

Anno 1778.

PHILLIPS · ACADEMY

OLIVER · WENDELL · HOLMES
LIBRARY

THE LIFE OF NELSON

BY

ROBERT SOUTHEY

“Bursting through the gloom
With radiant glory from thy trophied tomb,
The sacred splendor of thy deathless name
Shall grace and guard thy Country's martial fame.
Far-seen shall blaze the unextinguished ray
A mighty beacon, lighting Glory's way;
With living luster this proud Land adorn,
And shine and save, through ages yet unborn.”

ULM AND TRAFALGAR.— George Canning.

NEW YORK ∴ CINCINNATI ∴ CHICAGO
AMERICAN BOOK COMPANY
1895

Copyright, 1895, by AMERICAN BOOK COMPANY.

SOUTHEY'S LIFE OF NELSON.

M. I

942.07092

N335

INTRODUCTION.

ROBERT SOUTHEY, the author of this Life of Nelson, was born August 12, 1774. His father was a linen draper of Bristol. Of his mother Southey says in his "Recollections": "Never was any human being blessed with a sweeter temper or a happier disposition. She had an excellent understanding, and a readiness of apprehension which I have rarely known surpassed. In quickness of capacity, in the kindness of her nature, and in that kind of moral magnetism which wins the affections of all within its sphere, I never knew her equal."

His earliest years were spent with his aunt, Miss Tyler, who had a house in Bath, and a walled garden wherein grew "fragrant herbs" and "fine fruit trees" and lilies of the valley, and also Robert Southey's love for the beauty of nature. "Miss Tyler," he says, "was considered as an amateur and patroness of the stage. . . . She was thrown also into the company of dramatic writers at Mr. Palmer's, who resided then about a mile from Bath, on the upper Bristol road, at a house called West Hall. Here she became acquainted with Coleman and Sheridan and Cumberland and Holcroft. . . . Sophia Lee was Mrs. Palmer's most intimate friend. She was then in high reputation for the first volume of 'The Recess,' and for the 'Chapter of Accidents.'

You will not wonder that, hearing, as I continually did, of living authors, and seeing in what estimation they were held, I formed a great notion of the dignity attached to their profession. Perhaps in no other circle could this effect so surely have been produced as in a dramatic one, where ephemeral productions excite an intense interest while they last. Superior as I thought actors to all other men, it was not long before I perceived that authors were still a higher class.

“Though I have not become a dramatist, my earliest dreams of authorship were, as might be anticipated from such circumstances, of a dramatic form; and the notion which I had formed of dramatic composition was not inaccurate. ‘It is the easiest thing in the world to write a play!’ said I to Miss Palmer, as we were in a carriage on Redcliffe Hill one day, returning from Bristol to Bedminster. ‘Is it, my dear?’ was her reply. ‘Yes,’ I continued, ‘for, you know, you have only to think what you would say if you were in the place of the characters, and to make them say it.’

“My grandmother died in 1782; and, either in the latter end of that year or the ensuing January, I was placed at poor old Williams’s, whom, as that expression indicates, I remember with feelings of good will. I had commenced poetry before this,—at how early an age I cannot call to mind. . . . The discovery that I could write rhymes gave me great pleasure, which was in no slight degree heightened when I perceived that my mother was not only pleased with what I produced, but proud of it. . . . Nothing could be more propitious for me, considering my aptitudes and tendency of mind, than Miss Tyler’s predilection—I might almost call it passion—for the theater. Owing to this, Shakespeare was in my hands as soon as I could read; and it was long before I had any other knowledge of the history of England than what I gathered from his plays."

After a boy's experience at two or three schools, he was sent in 1788 to Westminster. He remained there four years. It would have been longer had he not undertaken, in a schoolboys' paper called "The Flagellant," to prove from the church fathers and the ancients that flogging was an invention of the devil. He was privately expelled.

An uncle befriended him now, and Southey entered Balliol College. His father had died a little before. "I left Westminster in a perilous state," he wrote years afterwards,—"a heart full of feeling and poetry, a head full of Rousseau and Werther, and my religious principles shaken by Gibbon. Many circumstances tended to give me a wrong bias, none to lead me right, except adversity, the wholesomest of all discipline. . . . A severe system of stoical morality came to its aid. I made Epictetus, for many months, literally my manual. The French Revolution was then in its full career. I went to Oxford in January, 1793, a stoic and republican. . . . Here I became intimate with Edmund Seward, whose death was the first of those privations which have, in great measure, weaned my heart from the world. He confirmed in me all that was good. Time and reflection, the blessings and the sorrows of life, and, I hope I may add with unfeigned humility, the grace of God, have done the rest."

At Oxford he met Coleridge. Both were poets, young, ambitious, sympathetic; and both had formed schemes. "In March," Southey wrote his brother in 1794, "we [about sixteen enthusiasts] depart for America. . . . My aunt knows nothing as yet of my intended plan; it will surprise her, but not very agreeably. . . . Coleridge was with us nearly five weeks, and made good use of his time. We preached pantisocracy and aspheterism everywhere. These, Tom, are two new words, the first signifying the equal government of all, and the other the generalization of individual property, — words well understood in the city of Bristol.”

The scheme failed, and Southey earned his living for a time by lecturing on history. He had already written his poem “Joan of Arc.” Not long after this he married Edith Fricker, and spent six months with his uncle in Portugal. Returning, he took up the study of law. “I love study — devotedly I love it,” he wrote an old friend in 1799; “but in legal studies it is only the subtlety of the mind that is exercised. I am not indolent — I loathe indolence; but, indeed, reading law is laborious indolence; it is thrashing straw. I have read and read and read; but the devil a bit can I remember. I have given all possible attention, and attempted to command volition. No! the eyes read, the lips pronounced, I understood and reread it; it was very clear; I remembered the page, the sentence, — but close the book and all was gone!”

He became private secretary; and finally in 1803, after much tossing hither and thither, he settled at Greta Hall, Keswick, and entered upon his life of literary labor. Here Coleridge, his wife’s brother-in-law, was his neighbor; and not far away lived Wordsworth, by whose writings that entire region, familiarly known as the “Lake Country,” has ever since been colored with the ineffable light of poetry.

Southey was one of the most industrious of men. “Three pages of history after breakfast,” he wrote, “(equivalent to five in small quarto printing); these to transcribe and copy for the press, or to make my selections and biographies [for ‘Specimens of the English Poets’], or what else suits my humor, till dinner time; from dinner till tea I read, write letters, see the newspaper, and very often indulge in a siesta. . . . After tea I go to poetry [perhaps 'The Curse of Kehama,' on which he was at this time engaged], and correct and rewrite and copy till I am tired, and then turn to anything else till supper. And this is my life." And at another time: "I am a quiet, patient, easy-going hack of the mule breed, regular as clockwork in my pace, sure-footed, bearing the burden which is laid upon me, and only obstinate in choosing my path. If Gifford could see me by this fireside, where, like Nicodemus, one candle suffices me in a large room, he would see a man in a coat still more threadbare than his own, . . . working hard and getting little—a bare maintenance, and hardly that; writing poems and history for posterity with his whole heart and soul; and daily progressing in learning,—not so learned as he is poor, not so poor as proud, not so proud as happy."

His industry produced more than a hundred volumes. He was pensioned for his literary labor, and afterwards made poet laureate. He refused an offer of a position as editorial writer for the "Times," and also a baronetcy which the government tendered him towards the end of his useful life.

At Keswick his children were born, and there his first wife died. His marriage to his old friend and correspondent, the poetess Caroline Bowles, was in 1839. But his work was done. Prolonged weakness, or paresis, came upon him, and he died in 1843.

"Southey," wrote Ticknor, the distinguished American scholar, when he visited him at Keswick in 1819—"Southey is certainly an extraordinary man; one of those whose character I find it difficult to comprehend, because I hardly know how such elements can be brought together,—such rapidity of mind with such patient labor and wearisome exactness; so mild a disposition with so much nervous excitability; and a poetical talent so elevated with such an immense mass of minute, dull learning.”

“What makes the life of Southey eminent and singular,” writes Professor Dowden, “is its unity of purpose, its persistent devotion to a chosen object, its simplicity, purity, loyalty, fortitude, kindness, truth.” His niece, Sara Coleridge, who lived much in his house, said that he was the best man she had ever known.

In his time Nelson was the hero of the English people. He was idolized in life, and after he died his apotheosis was almost complete. His courage and fidelity, his devotion to the furtherance of British empire by sea, his simplicity, his directness, his outspoken and unaffected piety, made entire appeal to their nature. In the battle of the Nile, his signal victory over an enemy who had until then never been vanquished, first brought him to their knowledge; his achievements in the battle of Copenhagen against the activity of the same power set him strong in their affections; and finally, when, after five weeks of battling with wind and sea, his body was brought home from Trafalgar, he was held as the martyred hero by whose death the power of the enemy had been broken and the sea glory of England raised to its greatest height. Popular grief was intense. Nothing served to express the fervor but a public funeral, the ceremonial of which, men of his time say, was one of the most impressive and magnificent ever witnessed in Europe.

This was in 1806. Nelson's work had been too great and too lasting for the interest of the people speedily to die out. They asked more facts about their hero than the chapbooks hawked about the streets for a penny could tell. "Many lives of Nelson have been written," said Southey, in his first preface. "One is yet wanting, clear and concise enough to become a manual for the young sailor, which he may carry about with him till he has treasured up the example in his memory and in his heart. In attempting such a work I shall write the eulogy of our great naval hero; for the best eulogy of Nelson is the faithful history of his actions, the best history that which shall relate them most perspicuously."

With this idea Southey began the work. "To-day," he wrote on the 11th of October, 1811, to his brother, Captain Southey, "I resume the long-suspended 'Life of Nelson,' which I shall bring on, that Murray may not lose the spring sale." On the 30th of December, 1812, he wrote again: "I am such a lubber that I feel half ashamed of myself for being persuaded ever even to review the 'Life of Nelson,' much more to write one. Had I not been a thorough lubber I should have remembered half a hundred things worthy of remembrance, which have all been lost, because, though I do know the binnacle from the mainmast, I know little more; 'tackle' and 'sheet' and 'tally' and 'belay' are alike to me; and if you ask me about the lee-clue garnet, I can only tell they are not the same kind of garnets that are worn in necklaces and bracelets."

The value, then, of this "Life" is not that Southey, the writer, was versed in seamen's vernacular. It is primarily that it is Nelson's life, and secondarily that it is written in the easy, flexible, harmonious style which Southey used in biographical writing. It is the "pedestrian" style which rises to heights with its subject. "I do not think uniformity of style desirable," he wrote; "it should rise and fall with its subject." He is clear and unaffected in what he says, and moves from action to action of his hero with open eyes and swinging gait, and, we should add, with loving and approving heart. Whatever excesses he shows are due to the prejudices of a contemporary who hated Napoleon's French, and feared them as the triumphant military power of the time, and whose nature had reacted to the strong conservatism which characterized the second half of Southey's life.

He knew the art of good writing. "There may be secrets in painting," he wrote, "but there are none in style. When I have been asked the foolish question what a young man should do who wishes to acquire a good style, my answer is that he should never think about it, but say what he has to say as perspicuously as he can and as briefly as he can, and then the style will take care of itself." "People talk of my style! I have only endeavored to write plain English, and to put my thoughts into language which every one can understand."

In reading the life of Nelson the student should follow on maps the movements of the hero and the men he led.

THE LIFE OF NELSON.

3492

972.07B

CHAPTER I.

Nelson's birth and boyhood.— He is entered on board the Raisonnable.— Goes to the West Indies in a merchant ship; then serves in the Triumph.— He sails in Captain Phipps's voyage of discovery.— Goes to the East Indies in the Seahorse, and returns in ill health.— Serves as acting lieutenant in the Worcester, and is made lieutenant into the Lowestoffe, commander into the Badger brig, and post into the Hinchinbrook.— Expedition against the Spanish Main.— Sent to the North Seas in the Albemarle.— Services during the American war.

HORATIO, son of Edmund and Catherine Nelson, was born September 29, 1758, in the parsonage house of Burnham Thorpe, a village in the county of Norfolk, of which his father was rector. The maiden name of his mother was Suckling; her grandmother was an elder sister of Sir Robert Walpole,¹ and this child was named after his godfather, the first Lord Walpole. Mrs. Nelson died in 1767, leaving eight out of eleven children. Her brother, Captain Maurice Suckling, of the navy, visited the widower upon this event, and promised to take care of one of the boys. Three years afterwards, when Horatio was only twelve years of age, being at home during the Christmas holidays, he read in the county newspaper that his uncle was appointed to the Raisonnable,¹ of 64 guns. "Do, William," said he to a brother who was a year and a half older than himself, "write to my father, and tell him that I should like to go to sea with Uncle Maurice." Mr. Nelson was then at Bath, whither he had gone for the recovery of his health; his circumstances were straitened, and he had no prospect of ever seeing them bettered; he knew that it was the wish of providing for himself by which Horatio was chiefly actuated, and did not oppose his resolution; he understood, also, the boy's character, and had always said that in whatever station he might be placed he would climb, if possible, to the very top of the tree. Accordingly Captain Suckling was written to. "What," said he in his answer, "has poor Horatio done, who is so weak, that he, above all the rest, should be sent to rough it out at sea? But let him come; and the first time we go into action a cannon ball may knock off his head, and provide for him at once."

¹ Sir Robert Walpole (1676–1745), made First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1721 by George I., was at the head of the government until 1741. He maintained himself through his persistent policy of peace with the enemies of England and discouragement of all dissension in church and home affairs. His expression, "All men have their price," may be taken as a fair indication of the temper of his policy and of his honesty.

It is manifest from these words that Horatio was not the boy whom his uncle would have chosen to bring up in his own profession. He was never of a strong body; and the ague, which at that time² was one of the most common diseases in England, had greatly reduced his strength; yet he had already given proofs of that resolute heart and nobleness of mind which, during his whole career of labor and of glory, so eminently distinguished him. When a mere child, he strayed bird's-nesting from his grandmother's house in company with a cowboy.³ The dinner hour elapsed; he was absent, and could not be found; and the alarm of the family became very great, for they apprehended that he might have been carried off by the gypsies. At length, after search had been made for him in various directions, he was discovered alone, sitting composedly by the side of a brook, which he could not get over. "I wonder, child," said the old lady, when she saw him, "that hunger and fear did not drive you home." "Fear, grandmamma?" replied the future hero; "I never saw fear; what is it?" Once, after the winter holidays, when he and his brother William had set off on horseback to return to school, they came back, because there had been a fall of snow; and William, who did not much like the journey, said it was too deep for them to venture on. "If that be the case," said the father, "you certainly shall not go; but make another attempt, and I will leave it to your honor. If the road is dangerous, you may return; but remember, boys, I leave it to your honor." The snow was deep enough to have afforded them a reasonable excuse; but Horatio was not to be prevailed upon to turn back. "We must go on," said he; "remember, brother, it was left to our honor!" There were some fine pears growing in the schoolmaster's garden, which the boys regarded as lawful booty, and in the highest degree tempting; but the boldest among them were afraid to venture for the prize. Horatio volunteered upon this service; he was lowered down at night from the bedroom window by some sheets, plundered the tree, was drawn up with the pears, and then distributed them among his schoolfellows, without reserving any for himself. "He only took them," he said, "because every other boy was afraid."

¹ This French name (meaning "reasonable") points to a former French ownership. The English sometimes used captured ships.

² Many fens and marshes in England have, since Southey wrote, been drained, the lands reclaimed, and the ague is now less common.

³ A cowboy, in England, was one who drove cows to and from pasture.

Early on a cold and dark spring morning Mr. Nelson's servant arrived at this school at North Walsham with the expected summons for Horatio to join his ship. The parting from his brother William, who had been for so many years his playmate and bed-fellow, was a painful effort, and was the beginning of those privations which are the sailor's lot through life. He accompanied his father to London. The Raisonnable was lying in the Medway.¹ He was put into the Chatham stage,² and on its arrival was set down with the rest of the passengers and left to find his way on board as he could. While he was wandering about in the cold, without being able to reach the ship, an officer observed the forlorn appearance of the boy, questioned him, and happening to be acquainted with his uncle, took him home and gave him some refreshments. When he got on board, Captain Suckling was not in the ship, nor had any person been apprised of the boy's coming. He paced the deck the whole remainder of the day, without being noticed by any one; and it was not till the second day that somebody, as he expressed it, "took compassion" on him. The pain which is felt when we are first transplanted from our native soil—when the living branch is cut from the parent tree—is one of the most poignant which we have to endure through life. There are after griefs which wound more deeply, which leave behind them scars never to be effaced, which bruise the spirit and sometimes break the heart; but never, never do we feel so keenly the want of love, the necessity of being loved, and the sense of utter desertion, as when we first leave the haven of home, and are, as it were, pushed off upon the stream of life. Added to these feelings the sea boy has to endure physical hardships, and the privation of every comfort, even of sleep. Nelson had a feeble body and an affectionate heart, and he remembered through life his first days of wretchedness in the service.

¹ A river of Kent, which widens into an estuary just below the mouth of the Thames.

² Running between London and Chatham, a town in Kent, on the Medway.

The Raisonnable, having been commissioned¹ on account of the dispute respecting the Falkland Islands,² was paid off as soon as the difference with the court of Spain was accommodated, and Captain Suckling was removed to the Triumph, 74,³ then stationed as a guard ship in the Thames. This was considered as too inactive a life for a boy, and Nelson was therefore sent a voyage to the West Indies in a merchant ship commanded by Mr. John Rathbone, an excellent seaman, who had served as master's mate¹ under Captain Suckling in the Dreadnaught. He returned a practical seaman, but with a hatred of the king's service, and a saying then common among the sailors: "Aft, the most honor; forward, the better man."² Rathbone had probably been disappointed and disgusted in the navy; and, with no unfriendly intentions, warned Nelson against a profession which he himself had found hopeless. His uncle received him on board the Triumph on his return, and discovering his dislike to the navy, took the best means of reconciling him to it. He held it out as a reward, that if he attended well to his navigation he should go in the cutter³ and decked longboat which were attached to the commanding officer's ship at Chatham. Thus he became a good pilot for vessels of that description from Chatham to the Tower, and down the Swin Channel to the North Foreland,⁴ and acquired a confidence among rocks and sands of which he often felt the value.

¹ Fitted out and manned for service.

² England and Spain claimed these islands in the South Atlantic, and both countries prepared armed fleets to contest their rights. In 1771 Spain yielded to the claims of Great Britain.

³ Carrying 74 guns.

Nelson had not been many months on board the Triumph when his love of enterprise was excited by hearing that two ships were fitting out for a voyage of discovery towards the north pole. In consequence of the difficulties which were expected on such a service, these vessels were to take out effective men, instead of the usual number of boys. This, however, did not deter him from soliciting to be received, and by his uncle's interest he was admitted as cockswain⁵ under Captain Lutwidge, sec-

¹ "Master's mate," i.e., assistant of the sailing master, who acts under orders of the captain.

² The quarters of the officers were near the stern,—"aft;" those of the common sailors in the bow,—"forward."

³ A boat with a double bank of oars carried by ships of war.

⁴ "The Tower" is the famous London Tower, at one time a palace and afterwards a prison. Southey means from Chatham down through the mouth of the Medway, and up the Thames to London; and down the coast of Kent to the North Foreland, which is the northeast point of Kent.

⁵ One who has charge, under an officer, of a small boat and its crew.

ond in command. The voyage was undertaken in compliance with an application from the Royal Society.¹ The Hon. Captain Constantine John Phipps, eldest son of Lord Mulgrave, volunteered his services. The Racehorse and Carcass bombs² were selected as the strongest ships, and therefore best adapted for such a voyage; and they were taken into dock and strengthened, to render them as secure as possible against the ice. Two masters of Greenlandmen³ were employed as pilots for each ship. No expedition was ever more carefully fitted out; and the First Lord of the Admiralty,⁴ Lord Sandwich, with a laudable solicitude, went on board himself, before their departure, to see that everything had been completed to the wish of the officers. The ships were provided with a simple and excellent apparatus for distilling fresh from salt water, the invention of Dr. Irving, who accompanied the expedition. It consisted merely in fitting a tube to the ship's kettle, and applying a wet mop to the surface as the vapor was passing. By these means from thirty-four to forty gallons were produced every day.

They sailed from the Nore⁵ on the 4th of June;⁶ on the 6th of the following month they were in latitude $79^{\circ} 56' 39''$, longitude $9^{\circ} 43' 30''$ E. The next day, about the place where most of the old discoverers had been stopped, the Racehorse was beset with ice; but they heaved her through with ice anchors.⁷ Captain Phipps continued ranging along the ice northward and westward till the 24th; he then tried to the eastward. On the 30th

¹ The Royal Society is an association of men for the furthering of mathematical and physical science. It refers its foundation to the year 1645,—the time of Charles I.

² Small war vessels which carry mortars (short, heavy cannon) for throwing bombs.

³ Whaling ships off the coast of Greenland.

⁴ The chief of the lords commissioners appointed to manage all affairs of, and to govern, the royal navy.

⁵ A part of the estuary of the Thames. ⁶ 1773.

⁷ "Ice anchors," i.e., iron hooks by which a ship is anchored to ice or dragged through ice floes.

he was in latitude $80^{\circ} 13'$, longitude $18^{\circ} 48'$ E., among the islands and in the ice, with no appearance of an opening for the ships. The weather was exceedingly fine, mild, and unusually clear. Here they were becalmed in a large bay, with three apparent openings between the islands which formed it, but everywhere, as far as they could see, surrounded with ice. There was not a breath of air; the water was perfectly smooth, the ice covered with snow, low and even, except a few broken pieces near the edge, and the pools of water in the middle of the ice fields were just crusted over with young ice. On the next day the ice closed upon them, and no opening was to be seen anywhere, except a hole, or lake as it might be called, of about a mile and a half in circumference, where the ships lay fast to the ice with their ice anchors. They filled their casks with water from these ice fields, which was very pure and soft. The men were playing on the ice all day; but the Greenland pilots, who were farther than they had ever been before, and considered that the season was advancing, were alarmed at being thus beset.

The next day there was not the smallest opening; the ships were within less than two lengths of each other, separated by ice, and neither having room to turn. The ice, which yesterday had been all flat and almost level with the water's edge, was now in many places forced higher than the main yard,¹ by the pieces squeezing together. A day of thick fog followed; it was succeeded by clear weather, but the passage by which the ships had entered from the westward was closed, and no open water was in sight either in that, or any other, quarter. By the pilots' advice, the men were set to work to cut a passage, and warp² through the small openings to the westward. They sawed through pieces twelve feet thick; and this labor continued the whole day, during which their utmost efforts did not move the ships above three hundred yards; while they were driven, together with the ice, far to the northeast and east by the current. Sometimes a field of several acres square would be lifted up between two larger islands,¹ and incorporated with them; and thus these larger pieces continued to grow by aggregation. Another day passed, and there seemed no probability of getting the ships out without a strong east or northeast wind. The season was far advanced, and every hour lessened the chance of extricating themselves. Young as he was, Nelson was appointed to command one of the boats which were sent out to explore a passage into the open water. It was the means of saving a boat belonging to the Racehorse from a singular but imminent danger. Some of the officers had fired at and wounded a walrus. As no other animal has so humanlike an expression in its countenance, so also is there none that seems to possess more of the passions of humanity. The wounded one dived immediately, and brought up a number of its companions; and they all joined in an attack upon the boat. They wrested an oar from one of the men; and it was with the utmost difficulty that the crew could prevent them from staving or upsetting her till the Carcass's boat came up, and the walruses, finding their enemies thus reënforced, dispersed. Young Nelson exposed himself in a more daring manner. One night, during the midwatch,² he stole from the ship with one of his comrades, taking advantage of a rising fog, and set out over the ice in pursuit of a bear. It was not long before they were missed. The fog thickened, and Captain Lutwidge and his officers became exceedingly alarmed for their safety. Between three and four in the morning the weather cleared, and the two adventurers were seen, at a considerable distance from the ship, attacking a huge bear. The signal for them to return was immediately made; Nelson's comrade called upon him to obey it, but in vain; his musket had flashed in the pan,³ their ammunition was expended, and a chasm in the ice, which divided him from the bear, probably preserved his life. "Never mind," he cried; "do but let me get a blow at this devil with the butt end of my musket, and we shall have him." Captain Lutwidge, however, seeing his danger, fired a gun, which had the desired effect of frightening the beast; and the boy then returned, somewhat afraid of the consequences of his trespass. The captain reprimanded him sternly for conduct so unworthy of the office which he filled, and desired to know what motive he could have for hunting a bear. "Sir," said he, pouting his lip, as he was wont to do when agitated, "I wished to kill the bear that I might carry the skin to my father."

¹ "Main yard," i.e., the yard supporting the lower sail of the mainmast.

² To haul the ship by rope, or warp, which has been fastened at some fixed point.

¹ Of ice.

² Middle watch, from midnight to four o'clock.

³ In the old flintlock the iron pan held the priming, which, fired by the flint, ignited the charge through the touchhole. "Flashed in the pan," i.e., the powder in the pan had burned without igniting that in the barrel.

A party were now sent to an island about twelve miles off (named Walden's Island in the charts, from the midshipman who was intrusted with this service), to see where the open water lay. They came back on the 6th, with information that the ice, though close all about them, was open to the westward, round the point by which they came in. They said, also, that upon the island they had had a fresh east wind. This intelligence considerably abated the hopes of the crew; for where they lay it had been almost calm, and their main dependence had been upon the effect of an easterly wind in clearing the bay. There was but one alternative,—either to wait the event of the weather upon the ships, or to betake themselves to the boats. The likelihood that it might be necessary to sacrifice the ships had been foreseen; the boats, accordingly, were adapted, both in number and size, to transport, in case of emergency, the whole crew; and there were Dutch whalers upon the coast, in which they could all be conveyed to Europe. As for wintering where they were, that dreadful experiment had been already tried too often. No time was to be lost; the ships had driven into shoal water, having but fourteen fathoms. Should they, or the ice to which they were fast, take the ground,¹ they must inevitably be lost; and at this time they were driving fast towards some rocks on the northeast.

¹ "Take the ground," i.e., touch bottom, and be stranded.

Captain Phipps sent for the officers of both ships, and told them his intention of preparing the boats for going away. They were immediately hoisted out, and the fitting began. Canvas bread bags were made, in case it should be necessary suddenly to desert the vessels; and men were sent with the lead and line¹ to the northward and eastward, to sound wherever they found cracks in the ice, that they might have notice before the ice took the ground; for, in that case, the ships must instantly have been crushed or overset.

On the 7th of August they began to haul the boats over the ice, Nelson having command of the four-oared cutter. The men behaved excellently well, like true British seamen; they seemed reconciled to the thought of leaving the ships, and had full confidence in their officers. About noon the ice appeared rather more open near the vessels; and as the wind was easterly, though there was but little of it, the sails were set, and they got about a mile to the westward. They moved very slowly, and were not now nearly so far to the westward as when they were first beset. However, all sail was kept upon them, to force them through whenever the ice slacked the least. Whatever exertions were made, it could not be possible to get the boats to the water edge before the 14th; and if the situation of the ships should not alter by that time, it would not be justifiable to stay longer by them. The commander therefore resolved to carry on both attempts together, moving the boats constantly, and taking every opportunity of getting the ships through. A party was sent out next day to the westward, to examine the state of the ice; they returned with tidings that it was very heavy and close, consisting chiefly of large fields. The ships, however, moved something,² and the ice itself was drifting westward. There was a thick fog, so that it was impossible to ascertain what advantage had been gained. It continued on the 9th, but the ships were moved a little through some very small openings; the mist cleared off in the afternoon, and it was then perceived that they had driven much more than could have been expected to the westward, and that the ice itself had driven still farther. In the course of the day they got past the boats, and took them on board again. On the morrow the wind sprang up to the north-northeast. All sail was set, and the ships forced their way through a great deal of very heavy ice. They frequently struck, and with such force that one stroke broke the shank of the Racehorse's best bower anchor;¹ but the vessels made way, and by noon they had cleared the ice and were out at sea. The next day they anchored in Smeerenberg Harbor, close to that island of which the westernmost point is called Hakluyt's Headland, in honor of the great promoter and compiler² of our English voyages of discovery.

¹ "Lead and line," i.e., a line with lead at the end, for sounding, or measuring, the depth of the sea.

² Somewhat; a little.

Here they remained a few days, that the men might rest after their fatigue. No insect was to be seen in this dreary country, nor any species of reptile,—not even the common earthworm. Large bodies of ice, called icebergs,³ filled up the valleys between high mountains, so dark as, when contrasted with the snow, to appear black. The color of the ice was a lively light green. Opposite to the place where they fixed their observatory was one of these icebergs, above three hundred feet high; its side towards the sea was nearly perpendicular, and a stream of water issued from it. Large pieces frequently broke off and thundered down into the sea. There was no thunder nor lightning during the whole time they were in these latitudes. The sky was generally loaded with hard white clouds, from which it was never entirely free even in the clearest weather. They always knew when they were approaching the ice long before they saw it, by a bright appearance near the horizon, which the Greenlandmen called the "blink" of the ice. The season was now so far advanced that nothing more could have been attempted, if, indeed, anything had been left untried; but the summer had been unusually favorable, and they had carefully surveyed the wall of ice extending for more than twenty degrees between the latitudes of 80° and 81° , without the smallest appearance of any opening.

¹ A bower anchor is the anchor carried at the bow of the ship; and the best bower was the larger of the two. Nowadays it is called the "starboard bower."

² Richard Hakluyt (1553-1616) was a famous English geographer who collected accounts of many voyages made in his time. His first published work was Divers Voyages touching the Discoverie of America.

³ These are now called glaciers, and are merely rivers of ice. As they move into the sea and are broken off by the force of the water, they become floating masses, or icebergs.

The ships were paid off shortly after their return to England; and Nelson was then placed by his uncle with Captain Farmer, in the Seahorse, of 20 guns, then going out to the East Indies in the squadron under Sir Edward Hughes. He was stationed in the foretop¹ at watch and watch.² His good conduct attracted the attention of the master (afterwards Captain Surridge) in whose watch he was; and, upon his recommendation, the captain rated him as midshipman.³ At this time his countenance was florid, and his appearance rather stout and athletic; but when he had been about eighteen months in India, he felt the effects of that climate, so perilous to European constitutions. The disease baffled all power of medicine; he was reduced almost to a skeleton, the use of his limbs was for some time entirely lost, and the only hope that remained was from a voyage home. Accordingly he was brought home by Captain Pigot, in the Dolphin; and had it not been for the attentive and careful kindness of that officer on the way, Nelson would never have lived to reach his native shores. He had formed acquaintance with Sir Charles Pole, Sir

¹ The top of the mainmast.

² "Watch and watch" is the alternation of watches kept during twenty-four hours. From twelve to four in the afternoon is the afternoon watch; from four to six, the first dog watch; from six to eight, the second dog watch; from eight to twelve, the first night watch; from twelve to four, the middle watch; from four to eight, the morning watch; from eight to twelve, the forenoon watch.

³ "Rated him as midshipman," i.e., gave him the rank of midshipman, which is next to the lowest rank of English naval officers.

Thomas Trowbridge, and other distinguished officers, then, like himself, beginning their career; he had left them pursuing that career in full enjoyment of health and hope, and was returning from a country in which all things were to him new and interesting, with a body broken down by sickness and spirits which had sunk with his strength.

Long afterwards, when the name of Nelson was known as widely as that of England itself, he spoke of the feelings which he at this time endured. "I felt impressed," said he, "with a feeling that I should never rise in my profession. My mind was staggered with a view of the difficulties I had to surmount, and the little interest I possessed. I could discover no means of reaching the object of my ambition. After a long and gloomy reverie, in which I almost wished myself overboard, a sudden glow of patriotism was kindled within me, and presented my king and country as my patron. 'Well, then,' I exclaimed, 'I will be a hero; and, confiding in Providence, I will brave every danger!'" Long afterwards Nelson loved to speak of the feeling of that moment; and from that time, he often said, a radiant orb was suspended in his mind's eye, which urged him onward to renown. The state of mind in which these feelings began is what the mystics¹ mean by their season of darkness, of aridity, and of desertion. If the animal spirits of coarser enthusiasts fail, they represent it as an actual temptation, a snare of Satan. The enthusiasm of Nelson's nature had taken a different direction, but in its essence it was the same. He knew to what the previous state of dejection was to be attributed,—that an enfeebled body and a mind depressed had cast this shade over his soul; but he always seemed willing to believe that the sunshine which succeeded bore with it a prophetic glory, and that the light which led him on was "light from heaven."

His interest, however, was far better than he imagined. During his absence, Captain Suckling had been made Comptroller of the Navy;¹ his health had materially improved upon the voyage; and, as soon as the Dolphin was paid off, he was appointed acting lieutenant in the Worcester, 64, Captain Mark Robinson, then going out with convoy² to Gibraltar. Soon after his return, on the 8th of April, 1777, he passed his examination for a lieutenancy. Captain Suckling sat at the head of the board, and when the examination had ended, in a manner highly honorable to Nelson, rose from his seat and introduced him to the examining captains as his nephew. They expressed their wonder that he had not informed them of this relationship before. He replied that he did not wish the youngster³ to be favored; he knew his nephew would pass a good examination, and he had not been deceived. The next day Nelson received his commission as second lieutenant of the Lowestoffe frigate,⁴ Captain William Locker, then fitting out for Jamaica.

¹ Those who believe that they hold direct and conscious intercourse with God, through their own souls, by a kind of ecstasy.

American and French privateers,⁵ under American colors, were at that time harassing our trade in the West Indies; even a frigate was not sufficiently active for Nelson, and he repeatedly got appointed to the command of one of the Lowestoffe's tenders.⁶ During one of their cruises the Lowestoffe captured an American letter of marque;⁷ it was blowing a gale, and a heavy sea running. The first lieutenant, being ordered to board the prize, went below to put on his hanger.⁸ It happened to be mislaid,

1 The officer who kept the accounts and superintended the building, repairing, and victualing of ships.

2 That which is escorted or protected; here, doubtless, it means merchantmen.

3 Youngster.

4 A vessel, smaller than a regular battle ship, which carried her guns on deck and was a fast sailer and good fighter.

5 Armed vessels owned and officered by private persons for preying upon merchantmen. The French were under American colors because France was nominally at peace with England.

6 Vessels, which attend a larger one.

7 A privateer with a letter of marque, or commission, granting the right to seize the property of a hostile country or of its subjects.

8 A short sword worn by seamen.

and while he was seeking it Captain Locker came on deck. Perceiving the boat still alongside, and in danger every moment of being swamped, and being extremely anxious that the privateer should be instantly taken in charge, because he feared that it would otherwise founder, he exclaimed, "Have I no officer in the ship who can board the prize?" Nelson did not offer himself immediately, waiting, with his usual sense of propriety, for the first lieutenant's return; but hearing the master volunteer, he jumped into the boat, saying, "It is my turn now; and if I come back, it is yours." The American, which had carried a heavy press of sail in hope of escaping, was so completely waterlogged¹ that the Lowestoffe's boat went in on deck, and out again, with the sea.

About this time he lost his uncle. Captain Locker, however, who had perceived the excellent qualities of Nelson, and formed a friendship for him which continued during his life, recommended him warmly to Sir Peter Parker, then commander in chief upon that station. In consequence of this recommendation he was removed into the Bristol flagship, and Lieutenant Cuthbert Collingwood succeeded him in the Lowestoffe. He soon became first lieutenant; and on the 8th of December, 1778, was appointed commander of the Badger brig, Collingwood again succeeding him in the Bristol. While the Badger was lying in Montego Bay, Jamaica, the Glasgow, of 20 guns, came in and anchored there, and in two hours was in flames, the steward having set fire to her while stealing rum out of the after-hold.² Her crew were leaping into the water, when Nelson came up in his boats, made them throw their powder overboard and point their guns upward, and, by his presence of mind and personal exertions, prevented the loss of life which would otherwise have ensued. On the 11th of June, 1779, he was made post³ into the Hinchinbrook, of 28 guns, an enemy's merchantman, sheathed with wood, which had been taken into the service. A short time after he left the Lowestoffe, that ship, with a small squadron, stormed the fort of San Fernando de Omoa, on the south side of the Bay of Honduras, and captured some register ships¹ which were lying under its guns. Two hundred and fifty quintals of quicksilver and three millions of piasters² were the reward of this enterprise; and it is characteristic of Nelson that the chance by which he missed a share in such a prize is never mentioned in any of his letters; nor is it likely that it ever excited even a momentary feeling of vexation.

¹ Filled with water and unmanageable, though still keeping afloat.

² The part of the hold which lies between the mainmast and the stern.

³ "Made post," i.e., raised to the rank of post-captain, entitled to rank of full captain by his post or appointment.

Nelson was fortunate in possessing good interest at the time when it could be most serviceable to him; his promotion had been almost as rapid as it could be; and before he had attained the age of twenty-one he had gained that rank which brought all the honors of the service within his reach. No opportunity, indeed, had yet been given him of distinguishing himself; but he was thoroughly master of his profession, and his zeal and ability were acknowledged wherever he was known. Count d'Estaing, with a fleet of 125 sail, men-of-war and transports, and a reputed force of five and twenty thousand men, threatened Jamaica from San Domingo. Nelson offered his services to the admiral and to Governor General Dalling, and was appointed to command the batteries of Fort Charles, at Port Royal. Not more than seven thousand men could be mustered for the defense of the island,—a number wholly inadequate to resist the force which threatened them. Of this Nelson was so well aware that when he wrote to his friends in England he told them they must not be surprised to hear of his learning to speak French. D'Estaing, however, was either not aware of his own superiority, or not equal to the command with which he was intrusted. He attempted nothing with this formidable armament; and General

¹ "Register ships," i.e., ships that had been registered when commissioned to trade.

² A Spanish piaster is a silver coin worth about one dollar.

Dalling was thus left to execute a project which he had formed against the Spanish colonies.

This project was to take Fort San Juan, on the river of that name, which flows from Lake Nicaragua into the Atlantic; make himself master of the lake itself, and of the cities of Granada and Leon; and thus cut off the communication of the Spaniards between their northern and southern possessions in America. Here it is that a canal¹ between the two seas may most easily be formed,—a work more important in its consequences than any which has ever yet been effected by human power. Lord George Germaine, at that time Secretary of State for the American department, approved the plan; and as discontents at that time were known to prevail in the Nuevo Reyno, in Popayan, and in Peru, the more sanguine part of the English began to dream of acquiring an empire in one part of America, more extensive than that which they were on the point of losing in another. General Dalling's plans were well formed; but the history and the nature of the country had not been studied as accurately as its geography. The difficulties which occurred in fitting out the expedition delayed it till the season was too far advanced; and the men were thus sent to adventure themselves,² not so much against an enemy whom they would have beaten, as against a climate which would do the enemy's work.

Early in the year 1780, five hundred men, destined for this service, were convoyed by Nelson from Port Royal to Cape Gracias-á-Dios, in Honduras. Not a native was to be seen when they landed; they had been taught that the English came with no other intent than that of enslaving them and sending them to Jamaica. After a while, however, one of them ventured down, confiding in his knowledge of one of the party; and by his means the neighboring tribes were conciliated with presents, and brought in. The troops were encamped on a swampy and unwholesome plain, where they were joined by a party of the seventy-ninth regiment, from Black River, who were already in a deplorable state of sickness. Having remained here a month, they proceeded, anchoring frequently, along the Mosquito shore, to collect their Indian allies, who were to furnish proper boats for the river, and to accompany them. They reached the river San Juan on the 24th of March; and here, according to his orders, Nelson's services were to terminate; but not a man in the expedition had ever been up the river, or knew the distances of any fortification from its mouth; and he, not being one who would turn back when so much was to be done, resolved to carry the soldiers up. About two hundred, therefore, were embarked in the Mosquito shore craft and in two of the Hinchinbrook's boats, and they began their way. It was the latter end of the dry season,—the worst time for such an expedition; the river was consequently low. Indians were sent forward through narrow channels between shoals and sand banks; and the men were frequently obliged to quit the boats, and exert their utmost strength to drag or thrust them along. This labor continued for several days, then they came into deeper water; but then they had sometimes currents and rapids to contend with, which would have been insurmountable had it not been for the skill of the Indians in such difficulties. The brunt of the labor was borne by them, and by the sailors,—men never accustomed to stand aloof when any exertion of strength or hardihood is required. The soldiers, less accustomed to rely upon themselves, were of little use. But all equally endured the violent heat of the sun, rendered more intense by being reflected from the white shoals, and because the high woods on both sides of the river were frequently so close as to prevent all refreshing circulation of air; and during the night all were equally exposed to the heavy and unwholesome dews.

¹ A movement, backed by American capital, for the construction of this canal has been on foot for several years. Preliminary surveys have been made and some work accomplished.

² "Adventure themselves," i.e., expose themselves; run a risk.

On the 9th of April they reached an island in the river, called San Bartolomeo, which the Spaniards had fortified as an outpost, with a small semicircular battery, mounting nine or ten swivels, and manned with sixteen or eighteen men. It commanded the river in a rapid and difficult part of the navigation. Nelson, at the head of a few of his seamen, leaped upon the beach. The ground upon which he sprung was so muddy that he had some difficulty in extricating himself, and lost his shoes; barefooted, however, he advanced, and, in his own phrase, "boarded the battery." In this resolute attempt he was bravely supported by Despard, who was at that time a captain in the army, and whose after fate was so disastrous.¹ The castle of San Juan is situated about sixteen miles higher up; the stores and ammunition, however, were landed a few miles below the castle, and the men had to march through woods almost impassable. One of the men was bitten under the eye by a snake, which darted upon him from the bough of a tree. He was unable to proceed for the violence of the pain; and when, after a short while, some of his comrades were sent back to assist him, he was dead, and the body already putrid. Nelson himself narrowly escaped a similar fate. He had ordered his hammock to be slung under some trees, being excessively fatigued, and was sleeping, when a monitory lizard passed across his face. The Indians happily observed the reptile, and knowing what it indicated, awoke him. He started up, and found one of the deadliest serpents of the country coiled up at his feet. He suffered from poison of another kind; for, drinking at a spring in which some boughs of the manchineel² had been thrown, the effects were so severe as, in the opinion of some of his friends, to inflict a lasting injury upon his constitution.

The castle of San Juan is thirty-two miles below Lake Nicaragua, from which the river issues, and sixty-nine from the river's mouth. Boats reach the sea from thence in a day and a half; but their navigation back, even when unladen, is the labor of nine days. The English appeared before it on the 11th, two days after they had taken San Bartolomeo. Nelson's advice was that it should instantly be carried by assault; but Nelson was not the commander, and it was thought proper to observe all the formalities of a siege. Ten days were wasted before this could be commenced; it was a work more of fatigue than of danger; but fatigue was more to be dreaded than the enemy. The rains set in; and could the garrison have held out a little longer, disease would have rid them of their invaders. Even the Indians sunk under it, the victims of unusual exertion and of their own excesses. The place surrendered on the 24th. But victory procured to the conquerors none of that relief which had been expected; the castle was worse than a prison, and it contained nothing which could contribute to the recovery of the sick or the preservation of those who were yet unaffected. The huts, which served for hospitals, were surrounded with filth and with the putrefying hides of slaughtered cattle,—almost sufficient of themselves to have engendered pestilence; and when at last orders were given to erect a convenient hospital, the contagion had become so general that there were none who could work at it; for, besides the few who were able to perform garrison duty, there were not orderly¹ men enough to assist the sick. Added to these evils there was the want of all needful remedies; for though the expedition had been amply provided with hospital stores, river craft enough had not been procured for transporting the requisite baggage; and when much was to be left behind, provision for sickness was that which of all things men in health would be most ready to leave. Now, when these medicines were required, the river was swollen and so turbulent that its upward navigation was almost impracticable. At length even the task of burying the dead was more than the living could perform, and the bodies were tossed into the stream, or left for beasts of prey, and for the gallinazos,¹—those dreadful carrion birds, which do not always wait for death before they begin their work. Five months the English persisted in what may be called this war against nature; they then left a few men who seemed proof against the climate to retain the castle till the Spaniards should choose, when the fit season arrived, to retake it and make them prisoners. The rest abandoned their baleful conquest. Eighteen hundred men were sent to different posts upon this wretched expedition; not more than three hundred and eighty ever returned. The Hinchinbrook's complement consisted of two hundred men; eighty-seven took to their beds in one night, and of the whole crew not more than ten survived.

¹ He became Colonel Despard, and in 1802, having plotted to take the life of George III. and to overthrow the government, he was executed with seven other conspirators.

² A small tree found in the West Indies, Central America, and Florida. Its milky sap is poisonous.

¹ An attendant in a hospital whose duty it is to keep order among the patients, see to their wants, and preserve cleanliness.

Nelson himself was saved by a timely removal. In a few days after the commencement of the siege he was seized with the prevailing illness; meantime Captain Glover (son of the author of "Leonidas"²) died, and Nelson was appointed to succeed him in the Janus, of 44 guns. He returned to the harbor the day before San Juan surrendered, and immediately sailed for Jamaica in the sloop which brought the news of his appointment. He was, however, so greatly reduced by the disorder that when they reached Port Royal he was carried ashore in his cot; and finding himself, after a partial amendment, unable to retain the command of his new ship, he was compelled to ask leave to return to England, as the only means of recovery. Captain (afterwards Admiral) Cornwallis took him home in the Lion; and to his care and kindness Nelson believed himself indebted for his life. He went immediately to Bath, in a miserable state,—so helpless that he was carried to and from his bed, and the act of moving him produced the most violent pain. In three months he was recovered, and immediately he hastened to London and applied for employment. After an interval of about four months he was appointed to the Albemarle, of 28 guns, a French merchantman which had been purchased from the captors for the King's service.

¹ The South American name of a vulture, which may be either the turkey buzzard or the carrion crow.

² Richard Glover (1712–85), an English poet and merchant, wrote Leonidas to celebrate the defense of Thermopylæ. Its popularity led Glover to write other verses, among which was the Hosier's Ghost, a popular ballad.

His health was not yet thoroughly reëstablished; and while he was employed in getting his ship ready, he again became so ill as hardly to be able to keep out of bed. Yet in this state, still suffering from the fatal effect of a West Indian climate, as if, it might almost be supposed, he said, to try his constitution, he was sent to the Baltic Sea, and kept there the whole winter. The asperity with which he mentioned this so many years afterwards evinces how deeply he resented a mode of conduct equally cruel to the individual and detrimental to the service. It was during the Armed Neutrality;¹ and when they anchored off Elsinore, the Danish admiral sent on board, desiring to be informed what ships had arrived, and to have their force written down. "The Albemarle," said Nelson to the messenger, "is one of his Britannic Majesty's² ships. You are at liberty, sir, to count the guns as you go down the side; and you may assure the Danish admiral that, if necessary, they shall all be well served." During this voyage he gained a considerable knowledge of the Danish coast and its soundings, greatly to the advantage of his country in after times. The Albemarle was not a good ship, and was several times nearly overset, in consequence of the masts having been made much too long for her. On her return to England they were shortened, and some other improvements made, at Nelson's suggestion. Still he always insisted that her first owners, the French, had taught her to run away, as she was never a good sailer except when going directly before the wind.

On their return to the Downs,³ while he was ashore visiting the senior officer, there came on so heavy a gale that almost all the vessels drove,¹ and a storeship² came athwart hawse³ of the Albemarle. Nelson feared she would drive on the Goodwin Sands;⁴ he ran to the beach; but even the Deal⁵ boatmen thought it impossible to get on board, such was the violence of the storm. At length some of the most intrepid offered to make the attempt for fifteen guineas; and, to the astonishment and fear of all the beholders, he embarked during the height of the tempest. With great difficulty and imminent danger he succeeded in reaching her. She lost her bowsprit and foremast, but escaped further injury. He was now ordered to Quebec, where, his surgeon told him, he would certainly be laid up by the climate. Many of his friends urged him to represent this to Admiral Keppel; but, having received his orders from Lord Sandwich, there appeared to him an indelicacy in applying to his successor⁶ to have them altered.

¹ The Armed Neutrality was agreed to in 1780 for the protection of commerce during the war in North America. Russia proposed it, and Denmark, Sweden, Prussia, Austria, Spain, and Portugal assented. It demanded free passage of neutral ships, and of an enemy's goods contained in them.

² George III.

³ A well-known roadstead, or place where vessels may anchor, in the North Sea, between the coast of Kent and the Goodwin Sands.

Accordingly, he sailed for Canada. During her first cruise on that station the Albemarle captured a fishing schooner, which contained in her cargo nearly all the property that her master possessed, and the poor fellow had a large family at home anxiously expecting him. Nelson employed him as a pilot in Boston Bay, then restored him the schooner and cargo, and gave him a certificate to secure him against being captured by any other vessel. The man came off afterwards to the Albemarle, at the hazard of his life, with a present of sheep, poultry, and fresh provisions.

¹ Were driven before the wind.

² A vessel used to carry supplies for a fleet or garrison.

³ The part of the bow where are the hawse holes for the cables. The expression "athwart hawse" is used when one vessel lies or sails across the bow of another.

⁴ A sand bank off the coast of Kent, which forms the breakwater of the anchorage of the Downs.

⁵ A town of Kent in England, on the coast of the North Sea, near the southern extremity of the Downs. The skill and courage of Deal pilots are proverbial.

⁶ Admiral Keppel became First Lord of the Admiralty in 1782.

A most valuable supply it proved, for the scurvy¹ was raging on board. This was in the middle of August, and the ship's company had not had a fresh meal since the beginning of April. The certificate was preserved at Boston in memory of an act of unusual generosity; and now that the fame of Nelson has given interest to everything connected with his name, it is regarded as a relic.² The Albemarle had a narrow escape upon this cruise. Four French sail of the line³ and a frigate, which had come out of Boston Harbor, gave chase to her; and Nelson, perceiving that they beat him in sailing, boldly ran among the numerous shoals of St. George's Bank, confiding in his own skill in pilotage. Captain Salter, in the Santa Margareta, had escaped the French fleet by a similar maneuver not long before. The frigate alone continued warily to pursue him; but as soon as he perceived that this enemy was unsupported, he shortened sail and hove to; upon which the Frenchman thought it advisable to give over the pursuit and sail in quest of his consorts.

At Quebec Nelson became acquainted with Alexander Davison, by whose interference he was prevented from making what would have been called an imprudent marriage. The Albemarle was about to leave the station; her captain had taken leave of his friends, and was gone down the river to the place of anchorage; when the next morning, as Davison was walking on the beach, to his surprise he saw Nelson coming back in his boat. Upon inquiring the cause of this reappearance, Nelson took his arm to walk towards the town, and told him he found it utterly impossible to leave Quebec without again seeing the woman whose society had contributed so much to his happiness there, and offering her his hand. "If you do," said his friend, "your utter ruin must inevitably follow." "Then let it follow," cried Nelson, "for I am resolved to do it." "And I," replied Davison, "am resolved you shall not." Nelson, however, upon this occasion was less resolute than his friend, and suffered himself to be led back to the boat.

¹ A disease resulting from a lack of nutritious food.

² It is now in possession of William T. Davis, Esq., Plymouth, Mass.

³ "Sail of the line," i.e., ships large enough to enter line of battle.

The Albemarle was under orders to convoy a fleet of transports to New York. "A very pretty job," said her captain, "at this late season of the year [October was far advanced], for our sails are at this moment frozen to the yards." On his arrival at Sandy Hook he waited on the commander in chief, Admiral Digby, who told him he was come on a fine station for making prize money. "Yes, sir," Nelson made answer; "but the West Indies is the station for honor." Lord Hood, with a detachment of Rodney's victorious fleet,¹ was at that time at Sandy Hook. He had been intimate with Captain Suckling, and Nelson, who was desirous of nothing but honor, requested him to ask for the Albemarle, that he might go to that station where it was most likely to be obtained. Admiral Digby reluctantly parted with him. His professional merit was already well known; and Lord Hood, on introducing him to Prince William Henry,² as the Duke of Clarence was then called, told the prince if he wished to ask any questions respecting naval tactics, Captain Nelson could give him as much information as any officer in the fleet. The duke, who, to his own honor, became from that time the firm friend of Nelson, describes him as appearing the merest boy of a captain he had ever seen, dressed in a full-laced uniform, an old-fashioned waistcoat with long flaps, and his lank, unpowdered hair tied in a stiff Hessian tail³ of extraordinary length; making, altogether, so remarkable a figure "that," says the duke, "I had never seen anything like it before; nor could I imagine who he was, nor what he came about. But his address and conversation were irresistibly pleasing; and when he spoke on professional subjects, it was with an enthusiasm that showed he was no common being."

¹ George Brydes, Baron Rodney (1718–92), was an English admiral, who with thirty-five sail of the line defeated the French of thirty-three sail, of greater size and sailing power, off Dominica, on the 12th of April, 1782.

² The third son of George III., who came to the throne of England in 1830 under the name of William IV.

³ At this time men wore long hair tied behind in a tail, or queue, and whitened with powder. It is called "Hessian" tail because the Hessian soldiers employed to fight for England introduced the fashion.

It was expected that the French would attempt some of the passages between the Bahamas; and Lord Hood, thinking of this, said to Nelson, "I suppose, sir, from the length of time you were cruising among the Bahama Keys, you must be a good pilot there." He replied, with that constant readiness to render justice to every man which was so conspicuous in all his conduct through life, that he was well acquainted with them himself, but that in that respect his second lieutenant was far his superior. The French got into Puerto Cabello, on the coast of Venezuela. Nelson was cruising between that port and La Guayra, under French colors, for the purpose of obtaining information, when a King's launch belonging to the Spaniards passed near, and being hailed in French, came alongside without suspicion, and answered all questions that were asked concerning the number and force of the enemy's ships. The crew, however, were not a little surprised when they were taken on board, and found themselves prisoners. One of the party went by the name of the Count de Deux Ponts. He was, however, a prince of the German empire, and brother to the heir of the Electorate of Bavaria; his companions were French officers of distinction, and men of science who had been collecting specimens in the various branches of natural history. Nelson having entertained them with the best his table could afford, told them they were at liberty to depart with their boat and all that it contained. He only required them to promise that they would consider themselves as prisoners if the commander in chief should refuse to acquiesce in their being thus liberated,—a circumstance which was not by any means likely to happen.

Tidings soon arrived that the preliminaries of peace had been signed, and the Albemarle returned to England, and was paid off. Nelson's first business after he got to London—even before he went to see his relations—was to attempt to get the wages due to his men for the various ships in which they had served during the war. "The disgust of seamen to the navy," he said, "was all owing to the infernal plan of turning them over from ship to ship, so that men could not be attached to the officers, nor the officers care the least about the men." Yet he himself was so beloved by his men that his whole ship's company offered, if he could get a ship, to enter for her immediately. He was now, for the first time, presented at court. After going through this ceremony he dined with his friend Davison at Lincoln's Inn.¹ As soon as he entered the chambers, he threw off what he called his ironbound coat, and, putting himself at ease in a dressing gown, passed the remainder of the day in talking over all that had befallen them since they parted on the shore of the river St. Lawrence.

CHAPTER II.

Nelson goes to France during the peace.—Reappointed to the Boreas, and stationed at the Leeward Islands.—His firm conduct concerning the American interlopers and the contractors.—Marries and returns to England.—Is on the point of quitting the service in disgust.—Manner of life while unemployed.—Appointed to the Agamemnon on the breaking out of the war of the French Revolution.

"I HAVE closed the war," said Nelson in one of his letters, "without a fortune; but there is not a speck in my character. True honor, I hope, predominates in my mind far above riches." He did not apply for a ship, because he was not wealthy enough to live on board in the manner which was then become customary. Finding it, therefore, prudent to economize on his half pay during the peace, he went to France, in company with Captain Macnamara, of the navy, and took lodgings at St. Omer. The death of his favorite sister, Anne, who died in consequence of going out of the ballroom, at Bath, when heated with dancing, affected his father so much that it had nearly occasioned him to return in a few weeks. Time, however, and reason and religion, overcame this grief in the old man; and Nelson continued at St. Omer long enough to fall in love with the daughter of an English clergyman. This second attachment appears to have been less ardent than the first; for, upon weighing the evils of a straitened income to a married man, he thought it better to leave France, assigning to his friends something in his accounts as the cause. This prevented him from accepting an invitation from the Count de Deux Ponts to visit him at Paris, couched in the handsomest terms of acknowledgment for the treatment which he had received on board the Albemarle.

¹ One of the four inns of court in London, where law students and barristers have their chambers.

The self-constraint which Nelson exerted in subduing this attachment made him naturally desire to be at sea; and when, upon visiting Lord Howe at the Admiralty, he was asked if he wished to be employed, he made answer that he did. Accordingly, in March,¹ he was appointed to the Boreas, 28 guns, going to the Leeward Islands, as a cruiser, on the peace establishment.² Lady Hughes and her family went out with him to Admiral Sir Richard Hughes, who commanded on that station. His ship was full of young midshipmen, of whom there were not less than thirty on board; and happy were they whose lot it was to be placed with such a captain. If he perceived that a boy was afraid at first going aloft, he would say to him, in a friendly manner, "Well, sir, I am going a race to the masthead, and beg that I may meet you there." The poor little fellow instantly began to climb, and got up how he could,—Nelson never noticed in what manner, but, when they met in the top,³ spoke cheerfully to him, and would say how much any person was to be pitied who fancied that getting up was either dangerous or difficult. Every day he went into the schoolroom, to see that they were pursuing their nautical studies; and at noon he was always the first on deck with his quadrant.¹ Whenever he paid a visit of ceremony, some of these youths accompanied him; and when he went to dine with the governor at Barbadoes he took one of them in his hand and presented him, saying, "Your excellency must excuse me for bringing one of my midshipmen. I make it a rule to introduce them to all the good company I can, as they have few to look up to besides myself during the time they are at sea."

¹ 1784.

² "Peace establishment," i.e., the amount of force kept during peace.

³ The platform surrounding the head of the lower mast.

When Nelson arrived in the West Indies he found himself senior captain, and, consequently, second in command on that station. Satisfactory as this was, it soon involved him in a dispute with the admiral, which a man less zealous for the service might have avoided. He found the Latona in English Harbor, Antigua, with a broad pendant² hoisted; and upon inquiring the reason, was presented with a written order from Sir R. Hughes, requiring and directing him to obey the orders of Resident Commissioner Moutray during the time he might have occasion to remain there; the said resident commissioner being in consequence authorized to hoist a broad pendant on board any of his Majesty's ships in that port that he might think proper. Nelson was never at a loss how to act in any emergency. "I know of no superior officers," said he, "beside the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and my seniors on the post list."³ Concluding, therefore, that it was not consistent with the service for a resident commissioner, who held only a civil situation, to hoist a broad pendant, the moment that he had anchored he sent an order to the captain of the Latona to strike it,⁴ and return it to the dockyard. He then went on shore the same day, dined with the commissioner, to show him that he was actuated by no other motive than a sense of duty, and gave him the first intelligence that his pendant had been struck. Sir Richard sent an account of this to the Admiralty; but the case could admit of no doubt, and Captain Nelson's conduct was approved.

¹ An instrument for measuring the altitude of the sun, and so determining latitude and longitude.

² A broad pendant, or pennant, indicated the presence of a senior captain or commodore.

³ "Post list," i.e., list of post, or full, captains. ⁴ Lower or take it in.

He displayed the same promptitude on another occasion. While the Boreas, after the hurricane months were over, was riding at anchor in Nevis Road,¹ a French frigate passed to leeward, close alongshore. Nelson had obtained information that this ship was sent from Martinique,² with two general officers and some engineers on board, to make a survey of our sugar islands. This purpose he was determined to prevent them from executing, and therefore he gave orders to follow them. The next day he came up with them at anchor in the roads of St. Eustatia, and anchored at about two cables' lengths on the frigate's quarter. Being afterwards invited by the Dutch governor to meet the French officers at dinner, he seized that occasion of assuring the French captain that, understanding it was his intention to honor the British possessions with a visit, he had taken the earliest opportunity in his power to accompany him, in his Majesty's ship the Boreas, in order that such attention might be paid to the officers of his Most Christian Majesty³ as every Englishman in the islands would be proud to show. The French, with equal courtesy, protested against giving him this trouble, especially, they said, as they intended merely to cruise round the islands, without landing on any. But Nelson, with the utmost politeness, insisted upon paying them this compliment, followed them close in spite of all their attempts to elude his vigilance, and never lost sight of them; till, finding it impossible either to deceive or escape him, they gave up their treacherous purpose in despair and beat up for Martinique.

A business of more serious import soon engaged his attention. The Americans were at this time trading with our islands, taking advantage of the register of their ships, which had been issued while they were British subjects. Nelson knew that, by the Navigation Act,¹ no foreigners, directly or indirectly, are permitted to carry on any trade with these possessions; he knew, also, that the Americans had made themselves foreigners with regard to England; they had broken the ties of blood and language, and acquired the independence which they had been provoked to claim, unhappily for themselves, before they were fit for it;² and he was resolved that they should derive no profit from those ties. Foreigners they had made themselves, and as foreigners they were to be treated. "If once," said he, "they are admitted to any kind of intercourse with our islands, the views of the loyalists,³ in settling at Nova Scotia, are entirely done away; and when we are again embroiled in a French war the Americans will first become the carriers⁴ of these colonies, and then have possession of them. Here they come, sell their cargoes for ready money, go to Martinique, buy molasses, and so round and round. The loyalist cannot do this, and, consequently, must sell a little dearer. The residents here are Americans by connection and by interest, and are inimical to Great Britain. They are as great rebels as ever were in America, had they the power to show it."

¹ A roadstead near Nevis, a British West India island.

² A French West India island.

³ A title of the King of France.

In November, when the squadron, having arrived at Barba-

¹ The Navigation Act is referred to 1672, the time of Charles II.; but it is based on an act of Cromwell's. Under it articles of commerce could not be introduced into any British port except in English ships manned by a crew of which three fourths were Englishmen. It was originally pointed at the Dutch.

² Every true American will differ with Southey in this sentence. The Americans had not, and never have, broken ties of blood and language with England; the independence which they had been provoked to claim they acquired, happily for themselves, when they were fit for it. At the time Southey was writing the Life of Nelson he was undergoing a strong reaction from the ardent republicanism of his youth to the Tory principles of the latter part of his life.

³ American colonists who settled in 1783 in Nova Scotia, in order to retain the privileges of subjects of the English crown.

⁴ Supply ships for carrying to and from the colonies.

does, was to separate, with no other orders than those for examining anchorages, and the usual inquiries concerning wood and water, Nelson asked his friend Collingwood, then captain of the Mediator, whose opinions he knew upon the subject, to accompany him to the commander in chief, whom he then respectfully asked whether they were not to attend to the commerce of the country, and see that the Navigation Act was respected, that appearing to him to be the intent of keeping men-of-war upon this station in time of peace. Sir Richard Hughes replied he had no particular orders, neither had the Admiralty sent him any Acts of Parliament. But Nelson made answer that the Navigation Act was included in the statutes of the Admiralty, with which every captain was furnished, and that Act was directed to admirals, captains, etc., to see it carried into execution. Sir Richard said he had never seen the book. Upon this Nelson produced the statutes, read the words of the Act, and apparently convinced the commander in chief that men-of-war, as he said, "were sent abroad for some other purpose than to be made a show of." Accordingly orders were given to enforce the Navigation Act.

General Sir Thomas Shirley was at this time governor of the Leeward Islands; and when Nelson waited on him to inform him how he intended to act, and upon what grounds, he replied that "old generals were not in the habit of taking advice from young gentlemen." "Sir," said the young officer, with that confidence in himself which never carried him too far and always was equal to the occasion, "I am as old as the Prime Minister of England,¹ and think myself as capable of commanding one of his Majesty's ships as that minister is of governing the state." He was resolved to do his duty, whatever might be the opinion or conduct of others; and when he arrived upon his station at St. Kitt's² he sent away all the Americans, not choosing to seize them before they had been well apprised that the Act would be carried into effect, lest it might seem as if a trap had been laid for them. The Americans, though they prudently decamped from St. Kitt's, were emboldened by the support they met with, and resolved to resist his orders; alleging that the King's ships had no legal power to seize them without having deputations from the customs. The planters were to a man against him; the governors and the presidents of the different islands, with only a single exception, gave him no support; and the admiral, afraid to act on either side, yet wishing to oblige the planters, sent him a note, advising him to be guided by the wishes of the President of the Council. There was no danger in disregarding this, as it came unofficially and in the form of advice. But scarcely a month after he had shown Sir Richard Hughes the law, and, as he supposed, satisfied him concerning it, he received an order from him stating that he had now obtained good advice upon the point, and the Americans were not to be hindered from coming, and having free egress and regress, if the governor chose to permit them. An order to the same purport had been sent round to the different governors and presidents; and General Shirley and others informed him, in an authoritative manner, that they chose to admit American ships, as the commander in chief had left the decision to them. These persons, in his own words, he soon "trimmed up¹ and silenced;" but it was a more delicate business to deal with the admiral. "I must either," said he, "disobey my orders or disobey Acts of Parliament. I determined upon the former, trusting to the uprightness of my intentions, and believing that my country would not let me be ruined for protecting her commerce." With this determination he wrote to Sir Richard, appealed again to the plain, literal, unequivocal sense of the Navigation Act, and in respectful language told him he felt it his duty to decline obeying these orders till he had an opportunity of seeing and conversing with him. Sir Richard's first feeling was that of anger, and he was about to supersede Nelson; but having mentioned the affair to his captain, that officer told him he believed all the squadron thought the orders illegal, and therefore did not know how far they were bound to obey them. It was impossible, therefore, to bring Nelson to a court martial composed of men who agreed with him in opinion upon the point in dispute; and luckily, though the admiral wanted vigor of mind to decide upon what was right, he was not obstinate in wrong, and had even generosity enough in his nature to thank Nelson afterwards for having shown him his error.

¹ The prime minister at this time was William Pitt, who was born May 28, 1759.

² Island of St. Christopher.

¹ "To trim," in seamen's speech, is to distribute the lading of a boat so evenly that it balances well on the water.

Collingwood, in the Mediator, and his brother, Wilfred Collingwood, in the Rattler, actively coöperated with Nelson. The customhouses were informed that after a certain day all foreign vessels found in the ports would be seized; and many were in consequence seized, and condemned in the Admiralty Court. When the Boreas arrived at Nevis, she found four^{*} American vessels deeply laden, and with what are called the "island colors" flying,—white with a red cross. They were ordered to hoist their proper flag and depart within eight and forty hours; but they refused to obey, denying that they were Americans. Some of their crews were then examined in Nelson's cabin, where the judge of the Admiralty¹ happened to be present. The case was plain: they confessed that they were Americans, and that the ships, hull and cargo, were wholly American property—upon which he seized them. This raised a storm; the planters, the customhouse, and the governor were all against him. Subscriptions were opened, and presently filled, for the purpose of carrying on the cause in behalf of the American captains; and the admiral, whose flag was at that time in the roads,² stood neutral. But the Americans and their abettors were not content with defensive law. The marines whom he had sent to secure the ships had prevented some of the masters from going ashore; and those persons by whose depositions it appeared that the vessels and cargoes were American property, declared that they had given their testimony under bodily fear, for that a man with a drawn sword in his hand had stood over them the whole time. A rascally lawyer whom the party employed suggested this story; and as the sentry at the cabin door was a man with a drawn sword, the Americans made no scruple of swearing to this ridiculous falsehood, and commencing prosecutions against him accordingly. They laid their damages at the enormous amount of £40,000; and Nelson was obliged to keep close on board his own ship, lest he should be arrested for a sum for which it would have been impossible to find bail. The marshal frequently came on board to arrest him, but was always prevented by the address of the first lieutenant, Mr. Wallis. Had he been taken, such was the temper of the people that it was certain he would have been cast¹ for the whole sum. One of his officers one day, in speaking of the restraint which he was thus compelled to suffer, happened to use the word "pity." "Pity!" exclaimed Nelson,— "pity, did you say? I shall live, sir, to be envied! and to that point I shall always direct my course." Eight weeks he remained under this state of duress. During that time the trial respecting these detained ships came on in the Court of Admiralty. He went on shore under a protection for the day from the judge; but, notwithstanding this, the marshal was called upon to take that opportunity of arresting him, and the merchants promised to indemnify him for so doing. The judge, however, did his duty, and threatened to send the marshal to prison if he attempted to violate the protection of the court.

¹ The judge of the Admiralty would try a case involving captured vessels and crew.

² "Whose flag," etc., i.e., whose flag was flying, and who was therefore present.

Mr. Herbert, the President of Nevis, behaved with singular generosity upon this occasion. Though no man was a greater sufferer by the measures which Nelson had pursued, he offered in court to become his bail for £10,000, if he chose to suffer the arrest. The lawyer whom he had chosen proved to be an able as well as an honest man; and, notwithstanding the opinions and pleadings of most of the counsel of the different islands, who maintained that ships of war were not justified in seizing American vessels without a deputation from the customs, the law was so explicit, the case so clear, and Nelson pleaded his own cause so well, that the four ships were condemned. During the progress of this business he sent a memorial home to the King, in consequence of which orders were issued that he should be defended at the expense of the Crown; and upon the representations which he made at the same time to the Secretary of State, and the suggestions with which he accompanied it, the Register Act¹ was framed. The sanction of government, and the approbation of his conduct which it implied, were highly gratifying to him; but he was offended, and not without just cause, that the Treasury should have transmitted thanks to the commander in chief for his activity and zeal in protecting the commerce of Great Britain. "Had they known all," said he, "I do not think they would have bestowed thanks in that quarter, and neglected me. I feel much hurt that, after the loss of health and risk of fortune, another should be thanked for what I did against his orders. I either deserved to be sent out of the service, or at least to have had some little notice taken of what I had done. They have thought it worthy of notice, and yet have neglected me. If this is the reward for a faithful discharge of my duty, I shall be careful, and never stand forward again. But I have done my duty, and have nothing to accuse myself of."

¹ Defeated in a lawsuit.

The anxiety which he had suffered from the harassing uncertainties of law is apparent from these expressions. He had, however, something to console him; for he was at this time wooing the niece of his friend the President, then in her eighteenth year, the widow of Dr. Nisbet, a physician. She had one child, a son, by name Josiah, who was three years old. One day Mr. Herbert, who had hastened, half dressed, to receive Nelson, exclaimed, on returning to his dressing room, " Good God ! if I did not find that great little man, of whom everybody is so afraid, playing in the next room, under the dining table, with Mrs. Nisbet's child !" A few days afterwards Mrs. Nisbet herself was first introduced to him, and thanked him for the partiality which he had shown to her little boy. Her manners were mild and winning ; and the captain, whose heart was easily susceptible of attachment, found no such imperious necessity for subduing his inclinations as had twice before withheld him from marrying. They were married on the 11th of March, 1787, Prince William Henry, who had come out to the West Indies the preceding winter, being present, by his own desire, to give away the bride. Mr. Herbert, her uncle, was at this time so much displeased with his only daughter that he had resolved to disinherit her and leave his whole fortune, which was very great, to his niece. But Nelson, whose nature was too noble to let him profit by an act of injustice, interfered, and succeeded in reconciling the President to his child.

¹ By this act it was established that, after the first day of August, 1786, no vessel should be accounted British unless she was built in the British dominions, or taken as a prize. Every vessel was ordered to have her name, with that of the port she belonged to, conspicuously painted on her stern; and to take out a register, wherein, among other things, should be mentioned the names of the owners. No ship built in the United States was entitled to be registered.

" Yesterday," said one of his naval friends, the day after the wedding, " the navy lost one of its greatest ornaments by Nelson's marriage. It is a national loss that such an officer should marry. Had it not been for this, Nelson would have become the greatest man in the service." The man was rightly estimated ; but he who delivered this opinion did not understand the effect of domestic love and duty upon a mind of the true heroic stamp. " We are often separate," said Nelson in a letter to Mrs. Nisbet a few months before their marriage ; " but our affections are not by any means on that account diminished. Our country has the first demand for our services, and private convenience or happiness must ever give way to the public good. Duty is the great business of a sea officer ; all private considerations must give way to it, however painful." " Have you not often heard," says he in another letter, "that salt water and absence always wash away love? Now I am such a heretic as not to believe that faith; for, behold, every morning I have had six pails of salt water poured upon my head, and instead of finding what seamen say to be true, it goes on so contrary to the prescription that you must, perhaps, see me before the fixed time." More frequently his correspondence breathed a deeper strain. "To write letters to you," says he, "is the next greatest pleasure I feel to receiving them from you. What I experience when I read such as I am sure are the pure sentiments of your heart, my poor pen cannot express; nor, indeed, would I give much for any pen or head which could express feelings of that kind. Absent from you I feel no pleasure; it is you who are everything to me. Without you I care not for this world; for I have found, lately, nothing in it but vexation and trouble. These are my present sentiments. God Almighty grant they may never change! Nor do I think they will. Indeed there is, as far as human knowledge can judge, a moral certainty that they cannot; for it must be real affection that brings us together, not interest or compulsion." Such were the feelings and such the sense of duty with which Nelson became a husband.

During his stay upon this station he had ample opportunity of observing the scandalous practices of the contractors, prize agents,¹ and other persons in the West Indies connected with the naval service. When he was first left with the command, and bills were brought him to sign for money which was owing for goods purchased for the navy, he required the original voucher,² that he might examine whether those goods had been really purchased at the market price; but to produce vouchers would not have been convenient, and therefore was not the custom. Upon this Nelson wrote to Sir Charles Middleton, then Comptroller of the Navy, representing the abuses which were likely to be practiced in this manner. The answer which he received seemed to imply that the old forms were thought sufficient; and thus, having no alternative, he was compelled, with his eyes open, to submit to a practice originating in fraudulent intentions. Soon afterwards two Antigua merchants informed him that they were privy to great frauds which had been committed upon government in various departments,—at Antigua to the amount of nearly £500,000; at Lucie, £300,000; at Barbadoes, £250,000; at Jamaica, upwards of a million. The informers were both shrewd, sensible men of business; they did not affect to be actuated by a sense of justice, but required a percentage upon so much as government should actually recover through their means. Nelson examined the books and papers which they produced, and was convinced that government had been most infamously plundered. Vouchers, he found, in that country were no check whatever; the principle was that a thing was always worth what it would bring; and the merchants were in the habit of signing vouchers for each other without even the appearance of looking at the articles. These accounts he sent home to the different departments which had been defrauded; but the peculators were too powerful, and they succeeded not merely in impeding inquiry, but even in raising prejudices against Nelson at the Board of Admiralty, which it was many years before he could subdue.

¹ "Prize agents," i.e., agents who sold the ships or goods which had been seized as prizes.

² The paper or receipt for the payment of money, which, properly attested, would guard against the fraud of contractors.

Owing, probably, to these prejudices and the influence of the peculators, he was treated, on his return to England, in a manner which had nearly driven him from the service. During the three years that the Boreas had remained upon a station which is usually so fatal, not a single officer or man of her whole complement had died. This almost unexampled instance of good health, though mostly, no doubt, imputable to a healthy season, must in some measure also be ascribed to the wise conduct of the captain. He never suffered the ships to remain more than three or four at a time at any of the islands; and when the hurricane months confined him to English Harbor, he encouraged all kinds of useful amusements, — music, dancing, and cudgeling among the men, theatricals among the officers, — anything which could employ their attention and keep their spirits cheerful. The Boreas arrived in England in June. Nelson, who had many times been supposed to be consumptive when in the West Indies, and perhaps was saved from consumption by that climate, was still in a precarious state of health; and the raw, wet weather of one of our ungenial summers brought on cold and sore throat and fever; yet his vessel was kept at the Nore from the end of June till the end of November, serving as a slop¹ and receiving² ship. This unworthy treatment, which more probably proceeded from intention than from neglect, excited in Nelson the strongest indignation. During the whole five months he seldom or never quitted the ship, but carried on the duty with strict and sullen attention. On the morning when orders were received to prepare the Boreas for being paid off, he expressed his joy to the senior officer in the Medway, saying, “It will release me forever from an ungrateful service; for it is my firm and unalterable determination never again to set my foot on board a King’s ship. Immediately after my arrival in town I shall wait on the First Lord of the Admiralty and resign my commission.” The officer to whom he thus communicated his intentions behaved in the wisest and most friendly manner; for, finding it in vain to dissuade him in his present state of feeling, he secretly interfered with the First Lord to save him from a step so injurious to himself, little foreseeing how deeply the welfare and honor of England were at that moment at stake. This interference produced a letter from Lord Howe the day before the ship was paid off, intimating a wish to see Captain Nelson as soon as he arrived in town; when, being pleased with his conversation, and perfectly convinced, by what was then explained to him, of the propriety of his conduct, he desired that he might present him to the King on the first levee day; and the gracious manner in which Nelson was then received effectually removed his resentment.

¹ “Slop,” in the British navy, means the clothing and bedding of the men, which are furnished by the state at about cost price.

² Receiving sailors who are waiting for appointment to some ship.

Prejudices had been in like manner excited against his friend, Prince William Henry. "Nothing is wanting, sir," said Nelson in one of his letters, "to make you the darling of the English nation, but truth. Sorry I am to say, much to the contrary has been dispersed." This was not flattery, for Nelson was no flatterer. The letter in which this passage occurs shows in how wise and noble a manner he dealt with the prince. One of his royal highness's officers had applied for a court-martial upon a point in which he was unquestionably wrong. His royal highness, however, while he supported his own character and authority, prevented the trial, which must have been injurious to a brave and deserving man. "Now that you are parted," said Nelson, "pardon me, my prince, when I presume to recommend that he may stand in your royal favor as if he had never sailed with you, and that at some future day you will serve him. There only wants this to place your conduct in the highest point of view. None of us are without failings; his was being rather too hasty; but that, put in competition with his being a good officer, will not, I am bold to say, be taken in the scale against him. More able friends than myself your royal highness may easily find, and of more consequence in the state; but one more attached and affectionate is not so easily met with. Princes seldom — very seldom — find a disinterested person to communicate their thoughts to. I do not pretend to be that person; but of this be assured, by a man who, I trust, never did a dishonorable act, that I am interested only that your royal highness should be the greatest and best man this country ever produced."

Encouraged by the conduct of Lord Howe and by his reception at court, Nelson renewed his attack upon the speculators with fresh spirit. He had interviews with Mr. Rose, Mr. Pitt, and Sir Charles Middleton, to all of whom he satisfactorily proved his charges. In consequence, it is said, these very extensive public frauds were at length put in a proper train to be provided against in future; his representations were attended to, and every step which he recommended was adopted; the investigation was put into a proper course, which ended in the detection and punishment of some of the culprits; an immense saving was made to government, and thus its attention was directed to similar speculation in other parts of the colonies. But it is said, also, that no mark of commendation seems to have been bestowed upon Nelson for his exertion. And it is justly remarked¹ that the spirit of the navy cannot be preserved so effectually by the liberal honors bestowed on officers when they are worn out in the service, as by an attention to those who, like Nelson at this part of his life, have only their integrity and zeal to bring them into notice. A junior officer who had been left with the command at Jamaica received an additional allowance, for which Nelson had applied in vain. Double pay was allowed to every artificer and seaman employed in the naval yard. Nelson had superintended the whole business of that yard with the most rigid exactness, and he complained that he was neglected. It was most true, he said, that the trouble which he took to detect the fraudulent practices then carried on was no more than his duty; but he little thought that the expenses attending his frequent journeys to St. John's upon that duty (a distance of twelve miles), would have fallen upon his pay as captain of the Boreas. Nevertheless, the sense of what he thought unworthy usage did not diminish his zeal. "I," said he, "must still buffet the waves in search of—what? Alas! that they called honor is now thought of no more. My fortune, God knows, has grown worse for the service—so much for serving my country. But the devil, ever willing to tempt the virtuous, has made me offer, if any ships should be sent to destroy his Majesty of Morocco's ports, to be there; and I have some reason to think that, should any more come of it, my humble services will be accepted. I have invariably laid down, and followed close, a plan of what ought to be uppermost in the breast of an officer,—that it is much better to serve an ungrateful country than to give up his own fame. Posterity will do him justice. A uniform course of honor and integrity seldom fails of bringing a man to the goal of fame at last."

¹ Clarke and M'Arthur, Life and Services of Nelson, vol. i., p. 107.

The design against the Barbary pirates,¹ like all other designs against them, was laid aside; and Nelson took his wife to his father's parsonage, meaning only to pay him a visit before they went to France,—a project which he had formed for the sake of acquiring a competent knowledge of the French language. But his father could not bear to lose him thus unnecessarily. Mr. Nelson had long been an invalid, suffering under paralytic and asthmatic affections which, for several hours after he rose in the morning, scarcely permitted him to speak. He had been given over by his physicians for this complaint nearly forty years before his death, and was, for many of his last years, obliged to spend all his winters at Bath. The sight of his son, he declared, had given him new life. "But, Horatio," said he, "it would have been better that I had not been thus cheered, if I am so soon to be bereaved of you again. Let me, my good son, see you whilst I can. My age and infirmities increase, and I shall not last long." To such an appeal there could be no reply. Nelson took up his abode at the parsonage, and amused himself with the sports and the occupations of the country. Sometimes he busied himself with farming the glebe, sometimes spent the greater part of the day in the garden, where he would dig as if for the mere pleasure of wearying himself. Sometimes he went bird's-nesting, like a boy; and in these expeditions Mrs. Nelson always, by his express desire, accompanied him. Coursing² was his favorite amusement. Shooting, as he practiced it, was far too dangerous for his companions; for he carried his gun upon the full cock, as if he were going to board an enemy; and the moment a bird rose he let fly, without ever putting the fowling piece to his shoulder. It is not, therefore, extraordinary that his having once shot a partridge should be remembered by his family among the remarkable events of his life.

¹ Pirate vessels sent out or protected by the Arab states — sometimes called the Barbary States — of North Africa, for the purpose of capturing or levying tribute upon the merchant vessels of other nations sailing in the Mediterranean. They were extirpated in the early part of the present century.

² Hunting.

But his time did not pass away thus without some vexatious cares to ruffle it. The affair of the American ships was not yet over, and he was again pestered with threats of prosecution. "I have written them word," said he, "that I will have nothing to do with them, and they must act as they think proper. Government, I suppose, will do what is right, and not leave me in the lurch. We have heard enough lately of the consequence of the Navigation Act to this country. They may take my person; but if sixpence would save me from a prosecution I would not give it."

It was his great ambition at this time to possess a pony; and having resolved to purchase one, he went to a fair for that purpose. During his absence two men abruptly entered the parsonage and inquired for him; they then asked for Mrs. Nelson; and after they had made her repeatedly declare that she was really and truly the captain's wife, presented her with a writ or notification on the part of the American captains, who now laid their damages at £20,000; and they charged her to give it to her husband on his return. Nelson, having bought his pony, came home with it in high spirits. He called out his wife to admire the purchase and listen to all its excellencies; nor was it till his glee had in some measure subsided that the paper could be presented to him. His indignation was excessive; and in the apprehension that he should be exposed to the anxieties of the suit, and the ruinous consequences which might ensue, he exclaimed, "This affront I did not deserve! But I'll be trifled with no longer. I will write immediately to the Treasury; and if government will not support me, I am resolved to leave the country." Accordingly, he informed the Treasury that if a satisfactory answer were not sent him by return of post he should take refuge in France. To this he expected he should be driven, and for this he arranged everything with his characteristic rapidity of decision. It was settled that he should depart immediately, and Mrs. Nelson follow under the care of his elder brother, Maurice, ten days after him. But the answer which he received from government quieted his fears; it stated that Captain Nelson was a very good officer, and needed to be under no apprehension, for he would assuredly be supported.

Here his disquietude upon this subject seems to have ended. Still he was not at ease; he wanted employment, and was mortified that his applications for it produced no effect. Not being a man of fortune, he said, was a crime which he was unable to get over, and therefore none of the great cared about him. Repeatedly he requested the Admiralty that they would not leave him to rust in indolence. During the armament which was made upon occasion of the dispute concerning Nootka Sound,¹ he renewed his application; and his steady friend, Prince William, who had then been created Duke of Clarence, recommended him to Lord Chatham. The failure of this recommendation wounded him so keenly that he again thought of retiring from the service in disgust, a resolution from which nothing but the urgent remonstrances of Lord Hood induced him to desist. Hearing that the Raisonnable, in which he had commenced his career, was to be commissioned, he asked for her. This also was in vain; and a coolness ensued, on his part, towards Lord Hood, because that excellent officer did not use his influence with Lord Chatham upon this occasion. Lord Hood, however, had certainly sufficient reasons for not interfering, for he ever continued his steady friend. In the winter of 1792, when we were on the eve of the Anti-Jacobin War,² Nelson once more offered his services, earnestly requested a ship, and added that if their lordships should be pleased to appoint him to a cockle boat, he should feel satisfied. He was answered in the usual official form: "Sir, I have received your letter of the 5th instant, expressing your readiness to serve, and have read the same to my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty." On the 12th of December he received this dry acknowledgment. The fresh mortification did not, however, affect him long; for, by the joint interest of the duke and Lord Hood, he was appointed, on the 30th of January following, to the Agamemnon, of 64 guns.

¹ This sound, on the west side of Vancouver Island, was discovered by Captain Cook in 1778. Soon after, a British fur station was established. The Spanish, who took possession in 1789, recognized British right in 1791, and Vancouver was sent out to take possession.

² The Jacobins were a club of French radicals who, headed by Robespierre, had control of affairs from 1792 to their overthrow in 1794.

CHAPTER III.

The Agamemnon sent to the Mediterranean.—Commencement of Nelson's acquaintance with Sir William Hamilton.—He is sent to Corsica to cooperate with Paoli.—State of affairs in that island.—Nelson undertakes the siege of Bastia, and reduces it.—Takes a distinguished part in the siege of Calvi, where he loses an eye.—Admiral Hotham's action.—The Agamemnon ordered to Genoa to cooperate with the Austrian and Sardinian forces.—Gross misconduct of the Austrian general.

"THERE are three things, young gentleman," said Nelson to one of his midshipmen, "which you are constantly to bear in mind. First, you must always implicitly obey orders, without attempting to form any opinion of your own respecting their propriety; secondly, you must consider every man your enemy who speaks ill of your King; and, thirdly, you must hate a Frenchman as you do the devil." With these feelings he engaged in the Anti-Jacobin War. Josiah, his son-in-law,¹ went with him as a midshipman.

The Agamemnon was ordered to the Mediterranean, under Lord Hood. The fleet arrived in those seas at a time when the south of France would willingly have formed itself into a separate republic, under the protection of England. But good principles had been at that time perilously abused by ignorant and profligate men; and in its fear and hatred of democracy, the English government leagued itself with despotism,—a miserable error, of which the consequences will long be deplored; for had not England, in an unhappy hour, interfered, the rotten governments of the Continent would then have fallen; and the Continental nations, acquiring a revolutionary impulse and strength at the same time as France, would now have been the rivals of France, instead of her prey. Lord Hood could not take advantage of the fair occasion which presented itself, and which, if it had been seized with vigor, might have ended in dividing France; but he negotiated with the people of Toulon to take possession provisionally of their port and city, which, fatally for themselves, was accordingly done.¹ Before the British fleet entered, Nelson was sent with dispatches to Sir William Hamilton, our envoy to the court of Naples. Sir William, after his first interview with him, told Lady Hamilton he was about to introduce a little man to her who could not boast of being very handsome, but such a man as, he believed, would one day astonish the world. “I have never before,” he continued, “entertained an officer at my house, but I am determined to bring him here. Let him be put in the room prepared for Prince Augustus.”² Thus that acquaintance began which ended in the destruction of Nelson’s domestic happiness. It seemed to threaten no such consequences at its commencement. He spoke of Lady Hamilton, in a letter to his wife, as a young woman of amiable manners, who did honor to the station to which she had been raised;³ and he remarked that she had been exceedingly kind to Josiah. The activity with which the envoy exerted himself in procuring troops from Naples to assist in garrisoning Toulon so delighted him that he is said to have exclaimed, "Sir William, you are a man after my own heart! you do business in my own way;" and then to have added, "I am now only a captain; but I will, if I live, be at the top of the tree." Here, also, that acquaintance with the Neapolitan court commenced which led to the only blot upon Nelson's public character. The King,¹ who was sincere at that time in his enmity to the French, called the English the saviors of Italy, and of his dominions in particular. He paid the most flattering attentions to Nelson, made him dine with him, and seated him at his right hand.

¹ In England the word "son-in-law" is often used where in America we always say "stepson."

¹ It was the royalists of Toulon who sought the English and invited them into the harbor. The army of the French republic besieged the town and took the forts. The English retired after firing the great arsenal.

² One of the sons of the reigning king, George III.

³ She began life as Emma Hart, a domestic. Romney saw her while she was waitress at a tavern, engaged her for a model, and painted her smiling face on many canvases. She afterwards married Sir William Hamilton.

Having accomplished this mission, Nelson received orders to join Commodore Linzee at Tunis. On the way, five sail of the enemy were discovered off the coast of Sardinia, and he chased them. They proved to be three 44-gun frigates, with a corvette² of 24, and a brig of 12. The Agamemnon had only 345 men at quarters,³ having landed part of her crew at Toulon, and others being absent in prizes.⁴ He came near enough one of the frigates to engage her, but at great disadvantage, the Frenchman maneuvering well and sailing greatly better. A running fight of three hours ensued, during which the other ships, which were at some distance, made all speed to come up. By this time the enemy was almost silenced, when a favorable change of wind enabled her to get out of reach of the Agamemnon's guns; and that ship had received so much damage in the rigging that she could not follow her. Nelson, expecting that this was but the forerunner of a far more serious engagement, called his officers together, and asked them if the ship was fit to go into action

¹ Ferdinand IV., King of the two Sicilies, Naples and Sicily. He was a great-great-grandson of Louis XIV. and a son of Charles III. of Spain.

² A frigate-rigged ship with only one tier of guns.

³ The stations of officers and men on a battle ship.

⁴ Ships seized and sent home.

against such a superior force without some small refit and refreshment for the men. Their answer was that she certainly was not. He then gave these orders: "Veer the ship, and lay her head to the westward; let some of the best men be employed refitting the rigging, and the carpenter getting crows and capstan bars¹ to prevent our wounded spars² from coming down; and get the wine up for the people, with some bread, for it may be half an hour good before we are again in action." But when the French came up, their comrade made signals of distress, and they all hoisted out their boats to go to her assistance, leaving the Agamemnon unmolested.

Nelson found Commodore Linzee at Tunis, where he had been sent to expostulate with the Dey³ upon the impolicy of his supporting the revolutionary government of France. Nelson represented to him the atrocity of that government. Such arguments were of little avail in Barbary; and when the Dey was told that the French had put their sovereign to death, he dryly replied that nothing could be more heinous; and yet, if historians told the truth, the English had once done the same.⁴ This answer had doubtless been suggested by the French about him; they had completely gained the ascendancy, and all negotiation on our part proved fruitless. Shortly afterwards Nelson was detached with a small squadron to coöperate with General Paoli and the Anti-Gallican⁵ party in Corsica.

Some thirty years before this time the heroic patriotism of the Corsicans, and of their leader Paoli, had been the admiration of England. The history of these brave people is but a melancholy

¹ "Crows and capstan bars," i.e., crowbars and the levers used to turn a capstan, which, like a windlass, raises weights.

² "Wounded spars," i.e., broken masts, yards, or bombs.

³ The title of the governor of Algiers, which was under Turkish guardianship from 1710 to the conquest by the French in 1830.

⁴ Louis XVI. was beheaded Jan. 21, 1793, after trial by the Convention. The English Parliamentary party tried Charles I. before the High Court, of which Bradshaw was president, and beheaded him on Jan. 30, 1649.

⁵ Opposing the French.

tale. The island which they inhabit has been abundantly blessed by nature; it has many excellent harbors, and though the malaria, or pestilential atmosphere, which is so deadly in many parts of Italy and of the Italian islands, prevails on the eastern coast, the greater part of the country is mountainous and healthy. It is about one hundred and fifty miles long, and from forty to fifty broad; in circumference some three hundred and twenty,—a country large enough, and sufficiently distant from the nearest shores, to have subsisted as an independent state, if the welfare and happiness of the human race had ever been considered as the end and aim of policy. The Moors, the Pisans, the Kings of Aragon, and the Genoese successively attempted, and each for a time effected, its conquest. The yoke of the Genoese continued longest, and was the heaviest. These petty tyrants ruled with an iron rod; and when at any time a patriot rose to resist their oppressions, if they failed to subdue him by force they resorted to assassination. At the commencement of the last century they quelled one revolt by the aid of German auxiliaries, whom the Emperor Charles VI. sent against a people who had never offended him, and who were fighting for whatever is most dear to man. In 1734 the war was renewed; and Theodore, a Westphalian baron, then appeared upon the stage. In that age men were not accustomed to see adventurers play for kingdoms, and Theodore became the common talk of Europe. He had served in the French armies; and having afterwards been noticed both by Ripperda¹ and Alberoni,² their example, perhaps, inflamed a spirit as ambitious and as unprincipled as their own. He employed the whole of his means in raising money and procuring arms, then wrote to the leaders of the Corsican patriots to offer them considerable assistance if they would erect Corsica into an independent kingdom and elect him king. When he landed among them they were struck with his stately person, his dignified manners, and imposing talents; they believed the magnificent promises of foreign assistance which he held out, and elected him king accordingly. Had his means been as he represented them they could not have acted more wisely than in thus at once fixing the government of their country, and putting an end to those rivalries among the leading families which had so often proved pernicious to the public weal. He struck¹ money, conferred titles, blocked up the fortified towns which were held by the Genoese, and amused the people with promises of assistance for about eight months; then, perceiving that they cooled in their affections towards him in proportion as their expectations were disappointed, he left the island, under the plea of expediting himself the succors which he had so long awaited. Such was his address that he prevailed upon several rich merchants in Holland—particularly the Jews—to trust him with cannon and warlike stores to a great amount. They shipped these under the charge of a supercargo. Theodore returned with this supercargo to Corsica, and put him to death on his arrival, as the shortest way of settling the account. The remainder of his life was a series of deserved afflictions. He threw in² the stores which he had thus fraudulently obtained; but he did not dare to land, for Genoa had now called in the French to their assistance, and a price had been set upon his head.³ His dreams of royalty were now at an end; he took refuge in London, contracted debts, and was thrown into the King's Bench.⁴ After lingering there many years, he was released under an act of insolvency; in consequence of which he made over the kingdom of Corsica for the use of his creditors, and died shortly after his deliverance.¹

¹ Baron Ripperda (1680–1737) was born in the Netherlands, of noble parents. He was educated a Catholic, and became a Protestant upon his marriage to a Protestant. While ambassador to Spain he was reconverted to Catholicism, and succeeded in ingratiating himself with the Queen after the fall of Alberoni. Finally disgraced, he went to Morocco, became a Mohammeden, and in the end a prophet.

² Cardinal Alberoni (1664–1752), starting in life as verger of a cathedral, came to be Prime Minister of Spain. He tampered with the politics of England, France, and Italy, and made an unsuccessful attempt to get into the papal chair.

¹ Coined. ² "Threw in," i.e., landed.

³ "A price had been set upon his head," i.e., a sum of money had been offered for his death, the head being presented as evidence.

⁴ A prison in London.

The French, who have never acted a generous part in the history of the world, readily entered into the views of the Genoese, which accorded with their own policy; for such was their ascendancy at Genoa that in subduing Corsica for these allies they were in fact subduing it for themselves. They entered into the contest, therefore, with their usual vigor and their usual cruelty. It was in vain that the Corsicans addressed a most affecting memorial to the court of Versailles;² that remorseless government persisted in its flagitious project. They poured in troops; dressed a part of them like the people of the country, by which means they deceived and destroyed many of the patriots; cut down the standing corn, the vines, and the olives; set fire to the villages; and hung all the most able and active men who fell into their hands. A war of this kind may be carried on with success against a country so small and so thinly peopled as Corsica. Having reduced the island to perfect servitude, which they called peace, the French withdrew their forces. As soon as they were gone, men, women, and boys rose again against their oppressors. The circumstances of the times were now favorable to them; and some British ships, acting as allies of Sardinia, bombarded Bastia and San Fiorenzo, and delivered them into the hands of the patriots. This service was long remembered with gratitude. The impression made upon our own countrymen was less favorable. They had witnessed the heartburning of rival chiefs and the dissensions among the patriots; and perceiving the state of barbarism to which continual oppression and habits of lawless turbulence had reduced the nation, they did not recollect that the vices of the people were owing to their unhappy circumstances, but that the virtues which they displayed arose from their own nature. This feeling, perhaps, influenced the British court when, in 1746, Corsica offered to put herself under the protection of Great Britain. An answer was returned, expressing satisfaction at such a communication, hoping that the Corsicans would preserve the same sentiments, but signifying also that the present was not the time for such a measure.

¹ In 1755.

² "The court of Versailles," i.e., the French court.

These brave islanders then formed a government for themselves, under two leaders, Gaffori and Matra, who had the title of "protectors." The latter is represented as a partisan of Genoa, favoring the views of the oppressors of his country by the most treasonable means. Gaffori was a hero worthy of old times. His eloquence was long remembered with admiration. A band of assassins was once advancing against him. He heard of their approach, went out to meet them, and, with a serene dignity which overawed them, requested them to hear him. He then spoke to them so forcibly of the distresses of their country, her intolerable wrongs, and the hopes and views of their brethren in arms, that the very men who had been hired to murder him fell at his feet, implored his forgiveness, and joined his banner. While he was besieging the Genoese in Corte, a party of the garrison, perceiving the nurse with his eldest son, then an infant in arms, straying at a little distance from the camp, suddenly sallied out and seized them. The use they made of their persons was in conformity to their usual execrable conduct. When Gaffori advanced to batter the walls they held up the child directly over that part of the wall at which the guns were pointed. The Corsicans stopped, but Gaffori stood at their head and ordered them to continue the fire. Providentially the child escaped, and lived to relate, with becoming feeling, a fact so honorable to his father. That father conducted the affairs of the island till 1753, when he was assassinated by some wretches, set on, it is believed, by Genoa, but certainly pensioned by that abominable government after the deed. He left the country in such a state that it was enabled to continue the war two years after his death without a leader; then they found one worthy of their cause in Pasquale de Paoli.

Paoli's father was one of the patriots who effected their escape from Corsica when the French reduced it to obedience. He retired to Naples, and brought up this his youngest son in the Neapolitan service. The Corsicans heard of young Paoli's abilities, and solicited him to come over to his native country and take the command. He did not hesitate long; his father, who was too far advanced in years to take an active part himself, encouraged him to go; and when they separated the old man fell on his neck and kissed him, and gave him his blessing. "My son," said he, "perhaps I may never see you more; but in my mind I shall ever be present with you. Your design is great and noble, and I doubt not but God will bless you in it. I shall devote to your cause the little remainder of my life in offering up my prayers for your success." When Paoli assumed the command he found all things in confusion. He formed a democratical government, of which he was chosen chief; restored the authority of the laws; established a university; and took such measures, both for repressing abuses and molding the rising generation, that, if France had not interfered, upon its wicked and detestable principle of usurpation, Corsica might, at this day, have been as free and flourishing and happy a commonwealth as any of the Grecian states in the days of their prosperity. The Genoese were at this time driven out of their fortified towns, and must in a short time have been expelled. France was indebted some millions of livres¹ to Genoa; it was not convenient to pay this money, so the French minister proposed to the Genoese that she should discharge the debt by sending six battalions to serve in Corsica for four years. The indignation which this conduct excited in all generous hearts was forcibly expressed by Rousseau,² who, with all his errors, was never deficient in feeling for the wrongs of humanity. "You Frenchmen," said he, writing to one of that people, "are a thoroughly servile nation, thoroughly sold to tyranny, thoroughly cruel, and relentless in persecuting the unhappy. If they knew of a free man at the other end of the world, I believe they would go thither for the mere pleasure of extirpating him."

¹ A livre was an old French coin of the value of about twenty cents.

² Jean Jacques Rousseau (1712-78), a French man of letters, whose works have had a considerable influence on all literature, education, and politics since his own time.

The immediate object of the French happened to be purely mercenary. They wanted to clear off their debt to Genoa; and as the presence of their troops in the island effected this, they aimed at doing the people no further mischief. Would that the conduct of England had been at this time free from reproach! But a proclamation was issued by the English government, after the Peace of Paris,¹ prohibiting any intercourse with the rebels of Corsica. Paoli said he did not expect that from Great Britain. This great man was deservedly proud of his country. "I defy Rome, Sparta, or Thebes," he used to say, "to show me thirty years of such patriotism as Corsica can boast!" Availing himself of the respite which the inactivity of the French and the weakness of the Genoese allowed, he prosecuted his plans of civilizing the people. He used to say that though he had an unspeakable pride in the prospect of the fame to which he aspired, yet if he could but render his countrymen happy he could be content to be forgotten. His own importance he never affected to undervalue. "We are now to our country," said he, "like the prophet Elisha, stretched over the dead child of the Shunamite²—eye to eye, nose to nose, mouth to mouth. It begins to recover warmth and to revive; I hope it will yet regain full health and vigor."

But when the four years were expired, France purchased the sovereignty of Corsica from the Genoese for forty millions of livres; as if the Genoese had been entitled to sell it! as if any bargain and sale could justify one country in taking possession of another against the will of the inhabitants, and butchering all who oppose the usurpation ! Among the enormities which France has committed this action seems but as a speck ; yet the foulest murderer that ever suffered by the hand of the executioner has infinitely less guilt upon his soul than the statesman who concluded this treaty, and the monarch¹ who sanctioned and confirmed it. A desperate and glorious resistance was made, but it was in vain ; no power interposed in behalf of these injured islanders, and the French poured in as many troops as were required. They offered to confirm Paoli in the supreme authority, only on condition that he would hold it under their government. His answer was that the rocks which surrounded him should melt away before he would betray a cause which he held in common with the poorest Corsican. This people then set a price upon his head. During two campaigns he kept them at bay ; they overpowered him at length. He was driven to the shore, and, having escaped on shipboard, took refuge in England. It is said that Lord Shelburne resigned his seat in the Cabinet because the Ministry looked on without attempting to prevent France from succeeding in this abominable and important act of aggrandizement. In one respect, however, our country acted as became her. Paoli was welcomed with the honors which he deserved, a pension of £1,200 was immediately granted him, and provision was liberally made for his elder brother and his nephew.

¹ In 1763, between Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal, to end the old French and Indian War.

² See 2 Kings iv. 34.

Above twenty years Paoli remained in England, enjoying the friendship of the wise and the admiration of the good.² But when the French Revolution began it seemed as if the restoration of Corsica was at hand. The whole country, as if animated by one spirit, rose and demanded liberty ; and the National Assembly passed a decree recognizing the island as a department of France, and therefore entitled to all the privileges of the new French constitution. This satisfied the Corsicans, and it satisfied Paoli also. He resigned his pension in the year 1790, and appeared at the bar of the Assembly with the Corsican deputies, when they took the oath of fidelity to France. But the course of events in France soon dispelled those hopes of a new and better order of things which Paoli, in common with so many of the friends of humankind, had indulged; and perceiving, after the execution of the King, that a civil war was about to ensue, of which no man could foresee the issue, he prepared to break the connection between Corsica and the French republic.

¹ Louis XVI., with Choiseul as negotiator.

² During this first visit, from 1769 to 1789, Paoli was introduced to Johnson, Goldsmith, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and others of the famous literary coterie of that time. Boswell had already met him during his visit to Corsica and his coöperation with the patriotic party.

The Convention, suspecting such a design, and perhaps occasioning it by their suspicions, ordered him to their bar. That way, he well knew, led to the guillotine; and returning a respectful answer, he declared that he would never be found wanting in his duty, but pleaded age and infirmity as a reason for disobeying the summons. Their second order was more summary; and the French troops who were in Corsica, aided by those of the natives who were either influenced by hereditary party feelings or who were sincere in Jacobinism,¹ took the field against him. But the people were with him. He repaired to Corte, the capital of the island, and was again invested with the authority which he had held in the noonday of his fame. The Convention upon this denounced him as a rebel, and set a price upon his head. It was not the first time that France had proscribed Paoli.

Paoli now opened a correspondence with Lord Hood, promising, if the English would make an attack upon San Fiorenzo from the sea, he would, at the same time, attack it by land. This promise he was unable to perform; and Commodore Linzee, who, in reliance upon it, was sent upon this service, was repulsed with some loss. Lord Hood, who had now been compelled to evacuate Toulon, suspected Paoli of intentionally deceiving him. This was an injurious suspicion. Shortly afterwards he dispatched

¹ Sympathy with the extreme measures of the French revolutionists.

Lieutenant Colonel (afterwards Sir John) Moore¹ and Major Koehler to confer with him upon a plan of operations. Sir Gilbert Elliot accompanied them; and it was agreed upon that, in consideration of the succors, both military and naval, which his Britannic Majesty should afford for the purpose of expelling the French, the island of Corsica should be delivered into the immediate possession of his Majesty, and bind itself to acquiesce in any settlement he might approve of concerning its government and its future relation with Great Britain. While this negotiation was going on, Nelson cruised off the island with a small squadron, to prevent the enemy from throwing in supplies. Close to San Fiorenzo the French had a storehouse of flour, near their only mill; he watched an opportunity and landed one hundred and twenty men, who threw the flour into the sea, burnt the mill, and reëmbarked before one thousand men who were sent against him could occasion them the loss of a single man. While he exerted himself thus, keeping out all supplies, intercepting dispatches, attacking their outposts and forts, and cutting out² vessels from the bay,—a species of warfare which depresses the spirit of an enemy even more than it injures them, because of the sense of individual superiority which it indicates in the assailants,—troops were landed, and San Fiorenzo was besieged. The French, finding themselves unable to maintain that post, sunk one of their frigates, burnt another, and retreated to Bastia. Lord Hood submitted to General Dundas, who commanded the land forces, a plan for the reduction of this place. The general declined coöperating, thinking the attempt impracticable without a reënforcement of two thousand men which he expected from Gibraltar. Upon this Lord Hood determined to reduce it with the

¹ Son of the author, Dr. John Moore. Upon his death at Corunna, in January, 1809, Wolfe wrote the famous poem beginning:—

“Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
As his corse to the rampart we hurried.”

² “Cutting out,” i.e., capturing and carrying off from the harbor, or from under the guns of the enemy.

naval force under his command ; and leaving part of his fleet off Toulon, he came with the rest to Bastia.

He showed a proper sense of respect for Nelson's services and of confidence in his talents by taking care not to bring with him any older captain. A few days before their arrival, Nelson had had what he called a "brush" with the enemy. "If I had had with me five hundred troops," he said, "to a certainty I should have stormed the town ; and I believe it might have been carried. Armies go so slow that seamen think they never mean to get forward ; but I dare say they act on a surer principle, although we seldom fail." During this partial action our army appeared upon the heights, and having reconnoitered the place, returned to San Fiorenzo. "What the general could have seen to make a retreat necessary," said Nelson, "I cannot comprehend. A thousand men would certainly take Bastia ; with five hundred and Agamemnon I would attempt it. My seamen are now what British seamen ought to be,—almost invincible. They really mind shot no more than peas." General Dundas had not the same confidence. "After mature consideration," said he in a letter to Lord Hood, "and a personal inspection for several days of all circumstances, local as well as others, I consider the siege of Bastia, with our present means and force, to be a most visionary and rash attempt, such as no officer would be justified in undertaking." Lord Hood replied that nothing would be more gratifying to his feelings than to have the whole responsibility upon himself ; and that he was ready and willing to undertake the reduction of the place at his own risk, with the force and means at present there. General d'Aubant, who succeeded at this time to the command of the army, coincided in opinion with his predecessor, and did not think it right to furnish his lordship with a single soldier, cannon, or any stores. Lord Hood could only obtain a few artillerymen ; and ordering on board that part of the troops who, having been embarked as marines, were borne on the ships' books as part of their respective complements, he began the siege with eleven hundred and eighty-three soldiers, artillerymen, and marines, and two hundred and fifty sailors. "We are but few," said Nelson, "but of the right sort, our general at San Fiorenzo not giving us one of the five regiments he has there lying idle."

These men were landed on the 4th of April,¹ under Lieutenant Colonel Villetes and Nelson, who had now acquired from the army the title of brigadier.² Guns were dragged by the sailors up heights where it appeared almost impossible to convey them, — a work of the greatest difficulty, and which Nelson said could never, in his opinion, have been accomplished by any but British seamen. The soldiers, though less dexterous in such service, because not accustomed, like sailors, to habitual dexterity, behaved with equal spirit. "Their zeal," said the brigadier, "is almost unexampled. There is not a man but considers himself as personally interested in the event; and, deserted by the general, it has, I am persuaded, made them equal to double their numbers." This is one proof of many that for our soldiers to equal our seamen it is only necessary for them to be equally well commanded. They have the same heart and soul, as well as the same flesh and blood. Too much may, indeed, be exacted from them in a retreat; but set their face towards a foe,³ and there is nothing within the reach of human achievement which they cannot perform. The French had improved the leisure which our military commander had allowed them; and before Lord Hood commenced his operations, he had the mortification of seeing that the enemy were every day erecting new works, strengthening old ones, and rendering the attempt more difficult. La Combe St. Michel, the commissioner from the National Convention, who was in the city, replied in these terms to the summons of the British admiral: "I have hot shot³ for your ships, and bayonets for your troops. When two thirds of our men are killed, I will then trust to the generosity of the English." The siege, however, was not sustained with the firmness which such a reply seemed to augur. On the 19th of May a treaty of capitulation was begun; that same evening the troops from San Fiorenzo made their appearance on the hills, and on the following morning General d'Aubant arrived with the whole army to take possession of Bastia.

¹ 1794.

² Brigadier general, one who commands a brigade. He is in rank next above a colonel, and below a major general.

³ "Hot shot," i.e., shot heated to fire the enemies' ships.

The event of the siege had justified the confidence of the sailors; but they themselves excused the opinion of the generals when they saw what they had done. "I am all astonishment," said Nelson, "when I reflect on what we have achieved; one thousand regulars, fifteen hundred national guards, and a large party of Corsican troops—four thousand in all—laying down their arms to twelve hundred soldiers, marines, and seamen! I always was of opinion, have ever acted up to it, and never had any reason to repent it, that one Englishman was equal to three Frenchmen. Had this been an English town I am sure it would not have been taken by them." When it had been resolved to attack the place, the enemy were supposed to be far inferior in number; and it was not till the whole had been arranged, and the siege publicly undertaken, that Nelson received certain information of the great superiority of the garrison. This intelligence he kept secret, fearing lest, if so fair a pretext were afforded, the attempt would be abandoned. "My own honor," said he to his wife, "Lord Hood's honor, and the honor of our country must have been sacrificed had I mentioned what I knew; therefore you will believe what must have been my feelings during the whole siege, when I had often proposals made to me to write to Lord Hood to raise it." Those very persons who thus advised him were rewarded for their conduct at the siege of Bastia. Nelson, by whom it may truly be affirmed that Bastia was taken, received no reward. Lord Hood's thanks to him, both public and private, were, as he himself said, the handsomest which man could give; but his signal merits were not so mentioned in the dispatches as to make them sufficiently known to the nation, nor to obtain for him from government those honors to which they so amply entitled him. This could only have arisen from the haste in which the dispatches were written, certainly not from any deliberate purpose, for Lord Hood was uniformly his steady and sincere friend.

One of the cartel ships¹ which carried the garrison of Bastia to Toulon brought back intelligence that the French were about to sail from that port, such exertions had they made to repair the damage done at the evacuation, and to fit out a fleet. The intelligence was speedily verified. Lord Hood sailed in quest of them towards the islands of Hyeres.² The Agamemnon was with him. "I pray God," said Nelson, writing to his wife, "that we may meet their fleet. If any accident should happen to me I am sure my conduct will be such as will entitle you to the royal favor. Not that I have the least idea but I shall return to you, and full of honor; if not, the Lord's will be done. My name shall never be a disgrace to those who may belong to me. The little I have, I have given to you, except a small annuity; I wish it was more, but I have never got a farthing dishonestly; it descends from clean hands. Whatever fate awaits me, I pray God to bless you and preserve you for your son's sake." With a mind thus prepared and thus confident, his hopes and wishes seemed on the point of being gratified, when the enemy were discovered close under the land, near St. Tropez.² The wind fell and prevented Lord Hood from getting between them and the shore, as he designed; boats came out from Antibes² and other places to their assistance, and towed them within the shoals in Gourjean Roads, where they were protected by the batteries on isles St. Honore and Ste. Marguerite, and on Cape Garroupe.² Here the English admiral planned a new mode of attack, meaning to double on¹ five of the nearest ships; but the wind again died away, and it was found that they had anchored in compact order, guarding the only passage for large ships. There was no way of effecting this passage except by towing or warping the vessels, and this rendered the attempt impracticable. For this time the enemy escaped; but Nelson bore in mind the admirable plan of attack which Lord Hood had devised, and there came a day when they felt its tremendous effects.

¹ "Cartel ships," i.e., ships employed in the exchange of prisoners or in carrying letters (charta) to an enemy.

² The islands of Hyeres are southeast of Toulon; St. Tropez is northeast of the islands of Hyeres. The islands of St. Honore (Honorat) and Ste. Marguerite and Cape Garroupe are close to Antibes, which is between Cannes and Nice.

The Agamemnon was now dispatched to coöperate at the siege of Calvi with General Sir Charles Stuart, an officer who, unfortunately for his country, never had an adequate field allotted him for the display of those eminent talents which were, to all who knew him, so conspicuous. Nelson had less responsibility here than at Bastia, and was acting with a man after his own heart, who was never sparing of himself, and slept every night in the advanced battery. But the service was not less hard than that of the former siege. "We will fag ourselves to death," said he to Lord Hood, "before any blame shall lie at our doors. I trust it will not be forgotten that twenty-five pieces of heavy ordnance have been dragged to the different batteries, mounted, and all but three fought by seamen, except one artilleryman to point the guns." The climate proved more destructive than the service, for this was during the lion sun, as they there call our season of the dog days. Of two thousand men, above half were sick, and the rest like so many phantoms. Nelson described himself as the reed among the oaks, bowing before the storm when they were laid low by it. "All the prevailing disorders have attacked me," said he, "but I have not strength enough for them to fasten on." The loss from the enemy was not great, but Nelson received a serious injury; a shot struck the ground near him, and drove the sand and small gravel into one of his eyes. He spoke of it slightly at the time. Writing the same day to Lord Hood, he only said that he got a little hurt that morning,—not much; and the next day he said he should be able to attend his duty in the evening. In fact, he suffered it to confine him only one day, but the sight was lost.

¹ "To double on," i.e., to inclose between two fires.

After the fall of Calvi his services were, by a strange omission, altogether overlooked, and his name was not even mentioned in the list of wounded. This was no ways imputable to the admiral; for he sent home to government Nelson's journal of the siege, that they might fully understand the nature of his indefatigable and unequalled exertions. If those exertions were not rewarded in the conspicuous manner which they deserved, the fault was in the administration of the day, not in Lord Hood. Nelson felt himself neglected. "One hundred and ten days," said he, "I have been actually engaged, at sea and on shore, against the enemy,—three actions against ships, two against Bastia in my ship, four boat actions, and two villages taken, and twelve sail of vessels burnt. I do not know that any one has done more. I have had the comfort to be always applauded by my commander in chief, but never to be rewarded; and, what is more mortifying, for services in which I have been wounded others have been praised, who, at the same time, were actually in bed, far from the scene of action. They have not done me justice. But never mind, I'll have a gazette¹ of my own." How amply was this second sight² of glory realized!

The health of his ship's company had now, in his own words, been miserably torn to pieces by as hard service as a ship's crew ever performed. One hundred and fifty were in their beds when he left Calvi; of them he lost fifty, and believed that the constitutions of the rest were entirely destroyed. He was now sent with dispatches to Mr. Drake at Genoa, and had his first interview with the Doge.³ The French had at this time taken possession of Vado Bay, in the Genoese territory; and Nelson foresaw that, if their thoughts were bent on the invasion of Italy, they would accomplish it the ensuing spring. "The allied powers," he said, "are jealous of each other, and none but England is hearty in the cause." His wish was for peace, on fair terms, because England, he thought, was draining herself to maintain allies who would not fight for themselves. Lord Hood had now returned to England, and the command devolved on Admiral Hotham. The affairs of the Mediterranean wore at this time a gloomy aspect. The arts, as well as the arms, of the enemy were gaining the ascendancy there. Tuscany concluded peace, relying upon the faith of France, which was, in fact, placing itself at her mercy. Corsica was in danger. We had taken that island for ourselves, annexed it formally to the Crown of Great Britain, and given it a constitution as free as our own. This was done with the consent of the majority of the inhabitants, and no transaction between two countries was ever more fairly or legitimately conducted; yet our conduct was unwise. The island is large enough to form an independent state, and such we should have made it, under our protection, as long as protection might be needed. The Corsicans would then have felt as a nation. But when one party had given up the country to England, the natural consequence was that the other looked to France. The question proposed to the people was, To which would they belong? Our language and our religion¹ were against us; our unaccommodating manners, it is to be feared, still more so. The French were better politicians,—in intrigue they have ever been unrivaled,—and it now became apparent that, in spite of old wrongs, which ought never to have been forgotten or forgiven, their partisans were daily acquiring strength. It is part of the policy of France—and a wise policy it is—to impress upon other powers the opinion of its strength by lofty language, and by threatening before it strikes,—a system which, while it keeps up the spirit of its allies and perpetually stimulates their hopes, tends also to dismay its enemies. Corsica was now loudly threatened. The ¹ The English language and the Protestant religion. The Corsicans are Catholic, and their language is related to the French.

¹ An official or authoritative report. Nelson's prediction was verified in October, 1798, when an account of the battle of the Nile was published.

² "Second sight," i.e., a foreknowledge or foresight of future events.

³ The name given to the head of the government in Genoa and Venice.

French, who had not yet been taught to feel their own inferiority upon the seas, braved us, in contempt, upon that element. They had a superior fleet in the Mediterranean, and they sent it out with express orders to seek the English and engage them. Accordingly, the Toulon fleet, consisting of seventeen ships of the line and five smaller vessels, put to sea. Admiral Hotham received this information at Leghorn, and sailed immediately in search of them. He had with him fourteen sail of the line, and one Neapolitan, 74; but his ships were only half manned, containing but 7,650 men, whereas the enemy had 16,900. He soon came in sight of them; a general action was expected, and Nelson, as was his custom on such occasions, wrote a hasty letter to his wife, as that which might possibly contain his last farewell. "The lives of all," said he, "are in the hand of Him who knows best whether to preserve mine or not; my character and good name are in my own keeping."

But however confident the French government might be of their naval superiority, the officers had no such feeling; and after maneuvering for a day in sight of the English fleet, they suffered themselves to be chased. One of their ships, the Ça Ira, of 84 guns, carried away¹ her main and fore topmasts. The Inconstant frigate fired at the disabled ship, but received so many shot that she was obliged to leave her. Soon afterwards a French frigate took the Ça Ira in tow; and the Sans Culottes, 120, and the Jean Barras,² 74, kept about gunshot distance on her weather bow.³ The Agamemnon stood towards her, having no ship of the line to support her within several miles. As she drew near, the Ça Ira fired her stern guns so truly that not a shot missed some part of the ship, and latterly the masts were struck

¹ "Carried away," i.e., lost.

² These names arise from the French Revolution. "Ça Ira" is the refrain of a revolutionary song; "Sans Culottes," meaning without breeches, was accepted as a title of honor by the radicals; "Jean Barras" was a President of the Convention.

³ "Weather bow," i.e., the side of the bow exposed to the wind.

by every shot. It had been Nelson's intention not to fire before he touched her stern; but seeing how impossible it was that she should be supported, and how certainly the Agamemnon must be severely cut up if her masts were disabled, he altered his plan according to the occasion. As soon, therefore, as he was within a hundred yards of her stern, he ordered the helm to be put astarboard, and the driver and after-sails to be brailed up and shivered,¹ and, as the ship fell off, gave the enemy her whole broadside.² They instantly braced up the after-yards, put the helm aport, and stood after her again. This maneuver he practiced for two hours and a quarter, never allowing the Ça Ira to get a single gun from either side to bear on him; and when the French fired their after-guns now, it was no longer with coolness and precision, for every shot went far ahead. By this time her sails were hanging in tatters, her mizzenmast, mizzen topsail, and crossjack yards³ shot away. But the frigate which had her in tow hove in stays,⁴ and got her round. Both these French ships now brought their guns to bear, and opened their fire. The Agamemnon passed them within half pistol shot. Almost every shot passed over her, for the French had elevated their guns for the rigging and for distant firing, and did not think of altering the elevation. As soon as the Agamemnon's after-guns ceased to bear, she hove in stays, keeping a constant fire as she came round, and being worked, said Nelson, with as much exactness as if she had been turning into Spithead.⁵ On getting round he saw that the Sans Culottes, which had wore,⁶ with many of the

¹ "The helm to be put astarboard," i.e., the tiller to be turned to the right, and the ship therefore turned to the left or port side; "the driver," i.e., the spanker, a large sail set abaft the mizzenmast; "brailed up," i.e., hauled in — this must refer to the driver; "shivered," i.e., the yards trimmed so that the wind strikes on the edge of the sail.

² A simultaneous firing of all guns on one side of a warship.

³ The crossjack yard is the lower yard on the mizzenmast.

⁴ "Hove in stays," i.e., turned on the other tack.

⁵ A roadstead south of England.

⁶ Veered.

enemy's ships, was under his lee bow,¹ and standing to leeward. The admiral at the same time made the signal for the van ships to join him. Upon this Nelson bore away, and prepared to set all sail; and the enemy, having saved their ship, hauled close to the wind, and opened upon him a distant and ineffectual fire. Only seven of the Agamemnon's men were hurt,—a thing which Nelson himself remarked as wonderful; her sails and rigging were very much cut, and she had many shots in her hull, and some between wind and water.² The Ça Ira lost one hundred and ten men that day, and was so cut up that she could not get a topmast aloft during the night.

At daylight on the following morning the English ships were taken aback with a fine breeze from the northwest,³ while the enemy's fleet kept the southerly wind. The body of their fleet was about five miles distant; the Ça Ira, and the Censeur, 74, which had her in tow, about three and a half. All sail was made to cut these ships off; and as the French attempted to save them, a partial action was brought on. The Agamemnon was again engaged with her yesterday's antagonist; but she had to fight on both sides the ship at the same time. The Ça Ira and the Censeur fought most gallantly. The first lost nearly three hundred men, in addition to her former loss; the last, three hundred and fifty. Both at last struck; and Lieutenant Andrews, of the Agamemnon,—brother to the lady to whom Nelson had become attached in France, and, in Nelson's own words, "as gallant an officer as ever stepped a quarter-deck,"—hoisted English colors on board them both. The rest of the enemy's ships behaved very ill. As soon as these vessels had struck, Nelson went to Admiral Hotham and proposed that the two prizes should be left with the Illustrious and Courageux, which had been crippled in the action, and with four frigates, and that the rest of the fleet should pursue the enemy, and follow up the advantage to the utmost. But his reply was: "We must be contented; we have done very well." "Now," said Nelson, "had we taken ten sail, and allowed the eleventh to escape when it had been possible to have got at her, I could never have called it well done. Goodall backed me; I got him to write to the admiral, but it would not do. We should have had such a day as, I believe, the annals of England never produced." In this letter the character of Nelson fully manifests itself. "I wish," said he, "to be an admiral, and in the command of the English fleet. I should very soon either do much or be ruined; my disposition cannot bear tame and slow measures. Sure I am, had I commanded on the 14th, that either the whole French fleet would have graced my triumph, or I should have been in a confounded scrape." What the event would have been he knew from his prophetic feelings and his own consciousness of power; and we also know it now, for Aboukir and Trafalgar have told it us.

¹ "Lee bow," i.e., the bow not exposed to the wind.

² The part of a ship's side or bottom which is brought above the water by the rolling of the vessel, or by tidal changes.

³ This gave the position of advantage, or the "weather gauge," as seamen say; for the English could then drift against the enemy with the wind.

The Ça Ira and Censeur probably defended themselves with more obstinacy in this action from a persuasion that, if they struck, no quarter would be given, because they had fired red-hot shot, and had also a preparation sent, as they said, by the Convention, from Paris, which seems to have been of the nature of the Greek fire;¹ for it became liquid when it was discharged, and water would not extinguish its flame. This combustible was concealed with great care in the captured ships; like the red-hot shot, it had been found useless in battle. Admiral Hotham's action saved Corsica for the time; but the victory had been incomplete, and the arrival at Toulon of six sail of the line, two frigates, and two cutters from Brest, gave the French a superiority which, had they known how to use it, would materially have endangered the British Mediterranean fleet. That fleet had been greatly neglected during Lord Chatham's administration at the Admiralty,¹ and it did not, for some time, feel the beneficial effect of his removal. Lord Hood had gone home to represent the real state of affairs and solicit reënforcements adequate to the exigencies of the time and the importance of the scene of action. But that fatal error of under-proportioning the force to the service, that ruinous economy which, by sparing a little renders all that is spent useless, infected the British councils; and Lord Hood, not being able to obtain such reënforcements as he knew were necessary, resigned the command. "Surely," said Nelson, "the people at home have forgotten us." Another Neapolitan, 74, joined Admiral Hotham, and Nelson observed with sorrow that this was matter of exultation to an English fleet. When the storeships and victualers² from Gibraltar arrived, their escape from the enemy was thought wonderful; and yet, had they not escaped, "the game," said Nelson, "was up here. At this moment our operations are at a stand for want of ships to support the Austrians in getting possession of the seacoast of the King of Sardinia; and, behold, our admiral does not feel himself equal to show himself, much less to give assistance in their operations." It was reported that the French were again out with eighteen or twenty sail. The combined British and Neapolitan were but sixteen; should the enemy be only eighteen, Nelson made no doubt of a complete victory; but if they were twenty, he said it was not to be expected; and a battle without complete victory would have been destruction, because another mast was not to be got on that side Gibraltar. At length Admiral Man arrived with a squadron from England. "What they can mean by sending him with only five sail of the line," said Nelson, "is truly astonishing; but all men are alike, and we in this country do not find any amendment or alteration from the old Board of Admiralty. They should know that half the ships in the fleet require to go to England, and that long ago they ought to have reënforced us."

¹ "Greek fire," i.e., a substance supposed to have been made of sulphur, niter, and asphalt. Water would not quench it. It was used by the Greeks of the Eastern Empire for burning an enemy's ships and fortifications. After the conquest of Constantinople, in 1453, the Arabs learned the secret of its composition.

¹ Chatham was made First Lord of the Admiralty—a post for which he was unfit—by his younger brother, the Prime Minister, William Pitt.

² Ships used to carry provisions for other ships.

About this time Nelson was made colonel of marines,¹ a mark of approbation which he had long wished for rather than expected. It came in good season, for his spirits were oppressed by the thought that his services had not been acknowledged as they deserved; and it abated the resentful feeling which would else have been excited by the answer to an application to the War Office. During his four months' land service in Corsica he had lost all his ship furniture, owing to the movements of a camp. Upon this he wrote to the Secretary of War, briefly stating what his services on shore had been, and saying he trusted it was not asking an improper thing to request that the same allowance might be made to him which would be made to a land officer of his rank, which, situated as he was, would be that of a brigadier general; if this could not be accorded, he hoped that his additional expenses would be paid him. The answer which he received was that no pay had "ever been issued under the direction of the War Office to officers of the navy serving with the army on shore."

He now entered upon a new line of service. The Austrian and Sardinian armies, under General de Vins, required a British squadron to coöperate with them in driving the French from the Riviera di Genoa;² and as Nelson had been so much in the habit of soldiering, it was immediately fixed that the brigadier should go. He sailed from San Fiorenzo on this destination, but fell in, off Cape del Mele,³ with the enemy's fleet, who immediately gave his squadron chase. The chase lasted four and twenty hours, and, owing to the fickleness of the wind, the British ships were sometimes hard pressed; but the want of skill on the part of the French gavé them many advantages. Nelson bent his way back to San Fiorenzo, where the fleet, which was in the midst of watering and refitting, had for seven hours the mortification of seeing him almost in possession of the enemy, before the wind would allow them to put out to his assistance. The French, however, at evening, went off, not choosing to approach nearer the shore. During the night Admiral Hotham, by great exertions, got under weigh;¹ and having sought the enemy four days, came in sight of them on the fifth. Baffling winds and vexatious calms, so common in the Mediterranean, rendered it impossible to close with them; only a partial action could be brought on, and then the firing made a perfect calm.² The French, being to windward, drew inshore; and the English fleet was becalmed six or seven miles to the westward. L'Alcide, of 74 guns, struck; but before she could be taken possession of a box of combustibles in her foretop took fire, and the unhappy crew experienced how far more perilous their inventions were to themselves than to their enemies. So rapid was the conflagration that the French, in their official account, say the hull, the masts, and sails all seemed to take fire at the same moment; and though the English boats were put out to the assistance of the poor wretches on board, not more than two hundred could be saved. The Agamemnon, and Captain Rowley in the Cumberland, were just getting into close action a second time when the admiral called them off, the wind now being directly into the Gulf of Frejus, where the enemy anchored after the evening closed.

¹ "Colonel of marines," an honorable sinecure said to have been conferred on a few old post-captains.

² The coast of Italy about Genoa.

³ On the Riviera.

Nelson now proceeded to his station with eight sail of frigates under his command. Arriving at Genoa, he had a conference with Mr. Drake, the British envoy to that state, the result of which was that the object of the British must be to put an entire stop to all trade between Genoa, France, and the places occupied by the French troops; for unless this trade were stopped, it would be scarcely possible for the allied armies to hold their situation, and impossible for them to make any progress in driving the enemy out of the Riviera di Genoa. Mr. Drake was of opinion that even Nice might fall for want of supplies, if the trade with Genoa were cut off. This sort of blockade Nelson could not carry on without great risk to himself. A captain in the navy, as he represented to the envoy, is liable to prosecution for detention and damages. This danger was increased by an order which had then lately been issued, by which, when a neutral ship was detained, a complete specification of her cargo was directed to be sent to the Secretary of the Admiralty, and no legal process instituted against her till the pleasure of that board should be communicated. This was requiring an impossibility. The cargoes of ships detained upon this station, consisting chiefly of corn, would be spoiled long before the orders of the Admiralty could be known; and then, if they should happen to release the vessel, the owners would look to the captain for damages. Even the only precaution which could be taken against this danger involved another danger not less to be apprehended; for if the captain should direct the cargo to be taken out, the freight paid for, and the vessel released, the agent employed might prove fraudulent and become bankrupt; and in that case the captain became responsible. Such things had happened. Nelson therefore required, as the only means for carrying on that service which was judged essential to the common cause without exposing the officers to ruin, that the British envoy should appoint agents to pay the freight, release the vessels, sell the cargo, and hold the amount till process was had upon it, government thus securing its officers. "I am acting," said Nelson, "not only without the orders of my commander in chief, but, in some measure, contrary to him. However, I have not only the support of his Majesty's ministers, both at Turin and Genoa, but a consciousness that I am doing what is right and proper for the service of our King and country. Political courage¹ in an officer abroad is as highly necessary as military courage."

¹ "Under weigh," i.e., under way.

² According to a theory that the firing of cannon calms the air and sea.

¹ "Political courage," i. e., the courage to find and pursue the best policy.

This quality — which is as much rarer than military courage as it is more valuable, and without which the soldier's bravery is often of little avail — Nelson possessed in an eminent degree. His representations were attended to as they deserved. Admiral Hotham commended him for what he had done, and the attention of government was awakened to the injury which the cause of the allies continually suffered from the frauds of neutral vessels. "What changes in my life of activity!" said this indefatigable man. "Here I am, having commenced a coöperation with an old Austrian general, almost fancying myself charging at the head of a troop of horse! I do not write less than from ten to twenty letters every day; which, with the Austrian general and aids-de-camp, and my own little squadron, fully employ my time. This I like, — active service or none." It was Nelson's mind which supported his feeble body through these exertions. He was at this time almost blind, and wrote with very great pain. "Poor Agamemnon," he sometimes said, "is as nearly worn out as her captain, and both must soon be laid up to repair."

When Nelson first saw General de Vins he thought him an able man,¹ who was willing to act with vigor. The general charged his inactivity upon the Piedmontese and Neapolitans, whom, he said, nothing could induce to act; and he concerted a plan with Nelson for embarking a part of the Austrian army, and landing it in the rear of the French. But the English commodore soon began to suspect that the Austrian general was little disposed to any active operations. In the hope of spurring him on, he wrote to him, telling him that he had surveyed the coast to the westward as far as Nice, and would undertake to embark four or five thousand men, with their arms and a few days' provisions, on board the squadron, and land them within two miles of San Remo, with their fieldpieces. Respecting further provisions for the

¹ "I cannot allow my letter to go," wrote Nelson to Earl Spencer in 1795, "without saying that (the Austrian) General de Vins appears to be an officer who perfectly knows his duty and is well disposed to act with vigor on every proper occasion."

Austrian army, he would provide convoys, that they should arrive in safety; and if a reëmbarkation should be found necessary, he would cover it with the squadron. The possession of San Remo, as headquarters for magazines of every kind, would enable the Austrian general to turn his army to the eastward or westward. The enemy at Oneglia would be cut off from provisions, and men could be landed to attack that place whenever it was judged necessary. San Remo was the only place between Vado and Villefranche where the squadron could lie in safety and anchor in almost all winds. The bay was not as good as Vado for large ships; but it had a mole, — which Vado had not, — where all small vessels could lie, and load and unload their cargoes. This bay being in possession of the allies, Nice could be completely blockaded by sea. General de Vins, affecting, in his reply, to consider that Nelson's proposal had no other end than that of obtaining the Bay of San Remo as a station for the ships, told him, what he well knew and had expressed before, that Vado Bay was a better anchorage; nevertheless, if *Monsieur le Commandant Nelson*¹ was well assured that part of the fleet could winter there, there was no risk to which he would not expose himself with pleasure, for the sake of procuring a safe station for the vessels of his Britannic Majesty. Nelson soon assured the Austrian commander that this was not the object of his memorial. He now began to suspect that both the Austrian courts and their general had other ends in view than the cause of the allies. "This army," said he, "is slow beyond all description; and I begin to think that the Emperor is anxious to touch another four millions of English money. As for the German generals, war is their trade, and peace is ruin to them; therefore we cannot expect that they should have any wish to finish the war. The politics of courts are so mean that private people would be ashamed to act in the same way; all is trick and finesse, to which the common cause is sacrificed. The general wants a loophole. It has for some time appeared to me that he means to go no farther than his present position, and to lay the miscarriage of the enterprise against Nice—which has always been held out as the great object of his army—to the non-coöperation of the British fleet and of the Sardinians.”

¹ French phrase, meaning, "the commander, Mr. Nelson."

To prevent this plea Nelson again addressed De Vins, requesting only to know the time and the number of troops ready to embark; then he would, he said, dispatch a ship to Admiral Hotham, requesting transports, having no doubt of obtaining them, and trusting that the plan would be successful to its fullest extent. Nelson thought at the time that if the whole fleet were offered him for transports, he would find some other excuse; and Mr. Drake, who was now appointed to reside at the Austrian headquarters, entertained the same idea of the general's sincerity. It was not, however, put so clearly to the proof as it ought to have been. He replied that as soon as Nelson could declare himself ready with the vessels necessary for conveying ten thousand men, with their artillery and baggage, he would put the army in motion. But Nelson was not enabled to do this. Admiral Hotham, who was highly meritorious in leaving such a man so much at his own discretion, pursued a cautious system, ill according with the bold and comprehensive views of Nelson, who continually regretted Lord Hood, saying that the nation had suffered much by his resignation of the Mediterranean command. The plan which had been concerted, he said, would astonish the French, and perhaps the English.

There was no unity in the views of the allied powers, no cordiality in their coöperation, no energy in their councils. The neutral powers assisted France more effectually than the allies assisted each other. The Genoese ports were at this time filled with French privateers, which swarmed out every night, and covered the gulf; and French vessels were allowed to tow out of the port of Genoa itself, board vessels which were coming in, and then return into the mole. This was allowed without a remonstrance; while, though Nelson abstained most carefully from offering any offense to the Genoese territory or flag, complaints were so repeatedly made against his squadron that, he says, it seemed a trial who should be tired first, — they of complaining, or he of answering their complaints. But the question of neutrality was soon at an end. An Austrian commissary¹ was traveling from Genoa towards Vado; it was known that he was to sleep at Voltri, and that he had £10,000 with him, — a booty which the French minister in that city and the captain of a French frigate in that port considered as far more important than the word of honor of the one, the duties of the other, and the laws of neutrality. The boats of the frigate went out with some privateers, landed, robbed the commissary, and brought back the money to Genoa. The next day men were publicly enlisted in that city for the French army; seven hundred men were embarked, with seven thousand stand of arms,² on board the frigates and other vessels, who were to land between Voltri and Savona; there a detachment from the French army was to join them, and the Genoese peasantry were to be invited to insurrection, — a measure for which everything had been prepared. The night of the 13th was fixed for the sailing of this expedition; the Austrians called loudly for Nelson to prevent it, and he, on the evening of the 13th, arrived at Genoa. His presence checked the plan. The frigate, knowing her deserts, got within the merchant ships in the inner mole; and the Genoese government did not now even demand of Nelson respect to the neutral port, knowing that they had allowed, if not connived at, a flagrant breach of neutrality, and expecting the answer which he was prepared to return, — that it was useless and impossible for him to respect it longer.

But though this movement produced the immediate effect which was designed, it led to ill consequences, which Nelson foresaw, but, for want of sufficient force, was unable to prevent. His squadron was too small for the service which it had to perform. He required two 74's, and eight or ten frigates and sloops; but when he demanded this reënforcement, Admiral Hotham had left the command; Sir Hyde Parker succeeded till the new commander should arrive; and he immediately reduced it almost to nothing, leaving him only one frigate and a brig. This was a fatal error. While the Austrian and Sardinian troops, whether from the imbecility or the treachery of their leaders, remained inactive, the French were preparing for the invasion of Italy. Not many days before Nelson was thus summoned to Genoa, he chased a large convoy into Alassio. Twelve vessels he had formerly destroyed in that port, though two thousand French troops occupied the town. This former attack had made them take new measures of defense, and there were now above one hundred sail of victualers, gunboats, and ships of war. Nelson represented to the admiral how important it was to destroy these vessels, and offered, with his squadron of frigates, and the Culloden and Courageux, to lead himself in the Agamemnon, and take or destroy the whole. The attempt was not permitted; but it was Nelson's belief that, if it had been made, it would have prevented the attack upon the Austrian army which took place almost immediately afterwards.

¹ An officer of the commissarial department, which supplies provision, camp equipage, transport, etc., to troops.

² “Stand of arms,” i.e., a complete set of arms for one soldier, consisting of a musket, bayonet, cartridge box, and belt.

General de Vins demanded satisfaction of the Genoese government for the seizure of his commissary; and then, not waiting for their reply, took possession of some empty magazines of the French, and pushed his sentinels to the very gates of Genoa. Had he done so at first he would have found the magazines full; but timed as the measure was, and useless as it was to the cause of the allies, it was in character with the whole of the Austrian general's conduct; and it is no small proof of the dexterity with which he served the enemy that, in such circumstances, he could so act with Genoa as to contrive to put himself in the wrong. Nelson was at this time, according to his own expression, placed in a cleft stick.¹ Mr. Drake, the Austrian minister, and the

¹ "In a cleft stick," i.e., in a dilemma or awkward predicament. Anything closed upon by a cleft stick is held fast.

Austrian general, all joined in requiring him not to leave Genoa. If he left that port unguarded, they said, not only the imperial¹ troops at San Pier d'Arena and Voltri would be lost, but the French plan for taking post between Voltri and Savona would certainly succeed. If the Austrians should be worsted in the advanced posts, the retreat by the Bocchetta² would be cut off; and if this happened, the loss of the army would be imputed to him for having left Genoa. On the other hand, he knew that if he were not at Pietra, the enemy's gunboats would harass the left flank of the Austrians, who, if they were defeated,—as was to be expected from the spirit of all their operations,—would very probably lay their defeat to the want of assistance from the Agamemnon.

Had the force for which Nelson applied been given him, he could have attended to both objects; and had he been permitted to attack the convoy in Alassio, he would have disconcerted the plans of the French in spite of the Austrian general. He had foreseen the danger and pointed out how it might be prevented; but the means of preventing it were withheld. The attack was made, as he foresaw, and the gunboats brought their fire to bear upon the Austrians. It so happened, however, that the left flank, which was exposed to them, was the only part of the army that behaved well. This division stood its ground till the center and the right wing fled, and then retreated in a soldierlike manner. General de Vins gave up the command in the middle of the battle, pleading ill health. "From that moment," says Nelson, "not a soldier stayed at his post; it was the devil take the hindmost. Many thousands ran away who had never seen the enemy, some of them thirty miles from the advanced posts. Had I not—though, I own, against my inclination—been kept at Genoa, from eight thousand to ten thousand men would have been taken prisoners, and, amongst the number, General de Vins himself; but by this means the pass of the Bocchetta was kept open. The purser¹ of the ship, who was at Vado, ran with the Austrians eighteen miles without stopping, — the men without arms, officers without soldiers, women without assistance. The oldest officer, say they, never heard of so complete a defeat, and certainly without any reason. Thus has ended my campaign. We have established the French Republic, which, but for us, I verily believe, would never have been settled by such a volatile, changeable people. I hate a Frenchman; they are equally objects of my detestation whether royalists or republicans. In some points I believe the latter are the best.” Nelson had a lieutenant and two midshipmen taken at Vado. They told him, in their letter, that few of the French soldiers were more than three or four and twenty years old, a great many not more than fourteen, and all were nearly naked. They were sure, they said, his barge’s crew could have beat a hundred of them; and that, had he himself seen them, he would not have thought, if the world had been covered with such people, that they could have beaten the Austrian army.

¹ Of the empire of Austria.

² A mountain pass a few miles north of Genoa.

The defeat of General de Vins gave the enemy possession of the Genoese coast from Savona to Voltri, and it deprived the Austrians of their direct communication with the English fleet. The Agamemnon, therefore, could no longer be useful on this station, and Nelson sailed for Leghorn to refit. When his ship went into dock there was not a mast, yard, sail, or any part of the rigging but what stood in need of repair, having been cut to pieces with shot. The hull was so damaged that it had for some time been secured by having cables served or thrapped² round it.

¹ The officer who has charge of provisions and pay, and who keeps the accounts.

² Bound or fastened.

CHAPTER IV.

Sir John Jervis takes the command.—Genoa joins the French.—Bonaparte begins his career.—Evacuation of Corsica.—Action with the Sabina.—Battle of Cape St. Vincent.—Nelson made a rear admiral and a knight of the Bath.—He commands the inner squadron at the blockade of Cadiz.—Boat action in the Bay of Cadiz.—Expedition against Teneriffe.—Nelson loses an arm.—His sufferings in England, and his recovery.

SIR JOHN JERVIS had now arrived to take the command of the Mediterranean fleet. The Agamemnon having, as her captain said, been made as fit for sea as a rotten ship could be, Nelson sailed from Leghorn, and joined the admiral in Fiorenzo Bay. "I found him," said he, "anxious to know many things which I was a good deal surprised to find had not been communicated to him by others in the fleet; and it would appear that he was so well satisfied with my opinion of what is likely to happen and the means of prevention to be taken, that he had no reserve with me respecting his information and ideas of what is likely to be done." The manner in which Nelson was received is said to have excited some envy. One captain observed to him: "You did just as you pleased in Lord Hood's time, the same in Admiral Hotham's, and now again with Sir John Jervis; it makes no difference to you who is commander in chief." A higher compliment could not have been paid to any commander in chief than to say of him that he understood the merits of Nelson, and left him, as far as possible, to act upon his own judgment.

Sir John Jervis offered him the St. George, 90, or the Zealous, 74, and asked if he should have any objection to serve under him with his flag. He replied that if the Agamemnon were ordered home, and his flag were not arrived,¹ he should, on many accounts, wish to return to England; still, if the war continued, he should be very proud of hoisting his flag under Sir John's command. "We cannot spare you," said Sir John, "either as captain or admiral." Accordingly, he resumed his station in the Gulf of Genoa. The French had not followed up their successes in that quarter with their usual celerity. Scherer,¹ who commanded there, was one of the few French generals during the Revolution who owed their advancement to other causes than merit. He was a favorite of the Directory, but for the present, through the influence of Barras,² he was removed from a command for which his incapacity was afterwards clearly proved, and Bonaparte was appointed to succeed him. Bonaparte had given indications of his military talents at Toulon, and of his remorseless nature at Paris;³ but the extent either of his ability or his wickedness was at this time known to none, and perhaps not even suspected by himself.

¹ "If . . . his flag," etc., i.e., if he had not been made admiral, the only naval officer who has the right to signify his presence by flying a flag.

Nelson supposed, from the information which he had obtained, that one column of the French army would take possession of Port Especia, either penetrating through the Genoese territory or proceeding coastways in light vessels, our ships of war not being able to approach the coast because of the shallowness of the water. To prevent this, he said, two things were necessary,—the possession of Vado Bay and the taking of Port Especia. If either of these points were secured, Italy would be safe from any attack of the French by sea. General Beaulieu, who had now superseded De Vins in the command of the allied Austrian and Sardinian army, sent his nephew and aid-de-camp to communicate with Nelson, and inquire whether he could anchor in any other place than Vado Bay. Nelson replied that Vado was the only place where the British fleet could lie in safety; but all places would suit his squadron, and wherever the general came down to the seacoast, there he should find it. The Austrian repeatedly asked if there was not a risk of losing the squadron, and was constantly answered that if these ships should be lost the admiral would find others. But all plans of coöperation with the Austrians were soon frustrated by the battle of Montenotte. Beaulieu ordered an attack to be made upon the post of Voltri. It was made twelve hours before the time which he had fixed, and before he arrived to direct it. In consequence, the French were enabled to effect their retreat and fall back to Montenotte, thus giving the troops there a decisive superiority in number over the division which attacked them. This drew on the defeat of the Austrians. Bonaparte, with a celerity which had never before been witnessed in modern war, pursued his advantages, and in the course of a fortnight dictated to the court of Turin¹ terms of peace, or rather of submission, by which all the strongest places of Piedmont were put into his hands.

¹ Scherer had commanded the French at the battle described on pp. 91 and 92.

² One of the five members of the Directory. It was upon his motion Napoleon Bonaparte had been placed in command of the troops of the Convention.

³ Bonaparte had been present at the siege of Toulon, in 1793. He was then twenty-five. At Paris he had crushed the revolt of the royalists by the victory of the 5th of October, 1795.

On one occasion, and only on one, Nelson was able to impede the progress of this new conqueror. Six vessels, laden with cannon and ordnance stores for the siege of Mantua, sailed from Toulon for San Pier d'Arena. Assisted by Captain Cockburn, in the Meleager, he drove them under a battery, pursued them, silenced the batteries, and captured the whole. Military books, plans, and maps of Italy, with the different points marked upon them where former battles had been fought, sent by the Directory for Bonaparte's use, were found in the convoy. The loss of this artillery was one of the chief causes which compelled the French to raise the siege of Mantua; but there was too much treachery and too much imbecility, both in the councils and armies of the allied powers, for Austria to improve this momentary success. Bonaparte perceived that the conquest of all Italy was within his reach. Treaties, and the rights of neutral or of friendly powers, were as little regarded by him as by the government for which he acted. In open contempt of both he entered Tuscany and took possession of Leghorn. In consequence of this movement Nelson blockaded that port, and landed a British force in the isle of Elba to secure Porto Ferrajo. Soon afterwards he took the island of Capraja, which had formerly belonged to Corsica, being less than forty miles distant from it,—a distance, however, short as it was, which enabled the Genoese to retain it after their infamous sale of Corsica to France. Genoa had now taken part with France; its government had long covertly assisted the French, and now willingly yielded to the first compulsory menace which required them to exclude the English from their ports. Capraja was seized in consequence; but this act of vigor was not followed up as it ought to have been. England at that time depended too much upon the rotten governments of the Continent, and too little upon itself. It was determined by the British Cabinet to evacuate Corsica as soon as Spain should form an offensive alliance with France. This event, which, from the moment that Spain had been compelled to make peace, was clearly foreseen, had now taken place, and orders for the evacuation of the island were immediately sent out. It was impolitic to annex this island to the British dominions; but, having done so, it was disgraceful thus to abandon it. The disgrace would have been spared, and every advantage which could have been derived from the possession of the island secured, if the people had at first been left to form a government for themselves, and protected by us in the enjoyment of their independence.

¹ "Court of Turin," i.e., the government of Sardinia.

The viceroy, Sir Gilbert Elliot, deeply felt the impolicy and ignominy of this evacuation. The fleet also was ordered to leave the Mediterranean. This resolution was so contrary to the last instructions which had been received that Nelson exclaimed: “Do his Majesty’s ministers know their own minds? They at home,” said he, “do not know what this fleet is capable of performing,—anything and everything. Much as I shall rejoice to see England, I lament our present orders in sackcloth and ashes, so dishonorable to the dignity of England, whose fleets are equal to meet the world in arms; and of all the fleets I ever saw, I never beheld one, in point of officers and men, equal to Sir John Jervis's, who is a commander in chief able to lead them to glory." Sir Gilbert Elliot believed that the great body of the Corsicans were perfectly satisfied, as they had good reason to be, with the British government, sensible of its advantages, and attached to it. However this may have been, when they found that the English intended to evacuate the island they naturally and necessarily sent to make their peace with the French. The partisans of France found none to oppose them. A committee of thirty took upon them the government of Bastia, and sequestered¹ all the British property; armed Corsicans mounted guard at every place, and a plan was laid for seizing the viceroy. Nelson, who was appointed to superintend the evacuation, frustrated these projects. At a time when every one else despaired of saving stores, cannon, provisions, or property of any kind, and a privateer was moored across the mole head to prevent all boats from passing, he sent word to the committee that if the slightest opposition were made to the embarkment and removal of British property, he would batter the town down. The privateer pointed her guns at the officer who carried this message, and muskets were leveled against his boats from the mole head. Upon this, Captain Sutton, of the Egmont, pulling out his watch, gave them a quarter of an hour to deliberate upon their answer. In five minutes after the expiration of that time, the ships, he said, would open their fire. Upon this the very sentinels scampered off, and every vessel came out of the mole. A shipowner complained to the commodore that the municipality refused to let him take his goods out of the custom-house. Nelson directed him to say that unless they were instantly delivered he would open his fire. The committee turned pale, and without answering a word, gave him the keys. Their last attempt was to levy a duty upon the things that were reëmbarked. He sent them word that he would pay them a disagreeable visit if there were any more complaints. The committee then finding that they had to deal with a man who knew his own power, and was determined to make the British name respected, desisted from the insolent conduct which they had assumed; and it was acknowledged that Bastia never had been so quiet and orderly since the English were in possession of it. This was on the 14th of October; during the five following days the work of embarkation was carried on, the private property was saved, and public stores to the amount of £200,000. The French, favored by the Spanish fleet, which was at that time within twelve leagues of Bastia, pushed over troops from Leghorn, who landed near Cape Corse on the 18th, and on the 20th, at one in the morning, entered the citadel, an hour only after the British had spiked¹ the guns and evacuated it. Nelson embarked at daybreak, being the last person who left the shore; having thus, as he said, seen the first and the last of Corsica. Provoked at the conduct of the municipality and the disposition which the populace had shown to profit by the confusion, he turned towards the shore as he stepped into his boat, and exclaimed, "Now, John Corse,² follow the natural bent of your detestable character,—plunder and revenge." This, however, was not Nelson's deliberate opinion of the people of Corsica. He knew that their vices were the natural consequences of internal anarchy and foreign oppression, such as the same causes would produce in any people; and when he saw that of all those who took leave of the viceroy there was not one who parted from him without tears, he acknowledged that they manifestly acted not from dislike of the English, but from fear of the French. England, then, might, with more reason, reproach her own rulers for pusillanimity than the Corsicans for ingratitude.

¹ Took possession of.

Having thus ably effected this humiliating service, Nelson was ordered to hoist his broad pendant³ on board the Minerve frigate,

¹ Plugged up the touchhole with spikes.

² A nickname used to designate the Corsican people, as the name "John Bull" designates the people of England.

³ See Note 2, p. 41.

Captain George Cockburn, and, with the Blanche under his command, proceed to Porto Ferrajo and superintend the evacuation of that place also. On his way he fell in with two Spanish frigates, the Sabina and the Ceres. The Minerve engaged the former, which was commanded by Don Jacobo Stuart,¹ a descendant of the Duke of Berwick. After an action of three hours, during which the Spaniards lost one hundred and sixty-four men, the Sabina struck. The Spanish captain, who was the only surviving officer, had hardly been conveyed on board the Minerve when another enemy's frigate came up, compelled her to cast off the prize, and brought her a second time to action. After half an hour's trial of strength, this new antagonist wore and hauled off; but a Spanish squadron of two ships of the line and two frigates came in sight. The Blanche, from which the Ceres had got off, was far to windward, and the Minerve escaped only by the anxiety of the enemy to recover their own ship.² As soon as Nelson reached Porto Ferrajo he sent his prisoner in a flag of truce³ to Carthagen, having returned him his sword. This he did in honor of the gallantry which Don Jacobo had displayed, and not without some feeling of respect for his ancestry. "I felt it," said he, "consonant to the dignity of my country, and I always act as I feel right, without regard to custom. He was reputed the best officer in Spain, and his men were worthy of such a commander." By the same flag of truce he sent back all the Spanish prisoners at Porto Ferrajo, in exchange for whom he received his own men who had been taken in the prize.⁴

General de Burgh, who commanded at the isle of Elba, did not think himself authorized to abandon the place till he had received

¹ Don Jacobo (James) Stuart. The Duke of Berwick was a son of James II. of England. He accompanied his father in exile, and having gained a victory for Spain, became a Spanish nobleman, with title of Duke of Liria and Xerica.

² The Sabina.

³ "Flag of truce," i.e., a vessel flying a flag of truce.

⁴ The Sabina, which had been retaken by the French after it had been manned by an English crew.

specific instructions from England to that effect, professing that he was unable to decide between the contradictory orders of government, or to guess at what their present intentions might be; but he said his only motive for urging delay in this measure arose from a desire that his own conduct might be properly sanctioned, not from any opinion that Porto Ferrajo ought to be retained. But Naples having made peace, Sir John Jervis considered his business with Italy as concluded; and the protection of Portugal was the point to which he was now instructed to attend. Nelson, therefore, whose orders were perfectly clear and explicit, withdrew the whole naval establishment from that station, leaving the transports victualed, and so arranged that all the troops and stores could be embarked in three days. He was now about to leave the Mediterranean. Mr. Drake, who had been our minister at Genoa, expressed to him on this occasion the very high opinion which the allies entertained of his conspicuous merit, adding that it was impossible for any one who had the honor of coöperating with him not to admire the activity, talents, and zeal which he had so eminently and constantly displayed. In fact, during this long course of services in the Mediterranean, the whole of his conduct had exhibited the same zeal, the same indefatigable energy, the same intuitive judgment, the same prompt and unerring decision which characterized his after career of glory. His name was as yet hardly known to the English public, but it was feared and respected throughout Italy. A letter came to him, directed "Horatio Nelson, Genoa;" and the writer, when he was asked how he could direct it so vaguely, replied, "Sir, there is but one Horatio Nelson in the world." At Genoa, in particular, where he had so long been stationed, and where the nature of his duty first led him to continual disputes with the government and afterwards compelled him to stop the trade of the port, he was equally respected by the Doge and by the people; for, while he maintained the rights and interests of Great Britain with becoming firmness, he tempered the exercise of power with courtesy and humanity wherever duty would permit. "Had all my actions," said he, writing at this time to his wife, "been gazetted, not one fortnight would have passed during the whole war without a letter from me.¹ One day or other I will have a long gazette to myself. I feel that such an opportunity will be given me. I cannot, if I am in the field of glory, be kept out of sight; wherever there is anything to be done, there Providence is sure to direct my steps."

These hopes and anticipations were soon to be fulfilled. Nelson's mind had long been irritated and depressed by the fear that a general action would take place before he could join the fleet. At length he sailed from Porto Ferrajo with a convoy for Gibraltar; and having reached that place, proceeded to the westward in search of the admiral. Off the mouth of the Straits he fell in with the Spanish fleet; and on the 13th of February, reaching the station off Cape St. Vincent's, he communicated this intelligence to Sir John Jervis. He was now directed to shift his broad pendant on board the Captain, 74, Captain R. W. Miller; and before sunset the signal was made to prepare for action, and to keep, during the night, in close order. At daybreak the enemy were in sight. The British force consisted of two ships of 100 guns, two of 98, two of 90, eight of 74, and one of 64,—fifteen of the line in all, with four frigates, a sloop, and a cutter. The Spaniards had one four-decker, of 136 guns; six three-deckers, of 112; two 84's; eighteen 74's,—in all, twenty-seven ships of the line, with ten frigates and a brig. Their admiral, Don Joseph de Cordova, had learned from an American, on the 5th, that the English had only nine ships, which was indeed the case when his informer had seen them; for a reënforcement of five ships from England, under Admiral Parker, had not then joined, and the Culloden had parted company. Upon this information the Spanish commander, instead of going into Cadiz, as was his intention when he sailed from Carthagená, determined to seek an enemy so inferior in force; and relying with fatal confidence upon the American's account, he suffered his ships to remain too far dispersed and in some disorder. When the morning of the 14th broke, and discovered the English fleet, a fog for some time concealed their number. The lookout ship of the Spaniards, fancying that her signal was disregarded, because so little notice seemed to be taken of it, made another signal, that the English force consisted of forty sail of the line. The captain afterwards said he did this to rouse the admiral; it had the effect of perplexing him and alarming the whole fleet. The absurdity of such an act shows what was the state of the Spanish navy, under that miserable government by which Spain was so long oppressed and degraded and finally betrayed.¹ In reality, the general incapacity of the naval officers was so well known that in a pasquinade² which about this time appeared at Madrid, wherein the different orders of the state were advertised for sale, the greater part of the sea officers, with all their equipments, were offered as a gift; and it was added that any person who would please to take them should receive a handsome gratuity.

¹ Referring to his letters to the government regarding the progress of affairs (see p. 76).

Before the enemy could form a regular order of battle, Sir John Jervis, by carrying a press of sail, came up with them, passed through their fleet, then tacked, and thus cut off nine of their ships from the main body. These ships attempted to form on the larboard tack, either with a design of passing through the British line or to leeward of it, and thus rejoining their friends. Only one of them succeeded in this attempt, and that only because she was so covered with smoke that her intention was not discovered till she had reached the rear. The others were so warmly received that they put about, took to flight, and did not appear again in the action till its close. The admiral was now able to direct his attention to the enemy's main body, which was still superior in number to his whole fleet, and more so in weight of metal.¹ He made signal to tack in succession. Nelson, whose station was in the rear of the British line, perceived that the Spaniards were bearing up before the wind with an intention of forming their line, going large,² and joining their separated ships, or else of getting off without an engagement. To prevent either of these schemes he disobeyed the signal without a moment's hesitation, and ordered his ship to be wore. This at once brought him into action with the Santissima Trinidad, 136, the San Joseph, 112, the Salvador del Mundo, 112, the San Nicolas, 80, the San Isidro, 74, another 74, and another first-rate. Trowbridge, in the Culloden, immediately joined and most nobly supported him; and for nearly an hour did the Culloden and Captain maintain what Nelson called "this apparently, but not really, unequal contest,"—such was the advantage of skill and discipline, and the confidence which brave men derive from them. The Blenheim then passing between them and the enemy, gave them a respite, and poured in her fire upon the Spaniards. The Salvador del Mundo and San Isidro dropped astern, and were fired into, in a masterly style, by the Excellent, Captain Collingwood. The San Isidro struck, and Nelson thought that the Salvador struck also. "But Collingwood," says he, "disdaining the parade of taking possession of beaten enemies, most gallantly pushed up, with every sail set, to save his old friend and messmate, who was, to appearance, in a critical situation;" for the Captain was at this time actually fired upon by three first-rates, by the San Nicolas, and by a 74, within about pistol shot of that vessel. The Blenheim was ahead, the Culloden crippled and astern. Collingwood ranged up, and hauling up his mainsail just astern, passed within ten feet of the San Nicolas, giving her a most tremendous fire, then passed on for the Santissima Trinidad. The San Nicolas luffing up,¹ the San Joseph fell on board² her, and Nelson resumed his station abreast of them, and close alongside. The Captain was now incapable of further service, either in the line or in chase. She had lost her fore-topmast; not a sail, shroud, or rope was left, and her wheel was shot away. Nelson therefore directed Captain Miller to put the helm astarboard, and, calling for the boarders,³ ordered them to board.

¹ Under the government of Charles IV. and his favorite and foreign minister, Godoy. In 1808 the King was forced by the hatred of his people to abdicate in favor of his son. Both betrayed the Spaniards and gave the kingdom to Napoleon.

² A satire or lampoon. Towards the end of the fifteenth century there lived in Rome a tailor,—some say a cobbler,—named Pasquino. He had a sharp and caustic tongue; and after his death his name was fastened to a broken statue opposite his shop, upon which satires and lampoons were hung.

¹ "Weight of metal," i.e., number and weight of guns.

² Before the wind.

Captain Berry, who had lately been Nelson's first lieutenant, was the first man who leaped into the enemy's mizzenchains.⁴ Miller, when in the very act of going, was ordered by Nelson to remain. Berry was supported from the spritsail yard,⁵ which locked in the San Nicolas's main rigging. A soldier of the 69th. broke the upper quarter-gallery window and jumped in, followed by the commodore himself, and by others as fast as possible. The cabin doors were fastened, and the Spanish officers fired their pistols at them through the window; the doors were soon forced, and the Spanish brigadier fell while retreating to the quarter-deck. Nelson pushed on, and found Berry in possession of the poop, and the Spanish ensign hauling down. He passed on to the fore-castle, where he met two or three Spanish officers, and received their swords. The English were now in full possession of every part of the ship; and a fire of pistols and musketry opened upon them from the admiral's stern gallery of the San Joseph. Nelson, having placed sentinels at the different ladders, and ordered Captain Miller to send more men into the prize, gave orders for boarding that ship from the San Nicolas. It was done in an instant, he himself leading the way, and exclaiming, "Westminster Abbey,⁶ or victory!" Berry assisted him into the main

¹ "Luffing up," i.e., coming up in the face of the wind.

² To "fall on board," or "aboard of," is to come into collision with.

³ The officers and men, armed with cutlasses and pistols, who are detailed to attack an enemy by boarding.

⁴ Chains or bars connected with the mizzenmast.

⁵ "Spiritsail yard," i.e., a yard supporting a spritsail.

⁶ Some of the great men of England have been buried in Westminster Abbey.

chains; and at that moment a Spanish officer looked over the quarter-deck rail, and said they surrendered. It was not long before he was on the quarter-deck, where the Spanish captain presented to him his sword, and told him the admiral was below, dying of his wounds. There, on the quarter-deck of an enemy's first-rate, he received the swords of the officers, giving them, as they were delivered, one by one, to William Fearney, one of his old Agamemnon's, who, with the utmost coolness, put them under his arm. One of his sailors came up, and, with an Englishman's feeling, took him by the hand, saying he might not soon have such another place to do it in, and he was heartily glad to see him there. Twenty-four of the Captain's men were killed and fifty-six wounded,—a fourth part of the loss sustained by the whole squadron falling upon this ship. Nelson received only a few bruises.

The Spaniards had still eighteen or nineteen ships which had suffered little or no injury. That part of the fleet which had been separated from the main body in the morning was now coming up, and Sir John Jervis made signal to bring to.¹ His ships could not have formed, without abandoning those which they had captured, and running to leeward; the Captain was lying a perfect wreck on board her two prizes, and many of the other vessels were so shattered in their masts and rigging as to be wholly unmanageable. The Spanish admiral, meantime, according to his official account, being altogether undecided in his own opinion respecting the state of the fleet, inquired of his captains whether it was proper to renew the action. Nine of them answered explicitly that it was not; others replied that it was expedient to delay the business. The Pelayo and the Principe Conquistador were the only ships that were for fighting.

As soon as the action was discontinued, Nelson went on board the admiral's ship. Sir John Jervis received him on the quarter-deck, took him in his arms, and said he could not sufficiently thank him. For this victory the commander in chief was rewarded with the title of Earl St. Vincent.¹ Nelson, who, before the action was known in England, had been advanced to the rank of rear admiral,² had the Order of the Bath³ given him. The sword

¹ "To bring to," i.e., to check the course of the ships.

¹ SOUTHEY'S NOTE. — In the official letter of Sir John Jervis, Nelson was not mentioned. It is said that the admiral had seen an instance of the ill consequence of such selections after Lord Howe's victory, and therefore would not name any individual, thinking it proper to speak to the public only in terms of general approbation. His private letter to the First Lord of the Admiralty was, with his consent, published, for the first time, in a Life of Nelson, by Mr. Harrison. Here it is said that "Commodore Nelson, who was in the rear, on the starboard tack, took the lead on the larboard, and contributed very much to the fortune of the day." It is also said that he boarded the two Spanish ships successively; but the fact that Nelson wore without orders, and thus planned as well as accomplished the victory, is not explicitly stated. Perhaps it was thought proper to pass over this part of his conduct in silence, as a splendid fault; but such an example is not dangerous. The author of the work in which this letter was first made public protests against those over-zealous friends "who would make the action rather appear as Nelson's battle than that of the illustrious commander in chief, who derives from it so deservedly his title. No man," he says, "ever less needed, or less desired, to strip a single leaf from the honored wreath of any other hero, with the vain hope of augmenting his own, than the immortal Nelson; no man ever more merited the whole of that which a generous nation unanimously presented to Sir John Jervis than the Earl of St. Vincent." Certainly Earl St. Vincent well deserved the reward which he received; but it is not detracting from his merit to say that Nelson is fully entitled to as much fame from this action as the commander in chief; not because the brunt of the action fell upon him; not because he was engaged with all the four ships which were taken, and took two of them, it may almost be said, with his own hand; but because the decisive movement which enabled him to perform all this, and by which the action became a victory, was executed in neglect of orders, upon his own judgment, and at his peril. Earl St. Vincent deserved his earldom; but it is not to the honor of those by whom titles were distributed in those days that Nelson never obtained the rank of earl for either of those victories which he lived to enjoy, though the one was the most complete and glorious in the annals of naval history, and the other the most important in its consequences of any which was achieved during the whole war.

² A rear admiral is of the third grade, carrying his flag on the hindmost mast.

³ Knights of the Bath were an old order first formed in the fourteenth century, and named from the bath taken before the knighting, to denote a purification from stain. Nelson was now Sir Horatio Nelson.

of the Spanish rear admiral, which Sir John Jervis insisted upon his keeping, he presented to the mayor and corporation of Norwich, saying that he knew no place where it could give him or his family more pleasure to have it kept than in the capital city of the county where he was born. The freedom of that city was voted him on this occasion.¹ But of all the numerous congratulations which he received, none could have affected him with deeper delight than that which came from his venerable father. "I thank my God," said this excellent man, "with all the power of a grateful soul, for the mercies he has most graciously bestowed on me in preserving you. Not only my few acquaintance here, but the people in general, met me at every corner with such handsome words that I was obliged to retire from the public eye. The height of glory to which your professional judgment, united with a proper degree of bravery, guarded by Providence, has raised you, few sons, my dear child, attain to, and fewer fathers live to see. Tears of joy have involuntarily trickled down my furrowed cheeks; who could stand the force of such general congratulation? The name and services of Nelson have sounded throughout this city of Bath, from the common ballad singer to the public theater." The good old man concluded by telling him that the field of glory in which he had so long been conspicuous was still open, and by giving him his blessing.

Sir Horatio, who had now hoisted his flag as rear admiral of the blue,² was sent to bring away the troops from Porto Ferrajo; having performed this, he shifted his flag to the Theseus. That ship had taken part in the mutiny in England,³ and being just arrived from home, some danger was apprehended from the temper of the men. This was one reason why Nelson was removed to her. He had not been on board many weeks before a paper, signed in the name of all the ship's company, was dropped on the quarter-deck, containing these words: "Success attend Admiral Nelson! God bless Captain Miller! We thank them for the officers they have placed over us. We are happy and comfortable, and will shed every drop of blood in our veins to support them; and the name of the Theseus shall be immortalized as high as her captain's." Wherever Nelson commanded, the men soon became attached to him; in ten days' time he would have restored the most mutinous ship in the navy to order. Whenever an officer fails to win the affections of those who are under his command, he may be assured that the fault is chiefly in himself.

¹ He was made a freeman of the city. With this was anciently connected certain privileges and immunities, but the gift of the freedom of a city is now merely an honor.

² The blue squadron. In the divisions of the English fleet the admirals formerly bore the red flag, vice admirals the white, and rear admirals the blue.

³ A mutiny occurred in 1797 in some of the naval stations, which was put down by Lord Howe.

While Sir Horatio was in the Theseus he was employed in the command of the inner squadron at the blockade of Cadiz. During this service the most perilous action occurred in which he was ever engaged. Making a night attack upon the Spanish gunboats, his barge was attacked by an armed launch, under their commander, Don Miguel Tregoyen, carrying twenty-six men. Nelson had with him only his ten bargemen, Captain Freemantle, and his cockswain, John Sykes, an old and faithful follower, who twice saved the life of his admiral by parrying the blows that were aimed at him, and at last actually interposed his own head to receive the blow of a Spanish saber which he could not by any other means avert,—thus dearly was Nelson beloved. This was a desperate service, hand to hand with swords; and Nelson always considered that his personal courage was more conspicuous on this occasion than on any other during his whole life.¹ Notwithstanding the great disproportion of numbers, eighteen of the enemy were killed, all the rest wounded, and their launch taken. Nelson would have asked for a lieutenancy for Sykes if he had served long enough. His manner and conduct, he observed, were so entirely above his situation that nature certainly intended him for a gentleman; but though he recovered from the dangerous wound which he received in this act of heroic attachment, he did not live to profit by the gratitude and friendship of his commander.

¹ See Nelson's Memoirs at the end of this book.

Twelve days after this rencounter, Nelson sailed at the head of an expedition against Teneriffe. A report had prevailed a few months before that the viceroy of Mexico, with the treasure ships, had put into that island. This had led Nelson to meditate the plan of an attack upon it, which he communicated to Earl St. Vincent. He was perfectly aware of the difficulties of the attempt. "I do not," said he, "reckon myself equal to Blake;¹ but, if I recollect right, he was more obliged to the wind coming off the land than to any exertions of his own. The approach by sea to the anchoring place is under very high land, passing three valleys; therefore the wind is either in from the sea, or squally with calms from the mountains;" and he perceived that if the Spanish ships were won, the object would still be frustrated if the wind did not come off shore. The land force, he thought, would render success certain; and there were the troops from Elba, with all necessary stores and artillery, already embarked. "But here," said he, "soldiers must be consulted; and I know, from experience, they have not the same boldness in undertaking a political measure that we have. We look to the benefit of our country, and risk our own fame every day to serve her; a soldier obeys his orders, and no more." Nelson's experience at Corsica justified him in this harsh opinion; he did not live to see the glorious days of the British army under Wellington.² The army from

¹ Robert Blake (1599–1657), the great admiral of the English fleet in Cromwell's time. His victory over the Dutch fleet led by Van Tromp was followed by his cutting out from under the guns of Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe, a fleet of Spanish galleons laden with silver. The great glory which Blake won from this latter deed, and the report of the incoming treasure ships, may have incited Nelson to his expedition.

² Sir Arthur Wellesley, Duke of Wellington (1769–1852). In the Peninsular War, which was carried on from 1808 to 1814 between Great Britain and Napoleon in Spain and Portugal, the Duke of Wellington was the great leader of the English.

Elba, consisting of thirty-seven hundred men, would do the business, he said, in three days, probably in much less time; and he would undertake, with a very small squadron, to perform the naval part; for though the shore was not easy of access, the transports might run in and land the troops in one day.

The report concerning the viceroy was unfounded; but a homeward bound Manilla ship put into Santa Cruz at this time, and the expedition was determined upon. It was not fitted out upon the scale which Nelson had proposed. Four ships of the line, three frigates, and the Fox cutter, formed the squadron, and he was allowed to choose such ships and officers as he thought proper. No troops were embarked, the seamen and marines of the squadron being thought sufficient. His orders were to make a vigorous attack, but on no account to land in person, unless his presence should be absolutely necessary. The plan was that the boats should land in the night, between the fort on the northeast side of Santa Cruz Bay and the town, make themselves masters of that fort, and then send a summons to the governor. By midnight the three frigates, having the force on board which was intended for this debarkation, approached within three miles of the place; but owing to a strong gale of wind in the offing and a strong current against them inshore, they were not able to get within a mile of the landing place before daybreak, and then they were seen, and their intention discovered. Trowbridge and Bowen, with Captain Oldfield, of the marines, went, upon this, to consult with the admiral what was to be done; and it was resolved that they should attempt to get possession of the heights above the fort. The frigates accordingly landed their men; and Nelson stood in with the line-of-battle ships, meaning to batter the fort, for the purpose of distracting the attention of the garrison. A calm, and contrary currents, hindered him from getting within a league of the shore; and the heights were by this time so secured, and manned with such a force, as to be judged impracticable. Thus foiled in his plans by circumstances of wind and tide, he still considered it a point of honor that some attempt should be made.

This was on the 22d of July. He reëmbarked his men that night, got the ships, on the 24th, to anchor about two miles north of the town, and made show as if he intended to attack the heights. At six in the evening signal was made for the boats to prepare to proceed on service as previously ordered.

When this was done, Nelson addressed a letter to the commander in chief,—the last which was ever written with his right hand. “I shall not,” said he, “enter on the subject why we are not in possession of Santa Cruz. Your partiality will give credit that all has hitherto been done which was possible, but without effect. This night I, humble as I am, command the whole, destined to land under the batteries of the town; and to-morrow my head will probably be crowned either with laurel or cypress.¹ I have only to recommend Josiah Nisbet to you and my country. The Duke of Clarence, should I fall, will, I am confident, take a lively interest for my son-in-law, on his name being mentioned.” Perfectly aware how desperate a service this was likely to prove, before he left the Theseus he called Lieutenant Nisbet, who had the watch on deck, into the cabin, that he might assist in arranging and burning his mother’s letters. Perceiving that the young man was armed, he earnestly begged him to remain behind. “Should we both fall, Josiah,” said he, “what would become of your poor mother? The care of the Theseus falls to you; stay, therefore, and take charge of her.” Nisbet replied: “Sir, the ship must take care of herself; I will go with you to-night, if I never go again.”

He met his captains at supper on board the Seahorse, Captain Freemantle, whose wife, whom he had lately married in the Mediterranean, presided at table. At eleven o’clock the boats, containing between six hundred and seven hundred men, with one hundred and eighty on board the Fox cutter, and from seventy to eighty in a boat which had been taken the day before, proceeded in six divisions towards the town, conducted by all the captains of the squadron except Freemantle and Bowen, who attended with Nelson to regulate and lead the way to the attack. They were to land on the mole, and thence hasten, as fast as possible, into the great square; then form, and proceed as should be found expedient. They were not discovered till about half-past one o'clock, when, being within half gunshot of the landing place, Nelson directed the boats to cast off from each other,¹ give a huzza, and push for the shore. But the Spaniards were excellently well prepared. The alarm bells answered the huzza, and a fire of thirty or forty pieces of cannon, with musketry from one end of the town to the other, opened upon the invaders. Nothing, however, could check the intrepidity with which they advanced. The night was exceedingly dark; most of the boats missed the mole, and went on shore through a raging surf, which stove all to the left of it. The admiral, Freemantle, Thompson, Bowen, and four or five other boats, found the mole; they stormed it instantly, and carried it, though it was defended, as they imagined, by four or five hundred men. Its guns, which were six-and-twenty pounders, were spiked; but such a heavy fire of musketry and grape was kept up from the citadel and the houses at the head of the mole that the assailants could not advance, and nearly all of them were killed or wounded.

¹ The victor in contest, whether of song, poetry, dance, athletics, or battle, was, among the Greeks, crowned with laurel. The Romans used cypress at funerals.

In the act of stepping out of the boat, Nelson received a shot through the right elbow, and fell; but as he fell, he caught the sword, which he had just drawn, in his left hand, determined never to part with it while he lived; for it had belonged to his uncle, Captain Suckling, and he valued it like a relic. Nisbet, who was close to him, placed him at the bottom of the boat, and laid his hat over the shattered arm, lest the sight of the blood, which gushed out in great abundance, should increase his faintness. He then examined the wound, and taking some silk handkerchiefs from his neck, bound them round tight above the lacerated vessels. Had it not been for this presence of mind in his son-in-law, Nelson must have perished. One of his bargemen, by name Lovel, tore his shirt into shreds, and made a sling with them for the broken limb. They then collected five other seamen, by whose assistance they succeeded at length in getting the boat afloat; for it had grounded with the falling tide. Nisbet took one of the oars, and ordered the steersman to go close under the guns of the battery, that they might be safe from its tremendous fire. Hearing his voice, Nelson roused himself, and desired to be lifted up in the boat, that he might look about him. Nisbet raised him up; but nothing could be seen except the firing of the guns on shore, and what could be discerned by their flashes upon the stormy sea. In a few minutes a general shriek was heard from the crew of the Fox, which had received a shot under water, and went down. Ninety-seven men were lost in her; eighty-three were saved, many by Nelson himself, whose exertions on this occasion greatly increased the pain and danger of his wound. The first ship which the boat could reach happened to be the Seahorse; but nothing could induce him to go on board, though he was assured that if they attempted to row to another ship, it might be at the risk of his life. "I had rather suffer death," he replied, "than alarm Mrs. Freemantle, by letting her see me in this state, when I can give her no tidings whatever of her husband." They pushed on for the Theseus. When they came alongside he peremptorily refused all assistance in getting on board, so impatient was he that the boat should return, in hopes that it might save a few more from the Fox. He desired to have only a single rope thrown over the side, which he twisted round his left hand, saying, "Let me alone; I have yet my legs left, and one arm. Tell the surgeon to make haste and get his instruments. I know I must lose my right arm, so the sooner it is off the better."¹ The spirit which he displayed in jumping up the ship's side astonished everybody.

¹ Nelson's regulation reads: "That each ship's boats should be kept together by towing each other, which will keep the people of each ship collected, and the boats will be in six divisions and nearly got on shore at the same moment."

¹ SOUTHEY'S NOTE. — During the peace of Amiens, when Nelson was passing through Salisbury, and was received there with those acclamations

Freemantle had been severely wounded in the right arm soon after the admiral. He was fortunate enough to find a boat at the beach, and got instantly to his ship. Thompson was wounded; Bowen killed, to the great regret of Nelson; as was also one of his own officers, Lieutenant Weatherhead, who had followed him from the Agamemnon, and whom he greatly and deservedly esteemed. Trowbridge, meantime, fortunately for his party, missed the mole in the darkness, but pushed on shore under the batteries, close to the south end of the citadel. Captain Waller, of the Emerald, and two or three other boats, landed at the same time. The surf was so high that many others put back. The boats were instantly filled with water, and stove against the rocks; and most of the ammunition in the men's pouches was wetted. Having collected a few men, they pushed on to the great square, hoping there to find the admiral and the rest of the force. The ladders were all lost, so that they could make no immediate attempt on the citadel; but they sent a sergeant, with two of the townspeople, to summon it. This messenger never returned; and Trowbridge, having waited about an hour in painful expectation of his friends, marched to join Captains Hood and Miller, who had effected their landing to the southwest. They then endeavored to procure some intelligence of the admiral and the rest of the officers, but without success. By daybreak they had gathered together about eighty marines, eighty pikemen, and one hundred and eighty small-arm seamen,¹—all the survivors of those who had made good their landing. They obtained some ammunition from the prisoners whom they had taken, and which followed him everywhere, he recognized, amid the crowd, a man who had assisted at the amputation, and attended him afterwards. He beckoned him up the stairs of the Council House, shook hands with him, and made him a present in remembrance of his services at that time. The man took from his bosom a piece of lace which he had torn from the sleeve of the amputated limb, saying he had preserved and would preserve it to the last moment, in memory of his old commander.

¹ "Small-arm seamen," i.e., seamen carrying small arms,—rifles, muskets, pistols, swords, etc.

marched on, to try what could be done at the citadel without ladders. They found all the streets commanded by fieldpieces, and several thousand Spaniards, with about a hundred French, under arms, approaching by every avenue. Finding himself without provisions, their powder wet, and no possibility of obtaining either stores or reënforcements from the ships, the boats being lost, Trowbridge, with great presence of mind, sent Captain Samuel Hood with a flag of truce to the governor, to say he was prepared to burn the town, and would instantly set fire to it if the Spaniards approached one inch nearer. This, however, if he were compelled to do it, he should do with regret, for he had no wish to injure the inhabitants; and he was ready to treat upon these terms: that the British troops should reëmbark, with all their arms of every kind, and take their own boats, if they were saved, or be provided with such others as might be wanting; they, on their part, engaging that the squadron should not molest the town, nor any of the Canary Islands; all prisoners on both sides to be given up. When these terms were proposed, the governor made answer that the English ought to surrender as prisoners of war; but Captain Hood replied he was instructed to say that if the terms were not accepted in five minutes, Captain Trowbridge would set the town on fire, and attack the Spaniards at the point of the bayonet.

Satisfied with his success, which was indeed sufficiently complete, and respecting, like a brave and honorable man, the gallantry of his enemy, the Spaniard acceded to the proposal. "And here," says Nelson in his journal, "it is right we should notice the noble and generous conduct of Don Juan Antonio Gutierrez, the Spanish governor. The moment the terms were agreed to, he directed our wounded men to be received into the hospitals, and all our people to be supplied with the best provisions that could be procured, and made it known that the ships were at liberty to send on shore and purchase whatever refreshments they were in want of during the time they might be off the island." A youth, by name Don Bernardo Collagon, stripped himself of his shirt to make bandages for one of those Englishmen against whom, not an hour before, he had been engaged in battle. Nelson wrote to thank the governor for the humanity which he had displayed. Presents were interchanged between them. Sir Horatio offered to take charge of his dispatches for the Spanish government, and thus actually became the first messenger to Spain of his own defeat.

The total loss of the English, in killed, wounded, and drowned, amounted to two hundred and fifty. Nelson made no mention of his own wound in his official dispatches; but in a private letter to Lord St. Vincent—the first which he wrote with his left hand—he shows himself to have been deeply affected by the failure of this enterprise. “I am become,” he said, “a burden to my friends and useless to my country; but by my last letter you will perceive my anxiety for the promotion of my son-in-law, Josiah Nisbet. When I leave your command I become dead to the world; ‘I go hence, and am no more seen.’¹ If from poor Bowen’s loss you think it proper to oblige me,² I rest confident you will do it. The boy is under obligations to me; but he repaid me by bringing me from the mole of Santa Cruz. I hope you will be able to give me a frigate, to convey the remains of my carcass to England.” “A left-handed admiral,” he said in a subsequent letter, “will never again be considered as useful; therefore the sooner I get to a very humble cottage the better, and make room for a sounder man to serve the state.” His first letter to Lady Nelson was written under the same opinion, but in a more cheerful strain. “It was the chance of war,” said he, “and I have great reason to be thankful; and I know it will add much to your pleasure to find that Josiah, under God’s providence, was principally instrumental in saving my life. I shall not be surprised if I am neglected and forgotten; probably I shall no longer be considered as useful; however, I shall feel rich if I continue to enjoy your affection. I beg neither you nor my father will think much of this mishap; my mind has long been made up to such an event."

¹ A paraphrase of John xvi. 10.

² By putting his stepson in the position left vacant by Bowen’s death.

His son-in-law, according to his wish, was immediately promoted, and honors enough to heal his wounded spirit awaited him in England. Letters were addressed to him by the First Lord of the Admiralty, and by his steady friend, the Duke of Clarence, to congratulate him on his return, covered as he was with glory. He assured the duke, in his reply, that not a scrap of that ardor with which he had hitherto served his King had been shot away. The freedom of the cities of Bristol and London was transmitted to him; he was invested with the Order of the Bath, and received a pension of £1,000 a year. The memorial which, as a matter of form, he was called upon to present on this occasion exhibited an extraordinary catalogue of services performed during the war. It stated that he had been in four actions with the fleets of the enemy, and in three actions with boats employed in cutting out of harbor, in destroying vessels, and in taking three towns; he had served on shore with the army four months, and commanded the batteries at the sieges of Bastia and Calvi; he had assisted at the capture of seven sail of the line, six frigates, four corvettes, and eleven privateers; taken and destroyed near fifty sail of merchant vessels; and actually been engaged against the enemy upwards of an hundred and twenty times; in which service he had lost his right eye and right arm, and been severely wounded and bruised in his body.

His sufferings from the lost limb were long and painful. A nerve had been taken up in one of the ligatures at the time of the operation, and the ligature, according to the practice of the French surgeons, was of silk, instead of waxed thread. This produced a constant irritation and discharge; and the ends of the ligature being pulled every day, in hopes of bringing it away, occasioned fresh agony. He had scarcely any intermission of pain, day or night, for three months after his return to England. Lady Nelson, at his earnest request, attended the dressing of his arm till she had acquired sufficient resolution and skill to dress it herself. One night, during this state of suffering, after a day of constant pain, Nelson retired early to bed, in hope of enjoying some respite by means of laudanum. He was at that time lodging in Bond Street; and the family was soon disturbed by a mob knocking loudly and violently at the door. The news of Duncan's victory¹ had been made public, and the house was not illuminated. But when the mob were told that Admiral Nelson lay there in bed, badly wounded, the foremost of them made answer, "You shall hear no more from us to-night;" and, in fact, the feeling of respect and sympathy was communicated from one to another with such effect, that, under the confusion of such a night, the house was not molested again.

About the end of November, after a night of sound sleep, he found the arm nearly free from pain; the surgeon was immediately sent for to examine it, and the ligature came away with the slightest touch. From that time it began to heal. As soon as he thought his health established, he sent the following form of thanksgiving to the minister of St. George's, Hanover Square: "An officer desires to return thanks to Almighty God for his perfect recovery from a severe wound, and also for the many mercies bestowed on him."

Not having been in England till now since he lost his eye, he went to receive a year's pay, as smart money;² but could not obtain payment, because he had neglected to bring a certificate from a surgeon that the sight was actually destroyed. A little irritated that this form should be insisted upon,—because, though the fact was not apparent, he thought it was sufficiently notorious,—he procured a certificate at the same time for the loss of his arm, saying they might just as well doubt the one as the other. This put him in good humor with himself and with the clerk who had offended him. On his return to the office, the clerk, finding it was only the annual pay of a captain, observed he thought it had been more. "Oh!" replied Nelson, "this is only for an eye. In a few days I shall come for an arm; and in a little time longer, God knows, most probably for a leg." Accordingly, he soon afterwards went, and with perfect good humor exhibited the certificate of the loss of his arm.

¹ The victory of the English fleet led by Admiral Duncan (1731–1804) over the fleet of the Dutch, of almost equal number, at Camperdown, Oct. 11, 1797.

² "Smart money," i. e., money given for wounds.

CHAPTER V.

Nelson rejoins Earl St. Vincent in the Vanguard.—Sails in pursuit of the French to Egypt.—Returns to Sicily, and sails again to Egypt.—Battle of the Nile.

EARLY in the year 1798, Sir Horatio Nelson hoisted his flag in the Vanguard, and was ordered to rejoin Earl St. Vincent. Upon his departure his father addressed him with that affectionate solemnity by which all his letters were distinguished. "I trust in the Lord," said he, "that He will prosper your going out and your coming in. I earnestly desired once more to see you, and that wish has been heard. If I should presume to say I hope to see you again, the question would be readily asked, 'How old art thou?' Vale, vale! Domine vale!"¹ It is said that a gloomily foreboding hung on the spirits of Lady Nelson at their parting. This could have arisen only from the dread of losing him by the chance of war. Any apprehension of losing his affections could hardly have existed, for all his correspondence to this time shows that he thought himself happy in his marriage; and his private character had hitherto been as spotless as his public conduct. One of the last things he said to her was that his own ambition was satisfied, but that he went to raise her to that rank in which he had long wished to see her.

Immediately on his rejoining the fleet he was dispatched to the Mediterranean with a small squadron, in order to ascertain, if possible, the object of the great expedition which at that time was fitting out, under Bonaparte, at Toulon. The defeat of this armament, whatever might be its destination, was deemed by the British government an object paramount to every other; and Earl St. Vincent was directed, if he thought it necessary to take his whole force into the Mediterranean, to relinquish, for that purpose, the blockade of the Spanish fleet, as a thing of inferior moment; but if he should deem a detachment sufficient, "I think it almost unnecessary," said the First Lord of the Admiralty, in his secret instructions, "to suggest to you the propriety of putting it under Sir Horatio Nelson." It is to the honor of Earl St. Vincent that he had already made the same choice. The British government at this time, with a becoming spirit, gave orders that any port in the Mediterranean should be considered as hostile where the governor or chief magistrate should refuse to let our ships of war procure supplies of provisions, or of any article which they might require.

¹ Farewell, farewell! Lord, farewell!

The armament at Toulon consisted of thirteen ships of the line, seven forty-gun frigates, with twenty-four smaller vessels of war, and nearly two hundred transports. Mr. Udney, our consul at Leghorn, was the first person who procured certain intelligence of the enemy's design against Malta, and from his own sagacity foresaw that Egypt must be their after object. Nelson sailed from Gibraltar on the 9th of May, with the Vanguard, Orion, and Alexander, 74's; the Caroline, Flora, Emerald, and Terpsichore frigates; and the Bonne Citoyenne sloop of war,—to watch this formidable armament. On the 19th, when they were in the Gulf of Lyons, a gale came on from the northwest. It moderated so much on the 20th as to enable them to get their topgallant masts¹ and yards aloft. After dark it again began to blow strong; but the ships had been prepared for a gale, and therefore Nelson's mind was easy. Shortly before midnight, however, his main topmast went over the side, and the mizzen topmast soon afterwards. The night was so tempestuous that it was impossible for any signal either to be seen or heard, and Nelson determined, as soon as it should be daybreak, to wear, and scud before the gale; but at half-past three the foremast went in three pieces, and the bowsprit was found to be sprung in three places. When day broke they succeeded in wearing the ship with a remnant of the spritsail. This was hardly to have been expected. The Vanguard was at that time twenty-five leagues south of the islands of Hyeres, with her head lying to the northeast; and if she had not wore, the ship must have drifted to Corsica. Captain Ball, in the Alexander, took her in tow, to carry her into the Sardinian harbor of San Pietro. Nelson, apprehensive that this attempt might endanger both vessels, ordered him to cast off; but that excellent officer, with a spirit like his commander's, replied he was confident he could save the Vanguard, and, by God's help, he would do it. There had been a previous coolness between these great men;¹ but from this time Nelson became fully sensible of the extraordinary talents of Captain Ball, and a sincere friendship subsisted between them during the remainder of their lives. "I ought not," said the admiral, writing to his wife,—"I ought not to call what has happened to the Vanguard by the cold name of 'accident;' I believe firmly it was the Almighty's goodness, to check my consummate vanity. I hope it has made me a better officer, as I feel confident it has made me a better man. Figure to yourself, on Sunday evening at sunset, a vain man walking in his cabin, with a squadron around him who looked up to their chief to lead them to glory, and in whom their chief placed the firmest reliance that the proudest ships of equal numbers belonging to France would have lowered their flags; figure to yourself, on Monday morning, when the sun rose, this proud man, his ship dismasted, his fleet dispersed, and himself in such distress that the meanest frigate out of France would have been an unwelcome guest." Nelson had, indeed, more reason to refuse the cold name of "accident" to this tempest than he was then aware of; for on that very day the French fleet sailed from Toulon, and must have passed within a few leagues of his little squadron, which was thus preserved by the thick weather that came on.

¹ "Topgallant mast," i.e., the third, and, except the royal, the highest part of the masts. Below it were the topmast and the lower mast. The main topmast was the topmast of the mainmast; the mizzen topmast the topmast of the mizzenmast, the mast nearest the stern.

¹ " In 1783 Captain Ball became slightly known to Nelson at St. Omer, when they seem to have conceived a strong prejudice against each other; and they never met again until the Alexander was placed under his orders. . . . On joining the Vanguard Captain Ball went on board to pay his respects to the rear admiral; but the reception he met with was not flattering. 'What,' said the admiral, 'are you come to have your bones broken?' Captain Ball, who was remarkable for command of temper, quietly replied that he certainly had no wish to have his bones broken, unless his duty to his King and country required such a sacrifice, and then they should not be spared. Soon after the Vanguard was taken in tow by the Alexander, Sir Horatio Nelson, fearing from the state of the weather that both ships would go down, peremptorily desired that the Vanguard should be abandoned to her fate. Captain Ball, however, resolved to persevere, under the conviction that his endeavors to save the Vanguard would be successful. When the ships arrived at San Pietro, Sir Horatio lost no time in going on board the Alexander to express his gratitude; and cordially embracing Captain Ball, exclaimed, 'A friend in need is a friend indeed!' From that moment their friendship commenced.

In the orders of the British government to consider all ports as hostile where the British ships should be refused supplies, the ports of Sardinia were excepted. The continental possessions¹ of the King of Sardinia were at this time completely at the mercy of the French; and that prince was now discovering, when too late, that the terms to which he had consented for the purpose of escaping immediate danger, necessarily involved, at last, the loss of the dominions which they were intended to preserve. The citadel of Turin was now occupied by French troops; and his wretched court feared to afford the common rights of humanity to British ships, lest it should give the French occasion to seize on the remainder of his dominions,—a measure for which, it was certain, they would soon make a pretext, if they did not find one. Nelson was informed that he could not be permitted to enter the port of San Pietro. Regardless of this interdict, which, under his circumstances, it would have been an act of suicidal folly to have regarded, he anchored in the harbor; and by the exertions of Sir James Saumarez, Captain Ball, and Captain Berry, the Vanguard was refitted in four days; months would have been employed in refitting her in England.¹ Nelson, with that proper sense of merit, wherever it was found, which proved at once the goodness and the greatness of his character, especially recommended to Earl St. Vincent the carpenter of the Alexander, under whose directions the ship had been repaired, stating that he was an old and faithful servant of the Crown, who had been nearly thirty years a warrant carpenter,² and begging most earnestly that the commander in chief would recommend him to the particular notice of the Board of Admiralty. He did not leave the harbor without expressing his sense of the treatment which he had received there, in a letter to the viceroy of Sardinia. "Sir," it said, "having, by a gale of wind, sustained some trifling damages, I anchored a small part of his Majesty's fleet under my orders off this island, and was surprised to hear, by an officer sent by the governor, that admittance was to be refused to the flag of his Britannic Majesty into this port. When I reflect that my most gracious Sovereign is the oldest, I believe, and certainly the most faithful ally which the King of Sardinia ever had, I could feel the sorrow which it must have been to his Majesty to have given such an order; and also for your excellency, who had to direct its execution. I cannot but look at the African shore, where the followers of Mohammed are performing the part of the good Samaritan,¹ which I look for in vain at St. Peter's; where it is said the Christian religion is professed."

Nelson soon discovered the injustice he had done Ball's character and abilities." (SIR NICHOLAS H. NICOLAS.)

¹ See page 95.

¹ In writing to Lady Nelson, May 24, 1798, Sir Horatio says: "The exertions of Sir James Saumarez in the Orion and Captain A. Ball in the Alexander have been wonderful; if the ship had been in England, months would have been taken to send her to sea; here my operations will not be delayed four days."

² "Warrant carpenter," i.e., a carpenter with writ or authority from the commission officers of the navy.

The delay which was thus occasioned was useful to him in many respects. It enabled him to complete his supply of water, and to receive a reënforcement which Earl St. Vincent, being himself reënforced from England, was enabled to send him. It consisted of the best ships of his fleet: the Culloden, 74, Captain T. Trowbridge; Goliath, 74, Captain T. Foley; Minotaur, 74, Captain T. Louis; Defence, 74, Captain John Peyton; Bellerophon, 74, Captain H. D. E. Darby; Majestic, 74, Captain G. B. Westcott; Zealous, 74, Captain S. Hood; Swiftsure, 74, Captain B. Hallowell; Theseus, 74, Captain R. W. Miller; Audacious, 74, Captain Davidge Gould. The Leander, 50, Captain T. B. Thompson, was afterwards added. These ships were made ready for the service as soon as Earl St. Vincent received advice from England that he was to be reënforced. As soon as the reënforcement was seen from the masthead of the admiral's ship, off Cadiz Bay, signal was immediately made to Captain Trowbridge to put to sea; and he was out of sight before the ships from home cast anchor in the British station. Trowbridge took with him no instructions to Nelson as to the course he was to steer, nor any certain account of the enemy's destination; everything was left to his own judgment. Unfortunately, the frigates had been separated from him in the tempest, and had not been able to rejoin. They sought him unsuccessfully in the Bay of Naples, where they obtained no tidings of his course; and he sailed without them.

The first news of the enemy's armament was that it had surprised Malta. Nelson formed a plan for attacking it while at anchor at Gozo;³ but on the 22d of June intelligence reached him that the French had left that island on the 16th, the day after their arrival. It was clear that their destination was eastward,—he thought for Egypt, and for Egypt, therefore, he made all sail. Had the frigates been with him he could scarcely have failed to gain information of the enemy; for want of them, he only spoke ¹ three vessels on the way; two came from Alexandria, one from the Archipelago,² and neither of them had seen anything of the French. He arrived off Alexandria on the 28th, and the enemy were not there, neither was there any account of them; but the governor was endeavoring to put the city in a state of defense, having received advice from Leghorn that the French expedition was intended against Egypt, after it had taken Malta. Nelson then shaped his course to the northward for Karamania, and steered from thence along the southern side of Candia, carrying a press of sail both night and day, with a contrary wind. It would have been his delight, he said, to have tried Bonaparte on a wind.³ It would have been the delight of Europe, too, and the blessing of the world, if that fleet had been overtaken with its general on board. But of the myriads and millions of human beings who would have been preserved by that day's victory there is not one to whom such essential benefit would have resulted as to Bonaparte himself. It would have spared him his defeat at Acre,⁴—his only disgrace, for to have been defeated by Nelson upon the seas would not have been disgraceful; it would have spared him all his after enormities. Hitherto his career had been glorious; the baneful principles of his heart had never yet passed his lips. History would have represented him as a soldier of fortune ⁵ who had faithfully served the cause in which he engaged, and whose career had been distinguished by a series of successes unexampled in modern times. A romantic obscurity would have

¹ Luke x. 30-37.

² The island of San Pietro or St. Peter, off which the Vanguard was at anchor.

³ A small island three miles northwest of Malta.

¹ Hailed and held communication with.

² The Grecian Archipelago, the island-studded sea which lies between Greece and Thessaly on the west and Asia Minor on the east.

³ "On a wind," i.e., against a wind.

⁴ This seaport was gallantly defended by the Turks, aided by the English; and Napoleon, after a siege of sixty-one days, was forced to withdraw.

⁵ "A soldier of fortune," i.e., one ready to serve as soldier wherever profit and advantage are greatest.

hung over the expedition to Egypt, and he would have escaped the perpetration of those crimes which have incarnadined¹ his soul with a deeper dye than that of the purple² for which he committed them,—those acts of perfidy,³ midnight murder,⁴ usurpation,⁵ and remorseless tyranny⁶ which have consigned his name to universal execration now and forever.

Conceiving that when an officer is not successful in his plans it is absolutely necessary that he should explain the motives upon which they were founded, Nelson wrote⁷ at this time an account and vindication of his conduct for having carried the fleet to Egypt. The objection which he anticipated was that he ought not to have made so long a voyage without more certain information. “My answer,” said he, “is ready: Whom was I to get it from? The governments of Naples and Sicily either knew not, or chose to keep me in ignorance. Was I to wait patiently until I heard certain accounts? If Egypt were their object, before I could hear of them they would have been in India. To do nothing was disgraceful; therefore I made use of my understanding. I am before your lordship’s judgment; and if, under all circumstances, it is decided that I am wrong, I ought, for the sake of our country, to be superseded; for at this moment, when I know the French are not in Alexandria, I hold the same opinion as off Cape Passaro,—that, under all circumstances, I was right in

¹ Dyed red or carnation.

² That which purple signifies, i.e., sovereignty.

³ Towards Charles IV. and his son, when he enticed them to Bayonne and forced them to renounce the throne; also to his wife Josephine.

⁴ In 1804 the Duke of Enghien, a Bourbon prince, was taken by violence to French soil, condemned by a body acting under the arbitrary order of Napoleon and contrary to existing law, and shot at night.

⁵ Usurpation of the rule of France in 1804, with the title of hereditary Emperor of France; of the throne of Spain for his brother Joseph; of the kingdom of Naples for his brother-in-law, Murat, and of Holland for Louis Bonaparte.

⁶ Shown in thousands of acts of his public and private life.

⁷ To Admiral the Earl of St. Vincent, under date of June 29, 1798.

steering for Alexandria; and by that opinion I must stand or fall." Captain Ball, to whom he showed this paper, told him he should recommend a friend never to begin a defense of his conduct before he was accused of error. He might give the fullest reasons for what he had done, expressed in such terms as would evince that he had acted from the strongest conviction of being right; and of course he must expect that the public would view it in the same light. Captain Ball judged rightly of the public, whose first impulses, though from want of sufficient information they must frequently be erroneous, are generally founded upon just feelings. But the public are easily misled, and there are always persons ready to mislead them. Nelson had not yet attained that fame which compels envy to be silent; and when it was known in England that he had returned after an unsuccessful pursuit, it was said that he deserved impeachment, and Earl St. Vincent was severely censured for having sent so young an officer upon so important a service.

Baffled in his pursuit, he returned to Sicily. The Neapolitan ministry had determined to give his squadron no assistance, being resolved to do nothing which could possibly endanger their peace with the French Directory. By means, however, of Lady Hamilton's influence at court he procured secret orders to the Sicilian governors, and under those orders obtained everything which he wanted at Syracuse,—a timely supply, without which, he always said, he could not have recommenced his pursuit with any hope of success. "It is an old saying," said he in his letter, "that 'the devil's children have the devil's luck.' I cannot to this moment learn, beyond vague conjecture, where the French fleet are gone to; and having gone a round of six hundred leagues at this season of the year, with an expedition¹ incredible, here I am, as ignorant of the situation of the enemy as I was twenty-seven days ago. Every moment I have to regret the frigates having left me; had one half of them been with me, I could not have wanted information. Should the French be so strongly secured in port that I cannot get at them, I shall immediately shift my flag into some other ship, and send the Vanguard to Naples to be refitted; for hardly any person but myself would have continued on service so long in such a wretched state." Vexed, however, and disappointed as he was, Nelson, with the true spirit of a hero, was still full of hope. "Thanks to your exertions," said he, writing to Sir William and Lady Hamilton, "we have victualed and watered; and surely, watering at the fountain of Arethusa,¹ we must have victory. We shall sail with the first breeze; and be assured I will return either crowned with laurel or covered with cypress." Earl St. Vincent he assured that if the French were above water he would find them out,—he still held his opinion that they were bound for Egypt; "but," said he to the First Lord of the Admiralty, "be they bound to the antipodes, your lordship may rely that I will not lose a moment in bringing them to action."

¹ Speed: rapidity.

. On the 25th of July he sailed from Syracuse for the Morea. Anxious beyond measure, and irritated that the enemy should so long have eluded him, the tediousness of the nights made him impatient; and the officer of the watch was repeatedly called on to let him know the hour, and convince him, who measured time by his own eagerness, that it was not yet daybreak. The squadron made the Gulf of Koron² on the 28th. Trowbridge entered the port, and returned with intelligence that the French had been seen about four weeks before, steering to the southeast from Candia. Nelson then determined immediately to return to Alexandria; and the British fleet accordingly, with every sail set, stood once more for the coast of Egypt. On the 1st of August they came in sight of Alexandria. The port had been vacant and solitary when they saw it last; it was now crowded with ships, and they perceived with exultation that the tricolored flag was flying upon the walls. At four in the afternoon, Captain Hood, in the Zealous, made the signal for the French fleet. For many preceding days Nelson had hardly taken either sleep or food. He now ordered his dinner to be served while preparations were making for battle; and when his officers rose from table, and went to their separate stations, he said to them, "Before this time to-morrow I shall have gained a peerage or Westminster Abbey."

¹ A fountain in Syracuse, concerning which the old Greek settlers had the following legend. Alpheus was a hunter who loved the nymph Arethusa; because she fled from him and changed herself into a fountain on the island of Ortygia in Syracuse, Alpheus became a river, which, flowing down under the sea from the Peloponnesus, united its waters with those of the fountain in Ortygia.

² On the southern coast of the Morea.

The French, steering direct for Candia, had made an angular passage for Alexandria; whereas Nelson, in pursuit of them, made straight for that place, and thus materially shortened the distance. The comparative smallness of his force made it necessary to sail in close order, and it covered a less space than it would have done if the frigates had been with him; the weather also was constantly hazy. These circumstances prevented the English from discovering the enemy on the way to Egypt, though it appeared, upon examining the journals of the French officers taken in the action, that the two fleets must actually have crossed on the night of the 22d of June. During the return to Syracuse there was still less probability of discovering them.

Why Bonaparte, having effected his landing, should not have suffered the fleet to return, has never yet been explained. Thus much is certain, that it was detained by his command; though, with his accustomed falsehood, he accused Admiral Brueys, after that officer's death, of having lingered on the coast contrary to orders. The French fleet arrived at Alexandria on the 1st of July; and Brueys, not being able to enter the port, which time and neglect had ruined, moored his ships in Aboukir Bay, in a strong and compact line of battle, the headmost vessel, according to his own account, being as close as possible to a shoal on the northwest and the rest of the fleet forming a kind of curve along the line of deep water, so as not to be turned by any means in the southwest. By Bonaparte's desire he had offered a reward of ten thousand livres to any pilot of the country who would carry the squadron in ; but none could be found who would venture to take charge of a single vessel drawing more than twenty feet. He had therefore made the best of his situation, and chosen the strongest position which he could possibly take in an open road. The commissary of the fleet said they were moored in such a manner as to bid defiance to a force more than double their own. This presumption could not then be thought unreasonable. Admiral Barrington, when moored in a similar manner off St. Lucia¹ in the year 1778, beat off the Count d'Estaing in three several attacks, though his force was inferior by almost one third to that which assailed it. Here the advantage of numbers, both in ships, guns, and men, was in favor of the French.² They had thirteen ships of the line and four frigates, carrying 1,196 guns and 11,230 men. The English had the same number of ships of the line, and one 50-gun ship, carrying 1,012 guns and 8,068 men. The English ships were all 74's; the French had three 80-gun ships, and one three-decker of 120.

During the whole pursuit it had been Nelson's practice, whenever circumstances would permit, to have his captains on board the Vanguard, and explain to them his own ideas of the different and best modes of attack, and such plans as he proposed to execute on falling in with the enemy, whatever their situation might be. There is no possible position, it is said, which he did not take into calculation. His officers were thus fully acquainted with his principles of tactics; and such was his confidence in their abilities that the only thing determined upon, in case they should find the French at anchor, was for the ships to form as most convenient for their mutual support, and to anchor by the stern.³ "First gain the victory," he said, "and then make the best use of it you can." The moment he perceived the position of the French, that intuitive genius with which Nelson was endowed displayed itself; and it instantly struck him that where there was room for an enemy's ship to swing, there was room for one of ours to anchor. The plan which he intended to pursue, therefore, was to keep entirely on the outer side of the French line, and station his ships, as far as he was able, one on the outer bow, and another on the outer quarter,¹ of each of the enemy's. This plan of doubling on the enemy's ships was projected by Lord Hood when he designed to attack the French fleet at their anchorage in Gourjean Roads.² Lord Hood found it impossible to make the attempt; but the thought was not lost upon Nelson, who acknowledged himself on this occasion indebted for it to his old and excellent commander. Captain Berry, when he comprehended the scope of the design, exclaimed with transport, "If we succeed, what will the world say?"³ "There is no if in the case," replied the admiral; "that we shall succeed is certain; who may live to tell the story is a very different question."

¹ A West India island.

² The French report is different. Every ship lacked good seamen, and for this reason the admiral had brought his ships to anchor. The number Southey gives is the full quota.

³ Instead of by the bows.

As the squadron advanced, they were assailed by a shower of shot and shells from the batteries on the island, and the enemy opened a steady fire from the starboard side of their whole line, within half-gunshot distance, full into the bows of our van ships. It was received in silence; the men on board of every ship were employed aloft in furling sails, and below in tending the braces, and making ready for anchoring,—a miserable sight for the French, who with all their skill and all their courage and all their advantages of numbers and situation, were upon that element on which, when the hour of trial comes, a Frenchman has no hope. Admiral Brueys was a brave and able man; yet the indelible character of his country broke out in one of his letters, wherein he delivered it as his private opinion that the English had missed him because, not being superior in force, they did not think it prudent to try their strength with him. The moment was now come in which he was to be undeceived.

¹ The after part of a vessel's side.

² See p. 74. "Southey seems," says Sir N. H. Nicolas, "to have understood doubling on the enemy to have consisted not in placing a ship on each side, but in having one ship on the outer bow and another on the outer quarter."

³ "These words were never spoken; and as Captain Berry had, from the first moment of discovering the enemy, been fully as confident of success as his admiral, the statement caused him much annoyance." (SIR N. H. NICOLAS.)

A French brig was instructed to decoy the English, by maneuvering so as to tempt them towards a shoal lying off the island of Bequieres; but Nelson either knew the danger or suspected some deceit, and the lure was unsuccessful. Captain Foley led the way in the Goliath, outsailing the Zealous, which for some minutes disputed this post of honor with him. He had long conceived that if the enemy were moored in line of battle in with the land, the best plan of attack would be to lead between them and the shore, because the French guns on that side were not likely to be manned, nor even ready for action. Intending, therefore, to fix himself on the inner bow of the Guerrier, he kept as near the edge of the bank as the depth of water would admit; but his anchor hung,¹ and having opened his fire, he drifted to the second ship, the Conquérant, before it was clear, then anchored by the stern, inside of her, and in ten minutes shot away her masts. Hood, in the Zealous, perceiving this, took the station which the Goliath intended to have occupied, and he totally disabled the Guerrier in twelve minutes. The third ship which doubled the enemy's van was the Orion, Sir J. Saumarez. She passed to windward of the Zealous, and opened her larboard guns as long as they bore on the Guerrier; then, passing inside the Goliath, sunk a frigate which annoyed her, hauled round towards the French line, and anchoring inside, between the fifth and sixth ships from the Guerrier, took her station on the larboard bow of the Franklin, and the quarter of the Peuple Souverain, receiving and returning the fire of both. The sun was now nearly down. The Audacious, Captain Gould, pouring a heavy fire into the Guerrier and the Conquérant, fixed herself on the larboard bow of the latter; and when that ship struck, passed on to the Peuple Souverain. The Theseus, Captain Miller, followed, brought down the Guerrier's remaining mainmasts and mizzenmasts, then anchored inside of the Spartiate, the third in the French line.

¹ Was caught in some obstruction.

While these advanced ships doubled the French line, the Vanguard was the first that anchored on the outer side of the enemy, within half pistol shot of their third ship, the Spartiate. Nelson had six colors flying in different parts of his rigging, lest they should be shot away; that they should be struck, no British admiral considers as a possibility. He veered half a cable,¹ and instantly opened a tremendous fire, under cover of which the other four ships of his division—the Minotaur, Bellerophon, Defence, and Majestic—sailed on ahead of the admiral. In a few minutes every man stationed at the first six guns in the fore part of the Vanguard's deck was killed or wounded; these guns were three times cleared.² Captain Louis, in the Minotaur, anchored next ahead, and took off the fire of the Aquilon,³ the fourth in the enemy's line. The Bellerophon, Captain Darby, passed ahead, and dropped her stern anchor on the starboard bow of the Orient, seventh in the line,—Brueys' own ship, of 120 guns, whose difference of force was in proportion of more than seven to three, and whose weight of ball from the lower deck alone exceeded that from the whole broadside of the Bellerophon. Captain Peyton, in the Defence, took his station ahead of the Minotaur, and engaged the Franklin, the sixth in the line, by which judicious movement the British line remained unbroken. The Majestic, Captain Westcott, got entangled with the main rigging of one of the French ships astern of the Orient, and suffered dreadfully from that three-decker's fire; but she swung clear, and closely engaging the Heureux, the ninth ship on the starboard bow, received also the fire of the Tonnant, which was the eighth in the line.

¹ A cable's length is about one hundred fathoms, or six hundred feet.

² Cleared of the dead and wounded men.

³ "Took off the fire," etc., i.e., turned the firing of the Aquilon's guns towards the Minotaur.

The other four ships of the British squadron, having been detached previous to the discovery of the French, were at a considerable distance when the action began. It commenced at half-past six; about seven, night closed, and there was no other light than that from the fire of the contending fleets.

Trowbridge, in the Culloden, the foremost of the remaining ships, was two leagues astern. He came on sounding, as the others had done. As he advanced, the increasing darkness increased the difficulty of the navigation; and suddenly, after having found eleven fathoms' water, before the lead could be hove again, he was fast aground; nor could all his own exertions, joined to those of the Leander and the Mutine brig, which came to his assistance, get him off in time to bear a part in the action. His ship, however, served as a beacon to the Alexander and Swiftsure, which would else, from the course which they were holding, have gone considerably farther on the reef, and must inevitably have been lost. These ships entered the bay, and took their stations, in the darkness, in a manner still spoken of with admiration by all who remember it. Captain Hallowell, in the Swiftsure, as he was bearing down, fell in with what seemed to be a strange sail; Nelson had directed his ships to hoist four lights horizontally at the mizzen peak as soon as it became dark, and this vessel had no such distinction. Hallowell, however, with great judgment, ordered his men not to fire. If she was an enemy, he said, she was in too disabled a state to escape; but, from her sails being loose, and the way in which her head was, it was probable she might be an English ship. It was the Bellerophon, overpowered by the huge Orient. Her lights had gone overboard, nearly two hundred of her crew were killed or wounded, all her masts and cables had been shot away, and she was drifting out of the line towards the lee side of the bay. Her station, at this important time, was occupied by the Swiftsure, which opened a steady fire on the quarter of the Franklin and the bows of the French admiral. At the same instant Captain Ball, with the Alexander, passed under his stern, and anchored withinside on his larboard

CULLODEN 74

MUTINE BRIG

FRENCH SHIPS.

1. GUERRIER 74 TAKEN
2. CONQUÉRANT 74 TAKEN
3. SPARTIATE 74 TAKEN
4. AQUILON 74 TAKEN
5. SOUVERAIN PEUPLE TAKEN
6. FRANKLIN 80 TAKEN
7. ORIENT 120 BURNT
8. TONNANT 80 TAKEN
9. HEUREUX 75 TAKEN
10. TIMOLEON 74 TAKEN
11. MERCURE 74 TAKEN
12. GUILLAUME TELL 80 ESCAPED
13. GÉNÉREUX 74 ESCAPED
14. DIANE 48 ESCAPED
15. JUSTICE 44 ESCAPED
16. ARTÉMISE 36 BURNT
17. SÉRIEUSE 36 SUNK

quarter, raking¹ him, and keeping up a severe fire of musketry upon his decks. The last ship which arrived to complete the destruction of the enemy was the Leander. Captain Thompson, finding that nothing could be done that night to get off the Culloden, advanced with the intention of anchoring athwart hawse of the Orient. The Franklin was so near her ahead that there was not room for him to pass clear of the two; he therefore took his station athwart hawse of the latter, in such a position as to rake both.

The two first ships of the French line had been dismasted within a quarter of an hour after the commencement of the action; and the others had in that time suffered so severely that victory was already certain. The third, fourth, and fifth were taken possession of at half-past eight. Meantime Nelson received a severe wound on the head from a piece of langridge² shot. Captain Berry caught him in his arms as he was falling. The great effusion of blood occasioned an apprehension that the wound was mortal; Nelson himself thought so. A large flap of the skin of the forehead, cut from the bone, had fallen over one eye, and the other being blind, he was in total darkness. When he was carried down, the surgeon,—in the midst of a scene scarcely to be conceived by those who have never seen a cockpit³ in time of action, and the heroism which is displayed amid its horrors,—with a natural and pardonable eagerness, quitted the poor fellow then under his hands, that he might instantly attend the admiral. “No!” said Nelson; “I will take my turn with my brave fellows;” nor would he suffer his own wound to be examined till every man who had been previously wounded was properly attended to. Fully believing that the wound was mortal, and that he was about to die, as he had ever desired, in battle and in victory, he called the chaplain, and desired him to deliver what he supposed to be his dying remembrance to Lady Nelson. He then sent for Captain Louis on board from the Minotaur, that he might thank him personally for the great assistance which he had rendered to the Vanguard; and, ever mindful of those who deserved to be his friends, appointed Captain Hardy from the brig¹ to the command of his own ship, Captain Berry having to go home with the news of the victory. When the surgeon came in due time to examine his wound (for it was in vain to entreat him to let it be examined sooner), the most anxious silence prevailed; and the joy of the wounded men, and of the whole crew, when they heard that the hurt was merely superficial, gave Nelson deeper pleasure than the unexpected assurance that his life was in no danger. The surgeon requested, and, as far as he could, ordered, him to remain quiet; but Nelson could not rest. He called for his secretary, Mr. Campbell, to write the dispatches. Campbell had himself been wounded, and was so affected at the blind and suffering state of the admiral that he was unable to write. The chaplain was then sent for; but before he came, Nelson, with his characteristic eagerness, took the pen, and contrived to trace a few words marking his devout sense of the success which had already been obtained. He was now left alone; when suddenly a cry was heard on the deck that the Orient was on fire. In the confusion he found his way up, unassisted and unnoticed;² and to the astonishment of every one, appeared on the quarter-deck, where he immediately gave order that boats should be sent to the relief of the enemy.

¹ Firing the shot lengthwise along the deck.

² Shot of bolts, nails, and other pieces of iron fastened together. It was used at sea for tearing sails and rigging.

³ The room under the lower gun deck of a war ship, given over during a battle to the surgeons and the wounded.

It was soon after nine that the fire on board the Orient broke out. Brueys was dead. He had received three wounds, yet would not leave his post; a fourth cut him almost in two. He desired not to be carried below, but to be left to die upon deck. The flames soon mastered his ship. Her sides had just been painted, and the oil jars and paint buckets were lying on the poop. By the prodigious light of this conflagration the situation of the two fleets could now be perceived, the colors of both being clearly distinguishable. About ten o'clock the ship blew up. This tremendous explosion was followed by a silence not less awful. The firing immediately ceased on both sides, and the first sound which broke the silence was the dash of her shattered masts and yards falling into the water from the vast height to which they had been exploded. It is upon record that a battle between two armies was once broken off by an earthquake.¹ Such an event would be felt like a miracle; but no incident in war, produced by human means, has ever equaled the sublimity of this coinstantaneous² pause, and all its circumstances.

¹ The Mutine.

² "On the Orient's taking fire, Captain Berry went below to acquaint the admiral with the circumstance; and he led him upon deck to witness the conflagration." (SIR N. H. NICOLAS.)

About seventy of the Orient's crew were saved by the English boats. Among the many hundreds who perished were the commodore, Casabianca, and his son, a brave boy only ten years old.³ They were seen floating on the wreck of a mast when the ship blew up. She had money on board (the plunder of Malta) to the amount of £600,000 sterling. The masses of burning wreck, which were scattered by the explosion, excited for some moments apprehensions in the English which they had never felt from any other danger. Two large pieces fell into the maintop and foretop of the Swiftsure, without injuring any person. A portfire⁴ also fell into the main royal⁵ of the Alexander; the fire

¹ Herodotus says that a battle between Medes and Lydians was once broken off by an eclipse of the sun; and Plutarch relates how Flaminius "marched forward up to Hannibal, who was posted near the Lake Thrasy-mene, in Tuscany. At the moment of this engagement there happened so great an earthquake that it destroyed several towns, altered the course of rivers, and carried off parts of high cliffs; yet such was the eagerness of the combatants that they were entirely insensible of it."

² Happening at the same instant.

³ See the poem Casabianca, at the end of this book, p. 300.

⁴ A slow match used to discharge artillery.

⁵ A small sail immediately above the topgallant sail.

which it occasioned was speedily extinguished. Captain Ball had provided, as far as human foresight could provide, against any such danger. All the shrouds and sails of his ship which were not absolutely necessary for its immediate management, were thoroughly wetted, and so rolled up that they were as hard and as little inflammable as so many solid cylinders.

The firing recommenced with the ships to leeward of the center, and continued till about three. At daybreak the Guillaume Tell and the Généreux, the two rear ships of the enemy, were the only French ships of the line which had their colors flying; they cut their cables in the forenoon, not having been engaged, and stood out to sea, and two frigates with them. The Zealous pursued; but as there was no other ship in a condition to support Captain Hood, he was recalled. It was generally believed by the officers that if Nelson had not been wounded, not one of these ships could have escaped; the four certainly could not, if the Culloden had got into action; and if the frigates belonging to the squadron had been present, not one of the enemy's fleet would have left Aboukir Bay. These four vessels, however, were all that escaped; and the victory was the most complete and glorious in the annals of naval history. "Victory," said Nelson, "is not a name strong enough for such a scene;" he called it a conquest. Of thirteen sail of the line, nine were taken and two burnt; of the four frigates, one was sunk; another, the Artémise, was burnt in a villainous manner by her captain, M. Estandlet, who, having fired a broadside at the Theseus, struck his colors, then set fire to the ship, and escaped with most of his crew to shore. The British loss in killed and wounded amounted to 895. Westcott was the only captain who fell. 3,105 of the French, including the wounded, were sent on shore by cartel, and 5,225 perished.

As soon as the conquest was completed, Nelson sent orders through the fleet to return thanksgiving in every ship for the victory with which Almighty God had blessed his Majesty's arms. The French at Rosetta, who with miserable fear beheld the engagement, were at a loss to understand the stillness of the fleet during the performance of this solemn duty; but it seemed to affect many of the prisoners, officers as well as men; and graceless and godless as the officers were, some of them remarked that it was no wonder such order was preserved in the British navy, when the minds of our men could be impressed with such sentiments after so great a victory and at a moment of such confusion. The French at Rosetta, seeing their four ships sail out of the bay unmolested, endeavored to persuade themselves that they were in possession of the place of battle. But it was in vain thus to attempt, against their own secret and certain conviction, to deceive themselves; and even if they could have succeeded in this, the bonfires which the Arabs kindled along the whole coast, and over the country, for the three following nights, would soon have undeceived them. Thousands of Arabs and Egyptians lined the shore and covered the house tops during the action, rejoicing in the destruction which had overtaken their invaders. Long after the battle, innumerable bodies were seen floating about the bay, in spite of all the exertions which were made to sink them, as well from fear of pestilence as from the loathing and horror which the sight occasioned. The shore, for an extent of four leagues, was covered with wreck; and the Arabs found employment for many days in burning on the beach the fragments which were cast up, for the sake of the iron. Part of the Orient's mainmast was picked up by the Swiftsure. Captain Hallowell ordered his carpenter to make a coffin of it; the iron as well as wood was taken from the wreck of the same ship. It was finished as well and handsomely as the workman's skill and materials would permit, and Hallowell then sent it to the admiral with the following letter: "Sir, I have taken the liberty of presenting you a coffin made from the mainmast of the Orient, that when you have finished your military career in this world you may be buried in one of your trophies. But that that period may be far distant is the earnest wish of your sincere friend, Benjamin Hallowell." An offering so strange, and yet so suited to the occasion, was received by Nelson in the spirit with which it was sent. As if he felt it good for him, now that he was at the summit of his wishes, to have death before his eyes, he ordered the coffin to be placed upright in his cabin. Such a piece of furniture, however, was more suitable to his own feelings than to those of his guests and attendants; and an old favorite servant entreated him so earnestly to let it be removed that at length he consented to have the coffin carried below; but he gave strict orders that it should be safely stowed, and reserved for the purpose for which its brave and worthy donor had designed it.¹

The victory was complete; but Nelson could not pursue it as he would have done, for want of means. Had he been provided with small craft, nothing could have prevented the destruction of the storeships and transports in the port of Alexandria. Four bomb vessels would at that time have burnt the whole in a few hours. "Were I to die this moment," said he in his dispatches to the Admiralty, "want of frigates would be found stamped on my heart!"² No words of mine can express what I have suffered, and am suffering, for want of them." He had also to bear up against great bodily suffering; the blow had so shaken his head that from its constant and violent aching, and the perpetual sickness which accompanied the pain, he could scarcely persuade himself that the skull was not fractured. Had it not been for Trowbridge, Ball, Hood, and Hallowell, he declared that he should have sunk under the fatigue of refitting the squadron. All, he said, had done well; but these officers were his supporters. But, amidst his sufferings and exertions, Nelson could yet think of all the consequences of his victory; and, that no advantage from it might be lost, he dispatched an officer overland to India, with letters to the governor of Bombay, informing him of the arrival of the French in Egypt, the total destruction of their fleet, and the consequent preservation of India from any attempt against it on the part of this formidable armament.¹ He knew that Bombay, he said, was their first object, if they could get there; but he trusted that Almighty God would overthrow in Egypt these pests of the human race. Bonaparte had never yet had to contend with an English officer, and he would endeavor to make him respect us. This dispatch he sent upon his own responsibility, with letters of credit upon the East India Company, addressed to the British consuls, vice consuls, and merchants on his route,² Nelson saying that if he had done wrong, he hoped the bills would be paid, and he would repay the company; for, as an Englishman, he should be proud that it had been in his power to put our settlements on their guard. The information which by this means reached India was of great importance. Orders had just been received for defensive preparations, upon a scale proportionate to the apprehended danger; and the extraordinary expenses which would otherwise have been incurred were thus prevented.

¹ "When his lordship left the Vanguard, the coffin was removed into the Foudroyant, where it remained for many days on the gratings of the quarter-deck. While his officers were one day looking at it he came out of the cabin. 'You may look at it, gentlemen,' said he, 'as long as you please; but depend on it, none of you shall have it.' It is satisfactory to state that Nelson was actually buried in this coffin." (SIR N. H. NICOLAS.)

² This is doubtless a reference to the oft-repeated story that Mary of England, having lost the continental seaport of Calais, said the name would be found inscribed upon her heart.

Nelson was now at the summit of glory; congratulations, rewards, and honors were showered upon him by all the states and princes and powers to whom his victory gave a respite. The first communication of this nature which he received was from the Turkish Sultan, who, as soon as the invasion of Egypt was known,

¹ Bonaparte's Egyptian expedition was really directed against the East Indian possessions of England.

² "To his Britannic Majesty's consuls, vice consuls, and merchants in their absence: . . . I am to request you will be pleased to furnish him [the officer] with everything that may be necessary to forward him as fast as possible, particularly with money of the country and letters of recommendation on the route; . . . and he will give you bills on the East India Company." The East India Company was the corporation which conducted trade with East India, and the power by which the country was virtually governed.

had called upon "all true believers"¹ to take arms against those swinish infidels the French, that they might deliver these blessed habitations from their accursed hands; and who had ordered his pashas to turn night into day in their efforts to take vengeance. The present of "his imperial Majesty, the powerful, formidable, and most magnificent Grand Seignior," was a pelisse² of sables, with broad sleeves, valued at five thousand dollars; and a diamond aigrette³ valued at eighteen thousand,—the most honorable badge among the Turks, and in this instance more especially honorable because it was taken from one of the royal turbans. "If it were worth a million," said Nelson to his wife, "my pleasure would be to see it in your possession." The Sultan also sent, in a spirit worthy of imitation, a purse of two thousand sequins,⁴ to be distributed among the wounded. The mother of the Sultan sent him a box set with diamonds, valued at one thousand pounds. The Czar Paul, in whom the better part of his strangely compounded nature at this time predominated, presented him with his portrait, set in diamonds, in a gold box, accompanied with a letter of congratulation written by his own hand. The King of Sardinia also wrote to him, and sent a gold box set with diamonds. Honors in profusion were awaiting him at Naples. In his own country the King granted these honorable augmentations to his armorial ensign:⁵ a chief undulated, argent; thereon waves of the sea; from which a palm tree issuant, between a disabled ship on the dexter and a ruinous battery on the sinister, all proper; and for his crest, on a naval crown, or, the chelengk, or

¹ Believers in the prophet Mohammed. His Imperial Majesty, the Grand Seignior, and Robert Southey, poet laureate of England, expressed the same religious tolerance for the defeated French, and described them in similar language.

² A long cloak.

³ A headdress in the form of a plume.

⁴ The weight of this coin varies. It might at this time have been worth about $2.20.

⁵ "Augmentations to his armorial ensign," i.e., additions to his coat of arms.

plume, presented to him by the Turk, with the motto, Palmam qui meruit ferat.¹ And to his supporters, being a sailor on the dexter and a lion on the sinister, were given these honorable augmentations: a palm branch in the sailor's hand, and another in the paw of the lion, both proper, with a tricolored flag and staff in the lion's mouth.² He was created Baron Nelson of the Nile and of Burnham Thorpe, with a pension of £2,000 for his own life and those of his two immediate successors. When the grant was moved in the House of Commons, General Walpole expressed an opinion that a higher degree of rank ought to be conferred. Mr. Pitt made answer that he thought it needless to enter into that question. Admiral Nelson's fame, he said, would be coequal with the British name, and it would be remembered that he had obtained the greatest naval victory on record, when no man would think of asking whether he had been

¹ SOUTHEY'S NOTE. — It has been erroneously said that the motto was selected by the King; it was fixed on by Lord Grenville, and taken from an ode of Jortin. The application was singularly fortunate, and the ode itself breathes a spirit in which no man ever more truly sympathized than Nelson:

“Concurrant paribus cum ratibus rates,
Spectent numina ponti, et Palmam qui meruit ferat.”

“Let ship meet ship of equal strength,
Let the divinities of the sea look on,
And him who has won it bear away the palm.”

² “In the chief [upper part of the shield] of the arms a palm tree (emblematic of victory) between a disabled ship and a ruinous battery, form striking memorials of the glorious event of the 1st of August, in the Bay of Aboukir, near the mouth of the Nile. In the crest the chelengk . . . is an indication of the distinctions rendered to his lordship's merit by the Grand Seignior, and the naval crown may bear a striking allusion to his lordship's victory. . . . The palm branch in the hand of the sailor and in the paw of the lion is . . . allusive to the motto. The tricolored flag of the subdued enemy was added.” (From a letter from the Garter King of Arms to Lady Nelson.)

In heraldry, “undulated” means cut off by wave line; “argent,” white; “dexter,” right; “sinister,” left; “proper,” natural colors; “or,” yellow; “supporters,” bearers of the escutcheon.

created a baron, a viscount, or an earl. It was strange that, in the very act of conferring a title, the minister should have excused himself for not having conferred a higher one by representing all titles, on such an occasion, as nugatory and superfluous. True, indeed, whatever title had been bestowed,—whether viscount, earl, marquis, duke, or prince, if our laws had so permitted,—he who received it would have been Nelson still. That name he had ennobled beyond all addition of nobility. It was the name by which England loved him, France feared him, Italy, Egypt, and Turkey celebrated him, and by which he will continue to be known while the present kingdoms and languages of the world endure, and as long as their history after them shall be held in remembrance. It depended upon the degree of rank what should be the fashion of his coronet,¹ in what page of the red book² his name was to be inserted, and what precedency should be allowed his lady in the drawing-room and at the ball. That Nelson's honors were affected thus far and no farther might be conceded to Mr. Pitt and his colleagues in administration; but the degree of rank which they thought proper to allot was the measure of their gratitude,³ though not of his services. This

¹ A small crown, which varies in form with the rank of the wearer. The coronet of a duke is adorned with strawberry leaves; that of a marquis, with leaves and pearls, etc.

² "The red book," i.e., a book containing the names of all persons in state service.

³ SOUTHEY'S NOTE. — Mr. Windham must be excepted from this well-deserved censure. He—whose fate it seems to have been almost always to think and feel more generously than those with whom he acted—declared, when he contended against his own party for Lord Wellington's peerage, that he always thought Lord Nelson had been inadequately rewarded. The case was the more flagrant because an earldom had so lately been granted for the battle of St. Vincent's,—an action which could never be compared with the battle of the Nile, if the very different manner in which it was rewarded did not necessarily force a comparison, especially when the part which Nelson bore in it was considered. Lords Duncan and St. Vincent had each a pension of £1,000 from the Irish government. This was not granted to Nelson in consequence of the union [the legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland, Nelson felt; and this he expressed with indignation among his friends.

Whatever may have been the motives of the ministry, and whatever the formalities with which they excused their conduct to themselves, the importance and magnitude of the victory were universally acknowledged. A grant of £10,000 was voted to Nelson by the East India Company; the Turkish Company¹ presented him with a piece of plate; the city of London presented a sword to him and to each of his captains. Gold medals were distributed to the captains, and the first lieutenants of all the ships were promoted, as had been done after Lord Howe's victory. Nelson was exceedingly anxious that the captain and first lieutenant of the Culloden should not be passed over because of their misfortune. To Trowbridge himself he said, "Let us rejoice that the ship which got on shore was commanded by an officer whose character is so thoroughly established." To the Admiralty he stated that Captain Trowbridge's conduct was as fully entitled to praise as that of any one officer in the squadron, and as highly deserving of reward. "It was Trowbridge," said he, "who equipped the squadron so soon at Syracuse; it was Trowbridge who exerted himself for me after the action; it was Trowbridge who saved the Culloden, when none that I know in the service would have attempted it." The gold medal, therefore, by the King's express desire, was given to Captain Trowbridge, "for his services both before and since, and for the great and wonderful exertions which he made at the time of the action, in saving and getting off his ship." The private letter from the Admiralty to Nelson informed him that the first lieutenants of all the ships engaged were to be promoted. Nelson instantly wrote to the commander in chief.² "I sincerely hope," said he, "this is not intended to exclude the first lieutenant of the Culloden.

Jan. 1, 1801], though surely it would be more becoming to increase the British grant than to save a thousand a year by the union in such cases.

¹ A company of London merchants who traded with Turkey.

² The Earl of St. Vincent.

For Heaven's sake—for my sake—if it be so, get it altered. Our dear friend Trowbridge has endured enough. His sufferings were, in every respect, extreme." To the Admiralty he wrote in terms equally warm. "I hope and believe the word 'engaged' is not intended to exclude the Culloden. The merit of that ship and her gallant captain are too well known to benefit by anything I could say. Her misfortune was great in getting aground while her more fortunate companions were in the full tide of happiness. No; I am confident that my good Lord Spencer will never add misery to misfortune. Captain Trowbridge on shore is superior to captains afloat; in the midst of his great misfortunes he made those signals which prevented certainly the Alexander and Swiftsure from running on the shoals. I beg your pardon for writing on a subject which, I verily believe, has never entered your lordships' heads; but my heart, as it ought to be, is warm to my gallant friends." Thus feelingly alive was Nelson to the claims and interests and feelings of others. The Admiralty replied that the exception was necessary, as the ship had not been in action; but they desired the commander in chief to promote the lieutenant upon the first vacancy which should occur.

Nelson, in remembrance of an old and uninterrupted friendship, appointed Alexander Davison sole prize agent for the captured ships; upon which Davison ordered medals to be struck in gold, for the captains; in silver, for the lieutenants and warrant officers; in gilt metal, for the petty officers; and in copper, for the seamen and marines. The cost of this act of liberality amounted to nearly £2,000. It is worthy of record on another account; for some of the gallant men who received no other honorary badge of their conduct on that memorable day than this copper medal from a private individual, years afterwards, when they died upon a foreign station, made it their last request that the medals might carefully be sent home to their respective friends,—so sensible are brave men of honor, in whatever rank they may be placed.

Three of the frigates whose presence would have been so essential a few weeks sooner, joined the squadron on the twelfth day after the action. The fourth joined a few days after them. Nelson thus received dispatches which rendered it necessary for him to return to Naples. Before he left Egypt he burnt three of the prizes. They could not have been fitted for a passage to Gibraltar in less than a month, and that at a great expense, and with the loss of the service of at least two sail of the line. "I rest assured," he said to the Admiralty, "that they will be paid for, and have held out that assurance to the squadron; for if an admiral, after a victory, is to look after the captured ships, and not to the distressing of the enemy, very dearly, indeed, must the nation pay for the prizes. I trust that £60,000 will be deemed a very moderate sum for them; and when the services, time, and men, with the expense of fitting the three ships for a voyage to England, are considered, government will save nearly as much as they are valued at. Paying for prizes," he continued, "is no new idea of mine, and would often prove an amazing saving to the state, even without taking into calculation what the nation loses by the attention of admirals to the property of the captors,—an attention absolutely necessary, as a recompense for the exertions of the officers and men. An admiral may be amply rewarded by his own feelings and by the approbation of his superiors; but what reward have the inferior officers and men but the value of the prizes? If an admiral takes that from them on any consideration, he cannot expect to be well supported." To Earl St. Vincent he said, if he could have been sure that government would have paid a reasonable value for them, he would have ordered two of the other prizes to be burnt; for they would cost more in refitting, and by the loss of ships attending them, than they were worth.

Having sent the six remaining prizes forward under Sir James Saumarez, Nelson left Captain Hood in the Zealous, off Alexandria, with the Swiftsure, Goliath, Alcmene, Zealous, and Emerald, and stood out to sea himself on the seventeenth day after the battle.

CHAPTER VI.

Nelson returns to Naples. — State of that court and kingdom. — General Mack. — The French approach Naples. — Flight of the royal family. — Successes of the allies in Italy. — Transactions in the Bay of Naples. — Expulsion of the French from the Neapolitan and Roman states. — Nelson is made Duke of Bronte. — He leaves the Mediterranean and returns to England.

NELSON'S health had suffered greatly while he was in the Agamemnon. "My complaint," he said, "is as if a girth were buckled taut over my breast; and my endeavor in the night is to get it loose." After the battle off Cape St. Vincent he felt a little rest to be so essential to his recovery that he declared he could not continue to serve longer than the ensuing summer, unless it should be absolutely necessary; for, in his own strong language, he had then been four years and nine months without one moment's repose for body or mind. A few months' intermission of labor he had obtained, — not of rest, for it was purchased with the loss of a limb, and the greater part of the time had been a season of constant pain. As soon as his shattered frame had sufficiently recovered for him to resume his duties, he was called to services of greater importance than any on which he had hitherto been employed, and they brought with them commensurate fatigue and care.

The anxiety which he endured during his long pursuit of the enemy was rather changed in its direction, than abated, by their defeat; and this constant wakefulness of thought, added to the effect of his wound and exertions from which it was not possible for one of so ardent and wide-reaching a mind to spare himself, nearly proved fatal. On his way back to Italy he was seized with fever. For eighteen hours his life was despaired of; and even when the disorder took a favorable turn, and he was so far recovered as again to appear on deck, he himself thought that his end was approaching, — such was the weakness to which the fever and cough had reduced him. Writing to Earl St. Vincent on the passage, he said to him: "I never expect, my dear lord, to see your face again. It may please God that this will be the finish to that fever of anxiety which I have endured from the middle of June; but be that as it pleases His goodness; I am resigned to His will."

The kindest attentions of the warmest friendship were awaiting him at Naples. "Come here," said Sir William Hamilton, "for God's sake, my dear friend, as soon as the service will permit you. A pleasant apartment is ready for you in my house, and Emma is looking out for the softest pillows to repose the few wearied limbs you have left." Happy would it have been for Nelson if warm and careful friendship had been all that awaited him there. He himself saw at that time the character of the Neapolitan court, as it first struck an Englishman in its true light; and when he was on the way he declared that he detested the voyage to Naples, and that nothing but necessity could have forced him to it. But never was any hero, on his return from victory, welcomed with more heartfelt joy. Before the battle of Aboukir the court of Naples had been trembling for its existence. The language which the Directory held towards it was well described by Sir William Hamilton as being exactly the language of a highwayman.¹ The Neapolitans were told that Benevento might be added to their dominions, provided they would pay a large sum sufficient to satisfy the Directory; and they were warned that if the proposal were refused, or even if there were any delay in accepting it, the French would revolutionize all Italy. The joy, therefore, of the court at Nelson's success was in proportion to the dismay from which that success relieved them. The Queen was a daughter of Maria Theresa,² and sister of Marie Antoinette. Had she been the wisest and gentlest of her sex, it would not have been possible for her to have regarded the French without hatred and horror; and the progress of revolutionary opinions, while it perpetually reminded her of her sister's fate, excited no unreasonable apprehensions for her own. Her feelings, naturally ardent and little accustomed to restraint, were excited to the highest pitch when the news of the victory arrived. Lady Hamilton, her constant friend and favorite, who was present, says: "It is not possible to describe her transports; she wept, she kissed her husband, her children, walked frantically about the room, burst into tears again, and again kissed and embraced every person near her, exclaiming, 'O brave Nelson! O God, bless and protect our brave deliverer! O Nelson, Nelson, what do we not owe you! O conqueror—savior of Italy! Oh that my swollen heart could now tell him personally what we owe to him!'" She herself wrote to the Neapolitan ambassador at London upon the occasion, in terms which show the fullness of her joy and the height of the hopes which it had excited. "I wish I could give wings," said she, "to the bearer of the news, and, at the same time, to our most sincere gratitude. The whole of the seacoast of Italy is saved; and this is owing alone to the generous English. This battle, or, to speak more correctly, this total defeat of the regicide¹ squadron, was obtained by the valor of this brave admiral, seconded by a navy which is the terror of its enemies. The victory is so complete that I can still scarcely believe it; and if it were not the brave English nation, which is accustomed to perform prodigies by sea, I could not persuade myself that it had happened. It would have moved you to have seen all my children, boys and girls, hanging on my neck, and crying for joy at the happy news. Recommend the hero to his master; he has filled the whole of Italy with admiration of the English. Great hopes were entertained of some advantages being gained by his bravery, but no one could look for so total a destruction. All here are drunk with joy."

¹ The French government was supposed to say, "Stand and deliver; your money or your life."

² The Empress of Austria from 1740 to 1780. Marie Antoinette, her daughter, and wife of Louis XVI., was beheaded by the revolutionists, October, 1793.

¹ King-killing, in reference to the beheading of Louis XVI.

Such being the feelings of the royal family, it may well be supposed with what delight and with what honors Nelson would be welcomed. Early on the 22d of September the poor wretched Vanguard, as he called his shattered vessel, appeared in sight of Naples. The Culloden and Alexander had preceded her by some days, and given notice of her approach. Many hundred boats and barges were ready to go forth and meet him, with music and streamers, and every demonstration of joy and triumph. Sir William and Lady Hamilton led the way in their state barge. They had seen Nelson only for a few days four years ago, but they then perceived in him that heroic spirit which was now so fully and gloriously manifested to the world. Emma, Lady Hamilton, who from this time so greatly influenced his future life, was a woman whose personal accomplishments have seldom been equaled, and whose powers of mind were not less fascinating than her person. She was passionately attached to the Queen; and by her influence the British fleet had obtained those supplies at Syracuse without which, Nelson always asserted, the battle of Aboukir could not have been fought. During the long interval which passed before any tidings were received, her anxiety had been hardly less than that of Nelson himself while pursuing an enemy of whom he could obtain no information; and when the tidings were brought her by a joyful bearer open-mouthed, its effect was such that she fell like one who had been shot. She and Sir William had literally been made ill by their hopes and fears and joy at a catastrophe so far exceeding all that they had dared to hope for. Their admiration for the hero necessarily produced a degree of proportionate gratitude and affection; and when their barge came alongside the Vanguard, at the sight of Nelson, Lady Hamilton sprang up the ship's side, and exclaiming, "O God! is it possible!" fell upon his breast, more, he says, like one dead than alive. He described the meeting as "terribly affecting." These friends had scarcely recovered from their tears when the King, who went out to meet him three leagues in the royal barge, came on board and took him by the hand, calling him his deliverer and preserver.

From all the boats around he was saluted with the same appellations; the multitude who surrounded him when he landed repeated the same enthusiastic cries, and the *lazzaroni*¹ displayed their joy by holding up birds in cages, and giving them their liberty as he passed.

His birthday, which occurred a week after his arrival, was celebrated with one of the most splendid fêtes ever beheld at Naples. But notwithstanding the splendor with which he was encircled, and the flattering honors with which all ranks welcomed him, Nelson was fully sensible of the depravity, as well as weakness, of those by whom he was surrounded. "What precious moments," said he, "the courts of Naples and Vienna are losing! Three months would liberate Italy; but this court is so enervated that the happy moment will be lost. I am very unwell, and their miserable conduct is not likely to cool my irritable temper. It is a country of fiddlers and poets and scoundrels." This sense of their ruinous weakness he always retained; nor was he ever blind to the mingled folly and treachery of the Neapolitan ministers, and the complication of iniquities under which the country groaned; but he insensibly, under the influence of Lady Hamilton, formed an affection for the court to whose misgovernment the miserable condition of the country was so greatly to be imputed.

The state of Naples may be described in few words. The King was one of the Spanish Bourbons.² As the Cæsars have shown us to what wickedness the moral nature of princes may be perverted, so in this family the degradation to which their intellectual nature can be reduced has been not less conspicuously evinced. Ferdinand, like the rest of his race, was passionately fond of field sports, and cared for nothing else. His Queen had all the vices of the House of Austria, with little to mitigate, and nothing to enoble them; provided she could have her pleasures, and the King his sports, they cared not in what manner the revenue was raised or administered. Of course a system of favoritism existed at court, and the vilest and most impudent corruption prevailed in every department of state and in every branch of administration, from the highest to the lowest. It is only the institutions of Christianity and the vicinity of better-regulated states which prevent kingdoms, under such circumstances of misrule, from sinking into a barbarism like that of Turkey. A sense of better things was kept alive in some of the Neapolitans by literature, and by their intercourse with happier countries. These persons naturally looked to France at the commencement of the Revolution; and, during all the horrors of that Revolution, still cherished a hope that, by the aid of France, they might be enabled to establish a new order of things in Naples. They were grievously mistaken in supposing that the principles of liberty would ever be supported by France, but they were not mistaken in believing that no government could be worse than their own; and, therefore, they considered any change as desirable. In this opinion men of the most different characters agreed. Many of the nobles who were not in favor wished for a revolution, that they might obtain the ascendancy to which they thought themselves entitled. Men of desperate fortunes desired it in the hope of enriching themselves; knaves and intriguers sold themselves to the French to promote it; and a few enlightened men, and true lovers of their country, joined in the same cause from the purest and noblest motives. All these were confounded under the common name of Jacobins; and the Jacobins of the continental kingdoms were regarded by the English with more hatred than they deserved. They were classed with Philippe Egalité, Marat, and Hébert;¹ whereas they deserved rather to be ranked, if not with Locke and Sidney and Russell, at least with Argyle and Monmouth,¹ and those who, having the same object as the prime movers of our own Revolution, failed in their premature, but not unworthy, attempt.

¹ The beggars of Naples. Their name is derived from that of the patron saint of the sick and miserable (see Luke xvi. 19-30).

² See Note 1, p. 60.

¹ Philippe Egalité was a Bourbon prince, who took his surname (meaning equality) to show his sympathy with the revolutionists. He was beheaded. Marat was a physician and philosopher of superior abilities, who, having given himself to further the ideas of the Revolution, was stabbed by Charlotte Corday, 1793. Hébert was a French revolutionist, whose readiness in scurrilous writing and glibness of tongue made him a leader of the more depraved populace. He was executed in 1794.

No circumstances could be more unfavorable to the best interests of Europe than those which placed England in strict alliance with the superannuated and abominable governments of the Continent. The subjects of those governments who wished for freedom thus became enemies to England, and dupes and agents of France. They looked to their own grinding grievances, and did not see the danger with which the liberties of the world were threatened. England, on the other hand, saw the danger in its true magnitude, but was blind to these grievances, and found herself compelled to support systems which had formerly been equally the object of her abhorrence and her contempt. This was the state of Nelson's mind. He knew that there could be no peace for Europe till the pride of France was humbled and her strength broken; and he regarded all those who were the friends of France as traitors to the common cause, as well as to their own individual sovereigns. There are situations in which the most opposite and hostile parties may mean equally well, and yet act equally wrong. The court of Naples, unconscious of committing any crime by continuing the system of misrule to which they had succeeded, conceived that, in maintaining things as they were, they were maintaining their own rights, and preserving the people from such horrors as had been perpetrated in France. The Neapolitan revolutionists thought that, without a total change of system, any relief from the present evils was impossible, and they believed themselves justified in bringing about that change by any means. Both parties knew that it was the fixed intention of the French to revolutionize Naples. The revolutionists supposed that it was for the purpose of establishing a free government; the court, and all disinterested persons, were perfectly aware that the enemy had no other object than conquest and plunder.

¹ John Locke (1632-1704), a philosopher, who, living at the time the English people were agitating the question of the rights of kings and passive obedience to them, advocated liberty. Algernon Sidney, and his illustrious companion in misfortune, William, Lord Russell, were executed in 1683 for what the king was pleased to term "complicity in the Rye House Plot." The Duke of Monmouth led an unsuccessful rebellion against the reigning king, James II., and was executed in 1685. Argyle led a Scotch insurrection in Monmouth's favor, and suffered death the same year (1685).

The battle of the Nile shook the power of France. Her most successful general and her finest army were blocked up in Egypt, hopeless, as it appeared,¹ of return; and the government was in the hands of men without talents, without character, and divided among themselves. Austria, whom Bonaparte had terrified into a peace at a time when constancy on her part would probably have led to his destruction, took advantage of the crisis to renew the war. Russia also was preparing to enter the field with unbroken forces, led by a general² whose extraordinary military genius would have entitled him to a high and honorable rank in history, if it had not been sullied by all the ferocity of a barbarian. Naples, seeing its destruction at hand, and thinking that the only means of averting it was by meeting the danger, after long vacillations, which were produced by the fears and weakness and treachery of its council, agreed at last to join this new coalition with a numerical force of eighty thousand men. Nelson told the King, in plain terms, that he had his choice either to advance, trusting to God for His blessing on a just cause, and prepared to die sword in hand, or to remain quiet and be kicked out of his kingdom; one of these things must happen. The King made answer he would go on and trust in God and Nelson; and Nelson, who would else have returned to Egypt for the purpose of destroying the French shipping in Alexandria, gave up his intention at the desire of the Neapolitan court, and resolved to remain on that station in the hope that he might be useful to the movements of the army. He suspected also, with reason, that the continuance of his fleet was so earnestly requested because the royal family thought their persons would be safer, in case of any mishap, under the British flag than under their own.

¹ After the battle of the Nile, Napoleon invaded Syria, defeated the Turks at Aboukir, and, leaving his army behind, returned to France, October, 1799.

² Suvaroff (1729-1800) led the Russians in a series of victories against the Turks and Poles while the Empress Catharine was on the throne. During the reign of Paul I. he repeated his victories at the head of the Russians and Austrians in Italy.

His first object was the recovery of Malta, an island which the King of Naples pretended to claim. The Maltese, whom the villainous knights of their order¹ had betrayed to France, had taken up arms against their rapacious invaders with a spirit and unanimity worthy of the highest praise. They blockaded the French garrison by land, and a small squadron, under Captain Ball, began to blockade them by sea on the 12th of October. Twelve days afterwards Nelson arrived, and the little island of Gozo, dependent upon Malta, which had also been seized and garrisoned by the French, capitulated soon after his arrival, and was taken possession of by the British, in the name of his Sicilian Majesty,—a power who had no better claim to it than France. Having seen this effected, and reënforced Captain Ball, he left that able officer to perform a most arduous and important part, and returned himself to coöperate with the intended movements of the Neapolitans.

General Mack² was at the head of the Neapolitan troops. All that is now doubtful concerning this man is whether he was a coward or a traitor. At that time he was assiduously extolled as a most consummate commander, to whom Europe might look for deliverance; and when he was introduced by the King and Queen to the British admiral, the Queen said to him, “Be to us by land, general, what my hero Nelson has been by sea.” Mack, on his part, did not fail to praise the force which he was appointed to command. It was, he said, the finest army in Europe. Nelson agreed with him that there could not be finer men; but when the general, at a review, so directed the operations of a mock fight that, by an unhappy blunder, his own troops were surrounded instead of those of the enemy, he turned to his friends and exclaimed with bitterness that the fellow did not understand his business. Another circumstance, not less characteristic, confirmed Nelson in this judgment. "General Mack," said he, in one of his letters, "cannot move without five carriages! I have formed my opinion. I heartily pray I may be mistaken."

¹ The Order of the Hospitalers of St. John, later known as the Knights of Malta, was instituted in the eleventh century. To their monastic vow they added that of bearing arms in defense of Christendom. They became distinguished fighters, and Malta their stronghold. Southey calls them villainous because, giving way to popular clamor, they surrendered to Napoleon.

² An Austrian general, who led one of the armies of the European coalition against France.

While Mack, at the head of thirty-two thousand men, marched into the Roman state, five thousand Neapolitans were embarked on board the British and Portuguese squadron to take possession of Leghorn. This was effected without opposition; and the Grand Duke of Tuscany, whose neutrality had been so outrageously violated by the French, was better satisfied with the measure than some of the Neapolitans themselves. Naselli, their general, refused to seize the French vessels at Leghorn, because he and the Duke di Sangro, who was ambassador at the Tuscan court, maintained that the King of Naples was not at war with France. "What!" said Nelson, "has not the King received, as a conquest made by him, the republican flag taken at Gozo? Is not his own flag flying there and at Malta, not only by his permission, but by his order? Is not his flag shot at every day by the French, and their shot returned from batteries which bear that flag? Are not two frigates and a corvette placed under my orders ready to fight the French, meet them where they may? Has not the King sent publicly from Naples, guns, mortars, etc., with officers and artillery, against the French in Malta? If these acts are not tantamount to any written paper, I give up all knowledge of what is war." This reasoning was of less avail than an argument addressed to the general's fears. Nelson told him that if he permitted the many hundred French who were then in the mole to remain neutral till they had a fair opportunity of being active, they had one sure resource, if all other schemes failed, which was to set one vessel on fire; the mole would be destroyed, probably the town also, and the port ruined for twenty years. This representation made Naselli agree to the half measure of laying an embargo on the vessels. Among them were a great number of French privateers, some of which were of such force as to threaten the greatest mischief to our commerce, and about seventy sail of vessels belonging to the Ligurian Republic, as Genoa was now called,¹ laden with corn, and ready to sail for Genoa and France, where their arrival would have expedited the entrance of more French troops into Italy. "The general," said Nelson, "saw, I believe, the consequence of permitting these vessels to depart, in the same light as myself; but there is this difference between us: he, prudently, and certainly safely, waits the orders of his court, taking no responsibility on himself; I act from the circumstances of the moment, as I feel may be most advantageous for the cause which I serve, taking all responsibility on myself." It was in vain to hope for anything vigorous or manly from such men as Nelson was compelled to act with. The crews of the French ships, and their allies, were ordered to depart in two days. Four days elapsed, and nobody obeyed the order; nor, in spite of the representations of the British minister, Mr. Windham, were any means taken to enforce it. The true Neapolitan shuffle, as Nelson called it, took place on all occasions. After an absence of ten days he returned to Naples, and receiving intelligence there from Mr. Windham that the privateers were at last to be disarmed, the corn landed, and the crews sent away, he expressed his satisfaction at the news in characteristic language, saying: "So far I am content. The enemy will be distressed, and, thank God, I shall get no money. The world, I know, think that money is our god, and now they will be undeceived, as far as relates to us. 'Down, down with the French!' is my constant prayer."

Odes, sonnets, and congratulatory poems of every description

¹ From the ancient name of the country about Genoa.

were poured in upon Nelson on his arrival at Naples. An Irish Franciscan,¹ who was one of the poets, not being content with panegyric upon this occasion, ventured upon a flight of prophecy, and predicted that Lord Nelson would take Rome with his ships. His lordship reminded Father M'Cormick that ships could not ascend the Tiber; but the father, who had probably forgotten this circumstance, met the objection with a bold front, and declared he saw that it would come to pass notwithstanding. Rejoicings of this kind were of short duration. The King of Naples was with the army which had entered Rome; but the Castle of St. Angelo was held by the French, and thirteen thousand French were strongly posted in the Roman states² at Castallana. Mack had marched against them with twenty thousand men. Nelson saw that the event was doubtful, or rather that there could be very little hope of the result. But the immediate fate of Naples, as he well knew, hung upon the issue. "If Mack is defeated," said he, "in fourteen days this country is lost; for the Emperor³ has not yet moved his army, and Naples has not the power of resisting the enemy. It was not a case of choice, but of necessity, which induced the King to march out of his kingdom, and not wait till the French had collected a force sufficient to drive him out of it in a week." He had no reliance upon the Neapolitan officers, who, as he described them, seemed frightened at a drawn sword or a loaded gun; and he was perfectly aware of the consequences which the sluggish movements and deceitful policy of the Austrians were likely to bring down upon themselves and all their continental allies. "A delayed war on the part of the Emperor," said he, writing to the British minister at Vienna, "will be destructive to this monarchy of Naples, and, of course, to the newly acquired dominions⁴ of the Emperor in Italy. Had

¹ A monk of the mendicant order founded by St. Francis d'Assisi.

² "The Roman states," i.e., central Italy, of which Rome was then the capital.

³ Of Austria.

⁴ By the peace of Campo Formio, October, 1797, Austria received the territory of Venice as far as to the river Adige.

the war commenced in September or October all Italy would, at this moment, have been liberated. This month¹ is worse than the last; the next will render the contest doubtful; and in six months, when the Neapolitan republic will be organized, armed, and with its numerous resources called forth, the Emperor will not only be defeated in Italy, but will totter on his throne at Vienna. 'Down, down with the French!' ought to be written in the council room of every country in the world; and may Almighty God give right thoughts to every sovereign, is my constant prayer." His perfect foresight of the immediate event was clearly shown in this letter, when he desired the ambassador to assure the Empress (who was a daughter of the House of Naples), notwithstanding the councils which had shaken the throne of her father and mother, he would remain there ready to save their persons, and her brothers and sisters, and that he had also left ships at Leghorn to save the lives of the grand duke and her sister. "For all," said he, "must be a republic if the Emperor does not act with expedition and vigor."

His fears were soon verified. "The Neapolitan officers," said Nelson, "did not lose much honor, for, God knows, they had not much to lose; but they lost all they had." General St. Philip commanded the right wing, of nineteen thousand men. He fell in with three thousand of the enemy, and, as soon as he came near enough, deserted to them. One of his men had virtue enough to level a musket at him, and shot him through the arm; but the wound was not sufficient to prevent him from joining with the French in pursuit of his own countrymen. Cannon, tents, baggage, and military chest were all forsaken by the run-aways, though they lost only forty men; for the French, having put them to flight, and got possession of everything, did not pursue an army of more than three times their own number. The main body of the Neapolitans under Mack did not behave better. The King returned to Naples, where every day brought with it the tidings of some new disgrace from the army and the discovery of some new treachery at home; till, four days after his return, the general sent him advice that there was no prospect of stopping the progress of the enemy, and that the royal family must look to their own personal safety. The state of the public mind in Naples was such at this time that neither the British minister nor the British admiral thought it prudent to appear at court. Their motions were watched, and the revolutionists had even formed a plan for seizing and detaining them as hostages, to prevent any attack upon the city after the French should have taken possession of it. A letter which Nelson addressed at this time to the First Lord of the Admiralty shows in what manner he contemplated the possible issue of the storm. It was in these words:

¹ December, 1798.

“MY DEAR LORD: There is an old saying, that when things are at the worst they must mend. Now the mind of man cannot fancy things worse than they are here. But, thank God! my health is better, my mind never firmer, and my heart in the right trim to comfort, relieve, and protect those whom it is my duty to afford assistance to. Pray, my lord, assure our gracious Sovereign that, while I live, I will support his glory; and that if I fall it shall be in a manner worthy of your lordship’s faithful and obliged Nelson. I must not write more. Every word may be a text for a long letter.”

Meantime Lady Hamilton arranged everything for the removal of the royal family. This was conducted on her part with the greatest address, and without suspicion, because she had been in habits of constant correspondence with the Queen. It was known that the removal could not be effected without danger, for the mob, and especially the lazzaroni, were attached to the King; and as, at this time, they felt a natural presumption in their own numbers and strength, they insisted that he should not leave Naples. Several persons fell victims to their fury; among others was a messenger from Vienna, whose body was dragged under the windows of the palace in the King's sight. The King and Queen spoke to the mob and pacified them; but it would not have been safe, while they were in this agitated state, to have embarked the effects of the royal family openly. Lady Hamilton, like a heroine of modern romance, explored, with no little danger, a subterraneous passage leading from the palace to the seaside. Through this passage the royal treasures, the choicest pieces of painting and sculpture, and other property, to the amount of two millions and a half, were conveyed to the shore, and stowed safely on board the English ships. On the night of the 21st, at half-past eight, Nelson landed, brought out the whole royal family, embarked them in three barges, and carried them safely through a tremendous sea to the Vanguard. Notice was then immediately given to the British merchants that they would be received on board any ship in the squadron. Their property had previously been embarked in transports. Two days were passed in the bay for the purpose of taking such persons on board as required an asylum, and on the night of the 23d the fleet sailed. The next day a more violent storm arose than Nelson had ever before encountered. On the 25th the youngest of the princes was taken ill, and died in Lady Hamilton's arms. During this whole trying season Lady Hamilton waited upon the royal family with the zeal of the most devoted servant, at a time when, except one man, no person belonging to the court assisted them.

On the morning of the 26th the royal family were landed at Palermo. It was soon seen that their flight had not been premature. Prince Pignatelli, who had been left as vicar-general¹ and viceroy, with orders to defend the kingdom to the last rock in Calabria, sent plenipotentiaries to the French camp before Capua; and they, for the sake of saving the capital, signed an armistice, by which the greater part of the kingdom was given up to the enemy,—a cession that necessarily led to the loss of the whole. This was on the 10th of January. The French advanced towards Naples. Mack, under pretext of taking shelter from the fury of the lazzaroni, fled to the French general Championet, who sent him under an escort to Milan; but as France hoped for further services from this wretched traitor, it was thought prudent to treat him apparently as a prisoner of war. The Neapolitan army disappeared in a few days. Of the men, some, following their officers, deserted to the enemy; the greater part took the opportunity of disbanding themselves. The lazzaroni proved true to their country. They attacked the enemy's advanced posts, drove them in, and were not dispirited by the murderous defeat which they suffered from the main body. Flying into the city, they continued to defend it even after the French had planted their artillery in the principal streets. Had there been a man of genius to have directed their enthusiasm, or had there been any correspondent feeling in the higher ranks, Naples might have set a glorious example to Europe, and have proved the grave of every Frenchman who entered it. But the vices of the government had extinguished all other patriotism than that of a rabble, who had no other virtue than that sort of loyalty which was like the fidelity of a dog to its master. This fidelity the French and their adherents counteracted by another kind of devotion. The priests affirmed that St. Januarius¹ had declared in favor of the Revolution; the miracle of his blood was performed with the usual success and more than usual effect on the very evening when, after two days of desperate fighting, the French obtained possession of Naples. A French guard of honor was stationed at his church. Championet gave "respect for St. Januarius" as the word for the army; and the next day

¹ "Vicar-general," i.e., assistant of a bishop or archbishop in the discharge of his office.

¹ A martyr of the third century, and the patron saint of Naples. According to the Roman breviary, his body is in the cathedral of Naples. At his feasts, in May and September, his clotted blood, preserved in glass phials, is said to liquify and bubble when placed in sight of the head. If the liquefaction is slow it is a bad omen. When the French occupied Naples the blood would not liquefy. The French general threatened the archbishop, and the blood, it is said, finally bubbled.

Te Deum was sung by the archbishop in the cathedral, and the inhabitants were invited to attend the ceremony and join in thanksgiving for the glorious entry of the French; who, it was said, being under the peculiar protection of Providence, had regenerated the Neapolitans, and were come to establish and consolidate their happiness.

It seems to have been Nelson's opinion that the Austrian cabinet regarded the conquest of Naples with complacency, and that its measures were directed so as designedly not to prevent the French from overrunning it. That cabinet was assuredly capable of any folly and of any baseness; and it is not improbable that at this time, calculating upon the success of the new coalition, it indulged a dream of adding extensively to its former Italian possessions, and therefore left the few remaining powers of Italy to be overthrown, as a means which would facilitate its own ambitious views. The King of Sardinia, finding it impossible longer to endure the exactions of France and the French commissary, went to Leghorn, embarked on a Danish frigate, and sailed under British protection to Sicily, that part of his dominions which the maritime superiority of England rendered a secure asylum. On his arrival he presented a protest against the conduct of France, declaring upon oath and word of a king that he had never infringed in the slightest degree, the treaties which he had made with the republic. Tuscany was soon occupied by French troops, a fate which bolder policy might perhaps have failed to bring about, but which its weak and timid neutrality rendered inevitable. Nelson began to fear even for Sicily. "O my dear sir," he, writing to Commodore Duckworth, "one thousand English troops would save Messina, and I fear General Stuart cannot give me men to save this most important¹ island!" But his representations were not lost upon Sir Charles Stuart. This officer hastened immediately before Minorca with a thousand men, assisted in the measures of defense which were taken, and did not return before he had satisfied himself that if the Neapolitans were excluded from the management of affairs, and the spirit of the peasantry properly directed, Sicily was safe. Before his coming, Nelson had offered the King, if no resources should arrive, to defend Messina with the ship's company of an English man-of-war.

¹ Because it commanded the strait between Italy and Sicily.

Russia had now entered into the war. Corfu¹ surrendered to a Russian and Turkish fleet, acting now, for the first time, in strange confederacy,² yet against a power which was certainly the common and worst enemy of both. Trowbridge, having given up the blockade of Alexandria to Sir Sidney Smith, rejoined Nelson, bringing with him a considerable addition of strength, and in himself, what Nelson valued more,—a man upon whose sagacity, indefatigable zeal, and inexhaustible resources he could place full reliance. Trowbridge was intrusted to commence the operations against the French in the Bay of Naples. Meantime Maffei, a man of questionable character, but of a temperance for such times, having landed in Calabria, raised what he called a Christian army, composed of the best and the vilest—loyal peasants, enthusiastic priests and friars, galley slaves, emptying of the jails, and banditti. The islands in the Bay of Naples were joyfully delivered up by the inhabitants, who were in a state of famine already from the effect of this blockade. Trowbridge distributed among them all his flour, and he pressed the Sicilian court incessantly for supplies, telling them that £100,000 given away in provisions would at this time purchase a kingdom. Money, he was told, they had not; and the wisdom and integrity which might have supplied their wants were not to be found. “There is nothing,” said he, “which I propose that is not, as far as orders go, implicitly complied with; but the execution is dreadful, and almost makes me mad. My desire to serve their Majesties faithfully, as is my duty, has been such that I am almost blind and worn out, and cannot, in my present state, hold much longer."

¹ The Venetian islands of Greece were seized by the French after Bonaparte conquered Venice in May, 1797.

² From their geographical position, these countries are natural enemies.

Before any government can be overthrown by the consent of the people, the government must be intolerably oppressive or the people thoroughly corrupted. Bad as the misrule at Naples had been, its consequences had been felt far less there than in Sicily; and the peasantry had that attachment to the soil which gives birth to so many of the noblest as well as of the happiest feelings. In all the islands the people were perfectly frantic with joy when they saw the Neapolitan colors hoisted. At Procida, Trowbridge could not procure even a rag of the tricolored flag to lay at the King's feet; it was rent into ten thousand pieces by the inhabitants, and entirely destroyed. "The horrid treatment of the French," he said, "had made them mad." It exasperated the ferocity of a character which neither the laws nor the religion under which they lived tended to mitigate. Their hatred was especially directed against the Neapolitan revolutionists; and the fishermen, in concert among themselves, chose each his own victim, whom he would stiletto when the day of vengeance should arrive. The head of one was sent off one morning to Trowbridge, with his basket of grapes for breakfast, and a note from the Italian who had what he called the glory of presenting it, saying he had killed the man as he was running away, and begging his excellency to accept the head and consider it as a proof of the writer's attachment to the Crown. With the first successes of the court the work of punishment began. The judge at Ischia said it was necessary to have a bishop to degrade the traitorous priests before he could execute them; upon which Trowbridge advised him to hang them first and send them to him afterwards, if he did not think that degradation sufficient. This was said with the straightforward feeling of a sailor who cared as little for canon law¹ as he knew about it; but when he discovered that the judge's orders were to go through the business in a summary manner under his sanction, he told him at once, that could not be, for the prisoners were not British subjects; and he declined having anything to do with it. There were manifestly persons about the court who, while they thirsted for the pleasure of vengeance, were devising how to throw the odium of it upon the English. They wanted to employ an English man-of-war to carry the priests to Palermo for degradation and then bring them back for execution; and they applied to Trowbridge for a hangman, which he indignantly refused. He, meantime, was almost heart-broken by the situation in which he found himself. He had promised relief to the islanders, relying upon the Queen's promise to him. He had distributed the whole of his private stock. There was plenty of grain at Palermo and in its neighborhood, and yet none was sent him. The enemy, he complained, had more interest there than the King; and the distress for bread which he witnessed was such, he said, that it would move even a Frenchman to pity.

¹ "Canon law," i. e., laws or rules relating to faith, morals, and discipline, enjoined by ecclesiastical authority.

Nelson's mind was not in a happier state respecting public affairs. "As to politics," said he, "at this time they are my abomination; the ministers of kings and princes are as great scoundrels as ever lived. The brother of the Emperor¹ is just going to marry the great Something of Russia, and it is more than expected that a kingdom is to be found for him in Italy, and that the King of Naples will be sacrificed." Had there been a wise and manly spirit in the Italian states, or had the conduct of Austria been directed by anything like a principle of honor, a more favorable opportunity could not have been desired for restoring order and prosperity in Europe than the misconduct of the French Directory at this time afforded. But Nelson saw selfishness and knavery wherever he looked; and even the pleasure of seeing a cause prosper in which he was so zealously engaged was poisoned by his sense of the rascality of those with whom he was compelled to act. At this juncture intelligence arrived that the

¹ Joseph, a brother of the Austrian Emperor, married a grand duchess, the daughter of the Czar Paul.

French fleet had escaped from Brest under cover of a fog, passed Cadiz unseen by Lord Keith's squadron, in hazy weather, and entered the Mediterranean. It was said to consist of twenty-four sail of the line, six frigates, and three sloops. The object of the French was to liberate the Spanish fleet, form a junction with them, act against Minorca and Sicily, and overpower our naval force in the Mediterranean by falling in with detached squadrons, and thus destroying it in detail. When they arrived off Carthage they requested the Spanish ships to make sail and join; but the Spaniards replied they had not men to man them. To this it was answered that the French had men enough on board for that purpose. But the Spaniards seem to have been apprehensive of delivering up their ships thus entirely into the power of such allies, and refused to come out. The fleet from Cadiz, however, consisting of from seventeen to twenty sail of the line, got out under Masaredo, a man who then bore an honorable name, which he has since rendered infamous by betraying his country.¹ They met with a violent storm off the coast of Oran, which dismasted many of their ships, and so effectually disabled them as to prevent the junction, and frustrate a well-planned expedition.

Before this occurred, and while the junction was as probable as it would have been formidable, Nelson was in a state of the greatest anxiety. "What a state am I in!" said he to Earl St. Vincent. "If I go, I risk, and more than risk, Sicily; for we know from experience that more depends upon opinion than upon acts themselves;² and as I stay, my heart is breaking." His first business was to summon Trowbridge to join him, with all the ships of the line under his command, and a frigate, if possible. Then, hearing that the French had entered the Mediterranean, and expecting them at Palermo, where he had only his own ship, with that single ship he prepared to make all the resistance possible. Trowbridge having joined him, he left Captain E. J. Foote, of the Seahorse, to command the smaller vessels in the Bay of Naples, and sailed with six ships, — one a Portuguese, and a Portuguese corvette, — telling Earl St. Vincent that the squadron should never fall into the hands of the enemy. “And before we are destroyed,” said he, “I have little doubt but they will have their wings so completely clipped that they may be easily overtaken.”

¹ He accepted office from Joseph Bonaparte, whom Napoleon made King of Spain after he had driven out the Bourbons.

² Nelson's presence in Palermo was a defense to the King and a menace to his enemies.

It was just at this time that he received from Captain Hallowell the present of the coffin. Such a present was regarded by the men with natural astonishment. One of his old shipmates in the Agamemnon said: “We shall have hot work of it indeed! You see the admiral intends to fight till he is killed; and there he is to be buried.” Nelson placed it upright against the bulkhead of his cabin, behind his chair where he sat at dinner. The gift suited him at this time. It is said that he was disappointed in the son-in-law¹ whom he had loved so dearly from his childhood, and who had saved his life at Teneriffe; and it is certain that he had now formed an infatuated attachment for Lady Hamilton, which totally weaned his affections from his wife. Farther than this there is no reason to believe that this most unfortunate attachment was criminal; but this was criminality enough, and it brought with it its punishment. Nelson was dissatisfied with himself, and therefore weary of the world. This feeling he now frequently expressed. “There is no true happiness in this life,” said he, “and in my present state I could quit it with a smile.” And in a letter to his old friend Davison he said: “Believe me, my only wish is to sink with honor into the grave; and when that shall please God, I shall meet death with a smile. Not that I am insensible to the honors and riches my King and country have heaped upon me, — so much more than any officer could deserve; yet am I ready to quit this world of trouble, and envy none but those of the estate six feet by two.”²

¹ Captain Nisbet.

² “Six feet by two,” i.e., the length and width of a grave.

Well had it been for Nelson if he had made no other sacrifices to this unhappy attachment than his peace of mind; but it led to the only blot upon his public character. While he sailed from Palermo with the intention of collecting his whole force and keeping off Maretimo, either to receive reënforcements there, if the French were bound upwards, or to hasten to Minorca, if that should be their destination, Captain Foote, in the Seahorse, with the Neapolitan frigates and some small vessels under his command, was left to act with a land force consisting of a few regular troops of four different nations, and with the armed rabble which Cardinal Ruffo called the "Christian army." His directions were to coöperate to the utmost of his power with the royalists, at whose head Ruffo had been placed, and he had no other instructions whatever.

Ruffo, advancing without any plan, but relying upon the enemy's want of numbers, which prevented them from attempting to act upon the offensive, and ready to take advantage of any accident which might occur, approached Naples. Fort St. Elmo, which commands the town, was wholly garrisoned by French troops. The castles of Uovo and Nuovo, which commanded the anchorage, were chiefly defended by Neapolitan revolutionists, the powerful men among them having taken shelter there. If these castles were taken, the reduction of Fort St. Elmo would be greatly expedited. They were strong places, and there was reason to apprehend that the French fleet might arrive to relieve them. Ruffo proposed to the garrison to capitulate, on condition that their persons and property should be guaranteed, and that they should, at their own option, either be sent to Toulon or remain at Naples, without being molested either in their persons or families. This capitulation was accepted; it was signed by the cardinal, and the Russian and Turkish commanders, and lastly by Captain Foote, as commander of the British force. About six and thirty hours afterwards, Nelson arrived in the bay with a force which had joined him during his cruise, consisting of seventeen sail of the line, with seventeen hundred troops on board, and the Prince Royal of Naples in the admiral's ship. A flag of truce was flying on the castles and on board the Seahorse. Nelson made a signal to annul the treaty, declaring that he would grant rebels no other terms than those of unconditional submission. The cardinal objected to this;¹ nor could all the arguments of Nelson, Sir William Hamilton, and Lady Hamilton—who took an active part in the conference—convince him that a treaty of such a nature, solemnly concluded, could honorably be set aside. He retired at last, silenced by Nelson's authority, but not convinced. Captain Foote was sent out of the bay; and the garrisons, taken out of the castles under pretense of carrying the treaty into effect, were delivered over as rebels to the vengeance of the Sicilian court.² A deplorable transaction! A stain upon the memory of Nelson and the honor of England! To palliate it would be in vain; to justify it would be wicked. There is no alternative for one who will not make himself a participator in guilt but to record the disgraceful story with sorrow and with shame.

Prince Francesco Caraccioli, a younger branch of one of the noblest Neapolitan families, escaped from one of these castles before it capitulated. He was at the head of the marine, and was nearly seventy years of age, bearing a high character both for professional and personal merit. He had accompanied the court to Sicily; but when the revolutionary government, or "Parthenopæan Republic," as it was called, issued an edict ordering all absent Neapolitans to return, on pain of confiscation of their property, he solicited and obtained permission of the King to return, his estates being very great. It is said that the King, when he granted him this permission, warned him not to take any part in politics, expressing at the same time his own persuasion that he should recover his kingdom. But neither the King nor he himself ought to have imagined that in such times a man of such reputation would be permitted to remain inactive; and it soon appeared that Caraccioli was again in command of the navy, and serving under the republic against his late sovereign. The sailors reported that he was forced to act thus; and this was believed till it was seen that he directed ably the offensive operations of the revolutionists, and did not avail himself of opportunities for escaping when they offered. When the recovery of Naples was evidently near, he applied to Cardinal Ruffo and to the Duke of Calvirrano for protection, expressing his hope that the few days during which he had been forced to obey the French would not outweigh forty years of faithful services; but perhaps not receiving such assurances as he wished, and knowing too well the temper of the Sicilian court, he endeavored to secrete himself, and a price was set upon his head. More unfortunately for others than for himself, he was brought in alive, having been discovered in the disguise of a peasant, and carried one morning on board Lord Nelson's ship with his hands tied behind him.

¹ The King had commanded Ruffo not to treat with the Neapolitans.

² The day before the evacuation, Nelson had sent word to the garrisons that they must capitulate. This act was evidence that he did not accept the negotiations of Ruffo. The garrisons and other persons quitted the castles "with the full knowledge that the terms of the capitulation would not be carried into execution." (SIR N. H. NICOLAS.)

Caraccioli was well known to the British officers, and had been ever highly esteemed by all who knew him. Captain Hardy ordered him immediately to be unbound, and to be treated with all those attentions which he felt due to a man who, when last on board the Foudroyant,¹ had been received as an admiral and a prince. Sir William and Lady Hamilton were in the ship, but Nelson, it is affirmed, saw no one except his own officers during the tragedy which ensued. His own determination was made; and he issued an order to the Neapolitan commodore, Count Thurn, to assemble a court-martial of Neapolitan officers on board the British flagship, proceed immediately to try the prisoner, and report to him, if the charges were proved, what punishment he ought to suffer. These proceedings were as rapid as possible. Caraccioli was brought on board at nine in the forenoon, and the trial began at ten. It lasted two hours. He averred in his defense that he had acted under compulsion, having been compelled to serve as a common soldier till he consented to take command of the fleet. This, the apologists of Lord Nelson say, he failed in proving. They forget that the possibility of proving it was not allowed him; for he was brought to trial within an hour after he was legally in arrest; and how, in that time, was he to collect his witnesses? He was found guilty, and sentenced to death; and Nelson gave orders that the sentence should be carried into effect that evening at five o'clock, on board the Sicilian frigate La Minerva, by hanging him at the foreyard arm till sunset, when the body was to be cut down and thrown into the sea.

¹ Nelson's former ship, the Vanguard, is doubtless meant.

Caraccioli requested Lieutenant Parkinson, under whose custody he was placed, to intercede with Lord Nelson for a second trial, for this among other reasons,—that Count Thurn, who presided at the court-martial, was notoriously his personal enemy. Nelson made answer that the prisoner had been fairly tried by the officers of his own country, and he could not interfere, forgetting that, if he felt himself justified in ordering the trial and the execution, no human being could ever have questioned the propriety of his interfering on the side of mercy. Caraccioli then entreated that he might be shot. “I am an old man, sir,” said he; “I leave no family to lament me, and therefore cannot be supposed to be very anxious about prolonging my life; but the disgrace of being hanged is dreadful to me.” When this was repeated to Nelson he only told the lieutenant, with much agitation, to go and attend to his duty. As a last hope, Caraccioli asked the lieutenant if he thought an application to Lady Hamilton would be beneficial. Parkinson went to seek her; she was not to be seen on this occasion,—but she was present at the execution.¹ She had the most devoted attachment to the Neapolitan court, and the hatred which she felt against those whom she regarded as its enemies made her, at this time, forget what was due to the character of her sex as well as of her country.

Here, also, a faithful historian is called upon to pronounce a severe and unqualified condemnation of Nelson's conduct. Had he the authority of his Sicilian Majesty for proceeding as he did? If so, why was not that authority produced? If not, why were the proceedings hurried on without it? Why was the trial precipitated, so that it was impossible for the prisoner, if he had been innocent, to provide the witnesses who might have proved him so? Why was a second trial refused, when the known animosity of the president of the court against the prisoner was considered? Why was the execution hastened so as to preclude any appeal for mercy, and render the prerogative of mercy useless? Doubtless the British admiral seemed to himself to be acting under a rigid sense of justice; but to all other persons it was obvious that he was influenced by an infatuated attachment, a baneful passion which destroyed his domestic happiness, and now, in a second instance, stained ineffaceably his public character.

¹ This has been denied.

The body was carried out to a considerable distance and sunk in the bay, with three double-headed shot, weighing two hundred and fifty pounds, tied to the legs. Between two and three weeks afterwards, when the King was on board the Foudroyant, a Neapolitan fisherman came to the ship and solemnly declared that Caraccioli had risen from the bottom of the sea, and was coming as fast as he could to Naples, swimming half out of the water. Such an account was listened to like a tale of idle credulity. The day being fair, Nelson, to please the King, stood out to sea; but the ship had not proceeded far before a body was distinctly seen, upright in the water, and approaching them. It was soon recognized to be indeed the corpse of Caraccioli, which had risen and floated, while the great weights attached to the legs kept the body in a position like that of a living man. A fact so extraordinary astonished the King, and perhaps excited some feelings of superstitious fear akin to regret. He gave permission for the body to be taken on shore and receive Christian burial. It produced no better effect. Naples exhibited more dreadful scenes than it had witnessed in the days of Masaniello.¹ After the mob had had their fill of blood and plunder, the reins were given to justice,—if that can be called justice which annuls its own stipulations, looks to the naked facts alone, disregarding all motives and all circumstances, and without considering character or science, or sex or youth, sacrifices its victims, not for the public weal, but for the gratification of greedy vengeance.

The castles of St. Elmo, Gaeta, and Capua remained to be subdued. On the land side there was no danger that the French in these garrisons should be relieved, for Suvaroff was now beginning to drive the enemy before him; but Nelson thought his presence necessary in the Bay of Naples; and when Lord Keith, having received intelligence that the French and Spanish fleets had formed a junction and sailed for Carthage, ordered him to repair to Minorca with the whole or the greater part of his force, he sent Admiral Duckworth with a small part only. This was a dilemma which he had foreseen. "Should such an order come at this moment," he said, in a letter previously written to the Admiralty, "it would be a case for some consideration whether Minorca is to be risked, or the two kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. I rather think my decision would be to risk the former." And, after he had acted upon this opinion, he wrote in these terms to the Duke of Clarence, with whose high notions of obedience he was well acquainted: "I am well aware of the consequences of disobeying my orders; but as I have often before risked my life for the good cause, so I, with cheerfulness, did my commission; for although a military tribunal may think me criminal, the world will approve of my conduct; and I regard not my own safety when the honor of my King is at stake."

Nelson was right in his judgment; no attempt was made upon

¹ A fisherman of Naples, who led an insurrection against taxes on fruit and vegetables, which the viceroy had levied, in 1647, in order to defray the cost of a Spanish war with France. The populace plundered and burned palaces until the viceroy accepted their conditions. Masaniello became intoxicated with his power, it is said, and in nine days was assassinated.

Minorca; and the expulsion of the French from Naples may rather be said to have been effected than accelerated by the English and Portuguese of the allied fleet acting upon shore, under Trowbridge. The French commandant at St. Elmo, relying upon the strength of the place and the nature of the force which attacked it, had insulted Captain Foote in the grossest terms; but *citoyen*¹ Mejan was soon taught better manners, when Trowbridge, in spite of every obstacle, opened five batteries upon the fort. He was informed that none of his letters with the insolent printed words at the top, "Liberté, Egalité, Guerre aux Tyrans,"² etc., would be received; but that if he wrote like a soldier and a gentleman, he should be answered in the same style. The Frenchman then began to flatter his antagonist upon the bienfaisance and *humanité*³ which were the least of the many virtues which distinguished Monsieur Trowbridge. Monsieur Trowbridge's bienfaisance was at this time thinking of mining the fort. "If we can accomplish that," said he, "I am a strong advocate to send them, hostages and all, to Old Nick, and surprise him with a group of nobility and republicans. Meantime," he added, "it was some satisfaction to perceive that the shells fell well, and broke some of their shins." Finally, to complete his character, Mejan offered to surrender for one hundred and fifty thousand ducats. Great Britain, perhaps, has made too little use of this kind of artillery, which France has found so effectual towards subjugating the Continent; but Trowbridge had the prey within his reach, and in the course of a few days his last battery, "after much trouble and palaver," as he said, "brought the vagabonds to their senses."

Trowbridge had more difficulties to overcome in this siege from the character of the Neapolitans who pretended to assist him, and whom he made useful, than even from the strength of the place and the skill of the French. Such cowards and villains, he declared, he had never seen before. The men at the advanced posts carried on what he called "a diabolical good understanding" with the enemy, and the workmen would sometimes take fright and run away. "I make the best I can," said he, "of the degenerate race I have to deal with; the whole means of guns, ammunition, pioneers, etc., with all materials, rest with them. With fair promises to the men, and threats of instant death if I find any one erring, a little spur has been given." Nelson said of him with truth, upon this occasion, that he was a first-rate general. "I find, sir," said he afterwards, in a letter to the Duke of Clarence, "that General Koehler does not approve of such irregular proceedings as naval officers attacking and defending fortifications. We have but one idea,—to get close alongside. None but a sailor would have placed a battery only one hundred and eighty yards from the Castle of St. Elmo; a soldier must have gone according to art, and the  way.¹ My brave Trowbridge went straight on, for we had no time to spare."

¹ Citizen; the French republicans thus addressed one another.

² "Liberty, equality, war on tyrants."

³ Beneficence and humanity.

Trowbridge then proceeded to Capua, and took the command of the motley besieging force. One thousand of the best men in the fleet were sent to assist in the siege. Just at this time Nelson received a peremptory order from Lord Keith to sail with the whole of his force for the protection of Minorca, or at least to retain no more than was absolutely necessary at Sicily. "You will easily conceive my feelings," said he, in communicating this to Earl St. Vincent; "but my mind, as your lordship knows, was perfectly prepared for this order, and it is now more than ever made up. At this moment I will not part with a single ship, as I cannot do that without drawing a hundred and twenty men from each ship now at the siege of Capua. I am fully aware of the act I have committed; but I am prepared for any fate which may await my disobedience. Capua and Gaeta will soon fall; and the moment the scoundrels of French are out of this kingdom I shall send eight or nine ships of the line to Minorca. I have done what I thought right; others may think differently; but it will be my consolation that I have gained a kingdom, seated a faithful ally of his Majesty firmly on his throne, and restored happiness to millions."

¹ The zigzag way; zigzag trenches by which soldiers approach a fort.

At Capua Trowbridge had the same difficulties as at St. Elmo; and being farther from Naples and from the fleet, was less able to overcome them. The powder was so bad that he suspected treachery; and when he asked Nelson to spare him forty casks from the ships, he told him it would be necessary that some Englishmen should accompany it, or they would steal one half and change¹ the other. "All the men you see," said he, "gentle and simple,² are such notorious villains that it is misery to be with them." Capua, however, soon fell. Gaeta immediately afterwards surrendered to Captain Louis, of the Minotaur. Here the commanding officer acted more unlike a Frenchman, Captain Louis said, than any one he had ever met; meaning that he acted like a man of honor. He required, however, that the garrison should carry away their horses and other pillaged property, to which Nelson replied that no property which they did not bring with them into the country could be theirs, and that the greatest care should be taken to prevent them from carrying it away. "I am sorry," said he to Captain Louis, "that you have entered into any altercation. There is no way of dealing with a Frenchman but to knock him down; to be civil to them is only to be laughed at when they are enemies."

The whole kingdom of Naples was thus delivered by Nelson from the French. The Admiralty, however, thought it expedient to censure him for disobeying Lord Keith's orders and thus hazarding Minorca, without, as it appeared to them, any sufficient reason; and also for having landed seamen for the siege of Capua to form part of an army employed in operations at a distance from the coast, where, in case of defeat, they might have been prevented from returning to their ships; and they enjoined him "not to employ the seamen in like manner in future." This reprimand was issued before the event was known, though, indeed, the event would not affect the principle upon which it proceeded. When Nelson communicated the tidings of his complete success, he said, in his public letter, that it would not be the less acceptable for having been principally brought about by British sailors. His judgment in thus employing them had been justified by the result, and his joy was evidently heightened by the gratification of a professional and becoming pride. To the First Lord he said at the same time: "I certainly, from having only a left hand, cannot enter into details which may explain the motives that actuated my conduct. My principle is to assist in driving the French to the devil, and in restoring peace and happiness to mankind. I feel that I am fitter to do the action than to describe it." He then added that he would take care of Minorca.

¹ Substitute powder of poor quality.

² "Gentle and simple," i.e., high and low.

In expelling the French from Naples, Nelson had, with characteristic zeal and ability, discharged his duty; but he deceived himself when he imagined that he had seated Ferdinand firmly on his throne, and that he had restored happiness to millions. These objects might have been accomplished if it had been possible to inspire virtue and wisdom into a vicious and infatuated court; and if Nelson's eyes had not been, as it were, spellbound by that unhappy attachment which had now completely mastered him, he would have seen things as they were, and might perhaps have awakened the Sicilian court to a sense of their interest, if not of their duty. That court employed itself in a miserable round of folly and festivity, while the prisons of Naples were filled with groans, and the scaffolds streamed with blood. St. Januarius was solemnly removed from his rank as patron saint of the kingdom, having been convicted of Jacobinism, and San Antonio¹ as solemnly installed in his place. The King, instead of reëstablishing order at Naples by his presence, speedily returned to Palermo to indulge in his favorite amusements. Nelson and the ambassador's family accompanied the court, and Trowbridge remained, groaning over the villainy and frivolity of those with whom he was compelled to deal. A party of officers applied to him for a passage to Palermo to see the procession of St. Rosalia.¹ He recommended them to exercise their troops, and not behave like children. It was grief enough for him that the court should be busied in these follies, and Nelson involved in them. "I dread, my lord," said he, "all the feasting, etc., at Palermo. I am sure your health will be hurt. If so, all their saints will be hated by the navy. The King would be better employed digesting a good government. Everything gives way to their pleasures. The money spent at Palermo gives discontent here; fifty thousand people are unemployed, trade discouraged, manufactures at a stand. It is the interest of many here to keep the King away. They all dread reform; their villainies are so deeply rooted that if some method is not taken to dig them out, this government cannot hold together. Out of twenty millions of ducats collected as the revenue, only thirteen millions reach the treasury; and the King pays four ducats where he should pay one. He is surrounded by thieves, and none of them have honor or honesty enough to tell him the real and true state of things." In another letter he expressed his sense of the miserable state of Naples. "There are upwards of forty thousand families," said he, "who have relations confined. If some act of oblivion² is not passed, there will be no end of persecution; for the people of this country have no idea of anything but revenge, and, to gain a point, would swear ten thousand false oaths. Constant efforts are made to get a man taken up in order to rob him. The confiscated property does not reach the King's treasury. All thieves ! It is selling for nothing. His own people whom he employs are buying it up, and the vagabonds pocket the whole. I should not be surprised to hear that they brought a bill of expenses against him for the sale."

¹ San Antonio, or St. Anthony of Padua, was a follower of St. Francis in the thirteenth century. The Italians have always held him in peculiar veneration and affection. His legendary "temptations" have been favorite subjects for painters, and their varying portrayal has increased his popularity.

¹ The patron saint of Palermo, said to have lived near there in the twelfth century. Her feast is the 4th of September. She is supposed to stay plagues, earthquakes, and other afflictions.

² "Act of oblivion," i.e., a general pardon by which all political offenses are pardoned. In England the General Act of Oblivion was that by which offenses committed during the time of the Commonwealth were pardoned.

The Sicilian court, however, were at this time duly sensible of the services which had been rendered them by the British fleet, and their gratitude to Nelson was shown with proper and princely munificence. They gave him the dukedom and domain of Bronte, worth about £3,000 a year. It was some days before he could be persuaded to accept it. The argument which finally prevailed is said to have been suggested by the Queen, and urged, at her request, by Lady Hamilton upon her knees. He considered his own honor too much, she said, if he persisted in refusing what the King and Queen felt to be absolutely necessary for the preservation of theirs. The King himself also is said to have addressed him in words which show that the sense of rank will sometimes confer a virtue upon those who seem to be most unworthy of the lot to which they have been born: "Lord Nelson, do you wish that your name alone should pass with honor to posterity, and that I, Ferdinand Bourbon, should appear ungrateful?" He gave him, also, when the dukedom was accepted, a diamond-hilted sword, which his father, Charles III. of Spain, had given him on his accession to the throne of the two Sicilies. Nelson said the reward was magnificent, and worthy of a king, and he was determined that the inhabitants on the domain should be the happiest in all his Sicilian Majesty's dominions. "Yet," said he, speaking of these and the other remunerations which were made him for his services, "these presents, rich as they are, do not elevate me. My pride is, that at Constantinople, from the Grand Seignior to the lowest Turk, the name of Nelson is familiar in their mouths; and in this country I am everything which a grateful monarch and people can call me." Nelson, however, had a pardonable pride in the outward and visible signs of honor which he had so fairly won. He was fond of his Sicilian title; the signification, perhaps, pleased him. Duke of Thunder¹ was what in Dahomey would be called a strong name; it was to a sailor's taste; and, certainly, to no man could it ever be more applicable. But a simple offering which he received not long afterwards from the island of Zante affected him with a deeper and finer feeling. The Greeks of that little community sent him a golden-headed sword, and a truncheon set round with all the diamonds that the island could furnish, in a single row. They thanked him for having, by his victory, preserved that part of Greece from the horrors of anarchy; and prayed that his exploits might accelerate the day in which, amidst the glory and peace of thrones, the miseries of the human race would cease. This unexpected tribute touched Nelson to the heart. "No officer," he said, "has ever received from any country a higher acknowledgment of his services."

The French still occupied the Roman states, from which, according to their own admission, they had extorted, in jewels, plate, specie,² and requisitions of every kind, to the enormous amount of eight millions sterling.³ Yet they affected to appear as deliverers among the people whom they were thus cruelly plundering, and they distributed portraits of Bonaparte with the blasphemous inscription: "This is the true likeness of the holy Saviour of the world!" The people, detesting the impiety and groaning beneath the exactions of these perfidious robbers, were ready to join any regular force that should come to their assistance; but they dreaded Cardinal Ruffo's rabble, and declared they would resist them as banditti who came only for the purpose of pillage.

Nelson perceived that no object was now so essential for the tranquillity of Naples as the recovery of Rome, which, in the present state of things, when Suvaroff was driving the French before him, would complete the deliverance of Italy. He applied, therefore, to Sir James St. Clair Erskine, who, in the absence of General Fox, commanded at Minorca, to assist in this great object with twelve hundred men. "The field of glory," said he, "is a large one, and was never more open to any one than at this moment to you. Rome would throw open her gates and receive you as her deliverer, and the Pope¹ would owe his restoration to a heretic." But Sir James Erskine looked only at the difficulties of the undertaking. Twelve hundred men, he thought, would be too small a force to be committed in such an enterprise, for Civita Vecchia was a regular fortress; the local situation and climate also were such that, even if this force were adequate, it would be proper to delay the expedition till October. General Fox, too, was soon expected; and during his absence, and under existing circumstances, he did not feel justified in sending away such a detachment.

¹ Bronte is the Greek for "thunder."

² The precious metals coined by sovereign authority.

³ "Sterling" is said to have come from the starling at one time engraved on coins; or because the best money in the time of Richard I. was brought by German merchants, and called easterling, the name given to these merchants.

What this general thought it imprudent to attempt, Nelson and Trowbridge effected without his assistance by a small detachment from the fleet. Trowbridge first sent Captain Hallowell to Civita Vecchia to offer the garrison there, and at Castle St. Angelo, the same terms which had been granted to Gaeta. Hallowell perceived, by the overstrained civility of the officers who came off to him, and the compliments which they paid to the English nation, that they were sensible of their own weakness and their inability to offer any effectual resistance; but the French know that while they are in a condition to serve their government, they can rely upon it for every possible exertion in their support; and this reliance gives them hope and confidence to the last. Upon Hallowell's report, Trowbridge, who had now been made Sir Thomas for his services, sent Captain Louis with a squadron to enforce the terms which he had offered, and as soon as he could leave Naples he himself followed. The French, who had no longer any hope from the fate of arms, relied upon their skill in negotiation, and proposed terms to Trowbridge with that effrontery which characterizes their public proceedings, but which is often as successful as it is impudent. They had a man of the right stamp to deal with. Their ambassador at Rome began by saying that the Roman territory was the property of the French by right of conquest. The British commodore settled that point by replying, "It is mine by reconquest." A capitulation was soon concluded for all the Roman states, and Captain Louis rowed up the Tiber in his barge, hoisted English colors on the capitol,¹ and acted, for the time, as governor of Rome. The prophecy of the Irish poet was thus accomplished, and the friar reaped the fruits; for Nelson, who was struck with the oddity of the circumstance, and not a little pleased with it, obtained preferment for him from the King of Sicily, and recommended him to the Pope.

¹ Pope Pius VI.

Having thus completed his work upon the continent of Italy, Nelson's whole attention was directed towards Malta, where Captain Ball, with most inadequate means, was besieging the French garrison. Never was any officer engaged in a more anxious and painful service. The smallest reënforcement from France would, at any moment, have turned the scale against him; and had it not been for his consummate ability, and the love and veneration with which the Maltese regarded him, Malta must have remained in the hands of the enemy. Men, money, food,—all things were wanting. The garrison consisted of five thousand troops; the besieging force, of five hundred English and Portuguese marines and about fifteen hundred armed peasants. Long and repeatedly did Nelson solicit troops to effect the reduction of this important place. "It has been no fault of the navy," said he, "that Malta has not been attacked by land; but we have neither the means ourselves nor influence with those who have." The same causes of demurral² existed which prevented British troops from assisting in the expulsion of the French from Rome. Sir James Erskine was expecting General Fox; he could not act without orders, and not having, like Nelson, that lively spring of hope within him which partakes enough of the nature of faith to work miracles in war, he thought it evident that unless a respectable land force, in numbers sufficient to undertake the siege of such a garrison in one of the strongest places of Europe, and supplied with proportionate artillery and stores, were sent against it, no reasonable hope could be entertained of its surrender. Nelson groaned over the spirit of overreasoning caution and unreasoning obedience. "My heart," said he, "is almost broken. If the enemy get supplies in we may bid adieu to Malta. All the force we can collect would then be of little use against the strongest place in Europe. To say that an officer is never, for any object, to alter his orders, is what I cannot comprehend. The circumstances of this war so often vary that an officer has almost every moment to consider, 'What would my superiors direct did they know what is passing under my nose?' But, sir," said he, writing to the Duke of Clarence, "I find few think as I do. To obey orders is all perfection. To serve my King and to destroy the French I consider as the great order of all, from which little ones spring; and if one of these militate against it (for who can tell exactly at a distance), I go back and obey the great order and object, to down, down with the French villains! My blood boils at the name of Frenchman!"

¹ Capitoline Hill.

² Hesitation.

At length General Fox arrived at Minorca, and at length permitted Colonel Graham to go to Malta, but with means miserably limited. In fact, the expedition was at a stand for want of money, when Trowbridge, arriving at Messina to coöperate in it, and finding this fresh delay, immediately offered all that he could command of his own. "I procured him, my lord," said he to Nelson, "fifteen thousand of my cobs.¹ Every farthing and every atom of me shall be devoted to the cause." "What can this mean?" said Nelson, when he learned that Colonel Graham was ordered not to incur any expense for stores, or any articles except provisions. "The cause cannot stand still for want of a little money. If nobody will pay it I will sell Bronte and the Emperor of Russia's box." And he actually pledged Bronte for £6,600 if there should be any difficulty about paying the bills. The long-delayed expedition was thus at last sent forth, but Trowbridge little imagined in what scenes of misery he was to bear his part. He looked to Sicily for supplies. It was the interest, as well as the duty, of the Sicilian government to use every exertion for furnishing them, and Nelson and the British ambassador were on the spot to press upon them the necessity of exertion. But though Nelson saw with what a knavish crew the Sicilian court was surrounded, he was blind to the vices of the court itself; and resigning himself wholly to Lady Hamilton's influence, never even suspected the crooked policy which it was remorselessly pursuing. The Maltese and the British in Malta severely felt it. Trowbridge, who had the truest affection for Nelson, knew his infatuation, and feared that it might prove injurious to his character, as well as fatal to an enterprise which had been begun so well and carried on so patiently. "My lord," said he, writing to him from the siege, "we are dying off fast for want. I learn that Sir William Hamilton says Prince Luzzi refused corn some time ago, and Sir William does not think it worth while making another application. If that be the case, I wish he commanded at this distressing scene instead of me. Puglia had an immense harvest; near thirty sail left Messina before I did, to load corn. Will they let us have any? If not, a short time will decide the business. The German interest prevails.¹ I wish I was at your lordship's elbow for an hour. All, all will be thrown on you! I will parry the blow as much as in my power. I foresee much mischief brewing. God bless your lordship! I am miserable,—I cannot assist your operations more. Many happy returns of this day to you (it was the first of the new year),—I never spent so miserable a one. I am not very tender-hearted, but really the distress here would even move a

¹ Spanish dollars; a name used in Ireland in Swift's time, and still kept at Gibraltar.

¹ Prevailed over the English in getting supplies of food for their army.

Neapolitan." Soon afterwards he wrote: "I have this day saved thirty thousand people from starving; but with this day my ability ceases. As the government are bent on starving us, I see no alternative but to leave these poor unhappy people to perish, without our being witnesses to their distress. I curse the day I ever served the Neapolitan government. We have characters, my lord, to lose; these people have none. Do not suffer their infamous conduct to fall on us. Our country is just, but severe. Such is the fever of my brain this minute, that I assure you, on my honor, if the Palermo traitors were here I would shoot them first, and then myself. Girgenti is full of corn; the money is ready to pay for it; we do not ask it as a gift. Oh! could you see the horrid distress I daily experience, something would be done. Some engine is at work against us in Naples, and I believe I hit on the proper person. If you complain he will be immediately promoted, agreeably to the Neapolitan custom. All I write to you is known at the Queen's. For my own part, I look upon the Neapolitans as the worst of intriguing enemies; every hour shows me their infamy and duplicity. I pray your lordship be cautious; your honest, open manner of acting will be made a handle of. When I see you, and tell of their infamous tricks, you will be as much surprised as I am. The whole will fall on you."

Nelson was not, and could not be, insensible to the distress which his friend so earnestly represented. He begged almost on his knees, he said, small supplies of money and corn, to keep the Maltese from starving. And when the court granted a small supply, protesting their poverty, he believed their protestations, and was satisfied with their professions, instead of insisting that the restrictions upon the exportation of corn should be withdrawn. The anxiety, however, which he endured affected him so deeply that he said it had broken his spirit forever. Happily all that Trowbridge, with so much reason, foreboded, did not come to pass; for Captain Ball, with more decision than Nelson himself would have shown at that time and upon that occasion, ventured upon a resolute measure, for which his name would deserve always to be held in veneration by the Maltese, even if it had no other claims to the love and reverence of a grateful people. Finding it hopeless longer to look for succor, or common humanity, from the deceitful and infatuated court of Sicily, which persisted in prohibiting, by sanguinary edicts, the exportation of supplies, at his own risk he sent his first lieutenant to the port of Messina, with orders to seize, and bring with him to Malta, the ships which were there lying laden with corn, of the number of which he had received accurate information. These orders were executed, to the great delight and advantage of the ship-owners and proprietors; the necessity of raising the siege was removed, and Captain Ball waited in calmness for the consequences to himself. "But," says Mr. Coleridge¹ (who, it is to be hoped, will do that full justice to the memory of this great man which he is so fully capable of doing), "not a complaint, not a murmur, proceeded from the court of Naples. The sole result was that the governor of Malta² became an especial object of its hatred, its fear, and its respect."

Nelson himself, at the beginning of February, sailed for that island. On the way he fell in with a French squadron bound for its relief, and consisting of the Généreux, 74, three frigates, and a corvette. One of the frigates and the line-of-battle ship were taken; the others escaped, but failed in their purpose of reaching La Valetta.³ This success was peculiarly gratifying to Nelson for many reasons. During some months he had acted as commander in chief in the Mediterranean, while Lord Keith was in England. Lord Keith was now returned, and Nelson had, upon his own plan and at his own risk, left him, to sail for Malta, "for which," said he, "if I had not succeeded, I might have been broke;¹ and if I had not acted thus the Généreux never would have been taken." This ship was one of those which had escaped from Aboukir. Two frigates and the Guillaume Tell, 86, were all that now remained of the fleet which Bonaparte had conducted to Egypt. The Guillaume Tell was at this time closely watched in the harbor of La Valetta, and shortly afterwards, attempting to make her escape from thence, was taken, after an action in which greater skill was never displayed by British ships nor greater gallantry by an enemy. She was taken by the Foudroyant, Lion, and Penelope frigate. Nelson, rejoicing at what he called this glorious finish to the whole French Mediterranean fleet, rejoiced also that he was not present, to have taken a sprig of these brave men's laurels. "They are," said he,— "and I glory in them,—my children; they served in my school; and all of us caught our professional zeal and fire from the great and good Earl St. Vincent. What a pleasure, what happiness, to have the Nile fleet all taken, under my orders and regulations!" The two frigates still remained in La Valetta; before its surrender they stole out. One was taken in the attempt, the other was the only ship of the whole fleet which escaped capture or destruction.

¹ Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772-1834), the poet, wrote a memorial of Captain Ball, from which these sentences are quoted. Coleridge was Southey's friend and relative by marriage.

² The English governor of Malta, Captain Ball.

³ The capital of Malta.

Letters were found on board the Guillaume Tell, showing that the French were now become hopeless of preserving the conquest which they had so foully acquired. Trowbridge and his brother officers were anxious that Nelson should have the honor of signing the capitulation. They told him that they absolutely, as far as they dared, insisted on his staying to do this; but their earnest and affectionate entreaties were vain. Sir William Hamilton had just been superseded; Nelson had no feeling of cordiality towards Lord Keith; and thinking that, after Earl St. Vincent, no man had so good a claim to the command in the Mediterranean as himself, he applied for permission to return to England, telling the First Lord of the Admiralty that his spirit could not submit patiently, and that he was a broken-hearted man. From the time of his return from Egypt, amid all the honors which were showered upon him, he had suffered many mortifications. Sir Sidney Smith had been sent to Egypt with orders to take under his command the squadron which Nelson had left there. Sir Sidney appears to have thought that this command was to be independent of Nelson; and Nelson himself thinking so, determined to return, saying to Earl St. Vincent: "I do feel—for I am a man—that it is impossible for me to serve in these seas with a squadron under a junior officer." Earl St. Vincent seems to have dissuaded him from this resolution. Some heartburnings, however, still remained, and some incautious expressions of Sir Sidney's were noticed by him in terms of evident displeasure. But this did not continue long, and no man bore more willing testimony than Nelson to the admirable defense of Acre.¹

¹ Obsolete form of "broken"; it means ruined.

He differed from Sir Sidney as to the policy which ought to be pursued towards the French in Egypt, and strictly commanded him, in the strongest language, not, on any pretense, to permit a single Frenchman to leave the country, saying that he considered it nothing short of madness to permit that band of thieves to return to Europe. "No," said he; "to Egypt they went with their own consent, and there they shall remain while Nelson commands this squadron; for never, never will he consent to the return of one ship or Frenchman. I wish them to perish in Egypt, and give an awful lesson to the world of the justice of the Almighty." If Nelson had not thoroughly understood the character of the enemy against whom he was engaged, their conduct in Egypt would have disclosed it. After the battle of the Nile he had landed all his prisoners, upon a solemn engagement made between Trowbridge on one side and Captain Barré on the other, that none of them should serve till regularly exchanged.² They were no sooner on shore than part of them were drafted into the different regiments, and the remainder formed into a corps called the "Nautic³ Legion." This occasioned Captain Hallowell to say that the French had forfeited all claim to respect from us. "The army of Bonaparte," said he, "are entirely destitute of every principle of honor; they have always acted like licentious thieves." Bonaparte's escape was the more regretted by Nelson, because if he had had sufficient force, he thought it would certainly have been prevented. He wished to keep ships upon the watch to intercept anything coming from Egypt; but the Admiralty calculated upon the assistance of the Russian fleet, which failed when it was most wanted. The ships which should have been thus employed were then required for more pressing services, and the bloody Corsican was thus enabled to reach Europe in safety, there to become the guilty instrument of a wider-spreading destruction than any with which the world had ever before been visited.

¹ See Note 4, p. 125.

² "Till regularly exchanged," i. e., till English prisoners had been released for them, man for man.

³ Nautical.

Nelson had other causes of chagrin. Earl St. Vincent, for whom he felt such high respect, and whom Sir John Orde had challenged¹ for having nominated Nelson, instead of himself, to the command of the Nile squadron, laid claim to prize money, as commander in chief, after he had quitted the station.² The point was contested and decided against him. Nelson perhaps felt this the more because his own feelings with regard to money were so different. An opinion had been given by Dr. Lawrence, which would have excluded the junior flag officers from prize money. When this was made known to him, his reply was in these words: "Notwithstanding Dr. Lawrence's opinion, I do not believe I have any right to exclude the junior flag officers; and if I have, I desire that no such claim may be made,—no, not if it were sixty times the sum, and, poor as I am, I were never to see prize money."

A ship could not be spared to convey him to England; he therefore traveled through Germany to Hamburg, in company with his inseparable friends, Sir William and Lady Hamilton. The Queen of Naples went with them to Vienna. While they were at Leghorn, upon a report that the French were approaching (for, through the folly of weak courts and the treachery of venal cabinets, they had now recovered their ascendancy in Italy), the people rose tumultuously, and would fain have persuaded Nelson to lead them against the enemy. Public honors, and yet more gratifying testimonials of public admiration, awaited Nelson wherever he went. The Prince of Esterhazy entertained him in a style of Hungarian magnificence, a hundred grenadiers, each six feet in height, constantly waiting at table. At Magdeburg the master of the hotel where he was entertained contrived to show him for money, permitting the curious to mount a ladder and peep at him through a small window. A wine merchant at Hamburg, who was above seventy years of age, requested to speak with Lady Hamilton, and told her he had some Rhenish wine of the vintage of 1625, which had been in his own possession more than half a century. He had preserved it for some extraordinary occasion; and that which had now arrived was far beyond any that he could ever have expected. His request was that her ladyship would prevail upon Lord Nelson to accept six dozen of this incomparable wine. Part of it would then have the honor to flow into the heart's blood of that immortal hero, and this thought would make him happy during the remainder of his life. Nelson, when this singular request was reported to him, went into the room, and taking the worthy old gentleman kindly by the hand, consented to receive six bottles, provided the donor would dine with him next day. Twelve were sent, and Nelson, saying that he hoped yet to win half a dozen more great victories, promised to lay by six bottles of his Hamburg friend's wine, for the purpose of drinking one after each. A German pastor, between seventy and eighty years of age, traveled forty miles with the Bible of his parish church, to request that Nelson would write his name on the first leaf of it. He called him the savior of the Christian world. The old man's hope deceived him. There was no Nelson upon shore, or Europe would have been saved; but, in his foresight of the horrors with which all Germany and all Christendom were threatened by France, the pastor could not possibly have apprehended more than has actually taken place.¹

¹ Summoned, or invited, to a duel.

² Nelson was left in command, with the duties of the station to attend to, and the direction of all the operations of the squadron. He brought action to obtain a one-eighth share, and after some delay obtained judgment.

CHAPTER VII.

Nelson separates himself from his wife. — Northern confederacy. — He goes to the Baltic under Sir Hyde Parker. — Battle of Copenhagen, and subsequent negotiations. — Nelson is made a viscount.

NELSON was welcomed in England with every mark of popular honor. At Yarmouth, where he landed, every ship in the harbor hoisted her colors. The mayor and corporation waited upon him with the freedom of the town, and accompanied him in procession to church, with all the naval officers on shore and the principal inhabitants. Bonfires and illuminations concluded the day; and, on the morrow, the volunteer cavalry drew up and saluted him as he departed, and followed the carriage to the borders of the county. At Ipswich the people came out to meet him, drew² him a mile into the town and three miles out. When he was in the Agamemnon he wished to represent this place in Parliament, and some of his friends had consulted the leading men of the corporation. The result was not successful, and Nelson, observing that he would endeavor to find a preferable path into Parliament, said there might come a time when the people of Ipswich would think it an honor to have had him for their representative. In London he was feasted by the city, drawn by the populace from Ludgate Hill to Guildhall, and received the thanks of the Common Council for his great victory, and a golden-hilted sword studded with diamonds. Nelson had every earthly blessing except domestic happiness; he had forfeited that forever. Before he had been three months in England he separated from Lady Nelson. Some of his last words to her were: "I call God to witness, there is nothing in you, or your conduct, that I wish otherwise." This was the consequence of his infatuated attachment to Lady Hamilton. It had before caused a quarrel with his son-in-law, and occasioned remonstrances from his truest friends, which produced no other effect than that of making him displeased with them and more dissatisfied with himself.

¹ This was written in 1813, before the overthrow of Napoleon was accomplished.

² Drew his carriage themselves, having taken out the horses.

The Addington administration¹ was just at this time formed; and Nelson, who had solicited employment, and been made vice admiral of the blue, was sent to the Baltic, as second in command, under Sir Hyde Parker, by Earl St. Vincent, the new First Lord of the Admiralty. The three northern courts had formed a confederacy for making England resign her naval rights. Of these courts, Russia was guided by the passions of its Emperor, Paul; a man not without fits of generosity and some natural goodness, but subject to the wildest humors of caprice, and crazed by the possession of greater power than can ever be safely, or, perhaps, innocently, possessed by weak humanity. Denmark was French at heart, ready to coöperate in all the views of France; to recognize all her usurpations and obey all her injunctions. Sweden, under a king whose principles were right and whose feelings were generous, but who had a taint of hereditary insanity, acted in acquiescence to the dictates of two powers, whom it feared to offend. The Danish navy at this time consisted of twenty-three ships of the line, with about thirty-one frigates and smaller vessels, exclusive of guard ships. The Swedes had eighteen ships of the line, fourteen frigates and sloops, seventy-four galleys and smaller vessels, besides gunboats; and this force was in a far better state of equipment than the Danish. The Russians had eighty-two sail of the line and forty frigates. Of these, there were forty-seven sail of the line at Cronstadt, Revel, Petersburg, and Archangel; but the Russian fleet was ill-manned, ill-officered, and ill-equipped. Such a combination, under the influence of France, would soon have become formidable; and never did the British cabinet display more decision than in instantly preparing to crush it. They erred, however, in permitting any petty consideration to prevent them from appointing Nelson to the command. The public properly murmured at seeing it intrusted to another; and he himself said to Earl St. Vincent, that, circumstanced as he was, this expedition would probably be the last service that he should ever perform. The Earl, in reply, besought him, for God's sake, not to suffer himself to be carried away by any sudden impulse.

¹ The administration of which Mr. Addington was the head continued from 1801 until 1804.

The season¹ happened to be unusually favorable; so mild a winter had not been known in the Baltic for many years. When Nelson joined the fleet at Yarmouth he found the admiral "a little nervous about dark nights and fields of ice." "But we must brace up," said he; "these are not times for nervous systems. I hope we shall give our northern enemies that hailstorm of bullets which gives our dear country the dominion of the sea. We have it, and all the devils in the North cannot take it from us if our wooden walls² have fair play." Before the fleet left Yarmouth it was sufficiently known that its destination was against Denmark. Some Danes who belonged to the Amazon frigate went to Captain Riou, and telling him what they had heard, begged that he would get them exchanged into a ship bound on some other destination. They had no wish, they said, to quit the British service; but they entreated that they might not be forced to fight against their own country. There was not in our whole navy a man who had a higher and more chivalrous sense of duty than Riou. Tears came into his eyes while the men were speaking. Without making any reply, he instantly ordered his boat, and did not return to the Amazon till he could tell them that their wish was effected.

¹ The winter of 1801.

² A name applied to ships as far back as the time of the Persian invasion of Athens. The Delphic oracle urged the Athenians to trust to their wooden walls, which their leaders interpreted as ships, and to conquest by sea.

The fleet sailed on the 12th of March. Mr. Vansittart sailed in it, the British cabinet still hoping to obtain its end by negotiation. It was well for England that Sir Hyde Parker placed a fuller confidence in Nelson than the government seems to have done at this most important crisis. Her enemies might well have been astonished at learning that any other man should, for a moment, have been thought of for the command. But so little deference was paid, even at this time, to his intuitive and all-commanding genius, that when the fleet had reached its first rendezvous, at the entrance of the Cattegat, he had received no official communication whatever of the intended operations. His own mind had been made up upon them with its accustomed decision. "All I have gathered of our first plans," said he, "I disapprove most exceedingly. Honor may arise from them; good cannot.¹ I hear we are likely to anchor outside of Cronenburg Castle,² instead of Copenhagen, which would give weight to our negotiation. A Danish minister would think twice before he would put his name to war with England, when the next moment he would probably see his master's fleet in flames and his capital in ruins. The Dane should see our flag every moment he lifted up his head."

Mr. Vansittart left the fleet at the Skaw,³ and preceded it in a frigate, with a flag of truce. Precious time was lost by this delay, which was to be purchased by the dearest blood of Britain and of Denmark. According to the Danes themselves, the intelligence that a British fleet was seen off the Sound⁴ produced a much more general alarm in Copenhagen than its actual arrival

¹ "Honor" i.e., from a courageous attack, or from victory; "good," i.e., lasting benefit.

² Castle of Kronborg. (See page 202.)

³ Cape Skagen, the northernmost point of Denmark.

⁴ The widening of the sea below the Cattegat and north of Copenhagen.

in the roads; for their means of defense were, at that time, in such a state that they could hardly hope to resist, still less to repel, an enemy. On the 21st Nelson had a long conference with Sir Hyde, and the next day addressed a letter to him worthy of himself and of the occasion. Mr. Vansittart's report had then been received. It represented the Danish government as in the highest degree hostile, and their state of preparation as exceeding what our cabinet had supposed possible; for Denmark had profited, with all activity, of the leisure which had so impolitically been given her. "The more I have reflected," said Nelson to his commander, "the more I am confirmed in opinion that not a moment should be lost in attacking the enemy. They will every day and hour be stronger; we never shall be so good a match for them as at this moment. The only consideration is, how to get at them with the least risk to our ships. Here you are, with almost the safety—certainly with the honor—of England more intrusted to you than ever yet fell to the lot of any British officer. On your decision depends whether our country shall be degraded in the eyes of Europe, or whether she shall rear her head higher than ever. Again do I repeat, never did our country depend so much on the success of any fleet as on this. How best to honor her and abate the pride of her enemies must be the subject of your deepest consideration."

Supposing him to force the passage of the Sound, Nelson thought some damage might be done among the masts and yards; though perhaps not one of them but would be serviceable again. "If the wind be fair," said he, "and you determine to attack the ships and Crown Islands,¹ you must expect the natural issue of such a battle,—ships crippled, and perhaps one or two lost; for the wind which carries you in will, most probably, not bring out a crippled ship. This mode I call taking the bull by the horns. It, however, will not prevent the Revel ships,² or the Swedes, from joining the Danes; and to prevent this is, in my humble opinion, a measure absolutely necessary, and still to attack Copenhagen." For this he proposed two modes. One was to pass Cronenburg, taking the risk of danger; take the deepest and straitest channel along the Middle Grounds;¹ and then coming down the Garbar, or King's Channel,² attack the Danish line of floating batteries and ships, as might be found convenient. This would prevent the junction, and might give an opportunity of bombarding Copenhagen. Or to take the passage of the Belt,³ which might be accomplished in four or five days; and then the attack by Draco⁴ might be made, and the junction of the Russians prevented. Supposing them through the Belt, he proposed that a detachment of the fleet should be sent to destroy the Russian squadron at Revel, and that the business at Copenhagen should be attempted with the remainder. "The measure," he said, "may be thought bold; but the boldest measures are the safest."

¹ Two small batteries off the shore near Copenhagen.

² The Russian squadron at Revel.

The pilots, as men who had nothing but safety to think of, were terrified by the formidable report of the batteries of Elsinore, and the tremendous preparations which our negotiators, who were now returned from their fruitless mission, had witnessed. They therefore persuaded Sir Hyde to prefer the passage of the Belt. "Let it be by the Sound, by the Belt, or anyhow," cried Nelson; "only lose not an hour!" On the 26th they sailed for the Belt. Such was the habitual reserve of Sir Hyde that his own captain—the captain of the fleet—did not know which course he had resolved to take till the fleet were getting under weigh. When Captain Domett was thus apprised of it, he felt it his duty to represent to the admiral his belief that if that course were persevered in, the ultimate object would be totally defeated. It was liable to long delays and to accidents of ships grounding; in the

¹ Sand banks in front of Copenhagen, beyond the Crown Islands. (See page 211.)

² Which lay between the Crown Islands and Middle Grounds.

³ The Great Belt, the passage between the islands of Seeland and Funen.

⁴ Dragor Point, on the south of the island of Amager.

whole fleet there were only one captain and one pilot who knew anything of this formidable passage (as it was then deemed), and their knowledge was very slight; their instructions did not authorize them to attempt it; supposing them safe through the Belt, the heavy ships could not come over the Grounds to attack Copenhagen, and light vessels would have no effect on such a line of defense as had been prepared against them. Domett urged these reasons so forcibly that Sir Hyde's opinion was shaken, and he consented to bring the fleet to, and send for Nelson on board. There can be little doubt but that the expedition would have failed if Captain Domett had not thus timely and earnestly given his advice. Nelson entirely agreed with him; and it was finally determined to take the passage of the Sound, and the fleet returned to its former anchorage.

The next day was more idly expended in dispatching a flag of truce to the governor of Cronenburg Castle, to ask whether he had received orders to fire at the British fleet, as the admiral must consider the first gun to be a declaration of war on the part of Denmark. A soldierlike and becoming answer was returned to this formality. The governor said that the British minister had not been sent away from Copenhagen,¹ but had obtained a passport at his own demand. He himself, as a soldier, could not meddle with politics; but he was not at liberty to suffer a fleet of which the intention was not yet known to approach the guns of the castle which he had the honor to command; and he requested, if the British admiral should think proper to make any proposals to the King of Denmark, that he might be apprized of it before the fleet approached nearer. During this intercourse a Dane, who came on board the commander's ship, having occasion to express his business in writing, found the pen blunt, and, holding it up, sarcastically said: "If your guns are not better pointed than your pens, you will make little impression on Copenhagen!"

On that day intelligence reached the admiral of the loss of one of his fleet, the Invincible, 74, wrecked on a sand bank as she was coming out of Yarmouth, four hundred of her men perishing in her. Nelson, who was now appointed to lead the van, shifted his flag to the Elephant, Captain Foley, a lighter ship than the St. George, and therefore fitter for the expected operations. The two following days were calm. Orders had been given to pass the Sound as soon as the wind would permit; and on the afternoon of the 29th the ships were cleared for action with an alacrity characteristic of British seamen. At daybreak on the 30th it blew a topsail breeze¹ from the northwest. The signal was made, and the fleet moved on in order of battle,—Nelson's division in the van, Sir Hyde's in the center, and Admiral Graves's in the rear.

¹ One of the forms of declaring hostilities against a country is to dismiss its representative resident at the seat of government.

Great actions, whether military or naval, have generally given celebrity to the scenes from whence they are denominated; and thus petty villages and capes and bays, known only to the coasting trader, become associated with mighty deeds, and their names are made conspicuous in the history of the world. Here, however, the scene was every way worthy of the drama. The political importance of the Sound is such that grand objects are not needed there to impress the imagination; yet is the channel full of grand and interesting objects, both of art and nature. This passage, which Denmark had so long considered as the key of the Baltic, is, in its narrowest part, about three miles wide; and here the city of Elsinore is situated, except Copenhagen, the most flourishing of the Danish towns. Every vessel which passes lowers her topgallant sails,² and pays toll at Elsinore,—a toll which is believed to have had its origin in the consent of the traders to that sea, Denmark taking upon itself the charge of constructing lighthouses and erecting signals to mark the shoals and rocks from the Cattegat to the Baltic; and they, on their part, agreeing that all ships should pass this way in order that all might pay their shares, none from that time using the passage of the Belt, because it was not fitting that they who enjoyed the benefit of the beacons in dark and stormy weather should evade contributing to them in fair seasons and summer nights. Of late years, about ten thousand vessels had annually paid this contribution in time of peace.

¹ A breeze which allowed the spreading of the topsail, — a square sail next above the chief sail. It would be too strong for the topgallant sails and royal.

² As a salute to Cronenberg Castle.

Adjoining Elsinore, and at the edge of a peninsular promontory, upon the nearest point of land to the Swedish coast stands Cronenburg Castle, built after Tycho Brahe's¹ design,—a magnificent pile, at once a palace and fortress and state prison, with its spires and towers, and battlements and batteries. On the left of the strait is the old Swedish city of Helsingborg, at the foot and on the side of a hill. To the north of Helsingborg the shores are steep and rocky; they lower to the south, and the distant spires of Landskrona, Lund, and Malmö are seen in the flat country. The Danish shores consist partly of ridges of sand, but more frequently their slopes are covered with rich wood and villages and villas, denoting the vicinity of a great capital. The isles of Hven, Saltholm, and Amak² appear in the widening channel; and at the distance of twenty miles from Elsinore stands Copenhagen in full view,—the best built city of the North, and one of the finest capitals of Europe,—visible, with its stately spires, far off. Amid these magnificent objects there are some which possess a peculiar interest for the recollections which they call forth. The isle of Hven, a lovely domain about six miles in circumference, had been the munificent gift of Frederick II. to Tycho Brahe. Here most of his discoveries were made; and here the ruins are to be seen of his observatory, and of the mansion where he was visited by princes, and where, with a princely spirit, he received and entertained all comers from all parts, and promoted science by his liberality as well as by his labors. Elsinore is a name familiar to English ears, being inseparably associated with "Hamlet," one of the noblest works of human genius.¹ Cronenburg had been the scene of deeper tragedy. Here Queen Matilda² was confined, the victim of a foul and murderous court intrigue. Here, amid heartbreaking griefs, she found consolation in nursing her infant. Here she took her everlasting leave of that infant, when, by the interference of England, her own deliverance was obtained; and as the ship bore her away from a country where the venial indiscretions of youth and unsuspecting gayety had been so cruelly punished, upon these towers she fixed her eyes, and stood upon the deck obstinately gazing towards them till the last speck had disappeared.

¹ An illustrious astronomer (1546–1601), who was led to remain in Denmark through the courtesies of Frederick II., and the gift of the island of Hven for an observatory. In this place, James, who afterwards became James I. of England, visited him. After Frederick's death he was invited by the German emperor to Prague, where he died.

² Amager, upon which is built a part of Copenhagen.

The Sound being the only frequented entrance to the Baltic the great Mediterranean of the North, few parts of the world play so frequent a navigation. In the height of the season fewer than a hundred vessels pass every four or five days for many weeks in succession; but never has so great a fleet did a scene been exhibited there as in 1719, when a fleet prepared to force that passage, and to enter the Baltic, vailed their topsails to avoid discovery. The fleet consisted of fifty-one vessels, of which thirty-seven were of the line, and the remainder were frigates. The vessels took the Sound by the narrow passage, and the Danish fleet; while the Swedish ships were in the Sound.

The Danish fleet, after a negotiation, was ordered to withdraw with battering ships, and a hundred pieces of cannon. Immediately, it was ordered to all the pompous circumstance and exciting reality of war, without its effects; for this ostentatious display was but a bloodless prelude to the wide and sweeping destruction which was soon to follow. The enemy's shot fell near enough to splash the water on board our ships. Not relying upon any forbearance of the Swedes, they meant to have kept the mid-channel, but when they perceived that not a shot was fired from Helsingborg, and that no batteries were to be seen on the Swedish shore, they inclined to that side, so as completely to get out of reach of the Danish guns. The uninterrupted blaze which was kept up from them till the fleet had passed served only to exhilarate our sailors and afford them matter for jest, as the shot fell in showers a full cable's length short of its destined aim. A few rounds were returned from some of our leading ships, till they perceived its inutility. This, however, occasioned the only bloodshed of the day, some of our men being killed and wounded by the explosion of a gun. As soon as the main body had passed, they followed, desisting from their bombardment, which was as that of the enemy; and about midday they were between the island of Hven and Copenhagen. Admiral Graves, some of the officers of the artillery and the admiral's bannister the enemy's admiral, ² pondeus, and supported the extreme point of the island. The apparent difficulty and the number of the vessel's sails, and the ves-

¹ Shakspere.

² Sister.

of the Swedes and the Russians whom they should afterwards have to engage, as a consideration which ought to be borne in mind. Nelson, who kept pacing the cabin, impatient as he ever was of anything which savored of irresolution, repeatedly said: "The more numerous the better. I wish they were twice as many,—the easier the victory, depend on it." The plan upon which he had determined, if ever it should be his fortune to bring a Baltic fleet to action, was to attack the head of their line and confuse their movements. "Close with¹ a Frenchman," he used to say, "but outmaneuver² a Russian." He offered his services for the attack, requiring ten sail of the line and the whole of the smaller craft. Sir Hyde gave him two more line-of-battle ships than he asked, and left everything to his judgment.

The enemy's force was not the only, nor the greatest, obstacle with which the British fleet had to contend; there was another to be overcome before they could come in contact with it. The channel was little known, and extremely intricate; all the buoys had been removed; and the Danes considered this difficulty as almost insuperable, thinking the channel impracticable for so large a fleet. Nelson himself saw the soundings made and the buoys laid down, boating it³ upon this exhausting service, day and night, till it was effected. When this was done, he thanked God for having enabled him to get through this difficult part of his duty. It had worn him down, he said, and was infinitely more grievous to him than any resistance which he could experience from the enemy. ✕

At the first council of war, opinions inclined to an attack from the eastward; but the next day, the wind being southerly, after a second examination of the Danish position it was determined to attack from the south, approaching in the manner which Nelson had suggested in his first thoughts. On the morning of the 1st of April, the whole fleet removed to an anchorage within two leagues of the town, and off the northwest end of the Middle Grounds, a shoal lying exactly before the town, at about three quarters of a mile distance, and extending along its whole sea front. The King's Channel, where there is deep water, is between this shoal and the town; and here the Danes had arranged their line of defense, as near the shore as possible, — nineteen ships and floating batteries, flanked, at the end nearest the town, by the Crown Batteries, which were two artificial islands at the mouth of the harbor, most formidable works; the larger one having, by the Danish account, sixty-six guns, but, as Nelson believed, eighty-eight.

¹ "Close with," i.e., come to close quarters with.

² Exceed in intrigue and stratagem.

³ "Boating it," i.e., going about in a boat.

The fleet having anchored, Nelson, with Riou, in the Amazon, made his last examination of the ground; and, about one o'clock, returning to his own ship, threw out the signal to weigh.¹ It was received with a shout throughout the whole division; they weighed with a light and favorable wind; the narrow channel² between the island of Saltholm and the Middle Grounds had been accurately buoyed; the small craft pointed out the course distinctly; Riou led the way. The whole division coasted along the outer edge of the shoal, doubled its farther extremity, and anchored there off Draco Point, just as the darkness closed, the headmost of the enemy's line not being more than two miles distant. The signal to prepare for action had been made early in the evening; and as his own anchor dropped, Nelson called out, "I will fight them the moment I have a fair wind." It had been agreed that Sir Hyde, with the remaining ships, should weigh on the following morning at the same time as Nelson, to menace the Crown Batteries on his side, and the four ships of the line which lay at the entrance of the arsenal, and to cover our own disabled ships as they came out of action.

The Danes, meantime, had not been idle. No sooner did the guns of Cronenburg make it known to the whole city that all negotiation was at an end, that the British fleet was passing the Sound, and that the dispute between the two Crowns must now be decided by arms, than a spirit displayed itself most honorable to the Danish character. All ranks offered themselves to the service of their country; the university furnished a corps of twelve hundred youths,—the flower of Denmark. It was one of those emergencies in which little drilling or discipline is necessary to render courage available; they had nothing to learn but how to manage the guns, and were employed day and night in practicing them.

¹ Weigh anchor; get under way.

² The narrow channel between Saltholm and the side of the Middle Grounds farthest from Copenhagen.

When the movements of Nelson's squadron were perceived, it was known when and where the attack was to be expected, and the line of defense was manned indiscriminately by soldiers, sailors, and citizens. Had not the whole attention of the Danes been directed to strengthen their own means of defense, they might most materially have annoyed the invading squadron, and perhaps frustrated the impending attack; for the British ships were crowded in an anchoring ground of little extent; it was calm, so that mortar boats might have acted against them to the utmost advantage; and they were within range of shells from Amak Island. A few fell among them, but the enemy soon ceased to fire. It was learned afterwards that, fortunately for the fleet, the bed¹ of the mortar had given way; and the Danes either could not get it replaced, or, in the darkness, lost the direction.

This was an awful night for Copenhagen,—far more so than for the British fleet, where the men were accustomed to battle and victory, and had none of those objects before their eyes which render death terrible. Nelson sat down to table with a large party of his officers; he was—as he was ever wont to be when on the eve of action—in high spirits, and drank to a leading² wind and to the success of the morrow. After supper they returned to their respective ships, except Riou, who remained to arrange the order of battle with Nelson and Foley, and to draw up instructions. Hardy, meantime, went in a small boat to examine the channel between them and the enemy, approaching so near that he sounded round their leading ship with a pole, lest the noise of throwing the lead should discover him.

¹ The foundation upon which the cannon were placed.

² Which would lead towards the enemy.

The incessant fatigue of body as well as mind which Nelson had undergone during the last three days had so exhausted him that he was earnestly urged to go to his cot; and his old servant Allen, using that kind of authority which long and affectionate services entitled and enabled him to assume on such occasions, insisted upon his complying. The cot was placed on the floor, and he continued to dictate from it. About eleven Hardy returned, and reported the practicability of the channel and the depth of water up to the enemy's line. About one the orders were completed; and half a dozen clerks in the foremost cabin proceeded to transcribe them, Nelson frequently calling out to them from his cot to hasten their work, for the wind was becoming fair. Instead of attempting to get a few hours of sleep, he was constantly receiving reports upon this important point. At day-break it was announced as becoming perfectly fair. The clerks finished their work about six. Nelson, who was already up, breakfasted, and made signal for all captains. The land forces and five hundred seamen, under Captain Freemantle and the Honorable Colonel Stewart, were to storm the Crown Battery as soon as its fire should be silenced; and Riou—whom Nelson had never seen till this expedition, but whose worth he had instantly perceived, and appreciated as it deserved—had the Blanche and Alcmene frigates, the Dart and Arrow sloops, and the Zephyr and Otter fire ships given him, with a special command to act as circumstances might require; every other ship had its station appointed.

Between eight and nine the pilots and masters were ordered on board the admiral's ship. The pilots were mostly men who had been mates in Baltic traders; and their hesitation about the bearing of the east end of the shoal and the exact line of deep water gave ominous warning of how little their knowledge was to be trusted. The signal for action had been made, the wind was fair,—not a moment to be lost. Nelson urged them to be steady, to be resolute, and to decide; but they wanted the only ground for steadiness and decision in such cases, and Nelson had reason to regret that he had not trusted to Hardy's single report. This was one of the most painful moments of his life, and he always spoke of it with bitterness. "I experienced in the Sound," said he, "the misery of having the honor of our country intrusted to a set of pilots who have no other thought than to keep the ships clear of danger, and their own silly heads clear of shot. Everybody knows what I must have suffered; and if any merit attaches itself to me, it was for combating the dangers of the shallows in defiance of them." At length Mr. Bryerly, the master of the Bellona, declared that he was prepared to lead the fleet. His judgment was acceded to by the rest. They returned to their ships, and at half-past nine the signal was made to weigh in succession.

Captain Murray, in the Edgar, led the way; the Agamemnon was next in order; but on the first attempt to leave her anchorage, she could not weather the edge of the shoal, and Nelson had the grief to see his old ship, in which he had performed so many years' gallant services, immovably aground at a moment when her help was so greatly required. Signal was then made for the Polyphemus, and this change in the order of sailing was executed with the utmost promptitude; yet so much delay had thus been unavoidably occasioned that the Edgar was for some time unsupported; and the Polyphemus, whose place should have been at the end of the enemy's line, where their strength was the greatest, could get no farther than the beginning, owing to the difficulty of the channel. There she occupied, indeed, an efficient station, but one where her presence was less required. The Isis followed, with better fortune, and took her own berth.¹ The Bellona, Sir Thomas Boulden Thompson, kept too close on the starboard shoal, and grounded abreast of the outer ship of the enemy. This was the more vexatious, inasmuch as the wind was fair, the room ample, and three ships had led the way. The Russell, following the Bellona, grounded in like manner. Both were within reach of shot, but their absence from their intended stations was severely felt.

¹ "Her own berth," i.e., the position assigned her.

Each ship had been ordered to pass her leader on the starboard side, because the water was supposed to shoal on the larboard shore. Nelson, who came next after these two ships, thought they had kept too far on the starboard direction, and made signal for them to close with the enemy, not knowing that they were aground; but when he perceived that they did not obey the signal, he ordered the Elephant's helm to starboard, and went within these ships, thus quitting the appointed order of sailing, and guiding those which were to follow. The greater part of the fleet were probably, by this act of promptitude on his part, saved from going on shore. Each ship, as she arrived nearly opposite to her appointed station, let her anchor go by the stern, and presented her broadside to the Danes. The distance between each was about a half-cable. The action was fought nearly at the distance of a cable's length from the enemy. This—which rendered its continuance so long—was owing to the ignorance and consequent indecision of the pilots. In pursuance of the same error which had led the Bellona and the Russell aground, they, when the lead was at a quarter less five,¹ refused to approach nearer, in dread of shoaling their water on the larboard shore,—a fear altogether erroneous, for the water deepened up to the very side of the enemy's line.

At five minutes after ten the action began. The first half of our fleet was engaged in about half an hour, and by half-past eleven the battle became general. The plan of the attack had been complete; but seldom has any plan been more disconcerted by untoward accidents. Of twelve ships of the line, one was entirely useless, and two others in a situation where they could ¹ "A quarter less five," i.e., four and three quarter fathoms.

BATTLE OF COPENHAGEN

- ENGLISH SHIPS
1. DÉSIRÉE 38
 2. POLYPHEMUS 64
 3. RUSSELL 74
 4. ISIS 50
 5. BELLONA 74
 6. EDGAR 74
 7. ARDENT 64
 8. GLATTON 80
 9. ELEPHANT 74
 10. GANGES 74
 11. MONARCH 74
 12. DEFIANCE 74
 13. AMAZON 38
 14. BLANCHE 38
 15. ALCMENE 32
 16. DART 18

not render half the service which was required of them. Of the squadron of gun brigs, only one could get into action; the rest were prevented by baffling currents from weathering the eastern end of the shoal; and only two of the bomb vessels could reach their station on the Middle Grounds and open their mortars on the arsenal, firing over both fleets. Riou took the vacant station against the Crown Battery with his frigates, attempting with that unequal force a service in which three sail of the line had been directed to assist.

Nelson's agitation had been extreme when he saw himself, before the action began, deprived of a fourth part of his ships of the line. But no sooner was he in battle, where his squadron was received with the fire of more than a thousand guns, than, as if that artillery, like music, had driven away all care and painful thoughts, his countenance brightened; and, as a bystander describes him, his conversation became joyous, animated, elevated, and delightful. The commander in chief, meantime, near enough to the scene of action to know the unfavorable accidents which had so materially weakened Nelson, and yet too distant to know the real state of the contending parties, suffered the most dreadful anxiety. To get to his assistance was impossible; both wind and current were against him. Fear for the event, in such circumstances, would naturally preponderate in the bravest mind; and at one o'clock, perceiving that after three hours' endurance the enemy's fire was unslackened, he began to despair of success. "I will make the signal of recall," said he to his captain, "for Nelson's sake. If he is in a condition to continue the action successfully, he will disregard it; if he is not, it will be an excuse for his retreat, and no blame can be imputed to him." Captain Domett urged him at least to delay the signal till he could communicate with Nelson; but, in Sir Hyde's opinion, the danger was too pressing for delay. The fire, he said, was too hot for Nelson to oppose; a retreat, he thought, must be made; he was aware of the consequences to his own personal reputation, but it would be cowardly in him to leave Nelson to bear the whole shame of the failure, if shame it should be deemed. Under a mistaken judgment, therefore, but with this disinterested and generous feeling, he made the signal for retreat.

Nelson was at this time in all the excitement of action, pacing the quarter-deck. A shot through the mainmast knocked the splinters about, and he observed to one of his officers, with a smile, "It is warm work; and this day may be the last to any of us at a moment;" and then, stopping short at the gangway, added, with emotion, "But mark you; I would not be elsewhere for thousands." About this time the signal lieutenant called out that No. 39 (the signal for discontinuing the action) was thrown out by the commander in chief. He continued to walk the deck, and appeared to take no notice of it. The signal officer met him at the next turn, and asked if he should repeat it. "No," he replied; "acknowledge it." Presently he called after him to know if the signal for close action was still hoisted; and being answered in the affirmative, said, "Mind you keep it so." He now paced the deck, moving the stump of his lost arm in a manner which always indicated great emotion. "Do you know," said he to Mr. Ferguson, "what is shown on board the commander in chief? No. 39!" Mr. Ferguson asked what that meant. "Why, to leave off action!" Then, shrugging up his shoulders, he repeated the words: "Leave off action! You know, Foley," turning to the captain, "I have only one eye; I have a right to be blind sometimes." And then, putting the glass to his blind eye, in that mood of mind which sports with bitterness, he exclaimed, "I really do not see the signal!" Presently he exclaimed: "Keep mine for closer battle flying! That's the way I answer such signals. Nail mine to the mast!" Admiral Graves, who was so situated that he could not discern what was done on board the Elephant, disobeyed Sir Hyde's signal in like manner, whether by a fortunate mistake or by a like brave intention has not been made known. The other ships of the line, looking only to Nelson, continued the action.

The signal, however, saved Riou's little squadron, but did not save its heroic leader. This squadron, which was nearest the commander in chief, obeyed, and hauled off. It had suffered severely in its most unequal contest. For a long time the Amazon had been firing, enveloped in smoke, when Riou desired his men to stand fast and let the smoke clear off, that they might see what they were about,—a fatal order; for the Danes then got clear sight of her from the batteries, and pointed their guns with such tremendous effect that nothing but the signal for retreat saved this frigate from destruction. “What will Nelson think of us!” was Riou’s mournful exclamation when he unwillingly drew off. He had been wounded in the head by a splinter, and was sitting on a gun encouraging his men, when, just as the Amazon showed her stern to the Tre Kroner Battery,¹ his clerk was killed by his side, and another shot swept away several marines who were hauling in the main brace.² “Come, then, my boys,” cried Riou; “let us all die together!” The words had scarcely been uttered before a raking shot cut him in two. Except it had been Nelson himself, the British navy could not have suffered a severer loss.

The action continued along the line with unabated vigor on our side, and with the most determined resolution on the part of the Danes. They fought to great advantage, because most of the vessels in their line of defense were without masts; the few which had any standing had their topmast struck, and the hulls could only be seen at intervals. The Isis must have been destroyed by the superior weight of her enemy’s fire, if Captain Inman, in the Désirée frigate, had not judiciously taken a situation which enabled him to rake the Dane, and if the Polyphemus had not also relieved her. Both in the Bellona and the Isis many men were lost by the bursting of their guns. The former ship was about forty years old, and these guns were believed to be the same which she had first taken to sea; they were probably originally faulty, for the fragments were full of little air holes. The Bellona lost seventy-five men; the Isis, one hundred and ten; the Monarch, two hundred and ten. She was more than any other line-of-battle ship exposed to the great battery; and, supporting at the same time the united fire of the Holstein and the Zealand, her loss this day exceeded that of any single ship during the whole war. Amid the tremendous carnage in this vessel, some of the men displayed a singular instance of coolness. The pork and peas happened to be in the kettle; a shot knocked its contents about; they picked up the pieces, and ate and fought at the same time.

¹ The Crown Battery.

² The rope by which the main yard is moved.

The prince royal had taken his station upon one of the batteries, from whence he beheld the action and issued his orders. Denmark had never been engaged in so arduous a contest, and never did the Danes more nobly display their national courage,—a courage not more unhappily than impolitically exerted in subserviency to the interests of France. Captain Thura, of the Indfødsretten, fell early in the action; and all his officers, except one lieutenant and one marine officer, were either killed or wounded. In the confusion the colors were either struck or shot away; but she was moored athwart one of the batteries in such a situation that the British made no attempt to board her, and a boat was dispatched to the prince to inform him of her situation. He turned to those about him and said, “Gentlemen, Thura is killed; which of you will take the command?” Schroedersee, a captain who had lately resigned on account of extreme ill health, answered, in a feeble voice, “I will,” and hastened on board. The crew, perceiving a new commander coming alongside, hoisted their colors again, and fired a broadside. Schroedersee, when he came on deck, found himself surrounded by the dead and wounded, and called to those in the boat to get quickly on board. A ball struck him at that moment. A lieutenant who had accompanied him then took the command, and continued to fight the ship. A youth of seventeen, by name Villemoes, particularly distinguished himself on this memorable day. He had volunteered to take the command of a floating battery, which was a raft consisting merely of a number of beams nailed together, with a flooring to support the guns;¹ it was square, with a breast-work full of portholes and without masts, carrying twenty-four guns and one hundred and twenty men. With this he got under the stern of the Elephant, below the reach of the stern chasers;² and, under a heavy fire of small arms from the marines, fought his raft till the truce was announced, with such skill as well as courage, as to excite Nelson's warmest admiration.

Between one and two the fire of the Danes slackened; about two it ceased from the greater part of their line, and some of their lighter ships were adrift. It was, however, difficult to take possession of those who struck, because the batteries on Amak Island protected them, and because an irregular fire was kept up from the ships themselves as the boats approached. This arose from the nature of the action. The crews were continually reënfined from the shore, and fresh men coming on board did not inquire whether the flag had been struck, or perhaps did not heed it,—many or most of them never having been engaged in war before, knowing nothing therefore of its laws, and thinking only of defending their country to the last extremity. The Dannebrog fired upon the Elephant's boats in this manner, though her commodore had removed her pendant and deserted her, though she had struck, and though she was in flames. After she had been abandoned by the commodore, Braun fought her till he lost his right hand, and then Captain Lemming took the command. This unexpected renewal of her fire made the Elephant and Glatton renew theirs, till she was not only silenced, but nearly every man in the praams ahead and astern of her was killed. When the smoke of their guns died away, she was seen drifting in flames before the wind, those of her crew who remained alive and able to exert themselves, throwing themselves out at her portholes.

¹ Such craft are called praams. Ordinarily they are used in the Netherlands and the Baltic for loading and unloading merchantmen.

² The guns at the stern, which were pointed backward to annoy a ship in pursuit.

Captain Rothe commanded the Nyeborg praam, and perceiving that she could not much longer be kept afloat, made for the inner road. As he passed the line he found the Aggershuis praam in a more miserable condition than his own; her masts had all gone by the board,¹ and she was on the point of sinking. Rothe made fast a cable to her stern, and towed her off; but he could get her no farther than a shoal called Stubben, when she sank; and soon after he had worked the Nyeborg up to the landing place, that vessel also sank to her gunwale. Never did any vessel come out of action in a more dreadful plight. The stump of her foremast was the only stick standing; her cabin had been stove in; every gun except a single one was dismantled; and her deck was covered with shattered limbs and dead bodies.

By half-past two the action had ceased along that part of the line which was astern of the Elephant, but not with the ships ahead and the Crown Batteries. Nelson, seeing the manner in which his boats were fired upon when they went to take possession of the prizes, became angry, and said he must either send on shore to have this irregular proceeding stopped, or send a fire ship and burn them; and with a presence of mind peculiar to himself, and never more signally displayed than now, he availed himself of this occasion to secure the advantage which he had gained, and open a negotiation. He retired into the stern gallery, and wrote thus to the crown prince: "Vice Admiral Lord Nelson has been commanded to spare Denmark when she no longer resists. The line of defense which covered her shores has struck to the British flag; but if the firing is continued on the part of Denmark, he must set on fire all the prizes that he has taken, without having the power of saving the men who have so nobly defended them. The brave Danes are the brothers, and should never be the enemies, of the English."² A wafer was given him; but he ordered a candle to be brought from the cockpit, and sealed the letter with wax, affixing a larger seal than he ordinarily used. "This," said he, "is no time to appear hurried and informal." Captain Sir Frederic Thesiger, who acted as his aid de camp, carried this letter with a flag of truce. Meantime the fire of the ships ahead, and the approach of the Ramillies and Defence from Sir Hyde's division,—which had now worked near enough to alarm the enemy, though not to injure them,—silenced the remainder of the Danish line to the eastward of the Trekroner. That battery, however, continued its fire. This formidable work, owing to the want of the ships which had been destined to attack it and the inadequate force of Riou's little squadron, was comparatively uninjured. Towards the close of the action it had been manned with nearly fifteen hundred men; and the intention of storming it, for which every preparation had been made, was abandoned as impracticable.

¹ "By the board," i.e., over the board, or side.

² See Campbell's poem, the Battle of the Baltic, page 302.

During Thesiger's absence, Nelson sent for Freemantle from the Ganges, and consulted with him and Foley, whether it was advisable to advance, with those ships which had sustained least damage, against the yet uninjured part of the Danish line. They were decidedly of opinion that the best thing which could be done was, while the wind continued fair, to remove the fleet out of the intricate channel from which it had to retreat. In somewhat more than half an hour after Thesiger had been dispatched, the Danish adjutant general Lindholm came, bearing a flag of truce; upon which the Trekroner ceased to fire, and the action closed, after four hours' continuance. He brought an inquiry from the prince: What was the object of Nelson's note? The British admiral wrote in reply: "Lord Nelson's object in sending the flag of truce was humanity; he therefore consents that hostilities shall cease, and that the wounded Danes may be taken on shore. And Lord Nelson will take his prisoners out of the vessels, and burn or carry off his prizes as he shall think fit. Lord Nelson, with humble duty to his Royal Highness the Prince, will consider this the greatest victory he has ever gained if it may be the cause of a happy reconciliation and union between his own most gracious Sovereign and his Majesty the King of Denmark."

Sir Frederic Thesiger was dispatched a second time with the reply, and the Danish adjutant general was referred to the commander in chief for a conference upon this overture. Lindholm, assenting to this, proceeded to the London, which was riding at anchor full four miles off; and Nelson, losing not one of the critical moments which he had thus gained, made signal for his leading ships to weigh in succession. They had the shoal to clear, they were much crippled, and their course was immediately under the guns of the Trekroner.

The Monarch led the way. This ship had received six and twenty shot between wind and water. She had not a shroud standing; there was a double-headed shot in the heart of her foremast, and the slightest wind would have sent every mast¹ over her side. The imminent danger from which Nelson had extricated himself soon became apparent; the Monarch touched immediately upon a shoal, over which she was pushed by the Ganges taking her amidships;² the Glatton went clear; but the other two—the Defiance and the Elephant—grounded about a mile from the Trekroner, and there remained fixed for many hours, in spite of all the exertions of their wearied crews. The Désirée frigate also, at the other end of the line, having gone, towards the close of the action, to assist the Bellona, became fast on the same shoal. Nelson left the Elephant soon after she took the ground, to follow Lindholm.

The heat of action was over, and that kind of feeling which the surrounding scene of havoc was so well fitted to produce pressed heavily upon his exhausted spirits. The sky had suddenly become overcast ; white flags¹ were waving from the masts of so many shattered ships. The slaughter had ceased, but the grief was to come ; for the account of the dead was not yet made up, and no man could tell for what friends he might have to mourn. The very silence which follows the cessation of such a battle becomes a weight upon the heart at first, rather than a relief ; and though the work of mutual destruction was at an end, the Dannebrog was at this time drifting about in flames. Presently she blew up, while our boats, which had put off in all directions to assist her, were endeavoring to rescue her devoted crew, few of whom could be saved.

¹ SOUTHEY'S NOTE. — It would have been well if the fleet, before they went under the batteries, had left their spare spars moored out of reach of shot. Many would have been saved which were destroyed lying on the booms, and the hurt done by their splinters would have been saved also. Small craft could have towed them up when they were required; and, after such an action, so many must necessarily be wanted that if those which were not in use were wounded, it might thus have been rendered impossible to refit the ships.

² The part that is midway between the stem and the stern.

The fate of these men, after the gallantry which they had displayed, particularly affected Nelson ; for there was nothing in this action of that indignation against the enemy and that impression of retributive justice which, at the Nile, had given a sterner temper to his mind, and a sense of austere delight in beholding the vengeance of which he was the appointed minister. The Danes were an honorable foe ; they were of English mold as well as English blood ;² and now that the battle had ceased, he regarded them rather as brethren than as enemies. There was another reflection also which mingled with these melancholy thoughts, and predisposed him to receive them. He was not here master of his own movements, as at Egypt ; he had won the day by disobeying his orders, and, in so far as he had been

¹ Flags of truce.

² Many of the English people are descended from the Danes, or Northmen, who ravaged, settled in, and finally made political conquest of England in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries. Defoe, in his True-born Englishman, speaks thus :—

“ A horrid crowd of rambling thieves and drones,
 Who ransacked kingdoms and dispeopled towns :
 The Pict and painted Briton, treacherous Scot,
 By hunger, theft, and rapine hither brought ;
 Norwegian pirates, buccaneering Danes,
 Whose red-haired offspring everywhere remains —
 Who, joined with Norman-French, compound the breed
 From whence your true-born Englishmen proceed.”

successful, had convicted the commander in chief of an error in judgment. "Well," said he, as he left the Elephant, "I have fought contrary to orders, and I shall perhaps be hanged. Never mind—let them!"

This was the language of a man who, while he is giving utterance to an uneasy thought, clothes it half in jest, because he half repents that it has been disclosed. His services had been too eminent on that day, his judgment too conspicuous, his success too signal, for any commander, however jealous of his own authority or envious of another's merits, to express anything but satisfaction and gratitude,—which Sir Hyde heartily felt, and sincerely expressed. It was speedily agreed that there should be a suspension of hostilities for four and twenty hours, that all the prizes should be surrendered, and the wounded Danes carried on shore. There was a pressing necessity for this; for the Danes, either from too much confidence in the strength of their position and the difficulty of the channel, or supposing that the wounded might be carried to shore during the action,—which was found totally impracticable,—or perhaps from the confusion which the attack excited, had provided no surgeons; so that when our men boarded the captured ships they found many of the mangled and mutilated Danes bleeding to death for want of proper assistance,—a scene, of all others, the most shocking to a brave man's feelings.

The boats of Sir Hyde's division were actively employed all night in bringing out the prizes, and in getting afloat the ships which were on shore. At daybreak, Nelson, who had slept in his own ship, the St. George, rowed to the Elephant; and his delight in finding her afloat seemed to give him new life. There he took a hasty breakfast, praising the men for their exertions, and then pushed off to the prizes, which had not yet been removed. The Zealand, 74, the last which struck, had drifted on the shoal under the Trekroner; and relying, as it seems, upon the protection which that battery might have afforded, refused to acknowledge herself captured, saying that though it was true her flag was not to be seen, her pendant was still flying. Nelson ordered one of our brigs and three longboats to approach her, and rowed up himself to one of the enemy's ships to communicate with the commodore. This officer proved to be an old acquaintance whom he had known in the West Indies; so he invited himself on board, and with that urbanity, as well as decision, which always characterized him, urged his claim to the Zealand so well that it was admitted. The men from the boats lashed a cable round her bowsprit, and the gun vessel towed her away. It is affirmed, and probably with truth, that the Danes felt more pain at beholding this than at all their misfortunes on the preceding day; and one of the officers, Commodore Steen Bille, went to the Trekroner Battery, and asked the commander why he had not sunk the Zealand rather than suffer her thus to be carried off by the enemy.

This was indeed a mournful day for Copenhagen. It was Good Friday; but the general agitation, and the mourning which was in every house, caused all distinction of days to be forgotten. There were, at that hour, thousands in that city who felt, and more, perhaps, who needed, the consolations of Christianity, but few or none who could be calm enough to think of its observances. The English were actively employed in refitting their own ships, securing the prizes, and distributing the prisoners; the Danes, in carrying on shore and disposing of the wounded and the dead. It had been a murderous action. Our loss in killed and wounded was nine hundred and fifty-three. Part of this slaughter might have been spared. The commanding officer of the troops on board one of our ships asked where his men should be stationed. He was told that they could be of no use; that they were not near enough for musketry, and were not wanted at the guns; they had therefore better go below. This, he said, was impossible,—it would be a disgrace that could never be wiped away. They were therefore drawn up upon the gangway, to satisfy this cruel point of honor; and there, without the possibility of annoying the enemy, they were mown down! The loss of the Danes, including prisoners, amounted to about six thousand.

The negotiations, meantime, went on; and it was agreed that Nelson should have an interview with the prince the following day. Hardy and Freemantle landed with him. This was a thing as unexampled as the other circumstances of the battle. A strong guard was appointed to escort him to the palace,—as much for the purpose of security as of honor. The populace, according to the British account, showed a mixture of admiration, curiosity, and displeasure at beholding that man in the midst of them who had inflicted such wounds upon Denmark. But there were neither acclamations nor murmurs. “The people,” says a Dane, “did not degrade themselves with the former, nor disgrace themselves with the latter; the admiral was received as one brave enemy ever ought to receive another,—he was received with respect.” The preliminaries of the negotiation were adjusted at this interview. During the repast which followed, Nelson, with all the sincerity of his character, bore willing testimony to the valor of his foes. He told the prince that he had been in a hundred and five engagements, but that this was the most tremendous of all. “The French,” he said, “fought bravely; but they could not have stood for one hour the fight which the Danes had supported for four.” He requested that Villemoes might be introduced to him; and shaking hands with the youth, told the prince that he ought to be made an admiral. The prince replied: “If, my lord, I am to make all my brave officers admirals, I should have no captains or lieutenants in my service.”

The sympathy of the Danes for their countrymen who had bled in their defense was not weakened by distance of time or place, in this instance. Things needful for the service or the comfort of the wounded were sent in profusion to the hospitals, till the superintendents gave public notice that they could receive no more. On the third day after the action the dead were buried in the naval churchyard; the ceremony was made as public and as solemn as the occasion required,—such a procession had never before been seen in that, or perhaps in any other, city. A public monument was erected upon the spot where the slain were gathered together. A subscription was opened on the day of the funeral for the relief of the sufferers, and collections in aid of it made throughout all the churches in the kingdom. This appeal to the feelings of the people was made with circumstances which gave it full effect. A monument was raised in the midst of the church, surmounted by the Danish colors; young maidens dressed in white stood round it, with either one who had been wounded in the battle, or the widow and orphans of some one who had fallen; a suitable oration was delivered from the pulpit, and patriotic hymns and songs were afterwards rendered. Medals were distributed to all the officers, and to the men who had distinguished themselves. Poets and painters vied with each other in celebrating a battle which, disastrous as it was, had yet been honorable to their country; some, with pardonable sophistry, represented the advantage of the day as on their own side. One writer discovered a more curious but less disputable ground of satisfaction in the reflection that Nelson, as may be inferred from his name, was of Danish descent;¹ and his actions, therefore, the Dane argued, were attributable to Danish valor.

The negotiation was continued during the five following days, and in that interval the prizes were disposed of in a manner which was little approved by Nelson. Six line-of-battle ships and eight praams had been taken. Of these, the Holstein, 64, was the only one which was sent home. The Zealand was a finer ship; but the Zealand and all the others were burned, and their brass battering cannon sunk with the hulls in such shoal water that, when the fleet returned from Revel, they found the Danes with craft over the wrecks, employed in getting the guns up again. Nelson, though he forbore from any public expression of displeasure at seeing the proofs and trophies of his victory destroyed, did not forget to represent to the Admiralty the case of those who were thus deprived of their prize money. "Whether," said he to Earl St. Vincent, "Sir Hyde Parker may mention the subject to you I know not; for he is rich and does not want it; nor is it, you will believe me, any desire to get a few hundred pounds that actuates me to address this letter to you, but justice to the brave officers and men who fought on that day. It is true our opponents were in hulks¹ and floats,² only adapted for the position they were in; but that made our battle so much the harder, and victory so much the more difficult to obtain. Believe me, I have weighed all circumstances; and in my conscience I think that the King should send a gracious message to the House of Commons for a gift to this fleet; for what must be the natural feelings of the officers and men belonging to it, to see their rich commander in chief burn all the fruits of their victory, which, if fitted up and sent to England (as many of them might have been by dismantling part of our fleet), would have sold for a good round sum?"

¹ His name in Danish is Neilson. In this form it is common in Scandinavian languages.

On the 9th, Nelson landed again, to conclude the terms of the armistice. During its continuance the armed ships and vessels of Denmark were to remain in their then actual situation as to armament, equipment, and hostile position; and the treaty of armed neutrality, as far as related to the coöperation of Denmark, was suspended. The prisoners were to be sent on shore,—an acknowledgment being given for them, and for the wounded also, that they might be carried to Great Britain's credit³ in the account of war, in case hostilities should be renewed. The British fleet was allowed to provide itself with all things requisite for the health and comfort of its men. A difficulty arose respecting the duration of the armistice. The Danish commissioners fairly stated their fears of Russia; and Nelson, with that frankness which sound policy and the sense of power seem often to require as well as justify in diplomacy, told them his reason for demanding a long term was, that he might have time to act against the Russian fleet, and then return to Copenhagen. Neither party would yield upon this point, and one of the Danes hinted at the renewal of hostilities. "Renew hostilities!" cried Nelson to one of his friends,—for he understood French enough to comprehend what was said, though not to answer it in the same language. "Tell him we are ready at a moment!—ready to bombard this very night!"

¹ Bodies of old ships unfit, or almost unfit, for sea service.

² Praams or rafts.

³ "Credit" is in bookkeeping the side of an account on which payment is entered. The number of Danish prisoners released should be credited to Great Britain. If afterwards the Danes should take British prisoners, they should restore them until they had paid back the full number of the debt.

The conference, however, proceeded amicably on both sides, and as the commissioners could not agree upon this head, they broke up, leaving Nelson to settle it with the prince. A levee was held forthwith in one of the state rooms, a scene well suited for such a consultation, for all these rooms had been stripped of their furniture in fear of a bombardment. To a bombardment also Nelson was looking at this time; fatigue and anxiety, and vexation at the dilatory measures of the commander in chief combined to make him irritable; and as he was on the way to the prince's dining room, he whispered to the officer on whose arm he was leaning, "Though I have only one eye, I can see that all this will burn well." After dinner he was closeted¹ with the prince, and they agreed that the armistice should continue fourteen weeks, and that, at its termination, fourteen days' notice should be given before the recommencement of hostilities.

An official account of the battle was published by Olfert Fischer, the Danish commander in chief, in which it was asserted that our force was greatly superior; nevertheless, that two of our ships of the line had struck, that the others were so weakened, and especially Lord Nelson's own ship, as to fire only single shots for an hour before the end of the action; and that this hero himself, in the middle and very heat of the conflict, sent a flag of truce on shore to propose a cessation of hostilities. For the truth of this account the Dane appealed to the prince, and all those who, like him, had been eye-witnesses of the scene. Nelson was exceedingly indignant at such a statement, and addressed a letter in confutation of it to the adjutant general, Lindholm, thinking this incumbent upon him for the information of the prince, since his Royal Highness had been appealed to as a witness. "Otherwise," said he, "had Commodore Fischer confined himself to his own veracity¹ I should have treated his official letter with the contempt it deserved, and allowed the world to appreciate the merits of the two contending officers." After pointing out and detecting some of the misstatements in the account, he proceeds: "As to his nonsense about victory, his Royal Highness will not much credit him. I sunk, burned, captured, or drove into the harbor the whole line of defense to the southward of the Crown Islands. He says he is told that two British ships struck. Why did he not take possession of them? I took possession of his as fast as they struck. The reason is clear,—that he did not believe it. He must have known the falsity of the report. He states that the ship in which I had the honor to hoist my flag fired latterly only single guns. It is true: for steady and cool were my brave fellows, and they did not wish to throw away a single shot. He seems to exult that I sent on shore a flag of truce. You know, and his Royal Highness knows, that the guns fired from the shore could only fire through the Danish ships which had surrendered, and that, if I fired at the shore, it could only be in the same manner. God forbid that I should destroy an unresisting Dane! When they became my prisoners, I became their protector."

¹ In close and private consultation.

This letter was written in terms of great asperity against the Danish commander. Lindholm replied in a manner every way honorable to himself. He vindicated the commodore in some points, and excused him in others, reminding Nelson that every commander in chief was liable to receive incorrect reports. With a natural desire to represent the action in the most favorable light to Denmark, he took into the comparative strength of the two parties the ships which were aground, and which could not get into action, and omitted the Trekroner, and the batteries upon Amak Island. He disclaimed all idea of claiming as a victory "what, to every intent and purpose," said he, "was a defeat, but not an inglorious one. As to your lordship's motive for sending a flag of truce, it never can be misconstrued, and your subsequent conduct has sufficiently shown that humanity is always the companion of true valor. You have done more: you have shown yourself a friend to the reëstablishment of peace and good harmony between this country and Great Britain. It is, therefore, with the sincerest esteem I shall always feel myself attached to your lordship." Thus handsomely winding up his reply, he soothed and contented Nelson, who, drawing up a memorandum of the comparative force of the two parties for his own satisfaction, assured Lindholm that if the commodore's statement had been in the same manly and honorable strain, he would have been the last man to have noticed any little inaccuracies which might get into a commander in chief's public letter.

¹ "Confined himself to his own veracity," i.e., limited himself to his own statements, and not call on others to substantiate his assertions.

For the battle of Copenhagen Nelson was raised to the rank of viscount,—an inadequate mark of reward for services so splendid, and of such paramount importance to the dearest interests of England. There was, however, some prudence in dealing out honors to him step by step. Had he lived long enough, he would have fought his way up to a dukedom.

CHAPTER VIII.

Sir Hyde Parker is recalled, and Nelson appointed commander. — He goes to Revel. — Settlement of affairs in the Baltic. — Unsuccessful attempt upon the flotilla at Boulogne. — Peace of Amiens. — Nelson takes the command in the Mediterranean on the renewal of the war. — Escape of the Toulon fleet. — Nelson chases them to the West Indies and back, delivers up his squadron to Admiral Cornwallis, and lands in England.

WHEN Nelson informed Earl St. Vincent that the armistice had been concluded, he told him also, without reserve, his own discontent at the dilatoriness and indecision which he witnessed, and could not remedy. “No man,” said he, “but those who are on the spot, can tell what I have gone through, and do suffer. I make no scruple in saying that I would have been at Revel fourteen days ago; that, without this armistice, the fleet would never have gone, but by order of the Admiralty; and with it, I dare say, we shall not go this week. I wanted Sir Hyde to let me, at least, go and cruise off Carlscrona,¹ to prevent the Revel ships from getting in. I said I would not go to Revel to take any of those laurels which I was sure he would reap there. Think for me, my dear lord, and if I have deserved well let me return; if ill, for Heaven’s sake supersede me, for I cannot exist in this state.” Fatigue, incessant anxiety, and a climate little suited to one of a tender constitution, which had now for many years been accustomed to more genial latitudes, made him at this time seriously determine upon returning home. If the Northern business were not settled, he said, they must send more admirals; for the keen air of the North had cut him to the heart. He felt the want of activity and decision in the commander in chief more keenly, and this affected his spirits, and, consequently, his health, more than the inclemency of the Baltic. Soon after the armistice was signed, Sir Hyde proceeded to the eastward, with such ships as were fit for service, leaving Nelson to follow with the rest as soon as those which had received slight damages should be repaired, and the rest sent to England. In passing between the isles of Amak and Saltholm, most of the ships touched the ground, and some of them stuck fast for a while. No serious injury, however, was sustained.

¹ A city on the southeastern coast of Sweden.

It was intended to act against the Russians first, before the breaking up of the frost should enable them to leave Revel;¹ but learning on the way that the Swedes had put to sea to effect a junction with them, Sir Hyde altered his course, in hopes of intercepting this part of the enemy's force. Nelson had at this time provided for the more pressing emergencies of the service, and prepared, on the 18th, to follow the fleet. The St. George drew too much water² to pass the channel between the isles without being lightened; the guns were therefore taken out and put on board an American vessel. A contrary wind, however, prevented Nelson from moving, and on that same evening, while he was thus delayed, information reached him of the relative situation of the Swedish and British fleets, and the probability of an action. The fleet was nearly ten leagues distant, and both wind and current contrary; but it was not possible that Nelson could wait for a favorable season under such an expectation. He ordered his boat immediately and stepped into it. Night was setting in,—one of the cold spring nights of the North,—and it was discovered, soon after they had left the ship, that in their haste they had forgotten to provide him with a boat cloak. He, however, forbade them to return for one; and when one of his companions offered his own greatcoat, and urged him to make use of it, he replied, "I thank you very much,—but, to tell you the truth, my anxiety keeps me sufficiently warm at present."

"Do you think," said he, presently, "that our fleet has quitted Bornholm?³ If it has, we must follow it to Carlsrona." About midnight he reached it, and once more got on board the Ele- phant. On the following morning the Swedes were discovered ; but they, as soon as they perceived the English approaching, retired, and took shelter in Carlscrona, behind the batteries on the island at the entrance of that port. Sir Hyde sent in a flag of truce, stating that Denmark had concluded an armistice, and requiring an explicit declaration from the court of Sweden whether it would adhere to, or abandon, the hostile measures which it had taken against the rights and interests of Great Britain. The commander, Vice Admiral Cronstadt, replied that he could not answer a question which did not come within the particular circle of his duty, but that the King was then at Malmö, and would soon be at Carlscrona. Gustavus shortly afterwards arrived, and an answer was then returned to this effect: "That his Swedish Majesty would not for a moment fail to fulfill, with fidelity and sincerity, the engagements he had entered into with his allies;¹ but he would not refuse to listen to equitable proposals made by deputies furnished with proper authority by the King of Great Britain to the united Northern powers." Satisfied with this answer and with the known disposition of the Swedish court, Sir Hyde sailed for the Gulf of Finland. But he had not proceeded far before a dispatch boat from the Russian ambassador at Copenhagen arrived, bringing intelligence of the death of the Emperor Paul, and that his successor, Alexander, had accepted the offer made by England to his father, of terminating the dispute by a convention. The British admiral was, therefore, required to desist from all further hostilities.

¹ The Russian squadron was ice-bound at Revel.

² "Drew too much water," i.e., required too great a depth of water in order to float.

³ A Danish island, south of Sweden.

It was Nelson's maxim that, to negotiate with effect, force should be at hand and in a situation to act. The fleet, having been reënforced from England, amounted to eighteen sail of the line, and the wind was fair for Revel. There he would have sailed immediately to place himself between that division of the Russian fleet and the squadron at Cronstadt, in case this offer should prove insincere. Sir Hyde, on the other hand, believed that the death of Paul had effected all which was necessary.

¹ Denmark and Russia.

The manner of that death,¹ indeed, rendered it apparent that a change of policy would take place in the cabinet of Petersburg;² but Nelson never trusted anything to the uncertain event of time which could possibly be secured by promptitude or resolution. It was not, therefore, without severe mortification that he saw the commander in chief return to the coast of Seeland and anchor in Kjöge Bay,³ there to wait patiently for what might happen. There the fleet remained till dispatches arrived from home on the 5th of May recalling Sir Hyde, and appointing Nelson commander in chief.

Nelson wrote to Earl St. Vincent that he was unable to hold this honorable station. Admiral Graves also was so ill as to be confined to his bed, and he entreated that some person might come out and take the command. "I will endeavor," said he, "to do my best while I remain; but, my dear lord, I shall either soon go to heaven, I hope, or must rest quiet for a time. If Sir Hyde were gone I would now be under sail." On the day when this was written he received news of his appointment. Not a moment was now lost. His first signal as commander in chief was to hoist in all launches⁴ and prepare to weigh; and on the 7th he sailed from Kjöge. Part of his fleet was left at Bornholm to watch the Swedes, from whom he required and obtained an assurance that the British trade in the Cattegat and in the Baltic should not be molested; and saying how unpleasant it would be to him if anything should happen which might, for a moment, disturb the returning harmony between Sweden and Great Britain, he apprised them that he was not directed to abstain from hostilities should he meet with the Swedish fleet at sea. Meantime he himself, with ten sail of the line, two frigates,

¹ He was strangled by conspirators in March, 1801. His son Alexander succeeded him.

² St. Petersburg.

³ East of Seeland, and southwest of Amager.

⁴ A launch is the largest boat carried by a man-of-war. It is used for passage to and from shore, etc.

a brig, and a schooner, made for the Gulf of Finland. Paul, in one of the freaks of his tyranny, had seized upon all the British effects in Russia, and even considered British subjects as his prisoners. "I will have all the English shipping and property restored," said Nelson, "but I will do nothing violently,—neither commit my country, nor suffer Russia to mix the affairs of Denmark or Sweden with the detention of our ships." The wind was fair, and carried him in four days to Revel Roads. But the bay had been clear of firm ice on the 29th of April, while the English were lying idly at Kjöge. The Russians had cut through the ice in the mole, six feet thick, and their whole squadron had sailed for Cronstadt on the 3d. Before that time it had lain at the mercy of the English. "Nothing," Nelson said, "if it had been right to make the attack, could have saved one ship of them in two hours after our entering the bay."

It so happened that there was no cause to regret the opportunity which had been lost, and Nelson immediately put the intentions of Russia to the proof. He sent on shore to say that he came with friendly views, and was ready to return a salute. On their part the salute was delayed, till a message was sent to them to inquire for what reason, and the officer whose neglect had occasioned the delay was put under arrest. Nelson wrote to the Emperor, proposing to wait on him personally and congratulate him on his accession, and urging the immediate release of British subjects and restoration of British property.

The answer arrived on the 16th. Nelson, meantime, had exchanged visits with the governor, and the most friendly intercourse had subsisted between the ships and the shore. Alexander's ministers, in their reply, expressed their surprise at the arrival of a British fleet in a Russian port, and their wish that it should return. They professed, on the part of Russia, the most friendly disposition towards Great Britain, but declined the personal visit of Lord Nelson unless he came in a single ship. There was a suspicion implied in this which stung Nelson, and he said the Russian ministers would never have written thus if their fleet had been at Revel. He wrote an immediate reply, expressing what he felt. He told the court of Petersburg that the word of a British admiral, when given in explanation of any part of his conduct, was as sacred as that of any sovereign's in Europe. And he repeated, that, under other circumstances, it would have been his anxious wish to have paid his personal respects to the Emperor, and signed, with his own hand, the act of amity between the two countries. Having dispatched this, he stood out to sea immediately, leaving a brig to bring off the provisions which had been contracted for, and to settle the accounts. "I hope all is right," said he, writing to our ambassador at Berlin; "but seamen are but bad negotiators, for we put to issue in five minutes what diplomatic forms would be five months doing."

On his way down the Baltic, however, he met the Russian Admiral Tchitchagof, whom the Emperor, in reply to Sir Hyde's overtures, had sent to communicate personally with the British commander in chief. The reply was such as had been wished and expected; and these negotiators going, seamanlike, straight to their object, satisfied each other of the friendly intentions of their respective governments. Nelson then anchored off Rostock;¹ and there he received an answer to his last dispatch from Revel, in which the Russian court expressed their regret that there should have been any misconception between them, informed him that the British vessels which Paul had detained were ordered to be liberated, and invited him to Petersburg in whatever mode might be most agreeable to himself. Other honors awaited him. The Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz,² the Queen's³ brother, came to visit him on board his ship; and towns from the inland parts of Mecklenburg sent deputations, with their public books of record, that they might have the name of Nelson in them written by his own hand.

From Rostock the fleet returned to Kjöge Bay. Nelson saw

¹ A Baltic seaport of Germany.

² A grand-duchy of the German empire.

³ Queen Charlotte, wife of George III.

that the temper of the Danes towards England was such as naturally arose from the chastisement which they had so recently received. "In this nation," said he, "we shall not be forgiven for having the upper hand of them. I only thank God we have, or they would try to humble us to the dust." He saw also that the Danish cabinet was completely subservient to France. A French officer was, at this time, the companion and counselor of the crown prince, and things were done in such open violation of the armistice that Nelson thought a second infliction of vengeance would soon be necessary. He wrote to the Admiralty, requesting a clear and explicit reply to his inquiry whether the commander in chief was at liberty to hold the language becoming a British admiral, "which very probably," said he, "if I am here, will break the armistice, and set Copenhagen in a blaze. I see everything which is dirty and mean going on, and the prince royal at the head of it. Ships have been masted, guns taken on board, floating batteries prepared, and, except hauling out and completing their rigging, everything has been done in defiance of the treaty. My heart burns at seeing the word of a prince, nearly allied¹ to our good King, so falsified; but his conduct is such that he will lose his kingdom if he goes on, for Jacobins rule in Denmark. I have made no representations yet, as it would be useless to do so until I have the power of correction. All I beg, in the name of the future commander in chief, is that the orders may be clear; for enough is done to break twenty treaties, if it should be wished, or to make the prince royal humble himself before British generosity."

Nelson was not deceived in his judgment of the Danish cabinet, but the battle of Copenhagen had crippled its power. The death of the Czar Paul had broken the confederacy; and that cabinet therefore, was compelled to defer till a more convenient season the indulgence of its enmity towards Great Britain. Soon afterwards, Admiral Sir Charles Maurice Pole arrived to take the command. The business, military and political, had by that time been so far completed that the presence of the British fleet soon became no longer necessary. Sir Charles, however, made the short time of his command memorable by passing the Great Belt, for the first time, with line-of-battle ships, working through the channel against adverse winds. When Nelson left the fleet, this speedy termination of the expedition, though confidently expected, was not certain; and he, in his unwillingness to weaken the British force, thought at one time of traversing Jutland in his boat, by the canal, to Tönningen on the Eider,¹ and finding his way home from thence. This intention was not executed; but he returned in a brig, declining to accept a frigate,—which few admirals would have done, especially if, like him, they suffered from seasickness in a small vessel. On his arrival at Yarmouth the first thing he did was to visit the hospital, and see the men who had been wounded in the late battle,—that victory which had added new glory to the name of Nelson, and which was of more importance, even, than the battle of the Nile to the honor and strength and security of England.

¹ See page 203.

He had not been many weeks on shore before he was called upon to undertake a service for which no Nelson was required. Bonaparte, who was now First Consul, and in reality sole ruler of France, was making preparations upon a great scale for invading England. But his schemes in the Baltic had been baffled; fleets could not be created as they were wanted, and his armies, therefore, were to come over in gunboats and such small craft as could be rapidly built or collected for the occasion. From the former governments of France such threats have only been matter of insult and policy. In Bonaparte they were sincere, for this adventurer, intoxicated with success, already began to imagine that all things were to be submitted to his fortune. We had not at that time proved the superiority of our soldiers over the French, and the unreflecting multitude were not to be persuaded that an invasion could only be effected by numerous and powerful fleets. A general alarm was excited, and, in condescension to this unworthy feeling, Nelson was appointed to a command extending from Orfordness to Beachy Head,¹ on both shores,—a sort of service, he said, for which he felt no other ability than what might be found in his zeal.

¹ That is, crossing Schleswig-Holstein by the Eider Canal to the point on the Eider River where it becomes navigable, and then descending the river to Tönning (Tönningen) on the North Sea.

To this service, however, such as it was, he applied with his wonted alacrity; and having hoisted his flag in the Medusa frigate, went to reconnoiter Boulogne, the point from which it was supposed the great attempt would be made, and which the French, in fear of an attack themselves, were fortifying with all care. He approached near enough to sink two of their floating batteries and destroy a few gunboats which were without the pier. What damage was done within could not be ascertained. “Boulogne,” he said, “was certainly not a very pleasant place that morning; but,” he added, “it is not my wish to injure the poor inhabitants, and the town is spared as much as the nature of the service will admit.” Enough was done to show the enemy that they could not, with impunity, come outside their own ports. Nelson was satisfied, by what he saw, that they meant to make an attempt from this place, but that it was impracticable; for the least wind at west-northwest, and they were lost. The ports of Flushing² and Flanders³ were better points. There we could not tell by our eyes what means of transport were provided. From thence, therefore, if it came forth at all, the expedition would come. “And what a forlorn undertaking!” said he. “Consider cross tides, etc. As for rowing, that is impossible. It is perfectly right to be prepared for a mad government; but, with the active force which has been given me, I may pronounce it almost impracticable.”

That force had been got together with an alacrity which has seldom been equaled. On the 28th of July we were, in Nelson's own words, literally at the foundation of our fabric of defense; and twelve days afterwards we were so prepared on the enemy's coast that he did not believe they could get three miles from their ports. The Medusa, returning to our own shores, anchored in the rolling ground¹ off Harwich, and when Nelson wished to get to the Nore² in her, the wind rendered it impossible to proceed there by the usual channel. In haste to be at the Nore, remembering that he had been a tolerable pilot for the mouth of the Thames in his younger days, and thinking it necessary that he should know all that could be known of the navigation, he requested the maritime surveyor of the coast, Mr. Spence, to get him into the Swin³ by any channel; for neither the pilots which he had on board, nor the Harwich ones, would take charge of the ship. No vessel drawing more than fourteen feet had ever before ventured over the Naze.⁴ Mr. Spence, however, who had surveyed the channel, carried her safely through. The channel has since been called Nelson's, though he himself wished it to be named after the Medusa. His name needed no new memorial.

¹ “From Orfordness to Beachy Head,” i.e., from Orfordness, on the North Sea coast of Suffolk, beyond Harwich, to Beachy Head, on the English Channel, the part of the English coast nearest to France.

² A fortified seaport of the Netherlands.

³ Now a part of Belgium.

Nelson's eye was upon Flushing. "To take possession of that place," he said, "would be a week's expedition for four or five thousand troops." This, however, required a consultation with the Admiralty; and, that something might be done meantime, he resolved upon attacking the flotilla in the mouth of Boulogne harbor, owning, at the same time, that this boat warfare was not exactly congenial to his feelings. Into Helvoet⁵ or Flushing he should be happy to lead, if government turned their thoughts that way. "While I serve," said he, "I will do it actively, and to the very best of my abilities. I require nursing like a child," he added; "my mind carries me beyond my strength, and will do me up; but such is my nature."

The attack was made by the boats of the squadron in five

¹ "Rolling ground," i.e., water rising and falling gently. ² See page 18.

³ See page 17. ⁴ A point formed by a group of islands, near Harwich.

⁵ Helvoetsluis, a seaport of the Netherlands.

divisions, under Captains Somerville, Parker, Cotgrave, Jones, and Conn. The previous essay¹ had taught the French the weak parts of their position, and they had omitted no means of strengthening it, and of guarding against the expected attempt. The boats put off about half an hour before midnight; but, owing to the darkness and the tide and half-tide, which must always make night attacks so uncertain on the coasts of the Channel, the divisions separated. One could not arrive at all, another not till near daybreak. The others made their attack gallantly, but the enemy were fully prepared. All the vessels were defended by long poles, headed with iron spikes, projecting from their sides; strong nettings were braced up to their lower yards; they were moored by the bottom to the shore, and chained one to another.² They were strongly manned with soldiers and protected by land batteries, and the shore was lined with troops. Many were taken possession of, and, though they could not have been brought out, would have been burnt had not the French resorted to a mode of offense which they have often used, but which no other people have ever been wicked enough to employ. The moment the firing ceased on board one of their own vessels they fired upon it from the shore, perfectly regardless of their own men.

The commander of one of the French divisions acted like a generous enemy. He hailed the boats as they approached, and cried out in English: "Let me advise you, my brave Englishmen, to keep your distance. You can do nothing here, and it is only uselessly shedding the blood of brave men to make the attempt." The French official account boasted of the victory. "The combat," it said, "took place in sight of both countries; it was the first of the kind, and the historian would have cause to make this remark." They guessed our loss at four or five hundred. It amounted to one hundred and seventy-two. In his private letters to the Admiralty, Nelson affirmed that had our force arrived as he intended, it was not all the chains in France which could have prevented our men from bringing off the whole of the vessels. There had been no error committed, and never did Englishmen display more courage. Upon this point Nelson was fully satisfied; but he said he should never bring himself again to allow any attack wherein he was not personally concerned, and that his mind suffered more than if he had had a leg shot off in the affair. He grieved particularly for Captain Parker, an excellent officer, to whom he was greatly attached, and who had an aged father looking to him for assistance. His thigh was shattered in the action, and the wound proved mortal after some weeks of suffering and manly resignation. During this interval Nelson's anxiety was very great. "Dear Parker is my child," said he; "for I found him in distress." And when he received the tidings of his death, he replied: "You will judge of my feelings. God's will be done. I beg that his hair may be cut off and given me. It shall be buried in my grave. Poor Mr. Parker! What a son has he lost! If I were to say I was content, I should lie; but I shall endeavor to submit with all the fortitude in my power. His loss has made a wound in my heart which time will hardly heal."

¹ Trial; attempt.

² SOUTHEY'S NOTE.—Nelson himself believed this. But I have been assured that it was not the case by M. de Bercet, who, when I had the pleasure of seeing him in 1825, was (and I hope still is) commandant of Boulogne. The word of this brave and loyal soldier is as little to be doubted as his worth. He is the last survivor of Charette's band; and his own memoirs, could he be persuaded to write them (a duty which he owes to his country as well as to himself), would form a redeeming episode in the history of the French Revolution.

He now wished to be relieved from this service. The country, he said, had attached a confidence to his name which he had submitted to, and therefore had cheerfully repaired to the station; but this boat business, though it might be part of a great plan of invasion, could never be the only one, and he did not think it was a command for a vice admiral. It was not that he wanted a more lucrative situation; for, seriously indisposed as he was, and low-spirited from private considerations, he did not know, if the Mediterranean¹ were vacant, that he should be equal to undertake it. Just at this time the peace of Amiens² was signed. Nelson rejoiced that the experiment was made, but was well aware that it was an experiment. He saw what he called the misery of peace, unless the utmost vigilance and prudence were exerted; and he expressed in bitter terms his proper indignation at the manner in which the mob of London welcomed the French general who brought the ratification, saying that they made him ashamed of his country.

He had purchased a house and estate at Merton, in Surrey, meaning to pass his days there in the society of Sir William and Lady Hamilton. This place he had never seen till he was now welcomed there by the friends to whom he had so passionately devoted himself, and who were not less sincerely attached to him. The place, and everything which Lady Hamilton had done to it, delighted him, and he declared that the longest liver should possess it all. The depression of spirits under which he had long labored arose from the disquietude in which this connection had involved him,—a connection which it was not possible his father could behold without sorrow and displeasure. Mr. Nelson, however, was soon convinced that the attachment, which Lady Nelson regarded with natural jealousy and resentment, did not in reality pass the bounds of ardent and romantic admiration,—a passion which the manners and accomplishments of Lady Hamilton, fascinating as they were, would not have been able to excite if they had not been accompanied by more uncommon intellectual endowments, and by a character which, both in its strength and in its weakness, resembled his own. It did not, therefore, require much explanation to reconcile him to his son, an event the more essential to Nelson's happiness because a few months afterwards the good old man died, at the age of seventy-nine.

¹ The Mediterranean naval command.

² In March, 1802, between France and England. By it England surrendered her conquests; among other concessions France gave up Malta to the Knights.

Soon after the conclusion of peace, tidings arrived of our final and decisive successes in Egypt; in consequence of which the Common Council¹ voted their thanks to the army and navy for bringing the campaign to so glorious a conclusion. When Nelson, after the action of Cape St. Vincent, had been entertained at a city feast, he had observed to the Lord Mayor that if the city continued its generosity, the navy would ruin them in gifts. To which the Lord Mayor replied, putting his hand upon the admiral's shoulder: "Do you find victories, and we will find rewards." Nelson, as he said, had kept his word,—had doubly fulfilled his part of the contract,—but no thanks had been voted for the battle of Copenhagen; and feeling that he and his companions in that day's glory had a fair and honorable claim to this reward, he took the present opportunity of addressing a letter to the Lord Mayor, complaining of the omission and the injustice. "The smallest services," said he, "rendered by the army or navy to the country have been always noticed by the great city of London, with one exception,—the glorious 2d of April,—a day when the greatest dangers of navigation were overcome, and the Danish force, which they thought impregnable, totally taken or destroyed by the consummate skill of our commanders and by the undaunted bravery of as gallant a band as ever defended the rights of this country. For myself, if I were only personally concerned, I should bear the stigma, attempted to be now first placed upon my brow, with humility. But, my lord, I am the natural guardian of the fame of the officers of the navy, army, and marines, who fought and so profusely bled under my command on that day. Again I disclaim for myself more merit than naturally falls to a successful commander; but when I am called upon to speak of the merits of the captains of his Majesty's ships, and of the officers and men, whether seamen, marines, or soldiers, whom I that day had the happiness to command, I then say, that never was the glory of this country upheld with more determined bravery than on that occasion; and, if I may be allowed to give an opinion as a Briton, then I say that more important service was never rendered to our King and country. It is my duty, my lord, to prove to the brave fellows, my companions in danger, that I have not failed, at every proper place, to represent as well as I am able their bravery and meritorious conduct."

¹ Of London.

Another honor of greater import was withheld from the conquerors. The King had given medals to those captains who were engaged in the battles of the 1st of June,¹ of Cape St. Vincent, of Camperdown,² and of the Nile. Then came the victory at Copenhagen, which Nelson truly called the most difficult achievement, the hardest fought battle, the most glorious result that ever graced the annals of our country. He, of course, expected the medal, and in writing to Earl St. Vincent said he longed to have it, and would not give it up to be made an English duke. The medal, however, was not given, "for what reason," said Nelson, "Lord St. Vincent best knows," words plainly implying a suspicion that it was withheld by some feeling of jealousy; and that suspicion estranged him during the remaining part of his life from one who had, at one time, been essentially, as well as sincerely, his friend, and of whose professional abilities he ever entertained the highest opinion.

The happiness which Nelson enjoyed in the society of his chosen friends was of no long continuance. Sir William Hamilton, who was far advanced in years, died early in 1803. He expired in his wife's arms, holding Nelson by the hand; and almost in his last words left her to his protection, requesting him that he would see justice done her by the government, as he knew what she had done for her country. He left him her portrait in enamel, calling him his dearest friend, the most virtuous, loyal, and truly brave character he had ever known. The codicil containing this bequest concluded with these words: "God bless him, and shame fall on those who do not say Amen." Sir William's pension of £1,200 a year ceased with his death. Nelson applied to Mr. Addington in Lady Hamilton's behalf, stating the important service which she had rendered to the fleet at Syracuse;¹ and Mr. Addington, it is said, acknowledged that she had a just claim upon the gratitude of the country. This barren acknowledgment was all that was obtained; but a sum equal to the pension which her husband had enjoyed was settled on her by Nelson, and paid in monthly payments during his life. A few weeks after this event the war was renewed; and the day after his Majesty's message to Parliament, Nelson departed to take the command of the Mediterranean fleet.²

¹ Lord Howe's victory over the French in the Channel in 1794.

² See page 118.

He took his station immediately off Toulon, and there, with incessant vigilance, waited for the coming out of the enemy. When he had been fourteen months thus employed, he received a vote of thanks from the city of London for his skill and perseverance in blockading that port so as to prevent the French from putting to sea. Nelson had not forgotten the wrong which the city had done to the Baltic fleet by their omission, and did not lose the opportunity which this vote afforded of recurring to that point. "I do assure your lordship," said he, in his answer to the Lord Mayor, "that there is not that man breathing who sets a higher value upon the thanks of his fellow citizens of London than myself; but I should feel as much ashamed to receive them for a particular service, marked in the resolution, if I felt that I did not come within that line of service, as I should feel hurt at having a great victory passed over without notice. I beg to inform your lordship that the port of Toulon has never been blockaded by me,—quite the reverse. Every opportunity has been offered the enemy to put to sea, for it is there that we hope to realize the hopes and expectations of our country." Nelson then remarked that the junior flag officers of his fleet had been omitted in this vote of thanks, and his surprise at the omission was expressed with more asperity, perhaps, than an offense so entirely and manifestly unintentional deserved; but it arose from that generous regard for the feelings as well as interests of all who were under his command, which made him as much beloved in the fleets of Britain as he was dreaded in those of the enemy.

¹ See page 127.

² In 1803.

Never was any commander more beloved. He governed men by their reason and their affections. They knew that he was incapable of caprice or tyranny, and they obeyed him with alacrity and joy because he possessed their confidence as well as their love. "Our Nel," they used to say, "is as brave as a lion and as gentle as a lamb." Severe discipline he detested, though he had been bred in a severe school. He never inflicted corporal punishment if it were possible to avoid it; and when compelled to enforce it, he, who was familiar with wounds and death, suffered like a woman. In his whole life Nelson was never known to act unkindly towards an officer. If he was asked to prosecute one for ill behavior, he used to answer that there was no occasion for him to ruin a poor devil who was sufficiently his own enemy to ruin himself. But in Nelson there was more than the easiness and humanity of a happy nature: he did not merely abstain from injury; his was an active and watchful benevolence, ever desirous not only to render justice, but to do good. During the peace, he had spoken in Parliament upon the abuses respecting prize money, and had submitted plans to government for more easily manning the navy, and preventing desertion from it by bettering the condition of the seamen. He proposed that their certificates should be registered, and that every man who had served with a good character five years in war should receive a bounty of two guineas annually after that time, and of four guineas after eight years. "This," he said, "might at first sight appear an enormous sum for the state to pay; but the average life of a seaman is, from hard service, finished at forty-five; he cannot, therefore, enjoy the annuity many years; and the interest of the money saved by his not deserting would go far to pay the whole expense."

To his midshipmen he ever showed the most winning kindness, encouraging the diffident, tempering the hasty, counseling and befriending both. "Recollect," he used to say, "that you must be a seaman to be an officer; and also that you cannot be a good officer without being a gentleman." A lieutenant wrote to him to say that he was dissatisfied with his captain. Nelson's answer was in that spirit of perfect wisdom and perfect goodness which regulated his whole conduct towards those who were under his command: "I have just received your letter; and I am truly sorry that any difference should arise between your captain, who has the reputation of being one of the bright officers of the service, and yourself, a very young man and a very young officer, who must naturally have much to learn; therefore the chance is that you are perfectly wrong in the disagreement. However, as your present situation must be very disagreeable, I will certainly take an early opportunity of removing¹ you, provided your conduct to your present captain be such that another may not refuse to receive you."

The gentleness and benignity of his disposition never made him forget what was due to discipline. Being applied to on one occasion to save a young officer from a court-martial which he had provoked by his misconduct, his reply was that he would do everything in his power to oblige so gallant and good an officer as Sir John Warren—in whose name the intercession had been made. "But what," he added, "would he do if he were here? Exactly what I have done, and am still willing to do. The young man must write such a letter of contrition as would be an acknowledgment of his great fault; and with a sincere promise, if his captain will intercede to prevent the impending court-martial, never to so misbehave again. On his captain's inclosing me such a letter, with a request to cancel the order for the trial, I might be induced to do it; but the letters and reprimand will be given in the public order book of the fleet, and read to all the officers. The young man has pushed himself forward to notice, and he must take the consequence. It was upon the quarter-deck, in the face of the ship's company, that he treated his captain with contempt; and I am in duty bound to support the authority and consequence of every officer under my command. A poor ignorant seaman is forever punished for contempt to his superiors."

¹ To another ship and under another captain.

A dispute occurred in the fleet while it was off Toulon, which called forth Nelson's zeal for the rights and interests of the navy. Some young artillery officers serving on board the bomb vessels refused to let their men perform any other duty but what related to the mortars. They wished to have it established that their corps was not subject to the captain's authority. The same pretensions were made in the Channel fleet about the same time; and the artillery rested their claims to separate and independent authority on board, upon a clause in the Act¹ which they interpreted in their favor. Nelson took up the subject with all the earnestness which its importance deserved. "There is no real happiness in this world," said he, writing to Earl St. Vincent, as First Lord. "With all content and smiles around me, up start these artillery boys (I understand they are not beyond that age) and set us at defiance, speaking in the most disrespectful manner of the navy and its commanders. I know you, my dear lord, so well, that, with your quickness, the matter would have been settled, and perhaps some of them been broke. I am, perhaps, more patient, but, I do assure you, not less resolved, if my plan of conciliation is not attended to. You and I are on the eve of quitting the theater of our exploits; but we hold² it to our successors never, whilst we have a tongue to speak or a hand to write, to allow the navy to be in the smallest degree injured in its discipline by our conduct."

To Trowbridge he wrote in the same spirit: "It is the old history,—trying to do away the Act of Parliament; but I trust they will never succeed; for when they do, farewell to our naval superiority. We should be prettily commanded! Let them once gain the step of being independent of the navy on board a ship, and they will soon have the other, and command us. But, thank God! my dear Trowbridge, the King himself cannot do away the Act of Parliament. Although my career is nearly run, yet it would embitter my future days and expiring moments to hear of our navy being sacrificed to the army." As the surest way of preventing such disputes, he suggested that the navy should have its own corps of artillery; and a corps of marine artillery was accordingly established.

¹ Of Parliament.

² Owe.

Instead of lessening the power of the commander, Nelson would have wished to see it increased. It was absolutely necessary, he thought, that merit should be rewarded at the moment, and that the officers of the fleet should look up to the commander in chief for their reward. He himself was never more happy than when he could promote those who were deserving of promotion. Many were the services which he thus rendered unsolicited; and frequently the officer in whose behalf he had interested himself with the Admiralty did not know to whose friendly interference he was indebted for his good fortune. He used to say, "I wish it to appear as a godsend." The love which he bore the navy made him promote the interests and honor the memory of all who had added to its glories. "The near relations of brother officers," he said, "I consider as legacies to the service." Upon mention being made to him of a son of Rodney,¹ by the Duke of Clarence, his reply was: "I agree with your Royal Highness most entirely that the son of a Rodney ought to be the protégé of every person in the kingdom, and particularly of the sea officers. Had I known that there had been this claimant, some of my own lieutenants must have given way to such a name, and he should have been placed in the Victory; she is full, and I have twenty on my list;² but whatever numbers I have, the name of Rodney must cut many of them out." Such was the proper sense which Nelson felt of what was due to splendid services and illustrious names. His feelings towards the brave men who had served with him are shown by a note in his diary, which was probably not intended for any other eye than his own: "Nov. 7. I had the comfort of making an old Agamemnon, George Jones, a gunner, into the Chameleon brig."

¹ See page 37.

² Of applicants for appointment.

When Nelson took the command it was expected that the Mediterranean would be an active scene. Nelson well understood the character of the perfidious Corsican who was now sole tyrant of France; and knowing that he was as ready to attack his friends as his enemies, knew, therefore, that nothing could be more uncertain than the direction of the fleet from Toulon, whenever it should put to sea. "It had as many destinations," he said, "as there were countries." The momentous revolutions of the last ten years had given him ample matter for reflection, as well as opportunities for observation; the film was cleared from his eyes; and now, when the French no longer went abroad with the cry of liberty and equality, he saw that the oppression and misrule of the powers which had been opposed to them had been the main causes of their success, and that those causes would still prepare the way before them. Even in Sicily—where, if it had been possible longer to blind himself, Nelson would willingly have seen no evil—he perceived that the people wished for a change, and acknowledged that they had reason to wish for it.

In Sardinia the same burden of misgovernment was felt; and the people, like the Sicilians, were impoverished by a government so utterly incompetent to perform its first and most essential duties that it did not protect its own coasts from the Barbary pirates. He would fain have had us purchase this island (the finest in the Mediterranean) from its sovereign, who did not receive £5,000 a year from it, after its wretched establishment¹ was paid. There was reason to think that France was preparing to possess herself of this important point, which afforded our fleet facilities for watching Toulon not to be obtained elsewhere. An expedition was preparing at Corsica for the purpose, and all the Sardes² who had taken part with revolutionary France were ordered to assemble there. It was certain that if the attack were made it would succeed. Nelson thought that the only means to prevent Sardinia from becoming French was to make it English, and that half a million would give the King a rich price and England a cheap purchase. A better, and therefore a wiser, policy would have been to exert our influence in removing the abuses of the government; for foreign dominion is always, in some degree, an evil, and allegiance neither can nor ought to be made a thing of bargain and sale. Sardinia, like Sicily and Corsica, is large enough to form a separate state. Let us hope that these islands may, ere long, be made free and independent. Freedom and independence will bring with them industry and prosperity; and wherever these are found, arts and letters will flourish, and the improvement of the human race proceed.

¹ Government employees.

² Sardinians.

The proposed attack was postponed. Views of wider ambition were opening upon Bonaparte, who now almost undisguis- edly aspired to make himself master of the continent of Europe; and Austria was preparing for another struggle, to be conducted as weakly and terminated as miserably as the former. Spain, too, was once more to be involved in war by the policy of France, that perfidious government having in view the double object of employing the Spanish resources against England, and exhaust- ing them in order to render Spain herself finally its prey. Nel- son, who knew that England and the Peninsula¹ ought to be in alliance for the common interest of both, frequently expressed his hopes that Spain might resume her natural rank among the nations. "We ought," he said, "by mutual consent, to be the very best friends, and both to be ever hostile to France." But he saw that Bonaparte was meditating the destruction of Spain, and that while the wretched court of Madrid professed to remain neutral, the appearances of neutrality were scarcely preserved. An order of the year 1771, excluding British ships of war from the Spanish ports, was revived and put in force; while French privateers from these very ports annoyed the British trade, car- ried their prizes in, and sold them even at Barcelona. Nelson complained of this to the captain general of Catalonia,¹ informing him that he claimed² for every British ship or squadron the right of lying as long as it pleased in the ports of Spain while that right was allowed to other powers. To the British ambassador he said: "I am ready to make large allowances for the miserable situation Spain has placed herself in; but there is a certain line beyond which I cannot submit to be treated with disrespect. We have given up French vessels taken within gunshot of the Spanish shore, and yet French vessels are permitted to attack our ships from the Spanish shore. Your excellency may assure the Spanish government, that in whatever place the Spaniards allow the French to attack us, in that place I shall order the French to be attacked."

¹ Spain and Portugal.

During this state of things,—to which the weakness of Spain, and not her will, consented,—the enemy's fleet did not venture to put to sea. Nelson watched it with unremitting and almost unexampled perseverance. The station off Toulon he called his home. "We are in the right fighting trim," said he; "let them come as soon as they please. I never saw a fleet altogether so well officered and manned; would to God the ships were half as good! The finest ones in the service would soon be destroyed by such terrible weather. I know well enough that if I were to go into Malta I should save the ships during this bad season; but if I am to watch the French I must be at sea; and if at sea, must have bad weather; and if the ships are not fit to stand bad weather they are useless." Then only he was satisfied and at ease when he had the enemy in view. Mr. Elliot, our minister at Naples, seems at this time to have proposed to send a confidential Frenchman³ to him with information. "I should be very happy," he replied, "to receive authentic intelligence of the destination of the French squadron, their route, and time of sailing.

¹ A captain-generalcy on the northeastern coast of Spain.

² In accordance with the laws between nations regarding neutral powers.

³ "A confidential Frenchman," i.e., a Frenchman who enjoyed his confidence.

Anything short of this is useless; and I assure your excellency that I would not, upon any consideration, have a Frenchman in the fleet, except as a prisoner. I put no confidence in them. You think yours good; the Queen¹ thinks the same; I believe they are all alike. Whatever information you can get me I shall be very thankful for; but not a Frenchman comes here. Forgive me, but my mother hated the French.”²

M. Latouche Treville, who had commanded at Boulogne, commanded now at Toulon. “He was sent for on purpose,” said Nelson, “as he beat me at Boulogne, to beat me again; but he seems very loath to try.” One day, while the main body of our fleet was out of sight of land, Rear Admiral Campbell, reconnoitering with the Canopus, Donnegal, and Amazon, stood in close to the port; and M. Latouche, taking advantage of a breeze which sprang up, pushed out with four ships of the line and three heavy frigates, and chased him about four leagues. The Frenchman, delighted at having found himself in so novel a situation, published a boastful account, affirming that he had given chase to the whole British fleet, and that Nelson had fled before him! Nelson thought it due to the Admiralty to send home a copy of the Victory's log³ upon this occasion. As for himself, he said, if his character was not established by that time for not being apt to run away, it was not worth his while to put the world right. “If this fleet gets fairly up with M. Latouche,” said he to one of his correspondents, “his letter, with all his ingenuity, must be different from his last. We had fancied that we chased him into Toulon; for, blind as I am, I could see his water line, when he clued⁴ his topsails up, shutting in Sépet.⁵ But from the time of his meeting Captain Hawker, in the Isis, I

¹ Of Naples.

² Nelson implies that he inherited the hatred.

³ The history of a ship's progress.

⁴ Hauled up the topsails by the clue lines in order to furl.

⁵ Cape Sépet, about three miles from Toulon, at the entrance to the roadsteads of that city.

never heard of his acting otherwise than as a poltroon and a liar. Contempt is the best mode of treating such a miscreant." In spite, however, of contempt, the impudence of this Frenchman half angered him. He said to his brother: "You will have seen Latouche's letter,—how he chased me and how I ran. I keep it; and if I take him, by heaven, he shall eat it!"

Nelson, who used to say that in sea affairs nothing is impossible and nothing improbable, feared the more that this Frenchman might get out and elude his vigilance because he was so especially desirous of catching him, and administering to him his own lying letter in a sandwich. M. Latouche, however, escaped him in another way. He died, according to the French papers, in consequence of walking so often up to the signal post upon Sépet to watch the British fleet. "I always pronounced that would be his death," said Nelson. "If he had but come out and fought me, it would at least have added ten years to my life." The patience with which he had watched Toulon he spoke of truly as a perseverance at sea which had never been surpassed. From May, 1803, to August, 1805, he himself went out of his ship but three times; each of those times was upon the King's service, and neither time of absence exceeded an hour.

The weather had been so unusually severe that, he said, the Mediterranean seemed altered. It was his rule never to contend with the gales, but either run to the southward to escape their violence, or furl all the sails and make the ships as easy as possible. The men—though he said flesh and blood could hardly stand it—continued in excellent health, which he ascribed in great measure to a plentiful supply of lemons and onions. For himself, he thought he could only last till the battle was over. One battle more it was his hope that he might fight. "However," said he, "whatever happens, I have run a glorious race." He was afraid of blindness; and this was the only evil which he could not contemplate without unhappiness. More alarming symptoms he regarded with less apprehension, describing his own "shattered carcass" as in the worst plight of any in the fleet; and he says:

“I have felt the blood gushing up the left side of my head, and the moment it covers the brain I am fast asleep.” The fleet was in worse trim than the men; but when he compared it with the enemy’s, it was with a right English feeling.¹ “The French fleet yesterday,” said he, in one of his letters, “was to appearance in high feather, and as fine as paint could make them; but when they may sail or where they may go, I am very sorry to say is a secret I am not acquainted with. Our weather-beaten ships, I have no fear, will make their sides like a plum pudding.”²

Hostilities at length commenced between Great Britain and Spain. That country, whose miserable government made her subservient to France, was once more destined to lavish her resources and her blood in furtherance of the designs of a perfidious ally. The immediate occasion of the war was the seizure of four treasure ships by the English. The act was perfectly justifiable, for those treasures were intended to furnish means for France; but the circumstances which attended it were as unhappy as they were unforeseen. Four frigates had been dispatched to intercept them. They met with an equal force. Resistance, therefore, became a point of honor on the part of the Spaniards, and one of their ships soon blew up, with all on board. Had a stronger squadron been sent, this deplorable catastrophe might have been spared,—a catastrophe which excited not more indignation in Spain than it did grief in those who were its unwilling instruments in the English government and in the English people. On the 5th of October³ this unhappy affair occurred, and Nelson was not apprised of it till the 12th of the ensuing month. He had, indeed, sufficient mortification at the breaking out of this Spanish war,—an event which, it might reasonably have been supposed, would amply enrich the officers of the Mediterranean, and repay them for the severe and unremitting duty on which they had been so long employed. But of this harvest they were deprived, for Sir John Orde was sent with a small squadron and a separate command to Cadiz. Nelson's feelings were never wounded so deeply as now. "I had thought," said he, writing in the first flow and freshness of indignation—"I fancied,—but nay, it must have been a dream, an idle dream; yet, I confess it, I did fancy that I had done my country service; and thus they use me! And under what circumstances, and with what pointed aggravation! Yet, if I know my own thoughts, it is not for myself, nor on my own account chiefly, that I feel the sting and the disappointment. No! it is for my brave officers,—for my noble-minded friends and comrades. Such a gallant set of fellows! Such a band of brothers! My heart swells at the thought of them."

¹ “A right English feeling,” i.e., exultation in the excellence of the British navy.

² “Like a plum pudding,” i.e., studded with shot as a pudding with plums.

³ 1804.

War between Spain and England was now declared; and on the 18th of January the Toulon fleet, having the Spaniards to coöperate with them, put to sea. Nelson was at anchor off the coast of Sardinia,—where the Maddalena Islands¹ form one of the finest harbors in the world,—when, at three in the afternoon of the 19th, the Active and Seahorse frigates brought this long-hoped-for intelligence. They had been close to the enemy at ten on the preceding night, but lost sight of them in about four hours. The fleet immediately unmoored and weighed, and at six in the evening ran through the strait between Biche and Sardinia,—a passage so narrow that the ships could pass only one at a time, each following the stern lights of its leader. From the position of the enemy when they were last seen it was inferred that they must be bound round the southern end of Sardinia. Signal was made the next morning to prepare for battle. Bad weather came on, baffling the one fleet in its object and the other in its pursuit.

Nelson beat about the Sicilian seas for ten days without obtaining any other information of the enemy than that one of their ships had put into Ajaccio¹ dismasted; and having seen that Sardinia, Naples, and Sicily were safe, believing Egypt to be their destination, for Egypt he ran. The disappointment and distress which he had experienced in his former pursuit of the French through the same seas were now renewed; but Nelson, while he endured these anxious and unhappy feelings, was still consoled by the same confidence as on the former occasion, — that though his judgment might be erroneous, under all circumstances he was right in having formed it. “I have consulted no man,” said he to the Admiralty; “therefore the whole blame of ignorance in forming my judgment must rest with me. I would allow no man to take from me an atom of my glory had I fallen in with the French fleet, nor do I desire any man to partake any of the responsibility. All is mine, right or wrong.” Then, stating the grounds upon which he had proceeded, he added: “At this moment of sorrow I still feel that I have acted right.” In the same spirit he said to Sir Alexander Ball: “When I call to remembrance all the circumstances, I approve, if nobody else does, of my own conduct.”

¹ There is but one island of this name, La Maddalena. The other island meant is Caprera. They are east of the northern extremity of Sardinia.

Baffled thus, he bore up for Malta, and met intelligence from Naples that the French, having been dispersed in a gale, had put back to Toulon. From the same quarter, he learned that a great number of saddles and muskets had been embarked, and this confirmed him in his opinion that Egypt was their destination. That they should have put back in consequence of storms which he had weathered gave him a consoling sense of British superiority. “These gentlemen,” said he, “are not accustomed to a Gulf of Lyons gale; we have buffeted them for one and twenty months, and not carried away a spar.” He, however, who had so often braved these gales was now, though not mastered by them, vexatiously thwarted and impeded; and on February 27th he was compelled to anchor in Pulla Bay, in the Gulf of Cagliari.²

¹ The capital and a western seaport of Corsica. Also the birthplace of Napoleon.

² On the southern coast of Sardinia.

From the 21st of January the fleet had remained ready for battle, without a bulkhead¹ up night or day. He anchored here, that he might not be driven to leeward. As soon as the weather moderated he put to sea again; and after again beating about against contrary winds, another gale drove him to anchor in the Gulf of Palma² on the 8th of March. This he made his rendezvous. He knew that the French troops still remained embarked, and wishing to lead them into a belief that he was stationed upon the Spanish coast, he made his appearance off Barcelona with that intent.

About the end of the month he began to fear that the plan of the expedition was abandoned; and sailing once more towards his old station off Toulon, on the 4th of April he met the Phœbe, with news that Villeneuve³ had put to sea on the last of March with eleven ships of the line, seven frigates, and two brigs. When last seen they were steering towards the coast of Africa. Nelson first covered the channel between Sardinia and Barbary, so as to satisfy himself that Villeneuve was not taking the same route for Egypt which Gantheaume⁴ had taken before him when he attempted to carry reënforcements there. Certain of this, he bore up on the 7th for Palermo, lest the French should have passed to the north of Corsica, and he dispatched cruisers⁵ in all directions. On the 11th he felt assured that they were not gone down the Mediterranean; and sending off frigates to Gibraltar, to Lisbon, and to Admiral Cornwallis, who commanded the squadron off Brest, he endeavored to get to the westward, beating against westerly winds.

After five days, a neutral gave intelligence that the French had

¹ A partition which is commonly taken down when preparing for battle.

² "Gulf of Palma," i.e., the Bay of Palma, on the southern coast of Majorca, the central Balearic island.

³ The French admiral (1763-1806) now in command.

⁴ The year after he had carried Bonaparte to France, Gantheaume commanded a division which conveyed aid to the Egyptian army. In going from Brest to Toulon he captured an English corvette, frigate, and cutter.

⁵ Armed vessels, sent out in this instance to reconnoiter.

been seen off Cape de Gatte¹ on the 7th. It was soon afterwards ascertained that they had passed the Straits of Gibraltar on the day following; and Nelson, knowing that they might already be half way to Ireland or to Jamaica, exclaimed that he was miserable. One gleam of comfort only came across him in the reflection that his vigilance had rendered it impossible for them to undertake any expedition in the Mediterranean.

Eight days after this certain intelligence had been obtained he describes his state of mind thus forcibly in writing to the governor of Malta: "My good fortune, my dear Ball, seems flown away. I cannot get a fair wind or even a side wind. Dead foul!² dead foul! But my mind is fully made up what to do when I leave the Straits, supposing there is no certain account of the enemy's destination. I believe this ill luck will go near to kill me; but as these are times for exertion, I must not be cast down, whatever I may feel." In spite of every exertion which could be made by all the zeal and all the skill of British seamen, he did not get in sight of Gibraltar till the 30th of April, and the wind was then so adverse that it was impossible to pass the gut.³ He anchored in Mazari Bay, on the Barbary shore; obtained supplies from Tetuan;⁴ and when, on the 5th, a breeze from the eastward sprang up at last, sailed once more, hoping to hear of the enemy from Sir John Orde, who commanded off Cadiz, or from Lisbon. "If nothing is heard of them," said he to the Admiralty, "I shall probably think the rumors which have been spread are true, that their object is the West Indies; and in that case I think it my duty to follow them,—or to the antipodes, should I believe that to be their destination." At the time when this resolution was taken, the physician of the fleet had ordered him to return to England before the hot months.

Nelson had formed his judgment of their destination, and

¹ "Cape de Gatte," i.e., Cape de Gata, the southeastern point of Spain.

² "Dead foul," i.e., wholly obstructive.

³ A narrow passage of water; here the channel between Spain and Africa.

⁴ A town in the northern part of Morocco, near the Bay of Mazari.

made up his mind accordingly, when Donald Campbell, at that time an admiral in the Portuguese service,—the same person who had given important tidings to Earl St. Vincent of the movements of that fleet from the capture of which he won his title,—a second time gave timely and momentous intelligence to the flag of his country. He went on board the Victory and communicated to Nelson his certain knowledge that the combined Spanish and French fleets were bound for the West Indies. Hitherto all things had favored the enemy. While the British commander was beating up against strong southerly and westerly gales, they had wind to their wish from the northeast, and had done in nine days what he was a whole month in accomplishing.

Villeneuve, finding the Spaniards at Carthagena were not in a state of equipment to join him, dared not wait, but hastened on to Cadiz. Sir John Orde necessarily retired at his approach. Admiral Gravina, with six Spanish ships of the line and two French, came out to him, and they sailed without a moment's loss of time. They had about three thousand French troops on board, and fifteen hundred Spanish; six hundred were under orders, expecting them at Martinique, and one thousand at Guadaloupe.¹ General Lauriston commanded the troops. The combined fleet now consisted of eighteen sail of the line, six forty-four gun frigates, one of twenty-six guns, three corvettes, and a brig. They were joined afterwards by two French line-of-battle ships, and one forty-four. Nelson pursued them with ten sail of the line and three frigates. "Take you a Frenchman apiece," said he to his captains, "and leave me the Spaniards; when I haul down my colors I expect you to do the same, and not till then."

The enemy had five and thirty days' start; but he calculated that he should gain eight or ten days upon them by his exertions. May 15th he made Madeira, and on June 4th reached Barbadoes, whither he had sent dispatches before him, and where he found Admiral Cochrane, with two ships, part of our squadron in those seas being at Jamaica. He found here, also, accounts that the combined fleets had been seen from St. Lucia on the 28th, standing to the southward, and that Tobago¹ and Trinidad were their objects. This Nelson doubted; but he was alone in his opinion, and yielded it with these foreboding words: "If your intelligence proves false, you lose me the French fleet."

¹ A French West India island.

Sir William Myers offered to embark here with two thousand troops; they were taken on board, and the next morning he sailed for Tobago. Here accident confirmed the false intelligence which had, whether from intention or error, misled him. A merchant at Tobago, in the general alarm, not knowing whether this fleet was friend or foe, sent out a schooner to reconnoiter, and acquaint him by signal. The signal which he had chosen happened to be the very one which had been appointed by Colonel Shipley, of the engineers, to signify that the enemy were at Trinidad; and as this was at the close of day, there was no opportunity of discovering the mistake. An American brig was met with about the same time, the master of which, with that propensity to deceive the English and assist the French in any manner which has been but too common among his countrymen,² affirmed that he had been boarded off Grenada³ a few days before by the French, who were standing towards the Bocas⁴ of Trinidad. This fresh intelligence removed all doubts. The ships were cleared for action before daylight, and Nelson entered the Bay of Paria on the 7th, hoping and expecting to make the mouths of the Orinoco as famous in the annals of the British navy as those of the Nile. Not an enemy was there; and it was discovered that accident and artifice had combined to lead him so far to leeward that there could have been little hope of fetching to windward of Grenada for any other fleet. Nelson, however, with skill and

¹ A British West India island, northeast of and nearest to Trinidad.

² During the Revolutionary War, and for some time thereafter, France was the ally of the struggling Americans.

³ A British West India island, northwest of Tobago.

⁴ The Spanish word for mouths; hence, openings, straits which separate the island from the mainland.

exertions never exceeded and almost unexampled, bore for that island.

Advices met him on the way that the combined fleets, having captured the Diamond Rock,¹ were then at Martinique, on the 4th, and were expected to sail that night for the attack of Grenada. On the 9th Nelson arrived off that island, and there learned that they had passed to leeward of Antigua² the preceding day, and taken a homeward-bound convoy. Had it not been for false information—upon which Nelson had acted reluctantly, and in opposition to his own judgment—he would have been off Fort Royal³ just as they were leaving it, and the battle would have been fought on the spot where Rodney defeated De Grasse.⁴ This he remembered in his vexation; but he had saved the colonies, and above two hundred ships laden for Europe, which would else have fallen into the enemy's hands; and he had the satisfaction of knowing that the mere terror of his name had effected this, and had put to flight the allied enemies, whose force nearly doubled that before which they fled. That they were flying back to Europe he believed, and for Europe he steered in pursuit on the 13th, having disembarked the troops at Antigua, and taking with him the Spartiate, 74,—the only addition to the squadron with which he was pursuing so superior a force.

Five days afterwards the Amazon brought intelligence that she had spoke⁵ a schooner, who had seen them, on the evening of the 15th, steering to the north, and, by computation, eighty-seven leagues off. Nelson's diary at this time denotes his great anxiety and his perpetual and all-observing vigilance: "June 21. Midnight, nearly calm; saw three planks, which I think came from the French fleet. Very miserable, which is very foolish." On

¹ A rock jutting from the sea to the southwest of Martinique.

² One of the more northern British West India islands.

³ Or Fort-de-France, a fortified town on the west coast of Martinique, taken by Rodney in 1762.

⁴ See page 37. Dominica is near Martinique.

⁵ Old usage for spoken; communicated with by signals.

the 17th of July he came in sight of Cape St. Vincent, and steered for Gibraltar. "June¹ 18th," his diary says, "Cape Spartel² in sight, but no French fleet, nor any information about them. How sorrowful this makes me! But I cannot help myself." The next day he anchored at Gibraltar; and on the 20th, says he, "I went on shore for the first time since June 16th, 1803; and from having my foot out of the Victory, two years, wanting ten days."

Here he communicated with his old friend Collingwood, who, having been detached with a squadron when the disappearance of the combined fleets and of Nelson in their pursuit was known in England, had taken his station off Cadiz. He thought that Ireland was the enemy's ultimate object; that they would now liberate the Ferrol³ squadron, which was blocked up by Sir Robert Calder, call for the Rochefort⁴ ships, and then appear off Ushant⁵ with three or four and thirty sail, there to be joined by the Brest fleet. With this great force he supposed they would make for Ireland—the real mark and bent of all their operations; and their flight to the West Indies, he thought, had been merely undertaken to take off Nelson's force, which was the great impediment to their undertaking.

Collingwood was gifted with great political penetration. As yet, however, all was conjecture concerning the enemy; and Nelson, having victualed and watered at Tetuan, stood for Ceuta⁶ on the 24th, still without information of their course. Next day intelligence arrived that the Curieux brig had seen them on the 19th standing to the northward. He proceeded off Cape St. Vincent, rather cruising for intelligence than knowing whither to betake himself; and here a case occurred that more than any other

¹ July is probably meant.

² A cape on the African coast, at the western end of the Strait of Gibraltar.

³ A seaport and naval arsenal, on the northwestern coast of Spain.

⁴ A fortified military seaport of France, on the Bay of Biscay.

⁵ A coast island of France, southwest of Brest.

⁶ Opposite Gibraltar, on the African coast.

event in real history resembles those whimsical proofs of sagacity which Voltaire, in his "Zadig,"¹ has borrowed from the Orientals. One of our frigates spoke an American, who, a little to the westward of the Azores, had fallen in with an armed vessel, appearing to be a dismasted privateer, deserted by her crew, which had been run on board by another ship, and had been set fire to; but the fire had gone out. A log book and a few seamen's jackets were found in the cabin, and these were brought to Nelson. The log book closed with these words: "Two large vessels in the west-northwest;" and this led him to conclude that the vessel had been an English privateer, cruising off the Western Islands.² But there was in this book a scrap of dirty paper filled with figures. Nelson, immediately upon seeing it, observed that the figures were written by a Frenchman, and after studying this for a while, said: "I can explain the whole. The jackets are of French manufacture, and prove that the privateer was in possession of the enemy. She had been chased and taken by the two ships that were seen in the west-northwest. The prize master,³ going on board in a hurry, forgot to take with him his reckoning;⁴ there is none in the log book; and the dirty paper contains her work for the number of days since the privateer last left Corvo,⁵ with an unaccounted-for run, which I take to have been the chase, in his endeavor to find out her situation by back reckonings. By some mismanagement, I conclude, she was run on board of by one of the enemy's ships, and dismasted. Not liking delay (for I am satisfied that those

¹ Voltaire (1694-1778), an illustrious French writer, satirized the follies of his time in a series of romances. The one Southey refers to begins: "In the time of King Moabdar there was at Babylon a young man named Zadig," i.e., "In the time of Louis XV. there was at Paris a young man named Voltaire." Zadig was sagacious in reasoning from the tracks of a horse that he galloped well, had small hoofs, was five feet high, etc.

² The Azores.

³ "Prize master," i.e., the French officer in command after the capture.

⁴ The calculation of the latitude and longitude, which had been made by the ship he left and entered in its log book.

⁵ A town on the northernmost island of the Azores.

two ships were the advanced ones of the French squadron), and fancying we were close at their heels, they set fire to the vessel, and abandoned her in a hurry. If this explanation be correct, I infer from it that they are gone more to the northward; and more to the northward I will look for them." This course, accordingly, he held, but still without success. Still persevering, and still disappointed, he returned near enough to Cadiz to ascertain that they were not there; traversed the Bay of Biscay; and then, as a last hope, stood over for the northwest coast of Ireland, against adverse winds, till, on the evening of the 12th of August, he learned that they had not been heard of there. Frustrated thus in all his hopes, after a pursuit to which, for its extent, rapidity, and perseverance, no parallel can be produced, he judged it best to reënforce the Channel fleet with his squadron, lest the enemy, as Collingwood apprehended, should bear down upon Brest with their whole collected force. On the 15th he joined Admiral Cornwallis off Ushant. No news had yet been obtained of the enemy; and on the same evening he received orders to proceed, with the Victory and Superb, to Portsmouth.

CHAPTER IX.

Sir Robert Calder falls in with the combined fleets. — They form a junction with the Ferrol squadron, and get into Cadiz. — Nelson is reappointed to the command. — Battle of Trafalgar, victory, and death of Nelson.

AT Portsmouth Nelson at length found news of the combined fleet. Sir Robert Calder, who had been sent out to intercept their return, had fallen in with them on the 22d of July, sixty leagues west of Cape Finisterre. Their force consisted of twenty sail of the line, three fifty-gun ships, five frigates, and two brigs; his, of fifteen line-of-battle ships, two frigates, a cutter, and a lugger. After an action of four hours he had captured an 84 and a 74, and then thought it necessary to bring to the squadron, for the purpose of securing their prizes. The hostile fleets remained in sight of each other till the 26th, when the enemy bore away. The capture of two ships from so superior a force would have been considered as no inconsiderable victory a few years earlier; but Nelson had introduced a new era in our naval history, and the nation felt, respecting this action, as he had felt on a somewhat similar occasion: they regretted that Nelson, with his eleven ships, had not been in Sir Robert Calder's place; and their disappointment was generally and loudly expressed.

Frustrated as his own hopes had been, Nelson had yet the high satisfaction of knowing that his judgment had never been more conspicuously approved, and that he had rendered essential service to his country by driving the enemy from those islands where they expected there could be no force capable of opposing them. The West India merchants in London, as men whose interests were more immediately benefited, appointed a deputation to express their thanks for his great and judicious exertions. It was now his intention to rest awhile from his labors, and recruit himself, after all his fatigues and cares, in the society of those whom he loved. All his stores were brought up from the Victory, and he found in his house at Merton the enjoyment which he had anticipated.

Many days had not elapsed before Captain Blackwood, on his way to London with dispatches, called on him at five in the morning. Nelson, who was already dressed, exclaimed the moment he saw him, "I am sure you bring me news of the French and Spanish fleets! I think I shall yet have to beat them!" They had refitted at Vigo¹ after the indecisive action with Sir Robert Calder, then proceeded to Ferrol, brought out the squadron from thence, and with it entered Cadiz in safety. "Depend on it, Blackwood," he repeatedly said, "I shall yet give M. Villeneuve a drubbing." But when Blackwood had left him, he wanted resolution to declare his wishes to Lady Hamilton and his sisters, and endeavored to drive away the thought. He had done enough, he said; "let the man trudge it who has lost his budget!"¹

¹ An Atlantic seaport of Spain, near the northern border of Portugal.

His countenance belied his lips; and as he was pacing one of the walks in the garden which he used to call the quarter-deck, Lady Hamilton came up to him and told him she saw he was uneasy. He smiled and said: No, that he was as happy as possible; he was surrounded by his family, his health was better since he had been on shore, and he would not give sixpence to call the King his uncle. She replied that she did not believe him; that she knew he was longing to get at the combined fleets; that he considered them as his own property; that he would be miserable if any man but himself did the business; and that he ought to have them as the price and reward of his two years' long watching and his hard chase. "Nelson," said she, "however we may lament your absence, offer your services; they will be accepted, and you will gain a quiet heart by it. You will have a glorious victory, and then you may return here and be happy." He looked at her with tears in his eyes: "Brave Emma! Good Emma! If there were more Emmas, there would be more Nelsons."

His services were as willingly accepted as they were offered; and Lord Barham,² giving him the list of the navy, desired him to choose his own officers. "Choose yourself, my lord," was his reply; "the same spirit actuates the whole profession; you cannot choose wrong." Lord Barham then desired him to say what ships, and how many, he would wish in addition to the fleet which he was going to command, and said they should follow him as soon as each was ready. No appointment was ever more in unison with the feelings and judgment of the whole nation. They, like Lady Hamilton, thought that the destruction of the combined fleets ought properly to be Nelson's work; that he who had been

"Half around the sea-girt ball,
The hunter of the recreant Gaul,"³

¹ Bag or pouch, and probably in this proverb purse.

² First Lord of the Admiralty.

³ SOUTHEY'S NOTE.— Songs of Trafalgar.

ought to reap the spoils of the chase, which he had watched so long and so perseveringly pursued.

Unremitting exertions were made to equip the ships which he had chosen, and especially to refit the Victory, which was once more to bear his flag. Before he left London he called at his upholsterer's, where the coffin which Captain Hallowell had given him was deposited, and desired that its history might be engraven upon the lid, saying it was highly probable that he might want it on his return. He seemed, indeed, to have been impressed with an expectation that he should fall in the battle. In a letter to his brother, written immediately after his return, he had said: "We must not talk of Sir Robert Calder's battle, — I might not have done so much with my small force. If I had fallen in with them, you might probably have been a lord¹ before I wished; for I know they meant to make a dead set at the Victory." Nelson had once regarded the prospect of death with gloomy satisfaction; it was when he anticipated the upbraidings of his wife and the displeasure of his venerable father. The state of his feelings now was expressed in his private journal in these words: "Friday night (September 13), at half-past ten, I drove from dear, dear Merton, where I left all which I hold dear in this world, to go to serve my King and country. May the great God whom I adore enable me to fulfill the expectations of my country! And if it is His good pleasure that I should return, my thanks will never cease being offered up to the throne of His mercy. If it is His good providence to cut short my days upon earth, I bow with the greatest submission, relying that He will protect those so dear to me whom I may leave behind! His will be done! Amen, Amen, Amen!"

Early on the following morning he reached Portsmouth, and having dispatched his business on shore, endeavored to elude the populace by taking a byway to the beach; but a crowd collected in his train, pressing forward to obtain a sight of his face; many were in tears, and many knelt down before him and blessed him as he passed. England has had many heroes, but never one who so entirely possessed the love of his fellow-countrymen as Nelson. All men knew that his heart was as humane as it was fearless; that there was not in his nature the slightest alloy of selfishness or cupidity; but that, with perfect and entire devotion, he served his country with all his heart and with all his soul and with all his strength; and therefore they loved him as truly and as fervently as he loved England. They pressed upon the parapet to gaze after him when his barge pushed off and he was returning their cheers by waving his hat. The sentinels, who endeavored to prevent them from trespassing upon this ground, were wedged among the crowd; and an officer who, not very prudently upon such an occasion, ordered them to drive the people down with their bayonets was compelled speedily to retreat, for the people would not be debarred from gazing till the last moment upon the hero, the darling hero of England.

¹ His brother would come into his title, since Nelson had no son.

He arrived off Cadiz on the 29th of September, — his birthday. Fearing that if the enemy knew his force they might be deterred from venturing to sea, he kept out of sight of land, desired Colingwood to fire no salute and hoist no colors, and wrote to Gibraltar to request that the force of the fleet might not be inserted there in the "Gazette." His reception in the Mediterranean fleet was as gratifying as the farewell of his countrymen at Portsmouth; the officers who came on board to welcome him forgot his rank as commander in their joy at seeing him again.¹

¹ "I joined the fleet late on the evening of the 28th of September, but could not communicate with them until the next morning. I believe my arrival was most welcome, not only to the commander of the fleet, but also to every individual in it; and when I came to explain to them the 'Nelson touch,' it was like an electric shock. Some shed tears, all approved. 'It was new—it was singular—it was simple!' and from admirals downward it was repeated: 'It must succeed, if ever they will allow us to get at them! You are, my lord, surrounded by friends whom you inspire with confidence.' Some may be Judases; but the majority are certainly much pleased with my commanding them." (From Nelson's letter to Lady Hamilton, October 1, 1805.)

On the day of his arrival, Villeneuve received orders to put to sea at the first opportunity. Villeneuve, however, hesitated when he heard that Nelson had resumed the command. He called a council of war, and their determination was that it would not be expedient to leave Cadiz unless they had reason to believe themselves stronger by one third than the British force. In the public measures of this country secrecy is seldom practicable¹ and seldom attempted; here, however, by the precautions of Nelson and the wise measures of the Admiralty, the enemy were for once kept in ignorance; for as the ships appointed to reënforce the Mediterranean fleet were dispatched singly,—each as soon as it was ready,—their collected number was not stated in the newspapers, and their arrival was not known to the enemy. But the enemy knew that Admiral Louis, with six sail, had been detached for stores and water to Gibraltar. Accident also contributed to make the French admiral doubt whether Nelson himself had actually taken the command. An American lately arrived from England maintained that it was impossible, for he had seen him only a few days before in London, and at that time there was no rumor of his going again to sea.

The station which Nelson had chosen was some fifty or sixty miles to the west of Cadiz, near Cape St. Mary's.² At this distance he hoped to decoy the enemy out, while he guarded against the danger of being caught with a westerly wind near Cadiz, and driven within the Straits. The blockade of the port was rigorously enforced, in hopes that the combined fleet might be forced to sea by want. The Danish vessels, therefore, which were carrying provisions from the French ports in the bay,³ under the name of Danish property, to all the little ports from Ayamonte to Algeciras,⁴ from whence they were conveyed in coasting boats to Cadiz, were seized. Without this proper exertion of power the blockade would have been rendered nugatory by the advantage thus taken of the neutral flag. The supplies from France were thus effectually cut off.

¹ Because of its free institutions, the popular form of government, and the right of Parliament to discuss public measures.

² Cape de Santa Maria, off southern Portugal. ³ Probably, Bay of Biscay.

⁴ "From Ayamonte to Algeciras," i.e., along the whole southern Atlantic coast of Spain, to the Bay of Gibraltar.

There was now every indication that the enemy would speedily venture out. Officers and men were in the highest spirits at the prospect of giving them a decisive blow, such, indeed, as would put an end to all further contest upon the seas. Theatrical amusements were performed every evening in most of the ships, and "God save the King" was the hymn with which the sports concluded. "I verily believe," said Nelson (writing on the 6th of October), "that the country will soon be put to some expense on my account,—either a monument or a new pension and honors; for I have not the smallest doubt but that a very few days—almost hours—will put us in battle. The success no man can insure; but for the fighting them, if they can be got at, I pledge myself. The sooner the better; I don't like to have these things upon my mind."

At this time he was not without some cause of anxiety. He was in want of frigates,—the eyes of the fleet, as he always called them,¹—to the want of which the enemy before were indebted for their escape, and Bonaparte for his arrival in Egypt. He had only twenty-three ships,—others were on the way, but they might come too late; and though Nelson never doubted of victory, mere victory was not what he looked to; he wanted to annihilate the enemy's fleet. The Carthagea squadron might effect a junction with this fleet on the one side, and, on the other, it was to be expected that a similar attempt would be made by the French from Brest,—in either case a formidable contingency to be apprehended by the blockading force. The Rochefort squadron did push out, and had nearly caught the Agamemnon and L'Aimable, on their way to reënforce the British admiral.

¹ "I have only two frigates to watch them, and not one with the fleet. I am most exceedingly anxious for more eyes, and hope the Admiralty are hastening them for me. The last fleet was lost me for want of frigates; God forbid this should." (From Nelson's letter to Viscount Castlereagh, October 5, 1805.)

Yet Nelson at this time weakened his own fleet. He had the unpleasant task to perform of sending home Sir Robert Calder, whose conduct was to be made the subject of a court-martial in consequence of the general dissatisfaction which had been felt and expressed at his imperfect victory. Sir Robert Calder and Sir John Orde, Nelson believed to be the only two enemies whom he had ever had in his profession; and from that sensitive delicacy which distinguished him, this made him the more scrupulously anxious to show every possible mark of respect and kindness to Sir Robert. He wished to detain him till after the expected action, when the services which he might perform, and the triumphant joy which would be excited, would leave nothing to be apprehended from an inquiry into the previous engagement. Sir Robert, however, whose situation was very painful, did not choose to delay a trial from the result of which he confidently expected a complete justification; and Nelson, instead of sending him home in a frigate, insisted on his returning in his own ninety-gun ship,¹ ill as such a ship could at that time be spared. Nothing could be more honorable than the feeling by which Nelson was influenced; but at such a crisis it ought not to have been indulged.

On the 9th, Nelson sent Collingwood what he called, in his diary, the "Nelson touch."² "I send you," said he, "my plan of attack, as far as a man dare venture to guess at the very uncertain position the enemy may be found in; but it is to place you perfectly at ease respecting my intentions, and to give full scope to your judgment for carrying them into effect. We can, my dear Coll, have no little jealousies. We have only one great object in view,—that of annihilating our enemies and getting a glorious peace for our country. No man has more confidence in another than I have in you, and no man will render your services more justice than your very old friend Nelson and Bronte.” The order of sailing was to be the order of battle: the fleet in two lines, with an advanced squadron of eight of the fastest sailing two-deckers. The second in command, having the entire direction of his line, was to break through the enemy about the twelfth ship from their rear; he would lead through the center, and the advanced squadron was to cut off three or four ahead of the center. This plan was to be adapted to the strength of the enemy, so that they should always be one fourth superior to those whom they cut off. Nelson said that his admirals and captains, knowing his precise object to be that of a close and decisive action, would supply any deficiency of signals, and act accordingly. “In case signals cannot be seen or clearly understood, no captain can do wrong if he places his ship alongside that of an enemy.”

¹ "Sir Robert felt so much, even at the idea of being removed from his own ship, which he commanded in the face of the fleet, that I much fear I shall incur the censure of the Board of Admiralty, without your lordship's influence with the members of it. I may be thought wrong, as an officer, to disobey the orders of the Admiralty by not insisting on Sir Robert Calder's quitting the Prince of Wales for the Dreadnought, and for parting with a ninety-gun ship before the force arrives which their lordships have judged necessary; but I trust that I shall be considered to have done right as a man, and to a brother officer in affliction. My heart could not stand it, and so the thing must rest. I shall submit to the wisdom of the Board to censure me or not, as to them may seem best for the service; I shall bow with all due respect to their decision." (From Nelson's letter to Lord Barham, September 30, 1805.)

² By "touch" Nelson here means his characteristic method, or plan, of attack.

One of the last orders of this admirable man was that the name and family of every officer, seaman, and marine who might be killed or wounded in action should be, as soon as possible, returned to him, in order to be transmitted to the chairman of the Patriotic Fund, that the case might be taken into consideration for the benefit of the sufferer or his family.

About half-past nine in the morning of the 19th, the Mars, being the nearest to the fleet of the ships which formed the line of communication with the frigates inshore, repeated the signal that the enemy were coming out of port. The wind was at this time very light, with partial breezes, mostly from the south-southwest. Nelson ordered the signal to be made for a chase in the south-cast quarter. About two the repeating¹ ships announced that the enemy were at sea. All night the British fleet continued under all sail, steering to the southeast. At daybreak they were in the entrance of the Straits, but the enemy were not in sight. About seven, one of the frigates made signal that the enemy were bearing north. Upon this the Victory hove to, and shortly afterwards Nelson made sail again to the northward. In the afternoon the wind blew fresh from the southwest, and the English began to fear that the foe might be forced to return to port. A little before sunset, however, Blackwood, in the Euryalus, telegraphed² that they appeared determined to go to the westward; "and that," said the admiral in his diary, "they shall not do if it is in the power of Nelson and Bronte to prevent them." Nelson had signified to Blackwood that he depended upon him to keep sight of the enemy. They were observed so well that all their motions were made known to him; and as they wore twice, he inferred that they were aiming to keep the port of Cadiz open,³ and would retreat there as soon as they saw the British fleet. For this reason he was very careful not to approach near enough to be seen by them during the night.

At daybreak the combined fleets were distinctly seen from the Victory's deck, formed in a close line of battle ahead, on the star-board tack, about twelve miles to leeward, and standing to the south. Our fleet consisted of twenty-seven sail of the line and four frigates; theirs, of thirty-three, and seven large frigates. Their superiority was greater in size and weight of metal than in numbers. They had four thousand troops on board; and the best riflemen who could be procured—many of them Tyrolese—were dispersed through the ships. Little did the Tyrolese and little did the Spaniards at that day imagine what horrors the wicked tyrant whom they served was preparing for their country!⁴

¹ Repeating the signals for the information of the fleet.

² Signaled; communicated by signs.

³ Free from the English ships.

⁴ In 1809, when the Austrian Archduke Charles summoned the German

Soon after daylight Nelson came upon deck. The 21st of October was a festival in his family, because on that day his uncle, Captain Suckling, in the Dreadnought, with two other line-of-battle ships, had beaten off a French squadron of four sail of the line and three frigates. Nelson, with that sort of superstition from which few persons are entirely exempt, had more than once expressed his persuasion that this was to be the day of his battle also; and he was well pleased at seeing his prediction about to be verified. The wind was now from the west,—light breezes, with a long, heavy swell. Signal was made to bear down upon the enemy in two lines, and the fleet set all sail. Collingwood, in the Royal Sovereign, led the lee line¹ of thirteen ships; the Victory led the weather line of fourteen. Having seen that all was as it should be, Nelson retired to his cabin, and wrote this prayer:—

“May the Great God, whom I worship, grant to my country, and for the benefit of Europe in general, a great and glorious victory; and may no misconduct in any one tarnish it; and may humanity after victory be the predominant feature in the British fleet! For myself individually, I commit my life to Him that made me; and may His blessing alight on my endeavors for serving my country faithfully! To Him I resign myself; and the just cause which is intrusted to me to defend. Amen, amen, amen!”

Having thus discharged his devotional duties, he annexed, in the same diary, the following remarkable writing:

“October 21, 1805. — Then in sight of the combined fleets of France and Spain, distant about ten miles.

“Whereas the eminent services of Emma Hamilton, widow of people to wage war against the power of France, Tyrol rose in arms. Between Austria and France a peace was soon concluded; the Tyrolese continued their resistance. Napoleon subdued them and had their leader, Hofer, shot.

¹ “Lee line,” i.e., the line furthest from the direction whence the wind blows. It is opposed to the weather line.

the Right Honorable Sir William Hamilton, have been of the very greatest service to my King and my country, to my knowledge, without ever receiving any reward from either our King or country :

“ First, That she obtained the King of Spain’s letter, in 1796, to his brother, the King of Naples, acquainting him of his intention to declare war against England ; from which letter the ministry sent out orders to the then Sir John Jervis to strike a stroke, if opportunity offered, against either the arsenals of Spain or her fleets. That neither of these was done is not the fault of Lady Hamilton ; the opportunity might have been offered.

“ Secondly, The British fleet under my command could never have returned the second time to Egypt had not Lady Hamilton’s influence with the Queen of Naples caused letters to be wrote¹ to the governor of Syracuse, that he was to encourage the fleet’s being supplied with everything, should they put into any port in Sicily. We put into Syracuse, and received every supply ; went to Egypt, and destroyed the French fleet.

“ Could I have rewarded these services I would not now call upon my country ; but as that has not been in my power, I leave Emma, Lady Hamilton, therefore, a legacy to my King and country, that they will give her an ample provision to maintain her rank in life.

“ I also leave to the beneficence of my country my adopted daughter, Horatia Nelson Thompson ; and I desire she will use in future the name of Nelson only.

“ These are the only favors I ask of my King and country at this moment when I am going to fight their battle. May God bless my King and country, and all those I hold dear ! My relations it is needless to mention ; they will, of course, be amply provided for.

“ NELSON AND BRONTE.

“ Witness { Henry Blackwood.
 { T. M. Hardy.”

¹ Old usage for written.

The child of whom this writing speaks was believed to be his daughter, and so, indeed, he called her the last time that he pronounced her name. She was then about five years old, living at Merton under Lady Hamilton's care. The last minutes which Nelson passed at Merton were employed in praying over this child as she lay sleeping. A portrait of Lady Hamilton hung in his cabin; and no Catholic ever beheld the picture of his patron saint with devouter reverence. The undisguised and romantic passion with which he regarded it amounted almost to superstition; and when the portrait was now taken down in clearing for action, he desired the men who removed it to "take care of his guardian angel." In this manner he frequently spoke of it, as if he believed there were a virtue in the image. He wore a miniature of her also next his heart.

Blackwood went on board the Victory about six. He found him in good spirits, but very calm,—not in that exhilaration which he had felt upon entering into battle at Aboukir and at Copenhagen; he knew that his own life would be particularly aimed at, and seems to have looked for death with almost as sure an expectation as for victory. His whole attention was fixed upon the enemy. They tacked to the northward, and formed their line on the larboard tack, thus bringing the shoals of Trafalgar and San Pedro under the lee of the British, and keeping the port of Cadiz open for themselves. This was judiciously done; and Nelson, aware of all the advantages which it gave them, made signal to prepare to anchor.

Villeneuve was a skillful seaman, worthy of serving a better master and a better cause. His plan of defense was as well conceived and as original as the plan of attack. He formed the fleet in a double line, every alternate ship being about a cable's length to windward of her second ahead and astern. Nelson, certain of a triumphant issue to the day, asked Blackwood what he should consider as a victory. That officer answered that considering the handsome way in which battle was offered by the enemy, their apparent determination for a fair trial of strength, and the situation of the land, he thought it would be a glorious result if fourteen were captured. He replied, "I shall not be satisfied with less than twenty." Soon afterwards he asked him if he did not think there was a signal wanting. Captain Blackwood made answer that he thought the whole fleet seemed very clearly to understand what they were about. These words were scarcely spoken before that signal was made which will be remembered as long as the language or even the memory of England shall endure, — Nelson's last signal: "England expects every man to do his duty!" It was received throughout the fleet with a shout of answering acclamation, made sublime by the spirit which it breathed and the feeling which it expressed. "Now," said Lord Nelson, "I can do no more. We must trust to the Great Disposer of all events and the justice of our cause. I thank God for this great opportunity of doing my duty."

He wore that day, as usual, his admiral's frockcoat, bearing on the left breast four stars¹ of the different orders with which he was invested. Ornaments which rendered him so conspicuous a mark for the enemy were beheld with ominous apprehensions by his officers. It was known that there were riflemen on board the French ships, and it could not be doubted but that his life would be particularly aimed at. They communicated their fears to each other; and the surgeon, Mr. Beatty,² spoke to the chaplain, Dr. Scott, and to Mr. Scott, the public secretary, desiring that some person would entreat him to change his dress or cover the stars; but they knew that such a request would highly displease him. "In honor I gained them," he had said when such a thing had been hinted to him formerly, "and in honor I will die with them." Mr. Beatty, however, would not have been deterred by any fear of exciting his displeasure from speaking to him himself upon a subject in which the weal of England as well as the life of Nelson was concerned, but he was ordered from the deck before he could find an opportunity. This was a point upon which Nelson's officers knew that it was hopeless to remonstrate or reason with him. But both Blackwood and his own captain, Hardy, represented to him how advantageous to the fleet it would be for him to keep out of action as long as possible; and he consented at last to let the Leviathan and the Téméraire, which were sailing abreast of the Victory, be ordered to pass ahead. Yet even here the last infirmity of this noble mind¹ was indulged; for these ships could not pass ahead if the Victory continued to carry all her sail; and so far was Nelson from shortening sail, that it was evident he took pleasure in pressing on, and rendering it impossible for them to obey his own orders. A long swell was setting into the Bay of Cadiz; our ships, crowding all sail, moved majestically before it, with light winds from the southwest. The sun shone on the sails of the enemy; and their well-formed line, with their numerous three-deckers, made an appearance which any other assailants would have thought formidable. But the British sailors only admired the beauty and the splendor of the spectacle; and in full confidence of winning what they saw, they remarked to each other what a fine sight yonder ships would make at Spithead!²

¹ The stars were embroidered on the breast of the coat. They were of the Order of the Bath, and of three other orders, conferred by the King of Sicily, the Sultan of Turkey, and the Emperor of Russia.

² SOUTHEY'S NOTE.—In this part of the work I have chiefly been indebted to this gentleman's narrative of Lord Nelson's death, a document as interesting as it is authentic.

The French admiral, from the Bucentaure, beheld the new manner in which his enemy was advancing, Nelson and Collingwood each leading his line; and pointing them out to his officers, he is said to have exclaimed that such conduct could not fail to be successful. Yet Villeneuve had made his own dispositions with the utmost skill, and the fleets under his command waited

¹ "Fame is the spur which the clear spirit doth raise
(That last infirmity of noble mind)
To scorn delights, and live laborious days."

MILTON'S Lycidas, lines 70-72.

² A roadstead, — a rendezvous of the British navy off the Isle of Wight.

for the attack with perfect coolness. Ten minutes before twelve they opened their fire. Eight or nine of the ships immediately ahead of the Victory, and across her bows, fired single guns at her, to ascertain whether she was yet within their range. As soon as Nelson perceived that their shot passed over him, he desired Blackwood, and Captain Prowse, of the Sirius, to repair to their respective frigates, and on their way to tell all the captains of the line-of-battle ships that he depended on their exertions, and that if by the prescribed mode of attack they found it impracticable to get into action immediately, they might adopt whatever they thought best, provided it led them quickly and closely alongside an enemy. As they were standing on the front of the poop, Blackwood took him by the hand, saying he hoped soon to return and find him in possession of twenty prizes. He replied: "God bless you, Blackwood; I shall never see you again."

Nelson's column was steered about two points¹ more to the north than Collingwood's, in order to cut off the enemy's escape into Cadiz; the lee line, therefore, was first engaged. "See," cried Nelson, pointing to the Royal Sovereign, as she steered right for the center of the enemy's line, cut through it astern of the Santa Anna, three-decker, and engaged her at the muzzle of her guns on the starboard side — "see how that noble fellow Collingwood carries his ship into action!" Collingwood, delighted at being first in the heat of the fire, and knowing the feelings of his commander and old friend, turned to his captain and exclaimed, "Rotherham, what would Nelson give to be here!" Both these brave officers, perhaps, at this moment thought of Nelson with gratitude for a circumstance which had occurred on the preceding day. Admiral Collingwood, with some of the captains, having gone on board the Victory to receive instructions, Nelson inquired of him where his captain was, and was told in reply that they were not upon good terms with each other. "Terms!" said Nelson; "good terms with each other!" Immediately he sent a boat for Captain Rotherham, led him as soon as he arrived to Collingwood, and saying, "Look, yonder are the enemy!" bade them shake hands like Englishmen.

¹ The card of a compass is divided into thirty-two equal parts by lines drawn from the center to the circumference; and the points of intersection with the circumference are called "points" of the compass.

ARRANGEMENT OF THE FLEETS AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE BATTLE OF TRAFALGAR

The enemy continued to fire a gun at a time at the Victory till they saw that a shot had passed through her main topgallant sail; then they opened their broadsides, aiming chiefly at her rigging, in the hope of disabling her before she could close with them. Nelson, as usual, had hoisted several flags, lest one should be shot away. The enemy showed no colors till late in the action, when they began to feel the necessity of having them to strike. For this reason the Santissima Trinidad—Nelson's old acquaintance, as he used to call her—was distinguishable only by her four decks, and to the bow of this opponent he ordered the Victory to be steered.

Meantime an incessant raking fire was kept up upon the Victory. The admiral's secretary was one of the first who fell; he was killed by a cannon shot while conversing with Hardy. Captain Adair, of the marines, with the help of a sailor, endeavored to remove the body from Nelson's sight, who had a great regard for Mr. Scott; but he anxiously asked, "Is that poor Scott that's gone?" and being informed that it was indeed so, exclaimed, "Poor fellow!" Presently a double-headed shot struck a party of marines who were drawn up on the poop, and killed eight of them; upon which Nelson immediately desired Captain Adair to disperse his men round the ship, that they might not suffer so much from being together. A few minutes afterwards a shot struck the forebrace bits¹ on the quarter-deck, and passed between Nelson and Hardy, a splinter from the bit tearing off Hardy's buckle and bruising his foot. Both stopped and looked anxiously at each other, each supposing the other to be wounded. Nelson then smiled and said, "This is too warm work, Hardy, to last long."

¹ Frames to which the ropes, or braces, of the foresail were fastened.

The Victory had not yet returned a single gun; fifty of her men had been by this time killed or wounded, and her main-topmast, with all her studding sails and their booms, shot away. Nelson declared that in all his battles he had seen nothing which surpassed the cool courage of his crew on this occasion. At four minutes after twelve she opened her fire from both sides of her deck. It was not possible to break the enemy's line without running on board one of their ships. Hardy informed him of this, and asked which he would prefer. Nelson replied: "Take your choice, Hardy; it does not signify much." The master was then ordered to put the helm to port, and the Victory ran on board the Redoubtable just as her tiller ropes¹ were shot away. The French ship received her with a broadside, then instantly let down her lower-deck ports, for fear of being boarded through them, and never afterwards fired a great gun during the action. Her tops, like those of all the enemy's ships, were filled with riflemen. Nelson never placed musketry in his tops; he had a strong dislike to the practice, not merely because it endangers setting fire to the sails, but also because it is a murderous sort of warfare by which individuals may suffer, and a commander now and then be picked off, but which never can decide the fate of a general engagement.

Captain Harvey, in the Téméraire, fell on board the Redoubtable on the other side. Another enemy was in like manner on board the Téméraire, so that these four ships formed as compact a tier as if they had been moored together, their heads lying all the same way. The lieutenants of the Victory, seeing this, depressed their guns of the middle and lower decks, and fired with a diminished charge, lest the shot should pass through and injure the Téméraire. And because there was danger that the Redoubtable might take fire from the lower-deck guns,—the muzzles of which touched her side when they were run out,²—the fireman of each gun stood ready with a bucket of water, which, as soon as the gun was discharged, he dashed into the hole made by the shot. An incessant fire was kept up from the Victory from both sides, her larboard guns playing upon the Bucentaure and the huge Santissima Trinidad.

¹ "Tiller ropes," i.e., the ropes leading from the tiller bar or head to the wheel, by which the ship was steered.

² For the firing. The guns recoiled when discharged.

It had been part of Nelson's prayer that the British fleet might be distinguished by humanity in the victory which he expected. Setting an example himself, he twice gave orders to cease firing upon the Redoubtable, supposing that she had struck, because her great guns were silent; for as she carried no flag, there was no means of instantly ascertaining the fact. From this ship, which he had thus twice spared, he received his death. A ball fired from her mizzen-top—which in the then situation of the two vessels was not more than fifteen yards from that part of the deck where he was standing—struck the epaulet on his left shoulder about a quarter after one, just in the heat of the action. He fell upon his face, on the spot which was covered with his poor secretary's blood.

Hardy, who was a few steps from him, turning round, saw three men raising him up. "They have done for me at last, Hardy," said he. "I hope not!" cried Hardy. "Yes," he replied, "my backbone is shot through." Yet even now, not for a moment losing his presence of mind, he observed, as they were carrying him down the ladder, that the tiller ropes which had been shot away were not yet replaced, and ordered that new ones should be rove¹ immediately; then, that he might not be seen by the crew, he took out his handkerchief and covered his face and his stars. Had he but concealed these badges of honor from the enemy, England, perhaps, would not have had cause to receive with sorrow the news of the battle of Trafalgar.

The cockpit was crowded with wounded and dying men, over whose bodies he was with some difficulty conveyed, and laid upon a pallet in the midshipmen's berth. It was soon perceived, upon examination, that the wound was mortal. This, however, was concealed from all except Captain Hardy, the chaplain, and the medical attendants. He himself, being certain, from the sensation in his back and the gush of blood which he felt momentarily within his breast, that no human care could avail him, insisted that the surgeon should leave him and attend to those to whom he might be useful; "for," said he, "you can do nothing for me." All that could be done was to fan him with paper, and frequently to give him lemonade to alleviate his intense thirst. He was in great pain, and expressed much anxiety for the event of the action, which now began to declare itself.

¹ Passed through the holes or openings, as would be necessary to put new tiller ropes in place.

As often as a ship struck, the crew of the Victory hurrahed; and at every hurrah a visible expression of joy gleamed in the eyes and marked the countenance of the dying hero. But he became impatient to see Captain Hardy; and as that officer, though often sent for, could not leave the deck, Nelson feared that some fatal cause prevented him, and repeatedly cried: "Will no one bring Hardy to me? He must be killed! He is surely dead!"

An hour and ten minutes elapsed from the time when Nelson received his wound before Hardy could come to him. They shook hands in silence, Hardy in vain struggling to suppress the feelings of that most painful and yet sublimest moment. "Well, Hardy," said Nelson, "how goes the day with us?" "Very well," replied Hardy; "ten ships have struck, but five of their van have tacked, and show an intention of bearing down upon the Victory. I have called two or three of our fresh ships round, and have no doubt of giving them a drubbing." "I hope," said Nelson, "none of our ships have struck?" Hardy answered there was no fear of that. Then, and not till then, Nelson spoke of himself. "I am a dead man, Hardy," said he; "I am going fast; it will be all over with me soon. Come nearer to me. Let my dear Lady Hamilton have my hair and all other things belonging to me." Hardy observed that he hoped Mr. Beatty could yet hold out some prospect of life. "Oh no!"

he replied; "it is impossible. My back is shot through. Beatty will tell you so." Captain Hardy then once more shook hands with him, and with a heart almost bursting, hastened upon deck.

By this time all feeling below the breast was gone, and Nelson, having made the surgeon ascertain this, said to him: "You know I am gone. I know it. I feel something rising in my breast"—putting his hand on his left side—"which tells me so." And upon Beatty's inquiring whether his pain was very great, he replied that it was so great that he wished he was dead. "Yet," said he in a lower voice, "one would like to live a little longer, too!" And after a few minutes, in the same undertone, he added: "What would become of poor Lady Hamilton if she knew my situation?" Next to his country she occupied his thoughts.

Captain Hardy, some fifty minutes after he had left the cockpit, returned, and again taking the hand of his dying friend and commander, congratulated him on having gained a complete victory. How many of the enemy were taken he did not know, as it was impossible to perceive them distinctly, but fourteen or fifteen at least. "That's well," cried Nelson, "but I bargained for twenty." And then in a stronger voice he said, "Anchor, Hardy; anchor." Hardy, upon this, hinted that Admiral Collingwood would take upon himself the direction of affairs. "Not while I live, Hardy!" said the dying Nelson, ineffectually endeavoring to raise himself from the bed. "Do you anchor." His previous order¹ for preparing to anchor had shown how clearly he foresaw the necessity of this. Presently, calling Hardy back, he said to him in a low voice, "Don't throw me overboard!"² And he desired that he might be buried by his parents, unless it should please the King to order otherwise. Then, reverting to private feelings: "Take care of my dear Lady Hamilton, Hardy; take care of poor Lady Hamilton. Kiss me, Hardy," said he. Hardy knelt down and kissed his cheek, and Nelson said, "Now I am satisfied. Thank God, I have done my duty!" Hardy stood over him in silence for a moment or two, then knelt again and kissed his forehead. "Who is that?" said Nelson; and being informed, he replied, "God bless you, Hardy." And Hardy then left him,—forever.

¹ See page 276.

² In burial at sea. He had before this expressed a wish to be buried in St. Paul's rather than Westminster, because of the swamp nature of the soil upon which the latter is built, and the speedier destruction of the memorial.

Nelson now desired to be turned upon his right side, and said: "I wish I had not left the deck, for I shall soon be gone." Death was indeed rapidly approaching. He said to the chaplain, "Doctor, I have not been a great sinner." And, after a short pause, "Remember that I leave Lady Hamilton and my daughter Horatia as a legacy to my country." His articulation now became difficult, but he was distinctly heard to say, "Thank God, I have done my duty!" These words he had repeatedly pronounced, and they were the last words which he uttered. He expired at thirty minutes after four,—three hours and a quarter after he had received his wound.

Within a quarter of an hour after Nelson was wounded, about fifty of the Victory's men fell by the enemy's musketry. They, however, on their part, were not idle; and it was not long before there were only two Frenchmen left alive in the mizzen-top of the Redoubtable. One of them was the man who had given the fatal wound; he did not live to boast of what he had done. An old quartermaster had seen him fire, and easily recognized him, because he wore a glazed cocked hat and a white frock. This quartermaster and two midshipmen, Mr. Collingwood and Mr. Pollard, were the only persons left on the Victory's poop; the two midshipmen kept firing at the top, and he supplied them with cartridges. One of the Frenchmen, attempting to make his escape down the rigging, was shot by Mr. Pollard, and fell on the poop. But the old quartermaster, as he cried out, "That's he, that's he," and pointed at the other, who was coming forward to fire again; received a shot in his mouth and fell dead. Both the midshipmen then fired at the same time, and the fellow dropped in the top. When they took possession of the prize they went into the mizzen-top and found him dead, with one ball through his head and another through his breast.

The Redoubtable struck within twenty minutes after the fatal shot had been fired from her. During that time she had been twice on fire,—in her forechains and in her fore-castle. The French, as they had done in other battles, made use in this of fireballs and other combustibles,—implements of destruction which other nations, from a sense of honor and humanity, have laid aside; which add to the sufferings of the wounded, without determining the issue of the combat; which none but the cruel would employ; and which never can be successful against the brave.

Once they succeeded in setting fire, from the Redoubtable, to some ropes and canvas on the Victory's booms. The cry ran through the ship and reached the cockpit; but even this dreadful cry produced no confusion; the men displayed that perfect self-possession in danger by which English seamen are characterized. They extinguished the flames on board their own ship, and then hastened to extinguish them in the enemy by throwing buckets of water from the gangway. When the Redoubtable had struck, it was not practicable to board her from the Victory; for though the two ships touched, the upper works of both fell in so much that there was a great space between their gangways; and she could not be boarded from the lower or middle decks, because her ports were down. Some of our men went to Lieutenant Quilliam, and offered to swim under her bows and get up there; but it was thought unfit to hazard brave lives in this manner.

What our men would have done from gallantry some of the crew of the Santissima Trinidad did to save themselves. Unable to stand the tremendous fire of the Victory, whose larboard guns played against this great four-decker, and not knowing how else to escape them, nor where else to betake themselves for protection, many of them leapt overboard and swam to the Victory, and were actually helped up her sides by the English during the action.

The Spaniards began the battle with less vivacity than their unworthy allies, but they continued it with greater firmness. The Argonauta and Bahama were defended till they had each lost about four hundred men; the San Juan Nepomuceno lost three hundred and fifty. Often as the superiority of British courage has been proved against France upon the seas, it was never more conspicuous than in this decisive conflict. Five of our ships were engaged muzzle to muzzle with five of the French. In all five the Frenchmen lowered their lower-deck ports and deserted their guns, while our men continued deliberately to load and fire till they had made the victory secure.

Once amidst his sufferings Nelson had expressed a wish that he were dead; but immediately the spirit subdued the pains of death, and he wished to live a little longer, doubtless that he might hear the completion of the victory which he had seen so gloriously begun. That consolation, that joy, that triumph, was afforded him. He lived to know that the victory was decisive; and the last guns which were fired at the flying enemy were heard a minute or two before he expired.

The ships which were thus flying were four of the enemy's van—all French—under Rear Admiral Dumanoir. They had borne no part in the action; and now, when they were seeking safety in flight, they fired not only into the Victory and Royal Sovereign as they passed, but poured their broadsides into the Spanish captured ships; and they were seen to back their topsails for the purpose of firing with more precision. The indignation of the Spaniards at this detestable cruelty from their allies—for whom they had fought so bravely, and so profusely bled—may well be conceived. It was such that when, two days after the action, seven of the ships which had escaped into Cadiz came out in hopes of retaking some of the disabled prizes, the prisoners in the Argonauta in a body offered their services to the British prize master to man the guns against any of the French ships, saying that if a Spanish ship came alongside they would quietly go below; but they requested that they might be allowed to fight the French, in resentment for the murderous usage which they had suffered at their hands. Such was their earnestness, and such the implicit confidence which could be placed in Spanish honor, that the offer was accepted, and they were actually stationed at the lower-deck guns.

Dumanoir and his squadron were not more fortunate than the fleet from whose destruction they fled; they fell in with Sir Richard Strachan, who was cruising for the Rochefort squadron, and were all taken. In the better days of France, if such a crime could then have been committed, it would have received an exemplary punishment from the French government; under Bonaparte it was sure of impunity, and perhaps might be thought deserving of reward. But if the Spanish court had been independent, it would have become us to have delivered Dumanoir and his captains up to Spain, that they might have been brought to trial and hanged in sight of the remains of the Spanish fleet.

The total British loss in the battle of Trafalgar amounted to 1,587. Twenty of the enemy struck, but it was not possible to anchor the fleet, as Nelson had enjoined. A gale came on from the southwest; some of the prizes went down, some went on shore, one effected its escape into Cadiz, others were destroyed; four only were saved, and those by the greatest exertions. The wounded Spaniards were sent ashore, an assurance being given that they should not serve till regularly exchanged; and the Spaniards, with a generous feeling which would not perhaps have been found in any other people, offered the use of their hospitals for our wounded, pledging the honor of Spain that they should be carefully attended there. When the storm after the action drove some of the prizes upon the coast, they declared that the English who were thus thrown into their hands should not be considered as prisoners of war; and the Spanish soldiers gave up their own beds to their shipwrecked enemies. The Spanish vice admiral, Alava, died of his wounds. Villeneuve was sent to England and permitted to return to France. The French government say that he destroyed himself on the way to Paris, dreading the consequences of a court-martial; but there is every reason to believe that the tyrant, who never acknowledged the loss of the battle of Trafalgar, added Villeneuve to the numerous victims of his murderous policy.

It is almost superfluous to add that all the honors which a grateful country could bestow were heaped upon the memory of Nelson. His brother was made an earl, with a grant of £6,000 per year; £10,000 were voted to each of his sisters; and £100,000 for the purchase of an estate.¹ A public funeral was decreed, and a public monument. Statues and monuments also were voted by most of our principal cities. The leaden coffin in which he was brought home was cut in pieces, which were distributed as relics of St. Nelson,—so the gunner of the Victory called them; and when, at his interment, his flag was about to be lowered into the grave, the sailors who assisted at the ceremony with one accord rent it in pieces, that each might preserve a fragment while he lived.

The death of Nelson was felt in England as something more than a public calamity; men started at the intelligence, and turned pale, as if they had heard of the loss of a dear friend. An object of our admiration and affection, of our pride and of our hopes, was suddenly taken from us, and it seemed as if we had never till then known how deeply we loved and revered him. What the country had lost in its great naval hero—the greatest of our own and of all former times—was scarcely taken into the account of grief. So perfectly, indeed, had he performed his part, that the maritime war, after the battle of Trafalgar, was considered at an end. The fleets of the enemy were not merely defeated, but destroyed ; new navies must be built, and a new race of seamen reared for them, before the possibility of their invading our shores could again be contemplated. It was not, therefore, from any selfish reflection upon the magnitude of our loss that we mourned for him ; the general sorrow was of a higher character.

¹ “The name of the estate thus purchased was changed from Stanlynch to Trafalgar; and the total sums granted by Parliament to Lord Nelson’s family were £2,000 per annum to his widow for life; £5,000 per annum forever to the person who might succeed to the earldom of Nelson; . . . £99,000 for the purchase of an estate which is annexed to the title; and £15,000 to each of his sisters. Yet of all these splendid gifts, not one shilling was bestowed upon either of the two individuals whom Nelson loved above all other human beings,—one of them his own child,—and whom in the most affecting words he had solemnly bequeathed to his country.” (SIR N. H. NICOLAS.)

The people of England grieved that funeral ceremonies, public monuments, and posthumous rewards were all which they could now bestow upon him whom the King, the legislature, and the nation would alike have delighted to honor ; whom every tongue would have blessed ; whose presence in every village through which he might have passed would have wakened the church bells, have given schoolboys a holiday, have drawn children from their sports to gaze upon him, and " old men from the chimney corner " to look upon Nelson ere they died. The victory of Trafalgar was celebrated, indeed, with the usual forms of rejoicing, but they were without joy ; for such already was the glory of the British navy, through Nelson's surpassing genius, that it scarcely seemed to receive any addition from the most signal victory that ever was achieved upon the seas ; and the destruction of this mighty fleet, by which all the maritime schemes of France were totally frustrated, hardly appeared to add to our security or strength ; for while Nelson was living to watch the combined squadrons of the enemy we felt ourselves as secure as now, when they are no longer in existence.

There was reason to suppose, from the appearances upon opening the body, that in the course of nature he might have attained, like his father, to a good old age. Yet he cannot be said to have fallen prematurely whose work was done ; nor ought he to be lamented who died so full of honors and at the height of human fame. The most triumphant death is that of the martyr ; the most awful that of the martyred patriot ; the most splendid that of the hero in the hour of victory ; and if the chariot and the horses of fire¹ had been vouchsafed for Nelson's translation, he could scarcely have departed in a brighter blaze of glory. He has left us not, indeed, his mantle of inspiration, but a name and an example which are at this hour inspiring hundreds of the youth of England,—a name which is our pride, and an example which will continue to be our shield and our strength. Thus it is that the spirits of the great and the wise continue to live and to act after them, verifying, in this sense, the language of the old mythologist:—

¹ 2 Kings ii. 11-13.

Τοὶ μὲν δαίμονές εἰσι, Διὸς μεγάλου διὰ βουλάς
Ἐσθλοὶ, ἑπιχθόνιοι, φύλακες θνητῶν ἀνθρώπων.¹

¹ They are good angels, through the will of mighty Zeus, living upon earth, guardians of mortal men. (HESIOD'S Works and Days, lines 122, 123.)

APPENDIX.

MEMOIR OF NELSON'S SERVICES.

WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

PORT MAHON, October 15, 1799.

HORATIO NELSON, son of the Rev. Edmund Nelson, rector of Burnham Thorpe, in the county of Norfolk, and of Catherine, his wife, daughter of Dr. Suckling, prebendary of Westminster, whose grandmother was sister of Sir Robert Walpole, Earl of Oxford.

I was born September 29, 1758, in the parsonage house; was sent to the high school at Norwich, and afterwards removed to North Walsham, from whence, on the disturbance with Spain relative to the Falkland Islands, I went to sea with my uncle, Captain Maurice Suckling, in the Raisonnable, of 64 guns. But the business with Spain being accommodated, I was sent in a West India ship, belonging to Hibbert, Purrier, and Horton, with Mr. John Rathbone, who had formerly been in the navy in the Dreadnought with Captain Suckling. From this voyage I returned to the Triumph, at Chatham, in July, 1772; and if I did not improve in my education, I came back a practical seaman, with a horror of the royal navy, and with a saying then constant with seamen, "Aft the most honor, forward the best man!" It was many weeks before I got in the least reconciled to a man-of-war, so deep was the prejudice rooted; and what pains were taken to instill this erroneous principle in a young mind!

However, as my ambition was to be a seaman, it was always held out as a reward, that if I attended well to my navigation, I should go in the cutter and decked longboat, which was attached to the commanding officer's ship at Chatham. Thus by degrees I became a good pilot, for vessels of that description, from Chatham to the Tower of London down to the Swin and the North Foreland, and confident of myself amongst rocks and sands, which has been many times since of great comfort to me. In this way I was trained until the expedition towards the North Pole was fitted out, when, although no boys were allowed to go in the ships (as of no use), yet nothing could prevent my using my interest to go with Captain Lutwidge, in the Carcass; and as I fancied I was to fill a man's place, I begged I might be his cockswain, which, finding my ardent desire for going with him, Captain Lutwidge complied with, and has continued the strictest friendship to this moment. Lord Mulgrave, whom I then first knew, maintained his kindest friendship and regard to the last moment of his life. When the boats were fitting out to quit the two ships blocked up in the ice, I exerted myself to have the command of a four-oared cutter raised upon, which was given me, with twelve men, and I prided myself that I could navigate her better than any other boat in the ship.

On our arrival in England, being paid off October 15th, I found that a squadron was fitting out for the East Indies; and nothing less than such a distant voyage could in the least satisfy my desire of maritime knowledge. I was placed in the Seahorse, 20 guns, with Captain Farmer, and watched in the foretop; from whence, in time, I was placed on the quarter-deck, having, in the time I was in this ship, visited almost every part of the East Indies, from Bengal to Bassorah. Ill-health induced Sir Edward Hughes, who had always shown me the greatest kindness, to send me to England in the Dolphin, 20 guns, with Captain James Pigot, whose kindness at that time saved my life. This ship was paid off at Woolwich, on the 24th of September, 1776. On the 26th I received an order from Sir James Douglass, who commanded at Portsmouth, to act as lieutenant of the Worcester, 64, Captain Mark Robinson, who was ordered to Gibraltar with a convoy. In this ship I was at sea with convoys until April 2, 1777, and in very bad weather. But although my age might have been sufficient cause for not entrusting me with the charge of a watch, yet Captain Robinson used to say "he felt as easy when I was upon deck as any officer in the ship."

On the 8th of April, 1777, I passed my examination as a lieutenant, and received my commission the next day, as second lieutenant of the Lowestoffe frigate, of 32 guns, Captain (afterwards Lieutenant Governor of Greenwich Hospital) William Locker. In this ship I went to Jamaica; but even a frigate was not sufficiently active for my mind, and I got into a schooner, tender to the Lowestoffe. In this vessel I made myself a complete pilot for all the passages through the keys (islands) situated on the north side of Hispaniola. Whilst in the frigate, an event happened which presaged my character, and as it conveys no dishonor to the officer alluded to, I shall insert it.

Blowing a gale of wind, and a heavy sea, the frigate captured an American letter-of-marque. The first lieutenant was ordered to board her, which he did not do owing to the heavy sea. On his return the captain said: "Have I no officer in the ship who can board the prize?" On which the master ran to the gangway to get into the boat, when I stopped him, saying: "It is my turn now, and if I come back it is yours." This little incident has often occurred to my mind, and I know that it is my disposition that difficulties and dangers do but increase my desire of attempting them.

Sir Peter Parker, soon after his arrival at Jamaica, 1778, took me into his own flagship, the Bristol, as third lieutenant, from which I rose by succession to be the first. Nothing particular happened whilst I was in this ship, which was actively employed off Cape François, it being the commencement of the French war.

On the 8th of December, 1778, I was appointed as commander of the Badger brig, and was first sent to protect the Mosquito shore and the Bay of Honduras from the depredations of the American privateers. Whilst on this service I gained so much on the affections of the settlers that they unanimously voted me their thanks, and expressed their regret on my leaving them, entrusting me to describe to Sir Peter Parker and Sir John Dalling their situation should a war with Spain break out. Whilst I commanded this brig, her Majesty's ship Glasgow, Captain Thomas Lloyd, came into Montego Bay, Jamaica, where the Badger was lying; in two hours afterwards she took fire by a cask of rum, and Captain Lloyd will tell you that it was owing to my exertions, joined to his, that her whole crew were rescued from the flames.

On the 11th of June, 1779, I was made post in the Hinchinbrook, when, being at sea, and Count d'Estaing arriving at Hispaniola with a very large fleet and army from Martinique, an attack on Jamaica was expected. In this critical state I was, by both admiral and general, entrusted with the command of the batteries of Port Royal; and I need not say, as this place was the key to the whole naval force, the town of Kingston, and Spanish Town, the defense of it was the most important post in the whole island.

In January, 1780, an expedition being resolved on against San Juan, I was chosen to direct the sea part of it. Major Polson, who commanded, will tell you of my exertions: how I quitted my ship, carried troops in boats an hundred miles up a river which none but Spaniards, since the buccaneers, had ever ascended. It will then be told how I boarded, if I may be allowed the expression, an outpost of the enemy, situated on an island in the river; that I made batteries, and afterwards fought them, and was principal cause of our success. From this scene I was appointed to the James, 44, at Jamaica, and went to Port Royal in the Victor sloop.

My state of health was now so bad that I was obliged to go to England in the Lion, Hon. W. Cornwallis, captain, whose care and attention again saved my life. In August, 1781, I was commissioned for the Albemarle, and, it would almost be supposed to try my constitution, was kept the whole winter in the North Sea. In April, 1782, I sailed with a convoy for Newfoundland and Quebec, under orders of Captain Thomas Pringle. From Quebec, during a cruise off Boston, I was chased by three French ships of the line and the Isis frigate; as they all beat me in sailing very much, I had no chance left but running them amongst the shoals of St. George's Bank. This alarmed the line-of-battle ships, and they quitted the pursuit; but the frigate continued, and at sunset was little more than gunshot distant, when, the line-of-battle ships being out of sight, I ordered the maintopsail to be laid to the masts; on this the frigate tacked, and stood to rejoin her consorts.

In October I sailed from Quebec with a convoy to New York, where I joined the fleet under Lord Hood; and in November I sailed with him to the West Indies, where I remained until the peace, when I came to England, being directed in my way to attend his royal highness the Duke of Clarence on his visit to the Havana, and was paid off at Portsmouth on July 3d, 1783. In the autumn I went to France, and remained there until the spring of the year 1784, when I was appointed to the Boreas frigate, of 28 guns, and ordered to the Leeward Island station.

This station opened a new scene to the officers of the British navy. The Americans, when colonists, possessed almost all the trade from America to our West India islands, and on the return of peace they forgot, on this occasion, that they became foreigners, and of course had no right to trade in the British colonies. Our governors and customhouse officers pretended that by the Navigation Act they had a right to trade, and all the West Indians wished what was so much for their interest.

Having given governors, customhouse officers, and Americans notice of what I would do, I seized many of their vessels, which brought all parties upon me; and I was persecuted from one island to another, so that I could not leave my ship. But conscious rectitude bore me through it, and I was supported, when the business came to be understood, from home; and I proved, and an Act of Parliament has since established it, that a captain of a man-of-war is in duty bound to support all the maritime laws by his Admiralty commission alone, without becoming a customhouse officer.

In July, 1786, I was left with the command until June, 1787, when I left for England. During the winter his royal highness the Duke of Clarence visited the Leeward Islands in the Pegasus frigate, of which he was captain. And in March this year I married Frances Herbert Nisbet, of the Island of Nevis, by whom I have no children.

The Boreas being paid off at Sheerness on November 30th, I lived at Burnham Thorpe, county of Norfolk, in the parsonage house. In 1790, when the affair with Spain relative to Nootka Sound had nearly involved us in a war, I made use of every interest to get a ship, ay, even a boat, to serve my country, but in vain; there was evidently a prejudice at the Admiralty against me, which I can neither guess at nor in the least account for.

On the 30th of January, 1793, I was commissioned in the handsomest way for the Agamemnon, 64 guns, and was put under the command of that great and excellent officer, Lord Hood, appointed to the command of the Mediterranean. The unbounded confidence on all occasions placed in me by his lordship will show his opinion of my abilities, having served in the command of the seamen landed for the sieges of Bastia and Calvi.

His lordship, in October, 1794, left the Mediterranean to Admiral Hotham, who also honored me with the same confidence. I was in the actions of the 13th and 14th of March, 1795, and 13th of July in the same year. For the share I had in them I refer to the Admiralty letters. I was then appointed by Admiral Hotham to coöperate with the Austrian general De Vins, which I did all the time Admiral Hotham retained the command, until November, when he was superseded by Sir John Jervis, now Earl St. Vincent.

In April, 1796, the commander in chief so much approved of my conduct that he directed me to wear a distinguishing pendant. In June I was removed from the Agamemnon to the Captain, and on the 11th of August had a captain appointed under me. Between April and October, 1796, I was employed in the blockade of Leghorn, taking Porto Ferrajo, the island of Capua, and finally in the evacuation of Bastia; when, having seen the troops in safety to Porto Ferrajo, I joined the admiral in San Fiorenzo Bay, and proceeded with him to Gibraltar; when in December I was sent in La Minerve frigate, Captain George Cockburn, to Porto Ferrajo, to bring down our naval stores, etc. On the passage we captured a Spanish frigate, La Sabina, of 40 guns, twenty-eight eighteen pounders on her main deck, as will appear by my letter.

For an account of what passed from our sailing from Porto Ferrajo on the 29th of January, 1797, to the finish of the action on the 14th of February, I refer to the account published by Colonel Drinkwater. The King, for my conduct, gave me a gold medal, and the city of London a gold box.

In April, 1797, I hoisted my flag as Rear Admiral of the Blue, and was sent to bring down the garrison of Porto Ferrajo; which service performed, I shifted my flag from the Captain to the Theseus on May 27th, and was employed in the command of the inner squadron at the blockade of Cadiz. It was during this period that perhaps my personal courage was more conspicuous than at any other part of my life. In an attack of the Spanish gunboats I was boarded, in my barge, with its common crew of ten men, cockswain, Captain Freemantle, and myself, by the commander of the gunboats; the Spanish barge rowed twenty-six oars, besides officers, — thirty men in the whole. This was a service hand to hand with swords, in which my cockswain, John Sykes, now no more, twice saved my life. Eighteen of the Spaniards being killed, and several wounded, we succeeded in taking their commander.

On the 15th of July, 1797, I sailed for Teneriffe; for the event I refer to my letter on that expedition. Having then lost my right arm, for this loss and my former services his Majesty was pleased to settle on me a pension of £1,000 a year. By some unlucky mismanagement of my arm, I was obliged to go to England, and it was the 13th of December, 1797, before the surgeons pronounced me fit for service. On the 19th of December the Vanguard was commissioned for my flagship. On the 1st of April, 1798, I sailed with a convoy from Spithead; at the back of the Isle of Wight, the wind coming to the westward, I was forced to return to St. Helen's, and finally sailed on the 9th of April, carrying a convoy to Oporto and Lisbon. I joined Earl St. Vincent off Cadiz on April 29th; on the 30th I was ordered to the Mediterranean. I refer to the printed narrative of my proceedings to the close of the battle of the Nile.

On the 22d of September, 1798, I arrived at Naples, and was received as a deliverer by the King, Queen, and the whole kingdom. October 12th the blockade of Malta took place, which has continued without intermission to this day. On the 21st of December, 1798, his Sicilian Majesty and family embarked in the Vanguard, and were carried to Palermo, in Sicily. In March, 1799, I arranged a plan for taking the islands in the Bay of Naples, and for supporting the royalists, who were making head in the kingdom. This plan succeeded in every part. In May I shifted my flag, being promoted to be Rear Admiral of the Red, to the Foudroyant, and was obliged to be on my guard against the French fleets. In June and July, 1799, I went to Naples, and, as his Sicilian Majesty is pleased to say, reconquered his kingdom, and placed him on his throne. On the 9th of August I brought his Sicilian Majesty back to Palermo, having been upwards of four weeks on board of the Foudroyant.

On the 13th, his Sicilian Majesty presented me with a sword magnificently enriched with diamonds, the title of the Duke of Bronte, and annexed to it the fief of Bronte, supposed to be worth £3,000 per annum. On the arrival of the Russian squadron at Naples, I directed Commodore Trowbridge to go with the squadron and blockade closely Civita Vecchia, and to offer the French most favorable conditions if they would evacuate Rome and Civita Vecchia; which terms the French general Grenier complied with, and they were signed on board the Culloden, when a prophecy made to me on my arrival at Naples was fulfilled, viz., that I should take Rome with my ships. Thus may be exemplified by my life, that perseverance in any profession will most probably meet its reward. Without having any inheritance, or having been fortunate in prize money, I have received all the honors of my profession, been created a peer of Great Britain, etc. And I may say to the reader:—

“GO THOU AND DO LIKEWISE.”

CASABIANCA.¹

FELICIA BROWNE HEMANS.

The boy stood on the burning deck,
Whence all but he had fled ;
The flame that lit the battle's wreck
Shone round him o'er the dead.

Yet beautiful and bright he stood,
As born to rule the storm, —
A creature of heroic blood,
A proud, though childlike form.

The flames rolled on ; he would not go Without his father's word ;
That father, faint in death below,
His voice no longer heard.

He called aloud : “ Say, father, say
If yet my task is done ! ”
He knew not that the chieftain lay Unconscious of his son.

“ Speak, father ! ” once again he cried,
“ If I may yet be gone ! ”
And but the booming shots replied,
And fast the flames rolled on.

¹ Young Casabianca, a boy about thirteen years old, son to the admiral of the Orient, remained at his post in the battle of the Nile after the ship had taken fire and all the guns had been abandoned, and perished in the explosion of the vessel when the flames reached the powder.

Upon his brow he felt their breath,
And in his waving hair,
And looked from that lone post of death
In still yet brave despair ;

And shouted but once more aloud,
“ My father, must I stay ? ”
While o'er him fast, through sail and shroud,
The wreathing fires made way.

They wrapped the ship in splendor wild,
They caught the flag on high,
And streamed above the gallant child
Like banners in the sky.

There came a burst of thunder-sound ;
The boy ! — oh, where was he ?
Ask of the winds that far around
With fragments strewed the sea ! —

With mast, and helm, and pennon fair,
That well had borne their part ;
But the noblest thing that perished there
Was that young faithful heart !

BATTLE OF THE BALTIC.

THOMAS CAMPBELL.

Of Nelson and the North,
Sing the glorious day's renown,
When to battle fierce came forth
All the might of Denmark's crown,
And her arms along the deep proudly shone ;
By each gun the lighted brand,
In a bold determined hand,
And the prince of all the land Led them on.

Like leviathans afloat
Lay their bulwarks on the brine ;
While the sign of battle flew
On the lofty British line.
It was ten of April morn by the chime ;
As they drifted on their path
There was silence deep as death ;
And the boldest held his breath
For a time.

But the might of England flushed
To anticipate the scene ;
And her van the fleeter rushed O'er the deadly space between.
"Hearts of oak!" our captains cried, when each gun
From its adamant lips
Spread a death-shade round the ships,
Like the hurricane eclipse
Of the sun.

Again! again! again!

And the havoc did not slack,
Till a feeble cheer the Dane
To our cheering sent us back;
Their shots along the deep slowly boom:
Then ceased; and all is wail,
As they strike the shattered sail,
Or, in conflagration pale,
Light the gloom.

Out spoke the victor then,

As he hailed them o'er the wave:
"Ye are brothers! ye are men!
And we conquer but to save;
So peace instead of death let us bring;
But yield, proud foe, thy fleet,
With the crews, at England's feet,
And make submission meet
To our king."

Then Denmark blessed our chief,

That he gave her wounds repose;
And the sounds of joy and grief
From her people wildly rose,
As death withdrew his shades from the day.
While the sun looked smiling bright
O'er a wide and woful sight,
Where the fires of funeral light
Died away.

Now joy, old England, raise!

For the tidings of thy might,
By the festal cities' blaze,
While the wine cup shines in light;
And yet, amidst that joy and uproar,
Let us think of them that sleep,
Full many a fathom deep,
By thy wild and stormy steep, Elsinore!

Brave hearts ! to Britain's pride
Once so faithful and so true,
On the deck of fame that died
With the gallant good Riou ;
Soft sigh the winds of heaven o'er their graves !
While the billow mournful rolls,
And the mermaid's song condoles,
Singing glory to the souls
Of the brave !

PHILLIPS ACADEMY

3 1867 00052 0325

WELLS BINDERY INC.
WALTHAM, MASS.
NOV. 1957

3

942.07092 N33s
Southey, Robert, 1774-1843.
The life of Nelson

