To the Officers Who Served in the Spanish-American War of 1898

The Navy and the Army, the Volunteers and the Regulars, soldiers from the South and from the North, from the West and from the East—who by their devotion to duty and their country, won the respect and affection of a grateful nation, placed the flag of their country high in the hall of Fame, secured for this Republic its proper place in the tribunal of nations, bound the South and North once more in affectionate brotherhood, and served the great cause of humanity and enlightenment.

NO war was ever entered into with higher principles of action or graver reasons for resorting to the dire conflict of arms, and no nation ever conducted a war with more unselfish motives. The war was the will of the people, the heart-beat of the nation, a sincere and honest appeal for justice, humanity and freedom. The deeds of the brave men who fought it were worthy of its great purpose.

The Navy, by their victories at Manila and Santiago, not only made history, but also prescribed to the world its future tactics. The naval lessons of the war, the two great actions of which were so remarkable and decisive, impressed the whole civilized world with their importance and significance. The battle tactics of our Navy were studied by all the great nations, and the principles deduced have been given a place in the tactics of the future. But, the study of the war from the naval standpoint did not end there: on the one hand, above and beyond the limited domain of tactics, there were principles of strategy involved which demanded careful consideration, and received unstinted praise, from the world's naval strategists; on the other, within and below the sphere of tactics, there were the elements of organization, training and instruction, which made "the man behind the gun" what he was, that called for minute investigation by naval students, as well as the material of the fleet—the ships, the guns, the armor and the machinery—every element of which had answered its purpose so perfectly, and all of which, in design, construction and management, was the work of naval officers.

The work of the Navy in this war was not only complete and glorious victory in battle, where valor and devotion to duty are the leading parts, but it was also a higher crown of glory for those heads whose brain and thought had developed and perfected our new Navy.

The Army, no less than the Navy, won imperishable renown. "The world never saw better troops" was the unsolicited and spontaneous verdict at Santiago of an experienced soldier of one of the great military powers of Europe. But for them it was not all glory. Bravery on the field of battle was their simplest duty, it was but the holiday of their term, the poetry of their work: privation and suffering were their main portion, and waiting their most difficult task. The Spanish-American War brought about no changes in tactics, but it convinced the civilized world that the American soldier had fighting qualities which placed him in the foremost rank of trained soldiers.

The President of the United States, in general orders, has characterized the work of the Army in glowing words:

"It has submitted to no discouragement and halted at no obstacle. Its officers have shown high qualities of command, and its men have shown devotion and discipline. Its splendid virile energy has been accompanied by self-control, patience, and magnanimity. With admirable good temper, sympathy, and loyalty to American ideals, its commanding generals have joined with the civilian agents of the Government in healing the wounds of war.

"The President feels that he expresses the sentiments of all the loyal people of the United States in doing honor to the whole Army which has joined in the performance and shares in the credit of these honorable services."

The small regular army which existed at the outbreak of the war furnished the nucleus about which the war army was constructed. Its training and discipline was the model for the army, and its spirit pervaded the whole. The volunteers, from all sections of the country, and from all ranks of society, brought into the field the patriotism of our people.

The Secretary of War has paid his tribute to volunteers and regulars in terms that should not be forgotten:

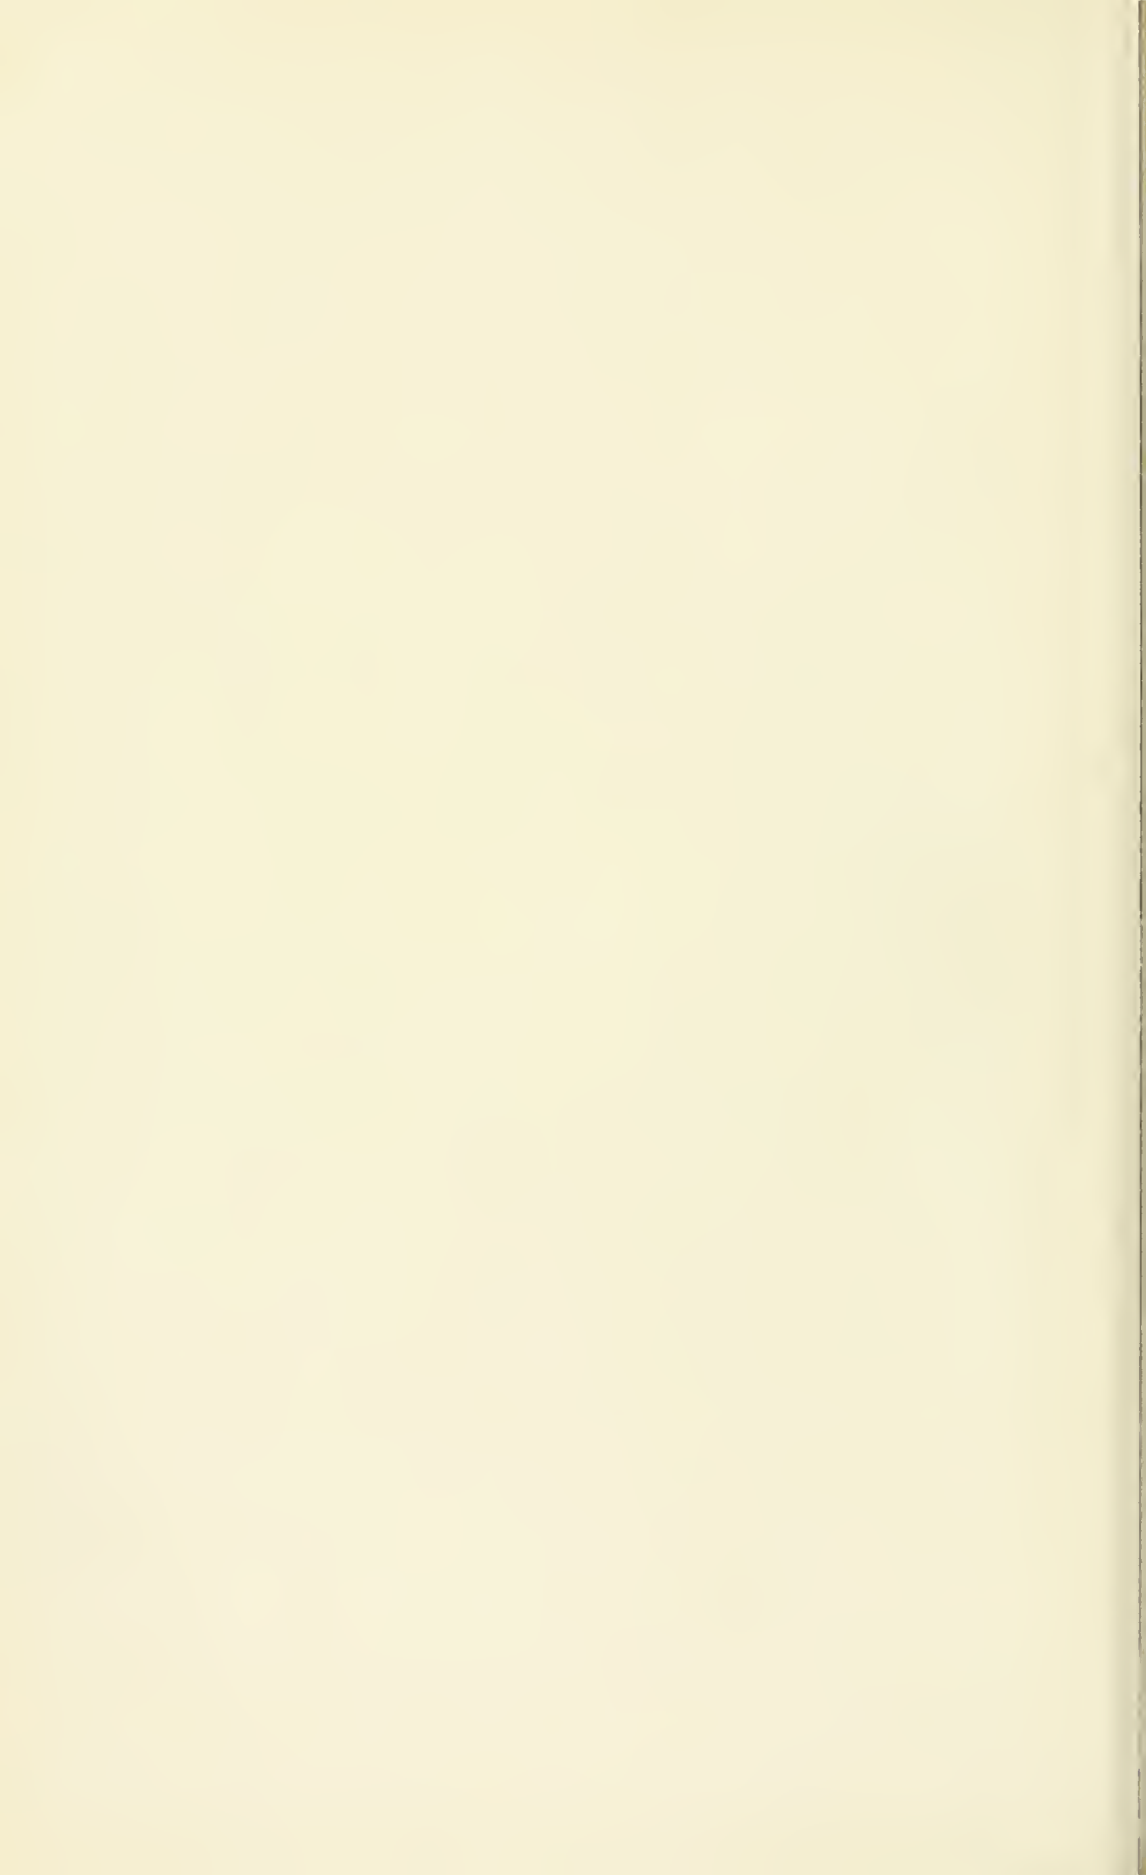

"All honor to the volunteers who have been and who must always be the main support of our country in war. All honor to the genius, the courage, the self-sacrifice of the men, many of whom I see before me now, who have won immortal renown as generals of the volunteer army. They will be the first to say aye when I declare that the formative power, the high standard of conduct, the informing spirit of every American army is to be found in the Regular Army of the United States.

"All honor to the officers of the American Army who in true republican fashion have worked their way up from the ranks. All honor to the officers who, turning aside from the allurements of wealth and honor in civil life, have been appointed as civilians to the army, as volunteers, accepting the slender income and the hard life that is known to accompany the duties of a soldier.

"Be of good cheer, American soldiers. When the record comes to be made up, in the cool judgment of the American people and of mankind, after Cuba, with its brilliant page, after China, with its glorious achievements, will be written another page equally brilliant, equally glorious, on which will be recorded the achievements in war and in peace of the American Army in the Philippines."

Not the least of the results of the war attributable to the army is the re-establishment of confidence between the South and the North. The two sections vied with each other in their patriotic devotion, and years of estrangement were obliterated in a few months of service side by side, in the camps of instruction, on the march, or in the trenches on the battle-field.

The Navy and the Army, in the Spanish-American War, have been true to their traditions, and have added another series of victories to the long list in the short existence of the nation. They have won the confidence of our people, and how well they have deserved this let the records speak.
