolognia which he had gotten by his meanes, he would establish there course of this victorie. By reason of this temporising, although Sassatella the Popes Cape, and who having chased out of Y mola the faction Gibeline, commaunded that citie as chiefe ne Guelfes, made him secret offers to put into his hands the citie of Ymola, yet he refused to eptit till he had the kings aunswere. There rested onely the Citadell of Bolognia, wherein the Bishop of Vitells, a Citadell large and strong, but manned and furnished according to custome of the fortreffes of the Church, containing but a verie slender strength of sootmen, e small prouision of victuals, and almost no munitions at all. Whilest it was holden besieged, fruch, being certified of the successe of Bodognia, was come from Modona by night to perde the Bishop with great promises and offers to deliuer it to Casar: but the Bishop, having fift day compounded with them of Bolognia, that the lives and goods of fuch as were within uld be faued, and received obligation that within a time certaine they should pay him three usand duckets, deliuered it vp into their hands: and they were no sooner possessed of it, then y ranne by heapes to difmantle and reverse it, the Bentinoleis stirring them to the action, not such to winne fauour with the citizens, as for feare least the French king would withhold it, ne of his Captaines being alreadie of a counsell to demaund it: but Tryuulce would neuer his confent, for that he thought it would be a thing contrarie to the kings profit to give ocon to thinke that he had defire to make him felfe Lord of Bolognia. By the occasion of this torie, the Duke of Ferrara recoursed befides Cento and Piena, Cotignuola, Lugo and the ortownes of Romagnia, expulsing at the fame time Albert Pie vino possessed them in comn with him.

It was reasonable, that the Pope should receive great discontentments for the loss of Boloa, not onely for that the Citie of most importance through the whole state Ecclesiastike, next Rome, was taken from him, wherein he suffered privation of that glorie which he had gotten conquering it, which was no lesse great towards men, then most principall and great in his me conceit: but also for seare least the same fortune & selicitie which in that action had made enemie happie, would not estsoones allure him to pursue his victorie surther: such be the vations of mindes possessed with doubts and feate, and such the motions and suggestions of a inscience troubled and insected. He knew if the armie should prosecute the course of their viorie, there was in him no abilitie of resistance: and seeking to remove all occasions that might buoke them to passe further, he solicited that the remainders of the Venetian souldiers already unked by the Senat, should embarke at the port of Cesena, and for the same cause he sent to unerstored to him the xx. thousand duckets, which remained yet in Venice, being sent thither oretos street of the synsers. Moreover he gave order, that the Cardinall of Nants a Bruton ration, should as it were of him self, solicite Trynulce to peace, perswading that the time was then convenient to worke it: but the Cardinall made aunswere that it was not convenience proceede in that generalitie, but rather to come expressely to particularities: he told him to when the king defited peace, he did offer the conditions, and that it was now no leffe necessy for the Popeto do thelike, the estate of the affaires so requiring, and his present fortune noting impugning. The Pope yled this maner of proceeding, more to avoid the present danger, then or any defire he had to have peace, striuing in himat one time feare, obstinacy, hatred, and disdain and with these passions was concurrant at the same time another accident that hapned, redibling in him his forrowes, and making him suspect and seare surther: there were brought to m many acculations against the Cardinall of Pania, some charged him with infidelity, some posed vpon him cowardise, and some blamed him of negligence, curry one thinking to makeis fault the greater by the varietie of their imputations: he came to R auenna to make his own(1stification, and sent to the Pope to signifie his comming, and to have affignation for audience to whom the Pope, whose gladnesse for his comming, was nothing inferior to the affection he re him, made answer that he should come to dine with him. But as he was going to the Popes illace, being accompanied Guido Vaine & the gard of his horfemen, the Duke of Vrbyn, bot or an auncient hatred he bare him, and also for a suspition that the revolt of Bolognia have through his fault, by which occasion followed the flying of the army, followed him with a lall traine, and thrusting in amongst his gard of horsmen who for reverence sake made him place flue the Cardinall with his owne hands: he might haply feeme worthy for the degree he vpó who violent hands should not be layed, but touching his infinit vices, he descrued most cel punishment, his faults being farre greater then the opinion that went on them, & his vertues me leffethen were convenient for such a profession. Assoone as the report of his death was broken to the Pope, he began to lament with miferable cries and complaynings, being not a little me for the loffe of a Cardinall fo deare to him, but much more touched that fuch a holy dignit is into violation almost euen affore his eyes, by the hands of his owne Nephew, & with an example not yled: a matter fo much the more greeuous to him, by how much he made profession to a ferue & exalt the authority Ecclefiastike. These forrowes he was not able to beare, and much she to temper his furie, in which respect, as also with the presence of the place to pretermit the migry of the fact, he departed the fame day from R auema to returne to Rome: and, to the encist at one time he were enuironed on all parts with infinit calamities, he was no fooner arrived: & miny, then he had aduertifement that within Modona, within Bolognia, and in many other is s there were fixed and fet up many placards in publike places, by the which was denounced to in the conuccation of the Councell, with citation to go thither in person.

For, as the Bishop of Gurcy, after he was gone from Modona, had trauelled certaine day by casic iorneis, expecting the answer of the Scottish Embassador, who went from him to Bot via for affayres which the Pope himselse had propounded: so, he being estsoones returned with fwers very vncettaine, the Bishop of Gurcy dispatched immediatly to Millan in the name of far three Proctors, who, ioyning with the Cardinals and with the Proctors of the French published the councell to be celebrated the first day of September next in the city of Pifa. The Cardinals made choyse of Pifa, as a place no lesse convenient for the oportunity of the sea for those that were there to affemble, then of speciall furety for the confidence the french king I in the Florentine: And withall, for that many other places, which though they might have bi capable of fuch an affembly, yet they were either inconvenient or suspected, or at least the pe might refuse them with just colour: There had bene no conveniencie to assemble it in Frau to in other place of the kings obedience, and Costance one of the free townes of Germany recon ded by Cafar, seemed for this action to beare no indifferencie, not with standing it had bene 100 notable by that worthy Councel, wherein three Popes were deposed, & the schisme confou led that had continued for fortie yeares in the Church: And in Thurin was more matter of su iti on to both parties, for the neighbourhood of the Swiffers and the estates of Fraunce: Bol mi afforcit was out of the obedience of the Church was not fure for the Cardinals: and, nni stands in the like case for the regard of the Pope. Moreover in the election of the tow ! 0 Pifa was partly respected the felicitie of an example past touching the memorie of two Cun cels which had been ethere right happily celebrated : the one, when almost all the Car ial who abandoned Gregorie the twelfth, and Benet the thirteenth, quarelling together fo the pedome, chose Pope Alexander the fift, celebrating the Councell in that Citie: and the other hich was long time before celebrated in the same place about the yere 1136, by Innocent the fend, at fuch time as Peter Leon Antipape of Rome was condemned, who making himfelf be cal-Anacles us the second, with such a schisine had not only much troubled Innocent, but also all eregions of Christendome. The Florentins had afore accorded Pylato the French king, who quired it of them, guing them to understand that Cafar, no less then he, was the author of convocation of the Councell, the king of Aragonallo confenting and concurring in it. In is action the Florentins deferue to be praifed, more perhaps for their filence, then for their wifme or constancie: for, either not having the courage to denie the king the thing that was grieous to them, or not confidering how many difficulties and dangers might grow upon them by a oucell which was celebrated against the Popes wil, they held so secret that deliberatio that was ade in an affemblie or Councell of more then an hundred and fiftie Citizens, that the Cardinals whom the French king gaue hope of their conformitie, were neuer affured that they had acrded, ne ther had the Pope any knowledge of it. The Cardinals pretended that the Councell ight be judicially called by them, without the authority of the Pope, for the prefent necessity sthey (aid) that the Church had, to be reformed, not only in her members, but also in her head, eaning the person of the Pope: they published him to be so hardned in Simony, and corrup-I with maners infamous and damnable, both vnfit to gouerne the Papacie; and author of fo any visualt warres, that he was incorrigible, to the visuerfall flaunder of all Christendome, for : fafetie and preservation of whom, there was no other medicine sufficient, then the convocatitof a Councell: whereof feeing the Pope made no care, they alleaged that the full and legititte power of connocation was divolued to them, specially the authority of the elect Emperour ing adjoyned, and the consent of the right Christian king, together with the Clergie of Gerine and Fraunce concurring: they pertwaded, that to vie often this medicine, was a meane t only profitable but necessarie for the diseased bodie of the Church, both to roote out the old ors, and to refift such others as would of new bud vp: to explane and interpret the doubts nich dayly happened, and to correct things which though in the beginning were found and ell ordered, yet in that triail they appeared pernicious by experience: that for these reasons ancient Fathers in the Councell of Constance had wholsomly enacted and provided, it for alwayes afterwards the Councell should be celebrated from ten yeares to ten ares: the Popes had no other bridle then this, to hold them from going out of the right ay and without this, weighing with the naturall frailtie of men, the manie entifements nich nature breeds in vs to do euill during our life, what furety could remaine to igdoms and regions, if he that tooke to himfelfe all libertie and licence, might stand exemp-I from all authoritie, and were affured that he should neuer come to give a reckening of hime.On the other fide, many occupied these reasons, partaking more with the doctrine of the uines, then of the Canonills, that the authoritie to call Councels was inuested only in the pernof the Pope: yea, though he were infected with all vices, if onely he were not suspected of refies: that if the holie authoritie were otherwife interpreted, it would rest in the power of a v, either for ambition or for particular hatreds, courring their wicked intentions with falle coirs, to alter and change daylie the peaceable estate of the Church: a matter which ought not be consented, no lesse for the prejudice, then for the ill example it brought: they alleaged that it that all medicines were wholfome, yet if they were not ministred with due proportions, & times convenient, they have more of poison then of medicine: by which reasons condemning those that had other opinions, they called this assemblie not a Councell, but matter to deuide d separate the vnitie of the Sea Apostolike, a beginning of schisme in the Church of God and :ounselling of diuels.

THE ARGUMENT.

After the taking of Bolognia, the French armie returneth to the Duchy of Millan. The Con cel that was to be holde at Pifa against the Pope, is transferred to Millan, where many stirs ha pen. The Popes armie besiegeth Bolognia. The Frenchmen take Bressia. The battellis gin at Rauenna. The Pope publisheth the Councellat Rome. And afterwards the affaires of t French begin to decline.

HE successe of the victorie hapning vpon the French king, drew Christendome, but principally the vniuerfall regions of Italy, to exp (in great doubt of mind) what he wold further deliberate of his fortu for eueric one gaue this judgemet, that it was in his power to make hi felfe Lord of Rome and the whole flate Ecclefiaslike, both for that the Popes regiments together with the Venetiuns were dispersed and most dissoluted, and also there remained not in Italy other armies able make refishance against the furie of the victor: & as for the Pope, seem only to be defended with the name and maiefly of the place, he flood in all other regards reduto the differetion of fortune, his resolution of mind only remaining to support the aduersicie of estate: neuerthelesse the French king, either the reuerence which he bare to religion retain him, or the feare to stirre vp other Princes against him drining him to vse a moderation in his s tune, determined not to vie the occasion of his victory, but with a counsell perhaps more rel ous then profitable, he addressed his commandements to Ioh. I ac. Trivulce, to return e with armic to the Duchy of Millan, leauing Bolognia to the Bentyuoleis, and making restitution o other peeces which he occupied of the Church. To these actions so gracious and affable, he chie of Millan. ded words and demonstrations no leffe acceptable and full of pietie: for, he forbad through his realmes to make any publike fignes of gladnesse; and protested oftentimes in the present manie, that notwithstanding he had nothing committed against the Sea Apostolike, nor age the person of the Pope, and much lesse done any thing but by prouocation and constraint: he would come to humility with the Pope, and for the reuerence and deuotion he bare to Sea, he would fue for pardon where he had done no offence: he perfwaded himselfe that Pope, knowing by experience what were the difficulties of his conceits, and being reaffure the suspicion which he had of him without occasion, wold with all his hart come to desire pe the practife & negociation wherof had not bene altogether given ouer, feeing the Pope, fine parted from afore Bolognia, had for that occasion fent to the king the Embassadour of the l of Scotland, continuing to folicit the fame points, which by the fame bishop had bene begun be debated with the Bishop of Gurei. In this disposition to peace joyned also the far of the Bentinoleis, who notwithstanding they followed the authoritie of the king, yet they nified to the Pope, that much leffe they would expresse contumacie and rebellion to the Chu feeing they laid themselves downe with ready and franke minds to live & die in that subject wherein their fathers had continued so many yeares: and in token thereof they did not onel at libertie the Bishop of Cluse, but according to the ancient vsage, they lodged him in the lace as Lieutenant to the Sea Apotholike.

The French

Trivulce departed with the armie and drew neare to Mirandola to recouer it, not with pding at the request of loban. Fran. Piqua, Vufruch was entred under colour to hold it in the nac of Cafar, and by protestation had fent to require Trivulce, that because it was of the iurisdicon

fthe Empire, he should abstaine from all violent action: but finding in the end that his vaine auwas not sufficient, he went his way, Trivulce giving him onely certaine promises more onorable for Ca/sr in shew then in effect: the like did lohn Fran. after he had safeconduit for oods and life; and Trisulce having to follow no other expedition, fent to the gard of Verona ae hundred Launces and a thousand three hundred launce-knights viider Captaine lacob: and feruing to himselfe two thousand fine hundred Gascoins under the regiment of Captaine Mord and Mangiron, which, with the companies of the men at armes, he fent dispersed into the wines of the Duchy of Millan, he gaue leave and difinified all the other bands of footmen: but the defire and hope of the king was nothing agreeable the disposition of the Pope, who tising to a new courage by the reuoking of the armie, and being cucrie day made more hard and obmate by the things that indeed should have made him more easie and tractable, seeing withall at at R many where he yet remained, he lay tormented with the gowt. In the midft of lo many rplexities he fet downe more in the person of a Victor then one that was vanquished, & that the meane and working of the same Scottish Embassadour, that the Duke of Ferrara should y to him hereafter the tributes which he was wont to pay before the diminution which had ne made by Pope Alexander: that the Church should hold a Visedomino in Ferrara, as the netians did before : and that there should be rendred to him Lugo, with the other townes nich Alfonso d'Este possessed in Romagnia. These conditions notwithstanding they seemed to aking no lesse grienous, then to hold too much of iniquitie, yet the desire to have peace with e Pope preuailing about all other respects, he made answer that he was contented to consent all those demands, so farre forth as Cafar might also condiscend and concurre in them: but Pope being now returned to Rome, feemed with the place to chaunge both counsell and Il, the periwasions of the king of Aragon helping no lesse then his naturall lightnesse and stabilitie : for, the king of Aragon, whom the late victorie of the French king had confirmed verie great suspition, had sodainly laid aside all the great preparations which he had made passein person into Affrica, where he maintained continuall warres with the Moores: and ing called home from thence Peter of Nauarre with three thousand Spanish footmen, he t him to the realme of Naples, both to the end to affure at one time his owne estates, I to give courage to the Pope to be so much the more estraunged from the peace : in so much t by these encouragements conformable to his owne variable disposition, the Pope made afwer that he would not heare of peace, valeffe the Venetians might be accorded with Ca-: vnlesse Alfonso d'Este ouer and besides the first demaunds, made him satisfied of all the pences which he had defrayed in the warre : and laftly, vnleffe the king were bound not to der him in the recouerie of Bolognia: which citie, as a rebell to the Church, he had already vnder Ecclesiasticall interdiction: and, to make a spoile of the corne of their countrey, he Hent into Romagnia Mar. Antho. Colonno and Ramaffote, who notwithstanding were ilie chased by the people, being scarcely entred into the frontiers. Notwithstanding this aner, the Pope, what by the petitions of the Cardinals, and for other private respects, as soone ne came to Rome, consented to the deliuerie of the Cardinall of Achx, having bene till that kept prisoner within the castle of S. Angeo: but to his libertie he joyned this condition, that hould not go out of the Pallace of Vatican till all the Prelats and officers that were taken hin Bolognia were set at libertie, and afterwards that he should depart from Rome vuder ne of fortie thousand duckets, for the which he was to put in sufficient surety: and yet not g after he suffered him to returne into Fraunce with charge not to be at the Councell, ypon like paine.

he Popes answer moued so much the more the mind of the king, by how much he was perided that he should confent to the conditions which he himselfe had offered: and therefore ermining to withstandhim in the recoucie of Bologuia, he'sent thither immediatly a new ngth of 400 launces, and not long after he tooke into his protection the citie with all the fa-The French lie of the Bentiuoleis, without receiving of him any couenant to minister either men or mony: loguid into his Iknowing that the alliance of Cafar was now more necessarie to him then ever, in place protection, iereafore he bare fome inclination not to give him those supplies of men which he had promihim in the capitulation made with the Bishop of Gurci; so farre forth as he passed in person

from the Duchie of Millan the bands that had bene promifed should march thither under the gouernement of Monsieur de la Palissa, for that Triunice whom Casar had required, refused the

By this time Cafar was come to Y spruch, neurishing on the one side a great defite to make warre upon the Venetians, and on the other fide, he found himselfe consuled with many thoughts and perplexities: for, confidering that all that he should do, would make vp no matter of subliace if he tooke not Podoa, and to that enterprise were required so great forces & so mighty preparations, as it was almost impossible to gather together: sometimes he suffered himselfe to be carred with a defire to agree with the Venetsans, wherunto the king Catholike viged him much : and forntimes he stood over-ruled with his owne conceits, thinking to march to Rome in person with his armie, to occupie according to his ancient defire all the estate of the Church: wherein he laic his plot to leade thither a mightie armie of Almains, befides the French copanies: but what by his disabilities & by disorders, the execution of things was so far inseriour to the imagination, that he columned the time without putting any to action, lomtimes promiting to come in person, & some times giving a naked hope to fend men. By these vncertainties it seemed grieuous to the king to take vpon him to fullaine alone the whole burthen of the war:a reason, which having conformit with his nature, being sparing and holding, could do more in him for the most part, the the will perswasions that many made to the contrarie, that if Cesar were not mightily succoured by him, he would at last ioyne with his enemies, by which it would happen, that besides his necel makes oversure firy to be at a greater charge, yet his estates in Italie could not but fall into right manifest dann of anim Coun- gers. Amid these doubts and difficulties, the tumults of the temporal armes began to grow cold but the fire of the spiritual armes kindled into greater flames, as well on the part of the Cardinals she Counced of authors of the Councell, as on the Popes fide, who laboured altogether to oppreffe fuch an en afore it became greater.

The Pope ceil to breake

> You have heard herctofore how the Councel was denounced and fignified under the authori ty of the king of Romains and the French king, the voices of the Cardinals of S. Croffe, S. Malle Baieux, and Cosenso being interpoled, the Cardinall also of S. Senerin consenting manifeltly, s fuccessively, the Proctors of both the one and other king did assist the counsels and deliberation that were made. Moreouer, and to give it a greater authoritie, the five Cardinals, authors of th pessilence, added by the way of intimation the names of other Cardinals, of whom Cardinals A here a Frenchman durst not disobey the commandements of his king, being innocent in all thing fauing in the compulsion that was yied to him to subscribe his consent and for the other Care nals named by them, Cardinall Adrian and Cardinall Finalo protested openly that the matt was wrought wholly without their privitie and consent: so that more then fixe Cardinals we not manifeltly declared of this faction: whom, for that the Pope hoped to draw them to a volu tarie renouncing of the matter, he entertained with them continuall practife, offering to parde the errors that had bene committed, and that with fuch furetie that they should not need to fea any violence or displeasure to happen to them: wherunto the Cardinals gaue a dissembled car beleeuing the Popes promifes no further then they faw the confirmed with good means of the fafeties: but the Pope could not for all this abstaine from most mighty and extreame remedies, so much as following the counsell of Antho. du Mont saint Sansouyn, one of the Cardinals his last creation at Rauenna, seeking to purge himself of negligence, assigned an universal Cou cell in the towne of Rome within the Church of S. lohn de Latran for the first day of May no comming: by which connocation he pretended that the Councell called by his aduerfaries w broken, and that in that which he had published was judicially contained the power and author ritie of all notwithstanding that the Cardinals alleaged, that it wastrue in the beginning, yet se ing they had preuented it, the Councell that had bene instituted and called by the ought to have place. The Councell being published, & the Pope reposing more then euer in his right, and with all dispairing to be able to reconcile the Cardinall of S. Crosse, who through ambition to be Pol had bin in effect the mouer of this alteration: and likewile doubting to reclaime the Cardinals Mallo & Cosensa, for touching the others he was not without hope to reduce them to his ob dience: he published against those three a threatning monition under paine of privation of the dignitie of Cardinall and all Church rights and benefits, if within threescore and fine day they made not their appearance afore him: and the better to dispose them to the Popes will, t Colled:

colledge of Cardinals fent to them an Auditor de la Rote to perswade and pray them, that leaing their private contentions, they should estsoones returne into the vnion of the Church, offeng to give them fuch forme of fecuritie as they defired.

In this time also the Pope, either for that he was irresolute, or laboured with some other pason of worfe nature, hearkned continually after the practife of peace with the French king, the hich was folicited in his owne Court by the kings Embassadours, and in the French Court by ie Embassadour of Scotland and the Bishop of Truoli the Nuncio Apostolike: and on the other de he laboured to make with the king of Aragon and the Venetians a new confederation against he Frenchmen, making all things lawfull & feemely, that he supposed might turne to the aduaunge of his affaires. About this time also, the Pope sought to render Montpulcian to the Florennes, not for any good he wished to them, but for feare least the truce which they had with Sien. abeing expired, they would call into Tuskane the French bands, to the end to have a greater rength to recouer that towne. And albeit it was grieuous to the Pope that the Florentins Thould couer Montpulcian, and that to hinder them he had already fent to Sienna John Vitella entertaied with an hundred men at arines by the Siennois, and Guido Vaino with an hundred light horfeen leavied and payed by him: yet afterwardes confidering better, that by how much the difficul-: appeared great, by so much more would the Florentines be induced to call the he determined, the end to take fro the king all occasios to fend armed bands into a place so neare Rome, to prode for this daunger by a way contrarie, Pandolfe Petrucci consenting to it, who the Florentins urifhed artificially in the same suspition. The matter was debated many dayes, for that (small ings oftentimes have no leffe difficulties, nor are no leffe hard to be refolved, then fuch as be of a eater nature) Padolffe to anoyd the hatred of the people of Siena, would the proceeding should fuch, that it might feeme there was no other remedic to affure him from the war, & not to aliete the Popes mind. Moreouer the Pope and he would that at the fametime should be made beeene the Florentins and the Siennois a confederation for the defence of their estates: and yet they red on the other fide, that they of Montpulcian espying what was meant and practised, would suct them in rendring the felues voluntarily, winning by that meane the fauour of the Florentins, to atchieuing their intention, might afterwards refuse to make the confederation. For this cause J. Vitelli was sent to remaine within Morpulcian, & the Pope sent thither lames Simoner, Andiir de la Rote, called certaine yeares after to be Cardinall, to the end that by his working, the afres of Montpulcian might be raunged & brought to conformitie. In the end, there was made at e time, a confederation for flue and twentie yeares, betweene the Florentins and the Siennoss:& Impulcian returned into the handes of the Florentines, Simonet interpoling for the pardon and firmation of the auncient exemptions and priviledges.

For certaine moneths, the war and actions of hostilitie were more easie and tollerable between e king of Romaines and the Venetians, then had wont to be: for that the Almaines being neither ong in men,nor prouided of money,thought they did a feruice of no finall importance, if they ot Verona. And the Venetian armie wanting sufficient forces to take that Citie, were retired besene Soane and Louigno, from whence they made a fally one night, and burnt both on this fide I beyond the river of Adice, a great quantitie of the fruits of the inhabitants of Verona, Johng withflanding in the action three hundred footemen as they retired, the greatneffe of their pray ing impediments to their valour for the defence of their proper liues. But affoone as they heard t Monfeur Palissa was comming to Verona with twelve hundred Launces & eight thousand tmen, their armic retired betweene Vincensa and Legunguo into a place of strength, bearing aloff the forme and fituation of an Iland, by reason of certaine waters and trenches that had bene re cut vp. Neuerthelesse they taried not in this placemany dayes, for that Monsieur Palissa arting at Verona with a great part of his armie, and without expecting the refidue taking the field fently together with the Almaines, they retired almost in flying to Lonigne, and afterwardes whithe fame feare abandoning Vincensa and all the other townes, together with Polisena Rome, which sometimes was pillaged by the Venetians, and somtimes prayed by the Duke of Ferrathey withdrew to Padoa and Trenifa, their feare enforcing them to follow those meanes for fetie and refuge, which were not so convenient for their honour and reputation. For the better sence of these Cities, many of the youth and nobility of Venice came thither with mindes resold to share and communicate with the fortunes of those two Cities: holding it a just office in

Citizens and countrey men to oppose their lives against the petils and iniuries done to their coun trey. The armie of the French and Almains facked Louigne: and Vincensa which was become miferable pray to thofe that were the firongest in the field, rendred it selfe. But all these enterprise and conquelles were of fmall confequence for the finbflance of the warre, fo farforth as the \mathcal{O}_ℓ netians held Padea and Trem'a: for that by the oportunitie of those Cities, assoone as the Frenc fuccours were deuided from the Almains, they reconquered without difficultie, the pecces the had loft; by reason whereof, after these proceedings and advancements, the armse stayed man dayes at the bridge of Barberano, expecting there either the arrivall or the resolution of Calai who being come betweene Trent and Roniero, denifing at one time how to follow his pleasure in hunting wild bealls according to his custome, and to send bands of footement othe armie, pre mifed to come to Montagnana, sometimes pretending to embrace the enterprise of Padoa, some times to execute upon Trensa, and sometimes to go take Rome, casting in his minde that plots and deuises of enterprise, whereunto his natural mutabilitie would suffer him to give n action. But befides his disposition frayle and variable, and which had not lesse communitie wit any thing then with constancie & resolution, he sound difficulties in these actions for his extern pouertie and want, and no lesse in the attempt of Rome then in the other enterprises: for that march thither with those forces of the French, seemed to him an action both against his dignit and furctie: and the feare least in the absence of that armie, the Venetians would assayle Veron. copelled him to leave there a strong garrison. Besides the French king made difficultie to separa his people from the Duchie of Millan by fo great a diffance and space of countreys, for the simhope he had to have accord with the Swiffers: who befides the inclinations they expressed to il defires of the Pope, spake openly to the Embassadour of the French king, that the peoples of the Nation were not a little grieved with the ruines of the Venetians, for the communicie that the common weales had together. At last the plots, conceptions, and great discourses of Cafar can. according to his cultome, to resolve into effects vieworthy his reputation: for that on the one sid having increased the armie with three hundred men at armes Almains, and on the other fide, uen familiar audience to the Venetian Embassadours, with whom he debated continually, and h caused Monsieur Palissa to come first to Lungaro neare Vincensa, and asterwardes to S. Crosse, folicited him to go take Nemcastell, which is a passage below Escalo drawing to Fruil, with twentie myles of Felire, and all to make his descending more easie on that side. By this directi Monsieur Palissamarched to Montbellono ten myles from Trenisa, from whence, hauingse flue hundred horsemen and two thousand footmen to open the passage of Newcastell, they we to Ficalo. About which time the light horsemen of the Venetians who ouerranne all the count without impediment, ouerthrew neare to Morostiqua, about seuen hundred footemen and n ny horsemen both French and Italian: who, to passe in surety where the armie was, went from I rona to Soane to joyne with three hundred Frech Launces, who being come after Monsieur Pa. fa, expected in that place his direction. And albeit in the beginning, things fucceeded well with Frenchmen and Almains, and that Count Guido Rangon leader of the Venetians was taken, fortune being far inferiour to his valour: yet many pay fants desceding in fauour of the Venetias, many occasions rising to their advantage, they remained in the end victorious, source hundred the French footemen being left dead, and their Captaines Mangiron and Chemaro detained; " foners: Such is the ordinarie variation of war; and fuch the naturall infirmitie of humaine caul on not certaine in their owne condition, but subjected to those endes whereunto they have bene-" dained from the beginning. The refolutions which before had bene debated and fet downe, gr more and more to declining & diminution, both for that the French king feeing the preparate of Cafar answered nothing his promises and offers, to the end he would draw further offfre Italie, returned from Dauphine where he had remained many dayes, to Bloys. And also Cafar, 1. ing now retired from Trent, with a minde to go no more to the armie, in place to reconquer l the Venetians held in the firme land, or to impatronise hinselfe your Rome and the whole est: Ecclefiastike, gaue direction that the Almains should enter into Frint, & vpouthe peeces of T. usan, not so much to vexe the Venetians, as to constraine the townes of the countrey to ge him money to preferue them from facke & pillage. And to the end his people fhould not beldred, he appointed the French men to passe further, bestowing two hundred Launces within rona where the plague raged with great daunger. His reason in this appointment was, fort t (haug tuing an intention to affayle Friull) there could not be affigned to that feruice other of his nds, then fuch as were referred for the gard of the Castels. Palissa consented to all these apintments, with whom being soyned Monsieur d'Aubigny Captaine of three hundred Launces nich were at Soaue, he went and incamped vpon the river of Piana, Besides this, for a greafurctie of Verona, the Almains left two hundred horsemen within Soane, who lying there in at disorder & negligence, vsing neither watch nor ward, suffered a smarting paine of their seitie, being one night almost all flaine or taken by foure hundred light horsemen and foure hund footmen of the Venetians. During all this yeare there fell diverle ordinary accidents & stirres the countrey of Friall, in Istria, and in the quarters of Trieste and Fiume, sometime by land h incurtions & inuations,& fometimes by fea with little veffels, those wretched countreys ening afflictions & calamities by both the armies, sometimes joyntly, & sometimes severally. Afwards the armie of the Almains entred into Fruill, & affoone as they made their approches bee V dina the principall place of that province, and where the V enetian Magistrates make their dencie: the layd Magistrates preferring feate before honour, fled with that cowardise which kes men of service dishonoured: by whose feares not onely the towne was yeelded, but also Frivil taken aone course of victorie all the countrey of Friell did the like, every towne being taxed to a gaine by the portion of money according to their abilities: there remained onely Gradifquo fituated v- Almains. the river of Lifance, wherein was Lowis Mosseniano treasurer of Friull with three hundred femen, and many bands of footemen: this was no fooner visited by the artillerie, and onely de defence against the first affault, but it was yeelded up by the importunitie of the souldiers, treasurer remaining prisoner. From Friull the Almains returned to loyne with Atonseur 'usa incamping within fiue myles of Trenisa, to which Citie they made their approches altoher, Cefar making great request that they would assay to take it : but finding it well fortified all fides, and wanting in themselves both the service of pyoners, munitions, with other proons necessarie, they retired, their wants taking away their hope and possibilitie of good suce. A little after, Paliffa by the kings direction, departed to returne to the Duchie of Millan, that feare of new confederations and conspiracies of the Swiffers increased continually. In ing he had alwayes at his backe the Venetian estradiots, who albeit hoped to distresse him at least at the passage of the rivers of Brent and Adice, yet his valour made his passage assured, committed to spoyle two hundred horsemen of the Venetians which were incamped without on, of whom Peter de Lungaro their Captaine remained prisoner: his departing left the Alns not a little confused, for that not obtaining that three hundred other Frech Launces should aine for the gard of Verona, they were constrained to retire thither, leaving in pray to the enesall that they had gayned that lommer. By which occasion the Venetian armie whereof John The Venetians le Baillon was gouernour by the death of Luke Maluazzo, recoucred immediatly Uncenfa: recover Friull, entring afterwards into Friull, they razed Cremonfa, and recovered the whole countrey, ex-Gradifqua, which they knew they could not take, not with standing a few dayes after cettaine ds of footmen leavied in the country of Tyroll, tooke Codora, and facked in like fort Bellona. n this fort, with light effects, were determined (for the prefent fommer) the actions and enrifes of armes, with leffe profit then ignominie to the name of Cafar, but with special reputao the Venetrans, who by the space of two yeares, inuaded by the armies of Cafar & the Frech , came at last to retaine their owne forces and their owne jurisdiction: Matters which albeit e directly against Cafar, yet they brought much more harmes to the French king: for, whilest id not minister to Casar such proportions of succours as might make him able to obtaine the oric defired, either fearing haply the too great prosperitie and greatnesse of Casar, or being ied with false counsels & foundations, and lesse looking into the daungers that were at hand, aply wifedome being blinded with couctoufneffe, he gaue him occasion, yea he brought him off into necessitie to ope his eares to such as ceased not to perswade him to separation from , preserving at one time the Venetians in such estate that they were able with greater forces to with those that defired to embase his power. In so much that men began even now to disre, that both in the mind of Cafar, new thoughts began to kindle, specially for the regard of the uncel and also his plots and deuises were abated, chiefly since the publication of the Councell Latran: for neither did fend thither according to his many promifes any Almain Prelates in name of Germanie, nor any Proctors to affift in his name : neither did he once stirre for the Nο example of the French king, who had given order that in the comon name of the Frech Churche foure and twentic Bishops should go to Pila, and all the other Prelates of his Realme should e ther go thither in perfon, or else returnish the action by affishance and deputation: yet neuerthe leffe, either to excuse these delayes, or that such was his desire indeede, he began in that time t make inflance, that aswell for a greater commoditie of the Prelates of Germane, as forthat l promifed to be there in person, the Councell that had bene denounced at Prsa, might be transfe red to Wiantua, to Verona, or to Trent. This demaunde was grieuous to all the other for mar causes, and onely agreeable to the Cardinall of S. Crosse, who burning in glorious ambitions mount up to the Popedome (to which end he had fowen all those discords) hoped that withil fauour and countenance of Cafar, he might eafily be raifed to that seate. Not with standing for th the cause of the Councell would stand much weakned, and almost without the authoritie of C far, they fent by common confent the Cardinall of S. Senerin, both to befeech him that he wou fend away the Prelates and Proctours which he had so often promised, and also to give him fai on their behalfe, that affoone as they had given beginning to the Councell at Pifa, they wou transferre it to the place which he should thinke good: which (say they) if we should do afore, could not but be very preindiciall to the common cause, specially it importing greatly to preue the Conuocation which the Pope had published. Galeas the brother of S. Senerin, whom wi a felicitie farre different from the infelicitie of Lodowike Sforce his first Lord, the king had hone red with the office of the Maister of his horse, went also in this expedition to make the same stance to Calar on the kings behalfe : but the king fent him principally of purpose to confin with new offers and plots, the minde of Cafar, for whose inconstancie he liued in no little dou and suspition, notwithstanding at the same time he was not without hope to conclude the per with the Pope. That peace, being disputed at Rome by the Cardinall of Nants, and by t Cardinall of Strigonia, and profecuted in Fraunce by the Scottish Bishop and the Bishop of 7 noly, was drawne into fuch termes, that almost all the conditions being accorded, the Pope hade foones ioyned to the Bishop of Timoly a further power to give it full perfection neverthelesse the were inferted in this new power, certaine limitations, which gaue no fmall occasion to men thinke that his will and intention were farre otherwise then were his wordes and protestation specially for that it was discerned, that at the same time he had to do with many potetates in m. ters altogether contrarie to this, not sparing to embrace all occasions and oportunities, thou they brought with them matter of ill opinion and murmure.

In this great doubt and inspition of things, there lacked not much that an accident falling pon the Popes person, brake not all the practises and beginnings of euils that lay in preparation The Popehol- for falling into a new fit of his ficknesse the seueteenth of August, the fourth day after there too him fuch a qualme, that for certaine houres fuch as were about him held him for dead : a the brute being no leffe quicke, then the accident was mortall, many of the Cardinals tl were absent put themselves upon the way to come to Rome, together also with some of the that had convocated the Councell. Within Rome the people made no leffe stirre and mouin then they have bene wont to do at the death of Popes, yea, there appeared fignes and tokens farre greater tumults, for that Pompey Colonno Bilhop of Reato, and Anthonie Sauello, you men of the Romaine nobilitie full of fedition and faction, affembling the commons in the Capit, perswaded them with words seditious to put themselves in libertie. But during the action, and they laboured with a very vehement ambition, to stirre vp the people of Rome to publike rebell. the Pope revived from his daungerous qualme: & albeit there was as yet greater scare then he! of his life, yet, the day following, in the prefence of the Cardinals which were afternbled in for: of a Confisterie, he gaue absolution to his nephew of the murder he had committed upon the C: dinall of Pauia, not by ordinarie way of inflice as he had bin aduifed before, (the shortnesseoft: time impugning) but by grace & Apostolike remission, as to a person penitent. In the same Corflorie he folicited that the election of his successour should be made Canonically: and seek ; to barre others from climing to fo high a degree, by the meanes which ray fed him to it, he cau to be published a Bull, full of horrible paines against those that should aspire to that election, ther by money or by other recompence, both declaring as nothing all election that should e made by symonie, and giving an entry and meane verie case to any Cardinall to impugne it. Is constitution he had pronounced from the time he was within Bolognia, standing then discotend ith certaine Cardinals who laboured opely to purchase the promises of other Cardinals, to posfe the Papacieafter his death. He began now to grow better & better, either by his strong and ple complexion, or else for that by destinie he was reserved to be the author & principal occasio fmore great & long calamities: for it was not reasonable to attribute the recourry of his health the vertue or remedy of medicines, for that he obeyed neither rule nor order, eating in the grea-Aperill of his maladie, raw apples and things contrary to the prescription of Physicke. The Pope was no fooner delivered from danger of death, then he returned eftioons to his old The Pope pur-

as his defire to chase out of Italy all dominion and imperie of the French. And albeit his will of Italy, vas more inclined to warre then to peace, yet he seemed oftentimes drawne with variety of fanies, and for manie reasons followed sometimes one opinion, and sometimes another, not being ble to fettle in mind and indgement, having his thoughts wandring, and reaching to ends farre aoue his power. The thing that caried his inclination to the warre, befides his ancient hatred aainst the French, and that he was not able to obtaine all the conditions of peace which he defied, were the vehement & importunate perswasions of the king of Aragon, who seared now more nen euer, least the French king being once at peace with the Pope, would execute vpon the alme of Naples vpon the first occasion. Wherein to the end his counsels might carie a greater sthority, befides the armie at sea which was afore repassed out of Affrica into Italy under Pe-" Nauarre, he had fent newly out of Spaine another sea armie, containing fine hundred men tarmes, fixe hundred horsenien mounted upon Iennets, and three thousand footmen: neuerselesse this king proceeding underhand with his accustomed suttleties, made shew that he desied more then ever the warre against the Moores, from which his owne profit or particular inte-: It did not draw him, but only a holy denotion which he had alwayes borne to the Sea Apostoke; only he alleaged, that being not able of himfelfe to entertaine his fouldiers, it was necessary nat the Pope and the estate of Venice should minister to him; whereunto, to the end they might ondificend more easily, his bands that were all descended into the Ile of Capri neare to Naples, rade she was as though they prepared to passe into Affrica. But his immoderate demands much mazing the Pope, and his futtleties pleafing him nothing at all, he entred into many suspitions, ell knowing that that king ceased not to give to the French king hopes all contrarie: he knew ne Venerians would not willingly be drawne from his will and purposes: euen so he was not igorant that for the greatnesse of such a warre wherein they were, they were no longer able to care out the burthen and charges as before: and that time had brought the Senate now to feeke nore to defend their owne, then to take in hand a new warre, which could not be continued ithout intollerable expences: he hoped that the Swiffers, by a common inclination of those ountreymen, would declare themselves against the French king, but having no certainty there-The hopes of f, he seemed to hold it undiscreet to oppose himselse to so great daungers for a hope so ill the Pope. flured, not being ignorant, that as yet were not rejected and cut off their practifes with the rench king, and manie of their Chieftaines and principals, to whom reuerted not small profits y the Frenchamities, labored all they might that in the affembly which was prefently to be holen, their alliance might be renewed with the king. Touching the will and intention of Cafar, otwithstanding he had many inclinations by the king Catholike, & of his owne nature a sworne nemie to the French name, yet his hope of him was leffe then his feare, knowing the great offers hat were made to him of new aswel against the Venetians, as against him, to the which the Frech ing was able to give more high flate and perfection then to any others that could be made to im: he faw that if Cafar should joyne with the French king, he had greatly to feare the counell by reason of his authoritie: and also his owne power joyned in good faith and meaning with he forces and treasures of the Crowne of Fraunce, and with the oportunitie of the estates of he both the Pope could not in reason have any hope of the victorie, which he sound veriethard o obtaine against the French king alone. But that which gaue him the greatest stomacke, was a hope he had that the king of England wold be wonto raise warre against the Crowne of France, both by the counsels and perswasions of the king Catholike his father in law, and for the authontie of the Sea Apostolike, which was then great in the Ile of England, and in whose name he had with vehement petitions implored his succours against the French king, as against an vsurper

euises and cogitations, continuing at one time to solicite a peace with the Frenchking, and a prifeto chase onsederation with the king of Aragon and the Senate of Venice against the Frenchmen; such the French out and oppressor of the Church: to these inducements was joined also the natural hatred aswell that king as of the people of Englad to the French nation, much helping in this 2016 the forward nesse of the kings youth and great abundance of treasure left to him by his father, which was fur posed to amount to a wonderfull quantitie. These were proper instruments to kindle fite intimind of this young king, and having neuer experienced in his kingdom but fortunes happie ar plausible, he was also pushed forward by an honorable desire to renew the glory of his ancestor who intituling themselues kings of Fraunce, and at sundrie times vexing that kingdom with gre warres, had not only holden for many yeares Guienne and Normandie (rich & mightie preuit ces of that Crowne) and taken in a battell neare to Poptiers the French king with two of his for and manie of his Noblity; but also, had occupied together with the most part of the kingdon the citie of Paris the capitall citie of the kingdome: laftly their valours and fortunes have bin f terrible to the Frenchmen, that if Henrie the fift then king of England had not exchanged this li in the flower of his age and glorious course of his victories, it was beleeued he had made an abs lute conquest of the whole realme of Fraunce, and brought subjected to himselfe the Crowne imperie of that nation. The memorie of these honorable victories working with the youth & di polition of the king, were not of litle force to draw him to action, not with sading his father vpc his dying had expresly aduised him aboue all other things to entertaine peace with the French natio, as the only mean for the kings of Englad to raigne surely & happily. It was not to be doub ted, but the war of the English against the French king (being also assailed in other places) was right great consequence, for that in that action the very intrals of the kingdome were charge the Frenchmen redoubting much the name of the English, by the memorie of victories and cor quests passed. Notwithstanding all these the Popesor the incertainty of the saith of strangers, ar for the farre diffance of those countries so farre removed, could not establish or repose his cour fels vpon those fauours. These were the hopes of the Pope, and thus were they limited and lay out in condition and proportion.

The thoughts of the French
King,

On the other fide the French king, to whom nothing was leffe pleafing then to be in warre: gainst the Church, was greatlie desirous to have peace, by meane whereof as he wasto shake o the ill will of the Pope, so also he was to be deliuered of the importunate demaunds and necess ties of Cafar: two respects which troubled him not a litle, the one offending his conscience, be ing too much addicted, and the other confunsing his treasures whereof he had made manie pre digalities: he made no difficultie to breake the Councell of Psfa, which he had introduced on to make the Pope condificend to peace by that feare, so farre forth as there might be pardon at remission to the Cardinals and others that had bene partakers either in counsell or in action : b on the contrarie, the demaund for the restoring of Tolognia kept him in suspence: a citiet reason of his situation, most convenient to molest him: he feared the peace was not sincerely as cepted by the Pope, nor with a mind disposed to observe it if occasions returned, but onlie t deliuer himselse presently from the daunger of the Councell, and from the warre, of whose su cesse he had no small sealousse. And yet he hoped to confirme the mind of Casar, with the great neffe of his offers, and therefore negociating of common occurrants as with a confederate he perswaded him vehemently among other things not to consent that Bolognia a Citie of 1 great importance, should eftsoones returne under the inristiction of the Pope: and touching the kings of Aragon and of England, he did not together distrust them, not with standing the maner proceeding of the one was already manifest, and the brute of the intention of the other no less publike and generall: and notwithstanding their Embassadors jointly had perswaded him, fir with words of modeltie, bearing a pretence of office and amitie, and afterwards preffed him wit importunities to command that both the Cardinals and Prelates of his kingdom should be at th Councell of Latran, and also to suffer and see that the Church were estsoones repossessed of the Citie of Bolognia, one of her members not in the least degree. The reason of this confidence tou ching the English, was, that they made shew to have desire to persever in the consederation which they had with him, and many of his counfell giuing him furetie of the fame, he beleeve they wold attept nothing against him: & for the king of Aragon, his sleights & suttle apparance were such, that the king gaue a lesse faith to his doings then to his speeches, wherein he always affured him neuer to enter into action of armes again(thim: with which opinion he fuffered him felfe somewhat to be perswaded, that that king would neuer joyne in armes so manifestly with is enemics, as he professed by his counsels and secret deliberations: he beguiled himself so much these opinions, that notwithstanding he had hope given by those that were of his faction in wifferland, that he might yet reconcile that nation if he would consent to their demaunds for inreasing their pensions, ye he estsoons resuled it with no lesse obstinacie then before, alleaging lat it were no equitie to yeeld himselfe to be taxed by them: and vsing sharpe remedies, where afie meanes had bene more necessarie, he made restraint that they should have no reliefe of vituals out of the Duchie of Mullan, thinking that by their vniuerfall scarcities, redoubled by the terilitie of their countrey, he should in the end bring them to agree to the renouation of the alli-

nce according to the ancient conditions.

By this time was come the first day of September, which had bene afore fet downe for the Ouerture of the reginning of the Councell of Pifa, at which day the Proctors of the Cardinals being come to Pi- Councell of Pia, celebrated in their names the acts appertaining to the expressing of the same. At this the Pope sa, id not a litle forme, specially against the Florentines, for that they had consented that the Counell of dinels (for so did he alwayes call it) tooke beginning vpon their estates, for which transgreson he declared that the cities of Florence and Pifaltood fubic to the interdictio Ecclefial tike, y vertue of the Bull of the Councell which he had caused to be published: wherein it was set owne in an expresse article, that who so euer he were that fauored the diuellish assembly at Pifa, lood excommunicated, interdicted, and subject to all paines seuerely ordained by the lawes aainst schismatikes and heretikes: and threatning to inuade the witharmes, he elected the Carinall of Medicis, Legate of Perousa: and not long after, the Cardinall Regina Legate of Bologia being dead, he bestowed him in his place, to the end that he who enuied their estate, being pon their marches with so great authoritie, his presence might make themfall amongst theselues ito suspition & confusion: a thing which he hoped might easily succeed for the state & reputatio herin he stood at that time in that citie: for, besides the affections of certaine particulars desing the returne of the Medicer, discordes and divisions (the ancient maladie of that citie) raigned mongst the generall number of Citizens of greatest apparace. These divisions bred at that time y the greatnesse and authority of the Magistrate which they call Gonfalonnier, which some for mbition and enuy could not fuffer, & others flood ill contented, for that judging him to intrude nore into the deliberation of things then appertained to his place, they thought he left not to the lat part of authoritie which their estates and conditions deserved: they complained, that in the ouernment of the Citie ordained and contained in two extremities, that is to fay, the publike lagistrate, and the councell popular, was manifest errour touching the true institution of ommon weales: for a Senate duly ordained, by the which besides that it should be as a reasonale temperature betweene the one and other extremitie, the principals and best qualified Citiens should obtaine in the common weale a degree more honourable : but the Gonfalonnier did te contrary, either by ambition, or by vaine fulpition, being not with standing principally chosen or the redresse and order of that. The thing which they defired in this action not with standard the redresse and order of that. ing it was reasonable, and yet not of that importance as to turne their minds to divisions, for nat without it they were both honorably raised and advanced, and withall there was no forme f disposing of the publike affaires without them, was the verie originall &principall cause of the reat calamities which fellafterwards vpon that citie. The factions & divisions amongst the citiens, being grounded therupon, & the enemies of the Gonfalonnier suspecting him with the Carinall of Volterre his brother to be at the deuotion of the French king, and to repose altogether this amirie: opposed as much as they could against the deliberations that were to be made in faour of that king, defiring that all might be transferred to the Pope. By this also it came to passe, hat the name of the family of Medicis began to be leffe hatefull in that citie then before, for that hose chiefest and mightiest Citizens who earst denied their returne, were now no more concurant to perfecute them, & much lesse to hinder the community and conversation of others with hem. The malicethey bare to the Gonfalonnier wrought this alteration and change of their affe-Stion, and the more to abate his authoritie, they stucke not to expresse by many tokens, how litle that familie was estranged from their fauor and amitie, not forbearing also to give shadow to ohers to defire their returne & greatnesse: & of this it hapned that not only those that were their affured and perfect friends (in whom was no great power) entred into hopes of innovation ind new things, but also many of the Nobilitie and youth of the Citie, pushed on either by their great prodigalities and expences, or by certaine particular disdaines, or at least by ambitious de fires to surpasse others in dignities, expected a mutation of that estate by the meane of their retur ning(that disposition having bene nourished and increased many yeares by the Cardinall Medi dicionho of cis with great fleight and futtletie for ever fince the death of his brother Peter, whose name we serwards was both feared and hated, he had made no shew to entermeddle in the affaires of Florence, nor t Pope Leo the haue any defire to aspire to the ancient greatnesse of his familie: and to omit no office which might either make him merit the more, or infinuate further, he forgat not with great humanit and fauours to welcome & receive all the severall people of Florence that had recourse to Rom offering himselfe a ready instrument for the dispatch of their affaires, wherein disposing his fauc 110 leffe to fuch that had bene manifest enemies against his brother, then to others whom he hel indifferent, he yied in his behauiour and speech to lay all the fault ypon his brother, as thought faults with the memorie and hate thereof, were determined together with his death. This form and maner of behaulour he continued many yeares, which, accompanied with the opinion the went of him in the Court of Rome, to be by disposition liberall, affable and gracious to all mer brought him in the end to be acceptable to manie at Florence : in which respect the Pope th defired not a litle the alteration of that gouernment, preferred him with great forefight toth Legation.

The Florentines appealed from the interdiction, & to commit the leffe offence in the apellat on, they called it not the Councell of Psfa, but named it the facred Councell of the Church vr uerfall: and as though by the appellation the effect of the interdiction had bene suspended, t priests of the soure principall Churches were compelled by commandement of the supreme m gistrate to make publike celebration of all divine offices, the same disclosing more and moret duifion of the Citizens, and left in the diferetion of euery one either to observe or contemnet interdict. For this reason, the Embassadors of the kings of England and Aragon made new instan to the French king, offering him peace with the Pope, so farre forth as he wold see Bolognia re dred to the Church, & that the Cardinals might make a presence at the Councell of Lairan, w they offered that the Pope should receive them all to pardon. But the regard and considerati of Bolognia holding him from colenting to the peace, he made answer, that as he did not defe a citie in contumacie and rebellion against the Church, under whose jurisdiction and obedience was gouerned in the fame forme & estate of pollicy wherin it had bin ruled many years afore t Pontificacy of Iulius, to who it belonged not to demaund a greater authority then had bin requ red & practifed by his predecessors: so also touching the Councell of Prait had bin introduc in a most honourable & holy purpose, to reforme the notorious and intollerable disorders of 1 Church, wherunto would be easily reduced her ancient vertue & brightnesse, and that with perill of schisme or division, if the Pope would agree to affist that Councell, the reason being leffe iust, the the action convenient for him, managing the supreme place: he added lastly, that vnquietnesse together with his inflamed mind addicted to wars & troubles, had chiefly induc him to bind himselfe to the protection of Bologma, which for his honor he would defend with leffe care & fludy, then he would fee to the protection of his towne of Paris. The Popethen fl king off all his cogitations & thoughts to the peace, no leffe for his ancient hatreds & conetouin the for feare of the Councell & his defire to Bologma, & finally suspecting, that if he deferred a longer to deliberate & resolue, he should be lest abadoned of euery one, the Spamsh souldiers! ginning now to embarke at Carpy, making as though they would passe into Affrica: he detern ned to finish the cofederation negociated with the king Catholike & the Senate of Venice, wh was folemnly published the fift of October in the Church of S. Maria de populo, the Pope and the Cardinals affifting. This confederation bare that they should principally preserue the vnity the Church, and the better to defend her from present schisme, to reuerse and dissolue the fembly of Psfa: to recover the Citie of Bolognia appertaining immediatly to the Sea Apolllike, together with all other peeces & places which directly or indirectly beloged to the Chur, Ferrara being comprehended under that sence: that against all such that should oppose agail anie of these things, or labour to throw any impediments (these words signified the Free 1 king) they should proceede to chase them out of Italie with a mightie armie, wherein Pope was to maintaine foure hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horfmen, and fixe thefand footmen: the Senate of Venice should furnish eight hundred men at armes, a thousa

As this confederation was fully refolued & established, lerome Donato Venetian Embassador died, who for his singular wisdome and ability being very deare to the be had in this actió & other affaires during his legatio, done many great feruices to his coutrey. This confederation made by the Pope under colour to deliuer Italy from the impery of stran-that was condrew the minds of men to diverse interpretations according to the diversity of their judge- ceiued of the its and passions: for many beguiled with the respect and magnificence of the title, set out league. h great merites and prayles so divine and high an enterprise: saydit was an action right worthe maiestic of his place, and that the greatnesse of his mind could not have chosen an entere more gracious, nor lesse full of discretion then of magnanimitie, stirring vp by his industry tranger against another: in such fort that the bloud of forrainers more then of natural Italibeing spilt vpon the Frenchme, not only the lines of Italians were spared & reserved, but also rone of the parties should be expulsed, it would be easie with the natural armies of the counto chase out the other, being already weakened and out of breath. Others on the other side, whom perhaps were fetled more deepe impressions and considerations of the substance of igs, reposing litle in the deluding shewes of a title magnificall, seared that the warres that were un with intention to deliuer Italy from forreine powers, would grow more to hurt the vitall ites of that body, then other warres that had bene begun with a manifest profession and reso-: intention to Subdue it: They sayd, it was no lesse vaine then ill aduised, to hope that the armies taly deprined of vertue, of discipline, of reputation, of Captaines, of authority, and the wils of ir Princes not conformed, should be mighty inough to drine out of Italy him that is already leffed of conquelt and victory, in whom albeit all other remedies should faile, at least he could ierfaile of the meane to be reunited with those that he had vanquished to the common ruine all the states and regions of Italy: They foresaw that there was more reason to seare that in fenew stirres were not occasion to make pillage of Italy by new nations, then to hope that the vnion of the Pope and the Venetians, there should be any ability to vanquish the Frenchn and the Spaniards: They sayd that as it was to be wished that the disagreement and ill dis-Red councels of their Princes had not opened the way to forraine armies to enter into the ine body of Italy: so notwithstanding, since by their infelicity, two of the most worthy memsofthat body were occupied by the French and Spanish kings, it was to be esteemed a fatte le calamity, that they both continued there vntill either the goodnesse of God, whose rule gothrough all, or the fauour of fortune, who ordereth things in time, would minister occasions tter grounded, and ayde them with oportunities more conuenient, for that the one king waighin ballance against the other, their mutuall lealonsies would defend the liberty of such as were t yet falne into seruitude: then that betweene themselues they should fall into armes, by meane which, whilest the warre should last, the parts that yet remained sound would be torne in pecs by pillages, by fyrings, by bloud, and by other miferable accidents which war draweth with And lastly which of them should remaine victor, would affuredly afflict the whole body with a ore hard and heavie servitude.

But the thoughts of the Pope (in whom was another opinion) being become more violent princehe berekindled by the new confederation : affoone as the tearme limited in the admonition published of the hass before against those Cardinals that were Authors of the Councell, was passed, he called toget the publike Consistory with great solemnity, and sitting in habit pontificall in the hall named e hall of the kings, he declared that the Cardinals of S. Crosse of S. Mallo, of Cosense, and of Bayer, were falne from the dignity of Cardinals, and had incurred all those paines, whereunto are sized heretikes and schilmatikes: he published also an admonition of the same forme against to Cardinall S. Senerin, whom he had not molested till that day: and proceeding in the same hee to the deuties for warre, he solicited continually the comming of the Spaniards, having an interior afore all other things to bring warre upon the Florentins, both to draw to the deutior of the consederate that common-weale, restoring to the government the famulie of Medicus: also to fatisfie the infinit malice which he bare to Peter Soderin Gonfalonier, as though it was alrough his authority, that the Florentins would never be separated from the French king, giv; also a consent afterwards, that the Councell should be holden at Pisa.

Of this resolution many signes and relations were brought to Florence, where falling into pparations to be able to sustaine the warre, it was propounded amongst other things, that it counct be vnreasonable to resist with the retienues and goods of the Church, the warre which is Church went about to make vnits the retienues and goods of the Church, the warre which is to constraine the Churchmen to contribute some great quantity of money, but vnder these constitutions, that they should be bestowed in places of surety, and the money not to be disbursed in the action of warre, which not hapning, and the sear thereof ceasting, curry portion shot be restored to the parties that lent it. To this deuise many of the Citizens spake against, some feare to incurre the paines imposed by the cannon lawes youn the defilers of the liberty of: Church: they were the least in number and most inferior in power and authority: but the gret part impugned this proposition, onely to object against the will and reasons of the Gonfalonn, of whose authority it was manifest that this counsell did proceede: in somuch as the new ordained hereupon, being already debated in the Councels printegn less by the diligence of: Gonfalonnier, then inclination of many others, and nothing wanting now but the approbation the great and publike Councell which stood assembled for that purpose, the Gonfalonnier reaso

In regard of these reasons it hath bene sudged necessa " by this honourable Councell and many other Citizens of respect and merite, that for the defen " and protection of this liberty, there should be leavied the same provisions as if the warre we " certaine. And albeit it is very likely that the French king, at least for his proper interest, will ay " vs mightily: yet, we are neither for that hope to leave off those remedies which be in our pow " nor forget that many impediments may eafily chaunce, which in some fort may deprine vs · " his fuccours. It may be there be some that will object against this counsell, as being neither nec " fary nor profitable: in fuch men perhaps is more dominion of passion er other particular l " mor, then of affection or zeale to the common benefite. Some also alleage, that being t certaine of the Popes intention to enter into warre, it is a resolution vnprofitable, such as offe edeth his authority, and by taxing the revenues of the Church, to give him infloccasion to be " gry, and to prouoke him to make warre vpon vs almost by necessitie: as thoughby so many e dent figures and arguments is not manifeltly comprehended the substance of his intention, o; "though it appertained to wife gouernours of common-weales to deferre preparations tilla: " the beginning of the affault, and first to receive the blow of the enemie, afore we cover our bor "with armes necessary for our defence: The medicine that is ministred out of time, workes t " to the benefit of the patient; the counfell is without fruit that comes after the fact, and it is) " late to apply the remedy after the ill be hapned. The feare to offend God neede not retaine you: for, our neces-,, ie is so great, and our daunger so manifest, not standing subject to any thing that may more pre-,, dice vs: that it is suffered not onely to serve our turnes with that part of those revenues which is ,, ot converted into workes of pietic and charitie, but also it is lawfull to lay hands even upon the ,, nings facred: for hat according to the law of nature, the defence and refifting of iniuries is com-,, on to all men, allowed of God, and approued of all nations, a perpetuall rule to men, and engen-,, ed together with the world: it will last as long as the world, and is not subject to derogation by, y of the lawes civill or cannon, grounded vpon the wils and traditions of men, which being not,, herwife recorded, then in paper or other matter frayle & declining, have no power to derogate,, perpetuall law, not made by men or their counfels, but engraved by nature herfelse in the spirits ,, dhearts of all mankind: we must not expect and temporise till we be brought into the last ex-,, mitie, for that being once enuironed with oppressions, our recourse to remedies would be,, olate, and we should stand to lament the harmes which we might have auoyded: it is too,, e to prouoke to vomit when the poyfon hath pierced to the bones: the fouldier ferueth no turne,, at beginneth to march when the battell is done. Besides all this, how can it be denied, that the ,, ite and multitude of private persons shall suffer great distresse by it, seeing that by the impostes,, at are layd vpon them, the greatest part of the are constrained to cut off some of those expences,, ithout the which they can not live but with great incommodity and diminution of things neces-,, ie to their degree: That is the necessitie which hath bene considered upon by such as haue made,, e lawes, by which we are forbidden to expect till our Citizens be brought to the daunger of fa-,, ne and no longer able to sustaine their families. On the other part, by this taxation, there is no ,, commoditie imposed upon the Churchmen, for that they do onely disfurnish themselues of that,, rt of their reuenues, which, either they keepe vnprofitable in their coffers, or reserue to expend,, prodigalities superfluous, or perhaps some of them (Ispeake under pardon) would lash out in ,, casures dishonest. This is a perpetual resolution of all wise men, that the libertie of Cities and,, mmon weales is acceptable to God, for that in them, more then in any other fort of gouerne-,, ent is preserued the common benefite, iustice administred without acception of persons, the,, nde of Cirizens rayled more and more to workes of vertue and honour, and more respect & re-,, rence borne to religion: And yet you beleeue it is an action not a little displeasing to God, that ,, defend a thing so precious, for the which who sheds his proper bloud winneth greatest merite,, dpraise, you employ a little part of the fruits and reuenues of temporall things: which not with-,, inding they are dedicated to Churches, yet they are all descended vnto them by almes, by dona-,, ons, and by inducements of laymen our elders: They are to be no lesse employed for the preser-,, tion and safetie of Churches, subject and exposed in a time of warre, then things secular which,, e layd downe to the crueltie and couerousnesse of souldiers, neither are they more to be respe-,, ed in a war made by the Pope, then if there were a perfecution by the Turkes or the greatest,, rants of the world. Forbeare not whilest you have time to provide for the safetie of your coun-,, ey, be not curious in consciece to defend your libettie, then the which you can not offer to God, temporall facrifice more acceptable or worthy: Thinke that to chase the war from your houses, ,, om your temples, from your Monasteries, and from your possessions, there is no better remedie,, ien to make knowne to him that is rifen to offend you, that you are determined to forget no-,, ing that may ferue to your defence. That force is iust that is rayled in a necessary cause, & where,, ou want fecular meanes to warrant your lives , to apply the goods of the Church in this propor-,, on, can be no breach of equitie nor conscience: nature by prerogative makes things lawfull for ,, efence, which the law ceremonially referueth for other respects.

The difcourse of this graue Magistrate, no lesse reasonable in it selse, then necessaries or their cononsafetie, wrought such impression in the minds of the hearers, that the law proponed was withPandolfe Petrucci counselleth the Pope.

ontany difficultie approved by the great councell. By reason whereof, not with slanding the di pleasure and discontentment of the Pope increased more and more, taking more hot occasiont dispose the confederats to begin war with the Florentins: yet the perswasios of Pandolfe Petrue es had power to turne from that opinion as well the Pope as the Deputies that solicited in Itali for the king of Aragon: for Pandoife giving counsell to affaile Bolognia, blamed much all deuise and enterprises to bring the war into Tuskane, alleaging that Bolognia being viable for her pre per weakeneffe, to defend her felfe, should be enforced to call in the forces of the French king, an for the Florentins, what with their owne power, concurring also the proper profit of the king, 1 would no lesse fee to their defence, then to Bolognia. That albeit the Florentins bare a certaine it clination of minde to the French king, yet neuertheleffe they were wife and flood alwayes icalor of the preferuation of their estate, neuer having at his instance offended any with armes during great flirs; yea they had not ministred to him in any other fort of service, but onely furnished him for the defence of the flate of Lombardie with two hundred men at armes, according to the bond of the capitulation made in comon between chim & the king Catholike he said there could not done to the French king a thing more agreeable or profitable, then to constraine the Florentimet giue ouer to be Newters,& to loyne their cause with his: That it would be a matter of great indi cretio, if his enemies were the cause to make him obtains that which he could never bring to pas by his authoritie, the king having in vaine solicited by many prayers & promises to declare the selues for him: That it was discerned of many by many signes, & by him copreheded by most cer taine knowledge, how grieuous it was to the Florentins, that the Councell should be celebrated Pifa, whereunto they had not confented for other respect, then that they durst not gainefay the French kings demaundes, made immediatly after the rebellion of Bologma: a time when in Ital was not seene any armse to oppose against him. Besides, it was a thing certaine, that the authorit of Cafar was concurrant in the Councell, accopanied also with the consent of the king Catholik That likewise he knew that the Fiorentins were not to suffer the French souldiers to stay vpo the lands: And that it was a matter daungerous to threaten or prouoke them, where, of the contrary could not be but profitable to deale with the with affabilitie & demoftratio to admit their exculfor that proceeding in such maner, either there would be obtained of them with time & occasio things which the could not be hoped for, or at least, for bearing to costraine the by scare of new r folutios, they might be fo entertained that they should do no hurt in times of danger & perill: A in case of victorie & preuailing, it would rest in the power of the consederats to give to the Flor rins fuch forme of gouernment as they should thinke most expedict. The matter that in this act diminished the authoritie of Pandolfi, was the knowledge that was had that he defired for his prefit particular, that a war of that cofequence should not begin in Tuskane, by meane of which the whole body & parts of the countrey would fuffer indifferent destruction, either by the armies of the enemy, or by the incursos of frieds. But what by the efficacie of his reasons, fet out so as they re fled all objectios, & by the authoritie of the man, in who was fo small opinio for matters of cour fell, it was eafily determined not ro affaile the Floretins. This coucell was the better approued a contention that a few dayes after began to kindle betweene the Florentins and the Cardinals.

A contention betweene the Florentins and the Cardinals rebels.

It is fet downe before that the presence of the Cardinals was not at the first actes of the Coucell: for they taried at the borough of S. Donyn, either to expect the Prelats that were come out of France, or to be accópanicd with those which (esa had promised to send, or hap lingring for other occasions: and being departed fro thence by sundry wayes, the bruce ranne, the the two Spanish Cardinals who had taken the way of Bolognia, would be reconciled to the Pop being knowne to solicit continually to that end the Embassadour of the king of Aragon which is resident with the Pope. That opinion seemed so much the more credible, by how much they he obtained of the Florenines under publike saith and promise, that they might remaine in suret within Florece. But by that time they were come upon the countrey of Mugello, they turned sure denly towards Lucqua, either to ioune with the others, or pethaps their intention had bin alway so, or essentially, receiving advertisements in that place that they were deprived of the dignitie, as easy of Cardinals, they dispaired to fall to any accord with the Pope. About this time the the Frech Cardinals, $Malo, Albert, & Bayenx. Passed the Appinyn by the way of Pontresino, togeth with the Prelats of France: after who and at their request, marked out of Löbardy three hundre renchlaunces comaunded by Odet Foix Lord of Lautrich: he was appointed gard of the Counill by the Cardinals, either to the end that the Councell accopanied with the armes of the Frech ng, should continue with more authoritie, or else (which was more likely) to have power to supreffe whofoeuer durst rife against the obedience of their decrees. But so soone as the Florentins une to the discouerie of that resolution, which had bin concealed fro them vnrill the bands bega march, they determined not to receive into a Citie of great importance, such a number of foulers, both condering the ill disposition of the Pisans, & that the last rebellio hapned king Charles eing present & suffering it, and also the inclination which the French souldiers bare to the towne Pifa: In times of perill wife men feare all things, and do hold it necessarie to their furetic to en- >> rtaine a suspition of things which in common foresight and coniecture they have no reason to ... oubt: for, the Florentins fearing that befides the daungerous accidents that might happen by the 32, solencie of men of warte, doubted also that the fouldiers of the French king entring into Pila, it Il not out (& perhaps fuch was the fecret defire of the king) that he fought to make Tuskane the ate of his warres. In these feares, they signified at the instant to the French king, that it was hard harbour fo many people for the flraitneffe and sterilitie of the countrey, verie vnable to prouide the nouriture of io many peoples as came from all parts to the Councell: They alleaged also at the place was not necessarie for the safetic of the Cardinals, to whom might be offered some olence, either by strangers, or by the proper inhabitants, their multitudes & numbers exceeding ree the pollicie and gard that they had affigued to containe them. To the Cardinall of S.Mallo, whose direction the Frenchmen were governed in all things, they sent word that they were dermined to admit no fouldiers into Pera: who, by the returne of his answers, seeming to consent &c contented, gave order on the other fide, that the bands should advaunce and match severally without making any femblance, perswading himselfe that being approched neare to Pssa, they ould enter either by force or by futtletie, or at least for feare that the Floretins durst not do such injurie to the Frech king as to let them. But the king having clearely answered that they should t march thither at all, the Florentins dispatched Frauncis Vittorio to the Cardinall of S. Mallo than Embassage equal to his hawtinesse and pride : he told him from the state of Florence, it if the Cardinals entred ypon their lands armed and with bands of fouldiers, they would not nely not admit them into Pifa, but also would hold them for enemies, and pursue them for ch, and would also do the like, if the men of warre passed the Appenin towardes Tuskane, that they were to prefume that they passed not for other purpose, then to steale secretly into ifa, or to execute fome other firatageme. This message wrought so with the Cardinall, that he olued the bands should efcsoones returne againe beyond the Appenin, the Florentins confeng that besides the persons of the Lords of Lautrich and Chastillion, he might retaine with him hundred and fiftie archers. All the Cardinals were together at Lucqua, which Citie, for fuffeg that affemblie and presence, the Pope pronounced to be fallen into the interdiction: and leang there verie ficke the Cardinall of Coffensa, who, not long after faw there the last day of his ortall life, the other foure went to Pila, where they were received by the Magistrates with ld thewes, and by the Commons was expressed no great reuerence, both for that their comng was displeasing to the Florentins, and the cause of that Councell not well received nor apby the nations of Christendome: for, notwithstanding the title and pretence to reforme : Church was both very honest & greatly profitable, & also no lesse necessary then agreeable to the regions of Christendome; yet it was differened of wife men that the Authors and workers of 1: fame were pushed on with endes ambitious: They were all caried with couetous desires of nporal things, & under the shadow of the weale and benefit universal!, they respected their parular interests, making holinesse and pietie a couer to their greatnesse and glory: and yet which them should be raised to the Popedome, stood in no lesse necessitie to be reformed then others at they went about to compell to reformation. Moreover it was seene of many, that besides the bition of Priests, the quatels of Princes and questions of estates. had stirred vp and nourished is councell. That respect had moved the French king to procure it, the king of Romains to connt to it, and the king of Aragon to defire it: So that it being clearely discerned that under the use of the Councell, was compreheded the quarell of armes and Empires, the people expressed I vniuerfall horrour, that under demont shadowes of spiritual things (instruments of warres and publes) men should thirst and aspire to matters temporall: and therefore not onely at the entire

in the actes of the Councell, their grudge and discontentment burst out more manifest: for albe they fummoned the Clergie to be in the Cathedrall Church at the first fession, yet much lesse th any of them respected the summons, seeing the verie Priests of the Church refused to lend the ornaments and vestures, when (according to their custome) they meant to have celebrated it Masse for the imploration of the aide & light of the holy spirit; yea, the Priests instifying their con tept with actes of greater infolencie, forbare not to thut the doores of their Church & wouldne fuffer them to enter. The Cardinals complained of these contempts at Florence, where was con maunded that neither the yse of Churches, nor the seruice of instrumets ordained for divine offic should be denied them, but as touching the Clergie, there was no compulsion either to be attl Church, or to afful the action. These directions almost repugnant in themselves, as they proceed of the diuision of the Citizens & by meane of them, on the one side the Councel was received i to their dominion, & on the other fide followed with contempt & rejection, brought at one tir offence to the Pope, and discontentment to the French king. In regard whereof, the Cardinals se ing how daungerous it was to remaine in Pifa without armes, and no leffe confidering that would bring diminutioto the authoritic of their Councel, to celebrate it in a citie that obeyed n their decrees, were vpo termes to depart affoone as they should have accomplished the affaires the Councell: wherein their resolution was further compelled & hashned by an accident happi fuddenly, which albeit was by chaunce, tooke not with standing his foundation of the wicked d that made the position of me: for, a French souldier, in a publike place comitting some insolencie ypon a strong pet, and fuch as faw it raising a prefent outcry, many fouldiers aswell Frenchas of the Cardin pars fro Pifa. traine and other Prelars, prepared in armes to the place where the brute was: on the other fide lil wife many troupes of the people of Pifa & of the Flor etin bands flockt thirder to behold the ac dent. And as for the most part popular tumults are full of faction and varietie of affection, so the larme being founded, fome cried upon the name of Fraunce, & fome upon the title of Morzoc (the figne & enfigne of the common weale of Florence) occupying amongst the daungerous fig wherein their fury made them feare nothing leffe the the hazard of their lives, which at other tin they would seeke to preserve with no little care & lealousse. But the Captaines and chiestaine the French, and commaunders of the Florentins, joyning differetion to valour and authoritie, a ted the furie of the fight, their diligence doing much to restraine the intemperance on all sides. the end the tumult was appealed, many on both parts bearing away no small hurts, amongst w fell into that fortune the Lord Chastellion and the Lord of Lamerich, notwithstanding neither one nor the other bare away any wounds of perill. This accident brought such assonishmet to ! Cardinals, haply at that houre affembled in the Church of S. Muchael which is there joyning, t: they made the day after the fecond fession wherein they ordained that the Councell should: transferred to Millan: not holding the oportunitie of that place convenient for the actes of: Councell, which gaue no furetie for the fafetie of their liues: and therefore before the fifteenth is of their arrivall, they departed in great diligence from Pifa, greatly to the reioycing of the Flor. tins & Pifans, & no leffe to the contentment and liking of the Prelats that followed the Counc who it did a little discotent to be come into a place, which, what for the incomoditie of lodging! what for the incoueniencie of other wants, growen by the long wars that were passed, did not nister to them that fulnes of helpes & meanes to liue delicately & prodigally, which the Priests: Frenchmen are wont to finde in the like actions. They murmured also, and being come thit t by the kings commaundement & against their wils, they defired chaunge of place, and all other -

cidents that might bring difficultie, prolongation, or diffolution of the Councell. But, such was the vniuerfall contempt of this Councell, that the hatred & grudging of peots following the Cardinalsto Millan, they found there euen the like despising, and farre greater ificulties: for the Clergie of Millan communicating in the contempts of Pifa, eve in the beginn ? refused of themselves to celebrate the divine service, as though there were entred into their Ci ; not Cardinals of the Church of Rome, who were won to be honored & worshipped in enery place but persons profane and accursed, and carying with them all prination of honour, renerence, and respect. And when they had occasion to shew themselves in publike, the commons forbare no o rayle at them, fcorning them as well in wordes as geffures: but specially their malice was most tpressed upon the Cardinall of S. Crosse, who as they supposed to be the author of that stir, so evy me exercised their judgement most upon him, being also in the last session of Pila elected Presilent of the Councell. These were the manifest and common murmures of people, that heretoore Councels were wont to bring to countries benedictions, peace and concord, but in this was red to countries, kingdomes, and peoples, maledictions, warres, and discords: That other Counels were assembled to reunite the Church that was out of vnitic, but this was assembled to reake her vnity, when the was in good agreement: That the contagion of fuch a peffilence inected all fuch as received it, altered all those that obeyed it, abused even those that savoured it, lefiled fuch as had converfation with it, and feduced all those that heard it: There was to be exected of their comming noother thing, then bloud, famine, & pellilence, together with the perition both of bodies and foules of men: by the original and cause, they gathered what would be ne fuccesse and effect, and reasonably they could expect no fruit or confirmation of vnity, from uch as began to fowe their labours with seedes of division. Gaston de Foix, who not many moeths afore the departing of Monsieur Lonqueville had bin preferred both to the Duchy of Millag nd to the army, somewhat suppressed those murmures, tending almost to a tumult and manifest edition: he joyned to his authority, commandements threatning and penall, conffraining the lergy to celebrate feruice as they were wont, and enivoned the Commons to speake more moeffly hercafter.

In regard of these difficulties the beginnings of the Councell were continued with very little recesse or issue: the plots that had bin layd with so great deuise and study, brought forth euents nite contrary to the expectation of the authors: things debated by long time and deepe difourie of counfell, drew no refolutió according to the weening & cóiectures of the parties: Where,, ound meaning goeth not with the wildom & imaginations of men, there their workings are full, frailty & the whole body of their actions clothed with imperfections. But the thing that most, oubled the hopes of the Cardinals, was, that Cafar did not only from day to day deferre to fend ther Prelats or Proctors, not with fanding the cofent he had give, & that often times reassured by rpetuall promifes to the Frech king & the Cardinall of S. Seuerin: but also, he alleaged for his exile (being haply induced & counselled by others) that it was not agreeable to his dignity, to send the Coucell of Pefa, the Prelats of his proper estates & territories, if both the example and name 'all Germany were not concurrant in the actio. And for that cause he sayd he had called a conuotion of the Prelats of Germany at Auspurge, to deliberate of some joynt & universall forme of occeding to be yied touching the Councell: affuring not with standing the Frenchme, that yner that meane he wold fo worke as they shold all be fent. Moreouer he much troubled the kings ind with his variety & diverse maners of proceeding: for, besides his vucertaine & cold dealings the affaires of the Coucell, he inclined fully & openly to the motion of peace with the Venetians, hich was solicited by the Pope & the king of Aragon with many offers : and on the other side, plaining bitterly against the king Catholike, both for that contrary to all shame, he had so appaatly impugned the league of Cambray, & also in this new confederation (which he rather cal- The French K. Itreason) he had named him but as accessary: he suborned Galeas S. Seuerin to go to Rome in Mariant rson as enemy to the Pope, but refurnished by the king for the greatest part of his army, & reeued with great quantities of treasure: and yet he made no declaration of these things with such urance as it could not be doubted whathe would at last determine (not with standing all his deands were fatisfied to him. In this fort the kings mind was eftfoones trauelled with his accustoed fulpitions, that if he abandoned Cafar, he left him at liberty to joyne with his enemies: and if would flill flicke to him and fulfaine him, his alliance would be bought with too deare a price, dyet doubtfull what fruit would reuert of it, well knowing by experience of things past, that ofnimes his owne diforders did hurt him more then his forces did ayde him: yea the king was t able to judge in himselfe, which would most hurt him in this action, either the well doings & od fuccesse of Casar, or the contraries. Besides, the king Catholike nourished him & entertaydhim as much as he could in that doubt: and, to make him proceede more flowly in the prouians of the war, he gaue him hope not to stir in armes. The king of England did the like, and for esame causes, who had made answer to the French Embassador, that it was not true, that he adeonsented to the league made at Rome, but that he was fully determined to keepe the alliance thich he had with the French king. Befides, at the same time the Bishop of Timely proponed cace in the name of the Pope, so farre forth as the king would no more fauor the Councell, 00 3

and withdraw himselfe from the protection of Bolognia, for the which he offered to give affu rance that the Pope flould dresse no more new enterprises against him. The king seeined less displeased with the peace, notwithstanding it bare hard conditions, then to put himselfe to the da gers & expenses of the war, which by computation feemed infinit, having to make refishance a gainst his enemies, and to refurnish the wants of Cafar: neuerthelesse, disdaine drew him almos to be forced by the king of Aragon to make peace for feare of warre: believes that, it was a matte very hard to affure him that the Pope would observe the couenants of peace, after he had recove red Bologma,& should be deliucted from the feare of the Councell: he doubted also that when h should be ready to confent to the conditions offered, the Pope would draw backe as he was wor to do at other times. In which maner of proceeding, besides that his dignity should be offender and his reputation diminished, Cafar would hold himselfe injured, for that leaving him in wart with the Venetians, he fought of himselfe alone to conclude the peace. Therefore he made precise answer to the Bishop of Tiuoly, that he would not condifiend to subject Bolognia to the Churc in other forme then it had wont to be in auncient times, And at the same time, to establish a fitti resolution with Casar who lay at Brunech, a towne neare to Trent, he sent to him in great dil gence, & with very large offers, Andre de Burgo Cafars Embassador resident with him. Arth time certaine of his subjects of the countrey of Tyroll occupied Batisten, a place of very great strength in the entreie of the valley of Caldora.

The practifes of the peace being wholly broken & diffolued, the first thoughts & deuises of the king were, that when Monsieur Palissa (leaving in Verona three thousand footemen to as peale Cafar not well contented with his departure) should have led the residue of the bandst the Duchy of Millan, there should be made new leavies of footmen: and so all the army beir reassembled, they should march to assaile Romagnia, hoping to occupy it either all or in part, b fore the Spamard should approach: and then either to march further according to occast ons, or at least to entertaine and beare out the warre vpon the dominions of others untill sprin time, when the king passing into Italy in person with all the sorces of his kingdom, hoped make an univertall suppression of his enemies. But as he stood wavering in this deuise, his resol tions not proceeding with that expedition which the occasions required, and by reason of his n ture estranged from expences, himselfe no lesse slow in many prouisions, but specially to wa new fouldiers, he fell into new fulpitions of the stirring of the Swiffers, of which nation for the heretofore we have fet downe fome generall mention in fundry places, it cannot be inconver ent to the present purpose, to deale somewhat more particularly.

mba: people

The Smiffers, which are those peoples whom auncient histories call Fieluetians, have their the Swiffers be, bitations in the most high mountaines of Iura, named S. (lando, S. Briget, and S Godat: a race men naturally valiant, warlike, and rude; and for the sterility of the countrey, more given to g zing, then to tillage: They have bene in times past under the subjection of the Dukes of Austra whose jurisdiction they shaked off by rebellion many yeres sithens: They have their policy & s uernement of themselves, without any figne of depending or relation to either Emperors, kin or other Princes: They are deuided into xiij communalties, which they call Cantons, and euery! them feuerally are gouerned by Magistrates, lawes & ordinances proper & particular: They he their parliament or Councell euery yeare, or more often if occasion and necessity require, whe in they dispute of universall affaires, their assemblies and meetings being not subject to certain! of places, but referred as best pleaseth the Deputies of euery Canton: They call those assemble dyots or iorneys, imitating the phrase and customes of the Germains. In them they resolue vp ! peace, vpon warre, vpon confederations, vpon legations and demands made to leavy fouldiers, ther by publike decree, or by permission: in them also they set downe directions for all thir: that appertaine to their common interest: when they agree by publike decree to deliuer fouldie, the Cantons chuse amongst themselues a Captaine generall, to whom they give the banner was the Enfigne and name publike: Their vnity and agreement, together with the glory of the armes, hath made them very notable and renowmed thorough the regions of the earth, notwistanding for their outward shape and personage, they beare a presence barbarous and ru; & for their behauior and conversation, hold more of incivility then of comlinesse. By their natu l valour joyned to due discipline & order, they have not only & at all times made valiant defe e at home for their owne countrey, but alfo in forreine warres they haue performed fingular fe: 🕏

armes to their perpetual praise: wherein sure their recommendation and merit had bene farre reater, if they had expressed such effects of valour for their proper jurisdiction and impery, and ot benemercenarie to the appointments of others, and for the increasing of the dominion of angers, or if they had fet before their eyes an end more worthy and noble then the defire of moy, by the loue and corruption whereof they have lost the occasion to be feared and redoubted traly: for, where they have not come out of their countrey bur as fouldiers waged & mercenary, ley have not earled backe a publike fruit of their victories: the defire of gaine makes them for emost part to follow armies, and besides their huge pensions, to be troublesome by new deands of payes almost intollerable: to such as wage and pay them, they are for the most art hard and vneafie in converfation & obedience: in their houses & apart, the principals of them rbeare not to receive gifts and pensions of Princes, to follow and favour their faction in their dyts and parliaments. By reason whereof, things publike being referred to private profit, and favors voyces being made vendible and corrupted, discords by litle & litle haue bin kindled amongst emfelues: the fame being the occasion that matters which have bin approved in the parliaments the most part of the Cantons, beginning not to be embraced and followed of all, they fell at last, ot many yeares afore that time, to manifelt warres amongst themselves, much to the diminution the authority which they bare throughout the parts of the word. Somewhat below these, be rtaine to words and villages inhabited by a people called Valleymen, as having their dwellings Valestent valleys, they are inferiour to the Swiffers in number, in authority, in valour, and in enery oer disposition : & yet more lower then they, is another generation of men called Grisons, which Grisons e gouerned by three Cantons, and vpon that are called the Lords of the three leagues: the catail towns of their countrey is called Coire: they have often fociety and confederation with e Swifers, and with them they go commonly to the warre: they have almost the same pollicy, e same lawes, the same constitution of maners and customes. In matters of armes and vaurthey are preferred afore the Valleymen, but they hold no comparison with the Swiffers, cier in numbers, in pollicy, or in vertue. The Smiffers then, who at that time were not fo much demerate and corrupted as they have bene fince, tooke incitation by the Pope, and prepared to scend upon the Duchie of Millan, both diffembling that that leavy of armes proceeded of the interfitie of the Cantons, and also spreading a brute, that the Cantons of Switz and Fribourg ere the authors of the action: of whom, the first tooke his complaint and consideration of this, at a post of theirs passing through the Duchy of Millan was murdred by certaine French soulers: the other pretended a reuenge for certaine particular wrongs that had bene done to them. he Councels of these, and generally, the resolution of the whole nation, albeit they were afore anified to the French king, yet they could do nothing to draw them to accord with him, notithstanding the adulfe and perswasions of his Lords & wise men concurred in it, and the friends I favourers which he had amongst them gaue him hope to be able to obtaine it. He was ived also by his accustomed difficulties to enlarge their auncient pensions with twenty thoundfrankes, which may be a little more or lesse then ten thousand duckets: so that he resused ra matter of small price and value, the amitie, which afterwardshe would have bought with finite treasures. He perswaded himselfe that either they would not stirre at all, or if they did, least they could not much hurt him, for that being accustomed to go to the warre on foote, cir want of horse and artilleries would bring great impediments to their seruice. Besides, pout that time (now was Nouember begunne) the rivers were swelled, and they had neither effels nor bridges: the victuals of the Duchie of Mullan were restrayned into fortresses and aces of strength, the townes thereabout well garded and kept, and in the plaine the men at mes were able to make head against them . By which impediments and necessities he presured, that of they did march, they would be constrained effloones to retire. But the Swiffers king litle amaze by these difficulties, began to descend at Varesa, at which place their numers increased continually: they had with them seuen field peeces and many harquebuzes crocke caried by horses, and some reasonable prouision of victuals. Their comming seemed to e fo much the more daungerous, by how much, the inhabitants of Millan began to be weary fthe French jurisdiction, the same growing both by certaine new insolencies and disorders the French fouldiers more then of cultome: and also by the conetousnesse of the king, who would not suffer to be made any newe leavyes or provision of footemen. Besides, the men at armes that at that time were in Italy, which in true computation exceeded not a thousan and three hundred launces, together with the two hundred Gentlemen, were not all able t make refultance to the Sweffers, both for that part of them were gone to the gard of Ferona an Breffa, and also Monsieur de Foix had newly fent two hundred launces to Bolognia to withfan the comming of the Cardinall of Medicis and M. Anth. Colonno to Faenza: where albeit the had no footemen as yet leavied, yet both to represse the divisions that were in Bolognia, and all for that at that time the Castle-keeper of the rocke of Sassalon (a borough of the mountaine of Be lognia) had voluntarily put it into the Legates hands, it was thought necessary to send a gartiso thither. From Varefa the Swiffers fent a trompet to defie the kings licutenant, who having as w but a flender strength of men at armes, and no more then two thousand sootemen, whereof was not yet resoluted to make new leavies for feare to displease the king, was now come to Ass. rona place about thirteene miles from Millan: he had no intention to fight with them, but accoast them, and cut off their victuals, in which action only rested his hope to let and stay the feeing there was not betweene Varesa and Millan neither rivers hard to passe, nor any place defence. From Varefathe Swiffers marched to Galera, where they mustred their army, whi contained ten thousand able bodies. Monsieur de Foix who followed John Ia. Triuulce, put his felfe within Leguano, which is about foure miles from Galera: by reason whereof they of Mile having more feare then affurance, and yet their perill as yet leffe then their fuspition, waged bar offootemen at their proper charges for the gard of the towne, Also Theodore Trumlee caused fortifie the bastillions, and (as though the army would have retired within Millan) he caused cast squares and Cariers within and about the rampiers that environed the suburbes, the me eafily to manage horses. Neuerthelesse, Chonsieur de Foix accompanied with fine hundred la ces, and the two hundred Gentlemen of the kings, presented himselfe before Galera with gr; flore of artilleries: which affoone as the Smiffers were aware of, they issued out in order of b. tell, and iretired efcloones within the towne, refuling to fight in a place open, volefic their numb: were greater.During thefe actions, and in a finall respite of time, their numbers increased, in who respect determining no more to resuse the fight, they marched to Busty, where was a garrison s an hundred launces, who faued themselues with much ado, looking their baggage and part of the horses . At last the Frenchmen, who retired alway by the like measure and distance that the Si fers advanced, were returned and lodged within the suburbes of Alillan, but there was no ful 1 that they would flay and fland to defence, for that fometimes they affirmed and fomtimes deed, furnishing with great diligence the Castels with victuals. The Smillers afterwards marc 1 within two miles of the suburbes, but the universall seare that was had of them before, begann t to diminish much, both for that the bands of men at armes that were renoked began to ar e continually at Millan: and befides, they mustred many footenen, expecting also from time? time Captaine Molard with his regiment of Gascon footenien, and Captaine Jacob with s lanceknights, the one directed to come from Verona, and the other from Carpy. About this to also were surprised certaine letters written by the Smiffers to their Lords, who they aduertised it the Frenchmen gaue them no great impediments, and that albeit they had as yet received newesfrom the Pope, and leffe intelligence what the Venetian army did(whereof they maruel 1) vet they forbare not to march and aduance continually according to the orders of the refolut 1 They were by this time fixteene thousand in number, and turned towards Moncia, which ty affayed not to take, but bearing more towards the river of Adda, they kept the Frenchmen feare that they would aduenture to passe ouer: by reason whereof they cast a bridge at (Canto hinder their passage, vsing therein the oportunity of the towns and the bridge. In is meane while a Captaine of the Swiffers having first obtained safe conduct, came to Atillan, d demanded a moneths pay for all the footemen which offred to returne into their countrey: It being departed without any effect of his message, for that their offers were farre inferiour te is asking, he returned the day following with greater demands: and albeit there were made to m greater offers then the day before, yet assoone as he was returned to his army, he sent backe amediatly a trompet to fignifie to them, that they would no more harken to accord. The day 11lowing contrary to the expectation of enery one, they retired towards Coma, and fo returned nto their countries, leaving to judge whether they were discended to affayle the Duchy of Min, to passe into some other place: and also for what cause, being as yet constrained by no enident cellitie, they returned to fodainly: and if they were afore determined to to do, why they did bt accept the money that was offered them, seeing withall themselves made the demaunds. That soener the cause was, this is certaine, that as they retired, there came two postes from the ope and the Venetrans, who if they had arrived somewhat sooner, it is likely the armie of the riffers had not returned and it is not to be doubted, that if at the same time that the Swiffers tred the Duchie of Millan, the Spamards had beine neare to Bolognia, the affaires of the French ho were not able to make refiltance in fo manie places, had forthwith fallen into manifest ruine

The French king finding now by experience the perill which he could not foresee afore by ason, sent to Monsieur de Foix (before he knew of the breaking up of the Swiffers) that he rould not spare neither labour, money, nor diligence, to make agreement with them: and not oubting of anie other violent affault, the Swiffers being compounded withall, he gaue present rection to all the men at armes that he had in Fraunce (except two hundred launces which he ferued for Picardy) to passe the Mounts, sending besides a new strength of Gascon footmen,& mmaunded Aforficur de Foix to furnish hisarmie with footmen of Italians & launce-knights. nd because the succours of the Florentines were of great importance to him, both for that the The Frech king

tte Ecclefiallike, befides cutting off of victuals and other commodities from the armie of the e- fuccours of the mies if they should approch Bolognia, he solicited them with great instance, to declare on his Florentines. le, and iowne with him in the warre with all their forces, for that the prefent necessity required other matter then either a fuccour litle or limited, or that they should now stand contained ithin the tearmes of confederations: befides, they could neuer expect a more great or goodlie casion to bind him perpetuallie to the, nor do a more singular benefit or pleasure, which both and his fucceffors should reknowledge to them and their estate from age to age: lastly, he told emthat if they descended into the matter with necessarie consideration, they should find that fuccour and defend him, did comprehend to support & protect their owne cause, for that they ere not ignorant what hatred the Pope bare to them, and with what defire the king Catholike poured to dresse and establish in that Citie an estate depending whollie vpon him. But at Flonce the opinions of men varied and were deuided, for many blinded with the sweetnesse of preat sparing, considered not what the time to come might bring; and with others preuayled not itle the memorie of ancient dealings, wherein neither the faith nor the actions of that commo eale had bene at any time thankfully required by the king raigning, nor by Charles the eight spredecessour: they remembred how he had sold with a great price his promise, not to hinder cm in the recovery of Pifa, by which examples they faid they had no reason to trust estsoones his promifes, neither could they stand assured by any offers he could make, that he would eld recompence for anie office or benefite they should do to him. In these respects they held great raffinesse to resolue to enter into a warre, which not well succeeding they should pertake all the cuils more then either reason would, or in due proportion they ought: and falling out appilie, they should in no fort communicate with the fruits and benefits, or at least in very small irt and share. But of farre greater importance were they, who either for hatred, or for ambition, for the defire of another forme of gouernement, were opposed against the Magistrate or Gonlamier: they extolled the reasons aforesaid, and inferred others, that being neuters they should ot incurre the hatred of either party, nor give to any of the two kings infloccasion to comlaine: for that touching the French king, they were not bound to him in anie other thing then to ide him with three hundred men at armes for the defence of his proper estates, a proportinwhich they had alreadie accomplished to him: and for the king of Aragon, he could not e discontented with them, but would esteeme it a great gaine if they would forbeare to enterreddle otherwise in that warre. They occupied also this reason, that such as kept their faith best. vere most worthy of praise & merite: and by that example he was to hope that when he should all into affaires and doings, they would likewise observe instlicto him that which was promised the capitulation made in common with the French king and with him: that proceeding in his fort, if peace were made betweene the Princes, the citie should be named and preserved of hemboth; and in case the victorie should fall to the one of them, neither holding himselse

430 offended, nor bearing them any particular hatred, they should more easily buy his siicc ship wh the same mony, and haply with a lesse quantity, then they should have disbursed vpon the was, which was an expedition and meane, with the which, more then by armies and warres, their ders had many times faued their libertie: where if they should proceed otherwise, they should defray for another during the warre, and without any neeeffitie, intollerable expences; and t the victorie falling to the enemie, the libertie and safetie of their countrie should remaine in m. men; he held it better that the common weale should take armes for the French king, for while

Soderin for the manifest perill. The aduise of the Magistrate or Gorfalonnier was contrary to the opinions of the reason he had afore sauoured the Councell, and given to the Pope sufficient matter to be disctented, to the end that the Citie being pronoked by him, or at least beginning to enter into spition, might be as it were constrained to make that resolution : he perswaded besides, than that nature of time it could not be but a counfell prejudiciall, to remaine idle, expecting their of the warre managed so neare them, and betweene Princes so mighty and farre aboue them: t that in the warres of another, then is neutralitie commendable and apt to shake off and avoids ny troubles and expences, when our proper forces are not so weake as may make vs feare the ctorie of either partie, seeing that then it bringeth vs a surety, & oftentimes by their long wan, we are enabled to good means to increase our estate: He told them it was no sure foundation t to have offended either partie, or not to have given any just occasion to complaine, for that rie rarely it happeneth that the infolency of the conquerour is brideled or repreffed, either b quitie, inflice, conscience, or other discreet considerations, the same being the reasons why git Princes esteeme themselues not the lesse injuried, when they are resused in the things they de : but stand disdainfull against euerie one that followeth not their will, and ioyneth not their m b to their fortune: the Prince for the time he commandeth hath his fortune hardly brought to lit his defires, or in his ambition to respect other things then such as may glorifie his victories: this was a follie to beleeue that the French king would not take it for an offence, to fee himfelfelt abandoned in fo great perils, to find that the effects nothing answered the confidence and se pectation which he had in the Florentines, both touching matters which he promifed to him to of them, and also for things which they had so oftentimes assured: that it was also a greater ly to beleeue that the Pope and the king of Aragon being victors, would not dispose immode: ly of the victorie against that common weale, weighing with the infatiable hate of the one, e iount defire of them both, to erect there a gouernment to their fancie, least that citie remaing in her libertie, would be alwayes more inclined to the French then to them: the experience proofe of which defire might be eafily differened, in that the Pope (the king Catholike appro it) had preferred the Cardinall Medicis as Legate to the armie: fo that as to remaine neuter, is as much as to offer the felues a willing praic to who foeuer should become victor; so in joynin a the one of them, at the least by his victorie, they should be assured & preserved: a reward and it to be well confidered upon, feeing the daunger wherein were reduced the estate of their affa s: and in case the peace were made, they should reape benefits under better conditions: but to vether of the parties they ought rather to loyne themselves, it was superfluous to dispute, for at there was no comparison betweene friendships ancient, experienced, and tried, and fauours ny, vncertaine, and doubtfull: lesse doubt to follow an ancient amitie, by whose meane, albeit to common weale had not bene rewarded and recompenced, at least it had bene oftentimes de aded and preserved, then to embrace new fauours and leagues, which would be never vnace apanied with their infidelities and suspitions. The Magistrate occupied in vaine these discours. fuch being the most hinderers of his aduise, who it gricued most that it shold come to the Firsh kings knowledge that it was by his meane and working, that the Florentines should be in id "with him. Such is the propertie of enuie, not only to wish harme to another, but also to let, at " by another no good be done. The Adder doth shoot out his sting, and partaketh no more: et "with poyfon: but the man of enuie, when he can do no more harme of himselfe, forbeareth of

to let another to do good. Aniid these contentions, one faction breaking the adulse of the our, there could be established no resolution, whether they should declare or stand neuters: their consels oftentimes were verievncertaine, their affections different, their wils contrarie, and theileliberations repugnant in themselues, without concluding any grace or merite towards any pay. But that which more is, proceeding with these incertainties, they sent (to the great disple: us fthe French king) Embassador to the king of Aragon, Frauncis Guicesardin Doctor of Law, he sho wrote this present historie, and at that time of so young age, that, according to the lawes the countrey, he was viable to manage any office: and yet they gave him not such natures from missions, as thereby he was able to make the consederates to leave off in any sort their.

But a litle after the Swiffers were returned to their countries, the Popish and Spanish souldis began to enter into Romagnia, whose comming bringing more seate then perill made all the ownes which the Duke of Ferrara held on this fide Pam, except the Bastillion of la Fosse and the ord of Genuola, to render at the formons of a simple Trumpet. And for that the whole regients were not yet affembled and arrived in Romagna, nor the artilleries which the Vicerorexected at I mola; it was thought good, to the end the time should not be spent without profite, nat Peter of Nauarre Captaine generall of the Spanish footmen, should go to beliege the Baill: he began to batter it with three peeces of artillerie, and finding it more hard to be taken then looked for, both for the quantity of munitions, being aptly applied and executed, and for the folute defence of the fouldiers, being fiftie able bodies, he caused to make two bridges of wood give a greater commoditie to the fouldiers to passe the ditches which were full of water: and loone as he might carie with him the oportunitie of these bridges, the third day after his apoching before the Bastill, which was the last day of the yeare 1511, he gaue a furious assault, id fuch as after a long and braue fight, the footmen winning the walles with the helpe of their dders, at last tooke it, making slaughter almost of all the footmen defendants, together with cir Captaine. Peter of Nauarre left two hundred footmen within the Bastill, contrarie to the maion of loha Vitelli, who affured that it was so much shaken with artillerie, that there was no offibility to defend it without making new fortifications: but he was scarcely returned to joyne melfe with the Viceroy, ere the Duke of Ferrara, being gone thither with nine great pecces of tillerie, affaulted it with fuch furie, that laying open a litle place reversed in many parts, he end by force the very same day of his enterprise, where were slaine partly in fighting, and partly reuenge the death of his people, the Captaine with all his footmen. The Duke himselfe was rt on the head with a stone, which did him litle harme for the defence of his head peece, his vaur carying him further into perill then belonged to the regard of fuch a personage, if in Noble en honour and reputation were not dearer then life.

In this meane while all the regiments Ecclefiafticke and Spanish were affembled at Tmola. ightie in numbers, braue fouldiers, and valiant Captaines: for as the brute went, the king of fragen had there a thousand men at armes, eight hundred mounted vpon Iennets, and the thousand footmen Spanish; to whom, besides the person of the Viceroy were joyned many irons of the kingdome of Naples, of whom the most notable and renowined by experience of nes, was Fabricio Colonno, in whom was inuested the title of Gouernour generall, Prosper alonno having refused it, for that in the warre he could not brooke to be subject to the comandements of the Viceroy. On the Popes fide there were eight hundred men at armes, eight ndred light horsemen, and eight thousand sootmen Italians under At. Anth. Colonno, John telli, Malatesta Baillon sonne to John Paule, Raphaell de Pazzi, with other leaders and optaines, all subject to the obedience of the Cardinall de Medicis, Legate: onely they had tyet a Captaine generall, for that the Duke of Termins whom the Pope had chosen, as one in nom the king of Aragon reposed much, died at Cinita Castellana comming to the armie: & e Duke of Vrbin, to whom that place was wont to be transferred, came not at all, either for that th was the Popes pleasure, or else that he held it as a thing vnworthie of him, even you the ritories and lands of the Church, to obey a Viceroy bearing authority of Captaine general ouer

e whole armie of the confederates.

With this Armie plentifully furnished with artilleries which were almost all come from the The enterprise almost Naples, they determined to bring the Campe before Bolognia: not that they were of Bolognia by it ignorant that the enterprise was of verie hard action, seeing how easilie the Frenchmen the Pope and ight minister succours: but for that there was no other fort of enterprise which contained not K. of Aragon, eater difficulties and impediments: and to remaine idle with so great an armie, could not without manifest argument of cowardise. Moreover, the Pope made so great instance without manifelt argument of cowardite. Moreover, the Pope made to great inflance embrace some enterprise, that who so ever would put into consideration the difficulties, feemed to give him occasion to beleeve, and cause to complaine, that the sleights & wiles of the "Spaniards began to appeare: The forward horse is not holden backe with the bridle without s " ming and shewing his furie: The streame that runneth is not stayed contrarie to his course, wit "out roaring and making a noyfe: And to the mind defirous, eueric litle impediment is gricuot "and with his trouble brings both suspition and feare (expectation of it selfe being noted "ielous then infinite in defire.) In these respects the Viceroy causeth the armie to march, incar ping betweene the river of Adice and Bolognia: where, after he had given order to things nece farie for the befieging of that Citie, and turned the channels which go to Bolognia by the riucts Rhene and Sanama, he approched neare the walles, he stretched out and bestowed the greate part of his armie betweene the mountaine & the way that goeth from Bolognia to Remagnia, that for the commodity of victuals that come from that side . Fabricio Colonno with the auaur gard containing seuen hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horsemen, & fixe thousand foc nien, was lodged betweene the bridge of Rhene, standing vpon the high way of Romagnia whi leadeth into Lombardy, & the gate S. Felix, being also vpon the same way, & that to object me easie impediments for any French succors to enter: and because they wold command the mou taines, they bestowed one part of their bands of souldiers in the Monastery of S. Wiebaell oft wood, which is verie neare the Citie, but seated in a high place and commaunding over it: th also made themselves Lord of the Church which is more high, called S. Maria on the Mou In Bolognia, befides the people that bare armes, haply more by necessity then by nature, with a raine troupes of horsinen and soormen waged by the familie of Bentinoley, M. de Foix had se thither two thousand launce-knights, and two hundred launces, under Odet de Foix and Ti Allegre verie notable Captaines, the one for his long experiece in warre, and the other for then bilitie of his house, ioyned to the great tokens of valour that even his youth did expresse: w the was captaine Saietta & Vincent called the great divel. Nevertheleffe they reposed more fur tie in the succours which M. de Foix had promised them, then in their proper forces, both ce fidering the great circuit of the City, & also weighing the incommodities that were on the mor taine side: besides, there were no other fortifications, then such as for the present daunger we made in halte, and the Tentuoleis distrusted many of the nobility and people; and lastly they be made a late experience about the Bastill of Gentuola, that the valour of the Spanish footmen: fwered the praises that have gone on them in all times, to be men apt to befrege townes, by re son of their great agilitie: neuertheleffe they began estsoones to be assured, when they saw enemies aduanced litle, lying nine dayes about the walles without doing anie thing, fauing t they began with two Sakers and two Culuerins planted in the Monasterie of S. Michaell shoot in vaine into the Citie, rather to terrifie men then to hurt houses: an execution which the gaue ouer immediatly, knowing by experience that in doing litle domage to the enemie in t fort, they made also an unprofitable waste of their munitions. The matter that kept them so le from doing any thing, was an aduertisement that they had the same day they incamped, that de Foix being then come to Finalo, waged fouldiers from all parts, with intetion (which he cr fed to be justified with a brute running) to offer himselfe to all perils for the preservation of Citie, knowing how much it would prejudice the affaires of the king, and no leffe diminish owne reputation, if he suffered a City of that importance and conveniency to be taken out of hands. This made them draw into counfell to debate better, not onely on which fide they mis: befiege it with most hope and greatest facilitie, but also by what wayes they might let the Free 1 succours for entring. In the first counsell it was agreed, that Fabricio Colomo passing to the ot! fide of the towne with his due provisions of victuals and artilleries, should lodge upon the hill ! beneath S. Maria of the Mount, from whence he might both eafily gine impediments to a: that should attempt to enter into Bolognia, and yet he should not be so farre decided from 1: refidue of the armie, as not to be fuccoured in time what perill foeuer could happen: and that: the same time they should begin from that part where they were incamped, or very neare, to b ter the towne. Such as were the authors of this counsell, alleaged, that as all that the French hel in Italy depended wholly vpon the preferuation of the armie, so it concerned M. de Foix in ccretion and all good respects, not to hazard to do any thing, in the execution whereof he mig t be constrained to fight: & much lesse wold he be of that judgement, albeit he knew he might

prive himselfe of all meanes to succour in cases of necessitie the estate of Millan, which was not yet wholly affured from the mouings of the Swiffers, and where also was greater doubts to be Tailed by the Venetian armie, which being come upon the marches of Verona, feemed to threan the towne of Breffia. These reasons being layd in consideration with the enemie & his estate, nd weighed withall with the examples and experiences of times past, seemed at the first to carie such in the mindes of men: but the day following almost all such as had approued this counsell, ere of opinion contrarie, confidering it was not a thing certaine that the French armie would or come, and if it did come, the vauntgard onely would not fuffice to refift them. They faid also at that deliberation was not to be approued, which was established upon such a foundation that rested alwayes in the power of the enemie to innouate or chaunge it: for this cause the aduise of eter of Navarre was allowed by the Viceroy, to whom onely he communicated his opinion, that aking prouision for fine dayes, and leaning a gard onely in the Church of S. Michaell, all the arie should passe to the other side of the Citie, where both might be objected convenient impements, that the enemie should not enter: and also the towne, not fortified on that side (neuer aring to be there assailed) they should be able without doubt to carie it in fiue dayes. But asone as this resolution was dispersed amongst the armie and generall bands of souldiers, there as none which did not openly reproue the directió to go lodge with the armie in a place meerevoide of all traffike of victuals which were brought from Romagnia: which as it was the onely earle to fustaine and nourish the armie, so no doubt it could not stand vndissolued and broken, it ithin fiue dayes it enforced not Bologma. And what is he (faith Fabricio Colono) that ca assuredmake promise of such a thing within so short a time, seeing there is nothing lesse likely to come passe, the that which depends upon many daungers & difficulties. Matters of enterprise can not warranted by coniectures onely, feeing oftentimes they draw with them fo many accidents, at euen the wisdomes of the wiselt me are found unperfect to assure them: What reason is there at vnder a vaine hope, which of her proper nature is fallible and subject to chaunces, we should fer so glorious an armieto so manifest a danger? It is more honorable to auoid a perill by cousels d confiderations, then by too much rashnesse and presuming to offer our selues to an action, perein the confidence is farre lesse then the dispaire. Who seeth not, that our houres and time liited being runne out, we have no possibilitie to retire our selves and our people made hungrie, ordred, and fearefull, without our loffe and certaine ouerthrow, having Bolognia in our face, nere is a great masse of people and many souldiers, and at our backs the French armie, which will t oversee the oportunitie of our great presuming and securitie. Some others aduised, that beowing in the vauntgard a greater strength of sootemen, it should incampe on the other side of plognia almost at the foote of the mountaine, betweene the gate Saragossa and S. Felix, fortifythemselves with trenches and other defences: and from that side the towne should be batd, being there not onely the weakest in wals and rampiers, but also by planting some peeces of e artillerie aboue the mountaine, they should execute in flanke during the assault, such of the dendants as would come to the breach. This counfell also was rejected, as not sufficient to let the mming of the French: and no leffe dangerous, for that if they should be charged by the enemie, e armie, not with standing it commaunded the mountaines, could not descend to their succours lesse time then three houres. Amid these variations and ambiguities, being farre more easie to proue the counsels that were propounded by others, then to open other adulses that deserved be followed, at last the Captaines grew to a deuise to assaile the towne on that side wherein earmie was already incamped: a resolution which amongst other reasons tooke furtherance an opinion they had that Monsieur de Foix would not come at all, fince he lingted fo long: erefore they began to cast platformes to bring the artillerie to the wals, and called backe the untgard to incampe together with the others . But a little after they had many advertisements at the French bands increased daily at Finalo, which remining eftsoones their former suspition of eir coming, there might be discerned amongst the a new diversitie & disagreement of opinions: reuery one being of this minde, that if Monsieur de Foils approched, they should lay to set upon mafore he entred Bologma: many perswaded, that in that case, the artillerie planted alreadie beore the wals, which then should be retired, would give many impediments and difficulties to the unie: a matter in fuch termes of affaires both daungerous and hurtfull: Others reasoned, that it as no lesse to their infamie then to their hurt, to remaine so many dayes about the wals of Bolo-

gnia without doing any thing both confirming at one time the courage of those that were with in, and giuing leafure to fuch as were without to prepare to fuccour them: and therefore it were not best to deferre any longer to plant the artillerie, but in such place as it might be casily retired making, the better to oppose against the Frenchmen, the platformes so large, that both the attille ries and the armie might be able to moue together. The Legate was fully with them that gair counsell to begin to batter the towne, both for the displeasure he had of so long deferring, and al fo fornewhat suspecting least the matter had bene wrought by the direction and fancie of the kin of Aragon, according to the futtleties and diffembled maner of proceedings of the Spanish: h complained that if from the first incamping they had begun to batter the towne, they might hap ly afore that time haue bene maissers of it: That it belonged not to noble men of warre to joyn fault ynto fault, and much leffe to remaine as enemies about a towne, and yet expresse no valou to assaile it: That the Pope sent to him dayly curriers and postes, but he knew no more what to answere and alleage, holding it a dishonor to entertaine and norish him any longer with promise and vaine hopes: Lallly, that it touched much the reputatió of a Generall, to prepare to an enter prife which he durst not execute. These wordes moved not a litle the Viceroy, complaining muc against his importunitie and hast, that he being a man of no trayning in armes nor exercises warre, would so vehemently solicite a resolution so rash and daungerous. He sayd, that in thos counsels there was debated the interest of all the world, wherin yet they could not proceede wit fuch absolute maturitie as there were not further neede of deeper counsell and consideration; the there were no humane things more futtle and intricate then the enterprises of war, nor any work ly accident of more compassion then the losse of a battell that the counsels of war drew withth infinite confiderations and reasons, and yet kept alwayes suppressed and retained some secret which the wifedome of men could not finde out: that it was the custome of Popes and commo weales to enter willingly into warre, and afterwardes the expences and perplexities encreasing: boue expectation; to wish the end with vndiscrete debres; he willed him to gue ouer to it Captaines the deliberations of things, who having the same intention that he had, were somewh aboue him in the administration and experience of a warre. Lastly Feter de Nauarre, in who the Viceroy repoled most, alleaged that in an expedition of so great importance, men ought not respect so much the distance of two or three dayes; and therfore it was necessarie to continued counsell and direction for provisions necessarie, as well for the besieging of Bolognia, as for the ba tell, and for their better government afterwards, according to the proceedings of the French. Tw dayes passed afore could appeare any light of the better resolution, for that Monseur de Foix, who Centa, Piana, with many other boroughs of the countrey of Bolognia were rendred, renu ned fill at Fmalo, where he lay to reassemble his forces & bands of fouldiers, who as well for the they had bin distributed in many places, as also that his footbands which he had waged were los in comming, could not fo fuddenly come to the muster: So that, no further cause of deferring a pearing, at last the artilleries were planted against the wals, about thirtie fadomes neare the gate S. Stephen which leades to Florence; where the wall turning and crooking towards the gate call Chestellon, that hath his prospect vpointhe mountaine, maketh an angle. And at the same time I ter de Nauarre was about to make a mine, drawing more towardes the gate of the way of Ch fillen, on that side the wall where within is a little chappell called Barbacana, to the end that t assault being given at the same instant, they might with more difficultie make resistance being d uided then if they were vnited and joyned, to defend one onely place. Moreover following I their first thoughts to oppose against the Frenchmen, they gaue order that the vaunt gard shot returne to the lodging where it was before, The artilleries brought downe to the earth in xxii houres an hundred fadomes of wall: and the tower of the gate was battred with fuch furie, that b ing no more able to maintaine defence, it was abandoned, for that they might very convenient give the affault on that fide: but they expected till the mine were accomplished, not withflandin by the raffine fe of the fouldiers, the affault was almost executed the same day in disorder: for ce taine Spanish footme being climed up by a ladder to a hole which had bin made in the towre, do cended that way into a little house which on the inner side belonged to the wals, wherein was! gard: which being found by the other bands of footme, they had all runne thither by heapes, if the Captaines hearing of the noyle, had not repressed their wilfulnesse. But after the defendants, hauf seaused a Cannon suft with the house, had flaine one part of them, the others fled for safetie fro slace where undifereetly they entred to feeke for perill. And whileft they were buffe about the nine, others laboured in the armie to make bridges of wood, and to fill up the ditches with bafcersand earth, the better to beable (marching as it were in a plaine way) to bring the footemen o the wall which had bene well battred, and to draw even you the ruines some peeces of arillerie, to the end that in the execution of the affault, the defendants should not be able to continuetherefistance. But the Frenchmen, sceing into these preparations, and discerning withall that he people began already to give the felues over to feare, fent immediatly to pray fuccors of Mona ieur de Foix, who dispatched thither the same day a thousand footemen, and the day after sourcecore Launces: a matter which made the enemies beleeue afforedly that he was determined to paffe no further, it feeming a matter nor likely nor congruent that he would feparate from him elfe one part of his strength if he had another intention: but truly such was his meaning, for that olding that succour sufficient to defend Bolognia, he would not without necessicie assay the forune of the battell. At last the mine was accomplished, and the armie standing in order of battell o go forthwith to the affault, for the execution whereof with greater ffrength the vauntgard was euoked, Peter of Nanarre caused fire to be put to the mine, which with so great noyse and irie blew vp fo high the wall and chappell, that in that space and division was made open to those vithout the intrals of the Citie within, together with the maner of the fouldiers prepared to deand it: but falling eftfoones downe againe, the whole wall tooke the fame place from whence the iolence of the fire had driven it, and was foreiogned and knit againe, as if there had not bene ay teparation or remouing at all: fo that being impossible for the souldiers to go to the assault on iat fide, the Captaines iudged it no leffe hard to follow it on the other part . They of Bolognia terpreted this aduenture to a miracle, faying it was impossible without divine aide, that the wall rould fall and reioyne fo iuftly upon his old foundations: for which cause the Chappell was afrwards increased and frequented of the people in great denotion. This successe(as though there mained nothing else to be feared touching the affaires of Bologma) was the cause that Monsieur For thought good to go to Breffia, both for an espiall he had that the Venetian armie drew at way, & allo for feare least the inhabitants there fellingt into some want and necessitie, for that reason of the petils of Bolognia he had left there a very slender garrison, & no lesse doubted of cret practifes and intelligences. Neuertheleffe he chaunged opinion at the contemplation & reiests of the captaines that were within Balogma, who somtimes alleaged to him that if he wer his ay, the dangers of the war would redouble & become greater then before; & fomtimes they gaue mhope to ouerthrow the campe of the enemies if the would but joyne his presence to their vaar. In regard of which reasons, accopanied with a deepe confideration of the perill of the affaires efent, notwithstanding in the counfell almost all the Captaines were against him, he issued very e out of Finale; and the morning following, being but two houres of daylight, he drew towards olognia with all his army in battell aray, laboring with importunity of trauel against the snowes, e ife,& bitter weather:he entred by the gate of S.Felix,hauing with him xiij. húdred launces,vj. outand Launceknights, whom he had bestowed all in the vauntgard, & viij thousand sootemen well French as Italias. Being thus with great felicitie & valour entred into Bologma, he put into reftio to affaile the morning following the campe of the enemies, the fouldiers making their fals at three gates, & the people issuing our by the way of the mountaine: if this resolution had bin usunced, he had foud the not doubting of his coming; a matter which affuredly their Captaines d no knowledge of, neither that day nor the most part of the day following. The execution was ndred by Tues Allegre, who gave counsell that the bads made weary with the bitter wayes they d marched, should have one day to repose theselves, thinking withal (which also any wife man ghthaue judged) that it was not possible that so great an army, and in the broad day, and by the sh way, could without their knowledge enter into a Citic, before the which they lay incamped. ne fame ignorace had also kept the abused the day after, if by adueture a Greek stradiot had not a take, being iffued out of the skirmith amongft other horleme: & being demaunded of the flate the towne, & what they did within it: he answered that he was able little to informe them, for at he had but entred the day before with the Frech armie. V pon his words, confirmed both with ith & constacie, the Captaines entred into such amaze & maruell, that they determined to leavie circampe, holding the danger too great to remaine there, as well for the bitternesse of the season hich greatly afflicted the foldiers, as for the neighbourhood of the citie, wherinto fo great an armie was entred: They judged it no pollicieto contend at one time, and with one force, against 1 many aduersties: the intemperance & afflictions of the season were more intollerable to them the hand of the enemie, who yet could not but be fearefull, both for their numbers, their trayning and their resolute mindes: They made also conjectures of the monstrous reioyning of the wall at ter it was blowen vp, a consideration which not the least increased their seare, though in soul rediers valour ought to be more ready then superstition. The night following, which was they day since their incamping, they retired their artilleries with as little brute as they could, and may check with their armie in good time alog the high way towards *Tmola, drawing along the plain, and squares by the which they came, in the middest of which was the high way and the attillerie and bestowing in their rearegard the flower of their armie, they marched and wonne way with squares of the state of the squares of

Associate as the campe was leavied, Monsieur de Foix leaving three hundred Launces and sou thousand footmen within Bologma, departed in great diligence to march to the succours of d Castell of Breffia, the Citie being taken by the Venetians the day before he entred into Bologm for Andrew Greets induced by Count Lowis Augusto a gentleman of Breffia, the most part of the people of the countrey concurring also, and hoping much that within the towne they would dra to some mutinie, had passed by commaundement of the Senate with an armie of three hundr men at armes, xiij, hundred light horsemen, and three thousand footmen, the river of Adice at A bera, which is a place neare to Leguague, and afterwardes waded the foord of Myricia at the ti ning mill betweene Crosto & Valegee: and comming at last to Monte haro, he encamped by nie at Castagnet a village within five miles of Bressia, & from thence made sudden incursions with horsemen even to the gates. And at the same time the authoritie and affection to the name of Marke resounding in all places, Count Lowis came hard to the gates with eight hundred men the vallies of Entropien and Sabina whom he had drawne into commotion, and fent his fonne the other side of the Citie eue to the gates with other companies of sootmen ; but Andrew Gri neither receiving from within the Citie those intelligences which he expected, nor being made him any fuch fignes as were agreed, he held himselfe preuented by the pollicy and well garding the Citie: and therefore, refusing to abide perill where he saw no tokens of safetie, and at fame time the sonne of Auogato being taken prisoner by a fallie made out of the towne, he tired to Montagnano from whence he departed at first, leaving a sufficient gard vpon the bric which he had made upon Adice . But being called againe not many dayes after, the repassed 1 river of Adice with two cannons and foute falconets, and incamped at Castagnet, Count Los being at the same time approched within a myle of Bressia with a great strength of the saydy lie men: and albeit there were as yet small tokens or apparance of fauour from them within, 1 Gritts feeing his strength to be greater then it was, determined to venter to have it by force: valour made him resolute against all doubts of fortune, which is not the least vertue in a man warte disposed to do an enterprise: he brought all his paysants to the wals, & began to execute affault in three places, which albeit was ill followed at the gate of the tower, yet it did more ha fucceede at the gate of the piles where Auogato fought, and at the gate La Garzula where fouldiers led by Baltazar Scipio entred by the ito graces, by the which the river (bearing his na of the towne) entreth into the citie. In this furie of the affault, not with flanding the refullance of · Frenchmen, who both seeing the enemies enter the Citie, and the townssimen conspire in their uour, they retired into the callel, together with Monsieur du Lude their Gouernour, loofing !! horfes and baggage. In this tumult, that part of the towne which is called the Citadel, & fland I separated from the residue of the Citie, a part wherein almost all the Gebelius inhabited, was sp led and facked, except the houses of the Guelffes. After the conquest of Bressia, Bergama rend 1 immediatly except the two castels, whereof the one is in the middest of the Citie, and the ot t stands within halfe a myle. This rendring happened not so much by the exaple of Bressia, as by meane and working of certaine Citizens. Orcinecche, Orcinouo, and Pontuique, with many of I places there about did the like: and perhaps much more had bene done, or at the least the victic had bin better affured, if at Venice they had had a care necessarie & couenier both to send sould s and artilleties to get the castell, which no doubt would have made no great resistance, and also create Magistrates for the well guiding of places already recourred: their ioy was greater for

ne victorie they had gotten, then their prouision to preserve the things which their fortune had rought them: their glorie was farre about their pollicie which in men of warre is not the least rour, for that it makes them more apt to winne, then able to hold; and this negligence of the enetians was so much the more hurtfull, by how much more great was the celeritie & diligence M. de Foix, who having passed the river of Pam at Stellato (from whence he sent fifty launces r the gard of Ferrara and 500 French footmen) he passed also the river of Mineia at the mill ridge, having almost at the same time of his marching, sent to demaund passage of the Marquisse Mantua: his sodaine demaund of the Marquisse drew one of these two reasons, either to give in no respite to take aduise in a matter so present & pereptorie, or else that the Venetian bands rould be fo much the later aduertised of his comming: A man of warre hath no one property " ore commendable then his celerity and speed, for that by advancing oportunities, he takes >> om his adversarie all counsell, & by his quicknesse ouercommeth the hardnesse of things which herwayes his valour were not able to suppresse: The tide that is driven with a violence more >> en ordinarie, beguileth the Mariner that Handeth to expect, but maketh much for the ship that " keth the benefite of it: There is no fort of action wherein fortune more fauoureth men of en->> eptile, then when their celeritie is equall to their valour, for that it cuts off from the enemie all secons feourse of counsell and makes him blind in the defence of his proper harmes. From thence he ent the day after to Nogero vpon the territories of Verona, and the day following to Pontpefere to Trevilla three miles from Escalo: where, receiving advertisement that John Paule Baillon is come from Frankecastle with three hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsmen, d twelue hundred footmen to encape within the Ile of Escalo, he made haste thither, to charge n with three hundred launces and feuen hundred archers, the refidue of the armie comming er, which otherwise could not march with such diligence : but finding that he was remoued houre afore his coming, he put himselfe in order to follow him without tarying. loh.P. Baillon d received advertisement that Barnardin de Montono to whom was lest the gard of the bridge ide at Albero, had broken it vp, hearing of the comming of the French, for feare he should be losed by them; and the launce-knights which were within Verona, whither Casar had a litle fore sent 3000 footme which he had in Fryull, being at that time released of all gard at Fryul, that all was returned to the power of the Venetians, except Gradifqua, who more then the rest pressed her fidelity against the adversities of the warre. For this cause loh. P. Baillon had gotninto Bressia, if he had not bene told that a litle beneath Verona the river might be passed or by foord: but as he went to performe his passage, he discouered a farre off M.de Foix, whose redible celerity, for that it was farre more then the report and renowme that went of him, he ought they could be no other troupes then one part of the fouldiers that were within Verona; din that perswasion ranging his companies in battell aray, he taried their comming with great urage at the tower Magnanino, which is somewhat neare Adice, and of a veric litle distance mithe tower of Escalo. The encounter of both parties was verie furious with their launces, and M. de Foix ctwards falling to other weapons, the battel was hotly continued more then an houre: but the defeateth Iohi ndition of the Italians grew worfe and worfe, for that the other part was continually supplied Paule Buillon, th new reliefe of fouldiers from the armie which was left behind: and albeit not fo much by the our of their enemies as by their proper imbecility of numbers, they were often put to disorder, by their vertue and gouernement they reassembled as often; at last, being not able to make a rpetuall refiltance against the greater number, they were broken and put to flight, & were chaby the enemy (the night now beginning) even to the river, which lob. P. paffed in fafetie, his tune being better then many of his people, who were drowned by the fury of the chase. In this edley were flaine and taken about fourescore and ten men at armes of the Venetians: amongs nom fell into the calamity of prisoners Guido R angon and Baltazar Signorello de Perousa:the otmen were all dispersed and broken, and two Faulconets lost, which was all they had to leaue the enemy as monuments of that miserable aducture. In this calamity it seemed fortune respeed much the Frenchmen, for that few of them fell into the mercy of the enemie, and fewer into e miserie of imprisonment (their selicitie with their valour, making them free from those daunrs which reason & coniecture threw vpon them.) The day after they encountred Meleager de my with certaine light horsmen of the Venetians, whom they easily put to flight, Meleager Pp 2 remaining prisoner: & in this course of felicity, holding it not necessarie to lose one houre of tin the ninth day after they parted from Bolognia, M.de Foix with the vauntgard incamped with the suburbs of Bressia about two crosbow-shoots from the gate of Tourlonguo, and the resid of the armie more backward along the way that leades to Pefquiero. As soone as he was incar ped, not giving to himselfe as it were any leasure to breathe, he sent one part of his sootness charge vponthe Monasterie of S. Fridian, which is halfe way to the hill under the which he w incamped, and the hill kept by many payfants of the valley Tropia: this gard was foone broken most of them slaine by the footmen, who made their entrie into many places by climing beings noured with certaine showers of raine, by the which the artilleries that were in the Monalic could not execute. The day following M.de Foix lent a Trumpet to fummon the towne to re der with conditions of fafetie for their lines and goods, except the Venetians: and his Messens being proudly answered in the presence of Andrew Gritti, he tutned his army to the other side the towne to be more neare the castle, and was lodged in the suburbs of the gate called S. Iol. gate: the morning following, euen by the first reuealing of the day, he chose out of the mai armie more then four ehundred men at armes all armed in white, and fixe thousand footm part Gascons, & part launce-knights; and with them putting himselfe on foot he went up on the fide towards the gate of the piles, & entred without refistance within the first waste of the cast where causing his companies to rest & refresh themselves a little, he encouraged them with sh speeches to mount resolutely vp to that rich and wealthie citie, where the glorie and bootie we be greater without all comparison then the paine or peril, having to fight with souldiers of Vem who were manifestly inferiour to them in numbers, in vertue, and infortune: he contemned the numbers, for that being people vnexperienced in warre, he judged them more apt to flie ther fight: he bad them hope that the cowardife of some bringing disorder to the residue would the cause that the whole would fall into seare, negligence, & confusion: he put the in remebra to of their ancient victories wherein their vertue was no leffe meritorious then their fortune: het them that to men of action nothing more hindereth their glorie then to be flowe to take thel nefite of occasions, and the resolute man neuer findeth want of fortune where he expresses he want of valour: he defired them lastly, that as he had chosen the for the most valiant of the wh armie, so they would not bring shame to themselves and to his judgement, but that they wo confider what infamie and dishonour it would be to them, if they who made profession to et ter cities notwithstanding the resistance of souldiers, of artilleries, of walles, and of rampi fhould not now reioyce in their defires, having no other impediment then men onely, in whi es nothing was leffe familiar then dispositions to fight. Immediatly he put his footmen before men at armes, and began to march out of the callle, and at his going out he found certaine bas of footmen who with their artillerie affayed to stop him for passing further: but his valour !king the to retire, he descended furiously by the skirts of the pallace greene of the Captain B. letto, where the Venetian regiments well ranged and close together expected him with great . folution: they fell immediatly to hand-strokes, when the medley was terrible for a long time; one part fighting for their proper safetie, and the other part for glorie, iovned to a defire to sac! citie so full of riches: the Captaines, besides their office to command and dispose, most often to: the places of meane fouldiers, the vertue of M, de Foix being fingular about the refidue: at t the Venetian armie were driven from the place after they had made a wonderfull defence : it much as the Conquerours, who now deuided themselves into two bands, made their entrie, : one by the Citie, and the other by the Citadell, finding in euery quarter and corner a maruell s resistance by the souldiers & by the people, in whom it seemed their adversitie had nothing dinished their vertue: but the Frenchmen being alwayes followed with victorie, passed through II impediments and chased all their enemies that stood afore them: they gaue not their minds? pillage untill they faw themselues absolute maisters of the towne: such was the direction of their Captaine, whom they obeyed & observed so justly: that whatsoever he were that did oil wayes, he was forthwith flaine by his fellowes. In thefe encounters there died of the French in many footmen, and a great number of men at armes: but of the enemies were left on the gro d eight thousand dead carkasses, part of the people, and part of the Venetian souldiers, which ye fine hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horsemen; and eight thousand sootmen 1mongst whom was Contarin commaunder of the stradiots, who was slaine upon the gree vith a bullet of a harquebuse: all the residue were taken except two hundred stradiots who sled y a posterneneare the gate of S. Nazareth, albeit with no better fortune, for that falling vpon he Frencharmie which remained without the towne, they were almost all taken or killed : they Ifoimmediatlie after the execution entred the towne by the fame gate, and falling to pillage afvell as the refidue, they enioyed the trauels and dangers of others. Andrew Gritty and Anth. lu-Innan whom the Senate had fent into that Citie as governour, remained prisoners together with ohn P. Manfron and his sonne the knight de la Volpe, Baltazar Scipion, one of the sons of Anth. le Pio, Count Lowys Auogato, and one of his founes, and Dominicke Busechio Captaine of the radiots: these being Chieftaines of the army were referued as miserable examples of their owne alamitie: they were by the wretchednesse and fortune of prisoners disposed and caried about as est pleased the appetite of the Victors, sometimes brought to behold the dead bodies of their ompanions and friends; a spectacle lamentable, to be compelled to see those men dead, whom a life they so much honoured and loued : and sometimes appointed to stand in the presence of ie enemie, taking speciall glorie in that which to them could not be but an increase of discomrt. By frait commandement of Mounfieur de Foix, the honors of the women of religion were ept vndefiled, but their goodstogether with fuch others, as for protection were conucighed intheir couents, were made a praie to the Captaines. Count Lowys was executed in the market ace, M. de Foix being present, and seemed to hold it a facrifice best acceptable and pleasing to s eyes: his two fonnes albeit they were for a time deferred, suffered in the end the same paine; eauthoritie of the Victor raigning verie indicially ouer the lines of whomfocuer it pleafed him. this fort by the valour and fortune of the Frenchmen, of whom they of Breffia vaunted to be scended, fellinto this extremitie that citie, for nobilitie and dignitie nothing inferiour to anie her citic of Lombardie, but inriches and plentic farre aboue them all except Millan. And as the iseries that war draweth with it are infinite, so the whole city for vij. dayes together was expodto the couetousnesse, to the lust, & to the crueltie of souldiers; things sacred as well as prophane ing parcell of the praie: and no lesse the lives then the goods of men committed to the discrein of spoylers. This victory brought great reputation to the name of M. de Foix, Italy no lesse en the other regions of Christendom refounding much his glorie, that by his celeritie and vaur in the space of xv. dayes he had compelled the armies Ecclesiastike and Spanish to discampe im before Bolognia, ouerthrowne in the plaine field Joh.P. Baillon, with part of the Venetian renets, & recoquered Breffia with fo great a flaughter of fouldiers & other forts of peoples: it was firmed by the judgemet of wife men, that touching enterprise & matters of war, Italy had not t the like of long time, the aduerfity far exceeding the memotie and example of all times past. After the action of Treffia, together with the other places that were loft, of whom Bergamo awne into rebellion by the ayde of veriefew of the towne, had by common confent reuoked : Frenchmen before M.de Foix made his entry into Breffia: & after M.de Foix had fet downe orme to the affaires of Bressia, and had somewhat restellhed and reordered his armie made earie with fo great trauels, and no leffe difordered partly by keeping and partly by diffribuon of the spoile: he determined according to the kings commandement, to go seeke the are of the confederates; which, after his departure from before the walles of Bolognia, was stayvpon the lands of the Bolognois. To this direction the king was constrained by many vigent cidents, which droughim into necessitie to take new counsels, for the safety and benefit of his aires: for, he difcerned manifefly that he should have war with the king of England, not withinding that king had in franke tearmes afore affured him the contrary, & fince kept him in fufnce with tokens and words doubtfull: the actions which were quite contrary to his promifes suld be no more covered, for that there came advertisement from Rome, how he had at last apoued & ratified the league by writing: befides, the French king was not ignorant, that in Engnd were made great preparations of men and ships, and in Spaine was rigged a great natie to affe into England, where was an universall disposition in all sorts of the people of that region, to ake warre vpon the realme of Fraunce. To this humor of the king & people, was much helping learriual of a Galiasse from the Pope, laden with Greeke wines, with cheeses and other prouisins, which distributed in his name to the king, Barons, and Prelates of the realme, were received all with a woderfull gladnesse: the comon fort of people which oftentimes is no lesse caried by ine & small things, then by matters more grave & great, ran with generall admiration to behold

the Galiasse, accounting it so much more to their pleasure & glorie, by how much they had a uer feene in that Ile anic veffell bearing the Popes banners. At last, Bishop Morton, who had lor negociated betweene the Pope and the French king, induced either by his confcience, or by de fire to be Cardinall, was appointed in an affembly of all the stares of that Iland, where he shewe with equal fauor & full testimonic, what was the instice of the Popes cause. Vpo this both it w determined to fend the Prelates to the Councell of Latran in the name of the whole realm and also (the importunities of the Popes Embassadour concurring) the king commaunded a French kings Embassador to depart out of the realme: he published this reason of his comma dement, that it was not convenient to entertaine about the person of a king, and in a kingdome deuout to the Chutch, a má that represented a king so manifestly persecuting the Sca Apostolik Now began to be discourred the secret resolution wherein the king of England with his armiel fea should molest the shoares of Normandy and Britaine, and should send eight thousand for men into Spaine to make warre upon the Duchie of Guyen, together with the forces of theki of Aragon: a suspicion which not a litle afflicted the French king, both for that the memorie the warres pall had made the English name verie terrible to those peoples, and also he knew t daunger would grow fo much the greater, by how much the Spanish forces were joyned w them : he was fearefull also by the confideration of his owne weaknesse, having fent into Italy his companies of men at armes fauing two hundred launces, which if he should call backe end in part or in all, the Duchy of Millan, which he effected much, should remaine in manifely rill; and if for his resupplie he should increase the ancient band of eight hundred launces, could repose litle confidence, and hope for lesse assurance amid so great dangers in persons ne ly created & vnexperieced: he added to this the suspition of the alienation of Casar, which de more and more increased: for, not with standing Andrew Burgos whom he had sent with so gr expectation, and being returned, brought tidings that Cafar was disposed to abide in the cor deration : yet he made offers of verie hard conditions, entermedling many complaints: for, he quited of the king, to affure him to recourrall that appertained to him by the capitulations Cabray, alleaging that he could no more trust in simple promises, for that he hath alwayes kno both fro the beginning & fince, that it was a matter very gricuous to the king that he should o quer Padou: and that to confume and hold him in continuall trauels, he had willingly wasted t hundred thousand duckers energy eare, knowing that to him the spending of fifty thousand is much more: that he had refused the last yeare to deliver to him the person of Trinnlee, bein Captaine that had both the will & the experience to put a speedy end to the war he required: the kings fecond daughter being but two yeares old, might be promifed to his nephew, inde her for her dowry with Eurgonny, & that the daughter might presently be deliuered to his han: lastly, that there should be left referred to him the quarrels of Ferrara, of Bolognia, and the ctrougrfie of the Councell, forbidding the French armie to march towards Rome, and protel that he was not to endure that the king should any way increase his estate in Italy. These cottions of themselues grieuous & almost intollerable, were yet made more heavy by the experhe had, that not with Handing he should accord to him so many things, yet he could not be ass. that he wold not varie, either according to occasions or according to his custome: yea, the inicty of the conditions offered, ferued almost as a certaine argument, that being already alien: I from the French king, he fought the occasion to putit to effect under some colour, seeing the well in words as in works he disclosed many signes of an ill will : for, both the Proctors which had so many times promised to send to the Councell of Psfa, were not come with Burgos, & 2 the Prelates affembled at Aufpurge, had at last made answer by a publike decree, that the Coull of Pife was schismatike & detestable, but yet with this moderation, that they were ready to che femence, if they might be resolved in the contrarie by reasons more strong & availeable. And t notwithstading the king, at a time, whe he stood in most need to assemble his forces, was constned to maintaine at the request of Cafar two hundred launces, & three thousand footmen in * roza, and a gard of a thousand footmen in Leguagua. Moreouer, the feare of the Swiffers ve d not alitle the kings mind: for, albeit he had obtained to fend to their Parliaments the Bailifl of Amens, to whom he had given vericample commissions, and was now resolved by disc t counsell (if such may be called counsels discreet as are taken when the oportunitie of helpit is past) to spare no liberalitie nor offers of money to reduce them to his amitie: yet what with re atred of the commons (which in this respite was made greater) and with the importunate perwastions of the Cardinall of Syon, prenailing about the authority of those that from parliament parliament had hindred all resolutions that were to be made against himrit was discerned that ney inclined to fend fixe thousand footmen to the pay of the confederates, who made demand of nem, to oppole against the firme squadrons of the launceknights. Besides all this, the kingsound imfelfe depriued of all hopes of peace and agreement, notwithstanding during the rate of the warre, there had bene great labour and solicitation made by the Cardinall of Nants ad the Cardinall of Strigonia, a mighty Prelate of the Realme of Hungaria: for the Pope had hade this last and resolute answer, that if they would be better heard then before, they should so ring to passe that the diabolical Councell of Pisa might be reversed, and see restored to the hurch her Cities of Bologma and Ferrara! Wherein expressing no lesse violence in effects then ity in words: he had newly depoted from their dignities many of the French Prelates which were forted to the Councell, together with Phillip Dece, one of the most excellent lawyers of that me, both for that he had written and disputed in the justice of their cause, and did follow the ardinals to be at hand for direction, when matters required aduife and interpretation of law. In I these difficulties, dangers, and aduersities which environed the French king on all sides, he had ot one firme or certaine footing in any part of Italy: the estates of Ferrara and Bolognia served m(as in times past) more for vexations and charges, then for any other vie : and touching the lerentins, to whom he made a new instance to joyne with him in a warre against Romagnia, he ould not draw from them other then generall answers no, he rather held them suspected by reanof the Viceroys Embassador of Naples, ordinarily remaining at Florence, but much more for that ey had set the Embassador to the king Catholike, & did no more comunicate with him of their aires, as they were wont. But most of all, for that having labored to prolong the league which as finished within few moneths, without that they demanded either mony or other great oblitions, they teporized, to the end to be at liberty to take that part that seemed best for their safe-

, & conveniency of their affaires. The Pope also to augment this disposition, & for feare withleast his too great feuerity & rigour induced them to follow with their force the fortune of the ench king both gaue them absolution of paines & censures, the commou-weale not suing for and also lent as Nuncioto Florence with very case and gracious conditions, Joh. Go fladin a Bonois, one of the Clarkes of the chamber Apoltolike, labering to take from them the fulpitio that ey had had of them: fo that the king feeing himfelfe left alone against fo many enemies, either eady pronounced or very likely to be fo. And having but very hard meanes of refiltance, if fo any aduct fities should thunder upon him in one time, he addressed speedy commandement to tonfieur de Foix, to march with as great diligence as he could against the army of the confedees:against whom, as he promised to himselfe the victory, supposing the to be the weakest, so, bespollessed of the victory, he should proceed to assaile Rome & the Pope without any respect: the good iffue & fucceeding of which, he had opinion that he should stand acquited all his great ingers. And to the end that both the enuy of the enterptife might be diminished, and his justifitions the more increased, he gaue order that the enterptife thould be made in the name of the ouncell of Pifa, by whom should be assigned a Deputy Legate to go with the army, and under

e favd name to receive the townes that should be conquered.

Thus, Monsieur de Foix, departing from Bressia, came to Finalo, where he remayned certaine yes, partly to make promision of victuals that came out of Lombardy, and partly to reassemble d draw into one strength all his bands which the king had fent out of Italy, except such as by ceffity remained for the gard of townes, and partly for the great and fudden raynes that fell, hich gaue impediment to his matching: from thence he went to S. Georges, which is vpon the rritories of Bolognia, and thither came to him a new supplie of three thousand sootemen Gasns, a thousand adventurers, and a thousand Piccards, all men of choise, and such as the French- The army of en made great reputation and reckening of: his whole campe according to a just number con- Monsteur de syned five thousand launceknights, five thousand Gascons, and eight thousand Italians and Foix, rench, with a thousand fixe hundred launces, comprehending the band of two hundred Gentleion. The Duke of Ferrara was also to joyne to this army with a hundred men at armes, and a reat traine of good artilleries, Monsieur de Foix hauing left behind him all his great shot and unitions for the deepe & foule wayes to draw them. To this army was also to come, and was already on his way, the Cardinall S. Seuerin appointed Legat of Bolognia by the Councell hew a braue and valiant Cardinall, bearing more inclination to armes then to holy exercises and co templations of religion, and leffe given to the vocation of the Church or civill or private profes on, then to publike action and warlike initation. Afloone as Monsieur de Foix had fet down these directions for his affaires, he marched forward to seeke the enemies, his valour carying hi in a burning desire to fight with them, no lesse for the continuals commandements and incitatio of the king, then by a resolute working and property of his owne mind, naturally thirsting aft glory, and in him so much the more vehement and kindled, by how much his former successe victories caried him into a weening of further fortune and felicity: and yet he gaue not himse ouer so much to this humor of glory and defire, as that his intention was to set upon them rash but approching neare their campe, either to fee if he could willingly drawe them out to the batt in some place where the qualitie of the situation might give least impediment to his vertue, elfe to constraine them to fight in cutting off their victuals and their other succours. But farre ther was the intention of the enemies, in whose army (after the regiment of the Duke of Vri was gone under colour of some controuersie) were a thousand source hundred men at arme: thousand light horsemen, and seuen thousand Spanish sootemen, with three thousand Italia newly leanyed: they were of this opinion, that being both inferior in numbers, & the French hor men better disposed then theirs, it could not be for their surety to fight in a place of equality, att least afore the fix thousand Swiffers were come, which being newly graunted by the Canto there was practife at Venice, whither the Cardinall of Sion with twelve Embassadors of that is on were gone for that purpose, to leavy at the common charges of the Pope and the Venetsa. there was added to this, the will of the king of Aragon, who had given commandement both letters and messengers expresse, to abstaine from battell as much as could be: for he hoped si cially in the thing which the French king feared most, that if the battell were deferred vntill king of England and hebegan the war in Fraunce, the French king would be constrained to home either all or the greatest part of his companies, & by that meane he should put end to war of Italy & remaine possessed of the victory without bloud or danger: and for this reason had forbidden the Viceroy to befiege Bolognia, had it not bin for the great instance & compla that the Pope made. Thus the Viceroy of Naples to gether with the other Captaines, were att point to encampe alwayes neare to the French army, both to let that the townes of Romagna mained not to them in pray, & also to stop the way for going to Rome: and with all they were folued to keepe them alwayes in places of strength, where, either for their situation, or to be bas with some great towne, the Frenchmen should have no oportunity to charge them but tot great disaduantage; and therefore they were determined to make no account nor difficulty to tire as often as needeshould be, judging, as men well understanding the quality of war, that it were not bound to the apparances and brutes that ran, but principally had to looke to obta: the victory which was followed with glory, with reputation, & with praise of men, According which resolution, the same day that the army was lodged at the Castle Guelfe and at Medici, fuch as were incamped neare those places, retired to the wals of Tmola: the day following: Frenchme paffed within a mile & an halfe of Ymola, the enemies keeping good order in the pl where they were encamped; but refufing to affaile them at fo great a disaduantage, they parl further, the vauntgard lodging in the borough of Bubana four e miles from Ymola, and the ott part of the army at Mordana & Baguaro, townes formwhat more then a mile one from a nod: They chose their lodging places beneath the high way for the oportunity of victuals, which wa furety were brought by the river of Pam, Lugo, Bagua, Cauall and the townesthereabout, be ? abandoned of the Spaniards, & eftfoones returned to the denotion of the Duke of Ferrara wil Monsieur de Foix entred vpon the territories of Bolognia. The day after, the Spaniards leaving ficient garrison in the Castle of Ymola, and Ix, men at armes in the towne vnder lob. Sassatello, vt to Castle Boulonnois, & incamped vpon the high way, their campe stretching towards the Moitaines; and the same day, the Frenchme tooke by force the borough of Solarola, the terror whe of made Cotignola and Grauarola to render to them, where they remained the day followit: and the enemies encamping in a place called the field of flies. In these little remouings and nes neffe of places, the two armies marched alwayes in good order, their artillery going foremost, v h the face to the enemy, as though the battell were to begin at euery houre; and yet both the arns narched with very great respect, the one not to be constrained to come to blowes but in a place where the aduantage of the lituation should recompence the disaduantage of their number and orces: and the other to feeke to draw the enemies to a necessity to fight, but with this regard, hat at one time, both the weapons and place should not be contrary to them. In that place, Monseur de Foix received a new commandement from the king to hasten the battell, the same causes indreasons still increasing that had first induced him to advance to seeke the enemies: For, where he Venetians had obstinately refused to make peace with Cefar, but vpon condition that they night retaine Vincenfa, notwithstanding they were much weakened by the accident of Breffia, nd also much pressed first by requests and after by protestations and threatnings of the Pope nd king of Aragon. There was at last made betweene them a truce for eight moneths before he Pope, with couenant that either parts should retaine thethings they possessed, and to pay o Cafar fiftie thousand florins of the R hem: the same removing from the king all doubts that e would not be deuided from him; and at the fame time he had intelligence that he would have varre beyond the mounts: for, lerome Cabauillo the king of Aragons Embassador and resident i his Court, making instance to be heard in plaine counsell, told him he had received comnandement from the king his Mailter to depart, exhorting him in his name to forbeare to faour against the Church the tyrants of Bolognia, and, for so vinult a cause, to leave off to troulea peace of so great importance and profite to the whole common-weale of Christendome. n which exhortation he offered, that in case he seared to receive any domage for the restitution f Bolognia, he would affure him in all forts he would defire; adding in the ende for a refolution umouable, that he would not, nor could not faile to defend the Church according to the office

euery Christian Prince.

Therefore Monsieur de Foix, being now certaine that he should neuer accomplish his intenon in accoasting and following the enemy, for that, for the commodity they had of the townes Romagnia, he could not easily cut off their victuals nor force them to the battell without great faduantage: and his owne army also suffering no small necessity of victuals by the barrennesse places where he lay, he tooke counsell of his Captaines, and determined to go to encampe are Ranenna: he hoped by this meane, the enemies, not to diminish their reputation, would not ffer to be lost before their eyes a City of that importance: and withall he doubted not under is occasion to fight with the enemies in a place of indifferency: and to let the enemy (haply specting his deutle) to approch to R auenna, he encamped betweene Cotignola and Granarola juniles from them, where he stayed foure dayes expecting from Ferrara twelue Cannons and velue other leffer pecces of artillery. The enemies doubted fuch a refolution, and for that cause at to R.:uenna Mark. Anth. Colonno, who before he entred into the iorney, tooke the faith and omife of the Legat, the Viceroy Fabricio and Peter of Nauarre, with all the other Captaines of e army (otherwaies he would not vndertake the enterprise) that if the French came to encampe ore it, they should make to his succours with the whole army. There went with him in this pedition, threescore men at armes of his owne band, an hundred light horsemen under Peter Caftre, and fixe hundred Spanish footenen commanded by Captaine Parades and Salezart: uching the refidue of the army, they encamped neare the wals of Faenza, along the gate that eth to Ranenna, entertayning the time of their abiding there with a hote skirmith with the eney. About that time Monsieur de Foix sent an hundred launces and fifteene hundred footeen to take the borough of Russi garded by a garrison of the place it selfe, who; notwithstanng in the beginning (according to the manner of commons and popular men) shewed themues very relolute and affured, yet, their naturall feares vanquishing their frayleshe wes of urage, they entred the same day into a parley to render and yeeld: during which comonings the Frenchmen taking the oportunity of their negligence and disorder, entred the ace with no little furie and facked it, putting to the fword more then two hundred men, and duced all the residue to the calamity of prisoners: from Russi, Monsieur de Foix drew neare Rauenna, and the day after incamped nearethe wals betweene the two rivers in the middest The featens hereof the towne hath her fituation : the river of Ronquo which old histories call Vitis, and Rouema, eriuer of Montono, not a litle esteemed, for that next after Pam, it is the chiefest of those riis that have their head on the left hand of the Appenyn, and entrethinto the sea of his pror course, fall from the Appenyn hilles, and where they take their head, there they make the separation of Romagnia from Tuskane. These rivers make their course so, as they inclose the City of Furly; Montono that runneth on the left hand toucheth almost the wals, and Ronque falling on the right hand, paffeth within two miles of it, and afterwards are reftrained and drawn narrow neare Rauenna, with fo litle space, that the one on the one part and the other on the other. make their course fast by the wals: a litle below which wals, their waters meeting and embra cing together, they fall afterwards into the fea, being now three miles off, but in old time (as is fayd) did beate vpon the wals of the towne: Monfieur de Foix commanded the space or distance that is betweene the one and other of the rivers, the front of his campe bearing towards the gau Adriana, which is almost iouning to the brinke or shoare of Montono. The day after he was in camped, he made to plant the artillery, partly against the tower called Roncono, situated be tweene the port Adriana and the river of Ronguo, and partly on the other fide of Montono whi ther one part of the army was passed by a bridge which was call ouer the riuer: he hastned the battery as much as he could, to the end to come to the affault, both afore the enemies approche whom he knew to be marching, and also for his great necessitie and difficultie to recouer proui fion of victuals, seeing the Venetian bands which lay at Fiequeroles, with many vessels armed gaue impediment to fuch as were brought out of Lombardie. And having funke to the bot tome certaine barkes in the mouth of the channell which entreth into Pan twelue miles from R auenna, and passeth there within two miles, they also stopped the entry of those that can from Ferrara in vessels of that countrey: a provision which was no lesse dangerous then vi easie to be brought by waggon or cart. Besides this, the incommodities and dangers were t lesse for their forragers, who of necessity were to raunge scuen or eight miles from the campe impediments not finall to a campelying upon the execution of fome enterprise. In regard of the difficulties, concurring also the confideration of other extremities and dangers, Monsieur de Fo determined to give the affault the fame day, notwithstanding he knew it was no lesse hard the dangerous to make his entry: for, of the wall that was battered, there was brought downe to t earth but thirty fadoms, and yet they not altogether ruinous, for that three fadoms were yet le standing on high, so that there could be made no entry but by ladders . But to surmount the difficulties with valour and direction, and the better to encourage his people by a striuing as emulation amongst themselves, he deuided in three squadrons distinct and separate one from nother, the regiments offootemen of the Almains, Italians, and French: and after he had chol out of eucry company of the men at armes, ten of the most trayned and resolute, he charged, the being couered with the fame armes with the which they were wont to fight on horsebacke, th should march afore the footenen; he brought them all in good order of warre afore the wals recommending them to their feuerall fortune, he faw them gine a very furious assault, respecti fo much the leffe the perils that were aforethem, by how much more every one of them lat red to make good his election and judgement of their valour. The defendants made valle refiltance, to the special praise of Mark. Anth. Colonno, who, during that sharpe store omitted in himselfe no office, no part, no place, that concerned the releveand succour of people, doing double feruice, both by direction and by example. The Frenchmen were we derfully troubled with a cultierine that was planted upon a bastillion, by which, with other flictions fatre contrary to their looking, they faw themselves out of all hope to be able to so the towne, and therefore after they had fought three houres, they retired to their lodgings w the loss of three hundred sootemen and certaine men at armes: many were miserably hurt, Chlonfieur Chastillon and the Captaine of the artillery, who receiving their wounds from our the towne, dyed not many dayes after: Federik de Rossolo was also hurt but not to the dea, all men in such a calamity, not being subject to one kind of fortune. The day following, deuises to batter the walles, were turned to fight with the enemies in the field: They, affor as the French armie was removed, remembring their faith and promife to Mark. Anth . w entred within Furly which is between the same rivers, and having afterwards passed theri I of Ronguo a few miles lower, they came towards Ranenna: about which time the Citizen: f the towne, brought into terrour by the assault of the day before, fent out one to treate of coposition without the privity of Mark. Anthony: but as he was in the action, going and retning with aunswers, the army of the enemy was discouered, which marched along the risk and affoone as the Frenchmen discerned it, they drew immediatly into armes with a great no dranged their companies under their enfignes: they retired in great half their artilleries from foretheir wals, and turned them towardes their enemies: And in the meane while Monsieur For consulted with the other Captaines, whether it were good to passe the river at the me instant, to let them for entring into Ranenna: a matter which either they had not dermined to do, or at least it was impossible with order couenient, and with necessarie dilince: where it was easie to the armie of the confederates to enter the same day into R anenna the wood of Pinera, which is betweene the fea and the Citie: a deuife which had constraid the Frenchmen to retire with shame, and to go out of Romagnia, considering the want of Stuals . But they either not knowing the occasion, and fearing withall, that as they marched the confedeey should be enforced to fight in the plaine field: or else supposing that by the onely view and rate as the fueewing of their armie , Rauenna was sufficiently succoured , for that Monsieur de Foix durst cours of Rabe effloones send to the affault: they incamped, contrarie to all expectation, three myles with-Rauenna, in a place called Monlinacco, spending the refidue of that day and the night followin intrenching their campe with ditches, so large and deepe, as the shortnesse of the time would fer. In this respite of time, the French Captaines consulted together not without diversitie of inions: forme held it an enterprise too daungerous to give a new affault to them within Ranen-, having before them so little a breach in the wall, and behind them so great a campe and are of enemies: They judged it unprofitable to remaine there without hope to be able to do any ng, yea the scarcitic of victuals bringing apparant impossibilitie to all action: and that in reng, there would grow to the Spanyards a greater reputation then was wonne the day before aduauncing. Laftly, that as it was a matter very daungerous, and against all deliberations and unfels made before, to go charge them in their campe, which they had to thinke was well fored, fo, of all fortes of daungers that chiefly was to be eschued by which might happen greatest mes, and of all other harmes this is the greatest without all comparison, to be ouerthrowne. aid these discourses of difficulties and perils, it was in the end resoluted, that they would go vponthe enemie assoone as it were day, Monsieur de Foix allowing that resolution as most eeable to his glorie and their common safetie. All the night they wrought to set up the Ige vpon the river of Ronguo, niaking plaine the rifings of the bankes on all fides, to make the y more easie and passible. The next morning by the first appearing of the day, being the eleith of Aprill, a day very folcome for the memory of the holy refurrection, the Launceknights he footemen marched ouer the bridge, almost all the vauntgard and the battell passed the riby foord, and the rearegard guided by Tues d'Alegre, wherein were foure hundred Launces, rained upon the shore of the river on Ranenna side, to the end to succour the armie in neces-; and to make head if the fouldiers or people issued out of Ranenna: and to the gard of the lge which had bene afore built vpon the river of Montono, was appointed Captaine Paris a rish man with a strength of a thousand sootemen. Immediatly vpon this the Frenchmen preed themselues to the battellin this order: The vauntgard with the artillerie before, gouerned The order of the Duke of Ferrara with seuen hundred Launces and the Launceknights, was placed upon the Frenchmen banke or shoare of the river which was on their right hand, the sootmen being on the left had in the bassell he horsemen: on the side of the vaunt gard and in flanke, were bestowed the sootemen of the ell, which were eight thousand, part Gascons, and part Piccards: and after, in enlarging alwayes I bearing further from the banke of the river, was the last esquadron of Italian tootemen led Federike Boffolo, wherein was not about the number of five thousand bodies: for not with stan-Monsieur de Foix comming from before Bolognia, tooke with him fuch as were there in garn, yet many of them were shronke away, by reason the pay was small; and on the side or wing his squadron were all the archers and light horsemen, which exceeded the number of three usand: After the ordering of all these squadrons, who not stretching directly right forth, but ing and bowing, bare the forme of a halfe Moone, and ypon the banke of the river, were the : hundred launces of the battell commanded by Monfieur de la Palissa, together with the Carall S. Senerin Legate of the Councell, who being of statute huge and mightie, and of courage I minde nothing inferiour, and armed withall from top to toe with glittering armes, performed better the office of a Captaine then of a Cardinall or Legate. In this disposing of the army Moor de Foix referued to himselfe no charge or place particular, but having made a choise of thirty the most valiant Gentlemen of the whole armie, he stood free & at libertie to be the better able to fuccour and minister to all parts. The goodly estate and presence of his personage couered varmour shining and wrought, made him easie to be discerned from all others, joyning his userie or cassacke, in whose colours was represented the inclination of his minde. And bees there should be omitted in him nothing that either belonged to the testification of his proper lour, or was necessarie to stirre vp the mindes of his people, he mounted upon the rising the shore of the riner, and with a countenance of singular joy and comfort, dispersed into his and all his other outward senses and parts, he spake to his companies with an eloquence not the mattiall in this fort:

My good friends and fouldiers, this is the day wherein fortune offereth to leade vs to f with our enemies in open field: a matter so much the more welcome, by how much it! bene long defired with an vniuerfall expectation of vs all . The fame fortune, whose fauous haue caried alwayes upon our shoulders in so many victories, presenteth her selfe now to our cheekes in figue of her perpetuall affiftaunce: and holding her lap open, the puts " our hands an occasion to winne the most honourable and glorious victorie that euer was go "any armie in the memorie of man: for not onely Rauenna, not onely all the townes and line of Romagnia, are subject to your discretion, but also the wealth and plentie of riches con-" ned in those large limites, shall be the least part of the rewardes of your valour. Not one Pra " or Potentate remaining in Italie able to make head against your force and felicitie, what sha " you to runne up even to Rome, where the infinite treasures of that wicked Court drawne of ·· many ages out of the bowels and intrals of Christendome, shall be the honourable fruits of a "trauell: yea your valour and your fortune will put into your hands so many stately ornam; " fuch heapes of filuer, fo many wedges of gold, fuch mountaines of precious stones, are 66 many rich prisoners, that the whole world will enuie your condition. And from Rome, euen the fame facilitie, we shall march into the bowels of the kingdome of Naples, executing " uenge vpon the iniuries done to vs and ours heretofore. These be felicities which I see not ful ? " to any impediment, when I confider your vertue, your fortune, 'and the honourable views " you have gotten in few dayes. These expeditions bring with them no doubt nor seare, while behold your countenances, and do remember that there are very few amongst you, who is y er presence hath not given some notable testimonie of his valour. Our enemies be the same is " niards, whom our arrivall forced with shame to flye by night from before Bolognia, they be " fame mindes and bodies who not many dayes fince fought their fafetie from vs , no other fe "then by hiding themselues under the wals of Ymola and Faenza, and afterwardes couered in "dishonor in places mountenous and impassible. This is a race of people and nation, that in the ! "dome of Naples neuer fought against our armies in plaine field, or places discouered, but bro "with them alwayes the aduauntage of rampiers, of rivers, of diches, or the weather, repofing R "in their valour and vertue, then in their fleights and ambushes. And yet I can not terme in "that portion of Spaniards which have bene norished and made old in the warres of Naples w "rather a people new, raw, and vnexperienced, who never fought against other armes then be of " and arrowes and launces pointed after the maner of the Moores: who not with standing is "tion & people weake of body, without heart, without armour, and wholly without knowled of "the art of warre, yet the last yeare they ouerthrew this proud generation of Spaniards, to te great infamic in the Isle of Gerbes: from which place fled this Peter of Nauarre, a Captaine le " great name and reputation with them, feruing as a notable example to all the world touching "difference to make wals fall with the furie of powder, and futteltie of vaults fecret and v.e. " earth, and to fight in the field with a true resolution and magnanimitie of courage. They are w " inclosed with a trench which feare hath driven them to make this night in great hast: their se " men are shadowed and couered with the rising of the banke, and they put confidence in "armed wagons, as if the battell were to be performed by those childish instruments, and with the resolution of minde, and meere force of hands and armes. But with our artillene ve " can not but hunt them out of their vaultes and caues, and compell them to come into the ale and open plaines, where the world shall heare of the oddes and difference betweene the rich of the Frenchmen, the resolution of the Almaines, valour of the Italians, and the suttelties, ves " and ambushes of the Spanyards. The greatest matter that I finde to diminish our glorie, is these " qualitie of our number, being almost twife so many as they. And yet to yse this advantag be referred to our cowardife, but to their rashnesse, for that their valour and courage is not cause of their appearing, but the authoritie of Fubricio Colono, in respect of his promises vndif- ,, etly madeto Marke Anthonio, or rather it is a sentece of Gods iustice for the iust pumshment ,, he pride and impudent vices of that false Pope Iulius, and of so many treasons and deceits,, hat disloyall king of Aragon hath wrought against vs, abusing the goodnesse of our king. But ,, fing to large a lcope of perswasions to souldiers of your vertue, methinkes I do so much de-,, e and hinder our victorie and the glorie thereof, as I spend time in debating with you to om the rewardes of the journey are not vnknowen: March on a Gods name according to the ection fet downe, and fight with this hope, that this day will give vnto the king impetie and iu-,, liction, & to you the wealth and riches of all Italie. For my part I will be all this day at your ele-,, on, not further extending my authoritie then may needfully tend to the benefite of the fer-,, e, and make lesse reservation of my selse then belongs to the place which I occupie amongst, 1. The seruice of this day being all one, the perill shall be equal both to you and to me, and, promise to be indifferent with you in the action, so I doubt not but we shall all communicate,, mefortune and felicitie. It shall be a great happinesse to me, that being the Captaine of this ,, es battell, my fouldiers shall be made more glorious and more rich, then hath bene euer any ie or fouldiers these three hundred yeares.

With these wordes the armie fell to a generall showting and crying, euery one wishing that y were at the place where they might expresse their valour : they all called upon him to be vard to leade them, whom they were willing to follow euen to the last man. Then the mpets blew and the drummes stroke vp, warning euery fouldier to repaire to his ensigne: in ich order, with more ioy then feare, they beganto march towardes the enemies campe, diit from the place where they passed the river lesse then two myles: their lodgings stretched along the shoare of the river, which was on their left hand, where they had cast afore them ench to deepe as the shortnesse of the time would suffer, which winding and turning vpon right hand, enuironed all the place where they were incamped, fauing they had left at the ie of the trench an opening of twentie pales for the horsemen to issue out to the skirmish. In campe, assoone as they law the French begin to passe the river, they were ranged in battell nis fort: The vauntgard of eight hundred men at armes commaunded by Fabricio Colonno, The confede.

bestowed along the shoare of the river, and joyning to the right hand of the same a squa-rates armie. n of fixe thousand footemen: after the vauntgard occupying the place along the river, was battell of fixe hundred Launces, and on the wing a squadron of soure thousand sootemen, all erned by the Viceroy, who was accompanied by the Marquis of Palude: the Cardinall de edicie, who by nature had no cleare fight, and in behauiour very easie and tractable, marched ie battell in an liabite of peace, seeming as well in demonstrations as in effectes, very vnlike to Cardinall S. Senerin . After the battell, and likewife along the brinke of the riuer, followed rearegard of foure hundred men at armes, ledby Caruagiall a Spanish Captaine, with a squa-I for his wing of foure thousand footmen, & with the bands of light horsemen, of whom was taine Generall Fernandd' Aualo Marquis of Pefquiere, albeit but very young, yet of finr expectation: They were on the right hand at the backes of the footement of fuccour fuch as ald fuffer diffresse. The artilleries were bestowed about the men at armes: & for Peter of Nare who had made a choife of fiuehundred footmen, and would not for that day be bound to one place, had bestowed upon the trench afore the sootemen, thirtie waggons resembling example of the old times: euery waggon was full of finall shot, with a verie long boare re vpon them, the more easily to sustaine the assault of the Frenchmen. In this order they kept nselues close within the body of their trench, expecting the armie of the enemie to come and ge them: a resolution that as it proued in the end little to their profit: so, from the beginzit appeared very preiudiciall: for Fabricio Colonno had giue aduile to charge the enemie whe began to passe the river, iudging a greater advauntage to consist in this, to fight against part onely, then to stand to the defence of a slender trench which they had cast afore them. Aill this aduife was Peter of Nauarre, whose counsels were received of the Vueroy as Oracles, by him it was resolued to suffer them to passe: an opinion no lesse vndiscreet, then altogether of perill. The Frenchmen marched on, and were by this time come within two hundred es of the trench; and seeing their enemies shew no disposition to come out of their place, they flayed for not to give them the advauntage which they fought to have : and in that fort b the one and the other armie stood at gaze without stirring for the space of two houtes, onely that executed on both partes, endomaging not a little the French footenien, for that by rection of Peter of Nanarre, the artilleries were planted in a place that gaue great oporturi to diffresse them . But the Duke of Ferrara retiring behind the armie one part of the artille drew it in great hast to the point of the Frenchmen , in the very place where the archers had \mathbb{I}_0 bestowed. This point, for that the armie bare the forme of a halfe Moone, was almost vi the backes of the enemies, who were now furioufly battered in flanke, and to their great harrs but specially the horsemen. Those companies of the Spanish footemen which the Captains Nauarre had withdrawen into a low place on the fide of the rifing of the river, being ite perill to be hurt, for that according to his commaundement they threw themselves flat vpork · carth, Fabricio cryed aloude, and with great importunities by messengers, called on to iffue out to the battell, and not tarie till they were confumed with the shor of the artiller, But it was in vayne to raunge the Captaine of Nauarre, in whombare more dominion acsed ambition, then either reason or conduct: for imagining that by the valour of the Spal footemen (though all the refidue perished) he should carie the victorie, he esteemed his:rie would by so much be augmented, by how much should be increased the daunger of the mie. By this time the artillerie had made fuch mortalitie of the men at armes and light he men, that they were able to fullaine no longer. There might be feene with a miferable Chacle mingled with cryes lamentable, both men and horses fall dead to the ground, their q ters flye into the ayre, and their heades and armes separate from the residue of their bodies in execution fo bloudy in the eyes of Fabricio, that he cryed out, shall we all dye heate through e wretched obstinacie of one straunger, shall this gallant armie be offered to the butchers bee without any reuenge of the bloud that is spilt? Where is the glorie of our victories so oftentis obtained against the Frenchmen? Shall the honour of Spayne and Italie be lost for the please of a particular man of Nauarre? In which rage and furie of complaint, he caused his con. nies to iffue out on the other fide of the trench, without tarrying for licence or direction from e Vicercy: and being followed with all the hotsemen, Peter of Nauarre was compelled make figne to his footemen, who being rifen from the ground, charged with incredible furite footemen of the Launceknightes which were already come vpon them. By this meane all e fquadrons being joyned pelmell, there began a most desperate and hot battell, and out of dest one of the greatest, and best executed that had bene fought in Italie of long time : for the tell of Taro was almost no other thing then a gallant encounter of Launces, and the deed of armes in the kingdome of Naples, were rather actions of diforder and rashnesse, then battels ched and performed: and in Guiaradadda the lesser part onely of the Venetians was brought the fight: but here there was not a body which passed not through the middest of the bail the fight being in the plaine field without impediments of waters or rampiers, both the ar s fought with a wonderfull refolution and courage, they came to the fields with mindes ind rently determined to dye or line, being kindled not onely with glorie, with hope, and h daunger, but also with hatred of Nation against Nation. In the heate of the fight there has d this spectacle worthy of memorie: in the medley of the Launceknights with the Spaniards, o Captaines of great reputation marching afore their fquadrons, fought handto hand as it use by defiance, where the Launceknight being flaine, the Spaniard had no more glorie by hilctorie, then the other had honour by his death. The horsemen of the league which ordinarily te not equall to the French, & that day having fuffred much by the artillery, were become farrei riour, being not able to make further refistance, gaue their backes to the enemy, having log bie out the furie of the fight more with courage the with strength, And Yues a' Allegre also who 4 to Palissa had called, comming with the rearegard to charge them in the flanke; & with a thou id footmen that had bene left at Montona, were taken prisoners by the souldiers of the Duke of. rrara, together with Fabricio Colonno fighting valiantly. In this giving backe the example one Captaines did much, for that the Viceroy and Caruagiall, without making a last proofe of the 1tue of their men, began to flye, carying with them the third squadron almost whole & viibro it with them fled Antho.de Leua, a man at that time of very base codition, but rising by cotinua xercise of armes, to all the degrees of warre, he became at last a Captaine of singular reputationad me. All the light horsemen were likewise ouerthrowne, and their Captaine the Marquis of I fquiere taken prisoner, having his armour all covered with bloud, and his body full of wounds, preffing his valour to be greater then his fortune. There was taken also the Marquis of Pale, who in great diforder had led the second squadron to the batte!! through a field full of hes and bushes. And albeit by the wretched successe of that day, all the place was couered th bodies of dead men and carcasses of horses, yet the sootemen of the Spaniards abandoned of ir horsemen, continued to fight with an incredible valour and assurance : for, albeit in the beining of the fight and at the first encounter with the launceknights, they were somewhat ken by the firme and close order of the pikes, yet comming afterwards to the swords point, s many of the Spaniards couered with their targets running with their daggers and short weaas betweene the legges of the launceknights, they came with a wonderfull flaughter almost nto the middest of their squadron: and neare vnto them the Gascon footemen having occud the way betweene the river and the rifing, had charged the Italian footmen, and albeit y had much suffered by the artilleries, yet they had expulsed them to their great praise, if, ha guidon of horlemen Yues Allegre had not thrust in amongst them, with a greater out then fortune : for Monsieur Vinarais his sonne being slaine in the action even afore his s, hethought to take present revenge of his new forrow, or haply having lesse delight to after he fawe the privation of his sonne, he thrust in with his horse into the thickest preffe nemies, where he communicated in the miferable destinic of his sonne, fighting as appertained The death of valiant Captaine. The Italian footemen gaue backe, being no more able to relift fo great Yuesd Allegree ultitude : but one part of the Spanish footemen running to their fuccours, sustained them for ne: neither could the footemen of the launceknights make any further refiffance, being alfo pressed by the other part of the Spaniards: but the horsemen being a ready fled, Monsieur de a turned him to charge them with a great troupe of horsemen, by reason whereof the Spanirrather retiring then chased out of the battell, and winning the way which is betweene the rand the rifing without shewing any maner of disorder, they began to get further off, not gig faster backe then by foote pases, keeping the front of their squadron very close, by whose e they repulled the Frenchmen. It was at that time that Peter de Nauarre hauing leffe defire to then to faue himselfe, and in that mind would not go out of the battell, was taken prisoner, reing a reward of his oblinacy to the vniuerfall ruine of the army: The mind thir sting after glo-; infinite in opinion and weening, and to the man that is caried with ambition and defire of " our, nothing can flay or limite his aduentures. For Monsieur de Foix could not brooke that the nifb footemen should go their wayes as it were victorious and in so good order, neither could " hinke his victory was perfect, if they were not overthrowne aswell as the residue: therefore ecting more the glory he should ger, then the perils that commonly lyc lurking under undifeaduentures, he went furioufly to the charge with a fquadron of horsemen, and executed n those that were last, by whom being enuironed and cast from his horse, or as some suppose, torfe falling vponhim whiles he fought, he was flaine with a thrust of a pike given him in the ke. And if it be then time for a man to defire to die, when his fortune hath fet him in the ful! of elicity, he may by imputation be fayd to die happily, falling into his last time, when he fell into aft act of fo glorious a victory: he died very yong, but with a fingular reputation throughout world, having in leffe then three moneths, & being almost a Captaine before he was a fouldier, tined so many victories with incredible celerity & valour. Neare vnto him Monsieur Laub was left as dead, hauing vp5 him twenty wounds, but being afterwards caried to Ferrara, ife was faued by the diliget cure of Philitions. Monlieur de Foix being dead, the Spaniards wet y without receiving afterwards any trouble or impediment, the refidue of the army being difed & put to chase, the baggage sacked, the Ensignes of artilleries spoyled, and the Popes Legat n, who from the hands of the stradiots being come into the power of Federik Boffolo, was im presented to the Legat of the Councell: There fell also into the fortune of prisoners Fabri-Colonno, Peter Nauarre, the Marquis Palude, the Marquis Buonte, the Marquis Pesquiere, namay other Lords, Barons, & honorable Gentlemen, as well Spaniards as of the kingdom of The number of ples. In battels there is nothing more vincertaine then the computation and number of the dead; the dead, the dea common brute was, that of the one and the other army, there was left on the ground at the tenthousand bodies of men, one part being of the French part, and the two other halfes ypon the most valiant and brauest fort, of which number on the Ecclesiastike side was Rap. ell de Passi a Captaine of great name, & of such as were hurt the number was infinite. Touche the Frenchmen, the victory was not more glorious then full of domage and discomfort, by r. son of the death of Monsieur de Foix, Yues d' Allegre, and many of the Nobility of France as also of the Almains, for the losse of Captaine lacob with many other resolute leaders at commanders, to whose valour (but with a great price of their bloud) the victory in the gr. test part was attributed: and lastly for the death of many Gascons and Piccards being left the with Captaine Molard, which nations lost that day all their glory with the French: onely e harme that exceeded all those losses, was the death of Monsieur de Foix, with whom perilled wholly the very finew and strength of that army. Of such as were vanquished and saued the felues from the milery of the battell, the most part drew towards Cefena, and from thenteld further off: the Viceroy himselfe made sinal reposes till he came into the countrey of Ance, whither he brought with him a very flender troupe of horsemen. Many escaping the flroks the battell, found peril by flying where they fought for fafety, for that the wayes being ful of:

fants, they were flaine and flripped by them, their fortune taking them out of one danger will they could not but feare, and caried them into another which they had no reason to doubt a futile is the stroke of destiny, ordained from the beginning to fall your mortal men. And e Duke of Vrbin did not only flirre up the countriemen against such as fled, but also sent bancif fouldiers into the territorie of Pefera to aggravate their calamity: he was in this suspect for that many dayes afore he had fent Baltazar Chastillon to the French king, and entertad also certaine bands of men with Monsieur de Foix: reasons that made some men beleeue he d fecretly conspired against his Vncle: only such as fled by the dominions of the Florentines, fed without any harine, the compassion of that common-weale being greater then to add & fliction to the afflicted, fince one fort of calamities sufficeth to vexe the minde that carieth h it feare and dispaire. Assoone as the French army was returned to their tents, not more. ioycing in the honour of their victorie, then loaden with burdens of forrow and lamentatis, the people of R auenna fent to render themselues: but such is the nature of fortune, to say no part vntouched whom she hateth, as they were in debating of the couenants, or hy being already concluded, the Almaine footemen and Gallons taking the oportunitie of it negligence in garding their walles, entred the towne at the breach which Monfieur de * had made: and as men whose minds were not yet free from the bloud of the battell, y facked it in great cruelty, adding to the despite of the harmes they received in the be Il the univerfall and naturall hatred they bare to the Italians. In this cruell action nothing is leffe respected then moderation inkilling and spoyling, no age spared, no sexercserued, no a of people nor goods pardoned, all things were brought into the rewards of the victorie, anc >thing left free from the violence and furie of the fouldiers. The fourth day after Marke An Colonno forfooke the Citadell, into the which he was retired, yeelding it vpon promife of lift id goods faued, giving also his faith, as also for his other Captaines not to beate armes, ne et against the French king, nor against the Councell of Pifa, vntill Magdalen day next. By th 1ample, and vuder the same conditions, the Bishop Vitelli with an hundred and fiftie foote in, conferted to give vp the Rocke which was committed to his keeping: the Cities of Truet of Furly, of Cosena, and Rimini, together with all the peeces of Romagnia, except the Rock of Furly and I mola, followed alfo the fortune of the victorie, and were all received by the Legi in the name of the Councel of Pifa: but the French army, both for the death of Monfierr de Foia nd fo great harmes received at the battell, remained four emiles from R anema, without doin; my thing, the terrour of their losses being greater in them, then that they were yet apt to be countell what to do. The Legate and Monfieur Palifa to whom was divolued the government of the army (for Alfonso d'Este was now returned to Ferrara) being vincertaine what wou be the kings will, temporized and tarried for his further direction: neither was their authority ich with the fouldiers, as to commaund the army to march, being fo troubled in fending tolaces offuretie the things they had facked, and also so weakned in force and courage for so loudy a victorie, that they feenied to carie the countenances rather of men vanquished, ien of conquerours. This amaze and confusion made all the souldiers with plaintes and tear call von the name of Monfieur de Foix, whose presence only had sufficed to remoue all impediments the might have let them to have followed him: and it was not to be doubted, that being pushed dwith the fury of his valour, and the promises that the king had made to him, that to his vise kingdome of Naples should be conquered, but he had with his accustomed selicity and difference thretched out his victory even to the bosome of Rome, and that the Pope and all his dependents had bene put to chase, having no other hope to save themselves.

The thirteenth day of Aprill the newes of the battell came to Rome by the relation of Ollavian The Cardinals Legofo, who went thither in post from Fossianbrun: They were heard not without a great feare comfell the drumult of the whole Court, which made the Cardinals runne in hast to the Pope, and with Pope to bathen them the profit of the peace, which they diffrusted not to obtain of to peace.

French king under honest conditions, he would at last dispose himselfe to deliuer the sea Apolike and his person from so many perils: They told him he had taken trouble and trauell erugh for the advancement of the Church, and the liberty of Italy, his intention only giving him ficient glory: They alleaged, that in so holy an enterprise, the will of God striving against him, ich he might know by many fignes and tokens, to obiect himfelfe against Gods ordinance, reno other thing then to tempt God, and turne the whole Church into her latest ruine: That o God more then to him appertained the care of his spouse: so it belonged to him being a n to refetre himselfe to his will, and embracing peace according to the voyce of the Gospell, etire his old age and the state of the Church from so many perplexities and tranels, giving his ole Court time to take breath from the long appetions of fo raging a time: That it was to be eened that the fortune of the victors would rayle them up to a higher ambition, even to come he wals of Rome: That felicity being to be feared, wherein is offered glory loyned with proand riches, it was to be doubted leafthis Nephew would joyne with them, Robert Vrfin, npey Colonno, Anthonie Sauello, Peter Margano, and Rance Mancin, bearing the fame ination: And as it was knowne that all these had received money of the French king, and were pared cuen afore the battell to diffresse Rome: so to meete with these pretences afore they If out into action, and to avoide the falling of the storme that was already gathered into a 1d, there was no other helpe then the remedy of peace. On the other fide, the Embassadors he king of Aragon and the Senate of Venice, folicited vehemently to the contrary: They perded him that the state of things was not reduced to so great affliction, that the despaire was thenthe hope and comfort, nor the atmy so extremely dispersed, that without great charge in litle time it might not be redreffed: They alleaged that the Viceroy was in fafety with the atest part of the horsemen, and that the Spanish footemen not broken were retired from the cell in good order, who if they were referned (as was very likely)all the other Toffes were of importance: It was not to be feared that the Frenchmen could march so speedily to Rome, but there would be respite inough to prouide against them, both for that it could not be, but the death of their Captaine would be followed with many diforders and infolencies, and also tthey would be holden in suspence for feare of the Smiffers, who now were no more to be bted to professe openly for the league and discend into Lombardie. Lastly, that there no hope to obtaine peace of the French king but vnder conditions vnequall and full of inie, being also driven to receive lawes of the pride of Bernardin Carvagiall, and of the plencic of Federike S. Seuerm. In these respects they held it better to take anie other course 1 to stoupe under the wings of peace, specially in such intollerable and unfaithfull seride, and with so great indignitie and infamie: the rather (fayd they) for that these troupes Heagues of Schilmatikes would neuer cease to persecute his authority and his life: They dit yet a lesse euill (if extremity would it so) to abandon Rome, and to withdraw himselfe lallhis Court either to the kingdome of Naples or to Venice, where he might remaine with same furcty, the same honour, and the same greatnesse, that he had there: for that with loffe of Rome, the Pontificacie was not loft, being alwayes tyed to the person of the pe in what place focuer he were. Laftly, they encouraged him to keepe ftill his accustomed aftancy and magnanimity, and that God, who is the fearcher of the hearts of men, would her fayle to ayde him in so holy a purpose, and much lesse would abandon the little ship Saint Peter, which though it hath bene wont to be tormented with the stormes and waves the Sea, yet it is ordayned neuer to be drowned: And finally, it would stand with the zeale, with the honour, with the piety, and with the pollicy of Chtistian Princes, to beiealce ouer the mightinesse of the French king, and bearing any affection to religion, they would comunicate with him in this quarrell, and ioyne to his defence both with their forces and their p. perpersons. These reasons were heard of the Pope with so great doubt and ambiguity of mil, that being not able to conceale his passion, it was discerned how on the one side did woe in him hate, disdaine, and his innincible obstinacy to bend or submit: and on the others; the confiderations of feare, suspition, and daunger. The aunswers he made to the Embadors comprehended that it was not fo grieuous to him to abandon Reme, as that he could t refort to any place where he should not be in the power of another: He told the Cardinals, to he would have peace, consenting that the Florentmes might be solicited to interpose to that d with the French king: and yet his aunswere bare not that refolution, nor was so cleate fin doubts, as might affure them what was his intention: He caused to come from Cinitavec, Buscia a Genomay and Captaine of his Gallies, which was a manifest conjecture that he wed go from Rome: but afterwards he difinified him to returne to his charge, leaving doubtfull that a pectation: He spake to leavie those Barons of Rome which were not of the conspiracy with the thers: He heard willingly the comforts of the two Embassadors, but so, as oftentimes he answed them with words full of reprochand difdaine:He diffembled alwayes in incertainties, which the most part deceived the wisedomes of such as gave him counsell.

About this time came Iulio de Medicis knight of the Roades and afterwards Pope, him e Cardinall Medicis under the leave of the Cardinall S. Senerin, feut from the army under colors recommend himselfe to him in so great a calamity, but indeed to relate vinto him in what cens and flate things flood. The Pope understanding by him at large how much the Frenchmen te weakned, of how many Captaines they were deprined and made naked, and how many val t bodies of fouldiers they had loft, how many lay hurt, and for many daves would be vnprofita; what spoyle of hotses they had suffered, and how one part of the armie was dispersed abree by reason of the sacke of R anenna, the Captaines vncertaine of the kings will, and not at g l agreement amongst themselves, because Monsieur Palisa refused to endure the infolency o Cardinall S. Senerin viurping the office of a Legate and a Captaine: that there were fecret mures of a descending of Swiffers, & no apparant token seene that the army could march to so : This discourse recomforted much the Pope, who causing the reporter to be brought into the fistory, he willed him estsoones to relate them in the presence of the Cardinals, in the same se e of discourse which he had vied to him apart. To these was added the doing of the Duke of V_{η_i} who (what focus moued him) changed counfell, and fent to offer the Pope two hundred mit armes and foure thousand footemen. Notwithstanding these reports and all the comforts y brought with them, the Cardinals continued to adulfe him to peace: a matter which albe a words and outward actions feemed not vnplaufible to him, yet in mind he was not refolie o accept it but for a last remedy : yea albeit for the present there appeared no present cure or see for the fore, yethe would rather chuse to go from Rome, so faire forth as he were not out all hope that his cause might be supported by the armies of Princes, and principally that the Switz would flir, who shewing great inclination to his defires, had many dayes before forbidden to French kings Embaffadors, to be in the place wherein were affembled the deputies of all the ()tons to determine upon the Popes demaunds.

In this estate of assaires, there appeared some hope of peace, for that before the battell of Rasma, the French king what with the consideration of the dangers that hung ypon him on all stand what with the despite of the inconstancy of Casar, and the hard conditions he propone specks that much induced him to yeeld rather to the Popes will in many things, had secretly not Fabricia Cauetto brother to the Cardinals Finalo, to the Cardinals of Nants and Strigonia, to had not yet altogether abandoned the negociations of peace: his charge was to require the to proposed to the Pope that he was cotent to reder yp Bolognia to him: That Assaira Assaira with the give yp to him Lango with the other townes that he held in Romagnia: That he should be bout to pay him his anciet tributes, &t to make no more falt ypo his grossids: And that he woold agreet we extinctio of the Councell: he demanded no other thing of the Pope, the to have peace with in, &t that Assaira Besselle in gift be absoluted of the paines, and restored to his auncient rights & the ledges: That to the family of Bentinoless, who should remaine in exile, their proper goods shale referred, & the dignities reflored to the Cardinals & Prelates which had followed the Counli. Which conditions albeit the two Cardinals feared that the king would no more confert value reason of the victory that had fuceceded fince, yet they durft not propound them in other aner. And the Pope feeing the fo honorable for him, & not yet willing to manifelt that which had feeretly determined in himself, judged not that the king could result them, but peraduented with the sentence of the sente

Vntill this time the affaires of the Pope went but in an cuill courfe:vntill this day was aduand the full of his calamities and his daungers; but after this day (worldly affaires haue their ordinie mutations) his hopes began to appeare greater, and the wheele of his fortune ceased not

th an incredible swiftnesse to turne to his greatnesse.

The thing that gaue beginning to so great a mutation, was the sodaine departing of M.P.a. yout of Romagnia: he was revoked by the Generall of Normandy for feare of the descending he Swiffers, and for that cause he drew his armie towards the Duchie of Millan, leaving in Rogm. vnder the Legate of the Councell three hundred launces, three hundred light horsemen, I fixe thousand sootnen with eight peeces of great artilleries. The seare of the comming of the offers was made greater, for that the fame Generall thinking to do a feruice more agreeable to king, had undifcreetly dismissed the Italian footmen, and part of the French footmen immetly after the battell of Rauehna, contrarie to all reason, pollicie, and that which the present afes required. By the departure of M. Palissa, the Pope was deliucred of the seare that troubled a most, he was more confirmed in his obstinacie, and it helped him greatly to assure the afes of Rome: for the better oportunity whereof he had leauied certaine Romaine Barons with ee hundred men at armes, and debated to make Captaine Generall Profer Colonno, the rather that the coutages of fuch as defired new things being abated, Pompey Colonno that de preparation at Montfortia, consented by the working of Profer to depose Montfortin inthe hands of Marke Anth. Colonno for the Popes furetie, retaining basely in his hands the mo-, he had received of the French king. By this exaple also Robert Vrsin, who was come afore fro villano vpon the lands of the Colonnois to leauie armes, keeping likewife in his hands the mothe had received of the French king, was brought in afterwards by the meane of Iulio Vr fin, ciuing of the Pope in recompence of his disloyaltie, the Archbishoprike of Regge in Caria: only Peter de Margana was ashained to keepe the money he had received, doing the ne haply with a counfell no leffe honorable then happie, for that otherwife he had justly paved merite and paine of his deceit, being not long time after taken prisoner by the successour of king raigning.

But now the Popes mind being greatly confirmed by reason of these things, and having no nee to seare either enemies fortaine or domesticall, the third day of May in great solemnite, he ue beginning to the Councell in the Church of Saunt lohn Latran, being now affired that tonelie the most regions of Italie would come thither, but also the realmes of Spanne, of gland, and of Hungarie. In this sirst action he was in person in habite Pontissicall, accompated with the Colledge of Cardinals and great multitudes of Bishops, where the Masse of the ly Ghost (besides manie other prayets) being celebrated according to ancient custome, and e Fathers exhorted with a publike oration to incline with all their hearts to the publike benefit ddignitie of Christian religion: it was declared (the better to lay soundations for other matas) that afterwards should be ordained, that the Councell assembled was a true, a lawfull, and ly Councell & that in the same remained vindoubtedly all the authoritie and power of the vnirall Church: Ceremonies assured that the thoughts and intentions of the authours had bene that were their words. In this fort didthe Pope gouerne himselse after the battell of Ranenna.

But the French king, not with standing that after the death of M. de Foix, which somewh troubled the joy of the victorie, as one whom he loued dearely, had commanded M. de Palil and the Legate to leade the armie vp to Rome affoone as they could: yet he feemed to abate that inclination, and began to returne with all his deuiles to the defire of peace, fearing that at or time and from many places great stormes would thunder vpon him and trouble his affaires: fo notwithstanding Cafar diminished nothing of his promises, that he would remaine firme wi him, affuring that the truce made with the Venetians in his name, was concluded without his a fent, neither would he ratifie it: yet besides the seare of the inconstancie of Casar, & doubt wh ther his promises were dissembled, it seemed to the king that for the conditions which he dema ded, he should have a companion in time of warre chargefull to him, and to the proceeding the peace verie prejudiciall and hurtfull, fearing that by his interpoling, he should be constrain to consent to more vinworthy coditions. Befides all these, he had no more doubt that the Swife would joyne with them of the league: and he was fure he should have warre with the king England, who had already fent a Heraldto fignifie to him that he pretended to be ended all co federations & covenants betweene them, for that in them all was comprehended this exception that he should make no warre neither against the Church, nor against the king Catholike his ther in law. Therefore the king understanding with a great pleasure that the Florentins were! licited to worke the peace, he dispatched speedily to Florence the president of Grenoble with ve large commission, to the end matters might be debated more at hand, and if need were he mig goe up to Rome: and knowing afterwards by the subscription of the articles that the Popes clination was more ready then he seemed he gaue himselfe ouer for his part wholly to the pea and yet fearing least for the retiring of his army the Pope would eftsoones returne to his oblin cie, he sent to M. Palissa lying then at Parma, to march againe immediatly into Romagnia w part of his regiments, spreading a brute that it was to passe further. It seemed to him a matter gi uous to deliuer vp Bolognia, not so much for the instance that Casar made to the contrary, as the feare he had, that not with standing the peace, the Pope wold continue his euill mind towa him: and therefore it could not but be an action prejudiciall to him to depriue himselfe of towne of Bolognia, which was as the fort and bulwarke of the Duchy of Millan: and befides, Cardinall Finalo and the Bishop of Tiuoly being come without expresse authoritie to conclu he interpreted that to an apparant figne that he had diffemblingly given his confent, partly the straits and daungers wherewith he stood enuironed: neuerthelesse at last he determined accept the faid articles vnder certaine limitations, and yet not fuch as by them the fubftance things should be troubled or altered. With which answer the Secretarie of the Bishop of Tu went to Rome, demaunding in the kings name, that the Pope would fend authoritie to the C dinall and the Bishop to conclude, or else, that he would call afore him the President of Grene who was at Florence, to whom was recommended sufficient power to do the like: but the ho of the Pope augmented dayly, and by confequent, if he euer had had any inclination to the per, it was now diminished, he being a man more disposed to observe and follow times, then to spect and imitate the qualitie of his calling.

About thistime arrived the commission of the king of Englass, by the which being dispated since the moneth of November, he gave power to the Cardinal of Yorke to enter into the least the reason why he was so long in comming, was the long course he had by sea, having bone at in Spaine. Case also specified and so that action for the hopes which the kings Catholike & of Eland gave to him of the Duchies of Millan and of Burgundy. In like fort the matter that mush pedito confirme the Pope, were the verie great hopes which the king of Aragon put him who, having the first knowledge of the overthrow by letters from the French king written to Queene, expressing that Guaston de Folk her brother was dead with great glorie, carying wishim the reputation of a samous victorie obtained you his enemies: and afterwards more pacularly by advertisements of his owne people comming somewhat later for the impediment the sea. And for that withall, it seemed to him that greater perill would grow to the kingdom of Naples, he had determined to send into Italy the Great Captaine with a strength of new mearemedy which he was driven to vse, having almost no choise of others: for not withstanding outward shew he seemed to respect much the Great Captaine for his behaviour in the kingdom of whether he was driven to vse, having almost no choise of others:

of Naples, yet he both suspected his greatnesse, and durst not trust him with authoritie. The Pope hen being confirmed by these occasions, at such time as the Secretarie of the Bishop of Tinoli arrined with the articles that had bene debated, putting him also in hope that the limitations adled by the king to moderate the infamie that might grow to him by abandoning the protetion of Bolognia, should be referred to his will: he determined altogether not to accept them: out making semblance of the contrarie in regard of the subscription and faith he had given to the Colledge of Cardinals: a maner which sometimes he ysed contrarie to the opinion that went of him to be alwayes vpright and iust: he caused the articles to be read in the Consistorie, and sked aduife of the Cardinals. Wherupon the Cardinall Arborenso a Spaniard, and the Cardinall frorke an Englishman, according to a secret pact afore, the one speaking for the king of Araon, & the other in the name of the king of England, perswaded him to perseuer in his constanie, & not to leaue abandoned the cause of the Church, which he had embraced with so great hoor: They alleaged, that all the necessities that had induced him to hearken to these offers, were emoued and ceased,, and that now it was manifestly seene that God would not suffer his ship to erith, though for fome purpose vinknown to the wit of man he had suffered it to lie ope & subetto fundrie stormes: They told him, it was not reasonable that he madepeace onelie for himlfe, and much leffe to debate it without the participation of the other confederates, the action eing common and denided from all particularitie: Lastly they exhorted him to consider well that prejudice it might bring to the Sea Apostolike and to him, to separate himselfe from true nd faithfull friends, to imbrace the amity of enemies reconciled. By the operation of these coun-Is the Pope openly refused the peace: and within a verie short time after, proceeding in his anent furie, he pronounced in the Confiftorie an admonition against the French king, charging mto release the Cardinall of Medicis vpon the penalties ordained in the holy Canons: but he rbareto publish it, for that the Colledge of Cardinals befeeching him to deferre asmuch as he ould rigorous remedies, offered to worke by letters writte in the name of them all, by the which bey would both comfort him & befeech him as a right Christian Prince to set him at liberty.

The Cardinall de Medicis was caried to Millan, where he was kept under reasonable and easie ard: and albeithis fortune had brought him subject to the power and disposing of others, yet ch was his vertue and spirit, that the authoritie of the Sea Apostolike shined in him, together ith a woderfull reuerence of religion. And about this time began to appeare a great contemning fthe Councell of Pifa, the cause whereof was not only abandoned of others with deuotion, ith diligence, and with faith, but also euen of such as afore had followed it with armes, and fauodit with affection, with study, and with resolution: for, the Pope having sent to the Cardinall of tedicis full power both to absolue from all paines & cursings the souldiers that would promise beare no more armes against the Church, and also to give libertie of holy burials for all the boes that were flaine at the battell, (a fauour demanded with great importunities) the concourse people was wonderfull, and no leffe maruellous the denotion of them that came to demaind id promise such matters: yea the Ministers and officers of the king were not against it : onely it as not without manifest indignation of the Cardinals, who saw even before their eyes, and in the ace where was the feate of the Councell, the fouldiers and fubiects of the king, contrary to his onour, against his profit, ypon the lands of his iurisdiction, and without respecting any thing the thoritie of the Councell, run after & follow the Romaine Church, acknowledging with great uerence as Legate Apostolike the Cardinall Oledicis being prisoner: Great is the force of a,, tople and multitude beginning to vary and chaunge; and so much more prejudiciall and pelous their revolt, by how much your their numbers and forces depend principally the estate, id expectation of affaires.

Now because the truce was ratisfied by Casar, notwithstanding his agents that were within srona maintained that it was nothing, the French king called home one part of the bands that he id in garrison in that citie, as seruing to small purpose; and having revoked also the band of two indred Gentlemen, the archers of his gard, and two hundred other languages, fearing the threat she his go f England, he knew by the suspicion he had of the Swifers, which was redoubled in im, that he should need greater forces in the Duchie of Mullan: for which cause he had pressed in Florentimes to send him into Lombardy three hundred men at arms, as they were bound by a covenants of consederation between them for the desence of his estates in Italy: and for that, that confederation drew to end within two moneths, he compelled them (the memory and reputation of the victorie being yet fresh) to confederate with him of new for fine yeares: wherein he bound himselfe to defend their estates with 600 launces, & the Florentines for their part promifed to furnish him with 400 men at armes for the defence of all that he possessed in Italy and yet, to aloy dall occasions to enter warre with the Pope, they excepted in the general obliga tion of defence, the towne of Cotignole, as if the Church might pretend right to it.

But now were apparantly disclosed right great daungers to the affaires of the king, for that th Swiffers at last were determined to fend fixe thousand tootinen to the pay of the Pope, who ha demanded them under colour to employ them against Ferrara: those that in this action suffai the Irenchme, ned and fauoured the kings fide, could obtain no other thing but to protract and deferre the de liberation till that time: and against those men the communalties of people made vuinersa exclamation in their parliaments, for the wonderfull hatred they bare to the name of the Frence king: They affirmed that the king refled not contented with this kind of ingratitude to refu to increase a little the pensions of those by whose bloud and valour he had won perpetuall rept tation accompanied with a great estate, but also with words full of reproch he had despised at rejected them as villaines, as though all men in the beginning were not conceived under one cle ment, were not cast in one mould & had not one maner of creation upon the earth, & as though any mortall man were now either great, renow med or noble, whe fe ancestors in the beginning were not pocre, vinknowne and bafely descended: That he had begun to wage seetinen of the Launce-ki ights to shew the cotempt he had of their nation for the service of his warres, persw ding himfelfe that it flering privation of his pay, they could not but die in their mountaines idlenesse and famine: therefore they had reason to expresse to all the world, how much he w deceiued in his vaire thoughts and perswasions: That his ingratitude was onely hurtfull to his felfe: That nothing could flay men of warre from shewing their valour: That for such was fitt vie of gold and filuer, in whom was most apt & ready the managing of armes: Lastly, that it w necessarie to she wonce to the world, how yndifereet were the resolutious of him, who in was would preferre the Launce-knight footemen afore the nation of the Smiffers. This affection violence of passion caried them so farre, that wedding theinselves to the cause of the Pope, asi had bene their owne, they departed from their houses, having received in press only one Florin the Rhein for a man, where afore they were not wont to march for the ferrice of the king, wit out promife of manie payes, and great distribution of prefents amongst their Captaines. The muster was at Coire the capitall towne of the Grifons, who having tofederation with the Frer king, and being in his ordinarie penfions, had fent to excuse themselues, that for the ancient alli: cesthey had with the highest Cantons of Swiffers, they could not result to fend with them c taine bands of focumen. This mouing troubled much the minds of the French men, whose for were now much diminished: for, after the Generall of Normanay had difinified the regime of the Italian footmen, they had not in all about tenthousand footmen; and the companies men at armes which the king had reuoked, being returned over the itiounts, there were left Italy but thirteene hundred launces, wherof three hundred were at Parma: and yet the Ger rall of Normandie doing more the effice of a Treasurer then of a man of warre, would in no w leauie new fuccours of footmen vvithout the kings commission: only he had caused to return to Millanthe bands that should have marched into Romania under M. Palissa, which were readic arrived at Finalo, The Cardinall of S. Senerin had direction also to do the like with the companies that were in Romagnia: for the retiring of which Itrengths fo needfull for the furc of that country, Runny and Cefena together with their castles, and also Rauenna, reverted vviout difficulty to the obedience of the Pope; and because the Frenchmen would not disfurnish: Duchy of Millan, Bolognia for the defending whereof they had received fo many afficile, aftood in great danger, being almost abadoned both of fortune & of men. Such is the instability of actions, nor mortall things, neither certaine in the selues for an universall frailtie in all earthly actions, nor me affured by the deulics and wifedomes of men for infinite imperfections which are proper to that with their creations. After the Swiffers had multered at Coire, they marched fro thence to Tri, having permission of Casar to passe through his lands, who yet studying to hide from the Freih king as much as he could, the things he had determined, excused himselse that he could not wifland their passage, in respect of the consederation he had with them: from Trent they wit on the territories of Verona, where they were taried for by the armie of the Venetians, who gether with the Pope contributed to their pay. And albeit there was not in the campe fufficht money to pay them, for that their number was farre greater then fix thousand which was maunded: yet, such was the hatred that the Commons bare to the kings name, that contrarie their cultome, they brooked with patience all difficulties.

On the other fide Olonfieur Paliffa, who was first come with his armie to Pintoillo, to the d to hinder their passage, thinking they would descend into Italy on that side, but finding afrwardes their intentions to be otherwise, he encamped at Chastellon, a place fixe miles from (quiera, being vicertaine whether they would take towards Ferrara according to the brute, celle do some enterprise vpon the Duchie of Alillan, which was to be feared. It may be that is vicertaintic hallined and brought forth the harmes that hapned: for it is not to be doubted, they had taken the way to Ferrara, if by ill aduenture had not fallen into the hands of the nesian estradiots, a letter, by the which M. Palissa debated with the Generall of Normandse ing at Atillan, the estate wherein stood their assaires, assuring him it would be hard to resist m if they turned towards the Duchie of Millan. By the direction of this letter they changed life, and the Cardinall of Sion who was now come from Venice, with the other Captaines, afthey had taken counfell together, determined with reason (which seldome beguileth men) follow that enterprise which they perceived by the letters to be most troublesom to the enees. In which opinion they went from Verona to Villa Franche, where they joyned with the Inetian armie, wherein (vixler the government of John Paule Baillon,) were four chundred nat armes, eight hundred light horsemen, and fixe thousand footmen with diverse peeces of illerie, as well for batterie, as for the field. This was the cause why Monsieur Palissa abandog Valegge the place not being defencible, retired to Gambara, with intention to encampe at ningua: his strength was not about a thousand launces, and fixe or seven thousand footmen, refidue being distributed in Bressia, Pesquiero and Leguaguo, for, notwithstanding he was blued to call backethe three hundred launces that were at Parma, yet, what by compul-1 of the apparant daunger of Bolognia, and great importunities of the Bentinoleys, he gauc er that they should be bestowed in that citie remaining almost without garrison. But seeing hat place into the daunger wherein they were, and examining at laft the vanitie of the hopes crewith they had bene beguiled, and withall complaining bitterly against the conetousnesses corrupt counsels of the Generall of Normandy, they constrained him to suffer Federike Bofwith certaine other It alian Captaines, to leavie so fast as they could, fixe thousand footinen: medie which they could not apply to any purpose, til at least the space of ten dayes were past. befides the finall number of fouldiers, the disagreement amongst the Captaines weakened th the French armie: for the Captaines were hardly brought to obey Monsieur Palissa, and touldiers and men at armes made wearie with fo long troubles and trauels of warre, wished her the Duchie of Millan were loft, to the end they might returne into their countrey, then ontinue the defence of it with so many disaduantages and daungers. As soone as M. Palista gone from Valegge, the Venetians and the Swiffers entred into it, & afterwards paffing ouer river of Mincie, they lodged upon the territories of the Mantuans, where the Marquis ethem libertie of passage, excusing himselse vpon his disabilitie. Amid these difficulties the erall resolution of the Captaines was to abandon wholly the field, and to lay for the defence laces of most importance, hoping that by temporising, so great a multitude and number of Hers would at last disperse and breake: wherein they were gouerned with this reason, that Pope no lesse cold to furnish the expenses, then hote to further the warre, was very slow in eling their payes, being no more able to aduaunce the wages of lo great a number.

The Frenchmen bestowed within Bressia two thousand footmen, an hundred and fiftie launce, and an hundred men at armes of the Florenines: to Crema they sent fiftie launces & a thousaid footmen: and in Bergama they put a thousand footmen and an hundred men at armes of Florenines: the residue of the armie which contained fixe hundred launces, two thousand timen french, and four thousand launceknights, was retired to Pontuiquo, a place very strong the benefit of his situation, and no lesse convenient to succour Millan, Cremona, Bressa & Bergan, and there they hoped to be able to sustaine the enemies. But the day after same letters to commandements from Casar to the Almaine footmen, to depart immediatly from the pay of the French king: & they, being subjects of the courty of Tyrol, obeyed the letters the same da they received the, as not to be disobedient to their natural Lord. By reason of their departure, leffe fudden & vnlooked for, then most prejudicial to the French affaires, Palissa and his Captain loft all hope to be able any longer to defend the Duchie of Millan: & in that passion of searc & de spaire, they retired in great half from Pontuique to Pesqueton: by whose departure, they of Cr mona being left abandoned, gaue the felues up to the armie of the confederats which was at han binding them selues to pay to the Swiffers fortie thousand duckats: but as among such varieties nations, nourishing not few differences of ambition, defire and opinion, there was no certein in whole name the money should be received: so after some disputation, the Venetians makin great instance that it might be deliuered to them, it was at last received (the Frenchmen notwit Handing holding as yet the Castell) in the name of the League and of Maximilian sonne to Lad wike Sfiree, on whole behalfe the Pope and the Smiffers pretended the conquest of the Duchie Millan. At the same time the Citie of Bergama fell into the power of the confederats, the mea was this: After Monsieur Palissa had called backe the companies that were there to joyne the ro the armie, certaine of the banished crewes who entred as soone as the other companies we departed, procured them to reuolt, (it being no hard matter to alter a multitude that hath no he to hold them:) from Pisqueton Monsieur Palissa passed the river of Aada, where the three hi dred launces appointed for the defence of Bolognia came to him, having retoked them to him the greatnesse of the perill. There he hoped to be able to give impediment to the enemie to pr ouer the river, if the strength of footmen that were appointed to be leavied, had come: but it v in vaine for him to thinke vpon those things, for that neither was there present money to wage many footmen, neither could the Generall of Normandy, binding for securitie the kings demai, raise it by any device, (credit being wholly lost in so great daungers:) and therfore having ren ned there foure dayes, as foone as he faw the enemies approch the river, three miles below ? queton, he retired to S. Arge to go the day following to Pania: and fo their danger redoubling, no expectation of succors in a state so desperat, both the hope to desend Millan being taken aw and the countrey alreadie drawing fast into tumult, John Lacques Triuulce, the Generall of N mandie, Anthony Maria Paluoisin, Galeas Visconte, with many other gentlemen, and all the ki feruants and officers, went from Millan, and fought their safetie in Premont. Not many daye fore the Cardinals fearing no leffe the people then the enemies, were fled, notwithstanding shew that valour in decrees, which they durst not expresse in other actions) they had at that t: almost suspended the Pope from all administration spirituall and temporall of the Church: a gree to depriue him of the place which he held. These tumults were much helping to the sat: of the Cardinall Medicis, whom it seemed God reserved to a greater happinesse: for, ast were leading him into Fraunce, and the morning that he entred the barke at the paffage of The which is right ouer against Baffignany, called in histories Angusta Bacienorum, certaine pail s of the village beginning to murmure, one Reignold de Lallo chiefe of the conspiracie, acconnied with certaine of the Cardinals fauorites lodging there all night, affembled a number, & tc. him from the Frenchmen that garded him: they, whom other aduerfities had made fearefull (1 accidents, hearing a noife of a tumult which they durft not abide to fuppresse, were more car 🏾 to fliethento fight, loofing their prifoner by cowardife, whom they had wonne in the daul it of a battell. Paliffa being entred into Pania, determined to stay there, fending for Truulce d the Generall to come to him thither: whereupon Trinulce by the aduice of the Generall & ricipals of the French fide, layed afore him the vanitie of the counfell, and how unpossible it was abide so great a ruine, the armie being vnmanned with footmen: That the shortnesse of the 11e fuffered not to wage new companies, and much leffe to draw any but from places farre remed and with great difficulties. Laftly, that though all thele impediments were not, yet there wa 10 money to pay them, all their reputation being loft, their friends full of astonishment, and the pple puffed up with incredible hatreds, for the immoderate infolencies which the fouldiers had id fo long time. Triunice applying this counsell to the present necessitie of things, he went and ufed to cast a bridge where the river is straightest and furthest off from Valence towards Ast, by he commoditie of which he meant to passe his companies ouer Paw: But by this the armie of he confederates (to the which after the Frenchmen were retired from Adda, the Citie of Lody 185 rendred together with the Castell) discamping from S. Ange was come neare to Pania, wher he Ven as venetian Captaines euen at the first arrival began to batter the Castell, and one part of the Swifers to passe the riner that ioyneth to the Citic, with boates. The French men fearing they hould find impediments to passe the stone bridge which is upon the river of Tesin, by the which nely they might faue themselves, wonne the other bridge, to be able to issue out of Pavia: but fore the reregard was come forth, wherein to sustaine the horsemen, certaine footmen of the aunceknights which were not iffued out with the others, were bestowed the last of all, with whom the Swiffers, illuing out of the new gate and of the Castell which was now abandoned, vent skirmishing all along Paula and the bridge, the footenen of the Launceknights making esolute desence about all others: but passing oner the bridge of Granatona which was of rood, the planks breaking with the weight of the horfes, all the Frenchmen and Launceknights hat were not yet passed ouer, were either slaine on the place, or taken prisoners: (that last calanitie being so much the more lamentable and grieuous, by how much they hoped by their dilience to make way for their fafetic, which they faw their fortune perfecuted to the vttermoft.) he towne of Paula bound it selfe to pay a great quantitie of money, by whose example also Millan compounded, but for a greater fumme; and all the other townes except Breilia & Crea, fled from the aduerfities of the Frenchmen: all the countrey cried now ypon the name of e Empire; the state was received and governed in the name of the holy League (so was it cald universally) and all affaires disposed by the authority of the Cardinal of Ston affigured Legate t the Pope: but the treasure, and what soener was taxed upon the townes, was made a reward the Swiffers, to whom was transferred an interest in all things that concerned gaine or proe: the same being the cause that many other bands and troupes of them descended into Lomudy to joyne with the refidue, after the parliament of Zurich was ended, which was affembled r that cause. In this mutation, the Cities of Plaisance and Parma gaue themselves willingly to e Pope, who pretended they appertained to him as members of Rauenna. The Swiffers made emselves Lords of Lucarno, and the Grisons got Valuoltolino and Chiavenna, places very comodious for them. And in the heate of this fortune, lanus Fregofa Captaine of the Venetian are, being gone to Genes with fuch bands of horsemen and sootemen as he had obtained of the nie, was the cause that that Citie revolted (the French Governour being fled) whereof he s created Duke; a dignitie afore time inuested in his father: with the same violence of fortune, the townes and Castels of Romagma returned to the Popes obedience. And lastly, the Duke Orbin approching neare to Bolognia with the bands of fouldiers of the Church, the familie of t: Bentiuoleys left it abandoned, their fortune leaving them desperate, having by these violence grees deprined them of all hope. The Pope purfued this familie very sharply, excommunicat gall the places that should receive them hereafter: he expressed no lesse hatred against the (ie; and being most kindled for their forgetfulnesse of so many his benefites bestowed you t m, and in that ingratitude not onely revolting from his obedience, but also in their spite, had r: forborne to spurne his picture, and raile out many villanous wordes against him: he would chent no more that they should create new Magistrates, nor communicate any way in the gouernement of the towne: he exacted by the meane of seuerc officers, huge summes of money of fundry Citizens, as partakers with the Bentuoleys: yea the opinion ran, that if his deuifes had not bene broken by death, he had a meaning to destroy that Citie, and translate the inhabitants to Centa.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Duke of Ferrara is in great trouble: The Medices returne to Florence: The king of Romain makes alliance with the Pope: Maximilian Sforce is put in the possession of the Duchy of Mi. lan: The French King makes his preparations to recouer Millan: Pope Iulio dieth: Leon il tenth is created Pope: The Frenchmen are ouerthrowne neare to Nouaro: and the Venetia neare to Vincensa.

😭 Otwithstanding the Pope, amid his greatest aduersities and daunger had not onely obtained victorie of his enemies, contrary to all hope at coniecture, but also with the same selicitie, had amplified the surisdiction of the Church aboue expectation, and contrary to common equitie: ye his auncient couetousnesse to the Citie of Ferrara, (the first matter of If these broiles) so held him stil ouerruled, that he could not make his defin equall to his fortune, nor conforme his wandring mind to restand tra quilitie: Such is the rage of couetousnesse when it hath the assistance authoritie, which makes men hard to be contented with that which on fion doth offer, for that those things that come first do abhorre them, so long as by the greatne of their power and place, they aspire and thirst for better. But albeit the Pope had violent desi to turne his forces against Ferrara, yet, the way of peace seeming more easie then the warre, rather hoping more in the benefite of secret and artificiall practises, then in actions apparant : discouered : he gaue eare first of all to the Marquis of Manina, who belought him that All. d'Este might come to him to Rome to demaund pardon, and that he would estsones reclaime! to grace under some indifferent conditions. In this request was concurrant the Embassador of king of Aragon, fuing for him, both for that he was the kinfeman of his king (for Alfonfo cam) a daughter of the old Ferdinand king of Naples) and also for that he effected it more to the cr moditie of the affaires of his king, to bind him to him by this propertie of benefite, then to fu so great an estate to be adjoyned to the greatnesse of the Church. Moreover the familie of the lonnois, being become of great amitie with Alfonfo, were earnest solicitors in this cause. The, fon of their compassion was, for that after the battell of R auenna, Fabricio Colonno, who is Alfon foes prisoner, being sent for and required of him, he vied so many delayes, first in refus. and then in interposing many excuses, that by the mutation that happened, he brought it into s owne power to give him his libertie without any charge or raunfome. At last safeconduct obtained for him from the Pope, by the furetie whereof, confirmed also with the faith of the I bassadour of Aragon in the name of his King, which was protested to him by the consent d privitie of the Pope, he went to Rome, his submission being greater then his hope to be so uen: and being come to Rome, the Pope admitted him into the Confistorie, suspending in e to some tode- meane while all centures and paines. There, with great humilitie he demaunded pardon, d maind pardon with the same submission befought him, that he might be received into his grace, and restore o the fauour of the sea Apostolike, offering to do hereafter all those offices and duties which mit appertaine to a most deuout and faithfull vassall of the Church. The Pope heard him w countenaunce and afpect reasonably peaceable, and substituted fixe Cardinalles to debate wh him touching conditions of agreement: who, after certaine dayes spent in disputation and tgument, declared to him, that the Pope neither would nor meant to deprive the Churcof the Citie of Ferrara, fince it was lawfully reverted to the imperie of the Church: Bi in ecompence, there should be given to him the Citie of Af, which being received in the name nd authority of the league by the departure of the Frenchmen, the Pope had vainely fent this her to take possession of it the Bishop of Agrigenta, pretending that whatsoeuer was on this de Paw, appertained to the Church. This offer was constantly refused of Alfonjo; who, for that it omprehended a demaund contrary to all the hopes that had bin giuen him, began to feare least ne Pope fought but to entertaine him cunningly within Rome, whilest he dressed some execution zainst Ferrura, the late accident at Regge nothing diminishing the reason of this feare.

The Pope had dealt with the inhabitants of Regge (who in so great confusion of things sead much to gine themselves vp to the Church,) following the example of Parma and Plais nce, wherein to give greater force to his counsels and perswasions, he had given direction to eDuke of Vrbin to march with his companies vpon the territories of Modona: in like fort Vituch was gone to Regge, to attempt the like action for the profite of Cafar, on whose belife did worke the Cardinall of Este; who, in the absence of his brother had charge ouer his lates; he feeing that Citie could not be kept, and judging the daunger would be leffe if it fell to the hands of Casar, who both pretended nothing against Ferrara, & also in his affaires there as hope of a greater change; he aduised the people of Regge rather to acknowledge the Eme then the Church: but they answered (in matters of election the will of a popular multitude Gronger then their reason) that they would follow the example of the Duke, who was gone to Pope and not to Cafar: and so received into their towns the souldiers of the Church, who mediatly found means to be Lords of the Citadell, not with standing Vitfruch had furnished it tha garrison of sootmen. Lastly, Garfagnana was rendred to the Duke of Vrbin, who returig afterwards to Bolognia, difinified all his bands of footmen: for that the confederates fomevatangrie that the Pope occupied Parma and Plaisance, the Cardinall of Sion fignified to the Iske that it was not necessarie that he passed further, since the victorie was alreadie obtained ainst the common enemies.

The Duke of Ferrara being entred into many suspitions, both for the hard conditions that the The Duke of pe offered, and for the taking of Regge, made meane to the Pope by the Spanish Embassador Ferrara in dis 1 Fabricio Colonno who neuer left to accopanie him, to haue leaue to returne to Ferrara. This ger to be prisoquest the Pope shewed no disposition to agree vnto, but maintained that the safecoduct which had given him for the controversie he had with the Church, could not let him to do instice his particular Creditors, of whom manie demanded instantly that he would administer ineto them. The Embassador and Fabricio answered him frankly, that it was not to the Duke Ito them that he ought to breake his faith; and therefore to preuent the Pope to do any furr spite against him, the next morning Fabricio being well mounted, went towards the portall S. John de Latran, the Duke and Marke Anth. Colonno following him a good distance off: il finding the portall garded with a greater strength then it was wont to be, and fuch as was set thop his going; he having a force about theirs, brought the Duke thorough the gate, & condudhim in surctie to the water side. This friendship he did to the Duke, in recompence of the efit of his liberty which he had received of him: for it is not to be doubted, but the Pope wold haue retained him prisoner, had it not bene for the impediment of the Colonnois, who finthat the way was daungerous for him to go by land, were driven to procure his passage by c:o Ferrara.

And whilest these things were in doing, the Pope, in whom was yet no diminution of hatred infi the libertie of the Florentines, had so wrought with the Cardinall of Sion, that the bands ouldiers which they had fent to the king were stripped and put to spoyle: of these bands, alis fuch as were under Luke Sauella, being fixescore men at armes and fiftie light horsemen (the e lue were left for the gard of Bressia under Frauncis Torelle) had afore the French army were ed the river of Pam, obtained fafeconduct of the Cardinall of Sion, confirmed by the oath and a of lo, Paule Baillon and almost all the Venetian Captaines, that they might returne to Tufexe: yet as they lay lodged neare to Cremona, according to the rule and direction they had resped, they were spoyled by the Venetian souldiers by the consent of the Cardinall of Sion: who the end the violence might be executed with more furetic, fent thither/as fome fuppose) two husand footnien, the rather for that the companies of Triulee and others were lodged with hn, and they for that they were almost all Italian souldiers, had likewise obtained safeconduct

to passe. Immediatly upon the robberie and spoile of these souldiers, the Bishop of Sion sent t Christopher More and Paule Capello agents for the Senate, to demaund the bootie that ha bene made, as appertaining to the Swiffers: but they refused it, and therefore comming th next day to the campe of the Swiffers to speake with the Cardinall of Sion, they were almost a led prisoners to lacques Staffler their Captaine, and by him caried to the Cardinal, who constra ned them to pay fixe thousand duckets in recompence of the pray, (not holding it convenies that his difloyaltie should turne to the profite of others:) he fent also to summon the Marquis of Montferrat to deliuer to him as priloner Nicholas Capponi Embassadour of the Florentine to whom he had given fafeconduct being retired to Cafall Ceruas. In this meane while the Se nate defiring to recouer Breffia and Crema, laboured the Cardinall of Sion, that their compani might be returned, whom the Cardinall entertained under colour to march together with the Swiffers into Promont against the Duke of Sauoy and the Marquisse of Salussa, who had follow ed the faction of the French king: but that reason ceasing afterwards, both for the wonders augmentation of the number of Swiffers, and also for that it was well feene that the French souldiers returned ouer the Mounts, he neither refused nor agreed that they should go: matter supposed altogether to proceed of the instance of Cafar, to the end they shou not recouer those townes. At last, the Smillers being in Alexandria, the Venetians depa ted from Bosco vpon the sodaine, and passed the river of Paw without anie impediment, at is a vponthe territories of Cremona: an expedition which the Cardinall might have let, he had not diffembled it (as was beleeued) at the Popes request: but being once ouer the uer, fome marched against Bressia, and some tooke the enterprise of Crema, both whi were kept yet for the French king. The Frenchmen that were within Breffia, feeing their prefe fortune could suffer no delay of action, went out and set vpon them at the village of Paters where they were confrained to retire within the towne, with the loffe of more then three hi dred men.

Conquest draweth with it ambition, infolencies and couetousnesse: And with men of wa et triumphing in the victorie, all things feeme to hold of equity, that they do in their rage and coi stousnesse: For, the Swiffers remaining alone in the Duchy of Millan and Premont, deuised he to taxe and rate the whole countrey, being now wholic affured of the Frenchmen: and albeit Frêch king, for the great affectió he bare to the Duchie of Millan, was hardly brought to aba. altogether the affaires of Italie; yet necessity compelled him to hearken to the counsels of su as aduised him to deferre those deuises to another time, and dispose his wits for that summer, defend the realing of Fraunce: the rather for that the king of England, according to the cont made with the king Catholike, had fent by fea an armie of fixe thousand footmen to Fontara, a towne of the kingdome of Spaine standing upon the Occean sea : the chiefe end of this ioun was, that ionning to the companies of the faid king Catholike, they might in one maine force faile the Duchie of Guien: he began also with another nauic to fcoure all along the coast Normandy and Brittaine, to the greatastonishment of the peoples of those Prouinces. Moruer, the French king had no hope to draw againe Cafar into amity with him, for that he vncstood by the Bishop of Mar feelles his last Embassadour resident in his Court, that he barea nd farre effraunged: he aduertifed him also that Casar had not entertained him with so many ho i nor for other regard debated with him upon so many matters with so faire apparance, then to occasion to oppresse him when he thought least of it, or at least to give him (as it were) see violent and deadly blow, as he gloried that he had done, at fuch time as he reuoked the Laur:

Thus Italy being for this yeare affured fro the armies of the French king, whose souldiers it withstanding held as yet, Bressia, Crema, Leguague, the castle and lanterne of Genes, the cast of Millan, the castle of Cremona, with certaine other fortresses of that estate. There were did the med amongst the consederates, manie signes of difference and disagreement, for the diversit of their wils, and their ends: for, as the Venetians desired to recover Bressia & Crema, as due to by the articles of capitulation, and for that they had borne out the daungers and troubles che wars a matter which the Pope desired likewise for the: so, on the other side, Cestar (from wise with the king of Aragon at last could not be separate) thought to appropriate them to him se, and also to deprive the Venetians of all that had bene judged to them by the league of Camas.

fides, Cefar and the king of Aragon practifed (hut verie secretly) to make to divolve the Duie of Millan to one of their Nephewes: a working quite contrary to the Pope and the Strafs, who laboured apparantly as much as they could, that according to the vinuerfall refolution d consent from the beginning, Maximilian, sonne to Lodowike Sforce might be restored to the ce of his father, after whose fall he had remained alwayes in Germanie. The matter that moued : Pope, was a feare he had, least Italy should fall into a miferable servitude of the Almaines & aniards: and that which induced the Swiffers, was a defire for their owne profite, that that cte should not be brought into the power of so mighty Princes, but rather to stand subjected one that could not maintaine himselfe without their aide and succours. Which election, as it pended almost whollie vpon those in whose power was that estate, and for the seare of their ces: fo the Pope, the more to confirme them in that will, and in all necessities to have in his nd the bridle, with the which he might moderate the ambition of Cafar and the king Calike, did all that he could to winne their amitie: and for that cause, besides the great acint he made publikely of the nation of Swiffers, raising to the starres the actions they Idone for the fafetie of the Sea Apostolike, he gaue them yet for their greater honour the bans of the Church, with this glorious title, to be the champions and detenders of the Ecclefiae libertie. Besides these diversities, the Viceroy had readdressed the Spanish companies ich after the battell were retired with him into the kingdome of Naples: and beginning eftnes to march, and to passe with them into Lombardie, the Pope and the Venetians refused econtinue the payes of fortie thousand duckets by the moneth, which had bene discontied fince the overthrow: their reason was, that seeing the French armie was chased home, y flood no more subject to such bond, for that it was to cease by the articles of the confederawhensoeuer the French were expussed out of Italie. Whereunto was replied on the bethe of the king of Aragon, that it could not be faid that the French king was driven out of I-, so long as Bressia, Crema, with other many strong places, stood at his deuotion. Morcouer, king of Aragon together with Casar complained, in that the Pope did appropriate to hime the profits of the victorie that was common to them both; and vsurped that which manily appertained to another, making himselfe Lord (vnder colour of certaine reasons suborned, it least so old and withered, that their force was gone) vpon Parma & Plaisance, cities which Lords of Millan had holden folong time, as freeholders of the Empire. The divertitie was expressed for matters that concerned the Duke of Ferrara: for, as the Pope on the one side irished his ancient couetousnesse to vsurpe that Dukedome; so on the other side the king of agon, who defired to preferue and protect him, flood yet difcontented with the injurie that soffered to have flayed him at Rome contrarie to the law of faith and lafeconduct given: for e reasons the Pope deferred to vexe Ferrara, expecting perhaps the issue of affaires of farre ater importance: whereof Cefar not thinking good that any resolution were made without , dispatched into Italy the Bishop of Gurey, whom he had appointed to that expedition ever eafter the battell of R auenna: there was negociation of peace betweene the Pope and the nchking: he appointed to fend himthen for the feare he had least they compounded amongst melues without respecting him and his affaires: but the mutatio of things hapning afterwards fill continued his deuise to send him: in like fort fell into confideration the affaires of the Flotines, who being filled full of suspition, began now to seele the fruits of the neutralitie which diferentiethey had yfed, finding withal, that it was not sufficient to beare themselves ypon the ice of their cause, wanting discretion and forecast: for in the war present, neither had they ofded the confederates, nor ministred anie succours to the French king, but so far forth as they re bound for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, according to the confederation made in mmon betweene them, the king Catholike, and with him: they had not fuffered within their isdiction any violence to be done vpon those Spanish souldiers which fled from the battell of inemia, for the which the king of Aragon himselfe gaue thanks to the Embassadot of Florence: athey had fatisfied all his demaunds, for that after the Councell was broken up from Pifa, his sents being in Italy, and the king himselse offering to their Embassadour to be bound to deid their common weale against all men, so farre forth as they promised him they would tdefend Bolognia, nor take armes against the Church, nor fauour the vnlawfull Councell of a: but they being let by civill discords to make the better election, gaue themselves neither to follow the French nor any other, and obseruing neutralitie from one day to another, and the with counsels no lesse doubtfull then broken, not jointly and fully resoluted whether they wou observe it, they offended much the French king, who in the beginning promised much of the they removed not the hatred of the Pope, and left the king of Aragon without any recompento enjoy the fruit of their neutrality: a matter which he would gladly have covenanted with the to obtaine. So that the Pope pushed on with his auncient hatred against the Gonfalonnier. Magistrate, and a perpetual defire descending from all Popes to have authority in that conmon weale, folicited earnefly the restitution of the family of Medicis to their ancient greatner. To this the king of Aragon, notwithstanding he ysed differibled phrases to the Embassadouri Florence, bare some inclination, but not with so great vehemency, for feare least in any stirre; alteration they might be brought to fauour the French king by the authoritie of the Magistra: yea, it was distrusted that though the Gonfalonnier were deposed and taken away, yet the co. mon weale being freely gouerned, would not have the fame affection, in respect of the ne and ancient dependances: but the resolution of this matter together with others, was reserved I the comming of the Bishop of Gurci, with whomit was agreed that the Viceroy, & such as we for the other consederates, should meet at Mantua. In this respite of time that the Bishopvi comming, the Pope sent to Florence his Datario, Laurence Pucci a Florentine (he was afiwards chosen Cardinall, and called Cardinall of foure Saints) to solicite them, together with : Embassadour which the Viceroy had there, that they would sticke to the League, and contrib: to the charges against the Frenchmen: that was the colour of his going, but in true meaning: was fent to found the willes of the Citizens. That demaund was debated many dayes w. out any conclusion: the Florentines made offers to pay to the confederates certaine prof. tions of money, but they answered doubtfully to the demaund to enter the League and pre themselues against the French king: which doubtfulnesse, moued partly by an opinion they I (which wastrue)that those matters were proposed artificially, rather to entrap them the affure them; and partly by an aufwer which the Bishop of Gurei had made to their Emba. dour at Trent, whom they fent to meet him : he feeming to make finall reckening of the rest made to him that Cafar by the capitulation of Vincensa subsigned with his owne hand, s bound to defend them, affured them that the Pope was determined to trouble them, and ye a paying to Cafar fortie thousand duckets, he would deliver them of that daunger. To this he ded, that the confederation betweene Cafar & the French king continuing yet, they should t therefore enter into the league, if first Cafar gaue them not example. The Florenines were t farre estraunged to buy their quiet with money, but they seared that the onely name of Cr (notwithstanding the Bishop assured them that his will should be followed by the Spania) would not suffice to remoue and make cease the ill intention of the others: a perswasion wh held them in doubt, and kept them so restrained, that with a counsell well disposed, they cod not minisfer the salue to such as had power to help their infirmitie. It was a matter perhaps () fidered vpon with counsell and discretion, and yet it could not but proceed either of neglige; or of their discords, or of too much confidence in their strength of footmen, forbearing in # respect to refurnish themselues of souldiers trained, by whom they might have bene defer d from any fodaine affault, or at least might have made easie the covenants with the confeder 5, and with better conditions, knowing once how hard a matter it were to force them. While these things were in action, the Viceroy with his regiments of sootmen was entred upon to countrey of the Bolognois, where having no meane to fatisfie the payes which he had pre ised to the souldiers, they ran with such a tumult to his tent, threatning and conspiring to ill him, that he had scarce leasure to steale away, seeking his safety by slying towards Model one part of the army tooke towards the countrie of the Florentines, the refidue chaunged it place, but lived there without law, without order, and without commandement: and with three or foure dayes after their light rages being somewhat satisfied with part of the payes at had bene promised, the Viceroy also and the residue being reassembled and returned to the mie, they gane their promise to tarie for him in that place till he returned from Mantua, wite the Bishop of Gurci was now arrived. As the Bishop passed by the territories of them of Ver 4, the Frenchmen that lay in garrison in Leguaguo having refused many offers of the Veneting gaue up to the Bishop that town which they could no loger hold: this was thought to be don y former commandement of Monsieur Palissa, as well to them as to all the residue that had in harge the other townes, to the end to nourish discord betweene Casar and the Venetians: But was an action very vnfortunate for the fouldiers, who (without respecting their safe conduct prained from the Bishop of Gurei) were miserably robbed and stripped by the Venetian army hich lay encamped vpon the confines of Breffin, after they were returned from Bofco, and after ey had recouered Bergama without any difficulty: only they forbare to batter the towne, for at (as was fayd) the Cardinall of Sion had forbidden them.

It was resoluted in the affembly of Mantua, that Maximilian Sforce should be reincested in The resolution e Duchy of Millan, the defire of the people being nothing inferior to the equity of his title. To of the treatie of is agreed the king of Aragon and Cafar, no leffe to fatisfie the great instance of the Pope, then to Manua by eafe the wils of the Swiffers. Touching the affignation of the maner and time, it was referred rates, I the Bishop of Gurei met with the Pope, to whom he was to go, both to conclude the alliance tweene Cafar and him, and to solicite peace with the Venetians, and so by the meane of mmon alliance, to confirme Italy in her auncient furety, that the French king should no more puble it. In that affembly also was disputed the expedition against the Florentins, wherein Inde Medieus made instance, as well in his owne name, as for the Cardinall: he proued that the alation of that state would be easie, for the diussion amongst the Citizens: for the affection of my that defired their returne: for the fecret intelligences they had with fundrie Noble;& mighpersonages: and withall, for that one part of the men at armes of that common-weale being Lombardy, and another moytic inclosed within Bressia, they had not sufficient forces to make sence against the assault so suddenly. Lastly, besides the money he offered, he shewed the ite that would come by restoring them to their former dignity: for, the authority and power that City being taken out of the hands of one that depended wholly vpon the French king, it ould fall to the administration of persons, who standing discontented and wronged by that 1g, had no reason to depend or hold vpon other alliance then of the confederates. Barnard de Bima(afterwards Cardinall) vrged this matter much in the name of the Pope, who for that occasihad fent him to Mantna, a man for his learning no leffe meete for this legation, then for his aftion most friendly to the Medices, in whose house both he and his brothers had bin trained vp en from their youth. lohn Victorio Soderin, a Lawyer, & brother to the Gonfalonnier, was at this ne Embassador to the Florentins with the Bishop of Gurci, to whom nothing was sayd, nor athing demaunded, either by the Viceroy or in the name of the league: only the Bishop declad to him the daunger, and how convenient it was that they accorded with Cafar according to e demands made before, offering that Cafar and the king of Aragon should receive them into otection: but the Embassador in whom was no power to conclude, could do no other thing enaduertise the common-weale and expectanswers: neither did hesolicite the Viceroy by nselse or by others, nor vsed any diligence to hinder the workings of the Medices: hauing no lneffe of authority, he was driven to be filent in things that concerned directly the fafety of the mmon-weale: and yet the matter of it felfe was not without many difficulties, both for that e Viceroy had not fo great an army, as to adventure to make triall of his forces without necessi-: and also the Bishop of Gures, to let the Venetians for reconering Bressia, or to make any eater proceedings, defired that the Spaniards might passe into Lombardy with all speede connient. By these considerations it was beleeued, that if the Floretins for bearing their niggardnesse the present perils required, had consented to contribute to Casar the mony he demanded, and leeued the Viceroy with fome small summe, whereof he had great necessity, they had easily turdaway & anoyded the storme : yea the Bishop of Gurcs & the Viceroy might perhaps with betr will have entred into couenant with the common-weale, of whom they were certaine to reiue the things that should be promised, then with the Medices, who had no ability to give them by thing, if first they returned not to Florece with armes. But the cause of that City being almost pandoned, either by the negligence or by the malice of men, it was determined that the Spanish my, together with the Cardinall & Iulian Medicus, should march towards Florence in which exedition the Pope had declared the Cardinall Legate of Tuscane, with fulnesse of power to leauy refouldiers of the Church, and wage fuch others of the townes adiopning, as he should thinke onuenient for that service. The Pope omitted nothing that might advance this enterprise, rather plying his authority to his will, then to the equity of the matter.

But affoone as the affembly of Mantua was broken up, the Vuerry returning to the territorie of Bologma, caused his army to march with speece against the Florentins, who had very small re spite to make necessary provisions, for that they were not aforehand advertised of the resolution of Mantua. The Cardinallioyned with the Viceroy affooneas he drew neare the frontiers, ha uing caused to be drawne from Bolognia two Cannons to supplie the want of the Spaniards wh hadno peeces of batterie . Also Francis Orsin and the Vitells (Captaines for the Church) cam thithet to him, but without their bands of fouldiers, both they and the other companies of the Church being forbidden by the Duke of Vrbin: who, notwithflanding Inlian Medicis had ha fome bringing vp in his Court; a matter to moue fauour, and that he had alwayes professed i defire the greatnesse of the Medices, which was a strong argument of affection, refused to refus nish them with artilleries or any fort of succours either of his fouldiers or subjects, thought Pope had commanded the contrary by large letters, aswell to him as to other townes subjects the Church. Assoone as the Viceroy was entred upon the lands of the Florentins, there came him an Embassador; who in the name of the whole common-weale declaring the respects the had alwayes borne to the king of Aragon, both what were their actions in the last warres, and a what that king might hope for of such a City receiting it to his amity, befought him, afore he pa fed further, to fignifie what it was he demanded of the Florentins: for that in demands reasonab. and not exceeding their power, they would willingly fatisfie him . The Viceroy answered,th his comming had not bene determined onely by the king Catholike, but also by all the conf derates for the common furety of Italie, seeing that so long as the Gonfolonnier remained in the administration, they could not be affured that that common-weale would not follow the Fren king, and be feruiceable to his occasions: therefore he demaunded in the name of the who league, that the Gonfalonnier might be deprined of the gouernement, and that there might instituted a forme of pollicie not suspected to the confederates: which could not be vulettet Cardinall and Iulian Medicis were restored to their naturall countrey: That if they would co fent to these things, they should find agreement in the residue more easily: Lastiy, he willed! to fignify this report and his intention to the state of Florence, and yet he would not stay his ar till answere were returned.

At Florence immediatly vpon the brute of the marching of the Spaniards, might be difcert an universall astonishment in the minds of men, both doubting that the Popes forces would uade them on some other side, and searing the division of Citizens, and the inclination of multitude to new things: they were very weake in men at armes, and had no other strengt! footemen, then such as were either leauied in haste, or at least drawne out of their garrisons, estate of soulders not yet experienced in warre: they had no excellent Captaine, vpon wh: vertue and authority they might repote the guiding of an army; and their other leaders were! as in the memorie of man they had not in their pay men of leffe expectation: their weaken: was great in regard of the frength that was comming against them, their wants were farreit riour to the preparations of their enemies, their wisedomes vnable to preuent the daungers 1 t threatned, their wealth unprofitable, where wanted men for action: Lastly, they hadithing amongst them which did not helpe to the desolation of their estates, and wanted all this wherein they might hope for comfort, counsell, or compassion: their feares were vaine, t that their perill was swifter then their prouision : and there could be no place for confider, where was nothing to affure their hope: all things were full of confusion, and the suddenne of the calamity made them leffe apt to confult for their fafety : and yet making fuch proui a as they could, according to the shortnesse of time, they reassembled their men at armes distribit d into many places, they waged footemen, but such bodies as they could get: They che out the best bands of their Pensioners, and drew to Florence all their principall forces, both a the surety of their Citie, and to refurnish from thence all other places that should suffer nit danger: And amidde these meanes of prouisions for the warre, they forgat not (but 19 late) to proue what they could do by way of accord : for which cause, besides the contin !! solicitation of their Embassador with the Viceroy, they wrote to the Cardinall of Voltero's ing at Gradoli neare to Rome, to go to the Pope, and labour to appeale him with offers, with titions, with humilities, and all other forts of offices what soeuer. But he having a hart hard J, aunswered notwitstanding with words contrarieto his doings, that the enterprise came of him, and that it was followed without his forces: only not to stirre up the league against m, he was constrained to consent to it, and to suffer the Cardinall of Aledieus to draw artillery om Bologma: That he was not able to stay the expedition afore it was begun, and much lesse uld he breake it now that it was in action: He made himselfe forrowfull for their affliction, dyet expressed no inclination to compassion: his words were doubtfull, and his intentions ffembled: he faw the humour that was offended, and yet would not apply the medicine to imfort it, judging it bestfor the serving of his turne, to suffer them to languish in their proper lamities. By this time the Viceroy had passed the mountaines of Barberina within fifteene iles of Florence, from whence he fent to fignifie to the Florentins, that it was not the intenon of the league neither to alter the jurisdiction, nor change the liberty, so farre foorth as the furety of Italy, they would depose the Gonfalonner from his estate: He defired that the tedices might be restored to their countrey, not as chiefetaines of the gouernement, but as perns private, subjected to the lawes, and to the Magistrates, and not seperate in anything from her Citizens. This proposition being knowne throughout the City, the opinions of men were terfe according to the discritty of judgements, palfions, and feare: Some blamed the Councell, at would, for the regard of one onely, preferre to fogreat a danger the generality of Citizens dthe valuerfall jurisdiction: feeing that in depoling him, they lost neither the counfell popular, or the publike liberty: a thing which it could not be hard to keepe, though the Medices, depridofreputation and power, would friue to exceede their degree private and limited: That it as to be confidered in what fort the City might refiff the authority and forces of fo great a igue: that of themselues they were notable: that all Italy was become their enemy: that ey had wholly loft all hope of fuccours with the Frenchmen, both for that being driven with wardise out of Italy, they had enough to do to defend their owne Realme, and also knowing eir weaknesse, they had answered to the demands of the Florentins, that they were contented fet them at libertie to make accord with the league. Of the contrary, others reasoned how ine it was to beleeue that so great a stirre was made only for hatred to the Gonfalonnier, or to typ the Medices in Florence as Citizens private: That farre otherwise was the intention of the infederates, who to joyne the City to their wils, and to make it contributary to their wants of ony, respected no other end then to bring in the Medices in tyranny : only they disguised their prrupt intentions, with demaunds not sharpe nor seuere, and yet pretended the same effect: for it as no other thing to take out of the pallace the Gonfalonnier in a time fo troubled, and with fuch reatning and compulsion of armes, then to leaue a flocke wandring without a pastor, the more fily to fall into the lawes of the wolfe: It comprehended no other thing to bring the Medices to Florence in so great a tumult, then to strike up the drumme and aduance the standard, that ch might follow it, as liued in no other study then to deface the name, the memory, and the rme of the great Councell: an estate of gouernement which could not be deposed without e absolute ruine of the common liberty: And what is there to let the Medices, backt from the rreine with the Spanish army, and followed at home with troupes seditious and ambitious, at they may not oppresse the liberty even assooneas they make their entrie into Florence: hey have the time by election, the place is prepared, mens minds altered, the good men of the owne do feare, the cuill fort expect, if there be any place of the towne free from tumult, at least ere is none voide of suspition, few to be trusted, and none affured, all things in confusion, year renthe wiself furthest off to avoide the storme which even now is gathered into a cloude idreadie to breake: It were good to confider what the ouerture of fuch things might enender, and what may happen by yeelding to demaunds uniust and prejudiciall: That it is good affection to much to feare their dangers as thereby to forget the fafety of their liues, and consider how intollerable it would be to line in seruitude, to such as haue bene borne and red up in liberty: That they were to remember with what valour they had opposed against ne late king Charles the eight for the protection of their liberty, at fuch time as he was possessed fthe City with a mighty armie: Lastlie that they had to consider how easily they might resist so nall an army, ynfurnished of mony, ynprouided of victuals, naked of great artilleries, & all other ommodities to beare out the war, if only the City refifted their first fury: yea when they found a esolute defence in place of the vaine hopes that had bin given to cary Florence at the first assault, ney would be easily ranged to agreement upon reasonable coditions. These discourses ran in the market places and streetes amongst the Citizens: but the Gonfalonnier holding it best that it aunswere which the Magistrate was to make to the Viceroy, should be communicated with a people, called together the great Councell, and in full presence of the Citizens, gaue his opinic in this maner.

Peter Soderin reasoneth in the Councell,

If I thought the demaund of the Viceroy touched me onely, or that his defires were staye fimply vpon particularities, I would of my felfe make a resolution conformable to my intention " and do the thing without your counfell, which could not but turne to your common fafety : fi " having alwayes caried this mind to give my life for your benefit, it could not but be just in men " resolue of my selfe, to renounce the office you have given me, to deliver you from the dangers "harmes of the warre, having especially worne out both my body and mind; with the travels of the of place in formany yeares fince you preferred me to it: but fince it may be that this demaund fire " cheth to things further then to me and my private interest, it is thought good by this honour. " ble affiltance, and by me, not to deliberate without publike confent in a matter that so vniuerfal " concerneth you all, and leffe feeming that a cause so grave and generall, should be referred tot "counsell of that ordinary number of Citizens, which are ordinarily called the privity of comme  things, but to you in whose persons is resembled the Soueraigne Maiesty and presence of this C "ty, and by whose wisdomes are to passe deliberations of so great importance. I induce you, not " incline more to the one part then to the other, I referre all to your counsell and judgement. " bring hither no meaning to perswade you to partiality, I set not myselfe betweene your a "fections and the present cause: The same you shall resolue, the same shall be accepted by m " who do not only lay at your feete the office which is your owne, but also my person and li "which is to my selfe alone: a facrifice which I would thinke happily dedicated, if it had any oper "tio tending to your fafety. Examine of what importance the Viceroys demand may be for your "berty, wherein I befeech God fo to leade your minds as you may make election of the better wa 6 If the Medicis were disposed to live in this City as private Citizens, with conformity to yo 4 lawes and rulers, it could not be but vertuous and commendable to fuffer them to returne, and r " ceiue them, to the end the members of our common countrey might at last be reincorporate in one common body: but if they bring with them other intentions, and undershadowes of co formity, shroud minds of tyranny, it were good you considered of your danger, not holding grieuous to fultaine all expenses and difficulties to preserue your liberty, a Jewell whose pres ousnesse, you shall then best discerne, when you shall suffer prination of it. Be not perswade that the government of the Medices will be the same it was afore they were expulsed, seeingt " forme and foundations of things are chaunged: for then as they had their trayning vp among " vs almost as Citizens private, wealthy in goods according to the degree they held, and not offe ded of any, made their foundation of the good will of the Citizens, vsed to consult with the pri "cipals of publike affaires, and labored with the/cloake of civility to cover rather then to discover their greatnesse: so now that they have bene so many yeares seperate from the lawes of Floren infected with the fashions and customes of strangers, and by that reason lesse practised in ciu causes, mindfull of the exile and seuerities done to them, poore in goods, injuried of so many fan lies, & according to their owne testimony knowing that the most part of this presence abhorse tyranny: they will repose confidence in no Citizen, nor haueno conformity to your law & Magistrates, but compelled by pouerty and suspition, will bring backe to themselves the adn nistration of all things: they will not reestablish good will and love, but recontinue force & arme they will reduce this City in short time to the image and state of Bolognia, and to Sienna & P rousa in the time of the Bentsuoleis. I speake this to such as keepe observation of the time and g uernement of Lawrence Medicis, which yet in comparison of this wold seeme a golden age, no "withstanding the conditions of that time were hard, and the gouernement was a kind of tyrann albeit more easie the many others. Now it appertaineth to you to resolue wisely, & to me, eith to give vp constantly this office, or else resolutely, to apply my selse to the preservation of your "berty: You are to determine, and I to be directed, you fland in the stands of your owner counse and I subjected to your arbitration.

There was no doubt what the Councell wold resolute, the whole multitude of the people be ring almost an universall inclination to maintaine the popular government: Therefore it w determined by a wonderfull accord, to consent to the returning of the Medices in t ure of persons private: and that in no wise the Gonfalonnier should be deposed from his place. unft which if the enemies were obstinate, then the whole body of the Citie should be applied the defence of their libertie and countrey, not sparing either goods or life in an action so honole and necessarie: so that disposing all their thoughts to the warre, they made prouisions of mo-, and fent mento the towne of Prato ten myles from Florence, a place which they thought uld be subject to the first violence of the Viceroy: who after he had gathered together his army Barberina, together with the artillerie which was drawen with a wonderfull paine, both for the vay of Appenin, and also for that for want of money they lacked labourers and infiruments nefarie for the cariage, he tooke the way to Prato as had bene supposed: he arrived there about breaking of the day, and cuen then began with two Falconets to batter the gate Atercatala by space of an houre, albeit little to his profit, for that it was mightily rapiered within. The Florenhad bestowed within Prate about two thousand footme, the most part of their Pensioners, & refidue leauied in hast of all scieces and base trades. In that number there were very sew expenced and trained to the warre. They had also sent thirder with an hundred men at armes Luke rello an ancient Captaine, but yet neither for his age nor for his experience come to any degree narriall knowledge: and the men at armies were the same bodies who a little before had bene iled and stripped in Lombardie. To this was added, what by the shortnesse of the time, and the orance of fuch as had the charge to make prouisions, both great want of artilleries, and not e the munitions and other things necessarie to defend the place. The Viceroy had in his armie hundred men at armes, flue thou land footemen Spamards, and two Cannons onely: an army y small in numbers and other prouisions, but great as touching their valour, for that the sooren were all of those bodies, who in so great reputation were retired from the battell of Ranenand who repoling much in their vertue, despised greatly the ignorance of their aduersaries, But ng brought to march, and no order as yet taken for their victuals, and lesse reliefe through the ole countrey, for that haruest was fully finished, & all gleaned & caried into places of stregth, y bega immediatly to fall into necessities of food, which made the Viceroy to incline to accord, the same followed with continual solicitation, that the Florentins suffring the Medices to rene equall with the other Citizens, there was no more speech of the deposing of the Goufalon-, onely the Citie should pay to the Viceroy (to the end to withdraw his armie from their dotions) a certaine fumme of money, which was supposed not to exceede thirtie thousand ducs. In respect of this he had graunted saseconduct to the Embassadours elected for that expedia, and had abstained vntill their comming from any further action against Prate, if they withnad furnished him with victuals: There is nothing that flieth faster away then occasion: no-,, ig more daungerous then to judge of the intention and profession of another: nor nothing » re hurtfull then an im noderate suspirion. All the chiefe Citizens desired agreement, being actomed by the examples of their elders, to defend their libertie against armes, with gold: and refore they made request, that the Embassadours elect should depart incontinently, being char-I amongst other things to see them of Prato furnish the Spanish armie with victuals, to the end : Useroy should expect with pacience if the composition that was now in action would bring thany effect. But the Ganfalonnier perswading himselfe against his naturall timerousnesse, that Prato tiken enemies dispairing to be able to do any more would depart the selections, or fearing that the Me-by the Spaes by one meanes or other would returne to Florence, or whether his destiny pushed him on to the cause of his owne ruine and the calamities of his countrey, he held artificially in delay the parch of the Embassadours, not suffering them to depart the day that was appointed according the refolution which had bene made: in fo much as the Viceroz both preffed with the want of tuals, and vincertaine whether the Embassadors would come, dislodged by night from the gate ercatale, and incamping before the gate called Seraglio, from the which the way goeth to the ountaine, he began to batter the next wall with two Cannons, chusing that place for the comodity of a high heape of earth joyning to the wal, by the which he might eafily go to the breach the wall from about that was battred: which facilitie for the campe being turned into a diffitie for the towne, for that the breach that was made aboue the heape of earth, remained within ry high and thicke of earth, one of the Cannons was broken at the first execution, and the other ththe which the battrie was continued, had so lost his force with ofte shooting, that his bullets neflowly to the wall, and yet did no great harme. Lastly after they had executed many houres and made an opening in the wall of more then twelue fadomes, certaine of the Spanish foote in got up to the terraffe or heape of earth, and began to affaile the breach: from thence they goo the top of the wall, where they flue two of the footemen that garded it, where death giving tre to the residue and driving them to retire, the Spanyards forbare not to take the openunitie of the timerousnesse, and climbe vp by the helpe of scaling ladders. And albeit there was within nearly wall a foundron of thot and pikes, bestowed there both to suffer none of the enemies to stay via the wall, and also to make flaughter of the first man that rashly should leape within or other ic go downe, yet (fuch is the feare of men vnexperienced in dangers) affoone as they faw the energy ypon the wal they brake their rancke, and of themselves abandoned the defence of the place. 18 cowardife depending fornewhat vpon want of experience in the fernice and perils of warte, see crying Victorie, they followed their fortune with valour, and began to runnethrough the tove, where was feene no other thing then flying, violence, spoiling, bloud, murders. & crying, the fitmen of the Floretins making no refistance, but casting away their weapons, they offered their dies to the rigour of their enemies: fró whofe couctoufneffe, luft, & crueltie, nothing had cfcap; if the Cardinall Medicis by bestowing gards in the great Church had not saued the honour of). men which in their calamitie were fled thither for fafetie. There were more then two thould men that dyed, not in fighting, for almost not one would joyne himselfe to the fray, but in fly a in hyding, and in crying mercy to the enemies, who difdained to flew compaffion upon med fo small merite. The residue were reserved prisoners together with the Florentin Commissions, none escaping the calamitie that so wretched a fortune did bring. By the losse of Prato the sf Piffoye, not falling otherwise from the jurisdiction of the Florentines, agreed to relieue the Vu y with victuals, receiving his promife not to be diffressed by his armie, But at Florence, associated fuccesse of Prato was knowne, and the Embassadours that went to the Viceroy being on the lie way, were returned by the bruite of the accident, there were discerned manifest alterations it a mindes of every one: some lamenting the losse that was happed, some fearing greater harmes, see fuspecting by nature more then they ought to do by reason, some distructing shadowes whole is dies were farte off, all things in confusion, and even those men the least assured, in whom was r ? reason of confidence and resolution. The Gonfalonmer repenting now the vanitie of his cour L was no leffe amazed then the refidue, and having almost altogether lost both reputation & au ritie, he flood fo irrefolute and vingouerned, that he gaue himfelfe vp to the wils of others, w out making prouision either for his owne safetie, or the common tranquilitie: others, who det d the alteration of the gouernement, tooke audacitie by the flate of their fortune, and blamed p likely the things prefent: but the multitude of Citizens not accustomed to tumults and atme: 🕻 having alwayes afore their eyes the miserable example of Prato, notwithstanding they affe d much the gouernement popular, yet what through feare and cowardife, stood as a miscrable 1 y to who focuer would oppresse them . In this tumult and separation of mindes Paule Vettorid Anth. Fran. Albizi, two young Gentlemen of the nobilitie, no leffe feditious and defirous of iv things, then by these occasions full of audacitie and boldnesse, having many moneths aforec spired secretly with others in fattour of the Medices, and for the better forme and maner of the restoring, had secretly spoken with Iulian de Medicis in a village of the Florentinterritorie ne to Sienna, determined to make experience to draw the Gonfalonnier out of the publike pallacy force: and drawing into this countell one Barth. Valors, a young man of like qualitie, but emgled by his vnreasonable prodigalities with fundry debts, as was also Paule, they went thesee d morning after the losse of Prato, being the last day of August, with a small company to the pall; where finding no great gard or refistance, for that the Gonfaloner left all things to aducture, ty entred his chamber, and threatned him to take his life from him if he would not depart the lace, but in case he would go out, they gave him their faith to defend him from harme: his see and the present extremitie made him obedient to the rage of the young men. Then the whole tie was drawen into tumult, and many were disclosed against him, but not one appeared in his uour. He by and by by direction and commaundement of others, caused to assemble the Mi-Arates, whom, having by the lawes a full authoritie over the Gonfalonniers, they required to 'prine him lawfully of his office, or otherwife they would kill him . In which feate they deped him contrary to their will, and led him in safetie into the house of Faule, from whence in then # g well accompanied, he was conveyed upon the dominions of Sienna, and from thence ma-Thew to go to Rome with safeconduct obtained of the Pope, he tooke secretly the way of ona, and passed by sea to Rangia, for that he was advertised by the meane of his brother the dinall, that the Pope would breake his promise with him, & spoyle him of the money which he supposed to be in great quantitie. Assoone as the Gonfalonmer was deposed from his place, Citie dispatched present Embassadours to the Viceroy, with whom they compounded easily neane of the Cardinall de Medicis: for the Cardinall was contented as touching his particuhat there should be no further communing but for the restoring of him and his, and all such as followed him, as Citizens private, with power to redeeme within a certaine time the goods had bene aliened by the fiske: That there should be repayment of the moneys that had bene urfed, and amends made by fuch to whom they had bin transferred: That touching the comaffaires, the Florentins entred the league: They were bound to pay to the king of Remains rthousand duckats, according to the promise which the Medices had made at Mantua to the op of Gures, in recompence of their refloring, to the Viceroy twentie thousand, and to the e fourescore thousand, the one halfe presently, and the residue within two moneths: rponthis condition that the first payment being received, the armie should forthwith dethe lands of the Florentins, leaving at libertic all that they had possessed. Besides this, they racted a league with the king of Aragon, with bonds reciprocall for certaine numbers of at armes for the defence of their estates, and that the Florentines should entertaine in their wo hundred men at armes of the subjectes of that king: wherein albeit it was not expresnder whom they should be led, yet the charge meant to the Marquis of P.:luaa, to whom Cardinall had promised, or at lest given him hope, to make him Captaine Generall of the entin men of warre. Thus the businesse of the deposing of the Gonfalonnier being passed ouer, he daungers of the warreremoued by the composition, the Citizens began to fall to corhe gouernement in points wherein the former forme was thought ynprofitable, but with niuerfallintention, except of a very few which were young and almost not falling in conation, to preserve the libertie, and support the counsell popular. Therefore they deterd with new lawes, that the election of the Gonfalonnier should not be established perpetuall, or one yeare onely: That to the councell of the fourescore, which chaunged from fixe eths to fixe moneths, and by whose authoritie causes of greatest gravitie were determined to nd there might be a continuall communitie of the Citizens of greatest qualitie, should be ales added all those that had administred either at home or abroad, the chiefe offices and s: At home, such as had bene either Gonfalonniers of instice, or of the ten of the Balia, fice in that common weale of great authoritie: Abroad, fuch as being cholen by the coun-If the fourescore, had served either as Embassadours to forreine Princes, or else as Generals intendents ouer the warre: All the other orders and ordinances of the gouernement remaiirme and stable without innouation.

fier these things were resolved, they elected Gonfalonnier for the first yeare, John Baptista If, a Cirizen of noble descending, and no lesse escended for his discretion and governe-. And as it happeneth in all times troubled, so in this election the people not beholding so In fuch as by popular practifes were most agreeable to them, as one, who what with the authoritie he had in the Citie, specially with the nobilitie, and with his proper vertue which reculiar to him, might reduce and make firme and stable the shaking estate of the common ce. But by the prefent tumult things were too much difordred, the common libertie had too mighty enemies, in the bowels of the countrey was an army suspected, and within the an unbridled boldnesse of young men desirous to oppresse it, and to their wils was conable the will of the Cardinall Medicis, notwithstanding in wordes he made demonstration e contrarie: for, as in the beginning he esteemed not the restoring of him and his as Citizens ite, a recopence worthy of so many tranels & paines, so also he considered for the present, that flate could not endure, for that together with his name, they should be greatly hated of all t, the Citizens liuing in continuall fuspition, that they would dresse some ambush against their tie: They would alwayes remaine discontented, for that they had brought the Spanish against their countrey, and were the causes of the wretched spoyle and sacke of Prato: lastly that by compulsion of armes the Citie had bene constrained to received conditions so vnworthy and vniust. To this he was vrged by such as afore had conspired with him, and oths who in a comon weale well ordered, held no honorable place: but the confent of the Vueroy is necessarie, who expecting the first payment, which for the divisions in the citie could not so loce be made, kept as yet within Prato, and had no fancic (what soener was the cause) that any ny chaunge should be made in the Citic of Florence, notwithstanding the Cardinall joyning to I the Marquis of Paluda & Andrew Caraffe Captaines in the armie, told him that the name of e Spaniards could not be but very odious to a Citie, against which they had done so many harn: that in all occasions they would sticke alwayes to the enemies of the king Catholike, and the there was daunger least when the armie should depart, they would reuoke the Gonfalonner vo they had expulsed by constraint. By these persuasions he consented to the Cardinall, who asso e as he had made agreement and resolution of affaires with him, cante with diligence to Flore into his houses, where many Captaines and souldiers of the Italians entred, some with him, d fome separate, the Magistrates being affrayed to let their entry for feare of the Spaniards in were at hand. The next morning the councell of the multitude of Citizens being affembled at e publike pallace to confult vpon the affaires present, Inhande Medicis being present and affil g the action, the fouldiers charged the gate of the pallace, and clining vp by ladders, they me themselues maisters of the pallace, and made pillage of the silver vessell which lay thet si flore for the vse and service of the Citie . There the Citie together with the Gonfalonmer CI. pelled to give place to the infolencies of fuch as could do more with armes and weapons then e Magistrate with reuerence and authoritie, called together with the ringing of the great bell y the direction of Inlian de Medicus) the people, to Parliament vpon the pallace greene: wh; fuch as went thither being enuironed with armed fouldiers, and the young men of the Citie u had take armes for the citie, they colented that to fiftie Citizes of the Cardinals naming, shoule giue the fame authority ouer publike businesse which all the people had:a forme or state of per which the Florentins cal Ampla balia. By the decree of these men, the government being redid to that forme which it caried before the yeare a thousand soure hundred nintie & soure, & a g is fon established within the pallace, the Medices resumed upon the the selfe same state of greatise which their father had, but their gouerumet was more imperious, & with a power more abso :

In this fort, and with armes, was oppressed the libertie of the Florentins, being brought to it degree of aduerfitie principally by the difagreements of the Citizens. It was thought it had it fallen fo far, if they had not behaved themselves with great negligence in the defence of thecimon bufinesse, specially in the last times, not speaking of the neutrality, which they vsed very 1discreetly, and the cowardise of the Gonfalonnier giving too much head to the enemies of the >pular gouernment. The king of Aragon had not from the beginning so great a defire to reuerl te libertie, as to turne away that Citie from the alliance of the French king, & to draw fome fun is of money to pay his armie: in fo much that affoone as the French had abandoned the Ducl of Asilan, he sent to tell the Viceroy, that whether the affaires occurant should draw him to ancit enterprise, or for any other occasion, he should know that the restitution of the Medices w ld be of hard action, that he should take libertie to determine according to the condition of tis, and agree or not agree with the Citie, according to the meane that brought the best open i-* tie to his affaires. This was his commaundement in the beginning: but being afterwardes dil 1tented with the Pope for the violence he would have done at Rome to Alfond d'Este, ancatring withall into suspicion for the threats he gaue publikely against straungers, he gaue plain to vinderstand to the same Embassadour of Florence that came to him in the beginning of the w , enjoyning no leffe to the Viceroy, that there should be no striuing to alter the government in which deuise these two reasons were indifferent to him: he judged that either it would be at 1g of more furctie to him to preserve the Gonfalonnier, who was enemie to the Pope, or else he ared that the Cardinall of Medicis being restored, would not more depend of the Pope th of him. But his last deliberation came not to the knowledge of the Viceroy, untill the day afte he common we'ale was reduced to the power or 'e Cardinall.

By this discourse it may be discerned, that if the Florentins, after the French were chased ad looked to affure their affaires by some agreement, or at least had made theselues strong with a strollers trained, either the Diceroy* had not marched against them, or at least finding resisting he would easily have bin brought to composition for money. But their destinie was against the fa ie,

fery, being belides the coniectures and comprehension of mans wisdome, warned of the perils pat were towards them, by certaine fignes in the ayre: for, not long afore, the lightning that fell on the gate that leades from Florence to Prato, caried away from an ancient shield of Marble, golden flower de Lys, which is the Enfigne or armes of the French kings: An other time a flash clightning descending from the top of the pallace into the chamber of the Gonfalomier, touched other thing then a great vessell of filuer wherein the lots are wont to be put when they come be made equall for the creation of the great Magistrate: and afterwards falling downe, it stroke violently a great stone which lay at the foote of the stayres, and bare vp the burden of the builing, that being remoued from his place without any other hurt, it feemed that the hands of men dtaken him out with a wonderfull knowledge in Archytecture.

About these times, or a little before, the Genowases beating upon the Castle of Genes with the ar- The castle of teries which the Pope had lent them, the Castle keeper being corrupted with a bribe of ten by the Geno-rusand duckats, deliuered it vp to the townes men: This treason of the keeper moued partly by maies. fire, for that an army by fea which was fent out of Pronence for the defence of the towne, having t courage to take land, were retired, by whose cowardise he had no hope to be succoured: But Lanterne held out for the king, wherein the fame day certaine French veffels had conueyed

Ruals and other necessary prouisions.

Affoone as the matters of Florence were dispatched and the mony received, the Viceroy remodhisarmy to march to Bressia: about which City the Venetians, having now appealed the Is of the Swiffers, were encamped and lay afore the gate of S. John, battering at one time both towne and the Castle with artilleries planted vpon the mountaine opposite: They had a cerne light hope to be let in at the pile gate by meane of an intelligence, which nevertheleffe prod vaine, for that it was disclosed: But when the Spanish army arised at the borough of Gairo nich is neare to Breffia, Monheur d'Aubigny gouernour of the French that were within, had a Breffia rene ind to give up the Towne together with the Castle to the Viceroy, with composition that all the dredbribe Ildiers that were within should iffue out, their goods and liues faued, but their Enfignes foulded, French to the d the points of their weapons downeward, and leaving behind them their artillery: wherein it Viceros. med Monsieur d'Aubigny respected more the Viceroy then the Venetians, by a commandement ich he hadreceiued afore from his king, to deliuer it to the Spaniards or to Cafar, not that he ted more the Venetians, but rather to entertaine matter of contention with Cafar and with a king of Aragon. The Frenchmen that kept Leguague followed the same counsell afore the amards passed into Lombardy: for, litle esteeming of the many offers of the Venetians, they suridred it vp to the Bishop of Gurci, as also did Pesquiero at the same time that the Viceroy ened Bressia, the possession whereof the same Bishop desired to have, but it pleased the Viceroy retaine it for the League, in whose name he had received it: it hapned otherwayes to the wne of Crema, about the which lay incomped Ranze de Cere with a part of the Venetian foulers: for, by that time the army of the foure thousand Swiffers which Octavian Sforce Bishop of ide and gouernour of Millan fent to conquere it, in the name of the expected Duke Maximiin Sforce, were come neare the wals, Benedict Cribario what by corruption of money, and an Crema renabitious desire to be created a Gentleman of Venice, gaue it vp to the Venetians: in which action is concurrant the consent of Monseur Duraz that kept the Castle, who reposed no confidence : his fafety in the faith of the Swiffers.

Immediatly vpon these expeditions the Bishop of Garei went to Rome, whom the Pope desiig earnestly to reconcile to him, gaue order to receive him through all the dominions of the Rome. hurch with all fortes of honours: and not sparing to enforce his nature to advance his defire, defraied his expenses by the wayes, together with all such as followed him, to whom were ade many great feafts and liberalities: euery towne which he entred honored him, with shewes d offices not accustomed, both for their variety which was strange, and for their state and maly, most rich and sumptuous: The wayes which he passed were full of personages appointed to ecte him, and in many seuerall places he was visited by fundry new Embassadors of Prelates & rsonages of honor of the Popes sending: yea he would that the Colledge of Cardinals should nue gone to the gates of Rome to receive him, but the whole Colledge refusing, as a matter for enewnesse, hurtfull in example, and for the indignity, most prejudiciall to their reputation, they pointed only the Cardinals Aginense and Strigonia to go out of the gates halfe a mile into the

medowes, to receive him in the name of the Pope, who with great respect & ceremony led him the Church of S. Maria de Popolo, he being in the middest betweene them as Lieutenant to far: there the two Cardinals left him, and from thence being honourably accompanied befic the generall multitudes that followed, he went to the Pope, who fitting in solemne habit under estate pontificall, expected his comming in the publike Consistory; where not many dayes b fore he had in great honour received the twelve Embassadors of the Swiffers, whom all the Car tons had fent to him, both to give him publike obedience, and to make offer of their nation be perpetuall defenders of the state of the Church, and withall to thanke him, that with so gre honour he had given them the fword, the hat, the helmet, and the banner, together with the ti to be the defenders of the Ecclesiastike liberty. When the Cardinall was ariued, & had perform his presence to the Pope, they began to debate of the establishment of the common affaire whereof the foundation rested in this, to remove all quarels and contentions particular, to the end that the regions of Italy reunited and confirmed, might with one joynt resolution and cou sell, be able to make a full refistance to the French king. The hardest matter in this action was t composition so many times practifed betweene Casar and the Venetians: for the Bishop of Gu cy could have bene contented that Padoa, Trevi/a, Bressia, Bergama and Crema should remai to the Venetians, so farre forth as they would render to Casar Vincensa, renounce their claim and rights they pretended to the townes that $C_{\mathscr{E} f a r}$ held, and pay to him prefently two hundr thousand florins of Rhem, and thirty thousand yearely for euer in forme of tribute. It troubled t Venetians to acknowledge themselves tributaries for those townes which they had possessed I many yeares as proper owners: and no lesse were they grieued to give mony, not withstandi the Pope offered to lend them part of the fumme: but the thing that troubled them most, was t restoring of Vincensa, in which action they alleaged they should seperate the body of their esta and fland, deprined of the commodity to passe from the head and principall parts to the oil members, by which privation the possession of Bressia, Bergama, and Crema would standill as red . Besides, to refuse the restitution under more honest colours, they say d, they had given the faith to the Vincentins the last time they put themselves into their hands, never to separate the from them. Other conditions were debated betweene the Pope and the king of Aragons Emb fador, proposed more for reuenge and recompence of the complaints of others, then that the was hope to obtaine them: for, the Pope demanded that that king according to the contents the confederation, should aide him to conquer Ferrara: he required him to leave off the protect of Fabricio and Mark. Anth. Colonno, against who he had begun to proceede with spiritual arm for that they had forced the gate of Latran, and received the Duke of Ferrara (rebelled agai: him)into those townes whose jurisdiction appertained directly to the Church: he required him renounce the protections he had made in Tuscane of the Florentins, of the Siennois, of the Li quois, and of Plombin, matters done to the diminution of the rights of the Empire, and genet: fulpected of all Italy, but particularly of the Church: for that as it was not profitable to the ot! Potentats that he should have so many abances in Italy, so it was most dangerous for the Chur, that a prouince belonging to the dominion of the fame, should depend you his authority. these the Spanish Embassadors replied, that they refused not to ayde him against Ferrara, so: forth as according to the bonds of the same confederation, he made payment of the mony due the army both for that was past, & to make new provision for hereafter: That it was an action to ther of praise nor merit to proceed against Fabricio & Mark. Anth. Colonno, by who, if they w: purfued, what by reason of their great friends and dependances, and for that they were Captais of authority, would be renewed matter of a new warre: That the king Catholike could not le: them abandoned, without special prejudice to his proper honor, neither did their seuerall serui; in the joynt warres of the Pope and him against the French king, deserve that property of recopence. Touching the complaint he made of the protections of Tuscane, they thought it procded not of any good or just zeale, but to the end that Sienna, Lucqua, & Plombin, should remail a pray to his couctousnesse, condiscending not with standing to referre themselves in those actions the arbiterment of Cafar. All the confederats agreed with full confent, that Maximilian Sfo: should enter upon the Duchy of Willan, but Cafar consented not to inuest him, nor to inc him with the name of Duke or any title judiciall. But eftfoones did renew the coplaints of the Thop of Gurci & the Spaniards touching the occupation of Parma & Plaifance: they brought gt t preiude judice of the rights of the Empire, too much encrease of greatnesset othe Popes, and an apant weakening to the Duchy of Millan, which had neede to be made more strong and able, that it lay alwayes open and subject to the first inuasions of the French: That in the capitulalus of the league, the Pope had made mention of no other things then of Bolognia and Ferrara: Lat now he vsurped that which of long time since, had not bene possessed by the Church of me, yea there was no certaine knowledge that euer the could claime interest, not in the times nost ancient: That this vsurpation was under shadow of rights and interests, whereof appeared authentike memory, he feeming to make the donations of Emperours none other thing then a aple writing, which might be forged or fayned according to fancy : And yet the Pope, taking occasion of the tumults of Lombardy, did reason to himselfe, as in a matter manifest and notopus: These disputations could not be resolved easily: But the matter that troubled most the issue things, was the controuersic betweene Casar and the Venetians, by reason whereof the Tipe did what he could, fornetimes prouoking them, fornetimes praying them, and fornetimes catning them, and all for a defire he still nourished to preserve the Venetians, both for the comon benefit of Italy, and also for that he hoped, under the oportunity of their succours, to be able cary Ferrara without the forces of the Spaniards. In this action the Aragon Embassadors laborl with great importunity, fearing least to a common danger, there were no cause added to the netians to turne their dispositions to the French, and be estsoones reunited to that nation; but ey were driven to proceed advisedly and with temperance, both not to provoke Cafar to make ance with the Frenchmen, from whom their king had separate him with so great paine, and alfor other reasons necessarily moving him not to breake amitie with him. Lastly the Swiffer nbaffadors omitted no trauell in this action, for that being bound to defend the Venetians, who oin that regard were bound to pay them euery yeare 25000 duckets, they wished not to be ought to this necessitie, either not to observe their promise, or to be driven to make head ainit Cafar if he offered to vexe them. At last, neither the Bishop of Garci, being not to be awne from the demaund he made that the Venetians should render Vincensa to Cafar, nor the enetians disposed to give it vp, who stood a sfo yet disagreed touching the quantity of mony, ePope, who about all things defired, the rather to reverse the name and authority of the ouncell of Pisa, that Cesar might approue the Councell of Latran, protested to their Embaslors, that he should be constrained to persecute that common-weale with armes spirituall and inporall: which protestation because it moved them not, he onely was brought to confederate ith Cafar, the Spanish Embassador refusing to deale in the action, either for that he had no mmission from his king, or else for that that king sought still to nourish the Venetians with me hope, notwithstanding he was resolued in mind to ayde Casar. It was expressed upon the oëme of the confederation which a little after was solemnly published in the Church of S. Maa de Popolo: That for that the Venetians had obstinately refused the peace, and the Pope by enecessitie of the Christian common-weale, had protested to abandon them: Cafar did now nter and accept the league made in the yeare a thousand fine hundred and eleuen, betweene the ope the king of Aragon, and the Venetians, according as the liberty and respite was reserved for m': That he promised to cleaue to the Councell of Latran, disauowing and reuoking all comiffions, procurations, and actes done in the fauour of the Councell of Pifa: He bound himfelfe ot to avde any one of the subjects or enemies of the Church, but chiefly Alfonso d'Este and the eminoleis occupiers of Ferrara & Bolognia: And lattly he promifed to call home all the bands Almain footinen that were in the paies of Alfonso, together with Federik de Bossolo that held on m:On the other fide the Pope promised to ayde Cefar against the Venetians with armes both irituall and remporall, vntill he had recovered all that was contained in the league of Cambray: was declared that the Venetians were altogether excluded out of the league and truce made ith Cafar, for that in many forts they had impugned both the one and the other: That they were nemies to the Pope, to Cafar & to the king Catholike, to whom they referred place & time to nter the confederation, and vinder certaine conditions: That the Pope could make no couenant ith them without the confent of Cafar, or till Cafar had recoursed that which appertained to m, as was fayd afore: That neither the Pope nor Cafar, without reciprocall privity and confent, ould contract or couenant with any Prince Christian: That during the war against the Venetians, ePope should do no displeasure to Fabricio & Mark. Anth. Colonno, being notwithstanding left at liberty to proceede against Pompey and Iulio and others that had bene declared rebels: The notwithstanding he was suffered to possesse Parma, Reggia and Plaisance, yet by this capitulati it was not meant to prejudice the rights of the Empire. When this confederation was publishe. the Bishop of Gures in the next session of the Councell of Latran, approved the Councell int name of Cafar, and as his Lieutenant generall in Italy: and cancelling all former commission, acts, & procurations, he testified in the presence of the whole Councell, that Cefar neuer confe ted to the convocation of Ps/a, difavowing all fuch as had vied his name. Affoone as he had the ratified the Councell of Latran, he departed from Rome to be present when Maximilian Sfor-(being now come by commission of Cefar to Verona) should take possession of the Duchy of M. lan: the Cardinall of Sion disposed himselfe very hardly to expect and attend his comming, a also the Embassadors of the whole nation of Smissers that were at Millan, for that they wou that in the demonstrations and solemnity of the actions that was to be vsed, it might appeared the Swiffers were the men that had chased the Frenchmen out of that state, and by their valour courage Maximilian received it: they would that the verity and effect of that conquest might transferred to them by such publike ceremonies as were to be yied in the installing of him, who their vertue only made Lord of the Duchy. But fuch was the working of the Viceroy, that, me by practife then by his authority he obtained so much, that they taried for the comming of the l thop of Gures: who, after he had ratified at Florence in the name of Cafar, the confederation ma in Prato, & received certaine summes of mony of the Lucquois, whom he tooke into protectic came at last to Cremona, where Maximilian Sforce and the Viceroy attended him: from then they went altogether to Millan, to make their entry at the day appointed into that City, with I lemnities and honors accustomed to new Princes. In which action albeit it was long disputed tweene the Cardinall of Sion and the Viceroy, which of them should give him the keyes at thee try of the gate in figne of possession, yet, in the end the Viceroy giving place, the Cardinall put in his hands the keyes of the towne in the vniuerfall name of the Swiffers, and that day, being one the last dayes of December, he did all things both in shew and act, that were necessary to ma knowne that Maximilian Sforce received the possession of them: he was received withan credible gladnesse of all the people, both for the desire they had to have a Prince proper and pa ticular, and also they hoped he would resemble his grandsather or his sather, of whom them morie of one remained very freshin the minds of the people of that state, and touching the ther, the despites they had received by the government ofstrangers, had turned their hatred i to good will: The working of time, with the experience of the yoke of straungers had made that people a wonderfull conversion, and nature in those actions workes not a little, bringing th people to rejoyce at the returne of him, whose father they abhorred with a just and vojuersallh tred. But these gratulations and loyes were yet unperfect untill the Castle of Nouaro weret couered : a matter not long deferred, for that they within, yeelded it vp, their fortune being fat it ferior to their faith.

Maximilian Sforcerestored to Millan.

> The confederation made at Rome, had not altogether broken the hopes of agreement be tweene Cafar and the Venetians, for that the Pope had vpon the fudden fent to Venice lacqu Staffilio his Nuncso, with who went accompanied three Embassadors of the Smillers to persua the to accord. And on the other fide, the Senat, the better to entertaine the good will of the Pope and not to give cause to Casar to invade them with armes, had sent to their Embassadors a ne direction to cleaue to the Councell of Latran: they had commaunded also the men of warrea foone as the confederation was made, to retire upon the territories of Padoa: and for the cause the Viceroy not willing to trouble the hopes of the peace, had turned his armie toware Millan . But all these things served to no purpose, for that the same difficulties did yet continu touching the restitution of Vincensa, and the payments of money which Casar demanded. The was the cause that the Pope assayled not the Duke of Ferrara, whom (agreement going be tweene Cafar and the Venetians) he supposed he should be able to vanquish with the aides of the Venetians, together with the brute that the Spaniards were to come on if neede should be: other wife he had resolued to deferre that expedition till the spring time, for that he accounted it matter of hard a ctio to take in a season of winter, the towne of Ferrara, the situation being stron in respect of the river, and greatly fortified besides, by the continual industrie of Alfonso.

It may haply seeme to some, if I intangle my history with the accidents of Fraunce in that yere hat I wander or change my course, which is not to speake of matters hapning out of the bounds of Italy: but because the affaires of that nation have some affinitie and relation with the busiresse of these parts, and that to the successe of the one, the counsels and issues of the other were oftentimes conjoyned, I am constrayned notto passe them altogether under forgetfulnesse nd filence.

About the beginning of May, an armie of fixe thousand English footmen sailed in vessels of The English-England and Spaine to Fontaraby, a frontier towne belonging to the crowne of Spaine vpon the raby against oalt of Fraunce, and standing upon the Ocean sea. The service and purpose of this armic, accor-the Presh kings ling to the couenants made betweene the father in law and fonne in law, was, together with the orces of Spaine, to let vpon the Duchy of Gayen, which is a part of the prouince of Aquitaine, acording to the ancient names and divisions of the same. Against this war, the Erench king not yet fured on the coast of Picardy, prepared a new pencionary band of eight hundred launces which ie had erected, and waged many bands of footmen of the lower parts of Germany not subjected o the Emperour: and knowing of what importance for the defence of the Duchy of Gnien, was ne realine of Nanarre, which was both appropriate and dowrie to Katherine de Foix, and pofeffed joyntly with Iohn the sonne of Albert, who was her husband: he called to the Court the ther of the faid John, and carefully confidered how he might make him his friend & confociate. Wherin ferued to good purpose the death of Gaston de Foix, by the instigation of whom preteing the fame kingdom not to fall ypon the female, & by confequent to appertaine to him, as to ne next heire male of the house of Foix, the French king had pursued the said John. On the other de the king Catholike, who had fet his eyes vpon that realine, required the king of Nauarre oftand neuter betweene the French king and him : and to suffer to passe through his realme, is fouldiers that were to enter Fraunce: and for the affurance of these things he would put into" is hands certaine places of strength, under promise to render them assoone as the warre should nd. It hath bene a perpetuall defire in the ancient kings of Spaine, to impattonize the felues you ne realme of Nauarre: in which respect the king of Nauarre, being also not ignorant whither note demands tended, chose rather to offer himself to a perill that was vincertaine, then to accept loffe certaine, hoping he should not faile of the succours promised by the French king, for shofe affaires it came well to passe that the warre began in the realme of Nauarre: and at the me time, either to give more leafure to fuch as were appointed to come to his fuccours, or to eliuer himselfeif he could from those demaunds, he treated with the king of Aragon, who acording to his cultome proceeded in those conferences with great cunning. But the industrie & varinesse of the king of Aragon hurt not more the king of Nauarre, then the negligence of the rench king, who taking courage by the flownesse of the English army, that for many dayes since ey were arrived at Fontaraby, had done nothing: & trusting withall, that the king of Nanarre as able with his owne forces to defend himfelfe for a time, deferred very long to fend him fucours. By the commodity of which delayes, the king of Aragon, who had cunningly nourished adentertained the hopes of the king of Nauarre, converted thither with great expedition the ands which he had prepared to joyne with the English: so that the king of Nauarre both vnepared of hunselse, and by his prination of hope, despairing to be able to make resistance, gaue The king of lace to his fortune, and fled into Bearn beyond the Pyrene hilles. By which accident, the Aragon taketh alme of Nanarre was left abandoned, except certaine strong places which yet held out for the the realme of ng, who in his feare was fled : and fo without any expences or difficultie, and more for feare "Autarre. adreputation of the English that were at hand, then by his owne forces that were farre off, the ng of Aragon made himselfe Lord of that kingdome. And because he could not affirme that possessed it lawfully with any other title, he alleaged that he was rightfully and indicially imatronized of it by the authority of the Sea Apostolike. For the Pope not satisfied for the happie eccesse of Italy, had a litle before published a Bullagainst the French king; wherein naming him omore Christianissimo, but Illustrissimo, he subjected aswell his person as who soeuer were his therents, to all the paines of heretikes and schismatikes, giving sufferance to every one to occuy their fubstances, estates, and all that appertained vnto them and in the same seueritie & rigour, yned to an indignation that the Cardinals and other Prelates who were fled to Millan, had ne received into the towne of Lyon, he commaunded vnder grieuous penalties and taxations, at the Fayre or Mart accustonied to be kept at Lyon source times eueric yeare, the traffike of

Marchants being no lesse plentifull, then the resort of strangers infinite, should be hereafter transferred to the citie of Geneva, from whence king Lowis the eleventh had taken it for the benefite of his kingdome. And laftly, he had brought the whole realnie of Fraunce vinder the interdiction Ecclesiastucall. In his malice he omitted nothing that might appertaine to seueritie or rigour: But after the king of Aragon had conquered the kingdom of Nauarre, which albeit is but of litle circuit and of lesse reuenue, yet for the situation, it is verie conuenient for the kingdome of Spaine, & greatly available to the furety of it: he determined in himselfe to passe no further, estecming it no leffe against his profit then inconvenient for his safetie, to make war against the French king beyond the Mounts. In this respect, as also even from the beginning that the Englishmen arriued, he had bene dilatorie in bringing forth his forces, rather temporifing with enations and deuises, then aduauncing according to the true meaning of his promise. And after the conquitol Nauarre, as the English solicited him to joyne his forces with them, to the end to march together and incampe afore Bayon, a citie neare to Fontaraby, and almost standing upon the Ocean sea; so he protracted the expedition they required, and proponed other enterprises in places remoued from the sea, alleaging that Bayon was so manned and fortified, that there was no hope or possibilitie to carie it. These reasons were answered and anoyded by the Englishmen, who without the towne of Bayon, esteemed nothing of all the other conquest of the Duchie c Guien. And therefore after the English armie had vainely spent much time to vrge the king, that was altogether vnwilling, they contemned his futtelties and delayes, and embarked to return into England without commission or licence of their Prince. By the retiring of which armie, the French king remained affured on that fide, and fearing no more the inuafions of the English by fea, for that at last he was become so strong by sea, that he commanded all that part of the O cean from the coasts of Spaine to the shoares of England: he determined to make triallifhe could reconquer the realme of Nauarre: to which expedition he was encouraged besides the depar ting of the English fleet, for that by reason of his adversities in Italie, all his bands of souldiers tha remained, were returned into Fraunce. At the time that the king of Aragon gave hope to the En glishmen to enter into the war, the better to bring under him the whole jurisdicton of the realm of Nanarre, he had sent certaine regiments of men to S. loh. Pie de Porto, which is the last plac of that kingdome, standing at the foot of the Pyrene hilles, on that side towards Fraunce: and al terwards as the French forces began to increase thereabouts, he had sent thither with the main armic Federike Duke of Alba, Captaine generall of the warre. But the French army at last bein become farre more mighty, by the presence of the Daulphin, Charles Duke of Bourbon, and A. Logueunlle, the verie floures of the realme of Fraunce: the Duke of Alba lying incaped in a flron place betweene the plaine and the mountaine, held it an action verie necessary to that seruice, t the Frenchmen for entring into the realme of Nauarre. The Frenchmen not able to force his out of that place for the strength of his situation, determined that the king of Nauarre withit uen thousand footmen of his countrey, & M. Palisa with his companie of three hundred launce remoning from Sanueterra neare to S. loh. Pie de Porto, where the whole armie lay, shold pass the Pirene hilles by the way of the vale of Willowes, and drawing neare to Pampelune the cap: tall towne of the kingdome, their denife was to occupie the way of the willowes, by the whic were brought to the Spanish armie victuals, whereof the sterility of the countrey had made ther fuffer great want. In Pampelune the peoples taking courage by the nearnesse of the Frenc men, began already to draw to mutinie, not otherwayes rebelling then to relieue their king, fe whose restoring they thought it good denotion to a ducture their lines. This was the effect of the deuise : after the king of Nauarre and Monsieur Palissa had won the way that is vpon the to of the Pirene hilles, they tooke by affault the towne that stands at the foot of the hilles, when in was Baldes Captaine of the gard to the king of Aragon, with many bands of footmen: and to winne the way of the willowes they had vsed the celeritie that the consideration of the service required, famine only had bene sufficient to vanquish the Spanish armie, enuironed on all side with enemies, with ill wayes, with ill fortune, & with wants. But the diligence of the Duke of All preuented the enemy & preserved himself, for that leaving in S. loh. Pie de Porto a thousand so men with all the artillerie, he passed to Pampelune by the way of the willowes afore they came th ther. So that the king of Nauarre and Palissa being disappointed of that hope, to whom also the Danlphin had fent a new strength of foure hundred launces, and seuen thousand Launceknight hade their approches to Pampelune with foure peeces of artillerie, which they had drawne with reat difficultie, by reason of the steepnesse of the mountaines: they gave the assault, but with a rtune farreinferiour to their forwardnesse, for that being not able to carie by their valour that ey were denied by the present season being then December) & by the want of victuals (being line into a countrey barraine) they repassed the Mounts Pyrene, vpon the which they were conrained to leave the artillerie, both for the difficulty of the passages, and for the impediments of e parsants of those hils. And at the same time M.de Lawtrech who was entred Bifear with 300 unces and three thouland footmen, making walte and pillage of the whole country, after he had vaine affaulted the towne of S. Sebaftian, he repassed the mounts and returned to the armie, hich now brake vp, both hope and feare ceafing on all parts, and the whole realme of Nauarre maining free and peaceable to the king of Aragon. About this time there was a detection of conspiracie, that Ferdinand sonto the late Federske king of Naples, who called himselfe Duke Calabria, had fecretly conspired with the French king, and to steale to the French army not far m the towne of Logrognia, where at that time was the king of Aragon: who fent him to the issue of Sciatura whither the kings of Aragon are wont to send prisoners, personages of me and merite either for their nobilitie or for their vertue : for this conspiracie was quartered vilip Coppolo a Neapolitane, who was the fecret messenger to the French king in these actions: schistlie alteration of the state of worldly things, that he was executed in the service of him, nose grandsather by the fathers side had cut off the head of Count de Sarny his father. The deteon of this conspiracy was of some consequence for the affaires of Italy: for, as it had his beginig of a certaine gray Frier, which the Duke of Ferrara had secretly sent to Ferdinand; so the ig Catholike having already an inclination to fatisfie the Popes will, tooke this matter foro art, that he comanded the Viceroy & his Embassadors resident with the Pope, to conuert when by thought good, his army against Ferrara, seeking to exact no further taxations of mony, then thas should be necessarie to entertaine them. These were the accidents of that yeare both in aly, in Fraunce, and in Spaine, their issues being diverse, as their causes were scuerall.

Now followeth the yeare a thousand fine hundred and thirteene, no lesse full of occurrants 1513 ange and fundric then the other. In the beginning of this yeare, armes ceassed on all parts, for it neither the Venerians molelted others, nor any other moued against them: only the Viceroy siched with three thousand footmen to incampe afore the rocke of Treffa, which immediatly is given ynto him ynder condition that the bodies that were within fhould depart with goods dlife faued. But eueric one vniuerfally was troubled with the confideration of things to come: ry faw that the French king deliuered from forraine armes, and eft foons reincouraged both for : great leavie of Launceknights he had made, and for the increase of his numbers of men at nes, had nothing in so great defire as to recouer the Duchy of Millan: which disposition albevas verie violent in him and no leffe defire to haften the warre whileft the Castles of Millan & emona were yet kept by his fouldiers: yet looking into the great impediments offered by the poling of o manie enemies, & being not yet affired that the king of England would not make ong war against him the next Sommer: he determined to enter into no action, vnlesse he sepaed fome one of the confederates from the common aliance, or elfe to winne to him the amity the Venetians. Of these things, the yeare past gaue him manic hopes, that some one of them ght haply succeede to him: for, at that time that the Bishop of Gurci went from Rome to Islan, he heard graciouslie by the way one of the familiar friends of the Cardinall S. Seuerin sent him from the French Queene, and afterwards he had sent into Fraunce one of his men to ke these overtures: That the king should be bound to aide Casar against the Venetians: That mariage should go forward betweene the second daughter of the king, and Charles nephew Cafar: That to the Daughter should be given in dowriethe Duchy of Millan: That the king ides, should give vp to his Daughter and his future sonne in law the rights he pretended to realme of Naples: And because simple words and promises should not stand to Cefar as a letie, he required that the Daughter might be immediatly put into his hands: And that ven the king should have recovered the Duchie of Millan, Cremona and Gusaradada should to Cafar. The king hoped likewise that he might easily ioyne to him the Venetians, who were talitle angrie at that time that the Viceroy occupied Bressia, but much more for the matters ich afterwards were accorded at Rome betweene Cafar and the Pope: therfore from that time, the king had caused to come secretly to his Court Andrew Gritty, who being taken within Bressa, remained as yet prisoner in Fraunce : he wrought so also, that loh.la. Truulce, in whom the Venetians reposed much, did send to Venice one of his Secretaries under shadow of other affaires: there offered him withall a certaine hope to be able to compound with the king of Aragon, who according to his custome oftentimes to debate in his affaires by the negociation of men religious, had sent secretly into Fraunce two gray Friers, to the end that expressing how they were touched with a confcience and zeale to the common benefite, they might begin to negociate with the Queene in some points, either concerning the peace vniuerfall, or particular betweene the two kings: wherein neuertheleffe there was no great hope, the king knowing well enough that he would still retaine the realme of Navarre, and to him it was a matter of no lesse indignity to leaue abandoned that king, who to reenter into his amity and under hope of his fuccours, was falne into that calamity: but nothing troubled so much the French king as the defire he had to be reconciled to the Swiffers: he knew that vpon their amitie depended his affured victorie, bothfor the great authority that that nation had then got, and their armes no lesse feared, and for that they feemed to be now drawne into a forme of gouernment, not as fouldiers mercenarie, nor mer fauage, but with a wonderfull warineffe and vigilancie, as mentrained vp in a common weak well instituted, and nourished in the administration of estates and managing of affaires, withou fuffering any stirre or leavies to be made but by good counsell and discretion. By this conformi tie of theirs, there was in Swefferland a refort and presence of Embassadours from all Princes is Christendome: the Pope with almost all Potentates payd them yearely pensions, to be received into their confederation, and to have fufferance to leavie for their proper defence in times of ne cessitie, souldiers of that nation. The remembrance of these things made them so proud, that weighing withall how king Charles the eight by their armes had first altered the quiet estate c Italy, and after king Lowys his successour by their valour had conquered the Duchy of Atislan recourred Genes, and ouerthrowne the Venetians, they vsed towards all men an imperious & in " folent behaviour: Amongst the harmes that prosperity bringeth, this is not the least, that it ray of feth men into opinion and weening, and lifteth up their thoughts through vaine and light a es fections, like as birds vie to do, whose naturall lightnesse conuey them to the starres. They conf dered not that the cltate of humane felicitie is subject to emulation, & nothing of more difficult to worldly men then to beare well the height and greatnesse of fortune: and yet the French kin notwithstanding the perswasions of many particulars of that nation, together with his owner pinion that they would stirre and draw into armes for the great offers of money that were made them, was not without hope to win them: his reason was, that albeit such as gouerned Mills having agreed with the Embassadours of the Swiffers in the name of Maximilian Sforce, that I should give them an hundred and fiftie thousand duckets so soone as he had received the posse fion of Millan and the Castles, and pension of sortie thousand duckets eueric yeare for xxv.year taking him into their protection, with couenant to deliuer into his pay bands of their footmenty the Cantons would never ratifierhofe covenants. In which hope, in the beginning of the year present, notwithstanding afore he had in vaine proued to have his Embassadors heard, which I meant to fend to folicite in those affaires, yet to purchase audience in their parliaments, he cou fented to give vp to them frankly and freely the castles of the vale of Lugan and Lugarna: wil so great indignity great Princes sought at that time the amity of that nation. In the end M.Tr moustle with commission from the king came to Lucerna, a place appointed to heare him in pul like affemblie; and albeit he was received with good fliew & countenance, yet he faw he shold c litle good touching the actio of the Duchy of Millan: for that not many dayes before, 6 Cantol hadratified & fublighed the capitulations made with Maximilian Sforce, three had determine to confirme them, and touching the other three, they were not yet refolued: by reason of whi doubts, the Embassador speaking no further of Millan nor the affaires therof, demaunded that least they would aide the king to recour Genes and Ast, matters not comprehended in the cap tulatio made with Maximilian Sforce. And the better to aduaunce that demand, Trinulce ma request that he might be at the parliamet under colour to treat upon affaires particular, where safeconduct was granted to him, but with this codition, that he should not solicite in any matt appertaining to the Frech king: & being come to Lucerna, he was enioyned not to have cofete with Trimouslle, neither in publike nor in private. At last by an universall cosent, the capitulatio ade with the Duke of Millan were ratified by all the Cantons, and all the demaunds of the rench king denied, with this addition, that they would not fuffer any leauies of footmen of that ation to ferue him either in Italy or out of Italy: a matter which made the king desperate of all saor, hope, or amity with that people, and therefore being excluded quite out where he thought to nd some entrance, he saw by considerations of his affaires, that it was necessary for him to be reonciled either to Cefar or the Venetians, who for their parts folicited at the fame time with Cer, for that the fulpition of their reconciliation ceasing in the minds of the confederates, the Biop of Garei confented that they should retaine still Vincenfa: but the same reasons encouraging e Senate which gaue feare to the enemies, they flood vpon this, to make no more peace if Vena were not rendred to them, giving Casar a recompense of a great quantitie of money. This maund seemed to containe difficultie, which made the Venetians to incline so much the more to e Frenchamitie, and in that disposition contracted with the Secretarie of Trisulce to be conlerate with the king, according to the capitulations made betweene, them afore, by the which remona and Guiar adadda should remaine to them. But the Secretarie set downe expresse menn in the capitulation, that that agreement should stand as voyd and of none effect, if within a taine time it were not approved by the king: in whose Councell the disputations were great, nch was most to be desired, either a reconciliation with Casar, or a confederation with the Veuns: Robert Este a Secretarie of great authoritie, Trisulce, and almost all the chiesest of the ouncell proued the necessitie of confederation with the Venetians: They alleaged that which present experience made them to know of the inconstancie of Casar, bringing no small doge to the kings affaires: They ript up the hatred he bare to the king, together with his dilponn to reuenge: They related what they had heard of personages worthie of opinion and credit, oreported how often they had heard him fay in that time, that he kept precifely in minde the nembrance of fenenteene injuries received by the French, and that whenfocuer the oportunity ted him to be renenged of all, he would not loofe the occasion, nor forget the defire: They azed, that these solicitations were practised by him for none other effect, then by the meane of onciliation ful of fraude and ill meaning, to haue a greater way to do harme, or at least to breake that which he knew was practifed with the Venetians, or elfe in his spite, to detract the preations of the warre: Laftly, they game this as a warning and lefton, that that man was neither re excused, nor esteemed worthie of compassion, who being once beguiled by another returneftloones to repole confidence in him: An enemie reconciled, charitie leades vs to loue him, wisedome willeth vs not to trust him; and to a friend once disproued, there can be no greadaunger, then effloones to reenter into confidence with him. The Cardinall of S. Seuerin was nother opinion, who (as his aduersaries said, croffing Triunice more through enuic then for er occasion, for that with his brethren he had alwaies defended the Gebelmfaction in Millan,) ied in the contrarie, that nothing could be more profitable to the king and his feruices, then wing with Colar, to breake the vnion of the enemies, specially the confederation being made uch meanes as they might hope it would last: That it was the propertie of Princes in their nfels and deliberations to preferre alwayes profite afore good will, afore hatred, and afore oaffections: And what greater benefite could be done to Cafar, then to ayde him presently inst the Venetians, with hope that his Nephew should come to succeed in the Duchie of Mil-: That Cafar being separate from the others, the king Catholike would not object against his pritie, as well for the interests of his Nephew, as for other good regards. Moreouer, that as ning could more amaze the Pope then this confederation: so, of the contratte to confederate the Venetians, was full of indignitie, fince there must be accorded to them Cremona and tradadda, members so convenient to the Duchie of Millan, that to recover them, the king. stirred up all the world: and yet if the union of the others were not broken and deuided, the ederation with the Venetians would not suffice to obtain the victorie. At last this opinion cathe King, the rather for the authoritie of the Queene, who defired greatly the advancement TDaughter: onely her defire was accompanied with this condition, to farre forth as it might brained, that till the confummation of the mariage the young Damfell might remaine with and the to bind her faith and promife to keepe her in the name of Cafar, as the spouse assigned is Nephew, to whom the would redeliuer her aftoone as her age and yeares made her able to ull office of mariage. But the King being afterwardes certified that Cefar would not agree under this forme of limitation, but rather that he foisted in those offers for the time & by sutteltie, to detract his diligence, and give him cause to proceede more slowly in his other plots, he brake of from this practife, and sent backe againe fot Monsieur de Asperot brother to Monsieur de Lautreeh, already gone from the Court with his commission to finde the Bishop of Gures. On the other fide, the feare of the vnion betweene the king and the Venetrans increasing dayly, the king o Aragon aduised Casar to render Verona, and to transferre the warre into Burgundie, by the helps of the money which he should receive of the Venetians, and with the Spanish armie. Of this adulf was the Bishop of Gures, who hoping to be able to moue Cafar by his presence now returned into Germanie, being followed not onely of Dom Peter de Vree which was come withhim, bu also of John Baptista Spinella Count of Carriato, Embassadour to the sayd king of Aragon tes dent with the Venetians. And because no new difficulties should breake off the matters that wer now in action; he induced first the Senare to make truce with Casar for the whole monethe March. And those Embassadours gave them their faith that Casar should render Verona, if the would promife him within certaine times two hundred and fiftie thousand duckats, and for yeare ly pension fiftie thousand.

In these alterations of affaires, and in these times so deuided and conspiring, the Pope fell sick and haply he was then more full of high conceits & trauelling thoughts then at any time before for not with standing he had brought his fortune to be equall to his defires, and obtained the thin he aspired vnto, yet his deuises and plots did nothing diminish, but grew increasing by the san meane which should have satisfied them: he had determined in the beginning of the spring ar first opening of the yeare, to send to the enterprise of Ferrara which he so much defined, and opinio was that that state was able to make no refistance, both for that it was naked of all succe and because the Spanish armie was to joyne with his companies. He had secretly bought of Case for the price of thirty thousand duckats, the Citie of Sienna for the behoofe of the Duke of Urb to whom (except Pefera) he would never give anything of the estate Ecclesiastike, to the end referue to himself the whole glory to have simply & only studied for the exaltation of the Churc heagreed to lend to Cafar fortic thousand duckats receiving Modona in gage: he threatned the of Lucqua, who in the heate of the affaires of the Duke of Ferrara, were become Lords of Ga fagnara, making instance that they would deliuer it to him: he was out of conceit with the Car nall of Medicis, for that he thought him to cleaue more to the king Catholike then to him: a because he knew he was not able to dispose of the Citie of Florence as he thought, he studied ready new plots and new practifes to alter that estate: he was ill contented with the Cardinal Sun, from whom he tooke the name of Legate, and enjoyined him to come to Rome, for that the Duchic of Millan he had appropriate to himselfe a yearely rent of more then thirtie thous duckats of the estates & goods of diverse persons. The better to assure the Duke of Vrbin of Sier by intelligences of his neighbours, he had of new taken into his pay Charles Baillon, to chase: of Perousa lohn Paule, who by affinitie was very neare joyned to the sonnes of Pandolfe Petr . ci, successiours to the greatnesse of their father. He would of new create Duke of Genes , Ostan 1 Fregofa, deposing lanus frothat dignitie: an action whereunto did consent the others of the ho: of Fregofa, because for the degree that his auncestours held in that state, it seemed best to app. taine to him. He studied continully either how he might worke out of Italie the Spanish armie r cut it in peeces by the ayde of the Swiffers, whom aboue all others he exalted & embraced. In s deuise he had this intention, that the kingdome of Naples being occupied by him, Italie should maine free fro straungers, a speech that often passed out of his mouth, & to that end he had hind that the Swiffers did not confederate with the king Catholike. And yet, as though it had bin ir s power to batter all the world at one time, he continued his accustomed rigour against the Fre h king, and notwithstanding he had heard a message from the Queene, yet he stirred up to me war, the king of England, to whom he had transferred by publike decree of the Councell of La I the name of Christianissimo, whereof there was already a Bull written, and in it likewise was citained the prination of the dignitic and name of the king of Fraunce, giving his kingdome to to could occupie it. In these conceptions no lesse straunge for their varietie, then great for the im to tance they drew, and perhaps in other thoughts, more fecret & fingular, (for in a minde fo fiere & terrible, all fortes of imaginations how great and vaine so euer they be, are not incredible) after in continuation of his fickneffe for many dayes, he declined towardes death: and feeling the en of mortalitie to haften on, and the fame to preuent the execution of his high thoughtes, he cau-Ito call together the confiftorie, which albeit he could not affilt in person by reason of his dise e, yet by the authoritie of it, he caused to be confirmed the Bull which he had published behe against fuch as by symonic would climbe to the Popedome: He declared that the election of Is fucceffour appertained to the Colledge of Cardinals, and not to the Councell: And that the ordinals schismatikes could have no presence or comunity there, to whom he protested there to rdon the iniuries they had done him, & prayed to God to forgive them the wrongs they had one to his Church After this he befought the Colledge of Cardinals, that in his fauour and for stake, they would graunt to the Duke of Vrbin his Nephew, the Citie of Pefera in patroge or Vicatage, alleaging the confideration, that by meane of the Duke it had bene recovered the Church after the death of lohn Sforce. In no other matter he expressed no private or parular affection: in so much as Madame Felice his daughter (ioyning with her the petitions of any others) befeeching him with great importunitie, to create Cardinall Guido de Montfalabeing her brother by the mothers fide, he answered toundly that he was not worthy of that gree; he made not his affections coformable to their defires: In that last actio of life he shewed partialitie in worldly causes: his present debilitie could diminish nothing of his auncient resotion but expressed in all things the same constancie and seneritie, together with that indgement d force of mind which he had before his ficknesse: in which firme estate and disposition of spie, he received denoutly the offices of the Church, and the xxi day of Februarie he ended his urfe of these mortall and present paines: he was a Prince of incredible constancie and courage, it so full of furie and viruled conceptions, that the reuerence that was borne to the Church, edifcord of Princes, and the condition of times, did more to flay him from his ruine, then eier his moderation or his discretion: worthy no doubt of great glory, if either he had bene a ince secular, or if that care and intention which he had to raise the Church into temporall great-Meby the meane of warre, had bin employed to exalt it by the mediation of peace, in matters irituall: Neuertheleffe he was lamented aboue all his ptedeceffours, & no leffe efterned of those, ho having either lost the true consideration of things, or at least ignorant how to distinguish paize them rightly, judged it an office more duely appertaining to Popes, to increase the inrifction of the fea Apostolike by armes and bloud of Christians, then by good example of life and recuring and correction of corrupt maners, to travell for the faving of those soules, for whom ey giory so much that Iesus Christ hath named them his Vicars in earth.

The Viceroy of Naples who was marched with his Spanish armie towardes Plaisance, conained that Citie to returne under the gouernement of the Dukes of Millan, on whom it deinded by auncient tenure. They of Parma did the like, having the same feare of the Spamsb uldiers, being followed in all places with more terrour then love. On the other fide the Duke of errara, after he had in great speede recoucred the townes of R omagnia, drew neare to Reggia: it finding no stirre nor turnult within the towne, he durst not abide there for feare of the Spanish mie, which lav dispersed betweene Plassance and Reggia. Touching the estate of the Church, creappeared no other stirre nor mouing, and the Citie of Rome nor the Colledge of Cardinals, thone of those difficulties which they had felt in the death of the two last Popes: so that the olequies and funerals being ended according to the accustomed maner, foure and twentie Carnals entred peaceably into the Coclaue, having gravited afore that the Marquis of Matuaes fon hom Pope lulio kept with him for oftage, should be made free and acquited of his faith and proife, with libertie to returne to his father. The first matter that was debated in the Conclave, as with straite articles to moderate the authoritie of the Pope to come, which they sayd the last ope had yfed too immoderately: and yet, as amongft men fome haue not the heart to oppofe gainst a Prince and great Lord, and some defire to enter into his grace and liking: so within small neafter, they dissolved and cancelled of themselves the articles which they had made with so reat aduife, and to so good purpose. The seuenth day they chose Pope without any discord of onsent, the Cardinall of Medicis, who tooks vpon him the name of Leo the tenth: he bare but Creation of xxvij.yeares of age, which albeit was so much the more maruellous & wonderfull, by how much Pope Leo the re election was contrary to custome, yet the young Cardinals were the principall causers of it by tenth, ieir industry, hauing long time afore secretly agreed amongst themselves to create the first Pope ftheir number. The most parts and nations of Christendome rejoyced much at this election, cuery one entertaining an affured expectatio of his vertues, aswel by the present & greene meme rie of the valour of his late father, as for an vniuerfall reputation that went of his owne inclination & liberalities. To this estimation also was joyned a generall opinio of his continencie & life not at tainted together with a gladfome hope that by the example of his father, he would be a further of learning, & beare fauour to wits disposed to study & knowledge. To these hopes was much he ping the maner of the election, being made in his person sincerely, & without symonic or suspice of other corruption. And it feeined that God began to approue and confirme his feate, for that the fourth day after his electio, came into his power the Cardinals of S. Croffe & Senerm, who affoor as they heard of the death of the Pope Iulio, went by seato Rome accopanied with the Embass dour of the Frech king. In their passage they stroke into the hauen of Lyuorno, where understadin that the Cardinall of Medicis was chosen Pope, they tooke lad, the one having confidence in the no turall inclination & clemencie of the Pope, & the other reposing much in the ancient friendship. thrait familiarity had with him & with his brother. There they obtained fafecoduct of the Captain of Lynorna, which albeit stretched no further the the bounds of his jurisdictio, yet without seekir other furety, they went yp in that condence to Pt/a: in which citie they were honotably receive & afterwards in no leffe affurace coueyed to Florence, where they were kept with that eafie & f. uorable gard, that they had no dispositio to depart: the same being the desire of the Pope, who se to them the Bishop of Ornietto, to exhort them with wordes gracious and full of affection, that a well for their proper furctie, as for the present tranquilitie of the Church, they would abide at Fl rence untill the Court had determined in what maner they should come to Rome. He willed the also, that whereas they had bene judicially deprined, and their deprination confirmed in the Cou cell of Latra, they should forbeare to go in habites of Cardinals, to the end that expressing sign of humiliation, he might take the better occasion to reduce and redresse their affaires according to their defire and his determination. The first act of this new Pope was his Coronation, whi was represented according to the viage of his predecessions in the Church of S. Iohn de Latra The pompe was so great both of his famulie and his Court, and also of the Prelates and mult tudes that were there, together with the popular and vniuerfall affemblies of peoples, that by t opinion and judgement of men, the pride and maiestie of that action did farre surpasse all the c lebrations that had bene done in Rome fince the tyrannies of the Gothes and fauage nations. this folemnitie the Genfalone of the Church was caried by Alfonso d'Este, who having obtained fulpention of his Centures and paines, was come to Reme, with great hope that by elemencie as facilitie of the Pope, he should be able to compound for his affaires. The Gonfalone of the religi of Rhodes was borne by Iulio de Medicis mounted upon a stately Courser armed at all points: his nature he bare an inclination to the profession of armes, but by destinie he was drawen to t life Ecclefiaftike, in which eftate he may ferue as a wonderful example of the variation of fortu One matter that made the memorie of that day wonderfull, was the confideration, that the po fon that then in fo high and rare pompe was honored with the most supreme and soueraigne di nitie of the world, was the yeare before, and on the very fame day, miferably made prisoner: t great magnificence that appeared upon his person, and his expences, confirmed in the generali & multitude of men, the expectation that was had of him, every one promifing that Rome that be happy under a Pope fo plentifully indued with the vertue of liberalitie, wherof that day he h giuen an honorable experience, his expences being aboue an hundred thousand duckats. But w men defired in him a greater grauitic and moderation: they judged, that neither fuch a maieflie pompe was couenient for Popes, neither did the coditio of the present time require, that he shou

To unprofitably disperse the treasures that had bin gathered by his predecessour to other uses. Tripolition of But fuch was the disposition of Princes to warre, that neither the chaunging of the Pope, n the presence nor seare of other accidents, were sufficient to establish and assure the tranquilitie Italie: cuery one discerned, that things of their proper inclination tended more to warre then peace: for Cafar would heare no more speaking of the rendring of Verona, fearing thereby to deprined of all oportunitie and meane to have any case entry into Italie. And albeit the tru was prolonged for the full moneth of Aprill, yet he kept no reckening of the conditions of accol that had bene debated at Millan: and in that minde being discontented with the instance all importunities of the king Catholikes Embassadours, he stucke not totell the Count of Carri

an Embaffador of Venice then of Spaine. But that which much more augmented this disposition, was the truce that was made for a whole yeare betweene the French king and the king Catolike, tending onely to the affaires on the other side the mounts: the oportunity of which truce use to the French king (being now deliuered of the suspitions of Spaine) a great facility to retwee the warre in the Duchic of Mallan.

The king Carholike had neuer any disposition to have warre with the Frenchmen beyond Mounts, for that being not mightie enough in money and treasure, and therefore depending the forces and aydes of the Barons & peoples of Spaine, either he had no readinesse of succors, else by his necessities in times of warre, they would hold him with them as it were in subjecti-: but then principally he stood confirmed in his ancient counsell, for that together with his one tranquility and rest, he was so much the more assured of the realme of Navarre newly quered by him: & withall for that fince the death of Queene Ifabell, his absolute authority ouer falle being embased into a governement limited, he had not in troubled scasons so great and neauthority: of this he had seene a late experience in the action of the kingdom of Nauarre, hereinalbeit he had an end happie and honourable, yet it hapned not by other meane then by negligence and flownesse of succours. And having no more defire to returne to the dauns which he had fuffered, and not knowing yet of the Popes death, he agreed to the truce. ich neuerthelesse was not published before he had received newes of the election of the new pe. The better to instifie himselfe of this valooked for deliberation, he alleaged that the Pope I the Venetians had behaved themselves towards him cleane contrarie to the league : for that e the battell of Rauenna they neuer offered to pay to him the forty thousand duckets as they re bound whilest the French king possessed any thing in Italy: That only he had had care of the mmon benefite of the confederates, and yet had not attributed to himfelfe the rewards of the mon victorie: That he did not possesse in Italy so much as a small tower more then that he Ibefore the warre: But the Pope had had regard to his benefit particular, and made proper to iselfe the things that were common: That he occupied Parma, Plaisance and Reggia, and trished a continual studie to possesse Ferrara: which couetousnesse of his had bene the onely pediment of the recovering of the Castles in the Duchy of Millan and the Lanterne of Genes: It touching his part, he had interposed all his diligence and authority to worke the accord beene Cafar and the Venetians, but the Pope for his proper interests, laboured to exclude them of the league: wherein he faid his Embassadours had behaued themselves yndiscreetly, who confenting (for that they knew fuch was his intention) that he was named in the head of the sederation, had suffered him to be expressed in that article wherein everie one named the federates, of which the Venetians were not. Moreouer, that in those negociations and practihe Venetians had not answered the opinion that men had of their wisdome and discretion, ding fuch an estimation and account of Vincensa, that the seare to lose it, hath kept them from uering themselves from the travels of the warre: That it was impossible to him to nourish armiche had in Italy without the payes and contributions that were promised, and much lesse onable to fulfaine the whole warre vpon the confines of his realmes, a matter which he knew ne residue did desire and procure: That the Pope could no more dissemble his desire and inion to take from him the kingdome of Naples: And yet notwithstanding, neither these preinjuries, nor the confideration of other wrongs could ever move him to have a thought to ndon the Church and the other estates of Italy, so farre forth as he might find in them a reaible correspondencie to contract and capitulate with himfor their common defence: a matter ch he hoped they would be moued vnto, the rather by the oportunity and meane of this e. He caused to expresse in the instrument of the truce the names of Casar and the king of land, not with standing he had nothing communicated with them: and therfore it was a thing : scorneful & ridiculous, that at the same time that the truce was solemnly published through arts and regions of Spaine, a Herald arrived even in the action frothe king of England, to fig. to him the strong preparations & furnitures of war which he leavied to inuade Fraunce foing that he would like wife enter into the warre against the king on the coasts of Spaine, accorto the a ticles and promises reciprocally passed betweene them.

he truce made in this maner, amazed much in Italy the minds of fuch as had any discontentt with the rule or intridiction of the Frenchmen, euerie one holding it almost for certaine, that the French king would not be long ere he fent an armie on this fide the Mounts: & alfo the by the obstinacy of Cafar touching the coditions of the peace, the Venetians wold iown withhis against whom it seemed a very hard matter to be able to resist, for that the Spanish army hadner no more meane to be entertained, not with flanding they had at times drawne some summess money out of the estate of Millan, which stood greatly impouerished with continual expens, Touching the new Pope, men could not discerne what was his intention: he seemed to wish. cretly that the power of the French king should have his ends and limits within the Alper; & 12 being newly ascended to the Popedonie, and no lesse consused then the others, for the truce it was made by the king Catholike, in a time when men had greatest expectation that he worl apply his thoughts to the warre, he was in great doubt and variation of mind: befides, he was: grie, for that demanding with great inflance the restitutio of Parma & Plaisance to the Chur. he found a readinesse of hope and promise, but verie slow dispositions to execute and perfort, all the others defiring to preserve them to the Duchie of Millan, and haply hoping that his des to recover them, would induce him to the defence of that state. The Swiffers seemed to be a me certaine and a more mightie defence and succour, but because the summes of mony, which acc. ding to the couenants were necessarie to wage and leavy them, could not be advanced neitt by Alaximilian Sforce nor the residue, there was great seare, that in greatest necessitie tt nation would refuse to descend to the rescue of Millan.

On the other fide, the French king after he had finished the truce, determined to send an are into Italy, the reasons afore recited giving him great hope of the victorie. To those reasons also added the propertie of his owne judgement upon the people of Millan, who, yexed with fo m 7 taxes and imposts of the Swillers, and no leffe troubled with the harbouring and payes made the Spaniards, he knew had an universall defire to returne eftfoons under his obedience: he thered by generall argument, that having now compared the heavie yoke of others with the sie imperie of the French, the seuerity of the one would make the other lesse contemnible: d particularly he understood by many Gentlemen, some relating to himself, and some entertaing intelligence with Trivulce, whom the king had fent to Lyon, the better to debate with their Millan, that he was not to deferre to fend an armie, having their promife to take armes and b s affoone as his armie were passed the Mounts. To these furtherances the king wanted no for if continual perswasions, as well of Trinulee, as of others that were banished, who according fuch as be depriued of the libertie of their naturall countrie, omitted no reasons which mit make the enterprise seeme easie, specialliethe Venetians being brought to joyne with him is to action. But the matter that enforced the king to make hafte, was the confidence he had to :uent with the end of that expedition, the beginning of a warre which the king of England II at to make upon him, which yet he could not begin till after certaine moneths; both for that it kingdome having lived many yeares in peace, was upon the sodaine disfurnished of armes 8 1mour, of artilleries, and almost of all other necessarie ablements of warre; and also in great was horses of service, for that to the inhabitants of those regions, the service on foot is more far ", then to make warre on horsebacke: &alfo the footmen lacking training and experience, the ig of England was contrained for the better strength & abilitie of his armie, to leavie a great out to of Almain footme: matters which could not be dispatched without great tract of time. The I sh king in like fort made more hafte to have his army to march, for that he feared the castles & tces that held for him wold be loft for want of victuals, but specially the Lanterne of Genes, with not many daies before had miffed to be relicued with victuals by a ship sent for that effect: with from Arbinga being thither accompanied with three ships & one gallion, being entred then no fea with a good wind, had by a strainable gale passed through the midt of the Genoways flic, & coming neare the castle of the Lanterne, she cast anker, & throwing yet with good success et cables to those of the castle, she bega to valade her victuals & munitions which she had brou 👯 but euen in the action, and before the desolate soules of the Castles could take the fruit of the nefite which their fortune seemed to offer, Andrew Doria, he who afterwards was so notal in marine service, thrust in with a great ship, wherofhe was owner, betweene the castle of the unterne and the French ship, and cutting asunder the cable that was cast to the of the Castle, the cables that held the ankers, he fet youn the ship with no lesse felicitie then perill, and albeit i the fight he was wounded in the face, yet by his valour he wan and carried away the ship. The ing

herefore being determined not to deferre the beginning of the warre, in which respect, and to pereadie in all occasions, he had already fent many launces into Burgundy and Dauphine, he hought good now to hearken with diligence after the matter debated upon fo many moneths vith the Venetians. They had bene somewhat deferred & prottacted as well by the one as by the ther party, both for that sometimes the hope to have peace with Cafar, & sometimes the great ultance made by the Venetians for Cremona and Guiaradadda, had holden the king in suspence: nd also in the Senate the opinions of Counsellers were diverse, for that many of great authority n that common weale, preferred the accord with Cafar: wherein they shewed that it would be nore profitable to discharge themselues for the present of so huge expences, with freedome fro aungers, thereby to be the more ready to imbrace the occasions that wold offer, then their comnon weale being to ouer-wearied and tranelled, & the wealth of prinate men abated, to entande themselues with new watres in company of the French king, whose amitic how faithfull and flured it was, they were not without a late and greene experience. Neuerthelesse the greater art feeming that rarely an occasion would rife to make them reconer their ancient estate, & that ne agreement with Cafar (he retaining Verona) would not deliuer them from troubles and daners, they rejected all thoughts and denifes for Cremona and Guiaradadda, and refolued to make onfederation with the Frenchking, in whose Court it was concluded by Andrew Gritti reprenting already more the person and place of an Embassador then of a prisoner. By this confedetion, after it was graunted that Bart. Aluiano and Andrew Gruts should be set at liberty, the enersans were bound to aid the king with eight hundred men at armes, a thousand fine hundred the horsmen, and ten thousand tootmen, and that against all such as would rise up to let him for eouering of Ast, of Genes, and the Duchy of Willan. The king for his part was bound to joyne ith them untill they had recourted all that they possessed in Lombardy and the Marquisdome Trensfana, afore the league of Cambray. Vpon the resolution of this contract, John lacques riunlee and Bart. Aluuno went to Sufo: the one to go from thence to Venice by the more re way, and the other to affemble there the armie appointed for the warre. It contained vpon e full muster fifteene hundredlaunces, eight hundred light horsmen, & fisteene thousand fooren, wherof eight thousand were Launceknights, & the residue of the French nation. This armie as committed to the authoritie and guiding of Al. Trimouille, whom the king appointed his ieutenant, to the end the action might proceed with more reputation.

In this time the French king made great request to the Pope not to hinder him in recovering s Duchie of Millan: and the better to containe the Pope, he offered that he would not onely or passe further after the victorie, but also would alwayes referre himselfe to him to make peace ider what conditions it should please him best. To which motions albeit the Pope gaue graciis & willing eare, and that to draw better faith to his words, he yied to folicite with the king by e meane and labour of lulian his brother, yet many things made him suspected with the king: If the memorie of things done afore the time of his Papacie: then fince he was Pope, how he Id fent to him Cinthio his familiar and fauorite with letters & very friendly commissions, but so nerall as they well declared the litle inclination of mind he bare to him or his affaires: also for athe had confented that Profp. Colonno should be elected Captaine generall ouer the Duchy of tillanta matter which his predecessor had alwayes hindred for the hatred he bare to the family Colonno: he entred also into greater doubt by a fignification which the Pope addressed to the ng of England to continue still in the confederation made with Cafar, with the king Catholike him:laftly, he wrote to the communalties of the Swiffers, exhorting them almost to the deace of Italie, whrein he could not diffemble that he wold continue with them the confederatimade by his predecessour, by the which they were bound to the defence of the estate Ecchallicke, receiuing of him a yearly penfion of twentie thouland duckets: it was also a figne his will and intention, that he had not received into grace the Duke of Ferrara, but by maexcuses deferred to render to him Reggia vntill his brother the Cardinall came to Rome, ho to anoyde the perfecutions of Pope Iulio, was withdrawne into the countrey of Hunria, and lived you his Bishopricke of Agria. But the matter that above all other things made e king enterinto fuspition against the Pope, was, that he had in great secrecie counselled the to of Venice to come to accord with Cefar: a matter cleane contrarie to the intention of the lig: who also had interpreted in ill part, that the Pope declaring that he moued not for other take armes, but rather to expresse a disposition to finish the warre with some honourable con. polition; a matter which the king would not have blamed, if for the same defire to peace. had also declared to the king of England, that he ought not to make warre vpon the French kin. Defreof Pope Sure this suspition of the king was not without cause, for that the Pope defired that the Fren Leers chafe the might be cut off from all seate and habitation in Italy, either for that he thought it more pretable for the common suretie, or for the greatnesse and advancement of the Church : or at let that he kept still fixed in his mind the remembrance of harmes received by the Crownef Fraunce, whereunto albeit his father and other his predecessours had borne no litle affecti. and in fundrie accidents had reaped many honours and profites; yet it was an iniurie fresh in nmorie, that his brethren and he had bene expulled Florence by the comming of king Charl: and that the king traigning bearing fauour to the popular gouernement, had either alwayes. iected them, or if at any time he shewed inclination to them, it was to vie them as instrumes to draw the Florentines by that suspition to couenants of more aduantage for himselfe, with t bearing respect or care to them. To this perhaps was much helping, a disdaine that he was t prisoner to Millan after the battell of Ranenna, and by the kings commaundement shod have bene catied in that calamitie into Fraunce. But whatsoever was the disposition of e Pope, or how focuer his conjecture was caried for these or other causes, he proceeded aduise and diffembled as much as he could his intention, for that both he faw he had not fo fire foundations to refift, as he wished, and also he gaue eare dayly with great affection to the maunds and complaints made against the king : for the Swiffers bearing an vniuerfall inclin. onto stirre and rife for the defence of the Duchy of Millan, offered to enter into the adn with a farre greater number then before, so farre forth as they were furnished in press with a taine summe of money, which for the pouettie and weakenesse of others, could not be ho d for otherwise then of the Pope. Touching the Viceroy, his counsels were uncertaine, and his sy ches seuerall and suttle, for that sometimes he offered the Pope to oppose against the Frenchis, not sparing to enter openly into the cause, by sending his bands of souldiers to joyne with I, and waging for three moneths a great number of footmen, and the rather to accompanie his ings with faith and credite, he caused to be retired his souldiers from the townes of Parma d Reggia, and lay incamped with his armie vpon the river of Trebia, leaving not with standing . taine bands of his fouldiers for the gard of Tortona and Alexandria, such as had not stirred in thence: fometimes also be did assure that he had received commaundement from his king, d that at the fame time that he wrote to him of the truce, to leade backe the armie to the kingdie of Naples. But lerome Vich Embassador resident with the Pope, yield other speeches, and ye is agreed with him in this, that his king promifed, so farre forth as the Pope would take vpon n the defence of Millan, to begin the warre in Fraunce, without bearing respect to the truce it had bene made: a libertie which he faid he might lawfully take without making violation e is faith promised. Therefore it was beleeued of many, that the king Catholike, fearing that by to truce that had bene made not one would appeare to oppose against the French king, had esmaunded the Vueroy, that if he faw none would proceed roundly to the defence of the lichy of Millan, that he should not seeke to prouoke the French king by new injuries, it should retire his armie to Naples: for which cause also he showed to the king a contentmet o heatken to the peace, offering withall to bring in Calar and the king of England. And to nice him the more tractable if he should recouer the Duchie of Millan, he made almost an affid promife, that his armie should be no impediment to him: so that the Viceror who was determed to go his way, renoked the fouldiers that were under the Marquis of Pergunero in Alexanta and Tortona. & at the same time, as was said, did communicate his resolution to Triunke to to end his departing might be more acceptable to the French king: neuerthelesse he did not exe to so speedily his deuise, forthat the Swiffers very desirous to defend the Duchie of Min, had fent thither by common confent five thousand footnen, and given hope to supplie the 1uice with a greater number : but making demonstration of the contrarie, he sent Prosper Connoto debate with the Swiffers of the place where they should assemble against the French :ther that he had received advertisement that the truce was discontenting to Casar, or else at he was enjoyned by new commissions fro his king to follow the will of the Pope, who perseuted Il in the fame perplexities, suffering a conflict betweene his small hope and his proper inclinain: and yet notwithstanding the Swiffers being come vpon the tetritories of Tortona, where rofter had fignified to them that the Viceroy would come and loyne with them, interpoling any excules, he labored then to come vpo the lands of Trebia to joyne with him, By which marof folicitation, they finding a diversity betweene his will and his words, made this brave anere, that the Viceroy made no fuch demand to the end to go looke the enemies in the face, but turne their backes with greater furety: they fayd they cared not whether he feared to fight th the Frenchmen or not, neither did it import them, whether he went away, or whether he tad still, whether he followed, or whether he fled, for that their valour onely did suffice to defend e Duchy of Millan against all enemies.

to Ast without any impediment, & after into Alexandria, all those bands of Frenchmen which men in the creparted from Sufa, marching with great diligence. The Duke of Millan who was come fom-hat too late to enter Alexandria, joyned himselfe to the Swiffers neare Tortona, and they being Millan. ade to understand by the Viceroy that he was determined to go his way, retired to Nouaro . He was tractable according to the condition of his prefent fortune, d with a mind humbled with the confideration of his miferies that were towards, he accepted llingly their excuse, recommending to them with words of great affection and zeale to have a aritable care over the fafety of the common countrie. Vpon this occasion Sacromoro Viscounto whom was appointed the belieging of the Caltle of Millan, turned to the French, and reuicued the Castell which he was fent to batter and beate. The Viceroy brake up from Trebia with his armie, which was twelue hundred men at armes and eight thousand footemen, to rerne to the kingdome of Naples, as though the affaires of Lombardy had bene desperate: a ason only wherein he sought to saue his armie; but receiving the same day in the way betweene laifance and Florenzola letters from Rome, he caused immediatly the Ensignes to march backe aine, returning to the fame lodging from whence he was departed : the cause was, that the ppe, to whom almost at the same time were rendred Plassance and Parma, determining to oucif the Duchy of Millan might be defended by the force of the Smiffers, gaue very le- The Pope feretely to Ierome Moron the Dukes Embasfador remayning in his Court, forty two thousand desh mony to ickats to fend to the Swiffers: but with this charge, that if the matter came to the knowledge the Swiffers. others, he should give out, that twenty thousand of them were upon the accompt of their infions, and the other twentie two thou land to fatisfie a pretended due to the three Cantons his predecessor, but alwayes resused to be payed by him. This returning of the Viceroy ith his army, together with a brute of the descending of new companies of the Smillers, ade the Olillanois eftsoones forie for their sudden revolting, and in that confusion betweene new hope and their old feare, they gaue tokens to Maximilian Sforce their Duke, that they ould be readic to returne to his obedience, when so ever they saw the Smillers and the Spanish mie loyne together in the field. And the more to nourish them in these hopes, the Viceroy, ith whom was Profer Colomo, prepared to plant a bridge upon Paw, promiting from ne to time to passe ouer, but neuer did put it in effect, for that having a speciall care to sauchis mie, he determined to proceede according as things fell out: he held it very dangerous to have e Frenchmen in his face, and the Venetian army at his backe, who having already taken the ity of Cremona, and call downe the bridge into the bottome of Pam, were not farre from him . y this was Bart l. Aluiano gone from Snfa to Venuce: where after he had in open Councell withtrany contradiction, cast vpon the Count Petillano the fault of the overthrow of Guiaralidia, he spake very proudly of the present warre, and by the Senate was chosen Captaine geneCartaine geCartaine gethat foure yeares before he fell into the power of the enemies: so often doth fortune laug it the ignorance of mortall men, denifing in their vaine fancies what shall happen vnto them . [. foone as he was chosen Generall, he went to the army that was mustering at S. Boniface vin the demaines of Verona, Theodore Triunlee was with him as Lieutenant to the French kg with whom he drewe neare in great diligence to the gates of Verona the felfe same day in the French armie parted from Sufa: the reason of this expedition was, that in that City certie factions had conspired to receive him in : but the day after, a strength of five hundred Law: knights entred the towne by the river of Adice, by which impediment together with the tection of the conspiracy, Aluiano loosing all hope to prevaile, determined, contrary to the thority of the Venetian affiftant, to draw towards the river of Pam, either to Stoppe the Sp. ards, or else according to the state and behaviour of things, to ioyne with the Frenchamiles resolution which he did not imparte to the Senate, vntill he was gone from Verona one bayte or that notwithstanding he alleaged, that the whole depended upon that which should success in the Duchy of Willan, and that there the affaires of the Frenchmen being in ill conding whatfocuer should be attempted or obtained in any other place would be but vaine and a durable, and therefore it was necessary by all possible meanes, to helpe to make the French lig victorious: yet he feared (and not without cause) that the Senate would be against it, no much for the defire he had that there should be first a care to recouer Verona and Breffings for that certaine other of the Captaines allowed not that they should passe the river of Mary vnlesse they had first a more particular knowledge of the proceedings of the French: when they shewed, in case of any inconvenience, how hard it would be to retire in safety, havin o passe by the confines of Verona and Mantua, countries either subjected, or at the denotics Cafar . Valeggia and the towne of Pesquiero, fearing the threates of Aluiano, yeelded the keib Pelquiero selues to him, by whose example also the Castel-keeper gane up the Rocke, his scare b g greater then that any hope could affure him: onely he received by composition a small fur to of money aswell for himselfe, as also to be shared amongst certaine Launceknights that ve within it. About the same time certaine of the chiefetaines of the Mountaine, entred into Br in infauour of the Venetians with a great strength of peafantes: and yet Aluiano, neither so e requelts of the Breffian Embassadors which came to him to Gambaro, nor at the defire o e Venetian Affistant, could not be brought to consent to go thither and remaine there o y one day, to recouer the Castle that was kept in the name of the Viceroy, so great was is defire to follow without intermission his first deliberation. With which celerity being one to the gates of Cremona, he found that at the same time Galeas Paluoisin (called by certain if (remona) was entred in fauour of the French king: but having in him no leffe ambition 1 valour, and not liking that any other should participate with him in the glory of that action e brake and put to pray his bands of fouldiers, and entring the towne, he stripped Cafar Fitmosqua that was left there in garrison with three hundred horse and fine hundred scotein of the Duke of Millans. He had not to lose time to recouer the Castle, for that it had bene wayesholden by the French king, and newly reuictualled a litle before by Ranfe de Cere: wh is he returned to Crema where he was appointed gouernour, he brake a troupe of two hund horsemen of Alexander Sforce, which he encountred at Serzana. From thence Aluiano camping at the channell upon Paw with the bridge made to passe ouer, he could not le is fouldiers to do infolencies lometimes vpon the lands of the Pope, his discipline not being: to containe the men, who had as great custome in spoyling as in well serving. Afterward e marched to Pisqueton, having already for the mutation of Cremona, Soncino, Lody, and ther places there aboutes, aduanced the French Enfignes. But afore, associate had reucred Cremona, he had fent to Bressia, Ranse de Cere with one parte of the men of was both to affure that Citie, and to recouer the Castell, but much more to hinder the good !cesse of the Almains : for that almost assoone as he was broken up from before Cremit, Rocand Captaine of the Launceknights, and Feder Gonfago de Boffolo issuing out of Verona v h fixe hundred horse and two thousand sootemen, were gone to S. Bomface, where Aluiano d left under Sigismond Canallo and John Fortin, three hundred light horsemen and fixe huncd footemen and they being scattered in the countrey without all discipline and order, hearg of the comming of the enemies, were fled to Colorguo, where the Launceknights follow g

Afterwards their furie redoubling with their fortune, ney executed the like cruelty upon Soano, and brake downe the bridge which the Venetians ad made ouer Adice: yea they had with the fame rigour occupied Vincenfa, if a great strength f peafants had not fuddenly entred: which maner of actions in that kind of cruelty were fo much ie more feared, by how much the brute ranne, that there came to Verona new Supplies of foote-

This action was aduanced with the benet of a great occasion, by reason of a discord hapned a little before betweene the Fiefquois and the tuke of Genes, with whom they were at first confederate against the family of the Adornei. This as the manner of the accident: either for some quarrell that hapned by chaunce, or for some spition that could not be tempered, lerome the son of lohn Lowis Fiefqua, comming out of the ommon pallace, was staine by Lodomike and Fregofin, the Dukes brothers: for which miurie, the olence being greater then their ability to reuenge, Othobon and Simbald his brethren, retiring to eir Castels, and a little after contracting with the French king, and conspiring with the Adornes, proched neare to Genes by another way with foure thousand footemen. The Duke was not ighty enough of hunselfe to make resistance against both the families of Fiefqua and Adorna yned together, and by the celerity and diligence of his aduerfaries, the fuccours which he had manded of the Viceroy, could not ariue in time. And as one aduerfity draweth on another, and cuill comes ynaccompanied, so the thing that in this condition of fortune, did wholly embase m, was, that a thousand of his footemen, who were possessed of the mountaines neare the towne, ere ouerthrowne, their weakenesse being notable to resist the calamity that his destiny did isten on. In which aduersity or persecution of fortune, the Duke together with Fregolin, hang scarce leasure to saue his owne life, fled away by sea, leaning Lodowike his other brother to udthe Castell. In which oportunity the victors entred Genes, where the bretheren of the faily of Fielqua caried with turious defires of reuenge, murdred and cruelly caused to be drawne a horse taile, Zachary the Dukes brother, who had bene taken in the encounter vpon the mounines, and was present with the others at the slaughter of their brother : and so Genes being duced to the denotion of the French king; Anthonia Adorna was created governour in the me of the king, and as the French Nauie by sea, remictualled the Lanterne, and afterwards sacd Specia, and then roade at Pertouenere: fo there now remained no more but Nouaro and ma, to make perfect the kings conquest, and recovering of all those estates which he had lost eyeare before: onely those two Cities through the whole Duchy of Millan, held out yet for taximilian Sforce.

But the glory of this warre was referued to the great infamie of all others, not to the French Novarobeen, not to the Almaine footemen, not to the Spanish regiments, nor to the Venetian bands: but fieged by the was an honour, a reputation, a tenowme, and perpetuall praise prepared by destiny for the French. reffers only, against whom the French army, having first left sufficient garrison within Alexania, the better to affure those peeces that were beyond Pam, drew neare to Nauare, brauing in extarrogancy of fo many happy successes, boatling of the enemies whom they had inclosed thin the wals, & contemning the manifest feare of the Spaniards . Besides, there seemed to preat to the meniory of men, as it were an image and reprefentation of things that had bene paf-1: That that was the same Nouaro wherein Lodowike Sforce father to the Duke raigning, was ade prisoner: That in the French campe were the same leaders, Trimouille, and Triullee: yea rtaine of the same Ensignes and Captaines of those Cantons, which in another war had sold the ther, did now accompany the fon in this warre: This made Monsieur Trimouille write proudly the king, that he would fend to him prisoner, the son from the same place where he had deliuedinto captiuity the father: The Frenchmen didviolent executions vpon the wals of Nanaro ith their artillery, but in a place of no leffe difficulty then danger to discend into the towne. ndfor the Swiffers', they contemned them so much, and shewed to have so little feare of eir valours, that they would never suffer to be shut that gate of the towne that was towards the campe. After the artillery had beaten downe to the earth, a sufficient space of the wall, the a my without prepared furioufly to the affault, but finding fo valiant refishance within, and vnde standing they did presently expect Altosaszo a Captaine of great renowne with a farre great supply, they doubted of the successe of the enterprise, which made them the day following to re the from the wals of Nouaro two miles, hoping afterwards to carry the victory more by the di orders and wants of the enemies, then by fortune or the furie of their armes. They hoped to more by temporifing then by present action, & looked that other accidents would make easiet enterprise which was almost desperate to their valour. But these hopes were made vaine by ther solute mind of Motin one of the Swiffers Captaines, who calling together all the bands of soldie Castaine Mo- vpon the market place of Novaro, encouraged them with words full of resolution, and affurance tinto the Swift that without tarying for the fuccours of Altofa/20, who was to arrive the day following, the should iffue out and set upon their enemies in their campe: he told them how farre it was contra to their honour, and reputation of their valour, to fuffer the glory and victory which they mig appropriate to themselves, to become common, or rather wholly transferred to another: se ing (faith he) that as things that follow draw with them fuch as go afore, and the increasing any thing concreth the part that is augmented, so the merit and praise of this warre would not cast your vs, but you the supplies that came after: By how much the enterprise may seeme ha " and perillous, by to much the iffue is to be confidered more case and sure, for that the more su "den and vnexpected are accidents, the more do they terrifie and amaze the men that fuffer their "The Frenchmen will rather doubt all other things at this hower then to be charged by vs, as "yet where they lye incamped, they cannot but suffer disorder, the place being neither intre "ched nor fortified. pectation and common viage of all men: And fince we are upon the territories of Nonaro, the ce it lelfespeakes to vs, that in other fort we can not quench the auncient infamie we got here, the pay and seruice of Lodowske Sprce: It is a double honour to be reuenged of infamie: It is a ,, e infirmitie in a man of warre, to fuffer the reparation of honour to be more flow then the in-,, nie, and to refuse to recouer the reputation lost, is to be guiltie of the slaunder and to confirme, disposition most base in the minde of a souldier, who of all other fortes of men ought to be, offications of his honor. Let vs go on then in the name of the great God, the perfecuter of schif-,, tikes, excommunicants, & all enemies to his name: Let vs march on to a victorie no lesse easie, n affured, if we have not mindes to feare the thing we have not proved : And by how much ,, · danger feemeth great, by fo much shall our name be made glorious, and the greater our eneesbe in number, the more shall we be enriched by their spoyles: Things got with most difficulare of most merite, and where is hope of honour, pray, and perpetuall prayse, what can be wan-, to prouoke fuch as you are to the fight? At these speeches of Alorin all the bands of souldiers began to rejoyce, every one approving deuile by holding up his hand: he commaunded them to go to rest, and to cherish somewhat ir persons, the better to fall into array when the drum should strike. The nation of Swiffers nemade a more braue, nor more resolute counsell, being but a few in number, without horsmen, without artilleries, against an armie most mightie in men, munitions, horses, & all other things ete for defence. Besides, they stood not desperate for any necessitie, for that both Novaro deliuered from daunger, and they expected the day after a great firength of fouldiers: They de rather a choile of this way wherein the furetie was leffe, and the hope of glory greater, then other, that for a greater fafetie there might happen to them a leffe glory. The fixt day of June out midnight they issued out of Novaro, bearing mindes lesse affected to safetie then to glory: r whole ffrength was about ten thousand men, who were so distributed and disposed, that sethousand were appointed to charge the artillery which was garded by the Launceknights, the due were to be beflowed with their pikes an end vpright oner against the men at armes. The nehmen, what for the shortnesse of the time, or that they doubted no such accident, or at least ted not for it fo foone, had made no fortification of their campe: and albeit at the first tumult alarme that their fentinell made of the comming of the enemies, the fuddennesse of the adueand the darkneffe of the night, brought vpon them a great feare and confusion: yet both the 1 at atmes drew forthwith into flrength, and prefented themselues in battel-ray, and also the inceknights who were followed with the other bands of footemen, fell presently into order. artilletic shot off with great noyse against those squadrons of Swiffers that came to assayle it, ing lamentable slaughters, and deutiding their places and rankes, which was rather discerned desired by hecryings of men, then by the benefite of the eyes, the vie whereof was taken away by the Swiffers. inesse of the night. Neverthelesse, such was their desperate resolution, that neither respecting r death prefent, nor difcouraged with the flaughter of their fellowes flaine at their feete, and all these daungers not once breaking their order, they ranne as fast as they could upon the artie:and being come to it, the Launceknights and they had together a bloudy medly, the one ting against the other with an unappeasable furie, which in them both was so much the more subled by how much in the one was infinite the humour of hate, and in the other no leffe regre the defite of glory. There might have bene seene (for now the sunne began to shew) the leand divertitie of the fight, fometimes one fide to yeeld, fomtimes the other: oftentimes that to seeme to preuaile which earst was thought to have the worst, on one side, and in one time one battell to fway, and the other to aduaunce, fome to expect aduauntage, fome to lofe eportunitie, one part to inuade furiously, and another part to refilt hardly, all things on all sfull of dead bodies, wounded men, and of bloud: fometimes the Captaines would valiry enter into the office of fouldiers, both striking their enemies and defending themselues, and times they would discreetly manage the place of Captaines, encouraging, prouiding, succou-14, relieuing, and commaunding: there was nothing leffe feared then death, nor any thing more pried the feare: the greatnesse of the perill made both sides more resolute the any other thing. the other fide the troupes of men at armes flood firme without doing any feruice, for neither juthoritie, the perfuations, the commaundements, the exclamations, the threatnings, nor the uple of Trunce and Trimonille, could do any thing to moue the horsemen, whose mindes

were already made timerous: neither the confideration of their owne perill, (which the cowardise made the greater) nor the calamities of their fellowes (which were redoubled b the feare they shewed) could once draw them to the charge: they seemed to stand and abic the daunger which by fighting they might have avoided: it sufficed the Swiffers to keepe the impaled in their rankes, and to let them from ministring succours to the sootemen: such w the calamitie of that fight, that those found most certaintie of perill who ventured furthessf their safetie, and on such whose seare was greater then their valour, fortune threw most fauour as fecuritie. At last in so great a hardinesse and valour of such as fought, the vettue of the Swiffers c ried the battell, who having wonne the artilleries, turned them vpon their enemies, whom the put to flight aswell by that meane as by their incredible vertue. To the flying of the sootemen w. ioyned the breaking and running away of the men at armes, who in that fernice shewed no vetue, nor did any thing worthy of merite or prayle: onely the Lord Robert la March caried w a vehement affection of a father, entred the battell of the Swiffers with a squadron of horsemen. rescue Florango and James his sonnes, Captaines of Almaine sootmen, who lying fore wound on the earth, his valour to the great wonder of the Swiffers, drew them a live out of that datger. The battell continued about two houres, both parties receiving no small discomfiture. The was flaine of the Swiffers about fifteene hudred bodies, of which number was that Captaine A. tin that was the first mouer of that glorious counsell: his deathes wound was by a thrust of a p: through the throat: but farre greater was the flaughter of the enemies, of whom some say w: left dead ten thousand carkasses: the most part of the Launceknights dyed in fighting, and greatest execution and slaughter on the French and Gascon footemen, was in flying: almost all: horsemen went away in safetie, the chase being so swift that the Smiffers were not able to foll 1 them: if the Swiffers had had horsemen, they had made their calamitie equal with the footen their feare being greater and their disorder nothing inferiour : all the baggage and stuffe beca: a pray to the Victors, with two and twentie peeces of great artillerie, & all the horses affigned t the service of the same. The same day the Swiffers returned into Novaro almost triumphantly, t with such reputation and renowme throughout the world, that what with the confideratio the magnanimitie of their enterprise, the cuident rejecting and despissing of death, the resoluta they shewed in the fight, and the happy and honourable victorie of the same, there were some t durst preferre this action, almost afore all the enterprises worthy of memorie which we reade t downe vpon the Greekes & Romains. The Frenchmen fled into Pyedmot, from whence Triu e lost time to cry after them, their feare being fwifter in flying then his force able to follow them

Vpon the report of this victorie, Millan with all the other places that were declared for e French, humbled themselves and sent to demaund pardon, which accordingly was graunte o them vponbonds & conditions to disburfe a great portion of money. The inhabitants of / llan were taxed at two hundred thousand duckats, and enery particular of the others ratee:cording to his behauiour: the whole taxation was given to the Smiffers, to whom ought i ly to be transferred, as well the gaine as the glorie of the victorie, got with their valour and h their bloud. And as men whose felicitic made them to account it to good equity to draw al ie fruite they could, they entred afterwards into the Marquildome of Mont ferrat and Pyedn u, courreys which they charged to have received the Frencharmy: there, partly by pillage,& | tly by ransoming the poore peoples, they raised a great gaine, for bearing not with stading to a th either the life or honor of persons. The Spanards also were not altogether deprined of the ofits of the victory, for that lanus lastly chased out of Genes, & Octavia Fregolo (both which is red to be Duke) being retired to the Viceroy after the battell; the Viceroy perferring Octani, or who the Pope did what he could in regard of their auncient amitie, & withall receiving his omise to pay him fiftie thousand duckats when he should be possessed of Genes, he delivered in three thousand footme vnder the Marquis of Pesquiero, & for his own part, went with the Idue of the army to Chiefteggio, making semblance to passe further if need required. As the lirquis & Ostanian drew neare to Genes, the brethre of the familie of Adorno, knowing their case weakenesse, abandoned the towne without any triall of resistance: and immediatly entred man and was created Duke of that Citie, which in the course of a yeare had for governous the Frenchmen, lanus Fregofo, the Adorner, and Octavian. Bartlemem Aluiano hearing of the crthrow given to the French armie, and fearing least he should be also put to the chase by the mi-ds. ards, retited with speed to Postuiquo, leaving in the way (for looking of time) certaine peeces artillerie, whose inconveniencie and slownesse of cariage might have bin an impediment to the pedició ofhis marching: fró thèce he sent Ranse de Cere vuto Crema, & after he had abandoned resistante went to Tomba neare to Adice, neuer reposing in any place longer then the necessitie refresh his men and horses did constraine him. The reason of his abandoning Breffia and disoling Ranse de Cere in Crema, was, for that he held it a matter very unprofitable to diminish the mie, wherein were remaining fixe hundred men at armes, a thouland light horlemen, and fiue outand footmen: he marched with the fame celeritie that he retired to Pontuiquo, & had so great are and disfauour of the countrey, that the leaft companies that had followed them, might haue fficed to have difordered & broken them. When he faw that both feare & perill ceassed, since no an followed him, he stayed at Tomba, where he gaue order to be conveyed to Padoa & to Trea, the greatest prouisio of victuals that he could draw fro the territories of Verona. And at the me time he fent to Leguague with lx men at armes, & twelue hundred footmen, John P. Baillo, ho, being immediatly received by the inhabitants of the towne where was no garrifon, gave afult to the rocke which was garded by a hundred & fiftie footmen, part Spanish, & part Launceights:he first didexecution upon it with the artilletic battering that place that had his prospect wards the greene. In this affault it may be a question which had more force, valour or fortune, r that during the fight, the fire by aducture fasting vpon the munitios, by meane of certaine inuments of artificiall fiers throwen by those that were without, part of the rocke was burned: in hich turnult the footnien that gaue the affault being entred forne at the breach, & forne by ladrs, killed and tooke prisoners so many as they found within, their Captaine that was a Spaniard ling with much ado into the fortune of a prisoner. After the enterprise of Lequague, Almano used to build a bridge vpo Aduce, & afterwards certaine inhabitants of Verona giving him hope at they would mutine against the Almaines, he wetto incampe at the village of S. John a quarter a myle fró Verona: & fró théce the morning following drawing neare to the gate called S. Mamo, he planted his artilleries with great furie against the tower of the gate and the wall joyning it, expecting in the meane while if there would rife any tumult in the towne: and after he had ought down to the earth about fortie fadome of the wal, befides the tower, whose fall was such, it the ruines ferued for a very strong rapier to the gate, he gaue a very hot & furious assault. But ere were within Ferona three hundred horsemen & three thousand Launceknights vnder Rondolph a Captaine much efteemed, by who was made a valuant defence: befides, the breach was ryhigh on the townes fide, which made the defeending vneasie; & lastly they of Verona itr-Inot according to the hopes that were giue: fo that Aluiano feeing what difficulties relisted s victoric, retired his footemen from the wals, & began also to withdraw the artillerie: when anging counfell in a moment, &, as was supposed, by a certaine message which he received fro etowne, he returned immediatly his footenen to the wals, and recontinued the assault with a eater furie then before: but he found the former difficulties redoubled, and the faction that had lled him, fo terrified and wearied, that having loft at the affault more then two hundred of his ople, of whom T.ho; Fabro of Rauenna Marshall of his footmen was one, he began to dispaire polly of the victory, & retiring with great diligece his artillerie, he returned the same day to the Iging fró whence he was departed the morning, That day he was nothing esteemed, either for coulcil or for the issue of the same only his celeritie was renowmed throughout Italy, for that one day he had done that, which hardly other captaines are wotto do in three or foure. After all s he gaue the spoile to the contrey, prouing by that seare to costraine the inhabitants of Veroto come to fome accord: but by this did the Spanish army march & come on, for that the Vicerafter he heard of the losse of Leguague, fearing least by the ill disposition of the townssimen, rona would fet ope her gates to the Venetias, determined to give prefent succours to the actios Cafar: wherein he had now no impedimet, nor was not retained fince the affaires of Genes had opily fucceeded. Therfore after he had passed without difficultie the river of Pam at Stradella, &c titthe cities of Bergama and Bressia were rendred to him without resistance, together with the twne of Pefquiera, he encaped before the castell that was maned with two hudred & fifty foot-:.This peece, not with stading by como opinio might haue holden out yet certaine dayes, came force into his power, the Venetia rulet being made prisoner & al the residue of the sooteme that tre not flaine at the affault: for that the Spaniards approched, Alusano retired to Albero to the other fide of Adice, & called to refurnish his armie, such numbers as he could, not onely centain bands of footemen which were at Polifena Rousena, but also even those regiments whom held left within Leguague. A little after the Launceknights loyned at S. Martin with the Viceroy, wh also after the recourry of Leguaguo went to Montagnano : and the Venetians who held no mo in that quarter but Padoa and Trenifa, caring for no other thing then the preservation of the Cities, ordained that the armie should be distributed in them, and that John Paule Baillon, wi whom were Malatesta Sogliano and the Knight la Volpe, should be bestowed in Trensfa wi two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and two thousand sociemen, Aluna remaining in Padoa with the refidue of the armie. There, in confidering the fortifications at flate of the bassillions, and giving persection to many things that were unpersect, he caused to d mantell and raze vp all the houses, and cut downe all the trees that were within three myles abo Padoa, to make more hard and daungerous the approach of the enemies, and to give to their fe

uice necessitie of multitudes of labourers and pyoners. But while It the matters of warre proceeded in this fort, the Pope trauelled with great indust to weede out of the Church the division brought in by the Councell of Pifa: a matter as it who ly depended upon the will of the French king, so he laboured to appeale him by many meanes: assured the king, that touching the rumour that ran that he had sent money to the Swiffers, it w a false brute suborned by men of little fidelitie, since he referred himselse to all his actions, when he had expressed to defire nothing more then an vninerfall peace, and to be the common father all Princes Christned: and he alleaged how grieuous it was to him that his diffention with Church, depriued him of all meanes to know how naturally he was inclined to his amitie, feei that for the honor of the sea Apostolike, and the dignitie of his person, he was constrained to p ceede with him feuerally, vntill by his returning to the obedience of the Church of Rome, it we lawfull for him to receive him as king most Christian, and embrace him as the eldest sonne of Church. The king also for the regard of his affaires, defired the vnion of his kingdome with Church, the same being also demaunded by all his peoples, and the Queene no lesse concurr then the refidue: it was well discerned by the King and his counsell that there could be no he of alliance with the Pope in matters temporal, if first they fell not to agreement for controuer spirituall: for which cause, either trusting indeede, or at least dissembling under shewes, and s ming to give faith to his words, he fent to him as Embassador to negociate in these causes, the thop of Marfeilles: at whose coming the Pope by decree of the Councell, reinuested the Bish. and Prelates of Fraunce, with power to purge themselves of their contumacie during the wh: moneth of Nouember. Against these Clergie men his predecessiour had proceeded rigorously way of threatning, as against perfons guilty of schisme: and the same morning wherein this dec was determined, there was read in the Councell a writing fubscribed by Bernar. Carnagiall 1 Feder, S. Senerin, wherein forbearing to name themselves Cardinals, they approved all the a s of the Councell of Latran, and promised to cleave to the same, and obey the Pope. In this act a consequently they confessed themselves to be lawfully deprived of the estate of Cardinals, what privation being done by Pope Iulio, had bene in his life time confirmed by the same Count It had bene debated afore in the confistorie to have them restored, but the resolution was af wardes deferred for the impediment of the Embassadours of Casar & the king of Aragon, to ther with the Cardinals of Sion and Yorke, who alleaged, that it was a matter vinworthy the 1iefly of the fea Apostolike, and of very ill example to pardon the authors of so great wickedness accopanied with manifest abhomination and impietie: a matter which the last Pope had costary maintained against them even to the last momet of his life, & that for no other cause then for e publike benefite. But the Pope raigning inclined to that fide that was least rigorous, judgin to more easic & worthy to quech altogether the name of the Councell of Pi/a, rather with clemcie then with seucritie: besides, he would not stirre vp the minde of the Frech king, who was a gent intercessour for them: neither was he caried against them by any particular hatted, for it neither was the iniurie done to him, neither before his Pontificacie he nor his brethren had be great friends to Federike: for which reasons, of his owne motion he caused to be read before to fathers of the Councel, the writing of their humiliation, & affigned a day for their restoring, with Cardinals. was done in this maner: Bernar, and Feder, entred secretly into Rome by night without either bite or ceremonies of Cardinals, and the morning following being to prefent themselves be re

Pope fitting in full confistory with the presence of all the Cardinals, except the Swiffer and : English, who refused to assist the action: they first passed apparelled as simple Priests, with cke bonnets on their heads through all the publike places of the pallace of Vatican, where they Hodged: a wonderfull concourfe and preffe of people flocked to fee them, every one judgthat a punishment so honourable did serve as a cruell torment for the viruled pride of Berden, and no leffe for the vnftayed arrogancy of Federike. Assoone as they were admitted into presence of the confistory, they fell downe on their knees, and with many fignes of great huity they demanded pardon of the Pope and the Cardinals: They approued all things that had hedone by Pope luko, and namely their privation and the election of the new Pope, as an act onicall: and they publikely reproned the Councell of Pafa, to be an affembly schifmatike and estable. When this confessio was subsigned with their hands & solemnly enregistred, they rose and stood on their feete, & after reverence done, they embraced all the Cardinals, who flirred out of their feates: then they were reinuested & apparelled in the habite of Cardinals, & receiby the residue to sit in the same order wherein they were wont to sit before their privation: ly recourted only by this act the dignity of Cardinals, & not their benefices and other reuenues ich they had poffessed, for that long time before they had bin distributed to others by the liberof vacation. In this act the Pope fatisfied the French king, if not fo much as he defired, at least in of that he expected: but he fatisfied him nothing in other matters, for that he fought by all the yes he could to accord Cafar and the Venetians; a matter which seemed to him of easie actio the accidents that were hapned: for it was beleeved that Cafar stirred up by the occasions beid the Mounts, would be brought to be contented to be discharged of such a burden, to have more oportunity to hearken to the recovering of Burgondy for his Nephew. And touching Venetians, it was hoped that they would much more defire it, as well for that they stood amawith the ouerthrow of the Frenchmen, as also that they knew that the French king for the malangers hanging ouer his Realme, was not able for that yeare to do any more to the affaires of 1: Besides, they saw fast vponthem the Spanish army, whereunto were to be united the comles that were within Verona: They were made dry of mony and treasure, ill furnished of souls, and namely offootemen: and (which was not least in their confideration) they were to reall alone of themselves without any hope or shew of other succors : and yet the Senate answevery constantly, that they would not hearken to any accord, vnlesse they were reposlessed of censuand Verona.

Cefar at that time demanded of the Pope two hundred men at atmes against the Venetians: a raund which albeit was grieuous to the Pope, both for feare least the French king should be ontented, and also he saw how inconvenient it would be for Cefar and him to become sufed to the Venetians for a matter of so small importance: yet by the obstinate importunity of ir, he fent him under Troillo Sauello, Achilles Torello, and Mutio Colonno, the numbers he reed both for that by refusing he would not shew any token not to perseuer in the consederation tracted with the last Pope, and also he considered he was not holden by any bond or obligatio he had with the Venetians: who befides that their army did almost expresse behaujours of hoy vpon the lands of Parma & Plasfantin, at fuchtime as Aluiano lay neare to Cremona, yet had not elected Embassadors to protest their obedience to him according to their custome, Il the Frenchmen being ouerthrowne, were returned beyond the Mounts. This deliberation ight no litle amaze to the Venetians, not so much for the importance of such a succour, as for cleaft by this beginning the Pope would passe sutther, taking it for a manifest signe that he ald neuer be seperate from their enemies. Neuerthelesse all these dangers & shewes of calamicould not make them change their first counsels, but standing resolute to make as good head ey could against fortune, they sent to their Admirall that was at Corfu to affemble his Nauie, layle the marine places of Powilla. And yet confidering a litle after, of what importance it dbe to prouoke so much the king of Aragon, they reuoked that counsell, being more couragithen differete, no leffe for the might and power of the fame king, then for that he had alwayes wed that he perswaded Casar to peace.

farre inferiour to the difficulties: for in the army there was little more then a thousand men armes, not many light horsemen, and onely ten thousand footemen, aswell Spanish Launce-knights: and lastly there was expectation of the comming of the Bishop of Guni vpon whose will and direction depended resolutely all things. About this time a Spanish mag thrate being in Bergamo to gather the impost of fine and twentie thousand duckats, tax vpon that Citie at such time as it was rendred to the Viceroy, Ranse de Cere sent this from frema one part of the souldiers, who entring by night by the helpe of certaine conspit tors of the towne, tooke the Spaniard with all the money he had leuied, and returned asset

There was differened about this time a preparation to new troubles in the state of Genes, bein conformable in that plot the wils of the Duke of Millan and the Smiffers, to whom Anthon and lerome Adorno had recourse: they declared to the Duke the affinity and dependencie whi their fathers had had with Lodowike his father: That by the ayde of their family he had recon red and many yeares holden in peace the principality of Genes, from the which he had bene fra dulently deuelted by the Dukes Fregojo: That the family of the Adorney had participated wi the aduerlities and fortunes of the Sforces, for that at the fame time that Lodowike loft the Duc of Millan, the Adorney were chased out of Genes: and therefore they perswaded that it was couenient that they should likewise communicate in the returne of good hap and fortune, see the same affection and the same faith continued: That they ought not to be charged by imputar if being not fo much as heard in any one place, but abandoned of all hope, their necessity & tl good will had driven them to have recourse to that king, by whom they had bene chased and pulsed before: That on the other side he was to remember the auncient hatred of the Frego, and how many injuries and practifes had bene wrought against his father by Baptista and Cardinall Fregofa, Dukes of Genes successively: and lastly he was to consider how farre her to trust Octanian Fregosa, who, besides the auncient hatred he bare, resused to have a super in that gouernement. To the Swiffers they recommended the profite, the furety, and the hon t that they might reape by the enterprise: that if by their meane they were eftsoones restored their countrey, they would pay a fumme of money equall to that which Ottanian Fregofat ed to the Spannards: that as by their vertue the Duchy of Millan had bene preserved, so to the appertained in honour the protection and defence of the thing they had gotten by their vak: wherein they were to confider what a matter it would be contrary to the furety of that flate, Genes a City of so neare neighbourhood and importance, should obey a Duke that deper d wholly vpon the king of Aragon: that it were an action vn worthy their name & their glory, to fer Genes (the fruit of the victory of Nonaro) to fall to the share and profit of the Spaniards, . 0 whilst the Swiffers with so great valour ran their bodies upon the thundring shot of the Fre 1 were with more ease then danger vpon Trebia, watching as it were the issue of the battell, to b and to vsurpe by suttlety the rewards of the victory gotten with the bloud of others. Vpont complaints, accompanied with other reasons of compassion, the Duke caused his companion march, & the Swiffers advanced 4000 footmen: but what with the threates of the Viceroy ag. Il the Duke, and the authority of the Pope with the Swiffers, the enterprise ceassed even assoone it was begun, the affection that the Pope bare to the affaires of Octavian, doing more to dast se expedition then any other thing In this meane while the Viceroy went vp to Battell, a plant bout feuen miles from Padoa, where Carnagial riding vndifcretly with a small strength of he men to view the feat of the countrey, was taken by Mercario Captaine of the Venetian light !men. About which time the Bishop of Gurci arriving in the army, they drew to consultation at was to be done: The Bishop gaue counsel to be siege Padoa, saying, he hoped so much in the vige of the Spaniards & Launceknights against the Italians, that in the end they shold be able to cot come all difficulties: he layd it was a matter of leffe labour to take Trensa, but the honor an e wards of the victory were far different, for that to win only Trenifa, was not of fuch importation the substace of the war; but by the taking of Padoa, both the townes & peeces of Casars obeier should stand assured from troubles and perils of the warre, & the Venerians should be left diued of all hope to be able to reconquer the places they had loft. The Viceroy and almost the other Captaines were of a contrarie opinion: they judged it rather impossible then had to force Padoa for the incredible fortificatios: it was throughly furnished with artilleries & all tags neci ary effary for defence: it was double manned with fouldiers, befides many young men of the Noty of Venice, that were come thither as they had wont to do at other times: they alleaged that circuit of Padoa was large, in which regard, as also for the multitude of the defendants and er difficulties, it required to be enuironed with a fiege of two armies: a computation so farre n them, that they were not able to make one sufficient, the number of their souldiers being great, and yet no figne of readinesse in the Launceknights, for that they murmured already want of pay: Lastly, they had not sufficient municions, and no lesse want, of pyoners, a proon very necessary for an enterprise of that difficulty. But in the end the reasons of the Viceroy Padoabesseged the other Captaines gaue place to the authority and will of the Bishop of Gurci, according by the Fiscory. whose direction the army drawing neare to Padoa, encamped at Bassanella vpon the right reof the channell: but being subject there to the affliction of certaine double cannons that lay nted vpon the bastillion of the towne, they passed the channell and lodged a little further from towne, from whence sending certaine bands of footenien to S. Anthonies Church within halfe ile of Padoa, they began to approch with leffe danger, & to call trenches neare to, S. Anthonies : but for that the worke was great, and the want of pyoners no lesse, and in a countrey adoned of all inhabitants, the trenches advanced litle, and not without danger; for that the diers making many sudden sallies as well by day as by night, gaue great domage and impediicto those that trauelled. They suffered besides great want of victuals, both for that onely a llpart of the towne was innironed by the enemies, and also the estradiots that had liberty to out of the other quarters of the towne, ouerrunning freely the whole countrey, gaue impediit to all that was brought to the campe: the traffike of victuals was also hindred by certaine ed barkes which the Venetians had let for that purpole youn the river of Adice, for that the me they caried, ceassed not to make incursions into the vpland and plaine countrey, scouring all es, and respected northing in the fury of their spoyle. In regard of these difficulties, the estate of es being eftfoones brought into the Councell by the Viceroy, euery one gaue this free judgeit, that it would be a leffe infamy to correct the deliberation undifferely made in leanying the pe, then by justifying the error to breede and bring upon them some greater domage, & that without the lociety of a farre greater shame. This opinion being related to the Bishop of Gurci he Viceroy in the presence of many Captaines, for that he had refused to be at that Councell, rade answer, that for that the discipline and practise of warre was not his profession, it was no neto him to confesse his ignorance in the service & guiding of war : only touching the counichad giuen to pitch the campe afore Padoa, it moued not by any fingularity of credit in his wifdom, but in the action he was caried by the opinion & authority of the Viceroz, who both tters & expresse messengers had counselled the Emperour, and given him great hope to cary that the difficulties not ceasing neither for their complaints, nor for their debating, no rather lispaire of the enterprise daily increasing, the campe brake vp, after it had lien xviij, dayes afore wals of Podoa: and having both at their breaking vp, and vpon the way, the light horsemen at backes, they withdrew to Vincenfa, which then was voide of inhabitants, and lay as a pray to was maister of the field.

1 this meane while the fouldiers of the Duke of Millan, to whose ayde the Viceroy had sent ho, de Leua with a thousand footemen, tooke Pontuiquo, wherein were two hundred footme urison for the Venetians, who neither amazed with the thunder of the artilleries, nor discoud with the mines that were made, were constrained at the end of a moneth to yeeld for want Auals, after they had valiantly Justained the affault. About the same time Ranse de Cere issuing of Crema ouerthrew Siluin Sauello marching with his bands and foure hundred Spanish footto Bergamo, whither the Duke of Millan fent him, And a litle after a Spanish officer being med to Bergamo to gather mony, Ranse sent thither a strength of three hundred horsemen flue hundred footemen, who tooke together with the officer the Rocke whereunto he was for his fafety with the money he had leauied. In this Rocke were very few men of warre for Ix men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and seuen hundred sootemen, with thousand paisants of the Mount of Brianso were gone from Millan under the leading fluo Sanello and Cefar Fieromosquo, to reconquer Bergamo: and they encountring upon way fine hundred light horsinen and three hundred footmen, sent by Ranse to Bergamo, were I put to flight, by whose example the residue that afore had occupied Bergamo abandoned it, leaving onely a garrison in the Rocke, which standeth out of the City vpon the mountaine and the Chappell.

The Viceroy and Bishop of Gurci remained certaine dayes at Vincensa, and sent one part one Spaniards under Prosper Colonno to sacke Basciano and Marostiquo: not that they had offend but that the substances of that wretched people should minister nouriture to the army, when the payes did fayle, Cafar standing alwayes oppressed with his accultomed difficulties, the kinos Aragon not able of himselfe to beare out so great a burden, and the Duchy of Millan being exs. finely taxed by the Swiffers, was no more able to contribute to the reliefe of the relidue. This my abode at Vincenfa, not without great discommodities, by the continuall vexations of the horlemen, who ouerrunning day and night the whole countrey, stopped all traffike and passage victuals, vnlesse they were garded with a great strength, and that of necessity must be of meat armes, for that they were very few light horsemen: therefore to be out of these tornients, this Thop of Gurci went to Verona, very much discontented with the Viceroy, who following hing fmall journies, got into Albero vponthe river of Adice, where he remained certaine dayes to je oportunity to them of Verona to make their haruest, the incursions of the light horsemen not clfing for all that, who tooke from the Almains even neare the gates of Verona, the oxen that cw the artilleries. The Viceroy had layd a former plot to bestow the army in garrison in the counts of Bressia and Bergamasqua, and at the same time to molest Grema, which was all that the Vitrans held on the other fide the river of Minera: which devise being published, had so affurence countries thereabouts, that the territories of Padoa were full of inhabitants and goods, thele being the cause that the Viceroy, who had no other meane to feede his army then by prayes d pillage, altered his plot, and calling backe the Almains, went to Montagnana and to Effe, and in thence to the village of Bonolento, where after he had driven away great flockes of cattell, to fouldiers confumed with fire many faire houses that flood thereabout: Still the defire of pil je caryed them on, and being the rather encouraged that the bands of the Venetian footemente distributed to the gard of Padoa and Treusfa, the Viceroy marching in pillage from Bouolente: termined to approch Venuce, but against the opinion of Prosper Colonno, who told him tha a lesse was the danger of the enterprise then the counsell rash: that after they had passed it uer of Bacquillon, and facked Pieuo de facco, which is a borough both great in fituation, popul s, and ful of all things, they went to Mestro, & so to Marguera which standeth vpon the salt was from that place, to leave a more honourable memory of this expedition, they discharged tow is Venuce x. peeces of great artillery, whose bullets pierced the Monastery of S. Secondo. And as in it where discipline is at liberty, there infolencies be infinit, so they proceeded still in pilling & wa g the whole countrey, whose inhabitants being fled, they made with great iniquity wars again to wals: for, not content with the rich prayes of cattell and other wealth, in their cruelty they but d Mestra, Marguera, and Lissafusnia, together with all the other villages and townes of the celtrey, not sparing any house or pallace which had any extraordinary representation or aprance. In these insolencies, the impiety of the Popes souldiers and the other Italians, was not e least, but so much the greater by how much it was more infamous in them then in the sorter is to vie cruelty against the magnificence and ornaments of their proper countrey. But they of nice differning within their towne the fmoke by day, and by night the fire thorough a whole countrey, and hearing within their owne houses the noyse of the artillery of the enen ; which was planted for no other purpose then to encrease their ignominy, were touched intit minds with right great indignation & forrow. It feemed to enery-one a hard and grienous chare offortune, that in place of so great glory & so many victories obtained in Italy afore time botly fea and land, their eyes should behold at that instant a small army in comparison of their aunc to force and power, to offer to the maiesty of their common-weale so great a brauery, to their | petuallreproch & ignominy . In regard of which indignities, the deliberatios of that Senate bug enforced, who till that day itood resolute, what hopes socuer were offered, to eschue to make y experience of fortune: they now consented by the hawty perswasions of Bart. Aluiano, that the fembling all the fouldiers, and flirring vp all the villages afwell of the plaines as of the mountais, they should assay to stop the returne of the enemies: a matter which Alusano proued to best very case action for that their rashnesse having brought them in the middest of Vence, Trens, and Padon, and being laden with burdens of pray and spoyle, they could not retire without gu

launger, as well for the incommoditic of victuals, as for the impediment of rivers and hard passaes:and now the Spaniards vuderstanding of the musters and preparations that were in hand; narching a good pace, were by this time come to Ciradella, which who they faw they could not get for a fuccour of fouldiers newly entred, they lodged a litle beneath neare to Brenta, to passe o the village of Conticella, a place where the river of Brenta was passable by foord: but they lurst not venture to passe ouer for searce of Aluiano, who stood on the other side with his compaies ranged in battell, and his artillerie planted along the shoare of the riuer, carefully prouiding or the fafety not only of that place, but also of many others: wherunto, if resistance had not bene nade, the enemy had had easie passage. It hapned (such be the stratagems of souldiers) that as the iceroy continued his shewes and demonstrations to passe ouer at the place below, to the which aluiano had turned all his forces, he passed the night after without anie impediment at the passige called the new croffe, three miles aboue Citadella: fro thence with great diligence he tooke is way to Vincensa, but Aluiano seeking to stop his passage ouer the river of Bacquillon, preented him. 10.P. Baillon and And. Gritti with a strength of two hundred men at armes, & two outand footnen of the forces of Trenifa, came and loyned with Aluiano neare to Vincenfu: ey with the other Venetian Captaines were of counfell not to fight with the enemies with banr displayed and in open place, but garding well the passages of strength and places most conueent, they should labour to stop their way on what place soener they came, drawing now toards Vincenfa. To this end they had fent lob. P. Manfronto Montechio with foure thousand en trained: and to Barberano to hinder their passage in the mountaines, were sent fine hundred ht horsmen with many other bands of the paisants: they had also stopped in the villages all the flages that led into Germany, & fortified the with treches, with flones, & with trees cut downe layd athwart the wayes: Aluiano left Theo. Trunlee to gard Vincenfa with a garrison sufficit, and himselfe with the refidue of the armie encamped at Olmo, a place within two miles of incensa, vpon the way that leades to Verona: this passage with another fast by, was so choaked thtrenches, ditches, and artilleries planted vpon the places comming toit, that it was almost possible to passe. As the way towards Verona was full of these impediments, so it was likewise rdfor the Spaniards that marched along the mountains, to go larger through the countries that nefull of marishes and waters and no lesse hard to take the way of the mountaine, which was row, and garded by many armed mentin formuch as being enuironed almost on all parts with emies, their perill all one both before, behind, and in flancke, and continually chased by great upes of light horfmen, they could make no deliberation wherein the difficultie was not greathen the danger. After they had spent certainetime in skirmishing, they encaped towards the ry of the night, within half a mile of the place where the Venerians lay, and there the Captaines wing to counfell what was best to do amid so many adversities and perils, they chose as least regetous to turne their enfignes towards Germanie: they judged that the best way, to returne Verona by Trenta, notwith sading what for the longuesse of the way, & the small garrison they Heft there, they had almost an assured opinion that the celeritie of the Venetians would preuet irpurpose. In this fort then did they march at the dawning of the day towards Bassan, turg their backs to the enemies, a matter then the which there is nothing more timerous nor perhous to armies: and albeit they marched in order, yet their fortune had left them so small hope afetie, that they thought the losse of their baggage and hotses of cariage would be the least me that could happen to them. What by their fecret difeamping without found of trumpet frumme, & the commoditie of a thicke mylffalling that morning which tooke away the beit of his eyes, Aluiano was not so speedily aware of their breaking vp: but he was no sooner tertifed of their departing, then he fet to follow the with all the army, wherin was thought to athousand men at armes, a thousand stradiots, & sixethousand sootmen: the stradiots vexed n continuallie on all fides, and infinite troupes of pailants descending from the Mountaines, re no litle trouble to them with their finall shot: fo that with their danger the difficultie of the resincreased continuallie, both for the multitude of their cariages, and the great quantitie of rpray,& also for that they were drine to passe through wayes straight & ful of ditches, which whad not had oportunity to inlarge or make plaine with mattockes and spades: and yet not-Mading by how much their aduersities were great & apparant, by so much greater was their allitic of speed and haste, their extremities could not make them forget to march in order, the neuerthelesse, after they had marched two miles with so many perplexities of wayes and trauel they judged it would be hard to hold out long in that fort, their griefe being greater by the wea rinesse of their bodies, then by any feare of the perilles they saw at hand. But the enemies b their rashnesse had not patience to expect till so faire an occasion might be ripened, which alre dy was come to his perfection: for Alusano according to his custome being not able to contain himselfe, charged upon the rearegard of the enemies guided by Prosper Colomo: he went to the charge not in disorder, but with the armie aranged in battell, and his artilleries planted ready se the execution: and it was faid for certaine, that being long in preparing to the charge, Loredano ruler among the Venetians, rebuked him with veries harpe words, that he went not to the charg whole flownesse, faid he, gaue oportunity to the enemies being already broken, to saue the seluc By these prouocations so valiant a Captaine was compelled to run headlong to the fight, and great furie gaue the figne of the battell. Some other affirme that Profper Colonno was the cau of all the actions of armes that day, by whose counsel the Viceror had rather proue the vicertain chaunce and fortune of the fight, then otherwise to follow so small a hope of safety: and it is sa that having made a shew that he would returne towards Vincensa, Alusano had caused to be b stowed in the suburbs of Vincensa, John P. Baillon, with those bands that were come from Tr nifa, and himselfe with the residue of the armie was incamped at Creatia within two miles Vincensa. In this place is a litle hill that gave a convenient commodity for the vse and service the artillery against the enemics, and at the foot of it is a valley capable of a maine armie raung in battell, but it hath no way of accesse but onely by one straight way that runneth vp along t hils, and is almost incompassed with marishes, It is faid that Prosper knowing what incommor ties this place gaue to the enemies, perswaded to set vpon them in that quarter, having there the oportunitie and feate of the place to fet forth their valour : but what soeuer it was, Profeer b gan to go to the charge with a refolution worthie of the reputation he bare, and hauing lent call the Viceroy which brought on the battell, & on the one fide, & at one time the Spanish for men advancing by the direction of the Marquis of Pelquaire, & on the other hand the Iquadro of the Launceknights, they brought vpon the Venetians so hot and surious a charge, that the Ouerthrow of feares being redoubled by the terrour and valour of their enemies, the first assault almost suffic to put them all to flight: the footmen threw downe their pikes and fled with more shame the hope of fafetie, their ignorance or want of courage making them vnable to fullaine the fury oft charge: the footmen of Romagnia, whole Coronell was Ra.de Naldo Brifiquello, were the fi that ferued to the others as an example of cowardife and infamie: the refidue of the armie too the same course, no man almost being seene to fight, or once looke his enemie in the face; ye the vertue of Aluiano was so abated and confused by this sodaine flying away, that wit out stroke striking he left the victorie to the enemies, to who the artilleries with all the bagga remained a pray: the footmen were scattered into diverse places; and for the men at armes, for fled to hide their shame in the mountaines, and some sought their safetie in Padoa and in Treni, whither fled in like fort Aluiano and Gritti. In this encounter were flaine Anth. Pio an ancie Captaine, with Constance his sonne, Meleager Furly, and Lodo. Parma, and the fortune of P. Ange was litle better, who though his life was referred, yet he escaped not without manie mil rable and mortall wounds. The prisoners were 10.P. Baillon, Iulio the sonne of Iohn P. Manfi Malatesto Soligiano, with manie other Captaines and persons of name and marke. Loredano t Venetian ruler fell into this calamitie, but with a worse fortune; for that two souldiers st uing whose prisoner he should be, the one of them killed him against all humanitie. Touchin the generall flaughter of this conflict both of dead bodies and prisoners, there remained abo foure hundred men at armes, & foure thousand footmen, the flaughter being so much the great by how much there could be no expedition of flying by reason of the marishes: this also broug great domage to fuch as trusted in the chase, that Theo. Triunice shut the gates of Vincensa, a would receive in no kind of person, for searc least the Victor and the vanquished should enter pe mel together: by which impediment manie striuing to passe further, drowned themselves in t next river, amongst whom were Hermio Bentinole and Sacramoro Visconte. This was the ouerthrow that fell vpo the Venetians the seventh day of October neare to Vi cenfa, worthy to be remembred, both for the example it gaue to Captaines not to have confide

uching matters of armes, in the Italian footinen not experienced in battels pitched and ranid, and also that almost in the turning of a hand the victorie was transferred to those in whom as least hope of safetie. This ouerthrow had put in daunger either Trenisa or Padoa, not withinding with the refidue of the atmie Aluiano was retired to the one, and Gritti to the other, if th the season of the yeare when raynes began to fall, had not bene contrarie, & the townes beag good fortifications, and the Captaines much troubled to dispose to new enterprises the soulers that were not yet paid. Neuertheles, albeit the Venetias stood afflicted with so many aductes, & no lesse confused with an accident so far cotrarie to their hopes, yet they forbare not acding to the time & their ability, to refurnish those cities, to the which, besides other prouisios ly fent many yong getlemen of the nobility, as they had wont to do in times of greatest perill. After this battell, things began to draw from armes to cogitations and deuises of peace, which is negociated with the Pope: towards who was gone the Bishop of Gurci, principally to protobedience to him in the name of Cafar, & the Archduke: in which action he was followed by auncis Sforce Duke of Bary, to performe the like for his brother Maximilian Sforce. And alt the Bilhop of Gurci represented in Isaly the full person of Cesar, as he did at other times, yet ing now afide his pompe and accustomed magnificence, he entred more modestly into Rome, orbare by the way to weare the cap of Cardinal which the Pope had fent to him at Poggibon-At his comming was compounded a compromise by him & the Venetian Embassadors in the fon of the Pope, of all the controuerfies that were betweene Cafar and their common weale: it was a compromise more in name & apparance then in effect & substance, for that neither he parties for the importance of the cause would be referred to an arbitrement suspected, vnthey had feuerally & fecretly received promise of him, that he would not give up his arbitration hout their consent & prinity. The Pope by this authority of compromitting, declared in writhat there should be a surceasing of armes betweene the two parties, which albeit was joyy accepted by them both, was yet ill observed by the Viceroy: for that being come betweene intagnana & Este, besides that he had done no other thing since the victory, then made pillage uer-run the whole countrie, having withall fent part of his fouldiers to Policena, he commitin fundrie places manie infolencies and harmes: fometimes he excused his doings, in that they e vpon the lands of Cafar, and sometimes he alleaged that he expected new intelligence from Cardinall of Gurci: laftly, the end of the compomife was no more happie then had bene the If & the beginning, by reason of difficulties that fell out in the negociatio of affaires: for, Casar uld not consent to the accord, but with condition to retaine part of the townes, and for the oto receive a great proportion of money: and of the contrarie, the Venetians demaunded all townes and offered a very small summe of money; it was beleeved also, that the king Cathodid secretly disswade the accord, notwith standing openly he made demostration to defire it: it was faid, that to make it more hard, he had at the fame time put Breffia into the hands of 'ar, a place which the Viceroy neuertill that day would give vp, alleaging that he kept it to ce him more inclined to the peace: but the caufes were coiectured diverfly, either he had fo far nded the Venetians that he judged he wold no more entertaine with them a true and affored tic, or elfc he knew that his reputation and greatnesse in Italy depended upon continuing and ping on foot the army, which for want of mony he was not able to feed & nourish but by rac-& ranfoming the peoples that were his friends, & in making pray & pillage of the countries were enemies. These difficulties, together with the vntowardnesse of the parties, made the be leave the matter unperfect, when a litle after the Almaines, by the helpe of the exiles and thed men, tooke Marano vpon the Sodaine, a seafaring towne in the countrie of Friull, & So ended to the like action upon Alontfalcon: & albeit the Venetians both for their honour and it defited to reconquet Marano, being 60 miles fro Venice, & in that disposition did affaile oth by lea and land, yet their fortune being all one in all places, they received loffe and vexaon all fides: only Ranse de Cere in that time sustained the name & credit of their armes, to his In praise and merite: for, albeit there was a great rage of plague and hunger in Crema where ty in garrison, and that the bands of Spaniards and Millanois being dispersed into the townes leabout by reason of the season, he was as it were besieged, yet he gaue a sodaine charge vpo inaia, a town of the coutrie of Bergamo, & stripped Cafar Fieramofquo with fortie menat es and 200 light horfmen of the rigiment of Profeer Colonno: and not many dayes after he entred by night into Quinsano, and tooke the Lieutenant of the Count S. Senerin, and spoiled fifty men at armes, and within Treny stripped ten men at armes of the company of Prosper.

About this time things were quiet enough in other places of Italy, saving that the Adorneus the Fiefqueis with 3000 me of the courty, accopanied perhaps with the fecret fauor of the Duk of Millan, drew neare the walles of Genes, after they had taken Spetia and other places of the ri uer of Leuant: but their fortune being far inferiour to their valour, they went away almost ouer throwne, having loft part of the men they brought to the enterprise, and certaine peeces of artil lerie. There appeared also in Tuscane certaine beginnings of new injuries: for, the Florentines be gan to molest them of Lucqua, trusting that through seare of the Pope, they should redeem peace in restoring to them Pietrasanta and Mutrona. They alleaged besides, that it was not con uenient that they should enion the benefite of that confederation, which they had broken in mi niltring fecret fuccours to the Pifans. Against these suggestions they of Lucqua complained t the Pope & to the king Catholike, in whose protectio they were, but seeing there grew no rem dy to them, they were at last contented (to auoyd greater mischiefs) to refer a compromise toil person of the Pope: who having like authority for the Florentines, pronounced that they of Lin qua, who had afore rendred to the Duke of Ferrara, Garfagnana, thould leave to the Florentin the places of Pietrasantu & Mutrona, and that there should remaine between them a perpetus peace and confederation.

About the end of this yeare the Castles of Millan and Cremona, who for the necessity of vist als had agreed to yeeld if they were not succoured in a certaine time, were deliucred into the pwer of the Duke of Millan: so that there remained no more that the French king held in Italy, be Lanterne of Genes, which in the end of the yeare the Genomayes assayed to cast downed mines: they appreched to it under the benefite of a caske or vessell of wood containing thirty doms in length and twenty in breadth: within which was stowage for 300 men, & service of wooll the better to defend the shot: at the first shew it caried great arte a deepe invention, but being brought to triall, it served to little vse, as most often is seene by the new and strange workes.

THE ARGUMENT.

The king of England makes warre upon the French king. The Venetians recouer Friull. The last arbitrator pronounceth peace betweene the & the king of Romains. King Lowis the xiy. differences the first commeth to the Crowne, and descendeth suco Italy to reconquer Millan.

Here hapned the same yeare in the regions beyond the Mounts, n daungerous warres, whereof I will make present discourse, both for same reasons, and with the same shortnesse that I have touched their the narration of the yeare before.

The beginning of these preparations and stirres grew vpon a resistant same statement.

rmie of three thousand horsemen, & eight thousand footmen, part Swiffers and part Almains. promised also to the Swiffers a certaine porportion of money, the rather to induce them to ie in the action with Cafar, who was contented to put into their hands in pawne one part of gundie vntill he had fully satisfied the of their payes: Lastly also the king of England occupied perswassion, that his father in law the king Catholike, cleaning to the confederation of Casar im(which he had alwayes protested and assured) would open the warre on his side at the same nt. By reason whereof, the report of the truce made by the English with the French king (and or all that the defire to make warte was nothing diminished) was so ill brooked not onely by , but by all fortes of states and peoples in England, that the commons had done violent execuvpon the Spanish Embassadour, if the kings authoritie had not resisted their surie. To these gs were added the oportunitie of the estate of the Archduke, not so much that he letted not biectes to take pay against the Frenchmen, as for that he promised to give sufferaunce and

r behoued the French king to omit no fortes of provisions against so great preparations and Provisions of igerous threatning: by sea he furnished a strong nause to encounter the Admirall of England, the Freich 47 land he leaused men from all parts, labouring specially to have as great a strength of Launce. Sains the king rland he leaured men from all parts, labouring specially to have as great a strength of Launce-ganger hts as he could. He had also afore made great instance to the Swiffers, that since they refused de him in the warres of Italie, at least, that they would so farre fauour him as to deliuer him portion of footemen to helpe to defend the Crowne of Fraunce. But they being wholly red to protect and affure the Duchie of Millan, refused in any wife to minister to him, valesse ould eftfoones returne to the vnitie of the Church: and give vp the Castell of Millan which not yet rendred: and also cancelling his rights and interests to that estate, he would promise ore to moleft neither Millan nor Genes; limitations no leffe ynprofitable to the French king, contrary to his honour, and prejudiciall to the foueraigne dignitie of the crowne of Fraunce. wise the French king, the more to terrific the English, and make them more intangled with owne affaires, had called into Fraunce the Duke of Suffalke as Competitour and aspirantto rowne of England: a deuise little helping the purposes of Fraunce, and of great daunger to ceand progenie of the Duke, for that in reuenge of their dealing, the king of Englandby cre course of the iustice of his Realme, cut off the head of his brother, who till then had bene in prisoner in England, since the time that Phillip king of Castille Sayling into Spaine, deliueminto the hands of the king his father. The French king also was not without hope to have : with the king Catholike: for that when the king Catholike vnderstood of the league made cene the French and the Venetians, he began to distrust much of the desence of the Duchie illan, and sent into Fraunce one of his Secretaries to practise new offers: and it was beleehat confidering how much the greatnesse of Casar & the Archduke might alter his governof Castille, he could not in good pollicie stadwell cotented with the embasing of the realme aunce. Besides all these, omitting no oportunities wherin occasion might be taken, the Frech lorgat not in these actions to stirre vp lames the king of Scots his auncient confederate, to ed that he opening the warre vpon the frontiers of England, he might with more falicitie defence against so many and mightie invasions. The Scottish king was moved to this warre e consideration of his proper interests, for that the aduersities of Fraunce could not but be gerous to the crowne of Scotland, in which regard to the respect of consideration, he red himselfe to the action with all diligence, demaunding of the French king no other ayde iftie thousand frankes to leavie munitions and victuals. Neverthelesse the French king was low in gathering together his forces and provisions, both for that he had turned all his this to the enterprise of Millan, and reposed not a little in the truce made with the king Cale.Lastly, his accustomed negligence was no little impedimet to the expedition of businesse, most hurtfull to the affaires of Princes, to whom is seldome seene to returne the effector, of their expectation, when they stand to temporise vpon euery new occasion, after the reon is let downe and things referred to action. And touching the king of England, he confumany moneths in measuring his proportions, in leauving his prouisions, in rating the state & r of his payes, and in diffinguishing the sortes of his souldiers and their fashions of armour & ons, for that his subjectes having bene many yeares without warres, & no lesse chaunged the r of warfaring, both their bowes & their other ysual natures of armes being become ynpro-fitable, he was constrained to make great provision of forreine armours, artilleries, and munit, and by the same necessitie to leavie as souldiers trained many bands of Launceknights and hos men, the auncient custome of the English being to fight on foote: for these impediments the'. glish armie passed not the seas sooner then the moneth of July: and after had for many dayes n vp into the champaine countrey neare vnto Bolleme, they went to incampe afore Termaine a towne standing upon the marches of Picardie, and in the region of those peoples whom the tins call Morini. The person of the king of England passed the sea a little after, who had it is maine armie fine thousand horses of service, and more then sortie thousand sootemen: An arie on not more notable by the multitudes of fouldiers and confideration of their valour, then most to their full ripenesse and perfection by degrees of time, study, and experience, made him the inf " renowmed and mighty Prince that lived in his age in all this part or circuite of the earth which « call Christendome. After the English were drawne into campe, which according to their cust, they environed with trenches and with carts, and so rampired it with wood and other firme 1 tter, and then planted it round about with artillery, that they feemed to be in a walled town:e 19 began to batter the towne of Terwaine in many places, and to make many mines, but they bare to give the assault, perhaps their provisions being lesse then their vertue, though their ve ur was nothing inferiour to the report that went of them . The town of Termane within was my well furnished with artilleries, and manned with a stregth of two hundred and fiftie Launces id two thousand footenien: which though it was a garrison very small in regard of the importa ee of the place, yet their daunger was no greater then their hope of succours: for that the French ag was come to Amiens, to the end that by his nearenesse he might give courage & comfort to the that were belieged, making great the difficultie to rescue the: he was very carefull to assemb army, which by true multering was supposed to containe two thousand five hundred launce to thousand Launceknights guided by the Duke of Gueldres, and ten thousand sootemen leavi in the parts of his realme. The greatest afflictio within the towne, was feare to want victuals, fo at (except of bread) they had not sufficient prouision of any one nature, a want which perhaps 1 de them more bold and buffe then otherwife they would, and leaft the fame necessitie might w to a desperate extremitie, though they durst not come to triall of their generall forces, yet ey forbare not to make practife of feruice, and vexed continually the English campe with the a rie, in which execution the great Chamberlaine of England was flaine, and one legge taken ay from Talbet then Captaine of Callice . The daunger of Termaine troubled much the king we for that by common negligence of Fraunce, and the difficultie to leavie Launceknights, h as long ere he began to put order to his affaires, his whole army was not yet affembled: neithe 125 he of minde (what aduer sities soener fortune brought vpon him) to hazard the fight with the 18mies, for that in loofing the battell, the whole realme and state of Fraunce had stood in me ell perill:he hoped also, that winter comming on, the which in those cold climats beginneth ber es, the enemies would be driven to dissolve, the ill oportunitie & season of the yeare driving the ho the enterprise, which the seare of the enemies could not make them to leaue: & yet his army affembled & his owne person remaining still at Amiens, he sent it forth to Aire neare to Ter me vnder the gouernment of Monsieur Longueuille, otherwise called the Marquis of Rottelm, I see of the bloud, and Captaine of an hundred Gentlemen of ordinaunce, ioyning with him he charge Monsieur Palissa: their commission was, that eschuing all occasions to attempt the attell, they should see to the well reuictualling of the towns thereabouts, which till that time he in ill furnished, being subicet to the same negligence that the whole seruice was, and withall do what they could to put into Termaine a succour of men and reliefe: a matter of it selfe very fie, and yet made more hard by the small agreement that was betweene the Generals, eit of them attributing seuerally to himselfe the whole direction and gouernement, the one for h 10blenesse and discending, & the other for his long experience in warre. Notwithstanding, wil by the necessitie of the time brooking no long delay, and what by the importunitie of them whin the town, crying out for a succour of men, there was a stregth of a thousand fine hundred la ces that adventured to approch the town on that fide that was furthest removed for the English and albeit there was a regimet of three thousand English bestowed at certaine passages to stop 1:m, the artilleries of the towne executed so furiously vpon thein, and the residue of the armie ing unprofitable to their refeuing, by reason of certaine overthwart trenches and ditches cast the towne, that Captaine Front aillas ouercomming the perill by his vertue, got to the gate, d put into the towne a supply of lxxx.men at armes without horses as they had required : and terwards with the same felicitie he retired with the residue of his copanies, finding easie by exrience the enterprife that was made hard by report, & ouercomming by his vertue the danger at without practife was holden desperat: he might under the same aduenture, have put victuals to the towne, if he had caried any with him, his fortune and the state of the perill being all one. By this experience the French Captaines were incouraged to make their approches another with a great quantitie of victuals, hoping in the fame felicitie: but the English that tooke warig by the last example, had raised new fortifications on that side, to stop them, and on the other e, had fent out their horsemen and fifteene thousand Almain sootemen to cut off their way: in much that as they were vpon their returne, the fortune of the first aduenture taking from them fuspition, and being remounted upon their little nagges of journey that were led spare, as men guiled with opinion of securitie, they were suddenly set upon, even in the greatest coniecture The overshrow guiled with opinion offectivitie, they were fuddenly let vpoil, even in the greatest confectute of the French their affurance and fafetic, and as men being passed from a perill they feared most into a danger neare Tery doubted least, they suffred the terrour of the accident to take from them all resolution, & put maine, infelues to flight without any refulance, looking in that diforder three hundred men at armes, th whom were taken prisoners the Marquis of Rottelin, Captaines Bayard and Faiette, with my others of marke and name: Monfieur Palissa was also taken prisoner, but escaped away by enture, his pollicie no lesse fauouring his safetie, then his fortune. It was thought that if the En-The had taken the oportunitie and offer of that dayes fortune, they had in that action opened to inselues a way to be maisters of the whole realine of Fraunce: for that behind, stood a great tell of Launceknights which had followed the men at armes, who if they had bene shocked louerthrowen, it had bene with so great domage to the French armie, that it is certaine that French king vpon the first newes beleeuing that they had bene broken indeede, would have en so desperate a sentence of his own safetie, that he would looke how he might flye into Bri-1e. But there was difference betweene the intention of the English and offer of their fortune. after they had given the chase to the horsinen, having nothing of more studie and care in their ide then the conquest of the towne of Termaine, they presented the Frenchensignes and priers before the wals: a spectacle which moved not a little the towne to despaire of succour: lioyning to it the view and confideration of their other calamities, and the Launceknights hall murmuring to endure without hope the last extremity of victuals, they agreed to leave the me, the horses and lives of the souldiers saucd, if they were not rescued within two dayes. And not to be doubted, that their holding out by the space of fifty dayes, was not a thing that greatrofited the Realine of France, who by the benefite of the log fuffering of Termaine, had respite emporife and prepare against many other greater afflictions, which otherwife so mighty an arof enemies would have brought upon them, even to the shaking of the Crowne of Fraunce. ttle before, Maximilian Cafar was come in person into the English armie, reviewing and ang out those places wherein in his youth, he had with so great glorie ouerthrowne the arme he French king Lows the eleventh: who whilest he remained in the campe, the affaires of warre tooke their chiefest direction and government from him.

The French king was not onely trauelled with the English armies, but also with greater daun-, he had his vexations by the Swiffers : for the communalties of those regions defiring with niuerfall minde that the king fhould disclaime from all titles and rights which he pretended to Duchie of Millan, wherein for that he did nothing, their hatred redoubled towards him, they Rifing of ile entred against him many actions of hostilitie, & set on fire many houses of private persons of Swiffere a-Gerna, whom they suspected to beare fauour to the affaires of the crowne of France: and pro- gainst the ding continually against all men noted of like suspicion, they had brought all the chiefetaines principals of them, to sweare to suffer all the pensions to go in common, and so falling into lies by publike order, they entred almost by heapes into Burgundie, their numbers being xx. uland footmen, & a thousand horsine. In which action they had certaine proportios of artille-iro Cafar, who, either according to his incostancie, or for iealousie he had of the, refused to go ther in person, not with stading he had promised both to the king of England, & to the Being drawne into this strength and power of watre, they went and incamped afore Dyon the thie towne of Burgundie, wherein was Monsieur Trimouille with a thousand Launces and I xe thou fand footmen. These natures of commons and popular peoples, having some doubt of their Cal taines, who began already to communicate with the French, tooke vpon them the managing the artilleries and fell to batter the towne, of whose defence Trimouille doubting much, hele recourse to the last remedies, and made with them a sudden accord without expecting any con mission from the king, on whose behalfe he made this contract, to renounce all the rights as claimes he pretended to the Duchie of Millan, and to pay them fixe hundred thousand crown within a certaine terme: for the observatio of which covenant he gave him foure of lages, perso very honorable and of great condition: and for the Swiffers they were bound to no other pre mile then to returne to their houses, a matter which tyed them not to remaine for afterward friends to the French king, but left them at libertie to returne when they lift to the inuations of le kingdome. Afloone as they were possessed of the ostages, they brake vp and dissoluted their arn immediatly, alleaging for their excuse with the king of England, for entring into this couens without his consent that they received not in time convenient, the money he had promised the It was thought that this capitulatio was the cause of the sauing of the whole realme of France, that the taking of Dyon, had put into the hands of the Swiffers a free power to run vp without. fishance even to the wals of Paris. And it was not vnlikely that the king of England passing the ucr of Somme, would have taken the field to joyne with them: a matter which the French col not let, for that neither the Duke of Gueldres being then come, nor in the armie aboue fixe the fand Launceknights, they were constrained to keepe themselues inclosed within townes. But ! king was not a little discontented with the resolution, complaining not a little against Monst. Trimouille, both for the fumme of money he had promifed, and much more that he had boil him to the refignation of his titles and interests, as an action of too great prejudice, and farre. worthy his greatnesse and the glory of the crowne of Fraunce: for which cause albeit the daun? had bene great if the Swiffers in their wrath had eftloones returned to affaile him, yet repol! much in the approch of the winter, and in the difficultie that they could not reaffemble so soc, and being withall resolute to runne all fortunes rather then to deprive himselfe of his rights in t Duchie (which he loued dearely) he determined not to ratific the agreement: year ather he be 1 to propound to them new offers, which much leffe that they did hearke vnto, feeing they did -Stantly reject them, with these bloudy threats, that if the ratification came not within a cert: time, they would cut off the heads of the offages. Terwaine being taken, whereunto the Archduke aspired by pretence of his auncient ri

& the king of England chalenged it to be his by the just prerogative of conquest and warre: far and he fel to this point for the anoyding of discord, to cast downe the wals to the ground, withflanding such violence was forbidden by the capitulatios made with them of Terwaine: mediatly after, Cafar went from the armie, giving this judgement upon the experience and till he had seene, that in matters of warre the English were more resolute then well aduised, and & futtle and politike then well disciplined and trained. From Terwaine the king of England wet o incampe before Tournay, a towne very strong and rich and of great devotion of long time to e crowne of Fraunce, but so enuironed with the countreys of the Archduke, that it was imposble to the French to rescue it so long as they were not maisters of the field. The French king is not a little glad of this enterprise, fearing least the enemie caried with victorie and wealth, wed transferre his forces into the body and parts of his realme of more importance: a feare which a him into no small perplexities: for, not with standing he had now areared a mighty army, when (befides the five hundred Launces which he had bestowed in garrison in S. Quintin) were 'o thousand Launces, eight thousand light horsemen Albanois, ten thousand Launceknights, atl 1fand Smiffers, and eight thousand footemen of his owne nation: yet it was farre inferiour tibe power and multitudes of the English armie, which, by the continual flocking of fouldiers, w. as the report went) resupplied to the number of soure score thousand fighting men. By the conteration of which inequalitie of forces, the French king who had no great hope to be able to de ad Bolei re and those parts of the countrey that are beyond the river of Somme, which he seareche - English would oppresse, looked how to defend Abeuille and Amiens, and the other townes lat are vpon the river of Somme: his deuise was also to let them for passing the river, and so to he

he English emic afore Jurney. orife either untill the cold feafon came, or else that the Scottish king in whom he hoped much, vere readie to aduance and draw them from that warre: his armie marched all the meane while ong the river of Somme, to let the enemies from winning passage. It was beleeved that the pervalions of Cefar wete the cause of this enterprile of the English, for hope that if the towne of ornay were take, it might either the or at som other time divolve into the power of his nephew whổ it was thought it did appertain: perhaps it moued vpổ a feare the armie had to be afflicted ith wat of victuals if they had bin in another place, or haply other places wherunto they might ue gone, had borne a more facility to be fuccoured by the enemies: but the towne of Tour - Tournay taken which was not manned but with bands of straungers and for reiners, and therefore of lesse ex-by the English. charion to be succoured, was so battered with artilleries in many seueral places, that after it had ade a small resistance, it yeelded, under safetic of goods and lives : and to advance an hundred outand duckets towards the defrayment of the warre, and to defend them from pillage. The fortune of the French men was no more gracious in other places, for that the Scottifb king mming to battell with the English armie vponthe river of Twede, where the Ladie Katherine m Queene of England was in person, was ouerthrowne with a verie great slaughter, the kings non being then flaine with one of his owne fonnes, who was Archbishop of S. Andrew with mie other Prelates and Nobles of that realine, and of the common fouldiers more then twelve puland bodies. After these victories about the end of October, the king of England leaving a ong garrison within Tournay, dismissed his horsemen and sootmen of the Almaines, & so dist sed himself to returne into England, reaping the great towns of Tournay as a fruit of his wars dgreat expences: for touching Terwaine whose walles he had throwne downe to the earth, naked feat and refemblance remained in the power of the French king. One cause that made king of England repasse the seas, was, that the season of the year etaking away all oportunities continue the warre in those cold regions, he held it a matter unprofitable to nourish an armie re with so great charges: and another was, that he thought to take order for the institution & ternment of the young king of Scots, who was in minoritie, and the sonne of his owne fifter,

Duke of Albany being gone thither, who was also of the bloud of the fame king. By the returne of the king of England, the feare of the Frenchmen being taken away, their king missed all his armie except the regiments of Launceknights: he saw himselfe delivered of the of daungers present, but not of feare to fall into them againe the next yeare with farre greadifficulties: he gathered this judgement by the behauiors of the king of England at his going ay, who vied many high threatnings against the Crowne of Fraunce, promising that he would e it a greater shake the next sommer: wherein he began already to make new preparations to ide the discommodities of his former delayes, & with more readinesse to open the warre asne as the season of the yeare would suffer: besides the French king knew that Casar had the e intention to annoy him, & feared withall least the king Catholike who with fundrie futtlehad excused himselfe of the truce made, least he shold wholly aliene the fro him, wold not alake armes with them: of this suspition he had great tokens by the discourse of a letter interted, wherein the king Catholike writing to his Embassadour resident with Casar, & expresan intention quite cotrary to his manifest speeches, which testified an earnest defire to make re against the infidels, & to go in personto recouer Ierusalem, he perswaded him to deuise dintly by what means the Duchy of Millan might be brought to Ferdinand their comon New, yonger brother to the Archduke. In this perswasion he occupied this maner of encourageit, that the estate being raged, it wold not be hard to reduce the residue of the regions of Itatheir denotion, and with the same facilitie joyned with his succours, Casar might make him-Pope, whereunto he had alwayes aspired since the death of his wife, and being once possesof that foueraignty, he should refigne to the vie and profite of the Archduke the Crowneimall: neuerthelesse he concluded that matters of so high nature and weight could not be led to ection but with time and with occasions. Besides all these, the French king doubted nothing re will of the Swiffers, whose obstinacies he could in no wife moderate, notwithstanding he le them offers aboue their merit: & they were of new incensed more then before bythe euaof the oftages deliuered by M.Trimonille, who fearing the daunger of their lines for want of ruation in the king, were secretly stolne away and fled into Germany: so that it was not out cause that he feared least by the occasion of so many other his adversities, they would rise to assayle presently, or at least the yeare after, the countrie of Burgundy or Dauphine. The difficulties were partly the occasion that made him fall to agreement with the Pope for caul spirituall: of which agreement the principall article contained the absolute rooting out of t Councell of Pi/a, which point was debated many moneths with verie great difficulties, specia for the regard of things done either with the authority of the same Councell, or against the mai flie of the Pope: fuch as it seemed verie vnworthie for the sea Apostolike to approue, and toc them off there could not but happen right great confusion: so that there was a delegation of the Cardinals to deuise of some means by the which such a disorder might be met withal!. This br also one difficultie, that it seemed not convenient to graunt to the king the absolution of penalt vnleffe he fuedfor it : whereunto the king would not confent, least by imputation his person as Crowne of France were noted of schisme: but at last the king was made weary with these pe plexities, and no leffe overlaboured with the importunities and willes of the people of his realn defiring with vinuerfall affection to be reunited to the Church of Rome: but most of all hew stirred and meued by the deuotion of the Queene, to whom those controuersies were grieuo In which respects he determined to yeeld to the will of the Pope, and not without some how that vpon the reappealment of these quarrels the Pope would some way ioyne to his ayde, wh unto with great arte he seemed to expresse to haue a good intention: and yet a new compla was added to the ancient injuries, for that the Pope by a speciall writ, had commanded the Sc sift king to attempt no domage or grienance to the Crowne of England: neuerthelesse in they Settion of the Councell of Lairan, which fell in the latter end of the yeare, the French Agent the name of their king, and protesting his commission, disclaimed from the Councell of Pi and stucke to the Councell of Latran: they promised besides, that sixe of those Prelates that affilt the Councell of Pifa, should go to Rome to do the like in the name of the whole Free Church, and that others of the Clergie should come to dispute vpon the pragmatike, with tention to referre themselves to the declaration of the Councel, of which in the same Session tl obtained full absolution of all things committed against the Church of Rome. These were the cidents and actions done in Italy, Fraunce, and England, in the yeare 1513.

In the beginning of the yeare following, Anne the French Queene passed from this lifete better, having scarcely talted the sweet fruit of the vnio with the Church which she had so un defired: she was a verie vertuous & Catholike Queene, and for those parts her death was gre ly forowed of all the realine, & of her naturall peoples of Brittaine. When the realine of Frau was thus reduced to the obedience of the Church, and by that meane both the name and aud ritie of the Councell of Pija vtterly remoued: some of those that had seare of the greatness. the French king, began to stirre and seare least his power were too much embased: but spi ally the Pope, who notwithstanding he continued in the same defire that the Duchie of Mo should not be recoursed by him, yet fearing least the king, made amazed with so great daung and remembring effloones the matters of the yeare past, would give himselfe sodainly to cord with Cafar (with whose will was alwayes concurrant the mind of the king Catholike): cotract his daughter with one of the Nephewes of those two kings, induing her for a downews the Duchy of Millan: he bega to perswade with the Swiffers, that for too great hatred against: French king, they would not put him into necessitie to do a matter which should be no lessen. indiciall to them then to him: He told them they were not ignorant of the ill mind that Cafa: the king Catholike bare to them, who if they obtained the Duchy of Millan by vertue of acc 1 with the French King, it would be a matter no leffe to the daunger of their liberty and author, then hurtfullto the prerogatiue of the Church, and perill to the whole state of Italie: That I ought to perseuer in their resolution, not to suffer the French king to recouer the Duchies Millan, yearhey ought alfo to take heed, least (asit often hapneth in the doings of men) touoydroo much one extremitie, they fell not into another extremitie more hurtfull and daunrous: That to affure themselues more then need was, that that estate should not reuert to e French, they were not the cause to make it fall into the hands of others, with so much them e perill and ruine to all, by how much lesse they should be found able to make resistance a fatre stronger power then the greatnesse of the Frenchking: That the common weale of & fers having made notable their name and reputation in the actions of warre with so many gleous and worthie victories, was to make themselues no lesse samous & renowmed by the praces

peace: That they were to foresee presently the daungers that were to come, and to remedie em with wisdome & counsell, without suffering things to slide & fall into places, from whence rey can not be drawne out & readdressed, but by armes and valour of the hand: That according the testimony of dayly experience, it hapned often in warre that the valour of men was smotered by the too great power of fortune: That it was a better counsell for them, to moderate in tme part the accord of Dian, specially the king offering them greater paiments, and promise to ake truce for three yeares with the state of Mullan, so tarreforth as they would not constraine In to religne his interests: which relignation being of greater consequence in apparance then in cect (for when oportunity shall returne to the king to recenquerit, the action of refignement fall be no other impediment to him then he lift) things for that difficultie ought not to be redud to fo great a daunger. On the other fide he aduited the French king with many working reahas to make election of the leffer ill, and rather to dispose himselfe to ratifie the accord of Dion, tento returne to the daunger of oppression by so many enemies in his realmethe next sommer: hat it was the office of a wife Prince to avoide the greater ill, and to embrace for good and profible rhe election of the leffer: That it was contrarie to the wife gouernement of a king, to take infelse out of one danger and disorder, to runne into another of greater importance and greater mie: That it could be no honour to him to graunt the Duchie of Millan with so manifelt a e of cowardize to his natarall engmies, who had purfued him with fo manie deceits and futies: That it was neither rest nor securitie to him, by diminishing so much his owne reputation, collarge the power of such as conspired altogether to pull downe the Crowne of Fraunce: at himselfe was a good witnesse that he could not be affured of any promise, of any faith or in that they make; a matter which he had well knowne by the experience of other times to his at harmes: That truly it was a hard matter to refigne his rights, but the infamie was so much the e, by how much a litle billet or writing made not his enemies more mighty: That fince it had he promifed without his privitie or confent, it might be faid, that it was not his devile from the juning, but in the execution he would be formuch the more excused, being as it were conincd for the promife made by his people, to keepe fomewhat his faith: Befides, the world h know from how great and desperate a state of daunger, that accord at that time had deliedthe realine of Fraunce: That he allowed well that by other meanes and offers he laboured nduce the Swiffers to his intention: And that touching his part, as he defired for the furety of kingdome, that in some fort there were made an agreement betweene them & him, so in that on he would omit no good office of amitie and trauell to draw the Swiffers conformable to will; but if they would be obstinate, he exhorted him in grauitie & fatherly denotion to obey eand necessitie, though not for other regards, yet not to take from him the excuse to depart nthe alliance he had with his enemies. The king knew that those reasons were full of fidelity lunth, and yet he could not difgelt them without murmure, for that the Pope had cunningningled threats with perswasions: and albeit he confessed that his necessitie constrained him nake some resolution that might diminish the number of his enemies, yet he was at a point ter to give himselfe up to all daungers, then to refigne his rightes to the Duchie of Millan: creunto befides his owne inclination, he was encouraged by the importunities and counfels of le of his Court, to whom albeit it was grieuous to follow the warres any more in Italy, yet re-Sting the dignitie of the Crowne of Fraunce, it was farre more intollerable to see their king so moully constrained to disclaime his properties in the Duchie. There was discerned the same linacie in the Parliaments and affemblies of the Swiffers: to whom notwithstanding the king de offer to pay presently foure hundred thousand Crownes, & eight hundred thousand at suntearmes: and albeit the Cardinall of Ston with many other of their rulers inclined to accept le conditions, weighing the estate of the danger, if the French king shold iowne with Calar & h the king Catholike: yet the commons of that nation increased in their generall harred to the ne of France, and made proud by so manie victories, tooke to themselves a confidence to and the Duchie of Millan against all Princes knit in one strength: the authoritie of the Carall of Sion was much diminished amongst them, and their other chiefe rulers were suspeby reason of the pensions which they were wont to receive from the French: matters ch made the Cantons with more oblinacie to stand upon the ratification of the accord of mand befides giving themselves over to rashinesse and disobedience to counsell, they debated coenter of new into Burgundy, an action which the Cardinall and other Chiefetaines among them laboured to hinder, not only with manifest authority, but indirectly & with many sleight deferring from one day to another that refolution. Therefore the French king standing neither of fended with them, nor affured of them, forbare not to continue with the king Catholike the pra Etise of the mariage, in the which (as before) the principall difficulty was, whether the Dam fell should remaine in the power of her father in law, till time had made her able to the consum mation of the mariage: for that the father retaining her, it seemed to Casar, that he could in n fort be affured of the effect. The king was content to entertaine the difficulties that happed inth action, for that he saw there was some hope that the brute of this match (which he diligent) spread abroad) might to his profite mollifie the minds of others, by reason of the interests the had in it. The king Catholike fent to him Quintaine his Secretary, who in that negociation he ha fent to him the yeare before: and he going afterwards by his confent to Calar, returned el foones to the French king: at whose returne, to the end the difficulties of the peace might be n solued with greater commoditie and respite, the king and Quant ame in the name of the king C. tholike prolonged yet for another yeare the truce that had bene made the yeare before : tl prolongation was under the fame conditions that were before, fauing that they fuffered a feet addition of this article, that during the truce the French king should not molest the estate Millan: in which article Genes nor Ast had no comprehention. This condition, which the kin concealed as much as he could, the king Catholike caused to proclaime it solemnly through Spaine, a thing which made the world vncertaine which was most true, either the negative of one, or the affirmative of the other. In the fame covenant was referred to Cafar and the king England, a respite of three moneths, to enter into the agreemet: which albeit Quintaine did ash on both their behalfes, yet touching the king of England there was no apparance, and in that beguiled himselfe much : but for Casar, the king of Aragon who alwayes stood resolued not haue warre on the part of Spaine, had perswaded him that there was no better meane to con passe the mariage that was sollicited. This prorogation of the truce aggravated the Popes suspi on, that betweene those three Princes were either made already, or at a point to be made so conclusion of greater things to the harme of Italie: and yet for all that, not going from his f deliberation, that it would be a matter veric hurtfull to the common libertie to luffer the D chie of Millan to divolve into the power of Cafar and the king Catholike, and of no leffe pe to have it recovered by the French king, he found it a hard matter fo to temper and proces in things, that the means which ayded one of his intentions, should not hurt the other, for one of the daungers came of the embasing and the searc, and the other of the greatnesse a furetie of the French king. Therefore to deliuer the king from necessitie to agree with them, continued his perswafions to the Swiffers (to whom the truce that was made was suspected): they had reason to compound with him: and to the end to make to the king in alleuents thee cending into Italy more hard, he tooke more paines then ever he did to agree Cafar with Senate of Venice: who for their parts judging that to make truce, would be to affure the man of Cafar in the townes that remained to him, stood resolved with a wonderfull constance. mind either to make an absolute peace, or to continue the watre, not retiring from so how rable resolution for any accident or ill aduenture whatsoeuer: for, besides so manie aduessis hapned in the warre, and the dispaire, that that yeare the French king would send no armicit Italy, they had against them this token both of the anger of heaven, and ill disposition of cash accidents, which are vainly furmifed to depend upon the power of fortune, that in the beginn of the yeare a great fire kindled in Venice; which, beginning in the night at the bridge Rialto, caried by the violence of the North winds, refifting all remedies of the diligence and travell men, and confumed the most rich and populous part of the citie.

But because the Pope shewed such forwardnesse to have them accorded, there was estion made betweene the a new compromise in his owne person: which bare sull power without listation, and was not restrained to any time, and yet with a secret promise under his hand, to penounce nothing but by the consent of both parties and after the arbitration was given up, he ioyned by writ both the one and the other to surcease from armes, an order very slenderly obused by the Spaniards & Almanns, for that those copanies of the Spaniards which were in garma at Polesina & in Este, made pillage of the whole constrict thereabout, and the Vicerey sent to

Vincenfa, to the end to be in possession at the time when the sentence should be given. Be sides cle insolencies, Captaine Frangipan did many harmes in the countrey of Friull, and the Veneans not standing carefully vpon their gard, the Launceknights, by an intelligence with certaine nished men, tooke Marano a towne in Friell neare to Aquilea, & hath his fituation upon the 1. To encounter these doings the Venesians sent thither by land Baltazar Scipion, with a cerme proportion of fouldiers, & Jerome Sauorgnano with many other bands of the countrey men, ho being there incamped, and holding the towne strait by the army at sea, there came to the cours of the towne, fine hundred Almaine horsemen, and a regiment of fine thousand footecn: for whose comming those that were within the towne issuing out to assaile the Venetran impanies, they were put to flight with a great flaughter of men, and no leffe loffe of artillery, fides that with certaine ships they tooke from them a gally with many other vessels. After this Hory the Almains tooke Monfalcon by force: and not many dayes after four hundred horsemen xij hundred Launceknights that had bene at Vincen/a, came as a strength to them of Marano, ho joyning with the other bands of horsemen and sootemen newly come into Friull, ouerran te whole countrey. By reason of which oppressions, Malatest a Sociano governor of the couny with fixe hundred horsemen and two thousand footemen, together with lerome Sauoranano dtwo thousand of the countrey men, who were now withdrawne into V dino, seeing neither by ir valour nor by their fortune they were able to make refistance, passed on the other side of nensa, giving succours where they could: but the Almains being devided, one part of the tooke tero & occupied the whole countrey thereabout with roades and incursions : amid which inencies the Venetians that commanded all the passages, charged certaine bands of them at Baswhere they kept no gard. And albeit they were leffe in number, yet they put them to flight & led three hundred footemen of the fine hundred that were there, and tooke prisoners two optaines & many fouldiers. The other part of the Almains was gon to incampe at Off standing on the top of a sharpe mountaine, and after they had executed vpon the Castle with their artiles, & given many vaine affaults, they hoped to carry it by befreging, having forme affurance fro m within of a want and necessity of water: but the benefit of the heaven remedied that want the fudden falling of fundry great showers, whereupon they continued afresh the affault, but h fo ill fuccesse, that finding neither fruit in the assault, nor fauour in the siege, they levied their spe. These matters were not a little gricuous to the Pope, but the thing that troubled him most, s, that he could find no meane of agreement to content both parties: for that because of the tinually ariation of things, the hopes changing according to the fuccesse of the same, it fell out t when Cafar had consented to leave Vincenfa, keeping still Ferona, the Venetians refused vnthey were repossessed of Verona: and when the Venetians much embased by their calami-, would be contented with Vincen a onely, Cafar on the other fide, not fatisfied with Verona, uiredalfo Vincenfa. These difficulties made weatie the Pope, who though he supposed that declaration would not be accepted, yet to shew that it was not long of him that they were not onciled, he pronounced a peace betweene them, with this clause, that armes should be presentayd afide on all fides: he referred to himselfe this power, to expresse within one yeare the The Popes senditions of the peace, wherein, as also in the furceasting of armes, the king Catholike should be the controver prehended: That Cafar should depose out of his hands Vincensa, and all else that he and the see bequeene niards possession the countries of Padoa and Trenisan: That the Venetians should do the like Cesar and the Grema: And for other things, every one untill the publication, should hold what he possessed: Venetians. it either party should ratifie his sentence within a moneth, and vpon the ratification the Veneto pay to Cafar xxv. thousand duckats, and as much more within three moneths next: That ifh parts did not ratifie, the sentence should be of none effect. He chose this maner of arbitraand judgement not accustomed, as the most indifferent not to displease neither side : and tufe there was no man had power to ratifie for the king Catholike, notwithstanding his Emador gaue assurance of his consenting, he referued to either party so much time to ratifie, as commission and faculty to doit might conveniently require. But because the Venetians were lute not to ratific it at all, defiring that at the fame time the conditions of peace might be pronced, the sentence tooke no effect.

this time the affaires of the Venetians stood in good case touching the desence of Grema, th was afflicted within with plague and penutie, and without was befreged with the campe

of the enemies: Profeer Colonno was come on the one fide to Efenanga with two hundred mere armes, two hundred and fiftie light horsemen, and a strength of two thousand sootemen: and the other fide was come to Vmbriana Siluio Sauello with his guidon of horfmen and a regime of two thousand sootemen. Both the places were not about two miles distant from Crema, fin whence the fouldiers made many fallies to skirmish with the enemies: who as they were in the lodgings at Vmbriana, neither making doubts, nor keeping gard, Ranse de Cere with one to of his companies that were within Crema, iffued out one night, and gaue them a Camuefadon their lodging, when suffring the paines of their owne security and negligence, the most of the were put to flight, and many of their footemen patt by the fword. This made Profer retire w his companies, effeeming it little to his fafety to remaine there, where the negligence of his lowes had opened so manifest a gappe to his perill. A few dayes after, the occasion was offered Ranse to passe the river of Adde by foard, by reason of the lownesse and shalownesse of the was and having drawne over his companies at Chastillon Lodigiano, he stripped a regiment of f menat armes that lay there, reaping no leffe prayles of these enterprises both happie and su industry, then were due to him by just merite vpon the vniuerfall beginning: the reputation of valour and celerity made him to be effeemed one of the principall Captaines in all the region Italy, wanting nothing to his worthinesse, that either nature or fortune could give him. These ings drew the Venetians to a resolute counsell and courage to proceede to the reconquering Freull, in which expedition they fent thither Aluiano with two hundred men at armes, foure ! dredlight horsemen & seuen hundred sootemen: as they marched along the high way of Pol nous, where lay part of the strength of the Almains, his light horsemen that scoured before, countred out of the towne with Captaine Riffan an Almain, accompanied with two hunds men at armes and three hundred light horsemen, by whom at the first encounter they were refed; but Aluiano comming to the reskew with the refidue of his companies, the skirmilh was foones recontinued with greater fury and danger, & no leffe doubtfull the iffue, till Captaine R being wounded in the face, was taken prisoner by Malatesta Sogliano. The chance of the sa threw the next calamity vpon the foul diers of Risan, who feeking their fafety by disorder and ing, retired in their calamity to Portonouo: but fearing they should fayle to defend the towne, were not able to keepe the field, in their feare they fled from the place that earff they ran vite fuccour, abandoning the towne which immediatly was put to facke, and many bodies o countrey men flaughtred. After this Aluxano, in whom no one vertue was more commence then his celerity, tooke the way to Ofofo, which Frangipan had newly befreged with the ce part of the Almains, who hearing of the comming of Aluiano, leuied their fiege, not with flan they loft much of their baggage and artilleries, by a charge which the light horsemen gaues their taile. By the fame of these encounters, bringing alwayes with them their victories, almost whole countrey of Italy became returned to the obedience of the Venetians: and Aluian tempting a vaine enterprise vpon Goritia, retited with his army to Padoa, having by his one cettificate to Rome, fubdued what by the fword and prisoners, two hundred men at armes, to hundred light horsmen, and two thousand footme. But by reason of his departing, the numb of the Almains being increased, they tooke of new Cromonio and Monfalcon, and constrained Venetians to breake up their fiege from before Marano, where not many dayes before, Capi Frangipan had bene taken by ambush and led prisoner to Venice : for the Venetians feeling plies and succours to flocke, brake vp from thence in disorder, and as it were discomfitted: 212 litle after their estradiots being put to slight, Iohn Vetturio their assistant was taken with an Indred horfmen. Thefe changes and alterations hapned oftentimes in Friult by the neighborhood the Almans, who were not serued in that quarter with other fouldiers then trayned and caplined, and fuch as after they had overrun, and pilled those quarters, and that they perceive in comming of the. Venetian regiments, with whom many of the countrey joyned, they retirecamediately to their houses, returning alwayes to the service as occasion served. The Venetians at thither a new supply of companies, by reason whereof the Viceroy gaue order, that Alarjon no of his Spanish Captaines, which lay betweene Este, Montagnano, & Cologno, should go to Fill with two hundred men at atmes, an hundred light horimen, & fine hundred footmen: but vn tstanding on the way that a truce was made in the countrey by reason of the haruest, he brakes his purpose and returned from whence he came.

Thus as the warres of Italy proceeded mildly and in an easie course, so also the practises of The books of ice and agreement were not discontinued : for the French king being not altogether deprined the French sope that the Swiffers would confent to receive recompence of money in place of relignation king. his interests and rights, sent to solicite them in that point with great instance. But the Commalties were so farre estraunged from the king and his affaires, that after they had compelled th many threatnings the gouernour of Geneva (when the offages fled) to deliuer them as soner the president of Grenoble, whom the king had sent to that City to negociate with them: y examined him with many torments, whether any of their nation received any increase of is infons, or intertained fecret intelligence with the French king: wherein no humanity nor inflition was fufficient to stop the course of their barbarous cruelty. Besides, the French g was not without sulpition, that the Pope, who for the diversitie of hisplots and intions, was conffrained to fayle with great warineffe amongst fo many rockes, would fecretly rke the Swiffers not to couenant with the king without him: not that he doubted he would re them up to make war, from which he diffwaded them so much as he could, but to remaine ne in the accord of Dion, or elfe for feare left with this beginning they were brought to be arate from him. In thele regards the king threatned that he would make half to come to acd with the refidue, for that he alone would not stand thrust out to the battery of the whole ild: he was also wearie of the intollerable expenses and insolencies of souldiers, for that having edinto Fraunce twenty thousand Launceknights, whom he could not have altogether, but enthe king of England lay before Tournay, he would not fend them backe againe, but retained n in Fraunce, to haue them ready for employment in due time according to occasion and neity. These were they that did infinite harmes in his countrey, with whom his authority was litle ected, that by force was not able to represse their insolencies. In these difficulties, and in so it confusion of affaires, the only matter that began to open to the French king the way to his ty and hope to repossesse his first power and reputation, was, the incredible discontentment the king of England received of the renouation of the truce which his father in law had made: itter contrary to his faith and promise many times reiterated, to make no couchant nor contwith the French king without his consent: he complained so much the more publikely of by how much it was the third time that his father in law had dallied with him, and therefore egan more and more to estrangehis mind from the renewing of the war against the French. Pope was not negligent to take the oportunity of the kings disposition, and began to worke the Cardinall of Yorke to perswade his king, that contenting himselfe with the gloric he had en, and remembring what correspondencie of faith he had found in Cafar, in the king Caike, and the Smillers, he would for beare to trauell any more with armes the Realme of unce : which the Cardinall tooke upon him, either for a feare he had that the French king talethe king of England would inuade him) would make peace and parentage with Candtheking Catholike, as he alwayes threatned : or else he thought that peace ensuing beene them, it were good for him to aduance himfelfe as an actor, and win fome fauour with rench king in an action which was not in his power to let. It is most certaine, that when Pope was told that the French king would take armes against the Duchie of Willan, beonce affured of the king of England: he aunswered, that, he knew well enough the estate of daunger, but on the other fide was to be confidered, the perill that might breede of the nion of those kings: that in a matter of so great importance it was hard to ballance things ctly, and to find a counfell that were wholly cleare from those dangers: That in all events the Vers would defend the Duchy of Millan: And laftly he answered that it was necessary in deations fo vncertaine and difficult, to referre one part to the arbitrement of aduenture and Treaty of me. What locuer was the cause, either for the authority of the Pope, or by the proper inclina - peacebetme one of the parties, there began immediatly a practife of accord betweene the king of England England and the French king: the motions and forespeeches of it were begun by the Pope with the France. op of Yorke, and were with diligence caried into England, whither for that businesse the I sent the Generall of Normandy, but under colour to treat for the delivery of the Marquis bothelin: Affoone as he was come there was proclaimed a furceaffing of armes by land onely cene the two Realmes, so long as the Generall remained in England. The king of Englands Ciation to peace was increased by the occasion of new injuries: for where Casar had promidiot to ratify without him, the truce made by the king Catholike, he fent notwithling to the same king the instrument of ratification, and by a letter which he wrote to the French king, he ratified in the name of Colar, but retained the instrument the better to viehisa tificiall feniblaunces and demonstrations. Associates the negociation was begun betweened two kings, the Pope defirous to purchase grace with them both, sent by post into France t; Bishop of Tricaro to offer him all his authority and faculty, and to that end he arrive in England by the sufferance of the sayd king. At the first opening of this practise for pear there fell out many difficulties, for that the king of England demaunded Boleine in Picari, with a great fumme of money: but at last all the differences fell upon the towne of Tourn, the king of England striuing to retaine it, and the French objecting some difficultie: in so mu as the king of England dispatched in post to the French king the Bishop of Tricaro, whom: charged, without imparting in what nature of particularitie confished the difficultie, to deck: to the king from him, that in regard of fo great a benefite, he should not stand upon so mar futtle difficulties, but to confider that in a Prince reason should beare more imperie then pl fion. The Frenchking, because he would neither do wrong to his Crowne, nor ill conti: his people, the towne of Tournay being verie Noble and loyall to the Crowne of Fraun, cansed the matter to be debated in full Councell, wherein was an assistance of the principals othis Court, who adulfed him with one voyce to embrace peace, yeavnder the condition offered. And yet in that time the king Catholike did what he could to breake it, offer? the king many plots and deuties, but specially to minister to him all his meanes and fauours conquer the Duchie of Millan: but the aunswere being returned into England that a French king stood contented with the resolution of Tournay, the peace succeeded, and was cocluded in the beginning of August betweene the two kings during their liues, and for one yes after their death.

In the capitulation it was expressed that Tournay should remaine to the king of England whom the French king should pay fixe hundred thousand crownes, and that in such fort of dil-bution that the French king should make payment of an hundred thousand frankes enery yes, till the full payment was fatisfied: That they should be bound to defend their cstates mutu? and reciprocally with ten thousand footenien if the warre went by land, and with fixe thous onely if the warre were made by fea: That the French king should be bound to serue the k? of England in all his affaires with twelve hundred launces, and the king of England likewil > minister to his seruices with ten thousand sootenien: the expences to be defraied by either s them that should have neede of the men: Both the one and other of them named the Secil king, the Archduke, and the Empire: But Cafar and the king Catholike were not named: e Swiffers had a nominatio, but it bare a codition, that who fo euer would defend against the Fre h The Fr, King king, the estate of Millan, Genes, or Ast, shold be excluded out of the dominatio. This peace will have maried the La was made with a wonderful readinesse, was continued by the mariage of the kings sister of Eng. Id ay Mary fifter with the French king, under condition that he should acknowledge to have received foure !to the King of dredthousand crownes for her dowry. The contract or handsastings were made in England, wie the king Catholikes Embaffador was not in presence, for the great hatred the king of Eng. d bare to the king his maifter. And even ypon the conclusion and resolution of this peace, a c to the Court of Fraunce the instrument of ratification which Cafar had made, together the his commission and the king Catholikes, for conclusion of the mariage that was solicited tweene Ferd. a' Austriche and the second daughter of Fraunce not yet source yeares of age : it the practife of that mariage vanished presently by reason of the peace, that was now establish: and the French king to fatisfie better the king of England, gauc order that the Duke of Suff & Captaine generall of the Launceknights that were it lis pay, should depart the dominior of Fraunce, in whom the honours and recompences that the king made to him ouercame all o 1fions of disconteutment, the bounty and liberality to the one, being no greater then the affal ty and disposition of the other.

England.

Actions of the Pope.

The Pope had also in this time made new aliances, for that according to his diffimulation to wished on the one side that the French king should not recouer the Duchy of Millan, and or he other fide he fought to entertaine the king and the other Princes as much as he could with furty meanes: and therefore he had dealt with the king by the Cardinall S. Senerin, who man: his affaires in the Court of Rome, that feeing the times suffered not to knit betweene them a rice

it and more discouered alliance, that at least there might be layd a beginning and founda-, whereupon might be raised a hope to accomplish at another time a more straite intellie: to those ends he sent him the particularities of articles. But the French king, not with standing nade demonstration to like well of the motion, did not answer so directly and speedily as was ked for: he was fifteene dayes in refoluing, either for the impediment of other affaires, or that expected fome answer from another place, to the end to proceede according to the trayne of ires, by which delaying the Pope entred into new capitulations for a yeare with Cafar and the Catholike, which yet coprehended no other matter then the defence of their comon effates: the king Catholike was entred afore, not without cause into suspicion that he aspired to the alme of Naples for Iulian his brother, and had already entertained in that action some practise h the Venetians. This new confederation was scarcely established and concluded, when the nch kings answer came. By it he approued all that the Pope had propounded, with this onely lition, that fince he was to bind himselfeto the protection of the Florentines, of Iulio de Medihis brother, and Lawrence his Nephew, whom the Pope had advaunced to the administration he affaires of Florence, that he would reciprocally be bound to the defence of the Crowne of sunce. But the Pope excused himselfe touching the action of capitulation with Cafar and the g Catholike, that feeing how long he deferred to make answer to a demaund so reasonable, he ald not but enter into some doubt: and yet the confederation was but for a short time, & conred no matter prejudiciall to him, nor to hinder the perfection of the practife begun betweene m. These instifications were accepted by the king, & so they passed the couenant, not by instrunrauthentike, to hold it more fecret, but by a private writing subfigned by both their hands. The peace betweene the king of England and the French king, was more sudden and easie then sexpected, being vnlikely that so great hatreds redoubled by new injuries, should with such litie be converted into amitie and aliance: haply the peace was not liking to the Pope, who el as others was perswaded, that there might grow betweene them rather a truce then a peace, it leaft if it resolved to the nature of a peace, it would either intangle the king with harder conons, or at least with obligation not to affayle the Duchie of Millan for a certaine time. But it ught incredible discontentment to Cafar and the king Catholike, who, as there is none cuill in naine actions which hath not joyned with it fome good, so he assured not with standing that he eiurd by it in his minde two contentments: the one, for that the Archduke his Nephew being of hope to give his lifter for wife to the French king, and entring withall into diffrust of the gof England, would be now compelled to do nothing without his counfell and authoritie: the ter, for that the French king flanding now in good possibilitie of children, the succession of , mieur de Angoulesme was put in doubt, to whom he bare no little hatred, for that he nourished treat defire to restore the king of Nazarre to his estate: onely the Swiffers gaue it out, that they r syced all at that accord, not with standing they retained against the French king the same hatred ry did before : the reason of their gladnesse grew of an opinion they had, that the French king Ing now at libertie, would take occasion to recontinue the warre in the Duchie of Millan, by wich meane they should estsoones begin to declare to all the world their vertue and their faith. dtruely it was not to be doubted, that the Frenchking, being now deliueted almost of all te to have warre beyond the Mounts, would not be touched with his old defire to reconter the Duchie of Millan: onely it could not be difeerned whether he would prefently difle himselse to armes, or deserre it till the yeare following, for that the facilitie of the enterprise peared to all men, but there was none that differned any figne of preparations. In which vncerthic the Pope, notwithstanding that conquest was gricuous to him, stirred him up not to ferre nor corrupt the present occasions: whereinhe gaue him to understand that all things troill prepared to make refistance, both for that the Spanish armie was diminished and ill payd, epeoples of Millan reduced to great pouertie and firaitnesse, and also none was able to adtunce money to make the Swiffers march. These persivations caried so much the greater sorce dauthoritic, by how much a little before the peace of the king of England, the Pope expressing slefte that the French king should recouer Genes, had given him a certaine hope to induce Flauran Eregolo to compound with him. Affuredly the Pope in this action proceeded not with I ceritie and good meaning, which disposition moued in him as was supposed, for that seeing cry one ill furnished, & no lesse doubting least the French would make that expedition without his counfell fince he had his men at armes in readineffe, and many leavies of Launceknights at hi denotion, thought by that meane to preuent and winne his friendship: perhaps (and in thish proceeded with greater futteltie) he was induced by the knowledge he had that the Emperor and the king Catholike were of opinion, that it was not lawfull to the French king to inuade the Duchie of Millan; an opinion which though they supposed to be true, yet the French king de niedit, auowing that it was good in him, and he was not forbidden to take armes against the estate of Mullan during the truce. By reason whereof, the Pope perswading himself that the kir would not enter into the enterprise, thought he would expresse to him a good disposition of w. which also should serve him for excuse, if another time he required succours of him, and the ma ter succeeded according to his opinion: for, the king being resoluted, either for that cause, or se his prefent necessitie of money, or lastly for the nearenesse of the winter, not to enter into arm afore the spring time, and making shew that he had considence, that even in that time the Pop fauour would not fayle him, he wrote answer to him, all eaging many excuses touching his defe ring, but concealed the excuse of the truce which yet endured, and perhaps was the principa Neuerthelesse he had defire to attempt the reconquering of Genes, or at least to succour the La terne, which the same yeare by his direction, had bin reuichualled many times with certaine pr portions of victuals by the aduenture of fundry finall veffels, who making as though they won enter the port of Genes, diffembled with the warders, and were profitable to them of the lanter But at last the extremitie of victuals growing aboue all remedie, and no lesse diligence of the er mie to keepe them suppressed in that want, and their calamitie not able to temporise and expe any longer after fuccours, the garrifon within, was driven to yeeld it vp ro the Genomais, who their spite rased it from the foundations: a matter not a little displeasing to the king . And alb the loffe of this fortreffe tooke wholly from the king all cogitations to vrge a prefent war agai the Genowais, yet it diminished nothing his disposition to the action of Millan, whereunto turned all his preparations, to inuade the yeare following that state with maine armies: he hot l that the Pope, both for the denout intention he protefted, and for the good disposition hell shewed in the negociations with the English and the Smiffers, and lastly for that he had proud! him to the enterprife, would joyne with him & fauout the action, the rather for that he had m. him many generall offers, and particularly had promifed to ay de him to reconquer the Real: of Naples, either to the vie of the Church, or to the benefit of Inlie his brother: but there hap! new occasions for the which the king began to enter into some distrust of him. The Pope wo neuer put end to the affaires that the Duke of Ferrara had with him, notwithstanding at his aspiring to the Popedome, he had given him many faire hopes, promising to render to him R. qua, at fuch time as his brother the Cardinall should be returned from Hungaria: but he was m: liberall to promise, then ready to performe, for that after the returne of his brother, he went wayes in deferring with many excuses: and yet he forbare not to confirme to him the selfe sa: promifes not onely with words, which might be vaine and vnaffured, but by writing fet out vr ! the authoritic & testimonic of his name, in which he consented that he should take the revenue s Reggia, as a degree to the whole which was to return e vider his dominion: it was well know that the Popes intention was farre otherwise, dissembling in meaning the things he had sim a fpoken with his mouth: his inclination and defire to occupie Ferrara were stronger then his r mife and true meaning, whereunto happily he was caried by Albert de Carpie Cafars Emba dour & great enemy to the Duke, and also by the reasons of many others, setting before his s the glory of Inlio which was perpetuall, for that he had so greatly advanced and augmented dominion of the Church: and fometimes they preferred the occasion to bestow an honour eflate vpon Iulio his brother, who thirsting after too great things, and nourishing himselfe the hopes immoderate, had voluntarily confented that his Nephew Lawrence, should retain at 11rece the authoritie of the house of Medicis: so that the Pope being entred into these thoughts. 1tained of Cafar who was alwayes needy of money, to deliuer to him in morgage the citie of 21dona for fortie thousand duckats according to the capitulation made with him a little afore it death of the late Pope: he made his reckening to vnite that citie with Reggia, Parma, & Plasse, and to give them in patronage or perpetuall government to Iulio, adding to them Ferrara, if et the occasion served him to get it: he sought to do a thing by authoritie and sauour of times, with he could not do by equitie or lawfull course of instice. But that maner of morgaging put the Fich

The Latern of Genes rafed by sie people, ig into great suspition, for that in his conceit it caried a manifest signe of straight alliance with gar, being also no lesse discontented that the Pope had given him money: whereof not withnding, the Pope excused himselfe, alleaging that Cafar had delivered Modena to him for assuice of the money which he had received of him afore. The king on the other fide augmeted his pition, for that vpo a victorie which the Turke got vpo the Sophy king of Persia, the Pope couing it to the vniuerfail danger of Christendome, wrote letters to all Princes, aduising the to defe armes among it themselves, to result or invade the common enemies of the faith: he protested e thing under his letters, and practifed another by operations feetet, proceeding alwayes with e apparances, and yet holding his intentions diffembled: but the matter that almost altogether closed his purposes, was, that he sent under the same shadow & pretence, to Venice, Peter Bemhis Secretarie, and afterwardes Cardinall, to dispose that state to agree with Casar, towardes om the same difficulties continuing that had bin before, the Venetians would not be wrought, manifested to the French king the occasion of his comming: a dealing that did so much duftent the king, that the rather for that the Pope fought to depriue him of his fuccours at a time E he was ready to aduaunce armes, he renewed eftfoones with the king Catholike the ancient ctifes, & that either to the end the Pope should be touched with that feare, or at least if he were eleffe, to conclude absolutely: so hote he was aboue all other things in the expeditio of Millan. In those times there were not in any quarter of Italie other Hirres or emotions, then against Emotions a-Venetians, against whom were raised many secret ambushes and conspiracies: for, accor- Sains the Ve-Venetians, against whom were raised many recret amounts and compilates. For, accounting the property of the Ventians, and of the Ventians enemies campe, entred Padoa with mindes to kill Alutano by direction of their Captaines, shoped by the trouble and disorder of the people for the death of such a Captaine, they old be able with their campe to carie the towne: So different at this day are the Aratagemes of from the vertue of the augicients, who much leffe that they would fuborne an infirument to reat a treason, but of the contrary having knowledge of it, they would lay it open to the nies, to the end that by their vertue they might vanquish the infidelitie preteded; but the conicy being detected, the Magistrates committed the traitors to the due paines of their offence. The Spanish armie, being now well diminished in numbers, lay incamped betweene Alonano Cologno, & Efter and the Venetians, to the end to conftraine them to returne to the kingic of Naples, leavied an armie at fea, and made their Admirallor Captaine generall Andrew ii, whom they thought to fend to inuade Powilla: but for many difficulties that happened, expedition went no further, being affoone discontinued as it was thought your. Afterwardes Spaniards came to the towre neare Vincefa, by the persuasio of the Almains that were witherona, to the end to joyne with them in an enterprise to wast and ouerrunne the corne of the loans. But after the Spaniar ds had taried in that place in vaine many dayes, being both reduto a very small number, and not able to accomplish the promises under the which they had dthem they left there their enterprise to spovle their corne, for bearing in such rashnesse to do slence which would draw with it a greater reuenge then was the injurie: and after they had of the Almains xv.hundred footmen, they marched with feuen hundred men at armes, feuen Ired light horfemen, and three thousand flue hundred Spansh footenien, to incampe before della, wherein were three hundred light horsemen: they marched with great diligence all the t,& came to the place within two houres in the morning, & falling to batter it with their aries, they caried the towne the fame day at the fecond affault: they made prisoners all the light emen that were there, and so returned to their campe lying within three niyles of Vincensa, nano making no refistance: he had received speciall commaundement from the Senate o fight, and lay incamped upon Brenta with seuen hundred men at armes, a thousand horsemen, and seuen thousand footemen, and the place being strong by situation and de-; gaue him great oportunitie to vexe the enemies with his light horfine. Neuertheleffe a little the retired to Barfillo almost afore the gates of Padoa, to the end to draw his army into a place retie: but the whole courrey being turned into spoyle & wast, by the pillages that were made oth the armies, the Spaniards having great want of victuals, retired to their first lodgings thence they were come, leaving abandoned the Citie of Vincensa and the rocke of Brendola, his about lenen myles fro it. They relieued the selues with no other subsidies or paymets, the thetaxatios which they imposed vpo Verona, Bressia, Bergama, & other places thereabouts. Υy

Vpon the retiring of the Spaniards, Aluiano bestowed himsels with the armie betweene Batal and Padon, the place being strong and proper; and there vnderstanding that there was within Equator footemen, who being entred afore they were discerned, tooke four escore light horsemen of Cataine Corners, who said himsels in the Castell, and with that pray retired to the armie. But Venetians having sent to the armie fresh bands of fouldiers, Aluiano drew neare to Montagna, and presented the battell to the Viceroy, who refused to accept it being sattemericain in fore, and in retired to Polesima de Rouigno: an oportunitie agreeing to the courage of Aluiano, what having now no more impediments beyond Adice, made dayly incursions even to the gatest Verona; the same to touching the Viceroy with the daunger of that Citie, that leaning withing the same than the same and athous and footemen, himselse with the residue of the mie went to the defence of that Citie, disposing his forces not sufficiently according to the este went to the defence of that Citie, disposing his forces not sufficiently according to the este went to the defence of that Citie, disposing his forces not sufficiently according to the este went to the defence of that Citie, disposing his forces not sufficiently according to the este went to the defence of that Citie, disposing his forces not sufficiently according to the este went to the defence of that Citie, disposing his forces not sufficiently according to the este and the cities of t

of his perils, but as well as he was able according to the necessitie of the time. Farre greater difficulties began to kindle towardes Crema, which was almost befreged by companies of the Duke of Millan bestowed in the townes and villages thereabouts: for the tove fuffered great affliction of famine, great stroke of plague, great disorder of souldiers for wan, pay, vniuerfall lacke of munitions, with other particular prouifions which had bene many til s demaunded: aduerfities which Ranse distrusting to be able no longer to sustaine, had made in almost to protest to the Venetians: & yet the same fortune following him with some fauour d countenaunce, he set vpon Siluso Sauello, whose strength was two hundred men at armes.n hundred light horsemen, and fifteene hundred sootemen, and charging him vpon the sudden e fo put him to discomfiture, that he fled to Loda onely with fiftie men at armes, seeking safetic ther at aduenture and by chaunce, then by confidence in his valour and prowesse. After this e Venetians remictualled Crema the second time, and the Count Nicholas Scot put into it fifte e hundred footemen: in so much as both the forces and courage of Ranse rising increased, he end a few dayes after the Citie of Bergamo, being called in by the towns fmen, and the Spaniards ing to the Chappell . At the same time also Mercurso and Malatesta Bastlon tooke three 11dred horsemen that were stragling without: but not long after, as Nicholas Scot went from Se gamo to Crema with fine hundred Italian footennen, he was encountred with two hund Smillers, who ouerthrew his companies, and tooke him prisoner, & led him to the Duke of . 1lan, who caused his head to be striken off. This losse of Bergamo awaked the Viceroy and Pr. r Colonno, who went and incamped there with fine thousand footemen joyned to the regin to of the Spaniards, and to the bands of the Duke of Millan: they planted their artilleries again S. Katherines gate, which though it made valiaunt refistance, yet Ranse being within, and seein jo possibilitie of long defence, left the towne to discretion, compounding to depart with the liu & goods of all his fouldiers, but without founding of trumpet, and with their enfignes wrapper p: the Viceroy taxed the inhabitants of Bergamo at fourescore thousand duckats. But amid the actions and services at Crema and Bergamo, another exploit of greater worthinesse and morull of industry and celeritie, was executed by Aluiano in the towne of Rouigno, wherein was a urison of two hundred men at armes Spanish, who thought themselues to stand in suretie, so sat they had the river of Adice betweene them & the Venetian bands: Aluiano when was least obt of him, cast a bridge neare the towne of Anguillaro, and by his industry and diligence made in a paffage ouer the river, with a company of foul diers resolute and trayned, and no impedime of Ruffe or baggage to hinder the enterprise, which was to be executed as much with celeri as with valour. And as he was arrined at the towne, and had possessed the gate by the stratague of a hundred footemen attired like paylants whom he had lent before vinder the colour and cafion of the market that was kept there that day, he easily made himselse Lord of the whole, ind tooke prisoners all the men at armes that he found there. In this enterprise he preuailed as mulby pollicie as by vertue, which two properties in a man of warre are equally required: & turning elther the one nor the other into rigour nor bloud, he accompanied his valour with elemencie and spared the lives of those whom his fortune & the course of armes offered to the edge of his synd. By reason of this adventure, the residue of the Spaniards that were lodged at Polesina, retir into the Abbey, as to the strongest place in the countrey, and afterwardes leaving abandor fall Polesma and Leguagua, they fled towardes Ferrara, carying with them more seare then he of ety. Immediatly after the taking of Rousgno, Alusano marched with the army to Oppiano neare Leguaguo, whither he caused to be brought by the river certaine armed barkes: & so he went to Villacero neate to Verona, with this resolution, that if from that place he should not be able take Verona, wherein was a strength of two thousand Spamsh footemen, and a thousand unceknights, at least he would keepe it in vexation and torment all the winter long: but being uertifed that an army of three hundred men at armes, five hundred light horfmen, and fix thouid footemen of the enemies, were gone vp towards Leguaguo, he came out of that place, feag least they would either stop his victuals, or constraine him to fight: he came within the view them going towards Adice, which they passed at Albaretto, with no small difficulty of victuals, reason of the impediments which the light horsemen and the armed barkes gaue them: and ring there that the Spanish army after the recourry of Bergama, returned towards Verona, he termined to abide them no longer, for which cause he sent the companies of men at armes by dto Padoa, and passed in person by night by the river of Adice, with the sootemen : he caried th him by water, the artilleries and baggage of the army, both to avoide the raines and mires ich were great, and also for feare to be charged by the enemies to whom the waters that were n tisen very high, gaue great impediments: and assoone as he had taken land, he retired with accustomed celerity to Padoa, where the men at armes were entred two dayes before: afterrds he distributed his army betweene Padon and Trensa: and the Viceroy and Profee Colonifter they had fent their men to lye in garrifon at Polefina de Rouigno, went vp to Ifpruch to conwith Cafar vpon the estate of the affaires.

his yeare the countrey of Friull remained in tranquillity more then was wont for the taking Captaine Frangipan, the only man that afflicted it more then any other: and therefore the Veians knowing how much it imported them to retaine it, had refused to render it in exchange of n Pawle Buslion: he, for that folicitation had bene made at Rome to exchange him for Car-41, had got leave of the Spaniards to go to Rome, guing his faith to return prisoner, if the pertation could not be agreed upon: But for that during the treaty, it hapned that Carnavall dylohn Pawle affirmed, that by the benefit of the accident, he was at liberty, and to holding him-: acquited, he would no more returne to him whose prisoner he was . About these times and rates the latter end of the yeare, the families of the Adorney & Fie Janey entred Genes by night, efectet fauor and working of the Duke of Millan, as was suspeosed: and albeit by conspirand intelligence they were come as farre as the pallace greene, yet their fortune being fometinfetior to the valor of their enemies they were chased out againe by Ostavian Frego, who 13 out against them even vntill beyond the barriers accompanied with the footenen of his 1, fought valiantly in his owne person, and put them to flight: he was not otherwise wounthen in the hand, being recompensed (besides the honor of the victory) with the persons of Siald de Fielquo, lerome Adorno, and John Camilla of Naples, as his prisoners.

Amid thele affaires of warre and feruice, it is not vnworthy of memory, to report that this Two Elephates a native of requires which have the preferred to the tethere were feene at Rome two Elephants, a nature of creatures which happily had not bene Pore. e in Italy since the triumphs & publike playes of the Romaines. Emanell king of Portugall to the Pope a very honourable Embassage, and withall, presented him with two huge and ly Elephants which his ships had brought by sea from India: their entring into Rome was e brated with a very great concourse of people, some wondring at the strange forme and staof the beafts, some maruelling to what vies thier nature inclined them, and some conjecturing espects and purposes of such a present, their ignorance making their wonder farre greater

ut about those times the French king, who had other cares in his mind then pompes and tacles, folicited all forts of prouisions for the warre: and albeit he was determined resoluteprofecute the enterprise of Millan, yet, defiring to be assured of the Popes will, he prayed i to declare himselfe in his fauour: wherein' to draw him on the rather, he confirmed to him offers he had made to him afore, affuring him for end, that if he were difappointed of his amity whe expectation of it, he would effloones in himselfe to those conditions of Ca/ar, and the i Catholike, which he had already refused. In this demaund he debated with him the power his kingdome the strength of his cofederations, and the proportion of succors promised by the essans: how at that time the forces of Cafar & king Catholike were small in Italy, & how both the one and other were very needy of mony, and having no meane to pay their owne foulding much leffe that they were able to defraie the Swiffers, who would not descend from their meter taines without good certainty of pay: That the popularity of Millan having preved the lard yel of others, expected with an univerfall defire the returne of the Frenchium dielici. That the victoria ry of Millanought not to give cause to the Pope to arme and band against him, both for that if greatnelle of the kings of Fraunce in Italy, and his owne authority, had bene in all scasens pres table to the sea Apostolike: And also standing alwayes contented with the things that of right appertained to them, they rose not higher into humors of ambition, nor once listed up their min to aspire to the residue of Italy; a matter well testified by so many experiences: That the intent of Calar & the king Catholike was far other, having above all other things thirfted after the who Empire of Italy, & to Subject the regions thereof, either by armes, by alliances, or by pollicies: The they have nourished a perpetuall disposition of mind, to reduce into thraldem, no lesse then oth thates, the fea Apostolike & the Popes of Rome; a defire which all the worldknew to be very and ent & resolute in Cafar: That theretore, he wold at one time provide for the furety of the Churc defend the common libertic of Italy, reelfablish the greatnesse of the family of Medicis, & that shold not be curious to employ the present occasion, which wold not be estseones presented, no ther with the fauor of a better time, nor with the oportunity of better alliance then his. On the ce trary:for Cajar & the king Catholike, there wanted no perfwalios full of affection & efficacy, the he would toyne with the for the defence of Italy: wherein was not forgotten to be alleaged, it if they conjoyned altogether, they were able to chase the French king out of the Duchy of Milla Extheir power was no leffe fufficient to defend it against him: That he was to remember the wro that he had done to the king the yere past, fending mony to the army of the Swiffers at fuch time the French campe marched into Italy: Lastly that he had to confider that if the French king obta ned the victory of Millan, he would not be vinnindfull to reuenge all the wrongs he had receive and to affure himselfe of all dangers and suspitions to come. But the Pope was much more mou with the authority & offers of the Swiffers, who, continuing in their first obtlinacies, offered to mand and defend with 6000 footmen the passages of the Mount Senis, of the Mount Geneure Finalo, receiving onely by the moneth 6000 florins of Rhein: and in case their payes might be: nauced to forty thousand floring by the moneth, they offered to inuade Burgundy with twen thouland footmen. These perplexities made the Pope doubtfull in himselfe, & as scare withdr him from the thing whereunto his will did drive him, so amid so many variations of mind, he del red as much as he could, to declare his intention, giving to enery one words and answers gene But being continually importuned by the French king, at last he made him this answer, that the was no person that knew better then himselse, how much he was inclined to his affaires, being i ignorant with what affection he perfwaded him to passe into Italy, at a time when he might h victory without danger or great effusion of bloud: That his perswasions, for that things were kept fecret as he had oftentimes required him, were now come to the knowledge of others, to common detriment of them both for that for his part, he faw himfelfe in danger to be affayled others, & that the difficulties were become the greater for the enterprise of the king, fince of had given fuch order to their affaires, that he could no more enter into the victory but with me felt perill and lamentable flaughter of men: That the power and glory of the Turkes being ne increased by so great a victory and successe, it was neither convenient to his condition, nor o formeable to the office of a Pope, either to give favor or counfell to Princes christened, to m war amongst themselves: and that therefore he could not otherwise aduse him, then to tem rife & furcease, expecting some other facility & better occasion, which when it hapned, he she find in him the same disposition to his glory & greatnesse, which he hath so well discerned cert moneths passed: an answer, which (albeit it did not in other fort expresse his conception) is it come to the knowledge of the king, it had not only depriued him of all hope of the Popes fat but also have certified him that the Pope would have joyned and banded against him, both v counselland with armes: These were the accidents of the yeare 1514.

But death, who bringeth with him this law and authority, to cut off the vaine counsels of r The death of euen in their greatest hopes, was the cause that the warre so forward in apparance, burst not ling Lowin the to action with that speede that was expected: for, whilest the French king gaue himselfee to behold too much the excellent beauty of his new wife, bearing then but eighteene yeare tweljsh.

nothing confidering the proportion of his owne yeares, nor his decayed complexion, he fell the rage of a feauer, which drawing to it a fudden fluxe, ouercame in one inflant the life, that ire gaue ouer to preferue any longer: he dyed the first day of the yeare 1515,a day of memoor the death of so great a Prince: he was a king iust and much beloued of his peoples, but toughis condition, neither afore he was king, nor after he had the Crowne, he never found concy or Itability in either fortune: for, rising from a small Duke of Orleance with great happinesse ne Crowne, & that by the death of Charles yonger then he, & two of his fons, he conquered 12 very great facility the Duchy of Millan, and the kingdom of Naples, and almost all the resiof the regions of Italybeing gouerned for many yeares by his direction: he recovered with a great prosperity, the state of Genes that was in rebellion, and vanquished with no leffe glosy armies of the Venetians, being in person at both those victories. But on the other fide, even n he was in youth and best disposition of body, he was constrained by king Lowis the xi, to y his daughter that was both barren and deformed, & yet could neuer get the good will nor ntenance of his father in law: and after his death, such was the greatnesse of the Ladyof Burthat he could neuer get the inflitution of the new king being then in minority, being almost pelled to retire himselfe into Brittaine: where being taken in the battell of S. Aubin, he lived yeares in the calamity of a prisoner. To these afflictions may be added the siege & famine of varo, the many discomfites he had in the Realme of Naples, the losse of the estate of Millan, s, and all the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: and laftly the grieuous war he in Fraunce against very mighty enemies, his eyes beholding into what lamentable perils his me was brought. Neuertheleffe afore he died, it feemed he had conquered all his advertities, rtune shewed good tokens of her reconcilement, both for that he had defended his kingdome all mighry enemies, & also established a perpetual peace, & aliance with the king of England, whom by how much his amity was great and affured, by fo much it gaue him hope to be able conquer the Duchy of Millan.

He tooke vpô him together the title of the French king, the name of the Duke of Millan: a dignity which he fayd, apper- The French dto him not only by the ancient rights of the Dukes of Orleance, but also as coprehended in king assumeth meltiture that was made by Cafar in the treaty of Cambray. Befides, there lived in him the Duke of Mila defire to recouer it that died with his predeceffor: whereunto not only the working of his lan. inclination, but the perfivations of all the Noble yong Gentlemen of Fraunce did induce to leffe by the memory of the glory of Gafton de Foix, the for the monumet of fo many victothe kingsraigning nextafore had obtained in Italy: and yet(notto warne others afore the not to prepare to refifthim) he diffembled his defires by the aduife of his graue counfellers, & meane while fell to practife the amities of other Princes: from whom were fent to congrawith him many Embassadors, whom he received with countenance affable & gracious, but ally the Embaliadors of the king of England, who defired to continue with him the amitie

n with his predeceffor, the iniuries he had received fro the king Catholike being yet fresh in ory. There came at the fame time an Embassage from the Duke of Austrich, whereof the of Nausan was chiefe, & in this Embassage, for the regard of the Earle of Flauders, whereof ngs of Fraunce are foueraignes, were discerned demonstratios of great submissio, in acknowng of superiority. Both the one & the other of these Embassages had a ready & happy expefor touching the king of Englad, the cofederatio betweene him & the late king was cofirmed the same coditions so long as either of the shold line, referring a respite of iii, yeres for the

Scottishking to enter in it: and for the Archduke, many differeces ceassed, which many ment, poled would have given great impediments to the action of the peace: but the Archdukebie now in full maiority, & newly taken upon him the government of his estates, was drawne to peace for many caules: first for the instance of the peoples of Flauders, who would in no wife w war with the Realme of Fraunce: secondly for a defire he had to be assured of such impeding as might be opposed against him by the French in the succession of the Realme of Spaine, who death of his grand father shold happen; and lastly for that he thought it too great a danger, to de without any league of amity in the middest of the powers of England and France being con nedtogether. And on the other fide, the king defined greatly to take away all occasions that n restraine him to be governed by the authority & counsell of his grandsather, either by the far or mothers fide : so that at last there was enacted betweene them in the towne of Paris, apre tual peace & confederatio, referring faculty to Cafar & the king Catholike (without who seaso rities the Archduke contracted) to take their place in this peace within three moneths. In this of tulation was promised the accomplishment of the mariage betweene the Archduke & Lady I e daughter to king Lowis, folicited so many times before: & that the king should endue the many of Lady Renee with fixe hundred thousand crownes and the Duchy of Berry in perpetuityale for her children as for her. This dowry, in respect of her insufficient age at that time, shold bear ned to her affoone as the shold come to the age of ix, yeres, under this condition or with stading a the shold renounce al rights of inheritance either by the father or mother, & namely such as u appettaine to her of the Duchy of Millan & Brittaine: that the king should be bound to aych Archduke with men & ships to go to the kingdom of Spaine, after the death of the king Cathon At the request of the king, the Duke of Gueldres was also named: & as some write, besides the ters afore rehearfed; it was agreed that in both their names joyntly, Embaffacors shold belett l king of Aragon, to require himto publish the Archduke Prince of the realmes of Spaine, such h ricle of him to whom the fuccession appertaineth: That he would render the kingdom of Nau. & abstaine fro the defence of the Duchy of Millā. Here it is not to be doubted, that both these w Princes making this confederation, looked not more to the present comodity that appeared, a to the observation of the same in time to come: for what soundatio could be layd vpo the mag that was promised, the Lady Renee bearing as yet scarcely source yeares? And how could it p the French king that that damfell should be the wife of the Archduke, who (her eldest fifter) the kings wife) had her action prepared vpo the Duchy of Brittame for that the Britons del once to haue a particular Duke, at fuch time as Anne their Ducheffe maried the second tim a greed that the Dukedome should appertaine to the youngest of the children and descendar of her, if the eldest were preferred to the Crowne of France. In like fort the French king to a with the king Catholike to prolong the truce made with his predeceffor, but to leave out this a dition not to molest the Duchy of Millan during the truce: he hoped he should afterwards on pound easily with Cefar . By which reason he kept in suspence the Venetians, who offered te new the league made with his predeceflor, withing that he werein his liberty to accord with far against them. But the king Catholike, notwithstanding he stood still possessed of his car not to have warre in the frontiers of Spame, confidering how great suspition the prolong a of the truce might give to the Smiffers, which might also be the cause that the Pope, who till a had bene in doubt, might turne to the French amity, refused at last to prolong the truce, but der the same conditions it had bene renewed with the last king: so that the Pope, shut out o hope, and leffe expecting to contract with Cafar against the will and counfels of that king, rem firmed with the Senate of Vence the league, in the fanie forme it had bene made with his preceffor. Now there remained the Pope & the Swiffers: Touching the Swiffers he required that of would admit his Embassadors, but they refused to give the safe conduct, vsing the same rude is they had done before. And for the Pope, ypon whose will depended wholly the Florenius, he quired no other thing of him, then that he would keepe him out of all bond, to the end that von by the traine of affaires he should be counselled to resolue, it might be in his power to use choyce of the better, perswading him that he should never find in any, either for his owne par w lar or for the aduancement of his house, a greater amitie, a more affured faith or more honousk conditions.

After the king had layd these foundations for his affaires, he beganne with great care to its

outhons of money, and to increase the bands of his men at armes to the number of foure thound: he published that he made those preparations, not of intention to make war for that yeare, at onely to make head against the Swiffers, who threatned him to inuade Burganay or Dauhine, if he would not accomplish the cougnants made at Dyon in the name of the late king. Many elected him in the femblances he made, the rather for the example of the kings of Fraunce, who me alwayes forborne to entangle the first yeare of their raigne with new warres: but that con-State caried not fitch impression in the minds of Cafar and the king of Aragon, to whom the ngs youth was sulpcoted, and the facilitie he had (more then other kings) to commaund the forsofthe kingdome of Fraunce, and the love of his people opening a way and readinesse to all at he would defite. Befides, they were not ignorant of the great preparations that king Lowys dleft, the fame making demonstration, that feeing he was affired of the king of England, he dnot of new determine to make warre, but rather did entertaine and recontinue the plot that as laid before. Therefore because they would not be taken unprouided, they fell to folicite a nfederation with the Pope and with the Smiffers: but the Pope entertaining both parties with ords gracious, and studying to nourish them all with diuerse hopes, deferred still to make any traine declaration. And touching the Swiffers, their former hatreds did not only Hill continue, t by time were made greater by increase of occasions, for that the causes that had taken their ginning of griefes publike, both for the deniall of the augmentation of their penfions, for the ling of Launceknights to the kings pay, and for the difdamefull and iniutious words deliueted ninft their nation, were redoubled and reincreased of prinate sorowes, displeasures, and ambius defires : the fame rifing both upon an enuy which the Commons bare to many particulars eiuing gifts and penfions of the King, and alto for that those factions that most hotly objected isclues against such as followed the French amities, which commonly were called at that time ulizzanti, being by that meane aduaunced with the fauour of the Commons, into reputation I greatnesse, seared a diminution of their authority, if the common weale were of new reallied th the French: in fo much that the counfell and disputation of affaires passing, not in a course publike zeale, but with ambition and diffentions civill, and these bearing more credit then the lizzanti, it was obtained that they should refuse the ynreasonable offers of the French King. In this disposition of minds and affaires the Embassaders of Casar, King of Aragon, & Duke Millan, affembled and met afore the Smiffers, and contracted with them in the name of their nces, a confederation for the defence of Italy, referring a respite for the Pope to enter, vntill Monday of the lent following. In this capitulation it was agreed, that to compell the French ig to disclaime all his rights & interests in the duchy of Millan, the Swiffers receiving monethof the other confederates thirty thousand cuckets, shold invade either Burgundy or Dauphin: he King Catholike with a nighty army should make strong war vpon the realine of Fraunce, ier vpon the side of Parpignan or Fontaraby. By these invasions the confederates pretended, t the French King compelled to applie to the defence of his owne realme, should have no otuntieto molest the Duchy of Millan, though he had made a resolution agreeable to his will: deliberation of the King was kept fecret untill the moneth of lune, but at last, fuch was the atneffe & care of the feuerall preparations, that they could no longer diffemble fo great & apant flirres. The provisions of money were great and universally reached to all the parts in the Prefarations lme, he leavied many bands of Launceknights, he caused to be drawne towards Lyon great of the French cofartilleries: & had ately fent into Guien to leavy ten thousand footnen from the marches the Duke of Vauarre, under Peter of Nauarre, who was newly entred into his pay: this was the reason that Millan. oyned himself to the French scruice, the King of Aragon was discontented with him, & char-Thim molt of all others with the ill successe of the battell of Ranenna: he wold not pay his ranthat was rated at 20000 duckets, which the late King had given to the Marquis of Rottelin ecompence in some part the hudred thousand Crownes which he had paid in England for his fom: but the new King electing him to his feruice, defrayed his ranfom at his first comming to Crowne, & tooke him into his pay: which yet the faid Peter of Nauarre wold not accept, til, he fafety of his honor, he had fent to the King of Aragonto excuse himself, that being abadoof him, he gave place to necessity, renouncing notwithstading the estates which he had give in the kingdome of iv aples. By this time it was manifelt to all the world, that those prepara-

This gaue the king some hope that the Popue specting the alliance, would be readily inclined to embrace his amitie, and the rather for the hauing before treated with the king Catholike to marrie Iulian with one of his parets which.a of the house of Cardona, it seemed he had preferred that alliance to the other, more for his en regard then for other reason: he doubted not also that Iulian would not willingly help sorre for defire to get by that meane some estate, by the which he might furnish the expences contient to fo great a mariage, and withall the better to establish the perpetuall government vid the Pope had newly giue of the cities of Modena, Reggia, Parma, & Plassance: which beingio supported by the fauor of mightie Princes, he had litle hope to be able to keep the after the cut of his brother. But the king began euen now to fall fro his hope, both for that the Pope had tulferred to the king of Aragon for two yeares the moneys & collections called the Croistards e he realine of Spaine: whereof it was thought, he would draw by way of contribution aboue a illion of duckets: and also for that he heard with great inclination Alberto Carpy and ler. el Embassadors of Casar and the king Catholike, who did not onely keepe almost alwayes a w him, but also it seemed the Pope did communicate with them all his counsels: neuertheless h Pope entertained the king in fuspence , both giuing good words , and shewing found intern to those that negociated for the king, but alwayes without any resolution: as one that de a aboue all other things that the Duchie of Millan should not be possessed by forraigne Prics therefore the king, whom it imported to be better affured of his intention, addressed to him w Embassadours, amongst whom was William Buda of Paris, a man in science of humanit # ther Greeke or Latine, of most absolute and onely erudition of all the learned men of our t.e. afterwards he fent to him in the fame Legation Anth. Maria Paluoisin, a man verie accep sk to the Pope, feeking to omit no meane wherein might be any oportunitie to aduance his in pose: but all was labour lost, for that before his comming, even from the moneth of July he ac very feeretly contracted with the others for the defence of the estate of Millian: notwith a ding feeking to keepe couered that refolution untill the necessity of affaires constrained hi to declare himself, and defiring withall to publish it with some excuse: sometimes he require he king to cosent that the Church might retain Parma & Plaisance, & somtimes he preferred on demands, to the end that any one of the things which he demanded being refused, it migh p peare that necessitie more then will, had caried him to knit with the kings enemies : and a in time, diffrusting not to be denied of some one of those things which altogether he would prefer without some honest colour; he made diverse answers doubtfull, suttle, & irresolute u as for the doings of mortall men there is referued in the infallible inflice of God an equal 12 fure and like proportion of recompence, fo there were others that vfed towards him the fleights and futtleties wherewith he abused the king: for Octavian Fregosa Duke of Genes ring on the one lide the great preparations of the French king, and on the other fide holdin o fulpected the victorie of the confederates for the inclination of the Duke of Millan and the 21 fers to their aduersaries, had made a very secret cottact with the French king by the mean che Duke of Bourbon, and yet verie firmely affured the contrarie to the Pope, both in the tir o the action, and after it was resoluted: yea, because Offanian was one of the ancient friends of Pope, and of his brother Iulian, to whom they had borne no small fauours at such time as he as created Duke of Genes, the Pope did so simply beleeve him, that the Duke of Millan suspense things for the rumours and brutes that went, and determined to invade him with foure tu fand Swiffers already come to Nouare, together with the faction of the Adorney and the . quer, the Pope was the cause that the enterprise brake and passed no further.

This was the capitulation of Octavian Fregosa: That the towns and jurisdiction of (16) should be rendred to the king, together with the castle: That Octanian should beare no internal of the castle in t Genes coronds the name of Duke, but take upon him the name of perpetuall Gouernour of Genes for the lig with power to dispose the offices of Genes: That the king should give vnto him an hunce men at armes, the order of Saint Michael, and a yearely pension during his life: That the in rould not reedifie the fortresse of Codifia veric hatefull to the Genowayes, and should also reontinue and graunt to the citie all those capitulations and priviledges which had bene reverdand burned by king Longs: That he should give a certaine proportion of Ecclesiashke reenues to Federike Archbishop of Salerno, and botherto Odaman, and to himselfe certaine plaes in Prouence, if euer it hapned that he were chaled out of Genes. Whethele matters were ipread broad, it was not hard for Oldanian to instifie his resolution, for that it was discerned of all men, hat he had great reason to scare the Duke of Milla & the Smiffers: the only thing that was noted lin him, was, that he had so many times denied the truth to the Pope, of whom he had received many benefites, and had broken his promife and faith, in entring into couenants without his rinitie; and yet in a long letter which he wrote to him afterwards for his instification, he discourdat large with great care and humilitie, the causes that had moned him, together with all the xcuses wherein he might reasonably defend his honour and the propertie of the action: he told in nothing was done in despising the respectand denotion which he owed him, acknowleding in his person the full maiettie of Pope, and his chiefe raiser and advancer: his conclusion was, acit would be more hard for him to be instified, it he wrote to persons prinate, or to any Prince, at measured the affaires of estate according to regards private: but writing to a Prince wifer aone all others of that time, and to whole wisdome it was seene he could not otherwise sane his late, that it was inatter (uperfluous to offer excuses to him that so well ynderstood and knew hat was lawfull to Princes, or at least what they were wont to do, not only when they were rereed to those necessities, but also when they went about to increase or make better the condions of their efface.

But by this time matters were wrought from words & counfels to deeds & execution: for the night twas now come to Lyons accopanied with the whole presence of the Nobles of Fraunce Dukes of Lorraine & Gueldres, caused to march towards Italy his power, which was the most ightie & flourishing armie that had bene seene of long time: he stood assured to have no trought be turned against him, had armed his frontiers, and perpetually united the realme Naples to the kingdome of Castulle, to make those peoples more readic to desend it: and as one as he had credible understanding, that the warre should be made in Italy, he dissinsted the companies he had leavied, holding no more reckening of his promise made that yeare to econfederates to make warre upon Fraunce, then he had done of all other courennsts and outracts made to them the yeares before: so ready he was to be caried by occasions, and folight lay downe his faith and word, more to the profite of his assained; then preservation of his repution and honor.

At the brute of the desceding of the French king, the Viceroy of Naples, who having bin many oneths as it were in truce with the Venetians, & now come to the country of Vincenfa, to draw are to the enemies that lay incamped in a verie strong place neare Vincenfa: removed his army Verena, to go (as he faid) to the fuccours of the Duke of Millan: and the Pope dispatched into imbard, his companies of men at armes, with the regiments of the Florentines, under the gomement of his brother, chosen Captaine of the Church, to minister likewise to the aide of 12m according to his resolution not many dayes before with the other confederates. Neuereleffe he forbare not to preseuer in his faire shewes and semblances, making the world to bemethat he fent out that firength only for the gard of Plaisance, Parma, and Reggia: wherein had fo cunningly proceeded with the Embassadors of Fraunce, that the King now doubting more to fall to agreement with him, had dispatched from Lyons to his Embassadors, a new mmission, with authoritie to conclude, consenting that the Church should remaine possessed Plasfance and Parma untill he had fatisfied it with fuch a recompence as the Pope should ld himfelfe contented. But all these remedies were but cures unperfect, whose fores burst out er againe: they were shadowes whose bodies were farre off, yea they serued for nothing, for se causes that hereafter shall be expressed: for it was a destinie set downe that the defence or le of the Duchy of Mellan shold be excuted only with the danger & bloud of the Swiffers, who : flaying for any impediment or small quantity of money in prest, descended by such heapes trowpes into the Duchie of Millan, that their armie there was about twentie thousand, whom tenne thousand were drawne neare to the mountaines. It was a counsell taken Frenchmen.

The Swiffers amongst them, to keepe against the French, the straight passages of those valleyes which beings Seeke to Hop the the foot of the Alpes that deuide Italy from Fraunce, come to open thefelues upon the plans passe of the of Lombardy.

The French armie.

This counsell of the Swiffers troubled greatly the mind of the king, who afore had promit to himselfe an affured victorie by the greatuesse of his forces, not remembring that the successes warre respecteth other considerations then the multitudes of souldiers: he had in his armiet thousand fine hundred launces, xxij. thousand Launceknights led by the Duke of Gueldres, thousand sootmen of Peter Nauarre, eight thousand Frenchmen, and three thousand labous that were paid according to the rate of the other footmen. The king cofidered with his Captes that in regard of the valour of the Swiffers, it was impossible to drive them from those straigt and strong passages, but with a farre greater number: and yet considering the nature of the ftraights, so great numbers could not be but hurtfull to the service: and much lesse in so le time could they do any thing of consequence, and least of all be able to nourish any long seam fo great an armie in a countrey fo barraine, notwithstanding there was continuall traffike of ctuals to the mountaines. Amidthese difficulties, some of the Captaines that were of opinion ther to dinert and draw them away then to fet vpon them, gaue counfell to fend out eight h dred Launcesthrough Pronence, and Peter Nanarre by sea with his ten thousand country my which should all joyne together at Sauonne: others were of adulfe that to go so farre about we to loofe too much time, that it would weaken the armie, and increase too much the reputation the enemies, who would not doubt to boast that they had not the courage to encounter v them: fo that it was refolued, that not retiting so much from that straight, they should assay passe by some other way, that either was not kept by the enemies, or at least not so strongly fended: and that Emard de Prio with four hundred Launces and five thousand footmen she d take the way to Genes, not in hope to draw them downe from their mountaines, but to me warre vpon Alexandria and the other townes beyond Paw.

There be two wayes in the Alpes that leade ordinarily from Lyons into Italy, the one is cad Mon/ane (a mountaine within the jurisdiction of the Duke of Sanoy:) it is the shortest way, e straightest way, and most beaten way : the other is called the mount Geneure within the gour ment of Dauphine, a way longer then the other, and leades by crookings and turnings to Greble: both the one and the other falleth into the way of Sufa, where the plaine beginneth to large: but the French armies are alwayes wont to passe by the mount Geneure, not withstance it be a way fomewhat longer, because it hath a facility of passage, & more coucnient to draw & artillery. The Swiffers that were careful to keep those two passages & the other paths therabe s were lodged at Susa, the cause was, that the passages which belower drawing towards the 1 were so straight & steepe, that it seemed impossible to draw any artillerie, being verie har o passe thither the horses of so great an army. On the other side Trunlee, to whom the king d giuen that charge, being followed with verie many pyoners, and having about him men pain & experienced to draw artilleries, whom he fent to fearch the places that were there, went fe ding the passinges, if he could find libertie of way without impediment of the Swiffers: by w occasion, the armie that for the most part was dispersed betweene Grenoble and Brianson, to ched flowly, expecting what should be determined, whereunto there was a constraint by a !-

ceffitie to abide the prouisions of victuals.

The king of to the French king not to

About this time the king of England fent a Gétleman to the French king, who was now de t-England fends ted from Lyons, to tell him on the behalfe of his king that he ought not to passe into Italy for the to trouble the universall peace of Christendoine. The cause of so great variation and changed reficine Italy that king was, that he wasicalous of the alliance betweene France and the Archduke, fea least the affaires of that Crowne would take a course too happie: in which considerations he gan afterwards to give willing eate to the Embassadors of the king Catholike, who with ce is mual reasons put into his mind, how hurtfull the greatnesse of the French king would be to in in whom he could not hope for any other affection then of an enemie, as well for the natural atred of that nation, as for his late actions of war and holfility done against him: but the thing a most moued him, was the emulation and enuie of his glorie, which he thought would be ret to too high degrees if he wonne the victory in the state of Millan: he thought in himselfe, notwithstanding he found his kingdome in rest, and verie populous for the long peaci Hiued in, together with a great maffe of treasure which his father had gathered, yet he neue d the courage till within certaine yeares, to inuade the Realme of Fraunce, alone and enuirod with fo many enemies, and broken with fo many aduerfities: That now the French king, formnat younger then he was, at fuch time as he came to the crowne, albeit he found his kingdome erwearied and made poore with so many warres, durst yet in the first moneths of his raigne, to an enterprise, for the which so many Princes were banded against him: That touching him, th all his huge preparations, and so many occasions, he had not brought into England any or profite then the Citie of Tournay, and that with expenses intollerable and infinite: But the ench king would returne with great glory into his kingdome, bringing with him the conquest fo braue a Duchie, and would open the way, and haply take the occasion afore he retired his nie out of Italie, to inuade the Realme of Naples. These were the motions that easily renewed his mind his auncient and naturall hatred; but for that he was not at that time prepared to give pediment to the French king with armes (wherein haply he fought fome occasion and colour) thought good to fend him this medage. The king nor his atmy forbare not for al that to march, sing their way from Lyonto Dauphine, where he met with the armie of the Launceknights, perwife called the blacke bads, guided by R obert de la Marche, together with all the regimets low Almaines, so greatly esteemed for their valour, their faith, and loyaltic, which they had alyes showed in the French seruices.

At this time John la. Triunlee advertised the king that his artilleries might be caried over the ounts, neare the Alpes of the sea descending toward the Marquisdonie of Saluzze: he wrote ut the passage was full of many difficulties, but yet the stregth of men & instrumets would make t easie which by nature was hard: and because on that side, neither on the tops of the Mounnes, nor in the entry of the vallies, there was no gard, he perswaded the king that it was better affay to ouercome the difficulties of mountaines and the Hraitneffe of vallies (an action with ne, but not with dannger of men) then to aductture to winne the passages from the Smiffers, ofe valour was not more terrible then their obstinacie, being desperate either to vanquish or e. Besides, the armie could not stay there many dayes, if any resistance were made, for that no wer or preparatió was able to bring through places fo impassable & barreine, sufficient prouisió rictuals to feede fo many mouthes. This counfell was allowed and followed, and immediatly attillerie that lay in a place conuenient to be turned on all parts, began to march that way. And Trivulce had advertised the king that the difficultie to passe the artilleries was very great, so to he fayd the experience would be found harder, when it was put to action and triall: for first ame difficultie, both for that there was no oportunitie of pathes or wayes, nor yet so much genesse of roomth as the artilleries contained, but such as was made by the ayde of the pyoners m hand to hand. There were many of those labourers that marched before, whose service was dy, fometimes to breake downe and enlarge the straites, and sometimes to digge up the hill kes and lumpes of earth that gaue impediment to the passage of the artilleries: from the tops of of mountaines they descended by broken cliffes, whose onely aspect gaue seare to the behols, into molt deepe vallies of the river of Argentiero. By the difficultie of these cliffes offerimes arcilleries could not be fulfamed, neither with the horfes that drew them, whose number was at, nor with the shoulders of the labourers that guided the, & therefore very often they were uen to dismount them, and in fastining them to great cables, they found a way to make them cend by the hands of the footemen, whose readinesse in these paineful actions, was nothing iniour to the greatnesse of the trauell. The labour ceassed not when they had ouercome the first untaines & the first vallies, for that they found others, which of necessitie they must passe with fame difficulties. At the last, about the end of fine dayes, the pollicie of the leaders and paines helabourers opened a way for the artillerie through the mountaines into the enlarged places the Marquisdome of Saluss: but with such hardnesse and importunitie of trauell, that if either y had encountred any resistance, or the Mountaines had bene coucred with snowes as they tre wont to be the most part of the yeare, it is most certaine that they had take in vaine so great tuell. The matter that deliuered them from the refistance and impediments of men, was the otion and perfwasion of the troublesome & impassable mountaines, which abusing the Swiffers th fecurity, made them to lodge without fuspition at Susa, carefully garding and watching the places which of necessitie must be passed by such as descend the mount Scrior Geneura, or t mountaines adioyning to the: & the scason of the yeare, being then upon the tenth of August, b. taken from them the impediment of snowes which were already melicd. At the same time pass, the men at armes and bands of footemen, not without the same difficulties, some by that way a some by the passage called la Dragoniera, and the residue by the high tops of the rocke Perotta: Cunie, passages more lower towardes Pronence. By these passages Mension Pal sa passed, whom an occasion was offered to do an act worthy of memory: he departed from Singlaro Wi foure cornets of light horsemen, and after he had marched long with great diligence by the g. ding of the countrey men, he arrined without any suspition at Villafranco, a towne seuen mys from Salusa, and of the which goeth a greater fame and reputation then the qualitie of towne requireth, for that the head of that notable river of Paw rifeth cut of a place very neare: in that towne lay lodged with his companies, Profper Colonno, doubting no daunger by the distance of the enemies, in whom he feared not that diligence and celeritie, which himselfe bei of nature flow and heavie, had not wont to vie : some suppose that he meant the same day to a part and joyne his strength with the Swiffers: a matter wherein he might in some fort abuse: carefulnesse. But what propertie of destinie soeuer did guide him, it is sure that as he was set at !! table at dinner, the bands of fouldiers of Palissa arrived, being not discerned of any, till the c. tainty of the perill tooke away all their pollicie to auoyd it: they were upon the counterfearfes? his lodging, afore he could be perswaded that they were come: so profitable is celeritie in ance terprise, and so effectuallis sudden seare against enemics surprised : he was holpen in this act i (besides his industry and speed) by the townssinen, with whom Palissa thirsting after so goods pray, had first secretly conspired, and by their aydes was scaled upon their scoutes and senting so that Prosper Colonno a Captaine of so great name, and in whom aswell for his authorities gouerning an armie, as for the credite he had in the Duchic of Millan, rested no small important for this war, was made prisoner the xv. day of August, far otherwise then appertained to his arcient glory: Peter Orlargano a Romaine was companion with him in this fortune, together wi part of his companies, and the refidue at the first brute fled in their feare to diucife places.

The descending of the French armie ouer those inuincible passages, together with the calar. tie of Profer Golonno, chaunged the counsels of cuery one, and confused wholly the estate o I affaires, kindling new dispositions in the mindes of the Pope, the Viceroy, and the Swiffers: for : Pope, who was constantly perswaded, that the French king could not passe the Mounts for: impediments of the Swiffers, and repoling no leffe in the vertue of Profeer Colonno, was no galled and grieued in courage, commanding his Nephew Laurence Captaine generall of the 1. rentines to march but flowly: To him he had given charge to leade the armie into Lumbardie, that Iulian his brother was constrained to abide at Florence by the occasion of a long & paine I feuer: this Laurence being come to Modena three dayes after the adventure of Profeer, to occasion to recouer the rocke of Rubiero that had bin occupied by Guido Rangon, for the wil 1 he payd him at last two thousand duckats, and consumed many dayes in the countrey of Mena and Reggia. Moreover, the Pope having recourse to his accustomed practiles, dispatched. ry fecretly to the French king, Cintio his familiar friend, both to excuse himself of things that I bene passed till that day, and also to begin, by the meane of the Duke of Sanoy, to solicine to ccpound with him, to the end that by that beginning he might have more falicitie to passe furtl, if the defence of the Duchie of Millan fell not out well. But the Cardinall of Bibienna with co taine others, carried more by their prinate passions, then by the respects & interests of their Prin, induced him to take a counsell more constrained and sudden: for they told him there was da ger, for the reputation of the successe and fortunes of the French, and haply by the perswasion 4 ayde of the king, the Duke of Ferrara would not now stirre to recouer Modena and Reggia, also the Betinoleis, to repossesse their estate in Bolognia: and therefore as amid so many othersuels and perplexities, he should finde it a very hard matter to contend against so great a num t of enemies: fo, it imported him much more both in fafetie and discretion of counsell, to labour winne them with some propertie of benefite, and in all chaunces and chaunges, to make then is affured friends, diffembling the remembrance of injuries past, till time brought about a bette portunitie to reuenge. They aduited him to reestablish the familie of the Bentiuoleis within !lognia, and to restore to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena and Reggia: a counsell which he had jo ntly put in execution, had it not bene for the contrary working of Iulio de Medicis Cardinall d Legate of Bologma, whom the Pope had sent thither to the end that in so great accidents, might sustaine things on that side, and remaine as it were a moderator and counsellour of the buth of Lawrence: he wastouched with the displeasure of the infamie that would have fallen on the Pope by a counsell so full of cowardise, which no doubt would have bene greater then dbenethe glory of lulio, in getting to the Church fo great a jurisdiction : he was also moved th griefe, that it would make infamous the memorie of his legation, wherein being scarcely in first action, he should restore Bolognia the principall Citie of the whole Ecclesiastike state, into power of her auncient tyrats, abandoning to pray & spoile so great a nobilitie, which in fauour the Apostolike sea had openly conspired against them. In these respectes he dispatched an exeffe messenger to the Pope, whom with reasons & with requestes he brought agains to a coun-I more honorable and fafe . Notwithstanding this Inlio was a bastard, yet he was made Carnall by Leoin the first moneths of his Pontificacie, following the example of Alexander the fixt he effect, but not in the maner: for, Alexander at fuch time as he created Cardinall, Cafar Borhis sonne, made to be proued by witnesses that deposed the truth, that his mother at the time t she was conceived of him, had a husband, inferring thereupon according to the opinion of lawes, that the fonne was to be judged to be begotten rather of the husband then of the aduler. But touching Iulio, the witnesses preferred the grace and fauour of men afore the truth, for tit was deposed that the mother of whom he was begotte, being yet a maide & not maried,& re she deuided her body to the deuotion of Inliano, had of him a secret consent to be his wife. These new accidents were likewise the cause that the Viceroy behaued himselfe farre otherethen he would have done : for , being not yet departed from Verona , both for that he could make his fouldiers march without money, and also expected new companies promised by Car who was now come to Y spruch, to the end to leave fusficient gatrison within Verosa and essia as neede required, he began withthese and other excuses to temporise and deferre, to what might afterwardes happen to the Duchie of Millan.

These matters also moued the Smissers, who retired to Pignorolo immediatly after the defding of the Frenchamie: and albeit understanding afterwardes that the king who was pasthe mounts, mustred his people at Thurin, they were gone to Cynas, and had taken it and tit, onely for that they were refused victuals, doing the like at Vercelly almost afore the kings being at Thurin: yet being at last drawne into Nonaro, and those factions of thems hat were so farte estraunged from the Frenchamities, taking courage and disclosing themselves more

bout this time, those regiments of the French which marched by the way of Genes, with mwere in yned foure thousand sootemen waged by the Genowayes, by the working of Otta-1Fregofa, became Lords of the whole countrey on this fide Pam, seazing first vpon the towne assellaceso, Alexandria, and Tortono. And the king that by this time was come to Vercelly, & there the first aduertifement that the Pope was declared against him, which the duke of Sauor ified in his name; a matter which albeit did much vexe & discontent the king, yet not suffring isell & judgement to be troubled with anger or distaine, & because he would not kindle him nevtter:nost, he caused to be proclaimed publikely, as well through his armie, as amongst the nents that had taken Alexandrea, that no man should molest or inuade in any fort the lands of Church, The king remained many dayes at Vercelly expecting the iffue of the parley with the Ters, who though they entertained the practife, yet on the other fide they shewed themselves ofvarietie & confusion: for at Nonaro where they were, they began to fall into tumult, taking occasion vpó the breach of the king of Aragon, for that the payes he had promised were not ome. They tooke also by force from the officers of the Pope, the money he had sent to be or-I distributed amongst them, & in the same fury they departed from Nouaro, with interion to me into their countries: a matter which many fortes of them did require, who having spent moneths in the spoiles of Italie, & now laden with money & booty, defired to couey in safetheir houses, the riches they had gotte: they were no sooner gone out of Novaro, the the mowhich was due for the king of Aragons portion, was fent : and albeit they rauished it fro the ers, & by violence made the selues possessed of it, yet weighing the infamies that followed for post part such insolent and rash dealings, they est soones turned their surie into discretion, and

Afterwardes they went to Galero, expecting another strength of twentie thousand society which was fay dto be newly arrived, and three thousand went with the Cardinall of Syon to imployed for the gard of Pania. By which occasion the king (whose hope of agreement dide minish for these variations) departed from Vercelly to go towardes Allan, leaving within Ve celly with the Duke of Sanoy, his baftard brother, Wonfieur Lawtrech, and the Generall of M. lan, to continue negociations begun with the Smiffers . And because after the departing of Smillers out of Nouaro, he had got the towne, he left the Callell befreged, which feeling the excutio of the artilleries, yeelded within few dayes, referuing the liues & goods of those that kept Afterwardes the king to whom Paula yeelded, passed the river of Thesin, and the same day to la.Triunlee tanne up with a part of his companies to S. Christophers neate to Willan . After wardes the confidence of his valour caried him vp even to the luburbes of the gate of Thefin, t. ping to be received by them of the towne, who ill contented with the pillages and ranfoms of: Smillers, defired to returne under the jurisdiction of the French: he saw also a more facilitie in t enterprise, for that the towne was naked of fouldiers. The people of Mullan had a great feare the Swiffers, and the memorie was yet greene of the afflictions they had suffered the yeare befo when they mutined in fauour of the king, the Swiffers being retired from Nouaro: the fame. fraining them now to better counfell, and to temporife and expect the iffue of things, not with ding they wished the victorie to fall upon the king. Therefore they sent to Tribulee to defire ! to passe no further, and the next day dispatched Embassadours to the king being at Buffaloro, befeech him, that resting contented with the disposition of the people of Millan well inclined his crowne, and ready to give victuals to his armie, he would not demaund of them a morer. nifelt declaration: a matter which would aduaunce nothing for the fubflance of the watre, more then it had ferued or ay ded the yeare before his predeceffour, but brought vpon them git domages. They wished him to march and stand assured that the towns of Millan should be rei to open their gates to receive him at fuch time as he should be maister of the field. The king . ceiued them with good countenance and affabilitie, and albeit at the first he was displeased to they had not received Tribulee, yet he answered now that he was contented to be conforme: The treatiebe- to their demaundes. From Buffaloro the king marched with his armie to Bragressa, and while sweene the king he remained there, the Duke of Sanoy, after he had given audience to twentie Embaffadout and the Swift the Swiffers fent to him at Vercelly, and going afterwardes to Galero accompanied with the flard and other deputies for the king, contracted a peace with the Smiffers in the kings name vr t thefe conditions: That there should be betweene the crowne of Fraunce and nation of Smille 1 perpetual peace during the kings life & ten yeares after his death: That the Swiffers & the Grit should make restitution of those vallies appertaining to the Duchie of Millan which they had cupied: That they should acquite that estate of a bond to pay yearely a pension of forty thous duckats: That the king should indue Maximilia Sforce with the duchy of Nemours with a ye: ly pension of twelue thousand frankes, a company of fiftie Launces, and a wife of the bloud r all: That he should restore to the Swiffers the yearely pension of fortie thousand frankes, and fray the pay of three moneths to all the bands of Smiffers that were already in Lombardie on the way to comethither: That he should pay to the Cantons (at termes and times) the fixe h dred thousand crownes promised in the accord of Dyon, and three hundred thousand for the Ritution of the vallies: That he should entertaine continually in his pay foure thousand of the In this peace they named by common confent the Pope, so farreforth as he would render Par 4 and Plaisance: also they comprehended the Emperour, the Duke of Sanoy, and the Marquist Mont ferat, without making any mention at all of the king Catholike: the Venetians, not any our Italia. But this peace was made and broken almost in one day, by the comming of new banco Swiffers, in whom for the memorie of their victories palt, was a fetled hope to carie from that w no lefte quantities of spoyles & riches, then the wealth which they faw their other countreys loaden withall. And for that cause much lesse that they would heare speake of the peace, but the contrarie, to dissolue and breake it, they refused to restore the vallies: in so much as the st bands being not able to retire them from these furies, five and thirtie thousand drew to Mon to lye in the suburbes of Allan , Alberto Petro a notable Captaine being gone from them the many enfignes along the way of Coma, which way the king altogether left free and open . Is

ne peace being no fooner made then broken, things returned to the fame difficulties they fuffed before, yea they brought with themfarre greater doubts for the new armies and forces that vere approched neare the Duchie of Alillan: for, the Viceroy leaning for the gard of Verona Marke Anth. Colonno with an hundred men at armes, and fixe hundred light hortmen, and with-Breffia twelue hundred Launceknights, was come at last to lodge vpon Paw neare to Plasince, having in his armie feuen hundred men at armes, fixe hundred light horfmen, & fixe thouindfootmen, with a bridge ready prepared to passe the riner. And to leave him no occasion to omplaine, Laurence de Medicis having with great watch & gardremained many dayes at Parna with the armie, was come from thence to Planfance : the army contained at that time fenent undred men at armes, eight hundred light horimen, & foure thousand footme: he had sent afore troupe offoure hundred light horfmen to the Smiffers during the negociation of the accord: a' and which he appointed at their request to serve them to fetch in victuals, and were guided by Mucio Colonno and Lodowike Count de Petillano, the one a Captaine of the Church, & the other Commander for the Florentines: he advaunced that expedition not to much for any defire he ad to aid the comon cause, as to give to the Swiffers no occasion to comprehend the Pope withthe peace if they accorded with the French king. On the other fide Bartlemew Alusano, who ad fent word to the king that he would so intangle the Spanish armie that they should have no leane to hurt him, affoone as he understood the Viceroy was departed from Verona, went from Palefina, & passing the river of Adice, he marched all along Paw with 900 men at armes, 1400 the horimen, and 9000 footmen: he drew with him fufficient prottifions of artilleric, and was on the wals of (remona with a speed & diligence contrary to the custome of the Captaines of ir time, and wherin Aluiano himlelf tooke fuch glorie, that in his vaunting he would oftentimes vit in comparison with the celerity of Claudius Nero, when, to make head against Asdruball, he d the swiftest part of his army upon the river of Metauro, Great is the moment of celerity and ced in enterprise, and oftentimes is more effectuall to the benefite of the service and reputation the leaders, then either the multitude or courage of fouldiers.

But in this fort the state of the warre was not only diverse and variable, but also consused and tangled: on the one fide was upon the confines of Millan the French king with an armie apsinted and furnished, and by this time was come to Marignan to give facilitie to Alviano to vne with him, and to let the vniting of the Ecclefiallike and Spanish companies with the eneies: and on the other fide lay a gallant armie of xxxv. thousand Swiffers, which was a force of otmen full of valour, and neuer yet had passed under the victorie of the French. The Viceroy ptalong the shores of Paw neare to Plaisance, and vpon the high way that leades to Loda, hang a bridge ready dressed to passe the river and to joyne with the Smisers: Laurence de Medicis as within Platfance with the regiments of the Pope and the Florentimes, and all to joyne with e Viceroy to the same ends: and Alusano a circumspect and resolute Captaine, lay with the Vetian atmie vponthe territories of Cremona, almost vpon the banke of Pam: his purpose was to dethe French king, either by joyning his strength with him, or in drawing away the Church & panish regiments. The citie of Loda which standerhin the midst betweene Millan and Plaisance, d of an equal distance from them both, stood abandoned of all parts; only it had bene facked fore by Range de Cere entring as a fouldier to the Venetians, who for quarrels rifing betweene m and Alviano, had afore, what with protestations, and what with threats, got leave of the Scte, and was entred into the Popes pay with two hundred men at armes, and two hundred light usmen: but for that his fouldiers could not follow him with that speed, by reason the Venetians ould not suffer many of them to depart from Padoa where they lay, he went from Loda to fill his numbers with those companies with the which he had serued. The Cardinall of Syon also pazed with the practifes which his nation held with the French king, & no leffe doubting the ete of the citie of Milla, was fled from Plassance with a thouland Smiffers & with part of the rements of the Duke of Millan: afterwards he went to Cremona to folicite the Viceroy to march is he tooke the way of Millan before that fide was occupied by the French king, and left cerine of his companies for the gard of Loda, who affoone as they heard that the French Ring was meto Marignan, abandoned the place, their feare being greater then their perill. But whileft the cercy lay vpon the river of Paw, & before Lande Medicis came to Plaisance, Cintio whom the pe lent to the French king, was taken by the fouldiers of the Viceroy: & albeit he found about him letters & briefs of credit, yet he let him go affoone as he was take, for the reuerece hebres him that fent him, entring not with flanding into doubt, that the hope was vaine that had benevien him, that the Church army joyning with him, would paffe the river of Paw. This doubt vs increased by this occasion, that at the same time Laurence de Medicis was detected to he fent fecretly to the French king one of his men: which he did either of his owne counsell, the protested that albeit he were constrained by a necessity to obeythe Pope, yet without censing his vncle, or staining his owne honour, the king should find in him a ready deuction about to satisfie him; a thing which he had alwayes sought, and now more then ever did delabour to satisfie him; a thing which he had alwayes sought, and now more then ever did delabour to satisfie him; a thing which he had alwayes sought, and now more then ever did delabour to satisfie him; a thing which he had alwayes sought.

to expresse it. Alfoone as Laurence was come to Plaisance, there began a disputation betweene the Vices and him, with others that fate with the in counfell, whether it were belt to passe ouer the river s Paw in one strength to joyne with the Swiffers: amongst them were occupied diverse reasons: cording to the diversitie of their affections, there being litle conformity of countell, where was great variety of will & disposition: such as perswaded to passe the river, said there was no reals to dissipade the from going into Loda, for that being there, both they should let Aluiano for it. ning with the French armie, & for their owne parts, they shold have good oportunity to knit wa the Swiffers, either in going to Millan to feeke the, or elfe the Swiffers drawing to meet them: al if their lingring left time to the Frenchmen to get it (as the brute went they would) being already vponthe way betweene Loda and Millan, the French should have vpon their backes their mies ioned together, a matter which would put the in paine & danger even fo perhaps it woll not be hard to find meane to loyne with the Swiffers, not with thanding they should be driver make a greater circuit: They reasoned that this resolution was profitable to the enterprise, al necessary to take from the Swiffers all occasions of new practises of accord, and no lesse conue. ent to increase their forces against so great an armie as they had need, and namely of horsme; That besides these respects the faith and honour of the Pope and the king Catholike requirect so, both for that the capitulations bound then to succour the estate of Millan, and also they II often promised no lesse to the Smiffers, who being disappointed, might perhaps of assured fries take occasion to become dangerous enemies: Lastly, that necessity would it so, for the interest regard of their owne estates, for that the Swiffers either looking the battel, or making accord we the French king, there would remaine no force in Italy able to stand against his victorie, or to: him from spreading the wings of his fortune ouer the whole estate of the Church, even to posternes of Rome. To the contrarie of this opinion was reasoned by others, that it was not c. able that the French king had not already fent a strength of fouldiers to Loda, and if it were, the estate of the perill would drive their companies to retire with shame, and haply not with t losse of bloud, since they stood subject to have at one time the French on their backes, and the netians in flanke: withall they could not repasse the bridge without confusion and long trac s time, which would bring great infamie to their valour, and by the property of the action traferreto the aduersary the glorie they sought to appropriate to themselines: That in matters of terprise it imports Captaines to make conserence of the perill and the price, of the time and place, and of the necessity and their proper wils, to whom by, all lawes, examples, and experies of men of warre, it can be no infamy to refuse the attempt that brings not with it the opertun: of time, place, necessity, and recompence. But be it that Loda were abandoned, and that the were libertie for them to take it, what profite could grow by the enterprise show could they their plot either to meet with the Swiffers, or the Swiffers to joyne with them, so mighty anan: lying objected against them betweene Millan and Loda? Besides, it might sall out not to 1 counsell assured, to put into the hands of a nation so rash and vareasonable, all the forces of Pope and the king Catholike, seeing there were sactions amongst them, the greatest part hau j made peace with the Frenchmen, and stood in division with their fellowes. At last it was relued, that the first day both the armies should passe ouer Paw without anie baggage or caria; leaving sufficient garifion within Parma & Plaisance, for feare of the Venetian armie, whose list horsemen cuen at that time had made incursions and pillages through the countrey. But as a all actions are found many impedimets, where either is emulation of men, or variety of will, so resolution was not sincerely executed by either of the parties, for that in particular, both seem g

have an equall will to passe, they laboured to lay the fault one on another; and neither of them touch the daunger: for the Viceroy that was already entred into fuspition for the going away (intio, and no leffe acquainted with what cunning the Pope proceeded in his affaires, was of pinion, that his ill will was that Laurence should passe no further: & on the other side Laurence buildering how hardly the Viceroy was drawne to commit his armie to the power of fortune, ne of another the same judgement that others gane of him. In the afternoone the Spanish unds began to passe the bridge, whom the Church armie was appointed to follow with speed: the by reason of the night that came vpon them, they deferred by necessity vntill the morng following, when they did not only not passe, but also the Viceroy retired with his armie this fide the river, being advertised by a scout of source hundred light horsimen sent out from oth the armies to espie the enemies and their doings, that an hundred French launces were ened into Loda the day before: this made the Viceroy & Laurence to returne to their first lodgings, hich gaue oportunity to Aluiano to march with his army to Loda.

Euen about this time the French king dislodged from Marignan to lodge at S. Donato; and e Swiffers retired to Millan, one part whereof not willing to heare of warre, and the others noing inclined to peace, there arose oftentimes amongst themselves counsels and tumults: and ing one day drawne into an affembly & universall presence, the Cardinal of Ston no leffe great rhis authoritie and place, then agreeable to the people for his affabilitie and eafineffe, began of Syon perith words full of affection and vehemencie, to encourage them to iffue out the fame day and finadeth the

Thefe speeches gave great incouragement to the Swiffers, who, iovning to the exhortation the The battell of nembrance of their ancient valour & felicity, armed themselves : and assoone as they were it- of arignan. ed out of the gate towards Rome, they fell into aray & order, & a! beit the day was almost spent, they marched with their squadrons towards the French army, vsing such shoures & cries that fuch as knew not the caule, it was a reasonable perswasson that they had obtained some glous victory: The Captaines encoraged the fouldiers to march, and the refolution of the fouldiers is fuch, that they put their leaders in remembrance that at what hower focuer they came neare campe of the enemies, they should give the signe of the battell, assuring them that that was the y wherein they would couer the field with dead bodies, and vtterly rate out the name of the unceknights, & namely of fuch, who prophecying of their death, bare blacke Enfignes: and in this effate of furie and resolution of mind, they were come neare the place where the Frenchnlay, albeit there remained not two howers of day, yet they began the battell, and with a defrate courage charged the artilleries and fortifications of the enemics, breaking and difperfing this first charge, the bands that made head against them, and with their incredible valour won e part of the artilleries: But what with the horfmen bringing on a great part of the army, and the sence of the king inuironed with squadrons of valiant Gentlemen, their great furie was somehat abared. Neuerthelefie a cruell fight began betweene them, which, with diverse chances, dto the grieuous losses of the men at armes of Fraunce, who were broken, continued till rehowers within night, diuerfe French Captaines lay dead on the ground, and the king himereceived many wounds with a pike: such egearnesse of mind remained in both parts, that ir bodies being no more able to manage the weapons which the reuenge of their hearts put o their hands, they separated and fell off from the fight both without sounding of trumpet, and mmandement of their Captaines. The Smiffers remayned incamped in the place, expecting the triume or day light, neither partie offending the other, as if there had hene a fecret truce beeene them: the Cardinall caused the campe of Swiffers to be reuichualled from Millan whitheir bodies tooke rest, adding such property of helpe as he could, being the author of the erprise. And to this first felicity of theirs, was joyned a generall brute thoroughout all Italy, tthe Swiffers had put to flight the army of the Frenchmen, with many other rumors given out discourage the French, and confirme their owne side. The French king consumed not vnshably the refidue of the night, for, knowing the greatnesse of the perill, he laboured to nge his artilleries into places conuenient, to reassemble his horsemen, and put in order his adrons of Launceknights and Gascoms: he performed in his owne person, all things that could equired of a king, of a Captaine, of a man of warre, and of a mind whose resolution was greathen the estate of the danger. By this time it was day, and at the beginning of the sunne, the iffers, who did not onely despise the French army, but also (in the opinion of their valour) secdto disable the whole forces of Italy knittogether, recontinued their charge vponthe enes with the same furie and rashnesse they went to it ouer night: but they were received of the nch with greater valour, with better order, and with more discretion, they were subject to a udy charge of the horsemen, and suffered saughter both in front and in flanke. Besides, at the ng of the Sunne came Alusano, whom the king had fent for ouer night, bringing with him his it horsemen and the most speediest part of his army: he arrived at such time as the fight was It close and furious, and all things reduced into greatest trauell and daunger: and having the due of his regiment marching to good purpose and time, he entred surjously your the backes he Swiffers, who, notwithstanding they maintayned alwayes the fight with one valour and plution, yet seeing the desperate resistance that was made, & the Venetian army that was now ned, they began to to doubt of the victory, that after the Sunne had thined many howers upon carth, they founded the retrait, & charging vpo their shoulders the artilleries they had brought h them, they call about their squadrons, and retired: They observed their accustomed order in ir retiring, and so ordered their march towards Millan with so great terror and assonishment he French, that of the whole army there was neither horsemen not footmen that durst breake to follow them: onely there were two companies of their fouldiers who being fled into a graunge, were burned within the house by the Venetian light horsemen: the residue of the aty returned to Millan, not breaking one joate of their order, and retaining in their apparance id countenance, one constant and perpetual assurance: some say that they eloyed sisteen peccos great artilleries which they won at the sirst charge, for that they had no oportunity to carytland.

All men are of opinion, that there hath not bene seene in Italy of long time a battell of nice fury and greater terror, for that, what by the desperate valor with the which the Smiffers begate the charge, and also for the darkenesse of the night which led all men in error, the order one whole army being confused, and the fight so mixed, that there could not be seene or observed in · figne or comman dement, allthings were wholly referred and fubiceted to fortune: Thele whose peason was not without many and manifest dangers, was able to discerne that his presuation and fafety came more by his owne vertue and by chance, then by the fuccours and ayou his people, from whom he was oftentimes separate, somtimes by the confusion of the battell, to fometimes by the troubles and obscurities of the night: such was the discourse and state of is conflict, that Trivulce (a Captaine of great triall and experience of things) affirmed that this ttell was fought by Gyants and not by men, and that eighteene battels wherein he had bin an ecutioner, were but combats of litle children, in comparison of this. It is not to be doubted, but at (without the ayde of the artilleries) the victory had remained to the Sweffers, who, entring a ne first charge into the fortifications of the French, and recouring from them the most part ene artilleries, had alwayes won further into their campe. Befides, the comming of Aluiano weto great purpose for the French, for that comming fresh to the fight when the battell was used doubtfull, he redoubled the courage of the French, and gaue tetror to the Swiffers, supposing at the whole Venetran army was with him. Touching the number of the dead bodies, if ener it as vicertaine in a battell (as it hap neth almost alwayes) it fell out most vicertaine in this, ment a king diverly, some by passion, and some by error: some make reckening of sourceene thou as Swiffers to be flayne, some set downe but ten thousand, and others that have a more mod te iudgement, affirme there were but eight thouland left on the ground, yea some would have im reduced to a number of three thousand, and all bodies of base place: on the French part inth n counter that was given over night, were flavne Francis brother to the Duke of Burbon, Mot w à'Imbercourt, the Prince of Tallemount son to Monsieur Trimouille, Monsieur de Boysines w to the Cardinall of Amboyse, the Count of Sancerre, Catelarth of Sanoye, Buffy of Amboyse Mony Enfigne-bearer to the kings band: all personages of marke, either for their noblenesse as greatnessed estates, or for the honorable places they managed in the army: and touchingth e nerall numbers of dead bodies, some refer them to fixe thousand, and some recken them to thousand, amongst whom were certaine Captaines of the Launceknights, fundry men many fundry accompts for the causes and respects aforesayd.

When the Swiffers were retired to Millan, they fel into great disagreemet & cotrouerse, in willing to accomplish an accord with the French king, & others perswading to continue the fence of Millan; wherein as there was amongst them partiality and faction, so cuery on a his particular reason and opinion. Those Captaines that afore had solicited the accord, so his now a cause lesse dishonest to breake vp.; requiring money of Maximillan Sforce, which ty knew he was not able to advance; but all the bands of sootemen at the perswassion of Rose in the Castle sifteene hundred Swiffers and flue hundred Italians, and gaue hope to the Duke at the same bands and regiments, would returne speedily to his service, & give rescue to the Ciewith this property of hope, Maximilian, Sforce accompanied with Iohn Gonzago, & Ierome rono with other Gentlemen of Millan, inclosed himselfe in the Castle, after he had with great ficultie consented that his brother Frances Duke of Bary should go into Germanie. The Cartal of Ston tooke his iourney towards Casar to solicite for succours, giving his faith to returne to the

feruice with expedition.

Thus was the City of Mellan abandoned and given up to the French king, neither their of nor thir fortune being able to minister any further protection amid so many hard adversities as it is a course ordinary in humane chances, that one inselicity nener comes alone, so, besides sit subjection, they suffered this property of calamity, to pay to the king such quantities of treates.

nd mony, as it pleased him to impose upon them: only his person forbare to enter the towne so ong as the Callle held good for the enemies, holding it a matter unworthy the maiesty of a king, o make his entrie into a towne which was not wholly and absolutely in his power. In the place where he had won the battell, he caused Masses to be song solemnely for three dayes: the first vasto thanke Gods for his victory: the second-to pray for the soules of those that were slaughtered the battell: and in the third he made supplication for peace, and in perpetual memory of his ictory, he built in the same place a Chappell of deuotion. Immediately upon the brute of this attell all the townes and Calles of the Duchy of Millan sollowed the fortune of the victory, exept the Calles of Cremona and Millan, to the which was appointed Peter of Nauarre, who assess that he would cary it in less then a moneth: a matter that seemed unreasonable in the opinion of wife men, both for that the Casse bare good fortifications, and also for the plentifull roportion of all things necessary for defence, yea having within it a resolute gartison of two notified men of water.

The Viceroy receiving advertisement of the French victory, remained a very few dayes in the lace where he was incamped, and that more by necessity then by will, having no reason nor oortunity to remove his army for want of mony: but being at last refurnished with some little proortion, and borowing befides of Lawrence de Medicus fixe thousand duckats, he brake up and ithdrew to Ponto de Nuro, with intention to go to the Realme of Naples: for, albeit the Pope nderstanding what was hapned, had in the beginning represented to the world the constancy of spredeceffor, having withall, the Embaffadors of the confederats to perfwade him to make head gainst fortune, and to labour either to hold the Swiffers in good disposition, or at least vpon their uolting, to take in their places the Launceknights: yet he discerned that it could not be, but that e remedies and provisions would fall out too flow for his perils, and that he should be the first at should suffer : for that though the respect and reverence of the Church held the king from olesting the state Ecclesiastike, yet he could not beleene, that it was able to containe him from failing Parma and Plaisance, as members depending of the Duchy of Millan, and much leffe old him from molesting the state of Florence; a matter wherein all regards did cease, and for the hich he would thinke himselfe as deepely offended as if violence were directly offered to the ne of the Church. It was not without cause that he feared these inuasions, for that the king had ready given order to casta bridge over the river of Pam neare to Pawa, to send totake Parma & 'assance, and afterwards, if the Pope refused his amity, to proceede by the way of Pontresmo to afethe Medices from the towne of Florence, But amid thele deuises and preparations, the Duke Sanoy and the Bishop of Tricaro the Popes Nuncio, by commission of the Pope, treated with e king, who was not without vehement defires to be accorded with him, fearing perhaps new iances to be made against him, and bearing a wonderfull reuerence and inclination to the sea A. offolike for the terrour that was thorogh the whole Realme of Fraunce by reason of the perfections received by Pope Inlin. In these respects there was concluded between them a present nsederation for the defence of the states of Italy, wherein was particularly expressed, that the ig should take upon him the protection of the person of the Pope, the state of the Church, lust-& Lawrence de Medicis, & the estate of Florence: That the king shold give an estate in Fraunce pension to Iulian, & to Lawrence a pension & a copany of fifty Launces: That he should con-. at that the Pope might give passage to the Viceroy through the states and jurisdiction of the nurch, to returne with his army to the kingdome of Naples: That the Pope should be bound to tke depart out of Verona, the fouldiers he had there, & withall, to countermand the companies it to the fuccours of Cafar against the Venetians: That he should give up to the French king the ies of Parma and Plusance, and in recompence thereof the king to agree, that from thence forard the Duchy of Millan should be bound to leavy for his vie the falts of Ceruia, a matter of at profit to the Church, & wherein the Pope had already agreed with the Duke of Millan in confederation he made with him: That there should be made an arbitration and compromise the person of the Duke of Sanoy, to judge whether the Florentins had broken the consederation ide with king Lowis, and if they have offended that way, then he to have power to impose such nalty as they have deserved: This the king sayd he demanded more for satisfying of his hour, then for other respect.

Assone as this conclusion was made, the Bishop of Tricaro went to Rome in post to persuade the Pope to ratifie it, and Lawrence de Medicis to give occasion to the Viceroy to depart the soc ner, withdrew to Parma & Reggia the companies that were within Plaisance: touching himself he went to the king to obtaine his good grace and fauor, and to perfwade him that in all effaces times and chances of things, he would depend your, ving in that office or offer of Court, the aduifes of his Vycle which were more full of futtlety then of good meaning. It was much ac to induce the Pope to this ratification, for that it brought no litle displeasure to him to loose Pa ma and Plasfance: he could willingly have temporifed to fee what the Smiffers would first dete mine, who having called a Parliament at Surich (the principal! Canton of the whole nation, al. most enemy to the French (debated to give rescue to the Castle of Mullan, notwithstanding the had abandoned the vallies and the townes of Bellinzone and Lugarno, but not the Castels. New theleffe the king obtained the Castell of Lugarno, in corrupting the Captaine with fixe thousal crownes: onely the Gresons would not abandon Chiauanna; at last the Bishop of Trical laying afore him the daunger leaft the king would inuade Parma and Plaifance, and fend mi of warreinto Tuscane, and making great terror of the harmes that the Swiffers had received; the battell of Marignan: the Pope was content to ratifie the peace, albeit under this moderatic, that neither he nor his Agents should be bound to give vp into the kings hands Parma and Pl. fance, but by leaving them voyde of men and officers, to give liberty to the king to enter vp 1 them: That the Pope should not be bound to leavie his people from Verona, for that he worl not commit such a property of iniury against Calar: and yet he promifed to do it vpon thene: convienient occasion: Lastly that the Florentines should be holden absoluted of the pretenct breaking of the league. The accord bare also that the king should not take upon him thepitection of any vasfall or subject of the estate of the Church, and that not onely he should not he der the Pope as their supreme Lord, to proceede against them with correction, but also he sho I be bound to minister ay de to him in that action when necessitie required. Moreover it was bated that the Pope and the French king should have an enterview together in some place couepient; a matter offered by the king particularly, but defired indifferently by them both: 1: king fought it, the better to establish that amity, to assure the estates of such his friends as held in Italy: and lastly for that he hoped with his presence, and offering great advancements to a Popes brother and nephew, to win of him his confent to inuade the Realine of Naples; ama T which was one of his greatest defires: The Pope wished this enterniew, to the end that with t office and observance very proper to win grace & amity with every one, to entertaine the k ? while st he stood in so great fortune & prosperity. Many thought not well of this deliberatio, a a action vinworthy of the maiefly of a Pope, & that it more appertained to the king, defiring to he coference with him, to go feek him & do reverece to him at Rome but the Pope gaue it out tha was so much the more ready to codificend to this meeting, by how much he was defitous to inc the king not to molest the Realme of Naples during the life of the king Catholike, who to iudgement of man could not line long, for that it was more then a yeare fince he was ill difpo l.

Peter Na ..

In this meane while Peter of Nauarre was labouring to cary the Castle of Millan, and hat g warre afore the won a murdring house vpon the Castle ditch which on the slanke side had his prospect via castell of Mil-the gate of Coma, and afterwards approching nearer the ditch and the Castle wall by the he of pauisses and Engines of wood, he began to worke a myne within the fayd ditch: and w n he had removed the defences, he began to labour more mynes, taking away with the helpe of s Engines a great paucor space of the wall on the flanke of the Castle, and applyed his hookes d Rammes to make it fall at the fame instant that he put fire to his mines: matters which albe n common judgement feemed not fufficient to cary the Caffle but with great difficulty and l g time, & that there was good intelligence that the Smiffers by the resolution of Zurich, preps d to succour it: yet a practise being begun betweene John Gonsago the Duke of Millans Capt 10 which was within the Caltle, & the Duke of Burbon his parent, le. Morono, with two other S. f. fer Captaines interpoling also in the action, the resolution was concluded the sourth day of O ber, not without a wonderfull maruell of all men: le. Morono was specially blamed for this ciclusion, for that either through feare, which was naturall in him, or forewant of faith which as neuer imputed to him, he had yfed his authority to perswade the Duke to agreemet: neuerthelesse he excused himselfe upon certaine controuersses and mutinies hapned between the footemen of the Smiffers and the Italians. The Articles of the accord were, that Maxim an Gree should immediatly give up into the hands of the French king, the Castels of Millan and remona: That he should depote himselfe of all rights and interests which he had in that estate: hat he should receive of the king, a certaine proportion of money to pay his debts: That he sould go into Fraunce, where the king should indue him with a yearely pension of thirtie thound duckats, or procure him to be made Cardinall with the same renenue: That the king should ordon Galeas Vilcount with certaine other Getlemen of that Duchy who had followed the ferce of Maximilian: That he should distribute amongst the Smiffers that were within the Castell, re thousand crowns: That he should coffrme to loh. Gozago the goods that he held in the estate Millan by the gift of the Duke, & enlarge his living with some yearely pensio. That he should like fort ratifie to Morono, as well the goods that appertained to him in propertie, as others that had of the Dukes gift, together with the offices he exercifed, & should make him Maister of reuells of the Court of Fraunce. Vpon the publication of this accord, Maximilian furnamed the gore according to the name of his father, departed out of the Castell, & went into France: he said was a sweet aductifie that brought with it prosperitie, for that by that exchange offortune, he as drawne out of the feruitude of the Swiffers, the ill dealings of (a/ar, & the deceits of the Spaards. In this alteration also men seemed more to allow of the working of fortune, that she had so eedily deposed him from such a degree, then that afore she had exalted a man, who, for his inpacitie, inconstant thoughts, and most fowle maners of life, was vinworthy of all greatnesse. Afore the Castell of Millan was restored, there were sent to the king as Embassadours from

ence, thefe foure of the most principall and honorable of the Senate Antho. Grimani, Dominike reutfan, George Cornara, and Andrew Gritti: their comming was to congratulate with the king his victorie, and to befeech him by the vertue of the capitulations of the league, to ayde them recouer their townes: an enterprise wherein they had no other impediments then the forces of efar, and the Popes regiments that were within Verona under the charge of Mark Antho, Conno: for, the Viceroy after he was gone fro off the marches of Plai Cance, & had reposed some few yes vpo the frontiers of Modena expecting the Popes ratificatio to the accord with the French ighe withdrew with all diligence to the realine of Naples by the way of Romagnia. Vpon the ation of these Embassadours, the king gaue speedie order that the bassard of Sanoy & Theodor runlee should go to their succour with fixe hundred Launces and seuen thousand Launceights: who, whileIt they deferred to march and depart, either that they temporifed to fee what ould come of the Castell of Allan, or that the king had a meaning to fend out the same bands ainst the Castell of Cremona, Aluiano drew with his armie towardes Bresia, for, the Venetians ould not consent that he should follow the Viceroy, for that they defired to recour Bressia and erona (if it were possible) without forreine succors. But because that citie was newly resupplyed th a thousand Launceknights, and Bergamo also rendred to the Venetians many dayes before, Aluiano resolued to go first to besiege Verona, as being the least fortified, and having there eatelt commoditie of victuals, and withall for that Verona being taken, the action of Bressia ould be easie, the situation bearing no oportunitie of succours by the Almaines: onely he forreto give beginning to his enterprise for feare least the Viceroy and the Popes bands that were the countreys of Reggia and Modena should repasse over Paw at Ostia, to rescue Verona: but ing deliucred of that Inspition by the going away of the Viceroy, he fell into another impedimet ficknelle, whereof he dyed in the beginning of October at Gueda in the countrey of Breffia, ha- Death of Alng not yet threefcore yeares of age. The Venetians received great displeasure for his death, but "iano. eater was the forrow of the fouldiers, who being not fatisfied with the remembraunce of him, pt publikely in the armie his body by the space of fine and twentie dayes, carying it about with em with very great pompe, at fuch time as they marched: and when he should be conserved to enice, Theodor Trivulce would not fuffer that as he was caried by the marches of Verona, they ould demaund lafecondust of Marke Antho, Colonno, Jaying, it was not convenient that he who his life had neuer feare of his enemies, should now in his death demaund the thing by petition hich afore they durst not denie him of duetie: he was buried at Venice by publike order & with eat ceremonies in S. Stephens Church, where yet remaineth the monument of his sepulcher, and perpetuall remembraunce of the merites and vertues of his life, was pronounced by a very elouent young Gentleman, a funerall Oration: he was a Captaine in all mens ópinion of great relution and courage, and an affured executioner of things determined; and yet either by the malice of fortune, who hath no small imperie ouer enterprises, or for that he was sudden in countell, a principall enemie to the valour of men, he receited many foiles by his enemies, year

thought he neuer obtained victorie when he was Generall of an armie.

By reason of the death of Aluiano, the French king (not being required by the Venetians) ga: to them for Gouernour of their armie, Triunlee, whom they fo much defired, as well for his exp. rience wherein he was well confirmed, as for his reputation in the science of warre, for the whit they had him in no imall opinion: but most of all for that by the comon inclination of the faction the Guelffer, there had bin alwayes a fetled amitte and good will between chim and that commit weale. Whilest he went to the armie, to take his charge, the Venetian bands tooke Pesquiere, al ouerthrew a little before the enterprise, certaine troupes of horsemen, and three hundred Spanis footemen that went to their rescue, recourring also Asolo and Lono, which the Marquis of Ma. tua had abandoned. Assoone as Trinule was come to the armie they besieged Bressa at the stance of the Senate, notwithstanding it seemed a matter of great difficultie to carie it with: the French armie, both for that the towne was strong and well manned with a crew of two the. fand footemenaswell Launceknights as Spaniards, & also for that a great number of the Guelli had bene constrained to go away, the winter also drawing on, and the season much disposed, raine and stormes. Neither did the issue and successe of the matter beguile the indgement that 1: Captaine gaue of it: for as they had begun to do execution vpon the wals with their artilleri. which they had planted upon the brinke of the ditch, on that fide where iffueth the small river Garzetto: fo they that were within making many fallies, brake forth at last with fifteene hundil Launceknights and Spaniards, to charge the gard of the artillerie, which was an hundred men: armes and fixe thousand footemen: and beating them also with the shot that for that end was. raunged vpon the towne wall, they put the eafily to flight, not with flanding that Iohn Paul M... from with thittie men at armes fulfamed form what their furie: in this action they flue two hund! bodies, burnt the powders, and drew into Bressia ten pecces of artilleries. For the harmes of ti diforder, Trinulce thought good to retire and incampe more at large, expecting the comming f the Frenchmen: in which minde he withdrew to Coccaio, which is ten myles from Bressia, : Venetians looking in the meane while to make new prouisions of artillerie and munitions . 1; affoone as the Frenchmen were come to the campe, returned to befrege the towne, and begat i batter it in two fundry places on that fide of the gate of Piles towardes the Castell, & also on t: fide of the gate of S. John: in one of which quarters the Frenchmen were incamped, and after the had given leave to the Launceknights, for that they refused to do service against the towners Cafars obedience, Peter of Nanarre arrived at the campe with five thousand Gascons & Fren men: and in the other quarter lay with the Venetian regiments, Tribulee, in whom rested alm the whole superintendencie of those affaires, for that the bastard of Saury being fallen into sign neffe, was gone from the armie. When they had battred the wall, they followed not with the fault for the fundry rampiers and fortifications which the valour of the defendaunts had made) refult their violence: onely Peter of Nauarre having recourse to his accustomed remedies, but to undermine and linke the wals. About this time Marke Antho. Colonno issuing out of Vers with fixe hundred horsemen and five hundred sootemen, encountred in the plaine John Par Manfron and Marke Antho . Buo, who were bestowed in garrison within Valeggio with so : hundred men at armes and foure hundred light horsemen, he overthrew them, and in the skirn 1 was takenthe fonne of John Paule, his horse being killed vnder him, and his father sled for hisse tie to Goieto: immediatly after which expedition, Marke Antho.occupied Leguaguo, where we taken prisoners certaine Gentlemen of Venice. At last the difficulties to take Bressia being me and more redoubled., both forthat the minesemployed by Peter of Nauarre did not answer the hopes that had bene giuen, and also for an expectation of eight thousand footemen to co out of Germanie, which the Captaines that lay about Bressia had no confidence to be a to hinder: the Venetians to couer someway the ignominie of their retraite, were contend to agree with the defendaunts of Breffia, that if they were not succoured within thirtie days they would abandon the Citie, and go out of it with their enfignes displayed, their artiller, and what elfe appertained to them; a promife which every one knew would ferue to no purpe for the affurance they had of fuccours; onely it was a thing profitable to them of Brefia, to be livered in the meane while from advertities & afflictios. Afterwards the Venetians put eight the and footemen within Bre, a towne subject to the Counts of Lodrono, but assoone as they heard ne Launceknights marched (to whom the Castell of Auso was redred) they retired cowardly to ne armie: the Captaines themselnes shewed no greater resolution and courage, who searing to echarged at one time both by those bands, and the defendants of Bressia, and also by Marke Amho. Colonno with the regiments that were within Verona, retired to Gueda, whither they had nt afore (being affured of that accident) their greatest fortes of artillerie and almost all their bagage: and the Launceknights that entred into Verona without impediment, returned into Gerianie, after they had refurnished it of victuals, and reenforced the garrison.

During these accidents and enterchaunge of affaires, the Pope and the French King had need vpon an enterview at Bolognia: a place which the King accepted afore Florence, beuse he would not befarre removed from the Duchie of Millan, and chiefly for that the Duke f Sauoy managed continually the negociation of accord betweene him and the Swiffers . But me thought he made election of that place, for that in passing into Tuscane he should be onstrained to leade with him a great trayne of souldiers, to the end he should not enter into larence with a leffe pompe then did the late King Charles before him: for dreffing of which mpe, it behoued him to spend certaine dayes in deferring; a matter by so much more gricuous dintollerable to the king, by how much (befides generall respectes) it would breede occaon to make him retaine yet longer the whole armie, whereof albeit the expences were great, t made he no reckening nor relolution to fend away any part of it, so long as his person remaid in It also. Thus the Pope entred into Bolognia the eight day of December, and after him the Enterwiew of ig made his entry within two dayes, and to receive him, were gone to the confines of the countries the Freeh king yof Reggia, the Cardinals Fiefquo and Medicis, Legates Apostolike. The king entred with- in Bolognia. tmany bands of souldiers, and with no great trayne of Court and Courtiers, and being conyed according to the maner of kings into the publike Confiltorie afore the Popes presence, he red in his own person (his great Chancellor deliuering the speech for him) the obedience which then he had not protested. They were lodged three dayes together in one pallace, shewing e to another right great and manifelt tokens of good will and amitie: they confirmed at this eting with wordes and promifes, the obligations and contractes passed afore, and debated bees, of many things touching the Realme of Naples, which for that the king was in no readile to assaile at that time, he contented himselfe with the great hope and assurances which the segaucto fauour him in that enterprise, either assoone as the king of Aragon should dye, who eatonable judgement could not long line, or when the confederation which he had with him uldbeended, which yet had continuance of fixteene moneths. The king also befought the he to reder to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena and Reggia, whereunto he condifcended so farre thas the Duke repayed xl. thousand duckats which he had given to Casar for Modena, and hall, make recopence for such summes of money as he had disbursed in expences for both the es. Lastly the king was a futer for Frauncis Mario Duke of Frbin, who being waged and insined by the Church with two hundred men at armes, and appointed with Inlian de Medicis to the armie, and afterwards that charge being trasferred to Lawrence, by reason Iulian was e, he refused to go thither, alledging he would not accord to Lawrence that which against his uite he had suffred for friedships fake in Iulian, to beare the place of a simple Captaine & subto the authoritie of another, & that in the armie of the Church, wherein he had ruled so oftensas Generalland foueraigne Commaunder of all. Moreouer he reuoked those fouldiers in ay that were on the way, not with standing his promise to send them on to the service : he had fecretly compounded, or at least was in action of compositio with the French king, like as also fince the kings victory, he had not ceaffed by special working to kindle him against the Pope, taking the occasion of those injuries, and casting by all his deuises to make fall to his tethat Duchie, refused to the king his demaund, reducing to his remembraunce by sweete des, of what consequence it would be for the affaires of the Church, to give boldnesse to his edes to rebell by so hurtfull an example. These reasons induced the King to conforme him to the Popes will, not with standing in regard of his honour, he would gladly have purchased fie for him that was fallen into daunger for being faithfull to his feruice: whereunto he was vaded by many of his Councell & most of his Court, who under the example of the late king, ed how ynwife a counsell it was to give heart and countenaunce to the Duke Valentinois to oppresse the inseriour Lords of Italie; a matter that made him rise into that estate of greatne that if God had given longer life to his father Pope Alexander, his ambition could not but he bene verie prejudiciall to the affaires of Fraunce. The Pope promifed to give the king power leavie the tenth part of the Church revenues of the Realme of Fraunce for the arrearing of an. mie, and gaue also his consent that the king should have the nomination of benefices, whichwayes afore hath appertained to Colledges & Chapters of Churches; a matter that fell out mh to the profit and purpose of the kings of Fraunce, not onely having by that meane the sacultio dispose at their owne arbitration and will many rich benefices, but also the annates of the Fieh Churches, should afterwards be payed to the Pope according to the true value, & not as the a. cient taxations being far leffe required. Wherein the Pope found himselfe deceined for, when is Deputies and Commissaries for the Realme of Fraunce, fought to proceede 2 gainst those at concealed the true value, they could finde no proofe nor testimonie, and much lesse have more to execute against the parties, so that dispatches went out according to the old rates. The kinsx his part promised not to take into his protection any of the Cities of Tuscane: and albeital: wardes he required to haue libertie to protect the people of Lucqua, who offered him fine d twentie thousand duckats, saying, he was bound to that protection by the obligation of his proceffour, yet the Pope would give no confent, but promifed for his part that he would forbeat o molest them in any fort . Lastly they agreed by indifferent consent of them both to send litt Giles General of the Augustins and an excellent Preacher, to Cafar in the Popes name, to dif se him to render to the Venctians, Breffia and Verona, taking a recompence of money: and form the expedition of these matters, but not set downe by writing, except the article for nominam of benefices and payment of the Annates according to the true value, the Pope in fauour one king pronounced Cardinall Adrian de Boisse, brother to the great Maister of Fraunce, and the greatest authoritie with the king and in the generall gouernment. Then the enterview he vp, the king departing from the Pope very well contented and in great hope to haue him his rpetuall friend, who for his part expressed no lesse with all reasonable demonstrations, but in minde he nourished other impressions: for that both it was a matterno lesse grieuous to him m afore, that the Duchie of Millan should be possessed by the French king, and Parma & Plas to restored, and also that the Duke of Ferrara should be effloones reinuested in Modena and pgia. And yet all these not long after turned to vanitie and smoake, for that the Pope being me from Bolognia to Florence, and remaining thereabout a moneth, had received of the Duke omiles of the money that should be paydatloone as he should enter into possession, & being ne fet downe in writing by common consent the instruments that were to passe betweene thei he Pope neither denying nor accomplishing, but interpoling many delayes and excules, refu to giue perfection to things. The king being returned to Millan, dismissed his armie except seuen hundred Launces ne thousand Launceknights and soure thousand Frenchmen such as they call aduenturers, who he left the gard of that estate. And for his owne person hereturned into Fraunce with great spilabout the first beginning of the yeare 1516, leaving behind him as his Lieutenant, Charles ske of Bourbon: he thought he had left his affaires in Italie in good estate of suretie, both for the ance newly contracted with the Pope, and also for that about that time, he was newly com inded with the Smillers, who, not with stading the persuasions of the king of England, to have to reenter into armes against the Frech king renewed with him the alliance, by the which they sid themselves to furnish alwayes for his service and at his pay, both in Italie and out of Italy, see fence and offence, and against all nations, such numbers of sootemen as he would require and that under their universall name and publike enfignes: onely they excepted to beare armes a influence of their universal public enfignes. the Pope, the Empire, and the Emperour. And on the other fide, the king confirmed to the new their auncient pensions, with promise to pay them within a certaine time the fixe ht red thousand duckats agreed vpon at Dyon, with three hundred thousand if they gaue vp to h the villages and vallies appertaining to his Duchie of Millan: a matter which the fine Cantor that possessed those places, refusing to do, as also to ratifie the accord, the king bega to pay to the eight Catons that part & portio of the money that appertained to the: who accepted it, but add this expresse condition, that they should not be bound to take his pay against the five Cant s. About the beginning of this yeare, the Bishop Petruccio an auncient servaunt to the opt seed out of Sienna by the Popes aide and somehelpe from the Florentins, Borque so fonto Panthe Petruces his cofin, and impatronifed himselfe vpon the place, the authority and gouerneent remaining by equity in the possession of his sayd cosin : the Pope had two respects induighim to this action, the one, for that that City standing betweene the estate of the Church, and dominion of the Florentins, was governed by a man wholly at his denotion: the other was, & ich more particular and mouing, for that he hoped with the fauour of some good occasion, to ike it fall into the gouernour of his brother or his nephew, wherein he doubted nothing of the shops consent, having already framed him tractable to all his defires and ambitions.

The warre continued kindled betweene Cafar and the Venetians, who for their partes defired recouer by the ayde of the French king, Breffia and Verona: but for other places and regions of ily, things feemed to stand in a peaceable estate: only there began to burst out motions of new resthat were pushed on by the king of Aragon, who fearing least the greatnesse of the ench king would bring some aduct sities to the realme of Naples, dealt with Cesar & the king England, to recontinue the warre: a matter not only of no great difficulty and hardneffe to w Cafar vnto, being both defirous of innovation and new things, and also was not able eafily keepe the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: but also it was fully concluded and reed vnto by the king of England: the remembrance of the late infidelity and breach of prose of his father in law, being of lesse power in him, then either his present emulation or rcient hatred against the Crowne of Fraunce: besides, he was enuious, that the Scottish king ing in minoritie, should be governed by people of his appointment, or any way depending

These matters had bene followed both with better counsell, and greater forces, if during the Death of the gociation, the death of the king of Aragon had not hapned, who, after he had benevexed with king Catholice. ong indisposition, died in an interior village, called Madrigalege, as he went to Semile with his butt: he was a king excellent in counfell, and so furnished with all other properties of vertue, that bare no occasion or matter of reprehension, if he had bene constant to keepe his promises: touching the imputation of niggardnesse or the report that went of him to be straite in expeni, it was proued vittue by the testimony and discourry of his estate after his death, leaving hind him no amaffe of treasure, notwithstanding he had raigned xlij. yeares. But it hapneth ofrtimes by the corrupt judgement of men, that in a king prodigality is more praifed, though the ing and oppression of subjects be joyned to it, then a sparing straitnesse, wherein is nourished orderly abitayning from taxing the goods of others. To the excellent vertues of this Prince, sioyned a most rare, and perpetual felicity during the whole course of his life, excepting only edeath of his onely sonne: for, the accidentes of his wives and his sonne in law, were the afethat he kept his greatnesse untill his death, and the necessity to depart with Castille after his ues death, was rather a sport then a blow of fortune. In all other things he was right happy: , being second sonneto John king of Aragon, he came to the Crowne by the death of his elder other: he aspired to the kingdome of Castille by Issabell his wife: he subdued the Competitors the same kingdom, & expulled them: he made a conquest of the Realme of Granado, which the emies of Christian faith had vsurped almost eight hundred yeares: he annexed to his Empire, Realmes of Naples, and Navarre, and the principalitie of Orano, with many other places of portance upon the coast of Affriqua: he base alwayes the victory and upper hand of his ences: he almost cloaked his ambitions and couetou snesse with an honest zeale to religion, and an ly affectió to the common-weale, wherein fortune appeared manifestly conjoyned with induy. About a moneth afore his death, dyed the Great Captaine, both ablent from the Court, and Death of the contented of the king : and yet the king gaue order, that in remembrance of his valour, there Great Capbuld be done to him both in the Court & through the whole parts of the Realme, those honors taine. it have not bene yied to be done, but at the death of kings; a matter plaufibly accepted and exeted by all his subjects, who omitted no fort of reverence or celebration to the name of the teat Captaine, making him fingular in liberality, in counfell, in discretion, and for knowledge in "irres and martiall science, excelling all the Captaines of his time.

By the death of this king, the French king entred into a new courage to addresse an enterprise finft the Realme of Naples, to the which he was in mind to fend forthwith the Duke of Burbon th an army of eight hundred Launces, and ten thousand sootemen: he seemed to repose much in the oportunity of the time, for that the kingdome being in some tumult vpon t death of the king, and ill prepared for defence, he perswaded a facility of conquest, sp. cially for that the Archduke could not come thither in time convenient to fuccour it: and doubted nothing of the Popes fauour, both for the hopes hee had given him at to enteruiewe of Bolognia, and in regard of the alliance contracted with him, and also consideration of his proper interest, as though hee should be icalouse of the wor. derfull height and greatnesse of the Archduke, heire present to so many kingdomes the death of the king Catholike, and expected successour of Casar: he hoped beside, that the Archduke would give him no great impediment, knowing howe harmel might be to him his ill will touching the Realmes of Spaine, but specially for the regard the kingdome of Aragon, whereunto many of the same samilie had aspired, if the power had beene as great as their right: for albeit in the life of the late king and Iffall his wife, it was interpreted in an open and generall Parliament of the whole Realr, that the auncient conflicutions of that kingdome, which admit not women to the ficession of the Crowne, were not prejudiciall against the issue males borne of the, when in the line masculine was to be found neither brother, vncle, nor nephew of the del king, nor any other that was more nearer to him then they that were difcended of : womans fide, or at least in equal degree: and that for that reason it was declared, that all the death of Ferdinand, the succession appertained to the Archduke Charles, wherein vi brought for example, that after the death of Martin king of Aragon dying without it: males, by the fentence of the Judges deputed to that matter through the whole kingdome, preferred Ferdinand Graundfather to this Ferdinand, notwithstanding he came of the wom: fide, afore Count Vrgello and others loyned to Martin by malculine line, but in deg: and property of discending, further off then Ferdinand : yet the people nourished amort thensselves a secrete complaint and controversie, that in that interpretation and declarati, the power and authority of Ferdinand and Islabell was of more force, then the law of iul: and equity. In this did the interpretation feeme valuft to many, that the women be excluded, such as descended of them might bee admitted, and withall, that i the sentence given to the behoose of the old Ferdinand, the searce of his a rmes ruled m: then reason .

These matters being layd open to the French king, and withall, that the peoples of a prouince of Aragon, Valence, and the Earledonie of Catelonia (all these are compreded vinder the kingdome of Aragon) stood desirous to enjoy a king proper and particus. He hoped that the Archduke, not to endaunger so great a succession and so many store reasonable composition. In the which time, for the better preparing of this enprise, and because he would infinuate by benefites, as well as preuable by sorces, he sout to set at libertie Prosper Colomo, upon whom was imposed a raunsome of since thirtie thousand duckats, whereof the king procured him to be pardoned of the mostic, upon payment whereof he was released. By which property of sauour the world is induced to beleeue, that Prosper had made secrete promise not to beare armes against by yea haply to ayoe him in the warre of Napler, albeit with some limitation or referuing his honour.

Alheit the kings minde was occupied with these thoughts, and that he had now demined to deserte no longer the action of armes and forraine warre, yet he was driver ynew accidents to turne his mind wholly to looke to his owne desence: for that the Empel having received an hundred and twenty thousand duckats, according to the formegociation begunne with the king of Aragon, he made; preparation (as he had acceded with the sayd King) to invade the Duchy of Willian, after he had once given cours to Verona and Bressia. For the army of the Venetians (commanded by The a Triunice, who was made Governour when the other Triunice was returned to Mill lying encamped within fixe miles of Bressia, suffered their estradiots to make incursions thore?

he whole countrey: and one day being charged by those that were within the towne, and either party running to the refeue and succour of their friends, they repulsed them and draue them reaten into Breffia, having long fought for the victory, in which conflict they flue many, & tooke oriloner the gouernours brother of the City. Not many dayes after Monfieur de Lawtrech Geterall of the French army, and Theodore Triunlee having espiall that a strength of three thousand Launceknights came to Breffia to conduct the money fent for the pay of the fouldiers, fent out o hinder their passage at the Castle of Anfo, lanus Fregosa and lohn Conrado Vrsm, with certaine ands of both the armies: they put the Launeeknights to flight, and made flaughter of eight hunlred of them, the refidue carying away the money, found fafety by flying to Lodrono. Aftervards the Venetians fent a regiment of two thousand fine hundred footemen into Sand-valley to onifie the Castle of Acfo, who burnt Lodrono and Aftoro. Thus were they in Breffia marseloully trauelled, whose aduerfities and straitnesse bearing suspition least they would give vp, compelled Cafar to advance and march: he tooke his way by Trent to Verona, having in his atny five thousand horsemen, fifteene thousand Swiffers sent to him by the five Cantons, and ten houland footmen aswell Spanish as Launceknights. By reason of which marching comming on orthin a maner, in a number, and by a way contrary to expectation, the French army and the Teneri ins, leaving fufficient garrifons within Uncenfa and Padoa, went to Pefquiero, carying a nindto flop Cafars passage at the river of Minee : but (as it often hapneth in matters of enerprise) the execution did nothing aunswere the counsell: for that when they sawe the enemies pproach and come on, they wanted the courage to performe in the field the thing which they ad fo brauely promifed vnder counsell in their panillions, but, having passed Ogha, they reiredto (remona, omitting the oportunity, with the loffe of reputation, which in the enemy enreased together with a new courage and resolution . But Casar, either caried by an yndiscret ounfell, or pushed on by an cuill fortune, encamped before Afolo, which was garded by a hunred men at armes, and foure hundred footemen of the Venetians: there he confumed unprofitably nany dayes, wherein it was thought that the respite which he gaue to the enemies in that delay, ooke from him the oportunity of the victory. Assoone as he brakevp from before Asolo, he passed heriuer of Oglio at Orcinouo, and the enemies leaving in Cremonla three hundred Jaunces & three housand footenen, retired on the other fide the river of Addo, with intention to Hop his passage. by whose retiring seauing the peeces there abandoned, all the countrey betweene Dgio, Pam, and Addo, was at the devotion of Cafar, except Cremona & Crema, whereof the one was garded by he French, & the other kept by the Venetiant. The Cardinall of Sion with many of the banished eople of the Duchy of Millan, followed Cafar, together with Mark. Anthonie Colonno, who marhed with two hundred men at armes of the Popes pay: a matter which gave so much the more are to the Frenchmen, by how much their greatest hopes were reduced thither of ten thousand iniffers who had beine payed for ten moneths made any more tarying to march, After Cafar had valled the river of Oglio, he drew neare to the river of Addo to make his passage at Pisqueton, out finding many difficulties to passe in that place, he came to Rinoles, the Frenchmen lying at Caferano on the other fide the river, who for that the Smiffers were not come, and that the river of Addo had many foordes that yeelded facility of passage, retired the day after to Adullan, not without matter of infamy to Monfieur de Lawirech, who had written to the king that he would Hop Jefars passage at that river. But Cafar finding no impediment to result his passage there, joyned illigence to his fortune, and finding mens minds inclined to his victory; he had the City of Lodge endred to him forthwich; and being within a few miles of Millan, he fent an Herald to Junimon he towns, threatning the inhabitants, that if within three dayes they expulsed not the Frencharny, he would deale worfe with them then did Federike Barberoffo his predeceffor, who not latisied to waste and burne Millan, caused salt to be sowed and strawed about in memory of his an-יות היב במל נוקו היב אול יום בוככסיים יו er and their rebellion.

The French men that in great feare were retired to Millar, fell among it themselves into great lebates and diversity of counsels: some were of opinion to abandon Millar, both for that in hemselves was no possibility of resistance against so mighty enemies, and withall they had no great considere in the comming of the Swiffers, not withstanding they knew they were already you the way: besides, they had advertisement that the Cantons either had already ordered, or were at point to commaund, that the souldiers of the Swiffers should depart from the service of both the one and the other, which direction it was thought credible and likely that those bands that were upon the way, would be more ready to obey then they that were in the feruic of the enemy. Others gaue aduise not to leaue the service, esteeming it too great infanty to leau for faken in perill and aduer fity, those friends that had reposed and layd up in them the whole con fidence of their fafety and protection. They alleaged a better hope in the refcue of the Swiffers and their owne ability to defend Millan, giving a resolute counsell to sticke to the defence c the towne, and for their better furety they willed to keepe retayned in Millan all the footemer and eight hundred Launces, making distribution of the others together with the Venetians an the light horfemen, into places adjoying, to keepe and cut off victuals from the enemies. Th variety of opinions was no small impediment to the present service, their daunger and necessit being more importunate, then their counsels resolute, or their confidence assured. Neuerthe leffe the first counsell had bene followed, had it not bene for the contrary working and persua fion of Andrew Gritti and Andrew Treussan, Venetian commissioners, who obtained by the authority (for otherwise they could win nothing) that a cowardly haste should not carry the further then the reputation of valour and counfell appertaying to men of warre and feruice In the action of which perswasions newes came, that the day following Alberto Peter would be in Millan with tenthousand Swiffers and Grisons; a matter that breathed new minds and cou rages in them, and yet having no confidence to be able to defend the suburbes, they burnt the by the counsell of the Venetian' commissioners, who aduised them to that violence, either se that they supposed it necessary to the safety of the towne, or else under that occasion they sough to fatisfie the auncient hatred remaining of long time betweene them of Millan and Venice: the both expulsed out of the City, and also retained under good gard, many of the chiefetaines of the Gebelin faction, as inclined to the name of the Empire by the care and labour of those houses, ar for that there were in the army many of the same partiality. In this meane while Calar encan ped with his army at Lambra two miles from Millan, where he had no sooner setled his came to the terror of the towne, then the expected supply of Smiffers entred for the defence of it . B. fides the fuddennesse of their comming, which in cases of rescue is of no small importance, the readinesse and disposition to fight, amazed not a little even those that afore seemed to standing furance of the victory: they gave a new life to the discouraged minds of the Frenchme and no les feare and terror to Cafar, who looking into the auncient hatred of that nation to the house Austrich, and comparing with his present estate, the accident hapned to Lodowike Sforce hauit Swiffers in his army, and the French army his enemies, began to feare least they wold joyne him that lamentable example: he faw it was likely that they would fooner practife infidelity and tre fon against him for the difficulty he had to pay them, then against the Frenchmen, to whom w wanting no money to pay their wages, nor to corrupt their minds: wherein this was one matt that confirmed him in his doubt, that lames Staffuer Generall of the Sweffers, had asked hi his pay with great arrogancie; which neuertheleffe was deferred, besides many other difficu ties, because the treasure that was sent to him out of Germanie, was restrayned by the Spani regiments that were within Bressia, to satisfie so much of their payes as were due . So that the confideration of these objections and doubts, together that the danger was nothing inserito the feate, Cafar brake up his campe and retired towards the river of Adda, his negligen taking from him the glorie of the victory which fortune and oportunitic feemed to pr pare for him: for, if he had made, his approaches to Millan but three dayes afore (a tin which he vainely consumed afore A/olo) the Frenchmen that lived in great doubt and incertain of the comming of the Swiffers, had returned beyond the Mountes. Befides, if he had not foone discamped, either the Frenchmen, not reposing fully in the Swiffers, for the respects their countrey men that served in Casars campe, had followed their first counsell, or else the Swiffers taking their excuse you the commandement of their superiours, would have abande ned the Frenchmen. Cafar passed the river of Adda, and was not followed of the Swiffers wh remayned at Loda, protesting that if their payes came not within foure dayes, they would d part and leave his feruice. But Cafar making his aboade upon the territories of Bergama, gal them continuall hopes to be fatisfied, for that he expected a new fupply of money to be fent hi out of England: he threatned to draw backe his forces againe to Millan, which eftloones recom Ken 1 mar .

the doubts of the Frenchmen, who now more then euer stood incertaine of the fidelitie of willers, for that befides they had willingly foreshewed their comming, with protestation that would neuer lift up their weapons against their countrey men in the other campe, there was to them a commaundement from the Cantons to forfake the pay of the French men: in uch as there were two thousand of them that went away, leauing behind them great feare the others would follow their example, notwithflanding the Cantons had affured the king they had given fecrer commandement to their footmen to the contrarie. At last Cafar, after dleauied vpon the towne of Bergama an impost of fixteene thousand duckets, & was gone rds Crema vnder hope of an intelligence, returned oftsoones upon the territories of Bergaithout doing any thing, and determined to withdraw himselfe to Trent. He communicaith the Captaines of the armie his deliberation, assuring them that his principall intention to give order for money which he meant to leavie of men, with the which, and with the treaof England that was voon the way, he would make a short returne, desiring them to tempond expect with him so good preparation: and they having sacked Loda, and forced the castle out artillerie, retired to Guiaradadda for want of victuals, after they had also made pillage towne of S. Ange. After the departing of Cafar, there was some hope that the Smiffers, with nwas joyned the whole armie at Romano, would eftfoones passe the river of Adda, the raor that the Marquis of Brandebourg was come to the campe, and the Cardinall of Syon to ama with thirty thousand duckets which the king of England had sent : for seare whereof, tuke of Burbon whom almost all the Swiffers and the Venetian fouldiers had forfaken, was exponthe shoares on the other side the river to make resistance; but the thoughts of the eis were fodainly changed, for that the Smiffers, the mony not fuffiling to fatisfie their whole ispersed and returned into their countrey by the vallie of Voltolina. And for the same cause ment of three thousand sootmen, part Spanish and part Dutch, came and rendred theselues :campe of the Frenchmen and the Venetians, who being passed the river of Adda, had not Ito trauell the enemies with fundrie incursions, and to skirmish with them with diverse forand accidents: sometimes the Frenchmen had the worse, who in a hot skirmish made neare ma, lost about two hundred men at armes; & somtimes the adversity fellypon the contrary of whom in a like encounter fell into the fortune of a prisoner Cafar Fieromosquo: the refifthe armie drew neare to Bressia, having received in prest a ducket for everie man: but for pediments that the light horsemen gaue them, Marke Anth. Colonno entred into Verona the Launceknights and certaine bands of Spanish footmen, and all the others separated his was the end of the mouing and marching of Cafar., wherein the French king had no suspition of the Pope, for that having summoned him according to the bond of the e made betweene them, that he should send to the desence of the estate of Millan fine ed men at arms, or at least draw them neare the confines, and withall to wage three and Smiffers according to his offer made to Anthonie Maria Paluoisin , which the king ed him withall. The Pope made but cold answers touching the waging of Smiffers, and an occasion to excuse himselfe, that his men were in ill appointment, he promised to imbands of the Florentines, who with certaine of his fouldiers marched very flowly to-Bologna and Reggia. The king suspected more and more that he did communicate the comming of Cafar, both for that affooneas he knew he was entred into Italy, he d Legate with him Bernard Bibiena Cardinall of Saint Maria in Portico, who bare es a setled emulation to the French, and was accussomed to impugne the proceeof their affaires with the Pope: and also for that he suffered Marke Anthonie Colon-In his regiments to follow Cafars armie. But howfoeuer the king was icalous of the privity in this action, or by what humours he ranne in coniecture against him for his it to the emotion, it is most true that touching his proper interest, the Pope was not a ggrieued with the descending of Casar with so great forces, fearing that if he caried the ie, he would aduenture to oppresse all Italy, according to his ancient inclination: neuere, what for the impression of scare, and that such maner of proceeding was conformahis nature, he diffembled his thoughts, labouring to make himselfe as litle hatefull as he to either parties : that was the cause why he was bold to call home againe Marke Anth. and durst not send to the king the succours he had promised: That he had created a Legate Cafar, and on the other fide, Cafar being departed from Willan, the Legate under a fainer lour of ficknesse stayed at Rubiera, to see afore he passed further, what would be the issue of an enterprise and afterwards, to settle and quiet the kings mind, he thought good that his nege Laurence (continuing in the same demonstration to depend of the king that he shewed in he went to him at Millan) should give him money by the Florentines to pay three thou Swiffers for one moneth. But albeit the king accepted this money, yet (disclosing by token) he knew the Popes drifts)he faid, that fince he was alwayes against him in warre, and the all made with him ferued him to no vie in times of daunger; he would eftloones make a new of deratio, nwherein he would be bound but in peace and in feafons of furety.

Affoone as the armie of Cafar was dispersed and separate, the Venetians (without taryir recover Bressia the Frenchmen) approched Bressia by night, thinking to scale the wals: they had confide this enterprise by the small strength of men that was within, since there remained no more b hundred footmen Spanish, and soure hundred horsmen, but both their ladders being shorten was necessarie to that service, and the valour of the desendants beguiling their expectation, attempt drew with it no frecesse. Afterwards arrived the French armie under the charge det de Foix whom the king had newly created his Lieutenant in the place of M. Bourbon. of his owne motion had willingly refigned that gouernement into the kings hands. The mies affailed Breffia with artilleries in foure places, to take from the defendants all reafol possibilitie to makeresistance against so severall executions : and albeit the valour of the de dants contending against their fortune, made good resistance so long as they had hope that giment of feuen thoufand footmen of the countrey of Tyroll, being come by Cafare comm ! ment to Montagnana, Shold paffe further: yet, both that refcue being disappointed for their diments which the Venerians bellowed in the castle of Anfo and other passages, and also the fendants not willing to abide the affault which was to be ginen the next day (a great pane) wall being already beaten downe to the ground) the fouldiers conenanted to leave the and castle only with their goods faired, if they were not rescued within a day.

About these times the Pope preparing to take by armes from Frauncis Maria de la Ro the Duchie of Vrbyn, began to proceede against him with censures and Church-paines, call to be published an admonition, wherein was expressed, that being in the pay and wages: Church, he had refused those regiments of men for the which he had received pay & was se compounded with the enemies: That long time before he had killed the Cardinall of Pa. the which he was absoluted by grace and not by justice, and had executed many other mu That in the greatest heat of the warre betweene Pope Inlio, to whom he was nephew, subi Captaine, he had fent Baltafar de Chastillion to take the Kings pay : And that at the fame ! he had denied paffage to certaine bands that marched to joyne with the armie of the Chun in the jurifdiction which he poffessed as freeholder to the Sea Apostolike, he had pursu a fouldiers of the Church that fled from the battell of Rauenna. The Pope was determined moneths before to make warre vpon him, whereunto, befides all late and greene injuries, h pushed on by a discaine in that he resused to aide himselfe and his brother to returne to Flo and yet he was somewhat retained by a shame that he had to perfecute the nephew of he whose meane the Church was risen to such a greatnesse, but much more at the contemplat i his brother Iulian, who in the time of their exile having remained many yeares in the Co! Vrbin, both with Duke Guido, & after his death with the Duke raigning, could not endure for him depriued of the Duchy, wherin he had received entertainment, favor, & honour. But . was no fooner dead of a cofuming difease at Florence, & the great stirres of Cesar being var " and turned into smoke, then the Pope at the perswasion of his nephew Laurence and his ma Alfonsina thirsting after that estate, resolved to defer no longer the oppression which he had termined with no leffe injury then infamy: he was not ashamed to alleage for excuse of his i titude (which many imputed to him for reproch and flaunder) not onely the trespasses has received by him, and the penalties which the rigour of the lawes impose vpon a subject the fends in contumacie against his Lord, or a Captaine who contrarieto his bond denieth to the men for the which he is waged and entertained: but also he brought in this confideratio. h it was to him a matter very icalous and daungerous, to endure in the intrals of his estate, of who by how much more he had begun alreadic to offend him without all regard to faith and onour, by so much moreit was certaine that whensoeuer a greater occasion did offer, he would The Pope tea not be leffe ready or apt to do the like hereafter, confirming his first illes with other examples keithle Duelry of like nature. The discourse of that warre was this . Assoone as Laurence shewed himselfe vp- of Vrbin, and on the frontiers of the Duchie, and displayed his armie, compounded upon the fouldiers and givesh it to ubiects of the Church and the effate of Horence, the Citic of Vrbin with other townes of that Lande Mediutildiction made a voluntarie rendring to the Pope, the Duke that was then retired to Pelera, juing them election to faue themselues, fince he had no abilitie to defend them: and assoone s the armie drewneare, Pefera followed the example of Vrbin, the cowardife of the Duke conurring with his infelicities: for not with standing there was a garrison of three thousand sootmen, he towne mightie infortifications, and had the sea at deuotion, yet the Duke leaving withothe Castle Tranquillo Mandolfo in whom he much reposed, tooke his way to Mantua, whiher he had fent before his wife and fonnes: fonie supposed that his retiring thither came upon a aspected confidence he had in the fouldiers, of whom the greatest part was vnpayed: but ome are of opinion, that his impatience for the absence of his wife, was the cause of his going nither, under which pollicie he excused his seare with loue. It is attue saving that adversieshaue a swift course, and fortune to make her mutabilitie wonderfull, can heape in one day Ithe chaunces of a world: for except the Castles of Sinigalo, Pefera, S. Leo, and Masuolo, the hole Duchie of Vrbin and Pefera was reduced in foure dayes to the obedience of the Church: ut the Calle of Sinigalo made no delay to follow the course of the victorie, as also the strong iftle of Pefera after it had bene two dayes executed with artilleries, compounded to give vp within twenty dayes it were not rescued, so far forth as during this time of truce or expectaon of succours there were no casting of rampiers nor other fort of fortifications: which condion being ill performed, was the cause that Tranquello receiuing no rescue within the time apbinted, refused to deliuer it vp: and beginning a fresh to recontinue the warre, he made new sals and actions upon the enemie without, which made his destiny the harder, for that the battery eginning to play with greater furie, the fouldiers within the Callle preferring their owne fafety orethe will of Tranquillo, drew into mutinie against him, and deliuered him vp into the hands the Captaines, who condemned him to be hanged for his promife breaking. Not many dayes erwas rendred the caltle of Mainola, a place verie necessarie to besiege S. Leo, for that it is but a ile distance, and hath his situation directly opposite: and they bestowed about S. Leo two thound men, to the end to keepe it belieged: and albeit for the strong situation there was no hope to ricit but by the last necessitie, which is hunger : yet it was surprised within three moneths by inuention of a mailter Carpenter, who climbing by night by the benefite of a verie long ladto a cliffe or dependant supposed to be most inaccessible of all that mountaine, he tooke away sladder, and remaining there all the refidue of the night, he began at the first appearing of the y to climbe higher with certaine fastening instruments of yron, and got at last with great adnture to the top of the mountaine, and so descending againe, and with his yron instruments iking case certaine of the places that were of most difficultie, he returned the night followto the campe by the help of the same ladder that caried him vp: he declared to the Captaines at the mountaine was accessible, and that in the enterprise the daunger was greater in opion then in aduenturing, in so much as a night was appointed when he was fent thither with : fameladder that he first vsed: and as it was reasonable that he should be guide of the action, at was the first author of the invention, so there were committed to himan hundred and fiftie otmen of choise, with whom staying upon the said cliffe or dependant, they began at the opeig of the day (for it was impossible to climbe higher by night) to mount up those verie hard & aight places, effeeming nothing of the perili when they confidered what glorie was in the adnture: with this labour about thirtie of them ouercame the difficulty of the place, and got vp the top of the mountaine with a drumme and fixe Enfignes: and hiding themselves upon the bund to expect their companions that were climing, when the watch then breaking up, eedthem as they lay in ambush upon the earth, and gaue the alarme, when the fouldiers ing now disclosed, not tarying for their fellowes, gaue the signe to the armie in the campe, who cording to good direction tooke knowledge of the successe of the climers, & with great store adders offered a present assault to the mountaine in manie places: their chiefest reason in this affault was to draw away those that were within, who after they had somewhat serued the place they were appointed vnto, & descrying already vpon the plaine of the mountaine fixe Enfigne aduaunced, they ran to inclose the selines within the castle that was hewed out of the mountaine having now more feare of their lives then confidence in the invincible strength of the place: th refidue by this time being climed up to the top of the mountaine, they began to commaund th whole place, opening the way to others, that as yet with great paine and difficultie were labou ring to win the top of the hill. But the resolution of the climers being farre about the valour c the defendants, in whom also the sodainnesse of the fortune redoubled their seare, the mountain became a reward to the labours of those that had aduentured to climbe it, when the Castle als well prouided of all things to hold out, sauing of valour and fidelitie, yeelded the second day. In formuch that upon the conqueting of this estate, which together with Pefera and Sinigalo sepa rate members from the Duchy of Vrbin, was not worth in reueuue aboue xxv. thousand duc kets. The Pope pursuing the processe he had begun, published sentence, and deprived Franci comaria, and in the Confistorie inuested his nephew Laurence : wherein for a more able and su ficient confirmation of his doings, he annexed to the Bull which he dispatched for that action, the fubscribing of the proper hands of all the Cardinals, sauing of Dominike Grimani Bishop of Vi bin, and an ancient friend to the Duke, who would not be concurrant in so manifest a wrong, for that cause searing the Popes indignation, he departed afterwards from Rome, whither he me uer returned folong as heliued.

The French king was discontented with the oppression of the Duke of Vrbin, the ratherse that he suffered privation of his estate for being confederate with him: but he stood much mor displeased for many other things that the Pope did for Profeer Colonno abiding at Basseta a tow of the Palnoisins, at such time as he was returned from France, and afterwards being come i Modena for feare of the Frenchmen, whither likewise was retired ler. Morono, who also flor in doubt of the, for that contrary to their promises they had commanded him to go into Fraunc there was conspiracy whilest Prosper lay at Modena, and afterwards at Bolognia, to surprise ! cretly some place of importance in the Duchy of Millan, by the working of some of the banish men. In this practife was also concurrant Mucio Colonno, to who the Pope having privity in the actions, had graunted harbour for his bands of fouldiers upon the territories of Modena, More uer the Pope had perswaded the king Catholike (for so was the Archduke called since the dea of his grandfather by the mother fide) to make no new conventions with the French king. At on the behalfe of the Swiffers, Emitte Bishop of Verulo and the Popes Nuncio, to who afterwar euen in his latest yeares was trasferred the creation & dignity of Cardinal, stirred up the flue Ca rons to follow the amity of Cafar, belides many other offices displeasing to the king. So that curring also at the same time a practise between Casar (who remaining between Tres & Ifpru terrified the French men more with demonstrations then with effects) and the king of Englan and the Smiffers to make a new inuafion upon the Duchie of Millan, the French king ful peet that these matters were wrought with the will and privity of the Pope, whose cuill affection a appeared in other actions, making many exceptions & difficulties to confirme vuto kins the ter of the benefices of the realine of Fraunce, which he had promifed him at Bolognia. And yet (great is therespect and maiestie of a Pope) the king so laboured to appeare him with offersa offices, that albeit after the departure of Cafar he had determined to molest Mirandola, Ca py, and Correge, as townes imperiall, to the end to make some leavies of mony of them, yet he se bare from all action, in regard of the complainings of the Pope, who had received afore into protection the Lords of those townes. Moreouer, the Moores of Affrica commaunding the I inferiour with many veffels, he offered to fend him for the furety of those feas, his nauie of ship which Peter of Nauarre armed at Marfeilles by his consent, for the invasion of the streames a creeks of Barbary, with a strength of 6000 sootmen: but not with stading all these offers & obs uances, the Pope perseuered in his opinion, & as sometimes he would yse deniall, and sometim occupy excuses, yet he wold neuer so much as consent to that demand the king had made to h with great instance to call out of Swifferland the Bishop of Verulo, & much lesse wold be reme: Mucio Colonno fro the territories of Modena (where he fained he remained of his own authorit) vntil by the departure of Proft. fro Bolognia & all that praclife diffolued into finoke, there was more necessity of his abiding there; only the breaking vp fro thece was a matter of great aduent Mutio, for that entring afterwardes by night into the towne of Ferma with the forces of the Colonnois, and with certaine bands of footemen Spanish, as he was busie in facking the Citie, he eccined a blow, whereof he dyed within few dayes after.

In this estate of affaires, and the Senate of Venice making instance for the recourie of Verona, Monsieur Lawtrech with his armie of fixe thousand Launceknight's whom the Venetians agreed o pay for that enterprile, came to the river of Adice, to the end to passe to Villinguo, and so to ncampe afore Ferona together with the Venetian army: but what by the rumour of the comming fthe Swiffers now redoubled, and the Suspicion recontinued of the being of Prosper Colonno t Modena, where also remained the Cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, he retired to Pegquiero, ot without the complaints of the Venetians, making distribution of his bands both on this fide & evond the river of Nancia, And not withstanding the sayd suspitions were ceasifed, & that from rerona a regimet of two thousand footnien both Spanish & Launceknights, were gone to the pay fthe Venetians, & more did go dayly: yet he remained in that place more then a moneth, expeling(as was fayd)both a new prouision of money out of France, & a greater proportion of artilrie, munitions & money fro the Venetians. But the true cause of his temporising, was, to observe hat would be the issue of the treatie betweene his King & the king Catholike: for the Frech king nowing how much & how necessarily his amity didimport the king Catholike, both to remoue ne difficulties of his passage into Spaine, and to assure him of the obedience and iurisdiction of his ingdomes, he feemed not content with the matters that had bene agreed upon afore at Paris, ut deuised both to impose vpon him more harder conditions, and by his working to have peace ith Cafar, which he could not bring to palle without rendring Verona to the Venetians . And ouching the Spanish King, whose minoritie having not aboue fifteene yeares, was wholly gouered by Atonseur de Cheures, he refused notto apply his deliberations to the present time and sceffitie of things: by reason whereof, on the part of the French King were sent to Noyon the Biiop of Paris, the great Mailter of Fraunce, and the Prefident of the Parliament of Paris: and r the King Catholike were Monsieur de Cheures, & the great Chauncellour of Cafar. In which fpite or intermission, the rigour of armes & hostility (as is the custome of warfaring of our time) as continually imployed against the poore paysants and countrey men, Monsieur de Lawerech ing still to see what would come of the negociation: for, by the benefite of a bridge which he id builded at the village of Monzarban, he began to cut downe the corne of the country of Vema, & gaue liberty to his light horfmen to make incurfions in all places: he fent also one part of sarmie to incampe vpon the lands of the Mantuans, making hauocke of the comodities of that untrey, with so vniuerfall & generall domage, that to redeeme their harmes together with the tiring of to dangerous an enemie, the Marquis of Mantua was contented to contribute to him velue rhousand crownes: and the souldiers of Verona executing dayly hostilities upon the terriries of Uncensa and Padoa, put to sacke the wretched Citie of Vincensa. Afterwardes Monsieur Lawrech bearing compassion to the great complaints of the Venetians, passed the river of duce by a bridge which he caused to be set up at Volunguo: and afterwardes having made a great ay of the countrey (for it was neuer thought that the armie would passe on that side) he drew are to Verona to befiege it, winning Chiu/a in the meane while by the ayde of the countrey en , to make more hard the passage of succours that were to come out of Germanie. Neuereleffe the same day that he approched to Verona, the regiments of Launceknights being now ree moneths fince they had bene entertained with the money of the Venetians, either of their oluntarie will and motion, or by the fecret subornation of Casar, protested openly, that they ould not serue at the siege of a towne possessed by Cafar, and wherein the French King had principall interest. By which mutinie, drawing with it a suspicion of greater conspiracies, Mansieur de Lamtrech repassed Adice, and incamped a myle from the wals of Verona, to whom e Venetian army went, to loyne with him, not supposing it sufficient for their suretie to remaine the other fide the river, though their armie contained a strength of five hundred men at armes, ue hundred light horsemen, and foure rhousand footemen.

About this time the deputies of those two Kings passed capitulations in this fort in the rowne Capitulations Noyon: That there should be a perpetual peace betweene the French King and the King of betweene the raine, with the like confederation for the defence of their chates against all the world: That the French king catholike, ench King should give in mariage to the king Catholike his daughter being then but one yeare

of age, and he to indue her for dowrie with the rights which he pretended to appertaine to him the kingdome of Naples, according to the partition made afore time betweene their predecesso. but under this couenaunt, that untill the bare an ageable to be maried, the King Catholike shot pay to the French King an hundred thousand crownes yearely to helpe to defray his expend That if the dyed before the mariage, and the King should have another daughter, then he to b flow her likewise vpon the King Catholike with the same conditions: and in case he had no other daughter, then to give him to wife Madame Renee, who had bene promifed to him in the call tulation made at Paris: That in case any of those wives dyed in mariage without children, th that part of the kingdome of Naples to reuert to the Crowne of Fraunce: That the King Cash. like within a certaine time should restore the realme of Nanarre to his auncient king, & in not poforming it, it should be lawfull to the French king to ayde him to recouer it: but vnder this char; (as the Spaniards affirmed afterwardes) that the King of that state should first communicate w him his rights: That Cafar might enter into the peace within the terme of two moneths, and if did enter into it, it should be lawfull to the French King to ayde the Venetians to recour Vero which Citie, if Cafar deliuered up into the hands of the King Catholike with power to gue frankly and absolutely to the French king within fixe weekes, to dispose of it as he thought goo that he should pay him an hundred thousand crownes, and the Venetians as much, whereoft one part to be payd vpon the confignation, and the other within fixe moneths, and alfo to 1 maine acquited of three hundred thouland crownes which he had received of the King Lon whilest they were in confederation together: That in that case there should be truce for xv monethes betweene Cafar and the Venetians: That to Cafar should remaine Rina de Tren and Rouera, with all that he possessed then in the countrey of Frind: and that the Venetians show cotinue to hold the places which at that time they held of Cafar untill the Frech & Spanifi kin had determined the differences that had bene entertained betweene them for their confines at limites: for refoluing whereof, both the one and the other of the parties named the Pope. Not wit standing the accord made at Noyon, the Venetians ceassed not to stirre up Monsieur de Lawtre to befrege Verona, defiring to recouer it by armes, both for that they were vincertaine wheel Cafar would accept the peace, and also to cut off the proportion of money which they were pay.But touching the French King, the way of concord and peace was more agreeable to h then the meane of armes and force, his defire to have vnitie with Cafar drawing him about all therrespectes: and yet Monsieur de Lawtrech refused not to consent to their will, having ne no more reason of excuse, both for that the Venetians had made great leavies of souldiers, and si filled all other provisions demaunded by him, & alfo for that the Launceknights refused no me to go thither together with the others: so that the armies passed scuerally ouer the river of Adi the one by the bridge that was builded about the Citie, the other by the benefite of anoth bridge fet up for the time beneath the Citie. One part of the artillerie of the French armie that 1 incamped at Tomba, was planted before the gate Santa Luce, and the other with the Launc knights was bestowed at the gate S. Massina. They made choice of those places for their artill ries, to the end to do execution all together on that part where the wall betweene the Citic at Citadell meeteth conjoyned with the wall of the towne, by which denife having meane at o time to make entrie into the Citie and the Citadell, the defendants within should be constri ned to devide themselves into two parts for the regard of the wall in the middest . The Ven tian armie passed beneath Verona in the field of Alars, and remained incamped at S. Michael betweene the river and Cannell, both to leavie and remove the defences of that place, and also beate the gate called the Bishops gate, which was a place of most weaknesse and least armed. The two first dayes the defences which were of great strength and beat flanking, were beaten down by the artilleries, but with greater difficulties on the quarter of the Venetians, to whom it was! finall labour to batter the defences of the three baltillions. But affoone as they were battred, bo parts began to execute the wall with xviij. peeces of great artilleries, and fifteene smaller peec of batterie, either army having throwen downe the third day twentie fadomes of the wall, no forbearing to batter still to make the breach and entry the larger: and yet the Venetians on who fide the wall was most weake, notwithstanding they had almost renersed all the bastillions as rampiers, had not yet wholly remoued all the defences within that played in flanke, because the lay so low and almost within the ditch, that either the bullet went over them, or else was graze

the earth afore it came there. Moreover at the same time they undermined the wall, which ough they had underfet and stayed with props, yet it beguiled the deuise of the doers, and fell own before the time appointed by the Captames. There was within Verona a firength of eight ndred horsmen, fine thousand Launceknights, & xv. hundred Spaniards under the government Marke Anth. Colonno, who had now exchanged the wages of the Pope for the pay of Calar. us garrifon omitted nothing that might tend to the flrengthning and repairing of the rampiers, d Handing carefull to do all other things for the valiaunt defending of the place, they expressed juerfally a wonderfull resolution and courage of minde, and particularly was performed an nourable example and office of Marke Anthonie Colonno, who receiving a fleight hurt in his bulder by a shot, forbare not for all that to offer his body both day & night to all paines & danits. By this time the artilleries planted by the Frenchmen in foure places against the towers tweene the gate of the Citadell and the gate of Santa Luce, had made fo great and many tines, that every breach was able to receive fouldiers in order. The artilleries of the Venetians Idaduaunced fo much, and almost done no lesse execution, and yet Monsieur de Lawtrech derunded new artilleries to make the breach the greater, embracing readily all occasions that offed to deferre the action contrarie to the will of the Venetians, who cried to give the assault. He t de helping to his delayes this accident; there came to the armie by the plaines of \emph{Verona} , $ext{eight}$ Indredbarrels of powder, together with many other natures of munitions drawne by Cartes, I what by the traitenesse and importunitie of the place, and emulation of the divers flriging to e er one afore another , the chafing and violent mouing of the wheeles bred to a fire , whose h tembraced the powder, and so consumed the Cartes with the cattell that drew them . Moreer there was this increase of difficultie to those that were besieged, that in the Citie so mamoneths afflicted by the enemies that kept it alwayes straitly engironed, the store of victuals anto diminish, and no hope to be resupplied, but in very small quantitie, and that by steakh, vig the pathes of the mountaines for the commoditie of that poore reliefe.

But as the affaires of Verona Hood in these termes, there came to the rescue of that Citie a regient of nine thousand Launceknights sent by Cesar, who arriving at Chinsa, tooke it by consition, and made themselues Lordes of the Castell of Cornaro, which is a peece standing upon next hill to Adice drawing towardes Trenta, and commaunded many times by both the parin the warre betweene Casar and the Venetians: Monsieur de Lawtrech either fearing in e de, or dissembling to be amazed at the new supply of Launceknights, leavied his campe agulthe mindes of the Venetians, and retired his atmie to Villefranch, carying with him one part o ne Venetian regiments, and the other part under John Paule Manfron withdrew to Boseto bey dtheriuer of Adice by a bridge prepared for their passage: in so much as the Venetians having ny no further confidence to carie Verona, fent all their great artilleries to Bressia: and the I inceknights without any impediment incamped at Tomba, where the French armie was lodg afore, one part of them entring into the Citic, and the other part remaining without, which te med after Verona was reuichvalled. There remained for the gard of Verona a strength of seor eight thousand Launceknights, for that the most part of the Spanish bands that could hold greement with them, were passed to the Venetian campe under Colonell Maldonato . And in tumon judgement, that refeue or fuccours was of smal moment, for that they brought not with th nother store of money then xx. thousand Florins of the Rhem, which the king of England had , and during the time of their tarying there, they consumed so much victuals, that it was al-

r tequall to that quantitie which they had brought with them.

iy reason of those bands that were retired to Villest innche, from whence they committed mait hauocke and spoile vpon the parts of Verona and Mantua, the Venetians were compelled, the Frenchmen, who no commaundement that was made to them on the kings behalfe could not oftay, should depart to their garrisons, to take order that the Citie of Bressia should wholy which them of necessary victuals; an expence rising to aboue a thousand crownes a day.

At last things began to incline manifestly to peace, for that it was known that Cafar (notwashanding his former solicitation to his sonne in law not to compound with the French King) prening the couetous nesses money afore the hate he bare naturally to the French, & also afore wancient ambition to make himselfe Lord of Italie, had not onely accepted and ratisfied the escapated for the consensation of the forme of those conventions from this

fucceeded another matter to the benefite of the French King, that all the Cantons of Swiffers feeing armes and hostilitie deposed betweene Cafar and the King, were contented to compound with him as the Grifins had done before, in which adion Galeas Viscount did what he could, who being banished and a rebell protested by the King, wonne of him by this meane libertie to returne into his countrey, restitution to all his goods, and recompence of many grace & honours. The composition was, that the king should pay to the Swiffers within three moneth an hundred and fiftie thousand duckats, and from thence forward an indument of perpetua yearely penfions: That the Swiffers should be bound to deliuer to his pay by publike decree so often as he should demaund, a certaine number of footemen, wherein not withstanding the pro ceeding was diverfe, for that the eight Cantons were bound to furnish that proportion, when to euer he should enter into any enterprise to offend the estates of another, and to the flue Cantor the couenant bare no other obligation then for the defence of his proper estates: That it shoul be in the power of the Swiffers to render to the French King the Castels of Lugan and Lugarn which be passages of great strength, and of no lesse importance for the suretie of the Duchiec Millan: and in case they would make restitution, the King to pay to them three hundred thou fand duckats. But they rafed them to the ground immediatly vpon the making of the copolition This was the discourse of things in Italie in the yeare a thousand fine hundred & fixteene: Buti the beginning of the yeare following, the Bilhop of Trente, who was come to Verona, made o fer to Monsieur de Lawtrech to deliuer vp that Citie to the French King within fixe moneths as cording to the contents of the capitulation, feeing he held it in the name of the King of Spain But there remained this difficultie whether the terme should begin from the day of the ratific tion of Cafar, or from the time it was acknowledged that Verona was holden by the King C tholike: and vpon this albeit there passed a disputation for certaine dayes: yet for that the garrise offootmen that were within Verona drew to mutinics vpon the demand of money, the Bishop Trente was constrained to follow those affaires with a greater hast: and therefore taking the b ginning from the day that he had received comission from Cafar, he agreed to deliver vp Ver na the fifteenth dayof January: at which day he passed the assignment to Monsieur de Lawtree who received it in the name of the Frech king, the fayd Bishop receiving of the Venetians the fil fiftie thousand duckats, together with the fifteene thousand, which by the capitulation they we bound to pay to the garrison in Verona, and also assured fidelitie & promise of Monsieur de La trech to see drawne to Trente the artilleries that were within Verona. Monsieur de Lawtrech the same instant redeliuered the Citie ouer in his kings name to the Senate of Venice: Andr Gritty standing then as Deputie & assigney to that state. Great was the gladnesse of the nobili and whole communaltie of Venice, for that after fo long and daungerous a warre, drawing w it so many calamities and expences, they had reclaimed to the generall body of their dominio. principall a member, effecting the reward of the warre farre about the burden and charges the fame, although by the report of fuch as have written of their doings, they confumed, during the warresthey made fince the league of Cambray, fine millions of duckats, whereof they lean fine hundred thousand of the sale of offices: lastly the inhabitants of Verona reioyced no lesse th

the refidue, together with all other Cities and jurifulctions subject to their common weale, hoping now to be deliuered and dispensed withall from so many afflictions, which so long a warre had throwen upon them, sometimes by the one armie and sometimes by the other.

THE ARGUMENT.

he Duke of Vrbin makes an enterprise to recouer his estate out of the hands of Pope Leo. The French king makes a league with the Pope. The conforacie of Cardinall Petrucci against the Pope is discourred. Charles king of Spaine is chosen Emperour. Martin Luther writeth against the Pope. The Pope puts John Paule Baillon to death.

> Orafinuch as all armes & holfilities were now furceased between Cesar and the Venetians, & in the French king all occasions restrained to make warre against Cafar or the king Catholike, it seemed that to the regions of Italy, afflicted with fo manie calamities and trauels of warre, was now appointed a time of rest and tranquilirie: wherin these were the reasons that the Swiffers (a mightie instrument to any that sought to innouate & trouble things) feemed now reclaimed to their ancient amitie with the French king, and yet bare no minds estraunged from other Princes: that in the accord made at Noyon, was declared fuch a hope, that to establish reater alliance betweene the two kings, there was working to draw them to an enteruiew at mbray, whither were gone to that end Monsieur de Cheures, the great Maister of Fraunce, IR obertet. Lastly, there was expressed no lesse readinesse on the part of Casar, who, besides rendring of Verona, sent two Embassadors to the French king, to solemnize and confirme the ice: for hat it was a judgement accompanied with his just cause and reasons, that by the beneof peace and concord betweene so mighty Princes, would be dissoluted the seeds of all quar-1& disagreemets in Italy: But as there is no certaintie in the counsels of mortall men, so is there ,, le expectation of their worldly euents : for, men and their doings standing subject to the law nature and destinie, haue no other liberty then to deeme and debate, and to God alone is re- " ed all power of disposition and execution, since he is able to gouerne & commaund all things » the same power wherewith he hath created them of nothing. Insomuch as in this action of ,, 1/y, either for the infelicity or destinie of the countrey, or for that the yniversall iurisdiction was ided into fo many feuerall principalities and states , it was almost impossible that it should sufanie dispensation of miseries, by reason of the diversitie of willes and interests of such as had it 1and: for scarcely were laidafide armes and hostilitie betweene Casar and the Venetians, year Citie of Verona not yet refigned, when were disclosed tokens & beginnings of new tumults: dofthefe was the breeder and conspirator Franciscomaria, who had practised and drawne to Beginnings of faction, such bands of Spanish footmen as had served both within Verona and afore Verona: new troubles. perswaded them to follow him to the reconquering of his estates, out of the which the Pope dexpulsed him the same sommer: a matter wherein he sound small difficulties, for that to soulrsforreiners and mercenarie, accustomed in the time of warres to sacke townes and to make ly and spoile of countreyes, there was nothing more contrary then peace, wherunto they saw the affaires and inclinations of Italy disposed at that instant.

There drew to him about flue thousand Spanish footmen, whereof was chiefe one Maldoo, a man of the same nation, & of long experience in manie warres: and to this regiment was ined a strength of eight hundred light horsmen, led by Federske Bossolo, Gasozo a Spaniard, vechar a Burgonian, Andrew Bue and Constantine Boccalo Albanois, all Captaines of name & tirke,& especiallie esteemed for their knowledge in wars. Amongst the he that bare the greatest outation, whether it were for the noblenesse of his house, or for the honorable degrees in warre Bbb 2 which he had borne from his youth, was Federike Gonfaguo Lord of Boffolo, who haply was o of the greatest parties to perswade this enterprise, being no lesse moued by an ambition to ma greater his merits and praises by new warres, concurring also the amity which he had with Fre. ciscomaria, the through an ancient & settled hatred which he bate to Laurence de Medicis, chier for that at such time as was transferred to Laurence the charge of all the armies of the Chur, and the Florentines, by reason of the ficknesse of Intian his Vncle, he had denied to make hi Captaine generall of the footmen, an effate which Iulian had affigned to him afore. This are standing only upon bodies and numbers, was lame in all other proportions & prouisions: for, the had neither refort of money, affiftance of artilleries, nor any firength of munitions, & exceptible horses and armour, they wanted all furnitures accustomed to follow armies: only they bared. mation more by their vertue then through anie other abilitie or means to suffaine the war. The departed to go to the state of Vrbin the same day that the citie of Verona was given vp to the !. netians: a matter which troubled not a litle the Pope after he had received advertisement; for: confidered the qualitie of the armie, which was to be feared, both for the hatred of the Ca. taines, and vertue and reputation of the Spanish footmen; and he was not ignorant with wh inclination the peoples of that Duchy favoured Franciscomaria, having long lived under the. fie government of the house of Montfeltro, the affection wherof they had transferred to him. to one that had bene trained and nourished in that Duchie, & bred of a fister of the Duke Gmi; befides, it grieued him not a litle that he was to maintaine warre against an army, which have nothing to loofe, could leave no reward to his victorie, & marching only vpon defire of pray : pillage, drew with the a miserable expectation of profit, bringing nothing to the war, but w they hoped to get by the chaunce & fortune of the war: he doubted also, least the sweet define gaine (which for the most part carieth mercenarie souldiers to the fight) wold draw such others ioyne to their factio, as by the mean of the peace were viterly excluded fi o action: but the mar that most troubled his mind, was a fearfull suspition that the French king did communicate int conspiracie: for, both he knew that the king was displeased with the warre made against Fr. cifcomaria, and was no lesse touched in his conscience with the cossideration of causes that hell giuen him to be ill contented of him: he knew also he had not observed the confederation me after the conquest of Millan, at the time when Casar descended into Lombardy: he conside that after he was returned to Rome, he fent him a Bull touching the collation of benefices in realnie of Fraunce and Millan, much different from the convention made at Bolognia, which the shortnesse of the time was not then subsigned: this Bull the king would not accept both that it bare contradiction against the agreement, and also for the interest of his proper dignity remembred the fecret negotiations entertained against him with other Princes, & with the Sn fersihe was not ignorant that a little before pushed on by a defire directly to hinder the recount of Verona, he had suffered the regiments of Spanish footmen comming from Naples to the rese of it, to passe in several troupes through the dominions of the Church, excusing himselfet: he would not give them occasion to passe in one lovet strength, being in that case not able stop then: lattly, he found in his conscience that he had not perfourmed his promises touch the donation of the tenths, but under conditions futtle and intangled, nor had observed the redring of the townes to the Duke of Ferrara, abusing the kings expectation, and his owne filitie. These were right iust causes to make him doubt of the kings will, whereof also his suspition made him feeme to fee certaine tokens, for that this conspiracie and leauie of men being breat the partes of Verona, it could not be that Monficur de Lamtrech could be without knowled: of it many dayes before, and feeing he was fecret and filent in it, it was a manifest prefumption his privitie and confent. To this also was added a lealousie of Federske Bossolo, having till the followed the pay of the king, and it was doubtfull whether that was true that M. de Lawer alleaged for his excuse, that the time of his entertainment was finished. Moreouer, the Pope sled doubtfull of the inclination of the Venetians, having an opinion that their Commissioners 11 made the selies to this vnion for that the Senate stood yerie much discontented with h alwell in regard of things past, as for lealoste of his present greatnesse, which was such, that beg successor of so great a power & reputatio of a Popedome, he disposed absolutely at his denote the whole estate of the Florentins. These confiderations brought no small amaze to the Popo who also was no lesse reason of expectatio or hope in the condece or alliance with other Prints that, befides that they were of new reconciled and confedered with the French king, not one them held for acceptable his maner of proceeding with secret counsels and suttleties, wherein weithe diffembled fomtimes to incline on their fide, yet what between the detections that burst tagainst him, and the flow execution of his intentions and promifes, he gaue litle or no satisfaon to anie of them: yea disclosing oftentimes a manifest doubt against them all, he had dispated a litle before to the king Catholike, Frier Nicholas an Almaine, and Secretarie to the Carall Medicis, to draw him from the enterview and parley which was solicited with the French g, fearing a contract of greater alliance betweene them to his prejudice. Thus the Pope wad indifferently betweene doubt and dread, betweene feare and fulpition, expecting all things happen to him which his timerous conscience did suggest or fashion, the same being a passion t oftentimes torments the minds of ill men, against whom Salomon pronounceth this vexan: That whatsoeuer their guiltie mindes do feare in ill, the same shall assuredly happen vnto m. Neuertheleffe amid these confusions and suspensions of mind, he and his Nephew Lauce ceased not to send bands of souldiers into Romagna, such as for the most part were lead of new, and the refidue drawne out of the squadrons of the Florentines pensioners: his reawas insending out of this force, that ioyning with Range de Cere and Vitelli, who lay at Rama with the regiments of men at armes, they might give impediment to the passage of the enies: but this expedition was in vaine and the effect thereof, for that the armie of the enemy, ing already passed the river of of Pawat Ostia, and preventing with their celeritie the preations of their aduersaries, were by that time entred upon the lands of the Duke of Ferrara, ing the way to Cento and Burio, and marching through the countrey of Bolognia. In this rny they facked Granarola, which is abotough vpon the territories of Fanentia, & fro thence y drew neare to Faenza, to proue if they could conspire any mutation there, by the helpe of a ig Gentleman of the family of Manfroy, who was in that armie: but the inhabitants of Faenza mowing all mutinies, the armie passed further, not trying to get any other of the townes of magnia, for that they were all strong in garrison, either of men at armes, or of footmen: & for better surety of Rimini, Ranse and Vitelli were gone thither by sea. Laurence came to Cea to affemble his companies there and at Rimini: but for that the enemies were already paffed, ceased not in the meane while to leauie souldiers in many places, whereof there flocked to him h more then he needed, and more then he required: for a regiment of two thousand fine hund Launceknights that were dismissed by M. de Lawtrech to returne into their houses, and wise certaine Colonels of three thousand Guscons, were tetained by John Poppy Secretory to urence: wherinhe vsed his owne authority, being perswaded that that army of sootmen wold ow Franciscomaria if they were not waged by others, or haply he beleeved lightly that with seforces there might be opened an easie way to the victorie. In this action he imployed also authority of Monsieur Lawtrech (with whom he had remained manie moneths) to perswade Captaines, whom with their feuerall bands and regiments he converted immediatly towards lognia: but his diligence brought forthan effect contrarie to his expectation and the merite of trauell, fince the Pope and Laurence were discontented with that maner of doing, suspecting kings indignation, and yet they could not refuse them, for feare least they would joyne to the mie, being marched sofarre with minds and promises to be imployed. In the meane while anciscomaria aduaunced more and more, accompanying his fortune with that diligence and eritie, which leades men of action to the successe and selicity of the enterprises they follow: he s no sooner entred into the Duchy of Vrbin, then he was received in everie place with great and gladnesse: he found no souldiers in the townes, for that Laurence having no leasure to reoish so many places, had onely care to desend the City of Vrbin, the sanctuarie and capitall re of that Duchie: and for that cause was sent thither by the counsell of Vitelli, a strength of thousand footmen from Citta de Castello, and in place of Vitells that refused to go to that ice, that charge was committed to lacques Roffetto of Citta de Castello, who notwithstanghe was adulfed, by reason the people of Vrbin were holden suspected, to chase out of the whe all such bodies as were vnable to beare armes, yet he forbare to execute any such violence, Probintelure iking he should better assure himselfe by elemency then by cruelty. But Franciscomaria not nesh to the owerting his time to the feruice of any other place, drew directly to Vrbin, where albeit he bedience of the ld do litle at the first approch, yet at the second lacques Rossetto agreed to deliuer the towne nasural Dules

into his hands, his infidelity being greater then his feare, both for that there were no mutinies no vproresamongst the people, and also he had no reason to be timerous of the forces of the ent mies, hauing neither artilleries nor other prouisions serving to the taking of townes. The son diers according to the composition went out of the towne, their goods and lives saved, but il Bishop of Vitelli remained prisoner, who had bene Regent of that estate for the new Duke, ar under whose government it seemed that nothing had happily succeeded. All the other town and places of the Duchie followed the example of Vrbin, except S. Lesn, which for the qualit of his fituation, and propertie of the munitions that were there, was easie to be defended, yea wi a verie smal garrison: the citie of Agobbio that in the beginning was declared for Franciscomari and effoones returned to the obedience of Laurence, did now as the rest did, being caried not respect to faith and alleageance, but by the cuent and observation of things: onely Pefera, Su. galo, Gradaro and Mondano, townes separate from the Duchie, remained in the intildictional denotion of Laurence. Franciscomaria having thus recovered Vrbin, entred into devile to ma: himselfe Lord of some place your the sea shoare: and making shewes as though he would go Pefera, whither were gone alreadie manie bands of fouldiers, and to Sinigalo, he diffembled : Fano befreged, intention and drew towards Fano, a citie which in all times had caried more facility to be ken, and whereof the aductfarie doubted least, for that it had bene neuer as yet subjected to iurisdiction: Ranse de Cere that lay at Pesera, either doubting of the daunger, which in reason! warre he forefaw, or feeing into his intention, which he could not hide, dispatched thicher Tree Sauello with an hundred men at armes, & fixe hundred footmen: neuerthelesse the enemie me his approches with fine peeces of artillerie not great, which they had found in Vrbin, and hand alfo want of powder, they could not make fo great execution as they would, only they broug downe to the earth twentie fadomes of wall, which notwithstanding was not done with great difficulty, yet they followed it with an affault, at which they loft more then an hundil and fiftie men: but neither being amazed with that flaughter (for their mindes were refolu) nor flanding to expect and temporize (though they were weake in munitions.) they recor nued the charge the day following, when with their valour they so farre vanquished the rill, that they made the breach almost abandoned, yea they had no doubt, entred the wall, ha: not bene for Fabian de Galleso Lieutenant to Troylo, who being left vpon the wall with a vi small companie of men of warre, made a wonderfull defence, and sustained the charge. I day after they were prepared to give the third affault, but understanding by espial that a stren of fine hundred men fent from Pefera, were entred by night by sea, they leavied the siege, retired to the borough and Castle of the mount Baroco, which standing upon a high hill, bear a verie strong situation, his descending being easie towards Fossambrun, and most hard and sha towards Pefera: they remained in that place, where having no further convenient occasi they garded the Duchie of Frbin, which lay vpon their backs. On the other fide, those regime of Launceknights and Gascons that were come to Rimin to Laurence de Medicia, prepa them to march, together with many bands of Italian footmen, and another regiment of fiftee hundred Launceknights, of those that had bene at the service of Verona: with which stren ! ioyned to the horsmen of the Popedome and Florence, Laurence marched with his men at arr to Pefera: and being wholly gouerned by the counfell of his Captaines, for the small experie: he had to manage an enterprite, he fent his footmen to encampe ypon the mountaines oppo Description of to the enemies. The citie of Pefera Handethat the entrie of a litle valley which comes from shecity of Pe- bin, out of which issuet which the inhabitants call Porro, for that by the oportur: of his deepnesse the vessels are brought vp even to that place : this river tunnes neare to Citie on that fide which is towards Rimini: the Cattle hath his standing towards the sea, and tweene the river and the Citic be many storehouses, which Range caused to be reversed for furety of the towne: a great part of the Citie is enuironed with mountaines on all parts, whi firetch not out fo farre as the fea, but betweene them and the fearemaineth a certaine peecif the plaine containing two miles in largenesse on that side towards Fano, and vpon the banke: two hilles the one right oner against the other; that towards the sea is called Candelaro, and A. galaro that which liath his prospect towards Vrbin: and in the top of euerie of them is a le rough and a Castle bearing the same name. The Italian footmen were lodged at the Castles Candelaro, and to the Launceknights and Gascons was appointed Nugalaro, which lay nearely the enemy: which disposing of the army in this sort, was not of intetio to fight with the otherwa tin by light skirmishes to cut them off from ouerrunning the countrey, or to amuse them for refuing to any enterprise: for the Popes counsell was not to hazard the battell with the enemies. effethere were almost an affured hope of the victory, for that he saw what perill it was to fight ainst resolute men, who by how much greater was the inequality of the reward of the victory, To much leffe would they feare the hazard of their lines: and the battell fwaying on their te, he faw the effate of the Church & the Florentins would be abandoned into manifelt dangers hat it were far more assured to temporise, specially the apparance being great, that for want of ony & victuals, the enemy would draw to some disorder; the pouerty & Herility of the countrey pelling the thereunto: That his army with respite wold become better & better, aswell through berience which much helpeth to the perfection of foldiers, as also that from moneth to moneth was refurnished with braue & resolute bodies: Lastly he had expectation that his affaires would cyly take better course, fince that fro the beginning of this stir & actio, he had vehemently solicirithe fuccors of al Princes, both coplaying to their Embaffadors that lay at Rome, & by speciall reffengers & letters imploring the Princes themselves: wherein he wrought not with all in one uner, for, fignifying to Cafar & the king of Spaine, that the conspiracy of Franciscomaria & the anish footmen, was contriued in the campe of the French king, & with the privity of his Lieuteint: he objected fo far in those particular clauses of his letters, that it might be easily comprehendhow far he suspected the king in the action: and to the French king himselfe he alleaged ely ajealousie of Monsseur de Lamtreth, and forbare to execute his complaints any further. The rtterwas diuerfly taken by those Princes, for to Cafar and his nephew it was no small gladnesse theare that the Pope interpreted that injurie to the French king : besides, the auncient hatred of far ioyned to his naturall inconstancy, had made him already estranged from the French king, I newly become confederate with the king of England: He also had communed with his ne-:w neare Antwerpe, & diffwaded him from having conference with the French king, which acdingly was at last accomplished by the consent of both the one and the other king: and in the g Catholike the confederation that he had with him, did not fuffice to deface his emulation, i lousie, and suspition: so that they made a ready offer to the Pope to ayde him, giving present mandement to all their subjects to depart from the war that was made against the Pope. The gCatholike fent the Count Potenso to the Realine of Naples, to the end that vpon the view Imulter of his men at armes, he should leade to his succours foure hundred launces: and for a prefull tellimony of his will, he deposed Franciscomaria as disobedient, from the Duchy of Soan estate lying vpon the confines of Terra Lauoro, and had bene purchased by his father: but other respects, were agreable to the perplexities of the Pope to the French king, as a Prince that la mind estranged from him: & therefore following his example from the beginning, he deterred to entertaine him with vaine hopes, & answering that his discontentments brought no litle se to him, he promised so to worke, that Monsieur de Lawtrech should minister to his affaires: lyet he forbare not to say, that the Pope himselse had bene the causer of his proper afflictions, that the Spanards would neuer haue taken that boldnesse, if their numbers had not bene inased by such as under his licence were passed from Naples to Verona. This was the kings intennat the beginning: but confidering afterwards that the Pope being left abandoned of him & of fuccours, would run with a ready will into the amities of the king Catholike, he determined to le and fauour him & according to the estate of the time, to draw some fruit of his necessity. In nuch as the Pope fending efficienes to demaund succours of him, he tooke order to refurnish 1 from Millan with three hundred launces requiring withall to have a new league to paffe beenethem, fince that that was contracted afore at Bolognia, was of no more confideration, ing suffered many violations by the Pope in sundrie manners: he added many complaints the offers which he made him: foructimes he fayd he fuffered wrong in matters wherein the pe charged him to other Princes : and sometimes he held himselse injuried, for that he had exnunicated George Sopressan foliciting for him with the Smiffers an actio wherein the despite of iniury was so much the greater, by how much in the doing of it he expressed a desire to gratify Cardinal of Sion, Moreouer the Lady Regent mother to the king, & of no final authority with n, reprehended without respect, the impiety of the Pope, for that not satisfied to have chased a nccout of his proper estates and dominions, he had also subjected him to the censures of the urch, and with a mind full of inhumanity, had denied to the old Duchesse, the property of her

the eares and hearing of the Pope, brought matter to redouble the suspition. Neuerthelesset Pope, who in those difficulties desired the kings succors, not so much for the effect and meaning as for the name and reputation of them, being not able to diffemble his suspition, made stay for m ny dayes of the three hundred launces that went from Millan vpon the territories of Modena ar Bologma: and afterwards Lawrence bestowed them within Rimini, as having lesse meane to anne him by lying there, for that that city bare a farre distance from the enemies. The Pope couldn be drawne from his icalousies and suspitions, notwithstanding at the same time was set downe Rome, a conclusion of confederation betweene him and the French king: and albeit before it wi ratified, the king objected many new difficulties for the which the matter remained many daics Confederation fulpence, yet at last the Pope yeelding to many things, the king past the ratification. By the artici of ratification, the Pope and the king were reciprocally bound to the defence of their estates wi an equall proportion of men and fouldiers, and a charge of twelve thousand duckats for eur moneth: The same bond was betweene the French king and the Florentines, with white was conjoyned the authority of Lawrence de Medicis, and in that article was comprehe. ded the Duchie of Vrbin, but with a leffer number of men, and pay of fixe thousand ducks monthly: The king was bound to ayde the Pope when focuer he had any action you the fubic: and vasfals of the Church: The Pope confirmed to the king the nomination of the benefic, and the tenth, according to his promifes made at Bolognia, under this condition, that the n. nies should be put into the hands of a third man to be employed against the Turker. This was colour of graunting the tenth, but there was fecretly hope given to the king, that after the colction of the whole quantity, the condition should be changed by another writ, and his maiesty. have liberty to convert them to what vie he would. The Pope passed a severall promise to king vnder his fignature, neuerto demand of him any ayde or fuccours against the Duke of F. rara, and conferred withall, that the king might take him into his protection. There was ke dispute vpon the rendring of Regeia, Modena, and Rubiero, which albeit the king demanded w no small instance, according to the Popes promises at Bolognia, and the Pope altogether not, fused it, yet he reserved the restitution till an other time, alleaging that it would be an action far worthy of him, and almost a confession of his extreame necessity and compulsion, to redeliuerth at a time whenhe stood oppressed with the warre. The king stood still upon it to have them dred presently, insomuch that the Pope making manifest shewes that he would vtterly estra: himselfe from the king if he sought to constraine him any further, the king having for declared nemies the English, and no lesse suspition of Cafar, the Spamards and the Smiffers, accepted: Popes promise under his hand, that within seuen moneths next following, he would put into hands of the Duke of Ferrara, Modena, Reggia, and Rubiero. The Pope had this intention, t if the dangers wherein he was, ceased afore, he would make no more accompt of his act vnders fignature then of his promise simply made at Bolognia. And touching the king, since he col winne no further of him without the hazard of his extreame indignation, held himfelfe come ted, effeeming it fomewhat fufficient, that he had appearing in writing the affurance and teffit ny of his word and faith.

During the discourse and action of these matters, Lawrence had much increased his army, b. by many regiments of Italians leavied of new, and also by a thousand footemen Spanish at a thousand Launceknights waged by the Pope at Rome: with which strength soyned to the or tunity and ripenesse of the time, he saw he stood in good estate to assay to deliuer himselfe of a warre, wherein his onely hope was by the strength and situation of the place where the ener s lay, to compell them to discampe for want of victuals: for which cause was dispatched Can. I rin with feven hundred light horimen, to ouerrun all that countrey which is called the Vicar. from whence came the greatest traffike of their victuals. At this time was sent to Pefera from a campe of the enemy, a Trumpet who required of Lawrence Safe conduct for Captaine Sna 1 Spaniard appointed by Franciscomaria to come to him: his demand was easily accepted by L. rence, for that he thought it had bene a Captaine with whom he had entertained very fecreltelligence: but there came to him another Captaine of the same name, and with him one Oracile Ferma Secretary to Franciscomaria, who after they were brought into publike audience, deck d

according to the instruction of Franciscomaria) that since the quarrels that were between them night be decided by fingular combat of their own persons, or with a determinate number of me adifferently agreed upon by them both, it were better to chuse the one of those two meanes, then perseuer in that course whereby might be brought to destruction so many numbers of people n both sides, no lesse contrary to all piety, then even to the prejudice of whosoever should carie Franciscana ne victory. In which good respects, Franciscomaria offered him to make election of whether of masends to derefe two wayes he would: and after he had delivered this message by mouth, he would have read for Lawrence writing that he had in his hand, fauing that he was forbidden. Lawrence answered by the coun- de Medicu. Il of his Captaines, rhat he willingly accepted this offer, so farre forth as Franciscomaria, would rilleaue those peeces which he occupied by force. After which answer (by the incensing of Rande Cere) he caused them both to be apprehended prisoners, Ranse maintaining that they had derued punishment for performing an action too intolent. But the other Captaines shewing him ow far he transgressed the law of armes and the reputation of his faith and word, he let go Suaro, d retained only Oratio, excusing, with falle colours, the infamy of his faith breaking, as though it dbene necessary in the safe conduct to have expressed specially Oratio, who, for his birth and untrey, was a subject of the Church, and for his place, a secretary to the enemy: but his restraint as chiefly to draw from him the fecrets of Franciscomaria, but specially by whose counsell and thority he had begun the warre. Whereupon being examined with torments, it was published it in his confession was matter to augment the suspition conceived against the French king. To : delire of Lawrence, to cut offfrom the Spaniards the traffike of victuals out of the countrey the Vicarage, was neede to be applied greater forces, both for that by the incursions of his light rsemen, was done no matter of importance, and withall, his army was in that estate of ength & furniture, that he might boldly make head against the enemies: for, beside a thousand in at armes and a thousand light horsemen, he had leuied fifteene thousand footmen of diverte ions, amongst whom was a regiment of two thousand Spaniards mustered at Rome: an aroffootemen of speciall choyce and sort, and of great exercise and training in armes, for that the tre being in no other place in Italy, the Captaines had good meane to exchange for better, all h bands of Italian footemen as were leaused in halt: and so compounded their whole army on the glory and flower of the fouldiers of all Italy. He determined at last to go incampe at Sorlongo, a borough in the countrey of Fano five miles from Fossambrono, from whence it was le to him to restraine from the enemy all reliefe comming out of the Vicarage. The City of Jambrono stands upon the river of Mettro, which is a river of name, by reason of a victory ich the Romaines had against Afdruball of Carthage, and running thither by a channell re- Situation of ined betweene the mountaines, it passeth Fossambrono, and beginnes to run thorough a little Fossambrono, ie more large, which makes it felfe to much the larger by how much it approacheth the fea e is fifteene miles beyond Fossambrono, and there it falleth into Mettro neare to Fano, but on t fide towards Smigalo. On the right hand following the course of the river, is the counwhich they call the Vicarage, full offertill hils and boroughes, and lieth stretched out in at length towards the fea : and on the left hand of the river are also hils, but passing further, re are found mountaines very high and sharpe, the plaine or vally whereof extending toeds Fano, containeth more then three miles in largenesse. At such times Lawrence determito incampe at Sorbolongo, fearing least his enemies, knowing of his remouing, would preuent iche sent on the morow afore day Iohn de Medicus, Iohn Baptista Stabbio, and Brunaust de Fily, with foure hundred horsemen, to surprise Sorbolongo, and gaue order to the footemen were at Candelaro and Nugularo, to ctoffe the mountaines and draw towards Mettro, to cre with the others: himselfe with the residue of the army, leaving for the gard of Pefera, Gundo ogon, with anhundred and fifty men atarmes, tooke his way at Sunne rifing, from Peferatods Fano along the sea shoare, and afterwards turning towards Fossambrono where the vally inneth, he arrived about noone at a place called our Ladies mill built ypon the river. All the Gemen and the regiments of Italian footemen, passed the river by foord, but the bands of Gaswand Launceknights, were so long in passing the bridge prepared to that ende, that the by was not able that day to fetch Sorbolongo according to the direction: and therefore they hight it convenient to incampe at Saint Georges, Orciano, and Mondano boroughes beadiltance one from another halfe a mile. The direction that was layd out for the light horsemen, succeeded not with much better fortune: for, as they marched, John de Medicis sin whomi this first triall, of service, appeared those signes of valour that appertained to one of his discending feeming by errour to take the longer way, left the refidue that contemned his counfell, and entre within Sorbolongo long time before night: & the other two Captaines, after they had fetched long compaffe, returned at last to the army, being abused (as they faid) by their guide: neither coul John de Medices (who had with him only his regiment) abide that night within Sorbolongo, for that the same morning Franciscomaria had with great celerity taken the field with all his army doubting belike of the discamping of his enemies, and no lesse imagining which way they wou draw : he found no impediment to passe the river, but vsing the favor of a stone bridge at Fossor. brono, he won Sorbolongo afore night, and bringing with him matter of feare and aftonishment John, being then of sufficient ability to refish him, he compelled John to retire towards Orcian whither he was followed in chase by the horsemen of the enemie, who made pray of many of people, & caried them backe in the state & fortune of prisoners. At Orciano he went to find Lan rence in his lodging, to whom he complained with a mind much discontented, that either the ne ligence, or the cowardise of Brunauli & lohn Baptista Stabbia, standing then in his presence, h that day taken out of his hand, the victory of the warre: he esteemed the iniury so much the gre ter, by how much the vertue & celerity of his owne people were leffe forward to advance his gl ry, then fortune her felfe, who for the most part y feth to hold backe the merit of mens valor in fu actions. But albeit this was the first, yet it was not the only occasion of good lucke that the arr of Lawrence did lofe, seeing afterwards he did not only omit the honor of enterprises of great in portance, but also he was folowed cótinually with far more dangerous disorders, his il fortune l ing alwayes accompanied with ill counsels. The boroughs of Orciano & Sorbolongo have their tuatió in a place eminent & high,& arc distant one from the other, som what more the two mil the mid way betweene them is full of litle mountaines & hils, & hath a borough in it called Bar wherein were incamped part of the bands of Franciscomaria, & for that neighbourhood & nea neffe of the armies, althe day following was spent in skirmishing. Amongst the Captaines of La rence army, the counsels and opinions were diuerse: for some, and chiefly they who barele fwaigh in the refolution of things, perfwaded to give a charge on the enemies, thinking perhaps aduancing vainely valiant counsels, they should get the name of valiant men, not weighling their glorious moodes, how farre the daunger exceeded the attempt. But this counsell was i pugned by Ranse and Vitelli, vpon whose adustes Lawrence with great confidence, founded his directions, for, fayd they, the enemies being lodged in a place of strength and aduantage, having on their backethe favour of the borough, there was no possibility to execute that terprise, but by a way troublesome and too full of annoyance: yea they thought it not go that the army should continue in those places, being a matter no lesse vnprofitable, then him ring the purpose for the which they were removed from Pefera, for that Sorbolongo bein: the deuotion of Franciscomaria, it would be hard to restraine the resort of victuals from countrey of the Vicarage. The reasons made rejected all other counsels, obtaying what i the authoritie of the same, and by the necessitie of things, that the army should returne: to the end their retiring should not seeme a manifest flying, their direction was, that the art should not only returne to their first lodging place, but also to go sease upon Monte Baroccio other places left abandoned by the enemies, from whence they might draw towards Vrbin. W1 this resolution the army departed the morning following at the appearing of the day: but the ner of their going away held more of a flying then of a rettaite, which growing to an opir 1 thoroughout the camp, it hapned that Franciscomaria was aduentifed by two men at armes, t the enemies were filled full offeare, and were broken vp almost in disorder and flying: in so no as feeming to be almost possessed of the certain evictory, he advanced his army, and mare a with great speede, by the way that leades athwart the mountaines : he hoped to encount them at their discending into the playne, beleeuing that they would take the way that was the short and passible, which if they had taken, neither the one nor the other army could have as !ded the battell. But as oftentimes in warres, effects and events of greatest consequences both hindred and changed by light causes and accidents: so fortune would, that by the occ: " of a Cannon left behind the day before, for that one of his mounting wheeles was bro ", the armie of Lawrence went to repasse the river of Metro at our Ladies mill, which is see refermentand footenen of Lawrence army passed ouer at the footd, and as both for their numbers dother impediments they made a long passage, so assoone as they were ouer, they cast them-

ues with great celeritie into order, keeping along the plaine that draweth towardes Fossamono. The armie of footemen being passed, and the men at armes and light horsemen marching the later ward of the campe being upon their passing, the light horsemen of the enemies, both any in number, and of the most resolute, began to skirmish with them; in which encounter was cen prisoner Constantin the son of John Paul Baillon, whom we might aswell call his nephew as fonne, fince he begat him of one of his owne fifters: not many dayes before the fame John Paul as come to the armie, and led the vantgard, but by the ill chaunce of his sonne, striuing to do his It to recouer him, he Itayd fo long deuifing, that from the auaunt gard he became in the areareard, and Lawrence that led the battell steppedinto the foreward, as also Troylus Sauello that uerned the arearegard was fet to guide the battell, for that Ranse and Vitelli marched before th the footemen. But Franciscomaria and his Captaines, discerning well that the enemics, by fame measure and numbers wherewith they passed the river, turned towardes Fossambrono, with they remoned not like men that fled, but with intention to surprise Montebaroccio: for nich confideration, they forgate their former furie and disposition to fight, which haply was ounded upon an imagined feare of the enemies, and leaving abandoned their baggage, they ran great half, and with no leffe disorder, year casting their ensignes wrapped vpon their shoulders, get a very throng passage of the river called the passage of Tauernelle. At this passage it seemed it nature had made a cofused trench ful of cliffes which runneth all along through a plaine place invntill the mountaine, which gaue no libertie of passage, but by one way which was made for e and sufferance. To this passage if their bands had come, who turned from that side alwayes they passed ouer, the Spaniards had bene reduced into manifest daunger. And albeit Lawrence this Captaines were aduertised of this by Lodowike the sonne of Oliver de Fermo, who the ne day was come to the army with a thousand footmen, together with a Spanish Sergeant that ald well discouer the countrey, yet their espiall was of little profite, fortune and destinie being onger then counsell: for not withstanding in the regiments of Launceknights and Gascons was prefied a wonderfull readinesse and disposition to fight, and the same desired with an univercry throughout the whole campe, and withall, the will of Lawrence being fully concurrant; that resolute denotion of the campe was not executed by the aduise of Range de Cere and Vsi, who counselled him not to go meete his enemies, but to draw his armie to a litle hill fast by, m whence in great safety he might do many grieuances to his enemies with his light horsemen, ney attempted to passe the river: and so leaving that place of strength, Ranse turned towardes : mountaine, which assoone as the Spaniards had brought to their deuotion, they began to sae with the bullet those bands of Launceknights that lay nearest them, and signified with crys and other tokens full of reioycing, how out of a daunger manifest and desperate, their valour dmade them a way into absolute safetie. Thus either by indiscretion or by cowardise (if we wy not allow destinie to partake in it) did Lawrence loose that day (in the judgement of all men) Lawrence loos occasion of the victoric. The difference of counsels amongst his Captaines were very prejudi- siet the occasion It to the glory and successe of this expedition, for they stood there to consult and debate, where of the victorie. casion called them on to execute the thing which their fortune had offered them, and then were ly least settled in resolution, when they saw most necessitie of action. That night the armie was Iged in a borough neare that place called Saltaro: but fuch was the diligence of Franciscomaria, temarching with his campe till well of the night, he gate Montebaroccio, preuenting a regimet two thousand footemen which Lawrence fent thither to surprise it. The day after he went and ampedaboue Saltaro towardes the mountaine, taking a place for the bestowing of his armie, at had his prospect upon Montebaroccio, but standing somewhat lower and had his situation on the sea shore. These were the places wherein the two armies incamped, bearing no more dince then a myle one from another, onely there fell to Lawrence greater discommodities by the ten want of victuals, for that the traffike lying by fea from Peferato Fano, they were driven of the alteration of the winds, to vie the service of cariages ouer lad, to the which the light horfen of Franciscomarsa gaue no small impediments by their continual roades and incursions over whole courrey, having espiall by the paysants of every litle moving of the enemies. About this time Franciscomaria sent a trumpet to communicate with the Gascons certaine packets ofler ters found amongst the writings of the Secretaries of Lawrence, and taken from him with other o his trash by the horsemen of the enemie, the same day that he departed from the borough of Sal taro. By these letters was discerned, that the Pope being wearie of the great payes of the Gascons and yet flood to make immoderate augmentation of them enery moneth, wished that traue might be made to induce them to teturne into Fraunce. By which occasion there had bene gree perill of a tumult the selfe same day, if Carbono their Captaine and Lawrence de Medicis had no by good perswasions reclaimed them, making them believe that the exhibition of those letters was but a suborned and fallible stratageme of the enemic. Neuerthelesse, what by the suspitions that danger, the necessitie of victuals, & the difficulties of the place, bearing more manifest figne to loofe, then any hope at all to winne, they determined to breake vp from thence, and to entiinto the countrey of the Vicarage on that fide that is nearest thesea, and so to march on, till the approched Fossambrono. And albeit it was not without shame to retire so often from the ene mies, yet the resolution to depart was allowed through the whole campe, but not without their famie of Range and Vitelli, against whom exclaimed all the regiments of souldiers, charging him that if in the beginning they had put execution to that deuife, they had brought vpon the enemit no small wants & difficulties of victuals, Lawrence himselfereprehended them no leffe then the thers, who accompanying his complaints with reprochfull suspitions, imposed upon them, that either to make the warre long for their particular profite, or to hinder his reputation and glory h armes, fearing haply to their persons the like effectes by his greatnesse, which the estate and amb tion of Valentinois had wrought against their houses, they had brought so many difficulties an fo many daungers upon an armie fo mightie and appointed, and fo fatte about the enemies, force, in fortune, and in discipline. But the armie marched and incamped before S. Constance, borough appertaining to the countrey of the Vicarage, the wals whereof they began with n leffe speede then violence to batter and execute with their artilleries. And albeit the inhabitant fued for parley, and offered to fubmit and render it, yet knowing the facilitie to force it, there we given to the Gaseons onely a full libertie to affault it, retiring from the wals all the other fortes. fouldiers: fuch was the defire to reappease the angry minds of the Gascons by the spoyle & fact of that place, whereof the whole profite and riches was transferred to them. From thence il campe marched two myles further, and went the same day to Mandolfe the best and stronge borough of all the Vicarage, and having his situation upon a hill, and in a high place thereof, is al inuironed with wals and trenches connenient, to the which the fituation of the place ferueth as rampier, having withall two hundred fouldiers in garrifon. That night they planted the artilleri on that fide towardes the South, but either by negligence or by indifcretion of Ranfe de Cere, whom was appointed the managing of that charge, they were planted in a place discoursed ar not defended by rampiers: by which fault, before the funne had dispersed his brightnesse or houre vpou the earth, there were flaine by the artilleries from within, eight Cannoniers with m ny pyoners, and Antho, Santeroffe the Captaine of their artillerie wounded: by reason of which accident, Lawrence rifing into some perturbation of minde, went in person to cause the artilleri to be rampieted and defended, notwithstanding all his Captaines aduised him to forbeare in h owne person the execution of a danger which he might well recomend to the charge of anothe After he had fet in hand that labour & well refurnished the worke with all things necessary, about the middle of the day, he retired behind the place to repose himselfe under the shade of certain trees, thinking the height of the hill to be a sufficiet couer to him against all dangers. But as he k bored in climbing,& the height of the hill diminishing by his labour, he discouered a sidelong, d rocke fituate on that fide towardes the West, which he had no sooner disclosed, then he had in eye (fuch is the fwiftnesse of destinie) a fire given to a harquebuze layd with full leavell again him: and as he threw himselfe flat on his face to deceive the blow, the swiftnesse of the bullet w farre greater then his speede in falling, in so much as before he could fall to the earth, the bull that otherwise hadrunne through his body, tooke the top of his head, and rasing upon the bon paffed along the braine-pan towards the necke. This wounding of the Generall brought no fine griefe to the Captaines and univerfall multitude of the atmie, in whom was kindled a greater d fire of revenge, by how much leffe worthy were the people by whom they had received the de pite, and that even in the person of the greatest amongst them . And therefore redoubling the esolution by the remembraunce of the iniurie, and finding that not with standing the battering hey had made of the wall, the earth was yet too high behind, they began to cast a mine, wherewith entring under a towre that leaned to the wall which they had battred, they put fire to it the ift day. The powder and other matter yield in the mine being embrased of the fire, threw out ucha violence and strength, that it brought the tower downe to the earth, together with a quarer of the wall ioyning to it : which furious execution of the fire, was followed of the campe with an affault, but with litle order, and (as it were) at aduenture, the fame yeelding no oher fruite then fuch as is wont to grow vpon enterprises ill disposed and directed. Neuertheeffe (fortune in some actions doth more then either power or pollicie) the night drawing on, ne souldiers that had no expectation of succours, for that Franciscomaria had not slivred from Montebaroccio, either not to loose the aduaunge of the fituation of the place, or for other ocasson, yeelded up the place under condition of goods and life saued, leaving in vile maner the eople of the towne as a wretched pray to the enemies. But by reason of the hutt of Lawrence, hich brought his life in daunger, the Pope sent as Legate to the armie, the Cardinall S. Maa in Portico, who, ill fortune being already joyned to ill gouernement, began with very ill fignes rexercise his Legation: for, the day after he came to the armie, there hapned a quarrell by naunce betweene an Italian and a Launceknight, when such as were nearest running to the ay, & euery one calling upon the name of his nation, the tumult so increased through the whole mpe, that expecting neither any informatio of the cause, nor seeking the due redresse & remedie the same, all the bands of footemen ranne in great mutinie to the lodgings of their fellowes and unpanions, to atme theinsclues: the violence of their disorder caried them so farre, that whoeuer they encountred in the way of another language or nation, payed with their liues the price their furie. And as fuch generall calamities draw with them many diversities of disorders, so in is vniuerfall confusion, whilest the bandes of Italian sootemen were gone in good order tourdes the place where the tumult began, their lodgings and houses were sacked by the Gascons: nation, no regiment, no companie was free from this outrage, and in whom was greatest reto cure the euill, in him was most possibilitie of perill and daunger: the innocent found least rie in abitaining most from violence: there was no dispensation of harmes where was no ref-Itto person, and lesse expectation of safetie where the sword bare most sway, and that guided hands fierie and bloudy. The principall Captaines after they had bin in counfell to remedie the order, ranne to the fray, to fee if by their presence they might do the thing which they were table to do by counsell: but finding the danger of the tumult to be greater then their authorileuery one cast fro him the thoughts and care of the common businesse, and began to looke to tir particular fafetie: they ranne to their lodgings and houses, and putting in order their men at nes, they retired for their safetie a myle from the campe, drawing with them their particular npaniesto desend them from the furie of the popular souldiers: onely the Legate Bibieno, v-3 the constancie and readinesse that appertained to his office and honour, would never abanthe common cause, but putting himself oftentimes with the danger of his life, amid the prease heir bloudy fwords and weapons, he did so much with the diligence and labour of other Capres of the footebands, that the tumult was at last reappeared, during the furie whereof were ne in many parts of the campe, more then an hundred Launceknights, xx. Italians, & some Spards. This accider was the cause that they determined for the present o enter into no enterprise, for a time to keepe the armie separate: for, it was feared, that if the armie should keepe toget, the fouldiers not yet reconciled for the harmes received, would recontinue the mutinic for ry light occasion, knowing that by so much greater is the despite of an iniury, & the desire of enge more violent, by how much are remaining in presence and memorie the first authors and rs. Therefore the companies of men at armes of the Church, and of the Florentins were bewed in the Citie of Pefera, together with the regiments of Italian footemen: for, touching the nch Launces, they had not stirred fro Rumini, by reason the difficulties that were betweene the be and their King were not yet resolued. The sootebands of the Gascons were incamped upon plaine within halfe a myle of that Citie, and the other companies of footemen were dispersed in the mount Imperialo aboue Pefera & on that fide towards Rimini: and fuch was the feuedistribution of them, that Spaniards were placed upon the top of the mountaine, the Launcethis somwhat lower according to the desceding of the mountaine, & the Corsikans at the soote

of the hill: vpon this mountaine called Imperialo standeth a pallace, which the auncestours of the familie of Malatesta had builded. They continued in this order three and twentie dayes, executing no other thing in that respite and intermission of time, then certaine skirmishes of the light horsemen: for, Franciscomaria stirred not, what with desire to hold that he had gotten, and the he faw no hope to breake fo great an army in the plaine field, or to take any place fo neare the ene mies. Neuerthelesse at last which was the foure and twentieth day, departing by night fro Monte. baroccio, he came by the peepe of the morning to the top of the mountaine, where the Spaniard. lay incamped, with whom either generally or feuerally it was beleeved he had some secret intel ligence, according to the relation and testimony of the successe that followed: for, associated was come thither, his Spaniards began to cry vpon the others of their nation, that if they would make care of their owne safetie, they should follow them; a voyce which most part of them di accept, euery one putting upon his head a bough of greene leaves, according to the example of th others: onely their Captaines retired to Pefera, and drew with them about eight hundred foote men. When the Spaniards were thus joyned into one Brength, they went all together to the tem of the Launceknights, who kept no great gard on that fide for the furctic of the neighbourhoo of the Spaniards, and taking the aduauntage of their lecuritie, they fell to execution and flaughte in which medley they killed & hurt more then fixe hundred of them, the refidue fled to the camp of Corfikaies, and with them retired in one Brength, towardes Pefera. The Galcons might we difcerne the bickering, and putting themselves in order, they kept their ground not once mouit from the place where they flood. Franciscomaria, after this flaughter of the Launceknights, ar the most part of the Spanish footebands allured to his side, went to incampe betweene Vrbin ar Pefera, not without great hope to have to come joyne with him those Gafeos & Launceknight who, leavied at that time in the campe of Monsieur de Lawtrech, had alwayes marched togethe and were for the most part lodged together, and neuer did any action separate or apart. The was amongst the Gascons a Captaine called Ambro, who bare enuie to the vertue and glorie Captaine Carbono, This Ambro was young & well disposed, of noble place and discending, kir man to Monsieur de Lawtrech, and with the fouldiers bare a greater credite and authoritie the did Carbono: he had secretly practifed many dayes to passe with his regiment of sootemen to t part of Franciscomaria, wherein he tooke this occasion, that not satisfied with the immoder augmentation of their payes, they redemanded infolently greater conditions: which when the were denied by the Popes ministers, there interposed betweene them Carbono & their Captain of the French horsemen, who for the same cause were come from Rimini to Pesera, to redu them to accord: but five or fixe dayes after the discomfiture of the Spaniards and Germaines the Imperiall hill, Franciscomaria, with his whole armie disclosed himselfe neare vnto them: whom one part together with Ambro being fallen into array of battell with fixe pecces of on naunce called Sagors, the Germaines followed and joyned themselues also vnto him: Carbone vaine endeuoring to stay them with prayers and most vehement perswassos: with Carbono abo feuen Captaines with 1300. footennen, all the rest together with the Germaines for sookehi And as in warlike matters alwayes one mischiefe breeds another: so the Italian footenien, pero ting what neede there was of them the next morning flirred vp a tumult. And to reappeale when neither greater shamefallnesse nor lesser greedinesse was in the Captaines then in the so diers, it was necessary in their payes to promise them more immoderate conditions. And truly was a matter to be maruelled at, that in the armie of Franciscomaria, in the which no pay was stributed to the fouldiers, was so great agreement, discipline, and concord, which no doubt pt ceeded not (as is fayd of the Carthagman Hanniball to his high commendation) fo much of vertue or authoritic of the Gouernour, as of the exceeding affection and constancie of the so diers. But of the contrary, in the armie of the Church, where in times due were not wanting ceffine payes, was seene an universall confusion, diforder, and defire of the souldiers to passe tot enemies campe. The same prouing that oftentimes, concord and discipline in armies are not eafily conferred by money as by other causes. The Legate and others who were present att Councell being made aftonished with so many accidents, after they had long time debated what meanes & remedies they might relieue the afflicted effate of things: neither were they not discreete or aboundant in counsels, to forsee that those disorders fell not, then apt to apply c remedies to the mischieses hapned. Anotheresore being moued also with their owne couets

lefires and interest particular, they concluded to perswade the Pope to restore Bolognia to the Bentsuolians before they being imboldened by the late declination of things, or pushed on by the acitation of others, they should make some commotion; a matter which how vnable they were o refift, was well expressed in the difficulties they had to fustaine the warres in one onely place: nd therefore to give the greater authority to this counfell, and for the more justification of all attes in all events, they fent the same to the Pope by Robert Buschet, a Gentleman of Moena fet downe in writing, subscribed with the hands of all the Captaines, and of the Legate, and he Archbishop of Vrsin, of whom the one was linked to the Bentinolians in auncient amitie, ne other loyned to them in parentage : which admife the Pope did not onely despise, but also omplayned in most bitter tearmes, that his owne ministers, and such as had bene enriched by im with many benefites, with dayly expectation to receive more, had fet before him with fo ttle faith and loue, a counsell or election no lesse pernitious then the very euils which the enenies did: but chiefly he cried out against the Archbishop of Orsin, whom haply he judged to e the chiefe author and inducer of the others to this counsell: vnder the occasion of which difleafure, it was believed that he depriued him of the purple hat or Cardinals dignitie, which as promifed in the beginning with an univerfall confent to be transferred to him in the first romotion that hapned. But Franciscomaria feeing his strength so increased and his enemies rces abated, and making his advantage also vpon the necessitie, traysed his thoughts to greater tempts: for both the footemen which came with him, had bene three whole moneths withut pay, and he had no likelyhood of meane or ability to wage those that lately revolted to im : and also the Duchie being fore pilled and harried, and almost veterly spoyled, the souldiers ad not onely no meane of praie and bootie, but also with great difficultie could they find out fficient victuals to sustaine them. But in choosing this new expedition, he was to follow oer mens willes, fo that for the better establishing of his estate before he would attempt any her matter, he fought to affault afresh Fano or some other peece on the sea coast. Neuerthe-He by the inclination of the fouldiers, greedie of pray and bootie, he determined to turne into uscane, where because the region was plentifull of all things, without suspect, and unready for fence, he hoped to rayle fome great spoyle. Furthermore he was caried with a hope to make me mutation in Perusia and Sienna, by the meane of Charles Baglion and Borquese of Peucci, by which deuise his owne things had bene sufficiently augmented, together with the olestations and perils of the Pope and his nephew: therefore the next day, after he had affemed the Gascons, he removed his campe towards Perusia: but when he was come to the ayne of Agobina, he determined to make manifest his suspition, year rather the certaine apprension which he had of the treason of the Colonell Maldonato and others joyned with him in efame cause. The matter was bred and brought foorth in this fort: When the army mared by Romagnia, Suares one of the Captaines of the Spaniards, under diffimulation of fickneffe agged behind, and of purpose suffered himselfe to be taken of his enemies, and being in the state a priloner he was conveied to Cefena to Lawrence, to whom he declared in the name of Malnato, and the two other Captaines of the Spaniards, that not for any other cause they were convned with Franciscomaria, then to have occasion to do some notable service to the Pope and him, seeing it was not in their power to let the accident of this commotion, promising in all eir names, that they would not omit the execution affoone as the oportunity was offered: hich deuice whereas it was vtterly kept vnknowne from Franciscomaria, yet he quickly tooke foition by certaine words vnaduifedly spoken of Ranse de Cere to a drumme of the Spaniards: of hom taking occasion to lest with him, he demanded when those Spaniards would give up their uke prisoner: which voyce making deepe impression in the hart of Franciscomaria, gaue him use diligently to observe whether there were any infidelity or treason in the army, which at the ngth by letters intercepted with the cariages of Lawrence, he did not onely differne, but perceied that Maldonato was the author of some dangerous stratageme; a matter which (having difpuled yntill then)he thought not good any longer to conceale it; and therefore calling together the Spanish footemen, fetting himselfe in the middelt of them, he began to give them great ankes, with words of most vehement infinuation, for those things which for his sakethey had idertaken with fo great inclination of mind, confessing openly that neither in the memory these latter times, nor in histories of auncient writers, had beneany Prince or Captaine owing fo great obligations to men of warre, as he acknowledged to owe to them: for that neither uing money, nor any meane to reward their great metites and feruices, and himselse a Princel of small effate though he should recour all his patrin onics, not being of their nation and la guage, nor having ferued with them in the field, yet they had with fo ready a dispessition follows him against so mightie a Prince and of so great authority, and that not for hope or greedingle spoyle, since they knew they were ledinto a barreine and poore region: which valeur and got feruices, as he had no meane to recompence to them but with good wil and gratification of min fo yet this was his comfort, that not only amongst the regions of Italy, but also through all the pro uinces of Europe they had purchased perpetuall same and reputation under him: they being be very few in number, without money, without artillery, without any warlike furniture, had loo ten constrained to turne their backes, an armie most rich in treasure and all other provisions, win whom were joyned fo manie warlike people, against the forces of the Pope and the power of the Florentines, with whom the name and authority of the kings of France and Spaine was concu rant; and that in regard to support and preserve the faith and honour of men of service, they he neglected the folemne commandement of their proper Princes. Of which things like as he did tal exceeding pleasure, because of the name and glorie of them, so on the other fide; all matters which might obscure so glorious a renowme, would bring vpon him a burden of intollerable griefes that as he endured with manifelt dolor the opening of matters which should draw to hu them or anie of that company, to every particular of whom he had vowed whilest he dre breath for euer to be dedicated in all affection, in all service, in all fidelitie, and all effice wha soeuer: so neuerthelesse, least this cuill begunne should be increased with his silence, at least the malice of some should blemish so great glorie gotten by this asmie: and being al convenient that he should hold a more deare accompt of the fame and honour of them all, the particularly respect the amity of a sew: he could not conceale longer from them, that there we I foure in that armie who went about to betray the glory and the sasety of them all. Touchin his owne private case, neither would he make mention, nor inferre complaints, fince havin bene trauelled in fo many accidents, and passed the rage of soutune for innocencie, he was no reduced to this temperance and state of minde, that it was all one with him the defire of dea or life: But for their parts, neither the obligations and offices which he ought to them, n the fettled affection which with so great merite he bare to them, would suffer him to keep longer from them the information and knowledge of their present daunger, which was th Colonell Maldonato, in whom for his place ought to have bene a greater care of the fafetical glorie of themall, and Captaine Suares the first contriner of this fraud, by yeelding under counterfeit sicknesse tobe taken of his enemies in Remagnia, together with two other Ca taines, had conspired and promised under wicked counsels, to betray the lines of them all Lawrence de Medicis: And as the effect of these counsels was disappointed by his vigilancie, se which cause he would no sooner repeale so great a treason: sonow not thinking to behold at longer either the person of himselfe, or the lines of others under so great a daunger, he hath ope ned vnto them, the thing which long before was knowne to himselfe : And the better to indutheir minds, he fayd that the discourse of this treason was set downe in credible forme in certain letters autentike found amongst the writings of Lawrence and intercepted by him, besides man apparant fignes and conjectures : all which he thought good to lay aforethem, to the end the might be the judges of fuch a hainous conspiracy, and so hearing aswell the crime detected, ast iutifications of the offenders, they might proceede to iuflice according to that counfell which should stand best with equitie and order, and establish a due safety to the whole army. Who he had made an end of speaking, he commanded to be read and interpreted the enidences of the ctime objected against them; which being heard with very great attention, Maldenato, Sware and the other two Captaines not being suffered to aunswere, were condemned by the comme judgement of the army, as of a matter most manifestly proved, and for thwith being committed passe the pikes, they were executed after the maner of fouldiers. Thus the army being purged they fayd) by this punishment of all treason, they followed on their journey towards Perusail to the which was already entired lo. Paule Baillen, being departed from Pejera affcone as heh knowledge of their intention: & there arming his frends with many companies of peafants leui in the countrey and confines there, he prepared himselfe to defend it : to whom the Legate h

t for fuccour, Camillo Vrsin his sonne in law, leader of the Florentins together with the men at nes of his conduct, and two hundred and fiftie light horsemen: with the which forces it was night he might sultaine the inuasion of his enemies, the rather for that many deuises were made hinder their proceedings : for Vitelli with his regiment of men at armes , and Sife with the nch launces, who flood now no more suspected, for that betweenethe Pope and the French ig was established a confederation, were marched to Citta de Castello, and Lawrence de edicis, who being newly recured of his wound, & also lately come from Ancona to Pefera, was nein post to Florence to prepare therethings necessary to the conservation of that governent & the cities adioyning: there he tooke order that the Legate with the rest of the army, puld march towards the Dukedome of Vrbin, to the end to counsell Franciscomaria to abann the expedition of Tuscane, for the gard whereof was left no other regiments of souldiers, na defence of the inhabitants. Franciscomaria not without the hope of fome intelligence or ispiracy, did remoue his army to Perugia, where lohn Paule riding about the city to take view, was affailed in the middelt of the streete by a peafant or foldier of the countrey, and fayling at t time to strike him to the death, he was suddenly set vpon & slaine by the concourse of those t accompanied lohn Paule: who taking the oportunity of this tumult, caused certaine others om he suspected to be murdred, and so being deliuered from snares of conspiracy, he seemed to be acquited from all perill, for that the enemies who had now many dayes lien about Pena, had no meane to take it by force: and yet lohn Paule at a time when the Pope least exned fuch a matter, alleaging in his iustification, that the people of Perugia (whose furie he had power to refift) would no longer endure the spoyling of their countrey, couenanted with the by to pay tenthousand duckats, to graunt victuals for source dayes, not to take armes against ancifcomaria in that warre, and they to issue presently out of the territories of Perugia: a matvery gricuous and of no little discontentment to the Pope, for that it confirmed the opinion nceived of him from the beginning of this warre, in going so slowly to the army with the sucshe promised, and holding for suspected the power of Lawrence, he wished that Franciscomashould conferue the Dukedome of Vrbin. This also aggravated the gricfe and discontentment Baillon, that whilest he was in the campe with Lawrence, Range and Vitelli bare greater authothen he: the memory of which things was haply the chiefelt cause of his owne calamities in es following . Franciscomaria hauing made conditionall agreement with the Perugians, matdrowards Citta de Castello, where when he had made certaine incursions, with intention to er the towne of Sansepulcro in the state of Florence, the danger of his owne state constrained 11 to take other counfell, for that the Legate Bibiena having effloones levied certaine bands notmen Italians, solowing the deliberation made at Pefera, was remoued with the rest of his y to Follombrono, which city being battered with the artillery, the third day was taken & fac-This done, he led his army to Pergola, where the day following the Earle of Potenza with 400 nish launces fent fro the king of Spaine to the aid of the Pope, did ioyne with the army: within rgola there was not one fouldier, but only a Spanish Captaine & many inhabitants of the regiwho being fore altonished begă to comune of yelding, but while they were in parley, the Capnewho stood vpo the wall being wonded in the face, the foldiers made affalt, without any order omandement of their Captaines, & won the towne by force. From Pergola they confulted to ig their army to Cagu, but being aduertised that Franciscomaria having heard of the losse of Jombrono, was returned into that region with most great celerity, they determined to retire msclues: wherefore the same night in the which the Legate received that intelligence, they deted from Pergola, & having travelled to Montlion, who knowing that there they might lodge, y began to lay out the ground according to encamping, being advertised by other messengers tthe celerity of the enemy was far aboue perswasion, and that he sent before him a thousand lemen, cuery one carying a footman in croope, to the end that they being constrayned to trawith more leasure, time might be given to the army to overtake them: they marched vij. miles a place called Boleo, from whence departing the morning following before day, they came the evening to Fano, having almost ypon their backes the horsemen of the enemies, which ne with fo great celeritie, that if they had onely departed foure houres later, they had hardly aped the necessitie of the fight. At this time the affaires of the Pope in other actions, proceeded with no better felicitie, then in the accidents and events of the warte : for that Alphonfo the Cardinall of Sienna dildaining much the life of the Pope, lay in waite to betray him, the rather for that the Pope having force ten the travels and dangers which Pandolfe Petrucci hisfather had endured to reftore him ar his bretheren to the gouernement of Florence, together with the operations which he with oth yong Cardinals had wrought in the confistory to aduaunce him to the Popedome. In recompenoffo many benefits he had caused to be thrust out of Sienna, Borquese his brother and him. I which occasion, being also spoyled of his fathers estates, he could not maintaine the dignity the purple hat with that glory which he was accustomed; and therefore being caried with h tred, and reduced almost to dispaire, he began to deuise by a young counsell to murder him wi violent hands, whom his hatefull hart could not brooke to loue; but restrained with the perillar difficulty of the fact, more then with the example and common infamie that throughout all Ch Hendome would run, if any Cardinall would with his owne hands take away the life of a Pot he changed aduite, and turned all his thoughts to take him away with poylon, by the ministrati of Baptista Vercelly a famous Surgion, and very familiar with himsof which counsell (if so wick a furie be worthy fuch name) this should have bene the order, that fith that he could not fi any other meane, the Surgion should by setting foorth with singular prayles his vertues, ma fuch infinuation into him, that the Pope having a Fistula under his fundament, for the whi he yfed daily the trauell of men of his profession, would by such impression call him to his cui But the imparience of Alphonfo reduced the action of this deuife to a desperate hope, since ast execution drew with it some long tract of time, depending upon many observations and circuit stances, so Alfonso who could not containe himselfe from complaying against the ingratitu of the Pope, being every day more hatefull, and suspecting least he would conspire some thing gainst his estate, was at last as it were constrained for his owne safety to depart from Rome, leavi neuerthelesse behind him Antho. Nino his secretary. Betweene them there was a continuall p. fage of letters, whereof certaine being intercepted, the Pope discerned manifest treason to be p Etiled against his life: therefore under colour to make some provision for the affaires of Alfon, he called him to Rome, sending him fafe conduct, joyned to his word and faith given besides to Spanish Embassador, not to touch him prejudicially. Vnder which assurance, notwithstanding privity and testimony of his conscience to so apparant treason, he went vnwisely to the Powho immediately caused him to be apprehended together with Barmello Cardinall Sawlya nowara great furtherer of Leo to the Popedome, but so conjoyned with Alfonso in fraite frier thip and familiarity, that he was thought partaker with him in all things. Their first apprehe ding was in the Popes chamber and in his presence, and from thence were conveyed as prisor to the Castell Saint Angelo: there was also present direction given, that Baptista Vercell, w then was following his art at Florence, should be made prisoner and sent to Rome. The Span Embassador labored with vehement complaints and protestations, to have Altonso set at liber alleaging that the Popes faith given to him as the kings Embassador, ought to be observed w the same fidelity, as if it had bene given to the king himselfe. But the Pope aunswered that the was no fafe conduct, how ample focuer it was, with claufes strong and speciall, that caried a furetie in crimes conspired against the life of the Pope, without peculiar and special nomination and that the same exception and prerogative followed also the crime of poyloning; an offce so greatly abhorred by the divine and humane lawes, and so hatefull to the sences of all m that they have referred no safe conduct or affurance for the offenders that way, but you particular and speciall mention . The Pope preferred to examine them, Mario Peru the procurer of the fiske, who following the matter upon them with feuerity and rigour, they are feffed the treason conspired with the privity of Bandinello. The confession was verified by the Se gion, & confirmed by Po. Bagnacanallo, who under Pandolfe his father, and Borguefe his broth had long bene Captaine of the garrifon of Stenna, and for this offence were now publikely qui tered. After this confession, in the next sitting of the consistory, was apprehended and cariec. the Castell, Raphael Riarso, Cardinall Saint George chiefe Chamberlaine to the sea Apostoli, who for his wealth & riches, for the magnificency of his court, & for his long time & cotinuar in that dignity, was become both in truth & name, the principal Cardinal of al the Colledge: here fessed, that albeit neither the treason nor the cousel thereof had bin imparted to him, by the whi he suffified his innocencie, yet he had heard oftentimes the Cardinall of Sienna both lament al

e threats to the Pope vider fuch words and speeches, as he could not but comprehend that he ire in him a mind to do some violence against his person when occasion offered. The Pope after is continued his complaints in another Consistorie, wherein the Cardinals, not accustomed to : violated, fell into no small assouishment and gricfe of mind, that with such cruelty and iniquity e Popes life should be betrayed by those, who for their place and dignity which made them incipall members of the Sea Apoltolike, flood more then all others inftly bound to defend it: complained with great compassion against the accident and the vnthankfulnesse thereof, to rerneto him fuch a recompence for his infinite benefits and liberalities bestowed upon all forts, anot without blame and imputation of some : but the thing that made him burst out into ore vehemencie of passion, was that other Cardinals were intangled with conspiracie, who nertheleffe, if afore the Confistorie were diffolued, they would frankly confesse their offence, they ould find him prepared to clemencie and to give pardon, but if they deferred till the Confiftowere broken vp, he would turne his clemency into feuerity of inflice, and cal into profcription well the accessaries as chiefe offenders. Which words working both pietic and submission the minds of Adriano Cardinall of Cornetto, & Fran, Soderin Cardinal of Volterra, they humd themselves upon their knees afore the feete of the Pope, contesting that the Cardinall of una had vied the same speeches to them, which the Cardinall Saint George had expressed. As one as these examinations and the euidences incident were published in the Consistore, Alfonand Bandinello by sentence of the generall Consistorie, were degraded of the dignitie of the rple hat and holy orders, and deliuered ouer to the secular Court and Judges of criminall ofces. The night following Alfonso was secretly strangled in prison, but the sentence of Banello by the Popes grace was changed into perpetuall imprisonment, from the which neuertheche was not long afterwards deliuered vndet a ransome of money, and eftsoones restored to dignicie of Cardinall, not with standing he had inster cause of indignation against him for the ny benefites and graces he had bestowed vpon him: and yet he was become estranged from n for no other cause then for the amity he had with Alfonso, adding with all a disdaine that the rdinall Medicis was preferred afore him in the fuites of certaine benefices: and there were not nting malicious interpreters, who judged that afore he was delinered out of prison, there was en to him by the Popes commandement, a potion confected with that kind of poifon which th not fodainly, but worketh by futtle operations vntill by times it hath wasted the life of 1that receiveth it. And touching the Cardinall Saint George, albeit the lawes ordained by nces for the securitie of their states; commaund that in the crime of high treason as well the acarie as the principall be pall under extreame punishment: yet, what by the state of his fall, bein a condition inferiour to the others, and what for the respect of his age and authority, which chad made reverent in him, and lastly, what for the law of friendship, which had indifferentunne betweene them afore his ascending to the Popedome, he proceeded with him with re clemencie and fauour: in so much as like as for the authoritic and reputation of instice, he by sentence deprined of the Cardinals dignitie, so he was immediatly by grace bought with eat funme of money, restored to his former condition in all things, fauing in the authoritie priviledge of his voice active and passive, which grace neverthelesse within the revolution of are was fully restored to him againe. There was no other vexation imposed upon Adrian and terra, saving a secret exaction of great summes of money: but secing there was no surety to er of them to abide in Rome with convenient dignitie, Volterra with the Popes licence went Fondy, where under the wings of Profper Colonno he remained till the Popes death : & Adrian atted secretly out of Rome, but what destinie fell upon him it is hard to report, seeing there none that ever could give any informatio of him fince his going away. The bitterneffe of this dent drew the Pope to confider for the creation of new Cardinals, knowing that the whole ence of the Colledge, altonished by this punishment, and icalous of other occasions, were of ds much estranged from him. In which action he proceeded so immoderatly, that in one morin the Confistory, the Colledge consenting more for feare then of will, he pronounced xxxj. dinals, and in that aboundance and plentie of numbers, as he had good meane to fatisfie mands, and to make his election of enery qualitie of men, to he preferred two sonnes of his lister, forme others, who, failing for the services they had done him, & had bene acceptable to the dinall Medicis by manie offices, were in other teasons neither capable nor worthie so high dignities: in the calling of some, he observed the humours of great Princes, creating them at the instance: some heraised by symonic and corruption of money, to relicue his treasure being much confumed: fome he called were verie famous by the opinion & credit of their learning, among whom were three Generals, (that appellation is of the highest degree) of the order of S. Augu fine, S. Dominicke, and S. Frauncis: and in this creation he left this most rare tradition, that to on function, in one promotion, and at one time, he preferred two of the family of Trinulce, taking his inducement for the one, to recompence his feruice, for that he had bene his Chamberlaine, & also upon a desire to fatisfie Iohn Iacques; & touching the other, he was caried with the fame his learning accompanied with fome quantitie of mony: but that which bred matter of greate. admiration, was the election of Frauncis Vrfm and Pompey Colonno, with other five Romains the principall houses, such as were followers of all factions, with counsels altogether contrariet the resolution of his predecessor: neverthelesse it was reputed an action not the least discreet, at yet it drew no great happinesse in the end to his friends and kindred: for, whereas the greatnesse. the Barons of Rome being alwayes the suppression & vexation of the Popes, and where in defau of the ancient Cardinals of those families, whom Alexander the fixt had bitterly perfecuted make a pray of their goods, Inho would never suffer that dignitie to be reinvested in any of the Leo with great immoderation did the contrarie, not that it could be faid he was drawne withtl merite of the men, for that as Frauncis was taken from the profession of armes, & created Ca dinall, so for Pompey, the memoric of his doings past ought to be objected against his prefermer for that though he was a Bishop, yet wing the occasion of Pope Iulios sicknesse, he had laboure to feduce to tumult the people of Rome against the government of Priests, for which cause Pol Julio deprived him justly of the dignitie of Bishop. But in this time Franciscomaria, albeit by the retiring, or rather manifest flying of the enemies, could have no meane to fight, his armie bei made mightie in men and valour by the continuall refort of new fouldiers, running after the far. of the Captain, and partly caried with hope of pray, entred into Marca, where Fabriano & mai other townes compounded with him, redceming with readie mony the peril of facking andro' bing their houses: but others standing destitute of that humanity, he committed to the mercie of t fouldiers, amongst the which the ciric of less rana hard fortune, since during the parlie & n gociation of accord, it was entred and spoyled in the unbrideled insolencie of the souldiers: drew from thence to Ancona, for the defending of the which the Legate had fent a crue of for diers: he remained about it many dayes, to the great hinderance of his affaires by the loffe of tir which he fuffered, not in fighting with the defendants of the place, but in temporizing to con pound with them: at last, because they would not with the harmes of the war suffer also thele of their haruest, they made him a ransome of eight thousand duckets, not swarping in otherse from their accustomed fidelitie to the Church: afterwards he inuaded the citie of Osim with ve ill fucceffe; and at last he planted his camp afore the towne of Corinaldo, wherein were two hu dred footmen forreyners by whom together with the valour of the townes-men, it was fo va antly defended, that after he had confumed xxij.dayes about it, he lenied his fiege, his defpaire l ing greater then his hope to carie it. This did greatly diminish the terror and feare that was had that armie, the rather for that he had not made conquest of any those townes that refused copound with him: a matter which no way could proceed of the vnskilfulneffe of the Captaine dispose, nor of want of valour in the souldiers to execute: but the true reason was, for that it had but very few & those very smal field peeces, lacking withall many things to put them rose uice: befides, touching those townes which would not yeeld to him, it was necessary they should make demonstration of their constancie and valour, for that the Captaines of the Church arm amongst whom Count Potenza was chiefe, had sent troupes of their men of warre to bridlea! make pillage of the countrey even to the walles of Orbin: and Sife being returned from Citta Castello in Romagnia, and afterwards entred into Montfeltro, & had subdued by force Secchu with certaine other small townes, was reduced to remaine incamped within flue miles of Peles, with intention not to minister succours to any place, nor once to stirre vnlesse necessitie m. ued them to retire: for, where in the times when they were superior in forces and strength, th: affaires had falne out so vnhappily, now being made inferiour in numbers by the diminutior f their footmen, they had not the courage to sustaine the same of their enemies approching, & mil lesse to abide any other perill: in which resolution made according to the Popes mind, they we confirm !

onfirmed by a hope of the comming of fixe thousand Smiffers, whom the Pope by the counfell fthe French king, had fent to leause and wages for, the French king after the confederation made, estred the victorie of the Pope, & yet at the same time he retained the same suspition of hunthar e did before the was continued in this suspirion by the relations of Galeas Viscount and Marke Inth. Colonno, of whom the one being reuoked to his countrie from banishment, and the other or thinking his feruices and merits well recompenced by Cafar, and both transferred with hoorable conditions to the pay of the French king, they had reported that the Pope had conspired ready with Cafar & the Smiffers against him. But much more was the French king moued, for hat the Pope had contracted fecretly a new confederation with Cafar, with the king of Spaine, id the English, which albeit was lawfull for him to do, for that it bare onely for their defence, t both the matter & maner of it troubled not a litle the thoughts of his mind: he was induced rough feare to be delinered of the wars, least the Pope not finding his aides & succours ready, ould enter into a greater conjunction with other Princes against him. And besides that, he gan to take gricfe & sulpition of the armie of Vrbin, whose strength was compounded of footen Spanish & Launceknights: therfore, besides that he had aduised the Pope to make himselfe ong with the footmen of Swiffers, he offered to fend him of new three hundred launces under homas de Foix brother to Odet, alleaging that belides the reputation and valour of the man, he ould be a convenient instrument to imbeasell from the army of Franciscomaria the bands of ascens, with whom those brothers & race of For being descended of the noblest bloud in Gasene, had great authority. The Pope accepted this offer, but with a mind verie suspitious, for that flood doubtfull as he did before, of the kings will, wherein he suffered his suspition to take incafing by the withdrawing of the Gascons, fearing least that action had privily proceeded of 1: operation of Lawtrech: and he that in those times had made observation of the doings of inces, might apparantly discerne, that no benefite, no office, no coniunction, was sufficient to noue our of their hearts the distrusts and leasonfies which they had one of another : for, the sufion was not only reciprocall betweene the Pope and French king, but also the king of Spaine tring of the leavies of the Swiffers, & the preparation of Thomas de Foix, was not without his I re, that the Pope and the French king joyned together, would deuise to spoile him of the kingme of Naples. These suspitions were thought to profite the affaires of the Pope, since both of 1 m least they should give him cause or matter to estrange himselfe from them, labored to con-I nehim, and affure him with benefits and with aydes.

Now Franciscomaria departing from Corinaldo, returned vponthe state of Vrbinto give def ce and protection to his people for the getting in of their haruest: & retaining with an increase, cumb tion his ancient defire to get Pefera, which was garded by the Count Potenza and his I ldiers, he brought his armie to the borders thereof, and objecting all impediments to cut off t refort of victuals, he put to the sea certaine ships: but against that force they of Rimini rigged c fixteene vessels, some barkes, and some brigantines, & some of other nature agreeable to the frice of those times, which being armed and manned, and fent to accompanie and assure other (>s loaden with victuals for Pefera, they encountred the nauie of Franciscomaria, of who they f ke to the bottome the Admirall, and tooke all the refidue; by which accidet, despairing of the e erprise of Pefera, he leavied his forces and departed. In this meane while M. de Foix advaunwith his three hundred launces, but the Smiffers made flow preparation, for that the Cantons died their consent valesse they were first satisfied of their old pensions: from which obstinacy I king being not able to remove them, and in the Pope no ablitie to make them fatisfied for d intollerable defrayments he had expended, his Agents having confumed in that folicitation my dayes, entertained and waged without common prinity two thousand particulars of that n on, and foure thousand other Germans and Grisons: which leavies being descended and be-Rved in the confines and suburbs of Rimini, and they being deutded by the river from the rehe cof the Citic, are enuironed and fetched in with walles: Fanciscomaria was entred by night hevaults and arches of that notable bridge of Marble which tieth the suburbs with the Ciwhat he could not passe ouer, the river being swelled by the inundation of the sea. There grews ong fight betweene his fouldiers and the footbandes bestowed in the suburbes, in which willaine laster Captaine of the Popes gard, who had conducted them thither: but greater w the loffe of the enemies, by the death of Balastishino & Vinea Spanish Captaines, & Federike

Boffolo and Fanciscomaria being wounded in the bodie with a bullet. After this encounter h turned his armie towards Tuscane, being caried more by necessitie then by hope, for that in an gion fo much confumed, fo great an armie could not be nourished. He remained certaine day in Tuscane amongst the populars of S. Stephano, the borough of S. Sepulchro, and Anguiar townes of the dominion of Florence, where he tooke Montedoglio, a place verie weake and of tle importance: he gaue a long affault to Anguiaro, a towne more strong by the sidelity and v lour of the inhabitants, then by fortification of walles, or other kinds of munitions: but being n able for his owne weakenesse and wants to carie it, he retired his armie vnder the Appenne, b tweene S. Sepulchro and Citta de Castello, and causing to be drawne thither from Mercate foure peeces of artilleries, he incamped within leffe then halfe a mile of the towne, vpon that we that leadeth to Vrbin: there he feemed to stand irresolute and doubtfull what course to take, se ing that as his enemies were passed behind him into Tuscane, & manie Italian bands entredit S. Sepulchro, and Vitelli with a great frength was got into Citta de Castello: so within Anguia within the plaine of S. Stephano, and within the other townes contoyning, were entred the bar; of footmen of the Germaines, the Grifons, and the Swiffers. Laurence de Medicis came also Florence but somewhat late to S. Sepulchro, where Franciscomaria hadlyen with his campe n. nie dayes idly: and for that he began to find in these places many discommodities of victuals, al leffe hope to be able to bring forth any good effect, & withall, for that the fouldiers of his arm, who were driven to defend their lives by pray & pillage, were now of equal terror to his friend and to his enemies, he began not to discerne any good expedition or end for his affaires : and : bands of footmen who had so long followed him, seeing no pay ministred, and no more hope maining to liue by diferetion, because they had no munition of qualitie to force townes, and i ting withall, that to their calamitie of want of victuals, was joyned an increase of the force and putation of their enemies, by the grace of many Princes disclosed in their famour, they began be wearie with the longnesse of the warre, the rather also for that they could hope for no go issue or successe, neither by the oportunitie of present battell, nor by the benefit of longer ti-The Pope for his part felt likewise the same perplexities and afflictions; for, he was both made ked of wealth and treasure, and no abilitie of himselfe to continue the prouisions of his camp t also he stood more doubtfull then ever of the fidelitie of other Princes, but chieflie of the Fre 1 king, who with great flownesse and negligence did provide for the reliefe of mony, which he bound vnto by the capitulatio. And for that M.de Forx having by the Popes directio remaine a Romagnia, refused to send part of his launces into Tustane, alleaging that he would not deuid s Atrength before the armies were passed the Appenin, there arose many arguments & perswall s of accord betweene the Legate and Franciscomaria & his Captaines. In which good inclina a to peace, there interposed betweene them M.de Foix, and Don Hugo de Moncudo; and for It effect also the Viceroy of Sicilia was fent by the king Catholike: but vntill that day nothing !ceeded, for the hard coditions which Franciscomaria vrged. At length the bands of Spanishsi men, induced both by the difficulties that appeared, & also by the folicitation & instance of. " Hugo, who loyning threats to the authority of his place, & fatisfying them, that fuch was pret ly the will of the king of Spaine, they were brought to incline & imbrace peace: which witharie hard consent of Franciscomaria, & the negociation of the Bishop of Auellino sent thither w the Pope by the Legate, was contracted in this fort, concurring also the consent of the bancol Gascon footmen by the interposing of M.de Foix: That the Pope should pay to the Spanish itmen fine and fortie thousand duckets for the full satisfying of foure moneths pay, and to the if cons & Germans ioyned with the, threescore thousand duckets: That they should all depart v 1in eight dayes out of the state of the Church, the iurisdiction of Florence, & the territories of re bin: That Franciscomaria leaving abandoned all that he possessed in that state, might passed is curity to Mantua: That he might carie with him his artilleries, his houshold fluffe, & namely at famous Library which with fo great charge and diligence had bin erected of Federike his gr de father by the mothers fide;a Captaine for leading of an army, of most renowne of althe Cap in of his time, but most famous amongst all other his vertues for his pattonage of good learn g: That the Pope should absolve him of all censures, and give remission to all the subjects of the uernement of Vrbin, & to all others that had rifen against him in this warre. But whilest they ic reducing the substance of these capitulations into articles and writing; Franciscomaria soughto

we inferted in speciall wordes, that the Spamards were they who promised to deliver up to the ope, the flate of Vrbin; a matter which they refuled for the regard of their honour, whereupon ey came to contention, when Franciscomaria suspecting least they would fell him to the Pope, ent suddenly to Sestina, leading with him part of the light horsemen, with the footmen Italians, afcos, & Germains, & foure peeces of artilleries . Affoone as perfection was given to the peace, id the Spaniards received their payes, they went into the Realme of Naples, containing at their parture a strength of fixe hundred horsemen, and source thousand sootemen : by their example, e other bands of footmen departed after they had received the reward of their difloyaltie: oneto the Italians, nothing was neither given nor promifed; and touching Franciscomaria ouer hose safetie it seemed Monsieur de Foix had a care particular, seeing himselse now abandoned, allenged the benefit of the first peace, and went through Romagma and the countrey of Bolovato Alantua, being accompanied with Federske de Bossolo, an hundred horse and fixe huned footemen. In this fort did end the warre of Vrbm, continued eight monethes with great exnces and ignominie to the Victors: on the Popes part were expended eight hundred thousand ickats, the greatest masse whereof was drawne out of the common weale of Florence, for the thoritie he bare there at that time. And touching the Captaines to whom was referred the adinistration of those warres, there was heaped against them, great imputation of cowardise, and disordered gouernement, adioyning to it want of sinceritie or found intention: for that in the ginning of the warre when the forces of Lawrence were mighty, and the power of the enemics great weakenesse, they neuer could vse any occasion, neither by apparant valour, nor by their Justire, and much lesse by their prouidece of forecast. To which beginnings drawing with them le of their reputation, negligence in discipline, and disobedience of the atmie, were adioyned in proceedings and further course of the warre, want of many prouisions in the campe. And at It fortune feeming to take her fport and pleafure vpon their etrours, did by her working so heape camities vpon their diforders, that the affaires of the warres were reduced to these termes, that t Pope detecting the snares that were lay dagainst his life, and being much shaked in the gonement of the Church, and eftfoones fearing the effate of Florence, was conftrained with peons and new obligations, to implore the aydes of all men . And yet he could not be deliuered nthose calamities, but by defraying of his owne treasure vpon the armie of his enemies, and has either were the originall mouers of the watre, or elfe being entertained in his pay, had vile-I euolted against him, after they had vexed him with many extortions.

In this yeare and almost in the end of the yeare, the king of Spaine went with prosperous nation, to take possessing the interest of the Frenchking (between whom and him went many demonstrations of amitie, both of them couering the secret intion of their mindes) assured that he would forbeare for fixe monethes, the first payment on hundred thousand duckats, which he was bound to pay in by the articles of the last accordence the content of the payment of the last edge defensive which they had with the French King, with whom as they should most firmely closed in the law of league and sidelitie, so in regard of him they made small account of the action of all other Princes. In so much as they omitted to send Embassadous to present heir obece to the Pope, who having sent Legate to Venue, Allobello Bishop of Pola, it was imputed inst him as a matter voworthy his maiestie.

There followeth now the yeare a thousand fine hundred and eighteene, in which the regions (take, contrary to the precedent of many yeares before, felt not the least impression or motion exarte, yea there appeared the selfe same disposition in all other Princes of Christendome, between whom by the operation of the Pope, though haply more with faire reasons, then with stantial counsels, was solicited an universall expedition of all Christendome against the pride chessen Prince of the Turkes, who the yeare before had so enlarged and extended his greatile, that comparing with his power, his ambition to be greater, pushed on with many helpes of ture, it was worthily to be doubted, that is the were not prenented by the invasions of the Chrisms, he would in his pride lift up his victorious hand against them. For Selim discerning that there is the person of Acomath his elder brother, drewinto rebellion against him, & by force of arms, cutring the corruption of the souldiers of his gard, constrained him to resigne up to him the authoritie of the gouernement: and not suffering his ambition to stay there, it was believed oil men, that for his more absolute affurance, he tooke away his life by poyson : and afterwardes . uing an ouerthrow to his brother in an encounter of a battell, he confirmed fully the feate of s Empire, by depriving him of his life in publike shew, exercising the like rage of crueltie vp1 Coren the youngest brother of all. And being not satisfied according to the tyrannie of the hoe of Ottomanni, with the bloud and flaughter of all his Nephewes, or any others that remaid of that line and flocke, he was in thought oftentimes (by the rage and furie of his disposition, takeaway the life of Solyman his onely sonne . Of these beginnings breeding one warre via another, after he had subdued the Aduliti a people of the Mountaines, he passed ouer into Pea against the Sophi, to whom he gaue battell and ouerthrew him, and in that selicitie of warre tooke the Citie of Tauris the foueraigne feate of that state, together with the greatest paris Persia, which he was constrained to abandon, not through the valour of his enemies, who r their disabilitie to support their armie, were retired into the mountaines and places desert, It for the universall dearth & barennesse of that yeare, he fell into an extreame want of victuals, e returned soone after this expeditio to Constantinople, where, after he had done execution vpo ca taine foldiers feditious, & for certaine moneths had refreshed his armie, he gaue out that he wod eftsoones returne to make warrevpon Persia, but indeede he turned his forces against the Sol n king of Soria and Egypt, a Prince not onely of most auncient seuerence and dignitie for that ijgion, but most mightic for the amplitude of dominion, most rich in tributes, and very gloriousy the discipline of the Mammelukes, of whose armes and forces that state was possessed with gite reputation three hundred yeares: for that Empire being ruled of the Soldans, they not by fucifion but by election, ascended to it, and to the supreme seate of government were not present but men of manifelt vertue, and confirmed by all the degrees of war, in the administration of a uinces and armies: and also the finewes and strength of their forces, stood not upon sould's mercenarie and forceine, but of men elected, who taken of children in the proninces adioyn; and trayned up by succession of yeares in hardnesse of sare, in suffering of labour and toyle, ann the exercise of armes and all customes appertaining to the discipline and law of warre, they at ibed and enrolled them in the order of the Mammelukes. There succeeded from hand to han a this order, not the sonnes of the Mammelukes that were dead, but others, who being take if children for flaues, had their rifing by the fame discipline, & by the fame industrie and artes, by e which their predeceffours had paffed from hand to hand. These not being in number about he teene or eighteene thousand, held subjected under a most heavy yoke, all the people of Egypt d Soria, whom they spoiled of the yse of all armes, and practise to manage horses: yea such was the fiercenesse and valour, that oftentimes they made warre of themselues, for that of their num's and by their election were chosen the Soldans, and in their power rested all authoritie to dibute the honours, offices, and profites of that most rich Empire. By the oportunitie of which iuing subdued many nations adioyning, and reduced to obedience the Arabians, and maintaid many warres with the Turkes, they were many times victorious, but very seldome or neuer 11quished of others. Against these people did Selim convert his forces, whom he overthrew in 1ny battels fought in plaine field, wherein was slaine the Soldan, and afterwardes in another ba II was taken prisoner the other Soldan his successour, who he caused to be publikely murdered the an vnworthy kinde of torment. Thus having fatisfied his bloudy humour with thefe great flat > ters, and almost wasted the name of the Mammelukes, he proceeded to the inuation of Cat 2 most populous Citie, wherein were resident the Soldans, and in short time subdued under hi !risdiction all Soria and all Egypt: the same drawing vnto him so great an increase of Imperie, sh amplification of tribute and reuenue, and remouing the impediments of so mightic enemies d offo great reputation, that with great reason he was to be seared of the Christians: a seare wh tooke his degrees of increasing by this consideration, that to so great a power & valour, was 1ned a setled impression of ambition to beare rule, and by many victories to make gloriou is name to all posterities: wherein reading oftentimes the Legendes and actions of the great Ale. der and lulius Cafar, he seemed to suffer griese and perplexitie of minde, that his actions and kploites of warre could in no wife hold comparison with so many great triumphes and victorie in which humour, refurnishing continually his armies, and building of new a great number of flos, and leauying all prouisions necessarie for the warre, it was feared when his preparations we accinccomplished, that he would inuade Rhodes, the bulwarke of the Christians in the East parts, or effecthe kingdome of Hungaria, made featefull by the valour of the inhabitants to the nation of Turkes; which at that time was in division among est themselves, and made weake by the minotitie of their King, who was governed by Priests and the Barons of the Realme. Others were of opinion, that he had addressed all his thoughts to the innation of Italie, taking his encouagement vpon the discord of the Potentates and natural Princes, whom he knew to be much haken with the long warres of those regions . To this was joyned the memorie of Alahomet is grandfather, who with a power farre leffe then his, and with a finall Nauie fent ypon the poaltes of the Realme of Naples, had wonne by affault the Citic of Ottronto: and, fauing (he was preuented by death) had both opened the way, and established the meane to perfecute the egions of Italie with continually vexations. So that the Pope together with the whole Court of Rome being made aftonished with so great successe, and no lesse provident to eschue so great daunger, making their first recourse to the ayde and succour of God, caused to be celebraed through Rome most deuout invocations, which he did affist in presence bare soote : and aferwardes calling upon the helpe of men, he wrote letters to all Christian Princes, both admoishing them of the perill, and perswading them to lay aside all civill discordes and contentions, nd attend speedily to the defence of religion and their common safetie, which he affirmed would tote and more take increase of most grieuous daunger, if with the vnitie of mindes, and conordances of forces, they fought norto transferre the warre into the Empire of the Turkes, ndinuade the enemie in his owne countrey. Vponthis aduise and admonition, was taken the xamination and opinion of men of warre, and persons skilfull in the discouetie of countreys, the spotting of provinces, and of the nature and viage of the forces and weapons of that kingdome, id thereupon a refolution being fet downe to make great leautes of money by voluntarie conibutions of Princes; and valuerfall impostes of all people of Christendome, it was thought ceffarie that Cafar accompanied with the horsemen of Hungaria and Polonia, nations ware, and practifed in continuall warres against the Turke, and also with the footemen of Germae, should saile along Danub; into Boljina, called aunciently Missa, and from thenceto Thracia, do to draw neare Conffantinople, the feate of the Empire of the Ottomans : That the French ng with all the forces of his kingdome, the Venetians, and the other Potentates of Italie, acupanied with the infanterie of Smifferland, should passe from the port of Brindiss in Albania, a islage very easie and short, to inuade Greece, a countrey sull of Christian inhabitants, and for the tollerable yoke of the Turkes, most ready to rebell: That the Kings of Spaine, of England, and oringall, affembling their forcestogether in Carragena and the ports thereabouts, should take circourse with two hundred ships full of Spanis footemen and other souldiers, to the straite Galipoli, to make roades up to Constantinople, having first subdued the Castels and fortes nding your the mouth of the straite : and the Pope to take the same course, embarking at nona with an hundred ships armed. With these preparations, seeming sufficient to cover the id & overlpread the sea, it was thought that of a warre so full of denotion and pietie, there could t be but hoped a happie end, specially adding the innocation of God, and so many severall insions made at one time against the Turkes, who make their principals foundation of defence, fight in the plaine field. These matters were solicited with no small industrie, & to stop all matof imputation against the office of the Pope, the minds of Princes were throughly founded, & vniuerfall truce for fine yeares between call the Princes of Christendome, published in the coorie, vpon paine of most grieuous censure to such as should impugne it . So that the negocian cotinuing for all things appertaining to so great an enterprise, he affigned Embassadors to all nces: to the Emperour he sent the Cardinall S. Sifto, to the French king he dispatched the Carnall of S. Maria in Portico, the Cardinall Geles to the king of Spaine, and the Cardinall Camus to the king of England: all Cardinals of authoritie, either for their experience in affaires, or opinion of their doctrine, or for their familaritie with the Pope. All which things albeit they rebegun with great hope and expectation, and the vniuerfall truce accepted of all men, and men with no litle oftentation and braueric of wordes, made shew of their readinesse with ir forcesto aduaunce fo good a cause: yet, what with the confideration of the perill esteemed tertaine and farre off, and extending more to one Prince then to another, & what by the diffilties & long tract of time that appeared, to introduce a zeale & vnion so vniuerfall, private interefles and respectes particular seemed to prevaile more, then the pietie of the expedition. In so much as the negociation stood not onely naked of all hope and iffue, but also it was followed very lightly and as it were by ceremonie, this being one propertie in the nature of men, that those things which in their beginnings appeare fearefull, do dayly take such degrees of diminution and vanishing, that valesse the first seares be reujued by new accidents, they leade men in proceffe of time to fecuritie: which propertie of negligence, both touching the affaires publike, and affection of private and particular men, was well confirmed by the death that succeeded not long after to Selim, who, having by a long maladie suspended the preparations of the warre, was in the end confumed by the passions of his dilease, & so passed into other life, leaving so great an Empir to Solyman his sonne, young in yeares, and judged to beare a wit and minde not so disposed to the warres, although afterwardes the effectes declared the contrarie. At this time, appea red betweene the Pope and the French King, a most great and straight conjunction: for the King gaue to wife to Lamrence, his Nephew, the Lady Alagdalene noblie descende of the bloud and house of Bolognia, with a yearely revenue of ten thousand crownes, where of part was of the Kings gift, and the relidue riling of her owne patrimonie. Belides, th King having borne to him a fonne, the Pope required that in his Baptisme, he would impos wpon him his name. By which occasion Lawrence making preparations to go to marrie his new wife, for his more speede, performed his journey by post into Fraunce, where he was rece ued with many amities and much honour of the King, to whom he became very gracious ar. of deare account, the rather for that besides other generall respectes; he made a dedication himselfe wholly to the King, with promise to follow in all accidents, his fortune: he brought a so to the King a writ or warrant from the Pope, by the which he graunted to him, that till the moneyes collected of the tenthes, and by other meanes of contribution, were expended vpc the holy warre against the Turkes, he might dispose it to his owne vses, so farre forth as he wou make promife to reffore it wheloeuer occasió & necessity would cal him to defray it to that end was gathered for: his warrant bare also to deliver to Lawrence of the same treasure, fiftie thousar crownes. And whereas the Kingtill that day had diffembled not to execute the Popes promi made to him under writing for the restoring of Modena & Requia to the Duke of Ferrara, no withstanding the terme of seuen monethes were past, and knowing withall that he could note fer to the Pope a thing more grieuous, then to vrge him to that restitution, he redeliuered into t hands of Lawrence the fayd writ of promise, making a greater reckening (as it often hapneth mongst mortall men) of the stronger then of the weaker . About the same time , the Venetians the operation of the French King, prolonged the truce they had with Cafar for fine yeares, wi codition to pay for every one of the flue yeares twentie thouland crownes, & to every one of t exiles that had followed Cafar, the fourth part of their goods yearely, being rated at the value fine thousand crownes. It was supposed that Cafar would have bin induced to have made pea with them, if they would have gratified him with a greater fun me of money.

But this truce was not a litle agreeable to the French King, for that the Venetians not standi fully assured, had the greater reason to make deare account of his amitie, and that to Cas was given no power, with the money he had of them, to dreffe any innovation. In fo much matters on all fides, tending to peace and concord, the differences betweene the French and E glish were also reconciled. And for the more stabilitie of which agreement, it was confirm with a contract of parentage and alliance, wherein the King of England promifed to give I onely daughter, to whom having no fonnes, there was hope of the descending and succession the kingdome, to the Dolphinthe eldest some of the crowne of Fraunce, adding for a porti foure hundred thousand duckats. Both the one and the other bare yet so tender age, that infin accidents might happen, before perfectio of yeares would make them able to establish matrim nie. There was made betweene them a league defensiue, wherein were comprehended Casar a the King of Spaine, in case they would ratifie it a certaine time. The king of England bound him! to reflore Tournay, receiving prefently for defrayments expended youn that town, two hundr and ix thousand duckats, & three hundred thousand to be defalked of the portion, & to pay the hundred thousand more in the space of twelue yeares. The French king also was bound, that the peace and the parentage followed not, to render up againe into the hands of the English, 1: towne of Tournay, Many Embassadors were sent from both the realmes to negociate this league

ndto receive the ratifications and oathes, by whom in the Courts of both the Kings the actes frhe accord were dispatched with great solemnicie and ceremonie, with a resolution of an enerniew of both the Kings betweene Callice and Bolleme, immediatly after the restitution of rournay. About the same time, the daughter of the French King appointed to be maried to he King of Spaine, being dead, the former peace and capitulation was eft soones reconfirmed etweene them, wherein was promifed the mariage of the second daughter of Fraunce. Both he Kings celebrated this conjunction with most great demonstrations of perfect amirie: for, the King of Spaine, having payed in at Lyons an hundred thousand duckats, ware publikely the orer of Saint Michaell vponthe day of the celebration of the fame, and in recompence of that onour, the French King, vpon the day dedicated to Saint Andrew, was honorably attired in ne robes and colour of the golden fleece.

Thus the affaires of Italie standing in good estate of tranquilitie, there remained onely disconented and in ill disposition, John Lacques Triuntee, whom neither his old age reduced almost to ie last time, nor his vertue so offetimes expressed in the seruice of the house of France, could any /ay aide or comfort: for, as in himselfe were bred some occasions, partly by his ambition, which ras fulfpected, and partly through his impatiencie, which the condition of old age might reasonaly excuse. So he was crossed by the suttle humours of such as did enuie him, but chiesly and vehenently quarrelled withall in many things by Monsieur de Lawtrech, by whose instigation, the king as drawne into suspition of him, that not onely his owne person but also the whole familie and Icalousie aouse, were too much agreeable to the Venetians. Wherein they tooke the consideration of their Zainst John apition, not onely for the interest of the faction of the Guelfes, and many other actions and tra- I acques Tritions of times past to keep him entertained in the grace of the Venetians, but also for that T heoor Triunlee was become their gouernour, & Rene a member of their family, was newly received to the pay of that state. By reason of which, after Galeas Viscount by the death of Fr. Bernardin secount, was become chiefe of the Gebelin faction, the king indued him with the order of S. Mirael & allowace of pension, to the end to oppose him against Tribulce with a greater authoritie. ruing withall the ready had of Lamtrech to push on his reputatio & credit as ofte as occasios ocirred to do any thing to the diladuantage of Tribulce. The pallage of which things brought no le diminutió to rhe authority of the old Truulce, who, having no patiece to dissemble the wrogs knewhe had not deferued, made his dayly complaints, and was so much the more hated and spected. Lawtreeb with his other adversaries made this no litle occasion to approach him and cufe him to the King, that he had made himselfe a burgesse inrolled with the Swiffers, as though would vie their meane to be supported against the king, and haply aspire to greater things: so ", is enuie to suborne suggestions, & so ready to enforce them dangerously, to the ruine of those ainst who she contendeth:and as Trinulce, not with standing his old age which was now in the ate decrepit, & the infirmities of a body broken which draweth after it dispensation from trall, was gone into Fraunce to iustifie himselse: so, Monsieur de Lawtrech after his departure, reained vnder reasonable gard by the kings directio at Vigeuena, his wife & grandchild borne of e Count of Musque his onely sonne deceased, which degree of rigour or hard dealing, was well preffed you himself at his coming into France, for that much leffe that he was received of the ng with the same aspect, countenance, & honour that he was wont, seeing of the cotrarie he reoched to his face, his amity & correspondency with the Swiffers, assuring him that no other thing oldhim fió punishing him as he had deserued, the the consideratio of the vniuersall renowne that n(though not true in many parts) of the merites & feruices he had done to the crowne of Frace: on the kings displeasure which commonly worketh many dangerous impressions in the minds men, he renounced and disclaimed all societie & introduction with the Swiffers: and not ma-I dayes after, following the Court, he fell ficke at Chartres, where he gaue up to the King, his nocencie and complaints, and made to God the last reckening of his aged dayes: he was a man The death of the judgement of many, and confirmed by fundry experiences, of fingular valour in the difciine of warre, and ranne a race alwayes opposed to the inconstancie of fortune, who according her mutabilitie, made him feelethe operation of both her humours, sometimes reioycing in her uour and earst againe finding her sower and of bitter tast. By his commaundement were writn vpon his tornbe, these wordes not disagreeable to the condition and course of his life: 1 finde erest within my grave, which in my life I could not have.

About this time, Calar defiring after his death to establish the succession of the Romaine Em pire in the person of one of his gradchildre, treated with the Electors to chuse one of them king o Romains, a dignitie which draweth with it an immediat succession to the Empire after the Em perours death, without other election or confirmation. And because none can aspire to such ele Stion, yntill the Emperour elect have obtained the crown Imperial, he made inflance to the Pope that by a new exaple, he would accoplish his coronation in Germanie by the hands & deputation of certaine Cardinals Legates Apostolike for that action. And albeit Cafar had afore withed tha that dignitie might be trasferred to Ferdinand his gradchild as a degree to support him, the elde having divolved to him fo great a puissance of estates, & albeit he judged that for the better con tinuance of his house in fame & honour, & to meete with all ill accidents that run vpon the eldes it were better that two perfonages were great then one alone , yet what by the operatio of man his Courtiers, & by the perpetual labour of the Cardinal of Syon, & lattly by the suborned impor tunities of fuch as feared & hated the puissance of Fraunce, he rejected the first counsell, & dispe fedall his meanes to have the King of Spaine elected to that dignitie: wherein he was perfwader that it would be farre more profitable for the house of Austrich, to assemble & drawinto one: lone, all power & greatnesse, then in canuasing & deuiding it into many parts, to make that fam lieleffe mightie to obtaine the iffue of their purposes: That the foundations of the greatneffee Charles were fuch & fo mightie, that adding the dignitie Imperiall, there was great hope, that I might reduce into one Monarchy all Italie & a great part of Christedom; an action not only at pertaining to the greatnes of his progenie & descendats, but also agreeable to the tranquilitie his fubicates,& for the regard of the infidels, most coformable to the benefite of the como wea of Christendome: That it beloged to him in office & equitie, to lay for the augmetation & exalt. tion of the dignitie Imperiall, which had bin fo many yeares inuelled in his person & his house Austrich, & which till that day, both by his weakenesse & infirmitie of his predecessors, had bee greater in title & name the in substace & effects: that there was no hope of the rising of that dign ty, or to reinuest it in his anciet renowme, but by trasporting it into the person of Charles & a nexing it to his power: That seeing the humour of the time presented to him the occasion, wher in also did concurre the order of nature & of fortune, it ought to be far from him to stop or hind the course of so many helpes, to aduaunce & life up the greatnes of his house: That it was seenel examples & traditions of auncient Emperours, that Cafar Augustus & many of his succession for want of sonnes or other issue of their line, have searched by meane of adoption for succe fours very farre removed from their alliance, yea fuch as touched them nothing in bloud and ki red, wherein they were caried by a naturall icalousie lineally desceding from one to another, the the dignitie which had bin so long resident in their persons, should not be separate or decline diminution: That the exaple was familiar of the king Carholike, who albeit he loued as his four Ferdinand, who had bin alwayes trained up about him, & neuer feeing Charles, but foundhim his last age, very disobedient to his comaundements; yet without hauing copassion of the pour of him whom he loued as his sonne, he neuer imparted with him any one of those estates which held, nor of fuch as he might dispose by the right and prerogative of conquest, but left all to hi whom he fcarcely knew but as a straunger: That he would remember how the same King wor alwayes vrge him to purchase new estates for Ferdinand, but to leave the dignitic Imperiall Charles: & that it was feene that for the augmentatio of the greatnes of his fuccessour, he had, pu haps with a counsell reproued of many and haply vniust, eucled from the kingdome of Arage his proper house, & consented against the commo defire of most men, that the name of his hot to noble and renowned, should fall into obscuritie & perdition. Against this instance of C.e.far, t French King opposed himselfe with all industrie and meanes possible, taking not a litle displeasi & enuie, that to fo many kingdomes & great effates holden by the Spanish, there should be add the dignitic Imperiall, which refuming a certaine vigour & firength for fo great a puissance, mis fubdue all others under his feare and jurifdiction; he made fecret folicitation to all the Electors flop the effect of fuch an ambition: he flood vpon inflance to the Pope not to fend with an exaple new and daungerous, the Crowne to Maximilium: and he fent Embassadors to the Venetsa to induce them to hinder it with the Pope, whom he admonished of the perils that might fall pon them both by the course of such a greatnesse. But the Electours for the most part were alre dy drawne to the opinion of Cafar, and no leffe affured of the fummes of money promit them for that election by the King of Spaine, who for that purpose had sent into Germanie two hundred thousand duckats. Neither could they in reason, not haply without daunger of flaunder in regard of the examples past, denie him such a demaund. Besides, it was not to be beleeued that the Pope (not with standing it was discontenting to him) would refuse to agree that Cafar should receive in Germanie by the ministration of Legates Apostolike, the Crowne Imperiall in his name, feeing that to make a voyage to Rome to be crowned, albeit it brought a greater authoritie to the sea Apostolike, yet in all other regardes, it was a matter rather ceremonious then substantiall. With these impressions and with these accidents, ended the yeare athousand fine hundred and eighteene : and as the Electours had not resolved and established the deliberation, so it was made both more doubtfull and full of difficulties, by the death of Cafar which hapned in the first beginning of the yeare following : he dyed at Linz a towne vpon the marches of Austriche, where he remained for the delight and pleasure in hunting the wild Boare and other chases of the field. He lived alwayes under one condition of fortune, who many times fauoured him in offering him many faire occasions, and as often wrought against him innot suffering him to take the fruite and effect of them. He was by nature inconstant and remouable, and had conceites and impressions very ill disposed and different from the judgement of other men, joyned to an excessive prodigalitie & dissipation of money; matters which cut off from him the effectes and successe of all occasions, being otherwise a Prince most perfect, and instructed in the ordering of warre, fecret to lay and dispose a plot, diligent to follow it, of body able and fuffering, of minde affable and easie, and replenished with many other excellent gifts and ornaments. Assoone as he was dead, the French King and the King of Spaine, began manifestly to aspire to the Empire, the purchase whereof albeit was a matter of right great importance, and no effe the emulation running betweene two fo mightie Princes, yet they ordered their ambition with great modellie, neither vsing wordes of iniurie nor threates of armes, but either one labouing by his authoritie and by his meanes, to draw on his fide the Electours. The French King sunlry times reasoned touching the election with great comelinesse with the Spanish Embassadours, o whom he fayd it was a matter both agreeable and convenient, that either of them severally hould seeke by honest meanes to increase the honour of his house by so great a dignitie: which or that in times before had bene transferred into the families of their predeceffours, there was owthe lesse occasion to breed betweene them two, matter of injurie, or diminution of their anitie and good will: but rather he will hed that in the action of the Empire they might follow the tample and order of two young louers, who albeit they follow the quest of one Lady, and ei- o terone laboureth by his industry to catie her, yet they forbeare to come to contention. The king Spaine alluded with good right that the Empire appertained to him, as having continued by a ng succession of time in the house of Austriche, and that it had not bene the custome of the Ectours to depriue the issue of the Emperours without manifest cause of their disabilitie, neither as there any in Germanie of that puissance and authoritie to make him equall to stand coperitor ith him in that election. And least of all did he hold it inst or tikely, that the Electors would trasort to a forreine or straunge Prince, so great a dignitie, continued by so many ages in the natio of ermanie. And albeit some particular amongst them, either through the infinuation of money, or her propertie of corruptio, might be allured to another intentio, yet he hoped to flop him with ree prepared in time convenient, not doubting also but the other Electours would oppose ainsthim, and the Princes and free townes of Germanie would not endure so vniuerfall an infaie, specially to suffer it to be layd vpon the person of the French king, which would be no other ing then to make great the puillance of a king enemie to their nation, & from whom there was furetie that the Imperiall dignitie would ever returne into Germany: he thought it would be an tion easie to obtaine & reduce to perfection, that which had bin solicited by his gradfather, who d already compounded for recompences & donations, & other dividents for every of the Eleors . On the other fide, the defire of the French king was as great, and no leffe were his hopes, nich tooke their principall foundation vpon an opinion he had to corrupt the voices of the Eleors with his huge fummes of money, especially for that there were amongst the both Pensionais to him, & otherwise assured by many good offices, who incouraging him with the facilitie of enterprise, pushed him on to embrace it . And for his part, as mortall men are apt to beleeue thing they defire, so he notished that hope with reasons rather apparant the the true: he knew Ddd 3 that comonly it was a matter grieuous to the Princes of Germanie to have the Emperous mightie, being lealous, that in fo great a puissance, they would rote ither in part or in all, quarrell the iurisdictions & authorities Imperiall occupied by many of the. In which reason heperswaded him felfe, that they would in no fort confent to the election of the Spaniard, and so of themselves to subject themselves to an Emperour more mightie then had bene fince along descent and race of Emperours: a matter which in his person seemed to be qualified, for that having neither estates nor auncient alliances in Germane, they had no occasion of suspition of his greatnesse. The same reason also made him beleeve well of the conformitie of the free townes, in whom much lesse that the regard of the glorie of the nation would carie it from him, feeing it would helpe to poile the ballance on his fide, for that with most men the motions of proper and private interest may do more then the respect of publike and generall profite. He knew it was not a little grieucus to many noble houses of Germanie, pretending to be capable of such a dignitie, to see the Empire continue fo long time in one house, but much more did it discontent them to suffer that so great an estate which of right ought sometimes to be ginen to one of them, and semetimes to passe to another, should become a perpetuall descent and succession in one line: in so much as they might cal inheritance and succession that election, which durst not leave the line of the Emperors: that in that fort the Empire was translated from Albert d'Austrich to Federike his brother , & from Federike to Maximilian his sonne, and now there was denice to passe it from Maximilian to the person of Charles his grandchild . By these humours and indignations of the Princes of Germamy, he tooke hope that the discordes and lealousies amongst themselves might helpe on his cause. the rather for that it often hapneth in the contentions of men, that he that is excluded, or the partie whom he fauoureth, runneth with a naturall rashnesse rather to callin and aduaunce a third, then to give place to him that hath opposed against his intention . Moreover the French King was not without his hopes in the fauour of the Pope, both in regard of the amitie and alliance newly past betweene the, & also for that he was not ignorant how incounient it would be to the fea Apostolike, to haue the Imperiall Crowne inuested in Charles, not so much for his owne greatnesse, as for that by the oportunitie & neighbourhood of the realme of Naples to the estate of the Church, and the adherencie of the Barons of the Gebelins, he had a plaine and open paffage to runne up to the gates of Rome. But in that discourse he considered not that the same reason which he judged true against Charles, was also against himselfe, for that the Empire being joynes to his person, he was no lesse to be seared of the Pope and all others, then Charles, for that though the one of them possessed haply more realmes and states, yet the other was not to be lesse estee med, having his power not dispersed nor separate in many places, but was Prince of a realme en tierly affembled and vnited, where the obedience and fidelitic of his fubicetes was no leffe won derfull, then his treasure and riches infinite. Neuerthelesse not knowing in himselfe that whichh considered in another, he had recourse to the Pope, and implored his fauour under the offer an protestation of his person and kingdomes, with all other denotions of a louing sonne. The matte of this election pressed much the Pope, to whom it was not a litle grieuous, both for the surer of the sea Apostolike, and tranquilitie of Italie, that either of those two Kings should be electe Emperour: and as his authoritie with the Electours was not fuch as he might hope to dra them much to his purpose, so he judged it necessarie to take a wife course, and to vie industr in a matter that drew to great confequence. He perswaded himselfe that the French King beir abused by some of the Electours, would have litle part in the election, and that the corruption in men salable, would not be sufficient to transport the Empire from the Germaine nation to the house of Fraunce, But he supposed the action would be easie to the King of Spaine, both for the conformitie of language and nation, & for the practifes and folicitations begun with Maximilia and for many other regardes, yea he thought he might eafily leade on his Intention, if he obiect no impedimet: a matter which he saw he could not worke in other fort, then to labour the Fre king to turne ypon the person of one of the selfe Electors the same fauors & distributions of m ney, which he aduaunced to procure his owne election: but he esteemed it a matter impossil to induce the kings mind to take that course, so long as he stood caried with the vehement mour of vaine hopes . And as he hoped that by how much more earnefly he should embars himselse into that practise, by so much more easily should he draw the French King to sayour election of a third, with no leffe affection then he had fought to aduaunce his own: so he doubt that under that dealing he might not winne fo much with the king as to bring him to receive heare his authoritie and counfell, especially having infinuated in him a credence certaine to his friend, and to have with him the fame defire to advaunce his election: besides, he thought It in fauoring at the beginning the affaires of the Frech king, the king of Spaine finding difficulty obtaine his defire, and fearing least the French would winne some aduantage, would in like fort pole hinselfe to electathird: for which reasons he did not onely fignifie to the French king, h what affection he wished he were lifted to the Empite, but he counselled him with many reas to proceed refolutely in the enterprife, promiting him under large words, to fauour him with whole authoritie of the Sea Apostolike : and as he thought he could not in better fort imprint he kings mind the finceritie of his intention, then to vie for that purpose an instrument whom French king would thinke depended more you him then of anie other, he gaue present direonto his Nuncio in Germany called Robert Vrsin, Archbishop of Reggia, and of great confince with the king, that both feuerally and joyntly with the French Agents there, he should ke the best labour he could to solicite the Electors: but he diminished the libertie of this comfion by fecret advertisement, that the Nuncio should proceed either more or lesse moderately, ording as he found in Germanie the Electors disposed, and the affaires advanced. These actidifferently discoursed by the Pope, and no lesse coursed with a wonderfull simulation, stood leed, as well for the person of the king as in his Agents in Germanie, of a greater wisdome and recie, and in the Popes ministers a more fidelitie and gratitie.

But whilest these matters tooke their proceedings by practises and by armes, the French king le direction to Peter of Nauarre to go to the fea with a Nauie of twentie gallies and other veffraughted with a thousand souldiers: his commission was to lie to impeach the piracies and odes of the Moores, who having with their foists runne into our seas without impediment, ame more harmefull this yeare then at any time before; his commission bare also to inuade the loores of Affrica, if the Pope thought it so good: but the principall respect and intention of s expedition was, to take away from the Pope (who was wholie for him in the chalenge of the ipire) all occasion not to scare the forces of the King Catholike, who more for scare to be troud in his owne estates, then for defire to vexe any other, leauled with great preparations an arby sea, to send it out for the garding of the realme of Naples. And yet notwithstanding amid fe distrusts and suspitions, both the kings continuing in demonstrations and faire semblarices mitie, there was fent from them feuerally and in particular to Montpellier, the great Maister of aunce, and the Lord of Cheures, in the feuerall persons of whom confisted almost all the counand intentions of their kings: their negotiation tended partly to confirme the mariage of the and daughter of Fraunce with the king of Spaine, and partly to resolute the affaires of the kingne of Naples, the restitution of which albeit being promised to the ancient King in the accord de at Noyon, though much folicited by the French King, was till that day deferred by the king spaine with diverse cunning excuses: but this intercounfell and meeting was dashed, by the acent of death hapning to the great Maister, who was taken away afore they assembled.

In this time died Laurence de Medicis, who had languished in a continual sicknesse euer since Death of Lau. returne from France, where he had confummated his mariage with a wretched prediction by de Medicin. death of his wife, who not manie dayes before, and after her deliuerie of child, was renoked of this world, leauing him behind to take warning of his mortall end by her going before to pare his way. By the death of Laurence, the Pope standing desirous to keepe conjoyned so gas heliued the power of the Florentines with the efface of the Church, would take no counof certaine his familar friends, who adulfed him; that fince of the line Masculine there remayno more (except himselfe) of the lawfull descendants of Cosmo de Medicis the first founder of t greatnesse, he would reinlarge and restore the libertie of his country: but with a counsell sinar and particular, he preferred the Cardinall Medicis to the administration of that estate, either in ambicious humour to perpetuate the name of his liouse, or for a revenging hatred nourished his exile against the name of that common weale : and judging that the Duchy of Vrbin for vniuerfall loue which the people bare to their ancient Duke, would hardly be holden under the ne of the only daughter remaining of Laurence, who was comprehended in the inuestiture of father, he rendered it, together with Pefera and Sinigato, to the Sea Apostolike, which seeming fusficient to represse the vehiment affection of the peoples, lie threw downe to the earth the wals of the Citie of Vrbin and the other principall places of that Duchie, except Agobbio: a Ce which for the lealousie it had over the Citie of Vrbin, bare no great inclination to Francisceman, he fauored, and reflored it to reputation, enduing it with a chiefe inrifdiction and principale ouer all that Duchie : and to weaken it so much the more, he gaue to the Florentines in recopere of the mony expeded by him in the war of Vrbin, for the which he before had reduced the chalt Apoltolike, as detter to the flate of Florece, the fortreffe of S. Leo with all Moifeliro & the paril's of Seftine which were alwayes of the demaine of Sefena. The Florentins were not wel cotent wa this maner of fatisfaction, & yet they had no meane to oppose against his authority and will.

Let ys eftfoones returne to the chalenge or fute for the Empire, which holding all Christie. dome in suspence, was pursued by both the kings with more ambition then euer. The French kings with more ambition then euer. The French kings with more ambition then euer. was beguiled more and more under the inducements and great promifes of the Marquis of Br. deburg, one of the Electours, who was allured with no small offers of money, and haply for round fumme in prest, for the which he did not only bind himself with secret capitulatios, to g him his voyce, but also to make for him & on his side his brother the Archbishop of Magence c of the three Prelate Electors. The king in like fort promised himselfe much of another part of Electors, and in case it came to an equalitie of voyces, he hoped not a litle in the voice of the kin of Bohemia, by the voice of whom the controuerfie was to be decided, if the fixe Electors, whe three be Ecclefiastike and three secular, were discordant. Therfore the French king sent to the A. mirall, who was gone before into Germanie to folicit the action, a great quantitie of money to distributed amongst the Electors. And as he understood that many of the free townes, togeth with the Duke of Wittemberg gaue out threats against those that sought to transport the digniof the Empire into the person of strangers, for the which they made leavies of men of warre: so forgat not to collect great provisions of money and treasure, to the end that both with corrupti and armes, he might oppose against such as put the Electors in feare to make choise of him. I great was the inclination of the people of Germany to keepe retained the Imperiall maiefly with the compasse of that nation, yea it concurred and ran even among the communities of the Swife who for the loue they bare to their common countrey of Germany, befought the Pope, that in t election, he would not beare fauor to any that were not of the naturall language of Germany. N uerthelesse the Pope perseucred to push on the French king, hoping that for those degrees & c monstrations of his affection towards him, he would at least be brought to heare & take count of him with greater credit and faith: under which counfel followed with other reasons, he labor in the end to perswade the king, that shaking off all hope from him selfe to be elected, he wor worke with the same instance and importunitie, to transferre the election to the person of so other of the Princes of Germany; a counsell that serued to small purpose, for that the Admiralla Robert Vrfin, being cunningly caried ouer with the promifes of fuch, as, to make them felues ri with the money of France, fed them with intentions very certaine and pleafing, the one being e French nature and the kings feruant, and the other bearing a light and vnflayed condition, & de rous to win grace with the king, confumed him daily more and more, with vaine aduertifemer increasing his hope to cary the election. With these practises and operations of money and finif meanes, the Princes, to whom not more by antiquitie of custome or well grounded reason, th through permission and privilege, or rather dispesation of Popo, Gregory the fift a Germaine of tion, belongeth the power to elect the Emperour of Rome, went according to that ancient vist to Francfort a towne of low Germany, where, as they contended upon many points & different touching the proceeding to the election in time due, observing their ordinances, they were aduc tifed of an armie put already to the field by the king of Spaine, who was more carefull to wa fouldiers with money, then to expend his treasure in symonic and corruption upon the Elector This armie approching neare the towne of Francfort, under title to bridle all fuch as should fer force to the action of election, brought no small encouragement to those Electors who fau red his cause, reduced to his part those that stood doubtfull, and so assonished the Marquis Brandeburg, who was for the French king, that both despairing of the concurrance of other El ctors, and also glad to avoid the hatred and vniverfall infamie of the whole nation, he had no he charles the fift to discover his intention. So that comming at last to the act of election, Charles of Austrich ki of Spaine was elected Emperour the xxviij. of June, by the full voyces of these source Electors, t

the Archbishop of Treues chose the Marquis of Brandeburg, who was also concurrant in the election of himselfe: but touching Charles it is not to be doubted, that if by equalitie of voyces he election had bene passed ouer to the gratification of the seuenth Elector, that he had not bene is o called, for that Lewis the king of Bobemia, who was also king of Hungary, had promised his royce to Charles. This election pulled downe maruelloufly the heart of the French king, and no effe abated the reputation of all those that in Italy had their expectation and dependancy of him: and on the other fide, it raifed into courage and stomacke all such as were occupied with hopes nd thoughts contrarie, seeing transferred and coniouned so great a power, in the person of one onely Prince, whose youth and other apparances made shew of great effectes of ambition in im, befides that there was promifed and prophecied vpon him by many predictions, a right reat and large Empire, together with many worldly fortunes and felicities: and albeit he was ot fo rich in treasure and money as was the French king, yet it was noted in him a matter of ght great importance, to be able to furnish his armies with footmen of Smifers, Germans, and puniards, people for their valour of great glorie and reputation through the world: a matter herein he had a fingular aduantage of the French king, who for that he had not in his kingdome strength of footinen to oppose against the vertue of these, had no meane to make strong warre, ut by drawing with great expences and intollerable difficulties, bands of footmen out of forine countries; a necessitie which constrained him to entertaine with great charge and diligence enation of Swiffers, and to endure of them manie injuries, and yet he neuer stood fully affured ither of their constancie nor of their fidelitie. Moreouer, it was not to be doubted, but that beveene these two Princes of equall youth and ambition, and having indifferent reasons and oc- Occasions of the fions of icalousie and contention, would in the end arise a great and dangerous warre: for the tensio between ench king was not without a burning defire to recouer the kingdome of Naples, to the which the Freeh hang aspired and pretended institute: and he tooke greatly to heart the restoring of king John to and the Empererealme of Nauarre, touching the which he now discerned that he had bene sed with vaine pes. It troubled the Emperourto pay the hundred thousand duckets promised in the accord Noyon, & he interpreted against the king, that in rejecting the accord made before at Paris, and ng immoderately the occasion when he was to passe into Spaine, he had almost forced him to kea new accord: befides, the cause of the Duke of Guelders was greene & fresh betweenethe, natter of it selfe without any other concurrancy, sufficient to stirre them up to warre & armes, that as the French king on the one fide had taken him into his protection, so on the other fide was holden by the people of Flaunders a fenere and bitter enemy: but about all other quarels Duchie of Burgundy wrought in the mind of the Emperor no small emulation: which Duchy Ing possessed by Lews the cleuech, by reason of the death of Charles Duke of Burgudy grandher by the mothers side to the Emperours father, hath ever since tormented the minds of his celfors: lattly, there wanted no matter nor occasions of strife & war for the Duchy of Millan, which the king raigning had not fince the death of Lewis the twelfth, neither demaunded nor c ained the inuestiture: besides, there was preteded to the rights which had bin gotten to him by inuestiture which had bin made to his predecessor, many chalenges & exceptions, aswel toue 1g the invalidity, as the loffe of those rights, which was matter sufficient to slirre the vp to quar : neuerthelesse, neither the time running, nor the oportunity present (which are the guiders of ons) consented as then that they should enter into any innovation for, besides that the Emperofnecessity was to repasse first into Germany, to receive at Aix the crowne of the Empire, ording to the cultome of those that are elected: yet they were either of them so puissant and thry, that the difficulty to offend one another kept them restrained from all inuation virtill they perfect information of the intention & disposition of other Princes, but specially of the Pope, hase the warre were to begin in Italy: his intentions and inclination were so obscured and coied with artificiall and faire femblances, that much leffe that they were knowne to others, feenaply at fome times they held no resolution in himselfe: not with stading he had dispensed with Irles for the acceptation of the election made in his person, contrary to the tenor of the inuestiof the realme of Naples, wherein (being made according to the ancient forme of inuestitures) was expresly forbidden such a matter: but whatsoever he did in that action, proceeded not so nth of good wil, as for that he had no occasio to refuse it to him, without offending him greatly. So that the regions of Italy, for these reasons, stood in good estate of peace and tranquilitie, Eerrara.

The Popes en. notwith lading in the end of the same yeare, the Pope sought to possesse the Citie of Ferrara, not with manifest armes, but by secret ambush and deuice for albeit it might have bin beleeved, that for the death of his Nephew Lawrence de Medicis, especially for that there wanted in his house rather men then estates, he would have shaked offall thoughts and ambition to occupie Ferrara, to the which he had alwayes aspired before: yet whether he was pushed on by a hatred cocciued against that Duke, or by a defire to make himselfe equall, or at least to come as neare as he could to the glory of Inlio, he had not, neither for the death of his brother, nor for the looking of his ne. phew, diminished any part of that burning ambition: by which experience it may be easily discerned, that the ambition of Priests taketh of nothing so great nouriture, as of it selfe. But the qualiting of the time and the fituation and fortresse of that Citie, which Alfor fo with great diligence had re duced to good rampiers & fortificatios, would not agree, that he should make his enterprise wit forces open and discouered, seeing withall he had prouided an infinite quantitie of faire attille ries and munitions, and improusing to the ettermost his reuenues, and limiting all his expences imposing new taxations and tributes, and lastly expressing in all things the minde of a marchan morethen of a Prince, it was beleeved he had gathered together a huge masse of money an treasure: in so much that if the conditions of the time chaunged not, there remained to the Pop no other hope to carie it, then by the way of fecret conspiracie and practile: whereof as he ha in vaine made experience in times past with Nicholas d'Este and many others : and Alfons fe that he knew not that he followed any more those practises, held himselfe almost assured, not his will, but of his conspiracies and ambushes. So it seemed to the Pope, for the meanes that we offered to him, and for that Alfinso by the oppression of a long maladie was reduced to those d sperate termes, that there was almost no hope of his recoucrie, and withall for that his brother th Cardinall, because he would not remaine in the Court of Rome with difgrace, was gone in Hungarie, that the time consented to execute some plot layd and preferred by some exil of Ferrara, and by their working, by Alexander Fregolo Bishop of Vintemelle, who was the at Bolognia, for that aspiring to be Duke as his father the Cardinall had bene, he was suspect of Octaman Fregolo. The same Bishop having had ill speede in the traffikes and practises whi hemanaged to bring him againe into his owne countrey, promifed to himselfe a better cour and more happy successe in the drifts which he should drive for another in a strange countrey: that after he had secretly received of the Pope ten thousand duckats, he leavied vnder colour reenter Genes by force, a power of two thousand sootemen partly in the countreys of Ra and partly within the iurifdiction of Lunigiane. By the brute and rumour of which musterii Octaman Fregolo fearing to be surprised by him, made himselfe strong both by sea and land .I the Bishop making as though by the disclosing of his driftes, he were fallen from all hope to able at that time to alter the elfate of Genes, gaue advertisement to Federike de Bossolo, w whose ay de the towne of Concorda was chiefly maintained against Count Iohn Frauncis of Co randola, thathe might vie the service of his forces untill the expiration of their pay, which continued almost a moneth : and after he had passed the Appenin, he descended into the con trey of Corregio, taking the way by flow marchings to Concorda. The foundation of this tr. tife or solicitation was to passe the river of Pam, for which effect certaine servaunts of All Carpi consenting to the expedition, had under colour to be marchaunts of come, hyred mil barkes ryding at the mouth of the river of Secchio, and passing in them the river of Paw, Bishop layd his pretence to approch vpon the sudden neare to Ferrara, where for that he bene not many monethes before, he had carefully surueyed one part of the towne vpon the uer side, where fortie sadomes of the wall were downe to the earth, which was a breach sufficie enough to enter. This breach or ruine of wall, for that it was but lately fallen, was not reenford & made up againe fo speedily as appertained, both for that the neighbourhood of the river & $ privation of feare, had nourished securitie & negligence in such as ought to have provided & paired fuch disorders. But whethe rumor ran through the countrey, that the Bishop of Vinten was passed the Appenin with his souldiers, the Marquis of Mantua, though for no partic ! suspirion, yet following his auncient custome to take away all meanes from forreine ball to passe the rivers, retired to Mantua all the barkes that lay in the mouth of Secchio . which accident the Bishop lost the oportunitie and seruice of those barkes which were hy and leffe meane to recouer other fo foone as the necessitie of the expedition required, for the officers for the Church that wete nearest that place, were not made privile to the practise, or it least if they had any inkling, they were without Commission to deale init. In so much that whilest he searcheth with the Agents of Albert some remedie, and reposeth his people about the confines of Corregia, where, by indifcretion he discloseth to some the particularities of his purpole, the Marquis of Mantua sendeth one of his men to impart the intention and discourse of the interprise to the Duke of Ferrara, who doubted so litle of any such matter, that he was hardy induced to beleeue it. Neuertheleffe looking with better eyes into the effate of his daunger, hat part of the wall that was ruinate mouing himmore then any other thing, he began to wage nen of warre: and making as though he had no suspition of the Pope, he advertised him of the inbushes dressed against him by the Bishop of Vintemille, befeeching him to give direction to the ouernours thereabouts to minister succours to him if neede required; a request which was eadily graunted and executed by the Pope by writs and letters in his fauour, notwithstanding e dispatched secretly at the same time commissions to the contrary. The rumour that ranne of ne preparations which were made at Ferrara, ioyned to the difficulties to passe the river of aw, tooke from the Bishop all hope to accomplish his enterprise, by reason whereof he drew vith his armie towardes Concorda: and whilest he treated with those that were within (who ere alreadie entred into suspition against him) to inuade Mirandola, he presented himselfe iddenly in the night before the wals of Concorda, and gaue the affault, to the end to induce a erswasion that he was come into those places not to go to Ferrara, but to impatronise himselfe on Concorda. But this affault as it was in vayne, fo the refidue of the expedition drew with a light effect, for that afterwardes he difinified the most part of his fouldiers: he left many en in opinion, and euen Alfonso himselfe, that if the meane to passe the river of Pam had not ne taken from him, the breach or ruine of the wall that was reuersed, had ministred to him great commoditie to take Ferrara, wherein was not one band nor regiment of men of warre, eDuke extreamely diseased, and the vniuersall people in such discontentment of him, that in accident fo fudden and vnprouided, there were few that would have fought their remedie armes, or offered their bodies to be opposed against such a daunger.

Now followeth the yeare a thousand fine hundred and twentie, wherein the peace of Italie, the same reasons and occasions by the which it had bene preserved the yeare before, tooke Martin Luntinuation and held good. But new doctrines began to spread and increase, first against the au-ther against price of the Church of Rome, and afterwardes against the course of Christian religion. This the Pope. chine tooke beginning in Germanie in the countrey of Saxonie, by the preachings of Mar-

Luther, sometimes of the order of Saint Augustine, who renewed at the first for the most it, the auncient errours of the Bohemians, which being reproued by the vniuerfall Counlof the Church holden at Constance, by whose authoritie were burned lohn Hus and lerome of age, two heads of those heresies, had lyen of log time cotained within the limittes of Bohemia. e cause that newly stirred up these opinions in Germane, was a contempt of the authoritic of :fea Apostolike, which Pope Leo abused too licentiously : he following too much the counsell Lawrence Puccin Cardinall of the title of foure Saints, touching the administration of graces wich the Court of Rome distributesh vpon things spirituali & beneficiall, had dispersed throughthe world without distinction of times or places, most ample indulgences, whereunto he had i ned a power to helpe not onely those that were yet in this life, but also to deliuer the soules the dead out of the paines of Purgatorie. And because it was manifestly knowen that those lulgences were graunted onely to draw money from men, and the same impudently demaundby the Commissaries deputed for that exaction, who had bought of the Popes officers wer to exercise and distribute by sale the sayd indulgences, they had bred in many places reat indignation and many slaunders, and especially in Germanie, where were detected maof his ministers selling for a small price, or set vpon a game attables in a Tauerne, the power redeeme the foules of dead men out of Purgatorie. This indignation tooke also increasing by wher degree of abuse in the Pope, who for the facilitie of his nature managing in many things office of Pope with very litle maiestic, made donation to his fister Magdalene, of the prof and exaction of the indulgences in many quarters of Germanie, and the affigned her Com-Flarie Bilhop Arembauld, a minister worthy such a commission, which he executed with no li: auarice and extortion. And for almuch as it was knowne notoriously through all Germane, that the money that was drawen by these indulgences, were not payed ouer to the Pope north Apostolike Chamber, who haply night have expended some part of it in good vies, but wa transferred indirectly to satisfie the infinite couctous self of a frayle woman, not onely the exaction became detectable and the officers of the same, but also the name and authoritie of him who with so little difference graunted it. Vnder this occasion Luther entred into his controuers as began not only to contemne those indulgences, but also in them to taxe and reprehend the authoritie of the Pope; and drawing to him energy day great numbers of auditors, who rannet heare a matter so well received of the eares of the people, he began to denie and quartell more c penly the authoritie of the Pope.

Of these beginnings haply honest of themselves, ot at least excusable in the greatest par he nourished his occasion and anowed it to be just : and being further caried with ambicio and popular inclination loyned to the special fauour of the Duke of Saxon, he went on ne onely to taxe the power of the Popes and the authoritie of the Church of Rome, but also flanding fill upon the errours of the Bohemians, he began with time to batter the Images of Churche to deprine places Ecclefiallike of their goods, and to permit matiages to Monkes and Nunni professed, confirming his opinion not onely with authoritie and with arguments, but also wit the example of himselfe. He denied that the power of the Pope was extended out of the Bish pricke of Rome, & maintained that enery other Bishop had as much authoritie and power in h particular Diocelle, as the Pope had within the Bishopricke of Rome. He rejected all matters d termined in Councels, all traditions written by those that are called Doctours of the Church, as all Cannons and decrees of Popes, and reduced himselfe onely to the old Testament, to the boo of the Gospels, to the Actes of the Apostles, to all that is coprehended under the name of thene Testament, and to the Epistles of S. Paule: onely he gaue to all these a new sence and interpret tion doubtfull, such as never had bene heard of before. Bur the follie of Luther and his adherer stayed not onely there, but being in effect followed of all Germanie, & running dayly into error more deteffable and daungerous, he came at last to deale with the Sacraments of the Church, to despile fastings, penances, & consessions, yea some of his followers (fuch as some way differ from his opinion) spake matter of blasphemic against the Eucharist. All which things being o ginally reproued by the authoritie of Councels and holy Doctours, have given an entry to new and peruerfeinuentions and interpretations, and going on encreasing and amplifying inn ny places out of the bounds of Germane, for that they containe such propertie of doctrine, the deliuering men from many commaundements established for their safetie by the generall Cer cels of the Church, by the decrees of Popes, by the authoritie of Cannons, and by the found int pretations of holy Doctours, they bring men backe to a maner of life more full of libertie, yea cu according to their own fancie & luft. The Pope laboured in the beginning to quench this peffi rous doctrine, & yethe forbare to vie remedies & medicines proper & couenient to cure fo gre a maladie: for he cited to Rome Martin Luther, he forbad him to preach, and afterwardes his disobedience, he imposed upon him the censures of the Church: but he abstained not from action of many things of ill example, and tuch as being reafonably reproued and blamed by L ther, became very intollerable to all men: for proceeding against him in his intemperancie, w armes spirituall and Ecclesiastike, much lesse that he did diminish, but did augment in the mine of the people, the reputation of Martin, as though those persecutions had taken their beginni of the innocencie of his life and of his found doctrine, rather then upon any other occasion . T Pope lent into Germany many religious men to preach against him, and countenanced them w many letters and writs of credence to Princes and Prelates: but neither that course nor any of meanes which he vied to represe him, served to nothing, by reason of the vniuerfall inclination of the people, and the speciall protection and sauour of the Duke of Saxon being within his in diction. In fo much as the cause of Luther began to seeme enery day in the Court of Rome cary greater importance, & to augment a feare among it them, that there grew not of it some gr domage touching the greatnesse of Popes, the profits of the Court of Rome, & the vinon of Cl stian religion: for which occasion in that yeare were summoned many consistories at Reme, a many confultations affembled in the chamber of the Pope, and many disputations amongst Cardinals and divines specially deputed, to deuise a remedie for such an euill, which tooke incr fing dayly. And albeit there were fome amongst them in this solemne Councell, that sayled no red: duce to the Popes memorie, that the perfecutions which had bin executed against Luther, fince ey were not accopanied with a correctio of things danable in the felues, had increased his repution & good will with the people, and that it had bene a leffe cuill to diffemble the knowledge ffuch a matter, which perhaps would have diffolued of it felie, then by blowing at the brand, make the fire burne more, and cast a greater flame: yet (such is the nature of mortall men to occed with remedies fierce and violent) the perfecutions were not onely redoubled against m and his followers, commonly called Luther ans, but also a wonderfull writ of threatning motion, thundered out against the Duke of Saxon, by the which being so much the more incend and kindled, he became with a greater affection the protectour of his cause: which, for the ace of many yeares went multiplying so farre, that there was great danger least the residue of briftedome were not infected with the contagion. But there is nothing that so much hath restraidhis course as the knowledge that men tooke that the followers of his doctrine, did no lesse pugne the imperie & power of Princes temporall, then were most enemies to the authority of Popes of Rome; a reason which hath moued manie Princes for their proper interests, to laur with studie and severity to keepe out of their realmes and principalities that contagion: And the contrary, albeit those errours have bene many times at the point to confound and fall, both the immoderate intemperancie of their heads and chieftaines, and for the diverfity and contraty of opinions among st their disciples, yet there is no one thing that so much hath entertained d continued the obstination of them, as the licencious libertie which the people have gotten their maner of living, together with the conetousnesse of great men, who would not suffer the privation of those portions of goods which they occupied of the Churches. There hapned nothing this yeare worthy of memory, fauing that Iohn Paule Baillon, and Gen-

one of the same samilie, being at Perousa, fell at quarrell betweene themselves, for that

m Paule being not content that he had the greatest part & authority in the government, sought ubiect the whole, in which ambition he chased Gentill out of Perousa: for which violence the pe being not a litle grieued, cited him to appeare personally at Rome, but searing some dauntohis person, he forbare to go thither, but sent Malatesta his sonne with his iultifications, & protest his ready obedience to the Pope and all his commandements. Neuerthelesse the Pope lting still upon his personallappearance, after the passion of many doubts and perplexities, he sresolued at last to go to Rome, being caried partly with confidence in his ancient merits and ices done in all times to his house, and partly ouer-ruled by the perswasions of Camilla V rsin some in law with other his friends, who both extended their authority and applyed all other anes they could to the Pope for his fafetie: of whom they obtained promife under his fidelity expresse assurance (though not set downe in writing, but pronouced with the Popes mouth h great arte) vnder confidence whereof he willed them to encourage him to appeare, ich they accomplished under warrant of assurance from them that he might do it in fasety. t when he was come to Rome, he found the Pope under colour of his recreation according to cultome, gone a few dayes before to the Callle S. Angelo, whither lohn Paule going the morg following to present himselse to him, he was before he came there, made prisoner by the Draine of the Castle: afterwards he was rigorously examined by Indges assigned, to whom in misery he confessed, that he had comitted many grieuous faults, as well for the conservation of unie, as to continue his disordered pleasures, and to observe his other interest particular: for which, after he had bene prisoner more then two moneths, he was beheaded according to the inance and sentence of the law: it was beleeved that the Pope was induced to this punish- The Pope exeit, for that he discerned in the warre of Vrbin by many signes, that Iohn Paule bare a mind e- cuteth Iohn nged from him, that he had entertained conspiracies with Franciscomaria, and that he could Paule Baillon. in all accidents affure himselfe of him, and consequently so long as he was at Perousa, he old make no foundation of that estate. The children of Iohn Paule associated heard of the aining of their father, fled from the malice of the Pope, who to readdresse the government Perou/a according to his fancy, gaue that legation to Syluio Cardinall of Cortono, his fernant, of his ancient bringing vp: he restored Gentill into Perousa, to whom he gaue the goods ch loba Paule had possessed, and so resting upon a soundation and subject verie weake, he verted into him all greatnesse and reputation. In like fort this yeare, the Pope, who attribunote to fortune or want of discretion then to any other operation, the losse and miscarying of the Bishop of Vintemille, beganne to enforce new ambushes against the Duke of Ferrara, 1 the meane and working of Hubert Gambaro the Apostolike pronotatie: to him one Rodoli Captaine of certaine bands of Launceknights which Alphonso held for his garde, had promise to put into his hands at his pleasure, the entrie of the gate of the castle Tralto, whither the fould ers that were to be fent from Bologma and Modena, having no meane to come without paffir the riner of Paw, but by the woodden bridge which is before that gate, direction was given Guido Rangon and the Gouernour of Modena to affemble a certaine crue of fouldiers vnd fomeother colour, and to go make a surprise of that gate, and to defend it vntill were arrived to others that were to come from Bolognia and Modena: but the day to execute the enterprise w no sooner determined upon, then it was discouered that Rodolph, to whom by the Popes ore nance were given about two thousand duckets by Hubert Gambaro, had fro the beginning conmunicated all the conspiracie to Alfonso, who, after he was well informed and affured of the Pop intention and his purposes, stopped the further course and passage of things, and revealed to men the deceit of Rodolph.

voluntarily to have conference with the king of England, with whom he found good agreeme from Flaunders he went into Germany, where he received in the moneth of October at Aix, I ing a citie of fame and renowme for the ancient relidencie and sepulcher of Charlemaine, 1 first Crowne, which is as men say, the selfe same Crowne with the which (harlemaine was ce brated: it was delinered to him according to old observation, by the authority of the Princes Germany: but that felicity was troubled with new accidents happing in Spaine, which grew ve this occasion: The populars and universall multitudes of that kingdome, were not a litle agrici with his promotion to the Empire, as knowing that to the great incommodity and harme ofth all, he should for fundry occasions be constrained to spend the most part of his time out of Spai but the principall cause of that discontentment and stirre, was the generall hatred they I Commessions in conceined against the conetousnesse of such as gouerned him, especially against M. de Cheur who expressing defires insatiable, had raked together by many means a great masse of treasu by whose example the other Flemmings were caried by humours couetous, selling for rea money to strangers those offices and magistracies, which were wont to be bestowed upon S niards, and made vendible all other graces, priviledges, favors & expeditions of Court: infomi as al mens minds being inflamed against the name of the Flemmings; the people of the vale of () began to draw into rebellion, at fuch time as the Emperour departed; and immediatly after her cone out of Spaine, all the peoples of any prouince what foeuer gathered into commotion, no gainst their king as they protested, but to suppresse the couctousnesse of his wicked governou and after they had communicated together their counfels, they would no more obey the ki officers, but of themselues set downe a forme of gouernement, dressed by the vniuersal counsel the multitude, which they called La fanta Giant a: firch is the name they give to the vninerfal o fell of the popular fort. The Captaines and kings officers tooke armes against them, and so this being reduced to a manifelt warre, the diforders increased by so many degrees, that the Empl held amongst them a verie small authority: the same being the cause that aswell in Italy asou Italy, the hope of those increased, who defired the diminution of such a greatnesse. Neuerthel ashis armie by sea had won yponthe Moores the Ile of Gerbes, so in Germany the reputation the French king had bene fornewhat embased: for, the king to nourish the troubles of Germi fauored in that Province the Duke of Wittemberg, who was difagreeing fro the league of Suan which thing, his peoples finding and feeling to their damage and harme, they chased him by fe out of his elfate, and after they had wonne his living vponhim, they fold it to the Emper whom they knew to be desirous to pull downe the factioners of the French king: the Emper bound himselfe to defend them in all oppressions whatsoeuer, insomuch as the Duke seeingh felfe reduced to hope in the succors of the French, was constrained to have his recourse to the mency of the Emperour, and to receive of him fuch lawes as was his pleafure to affigne, not be for all that restored to the possession of his Dukedome.

This feare was made greater in the Pope, for that the fouldiers refused the flets made to them by him and the Viceroy of Naples to entertaine part of them in pay & to diribute money to the refidue: but these offers raised the so much the more into courage, & made éto march towards the river of Tronto, not keeping the straight way of Capinai, but spreading ier the large way of Powilla: the refort of other fouldiers joyning with them dayly, together ith certaine companies of horsemen increased more & more the humor of this searc. In mentierous feare is a ready impression, and for the time carieth the mind in contemplations of peril & nunger: neuerthelesse, this emotion tooke end both with more expedition & more facility then as expected, fince affoone as they had passed Tronto to enter into the marke of Ancona whither ePope had fent strength of fouldiers; & incamping before Repatransono, they were compelled retire for the great losse of men they had sustained in a fierce assault they gaue to the souldiers thin Ripotransono: an accident so prejudiciall to their valour and reputation, that they accepted llingly of the Emperours officers conditions of farre leffer qualitie then fuch as they had reied before.

ve Leo is the cause that the peace continueth not in Italy. He ioyneth in league with the Emperor waisift the French king. The French king looseth the Duchie of Millan. Pope Leo dieth. Adrian he sixt is created Pope. Francis Sforce reentreth upon the Duchy of Millan. Warre is made v Tuscane by Ranse de Cere.

Bout the beginning of the yeare 1521 was reappeafed that former litle flirre, touching the which mens minds suffered more seare by a fresh recordation and memoric of those bands of Spanish footmen that inuaded the state of Vrbm, the for any other cause bearing either reason, likelihood or probabilitie of tertour: but as one warre draweth on another, like to disease, that redouble in bodies ill disposed, so, not many moneths after, Italy began estioones to be vexed with watres of greater perill, of longer continuance, & of more importance then were all the other quarrels had passed afore: wherin the ambition of two most mighty kings, pussed vp with mutual ieaies, harreds, and deepe suspitions, drew them on to make exercise of all their power and forces

e parts and bowels of Italy, which having searcely breathed three yeares in peace (and yet aless sull of doubt and suspition) it seemed that in the powers of heaven, destinie and fortune, waid up either a manifest enuie of their tranquilitie, or esse a supersticious seare that vnder the esse to rest & concord, those regions would estsoones returne to their ancient selicitie & greatesses. Such personages were the beginners of these new emotions, as albeit they had faire more usest then all others to procure the preservation of the peace, yet generally & severally they trouleit more then any others, and by their industrie and authority, sought to kindle the fire, which they ought to have quenched with their proper blood, if other remedies had not sufficed. For no withstanding the hard moods and inclinations betweene Cafar and the French king grew incre fing continually, yet there was no cause at all to push them on so fast to make present warre, no ther did the one fo farre exceed the other in Italy, either with force or friends, or any other prope ty of aide, that they were able to offend one another without the fauours oportunities, and mea of the Italian Princes: for that as the French king had no reason to seare any vexation of C far, neither touching the kingdome of Naples, norforany quarell of Germany, both haui the Venetians conjoyned with him for the defence of Millan, and in the Swiffers remaini no more readinesse to make warres in their owne names, but stood onely disposed to see as fouldiers to who focuer would minister pay to them: fo also he had no meane to offend Cel in the realme of Naples, vnleffe the Pope were concurrant with him in the action, who flood licited by them both by many offers and meanes to be their friend: insemuch as it was beleeve that if the Pope continuing indifferent betweene them, were carefull to temper and raunge w his high authority, and fidelity of a newter, their difdaines and quarrels, and to cut off and Hopt passage of their troublesome counsels, the peace would easily be preserved without violation: a there was not discerned any apparant cause why he should seeke to incense the warre, both that he had with ill speed broken out into armes before, and withall, considering the greatne of those two Princes, it stood him vpon to keepe an indifferent searc of the victory of either them, fince it was evidently seene into, that whether of them so uer prevailed in that warre, co not be stayed fro subjecting to his obedience all the regions of Italy. The Pope possessed in pe and great obedience the large estate of the Church, and Rome; and his whole Court flourist wonderfully under him in plentifull happinesse and selicitie: he had full authority ouer the state Florence, which in those times was a state mightie in people, pollicie, and riches: he was nature inclined to ease and pleasures, and therfore made it an offence to his liberty & greatnesse, to he speake of suits and affaires: his custome was to consume the day in hearing of Musicke, in see stage-playes, and trifling with scoffers and iesters; so that being more esteminate then was eit convenient or comely, it seemed he should be altogether estranged from the warre. Besides as was full of gracious liberalities and magnificencie, such as might be tearmed wonderfull, thou he had diffeended by long fucceffion from great kings, fo he had not only by his incredible pre galities and distributions without discretion or distinction consumed the treasures gathered Intio, but also having exacted an infinit quantity of mony of the expeditions of the Court, & m new forts of offices invented to raife gaine, he had wasted all so excessively, that he was stille strained to studie meanes and deuiles to entertaine those immoderate expences which grew, creafing with the vanity of his disposition; he had no deuotion to make great any of his houl kindred: & though he was possessed with a vehement desire to recour Parma & Plaisance no lesseambition to reduce to him the estate of Ferrara, yet he thought them not causes suf ent to remoue him from his pleasures, nor to reverse the peaceable condition of things, bu his delights & fecurity he held it better to temporize & expect oportunities and occasions: right trulie is it spoken, that there is no greater enemy to great men, then too great prosperity " that it takes from them all rule of them selues, it makes them full of liberty, it gives them bolde ss innouations and new things. Lee being thus lifted to so high estate, suffered to be bred in him many considerations: so times he faw what infamy it broughtto him to loose Parma & Plassance gotten by Iulia 1 fo great glory, and to that mood was joyned his burning defire to aduaunce the action of Fe ra: fometimes he seemed to see that if he dyed without doing something of importance, the mory of his Pontificacy would remaine dishonoured: sometimes he feared least those two (they both being excluded out of hope to have him on their fide, and therfore leffe able to of one another) would grow at last to contract betweene themselues some league prejudicial ding to the ruine of the Church & the refidue of Italy: fometimes he hoped (as I have heare Cardinall de Medicis say, who knew all his secrets) that the Frechmenbeing chased out of & Millan, he might the more easily expulse Cafar out of the kingdome of Naples, & so appro ate to himself the glory of the liberty of Italy, to the which his predecessor had so maniscally red:an enterprise which by how much lesse he thought he was able to accomplish by his pr

prees, by so much more did he hope, by appeasing somwhat the mind of the French king, either y the election of some Cardinall whom he would preferre, or by his readinesse to gratiste him in ome other matters, to draw him to give him fuccors against Cafar, as though it were a fatisfactin to the king to fee that as much was done to Cafar as to him. Thefe were his conceptions, fuch vere the discourses of his mind, and in these variations did he fashion the image of things : but which foeuer of these causes moued him, whether one, or more, or all together, he took viito him ew impressions, & turned all his thoughts to the war, & to ioyne himselfe with one of these two rinces, to the end that being allied with the one, he might moue war in Italy against the other: for a declaration of his readinesse to the matter, as also not to be oppressed in the meane while y either of them; whilest he negociated with them both, but more straitly and particularly with e French king: he fent into Swifferland Anth. Puccio Bishop of Pestoyo, and afterwards Cardiall to leavie and leade to the service of the Church fixe thousand Swiffers: an armie which beg delivered to him without difficulty by the Cantons, under the favour of the confederation, hich fince the warre of Urbin he had renued with them, and having likewise got liberty of palge through the estate of Mullan, was conducted upon the lands and dominions of the Church. here he entertained them manie moneths, aswell in Romagnia, as in la Marqua. Many were vnrtaine to what ends he made so great & chargeable a leauie of men, & not to imploy the, seeg there was no stirre or alteration in Italy: & albeit he affured the regions & Potentacies of the me that he hadarmed them for his proper furety, for that he knew well that the rebels of the hurch conspired some violent action against him: yet, the murmure of the people being not fafied, for that his reasons bare smal resemblace with truth me discoursed severally vpo it accorng to their seuerall fancies: some supposed that he called in those forces for scare of the French ig, others beleeved that he would imploy them against Ferrara, & some thought that he wold me the against Cefar to chase him out of the kingdome of Naples. But the practise that was retbetweene him and the French king, was, that they shold with their joynt forces inuade the redome of Naples, under this condition, that Caietta and all that flood betweene the river of willan, and the confines of the Ecclesiastike state, should be for the Church, and the residue of realme to reuert to the second sonne of Fraunce, who, vntill he came to the age of majority ould be gouerned together with the kingdome by a Legate Apostolicall, that should lie resider Naples. Moreouer, it was an article in the capitulation, that the king snould aid him against the siects and freeholders of the Sea Apostolike, which was a condition affixed for the better afing of that which the Church held already, and no leffe tending to the defire which the Pope to get Ferrara.

In these times, and in verie goodseason for those practises, the French king no lesse taking the tasio of the tumults of Spaine, the observing the persuasions of the Pope (which he afterwards ared by complaints) sent out an army into the kingdome of Nauarre under M. d'Asperot there to Lawreeh, to range that kingdome and reduce it to his ancient king, requiring at the seinstant Robert de la Marche and the Duke of Guelders, to breake out & vexe the confines saunders. The seditions of Spaine were the cause that M. d'Asperot made an easie conquest he kingdome of Nauarre, both being destitute of succours, and also not without a great merie and deuotion to their original and ancient king; for, after he had forced with his artilleries casses of Pampeluna, he entred the frontiers of the kingdome of Catelognas, and tooke Fonta-Fontaraly take y, tunning up even to Logrogna: of this enterprise it happed, as often times comment to passe by the French, unaine things, that that which men thought would have brought preside & harme to Ce-turned greatly to his service and benefits for the matters of Spanne being travelled till that time ewith diverse adventures & fortunes, were now reduced into verie great perplexities & trous, for that on the one side, the multitude and popular fort were banded together, and on the one side many Nobles & Barons had taken armes for the service of Cesarthey, for the interest of restates, seared the popular libertie, being now cometo a manisos strengthen, and the rather to eit governed by a head of authority, they had drawne out of the castle of Sciatina the Duke Salabria, whose sidelity made him resule to come out of prison, because he would not be are as against Casar thus tuch is the affection & ofscience of mentowards their natural country, such the perpetual custome of country-men when they see invasions made by forraine forces, civill quarrels cannot take from them the feeling of common and forraine dangers; for when the Spaniards faw the armies of France make flaughter and hostility vpon their countrey, not withstanding they had suffered the losse of the realme of Nauarre, being a member of their do minions by the vniting which the king Catholike made, they felt themselves so touched in consc ence and affection, that partly forthole regards, and partly for a happie encounter which the at mie of Cafar had made, they became men converted and returned to the obedience of their king leaving suppressed and forgotten, their domisticall hatreds and contentions.

After this easie conquelt of the realme of Nauarre, there hapned to the king a farre great fuccesse if he could have vsed the occasion: for, as both he and Casar had theit Embassadors will the Swiffers, foliciting feuerally that nation to stand with them, fo the Cantons did not one refuse (contrarie to the opinion of many, and against the hope that was given) the friendship & c fers of Cafar, but also embraced the alliance of the French king, binding themselues to furnish f his service so many footmen as he would and for what enterprise it pleased him, and not to suff anie leauies of fouldiers for anie other against him. There rested the execution of the capitulation made at Rome betweene the Pope and the king, who, when he was required to ratifie it, began to temporize and dwell in suspence, being aductifed by many, that there was no expectation furetie in the Pope, in whom was no opinion of fidelity and confidence, & who, fince he was po fessed of the dignity and place of Pope, had alwayes made declaration of small friendship towar the French: that it was to be feared that his doings were intangled with futtletie and deceit, fin there was no congruency of reason that the Pope shold defire the dinoluing of the realme of N ples into his power, or to the inheritace of his son, for that by how much more jurisdiction the Fre should have in the kingdome of Naples and the Duchy of Mullan, by so much lesse would be furcty of the Pope amid a power so mighty and redoubted: that so great a shew of amitie bre king our upon such a sodaine, could not be without mysterie: that the tokens of deceit that a peared, warned him to take heed, that under the practife to conquer the kingdome of Naples, fell not into the fnares laid for him to loofe the Duchy of Millatfor that to fend his army into N ples, was none other thing then to give power and oportunitie to the Pope with his fixe thousa Swiffers to breake it, and put all to extreame hazard, which being overthrowne, there remain no defence for the Duchie of Millan: an estate which (as he knew) the Pope had failed to ta from him by armes and warre, fo it was to be feared that he would affay to deprive him of it treacherie and deceit. These reasons so wrought with the king, that they made him doubts to ratifie the capitulation, and therefore expecting haply an answer of some other practites, fent no dispatch of the ratification to Rome, but left the Popes Embassadors in suspence. But! that the Pope either in deed (not with flanding his fliewes & femblances) had his mind elfrang from the king, or (for that all the tearmes and dates to answer being past) he began to suspect truth: or haply for that he feared least the king would discouer to Cafar his practises, and so so: alliance to passe betweene them to his prejudice : or it might be, he was pushed on by a vehem ambition to recouer Parma and Plasfance, and to do some thing worthie of memorie : or last perhaps he might take to displeasure the insolcracie of Monsieur de Lawtrech and the Bishor Tarba his minister, who contemning his commandements in the estate of Millan, and reject some Ecclefialticall edicts, disdained him with verie proud and insolent words: for some of the causes he determined to enter league against the French king with Casar, who also for his pr being kindled for the warte of Nauarre, and pushed on by many of the exiles of Millan, & k ly, induced by some of his counfell defiring to embase the greatnesse of M. de Cheures, whol alwayes perswaded him not to separate himselfe from the French king, resolued to joyne con deration with the Pope against the king: which he was thought to hasten the more, under a he that with the Popes authority & his owne, he should either diminish or dissolue the alliance me with the Swiffers, afore it were confirmed by bonds and other offices of gratifications, Moreou the Pope tooke greater occasion of considence in this, that Casar, who had heard Martin I ther in the Parliament of Wormes, whither he was come under his fafeconduct, and having p confederation fed him to be examined by many Dinines, who made report that his doctrine was erronious & gerous for Christendome, had banished him to gratifie the Pope; onely at last there was cont cted between Cofar & the Popea cofederatio for their comon defence, including also the fan of Medicis & th'effate of Florence: this league was resolved without the privity of M.de Chem, who til that time had borne with him right great place & authority, & died almost eue at the sa me. There were all othese additions to the contract, that they shold raise war against the state of Millan at fuch time and in fuch maner, as should be resolved upon betweene them; and if it were abdued and conquered, then Parma and Plaisance to reuert to the Church under the fame ghts and titles with the which it had holden them before: That Francis Sforce, who had bene haled out of Millan and remained then at Trent, should be est soones restored to the posseson of that state, as having right thereunto by the inucstiture of his father, and by the renuntiaon of his brother: That the confederates should be bound to defend him in his title: That the Duchie of Millan should vse no other Saltes nor Saltpits then those of Cerma: That it should ot onely belawfull to the Pope to proceede against his subjects and freeholders, but also Cair to be bound (after the conquest of Mullan) to joyne with him against them, and namely for ne recouerie of Ferrara. The tribute of the Realme of Naples was increased, and there was proised to the Cardinall of Medicis a pension of ten thousand duckats out of the Archbishoprike Toledo, which was newly voyde: and to Alexander de Medicis bastard son to Lawrence and tely Duke of Vrbin, was promised an estate in the dominion of Naples of ten thousand ducits of revenue.

For the more plaine information and opening of these things, it is not out of purpose to set The titles of owne in briefe what were the rights that Cafar pretended the Empire to have vpon the Duchy the Empire to Millim in those times. The Lawiers of the Empire alleaged, that the ancient rights of the Dukes the Ducky of Orleance were of no confideration, for that what loeuer had bene accorded touching the fuc-Millan. shon of Madame Valentina, was not confirmed with the authority Imperiall: and that for the efent, that Duchy appertained immediatly to the Empire, because the inuestiture made to Lowike Storce for him and his fonnes, was renoked by Maximilian graundfather to Charles, and at with so many and ample clauses that the renocation had indicially his effect to the prejudice iefly of his fons, who neuer possessing it, their right and title was in hope, & not in effect. Theree the inuestiture was anailable that was made to king Lowis, for him and for his daughter Clawin case the were maried to Charles, and with condition that the mariage not going forward thout that there were fault in Charles, it should be nothing, and that the Duchy of Millan ould passe directly to Charles, who in that case was invested of it in the presence of his father with That it followed thereupon that the fecond inuestiture made to the same king Lowis, for nand for the same Lady Clanda, and for Francis Lord of Angoulesme, was nothing worth, as ng made to the prejudice of Charles then an infant and under the tutos ship of Maximilian: so it as the king then raigning could make no foundation of that, to he could leffe alleage interest hat Duchy by new rights or titles, for that much leffe that he had obtained in uestiture from the iperour, seeing he had not so much as demanded it, as also it was manifelt, that the selsion made him by Maximilian at such time as he rendred to him the Castell of Millan, could not helpe 1: for that a chiefe aliened of proper authority, renerteth immediately to the supreame Lord: dlaftly, for that Auximilian Sforce, notwithstanding he had bene admitted by the confent he Emperour, and dying in that estate without having ever received the investiture, he could transport to another the rights that appetrained not to himselfe. Thus assoone as the confederon was passed between the Pope and Casar against the French king, and that as secretely as gainst the the be, they consulted together (afore they entred publikely into armes) to proceede by am-French king. hes and practifes, and by the meane of the exiles, to affaile at one time by fudden inuation, the chy of Mullan and Genes. In which counfell it was fet downe, that Cafars gallies which were Vaples, and the Popes gallies armed with two thousand Spanish footemen, should fall at vnes into the port of Genes, and having withthem Ierome Adorno, by whose authority and ne of followers, those of the rivers which were of their faction drawing into commotion, they ed that that Citie would eafily fall into tumult. On the other fide Francis Sforce and me Oloron, who was with him at Trent with many of the best fort of the exiles, had coned that the French bands that were within Parma, Plaisance, and Cremona, should be charat vinwares: that the like inuafion should be made at Millan by Manfrey Paluoism and tto de Brinzs a chiefe commaunder in those mountaines, who should leade thither by the of Coma certaine Launceknights, and fo to execute that city, where they were affured to have et intelligence. Moreouer if those enterprises tooke good successe, or any of the being of most

fecretly to Reggia where should meete them Ieronimo Moron at the day appointed, should dia into a firength, and rife to enter into that state, lenying with all possible diligence a campe of this Franch Guic-thousand footemen: for the better effect and expedition of those actions, the Pope sent to Fran eis Guicciardin an ancient gouernour of Modena and Reggia, ten thousand duckats, to be delin red ouer to Moron for the entertaining offootmen to be ready vpon the euent of things, to who Guicciardin was commanded to shew fauour, but secretly and in such maner, that the French kir should take no occasion either to complaine of the actions of his Officers, or euill interpret the Pope: But so vnperfect are the counsels and deuises of man, and so naturally subjected to a prot dence infallible and immutable, that there is left no certainty of their resolutions, and lesse surety their mortall doings, themselves being no other thing then bodies compounded of imperfection es error and frailty: not one of these deutles succeded either to purpose or to profit: for, the army feathat went to Genes, which was compounded of seuen gallies, foure Brigantins, and certain ships of other nature, made a vaine shew aforethe port, for that Duke Fregosa, doubting belof their comming, had well manned and refurnished the towne: insonuch as they crossed far and retired into the river of Leuant, after they found no mutinies not any other thing well diff fed on their behalfe. And touching Lombardy, many of the exiles having special privity with negociation there, together with the voyce that Ierom Moron wasto come to Reggia, Federik Boffolo having intelligence of it, went to Millan to give fignification to M. d'Efeud, supplying i place of his brother who a little before was gone into Fraunce. By reason of these aduertisemer he mustered and drew together the bands of men at armes that lay dispersed in diuerse places, after he had given order that Federsk should leade thither a thousand footemen of his subjects. wentfuddenly to Parma with foure hundred launces. In the way he was from time to time in: more certaine of those things which Federsk had reported to him, the rather for that the banish men, not observing the order that was given them to make their assemblies secret, were in an pen force withdrawne to Reggia: They required in all places bands of foldiers, & gaue out in pu like & manifelt rumors, that they would immediatly attempt some new enterprise: in whose ample & maner of proceeding, continued lerom Moron that came after them, pushed on peth with this reason, that by how much they did disclose themselnes and their enterprise, by some syould it breede harred & enmity betweene the Pope and the French king. But the vanity of the deuises and enterprises declared it selse manifestly to all men : and yet M. d'Escud being arri at Parma, determined the morning following (a day folemne for the nativity of S. lohn Baptifi present himselfe afore the gates of Reggia: he hoped in this maner of action to find occasio to t either allor part of the exiles, and that either as they fled out of the towne through the feare. attorishment of his comming, or else there being no strength of forraine souldiers, the seare of gouernour (a personage estranged from the profession of war) would put them prisoners into hands: or lastly he hoped that under the terror which the towns inen would have of his forces: fudden comming, the occasion & fauor of the time would give him leave to enter without diffe ty. The gouernour made some doubt of the matter, and albeit (the assailing of Genes being not come to his knowledge (he thought it not likely, that M. d'Escud would give beginning to war without the commandement of his king, & enter in warlike maner vpon the lands of the Pc yet looking into the ordinary furies and importunities of the french nation, as also to be some armed against a mischiese so apparantly threatned, he sent out his present directions to Gi Rangon lying vpo the confines of Modena, to come the fame night to Reggia, giving the like of that those bands of footmen leuied by Moron, & lodged nearest that place, should likewise me thither. And lastly his precepts went out to the people of the towne, in whom he knew was no perty of affection to the French name, that at the founding of the great bell, they should be at gard of the gates, where eucry one should receive his charge. The morning solowing M. a'E arrived with foure hundred launces. Federike de Bossolo marching a mile behind him with a th fand footmen. Assoone as M.d'Escud approched the towne, he sent to the gouernour a Capu of his, called M. Bonneuall, to tell him that he would speake with him: by whom it was agree affigned, that Efcud should come to the posterne that entreth ypon the raueline of the gates looketh towards Parma, where the gouernour would meete him, either one affuring other of t faith, M. & Escud according to the appointment came neare the gate accompanied with m Gentleme of his traine, & the governor issuing out of the wicket, they began to comune toget

he one complained, that contrary to the articles of confederation, there was received & telegued the townes of the Church, the exiles & banished peoples which were drawne into companies & ands to trouble the states of the king: The other expressed a griefe & vukindnesse, that there was ade sudden invasion in manifest array of warre and force vpon the lands of the Church. But as rey flood debating those complaints, certaine of the inhabitants (cotrary to the order set downe) pened suddenly one of the gates, to let in a cart loden with meale : when M. Bonnenall standing ght against the gate (for the traine of Escud dispersed about the wals environed a great part of it) fuanced with certaine men at armes to enter the gate : but he was repulsed, and the gate shur on him with a cry, which piercing even to the place where Monfieur Efeud and the governour infulted together, it was the cause that they of the towne and certaine of the exiles standing by oupes vpon the wals of the Arch, gaue the bullet to fuch as flood nearero Monfieur a Ejoud, Idin that violence so hurt Alexander Trumlee, that he died of the wounds within ten dayes, alough he had not deserved the stroke of such a calamitie, for that he had diffwaded the enrprise of Reggia. The terror of this sudden violence made the others lecke safety by flying, d no other thing preferued Monfieur d'Escud, but a feare that he had who aymed and leuclied him, least he should strike the Gouernour. This astonished not a little Monsieur d'Escud, ho tooke occasion of the violence, to complaine of infidelitie and faith breaking, and accorng to the face of his perill, not knowing what refolution to take, whether to tary or to flie, the ouernour tooke him by the hand, and perswading him to follow him vpon his faith, heled n vponthe Arch, being accompanied with none other of his traine then Monsieur la Motte, a entleman of Fraunce. It was a thing wonderfull that all the bands of men at armes understanng that Monsieur d'Escud was entred within the gate, were possessed forthwith with an opinion the was made prisoner; a conceipt which made them fall to flying with such generall feare confusion, that many of them call away their launces, refusing (to make the more light & casie flye) the weapons which they brought to defend their lives: fuch a matter is feare, that oftennesit makes men forfake the things that they ought most to employ for their safety. In this " nfused seare, there were sew that eithenlooked backe, or once taried for Monsieur d'Escud," 10 finding after long reasoning, that the disorder grew upon his owne people, was immediatdismissed of the Gouernour, in whom was no intention to keepe him retained, both for not filing his faith given, and also to observe the commissions he had of the Pope to make no viot demonstration against the king: as also in regard that the effect of the rebelling of the estate Millan did not follow, as many beleeued at that time: for, not with standing the troupes of men armes fell all to flying, yet feeing no men purfued the chafe for that there were then within ggia very few horlemen, and withall meeting vpon the limits and confines of the countrey of zgra with Federike Boffolo who halted to march on with his regiments of a thousand footnen, y flayed and drew the selectiones into order. Neither had the feare continued that was benat Parma and at Millan by the first rumors that came, that Escud was holden prisoner, and the nat armes broken, notwithstanding it had hene knowne that the bands of men at armes had whole, for that neither was there neare at hand any army or force to make any stirre, and withmany other Captaines of men at armes were there remaining. But affoone as M.d' E/cud had tlembled his companies of horfmen and footmen, he retired to Coriaque a village in the coun-1 of Reggia not fixe miles from the City: from thence within certaine dayes after, he withdrew he confines of Parma on the other fide the river of Lenzo, and fent la Motte to the Pope to tell what moved him to go to Reggia, and withall to folicite him in vertue of the capitulations' ich were betweene the French king and him, to expulse out of the dominions of the Church, has were holden rebels against the king.

About this time there happened at Willan a matter of no lesse wonder then feate, which Lightning ught to the Frenchmen no imall aftonishment, as if the heavens by manifest signes had given on the castell m a forewarning of their calamities to come . For, vpon the day that is folemnely confectated of Millan, he memory of the death of the Prince of Apollles, the Sunne being fet, and the aire and firmaat cleare, there fell downe fro the uppermost regiments as it were a fire, & light afore the gate he Caltle, whither were brought many barrels of gunpowder drawne out of the Caltle to be to certaine places offeruice. This flash or fiery lightning embraced by and by the powder ha horrible novle, and by the violence of it the faire tower of marble builded ouer the gate and bearing upon his top a goodly clocke, was cast downe and rased from the top to the sounds tion: in which furie did communicate also the wals and chambers of the Castel, with other buil dings adioyning the tower: yea in one instant all the whole bedie of the Castell, tegethe with the universall City of Mellan trembled and shaked with the furie of so reging a tenget which blew into the ayre from fundry places many huge and great flones, falling to the lutter many persons. And as in a generall calamity eucry one bath his fortune, so there were many th being happie to escape the fall of the huge stones, were made wretched by the ruines of the wal under the which they were smoothered and rammed to death; with which ruines, the Cafe greene was fo spred and covered, that it was a terror to behold such an alteration, but specially brought astonishment even to the most assured, to see the stones of incredible greatnesse which it fury of the tempelt had calt more then 500 pales from the place. It happened in the very low wherein the people of all forts were gone for their recreation to take the ayre vpon the greene, which occasion were flaine more then fine hundred footemen of the Castle, and the Captaine the Rocke and the Castell, together with others of principall place so amazed and desperate bot in courage and counsell, that if the people would have taken the benefite of that accident an falne to armes, they might without difficulty that night haue occupied the Caffell, specially f

After the Pope was aduertised how Monsieur d'Escud was come even to the gates of Reggi. he scrued his turne of that enterprise, and enforced it to the justification of his owne actions, I complained greatly of that doing in the confiltory of Cardinals, where, concealing the confeder tion made fecretly afore with Cafar, and also the direction that both their gallies should be asme to the affailing of Genes, he declared that fince Monfieur d'Efend had attemped to take Reggia, wasto be supposed that the French king bare no good mind to the sea Apostolike: he conclude that for the defence of the Church and the rights of the same, he was constrained to joyne wi Cafar, in whom had neuer bin different any action that was not worthy a Christian Prince, & t same expressed as well in his other operations, as in his late zeale which he published at Worm touching the protection of religion. Therefore he made semblance, and show to contract the with Don John Emanuell Cafars Embassador, the confederation which had bin concluded afore, for that matter he caused to be sent for to Rome, Prosper Colonno, vpon whom was determined t charge of the enterprise, and with whom they consulted in what maner and with what forces, th should enter into open war, seeing they had found no successe in ambushes and assaults sudde like as indeede the treatie of Coma did no more happily succeed then the enterprise of Genes: se as Manfroy Palnoysin and M. de Brinzi were by night, drawne neate the wals of Coma with & footmen, aswell Italians as Launceknights, hoping that Anthony de Rusquo a Citizen there wot breake downe fo much of the wall next joyning to his house, as they should have meane to ent where, for the flender strength of Frenchmen that were there, they supposed would be offered refishance. And after they had expected some good space of time, the governour of the place, fembling together all the Frenchmen, with certaine of the town fmen, whose fidelity he held me affured (& yet their numbers were lesse then they that were without) gaue the charge vpon the with a violence and fuddennesses for terrible, that they brake and fell easily into slight, not with suspition that he had corrupted the Almaine Captaines both with mony and greater promises. the chafe three barkes were funke upon the lake, & feuen taken: many of the general fouldiers! into the fortune of prisoners and amongst the chiefetaines were taken Matto & Manfrey as the fled by the way of the mountaines. The Launceknights were suffered to go away freely, & the fidue were led to Millan, where Manfroz & Whatto were publikely quartered. They conteffee their execution, that Bar. Ferrery of Milian a man of place and authority, was confenting to practifes of Moron: vpon which accusation he was in prisoned together with his sen, & so ce mitted to the fame punishment, for that he had not reucaled that Moren had induced him by cret messages, to practise innouations, and to raise enterprises against the king. About this time, Pope knowing of what oportunity was the estate of Mantua for the wars of Limbardy, tooke his pay Federik Marquis of Mantua with 200 men at armes, & 200 light horsemen, and indu of Manua for him with the title of Captaine General of the Church: but before he possessed himselse of the tertainement of the Pope, he renounced the order of S. Michaell, and returned the coller and I figne that the king accustomed to give to those that were received into that order.

This was the resolution set downe at Rome between the Pope and Cafars Embassador, touhing the order and maner of proceeding in this warre, and that according to the countell & rea- for the warre ons of Prosper Colonno: Fitst, that along the frontiets of the Church, inuatio should be made with Il speed possible upon the estate of Millan, employing in that enterprise the companies of men at Frenchmen, rmes of the Pope & the Florentins; a regiment which (comprehending the bands of the Marquis f Maneua) mounted to the ful number of fix hundred men at armes, & to them were to be adjoyed all the bands of men at armes which Cafar had in the realme of Naples, being almost as may as the refidue: That there should be leuied fix thousand footmen Italians: That the regiment fewo thouland footinen Spanish which were with Adorno in the river of Genes should come to nearmy, making their affembly betweene the countrey of Modena and Reggia: That the Marquis f Pefquiero should bring two thousand other footbands from Naples: That there should be leied of the common purile of the Pope & Cefar, foure thousand Launceknights & two thousand ryjons: That there should be also joyned to the army the two thousand Swiffers which remained oluntarily in the Popes pay: for the refidue of their countreymen both weary with wandring fo ng time without any thing doing,& alfo the feafon of their haruest drawing on, were now retured to their countrey afore M. d'Escud came to Reggia, neither could the Pope retaine them any nger, not with standing he had unprofitably confumed among strhem an hundred & fiftie thound duckats. Besides these prouisions, it was determined that with the authority of the Pope and efer, there should be instance made to the Swiffer Cantons, both to aduance fix thousand footen according to the tenor of the contract which the Pope had made with them, & also to refuse minister any succors of me to the French king; and the better to draw them to his demand, the ope alleaged that the confederation which he had made with the, was afore that which they had ntracted with the French king. If these demands were obtained, it was resoluted in the general I der & resolution of the war, that the Duchy of Millan should be inuaded on that side towards ma, in which quarter was hope that there would be made some insurrection, both for the great iltitude of the banished men being the most part of honourable houses, & also for that the ancireucrence & affection which the people were wot to beare to the name of king Lowis, was cored into hatred, & that not litle: the realo was, that the me at armes ordinary for the gard of that are, lived in a great & vobridled liberty, the rather for that they were ill payd through the ill orthe king yied in his affaires, wherein partly by necessity & partly by will, he had couenated to ow huge expences. The Gouernors rifing more infolent and haughty by the negligence of the g, did not minister that true & linely instice which they were won to execute with integrity &c induesse in the time of the late king, who bearing a deare affection to the Duchy of Millan, had rayes a particular care & regard to the interests of the people and subjects there. This was also e thing that went hard with them, that they were constrained according to the custome of runce, to lodge continually in their houses the officers & souldiers of the French, which albeit s nothing of their expences & charges, yet the trouble being perpetuall & generall, it was so ch the more intollerable and grieuous. And albeit it was a yoke which they bare during the cof the late king, who enforcing the example of Paris, would never exempt the subjectes of llan, yet the discommodity drawing with it the other enils that we have spoken of, it seemed them for the present very heavy and irkesome. To this also was added the common nature of people, alwayes defirous of new things, together with a vehement thirst and inclination which trall men haue to deliuer themselues from perplexities present, not considering what will be euent and afterchance of things.

The rumor of this warre fet downe by the Pope and Cafar with so mighty preparations, gaue ming to the French king to looke to the defending of Millan with provisions no leffe refoand well appointed: wherein, not to delay the danger that was fo imminent and manifest, insteur Lautrech who was upon his way to go to the Court for certaine his particular affaires, s cftfoones readiourned and remainded to returne to Millan . And albeit , doubting of the Monfieur de gs variety and negligence, and inconstancy of such as gonerned, he refused the journey, valesse Lautreet refirst delivered him in prest three hundred thousand duckats, which he assured to be no more turnesh to necessary for the defence of that state: yet being no lesse ouerruled with the importunities Millan. neking and his mother, then beguiled with the promifes and oathes of fuch as had the charge istreafure, affuring him that his perfon and the money he demanded, should arrive there with one speede: he embraced the journey and returned thither with great diligence, putting careful ly in order all things necessary for the defence. This was the order which he set downe with th king: That to the kings men at armes which were then in Lombardy, should be joyned the fix hundred men at armes, and fix thousand footmen, which the Venetians were bound to contribut to the kings seruice, whom they offered to aduance speedily, making their men at armes to marc even by the countrey of Verona and Bressia: That there should be levied ten thousand Smiller. which they held for certaine would not be denied by vertue & tenor of the new confederation That they should cause to passe into lealy fixe thousand adventurers, and to adjoyne to the who army certaine bands of Italian footemen. With these forces he hoped without great dangert be able to aduenture the fortune of a battell, or being too weake for such an action, he should least sufficiently strengthen his places with garrisons of men, and so temporise upon the defer ding of them, that both the enemies in time would draw to be wearie : the one by his natur prodigality and huge expenses disbursed in the warre of Vrbin, was drayned of all money at treasure, and for the other he stood so abridged and restained at that time, that the tributes at revenues which he leaved of his kingdomes and dominions, could not fuffice to furnish for all long feafon the expenses of such a war . This was also considered, that Alfonso d'Este dispayri of his proper estates, if the victory fell to the Pope, would either rife to recouer that which he h loft, or at least standing upon his readinesse, would so hold the Pope in suspicion, that of necess. he should employ many bands of souldiers for the gard of townes and places adjoyning his co fines and limits. These were the counsels and preparations of both parts, the king neuerthelesse that were to come from the kingdome of Naples, nor the bands of Launceknights, after he h bouring by all his meanes (but in vaine) to reappease the Pope. At that time Prosper Colonno was at Bolognia, and from thence not tarying for the regime mustred his other companies, and left sufficient garrisons within Wiodena, Reggia, Bolognia, I nenna, and Tmola, for feare of the Duke of Ferrara, he marched and encamped upon the river Lensa within five miles of Parma: he nourished himselfe with a full hope that the Frenchir could draw no strength of footmenfrom the Swiffers, and that as well for that disappointment for the ill disposition of the people, he supposed they would rather abandon then defend the D chy of Millan: but it hapned otherwise: for the Cantons, notwirhstanding the vehement labo to the contrary made by the Cardinall of Sion and the Embassadors of the Pope and Cafar, 1 derinined to deliuer to the king, bands of men fuch as they were bound to leuie by the last ec uentions. And whilest those leuies werein preparing, George Sopressan was discended to Mil with foure thousand footmen Valesiens: by reason of which succour, Munsieur Lawtrech desire to defend Parma, fent thicher Monsieur d'Escud his brother with source hundred launces: fiue thousand Italian footemen, ouer whom Federike Bossolo was Captaine. Moreouer it v understood that the Venetians made their musters at Pontuiquo to send speedily to the as of the Frenchking, and also that the Duke of Ferrara leuied certaine regiments of footemen, reason of these preparations, Prosper seeing in what neede he slood of greater forces, kept hi felfe incamped feuen dayes in that place, during which time, there io yned to the army foure hi dred Spanish launces led by Anthony de Leua, and drawne out of the kingdome of Naples: th came also to the army the Marquis of Chantua with part of his regiments, and yet for his ce ming being Captaine Generall of all the fouldiers of the Church, was nothing altered the aut rity of Profer Colonno, in whose person according to the Popes will and Casars, rested the C ciardin Gene- uernment of the whole army, but without any supreme title, for that to Francis Guicciardin giuen foueraigne and absolute power to command ouer the whole regiments of the Church. namely ouer the Marquis of Mantua, & did beare this title, Generall commander ouer the art a place which he exercised with a right great authority, far contrary to the cultome of the ge rall commanders before. After this, Profeer led the army to S. Lazaro within a mile of Parma. king the way that goeth to Reggiu: there he determined to passe no further till the Marqui Pelquiero were come, who was then vehemently expected to march from Naples with the hundred Launces and two thousand Spanish footemen: he looked also to receive there the giments of Launceknights that were to come: and so long as the army remained there, the were no other violences done ypon the countreymen of Parma, then by common industrie turne the streames and course of waters, and by breaking downe their milles, to take from the all meane and vie of grinding. There was great expectation when & what way the Launceknights would come; and to hinder their passing, the Venetians at the instance of the French, sent part of their regiments upon the territories of Verona: for it was knowne by relation, that being come to Ispruch, they fought to receive at Trent their first moneths pay, and required that there might be fent to meere them, certaine numbers of horsemen, to the endthat being once descended to Montbaldo, they might with more furetie paffe on with their bands : whereupon Profper Colonao had dispatched to Mantua two hundred light horsinen, to the end that joyning with two thouand footemen commaunded by the countrey of Alantua, they might aduaunce and march together with the artilleries of the Marquis, who (to be the more acceptable to the Pope and Co-(ar) proceeded in all things as in his owne action, and not in the condition of one mercenarie or aking their pay. But it was a matter of farre greater difficultieto make payment of the intertainnents of the Launceknights at Treze, for that the Pope did not onely make provision of his part, out also disbursed Casars portion, neither could the money have passage over the lands of the 'enersans but with great difficultie and perill: in so much as the Launceknights hearing what npediments the Venetians would object against their comming, required for their furetie grear forces, and varied at the fame time touching the passage of the mountaine and the way, notvithstanding that the Marquis of Pesquiero turned his companies vpon the partes of Muntua, nd was at that time arrived upon the lands of Modena, and had fent to him from the campetwo undred men at armes and three hundred Spanish footemen. At last the Launceknights having no enotion nor patience to attend the time they had fet downe and fignified, fent a new aduettifeent that they would eftfoones cut off and lessen fine dayes, with this resolution, that they would or expect the horsemen more then one day at the foot of Mont baldo, and if they came not, they ould returne backe againe. At which time the Marquis of Pefquiero being not able to be there hold appointment, they were constrained to fend fro the campe in great diligence, Guido Rann & Lewis Gonfaguo, which neuertheleffe ferued to no purpofe, for that (as Profper did alwayes arrant and affure) the Venetians were not able to stop the passage to fixe thousand sooremen nat being their number as well Launceknights as Grifins) a force able to have encountred the lads of horsemen, and for the Italian footemen, they had no courage to oppose against them. It which reason, and also for that the Senat (to whom was alwayes hatefull that the war should managed vpon their proper estate) sought to satisfie the Frenchmen more with demonstrainsthen with effectes, they caused to retire towardes Verona all their bands and regiments the before the Launceknights should passe, By which occasion they found libertie of passage and int to Valegge without any impediment, and so the day after they drew upon the confines of antua: and assoone as the Marquis of Pesquiero was come to the campe, the armie that had ret ined three dayes at S. Lazaro, marched the day following to S. Martin, where did io yne with t m the same day the sootemen of the Launceknights and Grifons.

Thus the forces ordained for this warre, reduced and drawne into one armie, the Captaines The Captaines t san to confult what was to be done: some gaue counfell to befiege Parma, both for that it was of the League t first and chiefe towne of the frontier, and also that it was no suretie to leaue it behind for the together. a nethat was to come on, in regard of the incommodities of victuals and conduct of money and c er prouisions that might be necessarie, and much lesse was it profitable for the townes that uld remaine betweene Parma and Bologma. They alledged, that the footmen that were within I ma were bodies of no valour, both because they were leanied in hast and at randon, and alhey made continuall diforders, flealing to the campe by stealth, no lesse for the difficultie al straitenesse of their payes, then for want of meale and prouision for foode: that the circuite be towne was great, and the people ill disposed, who though they were embased of coue, would yet take heart when they faw the armie neare the wals: so that executing batterie on the Citie in many places, it would be heard for the Frenchmen at one time both to refilt enemie without, and also keepe gard vpon the people that were within. Others reasoned of contrarie, that the Citie was well fortified, that it was strong in bands of men, that touching footemen that wandred fro them, they were people unprofitable, unapt, & cowardly, but the ies bearing abilitie, experience, & disposition to the war remained there, together with many s ds of the French fouldiers, all resolutely prepared to defend their life. Lastly, that with out this d furetie and prouision, it stood not with the experience and conduct of M. d'Escud, Federike

de Bossolo, and other right brane and worthy Captaines, to suffer themselues to be environed: That it was well knowen (for that of late time the maner of warrefaring and to keepe and defend a place was chaunged) what difficulties were in the taking of townes: And that it belonged to them to confider throughly, in what degree of reputation the armic should stand, if they did not accomplish the first enterprise: That as they held it necessarie to plant before Parma their artilleries in two scuerall places, fo they had to looke whether the campe were furnished with artilleries and other prouisions fit for the action: That such a quantitie of artilleries could not be drawen thither without the losse of certaine dayes, which (besides the consuming of too much time before) would be an intermission prejudiciall, for that in such respite the Venetian companies and the most part of the Swiffers would be joyned with Monsieur de Lawtrech, who was dayly expected at Cremona: That one part of the regiment of Sweffers was already arrived, & the forerunners of the French army were neare at hand. That whilest the armie was intagled with the siege of Parma, it would bring no small prejudice if Monsieur de Lawtrech came and planted his campe afore some place adioyuing: And as it would be a hard matter to force him to fight, so he might and would eafily vexe the scoutes of the forragets, & giue impediments to the victuals which day. ly were brought from Reggia, and they already in diverse sortes distressed by such as were within Parma: That it were a better counsell to make prouision of victuals for certaine dayes and leaving Parma behind, to proceede to surprise Plaisance, a Citic of farre greater circuite and of leste strength and garrison of fouldiers, the place voy de of fortifications and artilleries, and the people of the same disposition with them of Parma: That these reasons removed all doubt that making their approches, they should forthwith carie it, wherein Profer Colomo being c the same aduise and counsell, affured the residue that he knew a place which in no fort could b possible to hinder their entring, being the same by the which Frauncis Sforce at that time Cap taine ouer the peoples of Millan, made his victorious entrie against the Venetians, who had or cupied it after the death of Philip Maria Viscount : That Plassance was a Citie wonderfull abounding with great quantities of victuals, and flood so apt to assayle Millan, that the Frenc men would be constrained to retire thither most of their forces, by which meane the Cities ac ioyning to Parma should stand in no estate of daunger . Lastly Prosper held himselse assure that palling the river of Paw onely with light horsemen, and so marching with diligence to Mi lan, that Citie would draw into tumult hearing of the rumour of his name: Such was his opinic afore he patted from Bolognia, and in that regard, not thinking it needefull to stay about the take of any particular place, he would not have a plentifull provision of artillerie nor munitions.

In this varietie of counfels and opinions, it was determined by such as had authoritie to de berate and resolue, that assoone as sufficient provision might be made of meale and bread nourish the armie for foure dayes, a regiment of fine hundred men at armes, one part of the lig horsemen, the regiments of Spamsh footenien, and fifteene hundred footenen Italians, show march with great speede towardes Plaisance, and the residue of the armie to come after, whi could not march but with flow pase, by reason of the artilleries, victuals, and many other imp diments following ordinarily a campe. And it was affuredly beleeued, that yoon the arrivall oft first companies, either the Citie would rise for the Church, or at least they should be a reasonal let for the entring of fuecours, and so vpon the comming of the residue & full force of the arm they made no doubt to carie it. But it hapned the day before that the army should remoue, il certaine troupes of French horfmen having passed the river of Pan, ranne vp even as farre as B fetto: a matter which made a brute that the whole Frech army was come ouer Pan, and therefe that accident breaking the deliberation that had bin made, the departing of the bands was defen untill the certainty & truth were knowen, for the discouery whereof they dispatched loh. Med Captaine of the Popes light horseme with a troupe of soure hundred horses. But that which m troubled this denise & the executio of it, was the ambitio & controuer sie that fell betweene A fer & the Marquis of Pefquiero, betweene who was no great agreemet before. Prosper contec to leade the vauward & principall part of the army, against who the Marquis alledged that it v not reasonable that the regiments of Spanish footmen ouer who he was Captaine general, sho go to any expedition without him. In regard of which ambition and lealousse of the chiefe Co taines, daungerous most comonly for the affaires of Princes, not with stading it was knowen wiinfew houres after, that the bands of Frenchmen were effloones returned beyond Paw, and t Monfi .

Monsieur de Lamtrech stirred not, yet the first resolution was not followed . But what by the dierfitie of opinions and for the naturall flownesse of Prosper, things had proceeded in greater deaves and longnesse, if the Popes Agent had not stept in with them, and declared with discourse ull of reasons and efficacie, how much and how justly the Pope might take offence that they ad temporified to long: wherein they could not in any reasonable fort excuse themselves towards is holineffe of the delayes and respites they had vsed till then, first in expecting the Spaniards, nd then in tarying for the Launceknights: vpon whose admonition they drew all to a present reolution (but more in maner of tumult, then by maturitie of counfell) to plant the campe before Parma, wherein even frich as the day before had affired the contrarie, began to have a wonlerfull hope of the victorie, the rather for that the numbers and bodies of footemen ceasied not. o iffue out of Parma for want of money and food: onely it was reasonable to make some sureance for certaine dayes, both to tarie for two other Cannos that were expected from Bologma, nd to make prouition of many other things necessarie for the executing of townes with artillee; matters which Profeer had refused before. This, whether it may be called negligence, or mution of counfell, brought no litle prejudice to the flate of the enterprise, for that by how much noretime was wasted in temporising, or in that propertie of controuersie, by so much more afure and respite was given to Mösseur de Lamtrech to assemble his companies which he expeted out of Fraunce, from the Venetians and from the Swiffers: so greatly dothit import wise >> aptaines, remembring how necessarie it is in warres to chaunge counsels according to the vaetie of accidents that happen, to accommodate in the beginning all prouisions for all accidents, " id for all counsels. In this meane while, the armie remaining idle, there was executed nothing > uching the service of Parma, but certaine very light skirmishes: neverthelesse the third day ter the campe was reduced to S. Martin, the armie passing beyond the river of Parma, was loded vpon the way of Rome in the suburbes of the gate that leadeth to Plaisance called S. Crosses. hich suburbes Monsieur d'Escud had burned the day before, having doubt of their comming.

The towne of Purma is deuided by a river that beareth the name of it, whose streams and The siege of annell is neither fo deepe nor violent, but it may be alwayes passed by foord, sauing in sea-Parma. ns waterie and raynie: the leffer part of the towne, peopled by men of base condition, and t containing the third part of the whole, called by the inhabitants Codipone, is fituated that fide towardes Plassance. The Captaines made choise of this place, to be the more apt d ready to stop the entrie of succours into Parma, but much more for that on that part the all was weake, and bare such situation that it could not beate the campe in flanke. The Maris, who the day before went with certaine other Captaines to take knowledge and view of e place, made his report the same day that the batterie might easily be begun: but because was necessarie (the better to remove their defences) to batter first a tower ypon the top of the te, giuing no finall strength to the wall, all the day was wasted in that action and a great Culrine broken in the execution. The night following, the artillerie was planted against the wall vin the left hand of the gate to fuch as entred, their purpose being to do the like on the right nd, and to leave the gate in the middelt. The reason was, for that having no conveniencie to How the artilleries in two places separate, for that there were as yet brought to the campe no ore then fixe Cannons, and two great Culuerines, it feemed that by conftraining the defendants be amused at that defence for a long space, it would worke all one effect: but that deuise is not put in execution, for that there was on that fide vpon the compasse of the trench that enoneth the wals, a rifing or mount, so high, that vnleffe it were either made plaine or layd on(a matter ynpossible in so short time) it would gine great impediment to the artillerie to batthe wall. The wall, for that it was old and weake, made no great refisfaunce to the artilles, which having easily made two sufficient breaches, the Captaines spake of giving the asalt the same day, notwithstanding without any firme or assured resolution: onely the Maris , who with his bandes of Spamards had the whole charge of the batterie, fent certaine comnies of footemen to discouer the breach, and to disclose if they could, what fortifications they d within: who being mounted upon the wall, began to make showts and signes to the are to approch and enter, in so much that the footebandes of Spaniards and Italians ranne to : wall more by heapes and troupes then by order. But by that time they were approched and gan to climbe the breach, ypon the which was flaine lerome Guicciardin leader of the footmen, the Captaines ranne thither with the Alarme, and caused them immediatly to retire, doubting there could no good fruite come of that charge, being rather a feeble and weake tumult then affault well ordered. This retraite either made cold all their thoughts to the charge, or at least so ferued for excuse, that that day they forbare to follow the assault in order. The day after they continued to batter the wall which stood whole in the middest of the two breaches, and also a flanke, which had bene made within vpon the tower of the gate. But for that there ranne through the armie a brute, that for the huge rampiers which the French had made, it would be hard to carie it with a simple assault, the Captaines sent out to discouer the batterie two footemen of both the languages, who, either by feare, or by their lule diligence or perhaps by subornation (as was supposed) brought word that there remained of the wal which had bene battered to the ground, more then five fadomes on height. They reported alfo that the defendants had cast a very deepe ditch , and had made so many other soites of fortifications, that it was determined to make mines neare to the wall that was battered, and to oper the wall fall by, and, so with the ruines of the same, to fill the ditch that was made within, thereby to make the entrie more easic. It was also agreed, that assoone as those workes were brought to perfection, and that the artilleries of the armie were increased with two Cannons that came from Mantua, there should be made another batterie in that place, where the wall by turning make an angle after it hath gone forthright a long space, on the right fide of the gate, on which fide, af ter the was cast downe, they might beare the desendants in flanke. But as they began to cast: trench on that fide which had bene battered, and within few dayes after, another, the better to cast downe the wall with the working of the mines: so neuerthelesse those workes proceeder flowly, as well for that the necessarie prouisions and instruments for such actions, were not yet in the campe, because Prosper nourished endes and thoughts dinerse, as also for that the earth when they digged was hard to open, bearing a propertie of foile refifting their labour and diligence.

Whilest these things were in doing , and a generall intention not to assault the towne until they were fully accomplished, Monsieur de Lawtrech who had bene slow to march for the long tarying of fuch as came to the armie, having now affembled the most part of his men c warre, aduaunced and marched flue myles, holding alwayes along the river. He had in hi armie fiue hundred Launces', seuen thousand Smiffers, foure thousand footemen brought th fame day by Monsieur S.V alier out of Fraunce, and foure hundred men at armes with four thousand footemen under Theodor Triuulce commaunder of the Venetian bands, and Andrei Gritti their Legate or commissarie. There followed this armie the Duke of Vrbin, and Olark Anthonie Colonio, the one as fouldier to the French King, but without title and charge, and the other following the common hope of fuch as were banished: he expected also a regiment of fix thousand Smillers which the Catons had made him graunt of they were already upon their way but according to their custome, they marched flowly and with many difficulties. All which force being joyned to his armie, he would not have refused for the rescue of Parma, to adventure the fortune of battell. In which regard, what in expecting such as were to come, and what in folicitin and labouring the bandes already arrived, he stayed on the way and went not far from the short of the river of Pam. Onely he feared least whilest he temporised upon those good causes, hi brother might compound with the enemics, and therefore he fent to him to let him understand that the cause why he prolonged and lingered so much, was that he taried for a greater force of Smiffers who were neare at hand, and without whom the regiments that were alread with him made difficultie to passe Paw. Neuerthelesse he would draw neare to Parma, an would give him a token of his comming by shooting off certaine peeces of artilleries, and s the day following he would affront the enemie and prouoke them to fight, fending out cer taine troupes of his horsemen to entertaine the skirmish, to the end he might with better opor tunitie issue out and joyne with the armie; a matter which Monsieur a'Escud did chiefly soli cite, who affured him that he was not able to hold out about two or three dayes in that par of the towne, and not about two dayes more beyond the river, both for that the towne we large and weake, and his forces remaining not aboue two thousand footemen, for that man of them were straggled away, and also the men at armes being but three hundred, vpon who lay the burden of the service, were notable to make refissance, if the towne were affaulted many places. Thus afterwardes the same day he had promised, he accoasted the enemies in the porone orough of Zibelle which is about twentie myles from Parma, and from thence dispatched foure undred horsemen to runne vp euen to the tents of the enemies, who having brought their mines uen to the wal, and afterwards turning them and dreffing them in the place where the fire should eput, Count Gnido Rangen with the Italian footebandes over whom he was Captaine geneall, began to plant the artilleries on the other fide of the wall. But the Frenchmen hearing the rute that was made in executing the mines, having for two houres afore abandoned the Codione, retired in order and without noyfe on the other fide the water, drawing with them their aglleries: which retraite being knowen to those that were without, they entred into the Codsone the morning following at the breake of the day, fome making their way by the breach, and ome vied the feruice of scaling ladders. They were received with an universall gladnesse of the 'armefans, to whom nothing could be more acceptable then to returne under the dominion of re Church: but it was a joy that drew with it a prefent forrow and heauinesse, and a gladnesse nat was easily converted into dolour and lamentations, for that they saw afore their eyes their oules facked and spoyled, in no lesserigour and suriethen if they had bene moreall enemies. and it was not to be doubted that if certaine dayes before, the artilleries had bene planted in e fame place, but the Frenchmen had in the fame maner abandoned the Codipont. After their trie, they fell to breaking open the gates which afore had bene rammed up with no fmall iniffrie, and so the artillerie having passage even to the shore of the river, they began to batter the all that defendeth the other banke of the river: but the neare approch of the night hindered e benefite and effect of their working that way, and by the little time they had left, it was ellknowen they could do no great execution for that day. The same day Monsieur de Lamtrech me and incamped vpon the river of Taro within feuen myles of Parma: fome supposed his mming so neare was to bid battell to the enemie, but others were of opinion, that he aduaundthe full shew of his armie, to the end that either he might be ready to receive his brother dhis companies if they issued out of Parma by night, being no longer able to hold out : or e to entertaine fome treatie or parley with the enemie, for the better deliuerie of his brother d his fouldiers with fafetie and without obligation, according to the example of Federike de offolo, who had begun a conference by the folicitation of the Marquis, notwithstanding had received a hurt in his shoulder with a shot not many dayes before as he walked about the inpiers. But the parley was not fo farre forward, as that there could be made any certaine conture of the will of Monsieur d'Esud . The truth was (by the experience of things that hapd afterwardes) that Monsieur de Lawtrech was not determined to fight, vnlesse the regiints of Swiffers came to him: for notwithstanding he had somewhat the aduauntage, both for numbers and valour of men at armes, and also was more mightie in artillerie, yet the enemie s fironger then he in footemen, containing (according to a just computation and account) nine usand Launceknights and Spaniards, two thousand Swiffers, and more then source thousand ilians. Let it here be confidered how often and how much ypon small accidents & moments in tres, depend things of very great confequence: for the night after the armie entred the Codsv, it hapnediust at the instant that by advertisemets comming from Modena & Bologma, they lerstood that Alfond d'Este issuing out of Ferrara with a hundred men at armes, two huned light horsenien, and two thousand sootemen, amongst whom were a thousand aswell Corses as Italians, which Lawtrech had fent him, and with twelue peeces of artillerie, had furprithe boroughs of Finalo and S. Felix, with great feare that he would passe further. This bred finall trouble and terrour in the mindes of the Captaines, notwithstanding they had seare of ha leauie long time before, being not ignorant with what vehement instance the Frenchmen cited him to it : and yet had they not made at Modena fuch a prouision as might suffice for furetie of the Citie, for that Profeer maintaining to the vttermost the contrary opinion, would her consent that souldiers should be drawne out of the armie to be sent to Modena: his reason s, that either he reposed assured faith in the promises of the duke who was his right deare friend, with whom even under the Popes directions, he was interposed to solicite some accord: or ; for that he had no wil to diminish the number of his men of warre, in a time when they feared enemie would approch: One principall reason might be also taken of his naturall disposition ayes inclined to do things furely, which made him for the most part to defire to haue in his armore menthen the feruice needed. It may be he had other ends & confiderations more fecree and private to him felfe, then to be knowen of others by any coniccture or apparance: onely affoone as the aduertifements were throughly disclosed and understood, the Captaines assembled in counsellypon those affaires, determined that Guido Rangon should presently depart for Modena with two hundred light horsemen and eight hundred footemen, which being joyned to the fixe hundred footemen that were left there before, they thought would be a fufficient thrength and gartifon against the forces of Alfins. After they had set downe this order & resolution, there remained yet certaine houres afore it was day. A litle before also there came aductisement that Monsieur de Lawtrech was incamped the night before vpo Taro, which aduertiscment was partly true and partly doubtfull, for that it contained that the Swiffers were icyned with him, and it was not knowne that those which he had then in the army, notwithstanding his infinite requestes, had made him no further promise then to come to Taro. The Captaines, though they were not affembled for that matter, yet feeing there yet remained certaine houres of the night, and by that occasion they had no necessitie to employ themselves severally in other affaires, they began to reason amongest themselves rather to beguile the time then by way of counsell, into what estate things would be reduced now that Lawtrech did approch. In which discoursing it seemed the wordes and reasons of Prosper, the Marquis, and Vitelli, tended to this end: That it would be hard to take Parma, if they planted not a batterie on the other fide the Citie: for that though the wall beyond the water should be executed, which they had begun to batter the day before, yet there would be a wonderfull difficultie to climbe vp from the bottome or lower part of the river to the banke: neither could they put that matter in practife without great daunger, for that the artilleries and shots bestowed vpon the three bridges standing vpon the same river, and in the houses there adjoyning, would be as flankers to the perill of such as offered to climbe the banke: They reasoned that the neighbourhood of Monsieur de Lamtrech, who was to march on and incampe in some place towardes Pam, though he would not attempt the fortune of the field, would be the cause that the assault could not be given without great daunger. Moreover it was to be confidered, that by reason of the pillage and sacke which had bene lately made of par of Parma, there were many footemen gone away laden with spoile, and the other that remained were more carefull to faue the things they had gotten, then disposed or apt to fight: That thearmie could not remaine there without many difficulties, discommodities, and daungers, for that a it should be necessarie for the service to send out every day great troupes and bands, not onely to defend the forragers, but also for the suretie of victuals and money which came dayly, making: long circuit about the wals of Parma: fo, whilest such troupes should occupy the fieldes, i might come to passe that the residue of the campe should have to do at one time with the French men that were without, and such also as were within. They brought into discourse also, that i the Duke of Ferrara reenforced his armie with mo bandes of fouldiers, they flould be driven o necessitie to leavie from the campe farre greater forces for the suretie of Modena and Regeia yea, if he ouerranne the countrey with such bandes as he had, he might so hinder therefort of victuals that they should be driven to breake up and dissolute the campe; extremities which brough with them manifest apparances of most great daungers. These reasons albeit they expressed an in clination to leavie the fiege, yet they were so cloaked and dissembled, that it could not be dif cerned that fuch was their counsell and intention. At last after they had occupied many reason and long discourses, the Marquis of Pesquiero seeming to have already comprehended the intention of the refidue, fayd that he difcerned well inough that there was amongeft them all one o pinion and counfell, but every one feuerally respecting his particular, was content to yie silence expecting that the mouth of another should be the authour of the thing which they conceived in their hearts. But for my part, fayd he, depriving my felfe of fuch interest and respect, I can not bu pronounce in the presence of you all, that as whilest we remaine about the confines of Parma our daungers are greater then our hopes, and our labours more then the fruites we shall reape, se to auoyd greater euils, I thinke it very necessarie we leavie and depart. Prosper iustifying the wordes of the Marquis, alleaged that he had expressed no lesse, had not the celeritie of the Marquis preuented his flownesse to speake. Vitelli confirmed the opinion of them both: but Antho.d Leua well allowing of the breaking vp of the campe frothence, made this proposition, to conside whether it were not better to feeke M.de Lawtrech and to give the charge vpon him. Where unto it was answered, that as it would be very hard to constraine the enemy to fight, so also remaine there would be a matter fo much the more impossible, by how much the difficulties that were to be brought into confideration about their abiding there, would rife farre greater, feeing it was not vnlikely to come to passe, but the regiment of two thousand Smillers, would follow them, both for that many dayes before they had received commandement from the Cantons to depart out of the Popes pay, and also it was not likely that they would be drawne or disposed to fight against an armie, wherin were so many bodies of the same language and nation. Moreouer, it could not be denied but that by reason of the sacke and pillage made the day before, it would be very hard to moue the footmen that were fo difordered: fo that this counfell and the reasons of it being rejected, it seemed that the opinions and willes of all the Captaines drew to this, that it were best to breake up the Campe from before Parma. Vpon which resolution, no lesse settled then vniuerfall, Prosper and the Marquis, with drawing themselues apart from the residue, after long conference in private, demaunded of the Popes Legate, what the Pope would fay if they leauned the Campe. The Legate answered the Marquis with this question: Shall we not take Parma this day, according as you affured vs yesternight? To whom the Marquis replied in his Spanish language, neither this day, nor to morow, nor after to morow. The Legate said, it could not be doubted, that the Pope would be right greatly discontented with the matter, for that it would altogether depriue him of the hope of the victorie: onely he faid that the point of that deliberation confilled in the truth or error of the suppositions and reasons by them set downe, for that if to furcease and abstaine, were a matter daungerous and without hope, it could not be doubted that to remaine there were great indifcretion, but if it were otherwise, to breake up could not but oring flaunder of too great d forder. Therefore he willed them to confider with deep counfell and differetion, both the estate of the armic and importance of things, and to ballance indifferently whether was the greater, either the daunger or the hope. But Prosper and the Marquis stood continually upon this, that all reasons and rules of warre aduised them to retire: against whom being Captaines of such name and authoritie, the Legate forbare to object any further: in fo nuch as it was fet downe the fame day that the Campe should breake up, and the artilleries hould be retired from the wals, which being published through the campe, it was blamed as a esolution timerous and searefull by all those that were not present at the counsell. And albeit it vasa counfell cuen then disposed to execution, yet by the murmure of the vniuerfall bodic of he Campe, the Legate and Moron joyning together, labouted to altet Profeer and retire him om his opinion: they found him not much estraunged to consult againe and call a new counsell, lleaging with words and reasons so much the more worthy and commendable, by how much was great or grave the personage that spake them, that he held it no shame to chaunge counsell when he was encountred with better reasons, and therefore caused estsoones to be summoned all ich, as were at the first resolution. But the Marquis of Pesquiero, being buse about retiring neartillery, would not heare speake of changing the first conclusion, & refused to come to counill: infomuch as the matter remaining rather confufed them refolued, they proceeded to execute ne first determinatio. Thus the same day, which was the xij. since their encaping, they returned to Lazaro; and at the departing there wanted not much of a verie great diforder, for that the footien Launceknights demanding fo vnreasonable conditions touching their payes, that they could ot be accorded, refused to followe the armie: and the old Captaines that impugned the coun-Il concurring with them in that tumult, had created amongst themselves a Captaine & Author fthat fedition. In which diforder it was feared leaft they would compound and accord with the renchmen: neuerthelesse the armie being already gone, and no hope that the sentence of resoluon would be altered, they prepared also to depart, and followed the army. In this maner of perirbation, the army being full of feare and faction, both for fo fodaine a breaking vp, and for the imult of the Launceknights, there is no doubt, if Lawtrech had advanced and taken the occasion uthe had eafily put them all to flight: Such a thing is diforder, that in an army denided, it,, reeds more daunger then the multitude or fword of the enemie. This fodaine discamping won-,, erfully afflicted the mind of the Pope, who expected from one day to another, that newes would brought to him that his fouldiers were within Parma: he feemed to be deptiued of his hope coarie to all reason & order, & that he was now entred into a most deepe subjection to a heavie & tollerable charge, for that (except the men at armes & the Spanish footme) he supported generalall the burthen & expences of the warre: but that which worle was , he was not without doubt of the Captaines Imperials, whom many others held also suspected, perswading themselues that the retiring of the Campe from before Parma proceeded not of feare, but of arte and cunning, as though they had suspected that after the Pope had recoursed Parma and Plassance (nothing else appertaining to him in the estate of Millan) he would waxe wearie of the warre & the thoughts thereof, forbearing any longer to sultaine so great a charge and travell for the interests of another: he was induced to these suspitions, both by the long tract & delay that was vsed to plant the camp afore Parma, and also that they had bestowed it in a place so vnapt and inconvenient, seeing the leffer part of the towne being taken, they were to deuise to take the other part with the same difficulties: lastly they proceeded in the fiege slowly, and drawing things in delay, as though they meant expresly to give time and respite to the succours of the French: and being at last in polfession of one part of the towne, they cowardly lest it abandoned as soone as they heard Lawerechapproched, and yet he was not flronger then they. Some there were that supposed all this action might proceed (without the privity of Proper) of the arte and futtletie of the Marquis of Pefquiero, who as much as he could, was enuious and icalous of the gloric of Prefer: neuertheleffe it might be, that those fortes of men supposed the truth, who beleeued that all was done with fincerity and good meaning, and that they were not pushed on with other motions then of a feare that Lawtrech was at hand, wherin they were greatly beguiled by the first advertisements, by the which they were made to understand that his armie contained farre greater forces. But it is most certaine that the French Captaines maruelled more then all the residue, being reduced into a verie small hope to be able to defend Parma, for that the Smiffers, being gouerned more by their owne humours and nature, then observing the necessities of those that payd them their wages, were verielong in comming: which made many amongst them (not attributing to seare so so. daine a discamping) interpret rather that Prosper, a wise and experienced Captaine, knowing what disorder the lacking of cities brings upon armies, and confidering how hard it would be to restraine the souldiers from spoyling of Parma, judged it a matter of perill to take it, the enemies being so neare. What soeuer was the cause, M. Lawtrech after he had refurnished Parma with new bands, incamped at Fontanella, and within three dayes after he sent one part of the armit to take Roccabianqua, a borough of the territories of Parma neare to Pam, which after it hac bene battered with artilleries, the borough and the Castle were rendered by Rowland Paluoisa Lord of the place, himselse having liberty to depart. After this the armie was dispersed between S. Secondo and the river of Taro, the better to be ready for imployment according to the procee dings of the enemies, and it was now become strong and well resolued, as well for the defend of Parma, as for that the new regiments of Swiffers which were expected, were now arrived a Cremona: the same being the cause that the armie of the enemies not seeming to be in sufficien furety at S. Lazaro (not with standing M. Lautrech had commanded them not to sir fro thence that they retired to the river of Lensa on that side towards Reggia, with intention to draw yet sur ther off, if the Frenchmen aduanced: yea the Captaines without further tarying, had made a grea ter retrait, if they had not bene contained by the complaints of the Pope and the Agents of Cafar and touched with the murmure and blame of the whole armie. This was the behaulour and dispo fition of both the armies for many dayes, Lawtrech notwithstanding making diverse incursion with his horfinen and the fouldiers of Parma, even up to Reggia by the way of the mountaine wherin he gaue great impediments to the victuals which were brought to the enemies from Reg gia, and that to the great discommendation of Prosper, who would hardly suffer his light horse men to do seruice, and verie slowly prouided for the safetic of such things, as he might have re medied with good facilitie. On the other side the mounts, the affaires of Casar ran the sam fortune, for that being entred into the dominions of the French king on Flaunders side, with mighty armie, and holding Messers besieged with great hope to carie it, he was deceived in hi expectation: infomuch as being not able to take it, for that a strong succour of the French cam to rescue it, he retired with perill least his armie were broken and ouerthrowne. But in Italy not withstanding the successe of the war was not happy nor acceptable, yet the thoughts & counsel The Population of men were nothing restrained or for slowed: for, the enemies to the Frech, nor deuising any mor Caines and the to take Parma or any other towne, determined to enter deeper into the Duchie of Millan, joy counsel to passe ming to the army so many bands of Italians, that in all they cotained fix thousand, which were le uied fro hand to hand: they were the more boldned to take this resolutio, by a hope they had the

there would of newe descend to the pay of the Pope, twelue thousand Smillers: who albeit had bene refused by the Cardinall of Sion soliciting openly in their parliaments against the French, and by Ennius Bilhop of Verola the Popes Legat, and also by Cafars Embassadors, for that the Cantons would not deliuer fuch a regiment of their nation, but for the defence of the dominions of the Church, and with expresse direction not to march to offend the estates of the French king: yet for that they could not have them with other reason, they were glad at last to accept them under the fame condition, hoping that being once descended into the regions of Italy, they might be induced to follow the armie against the Duchie of Millan, and that either through their naturall inconstancie, or by their vninersall conetonsnesse, or at least by the sleights and corruptions that might be ministred to their Captaines. In this deliberation to passe further; there was no doubt made into what quarter they would draw: for that, to continue the watre on this fide the timer of Par, could not be without manifelt and right great difficulties, seeing it was a matter desperat to take Parma: & if they would leave that Citie behind, they must of necessitie go seeke out the enemies to fight with them; an action euidently daungerous, for that they were lodged in a place of aduantage and wellfortified with artilleries: to remaine betweene Parma and them, or to passe urther without fighting, there was no reason nor abilitie to do so, for that standing betweene the ownes that were posselfed by them and the armie, they should within sew dayes be afflicted with penurie of victuals, the countrey of the enemie denying all refort, and no possibilitic of traffike furher off. All which difficulties would be auoyded in transferring the warre beyond Pare, for that in hat country, naturally abounding in all things and had not as yet tafted of the harmes of the war, hey made good warrantie to find victuals sufficient, and to meete with no impediment vntill the iuer of Adda: both for that, leaving Cremona on the left hand, and drawing neare to the river of Dollo, there were no places to make refistance, and also they were perswaded that the Senate of 'enice would not (for the interests of others) deliuer vp their bands of fouldiers to the fortune of battell. They beleeved also that the French durst not oppose against them, but at the passage of heriuer of Adda: yeathe univerfall hope was, that the armie approching the Venetian frontiers, he Senate (for the furetie of their owne estates) would call home the most part of those fouldiers which they had fent to the feruice of the French king. Lastly; ouer and besides all these consideraons, to passe beyond Paw, sel out very aptly for the armic to joine with the Swiffers; a matter not fleast importance. But whilest necessarie provisions were in preparing for this deliberation, as tilleries, munitions, pioners, bridges, and victuals: and whileft bands of Italian footmen were leied in Tuscane and Romagnia, Count Guido Rangon, under the Popes commaundement, marred towards the mountaine of Modena, with part of the footment hat were alreadic leuied, and viththose bands that were under his government. This mountaine did neuer acknowledge other ord then the Duke of Ferrara, neither to long as Modena stood under the iurisdiction of Calar, or afterwards when it divolved to the dominion of the Church. But the peoples of the countrey earing how armed men came to inuade them, made publike protestation for the Church, not rying till they were affailed. At the same time fled from Millan, Boniface Bishop of Alexanria, and sonne to the late Frauncis Barnardin Viscount: the cause of his cuasion, was, for that ertaine conspiracies which he had practifed against the French, came to light: as also was discloda practife managed within Cremona by Nicholas Varola, one of the best fort of the banished en of that Citie, by reason of which conspiracie, certaine inhabitants in Cremona, partakers of ie matter, were executed and made an example: a great number of the exiles of Millan followed e armie, in whom I know not which was greater in those seasons, either their ill fortune, or their adifcreet behauiour: for, befides that all the enterprifes that they tooke in hand drew verie yntoard effects & successe, yet being wholly given to pill and spoile the country, they were the cause lat there came not to the armie to great Hore of victuals as was necessarie, yea (except the indurie of Moron) they recopenced not these euils by any diligence or intelligence of espials. Lastly, id which is of more importance then all the refidue, Profper having fent them long time before wards Plaisance, they executed great domages & hostilities indifferently both you their friends idenemies, and fell at last into such civill contention amongst them selves by reason of the booes, that Peter Scot of Platfance a chieftaine amongst them, was slaine by Hellor Viscount and uerse others: Such destinic followeth vnlawfull pillage and spoile, that being purchased by vn-,, flarmes and violence, it either brings with it the feedes of fedition, hostilitie, and bloud, or at, least leaves to the getters a miserable yse and fruition. In this meane while Profer attempted to burne the barkes of the bridge, which the Frenchmen had retired neare to Cremona with a very flender gard, he fet upon the enterprise to this end; to win so much the more time to enter the countrey, whilest Lawirech should reassemble the barkes necessary to reedifie the bridge. But the expedition being imposed upon lohn de Medicis, sent out to that end with two hundred light horsemen and three hundred Spanish sootemen, the longnesse of the way was the cause that he could not arrive there till after the night was passed: in somuch as the mariners judging some violence by the noyfe or brutes that were made, retired the barkes into the middelt of the river of Paw, where the enemy that lay planted vpon the shore, had no way to offend them. At last wher all things necessary to passe Paw were prepared, the army marched to Bresselle where was credical a bridge of barkes: but afore they passed ouer, for that to their purpose to offend another was joyned a necessity to see to the defending of themselves, there was sent to the garde of the townes of the Church which should remaine behind, Vitello Vitelli with an bundred and fiftie men at armes, the like number of light horsemen, and two thousand sootmen of the pension and pay of the Florentins. In like fort went thither the Bishop of Pistoya with the regiment of twe thousand Smiffers, who were turned to that enterprise, for that it seemed to sland neither with furety nor pollicy to lead them against the French, in whose armie was so strong a power of the fame nation deliuered to them by univerfall decree, and bearing their publike Enfignes: neithe were they affured what the new companies of Swiffers would refolue, who being muftered an affembled at Coire, there was dayly expectation of affured aducatifements that they had take the fields tomarch. The Bishop and Vitelly had charge, not onely to defend Modena and othe townes of the Church; if any inuation were made, but also to affaile the Duke of Ferrara, who attributing to himselfe the glory to have deliucted Parma, and occupied Finalo, and Sam Felix, passed not further, for that the Pope (in whom was redoubled a hatred for that surprise proceeded against him with censures and excommunications of the Church, to deprive him c the Duchie of Ferrara.

The army of feth the river of Pam.

Thus the army passed the river of Pam the first of October, and went to incampe at Casalmaio she league paf- they confurmed in passing not onely all the day, but a great part of the night, the multitudes of fuch as followed the campe giving no leffe impediments then the baggage that was drawne an caried. In this the Captaines were much deceived, for that they made their reckening to fee th whole army passed before noone, infomuch as what by the slownesse and negligence of the stras lers which are no small impediments to a campe marching, and what by the darkenesse oftl night, in which the vie of the eyes and hands is taken away, one part of the artilleries and munit ons, with many bands of fouldiers remained dispersed the whole night betweene Paw and C. falmaior, in danger to be made a pray to every finall troupe of enemies that would have fet vpc them in their diforder : yea it was not to be doubted, that if Alonfieur Lawtrech (who after ! had affembled all his Swiffers, came to incampe at Colorgne the same day that the enemies is camped at Breffelle) had passed ouer his bridge at Casalmaior, which is but three miles from Colo gne, at the instant that they made their passage, or at least at midday, had charged that part of il army which was not yet passed (for betweene Bresselle and Colorgne is but fix miles) he had he good meane and oportunity to bring his businesse well to passe: But in warres many occasionsa loft, for that the Captaines and leaders have not alwayes knowledge of the diforders and difficu ties that happen amongst the enemies. The same night atriued at Casalmaior, Cardinall de Mea cis whom the Pope fent as Legate into the army. This was the Popes reason to send him thithe That albeit he had very secretly begun to give eare to the Embassador of the French king, yet s the feare he had least these advertities and contrary successes, together with the burden of the w which was almost wholly reduced upon him, should give occasion to Casar and his ministers doubt, that to shake off so many difficulties and doubts, he would chaunge his mind and turnel thoughts to new deuises: he judged there could be nothing more apt to affure them, and sol consequence to induce them to proceede more resolutely in the war, then to send amongst the Cardinal de Medicis: both for that by reason of his affinity and nearencsse of kinred he bare no l tle authority with him, & also for that without his privity and counsell, they knew was done n thing of importance, not with landing he remained for the most part at Florence. And besidesti in him were cocluded the very counfels & authority of the Pope, yet in fending him to the arm, vas thought to rest no small matter to hold vp the reputation of the enterprise which was somewhat declined: & lastly, it was likely that for the presence of so great a personage the Captaines would deliberate upon the affaires with a greater agreement and unitie; a matter of no leffe neeffity to be looked into and remedied, for that betweene Profper and the Marquis of Pefguero requarrell rose more and more increasing, the rather for that the Marquis since the Campe was eujed from before Parma, fecking to lay upon others the infamic of that deliberation, gaue adertisements to Rome, that the resolution had bene set downe without his counsell or privity. The rmic reflect one day at Cafalmaior, and from thence they marched along the territories of Cresona to draw neare the river Oglia, where they arrived in four eremoues of marching: and in nis while was nothing done of consequence, sauing that as the armie was lodged in a farme caled la Corte de Frati, there arose a great fray and mutiny betweene the sootbands of Spamards & talians, in the which were flaine many of the Italian nation, and yet more by the pollicie of the paniards then by their valour, for that they knew how to vie the oportunity of the occasion: euerthelesse, by the authoritie and labour of the Captaines, the matter was speedily reappeased. he day before, John de Medicis alwayes pursuing the enemics, who the same day that the arnie flayed at Casalmaior, were passed the river of Pam somwhat higher towards Cremona, rake a band of Venetian eltradiots led by Mercurie, with whom were certaine French horfien, who tooke priloner Don Lowis Caiettan sonne to the Duke of Tracetta, whose cstare neerthelesse was holden by Prosper Colonno: but assoone as they came to incampe upon theriuer Toglia, fortune beholding with better eye the affaires of the Pope and Cafar, broke the finisher punsels of the Captaines, who had determined that from the farme of the Friers or Monks the rmie should go to lodge in the towne of Bordelano, a place about eight miles from thence, nd vpon the same river of Oglia: for, being not possible to draw thither the artilleries by reason of icill wayes, it was necessarie to stay in the towne of Rebecca, being in the midway, and a place hich is only separate by the river of Oglia from Pontuike atowne of the Venetians: and whi-It they incamped there, they had advertisement that Monsieur de Lawtrech, being followed iththe Venetian regiments, and had also left at Cremona all his baggage and impediments of mpe, was come the same day to S. Martin, within five miles of that place, with full resoluon to meete the enemies the day after in the field, if they offered to paffe any further. This troued not a litle the minds of the Cardinall and the Captaines, for that the Senate of Venice, at fuch ne as they fent their people into Lawtreches armie, had fignified that deliberation to the Pope ithfuch words as feemed to have some power to stirre and move him, not for any defire of e French victorie, but for that he had not just cause not to observe the consederation. They ere also perswaded afore, and the comming of the Cardinall did well confirme that opinion, at Andrew Gruti had secret commaundement not to suffer his bands to come to the fight: hich perswasion or opinion falling out to be false, it was necessarie to leave there all their forer counsels, fince it was confessed of all men, that the armie of the enemie was farre aboue them forces, containing, befides the horsemen which were mightie and strong, and seuen thousand otmen French and Italians, a puilfant strength often thousand Swiffers. But in the armie of the ope and Cafar the numbers of Launceknights were fo diminished, and the bands of the Spanide abated, that scarcely were they able to bring to the musters seuenthousand bodies, and of kethousand Italians (for that the most of them were new supplies, & leuied in haste) their numer was more in consideration then their vertue.

Thus Prosper with the others determined to tarie in that place for the comming of the Swifer, who being upon their way, and the Cardinall of Sion that led them, having sent word not linger for them in any place, it was thought they could not tarie about three or source dayes: id therefore the morning following, after the Captaines had diligently considered the situation of the place, they reduced into a better forme the lodging, which the night before had me made almost in tumult and mutinie; in which action they did not consider in what perill ey shood to be offended with the artilleries of the towne of Pontuke which stood upon the pposite; for this was the persuasion of the Cardinall de Medeis, retaining still his first imessions, that the Venetians who stood not bound to the French king in other conditions then to the him with men for the desence of the Duchie of Millan, would neuer consent nor suffer at out of their places should be drawne anie meane to year the armie of the Church and

Cafar. The difficultie of victuals was one thing that seemed contrarie to the resolution tot rie for the Smillers at Rebecca; for belides that the quantities that were caried with the arm were not sufficient to feed them but for verie few dayes, yet by reason of the harmes done l the exiles of Mullan, and the univerfall flying and abandoning that was made through t whole countrey, there was supplied and brought verie litle, and yet that more and more of minished dayly. In respect of these difficulties and wants, Guicciardin their Agent gaue this cou fell, that feeing there was no abiding there for want of victuals, and leffe expectation of the cor ming of the Smillers, who might be stayed by manie occasions, it could not be prejudiciall retire backe againe flue or fixe miles upon the fame river to the confines of Mantua, who having vpon their backes the countries of their friends, they should not feare the affliction of mine or want of prouifions. He enforced this counfell with this reasonable allegation, that t thing which presently might be done with suretie, might perhaps stand intangled with great perill whenfoeuer the enemies should approch. This counsell haply was not displeasing to t Captaines, but the late infamic of the retiring from before Parma kept manie of them refir ned from the libertie of free speaking. They were also not a litle caried with the hope that t Swiffers could make no long tarying, for that within fixe dayes they might eafily descend fro Core to the territorie of Bergano, and from thence they had no great way to make to joy with the armie: fo that being thus determined to awaite their courning at Rebecca, the prot fions of meale caried with the armie were distributed by measure to all the bands. And becau there were in the campeno onens portative, and the houses wherein any were built were take up by the fouldiers, enerie one for his particular feeding baked upon flones and hote coles t part that was deliuered to him for his prouision: which incommoditie toyned to the sin distributions that were made of meale, was the cause that the bands of Italian footmen, notwit standing they had plentie of wine and flesh, fled secretly from the campe, But the third day of Lawtrech remaining at Bordellane, caused about noone-tide to passe ouer Oglia, one part the artilleries, and fent them to Pontuske under the fufferance and privity of the Venetian Agei notwithstanding he made semblance of the contrary; and albeit it was almost night, yet th began the fame day to draw towards the lodgings of the enemies, whose Captains seeing into t manifest danger, not with standing they might have conveyed themselves into a place where the might have found defence in the couert and shadowes of certaine litle hilles, yet what with t calamitie of want of victuals, and a redoubled feare that the Smiffers would make long t rying, they caused the armie to depart the morning following by breake of the day: and their going away was without brute or found of trumpet or drumme, and their baggagea traine of Campe drawne afore their companies, fothere was no band which did not march good order and well appointed to fight: they incamped at Gabbionetta, about five miles fre thence you the confines of Mantua, confessing with one voyce that they were deliu red from a great daunger, partly by the benefite of fortune, and partly by the negligen and indifferetion of the enemies: for if they had not stayed at Rebecca the verie same d that they were appointed to go to Tordellano, there had remayned to them a verie for hope of fafetie, for that the felfe fame or elfe greater necessities had constrained them to reth by which aducrfitie the retraite being longer, and the enemies more neare, the perill w most manifest. In like fort it is most certaine, that the victorie had vindoubtedly fallen v on Monsieur de Lawtrech, if he had marched to incampe neare the enemies, the same d In fault of M. he fent the artilleries to Pontucke, whereunto hee was adulfed by manie of the Captaine de Lawsrech. but chiefly by the Smiffers: for by reason of his nearenesse, they had stoode deprived all meanes to retire in fafetie, both for that they could not raunge themselues into battell ray for the impediments of the artilleries of Pontuike, and also the rage of the famine would n give them sufferance in that place above three or source dayes. But such are the ordinarie fruit of fingularity and felfe-weening, that whileft by his nature and custome he despifed the coufels of all others, he layd open to the enemies the knowledge of the peril that was towards the and through his fault made them able to preuent his threatnings by their fodaine departur in so much as it was not without reason that the Swiffer Captaines told him, that they h well deferued the payes accustomed to be given to fouldiers that had wonne the battell, se ing it was not long of them that they had not got the victoric. At Gabbionetta the arm of the League fortified their campe with great industry, and in their owne safety remained there nany dayes. Neuerthelesse both for that the comming of the Swiffers seemed dayly to linger and inspend, and also for feare of the neighborhood of the French, both mighty in strength and braue n demonstrations to set upon them, they passed the river of Oglia, and went to incampe in the porough of Offrano apportaining to Lodowik de Boffolo, with intention not to depart from thence ill the Swiffers were come: which resolution made with wisdom and counsell, was also accompanied with good fortune, for that at Gabbionetta by reason of the low and shallow situation, the rmy had received great domages by the abundance of raines and waters falling affoone as the ampe was gone. But whilest in this fort the time ranne foorth idlely betweene both the armies, the one lying it Ostiano and the other at Rebecca, the Bishop of Pistoia Vitelli having drawne into one ltength the Swiffers and the bands of Italian footemen, gaue charge vpon the garrifons of the Duke of Ferrara that lay at Finalo, who albeit had for their advantage the oportunity of the lace, both strong by nature and well fortified by art, yet the Smiffers whose feare is alwayes eaft when the perill feemes most, presented themselves with a brave resolution to the daunger, nd giuing an ouerthrowe to the whole, they flue manie of them, amongst whom the knight Toriano passed by the sword as he was fighting. This brought so great feare and amazeto he Duke of Ferrara lying then at Bodena, that yeelding to the aductitie which he could ot ouercome, he abandoned foorthwith that towne, and fled to Ferrara, his feares being reater then his affurance. And to take from the enemies all oportunities to follow him, he tired with a present diligence all those barkes, vpon the which he had builded a bridge in ie same place.

In this meane while the regiments of Swiffers that were expected, were discended upon neterritories of Bergama: and yet their minds being no leffe variable then their difficulties ertaine, they stayed to passe further, having expresly refused to turne themselves to invade ertaine, they trayed to passe futther, naturing expressly feduced to turne the find the Agents of the The Swiffers in Duchy of Nullan according to the instance of the Cardinall of Sion and the Agents of the leased by the ope and Cefar . They also made difficultie to joyne with the armie that expected them at poper would hano, for that it was prepared to march against the French king, offering to go to the fer-not march aice of any place that the Pope should thinke good in the estate or dominion of the Church, gainst the or the defending of which, they fayd they were entred into pay : and yet according to French king. ieir barbarous interpretation of things, they consented to march to affaile Parma and Plaimee as Cities manifelfly appertaining to the Church, or at least to they which the French king ad no certaine right or interest. They required also that afore the should march, there should esent to them from the arithy, three hundred light horsemen, the better with their ayde to auie victuals in those countries and places through the which they should passe. These were e difficulties they stood vpon, bearing more vpon froward wilfulnesse, then vpon reason or reeffitie of the present service: neuerthelesse in the ende the light horsemen were sent, who iffed at vinwares in great diligence along the territories of the Venetians: they disposed their arching to, as they might come into tome place most neare the army, to have the more onueniency and oportunity to confult and refolue what were to be done: and in their way ey gaue the chase to certaine bands of the French and the Venetians which were bestowed at andowille or rather upon the lake of Eupile to stoppe their passage. Assoone as they were awne neare to the armie, there was prefent labour made to dispose them to joyne against e French, in which folicitation were employed manie messengers and Embassadours, and iefly the Archbishop of Capua going to and fro in the name of the Cardinall de Medicis. tlast, the bands that were leuied of the Canton of Surich, who as they have a greater authoy, fothey make profession to do things with a greater gravity', refused it constantly: the oers after many doubts and objections, neither expresly denied, nor manifelly accepted the fers that were made to them, for that as they refused not ro follow the armie, so yet it was ithout declaration that they would enter with them into the Duchic of Millan. So that, what the counsell of the Cardinall of Sion, and labour of the Captaines, into whose wils were made any corrupt infinuations by offers and promifes, the army determined to march on under this pe, that fince they refused not to follow, they would not be hard to be drawne to any place here the army went.

The bands of Surich containing foure thousand in number, brake off and returned toward Reggia: and the army after it had remained about a moneth betweene Gabbionesta and Offsano ioyned with the other Smiffers at Gambaro: they caried marching in the middelt of them the two Legats of Sion and Medicis with their croffes of filuer, enuironed with infinite weapons, artille ries, blasphemers, mankillers, & robbers: so much at that time did they abuse the reverence of reli gion. They went in three removings of campe through the lands of the Venetians to Orchineche, towne of their obedience, making this excuse to the Senate, that it was a passage necessary, an that they had no intention or defire to offend them. In the same fort was it excused to ther when Andrewe Gritts their Agent was constrained to consent to Monsieur Lawtrech, to send as tilleries to Pontuske, At Orchmeche arrived certaine Cutriers sent by the Lords of the Canton to commaund the Swiffers to depart from the army, fending also the like commaundement by o ther Postes to the bands that were in the French campe, to whom was alleaged, that it was thing vnworthy the reputation of their name and countrey, to fuffer the footemen of their na tion to serue vnder publike Enfignes in the armics of two enemies: but these commandement brought forth diverse effects, for, the Postes that were dispatched to the campe of the League were by comming stayed in the way, so that they came not so farre as to those bands that were with the Cardinall of Sion . And touching the companies that followed the French campe they dismissed themselves immediatly without bidding sarewell, not that they moved by th commandements that were fent, and much leffe for the longnesse of the warre, wherein they ar wont to be most impatient about all other nations. But they saw into the disability of Monsieur a Lawrech to answer their payes, who as he had of long time received no mony out of Fraunce, f. the extreame exactions which he levied vpon the Duchie of Millan were farre infufficient to fa tisfie his charge.

Here may be gathered a fit experiences how much the enuie and indifcretion of officers bring prejudice and domage to Princes, who either through negligence have no employment in affaire or elfe by incapacity, are not able of themselves to discerne good counsels from evill: for, where d rection was given for the leuying of three hundred thousand crownes to be sent to Lawtrech ac cording to the kings promise: the Lady Regent being the kings mother, bare so great emula tion of his greatnesse, that vsing her enuie against the profite of her some, she procured the Treasurers and Receivers without the kings privitie, to turne that summe to another vse. The same being the cause that Monsieur Lawtrech suffered himselfe to runne into consussion and pr uate griefe, fince by the departing of the Swiffers, the successe of the waires which afore he pre mifed to be good and happie, was become full of doubts and dispaire : and therefore for bearing to contend against enuie, fortune and the time, he bestowed garrisons in Cremona an Pi/queton, and reduced himselfe with the residue of the atmie to Cassan, hoping to give impe diment to the enemies to passe Adda, both in respect of the ordinarie difficulties which follow armiesthat are to passe rivers when there stands resistance upon the shore opposite, and also se the oportunity of the place, bearing his banke towards Millan verie high and raised, and there fore the offence is greater that is done to the enemies with the artilleries, then that which the can receiue.

On the other fide, the Legats Apostolike and the Captaines were broken up from Orchi neche, and passing effloores the riner of Oglio, were come in three removings to Rivolco, no feeling any more the incommodity of victuals, for that they were plentifully relieued by the townes of Guaradadda, which the Frenchmen had lest abandoned. At this place, as both the armies were upon tearmes, the one to winne, and the other to stoppe the passing of the tuer, Prosper and the other Captaines made preparation to build a bridge betweene Rivolco and Cassan; a matter very doubtfull and hard for the stopping of the enemies. When in having consumed two or three dayes in controversies and counsels, at last Prosper whould not communicate his thoughts with the Marquis of Pesquiero, to the ende he show have no interest in the glory of that action, and much lesse would vie the service of the Speniards least they would disclose his deuise, caused secretly to be taken from the river of Bemb two small backes, and sent by night with great silence certaine bands of Italian sootneen to pass the river right against the towne of Vanny: Vanny is a towne open, discovered, and without was and hath his situation upon the barkes of Adda five miles from Cassan: There is convenient passage over the river, & in the middest of the towne is there a small circuit of wal raised in sorme The studiers of a lule Castell: there were for the gard of this place, certaine bands of horsmen under the charge of the league of Hugh de Popoly Lieutenant to the men at arms which the French king had given to Ostanian taste the river Fregosa: vpon the hearing of the noyse that was made, he presented himselfe vpou the banke or shadda, show, from the which he was presently repulsed with sorce of shot, and yet it was thought that he might easily have maintained resistance, if a certaine troupe of hargubuziers had loyned with those horsmen which he had with him; a matter which afterwards he said he did require of Mon-

As the footmen passed in troupes and numbers, so they assembled and drew into strength in a place within the towne raifed and somewhat fortified, expecting there the succours which Profer had appointed: who affoone as he was aduertifed of that happie beginning, caused to be turned that way almost all the footebands of the army bestowed in diverse boroughs of Guiaradadda, to who he gaue this order, that as they arriued they should passe successively upon the same small barkes, and vpon two others that were appointed to follow the armie to serile for bridges ouer rivers, which by night were caried ouer land to the same banke or shore: then he and the other Captaines with the Cardinall Medicis tooke forthwith the fame way, leaving this commandement to fuch as tatied at Rivolto, that if the Frenchmen retired from thence, they should mmediatly fet vp the bridge. But at Vaury the successe of the enterprise was vncertaine or certaine howers, for, if Monsieur Lawtrech upon his first aductisement of the passing of is enemies, had converted thither one part of the armie, he had no doubt given them the ouerthrowe: but after he had spent certaine howers in doubt what he had to do, he dispatthed thither Monfieur a Efend with foure hundred Launces and the bands of the French footenen, causing to be drawne afterwards certaine peeces of artilleries . Monsieur d'Escud and his egiments marched thither in great diligence, and beganne very resolutely to charge the place wherethe enemies were retired, enen at the same time that the succours which were expected ppeared upon the other shore: for whose comming, together with the hope that they brought, he enemics made a valiant defence, notwithstanding that Monsieur a' Escud descended on foote vith all his men at armes, and made so resolute a fight in the straightes of the streetes, that if the ttilleries had come in time, his valour no doubt had given them the overthrowe: but on the ther fide the shore, did make speede to passe as much as the fraught of the barkes could carie, Tegane Captaine of the Grisons, and two Enfignes of Spanish footemen, pushed on with the omforts and speeches of Cardinall de Medicis and the other Captaines. And as in matters of xecution examples do wuch, so in this heate of valour and valiant doings, John de Medicis, ore moued of his naturall magnanimity and great defire of glorie, then by any other mans icitation, fwam ouer the deepnesse of the water vpon a Turkish horse to the other side, giving that action both a present seare to the enemy, and a just courage to his owne companies. it last notwithstanding the present arrivall of the artilleries, Monsieur a' Escud finding the dence that was made to be so sarre aboue his forces, and his fortune no lesse inseriour, that he ould not but dispaire of the victory, retired to Cassan with the losse of an Ensigne, and by his nample Lawtrech departed from Cassan, and withdrew to Australian with the whole army. here, whether it was that he would not lofe the occasion to fatisfie his hate conceived afore, or hether he thought that by that spectacle he should make himselfe more feared and redobuted, e caused to be executed publikely, Christopher Palnossin: an action of great pitie and compason to behold, no lesse for the noblenesse of his house, greatnesse and authority of his person, ad flourishing estate of his age, then for that he was committed, to prison many moneths ore the warre; in which point his instice was not without extreame feneritie. By this offing ouer Adda, Profer wonne a name and glory about the Sunne: he was afore not only famous at Rome, but contemned throughout the whole army, not so much for his breaking frombefore Parma, as for his cultome in protracting the warre: but now, as it often hapth that things done first, loose their memorie by the consideration of such as follow and are one afterwards, to the infamic of his former vices was now defaced, and the minds of all men nuerted to prayle and extoll him, the rather for that without bloud and daunger, yea altother with counsell and industrie worthy of so well experienced a Captaine, he had stolne om the enemies the passage of that river : a matter which Monsieur Lawtrech did not onely Ggg 2

promife to himselfe and his whole armie to let and sloppe, but also affured it absolutely to the king under his writing and publike protestations: and yet (such emulation followeth valout and the glory thereof) there were some, who with reasons either true, or apparant, laboured to diminish the glory of this action, wherein they alleaged that there was no vertue nor rare industry neither in the invention nor in the execution: for that nature and naturall providence doth teach all men finding impediments in rivers and thraite passages, to search and sound some other way to passe either higher or lower, where nothing is objected to stop them. They could say also that the passage of Vaury was at hand, and by his ordinary frequentation a passage very convenient, and that Lawtrech had bene so carelesse to gard it, that his negligence had left no place to induffrie: so that in no other thing could be recommended the providence of Prosper, then that with fecrecie he had made provision of the barkes, and managed the whole enterprise with necessary filence. There were other also, who perhaps either too diligent to judge of things, or more ready to reprehend faults that be doubtfull, then apt to commend actions and doings certaine, were not contented to diminish the renowme of his industrie, but with a spirite more enuious, they iuliified that there was in him neither providence nor order convenient: for, fay they, in no fending commaundement to those bands to slirge that were appointed for succours and lodged within Treny, Caranagge and many other places, but when the footemen whom he had fen before were possessed or Vaury: it fell out that the first companies could not arrive upon the shore of theriuer untill noone, which was sourceene houres after the first bands of sootmen were palt: so that if Monsieur Lawtrech had done presently upon the aduertisement that wa tent to him, the thing which he did many houres after, there is no doubt but he had recove red Vaury, and given the overthrowe to those sootebandes that were passed, for that the suc « cours or refeue were too flowe and lingring : But fuch interpretations and fancies of men di-" nothing at all deprate the glorie of Profeer, for that commonly in humaine wittes this col "lection is made, that they judge the counsels of men by the cuent of things, and so fome se times with praise and sometimes with dishonour according as the successe is happie or con "trarie, they give that to counsell and providence, which for the most part takes his proceeding cof fortune.

Monlieur Lawtrech being departed from the shores of Adda, it was to be doubted that the nemics who the day following builded a bridge betweene Rinolta & Cassan, wold draw neare t Millan as fast as they could: yet Prosper, whole cousell albeit was blamed by the popular fort, we yet approved by fuch as faw into the science of war, was of mind that in taking a longer circuit they should march the first day to incampe at Marignan, a towne equally distant from Millan & Paula: for, being not possible for the hardnesse of the time both cold and rainy, to keepe the field he judged it best to draw neare to Millan on that side, by the which ishe found it hard to enter, t might immediatly turne to Pama, where Lawtrech had left no garrison, for that he sought to re duce all his forces to Millanin which city both for the plenty of victuals, & many other oportun ties, he thought to settle the seate of the war. On the other fide, M. Lawtrech whose army of soe men was reduced to a very finall number, had from the beginning deuised to gard only the Cit of Millan: but confidering afterwards that if he abandoned the fuburbes, he gaue meaner the enemy to lodge and incampe, and therewithall many ready opportunities to take the town he changed opinion, and determined as yet to defend the suburbes. This no doubt was a rese lure and wife counfell, if it had bene accompanied with that vigilancy that appertained, for that b it, confidering the vilooked for accidents that fell within few dayes after, things had brough forth another issue then they did. But the army of the league being lodged for the greatest part Marignan, & the Smiffers more forward in the Abbay of Clernault, after they had remained the three dayes to expect the artilleries which could not follow for the extremity of the wayes: pro fented themselves the xix, day of November before Atillan, having this intention, that if the could not enter the same day, they would depart the day after and draw to Pania, whither wi already dispatched part of the light horsmen to take possession of the towne. There hapned the morning this matter worthy of memory, as the Legates and Chieftaines of the army itood in medow neare to Clernault to give place to the Smiffers to passe, there came to them an old ma aspect & habit popular, who telling them that he was sent by the parish of S. Cir in Millan soli ted & called vpo the with great exclamatios to passe further: for that saith he, order was give the

not onely the patish of Saint Cir, but all the parts of Millan vpon the approching of the army would rife and take armes against the Frenchmen at the vinuerfall ringing of the bels of euery parish. This relation was made more wonderfull by the consideration of the man and his departure, for that not with stading al their diligence to find him againe, they could never learne what he was, . nor by whom he was fent. The army then marched in order towards the gate of Rome, and the Thetaline of creatartilleries stayed at the entry of a way which turneth to Pania . The Marquis of Pelquiero Millanby the who was in the former front of the battell with his bands of Spanish footmen, obseruing the comming on of the euening, drew neare the trench that is betweene the gate of Rome, and the port Thefin, & presenting his harquebuziers against a battillion made in a place called Vicentin, neare the gate named Lodowikes gate, and that more to make a triall, then in hope to cary it, the Venetian footebands that garded the place, after they had with much ado endured the presence of the enemies, gaue their backes with an incredible basenesse of mind, by whose example the Spef-Grethat lay neare them, put themselves to flight, their feare being greater then their fidelity . By which yeelding, the Spanish footebands that passed the trenchand the rampier without any imnediment, entred with the fame facility the suburbes, and in that hurliburley of entring they tooke and hurt lightly Theodor Trinulce being all difarmed vpon a little nagge, who payed afterward to the Marquis of Pesquiero for his liberty twentic thousand duckats. In this confusion of eare and perill, Andrew Gritti with many others made way with great hardnesse for their safety, who after by the benefite of chase and slying, they were effloones writed with the French; they etired altogether into the towne by fetching a very long compasse: but both for that they had made no prouision for their defence, and also that they had no strength of sootemen, and therewithall the people disposed to rebell, they stayed about the Castell. On the other side, the Marquis of Pesquiero in whom wanted no diligence to follow his fortune, made his approch to the rate of Rome (the gates of the City and the luburbes beare all one name) & was received into the owne by the principall partners of the Gebelm faction, having the gate in gard. And not long aferthe Cardinall Medicis, the Marquis of Mantua, Profer, and one part of the army made heir entric in the same sort by the port Thesin, the victors themselves being almost ignorant in what manner or by what disorder they had won so great a victory: onely the principall cause roceeded of the negligence of the Frenchmen, for that (as was differned afterwards) Monfieur Camerech had no aduertisement that the enemies were removed that day, yea it was beleeved hat he affured himselfe, that for the disaduantage of the wayes being much disordered and broen with the raynes that were fallen, they would not that day make their artilleries march, vithout the which he neuer thought that they would affault the rampiers : yea fuch was his feurity, that at the same time that the enemic entred the rampiers, he was walking vnarmed in he City of Millan, accompanied with other Captaines, without any cogitation of enterprise, salfo Monsieur d'Escind being made wearie with watching the night before, was layd downe ofleepe in his owne lodging; both of them being beguiled in the care which they ought to sue had of their proper safety, honor and reputation. And yet it seemed fortune reserved for them favour which their destiny would not let them enjoy : for if Monsieur de Lamtrech after his are and flying had reassembled his people upon the Castell greene, it was beleeved that there as offered to him no little occasion to offend the enemies, for that one part were dispersed disrderly within Millan, another part stood houering in the suburbes in confusion, and therefiue remained without in a troubled expectation. But what through his feare, which could not creappeased, and what by the errour of the darke night to discerne in so little time the estate fibe enemies, he departed the same night to Coma, where leaving fiftie men at armes and xe hundred footemen, he tooke the way by the parish of Inzina, and so after he was passed Adda Lecco, he drew to the countrey of Bergama, the Castell of Millan remaining well garded and furnished . Lods and Pania followed the example of Millan: and at the same time the Bishop Polloya and Vitelli, who leaving Parma behind them, had taken the way of Plassance, were illingly received into that City. The like successe they had in Cremona, where vpon the newes ot onely that Millan was taken, but also that the French were ouerthrowne, the people ran to mes and cried vpon the name of the Empire and Duke of Millan: Associate as the commotion as understood by Monsieur Lawerech, who was then arrived upon the territories of Berma, he dispatched thither Monsieur d'Escud with one part of the armie to recouer it : he was repulsed by the people, by which occasion Lamtrech notwithstanding be had very small hope of good successe, for that the Swiffers that were within Parma might easily succour it, wen thither with the whole arme, having first given order that Federike de Bossolo should abandon · Parma, holding it a matter of too great difficulty to furnish so many places. This enterprise drey with it a good fuccesse and issue: for, notwithstanding that Cardinall Medicis associates heve derstood of the rebellion of Cremona, had fent to the Bishop of Pistoy, that the better to affut fuch a conquest, he should dispatch thither one part of the Smiffers: yet because he would neithe deuide them, nor intangle himselfe with other affaires, standing alwayes upon a defire to go wit them to an enterprise determined upon Genes, he lingred so long, that he left sufficient time to Munsieur Lamtrech to recouerit, having both the Castell to hold for him, and also knowing there was to be objected against him no other defence then a confused refistance of the people in whomhe discerned already an inclination to yeeld, for that they sent Embassadors to solicit their pardon. This good event ministred eftsoones some good courage and life to Monsien Lawtrech, who fent forthwith to Federike Boffolo not to abandon Parma: but he was departed afore the formons came, and had passed Paw with his bands and companies: at what tim Vitelli who went to Plaisance with his companies, and was not farre from Parma when Federik departed, was called in by an universall consent of the people, and made his entrie. The Cap taines and Affiliantes of the League deuised how to recour the refidue of the estate, under the foundation, to make no more so great expences: and accordingly they dispatched from Milla at the same time the Marquis of Pesquiero with his bands of Spaniards and the Launceknight and Gresons, to lay siege to Coma. In which enterprise it may be doubted whether was mor forward his defire or his fortune, for he had no fooner begunne to enforce the terrour of his artil leries, then the defendants dispayring of rescue, agreed to render vp. the place under conditio of fafety of life and goods, as well to the French bands as to the inhabitants of the towne: and ye when the Frenchmen were vpon their departure, the Spaniards made their entrie and sacked i to the great infamy of the Marquis, who being afterwards accused of faith breaking by tol Chabannes chiefe of the French bands within Coma, was by him defied and chalenged t the combate.

At the same instant they of the League sent the Bishop of Verula to the Swiffers, to affire the of their wils, neuerthelesse as he was come to Besinfone they committed him to ward, so that standing ill contented that their regiments of footmen had marched against the French king they did not only complaine of the Cardinall of Sion and the Pope, but also of all their minister and officers: but chiefly they inueved against the Bishop of Verula, for that being the Popes Nuclei with them at such time as they levied their men, he laboured to induce them to go against the exception under the which they had bene accorded.

The efface and affaires of the warre was reduced into these tearmes, with a wonderfull hope the Pope and Cafar to confirme the victory, both for that the French king had no meane to di patch with expedition new companies into Italy, and also for themselves they thought thepe wer of those who had won Alillan you him with the most part of the Duchy, was sufficie not onely to preserve it, but also to runne through all the residue that remained in the hands the enemy. Yea fuch a thing is terrour, that the Senate of Venice searing least the water b gunne against others would fall vpon them, gaue hope to the Pope to cause the French ban to depart out of their lands. But of thoughts sudden beganne to spring an accident villook for: for, newes came that the Pope was dead suddenly thefirst day of December: as helay the village of of Magliana whither he went oftentimes for his recreation, he heard the first port of the taking of Millan, which stirred in him such an extreame passion of ioy, that the sat night he entred into a small feauer: and for his better remedie he caused himselfe the next day beremoued to Rome, where he died within very few dayes after, not withflanding the Phifitions the beginning made no great reckening of his disease. There was great suspicion that he w poysoned by Barnaby Malespina his Chamberleine, whose office was alwayes to give him drink and yet though he was made prisoner through the suspition of the sact & the vehement realct of the same: yet the matter was dashed and the examination thereof, for that the Cardinall Me. eis assoone as he came to Rome, set him at liberty, searing to fall surther into the disgrace of the French king, by whose practise it was supposed that Barnaby gaue him the satall drinke. This w.

The death of Pope Leothe senth, out whispered secretly, the author being no lesse doubtfull then the consectures vincertaine: he lied, if we consider the common opinion of men, in verie great glorie and selicitie, not so much for hat by the surprising of Mollan he saw himselfe delivered of daungers and expences intollerable, which having drayned him of all store of money and treasure, he was constrained to advance all means and manners for his supply and relicuing: but also that a verie sew dayes afore his death he received advertisement of the taking of Plansance, and the very day he died, newes came to him of the winning of Parma; a matter so greatly desired by him, that a such time as he debated to noue warre against the Frenchmen, it is verie well removed that he said to the Cardinall de Melici labouring to dissinate him, that as he was in nothing more caried to the delire of that warre, hento recover to the Church those two cities, so when some God should blesse him with the effect of that desire, it would not grieve him to die. He was a Prince in whom were many things worthy to be commended and blamed, and in the estate and discourse of his life he deceived greatly the expectation that was had of him when he was created Pope, for that his governement vas with a greater discretion, but with farre lesse bounty then was looked for.

The death of the Pope did greatly diminish the affaires of Casar in Italy, as also it was not vnikely that fuchan enemy being taken away, with whose money the whole warre was both beun and continued, both the French king would enter into a new spirit, and disparch a new armie nto Italy, and also the Venetians for the same causes would recontinue the confederation they had vith him: fo that it feemed that by this accident, the denifes to affaile Cremona and Genes vanihed and were dissoluted : and the officers of Cafar , who till then had payd the Spanish bands, vith great difficultie were constrained to dismisse a great part of them; a matter not without launger, since there were holden yet for the king Gremona, Genes, Alexandria, and Castle of Millan, the Cattles of Nouaro and Tressa, Pisqueton, Domussolo, Arona, and all the Lake major: resides, the rocke of Pontremo was estsoones returned to his denotion, which being lost before, vas reconquered by Sinibaldo de Fiefquo and the Count Nocero. Neither had the affaires of the rench king anie good successe beyond the mounts, for that Casar bringing warre vpon Flauners, had taken from him the Citie of Tournay, and not long after the Caltle, wherein were no mall quantities of artilleries and munitions: in so much that by reason of the Popes death, new ouernements, new counsels, and new estates of affaires and doings were introduced into the Duchie of Millan. The Cardinals of Syon and Medicis made forthwith to Rome, to communiate in the election of the new Pope. The Imperials kept retained with them fifteene hundred. cotmen Smiffers, and difinisfed all the others, together with the Launceknights, who went heir way : the bands of the Florentines tooke their way to returne into Tuscane : touching the egiments of the Church, Guido Rangonled one part of them to Modena, and the other remaied in the estate of Aullan with the Marquis of Mantua, and that more of his proper resolution nen by the consent of the Colledge of Cardinals, who standing devided amongst themselves, ould bring forth nothing in determinatio: infomuch as when Monsieur Lawtrech, made his comlaints to them, that the fouldiers of the Church remayned upon the Duchie of Millan to the rejudice of the French king, to whom for the charitable actions of his predeceffors done to the hurch, was transferred the title of Protector and eldel fonne of the fame; they could not agree preturne other answer or resolution, then that they referred his remedy to the determination fthe Pope to come. Of those Swiffers that were in Plaisance, one part went with the Bishop f Piffoy to Alodena, for the defence of that Citie and Reggia against the Duke of Ferrara, who nniediatly vpon the death of the Pope had taken the field with an hundred men at armes, two nouland footmen, and three hundred light horlinen, and lo went to incampe before Cente, after e had recouered by the will of the inhabitants Bondene, Finalo, the mountaine of Modena, and Parfagnano, and with the same facility had taken Lugo, Bagnacauall, with other townes fRomagnia. Those Swiffers that were of the Canton of Zurich continued at Plaisance, and or that they would not fuffer themselves to be separated, they would not give leave to a thouand of them to go to the guard of Parma, which Citie remaining almost disfurnished, Monsieur Laweresh being then within Cremona with fixe hundred Launces, and two thousand fivehunred footnien, tooke occasion of the nakednesse of the place, to attempt to reconcuer it, being secially induced to the action by Federike Bossolo, who caried great credite in that matter for repeculiar kilowlèdge he had in enterprises of like nature."

The Frenchme before Parma.

It was then determined that M. de Bonneuall with three hundred Launces, and Federike an Marke Anth. Colonno, the one with the French footmen, the other with the Venetian bands con taining in one strength and general number five thousand bodies, should be employed to surpris the citie of Parma, wherein were fixe hundred footmen Italians, and fiftie men at armes of th Marquis of Mantua, besides that the people & inhabitants were at the deuotion of the Church but flenderly armed, and no leffe ill contented for the memorie of the French, and violences yfe by Federike. With these was also concurrant this addantage, that of that part of the towne which had bene battered by the Campe of the Church, the walles lay yet on the ground without any re floring or repairing: laftly, the Sea Apostolike was in vacation, a matter which is alwayes wontt keepe the minds of men in variation, and make gouernours rather carefull of their proper fafety then to looke to the defence of townes, as not knowing for whom they should put themselues in to daunger. So that with these foundations, the French footemen were sent below, along the rine of Paw even vnto Torricelle, where the bands of men at armes that were come from Cremona b land, joyned with them: and many Barkes being fent thither from Cremona, they passed our Pam by night to Torricelle, which is within twelve miles of Parma, having to follow them by d rection Marke Anth. Colonno with the Venetian footbands that were lodged upon Oglio. Fraun cis Guicciardin was sent thither for the guard of the towne by commission of Cardinall de Me dicis, and doubting of the daunger that was so apparant, he caused to call together by night th whole people and inhabitants, whom he encouraged to stand valiantly to the defence of the liues and libertie: and because they should fight against their perill more with weapons then wit words, he caused to be bestowed among them two thousand pikes, which two dayes before h had fent for from Reggia: it imported him much to be carefull to make prouisions necessaries defence, wherein by fo much greater was his diligence and studie, by how much more both the time and the place ministred many difficulties, both for that the small numbers of souldiers within the towne were not sufficient to defend it, without the ayde of the people, vpon whom in thos fodaine and daungerous cases can be laid no firme foundation, for the variablenesse of their cor dition: and also for that he faw it impossible to let the enemies for entring the Codipont, for which cause he retired the fouldiers and all the townes-men into the other part of the citie, but not with out a wonderfull difficultie: for, having a vaine perswasion amongst them, that it might be defer ded, as also the inhabitants of that quarter, interpreting to rigour and hardnesse to leave abando ned their owne houses, they could not be disposed to it neither with reasons, 'nor with authoriti untill they faw the enemies approch: because the inhabitants were so long afore they would b perfwaded to retire, the enemy lacked not much to enter with them pelmell into the other pa of the towne, where concurred at one time many difficulties, both necessity of mony, and incor ueniency of the time, being the felfe fame day wherein they were to pay the footbands, who pre tested to go out of the towne if they were not satisfied of their payes within xxiiij. houres. Th first day Federike Bosolo with three thousand footemen and certaine light horsemen, entredth Codipone which was left abandoned: the day after arrived there M.de Tongenall with the Frenc Launces, and Marke Anth, with 2000 tootmen Venetians: they had not with them other artille ries then two Sakers, for that by the impediment of the ill wayes all along Pam, the places bein lowe and apt to retaine water, made it verie hard for the vie of carts to draw greater artilleries which had not bene without loffe of time, and that contrary to their hopes, grounded altogethe vpon celeritie and diligence, for that they feared in lingring much, least Parma should receiv fome rescue either from Modena or from Platsance. Neuerthelesse the inhabitants being abuse with the fancies and feares of certaine paylants of the countrey that were fled, flood possession with an opinion that the great artilleries were comming: by which occasion they were entred if to aswonderfull terrour, and the same redoubled by a deuise of Federike, who having taken in the countrey certaine Citizens, he made them assuredly beleeve by certaine rebels of Farma whice he had with him, that Marke Anth, and the Frenchmen came after with a great armie and arti leries: and after he had let them go to Parma, they brought newes touching the forces of the ene mies and other things, much against the truth, and so replenished the people with terrour and? maze, that not only the Commons through all the quarters of the towne, but even their Magi strates and counsell, having charge of the affaires publike, began with importunities to entreat the Gouernour, that what for the safetie of himselfe and his souldiers, and to deliuer the Citie fr

mitude and facking, he would fuffer them to compound with the enemies. Against which deaund whilest the Gouernout made refistance, sometimes with reasons, and sometimes with equelts, & confumed the time in debating, there happed this new difficultie, that the pay day beng come, the fouldiers that were drawne into infurrection, publifhed in maner of tumult, that if hey were not paid, they would depart the towne: So lit! affurance is there in fouldiers mercena- 20 e, in whom in times of triall and danger, is commonly found leffe fidelity then forwardneffe, and >> nore corruption then constancie, and seruing but for pay, they have no regards about the defire ,, fmoney and gaine. Neuertheleffe the Agent or treasurer obtained with manie perswasions of ,, he inhabitants, to furnish one part of the money, which though they had promised before, yet ney became flowe to performe, notwith landing he declared to them that in all enents & chanes that action would fland them inno small flead of justification with the Popes to come : with his mony he reappealed the tumult as well as he could, the same being the cause that the seare of nepeople augmented. And as the fouldiers, who for their finall numbers faw themselves at the ilcrerion of the people, and had no furetie of any one of the Citie, to they entred into present sufition that the forces that were both within and without would fet vpon them at one time : infonuch as they rather wished that the Citie would render by accord under capitulations of their ifetie, then to continue and dwell in that daunger: So vnquiet a passion is seare, that whom " possesset, it maketh them nothing lesse apt then to be resolute or constant, and keepeth them, epriued of that reason and counsell which in other cases is the guide of mortall men and their ... oings. But in this estate of affaires reduced thus to extremities, it was necessarie for the gouetour to shew himselfe constant and absolute, & therfore he sometimes assured the souldiers that neperill was aswell comon to him as to the, & somtimes he stirred up the principals of the towne flembled in counsell, with whom he reasoned that there was no occasion of feare, for that he vas affored the enemies caused not to march their great artilleries, without the which it was both hildish & scornefull to doubt that by the benefit of scaling ladders they would offer to enter or ... orce the towne, wherin was a fufficient strength of youth and fouldiers to make resistance aainst a far greater violence:he told them he had fent to require succours at Modena, where were re Smiffers, Vitelli, & Guido Rangon, with their bands, not doubting but that the day following eshold be supplied with such a strength as wold be able to enforce the enemy to depart that alrelin regard of their own honor, as for feare least with the looking of Parma, there happed not a teater diforder, those succoss wold make halte & rheir rescue be almost as ready as their danger: nat he had fent to Plaisance for the same matter, & for the same reasons he had manifest hope to erelicued fro thence : that they had to confider that the Pope being dead, who had honored him inththe credit of that place wherein he was, there remained to him no interest or bond (if things ood vpo fuch fuch termes as they imagined) to fubicat himfelf to a perill fo apparant; for that acording to experiece & comon exaples pall, much leffe that the officers of the Pope deceased can spectof the Pope to come any degree of recopence, fince it was most likely that the Pope of the ew election wold become enemy to Florence his naturall country: for which reasons he had no aule to defire the greatueffe of the Church, respects publike being no lesse against it the occasios riuate only fuch might be the concurrance of accidents, that the diminution of the fame wold be noll acceptable to him: that touching his owne particular, he had not within Parma either wife, hildren, or any goods, for the which he was to feare that by the translation of the gouernmet they right be made a pray to the lufts, to the infolencies, & rapines of the French: that laftly, fince he ad no reason to hope for any profite by the desence of Parma, and lesse seare (by rendring it) of neaduerfities they had proued under the hard yoke of the French, & taking it by force, his peron communicating in the fame daungers that they did they might be affured that no other thing noued him to remaine constant, then the manifest knowledge he had that the enemies had no oility to force the towne without their great artilleries; of which as he was affored, they had none all, so if he Hood in doubt, it stood him vpon not to Hand against the accord, having no lesse care this owne fafety, then all they had defire to anoy d their common daunger: feeing withall, that y the vacation of the Sea Apostolike, and he not able in such a towne as that was, to oppose mfelfe against so great an inclination and will of the people, he could not be within daunger of oputation, and much lesse stand charged with their renolt. With rhese reasons sometimes ealing apart and feuerall with many particulars, and fometimes disputing with them also gether

and fometimes leading them along the walles, and eftfoones reasoning with them of oil er prop fions, he robbed the time from then, and entertained them all the night: yea he was not ignorathat not with standing they had vehement imaginations to compound with the enemies, and the not for other cause then for seare to be passed into captimity and spoile; yet they retained th confideration, that in according without his content, they could not avoid the note of rebe and faith-breakers. But affoone as the day appeared, which was a day dedicated to Saint Thom. the Apostle, they began to know by the bullets that were shot from the two sakers planted the the fame night, that the enemies had no pecces for batterie: which made the gouernour to hot that returning to counfell, he should find them chaunged and assured, but he found them of di position contrarie, their seares being by so much augmented & redoubled, by how much by the light of the day making them able to differne, they effected themselves to be neare the peri infomuch as laying afide all regards to fidelitie, & aptneffe to heare teason, they began with m nifest instance, with protestations and threatnings to compell him to aduaunce the composition se Such is the rage of a multitude unbridled, and so violently do they run to execute the thing which ce in their feares they have imagined, that their minds being once made timerous, there is nothin " leffe respected with them then the thing which should most affure them. The Gouernour mac answer with a lively resolution and libertie of mind, that since he had no power to stop in the the course of those speeches & thoughts, which he wold do, if he had in Parma a greater strengtl there remained to him no other fatifiaction of the injurie which they were determined to dot the Sea Apostolike, & to him being a minister of the same, then that they could not avoid the ir famie of rebellion, and imputation of difloyalty to their Lords, if reason could not hold them from executing the resolution which their timerous condition had slirted in them: he reproched to the with vehement words the oath of homage & fidelity, which a few dayes before they had folenu ly made to him on the behalfe of the Sea Apostolike: he told them, that though he saw afore h eyes their destruction & death manifest, yet they were not to draw fro him any other conclusion then that he would continue to make good his faith in that feruice, yntill either by supplies of new bands, or by the comming of great artilleries to the campe of the enemies, or some other accider hapning, he were fatisfied that the daunger was more manifest to loose the towne, then the hor greater to defend it. He flung out of the Counsellimmediatly vpon the deliuery of these spec ches, partly to leave them founding in their eares, and imprinted in their minds with greater at thoritie, and partly to give order to many things necessarie, if the enemies should offer to give to the assault that day, as was believed: but they remained in suspence, and stood so much the more confused, by how much their reason was lesse then their feares: whereupon yeelding at la the thing that could least affure them, and subduing in their fearfulnesse all other good regards they refolued to fend out at adventure to folicite an accord, dispatching withall certaine of ther to the gouernor, to protell to him, that if he cotinued obflinate to cofent to their fafety, they were determined by their owne meane, both to put away the perill that was towards them, and to pre ferue the City fro the spoyle that they faw preteded; but at the verie instant that they were deter mined to addresse their Embassage, there began to be heard on all sides the cries of such as gar ded the gates and the wals, together with the Alarme founded by the bels of the high tower of the Citie, which gaue the figne that the enemies being issued out of the Codipone in order of battel made their approches to the walles to give the affault: by which occasion the Governour return ning to those that he had not spoke to as yet, cried vnto the, that though all men were willing, ye the time now was incouenient tocome to accord: This is the election (faith he) you stand in eithe " to defend your lines honourably, or to fee your Citic put to shamefull facke, and your selnes de " liuered into captiuitie: your aduerfity calleth you to be warned by the example of R auenna an "Capua, whose inhabitants and the eyes of the naturall children borne in them, saw them misera bly facked, even as they were foliciting an accord with the enemies that flood upon the walles: " have done hitherunto as much as might be concluded in the abilitie of one alone: my will hat bene so much about my power, by how much my fortune hathbene lesse then my meanes: " haue gouerned you thus long, not more to mine owne praise then to your profite, not lesse t "your vniuerfall fafetie, then to the due fatisfaction of the place I hold, and now have Il ed yout cthis election whether, you will vanquish or die. I would of my selfe I could suffice to defend the sthing which our fortune hath made not to be preserved without your ayde, then should you se vith what affection I defire to defend or to die: Be not the more discouraged for the nearenesse », styour perill, let not your confidence be so much abated, by how much your danger is imminent: >> live not leffe to vanquish feare then to overcome shame : and be not leffe resolute to defend, out lines, your goods, the honour of your wines and daughters, then you have bene importu-,, ate to defire withour any necessitie to runne into willing seruitude of the French, in whom you te not ignorant remaineth a naturall malice towards you. After these speeches, he turned his ,, orle away, and left them all possessed with contemplations of feare: but as necessity is mightic o make men resolute, so for that their sortune had left them now no time to proue other remelies, they let fall all parleis for accord, for the present necessity they had to defend themselves: for hat one part of the enemies, who the day before had gathered in the country a great quantity of aling ladders, made approch to the Baltillion which Federike had builded on that fide towards Par, and inuaded it valiantly: and at the fame time was a furious affault given to the gate that ades to Reggia, as also the fight was begunne in two other places, with so much the more ificultie of defence to them within, by how much the enemies were more braue and encounged by the examples of the Captaines; and the men of the towne filled full of terrour and owardile, went not to the walles, but closed themselves within their houses, as though eveemoment they had expected the latest ruine of the Citie. These assaults being releued manie mes, continued the space of soure houres, the daunger of the townes-men diminishing contiually, not so much for the wearinesse of the enemies, who by the wounds and harmes they resined in many places, began to loose hart, asalfo by the example of the Gouernour, and vaour of the townes-men, who feeing the defence to succeed well, tooke courage in their good rtune, and laboured more and more at the wall: infomuch that afore the affault retired, not nely the vinuerfall multitude of people was run thither togither with the Church-mento defend e breaches, but also in the action was concurrant the valour of many women, who despising the junger, were seene to carie wine and other refreshings to their husbands. By these, the enemies ithout dispairing of the victorie, retired with the losse of some, and manie wounded, to the Copant, from whence they dislodged the morning following, and so returned beyond Pan, after ey had remained a day or two about the borders of Parma. Federike confessed that in this spedition, whereof he was the authour, nothing did more beguile him, then that he would nerhaue beleeued, that in a Gouernour neither for his profession a man of warre, nor for his time any continuance in the citie, would be found fuch valour; that the Pope being dead, he would ther throw himselfe into daunger without anic hope of profite, then teeke for his safety which might do without his dishonour or infamie.

This defending of Parma hurt greatly the affaires of the French, for that it put the people of tillan & other fubiects of that state into greater hart to defend themselves then they had before: it specially they tooke courage when they knew what weakenesse of souldiers was within, and d received no fuccours abroad, for that befides that there came no refeue fro Plassance, neither e Swiffers that were within Modena, nor Guido R angon, nor Vitelli, would once make out amen for the succours of Parma: wherein Guido alleaged for his excuse, that not withstanding e duke of Ferrara because he could not take Cente defended by the Bolognois, was retired to Filoat fuch time as the Smiffers arrived: yet he stood afraid least he would attempt some violent tion vpon Modena being made naked of the garrison. And the Bishop of Pistora so wancred, and as troubled for the instant requests which Guiceiardin made to him, & for the perswasios of Vi-1, who for his owne interest stirred him up to passe into Romagnia with the Swiffers, to the end stop the passage of the Duke of Vrbin: that what for that he was irresolute, & what through his tutall flownesse, he did neither the one nor the other of those matters, both for that Parma dended her felf, & in Romagnia no impediment was given to the Duke of Vrbin, because the Swifwould not march for want of their payes: which Duke of Vrbin and with him Malatesta & orace of the family of the Basilons passed, the one to recour his estates lost, and the other to retne to Peroufa, having affembled at Ferrara 200 men at armes, 300 light horfmen, and 3000 otmen; an army which willingly followed them, partly for filedship, & partly for hope of spoile: fineither of the Frenchmen nor Venetians they could obtain no other fauout then a permission whosocuer had take their pay, to follow the, & that the Venetians were cotented that Malati-& Horace shold depart out of their pay. Thus they went from Ferrara to Lugo all alog Par,

The Duke of Vibin reenwesh his eflates, and finding no impediments in the estate of the Church, they drew neare to the Duchy of Vrbis where the Duke being galled in by the peoples, recourred presently his whole estate, except cer taine peeces holden by the Florentines, and so turning towards Pefera, he tooke the towne wit the fame facility, and within few dayes after the Castle: he joyned diligence to his good fortune & having chased out of Camerin , John Maria de V arana the ancient Lord , who for his greate dignity & illustration had obtained of Pope Leo the title of Duke; he bestowed within it Sign, mond a Gentleman of the fame family, by whom was pretended a better right in the fame effatt and yet the Duke, who was withdrawne within Aquala, kept full the caffle : and fo after the co pedition of these matters, he turned with Malatesta and Horace Baillon to Perousa, of whice place the Florentines had taken the defence, not fo much of their owne counfell, as following the will of the Cardinall de Medicis: wherein he was pushed on, either by a kind of hatred the he nourished against the Duke of Vrbin and the Baillons, or by the impediment of their neigh bourhood, which he thought might put in daunger the authority he had in Horence, or lastly, ic that aspiring to the Popedonie, he sought to carie the reputation that he alone was the defende of the Church during the Sea vacant, the Colledge of Cardinals having no care to defend an part of the Ecclefiastike dominion, neither in Lombardy, in Tuscane, nor else where: the same pre ceeding partly by the division of the Cardinals, being no lesse full of civill factions, then whol drowned in deepe ambition to climbe to the Popedome, and partly for that it could not be foun neither in the treasurie Pontificall, nor in the castle S. Angelo, that the late Pope had left any pre uision of money: for such were his prodigalities that he had not onely consumed the moneye which his predeceffor had left him, with an incredible quantity of treasure which he had leuicde the creation of new officers, with a yearely diminution of forty thousand duckets of reuenue, br also he had left the Sea charged with huge debts, & layd to pawn al the precious iewels of the hol treasurie: vp6 which occasion was published this suttle speech, that other Prelacies ended with the death of Popes, but the Pontificacie of Leo was to continue many yeares after. Onely the Arch bishop Vrsin was sent by the Colledge to Perou/a, to accord an unitie and reconcilement with the Baillons, but that deuise was no lesse vaine then the labour fruitlesse, for that the man was suspe cted to Gentill for the alliance he had with the somes of John Paule, and also for the condition that were offered, bearing no furety for him: infomuch, as towards the last day of the yearet Duke of Vrbin, Malatesta and Horace Baillon with Camilla Ursin, who being followed of ce taine voluntaries was newly vnited with them, went to Pont. S. John, and from thence running to the other places thereabouts, they did great domages as well by night as by day to the Cit of Perousa, where over and besides five hundred sootmen which Gentill had levied, the Flores tines had fent thither two thousand sootmen and an hundred light horsmen under Guido Vain and an hundred and twenty men at armes, and an hundred light horfmen ynder Vitells.

This time was quiet in the Duchie of Millan, no other thing being done by either of the partithen certaine roades and pillages: and the better to execute those domages upon places holde by the Church, those bands of Frenchmen which were remaining in Cremona being two thos fand footmen, had fet ypon a bridge ypon Pam, by the oportunitie wherof passing oftentimes vi on the territories of Plas (ance and Parma, they did harmes to the whole countrie : and motwit standing Prosper by the incitation of other Captaines did publish that he would take Trezzo, i had already fent thither artilleries, yet he forbare to put the deuise to execution, alleaging that was not convenient that the armie should be restrained to any one place, to the end to be the moreable to fuccour the estates of the Church, if the French should begin to execute any actic ypon them; but it feemed his thoughts were farre different from his words, for that when he w told that the French campe was planted before Parma, much leffe that he made anie figne to fu cour it, seeing he said it was more convenient to expect the event and issue; yea, that which mo is, at fuch time as Plasfance remained disfurnished of garrison, for that the Swiffers of the Cantol of Zurich, according to the summons of their Lords, were gone away in haste, Prosper did wh he could to let the Marquis of Mantua for going from Mellan with his bands: and he being pi within Plaisance, sustained that citie to his great praise with the footbands of his estates, not spe ring oftentimes to relieve their necessities with money.

Amid so manie daungers and variations, there was no prouision for the election of the ne Pope, a matter which was deferred to the great prejudice of the estate Ecclesiassike, both to give time to the absent Cardinals to resort to Rome, & also for that the Cardinals of Tures going fro Thurm to Rome, was detained in Millan by commaundement from Pruffer Colonno, to the end he should not affish the affembly in the Cociaire, for that he was a fauorer of the Frech: vpo whose reffraining the Colledge fet down a decree, that so many dayes would they tary to enter the Coclaue, how many the Cardinall Yurea either had bin or should be stopped fro passing further: but assoone as he was deliuered, the Coclaue assembled the xxvij. of Deceber, wherein were drawne together in solene affembly nine & thirtie Cardinals: so much was increased the nüber by the immoderate promotiós of Leo, at whose creatió were not present aboue soure & twentie Cardinals.

The first fact of the yeare a thousand fine hundred two and twentie, was the mutation of the eflate of Perousa, which according to the judgement of men, happed no leffethrough the cowardife of the defendants, then by the valour of the affailants: who with their voluntaries and followers, were rifen to a number of two hundred men at armes, three hundred lighthorsemen, and five thousand sootemen. This armie after it had lodged in the suburbes of Saint Peter, which they within had abandoned, gaue the fourth day of the yeare an affault with many numbers of ladders both at Saint Peters gate, Solions gate, and the gate Brogmo, with many other places, having first removed the defences of all these places with seven field peeces which the Duke of Ferrara had lent them. The affault began about the breach of the day, and beng many times relieued, it continued almost the whole day: and albeit entrie was made in wo or three places of the towne, which onely was defended by the fouldiers without the ayde of the people who stirred not, yet the affailants were alwayes repulsed with slaughter, which raue no leffe courage to Gentill, then hope to the Florentine Agent, to be able to defend it full vith no lesse felicitie and successe: but the timerousuesse of Vuelli was the cause that the mater drew an other cuent: for fearing least the people bearing more inclination the somes of John Paule then to Gentall, would rife in their favours, and finding it withall a matter of no litle inortance that they were bestowed in the suburbes between the two gates of Saint Peter : but rincipallie standing fearefull to loose his life vpon the ill euent of things, for the hatred which he new the Duke of Vrbin and the sonnes of lobn Paule bare to him; he signified in the night to ne other Captaines, that he would depart, alleaging that his presence would be to little purofe for the feruice, for that the day before he had received at the affault a wound whis foote rith a bullet, the anguilh whereof constrained him to keepe his bed. Geneill and the other Capines laboured him with many requestes to chaunge that intention, wherein albeit they layd efore him how hurtfull would be his departure to the whole service, & of no lesse ill example to ie fouldiers and people of the towne, yet they found him leffe apt to be removed then beinged to a man of his place and valour, and in that inclination they joyned with him to follow in : and so the same night they departed to Citta de Castello , leaving Perousa to receive ie Baillons, not without an incredible wonder to all those, who being aduertised by letters ritten the same night what good successe they within had the day before, heard within few oures after, how Vitelli and the refidue had cowardly left it abandoned.

The election of the new Pope was not yet accomplished, which had bene deferred by reason Election of Pope fthe discord that was amongest the Cardinals, deriving principally from the Cardinals de Me-Adrian the who aspired to the place, and who could do much for the reputation of his greatnesse. & for fixt. s revenues: he had also by the glory of the late conquest of Millan corrupted the voices of teene Cardinals, pushed on either by their proper interests, or for the affection they bare to him. by the memory of the benefites they had received of Pope Leo: yea fome of them were caed with this hope, that though he should not be able to carie the soueraigne seate of the Popeme, yet he would at least beare fauour to those that had stood with him and for him: but mawayes his ambition was fuspected, and many things were contrarie to his defire: for to many them it feemed a matter most prejudiciall, that one of the familie should succeede the dead ope, and that in it would be concluded a Prefident & example to dispose the Popedome by sucfion. All the elder fort of Cardinals objected the felues against him, holding the dignitic of their ne and grauitie much depraued, to fuffer the election to fettle vpon one that had leffe then fiftie ares of age. All those that were of the French part were against him, with whom did joyne also me of the Imperiall factio: for notwithstading in the beginning the Cardinall Colono gaue it out at he would fauour him, yet afterwards he opposed himselfe openly against him:as also all those companies of Cardinals that were ill contented with Pope Leo, declared themselves his enemies: neuerthelesse amid these difficulties, the thing that nourished him was, that he knew that fuch as were of his fide, making more then a third part of the Colledge, folong as they flood vnited and conftant, the election could not be accomplished without their confent: a matter which kept him delited in this hope, that with time his aduet faries would either be weatie or deuided, the rather for that there were of them who for their age and other infirmities, were notable to beare out a long paine: and withall, though they stood firme not to create him at all, yet he faw their divertitie would keepe them from concluding the creation of another, euctie one striuing to transferre the election to his friend, & most of the retaining a setled obslinacie not to giue place one to another. But the chaunge of the estate of Perousa did somewhat say the ambition of Cardinall de Atedicis, by the instance of Cardinall Petrucci, one of the Cardinals of his faction: who being chiefe of the estate of Sienna, and fearing least by his absence there might happen some mutation in the Citie, whereunto he understood the Duke of Irbin would addresse his armie, did vehemently labour to aduaunce the election of the new Pope: his importunities together with the interest and consideration of the daunger which would fall vponthe state of Florence, if Sienna should happen to chaunge, drew the Cardinall de Medicis somewhat to incline and yeeld, and yet was not determined to whom to give his voyce. At last they fell to the cultome of lotting of voyces in the Conclave, wherein Cardinall Adrian Bishop of Derchuse was preferred without any affection or partialitie of voyce : he was of nation a Flenming, and in his youth having bene Schoolemaillerto Cafar, and by his meane made Cardinall under Pope Leo, did at that time gouerne Spaine in the absence Cafar: and as there began some voyces to publish for him, so Cardinall Xisto one of that election, began under an Oration speciall, torecount and amplific his vertues and knowledge, by whose example certaine other Cardinals yeelded, and the refidue from hand to hand followed, though more by compulfion then by counfell. Thus was he chosen with the voyces of all the Cardinals, and had his creation perfected the fame morning: wherein this was to be wondred at , that euen those that had elected him could giue no reason, why amid so many troubles and daungers in the chate Ecclesiastike, they had raised to the soueraigne sea, a straunger, a forreiner, and of long absence out of the countrey, and wherein were helping no respectes of fauour, no cosideration of former merites, nor any couersation had with any of the other Cardinals: yea they scarcely knew his name; he had neuer benein Italie, & had no hope nor cogitation to fee it: of which strauagant maner of dealing, being not able to excuse themselues by any reason, they attributed all to the working of the holy Ghost, who is wont (fo they alleaged) to inspire the hearts of the Cardinals in the electing of Popes: he received newes of his election in the towne of Fictoria in Biskay, and would not have imposed upon him any other name then his owne, which he caused to be published under Adrian the fixt.

The Duke of Szenna.

Vpon the mutation of Perousa, after the bandes of souldiers had lingred certaine dayes to Vrbin and the march, not without some litle prejudice to their other businesse, they went (to the end to leavin Baillons before money of their friends) from Perouja & Todie, where Camilla Vrfin had reflored the exiles. The Duke of Vrbin with the relidue leaving Malatesta in Perousa, marched in great diligéce toward Stenna, having with them Lastance Petrucci, whom Pope Leo had deprived of the Bishoprikeo of Sienna, for that the Emperours officers had flayed Bourge 6 & Fabio the sonnes of Pandolfo Pe trucci from going fro Naples. Those that gouerned in Sienna had no other hopes then in the fuccours of the Florentins, and that by intelligence which they had with Cardinall de Wledicis: at whose instance his faction ruling for him in his absence the estate of Florence, understanding tha the Duke of Frbin was gone fro Perousa, dispatched presently to Siena, Guido Vaino with an hun dred light horsemen & prouision of money, to joyne with them certaine bands of sootmen which they of Sienna had leavied. But the principall foundatio was vpo the forces appointed many daye before: for, when they were aduertised of the first mouing of the Duke of Vrbin and the Baillons & withall, having feare of Tuskane, they had solicited to wage the Smiffers of the Caton of Berne who being in number almost a thousand, were remaining within Bolognia with the Bishop of Pi floya, making no reckening of the commaundements fent to them by their Lords to returne inte Swifferland. This practife albeit it drew a longer time then was needefull by many difficulties ob iected by the Bilhop of Pistoy, yet at last it was put in execution, not without great expences, be fides the leavying of foure hundred Almaine footemen, who were joyned in Bolognia with the

Smiffers : they had also called out of Lombardie John de Atedicis, and with those forces arriving in time, they made no doubt to affure the affaires of Sienna, which were now reduced to very ill termes, both for that the greatest part of the people enuied the present government, and also for an auncient hatred against the Fiorentines, they could hardly endure that their bands of souldiers should enter into Siena. But the matter that redoubled the danger prefent, was the absence of Cardinal Petruces, in whose place notwithstading his nephew Frauncis did what he could to sustaine things, though his authoritie was not equall to the Cardinall: for this cause, being carefull eitherto auoid or to prolong the daunger present, (wherein the principals & chiefraines were concurrant) they had dispatched Embassadours to the Duke of Orbin assone as he was entred vpo the territories of Sienna: who notwithstanding required in the beginning a change of the state, and thirty thousand duckats; vet afterwards his demannds were reduced to a moderatio, in so much as it was to be seared greatly that there would grow betweene the Duke & the Sienness some compositio, either by the confent & primitie of the governors, or by the motion of the people against their wils. Neuertheleffe as the bands of the Florentines entred continually within Stenna, together with a brute running, that Iohn de Medicis approached with the Swiffers, so such as impugned the accord & the folicitation of the same, tooke so much the more courage to hinder it sto conclusion : so that the Duke being drawne neare to the wals with his armie, which contained but feue thousand footmen the most part leavied at rado, he eftsoones lest the enterprise of Siena to retire into his estate, the hopes of the accord diminishing, and the Swiffers being come within a dayes journey.

The fame companies that fuccoured Stennet turned towards Perouse, and the Florentess tooke occasion to execute speedily the thing which they defired, being thereunto also solicited by the Colledge of Cardinals: vinder whose name and authoritie the state of the Church was governed n the absence of the Pope, and by that reason the Cardinall Cortona, who from the time of Pope Leo was Legate of the Citie of Peronfa, was perfonally in the armie. But fince the creation of the Pope, there was in the Colledge no greater vnitic or resolution then had bene before in the Conlaue, but the variations were more apparant and their controuerfies not leffe violent: for, they had et down an order, that every moneth the affaires should be governed by three Cardinals bearing he title of Priors, whose office was to conuocate and affemble the residue and dispatch causes: of which the first three that were newly entred, began to oppose against the Cardinall Medicis, who was immediatly returned to Florence after the election of the Pope, and cried out that the andes of the Florentins should do no harmes nor domage to the lands of the Church. These oands having already facked the towne of Pasignian refusing to lodge them, and afterwardes beng bestowed within Olmathree myles from Perousa, under an assured hope almost to cary that Citie, they had held finall reckening of those commandements, had not bene the knowledge hen had of the vanitic of their hopes: for the familie of the Baillous had made to enter Peroula nany bandes of fouldiers, and bare befides a greater authoritie with the people then Gentill who followed the armie: in which regard no leffe dispairing of the victorie, then having prored in vaine to carie it by composition, they retired somewhat about the borders of Perousa, as hough they would not oppose against the wil of the Colledge. They entred into the countrey of Montfeltro, which except Saint Leo and the rocke of Maurola, was wholly returned under the bedience of the Duke of Vrbin : and after they had recovered it with more facilitie then loffe, rmes were deposed on that side as it were by a peaceasible convention, both for that the Duke vas not fufficiently mighty to continue the warres with the Florentines, nor they had not cause o hold him in warre, neither for their owne profit, nor to content others: for, the Colledge where-1 the aduersaries of Cardinall Medicis could do most, had at the same instant couenanted with im to retaine the estate which he had recoursed until the Popes comming into Italie, & longer it fo pleased the Pope, & that he should not molest the Florentins nor the Siennois, not enter into onfederacie with any Prince, nor any way communicate with him or administer to him.

Hitherunto the matters of Lombardie had bene in peaceable estate, the one part having want Alexandria of money, and the other no less necessities of men: and therefore the souldiers of the Imperials taken by the who were not payed, refusing to stirre out of their lodgings, there was dispatched into Alexan-Imperials, ria, onely 10hn Sasset law with his regiment, & other souldiers & subjectes of the Duchie of Mil-un. banished from his estate. In which disposition of minde, and with a fortune more ready then a counsell stayed, he approched to Alexandria, where the rashnesse of the Guelfes defending the Citie more then the force of the French fouldiers, made easie to him the action which all men esteemed hard: for that being issued out to skirmish with the enemies, and not able to sustaine the encounter, their disabilitie gaue them occasion to enter pelmell into the Citie, which by that accident more then through their valour, became a pray to the victors, and a reproch to the vanquished: and not many dayes after with the same facilitie, were chased out of Aft, certaine bands of the French being there entred, by the meane of certaine particulars of the Guelfes faction.

But of this short and suspected quietnesse, there were already discerned to draw on beginnings of veric great troubles: for, notwithflanding in the Parliaments of the Smiffers, there were great contentions tilen upon the demands of the French King, wherein as the Cantons of Zuruh and Zuicz flood obstinate against him, and the Canton of Lucerna wholly with him, and therefidue denided amongest themselues, so also the publike affaires were troubled by the couctousneffe of private persons, some demanding of the King pension and entertainment present, & some requiring their old payes and debts due in times past: yet they accorded to him at last those pro-Swiffers descet portions of footemen, which he required for the recourse of the Duchie of Millan: which leavie into the Duchie making a number of more then ten thousand bodies, descended into Lombardie by the moun-taines of S. Bernard and S. Goddard, and were conducted by the baltard of Sanoy great Maister of the Freeh king. Fraunce, and by Galeas S. Senerin maister of the horse. About this time the king of England being estraunged from the amitie of the French, had lent to Cafar a great quantitie of money, the better to furnish him against so great an emotion: and with that money the Emperour had sent lerome Adorno to Trent, to leavie fixe thousand Launceknights, & to leade them to Milla, together with the person of Frauncis Spree: his comming was the esteemed of great importance, both to keepe contained & coftant, Millan and the other places of that estate which greatly defired his presence, & also by his authoritie & sauours to make easie the exactions of money whereof there was extreame want. At the same time they of Milla not knowing the prouisios that Casar made had fent money to Trent to wage foure thouland footenen, & they being prepared by that time that Adorno came thither, he left the other fixe thousand to be made ready, and with these source thousand drew towardes Millan to descend to Coma by the vale of Voltolina. And albeit the Gri fons denied to give him passage, yet his celeritie & valour made his way, passing with so great dili goce vpo the territories of Bergama, & fro thence to Guiaradadda, that the Venetian gouernous who were within Bergama, had no time to stop them. And after he had led these first companie of Lauceknights to Azillan, he returned with the same diligence to Trent, to guide thither Fraun cis Sfirce with the residue of that leavie. In Millan there was no care omitted to make all sorts e prouisions, wherin this was chiefly observed, to forget no meanes that might augment the hatred of the people against the French, to prepare them the better to defend themselnes, and to relieu the common necessities with money. To this action was much helping many counterfet letter and falle meffages, together with other cunning stratagemes proceeding from the diligence & ar of Atoron. But the thing that most of all advanced so great an inclination, was the preachings and Sermons of Andrew Barbato a religious man of the order of S. Augustin, who drawing to him wonderfull cocourse and affluence of people, induced them with reasons and perswasions to tak vpon them the defence of their lines, and the redeeming of their free countrey from the yokec ftraungers, auncient enemies to that Citie: he willed them not to be lesse forward to execute, the God was ready to raife them a meane to fet themselves at libertie:he told them, the soueraign care of mortall folkes was to care for their proper fafety: he reduced to their memories the exam ple of Parma, a weake & small citie in comparison of Mullan, and left not vnrecorded the action of their Elders whose names had caried reputation & glory throughout all Italie: he layed out by reasons and examples, how far mortall men were bound to defend their countrey, for the which if the Gentiles who expected no other recompence then glorie, offered their liues willingly to death: the far greater was the office and bond of Christians, to whom, dying in so iust and holy a enterprise, was prepared for recompence, not the glory of this world fraile and transitorie, but th fruition of the immortall kingdome, infinite and euerlasting. They had to confider, what vuiuersa ruine would be brought vpon that Citie by the victorie of the Frenchmen, whose yoke is it ha feemed heavy & grieuous afore, their burdes now could not be leffe the extreame & intollerable and by how much their rigour raged vpon them without any cause afore, by so much had they to affure themselves of extreame oppression now you the occasion of these offences: That one execution of the people of Atilian would not fuffice to quench the thirst of their cruckie and hatred: That the goods of the Citie could not fatisfie their immoderate couctonfineffe: yea nothing could content them but the vtter defacing of the name and memorie of the inhabitants of Millan, and by a horrible example to furpatfe the vnnaturall cruckie of Federike Barberousse. Their specches so redoubled the hatred of the inhabitants, and no lesse suppressed all feare of the victorie of the Frenchmen, that it seemed now more necessarie to appeale and retaine them, then to moue or prouoke them; fuch is the power of speeches aptly delivered and duly refpecting time, place, and all other circumstances concurring with the inclination of the people to whom they are pronounced. But in this meane while Prosper was not idle to repaire and relique the ballillions and rampiers of the trenches, with intention to flay at Millan, which he hoped to be able to defend for certaine moneths, though the fixe thousand Swiffers came not at all. And looking also to the defence of the other townes, he dispatched to Nouaro, Philip Torniello, and to Alexandria Monsieur Viscount, the one with two thousand, and the other with fifteene hundred Italian footemen, who lived upon the people for that they were not payd:he fent alfo to Pausa Anth.de Lena with two thousand Launceknights and a thousand Italians . And oner and aboue all thefe proportions, he kept within Aullan leuen hundred men at armes, feuen hundred light horsemen, and tweluethousand sootemen: onely the present daunger that remained was, that the Frenchmen should not enter Millian by the Castell; therefore as well to remedie that, as by the same meane to stop them for putting victuals or other provisions into the Castell, Profer with an intention highly effected, and in the judgement of men supposed wonderfull, caufed to cast without the Castel betweene the gates that leade to Verceil & to Coma, two trenches with a banke or rifing to either of the same of that earth that was throwne vp. These two trenches were diltant one from another twenty pases, and in longitude they contained almost a myle, euen as long as is the trauerfe of the gardens behind the Castell betweene the two wayes afore fayd: at either head of these two trenches, he erected a fort both high and well manned, the better to annoy the enemies with shot if they made their approches on that side. This was the vie of these two trenches, being well defended with footement hat were placed in the middest of the fame: they both kept that no succours should enter into the Castell, and withall would not suffer any of the befreged to iffue out: Fortune also expressed with a gladsome token, that sinch an inuention should be no lesse happie, then it was full of wit and deuise: for she ministred to it this fauour, that it might be put in execution without any domage at all, for that Profeer feruing his turne of the benefite of a great frow that fell, caused to be cast before day two bankes or rifings of fnow (and to their refemblance or example he cast also trenches) which shadowed and covered from the shot of the Castell the labourers that wrought: & that which also helped to aduaunce the worke to perfection, was the impedimet which the Smillers in palfing the mountaines received by the fnow, which was wonderfull deepe and thicke.

In this meane while Monsieur de Lawtrech readdressed and reassembled his companies, of whom he fent certaine bandes beyond Pan, and they entring Florenzola, Ittipped the guidon of horsmen of Lewis Gonzaguo whom they found sleeping in securitie and negligece. The companies also of the Venetias were multred about the confines of Cremona, under Andrew Gritti & Theodor Truulce, and they ioyning at last with the Swiffers, passed the river of Adda the first day of March, M.de Lamtrech was generall of the armie, whose authoritie was nothing diminished by the coming of the great Maister nor the Maister of the horse. And at the same time came to the armie lohn de Medicis, who albeit he had folicited and almost resolued to enterinto the Iohn Medicis pay of Frauncis Sforce, and was already upon the way to go to Alllan, where he was greatly de-for the French fired for the good opinion that was of his valour and conduct: yet he was caried by the benefite fing. of greater offers & more furetie of payment of the French king, taking this excuse, that there was not fent to him from Willan the furnines of money that were promifed him. In which respect, & in which disposition he went fro the territories of Parma, where he had sacked the towns of Busfette, for that they had denied him lodging, and passed to the campe of the Frenchmen which lay within two myles of the Castell betweene the said wayes of Verceill & Coma. The third day after The Frenchme the Frenchmen were incamped, they marched in order making as though they would fet vpo the before Millan.

trench and rampier, which not with flanding they did not execute, either for that fuch was the intention of Monsieur de Lamtrech from the beginning, or else waighing together with the number of fouldiers that were within, the disposition of the people, and the readinesse that appeared in the defendants, the manifest difficultie of the enterprise drew him from it. The same day the stones that violently were driven fro a house within by the furie of the artilleries, slue Marke Anthonie Colonno a Captaine of very great expectation: Camilla Triunlee bastard sonne to John lacques participated also in this lamentable destinie as they walked together along the house that was striken, denisting to raise a mount to strike with the artilleries betweene the two trenches of the enemies. But Lawrech having no confidence to take Millan by affault, thought he should be able to carie it with the longnesse of time, for that with the multitude of his horsemen, & great bands of banisht men that followed his armie, with whom he ouerranne the whole countrey, he gaue great impediments to the entrie of victuals:he caufed to be broken downe all the milles, and turned away the course of such waters as any way gaue reliefe or commoditie to them of Millan: he was not also out of hope, that the payes would faile to the souldiers within, being hitherunto entertained but with the money of the Millanois, for that Cafar fent a very small quantitie from the kingdome of Naples or other places. But such was the hatred of the people of Millan against the French, and so voluerfall their defire to have their new Duke, that their affections therein did not onely make their patience greater then all discommodities, but also much lesse that those adversities made them chaunge will, seeing it was the thing that did more and more confirme them, yea the youth of their Cirie ranne voluntarily to armes, of whom they created Captaines in every Parish, in so much that the gardes that with a ready diligence ranne day and night to the places furthest offremoued from the armie, ministred no litle succour and comfort to the fouldiers: and wanting the vie of milles at that time, for that they were ruined by the

enemie, they relieved forthwith that advertitie with the fervice of handmilles. Thus the hope of the speedy victory of the warre, being reduced into the labours and cares of along fiege, the Duke of Millan whose departure had bene many dayes foreslowed for want of money, and had yet lingred if the Cardinal Medicis had not succoured him with nine thousand duckats, departed at last from Trenta with fixe thousand Launceknights, and taking the rocke of Croara belonging to the Venetias, the better to ope his passage, he marched without any impediment through the lands of Verona and Mantua. And passing the river of Paw to Casalmaior, he arrived at Plassance, where the Marquis of Maina came to him with three hundred me at armes, and accompanied him from hence to Pauia: There the Duke stayed to expect occasio to passe to Millan, where he was wished with an universall expectation, for that by the dayly diminution of meanes to leavie money to entertaine the fouldiers, it was thought necessarie to joyne assone as might be with the Launceknights, and so take the field and seeke to put end to the warre. But the difficultie to passe was great, for that assoone as Lawtrech vnderstood they were in Plaisance, he went to lodge at Casina fine myles from Millan, vpon the way that leades to Pania: he had also bestowed the Venetians within Binasquo which is upon the same way, both the one and the other being in lodgings well rampiered and fortified: where after they had remained certaine dayes, and in that space had taken S. Ange and S. Colombano, Monsieur de Lawtrech, understanding that Monsieur a' Escud his brother whom he had sent into Fraunce to relate to the king the estate of the affaires, was returned, and both with money and bands of sootmen which he had waged at Genes, was arrived in the estate of Millan: he sent to joyne with him Federike Bossolo with foure hundred Launces & seuen thousand Swiffers & Italians, Against who albeit the Marquis of Mantua issued out of Pania & went to Gambala to make head against them, yet he retired estsoones to Pauia, having an opinion that his abode within Gabala would be to litle purpose, either for that (this was his faying) they made as though they would retire towards The fin, or els (which was more credible) he stood in some feare of them, for that their numbers were greater then had bin reported to him. But they being come to Gambala, and being joyned with Monsieur d'Escud, they went to Nouaro, which after they had battred with the artilleries of the Castell that held for the, they entred it by force at the third affault, with the slaughter of the greatest part of the footmenthat were within, and Phillip Torniello remaining prisoner. For this accident together with the redoubled letters of Torniello appealing to him for succours, the Marquis of Mantua issued once againe out of Paula, returning effloones thither affloone as he had knowledge how things went, retiring his companies from Vigenena, and leaving onely garrifon within the Castell. The Frauncis Sforce joyning of forces with Monfieur d'Ejoud and the taking of Nonaro, was prejudiciall to the French at Millan. men in a matter of greatest importance, for that it was so much the more easie for Frauncis Stree to go with his armie of Launceknights to Millan. It was agreed betweene Profper and him to depart one night in secret from Paula, leaving for the gard of the same two thousand sootemen and three hundred horsemen, under the charge of the Marquis of Mantua, who refused to passe any further, for that he would not be so far removed from the estate of the Church, Francis Storce taking a straunge and vncouth way, was received at Sefto by Prosper, who was gone to meete him with part of his companies, and fo to guide him to Millan. Great was the joy that the people of Millan made to receive him, and every one reducing to his memorie the felicitie wherein they had lived in that estate under his father and other Dukes of that name, made their defires so much the more infinite, by how much they doubted not that in a naturall and proper Prince could want no iffection to his people to respect and esteeme them, and not to reject or disfauor them for his imnoderate greatnesse.

After the Duke was gone from Pauia, Lawtrech entred into hope to be able to take that Citie, ind you foundation of that confidence, he went to encampe there affoone as he had reaffembled is armie. And of the other fide Profer, not ignorant in what daunger it was, dispatched thither n great diligence a thousand footmen Corsekays, with certaine bands of Spaniards, who charging pon a sudden the lodging of the French armie, passed through, partly marching and partly fighing. In which encounter making flaughter of many of the Frenchmen, they made way by their wnevalour, and arrived in fafetie in Pania, where were many incommodities, but specially great vant of gunpowder. Alonsieur Lawtrech began to batter the walles in two parts, in the suburbes of Saint Marie in pertico towards Thesin, and in the Burget. And after he had brought to the earth before Pania. pirtiefadomes of the wall, he gaue the affault, but without any iffue or good fucceffe: in 10 much s feeing into the valour of the defendants, and their voluerfall resolution to sell their lines with the lace, he began to dispaire of the enterprise. Besides, he was afflicted dayly with many other diffiulties, both for the diminution of the treasure which his brother had brought out of France, and lo by the generall necessitie of victuals through the armie, the same happening by the occasion fgreat raines: by the impediments whereof it was hard for the armie to be reuictualed by land. ad leffe possibilitie of reliefe by the benefite of Thesin, for that the boates being driven backe by ne streame of the river which was great and violent, could not hold course against the surie of the

About this time Profer was issued out of Millan with his whole armie, to draw neare to Paia, but by reason of the raines and stormes that fell, he was constrained to stay at Binasqua, a lace in the halfe way betweene Millan and Pania: and from thence aduauncing as farre as the Charterhouse, which is within the Parke about flue miles from Paula, and haply the fairest monaerie in Italy, Lawtrech dispaired to take Pania, and therefore retired his campe to Landriane, vithout receiving any other impediment of the enemies, then certaine light skirmishes in the breaing vp. From Landriano he went to Monce, to receive with more facilitie and readinesse the moeys that were sent to him out of Fraunce, which were stayed at Arona, for that Anchifa Vifount sent for that purpose from Millanto Busto which is neare to Arona, stopped the rhat they ould nor passe further. This was the impediment that reduced the affaires of the French into the xtreme or last disorder, for that the Smiffers impatiet by custome of all delayes, finding their paies leferred many dayes, fent their Captaines to M. Lawtrech to make their complaints, that their ation having bin in all times liberal of their bloud and service for the advancement of the crowne f France, they were now restrained of their duties & paiments, contrary to all equitie, order, and cason: That under this ingratitude and injurie, it was manifest to all the world what stender estination was made of their vertue and their faith: That after a vaine expectation of fo many dayes, new were now determined to repose no more in promises, speeches, and termes, which so many mes had bene fallified, though much to their hinderance and prejudice, yet not without difhoor and reproch to fuch as did affure them: and therefore they were now absolutely determined to The Smiffers tume to their houses, after they had first made knowne to all the world, that the thing that indu-would leauethe adthem thereunto, was not any seate they had of their enemies who had now taken the field, that they are

which alwayes had bin contemned by the Swiffers, as many experiences & examples can witnef They told him withall that they were ready to go to the battell the day following, with inter tion to depart the day after: That therefore he would leade them to the field, and ving the occ sion of their readinesse, to bestow them in the first front of the whole armie: That they hope that as with farre leffer forces they had vanquished the French armie in their owne tertes about the borders of Nouaro, so their valour was no leffe able to make them carie the victorie out Spaniards, who albeit were farre aboue the Frenchmen in deceits, futtleties, and ambushes, y they esteemed themselues nothing inferiour to them so long as they were to fight with valiance & force of armes. But Monsieur de Lawtrech considering in what perill he should assaile the enmies in their tents, laboured to moderate that fury of the Smiffers, & by sufferance to seeke to st. those mindes whom he saw obstinate to be contained by reason: he told them that thought moneyes were long in comming, yet the danger of the wayes was more to be condered then the default of the King: he affured them that cre many dayes they should be possessed of the thin which their impacience made to doubt of, and that their hopes should be no more prolonged, bu their defires fatisfied. But he could not winne nor reclaime them, neither with authoritie, will petitions, with promifes, nor with reasons, and therefore since they should be the first th should feele the daunger, he determined rather to adventure the battell with a great disaduaur tage, then to loose viterly the warre, which manifeltly was seene to be lost, for that if he conser termined to fet tednot to fight, the Smiffers were resolved to depart.

The armie of the enemy lay at Bicocque, a towne within three my les of Millan, where is a car ping place veriero in thie and large, enuironed with great gardens, and they inclosed with year deepe ditches, having their fieldes about full of fountaines and brookes derived and conveye according to the vsage of Lombardie, to water the medowes. Monsieur de Lamtrech issuing o of Monce drew towards that place with his armie, and supposing that the enemies lying in place of aduauntage would not come out of it, he raunged and ordered his bandes in this for That the Swiffers with the artilleries should charge the front of the place and the artilleries oftl enemie, which quarter was garded by the Launceknights commaunded by George Frond fperg: That on the left had Monfieur d'Efeud with three hundred Launces & a squadron of soo men French and Italians should be upon the way that goeth to Millan, and should draw to wardes the bridge by the which might be made an entrie into the lodgings of the enemies : at for his part he would labour to enter upon their place with an efquadron of horfemen: while enterprise he hoped to guide to good successe rather by art then by open force, for that to abu them the more, he caused his people to put vpon their cassakins, the red crosse, which the marke of the armie Imperiall, and pulled off the white croffe, which is the figne of the French armie. On the other fide Profeer Colonno, who for the stuation and strength of the placehe the victorie certaine, and therefore determined to abide the enemies upon the ditch; caused: his companies to arme affoone as he heard of their comming, and having appointed to ever one his place, he fent forthwith to Frauncis Sforce to come to the campe with that multitude people that was armed: and having affembled at the ringing of the bell, four ehundred horfeme and fixe thousand footemen, he was appointed by Prosper to the gard of the bridge. But affooi as the Smillers were approched neare the tentes of the enemies, notwithstanding that for the height of the ditches more rifing then they supposed, they could not affayle the artilleries as cording to their first hopes, yet those difficulties nothing diminishing their valour, they gaue The encounter charge you the ditch, striving with a wonderfull courage to enter and carie it. And at the san time Monsieur d'Escud who was drawen towardes the bridge, finding so great a gard contr rie to his opinion, was constrained to retire. Prosper also discouered immediatly the deur of Lawtrech, and to meete with it commaunded his people to put vpon their heads bunde or handfuls of young corne and graffe, and so made vnprofitable the former suttelries : 1 that the whole swaigh or burden of the warre lay upon the Smiffers: who, as well for the gre disaduantage they had, as for the valour of the defendats, were much trauelled without any prof or effect: they received many harmes not onely by fuch as fought in the front, but also we galled by certaine harguebuziers Spanish: who lying hid and couered with the height oftl corne almost full ripe, flanked them, and so played upon them with affured aime, that in the end after they were well payed for their rashnesseby the slaughter of many of their companie

the violence of the shot compelled them to retire and loyning in their retraite with the French, they returned all together in good order to Monce, both leading with them their artilleries, & receiving no distresse in their retiring: the Marquis of Pesquiero with other Captaines importuned Profer to give a figure to pursue the enemic, seeing they had alreadic given their backes: but he beleeuing that which was, that they retired in good order and not in flying, wherin he was contributed by the relation of certaine discouerers mounted by his direction upon certain high trees, made this answer, that it was not reasonable to referre to the arbitrement of fortune the victory which was affuredly gotten, and leffe counfell to deface by his proper raffinetie the memory and imputation of other mens temeritie : to morow faith he, will make manifelt to you what hath bin done this day, for that the enemies comming to a better feeling of their wounds, and by their harme received, being warned to avoyd worfe hurts to come, will feeke to return ouer the mounts, by which honourable euasion we shall obtain with securitie that which this day wee should adventure to get with perill. There were found dead about the ditch three thousand bodies of the Swiffers, of luch as being more valiant and forward were most resolute to vanquith the daunger: of them were two and twentie Captaines: on the other fide the flaughter was The overthrone itle, and not one person of marke or qualitie except John de Cardona Count Culssan Stricken of the Swiffers with a finall shot through his helmet. The day following Monsieur de Lawtrech being wholly lepriued of the hope of the victorie, went to Monce to passe the river of Adda neare to Tresse: and from thence the Swiffers taking their way through the territories of Bergama, returned ino their mountaines, their numbers being no leffe diminished then their valour, for that it is ceraine that the harmes they received at Bicoegna fo much afflicted them, that in many yeares afer they expressed not their accustomed valour. The great Master and Master of the horse dearted at the same time together with many French Captaines: Monsieur Lautrech with his ompanies of men at arms went to Cremona to give order for the defence of that citie, wherereturneth into the left his brother: and not manie dayes after he passed the mounts, carying to the French king Fraunce, ot reports of victories or triumphs, but a justification of himselfe, with complaints against ohers for the loffe of fuch an estate, happing partly by his owne errours, partly by the negligence nd indiferetion of some about the king, and partly by the malice of fortune, if such attribution may be lawfull. Monsieur Lawtrech tooke order also afore his departure from Cremona, that conneuall and Federike Boffolo with fixe companies of men at armes, and fufficient garrison of potmen, should enter the towne of Loda, which had bene holden for the king during the whole ourse of the warre: he did this for that the Imperiall Captaines were let to congert thither forthith their forces, by reason of a tumult hapned amongst those companies of Launceknights thich Frauncis Sforce had brought from Trent: they required for a reward of the victorieto aue a moneths pay, a demaund which the Captaines fayd was no leffe varcasonable then vnift, for that both there was a great difference betweene the defending of themselues from such s did assault them, and to vanquish those that did charge them, and also for that it could not be hydrhar the enemies were vanquished, who were retired not in flying, but in good order, caryig with them their artilleries and traines. Neuertheleffe, the infolency of the Launceknights reuailing more then either necessarie reason or due authoritie of the Captaines, a consent was nade more by compulsion and necessity of things then by just cause arising, and so they were atisfied with a promise to be paid within a certaine time. After many dayes past in these affaires, hapned that the fame day that the French Launces entred the Citie of Loda, and the footbands bllowing, on the other fide came the armie Imperiall, and afore them all the Marquis of Pefquiro with the Spanish footenen, who entred afore the French could deuide or distribute the uarters of the rowne, or bestow their gardes, but were occupied in confusion and tumult, as ofen hapneth when men of warre enter a towne to lodge in it. This occasion was obserued by the Marquis, and joyning ready diligence to the prefent oportunitie, he affaulted one of the fuburbs f the towne, which was enuironed with a wall, where he found no great refiltance: he was o fooner entred, then all the Frenchmen within the towne, no leffe terrified with the fodaineffe of the accident, then desperate for that their footmen were not yet come, yeelded to their cares and drew into tumult, flying towards the bridge which they had built vpon Adda: the Loda taken by paniards entring at the same instant the citie, some by the walles and some by the rampiers, fol-the Imperials. bwedthemeuen to the river, and in the chase tooke many fouldiers, and almost all the Captaines except Federike and Bonneuall: and vpon their returne, they forbare not in that furie to facke that vnfortunate citie, sparing no more the goods, then they had done the lines of men. From Loda the Marquis went to Pifqueton which he tooke by composition : and not many dayes after Profeer with the whole armie passed the river of Adda, to go and incampe afore (remona, which he had no sooner approched, then Monsieur a Escud began to hearken to accord: he had no other hope to fullaine the warre then ypon the comming of the Lord Admirall, whom the king (defiring to preserve that which yet held good for him in that estate) sent into Italy with source hudred Launces and ten thousand footemen: and therefore he thought he did good service to the present affaires, if without danger he could temporize and entertaine things in tranquilitie, till he faw what would be the iffue of his expectation of the Admirall. And on the other fide Prefer defined to ric himselfe speedily of the affaires of Cremona, to have the better oportunity to reestablish within Genes the brethren of the family of Adorna, and that afore Italy were possest of the new fue cours of the enemies: infomuch as the capitulations bare that Monfieur d'Escud should depar cut of Cremona within fortie dayes with all his fouldiers, artilleries, and enfignes displayed, i within that rime (which determined the xxvj. of Iune) there came not to him fuch a refeue as either might make him able by force to passe the river of Pam, or else to take one of those cities in the flate of Millan which was possessed with garrison : that likewise he should procure that all those places and holds within the Duchy that were kept for the king, should be abandoned except the Callles of Millan, Cremona, and Nouaro: that for the observation of these couenants, he should deliuer foure oftages: that there should be restitution of prisoners on botl parts, and fufferance to the Frenchmen to passe in surety into Fraunce with their artilletie and traines.

Vpon the conclusion of this accord, and receiving of the oftages, the armie of Cafar marcher Genes takenby forthwith to Genes, which they approched in two places: the Marquis of Pegquiero with his tegi the Imperials. ments of Spanish footmen and Italians, were incamped on that side of Codifa, and Prosper will the men at armes and Launceknights vpon the opposite of Bisagnia: at that time the Cirie o Genes was governed by Duke Ottanian Fregofa, a Prince of excellent vertue, and no leffe fo his instice then for his other good parts, as greatly beloued in that Citie, as any Prince may be i townes full of factions, retaining yet a memoric of their ancient liberty: he had waged two thou fand Italian footemen, in whose confidence he laid vp all his hope of defence, for that the peo ples of the towne being deuided by factions, and having about him so mightie an armie com pounded vpon so great diversity of languages and nations, forbare to take armes, but stood t behold things in the fame maner, and with the fame eyes wherewith in other times he was won to behold his other trauels: wherein without the daunger or domage of fuch as tooke no armer the publike authoritie being transported from one familie to another, there was seene no other mutation, then that in the pallace of the Duke were bestowed other inhabitants, other Captaines and other bands of fouldiers for the guard of the place. Affoone as the armie was approched th towne, the Duke began to folicite composition by the meane of Bennet Viualdia Genoway whom he fent to the Captaines: but this folicitation began to grow cold by the comming c Peter of Nauarre, who being fent by the French king with two light Gallies for the furety c Genes, entred the hauen at the fame instant : neuerthelesse the Marquis beginning to execute hi artilleries and batter the walles, they began more then before to recontinue the parley for accord wherein all difficulties being debated and refolued, and the matter vpon termes of conclusion fodainly the Spaniards, who all that day had battred a tower neare to the gate, won the same, fin ding no guard nor order by the defendants, who were abused through their hope of composition infomuch as following more their fortune then regarding their fidelity, they iowned diligence t the occasion, and began to enter the city aswell by that tower, as by the wall that was reversed & ruined; by their exaple all that part of the armie ran to the action, and after the Marquis had fet hi bands in order, & fignified to Profer the flate of the accidet, they caused the trupets to be soude and entred the Citie by whole numbers: the calamitic of the defendants tooke away all refiftance the fouldiers giving themselves to flie, and the Citizens to seeke surety in shutting themselves i their houses: the Archbishop of Salerne, the Captaine of the guard, and many other Captains and fouldiers found safetie in certaine vessels, with the which they hoysed saile into the sea: the Duke for his difease not able to stirre, caused to shut the pallace, and sent to the Marquis Pe/quiti

'elquiero that he would yeeld to him, in whose house he died within few moneths after: Peer Nauarre was taken: all the goods of the Citie became a pray to the victors, manie rich unilies binding themselves some to one band of souldiers and some to another, to buy the fascine of their lines with great fummes of money, which they affured either with pawnes and gages, or vith bils of Marchants; and fo with their money defended their bodies from bloud, and redeened their houses from facking in the same maner was preserved the plot so samous which they all Caura, and is kept with great reuerence in the Cathedrall Church. It is hard to recount what quantities of filter vessell, iewels, mony, and most rich wares were made pillage, that Citie y the great traffike of marchandize being replenished withinfinite wealth; and yet so great a caimitie was fo much the more easie and tollerable, by how much was aptly expressed a compason by the brethren of the family of Adorna, who both of a naturall affection to the Citie, and for nat the inhabitants had shewed no token of grudge or hatted, and for that also they were almost pon the point of accord, procured such order to be set downe by the Captaines, that not one enoway was made prisoner, nor the bodie of one woman put to violation. Immediatly vpon ne appealing of the fouldiers Antho. Adorna was elected Duke; who after the armie was gone ncamped before the Castellet with such artilleries as the Florentines lent him: the third day he poke the Citadell and Saint Frauncis Church, and the day after the Castellet was rendered to im by the Capraine under articles of composition.

The mutation of Genes tooke from the French king all hope to be able to succour the affaires Moffeur d'Ef-(Lombardy: for, both the armie that he fent, and by this time arrived you the territories of Aff, cud returned turned backe againe, and also M. a'Escud passed into Fraunce with his copanies, having stayed into Fraunce. rtaine dayes in Cremona about the tearme appointed for the resoluting of certaine difficulties appling about the cattles of Tressa, Leegua and Domussotin his departure he had not onely faith adpromife kept with him, but also was honourably received wherefocuer he passed.

But amid these broyles and alterations in Lombardy, Bolognia stood not altogether in quiet, as ell for the warre that was in Lombardy, as for the absence of the Pope; and much lesse did Tusme relovce in any great tranquility; for touching Bolognia, Hanniball Bentiuole loyning with m Hanniball Rangon, leavied fecretly an armie of foure thousand footemen, with whom and ith three peeces of artilleries, one morning upon the first appearing of the day, they made their proches on that fide to the mountaines: and for that they in the towne made no brute, some of em passed the dirch, and fastened their ladders to the wall: but the inhabitants within, who had nowledge of their comming the day before, began to make a noyfe and to stirre when they faw ne, and to give to fire the artilleries, & fending out also many troupes to begin the skirmish, the mic forthwith fell to flight, leaving their artilleries behind, and in the chase Hamiball Rangon as hurt in the backe. It was affuredly judged, that this enterprife was attempted by the procureent and prinity of Cardinall Medicus, who fearing least the Pope at his comming into Italy, ther of his owne counsell or by the incitation of others, would diminish his greatnesse, sought It to trouble him for so great a losse of the estate Ecclesiastike, and so by that meane not onely connert his thoughts to other matters then to perfecute him, but also he should be constrained haue recourse to his aide and counsell.

But farre more redious and great were the travels of Tuscane, for that scarcely was the estate Emotions in Siema affured of the Duke of Vrbin, and the affaires of Peroufa and Montfelire ceased, then Tufcane e French king by the suggestion of Cardinall Volterro, gaue order of new that Ranse de Cere ing at Rome and not imployed, should practise to change the estate of Florence, and to recitaish in that Citie, the brothers and nephewes of Cardinal Volterro, who was manifestly declared ainfithe house of Medicis, with all his friends, and cofederates of the king: but because the king that time was in great necessitie, the Cardinall was to aduqunce for this enterprise all necessarie mmes of mony, receiving the kings promise to repay them within a certaine time. Whilest Ranse as making his preparations, these matters came to the knowledge of the Cardinall Medicis, the onfideration whereof, fearing also least the Duke of Vrbin should stirre, compelled him to make is accord, that without prejudice to the rights which the Florentines and the Duke pretended the townes in Montfeltre, the Duke shold be Captaine general of the common weale for one are coplete. & for another yeare at pleasure, and the time of his pay to begin the first day of the ext moneth of September. For the same cause he retained in the pay of the Florentines Horace

Baillon, but with this condition, that the time of his pay should not begin vntill Iune, for that he was enterrained and bound to the Venetians for fo log. And albeit this cotract was like wife made in the name of his brother Maletesta, yet he would not ratifie it, having afore received money to be joyned with Ranse de Cere with a charge of two thousand footemen and an hundred light horfmen. On the one fide he would not openly blemifh his proper honour, and on the other fide he was loath to prouoke the Cardinall and the Florentines by new occasions: therefore to wade in a meane betweene both, he fained himself to be ficke, and sent to Range being then come to the borough of Pieua two thousand sootenien, an hundred light horsemen, and source salconers, making excuse by the rage of his sicknesse that he was not able to go in person: and to the Cardinall he gaue hope that he would take no more new payes of the enemie, and that affoone as the terme were finished for the which he was payed, he would ratifie the contract made in his name, & in the meane time would proceede with as great moderation as he could in such actions as he could not refuse for the payes he had received. After this Range entred into the territory of Sienna with fine hundred horse and seuen thousand sootemen, with intention to practise the mutation of that government with the trayne of the felfe fame exiles which had followed the Duke of Vrbin: wherein if the enterprise had drawne to good issue, it was not to be doubted that having power by that meane to enter on that fide into the bowels of the Florentme dominion, that the like fuccesse had not sollowed him touching the particular of Florence. But the Florentins no lesse foreseeing that daunger then desiring that the enemies should not approch to Sienna, had sent to that state all their regiments of men of war, under the conduct of Guido R angon elected for that emotion generall of the armic: he had this special intention, both to temporife with the enemies to make them lofe time, for that he was not ignorant that without expedition they would fall into want of money: & also under one time to vse all the impediments he could to cut off & stop their victuals: fo that governing himselfe according to the proceedings of the enemies, he laboured to put seuerall garrisons into those townes that were nearest the estate of the Siennois and the Flo. rentines. In which remouing of fouldiers from one place to another, it hapned that the guidon o horsemen of Vitelli going from Torrito to Asmalongo, encountred on the way with three hundred horsemen of the enemies and were ouerthrowne, leronimo de Peppoli Lieutenant to Viteli being taken prisoner with fifty men at armes & two enfignes: Range addressed himself first to the Citie of Chinfa, a Citie more noble for the memorie of her antiquitie and the renowmed actes o Por lene her king, then for her fortunes and conditions present his hope was deceiled to carie it bringing with him no other fortes of artilleries then foure falconets, a force farre too weake to take townes that are defended with fouldiers. He marched further betweene Torrito and Asna longo, to draw neare to Siena, but having no commoditic of victuals amid fo many townes of the enemies, and feeking to get fome by force, he affailed the borough of Torrito, where was in garrison an hundred men at armes of Guido R angon and flue hundred sootemen: but he leavied hi campe from thece without doing any thing to aduaunce his purpose, & keeping his way, he wen to Motelifie & fro thence to Bagno de R apolino within tweline myles of Stenna, in which citie the Florentines in the beginning had bestowed the Count Petillane; but the Count Guido, by whole diligence and celeritie all these denises were preuented, entred the same day into Sienna with two hundred light horfenien, leaving his armie behind to follow after: fo that what for the fuccour that approched, and the reputation of Ranse which was greatly duninished in this expedition afwell with his owne companies as amongett the enemies, together with the knowledge they that he was reduced to a great necessitie of victuals, brought no litle discourage to them of Sienna to whom could have bene acceptable a chaunge or alteration: neverthelesse he presented him felfe with halfe a myle of the wals, and feeing no infurrection made in his fauour, he retired ha uing remained there xxiiij houres. The fame day he retired (but after he was gone) the bande of the Florentines entred with in Sienna, who albeit were put in readinesse to pursue him, ye they made no great labour when they faw he was too farre gone: they fuffred certaine light horse men to pursue the chase, and certaine bandes of footenen which were before at Siema, of whon he received no great domage: onely his retraite being hastie, and haply no lesse for famine the for feare, he left his artilleries by the way, which to his great dishonour fell into the power of the enemies the flayed at Agguepente to redreffe his companies which were much diminished; a place so much the more affured to him, by how much he knew that the Florentine bandes would be

:urious to enter upon the lands of the Church: but falling into wants of money and other prouifions, and the Cardinals of Volterra, of Monte, and of Coma, with whom by the French kings diection he communicated touching his affaires, beginning now to reject him, he conucrted those ew bands of souldiers that his fortune had left him, to pill and rob the shores or waterfides of ienna, and in vaine gaue affault to Orbatella: for which cause the Florentines having made their irmie to march towards the bridge of Centino, which is the confine and limite betweene the thate of Sienna and the dominion of the Church, threatned to make inuafion of the lands of he Church, for that they saw Range did not wholy dissolue his companies. In which respect he Colledge of Cardinals, who flood icalous to suffer such an action you the estate of the Church, interposedro accord them; a matter indifferently agreeable to them both: It was cceptable to the Florentines, for that by it they were drawne out of a burthen of expences which they imade without any fruite: and to Ranje it was no leffe welcome, for that both he was I furnished for the present, and also had no hope to increase his forces, specially the French flaires suffering ill tearmes in Lombardy. The accord contained no other matter then a bare romise not to offend one another: which promise ran betweene the Florentines and Siennois n the one part, and Ranse de Cere on the other part, putting in pledge in Rome of fistie thouand duckers for the furetie of observation: and touching the things that had bene made pilige and spoyle, they referred them to the arbitration of the Pope when he should come in-

This winter there hapned in the towne of Lucqua this! dangerous accident: one Vincent Pog-Anaccident of a noble descending and family, and Lawrence Totti, vnder colour of particular discords, in the towner ut more likely pushed on by ambition and pouertie, tooke armes, and in the publike pallace of Lucqua. ie the chiefe Magistrate of that citie: and as one furie draweth on another, and in an yprore is dome scene any moderation, so they ran with their armed weapons throughout the towne, and ade flaughter of diuerfe other citizens their aduerfaries, with fuch an vniuerfall terrour & feare, at not one durst oppose against them: neverthelesse assoone as the first violence was somewhat afed, the same seare that had amazed others began to terrifie the selues by the remorse and greatfle of the offences they had done: in which oportunitie certaine wife citizens thrufting in to licite and appeale, the murtherers iffued out of the citie under certaine conditions, and afterirds were sharpely persecuted by the inhabitants of Lucqua.

The were the matters of Lembardy and Tuscane brought to some appealment, but the olledge of Cardinals taking no care of the estates of the Church, partly for the Popes absence, t more for the ambition and disagreements that were betweene them: Sigisfinund the sonne of indolfe Malatesta, an ancient Lord of Rimini, tooke almost wholly into his hands the governent of that Citie, having therein but a verie small intelligence: and albeit Cardinall Medicu at e instance of the Colledge, went to Bologma as Legate of that Citie, both to recouer Rimini, d to reorder the other affaires of Romagnia, which were much troubled and altered, to whom the Colledge had promifed to fend to his succours the Marquis of Mantna Captaine generall of the Church: yet nothing forted to effect, no lesse by the wants and impediments of money, then through the lealousie and emulation of the Cardinals his adverfaries, who obiected themselues against all counsels and actions that anie way might aduaunce his reputation or greatnesse.

FIFTEENTH BOOKE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

ARGVMENT.

Pope Adrian comes to Rome. The Venetians make league with the Emperour. The Frenchmer besiege Millan, and are constrained afterwards to returne from it . Cardinall Medicis is created Pope. King Frauncis descendeth into Italy, he taketh Millan, and besiegeth Paula. Th Emperour Charles sendeth out an armie to the succours of Pausa, where a battell is fought an the French king taken prisoner.

Lbeit the late victorie against the Frenchmen had somewhat reduced the matters of Lombardy into an estate peaceable and settled, yet it had no thing diminished the vniuerfall suspition that the king would effoore recontinue the warre, and in short time bring new inuasions vpon th Duchy of Millar: for both his owne kingdom thood quiet and acquire from civill troubles, his Captaines and bands of men of warre whom h had fent into Italy, were returned in fafety, the Smillers well disposed an prepared to take his pay, as before; and lastly, the Senate of Venice stoo

firme with him in the ancient league and confederation: which arguments ioyned to the remem brance and passion of his harmes received, and no lesse concurring the violent inclination of hi youth naturally caried with moods of reuenge, were sufficient to arme his mind with bloody de fires, and to make him by his valour to feeke to recompence the difpleafures which the malice & enuie of his fortune had lately heaped upon him. By the confideration of which danger, the Cap taines of the Imperials were driven to entertaine and pay the armie; a compulsion verieted an grieuous, for that they received no supplies of money neither from Cafar, nor from the kingdon of Naples: and touching the estate of Millan, it was so narrowly raked and gleaned, that of the proper treasure and ability, they were not able to sustaine so great a proportion of expences, were distributed to the feeding of so many souldiers : and therefore for the relieuing of so great burthens, they sent the greatest part of their companies to be bestowed vpon the estates of the Church, notwithstanding the popular voyces and Colledge of Cardinals objected many impe diments and vaine exclamations: also other prouinces of Italy were taxed for the conservations the Duchy of Millan, and that by the labour & folicitation chiefly of Don Charles de Lanoy, latel The provinces made Viceroy of Naples by the death of Don Raimond de Cardona, and Don John Manuell: th rate of the imposition was, that monethly for three moneths next following, the estate of Alilla of the Duchy of should contribute a thousand duckets, the Florentines fiscene thousand, the Genomages eigh thousand, Sienna five thousand, and Lucqua foure thousand. And albeit many incrimited again this taxacion, yet the feare of fo great an armic made it to be both executed & fuffered: So migh

tie is necessitie, that in cases of extremity it makes tollerable those things, which in all other cond tions are full of inconveniencie and difficulty. Only they of Millan instiffed the taxation to b necessarie, for that the defence of all Italie depended vpon the continuation of that armie: neithe did it cease after the end of three moneths, for that the same necessitic continuing, the impositio was eftsoones renued, though in a farre lesse rate and taxation.

In this estate of affaires, Italy stood oppressed with continual adversities, and no lesse terrific with the feare of greater euils that threatned the vniuerfall regions thereof: for the remedy whe of much was attributed to the comming of the Pope, as an apt and consenient instrument by res fon of his supreme authority, to appeale and reorder all disorders. And albeit Casar passing: the same time by seainto Spaine, and in his way did communicate with the king of England, he fought him to tarie for him at Barcelona, whither he would come in person to honour him as ope: yet he forbare to abide the Emperours comming, either fearing least for the great diltance the Emperour, who as yet was in the extreame confines of Spaine, he should let slip the comoditie of his good time, which after his nauigation began to berough and dangerous, or else he spected least the Emperour would folicite him to deferre his voyage; or lastly (which was more edible) he seared to aggrauate the opinion conceined of him from the beginning, that the Emrour did so much gouerne him, as to be able to let him to treat of the vniueria! I peace betweene hriftians : an action wherein he was determined to employ all his studies and labours : so that or-ruling by his wildome all these suspitions, he passed at last by seato Rome, where he made his Pope Adrian trie the xxix. of August, with a great concourse of the commons and the whole Court: of who the victorial peithis comming was defired with an univerfall gladnesse, for that without the presence of the pes, Rome beareth more a resemblance of a lauage desert then of a citie, yet that spectacle rought fundrie impressions and diversitie of thoughts in the minds of all men, when they conlered that they had a Pope for nation and language a straunger, and for the affaires of Italy & e Court altogether vnexperienced, and also for that he was not of those regions and countries, ho by long conversation were alreadie made familiar with the customes of Italy: the enuy that rred vp in men this confideration was redoubled by the accident of the plague, which beginng in Rome at his arrivall, afflicted the citie during the whole season of Autumne, to the great lamitie and losse of the people; a marter which in the fancies of nien was construed to an euill ognostication of his Pontificacie.

The first counsell that this Pope tooke, was to advance the recovering of Rimini, and to put dto the controuerfies which the Duke of Ferrara had continued with two of his latest predefours: and for the better succeeding of that expedition, he fent into Romagnia that regiment fifteene hundred Spanish footmen which he had brought with him for the more surety of his flage by lea. Whilest the Pope was in these actions and preparations in Italy, the Emperour cast in his mind

w much it would import to the successe and suretie of his affaires in Italy, to separate the Veians from the French king: to which deuise was much helping an opinion that he had, that the pes of the French matters being diminished, the Senate would not be without manifest incliion to peace, and that they would not for the interests of others, lay themselves downe to the ungers which fuch a warre might bring vpontheir estates. In this practife he comunicated with king of England, who afore had lent him money secretly against the French king, and began The king of enly to take part against him: they sent thither their Embassadours to require the Senate to England for insederate with the Emperour for the desence of Italy Ierome Adorna being for the Emperour, the Emperour, of sendeth it Rechard Pase for the king of England. There was also expectation of an Embassadour Embassiadous Im Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, Cafars brother, who entertaining many quarrels with the to the Venettinertans, it was judged necessarie that he should interpose and communicate in all accords. Be- anstodram es, the king of England fent a Heraldto pronounce warre against the French king, in case he them from the puld not come to a generall truce with the Emperor for three yeares in all parts of the world, & alliance of the riein should be comprehended the Church, the Duke of Millan, & the Florentins: he complain It also in this defiance, that the French king had forborn to pay him the annuity of fifty thousand ownes which he was bound to answer yearely. But the French king whose youth made him reapt to trust in fortune, the to looke into things by counsell, refused to make truce, and touing the demand of the fifty thousand crownes, he protested openly that it was not conueniet for Into pay mony to him that ay ded his enemies with money: an answer which so aggrauated the daines and hart-burnings betweene them, that the Embassadours on both sides were reuoked. This yeare departed out of Italy Don Iohn Manuell, who had bene Calars Embassadour at me with verie great authoritie: and at his departure he deliuered to the Florentines a scece subsigned by his hand, declaring that Casar by a scedule published in September 1520 prored to Pope Leo to reconfirme & estsoones to reaccord to the Florentines the priviledges of e-Ite, of authority, & of the townes which they held within fixe moneths after the first dyot vpon coronation at Aix: this was a reiteration of a former promise made by him to accomplish the le within foure moneths after his election, within which time he faid he could not dispatch itor many just causes: so that under protestation of that reasonable excuse, Don John promised it effloones in the name of Cafar, who ratified the seedule in March 1523, and deliuered the expedition of it in writing in a most ample forme.

What the Emperour did in Spame.

As hath bene set downe before, Casur passed this yeare into Spaine, where he proceeded so userly against many that were noted the authors of the sedition, and to others he remitted all punishments, and pardoned their goods: in which action, to io you with insticand elemency, examples of recompence and remuneration, he called to the Court in great honour, Ferdinard Dak of Calabria, who refusing to be Captaine of the Commons that rebelled, he rewarded his side litie, with the manage of Madame Germania sometimes wise to the king of Spaine: she was nich but barren, to the end that house should determine in him who was the last of the descendants cold Alsonso king of Aragon, two of his younger brothers being dead before, the one in Fraunt and the other in Italy.

Rhodestaken.

But the end of this yeare was made no lesse wretched and vnhappy, then saunderous to al Christian Princes for the losse of the He of Rhodes, which Solyman Occomantooke by violence notwithstanding it was defended by the knights of Rhodes, called in other times more ancient the knights of Saint John of Jerufalem: and abiding in that place fince they were chased out o Jerusalem, notwiths landing they lay betweenetwo so mighty Princes as the Turke and the Sou dan, yet their valour had preserved it of long time, and to the right worthy glorie of their order they had remayned as an affured rampier of Christian religion in those seas: and yet they wet not without their imputations and notes of infamie, for that having a continual cuffome for the better defending of those shores, to spoyle the vessels of the instidels, they were thought some times to make pillage of Christian ships. The Turke sent into the Iland a wonderfull great army which remaining there many moneths, with no lefte horrour to good men for their cruelties the terrour to all men for their huge numbers, at last he came thicker in petson, and drawing to hi defire of conquest and glorie, the respect of profite and riches which the victorie would yeeld, h lost not one minute of time to vexe them, wherein his industrie was nothing inferiour to his va lour, for fometimes he cast monstrous mines and trenches, sometimes he raised platfornes c earth and wood, whose height ouertopped the walles of the towne, and sometimes he afflicte them with most furious and bloudy affaults: infomuch that as these workes and engines wer pot persourced without a wonderfull butcherie and slaughter of his souldiers, so also the defence of them was fo daungerous to the lives of them within, that manie numbers were diminished manie bodies maimed and made vnferuiceable, and the refidue made terrified by the calamities c their companions and friends, to whom they could give no other propertie of compassion the to mourne with them their common miferie: their aduerfitie was fo much the more intollerable by how much their trauels were without fruite, their words without comfort, and their valou disfauoured of fortune, and laftly, their flore of gun-powder was confumed, which is not the leaf necessitie for the defence of a place: they saw afore their eyes huge breaches made into their walles with the artilleries of the enemies: they discerned severall mines wrought into many part of the towne, and they found by lamentable experience, that the more painfully they laboured the leffe good they did, for that their fortune had reduced them to these termes of extremitic that in abandoning one place to reliene another, they put both in daunger, not having number fufficient to furnish the service, and lesse expectation of reseue amid perils so raging and despe rate: fo that, what for that their necessities were greater then their hopes, and their defence less able by the continual diminution of their numbers, and lastly, holding it no breach of honou to preferue by wifedome and composition, that they could no longer defend by their valour and prowesse, they gave place to their destiny, and capitulated with the Turke: That the great Ma fler of their order should leave the towne to him: That as well he as all his knights should de part in safetie, with libertie to carie with them as much of their goods as they could: And for al furance of this capitulation, the Turkeshould withdraw out of those seas his fleete or natie, an retire his armic by land five miles from R'hodes. By vertue of which capitulation R hodes remai ned to the Turkes, and the Christians passed into Sicily, and so into Italy, keeping their fait and profession vnuiolated: they found in Siedy an army by sea compounded of a certaine num ber of vessels, with great reliefe of victuals and munitions, and ready to hoise faile at the nex wind to reuictuall R hodes. The flownesse of this reseu was layd to the Popes sault. Ascerthe were departed, Solyman for a more contempt of Christian religion, made his entrie into the

Citievpon the day of the birth of the fonne of God: which day being celebrated in the Churches of Christians with noyse of musicke and holie inuocations, he converted all the Churches of Rhodes, dedicated to the feruice of Iesus Christ, into Mosqueis] (fo they call their temples) which after all the Christian rites and ceremonies were abolished, they dedicated to Mahomet. This was the end of the yeare 1, 22, infamous for the name and title of Christendome, and this was the fruite drawne of the discords of our Princes, which yet might be somewhat tollerable, if at least the examples of harmes past might make them better tempered in time to come.

As the discords of Princes continued, so increased also the trauels and perplexities of the yeare 1 5 2 3. In the beginning of which the familie of the Malatesteis knowing how vnable they 1523 were to refill the Popes forces, were in the end contented by the mediation of the Duke of Vrbin to leaue Rimini and the Castle, albeit under this uncertaine hope, that there should be referued for Pandolfe some reasonable estate and meane to line, wherein nothing was done. Afterwards the Duke of Vrbin went to the Pope, with whome and with the most part of the Court, the glorious memorie of Pope lulio working much for him, he obtained absolution from all paines and impositions, and was estsoones reinuested in the Duchie of Vrbin, but with this exception, not to prejudice the rights and application that had bene made of the country of Mont feltre to the Florentines, who faydthey had lent to Pope Leo three hundred and fifty thousand duckets for the defence of that Duchie, and had expended fince his death in diverse places for the preferuation of the chare of the Church, more then threescore and ten thousand. The Popereceiued also into grace the Duke of Ferrara, whom he did not onely inuest of new in the impery of Ferrara, and of all that he possessed appertaining to the Church afore the warre of Pope Leo against the Frenchmen, but also he left to him (not without a note of infamie both to himselfe and ministers that abused his ignorance) the iurisdiction of the boroughes of Saint Felix and Fimale: which townes as he got at fuch time as he began the warre against Pope Leo, and afterwards loft them before his death, so he had eftsoones taken them of new by the occasion of he vacancie of the Sea. For recompence of this grace and inuefliture, the Duke was bound to avd and fuccor the Church in times of need with certaine numbers of men, for so much as belonged to the defence of his imperie and estate: and in case hereafter he should fall againe, and transgresse or offend the Sea Apostolike, besides his submission to great fines and amerciaments, he consented to have this investiture made nothing, and to the privation of all his rights. Moreover the Pope gaue him great hopes to restore to him Modena and Reggia, notwithstanding afterwards he etranged his mind from his promife, as well for the importance of fuch an indument which was afterwards told him, as also for the infamic of the examples of his predeceffors, which could not outredound vpon him.

About this time the Cassle of Alillan suffering no lesse wants of all provisions except bread, The Cassle of hen being vniuerfally afflicted with ficknesse and diseases, agreed to deliuer vp their charge Millan redred inder condition of life and goods faued, if they were not succoured by the fourteenth day of by the French. Aprill: at which day the composition being accomplished, the most part of the souldiers were ound dead: Calar was contented to deliuer it ouer into the possession of Duke Frauncis Sforce, wherein he wonne no little reputation and praise amongst the Italians: and albeit there vas no other peece in Italy that held for the Frenchmen, except the Castle of Cremona, which had asyet a plentifull provision of all things, yet these successes did nothing qualifiethe infeicities and aductfities of the peoples of that Duchie, who were wonderfully oppressed with he armie of Cafar, for that it was not payd: in which discontentment being gone to lodge withn Aft and the confines about it, and falling into tumult for the same cause, their disorder led hem to make pillage of the whole countrey, euen as farre as Vigeuena: for regard of which vinerfall wasting, as also to anoyd the harmes and daungers of the countrey, the inhabitants of Millan were driven to make promise of their payes amounting to an hundred thousand luckets: and yet the feeling of so many aduersities and rigours, could nothing abate the hareds of that people against the French, wherein the things that sustained them were partly a eare through the memorie of old injuries done against them by that nation, and partly a hope, east upon ceasing of the daunger the French king would estsoones assayle that state, and Ifo that they should be deliuered from those great burthens, for that it should be no more necessarie for the Emperour to entertaine in that Duchie any regiments of souldiers.

The negociation of the peace betweene Cafar and the Venetians continued fil, & as for many difficulties that hapned, and diverse forts of delayes interposed by the Venerians, the minds of mer were holden in great suspence what successe or effect it would draw : so one chiefe matter that made that action dilatorie, & augmented the difficulties, was the death of Ierome Adorna, whose yeares albeit were not many, yet his experience was rare, and his wit raifed to the comprehenfor of high things, which he well expressed in this treatie, wherein his authoritie was great and his capacitie fingular. In his place was fent from Millan for Cafar, Marsin Caracciolo Pronotarie to the Sea Apostolike, who manie yeares after was created Cardinall by Pope Paule the third. Many moneths were spent in this negociation at Venice, where the Frech king became no small impediment to the resolution by the importunate labour and diligence of his Embassadors, by whon he promised sometimes by letters, and sometimes by messengers especiall, that he would descent speedily into Italy with a right puissant armie. These offers and promises bred great diversitie o opinions amongst the Senators, and continual arguments and disputations: for many gaue coun fell not to abandon the alliance of the French king, and reposed altogether vpon his promise to fend presently an armie into Italie: which hope the French king labouring to feed with a won derfull diligence, he had newly fent to Venice, Ranse de Cere, not onely to entertaine and con firme his promife, but also to publish the manifest preparation of things: others remembring hov in the hope of many things past the king had behauce himselfe negligently, could not now ex pect any confidence in his promife to paffe into Italie: wherein that opinion was confirmed in them by certaine aduertisements from John Baduere their Embassadour in Fraunce, who as fured them, that for that yeare the French king would neither passe in person nor send any ar mie into Italy: an intelligence which he had from the Duke of Burbon, who was already ver fecretly conjoyned with Cafar, and wished the Venetians to entertaine vnitic with him: another fort of the Senatours wavering in mind, floodterrified no lesse by the ill successe of the king then by the good fortunes of Cafar, whereunto they joyned this confideration, that in Ital the Duke of Alslan, the Genowayes, the Florentines, together with all Tuscane followed th faction of Cafar, and doubted also least the Pope would likewise concurre in that inclination and out of Italy were for him his brother the Archduke, confining upon the Venetian estate: and the king of England making continual warre in Picardie: in which diversitie of opinion running no leffe amongst the principals of the Scnate, then the vniuerfall multitude, the deli beration could not long suspend, as well for the forwardnesse of things, as for the importuni ties of Cafars Embassadors, by whose continuals solicitation the Councell of the Pregati we affembled to pronounce the resolution. In this Councell spake Andrew Gritts in this fort, a per sonage of verie high authoritie in that common weale, for the great offices he had administred and of especiall reputation throughout all Italy, and with forraine Princes, for the inerite of hi wit and dealing.

The oration of si touching the Casar.

There is nothing more hurtfull in Counsellers then the passion of icalousie and suspicion, which Andrew Grit- drawing with it diverfitie and separation of willes, is so much the more prejudiciall, by how alliance with much it stoppeth oftentimes the libertie and freedome of well counselling; and for my part, albe it I am not ignorant that in giving counsell at this present not to depart from the confederation " of the French king, some will interpret me to partialitie, as though in me bare more respe-44 and authoritie the long cultome and conversation I have had with the French, then the care ar 46 affection which in nature and equitie I ought to expresse to the benefite of the common weak " yet I will rather lay my selfe downe to the imputations of men, then keepe suppressed that fide " litie of counselling, which in good office appertaineth to eueric good Citizen, in whom cannot be a counselling, which in good office appertaineth to eueric good Citizen, in whom cannot be a counselling, which in good office appertaineth to eueric good Citizen, in whom cannot be a counselling, which in good office appertaineth to eueric good Citizen, in whom cannot be a counselling, which in good office appertaineth to eueric good Citizen, in whom cannot be a counselling to the cou be expected any good propertie, either of a Citizen or a Senator that for anie occasion forbearer " to perfwade to others, that which in himfelfe he different to be good for the common weak and yet I doubt not that amongst men of discretion and wisedome this interpretation w of find no place, both for the confideration of my customes and actions in all times past, ar "also for that I neuer negociated with the French king nor his counsell, but as your Ager " your Creature, your commissioner, and your Deputie limited and regulated: but touching the er present matter, I doubt not to accompanie my opinion and counsell with such force of reason a and examples as shall be able to make me instified even with such as hold me suspected: Wea affemble

affembled heere to dispute whether we ought to make a new confederation with the Emperour, both contrarie to the faith we have given, and against the covenants of the League which we have ,> with the house of Fraunce : which in my judgement is no other thing then to go about so to affüre and confirme the power of the Emperour already vniuerfally redoubted, that being with- » outfurther remedy to moderate and embase it, it rile not continually encreasing to our right so great and apparant prejudice. We have no cause wherein may be taken any reason to justifie 30 hat deliberation, if we looke into the fidelity and equity of the French king: for that as he hath » for the most part fulfilled the alliance that he hath made with vs, and carefully restrained himselse », to the reasonable observation of amitie and League, so though the effects have not followed so readily to renew the warre in Italy, yet in regard of his proper interests therein concurring, that » hath not proceeded of other matter then of the impediments growing vpon him in the kingdome so of Fraunce: which albeit may for a time prolong or deferre his counsels, yet let vs not looke that ,, hey will ytterly diffolue his enterprise, for that he liues possessed with so great a defire to recouer ,, he Duchy of Millan, and hath his forces fo mighty and ready, that having once fullained the first » runts of his enemies, there will nothing let him to renew his armie & recontinue the war in Italy. Wherein I may aptly vie for example the experience and memory of king Lowis, who having his 30 ountrey inuaded with armies farre more mighty then those that now vexe him, for that almost " all the nations and regions round about him role into conspiracy against him, yet did he so easily >> lefend his estates by the greatnesse of his forces, by the munition and defence of his frontiers and " places confining, and with the fidelity and readineffe of his peoples, that when in all reasonable » onfideration it was thought that necessity would drive him to retire himselfe for a time, and re- » fraine his mind to rest and tranquility, he raysed his thoughts to the warres of Italy, and in that » niuerfall coniecture of his weakneffe, fent thither fuddenly right huge and mighty armies. The ,, ing raigning did the like in the first yeare of his raigne, & even then entred into the renovation of » he warre, when, both by his new ascending to the Crowne, and also finding his treasures consu-, ned by the infinite expenses of his predecessor, euery man looked that he would put off the war » ill another yeare. Let vs not interprete finisterly of his delayes and deferring, and much lesse let » s lay them for an excuse our variations, seeing that confederate that is slow not of will but by im- » ediments, gives to his companion no iust cause to complaine, nor any honest colour to depart " com his confederation. We ought in this cause to judge of the French king, as in matters of a- " nity good men vie to measure friendship, that he that maketh a promise, albeit he performe >> ite, yet he breakes not the law of promile, for that although he disappointeth, yet he fayleth not . >> t a great vithankfulneffe when we forget what we have received of our friends: & when they are » low to performe but small things, we are ready to rayse great complaints against them. But » ouching this deliberation, if we looke well into the effate of our affaires, we shall find that if con- » non honesty joyned with the dignity of our Senat, call vs to it, no lesse are we justly prouoked by » he regard of our profite and proper safety: it is easie to be discerned from how many daungers, » rom how many suspitions, and from how many afflictions we shall be deliuered, if the French ,, ing recouer the estate of Mullan: and wisemen with the same facility may find out, into >> what tranquility, into what affurance, and into what freedome of estate, our affaires will fall for ,, nany yeares, if he preuaile in that action, wherein he hath concurring with his forces reason, con-, cience, and equity . Of this we are warned by the examples of the yeares before, for at such time ,, is the king that now is, went about to recour it, it came to passe that we, who afore with many,, langers and very great expences, were scarce able to defend Padoa and Treuisa, were made able, by his occasion to reconquer Bressia and Verona: yea so long as he enjoyed that Duchie in qui-,, tricffe, we possessed in peace and surety all our dominions and siurisdictions, and what else was ,, of our impery or our obedience: which are examples that much more ought to moue vs then the uncient memory of the League of Cambray, for that the kings of Fraunce have learned by ex-,, perience that which they could neuer comprehend by reason, how prejudiciall it hath beneto,, hem to depart our of our alliance; a matter which without all comparison they may best dif-,, terne in the time present, wherein this king hath for his adversary and competitor, an Emperour, Prince whose amplitude of kingdomes, and whose redoubted powerfwill keepe him in necessity, oesteeme dearely our alliance. But on the contrary, who seeth not into what dangerous termes, our affaires will be reduced, when the French king shall find himselfe meerely excluded out of 20

as the enterprises of Italy: for who can let the Emperout to appropriate to himselfe or to his bre et ther the Duchie of Mullan, of the which he would neuer to this day transferre the inuestitut " to Frauncis Sforce? And if he have power to do fo, what is he that can affure his will? wh .. can stay the streame driven by so violent a wind? Yea, since the Duchie of Millan is so apt a lac « der to lift him to the Empire of all Italie, who will take vpon him to promife, that in the Em ex perour iustice and conscience will beare more sway, then ambition and couetousnesse, incl " nations naturall to all great Princes? If any man take any furety by the moderation and tempe c. rance of his officers which he hath in Italy, let him be aunswered, that the most of them are Sp. .. mards, a nation vnfaithfull, rauifhing, and aboue all others most insatiable: so that if the Emp 66 rour or his brother Ferdinand, make Millan their owne and possesse; in what degree shall re as maine our estate being enuironed by them both, on the confines of Italy and Germanie? wh " furety, what fuccours, what expectation of remedicamid fo many daungers ? The kingdome « Naples is in his possession, the Pope with all the other Potentates of Italy are at his deuotio and all our friends being made naked of money and forces, there remaines to vs no hope of aye or comfort, and leffe possibility to find fauour where fortune and so great division of minds con ce tendagainst vs . But if the French king were Lord of the Duchie of Millan, then should thing ce stand so evenly ballanced betweene two so great Princes, that who so ever stood in seare of the copower of the one of them, should find peace and surety by the might of the other, for that bo " pollicy and their proper ambition would make them lealous one of anothers greatnesse: ye the onely feare of his comming affurethall his neighbours, for that by it the Imperials are n " frained from entring into armes, or to intangle themselves with any enterprise. By which re-" fon is made more ridiculous then terrible the vanity of their threatnings to turne the army; se gainst vs, if we confederate with the Emperour, as though it were an easie enterprise to mot " warre against the state of Venice, and as though there were present surety of the victory, ar alaltly as though that were the onely meane and remedy to keepe the French king from paffin "and not rather the cause of the contrarie: for who doubteth that being pronoke dby then es we would propound to the king by necessitie such conditions, that though he bare no incl "nation to them, yet they would induce him to passe? The same hapned in the time of kir. "Lowis, when the iniuries and treasons that were done vnto vs by that nation, enforced vs for "incense and stirre vp that king (when of his prisoner I became your Embassadour) that eue when he stood in the greatest scare to be mightily inuaded in his kingdome of Fraunce, ene "then did he dispatch a strong armie into Italy, though with very ill successe. Let vs not beleet "that if the Imperials thought the way to draw vs to their amitic, or to affure themselves of the French king, were to fet upon us, that they had till this day deferred the execution: perhappy "their Captaines have no defire to enrich themselves with the profites and spoyles of warre, per "happes they have had no necessitie, in disburdening those countries that were friends to the "to draw money from them, to nourish the army in the countrey of another: no rather the haue well found out, that by reason of our power, it is too hard a matter to force vs: and muc «leffe flands it with them having a continual feare of the descending of the French, to entang "themselues with another warre, norto giue occasion to a state so mightie in men, money, and " pinion, to allure with the greatnesse of offers the French king to march . So long as they are "holden in these suspitions and in these doubts, they will not intrude for themselves upon the "Duchie of Millan, neither will they feeke to offendys but with vainethreatnings: where "we affure them of that feare, they will have in their power to do both the one and other: and "they do it as it is likely they will, where is our remedie, where are become our hopes, our cour " fels, and our expectations, yea of whom may we complaine more then of our felues? our own "feares will breede our common daungers, our fraile suspitions will draw on our proper cale mities, and as a destinic we shall be driven into warre by our immoderate desires to peace which then is most holy and most to be embraced, when it puts men out of suspicion, when "increaseth no danger, and when it brings a meane to fit downe in tranquility, and to cut off gree expences. But when it appeareth in another habite and forme, & begetteth effects contrary, it abi "feth then the name, the property, & the nature of peace, & vnder a corrupt refemblance of peac " it taketh jully the title of a dangerous war, & under the shew of a wholsome medicine, it expres " feth the operation of a mortal poylon: so that, as in confederating with the Emperor, we turne th Frenc

French king from his enterptife of Italy, & leade the Emperour as it were by a line, to occupy at >> his will the Duchy of Mellan, and so to embase vs and our intifdiction: so it followeth that by that » action(with a right great infamic of our name, and hazard of the faith of this common-weale) we » buy the greatnesse of a Prince who hath given no lesse tokens of his ambition then proofe of his " power, and who (iovning with him his brother) hath fee downe this pretence, that all that we poileffe in the firme land, appetraineth vnto them. And on the other fide, we reiect & exclude out of " Italy, a king who under his equity and greatnesse assure the liberty of vs all, and is induced by a >> great necessity & constraint to remaine straitly allied and conjoyned with vs. These reasons so cuident and lenfible avoid all matter of imputation, that I am not pulbed on more by affection then » by truth, not more catted by any interest particular, then with the lone I beare to the commonweale, the fafety and preferuation of which we neede not doubt, if God give fo great grace >> and felicity to your counfels, as he hath plentifully imparted amongst you the spirit of wisedome >> and forecast.

But against this speech, did oppose one George Cornaro a Gentleman of equall authority, and of no lesse reputation for gravitie and stayed condition.

Right icalous were the office of Magiltrates, if in matters of counfelit were leffe lawfull to con- The oration of fure then to object, and no leffe doth it offend the estate and credit of their place, where it is not George Corthought as great a fidelity to answer as to propone: since such harh bin alwayes the law & liberty naro. of counsell giving to affire the truth against all sinister infinuations : and albeit I am not ignorant >> that in nothing is more suspition then to give counsell in matters of state, yet for mine owne part, , , considering the equity of this Senate afore whom I speake, I doubt not but the reasons I shall give >> will fuffice to affure mine innocency against all imputations. Affuredly the matter we have in » hand, is great and full of difficulties, both for the confideration of the time and nature of many ac- >> cidents concurring: and yet when I looke into the infidelity and ambition of the Princes of this >> time, and how much they differ from the nature of common-weales, who fogouernement being 39 not subjected to the appetite of one alone, but disposed by the consents of many, vieto proceede ... with more moderation and regard, and observe with great ceremony (contrary to the examples) of Princes) notto departe from any thing that beareth apparance of inflice, honelly or reason: 1 >> can not but conclude, that it is most huttfull for vs and our affaires, ro haue the Duchy of Millin 20 soffessed by a Prince more mighty then our seluces, seeing that necessarily such a neighbourhood , will so hold vs suspected and afflicted, that though we enjoy peace, yet we shall alwayes live in ,, continuall thoughts of warre, notwithstanding all Leagues of alliance or confederation what >> o cuer. Of this ancient flories give vs many examples, which for good respects I passe over for » he present, leaning you onely to the lamentable experience of king Lowisthe twelth, of whole " loing I doubt not remaineth imprinted in the hearts of vsalla bitter rememberance'. This Se- » nate brought him into the Duchy of Mullan, and to that vnhappic resolution many of vs heere 39 aue affiltance: we kept with him justly our faith in all Capitulations, notwithstanding (vn- " er great offers and goodly occasious) we were adulfed by the Spaniards and Launceknights to ,, eaue his alliance, as also his infidelity gaue no small cause to draw vs thereunto, for that he socited many practifes against vs : but neither the memorie of fo many benefites received, ,, or the merite of our fidelitie so justly observed, nor the consideration of many perpetuall, ffices exhibited, could moderate in him his great defire to vexe vs: in so much as in that am-, ition, and for that cause, he made a willing reconcilement with his auncient and greatest ene-,, nies, and lastly contracted against vs that most perillous confederacy of Cambray. If it be daun-,, erous for the rich and poore to dwell neare together, for that in the wealth of the rich are fowne, he feedes of enuie to the poore, and by the wants of the poote are bredhumors of couetoufnesse " the rich manto confume him; farte greater harmes mult grow by the neighbourhood of great ,, ings and Princes, whose ambition caried on the wings of authority, runneth without limite, ,, nd is no more repulled by the refiltance of men, then a fwift running streame blowne by a vio- ;, nt wind to ouerflow his chamiell: and therefore to escape those daungers that would al- ; ayes hang ouer vs by foill affured neighbourhood of great Princes, the necessitie of our affaires ?, riues vs to addresse all our counsels to this ende, that neither the French king nor the Emperour ,; me any footing in the Duchie of Aultan, but that it temaine to Frauncis Sforce, or fuch an- ;; her of his equalitie, who were not borne vp with kingdomes or large dominious. Vpon fach a 3, choise dependes our surety for the present, and hereaster (if the condition of times do change) may "depend a great encreasing and exaltation of our state. We consult now, whether we should continue amity with the French king, or confederate our selues with the Emperour: By the one of "these two deliberations Frauncis Sforce is excluded absolutely from the Duchy of Millan, and "an entrie left open to the French king, who is a Prince farre mightie aboue vs: the other tendeth " to affure and confirme in the same Duchie, Frauncis Sforce, whom the Emperour offereth to " comprehend as principall in our confederation, and hath made promise to the king of England to protect him: So that though he would feeke to deprive him of that estate, he should not offend vs only and the other potentates of Italy (to whom he should give cause to turne effloores to the "French) but also in that action he is both to displease the king of England, whom it behoueth him " greatly to respect, and also to prouoke against him all the inhabitants of the Duchy of Millan, who "beare an universall inclination to Frauncis Sforce: and so laying himselfe downe to many diffi-" culties and dangers, and to no leffe infamie, he should also go against his faith, which till this day "we have not found by any token that he hath defiled; a matter which we can not protest on the "behalfe of the French: yeahe can not be touched with any demonstration or signe contrarie to "his fidelity, having fince the death of Pope Leo repossessed Frauncis Sforce of that estate, and " tedehuered up the strong holds in fort as they were conquered, and lastly reestablished him in "the Castell of Millan contrarie to the beleeuing of many; why therefore should we not rather "embrace that counsell, wherein is discerned an apparant hope to come to the end of our inten-"tions, then to follow that which manifestly tendeth to an ende contrarie to our affaires? Per-" haps there are that will object against this, that this common-weale would suffer greater danger, " if the Duchy of Millan were in the power of the Emperour, then if it should divolve into the "hands of the French, for that necessitie would draw that king, both for the greatnesse of Cafar, " and for the emulation and lealousse he hath of him, to perseuere in our alliance : but in the Emee perour all the contrary, as well for his power and might, as for the claimes and rights which he " & his brother pretend against our estate. Sure I beleeve that who hath that opinion of the Emperour, is not beguiled, confidering the nature and cultome of Princes which are mighty and great: "but God grant that he be not deceived that holdeth not the fame opinion of the French king. Ma-" ny of the same reasons made for his predecessor, yet ambition and couctousnesse bare more do-"minion in him, then either common honefly, or his proper profit. And besides, the causes that " might keepe him contained in League with vs, are not perpetuall, but subject to change from one "time to another, according to the nature of humane things: for, both the Emperour hath his mor-" tality as other men haue, and withall, stands subject to infinite accidents of fortune, according to "the example of many Princes as mighty in greatnesseas he: it is not long since, that all Spaine con-" spiring against him, he seemed more needefull of pity then of spite. And at the leastwise there is "not fo great difference betweene the one daughter and the other, as there is oddes betweene counfell that wholly excludes vs from our purpose, and a resolution which in similitude of truet " and reason leades vs to the full accomplishment of the same. Besides those reasons consider only "the time to come and farre off: but if we looke into the prefent estate of things, we shall discerse " that to reject the alliance of the Emperor, doth put vs for the present into greater perplexities and "dangers: for, if we separate our selves from the French king, it is credible that he will deferre the "warre vitill better times and fitter occasions, but if we continue conjoyned with him, it may be that the Emperour will presently make warre against vs; a matter which necessarily will heape vp. " on vs many troubles and expences. And in whether of these elections shall the issue of the wa " be more dangerous to vs? If we joyne with the Emperour, it is not almost to be doubted but the "victory will fall on that fide, which we can not so assuredly promise to our selues, if we stand " conjoyned with the Frenchking: And in confedering vs with the Emperour, the victory of th "French can not be so dangerous to vs, as it wold be in the contrary, for that in that case, all the for er ces of the victor would be turned against vs, and the Emperour would not only have a lesse bridle " and weaker impediments, but also he would stand almost in an absolute necessity to occupie the "Duchy of Millan. Touching the objection made against the bond of confederation, it is easily ar " fwered by the same reason that is yied to satisfie questions of equity, since our promife to the "French king stretcheth only to ayd him to defend his estates that he possessed in Italy, but not t " recover them if he should lose them. The articles of the capitulations beare not that, and the sam asons make for vs that are brought in against vs: we accomplished the bond of all ductic and ... ffice, when, after the losse of Mullan hapning through the default of their provisions, our fouldis and men of feruice received more harmes then the Frenchmen. We were acquited of our proise, when Monsieur Lawtrech returning to the warre with the Swiffers, we sent him our bands of" uldiers for his succours: yea we have done more then teasonably might be required of vs, when, expecting formany moneths the coming of his army, we received nothing from him but vaine ppes and diffembled promifes: if howere stayed by his owne will, why leeke wee to support e imputation of his faults? if he were holden by necessity, is not the same a sufficient reason to stifie vs, though we stoodbound? I know not why we should be kept bound any longer to refrench king, feeing he hath first abandoned vs: it can be no iniustice to retire from the eague, since we take our liberty by his example: how can we stand guiltie in bond and office wards him, when he hath first broken the law of fidelity and contract with vs? In matters League and confederation betweene parties, the breach of the one gives liberty to the other, id the bond that is once broken by the one, forbeareth afterwards to $\,$ compell the other . I will ot assure that the Emperours Captaines intendto moue warre at this time against vs, no more ill I warrant the contrary, confidering with what necessity they are pressed to entertaine their ary in the estates of others, and the hope they may conceine to draw vs by that meane to their alnce, specially if the French do not march: of which who doubteth, doubteth not without reason, oth for their naturall inclinations, for their necessitie and want of mony, and for the impediments the wars which they have on the other fide the Mounts with two so mighty Princes, & of these ipediments our Embassador hath already made credible relation. Lastly, my reply containeth "ieselse matter, that we ought to foresee with all sludy, that the Duchy of Millan be transferred." Frauncis Sforce, and consequently I maintaine, that the counsell that guides vs to that effect is ore profitable, then that which makes reasons and arguments to exclude vs from it. The authority of two fuch personages, together with the force of their reasons, did rather make ubtfull, then assure the minds of the Senators, whose perplexities kept them so farre offfrom reluing, that the Senat deferred to determine absolutely, inducing them thereunto their custome d nature, the greatnesse of the cause, and their desite to see surther advanced the preparations of e French king: the many difficulties also that by necessity happed in the accord with the Archke, were some causes helping to their deferring: but the matter that most increased the sufnce of their minds, was, that the French king, who with great industry prepared himselfe to the are, had fent the Bishop of Bazeux to desire them to deferre to resolue any thing till the next oneth, by whom he affured them that before that terme he would march with a greater army in had bene feene in Italy in the age of man. And as they flood in this doubt and perplexity of nd, Anthony Griman Duke of the same City died, & Andrew Gritti was chosen into his place; Andrew Gritti election rather preindiciall to the French affaires then otherwayes: for, affoone as he was ray - Duke of Ve-Ito that dignity, he referred wholly to the Senate the deliberation and counsell of that matter, nice. d would neuer afterwards either in word or deede, shew himselfe inclined to either part. But at I, because the king continued to send tresh curriers to the Senate, and was importunate in offers d promises, and for that there was speciall aduertisement, that, to assure the expectation of the irre, Anne Monimorency afterwards Coultable of Fraunce, and Federike Boffolo, were upon ir way to Vence, the Embassadors of the Empetor and the king of England to whom this dering was much suspected) began to protest to the Senate, that they would depart within three yes, and leave all things in their imperfection. By reason of which protestation, imploying a mar of threatning, and also that the fidelity that was gathered in the French promises, began to dinish finding nothing but vaine hopes, but chiefly by the advertisement of their Enibassador reent in Fraunce, they were confrained to determine to embrace the amity of the Emperour, with ion they entred into contract under these conditions: That betweene the Emperor, Ferdinand confederation chduke of Austria, and Francis Sforce Duke of Millan on the one party, and the Senate of Ve- betweene Cae on the other party, should be a perpetual peace and confederation: That the Senate, in times far and they eneed, should fend for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, fixe hundred men at armes, fixe nesians, ndred light horsemen, and fixe thousand so temen: That they should administer the like prortion for the defence of the kingdome of Naples, but in case it should be inuaded by the Chriins: for, the Venetians refused to be bound generally, because they would not stirve the Turke against them: That the Emperour should be bound to defend against all men, all that the Venetans possessed in Italy, and that with the like number and proportion of men: That the Venetans should pay in eight yeares to the Archduke for appealement of their ancient controuerses are for the accord made at Wormes, two hundred thousand duckats. Vpon the end of this agreement the Senate having dismissed Theodor Triunlee, chose Francis Maria Duke of Vrbin for govern generall of their men of warre with the same conditions.

It was a common judgement of most of the wisemen in Italy, that the French king finding the aides to be turned against him, which afore had bene on his side, would put off the enterprise Millan for that yeare: neuerthelesse, when they heard that the preparations did not onely continue, but that the army began to march, such as stood in searce of his victory, fell (the better resist him) to make a new consederation, wherein they persuaded the Pope to be chiefe at principall.

Here is to be remembred, that where the Pope, at his first descending into Italy stood de rous to have an univerfall peace, and looking with great compassion into the harmes which gre vpon Christendome by the victories of the Turkes, he sent to the Emperour, to the French kin and the king of England', to depose for the time, their armes so hurtfull for the common-wea of Christendome, and every of them severally to send Embassadors to Rome, with fulnesse power to confult of the necessary remedies, and releeuing of the lamentable afflictions of the Christians. This was performed by them all in apparance, but beginning to treate more partic larly of things, it was presently discerned that those labours were vaine, for the infinite difficulti es that fell out when they came to the point of peace-making: So many impediments do follow the deliberation of great causes, and so hard it is to reconcile controuersies of estate, which ordinais or draw with them their infinite fuspitions and differences: for, a truce for a short time, was nothing agreable to the Emperour, neither did it in any fort serue the expectation of his perposes: and the French king refused to make it for a longer time (so hurtfull was it for him to protract or temps rise) that had all his provisions for the warre advanced. In which separation of mind between thefe two great Princes, the Pope either for the ancient affection which efticones begantor uiue in him towards the Emperour, or for that he discerned the thoughts of the French king ! be estranged from peace and concord, discouered his inclination, and began more then he w wont, to hearken to those that encouraged him nor to suffer the French to possesse against the Di chie of Millan . This oportunity was observed by the Cardinall Medicis, who, having rema ned at Florence for feare of the perfecutions of his enemies, but chiefly of the Cardinall Volterra, who stood very great & gracious with the Pope, tooke to him a new courage, and can to Rome, where he was received of most of the Court with great honor and respect: there joynic himselfe with the Duke of Seffe the Emperors Embassador, and with the Embassadors of the kir of England, he fauored that cause, and furthered it all that he could with the Pope. It is seene often in the course and practise of worldly things, that the falling of one man is the rising of another t which property of revolution is apparantly proved, that mortall men are subject to the law of ne ture and fortune : for, in this advantage of variation and change, the ill hap of Cardinall Volterr. "which almost alwayes troubled his wit, his pollicie, and all his drifts, heaped vpon him a great de mage and danger: and in that oportunitie was given to the Cardinall Medicis, a notable mean to enter into greater grace and authority with the Pope, who afore bare a constant inclination t the Cardinall Volterra, for that both by his industrie & apt infinuation of words, he had brough him to beleeue that he defired nothing more then an univerfall peace throughout all Christer dome. This was the accident: one Francis Imperiale, being banished from Sicile, went int Fraunce, and being staied at Castelnoua neare Rome by the denise of the Duke of Sesso, there we found about him a packet of letters written by the Cardinall Volterra, to his Nephew the Bishe of Xaintles. By these letters he gave counsell to the French king, to invade the Ile of Sicile witha army by sea, by which inuation the Emperors forces should necessarily be turned to the defent of it, and so the enterprise of Millan would become more easie to the French. The detection this man troubled not a litle the Pope, who was so much the more aggricued against him, by ho much his dissembled demonstrations had beguiled him : and in that just discontentment, he w:

Cardinall Vol- vehemently furthered by the incitation of the Duke of Seffo and Cardinall Medicis, by whose it serraprisoner-dustries he was committed to the Castell S. Ange, and afterwards examined by Judges delegate:

zuilty in the crime of violation of the Popes maiesty, for that he had incenfed the French king to nuade with hostility, the Iland of Sicile, a free hold of the sea Apostolike. Wherein albeit they proceeded with lenity and fauor, and after the acts of interrogatories, he had liberty of counfell to pelad for him, yet they proceeded not with the fame moderation against his goods, fince the same day he was apprehended, the Pope fent to make seasure of all the moneables & riches that were in his house. And as one conspiracy reuealeth another, so by the imprisonment of the sayd Imperialo here was discouered another detection for the French king in Sicile, for the which were executed by justice the Count Camerato, the master of the ports, and the Treasurer. The verity and confideration of these matters, infinuated the Pope a great displeasure against the French king, in which ill disposed inclination, he began to consult more and more with Cardinal Medicis: and aftly the rumor of the discending of the French armies redoubling daily, the Pope published manifeltly his intention to oppose against them: for which cause he summoned the assembly of the Cardinals, to whom after his accultomed protestations of the present feares and daungers of the great Turke, he declared that as onely the French king was the cause why so great perils were not emoued from Christendome, for that he refused with great obstinacy to consent to the peace hat was negociated : fo, feeing it apportained to him as the Vicar of Iefus Christ and fucreffor to Peter, to be carefull ouer the prefernation of Christian peace, he was compelled by that eale which he oweth to their vniuerfall fafety, to confederate himselfe with such Princes as did what they could to defend Italy from troubles, for that of the quiet or trouble of that region, deended the tranquility or vexation of the whole Christian part of the world. According to this eclaration, concurring with the industry of the Viceroy of Naples being come to Rome for that urpole, a league was concluded for the defence of Italy the day of August, between the ope, the Emperor, the king of England, the Archduke of Austria, the Duke of Millan, the Genoraies, and the Cardinall Medicis and the estate of Florence joyntly, The publication bare also, that should continue all the time of the confederates lives, and a yeare after the death of every of nem: There was referuation of place and time for any other to come in, so that the Pope, the Emerour, and the king of England thought good, with this provision, that in matters of quarrell and ontrouerly, they should vie inflice, and not armes: That they should creet an army to be opposed gainst who so euer wold inuade any of the confederats, to which army the Pope shold fend 200 nen at armes, the Emperor eight hundred, the Florentins two hundred, the Duke of Millan two undred, and two hundred light horsemen: That the Pope, the Emperor, and the Duke of Miller hould make all the provisions of artilleries and munitions, together with all expences and charges ppertaining: That to leavy the bands of footemen necessary for the army, and to furnish alloier expences requifite for the warre, the Pope should pay enery moneth twentie thousand uckats, the Duke of Millan as much, & the Florentins the like fumme: That the Emperor should ay thirtie thousand, the Genowates, Lucquois, and Siennois together, ten thousand, and the Genovies not with standing to remaine bound to the army by sea and other defraiments necessary for neir defence: To this contribution they should be all bound for three monethes, and so much me ouer the three monethes as should bet set downe by the Pope, the Emperor, and the king of ngland: That it should be in the power of the Pope and the Emperor to name the Captaine geerall of the whole warre, who it was fayd should fall vponthe person of the Viceroy of Naples, or whom the Cardinall Medicas, whose authority was great with the Imperials, laboured what e could, chiefly for the hatred he bare to Profper Colonno. The Marquis of Mantna was joyned o this confederation by an indirect meane, for that the Pope and the Florentins entertained him or their Captaine generall at their common pay.

But neither the league made by the Venetians with the Emperor, nor the vnion of so many great sinces, contracted with so ample contributions and great provisions, could alter the resolution sthe French king, who being come to Lions, prepared to passe in person with a strong army into staly: where the brute of his; comming was no sooner spred, then new tumults began to apcare: for Lionell the brother of Albert Pio, recovered by surprise the towne of Carpy, being neg-genly garded by John Coscia, whom Prosper had created Governor there, which he might do of cod authority, for that the Emperour had given that towne to him after he had deposed Albert or his offence of rebellion to the Empire. But in the Duchy of Millan there was like to have châded a greater accident, both more terrible for the property, & for the person of greater prejudices

This is the discourse ofit: Frauncis Sforce riding from Monce to Millan vpon a little Mule and caufing the horsemen that were for his gard to ride farre from him to anoyde the trouble (the dust that in sommer time the train of horses makes to rise in great abundance through all the plaines of Lombardy, Boniface Viscount a young Gentleman, better knowne by the noblenesse i his house, then for his wealth, estates, or other conditions, offered himselfe onely to accompan the Duke, being well mounted vpon a Turkish horse: and asthey came riding together vpon partition of a way, Bomface being somewhat slipt behind, obseruing the oportunity of the place and the distance of the Dukes traine, spurred his horse, and ranne in a maine race with his das ger drawne to thike the Duke on the head: but what with the feare of the Mulet shrinking win the noyfe of his horse, and the fiercenesse of his horse whom he could not stoppe, together wit the difference of the height of his horse from the Dukes Mulet, the blow that he made at the Dukes head fwarued and fell vpon his shoulders , and afterwards drawing his fword to accomplish the execution, the same impediments made it vaine, or at least the hurt was light, bein but a blow flentwife. By this time many of the horsemen making in to the Dukes rescue, h fell to flying, hoping to shake off by his fortune, the daunger that by his valour he was fallen in to. Many of the horsemen of the Dukes gardhad him in chase, amongst whom was a genera emulation of hazard and perill to kill him that in formanifest treason sought the life of their ma fter, but he found more lafety in the swiftnesse of his horse, then his followers sound remedy i their reuengefull defires. And if fortune had aunswered the valour and industry of the man, might have bene called one of the rarest and most fingular adventures that ever was, that or man without armour, at nooneday, in a plaine way, durft fet ypon a great Prince, in the middeft his estate, and ennironed with fo great a strength of souldiers and men armed, and yet to fly awa in safety. The cause of this desperate resolution of this Gentleman, was a malice that he had con ceiucdfor the murder of Monfeig. Visconte, who a few monethes afore, had bene flaine in Mi lan by one lerome Moron, not without the Dukes will and privitie as many supposed. The Duk vpon his hurt withdrew himselfe to Monce, and for that he was icalouse that there were of the conspiracy within Millan, the Bishop of Alexandria brother to Monseig. that was slaine, w apprehended by Oloron and Proper. At the first rumour of the fact, either to preuent the su pition that might go on him, or to make his fauour the greater, he put himfelfe willingly into the hands of Profeer upon his faith, and after he was founded by examination, they fent him ptison to the Castell of Cremona, some holding him guilty, and some speaking much of his innocence as the judgements of men were diverse. It hapned almost in the same seasons, that Galeas B raguo accompanied with the exiles of Millan, and with the ayde of certaine French fouldie which were already in the countrey of Piemont, was received into the rowne, of Valence by the Captaine of the Castell who was a Saucie man: but Antho, de Leua lying within Af with or part of the light hotfmen and Spanish footmen, being aduertised of the accident, went immediat to incampe before it, and taking the vantage of the weaknesse of the towne which the enemies he no time to reduce to fortification, he planted his artilleries, and tooke it the second day, and wil the fame fucceffe battered the Castell. There died about foure hundred bodies, as well in the action of the towne, as in the execution of the Callell, besides many made prisoners, among whom was Galeas principall leader of the enterprise.

The French army marcheth. According to the great preparations made in Fraunce for the warre, the army marched atlal and bands of fouldiers passed continually outer the mountstastier whom the person of the king prepared to passed, which he had effectually accomplished, had not the conspiracy of the Duke of But bon which now beganne to come to light, given impediment to his going: he was of the blou Royall, and therefore his reputation more great and generall: for the dignity of his office being great Constable, his authority was absolute and ample: by his large estates and riches, his credite was current in Fraunce, and by his naturall valour, he was mighty and strong in the opinion of men: but he had not bene of long time in the grace and fauour of the king, and in that aliection, was not admitted to the secret affaires of the Realme, not respected according to the mittee of his place and greatnesse: he was discontented with the opposition of the kings mothe whore using certaine auncient rights, made open claime to the greatest parte of his lands at dominions in the open Parliament at Paris: and for that he found in the king no disposition to remedy to that griefe, he suffered in dignation to enterinto his hart, and in that discontentment admitted confederation with the Emperour and with the king of England, folicited by Monsieur confederate le Beauram, of great confidence with the Emperor, and his chiefe Chamberlaine: betweene whom, but we the o affure things with a more faster and faithfull knot, it was agreed, that the Emperour should Emperour she give him in mariage his fifter Elenor the late widow of Emanuell king of the Portugals . The exe-king of Englad cution of their counsels was grounded upon the French kings determination to go in person to of Burbon. the war in which resolution to nourish him the more, the king of England had given him cunning liopes, that he would not molest the Realme of Fraunce for that yeare: That the Duke of Burbon, affoone as the king should be over the Mounts, should enter Burgundy with an army of twelve thousand sootemen that were secretly levied with the moneyes of the Emperour and the king of England: wherein he doubted not well to acquite himselfe in that seruice, both for the ablence of the king, and for the universall grace & opinion which he had through all the realme of Fraunce. And touching those things that should be conquered, the Earledome of Prouence should remaine to him, and in place of Earle, he should put on the name and title of king of Prouence, chalenging that state to appertaine to him by the rights of the house of Anion: and all the residue gotten by this warre to discend to the king of England: the Duke of Burbon then abiding at Moulyns a principall towne of the Duchy of Burbon, fayned himselfe to be ficke, to have the beter excuse not to follow the king into Italy. The king in his journey to Lyons, made Monlyns in his way, where being already possessed of certaine light tokens of the Dukes coulpiracy, he gaue him minkling, that albeit many went about to bring him in distrust and suspition with him, yet for his part, he beleeved lesse in the rumors and informations which might be full of incertainty and erour, then in his faith and valour, whereof he had so good experience. But the dissimulation of he Duke exceeded the roundnesse & plainnesse of the king; for, keeping his intentions smothered? regaue thankes to God thad had appointed him to line vnder fuch a king, afore whose equity and gravity could not stand the false accusations and imputations of malicious men; and in that compassion he promised the king to follow him wheresoener he would go so soone as he was delineed of his malady, which he fayd could not continue long, for that it drew with it no dangerous acidents. But the king was no fooner come to Lyons, then he had aduertifement that many bands of Launceknights were multred upon the frontiers of Burgundy, which confirming the tokens of uspition that he had before, together with certaine letters surprised, detecting more plainely the onspiracy, he committed to prison sorthwith Monsieur de S.V alier, Monsieur de Bussie brother o Monsieur La Palisse, the postmaister, and the Bishop of Autun, all parteners of the practise: and . hinking to make the action perfect by apprehending the head, he dispatched in great diligence o Monlyns, the great maisser with five hundred horse and soure thousand sootemen, to take the Duke of Burbon : but his suspition was swifter then their celerity, for, doubting no lesse the deection of things, then fearing leaft the passages would be stopped, by his forecast he preuented the perill that the kings indignation prepared for him, and escaped secretly into Franche count in disguiled attire: fo futtle in man is the fuspition of perill, and so swift are the wings that carie him >> rom the mischiese which he seareth.

By reason of this euasion, and the importance of the conspiracy that depended of it, the king The French are thought it best not to pursue in person the warres of Italy: and yet would be not wholly give ouer the expedition, but retaining with himselfe one part of the souldiers prepared for this new war, he committed to Monsieur Boniuet then Admirall of Fraunce, the conduction of his army, which contained a thousand eight hundred launces, six thousand Smissers, two thousand Gastoins, two thousand Valesiens, fixe thousand Launceknights, twelue thousand Frenchmen, and three thousand Italians: with which army affoone as the Admirall was past the Mounts, and drawing neare the confines of the flate of Millan, he made show that he would deale first with Nonaro: and by that demonstration, the City being not tenable, both for the want of fouldiers, and insufficiency of the rampiers, it yeelded by the consent of the Duke of Millan, who retained the Caflell, Vigeuena did the like suffering the same wants and impediments, and by their examples all that part of the countrey which is beyond the river of Thefin fell into the power of the Frenchmen. Profer Colonno lying ficke of a long malady, would neuer beleeue that the French king would stand firme in his resolution to inuade the Duchy of Millan for that yeare, both for the confederation that the Venetians had made against him, and for the detection of the conspiracy of the Duke of Burbon and therefore he had not with that diligence and speede that was necessary, affembled the fouldiers and men of war that lay dispersed in diverse places, & much lesse had made competent provisions for so great a refissance. But now that the enemies were you the way and approching, he fent to muster his companies in all hast, the oportunity of the time being against the speede he made, & his diligence as little availeable as the season was contrary: he thought abone all things to frop their passage at T befin, not remembring what hapned to him at the river of Adda against Monsieur Lawtrech, and of that he made himselfe so assured promise, that he tooke no care to reedify the bastillions & rampiers of the suburbs of Mullan, of which the greatest part lay already on the ground, fo finall was the care that was had of them : he affembled his army ypon the river betweene Biagrasso, Bufaloro, & Turbiquo, a place very apt for that purpose, & no lesse convenient for Pama and Millan. But the Frenchmen who were now come to Vigenera, finding the water of the river lower then Profe r beleeved, began four miles from the Imperial campe to passe ouer, part by the foord, and some in botes & barkes, building a bridge for their artilleries it a place where they found neither gard nor other impediment. By the necessity of this vnexpected accident, Profer was driven to change all the counsels of the warre, and therefore dispatched foorthwith Antho, de Leua, with an hundred men at armes and three thousand footemen, to the gard of Pavia, himselfe with the refidue of the armie drew to Mellan, where after he had called the Captaines to counsell, they were all of this minde, that if the French made their approches foorthwith, there was no possibility to defend Millan, for the ruine of the rampiers of the fuburbes, whereof there had bene made no reckening fince the last warres. The confidence that Profeer had to defend the passage of Thesia, was the cause that they were not repaired, neither could they be made defendable in the space of three dayes: and that they had to make a resolution as well for the one as the other of these two accidents, both to labour with universal diligence at the rampiers, and also to stand vpon a prepared readinesse to depart, if the Frenchmen came either the first, the second, or the third day, and to retire to Coma if they tooke the way of Pausa, or elle to go to Pausa if they marched by Coma. But the finisher destiny of the French. both blinding their eyes that they could not see, and binding their hands that they could not execute, would not fuffer them to vie so great and happie an occasion : for, either through their negligence, which is a chiefe enemy to enterprifes, or to expect the whole army, whereof a great part was behind, they wandered three dayes along the river of Thefin, and being all affembled into one strength betweene Atillan, Paula and Binajquo, they marched afterwards to Saint Christopher within a mile of Willan betweene the gate of Thefin and Rome gate : there, after they had made the way ellen to paffe their artilleries into the vauntgard, they made as though they would affault the towne: but without doing any other enterprise, they incamped in that place, and leaving their fiege from thence within lew dayes after, they went to lodge in the Abbey of (lerwaut, from whence they found meanes to deface the milles and cut the water from Millan; and so they thought rather to besiege then asiault Millan, for that there was within the walles eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horsemen, fourethousand Spanish sootmen, fixe thousand flue hundred Launceknights, and three thousand Italians (besides the popular forte, which were wellfurnished with weapon, and resolute in their auncient disposition against the French.)

The death of Pope Adrian.

In this citate of affaires, passed into the other life the sourcecenth of September, Pope Adrians his death was not without great discommodity and domage to the confederates, for that there did not onely faile in them, the authority Pontificall, but also the contribution of money, where unto he was bound by the capitulations of the League: he died, leaving behind have a very sinal opinion and cilimation, either for the little time he raigned, or for his want of experience in affaires: but his death was not a little plausible to the whole Court, for the defire they had to liuevnder a Pope naturall of Italy, or at least such one as had his training there. By the death of the Pope, many troubles began to kindle in the townes of the Churches iurisdiction, and in them as appeared before his sickenesse, many small spaces of a fire to come, so in the time of his life, they had easily burth out to a stame, if they had not bene quenched, partly by chaunce, and partly by the diligence of others: for, where before the Popes passing into Italie, the Colledge of Cardinals had given to Albert Pio the keeping of Reggia and Rubiero, the sayd Albert held still for himselfe the Castels, making small accompt of the instance that was made to him to render them, wherein he had no lesse ready his colours and excuses, then he was apt to

to take occasion by the slender experience of Pope Adrian. Besides, he had solicited that as soone as the beginning of the warre appeared, Ranse de Cere with certaine horsemen and sootemen should enter within Rubiero, to gouerne under the oportunity of that place, the way of Rome that passeth betweene Modena and Reggia: his intention was both to give impediments to the money and other dispatches that should be sent from Rome, Naples, and Florence to Millan, and to proceede to other enterprises as occasion served: but Franners Guiceiardin Gouer- Francis Guite nour of the fame Cities, discouering in good time this plot, and communicating with the Pope dardin, to what end tended the sweete words and requelts of Albert, together with the daungers that would fall on the estate Ecclesiastike on that side, suduced the Pope to make demonstration by threatnings, that he would vie force, and to constrained Albert, to restore to him the Castels: neither durst he oppose himselfe against the Popes will, for that the French were not as yet verie.

strong in Italy. Since the faction of Pio had recovered the towne of Carps, Profer in whom was no small defire to have it againe, procured to be retained in the name of the confederates, Guido Rangon with an hundred men at armes, an hundred light horsemen, and a thousand footemen. ordayning withall, that a thousand Spanish sootemen whom the Duke of Sesso had leaved at Rometo joyne with the residue at Millan, should remaine for the same cause at Modena. And whilest these things were in preparing, Ranse de Cere (to whom resorted dayly both horsemen and footemen, caryed no leffe by hope of pillage then for the authority of his name) began to commaund the wayes, and trouble the whole countrey. Befides, loofing no time to the liberty he had, he began one night to all ault vpon the fudden the towne of Rubiero, with two thousand footnen, but his vindiferete attempt being relifted both by the valour of the defendants, and the difficulties of the place, he was repulled, leaving as prisoner behind him, Tristram Corjo one of the

These forces assembled in these places for diverse causes, were the occasion of greater things: for after the death of the Pope, the Duke of Ferrara being made wearie with the hopes that were given him touching the restitution of Reggia and Modena, began to consider that in respect of the absolution which he had obtayned of Adrian, it would be selfe hard to get pardon for things taken away, then restitution of things lost: and therefore being of the unitterfall perswaion with all men, that it would be long afore they would choose a new Pope, both for the orlinary tract of time vsed in that election, and also for the discords of Cardinals, which were by nany degrees increased euer since the death of Pope Leo: he determined to deuise by what neanes he might recouer Modena and Reggia: and in that inclination he was pushed on (anongstother oportunities) with the com nodity and offer to knit with him Ranse de Cere, tho had alreadie leuied a thrength of two hundred hortemen and more then two thousand footnen: So that after the Dake had waged three thousand footemen, and sent to Ranse three housand duckats, he marched towards Modena, in which Citie was no other strength of men shwarre, then the regiment of the Count Guido Rangon who had beneretained by the League. And albeit the people bare no affection to the jurisdiction of the house of Ferrara, yet both by he weaknesse of the walles which were not flanked after the auncient manner, and the filling p of the ditches suffering of long time no reparation, it seemed there was neede of a greater arrison : and therefore the Gouernour and the Count dispensing with their private quarrels hat had bene betweene them, began to proceede with a joynt diligence to aduance the former esolution, to let into Modena the Spanish sootemen, who being arrived already in Tuscane, narched flowly, and made diverse and doubtfull aunswers when they were asked whether they vould remaine at Modena or passe further: neuerthelesse after many intreatings, they were at all content to enter. When this matter was related to the Duke of Ferrara, being then come o Finalo with two hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen, and threethousand ootemen, it stayed him almost for passing further: and yet because the matter was not abolute, and hoping at least, that knitting with Ranse de Cere, he might haply take Reggia: and othing dispayring that by the difficultie of payments', some disorder might fall amongst the ootemen of the enemies, he confirmed his first intention', and determined to passe on . Those topes were not lightly conceived by the Duke, for that the Colledge of Cardinals, to whom he gouernour had fignified with great diligence the perils that were toward, were so carelesse o make provision, yea not vouchfafing to give aunswere to the letters and meffages that were

fent, that there was no meane to pay the fouldiers, of the publike purse: and where haply the day was come wherein the Spanish fouldiers should receive the pay of the second moneth, yet if they had bene all payed, there was no hope to wage a greater number : and bestowing part of them within Modena and the refidue in Reggia, that separation would take away the suretie from both the Cities, befides that there were no louldiers within Reggia, and the disposition of the people farre other then they of Modena . Amid which difficulties, the gouernour and the Count Guido determining especially to preserve Modena, as a towne of greatest importance, both for the neighbourhood of Bolognia, and nearest affinitie with the estate of the Church, bearing also the aptest oportunity to eary to it succours and other provisions; they sent to Reggia fine hundred footemen under the leading of Vincent Maiato of Bolognia and one of the Count Guidos fouldiers, charging him, that if he were not able to defend the towne, to retire into the Citadell: which for that they hoped would hold out at least for certaine dayes, they sent money to John Baptista Smeraldo of Parma, who was Captaine there, to leavie three hundred footmen, and made request (though in vaine) to them of Reggia to contribute some proportion of mony for waging of the like number, feeing there was no leffe question of their furety, then of the fafety of the Church estate. Touching the danger of Modena, the Gouernour having no meane to defend it for want of money, called afore him many of the Citizens, declaring to them that things were drawne into that straite, that if the Spanish bands were not payed, and a rate of money rayled to furnish other expences, there would be compulsion to let the towne fall into the hands of the Duke of Ferrara. He fay dhe could yet defend it if there were provision of money, which could not otherwise be leaused but by taxing and rating themselves for the present, assuring them that either the new Pope, or the Colledge of Cardinals, would make prouifion for that that might happen afterwards: That there was not one amongst them who had not proued the yoke of the Duke of Ferrara, and the gouernement of the Church, and therefore it were too superfluous to debate by arguments, which of the two were most heavy or light, and no leffe vame to perswade by discourse of reason the thing that their owne experience and memory were againft. Laftly he defired them not to fland much vpo that trifling fumme of mony that was demanded by way of loane, for that both touching publike interest or profit private, it was a matter offmall confideration in regard to have a Lord to their more liking and contentment. These words fliding eafily into the minds of them that had the fame inclination, did the rather induce them to fall to taxing and rating themselues, and so leavied the money that was dema unded: so easie were they to beare a light burden amongst them all, to the end to auoyde a heavier yoke which lay ready to be lay dypon them. With this money were payed the fouldiers, and other proutions accomplished for the better bearing out of the warte; a comfort both for the qualitic and opottunity of it. which tooke from them all feate of the armes of the Duke of Ferrara: who prefuming no further of his forces then was conuenient, for looke the enterprise of Modena, and left it on the left hand, and joyning with him Ranse de Cere by the way, he drew neare to the towne of Reggia, which did not only receive him, but the day following the Captaine put into his hands the Citadell, suffering but a small summons of the Cannon. Touching which action the Captaine alleaged for his justification, that both Vincent Maiato being called by him, refused to cuter, and the money sent to him by the Gouernont, wastaken away neare Parma, whither he had fent to leavy bands offootemen. This instiffication was accepted, though not for the equity of it, yet for the necessity of the time not seruing to further examination. Assoone as the Duke had taken Reggia, Ranse de Cere being sent for by the Admitall of Fraunce, went to him: and the Duke being followed but with a flender strength of footmen, wandred certaine dayes along the river of Secchia, and from thence went to incampe before the towne of Rubiero, to the keeping whereof the Count Guido had vied in confidence the old man Couiano with two hundred footemen. And albeit the Duke had no great hope to take the town, both for the hard fituation of place and good fortification of large and deepe ditches, together with great rampiers all along the wals: yet beginning the day following to execute the wall loyning with the gate, the Captaine of the footenien, either by feeret intelligence, or for feare of the townsenien who began to rise, leapt ouer the wals and presented himselfe before the Duke, offering to his discretion both himselfe and the towne; an offer so much the more precious and welcome, by how much it came ynexpected, holding more offortune then of valour. But this being a line to leade the

The taking of Reggia by the Duke of Ferrara. Duke into the towne, and taking further courage vpon that felicity, he planted his artilleries before the Castle, which so terrified the Captaine named Tiens Tailleser of Parma, that not withstanding the Castle was strong and fully surnished of men, munition, and all other prouisions necessarie, yet being made scarefull by the fortune of the towne, he yeelded it vp before night, not abiding one bullet of the artilleries: wherein when the Duke was possessed as established, he abode there with his armie, hoping that for the long vacation of the Sea Apostolike, the regiment of footmen within Modena would either dissolue or disorder: he sed himselse also at the same time with hope of other things, which in their place shall be declared.

About this time Mon seur Bonniuet, who lay incamped a S. Christopher between the gates of The taking of Thesin and Rome, a place environed with waters and disches, began to despaire to take Willam Lotaky the by force: and therefore after the taking of Monce he sent Captaine Bayard and Federike Bessolo French.

with three hundred Launces and eight thousand footemento take Loda, whither was come the Marquis of Mantua with fine hundred horse and fine hundred footmen, which was the regiment with the which the Church and the Ftorentines had entertained him into their pay: but having feare of his person, he retired to Pontuike, by which occasion the Citie being abandoned, received the Frenchmen. After the taking of Loda, Federske builded a bridge vpon the river of Adda, and passed with his companies upon the lands of Cremona to succour the Castle of Cremona, which the defendants the fame day that the Admirall approched Atillan, had compounded to render, if they were not rescued by the xxvj. of September: to which composition they were compelled both by the extremitie of hunger, and not knowing that the French army was paffed into Italy, Federike drew neare to the Cattle without any relistance or difficultie, and after he had tefreshed it with victuals & other reliefes, he determined to assault the towne vpon this confidence, that Profeer Colonno had left a verie flender garrison; notwithstanding to helpe that seare, the Marquis of Mantua had sent thither an hundred men at armes, an hundred light horsemen, and foure hundred footmen but he finding the difficulties too great to enter the Citie on that fide towards the castle, for the fortifications which the defendants had made, the same deciding the citie from the castle, he turned on the right hand, & determined to batter the wall in places where he found it most weake: & after he had playd a while with the artilleries, he prepared his fouldiers to the affault, but without effect, which was the cause that he began agains the battery, to beat wider the breach, though with no better successe then the first, the same driving him to retire to S. Martins, there to tarie for Runse de Cere, who was to come fro Reggis with two hundred horsmen & two thousand footme: & when he was come, they encaped elifoones afore Cremona, doing great execution vpon the walles for many houres to great effect, neuerthelesse what by the impedimets of the great raines that fell, and differning by the prefent difficulties how hardly they should preuaile, they forbare to do any further execution: for that the same day, Mercurio with the light horsmen of the Venetians (whose bands were mustered at Pontuike) passed ouer the river of Oglio, and made incutions evento their tents. After the vaine triall of this exploit, Federike and Ranfe btake up their fiege from before Cremona, as well for lacke of victuals, as for the breaking away of the footmen which Ranse brought thither, picking this quarrell, that they had received no other money then that which the Duke of Ferrara had given. From Cremona they marched to incampe afore Sonzin, where they found no better successe in their affaires: afterwards they fell to sacking thetowne of Carauage, where they abode certaine dayes, of which lingting was bred this excule or impediment to the Senate of Vence, for not fending to Millan those proportions of men which they were bound vnto: for that, taking their excuse in temporizing so long upon the common opinion that the Imperiall Captaines had, that in respect of their separation with the French king, the French armie would not march that yeare, they affured to fend them affoone as the companies that lay upon the territories of Cremona should be repassed the river of Adda.

In this condition of affaires, both the parties distrusting not to be able to put a speedy end to the warre, either party dwelt in his securitie, and would offer nothing to hazard. The Admirall who neuer looked to take Millum by force, expected either that the enemies would dissolute for want of mony, or at least that necessity of victuals would copell them to abandon Millan: where notwithstading there was come in great plenty, yet the multitude of mouthes to eate it was more innumerable; besides that, he had cut from them their water, and the vie of their milles: for this cause the Admirall called home those bands that lay along the river of Adda, and bestowed them betweene Monce and Millan, to the end that the people of Alillan from whom was flopped the traffike of victuals by the wayes of Loda and Pausa, should also remaine deprived of all fuch reliefe as was wont to passe from the hill of Brianso: but these experiences were not sufficient to accomplish the effect that the Admirall defired. On the other part, albeit Profeer Colonno (as touching his body) was vehemently oppressed with a great sicknesse, and no lesse trauelled with emulation in mind, as not brooking the comming of the Viceroy of Naples, for that he had defire to be the principall man: yet, by his counfell was done what could be done, to flop the passage of victuals that came to the enemies from the parts beyond the river of Thesin, the rather for that the fortification of the place where they were incamped, gaue no hope to drive them away by force: therefore Prospers care was, that the Marquis of Manua should enter into Paula, whose comming putting the French into feare leafthe would win their bridge, they builded another at Torquen within five and twentic miles of Pauia. Befides, he folicited Vitelli to paffe the river. who with the companies of men of warre which the Florentines had given him (and by them was fent to Genes in the beginning of the warre) together with three thousand footemen payd by the Genowayes, had commaunded of the countrey beyond Paw, except Alexandria: that was to give impediment to the victuals which came to the Frenchmen from the countrey of Lonelling: but the Duke of Genes, would not consent to it for the feare he had of the Archbishop of Fregola, who lay in Alexadria neare to Genes. And because the Venerians, whose bands were passed Oglia, resufed follong as that part of the Frenchmen which was gone fro Caravage remained neare Monce, to passe Adda for the perill of Bergama: Prosper wonne them to send source hundred horsmen, and five hundred footmen to Treffa, to stop the course of victuals wherewith they lived.

Whilest both parts were in the action of these matters, there was performed no exploit of war other then light skirmishes, incursions and pillages, wherein alwayes the Frenchmen had the worfe, and to returned eftloones with great loffe and domage. It happed one day amongst others, that as Iohn de Medicis issued out with two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsmen, and a thousand footemen, he met with sourcescore French Launces, being most part of the companies of Barnaby Visconte, and offering to chase them, he sodainly fell to retire, and by that stratageme cunningly drew them vpo an ambush of fine hudred harquebuziers which he had laid, and there made flaughter of the most of them, and tookethe residue prisoners. In like sort in another encounter, Socchor Burguignon brake a troupe of threescore men at armes of the companie of the master of the horse. Besides, the bands of Spanish sootmen had many conslicts with the French sootemen that warded at those trenches which were made to go in couert even to the rampiers, where they flue manie of them that garded the trenches. And at the same time Paule Lula (quo, who remained at Pisqueton with an hundred and fiftie light horsemen, ouer-ran the countrey all about, and diffressed not a litle those that were in Cremona. Neither did the ambuthes fucceed more happily to the Admirall, then his other exploits; for having conspired fecretly with one Alorgant of Parma, a commounder under lohn de Aledicis, that when it should sall to his turne to ward at a Bastillion of a gate which was cast out of the rampiers, he should receive in his fouldiers: when the night appointed came, Morgant thinking it necessarie to communicate the matter with some other of his companions for the better execution, brake it with one especiall fouldier of his band, who making as though he confented to the treason, gaue him counsell to go and commaund the Sentinels in the name of Profeer not to flirre, what brute or noyfe foeuer they heard, as not to let him whom he would fend to call the fouldiers of the campe to come to the Baltillion, for that the Admirall had that night drawne neare to that fide five thousand footmen to be readie at the figne given, and had fet in order the whole armie: But fuch is the infirmity of treason, that it hath no further assurance then the party hath confidence. For whilest Morgant went to execute the deuise, the other who could not be faithfull in conspiracie, reuealeth the whole practife to Iohn de Medicis, who making speed to the Bastillion, taketh the offenders, and after judiciall examination had, he maketh them to passe the pikes according to the

It feemed now that the affaires of the French began to decline on all fides, both for the fertilitie of the country about Milan, which ministred some reliefe to the wants of the towne: & for the deuise of the townes-men inventing hand-milles to supply the vse of grinding, by which engine was taken away the Admirals hope that the inhabitants would fall into want of meale. It was

beleeued also that the French had lost in those encounters more then sisteene hundred horse aswel of service as of common fort, which brought them into that assonishment, that they forbare to issue out of their tents, but in times of need to guard the victuallers and forragers, and that alwaies in strong troupes. The infamic whereof the Admirall connecting to his special honour, he wold often fay, that touching the managing of the warre, he would rather obserue the moderation and téperance of the Italians, then be gouerned by the furious importunities of the French Captaines: and yet whenfocuer any encounter was given either by their footmen or horsemen, they showed more readinesse to flie then to fight: so that the Captaines of the Emperour being now assured of the feare of hunger, and the forces of the enemie, yea hoping to gine impediments to the victuals of the enemie, there was nothing remaining to trouble them but want of money, without the which if it were a hard matter to containe the fouldiers within Millan, it could not almost but be impossible to leade them out of the townehowsoeuer the affaires and occurances of the warre required: So hard is it to leade fouldiers to feruice wherein is no affurance of money, and more, daunger to minister discipline where no pay is performed. But to remedy these difficulties, ma-',, nie meanes were fought out, and amongst others, Prosper Colonno, by the privity of the Viceroy of Naples and Duke of Seffo, had immediatly upon the Popes death begun to treate with the Duke of Ferrara; who after he had refused many offers made to him by the Admirall fince the action of Regg:a, to go afore Cremona, couchanted at last with Proper, that if he reconquered Otodena by his meanes, he would pay him immediatly thirty thousand duckets, and twentie thousand more within two moneths. That conquest seemed a matter of case execution: since Prosper commaunding to depart from Modena Guido Rangon souldier of the league, and also the regiment of Spanish footmen, what other remedie remained to that Citie so abandoned, then to compound with the Duke, and lay themselves downe to his order? The benefite of the armie was one confideration that drew Prosper to this practife, but the thing that more violently ouer-ruled him to it, was his private affection, the ancient amirie he had with the Duke of Ferrara, a desire common also to all the other Barons of Rome, to embase the greatnesse of the Popes, and a hope that Modena and Reggia remaining no more to the Church, Parma and Platfance would with more facility divolue to the Duke of Mullan. This matter albeit was laboured with great lecrecie, yet being disclosed by the Count Guido to Guiceiurdin, he saw there was no other meane to stop it, but to perswade the Spanish Captaines who were well vsed and largely paid, and had good will to continue in that Citie, that wherethey were not subject to the authority of Profeer Colomo, they should of themselves refuse to go from Modena, but by the commaundement of the Duke of Seffo, by whose appointment they came thither: and albeit Guicciardin was not ignorat that the whole deuile was wrought by the confent of the faid Duke of Seffe, yet he cosidered that the Duke being the Emperors Embassador at Rome, & the Colledge making instance to him of the contrarie, would not onely not give out such a commission, but also would refuse at the request of the Cardinals to give open order to the contrarie. This deuise drew a successe according to the plot that was layd : for when Profper fent to commaund Count Guido & the Spaniards to go to Millan for the necessity of the warres, the Count excused him with many reafons, and alleaged that he was subject to the Church and to them of Modena: as also the Spanish Captaines being perfwaded by him and the Gouernour, made answer, that in that case they were to obey none but the Duke of Seff: which matters being fignified by the Gouernor to the Colledge of Cardinals, they fummoned forthwith into the Conclaue the Duke of Seffo, who to avoid suspition as well in himselfe as in the Emperour, could not resuse their demaund to write to the Captaines that they should not slir. And moreouer, as it often hapneth that in worldly dealings things oftentimes fucceed farre otherwise then men thinke, so in this was differred this accident, that certaine letters of Prosper intercepted by the Gouernour, were read in the Colledge, by the which as was disclosed how all things went: so the Cerdinals that were for the French king, by the impediment of whom the prouisions of money were lingred, which by the Cardinall Medies working was begun to be sent to Modena, knowing how dangerous it would be for the king that that matter should come to effect, began with open hand to help forward the sending of the mony to Modena: wherin the Cardinall Colonno joyned with the, to declare to the refidue, that he preferred the vtility of the Sea Apollolike afore all other things: but not with stading this shew of diligence was sufficient to defer the execution of the couenants made with the Duke of Ferrara, vet the foundation of those thoughts being remoued, they retained this in deuise, that the Vicero of Naples, who (though with flow removings) was come to Millan with foure hundred launces and two thousand footmen, should leade away with him the regiment of Spanish footemen as he passed by Modena.

In this time at Millan did increase the plentie and abundance of victuals, for that the Admirall fearing least the fouldiers within Pania would occupie the bridge which he had made vpon Thefin, by the which were conveyed necessarie provisions to the army, he drew from Monce the armie that was there being the leffer part : and of them he fent three thousand to the guard of the bridge, called some of them to himselfe, and distributed the residue, part within Marignan, and part within Biagraffo, places verie neare neighbours to the bridge: by which meane the Imperials that recouered Monce had a farre greater commodity of victuals. The French campe firetched from the Abbey of Clerenant untill the way of Pauia, and was towards that way within gun-shot of Millan: and at that time there was in the French armie eight hundred light horfmen, fixe thoufand Swiffers, two thousand Italian footmen and ten thousand as wel French as Gascons: they had at the bridge of Thefin a thousand Launceknights, & a thousand Italians: the like nubers at Biagrasso, where was Ranse de Cere, two hundred Launces within Nouaro, & two thousand footme as well in Alexandria as in Loda: and within Mullan were eight hundred Launces, eight hundred light horfmen, fine thousand Spanish footmen, fixe thousand Laurceknights, and source thousand Italians, befides the multitude of the people, who were very violent against the French both in heart & action: the Marquis of Mantua was within Paula with flue hundred Launces, fixe hundred light horsmen, two thousand sootme Spaniards, & three thousand Italians: lastly, there were in new caltlein Tortonese, three thousand footmen with Vitelli, who, as certaine French bands were passed into Alexandria, retired not with sading a litle after to Serranella, fearing least the way of Genes would be shut up from him: the Venetians also had 600 men at armes, 500 light horsemen, & fine thousand sootme, of who they sent a thousand to Milla at the request of Prosper, who defired to ferue his turne with the fame and reputation of their fuccours; and foone after they dispatched another part of their forces to Cremona, by reason of a suspition of some intelligence

The Frencl.me

At last the Admirall, what by the difficultie of victuals which grew extreame, the compulsion breake of from of the time, which was cold, the vehemencie of snowes, which were violent, and the important before Millan. instance of the Swiffers, whose impatiencie could not suffer so manie incommodities, determined to breake vp and go further from Millan: notwithstanding before he published his resolution, he procured Galeas Viscount to obtaine leave to go see, and to do reverence to Madame Clara, of great name for her fingular beautie, but of greater fame for the loue that Profes Colonno bare to her: and being within Alillan, he preferred the parley of truce, whereupon did affemble the day following upon the rampiers Captaine Alarcon, Paule Vettorie the Florentine Commissioner, and lerome Moron : and for the Admirall, Galeas Viscount and the Generall of Normandie: they communed of a furceassing of armes virill the end of May, and both parties to be bound to distribute their armies in the townes, and in the end they had confented to reduce all their forces beyond Thefin, had it not bene for the impediments of the Emperours Captaines, who objecting matter of reproofe, that with the truce they went about to take from the the hope they had of the victorie, made answer that they had no power to deliberate any thing without the will of the Viceroy: so that the Admirall within two dayes after caused his attilleries to march before day towards Thesin, himself sollowing with the whole armie at the full appearing of the day: he marched info good order, as though he would not (vpon occasion) refuse the battell: & on the other fide, the inhabitants of the towne feeing his discamping, together with the fouldiers made fute with vniuerfall voyce that they might be led to the field to charge them:in this demand were also concurrant the Captaines and personages of greatest authoritie, who redoubling the instanceto Prosper Colonno, laid before him the facilitie of the victorie, both by the aduantage of their disorder, which cast vpon them an vnappeaseable seare, the comparison of their forces nothing inferior to theirs, and their courage and resolution farre aboue them, and also the oportunity of their retract, wherein lurked some secret terrour to the most part of the armie, the same being confirmed at that instant by the relation of certaine Italians that straggled from the armie: they put him in remebrance of the infinite glorie and perpetuall memory of his name, if he would with his last reputation confirme the renowine and triumph of so many victories gotten by him lastly,

they perfwaded him that a noble leader of warre caried as great fame by his readineffe to imbrace good occasions, as by his resolution to execute when necessitie called him. But Prosper in whom was fixed a fetled mind to for beare as much as he could to commit the credite of his valour to the arbitration of Fortune, told them how far it was from the office of a difference Captaine to be catied with popular voyces, and how vnworthic the name of a General, to leade men to the fight, where was no other hope then in the force of their armes: That though many other worldly matters might be put to adventure and hazard, yet the life and honour of men required counfel, forecall, and deepeft providence: That they had wonne glotie enough in compelling the enemie to go his way without bloud: That the defire of men ought not to be infinite, and leffe expectatio in the furety of fortune, whose mutability worketh most in matters of warre: That that armie is ill guided, where in the enent and iffue of the field the losses are greater then the benefites: That he knew by experience, that the infamy that fell vpon the Generall by his rashnesse, did make a greater wound in his name and credite, then the gloric of the victoric made him rich or renowmed, for that as no man would have interest in the infamic but the leader, so almost everie particular would communicate in the commendation: That fuch were the humors of men, that they would lay the losse of a field upon the Generall only: That as he had hitherunto with temperance guided all his enterprifes to an honorable end, so now that he was voon the latest yeare of his age, he would not enter into new course and new counsels, and deliuer up to fortune so many valunt bodies as repoled their liues on him, nor exchange those rules which from the beginning had led him to that estate of gloric, reputation, and greatnesse, wherein he now standeth. The Frenchmen deuided themselnes into two parts, the Admirall with the greatest entred Biagrasso within sourcteene miles of the towne of Millan, and fent the residue to Rosa which is within seuen miles.

Almost as soone as the Admirall was gone from before Atellan, the Cardinals created a new Cardinal Me-Pope, having alreadic confumed in the Conclave more then fiftic dayes : at the beginning there Pope, taketh was in the Coclaue but a presence of xxxvj. Cardinals, and being afterwards increased with three the name of more, they fpent much time in fundile contentions; for they flood deuided amongst themselves clement she not only for the different wils of the Emperour and French king, but also for the greatnesse of the founth. Cardinall de Medicu: who being pushed on by all such as followed the kings authoritie, and fome others that depended of the Emperour, had at his deuotion the full voyces of fixteene Cardinals; they were determined either to chuse him, or at least to name no other without his conlent; befides, he was fecretly affured of fine other Cardinals and their voices, together with the fauour of the Emperours Embassadour, with all the residue that followed his authoritie: of all which furtherances and foundations albeit he was affured almost at the death of Pope Leo, yet he entred now into the Conclaue with a more constant resolution not to abandon his hopes, neither for the tract or length of time, nor for any accident what foeuer, making this his chiefest piller & ground, that in the election of the Pope, it was necessarie that of that presence of Cardinals that was there affifiant, a third part of voyces should be concurrent. But so oblinate were the controuerfics of the Cardinals, that they could not diffolue their diulifons, neither for the common daunger of Italy, nor for the particular estate of the Church, but according as the affaires of the warre proceeded, both the parts fought to prolong and deferre the election, for the supportation they hoped in the victorie of their fauorers: and it had bene yet longer deferred, both if there had bene amongst the old Cardinals of the Colledge (adversaries to the Cardinal Medicis) one agreement to chuse another, and also, shaking off their couetousnesse particular, they had stood upon this point, not to fuffer the Cardinall Medicis to rife to the foueraigne feat: but it is a hard matter for me by cocord to appire to the end they seeke for, whe their cocord is entagled with discord or ambitio:the Cardinal Colono, an anciet enemy of the Cardinal Medicia, & of a nature proud & haughtie, fell into forme indignation against the other Cardinals that were loyned with him, because they refused to elect for Pope Cardinall Iaccobaccio, a Romane, a man of the same faction, and wholy at his denotion: in which despite of mind, he made a willing offer to the Cardinall Medicisto iovne with him in the electio, & for recopece he received of him a very fecret promise of the office of Vicechancellor which he held, and of his pallace being very fumptuous, builded by Cardinall S. George, and given to him by Pope Leo; a matter which aptly agreeing with the couctousnesse of Cardinall Colonno, to pushed him on, that he drew to him Cardinall Cornare and two others, betweene whom was made a refolute consent to chuse Cardinall Medicis for Pope: and as it often hapneth that in election example doth much, so affoone as their inclination was knownermany of thers, either for want of stomacke, or by too much ambition began to presse on with the formost, to speake in his fauour: insonuch as the same night, he was honoured as Pope by the vinuerfal agreement of the all, and the next morning being the ninetcenth of Nouember, the election wa made perfect by folemne lot according to the cuffome: this dignitic hapned to him the fame day two yeares that he entred victorious into Willan. It was thought that amongst other things, hi great revenues of benefices and Ecclefiastike offices did much to make him Pope : for that the Cardinals, when they entred the Conclaue, fet downe this constitution, that the reuenues of him that should be elected Pope, should be shared by equall distribution amongst the others; a foule cuffome of couerousnesse in a Cleargie, whose hands should be no lesse innocent to take, there their hearts naked of fraud and guile, and in whose preferment should be most respected their finceritie of life and doctrine. He would have continued still his name of luho, but being caried with this supersticious observation of some of the Cardinals, that such as after their election refusing to change their name, died within the yeare, he tooke vpon him the name of Clement the feuenth, either for the nearenefle of that idolatrous festivall, or else by allusion, that immediatly after his election he had pardoned and received into grace the Cardinall Volterro, and reconciled all his faction: and albeit Pope Adrian in his latter dayes had declared this Cardinall to be ynable to affift or enter the Conclave, yet he had his place there by the permission of the Colledge, and was even to the last houre, altogether against the election of Iulio. Great was the opinion of this new Pope throughout all the world, and as it hath not bene feene of long time that the Conclauc hath follong temporized and flood vpon the naming of one, fo yet they thought the tracand expectation well recompensed in that they had raifed to that supreame scate, aperson of se great authoritie and valour, both for that he had confounded and coniogned by his arbitrement the power of the estate of Florence with the iurisdiction of the Church & had in the time of Pope Lee governed many yeares the whole Pontificacie, and was judged a man grave and constant in his deliberations, and also for that manie things being by finister imputation imposed upon him that proceeded from Leo, manie affirmed that Leo was full of ambition, full of pride, full of trouble, and full of defire of innouation and new things: to which good parts that were found in him adjoyning his modestie and abstincuce from pleasures, and full of care and study to attend affaires there were few who did not expect of him verie great and extraordinarie matters: his election euen in the beginning put the estate of the Church in great surety; for the Duke of Ferrara, not a litleastonished that such a Pope was mounted into the holy seat, and hoping no longer to go Modena for the comming of the Viceroy of Naples, and leffe expectation in the French, who afore by the folicitation of Theodor Trinulce, newly come to his campe, made him great offers, fo that he would joyne with them, returned to Ferrara after he had left fufficient garrifon within Reggia and Rubiero. In like fort all controuerfies were reappealed in Romagnia, where John de Saffatelle who had bene expulsed by the power of the Gebelins during the raigne of Adrian, was estsoones reentred with a traine of Guelfes under colour to oppresse the contrarie faction, but in truth at the incenfing of the French.

But lithence the French armie was distributed to Biagrasso and Rosa, the Admiral, with whom were remaining but four ethousand Swissers, distributed to Biagrasso and Rosa, the Admiral, with whom were remaining but four ethousand Swissers, distributed to surprofitable for service. Ill the footmen of Danphome and Languedocke: he sent also his great artilleries beyond The sim, with intentic to tarie there for the supplies which the king prepared for his succours, not fearing that the eneme would make any inuasion vpon him in a place so strong, and containing such plentie of victuals: and yet because he would not entertaine the time idlely, he sent Ranse de Cere with seuer thousand Italian sootmen to take Arona, a towne of great strength, and hath his situation in the confines of the Lake Maior. This towne was possessed by Anchises Viscount, and to the rescut of it Prosper Colonno sent from Millana regiment of twelve hundred sootmen: but because the Castle of Arona doth so much command the towne, that who holdeth not the Castle doth virressor and the towne, Ranse laid his plot to winne the Castle, but his fortune being inferiour to the difficulties he found, after he had given many assaults wherein he lost many men consuming almost a moneth in that enterprise, at last he leavised his slege and went away, constraining the vniversall opinion that had bene conceived of him for manie yeares, that his actions held no compatison with the reputation he had got in the desence of Grema.

About

About this time Profer Colonno having lyen ficke eight monethes, began to draw to his The death of latest houre, not without suspition of poyson, or else some amorous potion; he was carefull by Profee Cohis latest end, to confirme the credit he had gotten in the race of to many yeares past, and there-lonno, and his fore where afore he could not well brooke the comming of the Viceroy, he now folicited it with qualities. great affection, as knowing that he was no more able to manage the affaires of the warre: So agreeable was the modelfic and temperance of his last dayes, with the valour and courage of his younger time : no leffe honorable was the behaulour of the Viceror, who affoone as he came neare to Alillan, Itayed without and would not enter for certaine dayes, to shew what reuerence he bare to the vertue and reputation of fuch a Captaine : and yet when he understood he was reduced to the last action of life and had lost all sense and knowledge, he entred the towns for a defire he had to fee him, not with standing some hold that he would not enter till he was dead, which was the last day saving one of that yeare: he was a Captaine of great name and merite during the whole time of his life, and in his latelt yeares had wonne fingular reputation and authoritie: he was a father of fouldiers, a director of their counfels, a framer of their difpositions, an example of vertue, and a guideto true glory and fame: he was not apt to embrace lightly all occasions that the disorders of the enemies might offer, for, this propertie was joyned to his wit, rather to doubt too much, then beleeue too hallily: and lo realous was he ouer the fafetie and furetie of his peo ple, that he would not eafily give any advantage to the enemie to oppresse him: He would alwayes fay, that in a Generall, the glorie was greater to feare a mischiefe and foresee it, then to runne with occasions which cannot be without their hazardes: he was by nature easie and flow in his actions, & feeking alwayes to administer warres more with counsels then with the sword, heleft to others this propertie of example, to defend estates by temporising, and not without great necessitie to commit the euent of battels to fortune: for, in our time, the managing and gouernement of warres hath farre differed, since that afore Charles the eight past into Italie, the brunt of the warre being more borne out with horsenien armed at all parts, then with sootemen, and no leffe inconvenient & troublefome the engines wherewith they were wort to take townes, notwithstanding the armies came oftentimes to the shocke of battell, yet the slaughter was litle, and very rare the bloud that was spilt: and townes also that were befreged defended themselues with such facilitie, not for that they had more knowledge in defence, but through ignorance to take them: that there was not so litle or weake a towne, which was not able for many dayes to refift great armies of enemies: at that time Princes did not intrude vpon the estates of others without very great difficulties. But when king Charles made his first descending into Italie, the regions of that nation were so replenished with terrour and assonishment, what through the searc of new nations, and the valour of the footemen whose fight was in another maner, but most of all through the fury of the artilleries, by whose vnacquainted roaring noyse the ignorant people searedno leffe the if the frame of the world had falle, that there was no hope for any prince to be able to defend himfelf, that were not strog inough to keepe the field. For, men that had no knowledge to defend townes yeelded at the first approch of the enemies, and if haply any towne stood to her defence, it was taken within few dayes, fuch was the furie of the artilleties, and fuch the ignorance of men that had yet no custome nor familiaritie with them. By that meane the realme of Naples and the Duchie of Millan were no sooner inuaded then they were conquered: in that fort the Venetians being vanquished in one battell onely, left abandoned immediatly all their iurisdictio in the firme land; and in that fort the Frechmen having scarcely seene the enemies, left the Duchie of Aulian. But fince the wit of man comprehending better the furie of batteries, began to oppose engine and industry for their defence, and fortified townes with mounts, trenches, flankes, rampiers, & bastillions, which they made apt to bestow artilleries vpo : and being planted in a place which men feeke to defend, do farre more hurt, then that that is braked without: fo that at this day it is very hard to take a towne where is any refiftance made: and haply those inuentions began in Italie in the dayes of our fathers, when the towne of Ottranto was reconquered vponthe Turkes, wherein when Alfonso Duke of Calabria entred afterwardes, he found that the Turkes had made many rampiers & fortifications, fuch as were voknowen to the Italias, but yet those sortes of fortifications remained rather as images in the minds of me, the that they were followed. Profer either was the onely major the first man of all other that with greatest reputatio, hath twife by those meanes defended the Duchy of Milla: and aswel in offending as in defending, and cutting off the enemies from victuals, as also in prolonging the warre with such cunning, that pouertie, disorders, and other extremities consumed them, he hath borne out the warre and vanquished without once aduenturing the battell, without breaking of a Launce, yea almost without drawing a fword : fo that he standing in example to others that have come after, many warres (continued for many monethes,) have bene overcome more with industrie, with stratageme, and with temporifing, then with the force or fortune of armes.

Thefe things were done in Italie in the yeare 1523. And the yeare following were made beyond the Mounts preparations of right great expectation, and yet brought forth no effectes worthy of so mightie Princes: for where the Emperour and the King of England had contracted and promised the Duke of Burbon to enter with a strong armie, the one into Picardie, and the other into Guyen: the mouing of the King of Englad was to finall purpole, & the enterprise of the Duke of Burbon to inuade Burgondie was turned into a mountaine of smoke: for that wanting money to pay his Launceknights, befides the diminution of their numbers by the practife of certaine Captaines that stole away to the French King, he dispaired to do any thing in France, & in that mind went to Atillan: there the Emperour having no mind that he should passe into Spaine, pergody, commeth haps because he would not have the mariage of his fifter go forward which the Duke of Burbon defired, sent to him Monsieur de Beaur ain to perswade him to stay there, and gaue him the authoritie and title of his Licutenant Generall in Italie, to induce him with better will to abide there. Neither did things happen more happily to the Emperour on the coast of Spaine, for that albeit in a burning defire to the warres he was come to Pampeluna to passe in person into France, & had already fent his armie beyond the Mounts Pireney, where he had taken Sanueterra, which is not farrefrom S. John de pied de Porc, yet drawing with him many other imperfections, he found at last that his readinesse was farre greater then his power, for that as for the want of money, he was not able to entertaine so great forces as were necessarie for so great an enterprise, so for that want also he was not able to affemble his armie vitill the latter end of the yeare, when the nature of the feafon doubled vpon him his difficulties, and tooke from him the liberty of the wayes. These impediments copelled him to dissolve his armie, erected almost against the counsell of all his Captaines. which made the Duke of Albe a Prince of great authoritie say in the heate of the warre, that the Emperour who in many things refembled king Ferdinand his grandfather by the mother fide, did in this deliberation beare most similitude and likenesse with his grandfather by the father side.

The Duke of Burbon net ahle so do any thing in Burto Millan,

Now came on the yeare a thousand fine hundred twentie and foure, when the difficulties of the Frenchmen stirring up the Emperours Captaines to looke to put end to the warre, they called to Millan the Duke of Urbin and Peter Pefero treasurer of Venice, to consult of the maner of proceeding in the war: in which counfell they were all of opinion, that affoone as the fixe thoufand Launceknights which the Viceroy had fent to leavie, were arrived at Millan, the Emperors army joyning with it the Venetian forces, should affront the enemies, to the end to chase the out of the Duchie of Millan, either by force or by famine: and albeit they thought themselves firong inough to performe it, yet there was one thing that hindred the execution of the counfell, which was want of money, of which for that there were great summes due to the men of war for their payes past, they thought they should not be able to get them to issue out of Millan or any other towne vnlesse their payes were first satisfied. And for that the armie was to continue in the field, it was no lesse necessarie to set downe order hereaster for the payes of the souldiers to be performed in their due time, and fafelie to be conveyed to the campe to answere the dayes of payment: But the inhabitants of Millan defirous to be discharged of the burden of the war, offred to remoue these difficulties, in lending to the Duke sources and ten thousand duckats; an action whereunto they were the more eafily induced by example of the last good dealing, whe the money which they had lent at fuch time as Monsieur de Lawtrech lay afore Millan, was readily repayed vpon the Dukes revenues. In like fort the Pope, who by the remembrance of things palt held much suspected the victorie of the French, put to his hand, not with standing with a wonderfull cunning he made demonstration of the contrarie to such as the king had fent to him:he caused to be deliuered with great secrecie to the Emperours Embassadour twentie thousand duckats, & solicited also the Florentines (on whom the Viceroy required a new contributio by vertue of the league made in the time of Pope Adria) to pay as their last rest, thirty thoufand duckats: and yet the Pope had no meaning hereafter to shew more propertie of fauour to the one the to the other: but where immediatly vpo his election the one of the had fent to him Monsieur Beaurain, and the other Mosseur Saint Maixan, to draw him particularly to them, yet hisintention was, afloone as the prefent daungers should cease, to be are betweene them that moderation and temperance which orderly appertaineth to the office of Popes when Christian Princes be in discord, and laying aside all partialitie and suspected inclination, to be a worker for peace & vnitie betweene them; a resolutio which was so much the more agreeable to the Frech King, who feared least the Pope was of the same disposition towardes him that he was when he was Cardinall, by how much it was corrarie & difagreeable to the Emperor, who held it no treafonable that he should separate himselfe from him, both for the last alliance that was past, and also for that by his aide he mounted to the Popedom. In which regard it brought no litle griefe to him to be certified fro the Pope, that notwith tading he willed him as much good as he did before, yet for that he was now no more a person private, but rather a father indifferet to all, he was bound by the respect and office of his place, to do nothing which were not for the comon profite of all. But whilest the Viceroy prepared himselfe to go finde the enemies , he sent loba de Medicis before Marignan, which towne yeelded to him together with the Castell: and where the Marquis of Perguero disdaining to follow the warre under Profeer Colone, would not come to the campe but when he was aducrtifed that he drew towardes his latest houre, and hearing now that Captaine Bayard was within Rebecca with three hundred horse and many bandes of sootemen, he joyned himselfe with John de Aledicis, and marching with no lesse diligence then resolution of minde; he found them of Rebecca so oversleeping in their security, & so little doubting of his coming, that he tooke the most part of the footemen, and gave the chase to the residue, returning immediatly to Millan, as not to give leasure to the enemies within Biagrassa to pursue them . In this enterprise he was much efteemed for his industrie and for his valour, but much more for his celerity and diligence, for that Rebecca which is not past two miles fro Biagrassa; s fro Millan fro whece they went, more then scuenteene miles . But as the affaires of the warre were reduced to this degree; that to the French were left no other hopes then that wants of money would fall ypon their enemies, and the Imperials were fed onely with this expectation, that the French would fuffer great scarcitie of victuals, and yet neither of them were without their hopes of succours, the one of Launceknights, and the other of Swiffers: fo the Admiral loofing no oportunitie wherein occation was offered, fet fire vpon Rofa, and retired to Biagraffu those bandes that were within it, disposing his forces to distresse the enemies, & make incursions and burnings over all the countrey, But by this time were the Launceknights arrived at the Emperours campe, which contalned in the whole whole fixe hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horsemen, seuen thoufandfootemen Spanish, twelve thousand Launceknights, and fifteene hundred Italians, under the leading of the Duke of Aullan, the Duke of Burbon, the Viceroy of Naples, and the Marquis of Pelquiero. They left within Allan for the gard of the place, foure thousand footnen, and marched with the refidue to incampe at Binafqua, where not many dayes after the Duke of Vrbin joyned with them, with fixe hundred men at armes, fixe hundred light horfemen, and feuen thoufand footemen of the Venetians. At what time the Castell of Gremona being no more able to beare out the rage of hunger, and Federike Boffolo that was within Loda, having in vaine adventured to fuccour it, yeelded up to the Imperials. Afterwards the armie marched to Cafera, a towne within five miles of Biagraffa; there the Admirall (having distributed within Loda, Novaro, & Alexadria, two hundred Launces and fine thoufand footemen) kept himfelfe incamped with eight hundred Launces, & eight thousand Swiffers, to whom were joyned within few dayes after, a regiment of three thousand others, together with foure thousand Italians and two thousand Launceknights: and not with standing all this multitude of companies, he felt no necessitie of victuals, having a full prouision for two monethes as well in the armie as in the places thereabouts. It was not possible to affaile them in a place fo strong without their manifest daunger: by reason whereof the Imperials who many times had assayed to passe the river of Thesin, to stop victuals from the French on that fide, and to get into those townes which they held beyond Thesin, and also to give impediment to the succours that were to come out of France, determined at last to passe, judging by the confidece they had in the people of Milla, that there was no necessity to keepe there a great garrison: so that the duke, accopanied with loh.de Medicis, returned to Milla, where was remaining a strength of fixe thouland footmen. Thus they passed the second day of May the river of Thesina

The Imperials vpon three bridges beneath Pauia, the battell lodging at Gambala, and the refidue of the armie in the villages thereabouts: but the Admirall, when he knew they were passed Thesin, dispatched speedily Ranse de Cere to gard Vigena, and fearing to lose that towne, with other peeces in the countrey of Lomellina, which being taken from him, he should stand as it were besieged, he drew thither within fine dayes with the whole armie, leaning within Biagraffa, an hundred horsemen and a thousand footmen: he bestowed his vauntgard about the parts of Vigena, and sent the battellto Mortaro, a towne within two myles of Gambalo where the Viceroy was . That place was full of many commodities, fince befides the strength & fituation, it ministred victuals at commaundement, both for the furetie of the wayes of Mont ferat, of Verceill, and Novaro, and also fer the continuall oportunitie and affiftance of other places, yeelding courfe and trafficke from one towne to another, as if it had bene a lireame of water. The Admirall offered two dayes together, the battell to the enemies, who refused to accept it, not that they were lesse in numbers, or inferiour in valour and resolution of souldiers, but because they would not put in daunger the hope of the victorie which they held almost certaine, for that by the surprising of certaine letters, they had intelligence that the enemie began to feele want of money and pay.

.After the Emperours armie was passed Thesin , the Duke of Vrbin leading the Venetian regiments, went to incampe before Garla quo, a towne strong by situation, and well enuironed with elitches & rampiers: there was within it, a flrength of foure hundred footemen It alians; and standing betweene Pania & Trumella beyond Thefin, where he had an intention to bestow himself it did not onely cut the course of victuals from him, but also deprived the whole residue of the armie he had in short space made a breach, and the same day followed on with the assault, and being almost repulsed, many of his souldiers, holding all perill lesse then their valour, tooke the water and swamme over the ditches; by whose example certaine bands of sootemen of John de Medieis did the like, with whom in one resolute aductione they began to assaile it with such furie. that their vertue vanquishing all refistance, they entred it by force, making great slaughter of such as they found within. Afterwards the army approched S.Georges, and drew towards the Parish of Cairo to goto Sartirano, a towne of good strength, and hath his situation upon the hither shotes of Pamin a place very apt to hinder their victuals, and for the keeping whereof, were Hugh de Popoly and lohn Biragno with certaine horsemen, & fixe hundred footemen. lohn of Vrbin who was fent thither with the artilleries, and a regiment of two thousand sootinen Spanards, tooke first the town, and then the rocke, making flaughter of the most part of the men that were within, & committing the Captaines prisoners. The Frenchmen remoted their campe to succour Sartirano, but being preuented by the diligence of their enemies, they stayed all their armie at Monce, after they were aduertised by the way what was hapned. Neither had the affaires of the Frenchmen better fuccesse in other places of the Duchie of Mullan: for, those regiments of souldiers that were less within Mellan, compelled to render the towne of S. George which stands about Monce, whose inhabitants constrained by the extortion of the souldiers, had called home those bands of sootemer that were in Loda, Paule Lusasquo, encountring with certaine light horsemen of the French, put them to flight: and Federske Bossolo, being departed from Loda to set vpon Pisqueton, in place of the victory, brought home wounds & hurts, befides the losse of many of his nien: only there were certaine light horiemen of the French who running up betweene Plaisance and Tortone, furprifed a treasure of foureteene thousand duckats, which was fent to the Emperours armie.

Amid these difficulties, the Admirall had two hopes, the one to have the warre diverted, and the other to be succoured: for, the king had already caused to march foure hundred Launces by the Mount Geneura, to who were to be joyned ten thousand Swiffers. Besides, Ranse de Cere lec to the territorie of Bergama by the way of Valdefasina, five thousand Grisons, who were topasse from thence to Loda to joyne with Federike Bollolo, with whom were already many bandes o Italian footme. And lastly the Admiral stood firme in this perswasion, that the Emperour would be constrained for the suretie of Millan, to repasse the river of Thesin. Against these companies, the Duke of Millan fent out Iohnde Medicia with fiftie men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and three thousand footemen, & taking to him also a strength of three hundred men as armes, three hundred light horsemen, & soure thousand sootemen of the Venetians, he drew neare the enemics, who were now come to the village of Crauma betweene the rivers of Adda & Bre. bo eight miles from Bergama: he ran with one part of his people cuen vp to the places where the Grisons were incamped, who the third day after, complaining that they had not found at Gramina neither money for their payes, nor horlemen for their strength, nor other bandes of sootemen promifed by Ranse de Cere, set themselves at libertie and returned to their countrey. The defeending of the Grifons being thus turned into a mountaine of smoke, John de Medicus vling the occasion of their retiring, tooke Caranage, and afterwards passing Adda, he beat downe with his artilleries the bridge which the French had made at Bufaloro vpon Thefin: and those townes that are betweene Millun and The sin there was but Biagrassu left in the power of the French: it was plentifully provided of victuals, and garded with a strong garrifon of a thousand footemen under Ieronimo Caracciollo: but because it hath his situation upon the great channell, and by that meane floppeth the course of victuals which that channell is wont to bring in great plentie to Millan, Frauncis Space lent for loh, de Medicus to come to him being followed with all the youth of Millan behdes his ordinarie bandes of fouldiers: They joyned their forces together, and went to befiege it, and playing with their artilleries from Sunnerifing untill noone, he fent the fouldiers to the affault, whose valour being no lesse to enter the the artilleries were surious to make breaches, they tooke it the fame day with a fingular commendation of John de Medicis: in whom that day was not onely differend a vertue excelling all the other fouldiers, but also a grauitie, readinesse, and gouernement worthy of a right noble Captaine: So needefull is the presence of a Generall in any action of importance, and to conducible his example to carie the mindes of his fouldiers to contenme all perill, and leave nothing vindone, that valour or resolution can finde out. Captaine Caracciollo was taken, and many of the footemen committed to the sword, besides certaine companies which Iohnde Medicis put to the gibbet, for that they had run fro him a litle before. The conquelt of the towne, tooke from the cattell all hope of furetie, and yeelding to the fortune of the towne, it was rendred, referuing the lines of them that were within . The people of Millan were vniuerfally glad for this successe, but as there is no worldy blisse without his bale, and no prospericie so absolute which is not intangled with alteration, so the adversitie that happed by it was far greater without comparison, then their ioy, for that by transporting to Millan the spoiles & booties of Biagrassa, where the plague was, they brought wrapt up in the packes of their wealth and riches, the feedes of that pellilent contagion, which spread it selfe so vniuerfally ouer all complexions, that within few moneths, there dyed only in Aullan, more then fiftie thousand bodies. But the force & strength of the warre was on the other side Thesin, where the Admiral laster the losse of Sartirano, and discerning the enemies to approach him of new, abandoned Mortaro, and retired in two remoues, to Nouaro: his numbers were much diminished, for that not onely many of his footemen, but also certaine of his men at armes, were stolen from the campe and returned into Fraunce: by which weakenesse, the Admirall was driven to temporise vntill the supplies of the Swiffers were come, who were already neare to Yurea, & almost eight thousand fighting bodies. On the other fide, the Emperours Captaines studying to stop their comming, and to reduce the enemies into difficultie of victuals, made themselues Lordes of the townes neare to Nouaro, making flaughter of those vnhappy Frenchmen which they found in garrison: and after they had be-Howed within Verceill, certaine bandes of fouldiers, to defend the Smiffers for entring there, they went to encampe at Biandra betweene Verceill & Novaro, in a place environed on all parts with ditches, trees, and waters; matters of great importance to the fortification of a place.

At last the Admirall vuderstanding that the Swiffers that had passed Yurea, were stayed a long The Frenchine the river of Steffa, which they could not passe over for the great abundance of watersthere, and so from before defirous to joyne them to his armie, more to go away in furetie, then to fight with the enemie, he went from Nouaro to lodge at Romagnia vponthe shores of the same river: where, what by the want and necessitie of victuals, and the continuals diminution of his men, he was driven to build a bridge betweene Romagnia and Catinara: and on the other fide, the enemies, being come from Biandra to Briona, went to incampe within two inyles of Romagnia. The Frenchmen discerning upon what straite termes they stood, brake up and passed the river the day following, whe ir was believed, that if the enemies had bene carefull to watch their discamping, they had caried that day a most glorious & full victorie. But the Captaines being deuided in opinion & counfell, some bearing a forward defire to fight, & others to let them go without charging them, their emulations would not littlet them to vie the occasion that was offered. It seemed also that the army was not gouerned as appertained, for that as the Marquis of Pesquiero only, proceeding in all his actions with his accustomed valour, seemed worthy in whom should be reposed the whole direction of affaires, fo there were others that bare enuie to his vertue, and they feeking to darken his glory by detracting his doings, were content to put to hazard the whole estate of the war, rather then to joyne themselves to his counsels. But albeit the armie Imperiall was not in sufficient time aduertised of the discamping of the Frenchmen, yet after it was once knowen, many light horsemen and many bands of sootemen passed the foord of the river without order, & without enfignes, and followed them with fuch diligence, that they ouertooke the rearegard and began to skirmish with it: and albeit the Frenchmen, sometimes fighting, and sometimes marching, received the charge & fullained it a long time, yet in the end being not able to flie with the fame valour wherewith they were followed, they were constrained to leave on the place seven peeces of their artilleries, a great proportion of their munitions, with no fmall quantitie of victuals, & many of their horsemen and sootemen put to the sword, besides the losing of many of their ensignes. The Frenchmen made as though they would incampe at Cattinaro which is within a myle of Romagnia, and under that semblance, they caused secretly to passe on their artilleries and baggage. But as the enemies who beleeved they would incampe there, had begun to retire themselves, so they drew to Ranisinguatowardes Yurea which is fixe miles further. The Imperials without any impediment, incamped the same night vpon the river, which they passed immediatly vpon the rifing of the Moone: but they were not followed of the Venetians, for that being entred upon the lads of the Duke of Saney, they thought they had passed the bonds of consederatio, by the which they were bound to no further matter then to the defence of the Duchie of Mullan . The French men marched with flow pase in battell array, and had bestowed in the arearegard, the bandes of Smillers, by whom were repulled the first horsemen and footmen that came in disorder to charge them: and albeit the French by this time were gone from Rauisingua about two miles, yetthe Marquis of Pelquiero, arriving with his light horsemen, they were estsoones recharged, not that they forbare notwithstanding to march, although Captaine Chabanes was staine, and Captaine Bayard made prisoner, having a wound with a shot whereof he dyed within few dayes after. But the Marquis looking into the good order the enemies kept, and no leffe carefull not to follow his fortune further the good coulell called him, not with stading many bads of souldiers were come to him, yet he thought not good to pursue the enemies further, both for that he was vnfurnished of artilleries, & had not with him but one part of the army. By which meane the French were deliuered of further troubles, & returned together with the Smiffers to their houses, having left at Vaury beyond Turea, fifteene peeces of artilleries in the gard of three hundred Swiffers & one of the Lords of the countrey: but those artilleries were no better preserved the others, for that the Emperors Captaines having advertisemet of them, sent out to take them. After this the Victors devided the selues into diverse parts: the Duke of Vrbin was sent to Loda, and the Marquis of Pesquiero to Alexandria, which two Cities only were holden for the king, for that Nonaro was rendred, being fearefull of the Duke of Millan and lohn de Medicis drawing thither with their forces : the Viceroy was appointed to go against the Marquis of Rothelin who was come ouer the Mounts with foure hundred Launces, neuerthelesse assooneas he vnderstood of the fortune of the Admirall, & that he was retired, he returned also into Fraunce, holding it vaine for him to follow further the enterprise when the principall forces were dispersed: besides, Monsieur de Bussie and Iulio S. Seuerin to whom was committed the gard of Alexandria, made no relistance. In like fort Federike, after he had demaunded respite of a few dayes, to know if the Admirall were passed the Mountes, compounded to yeeld vp Loda, vpon the condition that was accorded to them of Alexandria, to leade into Fraunce the bandes of Italian footemen, who containing a regiment of five thousand men, did speciall service to the king afterwards. This was the end of the warre that was managed against the Duchie of Millan under the gouernement of the Admiral of France: by the which, neither the Kingspower being much weakened, nor the rootes of harmes remoued, much leffe that so many calamities were cleane take away, seeing they were but deferred to another season, and Italie in the meane while remaining discharged of troubles present, but not of suspition of further adversities to come: and yet the Emperour no lesse by the incitation of the Duke of Burbon, then by the hope that the authoritie & name of that man might ferue him to speciall purpose; was of minde to transferre the warre into France, to the which also the King of England shewed a readinesse and disposition. In

In the beginning of this yeare, the Emperour had fent his campe to Fontarabie, a towne of very fmall circuite, standing upon the debatable lands that deuide Fraunce from Spaine: and albeit the towne was very well manned, and furnished with artilleries and victuals, and leasure sufficient to them within to make it fortified, yet the fortifications being ill made through the ignorance of the Frenchmen, the towne lay open to the furie of the enemies, who heaping upon the defendants one necessitie after another, constrained them at last to give it vp onely with the safette of their lives. He was not fatisfied with the recoverie of this place, but flretching his thoughts further, he made his ambition no lesse then his fortune, and in those conceites being raised to further enterprise, he kept no reckening of the comforts and authoritie of the Pope, who having sent in the beginning of the yeare, to the Emperour, the French King, and to the King of England, to folicite a peace or a truce, he found their mindes very ill disposed to give over the warre. For, the French King, consenting to a truce for two yeares, refused to make peace, for the small hope he had to obtaine thereby such conditions as he defired: and the Emperour rejecting the truce, by the which was given good time to the French King to reordaine his forces to follow a new war, defired to have peace. And touching the King of England, any fort of composition that was offered to be made by the Popes meanes, was displeasing to him, as in whom was alwayes a defire that the treatie of the accord might be wholly referred to him. To this he was induced by the ambitious counsels of the Cardinall of Yorke, who (serving as a true example in our dayes of an immoderate pride) not with flanding he was of very base condition, and no lesseable ct for his parents and descending, yet he was risen to such an estate of authoritie and grace with the King, that in most the actions of the realme, the Kings will seemed nothing without the approbation of the Car unall: as of the contrary, whatfoeuer the Cardinall did deliberate, was either abfolute, or at least had very great force. But both the King and his Cardinall kept differibled with the Emperour that thought, and by apparances shewed a very forward inclination to moue warre against the realme of Fraunce, which the King of England pretended lawfully to appertaine to him: he grounded his claime upon these reasons: King Edward the third, after the death of the French King Charles the fourth called the faire, who died without iffue male in the yeare of our faluatio 1328. & of whose fister the said King Edward the third was borne, made instance to be declared The daine of king of France, as next heire male to the Frech king deceassed: neuerthelesse he was put by, by the the Kings of general! Parliament of the realme, wherein it was set downe, that by vertue of the law Salyke an Crowne of auncient law of that kingdome, not onely the perions of women were made vnable to the fuc- Fraunce. ceffion of the crowne, but also all such as descended and came of the womens line were excluded: but he not fatisfied with this order brought in to take away his right, armed himselfe soone after, and taking upon him the title of the King of Fraunce, he inuaded the realme with a mightie army: and as in that action he obtained many victories both against Philip de Valois, published by vniuerfall consent lawfull successour to Charles the faire, and also against King John his sonne, who being ouerthrowne in battell, was led prisoner into England: so after long warres he forbare further to vexe the realme, and making peace with the fayd lohn, he retained many Provinces and estates of the kingdome, and renounced the title of King of Fraunce: but after this composition which was neither of long continuance, not of great effect, the quarrell was eftfoones renewed,& fometimes followed with long warres, and fometimes discontinued with tedious truces: vntill at last King Hearie the fift entring confederacie with Philip Duke of Burgundie, who bare a minde estraunged from the Crowne of Fraunce, for the murder done vpon Duke Iohn his father, preuailed fo much against Charles the fixt somewhat simple of vinderstanding, that he commaunded almost the whole kingdome together with the towne of Paris : and finding in that Citie the French King accompanied with his wife and the Lady Katherine his daughter, he tooke to wife the fayd Lady, and brought the King to confent (having no great vse of wit) that after his death the kingdome should appertaine to him and to his heires, not with standing his sonne Charles did furnine him. By vertue of which title, affoone as he was dead, his sonne King Henrie the fixt was folemnly crowned at Paris, and proclaimed King of England and Fraunce: and albeit, after the death of Charles the fixt, his some Charles the seuenth, by reason of great warres happing in England betweenethe Lordes of the bloud royall, had chased the English out of all that they held in France, except the towne and territories of Callice, yet the kings of England did not leave for all that to continue and vie the title of King of Fraunce. These causes might haply moue King

Henrie the eight to the war, the rather also for that he stood more assured in his Realme then any of his predect flours had done: for that the Kings of the house of Yorke (that was the name of one factio) having suppressed the kings of the house of Lancaster (which was the other faction) & the partakers with the house of Lancaster seeing there was no more remaining of that house, railed to the kingdome Henry of Richmond for his proximitie and nearenesse with them. Who after he had subdued his adversaries, to the end he night raigne with more suretie and with more authoritie, tooke to wise one of the daughters of Edward the last King but one of the house of Yorke: by which confunction of houses, all the rights and claimes of both the one and the other houses, were absolutely and lawfully transferred into the person of king Henrie the eight borne of that mariage. These houses for the ensignes and cognizances that they bare, were called commonly the Red rose and the White rose.

But touching the mouing of the king of England to make warres in Fraunce, he was not so much caried by hope to winne the Realme of Fraunce by armes, for that he was not ignorant of the innumerable difficulties that would contend against him, as he was importunately pushed on by the ambitious desire of the Cardinall of Yorke, who layed this plot, that the long and tedious trauels & infinite necessities of the warre, would in the end bring his king to be the only arbitratour and appointer of the peace: and knowing that the negociation of it should depend much of his authoritie, he thought in one time both to make his name great through all the world, and also to entertaine himselfe in the good grace and liking of the French king, to whom he shewed secretly to beare some good inclination: and therefore the king of England sought not to bind him selfet to those conditions, whereunto it was necessarie he should be bound if he had had a levert minde to fo great a warre.

Thus the Emperour was stirred up to the warre by that occasion, but much more by a hope, that through the fauour, authoritie, and popular opinion which the Duke of Burbon caried in that kingdome, the commons of the Realme would draw to commotion; and therefore notwithstanding he was aduised by many of his firme & affured friends, that both for his want of money, which brings no small impediments to enterprises, and for the doubt of his confederats, whose sidelitie was vncertaine, he would give over to begin a warre so hard and intricate, and consent that the Pope might treate upon the furceasing of armes: yet he capitulated with the king of England and Duke of Burbon in this fort: That the Duke should enter the Realme of Fraunce with that part of the armie that was in Italie; and affoone as he should be ouer the Mounts, the king of England to pay an hundred thousand duckats for the defrayments of the first moneth of the warre: That it should be in the election of the sayd king either to continue this contribution fro moneth to moneth, or elfe to passe into France with a strong army to make warre from the first day of Julie vntill the end of December: and in that case the countreys of Flanders to furnish him of three thousand horse, a thousand footemen, and sufficient artilleries and municions: That if the victorie fell to them, there should be rendred to the Duke of Burbon, all those lands which the Frenchking had taken from him: That Prouence should be transferred to him, to the which he already pretended by the refignation that was made after the death of Charles the eight, by the Duke of Lorreine, to Anne Duchesse of Burbon: That he should hold it by the title ofking of Pronence: That first he should make an oath to the king of England as to the king of Fraunce, and do him homage, which if he did not performe, then this capitulation to be voyde: That the Duke of Burbon should not treate nor practife nothing with the French king without the confent of them both: That the Emperour at the fame time should make warre on that side towardes Spaine: Lastly that the Embassadours of the Emperour & the King of England should procure the Potentates of Italie to be concurrant with their money in this enterprise, to the end to be for euer assured against the war of the French; a matter which never forted to effect, for that the Pope did not onely refuse to contribute, but blamed expressly the enterprise, prophecying that not onely it would have an ill succeffe in Fraunce, but also it would be the cause to returne the warre againe upon Italie, and that with a greater puissance and perill then before. The Duke of Burbon refused constantly to acknowledge the king of England forking of Fraunce: and albeit after the confederation was made, he gaue counsell to march with the armie towardes Lyon, to the end to draw neare his owne landes and countreys: yet it was resolutely determined, that he should passe into Provence both for that the Emperour should with more facilitie fend him succours out of Spaine, and also

tobe more apt to take the service and oportunitie of the armie by sea, which was in preparing at Genes by the commaundement and with the money of the Emperour . The Marquis of Pefquero was declared Captaine Generall for the Emperour in this warre, for that he could not be brought to obey the Duke of Burbon. The plot and proceedings of this expedition were, that the Duke of Bur bon and with him the Marquis, should passe to Nice, and yet with forces farre lesse then such as were appointed, for that where, to the forces they had already with them which was fine hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horsemen, foure thousand footemen Spaniards, three thousand Italians, and five thousand Launceknights, there should have bene joyned three hundred men at armes of the armie in Italie, and fluethousand other Launceknights: these last companies failed to come for want of money, and the Viceroy kept retained the men at almes for the gard of the countrey, having no meane to wage new companies of footemen according to the resolution set downe in the first counsels, to the end to make head against Michaell Arigeo Marquis of Saluffe, who being departed from his effate, kept upon the Mountaines with a thoufand footemen. There was added to thist, hat the Emperours armie at sea (one of their principall hopes) being guided by Don Hugo de Moncado, a man of much malice and wickednesse of life, &c a creature of the Duke Valentinois, appeared far inferiour to the nauie of the French king, which being parted from Marseilles, was stayed in the port of Villefranche. Neuerthelesse the Emperours armie entredinto Prouence, where were Monsieur de la Palissa; Captaine Fayetto, Ranse de Cere, & Federike Boffolo, all Captaines of the Frech king, & were now withdrawen into townes. for that they were not ftrong inough to make head in the field. One part of the armie drew along the sea side, and tooke the tower that commaundeth the port of Towlon, where were taken two Cannons that were drawen to the armie. Befides, the towne of Aix (which for his authoritie and for that the Parliament is there refident, is one of the chiefe townes of Pronence) was rendred. whole example drew with it many other cownes of the countrey. The Duke of Burbon in whom was no leffe emulation then valour, defired that from Aix the armie might march further leauing the sea side, wherein he perswaded that seeking to passe the river of Rhosne, there might be loft no time to enter deeper into the bodie and intrals of Fraunce, whilest the kings prouisions were yet but weake and not and confirmed: for, by reason the king was confuned of treasure and money, the men at armes of Fraunce had suffered much, and were verice Il payed, and also not expecting that his enemies would passe out of Lombardie into France. his forces and companies of men of warre were fallen into that diforder that they could not be readdressed with such speede. Besides, the King having no considence in the valour of the sootenen of his owne kingdome, was constrained before he could march into the field, to tarie or the comming of certaine footebandes of the Swiffers and Launceknights: during which expectation, as the Duke of Burbon thought he should be able to do some matter of imporance in passing over R bosne, so the Marquis of Pesquiero with the other Spanish Captaines were of an other adule: they defired that both for the oportunitie of the fea, and to fatiffie the intention of the Emperour, Marseilles might be conquered; a hauen most convenient ovexe the Realme of Fraunce with sea armies, and also no lesse apt to passe in safetie out of Spaine into Italie. These Captaines what by the authoritie of their multitude, and the efficaicof their reasons, so prevailed against the will of the Duke of Burbon, that they pitched heir campe before Marseilles, wherein was newly entred Ranse de Cere with those bandes of footemen which had bene led into Fraunce from Alexandria and Loda. They lay fortie dayes pefore Mar feilles without doing any exploite of marke or memorie: and albeit they execued the wals in many places with their artilleries, and not prevailing with batteries laboured to worke their entrie by myning, yet they found objected many difficulties, and their great lapours refisted both by the fortune and fortification of the towne: they had contending against heir industrie, the strength of the wall bearing an auncient forme and building: the valour of he defendants most resolute in the quarrell of their libertie: the disposition of the people, beaing great denotion to the name of the French King, and verie hatefull to the glorie of the Spawards: And lastly the hope of succours as well by sea as land, for that the French King was once to Auignon, (a Citie of the Popes, standing upon the river of Rhosne) where he affembled with great diligence, a mightie armie. Moreouer want of money began to fall von the Emperours Captaines, and their hopes no leffe diminished that the French King being inuaded in other places, would be letted to conuett to one onely part all his forces & prouisions: for that the king of England notwithstading he had fent to the Duke of Burbon Maister Ruhard Pale, did both refule to pay the hundred thousand duckats for the second moneth, and also made slender shewesto moue warre in Picardie: no, having received into England John Joachin de Spetto whom the French King had fent to him , and also the Cardinall of Yorke making Arraunge answers to the Emperours Embassadours, he gaue the Duke great occasion both to doubt and distrust him. And touching Spame and the expectation there, the powers and forces did not aunswer the wils of men nor the promises that were made: The reason was, for that the Courtes of Castille (so are called the congregations of the Deputies assembled in the name of the whole kingdome) had refused to ayde the Emperour with foure hundred thousand duckats; a contribution which they are wont to make both in the great neede of their king, and vpon any action of importance: by which occasion there could no money be sent to the armie that was in Prouence, & much lesse any leavie of men made against the French king in the frontiers of Spaine. other then very weake, and not worthy to beare reckening: fo that the Imperial Captaines, both dispairing to facke Marselles, & also fearing to runne into some greater daunger when the King should approch, brake up their campe the same day that the King set from Auignon with his whole armie, having also marching with him a regiment of fixe thousand Swiffers.

The same reasons that moved the Imperiall Captaines to leavie their siege from before Marfeelles, caried them, also to turne their faces towardes Italie. And as in menthere is neehing more violent then the passion of seare, whose motions are swifter then the wings of the wind, so in the Imperials was seene no lesse diligence to hasten into Italie, the to breake up their siege, shewing one care to preuent the perill that might fall vpon them, if either all or part of the French Kings armic should encounter them in the countrey of the enemie. And on the other fide, the King fawa faire occasion offered to recouer his Duchie of Millan, what by the puissance of the armie he had leauied, by the fidelitie of his Captaines, by the plentie of his prouisions, by the intelligence he had of the weakenesse of his enemies, and lastly by his hope, that taking the nearest way, he should bring his armie into Italie afore those that went from Marseilles . In which The Free has uocable promise to passe in person into Italie, so who so ever would rise up to counsell him the estate and advantage of things, he determined to loyne industrie to the present oportunitie, and to follow the benefite that fortune presented to him: he imparted this resolution with all the Captaines of the armie, to whom he declared, that as he had vowed in himselfe an irrecontrarie, much leffe that he would graunt him audience, feeing he would not for beare to hold paffe the months him in ill opinion and affection: That therefore eueric one should go to his charge, and shew the same will to execute the enterprise, which they had done to consult and to conclude it: That God who was a louer of iustice., and the insolencie and rashnesse of the enemies, had at last layed open a meane to reconquer that that had bene violently rauished from him against law, equitie, and reason: That they had to doubt no more of the victorie then for his part, he distrusted their valours, for that God doth alwayes accompanie an innocent cause with a happie successe. To these wordes was correspondent, both his constancie in deliberation, and his celeritie in execution, for that he commaunded immediatlie his armie to march, wherein were two thousand Launces and twentie thousand sootemen . He tooke a contrarie, way because he would not meete with the Ladie Regent his mother, who was come from Anignon to debate with him not to passe the Mountes in person, but to performe the warre in Italie by his Captaines. He gaue order to Ranse de Cere to furnish his Gallies with those bandes of footemen which he had at Marseilles: and to auoyd all practiles and negociations of peace or at least that he somewhat distrusted the Pope, he forbad to passe surther the Archbishop o of Capua that was dispatched to him and so to go to the Emperour : He senthim word to taris for him at Auignon in the Court of his mother, and negociate with him by letters, or elle to returne againe to the Pope: so firmelie had he fixed his minde upon the warre, that nothing was more hatefull to him then to heare speake of peace, against the which he had closed he eares and shut vp all inclination: and in that resolution he followed the enemies in the mean while with the greatest diligence he could : but they making small reckening of the harmer and domages which the payfants did to them, marched alwayes in good order along the lea fide: at last they got to Monaco, and there they brake into peecestheir artilleties, which

for more facilitie of cariage, they laded their Mulets withall: as foone as they came to Finale, they underderflood with what hast the King marched after, which made them double their pase, to the end to be able in good season to defend the Duchie of Alulan, wherein were not remain

ning forces sufficient to make resistance.

Thus both the one and the other armie drawing towardes Italie, the fame day that the French King came to Verceill, the Marquis of Pesquiero artified at Albo with the horsemen and bandes of Spanish footemen, being followed one dayes journey behind by the Duke of Burbon and the Launceknights: the Marquis not taking leyfure to pawfe, or scarcelie to breath, went the day following from Albo to Voquiero being fortie miles diffant, to the end he might the next day get into Paula: and there he loyned his forces with the Viceroy who was come thither from Alexandria, for the gard of which towns he had left a firength of two thousand footemen: this was in a time when the French armie began to draw fast vpon the shores of the river Thesin, their diligence in marching being farre swifter then was the opinion of the enemies. In this place they consulted with Teronimo Moron of the eslate of their common affaires, wherein their first deuise was , that leaving sufficient garrison within Pausa, they should dispose all their forces to the desence of Atellan, according to the observation and cultome of the other warres. In this counfell, it was fet downe that Moron should go thither forthwith to make prouision for things necessarie. & the Duke of Millanto follow him who hey had fent for: and they their with companies marched the right way to Willan, after they nad left within Pama, Anthonie de Leua with three hundred men at armes, flue thousand soctenen being all Spamards, except certaine Launceknights: but fuch was the desolation within Mil-'an, that being still afflicted with the great plague that had runne through the towneall the formner, the Citie was fore shaken, and litle remaining of the former apparance and countenaunce: The fickenefle had confumed infinite numbers of the people and bodies of good feruice, and nany had abandoned the Citie to anoyde that mortall perill of their lines: it contained such rouisions of victuals as it was wont to do: the meanes to taxe and leavie money began to grow lard and desperate: and touching the fortifications, the adversitie of the sickenesse had taken way all care and remembrance of them, yea through the negligence of that time, all the bulvarkes and rampiers lay reuerfed to the ground : Such are the doniages of an universail negli-, ence, which even amid perils that be manifest and apparant, takes away the studie of things, hat most concerne safetie and desence . And yet albeit the townes-men and popular inha-,, itants, expressed no want of readinesse to lay themselves downe to all daunger, and suffer all rauell whatfoeuer: yet Moron judging by the present estate and desolation of the towne, natto enter with an armie, would be more to the ruine then to the defence of the Citie, tooke nother counfell, which he published in the presence of a great assemblie of the townssmen in his maner of speeches . We may say now and with the same perturbation of minde , the like ,, wordes which our Saujour Christ powred out in the middest of his perplexities: Truely the fpi-,, iteis ready, but the flesh is weake: I know that in you wanteth not the same affection which, ath alwayes carried you to honour, obey, and defend your Lord Frauncis Sforce: and I am, orignorant, that in him do make right deepe impressions the calamities and daungers of his care people, for whose safetie as I know he wanteth no inclination to offer vp his life and all his, nottall effate, fo in your faces I discerne an universall readinesse to recompence him with the ame compassion: But what availeth it to be resolute, where fortune hath made greater the perils, cdangers, then either reason or nature can make assured the hope, and how vainely is employed,, nat fidelitie which is not accompanied with his due respectes to time, place, and propertie of, nings. I see your forces are nothing aunswerable to your good wils and inclinations, for that, our towne is made naked of people, your treasuries drayned of money, your store houses con-,, uned of victuals, and your fortification reduced to extreame ruine; matters that of themselues do ,, ffer the Frenchmen to enter, without that you shall neede to beate open your gates or posternes. thrings no litle griefe to the Duke to be constrained to leave you abandoned, but it would be,, nore grieuous to him the death, if in seeking to defend you he should lead you to your last ruine,, nd desolation. In so great a face and multitude of euils, it is holden for good discretion to make, lection of the least, and not to doubt of better, seeing it is given to mortall men to hope for all, rings and to dispayre in nothing. In matters of perill it is no shame to flie, when the flying profi-eteth him that giveth place to his adverfarie, for this reason the Duke adviseth you to obey necessiettie, and give place to the fortune of the French King, referuing your remedies for a better time which we can not but hope will happen for your speedie restoring. To give place to necessitie and follow the law of time, is an office duly appertaining to wife men: For the prefent, the Duke will neither abandon himfelfe, nor give you over in time to come. Make your fortowes no greaeter then is the qualitie of your losse, and frame your mindes apt to receive this consolation, that " time triumpheth ouer all the advertities of the world. You fee your cause is just, the power of the « Emperour mightie, his fortune incredible, and your enemies no other men then fuch against whom your valours have so oftentimes prevailed. God will behold your pietie towardes the "Duke, and his compassion towardes his countrey: with him are layd vp the issues of warres se and in his fight is fatre more acceptable the innocencie of your cause, then the might of your ad " uersarie. Lastly I wish you all to remaine thus resolute, that suffering for a good end that which " our present necessitie doth constraine vs vnto, that mightie God whose rule goeth through all will take to himselfe the revenge of our proudenemies, & by a glorious victorie, redeeme vs from those afflictions which we have suffered so long in his light. After these wordes, he dismissed the affemblie, and caufing victuals to be put within the Castle, he issued out of the towne.

The Duke not knowing any thing of that which Moron had done at Millan, tooke his was to go thither: but immediatly after he was come out of Pania, he met with Ferrant Castrio having the conduct of the artillerie, who fignifying to him that part of the enemies were paffe Thefin, and that they had ouerthrowen Captaine Succhar a Eurgonion with his light horse men upon the shores of the river, he returned to Pania, searing to finde ambushes and impedi mets in the way. And albeit the Duke & Moron had proceeded with finceritie in these causes, ye the Emperors captaines who were with the armie at Binafquo, being leadous least they had fecret ly cotracted with the French king, fent to Millan Captaine Alarcon with two hundred Launces either to follow him or to lye still according to the aduertisements that should be given. He wa no looner arrived there, then the people who were already compounded with certaine exile that negociated in the Kingsname, began to take hart and to publish the name of the Emperou and Frauncis Sforce . But Captaine Alarcon , waighing with the litle hope that remained of de fence, the neareneffe of the French vauward which was then at hand, issued out of the gate cal led Rome gate, and tooke the way to Loda, whither was also marched the whole armie. The was at the fame time that the enemies began to enter by the gates of Thefin and Verceill, who, they had not turned towardes Millan, but put vpon them the chase and pursuing of the Empe rours armie, both being wearie with marching, & having lost many of their me at armes & horse it was beleeued for certaine, that they had put the armie to the shocke and defeated with faciliti the forces which afore they feared. And moreover, if after they were approched to Millan, the had with the same diligence drawne towardes Loda, either the Emperours Captaines would no have dared to flav there, or at left passing with diligence the river of Adda, they had with the fame fortune and facilitie put to diforder the refidue of the enemies. But the King who hapl supposed it a matter of great importance to establish and assure at his deuotion Willan, a town which had made the most principall refistance against him, or haply being caried with some other cause, he did not only draw to the Citic of Mullan, wherein he would not enter nor suffer the at mie to enter, but stayed to bestow in it sufficient garrison, and to give direction for besieging th Callell, wherein were seuen hundred Spanish footmen. He forbad, to the great prayse of his mo deflie and elemencie, that no displeasures should be done to the inhabitants, seeking by that infi nuation to reduce a people whom he faw vntractable by all other meanes; after he had publishe his directions at Willan, he turned his armie towardes Pania, not holding it convenient for the efface of his affaires, to leave behind his backe a Citie wherein were fo many fouldiers. The Kin had in his armie (reckening those that remained at Millan) two thousand Launces, eight thousan Launceknights, fixe thousand Swiffers, fixe thousand foreriders or aduenturers, and foure thou fand Italians: the number of these last increased much afterwardes

About this time, the Marquis of Pesquiero was got within Loda with two thousand footness the Viceroy having revictualled the townes of Alexandria, Coma, & Tressa, was entred into Son zum: with him entred Francis Source & Charles Burbon, who amid so many difficulties & distress drew to them some courage by the going of the king to Pania: they thought to readdresse the

companies if the defence of that Citie would give them libertie: & to that purpose they sent into Germany to leavie fixe thousand footmen, with the payes of whom & other expences necessarie, here was prouisio made with the fiftie thousand duckets which the Emperour had sent to Genes, o employ the in the warres of Prouence: but the thing that gaue chiefe impediment to their counels, was the necessity and want of money which they suffered : for neither had they meane to fraw any out of the Duchie of Millan, and leffe hope to obtaine of the Emperour for his difability my other matter then a commission to offer to be sold at Naples the most of the reuenues of the singdome : and touching their ancient confederates, they expected none at all or verie litle reliefe neither of money nor men: for that as the Pope and Florentines iountly being sued vnto for ome contribution of money, gaue them nothing but generall words and hopes more hurting the ouring their calamities: fo the Pope alone, who after the Admirall was gone out of Italie flood teolutely fixed not to intangle himselse further in the warres betweene the Emperour and the rench king, would neuer renew the confederation made with his predecessor, nor contract new eagues with any Prince: and which more is, not with flanding he declared himself cinclined to the imperour and the king of England, yet he had made a fecret promife afore to the French king, not o be any impediment to him in the recourrie of his Duchie of Millan. Moreover, when the Veerians were required by the Viceroy to furnish those bands of fouldiers which they were bound nto by the capitulations of the league; albeit they did not flatly refuse them, yet their answers vere but cold and contained small hope: their intention was to accomodate their counsels accoring to the traine and proceeding of things, wherein they were caried by one of these reasons: einet for that in many of them was renewed the memorie of their ancient alliance with the French ing, or elfe they judged that he could not but remaine victorious in regard of his valour, his forme, but specially the mighty forces he brought into Italy against enemies of so slender preparaon and worse prouision; or lastly, for that the Emperours ambition was more suspected to them en before, for that he had not inuested Franneis Sforce in the Duchy of Millan; a matter which te flates of Italy did no leffe maruell at then grieuoufly complaine vpon: in this maner of doing so they were much caried by the authority of the Pope, to whose counsels and example they are no small respect in those times.

The Frenchking made his approch to Pania on the lower fide betweene the river of The fin, The French id the way that leadeth to Willam and after he had incamped his vaunt gard within the fuburbs Paula. ES. Anthonie beyond Thefin vpon the way that goeth to Genes, he bestowed himselfe in the Abey of S. Lanfranke which is within a mile of the walles: there he drew into confideration all the rayes that could be deuised for the exploit of the towne, either how much the situation did help, t what might be hoped for by the industrie of men, which parts were weakest for want of rtification, and how to leavie the difficulties where were shewes of resistance, yea he made counsell with his Captaines of all things tending to such a service: & after resolution set downe, eaduaunced his artilleries, with the which for two dayes together he battred the walles in two laces, and afterwards raunging his armie into aray of battell, he began to give the affault: but the verie first charge he caused eftsoones to sound the retrait, both finding the rampiers withiverie ftrong and furnished, and the affurance and valour of the defendants resolute and fingur, and also discerning in his owne souldiers manifest signes of feare by the spectacle of their felrives flame in the charge: with this also he confidered how hard it would be to take by affault a owne that had for her defence so many braue men of warre, so many naturall impediments, so vary artificiall difficulties; and lattly, so plentifully prepared of all those things which either exerience, industrie, or counsell could prouide, that there was nothing, wanting which might be nade for the helpe of their danger, nor nothing yied to their helpe which was not hurtfull to the nemic: therefore he deuised to cast trenches and platfornies, wherein he employed the labour fa great number of pyoners, by whose working he fought to cut off the flanks, to give more retie to his fouldiers when they should approch : and as to his desire to carie the towne, there as wanting no will to follow the exploit with charges and expences, fo albeit the worke was ing and hard, yet he caused to make mines in many places, hoping to preuaile by that engine, rough in all other wayes should fall out imperfection or errour: the river there about two miles boue Pavia separates it selfe into two armes or hornes, and carying his streame of one violence ad swiftnesse somewhat below the towne, he niecteth in one againe afore he fall into Pan :

The king devised to take the oponunitie of this river, wherein vfirg the counfell of diverfects nifts and water workemen skilfull in the course of the streame, he determined to turne that am of the river that passeth on that fide to Paula, and to make it fall into the lesser, which they ca Granalone : his hope was to prevaile with greater facilitie on that fide, for that the wall by refon of his suretie, which the depth of the water did giue, was not any way rampired; the number of the defendants was fo great about his expectation, and their minds fo refolute in valour en fidelitie, that he had no confidence of the victorie by any other meane then this, which made his consume many dayes in that worke, no leffe great for the labour, employing multitudes of mer then grieuous for the expences, drawing with it many extraordinarie charges. The townes-me could not but be fearefull to fee fuch a worke raifed to do them harme, and yet fubduing throug a fetled confidence those motions that made them timerous, the vertue of their minds brough them to contemne the thing that their nature and flesh made them to distrust and doubt: but suc was the violent working of the water being much increased by certaine great raines and lanc flouds that were fallen, that it begato reverse the trenches & fluces which were made in the char nell where the river was decided to force the course of the water to enter into the lesser arme and albeit the kings hopesmade him both to recontinue the worke, and to thinke to be ablet furmount the violence of the streame with the force of men and money, yet in the end experience gaue him to know, that the force of a water carying a violent course, can do more then either d trauell of men, or industric of enginists. The privation of this hope, together with the difficultie that were differend to carie the towneby force, draue the king to a new counfell, wherein he de termined to continue the fiege, with the long tract and continuance whereof, he was not withou hope to reduce the defendants into necessitie of rendring.

During these preparations and actions, the Pope hearing of the taking of Millan, was not a lit moued with the fortunes and happy beginnings of the French: and therefore amid fuch alte ration of things, he studied to assure his proper affaires, dispatching for the same occasion to the French king, John Mathem Giberto Bishop of Verona, who was of no lesse fidelitie and confident with the Pope, then gracious and acceptable to the French king : he had in charge to go first t Sonzin to induce the Viceroy and the other Captaines to peace, communicating with them his k gation to the king for the same cause: but finding them recomforted by the refusance of Pani. and no leffe affured in the hope of their proper valour, they made him a braue answer, that the had no deuotion to any composition which should give to the king any one foot of land in the Duchie of Millan: he found in the king alike, or haply a more hard disposition, raising his hea into high hopes, both by the greatnesse of his armie, and also for the good meanes he had to con tinue it and increase it; a foundation wherupon he assured principally his passage into Italy, ar not under a simple hope to preuent his enemies, notwithstanding he would say, that in effect was already succeeded to him. The king nourished in himselfe an assured hope to carie Pani. which he battred with a continuall furie and execution of his artilleries : this hope was especiall grounded vpon the works which he cast about the wals, such as he was affured could not be troi bled by the enemies for the want which they had of munitions: a matter easie to be discerne by the little number of shots which they made. He faw also into their penuric of victuals are bread, and was not without hope also to be able in time to turne the streame of 7 hesin; an actic specially importing the advancement of his victorie: and esteeming the conquest of Millan at Genes, a recompence farre, vnworthy the expences he had made, and a reward too fimple for i great a glorie, he raised his mind to higher thoughts, & in that ambitio deuised to inuade the king dome of Naples, holding nothing the hardnesse of the enterprise in regard of his fortune & glori & more contemning the petill then well examining the parts and circumflances of it. But after a this, the principall cause of the Bishops legation was debated betweene the, and brought forthe feet with verie litle difficultie, both for that the Pope bound himselfe not to give against the kir any succours, either secret or manifest; in which couenant the Florentines did also communicate and also the king received into his protection the Pope and the Florentines, comprehending espe cially the authority which the family of Medicis had within Florence. It was agreed that this ac cord shold not be published, but at such time as shold seeme best to the Pope:neuerthelesse, albo it came not for the present, to the knowledge of the Emperours Captaines, yet they entred day more & more into icalousie of the Pope: & therfore to be fully made assured of the certainty of h intentic

intention, they dispatched to him Martin Abbot of Nagero Commissarie of the campe: his commission was to propound to the Pope at one time both hope and seare: for of the one part they made him offer of verie great things, & of the other they gaue him to understand, that if the Emperour and the king came to the vttermost contention, the Emperour could not but hold for enemies and against him such as stood in shew of neuters and indifferent : but the Pope answered, that nothing could be leffe feeming to him, his efface and place, then to give ouer neutrality in a time when warres ran betweene Christian Princes, both for that the office of a Pastour did so require it, and also standing a neuter, he might with a greater authoritie interpose in the action of peace: of the parts and couenants whereof, he treated at the same time with the Emperour, at whose Court since the taking of Millin was arrived the Archbishop of Capna, to whom the Ladie Regent had giuen pasport to go from Lyon into Spaine : where, after he had with the same reasons excused the Pope in that he would not renue the league, a matter wherein the Emperour did instantly require him, when he understood the king drew towards Italy, he toldhim that in making peace or truce, he ought to lay afide armes. But that which wrought in the Emperour an inclination to accord, was the difficulties wherein he faw his armie reduced, the flender means he had to make leavies of money to relieve the affaires of Italy, the full felicitie which followed the French king, and the suspition that he had least the king of England had secretly contracted with his enemie: he grounded that icalousie vpon this reason, that not only he resuled to send to the armie that was in Lombardy the fifty thousand duckets, for the which notwithstanding he had given order, and provided at Rome for the warre of Provence : but also he demaunded of the Emperour (suffering so great necessitie) both restitution of the money he had lent him, and also present payment of all such summes as he was bound vnto; for, the Emperour since his passing nto Spaine having a great defire of conjunction with the king of England, and the better to renoue all difficulties that might hold him in suspence, bound himself to pay him that pesson which schad yearely of the French king, and to answer twenty thousand duckets for the pensions which he French king paid to the Cardinall of Yorke and others, to gether with thirty thousand duckets payable to Queene Blanch the widow of king Lewis: of all which fummes he had made no paynent till that day: neuerthelesse the Emperour amid so many aduersities, made answer that it was iot a matter agreeing with his dignitic, to make any convention fo long as the French king lay exing with armes and hostility the Duchy of Millan. This was his answer, no lesse resolute then worthy fuch a greatnesse of mind, being notwithstanding no lesse afflicted in thought and spirit, hen very ill disposed of his person and body, being sallen into a seuer quartaine, either for the displeasure he had conceiued, when the difficulties to take Marseilles began to appeare, or for that ismind ill disposed to give place to the enemie, was not naturally made tractable by any diffiulties, or for that he had a firme confidence in the vertue of his armie; if once they came to the pattell; or lastly, for that he promised to himselfe, that hereafter the sauours of fortune would folow him with as full a gale as they had done in times paft.

The French king during these actions, had determined to invade the realme of Naples, hoping The French hat the importance of that kingdom would moue the Viceroy either to abandon Millan, or at least king fendeth recease armes vpon ill conditions; a thing which the king bega to desire for the difficulties he saw the Duke of T obtaine Pausa, and for that expedition it was fet downe, that Iohn Steward Duke of Albany, the realme of fued of the bloud of the kings of Scotland, should march to the realme of Naples with two hun-Naples, and foure thousand footmen: these to be drawne out of ne armie, the one halfe to be Italians, foure hundred Swiffers, and the refidue Launceknights: nd for the more glorie of the expedition and suretie of the victorie, Ranse de Cere was appointed pioyne with them, and to descend at Lyuorna with those bands of sootemen that were leavied or the armie at sea, which for the difficultie of necessarie prouisions, was yet within the bay of illefranche: he had also sent directions to the same Ranse and the Orsins, to wage soure thouind footmen in the country of Rome. This deliberation the French king fignified to the Pope by is Embassour Alberto Earle of Carpy, by who he required the Pope of sufferance to leavy bands ffootmen at Rome, and to consent to passage for his armie through the Church dominion. This emaund brought no litle griefe to the Pope, to whom it could not but be intollerable, that togéner with the Duchie of Millan, the crowne of Naples should divolve to the French king but looing into the estate of the time, & lesse hardy to make ope refusal to the kings demand, he adusted him only by way of counfell, not to embrace as yet that enterprise, and not to drive him to that necessitie not to accord to him that which for many just regards he could not consent vnto: wherein he occupied with him this wife discourse to proue the action to be against his proper weale and profite. That if in times past the defire to reconquer the Duchie of Millan had stirred vp fo many enemies, much more would it moue in those dayes, and in that estate of affaires, when the world differend that he aspired manifestly to the kingdome of Naples: That there was great perill least such an ambition would draw the Venetians to take armes for the Emperour, and to passe the bonds of their consederation: That he had to consider, that if his assaires found any disficultie in Lombardy, the war would proceed with finall reputation in the realme of Naples: That if his warres and armies suffered declination in either of these two places, it would be a materiall cause to bring forth diminution to both: That lastly, he should remember what offices he had commended in him in putting upon him a mind requifite in a Pope, and that therefore it was not convenient to compell him now to do the contrary. But this discourse was made in vaine, for that the Duke of Albame not attending for other answer, and withall halfe assured of the Popes consent, passed the river of Paw at the passage of Stellato, which is in the Duchie of Millan: and yet the fift day after he turned backe againe by direction from the king, who ynder flanding that the Launceknights began already to arriue, & that the Duke of Burbon was gone to wage more, thought best to referue with himselfe his whole armie, vitill his campe were possessed of the new Supply of Smillers and Grisons which he had fent to leanie. In this meane while were made many shewes and demonstrations of armes, though no action of importance was performed by neither partie. The king continued the fiege before Pania, working continually at the trenches & watching to vexe them within with his artilleries: and the Imperials flood quiet, expecting the returne of the Duke of Burbon: onely the Marquis of Pesquiero, vpon whose providence and valour depended for the most part the counsels and executions of the whole affaires, issued one night out of Loda with two hundred horsemen and two thousand sootemen; with which strength he furprised the towne of Melzo, being negligently garded by Jeronimo and John Fermo Triunles, with two hundred horsemen, and in the action tooke prisoners all the Captaines with the most part of all their fouldiers, of whom Ieronimo died not many dayes after of a blow which he receiued in fight. By this were arrived in the kings campe the bands of Swiffers and Grifons, by reafon of whole comming the Duke of Albany repalled agains the river of Paw at Stadello vpon the countrey of Plasfance: from which inclination the Pope was notable to turne the king, not that he did what he could, but haply solicited it with verie cold instance, for seare to make him enter into suspition : and therefore the thought it now time both to manifest to the Imperials, the couenants he had made with him before, and also to renew the mention of the accord, hoping that no leffe the difficultie to obtaine Paura, then the daunger of the kingdome of Naples would make either partie leffe obstinate & leffe hard to embrace the accord : to those ends he sent Paule Vettorio to the Viceroy to fignifie to him, that not with standing the means and meditations he had vied, yet he could never divert the French king from his purpose to invade the realme of Naples? and that (as touching his owne particular, leaft he should pull ypon himselfe the warre which he The Pope cou- could not refit the had no reason to give impediment to his passage: neverthelesse, albeit he was constrained by vehement compulsion to seeke his furety with him by new contracts, yet he wold neuer accord to any condition which might be prejudiciall to the Emperour: for whom, like as amid so many difficulties, he saw nothing more profitable nor reasonable the to embrace peace: so to the end the negociatió of peace might be aduanced afore the diforders grew greater or more immoderate, he perswaded the Viceroy to cosent to a surceasing of armes, & to put into the hands of a person not suspected at those precess in the Duchie of Millun, which as yet were holden in the name of the Emperor and the Duke. Vpon which doings and their ful accomplishments, he hoped there would be found out some convenient means for peace, wherin he proponed this deuise, that the Duchy of Millan being wholly separate fro the crowne of Fraunce, the kings second fon should be inuefled therin by the Emperor, to who in recopence shold be transferred some copetent sum of money: that there should be ordained some reasonable estate and assignation for the Dukes of Millan & Burbon: and laftly, that the Pope, the Venetians, and the Florentins should be bound to cofederate with the Emperor against the French king, in case he wold not observe things prinsed. The Emperors Captaines discerned well of the difficulties and dangers wherin they stood, having trone time to support so great a warre in Lombardy in such an universall want and necessitie of noney, and also to provide for the safety of the kingdome of Naples, being no lesse desperate of syde from the Pope and Florentmes, then very certaine that the Venetians would abandon them: who, albeit they waged new bands of footmen, and studied to entertaine the Imperials in hope to observe the articles of the league, yet they deferred the execution with diverse excuses: in so much is the Viceroy being for his particular nothing elfranged from the accord, inclined to draw with hearmy to the kingdome of Naples for the furety of the same : but the Councell being assemoled ypon the matter, the reasons and authoritie of the Marquis of Pesquiero preuailed, who exreffing an equal correspondecie of wisdome and courage, proued how necessarie it was to passe ouer the account of all other dangers, and to fixe only vpon the warre of Lombardy, vpon whose rictoric all other things had their expectation and depending: he faid it was not the kings intentio o inuade the realme of Naples with those armies and forces which could not so speedily be led nto the kingdome, where both were multitudes of flrong townes and an absolute resolution and ertaintie of refishance, by those bodies whom it concerned (for their proper safety) to defend it: by which occasion as it might be sustained for certaine moneths, so in that respite & time it was likely hat the warre of Millan would be determined, of which if they obtained the victorie, there could tot but follow the speedy delinering or rendring of Naples, yea though the Emperour had no oher holds or peeces there then one only tower. That holding good in Lombardy, it were easie to re victorious ouer Millan and Naples: where in marching to Naples were the only way to loofe Millan, and yet the kingdome not the more delivered from daunger, for that the whole body of he warre would be transported thither: and being once reduced to a state of men vanquilhed, with what hopes can we returne thither againe? where of the contrarie, the enemies would enter vith such a reputation and inclination of the people, who naturally either for feare or hatred, run efore the fortune of the victor : that in the kingdome of Naples wold be found no more defence nen in the Duchy of Millan: that no other thing moued the French king standing as yet in doubt f the successe of Lombardy . both to deuide his armie and begin a new warre (the first still haning and continuing) then the hope he had, that for the ouermuch care and icalousie of the kingome of Naples, they would at last leave vnto himas a pray the estate of Millan: according to those counsels and appetites, if the armie should moue that so ofen had triumphed in victory, it vere no other thing then with eternall infamie to subject to the vanquished, by copulsion of their nreatnings, that honour, that reputation, and that estate of glorie, which so manie times we have on vponthe by our armes, by our valour, & by our weapons. This aduife was embraced, and as a entence fet downe & followed by the Viceroy, who accordingly dispatched to Naples the Duke f Tracetta, with direction to make as great leavies of mony as was possible, & recomend over ne care and defence of the kingdome to Ascanio Colonno & the other Barons of the realine : and beit he had modeftly giuen answer to the Embassage presented to him from the Pope, yet he rtote to Rome letters full of feuerity & bitternesse, such as gaue manifest fignificatio, that he wold otheare speake of the accord. By reason of this, the Pope declaring how he was pushed on by neeffire, for that the Duke of Albanie advanced dayly, published (not as a thing done before) that he ad contracted with the French king under a simple promise not to offend one another: this he guified by writing to the Emperors Agents, alleaging the causes that induced him, but specially is necessities and perils increasing: and when the said writing was presented by John Corsi Emaffadour of Florence with words convenient in fuch a case, the Emperour, who afore could not e perswaded that the Pope would abandon him in so great a danger, sell into no litle emotion nd trouble of mind: he fet before his eyes the fundrie hopes he had given him, confirmed by maie good offices and oblations he conferred together the seuerall demonstrations of amitie, accoanied with no leffe tokens of constancy and firminesse: lastly, making a judgement betweene the ormer promifes of the Pope, and his present effects, he burst out into publike passion against him, ccufing with exclamation his frailtie & light condition: & in that heat of nature he answered the imbassadour, that neither hatted, nor ambition, nor any interest particular had stirred him up to egin warre with the French king, but only the perswasions, the suggestions, and the authority of ope Leo, who (as he faid) was drawne vnto it by the Pope raigning, being at that time Cardinall Medicis, & perswaded him with great vehemency of reasons, that it was a matter of greatimortance for the publike safety and universal benefite, not to suffer the French king to possesse any Mmm 3

thing in Italy. That the same Cardinal was the author of the consederation made for that cause be. fore the death of Pope Adrian. In which respects he pronounced with great griefe, how much it troubled him, to fee the Pope, who aboue all others was bound not to be scparate from him in those dangers, wherein by his meanes he was entred, had made a change no leffe hurtfull to him. then without all necessity: that fuch reuolt & separation for the time, the place, & the whole maner and propertie of it, could be attributed to no other thing, then to a certaine feruile feare and timerous impression, such as hath fallen upon him since they within Pausa haue holden out. In this humour he forgot not to debate the meanes and fauours he had vied to increase his greatnessealwayes fince the death of Pope Leo, and specially his authority in two Conclaues together, with his perpetuall defire to transferre vpon him the foueraigne election, onely for this opinion, that by his meane might bereestablished the common liberty of Italy: and on the other side, he made collection how little the Pope might affure himselfe of the French king, and how sarre he was either to feare or to hope of his victorie: lastly, he stood vpon this conclusion, that neither for the Popes resolution which was against all good office and expectation, nor for any other accident or fortune of what condition foeuer, he would not forget nor abandon himselfes: wherein he protested, and therwithall wished, that no man should expect that for want of mony he would change or varie from his purpose, seeing he had vowed to set up as a last rest all his crownes and kingdomes, and his life withall, defiring of God that his irreuocable deliberation in the matter might not be prejudiciall to the health of his foule. To these complaints the Embassadour of Florence replied: That the Pope, fince he was raifed to the foueraigne dignity, was bound to proceed no more as Cardinall of Medicie, but to put on the person of Pope of Rome, whose office was to be carefull ouer the peace of Christendome : for which reason he had often debated with him the necessity of peace and quietnesse, and for better negociation of it, he had sent to himat two seuerall times the Archbishop of Capua, by whom he protested that by the oath and ceremonic of his office, he was bound not to be particular, but indifferent : that he had also admonished him thereof at such time as the Admirall Bonniuet departed out of Italy, hatting no better season and oportunitie to treate of peace for him and more for his honour, whereunto neuerthelesk he made him no other answer, then that he could conclude no peace without the consent of the king of England: he defired the Emperour to remember how often the Pope had diffwaded the passage and journey into Provence, both for that it troubled altogether the hope of the peace and also (herein he seemed a divine Prophet oftlings to come) the necessity wherin it would pu the French king to enter into armes, might be the occasion to stirre vp in Italy a more dangerous cobustion: That the Pope by the negotiation of the Bishop of Verona, had declared to the French king, then polletior of Millan, and also to the Viceroy, how far it concerned them to hearken to peace, but neither of them bare any inclination thereunto: That fince that time he had with many reasons, and verie great efficacy, refused to give passage through the estate Ecclesiastike, to the bands of men of warre that marched against the realme of Naples: and yet neuerthelesse the king did not only denic to heare his reasons, but also made his forces to march along the countrey o Plaisance without tarying for his answer: That for that cause he had (lastly) sent Paule Vitto rio to induce the Viceroy to a surceasing of armes vnder conditions conformable to the time, and withall to certifie him by how many reasons of necessity he was to assure himselfe of the dange imminent, feeing withall that both the Venetians flood in suspence, and also the king of England would not be concurrant in the defence of the Duchie of Millan, if at the same time both by the Emperour and by him, the warre were not moued beyond the Mounts: but seeing the Vicero made no reckening of any offers or conditions he propounded, and that the kings men of warr and armed bands aduaunced dayly, he was constrained to take faith and surety of the king with out being bound to any other thing then not to offend him. The Emperour complained of th hardnesse of the condition offred to the Viceroy, for that it restrained and bound him to leave tha which he held, not expressing any mention that the French king shold do the like: & lastly he saic that albeit the Marquis of Pelquiero in counfelling him to agreement, had fignified to him that i the campe were many disorders, & no lesse danger to his affaires, yet he could not frame his min to peace, such was his hope that through the valour of his men he should carie the victorie, if th armies came once to the triall of a battell.

All this while continued the fiege of Pania: and yet forwant of munitions they had some

what ceased to molestic with their artilleries: but to remedy that difficulty, the king having new- Ferrara and the Duke of ly received into his protection the Duke of Ferrara, with obligation to pay him threefcore & ten the French thousand duckats in ready mony, was content to accept twenty thousand of that summe in price king during and value of munitions, which he caused to be conveyed by Parma and Plaisance, vling the service the piege of of the horses and cariages of the countreymen: wherein the king was readily holpen by the com- $^{T_{49145}}$ mission and direction of the Pope, not without the complayning of the Viceroy, as though in that action he had ministred manifestly to the ayde and succors of the king: who, to the end the munitions might arriue in furety, had fent afore Iohn de Medicis with two hundred horse and fifteene hundred footmen. This Medicis coplaining in the beginning of the war, both of the seuerity of the Viceroy giving him discountenance, and also of his penury of mony, not having sufficient to make the fouldiers to march, was passed out of the Emperours pay, to the entertainement of the French king. It seemed that these forces were sufficient to assure the munitions, the rather because the Duke of Albanie was at hand, having passed at the same time the river of Paw . And albeit the Viceroy & the Marquis of Pilquiero to Itop their passage, cast a bridge neare to Cremona, & made their way ouer Paw with fix hundred me at armes & eight thousand footme, lodging the first day at Monticello: yet they gave over the enterprise & returned againe over the river, being advertised by credible espiall, that the king had given charge to the Lord Thomas de Foix, to go seeke them with one part of the army. Affoone as they were retired, the Duke of Albanie passed the Appenine alog the territories of Reggia & Garfagnana, only he marched flowly, the same confirming the opinion that was conceived that the king embraced that enterprise, more to induce with fuch seare the Emperors Captaines either to accord, or at least to abando the affaires of Lombardy, then through hope to make any great advancement. Ranse de Cere joyned withhim neare to Lucqua with a regiment of three thousand footmen who were come with the army at sea. This army as they passed, tooke by composition Sauona and Varagina: and the Nauy being estsoones returned to the west river of Genes, held in seare and bridle that City.

In the beginning of the yeare a thousand five hundred twenty and five, Don Hugo de Moncado departing from Genes with the Nauv, descended and tooke land with three thousand sootmen at Varagina, where were left in garrifon certaine bands of French footmen. But the French Nauy that was then at sea, being comanded by the Marquis Saluffe, making to the succors of that place, the other fleete retired being naked of footemen: when also the French regiments of footemen descended and left their ships, and so fiercely charged their enemies, that the whole army being broken, diverse were miserably putto the sword, and the person of Don Hugo vnfortunately taken prisoner.

In the beginning of the same yeare, the Duke of Albanie copelled the people of Lucquato contribute to him 1 2000 duckats, & to lend him certaine peeces of artilleries: with which munitions and prouisions he marched further through the lands of the Florentins, by whom he was received inamity & friendship: & in that fort did he stay with his army neare to Stenna at the Popes request, who for that neither by authority, nor with armes, he could not meete with althings that troubled him, reforted to his natural coditio, & begá to manage his purposes with art & industy. It nothing displeased him that the French should get the Duchy of Mullan, for that he made this coniecture, that whilest the Emperor & the French king abode in Italy, both the sea Apostolike and his Pontificacy shold stand affured from the ambition & greatnesse of either of them, because they would keepe jealous eyes the one ouer the other: and yet by the same reason it was grieuous to himto fee the French make a conquest of the kingdom of Naples, for feare least at one time that kingdom and the Duchy of Millan were reduced under the power and commandement of one so puissant a Prince: wherein to cast impediments against the doings and fortunes of the king, he sought occafion to stay the Duke of Albanie, & made instance to the king, that as he passed he wold readdresse and reorder the gouernement of Ssenna, which the Pope (for the oportunity and seate of that City, standing in the midway betweene Rome & Florence) defired greatly might fall into the hads of longe of his friends, like as was hapned not many monethes before by his meane & working: for as the Cardinall Petrucci dying during the Pontificacy of Adrian, his nephew Francis pretended to succeed him in the government: so by reason of his insolency, the chieftaines of Montenous being neuertheleffe of the same saction, opposed vehemently against him, and made solicitation to the Duke of Seffe the Emperours Embassadour, and to Cardinall Medicis, to give them another forme of gouernement, as either to reduce it into liberty, or else to referre the whole authority into the hands of Fabio fonne of Pandolfe Petrucci, notwithstanding somewhat before he was fecretly stolen away to Naples. This matter was long debated, and at last when Clement was elected Pope, the common confent of him and the Emperour concurring, Fabio was eftic ones reestablished in the place of his father: but both for that he had not the full authority of his father, and for the present inclination of the City bearing vinuerially to liberty, and also because the family and faction of Montenous, was neither firmely knit with him, nor of no affured agreement amongst themselves, the estate of things drew to other effects then aunswered the expectation: for, by the debility that was differented to be in the power of one only, both having no foundation. vpon the affections and good wils of the Citizens, and also holding no government absolute. and without regard to the course and maner of tyrants, there hapned one day by the incensing of his aduerfaries, a popular tumuit, by the which without the ayde of any forreiners, he was eafily driven out of the City, notwithstanding he had alwayes in the place a gard depending vpon him. The Pope making his advantage of this deuision, and reposing no confidence neither in the populars, nor in any other faction, determined to put the authority into the hands of the Montenouges, to the end after wards to create chiefe Ruler either Fubio, or any other of them that should be best agreeable to him : amatter which as when men be entered; into suspicion, they are wont for the most part to take all things in the worst part, so the manner of that dealing increased this opinion in the Imperiall Captaines, that the capitulation made betweene the Pope and the French king, contained on all fides some matter of more advantage, and a greater obligation then the band of neutrality. It hapned by the staying of the Duke of Albania vpon the cofines of Sienna, that the inhabitants there, to redeeme their domages which they received of the army, gaue a most ample voyce and authority touching the gouernement to those Citizens who were most of the Popes confidence and faction; and afterwards the Siennois sent certaine quantities of munition and money to the Duke of Albania, who passed on marching notwithstanding as flowly as he was wont, He went from Mount fiasco to Rome to speake with the Pope, and afterwards passing Tiber to Frano, he abode upon the lands of the Vrsins, where didassemble the bads offootmen that were leuied at Rome by the permiffion of the Pope, who gave femblable fufferance to the Colonnois multring at Marina for the defence of the realme of Naples, to wage regiments of footme at Rome: but both for that they advanced not much, & that vniverfally they were ill prouided of mony, there was no great accopt made of those leuies or mustrings, fince the eyes, the eares, the expectation, the spirits and contemplations of all men were altogether settled vpon the affaires of Lombardy: which pretending to one end and by diverse accidents; increased in both parties indifferently the humor of hope and feare.

The defendats ceffiry.

They that were within Pania suffred no small necessity of mony & munitions, the store of wine of Pania in ma beginning also to faile and all other forts of victuals, except bread: by reason whereof the Launce. knights affembled, and almost in maner of a tumult demaunded their payes, whereunto, besides their owne infolent dispositions, they were pushed on by the incitation of their Captaine, who was feared to have made some secrete contract with the French king. On the other side, the Duke of Burbon approched, and led with him from Germany flue hundred men at armes Burgomans, and fixe thouland Launceknights payed vpon the treasure of the king of Romaines: The Viceroy also was gone to Loda, where they meant to affemble the whole army, pretending that it shold be nothing inferiour to that of the enemies. But as there was no present store of money, and lesse expectation to get fo much as would make march the fouldiers and entertaine them: foalfo they were destitute of all hope to be ayded by the Pope or by the Florentines: neither had they confidence in the Venetians, who after many excuses and delayes, had at last aunswered Caraccioll the Pronotary, and the Emperours Embassador at Venice, that they would proceede according to the example of the Pope, by whose meane and working it was supposed that they had fecretly made a contract of nuetrality with the French king : yea it was thought, that they printly solicited the Pope, to procure to descend into Italy at their common charges, an army of ten thoufand Swiffers, to the end they should not neede to feare the victory of either of the armies. This was well allowed by the Pope, but both for want of mony, and by the cultome and property of his nature, fo flowly executed, that he fent too late into Swifferland the Bishop of Verulo to dispose the minds of the Swiffers. The

The necessities & wants of Pania were somewhat released by the industry of the Viceroy and other Captaines: for, sending cettaine victuallers of wine into the French camp, Anthode Lena having a signe made, sent out certaine troupes to offer the skirmish on that side, by which occasson the brute & alarme following, the victuallers breaking their greatest vessell, ran into Pania with a litle vessell inclosed in the great, and wherein were bestowed 3000 duckats: which though it did not to the full remedy their wants, yet it wrought such an operation of comfort amongst the, that the Launceknights seeing by that litle summe the difficulty to send them mony, bare afterwards with more patience their other extremities, wherein also the death of their Captaine did conueniently concurre at the same instant. It was believed that Anthode Lena procured him to be poysoned, to the end to take away both the matter and occasions of tumults. In this time the Marquis of Pesquero went to incampe before Casciano, where were in garmson fifty horsemen and source hundred Italian footmen, whom he compelled to render themselves to discretion.

After the Duke of Burbon was arrived with his Launceknights, there was nothing that more retayned the Captaines (being very carefull ouer the danger of Pauia) then the want of mony, fuch as they had not only wherewith to pay the regiments of the men of warre, but also there was not to defray necessarily the conduction of the munitions and artilleries. In this necessity, they were driven to have recourse to perswasions, wherein they forgot not to recommend to the bands of footemen, the glory and riches which the victory would cast upon them, and reducing to their memory the reputation of their coquelts pall, they labored also to inflame their minds with the fire of enuy and hatred against the Frenchmen . By which commemoration of glory and profite, they brought the Spanish tootmen to make promise that they would follow the army one whole moneth more without receiving any money: and the Launceknights were contented with that which should suffice for the provision of their nurriture and necessary victuals. But they found nany difficulties to winne the men at armes and light horsemen being lodged in the townes of Cremona and Guiaradadda: they alleaged, that having received no money of long time, it would ne grieuousto them to follow the army, where of necessity they must be driven to buy victuals o nourish themselues, and forrage to feede their hosses: they brought also into complaint this niury, that their paines and seruice was holden lesse acceptable and recommended, then the inantery, to whom neuertheleffe had bene made many distributions of money, without releening of them with one penny of long time. In which griefe they forgot not to infinuate their many meits, and making comparison of their reputation and valor, much lesse that they yeelded to be infeior to the infantery either in valor or fidelity, but they challenged place about them, both by heir nobility and for their deleruings past, It was necessary for the expedition of the service to reppease this murmire, & by some present industry to reassure the minds that began so manifestly o shake; which office the Marquis of Pefquiero tooke vpon him, who travelling to their paricular lodgings, vied those meanes that best agreed with the state of the matter he had in hand, aking his observation of the wife Philition, who having found out the humor that offenderh, repareth that ministration & medicine that is most apt to cure and remedy: somtimes he served is turne with excuses, which in such cases have their operation, and sometimes he whetted them in with words of comfort, which to minds wavering give no litle edge and reviving : fortimes ie reprehended them, which according to the persons might worke some notable office, & some imes he confessed the equity of their complaints, wherein he ouercame their generall griefe with is proper compassion. And having thus by the singularity of his wit and industry, reduced to moeration their present murmures and discontentments, he followed his purpose with new incouigements, that by how much more they stood to make their vertue apparant, and their valor maifelt, by so much more were they bound not to suffer so noble harts to be ouer come by an estate f infantery or footenien, either in fidelity or affection to the Emperor. And as the prefent quarall did not concerne the glory and honor of the Emperour alone, but also the successe of the conition and whole estate of Italy was concurrant, so if they expressed not their readinesse and vaor equall with the greatnesse of the occasion offered, they could hardly acquire the expectation nat was conceived of them, but fitting downe with dishonor & infamy, they would leave to the mperour an unthankefuil recompence for his benefits past Lastly he told them, that seeing they ad so many times offered their lives to hazard in the Emperours quarels, and no leffe often had rade waie by their vertue thorough all perils of warre and fortune for his fake, it could not but intangle with shame and infamy the memory of their merites past, if now they should refuse to go to the warre for fo vile a thing as a small quantity of money. What by these perswasions, and the authority of the Marquis, they confented to receive for one moneth a small allowance of pay: infomuch that the whole army being thus affembled, which was supposed to containe feuen hundred men at armes, as many light horsemen, a thousand Italian footemen, and more then fixteene thousand Spanish Launceknights: they brake vp from Loda the flue and twentieth of Ianuarie, and marched the same day to Marignan, making as though they would draw towards Mullan, either to make the king, being touched with the daunger of that City, to leavie his siege from before Pana, or else to gine cause to the souldiers to go from Mullan that were there in garrison. Neuerthelesse having afterwards passed the river of Lambra neare to Vidigosso, they tooke manifelly the way to Paula. The king payed in his army thirteene hundred Launces, ten thousand Swiffers, foure thousand Launceknights, fine thousand Frenchmen, and seuen thoufand Italians: and yet what thorough the abuses and robberies of his Captaines, and corruption and negligence of his officers, the numbers of the footemen were farre leffe. Theodor Trinulce lay in garrison within Millan with three hundred launces, fixe thousand sootemen Grisons and Valesiens, and three thousand Frenchmen. But assoone as the king discerned that the Imperials turned towards Paura, he renoked to the army all the regiments of footemen, except two thousand.

Assoone as the army of the imperials had taken the field the French king began to deuise what was best to be done: and calling to counsell his Captaines, Trimouille, Palisa, and Monsieur de Forx with many others, aduised him to retire his army from before Paula, and to go incampeeither in the monastery of Charterhouse, or at. Binasquo, which are places of good strength, and likewife are found many such in the countrey there, for the oportunity of the channels deriving, and do ferue for the watering of medowes. They told him that in taking this courfe, he should speedily cary the victory without bloud or danger, the wants and necessities of his enemies not suffering them to hold out many dayes, but would constraine them either to dissolue, or disperse their companies into seucrall villages: That the Launceknights that were within Pania, to the end to cut offallimputation that they fought to couer their feare and timerousnesse with the excuse that they were not payed, were content to beare with patience the prolonging of their payes for many moneths: but affoone as they faw the fiege removed, they would in infolency demand their payes, & not finding in their Captaines any affured meanes to latisfie them, and leffe expectation to entertaine them with credible hopes, it was to be feared they would draw to fome daungerous tumult: That the enemies with no other thing kept themselves so orderly together, but with hope to give speedily the battel, but when they should see the war drawne out into longnesse, & the comodity of offering the battell not presented, the their expectation wold be frustrate, & the whole army replenished with difficulties & confusion: That it could not be but daungerous to remaine betweene a towne wherein were flue thousand footenen of a most warlike nation, and an army that came to rescue it, which was no lesse mighty in numbers of men, valour and experience of Captaines and fouldiers, then brane and resolute by the glory of their victories obtayned in times past, and who now had reposed all their hopes in the battell. That in warres it was no shame to flie, when the flying profiteth him that giveth place to his adversary: That there could be no infamy in a retraite that was made by discretion and not by timerousnesse, when it is done vpon this confederation, not to put in doubt things that be certaine, and when in the iffue & successe of the warre is to be expressed to all the world the maturity of the counsell: That there is no victory more profitable, more honourable, nor more glorious, then that which is obtayned without the doniage, the spoyle, and bloud of fouldiers: Lastly that the first and chie se commendation of the discipline of warre confissed in this, that a Generall should not oppose his army to daungers without necessity, and rather with industry and patience to reuerse and make vaine the enterprises of his aduersaries, then through valour & courage to hazard the battell, which sortune and accidents may make doubtfull. The Pope concurred in the same counsell, & fignified no lesse to the French king though not so much for the kings interests, yet for the necessity of his owne affaires, for that the Marquis of Pelquiero being not without his feare in so great a necessity, had aduertifed afore hand the difficulties of the Emperors army to be fuch, as they almost cut from him all hopes of happy fuccesse: neuerthelesse the king(a destiny ineuitable can not be au oyded)who

in his deliberations followed only the counsels of the Admirall, seemed to set before his eyes rather The French the rumors of men and brutes varying for enery light accident, then the firme and affured fub- king will not Stance of the effects of things: he interpreted it to a great shame and infamy, that an army royall follow the counled by his owne person, should shew more feare then valour, and basely give place to the com-fels of his Capming of the enemies, wherein he was also pushed on by this vaine suggestion; that he was bound to follow and performe with deedes, the words that his rash tongue had vainely promised; a resolution most vndiscreete and dishonorable to a Captaine; for, both he had vnder protestation assured all the world, and many times fignified by messengers into Fraunce & al the parts of Italy, that he would sooner chuse to sacrifice himselfe to death, then to retire from before Pausa without the victory:he flood fixed vponthefe hopes, that in the place where he incamped, he might eafily fortifie himselfe to auoy dall inconveniences by surprise: That through want of money every small delay, or the least necessity that might drive the enemies to temporise, would put them into disorder, and having no meane to get victuals but by ravine and pillage, they could not remaine long in one lodging: Lastly he hoped to give impediment to the victuals that were to come to their camp, whereof he knew the greatest part was appointed from Cremona, wherein he was furthered by this helpe, that he had newly taken into his pay John Lodowike Palnoysin, either to the end he should impatronize himselfe vpon Cremona, where was a very slender garrison, or at least to lie to cut off the suretie of victuals that had an ordinary traffike from that city to their campe.

For these reasons the king stood resolute not to leave the siege of Pauia, and to have the better way to impeach that the enemies should not enter, he dislodged in other maner, and gaue another forme to the incamping of his army : for the king was lodged before in the Abbey of Saint Lanfranke, situated about a mile and an halfe beyond Pauia, beyond the way that leadeth from Paula to Millan, and ypon the river of Thesin neare to that place where was proved the diversion of the waters: Monfieur Palissa with the vantgard & the Smiffers lay within the suburbes neare S. Instines gate, having fortified himselfe in the Churches of S. Peter, S. Apolline, and S. Ierome: and John de Medicis with his horsemen and regiments of sootemen, was bestowed in the Church of Saint Sautor. But now, the king having information that the enemies were departed from Loda, he went & incamped within the Parke in the right fumptuous & stately house of Mirabell, situate on this fide Paula, leaving at S. Lanfrank the Grisons footnien, & yet changed not the lodging of the vantgard. At last the person of the king was lodged in the monasteries of S. Paule, & S. lames, places befides other commodities, very eminent and neare Pania, & command the champion, but are formwhat without the ring of the Parke. In the kings place M.d' Alenson with the areargard went to incampe at Mirabell: and as for their more convenient succouring one another, they brake downe on that fide the parke wall, to they held and commanded betweene them all that space or circuit that stretcheth towards Thesinon that side below, and until the way that leadeth to Millantowards aboue: so that holding Pausa environed on all sides, and having also at their devotion the rivers of Gravalone, Thesin, and Touretta, which is right against Darsina, the Imperials could not enter Paula, vnleffe they paffed the river of Thefin, or elfe made their entry by the Parke. The king for the managing of the army, reposed himselse wholly vpon the counsels of the Admirall: he had fingular confidence in his fidelity, & so absolutely referred things to his direction, that he dispensed with himselfe and passed the most part of his houres in idlenesse and vaine pleasures, without any fludy or care of his affaires, or once to thinke upon expeditions of importance: wherein such was either his wilfull negligence or willing partiality, that if at any time he sate in counsell amongst them, he would referre the sentece & resolution of all things to the Admirall, without accepting the aduife of other experienced Captaines. By him were ordered all theskings deliberatios, though at times he suffered his eares to be governed by Anne Monimerancy and Philip Chabot Lord of Bryon, personages very agreeable to him in his sports, but of slender experience touching matters of warre. Moreover the estate and numbers of his army were not according to his defire and opinion, and much leffe aunswering to the brute that went for, one part of his horsemen being gone with the Duke of Albanie, & another part left for the gard of Millan with Theodor Triunlee, and many also being dispersed into seuerall villages and boroughs thereabouts, there was not found in the campe aboue eight hundred Launces; and touching the footemen the numbers were fatte leffe then was supposed, as well by the negligence of the kings officers, as thorough the deceit of the Captaines, of whom the greatest abusers were the Italians, who not withstanding they received payes for great numbers offootemen, yet their bandes were farre from their full complements, many of the French Captaines tooke counsell also by their corruptions: and lastly the regiment of two thousand Valesiens that were bestowed at Saint Sauior betweene Saint Lanfranke and Pania, being studdenly affaulted by those that were within, were dispersed and broken.

The Imperials S. Angeo.

In this estate of affaires, the Captaines Imperial having passed Lambray, they made their apsake the Castell proches to the Castell S. Angeo, which having his situation betweene Loda and Pania, would have given great impediments to the course of victuals that were brought from Loda to their campe if it had not bene at their deuotion and in their power: Pirrhus, the brother of Federike de Boffolo lay there in garrison with two hundred horse, and eight hundred sootmen, and the king not many dayes before, to the end he would not raffily commit his people to daunger, had fent to vifite and confider the place the same Federske and lames Chabanes, who brought report that that strength and garrison sufficed for the desence of the place: but experience made it knowne immediatly after, how farre they were deceived in their reckening, for assoone as Ferdinad d'Aualo made his approches with the regiments of Spanish footmen, and had cut off with his artilleries, certaine defences and refistances, the feare of the defendants became greater then their valor, and in those humors of timerous cowardife, they retired the fame day into the Castell: and not many howers after (feare hath a vehement operation in the minds it possesset) they compounded that Pirrhus. Emilio Boriano, and the three sons of Phebus Gonfaguo, should remaine prisoners and all the refidue depart the place, without armor and horse, and being sworne not to beare armes for one moneth against the Emperor. In this time the king sent for from Sanona a regimet of two thousand Italian footmen, parcell of those companies that had bin at the siege of Marseilles: but being come vpon the territories of Alexandria neare the river of Vrba: Gaspar Maine lying there in garrison with a regiment of feuen hundred footmen, issued out of Alexandria with a very slender strength, and fet yoon them: he found them very weary with the long way they had made, & without gard, for that they doubted no daunger by reason of which aduantages he disordered and brake them eafily, and in their feare being fled within the Castell, they rendred themselves immediately with feuenteene Enfignes. There hapned no better successe to the enterprise that was committed to the charge of lohn Lowis Paluoisin: who, after he was entred with foure hundred horse & two thoufand footmen within Cafalmaior, where was no wall, but ran parts which he had made, & having afterwards won S. lohn in Croce, he began from that place to make incursions into the countrey, laboring with all the meanes he could to cut offtheir victuals. By reason of which violences, Francis Sforce lying then within Cremona, leavied with great celerity foureteene hundred footme, and fent them to Cafalmaior with certaine troupes of horsmen of the band of Rodolfo Camerino and the horfmen of his gard, under the leading of Alexander Bentinole. As they were drawne neare to that place, Paluoysin reposing confidence in the aduantage of his numbers without tarying for certaine succours of Francis Rangon, issued out the eighteene of February and occupied skirmish with them: but he payed a deare price of his rashnesse, & fell by equity into the punishment of his hasty rashnesse, for that in laboring to sustaine his troupes that fought & bega to draw to retraite, he was striken from his horse and made prisoner, and all his souldiers broken and dispersed. There was also added to the affaires of the French king, this further difficulty of great consequence: tohn Ia. Medicis of Millan Captaine of the Castell of Mus, whither the Duke of Millan had sent him for the murder he had done of the person of Monsieur Viscounte, having placed by night an ambush on the side of the rocke of Chiauenna standing upon a hill side at the head of the lake, and formwhat dillant from the houses of the borough: tooke the Captaine prisoner as he walked without his Castell, & led him presently before the gate of the rocke, where threatning to kill him if he put not the rocke into his hands, his wife in whole presence his life was threatned to death, deliuered up the rocke. After this first fortune, he caused to discouer another ambush with three hudred footmen with whom he tooke the towne making his entry by the Castell. Whereupon it hapned that the Cantons of the Grisons, taking suspition vpon that accident, reuoked a litle before the battell, the regiment of fixe thousand Grisons that were in the kings army.

About this time, arrived in the Imperial army, the knight Cafalo, whom the king of England fent thirher with great promifes : that king beginning to be lealous ouer the prosperity of the French king, & pulhed on also with a certaine despite that in the Scottish seas the French had taken

certaine vessels of the English, threatned manifestly to make warre vpon Fraunce, and in that humour desired the well advancing of the Imperial army: in which forwardnessels of disposition, he sent to his Embassador Pace remayning at Trent, to go to Vence, and protest in his name the observation of the League, to the which his Masesty hoped they would be so much the more easily induced, by how much the Emperour had sent to the Viceror the investigation of Francis Sforce, with authority to dispose of it by his discretion, and according to the necessity and respect of his affaires. The king of England also solicited the Pope by his Embassador to minister ayde to the Emperour in his affaires; but the Pope excused him vpon the capitulation made with the French king for his owne surety, and not offending the Emperour, whereunto he added this complaint, that since the army was returned from Provence, he was not able in the space of twenty dayes to vindesstand their purposes, nor whether they pretended to defend or abandon the estate of Millan.

But now, litle availed the treaties and intelligences of Princes, and of lesse service were the ne- The Imperials gotiations and labors of Embassadors, for that by the affronting and approching of the armies, the draw neare to whole effate of the war, together with the difficulties and daungers fuffained for many moneths, Pana. were reduced to the fortune and hazard of a very few houres; for the army Imperiall pathing further fince the taking of S. Angeo, marched and lodged the first day of February at Vistarino, and the fecond day at Larding no and S. Alexis beyond the litle tiner of Lolono: alodging distant from Paula foure miles, and from the French campe three miles. The third of February they marched towards the gate of S. Iustine, the place of their incamping being stretched out betweene Prati, Treleuero, la Motto, and a wood on the fide of S. Lazarus, places within two miles and a halfe of Paula, within halfe a mile of the French vaunt gard, & not halfe a mile fro the rampiers & trenches' of their camp: by reason they were so neare affroted one the other, they escaped not without their feuerall domages by the artilleries. The Imperials commanded Beluyenfe, with all the villages & country that lay vpó their backes, except S. Colombin where lay a garrison of French, but so thraitly befreged as no person could iffue out. They found within S. Angeo & Belioyeus great quantities of victuals, and to have more plenty and abundance, they labored to command Thefin, as they did Paw, by the commodity of which they gave impediment to the French victuals. They held Saint Crosse, and albeit the French king at that time when he went to incampe at Mirabelt had abandoned the Charterhouse, yet they forbare to go thither, least their market of victuals should be cut off. The Frenchmen kept S. Luzarus, but the fully of the artilleries of the enemies put them in feare to abide there. There was betweene the two campes a litle brooke or river of running water called Vernacula: his head or spring was within the parke, and from thence making his course in the middest betweene S. Lazarus and S. Feter in Verge, hath his fall afterwards into the river of Thefin: This brooke the Imperials to the end they might come on with leffe difficulty, labored to passe, as a matter of great importance: but they found a valiant defence made by the Frenchmen, having both the ayd of the channell which was very deepe, and the commodity of the shores or bankes that were very high. By which impediments there was no possibility of passage without great difficulty: every one with that art & care that the perill required, fortified their lodging and quarter: The kings lodging had in front, in backe, and in the left flanke, thicke and huge ramparts, enuironed with ditches & tortified with bastillios: & on the right flanke was the wall of the parke of Pania, which was supposed to make the lodging very strong: The lodgings of the Imperials caried the same forme of fortificatio, having also the liberty of the whole countrey from S. Lazarus drawing towards Belioyeuse, even vntill the river of Paw, which ministred to them great abundance of victuals. Betweene the ramparts of both the one & other lodging, was no more distance then xl.pafes, and the baffillions fo neare neighbours, that the finall fhot played in great liberty. Thefe two armies were thus lodged and incamped the eight day of February: and albeit they loft no time in skirmifhing, yet euery one kept himfelfe within his fort, not willing to do any thing to his disaduatage. The Imperiall Captaines made their reckening, that they had gained much til that day being approched so neare Pauia, that if it came to a day of battell, they might be aided with the garrifons that were within he towne. And because the souldiers within Pania suffered want of munitions, the Imperials ventred to fend in fifty horfmen, euery one carying in croupe or behind him,a litle bag full of powder: who taking by night the way of Millan, and obseruing the instant wherein their campe by a token given should give the alarme to the Frenchmen, they got safely into Pania, their fortune being nothing inferiour to their valor, Antho. de Leua made many fallies out of the towne, bringing with him in diverse maners many harmes & domages to the enemies, in one of which fallies he charged those that had the gard of the borough of S. Lanfranke, whom he did not only defeate & breake, but also with the same selicity tooke from them three peeces of artilleries, & foure wagons laden with munitions. In this condition it was wonderfull to behold what was the fludy, the industry, & perpetuall toyle of body & mind of the Marquis of Pelquiero, who omitted no oportunity wherein occasio was giue to vex the enemy, sonitimes prouoking the with skirmifhes, fomtimes trauelling the with alarmes, & neuer ceaffing to keepe them awaked either with vndermining, intrenching, or raifing of mounts to annoy them. They caused to erect a cauallier or mount upon the channel: & for that the Frenchme with two peeces of artilleries planted upon S. Lazarus, made dangerous executio of those that wrought vpo it, they planted there certaine peeces which reuerled the fayd place of S. Lazarus & compelled the French to abandon it. And as the artilleries of this cauallier annoyed them much, so also they were no lesse beaten by another mount or cauallier which they had made within Pauia. Befides, the Spaniards had fo fortified theselues with bastillions & ramparts, & other preparatives desensive, that they had great meane to greeue the French Campe, without receiuing much offence thefelues: for which caufe the Frenchmen removed their artilleries to beate them in the flanke, the Spaniards not ceaffing for all that to advance & come on, & to win advantage by footmeale: & in this estate of proceedings in such a neare neighborhood & affronting of the armies, the skirmifhes were very rife, wherein the Frechmen for the most part caried the worse: & yet the practises and negociatios of truce did nothing cease, being cotinually solicited by the Popes Nuncios resident in both the armies: to whom were adiouned many of straite familiaritie & fauor with the king, who ceassed not to admonish him, the Popes counsell also concurring, that to aboyd so great a perill it were his best to retire his army fro before Pania, by which meane the victory could not but fall vpo him with facility, & without effusion of bloud, the rather by the necessities of the enemies, suffring the great want of mony. The xvij, dayes of February the fouldiers within Pausa made a fally, & charged the regiment of John de Medicus, who gave them a brave repulse, & with no lesse valor compelled them to retire: but immediatly afterwards as he returned to shew to the Admiral the place of the incounter, with relatio of things as they passed, certaine loose shot lurking in a house, gave him a wound with the bullet a litle about the heele which brake the bone, for the curing of which hurt he was constrained to be caried to Plaufance. This was an vnfortunate hurt, or else vnhappily chanced on that ma for that like as immediatly after his wounding, the fury of the french campe in skirmifhing and affaultit gibegan to diminish & abate, so it seemed to give to them of Paula a greater and more ready resolutio, for that their fallies were more familiar and furious, in which vehement inclination they burned the Abbey of S. Lanfrark & ceasied not ficturely to execute the Frenchme, taking aduatage of the diminution of their courage & fortune. In fo much that the night betweene the xix. & xx. day of February, the Marquis of Pefquiero iffuing out with a regimet of three thousand Spanish footme, assaulted the French bastillions, and winning the ramparts, he flue more then fine hundred footemen, and cloyed three peeces of artilleries.

It was now not possible to the Imperiall Captaines any longer to maintaine their army in that place, for want of money: They considered also that if they should breake up and retire, the essible to from would not onely remaine desperate, but also there would be left little hope to be able to defend their other peeces which they possessing in the Duchy of Millen: There was also in themall a wonderfull considence to obtaine the victory, both for the resolution and valour of their soludiers, and also through the infinite disorders in the French annie, and the insolent departing away of directe of their sootemen, in so much as the bodies to fight did not by farre aunswere the numbers that were involled in their pay-bookes. Therefore partly to determine these dissiputies, and partly to follow the humour of their hopes, the night before the sine and twentieth of Februaric, a cay dedicated by the Christians to the Aposses Marthias, and also the day of the Nativitie of the Emperour, they determined to march to Marabell, where lay incamped certaine companies of horsemen and sootemen. In this march they slood upon this intention, that if the Frenchmen moved, then they had feat a libertie the slege of Pavia: and if they moved not, then to adventure the fortune of the battell. Therefore the better to advance this determination, all the beginning of the night they gave many alarmes, the more to keepe travelled and weaty the Frenchmen, making semblance as though they would charge them on that fidetowards Paw, The fin, and S. Lazarus, and about midnight enery fouldier, by the commandement of the Captaines, put on a white castakin ouer his armour to be knowne from the Frenchmen: they were cast into two squadrons of horsmen, & foure of footemen: in the first were fixethousand tootmen equally compounded of Launceknights, Spaniards & Italians: This squadron was led by the Marquis of Guaft: the second stood onely vpon certaine bands of Spanish footmen under the charge of the Marquis of Pesquiero: the third and fourth squadron were of Launceknights commanded by the Viceroy and the Duke of Burbon: they attitued at the Parke wals certaine houres before day, and by the working of their Masons and ready wils of their souldiers, they cast downe to the earth threescore fadom of wall: by which breach being entred within the Parke, the first fquadron drew towards Mirabell, and the refidue of the army tooke the way to the campe. Affoone as the king understood that they were entred the Parke, thinking they would draw to Marabell, he issued out of his lodging to fight in plaine and open field, desiring to draw the battell rather to that place then to any other, for the aduantages which it gaue to the horfmen: he commanded to turne the artilleries towards the enemies, which beating them in flanke, brought great domageto the arearegard: but in the meane while, the battell of the Imperials gaue a furious charge youn the kings iquadron which ordinarily was the battell, but as the Spaniards went, it was the arearegard. The king fought valiantly, and fullayned with great courage the violence of his enemies, who with the fury of their harquebuziers constrained his men to give ground, vntill the refere of the Swiffers came, when the Spaniards were repulled as well by them as by the horsmen that charged them in flanke. But the Viceroy being called in by the Marquis of Pelquiero, who brought to the fight his Launceknights, they were cafily broken, not without great flughter of the Swiffers, who that day did nothing answer the opinion of valour which aforetimes they had wont so honorably to expresse in battels. The king kept alwayes the middle of the battell, being environed with a great gard of men at armes, & albeit he did what he could to containe and confirme his people, yet after he had fought long with his owne hands, his horse being flaine under him, himselfelightly hurt in the face and in the hand, he was striken downe to the earth and taken prisoner by five fouldiers that knew not what he was. In which misfortune the Viceroy pressing into the throng, his Maiesty disclosed himselfe to him, who, with great reuerence kiffed his hand and received him prisoner in the Emperors name. At the same time the Marquis of Guaft with the first squadron, had defeated the horsemen that were at Mirabell, and Anthony de Lena, who as was fayd, had to that end cast downe to the earth so great a quantity and space of wall, as an hundred and fifty horsemen might fally forth in front, issued out of Pania, and so charged the Frenchmen behind, that he put them wholly to flight: and in that fearethey were almost all ftripped and truffed, except the arearegard of the horsemen, which being led by Atonsieur d' Alenson from the beginning of the battell, retired almost whole. It is holden for certaine, that in this battell were flaine more then eight thousand men of the French campe, part by the sword. & part of bodies drowned in the river of Thefin feeking their fafety by swimming: of this generall number were about twenty of the most noble & apparant Lords of France, as the Admirall, the L. lames Chabanes, the L. Palissa and Trimouille, the Mailter of the horse, Monsieur d'Aubigny, Monsieur de Bussy, and Monsieur del'Escud, who being taken grieuously wounded by his enemies, gaue to them his life in steede of a ransome: The prisoners that were taken were the king of Nauarre, the bastard of Sauoy, the L. Montmerancy, Saint Paule, Brion, Aual, Monsieur de Chandiou, Monsteur d'Imbercourt, Galeas Viscount, Federske Bossolo, Barnabie Viscount, Gusdanes, with many Gentlemen, and almost all the Captaines that escaped the slaughter of the sword: there was also taken prisoner Ierome Leandro Bishop of Brunduso the Popes Nuncio, but by commandement of the Viceroy, he was efttloones fet at liberty: as also Monsieur Saint Paule and Federike Boffolo committed to the Castell of Pama, brake prison a little after by the corruption of the Spannerds that shad them in charge. Of the Imperials side the universall slaughter exceeded not 700 bodies, and not one Captaine of name except Ferrand Castriot Marquis of S. Angeo. The Marquis of Pelquiero was wounded intwo places, & Antho, de Lena lightly hurt in the leg. The pray & spoyle of this battell was so great, as there had not bin seene in Italy more rich souldiers. Of so great an army, there was prescrued but the arearegard of 400 Launceknights commanded by M.d' Alenson, they never came to the fight, never suffred charge, nor never were followed, but Nnn 2

leauing behind them their baggage, they retired whole to Piemont, their feare making them more hasty to fly, then carefull of their honor. And as one calamity followeth another, so the losse of the battell was no sooner reported at Millan, then Theodor Trinulce who lay there in garrison with foure hundred launces, departed and tooke his way to Musocquo, all the souldiers following him by troupes, infomuch as the same day that the king lost the battell, all the Duchy of Atillan was made free from the jurisdiction of the French.

The day after the victory, the king was led prisoner to the Rocke of Pisqueton, for that the Duke of Millan in regard of his proper furety, consented hardly that the person of the king should be kept within the Castell of Millan: he was garded with great lealousie and watch, but in all other things except his liberty, he was ysed and honoured as appertained to the estate and

SIXTEENTH BOOKE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT.

T He Pope is accorded with the Emperor. Many practifes are made for the kings delinery. Ierome Moron conspireth against the Emperour. The king is delivered out of prison and returneth into Frannce.

N the booke before, you have feene fet downe the overthrow of the French army in the battell of Pania, a wretched successe, where was so great expectation of victory: you have feene a mightie king delivered vp prisoner into the hands of him with whom he contended for glory & imperie; a spectacle most tragicall amongstall the calamities that fortune bringeth vpon mans mortality : you have seene the most part of the Nobility and honourable Captaines of Fraunce slaine in the service and pre-A sence of their king; a matter that made more lamentable his owne condition and aduerfity: you have feene the refidue of that army, so vniverfally perplexed with feare and confusion, that the fame thing that should have retained them in so great affliction, made them the leffe affured and further off from confidence. Lastlyyou have seene the loose hearts and pusillanimity of the Swiffers, a nation which in the warrespast, had fought in Italy with fo great name and glory. But the thing that most wonderfully increased the reputation of the victors, was the generall feare and aftonishment of all the Potentates in Italy, who looking into the fecility of the Imperials, carying so honourable a victory with so little losse to themselves, great fearefor could not but make a desperate reckening of their owne safeties. In which astonishment, they set before their eyes all those dangers which either doubt or dispaire could fir vp their feare would not let them hope for the things that reasonably might comfort them: and whatsoever their amazed minds suspected, the same did they seare would assuredly happen vnto them. Lastly when they faw themselues disarmed on all sides, and the Emperors forces most mighty in the field without impediment of enemies, they could not but give a grieuous sentence against their owne eflate and condition: and in this confusion they could not be so, much affured and comforted by the opinion which many had of the good intention of the Emperor, of his honorable inclination to peace, and of his vertuous mind not to viurpe the estates of others, as their passions were redoubled by the confideration of their great dangers, most manifest to the eye, and no lesse fearefull to their minds, in which lay suppressed all that resolution and constancy which reasonable men should expresse chiefly in times of adversities: They doubted least the Emperor, pushed on either by ambition (naturall almost to all earthly Princes) or by infolency (which commonly accompanieth victories) or caried by the importunate couctousnesse of those that governed his affaires in Italy, or aftly fet on by the vniuerfall perswasions of his Counsell and court: They doubted I say, least in thefe vehement respects, and in an occasion so sufficient to set an edge ypon the dullest spirit that was, he would dispose his thoughts to make himselfe absolute Lord ouer all Italy: wherein they were not ignorant how easie it is to every great Prince, but much more to an Emperor of Rome, o iustifie his enterprises with titles appearing comely & reasonable. This feare and astonishment did not onely occupy those Potentates that were of meane force and authority, but also even the Pope and the Venetians were no leffe trauelled then the others. The Venetians began to call into emorfe and conscience, the fault they had committed against the Emperour without just cause, in notfollowing the capitularions of the confederation: and allo the memory of ancient hatreds and njuries betweene them and the house of Austrich, together with the great warres they had had not many yeares before with his grandfather Maximilian: by which they feared would be reuired in the estates which they possessed in the firme land, the name and memory of the rights of he Empire which were almost buried and forgotten: as also they cast this coniecture, that whoocuer had any purpose to make himselfe great in Italy, would have his first recourse to lay plots o embale and pull downe their too much puissance and greatnesse. And for the Pope, his passion was this, that except the maiesty of the Popedome which even in the times of the auncient reveence that the world bare to the fea Apostolike, was oftentimes ill assured of the greatnesse of the Emperours, he was in all other regards very easie to be endomaged, as being disarmed of forces, leprined of money, the Church in an uninerfall weakenesse for want of strong townes, the minds of the people not vnited nor firme in denotion to their Prince, all the free holds and dependances of the Church full of divisions and factions, the one part being Guelfes, & the other part Gebelins, and the Gebelus by an ancient and naturall impression, inclined to the name of the Emperours; adiately the City of Rome more then all other places, defiled and weakened with these seedes nd rootes of divisions. The Pope also called into care and reckening the estate of Florence, which lepending upon him, and being the very peculiar and ancient greatnesse of his house, it was hapy no lesse deare to his heart then the estate of the Church, and assuredly no lesse easie to be inlouated and changed: for as that City, fince the passage of king Charles, having chased out the amily of Medicis, and vnder the name of liberty, was divolued to a government popular for ighteene yeares space, stood so ill contented with the returne of the Medices, that there were vey few to whom indeede was agreeable their puissance and greatnesse: so also the Pope seared chemently least to so mighty occasions, were added a forward will and defire to oftend that tate. Wherein also lie had reason to doubt that that same defire and enuy was not lesse, not so nuch for the regard of ambition in the most mighty, from which who is least puissant, is never vholly affured, as for feare that for many reasons, his name in that time were not odious to the Emperor: and albeit he made discourses in himselfe how much, both in the life of Pope Leo, and fterwards fince he was Cardinall, he had travelled for the greatnesse of the Emperour, so farre oorth as Pope Leo and he with their great expences and dangers, had opened him the way in 1alyto fo great a puissance, and that for his owne particular, fince his election to the Popedome, he ad given mony to his Captaines, & made the Florentins to contribute during the Admirals being n Italy, without renoking from his army the regiments of the Church and the bands of Florence: et, either in confideration of his office, wherein he is a father and pastour indifferent betweene Princes Christian, and rather the author of peace then the nourisher of warres: or else for that he adbegunne very lately to suspect and feare such a greatnesse, he was retired, and so given over orun the same fortune, that neither he would renew the consederation made by his predecessor or the defence of Italy, neither ayde him with money when the yeare before the Duke of Burbon ntred with his army into Prouence. And albeit those matters had not given the Emperors Capaines any just cause to complaine, seeing he was not as yet bound by the League of Adrian to be concurrant against the Frenchmen in the warres of Italy: yet they were beginnings to make him Nnn 3

not esteemed the same man with the Emperour, but diminished much of the faith that til that day they had in him, as men who caried onely either by their appetites or by necessitie, thought themfelues offended, if, to their particular enterprises dressed to occupie Fraunce, others did not as it were lay to their hands, according to the exaples before of others begun, under title to affure Italy against the power of the French. The complaints and displeasures began to discouer themselves at fuch times as the French K.passed the mounts to recouer the Duchy of Millan: for, albeit the Pope according to the coplaint he made afterwards to the Emperor, by a letter which he wrote to him, had secretly distributed certaine quantities of mony to the Frenchmen at their returns from Marfeilles, yet afterwards he had no straite familiaritie or intelligence with them: but as soone as the king had made a conquest of the Citie of Millan, he entred into capitulations with him, taking his reason upon the good event and traine of his affaires; of which he excused himself to the Emperour with this allegation, that in that time, his Captaines forbearing to communicate with him any part of their plots or purposes by the space of twentie dayes, and dispairing afterwards of the preferuation of that flare, not without some seare of the kingdome of Naples, for that the Duke of Albany drew with his regiments towards Tu/cane: he was constrained to looke to his surcty, and yet neuertheleffe the regard of his proper daunger did not so much cary him, but that he did accord with conditions no leffe fauourable and prouiding for the Emperors affaires then his owne, and did refuse very great offers which the French king tendred, to the end to make him enter into the alliance joyntly with him. And yet neuerthelesse these excuses had not such operation, but that the Emperour and his Captaines were much troubled, not fo much for that they faw themfelues wholy deprined of hope to have any more fuccours of him, as for the doubt they had that the capitulation contayned not some further matter then the obligation of neutrality. Besides, they construed that in all forces he had given too great reputation to the enterprise of the Frenchmen, and had this further feare also, least the Pope were the meane that the Venetians were not brought to follow his example; a matter which afterwards was differned to be true by certaine letters and billes found in the kings tent after the victorie. Laftly the Pope had kindled these fuspitions and discontentments when he consented that the munitions lent by the Duke of Ferrara to the French king when he lay afore Paula, should not onely passe through his lands, but also he gaue ay de to the conduction of them. But much more were these quarrels broached at fuch time as the Duke of Albanie went to the enterprise of the Realme of Naples, not onely for that he was received and honored as a friend along all the effates of the Church and the Florentines, but also he stayed certaine dayes about Stemma to reforme at his instance the government of that city; which albeit was the cause to prolong the Dukes voyage into the realme of Naples, and that it was a matter folicited principally by him to that end, as being a thing troblesome to him, that vpon one man should be layd the iurisdiction of Naples & Atillan: yet the Imperials in that respect had made an interpretation, that betweene the French king & him was a further bond, then a fimple promise notto offend one another. So that it was not without good reason that the Pope did not only feare to gether with the other Potentates, to be inuaded by the Imperials ypon enery concurrance of time and occasion, but also he had his seare particular, that without expecting an oportunity more great, they would bring on their fortune presently even to set you the estate of the Church, or to execute fome action against the common-weale of Florence. But the thing which more redoubled his feare, was, that the Duke of Albame affoone as he was aductified of the kings calamity, retired from the Mount Rotona's towards Braccians for his fafety: and having also fent thither a cornet of an hundred and fifty hot smen that were within Rome, whom the Pope caused to accompany him thither for his gard, fearing the preparations which the Duke of Seffo and the Imperials made to defeate the regiments of the Duke of Albanie: and comming from Sermonette about foure hundred horse and twelue hundred sootemen of the bands of the Vrsins, being sollowed by Iulio Colonno with many troupes of horfmen and footmen, it hapned that he ouerthrew them at the Abbey of tree fountaines, who flying for their fafety into the City of Rome, where they entred at the gates of S. Paule and S. Sebastian, the bands of Iulio entred with them pelmell, and in their rage killed diverse of them in the field of Flora and other places of the City. Vpon which occasion the whole City drawing into tumult tookearmes, first with a great scare, and afterwards with no little indignation of the Pope, for the flender regard and reuerence that was giuen giuento his authoritie: but in fuch a doubt and generall trauell of mind, he had occurrant the counsels and offers of the Venetians, who being of themselves entred into the like feare, laboured to personate differentially with all speeds a regiment of ten thousand smillers, and calling al-Popeso confess so into their pay another Colonie of Italians, they might loyne in grosse to oppose against so derate with manifest and huge daungers: wherein they promised for their parts (which is their ordinary cu- them. flome) farre greater things then they are wont to obserue : they alleaged that it was many moneths fince the Launceknights within Pania had hene payd, who feeing fince the victory the fame difficulties of payment to continue, were become mutinous, and leazing upon the artilleries, were drawne into a feeled strength within Pauia: that because the Captains had no mean to make good their paiment, all the refidue of the armie was drawne into tuniult, & murmured enery day more and more: in so much as both he and they falling speedily into armes, both their common estates were affured, and the occasion was entertained by the which they would of themselucs fall into disorder, being no lesse imbarked into those difficulties, then constrained to keepe continually great forces for the guard of the king that was prisoner. To this they added, that there was no doubt that the Ladie Regent through whose hands passed the government of France, and in whom was no small defire to further that vnion, would not onely make march at their instance the Duke of Albame with his regiments, and the foure hundred Launces of the arearcgard referned of the battell: but also would induce the universall consent of the kingdome of Fraunce to be concurrant for the fafetie of Italy, with a great fumme of money, as knowing that thereupon depended the greatest part of their hope to recouer the king. Lastly, they vrged this deliberation to be good and necessarie, if it were with the same speede put in execution : but to deserre and temporize, were to give meane to the Imperials to reduce their condition and reorder thefelues, the rather for that who foeuer tooke not a resolution to enter into armes, stood in case of confraint to compound with them, and to give them money; which was no other thing then to become an instrument and meane to deliuer them from all their difficulties, and submit themfelues wilfully under a yoke of perpetuall subjection. Moreouer they put him in hope, that the Duke of Ferrara would follow them, who like as both for his ancient dependancy of the French, and for the aide which in that war he had administred to the king, was not without his feare: so al-To his conjunction seemed of no litle importance, no lesse for the commoditie of his estate in the warres of Lombardie (Ferrara being a verie strong towne) then for his great store of munitions andartilleries, and (as the brute went) for his right huge wealth of gold and filuer. But neither the hope to ouercome an enterprise so hard and dangerous, which with wife men ought to carie no litle care and impression, nor the consideration of perils furthest off and removed, to the which time is wont to bring those remedies which the wit of man could not find out, nor anie other thing of what propertie or operation focuer, could not encline the Pope to open his eares to fuch speeches and perswasions, had not a seare to be inuaded presently, induced him to lay himselfe downer ather to the daunger least certaine, then to the perill that seemed most afford and most present: and therefore the practises were so farre advanced betweene them, and they staying upon nothing but to let downe the capitulations by writing, there was expectation from houre to houre to contract and accord: in fomuch as the Pope, who perswaded himselfe of the conclusion, dispatched in post to the king of England, Ieronimo Ghinuccio a Siennois, and Auditor of the Apoltolike chamber, whose commission was to labour to dispose the king to oppose his forces against such a greatnesse of the Emperour. In the verie instant of this expedition, arrived with good oportunitie the Archbishop of Capua, his ancient Secretary & Counfellour, and for many yeares of great authority with him: he affoone as he was aduertifed of the victoric of the Imperials, departed from Pluisance, & went to the campe of Don Charles de Lauoy Viceroy of Naples, and being resoluted of his intention, he tooke post horse to go to the Pope, to whom he caried an affured hope of accord: for at that time the Viceroy and the other Captaines were occupied with two thoughts and perplexities: the one to prouide money to content the armie, which for want of pay they faw began to decline into manifest consusion: the other, to catie the person of the French king into such a place, as the difficultieto gard him should not keepe determine to them in continual care and seare: which two things being established, they judged them to stand accord with in degree and condition alwayes able to execute and put to effect their purposes. In which the Pope.

respect they defired accord with the Pope, pretending thereby to draw from him a great quantity of money: whereunto feeking to dispose him the rather by seare, and also in releeuing the estate of Alillan, which was almost wasted with the burthen of souldiers, they sent to lie your the countrey of Plaisance foure hundred men at armes and eight hundred Launceknights not as enemies, but alleaging fometimes the pouertie of the Duchie of Millan to be farre vnable to nourish so great an armie, and sometimes threatning to make the march vp to the territories of Rome to seeke out the Duke of Albany, if the regiments of men of warre that had bene leavied by the Vrins were not retired and diffolued. But these industries and diligences were superfluous, for that assoon as the Pope was assured to avoid the dagers present, he left there all his other thoughts and disposed his mind wholly to the accord: in which inclination concurring also the reasons & counfell of the Archbishop, he sent after the Auditor of the chamber, to countermound him backe againe. And to take away all occasions that might hinder the accord, he wrought so that the Duke of Albany dispersed his whole armie, except those bands of footmen & horsmen that were of beyond the Mounts: he lodged the Duke within Corneto, after he had on the other fide receiued promise of the Emperours Commanders, to give leave also to their souldiers that lay vpon the passages of Rome, and cause to stay Ascanius Colonno with the other companies that came from the kingdome: he also was an interposer with the Colomois, beginning to molest the lands of the Vrsins, to defist and depose armes.

The Pope both defired and did all he could to bring the Venetians comprehended within the accord which he folicited with the Viceroy, but the only difficultie that refifted was, that they refuled to pay formuch money as the Viceroy demanded of them: for he required of them for much money as had bene spent in the warre, to the which they ought to contribute, and that hereaster they should make their contribution not with men, but with money: the like demaund did he also make to all those that were comprehended in the consederation made with Adrian : but it made well for the Pope that the Venetians shewed themselves hard and strait, because they put the Viceroy in suspition that they layd for new stirres and commotions: and whilest these matters were negociated with a verie affured hope of conclusion, the Florentines by the Popes ordinance fent xxv. thousand duckets to the Marquis of Pelquiero for the entertainment of the armie, hauing first received promise from Iohn Bart. de Gattinaro who negociated with the Pope for the Viceroy, that that summe should be parcell of the principall summe which was to be paid to him by vertue of the new capitulation. And not many dayes afore the resolution and conclusion of the faid capitulation, the Duke of Albanie, who for his returning into France had taried for the Nauie at fea, which being now come, and also the Galleys that were font him, he embarked himselfe in them together with the Galleys of the Pope, which were sent to him by consent of the Viceroy, and had neuerthelesse no safe coduct, neither for the one nor for the other: Ranse de Cere was imbarked with him, together with the artilleries which he had bad from Stenna and Lucqua, and foure hundred horse, a thousand Launceknights, with a very smal troupe of Italians, the refidue of the regiments being retired and gone away by troupes: the refidue of the horfes were partly fold, and partly left there. It was differened clearly by the dealing and proceeding of the Duke of Albany, that the purpose of his sending thither, was either to divert the Imperials from the Duchie of Millan for feare of the kingdome of Naples, or elfe through that feare to induce them to accord, and as wel for that cause he had marched slowly, as for that the forces which

But at last leaving out the Venetians, the confederation was concluded within Reme the first day of Aprill, betweene the Pope and Florentines on the one part, and the Emperor of the other, for whom the Viceroy vndertooke, being his Lieutenant generall in Italy, & for the Viceroy, Iohn Bart.de Gattinaro, nephew to the Emperours chiefe Chauncellour, being in Rome with full and ample commission. The effect of the capitulations most importing was this: That betweene the Pope and the Emperour should be a perpetual amitic and consederation, by the which both the one and the other should be bound to defend with a certaine proportion of men the Duchie of Willan, being then possessed when the name of the Emperour by Francis Sforce, who was named as principall in this capitulation: That the Emperor should take into his protection all the estates which the Church held, together with those which the Florentines possessed, with all the authoritic and preheminences which that samilie the king had given him, were not fufficient for fuch an enterprise.

Confederation betweene she Pape and the Emperour. held in that Citie: That the Florentines should pay presently an hundred thousand duckets, for recompence of their part of contribution in the last warres, by vertue of the league made by Pope Adrian, which the Emperour pretended not to be diffolued by his death, for that it was manifeftly expressed vpon the capitulations to endure one yeare after the seuerall death of the consederates: That the Impetials should retire their forces from off the Church estates, and not to send afterwards any bands of souldiers to harbour or lodge there without the Popes consent. There was place left for the Venetians to enter into this confederation within the tearnie of swentie dayes under reasonable conditions, which were to be declared by the Pope and the Emperour . Moreover, it was accorded, that the Viceroy should be bound to bring in within foure moneths the Emperours ratification to all these capitulations: and those that were delegates and deputies for the Viceroy, were bound seuerally to a capitulation confirmed by oath, that if the Emperor within the faid time did not ratifie the faid capitulations, the Viceroy should repay ouer againe the faid hundred thou fand duckets: and yet fo long as they were not repayed, the league thould have his full observation, to the which were added these three articles, not being any of the text of the capitulation, but set downe in articles apart, and confirmed also by oath: That in all causes and actions of benefices of the realme of Naples, it should be permitted to the Popes to vse the same authoritie and jurisdiction as was disposed by the inuestitures of the kingdome: That hereafter the Duchie of Millan should make all their prouision offalt from Ceruia, according to the price and order which had bene afore time couenanted betweene Pope Leo and the French king now raigning, and confirmed in the capitulation which the fayd Pope Leo made with the Emperour in the yeare a thousand fine hundred twentie and one: That the Viceroy should so worke and labour, as the Duke of Ferrara should immediatly render to the Church, Reggia, Rubiera, with such other townesss he had taken during the vacation of the Sea by the death of Adrian: and that in confideration thereof, the Pope assoone as he should be repossessed of them, should pay to the Emperour an hundred thousand duckets, and at the first request to be nade to him, to absolue the Duke of Ferrara of the censures and privations which he had in-:urred, but not of the penalty of an hundred thousand duckats, which he had promised in case of reaking the bond made with Adrian : and yet neuerthelesse after the Pope had recoursed possession, there should be search and examination made in law, whether those townes, together with Modena, appertained to the Church or to the Empire: and if they were found to be the rights of the Empire, then they should stand holden and recognized in chiefe of the Emperor, and otherwife to remaine free to the fca Apostolike.

This deliberation of the Pope was diverfly interpreted, according to the diverfity of mens passions and judgements: but especially did varie the construction of the popular fort, to whom uch counfels as cary the fayrest shewes seeme commonly more acceptable and pleasing, then hose that are disgested with good maturity of reasons: the common people also according otheir lightnesse and credulity, do for the most part esteeme for wise and noble, such men as neasure things not by discretion and experience, but by affection and light relation. There were also some that professed to desire the liberty of Italy, who blamed the Popes dealing, as hough through pufillanimity and infirmity of courage he had let slippe the occasion to vnite it igainst the Emperour, and to deliuer himselse from all disorders : but most men of deeper udgement and inlight in matters of state, were of another opinion: They saw how farre it had sene from wife counfell, to oppose resistance with new companies against so glorious and victorious an army: They confidered by how many reasons the comming of the Sweffers might be long and dilatorie, and with what difficulties they should passe not withstanding they were ready to descend: and yet wayghing with their custome and inconstancy of their nature, the fresh wound which they had so lately received, there was no assurance of their comming. These wisemen sawe also that there was no better hope or expectation on the French side, either for that by reason of so great an ouerthrow they stood deprined both of courage and counsell, or else there remained no prouision of money, nor any supply of men of warre to refurnish the bands (those few that escaped the lamentable slaughter of the battell being so spoyled of their furniture and baggage, that they stood in neede both of time and money to readdresse them: so that this vnion catyed no other foundation apparant or probable, then a naked hope that the army of the enemies would not come on nor moue for want of money: a matter which though it came so to passe, yet they remayned not for all that depriued of the Duchie of Millan, which so longas it flood at the deuotion of the Emperour, the Pope could not be without a perpetualloccasion offeare: and yet that hope was not without his vicertainties, for that it drew with it this feare, that the Captaines, either by their authoritie, or by their pollicie, or lastly, by propounding to the fouldiers the facke of some rich towne of the Church or of Tuscane, would dispose the armie to march: & of this inclination was discerned this manifest toke, that one part of the Launceknights to feeke a place of harbor of more benefite & conveniency, were passed the river of Par, & come you the lands of Parma and Plaisance: in so much as if they had any intetion to passe surther, it could not be but all remedies would come too late, and also so great a deliberation was grounded with too great a danger, vpon a bare hope of the disorders of the enemies, who nevertheleffe had it in their power & will to rid themselves out of their disorders. Then the counsell of the Pope seemed discreet & well considered according to the time that then ran, but it had haply bene more commendable, if in all the articles of the capitulation he had yied the fame difcretion. and disposed his wit rather to close vp and make whole all the wounds of Italy, then to open and make sharpe any one of consequence: wherein he had wisely imitated the order of the skilful phyfitians, who when the remedies they prepare to cure the indisposition of the inferiour members, augment the malady of the head or the heart, they throw away all care of guiefes and infirmities most light, and with the fauour of time they proceede carefully to the cure of that which most importeth and carieth most necessity of remedy for the safetic and good health of the pacient : but the better to explaine and fignifie luch a matter, it is necessarie we descend more deepely into the discourse of one part of those things which we have set downe severally here and there, and reduce them into one place and order.

The rights and pretentions of the family of Este.

They of the family and house of Este, besides that they have bene possessed of long time vnder the title of the Vicars of the Church, of the iurisdiction of Ferrara, were Lords also for many yeares of Reggia and Modena by vertue of inuesticure from the Emperours, for that in those times there was none that called into doubt why those two cities were not subject to the Empire: they were enjoyed peaceably vntill Pope Iulio the fecond (he whose custome was to vncouer the ancient titles and rights of the Church, long buried with tract of time; and under shadow of piety, was the author of many ils) began the warre with Duke Alfon/o, to reduce wholly Ferrara vinder the obedience of the Church; by the occasion and accidents of this warre; the Pope tooke from him Modenu, & at the beginning retained it for himself, as though together with all the other townes eue to the river of Paw, it had appertained to the Sea Apollolike, as being part of the partage or ditiision of Ranenna: but a litle after he gaue it to the Emperor Maximilian for feare of the Frenchmen, and yet he cealed not for allthat the warre against Alfonso, but tooke from him afterwards Reggia: yea, it was beleened that (in that humour of authority and ambition) if he had lived longer, he would have deprived him also of Ferrara: not that he accompanied his action with equity, but for the hatted and entry he bare to Alfon fo, wherin he not onely fought to couer his ambition with piety, pretending under that pretext to recouer to the Church all that he could find had bene holden by her in any time: but also under fuch a shadow, he pushed on the disdaine he had to Alfonso, for that he followed rather the amitie of Fraunce, then depended of him: yea in this malicious disposition was haply concurrant the vnappeascable hatred which he bareto the memorie and relikes of Alexander the fixt his predecessor, whose daughter called Luerece had bene maried to the Duke Alfonso, of which mariage were procreated many childre. The faid Pope Iulio left by his death to his successors not only the succession of Reggia, but also the fame thirlt and defire to get Ferrara, whereunto they feemed to be inclined, for the glorious memorie he had left of himself to posteritie: for which reason that ambition was more mighty in Leo his successor, then the regard to the greatnesse which the house of Medicis had in Florence, on whose behalfe it seemed more profitable that the puissance of the Church should diminish, theto haue it made more redoubted to all her neighbours, by annexing of Ferrara to it : and indeed after he had bought Modena, he disposed his spirits and studie wholly to the getting of Ferrara, & that more by practife and ambushes then with force open & disclosed, for that it wold have bene an enterprise of too great difficulties, since Alfonso by the consideration of his owne dangers, fortified himselfe on all sides, & made plentifull provision of artilleries & munitions, and as the brute went, had confirmed his stregth with huge proportions of, wealth & treasure: it may be his harreds

were greater then the hatreds of lulio, even so were they managed with more secrecie and suttlety: wherein befides many plots which he layd to take Ferrara, either by furprise or by fraud, he paffed such maner of obligations with those Princes, that he made alliance withall, that at least they were restrained to hinder him in this enterprise: that held him, not only during the life of luhan his brother, and Laurence his nephew, for whose greatnesse and exaltation it was thought he was catied with that ambition, but also even after their death: yea he was so over-ruled with that burning defire, that many were perfuraded that thereupon proceeded his last deliberation (more rash then discreete) to knit with the Emperour against the French king insomuch that by necessisty Aljon's was constrained to satisfie the French king (being his only founder & hope) in making warre vpon them of Modena, at fuch time as the armies of Pope Leo & the Emperour held Pana befieged in which warre, albeit he had received a verieill fuccesse, yet he had bene reduced into farre greater difficulties, if Pope Leo, euenamid the courfe and dayes of his victories, had not bene called into the other life by fodaine death; an accident which affuredly chaunced no leffe aprly and conveniently to him & to his affaires, then the death of Inlio. And it may be doubted, whether at last Adrian that was successor to Leo, was not infected with that property of conetousnesse, although both for his new creation, and want of training in the affaires of Italy, he gave him abfolution of the Censures in the verie first times of his comming to Rome: he granted him also of new the inuestiture of the Duchie, with permission to retaine all that he had possessed during the vacation of the Seathe brought him also into a generall hope to make restitution of Modena & Reggia, though afterwards upon better information of the efface & condition of things, he well expressed how farre his will was elfranged from his promise. But by the creation of Pope Clement, Alfonso entred into a great feare to returne eftfoones into the same dangers wherin he was intangled before: he tooke his reason of this seare, for that if things had happily succeeded with Clement, the same propertie of disposition would have bene found in him, which had alwayes followed luleo and Leo: but as the occasion was not yet ripe for Ferrara, so he made his next practise and preparation to haue againe Reggia & Rubiera, as an enterprise of more facilitie, and better to be iuftified by the late possession which the Church had of them, and as though in that regard he could not but beare dishonour and infamie, to leave them vnrecouered. Vpon which selfe suggestions & reasons, he tooke occasion both in many other sorts afore, and lastly in the capitulation with the Viceroy, to occupie his memorie with that deuise more often then manie desired: who as they looked into the daungers hanging over everiemans head by the greatnesse of the Emperour, and to breake the same, saw no better remedie then a ready and generall vnion of all the estates of Italy together, that the time might cut out occasions & necessities euerie day to take armes. So they udged it a better course for the Pope not to stirre and kindle the Duke of Ferrara, and much lesse to put him into necessity to seeke his rescue betweene the armes of the Emperour, against whose orces, whose fortune, & whose felicities, the time gaue them no power to oppose: & for the paricular of the Duke, he was a Prince rich, which in conference of actions and enterprises, is not of he least confideration, and for his training and experience, well able to forefee and auoyd; a vertue nost commendable in a Prince, whether his case beto defend or offend. Besides, as well for the ongruencie of his estate, as for his other conditions, the present divisions and conspiracies of the ime, required rather to cal himinto affection and assurance, then to leave him perplexed with hated or feare: and yet it may be doubted, whether to do benefite and pleafure to one perfwaded hat he hathreceiued iniuries, be sufficient to wipe out of amind ill disposed and full of iealousie, he memorie of wrongs and offences, specially when the pleasure is done at a time, when it seemes tproceedes more by necessitie then of good will.

After this capitulation was resolved, the Pope not to omit any convenient office to so great a The Pope Prince as the French king, by permission of the Viceroy, sent the Bishop of Pistoyato visite and sent to risk omfort him in his name: there past betweene the king and him but generall speeches, and that in the Frech king hepresence and hearing of Captaine Alarcon, wherein he chiefly besought the Pope to make being prisoners ome good solicitation for him to the Emperour: he asked him also, in such secrece as the licence of a prisoner would suffer, what was become of the Duke of Albanie, and was answered to his reat griefe, that one part of his armie being broken and retired, he was returned with the reidue into Fraunce. In these times they of Lucqua accorded with the Dicero, who received them ato the protection of the Emperour, under condition of ten thousand duckets: by whose exaple

also the inhabitants of Sienna contracted with him for fifteene thousand duckets without binding him to maintaine more the one forme of gouernement then the other, for that of the one fide, the family of Motenono, who at the instance of the Pope, and by the meane of the Duke of Albanie, had refumed the authority, which neuerthelesse was not as yet well confirmed: and on the other part, those who by the profession they made to desire liberty, were commonly called Libettines, tooke heart by reason of the battell of Pania, and would not endure the pollicie & gouernment induced by the forces of the French king: both parts fent messengers to the Viceroy to incline him, and to worke him fauorable to their feueral doings, and receiving from him no certaine refolution touching the forme of gouernment, they isyned both together and folicited readily composition: which being established and set downe, and the men arrived whom the Viceroy fent to receive the money, it hapned both in their presence and in the very action of counting the money, that lerome Severino a Cicizen of Sienna, who had bene fometime with the Viceroy, flue Alexander Dicho, both chiefe of the new gouernment, and also to whom the Pope had affigned at that time the whole reputation: the refidue of the Citizens of faction and conspiracy with him, ypon that alarme tooke armes, concurring with them the commotion and confociation of the populars, being ill contented that the pollicie should eftsoons returne vnder the yoke of tytanny: in which valuerfal emotion and rifing they chased out the Chiestains of the family of Montenous, and reducing the Citie to a reformation, they readdressed estsoones the gouernment popular, being both enemie to the Pope, and adherent to the Emperor. It was beleeved that this alteration of pollicie was either done directly with the privitie of the Viceroy, or at least not without his great allowing & approbation, seeing it brought no litle commodity to the affaires of the Emperor, to haue at his deuotion that Citie, which for her forces is very mighty and puissant, for the oportunitie of her ports and hauens, of great regard for marine enterpriles, for her fertility of countries very rich and plentifull, for her neighbourhood to the realme of Naples, verie congruent and apr, and for her fituation betweene Rome and Florence not of least respect and reason to fauour his affaires, and yet both the Viceroy and Duke of Seffo had given hope to the Pope not to alter the gouetnment introduced with his fauour. There were many other townes in Italy, who taking example of the inclination of them of Lucqua and Sienna, followed the fortune of the victors: amongst thefe was the Marquis of Montfer at, who compounded for fifteene thousand duckets: & the Duke of Ferrara made a loane to the Viceroy of fiftie thousand duckets, vnder promise to have them repaid if they did not capitulate together: he tooke his reason of that loane vpon the present condition of his affaires which could not be established so speedily, both for the respects they bare to to the captulation made with the Pope, and also for the necessitie to vinders and first the will of the Emperour: but with the money of that loane, together with a hundred thousand duckets which were promised from the Duchie of Millan, and the imposition of Sienna and Lucqua, together with some proportion of treasure sent to Genes by the Emperour for the supportation of the warre (which neuerthelesse came after the victorie) the Captaines set downe the payes of the armie according to the rate and quantitie of the money that came, meaning to pay the fouldiers for all that was past, and to tend backe from hand to hand the Almaines into Germanie: fo that no tokens appearing that there was any intention at that time to follow the course of the victorie against any man, fince the Viceroy both had ratified the capitulation made with the Pope according to his request, and also had put in negociation at the same time a new appointment with the Venetians which hee greatly defired. The eyes of enery man were set to beholde with what propertie of affection the Emperour would receive his gladfome newes, and to what endes his thoughtes were disposed: who so farre as exterior demon-The moderati- strations made shew of, expressed great tokens of a mind much moderated, and veric apt to reon and tempe- fift cafily the prosperity of fortune : yea the signes and inclinations appearing seemed so much the Emperor pon more incredible, by how much he was a Prince mightie and young, and as yet had never talked thenewes of but of felicitie : for after he was informed truly of so great a victorie, whereof he had the report the tenth of March, together with letters of the French kings owne hand, written rather in the fpirit and condition of a prisoner, then with the courage of a king : he went forthwith to the Church to make his holy oblations to God with manie folemnities, and the morning following he received with fignes of right great deuotion the Sacrament of the Encharift, and fe went in procession to our Ladies Church out of Madrill, where was his Court at that time:

His temperance and moderation was about the expectation of his estate, and farre contrarie to the custome of the time in matters of that nature: for he would not suffer any belies to be rung, nor bonfires to be made, nor any other manner of publike demonstrations: fuch as are vied for glorie or gladnesse, alleaging with a minde more vertuous then infolent, that fuch propertie of feathing and reloyeing was due to victories obtained against Infidels, but ought to have no shew where one Christian ouercame another: neither were the actions and geltures of his person and speeches differing from so great a temperance and continencie of minde, which he well expressed in the aunsweres he made to the congratulations of the Embassadours and great menthat were about him: to whom he sayd he was not glad of the accident according to the glorious operation of flesh and bloud, but his reioycing was in that God had so manifestly ayded hun, which he interpreted to an assured signe that he flood in his grace and fauour, though not through his owne merite, yet by his celefliall election: both for that he hoped now to have occasion to reduce Christendome to peace, and to prepare warre against the Infidels, and also to have meane to do good to his friends and to pardon his enemies: he faid that albeit he might justly appropriate to himselfe the whole victory, for that the helpe of none of his friends did concurre in the action, yet he was contented fo great a prosperitie should runne common to them all without any separation of glorie. Wherein after he had heard the Embassadour of Venice, who instified afore him the services done by his common weale, he fayd to fuch as flood about him, that though his reasons and justifications were not true, yet he would both accept them and repute them for true: and after he had continued certaine dayes in these speeches and demonstrations full of wisedonie and moderation, he called his Counfell together, to the endthat according to his observation and custome, nothing were proceeded in, which were not well measured with maturitie of reasons and countell: He required them by a maner of proposition, to adulse him in what fort he was to deale with the French King, and to what endes he was to addresse and dispose his victorie, commaunding them all to deliver freely in his presence their several opinions. Amongest them the first place of speaking was referred to the Bishop of Osimo his Confessour, who reasoned in this maner.

It is not viknowen to your excellent Maiestie, that God bath authoritie to dispose all things, The Oration by the same power wherewith he hath created them of nothing: and albeit all accidents and of the Bifthop of mortall eventes what so ever falling in this inseriour world, take their proceedings and dayly the taking of mouings of the providence of the eternal God , yet we finde it oftentimes more especially de- the Freeh ling. clared in some nature of things then in others, as manifestly hath appeared upon the successe,, of your present victorie : for , both for the greatnesse of the glorie gotten , which is the most ,, honourable end and reward of warre, and for the facilitie of the victorie, which instifieth the innocencie and goodnesse of your cause, and also for your happinesse to have subdued enemies, most puissant and better prepared for the warre then you, by which your valour and felicitie, Thineth with a clearer light. I thinke it can not be denied, that in the action hath not bene ex-,, preffed an especiall will of God drawing almost to a miracle. Therefore by how much the eternall God hath layd this great bleffing vpon you both manifeffly and publikely, by fo,, much more stand you tyed in obligation and office both to acknowledge it with humilitie and ,, Submission, and by demonstration to declare how thankefull you are for it. This is the sacrifice, that God requireth at your hands, and to this calleth you the confideration of the benefite, and,, your Christian pietie: the action whereof confisteth principally that you addresse your victorie,, to the exaltation of the service of God, which is the end for the which you ought to believe that ,, he hath throwen it vpon you . And for my part, when I looke into what termes and degrees the ,, estate of Christendome is reduced, I see no way more holy, more necessarie, nor more agreeable, to God, then to worke an universall peace betweene the Princes of the imperie and regiment of ,, Christendome. Wherein I amso much the more touched in conscience, in office, and in calling, ,, by how much I discerne by the generallface and shew of things, that without peace, both re-,, ligion and all her lawes and rules , and faith which mortall men repose in it , together with all ,, observation of the commaundements of God, which is the foundation of our Christianitie, are,, fliding into manifest ruine. Your Maiestie is not ignorant, how on the one fide we have the nation of the Turkes, who befides they have wonne great things vpon the Christians by our owne,, discords & divisions, do now manifestly threate the kingdome of Hungary which appertaineth to ,,

"the husband of your fifter: Their ambition goeth on increasing by the degrees of our separa-"tions and disagreements: and if God for our punishment suffer them to take Hungarie, which " afforedly they will take if the Christian Princes do not draw into one vnitie and amitie together, " the way is made open to them to carie the whole Monarchie of Germanie and Italie; a losse "irreparable, and no lesse tyed to a perpetuall infamie to the name of Christian Princes, then "the seruitude and yoke of barbarisme will be alwayes intollerable to the generall posteritie of all "Christian soules . On the other side we have the infection of Lutheranisme, so slaunderous to "those that have power to oppresse it, and so daungerous for the spreading it makes in all partes, "that if it be not restrained, the world is in hazard to be replenished with Heretickes; there " is no other remedie for that euill, then by your authoritie and puissance, which yet you can not aduaunce for the cure of this maladie, fo long as you stand embarqued in other warres. But "beit, that for the present there were neither feare of the Turkes, nor daunger of Heretickes, "yet to a Prince professing pietie and charitie, what can be more fowle, more sinnefull, or "more to be abhorred, then for our passions, and emulation of ambition, to live in the es-"fusion of so much Christian bloud, which either with greater glorie might be spent in the quar-" rell of the faith of Christ, or at least with better oportunitie be reserved for times more neces-" farie. The warres that you now profecute, draw after them a bottomlesse gulfe of violations and "whoredomes, an infinitie of facrileges and blasphemies, and a world of other impious and " execrable deedes; such as who so euer is a voluntarie authour of them, can not but stand in a "weake estate of grace or hope of pardon at Gods hand, sceing that if necessitic leade him into "them, he is without merite of excuse, if at the least he proceede not to the remedie of so great " cuils so speedily as he hath the meane. It is not good to be the authour of cuill, but we are es-" pecially bidden to beware to continue in those euils which our conscience doth assure vs to of-"fend God: so that this ought to be the end of your Maiesties thoughtes and counsels, and the " especiall marke whereat you have to shoote, to reduce the Princes and Potentates of Christen-"dome to an universall peace, as a matter most honourable, most holy, and most necessarie: for "the maner and reall effecting whereof, your Maiestie may take three deliberations touching the "French king: The first to keepe him a perpetual prisoner: The second to deliuer him stiend-" ly and brotherly without other conditions then fuch as may induce betweene you a perpe-"tuall peace and amitie, and tende to cure and readdresse the harmes of Christendome: The "third, to exact by his libertic as great a profite as you can. Of these, two of them in my o-" pinion do augment and prolong the warres: but the third which is his absolute libertie in ami-"tie and brotherhood, is the onely remedie to remoue the warre, and refift for ever all moti-"ons and occasions to renew it: for it is not to be doubted, but that the French King (for so sin-" gular a liberalitie as the free benefite of his libertie) will remaine more assured to you in minde "and affection, then he standes now fast bound to you in bodie. Greater is the bond of li-"beralitie and friendship, then the law of kindred and bloud, for that election and judgement " make a friend, but fortune brings parentage. And if betweene your facred Maiestie and him "fhall runne a league of true vnion and concord, all other Christian Princes will embrace recon-" ciliation and agreement, and by your vertuous example, will labour to reclaime to the bodie " of Christendome, such members as line now in separation. But if you make a resolution to de-" taine himalwayes in prison, besides the apparant crueltie in the act, which is contrarie to "the pietie of a Christian Prince, and besides the imputation of ignoraunce touching the muta-"bilitie of fortune, which in matters of victorie draweth deepe confideration, you shall nou-" rish the seedes of mutual warres betweene you, which no doubt will grow increasing and mul-"tiplying to the indifferent ruine of you both: for in fo doing you will make the world clamorous " against your vehement thirst after the crowne of Fraunce or some member thereof, and drive him "in reason and equitie to rise into new warres, to resist so great an ambition. And to chuse the "way to deliuer him under capitulations for your most profite and aduauntage, cannot be but "the worse way, and an election more daungerous then both the others: for, make what alli-" ance you will, what capitulations you can, and what obligations you thinke good, yet by how "much you feeke to tye his liberty to fuch conditions, by fo much will he take occasion to be more & more your enemie, wherein he shall neuer want the assistance and companie of all those Princes whom he can induce to be iealouse oner your greatnesse. In cases of icalouse and emulation, for imperie and effate, it is hard to containe the courage of man, though in all other occasions ,, nature hath affigned him an ordinarie bridle and restraint : and such is mans infirmitie, that ,, when the heart is possessed of the iniurie, the whole body is caried with a violent motion to the, passion of reuenge. I am not ignoraunt how farre this opinion differeth from the tast of ordinarie men, neither how new it is to their eares, nor how litle confirmed with examples : but ,, 1 know againe how much it agreeth with the Maiestie of the Emperour to dispose his minde ,, to deliberations extraordinarie and fingular: fuch as the conceptions and capacitic of other, men can not reach vnto, whom if your Maiestie exceede in dignitie, you ought by so many,, degrees to furmount in magnanimitie, which will not onely leade you to the merite and effect, oftrue glorie, but also it will open your facred eyes to discerne what greate coinclinesse it, bringsto you to pardon and vieliberalitie, then to punish and be couetous in getting. By this, your Maiestie shall know that God hath not given you in vaine, yea almost miraculously, the ,, power to reduce the world to a peace: and that it appertaineth vnto you, after so many victo-, ries, after so many graces and bleffings throwen upon you by the goodnesse of God, and after, you have brought so many Princes prostrate at your feete, to proceede no more in the person, of an enemie to any man, but to prouide in the affection of a common father, for the fafetie of ,, all men . That glorie is vniust that is purchased with the injurie of another , and nature hath ,, fowen in man aswell seedes of equitie and clemencie, as of iniurie and surie. The magnanimitie which Alexander the great and Iulius Cafar have showed in pardoning their enemies, and ,, reltoring kingdomesto those they had vanquished, hath made their names more glorious, then, their infinite victories and many triumphes: whole example it importeth most those men to,, follow, who not making gloric their onely end (though it be a right great reward) do defire,, principally to do that which is the true and proper office of enery Christian Prince . But to the ,, end to convince fuch as measure humaine things onely with humaine endes, let vs consider fur-,, ther if there remaine yet any other deliberation more conformable then this: For my part I be-,, leeue, that in all the greatnesse and soueraigne estate of your Maiestie, there is no part more, wonderfull nor more worthy, then this recommendation and glorie, that you have flood till, this day invincible, and have guidedall your enterprifes to a most happie end, drawing withit,, both felicitie and reputation: which as you can not but interprete to be the most precious iewell, ,, and most singular treasure that God hath indued you withall, so he hath left to your Maiestie,, no better way to establish it, nor fitter meane to assure and conserve it, then in leaving the, warres with an end so honourable and worthie, to take out of the handes and power offor-,, tune the subuersion of your glorie gotten, and to reduce from the middest of the seato the port, offafetie, this vessell loaden with marchandise of value inestimable. It belonges to wife men not, to referre effloones to the arbitrement of fortune, the things which they have once atchieued by ,, their valour and wifedome: and this hath bene alwayes an observation with wife men, that the greater their fortune was, the leffe did they trust it. But let vs passe further, there is no man doub-,, teth that that greatnesse which is preserved willingly is not more agreeable, then that which is ,, maintained by violence, for that it is so much the more stable, so much the more easie, so much the ,, more agreeable, and so much the more honorable: If your Maiestie bindthe Frechking to you by, fo great a liberalitie, and by fo great a benefite, will it not be the proper degree to put vpo you the absolute authoritie & jurisdiction both of himselfe and his kingdome? If you give to the Pope and, other Princes fo manifest a certaintie, that you are coteted with the states which you have, & that ,, you live in a special care and watching over the vniversall safetie of Christendome, will not they ,, remaine without suspition? Yea having no more to feare you, nor nothing to quarrell with you, ,, they will not only loue you, but they will honor in your person so great a bountie. By this meane, you shall draw to you the hearts of me, which are not to be subdued by siercenesse, you shall give ,, lawes to all nations for that they see you deuided from ambition, and by this meane shal you dis-,, pose more Christians with good wil and authoritie, then with forces & subjection. By this meane ,, being followed and aided of all men, you shal have good oportunitie to turne your armes against ,, the Lutherans & Infidels, with greater glory & with more occasion of greater conquestes. Which ,, I know not why they should not be also defired in Affrike, in Greece, or in Lenant, seeing that as ,, you have had fo great facilitie to amplifie your dominion amongst the Christians, & the puissance ,,

" of your Maiestie so augmented, that it is almost become terrible to them all, so when they shall " fee your purposes extended further, and your ambition breake out of limit, all the world will con-" spire by necessitie against you, who in they finde armed with a minde so prejudiciall to their liber-"tic. In all times, in all climats, and to all natures, feruitude hath bene hatefull, and libertie sweete "and acceptable: the Pope scareth your power, the Venetians tremble under your puissant hand, your forces have put all Italy into astonishment, and by the tokens that are discerned, it is credi-" ble that the king of England enuieth your felicitie : you may for certaine moneths entertaine the "Frenchmen with faire hopes and vaine practifes . but in the end, either the king must be deliue-" red, or they must be sent backe desperate: if they reape dispaire, they have reason to conspire " against you with all the confederates they can procure : and if you deliuer the king with condition " of litle profit to your Maiestie, what shall you winne, to lose the occasion to vie so great a magna-"nimitie? which if you expresse not at this beginning, when afterwards you would show it, it will "haue neither prayle, glory, nor the like grace: if you tye to his deliuerie couenants that bind him " to your profite and commoditie, he wil not observe them, for that no surctie that he shall give "you can fo much import him, but that it will import him much more not to have his enemie to " become so great as afterwardes he shall not be able to oppresse him: and so shall we have either a peace unprofitable, which ought to be farre from the deliberation of your Maiestie, or "else warres verie daungerous, whose end is as vncertaine as the action is iealous. Besides, the " change of fortune is to be feared of him to whom the hath giuen to long a fruition of felicitie, " and much more griefe and heavinesse by the ill successe of things, is to be doubted of him who " hath had power to affure them . Thus haue I satisfied the commaundement of your Maiestie, " though not with grauitie and wit that was expected, yet with affection and fidelitie according "to a subject, beseeching God to inspire you with the election of that deliberation, which " may be most acceptable to his will and agreeable to your glorie, and also be most conducible "to the benefite of the common weale of Christendome, of the which both for your supreme di-" gnitie, and correspondencie of the diuine will of God, there is necessarily transferred to your " person the name of patron and protectour. tion by any figne or gefture, whether he allowed or condemned it: but giving the figne to the re-Alba touching fidue to speake, Federike Duke of Alba, a man of great authoritie with the Emperour, rose vp & reasoned in this sort: There be in the soule of man two principal powers necessarily concurring to " euery good action, the understanding and the will, of both which wifedome is the full perfection: "The one we neede not doubt to be the free gift of God, and the other we may affure to be bred " in nature: the one an inspiration to leade vs to the knowledge of things, & the other a disposition " carying vs to the operation and action of the same, and they both no other thing then the effect of that perfection which is referred to wifedome: And as this wifedome defcended by grace, and 🚅 is not giuen by nature, so yet in the administration of worldly things, we see it both much holpen " and well confirmed by learning and industrie. In which respect (right sourraigne Emperour)I " pray to be excused, if my judgement differ not from the common judgement of others, and if by " the facultie of my spirite I be not capable to pierce so deepe as the understanding of others can " not reach vito: yea I hope to descrue more commendation, if in my counsels I perswade you to follow the fame way which your fathers and elders have alwayes taken: for albeit counfels new se and without vie, at the first fight may haply bring with them glorious shewes and apparances, " yet no doubt in the end they are found to draw with them more daunger and deceite, then fush as being measured by reason, example and experience, have bene in all times approved by gene-44 rall fentence of all men: yea all things are put to adventure, that are done by rashnesse and not by " reason . Your Maiestie hath received principally by the will and working of God, and second-" ly through the valour of your Captaines and armie, the greatest victorie that in many ages hath "bin transferred to any Christian Prince: but the chiefe fruite to vanquish consisteth in the well vfing of your victorie, and who ordereth not his felicitie fo, incurreth a farre greater infamy, then if 46 he knew not how to vanguish. Greater is the fault of that man who suffreth himselfe to be deceiee ued by those things which he holdeth in his owne power, then by such as depend vpon the arbi-· tration or fortune: fince for the most part whom fortune doth bring to beleeue in her, she  maketh them more defirous of glory, then apt to receive it, or able to governe it . Your Maiestie hath hath to take heede to enter into any deliberation which in the end may bring shame to others & ,, repentance to your felfe: and by how much the importance of this negociation is great, by fo , much doth it call your Maiestie to proceede with great aduise in your resolutions, in which the, faults that are once committed, can not be corrected. If you once deliuer the French king, you, can no more retaine him but fo long as he remaineth your prisoner, it is alwayes in your power, to give him libertie. In cases of captivitie he that hastily ensreeth his enemie, worketh to himselse the occasion of his owne harme : and therefore it cannot but be an injurie to object your slow-,, nesse to fet him at libertie, since the King knoweth in his owne conscience how he would vie the ,, Emperourif he were his prisoner. Truly it was a great felicitie to take the French king, but in con-, ference & comparison of things, it would proue a far greater infelicitie to let him go. I hope your >> Majestie is not ignorant, that follie and rashnesse have no societie with wisedome, nor fortune no >> communitie with good counfell, and therefore touching the deliberation of his deliuerie, it ought " to be debated with grauitie of counfell, calling to you a long affiftance and courfe of time: I might "> happily change this opinion, if I faw any reason to perswade me, that the king being presently deliuered, would reasonably acknowledge the benefite according to the consequence of it, and that " the Pope & the other poterates of Italy, would be brought to lay away together with their fuspi-, tions, all their couetoulnesse and ambition: but who knoweth not how dangerous it is, to ground " and cltablish a refolution of so great importance upon a supposition both untrue and uncertaine: » the confideration of the condition and maner of mortall men induceth the contrarie, for that or- " dinarily there is nothing endureth fo litle a season as the remembraunce of benefites received and the more greater they be, the more commonly are they recompenced withingratitude, for that " he that either can not or will not make them good with recompence, seeketh oftentimes to deface » them with forgetfulnesse, or at least to make the lesse, by perswading that they were not so great: " and as to some men it is a more shame to cofesse a fault the to do it , so, we have seene many who ,, being reduced to fuch necessitie as they have stood in neede of a benefit, do yet receive it with ,, mindes grudging and not contented: in whom commonly hatred beareth more rule for the re-, membraunce of the necessitie wherein they were fallen, then the obligation and thankfulnesse, which ought to follow the fauour and benefite that was done vnto them . Moreover there is no » nation under the couer of the skie to whom infolencie is more naturall, and lightnesse more fami-, liar then to the Frenchmen: and where is infolencie, there is inconfideration: and where is light- ,, neffe, there is no knowledge of vertue, there is no indgement to differne of the actions of others, ,, nor gravitie to measure that which concerneth themsclues: then what other thing may we hope, for in the French king, for his cultome to infolent, and for his greatnesse fo proud and hawtie, then ,, that he burneth with rage and disdaine to be prisoner to the Emperour, at a time when he looked, to triumph ouer him: he will keepe alwayes before his eyes, the remembrance of this infamie, and ,, being deliuered, he will neuer beleeue that the meane to quench it, is to be thankefull & acknow.,, ledge, but in striuing to be superiour, he will perswade himself that you let him go for the difficul-,, ties to hold and retaine him, and not through your bountie and magnanimitie: Such is for the most, part the nature of men, and fuch hath bene alwayes the condition of the Frenchmen, from whom who looketh for a constancie or magnanimitie, expecteth a renouation and new rule in humane, things: fo that in place to have peace, and to reorder the regions of Christendome, we shall see, rifeyp, warres, both more doubtfull and more daungerous then those that are passed, such as for ,, their confederacies will be intollerable, and for their calamities horrible. The reason of these is, for ,, that your reputation will be leffened, and your armie, which now expecteth the fruite due vpon, so great a victoric being deceived of their hopes, will have no more the same vertue, nor your af-,, faires followed with the fame fortune: who if the be hardly holden by him that retaineth her, ,, much leffe will the tarie with fuch as chase her and drive her away: she hath a freewill to come &,, go when the lift, & is not flayed by the power of mortall Princes, whom with other earthly crea-, tures nature hath made subject to the law of revolution & change:neither have you reason to re-,, pose any thing in the bountie of the Pope, or the modestie of the Venetians, for that repenting the selues to have suffred you to go away with the victorie past, they will seeke to cast blocks in your, way for going any further, wherein will be concurrant the present searc they have of you, which, wil copell the to oppose against your new fortunes & victories to come: yea where you have now ,, in your power to hold all men bound and aftonished, your selfe with a dissolute bountie will be

" he that will ynbind them and give them hart: I know not what is the will and resolution of God. " neither do I thinke others can reach to the knowledge of it, for that we are made assured by the " Scriptures that his judgements are fecret and deepe. But if it be lawfull to interprete matters by " coniecture, which is the onely way to comprehend things to come, I fee many tokens that God " fauoureth your greatnesse:neither can I beleeue that he extendeth his graces vpon you in so great " abundance to the end you should diffipate and dissolue them of your selfe, but thereby to raise you and make you superiour ouer others, as well in effect, as you are intitle and right: and truely to loofe fo rare an occasio which God doth sendyou, would be no other thing the to tempt him and make you vnworthy of his grace. In cases of conquest and victorie, Princes are hardly contented with that which occasion doth offer, for that the things which they winne first do not satisfie them, fo long as they hope to get better. Reason hath alwayes taught, & experience doth well cofirme it, that feldome do those things draw good successe which depend vpothe counsels of many: by which argument I doubt whether he measure rightly the nature of the world, who beleeneith that he is able to roote out the Heretikes, or suppresse the Infidels, with the vnion of many Princes. They be enterprises that have need of a Prince so mightie and great, as to be able to give " lawes and rules to others. If that be not observed and considered, they will have their passage "hereafter with the same successe, wherewith they have passed in times before: for this cause do I beleeue that God hath cast on you so great victories, and for the same reason hath opened you the way to the whole Monarchie, which onely may make you able to bring to passe so great and " holy effectes : to the which it is not amifle that you be flow to give the first beginnings, to the end to accomplish them with more better and more certaine foundations. Let not the feare of so many puissant leagues and confederations as are contracted against you, estraunge you from this de-"liberation, for that both the occasion which you retaine in your hand is sufficient to aduaunce it, "and also if things be well negociated, the Kings mother, for her affection to her sonne, and for the neceffitieto recouer his liberty, wil neuer cast off her hopes to redecine him of you by accord. Be-"fides, the Princes of Italie will neuer enter vnitie with the gouernment of France, knowing that it remaineth alwayes in your hand, fetting the King at libertie, not onely to separate him, but also to turne him against them; a matter which as for the time it will keepe them in astonishment and "fuspence, so in the end it must needes come to passe that they must be the first to receive lawes of " you, and then it can not be but an action full of glorie, to vic towards them elemencie & magna-"nimity, even when matters shall be reduced to that estate and degree, as they can not chuse but ac-" knowledge you for superiour. Such was the maner of dealing of Alexander and Cafar, who were " forward and liberall to pardon injuries, and not flow and incoffiderate to readdreffe their efface of "themselves, amid those difficulties and daungers which they had already surmounted the that doth " fo, deserueth prayse, for that he doth an act which hath verie few examples; but that man can not " but beare notes of imprudecie & indiferction, who doth that which hath no law of example nor rule of time. By these reasons I am bold to induce your Maieslie to draw of your victory as great " a profit as you can, and alwayes ving towardes the King those offices and oblations that apper-" taine to him, either to fend for him into Spaine, or at least to have him conveyed to Naples: and " for aunswere of his letter sent to your Maiestie, it were good to returne to him some special man " to visite him with wordes full of grace and hope, and withall to propound vnto him conditions of " his deliuerance, fuch as (vpon more particular confultation) may be worthie recompences and re-"wardes of so great a victoric. In this fort your foundations being layed, and your thoughts extenof ded to these endes, the time and the operations and accidents thereof, will make either more " quicke or more flow, the deliueric of the King, and will also beget occasions of peace or warre "with the Italians, whom for the prefent you may entertaine with good hopes: fo shall you with art and industric augment the fauour and reputation of armes, and auoyding to tempt euc-" rie day a new fortune, we shall be prepared and readie to accord either with this Prince or with "that common weale, either with all together or with one in particular, as occasions and accidents " shall induce vs. These be the wayes which wife Princes have alwayes followed, and particularly " those who have left to you the foundatios of such a greatnesse: They were neuer curious to reject " occasions that made to raise them higher, nor slow to push on the fauour of fortune when they " faw her well disposed: to you belonger the interest of their example, as of right appertaineth vii-" to you that which in any of them might feeme to be ambition . Your Maiestie must remember that you are a Prince, and that it is one office in your calling to follow the trace of Princes, much plefe that any reason either divine or humane perswadeth you to leave the occasion to relieve and preaddress the authoritie of the Empire viurped and defaced, seeing all lawes of God audnations bindyou by straite obligation, to arme your courage and intentions to recover it rightfully: occa-princes are precious if they be executed in the ripenesse of time, but being foreshowed, they turne to the preindice of those that hoped in them: your Maiestie must be icalous over them, knowing how easily they are lost, and with what difficultie they are recovered: you must not be curious to make your profit of them, nor doubtfull to advance them when you see they draw with them a protection of time, of place, and all other circumstances helping to your enterprises: You are mot to make your foundation you the bountie or wisedome of those that be vanquished, seeing all mortall men draw with them their corruptions, and the whole world isfull of infirmitie and persouraginities and greatnesse are the effectes and rewards of valour, and where is a resolute mind to execute, there never wanteth a good fortune to establish and confirme. Lastly, seeing the estate possible for the interest of your owne authoritie and more than the properties.

glorie, yet for the service of God, and zeale of the vniverfall benefite.

This Oration was heard with a wonderfull fauour and inclination of the whole Councell, in whom, for the authoritie of the man, and for the spirite and efficacie of his reasons, might be discerned an univerfall impression of ambition almost to the whole Empire of Christedome, There was not one amongest them, who without replie, did not confirme his opinion, which the Emperour also approued, though more for colour not to seeme to swarue fro the counsell of his friends, the in disclosing what was the propertie of his inclinatio. Monsieur Beaurain, by office his great Chaberlaine, and by fauour verie gracious with him, was dispatched both to impart with the Captaines of the army, the Emperours deliberation, and also to visite in his name the French King, and to propound to him the conditions by the which he might obtaine dis deliuerance : he tooke his way by land, for that the Kings mother had made free and openall passages for messengers and cutriers to come and go to the Emperours Court, for the more easie and safe negociation of her fonnes affaires: and so together with the Duke of Burbon and the Viceroy, he went to Pifqueton, where the King remained as yet: There he offered him his libertie, but with so vnequall and heauie conditions, that the verie hearing of them was intollerable to the King: for, befides the refigning of all his titles and rights which he pretended in Italie, the Emperour demaunded to have rendred vnto him the Duchie of Burgondie as appettaining to him in proper, and to give to the Duke of Burbon Pronence, with all the dependencies thereof: and he required befides, as well for himselfe as for the King of England, other conditions of verie great moment. It seemed the vertue of the king had ouercome the aduerfities of his imprisonment: for, to the Emperours demaunds he aunswered costantly, that he had rather offer vp hislife in prison the to deprine his children of any part of the Realme of France, and though he should consent to a composition so prejudiciall, yet it was not in his power to execute it: for that the auncient traditions and conflictutions of France did not fuffer alienation of any member or apertenancie to the crowne without the confent of the Parliamets, and others in whose hands rested the authoritie of the whole kingdome, and who in like cases had bin alwayes wot to preferre the vniuerfal safetie of the maine bodie of the realme, afore the particular interest of the persons of their Kings: That if they would demaund condition which were in his power to performe, they should find him most ready to joyne with the Emperour, and to fauour his greatnesse: but such was his desire of libertie, that here he ceassed not to offer conditions divers, making no difficultie to graunt large parts of other mens estares, without promiting anything of his own. This was in effect the fumme of the things he accorded: He offered to take to wife the Emperours fifter, a late widow by the death of the king of Portugall: He made confession that he would hold Burgondie as in dowrie, and that it should appertaine to the children isluing of that mariage: That he would restore to the Duke of Burbon, the Duchie that had bene confisked from him, enlarging it with fome other effate: That in recompence of the Emperours fifter who had bene promifed to the Duke, the King would give him in mariage, his fifter a late widow by the decease of Monsieur d' Alenson: That he would fatisfie the King of England with money, and pay to the Emperour a great treasure for his ransom: That he would refigne vnto him his interests and rights in the kingdome of Naples and Duchie of Millan: That he would fend to accompanie him both with a nauie by fea and an armie by land, at fuch time as he would go to Rome to take the crowne Imperiall, which was as much as if he had promifed to giue him in pray the whole Monarchie of Italie. Beaurain returned with thefe capitulations to the Emperour, to whom went with him also Monsieur Montmorancie, a personage then verie agreeable to the King, and afterwardes great Maisler of Fraunce, and at last by the Kings libetalitie, induced with the dignitie of high Constable of Fraunce.

The forowes and feares of Fraunce for she impriformens of the king.

But now let vs say somewhat of the sorowes and seares of Fraunce: After they were possessed of the newes of the ouerthrow of the armie, & taking of the King, there ranne through the whole kingdome an vniuerfall aftonishment and confusion: for, besides the incredible forow which the accident of the Kings imprisonment brought to that nation, naturally verie deuout and louing to their Kings, there appeared on all fides infinite mournings and heavineffe, as well publike as prinate: prinate men lamented and made forrowes apart, for that aswell of the Court as of the Nobilitie, there were verie few who had not lost in the battell, their children, their brethren, or other their parents and friends of marke: they wept and could not be comforted, because they judged their forrow could not be greater then the qualitie of their losse : and in the publike and generall bodie of the realme might be discerned nothing but an vinuerfall face of desolation and dispayre, euerie one crying out of fo great a diminution of the authoritie and glory of fo florishing a realme: a perplexitie formuch the more grieuous and intollerable to them, by how much naturally they are hawtie and presuming of themselues. In this chare of adversitie they set before their eyes all that feare and dispayre could imagine: They doubted least so great a calamiric were not the beginning of a further ruine and fubuerfion: They faw their King prisoner, and with him either take or flaine in the battell, the Chieftaines of the kingdome, which in the imagination of their forowes they held a loffe irreparable: They beheld their Captaines discomforted, and their souldiers discouraged; a calamitie which stopped in themall hope to be readdressed or reassured : They faw the Realme made naked of money and treafure, and enuironed with most mightie enemies, an affliction which most of all caried their thoughts into the last cogitations of desperate ruine: for the King of England, notwithstanding he had holden many parleys and treaties, and shewed in many things a variation of minde, yet not many dayes before the battell, he had cut offall the negociations which he had entertained with the King, and had published that he would descend into France if the things of Italie tooke any good successe: so that the French men feared least in so great an oportunitie the Emperour & he would leavie war against France, either for that there was no other head or Gouernout then a woman and the litle children of the King, of whom the eldest had not yet runne eight yeares accomplished: or else because the enemies had with them the Duke of Burbon, for his owne particular a puissant Prince, and for his authoritie in the realme of Fraunce verie popular and strong in opinion, a mightie instrument to stir vp most daungerous emotions. Besides, the Lady Regent, aswel for the loue she bare to the king. as for the dangers of the realine, was not without her passions both proper & particular: for being full of ambition, and most greedie of the government, she feared that if the Kings deliverie drew any long tract of time, or that any new difficultie hapned in Fraunce, the should be constrained to yeeld up the administration of the Crowne to fuch as should be delegate and assigned by the voyces of the kingdome. Neuertheleffe amid fo many aftonifhments and confusions, she drew her spirires to her, and by her example were recomforted the Nobles that were of counsell with her, who taking speedy order to man the frontiers of the Realnie, and with diligence to leavy a good prouision of money: the Lady Regent in whose name all expeditions and dispatches went out, wrote to the Emperour letters full of humility & copassion, wherin the forgot not by degrees vehement & inducing to folicit a negociation of accord, by vertue whereof, having a litle after deliuered Don Hugo de Moncado, she sent him to the Emperour, to offer him, that her sonne should renounce and disclaime from all rights of the kingdome of Naples and the estate of Millan, with contentment to referre to the censure and arbitration of the law, the titles and rights of Burgondie, which if it appertained to the Emperour, he should acknowledge it for the downie of his fister: That he should render to Monsieur Burbon his estate together with his moueables and goods which were of great value, and also the fruits and reuenues which had bene leavied by the commillioners deputed out of the regall chamber: That he should give to him his fifter in mariage, and deliuer vp to him Pronence, if judgement of the interest and right were made of his side : and for

for the more facilitie and speedic passage of this negociation, rather then for any desire she had to nourish her inclination to the warre, she dispatched immediatly Embassadours into Italie, to recommend to the Pope and the Venetians the latetie of her fonne : to whom the offred, that if for their proper fecuritie they would contract with her, and raife armes against the Emperour, she would for her particular aduaunce fine hundred launces, together with a great contribution of money. But amid these trauels & astonishments, the principall defire as well of her as of the whole realme of Fraunce, was, to appeale and affure the minde of the King of England, judging truely that if they could reduce him to amitie and reconcilement, the Crowne of France should remaine without quarrell or molestatio: where, if he on the one fide, & the Emperour on the other, should rife in one loynt force, having concurrant with them the person of the Duke of Burbon, and many other oportunities and occasions, it could not be but all things would be full of difficulties and daungers. Of this the Ladie Regent began to differne many tokens and apparances of good hope: for notwithstading the King of England immediatly after the first reports of the victorie, had not onely expressed great tokens of gladnes & reioycing, but also published that he would in person passe into France, & withall had sent Embassadors to the Emperour to solicite & treate of the mouing of warre iountly together: yet proceeding indeede with more mildnesse then was expected of so furious shewes & tokens, he dispatched a messenger to the Ladie Regent, to send to him an expresse Embassador: which accordingly was accoplished, & that with fulnes of authoritie & comission, such as brought with it also all sortes of submissions & implorations which she thought apt to reduce to appealement the mind of that King so highly displeased the reposed him selfe altogether vpon the will and counsell of the Cardinall of Yorke, who seemed to restraine the King and his thoughts to this principall end, that bearing fuch a hand youn the controucrfies and quarrels that ranne betweene other Princes, all the world might acknowledge to depend your him and his authoritie the resolution and expectation of all affaires. And for this cause he offered to the Emperour at the same time to descend into France with a puissant armie, both to give perfection to the alliance concluded betweene them before, & alfo to remoue all scruple & icalousie, he offered presently to configne vnto him his daughter who was not as yet in an age and dispositio able for mariage. But in thefe matters were verie great difficulties, partly depending vpon him felfe, and partly derining from the Emperour, who now shewed nothing of that readinesse to cotract with him which he had vsed before; for the king of Englad demaded almost all the rewards of the victory, as Normandie, Guyen, and Gascoigne, with the title of king of Fraunce: and that the Emperour, notwithstading the inequalitie of the conditions, should passe likewise into France, & comunicate equally in the expences & dangers. The inequalitie of these demandes troubled not a litle the Emperour, to who they were by so much the more grieuous, by how much he remebred that in the yeares next before, he had alwayes deferred to make warre even in the greatest dagers of the French king: fo that he perfwaded himfelf that he should not be able to make any foundation you that confederation: and standing in a state no lesse impouerished for money & treasure, then made wearie with labours and perils, he hoped to draw more commodities from the French king by the meane of peace, then by the violence of armes and warre, specially joyning with the king of England. Belides, he made not that account which he was wont to do of the mariage of his daughter, both for her minoritic in age, and also for the dowrie for the which he should fland accomptable for so much as the Emperour had received by way of loane of the King of England: he seemed by many tokens in nature to nourish a wonderfull desire to have children, and by the necessitie of his condition, he was caried with great conetousnesse of money, you which two reasons he tooke a great destre to mariethe fister of the house of Portugall, which was both in an age able for mariage, and with whom he hoped to-receive a plentifull portion in gold and treasure, besides the liberalities of his owne peoples offered by way of beneuolence in cale the mariage went forward: fuch was their defire to haue a Queene of the fame nation and language, & of hope to procreate children. For these causes the negociation became every day mote hard and despetate betweene both those Princes, wherein was also concurrant the ordinarie inclination of the Cardinall of Yorke towardes the French King, together with the open complaints he made of the Emperour, as well for the interests and respects of his King, as for the small reputation the Emperour bega to hold of him: he confidered that afore the battel of Pania, the Emperour neuer fent letters ynto him which were not written with his owne hand, and fubscribed, your fonne and Cofin Charles but after the battell, he yied the service of Secretaries in all the setters he wrote to him, infixing nothing of his own hand but the subscription, not with titles of so great reuerence & submission, but onely with this bare word Charles. In this alteration of affection of the Cardinall, the King of England tooke occasion to receive with gracious wordes and demonstrations, the Embassiadour sent by the Lady Regent, to whom he gave comfort to hope well in things to come: and a litle afterwardes, estraunging his minde wholly from the affaires which were in negociation betweene him and the Emperour, he made a consederation with the Lady Regent contracting in the name of her sonne, wherein he would have inferted this expresse condition, that for the kings ransome and deliveric, should not be delivered to the Emperour any thing that at that time should be under the power or possession of the crowne of Fraunce.

This was the first hope which fell vpon the Realme of Fraunce, and this was the first consolation in so many aductities, which asterwardes went on increasing by the disorders of the Imperials in Italie: They were become so insolent for so great a victorie, that perswading themselves that all men and all difficulties should yeeld and give place to their will, their glorie made them loose the occasion to accord with the Venetians, and gained y things which they had promised to the Pope, and lastly brought them to fill full of suspicions both the Duchie of Willam and all the other regions of Italie: and so going onto sow seedes of new innovations and troubles, they reduced the Emperour to this necessitie, to make a rash deliberation, daungerous for his estate in Italie, is his auncient selicitie and the hard fortune and destinie of the Pope had not bene of greater force: Matters assuredly most worthy of a knowledge particular, to the end that of accidents and things so memorable may be vinderstood the soundations and counsels, which being oftentimes hid, are for the most part revealed and published after a maner most farre from the truth.

But scarcely had the Pope capitulated with the Viceroy, when were presented vnto him the great offers of Fraunce, to stirre him up to the watte: wherein albeit he wanted not the perswafions of many to induce him to the same effect, and lesse diminution of the distrust which he had before of the Imperials, yet he determined to take fuch a course and proceeding in all things, as he would leave no cause to either of them to suspect him for his actions: Therefore he had no sooner understood that the Viceroy had accepted and pronounced the contract made at Reme, then he caused publication to be made within Saint lobn de Latran, and as he taried not for the ratification of the Emperour which was promifed to be fent first, so the better to demonffrate his intention, he honored with his presence, and with the same solemnitie he was wont to yse at his coronatio, the publication which was made the first day of May:he folicited also the Floretimes to make payment of the money promifed, and interpoled as much as he could, to draw the Venetians to enter appointment with the Imperials. But on the other fide, were presented to him by then, many just causes of complaint, since in the payment of the money promised, they would not accept the fine and twentie thousand duckats payed by the Florentins according to his ordinaunce during the negociation of the accord, for that the Viceroy alleaged impudetly, that if other promise were past, it was made without his commission: besides, that they had not retired their fouldiers from off the landes of the Church , but replenished the townes of Plaisance with garrisons. To these things which some way might haplie be excused, both for their want of money, and necessitie of harbour and lodging, was added also, that not onely in the mutation of the state of Sienna, they gave suspition to bearea minde estraunged from the Pope, but also they suffered afterwardes the Citizens of Montenous to be ill handled and spoyled of their goods by the Libertines, not with flanding upon the Popes often complaints, they gave him hope to remedie those disorders . But that which vexed him most of all , was the dealing of the Viceroy, who did not onely incline suddenly to the solicitations of the Duke of Ferrara, but also put him in hope not to force him to leave Reggia and Rubiera: he promised him also to induce the Emperour to take his estates into protection, notwithstanding he made dayly promises to the Pope, that when the Florentmes had performed to pay that which they ought, he would make himeftsoones repossessed of those townes: and to the end the Pope should the better solicite the effectes of these promises and hopes, and also to obtaine to have the companies of men of warre to retire from the territories of the Church , he sent vnto him the Cardinall Saluratio, his Legate in Lombardie and Deputie Legate with the Emperour, to whom the Ficeroy made beleeue believe that he was determined to procure restitution of Reggia by armes, if the Duke refused to render it by good will : But the effect of things aunswered nothing the promises and wordes; a matter and maner of dealing which could not be excused by the necessitie of money, for that vponthe rendring of those townes, there grew to them a greater quantitie: and there was taken good reason and matter to interprete the likelihood of that matter to proceede of a desire they had either to have him embased and pulled lower, or else to winne the Duke of Ferrara, or lastly, to go on still with better degrees and preparations for the oppressing of Italie. These matters brought to the Pope a suspition and griese of minde almost incredible, but much more was he perplexed to fee and confider that the Emperors intention was nothing different: who having dipatched to the Pope letters of ratification of the confederation made in his name to the Viceroy, deferred to confirme the three articles accorded apart and separate from the capitulation: he alleaged, that touching the restoring of the townes holden by the Duke of Ferrara, he had no power to do an act prejudiciall to the rights of the Empire, nor to force the Duke who protested to hold them in chiefe of the Empire, in which respect the Emperour offered to referre that controuerfie to the triall of law and instice, or else to be resoluted by some friendly composition. It was eafily comprehended that he could have bin conteted they should still have remained to the Duke, but under his inuestiture, and to pay him an hundred thousand duckats, and as much to the Pope for the inuestiture of Ferrara, and for the penaltie imposed vpon the contract which he had made with Adrian: he alleaged that it was a thing impertinent to accord with his ministerstouching the trade & prouisió of salt fró the Duchy of Millan, because the soueraigne profite of that Dukedome by the copolitio of the inuestiture though not as yet configued, appertained to Francis Sprce: & that therfore the Viceroy was not simply boud by the article to copell him to take it, but to do what he could to induce him to cofent: which promife for that it was extended to the actio of a third person, was notoriously of no force touching the effect to bind either himselfe or another: Neuerthelesse for desire he had to gratisie the Pope he would have practised to induce the Duke to consent, if the matter had not become no more his owneinterest but the interest of another, seeing the Duke of Millan in recopece of the succors which the Archduke had sent him had couenanted to take falt of him: and yet notwithstanding, he sayd he would interpose & do all he could to induce his brother (receiving recopence of money) to accord & colent to it, not for ever as the article expressed, but during the Popes life, which was most agreeable to reason: he would not admit also the article of benefites & benefices, vnlesse, together with that which was expressed in the innestitures, were joyned such things as had bin observed by his predecessours kings of Naples. In regard of these difficulties, the Pope refused to accept the letters of ratification, nor would not fend his to the Emperour, but infifted this demaund, that feeing the Emperour had not ratified within the terms of foure moneths according to the promife of the Viceroy, that the hundred thousand duckats might be restored to the Florentins: which demaund was answered with suttleties & rather cavillatios, the with firme & good foundatios: that the conditio of restitution of the hundred thousand duckats was not affixed to the instrument, but promised in an article apart by the Viceroys Agents by oath, & that it was not referred to the ratification of the league which the Emperour had not onely ratified within the terme of foure moneths, but also had sent out letters of it in due forme. Moreover the Pope had advertisement that the Emperors Court was vniverfally ill disposed to the things of Italie, & he was not ignorant that the Captaines of his army rose vp to perswade him, that for the more absolute assuring of his enterprises in Italie, it were good to cause Modena to be rendred to the Duke of Ferrara, to repossesse the familie of Betwoler of Bolognia, & to take the iurifdiction of Florece, of Sienna, & of Lucqua, as townes appertaining to the Empire: vea, so full was he of doubt and suspition. & so farre from stay and resolution, and knowing withall that the Frenchmen offered as a pray to the Emperour the regions of Italie, that by necessitie he went temporising, having not whereupon to fixe his foundation.

In this time the accord betweene the Viceroy & the Venetians was solicited continually, wherin Atrestife of befides the Viceroy lought to bind of new the Venetians to the defence of the Duchy of Millan, he accord between demaunded great summes of money to satisfie their fault of inobservation of the cosederation past the Victory & sed: The Venetians had many reasons to incline the to give place to necessitie, but of the cotrarie, the Venetians. they were caried with more reasonable perswassos to remaine in suspece: amid which incertainty of eltate, their coulels were full of varietie & irrefolution: Neuertheleffe after many conferences & meetings, their altonishmetbeing no lesse then their neighbours for so great a victory of the Emperor,& their estate onely being abadoned & reduced to prinatio on all sides, they addressed new commissions to P. Pefero their Embassador resident with the Viceroy, to construe the league in the same maner it had bin made afore, paying ouer to the Emperour fourescore thousand duckats for fatisfaction of penalties past. But the Viceroy being made so much the more obstinate by how much they feemed fearefull, answered them resolutely, that he would not renue the confederatio, unlesse they payed in the hundred thousand duckats: which obstinacie drew with it this ill accident, as oftentimes is seene to happen in matters deliberated with lognesse of time & no readinesse of will: for, fo long a tract was taken in the disputing and debating of this litle summe, that the Venetians had advertisement how theking of Englad bare no more so ill a mind to the advertises of France as was feared in the beginning, & befides, the Imperial armie had both payed and difmifled many regiments of Launceknights: matters which the Venetians interpreting to their aduauntage, and better suretie from vexation, they determined to dwell as yet in suspence, and to reserve in them felies (as much as they could) power and election to take those deliberations, which by the traine and euent of generall things, they knew were best for them.

The person of led prisoner into Spaine.

The Viceroy and the other Captaines Imperiall were not a litle stirred up by these variations the French king to transport the person of the French King into a place of furetie, judging that for the ill disposition of others, they could not without perill keepe him garded in the Duchie of Millan, In which feared joyned to their continuall defire so to do, they resolued to conucy him to Genes, and from thence by fea to Naples, where his lodging was prepared within the Newcastell . This determination brought no litle griefe to the King, who from the beginning of his captiuitie, had vehemently defired to be caried into Spame: perhaps he had opinion (measuring happily another man by his owne nature, or elfe running with the common errour of mortall men being eafily beguiled in things they defire) that if once he were brought to the presence of the Emperour, he doubted not of some easie passage for his libertie, either through the Emperours benignitie, or by the conditions he meant to offer. The Viceroy was of the fame defite for the augmentatio of his own glory, but being retained for feare of the French army by fea, they dispatched by commo consent Monsieur Montmerancie to the Lady Regent: she graunted to him fixe light gallies of those that lay in the port of Marfeillesy, po promife to have the restored assoone as the king was arrived in Spaine. With these gallies he returned to Portofino, where the kings person was already arrived, & ioyning them to fixteene Gallies of the Emperour, which was the nauie appointed at first to conduct him to Naples, he reduced them all into one fleete, and armed them all with footemen of the Spanish. The Captaines Imperials & the Duke of Burbon, were perswaded that the kings person should be led to Naples, but on the contrary, fetting faile the seuenth of June, they tooke such course, that the eight day they arrived with a happy voyage at Rosa a hauen of Catalognia: their coming brought no small joy to the Emperour, who till that day had understood nothing of that resolution: and assoone as he was made assured of the kings being there, he dispatched comandements to all places where he should passe, to receive him with great honors, onely till it should be otherwise determined, he gaue order to keepe him in the castell of Sciatina neare to Valence, a castell anciently yied by the kings of Aragon for the garding of great personages, & wherein had bin kept prisoner for many yeares, the Duke of Calabria. But the deliberation to keepe him in that place, seeming farre too rigorous to the Viceroy, & nothing agreeable to the promises he had made to the king in Italie, he won so much of the Emperour, that till he had taken another counfell, the Kings person might remaine neare Valence in a place apt for hunting & other delights of the field: There he left him lodged with sufficient gard under the charge of Captaine Alarcon, in whose custody he had alwayes remained since his vnfortunate day : and fro thece the Viceroy together with Montmerancie, went to the Emperor to make report of the estate of Italy, & the difcourse of things which tilthat day bin debated with the king, with who he perswaded the Emperour with many reasons to draw to accord, for that he could not have a faithfull amitie & coniun-Ctio with the Italians: The Emperor after he had heard the Viceroy & Motmerancie, determined to convey the King into Castille to the castell of Madrill, a place far removed fro the sea & the confines of France, where being honoured with ceremonies & reuerences agreeable to fo great a Prince, he should neuerthelesse be kept under carefull & straite gard, with libertie to take the ayre abroad certaine times of the day, mounted onely ypon a moyle. The Emperour could neuer be brought brought to admit the king to his presence, if first the accord were not either established, or at least in an assured hope of resolution: & to the end there might be interposed in the negociation a personage honorable, and almost equall with the king, Montmerancie was sent in great diligence into Fraunce, to bring the Duchesse of Alenson the kings sister and a widow, with fulnesse of authority to debate and contract: and to the end this negociation of accord were not hindered by new difficulties, there was made a litle afterwards a truce vntill the end of December, betweene the Emperour and such as administred the government of Fraunce. Moreover the Emperour gave order that one part of those galleys which were come with the Viceroy, shold returne into Italy to bring the Duke of Burbon into Spaine, without whose presence and prinitie he gave our that he would make no convention : and yet the galleys what for want of money, and other impediments, were prepared but with flow diligence. The Emperour shewing himselfe vehemently disposed to establish an universall peace betweene the Princes of Christendome, and also at one time to give forme reasonable forme to the affaires of Italy, solicited instantly the Pope to hasten away the Cardinall Saluiatio, or some others, with sufficient authority: he sent also to be excused to the king of England, taking the reasons of his excuse vpon this, that he could not resist the generall will and univerfall inclination of his peoples: and fent withall to the Pope Lopus Utrado, for a dispensation to marie the infant of Portugall his cousin german, and by that meane conjoyned to him in second degree : he sent also by the same Lopus, who departed upon the end of July, the inuestitute of the Duchy of Millanto Frauncis Storce, but under this condition, to pay presentby an hundred thousand duckets, with obligation to pay fine hundred thousand more at dinerse tearmes, and to take the trade of falts of the Archduke his brother: the same Lopus caried also commission to dispose of his men of warre in this sort; that except the regiments of Spanish footmen who were to remaine in the Marquisdome of Salusso, all the others shold be dismissed: that fixe hundred men at armes should returne to the realise of Naples, and the refidue remaine in the Duchie of Millan: and lastly, that the Marquis of Pesquiero should be Captaine generall of his army. The Emperour added to this commission, that those moneys which he had sent to Genes to defray foure Carackes with the which he intended speedily to passe in person into Spaine, should be converted to the necessities and vsage of the armie, for that he was now determined not to depart out of Spaine: the Commission bare also to send in the Emperours name the Protonotarie Caraccioll to Venice, to induce that Senate to a new confederation, or at least to infinuate his disposition, and leave them satisfied that all his actionstended to an universall peace amongst Princes Christian. But the going of the French king into Spaine brought no litle perplexitie to the Pope and the Venetians, who feeing the Emperours armie was much diminished, confidered that into what part of Italy the kings person should be transported, the Imperials could not but find many impediments by the necessity to have him well garded; so that by that meane either there might easily arise some occasion to deliver him, or at least the difficultie to carie him into Spaine, and the litle furetie to keepe him in Italy , would constraine the Emperous to give fome good forme to the generall affaires: but when by transporting his person into Spaine, both his owner hopes were disappointed, and meane given to his enemies to leade him into sure prison, they differenced that all treatifes and negotiations were wholly in the hands of the Emperour, and that there could be established no foundation upon the practices and offers of the French: in so much as the reputation of the Emperour rifing into augmentation by dayly degrees, all men began to expect from his Court and from his hand lawes and rules to dispose all affaires. In these disontentinents were concurrant also (but for diverse causes) the displeasures of the Duke of Burbon, & the Marquis of Pesquiero, for that the Viceroy took vpon him without their privity to leade he French king into Spaine: Such is the emulation of men in the case of glory or reputation, which " note then all other worldly passions, hath a naturall propertie to cary their minds headlong into 19 imbition of other mens merite. The Duke of Burbontooke the reason of his discontentment vp- 32 on this, that being expulsed Fraunce for the alliance he had made with the Emperour, he chaenged a more interest then any others to be called & to comunicate in all the practises of accord: n regard whereof he determined to passe also into Spaine, and yet he was driven to stand longer rpon his going then willingly he would, for that he taried for the returne of the galleys that caned the Viceroy. The Marquis tooke displeasure with the Viceroy for the small estimation he nade of him: and was no leffe ill contented with the Emperour, for that he was not thankfull as appertained to his merits and many feruices done in the last warres, and lately in the battell of Pama, touching which victoric albeit he had deferued more praise and glorie then all the Captaines of the armie, yet the Emperor, contrarie to the law of equitie & reason, had transferred the whole reputation to the Viceroy, with many high honours & demonstrations. This the Marquis could not difgeft with fufferance, but in the passion of his wrong, as he thought, he wrote letters to the Emperour full of detraction against the Viceroy, tempered with complaints, to be so much disfauoured of him, as not to be thought worthy at least to be made privile to such a resolution: and that if in the warre and dangers thereof, the deliberation of things had bene referred to his counfell and proper arbitration, the French king had not onely not bene taken, but also assoone as the losse of the Duchie of Millan had followed, the Imperial armie being driven to abandon the defence of Lombardy, would necessarily have retired to Naples: lastly, he charged the Viceroy to be gone to triumph of a victory, wherein it was manifeltly knowne to the whole army he had no part at all: yea for proofe that in the heate and most furie of the battell, he was both without courage and without counfell, there were many that heard him crie many times, We are loft and vanquished: and that if he would denie this chalenge, he offred to iultifie it vpon his body by the execution of armes, according to the lawes and rules of warre: the Marquis also was further incenfed vpon this, that fending immediatly after the victorie to take possessio of Carpy, thinking the Emperour would deliuer it to him, he was not fatisfied in that defire: the reason was, that the Emperour having graunted it two yeares before to Prosper Colonno, assured that notwithstanding he neuer had the inuestiture, yet in memorie of him that was dead, he would to the profite of Ve pasian his sonne, leave to his house the same recompence, which in his life time he had intended in recordation of his valour and actions: which reason albeit was just, and that such examples of gratitude ought to be acceptable to the Marquis, though not fo much for the excellency of them, yet for the hope they brought, that his great feruices should be brought into liberall consideration by the Emperor: yet it was not embraced of him, not for that it was not just & equall but because for the opinion he bare of himselfe, he held it convenient that that peculiar humor and appetite of his , proceeding of a conctoufnesse and irreconciliable hatred which he bare to the name of Profeer, should be preferred before all other interests, how inst soener they were. In this intenperancie of passion, he cried out of the Emperour and the whole counsell, sending his complaints through all the regions of Italy, and that with fuch detellation of the Emperours ingrati-Oceasions give tude, that by his exclaiming others tooke courage to build new plots. Of which, if the Emperous to the Emperor thought to proceed no further in the matters of Italy, didrile a just occasion, yea almost a necessity of new emotions to take other resolutions: but if he stood vpon ends and purposes ambitious, he had means to co uer them with the most honest occasion and fairest colour he could defire and seeing from thence was deriued the very beginning and cause of right great stirres and alterations, it is necessary were duce it to some particular rehearfall.

The warre which in the life of the late Pope Leo, was begun as well by him as by the Empe ror, for the chasing of the Frech king out of Italy, was leavied under colour to reestablish Fraun cis Sforce in the Duchie of Millan: and albeit for the execution hercof, after the victory was obtain tained, promife was made to transferre to him the obedience of that state, together with the castle of Millan, & the other places of thrength, when they shold be recourred: yet such was the magni ficency & oportunitie of that Duchie, that the former feare ceased not, which men had of the Em perours ambition to aspire to it. They interpreted the impediments which he received by the French king, to be the cause that he kept cloked as yet so great a thirst, for that he had alte red those peoples defiring vehemently to haue Frauncis Sforce for Lord, and had flirred vpa Italy against him, being not content to suffer the French to rise to such a greatnesse: so the Frauncu Sforce held that Duchie but with a hard yoke and subjection, and tributes and charge intollerable: for all the stay & foundation of his defence against the French confisting in the Empe ror & in his army, he was constrained not only to respect him as his Prince, but also to live subse cted to the will of his Captaines: by whom he was milerably compelled to entertaine his regi ments of men of warre not payd by the Emperor, sometimes with money which he leauied vpe his subjects with grieuous imposts & great difficulties, & sometimes in suffering them licentious to liue vpon his people by difcretion, and that in all the feuerall parts of his estate, except th Citie of Millan: oppressions which albeit of themselves were heavie and grievous, yet the nature of the Spaniard being greedy, and when he hath the meane to discouer his inclination yerv infolent, made them intollerable: neuertheleffe the daunger which was had of the Frenchmen, to whom the inhabitants were enemies, and the hope that those vexations would one day draw to end, wrought in the hearts of men a greater sufferance then their forces or faculties could well beare. But after the victorie of Pausa the people could no more endure, feeing the same necessisties no more continuing, for that the king was prisoner, yet their calamities continued not withstanding, and therefore they required to be somewhat eased of their burthens, by withdrawing from the Duchie, either all or the most part of the armie. The like instance was also made by the Duke, having enjoyed of the Dukedome no other thing till that day, then the bare name and title: he feared least the Emperour, being now affured of the French king, would occupie and retaine the Duchie to himselte, or at least bestow it in donation upon some of his followers and dependanciers. In which feare and suspition, derived of the verie nature of the affaires occurrant, he was specially nourithed by the insolent words spoken by the Viceroy afore he conveyed the king into Spaine, together with the demonstrations expressed by the other Captaines, wherein much lesse that they published any reputation to be holden of the Duke, seeing they defired openly that the Emperour would oppresse him: Besides, the Emperour, after many delayes and deferring, having fent to the Viceroy the expedition and priviledges of the investiture, the Viceroy when he presented them to the Duke, demaunded for recompence of charges for conquering and defending that state, to pay to the Emperor within a certaine terme, the summe of twelve hundred thousand duckets; a demaund so excessive and intollerable, that the Duke was driven to have recourse to the Emperor to moderate and abate the fumme. But these difficulties drew a doubt least the demands so immmoderate were not interposed to make the matter alwayes defetred: moreouer such as fought to excuse the necessity of Frauncis Sforce, alleaged manie other generall causes of his iust suspition, and particularly the knowledge he had that the Imperiall Captaines were resoluted to restraine or retaine him. In so much as being summoned by the Viceroy to a certaine counsell or Dyot, he refused to go, fayning to be ficke, couering himselfe with the like excuses in all places where they had power to do him violence: he nourished this suspitio whether it were true or false, and joyned withall this confideration, that the flate of Millan was well disburdened of the regiments of men of war, part of the Spanish footmen being gone into Spame at seuerall times with the Viceroy and the Duke of Burbon, and also diverse bands being made rich with pillage and pray, were retired by troupes into fundrie places: and confidering also the great indignation that was shewed to the Marquis of Pejquiero, he deuiled by these advantages to assure himselfe of the prefent danger, and entred into hope that the army might be eafily defeated, vling the colors and valour of the Matquis. The author of this deuise was lerome Moron his Chauncellour, a man of confriacie anigh authoritie and place with him, and for the faculty of his spirit, facility of invention, flowing e- gainst the Emloquence, familiar readinesse, and great experience, and lastly, for his resolution and magnanimitie, hauing oftentimes made fingular refiftance against aduersties, was in our age a personage of right worthy memory: which parts or gifts had tied vpon his name a perpetual fame and honour, if they had gone accompanied with fuch fincerity of mind, fuch care and zeale to integrity, and with such maturitie of judgement, as his counsels for the most part had not bene difcerned to hold more of precipitation and impudencie, then of circumspection or honestie. This man founding the intention of the Marquis, made fuch infinuation into his mind already deeply grieued, that they began to commune to cut in peeces the remainder of the regimements remaining within the Duchie of Millan, and to make the Marquis king of Naples; an enterprise which they held of easie action, if the Pope and Venetians would be concurrant with them: and touching the Pope, whose mind was drawne with suspition and doubt, after he was founded by the aduife of Moron, he shewed himselfe no whit disagreeing to that counsell, and vet he aduertised the Emperour vinder colour of friendship to entertaine his Captaines in deuotion and well contented, not that he meant to disclose the practise, but to prepare to himselse a refuge if the matter declined to some ill euent: but the Venetians imbraced the deuise with resolution and fincere affection, perswading themselves that no lesse readinesse of mind and will would be found in the Lady Regent, who began to perceive, that fince her fonne was arrived in Spaine, the negociations of his deliuerie were not continued with that facilitie that was lookedfor. There is no doubt but these counsels had easily succeeded, if the Marquis of Pesquiere

Capitulations betweene the confederates against the Emperour. had proceeded fincerely in that confederation against the Emperour; but whether at the first he entertained the practife or not, there was diverfity of opinions as well amongst the Spaniards, as in the verie Court of the Emperour. Many that were observers of times and events of affaires, beleeued that at the beginning he was simply concurrant with the residue, but afterwards he disclaimed from the enterprile, and made new deliberations both for the confideration of many difficulties that might happen with the time, & also fearing the continual solicitations of the French with the Emperour, with the resolution that the Duchesse of Alenson should go to him : yea some do assure that he deferred so long to aduertise the Emperous of these conspiracies pretended in Italy, that having received knowledge of themby Anthony de Leua and Marino Abbot of Nagero, Commissarie in the Emperours armie, all the whole Court matuelled at the filence of the Marquis: but howfocuer his dealing was then, it is certaine, that a litle after he fent to the Emperour Iohn Baptista Castaldo, who imparted the reall discourse of the conspiracie: and with the privitie of the Emperour did not only entertaine the practife, but also the better to decipher the thoughts of euerie man, and to take from them all the meane to deny that they had confented, he communed by mouth with the Duke of Millan, and perswaded Moron to induce the Pope, who a litle before had indued him with the perpetuall gouernmet of the Citie of Beneuent) to fend Dominicke Sawlo with a letter of credence to conferre with him of the natter. The conclusions of the treatife were these: That betweene the Pope, the realme of Fraunce and the governments of Italy should be a league, ouer the which the Marquis of Pefquiero should be Captaine generall: That for the first action he should bestow the Infantery or footbands of the Spanish severally in fundry places of the Duchy of Millan, and so drawing to himselfe so manie as would follow him, the others should be spoiled and put to the sword, together with Antho. de Leua, who next to himselfe was the chiefe Commander of the armie: & then joyning to him the forces of all the confederates, he should execute the enterprise of the kingdome of Naples, whereof the Pope was to indue him with the inuestiture. The Marquis seemed to find no other difficulty in these actions, fauling that afore he put any thing to triall, he defired to be fatisfied, whether without blemishing his honour and fidelity, he might embrace such an enterprise in case the Pope put it vpon him by his authoritie: whereupon was brought into question & consideration, to whom, he being a Baron and subject of the realme of Naples, ought to obey, either to the Emperour, to whom the profitable iunisdictió of the realme appertained, by the inuestiture he had received of the Church, or to the Pope, in whom was the direct foueraigntie, being abfolute and foueraigne thereof. Vpon which article both at Millan by the ordinance of Frauncis Sforce, and at Rome by the appointment of the Pope, were called very fecret confultations of excellent Doctors with suppression of their true names. These hopes against the Emperour were augmented by the offers of the Lady Regent, who judging that either the necessitie or the feare of the Emperour, would advance much the matters that were treated with him for the deliuerie of her sonne, solicited earnestly to take armes, promising to fend into Lombardie a strength of fine hundred Launces, and to be concurrant in the expenses of the warre with great contributions of money. Moron for his part ceased not to confirme the minds of the residue in that opinion: for, besides the perswasions he made how easie it would be even without the aide of the Marquis of Pesquiero, to deseat that armie fo much diminished in numbers, he promised in the Dukes name, that if the Marquis should not fland constant, but swarue from the resolution of the treatise, immediatly after order given to the other businesse, there should be apprehended prisoners within the Cassle of Millan, as well he as the other Captaines, having daylie accesse thither to consult. But albeit these occasions seemed great, and no leffe importing the circumstances and dependances which they drew, yet they had not bene sufficient to easy the Pope into armes without the Marquis of Pefguiero, if at the fame time he had not heard of prouision sent to Genes to arme soure Carackes, & with all had not had some token & intelligence fro Spaine of the Emperors inclination to passe into Italy; a matter which did not a litle afflict him, as well in regard of the conditions of the time present, as also for the ancient observation and disposition of the Popes of Rome, to whom nothing hath wont to bring more terrour and altonishment, then the comming of Emperours with armed hand into Italie: ir so much as desiring in his feare to meet with this danger, he tooke the consent and privitie of the Venetians, & dispatched secretly into Fraunce to conclude the matters negociated with the Lady Regent, Sigismund Secretarie to Albert Carpi, a man experieced in affaires of estate, & of singular confidence confidence with the Pope: but as he ran post towards Fraunce, he was set upon by night by theeues and robbers, and flaine neare the lake of Isea, vpon the territorie of Bressia; which accident for the secret keeping of it many dayes, brought to the Pope great suspition that he was secretly taken and flayed in some place by the Imperiall Captaines, and haply by the Marquis himselfe, whom they began to distrust much for his maner of proceeding, but more for the delayes he yied.

In this estate and condition of affaires, arrived the dispatch of Lopus Virado, who remaining ficke in Sauoy, fent his expedition away to Millan by a man expresse: he brought the letters pattents by the which the Marquis of Pesquiero was declared Captaine generall, who to continue with others in the same semblance, made as though such a charge was not verie agreeable to him. and yet he accepted it immediatly. The same Lopus fent also to the Pronotarie Carraccooll, the commission to go to Venice in the Emperours name, to induce that Senate to a new confederation, or at least to infinuate into them what defire the Emperour had to line in peace with all men. In this time Francis Sforce was fallen into a disease verie daungerous for his life, and accepted the inuelliture of the Duchie, paying for it fifty thousand duckets, and ceased not for all that to continue the practifes begun with the Marquis. The opinions were diverse touching this difpatch of the Emperour: fome belowed that he had simply determined to assure the Italians: but others judged that for feare of new innovations & Hirres, he fought to hold men in suspence with diuerle hopes, and going on still winning of time, to agree to the inuestiture, and in apparance graunt a commission to agreeable to all Italy to make retire his armie, though on the other fide he had given directions to his Captaines not to firre nor remove : yea there were fome that had this opinion that he had intelligence from the Marquis of the practifes entertained with Moron, and therfore he fent out fuch a commission, not to be obeyed, but to get some justification, & with his hopes to keepe lulled afleepe the mindes of men, vitill he faw apt time to aduaunce and execute his purpofes. In which diverfitie of humors and opinions, albeit it was verie hard to found out the simple truth, seeing withall it was not knowne whether Lopus Virado was dispatched at he same time that arrived at the Court Iohn Baptista Castaldo, sent by the Marquisto advertise he Emperour of the negociation: yet confidering by many accidents and euents fithence, what outfe the Emperour hath taken, it is without doubt that it is leffe fallible to hold for true the beter and the more easie interpretation. But in this meane while the Marquis omitted no oportunity wherein occasion was given to entertaine Moron and the others with the same hopes, deferring notwithstanding with many excuses the execution of things: wherein he tooke one occasion of the ficknesse of the Duke of Millan, which increased on him by such daungerous degrees, that elerie one held almost for certaine, that it would leade him to his last time: for all the Captaines pretending that in case of the Dukes death, the estate of that Duchie should return to the Empeor, as foueraigne Lord in chiefe, it was not only not conceniet for him to retire his armie, but also twas necessarie to call in a new strength of 2000 Launceknights, & prepare a greater number to pe in readinesse: so that the souldiers for their numbers and valours being puissant in the Duchie of Millan, there was no meane either to dissolue them, or at least to offend them: he gaue also rope to execute the counfels of the conspiracie assoone as there was apt concurrancie of time and neance in expectation whereof he faid he proceeded with a great respect to the Pope, and for graification of him, he leavied from off the estates of the Church his garrisons of men of warre, who gaue him occasion of right great complaints. But about this time almost all things were chaged by a new accident which hapned in Spaine; The French or the French king falling ficke in the Cattle of Wadrill, and having in vaine defired the presence ling extreamly of the Emperour, was carried by his discontentment and melancholy into such extremity and dan ficke in the Cager of his life, that the Physitions appointed for his cure, told the Emperour that they stood def- file of Madril, perate of his recouerie, if himselse in person came not to comfort him with some hope of his delucrie. The Emperour obeying more compation then the reason of things, was not curious to condifcend to performe so good an office: and as he prepared to visite him accordingly, his high Chancellour feeking to turne him from the journey, told him with many strong reasons, that he tould not go to him in honor, but with intention to deliuer him prefently, and without any couenant: otherwise as it would be a humanity not royall but mercenarie, so it wold disclose a defire to recover him, not moved of charitie, but pushed on by his proper interest, as not to loose by his death the occasion of the profite hoped for by the victorie, a counsell assuredly both graue and as the Emperour : and yet being more caried by the reasons of others, he tooke post to go to him: but for the daunger of the king being almost at the extremitie, the visitation was short, and yet for the time accompanied with gracious words, full of hope that he would deliuer him in: mediatly vpon his returning to health. In so much that whether it was by the comfort that he breathed into him (in the ficknesse of captivitie the promise of libertie exceeds all medicines) or by the benefite of his youth, which with the favour of nature was stronger then the maladie, he began after this visitation to resume so good disposition, that within few dayes he was out of danger, not withstanding he could not recouer his former health but with very flow time. And now neither the difficulties that were shewed on the Emperours side, nor the hopes which were given by the Ita-"hans, nor any other nature of impediments what soener could stay the voyage of the Lady Alenfon into Spaine: for that as nothing was more hard or heatie to the Frenchmen then to leaue off the practifes and negociations of accord begun with those that had power to restore their king, fo nothing was more easie to the Emperour, then feeding the French with hopes, to draw their minds from taking armes, and by that meane fo to keepe the Italians in suspence, as not to date to enter into new deliberations: and in that cunning maner, formetimes vfing delayes, and formetimes pressing forward the affaires, he thought to keepe the minds of all men confused and entangled. The Lady Alenon was received by the Emperour with verie gracious demonstrations and lejon treateth hopes, but the effects fell out both hard and heavie: for when the ministred speech to him for the with the Empe-mariage of his fifter the widow with the king, he made answer that it was a matter which could not be done without the consent of the Duke of Burbon: the other particularities were debated by deputies of both partes, wherein as the Emperour infilted obstinately to have the Duchy of Burgundy restored, as appertaining to him: so the French refused to consent, vnlesse he would accept it for dowrie, or else to referre it to the sentence of the law and justice to decide the true title: and albeit they could eafily have condificended to the refidue, yet for that they were so far offsor the demaund of Burgundy, the Lady Alenjon returned at last into Fraunce, without winning any other grace then a fauour to fee the king her brother: who growing more and more into diffrust of his deliuerie, defired her at her departing, to admonish his mother and all the Counfell fro him, to looke carefully to the profite of the Crowne of Fraunce without having any confideration of him, as if he lived not. But not withflanding the departing of the Lady Alenson, the solicitations for the kings delivery did not cease; for that there remained behind the Prefident of Paris & the Bishops of Ambrunand Tarbe, who had till then followed the negociation but with verse litle hope, fince the Emperor would not hearken to any condition, if first Burgundy were not rendred,

Cardinali Saluiatio the Popes Legate

which the king could not be brought to restore, but in a last necessity. About this time the Cardinal Saluiatio the Popes Legate arrived at the Court, where being receiued of the Emperour with great honour and fauours, he debated vpon his commissions, which principally contained the ratification of the articles promifed by the Viceroy, and secondly a dein the Court of maund to transferre the inuestiture to the Duke of Millan, for the common surery of Italy. But the Emperour. the Viceroy notwithstanding his promises, dissinaded the restitution of Reggia & Rubiera: & by his counfell & through the hopes he had in him, the Duke of Ferrara, defiring to folicite his owne cause before the Emperour, and having the Popes promise not to execute any enterprise vpon his estate for fixe moneths, tooke his way to the frontier of the realme of Fraunce, with intention to passe surther, but being denied passage & safe conduct by the Lady Regent, he returned backe againe to Ferrara. The Legate and the Emperour conferred together, touching a dispensation to take to wife the king of Portugals fifter; a mariage which the Emperor was determined to contract not with standing he had promised the king of England by oath to take no other wife then his daughter: but the Popetemporized this demaund, and flood long to accord to the dispensation, for that many perfwaded him that the defire to obtaine fuch a grace, would reduce the Emperor, and make him the more easie to his desires touching the matters in negociation: and at least wife, in case he would warre upon him, it were far from pollicic and discretion, to give him meane to heap together fo greata maffe of money as would grow to him by that mariage, for that the king of Fortugall offered him for a portion, nine hundred thousand duckets; of which, deducting to much as was fee downe to defray the debts contracted between them, it was thought there would come to his hands at least a summe of five hundred thousand duckets: besides, the subjects of Spaine confented to rayle a contribution of foure hundred thousand, under the title of a beneuolence or feruice, which taking his beginning in times past of the proper wils and motion of the people to releeue the necessities of their kings, was reduced by custome and working of times, into a loane or rather an ordinary Subfidy: yea they offred him moreover to enrich him with a further fumme of foure hundred thousand duckats, if he went through with the mariage. On the other side, the Pope had no power to resist the importunities of the Duke of Sesso the Emperors Embasfador, for that by the property of his inclination, there appeared for the most part in him a repugnancy betweene that he purposed, & things which he executed: for being by nature very far off to accordany grace that was demaunded of him, he was not apt to vie difficulties, nor easie to make deniall: only by the facility of his nature, he fuffered oftentimes his will to be won and ouerruled by the importunity of fuch as fued to him, and in that disposition seemed to accord to things more through feare then by grace, wherein he proceeded neither with that constancy of minde, nor with that Maiesty of title and place, which was required of the greatnesse of his dignity, and was agreeable to the importance of the affaires that flood upon negotiation. And in that maner did he deale touching the dispensation required by the Emperour, for as on the one side he was caried by his proper profite, and on the other fide outerruled by his ordinary facilitie and foft. neffe, fo according to his custome, he discharged vpon the backe of another the thing which himselfe was not sufficient to sustaine, neither with his body nor with his minde: he dispatched by writte the dispensation in the same forme the Emperour demanded it, and sending it to the Cardinall Saluiatio, he tied to it this commission, that if his affaires with the Emperour forted to a resolution according to the hope he had given assoone as the fayd Cardinall should come to the Court, he should deliuer the writ, otherwise to retaine it to himselfe; a commission wherein the minister or servant (as shall be fayd in his place) shewed himselfeno more firme nor more constant, then the maister.

But whilest the Cardinall disputed the Popes commissions with the Emperor, and was alwayes entertained with hope to have the expedition he defired, there felout in Lumbardy very dinerfe effects: for the Duke of Millan being so well recoursed of his ficknesse, that at the least he was holdenout of danger of sudden death, the Marquis of Pesquiero having received by Castaldo the Emperours Commission to prouide for those daungers as he thought good, determined to enter ypon the Duchy of Mallan, under this colour, that the Duke by reason of the conspiracies and practifes holden by Moron, was falne from the rights of investiture, and the chiefe or Soueraigne freehold renerted vpon the Emperour and supreme Lord : and to give a beginning to this resolution, the Marquis lying at Nonaro very sicke, notwithstanding he had bestowed one part of the army within Pama, and lodged the Launceknights neare Loda, which two Cities he had fortified : yet under colour to dispose the army through all the state of Millan, he reuoked to Nouaro when was least doubt of such a matter, the residue of the bands dispersed in Piedmont and the Marquisdome of Salusse, which state the Imperial Captaines had occupied almost immediatly after the victorie . He called also to Nonaro, Moron, in whose personrested almost the importance of all things: and as it was certaine that Otoron being made prisoner, the Duke of Millan would be made deprived both of men and counfell: fo the Marquis by that meane thought to take away all impediments and refiftance, where, if he should suffer him to live in liberty, it could not be but that Azoron, with his spirit, with his experience, and with his reputation, would entangle the estate of his affaires, and give many impediments to his plots and purposes. Besides, it was necessary for the Emperour to have the person of Moron in his power and possession, for that being the author and speciall instrument of all the conspiracies, he thought to draw from him by his proper confession all those treasons and intelligences which were charged vpon the Duke of Millan . There is nothing more hard then to auoyde de-,, flinie, nor no remedie auaylable against the euils determined to fall vpon vs . And as it is ca-,, fie to Juffer a mischiese when we are sure of the remedie, so, for that aduer site is of his owne na-,, ture quarrellous, there is no ill that happeneth which is not so much the more grieuous and ,, troublesome, by how much it happeneth on a sudden, shaking so much the more vehemently,, the resolution and constancie of the minde . Moron might now discerne that the practise, he had with so great secrecie entertayned with the Marquis, was a matter vayne and dissembled: he knew himselfe to be followed with an universall hatred of all the Spanish souldiers, amongst whom ranne already many rumours of his infidelity: Antho. de Lena gaue out publike threates that he would kill him . It is not credible that he did not consider the importance of his person, and discerned to what estate was reduced the Duke of Millan at that time vnprofitable. and as a body dead. Betweene them many dayes before, all things were sufpended and full of fuspition, every one connselled him not to go thither: himselse wavered betweene seare and assurance : and yet either for that he suffered himselfe to be flattered with the faire semblances of the Margnis, or making a foundation upon the great amity running betweene them, or repofing confidence in his faith affured by a letter subligned with his hand, or lattly being pushed on by that fatall necessity which violently draweth on men that will not be led, he resolued to go as it were to a manifest prison; a matter so much the more wonderfull, by how much he hath bene ofteneard fay in the time of Pope Leo, that in all Italy there was not a more impious and difloyall man then the Marquis of Pesquiero. The Marquis received him with gracious demonstrations, & leading him into a chamber apart, they began to renew betweene them the discourse of the former conspiracies, both how to kill the Spaniards and to murder Anth.de Leua, whom the Marquis had fecretly conuayed behind a hanging of Tapestrie, to heare what past betweene them. But affcone as the Marquis was parted from him, which was the fourteenth day of October, Antho. de Leua entred the chamber and apprehended him prisoner, sending him in that fortune to the Castell of Paula. Thither the Marquis went in person to examine him vpon the matters they had debated together, which Moron confessed from one end to the other together with the whole conspiracy, charging the Duke of Millan both as guiltie and confenting to all that had bene past, which was the matter that principally was fought. Thus the Marquis having Moron under gard and keeping proceeded by other degrees to reverse vtterly the Duke: and being already possessed of Loda and Pania, he required the Duke for the furety of the Emperours estate, to deliver vp Cremona and the Castels of Bressia, Leegua, and Pisqueton, places supposed to be the keyes of the Duchy of Millan, for that they have their fituat ion vpon the paffage of Adda. And ashe promifed to introduce no alteration nor innouation, so the Duke both abandoned of counsell, and deprined of hope, made present deliuery according to the demaund, departing willingly with the things which his destinie denied him to detaine. Being possessed of these places, of no lesse importance for the furety of the Marquis and his drifts, then most apt to pull on the extreame reversement of the Duke, he passed to further insolencies, requiring to be received into Millan to have conference with the Duke as healleaged: which being graunted to him with the same facility, he demaunded eftsoones to be possessed of the Castell of Cremona: and albeit he forbate to require the Castell of Mullan as being a demaund not reasonable, for that his person was lodged within it, yet he infilted vehemently that for the furetie of the Emperours armie he would confent the Ca-Hell might be enuironed with trenches : he required also to have delivered into his hands lohn Angeo Rucco, his Secretarie, and Politian Secretarie to Moron, to the end examinations might be imposed upon them for the conspiracies against the Emperour. To these demaunds the Duke aunswered: That touching the Castels of Alellan and Gremona, as he held them in the name and at the instance of the Emperour, to whom he had alwayes bene a most denour and faithfull vasfall, so he could not but judge it prejudiciall to his fidelity, to deliuer them up to the hands of any without his privitie and will. Wherein for his more full understanding and fatisfying, he sayd he would dispatch foorthwith a messenger expresse, so farre foorth as the Marquis would give him furetie of passage: That in the meane while he held it neither comely nor conuenient to consent to be inclosed or intrenched within the Castell; a violence which he would defend with all his power: That he could not depart with Iohn Angeo, being the only man that was instructed in all his affaires of importance, and at that time the only officer about him: And that as touching the Secretarie of Moron, he had a greater care to detaine him, to the end to prefent him to the Emperour, and to proue by that meane, that during the Dukes fickneffe, his maister had embraced and dispatched in his name, and without his primitie many expeditions, which finisterly might be charged upon him, if by that meane he instified not his innocency, and shewed that the practifes of Moron were fatte different and separate from his operations. But the ef-

feet was, that after manie offers and protestations past by writing as well by the one as the other partie, the Marquis compelled the peoples of Millan to passe an oath of sidelitie to the Emperour, in whose name he bestowed officers through all the estate of the Duke dome, to the great displeasure and discontenting of the inhabitantes: and in that authoritie he beganne with trenches to incompasse the Castels of Cremona and Millan, in the which the Duke was refolued to remayne with eight hundred choyse footenen and such reasonable store of victuals as by the shortnesse of the time he could prouide: he gaue himselse ouer to that besieging, partly through the necessitie of the time, and partly for the comfortes and hopes of succours given him by the Pope and the Venetians, not sayling withall with the vse of his Artilleries to hinder as much as he could the working of the trenches which were drawne on that side without, and of more distance from the Castell then those which Prosper Colonno caufed to be cast.

All the Regions of Italy were reduced to a great altonishment for the viurpation of the Dukedome of Millan, which they faw could not but fall inro manifelt feruitude, when so euer an Emperour of nature ambicious and stirring, and for his forces mighty and warlike, should be Lordouer Millan & Naples . But about all others the Pope was especially afflicted, seeing in that action his practiles were disclosed, with the which he had pretended not only to affare Millan, but also to confound the Emperorsarmy, and take from him the kingdome of Naples. Touching the Mat. quis of Pesquiero, it may be, that by these operations he won great fauour with the Emperour, but with all other forts of men he purchased perpetuall infamic, not only for the opinion that most conceiued of him, that in the beginning he extended his intentions to double with the Emperor & to bandy against him, but also notwitstanding he intended fidelity to the Emperour, yet heran a course of infamy in this, to set on men, and with so great art and infidelity to draw the into conspiracy with him, to the end to have occasion to detect them, and to make himselfe great of the transgreffions of others, folicited with words diffembled and artificiall. This alteration made hard the hope of accord that was negociated with the Senate of Venice by the Protonotarie Caraccioll: who hoped that (for the tearmes wherein things flood) the Senate would speedily draw to a conclusion to renew the former confederation with the fame conditions: and to pay to the Emperourfourescore thousand duckats in recompence that in times past he had withdrawne his ayde, leauing there wholly all demaunds to contribute hereafter with money. But the accident of Millan reduced the Senateto no little perplexitie: for on the one fide they flood gricued to be the onely people in Italie that with fo great daunger contended against the Emperour, seeing they were threatned by the Marquis of Pefquiero to transport the whole warre vpon their cleate, whereof they discerned already certaine preparations: and on the other side, they were not ignorant that in case the accord went through, the Emperor should with greater facility make himfelfe absolute Lord of that Duchy, which being joyned to so many estates, and so many other oportunities, they faw was the onely line to leade him to fubdue them together with the refidue of Italy; a matter which was continually declared to them by the Bishop of Bayenx, whom the Lady Regent had fent to folicite an vnion with the Italians against the Emperor: for which purpose, in so great a doubt, and in so daungerous apparances, they made many affemblies, but without any resolution for the diversity of opinions. And albeit to accept the accord, was a thing more conformable to their custome and maner of proceeding, for that it so tooke them out of daungers present, as they might hope in the tract of times and benefite of occasions which commonweales may attend (who in comparison of Princes are immortall) yet it seemed to them a matter of two great importance, to suffer the Emperour confirmed in the estate of Millan, and to see the French remaine excluded from all hope of alliance in Italy: therefore after they had at last resolued to be bound to nothing, they made this answer to the Protonotary Carraccoll: that the forme of their actions patt gaue faith to all the world, and he himselfe being present at the conclusion of the confederation, could well tellifie, with what great affection they had alwayes defired the amity of the Emperour: with whom as they contracted a confederation in a time when if they had hearkned to the French, it had bene (as all the world knew) an operation of right great consequence, so they had presented and would for ever continue in the same disposition towards him: only the necessity of things kept them in suspence, both for that they saw in Lumbardy many changes and innovations of great importance, and also for that they remembred that their confederation with the Emperor, together with fo many mouings & slirs hapned that years in Italy, drew no other end or meaning, then to transferre Francis Sforce to the Duchy of Millan as the principalli foundation of the liberty and furction Italy. In which regard they befought his Maiefly, that maintaining in that case himselse, & deducing afore all the world his bounty, he wold remoue and make cease so great an innouation, and establish the tranquility of Italy: which as it was in his power to do, being now the starte that guided the whole strament, so for their parts, he should find them alwayes disposed and prepared both with their authority and with their forces, to follow so holy an inclination, and honor him besides with all other sorts of office and humility, whether he would exted them generally, or apply them to his particular interests. This answer albeit it contained no hope of conclusion, yet it bred not for all that any ouerture or beginning of warrsfor that both the sicknesse of the Marquis of Pesquiero which aggrauated dayly in worse degrees, & the defire to impatronise himselse first of the whole estate of Millan, and to establish and affure that conquest, together with the inclination of the Emperor extending to put end and resolution to so many other affaires which he had in hand, would not suffer him to give beginning to an enterprise of so great consequence.

The Duke of Burbon in Spaine.

About this time the Duke of Burbon was arrived in Spaine, and came to the Emperours Court the fiteenth day of Nouember: concerning whom it is not reasonable I omit here to touch by the way, that albeit the Emperour received him with all honors and demonstrations of Court, embracing him with the title and grace of his brother in law, yet all the Lords and Nobles of the Court accustomed in all other things to follow the example of their Prince, abhorred him as a person infamous, & called him traitor to his king: fuch was their hatred against him, that one of them being required in the Emperors name to suffer his house to be made ready for the Duke of Burbon, an-Sweredinthe courage and stoutnesse of a Spaniard, that as he would not deny the Emperour any thing he would demaund of him, so his Maietly should well understand, that assoone as Burbon was gone out of his house he would burne it as a pallace infected with the infanty of Burbon and vnworthy afterwards for the dwelling of men of honor. The graces and honors which the Emperor shewed to the Duke of Burbon, augmented greatly the distrust of the Frenchmen, who, somewhat by that meane, but more for the returning of the Lady Regent without effect, began to haue cold hopes in the accord, notwithstanding it was continually negociated by men expresse remaining with the Emperor: in respect whereof, they labored as much as they could to advance the league with the Pope:wherein did concurre the perswasions and authority of the king of England, and the redoubled and vehement instances of the Venetians, together with this oportunitie not of the least consequence. The death of the Marquis of Pesquiero, who about that time, which was the beginning of December, made his last end happily by the just sentence of God, who wold not fuffer him to enjoy the fruit of that seede which he had sowne with so great malignity: He was of the house of Abalos originally derined from Catalignia, and his predecessor came into Italy with king Alfonso of Aragon, he who the first of that house made conquest of the kingdome of Naples: he began to follow armes at the battell of Rauenna, where being very yong he was taken prisoner: and afterwards aspiring to a reputation of a Captaine, he followed all the wars which the Spaniards had in Italy: infomuch as though he had not past the age of xxxvj. yeares, yet for experience he was old, for invention suttle, in counfell grane, in execution r esolute, wise to foresce a danger, and quicke to auoyd a mischiese: he bare great authority and credit with the infantery of Spaine, ouer whom as he had bene of long Captaine generall: so both the victory of Pania and all other actions of merit executed by that army fince certaine yeares, were principally succeeded by his counfell and by his vertue: he was affuredly a Captaine of great valor, but one that with art and diffinulation, knew how to draw fauor and grace to his doings, being befides, proud of mind, of wit deceitfull, of nature malicious, of counfell and action without fincerity, and so fingular in his owne weening, that oftentimes he hath bene heard fay, that he was more worthy to have Spaine for his countrey then Italy. His death as it kindled a great confusion in the whole army with whom he flood in no litle grace and reputation, fo also by his death the contrary fide tooke occasion to hope, that easily they might be able to bringe all the souldiers to ruine and oppression, fince there was taken from them a Captaine of fo great authoritie and valour. And by this occafion like as with the Pope were more vehement and importunate the inflances of fuch as folicited the proceeding of the league, fo also the doubts which detayned him in suspence were nothing leffe, and that with good right, fince on all parts he was touched with motions of right waightie reasons, such as might suffice to hold consused and suspenced any man of right good action and counsell, and much more a Pope Clement to whomit was familiar to proceede alwayes in his affaires

affaires with flownesse and doubt. There was no further expectation of the Emperour for any way or deutle to assure the regions of Italy, and he was manifestly discerned to solicite vehemently the taking of the Castell of Millan; in which action was layed a foundation to convert many other patrimonies into apparant pray or spoyle, but specially the states of the Pope, who being reduced to a generall weakeneffe, had his being planted betweene Lumbardy and the Realme of Naples. And if it were in the Emperours power to oppresse the Pope, there was no doubt that he would not execute it either for ambition which is almost naturally innested in Emperours'against the Popes, or for his owne furety which wife men preferre affore all other regards, or lastly for reuenge, being drawne both to disdaine and distrust for the conspiracies which he entertayned with the Marquis of Pesquiero: and if the necessity to provide for this danger, was great, the foundations and hopes to doe it feemed not light, for that if the remedy were not to succeede by the meane of so mighty a league and vnion, it was to be thought desperate for euer. The Regent of Fraunce made promife of fine hundred launces, & to contribute for enery moneth fo long as the warre should endure, forty thousand duckats, with the which it was intended to wage ten thousand Swiffers: the Pope and the Venetians in one loynt ayd, were to leny eighteene hundred Denifer of men at armies, twenty thousand footenien, and two thousand light horsemen: the Frenchmen princes as and the Venetians promised to take the sea, and with a great Nauy to do inuasion upon Genes, or gainfithe the Realme of Naples: lastly the Lady Regent of Fraunce was bound to begin the war imme-passes the dually with a strong army vpon the frontiers of Spane, to the end to stop the Emperous for sending of men and many to relecue the watre in Italy. The Emperours army that remained in Lumbardy was not great, neither for the numbers & quality of fouldiers being much diminished, nor for the presence of Captaines of conduct and authority, seeing both the Marquis was dead, & the Dake of Burbon and the Viceroy of Naples abode as yet in Spaine: they were without meane to recouer mony for their payes, and had no plenty of victuals to ferue them for foode: The generall , inhabitants there, were enemies to them for the quarrell and defire of their Duke, and no leffe for the intollerable exactions imposed by the fouldiers both in the City of Millan and ellewhere: the Castelsof Millan and Cremona held good as yet for the Duke : and lastly the Venetians gaue hope that the Duke of Ferrara would also enter into his confederation, if the Pope would accord to him Reggia, which by one meanes or other he had alwayes posseleded: these were the hopes of the confederates, which reduced to good manner of proceeding, caried their manifest reasons of happie issue: these were the soundations they layed against the ambition and puissance of the Emperour, shadowed neuerthelesse under the cloke and livery to assure their proper liberties. But on the other fide, the difficulties which they differred, rested in the suttlety and vertue of the enemies, who had this by cultome and property of condition, to temporife a long time with litle mony, and endure many necessities with much patience: they faw the townes which the enemies held, were well fortified, and no leffe facility to reduce them to better frength with ramparts, & other fort offortification, for that they were townes whole fituation was in the plaine or champion: by which oportunitie they were able to entertaine themselues together vitill there came from Germany a sufficient succorto draw and drive the whole warte to the fortune of abattell. Moreover they faw that touching the fouldiers of the league, they could not be but bodies raw & untrained, in comparison of the others resolute and nourished in so many victories: besides they wanted the conduct and presence of a Captaine generall, for that in the Marquis of Mantua then Captaine of the Church, they reposed not sufficient ability to manage and beare out such a charge, neither could they with any furety commit themselves to the fidelity of the Duke of Ferrara not the Duke of Frbin, whom they had so much offended, and much lesse would they rest contented with the greatnesse of the Pope, whom they enuied with no litle mutmure and grudge of minde. Lastly they were not ignorant that naturally the armes and weapons of the Church had but dull edges and cut flowly, and no leffe inferiour was the valor of the Venetians, of whom if either of them apart and feuerally were weake and feeble, what opinion or expectation of their forces being accompanied and conjoyned? This was also brought into confideration, that in the armies of leagues and confederates, was feldome seene a conturrancy of prouisions at conuenient time, and much leffe a correspondence of willes and minds, for that amongst such a diversitie of humors which draw with them divertities of intereftes and ends, are eafily kindled diforders, difdaines & diltrusts, at the least there is seldome an universal readines to follow resolutely the favor of fortune when it is offered, nor a joynt disposition to resist with constancy those stormes and ac uerfities which either the disfauor of the time or malicious instrument may stirre vp in an arm But the matter that in this counsellor deliberation drew with it great feare and difficulty, was suspirion conceined of the Frenchmen, that when sever the Emperour should be constrained ! the necessities of this warre to offer the deliuery of their king, that nation would not onely aba don the league, but also loyne in ayde with the Emperour against the Confederates . And albe the king of England gaue for them his faith and word of a Prince, that they flould not accordi such a renuntiation, and that there was deuise to give assurance in Rome, in Florence, or in Venn for three moneths pay, yet allthis sufficed not to assure such a suspition. For, as the French men had no other end nor intention then to recouer their king, and did manifeflly professe t beare no inclination to the warre, but when they faw no hope to effect the accord: fo it was thing verie congruent and likely, that whenfoeuer the Emperour should be disposed, the would preferre afore all other regards and interestes, to compound and accord with him. An like as they were not ignorant that by how much were great and mighty the preparations an forces of the league, by fo much more readily would the Emperour be inclined to compoun with the French king: enen so it seemed a matter full of petill, to enter a confederation to make warre in the which the strong prouisions of the confederates might do as much hurt as helpe With these reasons did the Embassadors and agents of Princes labour the Pope on all sides, and no lesse was he solicited by his owne officers & ministers, for that both the multitude of his Court and the people peculiar of his counsell, were denided: of whom enery one in particular fanored his proper inclination, with fo much leffe regard, by how much greater was the authority they had gotten vponhim, who till that time was accustomed to suffer himselfe to be carried for the most part by the will of such as in reason ought to have obeyed the twinkling of his eye, and to serve ne other office then as ministers and executers of the direction and ordinance of their maister: for the better information whereof and of many other occurrances, it is necessary to set downe a more large and particular discourse.

Qualities of Pope Leo and Clement.

Leo was the first for the familie of Medicis that bare any Ecclesiasticall dignity, who in the state and authority of Cardinall, did so wel support both himselse and his house, fallen from a wonderfull greatnesse into much declination, that it was reduced to respire and reexpect the returne of a great fortune: he was a man of great liberality, iffuch a name do worthily become him being of so excessive expenses as they passed all rate and measure. At such time as he was raised to the Popedome, he bore a presence of such magnificence and Maiesty, joyned to a port and shew royall, that the representation he made might be thought wonderful!, cuen in one that by long succession had discended of king and Emperours: he was not only prodigall of money and treasure, but also of all other graces and distributions belonging to the prerogative and power of a Pope. These he disposed in such immoderate liberality, that he made vile and base the authority spirituall, disordered the stile and course of the Court, and through his prodigall expenses, reduced himselfe to necessity to seeke mony alwayes by meanes extraordinary. This great facility was accompanied with a most deepe distinulation, with the which he beguiled all the world in the beginning of his pontificacy: The thing that made him feeme a good Prince (Ifpeake not of the goodnesse Apostolike, for that in those corrupted times, then is praised the bounty or goodnesse of the Pope, when it exceedes not the malignity of other men) was the opinion that was conceined of his elemency, having a defire to do good to all men, and far estranged from inclination to offend any. Amongst his other felicities which were many & great, it was no litle happinesse to him to have about him Iulio de Medicis his Coulin, whom notwithflanding he was not borne in lawfull mariage, yet he raised him to the estate of Cardinall, being before Knight of the order of Rhodes for lake being by nature grave to found deepely into things, diligent in office and feruice, watchfull ouer affaires, not delighted in securitie and pleasure, but ordered and regulated in all things, & for his modefly having under his hands the administratio of all the affaires of importance of the Popedom, did peare out and moderate many diforders which proceeded of his prodigall facility: yea fuch was his temperance and vertue working with a perpetuall care ouer the Pope, that forfaking the custome of all other coufins and bretheren of Popes, he preferred alwayes the honour and greatnesse of Leo, afore all friendships and foundations which he might apply to his owne stability after the Popes death. And being withall no lesse obedient to him then faithfull, he

feemed in all his behauiours to be a fecond himfelf to him by whom he had received so high confidence. For this cause the Pope raised him enery day, and pushed on by gratifications and benefites the mind that served him with so great studie and fidelitie; he reposed him selfe more and more vpon him touching affaires of greateil confequence, which being managed by two natures to different, shewed how wel oftentimes doth agree together the mixture of two cotraries, strairneffe with facilitie, watchfulneffe with fecuritie, measure with prodigalitie, grauitie of manners with pleasures and idlenesse. Which things and the gouernment of them, made many beleeue that Leo was caried by Iulio, being not able of himfelfe to rule fo great a charge, and no disposition to hurt any one, together with a vehement defire to enjoy the fruits & delights of the Popedome. But of the contrary, they interpreted Iulio to be of a fpirit ambitious, flirring, & addicted to innouations: fo that all the rigours, all the actions, and all the enterprises of Leos time, were by imputation heaped vpon Iulio, whom they reputed a man malicious, though he caried a mind of magnanimicie and courage: which opinion of his valour was confirmed and increased after the death of Leo, for that amid infinite contradictions and difficulties objected against him, he supported the estate and countenance of his affaires with such a dignitie as resembled the person & place of a Pope: yea he fo conferued his authoritie with the Cardinals, that making his entrie into two Conclaves absolute commander of fixteene voyces, he was at last made Pope within two yeares after the death of Leo, not with flanding the many obtrufions and emulations of the most auncient Cardinals: and he entred into his Popedome with fuch an expectation, that it was thought he would become the greatest Pope, and bring to passe greater marters then ever did any that til that day had fate in that supreme seate. But it was found out afterwards how farre men were abused in their judgements, both concerning Leo and him, fince in Clement were differred many conditions farre different from that which men beleeued of him before: for, there was not in him either that ambition or thirst after innouations and chaunges, or that greatnesse of courage and inclination of mind to noble and high enterprifes, which was supposed before, yea he was interpreted to be about Leo, rather an executer and minister of his plots and purposes, then a framer and introducer of his countels and wils. And albeithe was of wit veric apt and capable, and had a deepe science and inlight in all the affaires of the world, yet when it came to points of resolution and execution, that propertie of gift was not correspondent to himselfe, for that it was not onely hindred by a certaine timerousnesse of spirite which was not little in him, together with a defire of niggardnesse and sparing; an humour hurtfull in a minde raised to high things: but also he was followed with a certaine irrefolution and perplexitie, which was so naturall in him, that for the most part it kept him contained in suspence and doubt, euen when he was at point to establish things which he had aforetime with great forelight confidered, measured, and almost resoluted. By which it happened, that as well in his deliberations, as in the execution of his counsels, enery trifling regard rifing of new in his conceite, and enery light impediment that appeared, feemed fufficient to leade him into the fame confusion wherein he was afore he deliberated, being alwayes perswaded that after he had consulted, that counsell was the best which he had rejected: for, in that case, calling onely into reckening and representation those reasons which he had not esteemed before, he forbare to reduce into discourse the arguments which had moued him to make fuch election, which being conformed and compared with the contraties, would have made weaker the force and thrength of the others, neither did he take experience by the memory of his naturall timerousnesse, to beware to slide into the passion and humour of vaine searc. In which disposition intangled, and maner of dealing confused, he suffered himselfe oftentimes to be transported and gouerned by his officers, in which case he seemed rather caried then counselled by them: of whom, these bare most authoritic with him, Nicholas Scombergh a Germaine, and Mathem Gibers a Genoway: the one almost reuerenced and feared of the Pope, and the other loued and fauored with a fingular affection: Scombergh was a disciple of lerome Sauonarola, and of the order of Freat preachers whilest he studied the lawes, but afterwardes leaving his religion and profession, he retained onely the habite and the name, and followed the vocation of fecular affaires: Gibers had bene bestowed verie young in the function of religion, but afterwards he left that vocation by the privitie of his father, and not withflanding he was not botne in lawfull mariage, yet he difclaimed both the habite and the name of his profession. They two were of one societie & agreement together whilft he was Cardinali, & also in the beginning & enttie to his Popedom, bearing fuch a hand on him as they gouerned his thoughts, and drew his will to their wayes: but as among the mortall men, there can be no perfect concord, where is no conformitie of conditions, to be ginning afterwards to difagree, either through ambition, or by the diuerfitie of their natures, they brought ruine vpon him whom they had before supported, and led his affaires into great confusion. For, Friar Nicholas either for that he was a Germaine of nation, which caried him to fauour immoderately the affaires of his countrey, or for some other regard mouing, bore great affection to the name of the Emperour, by which occasion, concurring also his obttinacie in his opinions which oftentimes were different from others, the Pope stood many wayes suspicious that he preferred more the profite of another, then was studious ouer the aduauncements of his affaires. And touching the other, both by nature and all other respects of office, he was very deuout to the person of the Pope, whom he acknowledged alone for his Lotd and maisser, and simply caried verie carefull and studious impressions ouer his affaires. And albeit in the time of Leo he had bene a great enemie to the French, and saucred highly the affaires of the Empetor, yet after the death the Pope have a support in a proper properties.

of that Pope he was converted into another humour and habite. Thus these two principal ministers of the Pope being in manifest discord between themselves, neither proceeded in his affaires with foundnesse of counsell, nor for the honor of his person, with reuerence and regards agreeable; by which division, every one knowing how irresolute and weake the Pope was of his owne condition, he was made contemnible and fcorned to the world, by those men who ought with better modellie to have covered his impersections: infomuch as being priule to his owne weakenesse, & by the propertie of his nature alwayes irresolute, he knew not what course to take in a deliberatio so slippery & ful of difficulties, seeing that those to whom it appertained to stay and resolue him, were the men that caried him into greatest confusion: so dangerous is it for Princes to have faction and diution in their counsels, which of all others have the greatest facilitie to leade their persons and estates into perill of ruine and subuersion. Neuertheleffeat the last, more by necessitie to deliberate something, then by resolution or firme judgement, and standing chiefly in these termes, that to deliberate nothing was in a kind to deliberate, he inclined to go through with the League, and in companie of the refidue to begin the warre against the Emperour: wherein they fell to accord, and drew the capitulations into particulars. wanting no other thing then to give his full perfection at fuch time as he received newes that the Commandator Erraro whom the Emperour fent to him, was arrived at Rome. He was thought to be fent in diligence with fome good and gracious dispatch; in which respect the Pope determined to attend his comming, which droue the Embassadours to complaine, whom he had assured to passe the same day the confederation. The cause of his comming was, that the Emperour after he had fent such a commission to the Marquis of Pesquiero, to tetaine at the least in his power to impatronise him selfe vpon the estate of Millan, and searing least by that occasion there were incenfed fome new stirres in Italy, did begin to debate more straitly and sincerely of the accord with the Legate Saluiatio, fo that there passed betweene them one capitulation (reserving neuerthelesse the condition of the ratification by the Pope) wherein both he was satisfied touching the restitution of Reggia and Rubiera, & also the defence and conservation of the Duke of Millan was comprehended in it; matters which the Pope did principally defire. Moreouer was exprefly fet downe, that if the Duke should die, the Emperour neither should retaine that Dukedome, nor give it to the Archduke his brother, but should inuest it in the Duke of Burbon, which the Pope very vndiscreetly by the setting on of the Archbishop of Capua, had accorded vnto, together with George of Austria brother to the Emperour Maximilian, at such time as the life of Francis Sforce was almost holden desperat. Assoone as the capitulation was made, the Legat not tarying for Pope Clement to give it perfectio, either could not or would not refuse to present the Emperor with the writ of dispensation for his mariage so much defired: which for that it was made before, only with mentio of stop & impediment to the second degree without naming the king of Portugals daughter for offending the king of England, or because there was between the a double bod of affinity, there was no mentio made but of the bond that was most strong it was thought necessary to make another, which with expresse mention of the persons, contained all the impediments. The Commandator Erraro departed from the Emperours Court with the dispatch of this cofederation, about a day or two after the Emperor was aduertised of the imprisoning of Moron: & coming to the Popes court the vj. of Deceb. he was brought to his presence, where after he had presented to him many offers, with the like information of the good will of the Emperour, he deliuered him the capitulations, in which albeit the articles touching the falt and matters of benefice within the realme of Naples, were contrarie to that which had bene folicited and resoluted by the Viceroy: yet for that his principall end was to be affured of suspitions, he had allowed and accepted them, if he had found a fincere proceeding touching the Duchie of Millan. But feeing in the article concerning Frauncis Sforce, was contained no mention of the imputation made against him, neither promising to render the estate that was taken fro him, nor to pardon his faults committed, their art and futtleties were eafily differenced, the rather for that the Emperour in the conclusion made with the Legate, and in the instructions given to his Agent, seemed to take no knowledge of fuch things: for the confederation made to defend and preferue Frauncis Sforce in the Dukedome of Millan, deprined not the Emperour of power to proceed against him as against his vasfall, and to declare the freehold to be confished for the conspiracie supposed upon him, against his Maiestie: and Burbon suborned to be Duke in case of his death, was also to succeede in case of his prination, for that by the lawes is considered the death naturall and the death civil, by which they judge that man to die, who is condemned for fuch a crime. For this caufe the Pope answered with verie graue speeches, that as he had no particular matter of discord with the Emperour, fo touching all differences and contentions that might happen betweene them, he would for his part chuse no other arbitrator or judge then his Maiethe; only he held it necessarie to establish so good an order for the publike affaires, as Italy might remaine assured, which could not be done unlesse herestored to Frauncis Sforce the Duchie of Millan. Lastly he layed afore him reafons, prouing why a Capitulation fo generall was not fufficient, concluding that it would bring no small griefe to him to be driven to that necessitie, to enter into new deliberations and counfels, and to be made effraunged from the Emperour, with whom he had alwayes bene most firmely conjoyned. To these the Duke of Sesso replied with reasons justificatorie, that as the Emperour had alwayes a fincere and vpright intention: so he assured that his Maiestie was well contented that notwithstanding the accidents happened and past, the Duchie of Alellan should remaine to Frauncis Sforce: onely if the article especiall of that clause (through militaking) were not set downe in sufficient and ample forme, it was referred to the Pope to reforme it according to his will and discretion, promising for the Emperour, to present to him within two moneths the ratification, fo farre foorthalfo as he would give his word not to conclude during that time the League which was negociated with the government of Fraunce and the Venetians . It was clearely discerned, that this offer had no other foundation then a desire to temporise and winne a respite or time of two moneths, to the ende to give vnto the Emperour a better leisure to take good counsels, and leavie convenient remedies against so strong a League. Neverthelesse after many contentions and disputations, the discontenument of the Embassadors concurring, the Pope confented to that demaund, as well by defire and reason to enter as slowly as he could into expences and troubles, as also for this pollicie, that so long as the French king continued in the condition of a prisoner, all contracts and confederations made with the Regent of Fraunce would be icalous and daungerous, for that the Emperour would alwayes retaine a power to diffolue and breake the nas often as he lift. Also he judged, that by this respite or delay interposed, the Einperour might with more facilitie obtaine his purpose, not with tanding there was no great apparance of hope: and if by that were wrought the accord betweene the two kings, he made this deepe consideration (though many judged against it) that it were better to passe in a time when the Emperour flood in least necessitie, for that by how much his affaires were aduaunced or flood in good traine, by to much more rude would be the conditions he would offer to the French king, which being seuere and rigorous, he supposed the king wold not observe themaster he were posfessed of his libertie. There was also added to that treatise, that during the said time there should be no new enterprise embraced, nor no action executed against the Castle of Millan, so far foorth as Frauncis Sforce wold be bound not to do any molestation ypon those that lay without, which condition he would not accept.

The yeare of the nativitie of the sonne of God 1525 being runne out in these actions more disposed to warrethen to peace, there followed successively the yeare 1526, which being re- 1526. plenished with great accidents, brought a face of wonderful troubles. In the beginning of this yeare the Commandator Erraro returned to the Emperour with letters subfigned & written with the Popes owne hand, by the which he neither denied nor confessed the conspiracies practised against him, but laying the fault vpon the Marquis of Pefquiero, he laboured to excuse Frauncis Spirce, whom he alleaged (if he had offended at all) to be abused by the counsels of lerome Moron, befeeching him with termes of great affection, that for the benefit and quiet of all Christendome, he would preferre his elemencie afore his iuslice. At this time the Emperour expecting the answer of the Pope, held in suspence the negociations and practises of all Princes, and albeit he had exercifed great grace, fauour, and honor vpon the Duke of Burbon, promiting with speed to aduance the confummation of the mariage betweenchis fifter & him, yet when Burbon viged the accomplishing of his word and promise, he was answered with euasions and delayes, such as made the matter doubtful and the Duke discontented. Neuerthelesse to satisfie him with some reasonable or apparant excuse, he was caried ouer with this, that the Emperour wold first give perfection to his owne mariage with the infant of Portugal, who was expected from one day to another, but in true meaning that excuse drew this draught, to leauealwayes in the power and will of the Emperor (notwithstanding his promise to the Duke of Burbon) to give her to wife to the french king if the accord went on: fuch is the ordinarie humor of some Princes, to be caried tather with con-The Emperour fiderations of profit, then with care of honestie. Now after the Emperours mariage was consummated at Seut in Spaine, the commaundator Erraro arrived at the Court, with the breviat of the article concerning Frauncis Sforce, which article the Pope had deduced at large in his fauor. So that the Emperour, being also assured that the Legate Saluiatio had no commission to conclude any thing but according to that article, and his whole Counfell thinking it necessarie to stop and hinder the league that was in hand, & no leffe dangerous to haue to do at one time with fo great a number of enemies, he faw himfelfe reduced to thefe termes, either to content the Pope & the Venetians by restoring Frauncis Sforce to the Duchie of Millan, or else to compound with the French king, who for his part, after long arguing and disputation for the countrey of Burgundie, and finding that without the price of it, he could not hope for his deliuerie by the Emperour, offered to render it with all the apertenances and dependancies, and to renownce all titles and rights which he had to the kingdome of Naples and Duchie of Millan, and to affure the observation of his promise by the oftage of two of his sonnes. The disputations were great ypon the election of the one or the other way, wherein the Viceroy infifted more vehemently then ever, both for that he had the conduct of the French king into Spaine, & had nourished him with many braue hopes of his deliuerie vnder easie conditions. His authoritie was great with the Emperour, and his reputation nothing inferiour, both for that the Emperour repoted much in his fidelitie, and trusted him because he knew he loued him: but there opposed against him Mercurio Gattinaro, a man of base descending in the countrey of Predmont, and by his vertue raised to the place of high Chauncellor to the Emperour, and for his experience and credit, had managed of long time all the affaires of the Court of most importance. One day the Emperour fitting really in councell to refolue absolutely the matters that had bene discoursed so many moneths, these two were also pre-

fent, of whom the Chauncellor tooke occasion to reason in this fort. I have alwayes feared, least our too great greedinesse concurring with the immoderate endes we aspire vnto, would be the cause, that of so singular and honorable a victorie, we respect in the end neither glorie nor profite: but I could neuer be induced by any argument or reason, that by " your victorie (ô gracious Emperour) either your estate or your reputation should fall into dan-" ger; a matter which now appeareth manifeftly, fince there is question to conclude an accord, by "the which all the regions of Italy shall be reduced to a condition desperate, which can not but " bring infamie to your name; and the French king deliuered up to his libertie, but under so unequal " conditions, that he will continue a greater enemie to you then before, though not of will which " haply he may restraine and temper, yet by necessitie, which is alwayes a mightie motion to moue "inen to reuenge. For my part, I could wish with as great shew of affection as others, that at one "time and by one meane, your Maiestie might recouer Burgundy, and also establish foundations of "your imperie in Italy: but vaine is the wit that aspireth to hold the thing which the had is not able "to gripe; and in the propertie of worldly things, there is nothing more full of errour, then that am-"bition which goeth on working in the humor of weening only, and lookes not back to order and reason, which are the assured lines that lay out the insallible successe of euery mortal actio. But this "I know, that that Prince who fuddenly embraceth many things, is in perill to effect nothing, for that all those things are put to adventure, that are guided by will and not by reason. That fire,, that is mightily kindled hath much ado to be quenched, but when vppon one fire rifeth manie,, flames, whose propertie is to flie with the wind into many places, it can not be that the burning, will not be great, yea oftentimes extended to the confuning of him that first kindled it. I see no ,, reason to induce vs to thinke, that the french king being deliuered, will obserue the articles of so ,, great importance, since he is not ignorant, that in making you Lord of Burgundy, he layeth open, fuch a gap to leade you into the bowels of France, that it will be alwayes in your electio to run vp ,, euen to the gates of Paris: and he knoweth wellenough, that when he hath once put into your,, hand the power to vexe France in fo many places, he hath left to him felfe no possibilitie to make,, refillance against you. Doth not he know & all the world fee, that to consent that you go to Rome ,, with an armie, is no other thing then to give you a raine, with whose bridle you may checke all,, Italy, & authoritie to dispose according to your liking, of the estate spiritual and temporal of the Church, and by that meane your puissance being redoubled, you shalf or alwayes after neuer want, money nor forces to offend him? And who doubteth that of this greatnes he maketh this conclu-, sion, that he shall be constrained to accept all such lawes as it shal please you to impose you him. Is it then reasonable to beleeue, that he will observe an accord by the which he is made your slave, and you his Lord? Where is seruitude hatefull, if not in the mind whom nature hath borne to so, ueraigntie? and how can it be thought that he will liue under the yoke of subjection, whose ambi-,, tion could not hitherunto be contained within the large limits of Fraunce. But be it, that in the ,, king will be found no want of conscience to observe the conditions of the contract, yet he may be ,, ouercaried by a naturall compassion by the complaints and lamentations of his kingdome, and by ,, the perswasions of the king of England accopanied with the incitation of all Italy. It may be that ,, by the law of amitie that is betweene you two, he will repose confidence in you, or at least looke,, into the power you are of: but was there euer two Princes betweene whom have bene greater,, causes of hatred and contention? There is not onely betweene you a reciprocall lealouse of great-,, nesse; a matter apt to stirre vp one brother against another, but also your common emulation is ,, pushed on by many ancient and great quarels begun in the times of your fathers and great grand-,, fathers, many long warres betweene those two houses, many peaces and accords not observed, ,, many harmes done, and many injuries received. There is no quarell more mortall then that ,, which taketh his noutiture in tract and prescription of time, nor anie hatred so daungerous as that ,, which lyeth smothered like fire coursed with hote imbers, by whom the heate is preserved to a ,, greater power of burning. To the minde that is iniuried, there is nothing fo sweete as the pas-,, fion of reuenge; and by how much the offence is auncient and inueterate, by fo much more incu-,, rable is the humour of revenge, and more heavie the throke where it lighteth. We may beleeve,, that the Kings minde burneth with disdaine, when he remembreth how manie moneths he hath, bene your prisoner, with what severitie he hath bene kept under straite and sure gard, and neuer, was fauoured so much as to speake to you or see you. Besides, in this calamitie of imprison-,, ment, he hath passed so many perplexities and perils as had almost brought him to the ende of his ,, mortall-life; causes not litle materiall to make him highly incensed, besides the despite of hiso.,, ther injuries, sufficient to draw on his desire to be reuenged: and now he seeth we go about to " deliuer him, not through magnanimitie or amitie, but by necessitie and seare of so great a con-,, federation conspired against vs. Do we thinke that parentage made by necessitie, is more migh-,, tie, then so many vehement incitations? Do we not know how much Princes esteeme of such ,, bonds? And who can yeeld a better tellimonic then our felies, of the ellimation and reckening,, of parentages? But it may haply feeme to some, that we shall be greatly assured by the faith he ,, will giue to returne againe into prison. O weake foundations and full of frailtie! ô hopes ynper-,, feet and drawing more perill then furetie! o counfell undiference, which hath no focietie with ,, wisedome and forecalt! The griefe I have to see vs disposed to take a course so hurtfull and dan-,, gerous, makes me burst out into this libertie of plaine speech. This boord is not ignorant, what ,, reckening is made of faith and word given, when there is question of interests of estate, neither,, are we to learne of what force are the promifes of the Frenchmen, who though they be open and,, plaine in all other things, yet in this regard let vs thinke them Schoolemailters most perfect in ,, deceiving and abusing. And for the King, he hath naturally a readie tongue to promise, and a ,, flow hand to perfourme, and by cultome is fo much the more hard and sparing in effects, by how,

" much he is plentifull and prodigall in wordes and speeches. Vpon which I gather this reasonable " conclusion, that neither the respect of good will betweene two Princes, who have for an auncient "inheritance, iniuries and offences, nor the memory of benefites, which neuer was any, nor the con-"fideration of faith & promises, which in controuersie of matters of estate importeth nothing with "the Frenchmen, will have any force to induce him to follow an accord, which lifterh vp his enemy "into heaven, and throweth his own person & his kingdome into manifest subjection: where it may " be objected that for seare of these things, & the better to assure your Maiestie, you demand two " of his children (of whom one to be the eldeft) whose lone wil containe him more then the price of "Burgondie: I aunswer that the loue of those children will rather cause the contrarie, specially when " the memorie of them shall moue in the cogitations of his minde, & consideration that to observe "the accord, would be the beginning to make them your slaves: it is doubtfull that such a pawne " will not be sufficient, if he should be altogether desperate to recouer it in other fort: for that as it " is a thing that much importeth to put his Realme in daunger, which being once lost is hard to be " recoucred: fo neuerthelesse he may have many hopes to redeeme his children either with the fa-" nour of time, or by the benefite of accord, or by the oportunitie of some other occasion, and yet " in respect of their base age the expectation wil not be grieuous to him. Besides, standing in termes "to draw into vnitie against you almost all the Princes of Christendome, who doubteth not but he " will confederate with them? who feeth not that he will feeke to moderate that accord by the " way of warre and armes? and who knoweth not that case, the gaine and profite which we shall " reape by this victorie, will bring upon vs a most strong and daungerous warre, stirred up by the "desperate hatred of the French King, by the burning lealousse of the King of England, and by the " generali necessitie of all the Potentates in Italie: against whom how shall we be able to defend " our felues, vnlesse God continue dayly to worke the same miracles for vs which he hath so often "done till this time, or valeffe fortune for our fakes, change her nature, and reduce her inconfran-"cie and lightnesse to an example of constancie and firmenesse contrary to all experience past?how " many monethes have we concluded in our counsels, to do all that we could to let the Italians " for vniting with the house of Fraunce: and now we throw our selues rashly into a deliberation "which takes away all difficulties that till this houre have kept them in suspence: a matter which "multiplieth our daungers, and increaseth the forces of our enemies, fince it is not to be doubted "that that league will be more firong and mightie which shall have for a head, the French King " standing in his freedome and in his kingdome, then that which should be contracted with the " house of Fraunce and the King remaine your prisoner. There is no other thing which till this day " hath detained the Pope from entring confederation against you, then the feare he had that you " would alwayes separate the French from the residue, in offering to them the libertie of their king: "but lesse will be their searce of such a matter, when you shall have the children who import not " much, and difmiffe the father upon whose person resteth the ballancing of all things: so that by " this meane, the medicine which we have fought to apply to preuent our daunger, will become without all comparison the chiefe poyton and instrument of our perill, and in place to breake this " vnion we shall be the meane to enforce it and make it more firme and puissant. But me thinkes I " fee forme ready to aske my adulfe, and whether I will counfell your Maiestie to draw no profit of fo great a victorie, and to fuffer you to dwell alwayes yoon these doubtes and perplexities; to " whom I answer & confirme estsoones the similitude I have spoken many times, that it is a matter " too hurtfullto receiue so much meate at one time as the stomacke can not beare: and that it is of necessarie, either by returning into amitie with Italie, which demaunds nothing of vs but to be " affured, to get of the French King both Burgondie and as much else as we can: or else to make a " composition with him (by the which Italie may remaine at our discretion) but so easie touching "his interests; as he may have cause to observe the conditions of it. In the election of the one of these "two wayes it appertaineth to your Maiestic in pollicie and forecast to preferre that which indeed " is most stable and inst, afore that which at the first shew may haply seems most great and most • profitable.I confesse the Duchie of Millan is an estate more rich and more commodious for ma-" ny regardes, then Burgondie, and that there canno amitic passe with Italie, vnlesse Millan be tras-" ferred either to Francis Spree, or to some other of the Popes liking: and yet I rather allow to do this, then to accord with the Frenchmen, for that Burgondie appertaineth to you with better equirie and inflice then Millan, & beareth more facilitie to be maintained then a countrey where

is no person that willeth you good . To seeke to get Burgondie your auncient inheritance, is an ... action of great worthinesse and prayle: but to aspire after Adulancither to your owne vie, or for ,, any other that dependeth wholly vpon you, can not be without manifell notes of ambition. The ,, one calleth you to it by the honorable memorie of fo many your predeceffors, whose bones lying ,, buried in captinitie, call vpon you to be deliuered & redeemed by your vertue, whose compassion,, accompanied with their iuft, pitifull, and holy defires, may haply moue God to be more fauorable, to the action, Your Maiestie must consider that it is a more discrect and easie counsell, to establish, an amitie with him that vnwillingly becomes your enemie, then with one who in no time can be, your friend: for there will never be in the French king but a perpetual late and defire to oppole a-,, gainst your doings: where the Pope and the other Potentates of Italie being once affirred of all, Suspition by the renoking of your armie that is in Lombardie, wil have no occasion of controller in with you, neither through realousse wherein they will be satisfied, nor by feare which then will be resolued into assurance, and remaining your friends, you shall draw from them both now and al-,, wayesa greater commoditie and profite: fo that there are to leade your Maiesties inclination to, this amitie, not onely the confideration of honour, which ought to be most familiar with great, Princes, not only the regard of profite, which failioneth haughtie mindes to reason and facilitie: ,, not onely the respect of suretie, which to Princes and peoples is the sweetest end and reward of, their warres and contentions, but also the operation of necessitie, which about all other motions in the mindes of men, carieth them violently to resolution and accord. For, be it that you,, compound with the King, and bind him to no other thing then to ayde you in the enterprises of, Italie, yet it is not likely he will obserue it, fince this will be his opinion, that in leaving you Itahe for a pray, he should so much the more imbarke his owne Realme in perill and desperate daunger: where on the other fide, his hopes and oportunities will be great that by the compulsion of,, To mightie an vnion he shall be able to vexe and trauell you, and in the end to reduce you to accord vnder easie conditions: so that of a king whom we hold prisoner, we shall not only give him libertie, but also prepare him to be our enemy, & fend home to the realme of France, a foneraigne, chieftaine or leader, to the end that ioyning with the refidue, he might raife war against vs, both ,, with greater forces and with more profite. How much better were it to confederate with the Italians, who have the same conformitie of reasons with vs? How much more necessary to contract a firme and true alliance with the Pope, who hath continually defired it? And how much affured to remoue from the French all hope to joyne with the Italians, feeing that in that case not onely neceffity or feare of new leagues, but also cuen your owne will and quality of the conditions, will draw you to accord with the French. Then shal you see that their vuinerfall necessity and dispaire of their common condition, will constraine them not onely to deliuer vp Burgondy into your, handes and to follow you with greater offers, but alloto affure them with fuch obligations and oftages, that you shall not need to doubt the observation: for the which his children are not sufficient pawnes folong as they hope to effect to great an vnion : and scarfely will suffice the townes of Eagon & Narbona if they put them into your hads, nor an army at fea. This is the way to draw of your victory a fruit plentiful, honorable, comely and sure: and otherwise (if I have any insight in the matters of the world) by this accord you shall embark your estate into so great dangers, that I see no way to deliuer you, vulesse the indiscretió of the frech king may haply be greater the ours.,,

This oration, what with eloquence and good disposition of the matter, joyned with the reputation and wisedome of the man, wrought much in the mindes of the greatest patte of the councell: but the Viceroy being of an other humor, pronounced a contrary opinion in this sorte:

If it be a fault blameable in such men as through the motion of worldly appetite and ambition, oration of the seeke to embrace more then they are able to hold, the offence is no less in mine opinion, in one of the seeke to embrace more then they are able to hold, the offence is no less in mine opinion, in one of the seeke to embrace more they are able to many sufficients or too much incredulity, do willingly deprine them of the seeke to cash one and the seeke to embrace the property of the seriour in both, observing the quality of the persons in whome they raigue, that which proceed, and the feare and abiection of mind, is more to be reprehended and condemned in a great, apprince, then that which moueth of an inclination beroicall and true greatness of spirite and coupling age. And seeing it is to great slings that the thoughts of great princes ought to be raised and of dresses, the control of the seed of

" sions as very rarely happen to mortall men. This is the very course laid out to your Maiesty by the " Lord Chau ncellor, who doubting that by this accord Burgendy and Millan may not be obtay-" ned, (we must not think he is pushed on eyther with the love of Italy which is his countrey, or with the benefit or good turne that he wisheth to the Duke of Millan) hath made a resolution of a way by the which ashe faith, we shall get Burgondy and lose Millan, an estate without com-" parison of greater importance. But I feare that in following that deuise, as we shall not onely lose " Millan and not winne Burgondy, so also where your Maiesly hath with great glory opened you 44 a way to the imperie and jurisdiction of all Christendome, there will remaine no other fruite of of it if you take your direction by his counfell, then great doniage accompanied with perpetuall " infamy; effects which in all reasonable fort your Maiesty is to avoid, least through indiscretion and finister counsell of one private man, you blemish the reputation and valour of so many or princes and braue Captains, who under the felicity and fortune of your name fought for the vi-" clory which you now have: so wil the world thinke you more apt to get then able to hold, & lesse worthy of glory then meet to manage it. For my part much leffe that I can differ ne any furety " in the counsell he hath given, seeing of the contrary it bringes lurking under it many tokens of " manifest danger, and some apparances of a litle profite and yet easy to slide out of our hands, or not without our shame, and your indignity : Where on the contrary, in compounding with the French king, your Maiesty shall reape glory, which especially followeth the name of Emperours, " it will bring you profit which is a fweet reward of victories, and it will give you a fufficient affu-" rance of your estates, which is the happiest end and conclusion of warre and controversies be- tweene Princes. I aske this question of the Lord Chauncellor, under what reason, under what « furety, and under what fidelity he doth warrant or promife that the Italians after we haue left them the Duchie of Millan, will observe the accord, and will not intermeddle with the affaires "that shall passe betweene the French king and vs? Yea rather after they have embased our reputation, after they have corrupted the army that now holdeth them in bridle, and after they shall be " affured that no new companies of Launceknights can come into Italy, because there is no place " of retrait for them, I aske againe with what humor the Lord Chauncellor can answer for the Ita-"Iians, that they will not recontinue their practifes, and threatning the kingdome of Naples which will almost remaine at their discretion, they will not rise and force vs to deliuer the French king? "If it be good to prouide that a mischiefe happen not, it is better not to loose the oportunity of the " remedy that is proper for it, fince there can be no great daunger to defend the harme that 4 standes in feare of a remedy to relist it. It is farre from reason for my Lord Chauncellor to repose " confidence in Francis Sforce, to acknowledge the benefites that your Maiesty shall do to him, • feeing he hath already fo ill obserued your honorable liberalities, and with treasons hath recompenced the fauours you have yfed to him. But what expectation of conspiracie and worse dea-"Ing, whenhe feetha defire to call him to justice, and to punish by fentence of the law, the vn-" thankfulnes he hath pretended with so great iniquity: and what feare will be have of your puinishment, when he expecteth his safety by the deligerance of your enemies? He will not care to offend you, that feareth not your punishment: and that punishment will he not hold greenous, which either he supposeth to suffer for innocencie, or is assured of his meane of deliuerie, And " leffe reason is there to induce you to have confidence in the Venetians, for that beeing by nature " enemies auncient to the Crowne of the Empire and the house of Austria, cannot yet but trem-" ble vnder the memoric of Alaximilian your grandfather, who tooke from them manie of those of townes which they possessed at this date. The mind possessed with injurie and wrong, can never " be made affured: and wherethe remembrance of the harmes done remaineth without recomef pence or conciliation, there is nothing lesse certaine then sidelitie, and nothing more fraile then "the freindships they professe. Touching Pope Clement, there is no reason of confidence, either " in his vertue, or in his inclination to the Emperour, fincethe first alliance that Pope Leo made with him after he had attempted maniethings against vs, was, for defire either to be reuenged, or to be affured against the frenchmen, and for ambition to occupie Ferrara: and after him, " the Pope raigning being hated of the one moitie of the world, continued by necessitie (after the " death of Leo) in your amitie, but beeing become Pope, he returned immediathe to the nature of Popes, which is both to feare and hate the Emperours, and for his part he hath nothing in " more hortor then the name of the Emperour. I confesse these reasons may be aunswered with excules, excuses, and it may be alleaged that their complots and enterprises tookeno proceeding of hatred or ambition, but only of suspition and icalousy of your greatnesse, which being ceassed, all ;, their conspirations will take ende. But it may be answered, that either this is not true, or if at the ,, beginning it hath bene true, it hath now by necessitie taken other roote, and become an other,, humor, for that it is a thing naturall that hatred followeth suspition, and offences and vexations,, come after hatted, and after offences men draw to alliance and amity with the enemics of him, whome they have offended, labouring to raise practises not onely for their proper suretic, but also, to make their profite of him whom they have offended, Nature hath fowne in man feeds of ha-,, tred and reuenge, and though the lawes hold it more just to reuenge an injurie then to do it, yet, kind and nature sheweth that both the one and the other proceede of one imbecillity. Besides, the remembrance of wrongs is farre greater and more stirring in the mind of him that doth them, then in him that receiveth them: fo that where in the beginning suspicion onely would set them ,, vp and make them to moue, the same would be also the cause to make them become our ene-,, mies, to cary them both in inclination and in hope to the French part, and then to beginne to can-, tonize and make a divident of the Realme of Naples, as they have done in all contracts past. And,, now let vs gine them what furety we will, and inferre what accord we can, we shall find kindled in their stomackes the same hatted and scare that before, with mindes not disposed to repose,, confidence in that, which to their feeming we shall do through necessity. In so much as vnder,, an opinion they may have the more eafily to raunge vs to their wils, and fearing least in the end ,, there runne betweene the French king and vs a new appointment semblable to that which was ,, made at Cambray, and lastly defiring according to their owne phrases to deliuer Italy of stran-, gers, they will not flick to prefume to rife vp to give you lawes, and to demand at your hands the ,, delinery of the French king; a matter which if your Maiesty refuse, I see not how you can defend,,, against them the kingdome of Naples, and in according that, you lose all the fruits of your victo-,, ry, besides a manifest dishonor and rejection that will stand upon your name for euer. But let us ,, lay the case that Italy will performe and observe the accord, and necessity constraine you either ,, to leave Millan or not to recover Burgundy, yet in just comparison there is great difference be-,, tweenethe one and the other: Burgondy is a countrey of little circuit, of small revenue, and no-,, thing answering the commodities that are perswaded to be there: where the Duchie of Millan, both for the riches and reputation of fo many Cities, for the number and noblenes of subjects, for ,, the liberall and plentifull reuenues, and for the oportunitie and fufficiencie to nourish all the armies of the world, carieth more value and price then many kingdomes; and yet befides the ampli-,, tude and puissance of it, you have to make a greater reckening of the commodities that may reuert to you by conquering it, then of the simple accompt and valuation of it selfe: for Millan and ,, Naples being at your denotion, it followeth by congruent necessity that the Popes, as aunciently, they are wont, must depend upon the authoritie of Emperours: That all the region of Tuscane, ,, the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantua must be your subjects: and the Venetians be-,, ing environed with Lombardy and Germany, stand in case to accept lawes at your hand: and so ,, not with force & armes displaied, but with a glorious reputation of your name, with the only funmons of a Herald, & with the enseignes of the empire, you shall comand absolutely ouer all Ita-,, ly. Lift but vp your Maiesties mind to the consideratio of Italy, & you shall find it with great right ,, estcemed the supreme seate of all other provinces, both for the oportunitie of situation, for tempe-,, rature of aire and Climate, for the excellency of wits enclined to all honorable enterprises, for the ,, fertility of all things necessary to the life of man, for the stately representation of so many noble Cities, for the foueraigne feat of religion, and for the ancient glory of the empire. To which praifes as ,, I may aptly adioine the comodity of impery which it brings, extending fo far in your person, that if you comand ouer it, the found of your name and authority runneth fearful in the eares of other, Princes: so it can not but belong to your greatnes and to your glory, to raise your thoughts to this ,, which is an actio more agreable to the bones of your elders (feeing they are brought into counfell) who for their bounty and piety, we are not to believe do defire any other thing then what is ,, most couenient & agreeable to the glory of your name: so that, according to the cousel of the Lord, Chauncellor, we shall lose a matter of great price and value, for a thing of right small conquest, & ,, yet wrapt in many uncertainties, wherin we ought to stand warned by that which was like to , happen ceitaine moneths past. Do we not remember the great greife that fell amongst vs when ,,

"the French king lay in danger of death, which griefe proceeded of no other humor then a know-"ledge we had that with his life we should lose the fruit we hoped for by the victory. And who can on now affure vs that the like accident will no more repert ypon him: yea who feareth not the relapfe er with more facilitic, both for that the reliques of his malady do yet possesse him, and also the hope "which till now hath supported him, being taken away, who doubteth not but his gricued mind "will heape vpon him greater fits of forrow and discontentment, the only cause of his fickpesse, e-" specially new condicions and assurances being interposed, it can not be that for their hardnes, "they make not the negociation long and tedious; a matter subject to the former accident and "haply to others both more great and dangerous. We are not ignorant, that nothing hath follow " retained the government and councell of France, as an opinion they have had of the speedy de-"livery of their king. In which humor of expectation the Nobles and Chieftaines of that Realme, " have remained peaceable & conformable to the Lady Regent : but when they find the foundations of this hope to faile, who doubteth not that the Barons of that Realme will not eafily enterin-"to minds of despite and reuenge, and with an vniuerfall conformity, change the course of the go-"uernment: strong is the operation of ambition, and no lesse violent the passion and thirst after im-" pery and foueraignty, specially where is seene no meane to make resistance against so mighty motions: which I allude to the disposition of France, where, if the greatnes of the kingdome get once "thebridle in their hand, much leffe that they will be carefull ouer the delinery of their king, fee-"ing of the contrary their ambition will cary them to maintaine an estate of liberty, and aspiring to " elfablish supremacy in them selues, what will it offend them to suffer the captivity of their king? "and so in place to get Burgondy and so many other great conquests, what other thing do we re-" taine, then a desperate hope both by his imprisonment, and by his delinery? But this further que-" stion may be asked of the Lord Chauncellor, whether the Emperour in this resolution ought to eregard the reckening and reputation of his dignity and his maietty: then what greater infanty, or what more dimunition of his honor, can be receive then to have his clemency forced, and con-"Arained to pardon Francis Sforce, he who lately being half dead, detected of manifest rebellion, and a fingular example of ingratitude, not coming to humility nor imploring your mercy, but run-" ning betweene the armes of your enemies to feeke to force you to render to him the estate which " so justly hath bene taken from him, and compell you to take lawes of him, who by equity of condemnation ought to beare subjection to your imperiall name. It were better for your Maiesly, "more agreable to the dignity of the Empire, and more worthy your greatnes and puissance, to lay out your selfe to a new fortune, and to referre estsoones all things to hazard and danger, then in " blemishing the authority of the Prince soueraigne ouer all Princes, and the name of the Emperor, " and having so oftentimes vanquished so mighty a king, to receive at the hands of Priests and Mar-"chants, fuch condicions, as if you had bene ouerthrowne there could not have bene offered to "you either more vniust or more vnworthy. Honor and dignity are the gifts of god, which by how "much they are basely esteemed of those to whome they are transferred, by so much more is highly offended the eternall goodnesthat gaue them, who will eftiones renoke them with no finall indig-" nation. That man can not be accompted worthy of honor, that declareth him felf not able to vie " it, fince honor is a reward or effect of vertue, who enableth to honor and dignity those persons to whome her felfe is conioined. So that, most gratious Emperour, calling eftloones into considera-"tionall these reasons, both how litle profit may resort to you by the accord with the Italians, and "by how many accidents it may eafily flide out of your hands, how litle affurance or shew of fide-"lity is in them, and how vnworthy a thing it is to leave the estate of Alellan. And lastly that it is " necessary for vs to fort at last to a resolution, and that the imprisonment of the king profiteth vs " not but in regard of the fruits that may be drawne of his deliuery. I fland firme & conclude vpon "this aduife, that we compound rather with the king then accord with the Italians; a matter which " can not be denied to be more glorious, more reasonable, and more profitable, so farre foorth as " we may be affured of the observation. Wherin I discerne some good foundation in this, that for a " more thankfull acknowledging of your benefite, he offereth to take to wife your fifter, a Lady for "her vertue and staied condition, very well able and convenient to entertaine you in amity. Besides "the oblation of two of his fons, of whom one to be the eldeft, which is fuch a property of pawne and oftage, as amongst worldly men & to assure worldly things, there can not be offred nor recei-" ued a more worthy nor more important. And seeing our necessitie driueth vs to determine fonie something, it is more reasonable we repose confidence in a French king under such nature of,, oftages, then in a nation of Italians of no leffe infidelity then without gage: and rather to truff the,, word and faith of fo great a king, the to be caried with the inmoderate conetonines of prices and,, suspicious basenesse and bartring of Marchants: & lastly, according to the exaple of our ancestors, ,, we may with more facility keepe amity for a time with the Crowne of France, honorable for his ,, proper dignity, then with a cofuled people of Italians our naturall & perpetuall enemies. Taking, this courfe, I do not only difcern a greater hope of observancy and due keeping of faith, but also a, leffeeftate of danger in case of promise breaking; seeing if the king refuse to render to vs Burgudy, ,, at least he will not dare (his childre remaining oftages) to rife vp to offend vs againe, but will la-,, bour by folicitation and fute to moderate the rigour of the accord: and beeing but as it were ye-,, sterday vanquished by you, he will retaine a working scare of your forces and armes, and being, likewise this day deliuered out of prison, he will not be so hardy to make a new proofe of your for-, tune. And if he take no armes against you, you need not to doubt of the mouing of others, fince v-,, pon his exaple dependeth ordinarily the valor of the refidue. By which mean you shall have good, oportunitie to conquer the Calle of Millan, and so to elfablish your furety in that ellate, that ,, hereafter you shall not need to feare the malice of any man. But if you come now to accord with ,, the Italians, and they in their infidelity come to double with you, I fee remaining no bridle able to ,, retaine them, and as their power increaseth to vexe you, so looke that their will will likewise rise, greater to conspire, and their hands more free to execute: so that I can not but interpret it to time-,, roufnes and want of counfell, that for an humor of too great suspition and incredulity, we should,, loofe the benefit of an accord fo full of glory and many advantages, and no leffe accompanied,, with fufficient furety, following in place of it a resolution no lesse dangerous in the essect and sub-,, stance, then icalouse in all his partes and circumstances.

This oration of the Viceroy drew the refidue of the councell into dinertity of opinion: It feemed to fuch as were of judgement found and vpright, that to accord with the French king according to the maner declared, could not be but full of danger: and yet fuch was the partiality of the Flemings defiring to recouer againe Burgondy the auncient patrimony & title of their Princes, that their affection would not fuffer them to discerne the truth. Besides, it was said that the gifts and great promises made by the French men wrought not a litle to corrupt and carry many : but the Emperour aboue all the refidue, either for that fuch was his first inclination, or for that the authority of the Viceroy could do much with him, having concurrancy with the opinion of the Count Nausan, or haply because he held it too great indignitie, to pardon by compulsion Francis Sforce, who had offended him by fo great malice, feemed to heare with ready and willing eares all fuch as counselled him to compound with the French king. So that after he had caused to be sounded againe the Legat Saluiatio, to know if he would confent that the estate of Millan should be transported to the person of the Duke of Burbon, and that the Legate had certified him that he had no commission to allow that drift, and therewithall had made offer to him of the Popes amity, he determined to go on with the accord with the French king, with whome things having already palt many disputations and acts, he grew in very few daies to conclusion, not respecting at all the community or interpoling of the Popes Legat: and for the better perfection and stability of the accord, the Emperour had obtained before the Duke of Burbons confent to give in mariage to the French king, his fifter whome he had promifed to him. The Duke was driven to paffe this confent, not so much for a defirehehad to cary the Duchy of Millan, which was promised him contrary to the authority of the Chancellor and Viceroy, under obligation not with standing to pay a great fumme of money: as for the necessity of his affaires which were reduced to those tearmes, that neither having nor could have any other piller or stay then the Emperour, he was constrained to accommodate his condition to the Emperours will: and affoone as he had in all things accomplifhed this confent, to take him out of the prefence of the Court in a time fo vnconuenient, he departed forthwith by the Emperours order, taking his way by Barfeloma, whither was appointed to be fent to him necessary provisions to passe into Italy, which for want of mony and lacke of vessels, had slow proceeding, for that in Spaine were but three gallies at that time.

The solicitation of the peace which was resolved the xiiij. of February 1526. contained these Madrill toucouenants: That betweene the Emperour and the French king should be a peace perpetuall, in ching the deliwhich should be copteheded all such as should be named by their comon colent. That the French king, king by the fixt day of the next moneth of March, should be fet at libertie vpon the marches in the coast of Fontarabie: That within fixe weekes after hee should configue to the Emperour the Duchie of Burgondy, the Countie of Charrolois, the inrifdiction of Nozers, the Castle Chinon dependancies of the said Duchie, the Vicountie of Aussona, the resort of S. Laurence de la Roche a dependant of Franch County, together with all the apertenaunces as well of the faid Duchie as Vicountie, all which for hereafter should be seperate and exempted from the soueraignty of the Realme of Fraunce: That at the same and very instant that the king should be deliuered, thereshould be put into the Emperours hands the Daulphin of Fraunce, and with him ejther the Duke of Orleance the kings fecond sonne, or else xij principall Lords of Fraunce, whom the Emperour did name: it was left to the election of the Lady Regent, either to deliuer the kings second fon, or the xij. Barons, and they to remaine as oflages vntill reflication were made of the lands and places aforesaid, and the peace sworne and ratified together with all the articles by the estates generall of France, and inregistred in all the Courts of Parliament of the kingdome with forme and folemnities necessary: for the accomplishing whereof there was fet downe a terme of foure moneths: at which time returning the oftages, there should be put into the Emperours hands, the Duke d' Angoulesme the kings third sonne, to the end to traine him vp with the Emperour the better to entertaine and assure the peace: That the French king should renounce and give vp to the Emperour all his rights to the Realme of Naples, together with all such titles and preheminences as were to come to him by the inuesliture of the Church: That he should do the like touching his interestes in the estate of Millan, of Genes, of Ast, and likewise of Arras, Tourncy, of the Ile, and of Doway: That he should render up the towne and cassle of Hedin as a member of the county of Arrois, with all the munitios, artilleries, and mouables that were in it when it was last taken that he should disclaime and yeeld up all sourraigntie in Flaunders and Artois, & all other places or peeces which the Emperor possessed and that on the other side, the emperour should refigne & give vp to him all the right, title and quarell which he preteded to anie place possessed by the French men, and especially the townes and Castledomes of Perone, Mondidier, Roye, the Counties of Bullaine, Guines, and Ponthiem, with other townes standing vponthe one & other shore of the river of Somme: That there should be between ethem a league & confederatio perpetuall for the defence of their effates, with obligation to aide one another when need required, with 500 men at armes, and 10000 footmen: That the Emperour should promise to giue in mariage to the king the Lady Eleoner his fifter, whom affoone as the dispensatio shold be obtained from the Pope, he should contract or handfast with words obligatory for the present, & afterwards the shold be led into France to consumate the mariage at the same time that according to the capitulation the offages were to be deliuered. That she should have for her portio 200000 crownes, with Iewels according to her estate, the one moity of the monie to be paid within 16 moneths, & the other halfe in one yere after: That a mariage should be made betweene the Dantphin and the daughter of the king of Portugall, daughter to the Lady Eleoner, at such time as their age would fuffer: That the French king should do all that he could to induce the auncient king of Nauarre to give vp to the emperour the rights of that kingdome, which in case he would not performe, then the king not to aide him with any succors: That the Duke of Gueldres and the Count of Zusphen & the principall towns of those estates, shold promise with sufficient securitie, to give themselves to the emperour, after his death: That the king should give no succours to the Duke of Wittenberg, nor likewise to Robert de la March: That he should furnish and rigge for the emperour, both when he should passe into Italy, and two moneths after beeing sorequired, twelue gallics, foure shippes, & foure gallions, all well munitioned and appointed, except men of warre, and the faid veffells to be rendred a moneths after accompting from the day of his embarking: That in place of the armie by land which the king offred for Italy, he should pay him two hundred thousand crownes in mony, the one halfe within fixteene moneths, and the other halfe within a yeare after: And that at the time when the oflages should be delivered, he should be bound to give bils of exchange for the pay of fixe thousand footmen for fixe moneths immediatly after the emperours arrival in Italy: That he should also furnish for his service five hundred Launces payd, with a band of artillerie: That he should faue harmelesse the empetour of his promile made to the king of England by pensions which the French king should pay to him, the arrerages wherof amounted to 500000 crownes, or elfe to deliuer fo much in ready money to the Emperour: That they should both joyne to befecch the Pope to call a generall Councell with all speede, to the end to consult vpon an universall peace amongst Christians, to advance an enterprise against the infidels and hereukes, and to graunt to all the Croisade for three yeares: That within fixe weekes the king should restore the Duke of Burbon in most ample forme, into all his estates, goods, moueable and vamoueable, and fruits and reuenues received: not to molest him for any thing past, nor constraine him to dwell or go to the tealme of Fraunce: That it should be lawfull to the fayd Duke of Burbonto demaund by the way of law and inflice, the Earledome of Provence: That in like fort all those that had followed him should reenter in fafety into their goods and states, and namely the Bishop of Autum and Monsieur de Saint Valier: That the prisoners raken in the warre should be deliuered on both parts within fifteene dayes: That there should be reflication made to the Lady Margaret of Austrich of all that the possessed afore the war: That the Prince of Orange should be set at liberty with restauration to the principality of Orange, and all that he possessed by the death of his father which had bene taken from him for following the faction of the Emperour. That the like should be done to other Barons: That there should be made relitution to the Marquis of Saluffe of his effate: That the king affoone as he arrived in the first towne of his tealme, should ratifie this capitulation, & be bound to procure the Daulphin to ratifie it when he should come to the age of source teene yeares. Many were named by common confent, & chiefly the Smiffers: but there was not one of the Potentates of Italy, except the Pope, whom they named as conferuator of this accord, and that more for manner fake and ceremony, then in effect and true meaning. Lastly it was expressed in the sayd capitulation that in case the king for any occasion, would not accomplish these matters promised, he should return e true prisoner.

This accord, for the patts it contayned, brought no small altonishment to all Christendome: for when it was understood that the first execution thereof confisted in the delivery of the king, all mens opinions were, that being in his liberty, he would not deliuer vp Burgundy, as being a member of too great importance for the Realme of Fraunce: and except a few who had counselled the Emperous to it, all his Court had the same indgement, and namely the Chauncellor, who reprehended and detefted the matter with fo great vehemency, that not with standing he was commanded to figue the capitulation according to the office of chiefe Chauncellors, ver he refuled to do it, alleaging that in fuch matters daungerous and hurtfull as that was, he ought not to vie the authoritie that was given him: neither could he be altered from this opinion notwithstanding the Emperour was angrie with him: who seeing him so resolute in his opinion, figned it himselfe, and within few dayes after went to Madrill to confirme the alliance and make a foundation of amity and good-will with the king, whom he entertayned in familiar and primate forte. Great were the ceremonies and demonstrations of amitie betweene them: oftentimes they shewed themselnes together in places publike: and as often did they passe in secrete familiar discourses : they went together in one coach to a Castell not halfe a The French dayes journey from thence, where was Queene Eleoner whom the king maried: and yet in all king marieth these great signes of peace and amity, he was observed with as carefull and strate gard as before, the Emperours without any advantage of libertie: so that he was embraced as a brother, and garded as a sifter. prisoner; a matter which made manifest to the world, that it was an accord full of discord, an alliance without amitie, and that upon euctie occasion their auncient jealousies and pafsions would be stronger in them, then the regard of that alliance made more by force then friendship. Many dayes were spent in these offices and ceremonies of amitie, when was brought from the Lady Regent the ratification, together with the declaration, that with the Daulphin of Fraunce, they would rather give in oftage the kings second sonne, then the twelve Barons. Then the king departed from Madrell, taking his way to the frontier of his Realme, where was to be exchaunged his person for his sonnes who bare very small age. There was sent to accompany him the Viceroy the worker and author of his deliuerie, to whom the Emperour had given the Citie of AH, with other estates in Flaunders and in the kingdome of Naples . At this The Emperour the Citie of Att, with other citates in Franker, and the contribution the Emperous wrote to the Pope a letter of Court, wherein the certified him, that in regard writeth to the Emperous wrote to the Pope a letter of Court, wherein the certified him, that in regard writeth to the to have peace, and for the common benefit of Christendome, he had subdued all passions of iniuries and emulation, and restoring the French king to libertie, he had confirmed the league of kings delinere ent sonne, he had chosen him for conseruer of the peace. Not many dayes after he wrote to hin another letter of his owne hand, which he fent by the fame Commandator Erraro, who brough him the Popes letter written with his owne hand . This was a letter responsive indifferently tempered with words mild and gracious, and matter hard and rigorous, wherein he concluded that if Francis Sforce were not found guilty of the action of his accusation, he will render to hin the Duchie of Millan, and touching the triall of the cause, he referred it to the arbitration o the lawes under fuch Judges as himselse would appoint as his superiour: but in case his inno cencie were found insufficient, he could do no lesse then in that state to inuest the Duke of Bur bon, to whom the Pope was the cause that he had promised it, adulting him thereunto whiles Francis Sforce lay ficke. He added further in this letter to the Pope, that aswell to satisfie him as to assure all Italy, he would ineither retaine that Dukedome for himselfe, nor passe it by do nation to his owne brother, under which testimonie he assured the Pope upon his faith that such was his simple intention, the which he defired him to allow and approue, offering to him alwaye his authoritie and his forces as a sonne obedient to the sea Apostolike. By the same Erraro wa fent also the aunswere to the particulars of the Article which had bene fet downe at length by the Pope in fauour of Francis Sforce, which the Emperour continuing in his first resolution would not allow. The Emperour fent also by him to the Duke of Seffe the forme of the accord as he was determined to do the last time, with authoritie and power to contract if the Pop would accept it: in which was expressed that Francis Sforce should be comprehended in the confederation, so farrefoorth as he were not found guiltie in the crime of treason: but in case of hi death or deprivation, the Duke of Burbon should take place in the confederation, and receive or him the inuestiture for the Duchie of Millan. The obligation was confirmed which the Vicero had made for restitution of the townes holden by the Duke of Ferrara, but under condition tha the Pope should be bound to passe to him the inuestiture of Ferrara, and forgive him the penal tie of contrauention; a matter contrary to the Popes driftes, who had determined to exact paine of an' hundred thousand duckats, to make payment of the fine of an hundred thousan which he had promifed to the Emperour, in case that restitution went on: He did not admit thee state of Millan to make provision of falt of the Church, and touching the collation of benefice in the realme of Naples, he would not be referred to the tenour of the inuestitures, but to the cu ftome and viage of the kings afore, who in many cases had contemned the rights and authority c the fea Apostolike. And because a treaty had bin made with the Legate, that to remoue the arm out of Lumbardy which was a great charge to all Italy, the Pope and he as king of Naples, and the other potentates of Italy, should pay an hundred and fifty thousand duckats, and then the sayd as my to retire to Naples, or into some such place out of Italie as should seeme good to the Em perour, who fayd he would transport it into Barbarie: yea it was added that because there wi more due to the army then at that time, there should be exacted a pay of two hundred thousan duckats. A copie of these Articles was presented to the Pope by the Duke of Seffo and the Con mandator Eerraro, with proteflation that it was not in their power to alter or chaunge one fil lable: and yet all other difficulties had eafily taken forme, if the Duchie of Millan had benef disposed as the Pope with the residue had had no cause to enter into suspition. But in the conf deration of the Duke of Burbon and the minde he bare, they made this judgement of him, the he was so implacable an enemy to the French king, that either for his surery or for a defire to er ter Fraunce, he would be alwayes most deuout and subject to the Emperour, and retaine in him felfe nothing leffe then humours of ambition and defire to be great. They thought that Artic to remoue the army out of Lumbardy (fo greatly defired of all, and for the which they would hat bene brought to haue aduanced any fummes of money) would be to litle purpose, so long as the remained at Millan a Duke, who not only vpon enery gracious offer or motion of the Emperou would be ready to accept the gift of it, but also for his particular interest, would ambiciously a pire and thirl after it. In these regards, the Pope, who for that in the accord which the Empere had made with the French king, was made no particular mention of him, nor the furety of the e states of Italy, stood more and more confirmed in his former opinion, that the ambition an greatnesse of the Emperour would in the end be his seruitude and thraldome: and therefore determined not to accept the accord in the maner it was offered to him, but to referue himselfe fre vntill he were affured what course the French would take touching the observation of the peace. In which resolution he stood so much the more firme, by how much besides the apparance and likelyhoodes of it, he had heard by the relation of certaine speeches deliuered by the king afore his liberty, and spread abroade by some that were familiar in counsell with him, that the king had a mind altogether estranged from performing the things he had promised to the Emperour: and the better to confirme the king in that deliberation (his owne furety also depending vponit) he fent in post into Fraunce, Paule Victorio a Florentine Captaine of his Gallies : his charge was to be at the Court at the same time the king should arrive, ving that diligence not only to know his intention affoone as might be, but also the king hauing a ready hope to be able to draw into league against the Emperor the Pope & the Venetians, he might take occasion the sooner to resolve himselfe. It was enjoyned also to the expedition of Paule, to congratulate in the Popes name the kings deliuery, and to discourse with him at large what he had done to that end, and how much did induce the Emperors inclination to his liberty, the practifes of confederation that were entertay ned with the Lady Regent. Lastly that he should impart with the king the Popes vehement desire to have an univerfall peace in Christendome, and that the Emperor and he would performe together the enterprise against the Turke, who was reported to make mighty preparations to inuade that yeare the realme of Hungary. These were his Commissions apparant & knowne, but this was his direction most substantial & fecret, that aboue all things he shold sound throughly the kings inclination, who if he found resolute to observe the resolution of Madril, then to passe no further, least vainely he shold make his case more desperate with the Emperor then before, but if he found him to have other thoughts, & to hang in doubt, that he shold labor to cofirme him in that disposition & feruing his turne of all occasions, he should specially compel him to take that course, giving him knowledge of the Popes defire to joyne with him for the common benefit. He dispatched in like fort into England the Pronotory Gambaro, to manage the like office with that king, & to the same end. Besides, he procured the Venetians to send into Fraunce their Secretary Andrew Rose, with femblable commissions. As Paule past by Florence vpon his voyage, he fell sicke and died, by reafon of which accident the Pope sent to performe the legation in his place, Capui de Mantua, taking it to an ill prediction, that now the second time the ministers which he had sent into Fraunce to aduance those practises, were in the way intercepted by death. In the meane while making no omission of time nor oportunities, he together with the Venetians, did all that they could to keepe in courage the Duke of Millan, and to entertaine him in hopes, least the peace of Madrill led him not both with feare and rashnesse to make some accord with the Emperour.

By this time the Frenchking was come vpon the confines of Fontaraby, a town cappetraining The maner of to the Emperor, standing upon the Ocean sea, and is a frontier betweene Biskay and the Duchy the delivery of of Guyen: and on the other fide, the Lady Regent was arrived with the children of Fraunce at the French Bayon not many leagues from Fontaraby: the torments of the gout tooke her by the way, which king. was the cause that the had lingred some time longer then the day appointed of permutation: but at last, the eighteenth day of March, the French king accompanied with the Viceroy and Captaine Alarcon with fifty horse, was presented upon the shore of the river that devideth the realme of Fraunce from the kingdome of Spame. And on the other fide, vpon the shore opposite appeared Monsieur Lawtrech with the kings children and like number of horse: there was in the middest of the river a great barke made fast with ankers, in which was no person the king was rowed neare to this barke, in a litle boate wherein he was accompanied with the Viceroy, Captaine Alarcon, and eight others, all armed with short weapons. And on the other side of the barke were likewise brought in a litle boate, Monsieur Lawtrech with the ostages and eight others weaponed according to the others: After this the Viceroy went into the barke with the person of the king, and all his company: and also Monsieur Lawtrech with his eight that accompanied him, so that they were within the barke a like number of both parts, Alarcon and his eight being with the Viceroy, and Lawtrech and the others, with the person of the king : and when they were all thus within the barke, Lawtrech fetched out of the boate into the barke, the Daulphin, who being giuento the Viceroy and by him committed to Captaine Alarcon, was forthwith bestowed in their boate, and after him followed the litle Duke of Orleans, who was no fooner entred the barke, then the Frenchking leaped out of the barke into his boate, which he did with fuch quickenesse and celerity, that the exchange or permutation was thought to be done at one felfe inflant . As foone as the king was on the other fide of the shore, his new liberty making him searefull of ambush, he mounted upon a Turkish horse of a wonderfull swiftnesse, which was prepared for the purpose; and running betweene seare and gladnesse upon the spurre, he neuer flayed till he came to Saint lobn de Lus, a towne of his obedience soure leagues from the place; and being there readilie relieued with a stess horse, he ran with the same swiftnesse to Bayon, where, after he had past ouer the offices of Court done to him by his people, he dispatched with a great diligence a gentleman, to the king of England, to whom he wrote with his owne hand letters of his deliuery, charging the messenger under very louing commissions, to tell the king of England, that as he acknowledged the effect of his liberty to be wrought wholly by him and his operations, so, in recompence, he offered to remaine to him a perpetual and affured friend, and to be guided in all his affaires by his counsell: and afterwards he sent another solenine Embassage into England to ratifie the peace which his mother had made with him, as one that reposed a very great soundation in the amity of that king.

Otwithstanding the pledge of the two children of France (of whom the eldest being heire apparant to so great a succession, was one) was added to the oath and faith that passed betweene the Emperour and the French king, for confirmation of the accord solemnely trade at Madril, and not withstanding for the full perfection of the assurance, by his deliunary both strange for the manner, and seure for the assurance and pawnes that were enforced, all the Princes of Christendome drew into no small expectation what would be the issue of things. And as during his captiuity, the eyes of men flood fixed vpon the Emperour, to behold under what raunfome he would reflore himtoliberty, so being deliuered, they began now to tutne all their thoughts and contemplations vpon the king, for that they discerned fundry and great effects, depending vpon his deliberation, either to observe or not observe the capitulation of Madrill: for, as in observing the contract they saw a destiny of present servitude to hang outer the regions o Italy, both for the authority and greatnesse of the Emperour, which went encreasing, and so the imbecility of the provincesto whom was lest neither fortune nor vertue, to make head against so great a course of victory. So in not performing the articles of the accord, they saw the Emperour would be driven, either to put vp in forgetfulnesse the conspiracies and enterprises dresses against him by the Duke of Missian, and to restore to him that Duchy, least the Pope and Veneral trans tooke occasion to conjoyne with he French king, by which meane he should stand in hazare to loofe the great profits he hoped to reape by his victory : or elfe(making his indignation against the Duke of Millan more mighty, together with his defire to have no impediment of the French in Italy)he should be compelled to assure the accord made with the king, converting into certaine payments of mony, all his obligations and promises to restore Burgundy: or lastly, neither yeelding to the one nor the other, he would be driven to suffer to be brought against him by fo many enemies a war very grieuous almost by his owne confession, since to auoyd ir, he was reduced to this straite, to let the king go with so great a danger.

But the world flood not long in doubt of the will and intention of the French king : for that assone as he was got into Bayon, being required by a gentleman of the Viceroyes, to ratifie the accord according to the obligation of his word, being come into a place free and affured, he deferred it from one day to another interpoling reasons and excuses generall: wherein to the end to hold still the Emperor in hope, he fent to aduertise him by a man especiall, that he sorbare for the present to accomplish the ratification, not by omission or willing negligence, but you this necesfiry, that before he proceeded really to fuch an act, he was to labour to reappeafe and reduce the minds of his subjects ill cotented with the obligations he had made, tending to the diminution of the Crowne of Fraunce: neuertheleffe he would in his time resolue all difficulties, and obserue with fidelity all that he had promifed to him, both in substance and circumstance. By this dealing, no leffe doubtfull for the maner, then dangerous in meaning, might eafily be comprehended, what were his intentions, the same being more manifestly detected at the arrivall of the messengers fent to him not many dayes after by the Pope and Venetians, in whom was no great neede of industry or labour, to found out the plaine course of his inclination: for, after he had received them with many demonstrations and offices of Court, he entertayned them feuerally and apart with fundry speeches of compassion, such as tended to manifest complaints against the inhumanitie of the Emperor: who he fayd did neuer administer to him during his captiuity, any one office appertaining to the ranke of a Prince, nor at any time shewed himselfe touched with that affection The French and comiferation which one Prince ought to expresse vpon the calamities of another: and much king complailesse would vie any course of common comfort, either to relieue the heavinesse of his condition with any property of apt confolation, or once to enter into confideration, that the fame accident that had fallen yoon him, might also be as heatily heaped yoon his owne head. In this complaint, he alleaged the example of Edward king of England, called of some Edward Long-shankes: to whom when was prefented as prisoner lohn king of the Frenchmen, taken by the Prince of Wales his sonne in the battell of Poytiers, he did not onely receive him with great comfort and compassion of his afflicted case, but also, all the time of his imprisonment within the Realme of England, he let him go at liberty under a free gard, he had daily familiar conversation with him, he would ofcentimes have him to accompany him on hunting to communicate in the open avre and folace of the field, and was not curious to call him to eate with him at his table : and by thefe humanities much leffe that he lost his prisoner, or raunged him to an accord leffe fauorable, but of the contrary, by the operation of those graces and good offices, there grew betweene them such a familiarity and confidence, that the French king, after he had continued many yeares in Fraunce, made a voluntary voyage into England, to honor and gratifie under that property of office the liberalitie and frankenesse of the king: He alleaged, that as there was onely remembrance of two kings of Fraunce that had bene taken prisoners in battell, king John and himselfe : so the divertity of the examples was also worthy of fingular memorie, seeing vponthe one was exercifed all facility and mildnesse of the victor, and to the other were ministred all those rigours, and seuerities which tirants in the height and pride of their fortune are wont to vie : That much leffe that he bore towards others a dispositió either more peaceable or better qualified, seeing he gathered by the construction of his speeches ysed at Madrell, that following the humor of his ambition, he employed his thoughts most, how to subdue vnder seruitude the imperie of the Church, the potentacies of Italy, and all other Princes of Christendome. In which regard he wished the Pope and Venetians to provide for their proper fafety, wherein he offered himlelfe with great affection to be concurrant with them in the quarrell of their common fafety, and to establish against the Emperour a straite alliance, not that he intended to reconquer to himselfe the estate of Millan, or otherwise to encrease his purifance, but onely that by the meane of warre he might make recouerie of his children, and reassure the libertie of Italie, seeing the too great couetousnesse of the Emperour had taken from him all colour and reason of bondes to observe the articles of the capitulation: a liberty which he infifted the rather for that at the first whilest he was in the Castell of Pilqueton, & afterwards in Madrill, he had oftentimes protested to the Emperor for the iniquity of his demands, that if through necessity he were driven to compound under conditions vnequall or fuch as were not in his power to performe: that much leffe that he would observe them, but of the contrary, taking the aduantage of the iniury in constrayning him to make promises vnreasonable and unpossible, he would omit no occasion wherein oportunity were offred, to be reuenged: and that he had not forborne to tell him that which of themselves they might know, & which he beleeved was observed in other realmes. That it was not in the power of a king of Frauce, to bind himselfe to the alienation of any thing depending upon the Crowne, without the consent of the estates generall of the realme: That the lawes of Christians did not beare, that a Prince made prisoner by the accidet of war, should be detayned in perpetual prison, a punishment proper for malefactors, but not rigorously executed against such as had bene persecuted with the cruelty of fortune: That no man doubted, that all obligations made by conffraint in prison, were of no value, & that as such capitulations were of no force, so likewise the faith which was but the accidents, & the confirmatio of the fame, could not be bound: That the oathes which he had made at Rhemes, where the kings of Fraunce are confecrated with fo great ceremony & with the facted oyle, were first, by the which he was bound according to the presidet & custome of all other kings of Frauce, not to make alienatio of the patrimony of the Crowne: That for these reasons he was no lesse free then ready to moderate the infolency of the Emperor, & rife vp against his ambitio: wherein the kings mother made apparant the same defire, together with his fifter, who taking upon her in vaine a long iorney to go into Spaine, complained grieuoully against the rigour of the Emperour, and the seuerity of his Court, and namely such as were most familiar with him in Councell: for end, the king affirmed that if commissions and directions were once addressed from the Pope and Venetians, it should not be long ere the league were accomplished, which he sayd were best to be negociated in Fraunce, to the end to draw in with more facility the king of England, in whom they shewed to have a great hope.

This was the discourse of the speeches which the king held with them, being in like fort affured and confirmed by the universall inclination of those that governed him: but in secret, his thoughts were farre others: for, albeit he had no disposition to deliuer vp Burgundy to the Emperour, yet he bore a mind farre estraunged to moue warre against him, valesse he were compelled by great necessity: only he hoped, that in laboring to be confederate with the Italians, the Emperour, to anoyd so great a gulfe of difficulties, would be induced to connert into obligation of mony, the article of the restitution of Burgondy: in which case, not one regard touching the matters of Italy, should stay him from covenanting with him, for the defire he had to retire & revoke his children. These Agents of the Pope and Venetians, made speedie relation of the hopes and good inclination which they found in the French king, and that at a time, when were much increased in Italy, both the necessity and occasion to confederate against the Emperour: this was the necessity. The Duke of Millan in the beginning of the fiege, partly by the fault of his officers, and partly for the shortnesse of time, had bestowed within the Castell, a very small proportion of victuals, and yet the store he had prouided was more immoderately expended, then men reduced to so hard tearmes, are wont to do, for which cause (haning not with standing the straitnesse of the fiege,good meane to write out of the Castell)he gaue knowledge of his wats, which if they were not remedied by the next moneth of June, he should be constrained to give himselfe up to the difcretion of the Emperor; And albeit it was beleeued that (according to the custome of such as are befieged) the Duke fet downe a greater want and fearfity of victuals then in deede there was, yet there were many reasons to perswade that the store could not be sufficient for any long time: and to suffer the Castell to fall into the hands of the Emperor, was a matter that made more hard the recovering of that state, besides that it would increase not a litle the reputation of the Emperor. But it seemed not that the occasion was the lesse increased, seeing the people were reduced to the last dispaire: for, as the Emperour sent no money to the army, to the which many payes were due, and lesse meane to leavie any in any other place: so the Captaines to stop as well as they could all course of mutinie amongst the fouldiers, had bestowed all the regiments of the men at armes and light horsemen, in seuerall places of the countrey, taxing euerie towne ratelike

with bands and numbers, and compelled the townes to compound for mony with the Captaines and with the fouldiers; a taxation executed with such excesse, that it was affured by the credible information of many that had privity with the affaires of that state, that the Duchy of Aullan payd euery day to the Emperours souldiers, fine thousand duckers, of which came to the prinare purie of Anthony de Lena, thirty duckets dayly. By the example of the horsmen, the bands of footmen that were dispersed in severall lodgings within Millan and other townes, were insolent ypon the owners of the houses wherein they lay, whom they constrained not only to make prouifion of all things which they thought meet for their feeding and clothing, but also many of them being lodged in one house, enforced the service of the good man for the provision of them all:and fuch houses as had not meane to feede them, were compelled to compound with them for money at their owne rate: & as it often fell out, that one only fouldier had to himselfe a whole house with absolute commandement of all, so he taxed to furnish him of money all the residue, except him whom he vsed in the prouision of his diet. This miserable condition exercised with so great crueltie, made desperate the whole inhabitants of that Duchie, and namely the townesinen of the Citie of Millan, to whom had bene neither cultome nor prefident, before the entrie of the Marquis of Pesquiere, to be charged either with victuals or contribution for the lodging of souldiers: their cultome in times of warre before, running in a course of greater humanity and sacilitie, made the yoke of this innouation more heavy to them; in which respect looking into their owne estate, both to be mightie innumbers and armes, and remembring the law and obligation of their freedome and liberrie, they began to murmure, as men not able any longer to endure fo great infolencie and most grieuous exactions: and therefore to make some honest way to be deliuered, or at least to reduce them to some comely moderation, the towns of Millan lent Embassadors to the Emperour, who brought from him no other expedition then words generall, and that without any remedy to their afflictions: the towne of Millan principally and over and belides all the other townes of the Duchie, being charged according to his proportion with a greater number of fouldiers then the other townes, was also taxed to prouide money for expences publike, such as were set downe by the Captaines for the consequation of the Emperours things: the ministers of which exaction proceeded with no leffe rigour and severity then the others; for remedie of which aggreeuances, fince by folicitation they could neither be eased nor pitied, the people pushed on with the impressions of men in a desperate state, determined to resist with their weapons in hand those fore exactions which the iniquity of the war had laid upon the, to eate them vp. They gaue order, that who focuer were oppressed by the crueltie of the exactors, The inhabishould call upon his neighbors to come to his defence; who, together with the universal multitude tants of Milla of all the refidue should run at the commandement of certaine Chieftaines affigned in many parts rife pp against of the citie, to resist the furie of the officers and represse the insolency of the souldiers that should the Imperials. rife in their fauour. After this order and direction was established amongst them, the first experience fell upon a Marchant of retaile, who being vexed by the Collectours of the exactions, thirred up for his defence his neighbours, who calling to the alarme a great part of the populars, the whole towne was forthwith in a tumult: which, by the diligence of Antho, de Leua, and the good office of the Marquis of Guaft, and other of the principall Gentlemen of Millan, was efficiences reappealed: but vinder this condition & promise that the Captaines had assured the people to rest contented with the publike reuenues, and would not lay vpon them other impositions, nor bring into the towne other bands of fouldiers. This was an accord but for a verie short time, since it endured no longer then till the day following: for the people having advertisement that new regiments of fouldiers approched neere the towne, they fell againe into armes, but both in a greater tumult, and better gouerned, and with a greater affiltance of the people then the day before: year what with the rage of the populars, which in their futie is daungerous, and what with their well ordering of the vprore, being taught by the example of the day before: the Captaines fearing not to be able to refult fo great a furie, were vpon the point to go out of the towne with their bands: a matter which indeed the humour of their feare had drawne them to do ; if the people with a fetled resolution had marched on to be reuenged of them and their souldiers: but as in tumults and popular vprores there is alwayes something of imperfection, and that aswell by the property of the action which holderh of disobedience and rebellion, as by the ignorance of the leaders, who for the most part have more passion then reason : so first of all they went without all order or skill to facke the old Court, a place where lay the Captaine of criminall inflice with certaine bands of footmen, making their beginning with that which should have bene the last act of their execution; a matrer which gaue no litle life and advantage to the Imperial Captaines, who in that oportunitie omitted not to fortifie their straights and places of accesse, and reuoking from the fiege the most part of the footmen that kept the Castle enuironed, they assembled all into one strength, to make head against the people, if they offered to inuade them . By that occasion the besieged within the Cattle made a fally out to set vpon the ramparts cast on that side within: but when they faw the people made not on to their fuccours, they retired eftfoones into the Callle, leaving unperfect the enterprise, which with due execution would have done nuch to have established their libertie: the people, partly for want of experience in actions of warre, and partly for the care of the pillage they had made at the old Court, did not onely omitto do that which appertained, but also began to breake and separate themselves, every one being more mindfull to preserve the pray he had made, then to follow further the victorie which their fortune offered to them: by which occasion the Captaines of the armie, concurring the aide of certaine Gentlemen of the towne, reappealed estsoones this tumult, with promise to leade out of the towne and countrey of Millan all the fouldiers, except those bands of Launceknights which held the Castle besieged. In this fort the Captaines and men of warre, by their pollicie and industrie quenched a daungerous fire, which the furie of the people had kindled in their rashnesse, and rightly fcorned their diforders and ignorance to manage armes and weapons; errours which familiarly do follow a communaltie drawne into mutiny, hauing no leaders of experience and valor but by these appealements and accords all intelligences were not broken, and much lesse laid downe the armes of the people but retaining full many tokens of a disposition to flir vp a greater emotion, it feemed that who focuer would take upon him to trouble the affaires of the Emperour, need not want a fit occasion, considering principally both the small forces and other great difficulties which the Imperials had, and also that in the last wars, the wonderfull valour of the people of Millan and of other townes expressed in their fauour, had bene a great foundation for the defence of that estate.

These were the termes and estate of the affaires of Italy, when were brought out of Fraunce the reports of the teady disposition and offers of the king, together with his request for the sending of Commissions: and at the same time the Embassadors of the king of England resident with the Pope, laboured to induce him by reasons and perswasions to deuise how to moderate the greatnesse of the Emperour, and to encourage the French king not to observe the capitulation: by reason of which inducements, accompanied with the authority and inclinations of their Princes, not onely the Venetians, who in all times and in farre leffer occasions had given counsell to take armes, but also the Pope not withstanding his hard disposition to enter into that trauell, judged now that by necessity he was to reduce and gather together the summe of all those discourses, and no more deferre to take some deliberation: the reasons which in the moneths before hac made him inclined to the war, were not only the felfe same in nature and propertie, but also were more mightie and of greater confideration: for as the Emperour for his part, by how much the practifes and treatifes had bene holden out in tract and longueffe of time, was apt and able to difcouer what intentions the Pope bare against his greatnesse: so the Popetooke occasion by the contents of the accord which the Emperour had made with the French king, to enter into a just fuspition not to be able to obtaine of him any reasonable conditions, and that he had a secret refolution to proceed to oppresse the residue of Italy: wherein the daunger was more apparam then ever, for that the Castle of Alillan being not able to hold our any long time, stood almos vpon the point of rendering: he was also prouoked with the consideration of new injuries redoubled by the Imperiall Captaines, who fince the capitulation of Madril, had fent to be forried vpon the territories of Plaisance and Parma, certaine Enfignes of Italian footmen, such as executed vpon the places many insolencies and domages: and when the Pope complained of their oppressions, they made him answer, that they were drawne thither of their proper authority, for that there was no pay distributed in the army. He was likewise incensed with matters haply more light and fraile, but taken in the worse part, as often commeth to passe in su spitions and quarrels, which " have this in propertic, to take nothing in good that is not agreeable to the humor of their will and " liking, and to turne all things to blame that have no correspondencie with their owne intentions and meanings: for as the Emperour had published in Spaine, certaine edicts pragmatike against the authoritic of the Sea Apoliolike, by vertue whereof his subjects were forbidden to treat of causes of benefices within his realmes: so under that warrant a Spanish Notarie tooke boldnesse euen in the Court of Rome, and in the Chamber of audience, to commaund certaine men in the Emperours name, to defitte pleade anie more in that Auditorie and also it did not only feeme that by the deliuerie of the French king, the knot was vnfastened which had bound enery man indoubt, that the Frenchmen to have agains their king would not flicke to abandon the league: and withall it was well difcerned, that the fociety and presence of the kings person was of farre greater importance for the enterprise, then the fellowship of his mother & the generall gouernment: but also there were seene other farre greater occasions: for as the commotion of the commons of Mullan seemed to draw with it a matter of great consequence, so by the penutic of vi-Etnals that passed generally ouer all that estate, it was thought it could not be but a great aduantage to fet vpon the Imperials, before they fell into the oportunity of the harnest to remeduall and refutnish their strong places; and before necessity compelled the Castle of Alellan to yeeld, and before the Emperour had time to fend into Italy new supplies of men, or releeue them with prouisions of money. Moreouer, there fell into conideration, that the French king, in whom for the memory of things past, was great likelyhood of distrust against the Pope, and now finding not in hima zeale and forwardnesse to make war, would eftloons resolute to observe the accord made at Madrill, or elle to reconfirme it of new: and it was not doubted, that so great forces both by sea & land being conjuyred in one, together with fufficient means to continue for long time the expences of the war, that the conditions of the Emperor flanding both abandoned of all other Prin-. ces, & made naked of all flore of mony, wold be far inferior in the wat: only there was one foruple to the contrarie, caused by a seare, that the French kingto redeeme his children, would leaue abadoned the other cofederats, according to the doubt that was had of the gouernmet of Fraunce at such time as the king was prisoner: & yet there was esteemed great difference, for that in taking armes against the Emperour with so many good occasions, there was so great hope to recour them by force, & the action to fucceed with 10 great areputation of the king, that he would have no reason to open his eares to any accord particular, which would not only bring infamy to him, but also would be prejudiciall to his affaires, though not for the present, at least in time to come: for that it could not but be a matter most dangerous for the realme of Fraunce, to suffer the Enperour to dispose of Italy according to his owne arbitration. Of which reason did likewise follow. that he wold not faile to make sharpe warre vpon him, since it could not be but a naked Counsell in confederating against the Emperour, to deprine himself of the recouring of his children by the observation of the accord: and yet on the other side, to lay apart all things by the which he might hope to redeeme them glorioully by armes, such as made their discourses in this fort, confidered haply more that which reasonably he ought to do, then they looked with judgement into the nature of the Frenchmen; a fault wherin men do oftentimes fall, in matters of deliberatios and judgements that are made of the disposition and will of others : perhaps also they did not fufficiently confider, how much Princes that are culpable, who of their proper inclination do oftentimes preferre villity afore fidelitie, are eafily perfivaded the femblable of other Princes: and that therefore the French king suspecting least the Pope and the Venerans wold become negligent and carelesse of his interests, when by the conquest of the Duchie of Millan they should fland assured of the power of the Emperour, would judge that the longnesse of the warre would be more profitable to him then the victorie, as a meane more easie to induce the Emperour to refore his children vpon some new composition, being already made weary of the long trauels and expences of warres. So that partly by the reasons afore reheatled, making deepe impression in the mind of the Pope, but more for repentance that he had flood an idle beholder of the islue of the battell of Pauia, and somewhat for that he was reproched by euery one of timerousnesses,& laftly, for the common murmure of all his Court, and of all Italy, who cast in his teeth, that by his: fault the Sea Apostolike, together with the whole estate of Italy were reduced into so great dangers: he derermined in the end, not onely to enter consederation with the French king and the residue against the Emperout, but also by his labour and solicitation, to aduaunce and pursue it to. fpeedy conclusion : in which good inclination, he was pushed on partly for the other regards, but principally for this, that in time might be advaunced the provisions for the reliefe of the Castle of Millan, before the extremitie of samine compelled them to repose more in the mercie of the enemies, then in the remedie of their friends: that necessitie was the cause of all the aduerfities which followed: for that otherwise the Pope proceeding more flowly (vpon whose authoritie the Venetians depended much in this action) had expected if the Emperor being mouec with the inobservation of the French king, would not propound for a common furety, those conditions which had bene set downe before, specially when he should see himselfe constrained to take armes : and being not compelled to shew to the French king so great a necessity, he had eafily obtained of him aswell for himselfe as for the Venetians better conditions: and it had bene without doubt that thereby the articles of the confederation had bene better fet downe and particulated, together with more assurance of the observation, and that the warre had not begun but that the Swiffers had stirred, and all the provisions necessarie had bene ready: and lastly, the king of England might haply have bene drawne into the confederation, with whom for the distance of places, there was no leifure to negociate. But for that by the danger of the Castle of Millan, the Pope and the Venetians faw that celeritie was of great importance, they dispatched with speed (but secretly) commissions to their severall Agents, to go thorough with the consederation, wherin they were enjoyned to follow almost all those articles which had bene debated before with the Lady Regent of Frannce, the more to hasten the expedition. There were sent dayly aduertisements of the necessity of the Castle, which made the Pope enter into consideration, that wheras it was necessarie, for that the high way from Rome to the Court of Fraunce was stopped, to send his messenger and curriers by a long circuit of way through Swifferland, and where he thought that in the action of capitulation might fall out some difficultie, which necessarily might draw some intermission and tract of time, it might happen that they might stand solong upon the conclusion of the confederation, that if till then the Castle were deferred to be rescued, there were daunger leaft the fuccours would come too late: for which confideration, importing almost the effect and substance of the whole, he called to consult of the present perill the Venerians, by whose counsell, together with the importunate solicitation of the Agents of the Duke of Millan refident at Rome and at Venice, and concurring also the counsell of manie others of his faction, they resolued to prepare a sufficient force to give rescue to the Castle, to the end to be ready to employ them assoone as the conclusion of the league were come out of Fraunce, and in the meane while to give hope to the people of Millan, and to nourish many practises, which they entertained in the townes of state : they made then a resolute conclusion, that the Venetians should send the Duke of Vrbinto their frontiers towards the river of Adda, accompanied with their men at armes, and fixe thousand footmen Italians, and the Pope to send to Plaisance the Count Guido Rangon with fixe thousand footmen: and for that it was necessarie to so great a war to have many numbers of the Smiffers, of which nation the Duke of Vrbin counselled to leavie twelve thousand for the affured obtaining of the victorie, who also aduised the Pope and the Venetians, that not to disclose themselves so much against the Emperour, so long as they were not affured that the league was made, it were not good to fend out their Agents to leavie the Smiffers. They gave eare to lohn la.de Medicis of Millan, who of a Captaine of the Rocke of Mus, had made himself Lord of the place, pattly by a knowledge he had of the situation and fortresse, and partly by the occasion and sauour of the time running: he told them that many moneths before he had practifed to that effect with many of the Swiffer-Captaines, and did offer under an imprest of fixe thousand duckets, to make discend an armie of fixe thousand Swiffers, which shold not be leavied by the decree of the Cantons, but particularly, and then to proceed to furnish their pay, affoone as they were discended into the Duchy of Willan: fo that as it often hapneth in enterprises which of the one side are esteemed easie, and on the other side are pressed with the shortneffe of time, the offer of this man was accepted by the Pope and the Venetians, being also approued by the Agents of the Duke of Millan, and by Ennia Bishop of Verula, in whom the Pope reposed wholly for matters of the Swiffers, for that he had long time followed the solicitation of those affaires in the name of the Church, & in that action had lyen many moneths at Bressia by his directio, & was at that time with the Agent of the Venetians, where he treated cotinually with manie of that nation. In like fort they harkened at Venice to Oftanian Fregofa Bishop of Loda, who offering to make an easie leavie of many numbers of that nation, had immediatly his expedition (without communicating with the Pope) for Swifferland to wage fixe thousand, in the same fort and at thet ame rate of payes: of which deuifes, both ill understood and worfe ordered, was bred (as shall be recited in his place) a beginning to put to confusion the enterprise, which was

Whilest these preparations were in hand in Italy, the Emperour beginning to enter into suspition for the delayes that were interpoled to the ratification, dispatched into Fraunce the Viceroy of Naples & Captaine Alarcon, to be fully informed of the kings intention, who was now gone from Bayon to Congnac: the Viceroy had stayed all that while in the towns of Victoria, having with him the olfages and the Queene Eleoner, to the end to prefent them to the king affoone as he had accomplished the contents of the capitulation; and albeit the Viceroy was received with verie great honour, both for that he was Embassadour from the Emperour, and also the king acknowledged in him and his working, a great part of his deliuerie, yet he found the king wholly estranged & far offto leave Burgundy, somtimes taking his excuse you obstinacy of the estates of the realme whose consent he could not obtain: & somtimes alleaging that willingly he neuer pasfed a promife, which for that it was verie prejudiciall to the Crowne of Fraunce, it was impossible for him to obserue: only in respect of his great desire to entertaine the league of amitie begun with the Emperour, and to give perfection to the mariage promised, he said he was contented, observing all other covenants betweene them, to pay vnto himtwo millions of crownes, in place of the refignation of Burgundy: to which excuses he added, that no other thing induced him to confirme with this moderation the accord made at Madrill, then an inclination he had to continue in good intelligence and correspondencie with the Emperour, the rather for that he wanted not the working of offers and motions from the Pope, the king of England, and the Venetians, to incense him to the warre: which answer comprehending his last resolution, the Viceroy fignified to the Emperour the message, being accompanied with one of the kings Secretaries, to confirme the same. By this it hapned, that not with standing the commissions from the Pope and Venetians so much defired before, were now come to the Court, yet the king bearing a more inclination to have agreement with the Emperour, and in that regard had determined to expect his answer vponthenew offer, wherein the Vicerby had given him some hope, began openly to defer the coclusion of the confederation, not altogether dissembling (fince it was impossible to hide ir) that he solicited a new accord with the Emperour, which being propounded by the Viceroy, it was a matter which could no way do hurt to be understood. Besides, he assured the (not with standing he had other intentions) that he would never make any conclusion which should not containe the restoring of his children, the release of the Duchy of Mullan, & vnfayned provision for the furety of all Italy: an alteration of it selfe sufficient to consume the Pope, if for his impressions of suspition & feare, he had not judged that the only remedy for his affaires, was to consederate himselfe with the French king. But it is not to be doubted with what discontentment and perturbation of mind the Emperour received the newes of the Viceroyes advertisements, confirmed by the relation of the Secretarie of the French king: for, as it brought no litle gricfe to him The Emperor to fall from the hope he had to recouer Burgundy, a matter which he vehemently defired, as well ill contented, for the augmentation of his glorie, as for the oportunitie of that Prouince: fo his indignation feemed redoubled, for that the French king by finding euasions to shift off his promises and faith giuen, made manifest declaration to all the world, that he rejected and despised to performe the thing he had promifed: but the thing that bred most torment in his mind, was a certaine shame and reprouing of himselfe; for that both contrarie to the counsell of all his Nobles, and against the vniuerfall judgement of all his Court, and also contrarie to the prediction or foreshewing of the countrie of Flaunders related to him by the Lady Margaret his Aunt, and by all his agents and officers in Italy, he did not measure with better reasons and more maturity of counsell, the importance and condition of affaires, but lulled fimply in the humor of affection, perswaded himfelfe that the French king would observe the accord. And as amid these impressions and variety of thoughts, he had diligently confidered that which concerned his dignity, and foreseene in what termes of daunger and difficulties his affaires would fland at all affayes, he determined to alter no one lote of that article or chapter which spake of the restoring of Turgundy: no he rather refolued to accord with the Pope, and to confent to thereintegration of Frauncis Storce, as though it had bene more agreeable or comely for him to pardon a Ptince leffe then himselfe, then by veelding to the will of a king ambicious and puilfant, and ennious of his greatnesse, to make as it were a voluntarie confession of seare: wherein his passion caried him into this resolution, to haue rather a most dangerous war with euerie one, then to remit the iniury received of the French king: for he feared least the Pope seeing his aniity contemned, was wholly estranged in mind from him, wherein his suspition was augmented by the aduertisement he received, that besides the Pope had fent into Fraunce a particular messenger to congratulate with the king, he had also sent publikely an Embassadour: but much more did he suspect, for that he had newly taken into his pay, under colour to affure against the Moores the sea shoares of the Church, Andrew Dore with eight Galleis ynder the pay of thirtie thousand duckets for entertainment, and pensions for energy yeare: a matter which both for the quality of the man, and for that neuer heretofore the Pope had any thought to make himselfe strong vpon thesea, and also because Andrew Dore had bene many yeares in the pay of the French king: made him enter into suspition least that practife were suborned of intention to trouble the chate of Genes. For these reasons he prepared himselfe to endure all accidents, and leavied at the same time many provisions of warre, both to offend and defend: he folicited the passing of the Duke of Burbon into Italy, who made but slow preparation to that expedition, before he gaue order to that end, that the feuen Gallies which lay at Monaco in Italy, should be brought about to Barcelonia to be joyned with the refidue, & that there should be fent to releeue the necessicies of Italy, an hundred thousand duckets, for that without them the going of the Duke of Burbon would ferue to nothing: he dispatched to the Pope Don Hugo de Moncado, with commission (as he said) to fatisfie him: but his directions were to passe first by the Court of Fraunce: to the endthat learning of the Vicero; if there were any hope that the king would observe, that either he should passe no further, crif he did, that he should chaunge his instructions and commissions according to the estate and necessitie of affaires. But to euerie good counsell that was given to the Pope, was opposed the daunger of the Callle of Millan, which being almost confumed with want of victuals, the had great feare least it would be rendered to the enemy: he was also timerous that by some meane were contracted a new accord betweene the French king and the Emperour: he was vicertaine of that which might be wrought by the comming of Don Hugo, whose legation was made to much the more suspicious, by how much he was to passe first by the Court of Fraunce: and he was icalous of the diffimulations and cunnings that would be vied when he should be passed into Italy. In which regard, the Pope, together with the Venerians foliciting with great instance the conclusion of the confederation, the king at last began to hearken with better inclination to the resolution of the league whereunto he was induced partly for that he did understand by the comming of Don Hugo, that the Emperour wold alter nothing of the articles of the capitulation, and partly through feare, that if he should deferte further the action of confederation, the Pope would be caried into new counfels : he judged also that by this confederation his affaires should thand in better festate of reputation with the Emperour, in whom feare might haply plie or moderate the rigour of his mind : and laftly, he wanted not the incitations of the king of England, who more with perswasions and reasons then with effects and found meanings, feemed to fauour that conclusion. This league was concluded the The Tope, the tenth day of May in the yeare a thouland five hundred and fixe, at Congnac, betweene the kings Councell, deputies for the king, on the one part, and the Agents of the Pope and Venetians on the other part: That betweene the Pope, the French king, the Venetians, and the Duke of Millan (for whom the Pope and the Venetians assured the ratification) should be a league and confederation perpetuall, to the end to repossesse Frauncis Storce freely of the Duchie of Millan, and reflore to libertie the French kings children: That the league should be fignified to the Emperour, to whom was graunted power to enterinto it within three moneths, vpon condition to redeliuer the kings children, receiving a competent ransome, such as should be arbitrated by the king of England: which condition also was extended to leave wholly the Duchie of Millan to Frauncis Sforce, and the other potentates and estates of Italy, as they were afore the last warre began: That for the deliuetie of Frauncis Sforce, now befieged within the Castle of Millan, and for the recoverie of that estate, a present warre should be made with eight hundred men at armes, fenen hundred light horsmen, and eight thousand footmen for the Popes part: and for the Veneteans, the warre to be furnished with eight hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and eight thousand sootemen : for the Duke of Millan soure hundred, men at armes, three bundred light horsemen, and soure thousand sootemen: this proportion to be surnished assoone as

he should be able, and in the meane time the Pope and Venetians to accomplish for him: The French king to fend immediatly into Italy five hundred Launces, and fo long as the watre should endure, to pay to the Pope and to the Venetians fourtie thousand crownes monethly, which money was to be employed in the leavie of bands of Swiffers: That the French king should immediatly open the warre against the Emperour beyond the Mounts on what side he should thinke most convenient, and that with an armie of two thousand Launces, and tenne thousand footmen, with sufficient numbers of artilleries: That the French king should arme xij. light Gallies, and the Venetians thirteene, at their proper expences: That the Pope should joyne to those Gallies that proportion of Nauie, with the which he had entertained into his pay Andrew Dore: That the charges should run in common touching necessary ships for the said armie by sea, with the which they shold addresse their course to Genes: That after the Emperors army in Lombardy were either vanquished or weakened, they should mightily inuade the kingdome of Naples as well by land as sea, which being once conquered, the possession and inuestiture should be transferred to which of the confederates it pleafed the Pope: and yet in anarticle separate was fet downe, that the Pope could not dispose of it without the consent of the confederates, only there was refernation made of the tributes and contributions which anciently were yied to be paid to the Sea Apostolike, together with one fingular estate of sourtie thousand duckets of revenue, to gratifie whom it pleafed the Pope: That to the end the French king were certaine, that by the victorie to be obtained in Italy and the conquest of Naples, might be made easie the deliverie of his children: That if the Emperour in that case would within soure moneths after the losse of that kingdome, enter into the confederation under the conditions aforefaid, the kingdome should be rendred to him; but if he would not accept that power to reenter into the league, then the French king should take and enjoy the yearely and perpetuall rent of that realme: That the French king should not at anie nor time, for any cause, molest Frauncis Sforce for the Duchie of Millan, but shold be bound together with the others, to defend him against all men, and to do what he could to introduce betweene him and the Swiffers a new confederation; only the king should receive of him yearely a perpetual tribute, such as should be set downe by the arbitration of the Pope and Venetians, and that not to be leffe then fiftie thousand duckets: That Frauncis Sforce should take to wife such a Ladie of the bloud of Fraunce, as it should please the king to provide for him, and should be bound to entertaine, as appertained, his brother Maximilian, in place of the yearly pension which he received of the king: That the king should reenter into the Earldome of As: That if Genes were recourred, the king to retaine the same estate of superioritie which he was wont to do in times past: and that if Anth. Adorne, who then was Duke there, wold compound with the League, he should be received so farre forth as he would acknowledge the French king for superiour, in the same fort and maner as Ottanian Fregosa had done a few yeares before: That all the confederates should demand of the Emperor the deliuerie of the children of Fraunce, and if he refused to restore them, that it should be denounced to him in the name of them all, that the League would do all that they could to have themagaine: That as foone as the warres of Italy were finished, or at least the realine of Naples taken, and the Emperors armie so weakened as there was no feare of it, all the confederates should be bound to aide the French king against the Emperour beyond the Mounts with a thousand men at armes, a thousand fine hundred light horsemen, and ten thousand sootemen, or else with money in place of men at the kings choile: That not one of the confederates without the confent of the others, might not contract with the Emperor, to whom it should be permitted, in case he would enter into the confederation, to go to Rome to take the Imperiall Crowne with fuch attaine of men as should not be feared, the same to be rated by the Pope and Venetians: That thoughany one of the confederates were taken away by death, yet the League should stand good and absolute: That the king of England should be protector and defender of the League, to whom was left power to enter into it: And in case he wold enter, there should we given to him in the realme of Naples an estate of thirty thousand duckets of revenue, and another often thousand to the Cardinall of Yorke, and that to be leavied either in the same realme, or in some other part of Italy. The Pope would not fuffer the Duke of Ferrara to be comprehended within the confederation, notwithstanding the French king and the Venetians did greatly folicite it : yeahe procured that the confederation should beare (though vider generall words) that the confederates should be bound to aide him to recouer those places, for the which the said Duke was in contention with the Church Touching the Florentines, there was no doubt that they were not effectually comprehended in the consederation, for that the Pope made his reckening not only to serve his turne with their met at armes and their forces, but also to reduce them concurrate with him, yea even to make them suffaine the greatest burthen of the expences of the warre: but, not to hinder the traffike and entercourse which that nation had with the subjects of the Emperour, as also not to put in daunger their Marchants and factors, they were not named under the title of consederates: onely it was set downe that they should enion all the exemptions, priviledges, and benefites of the consederation, as if they had bene expressly comprehended, the Pope assuring for them that they should be in no fort against the league. There was no provision or nomination of the Captaine generall of this armie and warre, for that by the shortnesse of the time they had no leasure to bring into counsell and election uppon whose shoulders they should lay so great a burthen, both for the authoritie and qualitie of the man, and the considence that everie one had in him: neither was it easie to finde out such a man, in whose person were concurrant so worthic conditions.

The League being thus contracted, the French king, who had not as yet altogether withdrawne his minde from the practifes which he entertained with Viceroy of Naples, both deferred to ratific it, and to begin to make to march his companies of men at armes, and also to fend the fortie thousand duckets for the first moneth, untill the ratification of the Pope and the Venetians were accomplished: and albeit such an intermission was not a little troublesome to them, yet being pressed by their necessities to pursue their purpose, they dispatched the ratification, and entred immediatly to give beginning to the warre, under the title that they would rescue the Castle of Millan. In which action the Pope, who had before sent to Plaisance, Guido Rangon General of the Church armie, with his companies of men at armes, and a strength of fine thousand footmen, sent thither of new with other regiments of footmen, and the men at armes of Florence, Vitello Vitelli their Captaine and Gouernour, together with Iohn de Medicis Commaunder ouer the Italian Infanterie: he created Frauncis Guicciardin at that time President of Romagnia, his Lieutenant generall ouer the armie, and ouer the whole iurisdiction, enduing him with most ample, and almost absolute power. The Venetians on their side increased their army, which remained at Chiara in the countrie of Bressa, ouer the which was constituted Captaine generall the Duke of Vrbin, and for their treasurer was appointed Peter Pezero: both the one and other armie had one direction, which was to endomage the Imperials, and to inuade them without deferring or suffering for any respect. In this meane while was arrived at Alillan Don Hugo de Mocado, who albeit the League was still kept from the knowledge of the Viceroy and him, yet distrusting by the kings answers, that matters could not be reduced to the contentment of the Emperour, he had followed his way into Italy: and there earling with him into the Castle of Millan the Pronotarie Caraccioll, he laboured to assure the Duke of the facility and clemency of the Emperour, feeking to perswade him to referre himselfe to his will:but the Duke made answer, that in regard of the iniuries which the Emperours Captaines had done to him, he was driven to have recourse to the Pope and Venetians, without whose primity and participation he could not dispose of himselfe. Don Hugo put him in hope that the Emperors intetion was, that the crimes that were charged against him, shold be summarily viewed & examined by the Pronotary Caraccioll, who was a Prelate of great confidence with the Duke; a course which he said the Emperour tooke, rather to restore vnto him his estate with a better conservation of the Emperors reputation, then for any other occasion, & yet he wold not cofent that the siege might be first leavied, nor promise to innouate any thing according to the inflance of the Duke. It was believed that the authority & power which the Emperot gauc to Don Hugo was very ample & large, the same extending not only to enable him to corract with the Pope according to the reintegration of the Duke of Milla, but also his comission bare to copound with the Dekcalone, taking assurace, that being restored to his estate, he shold do no act prejudicial to the affaires of the Emperor: only this comission was under limitatio according to the traine of times & necessity, so that Don Hugo condering into what extremity was reduced the castle, & that to copound with the Duke profited nothing the affaires of the Emperor, but instrumetally, or as a meane to establish the accord with the Pope & the Venetians, judged it wold be a matter ynprofitable to cotract with him alone. Afterwards Don Hugo &

the Pronotary caused to be brought fro Monce, Moron, kept prisoner within the rocke of Trezzo the fame being for this cause, that the Pronotary who was to be judge of the cause, should take his information of him. Immediatly after this, Don Hugo tooke his way from Millan to Rome, having first written to Venice, that they should send sufficient authority to their Embassador at Rome to negociate & debate of the affaires occurrant: being come to Rome, he was brought to the prefece of the Pope, together with the Duke of Seffe, to who he declared with braue words, that it was in his electió to accept either peace or war, for that the Emperor, not with stading by his good intention & inclination was not effrauged fro peace, yet he was neuertheleffe both in courage & in preparation ready disposed both to the one & to the other. Wherunto the Pope answered generally, and complained that what for the hard termes which the Emperours officers had yied to him, & the very late arrivall of Don Hugo, he stood now bound to others, where afore he was in his owne libertie: they returned to him the next day, fignifying that the Emperors intention was to leave wholly the Duchy of Millan to Frauncis Sforce, fo far forth as the castle might be consignedinto the hands of the Pronotatie Carraccioll, vntill for the Emperors honor there were examination made of the cause, though not to the bottome & substance, yet in apparance & by ceremony: that also the Emperors intentió was to put end to the quarrels between him & the Venetians, by some reasonable & comely mean, & to withdraw his army out of Lobardy with the payes which had bene treated upon at other times: and that in counterchange & recopence of all thefe, he demanded no other thing of the Pope, then that he would forbeare ro interpole betweene him and the French king. To these propositions the Pope answered, that he doubted not that all the world had taken fufficient knowledge, how carefully he had alwayes defired to keep amity with the Emperour, and that he had never demanded greater things, then those which the Emperour himselfe did willingly offer him: matters which could not be more to his contentment, for that his defire was alwayes greater to the common benefite, then for his profite : that still he continued in the fame inclination, though there were given to him many occasions to fall from it: neuertheleffe that he heard now with a greater griefe of mind the matters which were offered to him by accord, then he had heard them at fuch time as they were denied him; an alteration which had not proceeded of his fault, but of the flownesse of the Emperour deferring so long to resolue: by which occasion, joyning also that there was neuer brought vnto him any hope of the assurance of the common affaires of Italy, and feeing in the meane while the perill of the caffle of Millan, he had bene constrained for his owne safety & for the comon interest of others, to joyne confederation with the French king, without whom he had no power to determine any thing, This was the conflancie of the Pope, verified with many other replications and circumflances tending to affure his faith given: against the which, after Don Hugo had in vaine objected his reasons and inducements, he departed from Rome ill contented with the Popes answers: by whose example also all the Imperial Captaines fell to murmure, for that the hopes of peace being cut off, they faw things tend to manifest warre, which both for the might and power of the league, and for their owne extremities and disorders, they supposed it would be verie heavy for them to sustaine.

About this rime the Popes Lieutenant surprised apacket of letters, written by Anth.de Lena to the Duke of Seffs, by the which he gaue him aduertisement of the ill disposition of the people of Mullan, and touching their affaires, there was no other remedy then the grace of God: he also interceptedletters written from him & the Marquis of Guast to Don Hugo after he was gone from Mullan, wherin making earnest solicitation to aduance the peace, they insisted greatly to know forthwith what would enfue of the negociation, not failing with words of great compassion to recommend vnto the the danger wherin their lives flood, & the perillous condition of the Emperors armie: but there was not fo great, affurance in the minds of those that were to dispose of the forces of the league, as the feare was great joyned with incertaintie of resoultion amongst the Imperiall Captaines: for the Duke of Vrbin, who for the title he had of Captaine generall ouer the Venetian army, & also for his singularity of estate, authoritie, & reputation about the others, managed in effeet the absolute government of the whole armie: he esteemed haply more then was convenient, of the valour of the Spaniards & Launceknights, & doubted no leffe of the vertue of the Italian fouldiers: in which distrust he had resolved in his mind, not to passe the river of Adda, if he had not at the least in the armie a strength of 5000 Smiffers: & fearing also least the Imperials would passe Adda & fet youn him, if onely with the copanies of the Venetians he passed the river of Oglio, he made instance that the armie of the Church which was then at Plaifance, passing ouer the river of Par beneath Cremona, might march to joyne with the Venetians, & fo in one maine strengthro draw neare the river of Adda, & vpon the shores of the same in some place of strength to attend the coming of the Swiffers: who cotrary to their custome & nature were slow to desced, being let with many impediments & difficulties, the rather for that the charge to leavie the was vndifcreetly comitted to Captaine Mus & the Bishop of Loda: of whom, as the Bishop being a man full of humors of vanitie & lightnesse, was not apt to manage that businesse as appertained; so Captaine Mus according to his couetousnesse fought chiefly to possels himself of one part of the mony that was sent to distribute in imprest to the souldiers: & for other respects neither of them both caried fuch authoritie with that nation, as under fo small a quantity of money to make leauy of fo great a number, and that with that speed which the necessity of the service required. Besides, the expedition was corrupted by the imperfection of the parties, the one being caried with ambition, and the other with vanity, and they both more disposed to respect their interests particular, then to observe the general cause of the service. Against this action also the French agents that lay in the countrey of Swifferland opposed some difficulties, for that they neither knew what wil & inclination their king bare to it, nor whether it was contrary or conformable to his intentions: for not by omiffion or forgetfulnesse, but willingly & expresly they had fayled to aduertise the king of that expedition, following haply those counsels which oftentimes seeming very discreet and well ranged, are found in the end very futtle and fallible : for Albert Pso the kings Embassadour resident with the Pope, had fignified to them, that if the king understood before the conclusion of the League, of the direction given to make a leavie of Swiffers, there would be danger leafthe would defer longer to conclude, for that it seemed to him eucrie way that the warre against the Emperour had bene begunne without him by the Pope and Venetians . Thus for the long tailing of the Swiffers, was foreslowed one of the most principall and most mightie foundations laid for the rescue of the castle of Millan, notwithstading both the Bishop & Captaine Mus gaue dayly most certaine & present hope s that they would be speedily at the campe. But when the Captaines Imperiall faw that the war was prepared openly, and that their former doubts & fecret coniectures were now resolued and turned to manifest assurance, they determined, least at one time they were trauelled with enemies both within & without, to stand assured of the people of Mullan, who rifing euerie day more insolent, did not only deny to answer all those prouisions that were demanded upon them, but also accompanying their disobedience with fiercenesse & bloud, they failed not to make flaughter of the fouldiers in the city, when they found any fingle or separate from his fellowes: so that the Captaines Imperial taking occasion of the disorders that were done in the towne, required that certaine heads & chieftaines of the populars shold depart the citie of Milla: which demand could not so casily be disgested, but that the commons beginning to draw into tumult, there was a new flaughter made of certaine Spannards going alone in the streets: & to meete with that mischies before it proceeded to greater degrees, A.de Lena & the Marquis of Guast after they had fecretly drawne neare to Millan their forces, & denounced to the people that they were now no more boud to the accord made certaine dayes before, they gaue the alarme to the tumult, by killing in their presence foure of the comons, who wold do no reuerence to them in passing by the: & then issuing out of their lodgings with a troupe of Launceknights, they gaue occasio to the « comons to found their alarme: But as in all popular comotions there are many errors, & the people for the most part more rude & obstinate, the skilful to order a fight, run in their ignorance to se their owne destruction with cries & showtes: so notwithstading in their first sury they had forced the old Court & the groffe tower of the Bishoprike, garded by manie Italians, yet partly by their owne disorders, and partly by the importunity of certaine shot bestowed in places of aduantage, which the Spaniards had furnished before, many ofthem fighting in their wilfull humor of libertie, found wretchedly at one instat the prination of their life & liberty together: insomuch as their disorders & seare increasing by equal degrees, & their latest perils hastning with a desperate swiftnesse, for that the Launceknights were youn point to put fire into the next houses, besides the calling into the citie the regiments of Spaniards, attending the token or figne to be given by the Captains. The comons in their last feares offered to parley with the Imperials, wherin they agreed that their leaders & many other persons of suspect shold go out of Milla, & that the popular multitude should depose armes and submit themselues to the obedience of the Captaines Imperiall: who

for their parts receiving the conditions, made haste to reappease and cease the tumult before the regiments of Spanish footmen entred within the towne, fearing least both parts being in armes, it would be hard for them to gouerne or bridle the furie of warre, or to restraine the fouldiers in that readinesse, from sacking the towne; a matter which they doubted, & yet were loth it should happen, aswell for feare least the armie being made rich with so great a bootie, would grow into corruption and great diminution, as also considering what want of money and other difficulties they might fuffer in the warre, they judged it a pollicy more profitable to preferue the citie, in which they might long nourish the armie, then in one day, and in one furie to consume the force & linely spirit which it had. Thus it seemed that the affaires of the league proceeded not with that prosperity, which men in their imaginations had promised in the beginning, borh for that there were manie difficulties in the descending of the Swiffers, and also the foundation of the people of Alillan was shaken and quailed: But as there is no estate or codition of worldly things, which is not full of vicertainties and casualties, so by a new accident that hapned, both their reputation was eftioones restored, and the facility of victory made both more great, and more apparant then before. In so great a discontentment, or rather a last despaire of the Duchie of Millan, there was entertained for certaine moneths by the working of many persons, sundrie intelligences and pradiscs of innovation, almost with all the townes of the Duchie: amongst the which, one succeeded to good effect in the Citie of Loda, being managed by the Duke of Vrbin and Treasurer of Venice, with Lodowike Vistarin, a Gentleman of the same City: who, what with the impression that he had bene an ancient feruant to the house of the Sforces, & with the inducement of compassion ouer the calamities of his countrey, being no lefferudely dealt withall by Fabricio Maramo Colonell of xv. hundred footmen Neapolitans, then Millan was by the Spaniards & Launceknights, determined to helpe into the towne the Venetian regiments, not with Handing he was in the pay of the Imperials: but he affured, & the Duke confirmed it, that he had before both demaunded and obtained his leaue to go away, taking his excuse vpon this reason, that he was no longerable to entertaine without money the bands of fouldiers which were committed to his charge. This was the order & direction of the enterprise: that vpon the xxiiij, day of lune by night, Malutesta Bail-In with three or foure thousand footmen of the Venetians, should about the vanishing of the day, Loda surprised approch the wals of the citie on that fide where was a certaine bastillion, to the end to be received by the Venetiin by Viftarin, who a litle before, with two others that accompanied him, being come neare the ans bastillion, which fixe fouldiers garded, as it were to fearch, & being followed with some others of his faction, who he had hidden within certaine houses thereby, he leaped vpon the bastillion, and began to fight with the fouldiers that garded it: for albeit he had pronounced before the watchword, according to the cultome of warre, yet the fouldiers being doubtfull of treason, were come to handstrokes with him, when others running by the brute of the alarmethat was made, the ba-Million was in great danger to be recoursed by the furie of the fray, wherein Lodowike was hurt ; but as he was almost reduced to the last necessity, Malatesta arrived with his bands, and scaling the bastillion by the help of their ladders, they entred the towne, which they had so long defired: by which entry both by force and intelligence, the alarme running through the towne, Fabricio Maramo prepared himlelfe to go to the wals with a great part of his fouldiers, but comming too late to the relicue of that which was already loft, he was constrained for his safety to retire into the caltle. Thus the towne was surprised, & the most part of the souldiers that were lodged in sundry places of the city were stripped & made prisoners. A little after the Duke of Vrbin arrived with one part of his regiments, who to make his approaches the better, was marched the day before to lodge at Oragno, vpon the river of Oglio, which he passed the same night by the sauor of a bridge made in hafte, & understanding of the entry of Malatesta within Loda, he passed also upon a like bridge the river of Adda: & after he had bellowed a greater garrison within Loda, for the better defence, in case succors shold be ministred by the meane of the castle, he returned immediatly to the armie. But affoone as the knowledge of this accidet was come to Millan, the Marquis of Guest with certaine troupes of light horfmen, & a strength of 3000 Spanish footmen, amongst whom was John of Vrbin, made with great celerity to Loda, & having without impediment beltowed his bands of footmen within the castle, by the benefit of whose situation he might enter with safety by a way naturally couered & defended, without danger to be annoyed with shot coming from the flanks of the city: he made a fodame irruption into the citie by the Callle, and got to the market place, where the forces that Malate sta brought with him, & the succors that came afterwards, had made their strength or place of defence, & put diverse houses under gard, together with the street that led to the gate by the which they were entred, to the end they might be able to retire & iffue with fafety, if it had hapned that the Imperials became mailters. The fight was valiantly performed for the beginning, which valour if it had continued in the Spaniards, the judgemet ran that they had recovered Loda, for that the Venetian fouldiers declined no lesse to cowardise the to weatinesses but as in furprifes, when the enterprife cometh to an execution, diffruft is for the most part greater then confidence, & feare far about resolution and assurance: so the Marquis of Guast, either for that he found a greater number of fouldiers then he had effeemed in the beginning, or for that he had a conceit that the Venetian armie was at hand, retired presently from the fight, & returned to Millanafter he had furnished the Castle with a garrison. Immediatly after this skirmish the Duke of Vrbin came againe to Loda, making no litle glorie, that without flaying he had passed his armie ouer two great rivers by the benefite of bridges and the better to affure the victorie, he refupplied the regiments that were within Loda, to the end to make the better refishance, in case the enemies would returne to recourt the thing from the which they had bene repulfed the caused artilleries to be planted round about the cattle, the better to affure the fiege, and cut off the refeues that might be fent. Neuertheleffe the defendants both for their small expectation of succours, the means of their reliefe being cut off, and leffe ability to defend the caffle, which for his small circuit was not capable of many men, left the caffle abandoned the night following, being received by certaine horimen fent fro Millan for that purpose. This conquest of Loda hapned very conuemently, & gaue great reputation to the affaires of the league, both for that the Citie was well fortified, & bare a name to be one of those which it was thought the Imperials would defend to the laft, From Loda the victors might march without impediment, eucn to the gates of Millan & Pama, for that those cities bearing a situation in triangle, are twenty miles one fro another, for which cause the Imperials dispatched with great expedition 1 500 Launceknights to Pauia. Moreouer the League had won the passage of Adda, which before was supposed to be very troublesome:all impediments were removed that might hinderall the armies of the league to joynetogether : all means take away to succor Cremona, in which citie lay in garrison Captaine Conradur with 1500 Launceknights,& the enemies deprived of place apt to travell & vexethe flate of the Church & the Venetrans. Infomuch as the conion opinion of the whole army was, that if they advanced with fpeed according to their fortune, the Imperials could not but be reduced into great perplexity & confusion:but the Duke of Vrbin was of another judgemet, holding it an enterptife of great perill to draw neare to Millan without a great strength of Smillers : and yet for that he would not discouer to others that which he retained in his secret opinio, he was conteted to seeme to do the thing he intended not, & in that refolution marching flowly, & repofing alwayes one day at the leaft in every lodging, he determined nevertheleffe to give time to the defeending of the Swiffers, hoping that within few dayes they would be with the armie : yea he had fo great expectation of their comming (notwithflanding by the experience of their long tract and deterring there was great doubt) and reposed such a surrance in their valour, that valesse they came, he contemned all motions and inducements to action and enterprise, what reason or property of likelyhood focuer they bare. After the conquest of Loda, the Church armic marching to S. Martin, within three miles of Loda, it was resolved there by common counsell, that after the two Armies, that is to fay, the Ecclefiastickes and the Venetians, had solourned there one day, they should draw the next day towards old Loda, about five miles from Loda, where it is written that Pompey builded Loda, and so taking the high way that leadeth to Paula, they pretended under that marching to threaten Millan & Paula; a deuise to hold the Imperials in greater scare & suspence. The same day the armies Ecclefiastike & Venetia ioyned together in the field as they marched, being almost equallin numbers of footmen. & containing in all few leffethen xx, thousand: only the Venetians exceeded the in nubers of men at armes & light horimen, & in prouisions of artillerics, munitions with all other necessary surnitures of waite. The day following they reposed at old Loda, where the Captaines taking counfell for the disposing of their marching, determined that hereafter the armies should keep along the high way, the better to auoid the incommodities of the countrey, which out of the high way is ful of ditches & rifings, & other impedimets to marching: one reason also of following that way, was the facilitie to give succours to the cassle by the oportunity of the way that leadeth towards the gate of Goma, rather then by the way of Landriano which turneth to the gate of Verceill, by the which was greater difficulty to leade the army in regard of the quality & disposition of the countrey: and lastly, by the benefit of that way, there was a more safe recourse & traffike for victuals to follow the armies, & more easy for the discending & receiving the Smiffers who were alwayes to second the & backe the: with this resolution the army being gathered into one main threath, arrived the last day of Iune at Marignan: where being drawn into coufell touching the further directio & disposing of the war, the Duke of Vrbin perswaded vehemetly to abide the coming of the Swiffers, of whose deteending he had haply some more assured information the before: he condered that without such a stregth & firme back, it could not but be dagerous to draw neare Millim with regiments of fouldiers votrained & leuied in half, notwith thanding there was within the towne of enemies but a very flender strength of hotimen, 3000 Lauceknights, & but 5 or 6 thousand Spaniards footmen, to whose small nubers of bodies were adjoyned many discommodities and wants, as lacke of money which maketh the fouldiers vnwilling, and very litle provision of victuals which weakeneth himfor the fight, with other impediments much hindring the action expected in fouldiers. But the other Captaines were not of his opinion, for that they judged that marching in order, and alwayes vfing good fcours to discouer their camping places for the day before, there could be no danger to approch Millan, the rather for that the parts of the countrey were enery way to ftrong & defentible, that without difficulties the army might alwayes incampe in places of furety. They reasoned that it was not likely, that the Imperials would issue out into the field to inuade the, for that leaving necessarily the castell besieged, & by that occasion, being not to leade their whole forces out of the towne for suspition of the comons of Millan, their nübers wold be too few to fet vpo fo great an army, which albeit was dreffed & copouded of bodies new and raw, yet was gouerned by the best experienced Captaines in Italy, having withall dispersed in severall bands of the army, many troupes of sootemen well disciplined and of good traineur in war. Befides, albeit they could not make their approches to Millan without dager, yer to draw neare it, was not without hope to cary the victory, for that the suburbs of Milla being not fortified, but by negligence lest open in many parts, it seemed not credible that the Imperials would fland to defend so great a circuit of place. Of this were discerned many manifelt tokes, for that the Imperials ving finall care to reenforce the fuburbs, had turned all their industry to the fortificació of the towne: Infomuch that if they once abandoned the suburbs & gaue place to the army to lodge there, it could not be reasonable that the towne could long hold out: not fo much for the want of victualls & mony which afflicted their whole army, as for that Profper Colonno with the other Captaines of knowledge and judgement, had bin alwaies of this opinio, that with great difficulty could the towne of Millan be kept against an army that was Lord of the fuburbs, both for that the city is very weake in wals (the houses of certaine particulars serving for want of wall in many places) as for that the suburbs have a great advantage & comandement over the City. To these reasons lastly was added, that they had the castel at denotion but not only the eflate of this direction or deliberatio, but also the absolute resolution of the whole body of the war depended chiefly vpo the Duke of Vrbin: for that albeit he was but only Captaine ouer the Venetians, yet the Ecclesiastikes to auoyd contentions, had determined to referre the selection ouer to him as to the Captaine generall of the army. Neuerthelesse though these reasons had no power to stir him to advance and passe further, nor the vehement instances, which (by order from their superiors) the Popes Lieutenant & the treasurer of Venice viged, with whom did concurre many other Captaines, yet in the end, he confidered that if he made any long abode in that place without a berter certainety of the comming of the Smiffers, it would not be but to his great infamy & challenge: rherefore after the army had refted two daies at Marignan, he removed it the third of lune to S. Donato within fine miles of Millan, fro whence he determined to passe further, though more to fatisfic the defire & judgement of others, then of his proper inclination or counfels: & he referued to himselfe this order & intention to put alwayes one day betweene the removing of the campe, to the end to give time to the comming of the Swiffers, of whom a thousand discending by Bergama, were arrived at the armie, and for the others (according to their custome) they fent every day messengers to entertaine the expectation of their comming, and to signific that their absence should not be long.

In this fort the fift of July, the army passing from S. Martin which is out of the high way on the right hand, marched on to incar pe within iij. miles of Millan, in a place of good firergth & furety: where the same day was executed some light action of warre against certaine harquebuziers of the Spaniards who were fortified within a house, & the day tollowing, the can pe being at the fame place, executed some other small exploit of war, & immediatly after arrived at the campe five hundre d Swiffers led by Cafar Gaulois: here the Captaines fell againe to counfell of the maner of paffing further, & albeit the fulf intentio was to march directly to fuccor the caffel of Milla, whose trenches that were cut round about without, were not fo firong but that there was great hope to win them: yet, by the authority of the Duke of Vrbin whose aduice was at last approued of all the others, not altogether for the sufficiency & soundnesse, but partly for the priviledge & prerogatiue of his place, which caried him to expresse his opinion in countel, & either net to attend the anfwers of others, or at least in their answers the Captaines dutst not impugne his reasons. The armies tooke the way that leadeth directly to the fuburbs of Millan, and he alleaged, that for the making plaine of the wayes, which of necessity must be done by reason of the naturall impediments of the countrey, it would be a labor long & not without danger of fome diforder, to leade the army out of the high way to the rescue of the castell, both for that they were to shew themselves too neare in flanke to the enemies, & alfo it wasto give the enemy meane to make a greater telistance, because they wold range all their forces on that side towards the castel:where otherwise they shold be constrained to remaine denided for the better refissance of the enemies: & not to abandon the gard of the Castell, & drawing to the gate of Rome, it would be alwayes in the power of the Captaines of the league, to turne cafily on what fide they wold according as occasios called the According to this counfell it was refolued, that the feuenth day the campe shold lodge at Vnfaletto & Pillast rello, which are crookings or turnings alog the high way within shot of canno, & there to take that course which occasio & proceeding of the enemies shold minister. Many were of opinio that the enemies whe they shold see the campe so nearethe, would not (specially in the night)embrace the hazard to defend the suburbs, both for that the ditches were filled up in many places, & the ramparts cast downe & made plaine, & in some places so open & discouered, that very hardly could they preserve their bodies which they brought to defend the place. But the night before the day wherein the army was to aduance, the Duke of Burbon, being arrived a few dayes before at Genes with fix gallies, and bringing bils of exchange for an hundred thousand duckats, entred into Millan accompanied with 800 Spanish footners, whom he had brought with him: his comming in fuch a time of perill. & after fo long expectatio for fuccor, gaue a new corage to the foldiers that fo desperatly lay exposed to the danger of their lines. By his coming, being vehemently solicited by the Marquis of Guaft & Anth. de Lena, may be casily coprehended the affected negligence or rather cold disposition which the French king had to the war: for, where the Pope in the beginning whe he entertayned into his pay Andrea Dore, had cofulted with him, with what forces & preparations the enterprise of Genes should be executed, he told him it wold be an action very easie so far forth as it were put to execution at the time that the war should be begun in the Duchy of Miklan, & that to his eight gallies should be joyned the kings gallies tiding in the port of Marfeilles, or at least that they might be employed to stop the comming of the gallies of the Duke of Burbon: wherein his reason was, that remaining in that fort Lord of the sea with his eight gallies, the City of Gener, having the sea shut vp, could not maintaine it selfe log, both for the restraint of marchadize, for the impedimet of exercises, & for the cutting offaccesse of victuals. And not with slanding the French king protested to stop the coming of the Duke of Burbon, yet it was a promise vaine & ill affured, hoth for that his veffels were not in order, which hindred the expedition, and also the Captaines of his gallies, partly for want of mony, & partly through negligence, and haply of purpose, were very slowly furnished to accomplish the service. The same fault or negligence was also vsed in advancing the men at armes appointed to his portion.

But the arrival of the Duke of Barbon being volknowne to the army of the league that was without, the refolution that had bin fet downe to advance forward, was peruerted by the Duke of Vrbin, & that either by some advertisements which he had received from Millan, or by the report of some spy; for, leaving the distrust which he had retayned til that day, he assured the Popes Lieutenation the presence of the Venetian treasurer, that he made an assured reckening that the day following would be a day of prosperity & happy successe: seeing saith he, if the enemies is uncase they single out to fight (which he could not believe they could not but be overthrowne & broken: & in case they did not iffue out, he was certaine that either they would abandon Millan the same day & retire into Pania, or at least abandoning the defence of the suburbs, they would gather themselves into the City, which they had no meane to defend after the suburbs were lost: infomuch as he warranted that any of these three accidents was sufficient to make them remaine victors & maisters of the war. Therefore ioyning diligence to the oportunity that offered, the day following being the feuenth of July, they left the lodging appointed for the day before, hoping to win the suburbs without refillance: wherein rifing in a glorie to lurprise them by assault in marching, certaine troupes of fouldiers ran in their infolency, to give a charge upon the gates of Rome & Tofa: where, notwithstanding the aduertisements they had the day before & redoubled the same day, that the Spamards would breake vp & go away, yer they found vame those relations, for that the Spaniards as, fronted them & made head orderly against their disordered charge, not that they meant to make a cotinual relistance, but like men of war thewing their faces to the enemies, to retire in order to Mullan, rather then to leave to the enemy that advantage to fay that they found the suburbs cowardly abandoned. Moreouer by making that refistance, they did not only preserue the reputatio of their army, retayning still in their power to make their retrait alwayes into the city without diforder, but also in the action might happen some occasion to take hart & perseuere in the desence of the suburbs; a matter of right importance: for that, to make their retire into the towne, was an election to be followed rather by necessity then of will, seeing that besides many other reasons if they should restraine the selues into a circuit of place so strait & litle, it would be so much the more easie to the armies of the league to stop the entry of victuals into Milla, without which kind ofreliefe they could not long hold out, for that the prouifios of new corne were not yet come in. Thus certaine bands of harquebuziers being presented to the desence of the two gates, where also the other Spaniar de ceassed not to labor & fortify cotinually, the Duke whose opinion was beguiled in that refistance, caused three cannons of battery to be drawne within a crosbow shot of Rome gate, and having planted them brauely, he began to execute upon the gate; in which battery he labored to leanie or dismount a Falconet, and so made descend certaine bands of souldiers to give the asfault, and gave direction to bring on the scaling ladders: but altering immediatly his purpose to give the affault, the matter was turned into light skirmishes of shot betweene those that were without and the defendantes that were vpon the ramparts, who fighting at great advantage, flue about fortie of the confederates, and hurt many. In this meane while the gate had felt many blowes of the cannon, though with very small domage, for that the cannons being planted farre off, the bullet loft much of his force by the farre diffance of the place, infomuch as no benefite rifing by the executions of the cannons, and no advantage gotten by the skirmish of the shot, the Duke confidering it would be very late to lodge the campe, would not fuffer the affault to be performed, but gaue order to beltow and forriethe campe in that place, which was not done without confusion, for the shortnesse of the time. There was left a reasonable gard for the three Cannons, and the refidue of the campe were bestowed almost full youn the right hand of the way, cuerie one having great hope of the victory, both for that by many aduertifements and by the relation of prisoners taken, they had certaine information that the Imperials truffed baggage, and prepared rather to depart, then to defend the place. To this hope was iouned also this good hap, that in good time the fame evening, there came to the campe fixe cannons of the Venetians, a reliefe much helping on the comfort and hope of the victory; But as in worldly things there is no affurance till the end be knowne, and all mortall menand their actions are put vnder an estate of incertainty and errour, according to their constitution, be full of frailty and im-" perfection: fo, not long after, that hope and the glorious imagination of the victory, did not onely " chaunge, but also the whole estate of the affaires varied and altered; for that certaine bands of " Spanish footemen issuing out almost vponthe beginning of the night to set vponthe artillerie, were repulsed and beaten in by the footemen that had the gard of the same notwithstanding the Duke of Orbin fayd that they were driven in in diforder : infomuch as after two or three houres of the night were past, he determined without counsell to dislodge and retire the army taking his reason for so sudden alteration upon the matter of his hope which he saw abused, for that he found refiltance at the gates, and defendants upon the ramparts of the fuburbs: and also the feare he had conceived before of the infantery of the enemies, was in this rafhnesse of some confideration with him . And proceeding in his fudden passion to execute the matter he had resolved without counsell or consent of others, he gaue order to the artilleries & munitions to march away, & commanded the regiments of the Venetians, to prepare to depart. Lastly he sent to the treasurer and Lieutenant, & other Captaines of the Church, to fignifie more in speede then with reason, the refolution he had fet downe, perfwading the to do the like without tract or deferring; a matter of fuch aftonishment & confusion to either of them, both for the suddennesse being against all order & course of war, and for the newnesse seeming to containe some mistery, sor that it was cotrary to the expectation of all men, they went to him to vnderstand more particularly his inductions and reasons of this alteration, & to labor with words and arguments to bring him backe againe to his former resolution: but he infifted still ypon the remouing of the campe, wherein with speeches cleare & resolute, he coplained manifestly that cotrary to his adulse & onely to satisfie the humors of others, he was copelled to approch so neare Millan: which since it was an offence, he told the it belonged to wildom & good counfell rather to correct the fault in time, then by fuffering, to let it run out of all cure & remedy he knew that both for that the army the day before for the shortneffe of the time, had bin lodged confusedly, & for the cowardise of the Italian sootme in the same cuening that the artilleries were affailed, if the campe lay there till the day following, it would not only be the destruction of the enterprise, but the ruine of all the state of the league : for, he stood so assured that they would be defeated and broken, that he held it not reasonable to stand to dispute with any man, seeing that the Imperials the same euening had planted a Sacre betweene Rome gate and the gate of Folo, which executed in flanke vpon that quarter, where lay the Venenetian footemen: That the fame night they would go on in that oportunity to plant other peeces of artilleries, and the day following would found the alarme, for which cause the army being costrained to fall into order, should be so annoyed in the stanke by the artilleries, that they would be driven into diforder, and so you the fally of the Imperials out of the towns, the whole campe full of passions of feare and disorder would be easily ouerthrowne: That he was sory that both by the shortnesse of the time, & the impediments of the munitions and artilleries which were farre greater in his army then in the army Ecclesiastike, he was compelled to leavy and breake vp afore he had communicated with them: but he told them that in elections done by necessity, it was a labor fuperfluous to alleage excuses: That he had adventured a greater matter, then ever had done any Captaine, offering as it were in marching to give an affault to Millan, and that now he would take vp and vse discretion, and dispaire nothing of the victory of the enterprise for the retraite. That Profer Colonno, haply with lefte iuft causes, leuied his fiege from before Parma when it was halfe taken, and yet nor long after he gloriously conquered the whole Duchie of Millan: he aduised them for end to believe his counsell and follow it, and not in other weenings to deferre their departings, fince he eftfoones affured them with a new vehemency of words, that if they stayed there till the rising of the Sunne, their destruction was more certaine then the remedie, and therefore to the end to fly from the storme before the cloude brake, he willed themalwayes with one constancy to returne to their lodgings at Samt Martin. These speeches borne vp more by the authority of the man the by any reason they brought, were not a litle grieuous to the residue of the Captaines that haply bare another courage to the war, and reasonably saw further into the facility of the victory, and therefore were of a contrary opinion: amongst whom the Popes Lieutenant affaying by words and reasons to make him constant whom seare caried into fo many variations, made him aunswere, that albeit there was none amongst them who thought not that his resolutions were made with great forecast and wisedome, yet the Captaines in their experience and traditions of warre, faw no manifest cause to constraine him to breake up so suddenly: he reduced to his memorie the dispayre of the Duke of Millan, beholding in his calamity the going away of fuch as he hoped would have fuccoured him, and dispayring to be referred, what could flay him from doing the thing from the which the hope to be succored by them, had holden him: how much it would discourage the Pope and Venetians, and what impressions are wont to stirre and moue in the mindes of Princes when enterprises begin to succeedeill, especially in their beginnings. Lastly that if the place of their campe, and the ill disposing of it, was the cause of so great a daunger as he pretended, it was easie without depriuing the armie of so great a reputation, to remedie it both in bestowing it in some other place with better order, and also in remouing it with such aduantage, that the sackers planted by the enemies should have no meane to annoy them. But the Duke confirmed of new his first conclusion, and added with vehement vehement termes that according to the reason of warre, they could not take any other deliberation: and lastly he knit up that he would take upon himselfe all the fault, & to lay himselfe downe to all opinions and imputations that the world would heape against him for being the Author of the action. And so aduising them not to consume vainely, in words and reasons, the time which they should employ for their safety, he told them that if they were not dislodged before the end of the night, it wold be too late to apply the medicine when the ill was past cure. With this conclusio he difmiffed euery one, who returning to their feuerall quarters, euery one prepared to diflodge and make to depart their charge & companies:amongst whom such bands as lay before, brake vp with such astonishment, that many going almost with demonstrations to be broken and defeated, many bands of footmen and hotlemen of the Venetians disbanded themselves, some of them not looking behind them till they came to Loda: & the artilleries of the Venetians passed beyond Marignan, but being reuoked, they were stayed there: the residue of the bands, but principally the arearegard marched away in order: and John de Medicis, who with the footinen of the Church was in the last part of the army, would not stirre till it was high day, esteeming it not agreeable to his honour, in place of the victorie so much hoped for, to cary away infamie and imputation of flying away by night; a matter which his experience induced him that he had no neede to do. because he saw none of the Imperials issue out of their ramparts to charge upon the tayle of the armie: onely when they within the towne faw by the benefite of the Sunne and cleareneffe of the day, how the campe was diflodged in maner of a tumult, they flood wondering at the going away of those, whom if they had taried they could not but have flood in feare of: and yet in the interpretation of fouldiers and mattiall doings, they could not imagine the cause of so sudden alteration. The infamie of this retraite was also augmented by this, that notwithstanding the Duke had given order that the campe should stay at Saint Marem, yet he sent out a new direction without communicating it, that the campe-mailters of the Venetians should leade their men to Marignan, wherein he feared that either the enemies would iffue out to affayle him in his lodging at Saint Martin, or at least that the Castell of Millan, seeing to retire the forces that were come, to rescue it (a matter more then all other that terrifieth those that are besieged) would fue for composition, and resigne by that vile compussion the hold they had kept so long with their valour. In which case because he durst not abide at S. Martin, he iudged it lesse dishonorable to retire once for all, then to make two retraites in so litle time. And in that humour, he caused the artilleries, the baggage, and the foremost regiment of the Venetian army to hold on to Marignan without staying at S. Martin: of which alteration when the Popes Lieutenant demaunded the cause, the Duke aunswered that touching their suretie he put no difference betweene the one and the other place, effecting S. Martin astenable and defensable against the enemies as Marignan, but the cause why he marched further, was, for that the bands of souldiers being made weary with the actions of the dayes before, might with good commodity repose and refresh themselves without receiving any impediments or vexations of the enemies. And as the Lieutenant replied touching the equal furety of the one and other place, that if the campe retired as farre as Marignan, the hope of fuccors would be more desperate to those that were besieged in the Castell of Millan, then if the armies stayed at S. Martin: so the Duke returned your him with words vehement, that so long as he caried in his hands the staffe of commaundement ouer the Venetians, he would not fuffer any other to entermedle with his authority. In which obstinacy both the one and other army with the great dishonor and clamor of all the fouldiers, went to incampe at Marignan, exclayming contrary to the faying of Cafar, veni, vide, fugi, we are come, we have seene, & we are run away. The Duke determined to remayne at Marignan, until not only the campe were possessed of the number of flue thousand Swiffers, whereunto were restrayned the promises of Captaine Alus and the Bishop of Loda, who at the same time that the campe brake up came thirter with fine hundred, but also till he were furnished of so many other of that nation as would make up the full number of twelve thousand strong of those regions: and that for an opinion he had, that because there could be made no more foundation of the Cattell of Millan, it would be impossible to force the towne, or to reduce it to a necessitie to yeeld for want of victuals and other reliefes necessarie, without the action of two armies, and either of them so mightie, that of it selfe it might suffice to defend it selfe against all the forces of the enemies vnited together.

The army of Millan.

Katherine de Medicis.

Thus the eight day of Iulie, did retire from the wals of Millan, the two armics of the league, a the league broke matter of no small aftonishment to many men, and no lesse concurring the inselicity of the predippfrom before Etion, for that the fame day, with the common confent of the whole confederates, the league was published at Rome, at Venuce, and in Fraunce with ceremonies and solemnities accustomed . In the judgement of all men of obternation or skill, it feemed to hold so little of necessity to take a course so infamous, that many doubted least the Duke of Vrbin were not caried into that deliberation by some secret order and direction from the Senate of Venice, who for some end vnknowne to others might defire to haue the warre protracted. And others were of opinion that the Duke, by the memory of iniuries received of Leo, together with the wrongs which the Pope raigning had done to him when he was Cardinall, and fearing withall leaft the greatnesse of the Pope would put his estate in danger, could not brooke so sudden a victory of the warre, being indifferently caried both with the passion of hatred which is much, and the humor of lealousie, which is more. Wherein one thing that gaue him so iust a cause to doubt and seare the Pope, was that the Florentins held Saint Leo with al the countrey of Montfeltro, and that the only daughter of Lawrence de Medicis being as yet very yong, retayned alwaies the name of Duchesse of Vrbin. Neuertheleffe the Popes Lieutenant was aduertifed by very special messengers that the Venetians were not a litle discontented with that maner of retiring, & that they had alwaies solicited that the army might approch to Millan in hope that the towne might be eafily caried. And withall, seeing it was not likely that the Duke, if he had hoped to take Millan, would have deprived himselfe of a glory, by so much more great about the merit of any other Generall in times past, by how much was greater the reputation and renowne of the Imperiall army aboue all others which had bin in Italy many yeares before, of which glory followed almost by necessity the surety of his estate, seeing the Pope, either to auoyd fo great an infamy, or not to offend fo much the Venetians, would not dare to inuade him: and confidering also with diligence the action of all those dayes there, the Lieutenant judged it more likely (wherein many others were concurrant with him in that opinió) that the Duke sallen from the hope which two dayes before had nourished him, that the Imperials at least wold abandon the suburbs, was returned in that vehemency to his first opinion, wherein he shewed himselfe to have a greater feare of the Spaniards & distrust of the Italian footemen, then any of the other Captaines had: and by that meane entring into impressions of deeper feare, he embraced rashly and confusedly that deliberation.

The Popein

This retrait assonished not a little the Pope and Venetians, and made them so much the more algreat aftonifi- tered and confused, by how much they were entred into hope and expectation to heate newes enery day of the taking of Millan: but principally the perplexity of this accident touched the Pope, who neither with money which was farre from him, nor with conflancy of mind which was suppressed by hisfrailty, was not prepared to endure the traite and longnesse of the warre. Besides that aswell at Rome, as in other quarters of his estate, many emotions and difficulties were disclofed: for, a regiment of three hundred footemen and certaine cornets of horfement lying in garrifon within Carpy, began to make incursions and very hurtfull actions upon all the confinesthat appertained to the Church, objecting by that meane many impediments to the passage of curriers and money fent to the atmy from Rome and Florence: an advertity which could not be met withall but by bestowing strong gartisons within the townes: And the Pope, who was entred into the warre with very litle flore of money, and deepely imbarked into great expences, could hardly, both with the money of his owne flore, and with the contributions brought to him continually from Florence to furnish the charges of the warre, make sufficient provisions to stoppe them, being withall troubled with a new enterprise in Tuscane, and constrayned to stand upon his gardabout Rome: for, after Don Hugo and the Duke of Seffo had taken leave of the Pope & had deposed themselues from the action of their embassage, Askanius & Vespasian Colonno being then recuced within the small boroughs of the Colonnois, which are neare to Rome, made many demonstrations to flirre up fome emotion on that fide, many of their factioners and adherents being drawne to a strength within Alagno. And the Pope was driven to keepe a diligent eye vpon their doings and stirres, as well for the regard of the Gebelin faction in me, as for that not many dayes before, were discouered against him many fignes of the ill disposition of the Commons: the reason was, for that when he tooke into his pay Andrew Dore, and for the better furnishing of that charge, had rayled and improved certaine impostes under colour to assure the seas of Rome against the soystes of the Moores by whom the traffike and wealth of the City was greatly hindred, the butchers refused to pay their part of the taxation, assembling in manner of a tumult afore the lodging of the Duke of Seffo not as yet departed from Rome, and by their example all the Spaniards that were within the towne, ran thither in armes: neuertheleffe this tumult was eafily appeafed. About this time, the Pope stood in doubt if he should enforce the enterprise to alter the state of Stenna, for that the counfels of such as were about him differed and were of diverse humors : for, some reposing confidence no lesse in the great number of the exiles, then in the confusion of the great government popular, perswaded by many reasons that the innovation and change of the state would be an action of great facility, wherein they led him on in this property of well liking, that in that time it would be a matter of great importance to affure himselfe of that state : for that in all accidents that might happen, the entry which the enemies might make that way, might be very daungerous for the affaires of Rome and Florence: but others induced him, that it were farre better for him to addresse all his forces into one place onely, then to intangle himselfe with so many enterprises with a very little or none at all alteration or diversion of principall effects: for that in the ende fuch as remayned maifters in Lumbardy, would become Commanders in every place. Lastly they told him he was not to lay such a foundation of confidence you the forces and trayne of the exiles, whose hopes in the end would be found vayne, as to fet upon the mutation of that flate without making of mighty and flrong prouifions, fuch as wasvery hard for him to accomplish, as well for the greatnesse of the expences which in enterprises draweth the deepest care, as for the want of principal Captaines, whom he had already sent to the warre of Lumbardy. It may be these last perswasions had peruailed more with him, if those that gouerned within Siema had proceeded with that moderation which in affaires of small imporrance the inferiors ought to vie towards their juperiors, having more regard to necessity then to a just discontentment: for, thus it hapned: There was one John Baptista Palmier Captaine within Siema of an hundred footmen for the City, who having of long time, before given hope to the Pope, that in fending his bands of fouldiers to the towne, he would put them within by a fluce or gutter that passed vinderneath the wall neare to a bastillion; and by his direction the Pope having sent to him two footmen men of assurance and credit, to one of the which some Baptista gauchis Enfigne to beare, the Magistrates of the city with whose privitie he entertayned this practise and abused the Pope, caused these two foothers to be apprehended, against whom after they had proceeded by way of accusation, and indicially condenined them with publication of the conspiracy, they passed them to the execution of manifest death, to the end to slaunder the Pope as much as they could. Moreover they fent certaine bands of their fouldiers to befrege lohn Martinozze one of the exiles dwelling in the countrey about Sienna: all which things done as it were in despite of the Pope, incensed him with the fury of a mind injuried, to aduenture to restore all the exiles within Sienna with his owne forces and the Arength of the Florentins. But as the generall prouisions were more weake then appertayned to the action of such an enterprise, & especially the numbers of footmen: fo also the valor and authority of the Captaines recompensed nothing the weakenesse of the army, ouer the which he instituted as chiese commanders Virginio Vrsin Count of Languillaro, Lodowik Count of Petillane & John Fran his fon, Gentill Baillon & John Saffatello: who making their muster at Centina and drawing along the river of Arbira, so much renowmed for the worthy victory of the Gebelins against the Guelfes of Florence, approched the wals of Sienna about the xvij. of July with nine peeces of artilleries, twelue hundred horse, and more then eight thousand footmen, almost all levied in the state of the Church & Florentins, or at least all sent without mony to the exiles by their frieds, from Peroufa & other places. And at the same time Andrea Dore with his gallies & a thousand footme sent to him in supply, made inuasion you the hauen of the Siennois. But in this, their hope was deceived, that when the forces approched neare the wals of Sienna, they within made no figne of tumult, by which disappointment they were constrained to fettle in campe & befiege the towne, in which was a strength of fixe hundred horsmen and three hundred formen forreyners. And as the enemies made their approches to the gate of Camollia, & began on that fide to batter the wall with their artilleries: 10, the city being strong by situation, and well fortified with ramparts, and for the circuit fo great, that the army enuironed but the leffe part of it, they found the inhabitants disposed with firme resolution to defend the gouetnement that then ran, wherein their hatred against the Pope and Florentins caried them more vehemently, then the affection they bare to the exiles: and of the contrary in the army that befieged them, the fouldiers having no pay made to them, were little profitable to the feruice, & the Captaines having no reputation in armes, were also in civil division amongst themselves, together with the exiles, who varied not only vpon the prouisions & dayly counsels, but also contended for the forme of the future government, leeking to impart and devide being without the thing which could not be established but by such as were within: for which conditions after they had made a vaine battry vpon the wall, and had no harts to go to the affault, they began under those fignes of dissolute dealing, to have a very slender hope of the victory. In these times the difficulties of the confederates increased in Lumbardy: for not withstanding the regiments of five thousand Smiffers levied by Captaine Mus and the Bishop of Loda, were at last come to the army, yet for that the Duke of Vrbm held them not a number sufficient to execute the enterprise of Millan, there was expectation of another proportion of that nation, which they had fent to require of the Cantons in the name of the French king. They hoped the Cantons would not be hard to accord those leuies, though not for other hope, at least to deface the ignominy of the battell of Pania, and that for the fame reasons the bands of souldiers wold agreeto go to the war with a ready corage, specially in so great a hope of the victory. But as in that natio who not many yeres before for their valor & for the authority they had won, had no small oportunities to get a very large dominion or iurifdictio, there was now no more neither the same defire of glory, nor any care of the interests of the comon-weale: so, of the contrary, having their minds overcaried with incredible coneconinesse and appetites of gaine, they gave themselves over as to the chiefelt end & honor of the exercise of war, to returne to their houses loden with mony & booty. In which humors, the generall Cantons hearkning to the folicitations of war, as marchants do in bargaines & marting, either publikely feruing their turnes of the neceffity of others for their owne profit, or else having amongst them men whose minds were vendible & corrupted, they did either accord or refuse to depart with souldiers according to the working of those ends: and by their example the chiefe and speciall Captaines, being labored to be entertayned into pay, did rise so much the higher, and made their demaunds fo much the more intollerable, by how much they faw that Princes and common-weales had neede of their feruice. In regardof thefe reasons, the French king summoning the Cantons according to the articles of the contract, to ayde him with men, who by common confent were to be paid with the forty thousand duckats which the king deliuered out of his treasure, the generall Cantons after many counsels and deliberations, made him aunswere according to their custome, that they would not agree to any leuies or muster of fouldiers, valeffe the king made them first contented of all the arrerages of their pensions which he was bound to pay by yearely reuenue : which fummes being great, and hard to be fatisfied in a litle time, the kings agents were constrained to entertaine Captaines particular and yet not without leaue and authority of the Cantons, who granted such power not without great difficulty; a course which besides the long tract and consuming of time which could not be but daungerous for the present estate of affaires, did neuerthelesse not succeed neither with that essect nor that reputation, which it would have done if the confent and authority of the Lords of the Cantons had concurred. Vinder this occasion no lesse slanderous to the Duke of Vrbin, then hurtfull to the generall proceeding of the warre, the Imperials who in this meane while were dispensed with from all vexatió of the enemies lying idlely at Marignan, tutned all their diligence to fortify Millan, not the body of the city as they did in the beginning of the war, but the ramparts & baffillions of the suburbs, which they did no more distrust to be able to defend, for that by how much the reputation of the enemies was diminished, by so much was their hope recofirmed & their corage redoubled . And because they had take from all the inhabitants of Mullan their armes & weapos, & had thrust out of the towne all persons suspected, much lesse that the Captaines had now so great a searce or lealoufie as before, feeing they established their owne assurance by reducing the towne to so The inhabitats cruell a feruitude, that they stood carelesse to make payes to the soldiers: and lodging the bads by their tyranny in the houses of the inhabitants, they did not only compel the maisters & owners of houses to minister dayly food to the soldiers both plentifully & delicatly, but also to furnish them with mony for all other things which in their vanities & fancies they would defire, not forgetting to impose vpon them as much as the rigor of tyranny could deuise: which dealings were so intollerable to the Citizens, that they had no other remedy then, by stealth & secret wayes to fly from

he place where were layd up the monuments of their nativities, the effect of their delights, and the rewards of all the pleasures and solace of their life: neither durit they seeke this miserable afety openly or manifeltly, for that the eyes of those that oppressed them kept a seuere espiall ypon them. And the better to assure the fouldiers of those rates and taxations imposed upon euethe housholder but especially the Spaniards, for in the Launceknights was a great modestie and auour, the Captaines kept bound and in chaynes in their owne houses certaine principall housnoulders with their wlues and little children, not omitting to expose eucric sexe and age to their bhominable lust. By reason of this tyranny all the shops of Aullan were shut in, and every man fought to hide as fecretly as he could, his goods and Iewels of most value, making also the ame conneiance and bestowing of their riches and ornaments of Churches, which for all that were not altogether in furety: for that the fouldiers under colour to fearch for armour and weapons, tooke liberty to ranfacke all the corners of the rowne, and in that infolent authoritie, for ced he feruants to disclose the goods of their maisters, which when they found, they imparted to the owners portions not according to equitie or conscience, but such as in their licentiousnesse they hought good. The face and universall apparance of that Citie was made miserable, to behold the auncient inhabitants and glorie of the same reduced to an estate of extreame oppression; a matter worthie of great commiseration, and an incredible example of the mutation of fortune to uch as had seene it few yeares before, most populous and rich in Citizens, plentifull in Marchants and Artificers, proud in pompes, and very sumptuous in ornaments for men and women, naturally addicted to feaffings and pleasures, and not only full of rejoycing and solace, but also nost happy in all other nature of comfort and contentinent for the life of man; where now it tood lamentably deprined of inhabitants, what by the stroke of the plague that raged there, & for he continuall euafions of fuch as fled from the violation of tyrants. Milerable was the apparance of men and women being most wretched in pouerty and nakednesse: no entercourse of Marhants or trade which before was wont to enrich the Citie: and the chearfulnesse and spirits of nen were wholly converted into a state of lauguishing dolor and feare. No, no other thing remayned of the glorious apparance of that City, then the foundations of houses and Churches, and ver euen in them was discerned a lamentable spectacle, in regard of the former memory of them. Neuerthelesse as there is no forrow without his comfort, nor no mischiese without his remedy, otheir afflictions & heavineffe tooke fome confolation for the comming of the Duke of Burbon, or that the bruite went he brought some reliefe to the army: and also in their misery they made his last perswafion, that for the retrait of the campe of the confederates, their necessities and dangers would formewhat diminish: and they hoped that the Duke to whom it was sayd the Empe-. or had given the Duchy of Millan, would for his owne interests, and the better to present the . cuenues and estate of the City, take order against so licentious oppressions of the Spaniards. This. vas a naked hope without any flay or foundation, for that they knew by relation of their Embafadors whom they had fent to the Emperor, that there was no further expectation of remedy from im either for that by his farre distance he could not apply necessary provisions for their safety, or , Me (which they judged by many experiences) the copassion of the oppressions and miseries of the people was far colder in him, then his defire for the interests of his estate to minister to the army k maintaine it: to the which because payments were not made in times due neither his authority which was far off, nor the lawes of his Captaines joyned to their presence, could not contayne the ouldiers from insolencies and iniuries: neither did the Capraines, to infinuate and win the harts of he foldiers, & sharing also in the profit of so vniuerfal a spoyle, labor much to restraine this licence. of war, the rather for that under their complaints and excules of want of payes, they cloked what, o euer was done in infolency and oppression. In so much as the chiefest within Millan about the refidue, affembling in one great number, and expressing in their face', their attire, and whole, apparance, the miserable estate of their countrey including also their owne wretched condition, went with many teares and complaints to seeke the Duke of Burbon, afore whose feete that pectacle of Citizens fell prostrate, and one of them deliuered the complaints of their griefe in

Were it not that the heavy oppressions of this Citie, for their nature more bitter, and for their of Millan imime more intollerable then euer raged ouer any city or countrey within the age or memory of me, plore the comdid not hinder the due offices & humilities which in fo generall inclination of the whole countrey Date of Barbo, to haue a Prince proper and peculiar, our affections would offer & prefer, your ceming (oh gracious Duke) had bene embraced with ceremonies and apparances agreeable to the gladnefle * we receive in the aspect of your gracious and honourable presence. For as to men living vndera " cloud of obscurity & darknesse, nothing is so sweet as the defire of light, & nothing more accep-"table the the vie & benefit of the same: to to the city of Millan folong restrained under the yoke of " feruitude & oppression, no worldly thing could be offred of more telicity or cofort, the to behold "in your face the effect of our long expectatio, & to receive of the hand of the Emperor, a Prince of " right noble discending, and in whom, in many actions and at fundry times, we have experienced 66 your wisedome, your iustice, your valor, your clemency, and your liberality. but our scuere sortune, " vnder whose lawes we are without all moderation subdued, constraineth vs (expecting our re-" medy of none other the of you) to powre out afore you our miferies being greater without copari-" fon then those that any townes taken by affault did cuer endure, by the fury, by the ambition for "luft of any tyrants that conquered them. Which things of themfelues intollerable, are yet made "more gricuous to vs by the cotinual reproches heaped against vs, that they are inflicted upon vs for " punishmet of our infidelity to the Emperor: as though the late tumults proceeded by publike con-"fent, and not by the incitation of certaine yongmen fedicious, who in their rashnesse drew to their " faction the commons, who by their pouerty were affured to loofe nothing, and by their nature "liue alwayes defirous of innouation and therefore are a kind of people that with fo much the more " facility are allured to commotion, by how much they are compounded of humours replenished "with errors & vaine perswaftons, stirring at the appetite of euery thing that moueth the cuen as the " waues of the fea are caried with euery light wind that bloweth. And touching the accusations that " are heaped against vs, we seeke not either for our excuse, or to make lesse the quality of the critic, " to reduce into reckening the merits of the people of Millan (from the highest to the lowest) in the "feruice of the Emperour in the yeares before: first when the whole city for the auncient deuction " to the name of the Emperour, rose against the governors and against the French king; an expe-" rience reasonably inducing with what property of affection we sought to introduce the authoerity and supremacy of the Empire. Secondly when with so great constancy we bare out two mest " frait and hard befregings, fubmitting willingly our victuals, houses and our mony to the commose dity of the fouldiers, & with the chearefully exposed our persons to every watch and ward, to all " dangers, and to all actions of warre; an example of sufficient credit to just for your faith & loyaltie " to the sacred name of the Emperour: And thirdly when at the battell of Bicocque the inhabitants " of our towne defended with so braue resolution, the bridge, the onely passage by the which the "French were to pierce even into the bowels of the Imperial army; a confirmation without refi-" flance, that we preferred the defence of the Emperours cause before the safety of our owne lines. "Then was our faith recommended, then was our valor reputed to vs for good, & then was our con-" stancy lifted up to the third heaven, both by Prosper Colonno, the Marquis of Pesquiero, and the cother Captaines. And in these actions we may truly call upo the testimony of your Excellency, since ce being present in the war which the Admirall Bonniuet made, your eyes law, your tongue comen-« ded,& your hart did ofte maruell at fo great fidelity, and so affured disposition: but it agreeth not with our condition to infift upon the memory of these things, nor to counterpeise merits with offences, fince our mifery present offreth to stand against all operatios of merits or seruices past. And ce if now there can be found in the people of Millan, any humor, any vaine, or any inclination of ill se affection against the Emperonr, we lay our selues downe to what penalties shall be determined ce ypon vs, yea much leffe that we wil fpcake in our inflification, feeing we will more willingly submitour neckes to the blocke, then hold for visual the fentence that condemneth vs:only we loued ee not a litle Francis Sforce, as a Prince given vnto vs by the Emperour, and as one in whose father, grandfather, & brother had bin inuefted a comandement and government over vs : and we could ce do no lesse then honor him for the peculiar expectation that every one had of his vertue. For which causes it brought no litle griefe vnto vs to see him so suddenly deuested & dispoyled without ince formatio of the cause, yea we were not certified that he had cospired any thing against the Empece ror, but of the cotrary, both he & others affured vs, that it proceeded rather of the an bitio of him that governed the army, then of any comission from the Emperor: and yet the whole city possed es an oath of fidelity to the Emperor, & submitted the selues to the obedience of his Captaines. Such ce was the resolutio of the city, such was the universal cousel of the Magistrates, such was the publike confen

consent of the inhabitants, and such was the forwardnesse & sidelity of the nobility, whom to per- >2 secure thus for falts particular, there is neither law of reason, instice, nor example. But even in the very dayes of the tumults our faith was shewed according to the quality of the places that we >> held, since both in the beginning of the stir, & in the heat & fury therof, we fayled not to labor with " our authority & petitions to make them leaue armes and in the last day of the turnult there were va none others then we that induced the chieftaines & leditious yongmen to go out of the city, and " perfivaded the commons to submit to the obedience of the Emperouts Captaines. But both the commemoration of our actions and merits, and our indiffications against the infamies heaped a- "> gainst vs, might haply be necessary or connenient, if there were any correspondency betweene the " punishments we endure, and the faults we have committed, or at least if our afflictions did not " farre exceede our offences: but there is great difference betweene the one and the other, for we may boldly fay (and we fay it in our owne trueth) that if all the calamities, all the cruelties, all " the inhumanities (without speaking for our honour of filthy lust or violation) which at any time " within the memory of men haue bene endured by any City, any people, or any congregation of " inhabitants, were gathered together and reduced into one presence, they would make but a little " part of those misseries which we wretchedly do suffer, not for a moment, not for an house, not " a day, but continually and without intermission: feeing that in one instant we are dispoyled '> of all our fubstance, free men liue tormented with bondage, our wives are imprisoned in " their houses, and kept chayned by the souldiers, who with a perpetuall rage runne vpon vs for vi-" ctuals, for money, for armour, for all their wants, and in their licentious neitle will not be vied as " belongeth to men of war, but as best liketh their insolent fancies. If we be not able to furnish them " dayly with fresh supplies of money, they drive vs to seeke to do that which is impossible to our e- " flate, and in their cruelty they constraine vs with threates, with injuries, with beatings, and with all " forts of outrages: fo that there is not one of vs which interpreteth not to a fingular grace and fe- >> licity, to abandon to pray and spoyle allour goods, and for the fauing of our wretched liues, 'to fly >> barefoote out of Millan, and for ever to look the folace of our countrey, which for ever hath pre- >> ferued vstill this accurfed day . In the time of our auncestors Federike Barberosso made desolate >> this City, and executed no finall cruelties against the inhabitants, against the buildings, and a- " gainst the wals: but alasthe miseries of that time hold no comparison, with the calamities of vs " wretches, not only for that the tyrannic of the enemy is more easie to be endured, as being more >> iuft, then the crucky vniust of a friend, but also for that one day, two dayes, three dayes, sufficed to >> glut the wrath and inhumanitie of the victor, and the punishments of the vanquished tooke end: " but with vs it is more then a moneth that we have bene exercised under these miseries, wherein >> our torments have increased by so many degrees of crueltie, by how many have bene the dayes w and houres since our persecution: yea we endure those crosses which before we would have " thought had bene impossible to the state of humaine condition, and as men reprobate and dam- " ned to eternall perdition, we fuffer without hope to fee an end of our woes. Onely the confi- >> dence we have refleth in your vertue and clemencie, vpon which we make our implorations, " that you would not fuffer this Citie lawfully made yours, and committed to your protection, to " be wholly denoured with the lawes of Lions and Tigers: wherein reclayming vs with that pro-" pertie of pietie, besides the perpetual honour of your name to be the onelie patron and restorer " of this Cirie, yet you shall settle and establish more in one day your principalitie with the good- >> will and deuotion of subjects, then other new Princes do in manie yeares with armes and forces. " For end, all our petitions, all our humilities, all our oblations, and all our defires tend to this, that >> iffor anie cause what loener, your will be estraunged to deliuer vs from this infinite oppression, " or if you stand curious or restrayned by anie inducement to remove from our neckes the yoke " of this intollerable seruitude, at least we beseech you with the dearest teares of our inward hearts >> and affections, that you will turne against vs, and discharge vpon this people, vpon vs all, vpon » euery one, vpon enery fexe, and vpon enerie age, the furie, the forces, the fire, and the artilleries » of your armie. In which action, we will confter to a speciall felicitie, to die by the stroke of your " handrather at one blow, then by languishing in our present miseries, to die by degrees more >> gricuous, then the life and breath that is left vs can fuffer. in a lingring death, and yet will not adde the blow that should dispatch vs: neither shall it be "lesse easie for vs to end in this fort our most wretched life, then such as love vs will be glad with "this kind of our death, even as fathers and parentes are wont to rejoyce at the birth of their children.

These words were followed with the teares and weepings of the whole assistants, to whom the Duke answered with a chearfull affability, that he was no leffe agricued with their intelicities. then touched with remorfe and defire to releeue them; which compassion he told them he would extend as much as in him lay, not only you the City, but also over the whole Duchy he excufed the infolencies done, that they were not only against the will of the Emperor, but also contrary to the intention of all the Captaines, whom for that there was no meane to pay the soldiers, necesfity had induced to confent rather to fuch outrages, then to abandon Millan, and leave the army in danger, and put all the estate which the Emperor had in Italy in manifest pray to the enemies: He told them he had brought with him some quantity of money, but not sufficient to content the fouldiers to whom many payes were due : neuertheleffe if the City of Millan would furnish him with thirty thousand duckats for the pay of one moneth, that he would cause the army to issue out of Millan and bestow them elsewhere, affuring them that though at other times they had bin abused in the like promises, the custome of other men should breed no law in him, for that he would alwayes observe his faith and word, youn the which they might assuredly repose themfelues, which he confirmed with this last addition, that if he fayled them, he wished his head might be taken from his shoulders by the first shot of Cannon from the enemies. But albeit such a summe, (both for the quantity which was great to men already confumed, & for the fuddennesse, wherein was matter of more aftonithment to those who were already amazed) was hard to be found in the City fo much wasted, yet the miseries they endured in lodging the soldiers being greater then all other degrees of calamities, they accepted the condition of the Duke, and began to make prouifion with as great diligence as they could: But their calamities were rather fulpended then ended, for that albeit one part of the fouldiers amongft whom was imparted ratably the money that was leuicd, were fent to lodge in the suburbs of Rome gate and the gate of Tosa, and there both to gard the ramparts, and worke at the fortifications, & alfo to labour at the trench towards the garden where Profest Colonno had made one before: yet they retayned fill no leffe then the others that abode in the towne, the fame lodgings they had, and continued to handle their hoftes with the fame rudenesse: wherein it seemed the Duke of Eurbon held no reckening of his promise, or at least (as was believed) he was not able to refist the rage and infolency of the fouldiers, being entertayned and pushed on in that humour by certaine Captaines, who either by will, or through ambition, or for hatred, gaue impediments to his counsels. But the miserable people of Mislan being thus deprined of their latt hope, and having not where to make their further recourse, fell into such an estate of dispayre, that some of them, to put end by dying to someny miseries and cruelties, which they could not ouercome by living, threw themselves headlong from the top of their houses into the streetes, and some did wretchedly hang themselues: and yet notwithstanding all those grieuous spectacles, neither the rauine, nor rage, nor inhumanitie of the souldiers could be any way appeared. In that time also the plaine countrey was in poore condition, being no leffe ransackt by the souldiers of the Confederates, who as they were received at first with a great ioy and defire, fo not long after, their inhumanities and extortions had converted the first affections of the people into iust hatreds; a corruption which generally tanne amongst the men of warre of that time, who taking example by the Spaniards, wasted their friends as well as they destroyed their enemies: for, not with standing in many chaunges of times, the liberty of fouldiers had bene great in Italy, yet it had taken infinite augmentation of the footemen of the Spaniards, though not vpon just cause, yet for reasons necessary, for that in all the warres of Italy they were alwayes ill payd: fo that under the colour of examples, notwithstanding they had a beginning excusable, yet they proceeded and continued alwayes from ill to worse. By whose rule, the Italians albeit they had not the same necessitie, for that their payes were orderly performed, yet making the custome of the Spaniards a law to them, they beganne not to be inferiour to them in any course of enormities. In which corruption, to the great contempt of the discipline of war of that time, the foldiers waighed in one ballance both their friends and their enemies, and so both peoples and countries were no leffe desolated by such as were paid to desend them, then

About this time the befieged within the Castle of Millan were reduced to such straights for want of victuals, that they were at point to render the Cassle: but because for their longer holding out, certaine of the chiefe confederates entertained them with hopes to be fuccoured, they thrust out in the night at the Castle gate which hath his prospect upon the trenches that enuironed it wirhout, more then three hundred footmen, women, children, & mouthes ynprofitable: who albeit the enemies that warded at that place, hearing the noise of their going, gaue the alarme to the refidue, yet they passed away all in safety without any impediment, finding fauour in the straightnesse of the trenches and ayde of their pikes. There were two trenches about two stones cast from the Castle, and betweene them both a rampart of fortie sadomes high, which rampart as it serued as a guard against the Castle, so also it concred such as without would affaile the trenches. This milerable troupe excluded out of the Callle, went to Marignan, where the armie was, and giuing good testimonie of the extremity wherein the Castle was, and no lesse experience of the weakeneffe of the trenches, for that both women and litle children found paffage through them, the Captaines by their relation turned eftsoones to deuise for the succour of the Cattle, with who did readily concurre the Duke of Vrbin, to the end he would not take upon himselfe alone the burthen of the excuse, which he supposed would not be now so casic as before, for that his army being now possessed of a strength of five thousand Swiffers, there was cut off the principal cause of daunger alleaged to make their approches to Millan without other footment then the Italians: fo that it was fet downe with a full confent of counfell, that the armie should directly addresse their approches to the castle, and commaunding the Churches of S. Gregorie and S. Angelo, neighbours to the counter-scarps, they should encampe below Millan. With which resolution the armie brake vp from Marignan, and for the impediments of the wayes, being cloyed with hilles and ditches, they marched foure dayes by wayes troublesome, and the xxij. of Iulie they came to incampe between the Abbey of Cafaret and the tiuer of Ambro, in a place commonly called Ambro: in which place the Duke chaunging the first direction set downe in the counsell, gaue order to dispose the lodgings of the armie in such fort, that the front of the campe might have his prospect upon the Abbey of Casaret, which is within a mile of Aullan, and keeping the river of Ambro vpon his backe, it might fretch out on the right hand untill the harbour, and on the left hand vntill the bridge: so that the lodgings of the armie bare directly betweene the gate of Renze and the gate of Tofo, and holding litle of the new gate, it bare a strong situation and disposition, aswell for those regards, as for the nature of the countrey. The Duke alleaged that he had exchanged the lodging of the Monasteries for that place, both for that it was more neare the Castle, and also not so farre underneath the walles, as to be put into daunger by any compulfion, and withall, for that threatning the enemies in manie places, they should be constrained to bestow guards in seuerall quarters; a matter which for their small number increased not a litle their difficulties. And now the armie being incamped in those lodgings, some regiments were sent out the same day to be siege the towne of Monce, which they tooke by coposition, and the day following with artilleries they subdued the Castle, wherin was a garrison of anhudred sootmen Neapolitans: there the Captaines began to deuise straightly how to put victuals within the Cassle of Millan, which they were informed was reduced to fuch a state of necessity, that there was intention to fend out Frauncis Sforce: and albeit there were amongst them many Captaines, who either for that fimply fuch was their opinion, or elfe to shew themselves forward and valiant in those things which were to be determined with a greater daunger of honour and reputation to others then to themselues, gaue counsell to give a charge upon the trenches: yet the Duko feeing into the perill and desperate hazard of the exploit, would not be against it openly, but objecting difficulties, and temporizing with delayes, he hindred that there was made no conclusion: in so much as the deliberation being referred ouer till the next day, the Captaines of the Smiffers demaunded to be introduced into the counsell, which never till then was permitted to them : and, Captaine Mus, who for that he had leauied the greatest part of them, and retained amongst them the title of Captaine Generall, alleaged in the behalfe of all his nation: that they maruelled not a litle that the war being begun for the tescue of the castle of Milwhose necessities redoubled by so much time as it was deferred, they stood to dispute yainly whether they should succour it or not, at a time when was more necessitie of courage and execution: That he did not doubt but in such a counsell would be set downe a resolution agreeable to the values all safetie of the state of Millan, to the honour of so many braue Captaines, & to the reputation of so flourishing an armie: in which case he let them to understand, that the Captaines and soludiers of his nation would interpret it to their great injurie and shame, if in the approching and action of the castle, they were not referred both to that place, and to that part of the perill, which the sidelity and honour of their nation did deserve. Lastly, he protested that in taking that counsell he would not faile to reduce them not to keepe so great a memorie of such as with infamic had lost the enterprises begun before, as therby they should passe into forgetfulnesse

the glorie and fortune of those that had vanquished. As they flood your confuming of time about these counsels and deliberations, wherein was manifelly discerned, that the Duke of Vrbin was of opinion that the Castle could not be succoured, newes came to the campe (though not very certaine) that the Caffle had compounded with the Imperials, or at least was youn the point to capitulate. These aduertisements were easily beleeued of the Duke, who alleaged in the presence of the whole Counsell, that though the accord could not be but prejudicial to the Duke of Alllan, yet it was agreeable and profitable to the affaires of the League, feeing it tooke them out of the daunger, which either defire or necef-* fitie to relecte the Castle might haplie bring upon the armiel, being caried with rash and sodaine minds to aduenture to do the thing which in reason and experience of warre held almost of impossibility:insomuch as that danger being now taken away, they were to begin of new to confult and deliberate vpon the proceedings of the warre, in the same fort, as if it were the first day of the beginning of the fame: so litle a thing hapning accidentally doth alter the whole estate and resolution of great affaires. But not manie dayes after the Campe was credibly aduertised that the composition was past: for the Duke of Millan, who saw the Castle reduced to such an extremity for victuals, that it could scarcely hold out one day, and being altogether out of hope to be rescued, for that he saw no aduauncing of the campe of the League, who had lyen so neare two dayes, was driven by the confideration of his owne perill, & not to be found vnready to entertaine the parley which had bene begun many dayes before with the Duke of Burbon, who after the retiring of the armie, was fent to vifite him in the Castle, and there the xxiiij. of July they fell to accord in this fort: That without prejudice to his rights and interests he should deliveryp the Castle of Millan to the Captaines appointed to receive it in the Emperours name, who promifed him to depart in fafetie, together with those companies that were with him: That it should be lawfull for him to remaine at Coma, which was deliuered to him, with the gouernment and revenues of the same towne, vntill they had received further direction from the Emperour touching his affaires: and that there should be added so much of other nature of reuenues, as should. in the whole amount to thirty thousand duckets yearly: That they should give him safe conduct to go in person to the Emperour, with obligation to content the souldiers that were within the Caltle for all their payes due and palt, which were supposed to amount vnto twentie thousand duckets: That the Duke of Millim should put into the hands of the Pronotarie Caraccoolly lobin Angelo Riccio, and Politiano, to the end he might examine them, neverthelesse Carraccioll to giue his faith to fuffer them to go away afterwards, and to give them fafe conduct to some place of furetie: That the Duke should deliuer the Bishop of Alexandria, who was prisoner within the Castle of Cremona, and that new Castle in Tortono should be delivered to Sforzino. In this convention there was no speech made of the Castle of Cremona, which being no longer able to refift the rage of hunger, the Duke had given charge to lames Philip Sacco, whom he had fent to the Duke of Burbon to promise it to the Imperials, if composition could not be obtained otherwife: but he difcerning by their words and maner of dealing what defire they had to accord, and declaring vnto them that the Duke could never paffe such a matter, obtained so much that there should be nothing spoken of it: for albeit the Captaines Imperials had great conjectures that the Callle had no great flore of victuals, and that the necessitie of the desendants would ere it were long make them fatisfied of the end and expectation of their intention: yet being defirous to be affured of it, they were determined to accept it vuderany conditions, for that they flood doubtfull whether the armie of the League that lay neare, would aduenture to fuccout it. In which case having no confidence to be able to defend the trenches, they had resolved to issue out into the field and fight: which doubtfull event of fortune they were willing to avoyd in accepting what conditions they could obtain of the Duke, who the dayfollowing issued out of the caltle, and being accompanied with manie of the Imperiall Captaines even as farre as the barriers and limits of the army, he taried there one day, and afterwards he tooke the way to Coma, the Imperials standing vponthis, that they had promifed to give him fafe retraire and lodging within Coma, but not to make depart out of the towne their companies of foldiers that were there in garrison. In regard of which dealing, he saw no cause to repose further confidence in them, & albeit he had determined before to do nothing that might incense or stir vp the mind of the Emperour, yet for his fafety he tooke the way to Loda, which City the Confederates restored wholly into his hands: and there, for that there was no one article of the capitulations observed to him, fauing that he & his companies came away in fafety, he ratified by publike instrument, the league

But in this time albeit the Pope, who for the commotion of the Colonnois, had published a Bullagainst the Cardinalland all others of the family of Colonno: yet feeing his hope to change the government of Scenna much diminished, and no lesse gricuous and troublesome to him to be vexed and translled in the territories of Rome, he began with better inclination, to open his eares to Don Hugo de Moncado, who not with intention to contract with him, but to make him more negligent in aduauncing his provisions, made a motion that under certaine conditions, the offences should cease against the Siennois, and all quarrels betweene him & the Colonnois: and to deale in this negociation, Vefpatian Colonno, whom the Pope trulled much, came to Rome, by which occasion the Pope having lost all hope of successe about Sunna, and treating to leavy the armie from before the walles, delayed the execution of that good counfell, expecting to runne into a leffer flaunder, to make it breake vp affoone as the accord now in negociation should be concluded: and yet for the diforders and confusions of the armie, which went increasing, it was determined at Florence that it should tetire: but sodaine and straunge be the accidents of warre: the day before the armie was appointed to depart, a regiment of foure hundred footemen issuing out of the towne, marched towards the artilleries which were guarded by lames Corfo, who seeing the faces of the foul diets comming, ranne away in feare from the place that he had promifed to defend: by whose example, together with the noise and brute of the accident comming to the armie, the whole armie hauing neither order nor obedience, tooke to flying, being neither charged nor followed. In which confusion of running away, there was striuing who could make beltspeed, and for the defire they had to escape the daunger which their timerous imaginations stirred up, the defire to flie was all one in the Captaines and in the fouldiers, and in the horsemen and the footenien, nothing being able to affure them, in whose cares the noise of seare did continually ring: they left to the enemies their victuals, their baggage, and artilleries, of which ten peeces great and small belonging to the Florentmes, and seuen appertaining to Perousa, were caried into Sienna with no litle gladnes, tending almost to a triumph. By the example of this accident, the people began with gerat showting and cries to renew the infamics descrued by the Florentines in the like case loosing long time before (euen afore the walles of Sienna) their artilleries, which were guarded upon the publike place of the same citie. This chase was given the day after the rendring of the Callle of Millan to the Imperials. At which time also the publike calamities of all Christendome being added to afflictions particular, the Pope had aduertisement out of Hungary, that Solyman Otto-Solyman Ottoman, who was come from Constantinople with a mighty armie to inuade the king-manin Hundome of Hungarie, having passed the river of Sauo without impediment, by the commodity of gane. Relarade, which he had subdued few yeares before, had taken the Castle of Peter Varadin, and paffed the river of Drano: in fo much as having no impediment of mountaines or rivers, the rage of the Turke was like to reduce the whole kingdome of Hungarie into manifest daunger. Now for assuch as the Cattle of Millan was fallen into the hands of the Emperour, it seemed that in Italy the state of the warre was wonderfully chaunged: wherein the Duke of Vrbin tooke his reason ypon necessity to take new counsels, such as they should have set downe and taken, if from the beginning of the warre the Castle of Mullan had not bene in the hands of Frauncis Storce: and in that regard the fame day the Callle was rendred, amplifying a discourse which he made to the Popes Lieutenant and Treasurer of Venice, touching the estate of affaires, he added that it was necessarie to create a Captaine generall ouer the whole League, to take charge and commaund all the armies: wherein he faid he joyned with himselfe the interests and respects of others, being determined for his owne particular, without that authoritie, not to intangle himselfe with care of anie other thing then to commaund ouer the Venetian armie; a resolution which he prayed them to fignifie to the Pope and Venetians. Whereupon the Senate agreed, the rather to remoue him from that demaund, which was made in a time fo inconvenient, and so greatly discontenting to the Pope, to send to the campe Lowis Pisan a Gentleman of great authority, by whose working his vehement inclination was rather moderated, then his determination altered. But touching the maner of proceeding in the warre hereafter, it was determined that the armie should not remoue from the place where it was, till the Smiffers were come, who were waged under the name, & with the money of the French king. The Duke of Vrbin thought it necessarie after they were come, to lie about Millan in two severall quarters, not to assaile it, or proue to force it, but to hold it languishing, till for want of victuals it were driven to yeeld, which he hoped wold come to passe within three moneths. He was with great vehemency against the opinion of those, who counfelled, that after the campe was setled, they should aduenture to take the towne, wherein he inferred that the League being mightie in men and money, and the Imperials in necessitie of both, all reasons and inducements of warre promised the victorie of the enterprise: he faid there was not one argument for the which the contrarie ought to be feared, but the defire to aduaunce the victorie, for that the enemies confuming themfelues with time and patience, there was nothing to flop the good course and successe of things. He was answered, that the discourse he made was strong and credible, if he stood assured that there would not come out of Germany a new fuccour of footmen, which if it were fuch as to enable the Imperials to take the field, there was no doubt that the euent of the whole warre would not be exposed to the arbitrement of fortune. But he replied, that cuen in that case he made no lesse account of the victorie, for that knowing the Duke of Vrbin to be of nature burning and active, he made this judgement of him, that when some he esteemed himselfe to be equall in forces with the armie of the confederates, he would aduaunce so falt, as by his rashnesse would rise occasion of some good accident to hasten the victoric: but because for the difficulties which they understood fell out in leavying them, they feared they would draw a long tract of time in contining, which might bring danger: it was determined by the counsell of the Duke of Orbin and solicitation of the Duke of Millan, to fend out Malatesta Baillon with an armie of three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horfemen, and five thousand footemen to take the towne of Cremona, which they supposed might be eafily forced, for that it contained not but an hundred men at armes, two hundred light horfmen, a thousand Launceknights of choice, and three hundred Spaniards, verie small store of artilleries, leffe quantity of munitions, and a flender prouifion of victuals: the inhabitants not withflanding they were appalled in courage, yet they were enemies to the Imperials: and the Castle no leffe hatefull to the name of the Emperour: and albeit the Castle was separate from the Citie by atrench, yet by the report of Hanniball Piccianard, who was Captaine, it was easie to supplant the flankes, and by that meane to carie it without danger. With these directions and counfels Malatest a went to Cremona, for whose departure the armie being diminished, the Duke of Vrbin fell into no small feare, least the regiments that were within Millan should give themin the night a Canuisado in their lodgings, so farre were things removed from all hope of the victoric: neuertheleffe lohn de Wedicis prouoked many skirmishes, and perfourmed them, wherein notwithstanding he made manie good impressions of his valour, with no lesse declaration of the vertue of the Italian footemen, which had not bene seene but sithence he had the charge of them; yet those skirmishes did rather hurt then helpe the substance of the warre, for that ordinarily they confumed some of the most braue and best experienced soul-

Here is to be noted, that for these adversities and contrary events of affaires, the Pope was growne into a marvellous discourage and appalement of mind, both for that he was not provided of money to surnish the long traine of the warre, which he now discerned, and also not disposed to make leavies of treasures by such meanes as the importance of the affaires required, and such as other Popes afore him had wont to vieto releeve those wants: but the thing that troubled him most, was, that he saw not that the effects of the French king were correspondent to the obligations of the league, and to the assurance and promise which everie one made of him: for, besides he was long before he wold make payment of the fortie thousand duckets for the first moneths pay, and give order for the leavying of the Swiffers: yet there was not discerned in him any preparation to begin the warre beyond the Mounts: no rather he found reasons to alleage, that it was first necessarie to fignifie to the Emperour what had bene contracted in the articles of the confederation, for that otherwise the king of England, who had a particular league with the Emperour for their common defence, might haply minitler aidevnto him, where, if fignification were made, regard and conjecture would ceale; and that then he would immediatly begin the warre, hoping that the king of England would do the like, who promifed affoone as fignification were made, to protest against the Emperour, and thento enter into the confederation made at Cosquae, Moreouer, the French king proceeded coldly to prepare his army by sea : and the thing that discourred more his intention was, that the fine hundred Launces which he was bound to fend into leah, were long in passing the Mounts: against which albeit was alleaged, that such a tract & lingring proceeded either of the negligence of the Frenchmen, which is naturall to that nation, or of the disability to recouer mony which hapned by the losse of credite the last yeares with the Marchants of Lyon, or for that the companies of menat armes were in verie ill point, for their loffes received in the battell of Pania, and had not bene repaired with any money fince: fo that they could not reorder and refurnish themselues, but with the fauor of a good time: yet such as made a more neare observation of things, began to doubt by the proceedings of the French, least to the king was more agreeable the lingring of the warre, then the expedition of the victorie: they suppoled he feared (according to the small fidelity and confidence amongst Princes in those times) that the Italians recouring once the Duchy of Millan, and by that meane making finall account. of his interests, would either grow to accord without him with the Emperor, or at least would be negligent fo to vexe and trauell him, as not to induce or copell him to reffore his children. But the matter that most kept the Pope in suspence, was, that the king of England being required to enter the cofederation that was made by his perswasions & setting on, & expressing now no correspondencie of reasons, & promises which he had made before: made a demaund, more to protract and defer then for other occasion, that the Confederates would be bound to fatisfie him of the money which the Emperour ought him, & that the estate & revenues promised to him in the kingdome of Naples might by affiguation be paid out of the Duchy of Millan. Moreover, the Pope feared least the family of the Colomois, who with many comotions held him in continual suspicion, wold not in the endrife to inuade him with the forces of the realme of Naples: fo that making a colle-Ction & confideration of all these difficulties & dangerstogether, he made vehement instance to The Pope mothe Confederates, that notwithstanding every one in particular should solicite & advance such weth the Conprouisions both by sea & land as they were bound vnto by the articles of the League, yet he per-federatesto fwaded the in generall, to make a common inuation upon the kingdome of Naples with an armic inuade the of a thousand light horsinen, twelve thousand footmen, & a convenient number of men at armes, realme of Na-He took his reason of this deuise vpon the experience of things done til that day, & judged that afterwards there would succeed no better issue, if they vexed not the Emperour with war in other places then in the Duchy of Millan: and for the better advancing of this expedition, he dispatched to the French king John Baptista Sanga, a Romane, and one of his Secretaries, both to pull him on with a better inclnation to the war, and to impart with him the estate of his wants and pouertie of mony, together with the small meanes he had to go on with so heavy a burthen of expences, if he were not eased with some quantity of money from him: that he was determined to hearken prefently to the war of Naples, not withstanding the articles of the confederation bare mot to do any action upon that kingdome, folong as the warre should endure in Lombardy: that the Venetians not with stading to avoid so great expences, had made difficulty in the beginning, yet being caried with his importunities, they had conferred to be concurrant in the action, and that without the French king, but with so much lesse numbers of men as imported his part and contribution: that the French king for that cause ouer and besides the 500 Launces, to who he was minded to give for Generall and Commander the Marquis of Saluffa, more for the fortune and felicitic, then for valour and vertue of the man, as he faid, would also send another proportion of three hundred Launces into Lombardy, to the end to administer one part of them to the warres of Naples: that he would solicite the comming on of the armie by sca, and that either to hold Genes short and refrained withit, or elfe to convert it against the kingdome of Naples: which armie, albeit the

Frenchmen led on with as flow aduauncements as they vsed in the other prouisions, yet it went on still in forwardnesse. The kings nauie contained foure gallions and fixteene light Gallies, the Venetians contained thirteen Gallies, & the Popes cleuen: ouer all which Nauy, reduced into one Admiralty, Peter Nauarre was appointed Captaine generall at the kings instance, notwithstanding the Pope could have wished that dignity to have bene transferred to Andrew Dore, Besides all these instructions & comissions, the Pope gaue a secret charge to Sanga, to perswade the Frech king to undertake the enterprise of Millan for himself, to the end to entangle him with that occafion, and to imbarke him into the war with all his forces. Moreouer, Sanga was enjoyeed to go out of Fraunce to the king of England, to demand succors of mony, seeing the king of that realme (desiring greatly in the beginning the warre against the Emperour, so farre forth as the League were negociated in England, according to his defire and the Cardinals of Torke) would enter the League, as was beleeued: but the nature of the time, and necessity of the Castle of Aillan not fuffering a long treaty or conference, when he saw the League was made by others, he thought he might hold the ballance, and stand as a looker on and a Judge. The Pope also solicited both at the perswasions of the Venetians, and at the request of the French king, who had sent to that end the Bishop of Bayeux to Ferrara, to have composed the controversies that were betweene him and that Duke: but he handled that action more in apparance then in effect, making viito him many offers, and amongst others, to give him Ranenna in counterchaunge of Modena and Reggia; a couerture or colour which the Duke made no reckening of, not onely for that by taking a new heart for the retiring of the armie from before the walles of Willan, he was more hardly then before drawne to like of the offers that were made, and chiefly that of Ranenna, but also for the great difference and inequalitie of the revenues, and that he tooke it to be a meane to drive him with time into contention with the Venetians.

These were the practises, preparations & operations of the confederats, deferred, broken off,& changed, according to the ends, and according to the counsels of the Princes that managed them. But the Emperour, whose deliberations depended wholly of himselfe, was neither negligent nor irresolute, so far forth as his power & forces stretched: for, after the Frech king, at the instace of the Confederates, had denied to the Viceroy leave to passe into Italy, which he demanded with great affection, the Viceroy refusing to take the kings present, which was supposed to be in value twenty thousand Crownes, departed and tooke his way into Spaine, bearing with him a writing written with the kings hand, wherein he protefled a readinesse to observe the accord of Madrill, so farte forth as he would convert the restitution of Burgundy into an exchange and paiment of two millions of Crownes: by whose relation, the Emperor seeing now no further hope of observation in the king, determined to fend by fea into Italy the Viceroy with the Launceknights that were in Parpignan, being almost three thousand, with the like number of Spanish footmen, containing in all a number of fixe thousand: he gaue order also to fend a new supply of an hundred thousand duckets to Millan, and albeit he folicited the expeditio of the army by fea, yet it could not be ready with speed according to his expectation, for that besides the time to muster and assemble the Spanish fouldiers, there was necessity to pay the Launceknights an hundred thousand duckets, due vpon their wages past: furthermore he addressed continual directions into Germany to send to Millan new succours of sootmen, but both for that he gaue no order for their payes, and also for the disability of his brother to leavie money, that expedition proceeded slowly: and yet by the delayes and ill successe and issue of the confederates, no fort of temporising or slownesse could be hurtfull: for Malatesta Baillon, being come before Cremona, planted his arrilleries by night on the seventh of August before the gate of la Mussa, judging that place to be weake, for that it wasill flanked, and worse rampared: and for that he thought at the same time to give the assault on the castle side, he supposed it best to make his batterie in a place farre off, to the end to constraine the defendants to deuide their strength into fundrie places: neuerthelesse after his artilleries had executed, he found the place strong, and fortified with ramparts, and the wall which he battered fo high of earth, that the discent into the towne would be too troublesome: the same being the cause that he would not give the assault, but with a counsell quite contrarie he determined to beginne a new batterie neare the Castle, in a place called Santa Monaca, which afore time had bene battered by Federike Bossolo: and at the same time he caused to cut two trenches vpon the Castle greene, of the which one of them drew on the right hand towards the river of Paw, Paw, where the defendants of the Callle had made two trenches: he hoped by the commodity of his trench, to take from them a Bastillion neare to the which there was fouldiers already arrived, and which Baltillion was in their first trench neare the wall of the towne: if he won it, he laid his plot to serue his turne by the benefite of it, and to make it a Caualier or Mount to batter along the walles, which the Frenchmen at other times had bartered. For which cause the Imperials made another bastillion behind their hinmost trench: the other trench which Malaresta call, was on the left hand towards the wall, and so neare to theirs, that they joyned within the casting of stones; he determined to begin his batterie assoone as the trenches were made according to his deurse, to the which the artilleries of the enemies gaue no great impediment, for that within Cremona were but foure Falconers, which they applyed but seldome by reason of their necessitie of munitions and powder : yet the souldiers that were footmen within, ceased not to make fallies out, and vexe those that laboured at the trenches, whom they oftentimes put to great distresse, notwithstanding they had a great guard. By reason of which impediments increasing with other difficulties and daungers, Malatesta who was vacertaine what to do, confounded with litle praise to himselfe by diverse judgements and letters, all the Captaines of the armie, who finding the action of Cremona to multiply in difficulties, fent to his campe a regiment of twelue hundred Launceknights newly leavied by the Venetians at a joynt charge and expences with the Pope: and not many dayes after, to the end to reconcile the discord and ieloufie growne betweene Malatesta and lutius Manfron the Treasurer Pezero, who after a great reconciliation, was now become more agreeable to the Duke of I'rbin, went also to his campe with a strength of three thousand footemen: but Malatesta continued his batteries, and the night before the thirteenth of August, he planted foure peeces of artilleries betweene Saint Lukes gate and the Castle, to take a Bastillion, where, after he had executed almost all the day, he made an opening or breach into the trench, hoping to carie the Bastillion the same night: but about foure houres within night there iffued out of the towne a small crue of Launceknights, who gaue a charge vpon those that guarded the trenches, containing both within and without more then a thousand sootemen: and after they had put them in disorder, they forced the guard to abandon the charge: neuertheleffe they were compelled the day after to go away, fo that the trench that had bene made with so great paine and industrie, remained abandoned, aswell on the one part as on the other. But amid these actions it seemed fortune would play a part, offering to be fauourable to those without, if they could have knowne how to discerne or to take the occasion: for, as in the night of the fourteenth day, about forty fadome of wallfell of it felfe, betweene Samt Lukes gate and the Cattle, wherein was deuoured and lost one peece of their artilleries in the ruines: so if they had taken the advantage of this accident, and followed on with the affault affoone astheday had appeared, the defendants, whose feare was redoubled with the allonishment of a chaunce so sodaine and vnlooked for, would have had no hope at all to relift or repulse them, for that the place which they should have occupied with defence, lay open and discoucred to the artilleries of the Castle: But as there is nothing more surtle then » occasion, which being taken & applyed, draweth with it good issue, but being neglected or fore-,, flowed, flideth away as a vapour, leauing men abused with their proper errour. So whilest Ma-, latesta stood long before he could resolue, and then lost time ere he could raunge his souldiers to go to the affault, the benefite of this occasion was taken away by the industrie of the defendants, who laboured with extreme diligence within, they first fought to couer themselues with risings and hilles cast vp with the labour of their hands, against the artillerie of the Castle, and afterwards they rampard themselues in the front of the enemies: so that when the assault came to be presented, being then well of the day, albeit the most part of the campe were concerted to that fide, yet for that they went all discouered and open, they made their approches with their great narmes: and being approched, belides the other defences wherein they found perill, they were wonderfully vexed with stones which the defendants within cast downe vpon them: by which maner of execution Iulius Manfron and Captaine Maron were flaine vpon the place, together with manie other fouldiers of condition. At the fame time there was another affault given by the Castle, but that was repulsed with a veric small domage: it was appointed also that at the batterie made at Santa Monaca, should be perfourmed another assault with source score men at armes, an hundred light horfmen, and a thousand footemen: but by the impediment of the ditch which was ful of water, & the disaduantage of the place being well fortified, the souldiers retired without doing any thing. After this arrived at the campe, the Treasurer Pefero with three thousand footmen Italians, and more then a thousand Swiffers, together with a new coplement of artilleries: by which supply the campe being now about eight thousand sootmen, the Captaines thought to make two batteries following on with the affault to either of them with three thoufand footmen, and with the other two thousand to assayle the part towards the Castle; and Pefero bringing with him to the Campe a great quantity of Pyoners, they laboured with great industrie all the trenches, of the which one being finished the xxiij. of August, they wonne after long fight to couer by their valour a flanke of the enemies. Afterwards the night of the fine and twentieth day, they made two batteries, the one (of the which Malatesta had charge) beyond that place which Federike had executed aforetime: the other at Musse gate, managed by Camilla V r fin: but the successe both of the one & the other was verie sleder, for that the place where Malatesta braked his artilleries by reason it was marrish, gaue no firme ground to the artilleries. for that in finking at the breach by the folinesse of the place, they mounted at the mettall or mouth of the peece, and flot ouer. And touching the batterie of Camilla, both it was low, which hindered the execution, and in the action of the affault the fouldiers found impediment in a ditch which was full of water, together with so many small shot beating in flanke, that their valour could not make them a way to passe further: so that albeit for all these difficulties they gaue the affault, and received in that place the greatest harmes: and albeit on Malatest as side the footmen went up to the wall, passing a ditch, wherein the water was deeper then was looked for, yet by the vertue of the defendants, applyed to the advantages of places, they were eafily and readily repulsed. Moreouer on the Castle side one part of the Caualier being reuersed and put downe, the footmen mounted vponit: but for that the descent withinwards was too high, the fouldiers that were come to the affault from all parts in no good order, were put backe, fome running on in their rashnesse till they were slaine, and some with a more fauourable infelicitie bare away the rewards of their enterprise in wounds and maines of their bodies, and with very litle hurt of their enemies. These disorders together with the privation of hope to take Cremona, joyned to the want of gouernement and obedience of the Campe, called the Duke of Vrbin to go thirther in person, who drew out of the army that lay before Willan, almost all the Venetian sootmen, and left there one part of the men at armes with all the regiments of the Church, together with the Smiffers, who now might containe a number of thirteene thousand: and now that there remained in the army a leffe number of men, which being disfurnished of a Generall or Commander of fuch authoritie, he despised the same daunger, which he seemed alwaies before to scare when there were greater forces: and laftly, affuring that it was not the custome of men of warre, but chiefly of the Spaniards, to inuade other men of warre in their strength or campe, he went from the armie to Cremona, laying this plot, not to carie it with the only force of batteries and affaults, for that the ramparts of the enemies were too strong, but by feeking with the industrie of so many Pyoners to approch their trenches and Bastillions, and to make themselues maisters of them more by the benefite of undermining, then through the vertue of armes. There were many of the Captaines that reprehended him in many things touching the gouernment of that enterprise against the state of Millan, but chiefly they reproched the retraite and breaking vp from before the walles of Millan, but most of all did they challenge him of indifferetion, for that from the beginning he had attempted to carie Cremona with verie small forces, trusting more in his vanitie and fancie, then by the rule of experience or reason to accomplish the action with great facility: wherein also the difficulties of the enterprise still redoubling & discourring, he had embarked fuch a part of the army, as far greater occasios falling out whilest he columed the time there, were hindred and lost by following that service: for, seeing now the full numbers of Smiffer's were come to the campe, both so manie as was necessarie, and no fewer then was looked for, he night by entironing Millan with two armies, according to the first resolution, cut off that great resort and traffike of victuals which continually had passage thither by the way of Pania, which the singlearmie that lay at Amber could not restraine for the great circuit of place and wayes to be made. But the matter of greatest importance, was, to loose the occasion that haply was offered to sorce Millan: the rather for that the bands of fouldiers that were within, were so weakened by ficknes & diseases, that the bodies most sound & free being scarcely able to entertaine the ordinary watch and ward with other necessary factions of warre, the Imperials themselves gave this judgement of their owne estate, that if they had bene inuaded in that adverfity and weakenesse, their danger had bene greater then their valour could have defended it. But amid these good offers to the Confederates no leffe certaine and great was the occasion given to take Genes, for that as the Venetian Nauie was joyned with the Popes at Cinita Vecchia, & afterwards stayed in the port of Linorne to tarie for the French, which with fixteene gallies, foure gallions, & foure other veffels was fallen into the river of Ponent, had gotten by the consent of the inhabitants, Sauona & all the river of Ponent: fo that armie by sea, after they had taken many ships loden with graine going to Genes, passed away to Linorne to knit and joyne with the residue: besides, it was also determined, that at the comon expences of the Confederates, there should be armed in the port of Marfeilles twelve great ships, to the end that with the French Gallies, and by the direction of Peter of Nauarre, to meete with the Nauic that was prepared in the port of Carthage, or at least to encounter them at fea: where the three fleets making faile together, the Nauie Ecclefiastike and Venetian stayed at Porto fino, and the French fleete returned to Sauona: and from those places scouring all the seas without resistance, they restrained Genes so straight where was want of victuals, that if they had fent up a certaine strength of souldiers by land to cut from them that only refuge, there was no doubt but the towne of Genes would have come to composition. The Captaines of the said Nauies defired no other thing both by letters and Messengers expresse, demanding at least that there might be fet foure thousand men on land: but there could be no fouldiers drawne fro the campe that lay before Oremona: and the Duke of Vrbin with others, holding it too great a daunger to diminish the armie that lay before Alillan, they entertained the demands of the sea Captaines with hope, that assoone as the enterprise of (remona were ended, there should be sent to them a saffici-

But the enterprise of Cremona, aswell for the vertue of the defendants, as for that the great workings of Pyoners draw a long time, proceeded every day with greater delayes & temporizing then was looked for: for, the Duke who would needs have at the campe two thousand pyoners, a great quantity of munitions, and no leffe store of all forts of instruments, made a continual working at the trenches of the Castle, and at the Bastillion renwards Pan, both to win that, & to serue his turne of the Caualier, not with flanding that the enemies doubting of his intention, were retired many dayes before, having made a strong rampart behind it; he drew a worke also at the two heads of the trenches which went ouerthwart the Castle greene, the better to beat the Caualiers which the enemies had made there: and betweene the two trenches of the campe, he cast another trench of fixe fadome broad, prouiding, that during the labour of the pyoners, they should be couered with earth and other matter for their defence both on front and in flanke: the reason of this worke was, to make a Caualier at fuch time as they should be come to the ditch of the enemies trench: Moreouer, he caused to cast a ditch without the castle, towards the towne wall, the better to have way to the Bastillion towards the wall that was ruinate: he made another trench at Saint Lukes gate, drawing enen vp to the wall: and by the commodity of thefe labours and workings, he ceased not with the artilleries planted within the Castle, to execute upon the ramparts of the enemies: which for the alteration of the earth much yied and loofened, did eafily dampe and moderate the shot of the artilleries. On the other side the desendants within lost no time: for, distrufling to be long able to keepe trenches and caualiers, they made a ditch towards the houses of the towne, and yet made many braue iffues & fallies, and with great courage charged vpon the works of the enemies: infomuch as the night before the feuenth day, they fet vpon in three places those trenches which the enemies cast vpon the side of the Castle: where finding sleeping in their fecuritie the bands of footmenthat were fet to guard them, they flue more then an hundred together with certaine Captaines, and followed the charge euen up to the rauelin before the Castle: neuertheleffe notwithstanding their valour, which in those extremities lay not idle, and not withstanding their industrie and perpetuall working at ramparts and trenches, yet they were more and more reduced into straight termes, and their affaires declining by swift degrees to diminution: for, the Duke having made way with his trenches even to their ramparts, which separated the Castle from the towne, went on vexing them with certaine troupes of shot & other souldiers couered with their targets, by whom they received great harmes, as also by the attilleries fro the towers of the Castle. By reason of these harmes the Imperials, not to give favor to the enemies by any of their labours, burned their rampatt which they made at the Canalier, to the end it shold not serve for a parapet to those that were without; and about the nineteenth day, two trenches of theirs within their ditches, being beaten ope & flat, they retired within the other trenches, of which the Duke of Vrbin made small accompt, both for that for the shortnesse of time they could not be wel for tified, and also by their retiring more at large and abroad, there must be necessarily a greater guardto defend them. But notwithstanding all these workes were managed to a good end and issue, yet the proceedings of the campe were but slow, for the necessitie to reorder and renew the regiment of the Venetian footmen, who had bene long time without pay, for which cause they were greatly diminished in nubers, as alwayes in the affaires of the Contederats one disorder hapned vpon another. And as the Imperials, partly to apply to their advantage the diforders of the campe, and partly to follow the fauor of other occasions, did make many fallies by night to proue and pronoke the trenches, so all their valour and labour was in vaine, for that their enemies were now made wife by the experiene of the harmes they had received there before:infomuch as at last the Duke of Vrbin having now got a sufficient strength of sootmen, began the xxij. day to make a violent batterie vpon a tower, which afore times had bene battered by Federike, where after he had executed certaine shor of cannon, he found the enemies reduced to such termes of weaknesse, as they could not refuse to compound: in which opinion he fent out a Trumpet to summon them to render the towne, with whom came forth a Captaine Launceknight, and a Spanish Captaine, together with Guido Vaino. The day following the capitulation went betweene the & the Duke, that if they were not succoured by the end of the moneth, they should depart out of Cremona: That it should be permitted to the Launceknights to go into Germany and the Spaniards to the realme of Naples: That in foure moneths they should not beare armes for the defence of the state of Millan: That they should leave all their artilleries and munitions, and go out with their Enfignes foldeden, and without found of drumme or trumpet other then at fuch time as they leauied and brakevp.

Cremona rendred to the Confederates,

> A litle after this time there was fent to remaine in the French Court as Legate, Cardinall Salniatio, who was departed out of Spaine with the leaue of the Emperour: and in this meane while the French king had answered to the regied to that were made to him by the Pope: wherein he excused himselfe by his great want and necessity of money, that his doings and actions were not correspondent to his will and affection : but if he might have a permission to leavie throughout all his realme a tenth of the reuenues of benefices, he would releeve him with twenty thousand duckets monethly of that collection, and would be also concurrant with him in the wartes of Naples the refused to hearken to the conquest of the Duchy of Millan for himselfe, from the which his mother and Monsieur Lawtreth did chiefly draw him, not with standing he had declared from the beginning a good inclination that way:he gave him hope that he would go on with the war beyond the Mounts, but he alleaged that it was necessary the intimatio proceeded, which being done, he offered to begin the war vpon Flaunders fide & Parpignan: & yet it was differned that he had no disposition to it, his intention therein being nothing different from the will of the king of England, with whom the expedition fent by the Pope ferued to no purpose, for that the Cardinall of Yorke, whose humout was to entertaine every one, and be sued vnto of all men, would give no resolution: only the King and the Cardinall made oftentimes this answer: The affaires of Italy appertaine nothing to vs.

> At this time the Confederates fearing least the Grisons, who during the fiege of the Cassle of Millan, had reconquered & rased Chiamana, would enter into the pay of the Duke of Burbon, or at least would suffer the Launceknights whom he expected for succours, to passe through their countrey: the Pope and Venetians bound themselves to take into their pay two thousand sootmen of the Grisons, and to pay to Captaine Asus sine thousand fine hundred duckets, which they had promised to him more by force then by friendship. This Captaine Mus was sled from the campe, searing the Duke of Asislan, who was then connect the armie, & afterwards pretending that there was money owing to him for the payes of the Swissers, he detained prisoners two Embassadours of the Venetians, who had bene sent into Frauncethe obligations of the Pope & Venetians stretched also to deliver them of the new taxes imposed you such as traffiked in navigation you the lake of Coma. And touching the Grisons, they bound the selves to stop the passage of the Launceknights, and wrought so as Tegane their Captaine, who had compounded with the Duke of Burbon to serue him with two thousand sootmen, advanced not. In the meane while the affaires of Italy proceeded coldly: for the army that was before Willan, wherein was greatly diminished the numbers of fuch Swiffers as were not payd, lay with an idle campe, without doing any other action then enterchange of light skirmishes, according to custome. But another humor raigned in the Spaniards that lay within Carpy, who forbare not to do the worlt they could, and being fecretly aducrtifed by their espials (taking withal the commodity to withdrawthemselues ypon the lands of the Duke of Ferrara) they gave many impediments to the curriers & other perfons going to the army. In which liberty, tunning ouer all the country therabouts, euen vpon the confines of the Bolognois & Mantuans, they comitted very many infolencies and harmes, but not to any others then the subjects of the Church. At last the Marquis of Salussa passed the Mounts with fine hundred French Launces, by reason of whose comming, Fabricio Maramo, who battered the towne of Valence, and lay encamped before it, (lohn Biraguolying there in garrifon) retired himselfe to Bassignan: but the Marquis refused to passe further, volesse a regiment of source thoufand footmen, whom he had led out of Fraunce for that intention, were payd by the Confederats by equal portion: which in the end by necessity was consented vnto, the rather for the instance and importunity of the king, who folicited it vehemently for the furctie of his men at armes, and to raise into greater degrees the reputation of the Marquis.

In this time Symbald Fiesque made himselse Lord of the towne of Pontriemols, which Sforzino held, but it was est soones recovered with the same facility, by the meane of the Castle. Within Millan was great want of money, since both there was none received from the Emperour, and the inhabitants within were so impourished by their intollerable destaymess, that stateely could they furnish the thirty thousand duckets promised to the Duke of Burbon, who had received into his pay Galeaz Buraque & Lodowyke Beliopeuse, who till that day had alwayes followed the Frech partithe reason was, for that the Cosederates could not accept them for the intollerable burthens of charges which they sustained. About this time lohn Biraquo got Nouy.

During these stirres the state of the Marquis of Mantua stood almost indifferent and common to all sides, wherein he excused himselfe, for that he was in the pay of the Pope, and a freeholder of the Emperour: and to hold still his estate of indifferency, when the end of the terms of his pay drew neare, he put himselfe of new into the pay of the Pope and the Florentines for soure yeares more, with this expresse condition, that neither in his person nor with his estate he shold be bound to any thing against the Emperour; and yet in the beginning of the warre he defired to go in person to the army; which being notagreeable to the Pope, as having no considence in his government, he was answered, that in regard he was a freeholder of the Emperour, he would not bring him so farre in daunger. This was the estate of affaires in Lombardy at that time.

In Tuscane, albeit the Florentines had neither armies nor armes vpon their lands and confines, yet were they not without their part of the burthens of the warre, for the contributions that were imposed vpon them; for the Pope, who had no money by meanes ordinarie, and would not make any leauies or collections extraordinarie, laid vpo their shoulders with a great impiety, almost the whole waight and charge of the expences of Lombardy. The Siennois also were not without their vexation on the sca side, for that Andrew Dore commanding Talamone and Portherculo, made them stand continually vpontheir guard: notwithstanding not long after Talamone was restored to the Siennois, by the inside lity of a Captaine that was appointed to keepe it. Their aduersity also was increased by the vexation of the exiles of Sienna, who shaining supportation by the Pope, molested them in the parts of Maremma: where lohn Paule the sonne of Ranse de Cere, who was entertained by the Pope, made himself Lord of Orbatella, by a surprise that was made by certaine horsmen of the gate of the towns, which he followed for the with with his companies.

But at Rome the alteration was great, and drew after it effects of right great confequence, such astooke not their beginning of armes and open warre, but were bred in the bosome of conspiracies and ambush: they brought no lesse infamic and slaunder to the Pope, then consustion and disorder to the affeires of Lombards: where, by reason of the conquest of fremona, was hoped a good issue of the enterprise of Genes, & also to be able to dispose the campe in two parts before Millan, according to the plots set downe arthe first sor, like as since the chase given to the Ecclesialtikes before Steama, the Pope having no hope to do any great action ypon the family of the Colones, continued his inclination altogether to inuade the realme of Naples with greater forces: so, on the other fide, the Colounois and the Emperours Agents, finding by the disposition of their owne affaires that they were able to do no notable matter against him, and desiring to keepe him still amused, and to take time from him vntill the Viceroz were come out of Spaine with the Nauv: they fent to Rome Veftafian Colonno, in whose fidelity the Pope reposed much, by whose meanes they fell to capitulate together the two and twentieth of August: That the Colomois should render Agnano with other places which they had taken: That they should withdraw their power to the kingdome of Naples, and entertayne no more bands of fouldiers in the townes which they polfessed in the dominion of the Church: That they might freely serue the Emperor against all men for the defence of the kingdom of Naples: and on the Popes fide it was agreed, that it should pardon all offences past, and revoke and abolish the bull published against the Cardinall Colonio: That he should not inuade their estates, nor suffer them to be endomaged by the Vrsins. By reason of this reconciliation, the Pope, who very undifferely reposed too much in the fidelity of Vefpafian, difmiffed almost all his horfinen and footmen which he had waged, and those bands that remayned, he dispersed them in seuerall townes about Rome, and from thenceforth seemed to grow cold in all things that concerned the plot of inuading the kingdom of Naples: for, as by the complaints and protestations which ordinarily came from Millan and Genes, to the Emperors officers refident in the realme of Naples, it was differend that those cities would hold out no longer vnlesse the Consederates were turned from the pursute of their enterprise with a mighty diversion: fo the Emperours Captaines and officers there, having no meane to make openly a firong warre, fuch as was able to administer a speedy remedy, tooke another course, and disposed immediatly all their thoughts and spirits to oppresse the Pope with ambushes & deuises: Such is the operation of minds malicious & ambitious, that the thing which the law of equity & order denieth them to do, &their forces too weake to further the impiety of their hart, they will not faile to follow it to effect with conspiracy and infidelity. Whilest these practises were in preparation, the almighty God bringing to passe that to the afgarie ouerthro. fliction which the Pope fuffered for his affaires particular, should be adjoyned other visitations wen in batt. I more publike and generall: aduertifements came that Solyman Ottoman Prince of the Turkes had ouerthrowne in a battellranged and accomplished, Lewis king of Hungary; a victory which it was supposed the Turke won no lesse through the temerity of his enemies, then by his owne valour & forces: for the Hungarians notwithstanding their numbers were but small in comparison of to huge an army of their enemies,& in their rathnesse reposing more for themselues in their victories past against the Turkes, then in the cltate and condition of things present : yet they perfwaded their king who being yong in age & yeares, was alfo more yong in counfell & iudgement, that not to obscure the ancient reputation and glory of war gotten by his peoples, and lesse attending to the fuccors that were to come to him from Transiluania, he would advance his forces & go seeke the enemy, & not refuse to fight with them in open field, a maner of action wherein the Turkes are almost inuincible by reason of their infinite numbers of hot fmen: so that the event & effect falling out all one with their rashnesse and indiscretion, his armie being compounded of all the nobility and valiant men of his realme, was overthrowne with a great flaughter of the generall multitude of fouldiers, and the death of the kings person, with manie of the print pall Barons & Prelates of the realme. This victorie both bloudie for the flaughter, and dangerous for the consequence, brought an universall terrour and assonishment over all the regions and lands of Christendome, eueric one feeing in his owne judgement, that nothing could hold backe the Turke from appropriating to himselfe the whole realme of Hungaria, which for fo many yeares had benethe only bulwarke and defence of Christendome: And as in the minds of men already troubled and afflicted, new displeasures and accidents make a deeper impression, then they do in such se spirits as are free and voide of passion: so this ouerthrow was to the Pope aboue all other Princes most bitter and grieuous, in so much as expressing in his actions, in his words, and in his countenance great tokens of in ward dolor and heauinesse, he complained in that griese afore the Cardinals fitting in Confistorie, of so great a domage & ignominie done to the common weale of Christendome: which for his part he had not failed both to foresce and prouide for, as well by exhorting and perswading the Princes of Christendome to peace, as also in comforting in their most necessities the kingdome of Hungary, with great contribution of money: he said that from the beginning he had foreseene and foretold that that warre would be full of incommodities, and a

warre very dangerous for the defence of that kingdome: onely he alleaged that feeing there was noteckening made of those reasonable conditions which he proponed for the tranquility of the fea Apostolike and Italy, he was driven by necessity to have recourse to armes and forces contrarie to his perpetuall intention: wherein he referred himselfe to be justified, both by the neutralitie which he had vsed before that necessitie, and also the conditions of the league which he had made respecting all the common benefite: all which he sayd aunswered sufficientlie for him, that he had not bene pulled on by any confideration of his proper interestes, or particular respects of those of his familie: but since it is Gods good pleasure haply for some good ende, that the head and principall part of Christendome should be hurt, specially in a time when all the other members of the fame body were devided into other thoughts then fuch as tended to the fafetie of the whole, he rhought that the holy will of God was, that they should seeke to cure fo greata malady by some other meane: and therefore feeing that care appertayned more to him then to any other in respect of his office of Pastour, he was determined contrary to all confiderations of the incommodities, of the dangers, and of his dignity, and foliciting with all afloone as he could vnder some good conditions, a surceance of armes in Italy, to mount upon his gallies and in person to go seeke the Princes of Christendome, and to solicite a holy and vninerfall peace with perswasions, with peritions, and with teares. He exhorted the Cardinals to put themselves in preparation for his expedition, and with one franke readinesse to dispose their minds and bodies to and their common father in fo holy an enterprise, which he befought God to blesse and fauor: and that if for the common fins of the world it could not be guided to his perfection, he befought the goodnesse of God, that at least in the negociation he would rather deprive him of life then of hope to accomplish it: for that (fayth he) no infelicity, no adversity, no milery can happen to me fo great, as in fo dangerous and mortall affonishments, to loose both hope and meane to put to my

This protestation of the Pope was heard with great attention, and with no lesse compassion and denotion was it holden for recommended and effected. But it had imprinted a farre greater operation, if his words as touching the person had caried so much fidelity & credit, as in themfelues they feemed to beare authority and dignity: for, the most part of the Cardinals were of this opinion, that he was more touched with the confideration of the difficulties wherein the present warre was reduced, then with any conscience of the daunger of that kingdome; a marter which they proued by this observation, that he had taken armes against the Emperour in a time, when, for the open preparations of the Turkes, the daunger of the Realme of Hungarie was manifest and vindoubted. But of this there could not be made a true experience : for, the faction of the Colonnois beginning to execute the treason they had pretended, sent Calar Filettin their confederate, with a strength of two thousand sootemen, to Agnano, where was a garrison for the Pope, of two hundred footemen payed: and in the manner of their doings, the better to keepe covered and hid their thoughts and intentions, they made shew as though they would take the towne: but for that in true meaning their purpose drew to another effect, they occupied all the passages, and with an extreame diligence cut off from comming to Rome all meane of aduertifement of their enterprise. And in the meane while after they affembled their forces which they had fent to keepe about Agnano, and together with those bands that were with themselues, were reduced all into one strength, which haply might containe in all about eight hundred horsemen and three thousand tootemen, all trayned and disciplined, they marched in great celerity towards Rome, where was holden no suspition nor doubt of their comming. They arrived there the night before the twentieth day of September, where in their first action, they tooke by surprise three gates of Rome, making their entrie by the gate of Saint John de Latran . There met them in person, not onely Askanio Colonno and Don Hugo de Moncado (for the Duke of Selfo was dead before at Marino) but also Velpasian, who had solicited the accord and given his faith as well for him as for all the refidue. There was also in person Cardinall Pompey Colonno, a man fo farre ouercaried with ambition and furie, that he had not onely conspired the death of the Pope in cruell manner, but also, by bloudy hands and meanes full of impietie and sacriledge, he had aspired to the seate Pontificall, constraying with force and armes, the Cardinals to make election of his person, whom he knew they would not call for his vertue or merites. About the breaking of the day, the Pope had information of their fuddennesse of the accident tending to a manifest surprise, & by the operation of his owne frailty, which by fo much was redoubled, by how much his perill was prefent and desperate, he sought in this aftonishment and confusion to appeale the tumult with his authority: for, neither had he ready any forces particular to defend the danger that his destiny pulled on, neither did the people of Rome make any figure to stirre, partly for that it grieved not them to see him fall into inconvenience whom they loued not, and partly according to the humour of populars, they made as though a vexation publike and generall did nothing touch nor concerne them. By 1eafon of which weakenesse of the Pope, and want of inclination in the people, the enemies with these oportunities aduanced forward, and with all their bands, stayed at Santo Apostolo, from whence they fent beyond Tyber by the bridge Sifta, a strength of five hundred sootemen with certaine horsemen: who, after a small resistance, repulsed from the portall of Santo Spirito, Stephen Colonno being in the Popes pay, and appointed for that place with two hundred footemen. Then, taking the way of the old suburbs, they drew to Saint Peters and to the Bishops pallace where the Pope was, no leffe doubtfull of his fafety then deprined of all affurance and vertue in fo great a distresse: he called in vaine upon the succours of God and men, and yet having a glorious defire to die in the feate of his dignity, he prepared himselfe with the habite and ornaments of his calling to take his feate in the chaire pontificall, according to the example of Pope Bonface the eight when he was furprised and restrayned by the Colonnois. In his feare and astonishment he could not discerne the way of his safey, and in that desperate accompt of himselfe and his estate, he was without all confideration, that fudden actions pushed on with that property of furie and rage, have their ordinary dissolution before they come to worke the worst that the timerous man in his fraile conceipts doth imagine: onely he found comfort and care in the Cardinals that were about him, who with a resolution aboue the greatnesse of their perill, conjured him to chaunge his timerous deuise to die in his chaire, and willed him to go out, though not for his owne respect, at least for the reputation of the holy sea, least the honour of God were wickedly and wretchedly offended in the person of his Vicar. By their perswasions he retired together with such of them as he trulled most, into the Castell about ten of the clocke: if in his feare he had lingred there longer, he had feene with his eyes that fpectacle of calamitie which in histime. rous condition he alwayes doubted: for, by that time he was remoued, all the horfmen & footmen together with the whole army were affembled before the pallace, & in their fury not sparing the place which at other times in their modesty they reverenced, they entred, & fackt the pallace, making violation and pillage of all the holy ornaments of S. Peter. Their infolency tooke from them all regard to the maiefly of religion, & whose harts had reiceted all denotion & piety, their hands tooke liberty to prophane all things that their fury could find out, yeathey made a small ceremony to ransacke the holy things of Rome, as the Turkes did in the Churches of the Realme of Hungarie. And being made weaty with tunning thorough the spoyle of things rich and precious, they left in their fulnesse to make further pillage of the holy relikes, and in their rage they retired to the new suburbs, of which they sacked about the third part, and passed no sutther for feare of the artilleries of the Castell. This was the last act & passage of their fury, which they seemed there to restraine & cut off, not that their rage was fully satisfied, but because their hands were weary with robbing; a tumult which they executed with fo much the leffe impediments, by how much more they forbare in their liberty to do any domage to the people of Rome: And after they had continued three houres in the licentious execution, Don Hugo vnder the Popes faith, & receiving as ostages for his surety the Cardinals Cibo and Rodolfo the Popes cosins, went up to the Caltell to speake with the Pope, to whom vsing the termes and phrases that appertayned to a victor, he set downe to him coditions of truce: whereupon answer being deferred till the day following, the coposition was concluded in this fort: That there should be betweene the Pope as well in his owne name as in the name of the confederats, & betweene the Emperor a truce for iii, moneths, with liberty to the cofederats to enter within ij, moneths: That in the same truce should be coprehended not only the estate Ecclesiastike, & the realme of Naples: but also the Duchy of Milla, the Florentins,the Genomaies,the Siennoù & the Duke of Ferrara, & all the Subiects of the Church, mediate & immediate: That the Pope shold be bound to retire immediatly on this side the river of Paw, his men of war that lay before Millan, & to call home fro his army by fea, And. Dore with his gallies:

Truce between she Pope and the Emperour. That he should be bound to pardon all the Colonnois, and any other who society was party to this commotion: That he should be bound to deliver for offages of observancy, Philip Strozzi & one of the sons of lames Saluiatio, and to send the to Naples within two moneths, ypon paine to loose thirty thousand duckats: That the Imperials and the Colomois should depart out of Rome & all the

This truce was willingly accepted both by the one and other party: it was acceptable to the Pope for that he had not in the Castell sufficient provision of victuals: and Don Hugo (though contrary to the instance of the Colonnois) thought it now time to take up, both for that he had done enough for the Emperor, and also he saw most of those souldiers that had entred Rome with him, dispersed here & there, being more loden with pray & booty, then bearing aptnesse to any further feruice: But this truce brake all the deuises and plots of Lumbardy, and tooke away all the fruite of the victorie of Cremona: for, notwithstanding almost at the same time the Marquis of Salusso was come to the army with the French launces, yet the Popes regiments beginning to fayle, who for the most part by reason of the truce retired to Plusance, the seventh of October: yet the deuise to send souldiers to Genes was no leffe dissoluted and disordered, then the resolution to enuiton Millan with two armies. Wherein the matter that helped also to this alteration and trouble, was the Duke of Krbin, who after he had made a composition with those in Cremona, went to visite his wife at Mantaa, without tarying for the confignation, notwithstanding he was credibly advertised of the truce made at Rome: and having accorded to the companies that were within Cremona, a prolongation of time to depart, there was so long tarying about Cremona before they dislodged, that he came not to the army with those companies that were before Cremona before the middelt of October; a matter that brought great prejudice to all the affaires, both for that thete was folicitation made to fend mento Genes, which Peter Nauarre and the Venetian treasurer of the army by sea demanded with greater instance then ever, for that (all the Venetian regiments being reaffembled) there were in the army for many forces as might fuffice for that effect, without that it was needefull for that matter to remoue the campe: and also for that the Marquis of Saliffo had brought with him fine hundred launces and foure thousand sootmen, befides a dayly expectation of two thousand Grisons, who were waged according to the accord made with them. And lastly the Pope, albeit he made open demonstrations to observe the truce, yet his intention being otherwise, he had left in the army foure thousand footmen with lohn de Medicis, under pretence that the French king should pay them an excuse not without apparant colours, for that John de Medicis was alwayes in the kings pay, and in his name retayned continually a company of men at armes At last the Imperials that were within Gremona went out of that Gremonagiuen City, the possession whereof was consigned out to Francis Sforce. The Launceknights with their by the confede-Captaine Conradin tooke their way to Tren: but the horimen and footmen of the Spaniards ha- Sfore. uing passed ouer Paw to returne to the realme of Naples, and the Popes Lieutenant making disficulty to give them sufficient passeports and safe conducts, for that it was contrary to the Pope to fuffer them to go to the realme of Naples: they fuddenly turned their way, and went up by the mountaine of Parma and Plassance: and after with great diligence they repassed the river of Parm at Chiarella, from whence they went in safety to Lomelino, & so to Millan. And the Popes Lieutenant Guiceiardin for the observancy of the truce, did not only go from before the wals of Millan with the Popes regimets, but also Andrew Dore removed himselfe from Genes with his gallies: out of which towne not many dayes before, were issued fixe thousand so tmen, as well bodies payed and waged, as men voluntary and followers, with direction to fet vponthe fixe hundred footmen who were vpon the land with Philip Fielquo: who with the fauour of the top of the mountaines neare to Portofino, had so fortified himselfe with ramparts and bastillions, that he constrained them to retire with their great losse. And yet not many dayes after Andrew Dore returned to Portofino with fixe gallies, to continue together with the refidue, the fiege of Genes by fea.

At the same time that these matters succeeded in Italy with diverse eventes, the Embassadors The leaguestgof the Pope, the French king, and the Venetians, fignified to the Emperour the fourth day of infied to the September, the League that was made, together with the liberty that was left to him to enter according to the conditions fet downe in the Capitulations . At which an Embaffadour of England being present, he deliueted to the Emperour from his king a letter, modestly perswading him to enter into the League. The Emperour heard with great affabilitie the reasons and relatios of the Embassadors, but he answered the, that it agreed not with his dignity to enter into a confederation made principally against his estate and his honor: only he had bene alwayes most denoute and disposed to have an universall peace, according to which inclination still continuing he offered to accomplish it presently, if they had sufficient warrant and commissions for the same. Neuerthelesse it was beleezed that his intention was farre otherwise, and that he did but infinuate that offer for his greater inflification, and to give occasion to the king of England to describe enter into the league, and also to make cold with that hope, the preparations of the confederates. and so under the treaty of peace, to leade them into some icalouse & distrust and yet notwithstanding this practife, he folicited on the other fide the prouifious for the army by fea, which was supposed to be forty ships and fix thousand men payd: and the rather to make that army advance being affembled at the notable port of Carthage, the Viceroy departed from the Court the foure and twentieth day of September. By which expedition and celerity, it seemed that the Emperour was more ready and carefull of his affaires then the French king, who notwithstanding he was pressed with so great interests and considerations, yethe forbare not to follow the humor of his negligence, and passed forth the most part of his time in the pleasures of hunting, dancing, and making court to Ladies: and then were his captiue children caried up to Valdolit, when it was manifettly differend that there was no more hope that the accord would be observed. The comming of this army by sea compelled the Pope to take armes, who with the lealouse of those apparances, could not but doubt of the fidelity of the Viceroy and the Spaniards: in which danger he did not only call to Rome Vitelly with his regiments and the bands of his Nephewes, but also he called in for his fafety an hundred men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, and an hundred light horsemen of Peter Maria Rosso and there was sent to him from the army two thousand Smillers at his charges, and three thouland footmen Italians: neuerthelesse he continued still and assured from one time to another, that he would go into Spaine to conferre with the Emperor, from the which most of the Cardinals diffwaded him, the rather for that he followed an action uncertaine, aduiting him first to send thither his Legates.

Deliberation Vebin.

But now to returne to the army which the confederates kept incamped before Millan, After of the Duke of the Duke of Vrbin was returned thither, who saw there was no hope to cary the towne either by force or by famine, and being with great importunity folicited by the Captaines of the fea army to fend out fouldiers to vexe by landthe people of Genes, he determined for the better aduancement of that expedition, to draw the army farre from the wals of Millan, & yet he made such disposition & direction of things, that all resort of victuals that was to come to that city, was cut off & flopped: for which occasion and to have the better oportunity to that action, he began to fortify Monce, to leave there with more furery fome crew of fouldiers, both to impeach the traffike of victuals from the mount Brianso and other places confining, and also by the commodity of that fortification to transport the army into such a place as might restraine the matkets of victuals comming continually to Millan from Baigreffe and Paula, And afterwards that place being reduced to good strength & fortification, the direction extended that the Marquis of Salussa should march to Genes with his footmen accompanied for his better strength with another regiment of Swiffers; a proportió which the fea armies did much defire, for that the towne of Genes labored in fuch extreame wants of victuals, that it could fearcely hold out any longer. But as these deliberations and directions were such as they could not be put to execution but with a farre greater tract and longnesse of rime, then either was agreeable to the estate of affaires, or the necessities of Genes could endure: so for that the only meane to cary that city, rested in no other property of action, then in the flopping of the refort of victuals which passed thither by land, those counsels tooke no resolution, nor were not referred to effect, notwithstanding there were in the army foure thousand Swiffers, two thousand Grisons, the regiment of source thousand sootemen of the Marquis of Saluffa, and foure thousand others under John de Aledicis payed by the Pope, together with the bands of footmen of the Venetians, which according to the obligation of the league, & testimony and report of themselues, were assured to contayne a strength of tenthousand men: but in truth vpon the iuft mustring and view of the bands, they contayned a far lesse number. At last, being the last of October, the army dislodged from the place where it had so long incamped, and drew to Pioltello fiue miles from the first lodging, but in discamping they had a great skirmish with the fouldiers of Millan, in which Burbon was in person. The intention of the Duke of Vrbin was to stay

Ray at Pioleello untill the fortifications were ended at Monce, where he deuised to leaue in garrifon two thousand footmen with certaine helpes of horsmen, and so to go to Marignan where he was determined to lodge the army: and from thence having first taken and fortified that place & also Biagressa as he supposed, he thought to send bands of mento Genes; expeditions which drew with them to long an executio, that there was reason to accuse him, not with tranding that he alleaged for one part of his excuse, the ill prouisions of the Venetians, who not paying their footmen in time conveniet, neither had they their numbers complete which were promised, & many of those which they had diminished alwayes the uncertainty of their paies, the Duke was costrained when the pay dayes came, to furnish their places with others, in such fort as he seemed to have every day new copanies & a new army. But this deferring or protraction which hitherunto feemed voluntary, began to haue a cause and colour of necessity; for after many negociations and practises helden in Germany to fend a new strength of footmen into Italy, the same serving to no effect, aswell for the disability of the Archduke, as for the pouerty of the Emperour, who sent no mony thither: George Frong (pergh for the affection he bare to the affaires of the Emperour, joyned to a defire to aduance the glory of his nation, and who with great merite had at two feuerall times commanded in Italy two great armies for the Emperour against the Frenchmen, determined to supply with his goods and faculties private, the charge which Princes for their weakenesse were not able to vndertake: he stirred vp with his authority many bands of footemen, whom he allured with the sweete infinuation of pray and booty, concurring withall the good oportunity and occafion that offered to make them rich with the spoyles of Italy. And after he had contracted with them, that in receiving for every man a crowne in preft, they would follow him to the succours of the Emperour, and obtayned of the Archduke certaine aydes of horsemen and artilleries, he prepared to march, making the generall mufter and leauie of all his men betweene Bolzano and Maran. The rumour of this preparation for the suddennesse not expected, and for the authoritie of the man much redoubted, piercing eafily into the bowels of Italy, was the cause that the Duke of Vrbin went not on with his resolution to inolest Genes, which was now reduced almost to the last extremity. And yet Andrew Dore for that he wold have the expedition advanced, abated some part of his demaunds, and required now but fifteene hundred sootemen, making nisreekening to furnish the relidue by his owne meanes. But the Duke resusing also that denaund, alleaged for his excuse, that it was necessarie to send from the army ypon the countrey of Vincenia, a Arength of fifteene hundred footemen of the Venetians, for a feare which that Senate had leaft the army of the Launceknights wold take that way; an opinio which the Duke cofuted, perswading himselfe that they would rather take the way of Leequa, and for that reason he stirred not from Proteella, for that he would be more neare the river of Adda, and he published that he would march to meete them, and fight with them beyond Adda at their comming out of the vale of Sarcina.

By these variations as the affaires of Lumbardy began to draw to new & sarre greater difficulies, so also there burst out in the towne of Rome a fresh fire of trouble and new vexation : for the Pope, who for the accident of the Colonnois was pulled downe in courage, and in an inclination to peace, was bent to go by feato Barcelonato contract fome accord with the Emperor: affoone as his enemies were gone out of Rome, had fent Paule d'Arezze his Chaberlaine to the French king, and from him to passe to the Emperor with his privity, to negociate the peace: his commissions extended alfo to fignify to the king his necessities & his dangers, and to demand an hundred thoufand crownes for his better defence. In which matters he feemed to discordant and disagreeable to himselfe, that in demanding mony of the king, and vrging him to a greater readinesse in the war, he would not only not consent to the tenthes without condition of a moity of himselfe, which the king refused under this reason, that it was contrary to the tradition and vsage of Fraunce: but also in his contradiction he could not be resolved to create Cardinall the Chauncellor Prat, who both for the authority and fway he bare in the kings counsels, and for that all expeditions of money passed through his hands, might have bene a necessarie instrument to helpe forward all his purpoles. Such was his confusion, that his counsels were no lesse dilatory and slow, then the execution vocertaine and irrefolute: which passion as it tooke beginning of his astonishment for the tumult of the Colonnois, so it went on increasing by new terrours, whose operations led him into manifest contradiction in matters concerning his owne safety. But the French king forgat not to be forowfull with Paule d'Arezzo and the other Nuncios, for the accident of Rome, and in that compassion he offered to the Pope all things for his defence, and wishing he would repose no more confidence in the Emperour, he aduited him to persone no longer in the truce: your which condition and not otherwise, he promised still to satisfie the twentie thousand duckats which he was bound vnto for every moneth. To this the Pope was also aduited by the king of England, who diffwaded him from his voyage to Barcelona, and to comfort his present distresse, he sent him five and twenty thousand duckats. The French king discouncelled the Pope from his purpose to go visite the Princes of Christendome, as being a matter which for the importance required a deeper consultation: and at the first he refused to consent that Paule d'Arezzo should go to the Emperour, either for suspition that the Pope would begin to entertayne with him some practise seperate, or else that he held it a matter more honourable to worke the peace by the meane of the king of England, then to feeme under those wayes to begge it of the Emperour. Neuertheleffe by a new instance made by the Pope, he gaue his consent to let him go, cither for that he defired the peace in deed, or elfe because he began not well to brooke to have it wrought by the king of England, who bare such a hand and government in these actions, that the French king could not but doubt, least for his interests particular, he would draw him to conditions hard and inconvenient: wherein he tooke the reason of his doubt vpon the disposition of the king of England, or rather the Cardinall of Yorke under his name, who caried with ambition and a glorious defire to be judge of all, fet downe conditions very strange and farre off, and having also ends different from the purposes of others, he feared by reasons of those ends least he would fuffer him to be abused by the Emperor, & would not be grieved that the Duchy of Millan should fall upon the person of the Duke of Burbon by the benefit of the peace, so far forth as he maried the Emperours fifter, to the end it remained in his power to give his daughter in mariage to the French king. So that what by these perswasions tendred to the Pope by the one and other king, and what through his feare not to loofe the amity of the Confederates, and so by the privation of their aides, to remaine in pray to the Emperor and his officers; and what by the importunities & vehement inducements of his owne counsellers: & what for the hatred & disdayne conceined against the Colonnois, together with the burning defire to recouer by way of renenge the honor he had loft, he was induced to convert against the townes & lands of the Colonnois, all those forces which he had called into Rome only for the surety of his person. And in this variatio & ballancing of reasons and causes, he judged there was no law of equity nor order, to compell him to observe the accord which he had not made by will & free consent, but under the abuse of their fraudes, and forced by their armes, contrary to the law of faith, he fent out immediatly Vitelly with his companies to yexe the lands of the Colonnois, making his account to burne and raze all their townes, for that for the ancient affection of the inhabitants, it could not be a matter very prejudicial to them to take the townes only without doing other violence: and in the humor of his anger he published a Bull against the Cardinall and others of that family, by vertue wherof he proceeded afterwards to deprive the Cardinall of the purple hat, who feeking before to defend himfelf with the bul of fimony, had made publike appellations at Naples, & had appealed to the generall Councell to come:only the Pope deferred to pronounce sentence against the residue of the house of the Colonnois, who were not negligent to wage both horfme & footmen in the realme of Naples. But the Popes bands being entred into their townes, they burned Marina & Montfortin, whose Caftel held good as yet for the Colonnois. And in this rage of the victory & aduatage, they rafed Gallicana & Tagarolo, the Colonnois being carelesse of al other townes, then to desend their places of frength, & chiefly the towne of Paliano, which is a peece frong by fituatio & of very hard accesse for great artilleries: befides, hath no accesse but by three wayes, wherof one cannot succor another; and having about it, wals of good fortification & thicknes, the inhabitants were determined with great refolution to defend it. Neuertheleffe it was beleeved, that if he had marched with diligence to affaile it notwithstanding many of the inhabitants of those townes that had bene taken were retired thither, he had eafily caried it, for that there was not a foldier within it: but whilft he stood teporifing & deferring to go thither, following the inclinatio & working of his nature, which was ful of irrefolutio & feare whe things were to be put in executio, there entred into the .owne by night a strength of 500 footmen as well Launceknights as Italians, being seut from the realme of Naples; a reliefe which as it made the taking of the towne fo hard and desperate, that Vitelly

who at the same time kept his companies about Grotta Ferrata, not dating to attempt further enterprise vpon Paliano, and much lesse to execute any action against the peece called the Popes rocke : so after he had sent to batter with his artilleries the rocke of Montfortin garded by the Colonnois, he determined to gather together all his forces at Valmonton, more to looke to the defence of the countrey if anie stirre or emotion were made on Napless side, then with hope to be able to do any thing of importance: for the which he was blamed much of the Pope, who at a time when his device was to inuade the kingdome of Naples, and afterwardes when he called into Rome the regiments for his defence, wished to be sent thither V wells & John de Medicis, two Captains, who as they were conjoyned together by amitie & alliance, fo by a naturall correspondencie of complexion, the flownesse and coldnesse of the one seemed sufficient both to ballance and temper and also to be ballanced and tempered of the valor and forwardnes of the other. But destine drawing to a sodaine death in Lumbardy John de Medicis, and the Pope by the counsell of his Lieutenant feruing his turne in the meane while of Vitelly in leffer things, had deferred to call John de Medicis vntill either there were a greater necessity of him, or else he taried for an offer & occasion of some more worthie enterptife: wherein his reason to forbeare so long to call lohn de Medicis, was, that he would not deprive the armie that was in Lumbardy of a perionage of so many merites & good parts, who by his resolution and forwardnesse gaue no little terrour to his enemies, and by his vertue and prouidence did much affure hisfriends. And one inducement helping to his stay and abiding, was the rumor which by relation of espials redoubled daily, of the descending of the Lanceknights for the Enperour, whose comming joyned to the aduettisements that ran of the Spanish Nauieto be vpon the point to depart out of the port of Carthage, constrained the Pope (being withall veged by many of the Confederates, and by his owne counsellers) to deuise, contrarie to his meaning alwayes before, to make some composition with the Duke of Ferrara: not so much to fland affured of his conspiracies & emotions, as to draw from him some great quantitie of money, & to induce him to go to the armie as Captaine general of all the League. Wherein after he had many times dealt with Mathem Cafella the Dukes Embassadour resident with him, who affured him that in the Duke was no want of inclination that way : he fent to his Lieutenant Guicciardin, who was then at Parma, to go to Ferrara, furnishing him with a commission very large in apparance, but indeed full of restraints and limitations, for that he would have him consent to render to the Duke of Ferrara the townes of Modena and Reggia, and he to pay in recompence and counterchange, in a verie short time, two hundred thousand duckets: To binde the Duke to declare and protest openly, and to go to the armie as Captaine generall of the League: That his eldest sonne should take in mariage Catherine the daughter of Lawrence de Medicis: That there should labor be made to giue one of the Dukes daughters in mariage to Hippolito de Medicus sonne of Iulian, with a conucnient dowrie. Manie other conditions were annexed to this comission, which for that by their owne varietie and for the shortnesse of the time, were almost impossible to be decided, yet the Pope notwithstanding he condiscended not to them but by a last necessitie, yet he charged him not to passethe accord, nor to grow to absolute conclusion, till he had from him new directions and other instructions. But not long after he enlarged his commission, as well for regard of the conditions, as for authoritie and power to conclude. The reason of this amplification was, that he had received credible advertisement, how the Viceroz of Naples was arrived with two and thirtie thips in the gulfe of Saint Florent in Corfika, and had brought with him three hundred horse, two thousand Launceknights, and three or source thousand Spamiards footemen. But now the Popes will and working was to litle purpole, for that a gentleman of the Duke of Ferraraes being with the Viceroy, who with great diligence was dispatched from the place about aid, did not onely fignifie to the Duke the comming of the armie by fea, but also he caried vnto him from the Emperour, the inuestiture of Modena and Reggia, with words of promise of the next mariage of Ladie Atargarue d'Austrich bastard daughter to the Empetour, with Hercules eldest sonne to the Duke. By reason of which aductissements, the Duke, who before expected with great defire the comming of the Lieutenant, began now under the accident of this occasion to chaunge counsell: and discerning both by the approch of the Launceknights and descending of the armie by sea, some good fortune to begin to follow the Emperours affaires, he failed not to embrace the oportunitie to follow the streame, & in that variation of mind fent a Counseller of his called lames Aluator to fignifie to the Popes Lieutenant, who being gone

from Parma was then at Centa, the expedition he had received out of Spaine: by the which albeit he was not bound to declare himselfe neither against the Pope, nor against the League, yet for that he had received fo great a benefite by the Emperour, it was not reasonable he should entertaine any further practile against him. In which regard, the negociation for the which he went to Ferrara being dissolved, he thought good to give him figuification of it, to the end not to give the Pope by his filence any just cause of discontentment against him. Neuerthelesse he would not forbid him to come to Ferrara, but left it referred to his good differetion. The Lieutenant differned manifeltly by this relation that it would be in vaine for him to go on to Ferrara: in which respect, joyning withall the interest of the Popes reputation, to follow a voyage wherin was so small hope of frute, and being also called backe by the necessitie of the affaires of Lumbardy, he gaue place to the operation of the time, and returned immediatly to Orlodena, after he had (not with-Itanding) preferred in other forme new folicitations of accord, the rather for that the state of the Church on that fide grew daily reduced into farre greater daungers: for that George Fronspergh with his armie of Launceknights containing thirteene or fourteene thousand, taking their way by the vale of Sabio, and so passing by the rocke of Anfo towards Salo, were now conseto Chastelion vpon the confines of Mantua. The Duke of Vrbin not many dayes before to be the more readie to encounter the Launceknights, had led the armie of the League to Vawry vpon the river of Adda, betweene Trezza and Cassan, and there had erected a bridge and fortified his campe: and Duke of Vrbin leaving at Vawry the Marquis of Saluffa with the French bands, the Swiffers, the Grifons, and his owne footemen, he departed himselfe from Vanry the nineteenth of Nouember, leading with him John de Medicis, fixe hundred men at armes, many cornets of light horsemen, and eight or nine thousand sootmen. His intention was not to set vpon them directly in the plaine field, but to vexe them with incommodities, and cut off rheir releefes and victuals, alleaging that the onely way to vanquish men of that humour, was to drive them to fallinto some disorder, which being wel obferued and applied, would do them greater domage then a manifest inuasion. In which mind the one and twentieth day he arrived at Sonzin, from whence he caused to advance forward Mercurso with all the light horsemen and a band of men at armes, & they to intangle the enemie with skirmish whilest the whole armie might have time to overtake them. The reason of that advauncing of the light horsemen and hastie marching of the armie after, was, for that he feared he should come verie late, being lodged the fame day at Cauriano: by which occasion excusing himselfe of his long tarying at Vawry, he layed the fault vpon the negligence and couetousnesse of the treafurer Pifant, through whose fault the campe was constrained to remaine there a day or two more, tarying for the oxen that should draw the artilleries: of which fault he alleaged afterwards did proceed a verie great disorder, extending almost to the ruine of the whole enterprise. Vntill that time there was great doubt what way the Launceknights would take, for that at first it was beleeued they would draw towards Adda by Bressia and Bergama, with purpose to be niet by the bands Imperiall, and fo to go with them to Alllan: and afterwards it was supposed that they would passe the river of Pan at Casalmaior, & from thence would take their orderly march to Millan: but being come the two and twentieth day to Rivolto within eight miles of Mantua betweene the riners of Minceo & Oglio, the Duke of Vrbin lodging the same day at Prato Albuino, it was knowne (for that they passed not Minceo at Goito) that they would go on to passe Pam rather at Bourg fort or Viadana then at Oftia or in the places more lower: but passing at Oftia, it was a manifelt figne that they would take the way of Modena and Bolognia, in both which places there was made leavies of footemen and other provisions. Afterwards the Launceknights tooke the way of Bourgfort the xxiiij.day, whither, because they had no artilleries, the Duke of Ferrara fent them foure falconets by the river of Pam, which though of it felfe was but a very flender fuecour, yet it was verie profitable to the feruice by the benefite of fortune : for, as the Duke of Vrbin in following them was entred within the straite of Mantua, within the which they were as yet: fo in their approching to Bourgfort, John de Medicis made after the with his light horsmen to charge them upon the taile, though with no reason or hope to do any great matter: and as he accoasted them verieneare, not knowing that they had anie artilleries, his destinie led him on in that secure resolution to the daunger of his life, for that with the second shot of one of those Falconets, his legge was broken a little aboue the knee, from whence being earled wounded to Mantua, he ended his life there within few dayes after, to the great prejudice of the enterprise, fince the enemies

goeth against the Laceknights of George Fro-Spergh.

neuer flood in feare of any mans armes or valour, then of his: for notwithstanding he had but xxij. yeares of age, and by that disposition of youth was full of heate and forwardnesse, yer his experience and vertue subdued to moderation and temperance the rage of nature and youth, and daily ranged to good order and discretion, those violent humors which through the intemperancie of his youth tooke libertie to stirre in him: and by the tokens of industrie and wisdome appearing more and more in him, he caried an affured expectation to become in time a Captaine most sufficient and accomplished in all things concerning the science of warre. After this the Launceknights without any impediment drewe along the river of Paw to Oftia, the Duke of Vrbin being at Bourgfort: and having passed over Paw at Offia the eight and twentieth day, they encamped at Rouero, where the Duke of Ferrara lent them a certaine releefe of money, and furnished them with some field peeces. But the inhabitants of Bolognia and all Tuscane began to be verie fearful, for that the Duke of Prbin, notwithstanding he had assured before, that if the enemies passed the river of Pam he would do the like, was gone to Mantua, faying he would tarie in that place for a commission from the Senate of Venice, to direct him whether he should passe Paw or not. But the Launceknights after they had passed the river of Secchia, turned to the way of Lumbardy to joyne with the companies that were within Millan.

At which time the Viceroy, who was departed from Corfika with fine and twentie veffels (for Encounter of two of his thips were perished in a storme before he came to S. Florent, and five others were separ the Nanie of rate from the Name abiding their fortune) encountred aboue Seftria in the Leuant, the Namy of the Emperour the League, which contained fixe gallies of the French, flue of the Popes & flue of the Venetians: with the fleete and being grappled together aboue Codemont, they fought from two of the clocke till night: in of the Confewhich conflict it is written by Andrew Dore that he funke one of their ships wherein were more then three hundred men, and did many other great domages to the whole fleete with his artilleries. He wrote also, that for the stormic season the gallies were constrained to retire under the hill of Portofino, expecting the same night the other gallies that were at Portonenere. But whether they came or not, he wrote that you the appearing of the day they would go feeke the enemie: neuerthelesse albeit they followed the fleete to Lyuorno, yet they could neuer ouertake it, for the way they had wonne afore them, by which occasion beleeuing that the fleete had run vp either into Corfo or into Sardignia, they were so much the lesse readie in diligence to follow it. Afterwards the Viceroy followed his way, but so shaken with stormes and tempests, that his ships were dispersed, whereof one of them commaunded by Don Ferrand de Gonsaguo, was driven into Sicile, which afterwards came to Casetta, where were fet on land certaine Launceknights. But touching himselfe, he arrived with the residue of the nauleat the port of Saint Stephen, from whence for that he was vncertaine in what condition or termes stood the affaires, he sent to the Pope at Rome the Commaunder Pignalofo, with commissions expressing the good intentions of the Emperour: and after the rage of the fea was abated, he failed with his Nauie to Casetta.

In this meane while the Lanceknights after they had passed the river of Seechia & were drawne towards Razzolo and Gonfaguo, lodged the third day of December at Guaftallo, and the fourth day at Newcastel and Powy which is ten miles from Parma. There the Prince of Orenge came to The prince of them, passing from Mantua with two companions in the habite of a simple harquebuzier. The Orenge with fift day after they had passed the river of Lenze about the bridge and the high way, they lodged the Launceat Montchiarucolo, the Duke of Vrbin remaining yet at Manina with his wife, and was not tou- knight. ched with the present daunger of the affaires. The seuenth day after they had passed the river beyond Parma, they beltowed themselves in the villages of Felina. At that time the raines fel great and thicke, whereby the rivers swelled high and brode, and Captaine George by the relation of his letters written to the Duke of Burbon and jurprifed by espiall, shewed himselfe verie irresolute what course to take. The eleventh day they passed the river of Taro, and the day following they lodged at the borough Saine Donin, where they exercised their malice against holy reliks and images of Saints. The xiij.day they encamped at Firenzolo, from whence as was discerned by surprising of letters, they solicited the bands of Millanto come and ioyne with the, who albeit were agreeing with them in the fame defire, yet they were retained by want of money: for the penurie of the Spannards carying them into mindes infolent and disobedient, made them bold to say that they would not depart out of Mullan, vnlesse they were satisfied of their old payes, and in that disorder they began to sacke and spoile. But at last to stoppe the course of so daungerous

a mutinie, the industrie of the Captaines reappeased the angrie minds of the souldiers, who were contented to receive onely five payes, which to furnish and accomplish, they were driven to dispoile the Churches of their plate, and to imprison many Citizens: wherein the better to containe the wholein safetie, such of the souldiers as were payd the Captaines sent to Pauia, though with very great difficultie, for that they were loth to leave the place where they had lived with to great libertie. And because the action of these things would require sometime, the Captaines in the meane while fent beyond Paw certaine bands of horfemen and footenien Italians to joyne with the Launceknights. And albeit the Popes Lieutenant had made instance, that the Duke of Wrbin for the better furctie of the estate of the Church, would passe the river of Paw on that side with the Venetian regiments: yet the Duke had not onely deferred to passe, alleaging sometimes that he expected the will and resolution of the Venetians, and sometimes temporifing vpon other causes and reasons, but also he gave fignification to the Senate, that if he should leade the armie ouer the river of Pan, there would be daunger least the Imperials would inuade their chares : for which allegation holding more upon feare then good reason of warre, he received straite charge from them, not to passe the river. And he had also in that regard retained manie dayes the bands of footemen that were under the commaundement of lohn de Medicis, whom the Lieutenant had vehemently folicited to passe Paw for the defence of the affaires of the Church. And whereas the Marquis of Saluffa had passed the river of Adda, of whom the Lieutenant had required fuccours, as well to affure the things of the Church, as for that by the great diminution of the Smiffers and Grefons, he faw himselfe not strong enough at Vawry. Now the Venetians who before had consented that the Marquis should passe Paw to the succours of the Pope with tenne thousand societies, both Swiffers and of his owne people, who were payed with the fortie thoufand duckets allotted to the French king, befought the Duke of Orbin that they might not be ledouer the river, being thereunto moved and induced by the perswasions of the sayd Duke. By reason whereof the Duke sending him word that he would conferre with him at Sonzin, deferred his comming to long, that the Marquis went his way. Wherein fuch was either his negligence of the affaires, or his timerous condition, that he did not onely all he could to make him to flay, to the ende to behold with better eye what the Launceknights would do, but also he made manifelt perswafions to him not to passe at all; an occasion that somewhat stayed him in the expedition, as also that the payes of the Swiffers were not readie, who were payed after the rate of fixe thousand, and were intrueth but soure thousand. And albeit for that impediment he deferred to passe vntill the seuen and twentieth of December, yet he sent abroad into diverse places of the countrey, the French horsemen with certaine bandes of sootemen, to stop the passage of victuals to the Launceknights, who had now remained manie dayes at Firenzola: for that feruice also was sent Guido Vaine to the borough of Saint Domin with an hundred light horsemen: and Paule Lusasquo came out of Plaisance with a good troupe of horsemen, and drew neare to Firenzola, from which place one part of the Launceknights went to lodge at the borough of Arque for the more commoditie of victuals. For feare of the faid Launcknights Plaisance had bene refurnished before, but not with so sufficient forces as were thought convenient for the defence of the place, for that the Popes Lieutenant, who had alwayes feared fince the comming of the Launceknights, least the difficulties to aduaunce their expeditions in Lumbardy, would not force the Imperials to paffe into Tuscane, wished that they would desire to go encampe before Plassance: for which reason vnknowneto all men, yea cuen to the Pope himselfe, he so deferred to furnish Plaisance, that they might dispaire to be able to take it: and yet he manned it and fortified it in fuch fort as they could not eafily carie it, leaving this hope, that if they went thither he could not lacke meane to refcue it. But by the long abode which the Launceknights made in the places thereabout, & the vniuerfall exclamations of all men touching the daunger, least that Citie should be taken, he was driuen to suffer Guido R angon to go thither with a great companie of fouldiers, like as also according to the direction of the Venetians, who had promised to send thither for garrison a thousand footmen to succour the Popes necessitie, Nabbon de Naldo one of their Captaines, was dispatched thither with a regiment of a thousand sootemen: but because they were ill payed, they were immediatly diminished to sourchundred. At last the Marquis of Salussa passed the river, who in true muster and computation had not in his armic about four thousand Swiffers and Grisons, and three thousand sootemen of his owne:

and being come to Pulesma, notwithstanding he was defired not to depart from thence, the better to vexethe Launceknights who were at Firenzola, whither Lufafquo made incursions many times even up to their lodgings, yet for his better furctie he went up to Torricella and Siffa. But amid these marchings and remouings of fouldiers and regiments, the Launcknights within two dayes after brake vp from Firenzola, and went to Carpineita and the places thereabouts. Neither was it knowne what courfethe Duke of Burbon would take, whether he would plant his campe before Plassance being come out of Millan, or whether he would paffe further in the expedition of Tu/cane. Afterwards the Launceknights passed the river of Nuro the last day of the yeare, to the end to passe afterwards the river of Trebia, and to tarie for the Duke of Burbon in that place, which was least subject to the incursions of the enemie.

Thus the affaires of Lombardy proceeded in a flow course, not so much for the season of the yeare which was sharpe and full of incommodities, as for the difficulties which the Duke of ${\it Bur}$ bon had to pay his fouldiers, wherein refled not the leaft impediments to the good fortune and felicitie of the warre. The wretched people of Millan were wonderfully trauelled for provision of money: in which necessitie or rather tyrannie, lerome Atoron being condemned to death, compounded the night before he should suffer, to pay twentie thousand duckets, for the which it seemed they had passed him to sentence of death. But after the releefe of his purse had anoyded the daunger of his life, and under the same good meane his person was deliuered out of prison, such Ierome Moron was the course of his destinie working instrumentally by the dexteritie of his spirite and wit, that ont of prison. of a prisoner to the Duke of Burbon, he became his counseller, and within short time he went on by the operation of his wir, till he became almost his onely governour and directour.

Neuerthelesse amid all these variations and vexations the treatises of truce or peace were great betweene the Pope and the Viceroy, though in good meaning the plots and purposes of the Viceroy tended rather to make warre, wherein he was fet on by the incitation of the Colomois, who had breathed into him a new life fince he came to Caietta, and also because he understood that the Pope no lesse abated in courage then naked in money, found nothing so sweete as the desire of peace: wherein both publishing to all the world his pouertie and his feare, and in his confusion refuting to create Cardinals for money according to the counsell that was given him, the demonstrations he made of his owne weakenesse, gaue courage and hope to whom so ever would offend him. For, as the Pope not entring into the warre with that constancie of mind that appertained, had sent to the Emperour a letter the xxvj. of Iune, containing matter bitter and ful of complaints, that he drough him by necessitie to intend to the warre: fo also fearing afterwardes least by the tharpe phrases of that letter he might further incense the Emperour whom he so much seared, he fent after another expedition, compounded of an humour more temperate and reformed, charging his Nuncio to retaine the first, which neverthelesse was delivered for that it came first to his hands: the other was prefented afterwards, but the Emperour under one expedition auniwered them both feuerally, according to the argument and nature of matter they contained. Moreouer the Pope had readily hearkened to the Generall of Grayfrears, who going into Spaine at such time as the warre began, was charged by him to deliuer to the Emperour embaffages mild and full of amitic: and being eftfoones returned to Rome by commission of the Emperor, he brought many reports and informations touching his good intention, and how he would be content to come into Italy with a traine of five thousand men, and from thence after he had taken the Crowne of the Empire, he would passe into Germany to set downe some forme to the matters of Luther. without speaking aniething of the Councell: That he was also well inclined to accord with the Venetians under reasonable conditions: That he would referre the cause of Frauncis Sforce to the arbitration of two Judges affigned by the Pope and him, and in case he were condemned, he would bestow that estate ypon the Duke of Burbon: That he would reuoke his armie out of Italy, so farre foorth as the Pope and Venetians would pay three hundred thousand crownes to fatisfie the wages of the army, which not withstanding he would labour to make contented with a fumme more moderate: That he would restore to the French king his children, receiving in counterchange two millions of gold at two or more termes: He shewed also that it would be easie to accord with the king of England, both for that the fumme that was in question was not great, and also the king had made offer of it. And the better to debate & work these matters, the Generall of Grayfrears offered a truce for viij.or x.moneths, protesting that he had warrants and commissions from the Emperour very large and absolute, wherein all power of negociation and conclusion was given to him, to the Viceroy, and to Don Hugo. In regard of which authority, and good inclination of the Emperour, the Pope, after he had given audience to Pignalofo, and had received advertisement that the Viceroy was gone out of the port of S. Stephen, fent the generall to Caietta to treat ypon these matters with him: whereunto he was the rather induced, for that both the Venetians would not refuse the truce if the French king would consent, who for his part was not far estranged from it, and his mother had sent to Rome Laurence Tuskane declaring an inclination to peace, wherin should be a generall comprehension of all men. And also for that he thought no practife to be fure without the will and concurrency of the Duke of Eurbon, he fent to himin that behalfe one of his owne Amners that was at Rome, whom the Duke returned eltsoones to the Pope to folicite the same matter; and yet neither to loofe the oportunity of the time, nor to abandon the prouifions for the warre, he fent Cardinal Augustine Triunles as Legate to the armie, which was then in the field, and continuing also his preparations to inuade the Realme of Naples Peter Nauarre ariued the third of Deember at Civitanecchia with a Nauie of xxviij gallies of the Popes, the French, and the Venetians: at which time also Range de Cere being sent for the french king for the expedition intended upon Naples, was ariued at Sanonna with a fleete of failes quartered. On the other fide Askanio Colonno with a strengh of two thousand footemen and three hundred horsemen, came to Valbon fifteene miles from Tiboli, where are the lands of the Abbot of Farfa and John Jordan: with these forces the twelfth of December he tooke Cepperano, finding no refistance for that it was not garded. Vitelly with the Popes companies reduced himselse betweene Tiboly, Palestime, and Velletre. Asterwardes the Colonnois tooke Pontecorne which was not garded, and in vaine gaue affault to Scarpa, which is a litle and weake place depending vponthe Abbey of Farfa. Cafar Filettinapproched by night to Alagnia with fifteene hundred footmen, of which fine hundred making their entric fecretly, by the fauour of a house ioyning to the walles, and by the practife of certaine of the towns finen that received them, were repulsed and driven out againe by Lion de Fano commander of the sootmen that were there. In this meane while the generall of Grayfrears returned from the Viceroy to the Pope, to whom he related the Viceroyes inclination to confent to the truce for certaine moneths, to the end that in the meane while the peace might take course; onely he stood upon demaunds of money, and for fureric he required the Castells of Oftia and Countaneechia. But of the contrary to him, the archbishop of Capua arining at Caietta after he was departed, and who happly had bene sent thither with an ill counfell of the Pope, wrote to him that the Viceroy rejecting all motions to truce, was contented to make peace with the Pope onely, or with the Pope and Venetians joyntly, so far forth as they would make payment of money to the end to maintaine the army for affurance of the peace, and afterwards to debate in the matter of the truce with the others; an alteration mouing either by the variation or chaunge of the Viceroy, or haply by the persuasions of the Archbishop as many suspected. At which time Paul d'Arezze being come to the Emperours Court with authoritie from the Pope, the Venetians and Francis Sforce, whither also went by the motion of the king of England for the negociation of peace the Auditor of the Chamber, the rather for that before were come thither full commissions from the french king; he found the Emperour wholy changed both in mind and will, taking the reason of his alteration vpon an adverssement he had received of the army of the Launceknights, and of his Navie in Italy. In so much as enforcing the fauor of that good advantage, he fled from all the conditions that were fet downe before, and vrged vehemently that the French king should observe absolutely the accord of Madrill, & to have the cause of Francis Sforce heard by law before Judges assigned by himselfe. Thus did both the will and intention of the Emperour vary according to the successe of affaires, like as also his commissions which he sent to his Agents in Italy, bare alwaies by reason of the diltance of the place, either an expresse or filent condition to gouerne themselues according to the variation of times and occasions. Therfore the Viceroy after he had many daies abused the Pope with vaine practifes, and would not fo much as confent to a furceance of armes for a few daiestill the negociation might fort to some issue, brake vp from Naples the xx. of December to go into the states of the Church, in which wilfulnesse he offred many new and very strange conditions of accord.

But to returne to the last day of the yeare, wherein the Launceknights (as we have said) passed the river of Nure: the same day also the Duke of Ferrara, by the meane of his Embassadour, Capitalianions capitulated with the Vicer oy and Don Hugo who had commission from the Emperour. Neuer-betweene the theleffe the capitulation was made with a veric finall liking of that Embaffadour, for that he was Emperour and almost constrained to consent by the threats and sude words of the Everyor The articles of the of Feralmost constrained to consent by the threats and rude words of the Viceroy. The articles of the ca- 1410 pitulation were these: That the Duke of Ferrara should be bound as well in his person as in his estates, to serue the Emperour against all his enemies: That he should be Captaine general for the Emperour in Italy, with a companie of an hundred men at armes and two hundred light horsemen, only he should assemble and leavie them at his owne charges, and teccine againe allowance in his accounts: That he should presently receive the towns of Carpy and the Castell of None which had appertained to Albert Pio, for the dowrie of the Emperours bastard daughter promised to his sonne, onely the reuenues should be answered in account of the souldiers, a compenfation to be made untill the confummation of the mariage: And that Vefpatian Colomo and the Marquis of Guaft should disclaime and renounce the rights which they pretended to them: That he should pay the summe of two hundred thousand duckets when he had recovered Modena: but out of that should be deducted that which he had given to the Viceroy since the battell of Pania; That if he did not recour Modena, all the fummes of money which he had before disburfed. should be effloores repayed to him: That the Emperour should be bound to his protection, and not to make peace without comprehending him, and not without obtaining for him of the Pope, absolution of the paines and censures which he had incurred euer since he was declared confederate to the Emperour: And lastly that he should vse all his meanes and authoritic to the Pope to absolue him of all those penalties and transgressions which he had run into before. Thus in the end of the yeare 1526. all things prepared and tended to a manifest and open warre.

Ow ensueth the yeare of our Lord 1527.a yeare prepared to many hard cuents and accidents, such as for their cruckie were full of feare and danger, and for their straungenesse, had no example or experience with the worlds and ages before. For in the predictions of this yeare was expressed and consustance of elates, of fed an vniuerial stace of troubles and consustance, of mutation of estates, of a generall visitation of the plague, yea through all the regions & climates of stady, there was no apparance not contemplation of other thing then of bloud, death, famine and flying; a condition lamentable even to forreiners and fraungers that did but heare of it, but most intollerable to those miserable wretches vpon whose neckes the law of destinie had drawne so grieuous a yoke. To these calamities there was no other thing that stayed the action of beginning, but the difficulties which the Duke of

The Duke of Burbon goeth out of Millan and leaueth there Antho. de Leua Burbon found to make the regiments of Spanish footmen to depart out of Millan: for where he had determined that Anthony de Lena should abide there for the defence of the whole Duchie, and retaine with him all those bands of Launceknights which were there before, for whose entertainments and paies were confirmed both all the monies exacted at times vpon the Millannois,& also such other summes as were leavied by the billes of exchange which the Duke of Burbon brought from Spaine. And where he had also appointed to remaine with the said Lena for the seruice of the Duchie, a strength of twelue hundred footmen Spaniards, together with some bands of Italian footmen under the leading of Lodowike Belliense and other commanders : so likewise by their example all the other bands and regiments of fouldiers, for that they had in pray the houses, the wives, and daughters of the inhabitants of Millan, were not discontented to line still in that estate of licentious liberty: but for that both for the necessitie of the present service, & regard of their proper honor, and lastly for the awe and authoritic of the Duke of Burbon, they could not directly refuse the appointment, they demaunded at least to be satisfied before they departed of their paies due to them before that day. Neuerthelesse what by the force of reasons and perswasions, and what by the example of some particulars inducing the refidue by their good inclination, they promised at last to follow the Duke, so farre forth as he would pay them fine paies; a condition very hard to accomplish and furnish, for that there was no possibilitie to make any more leauies of money of the inhabitants of Millan, neither by way of rigor or threatnings, nor by facking their houses, nor by imprisoning their persons. Besides, in that estate of extreme violence and oppression, fuch as were abfent and had abandoned the towne, were adiorned and taxed at rates to nourish the armie, and those that your sommons refused to appeare, their goods by sentence were given to the fouldiers.

At last both by the industrie of the Duke and the extremitie of the time, all these difficulties were ouercome, and the Imperialles, called on both by the necessitie of the service, and hazard of the whole warre, passed ouer the river of Pam the last daie saue one of Ianuarie. The day after one parte of the Launceknights who before had passed ouer the river of Trebia, repassed it againe and went to lodge at Pontenouo, and the refidue of the armie staied beyond Plaisance. On the other fide, the Marquis of Saluffa, who had all his regiments and bands of fouldiers dispersed in the countrie, was at Parma; and the Duke of Vrbin being now come to Casalmaior, and to whose opinion and election the Venetians had referred to passe or not passe the river of Pam, began to passe his companies, assuring the armie that if the Imperialles tooke the way of Tuskane according to the aduertisements he had received from Millan, that both he would passe in perfon with 600, men at armes, 9000, footmen, and 500, light horfemen, and through his celeritie would be before them at Bolognia; and also the Marquis of Saluffa should do the like with his regiments and the bands of the Church. The armie Imperial! Haied about twenty dayes the one halfe on this fide, and the other halfe beyond Plausance; a matter happening partly through the difficultie of monie, the Launceknights not having received till that daie one penie of the Duke of Burbon: and partly by a defire he had to plant his campe before Plasfance, though haply more for the difficulties he found to passe further then for anie other matter. Wherein the better to aduaunce his intention for the befreging of Plaisance, he solicited the Duke of Ferrara to furnish him with powder and artilleties, and to come & joyne his person with the armie, offering to send out to meete him five hundred men at armes, and Captaine George with fixe thousand footmen. To this demaund the Duke of Ferrara made answer, that he could not with anic safetic send powder through the countrie of the enemie, for that it could not be without manifest danger of interception: and that he could not without apparant hazard of his person, joyne him selfe with him, for that all the companies of the league lay in the wayes of his passage: but be it there were safety and facilitie in both those wayes, yet he wished the Duke of Burbon to consider that he could not do a thing more commodious for the enemie, nor more agreeable to their defires, then to stand temporifing and lofe time about the action of those townes one after another: 'that if he tooke not Plaifance, wherein the doubt was greater then the hope, or if he did take it, the action whereof would deuour a great deale of time, he was to looke how farre it would concerne his reputation, and with what meanes he were able to purfue the warre having so great wantes of monie and other prouisions: Lattlie he told him that the way to aduaunce the benefite of the

Emperour and to establish the victorie, was to draw and addresse himselfe to the head, and casting behind him all other enterprises, to march with celerity to Bolognia, and there to determine either to force that towne (in which enterprise he could not want succors) or at least to passe on either to Florence or to Rome.

But during the counsell and expedition of these matters, together with the deuises the Duke of Burbon vsed to get monie, both to make vp the full pay of the Spanish souldiers and to give some reliefe to the Launceknights, amongst whome at their departing from Plaisance he distributed two crownesto euerie man. The warre went on, and was strongly kindled in the estate of the Church: for Range de Cere at his returne from France was newly gone to the campe Ecclefiastike, which campe lay very neare to the Viceroy who was then you the confines of Cepperana, where certaine bands of Italian footmen gaue an ouerthrow to three hundred men of the Spanish footmen. But the counselles and opinions of men were diverse touching the maner how to defend the flate Ecclefiastike: for as Vitelly before the comming of Ranse, had counselled the Continuation Pope to abandon the province of Campagnia, and to bestow two thousand sootmen within Ty- of the Warre woly, and two thousand within Pullsstrina, and the residue of the armic to remaine at Villetra to state Excless-Rop the Viceroy for going to Rome: fo Ranse arising even upon the point of this resolution, re-file. proved the councell to remaine and be inclosed within Villetra, both for the great and large circuit of the towne, the many impediments and incommodities to fortifie it, and laftly for the vnaptnesse & many inconveniences it bare to stop the passage of the enemies: but his opinion wasto have the armie holden within Ferentin, where by reason they should not be tied to the garding offo many places, it fould be more strong and full, befides also that the place gaue good oportunity to hinder the enemies for palling further. This counsell was approved and holden for good, and according to the reasons and directions of it, they bestowed within Frusolone a principall towne of Campagnia and within five miles of Ferentin, a garrison of eighteene hundred sootmen of the regiments of John de Medicis, who for the most part were called by the name of the blacke bandes : and thither were also fent Alexander Vitelly, John Baptista Sauella, and Peter Biraguo, commanders ouer light horsemen.

But in this meane while the familie of the Colonnois had fecretly conspired with Napoleon Vrfin Abbot of Farfa, and had induced him to take armes in the towne of Rome as fouldier to the Emperour. But the Pope having advertisement of the whole practise, which he did diffemble with the same suttlety which he found it out withall, found meane to send the Abbot, who had received monic of him before, to incete Monsicur Vaudemont the Duke of Lorraines brother, whom the French king fent to him to fauor the enterprise of Naples: and by the Popes direction the Abbot was apprehended neare to Pracciano, and lent prisoner to the castle S. Angeo. The Pope was all this while in no small thought to make prouision of monie, wherein imploring the aide of other princes, he received of new from the king of England a supply of thirtie thoufand duckets which the Lord Ruffelthis Chamberlaine brought vnto him: and with him came Monsieur de Rabandanges with ten thousand crowns sent to him by the French king vpon the benefite of the tenthes which the Pope had accorded to him by necessitie and compulsion, under this promife notwithstanding, that besidesthe payments of the fortie thousand crowns which he gaue to the league, and twenty thousand which he contributed to the Pope for eucry moneth, he should presently minister to him thirtie thousand duckets, and within a moneth thirtie thoufand more. The king of England gaue commission also to the Lord Russellto signific to the Viceroy and the Duke of Burbon, a surscance of armes, to the end to give sufferance and time to treate a peace, the practife and negociation wherof according to the Emperors will, was holden in England: and if the Vicerey would not condiffeed to it, then to denounce against him warre. It feemed by this readines and many other apparances, that the king of England vudera defire to marry his daughter with the French king, was well inclined to the confederates and fauoured their cause, and in that good inclination he promised that assoone as the mariage were established, to enter into the league and beginne the warre in Flaunders. It seemed also he was particularly dispofed to do pleasure to the Pope: but there could be no great expectation of ready remedies from a Prince who both measured not well the present conditions of Italy, nor stood firme and resolute in his purposes, beeing still labored and retired by the hope which the Emperour gaue him to committo him the working and arbitration of the peace, notwithflanding the effects were in nothing correspondent to the semblances and shewes he made: for when the Auditor of the Chamber was with him for that matter, albeit the Emperour did what he could to perfwade him in many fortes that fuch was his intention: yet for that he expected some euents from Italy since the descending of the Launceknights, and the ariual of his Nauie at sea, whereos he had received some advertisement, he forbare to give him an answere assured and certaine, taking his excuse vpon the warrants and commissions of the Cosederates, as though they were not sufficient.

But the accord which the Pope folicited continually with the Viceroy, hurt him not a litle with the Confederats, both for that they flood alwaies in care leaft he would resolue and compound with him: and also the French king and the Vinetians made this judgement, that all the expences and defraiments which they should make to support him, would be almost vnprofitable. This judgement and suspition tooke increasing by certaine degrees of vehement feares which were discerned in him, together with the lamentable protestations he made daily that he was no more able to susfainly his natural obstinacy, and would not make Cardinalles for monie, nor relecue himselfe in so great necessities and amid so manie dangers of the Church, with those means which other Popes had wont to vie, yea cuen in the atchieuing of their vniust and ambitious enterprises. In which regard, the French king and the Vinetians, to be the better prepared andreadie in all accidents, were essentially bound tomake no accord with the Emperour, the one without the other: and the French king for that cause, and for the great hope which the king of England gaue to raise together with him (in case the mariage went forward) great emotions in the spring following, became more negligent and lesse careful of the dangers of traly.

In this time the Viceroy who folicited an inualion yponthe Church states, dispatched a regiment of two thousand Spanish footmen, to affault a small Castle of Stephen Colonno, where the valour of the defendants made that enterprise in vaine. And because the Viceroy came on and advanced, the Ecclesiastikes referred to another time to execute the resolution taken to batter the Popes rocke, the garrifons of which place had furprifed the Callle Gandolfo but weakely manned, and at that time holden by the Cardinall de Monte. At last the Viceroy, after he had affembled into one strength twelue thousand footmen, all bodies commanded and trained fauing the Spaniards and Launceknights that were come with him by sca, encamped with his wholearmie the xxix. of Ianuarie before Frufolone, a towne weake and without walles, fauling that the houses of some particulars serue as a wall, and within the which the Captaines of the Church had bestowed garrison, because they would leave him no sooting nor entrie into Campagnia. To the weaknes of this place was joined a great necessitie and want of victuals: and yet the situation of the towne standing your a hill, giveth alwaies to the inhabitants good meane and oportunity to faue themselves on one side, for that it bearetha certaine benefite of rescue and backing; a matter which gaue a great resolution to the garrison within to defend it, besides that they were of the best choise of Italians which at that time tooke pay. Moreover the height of the mountaine was no litle impediment to the enemies to do any action upon their artilleries, of which they had planred three demy Cannons and foure Culuerines: only the greatest care of the enemies wasto stoppe as much as they could the entrie of victualles into the towne. On the other side the Pope, who albeit was much impourished for monie, and was more apt to suffer indignity to defire others to relecue him, then to furnish himselfe by meanes extraordinarie, increased his campe as much as he could with bands of footmen payed and trained : and in that incertainty of mind and dealing, he had newly taken into his pay Horacio Baillon, without keeping memorie or observation of the injuries which he had done before to his father, and afterwards to him, whom he had of long holden prisoner within the Castle of S. Angeo as a troubler of the quiet of Perousa. With these supplies of souldiers his armie went on alwaies drawing neare to Ferentin to make there his generall musters, and to give hope of succours to those that were besieged. The batterie of Frusolona was reduced to perfection the xxiiij day, but because it was not such as to give hope to carie the place, there was no affault performed: onely Captaine Alarcon trauelling about the walles was hurt with the blow of a harquebuse, and likewise Maria Vrsin was wounded. One of the principall grounds and hopes of the Viceroy was, that he was not ignorant that the fouldiers within fuffered great scarcitic of victualles, as also the armie that mustered at Ferentin was in the fame extremity: for the fouldiers of the Colonnois which lay within Palicina, Mont fortin, and the Popes Rocke, the onely places which they held, robbed and spoiled all that they found ypon the waics waies, and Ranse going to the armie, having for his eskort and safetie the bands of sootmen of Cuio, they cut them in peeces and made pillage of what they found. Neuerthelesse as every accident of warre is tied to his seuerall euent, and where be made many aduentures there be sundrie issues and fortunes: so it hapned that three hundred footmen issuing out of Frusolone seconded and backed by one part of the horsemen which were led by Alexander Vitelly, John Baptista Sauello, and Peter Biraguo, approched within halfe a mile of Larnato, where were lodged fine enfignes of Spanish footmen: of which they drew two enfignes into an ambush and ouerthrew them, and in the conflict was flaine Captaine Perault with four score footmen, many were made prisoners, and two ensignes wonne and borne away. All this while the Viceroy was buffe in ca-Iting of mines at Frusolone, which for the most part were reversed by countermines made by the defendants, who standing fully affured in their ownevalour, and fearing litle the forces of the enemies, refused the aide of foure hundred footmen whom the Captaines of the armie would have fent thither for their succours. And yet amid all these actions and accidents of warre, the solicitations of accord kept on their course with the same vehemencie they did before: for at this time tations of accord kept on their course with the same vehemencie they did before: for at this time tations of accord kept on their course with the same vehemencie they did before: for at this time tations of accord kept on their course with the same vehemencie they did before: for at this time tations of accord kept on their course with the same vehemencie they did before: for at this time tations of accord kept on their course with the same vehemencie they did before: for at this time tations of accord kept on their course with the same vehemencie they did before: for at this time tations of accord kept on their course with the same vehemencie they did before: for at this time tations of accord kept on their course with the same vehemencie they did before: for at this time tation the same vehemencie they did before the same vehemencie they are the same vehemencie they are the same vehemencie they did before the same vehemencie they are the same vehemencie Cefar Fieromosquo a Neapolitan, whom the Emperour had dispatched to the Pope after the the Emperour Viceroy was departed from Spaine: to him was given full commission to assure the Pope by espe- 10 the Pope. ciall protestation, both how much he was discontented with the action of Dan Huge and the Colomnis upon Rome, together with the accidents that followed, and also to make impression of the Emperours defire and inclination, to compound with him friendly all the controverties and differences that were betweene them. Their expedition bare also, that they should debate upon the peace in his name; a matter which he feemedalfo inclined to accompliff with the other confederates, faying according to the relation of his Nuncio, that if the Pope executed his enterprise to go to Bologma, he would give him full and free power to pronounce it as he thought best. These deputies propounded for the I teeroy a surceance of armes for two or three yeares with the Pope and Venetians, every one retaining still the possessions they enjoyed at the present, and the Pope to pay an hundred and fifty thousand duckets, and the Venetians fifty thousand; a taxation albeit not a litle grieuous to the Pope for the difficulties to leavie it, yet such was his inclination to be deliuered of the trauels of the warre, that the rather to induce the Venetians, he offered to impose vpon himselfe the fiftie thousand duckets rated vpon them: wherin the better to allure their consents, & to expect their answere, he made truce for eight daies with the Viceroz the last of Ianuary, in which it was agreed, that the regiments of the Church should not passe Ferentin, nor the bands of the Viceroy Frusolone, and that as there should be no action executed against the towne, solikewise the towne was forbidden all maner of sortifications and prouisions of victuals, but from one day to an other. Amid which interpoling of the truce, Fieromo (quo thinking he had well founded the intention of the Pope, and could also discouer the meaning of the Emperour without doing wrong to his dignitie, he presented him a long letter written with the Emperours hand, full of his good intention, offers, and denotion towards the Pope. But after he was departed from the Popes prefence, and prepared to go fignific to the Viceroy & the Legate the furceance agreed upon, and to give addresse for the execution of it, the same day he found the armie departed from Ferentin and marching towards Frusolone: he communicated with the Legate all that had passed betweene the Pope and him, who not willing to breake the great hopes which he and his fouldiers had of the victorie, entertained his doings with praise and commendation, and leading him in the abuse of faire words, he sent secret direction to his Captaines not to forbeare to march on. The armie could not come in time to Frusolone, if they wonne not a palfage or way in forme of a bridge lying at the foot of the first hill of Frusolone, and gatded by foure enfignes of Launceknights. But affoone as the vauward came which was commanded by Stephen Colonno, and that they came to hand ftrokes with them, they difordred & put them to flight, after they had made flaughter of 200, and taken 400 prisoners together with their ensignes. And thus the first hill being wonne, the others by that example retired into places more strong, leauing a free and fafe entrie into Frusolone to the Ecclesiastikes, who omitting nothing which either the fauour of their fortune or the oprtunitie of the time gaue them, being now very neare night, pitched their tents and lodgings even at their beards. By the benefit of which action Ranse and Vitelly with whome the Pope was discontented for this enterprise, had great hope to give them lecued would affuredly have fucceeded if they had encamped vpon the hill which was taken, or had bene diligent or carefull to observe the retiring of the enemies: for the Viceroy not the day following but the third day, making no figne nor token that he would dislodge, went away with the armie two or three houres before day, fetting on fire certaine munitions that remained, and left behind him manie bullets and great shot. And albeit the Ecclesiastikes when they knew he was gone, fent out after him their light horsemen, who fell vpon his baggage and tooke a few prisoners of small importance, yet they were not there in sufficient time to do him anie notable hurt: and yet he left behind him one part of his victuals, and retired himselfe to Cesena, and from thence to Cepperano. By reason of this retrait the Pope tooke such courage, concurring also the incitation of the Embassadours of the confederates, whom he could not otherwise satisfie, that he resolved to execute the enterprise of Naples: for Rabandanges who had brought the ten thoufand duckets collected of the tenths, and ten thousand more for the portion of Ranse, had commission not to disburse then without the consent of Albert Pro, Range, and Mosseur de Lange, and that in case they were assured that the Pope would not accord. And touching the Venetians (to whom was gone the Lord Reffell to induce them to accept the truce offred by the Viceroy and approved by the Pope, but by the accident of his legge breaking by the way he fent another to them) they made answere that they would not accept the truce before they were well informed of the French kings will, in which deniall they stood so much the more resolute, by how much they understood that Genes was reduced to great extremities and wants of victuals: so that it was determined to inuade the kingdome of Naples as well by sea as by land: and that Monsieur de inuade Naples. V audemont should be Admirallof the armie by sea, for whose better strength there was addresse giuen to leauie 2000 footmen. But Ranse by whose direction was distributed and expended the monie of the French king, determined contrary to the Popes will (who was of opinion to convert into one place all the forces of that expedition) to dispose 6000 men to enter abruzza: he hoped that by the working of the fonnes of the Count Montoiro who had bene fent thither with 2000 footmen, they should make an easie action ypon Aquila, which accordingly hapned through the feare of Askunio Colonno, who affoone as he heard of their approch, fled from the danger which his timerous condition would not fuffer him to abide. The beginnings and first actions of this enterprise were full of hope and felicitie: for albeit the Viceroy who had bestowed garrisons within the places neare him, was busic to redresse and refurnish his armie as much as he could, yet both for that one part of his regiments was disbanded, and an other part by necessitie bestowed in garrisons, it was thought he would stand dangerously imbarked, and with great difficultie be able to make refistance only to the sea armie. It was beleeved also by the same reason that Range in Abruzza, and the Nauics of the Church and Venetians containing axij. gallies, should find no head made against the, both for that they were resupplied with a strength of three thousand men, and also for the joining of Oratio with two thousand sootmen, together with the Mösseur Vau- person of Monsicur de Vaudemont, who under the auncient rights and claimes of king Rene, pretended to the succession of that kingdome, and at that time managed the place of Lieutenant generall under the Pope. But these matters proceeded very flowly to execution, both for the temporifing of the armie Ecclesiastike not as yet departed from Frusolone, where they taried for the great artilleries that were to come from Rome, & also for the expedition of Abruzza, & the ariual of the sea armie. These impediments and losse of time were also increased by the mutinic of the footmen within Frusolone, who demanded double pay, as a matter wonne and due for the victorie. Neuertheles the eighteenth day of February the soldiers of the Viceroy abandoned Cefena and other places confining, and withdrew themselves to Cepperana: by the oportunitie of whose retrait, the armie Ecclesiastike beginning alreadie to feele the want of victuals, passed Samt Germain, and the Viceroy fearing to put things to hazard, retired to Caietta, and Don Hugo to Naples. All which notwithstanding the Pope pressed still with his wants and necessities of monie, & fearing no leffe the advancing of the Duke of Burbon, against whose armie he saw the Confederates disposed to make no great resistance, continued still his inclination to compound with the Emperour, & in that humor had effloones profecuted the Lord Ruffell to go vp to the Viceroy in the name of his king. Vpon which it followed, that Fieromo (quo returned to Rome the xxj. of February, from whence also the day following he departed, having published his commissions, and

left the Popes mind full of confusion and irresolution. In regard of which perill and the Popes alteration, the Venetians leaft he should rashly intangle himselfe with the accord, made offer to him in the beginning of March, to fend him in readig monie within fifteene daies fifteene thousand duckets, and fifteene thousand more within other fifteene daies, so farforth as he would graunt them a lubiley for all their gouernement. But amid these delayes and temporisings the Popes Nauy and the Venetians, which had with great loffe taried to expect the French fleete, and being Explite of the by rage of weather driven into the lle of Ponjo the three and twentieth of February, fell with the Nam of the Mole of Casetta and facked it: and the fourth day of March having fet on land the footemen at confederates, Pozzolo, returned efficience to the fea, for that they found it in good condition of defence; and fo passing further they discended againe neare to Naples by the river of the borough of Stabbia, where was Diomed Carafa with fine hundred footmen: they caried this borough by affault the third day on that tide of the Mountaine, by whose example the Castell rendred the day after. The tenth day they forced the Greeke tower and Surrenta: and in that violence of victory & fortune, many places on that fide yeelded afterwards upon composition. This fleete also had taken before certaine ships laden with graine for the prouision of Naples which had great neede of them, and for want of them suffered no small vexation, the rather for that the enemy found no impediment ypon the fea, neither was there such order taken as was necessary. In which disorder and want of good direction, the fleete drew fo neare the Mole the fecond day in Lent, that the Castell and the gallies shot at it : year the sootmen came on so fall by land, that with great difficultie the Neapolitanes could retire themselves by the Market gate and it. After this they tooke Salerne, when Vaudemont made after certaine thips, and leaving fonce gallies at Salerne where Oracio was, the Prince of Salerne at the fame time entred within the towne by the way of the Castell with many fouldiers, but he was ouerthrowne by Oracio, in which encounter were flaine more then two hundred footemen and many made priloners. In Abruzza after the Viceroy had delivered out of prison the olde Count of Mentoire to the ende he might recover Aquila, the sayd Count was no fooner fet at liberty by the Viceroy, then was he made prisoner by his owne fons. And Range who tooke the fixt of March Siciliana and Tiallecoussa, went up towards Sora: neuertheleffe, not with standing the fauour of so faire occasions, and the benefite of so many selicities concurring, the fouldiers began the first day of March to abandon the army on land by troupes. and that either for want of victuals, or through negligence in the officers, or at least for the ill prouisions of the Pope.

The negotiations and counfels of the peace continued and kept on their course, and in that a. ction were come to Rome the second of March Fieromosquo and Serenon Secretary to the Viceroy: there they found arrived the day before, Monfieur de Lange, instructed with words and promiles inflicient for the credit of his expedition, but he brought no money, not with flanding they had advertisement out of France, that he was departed both with twenty thousand duckats for the payes of the footemen appointed to ferue in the great ships which were expected at Cinitavecchia, and also that he brought twenty thousand more for the Pope, to helpe to advance the enterprise of the realme of Naples for one of the sonnes of the French king, to whom should be giuen in mariage Catherine de Aledicis daughter to Lawrence and necce to the Pope: for the Catherine de French king repoling much for himselfe in the negotiation of England, and being perlivaded that the Viceror for the disorder of Frusolone could execute nothing, and also that the army Imperiall both for their flownesse to move and march, & for their wants and necessities of mony, would not go at all into Tuscane, would heare no further of the motion of the truce, no though it should be generall and extended to comprehendall, and that he should be acquited from all payments of mony. Wherein albeit his principall intention was, not to give time to the Emperor to reorder and readdresse his forces, yet in regard of his owne nakednesse and pouerty of money, he sent to the Pope no other thing of the xx.thouland duckats which he had promifed monthly, nor of the mony collected of the tenth, then ten thouland duckats: neither had he fent as yet the wages of those bands of footmen appointed to the maine army at fearunning in the common accompts and expences of the Venetians and him. And lastly for that he had defire that there should be no action or enterprise till some conclusion were made with the king of England, he thought it but reasonable that the Pope should temporise and expect till that time. So that the enterprise of Naples begun with so great felicity and hope, went every day diminishing and of lesse expectation, for

as the army by fea which was neither made greater by vessels and shipping, nor stronger with supplies of fouldiers, was not to execute any great action, the rather for that they were to draw out of their maine forces, garrifons of mento defend such places as they tooke: fo the army by land, which for the ill disposition of the time, was not as yet possessed of the victuals that were sent from Rome by fea, did not onely not advance, but also diminishing dayly by new degrees of diforder and penury of victuals, it retired at last to Piperna. Besides, those regiments of sootemen which Ranse led and gouerned, were so diminished for want of money, that Ranse seeing he could not inclose the Viceroy according to the plot he had layd, returned backe to Rome: yealattly the straite negotiation and labor of the accord which the Pope entertained, augmented greatly those disorders: for as it abated the preparations of the Confederates, which of themselves came but flowly on, so on the other side it pushed on the Popes inclination to the accord, wherein he was induced to repose a greater hope in the intention of the Emperour, for the intelligence he had by one of his letters furprised, by which he charged the Viceroy to entertaine and embrace the accord with the Pope, if the estate and condition of his affaires induced him not to take other counfell. But the matter that most stirred and moved him, was, that he saw the Duke of Burbon march and advance continually with the army Imperiall: neither did he differne the resolutions of the Duke of Vrbin to be so constant, nor the provisions of the Venetians so full and forward. as he could be affured of the matters of Tuscane, the feare of which brought no small affliction to him; for as the Imperials lay some of them on this side, and some of them beyond Plaifance, the Duke of Vrbin had chaunged his first opinion, which was to get before them into Bolognia with the Venetian army: and had resolved in his counsell, that assoone as he should be advertised that the enemies would remoue, the army Ecclefiastike leaving good garrison within Parma and Modena, should go to Bologma: and for himselfe, he would march with the Venetian army in the tayle of the enemies, though twenty or thirtie miles from them, for the more furetic of his people. According to which order, when afterwards the enemies would take the way to Romagnia or Tuscane, the whole campe should advance continually, the army Ecclesiastike marching alwaves before with the Marquis of Salussa, leading the French launces, the Swiffers footenen, and his owne, and leaving alwayes garrifons in fuch places as the enemies should passe by after them, and they afterwards to be reassembled and revoked from hand to hand according as the enemie should advance and passe: this counsell the Duke instiffed and followed with many reasons, such as the other Captaines could neither comprehend nor approue. First he alleaged that there was a furety to affemble andioyne all together in the field to ftop the passage of the Imperials: for that it would be a matter either dangerous or vnprofitabe. Touching the danger, he referred it to rest in the fight or battell, for that if the Imperials were not superior in numbers and multitudes, at least they were about them in force and valour; an advantage which would make the victory casic to them. And he proued it unprofitable by this, that if the Imperials would not fight, at least it would be alwayes in their power to leave behind them the army of the Confederates, and so keeping alwayes before them, they should be apt to accomplish great exploites. Lastly he alleaged, that as in the experience and reason of things, he held this counsell better then all others, fo also he was constrained by necessity to embrace and follow it, for that the Imperial army being as was beleeved halfe shaken, he could not put his people into such speedie readinesse as to be affured to march in time and to get before: Befides, feeing the Venetuans had wholly reposed themselves upon him touching that deliberation, he was to consider not to leave their effate in dannger, which if the enemies differend to be unfurnished, they might, taking new counsell vpon new occasions, turne their course to passe ouer Paw, and so intrude vpon their lands to their harmes. This reason might suffice to content the Senate of Vence, for that naturally they have for object to proceede aduisedlie and surelie in all their affaires. But it did not fatisfie the Pope, for that under that counfell he sawe opened a waie to the Imperiall armie to take their course euen vp to Rome or to Tuscane, or to make their passage into what place they lift, feeing there was no possibilitie of resistance by the atmie that was to go before both for that they were to distribute in places as they passed garrisons of souldiers, and also their maine strength wasto suffer diminution by other meanes. Neither was it a matter certaine, that in the Venetians tarying once behind, would be as great readinesse to follow with effectes, as the Duke was liberall to promife in words, confidering his custome and maner maner of proceeding in all the course of the warre before: Lastly he judged that if the armies were reduced into one strength, wherein the numbers of souldiers farre exceeded the Imperials, they might with more facility stop the enemy for passing further, cut off the trafficke of their vi-Etuals, observe all occasions that offered, and never be so farre removed from them, that in good feason and oportunity they might not succour the townes of the Venetians if the enemy officed to make any violent action vpon them. But this resolution displeased him so much the more, by how much he vnderstood the Duke of Vrbin being come to Parma the third of Ianuary, was retired the fourth day to Cafalmaior, by the accident of a small malady that hapned vpon him, and fine dayes after he went from thence to Cassola under colour to cure his ficknesse : to which place he sent for his wife, being somewhat eased of his seauer, but tormented as he sayd with the pangs of the goute. Such as were fauorers and good interpreters of this maner of dealing very suspicious to the Pope, referred the cause of all to his negociations and practises of peace: but his Lieutenant Guicciardin comprehending partly by tokens of likelyhood and probability, and partly by information of the Dukes owne words and speeches, that his defire to tecouer Mont feliro and Saint Leo possessed by the Florentins, was the matter that induced him to that deliberation: and judging that if in that he were not contented, he would leave both the Pope and Florentins abandoned in their greatest necessities; and lastly supposing that he judged not these places to be a reward worthy inough for exposing himselse to so great a daunger : and knowing withall, that they had the same defire at Florence. In all these respects he gaue to the Duke an affured hope of the restitution of those places, as though he had commission so to doe from the Pope: which neuerthelesse was not approued by the Pope, who in that case suffered himselfe to be caried more by olde and newe hatreds, then by equitie or

In all this meane while the Imperials, who had made distribution of a very small summe of money amongst the Launceknights, kept themselves incamped upon the confines of Plaisance, where was the Count Guido Rangon with fixe thousand tootemen : at which place Paule Luzasque with certaine other light horsemen of the Ecclesiastikes making sometimes incursions to discouer the countrey: and being in that action one day accompanied with certaine bands of footemen and some men at armes, they encountred a troupe of enemies of the same faculty and profession, whom they ouerthrew and tooke soure score horse and an hundred sootemen, ouer and befides Captaines Scalengo, Succar, and Grugny Burgonions, who remained prisoners. After Count Caiasze this Monsteur Burbon lent out ren Ensignes of Spaniards to renictuall Pelquiton, and ioyntly with goeth from the that action, the Count Caiazze with the light horimen and with his regiments of footmen, came Imperials to to lodge in the borough of S. Donin which the Ecclefiastikes had abandoned: The sayd Count the the pay of day after according to an intelligence which was entertained with him before, and also pretending the Ed for want of his pay, to be acquited and made free from his oath which he had given to the Imperials, passed to the campe Ecclesiastike, where he was entertained by the Lieutenant (though more to content others then of his owne inclination) and with him were taken into wages twelve hundred footmen, and an hundred and thirty light horsemen which he had with him. This condition was tied to the contract, that if the Emperour tooke from him by way of warre or other violence his Earldome of (auazze, the Pope within eight moneths should indue him with so much in yearely value as the Earledome was worth, and to remaine possessed of it vntill he had recoue-

Duke of Ferrara refuling alwayes to come to the atmy, pushed on by perswasions the Duke of Burbons defire, to take his course rather to Bolognia and Florence, then to stay and intangle his army with the action of those townes. And as an army of souldiers compounded upon sundry natures, nations, and languages, draweth after it for the molt part fo many forts of accidents and aduerfities, as it containeth feuerall complexions and humors : fo, his regiments of Spanish footemen, either for want of money in deede, or making that their colour, drew into mutinie the feuenteenth day demaunding their pay: and albeit in that rage of infolencie, they flue the Sergeant Maior whom the Duke had fent to appeale them, yet vling mildnesse and gouernement where his Sergeant Major fought to manage them by authority and rigour, he raunged them by discretion whom his officer could not reduce by seueritie, and so with minds well reconciled the twentieth day he passed ouer Trebia with his whole army, and incamped about three three miles from Plaifance having with him five hundred men at armes, and many light horfmen Italians who were not payed. Touching the old bands of Launceknights, one part of them were appointed to remaine at Millan, and the others were addressed to Sanona to ay de those of Genes who were reduced to great necessitie. Surethe resolution of the Duke of Burbon and the armie, which he led, was strange and wonderfull, for that being without money and pay which onely leadeth the fouldier to fight, and having no munitions, without the which standeth mainted all enterprises of warre, and standing destitute of the feruice of pyoners, a matter most important in the action of townes and peeces, and laftly being followed with no addresse nor order for victuals which alwayes is accompted one of the strongest veines or finewes of an army, they fought to aduance and passe further amid so many prinations and wants, through so many townes and pecces of the enemies, and against focs of tarre greater numbers then they. But more recommendable was the constancy of the Launceknights, who being drawne out of Germanie with one onely duckat a pecce, and fuffering a long time with a wonderfull temperance in Italie, and neuer were beleeved fince they first set their foote to march with more then two or three duckats at the most, offered to march on with the same resolution and cheerefulnesse of minde, with the which they betooke themselues first to the service : and in that good example to all fouldiers of other nations, they passed on, contrarie to the ordinarie custome of men of warre, and especially against the humor of their owne climate and region, depending upon no other pay or affignation then upon the hope of the victory, notwithflanding it was manifestly discerned that they could not continue without money, both for the neareneffe of the enemies whose importunity pressed them, and for the necessities of victuals which more and more grew into extreame penurie : on-Iy amidthele sufferings and afflictions they were much stayed and supported by the authoritie & operation of Captaine George, who the better to containe them, let before their eyes the facke of Rome; and the booty of most part of Italy; a matter which he thought most agreeable to minds replenished with impressions of ambition, glory, and profit. And in that good conformation of mind, the army marched the two and twentieth day to the borough of Saint Donin: out of the which the day following iffued the Marquis of Saluffa and the Ecclefiaflike regiments, leaving certaine bands of Venetian footemen for the gard of Parma, and so they followed the way of Bologma with eleuen or twelue thousand footenien: but it was ordained that the Count Guido should come from Plaisance to Modena, and the footenen of the blacke bands to Bolognia, leauing a sufficient garrison within Plassance. In this fort in foure removes they marched by the countrey of Reggia betweene Anzolo and the bridge of Rene. At that time the Duke of Burbon was vpon the confines of Reggia: and the Duke of Vrbin who being perswaded at Casalmaior by Guicerardin to augement his number of Swiffers, had refused it as a matter unprofitable, stood now upon vehement inflance to fend to Rome and Venice to make a new leavie of foure thousand Swiffers and two thousand Launceknights: in which variation and change of his mind, he excused the contradiction that was made then, both for that the scason did not then require to take the field, and also he beleeved by many reasonable conjectures that the enemies would have diffolued and broken, whom now he promifed to accoult with that firength and new fupply; but that was a counfellill difgetted of themall, and not holden indifferent of any, both for that there was no possibility to relecue the dangers that were present with remedies so slow and farte off, and also that for the difficulties of mony, & the disagreement of the Confederats, the effect of that counfell could not be put in execution.

In this time the Duke of Millan, with the valour of three thousand footemen whom he had assembled, did not only desend Loda, Cremona, and all that countrey beyond Adda, and made incursions upon the territories of Millan, but also ioyning order to celerity, he surprised with the same felicity the towne of Monee: Neuerthelesse his souldiers less it estsoones abandoned, having advertisement that Anthony de Leua (who after he had given conduct to the Duke of Burbon was returned to Millan) marched thicher with two thousand of the old Launceknights and siffeene hundred of a new leavy, a thousand Spanish sootnen, and sive thousand Italians, commanded by dinerle Captaines.

The Duke of Ferrara counfelleth the Duke of Burbonto go so Rome.

But after the Duke of Burbon had passed the river of Seechia, he tooke his way on the lest hand and arrived the fift day of March at Bonport: therehe lest his people, and went himselfe to Finalo to communicate with the Duke of Ferrara, who perswaded him with many arguments and reasons to draw towards Florence or Rome, and to reduce thither all his thoughts: yea it was thought that the scope of his counsell tended chiefly to take his course to Rome, and in regard of that to let passe all other enterprises. In this deliberation there occurred many accidents and disficulties which troubled the mind of the Duke of Burbon, but chiefly he feared leaft the army being come to Rome, they would passe on to the Realme of Naples, and that either for necessity which is mighty in the minds of foldiers, or for defire to be refreshed, which their long wearinesse and sufferance did infly chalenge, or for some other difficulty that might happen, whereofhe did not doubt, neither had his doubt bin fallible or vaine, if at his comming to Rome he had not found the Pope difarmed. The fame day did the regiments of the Venetians passe the river of Paw without the person of the Duke of Vrbin, who not with standing he was almost recovered and whole, yet he remained at Gazzolo, though with intention to put himselfe on the way foorthwith. The feuenth day the Duke of Burbon lodged at Saint lohn vpon the confines of Bologma, from which place he sent a trumpet to Bolognia, whither were retired the army Ecclefiastike: the summons of the trumpet was to demaund victuals, and to affure them that the Duke of Burbon would go to the fuccours of the realine of Naples. And the fame day the bands of Spaniards that were within Carpy after they had deliucted up the towne to the Duke of Ferrara, joyned themselues with the Duke of Burbon. The army of the Venetians lay incamped along the riner of Secchia, not refolued to passe further, vules they first understood that the Duke of Burbon were discamped from Saint John, into whole army had passage and refort a traffike of victuals from about the remtories of Ferrara: but for that the victuallers demanded money of the fouldiers, who had almost none to pay, they dispersed themselves to lodge at large and abroad, to eate & devoure the countrey,& in that wretched infolency they ran into all places robbing both man and beaft, the better to furnish them of meanes to pay for their victuals: the same bringing such a disorder over the whole army, that it was holden for certaine, that if in that confusion they had met with any strong encounter, or if the Ecclefiastikes who were within Bolognua and the confines thereabouts, would haue incamped neare them, their owne diforder would haue drawne vpon the no finall difficulties and dangers: both for that follong as they continued to disperfed at large and at random their perils could not but be more apparant then their fafetie, and reducing themselves into a straite and one campe, they flood deprined of all meane and providence for victuals. The bands also that were within Bolognia were not without their disorders, as well through the condition of the Marquis, who was more apt to breake a launce in a faire shew at tilt, then to manage the office of a Captaine in the field: as also for that the Swiffers and his companies of footemen were not payed in times due by the Venetians, the fame being the cause that made them loofe a faire occasion. In the meane while the Duke of Burbon to the ende to passe further, was at the point to draw from Ferrara a prouision of victuals for many dayes, together with a proportion of powder, pyoners and oxen to draw foure cannons: wherein notwithstanding he made many demonstrations that fuch was his intention, yet it was holden for certaine that he was determined to passe into Tuscane by the way paued or causied: the like was confirmed by Ierome Moron, who many dayes before had holden a fecrete intelligence with the Marquis of Saluffa, though in the iudgement of many, but fraudulently and diffemblingly: But fuch is the operation of a difforder " begunne, that if it be not as well cured at the roote as reconciled at the top, it goeth on working to daungerous effects, euen as a fire couered and raked vp with affies is not fully quen- >> ched but smoothered and preserved to a greater burning: for, as the army was appointed to de- >> part and breake up the fourteenth day of March, and to that end had fent backe againe to Bodin the foure cannons: so the day before, the bands of Launceknights having bin long led in abuse by many promises made to pay them, joyned their exclamations to the complaints of the Spanish footmen, and begaune with infolent voyces to call for their payes, wherein giving scope to their difcontentments to passe from one passion of rage to another, they mutined and drew into manifest tumult, and that to the great danger of the life of the duke of Burbon, if he had not with present diligence escaped from his lodging, which in their fury they invaded and sacked, killing one of his Gentlemen who flood to defend the goods of his maifter. By reason of this accident the Marquis of Gualt went forthwith to Ferrara, from whence he returned with some little summe of money, with the which the army was reappealed. The feuenteenth day there fell from the regions about fuch abundance of fnow and raine, that for certaine dayes it tooke away all liberty of marching, as well for the impediment of the wayes made worfe by the ill weather, as for the fwelling of the rivers which the flowes and land-flouds had made equall with the tops of their bankes of fhores. By which intemperance of the weather influmentally working in the defliny affigned, Captaine George fell ficke of an apoplexie, which fo vexed him to the great perill of his life, that at leaft the enemies hoped that he would become unprofitable to follow the campe, and under that occasion the Launceknights would no more bearetheir incommodities and want of money: but the effect was otherwise then the apparance declared. By this time the Venetian army was at S. Faustim neareto Rubiero, to whom the eighteenth of March came the person of the Duke of Vrbim, who according to his custome promifed to the Senate of Venice almost a certainty of the victory, not so much through the valor and puissance of the confederates, as for the difficulties and streites whereunto were reduced the enemies.

The Pope losfeth courage, and why.

But now the affaires of the Pope being reduced on all parts to these hard termes, he ran a careleffe courfe, accompanied with faintneffe of courage, both for that he was pinched with the want and necessity of money, wherein his care was formuch the greater by how much did redouble his extremities, and also for the enterprise of Naples which tooke not successe according to his first deuiles, and lastly for that his companies were retired to Piperna, being no longer able to endure the want of victuals. But the matter that most tooke away his resolution and spirit, was the temporifing of the French, in whom was found no cortespondency betweene their promises and their effects; a custome which they had duly observed even from the first day of the warre till the last end of the fame: for, befides that the king was long in fending the forty thousand duckats for the first moneth of the war, and to dispatch the five hundred launces for the sea army: and besides that he would not according as he was bound, make warte beyond the mounts; which was one of the principall foundations and meanes fet downe to aspire to the victory: yet also he failed to observe his promises with the Pope from day to day, that besides the ordinary contribution, he would minister to him monethly twentie thousand duckats to make warre in the realme of Napler. Also the truce being made by reason of the conspiring of Don Hugo and the Colomois, he counselled him not to keepe the atticles of the truce, and confirmed vnto him the same promise not onely to ayde him in the warres against Nupler, but also in all actions for his proper defence. And lastly he promised to fend to him R anse de Cere whom he favoured much, for that he had expressed great valour in the desence of Marseiller. All which things, albeit they had bene promifed from the moneth of October, yet it was so long cre they were executed, that it was the fourth day of Ianuarie before Ranse came to Rome, and yet he brought no money, and also it was ten dayes after before the twenty thousand duckats were sent: of which summe source thousand were retained by Ranfe, as well for his expences and defrayments, as for his penfion, and tenthoufand were converted to furnish the enterprise of Abruzze, so that to the Popes hands who under that promife had broken the truce almost three moneths before, there never came of that summe more then fix thousand, Moreover the king had promifed the Pope in regard of his consenting to a tenth, to pay vnto him xxv. thousand crownes within eight dayes, and fine and thirty thousand more within two moneths: but he neuer received aboue nine thousand, which were brought him by Monsieur Rabandanges: The king also extended his promise further, for that after Paule Aresze had taken his leave of him the twelfth of February, he promifed him a coplement of twenty thoufand duckats to the end to give to the Pope a better flomacke to make war: but the fayd twenty thousand duckats which were fent after Monsieur de Lange, neuer passed further then Sauona. The king was bound by the capitulations of the confederation to fend twelue gallies, of which fort of vessels he sayd he hadsent sixteene, but the most part of them so ill prepared, and so slenderly furnished of men to set on land, that they stirred not from Sauona: where, if at the first when ouerture was made of the watre against the kingdome of Naples, they had immediatly ioyned with the gallies of the Pope and Venetians, they would not but have executed right great exploits. And touching the army by feavery mighty in great veffels, notwithstanding the king had made many promises to fend them out against Naples, yet they neuer went farre from Prouence, or Sauona. Furthermore, after he had condificended to give two payes to the foldiers of the Marquis of Saluffa, he agreed with the Venetians who had a leffe number of fouldiers then he, to whom they were bound, that their pay should be taken upon the contribution of the forty thoufand duckats. He faw the comforts and fuccours of the king of England were verie farre off and yncertaine

uncertaine. The Venetians made but flow paiments to their companies, & for that cause the bands of the Marquis of Saluffa and the Swiffers who were within Bolognia, served almost for nothing. The variations and vincertainties of the Duke of Vrbin aftonished him not a litle, since thereby he discerned that no impediment would be given to the Imperials to passe into Tuscane: by which meane, weighing together with the il disposition of the people of Florence the intelligence which the citie of Stenna had with the Imperials, he faw that not only the state of Florence would fallinto manifest daunger, but also the circuit and jurisdiction of the Church. All which reasons albeit they moued him greatly, & wrought no small impressions in him, yet after many drifts & doubts, notwithstanding he discerned well enough how infamous and daungerous it would be to separate himselfe from the Consederates, and to referre him to the discretion of the enemies, yet both for that he was not fufficiently succoured by the residue, and much lesse would applie such aide of himselse as he might, and also being ouer-ruled by passions of present seare, and notable to refift with resolution and courage the difficulties and daungers occurring, he determined to accord with Freromofquo and Serenon, whom the Viceroy had fent to Rome for that matter: the articles of the accord were these: That there should be a furceance of armes for eight moneths, the The Pope ar-Pope paying to the Imperiall army threefcore thousand duckets: That what focuer had bene taken cordeth with vpon the Church, vpon the realme of Naples, and vpon the family of the Colonnois, should be rendered: That Pompey Colonno should be restored to the dignity of Cardinall, with absolution of all paines & censures: this was a condition most grieuous to the Pope, and whereunto he condiscended with a verie ill will: That the French king and Venetians might enter this accord within a certainetime: That in case they didenter, the Launceknights should go out of Italy, and if they did not enter, then they should depart from the Church estate, and likewise from the territorics of Florence: That the Pope should pay in forty thousand duckats within two and twentie dayes accompting from the present day, and to satisfie the residue within one moneth after: That the Viceroy should come to Rome, which the Pope supposed to be the best meane to affure him that the Duke of Burbon should observe the accord; a hope wherein he was estsoones confirmed by the relation of a letter surprised by Gnicciardin, by which the Duke of Burbon aductised the Viceroy of the difficulties of the army, for remedy whereof he counselled him to grow to accord with the Pope so farre foorth as it might be done with the Emperonrs honour. Immediatly vpon the concluding of the accord, either party retired their bands of fouldiers, reuoked their army by sea, and the places that were taken were rendred, the Pope vsing good faith and meaning in the execution of the contentes of the capitulation, notwithstanding at that time he had the betterin all the realme of Naples, fauing that in the part of Aquila, the sonnes of the Count Montorro doubting to remaine there in lafety, deliuered vp their father, who foorthwith with the fauour of the faction Imperial chased them out of that province, together with all those that were against him . After this the Viceroy came to Rome, by reason of whose presence there, the Pope iudging he flood every way in good furety for the observation of the accord, dismissed with a very ill counsell all those bands of souldiers that were in his pay in the quarters of Rome, retayning onely two hundred light horsemen, and two thousand sootemen of the blacke bands: he was induced to this difmiffion of his regiments by an opinion he had that the Duke of Burbon was inclined to the accord, both for the difficulties that increased upon him daily, and also for the testimonie he had alwayes given of his defire and disposition to peace.

But the affaires tooke another course about the confines of Bolognia, for associate truce was established, the Pope dispatched Cafar Fieromosquo to the Duke of Burbon to approue and confirme the accord, and to see him depart from off the Church lands so soone as he should receiue money: but contrary to their expectation & the testimonies he had given before, the Duke of Burbon shewed a hard disposition to the peace, & in his soldiers appeared a far more forward inclination, who feemed to stand resolute to follow the war, either for that they stood fixed upon the hope of a great profit, or because the monies promised by the Pope were not sufficient to satisfie two payes; a matter which induced many to beleeve, that if the Pope had advanced to the fumme of an hundred thousand duckats, the souldiers had casily accepted the truce: But whatsoeuer was the ground or cause of their obstinacy, it is certaine that after the comming of Fieromosquo, they ceassed not to rake and harrie the parts of Bolognia as before, and expresse vpon the people all demonstrations and acts of enemies. Neuerthelesse the Duke of Burbon who caused to cast platformes, and Fieromosquo gaue continuall hope to the Popes Lieutenant that notwith-Handing al these difficulties and insolencies the army should accept the truce: together with which promise, Burbon assured him that he was constrained to cast platformes and expresse other apparances of enterprife, only to entertaine the army in hope to passe further, vntill he had reduced them to his defire which was to keepe amity with the Pope. Notwithstanding at the same time were brought to the campe many prouisions of meale, pyoners, cartes, powder, and other like neceffaries fent by the Duke of Ferrara, who afterwards justified himselfe, that neither the money he had fent them, nor all other reliefes of what nature fo euer, passed not the value of three score thousand'duckats. But on the other fide the Duke of Vrbin, under a semblance of seare, that if the armie did accept the truce, it would returne towards Polisena de Rouigno, retired the Venetian regiments beyond Paw, and encamped at Cafalmaior. In this efface of suspence and temporifing continued the affaires of the warre for eight dayes: but at last the Duke of Burbon, either for that fuch had bene alwaies his intention, or because the armie was fallen into an insolencie aboue his power to restraine, wrote letters to the Lieutenat Gnicciardin, that since he was not able to range the fouldiers to his will, necessity constrained him to passe further; and putting it accordingly in execution, he removed the day following, being the last of March, and went to encampe at the bridge of Rene, where the furie of the footmen of the campe had killed a Gentleman fent by the Viceroy to folicite the Duke of Burbon to imbrace the truce, had he not both with good celeritie and fortune auoyded the daunger of his life by flying away: but in that humour of rage & mutiny they expressed far more infolent demonstrations against the Marquisse of Guast, who being gone from the armie to draw to the realme of Naples by reason of his indisposition, or not to be cocurrant with others to impugne the Emperors will, or induced haply by some other cause, was publifhed and proclamed rebell by the fouldiers of the army.

The comming of the Duke of Barbon to the bridge of Rene, affured the Marquis of Saluffa & the Popes Lieutenant, that the armie would draw directly towards Romagnia: by reason wherof, after they had left one part of the Italian footmen for the guard of Bolognia, and with great difficultie brought thither the Swiffers, for whose payes the Popes Lieutenant was driven to lend ten thousand duckets to Iohn Vetturio, they went the same night with the residue of the army to Furly, whereinto they entred the third day of Aprill, leaving within Imola a sufficient garrison to defendit. Somewhat beneath the fame city the Duke of Burbon passed the fift day, and encamped more lower under the high way: but the advertisemet being come to Rome that the Duke of Burbon had not accepted the truce, the Viceroy made many semblances to be discontented, wherein perswading himselfe, that according to the former advertisements he had received, it was needfull to aduaunce a greater fumme of money, he dispatched a Gentleman of his to make an offer of xx. thousand duckers more, which he would leavy of the revenues of Naples: but vinders anding that the Gentleman had hardly escaped with the hazard of his life, he departed from Rome in person the third of Aprill, to meete and conferre with the Duke of Burbon, promifing the Pope to compell him to embrace the truce by separating from him the men at armes and most part of the Spanish footmen, if by other meaneshe could not induce him: but arriuing the fixt day at Florence, he stayed there, as in a place most convenient, to debate with the Deputies whom the Duke of Burbon fent to him: by whom he was fully affured that there was no possibility to stay or conraine the armie, but by advauncing a greater defrayment of mony, and that to be leauned upon the Florentines, ypon whom the Pope had layed all the charge of that prouision.

These variations increased greatly the difficulties and daungers of the Pope, which for manie dayes before were augmented even into degrees of extremities: for both amid such an uncertainty of counsels and dealings of the Duke of Burbon, and by the success and issue drawn from the labor of the Viceroy, he stood in need of the success of the Confederates, the actions of whom went on dayly diminssing and abating, not withstanding the persuastions and instance of the Lieutenant Guiceiardin: the reason grew upon the Popes owne dealing, for that in all his speeches and demonstrations, he gave knowledge of his desire to the accord, together with the great hope he had of the success of the same by the working of the Viceroy: and on the other fide, the Lieutenant, who comprehended by manie signes that the Popes hope was vaine, and by the same reason saw, that if the provisions of the Confederates grew cold, the matters of Florence and Rome stood in apparant danger, sell to persuade with many strong reasons and similitudes the Matquis

of Saluffs and the Venetians, that the accord would not fort to effect: wherein he forgate not to encourage them, that if not for the regards of others, at least for their owne interests, they wold not abandon the affaires of the Pope and Tuscane: and in that action the better to infinuate credire and authority, he did not diffemble that the Pope did vehemently defire and demaund truce, and did vn difereetly labour and expect the fame, not looking into the manifest abuses and doubleneffe of the Imperials : he forgat not also to induce them, that though by aiding him they obtained no other thing then to make easie for him the conditions of the accord, yet in that action they should drive a drift of great good and profite to themselves, for that the Pope by their helpe, would accord for him & for the Florentines under conditions which should little hart the League: where if they lest him abandoned, the necessity of his affaires would compell him to pay to the Imperials a great fumme of money pretently, with continuation of some huge contribution monetly, for the entertaining of those armes and fouldiers with the which the warre was to be brought against them afterwards. In which regards, valetse they would wilfully prejudice and harme themselves, they ought to thirre & come on with all their forces, to defend Tuscane whenfocuerthe Duke of Burbon would advaunce to invade it. The matter of this deliberation reduced the Marqu's of Saluffa into no small doubts and perplexities, but much more it heaped allonishmet vpon the Venetians: for the pufillanimitie of the Pope being not vaknowne to the both, they held for certaine, that though they should seeke to succour him of new, yet he would not tticke to imbrace the accord (without respect to the Consederates) as often as he had meane to obtaine it: in so much as it seemed that they were pressed in a matter verienew and strange, to administer aide to him, to the end he might more easily accord with their common enemies: they confidered that to leave him abandoned, would be more prejudiciall to their common affaires: & vet they faw they shold leave their men in manifest danger between the Appenine & the enemies, & in a country become alreadic against the, if, whilest they were in Tuscane, the Pope did either cofirme the accord, or made a new. Moreouer the Senate of Venice leared leaft the Pope made instance to have their men passe into Tuscane, to the end to constraine the to consent to a succeance of armes, by meane of the danger wherein they should be to loose their men. The Licutenant had eafily retired the Marquis of Saluffa from those doubts and perplexities, not with standing he was incouraged to the cotrarie by many of his counfell, to the end not to commit his fouldiers to danger: fo that euen as he had not bene ready to come to Furiy, fo he refused not to passe into Tufcane, if need to required. But the Venetians, who fought to hold the Pope and Florentines under hope, and on the other fide, were apt to fland ready prepared from day to day, to take fuch course as the occurrances of things did require, gaue out directions to the Duke of Orbin to iffue out of Calalmeter the fourth day of Aprill, and to fend the horsemen on that side beyond by the way that leadeth to Pam, and the footeness along the river: and the Duke of Vrbin having regard to his owne particular, was fearefull by the course that the Imperials tooke into Romagnia, in which humour he dispatched aregiment of two thousand footmen Venetians, for the gard of his owne estates, not with standing many were of opinion, and particularly the Pope, that he had paffed a fecret promife to the Duke of Burbon, not to flop his passage into Tujcane.

But in this meane while the Duke of Burbon eating to recouer victuals from all parts, of which he had great want, fent one part of the army afore (originals, a towne which after it had endured certaine furmions of the cannon, rendred vinder composition, not with landing it was very strong by fortification and walles; for they of the towne fearing the hauceke and infolencies of fouldiers, had refused those bands that were sent to defend them. After the action of Cotignals, the Duke of Burbon sent to Lugo source cannons: and as well to make provision of victuals, as for impediment of waters, he abode three or source dayes upon the river of Lamono: and so he passed the truer of Cotionor the thirteenth day of Aprill, and lodged at Villa Franche, sine miles from Furly: the same day did the Marquis of Salussalting and rob 500 sootmen Spanish disbanded, who were gone out towards Monto Poggio to make pillage for victuals, according to the example of the whole armie, being constrained by the great penuric & necessitie of reliefe. The xiii, day the Duke of Burbon encaped about the way that leadeth towards Meddolo; a way to passe into Tuscane by Galzaro & Valubagnio the was solicited to take that way by them of Siema, who offered to him great quartities of victuals & pyoners: & in the way insolencies following disorders) the Launce-knights, who burned al as they passed, atsiaulted the towner of Meddolo, which redred upo copositio, but was confumed with fire notwithstanding. That day the Duke of Burbon was aductifed that the Viceroy by the consent of the Lord la Motte, sent by him for that effect, had capitulated the day before at Florence in this fort: That without going fro other matters, but confirming of new the capitulation made at Rome, the Duke of Burbon should begin within five dayes next to retire himselfe with the armie: That at the first place whereunto he should be retired, there should be payd to him threefcore thousand duckets, to which the Viceroy did adde twentiethousand: That he should receive threescore thousand more by the end of the next moneth of May, of which the Viceroy by a scedule subsigned with his owne hand, bound the Emperour to reflore and repay fiftie thousand: only these last threescore thousand duckets should not be paid, vnlesse Philip Stroffy were deliuered, and lames Saluiano absolued of the penaltie of thirtie thousand duckets, as the Viceroy had promifed to the Pope, though not in the capitulations of the truce, yet vnder simple and secret words. But neither the knowledge of this detained the Duke of Burbon for paffing further, nor the advertisement he had that the Viceroy was departed from Florence to come to thearmy to him, and to establish with him all things that should be necessarie: for the Viceroy did earneflly defire the accord, as well for many other generall causes, as especially (which I have heard by credible relation) for that he fought to convert the army prefently against the Venetians: and albeit the Viceroy had promifed at Rome to deuide from the Duke of Burbon, his cauallerie or horfmen, together with the most part of the Spanish footmen, yet he refused to make such separation fo long as he was vpon the treatie within Florence, alleaging that it belonged not to him to be the cause of the ruine of the Emperours armie. The xvj.day the Duke of Burbon marched to lodge at Saint Sophia, a towne of the valley of Galearo, subject to the Florentines : and striuing with diligence and with deceit to preuent the enemies, to the end no impediment should be given to him in passing the Alpes; a place, where for want of victuals, euery contrarie accident had bene sufficient to disorder him. The xvij, day he received at Saint Peter at the Baines, letters from the Viceroyand the Popes Lieutenant, fignifying to him the comming of the Viceroy: to whom he made answer, as also to the Lieutenant, that where the advertisemet came to him in a lodging so vnapt, as he could not without incommoditic attend him there, he would expect him the day following at Saint Mary of the Baines below the Alpes. In the seuerall letter which he wrote apart to the Viceroz, he recommended particularly the ready defire he had to come to accord, wherin he defired him to impart with the Pope his good inclination and deuction, notwithstanding his intention was otherwise. At the day affigued the Viceroy went to meete the Duke of Burbon, together with the Lieutenant Guicciardin, who being not without suspition of his marching and comming on with his power: and to the end he shold not enter with his armie into Tuscane before the succors prepared to defend it, perfwaded the Marquis of Salussa with many reasons to aduaunce and go before: and after he had with great efficacy of words and spirit disputed the matter against John Vetturio the Venetian Treasurer, alwayes affillant with the Marquis, and against others who for feare least their regiments of fouldiers were committed to danger, made their demands that before they passed into Tuleane, there shold be deliucted vnto the assurance for two hundred thoufand duckets, or at least some strong places in pawne, he brought him with all his companies to go to Breffiquello : from thence he wrote to the Pope, that he found the Marquis fo well dispofed and ready to march, that he made no doubt to procure him to passe with his armic into Tuscane, affuring himselfethat the Venetian regiments would do the like: but he fignified that by how much the matters of Florence flood affired by their passage, by so much were endangered the affaires of Rome, because the Duke of Burbon having no other hope remaining, wold be contrained to convert his forces to that enterprise. & that his army having the advantage to be so neare Rome, it would be hard with the fuccours that should be sent, to match his diligence and celeritie, seeing he might well passe the Appenin in two remoues of incamping: That for seare of this, the Florentines lought afore hand to fortifie themselues with the forces of the Venetians and the Duke of Vrbin, to whom they had given hope, and afterwards affured it with promife to enter the League, in case their bands of men of warre did passe into Tuscane: whereinto they added obligations for payment of a certaine number of footemen, and not to accord with the Emperour, though the Pope would: That they had also offered to the Duke of Vrbin (who being passed Pamat Fiequeroles was arrived the thirteenth of Aprill at Finalo, and afterwards at Corticello) to render up to him the Castles of Saint Leo and Manuolo, which offer was solicited with him by Pallas Rucellai whom they fent to him to follow that negotiation. Infomuch as it was leffe hard for them to have a ready fuccour, yea though there was advertisement that the Viceroy did not only not find in the place appointed the Duke of Burbon, who the fame day diffembling the appointment fought to passe the Alpes: but also had bene in great dannger to be slaine by the payfants of those quatters rising in armes for the oppressions and harmes they received by the army: for, the Marquis was ready to passe the Alpes, notwithstanding the Duke of Vrbin foliciting him to come and speak with him in the borough of Saint Peter, sought by all meane to foreflow and hinder him: But the two and twentieth of Aprill he incamped at the borough of S. Lawrence in Megello: the same being the cause that by his example, the Duke of Vrbin, who with no honor nor good order could go farre from him, passed in like fort, and incamped at Barberina the xxv. day of Aprill: wherein he tooke one principall reason vpon the objection that might be made against him, that in case any ill accident or harmes fell youn them, they should not lay it vpon him, both feeing the readinesse of the Frenchmen, and knowing that the Venetians had referred themselues to his will, though with this relation and commission, that if immediatly after he were artifed in Tufcane, the Florentins went not through with his confederation, he shold

At last the Duke of Burbon being the same day passed the Alpes, lodged at Saint Stephens, which towne defended brauely the affault of his fouldiers. And the more to blind the Pope with excuses and reasons artificiall, audto have a greater occasion to offend him, he sent one of his Gentlemento keepe him still confirmed in his good denotion and defire to have accord with him: onely he alleaged, that as in regard of the obstinacy of his army which he could not resist, he was driven to accompany his fouldiers to avoid a greater harme : fo he befought him to beleeve well of his fidelity, with this counsell not to leave off the solicitations of accord and not to slicke for any fumme of mony. But it was a matter superfluous to vie those diligences with the Pope, who beleeuing too much the thing which he defired, and defiring too much to ease himselfe of expences, affoone as he was aduettifed of the conclusion made at Florence in the presence & privity. of the Procurer of the Duke of Burbon, did vndiscretly dismisse almost all his footemen of the blacke bands; and in that securitie Monsieur V andemone was gone to Marfeilles, as if the peace had bene as firme as the Pope was fecure. But all the armies being thus drawne into the body of Tuscane, and the Confederates having vnderstanding that the Duke of Burbon was gone in one day, which was the three and twentieth day from Sant Stephens to incampe at Chiaffa neare to Aretzo contayning a distance of eighteene miles, the Captaines who were assembled at Barbering, drew into counfell what was to be done: amongst whom many of them together with the agents of the Pope and Florentins, made instance that the armies knit in one strength should march and be bestowed in some place beyond Florence, to take from the Duke of Burbon all meanes to approch that City: which inflance being fomewhat qualified, it was refolued to fuffer the regiments to repose in the lodgings where they were, and that the Captaines the day following should go to Ancifa thirteene miles from Florence, to the endafterwards to calthither all their companies if they found that place to be affored, which Federal Boffolo the author of that counfell did promise. But as they were the day after upon the way, and very neare Florence, there hapned an accident which might have brought forth verie dangerous effects, if it had not bene remedied, the fame hindering greatly the execution of that counsell, and many other good complots which might have derived ofic: this was the discourse of the accident: At Florence the minds of men were much stirred, of whom, as the most part of the populars were discontented with the present government, so the youth of the towne concurring in that insolency, made a proud instance to the Magistrates to give them libertie of publike armes to defend them (as they faid) against the oppressions of the souldiers: but before the Magistrates could establish any refolution, the discontentment which before was but in opinion, burst out into a manifest and open tumult in the publike place, where the most part of the Commons, & almost all the cocourse Tumultin of the youth proclaiming armes, began in their furie to tun to the pallace. One matter that infla- Florence. med & pulhed on this tumult, was the indifferetion and timerousnesse of Silvio Cardinall of Cortono, who being determined to iffue out of the towne to go meete the Duke of Vrbin to do him honour, forbare not to abandon the towne, notwithstanding he was not ignorant before his going that the tumult was in action: so that the towne being possessed with a rumor of his flying away, euery one was the more ready to run to the pallace, which being in the power of the youth that were conspirators, and the court & greene all ful of the commons armed, the high Magistrate was constrained to proclaime rebels by a solumne decree, Hipolito and Alexander the Popes nephewes, with intention to introduce againe the popular government. But in the meane while as the Magistrate held the people appealed with this proclamation, the Duke & the Marquis entred Florence with manie Captaines, and were accompanied with the Cardinall of Cortono and Hipolito de Medicis: they managing at first certaine bands of fisteene hundred footmen, who had bene kept armed in the citie manie dayes for feare of the Duke of Burbon, reduced them allinto one resolute and firme strength, and drew in warlike order towards the greene or maine place, which the Commons immediatly abandoned, and in their feare left to their power the thing which they had no valour to defend: neuerthelesse what by the violence of stones cast from within the pallace, and furie of the small shot that played upon the, there was no fafetie for them to abide there, but somewhat to anoyd the importunity of the daunger, and not altogether to be farre from the place they had gotten, they retired themselves into the streets and quarters therabouts. The Duke of Urbin was of opinion (a reason which albeit seemed to beare but small consequence, yet it was the principall cause that Florence that day was deliuered of so great a danger) that the bands that were within Florence were not sufficient to win the pallace: and doubting according to the experience of a fouldier, that if it were recovered by night, least the Commons would eftloones have recourse to armes, he determined with the privity of Cardinals Cibo, Cortono and Radolpho, together with the confent of the Marquis of Salnsfa and the Venetian Legates, being all assembled in the street of Garba, ioyning to the pallace greene, to send for one part of the Venetian bands incaped vpon the plaine of Florence neare the citie. By meane of this deuise there was towards a dangerous encounter, for that neither the pallace could be subdued without the slaughter of most of the Nobility that were within, & alfothe drummes striking up to armes, there was daunger least the fouldiers in that libertie would put to facke the refidue of the Citie: yea that day had bene verie vnhappy for the Florentines, if the ready wit & counfell of Lieutenant Guicciardine had not cut in funder the knot that of it selfe was verie hard to be vindone: he seeing to come towards them Federike Bollolo, and comprehending in his imagination the cause of his comming, left the others with whom he was denifing, and ran to meet him, to the end to be the first to speake to him. In the beginning of the mutiny Federike went vp to the pallace, hoping to reappeale the ryot, aswell through his authority, as for the familiatitie he had with the most part of the youth: but much lesse that he profited by that labour, seeing of the contrarie he received from some of them words injurious and reprochfull, fuch as the humour of men drawne into rebellion could affoord, yea being kept retained certaine houres, he found great difficultie to be fet at libertie: but being got from them more full of disclaine then of compassion, and bringing away a true discourry and information how easie it were to take the place, both for the litle forces they had, and for the leffe order they kept, he perfwaded the refidue to affault it prefently: but the Lieutenant cutting off that deuife, flept in, and with verie short speeches told him what griefe the Pope would conceme by those disorders, together with the domage that consequently would follow upon all the affaires of the Confederates in which regards, as it were better to labor rather to appeale & fettle then to kindle and incense the hearts of men, so also it was a matter not a litle prejudicial to make knowne to the Duke of Vrbin and others fo great a facilitie to carie it. In formuch as raunging him to his opinion, he procured him fo to temper with the refidue, and to reconcile the mutiny without the helpe of armes, that they all approoued his deuile, and made choice of them two to go vp to the pallace to deale with the Conspiratours, and assure them in general and particular, that what soeuer they had committed against the lawes of the state that day, should not in any fort be imputed against them: and being gone up to the pallace under safeconduct of those that were within, they induced them at last after many difficulties, to condiscend to abandon the pallace which they could no longer keepe. Thus was the tumult appealed more by industrie then by armes, and the Citic that earlt was full of infolencie and futie, was thus by counfell deliuered from daunger, and all things returned to the fame efface wherein they were before the mutinie: But oftentimes as ingratitude and reproch are farte more readie then the remuneraction and praise of good workes, so albeit for the present the operation and wit of the Lieutenant Guicciardin was highly esteemed and commended, yet not long after the Cardinall of

Cortono burst out into murmure and complaints against him, that holding more deare the safety of the Citizens, and particularly Lewis Guccuardin his brother, being at that time chiefe Magistrate, then carefull ouer the greatnesse of the house of Medicis, his artificiall dealing had bene the cause why the estate had not bene that day established for euer in the house of Medicis, with the armes and bloud of the Citizens: and on the other fide, the commons and populars followed him with accusations and complaints, for that bringing backe from the pallace reports that the dangers were farre greater then they were, he had betrayed the valour of the Nobility, by inducing them for the benefite of the family of the Medicis, to render without anie necessitie: So hard it is " to do the thing that beareth a cleare fight in the eyes of all men, for that no good action what " dignitie foeuer it hath, if it bring not with it the fauour of the time wherein it is done, and the opinion and judgement of those into whose hearts it seeketh to infinuate and winne place, it is but " a candle that burneth dimme, and whose shadow seemeth more then the light. Albeit you see >2 the tumult of Florence appealed the same day without murther and blood, yet from that originall ground didenfue fucceffinely many great diforders : yea it may be inferred, that had it not bene for that accident, the ruine that hapned immediatly after, had bene accompanied with his enafion: for both the Duke of Vrbin and Marquis of Saluffa abiding still at Florence for the occasion of the mutinie, went not on according to the first resolution to view the lodging of Ancifa; and also the day after the appealment, Lowis Pisan and Marke Foscaro Embassadour for the Veneteans with the Florentines, taking occasion upon the inconstancie of the Citie, protested that they would not fuffer the armie to passe Florence, vnlesse there were made a conclusion of the consederation which had bene negociated: in which they demaunded contribution for ten thousand footemen, feeking through the oportunitie of the time to ferue their turnes of the necessities of the Florentines: but in the end the conclusion was accomplished the eight and twentieth day, referring the matter of the contribution to the sentence of the Pope, who was beleeved to be alreadie reunited with the Confederates. Besides, the time being accomplished for the payes of the Smiffers, and Lowis Pifan having no money to furnish them, for the ill ordinance and addresse which the Venetians had given, there passed certaine dayes before he could make prouision of money: in so much as through these variations and other impediments subsisting, the good counsell to draw with the armies to Ancifa, was made vaine. But in this estate and condition of affaires, the Pope looking with bettereye into the wiles wherewith the Duke of Burbon had abused the Viceron, and also seeing him to advaunce forward into the heart of Tuscane, turned by necessitie all his cogitations to the warre, and in that humour discerning on all sides nothing but visions of daunger and feare, after the xxv. day, he made a new confederation with The Pope cothe French king and the Venetians, by the which as they were bound to minister to hima great pelled to hearfummeofmoney, fo he would not restraine himself nor the Florentines to any further obliga- ken to the war. tion then their faculties were able to beare, alleaging that youn them both had bene laid alreadie heavie burthens of expences and travels: but albeit thefe conditions verie grievous of themselues, were approued by the Embassadours of the Consederates, to separate entirely the Pope from the accords made with the Viceroy, yet they had not their perfection and confirmation by their mailters and heads principall, in whom either their authoritie or their will did much to diffoline the conditions of the action: for the Ventians charged Dominicke Venerio with a great errour, for that without commission of the Senate he had concluded a confederation of great expences and litle fruite, fince they gathered by the Popes inconfrancie, that in all occasions he would effloores turne to his first defire to accord with the Viceroy: and touching the French king, both drayned of money, and driven more to wearie the Emperour with the longueffe of the warre, then with the victorie, he judged it would fuffice now to entertaine the warre with a small expence : and which more is, albeit in the beginning when he videtstood the Pope had made truce with the Viceroy, both the matter and maner of the truce were grieuous to him, yet. looking better afterwards into the estate of affaires, he wished that the Pope would dispose the Venetians (without whom he could make no convention) to imbrace the truce. But at this time the Pope was not a litle discontented to see the body of the watre transferred into Tuscane, and yet lesse grieued then if it had embraced the towne of Rome: and in that regard he leavied bands of fouldiers, and made provisions for money, but not with that propertie of diligence which the estate of his daungers required : he had also a purpose to send Ranse de Cere against them of Sienna, and also to inuade them by sea, to the end that the Duke of Burbon being entangled in Tuscane, might be stopped for taking his way to Rome: of which expedition neucrtheleffe he had enery day fo much the leffe feare and doubt, by how much more he hoped, that both for the difficulties of the Duke of Burbon to leade his army to Rome without victuals and mony, and for the commoditie of the estate of Sienna, where at the least his fouldiers would be refieshed, he would be driven to flay himselfe upon the enterprise against the Florentines, But the Duke of Burbon, either for that his first counsell was otherwise, which he had secretly determined at Finalo by the authority of the Duke of Ferrara and aduise of Ierome Moren, or distrusting to drive to any good issue the enterprise of Florence, for that the maine forces of the League were assembled neare there for the detence of the citie: and lastly being no longer able to entertaine the armie without money, which he had till that day caried through fo many difficulties with promifes and hopes, and now feeing time had reduced him to this straite, either to perish amid the murmures of his fouldiers, which could not but be miferable to a man of his heart, or elfe to hazard the fortune of battell in so great a weakenesse & disorder, wherin if there were any certainty, it was in the loffe of the victorie: he determined to march with all diligence to furprife the towner of Rome, where the rewards of the victorie would be equal with the danger of the aduenture, and to the Emperour it would bring no leffe renownie and honour, then to the fouldiers a full fatisfaction of their long and weary travels. He was pushed on to this enterprise by a hope which he selt to carie the towne, seeing the Pope with an euill counsell had first decasted the Smiffers, & afterwards difmissed the blacke bands, and begunne so slowly to refurnish himselfe at such time as the accord was desperate, that it was thought he could not in good time affemble forces sufficient to defend his dangers: and fo the Duke of Burbon with whom nothing was more familiar then the enterprise of Rome, departed the xxvj. of Aprill from the countrey of Areize, with his armie no lesse speedy in marching then swift in hope: his celeritie to march and win time tooke fom him all care to carie artilleries, or any traine or baggage of campe, fo well was he disposed to see executed the thing which in his hart he had determined, or rather fo violent was his defliny, to call him to the end of his life, which he could now no longer prolong. In so much as marching with this incredible diligence, neither being hindred by the raines, which in those dayes fell in great abundance, nor with the want of victuals, which is no finall impedimet to all great actions, he drew neare to Rome ata time when the Pope was scarcely aduertised of his comming: all the wayes where he passed were as free from relitance, as his defire was farre from alteration and change, feeing he found no impediment neither at Vuerba, whither the Pope had not fent strength in time, nor in anie other place apt to flay the resolution of the armie so well prepared to endomage him. Now began the Pope to have recourfe to those remedies, which if he had vied in their due time & place, might haue bene to special purpose to turne away so great a storme: & now found he too late the effect and truth of the counsels of some wife men about him, prophecying that he would defer the ministration of those helpes untill either his necessities were greater then his remedies, or at least they would profite litle, being applied out of due feafon. Now did he create three Cardinals for nioney, which either could not be leavied for the speedie importunity of the affaires, or elseifhe should receive it, the vie would be unprofitable, by reason of his dangers that hastened on so sail: he called together the people of Rome, whom in great compassion he befought, that in so great a hazard of their countrey, they would readily run to armes to defend it, wherein he disposed the bodies of the popular fort to protect their libertie, and imposed ypon the richer loanes of money to wage fouldiers; a taxation which ran amongst the people with no authoritie, feeing upon the leavying of the imposts one Dominicke Maximo of the greatest wealth amongst the Romanes, offered to lend but an hundred duckets : for which couctousnesse he bare a sharpe punishment, for that his fonnes were made a pray to the fouldiers, and himfelfe falling into the calamitie of a prisoner, was rated at a huge ransome to redeeme his liberty. But after they understood at Florence the newes of the discamping of the Duke of Burbon, which being writte by Vitelli, lying then within Aretze, lingred a day in comming more then or dinarie: the Captains determined that the Count Guido Rangon with his horsemen, and with the troupes of the Count Canazze, together with a thousand footemen of Florence and the Church, should march speedily without baggage towards the towne of Rome, and that the other part of the armie should follow after: they hoped that if the Duke of Burbon drew with him his artilleries, that proportion of succours, would be at Rome before

The Duke of Burbon draweth his army directly to Rome. before him, and if he marched with expedition, it would arrive fo foone after him, that having no artilleries, and the Citic of Rome being furnished with fixe thousand sootemen by the Popes report, the towne would be able to maintaine defence untill the first succours were come, which being arrived, there could be no daunger of the loofing of Rome. But the celeritie of the Duke of Burbon and the flow provisions made at Rome, prevented the effect of all those devises: for as Ranse de Cere to whom the Pope had recommended the principall charge of the defence of Rome, had according to his short time leavied verie sew footmen of service, but gathered a great crew of men ignorant and entrained in warre, whom he had drawne by force out of the stables of Cardinals and Prelates, and shops of artificers, besides Innes and other domesticall places of the towne: so he laboured to call ramparts in the suburbes, such as in his judgement were sufficient for defence, though in the account of others they were farre too weake to hold out the dangerthat was toward: his confidence was such to defend them, that he would not suffer (for the fafetie of the towne) to breake up the bridge of Tyber in ease the suburbs and quarter beyond Tyber could not be defended: and in that humour of fecuritie holding for superfluous all other forts of fuccours, when he was aduertifed of the comming of Count Guido, he wrote letters to him in the Popes name by the Bishop of Verona, that seeing the Citie of Rome was furnished and fortified jufficiently, he should onely send a proportion of fixe or eight hundred harquebuziers, and for him felre with the refidue of his people, he aduised him to go ioyne him felfe to the armie of the League, where he should do more profit, then if he were inclosed within the towne of Rome. Which letter though it did litle harme, for that the Count was not fo farre aduaunced as he might ariue in time, yet it made good declaration what flender fense or feeling he had of the present daungers. But if it may be referred to a wonder that mortall men neither cannot nor know not how to renit destinie, it was a matter no lesse maruellous that the Pope, who before was wont to despise R anse de Cere aboue all other Capraines, threw himselfe now into hisarmes, and reposed his life and estate wholly voon his confidence and judgement: and yet this was a matter more strange and contrarie, that he who in farre lesser daungers was wont to be vexed with seare and terror, being euen your the point to abandon the Citie at fuch time as the Viceror drew with his campe to Frusolone, now in so great a tempest of petill and hazard, contrary to his custome, his nature, and all expectation, did not onely constantly remaine in Rome, but had so great a hope to defend it, that being as it were the aduocate and somner to folicite for the enemies, he did not only forbid mento go away, but also in the same obstinacie he gaue out ordenance, that there should not be transportation nor outearying of goods, such as Marchants with other natures of artificers would have fent for fafetie downe the river.

The fift day of May the Duke of Burbon encamped within the medow neare to Rome, from whence with the infolencie of a foldier he fent a trumpet to demand passage of the Pope through the Citic of Rome, to go with his armie to the Realme of Naples. The morning following vpon the point of the day, by the confideration of his case and the aduersities thereof, he found there remained no other hope for his affaires, then to be resolute to releeue the afflictions of his armie, and according to the oportunitie that was offered by the Citie of Rome, either to die or yanguish. In which resolution, pushed on more and more by the nurmures and exclamations of his souldiers, in whom he could not discerne which was greater either their insolencies or their necessities, he drew neare the suburbes by the way of the Mountaine and Santo Spirito, where he began to give a furious affault: wherein he feemed to have the favor of fortune, who made him prefent the armie in more furctie by the benefite of a thicke milt, which being rifen before day, and increased with degrees of fogge and thickneffe, became fuch a couer to his whole campe, that his fouldiers were not differend tilithey were neare the place where they began to give the affault. The Duke of Barbonthrough a last despaire of his estate, aduaunced before all his companies, either for that he had no other expectation of refuge in case he returned not victorious, or else by his own example, he thought to call on with a greater courage the Launceknights, who it feemed went not resolutely to the service. But such washis dessinie, to determine his life and glorie together, or rather fuel the reward of his wilfull forwardnesse, which for the most part heapeth wretched effectes vppon such as seeke not to accompanie their valour with counsell and discretion. In Burbonstaine the heginning of the assault hee was stricken with a hullet of an harquebuze, of which wound at the assault he fell downe dead to the earth, receiving infly vpon his bodie and life, the price of the action of Rome.

which contrary to all instice and piety he went about to execute. But much lesse that his death did abate or diminish, seeing it did inflame and redouble the courage of his souldiers, who fighting with a wonderfull constancie the space of two houres, made way at last by their hands and weapons to enter the suburbes, wherinthey were not onely holpen by the weaknesse of the rampiers which were great and generall, but also they found helpe in the slender resistance which the defendants made: An experience of right good doctrine to fuch as have not as yet gotten by so the benefit of examples past, the knowledge of things present, who in that action may discerne what propertie of difference is betweene the vertue of fouldiers exercifed and trained in warre, and armiesnewly and halfily leavied and compounded of the multitude of a people more wilfull then skilfull, and by fo much leffe apt to be drawne vnder discipline, by how much more by their nature and custome they are seldome conformable to any good order. For there was at the defence of the suburbes one part of the youth of Rome vnder the ensignes of the people, notwithstanding that manie of the Gebelins and faction of Colomo defired or at least did not feare the victory of the Imperials: they hoped in regard of their faction, to receive no harme or offence by the victors, the same being the cause why they proceeded so coldly in the defence. Neuertheles for that according to the rules of warre, it is a hard matter to take townes without artilleries, there died of the assailants, partly by that want, & partly through their wilfull forwardneffe, about a thousand footmen: who having once by their valour made the way open to enter in, all the defendants fled before them, as men whose feare was farre aboue any other sense or pasfion in them. In which disorder some tooke the way which his fortune and not his wit laid out for him: some in the altonishment seeking to flie who durst no more fight, was slaine by the enemie afore he could resolue vpon the way of his fafety: some either better prepared or more happily preserved, sound that safety in running away which they could not but doubt if they had loger endured the fight: and some with that resolution which their present calamitie would suffer, ranne by heapes towards the Castle, where in place of rescue they found a seare conformable to their own, Info much as all things being reduced to confusio & manifest flight, the suburbs were entirely abandoned and left a pray to the victors: and the person of the Pope, who expected with great denotion in the pallace of Vatican what would be the iffue of the affault, hearing that the enemies were entred, had alfo (with the others) his passions of feare and srailtie, and in that timerous contemplation of his owne perill, he fled with certaine Cardinals to the Castle. His feare kept him from being resolute in perill that was so desperate, neither did he thinke that with the presence and maiestie of his person, though it was couered with the vaile of the highest dignity vponearth, he was able to put by the danger, which the valour and fidelitie of his fouldiers could not defend with their weapons: there he confulted with the Cardinals, whether it were more for his fafetie to remaine there, or during the furie of the aftonishment to retire with the light horsmen of his gard into some place of more suretie by the way of Rome. But he who was appointed by destinie to be an example of the calamities that may thunder upon Popes, and how fraile is the authoritie and maiesty of that sea, being certified by the relation of Berard de Padoa who was fled from the armie Imperiall, that the Duke of Burbon was dead, and that the whole armie flanding abated in courage for the death of their Captaine, defired to come to accord with him: in which matter they fent out men to parley with the principals there, he wretchedly left there all his counfels to go away, both he and his Captains remaining no leffe irrefolute in the prouisions for defence, then they had bene slow in the expeditions: so that the day following, the Spaniards neither feeing order nor counsell to defend the quarter beyond Tyber, entred the place without any refiftance: and from thence, not finding anie impediments to ftop their victorie, the same evening they entred the Citie of Rome by the bridge Xisto, where except such as reposed in the confidence of their faction, and certaine Cardinals, who for that they bare a name to embrace the Emperours quarell, beleeved to find more furety then the others: all the refidue of the Court and Citie (as hapneth in accidents fo furious) was converted into flying and confusion. But the souldiers being within the Citie, which they knew wanted nothing to make them right glorious, and well fatisfied of all things appertaining to their defires, they began to omit no time to execute the thing they had so dearely bought: euerie one ranne to pillage with the same vnbridled libertie which in such cases maketh souldiers both insolent and impious: there was small care or regard borne either to the name of friends, factions, or fauourers,

fauorers, and much leffe was respected the authority of Cardinals and Prelates, or dignitic of temples and monasteries, and lastly not referred from violation the holy relickes brought thither from all parts of the world, yea euen things facred and specially dedicated, were prophaned from their shrines and holy places, and made subject to the furious willes and differetion of the fouldiers : it is not onely impossible to recount, but also to imagine the calamities of that Citic raised to a wonderfull greatnesse, and appointed by Gods ordinance to suffer many fortunes and directions, hauing bene facked by the Gothes within nine hundred and fourescore yeares. It is hard to particulate the greatnesse of the pray, both for the generall wealth and riches which the greedie hands of the fouldiers had made up in heapes, and for other things more rare and precious drawne out of the storehouses of Merchants and Courtiers. But the matter which made the spoile infinite in value, was the qualitie and great number of prisoners, redeemed with most rich and huge ransomes. And to make vp a full tragedie of miserie and infamie, the Launceknights being so much the more infolent and cruell, by how much they bare hatred to the name of the Church of Rome, tooke priloners certaine Prelates, whom with great contempt and indignitie they fet upon Asles and leane Moyles, and with their faces reuerfed to the crowpe of the beaffes, they ledde them through the Citie of Rome apparelled with the habites and markes of their dignitie: yea they paffed many of them to cruell torments, who either died in the furie of the action, or at least with the paincfulnesse thereof they lived not long after, first yeelding a raunsome, and afterwardes rendring their liues. The generall flaughter, as well at the affault as in the rage of facking, was about foure thousand bodies. All the pallaces of the Cardinals were sacked, except some particulars, who to faue the Marchants that were retired thither with their goods, together with the persons and goods of many others reserved of the generall calamitie, made promise of great fummes of money: to whom notwithstanding was vied this iniquitie, that some of them that had compounded with the Spaniards, were afterwards facked by the Launceknights, or at least constrained to a second raunsome. The Ladie Marquisse of Manua compounded for her pallace for the funime of fiftie thousand duckets, which were payed by the Marchants and others retired thither: of which fumme the rumour ran that Ferrand her sonne had tenne thousand for his share. The Cardinall of Stenna dedicated in a perpetuall denotion to the name of the Emperour, after he had agreed with the Spaniards, as well for himselfe as for his pallace, was afterwards made priloner by the Launceknights, who made bootie and pray of his pallace, and afterwards leading him all naked with buffets and baltonadoes into the borough. he was driven to redeeme his life out of their hands with a promife of five thousand duckets. The Cardinalles Minerus and Ponfero passed under almost the like calamitie: who being prisoners to the Launceknights, were rated at a raunsome which they payed, after they had bene in a vile spectacle caried in proceffion through the towne of Rome. This furie of fouldiers executed in a place of fo great riches and profite, could endure no dispensation of anie fort or qualitic of men, seeing the Prelates and Cardinalles Spanish and Germaines, who made them selues assured that the souldiers of their Nation would spare them from oppression and taxation, were taken and passed by the fame measure of miserie and calamitie as others did. Right pitifull were the cryings and lamentations of the women of Rome, and no leffe worthie of compassion the calamitic of Nunnes and Virgines professed, whom the souldiers rauished by troupes out of their houses, to satisfie their lust, no age, no fexe, no dignitie or calling was free from the violation of fouldiers, in whom it-was doubtfull whether bare more rule the humour of crueltie to kill, or the appetite of luft to defloure, or laftly the rage of couctoufnesse to rob and spoile: yea in the violation of these women might be differned a confirmation of the judgements of God hidden from mortall men, for that he fuffered to be delinered up to the vileneffe of men barbarous and bloudic , the renowmed chastitie of women professed and virgins. To this compassion was joyned the infinite clamours of men forced against all law of humanitie, partly to wrest from them vnreasonable raunsomes, and partly to disclose their goods which they had hidden from the rauine of the fouldiers, All holy things, Sacraments and relikes of Saints whereof the Churches were full, being dispoiled of their ornaments, were pulled downe and layed vppon the earth, suffering no small prophanations by the vile hands of the Launceknights: and what so eucr remained vpon the prayes and fooylings of the Imperials, which were things but base and vile, were raked and caried away by the paifants and tennants of the lands of the Colonnois, whose insolencie caried them into Rome

during the generall furie : onely the Cardinall of Colonno arriving the day after, preserved in his compassion the honour of many women, that haply were fled for rescue into his house. The rumour went that the valuation and prife of this facke, in gold, filuer and iewels, amounted to more

then a million of duckets, but the matter of ransomes contained a greater quantitie.

The fame day that the Imperials tooke. Rome, Count Guido arrived with his light horfmen and eight hundred harquebuziers, thinking to enter the fame night by the bridge of Salaro: but hearing of the accident and dolorous estate of the towne, he retired to Otricoly, where the residue of his forces came to him: for notwithflanding the letters he had received from R one, by which he vinderstood that there was no reckening made of his fuccours, yet he forbare not to keepe on his way, retaining this speciall deuotion, to be reputed the man that should give rescue to Rome in greater afflictions: & yet like as it is the nature of men to be gracious and easie interpreters of their owne actions, but hard and seuere censurers of the actions of others, so there wanted not some who in that humour reprehended the Count Guido for not knowing how to yle a faire occasion: for that as the Imperials being wholly disposed to follow so rich a pray, to rob houses, to search out treasure that was hid, to take prisoners, and to reduce to places of suretie such as they had taken, were difperfed into all the parts of the citie, without order for their lodging, without knowing their Enfignes, and without obeying the commaundements of their Captaines: their confusion was fuch, as if Count Guido with his refeues had made a fudden entrie into Rome, and shewed their faces to the Castel which was neither besieged nor garded, it was beleeved that they had not onely obtained the deliuerance of the Pope, but also in that oportunitie had done some braue exploit: wherein they should have had so much the more facilitie, by how much they might have commaunded ouer the diforders of the fouldiers, who were fo vinuerfally drowned in the action of pillage, that for anie accident that might happen, there could be fearcely reordered or drawne together anie notable number, the same being verified by the experience of certaine dayes after, when you founding the alarme, not a fouldier was in readinesse to refort to his Ensigne: But ,, fuch are the errors and imperfections of men, that being caried with felfe opinion, without the a, ground of reason or example, they oftentimes beleeue that if things had taken another course, the ,, iffue had bene otherwife, whereof if the experience might be seene, their iudgements would of-,, tentimes be found fallible and false. But now there remained onely to those that were inclosed within the Castle, a hope to be rescued by the armie of the League, who being departed from Florence no sooner then the third of May, for the long time the Venetians tooke to pay the Swiffers, disposed their marching in such sort as the Marquis of Salussa went a dayes iourney before the Venetian regiments, but under this ordenaunce and agreement betweene him and the Duke, that he should follow him the same way : neuerthelesse the Duke contrarie to that resolution, tooke the feuenth day the way from the lodging of Cortona to Peron (a, to arrive at Lody, and afterwards at Otrio, and there patting Tyber to joyne with the refidue: who as they marched along the way appointed, forced and facked the borough of Pieua, refusing in their obstinacie to lodge the Smiffers, in which conflict were passed to the sword fixe or eight hundred of those that were within. By reason of this disorder which drew the souldiers to consume time in pillage and spoile, the armie ariued no sooner then the tenth day at the bridge of Granianola, where they had advertisement of the taking of Rome, and the eleventh day they came to Ormetto, where by the counfell of Federike de Boffolo, he and the Marquis, and Hugo Peppoly with a great troupe of horse drew towards the Castell, with this intention, that he and Hugo should go vp euen to the Castell, and the Marquisto remaine behinde to backe them. In which deuice they had this hope, that finding the Imperials difordred, the fuddennesse of their arriving, both not looked for, & in their greatest heate of spoile and pillage, would haply fauour them with occasion to drawout of the Castell the Pope and his Cardinals, wherein they seemed chiefly to take the aduantage of the disorders of the souldiers, in whom was more care to rob and spoile, then to foresee daungers. But that deuise drew to no effect, both for that being not farre from Rome, Federikes horse falling under sim, he received such a hurt, as he was not able without greater hazard to go from the place, and also Hugo shewing himselfe before the Castell at high day, where by his direction he should have arrived in the night, retired his companies, alleaging that that enterprise was discouered, but as Federike fayd, he forfooke the action committed to him, because his feare was greater then his valour.

In

In this meane while the Duke of Vrbin understanding the accidet of Rome, albeit he assured that he would fuecour the Pope with all his forces, yet taking the fauour of the time and occasion to deprine the efface of Perousa out of the hands of Gentell Baillon, who was supported and confirmed in it by the Popes authoritie, and to restore it to the arbitration and disposing of the sonnes of lohn Paule, made his approches to Perousa with the Venetian regiments, & what with threats which were sharpe and rigorous, and with the terrour of his armie standing prepared in their prefence, he compelled Gentell to depart from the thing which he kept by viurpation. He confumed three daies in that action, and leaving there certaine commanders, such as depended upon Malatesta and Horatio, of whom the one was inclosed in the Castle S. Angeo, and the other managed the warre in Lombardy with the Venetian regiments, he departed from thence the fixteenth day to Ornietta, the waie which he tooke at comming out of Cortona to go to Rome beyond Tiber, being the cause that he had lingred long. At Ormetta all the Captains and commanders of the atmie tooke counsell together, to set downe a resolution of their proceedings hereaster: amongst whom the dake of Vrbin, after many protestations of his deare and right great affection, propounded many difficulties, recommending them chiefly to think you the furetie of their retraite in cafethe fuccours of the Caffle forted to no good fucceffe. In which reason he viged of them of Ornietta to giue him ostages for assurance not to releeue the army with victuals at their returning: and interpoling in all the affaires of that enterprife a temporifing and track of time, he refolued at last to be at Nepy the xix day, and that the same day the Marquis with his people and the Count Guido with his Italian footmen, should likewise be at Braciano, to the end to go the next day in one frength to the Ile, which is a place nine miles from Rome. The Pope understanding of the approching of these fuccours by the relation of Guicciardin writing to him from Viterba, tooke occasion, that having almost concluded the accord with the Imperials, he refused to subsigne the articles: not fomuch for the hope he received by the letters, which (albeit they were aduifedly written) made forne discouerie to him of things which by discoursing of matters past he was to looke and hope for of the time to come, as to avoid the imputation and note of ignominic, to lay vpon his fearfulnes and rashnes the fault that he had not bene rescued. There was in the French an universall readines to fuccourthe Castle, in whom the Venetians with letters and relations of great affection, augmented the fame disposition, the Prince soliciting the matter with great vehemencie in the counsell of the Pregati: To that all excuses being taken away from the Duke, he consented that the day following a muster should be made of all the armies and men of warre, hoping perhaps that finding such diminution of numbers amongst the regiments and particular bands, that he might make it a just cause to refuse the fight; a deuise which he could not reasonably vie to ferue his turne, fince upon prefenting the armies to the mufters, there were found fifteene thousand footme strong, with an universall resolution to fight and do the office of souldiers. Immediatly after the multer and furney of the armies a generall counsell was taken for the maner of their proceeding further, which drew to this determination to leade the army to incampe at the croffe of Montmary, according to the great instance and solicitation of those of the Castle: they alleaged that in respect of the strength of the place and the small distance thereof from Rome containing but three miles, together that there was no feare of the Imperials to iffue out of Rome to incampe, they might not only remaine there in fafetie, but also retire without danger: and laftly that by the oportunitie of that place they might better take a view, and better execute the occasion to succour the Cattle. But this resolution nothing pleasing the Duke of Vrbin, he embraced an other denife propounded by Gnido Rangon, who offred to approch the Castle the same night with all the horsemen and sootmen of the Church, and in that action to aduenture to rescue the Pope out of the Castle, so farforth as the Duke of Vrbin with the residue of the maine armie would march up to the three Canannes to backe him. But that deuise was not executed that night, because the Duke went up to survey the lodging of Montmary being earnestly pressed by the importunities of the Pope: and albeit he offred to make his approches that night, yet either for his want of valour, or his too much ielousie of his owne safetie, he passed not the three Canannes, in fo much as many hours being vainly spent in that temporising, they were driven to deferre the execution of the enterprise till the night following. But the same day they were aduertised by their espials (whether true or suborned) that as the trenches which the Imperials had made in the medowes were more strong and braue then they were indeed: so also that they had broken yp in manie places (which also was false)the gallery wall that leadeth from the Vatican to the Calle Saint Angeo, to the end to minister succours of many sides, in case any inuasion were offred. Vpon which report the Duke tooke occasió to alleage many difficulties, which were all consented vnto by Guido and approved almost by all the other Captains: wherupon ensued the conclusion that it was a matter impossible to give succours to the Cassle for the present, wherin some other of the Captaines that rose vp to dispute and defend the contrarie opinion, were bitterly reprehended of the Duke, who wanted patience to be drawne to that by reasons and arguments. whereunto he had no inclination of will and valour. In this fort the person and presence of the Pope remained in pray, not one Launce being broken to rescue and recouer out of prison, him who to succour others had leavied so many bands of souldiers, expended such huge maffes of monie and treasure, and stirred up to warre almost all the Nations of the world. Neuerthelesse they disputed if the helpes that were not to be given presently, might be ministred at another time with more forces, a deuise which being proponed by the Duke, was also answered by himfelfe, that vindoubtedly the Casile might be succoured when so ever the armie were possessed of a flrength of fixteene thousand Smiffers leavied by ordinance of the Cantons, not comprehending in the reckning fuch as were there already, as being become unprofitable for the feruice by their long abiding in Italy: and befides this complement of Smillers, he required a new proportion of centhousand harquebuziers Italians, three thousand Pioners, and fortie peeces of artilleries: with which resolution he required the Lieutenant to comfort the Pope, whome they knew to be furnished with victuals for a weeke, that amid his aductifities he would temporise & deferre to make anie accord till his forces might be affembled together. The Lieutenant answered. that as he liked of his deuise so farforth as in the meane while the estate of affaires did not change: fo being verie likely that those within Rome would make the rescue more hard with new trenches and fortifications & also that from Naples wold come to Rome the bands which the Viceroy had led thither by fea, he defired to know what propertie of hope he could give to the Pope in case matters drew that successe according to the sensible apparances and conjectures that were discerned. But the Duke replied, that in such case should be omitted no indeuour or action tending to fo good an office, adding withall, that if the bands that were at Naples were joined with those of Rome, their strength would be in all more then twelue thousand Launceknights, and eight or ten thousand Spanish footmen, and that if the Castle were lost, there could be made no reckning to remaine mailters of the warre, if there were not at least xxij or xxiiij thousand Swiffers strong. Which demandes being contemned of all the Captains as ynteasonable and impossible, the armie being diminished in footmen, retired the first day of June to Monterga, notwithstanding the great instance which the Pope made, not to depart so soone, to the end to make his advantage of the armie in the practife and negociation of the accord: the fame night Peter Mariaroffa and Alexander Vitelly with two hundred light horsemen passed up to Rome towards the enemies. But now the Pope having small expectation of succours, and no lesse feare and icloufie of hislife by the rage of the Colonners and furie of the Launceknights, fent for the Viceroywho was at Sienna to come to Rome, and as the Pope hoped that by the interposing of the Viceroy, his composition would be both more easie and reasonable, so the Viceroy went with great will and readines to find the armie, with intention and hope to be created Captaine generall: but being arrived at Rome whither he paffed under fafeconduct of the Captaines of the army, he found no good inclination in the Launceknights and Spaniards, who after the death of the Duke of Burbon had elected to that place the Prnice of Orange, By reason of which preuention together with the euill disposition of the armie continuing, he had no reason to abide at Rome: and yet as he went towards Naples, he was encountred in the way by the Marquisof Gnast, Don Hugo, and Captaine Alarcon, by whose counsels he returned escloones to Rome: neuertheleffe for that he was not agreeable to the armie, he bare no more authoritie neither in the af-The Pope being the letter that he was not agreeable to the armie, he bare no more authoritie neither in the araband oned of faires of the warre, not in the negociation of accord with the Pope, who being by his advertitie all hopes com- made naked of all helpe present, and lesse expectation to be rescued where was so great want of poundeth with valour and order, was driven to runne the race of his fortune, compounding the fixt day of June the Imperials. with the Imperials almost under the same conditions with the which he might have accorded before: That the Pope should pay to the armie foure hundred thousand duckets in this order: one hundred thousand presently to be defraied of the gold, monie, and treasure reserved in the Castle: fiftie

fiftie thousand within twentie daies, and two hundred and fiftie thousand within two moneths, affigning to him for these defraiments, an impost of monie to be charged upon the whole Church state: That he should deliuer into the power of the Emperour to retaine them so long as he thought good, the Castle Saint Angeo, the Rockes of Ostia, of Ciuta vecchia, and of Ciuta Castellano, together with the Cities of Parma, Plausance, and Modena: That the Pope together with all those Cardinals that were with him, which were thirteene in nuber, should remain prisoners within the Castle vitill the first payment of an hundred and fistie thousand duckets were satisfied: That afterwards they should go to Naples or to Caietta to expect what the Emperour would determine of them: That for affurance of the paiments whereof the third part appertained to the Spaniards, he should deliver in for oftages, the Archbishops of Siponto and Pifa, the Bishops of Pistoia and Verona, together with lames Salutatio, Simon de Ricasola, and Lawrence brother to Cardinall Rodolfo: That Range de Cere. Albert Pio, Oracio Baillon, the knight Cafalo, the Embassadour of England, with all others that were faued within the Castle, except the Pope and the Cardinals, should depart in suretie: That the Pope should give absolution to the Colonnois of the centures they had incurred: And that when he should be led out of Rome, a Legate should remaine there for him with authoritie to dispose and administer instice. Assoone as this accord was passed, Captaine Alarcon entred within the Castle with three bands of Spanish footmen, and three companies of Launceknights, who because there was put upon him the confidence and deputation to gard the Caltle and the Pope, he performed it with a very strait and feuere watch, such as thut vp from the prisoners almost all libertie. But touching the other castles and townes promifed, they were not fo easily configured, for that as the Callle of Cinitavecchia was kept and defended in the name of the Côfederates, so Andrew Dore not with standing he had received warrant and commandement from the Pope, refused to deliver up the Castle of Civita Castellano, voles he were first satisfied of fourtene thousand duckets which he said were due to him for his paie. Iulian Lenoa Romaine was sent to Parma and Plassance in the Popes name, and Lodowike Count of Lodron accompanied in the name of the Captaines, with commandemet to those cities to obey the will of the Emperour, notwithstanding the Pope had given them secret aduertisement to the contrarie: and accordingly, those Cities abhorring the inrisdiction of the Spaniards, refused to receive them. Touching them of Modens, they stood not in their owne power, for that the Duke of Ferrara letting not passe any occasion which the calamities of the Pope offred him, threatned them to ouerrunne and waste all their corne which was now ripe, by which copulfio he constrained the to reder up to him the town the fixt day of June, not without the infamy of Count Lodowike R angon, who notwithstanding the Duke had but a small strength with him, left the towne abandoned without making any figne of refiftance. In this action the Duke respected not the authoritie of the Venetians, who perswaded him to attempt or innovate nothing against the Church in such troubled times. And yet they thenselves entertaining intelligence with the Guelfes of Rauenna, after they had fent certaine bands of footmen under colour to defend the towne for feare of those of Congnola, converted to themselves the iurisdiction and possession of that Citie, and under the same cloke tooke the Cattle, after they had made secret flaughter of the Captaine, publishing that they would hold it in the name of the whole league. Not many daies after they possessed themselves of Ceruia and the salts that were there, appertaining to the Pope, whose estates being neither garded nor defended further then the people & inhabitances for their owne interests stood in defence of their places and libertie, Sigismond Malatesta with the same facilitie seized upon the towne and Castle of Rimini.

The affaires of the Pope proceeded with no better course in the Citic of Florence, where when the accident and losse of Rome was related to them, the Cardinall Cortono, whose search greater then his assure, resolued to give place to necessitie and fortune: he saw he was abandoned of those partakers and Citizens who made prosession to be friends to thehause of Medicis: he saw there remained no means for him to leavy monie without vsing means violent & extraordinary; and lastly lacking deutotion to employ his owne purse, at least till he saw a surther event and issue of the armies who were marched to succour the Pope, he stood possessed with passions of search and cowardise, and gave scope to the adversities of the towne without laying to his handto restraine or moderate the vniversall perill. In which disposition, after he had made an affemblie of the Citizens together, he deposed vnto them the free administration of the common weale, having before obtained certaine priviledges and exemptions, together with facultie to the Popes Nephewes, to remaine at Florence as Citizens prinate, being clearly absolued and pardoned of all thingspaft, which they had committed joyntly or feuerally against the estate. Vpon the conclusion of which grants, the fixt day of May he went to Lucqua with the Popes Nephewes, where reprehending and repenting his departure in fo great timerousnes, he practifed to retain to himself the Castles of Pria & Livorna, being already in the hands of Captains of the Popes confidence, who neuertheleste, having no hope of succours by reason of the Popes captiuitie, and being corrupted with some secret summe of monie, within verie sew daies after delivered up those Castles to the Florentyns. In the meane while the people of Florence had reduced their Citie to a popular government, and in that humor had created Gonfalomer and chiefe Magistrare of the pollicie for one weate, with facultie of confirmation for three yeares, one Nicholas Cappony, a Citizen of great authoritie and a louer of the publike liberties this man defiring wholly the concord and vnitie of the Citizens; and no leffe zealous to reduce the government to the most perfect forme of a common weale that was possible, debated the action with reasons grane and resoluted, in a convocation of the great counsell, in whom rested absolute power to establish lawes & create all Magistrates, and sure if the Citizens had given faith to the perswasions of this man, their new libertic had haply endured longer: But as for the most part the passion of spite and disdaine is stronger in him that recouereth libertie, then in another that defendeth it, so the hatreds being great against the house of Medicis for many causes, but especially for that they had bene driven to beare out for the most part with their owne monic, all the enterprises that they had begunne: the people began to perfecute immoderatly all those Citizens that were friends to the Medicus, together with fuch as bare affection to the name of the Pope: they called into remembrance how the Citie had expended not onely in the occupation but also in the desence of the Duchie of Vrbin, more then fine hundred thousand duckets, and as much in the warre which Pope Lee managed against the French king, and in matters happing after his death depending upon the fame watre: neither did they forget the three hundred thoufand duckets which were paied to the Captains Imperials and to the Viceroy, before the creation of Clement. And lattly they reduced into reckning the fixe hundred thousand duckets disburfed aswell fince that time, as emploied in this last warre against the Emperour. These recknings being joyned to the humor of their vniuerfall hatreds, so aggrauated their rage and furie, that they defaced and reuerfed through all the partes of the Citie, the armes and enfigues of the house of Medicis, not forbearing in that course of infolencie to pull downe cuen those scutchions which were affixed and embosted to the publike pallaces builded by them selues. They brake the images or portraites of Leo and Clement, fet up in so great glorie in the temple of Annuciado, so much celebrated through all the world; yea the most part of them omitted nothing appertaining to move the Popes disdame, and to nourish the divisions and discordes of the Citie, wherin they hadrifen into greater degrees of diforder, if the authoritie and diferction of the Gonfalonier had not bene interposed, which yet was not sufficient to remedie manie insolencies.

But by this time were come to Rome with the Marquis of Guast and Don Hugo, all those footbands of Launceknights and Spaniards which were in the Realme of Naples: fo that it was faid they had strong within the towns of Rome eight thousand Spanish footmen, twelve thoufand Launcelinights, and foure thousand Italians; an armie sufficient to do in Italy what they would, aswell for the reputation they had gotten, as for the universall astonishment of those regions, together with the weake prouisions that were made to oppose against them: onely the armie tooke fuch libertie in their insolencies and disorders, the Prince of Orenge being Captaine generall in title and name, but not in authoritie and effect, that they tooke litle care of the intereffes of the Emperous, being wholly carried with the humor of pray and spoile, and to raunsome prifoners and racke the putse of the Pope; matters whose sweetnesse detained them still in Rome, where running arace of tumult and mutinie, the Viceroy and the Marquis of Guast feared least they would extend their furie vpon their persons to the danger of their lines: in which scare they fled. leaving the fouldiers to the hazard and stroke of the plague, which being already begun, kindled amongst them greater brands of infection to their vniuerfall domage. For these reasons the Imperials loft the occasion of many enterprises, but especially they omitted the oportunity to conquer Tologma; a citie which albeit the Count Hugo de Pepoly went thither after the losse of Plague in Rome.

Rome with an army of a thousand tootemen payed by the Venetians, vet it stood and personred in the obedience of the sea Apostolike, though not without difficulty, by reason of the tumult which Lawrence Maluezzo made by the lecret content of Ramafferro and the fauour of the faction of the Bentinoleis, yea (which was of no leffe importance then the refidue) their diforder and carelefnesse gaue time to the French king to dispatch into Italie a most mighty army, with great danger to the Emperour to loofe the Realme of Naples after he had triumphed gloriously in fo great a victory: for, matters going on long time before in Fraunce to a preparation of a new warre, there was established the foure and twentieth of Aprill, a conclusion of the confederation confederation folicited many moneths betweene the French king and the king of England: wherein one con-betweene the dition was, that the daughter of the king of England should be maried to the French king, or to trench king of the Duke of Orleans his second sonne, the election of which should be resoluted at the time of the king of enterniew of the two kings, which was to be performed at Whitsontide betweene Callice and Bolleyne. Another article was, that the king of England shold renounce the title of king of France, receiving in recompence a yearely pention of fifty thouland duckats. The third article barethat the king of England should enter league made at Rome, and to be bound by the next moneth of July, to move warre beyond the Mounts against the Emperour with nine thousand footenen, and the French king with eighteeine thousand, and a convenient number of launces and artilleries: That in the meane while both the one and the other of them, should send Embassadours to the Emperour, both to fignifie the confederation made by them, to fummon him to reffore the kings chill dren, and to enter into the peace with comely conditions: which in case he would not accept within one moneth, their Embassadours should denounce warre to him, and begin it . Assoone as this accord was passed, the King of England entred the League, who together with the French king dispatched two Gentlemen in post to present to the Emperour convenient summons; matters which were done by the Embaffadours of the French and English with a farte greater readinesse then they were performed by the Popes commission: forthat his Nuncio Baltalar Castillion, sparing to sharpen the minde of the Emperour, would not consent to denounce warre against him. But afterwards the Court of Fraunce being possessed with the newes of the losse of Rome, and the displeasure of the accident of the Pope being ballanced with the gladnesse of the death of the Duke of Burbon, and lastly the French king not holding it good pollicie to fuffer the things of Italy so to decline, he contracted the fifteenth day of May with the Venetians, that they should wage in common ten thousand Smillers, he to furnish the first pay, and the Venetians the second, and so forward according to that rule: That he should tend into Italie tenne thousand Frenchmen, under Peter Nauarre: That in like fort the Venetians joyntly with the Duke of Millan should wage tenne thousand footemen Italians: That he should fend thither a new supplie of fine hundred Launces and eighteene peeces of artilleries : And because the king of England not with standing the articles of the contract, shewed no great readinesse to make warre beyond the Mounts; a dealing which was not very agreeable to the French king, they dispensed with that obligation, and in place of that they couenanted: That the king of England to furnish the war of Italy should defray the pay of ten thoufand footemen for fixe monethes full: And at the speciall instance of the fayd king of England Monsieur de Lawtrech almost against his will, was declared Captaine generall of the whole army, during whose preparation to march and passe with convenient provisions of money and other things necessarie, there was nothing done in Italie that was of any consequence : for , both the Emperors army stirred not out of Rome not with standing that many perished daily by the rage of the plague, which at that time ranne also with great mortalitie in Florence, and through many parts of Italie: and also the army of the League, into which at the instance of the Marquis of Saluffa and the Venetians, the Florenzus were entred of new with obligation to defray five thoufand footemen, wherewith the Emperor felt himselfe grieuously offended, for that having at their instance given to the Duke of Ferrara authority to compound in his name, was almost assoone advertised of their contrary deliberation. This army being greatly diminished in numbers, for that the regiments of the Venetians, of the Marquis, and the Swiffers, were ill payed, was retired to-. wards Viterba, and looking altogether to temporife and entettayne, they laboured to hold in the deuotion of the League, Peronfa, Ornietta, Spoleto with other places thereabouts. And afterwards having understanding in that place, that one part of the Emperours army was issued out of Rome somewhat totake breath with the largenesse and scope of ayre, searing least the residue should do the like, after the first payments were made, they retired to Ornietta, and afterwards neare to the borough of Piena: and in that inclination they had retired vpon the lands of the Florentins, if they would have given consent. In this rage of the plague the Castell of S. Angeo was vifited, to the great daunger of the life of the Pope, about whom died certaine speciall men that did service to his person: who amid so many afflictions and adversities, and no other hope remaining to him then in the elemency of the Emperour, appointed for Legat with the consent of the Captaines, Cardinall Alexander of Furneso, who notwithstanding being issued out of the Cattell and Rome, resulted what that occasion to go in the state legation. The Captaines desired to cary the person of the Pope with the thirteene Cardinals that were with him, to Caietta, but he labored against that resolution with great diligence, petitions, and art.

Monsieur Lawtrech Captaine generall of the league,

At last Monsieur de Lawtrech, after he had given order to things necessary, departed from the Coutt the last of Iune with eight hundred launces, and honoured with the title of Captaine generall of the whole league. And the king of England in place to present ten thousand sootemen, was taxed to pay in money for every moneth, beginning the first of June, the summe of thirthie thoufand duckats, which money should be converted to the payment of then thousand Launceknights under Monsteur Vaudemont, which was a regiment of very good exercise and pra-Etife, for that they had many times broken the bands of the Lutherans. The French king tooke alfo to his pay Andrew Dore with eight gallies and fixe and thirthie crownes for every yeare. But before Monsieur Lamirech was past the Mounts, the regiments of the Venetians and the Duke of Millan joyned together, marched to Marignan, whom Anthonie de Leua issuing out of Millan with eight hundred Spaniards and the like number of Italians together with a very few horsemen, constrayned to retire. About which time Iohn lames de Medicis Captaine of Mus, who was in pay with the French king, and expected vponthelake the comming of the Swiffers , made himselfe Lord by suttle meanes of the Castell of Monguzzo seated betweene Lecquaand Coma, wherein dwelt Alexander Bentinolo as in his owne house: for the recouring of it, Anthony de Lena sent thither Lodowike de Belioyeuse, who having assaulted it in vaine, turned to Monceo: but afterwards Anthony de Leua having espiall that the sayd Captaine Mus with two thousand & fine hundred footmen, was come to the village Carato fourteene miles from Millan, returned to Millan: where leaving onely two hundred men (notwithstanding the Venetians were almost ten thousand) and issuing out by night with the rest of the armie, he charged suddenly) ypon the rifing of the Sunne) the bands of Captaine Mus, who at the alarme leaving their houses wherein they were lodged, they retired into a plaine place enuironed with hedges not farre from the village, not thinking that all the bands were there: and albeitthey cast themselues into order, yet by the disaduantage of the place being low and strayted as a prison, they fell all without anie resistance into the calamitie of the sword or prisoners, except many who in the beginning fought their safetie by flying, taking their example of the Captaine.

In this meane while, the Emperour had aduertifement of the Popes captiuity, by letters which his high Chauncellor wrote to him from Monaco, as he went into Italie, whither he was fent by his authoritie: and albeit by his speeches and outward forme of behaulor he expressed how grieuous that accident was to him, yet it was discerned by his fecret motions and affections, that he was not much discontented with it, which he well declared in publike demonstrations, not forbearing to follow the featles and torneyes begun before for the birth of his sonne. But as the delinery of the Pope was vehemently defired by the king of England and Cardinall of Yorke, and for their authority no leffe displeasing to the French king, who in case he could other wayes haue recourred his children, would haue taken litle care and griefe for the calamities of the Pope and vniuerfall domages of all Italy: fo in a cause so generally inducing to compassion, both the one and other the king sent Embassadors to the Emperour, to demaund the deliuerance of the Pope as a matter appertaying in common to all the Princes Christian, and particularly due by the Emperour, under whose faith he had bene reduced to that estate of miserie, by his Captaines and by his army. About this time the Cardinals that were in Italy made a motion, that as well they as the other Cardinals beyond the Mounts might affemble' together at Augnion, to take counfell in so troublesome a time, what course to hold for the stability of the Church, But because they would not all at one time raunge themselves under the power of so mightie Princes, they refused to go thither though with diverse excuses: by whose example also the Cardinall Salviatio Legate in the French court, being required by the Pope to go to the Emperour to helpe his af. faires at the comming of Don Hugo, who according to the capitulation, wasto go vp to the Emperour, refused to accomplish that legation, as though it had bene a matter huttfull to deliuer vp to the power of the Emperour at one time so manie Cardinals : only he sent by one of his feruants of credite the inflructions he had received from Rome, to the Auditor of the Chamber refident with the Emperour, to the end he might negociate with him, who brought from him veric gracious words, but such as promifed a diucrse and vncertaine resolution. And albeit the Emperour could have defired that the Pope had bene led into Spaine, vet for that it was a matter full of infamic, and greatly tending to incense the king of England : and withall for that all the Potentates and prouinces of Spaine, and principally the Prelates & Lords, detelted not a litle that an Emperour of Rome, Protector and Aduocate of the Church should with fo great indignitie to all Christendome, hold in prison the man in whom was represented the person of Jesus Christ in earth. In those regards he made gracious answers to all the Embassadours which occupied his presence there:at whose instance also to go through with a peace, he said he was content to referre the action of it to the king of England, which was accepted by them : and feeming to confirme this good inclination with correspondencie of effects, he dispatched into Italy the third day of August the Generall of the gray Frears, and foure dayes after him Veri de Mighan, enabling both the one and other with commissions sufficient to the Viceroy for the delinetie of the Pope, and restitution of all such townes and Castles as had bene taken from him : he consented also for the better relecuing of the Pope, that his Nuncio should fend him a certaine summe of money exacted ypon the collection of his realmes, who in their Courts and Parliaments had refused to contribute money to the Emperour.

In this time about the end of July, the Cardinall of Yorke passed the sea to Callice with twelve The Cardinall hundred horse: the French king who had great defire to receive him with all shewes of honour, of Yorkein

fent to meete him at his landing the Cardinall of Lorraine, and went afterwards in person to Fraunce. Amiens, where the Cardinal of Yorke made his entric the day after with very great pointe: wherin one thing that much augmented his glorie and reputation, was the treasure he had brought with him amounting to three hundred thousand crownes, both to furnish the expences occurring, and to impart it with the French king by way of loane if need were. They debated betweene them aswell of matters appertaining to the peace, as of occasions tending to nourish the warre: wherein albeit the ends and intentions of the French king were different from the purposes of the king of England, for that to have his children restored, he cated not to leave abandoned to manifelt pray both the Pope and all the elfate of Italy: yet what by the authority of the king of England, and necessitie of his owne affaires, he was driven to promise to make no accord with the Emperour without the deliuerie of the Pope: and therefore the Emperour having fent to the king of England the articles of the peace, answer was made to him by both the kings, that they would accept the peace under conditions of restitution of the children of Fraunce, receiving for ransome of them two millions of duckets within a certaine time, and deliuerie of the Popes person with the flate Ecclefiastike, together with the conservation of all the governments & estates of Italy, as they were at that prefent, & laftly, under condition of an univerfall and generall peace. And because the mariage of the French king with the Emperours filter should still continue, there was fee downe a speciall couchant that the Emperour accepting these articles, the Daughter of the king of England should be married to the Duke of Orleans: but in case the peace succeeded not, the king himselse should take her to wife. After these articles were sent, they refused to give safe conduct to a man whom the Emperous required to fend into France, answering that they had done enough to fend him the atticles of their resolution : which being not accepted by the Emperour; the peace and confederation betweene the two kings was fworne & published solemnly the eight day of August. They determined to employ all their forces in the warre of Italy; having for their principall object the deliverie of the Pope: and touching the maner to proceed in that warre, they reposed themselves upon M. Lamtrech, to whomaccording to the confidence they had in him, they gave absolute power, and before he tooke his leave to depart with his expedition, they suffered him to obtaine of the French king all his demands, for that the king meanting that wafre to fee vp his last rest. The Cardinall of Yorke would also that the knight Casalo should go to the campe on the behalfe of his king, and that the thirtie thousand duckers which were his monethly courtibution should bee deliuered to him, to the end to be assured if the number of Almannes were complete. Thus after the resolutions and directions of the warre were established, the Cardinal of Yorke returned, and at his departure he dispatched the Pronotatic Gambaro to the Pope, to induce him to make him his Vicar generall in England, in France, and in Germany so long as he was in prison: whereunto though the French king seemed by demonstrations to consent, yet

In this meane while there passed but verie few actions and exploits of warre in Italy, the expechation of the comming of Lawtreeb being veric great : the reafon was, that as the Imperial larny full of diforder and difobedience to their Captaines, and no leffe chargeable to their friendes and townes that were rendred, made no great mouing, and gaue no feare at all to their enemies: fo the footebands of Spaniards and Italians flying from the infection of the plague, lay dispersed and wandring about the confines of Rome: and the Prince of Orenge with an hundred and fiftie horsemen was gone up to Stenna, as well to eschue the daunger of the plague, as to keepe that citie in the denotion of the Emperour : and for the better containing the Citie in fidelitie and order, he had fent thither before certaine bands of footenien, the rather for that the people being drawne into commotion at the incenfing of certaine feditious Citizens, had in that tumult facked the houses of such as were of the family of Montenous, and had slaine in their rage Peter Bourgefo a Citizen of authoritie, together with one of his fonnes, and seuenteene or eighteene others. There remained only within Rome the Launceknights, as full of infection and plague, as ripe in disorder & insolency, who being satisfied by the Pope with verie great difficulty of the first hundred thousand duckets, which were partly paid in money, and part to be answered upon bils of Marchants of Genes, being to be repayed vpon the tenths of the realme of Naples, and vpon the fale of Benevient, required for the refidue of their paies due other furcties, and other affignation then the imposition of the state Ecclesiastike; a matter impossible to the Pope being a prisoner: by reason whereof, after many threatnings made to the oldages and sureties whom in great crueltie they kept in chains, they led them in a manifestignominie to the field of Flora, where they set vp a gibbet, as though they would have made present execution of them: afterwards they issued all out of Rome without anic Captaines of authoritie, rather to lodge abroad and refresh themselues, then to execute anie exploit of importance. In which inhumanitie and infolencie, after they had facked the Cities of Ferno and Narno, Spoleto agreed to give them passage and victuals: by which occasion the armie of the Confederates, to affure Peronsa, went to lodge at Pontenono beyond Peroufa, they were encamped before vpon the lake of Peroufa, but they were much diminished in numbers, in regard of the obligation of the Confederates: for the Marquis had with biin threehundred Launces, and three hundred French archers, three thousand Swiffers, and a thousand footmen It alians: the Duke of Vrbin had with him fine hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsmen, a thousand sootmen Almaines, and two thousand Italians: the Venetians alleaged for their excuses, that they supplied their promise and obligation with the bands of soldiers whom they held in the Duchie of Willan: the Florentines had four escore men at armes, an hundred and fiftie light horsemen, and source thousand footmen; and as they were constrained to maintaine a better prouision then all the others, for a continuall feare they had least the Emperours armie would affaile Tuscane: so in that respect they fayled not to make payes to their souldiers in times due, wherein they did contrarie to all the refidue : but the Duke of Vrbin ouer and befides his auncient difficulties, was not without his passions of griefe and disquietnesse, tending almost io dispaire, for that he knew that both the French king and Monsieur Lawerech spake not of him to his honour, and also the Venetians were drawne into a verie ill opinion of him: who, sufpecting either his fidelitie or his inconflancie, had fet a diligent and carefull guard vpon his wife and children that were at Venice, least they should depart without their leave : and in that humor of icalousie and suspition they reproued openly his counsell, which was that Lamirech should draw directly to Rome, without attempting any thing in Lombardie.

... So that all matters of action or enterprise lay afleepe in that armie, who interpreted it to a special grace that the Imperials passed not further. And the Impetials having a litle afterwards received two crownes a peece of the Marquis of Guall, who went to the armie, returned, the Lauceknights

(who agreed not well with the Spaniards) to Rome, and the Spaniards were severally dispersed to Aluiano, Tegliano, Chastillion, and Bolseno: only the generall numbers were so much diminished, especially the Launceknights, by the stroke of the plague, that it was thought the whole army of the Emperour contained not about ten thousand sootmen: here is not to be omitted the report of an act worthy of perpetuall infamie, committed by the Imperiall Captaines before their departure, the discourse of it was this: Gentell Baillon being returned to Perousa with the will & consent of Horacio, who perswading that the disorders betweene them were hurtfull to eucrie one, had made shew that he would reconcile himselfe to him thither went Federike Boffolo with the prinitie and authority of all the Captaines, to fignifie vnto him, that for a finuch as they had found out that he practifed fecretly with the enemies, they thought good to be affured of his perfon not with Itanding he instified himselfe, and promised that he would go to Chastillion: he was left in the guard of Gigant Corfe Coronell of the Venetians, supposing though his liberty was restrained, yet there was no daunger to his life: but the malice of his enemies pulling on by violent hands, the last degree of his destinie, he was the same night saine with two of his Nephewesby A wicked att, certaine murtherers of Horacio, suborned by his commission: which bloudy accident he caused to be also accompanied at the same time with the slaughter of Galeotto, brother to Braceio, & one of the nephewes of Gentill. After this the Consederates sent souldiers to enter within Camerino, by reason they had aduertisement that the Duke was dead, but they were preuented by Storce Baillo in the name of the Imperials: infomuch as Sero Colonno made his entric on the behalfe of Rodolph his fon in law, bastard son to the late Duke. Asterwards the Marquis of Salussa & Federike with many horsmen and a thousand sootmen assaulted by night the Abbey of S. Peter, which is neare Ferno, wherein were Peter Maria Rossa and Alexander Vitelli with a strength of two hundred horsemen and soure hundred sootemen: this enterprise verierash of it selfe, since for the garrifon that was there the place was not pregnable but by artilleries, fucceeded well to them, either by fortune, which is vainly supposed to beare some sway in actions, or by indiscretion, which leades all things in errour and confusion, or elle through the couctousnesse of the Captaines, who having fent out the same day an hundred and fiftie harquebuziers to make pillage of a towne fast by, had depriued themselves of a strength necessarie to defend it : insomuch asaster they had maintained relitlance for certaine houres, they yeelded to discretion, reserving only the persons and goods of Peter Maria Rossa and Alexander Vitelli, who in defending the place which they could not keep had received wounds with the bullet, the one in the leg, and the other in the hand. About this time the riner of Tyber rifing in two or three places about the bankes, overflowed with great hurt the cape of the League, which went to lodge at Ascesa, the Imperials being as yet betweene Farno and Narno: and then paffing further, the Duke of Orbin lodged at Narno, the Frenchmen at Benagno, and the blacke bands commaunded by Horacio Baillon Captaine generall of the infanterie of the Florentines, leeing there was no lodging prepared for the, entred into the towne of Montfalcon and facked it: in which course of insolencie certaine bands of his footmen invaded afterwards Pressia, whither were retired Rodotso de Varano and Beatrice his wife, who in so great an aduernty having no meane to defend themselves, yeelded to discretion: neverthelesse not long after they recovered their liberty, for that Sero being notable to remaine loger within Camerino for the displeasures he received of that armie, compounded to abandon it vnder condition to recouer his fon in law and his daughter. And in this enterchange of actions & affaires, the Marquis of Saluffa and Federike made a practife with the French horimen and two thousand footme to Surprise and Strip the Spanish horsemen, who were lodged at Monte Rosondo without gard & watch, as Alaria Vr sin reported: they had three dayes marching to the place where the exploit should be done, wherein they proceeded with so litle order, that they were disclosed and returned without doing any thing, not with standing they had determined, the better to take from the Spaniards all meanes to flie away, to breake downe at the same time the bridge of Fenerono.

During the whole time of this fommer the actions of the fouldiers that were in Lombardie, were of the like propertie: for as the bands of the Venetians and the Duke being drawne into one strength neare to Millan, with intention to leavie and take away the corne of that countrey, had ouerthrowne the eskart or gard of victuals, and flaine an 100 footmen, taken thirty men at armes and three hundred horse of service & others: so they forbare to proceed any further against their come, for that the bands of the Venetians according to their custome, did immediatly disperse and diminish. Andrew Dorewas retired with his fleete towards Sanona, and the Genomayes ynder that occasion had reconquered Specia: but afterwards the affaires of Lombardy began to take a new life for the descending of Monsieur Lawtrech into Piemont with one part of the armie: who having no mind to remaine idle whilest he expected the residue of his forces, went to encampe in the beginning of August afore the towne of Bosco in the countrey of Alexandria, wherein were left for garrifon a thousand footmen; the most part of them were Launceknights, who defended their lives with fo much the more obtlinacie and resolution, by how much Lawerech made angrie for that they had flaine cettaine Smiffers, would not receive them to rendring, vnlefle they re-ferred themselves wholly to his discretion, wherin the more to confirme them in hart & courage, Lodowike Count of Lodron to whom was committed in charge Alexandria, fent to them oftentimes and comforted them by all the meanes they could: in which good office he had speciall interest, for that his wife and children were befreged also within Bosco: neuerthelesse their adverfitie being farre aboue their power, at last after they had day and night for the space of ten dayes endured the importunate furie of the artilleties, the minds that through their valour were no longer able to make refistance, were compelled through the malice of their calamities to fubmit wholly their liues and goods to the arbitration of Monsieur Lawtrech: who tempering his feueritic and justice with compassion and elemencie, retained the Captaines prisoners, and saued the life of the fouldiers, but with this condition, that the Spamaras should returne into Spaine through Fraunce, and the Launceknights to take their way into Germany by the countrey of Smifferland, and cuerie particular of cuerie nation of them, according to the brauerie of warre, to go out of Tofco without armes, cueric one bearing a white rod in his hand: only in this his magnanimitie exceeded his justice, that he liberally rendred to the Count Lodron his wife and his children. This conquest was accompanied with a happie successe of the affaires of Genes: for flue thips, whereof toure were laden with corne, and the fift with marchandife, which went to Genes, being arrived at Portofino, and to the endthey might passe in safety, nine Galleys being fent out of Genes to accompanie them, it hapned that by reason of an advertisement that Casar Fregosa approched to Genes by land with two thousand sootenien, almost all those that were at Portofino went to Genes, leaving the fleete abandoned, the same giving occasion to Andrew Dore to enclose it with his Galleys in the same port: at which place the Genowayes knowing that they were not able to refift, difarmed their Galleys, and fet their fouldiers on land: by which meane, of the nine Galleys (one being burned) the others fell into the power of the enemies, together with the ships laden with come, and the Caracke Instinuan, which being come out of Leuant, was supposed to have a lading in value worth an hundred thousand duckets: at this exploit were also the other French Galleys, who having taken before fine ships laden with corne which were bound for Genes, were afterwardes drawne behind Codomont, betweene Portofino and Genes. Moreover, at that instant certaine bands of sootemen which the Adorneyes had leavied to bestow within Genes, were overthrowne at Princroce, a place situated in the fame mountaines. This calamitie joyned to many other loffes of money and fundrie veffelles. tooke from the Genowayes being now reduced to extremitie, all hope to make good any further refishance, notwithstanding that at the same time Cofar Fregosa being drawne neare to Saint Peter de Rene, was constrained to retire himselse : but the stroke of samine being joyned to the forces and vexations of the enemies, and no further necessitie remaining to make their calamitie more wretched, they fent Embassadours to M. Lawrech to capitulate: Anth. Adorney who was Duke of Genes, retired within the Callle: infomuch as the tumults being appealed principally by the industrie of Philip Dore who was ptisoner there, the Citie divolued to the obedience of the French king, who created Gouernour there Theodor Trinulce. By the example of this felicitie; CM. Lamtrech drew neare to Alexandria, having in his armie eight thousand Swiffers, who diminished dayly in number, and the tenne thousand footemen commaunded by Peter Nauarre, together with three thousand Gascons whom the Baron of Bear had newly brought into Italy, and also three thousand sootmen of the Duchie of Millan. There were within Alexandria fifteene hundred footme, who for the overthrow & losse of the Almaines of Bosco, were both much weakned, and no leffe terrified, but being releeued afterwards with fine hundred footemen entring by the fauour of the hilles next to the Citie, and guided by Alberig de Beloyenfe, they refumed their spirits and made a valiant defence: neuerthelesse what by the sury of the batteries

Genes reswrneth to the obediece of the French king. batteries redoubled in manie places, & fresh courage of the Venetian bands newly arrived in the armie (who notwithstanding did nothing answer neither by sea nor land the numbers they were bound viito) and also the defendants at the same time being much trauelled and weakened with the trenches and mines which Peter Navarre call, their aduerfities compelled them to yeeld vp Alexandria the place with safetie of goods and life. This conquest of Alexandria bred amongst the Confede-taken. rates a beginning of fome contention: for as Monsieur Lawtrech laid his plot to leauethere in garrison five hundred footmen, to the end that in all eucnts, his bands and regiments might have a fure retrait there, and also such companies as should come out of Fraunce might orderly reassemble and refresh themselues in that Citie: so the Embassadour of the Duke of Mullan, who began to suspect least that beginning extended to vsurpe and occupie that estate for his king, opposed against it with manie protestarions and wordsfull of efficacy wherein the Embassadour of Venice, concurring with him in that mind, and the English interpoling in the action, Monsieur Lawtrech at last agreed, albeit with great indignation, to leaue it freely to the Duke. of Millan; a matter which haply was of great prejudice for that enterprife, for that according to the opinion of many he yled a greater negligence in the conquest of Millan, either through disdaine, or else to reserve himselfe to do it in a time when without regard of others, he might make his profit of it. But after the loffe of Alexandria, it was not doubted but Monfieur Lawtrech would convert his forces eitherto Millan or to Pausa, and therefore that Anthode Leua, who had there with him an hundred and fiftie men at armes and fine thousand footmen Spanish and Launceknights, distrufling to be able to defend Mellan with fo finall forces, and amid fo manie difficulties, should retire his companies to Pania. Nevertheleffe, confidering that Pania gave finall reliefe or store of victuals, and leffe expectation to maintaine the armic there with robberies and extortions, as had bene done rudely and iniuriously at Millan, he changed purpose and stayed at Millan, sending to the guard of Pana Lodowike Behovense, and to the Millanois, who with mony would buy liberty to depart, he fold for corruption and gaine the thing that he could not lawfully give. But Monfeur Lawtrech notwichstanding he was much weakened in numbers of Smiffers, marched on and tooke Vigeuens, and afterwards making a bridge vpon the river of Thesin, and by the aide of the fame palt his army ouer, he drew towards Benerolo, which is a Village within foure miles of Millan. In this order of proceeding he made shew as though he would incampe before that Citie, wherunto he was also counselled by the Venetians, but indeed he was resoluted to take that course which feemed most easie : and because he understood when he was within eight miles of Millan, that Lodowike Beliogense had sent thither the night before soure hundred sootmen, by which meane there remained no more then eight hundred within Pauia: he turned way, and went the day following, being the xxviij. of September, to the Monasterie of Charterhouse, and fro thence with great celerity he went to incampe before Pauia: to the succours or rescue of which Citie Anthony de Lena, taking occasion vpon the alteration of At. Lawtrech, and chaunging his way, dispatched thither three Ensignes of footmen, who could not enter: by whichimpediment, together with the small numbers of men of warre that were there, it seemed the towne could make no great resistance: and in that weaknesse and feare, not with standing they of the towne belought Belioyeuse to make some composition to avoide the sacke and destruction of the Citic, yet he refused to graint them that compassion: but when he saw with what importunitie Lawtrech continued his batterie by the space of source dayes, having reversed so much of the wall, that the small number of men that were within sufficed not to reenforce it, the necessity of the place joyned to the complaints of the townesmen, compelled at last Beliogense to send a Trumpet to Lamtrech, who having no speedy accesse to him, by reason that he was by chaunce gone to the Venetian campe: the fouldiers drawing neare the towne, entred into it by the ruines of the wall: which the facke of being a spectacle grieuous to Believense, and no meane to remedy or resist it, he set open the gates Paula. of the towne, and issued out in his missortune to yeeld himselfe to the Frenchmen, who sent him prisoner to Genes. The Citie was sacked, in which action the Frenchmen spent eight dayes in pillage and crueltie, putting fire into diuerse houses, which in their furie they consumed, in reuenge of the battell which they loft within the parke : then they drew to counfell, whether they should execute the enterprise of Millan, or addresse their forces to Rome: the Florentines made instace to passe further, for feate least Lawtrech staying in Lombardy, the Imperial armie issued out of Rome to distresse them: the Venetians and Duke of Millan, who was expresly come from that would rife by it for the enterprise of Naples: for that as Millan being taken, there remay. ned no hope to the Imperials to have succours out of Germany, so that gate being laid open, Demaunds which the Emperor made to the army of the Confederates if the accord went on.

it was to be alwaies feared that a great army comming from that part, would either put Lawirech in danger, or at least divert him from the enterprise of Naples: but he answered that he must neceffarily passe further by the commandements of his king and the king of England, who had sent him into Italy chiefly to deliuer the Pope. To which resolution it was beleeued he might be induced by suspition, that if the Duchie of Millan were got, the Venetians thinking themselves assured from all daunger of the greatnesse of the Emperour, would be negligent to side the king in the enterprise of the realme of Naples: and haply he was no lesse induced by this, that the king supposed it would be for the benefite of his affaires not to suffer Frauncis Sforce to tecouer wholly that state, to the end that retaining the power to offer to the Emperour to leaueit, he might the eafier obtaine the delinerance of his children by way of the accord, which cotinually was negociated with the Emperour by the En:bassadours of Fraunce, England and Venice: but in the negociation of the fame appeared many difficulties, for that the Emperour made inflance that the cause of Frauncis Sforce shold be referred to the sentence of the law, and that during the trial, the estate of Millan to be holden by him, promifing in all accidents not to appropriate it to himselfe: he required that the Fenetians should pay to the Archduke the residue of the two hundred thousand duckets which were due to him by the capitulations of Wormes, which the Venetian Embassadour refused not, so farse forth as the Archduke would accomplish the said capitulations, and render fuch places as he was bound by the obligations of the fame : he demaunded of the faid V enetians to give to their exiles according to covenant an hundred thousand duckets, or at least affignation for flue thoufand duckets of reuenue: that they should pay that which they ought him for the confederation made withhim, which he wished might be renued: that they should render Rauenna to the Church, and wholly to give over all that he held in the Duchie of Millan: he required thirtie thousand duckets of the Florentines, in recompence of the defrayments and expences made, and for domages received by reason of their inobscruancy: he consented that the French king should pay for him to the king of England a debt of foure hundred and fifty thousand duckets, and for the refidue, amounting to two millions, he required offages: he required to be prouided for him the twelue Gallies of the French king for the conuey of his person into Italy, onely he cut off all proportions of horsemen and sootemen: lastly he demaunded that assoone as the accord were refolued, all the French regiments should iffue out of Italy; an article which the French king refused, vulctse his children were first restored to him: yea when it was hoped that he would mitigate these demaunds for the losse of Alexandria and Pama, it was then he shewed himselfe more firme and resolute, following his custome, which was not to yeeld to disficulties. In so much as when the Auditor of the Chamber came to him out of England the fifteenth of October to folicite the Popes deliuetic in the name of the king of England, he answered, that he had taken order for that by the Generall: and that touching the accord, he would not either for love or by force after the conditionshe had established before. But it was discerned manifelly that the Emperour bare no great inclination to the peace, for that many things gave him courage against the puissance of his enemies: for, he called into confideration that in Italy he might make refishance through the vertue of his armie, and for the facility to defend townes: that he could alwayes with small difficulty make passency supplies of Launceknights: that the long tract of expences had drayned of money and treasure the French king and the Venctions: that according to the custome of Leagues, their provisions were defective and diminished: he had confidence to draw out of Spaine fufficient flore of money, feeing he bare out the watre with fatre lester expences then did the Confederates, being much impountished by the pillage and rebbery of fouldiers, and also for that he hoped by separating the Confederates to make them more weake or negligent: lattly, he promited much to himselfe of his great felicitie, both approued by the experience of so manie yeares, and had bene assured from his infancie by manie predictions. But in this time Monsieur Lawtrech solicited that the armies by sea prepared to inuade either

Cicilia or the realme of Naples, should advance and come on: of which, the fleete of the Venerians (whose provisions either by sea or land answered nothing the obligations) was at Corfon, and fixteene

fixteene gallies were to ioyne with Andrew Dore, who expected in the river of Genes Ranse de Cere, appointed to the footmen of that enterprise. After Lawrech fent backe againe into France 400 Launces, and three thousand tootemen, and contracted with the Venetians whom he coun-felled to render R auenna to the Colledge of Cardinals, and with the Duke of Mislan, that to defend that which had beneconquered, they shold retaine their bands with whom were lanus Fregofa and Count Carazze, in a place well fortified at Landriano, which is a village within two miles of Millan. By reason of whose neighbourhoodsorthat the companies that were within Millan could not go abroad, it was supposed an easier gard would be made of Pauia, Moncia, Bugrassa, Marignan, Binafquo, Vigeuena and Alexandria, Alter he had established these things, the xviii of October he marched with fifteene hundred Smiffers, the like number of Launceknights, and fixe thousand as well French as Gascoins, and with this strength he passed the river of Paw right over against' the borough of Saint John, with intention to abide there the comming of the Launceknights, of whom till then was arrived but a very slender number, and also another regiment of footmen of the fame nation, which the French king had fent to levie of new in place of the Swiffers, who were almost gone away: but from this place he was driven to fend backe againe beyond Paw, Peter Nauarre, with the bands of footmen Gascons and Italians, to the succors of Baigrassa, before which towne garded by the Duke of Cililian, Anthony de Leua was gone to incampe the eight and twentieth of October with fourethousand sootemen, and seuen peeces of artilleties, taking his reason of that enterprise vpon the wants and ill provisions of the towne: which being yeelded to him the fecond day by accord, he prepared to passe into Lomelino, to the ende to reconquer Orgenena and Novaro: but being aduertifed by good espiall, that Peter Navarre was come with a greater supplie of forces, he returned backe againe to Millan. By which retiting he made eatie to Peter Nauarre, to get againe Biagreffs, in which Francis Sforce bestowed better prouisions. It was now discerned that Monsieur Lawtrech deferred with great industrie and art, to depart: wherein albeit he alleaged that the thing that retayned him, was the tarying of the Launceknights, of whom one band being at last arrived under the charge of M. Vaudemont, he abode the comming of the others, and albeit he cunningly accompanied that excuse with a complaint of the slender prouisions of the Venetians, yet it was supposed that the onely cause that held him in deferring and lingring, was the money which he expected our of Fraunce: but the true and most strong reason was, that the French king hoping much in the peace, the negociation whereof was still continued with the Emperour, he gaue direction to Lawerech to diffemble underflow proceedings, his advancing on : whereupon also it came to passe that the king was not readic to satisfie his part of the pay of those Almans which were leuied in place of the Smifers, and much leffe the other bands that were before referred to go with M. Vandemont. With these necessities or rather excuses M. Lawtrech soloutning at Plaisance, and his companies being bestowed betweene Plaifance & Parma, the difficultie which before was had of the Duke of Ferarra was now taken away. This Duke, like as M. Lawirech affoone as he was entred into Italy, had folicited to enter into the League, which was a matter defired by the one fide of the Duke in respect of the alliance that was offered to him with the French king, and on the other fide the same retayning him, both for a distrust he had of the valour of the French, and for a suspition he had least the king for the recouerie of his children, would at last accord with the Emperour: fo neuertheleffe fearing the threats of Lawtrech, he was reduced conformable to the will of the French, demanding onely that the negociation of those affaires might be performed at Ferrara, for that he would in his owne person manage a cause that imported him so much. So that the Embassadours of the whole confederates went up to Ferrara, together with Cardinall Cibo in the name of those Cardinals that were affembled at Parma: and the Duke being not a little mound to fee Lawtrech advance, after he had laboured to infinuate his reasons, and make them feeme good to Captaine George and Andrew de Burgo (these were within Ferrara and greatly honoured and entertayned by him) he left them fatisfied of the necessitie that compelled him to compound, and at last he accorded, but with conditions well shewing either his industric The Dukes of and knowledge how to negociate, and that it was not in vaine that he fought to draw the a- Ferrara enction into his presence, or else by the conditions were well declared the great defire the other treth into the party had to draw him into confederation: wherein he entred with obligation to paie monethlic league. for the space of sixe monethes, sixe or ten thousand crownes according to the arbitration of the French king, who resolved afterwards upon fixe thousand, with bond to deliver to Monfieur Lamtrech a company of an hundred men at armes payed. On the other fide, the confederates bound themsclues to the protection of him & his estate: To deliuer to him Cotionale (which a little before the Venetians had taken from the Spaniards)in exchange of the auncient and almost desolate Citie of Adria, which he demaunded with great importunity: To render vnto him the Pallaces which before time he had possessed in Venice and in Florence: To give them sufferance to win vpon Albert Pio the Castell de Nony standing vpon the confines of Mantua, which he held befieged at the same time: That they would pay the fruites of the Archbishoprike of Millan to his sonne who was Archbishop there, if the Imperials gaue no impediment to him to receive them: The Cardinall Cibo in the name of those Cardinals who promited the ratification of the Colledge, bound the Pope to renew the inuestiture of Ferrara: To renounce the rights of Modena in regard of the purchase he had made of it with Maximilian: To cancell the obligations for the saltes: To consent to the protection which the consederates tooke of him and his: To pronise by Buls Apostolike to suffer as well him as his successours to possesse all that they now enloyed: and that the Pope should create his sonne Cardinall, and bestow upon him the Bishoprike of Modena vacant by the death of the Cardinall Rangon. To this confederation was added that Renea the daughter of king Lewis should be given in mariage to Hercules his eldest sonne, and to indue the mariage with the Duchy of Chartres and other honorable conditions. By the example of the Duke of Ferrara, concurring also the instance and solicitation of Monsieur Lawtrech, the Marquis of Mantua entred into the league, notwithstanding he had put himselse before into the pay of the Emperour.

But at this time the confederate army was very weake, and lay many dayes without doing any thing, betweene Fuglino, Mont falcon, and Benagno: and the Duke of Vrbin who had aduertisement of the restraining of his wife and children at Venice, being departed from the army against the commission of the Senate to instifue his cause, was told by the way that they were deliuered, and that the Senate being well fatisfied of his gouernement defired him to paffe further: by reason of which advertisement he returned to the army, in which the Swiffers and the sootebands of the Marquis were not payed: neither did the Venetians either there or in Lombardy, where they were bound to maintaine nine thousand sootemen, aduance the third part: by which negligence accompanied with an univerfall sparing of expences, the army was declined to great debility: in which weakenesse they retired afterwards to the territory of Lody and the confines thereabout. And the Spaniards upon the end of November were gone up towards Corneto and To scanello, and the Launceknights remained at Rome, to whom the Prince of Orenge was returned from Stenna, where he had made but fmall abode, for that he faw he could not be apt to reorder that gouernement as he thought he could have done. Affuredly it was not to be doubted that if the Emperours army had advanced, the Duke of Vrbin and the Marquis of Saluffa had not retired with their forces to the wals of Florence, notwithflanding they had made many vaunts that to flop them from entring into Tuscane, they would plant a campe either within Ormetto or Viterba, or else vpon the territorie of Sienna towards Chiusa and Sartiano. But Monsieur Lawtrech notwithstanding the bands of Launceknights were arrived, proceeding, for the expectation of the issue of the peace, so slowly as he was wont, made his abode within Parma: where albeit he had reduced into his power the Castels of that City, and had levied vpon that towne and Plai-(ance and their territories about fiftie thousand duckats, yet it was beleeved that he had an intention not onely to subdue to his denotion and power Parma and Plaisance, but also to the end to draw Bolognia to depend upon the authority of his king, he had impression to conuert the jurisdiction of that City into the family of the Pepoles: but those deniles forted to no effect by reason of the Popes delivery. To the which albeit it seemed at the first that the Emperour was not to condificend readily (for fince the newes of his calamitie he had temporifed one whole moneth before he would resolue) yet both understanding that Lawtrech was passed into Italy, and also not ignorant of the king of Englands readinesse to the warte, he had dispatched into Italy the Generall of the gray-freers and Verio de Mighato, with commission to the Viceroy to debate that a-Etion. But the Generall finding the Viceroy dead before he arrived at Caietto, he was then to transfer the negociation of those affaires to Don Hugo de Moncado, to whom as the Emperours commission did also extend, so the Viceroy had orderly substituted him in his place vittil the Emperour

Emperour should fend some new addresse for the gouernement of the realme : and after the Generall had communicated with Don Hugo, he went to Rome, accompanied with Migliato who was come out of Spaine with the like commissions. This businesse and negociation contained two principal articles, the one that the Pope should fatisfie the army, to whom was owing a very great fumme of money, and the other that the Pope being deliuered flould not be adherent to his enemies. To which two articles were tyed hard conditions of oftages and townes for affurance: which difficulties as they drew a long tract and delay in the generall matter, so to make the iffue easie, the Pope failed not by secret meanes to solicite continually Monsieur Lawtrech to advance, affuring him that as his intention was to promise nothing to the Imperials but by force, so also in that case, being once out of prison, he would observe nothing so soone as his person were once transferred into a place of furety, which he forgst not to bring to passe in giving to them the least oportunities he could: but in case he did accord, he belought him that the compassion of his aduertiries and necessities might serue him for excuse. But during the solicitation of these matters, the oflages stale away secretly from Rome in the end of November, not without the great indig-

Long was the disputation ypon this matter, even those being not of one opinion and adulse, in whom was most power to determine: for albeit Don Hugo had sent to Rome Serenon his Secretary together with the others, yet what for his ill nature and the little loue he bare so the Pope, he had no great inclination to his delinery. The Generall bare a contrary affection, either in true regard of office and compassion, or for that he aspired to be Cardinall: and Migliato impugned it as a matter most dangerous for the Emperor, and being not able to result it, he went from them to Naples, of which impiety he bare a right punishment, for that at the first besieging of Naples leading the skirmilh, he was flain with the shot of an harquebuze. The Pope omitted nothing that by industry might be made for his purpose, for he allured to his opinion, and won on his side the wit and tongue of lerome Moron, the counsels of whom bare great authority with the Imperials in all their deliberations. The meane with the which he did allure him, was', that the Pope transferred the Bishoprike of Modena to his sonne, and corrupted him with the promise of certaine corne which he had at Cornetta, amounting in value to about welue thousand duckats : he made fayourable the Cardinall Colonno with a leffe industry, both by promising him the legation of la Marqua, and also affuring him at such time as he came to visite him in the Castell, that he would principally acknowledge to great a benefit of him: wherein he forgar not to worke vpon the humor of the man, that he could not with a greater degree of glory & felicity, then to let all the world know that it was in his power to pull downe Popes, and being once embased and reuerled, that it was in his hand to remount them and rayle them to their former estate of greatnesse. With which infinuations, of themselues full of compassion, and for the party that preterred them, of no leffe piety and denotion, joyned to the property of the Cardinal, being by nature haughty and glorious, inclined him to a ready disposition to deliner the Pope, beleeuing that it would be as easie for the Pope in his liberty to forget to many wrongs and injuries, as being prisoner he was apt with prayers and teares humbly to recommend vnto him his deliuerance. But all forts of difficulties were formewhat eafed by a new commission from the Emperour, by the which he gaue order that the Pope should be deliuered to his contentment as much as was possible, wherein it feemed he held it fufficient, that being in his liberty, he would be for the Confederates no more then for him. Neuertheleffe the matter that more then all other wrought for his deliuery, was, necessitic they had, which made them featefull, least Monsieur Lamtrech would leade his army to the defence of the realme of Naples: which was a matter impossible valesse they were first assured of the payes due to them, in recompence whereof they would not fuffer fo many payes and great gaynes as they had made at the fametime. This necessitie to prouide for the payes, was also the cause why there was made lesse account to be assured of the Popein time to come. At last after long negociation and practife, and many accidents and difficulties occurring, there was concluded in Rome the last of October, a resolution of accord with the Generall and with Serenon in the name of Don Hugo, who afterwards ratified it. These were the articles of the compo- Accordbefition: That the Pope should be no party against the Emperour, neither in the affaires of Millan, Pope and the nor in the kingdom of Naples: That he should accord vnto the Emperor the Croylade in Spaine, & Emperours a tenth of the reuenues Ecclesiastike through all his dominions : That to assure the observation of Agents

these things, Ostia should remaine in the hands of the Emperour, and Cinita vecchia which Andrew Dore had left to him before: That he should assigne over to him Civita Castellana, a towne which had refused to receive the Imperials, Mario Perusquo procurer of the fiske being entred within the rocke by fectet commission from the Pope, not withstanding he made semblance of the contrary: That he should also deliuer ouer to him the rocke of Furly, and to put into his hands for oftages Hipolito and Alexander his nephewes, and till they were come from Parma the Emperour to be possessed of the Cardinals Pisani, Trinuleo, and Gaddi, whom they led to the realme of Naples: That he should make present payment to the Launceknights of threescore thousand duckats, and to the Spaniara's thirty and five thousand: That in so doing they should let him come out at liberty with all the Cardinals, and they to go out of Rome and out of the Callell, alwayes interpreting to liberty when so ever they should be conveyed in safety to Ormetto, Spoletto, ot Perousa: That within fifteene dayes after his going out of Rome he should pay the like quantity of mony to the Launceknights, and afterwards the refidue within three moneths to the Spaniards & Launceknights ioyntly, according to their shares and portions: which residue together with the fummes payed amounted to more then three hundred and fifty thousand duckats. The Pope to have the better meane to observe these payments, and withall to deliver himselfe of the heavy yoke of his imprisonment, had recourse to those remedics, which he would not apply before to keepe him out of that calamity: and in that necessitie he created for mony certaine Cardinals, of whom the most part for their doctrine or vertue were vnworthy so great honour. The fame property of extremity forced him also to consent to the Article of the tenths through the realme of Naples, with power to alienate the goods of the Church: in fo much that that which was dedicated to the service of God (so deepe and profound are his judgements) was converted to the vie and entertayning of Heretikes, and that by the premission and consent of the Vicare of Christ: with which meanes having assured the payments of the money according to the times promised, he deliuered also for ottage for the surety of the souldiers, the Cardinals Cesis & Vrsin, who were led by the Cardinall Colomo to Grottaferara: and fo all things having their orderly expedition, and the resolution set downe that the tenth of Decemberthe Spaniards should accompany him into a place of furety, he fearing some variation either for the ill minde which he knew Don Hugo bare to him, or for any other accident that might happen, the night before he The Pope go. stale secretly out of the Castellin the closing of the evening, disguised in the attire of a Marchant: oth out of pri- Lewis de Gonsaguo who was in the pay of the Emperour, taried for him in the medowes with a strong company of harquebuziers, and with that gard did accompany him to Montfalcon, where difmiffing almost all his bands offootemen, he was led by the same Lewis even to Ormetto, into which City he entred by night without the company of any one Cardinall; an example worthy of confideration, and perhaps neuer hapned fince the Church was great, that the Pope shold in that fort fall from fo great a puissance and reverence, his eyes to behold the losse and facke of Rome, his person to be turned ouer into captivity, and his whole estate reduced to the disposing of another, and within few moneths after to be reflored and reeffablished in his former greatnesse: so great towards Princes Christian is the authority of the Pope, and the respect which mortall men do beare to him.

About this time which was immediatly after Monsieur Lawtrech was departed from Plaisance, Anthony de Leua sent out of Willan the bands of Spanish and Italian footemen, both to feede and refresh themselues, and also to recouer such places of the countrey as were most weake, to the end to open a way and commodity to bring to trafficke of victuals to Millan. These bands exchanging the captinity of the towne wherein they were kept straite, for the liberty of the countrey which gaue them scope, tooke that part of the countrey which is called Spetso. He sent out also at the same time and to the same ends Philip Trouvello with eleven hundred sootemen and certaine light horsemen to Nouaro, in which City was a garrison of soure hundred sootemen of the Duke of Millan: Trouvello made his entry by the rocke which had bene alwayes holden in the name of the Emperour, and finding a very flender defence, he made himfelfe maister of the towne, where making pillage of fome of the footemen, and fending the refidue to their houses, he kept within Nonaro, holding it for a retraite to ouerrun all the countrey thereabout. But there were part of the Launceknights got into Arona, and another part bestowed within Moraro, to whom for that the Duke had fent a strength of other sootmen for the desence of Lomelina and the countrey, countrey, they became impediments to Torniello that he had no liberty to make his incursions farre off. In so much as that winter running foorth in no other exploits then in many skirmishes, both parts made pillage aswell upon their triends as their enemies, and in that liberty of warre ran ouer the whole country with an univerfall ruine of all forts of people. In like fort at that time were joyned and affembled at Linorne the gallies of Andrew Dore, and fourteene French gallies, with fixteene gallies of the Venetians: who after they had received in Ranfe de Cere, with three thousand footmento put on land, they weighed anker the thirteenth of Nouember, to depart out of the port of Linorne: and albeit it was determined before, that they should make an inuafion upon the Ile of Sicile, yet that resolution being innouated, they were converted to the enterprife of Sardignia, at the perswasion as was supposed of Andrew Dore, who haply had in his mind other conceptions . Monsieur Lawirech consented easily to embrace this enterprise, hoping that Sardiania being taken, the conquest of Sicile' would be of lesse difficulty; but whatsoeuer the cause was, the iffue and effect was (traunge and diuerfe, for that falling into the rage of a very violent Horme, they were seperated and turned to their seuerall hazards of the sea : one of the French gallies perished neare the shores of Sardigma, and source of the Venetians being fore beaten with the futy of tempests, returned to Lunorne : the other gallies of the French were driven into Corfa by the rage of the winds, against which the skill of the Pilots had no force, and afterwards they reassembled with the foure Venetian gallies within Portovecchio: the other eight of the Venetians were carried by violence of sea and storme into Linorne: so that after many perils by storme and weather that enterprise stood dissolved, Andrew Dore and Ranse de Cere remaining in great discord together. But Monsieur Lawrech being within Reggia, assoone as he was advertised of the Popes deliuery, he left the Castell of Parma to the officers of the Church, and went up to Bolognia, in which City he made his abode, expecting the comming of the last bands of the Launceknights, who within few dayes afterwards arrived vpon the countries of Bolognia, not in number of tixe thousand as was appointed, but only three thousand, which was farre lesse then was looked for. And neuerthelesse after they were arrived Lamtrech solourned twenty dayes within Bolognia, attending the kings advertisement for the last resolution touching the negociation of the peace. He vsed in the meane while a great diligence, wherein was also interposed the authority of the king of England, to draw the Pope to make an open protestation to cleaue to the confederates. But immediatly after he was arrived at Ormetta, like as there went to congratulate with him the Duke of Vrbin, the Marquis of Saluffa, Federike Boffolo who died a litle after at Lody, and Lewis Ps/ano Commissary for the Venetians: so he besought them with great instance to retire their companies and bands of men of warre from the estate Ecclefiastike, assuring them that the Imperials had promifed him to withdraw their forces, if they might discerne the armies of the Confederates to do the like. And in that compassion he wrote also a letter to Monsieur Lamtrech tending The Pope to thanke him both for that he had done to purchase his deliverance, and also for his counsell he thanketh Mongaue him to procure his liberty in any fort what so ever. He debated with him that his actions and fieur Lawindustry had bene of fo great confequence to constraine the Imperials to resolue ypon the deliucry, that he did no lefte acknowledge himselfe bound to the king and to him, then if his person had bene taken out of that calamity with the force of their armies: the ayde and proceedings of which he would willingly have raried for , had not his necessity compelled him to abandon all temporifing, the rather for that the conditions that were proponed were alwayes changed from ill to worfe, the fame tellifying vnto him in cleare apparance that his fortune had left vnto him no other meane of delinery, then by the benefit & operation of accord; which by how much more it was deferred & put off, by so much more the authority & estate of the Church was to fal into manifest reversement: but the chiefest matter that induced him to determine his advertity by accord, was a hope he had conceived that being at liberty, he should be made an apt instrument to solicite a comon tranquility both with his king and the other Princes of Christendome. Such were at first his phrases and manner of speeches protested in simplicity and roundnesse, as became the office of a Bishop, but especially a Pope, who had received at the hands of God so sewer and sharpe admonitions: neuertheleffeit was not long ere he returned to his naturall custome, hauing not left for the calamitic of his imprisonment, neither his suttleties wherein he could deepely diffemble, nor his couetousnesse which he could not auoyde: for when the Agents which Lamtrech fent together with the Embassador of the king of England were come before him to folicite him to confederate with the refidue, he began to give them diverfe aunswers, sometimes he dismissed them with hope, that he would be reduced conformable to their desires, and sometimes he would inferre excuses, that having neither men, money, nor authority, as it could not helpe them much to have him to ioone with them, so the action could not but be preividiciall to himselfe, for that the Imperials would take occasion to vexe him in many! places: and sometimes he shewed a readie inclination to fatissite their demaunds, so farre forth as Monfeur Lawtreeh did advance; a matter which he desired greatly, to the ende the Launceknights were compelled to depart out of Rome, who going on consuming the remainers of that miserable City and all the countrey confining, would not be brought to give ouer to hunt the pray which they sound so sweet, but in their insolencies neither respecting their Captaines with obedience, nor forbearing civil tumult and mutinies amongst themselves, they demaun-

But from the end of the yeare going before, and much more in the beginning of the yeare following, the industrie and folicitations of the peace began to appeare vaine, and by that reason the minds of Princes and states began to be so much more incented and kindled, by how much leffe they faw themselnes excluded from the hope of peace. For as all the difficulties were almost resolued, seeing the Emperour refused not to render to Francis Sforce the Duchie of Millan, and to compound with the Venetians, the Florentins, and the other confederates: fo this rested only in question, which of these two things should be put first in execution, either the withdrawing of the Frencharmy out of Italy, or the restitution of the kings children: the king would not be bound to renoke his army out of Italy, if first he recoursed not his children, offering to put ostages into the hands of the king of England, to assure the observation of the penalties wherein he was bound, if vpon the refunding of his children he retired not presently his army. But the Emperour made instance to the contrarie, offering the same cautions into the king of Englands hands : wherein the question and disputation running, in whether of themit would be more comely or honest to trust the other: the Emperour sayd it was not reasonable to repose confidence in him who had once deceived him. To the which the French Embassadours answeed, that by how much more he pretended to bedeceived by their king, by fo much lefte could their king repose confidence in him they alleaged also that the Emperors offer to configne into the hands of the king of England the same assurances which their king offered, was neither equal nor indifferent: for that both the case varied in this, that the thing which the Emperour promised to do, was of farre greater consequence then the obligation of their king, and therefore not reasonable to be affured under the same cautions: and also they added, that the English Embassadours who had authority to bind their king to obserue what so euer the French king should promise, had no commission to tie him to the observation of the Emperours promises: and that their faculties and authoritie being limited and restrained to tearme and time, they could neither exceede nor anticipate. Vpon which disputation could foart no resolution, for that the Emperour had not the same inclination to the peace, which his Councell had, the rather for that he entertained himselfe with this opinion, that though by warre he should loose the kingdome of Naples, yet he should be apt to recouer it by rendring the children of Fraunce: yea the great Chauncellour, who long time before was returned into Spaine, was touched much by imputation, to have troubled greatly the folicitations of the peace with cauillations and interpretations fophisticall. At last the Embassadours of England and Fraunce following their commissions in case they dispayred of the accord, determined to demaund leaue of the Emperour to depart, and immediatly afterwards to denounce warre against him: and with that conclusion being brought to his presence the one and twentieth of Ianuary, his Court being then at Burgos, and being followed with the Embassadors of Venice, of the Duke of Millan, and Florence, the English Embasfadors demanded of him the foure hundred and fiftie thou fand duckats which their king had lent to him, and fixe hundred thousand for the penalty imposed ypon him in that he had refused his daughter, together with fine hundred thousand for the pensions of the French king & for other causes. Which demands being proponed for greater instiffication, all the Embassadors of the confederates asked leaue to depart away: but he told them he would take aduice of his Councell before he would aunswere that demaund, being in deede necessary afore they departed, that his Embassadours were in places of suretie. The Embassadours were no sooner departed his presence,

then the Hetalds of England and Fraunce entted to denounce war against him, which he accep- warredeted with a great shew of gladnesse and branery; and in that humor he gaue present direction that municed athe Embassadors of Fraunce, Venice, & Florence, should be conveyed to a rowne fifteene leagues Samst the Emfrom the Court, where, being garded with archers and halberdiers, they were forbidden either to first by the communicate or to write any thing what so euer touching the Duke of Millans Embassador, he land and imposed upon him a commaundement as upon his subject, that he should not depart from his France. Court: only on the behalfe of the Embeffador of England there was nothing innouated.

Thus the negociations and hopes of peace being broken, there remained only inflamed and kindled the cogitations and thoughts of the ware which as it declared it felfe in manifelt preparation through all the regions of Italy, so to reduce to action and beginning the thing that as yet was but in apparance and thew, Monsieur Lawtrech pushed on by the king, but much more by the king of England, fince the hope of peace began to diminish, was departed from Bolognia the ninth of Ianuary, to march to the kingdome of Naples by the way of Romagnia and la Marqua. This way after long confultation was chosen by him contrary to the instance of the Pope, who defired under the occasion of his marching, to reflore into Sienna, Fabio Petrucci and Montenosto: that election of the way was also against the instance of the Florentins, who to the ende to have that army more ready to fuccour them in case the Imperials marched to inuade Tuscane, defired them to take the way of Tuscane: but Olonsieur Lamerech chose rather to make his entry into the realme of Naples by the way of Tromo, both for the commodity of that way to leade the artilleries, & also for the fertility of the countrey yeelding plenty of victuals: & lattly because he would not gine occasion to the enemies to make head at Sienna or in any other place, having a specials defire to make his entry into the kingdom of Naples before he shold encounter any impediment. And affoone as he was departed from Bologma, John Saffatello rendred to the Pope the rocke of Ymola, of which he had made himselfe Lord in the time of his imprisonment : and drawing neare afterwards to Rimin, Sigismund Malatesta son to Pandolfe, contracted with him to give vp that City to the Pope, ypon condition that he should be bound to suffer his mother to enjoy her dowry, to give to his fifter who was not maried fixe thousand duckats, and to affigne for his father and for him two thousand duckats of revenue: That Sigifmund should depart immediatly out of Rtmini, & his father to remaine there vitill the Pope had fent the ratification: and that in the meane while the rocke should abide in the hands of Guido R angon his cosin, who being in the pay of the French king followed Monsieur Lamtrech to the warre. But the Pope deferting to accomplish these promises, Signimund repossessed and occupied agains the rocke, though not without a great complaint of the Pope against Guido Rangon, as though he had secretly suffered him, and not without suspition that Lawtrech and the Venetians had consented, seeming they had defired to keepehini in continual difficulties. The suspition of the Venetians grew ypon the cause of R auenna, which the Pope affoone as he was deliuered out of the Castell having fent to fummon and demaund it of the Senate by the Archbishop of Siponto, he was aunswered with words generall, referring the matter to the arbitration of lafter Contarin Embassador elect resident with him: for not with standing they had given affurance before that they retained it for the sea Apostolike, yet they had no defire to restore it: wherein they were moved as well by interests publike as private, for the commodity of that City, to augment their jurifdiction in Romagnia, fertill of it felfe in graine, and for the plenty of the countries adiopning, of great oportunity to draw to Venice euery yeare good quantities of corne: belides many of the city of Venice had in that territory, great & goodly possessions. And touching Monsieur Lawerech, the Pope doubted no lesse of him, for that befides many inflances which had bene made to him before, Lawrecch notwithflanding he had fent to him after he was come from Bolognia M. Vandemont Captaine generall jof the Launceknights, together with Monfieur Longueuille, whom the king fent to folicite him earneftly to declare against the Emperour, could not obtaine so much of him, the Pope not refusing expresly, but under delayes and excules : and in that cunning he had offered to the French king to give his consent, but under this condition that the Venetians should render to him Rauenna; a condition which he knew could not take effect, both for that it behoused not the Venetias to be induced to it by the kings perfivations, neither was it agreeable to the time that the king should make them his enemies, to fatisfie the Pope. Moreover he gave no inclination to the inflance which Lawtrech made to him to ratific the accord made with the Duke of Ferrara, alleaging that it was a matter

fat vnworthy of him to approue in his lifetime, conditions made in his name whilft he was dead: and yet he alleaged that he would not refuse to contract with him. By reason whereof the Duke of Ferrara taking that occasion, made difficulty (notwithstanding the king and the Venetians had received him into their protection) to send to Monsieur Lawtrech the hundred men at armse and the mony which he had promised: wherein he stood upon this observation, that doubting the issue of affaires, he would not be so much for the French king, as not to reserve place and meane to appease in all cuents the minde of the Emperour, to whom he had excused himselfe by his necessity besides, he entertained continually at Ferrara George Fronspergh and Andrew de Burgo. Neuerthelesse he army for all this ceassed not to advance, which under the leading of Monsieur Lawtrech army do all the tenth of February upon the river of Tronso, which separate the estate

Ecclesiastike from the kingdome of Naples. But in Fraunce after advertisement was brought that the Emperour had retained the kings Embassador, by his example the king caused the Emperours Agents to be restrained within the Castell of Paris, and all Marchants subjects to him to be stayed throughout all the regions of Fraunce. The king of England did the like by the Emperous Embassadour resident with him, whom he eftloones redeliuered, after he was made to understand that no restraint was made upon his. And as the war was now published in France, in England, & in Spaine, so the French king stood vpon this request, that the first action might begin joynely in Flanders, in which resolution he sent certaine bands of fouldiers to make incursions into that countrey. Neuerthelesse the Flemings for all those prouocations, made no emotion nor rising, vnlesse to defend themselves, for that the Lady Margaret of Austria laboting to aucid all occasions to enter war with the French king, would not fuffer her people to iffue out of their bounds and confines. But it was a matter grieuous to the king of England to have war with the people of Flaunders, for that notwithstanding there were to be confined to him afloone as they should be conquered, certaine townes promited before by the Emperor for assurance of the mony he had lent him, yet he held it also a matter no lesse prejudicial as wel for his particular reuenues, as for the general interest & benefit of his realme, to breake the trade and entercourse of his Marchants with those prouinces: notwithstanding according to the obligations of the contract, as he could not apparantly refuse it, so yet he temporised and deferred it afmuch as he could, taking the aduantage of the capitulations, by the which it was lawfull for him to linger forty dayes after formmons made, to the ende to give time to the Marchants to retire themselues. This excuse of his and inclination being both well knowne and approued by the French king, he folicited him that in place to make warte in Flaunders, he would with an army by sea, inuade the sea costes of Spaine, where he assured him he had right good intelligence. By which alteration of counsels it hapned at last, that as the king sending to the French king a Bishop to perswade him to give over the enterprise of beyond the mounts, and to encrease and make frong the warte of ttaly: so by his perswasions and his authority there was an order established, that for the space of eight moneths next ensuing, there should be done no vexation nor harmes by the French and English, vpon the countries of Flaunders, nor any of the effaces or subiects of the Emperour confining upon those prouinces. Wherein for the more casic induction of the French king to condifcend to this order, the king of England was bound to pay thirty thousand duckats monethly for the war of Italy, in which was determined the contribution promifed before for fixe monethes.

The lie given by the French king to the Emperour.

But by how much were augmented and enforced the preparations of the warre, by so much and by the same degrees were kindledand redoubled the hatreds of both the Princes having especially interest in this warre: either of them tooke occasion to multiply injuries and enforce quarrels, in which passions they contended no less with courage and malice, then with sorce & armess for, whereas the Emperour about two yeres before in the towne of Grenado, when in like fort the peace was solicited betweene the French king & him, spake to the Presidet of Grenate the French Embassadout then, certaine words inferring that he would willingly put end to all quarrels betweene the king & him by a singular combat of both their persons, to the end to auoyd so much bloud and affliction of Christians and persons innocent: and whereas also since that the time he had confirmed the same words to the Herald the last time he fignified the war to him, with this addition, that the French king had dealt with him villanously and cowardly in falsifying the saith he had given to him. These speeches being now delivered over to the king, he thought he could not let them lie in filence without his ignominic and dishonor: and therefore albeit the chalenge might better become the persons of knights, then to be performed by Princes of their estate and greatnesse, yet being no lesse guided with the enuie of the chalenge, then desirous to purge and instifie his honour, he cansed to assemble the xxvij. of March in a great hall of his pallace at Paris, all his Princes, attending his person, all the Embassadours resident from the forraine, and the whole prefence of his Court: and in that aspect and stately view of nobles & Embaffadours, the king in his time discended into the hall with a great pompe and surnishment of fumptuous attite, and no leffe honorably accompanied with a traine of Barons: where after he was with all ceremonies of state and dignitie set in his seateroyall, he caused to be called before him the Emperours Embassadour who sued for his dispatch, for that it was determined that being conucied to Bayon, he should be deliuered at the same time that the other consederate Embassadours were set at libertie, who for that purpose were conducted to Bayon. When the Embassadour stood in his presence, the king spake to him, excusing & alleadging that the Emperour had bene principally the cause of his restraining, for that in an example new & against humanity, he had kept retained his Embassadours & the agents of his confederates: but seing he was now to go to Bayon to the end there might be an univerfall deliverie at one time, he defired him to carie from him a letter to the Emperour, and to deliver a message from him of this tenor: That whereas the Emperour had faid to his Herald that he had fallified his faith, he had failely, & that bow many times he had spoken it, so manie times had he lied, and that for answere to the end not to linger the triall of their quarrels, he would assigne him the place where they might together performe the combate. But the Embassadour resusing either to carie the letter, or to deliver the message, the king said he would send to signifie no lesse to him by a Herald: he added also to the metfage, that albeit he was not ignorant that the Emperour had spoken words against the honor of his brother the king of England, yet he would make no mention of that, knowing that the faid king was wel able to deale in his owne defence: & yet if through the indisposition of his body he had any lawfull impediment, he offred to present his person to hazard for him. Not many daies after the king of England gave the same defiance, and with the same solemnities and ceremonies: the same somewhat offending the honor of the Princes of Christendome, who in their rage of malice could not for beare to defile their minds with fuch passions, having running amongst them a warre of so great importance & so much prejudiciall to all the common wealth of Christendome. But amid these great heates and furies of warre & armes, the order of our storie draweth into discourse some report of the king of England touching the refusing of the Lady Katherine of Aragon.

The faid king hadto wife the faid Ladie Katherine daughter to Ferdmand and Elizabeth For what occ kings of Spaine; a Queene worthy of fuch parents, and for her vertues and good behauiour vni- coffon the king uctially beloued and reverenced of the whole estate of the realme. In the time of the father of of England rethat king, the was maried to Prince Arthure eldeft sonne to the Crowne, but being almost fuseth his wife no fooner maried then she was made a widow by the halty death of her husband, she was eft-therine of Asoones by the consent of her father and father in law, maried to Prince Henry the yonger brother, ragon, but with dispensation of Pope Iulio, in regard of the affinitie that was neare and strait: of which mariage was procreated a fonne, who died immediatly, and afterwards there succeeded no other generation of children then a daughter: the fame giving occasion to the Court to mutmure, that for the valawfulnes of the mariage, being not dispensable in the first degree, the crowne was by miracle depriued of iffue male. This occasion was aprly taken and managed by the Cardinall of Torke, who knowing the kings defire to have fons, began to perswade him, that resusing his first wife who infly was not his wife, he might dispose himself to marrie another: wherein much leffe that he was induced by conscience, or of a simple desire to bring issue male to the king, but he was caried in that action with a fecret opinion that in drawing his king to embrace a fecond mariage, he might haply induce him to fix his affection upon the Lady Renea daughter to king Lowis; a matter which was defired by him with no finall industrie and ambition: for that knowing he was generally hated of all the Realme, he fought to prepare remedies for his owne efface against all accidents that might happe both during the life & after the death of the king: he took also one strong inducement to that practife upon the great malice he had conceived against the Emperour, for that neither in demonstrations nor with effectes, he did not satisfie his incredible pride: neither did he doubt for the great authority the king and he had with the Pope, to dispose him to publish judicially the divorce. The king opened readily his eares to this counsell, not that he was caried with these ends which the Cardinall of Yorke had fashioned : but according to the opinion of many) he tooke the chiefest reason of his inducement upon the love he bare to a Lady of the Queenes traine whom he determined to make his wife. In which course of loue and chufing, the king was fo fecret and private, that his pretence was neither knowne to the Cardinall nor communicated with others, but when it beganne to burst out either into knowledge or into conjecture, the Cardinall of Yorke that first infinuated the motion of divorce, had no meane to diffwade him from it, and leffe authority to leade him in another counfell then fuch as he had perfwaded him before. But the king feeking to establish his confeience vpon good grounds, Tearched out of the opinions of Dinines, Lawyers, and men religious, by whom he was answered that his first mariage was not found not lawfull, and vpontheir learning justified it for fuch. Therefore as foone as the Pope was deliuered out of prison, he dispatched Embassadours to induce him to enter the league, and to labour according to the ordenaunce given for the restitution of R auenna: but the chiefest end and industrie of these Embassadours consisted, to obtaine sacultie to proceede in the diuorce, which he fought not by way of dispensation, but by declaration that the mariage with Catherine was of none effect. The king beleeved that the Pope, for that his effate was weake in forces, and his person voyd of reputation, and having no flay nor support ypon the puissance of other Princes, and lastly in recordation of the great sauours received of him for his deliuery, he would not be vucafie to confent to the thing whereunto he was deepely bound by fo many obligations.

To which the king adioyned the confideration of the Cardinals credite, whom he knew for that he had alwayes fauoured his affaires and afore him the doings of Pope Leo, he was very gracious and mighty with the Pope. And to cut offfrom the Pope all excutes of feare for any offence that might happen to him by the Emperour being sonne of the fister of Catherine, and the better to allure him with furcty, the king offered to wage for his fafety a gard of foure thousand footemen; an offer which the Pope barkened vnto, and in that inclination though he confidered the importance of the matter, and the infamy that might redound to him, yet being at Ornietta and as yet in the condition of a Newter betweene the French king and the Emperour, and of litle confidence with either of them, and in that regard effecting much to preferue the amity of the king of England, he had no ftomacke to impugne the kings demand. And albeit he declared in shewes & demonstrations aready defire to be agreeable to the king, yet holding things in suspence for the difficulty of the meanes that were proponed, he kindled fo much the more the hope and importunity of the king and his Agents, which well-spring or originall of many aduersities, tooke aug-

Assone as the Pope had given audiece to Monsieur Vandemont & Monsieur Longuemille, and answered them with words generall, he dispatched to the king together with Longuenille, the Bithop of Pistora, to fignifie vnto him, that being without mony, without force, without authority, and wretched by all other privations, it could litle profit the Confederates to have him to declare? That only he might do a better office to sollicite a peace, to which end he had given him commission to go to the Emperour to exhort him with words sharpe and rigorous to embrace it; a matter which the king would not confent vnto, not for that he remained ill contented of the Popes neutrality, but that he doubted the negociation was extended to fome further matter: neither the Emperour complained that the Pope in fo great a different food indifferent.

Lawtrech enering into the realme of Na. ples, Andrew from Genes.

But now at such time as Monsieur Lantrech trarched and came on, and direction given that the armies by sea should do the like, there were found many difficulties to give impediment to the enterprise: for, the twelue gallies of the Venetians which before were reduced to Li-Doreretireth worne, having suffered many vexations in the exploit of Sardignia, both by the rage of the sea, and for want of victuals, departed the tenth of Februarie from Linorne to go to Corfu to readdresse and resurnish their wants: Neverthelesse the Venetians promised in their place, to send twelne other gallies to ioyne with the French army by fea, which was not without their difficulties for the perplexities they had passed, and for the controversies happened betweene Andrew Dore and Ranje de Cere: by reason of which accidents albeit Ranje remayned sicke at Pifa, yet it was fet downe that Andrew Dore, who with all the gallies was come to the shores of Ludrne, should with his flecte of gallies fet his course for the Realme of Naples: and Ranse with the other French gallies and the foure of Frear Bernardine, together with the foure of the Venetians, which were all affembled into one fleete, should prepare for the enterprise of Sicile. But Andrew Dore with his eight gallies accompanied with eight other of the French kings, croffed faile and retired to Genes, taking this excuse, that it was necessarie both for him and his gallies to take some rest, either for that such was the true ground and occasion, or else the interestes of the affaires of Genes caried his mind with an inclination to new thoughts: for, where the Genowayes had demaunded of the king to fuffer them to gouerne freely of themsclues, and for that gift of libertie did offer him two hundred thouland duckets; the king refuling to gratifie a demaund lo farre from the common weale of his affaires, it was believed that Andrew Dore either the author or at least the furtherer of these demaunds, held it not reasonable that the king should accomplish the conquest of Sicile, if first he did not consent to the libertie of the Genowayes. There was also brought in question another cause of controuerse which was of importance: for, the king having difmembred the Citie of Sauona from the Genowayes, it was doubted least most part of the entercourse and traffike of Marchants being transferred in short time to Sauona in fauour of the king, and for the oportunitie and situation of the place, and that the king making there his staple, and building vessels for his service, the Citic of Genes would stand deprived of most part of her inhabitants and plentie of riches: Andrew Dore employed all the arte and industrie he could to induce

Bue a farre better successe and felicitie followed the enterprise of Lamtrech, then the expeditions of the sea, for that as soone as he was arrived at Ascoly, and had fent Peter Nanarre with his footebands to Aquila, Ieramo and Iulia Noua were rendered to him at the first brute of his comming. The Marquis of Saluffa by the same direction followed him with his regiments by the way of Lionessa: and last of all succeeded Horatio Baillon with an hundred and fiftie light horsemen, and foure thousand footmen Florentines of the blacke bands. The Venetians had also promised to send him without the person of the Duke of Vrbin, fourehundred light horsemen & foure thousand footmen of those bands which they had in the towne of Rome: and in supply of the others which they were bound to administer and employ to the warres of Naples, they had accorded to pay three and wentie thousand duckets for enery moneth: assuring also that for the regard of the nauie at fea, they would aduaunce xxxvj. veffels to give aide to the enterprise of Sicile. Neuertheleffe they gave manifelt fignes that they were wearie of the butthen, & proceeded verie flowly in the matter of expenses, by whose example the French king did the like: seeing at the fame time complaints were come from Alonfieur Lawtrech that the affignation for an hundred and fifty thousand crownes monethly for the charges of the warre which the king had made to him at his departure out of Fraunce, of which was to receive aboue two hundred thousand crownes, was reduced to threefcore thousand crownes onely the moneth, and that but for three monethes to come; a matter which as it brought no fmall griefe and dispaire to him, so he burst out in complaints against the king and his omission and carelesnesse, as not to be moved neither with reason, nor with his faith, nor with the memory and example of his proper domage. This was one especiall point of his griefe and complayning, that where the king had converted to the enterprise of Fontarabie his treasures and forces which ought to have served him for the desence of Millan, it was the cause to make him to loose the whole estate and Duchy of Millan. The en- Peter Naterprife of Aquila fucceeded happily, for that as Peter of Nanarre made his approches, to the narretaleth Prince of Melfa went out of it, & for the French king, did enter the son of the Count Montoiro. In Aquila. like fort the Lanceknights of the Venetians tooke by composition Csustella, a litle towne, but well fortified, and hath his lituation scuen niles beyond Tronto. The taking of this towne was furthered by the preuentio of two hundred harquebuziers Spanish who were fent for the defence of it. All Abruz 3 followed the example of Aquila, & the whole refidue of the realme of Naples had done the like, had not the Imperial army iffued out of Rome. This army after passion of many dif- The Imperial ficulties & tumults, & the foundiers fully fatisfied of all their payes from the time of the Popes de-out of Rome. livery, marched out of Rome the xvij.day of February; a day which had bin moltioyfull & of speciall respiration to the long miseries of the wretched people of Rome, if their calamities which they supposed to be ended by the departure of the Launceknights, had not effloores recontinued in a new course by the Abbot of Farfa and others of the familie of the Vrsins, who entring the towne with the payfants of their dominions immediatly upon the breaking up of the others, did for many dayes many great infolencies. By reason of these calamities, grieuous for their continuance, and lamentable for their wretched succession, descending from one enemie ill, to another that was worse, the Citie of Rome was not onely made naked of a great part of her inhabitants, with the defolation of many houses and pallaces, but also it stood rent and defaced, in images of worthie and auncient presence, of pillars representing the monument and memorie of great Princes and conquerors, of many fingular stones, for their value precious, and for their raretie greatly esteemed, and lastly of many ornaments of antiquitie, such as drew delight to the eyes of the beholders, and gaue great reputation to the towne that so long had preserved them. Neverthelesse the Lanceknights cotinuing in their mutinies, & wold not depart without imprest for two payes, where the Spaniards were latisfied with more facilitie, the Pope desirous to purge the towne of fuch a contagion, was constrained to furnish them with twentie thousand duckets more, which he payed under colour to deliuer the two Cardinals oftages: and afterwards they retained twentie thousand more as from the people of Rome: and albeit it was doubted that this pay was made by the Pope, yet it passed under that name to the end to give lesse occasion of complaint to Lawirech, who not with Handing complained not a litle, that the Pope with that money was the cause that the Imperial armie went out of Rome, by which action his victorie which was before manifelt & certaine, was now reduced to doubtfull termes and vncertaine cuents of warre. There issued out of Rome according to computation, fifteene hundred horse, soure thousand sootemen Spanish, two or three thouland footmen Italians, and flue thouland Launceknights: fo great diminution had the plague brought vpon that nation. By the remouing of the Imperials out of Rome, Monsieur Lamtrech who otherwise wold have taken the straight way to Naples, was constrained to setch a circuite more long by Powilla along the fea coast: he had some reason to take that march, for the difficultie to draw his artilleries if in these places he should have found impediment of enemies to passe the mountaine: but much more to make provision of victuals, least he fell into want if he haply were driven to plant the course of his victorie before the wals of Naples: so that partly by compulsion, & partly vpon those reasons inducing, he tooke his way to Ciusta de Chiora the capitall towne of the furthermost Abruzza: for the water of Pelcairo makes separation of the hithermost Abruzza from the furthermost. There did render vnto him Sermono with many other townes of the countrey, and in that propertie of inclination, either for affection they bare to the French name, or for hatted to the Spaniards, there was almost no towne which fent not out at least xxv. and xxx. miles before, to yeeld themfelues. And yet because he would passe with a greater suretie and stabilitie, he forbare to advance with that diligence which both by his felicitie he might, and by his fortune was offered. And it was believed, to the end to gather in fafetie during the moneth of March, the revenue of the tribute of Powilla amounting to fourescore thousand duckets, and was leavied in fine townes, that he would fend thither Peter Nauarre with his regiments, for whose disagreements and controuerfies which Monsieur Lamtrech was compelled to endure, there was litle good order in the armie. But being deported from Gualt, and understanding that one part of the enemies to whom was joyned the Prince of Melfe with a thousand of those Lanceknights which the Viceroy Don Charls had brought out of Spaine, and two thousand Italian footemen come out of Aquila, was arrived at Nocero fortic miles from Termini drawing towards the sea: and another part of the enemies to be passed to Campo Basso which is thirtie miles from Termini vpon the common or ordinarie way to Naples: he fent out before Peter Nauarre with his regiments of footmen, and went him felfe the last day of Februarie to Sera within twelve miles of Termini, from whence the fourth day of March he arrived at Saint Senero. But Peter Nauarre according to the addresse that was given him, passed on, and in one day entred within Nocero, and in another he got into Foggio, making his entrie at one gate when the Spaniards who were retired to Troya, Barletta and Manfredonia, would have entred by the other. The conquest of these places served greatly for the revictualling of the armie.

The armie that was with Monsieur Lawtrech contained in the whole foure hundred launces, Maffeur Law, and twelve thousand footmen, men not verie well prepared and trained for the warre: but there treches armie. Were to joyne to him, the Marquis of Saluffa who marched before all the others, the regiments of the Venetians, and the blacke bandes of the Florentines, whom Lamtrech defired not a litle to iovne with him: for that bearing a name to be a Colonie of footmen as apt & resolute for assaults as any infanteric that then was in Italy, they ferued as good examples and whetters on of the refidue of his armie, wherin were bodies strong and stable for the fight. But when he vnderstood by the report of Peter Nauarre whom he sent to take the view, that there were within Troya and the confines about it, five thousand Almains, five thousand Spamards, and fifteene thoufand Italians: and that for the bitternesse of the coldthat then was, he was not able to keepe the field, Monfieur Lawtrech the eight of March went to Nocero with all the footmen and light horsemen, and the Marquis of Salusso newly arrived, put into Foggia with the men at armes and a thousand footmen: Vpon which dispersing of the armie, Monsieur Lawtrech gaue it out that he would give battell if occasion offred, aswell for manie reasons generally moving, as chiefly for that the affignations which the king had given to him, being withdrawne and diminished, he was not able long time to fustaine the expences of the warre: he left within Samt Scuero with a flender gard all the Embassadours and other natures of people that were not apt for the watre; and so he seemed to be there in suretie, without anie necessirie or compulsion to give battell but vpon aduantage, neither had he want of victuals, though he lacked meale. Afterwards he iffued out the xij. of March, and tooke the field three miles beyond Nocero and within fine miles of Troya: for, Nocero and Barletta which are diltant one from another xij. miles, are not further from Troya then eight miles. The Imperials who had now affembled together all the companies that were within Manfredonia and Barletta, and had plentie of victuals within Troja, issued out to skirmish, though all the bands of sootmen except the Launceknights, were not paied: and the day following, they tooke the field without artilleries, in a strong place vpon the hill of Troya: but Lautreeb the xiiij, day enuironed that hill on the part about that looketh to the South drawing towards the mountaine, and turning his face to Troja, he began to ascend, where after he had wonne the hill in a hot skirmith, he encamped in a place that commanded them, from whence he compelled them with his artifleries to retire some into the towne and some backe againe: so that both the towne of Troya and the Imperial armie remained betweene the French armie and Saint Seuero: which both made vneafie the passage of succours that might have come to Naples, and also stopped for the most part the victuals that might have bene brought to them: notwirhstanding they consumed not much, as being discharged of all vnprofitable mouths and the generall baggage and traine of the armie: and on the other fide was stopped by them the traffike of victuals that passed from Same Senero to the French campe, besides that they held in danger Same Senero, which they might affault with part of their people and the French not to perceiue it.

The armies lying incamped in this fort, that is to fay, the Frenchmen beyond Troya towardes the mountaine, and the Imperials on this fide towards Nocero at the backe of the towne, and the most part of the places thereabouts being commanded by the French, they remained there in that order vntill the xix day, all the nights being spent in alarmes, and the daies running out in skirmilhes, in one of which was taken priloner Martio Colonno. The Imperials oftentimes cut off the victuals that went from Saint Seuero and Foggiato the French armie, which for that impediment felt some incommoditie & had need of a strong eskort or conduit to defend the victuallers. Here the Imperialists drew into counsell what was to be done, amongst whome the Marquis of Guast perswaded to offer the battell, seeing the French armie went on increasing daily, and theirs was more & more weakned. But the counsell of Captaine Alerson caried most authoritie, who proued by reasons and arguments that there was more hope of the victorie in temporising and fuffering the time, then by aduancing to referre things to the arbitration of fortune. The xix. day the Imperials retired within Troya, to eschue the continuall vexations of the artilleries of the enemies: but having afterwards rampared their place against the futie of the shot, they repaired this ther againe in good feason, and returned in euill time within Troya: but the xxj.day at the appearing of the morning, they brake vp and went towards the mountaine to Ariano, making a great daies march: they found within Troya a great quantitic of victuals farre furmounting that which the French men beleeued before, and having cut offall passages by the which victuals might be brought them, they made to them selves a vaine promise of the victorie. It was then they leavied and brake vp, either to draw the French into aplace where they might find want of victuals, or for an intelligence they had, that the day following they expected in their campe the blacke bands, who as they marched being lodged in Aquila, had in their infolencie facked that Citie, not being prouoked by injurie, or other occasion. The xxij. day Lawtrech incamped at Lyenessa vpon the river of Ophanto, which the Latyns call Aufidium, fix miles from Afcoly, having fent the black bands & Peter Nauarre with his regiments & two Cannons, to take Melfa: where after they had battred a small breach, the Gascoms presented theselues to the wall, & the black bands with more furie then good direction of their Captains did the like: wherin the one nation feruing with an emulation of the other, and they both being well beaten in flanke by small shot, the affault was repulfed with the death of manie Gascoms and threescore of the black bands : and the fame furie continuing, they ran the like fortune the next day in another affault which they gaue, after the batterie had executed: but in the night there came to the campe a succour of attilleries fent by Monsieur Lawtrech, with the which having made two great batteries the morning following, the pailants within Melfa began in their feare to draw into tumult: by which accident the fouldiers being in number fix hundred, and troubled in their ordinarie office of feruice by the mutinie of the payfants which fill redoubled into worfe degrees, they abandoned the defence of the place: in fomuch as the whole campe entring where no refisfance was made, they turned their felicitie into bloud, flaying in their furie all the payfants and men of the towne: onely the fouldiers retired into the Caffle together with the Prince, who not long after yeelded fimply as was faid, to discretion notwithstanding they pretended that their lives were excepted. The Prince was faued with a verie few of his followers, all the others were put to the fword, containing three thousand bodies, and the towne deliuered up to facking. In the towne was found great store of victuals to the great commoditie and comforting of the French men, who, for their hard provision, suffred no small wants in Powella. The xxiiij, day the Spaniards departed from Ariano and incamped at Tripaldo, which is xxv. miles from Naples vpon the high way, and xl. miles from Ofanto, with whom ioyned the Viceroy, the Prince of Salerno, and Fabricio Maramo with a regiment of three thousand footmen and twelue peeces of artilleries: it was thought also that Captaine Alarjon issued out of Naples with two thousand footmen to succour Dogania: but Lawtrech staied upon the territories of Ofanto to make great protifions of monie, and had all his companies incamped betweene Ascalo and Melfa: and fince the accident of Melfa, were rendred to him Barletto, Trany & all the townesthereabouts except Manfredonio, wherin was a strength of a thousand footmen. In this successe and rendring of townes, he sent out Peter Nauarre with foure thousand footmen to take the Rock of Veno/a, which being garded and valiantly defended by two hundred & fiftie Spanish footmen, he tooke it at last to discretion, and retaining the Captaines prisoners, he sent away the others without weapons: and there he had ginen order that the reuenue of the tribute of Powilla should be received for him, which for the troubles and impediments which the warre brought, answered not the value and price that were wont to rife by ir. In this place the commissarie Tylano with the Venetian regiments containing about two thousand footmen, came to Monsieur Lawtrech, who in this fort was bushed to assure himself of victuals and provisions; a matter which was made more easie to him, after he had got into his power Ascoly by the meane of the Venetian regiments: and at this time rising into courage by the happy cuent of his affaires, he vrged the Pope with haughty words to declare himself for the league: who not with flanding they of Viterba would not before receive him for their gouernour (of which Octanian Spirito was the cause) yet being afterwards ranged and made pliable through feare, he had transported his Court to Viterba. And Vespatian Colonno being dead at the fame time, who ordained by histestament that I fabell his onely daughter should be maried to Hipolito de Medicis, the Pope vnder that colour got possession of all those places which he held in the territories of Rome, not with standing Askanio pretended that they appertained to him by the ceasing of the line masculine of Prosper Colonno. About this time Monopoly was rendred to the Venetians, for whom, and to wholevie according to the last couenants made with the French king, were gottenall those ports of the Realme of Naples which they possessed before they were overthrown by king Lowis the xij. in Guiaradadda.

By reason of these prosperities of the French, the Duke of Ferrara was induced to send his some into France, to accomplish and give perfection to the mariage; a matter which he had deferred before by great industrie, resusing with the same pollicie to be Captaine of the League. But the Emperour who sent no menout of Spaine to releeve the dangers of the kingdome of Naples, had given ordenance that the Duke of Brunsmich should passe out of Germany into Italy with new supplies of Launceknightes for the succour of that kingdome. These supplies were prepared with so much the more care and diligence, by how much they understood the necessity to rescue it was great for the comming on of Monsieur Lamtrech. But to the end the aduancing of those supplies should not trouble the hope of the victory, it was agreed by the consent of the king Monsieur S. of England, the French king, and the Venetians, that the Lord Francis of Saint Poll, discended of Poll appointed the house of Burbon, should passe into Italy with four hundred launces, fine hundred light horse-tothewarres men, five thousand so temen French, two thousand Smiffers, and two thousand Launceknights. of Italy. This army was appointed to follow them if they passed to Naples, and otherwise, to make the warre vpon the Duchy of Mullan , adioyning to them the regiments of the Venetians and the bands of Francis Sforce. For the defrayment of this army, was fet downe a pay of threefcore thousand duckats monethly : of which the king of England was to contribute enery moneth thirty thousand : and the Venetians had resolved in the counsell of Pregati, to wage ten thoufand footemen.

In this time the inhabitants of Atillan were reduced to an extreame and milerable subjection Milerable for the intellerable exactions imposed by Anth. de Lena: who the betterto provide for the payes their of of his fouldiers, had drawne into his owne hands all the victuals of the City, and haning bestowed Millan. them in publike store-houses and Garners, he sold them in his owne name at what rate or price he would, the inhabitants being driven to buy them according to his law, or elfe to die for hunger; and yet the money rayled vpon that extreame meane, being not sufficient to pay the Launceknights that were lodged inhouses, they were suffered to make dayly raunsomes of the maisters and owners, of whom fuch as would yeeld no money, were kept in chaynes and irons: And because to anoydso great crueltics and intollerable impostes, many did fly continually out of the city not with Handing the rigour of the commandements and diligence of the warders, there was confiscation of goods published against such as were absent, who were so many innumber, that to anoyd the trouble to fet them downe in writing, they caused them to be put in print. The Nobles and best fort of Citizens such as remained there, were seene in their garments poore and ragged, and in their countenances aftonished and desolate, expressing by a lamentable compassion. the calamities they endured, & their pallaces and places of best frequentation were reduced to ruines & tubbege, fuch as were heavy testimonies of the cruelty of the Spaniards. And yet all things fucceeded happily to him that was the causer of all these miseries: for where Captaine Mus lay incamped at Leegua with fix hundred footemen as a fouldier of the League, and having taken away the barkes to the end the Sprniards that were within Coma, could not refcue it by the way of the lake, Anth. de Leua with the bands of footmen that were within Novaro iffued out of Mil-Im and incamped fifteene miles beyond with the Launecknights: and after he hadtaken the rocke of Olgina standing upon the shores of Adda, which Captaine Mus had taken before, he sent Philip Trouvello with the bands of footmen Spanish & Italians, to give succors to Lecqua standing vpon the other shore of the lake, where Captaine Mus with the ayd of the fouldlers whom behad crawne from the Venetians and Duke of Millan, and with certaine peeces of artilleries from the Venetian campe, had taken and fortified all the passages, of themselves containing many disticulties, for the Heepeneffe of the mountaines and other places of hard accesse. But the Imperials who tooke the mountaine opposite that commaundeth Lecqua, after they had made many vaine attempts to passe in many places, at last they forced that place where the Venetian souldiers garded; companies whom the Captaine either for that he had leffe confidence in their vertue, or ar least to bestow them where was least danger, had dispersed into places most steepe & inaccessible; Captaine Mus with his fouldiers and artilleries, was effoones remounted upon the barkes and faued himselse, not without suspition that the Venetians had made a light desence to gratify the Duke of Millan, to whom it was nothing agreeable that he tooke Lecqua. And afterwards to the end to cary by accord that which he could not win by armes, he changed both the feruice & pay wherin he was, and goeth to the Imperials, obtaining of Aatho.de Lena by way of accord for reward of that infidelity, both Lecqua and many other places: and he got of Ierom Moron, who by letters & intelligence had bin the author of this practile cellion of his rights. By reason of this accord Anth. de Leua who before had bin much afflicted by hunger, was releeved both with victuals & mony : for the Captaine who aspiring to high and great things, tooke afterwards upon him the title of Marquis, payed thirty thousand duckats, and sent into Millan three thousand sackes of corne.

During all this while Monsieur Lamtrech marched towards Naples, and by the third day of Aprill was come to the Rocke Manarda, having left for the gard of Pomilla (where onely Manfredonia held for the Emperour) fiftie men at armes, two hundred light horsemen, and xv. hundred or two thousand footmen, all bands of the Venetians. But the Imperials who had resolued in abandoning all the countrey thereabout, to lay onely for the defence of Naples and Casetta, and to cut off victuals from the enemics, after they had facked Nola, and caried to Naples all the victuals that were within Capua, they encamped upon the hill of Saint Marin, and the day following entred within Naples withten thousand footmen Spanish and Launceknights, having decassed the bands of the Italians, except fixe hundred who were under Fabricio Maramo, for that Sero Colonno was gone to Abruzza with his bands of footmen. Naples was vetic naked of inhabitants, for that almost all men of qualitie, and such to whom their fortune had yet left anie meane, were retired into 16hia, Capria, and other Ilands confining. It was supposed that there was within the towne sufficient prouision of corne for more then two moneths, but for flesh and other natures of victuals, the quantities were very small. Capua, Nola, Acero, Anersa, and all the places therabout yeelded to Monsieur Lamtrech, who remained source daies with his armie in the Abbey of Acero which is seuen miles from Naples. He had advanced and did still march with a verie flow pase, to the end to tarie for the victuals which could not observe the speed of the armie for the impediment of fowle waies and raines, such as had made all the countrie full of waters: befides, it behoued him to make great provisions of victuals, for that the brute ran that his armie according to the corruption of the discipline of warre at this day, contained more then twenty thousand horsemen, and fourescore thousand sociemen, of whom two parts were men unprofitable for feruice. From this place he fent out to the enterprise of Calabria, Sumon Roman with an hundred and fiftie light horsemen, and fine hundred Corsikans not payed, but were come from the Campe of the Imperials: and Philip Dore who with eight galleyes of Andrew Dore and two ships was come into the waters of Naples, both tooke a ship laden with graine, and with his artilleries draue the Imperials from Magdelaine: and albeit with the same valour and fortune he tooke a litle afterwards two other thips laden with graine, and brought vpon the enemies many other discommodities, yet his gallies onely were not sufficient to hold the port of Naples wholly be fieged: for the helpe whereof Lawrech folicited that the fixteene gallies of the Venetians might be joyned with the fleete of Philip. These after they were with flow diligence affembled in order at Corfn, were now come up to the port of Trany: but not withstanding the Cities of Trany and Monopoly were alreadie rendred to the Venetians, yet those gallies preferring their particular profits before foreine interests, though they knew that all things depended vpon the victorie of Naples, yet they were flow to aduaunce, to the end to take also Pulignano, Ottronto, and Brunduso. The seuenth day of Aprill Lawtrech encamped at Cauiano within five miles of Waples; and the same day the light horsemen of the Imperials whose celeritie and diligence appeared farre greater then the negligence of the Frenchmen, tooke from the French a great quantitie of victuals; a prouision which they were not well furnished of. They had also fortified Saint Hermo, which is in the top of the mount Saint Martin, and commaunds much the towne of Naples, to the end to take from the Frenchmen all commodities to vexe it with their artilleries; and for that they were maissers of that mountaine, they gave impediment to the French to approch neare the most partes of the Citie. The Frenchmen tooke some hope of good event by the discords that were amongst the enemies, of whom the Marquis of Guast for some particular quarell, hurt the Count Potensa and flue his sonne. But the one and twentieth day the French armie came to Caforia within three miles of Naples vpon the way of Auerfa: and the same day was embraced of both parties a skirmish under the walles of Naples, wherein was slaine Migliato, he who had impugned by all his industrie the deliuerie of the Pope, for the which he was the bearer of the Emperours Commission to his Captaines. The two and twentieth day the armie encamped within a mile and an halfe of Naples, where Monsieur Lawtrech forbad his fouldiers to skirmish, as a matter unprofitable to the clate of the service: there was Pozzolo rendred to him. At last, being the last but one of Aprill, he brought his armie verie neare the Citie of Na-The Frenchbee ples, and encamped betweene Poggio Royall, which is a stately house for pleasure, and builded by Alfonso of Aragon the second, when he was Duke of Calabria, and the hill of Saint Martin: the campe was extended even within halfe a mile of Naples, & the person of Monsioner Lawtrech lay formewhat before Poggia Royalat the pallace of the Duke de Monte Alto: in this place he had made great fortification, firetching out the face of his lodging towards the way of Capua. It was a place of verie good fituation, and aprly feruing to cut off from them of Naples the commoditie of the water conduicts that come from Poggia Royal. He made account to plant another lodging formewhat before that, about the hill that is beneath the mount Saint Hermo, to the end to cut off more commodities from those of Naples, and to vexe the towns more neater. But to have a more true and perfect information of these matters, it were necessaries for downe by description the situation of the Critic of Naples, and the countrey thereabouts.

THE ARGUMENT.

Lawtrech bessegeth Naples. In the meane while Anthony de Leua taketh Pauia, and bessegeth Loda. Indrew Dore leaueth the pay of the French. Monssenr Lawtrech dieth. The French breake up from besore Naples. Monsseur de Saint Pol reconquereth Pauia. Andrew Dore taketh Genes. The Genowayes take Sauona, and put themselves in the Pope. Monsseur de Saint Pol is taken by Anthony de Leua. The Emperour fallethro accord with the Pope. Peace is made at Cambray betweene the Emperour and the French king. The Emperour passethinto Italy, where the warre is made against the Florentines, and peace is solicited with all others.

Hus Monseur Lawtrech having reduced his whole armie vinder the wals of Naples, the first thing he drew into consultation was, whether it were best to attempt the expugnation of the towne with the furie of artilleries and valor of men, as many of his Captaines adulfed him, wishing that for the better execution of the enterprise, the regiments of sootemen might be increased with new numbers: they alleaged many difficulties, in regard of which there could be no hope to entertaine the armie any long space before the towne. The first difficultie consisted in victuals, the traffike and refort whereof was alwayes in danger by the inrodes of the enemies, who having many companies of light horfemen, commaunded by their incurfions all the wayes and paffages of the fields. The second impediment rested in the hope verie vncertaine that Naples would render for famine, by reason the gallies of Philip Dore being not sufficient to hold the port besieged or restrained, and the Venetian gallies not arriving notwithstanding they were promised daily, there came from Caietta to Naples foure gallies laden with meale, and by the weake defence of the hauen, other veffels entred the towne daily with reliefe. The third doubt was referred to the cold prouifions of the Venetians, who being taxed to pay monethly to Monsieur Lawtrech two and twentie thoufand duckets, were alreadic become behind with him for threefcore thousand. The successe of the enterprise stood also desperate, both by the slender releefe of money that came out of France, and also by the maladies and dileases that generally raigned in the armie, such as did not proceede fo much by the (tinch and ordinarie corruption of that aire, which by custome beginneth to deliuer infection in the end of Sommer, as through the great quantities of raines that fell, which by fo much more offended the armie, by how much most part of the soldiers lay in the ope fields, having no other couer then the skie: yet neuerthelesse Lawirech considering that in so great a multitude and vertue of defendants, wherein he knew to confift not the least difficultie, & for the fortification of the mount Saint Martin which lay apt to be fuccoured, it would be an action verie hard eiwher to take the hill, or to force the towne; and haply forceeing not to expend his monie with small hopes, fearing to want for the furnishment of expences ordinarie, tooke this resolution, not to affault the towne, but to befiege it: hoping that in verie short time the enemies would fall into the want of victuals to feed their bodies, or monic to containe the fouldiers: fo that yuder those hopes, and the reasons and considerations of them, he converted his whole mind and all his prouisions to the besieging of Naples, cutting offall meanes of accesse or resort of victuals by land, and foliciting the comming of the Venetian gallies to reduce the towne to an absolute prination of reliefe by fea and yet altering his refolution in fome points, he fet the campe at liberty to skirmish, least the fouldiers living without action might become effenting te and abated in valour: infonuch as there passed manie skirmishes betweene the campe and the defendants of the towne, to the great commendation of the fouldiers of the black bands, who being most resolute and ready in that kind of fighting by the discipline of lohn de Medicis, had not as yet made anie shew of their valour in the plaine field in anie battell pitched and ranged, where they were to keepe their ground, and either to be found dead or living in the places appointed to them. About this time came to the armie fourscore men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, and an hundred from the Duke of Ferrara, who notwithstanding he had bene amply received into the protection of the French king and the Venetians, yet he deferred fo long as he could to fend to the armie, referuing to him felf to dreffe and regulate his deliberations according to the coniccure and judgment of the accidents and events of the warre.

Resolutio of the Imperials within Naples.

In this estate and condition of affaires the Imperials were not without their hopes to be able to breake the fleet of Philip Dore, who rode with his gallies in the gulfe of Salerne: in which enterprise they teposed not their foundation and hope so much in the numbers and goodnesse of their vessels, as in the valour and dexteritie of their souldiers: for they surnished fixe Gallics, foure Foistes, and two Brigantines, with a thousand harquebuziers Spanish, and that of the most approved and best choise of the armie; and with them entred as commanders, Don Hugo Viceroy accompanied almost with all the Captaines and personages of authoritie. To this armie by sea, disposed and gouerned by the direction of Gobbo, a stout and famous Captaine for sea service, were adjoyined manie Barkes of fishermen, to the end to assouth the enemies a farre off through the multitude and number of vessels appearing. This fleet departed from Possilpo, and by a direct course made with the Ile of Caprio, where Don Hugo to the great prejudice of that exploit, loft time to heare a Spanish Hermit, who under reasons and perswasions of his profession, inflamed them to fight according to the glory of that nation gotten in fo many victories. From thence, leaving on the left hand the Cape of Minerna, they entred into the maine fea, and fent before two Gallies with this direction, that being come within fight of the enemies, they should make shew as though they would give backe and slie, to the end to draw the enemies into the maine to fight. But Philip Dore being aductifed the day before by verie faithfull and affured espials of the intention and fratageme of the enemics, dispatched a messenger with diligence to Monsieur Lawtrech, to fend to him forthwith three hundred harquebuziers, who being commanded by Captaine Croche, were arrived with Philip Dore alite before the Nauie of the enemies were discouered: which when he beheld a far offresembling (for the number of vessels) a huge wood, Fight at feather notwithstanding he had before with great courage advanced all necessarie preparations to exeeweeneshe In- cute the fight, yet the confideration and view of the vellels guing him manie timerous impressions, he flood long suspended betweene hope & feare: but he was presently deliucred of that perplexitic, when by the drawing neare of the fleet of the enemies, he discerned them to contains not aboue fixe veffels of helme: therefore with a courage refolute, and as a Captaine well experienced in the wars by fea, he caused to enlarge and as it were he east off as though they would run away, three other Gallies of his, to the end that with spooning afore the sca and winning the wind, they might in their time charge the enemies both in fide and in powper and the person of himself with fine gallies made directly with the front of the enemies, who were to discharge their artilleries to take from him by the thicknesse of the smoke, both his leuell and his view: but Philip to turne vpou themselves the danger he saw prepared for him, gaue fire to a very great Basiliske, whose force caried his charge with great violence through the gallie Admirall of the enemy, wherin was the person of Don Hugo, and at the first shoot, killed fourtie men, of whom the

the Captaine of the gallie was one, with many officers and men of place. This furie of the Bafiliske he followed with all his other forts of artilleries, by whom were executed and hurt many bodies of the enemies: who for their partes loft no time both to defend and endomage, for that the artilleries of the gallie of Don Hugo being fired at a token given, flue the Captaine, and hurt the Patron of the gallie of Philip. In which medly the great artilleries having done their executio, the gallies by the helpe of their oares, drew neare one to another, & with their small shor & other furies which men in fight do vie, began a bloudie fight : in which the Genomais who were not without training and experience in such encounters, had better meanes to avoid the perill, by fighting low, and as it were bowing downe, standing vpon their gards within the bodie of the panishes or couerts. As these two gallies were in fight together with a wonderfull furie and astonithment, three other gallies of the Imperials obserning their advantage, invironed straightly two of the Genowars, and had already got the upper hand : but the three first gallies of Genes that made as though they ran away, were got into the maine sea, and with the sauour of the wind came with a fierce charge vpon the enemies, and playing in flank vpon the gallie Admirall, they Death of the renerfed with a flot the maine yard of the gallie called the Neptune, which did no finall do-Viceroy, Don mage to her feruice: there Don Hugo having alreadie a wound in his arme, whilft he was labo-Hugo Monearing to encourage his fouldiers, and neuer was free from the danger of stones and wildfires which do. were throwne from the tops of the enemies gallies, was flaine in fighting, giving by his death an honorable testimonie of his valour and fidelitie: there the Admirall of Philip and the gallie called the More rent in peeces the Admirall of Don Hugo, and the other two, with their artilleries funke the gallie of Gobbo wherin Fieromo/quo died; and in the meane while the other gallies of Philip hadrescued and reconcred two gallies of their companie fore pressed by the Spaniards, & in that action had taken their Foiltes: onely two Spanish gallies not without some grieuous testimonie of the encounter, fell off from the fight, feeing the absolute victorie of the enemies. The Marquis of Guaft and Askanio, their gallie being in perill both of water and fire, their oares broken and their fouldiers bleeding in their deadly wounds, were made prisoners, the shining of their armours being gilt preserving their lives, which their valour could not do. In this battell Philip was much holpen by certaine captines whom he delinered, who being for the most part Turkes and Mores, shewed their crueltie in the fight, according to the custome of those nations. The dead bodie of Don Hugo was cast into the sea, without other ceremonie or regard of his greatnesse, and likewise Fieromosquo. The principals of the prisoners of this battell, were the Matquis of Guaft, Askanio Colonno, the Prince of Salerne, Saint Croffe, Camille Colonno, Gobbo, Serenon, with many other Captaines and gentlemen of marke: the dead bodies of this battell conrained more then a thousand footmen, and of the Spaniards there were verie few, who were not either flaine or grieuoufly wounded : the prisoners with three gallies were sent by Philip to Andrew Dore, and one of the two gallies that escaped, passed not long after to the pay and service of the French . By this victoric, as the Frenchmen role into great hopes of good successe for the generall enterprife, wherin haply their prefuming was not without prejudice, for that it reduced Lawtrech to a more negligence or omillion in the provisions that were to be made : fo on the other fide it replenished the Imperials with no small feare and astonishment to fall into want of victuals, feeing both they remained depriued of all commandement by fea, and also the fauours of the land were taken from them in many pattes, but especially fince the losse of Pozzolo, a place which administred a great traffike of victuals to Waples: and the towne of Naples was alreadic vietafiell of falleninto great wants of meale and flesh, and the store of their wine well wasted : infomuch as the Imperials being through their necessity driven to follow the examples and cruelties of men of warre in that as the for the case, the day after the ouerthrow at sea, they put out of the Citie no small numbers of mouths vn- ring the sego profitable, and establishing orders for the distribution of victuals, they provided in any wife that of Maples. the Launceknights should have lesse wants then the other souldiers. By these expulsions & good . information of their other doings within the towne, Lawtrech nourished his first hope, which was also well increased and confirmed by a surprise made of a Brigantine the seventh day of May, wherin he found by certaine letters written to the Emperour by his Captaines, that the flower of the armie was loft: the towne was not prouided of come for a moneth and a halfe: that they were driue to grind their meale with the force of their hands; that the Launceknights began to incline to tumult: that there was no monie to furnish their pay: & that there remained no remedy by sea and land. To which extremities was not forgot to be adjoyned the stroke of the plague begun in Naples, which is fo much the more contagious where Launceknights do frequent, by how much in their rudenesse theyforbeare not to converse with such as are insected, and much lesse to manage and vie in their owne persons, any thing that was theirs. On the other side the French men were not free from those afflictions and calamities which a warre traineth after it: they suffered great want of water, for that from Poggio Royall, even ynto the front of the army, the campe was served onely with cesternes: the maladies of the campe went on multiplying & increasing, which diminished not a litle the strength of the armie: and the enemies being far aboue them in light horsemen, made continuall fallies, especially by the way that leadeth to Soma, and did not onely bring to the reliefe of the towne much flesh and many forts of wines, but also cut off oftentimes the trassike of victuals that passed to the French campe. Many of the Captaines dealt with Lawirech to wage more companies of light horsemen to oppose against the cauallerie of the enemie, which he did not onely refuse to do, contrarie to good foresight and order of warre, but also he gaue sufferance to the most part of the French horsemen to ly disperfed within Capua, Auer fa, and Nola; a matter which made easie to the enemies all their exploits: others perswaded him for that diseases had done much to diminish the infanterie or sootmen of the armie, to leauie a proportion of feuen or eight thousand footmen, as well to supply the weaknes of the armie, as to be more frong and mightie according to their defire in the beginning; a counfell which as he had begun to denie alreadie, so he stood resolute to resuse : still, alleadging that he had no money, notwithstanding he had at that time received from France a convenient provision, and had gathered the tribute of the cattell of Powilla, together with the taxation of the townes which he had taken, and lastly the Barons of the Realme that were with him, were readieto lend him any reasonable quantitie of monie he would require. By which experience I may fay, that it is a worke worth the labour, to observe and consider what diforders are bred by the obstinacie of those that are preferred to great things; or do manage the place of high authoritie: for Monsieur Lawtrech no doubt the principall Captaine of the Realme of France, as he caried with him a long experience in matters of warre and enterprise, and commanded in the armie with great respect and authoritic: so on the other side he was by nature haughtie and imperious, and hauing a fingular weening in himfelfe, would reject the counfell of all others, and stopping his eares from the reasons of other men, he interpreted it to his dishonourthat the world should perceive that he governed not alwaies by his owne arbitration and iudgement. In which conceit of fingularitie and weening, he refused to make those prouisions

the thing, which so often had brought them harme. After this victory by fea, the town of Stabia Standing vpon the fea side, yeelded to Wonsteur Lawtrech, but not the Castell, by whose example also was rendred Saint Iermine: and by this successe and victorie of the fleet, the garrisons that were within Caietta having recovered Fondy and the country thereabouts, Lawtrech dispatched thither Don Ferrand of Caietta, fonne to the Duke of Tracetta, and the Prince of Otelfe, he who had newly contracted with the Frenchmen, taking his reason upon the omission of the imperials, whose Captains he thought were carelesse to deliuer him, Moreouer, the streame of victorie running with manie courses, Simon Romaine at the fame time made a great advauncement in Calabria, much helping himiu that action the inclination of the people crying with great affection upon the name of the French: which if he had accomplished, might haply have given him the victorie, but being rejected, were the causes that the enterprise begun with so great a hope was passed into extreme ruine. The fouldiers of the black bands who were lodged in the front of the armie, skirmished daily, wherin running on in the humor of their courage and forwardnesse, they would oftenrimes presse so neare the walles of Naples, that the small shot within the towne had power of them, & in their retiring because they had not horsemen to back them, they fell into the mercy of the borsmen of the enemies: in fo much as prouing to their harms the disaduantage to make skirmishes without horimen under the walles of Naples, they began to give over the often practife of

But all these exploits for their quality good and happie, and for their maner honorable and full of valour, were not fufficient to cariethe victorie of the warre, for that it depended wholly either vpon the conquering or vpon the defending of Naples: the same inducing Monsieur Lawtrech

Monsieur Lamtrech.

Lawtrech who chiefly applied the fiege, and not altogether desperate to take the towne by force for the flaughter of so manie of their good souldiers of Spaniards at the battell ypon the sea, solicited earnestly the comming of the French and Venetian Nauie, to the end to deprive wholly that Citic of all victuals that might he brought to it by fear he caufed also to remove the campe, and planted it in front vpon a hill, both more neare Naples, and more commanding the Mount Saint Martin: where the blacke bands cast a trench, not onely to draw from that, hill a trench, which being stretched out to the sea side, and having upon that end to the seawarda bastilion, closed up the way of Somma: but also to the end that immediatly after the sea armies were come, they might with better oportunitie carie by force the Mount Saint Martin, having cut out before, an other trench betweene the Citie and the Mount to Hop them for fuccouring one another: and afterwards at one time to execute Naples by water with the faid armies by fea and land, beating it within from the front of their campe, and vexing it without with one part of the armie, and converting the other part to invade the Mount : fo might the enemies, whose necessities to defend so manie seugrall places would drine them to deuide their forces, be more easily ouercome in some place: and yet they held it not good to abandon Poggio Royall, though the front of the campe were farre off, to the end that if the enemies did recouer it, they should not cut from them the commoditie of fresh waters, onely they closed up their campe behind or on the backefide. These counsels and denises albeit they were considered with gerat skill and knowledge in warre, yet manie difficulties were opposed against them: first the trenches containing more then a mile cuen to the sea, could not be cast with speed, as well for want of Pioners to lay out to the worke, as for the difeafes of the fouldiers being weakned from all hardnes of labour: fecondly (which was verie necessarie for the besieging and inuasion of the towne) the armies by sea did not come. for that neither Andrew Dore with his gallies that were at Genes did stirre, neither was there any advertisement of the comming of the Nauic prepared at Marfeilles, and also the Venetians regarding more their profit particular then the benefit generall and common, or rather respecting lesse, interests principall, then ends more inseriour and accidentall, emploied their Nauie at the expedition of Brundusa and Ottranta: of which Cities Ottranta: had couenanted to yeeld, if within fixteene daies it were not referred, and for Brundusa notwithstanding it had received by accord the Venetians, yet the Castle held good for the Emperour, whereof the one having a strong situation vponthesca, gaue small hope to be taken, and the other standing within the towne and of greater circuit then the other, feemed not to be able to make long refistance, for that it had loft two rocks. The xij. day of May they made a batterie with the artilleries ypon the hill, which executed a turret that vexed not a litle the field: they shot oftentimes also into the towne, but that offended litle, and many skirmishes were performed at Saint Anthonies. The fixteenth day the artilleries being planted upon the top of the mountaine upon certaine turrets betweene Saint Gennaraes gate and the gate of Capua, and kept them also from erecting a baltilion which the defendants had begun: within the towne most mouthes were fed with fodden corne, and for feare of extreme famine, they deliuered the towne daily of manie numbers of people, whom the calamities of the warre had reduced to a hard election, either to languish in famine within the towne in the eyes and compassion of their friends, or to run to the mercie of the enemie, in whom it was not real onable they should hope for safetie and succour, having so justly offended them: & the Launceknights notwithstanding they suffered lesse then the other nations of souldiers, yet both for want of bread and farre greater necessities of wine and flesh, they protested oftentimes to mutine: but they were estsoones reclaimed with many good offers and meanes, and for the most part kept entertained with false letters and promises of succours. The xix, day the Pioners and fouldiers were brought to workeat the new trenches, and planting two cannons upon the bastilion when it was made, they wonne and reuersed two miles neare to Magdaleine, garded by The affaires of two ensignes of Launceknights, against which they neuer addressed any enterprise for that they she French mon were apt to be rescued from Naples. Hitherunto the affaires of the Frenchmen haue runne in a beginto decline. course happie and pleasing, but they began to swarue to declination for many causes manifest & apparant: for, as Philip Dore by the secret ordinance of Andrew Dore was retired with his gallies to he about Pozzom, fo by that meane there entred daily within Naples (where were left no other fortes of people then fouldiers) some quantitie of victuals in barkes. And albeit the Venetian Nauie after they had conquered Ottranta, gaue continuall hopes to descend and fall with Naples, yet they temporifed and interposed daily new delaies and excuses, hoping to get speedily the great Castell of Brundusa. Lastly the affliction of diseases and sicknesse encreased daily in the armie, and wherethe blacke bands were wont to be in all actions three thousand strong, now what for their hurt men who were unprofitable to the seruice, and what for their ficke men in whom was more weaknes then valour, and what for the bodies dead whose places were emptie, they were reduced to a number of two thousand. The xxij, day the Spaniards made a braue fallie vponthose that defended the new trenches, where was a continual labour and working of men in hope to perfect them within fixe or eight daies: at this fallie Horatto Baillon being appointed to a place of perill with a verie litle companie, was flaine as he was fighting in good example to his fouldiers; a death more meet for a fimple fouldier, then worthie fuch a Captaine. The Imperials rifing into courage and hope by the successe of this sallie, made it good with a new action and greater forces, but the whole campe being in armes and running to the defence of the trenches, they retired agains into the towns: Philip returned in the end to the gulfe of Naples, for the great instance and solicitation that was made to him: The trenches that had bene begunto close up the waie of Somma, were not finished the xxvij. day: The Spamards made roades daily through the countrey, brake downe waies, and made open passages, and brought into the towne great quantities of flesh: against whom the horsmen of the campe made litle head, for that they went rarely to the field: And Monsieur Lawtrech beginning now to wish for a supplie of footmen (though he yeelded not wholly to the counsell of others) solicited that they would fend him out of Fraunce by sea fixe thousand footmen of anic nation, alleadging that for want of victuals, and the stroke of maladies and diseases, the campe was much diminished: and yet amongst so manie difficulties, & in so small expectation of remedie, it was he onelie that had hope of the victorie, repoling himselfe whollie vpon the famine of that Citie.

In this time things fell out well in Calabria with Simon Roman, who had with him two thoufand footmen aswell Corfikans as souldiers leavied of the countrey: and albeit the Prince of Bisignan and one of the sonnes of Captaine Alerson were opposed against him with a regiment of fifteene hundred footmen waged of the countrey, yet they found it a hard matter to fland against him, infomuch as the sonne of Alerson retired to Tarenta leaving the Prince in the field. Not long after, Simon following the course of his fortune, got Cosense by accord, and successively after that, he tooke in a towne thereby, the Prince of Stigliano, and the Marquis of Laine his sonne with two other of his children: but in Powilla the garrifon that held Manfredoma for the Emperour, vexed all the countrey with incursions and roades without anie refishance of the horsmen or footmen of the Venetians, who were gone up to the conquest of those townes. Moreover, in the quarters about Rome, things were not well appealed, for that Serro Colonno having taken Paliano notwithstanding he was forbidden in the Popes name on the behalfe of the daughter of Vespatian, yet the Abbot of Farfa recoursed it, making prisoners Serro, and Prospero de Gany,

Whilest the armies were in action about Naples, and trauelled with those difficulties & with those hopes, Antho. de Lena being aduertised by good espiall, that there was negligent gard in Paula, in which towne was Peter Lungeno with foure hundred horsmen, & a thousand footmen Venetians, and Hanniball Pissinard Captaine of Cremona with three hundred footmen, which he had led thither to maintaine in the deuotion of the Duke, all the countrey beyond Paw: he drew Ambo. de Le- to him a company of fouldiers of confidence & choise, whom he led thither one night when was via recoveresh least doubt of any action, and having with no lesse fortune then celeritie scaled the towne by ladders in three places, he tooke it by affault before the fouldiers heard the alarme: in this exploit he made prisoners Peter Lungeno, and one of the sonnes of lanus Fregoso: from thence he followed his victorie to Biagrassa, where the garrison and townsmen rendred up the place to him after they had indured some execution of the Cannon, and so preparing to go to Arona, Federike Boromeo compounded with him, binding himfelfe to follow the Emperoursfaction.

About this time the Duke of Brundsmike being issued out of Trent, had passed the tenth day of May the river of Adice with an armie of x. thousand footmen, and vj. hundred horsmen well for the Empe- armed, many of them being gentlemen. This armie being repulsed from Chiusa discended vpon the territories of Verona: and albeit for that it was knowne long time before that he would come, there was a resolution fet downe that Monsieur faint Pol should go before to meet him:

Pania,

Duke of Brud-Swike in Italy 70W7.

yet making no greater speed in this expedition then in others, the Launceknights were in Italy before faint Pol could be in order to march. And as to omit occasions is to breed impediment & difficulties, fo comming on with his march with fo flow a foot, he was drinen afterwards to abide manie daies in Alt, both to reastemble and muster his companies, and to obey the difficultie of victuals, of which a great dearth and scarcitic raigned in all the parts of Italy, but chiefly in the quarters of Lombardy: and there was not to be hoped for, a more great and more readie fuccourfor the generall affairs, then of the Senate of Venice, who albeit had affured that their army should take the field with xij, thousand footmen, yet the Duke of Vrbin being within Verona, disposed himself to no other enterprise then to defend the townes of most importance of their estate. By which omission the Launceknights who were discended upon the lake of Garda, had Pifquiero by accord, and fuccessively Rivolto and Lunaro: in so much as being under that propertie of fortune, made Lords almost of the whole lake, they drew contributions of monie from manie places, committing to fire and fword fuch as had no meane to fatisfie them with ransome. Antho. Adorno who was arrived in this armie, perswaded them to go vp towards Genes, but both for their necessitie and want of monie, and for other impediments and difficulties, and also for their defire to have conserence with Antho. de Leua issued out of Millan to that end, they marched flowly along the countrey of Breffis, whither went to incetthein Andrew de Burgos & captaine George: by whose means it was teared the Duke of Ferrara, who in so great a seare of others made no preparation, entertained some secret intelligence or practise. After this the Launceknights marched up towards Adda to joyne with Antho. de Lena: who being passed the river of Adda the ix. of June with an armic of fix thousand footmen and fixteene great peeces of artilleries, and being incamped neere those companies that were within three miles of Bergama, in which Citic and also in Breffia and Verona, the Duke of Vrbin had distributed his bands of fouldiers: he perswaded the for an extreme desire he had to reconquer Loda, to embrace the recouerie of the effate of Millan, before they passed to Naples: by whose perswasions they incam- Loda besieged ped the xx. of May before that Citie, out of which iffued the Duke of Millan, who retiring to by the Imperi-Breffin, left for the defence of the towne, Iohn Panle his bastard brother with a garrison of three als. thousand footmen. And after the artilleries had plaied, which being planted in two seucrall places, did great execution, Antho. de Lena to whom the first assault appertained, brought his bands of Spaniards neare the place where the ruine was greatest. There they fought brauely for the space of three houres, but at last the vertue of the Italians defendants being nothing inferiour to the valour of the Spaniards affailants, they were repulfed by the fame vertue which led them first to the fight: fo that rejecting all hope to catie it by affault, they reduced all their confidence to the fauour and working of famine: the rather for that the haruest being not yet made, there was within Loda fo great want of victuals, that the share and distribution of bread running equally betweene the fouldiers and the inhabitants, the towne of necessicie was either to perish under the rage of famine, or the townsinen to issue out to the great perill of their liues. But the plague began now to be warme amongst the Launceknights, and the armie withall suffring no small afflictions for want of victuals, they began to breake vp, and many returned into their countries by the waies of the Smiffers and Grifons; an action which bred no great care in the Duke of Brundfwike their Captaine, who having conceined great hopes in Germany for the example of the regiment which George Fronspergh led, he found by proofe and triall the matters of Italy to be farre more intricate and hard then he imagined : and his money falling (hort, much leffe that he could leade them to the kingdome of Naples, seeing it was impossible for him to containe them before Lodg: neither was he relected with anic comfort by Antho, de Leua, who rather tooke away all his hope of remedie, that way filling him with continual complaints of the pouettie and wants of Mullan For, after he had lost all hope to recouer Loda, he deuised all the waieshe could to give The bandes of them occasion to break vp and go away, fearing lest they would establish their abiding in the Du- Launcelmights chy of Millan, and by that meane would intrude themselves to be competitor with him in the ander Brund. government, and share with him in the spoile; and he forgat not in this time of temporising, to swik domutine give order both to thresh out the corne through all the estate of William , and to carie and lay vp all their haruest within the towne of Millan. At last the xiij. of Julic as they were going to giue a new assault to Loda, the Launceknightes in their discontentments fell into mutinie: in which rage a thousand of them went their way to Coma, and the others that remained retired Cccciii in great diforder the artilleries from before Loda: but fearing leaft they would return into Germanie, the Marquis of Guaft whom Andrew Dore let go for twelve daies upon his faith, came to Millanto perswade Brundsnike not to suffer his souldiers to returne into Germanu: neuertheleffe the fouldiers whose rudenesse could not be reclaimed with words and reasons, retained their resolution to go away, and passed by Coma, except two thousand who remained with Antho. de Leua, to whomin those daies Moraro was rendred. And it was not doubted, that if the Launceknightes had continued before Loda a few daies more, they had honorably caried the towne, both by their vertue, and want of victuals in the towne. In which expedition manie defired a readinesse in the Duke of Vrbin, to the end that whilest they lay about Loda, he might draw neare Crema, or Pilqueton, or at least keepe maintained there some cornets of horsen to vexe them. And albeit whilest they were vpon the confines of Breffia he did sometimes both account them and moleft them, yet neuer comming so neare them as three miles, and standing onely vpon defending of the estate of the Venetians, he passed no surther then the river of Fglia: neither was Monfieur Saint Poll for his part more diligent to advance and come on, who, notwithflanding all the refolutions fet downe and confirmed by formanie promifes made by the king to fend on his behalfe bands of fouldiers against the Launceknights, arrived not in Piedmont, but at such time as the Launceknights departed, and yet his armie contained farre fewer number then had bene promifed and published. Neuerthelesse the Confederates forbare not for all this to solicite of new the Pope to declate himselfe for them, wherein they required him, that proceeding against the Emperour with armes spirituall, he would also deprive him of the Empire and the realme of Naples: but he flood vpon these excuses, that if he should declare for them, he could then be no more a conuenient meane to practife and folicite peace: That his declaration would enfestathe constirre vp a greater combustion amongst the Princes of Christendome, and yet bring no profit to the Confederates, for that his pouertie and weaknes would alwaies impugne the good they expected in him: That the privation of the Emperour for Naples and the Empire, would fet all Germanie in an vprote: both for suspition that he would appropriate to himselfe the authoritie to elect the Emperour, and for jealousie that he would establish that election in the person of the French king. Lastly he reduced to their memories the imminent danger of the Lutherans, which went on increasing by the division of the time. Neverthelesse not being able in reason and comlineffe to refift the importunities that were viged to him, he promifed to enter with them fo farforth as the Venetians would restore to him Rauenna, which condition he proponed as impossible to be granted, and confirmed this offer with his promife and obligation not to moleft the eflate of Florence. Vpon which occasion the Embassadours of England came to Venice the xx. of Iune, to solicite the Senate to render Rauenna, protelling for the Pope to assure the observation of his promifes: but being not able to induce the Senate, they went away cuill contented. In this time the Pope recoucred the Citie of Rimine, which John Saffatello having before affaied in vaine to recouer, was at last yeelded vp vpon condition of life and goods saued.

Bention touching Florence

The Popes ex-

federates.

But now by the operation of the time and course of events and affaires, began to be layed o-The Popes in- pen and disclosed the Popes most deepe and secret thoughts, such as he had before dissembled with great art: for, where before he had firmely imprinted in his mind a defire to restore to his house the greatnes which aunciently it had had in Florence, he was driven in publishing by singular cunning, the contrarie, to perswade the Florentyns, that much lesse that he had anie such thought, seing all that he defired of that common wealth was, that they would according to the example of other Christian Princes, acknowledge him for Pope, and that in causes particular they would forbeare to perfecute fuch as depended ypon him, or deface or reverse the armes and ornaments proper to his house. To these ends and with such commissions, he sent to Florence as his Embassadour when he was delivered, a Florentine prelate: and for that the estate of Florence would not give him audience, he forgat not, the better to cloake his diffimulation, to recontinue a new instance by the solicitation of the French king, that they would send to him an Embassadour, seeking by these simplicities and offers, to have them familiar with him, and to draw them with more facilitie into the ambushes he had dressed against them; but when he saw these deuises and labours fort to none effect, he began to perswade Monsieur Lawtrech, that whereas fuch as governed the effate of Sienna were dependants and devote to the Emperour, it were conuenient for the better course of his affaires there, to refer to that gouernment Fabio Petruccio. Neuerthelesse

Neuerthelesse albeit Lawtrech saw reason and conveniencie in the devise, yet in regard of the contradiction of the Florentins he forbate either to follow it or to effect it; and when the Pope faw he could worke none of these to his drifts, and having no inclination to dissolue or leave off the practife which his ambition kept entertained in him, he wrought fecretly in fuch fort, that Prrhus di Custello vadet pretence that the inhabitants of Siena had done him wrong, made himselfe Lord of Chuft with a ftrength of eight hundred footmen, and by the good diligence and office of certaine exiles of that towne, The Popes reason to raise this man to the jurisdiction of Chiusa, was to make him an instrument under that oportunitie, to travell and trouble the government of Sienna: but the Florentins discerning deepely into the Popes drifts, complained to the Vicount of Loraine Embassadour to the French king, that the doings of the Pope tended to no other end, then with the commoditie of Sienna to trouble and diforder the affaires of Florence. In which regard the Embassadour procured of the Pope, that the action of Chiusa should cease.

In this meane while the affaires of the kingdome of Naples proceeded diversely, for that on the one fide the Count of Burello was passed from Sicile into Calabria with a thousand footmen, where he joyned himfelf with the refidue; and on the other fide, Symon Roman had rauged to discretion with the fauour of mines and trenches the Castell of Colenso, though by a wound he received of a harquebuze in the shoulder, the course of the victorie was somewhat hindred: he loyned his forces afterwards with the Duke of Somma, who with the bands of footmen of the contrey, held befieged Catanzara, a towne strong by fortification, but weake by the want of victuals: in this towne was the fonne in law of Alarfon with two hundred hortinen and a thousand footnien: and as in taking this towne they stood in good degree to command the whole countrey cuen vp to high Calabria: fo neuerthelesse necessitie constrained them to turne against the forces ynited with the fuccours that were come from Sicile who had now made some advancing. But Simon being abandoned of one part of his footmen leaused of the countrey, was driven for his fafetie to retire within the Castell of Cosenso, and the other part of his footbands not without the flaughter of manie of them, dispersed and went away. The Corfiquers went wandring towards the armie, in fomuch as not onely the region of Calabria was left in danger, but also it was feared leaft the victors would aduance and addresse their sorces to Naples. On the contrary, the affaires of the Frenchmen drew good successe and issue in Abruzza by this accident, as the Bishop Colonno was approched within xij. miles of Aquila to stirre vp Abruzza to commotion, he was ouerthrowne and flaine by the Abbot of Farfa, with whom were put to the fword iiij, hundred bodies of souldiers, and eight hundred taken prisoners. In the confines of Caietta the Spaniards went wandring and retiring, being caried with feare for the arrivall of the Prince of Melfe, and the garrison of Manfredonia, through the slender valour and action of the Venetian bands, committed many domages without perillor refiftance.

Like as the Pope perseuered full in his resolution to declare himself for neither partie : so the cardinal ca-French king cloying the intelligences and ptactifes which he entertained, began to hold him for peius Legatio fuspected, and to the Emperor he was nothing agreable, though for no other cause, yet for that England. he had fent as Legate into England Cardinall Campeius to debate there the controuerfie delegated to him, & to the Cardinall of Yorke: for, where the king of England solicited vehemently to haue published the invaliditie of the first mariage, the Pope having dealt verie liberally in words and promifes with his Agents, and also being of litle fidelitie or credit with other Princes, laboured to keep himself under his protection: he made at last secretly a Bull decretall, by the which he pronounced the mariage to be of no force, & gaue the Bull to the Cardinall Campenus: he charged him withall, that in shewing it to the king and the Cardinal of Yorke, he should tell them that he had commission to publish it, if in judgment the knowledge and information of the cause succeeded not well: wherin it feemed the Pope wrought vpon this ground, that both they should be brought with more facilitie to consent to have the cause indicially debated, and also indure with better temperance of mind the delaies and longnesse of the judgement, which he had injoyned his Legate to hold off and prolong to as long a tract of time as he could: and as he should not deliver the Bull vntill he had received new commission from him, so neverthelesse he should labour to perswade the king by all the meanes he could, that his intention was to deliver it up to his hands in the end. Of this embassage in the person of that man, and of the delegation of the cause, the Emperous Embassadours that were within Rome complained not a litle, though with lesse

About Naples manie were the difficulties happening upon both the one and other pattie, but fuch as in all difcourse of reason, made more apparant on the French fide the hope of the victorie, though it was hindred by the vertue and obfinacie of the enemies: within the towne of Naples the wants of victuals grew daily to extremities, especially of wine and flesh; a calamitic without his comfort, for that no prouision could enter the rowne by sea for the in-pediments of the Venetian gallies, being after so long expectation arrived now the x. of Iune in the gulfe of Napies, to the number of xxij. And albeit the horimen of the towne made daily fallies cut not towards the face of the armie, but to those quarters of the countrey where they thought to find victuals, by whose in diffrie some praies of flesh were alwaies brought in, and the whole estate of the towne somewhat releeued and refreshed: yet these prouisions and comforts brought in by these aduentures, were not such as being depriued of the commoditie of the sea, they might suffice to nonrish and entertaine them long. Besides, they began to grow short in monie, the stroke of the plague afflicted them much, and they had much to do to keepe entertained the Launccknights, whom they could no longer abuse with vaine hopes and promises. In which discontentment many of the went by troups to the French armie, not with standing the authoritie & grace which the Prince of Orenge, who by the death of Don Hugo commanded in the place of Viceroy had with them, was of some force to retaine them: who the better to frame their minds with authoritie and discipline, which he could not range by lenitie and eafinesse, he made prisoner Captaine Cattay a Gascon with many of his souldiers, being of the remainders of the regiments of the Duke of Burbon: and afterwards he did the like by suspition to Fabricio Maramo, whom notwithstanding he fet at libertic presently. On the other side discases increased daily in the French campe, the same being the caule that Lamtrech, to the end not to have so great a space or circuite to gard, would not fuffer to be perfected the last trenches, which neverthelesse could not easily be finished for the impediment of certaine waters. Befides, the campe suffred want of victuals and nouriture though more for the ill order and government that was vsed, then through anic other occafion. Neuerthelesse Monsieur Lamtrech obseruing his owne rule and counsell, hoped more in the necessities that were within Naples, then he seared or doubted his proper difficulties : and perfwading himself of the expedition of the victorie, either for that cause, or for their want of monie, he forbare to make anie new leavies of footmen; a matter which the whole armic defined for the univerfall diminution which was made by death and difeases, not onely of persons meane and base, but even of such as sate in places of authoritie, as the Popes Nuncio and Loys Pisano commissarie of the Venetians, who died in the face of the towne the xv. daie. He hoped also to allure to the campe either all or the most part of those bands of Launceknights that were within Naples; a practife wherin the Marquis of Saluffa first, and afterwards himself, had reposed of long time great confidence in vaine. So that vpon the e grounds, together with certaine hopes that were given him to draw to the armie certaine light horfmen that were within Naples, he forbate to make anie new leavies of light horimen fuch as had bene most necessarie for the service, of whom if he had waged but four hundred, he had stopped in good time the hurtfull incursions which the fouldiers of the towne made fo often to his disaduantage. And yet in those actions of pray and bootie, he was not without his felicitie, for that as the horsmen of Neples returned one day with a rich spoile of cattell, they were encountred by the blacke bands, who as they were the finewes and strength of the armie, so without them there had bene no fiege planted before the walles of Naples: by them the bootie was recoursed from the Neapolitans with the loffe of three score horsinen, notwithstanding the Spaniards issued out of the towne to rescue them. Thus Monsieur Lawtrech was not without hope that the Imperials would be constrained to leave Naples to discretion: and therfore laying to cut them offfrom all retraite within Caietta, he gaue order to gard well Capua, and keepe in devotion the fea towne of Vulturno: and to deprive them also of meane to retire into Calabria, befides that he cut off certaine passages, apt for their purpose, he recontinued the working at the trench begun so often and left off for fundrie accidents, he now raised it so high, that the springs and waters which before gaue impediment, were now beneath the worke: befides, he fought to put in defence certaine houses adioyned neare to Naples, and to have them garded with a thousand footmen which he meant to leavie to that end, turning also to that service the favour of the Venetian Gallies, which were come vp right over againit

against the trench: this trench also served aprly for that resort of victuals to the armiethat came from the lea coast, and was no lesse convenient to cut off the enemies if they returned that way with their booties: for, by reason of the great ditches and waters at Poggio Royall that had bene cut vp, the way from the campe to the fea contained a great and dangerous circuit. The Imperials sought to vexe and hinder those that wrought at the trench, and being one day iffued out in very strong troupes, the Pioners by the ordinance of Peter Nauarre who solicited the worke, made as though they fled, and the Imperials pursuing them more in raffineffe then in good gouernment of watre, fell vpon an ambush dressed for their destruction, wherin were hurt and flaine an hundred bodies: neuerthelesse the trench was not halfesinished, as well for want of Pioners as by other accidents, joined to an ordinary negligence, which ofcentimes hindreth the effect of the good directions and ordenances that are given. In which good course of direction, if the campe had continued, manie were of opinion that confidering the strait terms and condition of Naples, Monsieur Lawtrech had honorably caried the towne: and at the same time was offred a faire occasion and of great consequence, if the execution had bene as resolute as the offer was ready: Monsieur Lawtrech being informed that the fouldiers of Naples were issued out in great troupes to go on forraging and for bootie, and for that he would at one blow rid the countrey of those incursions, and open himself a way to the absolute victorie, sent out the xxv. of lune by night, the regiment of the blacke bands, the horfmen of Florence, and three fcore French launces, with a band of Swiffers and Launceknights, whom he directed to take the way of Beluedere & Pedegrotto, to écounter the forragers, & to vexethem in their retire: he appointed Captaine Burso with the Gascon sootmen to stand upon the hill which is aboue Grotta, and vpon the alarme giuen, to discend and cut the enemies from entring into Grotta. The beginning of this exploit was well executed, and drew with it a good iffue, for that the companies of Lawtrech having encountred the Imperials, they charged them & put them to flight, more then three hundred bodies remaining prisoners and slaine, besides an hundred horses of service and great store of baggage: and in the encounter Don Ferrand of Gonfagno was thriken from his horse as he fought, and being made prisoner he was effloons recoursed by the fury of the Launceknights: but this medley had his imperfection by Captaine Burio, who either through negligence which is ill, or by feare which is worse, appeared not in the place to the which he was appointed, which if he had done according to his direction, they had no doubt given an absolute overthrow to the Imperials. Monsieur Lawtrech had also sent to Caietta fix Gallies of the Venetians, and had appointed two to ride at the mouth of Garellan to favour the Prince of Melffe. And because that notwithstanding the impediments of the Gallies, some reliefe of victuals entred into Naples by the fauour of certaine Frigots, he put out to the sea certaine small Barkesto oppose against the feruice of the Frigots: and lastly he gaue order that all the heards of cattel should be driven away xv.miles compasse from Naples, to the end the Imperials should not with such facilitie chase the.

But now by reason of a new accident which long time before had disclosed certaine signes & tokens, the French affaires were not a litle intangled: Andrew Dore either by corruption and long Andrew Dore working with him, or of his owne proper motion, which in cases of alteration carieth men not a leaneth the pay litle, determined to leave the French pay, to the which he was bound till the end of June; a refo- of the French. lutio which he had long time before established in his mind, as was gathered by many arguments and coniectures. In that disposition he retired to Genes, and would not go vp with his Gallies to the kingdome of Naples, no though the French king offred to make him Captaine generall of the armie by sea which he prepared at Marfeilles: against which offer he alleaged onely his impotencie of bodie, in which raigned so manie maladies drawne on with yeares and olde age, that he was nowe no more able to beare the trauels of an armie: but the originall and first motion of this change was afterwards attributed as well by himselfe as others, to diverse causes: Touching himself, he complained that the French king to whom he had done faithfull service for the space of fine yeres, had raised to the place of high Admirall by sea Monsieur Barbesseux, a place which though he had refused once, yet he looked that the king would make a new instance to him to take it. Secondly, that the king had not fatisfied him of the twentie thousand duckets due for his payes past, without the which he was not able to entertaine his Gallies: That he would not hearken to his just petitions to restore to the Genowayes their accustomed jurisdiction of Sanona. And lastly, that because he vrged these petitions with importunitie, the king had debated in his counsell to cut off his head, as one that yled too arrogantly his authoritie. Others were of opinion, that his ill contentment grew first from the difference & controuer ses betweene him and Ranse de Cere for the enterprise of Sardigma. In which contention he construed against the king that he had with more partialitie inclined to the reportes of Ranse, then favoured his instiffications: That the king had too much importuned him to deliver vp his prisoners whom he defired, but especially the Marquis of Guaft, and Askanio Colonna as a matter of great importance, neuerthelesse offering to pay their raunsome. These were the causes coniecturall gathered by strangers: but afterwards it was both beleeued and discerned manifestly, that in this revolt he was not earled fo much with disdaine that the French held not reputation of him according to his merites, or with anic other propertie of ill contentment, as with an ambition and emulation to deliuer Genes, and so to make himself great under colour of the libertie of his countrey; wherin having no other meanes to drive his driftes to their true effect, he resolved to follow no more the French, nor to aide them with his Gallies in the action of Naples, like as also it was beleeved that to hinder the conquest of Sicile, he had advanced and brought on the enterprise of Sardignia : fothat having replenished all the thoughts of his mind with this device of ambition, and feeking to confirme it with some greater authoritic, he solicited by the interposing of the Marquis of . Guaff, to enter into the pay of the Emperour, notwithstanding the profession of great hatred which for the memorie of the facke of Genes he had made manic yeres against the Spanish nation, accompanied with sequere cruelties executed upon anic particulars of them when so cuer they sell into his hands. But for that he couered his intention with a cloke of deepe art and diffimulation, the matter was not yet come to the knowledge of the French king, who in that ignorance had not looked to remedie an euill of fo great importance, though he was not without force fulpition of the revolt by the occasion of surprising a Gallie: wherin passed as a passenger into Spaine a Spamiard fent under the colour to raunsome certaine prisoners, and amongst other things was found about him a letter of credence from Andrew Dore to the Emperour; and yet such was the surtletie of the Spaniard or compassion of such as had him in hand, that they suffred him to continue his way without examining him. At last Orlonfieur Barbifieux being arrived at Sauona with a fleet of fourteene Gallies, Andrew Dore fearing some stratageme, retired with his Gallies to Genes, and afterwards conveyed his prisoners to Lirice; a matter which when the French king vnderstood by credible relation, and tasting the danger which was now become without remedie. he dispatched to him Peter Francis Nocere to reduce him to his pay againe: by him the king offred him to fatisfie his defire touching Sanona, to pay in the twentie thousand duckets that were due before, and to give him twentie thousand more for the raunsome of the Prince of Orenge whom he had taken before, and the king fet him afterwards at libertie at fuch time as he made peace with the Emperour at Madrill. Lastly he offred him that in case he would deliner his pri-Toners, he would defray their raunsome before they came out of his hands, and yet if he refused to deliuer them, the king promised not to impute or charge against him his denials. But Andrew Dore, whose resolution was more constant and settled, then that the kings offers could remoue it, gaue small eare to the solicitation, but instified with complaints his going from the king : in so much as Monsieur Barbisseux, to the great prejudice of the affaires of Naples, was constrained by the necessitie of things, to stay at Sauona: and yet passing further afterwards, he left for the gard of Genes fine hundred footmen, with direction to remaine within ten miles of the Citie, for the rage of the plague that raigned there; and for the same service he put on land thirty miles from Genes twelve hundred Launceknightes newly arrived, who as they had received their first pay of the French men, so for that the Venetians had not made good the second according to their bond, Triunice gouernour of Genes was driven to leavie it by his meanes.

Vpon this revolting of. Andrew Dore, the Pope being advertised that he entertained practise with the Emperour, signified the same to Lawtrech the xxj. of June, whom he required to confent that he might retaine him in his pay, to the end to deprive the Emperour of his service, assuring him that Phillip Dore should depart from Naples within ten daies: for which cause Monsieur Lawtrech restored to Phillip for that he would not kindle or incense him, the Secretarie Serenon, whom he had alwaies retained with him, to the end to come by his meane to the knowledge and light of manie things that lay in darknes and shadow: and yet for the suspicion he had conceiued of the Pope, he interpreted sinisterly the advertisement he had sent him. At last Andrew

Dore, notwithstanding that Barbifien v in passing further with his armie by sea containing nine. teene Gallies, two Foystes, and source Brigantins, affisted with the person of the Prince of Nawarre, had spoken with him: yet forbearing to cloake or diffemble any longer the thing he intended to do, he dispatched a gentleman to the Emperour in the company of the generall of Grayfrears, who was now created Cardinall, and was sent to the Emperor from the Pope: there was refolued with this Gentleman a contract bearing these couenants: The liberty of Genes to be couenants bearing these vnder the protection of the Emperour: the inrildiction of Sauona to remaine to the Genowaies: tween the Em-Pardon to Andrew Dore that had bene fo great a perfecutor of the Spanish name: Entertain- perour et Aament in the Empetours scruce with twelve Gallies, and threescore thousand duckets by the drew Dore. yeare, with manie other articles verie honorable. In regard of this league, Phillip departed the fourth day of Iulie from before Naples with all his Gallies: whose going away was nothing preiudiciall to the French but onely in reputation, for that he had of late not only made ill gard, but also had suffered his Brigantins to conney into Naples by stealth, certaine proportions of reliefe. He had also carried the sonne of Antho. de Lena to Caietta, and was a backe for manie daies to the forra gers to passe victuals into Naples: but if he had followed that service with the same fidels tic he shewed in the beginning, his going away had bene very hurtfull to their affaires. Monsieur Lawtrech taking occasion upon his departing, solicited so much the more the comming of the French armie, which according to the Popes ordinance was staied with great indifferetion about the action of Couranecchia.

But for the retiring of Phillip with his Gallies, the Venetian armie by fea who had taken the charge of the worke from the sea shore vntill they met with the trenches of Peter Nauarre, was driven to leave that action, and apply to the gard and service of the sea: which to the end to hold more strait and inclosed, there were appointed certaine armed Frigots to scoure day and night the coast: vsing likewise a greater diligence by land, in opposing against the daily incursions of the Spaniards, whom not with Handing when they encountred, their valour was turned into feare, and in that fearethey fled away without fighting: in fo much as Naples was reduced to an extreme necessitie, and the Launceknights protested oftentimes to go away if they had not speedie fuccours both of monic and victuals, By reason wherof Monsieur Lawtrech, who had reposed a great confidence in those operations, perswaded himself, that for the long practise and intelligence he had holden with them, they would in those disorders and wants passe daily to his army.

But the sitteenth day of July all the Fleet of the Venetian Gallies except those that were about Caietta, returnedinto Calabria to be reuicualled of Bisket: by whose going away the ha-ties in the frech uen being laid open, manie Frigots passed into Naples with victuals of all sorts except wine; a reliefe comming in a time apt, for that within Naples there was not fo much store of corne as would last till the end of July. And on the other fide, in the campe which was filled full of the plague by the infection of tuch as came out of Naples, maladies and difeafes increased greatly: which respecting neither place, authoritie, nor complexion, so touched Monsieur Vandemont that he bare more likelyhood of death then hope of life, and reduced Monsieur Lawtrech into great maladies : by whole absence and restraining for the sicknesse he suffred, the service declined to fuch diforder, that the Imperials had leafure to execute their incursions without impediment, and with the same facilitie cut off the victuals that came to the armie, reducing the whole campe to great wants of reliefe: and yet much leffe that the French could be brought to leavie new companies of light horimen, seeing in these disorders Valerio Vrsin being in the pay of the Venetians with an hundred light horfmen, went from the army, for that he was not payed, by whose example manie other companies of light horimen left the service for want of pay, and the residue were made unprofitable by reason of diseases. The men at armes of the French were bestowed in garrison in the places thereabout: and the bands of the Gascons being dispersed into seuerall places of the countrey, were buffe in gathering in of harueft and feeking pray and bootie. Neuerthelesse there was great hope in certaine bandes of footmen which were faid to come with the armie by sea, which armie having stayed more then twentie daies after they parted from the port of Linorno, arrived at laft the eighteenth of July, with manic gentlemen and money to comfort the campe : onely this supply brought to the armie but eight hundred footmen, the refidue that marched with it remayning bestowed partly for the gard of Genes, and partly to follow the enterptile of the Castell of Cinitanecchia. At the comming of these succours

Monsieur Lawtrech having sent to the sea side bands of souldiers to receive the monie that was brought, the Gallies could not come to land for the impediment of the sea that was great and swelled with waters : and therefore the next day the Marquis of Saluffa returned thither againe with his Launces, and with a groffe regiment of Gascons, Swiffers, and Launceknights, accompanied with the blacke bands, but in their returning they were encountred by the Imperials being issued out of Naples in great troupes, who gave so surious a charge upon the French horsemen, that they turned their backes, and in flying they to shaked and trode their footmen, that they disordered them whom they should have defended. In this encounter Don Hago de Pepoly succeeding by the death of Horatto Baillon to the gouernment of the Florentine bands, being set on foot with fortie harquebuziers before the elquadron of the blacke bands, became prisoner to the horsemen: yea such was the furie of the Imperials, that if the valour of the blacke bands had not retained them, they had in this medley made a great flaughter, for that they fought with a wonderfull resolution, but chiefly the horsemen: there were left dead of the French men more then an bundred bodies, and no leffe number paffed ouer to the calamitie of prisoners, amongst whom were manie of the gentlemen of the fea armie that were fet on land: and also Monjieur de Candales nephew to the Marquis of Saluffa: onely the monie was presetued, and sent in safetie to the campe. The fault of this disorder was laid vpon the French horsemen, being farre inferiour in valour to the enemies; a matter which did not a litle diminish the vertue of the footmen of the armie, as knowing that now they could not fland affured of refcue in the horfemen: but the matter that most endomaged and weakned the armie, was the sicknesse of Monsieur Lamtrech, who albeit laboured with the vertue of his mind and courage to fuffaine and beare out the feeblenefle of his bodie, yet being not able with his hand and presence to assist actions, he could not prouide and remedie manie things that went to declination: for the Imperials taking liberty to make rodes abrode, did not only make purueiance of all things they flood in need of except wine which they could carie, but also in that libertie they cut from the armie oftentimes the refort of victuals and nouriture, taking their baggage and forrage even upon their ramparts, and winning their horses sometimes as they were led to the watering: in so much as besides the generall diminution of the armie by diseases, euen things necessary began to faile in the campe, which was almost reduced of an armie befieging, to a campe befieged, if they had not seene to the garding of the passages against the sootmen that ran away. And of the contrary, within Naples all commodities and hopes increased, the Launceknights mutined no more, and all the other bands of fouldiers in glorie and emulation strong to suffer and endure. With these dangers no lesse manifest then still increasing, the obstinacie of Monsieur Lawtrech was at last vanquished, who both had fent into France to be supplied with fixe thousand footnen by sea, and also had dispatched Ranse de Cere being come with the armie by sea, towards Aquila, to leauic source thoufand footmen and fixe hundred horsemen, giving him affignation for monie to the treasurer of Aquila and Abrazza: which supplies as Ranje vndertooke by promise to bring to the campe within few daies, fo they would have ferued better for the advancement of the affaires, if they had bene prepared before. By the xxix, day the wayes and straites were so broken, that there was no furetie of passage to Capua which lay vpon the backe of the armie, and wherin almost all forts of people laboured of diseases and sicknesse: Monsieur Lawtrech who somewhat before had bene ealed of his feauer, was eftloones fallen into it againe, with a more infirmity and danger then before: the men at armes were almostall dispersed in the villages, either for diseases and sicknes indeed, or at least to refresh them under such an excuse: the regiments and bands of sootmen were almost reduced to nothing : and within the towne of Naples both the plague abating, and other discases diminishing, by which helps there were as yet 7000, footmen strong, there was feare least they would fally out & inuade the campe. In which regard Monfieur Lawerech caufed to tarie the fine hundred footmen which Ranse de Cere had fent after the ouerthrow of Simon Roman, to the end to stop that the bands of enemies who were in Calabria, came not vp towardes Naples: he fent also to leavie a thousand footmen in the countrey thereabout: he retayned the Duke of Nola with two hundred light horsemen, and Rinnecio Farneso with an hundred, whome they promifed to bring to him foorthwith: he fent for backe againe two hundred Estradiots of the Venetians, who were gone to the enterprise of Tarenta: he reuoked ypon great penalties all the men at armes that were whole and able : he folicited daily the comming comming of Ranse, and hastened (albeit very late) with a great vehemency and efficacie all other provisions. By the second day of August there were scarcely in the French campe an hundred horse, by reason of which diminution the Imperials made dayly incursions even up to their trenches: they tooke all advantages of their weaknesse, and omitted no oportunity which their diforders or declination offered to them: they won Somma, performing the exploit by the ayd of scaling ladders, and they sacked it, finding within it a company of men at armes and a cornet of light horsemen. By these actions growing on to extremities, Monsieur Lawtrech seeing himselfe almost befreged, solicited Monsieur Saint Pol to fend him succours of men by sea, and called vponthe Florentins to turne to his rescue the two thousand footenen whom they had leuied to send to Saint Pol, which they consented to readily: Monsieur Candales who was let go vpon his faith, was dead in the campe. The Prince of Nauerre, Vandemont, Camillo Triunlee, and the olde and new maisters of campe, were fallen ficke: Lawirech was eftsoones fallen into the pangs of his feuer, all the Embassadours were sicke, all the Secretaries passed by maladies, and all personages of account were kept suppressed by the diseases of the campe, except the Marquisof Saluffa and the Count Guido: yea there was fearfely to be found through the whole campe a body who could boast of his soundnesse: the bands of sociemen perished miserably of hunger, and almost all the cetternes being drawne dry, there was an quiuerfall want of water; fuch were the diforders of the campe by these afflictions, and much more redoubled by omission and negligence, that all action was taken from the army, other then to stand upon their gards and defend their campe, abiding the comfort of the refeue. After this, the Spaniards brake up the water conduit of Poggia Royall, and not withflanding it was eftloones recovered, yet they could make no vie of it without great daunger. Monsieur Lawtrech expected within two dayes the Duke of Somma with fifteene hundred footmen, and with the same expedition he looked for the bands of horsemen and sootmen of the Abbot of Farfa, which he had sent for since he had given the defeate to the Bishop of Colonno.

About this time and in these extremities returned the gallies of the Venetians, very ill armed and appointed, and so slenderly furnished with victuals and prouisions, that to get meate and nouriture conuenient for their feeding, they were driven to runne all along the sea shores thereabout, and by that occasion had no care to gard the port of Naples: but the Spaniards in whom was equall their infolency and their fortune, being returned the eight day to Somma, made pillage of it of new, and tooke away with them all the refidue of the horse which Count Guido had there in garrifon: they charged also the eskort or gard of the French victuals, who were two hundred Launceknights, and they flying in their cowardife into two houses, yeelded their liues to discretion. By reason of these incursions and selicities of the Imperials, the souldiers that kept the campe were oftentimes without meate to eate; a calamitic of all others most wretched, when is wanting foode to feede the body which stands to defend his life. All their incommodities were made greater by the huge circuit of place where the army was incamped, which property of errour as it was different in the beginning, so the daunger redoubling by the fauour of the place, their eyes beheld a miferable confuming of their fouldiers eueric day by the necessity of too much action: and yet Monsieur Lawtrech standing firmely vponthe hope and dayly expectation of succours, could not be brought to restraine it or make it lesse, who albeit in his owne person he was not welreflored, yet in that weaknesse of body he tooke paine to visite the whole campe to maintaine due order of watch and ward, fearing to be inuaded. But fo swiftly did things runne to declining, that by the fifteenth day the great puissance and valour of the Imperiall horsemen had cut offall refort and entercourse betweene the campe and the gallies, neither could the souldiers of the campe, for want of the feruice of horsemen, make any incursion, or do exploites beneficiall. Enery night the alarme was given to the campe twife or thrife, in fo much as the fouldiers wasted with so manie paynes and incommodities, were not able to send out such eskort for vi-Etuals as was needfull: but the thing that amid so many calamities, made them most discomforted, was the death of Monsieur Lamerech, yeelding up his life the same night, upon whose The death of authoritie and vertue all the counsels and actions of that service depended, and in whose Monsieur person stood represented the hope and expectation of that warre. It was thought he fell into the relapse of his disease, by the continual paynes he put his bodie vnto before it was well confirmed.

The whole charge and government of the campe remained now in the person of the Marquis of Salussa, a man whole weaknesse made him vnable to manage well so great an authoritie: and in this dayly increasing of the French disorders, Andrew Dore with twelve gallies arrived at Caietta as fouldier to the Emperour, the fame reducing the French Nauy to fuch straights, that they began to make no more fo good gard as they had wont. At that time also the Count of Sarny with a thousand Spanish footmen, tooke Sarny, expulsing three hundred footmen that were there in garrison: and afterwards marching by night the xxij. of August, with a greater sorce to Nola, he tooke it, and droue Valerio Vr finlying there in garrifon to retire into the Callell, alleaging for his excuse that he was deceived by the men of the countrey: he fent to demaind refeue of the Marquis of Saluffa, who fent him a strength of two thousand footemen, but carving with them the ordinary infelicity of the campe, as they marched towards the place by night, they were fet vpon by the bands of Naples, and cut in peeces. The xxij.day the campe being both naked of men and voyd of government, flood entertayned only with hope of the comming of Ranfe, who being as yet in Naples, was not wished to half on for the taking of Naples, nor in hope to be able to make any refisfance in that place where they were incamped, but onely that by a greater Attempth they might breake up and leavy the fiege. By this time Monfieur Vandemont was dead, and the Marquis of Saluffa, Count Guido, Count Hugo, and Peter of Nauarre extremely afflicted with ficknesse: in which generall persecution of the French campe, Maramo to the ende to deprive them wholly of foode and victuals, iffued out of Naples with four hundred footenien, and finding Capua almost abandoned, entred into it, by whose comming thither, the Frenchmen sorfaking Pozzolo, bestowed the garrison that was there within Aueria; a place of very special importance for the campe. But when Capua and Nola were lost, the army was at a maze where to sceke victuals to containe the bodies which the stroke of diseases had yet lest aliue: so that their extremities making them no longer to hold good, and the rage of their necessities carying them necessarily to obey the aduersity of the time, they resolved to embrace their last shift, & brake vp by night to retire to Auer (a: but the Imperials keeping a lealous eye vpon their lodgings, & hauing good informatioof their diflodging, fet vpon them, & overthrew them in the way, where being taken Peter Nauarre with many other chiefetaines and personages of condition, the Marquis of Saluffa escaped, and retired with one part of the army into Auerfa: but being pursued no leffe by his owne infelicity then by the valor of the Imperials, & being reduced to an eflate not to maintaine defence, he fent out of Auerfa Count Guido Rangon to parley with the Prince of Orege, of the Marquis betweene whom ran these capitulations: That aswell he as the other Captaines should remaine of Saluffa with prisoners, except Count Guido, to whom in recompence of the accord, was granted liberty: That the Imperials, the Marquis should do all that he could with the Frenchmen and Venetians for the rending & giuing vp of the whole kingdom. That the fouldiers and fuch as by the accord were to haueliberty, should leane their Enfignes, their armes, their houses, and their goods, granting only to those that were of greatest quality, the service of moyles and cuttals: That the Italian touldiers should not beare armes against the Emperor for fix moneths. In this fort all bands and regiments were defeated, all Captaines cut off by death, or made prisoners in flying, or at least taken in the accord. Anersa was lacked by the army Imperial, who afterwards retired to Naples & demanded viij, paies. Ranse who the day following was drawne neare to Capua with the Prince of Melse & the Abbot of Farfa, hearing of the accident and aduenture of the army, returned into Abruzza, which con-> trey only together with certaine peeces in Pomilla and Calabria, held good for the Confederates. This was the iffue and euent of the enterprise of the kingdome of Naples, disordered by manie causes, but guided by his last errour by two principall reasons: the one, for the maladies and discases engendred partly by the cutting away of the water conduits of Poggio royall to depriue them within Naples of the meane and viage of grinding: for, when the waters were dispersed all ouer the playnes, and having no iffue, were driven to fland still and gather mudde, they so corrupted the ayre, that the Frenchmen by nature intemperate and impatient of heate, fell into maladies, and they in time were turned into the nature of the plague, whole contagion was caried into the body of the army by certaine that were infected, who were expresly fent out of Naples. The other error was, that Monsieur Lawtrech who had drawne out of Fraunce all the best experienced Captaines of that nation, was too fingular in his owne hope and weening: and not remembring what little honor it brought to him at fuch time as he lay at the defence of the efface of Millan, to write to his king that he would ftop the enemics for passing the river of Adda, he had now in the same partiality since the siege of Naples, assured his king by fundry letters, that he would not leany his campe from before the wals of Naples, till he had honorably caried the victory of the towne. By which property of errour and selfe promise, for that he would not be reproued of his word and judgement, he stood obstinate not to leasy the fiege, contrary to the counsell of his other Captaines, who seeing the campe full of maladies & insection, perswaded him alwayes to retire in safety to Capua or to some other place of refreshing; the rather for that having in his hands & deuotio almost all the kingdome, much lesse that he could have wanted either victuals or mony, seeing he might with facility haue confumed the Imperials, to who all things were lacking.

During these proceedings in the realme of Naples, the affaires of Lombardy were not without The procestrauell and diverfity of fortune, for that after Monsieur Saint Pol had assembled his forces and dings of Monmade pronision of victuals, he tooke beyond Paw certaine townes and burroughes comanded be from but Anthony de Laur, who the third of A until was covered. Toward the instance of the contract of the contra fore by Anthony de Leuis, who the third of August was gone to Torretta, laboring to gather into bardy. Millan fo great provisions of victuals as he could, for that thorough the whole chatcof Millan, the haruests were so poote and barren, that it was thought there were scarcely sufficient victuals to feede for eight moneths the mouthes that were in the countrey: afterwards he retired to Marignan being not able for want of money to abide long time in that place. At this time the Duke of Urbin was at Breffia; and Saint Pol at Newcastellin Tortono, from whence being come to Plusance, they met and had conference together at Montwella voon the river of Pam, where it was refolued that the armies should voite and affemble about Loda: from thence Saint Pol passed the river of Pam neareto Gremona, they of Plassance suffering him without resistance to convert the barkes that were there to the vie of a bridge. and therefore Anthon; de Lena who had at his denotion the bridge of Cassan, Carnaggia, and Treny, brake downe the bridge and abandoned the places of Guiaradadda, like as he had before abandoned Novaro: only he had be-Stowed within Pania, seuenhundred footmen, and fine hundred within Samt Angeo: Monlieur Saint Polhad in estate and payment source hundred launces, 500 light horsmen, and fifteene hundred Launceknights, but in number and true muster farre lesse, both through his owne negligence and deceipt of his officers: for these forces and other companies of Smissers and Launceknights which were expected, the Venetians had agreed to pay for every moneth twelve thouland duckats, to Monsieur Saint Pol, who had also at Turea three hundred Swellers entertained and payed for nine hundred, and three thousand sootenien French: the Venetians had three hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and six thousand sootmen : and with the Duke of Millan were more then two thousand footmen of choise: Amb, de Leua had soure thousand Launceknights, a thousand Spannards, three thousand Italians, and three hundred light horsemen: the regiments of the confederates passed the river of Adda, and joyned their forces together the two and twentieth of August, Anthony de Leua being yet at Marignan : from that place the Duke of Vrbin fent to Saint Angeo a ftrength of three thousand footmen, and three hundred light horsemen with fix cannons, under the conduct of lohn Naldo, who as he was incamping was flaine with a bullet from the artilleries, for renege of whose death the Duke went thither in person & caried the towne. The fine & twentieth of August, the army of the confederates lodged at Saint Zenon ypon the river of Ambra, which is within two miles and an halfe of Atarignan; the feven and twentieth day they passed outer Ambra, and drew neare to Marianan: the Spaniards at their approching retired within Marignan to an old rampart, & after they had skirmished many howers, they isflued and spred themselves at large, making as though they would either give or take the battel:but after the artilleries had plaied on both sides the space of an hower, by which time the night drew on they retired within Marignan and Riozzo, and at the lodging or planting of the campe they affaulted it brauely. The day after Anthony de Lena made his retraite with all his copanies to Millan, & the Confederates went to Landriano: there they tooke counfell whether they shold attempt to force Millan, and during the action of that confultation, the army marched with intention to enter the towne of Millan by surprise, which enterprise was broken by a great abundance ofraine, which making the wayes heavy and troublesome, stopped them for going to the gate of Verceill, where they should have entred : but seeing that exploit frustrate, and the device disappointed, wherein they were more confirmed of the impossibility of the action, by the relation of a Gentleman whom they fent to take a view of Millan, they determined to go incampe before

Pania by the way of Bingrassa: both for that there remained no other nature of action for the army, and also for the hope they had to cary it easily, having no greater a strength to defend it then two hundred Lanceknights and eight hundred Italians. Thus keeping that way they fent out beyond the river of Thefin, certaine bands of footmen, which tooke Vigenena: and the ninth of September Monsieur Saint Polarriued at Saint Alexis within three miles of Pausa, where both the armies approching neare together, there came an advertisement that put them in a greater astonilhment: for, the plague being great in Genes, for feare of whose infection the towne being almost left abandoned of inhabitants and fouldiers, in which generall confusion Theodor Truulce gouernot of the towne, being retired into the Cattell: Andrew Dore tooke the advantage of that occasion and drew neare the towne with certaine gallies, having neverthelesse a very Hender hope to force it, for that he had with him but fine hundred footemen. But as where the feare is generall there the minds & courages are least affured, so the French Nauy that roade in the hauen, searing least their way to returne into Fraunce would be closed up, left without care or gard the matters of Genes, and hoysed sayle to go to Sanona, the first vessell that arrived there, being the gallie of Monsteur Barbesteux: fo that both for the weake forces of souldiers that were within the City, notwithstanding Theodor was returned to keepe the pallace, and for that the people and commons for the injury of the liberty done to the towne of Sauona, were become enemies to the name of the French, Andrew Dore made his entry into the towne finding made against him no great refisfance: such was his ambition and so strong and violent his appetite of dominion, that the plague which forced the naturall inhabitants to leave their patrimony and place of abiding, had not power to make him timerous to enter, where the others in their feare fled from the infection. But this fouleloffe of the city hapned chiefly by the negligence and too much fecuritie of the French king: for, both not looking that the matters of Naples would so speedily fall to ruine. and also being perswaded that in all accidents the retraite of the Nauy to Gener and the neighbourhood of Monsieur Saint Pol, would suffice either to saue or rescue, he omitted to make neceffary prouifions: Theodor who was retited within the Caltell, demanded fuccours of Saint Pol. whom he put in hope to reconquer the towne, if there were fent to him forthwirh a ffrength of three thouland footmen: which demand being confulted vpon among the Captaines confederate, the Frenchmen shewed a disposition to go thither presently with the whole campe. But the Duke of Orbin proued, that to prouide boates to make a bridge vpon Pam, and to leavy necessary proportions of victuals, was a matter which would draw a longer tractof time then the prefeut businesse required: so that according to his counsell it was determined that Atonsieur Monti Ian should turne from Alexandria to Genes, a regiment of three thousand Launceknights and Smillers who were come out of Fraunce to the army of Saint Pol, & were arrived at Alexandria: but in case they would not be led thither, then the resolution bore, that they should be led to the campe, & in their places should be dispatched and bestowed a colony of three thousand others: & that as in the meane while there should be made labor and practife to presse Panja: so the Venetians promifed, that if the enterprise of Pania fayled, they would connect to the succours of Genes all their companies, so farre forth as they might dwell assured of the affaires on that side.

Thus was refolued and continued the fiege of Pania, & the better to aduance it to a good end & iffue, there were planted the xiii, day on this fide the river of The fin in the plaine there below, nine cannons which executed upon a baffillion adioyning to the arfenacke or florehouse for munitions, which in sew howers was reduced almost to ruine, and beyond the river of The sin were braked three cannons to beate (when the assalt should be given) assalt an unswered the arfenacker and upon a lite hill side on this side The sin were bestowed five cannons which commanded two other bastillions: & upo the point of the say direct hill were bestowed three other cannons which plaied upon the wal-all which sury of artilleries beloged to the Venetias, referring the great shot of M. Saint Pol to beate upon the desences. By the day following Annyball Captaine of Cremona was come with a trench as sat as the ditch of the bastillion on that side of the arsenacke, of which two parts were already so renersed to the earth, that the soldiers that were within, had almost abandoned its this day was slaine with a bullet so the artilleries, Malates a Sogliano, one of the Captaines of the Venetians: and after the artilleries had plaied with a continual execution all the day and night following, the army was raunged and prepared to give the assalt, most part of the wall on all sides of the three bastillions, being made even with the earth. But when in the morning following they went about to draine the water out of the ditches, they found fo great a refistance by the foundation of the wall, that they confumed there all that day and the day following, by which occasion the affault was prolonged till the xix.day, when the ditch was almost cleared of all the water. By this the ballillion at the corner being wonne by the first appearing of the day, they began to give the affault, & deciding their companies into three, the first action appertained to Anthony de Castello with the Venetian regiments, the second to Monsieur de Logers, leading the foulthers of Saint Pol, and the last to the Capcaine of Cremona, commaunding the regiments of the Duke of Millan, being twelve hundred footemen. The person of the Duke of Vrbin came on foote with two hundred men at armes, and affronted the battillions, which made a valiant defence for more then two houres, vnder the valour of two hundred Launceknights and eight hundred Italians, with a very few Spaniards, who notwithstading in the actio they shewed great courage and resolution, yet for the smalnesse of their numbers they desended their bodies with great hazard and difficultie, the rather for the rage of the artilleries planted beyond Thefin, which alwayes executed vpon the principall part or flower of the ramparts. In the affault Peter Biraguo was hutt in the thigh with a shot of a harquebuze, of which wound albeit he dyed with. in few dayes after, yet he would not have his body removed from the place, to the end his fouldiers should not abandon the assault. In like fort was wounded with a harquebuze Peter Boticello, but with more fauour for that he dyed not, and with leffe shew of constancie for that he retired from the affault: they were both Captaines of the Duke of Millan, At last within xxij, houres the affailants by their valour made their entry with final butt to then selues, & right great commendation to the Duke of Irbin. The flaughter of the fouldiers within, was about 700 bodies, almoltall Launceknights, But whe the army bega to enter the towne, Galeas Biraquo being no logerable to preserue the place which he saw by all properties of destinie to decline fro him, retired . into the Caltell with all the fouldiers that remained of the flughter of the affault, together with many inhabitants of the towne, which immediatly was deliuered to the facke & spoyling, though of litle profit, by reason it had passed that afflictiot wise before. The castel was received by copositio without any affault or exploit of war, both for that there were in the camp no munitios to batter it and also the ditches which were both large & deep were not in so short time to be filled vp. and lastly there were within it a regiment of fine hundred men of warre strong. These were the capitulations between the armie and the castell: That the Spaniards with all those forts of artilleries and munitions which they could carie in their hands, and with all their trayne of baggage, should go to Millan together with the Launceknights, of whom was left of the general slaughter a verie small number: And that the Italians might go whither they would, except to Millan.

Vpon the taking of Pania, the Duke of Vrbin gaue out his reasons, that it were not good to force Millan, vnlesse they had an armse sufficient for two batteries: but to the end to vexe it and restraine it, he thought it good to take Biagrassa, Saint George, Monce, Coma, and to minister fuccours to Genes: for, notwithstanding the Launceknights and Smiffers had made aunswer to Mossieur Monte lan that they would go to Genes, yet the Launceknights taking the occasio that they were not payd, went away to Turea, by which alteratio there was no propertie of succours fent to the castell which Andrew Dore laboured to undermine with all diligence: for which cause and to apply a remedie fo necessarie, Moseur S. Pol with an hundred Launces and two thousand footing remaining with him, prepared the xxvij.day to go to the fincors of Genes; he passed Paw at Portofellain the mouth of the river of Thefin, & drew towards Tortone, with promife to turne backe againe, if he saw his succours could not be made profitable to the place. All this while the Duke of Vrbin, flayed for him at Panta, and with him were foure thousand footenen Venetians, and a thousand of the regiments of the Duke of Millan. At this time Anthonie de Lena who was retired to Millan, made an order that no mã should keepe or make any meale in their houses, except such as had redeemed & bought the tribute of ir, who payed vnto him for the space of nine moneths, three duckats for every measure of meale. With the money growing of this imposition, he paved for all that time the horsemen, & the sootemen Spanish and Launceknights; a contribution which did not onely defend him fro the danger prefent, but did entertaine him all the winter following having dispersed his regiments of Italian sootemen within Novaro & certaine townes of Lomelino, with other villages of the territories of Millan, in which wretched townes he gaue fuffcance to the fouldiers during the whole time of the winter, to spoyle & raunsom the miserable inhabitants: the first day of October M. faint Polarriued at Gany a place within xxv. miles of Genes having for his better expedition, left his artilletics at None: the day fellowing he to ale the rocke of the borough of Fornaro, but paffing further towards Genes, & vudetflanding there was entred a new strength of seven hundred footmen Corfekays, he returned efficients to the borough of Fornaro: fuch was his want of monie, that he had not with him in all, aboue foure thousand footnen aswell of his owne as of the companies of Monti lan, and a thousand who had bene fent from the campe with Nicholas Dore: and yet of those few that were with him, many troupes passed continually into France, which making him dispaire of the successe of the enterprise, he dispatched Monti Ian with three hundred footmen to Sauona, before which towne the Genowaies were incamped: but there was no meane for them to enter, both for that it was restrained and inuironed with trenches, and all the passages and places of accesse taken. The x. of October he retired himfelfe within Alexandria, and afterwards to Senazzaro betweene Alexandria and Paula, to have conference with the Duke of Vrbin: onely he was almost left without fouldiers: and there consulting upon the common affaires, where the Duke declared that there was remaining but foure thousand footmen of all nations and natures, and that Antho, de Leua had what without and within Millan foure thousand Launceknights strong, fixe hundred Spaniards, and xiiij, hundred Italians. It was refolued that the Duke should retire to Paula, and Saint Pol to Alexandria; a matter accorded vnto him by the Duke of Allan: there were also occupied speeches and deuises to make new leavies of footmen, and then if the time favoured, to advance to execute the enterprise of Biagrassa, Mortaro, and the Castell of Nonaro.

But when the inhabitants of Sanona faw that Monte Ian could not enter for their succours, they agreed amid for many distresses, to render the townethe xxi. of October, if within certaine · daies they were not rescued : and therefore Saint Pol who was carefull to relecue it, and not hauing of his owne companies aboue a thousand sootmen strong, required a supply of three thou-

fand footmen of the Duke of Vrbin and Millan, who furnished him but with xij. hundred: infomuch as having no affurance to be able to refeue it with fo finall a number, he fuffied it to be loft: and after the Genowaies hadit, they shaked the hauen with stones, for that they would make it Ihed in Gener, thoritie of Andrew Dore established in that citie a new government, such as had bene affore time

vuptofitable to feruice: and by the example of that aduer fitie, T beoder T riquice dispairing to be fuccoured, and being without money and comfort, gaue himselfe vp to composition. Assoone as the Castell was conquered, it was in a popular furic rased by the Genomaies, who with the aufolicited under the name of libertie: this was the fub flance of it: that by the counfell of four hundred citizens should be created all the Magistrates and dignities of their citie, but chiefly the Duke and supreme Magistrate, to continue for two yeares: they abrogated the law, by the which the gentlemen were excluded before out of that creation: & feeing the foundation and ground of greatest importance rested in this, to establish their libertie, that they should presently labour to reconcile the faction & diuifions of the citizens, which of long time had bene there more great & hurtfull then in anie other citie of Italy, seing besides contentions private, there had raged for long time the factions of Guelffer and Gebelins: to deface the emulation between the gentlemen and populars, which populars were not yet reduced to one unitic of will among it themselves: and lattly to reappeafe the mightie and flrong partialitie and controverse betweene the two famulies of Adorney and Fregoley. By reason of which divisions it was likely that their citie, most convenient to command the sea aswell for the situation as for the science and knowledge of marine matters, had not bene onely at feuerall feafons vexed and depressed, but also for long time had bene kept vnder a croffe of continual subjection: therefore to cure that euill even to the root, they proceeded by obscuring the names of all the famulies and houses of the citie, conseruing and retaining onely the memorie and name of xxviij, of the most noble and notable, except the 2dorness and Fregofess, which they veterly suppressed and abolished: vnder the name and number of which famulies, they gathered all those gentlemen and populars who remained without name of their houses: wherin the better to confound the memoric of all factions, they fought to intangle and intermedle the famulies of the gentlemen with the houses of the populats, and reciprocally the names of the populars with the gentlemen: fuch as had bene partners with the Adorneys, they coupled with those that had followed the name of the Fregosey, and so of the contrary, establishing under that commixtion of houses and names, an equal affinitie betweene

both: and as by this law it was ordained that there should be no distinction of power to hinder the one more then the other to aspire to honours and magistracies: so by this consusion of names and menthey hoped, that within the course of a few yeares, the poisoned memorie of sactions and quarrels would be veterly defaced and quenched: and in the meane while the authoritie of Andrew Dore remained great amongst them, without whose consent and privit both for the reputation of the man, and for the authoritie of the Emperours gallies which he commanded, and for his other conditions and parts, they would not passe anie deliberation of things which were of greatest importance: onely the thing which made his puilfance and greatnesse less troublefome, was, that he would neither suffer the treasure to be administred with his ordenance, nor, intrude hiralese into the election of the Duke and other magistrates, and much lesse communicate in causes more particular and lesse: by which maner of behauiour the citizens being reduced to minds peaceable, became more inclined to marchandize thento ambition, and retaining still impressions of their trauels and subjections passed, they had great reason to love and follow that forme of gouernment. After this the French fleet and the name of Andrew Dore buckled together betweene Monaro and Nice, where one of Dores gallies was funke.

After the loffe of Sauona, the Duke of Vrbin, and Monfieur faint Pol, met together of new at Senaro betweene Alexandria and Pania: where the Duke of Vrbisto the great discontentment of Frances Sforce, and Minfieur faint Pol, resolved to repasse on the other side the riner of Adda, both leaving to the Duke of Millan the gard of Paula, and counselling Monsieur faint Pol to fpend the winter in Alexandria: with which alterations the French kings officers were not onely discontented, but also himselfe not taking for payment certaine light excuses which the Venetion ans made to him, complained bitterly that they had not succoured the Castell of Genes, and the citie of Sauona, which the Genomaies in their rage had viterly deformed. After this, a supply of a thousand Launceknights were fent to faint Pol, with whome, accompting the thousand foot-

In this time hapned a tumult in the Marquisedome of Salussa: the accident was this. After the death of the Marquis Michaell Anthony, Francis his brother having taken upon him the jurifdiction, by reason that Gabriell the second brotherto Anthony, even in the time of his eldest brother by direction of the mother who had managed the government of the children during their minority, had benekept prisoner in the Rocke of Rauel, under colour that he was almost eltranged from his vinderstanding: it happined that the captaine of the rocke deliuered him; by which meane seazing youn the mother who had holden him prisoner, and being gladsomely embraced of the people, he conquered the whole estate: to which felicitie of the time it seemed his brother gaue place, and fled in his feare to Carmagnola, where, having afterwards reaffembled his forces, he overthrew his brother Gabriel. There passed no more actions of consequencie in Lombardy for this yeare, faming that Count Carezza ran vp even as farre as Millan, taking advantage vpon the negligence of the Venetians, who omitted to fend to Monsieur saint Pol the forces they had promised for the enterprise of Saranallo, Gany, and other places of the Genowaies: there was alto made an attempt of an exploit of great importance: for, Monti Ian and Vecellero with two Monti Ian thouland footmen and fiftie horsemen, departed in the evening to Vicado, to surprise Andrew millethrosur-Dore in his pallace, the which standing upon the sea coast retaineth a verie nere neighbourhood prise Andrew to the wals of Genes. But this plot was vaine in the effect, for that the footmen for the tediouf- Dore. nesse and longnesse of the way containing xxij, miles, could not reach the place where they were to execute their enterprise before the night were walted, and being discourred by the clearnesse and benefit of the day, the alarme arole, which from hand to hand was brought at last to Andrew Dore, who convaying himselfeout of the backfide, was received into a barke, and by her fwiftneffe of failes and oares, he anoyded the danger that was prepared against his life: onely the French men milling by miladuenture the person of Andrew Dore, converted their rage you his pallace, which they facked, and afterwards returned in fafetie. Also Count Caiezzo having laid an ambush betweene Atillan and Atonceo, overthrew fine hundred Launceknights and an hundred light horseme who were sent out to eskort or safe-conduct the victuallers: but being afterwards fent to Bergama, he so afflicted that citie with pillage and robbing, that the Senate of Venice, who had established him captaine generall ouer their infanterie, decassed him and depriued him with infanile of their pay, whom in their compassion they could not indure in so great Ddddiiij

a cultome of insolencie and auarice. About this time the Spaniards tooke the towne of Vigenena, and Belioveuse who was escaped out of the hands of the French men, being sent by Ambo. de Lena with two thousand footmen to surprise Pania, wherein was a garrison of fine hundred footmen of the Duke of Millan, presented himselfe one night before the wals, but being discouered he was compelled to retire without anie effect. There arrived in the countrey of Genes a supply of two thousand footmen Spaniards, whom the Emperour sent out of Spane eitherto defend Genes, or else to be converted to Millan, according to the necessitie and occasion of affaires. Beliogense went out to meete this supply and conduct them: who as they made shew that they would take the way either to Platfance or of Cafa, to Monfieur faint Pol put himselfe in preparation to ftop their comming, and fent to folicite the Venetian bands to make themselves strong . at Loda, to the end that the bands of Willan flould not come out to backe them: he laboured also to perswade them to execute joyntly the enterprise of Millan, being thereunto induced through the want of victuals and other dispaires of those wretched inhabitants. But the Duke of Vrbin was not of that opinion, like as also the Venetians proceeded coldly in the braue actions of that time, wherein both for the report of Andrew Nauager their Embassadour now returned out of Spaine, and in regard of a certaine practife and intelligence which was entertained at Rome with the Emperours Embassadour, the opinions of the Senate were diverse, manie inclining to have an accord with the Emperout: and yet it was at last resolved to continue the confederatio with the French king: at which time Torusello having passed the river of Thefin with two thousand footmen, tooke Basisnan & went towards Lomelina: & the Abbot of Farfa going with his cornets of horfmen to Crescentin a place of the Duke of Sauor, was defeated by night & taken prisoner: but being afterwards set at libertie by the working of the Marquis Montferat and the Marquis of Mus, he ouerthrew certaine regiments of Antho. de Lena, & tooke their artilleries.

There began to rise a doubt that the Pope inclined to the Emperours side, both for that the Cardinall Saint Crossebing arrived at Naples, caused to be delivered three Cardinals who were there in ostage, and also according to the rumor that ran, he had commission from the Emperor to cause to be rendred Ostin and Cinitavecchia: and by his meane and working the Pope being also solicited, Andrew Dore restored to the Siennoys Portobercole: but there were daily more and more arguments & restimonies that the Popes mind was caried with a disposition to new things, for that by his meane though secretly, Braccio Baillon for the interest of the affaires of Perousa, molested Malaiesta, notwithstanding he was in his pay: and when he understood that the Duke of Ferrara was come to Oslodena, he conspited to take him in his returning with an ambush of two hundred horsemensaid by Paule Luzasquo upon the consines of Modena: but for that the Duke stirred not out of Modena both the device was disclosed & the effect disapointed.

About this time the Realme of Naples notwithslanding the overthrow of the French was not entirely deliuered of the calamities of the warre: for, as Symon Romain having affembled new companies, had taken Nano, Oriolo, and Amigdalaro, townes standing upon the sea side at the point of the Appenine : so drawing to him into one strength Federike Caraffa whom the Duke of Granino had fent with a thousand footmen, together with manie others of the countrey, he had an armie reasonably well compounded. But after the victorie of the Imperials about Naples, and being abandoned of the companies of the Duke of Granina, he entred into the towne of Barlettaby the Castell, and putting it to sacke and pillage, he staied there: at what time the Venetians held Trany garded by Camilla, and Monopoly defended by John Conrardo, both captaines of the family of the Vrins. After this Range de Cere and the Prince of Melfe came into the kingdome with athousand footmen: who being reduced betweene Nocero and Gualdo, and afterwardes retiring from thence by the commandement of the Pope who would not offend the mindes of the victors, embarked themselnes at Singalo and went by sea to Barletto, with intention to renew the war in Powilla; a matter determined upon by comon confent of the Confederats, to the end to constraine the Imperial army to make theirabode in the kingdome of Naples untill spring time, at what time they drew to counsell & conference to make new prouisions for their commo fafety: for which matter the French king fent to Ranfe a reliefe & fuccors of monie, like as also the Venetais concurring with the king in the same defire, the rather to retaine more easily & keep still by the help of others, the townes which they had take in Powilla, offred to furnish him of xij. gallies: but whe the king vrged them to arme & appoint those gallies, referuing to defray the charge and

and expences ypon the fourescore thousand duckets, whereunto they were bound by the contribution promifed to M. Lawtrech, they would not hearken to it. The king of England promifed not to be behind with his part of the prouisions ordinarie: & the Florentmes had cotracted to pay the third part of the companies which Range had leaused: the Imperials thewed no great readinesse or disposition to quench so great a preparation of trouble, being busied on all parts to exact money to fatisfie the fouldiers of their duties and payes past wherein both to leavie those exa-Clions with more facilitie, and the better to affure the kingdome with examples of feueritie: the Prince of Orenge even in the market place of Naples, where the plague raged most, and in the publike view of the people, caused to be beheaded Federike Caietan sonne to the Duke of Tra- Naples cetto, and Henrie Pandon Duke of Toniano, a discendant of one of the daughters of old Ferdinand king of Naples, together with foure other Neapolitans, extending also the same rigour of punishment vpon other places of the kingdome: with which maner of proceeding, no lettle pitifull in the persons, then dangerous for the example, he reduced into seare and assonishment the mindes of all men, not omitting to proceed against the absent, such as had followed the French faction with confiscation of their goods, which atterwards he suffered to be copounded for with money, & did not forget anie violence or extremitie by the which he might draw greatest summes of mony: all which actions of mutther and oppression were supposed to have their device and resolution by the wit of lerome Moron, to whom was given in recompence of his services the Duchie of Bourano. To these emotions and stirres was added the exploit of John Lacques Franco in Abruzza, who entred for the French king into Matrina, which is neare to Aquila, by whose coming all the parts & people of the countrey drew into commotion, neither was the region of Aguila without fulpition of rifing, where lay ficke with fixe hundred footmen Serro Colonno: moreouer the L'enetians made prouision for the affaires of Powilla, who fending by sea certaine companies of light horsemento furnish Barletto, one part of the yessels which caried them, perished in the lakes of Barletto & Trang, where their Treasurer was drowned seeking to saue his life in a litle skiffe: the companies of horfemen, who had for their leader lohn Conrado Orfin, being fore beaten with the rage of the tepest, fell into the hands of the Imperials: & John Paule de Cere, who made his shipwrack near Gualt, remained prisoner to the Marquis. In the latter end of the yeare, the regio of Aquila became for the league, by the mean of the Bishop there, & good working of Count Motoiro with others of the exiles, who being hardly vsed by the Imperials, sought their remedy by reuolt.

In the beginning of the yeare 1529 began to appeare on all fides certaine fignes and good dif-1529 positions to peace, which seemed to carie a generall desire to be solicited and negociated in the Popes court: for, as there was good aduertifement that the Cardinall Samt Croffe (inch was the title of the Spanish Generall) was gone vp to Rome with warrant from the Emperour to conclude a peace: so the French king, whose defire to end the warres was nothing inserior, dispatched to the fame end a commission to his Embassadours, in which action also the king of England tooke interest, and in the same regard sent Agents to Rome, which matters of negociation and hope of peace ioyned to the trauell and wearineffe of Princes, brought the Confederates to proceede flowly in the prouisions of the warre, for that in Lombardietheir greatest thought and care was, whether the Spaniards being come to Genes, could passe to Millan, from whence the Launceknights for want of pay, were almost all retired: & to conduct them thither, Belioyense with a hundred horfmen was gone vp as farre as Cafa: and from thence in habite difguifed was passed into Genes, fro whence he led the faid footbands of Spaniards to Sauona, with intention to gather together fine hundredmore newly come out of Spaine, and were disbarked at Villafranco.

But in the realme of Naples the Imperials could not but doubt, that the rebellion of Aquila & Matricia, together with the stirres and risings that had bene made in Powilla, would breed and bring forth some matter of fatte greater importance : and therefore to cut off & remedie the mischiefe aforethe ill were come to his fulnesse, they determined to convert to the expugnation and suppression of those places, the forces they had: & in that resolution the Marquis of Guaff with his regiment of Spanish footmen, was sent out to recouer the townes of Powilla: and the Prince of Orenge likewise with his Launceknights was dispatched to reconquet Aquila and Matricia: who as soone as he made his approches to Aquila, they that were within issued out, and left the place abandoned: the Prince compounding for the citie and the whole country at a ranfome of an hundredthousand duckets, & tooke away by vertue of his conquest & contract the oblation of silver which the French king Lewis the tenth had confecrated to S. Bernard: from thence he fent fouldiers to Matricia, where lay in garrison Camillo Pardo with source hudred footme, who was gone away not manie dayes before with promife to returne againe: but being not without his feuerall feares, both for the want of wine, whereof was left no store, the necessitie of waters, which were all cut from them, and for the faction betweene the towne and the fouldiers, which was firong and violent; and lastly, for some other reason, which men in their timerousnesse want not, he did not only not returne againe, but also he kept from them some of that reliefe, of money which the Florentines had fent to him, for the defending and succouring of that place: by reason of which disorders, both their Leader having left them, and their wants without comfort or hope of relieuing, the fouldiers went in their aray vpon the walles, and the townes-men rendred the place. The confideration of these good events and issues, brought a feare least the Prince of Orenge would passe into Tuscane, at the instance of the Pope, who being deliucred of a most daungerous, but Thort difease, ccased not to solicite & give hopes to all men: he promised the Frenchmen to slicke to the League, so farre forth as Rauenna and Serusa were rendred to him: & he offered to compound under reasonable conditions with the Florentines and Duke of Ferrara, who touching the payments of money made before to Monsieur Lawtrech, affirmed that what he did in thole paiments, was of his liberalitie, and not by vertue of obligation, for that the Pope had forborne to ratifie. On the other fide, now that he hadrecouered (though at great charges) the Castles of Oftia & Cinitanecchia, by vertue of a comiffion which the Cardinall Saint Croffe had brought, he entertained with the Emperour intelligences more fecret, and practifes more certaine then before; yea, they debated rather vpontheir affaires particular (which beganne to be managed in a course more assured and secret) then that there passed betweene them any action or solicitation, tending to the vniuerfall peace : only in Barletto the flate of affaires was this: Barletto was holden for the French king, within the which was Range de Cere, at d with him the Prince of Melfe, Federike Caraffa, Simon Roman, Camillo Perdo, Galeas de Farneso, John Conrard Ursin, and the Prince of Stiphano. The Venetians had Trany, Pulionany, and Monopoly : their forces in those places were two thousand footmen, and fixe hundred horsemen Albanieus, whereof two hundred were within Whonopoly: they had also at their denotion the port of Biestry. Now after the French king had fent in the beginning a finall prouision of mony to those copanies, he forbare afterwards to relieue them with anie further supplies, nor did not accept the xij. bodies of Gallies offered to him by the Venetians, of which three perished in the lake of Bieftry with a great foist, as they went torcuichuall Trany & Barletto: and of therefidue they had loft at fundry times fine more, fauing notwithstanding their artilleries and other furnishments. The Frenchmen held also the mount Saint Angeo and Nardo in the quarter of Ottranto and Gastro, wherein was the Count Dugento: the actions of the warte were performed with the bodies & men of the kingdome, and with the forces of the countrey, many rebels to the Emperour were affembled in fundrie places, & many were drawne into companies and firength, who as aduenturers followed the warre for pillage only: so that the condition of the countrey was farre more miserable then any man would have beleeued, euerietowne and place being laid open to robberies, prayes, ranfoms & wretched burnings on all fides: only the extortions and inuafions of Simon Roman were more intollerable the any other, who ouer-running with his light horsemen, and a band of two hundred and fifty footmen all the partes and confines of those countries, brought oftentimes into Barletto great droues of cattell, and great quantity of corne, with other nature of bootie and spoyle : and in that liberty of warre running a race of vexation and crueltie he would fornetimes by furprife, and fornetimes with force, inuade townes and places with wretched examples and actions of inhumanity: of which the towne of Canofa was a lamentable experience, where entring by night by the benefit of scaling ladders, he put the towne to sacke, and many of the inhabitants to death, whom he found seeping in their last rest, he stripped likewise in that exploit manie horsemen of the fortie men at armes that lay in the Cassle. At last the Marquis of Guast for bearing to execute any action vpon Barletto, being a towne strong and fortified, settled his Campe in march before the towne of Monopoly with foure thousand Spaniards footemen, and two thousand Italians: for, the Launceknights being in number two thousand fine hundred, and staying in Abruzza, refused to go to Powilla: he encamped himselfe in a small valley so shadowed & couered with the mountaine, that he could not be endoniaged with the artilleries of the town in the towne were Camillo Urlin

Or sin and John Vetturio Treasurer, to whom Ranse sent speedily upon the gallies three hundred footmen. Monopoly is a towne of small circuit, and hath the sea on three parts of it, and rowards the land it beareth a wall of three hundred, or three hundred and fifty pales, with a ditch about it : right against this wall the Marquis caused to be made a bastillion within the shot of harquebuze, and two others vpon the sea shoare, of either side one: they beat the sea, and the gate towards the sea, and gaue impediment that no succours or victuals should enter by the helpe of the gallies : and so having made these preparations in the beginning of Aprill, the Marquis gaue the affault to Monopoly, where he lost more then fine hundred fouldiers, and many pyoners, besides three pecces of artilleries which were broken, retiring with his harmes about a mile and a halfe fro the place, for that he was not able to endure the vexation of the artilleries out of the towne; by reason of which retiring, the Venetians issued out, & ran vpon the bastillions which he had made, making flaughter of more then an hundred bodies, and with the fame felicitie they affured the port or hauen by a Mount, which they raifed upon the shoare, right ouer against the bastillion of the enemies: neuertheleffe, though the Marquis was expulfed, yet he could not be made desperate, but making new approches to Monopoly, and returning from whence he was repulfed, he raifed two caualliers to beate within the towne : he cast also trenches, to leade him even voto their ditches, and filled them with fixe hundred loades of earth rammed in baskets : but not long after that ballillion was burned by the industrie of two hundred footenen, iffuing to that end out of Monopoly. Afterwards the Marquis being approched with a trench upon the right fide of the batterie, and having driven another trench on the right fide of the lodging of the Spaniards within a hand throwing of the duch, and also after he had fortified a bastillion behind the same, he planted upon it his artilleries, and executed threefcore fadomes of wall thereabout within foure factomes of the earth: but viderstanding that the same night were entred new companies sent by Ranse, he retired his artilleries, and confequently the end of the moneth of May drawing on, he brake up his campe. During the lying of this Campe before Monopoly, and after it was leauied and retired, there followed diverse factions and emotions, both for the great harmes and domages done by them of Barletta by spoile and bootie, and also the garuson that was within mount Saint Angeo, having for Commaunder Federke Caraffa, tooke Saint Senero, and rescuing the towne of Viro, they compelled the Imperials to leavie their campe from before it. After that Caraff a went by fea with xxvj. fayles to Laciano, where lay an hundred & threefcore men at armes, and entring the place by force, he brought away as tellimonies of his valour, three hundred horse offeruice, and a great bootie of other natures of things, without leaving any garrifon in the place. There were also many troupes of exiles, who did great harmes in Bafillicate, for which difficulties as the Imperials exacted with all their industrie the taxes and impositions: so there is no doubt that if the French king had fent money, and anie reasonable supplie of succours, but new affaires and businesse had growne vpon the Imperials throughout the whole kingdome, which had at least so encombred the Emperours armie, that it would have intangled the course of their owne affaires. But so difordred were their companies, both undisciplined and accustomed to tumults, and delinered up without any succours or refreshing (for the Florentmes ministred onely reliefe to Ran(e) that they could not do any action of great consequence, seeing withali that both the Duke of Ferrara refused to send to Ranse by sea source peeces of artilleries, & also the store of money & come began to diminish within Barletta. Morcouer, about fixe hundred rebels of the countrie of Calabria, befreged by the Viceroy within Monthon, were drive for want of municion and victuals to render the place, and in that calamitie were led prisoners to Naples . Afterwards the Prince of Melfe with the armie by sea, and Federike Caraffa by land, went to encampe before Malfetta, a place aforetime belonging to the Prince, where Federske in fighting for the lafety of his life, was flaine with a stone: in reuege of whose death the Prince extended his indignatio to far vpo the towne, that taking it by force, he put it to a miferable facke; a like mifadueture fell vpo Simo Roma, for that as the Venetia atmy, which fro the cape of Ottronta vexed all the courty, was drawne neare to Brudulo, they fet on land certaine copanies of foldiers, with who was Simon Roman, and caried the towne, but in affaulting the rocke Simo was flaine with a bullet.

Whilest the realme of Naples was thus travelled with diverse successes, the matters of Lombar-Proceedings of die suffered no great traquillitie: M. Saint Poll about the end of March tooke by force the towne M. Saint Pol of Senarella, and the castle compounded to stand neuter: but the valour of the enemies recovered in Lombardy, againe the thing which by his industrie he could not keepe, for that he lost one night by surprise the towne, which earst he had wonne by force; the same with other reasons driving a feare into him, that he was no longer able to stop the Spaniards the way to Millan: he saw also a dayly diminution of the numbers of his campe for want of money, whereof as he received but verie litle from the king, so of that litle, being a Captaine of litle governmet, he expended one part for himfelfe, and suffered another part to be imbeaseled and robbed by his officers. The king and Venetians disputed what enterprise were good to take in hand: the king made instance to advaunce the exploit of Genes, both for the importance of that Citie, and also for that it began to be a beleefe amongst them, that the next sommer the Emperour would passe into Italy: and for that the king effeemed that the Venetians had never holpen him either to refeue or to recover that: wherin notwithstanding they excused themselves, by an uninersall rumour running in Italy of the descending of new Launceknights, yet he could not but doubt that they were ill contented to fauour the victorie of that enterprise. But the Venetians to obscure for the time the memorie of that exploit, brought into deuice the action of Mullan, which both they laid out to be verie easie for the small number of souldiers that were with Antho. de Lena, and also they offered, that when the conquest of Millan were perfourmed, they would administer to the enterprise and befieging of Genes: in which regard the resolution went by the kings consent, to embrace the enterprife of Millan with a campe of fixteene thousand footenen, of whom enerie one to make prounifion for the moity. This resolution was made in March, and in the absence of the Duke of Vrbin, who, for that the Prince of Orenge and the Launceknights were drawne neare the confines of the kingdome, was retired upon his owne estate, almost against the will of the Venetians: who neuerthelesse retained him of new into their pay, with the same conditions which aforetime they had passed to Bart. Aluiano and the Count Petillano, sending him also for his defence three hundred horsemen and three thousand scotmen, according to the contract of their obligation, and gaue the title of Gonernour to lanus Fregofo: there were in the armie of the Venetians fixe hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and soure thousand sootemen, notwithstanding they were bound to maintaine twelve thousand. This armie the fixt of Aprill tooke by force Cajsiano, and the rocke rendred to discretion, when Anthode Lena and Torniello being come out of Millan to divert or draw away the enemics, returned backe without doing any thing. The Spaniards passed from Genes to Millan, notwithstanding to stop them, there had bene made so manie devices and resolutions: for where Al. Saint Pol and the Venetians had supposed that they would make their passage by the parts of Tortona and Alexandria, they tooke at their departure from Voftaggio, and by the direction of Believenje, the way that was more long by the mountaine of Plaisance, and places subject to the Church: and being come to Varsy, in the sayd mountaine, notwithstanding Samt Pol made to march from thence anhundred and fifty horsmen appointing their way to Loda, and also the companies of the Venetians, who for that they would be before, fent one part of their bands to the Duke of Millan, but both later by one day then they shold, & in lesse numbers then they promised, yet they passed by night the river of Parat Areno, vfing the service of the vessels of Plaisance: so that being no more able to stop their vnicing with Anthade Lena, who for the more fafetie & facility of their joyning, was come to Landriane, within twelve miles of Paura, they met and joyned with him, and so being conducted to Millan, so poore and naked of all things, that they seemed to beare the resemblance of rogues, they increaled the calamities of the inhabitants there, by putting them to spoyle and robberie, euen in the streetes. Thus was litle profitable to the French and Venetians all their actions and doings of the whole winter, which were extended to stop the passage of their souldiers to take Gany, & places enuironing Gonos and Casa; places doing great domages to the whole country. Moreover Anth. de Lena tooke Binafque by composition: but where the Spaniards had served their turnes of the Barkes of Platfance, & that as was believed, they had not removed had they not bene affured that in case of necessitie they might retire into that citie, besides many other apparances and tokens, the Confederates began to rife in suspition, that the Pope specially touching the rollitution of the Cafiles, was either entirely accorded, or at least verie neare to accord with the Emperour.

Now wherethe Pope in great secrecie, had disposed all his thoughts to recouer the estate of Florence, wherin albeit to circumuent the French Embassadours, he entertained fundrie practises, and led both them and the other Confederates in diverse humours of hope to accord with the League:

Devices of the Pore to restore his house in Florence.

League: yet being partly moued with feare of the greatnesse of the Emperor & the prosperitie of his affaites, and partly through hope to induce him more eafily then he could induce the French King, to restore and reestablish his house in Florence, he inclined much more on the Emperours fide then on the French Kings: he had also a vehement desire to make easie his device to draw to his devotion the estate of Perousa, in which action it was beleeved that he entertained Braccio Baillon, who managed euerie day new driftes in those confines: by reason whereof, Malatesta doubting, least whilest he was in his pay, he should be oppressed with his fauour, thought it neceffarie for him to seeke to put himselfe in the protection of another: therfore either induced with that reason, or caried with a couctousnesse after greater parties, or pushed on with a passion of ancient hatted, he refused to reenter into his pay, pretending that he was not bound for the whole yeare, but at his election, for that as he alleaged, the contract appeared not by writing, notwithstanding the Pope maintained a further obligation fo that he solicited to enter into the pay of the French and Florentines, complaining bitterly of certaine intelligences and practifes cutertained against him by the Cardinall of Cortons, and of a letter which he had surprised, written by the Cardinall Medicis to Braccio Baillon. But the Pope feeking indirectly to flop the effeet of his deuice, forbad by Edicts publike, that none of his subjects without his leave, thold take the payes of other Princes, vpon paine of confifcation: neuerthelesse, Malasesta torbare not for that to profecute his deuice: the Frenchmen bound them to indue him with a charge of two hundred horsemen, two thousand Crownes pension, the order of Saint Michael, and in time of warre with two thousand sootmen: and the Florentines gave him the title of Governout, two thousand Crownes pension, a thousand footmen in time of war, fiftie horsemen for his sonne, and fiftie for the some of Horatio, with fine hundred Crownes for the pay of them both: they tooke vpon them the protection of his efface of Perousa; and aswell the French king as they made him one joint allowance in time of peace, of an hundred Crownes the moneth, to entertaineten Captaines: and the Florentines apart made him a pay for two hundred footmen for the guard of Peroufa; and for his part, he was onely bound to this, to go to their feruice with a thousand footemen, when their affaires required; yea, though he should not have the bands promited from the French king. Of this dealing the Pope complained highly to the French king, as a matter done directly to let him for disposing according to his will, of a citie which was vasfall and subject to the Church, the fame making the king, who bare no mind to kindle the Pope, to deferre the action of ratification: and for the same cause, the Pope hoping to beable to alter or retire Malatefta, perswaded him to continue out his yeare; and at the same time he entertained secretly Braccio Baillon, Serro Colonno, and the exiles of Perousa, who having affembled and mustered bands of fouldiers, lay encamped at Norcio. But all these practises, together with all offers & oblations served to no purpose, for that Malatesta was resolutely fixed to continue no longer in the Popes pay; & as the Florentines ministred and to him openly, so he seared so much the lesse those Hirres or emotions, by how much they ceased forthwith, the Pope finding they were vnperfect and infufficient to leade on his hopes to their effects. Befides, the Pope would not fuffeethe Dukc of Ferrarato dwell in rest, and he was so farre off from observing the covenants made with the Duke, in the name of the Colledge of Cardinals, that the Bilhopricke of Modena being newly falleninto vacation by the death of Cardinall Gonzagno, an estate promised to the Dukes some by the said couenant, he bestowed it by his authority upon lerome Moroin, feeking, under colour of refuling the possession, occasion to pronoke against him such a personage and minister, bearing great authoritie in the Emperours armie. He entertained also a pra-Sile with Ierome Pio, to occupie Reggia, & that by the meane and operation of Hubert de Gambaro, Gouernour of Bolognia: but when the Duke was informed of the state of the practile, and how far it exteded, he passed Pio to such propertie of punishment, as his offence deserved : he laid plots also to surprise Rauenna, which likewise sorted to none effect. And about this time, inclining dayly by apparant degrees to the Emperors part, & being also wel advanced in the solicitation of things, he fent vnto him the Bithop of Vasono his Heward: he called backe the cause of divorce of the king of England, which he had done long time before, had not the regard of the Bul which was alreadie in England in the hands of his Legate Campeius retained him: for, as the good fortunes of the Emperourincreased in Italy, so he sought not onlie not to offend him surther, but also to reuoke the offence he had done him alreadic, being indeed determined before he was ficke,

Ecec

Cause of the ruine of the Cardinall of Yorke,

to reuoke the cause: in which action he sent Frauncis Compagnio into England to the Cardinall Campeius, diffembling to the king, that he was fent for other matters, including notwithstanding matter appertaining to that cause, where indeed he brought commission to fiameius to burne the Bull: & albeit Campeius for a maladie the Pope was fallen into, deferred for a time the execution of that commission, yet whenhe knew he was recured, he perfourmed the thing he was commanded: fo that the Pope being thus delinered of that feare, revoked the cause, though not without great indignation of that king, especially when he required the Buil of the Legate, and viderflood by him the vinworthic accident of it. These matters made both more seuere, and more readie the ruine and fall of the Cardinall of Yorke, whose authoritie the king supposed to be so great and gracious with the Pope, that if his mariage with the Lady Anne had bene agreeable to him, he might have obtained of the Pope what dispensation he would. By which occasion, opening his cares to the entile and malice of his adverfacies, he grew kindled against him, even to the taking from him his goods and treafure of a wonderfull value, and in his indignation leaving him a finall part of the reuenues of his benefices, he restrained him to his Bishopricke, with a slender traine of servants : and so not long after, either by a surprise of letters, which he wrote to the Frenchking, or for fome other propertie of malice of his enemies, who gathering by the kings speeches, that he was not without inclination towards him, and therefore seared least he would rile againe into his auncient authoritie, he was conuented to appeare in Counfell to speake for himselfe in matters to be objected against him : for which caute, as he was brought towards the Court as prisoner, he was sodainly taken with a fluxe, engendred either of the humor of disdaine, or of the passion of searc, of which he died the second day after he was apprehended with the maladie; an example in our dayes worthie of memorie, touching the power which fortune and enuy hath in the Courts of Princes.

About this time fell out in Florence, to the great prejudice of the government that then was, a new chalenge against Nicholas Cappony Gonfedonier, it hapned almost vpour he end of the second yeare of his Magistracie, and was incented principally by the enuic of some of the chiefe Citizens, who tooke occasion of the vaine suspitions and fond ignorances of the Commons: Nucholas Cappany, during all the time of his Magistracie, hath had these two principall objects, the one to defend himselfe against the fresh enuy of those that had bene honoured of the house of Azeaicis, fuffering the principals amongst them to communicate with the other Citizens in the honeurs & counfels publike: and the other, not to flire or make angric the mind of the Pope in matters which were not of importance, touching the libertie. Of which things both the one and other had bene found profitable to the common wealth: for, like as many, cuen of those, who were perfecuted as enemies to the government, being affired and embraced, had bene firmely conjoyned with the others to preferue the flate, knowing withall, that the Pope, for matters hapning in the times when the government changed, was ill contented with them: so touching the Pope, albeit he defired vehemently the returning and restauration of his friends, yet having no new prouocation or matter of wrong, he had so much the leffe occasion to burst out, and to complaine, as he did continually with other Princes. But against these matters was opposed the ambition of certaine particulars of them, who knowing well enough, that if fuch (hould be admitted ... to the government as had bene friends to the Meanes, being indeed men of most experience & valour, that their estate and authoritie should be madelesse; laboured by all the studies & deuices they could, to keepe the common people full of suspition, both of the Pope and of them, not sparing to flaunder the Gonfalonier, as well for those causes, as also to the end to deptive him of his Magistracie for the third yeare, to charge him that he bare not a mind so far estraunged from the familie of Medices, as the interest and profite of the common weale required: which imputations and chalenges not moving him at all, and holding it veriene ceffarie not to have the Pope incenfed, he tooke the more libertie to entertaine him privately with letters and Embassages, yet fuch as he had not begun nor profecuted without the continual printite and knowledge of fome fuch as were Principals and chiefe Magillrates, neither did he manage them to other end, then to. retaine or retire the Pope from some act of precipitation : but whereas a letter that was sont to him from Rome, fell by misfortune into interception, bearing certaine words to breed suspition in such as knew not the ground and foundation of those things, and the same letter being passed ouer into the hands of some of those that sate and managed the supreme function, there were certaine certaine yong men prepared to fedition, who rifing into armes, inuaded by force the publike pallace, and in their infolencie restrained the Gonfalonier almost under guard, and going on to confirme this beginning with acts of manifest rebellion, they funmoned together in maner of a tumult, almost all the Magistrates, and many Citizens, where they debated to deprive him of his Magistracie; which being approued in the great Counsell, his cause was afterwards referred to the examination of the law, wherein being absolued by judgement and sentence, he was led with great honour to his houses, accompanied with the greatest presence of the Nobility. In his place was preferred Frauncis Carduccio, a personage vnworthie of so great a dignitie, regarding his life passed, his customes, and his wicked ends and intentions.

Now began new stirres to appeare in Lombardy, At. Saint Pol having past the river of Par at Valencia the xxvij. of Aprill, by reason of which proceeding the Imperials abandoned the borough of Basignana, and the parish of Caira: from thence Saint Pol sent Guido Rangon with one part of the armie to Montaro; a place strong for the double ditches, stankes and waters: and as they had planted by night their artilleries, without prouisions of baskets, without trenches, and other like preparations, they were by day charged by those that were within, such as did the great harmes, and cloyed two peeces of their artilleries, and put therefidue in daunger to beloft. At that time, albeit there was within Millan a flender prouision of things necessarie, yet the preparations of the French and Venetians were in no better condition, who complaining one of another, were both negligent to furnish things needfull in so much, as among ll other difficulties, the Confederates fell into some doubt, that the Duke of Millan, for the little hope he saw remaining to reconquer that state, either by his owne forces, or with their fuccours, would make some accord with the Imperials, by the meane and working of Moron. But the thoughts and denices Althe Princes of the Frenchking tended altogether to peace, for a diltrust he had not to be able otherwise to re- hearle to peace couer his children: whereunto also the Emperour bearing a manifest inclination, two Gentlemen, whom the Ladie Margaret had sent to him for that effect, were returned fro Spaine, bringing to her ample commission to go through with the peace; of which when the French king was aductifed by a Secretatie of his, whom for that matter he had dispatched into Flaunders, he required the Confederates for their parts to addresse commissioners also: and having determined in himselse to leave there all the provisions of the warre, yet feeking to worke under some iust colour, he complained that the Venetians had refused to contribute to the money for his passage: who albeit in the beginning (to farre forth as the Emperour passed) they had earnestly folicited him to passe, which also the king had offered to perfourme with two thousand source hundred Launces, a thousand light horsemen, and twentie thousand sootemen, in case the Confederates would give him money to pay aboue this, a thousand light horsemen and twentie thoufand footmen, and contribute to the moitie of the expences of the attilleries; yet what focuer was the occasion, they changed counsell, and retired from those offers.

At this time Monsieur Saint Pol with foure cannons tooke Saint Angeo by force, wherin was a garrifon of foure hundred footmen: and in the fame expedition he converted his strength to Columbano, to open to his campe a passage of victuals from Plassance, and made himselfe master of the place by copolition. Afterwards, being informed that there lay a force of foure thousand footmen within Millan, but much weakened with maladies, he thought to affault it. The lecend of May Moraro rendred to Atonfieur Saint Polat diferetion , though after it had suffered so great an execution of the artilleries, that there was no more possibilitie to make defence. Torniello left also the towne of Novaro, but not the Castle, wherein he put a verie slender strength of sootmen, and retired his person to Atllan: so that the Imperials held no other peece beyond the river of Thefinthen Gaya and the tocke of Biagrassa: Monsieur Saint Polliauing also gotten the tocke of Vigenena. The tenth day he marched to the bridge of Lucqua to joyne with the Venetias at the borough of S. Martin. Here the Duke of Vrbin came to the armie, and from thence being gone vp to Beliogense to have conference together, the resolution was in the common counsell to incampe before Mellan with two armies on two fides, for which expeditio M. Jame Pol paffing ouer Thefin shold turne to Bragraffa to force it, & the fame day the Venetias to go to the botough of faint Martin, which is within five miles of Millan, the Venetrans affuring that their campe contained 1 2000 footmen, & M. faint Pols 8000, to whom was to be joyned the bands of footmen of the Duke of Millan. By this direction A1. Saint Pol passed the river of Thesin, & finding the towns of Biagrassa abadoned, he caried the castle by accord: & so encaping at Gazzano, about viij, miles fro Milian, he conserred of new with the Duke of Orbin at Binasque the third of June: in which place they were credibly certified that the I enctions had not in their campe the one half of 12000 footmen according to the capitulatios of the cotract; a matter which for that M. faint Pol coplajned greatly vpo, it was fet downe that Millan shold be approched with one campe: only on that fide of Lazzaretto, notwithstanding the protestation of Count Guido, who allcaged that Arth de Lena, at whose denotio remained only Millan & Coma, was wont to say, that Milla could not be forced but with two campes: but not many dayes after, those opinions & counsels being chaged, the Chieftaines of both the armies being affembled within Loda, the Dukes of Millen and Irbin notwithstanding they solicited before to haue the campe go to Millan, and were flatly against the expedition of Genes, yet they were now of a contrarie adulfe, the Duke of Vibin alleaging many reasons to instific that new counsell: but principally he insisted vpo this, that seeing the Emperor made preparation to passe into Italie, for whose conduct Andrew Dore was departed from Gones with his gallies the eight of June : and withall sceing in Germany there was intention to send new companies of Launceknights into Italy under Captaine Felix, he flood indifferent, and in his reason and experience could not finde out whether it were better to take Millan, or not to take it: these were the reasons he inferred, but it was beleeued, that for an opinion he had of the succeeding of the peace which was negociated in Flaunders, he had fignified to the Senate of Venice. that it was a matter unprofitable to put the selues in expeces for the recourty of Milla the summe & conclusion of his counsell was, that the regiments of the Venetians should tarie at Cessiana, the companies of the Duke of Millanto keepe within Pania, and M. faint Polto lie at Biagraffo: & they, by the service of their horsemen, to stop that there entred no reliefe of victuals into Millan, where it was supposed they wold within short time fal into want of food, for that a very final portion of the country was connected to tillage and fowing. This epinion could not be altered in him by anie reasons or inducements of M. faint Pol, neither did he approne the abiding of him and his armie at Bingraffa, alleaging, that to pine and hunger, Millan, it was enough that the Fenetian regiments remained at Moneio, and the bands of the Duke of Millan at Pania, and at Vigenena, he faidalfo that the king prefled him, that in case he went not up to incampe before Millan, then to execute the enterprise of Genes, which he had in intention to attempt with a great celerity, hoping that in the ablence of Andrew Dore, Cafar Fregofa, to whom the French king had made a graunt to be Gouernour & not his father, would reduce that state to alteration with a very small Arength of footmen. But these proceedings and expeditions, together with an information how much was diminished in footmen the armie of the Confederates, did so affure Anthode Lena of all daungers for Millan, that he fent out Torniello with a verie flender strength of hersemen, and three hundred footmen to recouer Nonaro, obsetuing the oportunitie, whilest the French and Venetians were wandring betweene the river of Thefinand Atillan: he made his cutrie by the castle, which was holden for the Imperials, by which commoditie he recoursed Novaro, and afterwards fallied out with his forces to pill the countrey, and get victuals. But this conquest was not without his contrarie accidents, for that as the Captaine of Nouaro was issued out of the Cafile, & walked into the towne, two fouldiers of the Duke of Millan, and three inhabitants of Nouaro that were prisoners in the Castle, fell vpon the Captaine, and slue him, with the aide of cértaine others that wrought at the Cassle: & in the same sortune making prisoners certaine Spanish footmen, their valour made them Lords of the place, hoping after so great an adventure to be succored by their friends, they tooke the reason of their hope vponthis, that the Duke of Millan as foone as he understood that Torniello was gone out, having a feare and lealousie of Nonaro, had dispatched into those quarters his brother John Paule with a good strength of horsmen and footmen, and he in that expedicion was already gone vp and arrived at Vigenena : but Tormello was no fooner advertifed of the accident of the Caftle, then he returned with speed to Novaro, where what with threats, which prevaileth much where the hope is leffe then the perill, and what with preparations to give the affault, which cannot but make timerous fuch as have no remedie in their danger, he so astonished the said souldiers of the Duke of Millan, that compounding only for the fafetie of their persons, they rendred the Castle without caring for the lines of the inhabitants of Nouaro, by whose valor they executed the exploit of the Castle. It was determined to vexe Millan as much as might be with the forces of the Venetians & regimets of the Duke of Millan, notwithstan-

withstanding the Duke of Milli alleaged that because he wold be more neare the lands of the Fee netias, he wold not abide at Moneso, but at Cassiano: & M. Saint Pol, who lay encamped at the Abbey of Bibaldono, determined to returne beyond the river of Pair to draw towards Genes. According to which resolution he marched up to lodge at Landriano, which is twelne miles from Altilian betweene the wayes of Loda and Panea: and minding the day following, which was the xxi, of Iune, to encampe at Lardinagno vpon the way of Pania, he fent before his artilleties, his cariage and the auamgard, and departed himfelfe somewhat later with the battell and the reregard. But when Anthony de Leua was aduertifed by his espials where he made his abiding, and how the quauntgard was gone before, he issued out of Mellan with his souldiers all covered for their vppermost garments with white shirts: and because of long time his bodie had bene reduced to debility by dolors and griefes, he caused his owne person to be armed in a chaire which foure men bare: and by that time he was come within two miles of Landriano without found of drumme, he vnderstood by his espials that Saint Pol was not yet departed from Landrano: fothat joyning celeritie to the fanours which the time and occasion offered, he hastened his march & charged vpon them before they were aware of his comming. The first esquadron of the Frenchmen commannded by John Thomas de Gallera, was so farre marched away, that he could not in time be at the succours of the residue. And albeit Monsieur S. Pol reposing much in a regiment of two thousand Launcekinghts, was descended on foot and sought valiantly, yet after they had maintained a light defence, he law the begin to retite, in whose valout he had layed up his chiefest confidence. And albeit they were fultained and rescued by John Ieronimo de Cassillon and Claudo Rangon, Commaunders ouer two thousand Italians, who expressed great effects of their valour : yet in the end both the horsemen and Launceknights not able to stand against the furie and fortune of their enemics, turned their backes, leaving a wretched effect of the hope that was conceived of them. By their example the Italians did the like : and Monfeur Saint Poldispairing to find by fighting the fafetie which the refidue could not find by flying, was eftfoones remounted voon his horse, and as he would have passed over a great ditch, he fell into the calamitic of a prisoner, having parta- Mansfeur fains king with him in that fortune Iohn Ieronano de Castillon, Claudo Rangon, Laquette, Carbon, Pol profonerio with other leaders of importance. All the companies were defeated, many horsemen taken priso- Anthony de ners, and all the baggage and traine of the armie and the attilleries rifled. Almost all the men at armes found safetic in the swiftnesse and running of their horses, together with Count Guide leading the auauntgard with whom he retired into Pania, and from thence in the beginning of the night, the same feate following them now being free and at large, which they saw in the extremitie of their perill, they went to Loda, but so perplexed with astonishment, that they were almost at point to breake and disorder of themselves. Many of the souldiers remained in the wayes, their horses having no forces to carie them whither their seare would chase them; and the Captaines excused their running away, for that their companies were not payed, of whom the French bands returned all into Fraunce.

Thus armes and warre being almost layed aside through all Italy, by reason of the hard enemts The Pope at and aduerfities of the French men, the cogitations of the greatest Princes were connected and di- accord with the sposed to accord: the first accord that succeeded, was betweene the Pope and the Emperour, Emperour, which was concluded at Barielona to the Popes great advauntage: wherein the Emperour had the one of these two reasons, either for that having a great defire to passe into Italy, he sought to take away all impediments to his voyage, accounting it in that regard verience flarie to have the Popes antitie : or else for that he would with vericlarge and ample capitulations give the Pope a greater occasion to forget the wrongs and offences which he had received of his Agents and his armie. The substance of the accord was this: That betweene the Pope and the Emperour should be a perpetuall peace and confederation: That the Pope should give passage to the Emperours armie through the dominions of the Church, in case it should depart our of the kingdome of Naples: That the Emperour in contemplation of the new emariage, and for the tranquilitte of lealy, should restore in Florence the sonne of Lawrence de Medicis, to the same estate of greatnesse, wherein were his predecessors before they were expulsed, having not withstanding regard to the expenses which were to be destrayed for the said restruction, according to the arbitration to be made as well by him as the Pope: That the Emperour should affay assoone as he could, either by armes or some other way more comely, to reestablish the Pope in the possession of

Ceruia, Ranenna, Modena, Reggia, and Rubiero, without projudice to the rights of the Empire and the sea Apostolike: That the Pope having recovered the townes about said, should accord to the Emperour the inuestiture of the Realme of Naples in remuneration of that benefit, and should reduce the tribute of the last inuestiture to a white horse for a fine or acknowledgement of chiefe: That he should accord to him the nomination of xxiiij. Cathedrall Churches, for the which they were in difference, remaining to the Pope the disposition of the Churches which should not be in patronage, & of other benifices: That when the Emperour should be passed into Italy, the Pope and he should meete and commune together, to consult of the particular quiet of Italy, and the vniuerfall peace of Christendome, receiving one another with ceremonies and honors due and accustomed: That the Emperour, in case the Pope required the aide of the arme secular to conquer Ferrara, should assist him even to the end as Advocate, Protector, and eldest fonne of the sea Apostolike, and that with all the good meanes, which at that time should be in his power : and that they should agree of the expences, proceedings, and formes to be vied according to the qualitie of times and accidents: That the Pope and Emperour with a common counfell should deuise some meanes to draw lawfully into justice and examination of the law by Judges not suspected, the cause of Francis Sforce., to the end he might be restored if he were found innocent: That otherwise the Emperour offered (not withstanding the disposing of the Duchie of Millan appertained to him) to dispose of it with the counselland privitie of the Pope, and to inuest in it no person which should not be agreeable to him, nor otherwise to transferre it, but in fort as he shall thinke most expedient for the tranquilitie of Italy: That the Emperour promifed to make to confent Ferdinandking of Hungaria his brother, that for the time of the Popes life and two yeares after; the Duchie of Millan should be furnished of saltes from Ceruia, according to the confederation made betweene the Emperour and Pope Leo, confirmed in the last inuestiture of the kingdome of Naples, not approving neverthelesse the covenant that had benemade with the French king, and without prejudice to the rightes of the Empire and the king of Hungaria: That neither of them apart, to the prejudice of this confederation, should make touching matters of Italy, new leagues, nor obserue such as were made to the contrarie of this: and vet neuerthelesse the Venetians might enter this league, so farre forth as they lest all that they possessed in the Realme of Naples, and accomplished all their obligations to the Emperour and Ferdinand by vertue of the last confederation made between them, and also to restore Ranenna and Cerma, referuing the rights of the domages and interests fuffred in regard of these matters: That the Emperour and Ferdinand should do all that they could to have the Heretikes reduced and brought home to the true way, wherein as the Pope should vse spiritual remedies, fo in case they would stand obstinate, the Emperour and Ferdinand should force them by armes, and the Pope to labour other Christian Princes to affist them according to their feuerall meanes: That the Pope and the Emperour should not receive the protection of the subjectes, vasfals, and feodatories of one another, but for the regard of the jurisdiction direct which they had of anie one, without extending anie further: And that all protections taken in other forme should be interpreted void and derogate within one moneth: That to make this amitie and conjunction more firme and stable, they were to confirme it with the strait knots of parentage, the Emperour promifing to give for wife Margaret his bastard daughter with a downle of twentie thoufand duckets of yearely revenue, to Alexander Medicus fonneto Lawrence late Duke of Vrbin, vpon whose person the Pope determined to conuert and bestow the temporall greatnesse of his house, having at such time as he was in danger of death created Cardinall, Hipolito soune of Inlian. They contracted at the same time in articles seperate: That the Pope should accord to the Emperour and to his brother to refift the Turke, the fourth part of the revenues of bepifices Ecclefiastike, in the same maner that his Predecessor Adrian had done: That the Pope should give absolutio to all those, who within Rome & other places had offended against the sea Apostolike, & to all fuch as had ministed any property of aid, counsell or fauor, or that any way participated, or fecretly approued, or expressely allowed, or directly had consented, to the actios that had bin done: That where the Emperor had not published the Croissade granted by the Pope, which was lesse ample then others that had bene before times granted, that the Pope (the first being reuoked) should passe another of more ful & ample forme according to the scope of those that had bin granted by the late Popes Iulio & Leo. Before this accord was passed, & after all the difficulties AACLE

swere resoluted, aduertisement came to the Emperour of the ouerthrow of Monsieur Saint Pol: in regard of which successe, so honorable for the reputation of his atmies there, and no lesse profitable for the generall estate of his affaires, albeit it was doubteed, that to helpe his conditions, he would have chaunged some branch or article of matters agreed upon, yet he confirmed them all both in substance and circumstance, and with a singular readinesse ratified them the same day, which was the xxix. of Iune, accomplishing with solemne oath before the high Altar of the Cathedrall Church of Bar (elona.

But the negociations of peace betweene the Emperour and the French king were not purfued But the negociations of peace betweene the Emperour and the French King were not purified with leffe denotion and diligence: and the better to advance them to fome good fuccesse and itfue, after the commissions on all sides were come, the towne of Cambray was indifferently ap- 177th king nepointed for the affembly and meeting; a place fatall for fo great conclusions, and where were to godined in (a. conferre together, the Ladie Margaret of Austria & the Ladie Regent mother to the French king, bray. The French king labored with all his meanes and diligence (though he meant not in him felfe to performeit) which also he confirmed by promises to the Confederate Embassadors of Italy (hauing therein the consent & privite of the king of England) not to make any accord with the Emperour without the consent and satisfaction of the Consederates : for, he seared least they entring into a icalousie and suspition of his will, would preuent him, & be the first that would compound with the Emperour, and by that meane to leave him excluded out of the amitie of both fides. In which telpecthe fought to perswade them not to hope in the peace, but rather to keepe their thoughts disposed and turned to the provisions of the warre: wherein to establish some good order & forme of proceeding, not ceaffing to folicite continually, he had fent into Italy the Bilhop of Tarby with commission to go to the states of Venice, the Dukes of Milla, Ferrara & Florence, both to folicite prouisions appertaining to the warre, and to promise that if the Emperour passed into Italy, he would also descend at the same time with a mightie armie, sofar foorth as the other Confederats would contribute for their part touching the preparations needfull. Neuertheleffe the negociations of accord continued more and more; in fo much as the feuenth day of July both the Ladies made their entries into Cambray by feuerall gates with a great pompe, and being lodged in two houses adiopning, having an entrie the one within the other, they spake together the same day, & gaue order to their agents to treat of the atticles: wherein because the king wold be neare at handto resolue all difficulties occurring, he was gone vp to Compiequo, to whom the Venetians having feare of the iffue of that conjunction, had made many large and great offers. And for the more absolute negociation of this peace, there were sent to Cambray as interposers in the action. the Bithop of London and the Duke of Suffolke Embassadors for the king of England, with whose conferr and participation that affembly was made. The Pope fent thither the Archbishop of Capna. There was also a presence of Embassadours from all the Consederates: to whom the Frenchmen made relation of things farre otherwise then was the truth of that that was debated: wherein the king either retained to great an impiette, or elfe had to simple and fole a thought of his interest particular, which confifted wholly in the recouerie of his children, that where the Florentines made greatinstance to him, that according to the example of king Lewis his father in law and his predecessour, in the yeare a thousand fine hundred and twelve, he would consent that they might accord with the Emperour for their fafetie: he refused it, under this promise, that he would never make anie accord without comprehending them in it, assuring them also that he was most readic to follow the warre, and promifed no leffe to all the others, even in the greatest heate of solicitation for peace. About the three & twentieth day of July came aduertisement of the capitulations made betweenethe Pope and the Emperour, at what time albeit the present negociation was wel advanced, yet it was to troubled and hindered for some difficulties touching certaine townes of Franche Counte, that the Ladie Regent gaue order to prepare to depart. Nevertheleffe by the working of the Popes Legat, and principally by the operation and good office of the Archbishop of Capua, the conclusion was established, the French king not leaving to promise to the Confederates the fame things he had offred before. At last, being the fift day of August, the peace was solemnely published in the great Church of Cambray, whereof the first article contained : That the kings formes should be redelivered, so farre foorth as their father payed to the Emperour for their ranlome, twelve hundred thousand crownes in readie money, and to the king of England for him two hundred thousand: That the king should render to the Emperour within fix weekes after the ratification, all that he possessed in the Duchie of Millan: That he should leave vnto him Ast with refignation of the rights appertaining: That he should leave assoone as he could, Barlette, with all those peeces which he held in the Realme of Naples: That he should require the Venetsans that according to the forme of the capitulations of Coignar, they should render the townes of Powilla: That in case they would not, he should declate himselfe their enemie, and aide the Emperour to recourt them with a monthly contribution of thirtie thousand crownes, and with twelve gallies, foure shippes, and foure gallions payed for fixe moneths: That he should restore as much as was in his power of the price of the gallies taken at Portofino, or elfe to answere the value, deducting and defalking so much as had benetaken since by Andrew Dore or other the Emperours Ministers: That according to the former couenants at Madrill, he should renounce the foueraigntie of Flanders and Artois, and refigne the rights of Tourney and Arres: That he should call in the processe against the Duke of Eurbon, and render to him that was dead his honour, and to his heires his goods: and yet the Emperour complained afterwards, that affoone as the king had recoursed his children, he tooke them from them: That the goods of whom so ever occupied in regard of the warre, should be restored to their successours: in which point the Emperour tooke occasion also to complaine, for that the king made not restitution of the goods occupied vpon the Prince of Orenge: That all bils of defiance and chalenge should be suppressed and cancelled, and chiefly that of Robert de la Marche. The Pope was comprehended in this peace as principall, and the Duke of Saury was generally included as subject to the Emperour, and specially brought in by the nomination of the Emperour. It was also set downe that the king should meddle no more in the affaires of Italy nor of Germanie in fauour of any potentate, to the preindice of the Emperour, notwithstanding the French king in times following maintained that he was not by that defended to recouer that which the Duke of Sauoy vsurped vpon the Realme of France, as also all that he pretended to appertaine vnto him by reason of the rights and claimes of the Ladie Regent his mother. There was also one article which bare that in the peace it was meant, that the Venetians and Florentines should be comprehended so farreforth, as within source moneths they were at a point with the Emperour for their differences, which was a kind offecret and filent exclusion. That the like should be of the Duke of Ferrara: but touching the Barons and exiles of the Realme of Naples, where was no mention made of them.

Affoone as this accord was past to conclusion, the French king went immediatly to Cambray to visite the Ladie Margaret: and being not without some shame for so soule a fact against the confederates, he eschewed for certaine daies with fundrie enasions, either to see or heare their Embaffadours: but in the end giving them audience apart, he excused himselfe vpon the impossibilitie to recouer otherwise his children : onely he gaue them comfort that he would send the Admirall to the Emperour for their benefit: he gain them also fundric other sweete and vaine hopes, promiting feuerally to the Florentins to lend them for the remedie of their dangers imminent, fortig thousand duckets; a promise performed with the same fidelitic that his other offers were: & he suffred as though it tended to their benefit, Peter Stephen Colonno whose seruice he would accept no more, to go to their pay. But during the action and solicitation of these things, Antho. de Leua had recovered Biagraffa, and the duke of Vrbin remaining at Caffiano, which helaboured with the hands working of infinit Pioners to fortifie, compelled them of Pania and S. Angeo to hold good: faying that the lodging of Cassiano was verie apt to minister succours to Loda & Pania, Afterwards Antho. de Leua went vp to Enzagua, a place within three miles of Cassieno, from whence he sent out continually bands of soldiers to skirmish with the Venetias: & lastly from Enzagua he drew to Vamry, either for that he meant to run vp vpon the territories of Burgama/que, or else because the Venetians had cut from him the course & viage of all water.

The Emperour Sendeth to the Prince of 0renze to inof the Florentines.

Vistaring about this time entred into Valentia by the Castell, & cut in peeces a garrison of two hundred footmen that were there: and by this time were arrived by fea at Genes a regiment of wade the states two thousand Spaniards to tarie for the comming of the Emperour, who immediatly after he had passed the accord with the Pope, sent direction to the Prince of Orange, to reinforce the armie and invade at the Popes request the estate of the Florentines: and when the Prince was come to Aquila, and mustred his companies upon the frontiers of the kingdome, he was solicited vehemently by the Pope to aduaunce and passe further: for which solicitation he went up to Rome the last of July without his forces, to resolue with the Pope vpon the prouisions for the warre:

where after many actions and negociations which sometimes were vpon the point to be broken, for the difficulties which the Pope objected touching the defrayments: it was at lattrefolued that the Pope should deliuer to him presently thirty thousand duckats, and within a very short time after forty thousand more, to the end that at the Emperours expences he might first reduce to the obedience of the Church the estate of Peronfa, by chasing out Malatesta Basilon, and afterwards make inuation upon the Florentins, to readdreffe in that City the family of the Atelices; an enterptile which the Pope effected of very easie action, for an opinion he had, that being abandoned on all fides, they would according to the cufform of their elders, rather give place to the time, then to bring upon their countrey a most manifest daunger. Upon these conditions the Prince of Orenge affembled his forces, which contained 3000 Launceknights, the remainders as well of those companies which the Ficeroy had brought out of Spaine, as of others who had passed out of Germany into Italy under George Fron pergh, and four chousand Italians not payed under these Colonels, Peter Lewis de Farnese, the Count Saint Second, Colonel Martio, and Serre Colomo. For their better fafety in approching any place, and to execute any peece of force, the Pope caused to be drawne out of the Castell Saint Angeo, and to be caried with them, three Cannons with other peeces of artilleries: and after the Prince of Orenge, was to follow the Marquis of Guast with the bands of Spanish sootmen that were in Pomilla. But at Florence both the generall deliberation was farre otherwise, and the minds of particular men verie resolute to defend their countrey and their liberty; an event contrary to that which the Pope expected of that Citie.

Whilest these preparations were managed on all parts, the person of the Emperour departed The Emperor from Barfelona with a great fleete of thips and gallies, fraughted with a thouland horsemen, and at Genes, whi-9000 footemen : and after he had run not without perill and travell a course of fifteene dayes at ther the Prins fea, he arrived the twelfth of August at Genes, where was brought to him the first advertisement cos of Italy of the accord made at Cumbruy: and at the same time passed for him into the parts of Lombardy, dorsto him. Captaine Felix, whom he had taken into his pay with eight thousand Launceknights. The discending of the Emperour, with such a pursant preparation, made astonished the minds of all the regions of Ita y, being now affured that they were left and deliuered up for pray by the French king: and therefore the Florentins who in that altonishment were no lesse carefull then appertained to the charge of good Citizens, vpon the first advertisements they had of his comming, fent out foure Embaffadours of the most principall and chosen of their towne, to congratulate his comming and to labor to make some composition with him for their affaires. But afterwards either ypon better confideration of things, or ypon the common custome of men to receive comfort when they know the vttermost of their mishap, they tooke courage, and began to moderate their commissions, restraining their Embassadors to debate only with him of their interests, and not to meddle with the differeces of the Pope, wherin they hoped that both for the memory of things past, and for the litle confidence which is wont to be betweene Popes and Emperours, he would be so much discontented with the Emperors greatnesse, as to be driven to desire that the authonty andforces of the estate of Florence might be adjoyned to the power of the Church. The Fenetians were discontented that the Florentins being joynt Confederates with them, had sent Embasfadors to their common enemy without communicating with them. The Duke of Ferrara made also the same complaint, notwithstanding that following their example he dispatched Embassadors to the Emperour aswell as they . The Venetians consented that the Duke of Millan should do the like: but he had long time before entertained a feeret practife with the Pope, to bring him to compound with the Emperour, which de did so much the more solicite and advance, by how much he knew even before the overthrow of S. Pol, that he could lay no good ground of hope in the French king nor in the Penetians.

The Emperour disbarked at Sauona the bands of Spanish footmen which he had brought with him, and converted them into Lombardy, to the end Anth, de Lena might iffue out frong into the field: he made an offer to disbarke the at Spetio, to the end to fend the into Tuscane: but the Pope had an opinio that fo many forces were not necessary, especially seeing he wished (for the preservation of the countrey) not to addresse without need so great a fury against the towne of Florence: and yet proceeding now openly against that state and against Malatesta, he caused to be stayed in the townes of the Churchthe knight Sperello, who before the capitulation of Cambray being fent with mony by the French king to Malatesta who had ratified his pay, returned to Perousa. He caused also to be stayed neare to Bracciano, the money sent by the Florentins to the Abbotof Farfa being entertained in their pay with two hundred horsemen, to the ende he might leavy for their feruice a thousand footmen; but he was constrained effoones to render to it againe, for that where the Pope had appointed Legates with the Emperor, the Cardinals of Farnese, S. Crosse and Medicis, of whom S. Croffe paffing by his lands, the Abbot caused him to be stayed, and would not redeliuer him if first he had not restored to him his money. The Florentins continued still in their preparations, and as they had in vaine moued the Emperour for a furceassing of armes vntill he had giuen audience to their Embassadours, so prouiding for the euill before the mischiese hapned, they fent to formon Don Hercules eldeft fonne to the Duke of Ferrara, whom fix moneths before they had taken into their pay with title of Captaine generall, to come to their fuccors with his companies according to the Articles of the contract. But notwithstanding he had received the money that was fent him for imprest, to wage a thousand sootemen allowed for his gard when he marched, yet his father preferring confiderations of estate before fidelity, made him refuse to go thither, without that he payed backe agains the money, but fent to their aydes his bands of horsemen: by reason of which dealing the Florentins denied him the election of the

By the xix. day of August the Prince of Orenge was come to Terny, and the Launceknights to Fuligno where was multred the whole army: but it was a matter ridiculous, that not with Itanding the peace was made and published betweene the Emperor and French king, yet the Bishop of Tarba as the kings Embassador at Venice, Florence, Ferrara, and Perousa, did not onely boast of the mighty prouisions his king made for the warre, but also comforted them to do the like. After this the Prince of Orenge with fix thousand footmen as well Launceknights as Italians, came and incamped neare to Spello, where prefenting himselfe before the towns accompanied with many hotlemen to view the fituation, it hapned that Iohn Orbina, a man for his long trayning in the warres of Italy, of the best place & reputation amongst all the Captaines of the Spanish infantery, was hurt with a fhot out of the towne in the thigh, of which wound he died within few dayes after, to the great domage of the army, for that almost the whole course of the warre passed by his counsell and gouernement. In reuenge of whose death the artilleries were planted before Spello, wherein was a strength of more then fluc hundred sootemen and twenty horse, under the leading of Lyon Baillon baltard brother to Malatesta. But after there were spent certaine volleys of that you a tower which is without the towne on the wall fide, the defendants not with flading Lyon had given a great hope to Malatesta to preserve the towne, yeelded immediatly, ypon condition that the towns and inhabitants should remaine at the discretion of the Prince, & the souldiers with their liues faued & fo much goods as they could cary, should go out in fafety with their fwords only, and not to ferue against the Pope nor the Emperour in three moneths. Neuerthelesse contrary to their affurance giuen, which by the law of armes is a warrant fufficient and able, they were almost all stripped & spoyled at their going out . Iohn Baptista Burgeso one of the exiles of Stenna was vehemently charged with this accord, who having begun to treate with Fabio Pegruces that was in the army, made perfect the conclusion by the ayde of the other Captaines; a matter which Malatest a referred to disloyalty, but many others attributed it to faintnesse of courage. After the Embassadors of Florence who first presented themselves before the Emperor had congratulated his coming, they began to fignifie vnto him, that as their city was not ambitious, but thankfull for benefits received, and ready to offer all the offices and commodities they could to whom so ever would professe the protection & preservation of it : so they sought to excuse their action of entring into league with the French king, you the will and inclination of the Pope, who then commanded them, and vpon the law of necessity which had hitherunto compelled them to continue in it. They faid, they could not passe further, for that they were not enabled by comisfion: only they had expresse commandement from their common-wealth not to open their eares to any practife with the Pope, and to vifite his other Embassadours, but not the Cardinall Medicis. The great Chauncellor newly called to the dignity of Cardinall, made them aunswer, that it was necessary they should satisfie the Pope and reduce him contented both of their doings and of their meanings: and they complaining of the iniuffice of that demaund, he eftfoones replied, that feeing their City was confederate with the enemies of the Emperour, and had fent out armed bands bands against him, that it was fallen from her priviledges & divolved to the Empire, and therfore it was in the Emperor to dispose of it according to his owne arbitration. But at last it was faid vnto them on the Emperours behalfe, that they should procure to be sent to their sufficient cominission to compound with the Pope, and that afterwards should be considered the differences that were betweene the Pope and them, which if they were not first resolued and compounded, the Emperour would not commune with them of their poper interests. Whereupon the estate of Florenze dispatched a commission very large and ample to compound with the Emperour, but not to accord with the Pope : in to much as the Emperour departing from Genes the xxx, of August and went up to Plaisance, the Embassadours following his Court were not admitted into Plais fance, for that it was understood that their commission was not such as the Emperour had demaunded: by which meane all things suspended and remained without accord. The Emperour caused also to depart from his Court the Embassadouts of the Duke of Ferrara, whom he receiued with hard terms; and yet returning afterwards with new conditions, and haply with new fauors, they were admitted & heard. Moreover the Emperor fent Embassador to the French king, the Count Nanfam, to congratulate with him the new accord confirmed with the knot of parentage, & to receive the ratification. In recompense of which Embassage & for the same expedition, the king fent to him the Admirall of France. The king fent mony to Ranfe de Gere, to the end that with all his companies he might retire from Powella, and caufed to be rigged twelve gallies to be fent thither under Philip Dore against the Venetians, against who the Empetor sent out Andrew Dore xxxvij. gallies. Neuertheleffe the king judging that the recovering of his children would be more certaine, if there remained any difficulty in Italy to the Emperor, he cotinued to give diverle hopes to the Confederates, & promised particularly to the Fiorentins to send many to the secretly by the Admirall, not that he had any defire to minister to the wants of them or the others, but to the end they should show themselves more hard and severe to compound with the Emperour.

During all this while there was folicited a continuall proftile of accord betweene the Emperor and the Duke of Millin, the action whereof was managed wholly by the Pronotory Careccioll, whole office was to come and go from Cremona to Plussance. But where the Emperour heldit ftrange that the Dake reposed lesse considence in him then he looked for, and the Duke on the other fide was hardly brought to trust him at all, there was an operture and motion made, that til the Dukes cause were throughly examined, Alexandria and Paula should be deposed of trust into the Popes hands. To this the Emperour would not confent, both for that he thought the Duke was not able to refift his forces, and also for that Anth de Lina Was gone vp to Plaifance, who being alwayes an enemy to peace and quietnesse, had incensed the Emperor with many reasons to purfue the war: and therefore the Emperour charged him to go on with the enterprise of Pania, having a device also, that at the same time Captaine Felix who was come with the new-supplies of Almsins, aswell footmen as horsmen, and with artilleries, and had first passed by Pesquiero, and afterwards was entred upon the lands of Breffia, should make warre on that fide upon the Venetians: of which expedition he had made Captaine generall the Marquis of Mantua, newly returned to the deuotion of the Imperials.

All this while the Pope was not idle to labor a peace betweene the Emperor and the Venetians, with hope to conclude it at his coming to Bologna: for that where he had before folicited to meet the Emperor and confer with him at Genes, they had fithens by comon confent referred the place of their enterview to Bolognia, chiefly for many apteomodities which that city yeelded to fo great an affembly. They were not induced being Princes of the greatest importance to meete together by a common defire only to confirme the league of their new amity & conjunction: but also they hadto cary them their further feuerall respects; the Emperor pushed on by necessity, being determined to take the Crowne of the Empire; & the Pope by ambition, having a defire to advance the enterprise of Florence: and in them both indifferently did concur a joynt deuotion to establish fome orderly forme over the affaires of Italy; a matter which they could not accomplish without refoluing the affaires of the Venerians and Duke of Millan, and without keeping fome good hand vponthe imminent dangers of the Turke, who being entred into Hungary with a puilfant armic, came onto inuade Austria & take Vienna, In this time were done no actions of consequence between the Emperor & Venetias, for that the Venetias having an absolute inclinatio to accord with him, & because they wold not inceuse him further, had giue order to retire their army by sea from the enterprise of the Castell of Brundusa to Corfu: and seeking only to presence the townes which they held, they forbare also for that time all exploits in the regions of Lombardy, except certaine light rodes & incursions: and so being only carefull for the gard of their townes, they had put into Breffia the Duke of Vrbin. Touching the Almains, they wetereduced to Lunaro, containing a number of a thousand horsmen & eight or tenthousand sootemen; they had resolved together with the Marquis of Mantua, to execute the enterprise of Cremona, where was the Duke of Millan, who feeing himselfe excluded fro all accord with the Emperor & that Author Lena was gone to incampe before Pauia, & Caracciol gone vp to Cremona to denounce war to him, contracted with the Venetians to conclude no accord with the Emperor without their confent and in recompence of that contract they bound the felues to minister to him for the defence of his chates, a regiment of 2000 footmen payed, with contribution of 8000 duckats for every moneth. They fent also artilleries & men to Cremong, with which proportion of succors & promises, the Duke had confidence to be able to defend Cremona & Loda: for touching Pania, it made a very flender refistance against Anth. de Leua, not only for that it contained not sufficient victuals for two moneths, but also because Captaine Piffinard to who it was comitted to keep & gard it, had not many dayes before fent out of the towne foure companies of footmen to S. Angeo, where Anth. de Leua had made as though he would incompet for which want of victuals & weaknesse of men, of whom the nubers were very small within the towne, & worse furnished for the service, there was no cofidence in all confirmation of war & war causes, to be able to defend it, & therfore when he saw the artilleries were planted & bent to execute, not enduring the proofe of one bullet, nor the venture of one affalt, he rendred the towne under fafety of life & goods as well for himself as his souldiers. In this action he was charged greatly (which also was a cause to hasten the rendring of the towne) that he was more caried by couctousnes not to lose the wealth & riches he had gathered together vpon to many prayes & pillages, then induced by any defire to preferue the glory he had gotten in fo many excellent and braue exploits of war, and chiefly in the feruices of Pama.

Now was the warre very hotly kindled in Tuscane, for that as the Prince of Orenge had taken Spello, and the Marquis of Guaft who followed him with the Spanish infantery beginning to draw nearehim with his army, so he went on and advanced by good degrees till he came at the bridge of Saint John neare to Peron Laypon Tyber, where joyned with him the regiments of Spar nish footmen. In this City was a strength of three thousand footmen of the Florentins: and the Prince before he planted his campe before Spello, fent a meffenger to Percufato perswade Malatesta to obey the will of the Pope: who feeking to appropriate to himselfe by what way so The Pope ma- euer, the City of Peroufa, and to the ende the army night passe further, made this offer to Malatesta, that if he wold leave Perousa, he would preserve his estates and his proper goods, he would confent that he might freely go to the defence of the Florentins, and would be bound that Braccio and Sforce Baillons, not any other his enemies should reenter into Perou/a. And albeit Malatesta assured him that he would not accept any offer without consent of the Florentins, yet > he opened more and more his cares to the Embassages of the Prince, who after he had conquered Spello, solicited him more veheniently. Al these offers and deuises Malatesta communicated with the Florentins, being haply inclined to passe the accord, for that both he seared the ende of things, and was no lefte doubtfull that the Florentins would not continue to give him all the aydes and fuccors he defired: and when by necessity he should be driven to accord, he had no hope to find better conditions then those that were offered him, holding it a better way that without offending the Pope, or to give him occasion to deprive him of the goods and places which he preferued for him, to keepe himselfe possessed of the pay of the Florentus, then in standing to his defence, which by many arguments was fraile and cafual, both to put wilfully into danger his whole estate, and also to pull upon him the hatred of his friends and the towne : so that as he assured dayly and perseuered in this, that he would not accord without their prinity, so also he added, that if they would have him to defend Perousa, they must of necessity supplie him of new with a thoufand footmen, and turne the refidue of their companies to make head at Orfaio, a place within five miles of Cortona vpon the confines of Cortona and Perousa; a matter which they could not do without decaying the garrifons of their other townes. And yet the weaknesse of the towne was fuch that by necessity they must retire at every mouing of the enemies; he perswaded with them also, that in case he did not accord the Prince leaving the enterprise of Perousa, wold take his way to Florence, in which case also it was needfull that they left him within Perousa a thousand footmen of service, which yet would not be sufficient, since the Pope had means to vexe the Citie with other forces then with the regiments Imperiall: but if he didaccord, then the Florentines were to retire to themselies all their bands of sootemen, who should be accompanied with two or three hundred men of choice of his training; and for his owne part, his estates and goods being left to him, & his enemies excluded from all expectation to have Perousa, he should be reduced to better termes and estate of quietnesse to hearken to their desence. If the election had rested in the Florentines, they could have bene better contented to continue the warre at Peronfa, but differning that Alalatella entertained a continuall intelligence with the Prince, and no leffe affured that he had not discontinued to practise with the Pope, they doubted upon these good grounds, least by the incitation and importunity of his friends and followers, and in compassion of the domages of the citie and countrie; and lattly, for suspition of the enemies and instabilitie of the people, he would in the end give place to the power of time: they interpreted it also to too great a daunger and hazard, to put into Perou/a almost the whole reputation and flower of their forces, exposed to the perill of the fidelity of Malatesta, to the apparant danger to be forced by the enemies, & to the manifest difficultie to renoke the againe in case Malatesta should accord: they also brought into confideration that the changing of Perousa could prejudice the little, both the friends of Atalatesta remaining there still, and he recaining his Castles and Boroughs, & none of his brothers returning thither at all, so that so long as it perseuered in this estate, it could not be that the Pope would not be in suspition of it. Thus they wandred in suspence and incertaintie of mind, & in that perplexitie making their chiefest care of the safety of their men, and having no assured confidence in the constancie of Malatesta, they dispatched secretly the fixt of Septebera man of credence to draw away their bands of fouldiers from Peronsa, feating to be abused, if the accord went on: but being enformed afterwards that they could not get away, for that the enemies were come neare at hand, they fent with diligence to Malatesta their consent, that he might compound: but his necessities and feare of further danger, were swifter then the diligence they made to disparch to him their consent, for that before the messenger arrived, the Prince of Orenge the ix, of September having passed Tyber at the bridge of Saint John, and being drawne into campe, and offering certaineskirmishes, he was driven to compound the same night. By which compofition he bound himselfe to depart from Peronfa, with obligation of sufferance to enjoy his goods, to go to the service of the Florentines, and to retire their companies in safety; and to gue him the better time to leade them ypon the dominions of Florence, the Prince of Orenge promifed not to remove in two dayes from the place where he lay encamped: fo that they issued out of Pereusa the twelfth day, and making veric speedle marches, they went the same day to Cortono by the way of the mountaines, long and troublesome, but free and affured. Thus was the body of the warre reduced ypon the lands of the Florentines, to whom, albeit the Venetians & Duke of Vrbin had given manie hopes that they would aide the with three thousand footmen; a strength which for sulpition of the Princes comming into those quarters, they had sent upon the state of Urbin, vet because they would not displease the Pope, that promise sorted to none effect : onely the Venetsans gave money to the Commissarie Castrocaro to wage two hundred footemen, and notwithstanding that state and the Duke of Ferrara entertained continual solicitation to compound with the Emperour, yet they forbare not to comfort the Florentines, & encourage them to stand to their defence, hoping vnder such propertie of difficultie to raunge the Emperour more eafily, and to get to themselves better conditions. The Florentmes at that instant had principally two actions in hand, the one, to temporize & delay the armie fo long as they might hauetime to rampart and fortifie their towne, under the walles whereof they looked that in the end the war wold be reduced: the other, to labor to appeare the mind of the Emperour, yea euen in according with the Pope, so far forth as the forme of their libertie and government popular were not innovated. By reason whereof, being not yet come the exclusion of their Embassadours, they had sent a messenger to the Prince of Orenge, and made a nomination of Embassadors to go to the Pope, defiring him whe they fignified vnto him the election, that he wold make a furceance of the army untill they were arrived, which he refused to do: fo that the Prince being advanced & come on with his forces, he battered and gaue the affault to the fuburbs of Cortono which looke to Orfaio, in which citie were feuen hundred footmen ftrong, he was repulsed from thence, finding both force and valour where he expected but weaknesse or disloyaltie: there was a greater strength of footmen within Aretze: but as Anth. Frauncis Albizi Commissarie, fearing least the Prince, after the taking of Cortonoleauing Aretze behind him, would take the way of Florence, and preuenting the companies that were with him in Aretze, the Citie of Florence in that aftenishment would draw to accord for want of the readiest succours that they had, determined to abandon it: fo, for those reasons and considerations, without the publike consent of the state, though haply obseruing a secret intention of the Gonfalonnier, he went from Aretze with all his companies, leauing onely two hundred footmen within the Castle: but being arrived at Feguma by the counfell of Malaresta that was there, who allowed well that they should reduce all their forces to the defence of Florence, he fent backeagaine to Aretze a thousand sootemen, to the end it should not be left altogether abandoned. And as in the course of calamities accidents happen by succesfion, fo the xvii, day the towne of Cortone, for whose keeping and defending, a thousand men had bene a strength sufficient, seeing the Florentines yied not such order as they ought, rendred, notwithstanding it was very litle pressed by the Prince, with whom the towne copounded to pay him xx, thousand duckets. By the accident of Cortono, the fouldiers that lay within Aretze, doubting of their sufficiencie to defend it, abadoned that Citic, which the xix.day copounded also with the Prince, but with capitulations & clauses, rather to rule and gonerne themselves in their liberty under shadow of the Emperours protection, then to beare any longer the yoke and subjection of the Florentines, declaring to be falle and fained the profession which to this day they had made to befriends to the family of Medicis, and enemies to the government popular. At which time the Emperor refused expressly to give any more audience to the Florentine Embassadors, vnlesse they restored the house of Medicis, and the Prince of Orenge, notwithstanding the Embassadours that were with him detelled, without any regard, the Popes couetou fresse, and the iniquity of that enterprise, had neverthelesse told them, that without restoring the house of Medices, he must of neceffity continue the warre: whereupon calling his army into view & muster, he found that he had strong 300 men at armes, 500 light horsmen, 2500 Launceknights braue bodies, 2000 footme Spanish, & 3000 Italians, all disposed under the leading of these Captaines, Serro Colonno, Peter Maria Rossa, Peter Lewis de Farnesa, & John Baptista Sauella, and to them afterwards came John Saffatello, bringing with him the money which he had received before of the Florentines, whose pay he had accepted: to them also was adjoyned Alexander Vitelly, having betweene three and foure thousand footmen: only the Prince had small store of artilleries, and therefore he prayed aide of them of Siennato furnith him, who standing in case not to result to so mighty an armie of the Emperour any thing they demaunded, they gauc order to refurnish him with some proportion of artilleries, but prepared it with as great delayes & longnesse as they could, both for the hatred they bare against the Pope, & jealosie they had of his greatnesse, & also for that they were ill contented with the mutation of the government of Florence, with who by reason of their commion hatred against the Pope, they had for certain moneths entertained together a secret peace & intelligence. In this meane while the Popehad ginen audience to the Florentine Embaffadors, to who he answered, that as his intention was not to alter the libertie of the city, so he was not caried into this way of enterprife & armes fo much for the injuries he had received of that government, and necessity to assure his owne estate, as in regard of the capitulations he had made with the Emperor, in which debating now upon the interest of his honor, he required no other thing of them, then that they would voluntarily refer the selues to his abit rement & power, which being done, he would make to them good declaration & testimony, with what property of zeale & deuotion he defired the benefite and advancement of their common country: and understanding afterwards that the feare & astonishment was increased at Florence, specially since they were aduertized that the Emperour had refused to heare their Embassadors, and in that regard where they had elected new Embassadors to go to him, which he thought was done to submit and accord to him that he demanded, and defiring that the matter might be fuddenly done, to auoyd the destruction of the country, he dispatched in post to army the Archbishop of Capua, who passing by Florence, found the of the towne otherwife disposed then the Pope was perswaded. But in this meane while the Prince of Orenge advanced, and was come the xxiiij.day to Montuarch in the vale of Arno, which is within xxv. miles of Florence, abiding there for eight cannons from Sienna, which were fent away the day after, onely they continued to be caried with the fame tract and flownesse, with the which

which they had bene prepared, in fomuch as by their want and impediment, the Prince, who the xxvij, had led the armie enen vp to Feguina and Anchifa, was driven to abide in that place vnto the end of the fourth of October; and from thence proceeded the difficultie of the whole enterprife: for after the losse of Aretze, when the Florentines found that their hopes failed, together with the fauours and promifes made from all parts, and also that the fortifications which were made in the Citie on that fide towards the mountaine, not with flanding the continual labour of Pioners and workmen, could not by the judgement of fouldiers be reduced to defence fooner then viij. or tenne daies: and being aduertifed on the other fide that the army of the enemies aduaunced and wonne way, and Ramajotto, who was in armes by the Popes ordinauce with three thouland footmen, had facked Firenfolo, and was entred into the country of Mugello, which was not without daunger that he would go vp to Prato. By these arguments of seare and impediments, the Citizens being reduced to an universall assonishment, began to incline to accord, the rather for that many in their feare were fled from the danger, which in their cowardife they durit not defend, so that at the Counsell board of Ducy, where are debated the affaires of the warre, and in which Councell were prefent the principall Citizens of the gouernment, the vniuerfall confent &c aduife was, to dispatch to Rome a free and ample commission, to submit and referre themselves to the Popes will. But when this resolution was related to the supreme Magistrate, without whose consent there could no deliberation passe, the Gonfalonier, who obstinately sustained the contrarie opinion, was against it, who ioyning with him the Magistrate popular of the Colledges (who participated with the authoritie of the Tribunes of the people of Rome) in which office or tocietie were haply many persons of finister understanding, and great temerity and insolencie: & having also their opinion supported with the boldnesse and threatnings of many young men, he brought to passe, that that day nothing was established : and yet it was a thing manifest, that if the day following, which was the xxviij. of September, the Prince had aduaunced and come on one remone, the faction that impugned and inneighed against the accord, had not beneable to refill the strong inclination of all the others, of so small causes depend oftentimes the moments of right great things Thus the furceance and temporizing of the armie made by the Prince of Orenge in vaine, which some interpreted to be done expressly to entertaine the war, for that he had not fufficient artilleries to affront the Citie of Florence, was the cause that within the towne many entredinto courage and refunied the spirits, which through the former assonishment they had lost: but the thing that confirmed them in this resolution, was, that the fortification continued without any intermission of time, and which the hands of many numbers of men did so raise and adnaunce, that before the Prince of Orenge removed from the place where helay encamped, the Captaines judged that the ramparts were fufficient for defence : fo that ceafing now all inclination to accord, the Citizens with a generall resolution stood prepared to defend with their bodies and lines the place, which till then they had laboured to make firong by their industrie and worke of their hands: wherein the better to affure their minds fo well induced, they were aduertifed that Ramafforto, who led with him without pay or discipline, not fouldiers but payfants, raw and ynarmed, and hadtaken the field, not with intention of fight, but to rob and spoyle: after he had wasted with raking and sacking the whole countrey of Augello, he retired with the booties he had taken upon the territories of Bolognia, where did diffolue in diforder and difagreement the bands he had leavied and led in infolencie and licenciousnesse, though after they had fold to him their shares and most part of the spoyles. Thus of a warre case and tractable, and which might have taken end with a small losse to any partie, was derived a warra most heauy and hurtfull to all, and fuch as could not be led to his end, till the whole countrey was wasted, and the principall City in hazard of herlatest desolation. The fift of October the Prince of Grenge departed fro Feguino, but he ordered his marching so flowly, to tarie for the artilleries of Storres, which now drew neare, that he could not before the xx. day range all his companies & artilleries into the plaine of Ripoly, which is within two miles of Florence: he encamped all his armie the xxiiii.day vpon the litle hilles neare the ramparts, obseruing with the safety of his owne, the places that most helped him to annoy his enemies: and of this armie as one part occupied all the litle hils eminent to the Citie, which stretch from the gate Saint Minato to the gate S. George: 10 the other part from the faid gate S. Miniato was extended even to the way of the gate S. Nicholas. There were within Florence eight thousand footmen, all bodies of service, and their chiefest Ffff 2

resolution was to desend Prato, Pistoya, Empoly, Pista and Liuorna, which places they had strengthened and fortified with fufficient garrifons, leaving all other places and poeces rather to the fidelity and difference of the peoples, and the fortrelles to the benefite of their fituation, then to beflow great bands of fouldiers to guard them: but now the watre rifing by burning degrees into his heate, all the countrey was filled full of combustion, of incursions, and bands of licencious fouldiers: and the Stenneis, notwithflanding their former proteffion of league and amitie with the flate of Florence, did not onely rife up to make pillage in euerie place, but also in that libertie of warrethey fent bands of fouldiers to occupie Wontpulsion, hoping that afterwards the Prince would confent that they might retaine it : neuerthelesse, finding it desended by a gattifon of the Florentines, their ambition was eafily flopped, and their aspiring inucntions presentlie defeated, the rather for that not long after Napoleon Vr sin arrived there; a souldier of the Florentines, with three hundred horfmen, who would not depart from Rome before the Pope were vpon his way to go to Bolognia. The Prince of Orenge, when he had beflowed his armie, and Aretchedit out at large vpon the hilles of Monticio, Gullo, & Giramont, and after he had brought to him from Lucqua both pyoners and certaine peeces of artilleries, he caused to cast a rampart, to the end to make it profitable to give an affault to the Bastillion of Saint Miniato: but on the other fide to hinder the yfe and feruice of it, were planted in the garden of Saint Miniato, foure Cannons vpon a cauallier. The townes of Collo and Saint Gimignano rendred immediatly to the Prince, they were places of importance to make easie and safe the resort of victuals that came from Sienna. The xxix, day the Prince planted upon the bastillion of Giramont source Cannons to beate the steeple of Saint Miniato, for that a Saker which the defendants of the towne had mounted there, played with great hurt ypon the armie: two of those cannons were broken and reduced not feruiceable within few houres: to recompence which default, the day following another cannon being brought to the place, after they had executed in vaine about an hundred and fiftie that of bullet, and yet could not difmount the Saker, they forbare to thoot any more, where fo litle good was done by their labour. By which relitance and other difficulties and impediments concurring, eueric one interpreting it to a hard matter to catie Florence, specially with one only army, the actions and exploits afterwards beganne to proceed flowly, and rather in maner of skirmishes then in forme of assault. The second of Nouember was perfourmed a great skirmish against the Bastillion of Saint George, another upon the Bastillion of Saint Nicholas, and a third vpon the way that goeth to Rome. The fourth day was planted vpon Giramont a Culperin, right against the pallace of the Lords, which set open the gates at the first flor: but at this time the horsementhat were within Florence ran up to Valdipejo, and made pray of an hundred horse, most part horses of service: and in the same fortune certaine horsemen and harquebuziers of the Florentines, issuing out of Pondadero, tooke threescore horse betweene the cabans and the towre of Saint Romaine.

The Pope and the Emperour at Bolognia.

By this time the Pope was arrived at Bolognia, after whom the Emperour followed according to the ceremonic and custome of great Princes, for that when two Princes are to enterview and meete together, the tradition beareth that he that represente the greatest dignitie shall come first to the place appointed, seeing it is both judged and taken for a gerat signe of reverence that he that is inferiour shall shew office and go to the other: and there being received of the Pope with great shewes and testimonics of honour, and lodged in the same pallace with him, joyning one to the other, it feemed by the demonstrations of office & familiaritie passing betweene the, that they had alwayeslived in an indiffoluble league of amicie and good will. There the Emperour received aduertisements, which cleared him of all suspicion of invasion by the Turkes, whose armie, together with the person of their Lordand Prince being presented before Vienna, wherein was a great garrison of Launceknights, they had not onely given in vaine manie atfaults to the place, but also had bene so repulsed with so great a slaughter, that with the small confidence they had to carie it, and what with the want of great artilleries to batter it, & what by the compulsion of the time, which in that region is veries harpe, being in the moneth of October, they brake vp & went their wayes, not retiring vnto any other place neare to it, but tooke the way of Conff antinople, which is a march of three moneths: fo that the Emperor being cleared and affured of that suspition, which before had not onely made him inclined (notwithstanding the conquest of Pania) to accord with the Duke of Millan, but also had induced him to deale with the

Pope

Pope to thinke vpon a meane to compound with the Florentmes, to the end that being eafed and dispatched of the affaires of Italy, he might passe with all his forces into Almany, to the succours of Vienna and his brother. According to which perswassion, as the Pope and he began to debate vpon the affaires of Italy, so the thing that most concerned the Pope, and lay nearest his heart, was the enterprise against the Florentines, whereunto also the Emperour seemed to beare a manifest inclination, as well to satisfie the Pope touching the matter of capitulation at Barfellonia, as also for that the Citie of Florence being alwayes caried with a deuotion to the Crowne of Fraunce, it could not be but the embasing of his greatnesse was verie agreeable to them: therefore when the Florentines had chosen foure Embassadours to go to the Pope at Bolognia, and making also petition to speake to the Emperour, he would neuer give them audience but one time, and that when it pleafed the Pope, from whom also he drew the substance of the answer he made them. Thus they concluded to continue the enterprise, and because it fell out morehard and entangled then the Pope expected, there was a determination to employ in this action all the bands and companies of fouldiers that were in Lombardy, in case there hapned occasion of accord with the Venetians and Frauncis Sforce: which companies, as they were to be paid by the Emperor, fo also the Pope was to contribute monethly to the Prince of Orenge (who was gone up to Bologned to folicite those matters) threescore thousand duckets, to the end, that where the Emperour found the burthen too heavie to beare out so great expences, he might be shared to defray all those regiments that were alreadic about Florence. After this, was brought in question and conference, the other interest of the Pope, which was concerning the matters of Modena & Reggia: wherein the Pope, to avoid the note of obstinacie and selfe-will, making shew to continue in the same inclination he had professed many times before, that asis the interest of those two townes only were brought into question, he would make no difficultie to dispose of them according to the will of the Emperour: fo neuerthelesse he protested that in that case of alienation of Modena and Reggia, Parma and Plaisance would to remaine separate & cut off from the estate Ecclefialticke, that in confequence they would feeme to be more then halfe aliened. The Emperour answered him, that it was a regard and consideration both just and reasonable: but for his part he could do no more then yee his authority, whilest his forces were occupied in the enterprise of Florence: neuerthelesse in secret he could have withed, that with the good satisfaction of the Pope, those townes had remained to the Duke of Ferrara, with whom in his way to Bolognia he had had conference, and given him great hope and comfort to worke with the Pope what he could for the benefite of his affaires; so much had that Duke by his good industrie and working made infinuation into the Emperours grace and fauour, and allo made fuch impressions of compaffion in the minds of those that gouerned him most, that he wanted not in his Court the operations of great personages, to make his cause sauoured and recommended. There remained now the two articles of most importance and difficultie, concerning the Venetians and Frauncis Sforce, with whom as touching to accord and compound, the Emperour feemed now nothing fo seuere and hard as he had bene before: which as it was altogether contrarieto the inclination with the which he was come into Italy, so he tooke his reason both upon the difficultie of things, appearing greater then he imagined in Spaine, and also for that he found by reason of the new conjunction which Frances Sforce had made with the Venetians, that the conquest of the estate of Asslum would not be a matter of case action; he saw also how far he was imbarked into expences and charges, by fo great a traine of fouldiers & followers which he had brought with him, and caused to come after him aswell out of Spaine as Germany: but the chiefe cause was the importunitie of his brother, who for the tumults of the Lutherans, and other fignes appearing of innouation, folicited him to passe into Almany, whither it was credible that within a short time the power of the Turkes would effloones returne; a matter which he gathered you the protestation which Solyman made, who in his passion of spite and ignominy, had sworne at his breaking vp fro before Vienna, that he would effloones recontinue the quarrell with an armie more mighty and prepared. In these regards were equallie concurring the interests of his honor and safety: for that the Emperour, to whom it seemed that if he should go out of Italy and leave things ynperfect, he could neither carie away affurance for himselfe, nor reputation to his name, began to giue out many fignes and tokens of a mind inclined not only to come to accord with the Venetians, but allo to pardon Francis Sforce. In which good disposition the Pope omitted no good office of perswasion and inducement both to solicite and confirme him, no lesse mouing him a denont defire to have an univerfall tranquillity, then for that the Emperour Handing no more restrained and intangled with other enterprises, he might with better oportunity draw him to convert all his forces against Florence: only the Emperour seemed most of all to be detained by this reason, that it could not but be against his dignitie, to give occasion to the world to beleave, that necessitie had almost induced him to pardon the crime of Frauncis Sforce: and Anth. de Leua being with him at Bolognia, solicited vehemently that he would make an other resolution and disposing of that estate, sometimes preferring the memorie of Alexander the Popes nephew, and fometimes naming others, meet to receive such a preferment. Neuerthelesse for that there could not easily be found out to gouerne that estate, a personage with whom Italy wold be contented, and the Pope having no inclination to convert it to any of his, not that he wanted ambition to embrace fo great athing, but because he saw he could not accomplish it without new warres and new troubles: the Emperour at last was brought to consent to graunt safeconduct to Frauncis Sforce, vnder colour to have accesse to him to submit and instifie himselfe, but in true meaning, that libertie of accesse was graunted, to the end things might be reduced to some composition. The Venetians were not ill contented with his going to the Emperour, for that they hoped that at one time would be introduced some forme of accord to their affaires.

Neuerthelesse the course of armes and warre ceased not for all this, in the regions of Lombardy, for that Belioyeufe, who in the absence of Ant de Leua was chiefe Commander at Millan, went out with feuen thousand footmen, to encampe before Saint Angeo, wherein were remaining for the strength and garrison of the towne, foure companies of footmen of the Venetians and the Duke of Millan: and after he had yfed upon it the feruice of his great artilleries, and that by reason of certaine raines and showers that fell from aboue, the harquebuzes that manned and defended the walles vncouered, were made vnprofitable: he brought neare his fouldiers couered with their shields, and being armed with their swords and pikes, he gaue the assault, in which he presented in his owne person no lesse valour and resolution the was seene in anie of the others: but when the defendants were no longer able to keepe fire in their matches, by reason they stood open to the raine, and in that regard being driven to fight with other weapons, they began to 4bandon the walles, no leffe through the valour of their enemies, who preffed on with a furie equall to the fortune that fauoured them, then for their owne aftonishment, which was made so much the greater, by how much they were made lesse apt to do service by the wretched accident of raine that tooke away the vse of their peeces. As soone as the Imperials saw the walles abandoned of bodies to defend them, the fame fierceneffe that led them to give the affault. brought them on to enter the place: where, in the rage of their victorie, all fuch wretched creatures as they found, they made them either passe by the edge of the sword, or at least put them under the sentence of bitter captiuitie. After this, he determined to passe ouer to the other side of the river of Adda, and by that time he had put over one part of hisarmie at the bridge of Calciano, he saw certaine bands of Spaniards of a new leavie, departing to go to Millan, but preuenting them, he caused the souldiers that were left in the towne to take armes, by which impediment being flopped and denied to enter, they returned agains to the armie. But not with flanding all these seuents, and that the armie of Launceknights was already upon the lands of the Venetians, the negociations of the peace were fo farre advanced, and in fo good tearmes, that all counsels and studies of the warre beganne to vanish and grow cold: for, when Frauncis Sforce was brought to the prefence of the Emperour at Bolognia, and having with humility and submission praised his benignity, in admitting him to his presence: he told him, that so much did he repose for himselfe in his owne instice and equitie, that for all things hapned before the Marquis of Pelquiero restrained him within the Castle of Mellan, he desired no other propertie of furety or support then his owne innocencie; and that therefore he renounced frankly the safeconduct, the bill or escript whereof the Duke holding in his hand, he layd it at his feete; a matter which much pleased the Emperour. There was a moneth spent in debating of the difficulties as well concerning his accord, as the composition with the Venetians: but at last by the continuall working and interpoling of the Pope, both the one and the other were concluded the xxiij. of December, Frauncii isforce being bound to pay to the Emperour within one yeare, foure hundred thousand duckats, and fine hundred more within ten yeares, that is, fifty thousand enery yeare : and for the pawne and affuring of these payments, the Emperour to keepe in his hands Coma and the Castell of Millan, which he bound himselfe to render and redeliuer vp to Francis Sforce assoone as the payment of the first yeare were furnished: he gaue him also the inuestiture of the Duchy, or rather confirmed that which had bin given to him before . But to furnish three payments and to performe the gifts and bribes which he promifed to those that gouerned the Emperour, he imposed great taxes upon the towne of Millan, and through the whole Duchy, notwithstanding the people had bin miferably wasted and consumed, both by the cruelty of their long warres, and also by the rage of hunger and pestilence. Touching the Venetians they accorded: That they should render to the Pope Ranenna and Ceruia with their territories, fauing their rights, & also the Pope to pardon all such as had cospired or done any thing against him: That they should give vp to the Emperor by the end of the next Ianuary, all that they possessed in the realme of Naples, & to pay him the residue of the two hundred thousand duckats due vpon the third article of the last peace contracted with them: that is to fay, xxv. thousand within one moneth next following, & 15000 at the yeares end, but vpon condition that their peeces should be rendred to them within one yeare, if either they were not rendred already according to the tenor of the fayd peace, or at last the controller lies and differences judged by common arbitrators: That they should pay to the exiles 5000 duckats for enery yeare for the renenues of their goods, according to the disposition of the treatise of the same peace: That over and besides this, they shold pay to the Emperor an hundred thousand duckats, the one moity within ten moneths, and the other halfe within a yeare after. It was further accorded, that the rights of the Patriarch of Aquilea, which had bin reserved to him in the capitulation of Wormes against the king of Hungary, should be decided: That the Duke of Virbin should be comprehended in this peace and confederation, because he was an adherent & in the protection of the Venetians: That the Venetians should pardon the Count Brunoro de Gambaro: That the trafficke and entercourse should be free amongst all their subjects; and that there should be given no place of retraite to the corfaires or rouers, who would trouble either party: That it should be lawfull to the Venetians to continue peaceably in the possession of all those things which they held. That all those that had bin published rebels, for following the faction of Maximilian the Emperor and the king of Hungary fince the yeare 1523, should be restored: only the restitution should not extend to the goods that had bene brought to their fiske: That betweene the faid parties there should not only be a peace, but also a perpetualleague defensible for their estates of Italy against all Christian Princes. The Emperor promised, that the Duke of Millan should keepe and hold in his estate, a thrength of flue hundred men at armes, flue hundred light horsmen, six thousand footmen, and a good band of artilleries, for the defence of the Venetians; and the Venetians to maintaine the like strength for the defence of the Duke of Millan. In which article was fet down, that when either of their estates were molested, the other through their countries should give no passage of victuals, munitions, curriers, nor Embassadours, restraining all patures of aid in their estates, & all passage or sufferance of succors what soeuer: That if any Christian Prince though he were of supreme dignity, should invade the realme of Naples, the Venetians to Manners bring to the defending of it xv. light gallies wel armed: That in this prefent accord should be com- dred by the prehended, all fuch as the afore named and to name, held in their protectio, though without other Emperor to obligation of the Venetians, then for their defence: That in case the Duke of Ferrara accorded with Franch Sforce. the Pope and with the Emperor, it was meant he should be comprehended in this confederation. For the execution of which accords and compositions, the Emperour rendred to Francis Sforce Mullan and all the Dukedome, and renoked all the fouldiers except fuch as were thought necessary for the gard of the Castell and of Coma, which places he rendred afterwards according to the time couchanted: The Venetians restored to the Pope the townes

historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Emperor taketh the Imperiall Crowne at Bolognia, and from thence passeth into Almanie. The family of Medicis by the ayd of the Emperors army returne to Florence. Ferdinand is chosen king of Romains. The Pope will not hearken to a Councell. The French king stirreth up the Turke against the Emperor, and hath conference with the Pope as Marseilles.

T feemed that the conclusion of this peace and confederation had reduced to their last end the warres of Italy, which for their continuance and longnesse, had drawne a space of eight or ten yeares, and for their horrible accidents, had left to all the regions of that climate, matter of lamentable and instruction of the Citie of Florence, either more wretched in destinie, or lesse worthie of so good participation, was not dispensed in the transport of the contrarie, in the transport of the sy was wrought to her selse matter of a more heavie and dangerous

warre: for, where it was supposed that all natures of difficulties were so resolved and disgested. that there was no further doubt nor impediment to detaine the accord from his perfection, the Emperor leanying his companies and bands of men of warre from the estate of the Venerians, sent out to make war against the Florenins, an army offoure thousand Launceknights, two thousand five hundred Spanish footemen, eight hundred Italians, and more then three hundred light horsemen with fine and twenty peeces of artillerics. But in this warre either for the ill direction of the Captaines, or worse order of the souldiers, much lesse that there was done any exploit notable, seeing there was performed no actio worthy the exercise of a pen to write it, the assailats lacking harts to inuade the towne, and the defendants having no devotion to affay the fortune of a battell, they faw in the accompt of their prouisions, that they had meanes sufficient to make desence for many moneths: and in the reckening of the minds and inclinations of men, they doubted not of an vniuerfall resolution of the City to resist the quarrell inflicted against their common liberty. In which regards they hoped by temporiting to to make weary the campe of the enemies, that either for wat of mony which maketh the fouldier mutinous, or for fome other accidents which ordinarily enfue a campe, they would drive the enemies through difficulties to diffolue the war which they durft not refift by their valour. Neuerthelesse either to avoid these difficulties or to prepare a remedy, the Prince of Orenge had fent out fifteene hundred footemen, and foure hundred horsemen with foure peeces of artilleries, to take Lastra wherein were three Ensignes of sootmen, of whom was passed to the sword two hundred bodies and the towne taken before the rescues of Florence could arrive. It hapned also that in the night of the xj. of December, Stephen Colonno with a thoufand harquebuziers and foure hundred halberdiers and partifanes, all armed with corfelets and cassakins after the maner of Camisado of Spaine, set upon the regiment of Serro Colonno lying in the houses neare to the Church of Saint Margaret de Monticio, and in that surprise they slue and wounded many fouldiers without the loffe of one person of theirs. About that time were slaine with the bullet within the garden of Saint Mimato, Muria Vrfin and Iulio faint Croffe: and in like fortune, Purhus going to Saint Peters borough to take Montopole which is a towne of the countrey of Pi/a, he was cut off by the footmen that were within Empoly, and being defeated in the way betweene Palasa and Montopoly, many of his companies fell into the fortune of prisoners. The Florentus sent to the borough of Saint Sepulchro, Napolion Vr sin with an hundred and fiftie horsemen, to encounter Alexander Vitelly who was sent to destroy the country all along the fayd borough and Anguiaro.

But now the war beginning to fal into actio of terror & aftonishment: after the regime is newly fent by the Emperor were passed the Alpes, the townes of Pestoia and Prato being abandoned of the Florentin garrisons, were yeelded up to the Pope: by reason whereof, the army that had lest behind them no impediment, marched not to joyne with the others, but remaining incamped on the other fide of Arno, they went to lodge at Peretola neare the wals of the city, under the authority & gouernment of the Marquis of Guaft, though the Prince of Orenge was alwayes superior & absolute about all. By which disposing of the army apart & separate, things were rather reduced to the forme of a fiege, then to an action of oppugnation. At this time also Pietrasanta was rendred to the Pope: and as the Pope labored with a perpetuall fludy and care of mind, to leade to perfe-Ction the purposes he had pretended to reestablish and set up his house in Florence, so towards the end of this yeare, partly at the request of Malatesta Baillon who gaue him hope of accord, he sent to Florence directly to him Rodolfo Pio Bishop of Faenza, with whom were debated diverse and fundry things, some with the prinity of the city and for the profit, and some infecrecy by Malatefta against the weale of the city; matters which much lesse that they forted to any effect, seeing it was discerned that Malatesta, who was now come to the expiration and full time of his pay, had entertained them with art & cunning, to the end that the Florentins fearing to be abandoned of him, would eftfoones retaine him into their pay, with title of Captaine generall of the war, which in the end he obtained. This enterprise of Florence continued also the yere 1530: and albeit the Prince of Orenge in beginning to make new caualliers & cast new trenches, made demonstratio to batter vehemently the bastillios, but chiefly the bastillion of S. George which was very strog: yet what thorough his ignorance which could not be without his ignominy, and what for the difficulty in the action, wherein his error was nothing leffe, not one deuice was put in execution, the gard of the whole Mount appertaining to Stephen Colonno.

In the beginning of this yeare, the Florentus taking hope in the matters of negociation with the Bishop of Faenza, sent of new other Embassadors to the Pope, and to the Emperor, but with expresse comission to innouate nothing, nor hearken to any motion by the which the gouernment might be altered, or the general invisidiction diminished. So that as they were repugnant in the principal article, so they could never obtain audience of the Emperor, but according to the vanitie of their commission, they returned to Florence without any conclusion.

There were within Florence nine or ten thousand footmen strong, but payed according to the number of sourcement thousand; and as the souldiers were resolute to defend the city with a great affection and readinesse of faith, so to confirme them the more; all the Captaines being affembled in the Church of Saint Nieholas, after the celebration of the Masse, and in the presence of Masa-test a, they made a solemne out to stand against the iniuries and inuasions offered against the City vntill the last man: onely in this vniuerfall constancy, was found vnconstant Napoleon Vrsin, who not withstanding he prosessed in installed to the Florentum by receiving their mony and impress, yet he became a revolt, and returning to Bracciano, compounded his affaires with the Emperour and the Pope, and revoked from the service of Florence certaine Captaines whom he had fent thither before.

But the Pope omitted no diligence wherein he thought was any meane to aduance his intention, wherein he is wrought with the French king, that he fent M. Cleremont to excuse the accord he had made by necessify to redeeme his children: and where he alleaged how impossible it was to comprehend the state in that accord, he counselled them with reasons & inducements to lay themselves downe to the necessify of the time, and take such conditions as they might, so faire forth as they were conducible to the profit and concertation of their liberty. In which good inclination, & to helpe to raunge the issue of things to their weale and benefit, he offred as it were to interpose in the action: he also commanded by publike protestation Malatessa and Stephen Colomo being of the kings creation and dependancy, to depart from Florence, notwithstanding apart and severally he gaue them comfort to the contrary. But the thing that imported most to stay his ordinary Embassador resides at Florence, leaving there notwithstanding as a person private Emilia ordinary Embassador resides at Florence, leaving there not with standing as a person private Emilia.

ayd them affoone as he had recoucred his children. Such was the Popes ambition in this action, and fo furtle was his humor to ferue his turne of all meanes that either art or industry could infinuate, that he had almost brought the French king to make retire from his Court his Embssadeur resident for Florence: wherein to draw better sauour to his purposes, he sent by the Bishop of Tarby the Cardinals Hat to the Lord Chancellour, and not long after he gratified him with the legation of the realme of Frannee: and by him he solicited a new enterniew and conference at Thurm betweene the Emperor, the French king, and himselfe. But he was answered in the sull Councell of the king sitting, that it was enough that the children of the Crowne of Frannee were vinder captiuity, without that the person of the king should seeke to intrude himselfe into that calamity.

The Emperor taketh the Crowne at Bolognia.

The Pope and the Emperor did now determine to go to Sienna, to be more ready and apt to fautor the enterprise of Florence, and afterwards to draw to Rome for the coronation of the Emperor: but whether it was a true or false deliberatio, as they were upon the point prepared to depart, the Emperor received letters out of Germany soliciting himto return thirlier, the Electors making instance for regard of the diots, and Ferdmand standing to be chosen king of Romains, and others in respect to celebrate the Councell. By these new instances, whether more effectuall for their suddennesse or for their conformity to the Emperours will, all deuises and counsels to passe further were dashed, in which variation the Emperour was contented to receive the Imperiall Crowne within Bolognia, being affished with a great affluence of people, but suffaining a very slender pompe and expences: he was crowned upon Saint Matthewer day; a day of many happie predictions, for that one that day was he botne, in that day was the French king taken prifoner, and during that day was he celebrated with the Ensignes and ornainents of the Imperiall dignitie.

But before the Emperour departed to returne into Germany, he laboured to accord with the Pope the Duke of Ferrara, who the feuenth day of March came to Bolognia vnder safe conduct: and because there was no other meane to issue or end betweene them, they referred to the perfon of the Emperour the arbitration and Compromise of right and action touching all their controughfies. To the which the Pope was induced by the generality of the Copromife, fuch as comprehended also the quarrell and title of Ferrara, which the Pope doubting that according to termes of right, it would not divoluc to the sea Apostolike, he thought the Emperour had an easie meane in ving silence for Ferrara, to bring him to render Modena and Reggia. The Pope also was induced by the word and promise which the Emperour made to him, that if he found that he hadright to those two Cities, he would pronounce judgement of his side, but if by examination it appeared otherwise, he would suffer to expire and determine the time of the Compromise. And to assure the observation of the sentence and resolution of the Compromise, there wenta couenant, that the Duke should depose Modena into the hands of the Emperour, at whose instance he had revoked before his Embassadors from Florence, and ayded the army with a proportion of pioners. After this the Emperour departed from Bolognia the xxij. day, the Pope hauing left him fatisfied that his intention was to confent to the Councell, if he thought it might any way quaile for the extirpation of the herefics of the Lutherans. The Cardinall Campeius went with him as Legate, and so he passed by Mantua, whereaster he had received threescore thoufand duckats for the Duke of Ferrara, he gaue to him in chiefe for eucr the towne of Carpy:after whom the Pope the xxxj.day tookehis way to Rome leaving the matters of Florence in the same estate of difficulties they were before.

The Imperials made many fignes and braueries as though they would assault the City, for which cause they had begun a trench before the bashillion of Saint George, where being performed a hote skirmish the one and twentieth of March, they without received great harmes. The xxv.day the Prince of Orenge sinding his campe much vexed by a tower adiopning to the side of the bashillion of Saint George towards the gate of Rome, battered it with his artilleries, but sinding it very strong and well appointed, after certaine vollies of Cannon, heforbate any further execution. There arrived dayly at the campe new companies and bands of souldiers, by whose insolencie and licentious selfs, for that there was no warres in any other part of Italy, the harmes and ruines of the countrey of Florence increased continually. The City of Volterro was rendred to the Pope, but the Castell holding good for the Florentins, suffered great executions with two Cannons of the Imperials, and two Culucines brought from Genes. And the

Florentine

Florentins defiring to succourit, sent out to Empoly an hundred and fiftie horsemen and five Enfignes of footmen, who making their march by night, passed by the campe neare the Mount Olynet, and being discouered, there were sent out after them certaine guidons of horsemen, who ouertooke them, but being skirmished withall by the harquebuziers, they retired with some loffe: and the horsemen that were issued out of Florence by an other way behind the campe, saued themselves at the same time with the footmen within Empoly, where they were received by Francis Feruccio commaunder of that place: this man being fent in the beginning of the warre by the Florentins to Empoly as commaunder ouer a very small company of horsemen, and with a very little authority, had, what with the observation of the warre, and with the oportunity of that feate, and with the occasion of prayes and ordinarie incursions, assembled together a good crew of fouldiers of choyse, with whom both by his valour which he had well expressed, and also by his liberality which was infinite in him, he was rifen to fo good cleate of reputation, that the Florenturs had no finall expectation of him. Feruccio then departed from Empoly with two thoufand footemen and fine hundred horfe, with which army marching with great celerity, he entred within the Castell of Volterrothe fixe and twentieth day of Aprill earely in the morning, where having well refreshed his souldiers, he assaulted presently the towns which was garded by Iohn Baptista Borqueso with a very slender strength of soctemen, and winning before night two of their trenches, he had the towne the next morning, together with the artilleries that were come from Genes. The first action he managed after he was Lord of the towne, was by extortions and wayes compulfine, to exact money of the inhabitants of Volterro, and no leffe by that good helpe then by his valour and industry, he constrained to reuolt Gimignana and Collo, and cutting off the trafficke of victuals that came from Sienna by that way, he had reduced the army of the enemies to great difficulties, whose Captaines thinking of no other expedition then of the fiege, the Marquis of Guaft retired the artilleries within Prato. But (fo fudden and vncertaine are the things of warre) there hapned into those quarters vnlooked for, Captaine Maramus leading a regiment of two thousand fine hundred footemen without pay: by reason of which succour being come against the Popes will, he kept on his course, for that Maramus went to incampe with his people at the suburbs of Volterro. The ninth of May was executed a great skirmish without the gate called Rome gate, wherein remained dead and wounded of them within the towne an hundred and thirtie persons, and of the souldiers without, more then two hundred bodies, amongst whom was Captaine Baragnino a Spaniard. Amid these enterchaunges of skirmishes and factions of warre, the Florentins forbare not to hope continually for fome fuccours from the French king, who accordingly fayled not to entertaine their hope with promise of a sufficient rescue when so ever he had recovered his children. Wherein the better to affure and confirme them, he gave affignation to the Florentine Marchants for twentie thousand duckats due to them long time before, which summe being lent by them to the City, was brought to Pisa by Lewis Alaman, but by such parcels and driblets, that it did little comfort the warre. Moreouer lohn Paule de Cere whom the Florentins had taken into their pay for the gard of that City, came away to Pifa. But by the conquering of Volterro was bred to the Florentins a domage of farre greater importance: for that where Feruccio both contrary to the commission given to him, and also because he would go the stronger to the action of Volterro, and having withall too fecure a confidence in the fortresse of Empoly, had left for the defence of it fo finall a garrison, that the Imperials vsing the occasion that was offered, went to incampe about it with vnder the conduct and leading of the Marquis of Guast: and as for the weaknesse of by the Marquis of Guast: the defendances and garrison, they tookeit without any resistance and with many harmes put quis of Guaste it to facke : fo in the losse of that was brought to the Florentins more matter of affliction then in any other thing during the watre, for that having determined to affemble in that place new companies and regiments, they hoped by the oportunitie of the fituation which importeth much, both to reduce into diffresse and difficulties the army that lay on that side of Arno, and alfo to open the commoditie and way for victuals to passe that Citie, which began already to feelethe want of nouriture and comfort. To this also was added a new occasion to deprine them more of the hopes they had conceived: for after the French king had delivered over his money which he was to pay to the Emperour, and retired his children which was in the beginning of Iune: in place of so manie ay des and succours which by his promises he had referued till that time, he fent into Italy at the instance of the Pope (who to have wholly at his devotion the kings Agents, created Cardinall the Bishop of Tarbie, Embassadour resident in his Court) one Peter Francis Pontrumolie, a man of great confidence with him, to infinuate fome motions and practife of accord with the Florentines, who by that manner of dealing difcernedno further hope to be succoured by the king; wherein they beleeved the more by this inducement, that both he and the king of England ioyning together, did all that they could tine out of hope to to allure and gouernet the Pope, as they might hope to leparate him from the Emperour: and by the French in that regard the French king laboured to have some participation and interest to reduce and convert the Florentins to the Popes amitie. After the Marquis of Guaft had taken Empoly, he went with the bands of fouldiers whom heled, to joyne with Maramus in the suburbs of Volterro: where having in one strength almost fixe thousand footenien, they beganne to batter the towne, and when they faw they had brought to the earth more then fortic fadomes of wall, they followed the execution of the artilleries and three furious affaults, but with worfe effect then their valour deserved, since in the action they lost more then source hundred men. They made afterwards a new battery, and with certaine chosen bands of Spaniards and Italians conforted together, they gaue another very braue and refolute affault, but with greater domage and harmes then the former affaults: in which regard the campe brake vp, rather with great prayfethen good effect of their doings. The same morning about an hower before day, Stephen Colonno issuing out of the gate of Faenza, and Malatesta by the posterne that leadeth to Prate, went to give the Camifado with three thousand footenien to the Launceknights that were lodged in the Monastery of Saint Donat, where they had fortified themselves: Stephon palfed the trenches and flue many of them, but the alarme being given to the refidue, they put themfelues in order, with refolution to defend their place to the last man: so that after Stephen had receined a light hurt in the mouth, he tetired for feare of greater rescues, complaying much that Malatesta had not followed him.

But in Florence were entred no nature of victuals nor nouriture from any part, albeit their wants of comforts went on increasing dayly, yet so resolute were they to defend their liberty, that there could be discerned no diminution of that constancy and fidelity that at first armed them to so holy an action. And where Feruccio was gone from Volterro to Pifa, and laboured by his authority and industrie to affemble as great a strength as he could, all the hopes of the Florentins were reduced to his comming: for they had fignified to him to advance and come on, and not to forbeare for any way or other daunger to joyne himselfe to the defence of the City, being refolued to give battell to the enemies affoone ashe had joyned his forces with the maine army that was within Florence. Of which device the successe and issue was not so good and happie, as was great and manifest the rashnesse of the resolution, if I may terme those counsels rash which are drawne or deriued from a last necessitie: for in this rested the errour of that counsell, that they were to passe thorough the countries of the enemies, such as were occupied and commannded by a very strongarmy though dispersed into many seuerall places. The Prince of Orenge who had aduertisement of this deuise, thought to go before with one part of the army, whereof he made his greatest assembly of the Italian footenen: and Malatesta Baillon with whom he had many fecret and straite intelligences, having haply assured him in secret, that the Florentins fuspected least in his absence he would affayle the armie, went out to meete him; and finding him neare to Ciuiniano in the Mountaine of Pistoia, 2 way which he tooke passing from Pisa towards Lucquay, in regard of confidence reposed in the Chauncellours faction well affected The Prince of to the popular government, he gave him the skirmish with a very small company of men: at Orenge flaine, the first shocke the Prince, whose rashnesse was greater then his conduct, and in whom was lesse the humour of counsell and discretion then appertayned to the place he managed, was flaine, doing rather the office of a private fouldier then of a Captaine or commaunder. Neuerthelesse his souldiers got the victorie, and made prisoners together with many others, lohn Paule de Cere, and Feruccio, whom Maramus flue being prisoner, in reuenge as he confessed of a Trumpet, whom he had caused to be hanged, being sent to him at the siege of Volterro to declare'a message.

Thus the Florentins seemed deliuered up to a condition abandoned of all succours both diuine and humane, in whom also increased dayly afflictions of famine, without hope of further remedy remedie or comfort : and yet albeit their extremities for their nature were no leffe heavie & grieuous then their remedies desperate, yet the obstinacie of those that opposed against the accord was nothing abated, but was augmented by the same degrees which multiplied their wants and extremities. Those men being induced by a last dispaire not to pull on them their own ruine without the destruction of the country, & standing now no more wilfully resoluted to die for the safety of the countrey, but that their common countrey and their lives should take end together, were also followed of many, who flattered themselves with this impression, that the succors of the great God of wonders would not appeare before things were reduced to fuch termes, as there remained no further expectation in humane helpe: and as the Magistrates and almost all fuch as managed any publike authoritic, were concurrant in this oblimacie, and no place left to impugne it for that greater was the awe of the Magiltrates and threats of armes, then the reasons or perswasions of those that were of the contrarie opinion: so there had bene daunger that the warre wold have ended with the last destruction of that Citic, had it not benefor the industrie of Atalatesta, who feeing the aduer fitie of the Citie to be without remedie, did as it were confirmine them to encline to accord. Wherein haply he was caried by pitie and compassion, to see wholly perish through the rage of her citizens, a Citic fo ancient & florishing : and haply he was moved by the dishonor and domage that might come to him to be present at so great a ruine: but the principall cause of his induction was, that he hoped to obtaine of the Pope by the meane of that accord, sufferance to returne to Peron a. So that whileft the Magistrates and such as were most surious and forward, were confulting to make iffue out of the Citie the foldiers to give battel to the enemies, who both exceeded them in numbers and aduantage and strength of place, & that he refused to go out with them, they suffered their passion to carie them so farre, that they decasted him, and deposed him from his charge of Captaine, and fent certaine of the most disordered amongst them to denounce against him a commaundement to go out of the towne with his companies; a matter which both for the suddennesse comming valooked for, & for the propertie of injurie being not descrued, did so enflame and kindle him, that striking at one of them with his dagger, the assistants that were by him had much a do to deliuer him with his life out of his handes. By which accident the present company being aftonished and the whole Citie beginning to rife, those that were not so fatte incenfed with pathon and furie, began in better temperance to reprehend the rallnesse of the Gonfalorier, who though he went to arme himselfe, protesting somtimes that he would set upon Malatesta, and sometimes that he would issue out to fight with the enemies, at last things were qualifted to this moderation, that the desperate obstinacie of many gaue place to the extreme neces- Theisfue of fitie of the whole. Intomuch as in those moods they sent out foure Embassadors the ninth of Au- thewarre of guilto capitulate with Don Ferrand Gonfaguo, who for the death of the Prince of Orange com- Florence. maunded in the armie, the Marquis of Guaft being retired before: with whom the day following the conclusion was made, of which these were the principall articles: That the Citie within verice few dayes should pay 80000 duckets for the withdrawing of the armie: That the Pope and the Citic should give authoritie to the Emperour to declare within three moneths what should be the forme of the government, alwayes referuing and faving their libertie: That there was generally pardoned all maner of iniuries done against the Pope, his friends, and his seruants: That till the declaration and fentence of the Emperour were passed, Malatesta Baillon should remaine within the Citie in garrison with 2000 footnen. Assoone as this accord was made, and whilest the money was collected for the armie, whereof there was need of a fatre greater fumme, for that in the Pope was found litle readinesset o releeue the Citie with money in so great a daunger, the Popes Commissarie called Bart. Valory joyning with Malatesta, who aspired altogether to returne to Peroufa, made a convocation of the people in the publike place, according to the anciet cultomes of that Citie, to the which the Magillrates & multitudes agreed through feare : and in that Parliament they introduced a new forme of gouernment, by the which was given authoritie to twelve The effate of Citizens of the faction of the Medices, to dispose as they thought good of the pollicie of the Citie; the City of Flor who reduced it to that forme which it was wont to carrie before the yeare 1527. After this the armie dislodged and brake vp, and having received mony for the orderly pay and fatisfying of the vniuerfallbands, the Italian Captaines converting to their owne private vsage (to the great ignominie of their discipline) that which should haverun amongst the soldiers by share, retired into Florence loden with the money which was appointed to pay the armie. They contented with a litle the regiments of footmen, and dismissed them, who remaining without leaders or commaunders went dispersed into diverse places of the countrey: but for the Spaniards & Lanceknights being fully answered of all their payes, they went out of the townes and jurisdiction of Florence, and drew to the countrey of Sienna to rootder the government of that City. And as Malatesta Baillon, whom the Pope fuffered to returne to Peranfa, without tarying for the declaration of the Emperor, left the city wholly to the arbitration and will of the Pope: To, after the fouldiers were gene out of it, the perfecutions and punishments of the Citizens began, the end of one calamity being the beginning of another: for, those into whose power and administration was divolved the gouernement and authority, partly to affure better the state, and partly by malice conceiued against. the authors of so many enils, & partly for memory of iniuries particularly received, but principally to satisfie the intention and ends of the Pope, though he made small manifestation thereof; those I fay (observing haply the superficies and outward declaration of the words, but wresting & peruerting the inward sense) interpreted, that the chapter or article, by the which pardon was promifed to such as had injured the Pope and his friends, extended not to deface and wipe out the wrongs and crimes which by them were committed in matters that concerned the commonweale. In which inclination to reuenge the information, things being preferred vp to the Magistrates, fix of the principals were beheaded, many imprisoned, and a great number bound ouer according to the traditions and statutes of the City: infomuch as the City being so much the more made weake and feeble, by how much the was shaked in her pillers and chiefe foundations, and withall those that had pertaked in these reuenges and punishments being reduced into greater neceffities and difficulties, the power of the Medicer returned more free and more absolute, yea almost royally into that City, which had for so long & great a warre, remained much impourrished of money, made naked both within and without of many inhabitants, and spoiled both of dwellings and goods abroad, and laftly stood now more then ener denided in it selfe; a calamity which yet was made so much the more great and heavy, by how much had bin more lamentable for mamy yeares their vniuerfall necessity and difficulty to make prouision of victuals in forem countries for the generall scarcity and dearth which the whole countrey endured: for as for that yeare by reason of the afflictions and impediments of the war, they made neither seede time nor harnest, so it was so seuere a calamity continued to the yeares succeeding, that the City being raked and dreyned, had issued out more mony to make prouision of come from forreine regions and cattell without the limits of their owne dominions, then had bene defrayed for the expenses of fo great a warre, full of heavy burdens and charges.

In this meane while the Emperour affembling the diot at Auspurge, had caused to be elected king of Romains Ferdinand his brother: and calling into question the cause of the Lutherans, both suspected touching the power of Princes, and for the multitude and ambition of their followers deuided into diverse herefies, and even the life and example of Martin Luther the originall author of that opinion, being now almost of no consideration, the Princes of Germany could deuise of no better remedy, then to assemble and celebrate a Councell: for, both the Linberans feeking to couer their cause with the authority of religion, solicited vehemently to have their cause disputed in a publike and free Councell: and on the other part it was believed, that the decrees which the Councell should set downe, wold beare authority sufficient, if not to teduce & remoue the minds of the heretikes from their errors, at least to retire and recouer to a more found opinion one part of the multitudes infected. But in Germany even those that followed the sactions and opinions of the Catholikes defired the conuccation of a Councell, to the end to reforme the exceffine charges and abuses of the Court of Rome: where, what with the authority of indulgences, and with the profit of dispensations, and lastly with the annates or yearely fruits of benefices that were given, together with the allowances that in the expedition of them reverted to the offices infinitely multiplied in that Court, it feemed there was no other fludy or care then to exact by those corruptions a huge masse of treasure throughout all Christendome, without regarding the health and true comforting of foules, nor that matters Ecclefiastike were rightly administred and gouerned: for, both many benefices incompatible were transferred and heaped vp6 one perfon, and also without respecting the merits & worthinesse of men, they were either bestowed by partiality and fauor, or at least such persons were introduced, who for their age were incapable, or for their doctrine infufficient, or (which worse is) for their life and example most slaunderous.

The Emperour was very forward to fatisfie this univerfall instance and solicitation of the parts of the states of Germany, and held it allo not out of purpose for his affaires, to appeale in those provinces the causes of the tumults and contumacie of the peoples. In which regards he vr ged the Pope by reducing to his memory the conference they had together at Bolognia, to call a Councell, promifing him (least he seared his authority & dignity shold fall into danger) to be there in person to take particularly care of him. But for the Pope, albeit there was nothing in the world that could be offred more to his displeasing or discotent met then the assembly of a Councel, yet, to nourish the opinion that men had of his good intention, he dissembled that inclination or rather cause of searc: and yet in essect he had many deepe and settled searcs: one was, least the Councell, to moderate the abuses of the Court and the indiscreete permissions of many Popes, would not too much diminish and restraine the power of the sea Apostolike: another was (which was no small impressió in him) that albeit when he was called to be Cardinal, he had proued by witnesses that he was borne in lawfull mariage, yet in truthle knew it was contrary, and albeit there could be found no law writte that forbad any man (not lawfully borne) to afced to the Papacy, yet there was entertayned among st them an ancient and common opinion, that no man, ypon whom could be proued illegitimation, could be capable of a Cardinals place: thirdly he reduced to remorfe and conscience, that he was raised to the sea Apostolike not without some suspition of symony practifed with the Cardinall Colonno: and lastly he feared least for the seuerities and rudenesse which he had yfed towards his naturall countrey, accompanied with fo many tumults and aduerfities of war, he should be made perpetually infamous in the general! Councell, the rather for that it had appeared upon the effects that he was moved not to reduce that City to a good and moderate gouernement, but was induced with ambition and enuy, to put it eftloones under the yoke and feruitude of his house. In regard of these causes and seares, like as he abhorred the name of a Councell, and could not accompt the fidelity of the Emperor a sufficient surety to him: so, after he had communicated the whole matter with some Cardinals deputed to the discussion of a cause of so great waight, who also stood in seare to be corrected by the Councell: he aunswered that there were many reasons against the calling of a Councell in that time, both for that there was no affured stability of peace amongst the Princes of Christendome, and also the feare was no lesse that the Prince of Turkes would recontinue the warre, in which case it were not good that he found the regions of Christendome encombred with the disputations and contentions of the Councell. Neuerthelesse making shew to referre the resolution of it to the Emperour, he concluded, that he was contented that he should promise in the diot, the industion of the Councell with these observations: That it might be celebrated in Italy: That a reasonable time were affigned for the calling of it: That it be affigned with the person and presence of the Emperour: And that the Lutherans and other heretikes promising to referre themselues to the determination of the Councell, should in the meane while defist from the practife of their corruptions, and rendring to the sea Apostolike their due obedience, they should returne to their former conversation of Christian Catholikes. This article made more hard the whole practife and negociation of the Conneell : for, the Lutherans were not onely not to defift from their opinions and ceremonies before the celebration of the Councell, but also it was beleeved, that they had no inclination of the Councell, where they could expect no other matter, then a reprobation of their doctrine, the rather for that their principall opinions had bene many times refuted as hereticall by the former Councels: yea it was thought they infifted upon the conuocation of this Councell, for that knowing it was a matter fearefull to Popes to stand in presence of a Councell, they were of opinion that the Court of Rome would not accord to it, and fo by that meane, they should support their cause with the nations of the world with a greater authoritie.

With these actions and intentions determined the yeare a thousand fluehundred and thirty, and successfuely followed the yeare 1531, wherin was wrought no great matter of emotion and The French stirre: for, notwithstanding it was comprehended by many signes, that the French king was him and ling not onely ill contented with the accords and contracts made with the Emperour, but also flood of England ill very defirous to innounte things to new tunults, with whom the king of England bare the fame disposed to inclination, especially against the Emperour, for that standing in defence of the cause of the sister the Emperour. of his mother, he impugned the matter of his divorce: yet the French king being both imponerished of money, and little leasure to respire from the trauels of so long wars, he saw the time was not yet apt to kindle matters of innouation: neuertheleffe he omitted not in the meane while to confpire as well in Germany with such Princes as bare minds estranged from the Emperor, as in Italy with the Pope, to whom the better to affine his amity, he made an ouerture of mariage betweene his fecond fonne and the Popes Neece. In which practifes and conspiracies he suffered himselse to be somuch our caried with malice and reuenge, that to the great offence of God, and perpetuall infamy to the Crowne of Fraunce, which alwayes made principall profeffion to defend Christian religion, and for those merits was honored with the title of Christianissimus, he entertayned practises with the Prince of Turkes, to stirre him up against the Emperour, towards whom the Turkes were ordinarily ill disposed, no lesse for a naturall the Turke as hatred they bare to the name of Christians, then for the matter of controverses they had with his brother tending to questions, for the realme of Hungary with the Vaynode whom he had taken into his protection: the Turkesalfo began with much icalouse to suspect and enuy the greatnesse

of the Emperonr. By this time the Imperial Captains leavied their forces fi othe territories of Sienna, to leade them to Premont : but before they departed, to fatisfie the Pope, they reestablished within Stenna the family of Montenous, reposlessing them of their courrey & goods, & yet altered not the forme of the gouernement : and to affure them in their estate, they left them a gard of 300 Spaniards depending upon the Duke of Malfy, under whom, being not able to keepe his authority things foreuerted forthwith to their old disorders, that such as had bin reestablished and restored, left for seare the things they could not hold by force. Moreouer the Emperour pronounced the forme of gouernement for Florence, differibling that part of the authority given to him, which limited their itberty faued: for that according to the very instruction which the Popehadsent to him, he expressed that the City should be gouerned with the same Magistrate & in the same maner, it was wont in the times when the Medices ruled it: he declared also for chiefe of the gouctnement Alexander the Popes nephew, and his ion in law: and that in case of him & his issue extinct, there should succeed from hand to hand, the children, the descendants, and the next procreated of the same samily: he restored to the city all the priviledges agreed vnto before times by him & by his predecessors, but with this condition annexed, to be deposed from them as often as the city should attempt anie thing against the greatnesse of the family of Medicis, inserting through all the decree, words which shewed that he tooke not his ground & inducement only vpon the power that had bin given to him by the parties, but also vpo the authority & dignity Imperial. In which maner of dealing, whete he haply fatisfied the Pope more then was extended by the faculty given him by the writ of compromife, he offended him afmuch immediatly after in a matter which was no leffe grieuous to him then the other was agreeable: for, after the Doctors especially affigued, had heard and examined the controuershe betweene the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara, before whom both the parties had produced many testimonies and inscriptions, with a long course of processe and pleading, he pronounced fentence according to their counsell and relation, that as Modena and Reggia appertained of right to the Duke of Ferrara, so the Pope in receiving of him an hundred thousand duckats, and reducing the tributes to the auncieut maner, he should inuest him of new in the jurisdiction of Ferrara. Wherein the Emperour labored to infinuate into the Pope, that where contrary to his promise made in Bolognia, not to pronotice in case he found his cause not to be just, he had given sentence, That he was not to complaine against him, but rather to blame the Bishop of Vafona his Nuncio, to whom he alwayes gaue fignification that he would not pronounce fentence, for that he would not be constrained to passe judgement against the Pope: but he perswading the contrary, and interpreting those fignifications for a discharge of the promise he had made to give sentence, if the right were in him, had pressed so much the publication of the sentence, The Pope hol- that he was halfe constrained toit for the regard of his honour; an excuse which the Pope would foonerhaue admitted, if the fentence and judgement had not bin in the fame fort and maner, wherein the Emperor had many times affayed to reduce the matter by accord. But the point wherein the Pope was most offended, was, that the Emperor in pronouncing upon the matters of Modena end Reggia, had followed a way and taken a course of a Judge most rigorous, but in the action of Ferrara wherein the rigour was manifeltly for him, he had done the office of a friendlie Arbitratour and Compromittour: therefore though he would neither ratifie the fentence:

deth himselfe offended with the Emperor.

Entence pronounced, nor accept the payment of the mony wherein the Duke was condemned, neither did heat the next feast of S. Peter accept the tribute which was publikely offered to him according to ancient custome: yet the Emperor forbare not for all that to configne to the Duke of Ferrara Modena, which he had detayned in deputation till that day, leaving them to decide afterwards the differences betweene them. So that by reason of that dealing, there was not for manie moneths betweene the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara, neither an open war nor an affured peace, the Pope lying alwayes in watch to oppresse him with conspiracies and surprise, or else to expect the occasion to heape against him an open war with the supportation of greater Princes. This yeare of 1531 brought foorth no other accidents, and the tranquillity also went on continuing for the yeare following; a yeare more dangerous for forrein wars, then for the emotions of

Italy: for, the Turke being kindled with the ignominy of his repulse at Vienna, and no lesse under-Handing how the Emperour was intangled in Germany, prepared a right huge and great army, wherein boaffing infolently of his forces, he let not to publish, that his intention was to conftraine the Emperor to come to battell with him. By the rumor & renowne of which preparations, both the Emperour put himselse in as good order as he could, reuoking into Germanie the Marquis of Guast with his Spanish regiments, and a great band of horsemen and sociemen Italians: and the Pope promifed to contribute to him a defraiment of forty thousand duckats for every moneth, fending for the same expedition as Legate Apostolike, his nephew the Cardinall of Medicis: and lattly the Princes and free townes of Germany, prepared infauor of the Emperor and for the com- The Turke res mon defence of Germany, a very huge and mighty army: but the effects answered nothing the re-turneth with nowme and the feare: for, Soliman who (for the greatnesse of his preparations, and difficulty and Shame to Condistance of the way) could not enter into Hungary but very late, did not draw directly with his flantinople, armic where the Emperour was, but exhibiting onely a fliew of warre, together with certaine bragging Canalcadoes and braueries of horfemen, he returned to Constantinople, leaving the enterprife upperfect for want of valour, which he had induced and managed with fo mighty preparations: neither did the Emperour shew any greater denotion or readinesse, seeing that when he understood the Turkes drew neare, much lesse that he made out to meete them, seeing upon their retiring he omitted to pursue with all his forces the faire occasion that was offered him to reconquer Hungary for his brother: onely yeelding to his importunate defire to go into Spaine, he gaue order that certaine bands of Spanish footemen and some regiments of Launceknights should be converted to the enterprise of Hungary. But that order was immediatly disordered by the infolent behaulours of the Italians, who pushed on by certaine their Captaines, disdaining that the authority and conduct of the enterprise was given to others and not to them, so mutined, that hauing no reason to alleage for their tumult, and the presence of the Emperour who went thither to appeale them, being not sufficient to continue them, they tooke resolutely and vniuerfally their way into Italy, in which disorder they marched with great hast for feare to be followed, and in their way with minds malicious they burned many villages and honfes, in renenge as they fayd of the burnings and wasting committed in many places in Italy by the Lanceknights. The Emperour also returned by the way of Italy, and where he had set downe in what order and by what places should passe his Court and all his traine, the Cardinal Medicis, caried with humors and passions of youth, would not obey the order generally given to all the traine, but in his infolency respecting lesse the Emperours order then his owne ambitious will, he advanced and got before together with Peter Maria Roffa, vpon whom chiefly was layed that fault of the fedition. This bred no litle indignation in the Emperour, either for that he imputed the beginning and discourse of the matter to the Cardinall, or else he feared least the Cardinall standing ill contented, that Alexander his coulin was preferred to the administration of the estate of Florence, would go after the bands of Italians to leade them to trouble the affaires of Tuscane. In which regard he caufed to be apprehended by the way, the Cardinall and with him Peter Maria Roffa: but after he had better considered of the importance of the matter, he wrote letters for the redeliuery of the Cardinall, to whom as well as to the Pope he protested many excuses: only Peter Maria remained prifoner, though not long after he was released, working greatly for him with the Emperout, the injury which it seemed he had done to the Cardinall. ut, the injury which it feemed he had done to the Cardinall.

the Emperor, had an enterniew and conference together betweene Calice and Bulleyne, where taking their grounds that the Turke would abide that winter in Hungary, and hold intangled the forces of the Emperour, they consulted that the French king under that oportunity should inuade the Duchy of Millan, and haning a disposition to draw the Pope to their part by violence and astonishment, whom they could neuer allure by other meanes, they denised to take from him the obedience of their kingdoms in case he would not consent to that which they defired of him, which was for the action of Millan for the French king, and for the king of England to give tentence on his fide in the cause of diuorce: and to relate their intentions, they were determined to fend to him with sharpe commissions, the Cardinals of Tournon and Tarbes, both which bare no small authority with the French king. But the newes which they received of the retiring of the Turke before the time of their enteruiew was determined, did not only well moderate those deuifes and their feuerities, but were also the cause that the king of England would not suffer to passe to Calice the Lady Anne Bulleine, to celebrate mariage with her publikely in that affembly, notwithstanding that both the cause was hanging in the Court of Rome, and also he was sorbidden by writs Apostolike, under paine of very great judgements, to innouate nothing to the prejudice of the first mariage. But so deepe did the French king diffemble, that albeit to confirme the mind of the king of England that he would be against the Pope, he imposed by his owne authority vpon the Clergie of his realme a taxe of tenths, and dispatched the two Cardinals to the Pope, yet not observing the fidelity of his word and premise, he sent them furnished with commissions farte disfering from the resolution of the two kings in the beginning. The Emperour being come into Italy with a defire to speake with the Pope, the place of

terniew of the their meeting and enterview was eftloones affigned at Bolognia; a place which the Pope Pope and Em- accepted willingly, the rather for that he would give no occasion to the Emperour to go to the realme of Naples, and by that occasion to make a longer aboad in Italy; a matter whereunto albeit the Emperour was induced by the reasons and perswasions of many of his Court, yet it was entirely contrary to his principal intention, who defired to make half into Spane chiefly for the defire he had to have fons, his wife remaining there: so that those two personages of that estate and greatnesse, met at the end of the yeare at Bolognia, where were observed betweene the the fame demonstrations of amity, and the same offices of familiarity, which they vsed before, but there was no more the same correspondency of wils which had bene expressed upon their negociations the other time: for the Emperor had a great defire to advance the Coucell, the better to reduce to rest and contenument the regions & peoples of Germanythe offered to dissolue the army, liuing at a great charge both to him and others, but to the end he might do it with more furety, he infifted to have renued the last league made at Bolognia, both to comprehend in it all the Italians, & to taxe the quantities & rates of mony which enery particular was to contribute, if the states of Italy were inuaded by the French: he defired also to have Katherine the Popes Neece maried to Francis Sforce, aswell to presset the Pope by a greater necessity to looke to the preservation of that state, as also to breake the practife of paretage that was solicited with the French king. Of all these matters not one was acceptable to the Pope, seeing the cofederation was a motion cotrary to the defire he had to stand a newter so much as he could between the Princes of Christendom: wherin both he doubted many dangers generally, & especially he feared least the French K. taking his example & instigation by the king of England, would deprive him of the obedience of his kingdom. Touching the convocation of a Councell, it was no leffe grievous to him then before, for the ancient causes and impressions : and for parentage with the Duke of Millan, it pleased him nothing at all, for that he interpreted it to a meane to take an open hatred with the French king, with whose second son he had a vehement desire to conjoyne his Necce. These matters were drawne into negociation and counsell, but principally was solicited the point of the consederation, in which actio running many moneths, were deputed for the Emperor, Cnouss, the great Commander of Leo, Granuelle, and Prato his chiese Counsellors: and for the Pope were delegate the Cardinal Medicis, lames Saluiatio, & Guicciardin: who as they refused not to go through with the co. federation, for that it was all one to vicouer the Popes intention, & to give the Emperor cause to coceiue infly a great suspition of him, so they made instance to haue the Venetias sounded & to be drawne to consent to it, alleaging that both without them the defence of Italy would be but weake, and that iountly with them should be protected with more reputation the common affaires if the defence were continued vpon the renowne of the former confederation : where, if there were resolued another without them, it wold deliuer to the world an opinio, that betweene the Emperour, the Pope and Venetians, were apparant matter of discord. In this regard the Venetians were solicited to condificend to a new consederation for an unjuerfall desence of all the regions of Italy, for that by the first League their obligation exteded no further the for the affaires of Millan and Naples. The Emperour also wished with great defire, that they might be bound to the defence of Genes, where it was thought, that when the war was on foot, the Frenchmen wold be apt to recontinue their former inuation; a matter which they might pretend to do lawfully, by reason of their rights & interests particular, without prejudicing the contracts of Madrill & Cambray. But the Senate of Venice refused absolutely to renew the confederation, or to amplifie the obligations contained in the same; a matter which brought no small discontentment to the Emperour, though they affirmed to obserue inviolably that confunction: but the Emperour was so much the more importunate, & so refuted all reasons that were alleaged to the contrarie, that the articles of the confederation began to be communed vpon. And for the more effectuall handling of things, there were fummoned all the Potentates of Italy, who fent Embaffadours to this negociation: they were required to enter the League, and to contribute in case the war went on eucry one according to his power and politibility, wherein they made no difficulty or refiftance but laboured feuerally to eafe the demaund of the contribution : only Alfonso d'Este reasoned with the that it was not reasonable he should enter into a league to defend the states of others, if first he were not affured of his owne: he alleaged there could no accord be made to warrant him against the Pope, nor to enter league with him, neither could be promife to contribute with his treasure to the desence of Millan & Genes, if necessity compelled him to expend it continually to keepe bands of fouldiers within Modena and Reggia, and also for the surety of Ferrara: vpon which reafons was deriued a new practife and labour to accord him with the Pope: who bearing a mind far estranged from that morion, and yet not willing to oppose himselfe so apparantly against the inflance of the Emperour, he proponed conditions verie hard and impossible to be observed, affirming that if he should leave Atodena and Reggia to Alfonfo, who otherwayes would not come to accord, he would that Alfonso should reacknowledge and hold them in chiefe of the Sea Apoflolike; a matter which for that it could not be done in fuch fort as to be judicially available without the confent of the electors & Princes of the Empire, reduced the Emperor to a difficulty which had no iffue. This brought the Emperor to intreat the Pope, that at least during the league he wold be bound not to vexe the flate which Alfonso held:insomuch as aftermany importunities & disputings, the Pope cosented to assure him for xviij, moneths: & soat last was resolved the con- A League for clusion of the League, passed & cotracted upon S. This league & colederation cotained an obligation of the Emperor, the king of Romans & Itaiy. all the other Potentates of Italy, except the Venetians, for the defence of Italy: only the Florentins were not otherwise named, the in the same maner they were expressed in the league of Congrace, & that to the end not to trouble their entercourse & trades in the realme of Fraunce, it was set downe with what proportion of fouldiers enery one shold be cocurrant, & with what quantities of mony to contribute for enery moneth: the Emperors rate was xxx. thousand duckets, the Pope for him & the Florentines was taxed at twenty thousand, the Duke of Asillan at xv. thousand, the Duke of Ferrara at ten thousand, the Genomayes at fixe thousand, the state of Sienna at ten thoufand, and the Citie of Lucqua at a thousand: and to the end to be found prepared against all sodaine & vnlooked for inuations, vntill defence might be made with the contributions aforenamed, it was agreed that immediatly should be leauied a loane of a summe of money, almost equall to the taxations, and that not to be expended, vuleffe the praparations to intiade Italy were manifeltly discerned. There was also set downe a small contribution yearcly for the entertainment of those Captains that remained in Italy, and to defray certaine pensions to the Swiffers, to stop that nation for giving aide of men to the French king. Over this League was declared Captaine gene-The Pope will remain in the Duchy of The Pope will remain the Duchy of the Emperor, who fill solicited the Pope to fend out present summons for it: but he refused to accomplish a Council, the motion, alleaging that as in that ill disposition of the time and mens minds, there would be danger least the kings of England & Fraunce wold not appeare, so if the Councel were celebrated without the, much lesse that there could be introduced either vision or reformation of the Church, feeing it was to be feared least things wold divolue to a manifest schisme: only he was content to send out Nuncios to all Princes to induce the to so holy a worke: but albeit the Emperor made a question to him what wold be the issue of things, if those two Princes did dissent fro the without iust cause, and pressed him in that case to intimate the Councell, yet he could never dispose him to it: fo that his Nuncios were affigued and fent out with a verie flender hope to bring backe any good conclusion. The Emperour was no better fatisfied touching the negociation of the parentage, for that when the two Cardinals which the French king had fent, were come to Bolognia, and had eftfoones recontinued the negociation of the mariage with the second sonne of Fraunce, The Pope re- the Pope gaue answer to the offer made for the Duke-of Millan, and exhibited by the Emperour: that whereas the French king had long time before made an ouetture of mariage for his fonne, and he had hearkened to the motion by the confent of the Emperor, declaring at that time his good confent and liking, he should now do too great a wrong to the French king, if during the negociation he should give his Neece in mariage to one of his enemies: but he perswaded him, that that practife was artificially introduced by the French king to entertaine him, and not with intention to conclude it, seeing there was betweene the parties so great disagreement and inequality of degree and condition. Laftly, he affired him that he would not commit fo great an offence to the king, if he faw not before the practife and folicitation altogether broken: and the Emperour for his part, being not to be perswaded that the French king would adioune his sonneto a match fo farre vnequall to him, encouraged and aduited the Pope, that for the better vncouering of the kings diffimulations, he would presse the Cardinals to send for a procuration to contract them, which accordingly was accomplished in few dayes, and exhibited in very ample forme: by which readinesse and resolute meaning, not onely was lost all hope of affinitie with Frauncis Sforce, but also the solicitation with the French king was pursued with so much the more importunity, and to it was further added, according to the deuise betweene them long before, that the Pope and the French king should contract together at Nice, a Citie of the Duke of Samoy, standing upon theriuer of Var, and separateth Italy from Provence. These matters were not a litle discontenting to the Emperour, aswell for a suspirion he had, that betweene the Pope and Frenchking were concluded a greater conjunction to his prejudice, as also for that he was iealous, that in the Pope remayned some secret memorie and impressions of his imprisonment, of the facke of Rome, of the mutation of Florence, and of other wrongs. To there he adioyned the passion of disdaine, wherein he judged that the honour which the Pope had done to him in making two journeyes to Bolognia to speake with him, would stand derided and diminished, if he should make a voyage by sea so farre as Nyce, to meete with the French king. But in vaine were these suspicions and the causes of them, though he could not dissemble them, for that in the Popes mind was vehemently nourished and affected the defire of that affinity, being haply moued more with ambition and appetite of glorie, in that being of a house almost simple and private, he had obtained in recompence of a baltard Nephew of his, a baltard Daughter of so mighty an Emperour, and now in exchaunge of his Neece legitimate, he had honoured his house with the fecond some of France, lawfully borne and orderly affured. Then that he was induced, which many counfelled him, that by the meane of that parentage he might give colour of right (though more apparant then true) to the Frenchking, to enter for his some and for his daughter in law vpon the estate of Florence. To these discontentments of the Emperour, may be added also as a full accomplishment of his dishking, that where he made instance to the Pope to create three Cardinals exhibited by him, he obtained onely (and that with difficulty) the calling of the Archbishop of Bary, the Pope making his excuses upon the contradiction of the Colledge of Cardinals: the Emperour stood little appealed in the readinesse which the Pope shewed to make a secret confederation with him, wherein he promifed to proceed judicially to pronounce judgements and censures, and all other things that might be done by right against the king of England, and against the Lady Anne Bolleyne: & they were bound to make no new confederations or accords with Princes, without reciprocall confent one of another. Thus the Emperor departed from Bolognia the day after the conclusion of the confederatio, being now no lesse assured in himselfe, that the said mariage would go on, together with the enteruiew betweene the Pope & the French king, then he had reason to doubt some greater coiunctio:

and being embarked at Genes, he passed into Spaine with this resolute intention, that if the mariage of Katherine de M. dieis were celebrated with the fecond sonne of France, he would difsolue and breake the match made betweene his daughter and Alexander de Medicis. Not many dayes after the Pope departed to go to Rome, being accompanied with the two French Cardinals, and nothing troubled with the new confederation: for that as he was excellent in fimulations and practifes, in which he was not furmounted with feare, to he had told them that vpon concluding the League the Spanish armie was to dissolue and decaste; a matter which woldturne more to the benefite of the French king, then the league or cofederation could do him hurt, feeing that aswell for the obligations it contained, as for the obsernancy and executions of the same, many difficulties might happen and fundrie impediments arife. Thus the folicitations and practifes begun, were continued between them: and as the French king was defirous in regard of his honour, and for ambition more then for other needfull matter, that the person of the Pope might come to Nice, so to allure him the more, he promised not to require of him any confederation, nor to incense him to warre, and much lesse to draw him fro termes of iullice in the cause of the king of England, nor to importune him to create new Cardinals: neuertheleffe he was somewhat pushed on by the incitation of the king of England, who hadnow tolernnly maried the Lady Anne Bolleyne, by whom having by due order of time procreated a daughter he had, to the prejudice of the daughter of his first wife, declared her Princesse of the realme of England; a title which is transferred to such as are most nearest the Crowne: by reason of which action, the Pope notable to differable so great a contempt against the Sea Apoltolike, nor refuse to graunt instice to the Emperour, had with the vowes and instifications of the Confittoric, published that king guiltie of the crime of contempt; a matter which moved the king of England to defire with more importunitie both the parentage and entertiew of the Pope with the French king, hoping much in that king to remedie his cause: and that if the Pope were induced to commune vpon new matters against the Emperour, he would defire to restore him, and to draw him to their conjunction, and so almost to constitute a Triumuirate to give lawes to the things of Italy. At last his going was concluded, but not to Nice; for some difficultie interpofed by the Duke of Sanoy, touching the configning of the Callle to the Pope, having in likelihood no inclination to displease the Emperour: but the place was changed to Marseilles, greatly to the pleafing and appetite of the French king, who interpreted it not a litle to his honour, to reduce the enterview into his kingdome, neither was it difcontenting to the Pope, as one that defired to fatisfie him more with demonstrations to please his ambition, then with effects according to true meaning. The Pope caused to be published a brute, that he went to this enterview, principally to solicite an universall peace: secondly, to persuade an enterprise against the insidels: thirdly, to reduce and call backe to good wayes the king of England: and laltly, and onely for common and generall interests, and to establish some good forme in the universall affaires: but being indeed not able to diffemble the true cause of his journy, before he departed he sent his Neece to Nice voon the Galleyes which the French king fent to him, accompanied with the Duke of Albania, Vincle to the young Ladie: which Galleyes after they had delivered the Lady to Nice, returned to the port Pifan, and tooke in the fourth of October the person of the Pope with Enterview of a traine of manie Cardinals, whom with a happie natigation they brought in few dayes to the Pope and Marfeilles: there he made his folemne entrie, and after him entred the Frenchking, who had Frenchking as visited him before by night: they were lodged in one Pallace, and exercised reciprocally one vpo Marseiles. another right great offices and demonstrations of amity: and the king, who especially laboured to infinuate into his fauour and to win him, befought him to fend for his Neece to come to Marfeiller, which being perfourmed with a willing readineffe in the Pope, who forbare to preuent the king in that motion, to shew that he would first debate of the common affaires . So soone as the Katherive de Ladie was come, the contracts went on, which were immediatly confirmed and made perfect by Medicismarithe confirmation of the mariage, to the incredible gladnesse of the Pope, who albeit with such cond some of arte folicited his affaires with the king, that the king reposed a wonderful confidence in his words, France. and honoured him with a fingular affection: yet both contrarie to the opinion of all men, and especially against the expectation of the Emperour, no article or capitulation was passed betweenerhem: onely the Pope shewed himselfe alwaies well inclined and defirous, that the state of Millan might be converted to the Duke of Orleance husband to his Neece; a matter

also yehemently thirfled after by the king, for a hatred and despite he bare to the Emperour and his greatnesse and fortunes, but much more for that the Duke of Orleans having to his share an ϵ flate of that apparance and greatnesse, he thought that thereby would be quenched the occasions of contentions betweene his children after his death, which otherwise he scarcd might fall amongst them for the title of the duchie of Brittaine; an cleate which the king in the yeare before contrarie to the couenants made by king Lewis with those people, had annexed and vuited to the Crowne of Fraunce, wherunto he induced the fubicets of that state to consent more by his kingly authority then of their proper inclination and will. Moreover, in this enterview much lesse that the king could obtain any faucur of the Pope in the cause of the king of England, seeing being discontented with the incivilities of the Agents of that king, whom he found in the Popes chamber, protesting and appealing from him to the Councell: he told the Pope it should nothing offend him, if he purfued that king and his cause according to the rule of instice: yea, he was so moderate in his demaunds and dealings, that in nothing did he offend the mind of the Pope, fauing that more to fatisfie others of his Court and Counfell, then to content himselfe, he folicited him to create three Cardinals; a matter not a litle discontenting to the Pope, not so much for the instance which the Emperours Embassadour made to the contrarie, as for that he interpreted it to an action of great confequence, both for the election of other Popes hereafter, and for the difobediences which might happen in his life, and after to adde fo manie Cardinals to the French nation, being at that time fixe in number: neuertheleffe to preuent a greater euill with fatisfying the leffer, he accomplished the kings demand, making to be concurrant in the action of that creation, a brother of the Duke of Albany, to whom he had before promifed the Cardinals cap, In all other regards they feemed to stand firme and assured in all forts of fidelity and satisfaction, and in that good effate of inclination and amitie, the French king was not curious to communicate with him manie of his counfels, and especially his determination to stirre vp against the Emperor certaine Princes of Germanie, and chiefly the Lantgrane van Hesse, and the Duke of Wittenberg, who the fummer following drew into commotion: and fo with these actions and demonstrations of amitie and office, after they had passed a moneth at Marseilles, the Pope returned vpon the fame Gallies that brought him: but being with great flormes and tempells of sea arrived at Sasiona, where repofing no more confidence neither in the provisions of the Gallies, nor in the industrie and experience of those that governed them, he sent backe against he same Gallies that had deliuered him out of his first petilles, and tooke his course to Ciuitanecchia in the Gallies of Andrew Dore, from whence being returned to Rome, with a right great reputation and wonderfull felicitie, especially to luch as had seene him prisoner in the Callle of Saint Angeo, he reioyced, as it were at his will, in the full fauour of fortune, feeling not with flanding in the fecret apprehensions of his spirite and mind, the chaunge that was speedily to happen to him: in which impression he seemed to foresee and discerne his last end: for it is certaine, that almost as foone as he was returned from his voyage to Marfeilles, from whence he feemed to bring certaine predictions and comets of his death, he caused to make the Ring with all other habites accustomed to buric Popes, assuring his familiar with a mind well reposed and resoute, that his latest sdayes could not be deferred for anie long time. Neuerthelesse nothing retiring for all those impressions from his cares and studies accustomed, he solicited, as he thought, for the greatet furetie of his house, to build a verie strong Cittadell within Florence, not knowing how foone was to end the felicitie of his Nephewes, of whom being mortall enemics one to another, Hippolito the Cardinall died before the end of the yeare of the Popes death, not without suspition of poison, and Alexander the other Nephew, who commanded at Florence, was (not without a great note of indifferetion) secretly slaine by night in Florence by the hands of Lawrence once of the same familie of Medicis.

The Pope fickened about the beginning of former, whose griefe in the first apprehension, was the paines of the stomacke, which drawing with them the passions of a seuer and other accidents, kept him long time vexed and tormented, somtimes seeming to be reduced to the point of death, & sometimes so eased and relieued, that he gaue to others, but not to himselfa kind of hope of recouring. And duting the time of his maladie, the Duke of Wittenberg by the ayde of the Lantgrane Van Hesse & other Princes, cocurring also the mony of France, recoursed the Duchy of Vistemberg which the king of Romaines possessed by which occasion fearing a greater combustion.

bustion, they came to composition with the king of Romains against the will of the French king, who well hoped that the Emperour, in regard of those emotions, would stand entangled with a long and tedious warre, and that haply their armics being victorious, would descend you the Duchy of Millan, Inlike fort about that time Barbaroffa Baffa, and Captaine generall to Solyman of all his Nauics and armies by fea, passed to the conquest of the kingdome of Thunis: in his Earberoffs at way thithet he feouted along the shores of Calabria, and ran vp aboue Caletra, where setting on Thurss. land certaine bands of his fouldiers, he facked Fondy, with fuch a feare and aftonuliment to the Court and peoples of Rome, that it was supposed that the citie of Rome had bin left abandoned, if in that course of victory they had passed on further. This accident was kept from the knowledge of the Pope, who being no longer able to make refiltance against his maladic, exchanged this life Death of Tore for a better the xxv. of September, leating behind him in the callle of S. Angeo many rich flones clemes the ry. and iewels, more then was expected of him, and in the Chamber of the Sea Apostolike infinite offices, contrarie to cultome and good order, but in the Treasurie a verie small store of money, wherein he beguiled the opinion of all men: he was raifed from base degree to the place of the Popedome with a wonderfull felicity, but in managing the place, he proued a verie great variatio of fortune, wherin if both the properties of fortune be evenly ballanced the one with the other, the worfer fortune without all comparison was far more familiar with him then the better : for as there could happe to him no greater infellicity the the aduerfity of his imprisonmet, for that with his owne eyes he beheld with lo great a ruine and destruction the lacke of Rome; a defolation which his fortune suffered him to be waile with pitie & copassion, but not to turne away or remedie the harme: fo also by him moved the generall desolation of his naturall country, to the which by how much more he was bound by perpetuall obligatios, by so much greater was his adversity to be a chiefe hiltrument in the ruine of the place where he had taken his first being; he died hated . of all the Court, suspected to most Princes, and for the discourse of his life, he left behind him a renowing rather hatefull then acceptable: for he was accounted couctous, of litle fidelity, and naturally far offfrom doing pleasures to men : and in that humor, albeit during his time of Pope he created xxxj. Cardinals, yet vpon none of them did he impose that dignity to content himselfe, but was drawne as it were by the violent law of necessity, and to please others: yea he called to that dignity the Cardinall of Medicis, not of his proper and free election, but at the contemplation & perswasion of others & at a time when being oppressed with a dangerous maladie, if he had died, he had left his friends and kindred in the fate of beggers, and deprined of all side: neuertheleffe lie was in countell verie graue, and in his actions much forefeeing: touching passions & affections. a conquerour of himselfe, and for the facultic of his mind and spirit, of great capacitie and power, if timerousnesse had not oftentimes corrupted his judgement. Immediatly after his death the Cardinals going the fame night into the Conclaue, elected in his place with full voyce Alexander, of the familie of Farnefa, a Romane by nation, and for his time the most ancient Cardinal of the Creation of Court: in which election their voyces feemed conformable to the judgement and instance that Pope Paule Clement had made, the person elected being more worthieto be preferred before all the others the third to so soueraigne a degree, for that he was both furnished with doctrine and good learning, and fully replenished with good apparances and customes; and for the Cardinals, they were so much the more forward to passe the election in his person, by how much for the greatnesse of his age, being already upon the theefcore and feuenth years!, and supposed to beare a weake and vnfound complexion (which opinion he nourifhed with arte) they hoped he would not fit long in the feate. But touching his actions and operations, whether they answered the expe-Aution conceived of him, or whether they were worthy of the incredible gladnesse which the people of Rome tooke to have after the end of an hundred and three yeares, and after the fuccessio of thirteene Popes, a Pope of bloud and nation a Romane, and of language and education of one familiaritie with themselves, it standeth in the testimonie and relation of those who are to write of the accidents happing in Italy fince his election:

> fo is to be verified the fentence of the properbe, that The office setteth out the dignitie of the person that manageth it.
