WILLIAM
SECOND DUKE OF HAMILTON
1696

SECOND DUKE OF HAMILTON,

WAS the second of the two sons of James, second Marquis of Hamilton, by Anne, daughter of James Conyngham, seventh Earl of Glencairn, and was brother to James, the first Duke, a sketch of whose life may be found in this work. He was born on the fourteenth of December, 1616, ten years after that nobleman, and, having made some stay in the University of Glasgow, completed in a long residence on the continent an education in which we are told that erudition was less considered than that observation of men, and manners, and systems, so necessary to all whose views are directed to the higher orders of public employment. It is evident that he was so designed by his family, and his success could have been scarcely doubtful, for he was of the royal blood; and, while he was yet a child, his brother had gained the entire affection of Charles the First; in the mean time he was distinguished by the most promising talents. He returned from his travels in his twenty-first year, and with such confidence of immediate promotion, that on being shortly after refused the appointment of Master of the Horse to the Queen, because it had been promised to another, he prepared, with all the anger of a man who had been really ill used, to retire to France, and was dissuaded solely by an unsolicited promise from the King, of instant preferment. Accordingly on the thirty-first of March, 1639, he was created Baron Polmont, and Macanshire, and Earl of Lanerick, (Lanark) and in the following year was appointed Secretary of State for Scotland.

These circumstances sufficiently prove not only the high degree of favour which he suddenly acquired, but the resolute and ardent temper which is said to have been the ruling feature in his character.

It is scarcely necessary to say that he was nearly unacquainted with the affairs of that country, then peculiarly critical. To his brother therefore, a man not only well experienced in them, but of considerable ability, and so many years older than himself, he naturally looked for direction. Among the various misfortunes which at that period combined to undermine the regal power in Scotland, perhaps the most evident was Charles's partiality to the House of Hamilton. The mother of these noblemen, a woman of powerful understanding and of masculine spirit and activity, whose father was one of the fathers of the covenant, had implanted in the mind of her heir, even from his earliest infancy, an enthusiastic attachment to the new fanaticism, and he communicated the infection to his brother. They conceived between them the utterly impracticable project of uniting to a Monarchy of high pretensions a Calvinistic church. The Duke remained stedfast in his error to the last moment of his life, but Lanerick at length retracted; not however till he had considerably injured the royal cause, to which, notwithstanding, he was most loyally devoted.

Thus for more than two years after his entrance into his office he was alternately occupied in beseeching the King to bend to the humiliating demands of the covenanters, and in endeavouring to dissuade them from actual rebellion, and failed in both. At length, in the spring of 1643, the Scottish Privy Council determined on calling, without the King's necessary warrant, a Parliament, under the denomination of a Convention of the Estates. A large correspondence on this subject between Charles, the Duke of Hamilton, and Lanerick, is extant, and closes with a letter from the King to the Secretary, concluding with this clear direction—"If, notwithstanding our refusal, and the endeavours of our well-affected subjects and servants to hinder it, there shall be a convention of the Estates, then we wish that all those who are right affected to us should be present at it : but to do nothing there but only protest against their meeting and actions." On the twenty-second of June, this convention, which in the end overthrew the royal authority in Scotland, assembled. Lanerick, at their first sitting, presented a letter from the King, excusing them for meeting without his concurrence, and limiting their deliberations to certain subjects ; and Hamilton, in a speech of studied ambiguity, instead of simply protesting, as the King had requested, obscurely threatened it. The assembly, however, confident in its strength, and pre-determined on its course, insisted on his making an explicit declaration, when Lanerick stood up, and said for his brother, as Lord Clarendon reports, that "he hoped that noble Lord's affections to his country were better known than that any man could imagine he would protest against the Parliament of the kingdom." They contented themselves with making a verbal declaration that it was not in their opinion a free Convention, the King's sanction being wanting. Those who had pledged themselves to support in it the royal cause became discouraged, and many of them retired to their respective countries ; Lanerick and Hamilton continued to sit in silence occasionally in the Convention ; and when that body, shortly after, following the example of their brethren of the English Parliament, resolved to make war on the King with an army raised by them in his name, Lanerick actually put the royal signet, which in right of his office was in his custody, to the proclamation of the general levy.

The loyal nobility of Scotland were highly incensed by this conduct, and Montrose, whose devotion to the royal cause was equalled only by the courage with which he always defended it, set out privately to accuse the brothers to the King ; but they soon discovered his intention, followed him to Oxford, where Charles then was, apparently in the hope of averting the storm which threatened them ; and were immediately made prisoners. Lanerick, by the aid of a Mr. Cunningham, a gentleman of the privy chamber, presently found means to escape, and went to London, and soon after into Scotland, where he again applied himself, still, however, under the influence of that temporising and suspicious policy, which he had imbibed from the lessons and the example of his brother, to the King's service. Of the conduct of a partisan so circumstanced it is natural that little should have transpired. The only fact of which we are clearly informed is, that he was in 1645 actively engaged with the covenanters in endeavouring to resist the progress of Montrose's victorious arms; and it may be reasonably inferred that he had Charles's secret consent to this, since that Prince almost immediately after received him again into the office of Secretary, from which he had been dismissed on his arrest at Oxford, and indeed into the fullest confidence. In the spring of the following year he was appointed, together with the Earls of Loudon and Lauderdale, by the rebel government sitting at Edinburgh under the name of the Committee of Estate, a commissioner to treat with the King, then in the hands of the Scottish army, as well as with such commissioners as might arrive from the English Parliament, and seemed to join heartily in the persecution which they were deputed to inflict on that unhappy Prince. Just at that period, the Duke, his brother, who had been for nearly three years in apparent disgrace, and a prisoner in the castle of Pendennis, in Cornwall, from whence he was liberated merely by the fortune of war, arrived at Newcastle, and presented himself to the King, who received him with a countenance which implied a complete oblivion of all former causes of offence. The secret understanding which undoubtedly subsisted between Charles and these brothers is enveloped in a cloud of mystery, towards the dispelling of which history has left us even without tolerable presumptions.

The close of this year, 1646, was distinguished by the fruitless negociation at Newcastle, between the King and the Scottish Parliament. Lanerick, who was almost the sole instrument of their intercourse, exhorted Charles without intermission to submit to all the bitter conditions propounded to him, but found his magnanimity immoveable. At length the Parliament resolved to put him into the hands of the English commissioners. When that detestable measure was proposed to the House, Lanerick prefaced his negative voice with these words : "As God shall have mercy upon my soul at the great day, I would choose rather to have my head struck off at the market-cross of Edinburgh than give my consent to this vote." Charles for the most part of his succeeding captivity found means to correspond with him, and held him to the last in unabated confidence. In December, 1647, he concluded with the King, in the Isle of Wight, in concert with Loudon and Lauderdale, still acting under the authority of the commission granted to them two years before, that remarkable secret treaty which they had lately commenced with his Majesty at Hampton Court. Charles, to whom at this period almost any change of circumstances would have been desirable, now conceded all that he had refused at Newcastle ; and the Scots, on their part, engaged to raise a powerful army for the invasion of England, and to do their utmost to re-establish his authority. The army was levied accordingly, by authority of the Parliament ; placed under the command of the Duke of Hamilton ; and totally overthrown within few weeks after it left Scotland. Lanerick, who in the mean time had been exerting himself to the utmost in that country in promoting the views of those who had joined in support of the stipulations of the treaty, and who were therefore called "the Lords of Engagement," was now deprived of his office of Secretary of State, and proscribed, by the same Parliament, which had so lately authorised those measures his activity and zeal in the execution of which were the only faults alleged against him.

He fled to Holland so nearly at the time when Hamilton was beheaded in London, which was on the sixth of March, 1649, that Lord Clarendon says, "he did not know till he arrived there that he was Duke of Hamilton by the slaughter of his elder brother." Charles the Second, who had taken refuge in that country, and who had been deprived of his royal father by a similar stroke only five weeks before, received him with a grace and kindness heightened no doubt by melancholy sympathy. The Duke, whose entire affection, and indeed veneration, for his brother, had never allowed him to reason on the dictates of one to whom in all matters he submitted with delight, or to seek for motives in his own breast, after some little time looked back with deep regret to many things that he had done, and more that he had omitted. He declared, as Lord Clarendon tells us, "that his condition had been very hard; for that having been always bred up in the Church of England, for which he had a great reverence, he was forced to comply with the covenant, which he perfectly detested, and looked upon it as the ruin of his nation, and would be as glad as any man to declare against it." He added, that, "he had been driven into rebellion by the calumnies and persecution of Montrose," (who was indeed his brother's bitter enemy,) "which nothing else could have done; and for that he always asked God forgiveness from his heart, and desired nothing more than to repair his fault by losing his life for the King." Unhappily that expiation was near at hand.

He presently acquired the young King's esteem. The Order of the Garter, all that Charles then had to give, was conferred on him soon after his arrival. He was of the number which attended that Prince in his voyage to Scotland in June 1650; but was not at first permitted by the ruling party there to approach the capital, and retired therefore to the Isle of Arran, where he remained till the succeeding January, when he was again suffered to wait on the King. Cromwell was then in Scotland, at the head of the army which had lately won the battle of Dunbar, and the Duke, now first a soldier, raised a body of troops, and led them with distin-gushed gallantry in several enterprises. In the mean time the Scots formed an army destined to march into England under the command of the King, who appointed Hamilton his Lieutenant-General. He entered on this great service with melancholy forebodings; not the result of any superstitious impressions, but of a just and enlarged review of all the considerations which the enterprise involved. On the march he earnestly recommended in more than one council that the army should proceed directly to London, but his opinion was overruled by the English. They arrived at length at Worcester, and Cromwell, who had therefore left Scotland, advanced to meet them with an overwhelming force. Hamilton, who had passed the night preceding the battle in devout meditation, the fruits of which have been published by Bishop Burnet from the Duke's original manuscript, was in the morning at his proper post, when, early in the action, seeing his own regiment retreating, he flew alone to rally it; and, after performing prodigies of valour, received a shot which shattered the bone of his leg. He survived eight days, and expired on the 11th of September, 1651, amidst the debates of surgeons, who could not agree on the question of amputation.

Lord Clarendon, who has repeatedly eulogised his character, tells us, that "he was in all respects to be preferred to his brother. A much wiser, though, it may be, a less cunning man; for he did not affect dissimulation, which was the other's masterpiece. He had unquestionable courage. He was in truth a very accomplished person; of an excellent judgment, and clear and ready expressions; and, though he had been driven into some unwarrantable actions, he made it very evident he had not been led by any inclinations of his own, and passionately and heartily ran to all opportunities of redeeming it; and in the very article of his death he expressed a marvellous cheerfulness that he had the honour to lose his life in the King's service, and thereby to wipe out the memory of his former transgressions, which he always professed were odious to himself." Burnet tells us that "his youth discovered, with an extraordinary capacity, so much ingenuity that candour seemed in him not so much the effect of virtue as nature, since from a child he could never upon any temptation be made to lie." The Bishop adds, that "he was of a middle stature ; his complexion black but very agreeable ; and his whole mien was noble and sprightly."

William, second Duke of Hamilton, married, in 1638, Elizabeth, eldest daughter and coheir of James Maxwell, Earl of Dirleton in Scotland, and had by her one son, James, Lord Polmont, who died an infant, and five daughters ; Anne, wife of Robert Carnegie, third Earl of Southesk ; Elizabeth, married first to James Conyngham, Lord Kilmaurs, eldest son of William, ninth Earl of Glencairn ; secondly to Sir David Cunningham, of Robertland ; Mary, married to Alexander Livingstone, second Earl of Callender ; secondly, to Sir James Livingstone, of Westquarter ; thirdly, to James Ogilvie, Earl of Findlater ; Margaret, to William Blair, of Blair ; and Diana, who died young.

JAMES STANLEY,

EARL OF DERBY.

OB. 1651.

JAMES STANLEY,

EARL OF DERBY.

THE motto, "Sans Changer," used for so many centuries by the elder line of the noble house of Stanley, seems to have been adopted in a prophetic spirit. Invariably honourable, just, bounteous, hospitable, valiant, and magnificent; above all, invariably loyal; that family may perhaps safely challenge history and tradition to show one defective link in its long chain of succession; to point out a single stain on the purity of its public conduct, or on its uniform exercise of the mild and graceful duties of private life. Of the nobleman whose eulogium will be attempted in the following pages (for the simple story of his life will form his true eulogium) it is not too much to say, that his family, the peerage, and his country, are bound in policy, as well as by affection, to cherish his memory, even with a reverential regard.

He was the first-born of the three sons of William Stanley, sixth Earl of Derby, by Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward Vere, seventeenth Earl of Oxford, and at length heir general of that most ancient house. Of his youth, and early manhood, scarcely any particulars have been preserved. He has left proofs, however, that his education was worthy of his rank, and perhaps of his mind. The Court knew little of him till it had become a military Court. He was one of the many Knights of the Bath appointed at the coronation of Charles the First, when he was a very young man, bearing the title of Lord Strange, by which two years after he was summoned to Parliament; and these, with the exception of those provincial authorities which seemed almost naturally to belong to him, were the only public marks of favour that he ever received from that Prince ; so that his devotion to the Crown may be said to have flowed even from a finer source than gratitude. He passed his time in splendid privacy ; superintending the several princely establishments of his ancient father, in Lancashire, and in the Isle of Man, where the Earls of Derby then exercised a royal sway ; cultivating the morals and manners of a numerous population attached to him and to his ancestors by feelings which wanted but the fact of actual parentage to make them really filial ; and employing his leisure in studies not less philosophic than polite. The lamentable crisis of the grand rebellion drew him in an instant from these peaceful engagements, and he was among the first who joined the King, after the fury of the Parliament had driven his Majesty to York. He assumed the character of a soldier within very few weeks after the death of his father had invested him with the utmost extent of those views of prosperity which nothing but his engaging in the war could have frustrated.

An unfortunate change of resolution in Charles's Council not only rendered Lord Derby's first endeavours in a great measure abortive, but had an ill effect also on many of his subsequent services. It had been determined that the royal standard should be first hoisted at Warrington, and the Earl, whose influence in that part of the island was unbounded, had been sent back into Lancashire, immediately after his arrival at York, with directions to collect the military force of the county. He had performed that duty with surprising celerity and exactness, and had actually mustered on the three heaths of Preston, Ormskirk, and Bury, a force of sixty thousand men, and was proceeding to take the same course in Cheshire, and North Wales, where, as well as in Lancashire, he was Lord Lieutenant, when he suddenly received notice that the King had resolved to set up his standard at Nottingham ; and, soon after, a special letter from his Majesty, directing him to hasten to the head quarters, with such troops as he might be able to equip completely. In the mean time great numbers of the Lancashire men, piqued at the disappointment, returned to their homes, resolving to stand neuter, while many others joined the rebels, and aided them considerably in seizing on the town of Manchester. The Earl, however severely mortified, speedily raised among his friends and tenants three regiments of foot, and as many troops of horse, which he clothed and armed at his own expense, and waited on the King, who was then at Shrewsbury, to receive his orders for the disposal of them. He was commanded to return to them with the utmost speed, and to endeavour to take Manchester by a bold and sudden attack; and having accordingly made all preparations, even to fixing the hour for the assault, he received orders the night before to join the King, without a moment's delay, with his force, which was then most imprudently placed under the command of others, while he was desired to repair again into Lancashire, to make new efforts to raise men in a country dispirited, offended, and now in no small degree disaffected. Lord Clarendon, whose report of all these matters is given too much at large to be admitted here, seems to treat the Earl's concern in them with less than his usual candour.

Lancashire however was now nearly lost to the Crown. The Earl, with much difficulty, collected a sufficient force to take Preston and Lancaster by storm, and led it personally in those enterprises with the greatest bravery, and was preparing to attack Manchester, when this new levy was also called away to the main army, and he was once more left without the means of using offensive measures. Nothing now was left for him in his county but to fortify his mansion of Latham, in which he was busily employed when he received intelligence that the rebels had planned an attack on the Isle of Man, and immediately sailed thither, leaving the completion of his works at Latham, and its defence, to his Countess. Of the romantic excellence of that lady's conduct in the execution of her charge I shall say nothing more in this place, but will endeavour in another part of the work to do that justice to her memory which has been hitherto in a great measure neglected. Latham House, the siege of which commenced in February, 1644, was defended first by the Countess in person, and afterwards by one of the officers whom she had originally placed in it under her command, for more than two years, and was at last surrendered by a positive order from the King, having cost the enemy no less than six thousand men, and being one of the last fortified places in the kingdom that had held out for his Majesty. The Earl, who had returned from Man during the siege, found Prince Rupert unsuccessfully besieging the town of Bolton, which was in the midst of his own territory, and which, with the aid of some companies of his old provincial soldiers, who at his request were placed under his command for that peculiar service, he carried by a furious assault in the space of half an hour, and was the first man who entered it. He now returned to the Isle of Man, together with his Countess, leaving his children in England, who were soon after basely seized and imprisoned, by an order of the House of Commons. Offers were repeatedly made to him by that body to restore them, and to leave him in quiet possession of his whole estate, if he would give up the island; but he constantly refused, even after all hope for the royal cause was lost, saying, that "he would never redeem either by his disloyalty." Affronted at length by solicitations which evinced a doubt in those by whom they were used of his courage or fidelity, he sent the following glorious reply to a proposal made to him by the regicide Ireton, who was frequently the organ of the party on such occasions, and from that moment the rebels vowed the deepest vengeance against him:—

"I received your letter with indignation, and with scorn I return you this answer—that I cannot but wonder whence you should gather any hopes from me, that I should, like you, prove treacherous to my Sovereign; since you cannot be insensible of my former actings in his late Majesty's service, from which principle of loyalty I am in no way departed. I scorn your proffers: I disdain your favours: I abhor your treasons: and am so far from delivering this island to your advantage, that I will keep it, to the utmost of my power, to your destruction. Take this final answer, and forbear any further solicitations; for, if you trouble me with any more messages upon this occasion, I will burn the paper, and hang the bearer. This is the immutable resolution, and shall be the undoubted practice, of him who accounts it the chiefest glory to be

His Majesties most loyal and obedient Servant,
DERBY."

Castle Town,
12th July, 1649.

He remained in the Isle of Man till the year 1651, when the young King, having resolved to leave Scotland, at the head of an army unhappily commanded rather by Presbyterian ministers than by its generals, despatched an order to the Earl to meet him in Lancashire, which he instantly obeyed, and received there the King's command to endeavour once more to raise troops in that county. Charles, who was then repairing by forced marches to Shrewsbury, left with him a body of about two hundred horse, consisting mostly of officers and gentlemen, to enable him, should he prove unsuccessful in his levy, to follow the army with a better chance of security. Having employed trusty persons to publish the news of his arrival, and to give notice of his views, he took up his quarters, within two or three days after he had left the King, in the town of Wigan, to await the appearance of his friends; where, on the very next morning, he was attacked by a large body of militia, and regular troops, which Cromwell had unexpectedly detached, under the command of Lilburn, to harass the rear of the King's army on its march, and to pick up such stragglers as might not keep pace with it. The most heroic but at length ineffectual, resistance was made for two hours by the Earl, and his small band, against a force of three thousand horse and foot. It is recorded that he received in this sanguinary skirmish, seven shot on his breast-plate, thirteen cuts on his beaver, and five or six wounds on his arms and shoulders, and that he had two horses killed under him. He found means, however, to escape, almost alone, through Shropshire and Staffordshire, to the King, at Worcester, reserved for a harder fate.

In the evening of the third of September, the day on which the fatal battle was fought close to that city, his wounds yet bleeding, for only eight days had passed since his fierce encounter at Wigan, he secretly and safely conducted Charles, by St. Martin's gate in Worcester, from the horrors and dangers which surrounded him ; directed his Majesty to the since celebrated retreats of White-ladies, and Boscobel, in each of which himself had been within a few days before sheltered ; and took leave of the King for ever. He now travelled, with as much speed as his condition would allow, towards his own country ; but had scarcely arrived within Cheshire when he was attacked by a party commanded by a rebel Major of the name of Edge, to whom he surrendered, under a promise of quarter. The Parliament, however, sent down to Chester a commission to nineteen persons of its military in that part of the country, all of whom were notoriously his personal enemies, to form themselves into what was called a High Court of Justice, and "to try the Earl of Derby for his treason and rebellion." He was of course condemned to die ; and these mock judges indulged themselves in the vulgar barbarity of sending him to suffer their sentence in his own town of Bolton, where he had last appeared as a conqueror, and of subjecting him on his way thither, and indeed to the moment of his death, to brutal insult. A minute narrative of the circumstances of his final hours was penned, with touching simplicity, by a Mr. Bagaley, one of his gentlemen, who was allowed to attend him to the last, and the manuscript has been carefully preserved in the family. A transcript of the most part of it may be found in Collins's Peerage. It displays one of the purest examples extant of the courage of a soldier, the patience of a philosopher, and the piety of a Christian. He meant to have addressed himself at some length to the people, but was interrupted. In the part which he uttered are these passages :—“ As for my crime, as some are pleased to call it, to come into this country with the King, I hope it deserves a better name, for I did it in obedience to his call whom I hold myself obliged to obey, according to the protestation I took in Parliament in his father’s time. I confess I love monarchy, and I love my master, Charles, the second of that name, whom I myself proclaimed in this country to be King. The Lord bless and preserve him ; and I wish so much happiness to this people after my death that he may enjoy his right, and then they cannot want their rights. I profess here, in the presence of God, I always sought for peace, and I had no other reason, for I wanted neither means nor honours, nor did I seek to enlarge either. By the King’s predecessors mine were raised to a high condition, it is well known to the country ; and it is as well known that by his enemies I am condemned to suffer, by new and unknown laws. The Lord send us our King again, and our old laws again, and the Lord send us our religion again. Truly to me it seems I die for God, the King, and the Laws ; and this makes me not to be ashamed of my life, nor afraid of my death.” At these words one of the persons by whom he was guarded on the scaffold, misunderstanding him, ignorantly cried, “ We have no King, and we will have no Lords,” and he was not permitted to say more ; Bagaley’s narrative, however, gives the remainder of his intended speech, from the notes which the Earl at that moment handed to him. He was beheaded on Wednesday, the fifteenth of October, 1651 ; and England has not produced a parallel character since loyalty ceased to be an unmixed sentiment.

“ The Earl of Derby,” says Lord Clarendon, who, by the way, seems never to have felt cordially towards him, “ was a man of unquestionable loyalty to the King, and gave clear testimony of it, before he received any obligations from the Court, and when he thought himself disobliged by it. The King in his first year sent him the order of the Garter, which, in many respects, he had expected from the last; and the sense of that honour made him so readily comply with the King's command in attending him, when he had no confidence in the undertaking, nor any inclination to the Scots, who he thought had too much guilt upon them in having depressed the Crown, to be made instruments in repairing and restoring it. He was a man of great honour, and clear courage, and all his defects and misfortunes arose from his having lived so little a time among his equals, that he knew not how to treat his inferiors, which was the source of all the ill that befel him; having thereby drawn such prejudice against him from persons of inferior quality, who yet thought themselves too good to be contemned, that they pursued him to death."

He married Charlotte, daughter to Claude de la Tremouille, Duke of Thouars, and Peer of France, by whom he had Charles, his successor, and two younger sons, Edward and William, who died infants; and four daughters; Charlotte, who died young; Henrietta Maria, who was married to William Wentworth, second Earl of Strafford; Catherine, to Henry Pierrepont, Marquis of Dorchester; and Amelia Sophia, to John Murray, Marquis of Athol. It remains only to be added to this sketch that the Earl had very considerable talents; was inclined to literary composition, and was among the best prose writers of his time. In the Desiderata Curiosa may be found "The History of the Isle of Man, by James, Earl of Derby, and Lord of Man, interspersed with large and excellent Advices to his Son;" and one of the Sloane MSS. in the British Museum, is a sort of historical common-place book, written by his hand. It contains chiefly extracts from the popular libel called "Leicester's Common-wealth;" from the History of the Council of Trent; and from Fuller's Holy War. On the first page he has written "Ne turba operas meas—J. Derby, 1645;" and on the last, "Finis, Ja. 13, 1645, at Castle Rushin, in the Isle of Man—J. Derby."

FRANCIS,
EARL COTTINGTON
OB. 1652.

FRANCIS, LORD COTTINGTON.

LORD CLARENDON informs us, and has of course been followed by those who may have since written of Lord Cottington's origin, that "he was born a gentleman, both by father and mother, his father having a pretty entire seat near Bruton, in Somersetshire, worth about two hundred pounds a year, which had descended from father to son for many hundred years, and his mother being a Stafford, nearly allied to Sir Edward Stafford, who was Vice-Chamberlain to Queen Elizabeth, and had been Ambassador in France." This statement is in part incorrect. It is true that his father, Philip Cottington, of Godmanston, in Somersetshire, to whom he was fourth son, was such a person as the noble historian describes, but his mother was Jane, daughter of Thomas Byfleet, of Bratton in the same county, a gentleman of ancient family there, nor can I find any trace of her connection with the once great House of Stafford.

He was born in the year 1576, and, whether related or not to Sir Edward Stafford, was certainly received into that gentleman's household, when a very young man, in the office of Master of the Horse. His education had been wholly neglected. "He was illiterate," to use the words of a great authority, which will be presently quoted more at large, "as to the grammar of any language, or the principles of any science;" but he had an acute understanding, a cool head, a cooler heart, and the most indefatigable industry. Thus in a great measure qualified by nature for a statesman, Stafford recommended him to Sir Robert Cecil, through whose influence he became Secretary to Sir Charles Cornwallis, in his embassy to Spain ; accompanied him thither in that capacity in 1605 ; and on Cornwallis's return four years after, was intrusted for a considerable time with the sole management of the affairs of England at that court. In 1614 he was appointed a clerk of the Privy Council, and in 1616, on the recall of the ambassador Digby, afterwards Earl of Bristol, was again dispatched to Madrid, to assume the functions of that minister, which he continued to perform till the year 1621, when he obtained the office of secretary to Charles, Prince of Wales.

It is probable that he owed that appointment, as well as the title of Baronet, which was presently after conferred on him, to his intimate knowledge of the manners and language of Spain. The Prince and Buckingham were then secretly concerting that impolitic journey to Madrid which forms so important a feature in the history of that period, and had in fact determined that Cottington, and one more, should be their only confidential attendants. When they imparted their design to James, who strongly opposed it, he sent for Cottington, and told him, says Lord Clarendon, doubtless from Cottington's information, " that he had always been an honest man, and therefore he was now to trust him in an affair of the highest importance, which he was not on his life to disclose to any man alive : then said to him, ' Cottington, here is Baby Charles and Stenny' (an appellation he always used of and towards the Duke), ' who have a great mind to go by post into Spain, to fetch home the Infanta, and will have but two more in their company, and have chosen you for one ; what think you of the journey ?' He often protested since that when he heard the King, he fell into such a trembling that he could hardly speak ; but when the King commanded him to answer him what he thought of the journey, he replied that he could not think well of it, and that he believed it would render all that had been done towards the match fruitless ; for that Spain would no longer think themselves obliged by those articles, but that, when they had the Prince in their hands, they would make new overtures, which they believed more advantageous to them, amongst which they must look for many that would concern religion, and the exercise of it in England; upon which the King threw himself upon his bed, and said 'I told you this before,' and fell into new passion and lamentation, that he was undone, and should lose Baby Charles."

Buckingham, who was the main projector of the expedition, loaded Cottington with the bitterest reproaches, even in the King's presence, for uttering this candid opinion, while James defended him with equal earnestness. He attended the Prince to Madrid, and by his prudent councils there did his utmost to prevent the evil consequences which he had foreseen, but the result fully justified his predictions. On his return he boldly demonstrated to James the fair intentions of Spain with respect to the treaty for the marriage, and the extravagant conduct of Buckingham, by which it had been thwarted. The anger of the favourite was excited to the last degree, but remained inactive during the short remnant of the King's life. On the accession, however, of Charles, when Cottington appeared at court in order to his daily attendance, he was told by one of the secretaries of state that "it was the King's pleasure that he should come no more into those rooms;" and Buckingham, perhaps purposely, entering at that moment, Cottington advanced firmly to him, and, ascribing to his resentment the inhibition which he had just received, demanded plainly whether it were possible for him to restore himself to his Grace's good opinion. Buckingham, with that sincerity which was among the best of his virtues, answered no; "that he was not only resolved never to trust him, but that he was, and would be always, his declared enemy, and would do always whatsoever should be in his power to ruin and destroy him: and that of this he might be most assured." After a time, however, the Duke so far relaxed as to consult him on the war with Spain, which had been produced by his own misconduct, but he remained unemployed till after Buckingham's death, which presently ensued.

On the eighteenth of April, 1629, he was appointed Chancellor and under-Treasurer of the Exchequer, and in the succeeding winter, such was the opinion of his clear perception of the true policy of his country with respect to Spain, was detached from the urgent duties of those busy offices, and once more sent to Madrid to negotiate a peace. He executed this commission with the greatest credit, and, returning in the spring of 1631, was on the 10th of the following July created Baron Cottington of Hanworth in Middlesex. Charles, on his departure for Scotland in 1633, invested him formally with an authority to exercise the functions of Lord High Treasurer during his absence, and in the course of the same year gave him the office, then so important to the royal revenue, of Master of the Court of Wards, his vigilance and exactness in which gave much offence to the nobility and higher gentry. Many circumstances, however, in the character of the times, as well as in his own character, now concurred to render him generally unpopular. He began to be considered, as in fact he was, as a member of that selection from the Privy Council, which about that time began to be invidiously called "the Cabinet," for indeed all the great measures of the government flowed from the joint deliberations of Laud, Strafford, and himself, and this, in the poisoned imaginations of that day, placed him at the fountain-head of all sorts of mischief. In addition to this disadvantage, he was not only the superintendent of the royal revenue, but the instrument of its expenditure. He was esteemed the leader of the Spanish faction, then vulgarly held in great disgust, and suspected at once to favour the cause of the papists, and to be himself indifferent as to all modes of religious faith. The disaffected great detested him for his loyalty, which they rightly believed to be incorruptible, and because he held certain profitable places of which they earnestly wished to possess themselves.

Thus he stood in the commencement of the year 1640, when Charles added to the proofs of confidence which he had already given him, the office of Constable of the Tower of London, in which a guard of four hundred men had been lately placed to provide against any sudden tumult which might arise in the City. The King was presently obliged, in deference to the jealousy of the House of Commons, to revoke this appointment; and Cottington soon after, in the honest hope of conciliating some of the party by the only sacrifices he could make to their rapacity, voluntarily resigned his place of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and on the seventeenth of May, 1641, his Mastership of the Wards, which last was immediately bestowed on the Lord Say, who had bargained to give in exchange for it all the loyalty of which he was capable. Cottington now retired into private life, and so remained till the King assembled his parliament at Oxford, in the commencement of the year 1644, when he obeyed a summons to join that illustrious body, and was soon after commanded by Charles to take on himself the office, or rather the name, of Lord High Treasurer. Whitelocke informs us, that he, as well as other men of rank, assisted with their manual labour in the defence of Oxford when besieged by Fairfax, and signed the articles by which it was surrendered to that General in 1646. On the twenty-fourth of September in that year the rebel parliament passed a vote directing a sale of his estates, and the application of the produce to the service of Ireland, but they were afterwards devoted, for the most part, to the maintenance of the state of the infamous Bradshaw. He remained in England till all possibility of his rendering any service to the royal cause had ceased, and till his own person was in the most imminent peril. In April, 1648, we find him at Ronen, in Normandy; and on the twenty-fourth of the following October he, with a few others, were specially excepted for ever from pardon.

Charles the Second was at the Hague when he received the news of his father's murder, and was about the same time joined there by Lord Cottington, who was sworn of his Privy Council, and directed, or at least allowed, to retain his empty title of High Treasurer. He was now grown old and infirm, and unable to endure either the wanderings to which he foresaw that his new master's little court would be subjected, or the intrigues and jealousies which had even already begun to infest it. He was conscious that he could render no service to Charles but in Spain, and perhaps longed once more to revisit it, for it seemed the land of his adoption. He consulted Sir Edward Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, with whom for the most part he had kept house since their flight, on the expediency of a formal mission to implore the friendship of the King of Spain to their forlorn Sovereign, and proposed that they should offer themselves to Charles for that service, to which Hyde cordially assented, and the King, on Cottington's representation to him of the policy of the measure, nominated them his joint ambassadors to Madrid. They arrived there about the middle of November, 1649, having from their very entrance into Spain, seen abundant cause to expect a cool reception, and the answer given to the propositions which they delivered at their first audience left them nearly hopeless. They were however treated with respect, and, having determined that their ill success should not be ascribed to any want of diligence on their parts, they remained for fifteen months at Madrid. At length, on the arrival of the news of Cromwell's military advantages in Scotland, the King of Spain, who had been waiting for the preponderance of one of the two great parties, required them by a civil message in March, 1650, O.S. to depart, when Cottington requested permission to establish his abode in that country as a private man, and obtained it, with a proviso that he should not reside at Madrid. He now, for the fourth time, changed his profession of faith, and was publicly reconciled to the Church of Rome by the Pope's Nuncio; which done, he retired to Valladolid, where a society of English jesuits established there, proud of such a proselyte, had provided a habitation, and every other comfort, for him. He died in that city in 1652, at the age of seventy-seven.

Lord Clarendon has left us the following exquisite notices of this eminent person's character :—" He was a very wise man, by the great and long experience he had in business of all kinds, and by his natural temper, which was not liable to any transport of anger, or any other passion, but could bear contradiction, and even reproach, without being moved, or put out of his way, for he was very steady in pursuing what he proposed to himself, and had a courage not to be frightened with any opposition. It is true, he was illiterate as to the grammar of any language, or the principles of any science, but, by his perfect understanding the Spanish, which he spoke as a Spaniard, the French, and Italian languages, and having read very much in all, he could not be said to be ignorant in any part of learning, divinity only excepted. He had a very fine and extraordinary understanding in the nature of beasts and birds, and, above all, in all kind of plantations, and arts of husbandry. He raised by his own virtue and industry a very fair estate, of which, though the revenue did not exceed above four thousand pounds by the year, yet he had four very good houses and three parks, the value whereof was not reckoned into that computation. He lived very nobly ; well served and attended in his house ; had a better stable of horses, better provision for his sports, especially of hawks, in which he took great delight, than most of his quality ; and lived always with great splendour ; for, though he loved money very well, and did not warily enough consider the circumstances of getting it, he spent it well all ways but in giving, which he did not affect. He was of an excellent humour, and very easy to live with, and under a grave countenance covered the most of mirth, and caused more, than any man of the most pleasant disposition. He never used any body ill, but used very many well, for whom he had no regard. His greatest fault was that he could dissemble, and make men believe that he loved them very well when he cared not for them. He had not very tender affections, nor bowels apt to yearn at all objects which deserved compassion. He was heartily weary of the world, and no man was more willing to die, which is an argument that he had peace of conscience. He left behind him a greater esteem of his parts than love for his person."

Lord Cottington married Anne, daughter of Sir William Meredith, of London, and widow of Sir Robert Brett, Kn^{ts}., and had by her a son, Charles, and a daughter, Anne, both of whom died, childless, in his life-time. Francis Cottington, son of his brother, Maurice, became therefore heir to his property, which, in spite of losses and confiscations, was still very considerable, and his Barony became extinct.

RALPH,
LORD HOPTON
OB. 1652.

RALPH, LORD HOPTON.

WAS the heir-male of one of the most powerful families among the gentry of the county of Somerset, where his ancestors had been settled for more than four centuries. He was the only son of Robert Hopton, of Witham, in that county, by Jane, daughter and sole heir of Rowland Kemish, or Kemeys, of a seat called the Vandrey, in Monmouthshire, where he was born in the year 1598. He was distinguished, when he had scarcely left his cradle, by a surprising aptness for study, and for the attainment of languages, which David Lloyd, who seems to have known him in private life, commemorates with his usual prolixity, and whimsical method of expression ; and, with no further assistance than that of a reputable country school, was sent at the usual age, with an uncommon share of erudition and science, to Oxford, where he was entered a gentleman-commoner of Lincoln College, and had for his tutor the learned Robert Sanderson, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln. With this disposition, however, to literature, to which is so generally united a love of retirement and tranquillity, he possessed not only an ardent and enterprising spirit, but a vigour and activity of mind and body always ready to obey its impulses. He fell therefore without hesitation into the fashion of the time, and left the university to serve as a volunteer in the Low Countries, and afterwards, with some regular command, in the war of the Palatinate, at the termination of which by the fatal battle of Prague, he had the honour of conducting the interesting Queen of Bohemia sitting on horseback behind him, in her critical flight from that city. In these services, which seem to have occupied nearly five years of his youth, he acquired no small degree of that military skill which he afterwards so nobly applied, as well as a high reputation for undaunted courage, insomuch that he was admitted into the number of Knights of the Bath who were created immediately before the coronation of King Charles the First.

He was elected to serve in the Long Parliament as one of the burgesses for the city of Wells, and like most of the young men of that time, and indeed of all other times, was at first inclined to the popular party. He was not only on the committee which formed the bitter remonstrance of November, 1641, but was the person appointed by the malcontents to read it to the King when it was presented. He was, however, too wise and too virtuous to remain long in this error, and soon after began to oppose, not only by his vote, but by sound and bold argument, delivered with no small degree of eloquence, the fearful resolutions of that wretched assembly ; till finding all efforts there to stem the torrent of mischief hopeless, he determined to retire within the circle of his own personal influence, and to make the best preparation that he could to strengthen and defend the Crown in the sad crisis which was evidently approaching. There he seized every opportunity favourable to that end, and by his entreaties, his reasonings, and his example, so wrought on the minds of the principal gentry of the west, that when the King sent the Marquis of Hertford, whom he had appointed his commander-in-chief, into that country, on the commencement of the war in the summer of 1643, they joined that nobleman at Wells without delay, with their retainers and servants, and led by Hopton, at the head of two troops of horse, which he had raised and armed at his own charge, and by his experience rendered fit for immediate service. From Wells the Marquis marched to Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, and having held that town for two months in the face of an army greatly superior, retreated towards Wales, detaching Hopton with his horse into Cornwall, to try the affections of that province. So little did the committee appointed by the Parliament for the government of the western counties apprehend from this small force, that, in mere contempt, they caused it to be presented at the Quarter Sessions in ordinary form of law, under the denomination of "divers men unknown, who had lately come armed into Cornwall contra pacem," &c. Hopton readily joined in the conceit; appeared voluntarily at the Quarter Sessions; produced the Marquis of Hertford's commission appointing him Lieutenant-General of the Horse; and told the court that he was sent to assist them in the defence of their liberties against illegal taxes and impositions; whereupon, says Lord Clarendon, "the jury, which consisted of gentlemen of good quality and fortunes in the county, after a full and solemn debate, not only acquitted Sir Ralph Hopton and the other gentlemen, his companions, of any disturbance of the peace, but declared that it was a great favour and justice of his Majesty to send down aid to them, and that they thought it the duty of every good subject, as well in loyalty to the King as in gratitude to those gentlemen, to join them with any hazard of life and fortune." But this was not all; for these good Cornish-men retaliated by indicting the Parliament commissioners for unlawfully assembling, and committing various misdemeanors and riots at Launceston, where they usually sat, and, the grand jury having found the bill, the High Sheriff was authorised to raise the posse comitatus and to apprehend them, which they avoided by fortifying the town. This curious instance of the regular execution of a legal process in a scene of war was at the time in no great degree beneficial to the royal cause, for, although within a few days Hopton's small force was thus joined by three thousand foot, well armed, at whose head he drove the commissioners and their guard from Launceston, the same authorities by which he had been so reinforced, obstinately determining still to be guided only by strict law, rendered their aid useless by preventing him from pursuing the rebels beyond the limits of the county. He marched therefore to Saltash, and expelled a garrison of Scots which they had placed there, but which was presently reinforced and restored by Ruthen, a native of that country, who commanded the Parliament troops in the West, under the Earl of Stamford. Ruthen now advanced with a superior force, and a full expectation of easy victory, to Liskeard, where Hopton had fixed his quarters. The two little armies met in the middle of January, 1642, on Braddock Down, near that town, when, soon after the first onset, the rebel troops, seized with that panic which seldom fails to occur on one side or the other to newly-raised forces, fled in the utmost disorder, and Hopton, after a short contest and pursuit, in which his humanity in avoiding bloodshed was distinguished, found himself in possession of all their cannon, ammunition, and colours, and between twelve and thirteen hundred prisoners, and having once more driven them out of Saltash, whither they had fled, remained in effect master of the whole of Cornwall.

This success however did little more in those parts for the royal cause than to place Hopton's force on an equality of strength with that of the rebels. He had marched after the battle of Braddock Down into Devonshire, and had taken up his quarters at Tavistock, when a proposition was made to him by several gentlemen of weight in that county, either enemies or neutrals, in the hope of averting the horrors of war from that quarter of the kingdom. A treaty was accordingly agreed to, and ratified by oaths with uncommon solemnity; but arrangements of this nature were by no means suited to the inclinations and intentions of the Parliament. The very night before the expiration of the prescribed term, a strong party of the rebel horse and foot unexpectedly appeared before Launceston, to which the Cornish had removed not many hours before, and on the next morning hostilities were recommenced. In the meantime the Earl of Stamford advanced against them at the head of nearly seven thousand well-appointed troops, with a competent train of artillery, in so full a confidence of overwhelming a force which scarcely amounted to half his number, that even after his arrival on the advantageous eminence which he had chosen for his camp, he detached twelve hundred of his horse on another enterprise. The intelligence of this magnanimous error had no sooner reached Hopton than he formed his resolution. On the fifteenth of May he marched into the valley beneath Stamford's army, within a mile of which he halted for the night, during which he divided his infantry, not amounting to two thousand five hundred, and stationed them on the four sides of the hill. At five on the following morning they marched simultaneously to the attack, and an irregular engagement ensued, which continued till three in the day, when Hopton was informed that his magazine was reduced to four barrels of powder. He communicated the news secretly to the leaders of the several bodies, and exhorted them to press on in an instant and general assault with the pike and the sword, to which without hesitation they agreed. The command was severally given to march forward, and one soul seemed to animate the whole of this little force. The enemy, as much unused to such desperate courage as to so singular a method of attack, everywhere gave way; Chudleigh, their Major-General, in gallantly striving to rally them, fell into the hands of the royalists, whose victory was from that moment complete, and the four parties met on the summit of the hill but to possess themselves quietly of the rebels' cannon, and to express their mutual congratulations. This action, one of the most memorable in the course of the war, was called, from the village near which it was fought, "the battle of Stratton."

Almost immediately after this gallant affair Hopton marched into Somersetshire, to meet the Marquis of Hertford, who, with Prince Maurice, had arrived at Chard, with nearly two thousand horse, and a thousand newly-levied infantry. On the junction of the Cornish army with these forces, his command nominally passed to the Marquis, who was General-in-Chief, but the direction of all measures was prudently suffered yet to remain in his hands. Taunton, Bridgewater, and Dunstar Castle, surrendered to these combined bodies without striking a blow; and such was the reputation which Hopton had deservedly acquired, that the Parliament, on hearing that he was thus reinforced, instantly sent against him their favourite general, Sir William Waller, at the head of the most numerous and best-appointed army which on either side had yet appeared in the field. The battle of Lansdown succeeded, in which the royalists obtained a hardly-earned victory. Here Hopton received a musket-shot through the arm, and on the following morning, visiting the scene of action, to provide for the wounded, and to restore order among the troops, was cruelly mangled by the explosion of some barrels of powder in a waggon near which he sat on horse-back. He was removed, apparently in a dying state, amidst bitter lamentations and outcries; for, to use the words of Lord Clarendon in speaking of this accident, "he was the soldier's darling, and the soul of that army." Their hope however was speedily revived, for not many days after it occurred Hertford marched to Oxford with all the horse, leaving the command of the infantry to him, who then, says Clarendon again, "was supposed past danger of death, and could hear and speak well enough, though he could not see or stir."

This mischance however prevented him from personally partaking in the succeeding triumph over Waller at Roundway Down. In the mean time the Marquis of Hertford, generously anxious to do him the honour which he had so eminently merited, nominated him to the government of Bristol, which it happened that Prince Rupert, who had lately with distinguished gallantry wrested that town from the rebels by assault, had privately asked of the King for himself. This unlucky accident produced a jealousy and discord between the Prince and the Marquis which even Charles, who made a journey to Bristol especially for that purpose, found himself unable to compose; and Hopton, conscious of the prejudice which a continuance of their disagreement could not but produce to the King's service, not only relinquished his claim to the chief command, but even solicited the station of Lieutenant-Governor under the Prince, who, on his part, as readily consented to delegate the whole of his authority implicitly to Hopton's discretion. Charles, in whom a cool and just judgment of meritorious services was united to all the impulses of kind and honourable feeling, chose this moment to advance him to the dignity of the peerage. On the fourth of September, 1643, he was created Baron Hopton of Stratton, by a patent, dated at Oxford, in which an epitome, of much larger extent than is generally admitted into such instruments, is given of his eminent services.

He remained at Bristol, slowly recovering his health, till the winter. In the mean time his army, as it was deservedly called, had yet further increased its reputation by new successes in the west, under Prince Maurice, insomuch that the Parliament had determined to leave no means untried to subdue that important quarter. A powerful reinforcement was ordered for Waller, and the king prepared to interrupt him on his march thither by levying a new force from the garrison of Bristol, and from the country adjacent to that town. This service was committed to Hopton, who performed it with his accustomed zeal and activity, and, having been in the mean time joined by considerable bodies of troops from Devonshire and from Ireland, presently collected a force of at least three thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, with which, the King having given him the chief command, he fixed his headquarters at Winchester. Waller, his progress having been thus impeded, took possession of Farnham; halted his troops there; and returned himself to London to solicit further aid; while Hopton, whose numbers daily increased, made an excursion into Sussex, and surprised Arundel Castle, from whence, having been apprised of Waller's return strongly recruited, he retraced his steps, but not in time to prevent his adversary, who excelled in what in military language is called beating up quarters, from seizing one of his best regiments at Alton, an out-post of his army. It was the first check that Hopton had sustained, and inspired him at once with a deep regret, and a desire not less earnest, to bring Waller to a general action. These feelings were within very few days aggravated to the utmost by the event of a successful forced march, through which that active rebel re-took the Castle of Arundel. He speedily returned; Hopton advanced to meet him; and on the twenty-ninth of March, 1644, they engaged at Alresford, and the result, although it had many of the characters of a drawn battle, was pregnant with misfortune to the royal interest. "The King's horse," says Lord Clarendon, "never behaved themselves so ill as that day; for the main body of them, after they had sustained one fierce charge, wheeled about to an unreasonable distance, and left their principal officers to shift for themselves." Hopton, after great loss, relinquished the field to the enemy, carrying off however his cannon and ammunition; retreated to Reading; and soon after joined the King for a short time at Oxford. Lord Clarendon speaks of him elsewhere in terms which seem to be somewhat exemplified in some circumstances of his conduct which have been just now recited. "The Lord Hopton," he says, "was a man superior to any temptation, and abhorred enough the licence and the levities with which he saw too many corrupted. He had a good understanding, a clear courage, an industry not to be tired, and a generosity that was not to be exhausted, a virtue that none of the rest had; but in the debates concerning the war was longer in resolving, and more apt to change his mind after he had resolved, than is agreeable to the office of a commander-in-chief, which rendered him rather fit for the second than for the supreme command of an army."

He now marched to strengthen his garrison of Bristol, and to draw together such recruits as he might be able to raise in South Wales, and wait for the King's order to join the force commanded by his Majesty in person with as numerous a body of troops as he could collect. He soon after received the commission of General of the Ordnance, and was named one of the Council of six for the affairs of the Prince of Wales, whose person, the King now sending him to reside in Bristol, was in a manner placed under the especial care of Hopton, from whose purse, so deplorable at this juncture were the King's necessities, the establishment of his Royal Highness was chiefly supplied. His vigilance in the execution of this great trust was as exemplary as the anxieties which surrounded it were intolerable. The Prince had been lately invested with the chief command of the army, and his little court became presently a scene of intrigue, in which himself, young as he was, sometimes took a part. Some officers, and particularly the worthless Lord Goring who aspired to wrest the management of him wholly from his Council, endeavoured with unceasing assiduity to gain his favour. Their plans were naturally cultivated with increased vigour on the frequent occasions of Hopton's necessary absence with the army, and he was the peculiar object of the hatred of some of them, and the jealousy of all, especially when the King, immediately after the fatal defeat at Naseby, appointed him to command the forces, as Lieutenant-General under the Prince. Hopton however was relieved by this commission, because it tended to define with some accuracy the measure of his duties, and to fix the degree of his responsibility. He withdrew himself gradually from all concerns, except such as were immediately connected with his military station, in the affairs of the Prince, who had for some time quitted Bristol, and was wandering uselessly in Devonshire and Cornwall with the undisciplined and almost mutinous remnant of the western army, the officers of which were not less disorderly than the men. The appearance of a strong rebel force was daily expected, and the Prince and his Council, in terror for the event, implored Hopton to assume the chief command. "It was a heavy imposition I confess," says Lord Clarendon, "upon the Lord Hopton, to the which nothing but the most abstracted duty and obedience could have submitted, to take charge of those whom only their friends feared, and their enemies laughed at; being only terrible in plunder, and resolute in running away." And in this melancholy light was it considered also by Hopton himself, for, as the noble historian soon after tells us, when he accepted, as he did, this unwelcome commission, he observed to the Prince, "that it was a custom now, when men were not willing to submit to what they were enjoined, to say that it was against their honour; that their honour would not suffer them to do this or that: for his part, he could not obey his Highness at this time without resolving to lose his honour, which he knew he must; but, since his Highness thought it necessary to command him, he was ready to obey him with the loss of his honour."

His judgment proved but too correct. He had barely time to make a feeble attempt to relieve Exeter, then closely besieged, when Fairfax, with ten thousand well-disciplined and seasoned troops, overtook him at Torrington, where, with a desperate gallantry, he faced about, and awaited the attack which was to close his long and faithful services. Abandoned, at the first onset of the enemy, by a great part of his army; his horse killed under him, and himself wounded in the face by a pike; he retired with a small party, by Stratton, the scene of his former triumph, into Cornwall; and presently after went to the Isle of Scilly, where the Prince of Wales had lately taken refuge. From thence he shortly after passed over into Flanders, where having long employed himself in unavailing efforts to serve the royal cause, he settled at length in the city of Bruges, and, dying there in the end of September, 1652, his body was carried to Sluys, where it remained unburied till after the restoration of

Charles the Second, when it was brought to England, and interred at Witham, with those of his ancestors.

Lord Hopton married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Arthur Capel, of Hadham, in Herts, aunt to Arthur, first Lord Capel, and widow of Sir Justinian Lewen, by whom he had no issue. His barony therefore, which had been granted to him and his heirs male, with a like remainder to his uncle, Sir Arthur Hopton, who died before him also childless, became extinct, and his four sisters succeeded to his estates as his coheirs. They were, Rachel, who married, first David Kemish, or Kemeys, of Kevenmably, in Glamorganshire, and, secondly, Thomas Morgan; Mary, wife of Henry, son and heir of Sir Thomas Mackworth, Bart.; Catherine, married to John Wyndham, ancestor, in the fifth degree, to George, now Earl of Egremont; and Margaret, to ——— Throckmorton.

EDWARD MACNVILLAN,

FOURTH EARL OF DORSET

OB. 1657.

EDWARD SACKVILLE,

FOURTH EARL OF DORSET,

OF his old Norman House, was the second surviving son of Robert, the second Earl, by Mary, only daughter of Thomas fourth Duke of Norfolk of the Howards, and was born in London in 1590. He was entered of Christ Church in 1605, and, having studied there for three years, left the University, either to travel on the Continent, or to seek in one of the Inns of Court that insight into the laws which at that time was so frequently thought necessary to young men of his rank—a contested point, undeserving of further enquiry. Lord Clarendon has left us so full a view of his earlier manhood, as well as of his character, that it will perhaps be better to place it here than elsewhere in this Memoir.

“The Earl of Dorset,” says the noble historian, contrasting his qualities to those of the unworthy Philip Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, “was to all intents, principles, and purposes, another man. His person beautiful, and graceful, and vigorous; his wit pleasant, sparkling, and sublime; and his other parts of learning and language of that lustre that he could not miscarry in the world. The vices he had were of the age, which he was not stubborn enough to contemn or resist. He was a younger brother, grandchild to the great-treasurer Buckhurst, created at the King’s first entrance Earl of Dorset, who took care and delight in the education of his grandchild, and left him a good support. for a younger brother, besides a wife who was heir to a fair fortune. As his person and parts were such as are before mentioned, so he gave them full scope without restraint, and indulged to his appetite all the pleasures that season of his life (the fullest of jollity and riot of any that preceded or succeeded) could tempt or suggest to him. He entered into a fatal quarrel, upon a subject very unwarrantable, with a young nobleman of Scotland, the Lord Bruce, upon which they both transported themselves into Flanders, and, attended only by two chirurgions, placed at a distance, and under an obligation not to stir but upon the fall of one of them, they fought under the walls of Antwerp, where the Lord Bruce fell dead upon the place, and S^r Edward Sackville (for so he was then called) being likewise hurt, retired into the monastery which was at hand ; nor did this miserable accident, which he always exceedingly lamented, make that thorough impression upon him but that he indulged still too much to those importunate and insatiate appetites, even of that individual person that had so lately embarked him in that desperate enterprise, being too much tinder" (not) "to be inflamed with those sparks. His elder brother did not enjoy his grandfather's titles many years before they descended, for want of heirs male, to the younger brother ; but in those few years the elder, by an excess of expense in all the ways to which money can be applied, so entirely consumed almost the whole great fortune that descended to him, that when he was forced to leave the title to his younger brother, he left upon the matter nothing to him to support it, which exposed him to many difficulties and inconveniences ; yet his known great parts, and the very good general reputation he had acquired, notwithstanding his defects, (for as he was eminent in the House of Commons whilst he sate there, so he shined in the House of Peers when he came to move in that sphere) inclined King James to call him to his Privy Council before his death, and if he had not too much cherished his natural constitution and propensity, and been too much grieved and wrung by an uneasy and streight fortune, he would have been an excellent man of business, for he had a very sharp discerning spirit, and was a man of an obliging nature, much honour, and great generosity; and of most entire fidelity to the Crown.”

The duel here mentioned was so remarkable a fact in his private life, as well as in the history of such personal contests, that though his own account of it has already more than once appeared in print, the present memoir could not but be considered imperfect were it to be omitted. Of the cause of enmity we have no information beyond the hint which we have just now seen, that it arose from amorous jealousy. It had been of many months' standing. A letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, of the ninth of January, 1612, says “there is a quarrel fallen out betwixt Edward Sackville, son to the late Earl of Dorset, and the Lord Bruce of Kinlos, which was to be determined beyond sea. Sackville got over, but the Lord Bruce staid at Dover.” It passed however for the time, but, on the sixth of the following May, we find in another letter of Court news to Winwood—“The old quarrel was renewed at Canterbury by the Lord Bruce of Kinlos upon Edward Sackville, at the Prince's being there. My Lord bare away two or three good buffets on the face (for Sackville had no weapon, having given his rapier instantly before to the Palsgrave) and so they were parted, and made friends, by the noblemen that were present. The Lord Bruce is since gone into France; I think to learn to fence.” A third, from Paris of the fifteenth of August, to Mr. Trumbull, Resident at Brussels, concludes—“the Lord Bruce is, within these few days, departed secretly from hence into the Low Countries, there to meet, and fight, as we understand, with Mr. Sackville, with whom he had a quarrel in England:” and, within a few days after that date, the fatal meeting at length took place. To contract as far as may be such extended quotations, I reluctantly omit four short but interesting letters which passed between the parties immediately previous to the tragedy, and will be presently alluded to; observing only that it must be inferred from one of them that they had once been affectionate friends, and hasten to Sackville's narrative of it, addressed to some person now unknown.

“ WORTHY SIR,

“ As I am not ignorant, so I ought to be sensible, of the false aspersions some authorless tongues have laid upon me in the reports of the unfortunate passage lately happened between the Lord Bruce and myself, which, as they are spread here, so may I justly fear they reign also where you are. There are but two ways to resolve doubts of this nature; by oath, or by sword. The first is due to magistrates, and communicable to friends; the other to such as maliciously slander, and impudently defend their assertions. Your love, not my merit, assure me you hold me your friend, which esteem I am much desirous to retain. Do me therefore the right to understand the truth of that, and in my behalf inform others, who either are, or may be, infected with sinister rumours, much prejudicial to that fair opinion I desire to hold amongst all worthy persons; and, on the faith of a gentleman, the relation I shall give is neither more nor less than the bare truth.

“ The inclosed contains the first citation, sent me from Paris by a Scottish gentleman, who delivered it me in Derbyshire, at my father-in-law’s house. After it follows my then answer, returned him by the same bearer. The next is my accomplishment of my first promise, being a particular assignation of place and weapon, which I sent by a servant of mine, by post from Rotterdam, as soon as I landed there. The receipt of which, joined with an acknowledgment of my too fair carriage to the deceased Lord, is testified by the last, which periods the business till we met at Tergose, in Zeland, it being the place allotted for rendezvous, where he, accompanied with one Mr. Crawford, an English gentleman, for his second, a surgeon, and a man, arrived with all the speed he could. And there having rendered himself, I addressed my second, Sir John Heidon, to let him understand that now all following should be done by consent, as concerning the terms whereon we should fight, as also the place. To our seconds we gave power for their appointments, who agreed we should go to Antwerp; from thence to Bergenopzoom, where in the midway but a village divides the States' territories from the Archduke's; and there was the destined stage, to the end that, having ended, he that could might presently exempt himself from the justice of the country by retiring into the dominion not offended. It was further concluded, that in case any should fall, or slip, that then the combat should cease, and he whose ill-fortune had so subjected him was to acknowledge his life to have been in the other's hands; but in case one party's sword should break, because that only could chance by hazard, it was agreed that the other should take no advantage, but either then be made friends, or else, upon even terms, go to it again. Thus these conclusions being by each of them related to his party, was by us both approved and assented to. Accordingly we re-embarked for Antwerp, and by reason my Lord (as I conceive, because he could not handsomely without danger of discovery) had not paired the sword I sent him to Paris, bringing one of the same length but twice as broad, my second excepted against it, and advised me to match my own, and send him the choice, which I obeyed, it being, you know, the challenger's privilege to elect his weapon.

“ At the delivery of the swords, which was performed by Sir John Heidon, it pleased the Lord Bruce to choose my own; and then, past expectation, he told him that he found himself so far behindhand as a little of my blood would not serve his turn, and therefore he was now resolved to have me alone, because he knew (for I will use his own words) that so worthy a gentleman and friend could not endure to stand by and see him do that which he must to satisfy himself and his honour. Thereunto Sir John Heidon replied that such intentions were bloody and butcherly, far unfitting so noble a personage, who should desire to bleed for reputation, not for life; withall adding he thought himself injured, being come thus far, now to be prohibited from executing those honourable offices he came for. The Lord, for answer, only reiterated his former resolution, the which, not for matter but manner, so moved me, as though, to my remembrance, I had not for a long while eaten more liberally than at dinner, and therefore unfit for such an action (seeing the surgeons hold a wound upon a full stomach much more dangerous than otherwise) I requested my second to certify I would presently decide the difference, and therefore he should presently meet me on horseback, only waited on by our surgeons, they being unarmed. Together we rode (but one before the other some twelve score) about two English miles, and then passion, having so weak an enemy to assail as my discretion, easily became victor, and, using his power, made me obedient to his command. I, being verily mad with anger the Lord Bruce should thirst after my life with a kind of assuredness, seeing I had come so far, and needlessly, to give him leave to regain his lost reputation, I bad him alight, which with willingness he quickly granted, and there, in a meadow, ancle deep in water at least, bidding farewell to our doublets, in our shirts began to charge each other, having afore commanded our surgeons to withdraw themselves a pretty distance from us, conjuring them besides, as they respected our favour or their own safeties, not to stir, but to suffer us to execute our pleasure, we being fully resolved (God forgive us) to dispatch each other by what means we could.

“I made a thrust at my enemy, but was short, and in drawing back my arm I received a great wound thereon, which I interpreted as a reward for my short shooting, but, in revenge, I pressed in to him, though I then missed him also, and then I received a wound in my right pap, which passed level through my body, and almost to my back. And there we wrestled for the two greatest and dearest prizes we could ever expect trial for, honour and life ; in which struggling my hand, having but an ordinary glove on it, lost one of his servants, though the meanest, which hung by a skin, and to sight yet remaineth as before, and I am put in hope one day to recover the use of it again. But at last, breathless, yet keeping our holds, there past on both sides propositions of keeping each other's sword ; but when amity was dead confidence could not live, and who should quit first was the question, which in neither part either would perform ; and, re-striving again afresh, with a kick and a wrench together, I freed my captived weapon, which incontinently levying at his throat, being master still of his, I demanded if he would ask his life, or yield his sword ? both which, though in that imminent danger, he bravely denied to do. Myself being wounded, and feeling loss of blood, having three conduits running on me, began to make me faint ; and he courageously persisting not to accord to either of my propositions, remembrance of his bloody desire, and feeling of my present estate, I struck at his heart, but, with his avoiding, missed my aim, yet passed through the body, and, drawing back my sword, repassed it through again, through another place ; when he cried ' Oh ! I am slain : ' seconding his speech with all the force he had to cast me : but, being too weak, after I had defended his assault, I easily became master of him, laying him on his back, when, being upon him, I redemanded if he would request his life ? but it seemed he prized it not at so dear a rate to be beholden for it, and bravely replied he scorned it ; which answer of his was so noble and worthy as I protest I could not find in my heart to offer him any more violence, only keeping him down, till at length his surgeon, afar off, cried out he would immediately die if his wounds were not stopped, whereupon I asked if he desired his surgeon should come ; which he accepted of ; and so, being drawn away, I never offered to take his sword, accounting it inhuman to rob a dead man, for so I held him to be.

“ This thus ended, I retired to my surgeon, in whose arms after I had remained a while, for want of blood I lost my sight, and withal, as I then thought, my life also ; but strong water, and his diligence, quickly recovered me, when I escaped a great danger ; for my Lord's surgeon, when nobody dreamed of it, came full at me with my Lord's sword ; and had not mine, with my sword, interposed himself, I should have been slain by those base hands ; although my Lord Bruce, weltering in his blood, and past all expectation of life, conformable to all his former carriage, which was undoubtedly noble, cried out, ‘ Rascal, hold thy hand.’ So may I prosper as I have dealt sincerely with you in this relation, which I pray you, with the inclosed letter, deliver to my Lord Chamberlain : and so, &c.

“ ED. SACKVILLE.”

It does not appear that any public proceeding was instituted against Sackville, or that he suffered any diminution of the favour of the pacific James, or that the family of the deceased nobleman showed any disposition to avenge the sanguinary loss of their kinsman. The amiable features of “the age of chivalry” had nearly passed away, but the ferocity of man yet preserved and cherished some of its worst usages ; and the blame of this frightful homicide was rather due to the manners of the time than to the individual fury of the victor.

Sackville however had been bred in the cultivation and practice of almost the whole of that beautiful, though irregular, system. Among the rest, he had peculiarly studied the history, the laws and regulations, of dignities, hereditary and personal, in every part of Europe ; and such reputation had he in this branch of chivalrous science that in the year 1625, on a question of precedency between the younger sons of Earls, and Privy Counsellors, being Knights, which was thought important enough to be argued in the King’s presence, he was chosen by the former class to be their advocate, and it is said that James’s decision in their favour was obtained through his sound reasoning and eloquence on a subject with which he was entirely acquainted. He was indeed one of the most accomplished orators of his time in the House of Commons, where he represented the county of Sussex during the most part of James’s reign, and was held in yet higher respect for the independence and purity of his principles than for those ornamental talents which about that time began to find their value in that assembly. Rushworth has preserved one of his speeches, on the subject of supplies for the recovery of the Palatinate, which furnishes striking proofs of both, and affords at least one of the best examples of his day, as well in thought as in expression. He had a command in the forces sent to that unfortunate country in 1620, and fought in the decisive battle of Prague, which occurred in the conclusion of that year ; in the summer of the following was employed on a mission to the Queen Regent of France ; and on his return was sworn of the Privy Council.

In the spring of 1624, he succeeded to the Earldom, on the death of his brother Richard without male issue, and to an estate impoverished by his imprudence. The accession of Charles immediately followed, when, on the fifteenth of May, 1625, he was chosen a Knight of the Garter, and, on the establishment, immediately after, of her household, was appointed Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, the most important office, considered either as to dignity or emolument, ever held by him. He was however always employed in a multiplicity of affairs scarcely worthy of his rank or talents, and yet too important to disgrace either. Thus he was successively joined with others of the Privy Council in commissions to enquire into the causes of the decay of trade ; to control the erection of buildings in the city and suburbs of London ; to execute martial law on murderers and robbers in the county of Sussex ; to inquire into the state of the King's revenues ; to take cognizance of accidents which might occur at sea between the King's subjects and foreigners, to the interruption of peace ; to examine proceedings in the Court of Admiralty regarding prizes ; to survey the arms in the Tower of London ; to compound for knighthood ; to examine and purchase Sir Robert Cotton's manuscripts ; to regulate the fisheries on the English coast ; to superintend the repair of St. Paul's Cathedral; to encourage the plantation of the colony of Virginia; with many others of no higher class in public affairs, if we except a commission issued in January, 1627, N.S., to him and others for the supervision of affairs in Ireland; another, in the following month, to treat of an alliance with the States General; and a third, presently after, appointing him one of a standing council of war. For all these services he seems to have received no further permanent reward than grants of the offices of High Steward and Keeper of the Honour of Grafton; Constable of the Castle of Beaumaris; and Lord Lieutenant of the county of Middlesex.

This nobleman died on the seventeenth of July, 1652, and was buried with his ancestors at Withiam, in Sussex. We are told, incredibly enough, that on the murder of the King, he made, and kept, a resolution never again to go out of his house. If this be a fable, it proves at least the general reputation at the time of his excessive attachment to his unhappy master, or to the system of government which was overthrown by his death, or to both. He married Mary, daughter and heir of Sir George Curzon, of Croxhall, in Derbyshire, and had issue by her two sons; Richard, lineal ancestor to the Dukes of Dorset; and Edward; and a daughter, Mary, who died young.

JOHN ALDEN,

OB. 1654.

JOHN SELDEN.

MR. SELDEN was certainly the most learned, and perhaps the most honest Englishman of his time. He was actually a patriot, for his continued efforts to serve his country, however frequently he might have mistaken the means, seem never for a moment to have incurred even a suspicion of selfishness. Wealth, power, and dignities, had been laid at his feet, and refused by him. Firm in his occasional resistance to that royal prerogative, the limits of which no man could so well define as himself; incapable of private resentment for public causes; indifferent to popularity, and despising the hypocritical fanaticism by which it was then the fashion to court it; he stood almost alone, a perfect example of public integrity. His patriotism extended to, and guided even his literary studies. The final object of all his works was to improve the history of the religion, the laws, the government, or the liberties, of his country. In the prosecution of his profound inquiries he disdained conjecture, and avoided argument. Devoted by his nature to the love of truth, he could not rest on his way till he had arrived at facts; and influenced by the habit of his profession, he considered those only as facts which he could prove by the most rigid evidence. To qualify himself to search for such proofs, even to the remotest sources of intelligence, he had added to the most critical skill in what are usually called the learned languages, an intimate knowledge perhaps of all others which could boast a written alphabet. Some sparks of vanity in the composition of his mind would have placed his fame far beyond that of a few prodigies of learning who have been so frequently celebrated ; but he sought not for notoriety, and did not affect either to be absent, or slovenly, or morose, or melancholy. It is perhaps therefore that he may be seldom recollected, while we talk with much interest of the Florentine Magliabechi, and of others who were very inferior to Selden.

This great man was the eldest son of Thomas Selden, of Salvington, a small village on the Sussex coast, not far from Arundel, who seems to have been of the highest order of yeomanry, and who had probably increased his means by having married Margaret, only daughter and heir of Thomas Baker of Rustington, a neighbouring parish, descended from an ancient knightly family of the county. Of these parents he was born on the sixteenth of December, 1584. He was sent, very young, to the free school of Chichester, and from thence, at the age of fourteen, to Hart Hall, in Oxford, where he astonished every one by the rapidity with which he mastered all the usual difficulties of academical study. His family, rather perhaps than his own inclination, had destined him for the profession of the law, and he removed therefore at the end of four years, to Clifford's Inn, and in May, 1604, was admitted of the Inner Temple. Here he soon practised extensively as a chamber counsel, but we scarcely hear of him at the bar, and his absence from it has been attributed to his consciousness of some deficiency of requisite talents, but surely this is very extravagantly conjectured of one who became soon after a frequent speaker in Parliament. May it not be ascribed with much more probability to the aversion which might reasonably be expected in such a man to the sophisms and misrepresentations by which an advocate is unhappily so frequently bound to sacrifice truth and justice to the interests of his client ? In the intervals which could be spared from the exercise of his profession, he employed himself incessantly in searching into the origin and history of all laws, in all their branches ; and, at the age of twenty-two, completed a treatise in Latin on the civil government of Britain, before the coming of the Normans. This work, notwithstanding many errors and omissions, was esteemed a wonderful performance for so young a student, and the approbation with which it was received encouraged him to pursue the subject, and to enlarge on some detached parts of it, in several tracts published mostly in the year 1610, under the titles of "Jani Anglorum facies altera;" "England's Epinomis;" and an Essay on Single Combat. Nor was his pen then solely confined to antiquities of law, for in 1612 he printed "Notes and Illustrations on the first eighteen Songs of Drayton's Polyolbion," a poem for its historical and other learning worthy of such a commentator.

His acquaintance was now sought by the most eminent literary men of his time. Archbishop Usher knew him so early as 1609, and they contracted an earnest friendship for each other, which continued unimpaired during Selden's life. Camden, Spelman, and Sir Robert Cotton, became his familiar companions. Ben Jonson lived in a strict intimacy with him, and Selden caught from the learned poet rather perhaps an inclination than a taste for English as well as Latin verse, for the few compositions left by him contain nothing very remarkable; though Suckling, unwilling to lose an opportunity of showing respect to him, has given him a very honourable seat in the "Session of Poets." Perhaps the most favourable specimen of his muse is to be found in a short compliment to the author, prefixed to the Pastorals of William Browne, which I will insert for the sake of presenting this "great dictator of learning to the English nation," as he is called by a German writer, in a character so wide of the course of his usual studies.

So much a stranger my severer muse
 Is not to love-strains or a shepherd's reed,
 But that she knows some rites of Phæbus' dues,
 Of Pan, of Pallas, and her sister's meed.
 Read, and commend, she durst these tuned essays
 Of him that loves her; she hath ever found

Her studies as one circle. Next she prays
 His readers be with rose and myrtle crown'd:
 No willow touch them! as his bays are free
 From wrong of bolts so may their chaplets be.

J. SELDEN, Juris C.

In 1614 he published his great work on Titles of Honour, comprehending, without the smallest omission, the history of all ranks in society which have acquired distinct denominations, and tracing them gradually to their original institutions and functions. The vast display of learning, and the exquisite correctness, which distinguish this extraordinary book, spread his reputation throughout the whole of Europe: but he was even then employed in a work of higher erudition—his treatise on the Deities of the ancient Syrians, intended as a commentary on all the passages of the Old Testament relating to the idols of the heathens, and discussing therefore not only the Syrian, but the Arabian, Egyptian, Persian, African, and European idolatry. It appeared in 1617; and in the following year he published his "History of Tythes," in which, without arguing against the divine right by which the church assumes to hold them, he cited numerous authorities of much weight which tended to invalidate it. The clergy, with good reason, were greatly alarmed, and the King not less offended. James, however, consented to hear his apology personally, and he was introduced for that purpose by Ben Jonson, as is said, and received more mildly than he had expected. The King pointed out some objectionable passages, particularly one from which it might have been inferred that the twenty-fifth of December was not the true birth-day of our Saviour, and desired Selden to sanction the received opinion on that subject by a small treatise; which, finding nothing in the concession against his conscience, he promised to write, and presented it accordingly to James on Christmas-day, which fell shortly after. The storm seemed thus to have blown over; but, within a very few weeks, he was cited before the High Commission Court, which, having exacted from him a submission, though in no very humiliating terms, prohibited the sale of his book; the King, at the same time, forbidding him, under pain of imprisonment, to reply to any of the animadversions which might be written on it.

He was now to take a part in that mighty political scene which was then opening. In 1621, James, having most imprudently asserted in a speech to the Parliament that the privileges of both Houses were originally grants from the Crown, the Lords did Mr. Selden the honour to refer that great question to his opinion, in delivering which he wholly denied the position; at the same time honestly defending the fair prerogative, with more warmth than they either expected or desired. He was consulted on the same occasion, though with less form, by the Commons; and the famous protest made by them, immediately before the dissolution of that Parliament, was attributed not only to his advice, but to his pen. For these facts he was imprisoned, by an order of the Council, of the sixteenth of June, which directed that no "person should be suffered to speak with him; nor should word, message, or writing, be received by him; and that a gentleman of trust should be appointed to remain with him," &c. He immediately addressed to Sir George Calvert, one of the Secretaries of State, the following letter, which, were it only for the cool firmness which it exhibits, certainly deserves a place in this memoir.

Most honored S^r,

This most unlookt for imprisonm^t w^{ch} I now suffer, (but why, on my soule, I cannot guesse) falls in a time when I have divers businesses of private men's in my hands, and under my direction. The warrant of my commitm^t is somewhat strict. My humble suite to y^r Honor is that, through yo^r favor, I may have granted to me so much libertie here as that I may have speech wth my friends upon such kinde of business, openly, and in the hearing of those gentlemen who are trusted wth me: and I professe it, on the hope of my salvation, that there is not a seacret that hath, or can possibly have, any reference to the publike touching w^{ch} I desire either to heare or tell any thing, from or to any p^{erson} living, so cleare is my brest, and I beseech yo^r Honor let me be dispatched in the making it appeare. Soe I humblie beseech you alsoe that my papers, w^{ch} are the labors of many houres, and a greate parte of the furniture of my studie in my p^{rofession}, among which there is nothing that was written for seacret, may be safe. Let me obtain these suites now; and my lib^{erty} once had, w^{ch} I knowe I nev^{er} deserved to loose, I shall expresse me ever humblie at yo^r Honor's service.

JO. SELDEN.

Notwithstanding this apparent rigour he was liberated at the end of five weeks, at the intercession of the Lord Keeper Williams, a letter from whom to the Duke of Buckingham, to that effect, is extant. During his confinement he prepared for the press the historical work of Eadmer, a monk of Canterbury, and enriched it by numerous notes: and in the dedication of it to Williams, thanks that prelate for having procured his release.

In 1623 he was returned a Burgess for the town of Lancaster, and in the Parliaments which were called in the first and second years of Charles the First was elected for Great Bedwin, in Wiltshire. He had confined himself for four years chiefly to his literary labours, but in the beginning of this reign engaged again with great warmth in politics. He was chosen of the committee for forming articles of impeachment against the Duke of Buckingham, and appointed one of the managers at his proposed trial. After the dissolution of the Parliament in which those matters were agitated, he appeared among the firm opposers of the loan which Charles had unhappily been advised to levy on the authority of his prerogative, and pleaded in the Court of King's Bench for Hampden, who had been imprisoned for refusing to submit to it. In the House of Commons he was a speaker on the popular side on all the great questions of that eventful period, and his speeches were regarded as the dictates of an oracle. He became so formidable to the government, that it was resolved to prevent his attendance in Parliament by secluding his person, and, on the twenty-fourth of March, 1628, he was committed to the Tower, on a charge of having uttered seditious expressions, and attempted to excite contempt against the State. After seven months' confinement, the Judges proposed that he should be released, on giving security for his good behaviour, but he stedfastly rejected the offer. He was then removed to the prison of the King's Bench, and soon after prosecuted in the Star-chamber, for publishing a libel which had been written in the late reign by Sir Robert Dudley, intituled "a Proposition for his Majesty's service, to bridle the impertinence of Parliaments." By the favour of the Earl of Portland, Lord Treasurer, he was transferred to a nominal restraint in the Gatehouse, Westminster, and went for nearly three months into the country, at the end of which he was again committed to the King's Bench prison, and remained there till May, 1631, when he was admitted to bail, that he might be enabled to appear in the Courts, on the matters of a great suit then pending between the heirs of Gilbert Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, and afterwards bailed, from term to term, till July, 1634, when he was finally discharged: having, for four years together, incessantly solicited in vain for a writ of Habeas Corpus. The literary fruits of this second seclusion were his four treatises on ancient Jewish law—"De successionibus in Bona defuncti—De successione in Pontificatum Hebræorum—De Jure naturali et gentium,"—and "Uxor Hebraica, sive de nuptiis ac divortiis."

This rigorous, and indeed illegal, prosecution, neither soured his temper, nor warped the impartiality of his judgment. We find him, even before he was absolutely released, on a Committee of members of the Inns of Court for the management of the masque to be presented before their Majesties on Candlemas night, 1633 ; so rendering an agreeable compliment to the King, while he opposed the fanatical Prynne, though a great favourite of his party, who had written outrageously against all dramatic representations. Soon after too he published, at Charles's special desire, his celebrated treatise "Mare Clausum, seu de Dominio Maris," which he had written some years before, in opposition to the "Mare Liberum" of Grotius. The King, in Council, commanded that copies of this book, the doctrines of which were so important to the interests, as well as flattering to the prejudices, of the country, should be preserved always in the chests of the Privy Council, the Court of Exchequer, and the Court of Admiralty ; and the immediate concession of the Dutch to pay an annual tribute to the Crown of England for their fishery was ascribed in a great measure to the arguments of Selden. The sternness however of his political opinions and practice remained undiminished. In the Parliaments of 1640, and 1641, in which he sat for the University of Oxford, he was among the foremost of those who opposed the Court ; joined with vehemence in the prosecution of the Earl of Strafford ; and, perhaps inexcusably, (for who will subscribe to the praise of that Roman virtue which can disdain the ties of private gratitude ?) of Archbishop Laud, from whom he had for many years experienced constant friendship and favour. Certainly he was a bitter enemy to the Hierarchy, and the votes which deprived the Bishops of their seats in Parliament, and the clergy in general of all temporal jurisdiction, had the earnest support both of his voice and his pen.

It was at this period, 1642, that the King, then at York, tendered to him the custody of the Great Seal. Charles took this step with the concurrence of those excellent men, Mr. Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, and Lord Falkland, who admired Selden as much for his virtues as for his wisdom and learning.

They entertained a hope that he had lately become somewhat disgusted at the increased violence of his party, for, though he had voted against the King's commission of array, he had supported with much force and warmth of argument the Royal Prerogative as to the Militia; but he declined the offer, by a letter to Lord Falkland, from the terms of which it may be clearly inferred that he had determined never to serve the King separately from the Parliament. Some knowledge of this correspondence got abroad, and a rumour arose that he had engaged with Edmund Waller, and others, to deliver up London to the King; and Selden, forgetting for a moment the grandeur of his own character, condescended to deny the charge on his oath. He now engaged more deeply with the Parliament party, and in 1643 was chosen one of the lay members of the assembly of Presbyterian clergy, and soon after subscribed to that wretched bond of rebellion between England and Scotland which bore the name of "the solemn league and covenant." In the same year he was appointed by the Parliament Keeper of the Records in the Tower; in 1645 one of the Commissioners of the Admiralty; and in 1646 the sum of five thousand pounds was voted to him, as a compensation for his sufferings in the public service, but it is said that he refused to receive it.

Amidst the horrors which shortly followed that period, the endeavours of the honest of either party became wholly useless. Mr. Selden had taken his full share in paving the way towards them, but he retired with a clear conscience. While the great mass of his political compeers had been swayed by ambition, vanity, resentment, or avarice, patriotism had been the motive, and the law of the land the index, to his public conduct. He returned with eagerness to his studies, and sat down to commence a work of stupendous erudition which he had long contemplated—"De Synedris et Prefecturis veterum Hebræorum," of which he lived to finish but three books, which were published singly, but at length appeared together in 1679, "which last edition," says Wood, "had divers corrections made, by reason of the many languages, twenty in number, therein." He wrote also, shortly before his death, a biographical and critical preface to "Decem Scriptores Anglicanæ," and "Vindiciæ secundum integritatem existimationis suæ per convitium de descriptione Maris Clausi," in which he detailed many circumstances of his own story. His works which have not been already mentioned here were Notes on Fortescue de laudibus legum Angliæ, and on the Sums of Sir Ralph Hengham, 1616—Marmora Arundeliàna, &c. 1628—Discourse on the Judicature of the Peers and Commons, 1640—Answer to Sir Harbottle Grimston's Argument for Bishops, 1641—Discourse on the Rights of the Subject, in a conference between the two Houses, 1642—Privileges of the Baronage in Parliament, 1642—Versio et Comment. ad Eutychiei Eccl. Alex. Origines, 1642—De Anno civili et calendario Judaico, 1644, and 1683—Dissertatio Historica ad Fletam—Discourse of the Office of Lord Chancellor—De Nummis—and two treatises, of the Origin of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction of Testaments, and of Administration to the Goods of Intestates: the five last named were not published till long after his death.

He died on the thirtieth of November, 1654, of a gradual decline, at the Friery House, in White Friars, which he possessed as residuary legatee to Elizabeth (Talbot) Dowager Countess of Kent, with whom, as well as with her Lord, he maintained for many years the strictest friendship. He derived from that lady other property, to a considerable amount, and had gained much in the exercise of his profession, and having lived a bachelor, and with no disposition to expense, except in the purchasing of books, he died very rich. He had once (according to Burnet, in his life of Sir Matthew Hale, who was one of Selden's executors,) bequeathed his curious and extensive library to the University of Oxford, but had in great part revoked the legacy, in anger, because a bond for one thousand pounds had been required of him there, as a security for the loan of a manuscript. He left it therefore in the disposal of his executors, forbidding them however to sell it; and they proposed to bestow it on the Inner Temple, where it actually remained for five years in some chambers hired for the purpose ; but the Society having so long neglected to build a room for its reception, the executors finally placed it in the Bodleian Library, where it remains, together with his collection of ancient sculptures, and other antiquities. He was buried, by his own order, in the Temple Church, Archbishop Usher preaching his funeral sermon.

The parliamentary character of Selden was not long since given by an anonymous author, in a periodical paper, in the following terms : the truth, the comprehensive conciseness, and the manly beauty of expression of which, are equally admirable.—“Selden was a member of the Long Parliament, and took an active and useful part in many important discussions and transactions. He appears to have been regarded somewhat in the light of a valuable piece of national property, like a museum, or great public library, resorted to, as a matter of course, and a matter of right, in all the numerous cases in which assistance was wanted from any part of the whole compass of legal and historical learning. He appeared in the national council not so much the representative of the contemporary inhabitants of a particular city, as of all the people of all past ages ; concerning whom, and whose institutions, he was deemed to know whatever was to be known, and to be able to furnish whatever, within so vast a retrospect, was of a nature to give light and authority in the decision of questions arising in a doubtful and hazardous state of the national affairs.”

JAMES STUART,

DUKE OF RICHMOND.

OB 1655.

JAMES STUART,

DUKE OF RICHMOND.

THE Duke of Richmond was perhaps the only person of that great and honourable class distinguished by the general appellation "Royalists," who followed the fortunes of Charles the First from mere personal affection, and who was held by that Prince in the most unlimited tenderness of friendship. They were of the same family, the same country, and the same character. Both were distinguished by plain good sense; by a cool unvarying integrity; an exact sense of honour; a reserve which was the result more of temper than of prudence; and by a perfect freedom from vice. "The higher he was," says Lloyd, "the less he desired to seem, affecting rather the worth than the pomp of nobleness; therefore his courtesy was his nature, not his craft, and his affableness not a base and servile popularity, or an ambitious insinuation, but the native gentleness of his character, and his true value of himself." With these dispositions, the Duke was rather a benefit than an ornament to the court; rather a pillar for the security of the state than an engine to forward its operations.

He was the eldest son of Esme Stuart, Duke of Lenox (who was first cousin, once removed, to King James the First), by Catherine, daughter and sole heir of Sir Henry Darcy, of Brimham, in the county of York, and was born on the sixth of April, 1612. His father died in the prime of life, leaving him an infant of the age of twelve years, with six brothers and four sisters; and James, who also died soon after, took them under his special protection, with a degree of distinction, which however their kindred to him seemed but justly to challenge. From a family thus in a manner bequeathed by the King to the kindness of his successor, Charles selected, without neglecting the rest, the young Duke as his favourite child, and a mutual interchange of sympathies, which were all but in fact parental and filial, unfolded gradually into a strict and noble friendship between them. The King took on himself to superintend the completion of his education, and sent him to travel through France, Italy, and Spain, where the distinction of a Grandee of the first class was conferred on him; and, on his return, when scarcely twenty-one years of age, he was called to the Privy Council, and married, by Charles's recommendation, to the only child of the deceased favourite, Buckingham, with whom he received a portion, in those days esteemed very great, of twenty thousand pounds. The offices of Lord Steward of the Royal Household, and Warden of the Cinque Ports, were soon after bestowed on him, together with the Order of the Garter.

Such was his state when the furious commencement of the Long Parliament drew him into the vortex of politics. He became presently an object of jealousy and disgust with the leaders of the popular party in that ominous assembly. In Scotland, where the seeds of discontent had been first sown, he possessed a powerful influence, which he had already opposed, with skill as well as with resolution, to the plans of those of his own rank there who strove to promote division, and had so rendered essential service to the royal cause; but he now declared himself openly in the House of Peers, where he sat as a Baron, an utter enemy to all those concessions which it had been proposed in Parliament to make to his insurgent countrymen, on whose success the fairest hopes of mischief had been founded by the disaffected here. Thus, while he incurred in England the resentment of one faction, he was in Scotland held in universal distrust by another. "He was a man of honour and fidelity," says Lord Clarendon, "in all places, and in no degree of confidence with his countrymen, because he would not admit himself into their intrigues." He was soon assailed in the House of Commons; and Clarendon, who was then a member of that body, describes thus, in his History of the Rebellion, the motive and method of the attack, which was made just after the death of the Earl of Strafford, and the expedient which he himself used to render it for the time fruitless.

"Their design," says he, "was to remove the Duke of Richmond from the King; both because they had a mind to have his office of Warden of the Cinque Ports from him, that it might be conferred on the Earl of Warwick, and as he was almost the only man of great quality and consideration about the King who did not in the least degree stoop or make court to them, but crossed them boldly in the House, and all other ways pursued his master's service, with his utmost vigour and intentness of mind. They could not charge him with any thing like a crime, and therefore only intended to brand him, and make him odious, by which they presumed they should at last make him willing to ransom himself by quitting that office, for which there was some underhand treaty by persons who were solicitous to prevent further inconveniences, and, as they found any thing like to succeed in that, they slackened or advanced their discourse of evil counsellors. One day they were very warm upon the argument, and had a purpose to have named him directly, which they had hitherto forborne to do, when Mr. Hyde stood up, and said, 'he did really believe that there yet remained some evil counsellors, who did much harm about the King; and that it would be much better to name them than to amuse the House so often with the general mention of them, as if we were afraid to name them. He proposed that there might be a day appointed, on which, upon due reflections upon those who had been most notorious in doing mischief to the public, we might most probably find out who they were who trod still in the same paths, and name them accordingly; and that, for his part, if a day were appointed for that discovery, he would be ready to name one who, by all the marks we could judge by, and by his former course of life, might very easily be believed to be an evil counsellor.' They were exceedingly apprehensive that he meant the Marquis of Hamilton, who was very dear to them ; and thenceforward, though they desisted not from prosecuting the Duke till at last they had compelled him to quit the Cinque Ports to the Earl of Warwick, they no more urged the discovery of evil counsellors ; and all the familiar friends of Mr. Hyde were importuned to move him not to endeavour to do any prejudice to the Marquis of Hamilton."

The same historian furnishes us with another anecdote, which, while it relates to the Duke, will serve to show how little the privileges of Parliament were then understood, or at least valued, by the members of both Houses, or how ready the popular party was to sacrifice madly those privileges to their hatred of the King and his friends. Upon the proposal of some matter in the House of Lords which was not agreeable to that party, many of them, in a tumultuous manner which was not then usual in either House of Parliament, cried " adjourn, adjourn ;" on which the Duke of Richmond, without addressing himself to the chair, was overheard to say to some around him, that, if they would adjourn, he wished it might be for six months. These words, so uttered, were interpreted to be a regular motion, which, had they been so, would have been but strictly parliamentary ; and it was immediately determined that the House should not rise, and that " the Duke should explain himself, and answer the making such a motion as, being granted, would be destructive to the commonwealth." The Duke said that " he had made no motion, but used that expression to show his dislike of the other motion, to adjourn ; and that when he spoke, all men being on their feet, and out of their places, he conceived that the House had been up." He was, however, required to withdraw, and, at the conclusion of a fierce debate of many hours, it was resolved, by a small majority, that he had committed no offence, against which vote several Peers entered their protest. But the matter ended not there. On the following day it was taken up in the House of Commons with the greatest fury, and, after one of the longest discussions ever known there, it was determined that they should accuse the Duke of Richmond to the Lords as "one of the malignant party, and an evil counsellor to his Majesty, and should desire them to join in a request to the King that he might be removed from any office or employment about his Majesty's person." The Peers tamely and patiently received the proposition, which was delivered with much solemnity, and testified no further resentment at so monstrous a breach of their privileges than by silently forbearing to take the matter into their further consideration.

On the eighth of August, 1641, the King conferred on him the title of Duke of Richmond, which had been by James the First revived in his uncle, Lodowick, Duke of Lenox, and had become extinct by that nobleman's death without issue; and the next day he set out towards Scotland with Charles, who had probably chosen that precise time to raise him to the highest rank of the English Peerage as a compliment to his country, which might, considering the character of that people, be agreeably received there, even by the party which he opposed. A few weeks after his return the war commenced, in the very outset of which he was one of the eleven eminent persons whom the Parliament proscribed by name in their instructions to the Earl of Essex, their general. He placed three of his brothers, two of whom had then scarcely attained to manhood, in the royal army, and they were all engaged in the battle of Edgehill, the first action that occurred, in which the eldest, who was called Lord Aubigny, was killed, as were afterwards the Lord John Stuart, at the battle of Alresford, and the Lord Bernard, (who, for his admirable gallantry, had been created Earl of Lichfield,) at Chester. The Duke himself remained constantly about the King's person, which was, in fact, his proper station in those miserable times; not so much for the office which he held in the royal household, as for that perfect affection and fidelity which rendered his presence at once a consolation and a security to his afflicted master.

In 1644 he was placed at the head of the council then appointed by the King for the government of the Prince of Wales, and was in the following year named first commissioner for the treaty of Uxbridge, in the course of which he gave ample proofs that he was by no means deficient in the best qualities of a statesman, as indeed he had before in the negotiations at Oxford, and with the Scottish commissioners in London. He persevered in his attendance on Charles, till his Majesty, without communicating the design even to him, fled from Oxford on the twenty-seventh of April, 1646, to throw himself into the arms of the Scots; and from thenceforth the Duke saw him no more till he was a prisoner in Carisbrook Castle, when, at the King's special desire, he was permitted by the rebels to resume, for a short time, the performance of his personal duties. The next request, on the behalf of what remained of royalty in the land, which they granted more reluctantly, was made by himself—to be allowed to lay in the grave the mangled remains of his beloved sovereign, to save whose life he had solemnly offered the vicarious sacrifice of his own. That sad office performed, he retired into utter privacy, and died, as has been said with great probability, of the gradual effects of grief, on the thirtieth of March, 1655, leaving an only son, Esme, who succeeded to his titles, and died in France, aged about ten years, in 1660; and an only daughter, Mary, married to Richard Butler, Earl of Arran, second son of James, Duke of Ormond.

Lord Clarendon tells us that “he was a man of very good parts, and an excellent understanding, yet, which is no common infirmity, so diffident of himself that he was sometimes led by men who judged much worse. He was of a great and haughty spirit, and so punctual in point of honour that he never swerved a tittle. He had so entire a resignation of himself to the King that he abhorred all artifices to shelter himself from the prejudice of those who, how powerful soever, failed in their duty to his Majesty ; and therefore he was pursued with all imaginable malice by them, as one that would have no quarter upon so infamous terms as but looking on while his master was ill used. As he had received great bounties from the King, so he sacrificed all he had to his service as soon as his occasions stood in need of it, and lent his Majesty at one time twenty thousand pounds together ; and, as soon as the war begun, engaged his three brothers, all gallant gentlemen, in the service, in which they all lost their lives. Himself lived with unspotted fidelity some years after the murder of his master ; and was suffered to put him into his grave, and died without the comfort of seeing the resurrection of the Crown.”

Dr. Birch, in giving some account of the life of this nobleman, has fallen, which was not usual with him, into many gross errors. He states that the Duke succeeded to the dukedom of Richmond on the death of his father, who never had that title ; and accommodates that mistake to another, by fixing the date of his father's death, which happened in 1623, to 1640. He speaks too of the offices of Lord Chamberlain, and High Admiral, of Scotland, as having been conferred on the subject of this memoir by King Charles the First, when they were in fact hereditary, or to use the Scottish term, heritable, in his family : they devolved on him necessarily, therefore, with his title of Duke of Lenox. There is a tradition that the Duke, when on his travels, was preserved from assassination by a favourite dog which lay in his chamber, and aroused him from his sleep ; and it is added, that his master from that time distinguished him by a collar set with pearls. It is scarcely enough to say that the picture which is here engraved seems strongly to allude to the circumstance in question ; for the age at which the Duke is represented, the singularity of his dress, or rather undress the dog, and the pearled collar, combine to tell, hieroglyphically, nearly the whole of the story. Nothing is wanting but the assassin, who may be supposed to have fled.

ROBERT RICH,

EARL OF WARWICK

OB. 1658.

ROBERT RICH,

SECOND EARL OF WARWICK,

Of his newly raised family, was the eldest son of Robert, the first Earl, and great-grandson of Sir Richard Rich, who rose from obscurity in the profession of the law, and became Lord Chancellor, and a Baron, in the reign of Edward the Sixth. His mother was Penelope, daughter of Walter Devereux, Earl of Essex, a lady whose flagrant disgrace has been already more than once unwillingly recorded in this work.

He was born in May or June, in the year 1587, and probably consumed his youth and early manhood in those alternations of indolence and useless activity so common among the heirs-apparent of the nobility and gentry of his time, and for many succeeding years. The death of his father made way for his inheritance of the Earldom in 1618, but we hear not of him, either in the Court or Parliament, or in any kind of public employment, till the year 1625, when, during the preparations for the ill-managed expedition to Cadiz, he was appointed, on a rumour that the Spaniards had projected an invasion on the coast of Essex, to command the militia of that county, in which lay his estates, and to watch over the security of Harwich, and the neighbouring ports. A blank of several years now again occurred in his history, during which he attached himself to the puritans, and indulged, as they gradually became dangerous, a growing ambition to be considered as their leader. He attained to that honour, such as it was, and "was looked upon," as

Lord Clarendon informs us, "as their greatest patron, because of much the greatest estate of all who favoured them, and so was esteemed by them with great application and veneration, though he was of a life very licentious, and unconformable to their professed rigour, which they rather dispensed with than they would withdraw from a House where they received so eminent a protection, and such notable bounty."

This sort of influence, together with a cool head, and a persevering disposition, recommended him powerfully to the republican party, whose confidence he presently obtained, and in whose measures he joined with a sudden alacrity, and even violence, which induced unfounded suspicions that he had engaged himself in some deep specific design against the State. In 1640 therefore, soon after the dissolution of the Parliament which met on the thirteenth of April, his house, and even his pockets, were searched, by Sir William Becher, a clerk of the Privy Council, under a warrant from the Secretary of State, in expectation of finding treasonable papers. This imprudent measure, especially as it proved fruitless, naturally increased his rancour, and was taken up with great warmth at the meeting of the Long Parliament, when Becher was committed to the Fleet for a high breach of privilege. He was among the most eager of the Peers in the prosecution of Strafford and Laud, and when the King, in the hope perhaps of abating the danger which threatened those great men, as well as of calming the popular fury, shortly after admitted eight of the noble malcontents at once into his Privy Council, Warwick was of the number. His favour with the party now increased daily. When the Parliament adjourned for six weeks, on the ninth of September, 1641, each House appointing a small committee, in fact for the government of the country during the recess, he was one of those who were placed in that station by the Peers; and, on the twenty-eighth of the following March, the Commons, by a formal message to the Upper House, required its concurrence in a request to the Earl of Northumberland, who commanded the Fleet, and was then unable, from long illness, to attend that duty, that he would appoint Warwick his Vice Admiral for the year's service, and also to the latter that he would undertake it. The Lords had then grace enough to refuse, unless the King's approbation should be previously obtained; on which the Commons made the motion singly to the Lord High Admiral, who, unwilling to be drawn into a contest with his Sovereign, by whom he had already been informed, through the Secretary of State, that he had named another officer, persuaded them to join with the Peers in a message to his Majesty, demanding the appointment for Warwick, which the King refusing, the two Houses proceeded to grant the commission, in contempt of the royal authority and declared inclination, as well as of the constitution, to the integrity and purity of which they pretended such devout attachment and veneration.

He entered on the command, but with some doubt of the obedience of his captains. He assembled them therefore on his arrival at the Fleet, and sounded them in a hypocritical address, in which he endeavoured to persuade them of the validity of his commission, on the ground that the Parliament was the only proper organ of communication between the King and his subjects. Five were bold enough to demur, and he employed their respective crews to force them to compliance, when three submitted, and the other two were brought prisoners to him by their own men. In the mean time Charles dismissed the Earl of Northumberland, and made a feeble effort to appoint a successor, while the Parliament triumphantly placed Warwick in the exalted post of Lord High Admiral of England. "In consideration of his great disbursements in the public service," a tenth of all prizes was allotted to him, and, by a vote which speedily followed, he was appointed Governor in chief of all the English plantations in America.

Steps were taken about this time to raise a new army, to be placed independently under his command, and a commission to that effect was actually delivered to him, but the rebels changed their purpose, and the troops already embodied were added to Essex's army. This probably arose from a resolution secretly taken by them to propose that well-known regulation called "the self-denying Ordinance," which would have deprived the Earl of his newly acquired command, as it did, in April, 1645, of his office of Lord High Admiral. On the tenth of that month he made his resignation by presenting a written paper to the House of Peers, in which, among other expressions of the same character, he told them that "his highest ambition was to contribute his best endeavours for the service of the Parliament, and that he was resolved to stand or fall with them in the upholding of God's truth, and the public liberty, knowing well, by many years' experience, that the welfare of the kingdom could not subsist without God's blessing in the preservation of the Parliament." The office of High Admiral was now put into commission, and, the self-denying ordinance having no prospective influence, as its sole purpose was to exclude certain persons from each House, he was appointed a commissioner: and now the Parliament, or at least one of the Houses, proposed to give him the most lasting and brilliant mark of approbation within the scope of their usurped power; for, in the following December, it was "voted," for such is the term used, that several of the most conspicuous among the rebels should be exalted to titles of peerage, among whom himself, and the Earls of Northumberland, Essex, and Pembroke, were to be created Dukes. Whitelock, the only writer I believe who has recorded this resolution, makes no subsequent mention of it, and so leaves us ignorant of the impediments which prevented it from taking effect.

In April, 1647, he was included in a commission issued by the Parliament with a view of persuading the army to undertake the reduction of Ireland; and, towards the end of the succeeding month, in another, appointed to assist Fairfax in an ineffectual attempt to disband the many regiments which had mutinously rejected that service. Two months however had scarcely passed when he fled, with many other seceders from both Houses, to seek the protection of that mutinous army, then encamped on Hounslow Heath, against the tumultuous mob of London, which had suddenly besieged the Parliament. From this secession may be traced the gradual decay of the authority of that assembly, and the more rapid exaltation of the military power which followed ; nor is it extravagant to suppose that Warwick's conduct on the occasion was dictated by a secret inclination to forward both : for he had of late attached himself with earnestness to Cromwell, with whom from this period he ever after lived in the strictest intimacy and apparent confidence, and with whose family, as we shall see presently, he soon after connected his own.

When a part of the Fleet revolted to the Crown, and took on board the Prince of Wales, and Duke of York, on the coast of Holland, in May, 1648, he was by a vote of Parliament again appointed High Admiral, and sailed in pursuit of those ships, which lay in the Downs. The Prince's advisers determined to resist, and, while the parties were in sight of each other, and preparing for action, the Prince wrote to him, by Mr. Henry Seymour, inviting him to return to his allegiance ; and Warwick replied, but in respectful terms, by beseeching his Highness "to put himself into the hands of the Parliament ; and that the ships with him might return to their obedience, upon which they should be pardoned for their revolt." A second message from the Prince, to the purpose of the former, produced a similar answer, and his Royal Highness's ships immediately weighed anchor, and sailed to the attack : when, a sudden change of wind having prevented it, and driven them out to sea, it was determined to wait for a more favourable opportunity, which never offered, for the revolters presently after began to join Warwick gradually, and before the end of a month, the Parliament sent him a vote of thanks for having recovered them. In the mean time however his late intercourse with the Prince had drawn some suspicion on him, or at least tended to increase doubts which had been previously entertained. Lord Clarendon indeed affirms that he was about this time in secret intelligence with his brother, the Earl of Holland, on a design in which that unworthy nobleman, after repeated tergiversations, had engaged on the part of the Crown, and for which he soon after lost his head ; nor is it improbable that Warwick might have so acted with the concurrence of his friend Cromwell, who it is well known was just at that period undetermined whether to sacrifice to his ambition the King or the Parliament, both equally and completely in his power. Whitelock tells us that, in the December following, the two Houses received " letters from Warwick, and a declaration in vindication of himself, and the scandal cast upon him by a false pamphlet, and lying report that he resolved to join the Prince, in case the treaty took not effect," meaning the treaty with the King, then in progress, in the Isle of Wight.

It is at all events certain that on the twenty-first of February, in the succeeding year, his commission of High Admiral was revoked by the Parliament, in consequence of a report from what was called the Council of State, and an act passed to appoint commissioners for the direction of the Fleet. Of the particulars of his conduct under the spurious governments which followed the murder of the King no memorials have been preserved. We know only that he was one of the few noblemen who condescended to sit in the Usurper's mock House of Lords, and that he had the credit, or discredit, of being considered during the remainder of his life as one of the chief advisers of that prodigy of good fortune, talents, and wickedness. Lord Clarendon has left us this summary of his character, and of part of his life—" The Earl of Warwick was of the King's Council, but was not wondered at for leaving the King, whom he had never well served, nor did he look upon himself as obliged by that honour, which he knew was conferred upon him in the crowd of those whom his Majesty had no esteem of, or ever proposed to trust, so his business was to join with those to whom he owed his promotion. He was a man of a pleasant and companionable wit and conversation ; of an universal jollity ; and such a license in his words and in his actions that a man of less virtue could not be found out ; so that one might reasonably have believed that a man so qualified would not have been able to have contributed much to the overthrow of a nation and kingdom. But, with all these faults, he had great authority and credit with that people who in the beginning of the troubles did all the mischief : and by opening his doors, and making his house the rendezvous of all the silenced ministers, in the time when there was an authority to silence them, and spending a good part of his estate, of which he was very prodigal, upon them ; and by being present with them at their devotions, and making himself merry with them, and at them, which they dispensed with, he became the head of that party, and got the style of a godly man. When the King revoked the Earl of Northumberland's commission of Admiral, he presently accepted the office from the Parliament, and never quitted their service ; and when Cromwell disbanded that Parliament he betook himself to the protection of the Protector ; married his heir to his daughter ; and lived in so entire a confidence and friendship with him that when he died he had the honour to be exceedingly lamented by him. He left his estate, which before was subject to a vast debt, more improved and repaired than any man who trafficked in that desperate commodity of rebellion."

The Earl of Warwick died on the eleventh of April, 1658, and was buried at Felstead in Essex. He married twice, first, to Frances, daughter and heir to Sir William Hatton, alias Newport, by whom he had four sons, of whom Robert, the eldest, succeeded to the titles and estates, and had an only son, Robert, who married Frances, youngest daughter to Oliver Cromwell, and died before his father ; Charles, the second, to whom they fell on the demise of his brother Robert; Henry, and Hatton, who died unmarried; and also three daughters; Anne, married to Edward, Lord Mandeville, son and heir to Henry Montagu, first Earl of Manchester; Lucy, to John, Lord Robartes, afterwards created Earl of Radnor; and Frances, to Nicholas Leke, second Earl of Scarsdale. The Earl of Warwick's second lady was Eleanor, daughter of Sir Edward Wortley, of Wortley, in Yorkshire, and relict of Sir Henry Lee, of Quarendon, in Bucks, Bart. It is stated too, but rather dubiously, by some authorities, that he had a third wife, Susanna, daughter of Sir Henry Row. He appears however to have left no issue but by his first lady.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

It may seem strange, and more especially in times of the complexion of those in which we live, that the character of this remarkable person should have been suffered to find its own level in unbiassed judgment: that no flowery whig pen has yet attempted to varnish it with eulogies: nay, that even the fierceness of democracy has not furnished a single champion to bedaub it with coarse and plain-spoken praise: if Cromwell went too far in the pursuit of his plans of reform for the more delicate taste of the one, he certainly went quite far enough to gratify amply the appetite of the other. The cause of these omissions is twofold: first, the absence of any one positive virtue in the man, as well as of any form of that heroically splendid generosity, real or affected, which too frequently serves to lessen the deformity of wickedness; and, secondly, the embarrassment into which such panegyrists must have been thrown by contemplating the obsolete engine which he chiefly employed in his great work; for how could they who seek to overthrow the state by decrying Christianity itself, celebrate him who made a semblance of fanatical zeal for that faith his stalking-horse for the accomplishment of the same end? But this is not all. Even they who may be fairly supposed to have the largest and most general interest in whitewashing his fame have shrunk hopeless from the task. The anxiety, perhaps more amiable than prudent, of a descendant has of late put forth a large cento of quotations from abundance of writers, good and bad, well-known and obscure, under the title of "Memoirs," &c.; but they are urged merely in negative apology, and aim only at relieving his memory somewhat of the burthen of certain heavy charges, without making a single effort to adorn it by bringing forward any redeeming merit. We shall seek in vain for any other estimable qualities in Cromwell's character than judgment, courage, and decision, and these he perverted to the worst purposes.

He sprung from a very ancient and highly allied family of the county of Huntingdon, of which his father, Robert Cromwell, was a younger son, who relieved the scantiness of his patrimony by engaging in the trade of a brewer. His mother was a daughter of Sir Richard Stewart, a knight of the city of Ely, who had been before married to William Lynne, of Bassingbourne, Cambridgeshire, and of these persons he was born in Huntingdon on the twenty-fifth of April, 1599. He received his education in the free school of that town, and in Sidney College, Cambridge, which he is said to have left with small reputation for learning, and to have been soon after sent to London, and placed to study the law in Lincoln's Inn, in the books of which society however, as we are informed in the "Memoirs" above referred to, his name is not to be found; yet the fact has been so universally stated that it almost defies doubt, and we may strengthen those reports by adding to them a tradition hitherto unpublished which still prevails there, that he inhabited the chambers over the gateway into Chancery-lane. Such traditions seldom err; but not to dwell on that question, he certainly became a resident in London about the age of eighteen, and is recorded to have led there a life altogether dissolute, for which he could not plead in apology the usual warmth and vivacity of youth, for his nature was morose and saturnine, and he was subject to those reveries and fits of melancholy which usually occur to persons of that temperament. His marriage, however, which happened before he was fully of age, suddenly reclaimed him, and he settled in his native town, from whence, after some years, he removed to the Isle of Ely, and to the possession of a decent estate, which had been bequeathed to him by a maternal uncle. This however, as well as his own little patrimony, he in great measure dissipated, and sought to repair the deficiency by engaging in agriculture in the neighbourhood of St. Ives, as is said, with little success.

He had been bred in the profession of the established faith, and practised it with apparent devotion till some years after his marriage, when he embraced puritanism, and presently became distinguished as a teacher of the first order ; nor is it improbable, as a reputation of that sort is always somewhat dearly purchased by persons of any property, that he might have squandered his fortune as well as his time, in supporting the temporal interests of the schism which he had thus adopted. He received however some compensation by obtaining a seat, through the influence of his new brethren, in the short Parliament which met in 1628, and was chosen of the committee for affairs of religion, in which he distinguished himself by the bitterness and violence with which he denounced every trace of Popery which had been suffered to remain in the doctrine or discipline of our Church. After the dissolution of that Parliament, he returned again to the country, where for some years we have no intelligence of him, till he placed himself at the head of a party there against the Earl of Bedford's magnificent scheme of draining and embanking, which he opposed and obstructed with all the resolution and obstinacy which belonged to his character. At length the well-known John Hampden, who was his first-cousin, convinced that he possessed the sort of talents and temper peculiarly necessary to the political support of himself and his faction, drew him from his retirement, and he was returned to the Long Parliament at its general election.

Hampden had judged rightly. Cromwell commenced his career in that assembly with a uniformity of virulent opposition and calumny towards all the acts of the Court and the ministry, as well as several of the ancient and established public institutions—a conduct which, however familiarized to us of later days had till then been unknown in Parliament. The novelty of this, joined to the unusual coarseness and vehemence with which he commonly addressed the House, and to a show of simple frankness which looked like honesty, presently gained him the attention of all, and soon after the friendship and attachment of many. A small picture of him at that precise period, left to us by Sir Philip Warwick, though chiefly relating to exterior, yet not without reference to those facts, is too lively and glowing to be omitted in this place. "The first time," says Sir Philip, "that I ever took notice of him was in the very beginning of the Parliament held in November, 1640, when I vainly imagined myself a courtly young gentleman. I came one morning into the House, well clad, and perceived a gentleman speaking whom I knew not, very ordinarily apparelled, for it was a plain cloth suit, which seemed to have been made by an ill country tailor: his linen was plain and not very clean, and I remember a speck or two of blood upon his little band, which was not much larger than his collar; his hat was without a hatband; his stature was of a good size: his sword stuck close to his side: his countenance swollen and reddish: his voice sharp and untunable; and his eloquence full of fervour, for the subject-matter would not bear much of reason, it being in behalf of a servant of Mr. Prynne's who had dispersed libels against the Queen, for her dancing and such like innocent and courtly sports; and he aggravated the imprisonment of this man by the Council Table unto that height, that one would have believed the very government itself had been in great danger by it. I sincerely profess it lessened very much my reverence for that great Council, for he was much hearkened unto."

The truth is (and here again he was a political prototype) that his views at that time in assuming there the character of a seditious demagogue extended no further than to the retrieval of his desperate fortunes. He had neither distinct plan nor inclination for the public benefit. When pressed by the honest Warwick, who soon after became acquainted with him, and by some other members, to declare the objects of his exertions, particularly with regard to the Church, which he incessantly attacked, he answered, with less caution than was usual with him, "I know what I would not have, though I cannot tell what I would have." The success of his endeavours approached too tardily for his impatient spirit, and he became desperate. He formed at length the secret resolution to rest it on a single cast—the fate of that unhappily memorable remonstrance which was voted in the Commons, by a very small majority, on the fourteenth of November, 1641; for as soon as the House had risen, he told Lord Falkland that if the question had been otherwise decided, he would the next day have sold the remnant of his estate, and quitted the kingdom, never to return. The part which he had taken in the great debate of that day fixed his importance in the minds of the leading malcontents, and they now admitted him into their most private councils. He began to feel his own strength, and soon afterwards his superiority, and proved both by some successful efforts against certain persons among themselves whom he disliked.

The war broke forth in the following year, when he received a captain's commission from the Earl of Essex; went to Cambridge; and in that neighbourhood raised a troop of horse, with which he persecuted the University; and afterwards into Hertfordshire, where he seized the High Sheriff, with the King's proclamation in his pocket, declaring Essex and his army rebels, and brought him prisoner to London, where he received the thanks of the House of Commons. He marched presently into Suffolk, and surprised and captured the principal gentlemen of that and some adjacent counties, at Lowestoffe, where they had met to consider of the best means of serving the King's cause, besides possessing himself of abundance of arms, ammunition, and money. His force had now increased to one thousand horse, and he bore the title of colonel. His discipline, his courage, his activity, his minute attention to every circumstance which the service that he had now undertaken involved, astonished both armies. The spendthrift country gentleman, the fanatical teacher, the popular declaimer, had become a consummate soldier, as it were by intuition.

Such was the commencement of his military life, the progress of which is so well known that it would be impertinent to detail it here at any length. After distinguishing himself in several exploits in Lincolnshire and its borders, he was appointed Lieutenant-General of the Horse in that army, the nominal command of which the Parliament had given to the Earl of Manchester, while it invested Cromwell with all the active authority. He led it, in the spring of 1644, in a march of surprising rapidity, to meet the Scottish army which had agreed to aid the rebellion, and joined it in besieging York, the reduction of which was speedily followed by the battle of Marston Moor, where the signal defeat of the King's forces has been ascribed chiefly to his gallantry and skill. In the second battle of Newbury, which occurred in the same year, himself and his troops fought with uncommon desperation, and, in a remarkable charge on the royal guards, had nearly seized the King's person. While these events were passing, his friends were not less busily employed in London. His successes, his sagacity, and his intrigues, had combined to place him at the head of a faction in Parliament, which, in contradistinction from the comparatively innocent Presbyterians, who had unwittingly acted as its pioneers in the rebellion, called itself "the Independents." The former party, many of whom had engaged in the mischief of the time from honest, however mistaken motives, observed, with well founded dread, its growing importance, and attempted to nip it in the bud. Manchester exhibited articles of accusation in the House of Peers against Cromwell, who repelled the blow by levelling a counter-charge at him in the Commons; but neither was in the end prosecuted, each party probably then doubting its own strength. The independents however became daily more formidable, and shortly after effectually triumphed in passing that measure, so fatal in its results to every prospect of peace and order, which obtained the name of "the self-denying Ordinance," because it prohibited the members of the two Houses of Parliament from holding any offices, civil or military. It is scarcely necessary to say that its aim was directed chiefly to the latter. Essex, Manchester, Sir William Waller, the Earl of Warwick, who was the Parliament Admiral, and indeed all the commanders of any note under the original scheme of the rebellion, were thus at a stroke cashiered; while Cromwell, and such of his peculiar confidants as were members, after having received, for form's sake, some occasional individual dispensations, were at length specially excepted from the operation of the act. The army was in this manner, to use the phrase of the time, new-modelled; Sir Thomas Fairfax was appointed Commander-in-Chief; and Cromwell, raised to the rank of his Lieutenant-General, was in fact placed at its head.

The almost uninterrupted tide of success which now attended his enterprises is scarcely to be paralleled in military history. In twelve months' almost incessant fighting he met with but two insignificant checks. The succeeding battle of Naseby, so fatally decisive of the King's very hopes, the critical hour for which was adopted by Fairfax at his suggestion, crowned his fame. He availed himself with equal prudence and gallantry of the many advantages which that victory had thrown in his way, and at length returned to the Parliament, where the two parties of which it was composed, by the one of which he was now hated, and by the other already distrusted, loaded him with adulation and wealth; himself, with equal sincerity, ascribing his endeavours wholly to his devotion towards them, and his successes to the special favour of Providence to a righteous cause. The unfortunate Charles now threw himself into the hands of the Scots, who sold him to his rebel Parliament, and it was presently argued in that body that, as the war must be in some way concluded by that event, it would be advisable to relieve the people by disbanding at least a part of the army, of which they had now, with ample reason, become jealous. This motion, so adverse to his views, Cromwell not only parried with exquisite address, but contrived to turn it to his advantage; for, while he intrigued successfully to confine the reduction to certain regiments whose affection to himself he suspected, he conveyed insinuations to the rest of the army of the ingratitude of the Parliament towards them, and of the proof of his affection for them, which his successful interference in their favour had manifested. At this precise juncture, while each party was acutely, and perhaps equally, sensible of its critical position, the Parliament, which terror had now inspired with a true desire to restore some sort of order, meditating the mockery of treaties with their captive King, and the independents little less agitated by their fears for their interests, and even personal safety, than by their abhorrence of monarchy under any modifications; Cromwell boldly turned the scale, and decided the fate of the kingdom—He seized the person of Charles; and from that moment, the Parliament, as well as the King, was in the power of the army.

The subtilty of his conduct at this critical epoch was equalled only by the treachery of his intentions. The unhappy Prince was treated with profound reverence, and actually submitted to be persuaded that Cromwell meant to compose all differences, and to restore him on favourable conditions to his throne. To complete this deception, the army was made to send an address to the Parliament, declaring their determination to make common cause with the King, and their opinion that all endeavours to settle the nation would be fruitless while he was debarred of his just rights; Cromwell, in the same hour, publicly professing that his earnest attachment to the ascendancy and privileges of Parliament had rendered him unpopular with the military. His agents were now directed to sift the disposition of the populace of the city, which was found to incline to the army. The Houses were besieged by crowds, and a number of young ruffians, calling themselves apprentices, forced their way into the Commons, which they actually compelled to pass certain votes in their presence. In the mean time the army had set up a sort of Parliament for the management of its own affairs, composed of a committee of troopers, and another of officers, formally elected by the several regiments, to whom they gave the name of agitators ; and Cromwell, who had connived at this, with the view of over-awing the King and the Parliament, affected to consider them as mutinous assemblies, and to expect dreadful consequences from the alleged insubordination, which he insinuated that he durst not endeavour to subdue by any summary measures. These persons presently resolved, and publicly declared, that the army would not submit to be disbanded, and dispatched a sturdy remonstrance to the Parliament. Cromwell now proceeded to purge, as it was called, the House of Commons ; eleven of its leading presbyterian members, all original instigators of the rebellion, were impeached by himself and those of his creatures who had seats, and fled for their lives. The two Speakers sought refuge with the army, which was then advancing slowly towards London, and which, arriving there a few days after, replaced them, and marched triumphantly through the city, led by Fairfax, who had sunk gradually into a passive instrument in the hands of his Lieutenant-General.

The King, who had been for some time a prisoner at large, now withdrew himself privately, with what view or hope has never been clearly ascertained, from Hampton Court, and was persuaded, treacherously, or most imprudently, by those who attended him, to put himself into the power of the rebel governor of the Isle of Wight. Here, in the midst of a treaty, if it deserved to be so called, with the commissioners from the Parliament, his person was again suddenly seized in the dead of night by a party of soldiers, and closely imprisoned. Five days after, Cromwell, to whom it was still convenient to employ the name of a Parliament, sent one of his favourite officers, at the head of a strong guard, into the House of Commons, and made prisoners at once of more than forty members who were unfit for his purposes, and on the following day himself appeared in the House, and received the thanks of those who remained for his great and faithful services. They now proceeded without delay to attain the King of high treason, and on the Lords rejecting their bill, resolved that their consent was unnecessary, and so it passed in the name of the Commons of England only. A few, selected from the many instances of detestable hypocrisy and affected fanaticism displayed by Cromwell on this memorable occasion, must serve as specimens of that extravagant inclination to falsehood and deception, which was certainly the paramount feature of his nature, and is proved to have marked the whole of his public conduct. When this proceeding against the King was first proposed in the House of Commons, he rose, with great apparent agitation, and said that "if any man had moved this upon design, he should think him the greatest traitor in the world; but, since Providence and necessity had cast them upon it, he should pray to God to bless their councils, though he was not on the sudden prepared to advise them." And in a subsequent debate, he told them that "while he was praying for a blessing from God on his undertaking to restore the King to his pristine majesty, his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth, so that he could not speak another word; which he took as a return to his prayer, and so that God had rejected him from being King." And when an officer in the service of the States General was dispatched to him after the trial, with blanks, testified by that government to be genuine, and signed by Charles and by the Prince of Wales, and proposed to him to insert any conditions on which the King's life might be spared, he left the messenger, and returning after some time, answered that he had been with the council of officers, "seeking God," and that they had all resolved that the King must die. Burnet too, whose report may be fully trusted on this occasion, assures us that Cromwell used every possible argument to persuade the Scottish Commissioners (for they who had so lately betrayed him to his blood-thirsty enemies now sent to intercede for him) that the King ought to be put to death; and such was doubtless his fixed design when he first made himself master of the royal person.

From the moment of the King's murder Cromwell may be said to have reigned in England. The House of Commons, however, such as he had left it, affected to form a government; voted the Peers useless and dangerous; set up a republican system, under the title of a commonwealth; and placed the executive power in the hands of certain persons, who were called a Council of State. Cromwell for a while temporised. He accepted, with all apparent deference, the command of an army sent to enforce the submission of Ireland; and on his return, after a short repose at Whitehall, where he now took up his residence, marched to chastise the Scots, who had received among them their new King. Here he gained the battles of Dunbar and Fife, while his subordinate commanders were uniformly successful in other parts of the country; and at length, by a series of the most masterly military dispositions, forced the main Scotch army, with the King at their head, into England; drove them before him to Worcester; and compelled them to try the fate of that well-known desperate action, the event of which seemed to have extinguished all hope in the loyal party. His letter, communicating the news of this signal victory to the Parliament which he was then meditating to annihilate, is still extant, and the concluding lines seem worthy of insertion here, not only as a further illustration of his detestable cant and hypocrisy, but as a sample of the style which he used, and the sentiments which he affected on all occasions, public and private.

——“ The dimensions of this mercy are above my thoughts.

It is, for aught I know, a crowning mercy. Surely if it be not, such a one we shall have, if this provoke those that are concerned in it to thankfulness, and the Parliament to do the will of him who hath done his will for it, and for the nation—whose good pleasure is to establish the nation, and change of the government, by making the people so willing to the defence thereof, and so signally to bless the endeavours of your servants in this late great work. I am bold humbly to beg that all thoughts may tend to the promoting his honour who hath wrought so great salvation, and that the fatness of these continued mercies may not occasion pride and wantonness, as formerly the like hath done to a chosen people; but that the fear of the Lord, even for his mercies, may keep an authority and a people so prospered, and blessed, and witnessed, so humble and faithful, that justice and righteousness, mercy and truth, may flow from you as a thankful return to our glorious God. This shall be the prayer of “Your most humble and obedient servant,

“O CROMWELL.”

It is ridiculously observable, that in the very moment that he was cajoling these people about a “crowning mercy,” which, if not yet arrived, was surely to come, he was full fraught with the idea of placing the Crown of these kingdoms on his own head. He had scarcely returned from Worcester, when, as Whitelock informs us, at a meeting of certain members of the Commons, and some principal officers of the army, at the Speaker’s house, summoned by Cromwell to deliberate on some plan for the permanent settlement of the nation, to be presented to the Parliament, Whitelock, who knew his mind, asked whether it should be “by way of an absolute republic, or with any mixture of monarchy?” Cromwell took the hint, and replied, “My Lord Commissioner Whitelock hath put us upon the right point: and indeed it is my meaning that we should consider whether a republic or a mixt monarchical government will be best to be settled ; and if anything monarchical, then in whom that power should be placed ?” Desborough and Whalley, two of the regicides, declared for a strict republic ; and Sir Thomas Widdrington, a presbyterian member of the Commons, for a mixt monarchy, and unluckily added,—to be placed, on terms, in one of the late King’s sons ; on which Cromwell calmly observed—“ that will be a business of more than ordinary difficulty ; but really I think, if it may be done with safety, and preservation of our rights, both as Englishmen and Christians, that a settlement with somewhat of monarchical power in it would be very effectual.” The debate, in which Cromwell meant no more, for the time, than to sound the inclination of the parties, lasted long, but, as might be expected, ended in no determination.

The same author reports also a subsequent private conversation between Cromwell and himself on the same subject, in which the one seems to have disclosed his views without reserve, and the other to have argued against them with equal freedom, and the consequence of this contest was the disposal of Whitelock soon after in a foreign embassy. Cromwell, in the mean time, formed his resolution, and the mode of executing it, with cool intrepidity. The Commons, sensible of their own impotence, had submitted, at his dictation, to limit their sitting to the end of two years. That date had nearly expired ; and of all imaginable contingencies none could have been more unfavourable to his hopes than a recurrence to the suffrages of the people. He suddenly assembled therefore a council of such of the ministers and military as he thought fit to trust on so momentous an occasion ; bewailed that weakness in the Parliament of which himself had been the author ; represented the danger with which it threatened the nation ; and, with many pious exclamations, meekly besought their advice.

A great majority, which had come fully prepared, proposed an immediate dissolution, and a message was sent to the Commons, without delay, recommending to them to adopt that resolution by a vote of their own. They demurred ; when Cromwell, putting himself instantly at the head of a party of soldiers, entered the House, and, to use a phrase worthy of the action, turned them out, with circumstances too well known to all England to need repetition. Thus this dastardly remnant of an assembly which had for several years deluged the land in blood, and perpetrated in effect the murder of its lawful sovereign for having calmly ventured within its proud walls to demand the persons of five of its members who stood charged with high treason, submitted, without a remonstrance, then or after, to be crushed in a moment by the single act of an individual of its own body ; a monster of its own creation.

He now summoned a Parliament, for so it was called, not only invented but elected by himself ; dispatched letters missive to certain chosen persons, very insignificant either on the score of talent or property, requiring them to meet and deliberate, as representatives of their respective counties. By this means he gained time to make his final arrangements, as well as the advantage, such as it was, of obtaining a recognition of his authority by an assembly bearing the name of a Parliament, which it amply gave by voting on the thirteenth of December, 1653, five months after its birth, that its further continuance " would not be for the good of the commonwealth, and that it would be fit for them to resign their powers to the Lord General," as they did without delay. Cromwell and his military Council now resolved that the government of the three kingdoms should be in a Lord Protector, for life ; a Council of State, which was so constituted as to be wholly at his disposal ; and a triennial Parliament, on a new and convenient model ; and he immediately assumed the office of Lord Protector.

He was now to maintain himself on the pre-eminence to which he had thus attained. He knew the English character, and sought to accommodate his government to its habits and its foibles, rather than to the actual interests of the country.

He knew that it preferred greatness, and what is called national wealth, to the solid comfort to be derived from the cultivation of internal advantages. He felt too his own necessity to divert its attention from the contemplation of recent events. He commenced therefore the execution of his counterfeit reign with a defiance, declared or implied, to nearly all the powers of Europe; assailed the Dutch in a furious and most successful maritime war; and had no sooner compelled them to a treaty, equally humiliating and expensive, than he prepared to attack Spain, and answered the remonstrances of the ambassador from Madrid, by demanding the abolition of the Inquisition in all his Master's dominions, and the unqualified admission of the English to a free trade in the Spanish West Indies. These being of course refused, he despatched a fleet and army thither, and the island of Jamaica is a permanent fruit of that enterprise. At home little remained to be done. The royalists were sunk in complete despondency; the mass of the people were dazzled by his boldness and his success; the religionists of all descriptions, even of the lately persecuted Church of England, were unmolested; he now confined his pious cares to himself, except in a single instance—the dissolution in a moment, by one of his colonels, of the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland. In the forty-two Chapters which compose the sacred record of his new constitution, not a word is to be found of doctrine, discipline, worship, churches, synods, or ministers. It mentions Christianity generally, and concedes a universal toleration.

A competent idea of his opinion of his first Parliament may be formed on two of his regulations which distinguished its commencement—the previous trial of elections by his own Council of State; and his imposition after it had met, in consequence of its having ventured into some discussion on the new government, of a qualifying test to be subscribed by each individual member. It proved however somewhat uncompliant, and he dissolved it, in an intemperate speech, after it had sat for five months. By this act he incurred, for the first time, a certain portion of unpopularity with his own party, which he extended to others by the cruel vengeance which he took on several persons who had risen in the west in a hopeless attempt for the royal cause. He fortified himself against the effects of these disgusts by increased kindness to the army and navy, and by new levies of troops to a formidable amount, and thus entrenched, assumed an arbitrary rule hitherto unknown in Europe. He gave the custody of the Great Seal to two military officers ; imprisoned barristers because they had pleaded for persons whom he disliked ; and decided several causes at law by his own special authority. When he thought fit in 1656 to summon his second Parliament, he previously issued "a commission for inspection of Charters," of which his own solicitor was chairman, and thus in great measure enabled himself to disfranchise, or new model, those boroughs in which it was probable that his will might be opposed. This device, however, not proving fully sufficient, when the day of meeting arrived, a guard of soldiers was found at the doors of the House, and an officer, who presented to those members whose names appeared in a list which he held in his hand, tickets, certifying that they had been "approved by his Highness's Council," and to those who were not provided with such tickets no admission was granted.

It is not strange that an assembly thus formed, should have determined to beseech Cromwell to assume the title of King. He answered doubtfully ; desired time "to seek God," and that they would appoint a committee to confer with him on a question so weighty, and the conference was held accordingly. This impending disgrace, however, to the nation was cut short by the jealousy of some of the principal officers of the army, who unexpectedly petitioned the House to discourage the idea ; and Cromwell, at a second meeting, in which, as Ludlow informs us, he had resolved to signify his acceptance of the title, was thus forced to refuse it, which he did, in a speech fraught with the grossest deception, and most profound hypocrisy. He now, however, obtained all but the name; for, in compliance with a second petition from the House, he consented to accept a renewal of his office of Protector; to be invested with more than regal powers; and to erect a House of Peers of his own creation. He was presently after solemnly inaugurated, with all the ceremonies, one only excepted, of the coronation of our Kings. The Commons having completed for him this great work, now adjourned, and some signal naval successes against the Spaniards served to maintain the spirits and good humour of the astonished nation till the meeting of the newly constructed Parliament, which Cromwell opened with all the accustomed royal forms. Not many days had passed, when a strife arose between the two spurious Houses, so bitter and disgraceful, that he flew to them in a rage beyond even his power of dissembling, and pronounced their dissolution. He is even said to have concluded the few furious sentences which he addressed to them with the words, "by the living God I must and do dissolve you."

From this period the bodily health, as well as the public character, of Cromwell gradually declined. He became timid and irresolute. Some plots were discovered against his life, and he imagined others which had no existence. A well known tract, recommending the assassination of tyrants, and entitled "Killing no Murther," is said to have cut him to the heart. His cruelty, according to the common unhappy order of nature, increased with his fears. The last public acts of his life were the erection of one more of those infamous tribunals which were nicknamed High Courts of Justice, and the sacrifice, according to its sentence, of many persons, most of them of great worth, who had engaged in a design to restore the King, scarcely a single active step towards the accomplishment of which seems to have been taken. Cromwell died of a tertian ague on the third of September, 1658.

He married Elizabeth, a natural daughter of Sir James Bouchier, of Felsted, in Essex, who for some years survived him, and had by her three sons, and four daughters. Richard, his insignificant successor in the office of Protector; Henry, to whom he gave the government of Ireland: and James, who died an infant. Bridget, married first to Henry Ireton, then to Charles Fleetwood, both eminent in the rebel army; Elizabeth, wife of John Claypoole, of Norborough, in the county of Northampton; Mary, married Thomas Belasyse, Viscount Falconberg; and Frances, wife, first, of Robert Rich, grandson to Robert, Earl of Warwick; secondly, of Sir John Russel of Chippenham in Wilts. It has been said that he had two other children. If so, they died in their infancy.

DOROTHY PERCY,
COUNTESS OF LEICESTER.

OB. 1659.

DOROTHY PERCY,

COUNTESS OF LEICESTER.

THIS lady was the eldest daughter of Henry Percy, ninth Earl of Northumberland of his family, by Dorothy, daughter of Walter, first Earl of Essex of the house of Devereux. The scattered notices which remain of her are few, and mostly of a private and domestic sort, but they afford ample proof of the integrity of her heart, and the benignity of her temper; of excellent understanding, and the most refined politeness. Mild, timid, and cautious, the misfortunes of her family, on the sides both of her father and mother, probably inspired her with a distaste to the objects usually so eagerly sought by persons of her rank, and taught her to seek security and peace in the bosom of her family; while the same cause, operating on an opposite character, made her haughty and eccentric sister, the famous Lucy, Countess of Carlisle, an intriguing courtier, and a busy politician.

She was married in 1618 to Robert Sidney, Earl of Leicester, a nobleman of great worth and accomplishments, with whom she lived for nearly half a century in the most perfect connubial felicity. I have now before me one of her letters to him, then ambassador at Paris, written eighteen years after their marriage, which, after having treated in it, at great length and with much acuteness and judgment, of some matters of state at home, in which his interests were concerned, she thus concludes:—"Mr. Seladine comes in with your letter, whom I am engaged to intertaine a litle: besyeds, it is super time, or els I should bestow one sied of this paper in making love to you ; and, since I maie with modestie expres it, I will saie that if it be love to thinke on you, sleeping and waking ; to discourse of nothing with pleasur but what concerns you ; to wische myself everie hower with you ; and to praie for you with as much devotion as for my owne sowle ; then certainlie it maie be saied that I am in love."

With her own family less harmony seems to have prevailed. Some cause of disagreement, now unknown, appears to have long subsisted between her brother, Algernon, Earl of Northumberland, and her lord ; and Northumberland, whose character united to great strictness of honour and morality, their too frequent concomitant, an imperious and severe temper, suffered his resentment to extend to his amiable sister. Allusions to this misfortune appeared in a letter addressed to him by Leicester, on the eighth of October, 1632, from Rensburgh, in Holstein, in which, among other conciliatory efforts, expressed with equal warmth, is the following passage : " I love you so much that I think I shall not profane the word of God, the fountaine of truth, if I take this saying out of it, and apply it to myself ; that ' my love is beyond the love of women ; ' and, in confidence that you will believe this, or at least accept as much as you do believe, I present a request unto your Lordship that you will make a visit to your sister, my dear wife, if she be at Penshurst. That poore place hath not offended, that it should be forbidden the honor to receive you. She hath not offended, that she should be deprived of the consolation and delight that your Lordship's company ever brings her. Let me, that am the criminal, be punished with the trouble of minde for not enjoying the pleasure of your conversation, nor the glory of seeing you againe under my roofe. That which I desyre is only in consideration of your sister, whose disposition I know apt enough to be melancholick, especially in that solitary place, where, though it be the best I have, I must confess it was ~~her~~ ill fortune that placed her there ; in recompence whereof my greatest study is to procure comforts for her, which she shall never want if my life can serve her with any," &c.

Northumberland, however, remained long unappeased. Even four years after, on the tenth of November, 1636, the Countess closes a letter from Penshurst to her lord, at Paris, on a variety of his private affairs, of which she appears to have been a most careful and judicious superintendant, with complaints of her brother's unkindness. "I have not yet seene him," says she, "being full of the King's busines, as he pretends; neither have I perceived any inclination to drawe me from the solitarines I sufer in this place; for, though I expressed a willingnes to goe to him, were I acomodated for a journey, yet have I receaved no maner of invitation, wich I take a little unkindlye; but it shall not much afflicte me, for, I thanke God, and you, my dearest harte, that the obligations wich I have receaved from frends has beene very small; and I hope my necessities of their favors will not be increased. But of this coldnes in my brother I will take no notice, or verie litle; and content myself the best I can with this lonelie life, without envieng their greatnes, their plentie, or their jolitie. The principall trouble I sufer, next to the want of your companie, is the apprehentions I have of your being crost in what you desire to accomlishe; but my best and most earnest praiera shall be ofne presented for you; and, with your owne, which I beleeve are better then mine, I hope those blessings shall be obtained wich will make us hapie."

In 1639, and in 1641, she visited her husband in Paris, and in the latter of those years the Queen of France presented her with a diamond valued at six hundred pounds. The war between the King and the Parliament now commenced, and Leicester, whose loyalty was well known, became an object first of suspicion, and then of vengeance, to the party which unhappily gained the ascendancy. His estates were sequestrated; in 1643 the Countess sued for the restoration of them by a bold and dignified memorial, and the sequestration was presently after removed. It can scarcely be supposed that this concession was procured merely by her persuasion. Her brother, Northumberland, whose attachment to the royal cause was, at best, but lukewarm, and who was now in some measure reconciled to Leicester and his family; and her eldest son, the Viscount Lisle, a young man already distinguished by republican prejudices, stood foremost among those nobles whose affections the House of Commons was then most anxious to secure, and there can be little doubt that it was through their influence that Leicester was replaced in the possession of his patrimony, and permitted to live in tranquillity at home during the whole of the rebellion and usurpation.

These favours were some years after succeeded by a mark of confidence from the Parliament, which may be certainly traced to the same source. In June, 1649, the two youngest children of the unfortunate Charles were placed under her care, and are said to have been treated by her, till August, in the following year, when they were removed to other custody in the Isle of Wight, with great tenderness and respect. A single word indeed, in Lord Clarendon's account of the circumstances at that time of those royal sufferers, tends to convey a different impression. "The Princess Elizabeth, and the Duke of Gloucester," says he, "were committed to the Countess of Leicester, to whom such an allowance was paid out of the treasury as might well defray their expenses with that respect that was due to their birth, which was performed towards them as long as the King their father lived; but as soon as the King was murdered, it was ordered that the children should be removed into the country, that they might not be the objects of respect, to draw the eyes and application of the people towards them: the allowance was retrenched, that their attendants and servants might be lessened, and order was given that 'they should be treated without any addition of titles, and that they should sit at their meat as the children of the family did, and all at one table ;' whereupon they were removed to Penshurst, a house of the Earl of Leicester's, in Kent, where they lived under the tuition of the Countess, who observed the order of the Parliament with obedience enough ; yet they were carefully looked to, and treated with as much respect as the Lady pretended she durst pay to them." Lord Clarendon, however, as may be inferred from more than one passage in his history, entertained unfavourable prejudices against Leicester and his family ; but the Princess, who died soon after her removal from Penshurst, recorded her gratitude and kindness to the Countess by bequeathing to her a jewel of considerable value. It is worthy of observation that the Parliament, in its eagerness for popularity, condescended to question the validity of this legacy. The Countess had obtained letters of administration, and had gained possession of the jewel, when the Attorney General was ordered to institute a suit against the Earl, her husband, to claim it as the property of the State. The question remained in litigation till the beginning of the year 1659, when, as might be expected, it was decided in favour of the Parliament : the jewel was wrested from the Countess, and deposited in the Exchequer.

She died on the ninth of August, in the same year. A letter on that occasion, written by her Lord to the Earl of Northumberland, and savouring perhaps more of the finesse of a courtier than the grief of a widower, has been preserved, and claims place in this memoir.

MY LORD,

In the greatest sorrow that I have ever suffered your Lordship hath given me the greatest consolation that I could receive from any body in this world ; for having lost that which I loved best your Lordship secureth me from that which I loved next, that is your favour, to which having no right nor claime by any worthynes in myself, but only by that alliance of which my most dear wife was the mediation,

I might justly feare the loss of that also if your Lordship's charity towards me did not prevent it. And now I will presume to tell your Lordship, that though you have lost an excellent sister, who by her affection and reverence towards you highly deserved of you, yet such was her death that your Lordship hath reason to rejoyce at her departure : and, if I were Christian good enough to conceive the happynes of the other life, and that I could have loved her enough, it might have bin to me a pleasure to see her dye as she dyed ; but being unable to repara my own loss with the consideration of her advantage, I must ever greeve for the one untill I may be partaker of the other ; and, as I shall ever whilst I live pay to her memory all affection and respects, so, for her sake that loved you so dearly, and was so beloved of your Lordship, and for the high estimation which I have allways had of your Lordship, I beseech you to let me remaine in your favour, and to be assured of my being

Your Lordship's faithfulest humble servant,

LEYCESTER.

Penshurst, 31 Aug. 1659.

The issue of her marriage was four sons, and eight daughters. Philip, her first born child, succeeded to his father's titles and estates ; Robert, the second son, died unmarried ; Algernon, the third, suffered death for high treason in 1683 ; and the fourth, Henry, was created Earl of Romney. Her daughters were Elizabeth, who died young, and unmarried ; Lucy, wife of Sir John Pelham, of Loughton, in Sussex, Bart. ; Anne, wife of Joseph Cart, a clergyman ; Mary, and Diana, who died in childhood ; Elizabeth, married to Thomas Smith, Viscount Strangford, in Ireland ; Frances, and Isabel, unmarried.

WILLIAM SEYMOUR,

MARQUIS OF HERTFORD.

O.E. 1660.

WILLIAM SEYMOUR,

FIRST MARQUIS OF HERTFORD.

FOR it has been thought fit here rather to designate that great and good man by the title under which he adorns the page of history, than by that of a higher dignity, which was conferred on him after he had performed all his services, and when he was on the very eve of receiving their eternal reward.

He was the second son, but at length heir, by Honora, daughter of Sir Richard Rogers, of Bryanston, in Dorsetshire, of Edward Lord Beauchamp, eldest son of Edward Seymour, Earl Hertford, who was eldest son, by the second marriage, of the Protector, Edward Duke of Somerset. He received his education in Magdalen College, in Oxford, and had formed even then a tender attachment, the consequences of which embittered many years of his early manhood. The witty and accomplished Arabella Stuart, daughter of Charles, fifth Earl of Lenox, who was a lineal descendant from Henry the Seventh, and uncle to James the First, had conceived an affection for him, and privately encouraged his addresses. Her residence at the Palace of Woodstock, which perhaps first produced a familiarity between them, was highly favourable to their intercourse, which was long carried on in profound secrecy, but it was at length discovered in 1609 that they had entered into a formal contract of marriage. James, not only affronted, but, from motives which will be stated more at large in a sketch of the Lady's life, to be found elsewhere in this work, alarmed, caused them to be called before the Privy Council, and they were severely reprimanded; but this proceeding produced the very consequence which James desired to avoid ; for Arabella, sensible that her reputation had been wounded by the inquiry, was in a manner forced into a marriage with Mr. Seymour, which becoming publicly known in the spring of the following year, she was committed to a close, though private, custody, and he to the Tower of London. Thus separated, they concerted means to escape, which both effected on the same day, the third of June, 1611, amidst circumstances which fell little short of the fictions of chivalrous romance. The poor Lady however was unfortunately taken on the sea, near Calais, and imprisoned for the short remainder of her life ; but Mr. Seymour eluded his pursuers, and arrived safely in Flanders, where he seems to have resided till 1621, when he succeeded to the titles of Earl of Hertford, and Baron Beauchamp, on the death of his grandfather.

This misfortune, operating on a disposition already perhaps too much addicted to retirement and reserve, induced him to seclude himself from the society of all but a few very dear friends. He resided for many years almost entirely in the country, dividing his time between his studies, to which he was passionately attached, and the repair of his estates, which had been sadly mutilated after the downfall of his great ancestor. His inclination, and his vote, when he attended in Parliament, went for some years after the accession of Charles the First with the popular party, but the eagerness of its leaders for the blood of Strafford convinced him of the true nature of their designs ; and from that period he not only threw into the scale of the Crown the whole weight of his affection, his popularity, and his replenished revenues, but suddenly assumed, together with the character of a counsellor and a commander, a degree of activity which had before seemed foreign from his very nature. In 1640 the King advanced him to the title of Marquis of Hertford, and about the same time appointed him Governor to the Prince of Wales ; an office conferred by Charles for the sake of proving the fulness of his confidence in this nobleman, and accepted by him merely in testimony of his profound duty and obedience ; for, says Lord Clarendon, “ It is very true he wanted some of those qualities which might have been wished to be in a person to be trusted in the education of a great and hopeful Prince, and in forming his mind and manners, in so tender an age. He was of an age not fit for much activity and fatigue, and loved, and was even wedded so much to, his ease, that he loved his book above all exercises ; and had even contracted such a laziness of mind that he had no delight in an open and liberal conversation, and cared not to discourse and argue on those points which he understood very well, only for the trouble of contending : and could never impose upon himself the pain that was necessary to be undergone in such a perpetual attendance. But then those lesser duties might be otherwise provided for, and he could well support the dignity of a Governor, and exact that diligence from others which he could not exercise himself ; and his honour was so unblemished that none durst murmur against the designation, and therefore his Majesty thought him very worthy of the high trust, against which there was no other exception but that he was not ambitious of it, nor in truth willing to receive and undergo the charge, so contrary to his natural constitution.” The first act of his government was a positive refusal to obey an order of the Parliament respecting the Prince.

He subscribed at York, on the thirteenth of June, 1642, the declaration made by the Peers of their opinion of the King’s motives in his dispute with the Parliament, and of his sincere desire to avoid the impending war ; and was presently after appointed, by commission under the Great Seal, Lieutenant General of all the western parts of the kingdom, with power to levy men, as he might think necessary, for his Majesty’s service ; and, quitting the King at Beverley, set out immediately for those counties in which he possessed great estates, and yet greater public esteem. He had magnified overmuch the influence which he expected to derive from those sources, and instead of using that activity which the occasion required, tacitly left the country to exercise an option between the cause of the King, and that of the rebels. In the meantime the enemy, under the Earl of Bedford, with the vigilance commonly used by those who espouse the faulty side of a question, had projected to surprise him at Wells, where, with only four troops of cavalry, and about a hundred foot, he had first taken up his quarters ; and, although they failed in that design, forced him, even within a few days after his arrival, to retreat, which he did with great gallantry, and without loss, to Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, and from thence into Cornwall, where leaving a small part of his force, he transported himself, with the remainder, into Glamorgan-shire, and then joined the King at Oxford. Shortly after, however, upon some successes obtained by Prince Rupert in Devonshire and Cornwall, he was again despatched into those parts, and Prince Maurice appointed to serve under him. He was now more diligent, and more successful, in his levies, which, added to the few troops which marched with him from Oxford, presently placed him at the head of a body of sixteen or seventeen hundred horse, and about a thousand foot. Thus recruited, he had no small share in the victories gained over Sir William Waller at Landsdown, and at Roundway ; but on the capture of Weymouth, unhappy differences arose between him and the two Princes, the King's nephews, on the question whether he, as commander in the west, or Prince Rupert, as commander in chief of the King's army, possessed the right to nominate a governor of that town. The Marquis, at the King's earnest instance, consented with a good grace to waive his claim, but this dispute seems to have terminated his military services, for which, to say the truth, he appears to have had few qualifications beyond his personal courage, and his perfect fidelity to the royal cause. He retired with the King to Oxford ; was appointed Groom of the Stole ; and soon after resigned his superin-tendance of the Prince of Wales. On the twenty-fourth of October, in the same year, 1643, he was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford.

He now became the constant counsellor, companion, and friend, of the unhappy Charles, to whom he wholly devoted himself. In all negotiations and treaties with the rebels, public or private, he was the prime agent; and such was their reverence for his virtues and his honour, that they seem to have allowed him to converse and correspond with them with the utmost freedom, and even to have held his person sacred, for he frequently put himself into their power. The sums lavished by him, from his own purse, for the service of the Crown, were prodigious, independently of the great charge of his military levies. He is said to have brought at one time to the King sixty thousand pounds, contributed by himself and some of his friends; and he supplied the necessities of Charles the Second, during the fifteen years of his exile, with nearly five thousand pounds annually. The private nature of the innumerable services performed by him between the period when he relinquished his military command and that of the King's death has in a great measure excluded them from the notice of historians, from whom we gain no further information of him previously to the Restoration than that he was a commissioner for the King at the treaties of Oxford, Uxbridge, and Newport, and that he was one of the four faithful noblemen who were permitted to lay the body of their murdered master in its grave.

He was of course dismissed by the usurpers from his office of Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and restored by a letter from King Charles the Second to that body, three weeks before he returned to repossess his crown. The Marquis met him at Dover on his landing, and the next day received from his hands at Canterbury the Order of the Garter, to which he had been elected in Jersey, on the thirteenth of January, 1649. He was immediately after restored by an act of Parliament to the title of Duke of Somerset, which had been forfeited by the attainder of the Protector, his great-grandfather ; and the King, when he passed the bill, observed to both Houses that “ as this was an act of an extraordinary nature, so it was done for an extraordinary person, who had merited as much of his royal father and himself as any subject could do ; and therefore he hoped no man would envy it, because he had done what a good master should do to such a servant.” The Marquis survived these tributes of just gratitude scarcely five months : he died on the twenty-fourth of October, 1660, and was buried at Great Bedwin, in Wilts, having been twice married ; first, as has been before observed, to the Lady Arabella Stuart, by whom he had no issue ; and, secondly, to Frances, eldest daughter of Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, and sister and coheir to the second Earl Robert, the Parliament General. By the latter Lady he had five sons, of whom William, Robert, and Thomas, died young and unmarried ; and four daughters ; Mary, married to Heneage Finch, Earl of Winchelsea ; Frances, successively to Richard Viscount Molineux, Thomas Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, and Conyers, son and heir to Conyers Lord Darcy ; Jane, wife to Charles Lord Clifford, of Londesborough, son and heir to Richard Boyle, Earl of Burlington ; and Arabella, who died unmarried. His two sons who lived to maturity, were Henry Lord Beauchamp, who died in 1656, leaving an only son, William, successor to his grandfather ; and John, who on the death of that William, his nephew, in 1671, unmarried, became fourth Duke of Somerset.

Lord Clarendon, whose admirable censures must never be omitted, says that “ the Marquis of Hertford was a man of great honour, interest and estate, and of an universal esteem over the whole kingdom ; and, though he had received many and continued disobligations from the Court, from the time of the King’s coming to the Crown as well as during the reign of King James, in both which seasons more than ordinary care had been taken to discountenance and lessen his interest, yet he had carried himself with a notable steadiness from the beginning of the Parliament in the support and defence of the King's power and dignity, notwithstanding all his allies, and those with whom he had the greatest familiarity and friendship, were of the opposite party, and never concurred with them against the Earl of Strafford, whom he was known not to love, nor in any other extravagancy : and then he was not to be shaken in his affection to the government of the Church, though it was enough known that he was in no degree biassed to any great inclination to the person of any Churchman ; and, with all this, that party carried themselves towards him with profound respect, not presuming to venture their own credit in endeavouring to lessen his. He was a man of very good parts, and conversant in books, both in the Latin and Greek languages, and of a clear courage ; yet he was so wholly given up to a country life, where he lived in splendour, that he had an aversion, and even an unaptness, for business."

LUCY PERCY,
COUNTESS OF CARLISLE.

OB. 1669.

LUCY PERCY,

COUNTESS OF CARLISLE.

THIS lady, equally remarkable for beauty, talents, and singularities, was the second and youngest daughter of Henry Percy, ninth Earl of Northumberland, by Dorothy, daughter of Walter Devereux, first Earl of Essex of his name. She was born in 1600, and had scarcely reached her fifth year, when her father, whom undeserved ill-fortune seems to have prevented from shining among the first great characters of his time, was charged with being accessory, or at least privy, to the Gunpowder Plot; enormously fined; and condemned to imprisonment in the Tower of London for life, where he indeed remained for nineteen years. An illustrious family thus deprived of its protector perhaps wisely sought security in seclusion, and it was probably amidst the mountains and forests of her mighty ancestors that Lucy acquired the activity and independence, the masculine and haughty sentiments and prejudices, by which she was always distinguished. On the sixth of November, 1617, she was married to James, Lord Hay, afterwards created Viscount Doncaster, and Earl of Carlisle, a young Scotsman, whom King James, with the extravagancy which usually marked his partialities, had loaded with favours. The legends of Asiatic magnificence, and of Roman luxury, fall short of the accounts which have been transmitted to us of the habits of this nobleman's life. Having already imbibed much of the romantic in rural retirement, such a union presented to her a new series of illusions of a nature wholly opposite, and, together with the idolatry lavished on her beauty by a splendid Court, contributed to form a character at once admired, disliked, feared, little understood by any, and perhaps least of all by herself.

This marriage, which had been made by the King, and which he honoured by his presence, was highly offensive to her father, but in the end procured his liberation. Wilson, in his Life of James the First, tells us that the “younger daughter, Lucy, a lady of incomparable beauty, solemnized in the poems of the most exquisite wits of her time, married the Lord Hayes, now made Viscount Doncaster, against her father’s will (who aimed at higher extractions); which the old Earl’s stubborn spirit not brooking, would never give her any thing; and Doncaster, whose affection was above money, setting only a valuation upon his much-admired bride, strove to make himself meritorious, and prevailed so with the King for his father-in-law, that he got his release: but the old Earl would hardly be drawn to take a release from his hand; so that when he had his liberty he restrained himself, and with importunity was wrought upon, by such as knew the distempers of his body might best qualify those of his mind, to make a journey to the Bath, which was one special motive to accept of his son-in-law’s respects.” The Earl’s enlargement, however, did not take place for four years after his daughter’s marriage.

In the following reign she turned her attention to politics; despised the society of her own sex; studied systems of government, intrigued in matters of state, actually obtained considerable influence, and exercised it with adroitness and security. Lord Clarendon, to whose very gravity the interference of a woman, and such a woman, must have been sufficiently offensive, occasionally mentions her, and always unfavourably. Speaking of Lord Holland’s transactions with the disaffected party, after his shameful abandonment of the King at York in the autumn of 1641, and of the mischievous intelligence with which they were treacherously supplied by that nobleman, he concludes,—“and he added to all this whatever information he had received by the Lady Carlisle of words or actions spoken or done by the Queen, which might increase their jealousy or malice to her Majesty." On the discovery probably of this, or some such correspondence, she lost the Queen's favour ; for he tells us elsewhere, in treating of the affairs of the Prince of Wales, after his flight to Holland, that "the Countess of Carlisle, who was now much trusted by the citizens, and had gotten again confidence with the Queen," had engaged herself in a negotiation between the Prince and the city, and had given his Royal Highness her advice as to his conduct towards the leading men there. Lord Clarendon however soon after acknowledges that she had "pawned her necklace of pearls for fifteen hundred pounds, which she totally disbursed in supplying officers, and making other provisions for the expedition of the Earl of Holland ;" but takes care to add, in the same sentence, that the Lord Percy, her brother, had been a "very importunate solicitor to the Prince for the repayment of that sum," and that "she had committed faults enough towards the King and Queen."

All this, it is true, might have been reasonably expected from any woman of a lively and busy cast of mind ; but that she should have gained an influence over the wise, severe, and haughty Strafford, would, if supported but by mean evidence, be utterly incredible. Of this, which is more than once alluded to by historical writers, we have a full proof in a letter of the tenth of January, 1636, from her sister, Dorothy Percy, Countess of Leicester, to her lord, which may be found in the Sidney Papers. "I shall be in much hope," writes the Countess, "that you will succeed the Deputy of Ireland" (Strafford), "whom they saie will only stay the accomplishment of what he has undertaken ; but I fear that Lady Carlisle, who has more power with him than any creatur, will do nothing for our good." This fact might be corroborated too by several letters from Lady Carlisle herself, two of which, one to the Earl of Leicester, the other to his Countess, from the same collection, I will insert here ; not however so much for that purpose, as to show her vehement inclination to politics, and as specimens of her epistolary style and method. The names are written in cipher in the originals, and afterwards deciphered, I suppose by Collins, the editor of the Papers; and it may be observed that she always mentions herself in the third person.

MY LORD,

A Sunday last the King cald Hamilton, and Lord Deputy, and commanded them to be friends, saying thaye wayr persons that he meant to trust with most of his busnise, and therefore that thaye must agree. Hamilton mayd great professions that he had never spoken to the disadvantage of Lord Deputy, and calld the King to witnes it, which he did, though Lady Carlisie knowse he hase indeavourd all that's posible to keepe the Deputy from being Lo. Treasurer. The Queene has mutche lamented this losse of the Spaniards, which the French Ambassador takes very ill. Sir Henry Vane has behaved himself verie well in H. Percy's busnise, and hase spoken verie boldly to the King; but yet it cannot be overcome, for Hamilton dosse hugly opose it, and his power is sartanely verie great; but the Queene is confident it will be donne, which I fear. Three days agoe my brother Northumberland wase calld to the Junto, and yesterdaye my Lord Hamilton, and the Deputye. There is aneother littell Junto that is mutch apprehended hear, of which there is but three; the Bishop, and Hamilton, and Deputye. They have meet twise, and the world is full of guesses for the ocation of it. My Lord, it is a great pain to me that you have yet no more sartanty of my sister's health, and I fear your Lordship gives me your greatest hopes. My best consolation is that you say she is cheerfull, for that is not her humour of great indispositione, without the being with your Lordship make that change. I beseetch you lett me again hear from your Lordship the nexst weeke, for tell I am free from thes feares I cane thinke of nothing ells, which I am confident will make you love me, and believe me more 17 Oct. 1639.

Your's, &c.

DEAR SISTER,

I am glad that you wish a friendship between my Lord of Leicester and Deputy, for I am confident it will be an essay worke, and, if Lady Carlisle be not much deceived, for the service of Leicester, which above all things at the present I thinke of. Northumberland is better with the Deputy than he has binne. Those two Lords have made a little expostulatione, and Northumberland more satisfied by mutche, and is now cald to all the greatest secrets of the King, which are now only in the trust of Canterbury, Deputy, and Hamilton. Conway will be General of the Horse, and Counselor, which is absolutely the Deputy's act. I desire you not to take notice of it to any body. The Deputy does absolutely govern Canterbury, and sartinly may persuade him to anything; and Lady Carlisle is verie confident that she can engage the Deputy as far as you please in any betwixt Canterbury and E. of Leicester. I was desired by my Lord Deputy to send some of your servants to buy him 2 beds, one of crimsons velvet, and the other of watched damaske; the crimsons, with silke fringe, and the other with gold and silver; but I, that day say anything to you, will let you knowe that by giving this command to one of your servants you will do him a huge favor. I did expect to have found the price of my particler in the trunk, but not finding it, I beseeche you send it by the next, and let me know whether I shall paye the money to Jone Illoyts, or send it to France. I have not binne well this weeke, and therfor excuse my strang writing. If you have found anything for a New year's Gift send me word by the next; and let my Lady Spencer knowe that my indispositione kept me from writing to her. My Lord of Holland asks your pardon for not writing, being at Theobalds with the King.

Your's, &c.

19 of December, 1639.

We will take leave here of her political speculations, observing only, in addition, that they seem to have been built on no fixed principles. Sir Philip Warwick, in his Memoirs, accuses her, the friend, and alleged confidant, of Strafford, of having given notice to Pym of the King's coming to the House of Commons to demand the five members, in order that they might have time to absent themselves. And St. Evremond, in the spirit of true French politeness, founding a compliment on her duplicity, tells us that—"from the inmost recesses of Whitehall, she had a great hand in animating the faction at Westminster." It is said that Monk obtained his first commission for military service in England through her recommendation, at the commencement of the civil war.

If her talents, whatever they might have been, attracted the notice and favour of one class of men, her beauty, not to mention her vanity, in which she seems to have been by no means deficient, commanded the positive worship of another: "Solemnised indeed she was," to use again the words of Arthur Wilson, "in the poems of the most exquisite wits of the time." At the head of these was Waller, the bard of the Sidneys, her relations, from the numerous eulogies dedicated to her by whose muse I will select the most agreeable.

THE COUNTRY TO MY LADY OF CARLISLE.

Madam, of all the sacred Muse inspir'd,
 Orpheus alone could with the Woods comply.
 Their rude inhabitants his song admir'd,
 And nature's self, in those that could not lye.
 Your beauty next our solitude invades,
 And warms us, shining through the thickest shades.

Nor ought the tribute which the wond'ring court
 Pays your fair eyes prevail with you to scorn
 The answer, and consent to that report
 Which, echo like, the country does return.
 Mirrors are taught to flatter, but our springs
 Present th' impartial images of things.

A rural judge disposed of beauty's prize :
 A simple shepherd was preferr'd to Jove :
 Down to the Mountains, from the partial skies,
 Came Juno, Pallas, and the Queen of love,
 To plead for that which was so justly given
 To the bright Carlisle of the Court of heav'n.

Carlisle ! a name which all our woods are taught
 Loud as their Amaryllis to resound.
 Carlisle ! a name which on the bark is wrought
 Of every tree that's worthy of the wound.
 From Phœbus' rage our shadows and our streams
 May guard us better than from Carlisle's beams.

Voiture too, the Waller of France, in which country she resided during her husband's embassy thither, has addressed to her some highly complimentary verses. It is remarkable that her poets have confined themselves almost wholly to the celebration of her personal charms, seldom adverting to the powers of her mind, and never to her virtues ; this however furnishes scarcely a negative evidence against her moral character. Such a person must have had abundance of enemies, and yet we meet with no direct censure on her conduct as a woman, except in the memoirs, already quoted, of Sir Philip Warwick, who, it must be confessed, expresses himself of her pretty freely. He calls her "that busy states-woman, the Countess of Carlisle, who had now changed her gallant, from Strafford to Pym, and was become such a she-saint that she frequented their sermons, and took notes, &c." If Warwick intended to apply the word "gallant" in its most usual sense, we shall have less cause to wonder at the strictness of her intimacies, either with royalists or rebels.

Nor were her panegyrics confined to verse. Sir Toby Matthews, whose eccentricities have found their way into all the memoirs of the reigns of James and Charles the First, drew her character with an intenseness of labour, and an extravagancy and obscurity of thought and expression, which must discourage all hope, could any one be found with such a hope, to discover a parallel. This singular production lay dormant till 1660, the last year of Lady Carlisle's life, when it appeared, occupying no less than ten octavo pages, in a volume of Letters of eminent persons, collected by Matthews, and edited by Dr. Donne, who prefixed to it a dedication to the Countess, in which he seems to have striven to tear the palm of absurdity from the brow of his author. "But, Madam," concludes Donne (having uttered every thing that common sense and moderate taste would have rejected on the subject of epistolary correspondence, particularly of the dead with the living, and, above all, of Sir Toby Matthews with his surviving friends in England, and all for the sake of introducing a poor final conceit), "that which would concern us more than all this is a hope that by a letter from him we should hear that your Ladyship were to favour us for many years to come with your presence here; whose absence would make such a chasm in our Galaxy, that it would grieve us less to see all our saints ascend into the heavens than that the earth should lose so much of her splendour, beauty, and goodness." Among the most intelligible passages of Matthews's long eulogium, the whole of which, as Lord Orford justly observes, might fairly pass as satire, are the following:—"She is of too high a mind and dignity not only to seek, but almost to wish, the friendship of any creature—Her nature values fortunate persons as virtuous—She has as much sense and gratitude for the actions of friendship as so extreme a beauty will give her leave to entertain—She more willingly allows of the conversation of men than of women; yet when she is amongst her own sex, her discourse is of fashions and dressings, which she hath ever so perfect upon herself as she likewise teaches it by seeing her—She hath too great a heart to have naturally any strong inclination to others—She affects particular so much that she dislikes general courtesies; and you may fear to be less valued by obliging her—She believeth nothing to be worthy her consideration but her own imaginations: those gallant fancies keep her in satisfaction when she is alone; when she will find something worthy of her liking, since in the world she cannot find anything worthy of her loving—She hath a grace and facility, and I might well say a felicity, in her expressions, since they are certain and always in the fewest words—She is in disposition inclined to be cholerick, which she suppresses, not perhaps in consideration of the persons who occasion it, but upon a belief that it is unhand-some towards herself—She affects extremes, because she cannot suffer any condition but of plenty and glory.” The reader doubtless will be satisfied with the extent of these extracts.

The Countess of Carlisle died in November, 1660, having survived her husband, by whom she had no children, for twenty-four years. She was buried near her father, at Petworth, in Sussex.

1678

MARQUIS OF ARGYLL.

THIS nobleman, who was so deeply engaged in the Scottish affairs of his time, and generally so mysteriously that to treat of him at large would produce rather a series of conjectures and arguments than of facts, was the eldest son of Archibald, seventh Earl of Argyll, by Anne, fifth daughter of William Douglas, first Earl of Morton of the line of Lochleven, and was born in the year 1598.

His entrance into public life commenced with a bitter disagreement between his father and himself. The Earl had taken a second wife, of the English Catholic family of Cornwallis, and, owing to her persuasions, and, perhaps yet more, to a long residence in Spain, where he held a high military command under Philip the Third, had embraced that faith. The son, who bore the title of Lord Lorn, had been bred in all the strictness of Calvinism. Such a discordance in religious profession was then, and in that country, certainly destructive of all ties of affection, natural or habitual. Charles the First, to whom the influence of the head of a family so powerful in Scotland was at that time peculiarly important, considering that the Earl had in a great measure forfeited that influence to his son by the adoption of a doctrine and worship so detested there, spared no pains in endeavouring to gain Lord Lorn to his interest. He called the young nobleman to his Privy Council in Scotland so early as the year 1626, and soon after accepted from him a surrender of the hereditary office, or rather the reversion of it, of Justice General in Scotland, which was little more than a dignified sinecure, and gave him in return the appointment of Justiciary of the shire of Argyll, the Western Isles, and all other his father's estates in Scotland, which in fact invested him with all but sovereign sway in those parts : he was about the same time constituted one of the extraordinary Lords of Session ; but these favours were presently followed by one far more considerable. The Earl, whose great revenues were mostly in his own disposal, had resolved to disinherit him, when the King interfered, and not only prevented it, but, in right of one of the many penal laws against Catholics, compelled Argyll to relinquish his estates to his son, and to accept a rent-charge on them of sufficient amount for the maintenance of his rank during his life.

When this arrangement was made both parties were in London, and it seems to have been concluded in the King's presence, for Lord Clarendon informs us that "the old man declared he would submit to the King's pleasure, though he believed he was hardly dealt with ; and then, with some bitterness, put his son in mind of his undutiful carriage towards him, and charged him to carry in his mind how bountiful the King had been to him, which yet, he told him, he was sure he would forget ; and thereupon said to his Majesty, 'Sir, I must know this young man better than you can do. You have brought me low that you may raise him, which I doubt you will live to repent, for he is a man of craft, subtlety, and falsehood, and can love no man ; and if ever he finds it in his power to do you mischief, he will be sure to do it.' " Nor was it long before this prophecy was fully verified.

Lorn returned into Scotland, full of professions of loyalty and gratitude, but with discontent lurking at his heart. He had asked the King for the office of High Chancellor of Scotland, which just at that time became vacant by the death of George, Earl of Kinnoull, and was not only refused, but had the additional vexation of seeing it bestowed on a prelate, the historian Spotswood, which more than ever irritated him against that order. He concealed however his resentment, as well as the communications into which he presently entered with the leaders of the more violent presbyterians, but suspicions soon arose of his disaffection, and, on the first proposal of the covenant, were confirmed. Still he affected a high devotion to the King's interests; joined in all the deliberations of the Privy Council, and in the direction of the measures of government. At length the rumour of his double dealing becoming public, he wrote an apology at large for his conduct, and transmitted it to the English ministers, who replied that the King desired to receive it from his own mouth. This however, as well as any apparent concern with the covenant, which by this time had set Scotland in a flame, he dexterously evaded; and thus, maintaining with great skill a show of strict impartiality, seemingly dictated by his loyalty on the one hand, and his conscience on the other, he steered his doubtful course till the end of the year 1638, when, thinking his designs, whatever they were, sufficiently ripe for such a disclosure, he at length publicly signed the covenant, and committed an act of open resistance to the Crown, by remaining and voting in that general assembly which abolished Episcopacy in Scotland, after its dissolution had been formally pronounced by the King's High Commissioner. He was now Earl of Argyll, nor is it improbable that the death of his father, which had very recently occurred, might have furnished some motives to this sudden alteration in his conduct.

Charles's impotent and unfortunate warlike expedition into Scotland immediately followed, and in the pacification, as it was called, which so speedily cut it short, Argyll was a principal manager. The King, soon after his return, despatched an order, or rather invitation, for his personal attendance at the Court, with some others of the Scottish nobility, which he disobeyed, pleading a prohibition by which the government there, in its anxiety for his personal safety, had forbade his absence; nor could he indeed at that time have been spared with convenience to his or their designs, for he was then, with his vassals, in arms, successfully combating the Earl of Athol, and the clan of Ogilvie, who had risen for the King in the north. Scotland had now in fact tacitly renounced its allegiance, and was in a close correspondence with the rebel Parliament of England, in which no man was more deeply, however secretly, engaged than Argyll. Charles, in the spring of 1640, made another feeble and abortive effort to subdue it by an army, which was followed by another disgraceful treaty, in the result of which he submitted to all the demands of the covenanters, and in the following year, tempted by some singular and unknown motives, made a visit to that land which had so lately involved him in such bitter humiliation. His first care on his arrival was to open privately a negotiation with Argyll, through the medium of the Marquis of Hamilton, which had scarcely commenced when both those noblemen fled secretly from Edinburgh to their country-seats, alleging that they had discovered a design to take them off by assassination. That a proposal to that effect had been offered to the King we have undoubted evidence, while even his worst enemies have always admitted that he rejected it with disgust and horror, yet considerable mystery involves the circumstance of their flight. It produced however no results, beyond furnishing the leading rebels of England with a pretext for alarming the people by affected apprehensions of similar attacks on themselves; and producing to the two fugitive Lords on their return an advancement in their respective dignities: Hamilton was created a Duke, and, on the sixteenth of November, 1641, the title of Marquis was granted to Argyll; acts of grace performed by Charles probably with no other view than to discredit any belief of his having countenanced the alleged design against their personal safety.

These two great men, of equal weight in Scotland, of equal talents, and of characters somewhat similar, were at that time apparently on terms of friendship. Hamilton possessed the entire confidence of the King, who had lately employed him in endeavouring to fathom the real sentiments and intentions, with respect to public affairs, of Argyll, whose discovery of that commission, joined to a mutual jealousy of each other's power, produced a bitter enmity between them. Charles left Scotland in November, 1641, having, by innumerable bounties and concessions during his stay, in a manner divested himself of the sovereignty of the country; and Argyll lost no time in confirming the close connexion which he had for some time held with the English Parliament, and disposing Scotland, always saving his own superiority there, to a submission to its will. In order to enable himself to pursue this line of conduct with full effect, he procured from his own Parliament, as it may be called, since it was wholly under his control, the office of first Commissioner for Scottish affairs to that of England. There he cultivated the strictest intimacy with all the most determined enemies to the King and to Monarchy; while at home, whether in Council, in Parliament, in the field, or in the application of his own vast private authority, he directed all his endeavours to the utter ruin of the royal cause; yet, such was the profound faculty of this man at artifice and dissimulation, that he contrived from time to time during the course of his open rebellion to flatter the King's friends, and even Charles himself, with faint hopes that he was secretly inclined to support it when a favourable opportunity might offer itself.

In the spring of 1644, in his character of first commissioner, he came to England with the army which, under the command of Leslie, then invaded it, and on his return marched into the north of Scotland, with a commission of commander in chief, to oppose the Marquis of Huntley, who had risen there with a considerable body of troops on the part of the Crown; and, having defeated them, attacked the Marquis of Montrose, to whom he had an utter hatred, and who had lately beaten the covenanters near Aberdeen, and dispersed his little army. His military successes however were cut short by the arrival in his own territory of the Marquis of Antrim, who claimed a right to the inheritance of a large portion of it, with a body of Irish, who, being joined by Montrose, and his scattered forces, laid the country waste, with horrible spoil and devastation. The battle of Inverlochie followed, in which Argyll was totally worsted, and fifteen hundred of the name of Campbell perished. Their chief, who was equally deficient in the skill and in the spirit of a soldier, beheld the havoc from a boat in a neighbouring lake, not less galled by the severe loss than by the fact that the victorious general was Montrose. That gallant nobleman commanded also in the battle of Kilsyth, yet more unfortunate to the covenanters, which occurred shortly after, and in which Argyll was likewise present. Numerous actions of less importance, but not less favourable in their events to the royal cause, were fought about the same period. The military force of the Scottish rebels was nearly destroyed; and in February, 1646, Argyll went to Ireland, to bring home a little army which had been sent thither to the aid of the Protestants, on the breaking out of the horrible insurrection of 1642.

On his return, he re-assumed the politician. It is about this time that we find Lord Clarendon speaking shortly of him in terms which tend to justify much which has been here given of his character—"The Marquis of Argyll," says his Lordship, "was now come from Scotland, and sat" (in Parliament) "with the commissioners of that kingdom, over whom he had a great ascendant. He was, in matters of religion, and in relation to the church, purely Presbyterian; and in matters of state, and with reference to the war, perfectly Independent. He abhorred all thoughts of peace, and that the King should ever more have the government, towards whose person, notwithstanding the infinite obligations he had to him, he had always an inveterate malice. He had made a fast friendship with Sir Harry Vane, during his late being in Scotland, and they both liked each other's principles in government. From the time of his coming to the town the Scottish commissioners were less vehement in obstructing the ordinance" (self-denying), "or the new modelling the army." These were in fact the two measures which led most immediately to the subversion of what remained of the British constitution.

And now, in an evil hour, the unhappy Charles fled for protection to his Scottish subjects. It seems scarcely credible that Argyll should have been among the first of those who greeted him with protestations of fidelity; still less, that the King should have immediately intrusted him with a commission to obtain the opinion of two of his most faithful servants, the Duke of Richmond, and the Marquis of Hertford, whom he had left at Oxford, on a question of the utmost delicacy and importance—whether it would be advisable at that juncture for the Scottish Parliament and army to declare explicitly in his favour. That both these facts occurred we have however the best historical evidence; as well as that Argyll performed, or pretended to have performed, the duty required of him, and delivered to the King a negative answer. He contrived to be absent from all deliberations on the subject of the infamous surrender, which speedily followed, of the King's person to the English rebels; but it would be madness to suppose that such a step could have been taken without the consent of him who at the time might be said to govern Scotland. He opposed with vehemence "the royal Engagement," in compliance with which the Duke of Hamilton undertook his unfortunate expedition into England; and not only protested in Parliament against the vote by which it was ordained, but, shortly after the murder of the King, personally led to Edinburgh an immense tumultuary body of the most furious covenanters, and with their aid expelled the executive branch, which called itself "the Convention of Estates," for having obeyed that vote, and so in a manner dissolved the government.

This certainly was a fit preparation for his reception of Cromwell, who so soon followed his example, on a somewhat larger scale. That General now marched with an army to Edinburgh, where he was received by Argyll with a cordiality not wholly affected. The covenant was renewed with great solemnity; the engagement proscribed, and its adherents summoned to appear before the Parliament, which was then about to meet. Argyll however was unable, perhaps unwilling, to go with that arch-rebel the whole length which was meditated by the latter, for the Scots were, to a man, now anxious that the King's life, which they had put in jeopardy, should be spared. It was rumoured that he had proposed that his Majesty should be perpetually imprisoned, and that Cromwell when they were together had consented. The great tragedy over, Scotland, as with one voice, demanded the acknowledgment and proclamation of Charles the Second, and Argyll, powerful as he was, durst not resist. The new King arrived in Scotland, and was received by him with all the arts and graces of a courtier, the practice of which no man better understood, but watched and guarded as a prisoner. After Charles had left him to march into England, his importance gradually decayed, and with it his spirit, which had been always the creature of circumstances and not of nature, but his shameless inconsistency and treachery became aggravated. He placed the crown on the head of Charles the Second with his own hands in 1651; assisted in the ceremony of proclaiming Oliver Cromwell Protector in 1653; signed an engagement to support the usurper's government; condescended to sit in his mock House of Commons, as representative of the county of Aberdeen; and secretly intrigued there for the King's restoration.

When that great event occurred, he wrote to Charles from Scotland, desiring leave to pay his duty to him. It has been obscurely hinted by Burnet that the King in his answer, delivered verbally to the Lord Lorn, and communicated by him in writing to his father, did not discourage his coming. Be that as it might, he came, and was actually within the palace of Whitehall when he was arrested, and committed to the Tower, from whence, after a time, he was sent a prisoner to Edinburgh, and put on his trial. It is strange, more especially considering the character of the time, and of the party accused, that it should have been found difficult to convict a man nearly the whole of whose life had been passed in the commission of treason, but there is reason to think that he would have been finally acquitted had not Monk, with scandalous baseness, conveyed to the advocates for the Crown, even during the trial, some letters written by Argyll to himself when they were colleagues in rebellion. The evidence thus obtained was conclusive. He was condemned, in recollection of the fate of the gallant Montrose, to be hanged, but that indignity was afterwards spared; and on the twenty-seventh of May, 1661, he was beheaded, suffering death with a calmness and resolution little expected in a man whose natural timidity was as well known as his crimes.

The Marquis of Argyll married his cousin Margaret, second daughter of William Douglas, second Earl of Morton, by whom he had Archibald, to whom the Earldom of Argyll was re-granted, and who was beheaded in 1685, and Neile; and three daughters; Anne, who died a spinster; Jean, married to Robert Ker, first Marquis of Lothian; and Mary, first to George Sinclair, sixth Earl of Caithness, secondly, to John Campbell, first Earl of Breadalbin.

ELIZABETH,
QUEEN OF BOHEMIA,
DAUGHTER OF JAMES THE FIRST.

ELIZABETH, QUEEN OF BOHEMIA.

Few persons have been more celebrated than this lady for virtues, talents, strength of mind, sweetness of temper, and gaiety of heart. These praises however have been bestowed but in the way of general eulogy, and we can collect few particulars of her but from the dry details of public history, which, with an exactness perhaps too fastidious, usually rejects those characteristic anecdotes in which biography delights. Other circumstances too have concurred to cloud her story. She was withdrawn from her country at an age too early to admit of much previous observation there, beyond such as the amiable qualities of her childhood might have excited, and placed among a people to whose phlegmatic gravity, and formal manners, those of her maturity were perhaps generally in a great measure indifferent. Above all she became an exile, experienced comparative poverty, and was neglected by her friends, and of the history of the unfortunate much will be always lost.

She was the only daughter of James the Sixth of Scotland, and Anne, his Queen ; and was born in that country on the nineteenth of August, 1596. Her father, soon after his arrival to take possession of the crown of England, gave the charge of her education, with the name of preceptor, to John, first Lord Harrington, a nobleman not less qualified for that office by an acute judgment, and by the variety and elegance of his acquirements, than by the strictness of his morals, and the refined politeness of his manners. All that might have been expected from such a pupil, under such a director, was obtained, and when the customary etiquette of the Court at length allowed her to appear publicly in it, she became at once the object of general approbation, mixed with a tenderness of regard that almost deserved the name of love. Her features were by no means faultless, but they abounded in that fascinating expression which may be called the soul of beauty, while the brilliancy of her understanding and accomplishments shone with a mild and inoffensive lustre through a veil of the purest simplicity and candour. Several suitors had aspired to her hand, the most remarkable of whom was the afterwards celebrated Gustavus Adolphus, for whom his parent and predecessor, Charles the Ninth of Sweden, demanded her in marriage by a formal embassy in 1609, and was refused. Her father at length determined to accede to the proposals of the Elector Palatine, Frederic the Fifth, who was the most powerful of the protestant Princes of the Empire, and owed his preference chiefly to James's warm attachment to that faith. Frederic arrived in London at the close of the year 1612, and, by a good fortune which rarely attends such marriages, not only became ardently enamoured of the Princess, but in an equal measure captivated her affections.

They were married in the banquetting-house at Whitehall on the fourteenth of February, 1613, N. S., with a splendour which historians, however carelessly they may have passed over the more important parts of Elizabeth's story, have not failed to commemorate with diffuse minuteness. Suffice it to say on this head, that the sum lavished on the celebration amounted to considerably more than one hundred thousand pounds, and that the jewels worn by the King and Queen, and the Prince of Wales, as Sir John Finett informs us, James himself declared "in conversation," were of the value of nine hundred thousand. In the meantime the portion of the bride was but forty thousand. The match was hailed by the utmost popular applause, but met with less favour at Court; the King treated it with indifference, and the Queen openly held it in aversion. She was used to call her daughter, in contempt, "Goodwife Palsgrave;" and the unfavourable opinion which Prince, afterwards King, Charles had formed of the bridegroom may be inferred from the coarse commencement of a short letter subsequently written by him to the favourite Buckingham—"Steenie, I send you herewith letters to my sister and brother: I place them so because I think the grey mare the better horse." These prejudices however were confined to the royal family; for Finett, writing on the twenty-third of October, 1612, to Mr. Trumbull, the English Resident at Brussels, of Frederic's first appearance at the Court, says, "He hath most happily deceived good men's doubts and ill men's expectations; report of envy, malice, or weak judgment, having painted him in so ill colours as the most here, and especially our ladies and gentlewomen, who held themselves not a little interested in the handsome choice of her Grace's husband, prepared themselves to see that with sorrow which they now apprehend with much gladness." He was in fact a Prince by no means deficient in natural talents or accomplishments, but qualified neither by nature or art to direct the councils of a state, or to defend it in the field.

They remained in London till the tenth of April, when the King and Queen accompanied them to Rochester, and took leave of them there; and they embarked at Gravesend for Flushing, and proceeded in great pomp to Heidelburgh, the capital of the Palatinate. There for six years they reigned, with equal prosperity and popularity, in the most beautiful country, and perhaps over the happiest people of Germany, when in a moment of blind and silly ambition they sacrificed those incomparable advantages to the mere sound of a regal title, and an ill-founded reputation of independent sovereignty. The kingdom of Bohemia, originally elective, had been brought by the genius and power of Charles the Fifth under the dominion of Austria, and rendered hereditary. Ferdinand, the fifth King of that House, was a zealous papist, and Bohemia had been called the cradle of the reformation. A powerful party opposed his election, for that form was still used, with great firmness. At length they openly revolted; formed a provisional government; and, having offered the crown to the Dukes of Savoy and Saxony, by whom it was successively refused, were induced by their hopes from the good will and strength of his father-in-law, to proffer it to the Elector Palatine. Frederic returned a cool answer, and demanded time to deliberate. James earnestly dissuaded him from accepting it, and even forewarned him that in the event of an unprosperous issue he was to expect no assistance from England. The entreaties however of his own family, in which his lovely consort is said to have earnestly joined, at length prevailed, and she was crowned at Prague, on the seventh of November, 1619, three days after the coronation of her husband.

Ferdinand, who had lately become emperor, lost no time in issuing his Ban, declaring Frederic a traitor and rebel against the Empire, and deprived of his Electoral dignity and estate, and prepared to invade not only Bohemia but also the Palatinate. James, whom the English would have willingly supported in aiding his son-in-law with troops, kept his word, and would interfere no further than by various negotiations, which had no other effect than to render him the scorn and ridicule of Europe. At length, on the ninth of November, 1620, Frederic was discomfited, under the walls of Prague, in one of the most decisive actions ever fought, and fled on the night of that fatal day, with his Queen, then great with child, to Breslau, one hundred and twenty miles from the field of battle. A letter written by her to her father, in the forlorn hour of her arrival there, remains in the British Museum.

“Je ne veux importuner V. M. d’un trop longue lettre. Le Baron de Dona ne faudra d’informer V. M. de malheur qui nous est arrivé, et nous a contraint de quitter Prague, et venir en ce lieu icy, où Dieu sait combien nous y demeurerons. Je supplie donc treshumblement V. M. d'avoir soing du Roy et de moy en nous envoyant du secours, autrement nous serons du tout ruinez. Il n'y a que V. M. apres Dieu, de qui nous attendons ayde. Je la remercie treshumblement de la favorable declaration qu'il luy a pleu faire pour la conservation du Palatinat. Je la supplie treshumblement de faire le mesme pour nous icy, et nous envoyer un bon secours pour nous defendre contre nous ennemis, autrement je ne say que nous deviendrons. Je la supplie donc encore d'avoir pitié de nous, et de n'abandoner le Roy à cest heur qu'il en a si grand besoign ; pour moy, je suis resolvé de ne le quitter, car si il perit je periroy aussi avec luy ; mais, quoyqu'il m'arrive, Je ne seray jamais autre que, Sire, de V. M. la treshumble et tresobeissante fille et servante,

ce $\frac{23}{13}$ Novembre.”

“ ELIZABETH.”

Nor was Frederic's attachment to her less constant or ardent. “Croyez, mon cher cœur,” says he in a letter of later date, “que je me souhaite bien après de vous. Je vous ai déjà mandé ce que m'en retient ; plut a Dieu qu'eussions un petit coin au monde pour y vivre contents emsemble—ce tout le bonheur que je me souhaite.”

The affectionate tenderness of her nature was blended with a magnanimity which misfortune could not impair, and a dignified purity of morals, and sense of female honour, which awed into due respect her numerous admirers : for she was actually beloved by many, even to adoration. The fierce and haughty Christian, Duke of Brunswick, her husband's most warlike ally, constantly wore her glove on his helmet ; the celebrated General, Count Thurn, was proud to acknowledge the influence of her charms ; and Lord Craven, who was a volunteer in Frederic's service, and of whom more will presently be said, was devoted to her, and continued her slave even to the end of her life. She was universally called in the army, "the Queen of Hearts," and the soldiers were used to say that they fought as much for her as for the justice of her husband's cause. The complete overthrow of fortune which she had suffered, for Frederic was deprived by the battle of Prague not only of his kingdom but of his electorate, scarcely drew from her an expression of regret and his affection for her inspired him with the same passive heroism, for it did not belong to his nature. The anonymous writer of a letter in the Lansdowne MSS. speaking of them after some detail of the battle, says—"Both of them, the Queen especially, do make all comers to be witnesses of their singular moderation, patience, devotion, and confidence in God; and this I would have you believe; that the world in many ages did hardly ever see such a pair of that rank; and surely this tribulation shall do them good."

They were presently driven from Breslau, and having wandered for some time in Silesia, removed into Brandenburg, and at length settled in Holland, where they were supported more by the beneficence of the House of Nassau, and by the occasional contributions of several persons of rank in England, particularly Archbishop Abbot, than from the purse of her father. James contented himself by redoubling his embassies, and by indulging in idle reveries of compassing their restoration to the Palatinate through the interest with the House of Austria which he expected to found on the projected marriage of his son with the Infanta of Spain. This weakness involved his daughter in the contempt which was properly due only to himself. Her misfortunes became in some measure the subject of vulgar satire. "She was represented in a print at Antwerp," says Wilson, in his Life of James, "as a poor Irish mantler, with her hair hanging about her ears, and her child at her back, and the King, her father, carrying the cradle after her." The accession of her brother to the crown of England brought with it some public promise of succour, and some actual exertion. Charles declared to his first Parliament on its meeting, that it was his intention to make the recovery of the Palatinate the primary object of his political consideration ; little however was done till the King of Sweden, then at war with the Emperor, in 1632 proffered his best endeavours to that end, but on such hard conditions that Charles, in anger, broke up the treaty in which they had been proposed, and recalled his ambassador from Stockholm. The unhappy Frederic, however, willing to cherish even the faintest hope, negotiated separately with Gustavus, when death cut short the views of both the parties : the heroic Swede fell at the battle of Lutzen on the sixth of November, in that year, and Frederic died at Mentz on the twenty-ninth of the same month, of an infectious fever which he had contracted at Frankfort.

Elizabeth remained at the Hague, living in the utmost privacy, her chief employment the education of her children, and her only relaxations of which we hear, an extended correspondence with men celebrated for powers of mind, and for various literary and scientific attainments, occasionally relieved by the amusements of hunting and shooting, in which she much delighted. The management of her domestic affairs, and indeed of all matters in which her interests or her comforts were concerned, she committed to Lord Craven, who had entered the military service of the states of Holland that he might be near to her. The most perfect friendship and confidence, and the most open and unreserved intimacy subsisted between them, yet such was the public opinion, or rather feeling, excited by that harmony of general correctness which had always distinguished her, that not a breath of slander ever fell on their connexion. It was at length believed, and probably most justly, that they had been privately married. She professed the protestant persuasion without ostentation, but practised it with unalterable firmness of resolution. Her brother, Charles, at a moment when her affairs were in a state of the deepest depression, dispatched Sir Henry Vane to represent to her the prudence of sending her eldest son to Vienna, to be bred a Catholic, in the view of matching him to a Princess of the House of Austria, but she answered that, rather than take a step at once so mean and so wicked, she would put him to death with her own hands. A bitter and reciprocal dislike subsisted between Elizabeth and the eccentric Christina of Sweden. This is said to have arisen out of a mutual jealousy on their respective intimacies with eminent men of letters, but the following epistle from Elizabeth to Sir Edward Nicholas will at least shew that she had other causes of aversion. It is not perhaps so much for the sake of elucidating that point, as to give a specimen of the liveliness of her mind and style, that I here insert it.

“ Haghe, Dec. 3, 1654.

“ Mr. Secretarie,

“ I received your’s at Berghen, whither I was come from Antwerp and Bruxells. I find you have unriddled my riddle verie right. I saw the Queene of Sweden at the play. She is extravagant in her fashion and apparell, but she has a good well-favoured face, and a milde countenance. One of the players that knew me tolde her who I was, but she made no shew of it. I went the next day to Bruxells, where I saw the Arch-Duc at Mass, and I saw his pictures and lodgings. I lay at Sr. Harry de Vic’s, who was very carefull and diligent to do me all the service he coulde. I staid but Sunday at Bruxells, and returned to Antwerp upon Monday, and hearing from Duart how the Queene of Sweden had desired to know when I came back thither, that she might meet with me in an indifferent place, I made the more hast away the next day, because I had no mind to speak with her, since I heard how unhandsomlie she had spoken of the King, my dear brother, and the King, my dear nephue, and indeed of all our nation ; so I avoided it, and went away as soon as I had dined ; yet she sent Donoy to me with a very civill message, that she was sorie she could not use that civilitie to me as she both should doe and desired, hoping that one day we might meet together with more freedome. I answered her as civillie as I coulde, and now, when I went from Berghen, I gave Sr. Will. Swann charge to make her a complement from me.

“I came hither upon Tewsday from Berghen, where I was extremelie well intertainēd by the Princess of Zollern, who was with me, and was my guide all the jorney, and defrayed me. Her daughter is now so prettie everie way that you would like her yett better than ever you did if you saw her. She is much growen, and is still of a verie sweet disposition, and she doth become her. She has a great deal of witt, and loves our nation extreamlie. It makes me think of your wish, which I am not against, you know. By this post I have had verie good news of the Duke of Gloucester’s constantie in his religion, and of my Lo. of Ormond’s handsome carriage in that business, so as the Queen saith she will press him no further in it; but I hope the King will not trust to it, but get him away from thence, which will doe the King great right. It is so colde as I can say no more, but am ever

“Your most affectionat friend.”

She was unfortunate in her heir, Charles Lewis, to whom the Lower Palatinate was restored in 1648, on condition of his renouncing his title to the Upper. He appears to have been mean, selfish, and unfeeling. He came to England at the age of eighteen, and was received with kindness and flattering distinctions, but in the beginning of the rebellion left the King at York, and went to Holland; returned in the following year; and, while his younger brothers, Rupert and Maurice, were fighting bravely in the cause of their royal uncle, went over to the Parliament, and actually condescended to sit in what was called the assembly of divines at Westminster. It has been supposed that this strange conduct was the result of a secret agreement between the King and himself: a conjecture altogether incredible. He treated his mother with unkindness, and even denied her trifling pecuniary aids towards the maintenance of her little æconomical household, when he had been for some years competent to relieve her. She thus expostulates with him in a letter published in Bromley's collection, which contains also another, of the same tenor, written some years after :—

“ Son,

“ I send this by the post to let you know that the States have given me for my kitchen one thousand guilders a month till I shall be able to go from hence, which God knows how and when that will be for my debts ; wherefore I earnestly entreat you to do so much for me as to augment that money which you give me, and then I shall make a shift to live a little something reasonable ; and you did always promise me that as your country bettered you would increase my means till you were able to give me my jointure. I do not ask you much. If you would add but what you did hint, you would do me a great kindness by it, and make me see you have still an affection for me, and put me in a confidence of it. Since you cannot yet pay me all that is my due, that will shew to the world you desire it if you could. I pray do this for me. You will much comfort me by it, who am in so ill a condition that it takes all my contentment from me. I am making my house as little as I can, that I may subsist by the little I have till I shall be able to come to you, which (since I cannot do because of my debts, which I am not able to pay, neither the new nor the old) if you do not as I desire you, I am sure I shall not increase. As you love me, I do conjure you to give me an answer, and by the time commonly, and you will tie me to continue, as I am most truly,

“ Yours, &c.”

“ Hague, $\frac{13}{23}$ August, 1655.”

She remained however under these forlorn circumstances till the restoration of her nephew, Charles the Second, who invited her to pass the remainder of her life in England, a proposal which she most readily accepted. She arrived in London on the seventeenth of May, 1661, with Lord Craven, and took up her residence in his house in Drury Lane, where she remained till the following February, on the eighth of which month, as we learn from Mr. Evelyn's Diary, she removed to Leicester House, and died there on the thirteenth, only five days after she had entered it. She was buried in Westminster Abbey, in a vault made for the interment of her brother, Henry, Prince of Wales.

The issue of the Queen of Bohemia was eight sons, and five daughters. 1, Frederick Henry, who was drowned, or rather frozen to death, in his fifteenth year, at Haërlem, on the seventh of January, 1629, in the sight of his unfortunate father; 2, Charles Lewis, who has been lately mentioned; 3, Rupert; 4, Maurice; both of whom hold places of some distinction in English history; 5, Lewis, who died an infant; 6, Edward; 7, Philip, who fell in battle in Germany, at the age of twenty-three; 8, Gustavus, who also died in infancy. Her daughters were, 1, Elizabeth, Abbess of Hervorden, in Westphalia, one of the wisest and most learned women of the age in which she lived, to whom Descartes dedicated his "Principia," and declared that she was the only person he knew who perfectly comprehended his works, and with whom William Penn frequently conferred on the system of his new colony, and on the principles and doctrine of his sect; 2, Louisa Hollandina, Abbess of Maubuisson, in France, highly celebrated for her skill in the fine arts, especially painting, many proofs of which are preserved, and highly esteemed, in the continental cabinets; 3, Henrietta Mary, married to Sigismund Ragotsky, Prince of Transylvania; 4, Charlotte, who died an infant; and, 5, Sophia, a Princess distinguished by every virtue, and every accomplishment, who became the consort of Ernest, Elector of Hanover, and carried the inheritance of the Crown of these realms into his illustrious House; in which may it please the Almighty to the end of time to maintain it in all happiness and glory!

MARLOTTA DE LA TRINDAD

COUNTESS OF DERBY

1785

CHARLOTTE DE LA TREMOÛILLE,

COUNTESS OF DERBY.

THE story of this illustrious lady, that is to say, almost the whole of it which remains unburied in oblivion, is confined to the journal of a siege. It exhibits however a character so abounding in sagacity, prudence, loyalty, grandeur of spirit, and active heroism, as to beguile us for a moment into a feeling of regret that the social policy of all climates and ages should have agreed to restrict the amiable sex to the power of pleasing, and to repress those energies which in spite of its regulations occasionally burst forth, and always with a degree of splendour which is rarely found to adorn even the finest of masculine sentiments or actions.

Charlotte de la Tremouille was the third daughter of Claude, Duke of Thouars, Prince of Palmont, and a Peer of France, by Charlotte Brabantina, daughter of William the first Prince of Orange, and of his third wife, Charlotte of Bourbon, of the Royal House of Montpensier. She was married when very young to the excellent and highly accomplished James Stanley, seventh Earl of Derby, an outline of whose life and character has already appeared in this work. All the most propitious circumstances seemed to have combined to bless their union: the purest mutual affection; congenial talents and tempers; a numerous and beloved progeny; the most exalted birth, with immense revenues; and the whole crowned by a just reputation for the practice of all virtues. This marvellous picture of almost superhuman felicity was doomed to be torn in pieces, and scattered to the winds, by the accursed demon of faction and rebellion.

The Earl, her husband, was among the first of the nobility who hastened to surround King Charles the First after his declaration of war in the year 1642. He presented himself to his Sovereign at Shrewsbury at the head of three regiments of infantry, and as many troops of horse, raised, clothed, and armed, solely at his own charge. It was thought proper to retain this force with the main army, and to despatch the Earl back into Lancashire, his own country, that he might exert his great influence there in encouraging the gentry to further levies; and having so done, with very extensive effect, and performed some gallant actions with a small body of new recruits, intelligence was received that the rebels had formed a design to seize the Isle of Man, of which he was hereditary Lord. He was now suddenly ordered thither, and his Lady and family being then resident in his noble mansion of Lathom, a building which required little to render it in some degree defensible, he threw into it a few soldiers, together with such arms, ammunition, and sustenance, as the time would allow him to collect, and having committed it, together with his children and the management of all his English concerns, to the charge of the Countess, hastily departed.

He had scarcely reached the Isle when the Countess received certain intelligence that her house would shortly be attacked. She lost no time therefore in strengthening her little garrison, by increasing her provisions and military stores, and admitting singly, or in small parties, such neighbours of the middling and lower classes as might be depended on. Mingling these with the servants of the family, she formed the whole into six regiments, at the head of which she placed as many gentlemen of the county, and gave the command in chief to a Captain Farmer, a Scot, who had served with reputation in the Low Country wars, and was afterwards slain at Marston Moor; and these arrangements had been made with such caution and secrecy that the rebels had no expectation of resistance till they had arrived within two miles of the house. On the twenty-eighth of February, 1644, they arrived, led by Fairfax himself, who sent a trumpet to require a conference with the Countess, to which she agreed, and detained the messenger, says my authority, while "to make the best show she could, she placed her inefficient and unarmed men on the walls, and tops of the towers, and marshalled all her soldiers in good order, with their respective officers, from the main guard in the first court to the great hall," in which she calmly awaited his visit. Their meeting was ceremonious and courteous. Fairfax informed her that he was commissioned to offer her an honourable and secure removal, with her children, retinue, and property, arms and ammunition excepted, to Knowsley Hall, another of the family seats; an engagement that she should reside there without molestation; and the moiety of the Earl's estate for her support. She answered that "she was under a double trust—of faith to her husband, and allegiance to her Sovereign," and desired to have a month to consider her answer; and, this being denied, rejoined that "she hoped then he would excuse her if she preserved her honour and obedience, though perhaps to her own ruin."

Fairfax departed, and was for some days doubtful whether to attack Lathom by storm or by siege, when he was determined by the artifice of one of the Earl's chaplains, a Mr. Rutter, who, happening to have some conversation with a rebel officer, his acquaintance, insinuated to him that the military force of the garrison was abundant, but that it had not fourteen days' provision. This false intelligence was presently conveyed to Fairfax, who in consequence resolved against a summary assault, and, at the end of a fortnight accordingly, sent in military form to demand an immediate surrender. The Countess replied that "she had not yet forgotten what she owed to the Church of England, to her Prince, and to her Lord; and that till she had lost her honour or her life she would defend that place." The rebels presently began to form their trenches, when, on the twenty-fourth of March, she ordered a sally of two hundred men, who attacked them; slew about sixty, and took some prisoners; with the loss on her side only of two. The enemy now doubled their guard and began to draw their lines at a greater distance, but were so interrupted by sallies that fourteen weeks had passed before they could complete them. This however done, they gradually approached the moat by which the house was surrounded, and at length mounted a strong battery, and particularly a mortar of large calibre, a shell thrown from which fell into an apartment in which the Countess and her children were at dinner. They escaped unhurt, and the heroine instantly ordered another sally, in which they were again worsted, and all their guns spiked or thrown into the moat, except that mortar, which was triumphantly dragged into the house. This remarkable exploit was performed on the twenty-sixth of April, the very day fixed on by the rebels for a general assault, in which it had been determined to give no quarter. They were employed for several days in repairing their works, during which they were incessantly annoyed by the besieged, and had no sooner accomplished it, when the garrison once more dispersed them: again spiked their cannon; and killed one hundred of their soldiers, losing only three men and five or six wounded. In most of all these affairs the Countess was personally present, and frequently in great danger. Her conduct united the most exemplary piety with the most determined courage. Every action was prefaced by devout prayer; every success acknowledged by humble thanksgiving.

More than three months had now passed since the commencement of the siege, in which the rebels confessed themselves to have lost two thousand men, when Fairfax, chagrined by its ill success, removed the officer who had hitherto commanded before Lathom, and appointed a colonel Rigby, whose principal recommendation was a private enmity to the Earl of Derby. He had no sooner arrived than he manifested this disposition by a new summons to surrender, conveyed in affronting terms, to which the Countess herself replied—"Trumpet, tell that insolent rebel, Rigby, that if he presume to send another summons within this place, I will have the messenger hanged up at the gates." The garrison however was now reduced to the greatest distress. Their ammunition and their corn were spent, and they had killed for food nearly all their horses. The Earl now hastened from Man to solicit relief for them, which Prince Rupert, who was then marching his army to York, was directed to give, and Rigby, on receiving intelligence of this expected succour, raised the siege on the twenty-seventh of May, 1644.

The Countess now accompanied her Lord in his return to the Isle of Man. On the fatal decline of the royal cause, his great estates were confiscated. He continued however to hold that island for the King with a firmness which the rebel Parliament, to its eternal disgrace, avenged by detaining his children, who came to England to solicit relief from it, on the faith of a pass from Fairfax, for eighteen months in the harshest captivity. The incomparable pair remained on the Island, protected and supported by its simple people, who adored them, till the fruitless enterprise of Charles the Second in 1651, when the Earl flew to his aid, and perished in his cause. On the twelfth of October in that year, two days before he was beheaded by the rebels, he wrote the following exquisite letter to his Countess, inestimable in this place, inasmuch as it lays before us the most important features of her character, drawn by the dying hand of him who knew her best.

"My dear Heart,

"I have heretofore sent you comfortable lines, but alas I have now no word of comfort, saving to our last and best refuge, which is Almighty God, to whose will we must submit; and when we consider how he hath disposed of these nations and the government thereof, we have no more to do but to lay our hands upon our mouths, judging ourselves, and acknowledging our sins, joined with others, to have been the cause of these miseries, and to call on him with tears for mercy.

“The governor of this place, Colonel Duckenfield, is general of the forces which are now going against the Isle of Man; and, however you might do for the present, in time it would be a grievous and troublesome thing to resist, especially those that at this hour command the three nations; wherefore my advice, notwithstanding my great affection to that place, is that you would make conditions for yourself, and children, and servants, and people there, and such as came over with me, to the end you may get to some place of rest, where you may not be concerned in war, and, taking thought of your poor children, you may in some sort provide for them: then prepare yourself to come to your friends above, in that blessed place where bliss is, and no mingling of opinion.

“I conjure you, my dearest Heart, by all those graces that God hath given you, that you exercise your patience in this great and strange trial. If harm come to you, then I am dead indeed; and until then I shall live in you, who are truly the best part of myself. When there is no such as I in being, then look upon yourself and my poor children; then take comfort, and God will bless you. I acknowledge the great goodness of God to have given me such a wife as you—so great an honour to my family—so excellent a companion to me—so pious—so much of all that can be said of good I must confess it impossible to say enough thereof. I ask God pardon with all my soul that I have not been enough thankful for so great a benefit; and where I have done any thing at any time that might justly offend you, with joined hands I also ask your pardon. I have no more to say to you at this time than my prayers for the Almighty’s blessing to you, my dear Mall, and Ned, and Billy—Amen, sweet Jesus!”

The unhappy Countess remained in Man, her little kingdom in her better days, ruling it in indigence; her health broken down by grief, but her spirit still unsubdued. At length a wretch of the name of Christian, whom the Earl had cherished from his childhood, and to whom at his final departure he had committed the care of his lady and their offspring, as well as the command of the Infantry of the island, betrayed it to the enemy. The Countess and her children were for a time rigorously imprisoned, but at length suffered to wander in obscurity, actually subsisting on the alms of their impoverished friends. Thus they languished till the Restoration, when the family estates returned of course into the possession of their eldest son. She passed the short remainder of her days at his seat at Knowsley Hall, in Lancashire, and dying there on the twenty-first of March, 1663, was buried at Ormskirk in that county.

HIER WERELD DIGST.

OB. 1685.

SIR KENELM DIGBY.

It is a perilous task to attempt to portray the character of a universal genius. Sir Kenelm Digby was a scholar, a soldier, a courtier, a divine, a philosopher, an orator, and a politician ; and not only his own country, but all Europe, held him in the highest estimation in each of those characters. Exquisite parts, with a most happy temper, produced in him their usual result, a perfect politeness. His very vanity, and he abounded in it, was so well governed, that it gave to all he said, or wrote, or did, a peculiar zest, if I may so express myself, which all relished, while no one could perceive from whence it came. The depth and the quickness of his understanding might have qualified him for the management of the most important affairs, and he was ambitious of public employment, but a certain eccentricity and unsteadiness, perhaps inseparable from a mind of such variety, probably impeded his advancement. Those dispositions in him became too the more exposed to censure because he lived in a time when something like Roman virtue still appeared in the public conduct of men, and a firmness of principle was displayed by two great opposing parties, which, while it shed an additional lustre on loyalty, lent an ornament even to rebellion. With respect to his philosophy, it would be difficult to say whether his succeeding so immediately as he did to the illustrious Bacon might be deemed more fortunate or disadvantageous to him ; since, in profiting largely by the discoveries of that sage, he lost, through the carelessness of some, and the malignity of others, the credit of originality.

The truth however is, that Digby not only gave form and birth to many of Bacon's mighty conceptions, but that those who may have courage enough to turn for a while from more fashionable systems, will find in his works many inventions which had escaped the observation of his profound predecessor.

The public circumstances of his time perhaps contributed equally with the singularities of his nature to render his life as various as his character. It may be said that their operation commenced when he had scarcely left his cradle, for he was the son and heir of that accomplished gentleman and frantic bigot, Sir Everard Digby, who suffered death in 1606 for his concern in the gunpowder treason. His mother was the daughter and sole heir of William Mulsho, of Gothurst, in Buckinghamshire, and her ample fortune, as well as the paternal estates, had fortunately been so firmly settled on the issue of her marriage, that the Court of Wards found itself obliged to adjudge them to the heir male, in spite of a claim made by the Crown under the attainder of the father. Kenelm, concerning the precise date of whose birth there has been some contest, appears to have been born on the eleventh of June, 1603. His mother, who was a zealous Roman Catholic, submitted for obvious reasons, to his being bred at least under Protestant forms, and it is said, that the early part of his education was superintended by the celebrated Laud, at that time Dean of Gloucester. In 1618 he was sent to Oxford, and entered of Gloucester Hall, where the direction of his studies was committed to the care of Mr. Thomas Allen, a man of the highest reputation for ability and erudition, who accepted that charge, not in the ordinary character of a college tutor, but from affection to the family of his pupil, and for the gratification of cultivating a genius which had already shewn abundant signs of pre-eminence. He remained little more than two years at the University, which having quitted with the most brilliant reputation, he set out on the tour of France, Spain, and Italy; from whence he returned in 1623, and on the 23rd of October in that year received from King James, at the house of Lord Montague, at Hinchinbroke, the honour of knighthood, so seldom bestowed on one of his years.

On the accession of Charles the First, which occurred soon after, Sir Kenelm Digby became one of the chief ornaments of Whitehall. Charles, who did not love gaiety, highly esteemed him however for his admirable talents ; but to the Queen, who, before her misfortunes, had a very lively disposition, he rendered himself infinitely agreeable, and she seems to have conceived a friendship for him which lasted through life. He was a party in all the royal diversions, which indeed he frequently planned and directed, and such were the volatility of his spirits, and the careless elegance of his manners, that it should have seemed that he had been bred from his infancy in a court. He obtained the office of a Gentleman of the Bedchamber, and was soon after, an odd mixture of employments, appointed a Commissioner of the Navy. In 1628 he was suddenly called from the study and the drawing-room to assume the character of a naval commander, and was sent, at the head of a squadron, to chastise the Venetians and Algerines, who had of late infested the English trade in the Mediterranean by their piracies. In this expedition he was completely successful, for, having taken money of the Moorish armed vessels, and liberated the English slaves who were in them, he attacked the Venetian galleys, and totally routed them. These actions, by which he acquired considerable fame of a new character, were fought near Scanderon, on the 16th of June.

On his return he relapsed into the student ; purchased the valuable collection of manuscripts and printed books of his early friend Mr. Allen, of Gloucester Hall, the use of which he allowed to that gentleman while he lived, and soon after his decease, in 1632, nobly gave them to the Bodleian Library. He now applied himself with much earnestness to the study of religious controversy, with the view, as he confesses, to strengthen an inclination which he had formed to abandon the protestant persuasion. He wavered however for four years, but in 1636 finally reconciled himself to the Church of Rome, in spite of the arguments of Archbishop Laud, his correspondence with whom on that subject, full of a charity and moderation which did honour to the hearts of both parties, is still extant. He was at that time in France, where he long remained, employing himself in composing elaborate arguments in defence of his lately adopted faith, which he afterwards put forth, in two publications, under the titles of, "A Conference with a Lady about the Choice of Religion;" and "Letters between Lord George Digby, and Sir Kenelm Digby, Knt., concerning Religion;" the one in 1638, the other not till 1651. There was an air of candour in thus publishing both sides of a controversy, which, whether it arose from the humility of doubt, or the arrogance of superiority, certainly gained him much credit. The Roman Catholics triumphed, as well they might, on the accession of such a person to their communion; and the Queen, their great patroness, received him, on his return to England, with much grace and confidence, and immediately employed him in the management of an affair, his conduct in which, while it increased her esteem for him, rendered him obnoxious to the party which was then aspiring to that ascendancy in Parliament which, unhappily for the country, it soon after gained. The King, with a very scanty purse, was preparing for a war with the Scots, and had called on his subjects for such aid as they might be willing to lend him. The wealthiest of the protestant clergy and laity had contributed liberally, and the Queen, anxious that those of her religion should imitate the example, engaged Sir Kenelm, and Mr. Walter Montague, to compose a kind of circular letter to excite them, which was dispersed throughout the kingdom, and procured considerable sums. The House of Commons resented this proceeding, and in January, 1640, Sir Kenelm was called to the bar, and questioned on it. He is said to have answered with simplicity and candour, and the Queen herself having sent an explanatory message to the House, it seemed, for the time, to be satisfied: but the offence was not forgotten, for in the address which was sometime after presented, requiring the King to remove the Roman Catholics from his presence and his Court, Sir Kenelm Digby and Walter Montague were particularly named.

His conduct, indeed, in that affair had subjected him to a lasting suspicion. On the breaking out of the grand rebellion, which soon followed, he was imprisoned, by order of the Parliament, in Winchester House, from whence he was released in the autumn of 1643, at the instance of the Queen Dowager of France, on condition that he should transport himself forthwith to France. On this occasion he subscribed a declaration, more prudent than honest, in which he promised, "on the faith of a Christian, and the word of a gentleman," neither directly nor indirectly to negotiate, promote, consent unto, or conceal, any practice or design prejudicial to the honour or safety of the Parliament. Before his departure, however, he was strictly examined before a committee, as to an alleged correspondence between Archbishop Laud and the Court of Rome, and particularly on the question whether a Cardinal's hat had been offered by the Pope to that Prelate, which, with many other rumours equally absurd and incredible, had been invented in the House to inflame the minds of the people. His pen had not been unemployed during his confinement: we have two pieces written by him in Winchester House; the one intituled "Observations on Religio Medici, occasionally written by Sir K. D., Knt." This small piece, printed in 1643, and addressed to his great friend, Edward, Earl of Dorset, is said to have been written in one night, an assertion which seems to be contradicted by the word "occasionally" in the title. The other, though hastily composed, is a little work of deep reflection; "Observations on the Twenty-second Stanza, in the Ninth Canto of the Second Book of Spenser's Fairy Queen," in a letter to Sir Edward Stradling, published in 1644.

He was received in France even with rapture. The extent of his natural talents and his learning, and the gay variety of his conversation, captivated a people equally ingenious and volatile. He passed a considerable part of his time in the Court, where he was a great favourite with the Queen Dowager, as well as in the most refined private societies of Paris; and then, as seems to have been his custom, suddenly withdrew himself wholly to his studies. He now digested and reduced to order the particulars of a philosophical system on which he had long speculated, and which he published at Paris in 1644, in two parts, under the titles of "a Treatise of the Nature of Bodies," and "a Treatise declaring the Operations and Nature of Man's Soul, out of which the Immortality of reasonable Souls is evinced." This, which may be esteemed, in every point of consideration, as his greatest work, exalted his reputation to the utmost, and the feeble attacks made on it by Alexander Ross, and by some writers on the continent, served but to increase the number of its students, both at home and abroad. He wrote also, soon after, in Latin, "Five Books of Peripatetic Institutions, with a Theological Appendix concerning the Origin of the World," which were not printed till 1651.

The final subversion of Monarchy in England, called him home. He had lost his eldest son in the faint struggle made by the Earl of Holland on the part of the King, and had otherwise partaken largely in the misfortunes of that sad period. He was scarcely allowed time to manage a composition for his estate, which, however, as we shall see presently, was not the sole object of his journey, when the Parliament ordered him to withdraw, and forbade him to return, without leave of the House, under pain of death. He fled once more into France, where he joined the little Court of Henrietta Maria, who had lately appointed him her Chancellor, and by whom, not long after his arrival, he was sent as her Envoy to Pope Innocent the Tenth. He is said to have disgusted the pontiff by the unreasonable haughtiness and freedom of his behaviour, a charge ill-suited to the general character of his temper and breeding. "At first," says Aubrey, in some curious notices of Sir Kenelm, from which I shall have occasion to make larger extracts, "he was mightily admired; but after some time he grew high, and hectorated at his Holiness, and gave him the lie. The Pope said he was mad." Wood, who gives nearly the same account, adds, what may be feared was the true occasion of his quarrel with the Pope, that, "having made a collection of money for the afflicted Catholics in England, he was found to be no faithful steward in that matter."

Cromwell, having crushed the Long Parliament, and assumed the sovereign power, Sir Kenelm returned to England, and to the great surprise and regret of all parties, seemed presently to acquire some degree of intimacy, and even favour, with the usurper. Time has unveiled the mystery of this seemingly unnatural connection. The publication of the Duke of Ormond's papers has proved that, even from the hour of the death of Charles, Digby had meditated the restoration of his own religion in England, by joining the Roman Catholics and the King's murderers in one common cause. Lord Byron, in a letter to the Marquis of Ormond, of the first of March, 1649, from Caen, in Normandy, says, "Sir Kenelm Digby, with some other Romanists, accompanied with one Watson, an Independent, who hath brought them passes from Fairfax, is gone for England, to join the interests of all the English Papists with that bloody party that murdered the King, in the opposition and extirpation of monarchical government; or if that government be thought fit, yet that it shall be by election, and not by succession, as formerly provided: that a free exercise of the Romish religion be granted, and of all other religions whatsoever, excepting that which was established by law in the Church of England," &c. And a letter in the same collection, from a Dr. Winstead, a physician at Rouen, to Secretary Nicholas, of a date somewhat earlier, after reciting a long conversation between himself and Sir Kenelm, when the latter was about to embark, concludes—"The plot, as I am told, about which Sir Kenelm Digby is employed as agent to treat with those horrid rebels, the Independents of England, is for the subversion of successive hereditary monarchy there, and to make it elective, and to establish Popery there, and to give toleration to all manner of religions there, except that of the Church of England according to the practice thereof." Here then we find the cause of the severity of the Long Parliament towards Digby, when he visited England for the alleged purpose of compounding for his estates, as well as the motive to the grace with which he was now received by Cromwell, to whom doubtless he came to reiterate the same proposals, perhaps somewhat modified with regard to hereditary succession. That Cromwell should have sought to fortify his dominion by gaining over the English Catholics, adds nothing to the weight of crime and infamy which loads his memory; but for the treachery thus imputed to Digby, the most fervid affection to his religious faith which we could ascribe to him would furnish no extenuation; and, however painful it may be to believe the story, it is scarcely possible to doubt the truth of it.

Having remained in England for a considerable time, he went again to the continent in 1656, and travelled through France and Germany, fixing his residence occasionally for long intervals in different cities, and collecting and bestowing treasure in every branch of science. Amidst these refined pursuits, however, he found time to correspond with Secretary Thurloe, with professions, on his part, of the firmest attachment to the person and government of Cromwell; after whose death, and during the rapid dissolution of the system which he had framed, Digby returned to Paris to await the event. Immediately after the restoration, he came to London, and though the King and his ministers were well apprised of the intrigues which have lately been mentioned, was received at Court, at least, with great complaisance. It would have been surprising, indeed, had he been treated with confidence.

In composing this memoir, I have purposely omitted many small circumstances of Sir Kenelm's story, for the sake of giving them in the dress in which they appear in a late very choice publication of papers in the Bodleian and Ashmolean libraries, which closes with a collection of biographical memorandums, loosely strung together under the several heads to which they belong, by the pen of the singular John Aubrey. Those who read biography with a true taste and feeling, well know how much the life and freshness of such unstudied notices fade, in being reduced even to the best form of regular narrative.

“Sir Kenelm Digby,” says Aubrey, “was a great traveller, and understood ten or twelve languages. He was not only master of a good and graceful judicious style, but he also wrote a delicate hand, both fast hand and Roman.”

“He was such a goodly handsome person, and had so graceful elocution, and noble address, that had he been dropt out of the clouds in any part of the world he would have made himself respected; but the Jesuits spake spitefully, and said 'twas true, but then he must not stay there above six weeks. He was well versed in all kinds of learning; and he had also this virtue; that no man knew better how to abound and to be abased, and either was indifferent to him: no man became grandeur better; sometimes again he would live only with a lackey, and horse with a footcloth. He was very generous and liberal to deserving persons.”

“Much against his mother's, &c., consent, he married that celebrated beauty, and courtesan, Mrs. Venetia Stanley, whom Richard, Earl of Dorset, kept as his concubine, had children by her, and settled on her an annuity of five hundred pounds per annum, which, after Sir K. D. married, was unpaid by the Earl. Sir Kenelm sued the Earl, after marriage, and recovered it. He would say that a handsome lusty man, that was discreet, might make a virtuous wife out of a brothel house. This lady carried herself blamelessly, yet they say he was jealous of her. She died in her bed suddenly; some suspected that she was poisoned. When her head was opened there was found but little brain, which her husband imputed to her drinking of viper wine; but spiteful women would say that it was a viper husband, who was jealous of her. Once a year the Earl of Dorset invited her and Sir Kenelm to dinner, where the Earl would behold her with much passion, and only kiss her hand. After her death, to avoid envy and scandal, he retired into Gresham College, at London, where he diverted himself with his chemistry, and the professor's good conversation. He wore there a long mourning cloak; a high cornered hat; his beard unshorn; looked like an hermit; as signs of sorrow for his beloved wife, to whose memory he erected a sumptuous monument, now quite destroyed by the great conflagration. He was a person of extraordinary strength. I remember one at Sherbourne, relating to the Earl of Bristol, protested to us that as he, being a middling man, being set in a chair, Sir Kenelme took him up, chair and all, with one arm. He was of undaunted courage, yet not apt in the least to give offence. His conversation was both ingenious and innocent."

"There is in print, in French, and also in English, translated by Mr. James Howell, a speech that he made at a philosophical assembly at Montpellier, 165.. of the sympathetique powder. He made a speech at the beginning of the meeting of the Royal Society, of the vegetation of plants. He was born to three thousand pounds per annum. His ancient seat, I think, is Gotehurst, Buckinghamshire. He had a fair estate also in Rutlandshire. What by reason of the civil wars, and his generous mind, he contracted great debts; and, I know not how, there being a great falling out between him and his then only son, John, he settled his estate upon Cornwalleys, a subtle solicitor, and also a member of the House of Commons, who did put Mr. John Digby to much charge in law.

Sir John Hoskyns informs me that Sir Kenelm Digby did translate Petronius Arbiter into English," &c. &c.

Sir Kenelm Digby survived the restoration about five years, which he passed rather in the enjoyment than in the active prosecution of science. He lived entirely in London, and established in his house, in Covent Garden, those literary assemblies to which he had been accustomed in France, and which he seems first to have introduced in this country. He had been for several years afflicted by the stone, and in the autumn and winter of 1664 his attacks of that cruel disease so frequently recurred as to reduce him to a state of extreme weakness. He was preparing, however, for one more visit to Paris, when a most violent paroxysm carried him off on his birthday, the eleventh of June, in the following year. He was buried in Christ-Church, within Newgate, where, several years before his death, he had erected a superb monument in memory of his wife. By the unbridled frailties of that lady, the Earl of Dorset having been but one of many favoured lovers, much of the noblest blood of England was dishonoured, for she was the daughter of Sir Edward Stanley, Knight of the Bath, grandson of the great Edward, Earl of Derby, by Lucy, daughter and coheir of Thomas Percy, Earl of Northumberland. Sir Kenelm left by her an only child, John Digby, who certainly inherited, though under many disadvantages and vexations, the most part of his father's estates. In him the male line of his branch of the Digbies became extinct, for he had by his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir Edward Longueville, of Wolverton, in Bucks, two daughters only; Margaret Maria, married to Sir John Conway, of Bodey, in Flintshire, and Charlotte Theophila, to Richard Mostyn, of Penbeddw, in the same county.

In addition to the works which have already been mentioned, several small tracts have been published under the name of Sir Kenelm Digby.—A Discourse delivered before the Royal Society on the Vegetation of Plants.—Choice Receipts in Physic and Chirurgery.—Cordial and Distilled Water and Spirits, Perfumes, and other curiosities.—His Closet opened, wherein is discovered several ways of making Wines.—Excellent Directions for Cookery.—Choice Collection of rare Chemical Secrets, &c. But there is reason to suspect that all these, except the first, were the gleanings of his laboratory, put together, and published after his death, by the servant who assisted him in his philosophical experiments.

MONTAGUE BERTIE.

EARL OF LINDSEY.

OB. 1666.

MONTAGU BERTIE,

SECOND EARL OF LINDSEY.

A WRITER too frequently quoted, who sometimes sacrificed truth to what he esteemed brilliancy of thought and expression, has left us many particulars of this nobleman's character, on the authenticity of which we may depend, because they were published within two years after his death, while the recollection of him was so warm in the hearts both of his friends and enemies, that the subject may be said to have been almost living to caution the author against misrepresentation. Lloyd tells us that "his converse gave the world a singular pattern of harmless and inoffensive mirth; of a nobleness, not made up of fine clothes and courtship; a sweetness and familiarity, that at once gained love and preserved respect; a grandeur and nobility safe in its own worth, not needing to maintain itself by a jealous and morose distance; the confirmed goodness of his youth not only guarding his mind from the temptation of vice, but securing his fame too from the very suspicion of it, so outstripping in wisdom, temperance and fortitude, not only what others did but even what they wrote, being as good in reality as in pretence; to which he added this unusual glory—that since there was but a small partition between the Kings of Judah's beds and the altar, through which they said David had a secret passage (arguing the nearness there should be between religion and honour) and that the Cross was an ornament to the Crown, and much more to the Coronet, he satisfied not himself with the bare exercise of virtue, but he sublimated it, and made it grace." Lloyd adds, in more words than it is convenient here to use, that he was educated with great care, and that he prosecuted his tour of the Continent with a contempt of the inconveniences then incident to it, and a spirit of observation and inquiry, uncommon in young men of his rank ; and that "the result of these and other advantages, was a competent skill in arts, especially philosophy, mathematics, physic, and the two parts belonging to it, chirurgery and botanizm."

He was born in the year 1608, the eldest son of that admirable example of honour, loyalty, and courage, Robert Bertie, Lord Willoughby of Eresby, who was in 1626 created Earl of Lindsey, by Elizabeth, only child of Edward, first Lord Montagu of Boughton. Having served as a volunteer in two or three campaigns in Flanders, which was then esteemed the conclusion almost necessary of a nobleman's education, he returned to the court, where his father was highly esteemed, and was appointed a Gentleman of the Bed-chamber, and soon after Captain of the King's Life Guard. In those capacities he attended Charles on his journey into Scotland in 1639, and seems to have gained at that time not only the favour but the cordial friendship of that Prince, from whose person he was for several years after that period never, but in one instance, for many days together absent. At the commencement of the rebellion he was named one of the Commissioners of Array, and at the battle of Edgehill, in which his father was General in Chief of the army, under the King, who was present, was stationed, at the head of the guards, next to the General's regiment. It is well known that the fortune of that day, in which the King had at first the advantage, was marred by the absence of the horse, which, under the command of Prince Rupert, had engaged in an imprudent pursuit. In the unfortunate interval before their return the reserve of the rebels, under Sir William Balfour, made a furious attack on the King's infantry, especially in the quarter where the General stood, for he was on foot, and he fell into their hands, after the most heroic resistance, severely, and as it proved, fatally wounded. Montagu, then Lord Willoughby, under the impulse of a filial love which for the time suspended all reflection, rushed, almost alone, amidst the captors, and was overpowered by their numbers, while desperately fighting his way towards his father, who on the following day, the twenty-fourth of October, 1642, died in his arms, leaving him Earl of Lindsey, and a prisoner in the hands of the rebels.

Amidst the confusion, and multiplicity of cares, necessarily following such an action, the King's almost first attention seems to have been directed to him. A trumpet was despatched to the enemy, with proposals for his release, and with the following letter to himself.

Lindsey,

You cannot be more sensible, as I believe, of your father's loss than myself; his death confirming the estimation I had of him. As for yourself, the double suffering you have had for my sake, both in your father's person and your own, puts upon me the stricter obligation, not only to restore you to your liberty, now unjustly detained from you, but also to shew the world by my actions how really I am

Your assured and constant friend,

CHARLES R.

Aynho, 27 Oct. 1642.

The King however had reckoned too favourably of the justice and generosity of those who were opposed to him. They refused to accept any exchange for Lindsey; and, from their knowledge of his exalted fidelity, or of his military skill or bravery, or perhaps from mere malice, detained him till the eleventh of August, in the following year, when he was liberated, it does not appear on what terms, and joining the King at Oxford, became one of his prime counsellors for the future conduct of the war.

He would however exercise no command beyond that of his old regiment, the Life Guard, at the head of which he was actively and valiantly engaged at both the battles of Newbury, at Cropredy Bridge, in several actions in Cornwall, and, finally, in the battle of Naseby, where he was wounded. It was there that his master's fate may be said to have been unhappily decided ; and as Charles never after commanded personally in the field, so Lindsey, who had almost always fought as it were by his side, now retired from military service. He continued in constant attendance on the King till his Majesty fatally put himself into the hands of the Scots, and then, with his approbation, surrendered, with the Duke of Richmond, and others of Charles's best friends, to the rebel army, and, after an imprisonment of some duration, was released on his parole. He now constantly employed himself in various efforts to promote some sort of accommodation between the King and the Parliament, from which his known honour and integrity extorted a respect rarely shewn by that body to any of the royal party. At length, after a separation of two years, he was permitted, at the particular request of the King, then a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, again to wait on him, and was appointed by him a commissioner for the treaty of Newport, which, as it is needless to inform the historical reader, was cut short by the abrupt seizure of the King's person by Cromwell's emissaries, almost in the hour when Lindsey, who had obtained some hint of the design, was earnestly pressing him to avoid its consequences by instant flight. Within two months from this precise period, the bloody stroke which terminated the miseries of this unhappy and blameless Prince had fallen on him. Lindsey had been still allowed to pay his daily duty, and the King, on the day before his death, in distributing to a few eminent persons some books, to be kept by them as tokens of his regard, gave him the now almost forgotten romance "Cassandra." He was one of the four noblemen who petitioned for, and obtained, permission to attend the royal corpse to its unseemly interment.

After the King's death he remained in England, still a prisoner on parole, suffering severely from time to time by arbitrary fines and sequestrations, and labouring incessantly for the royal cause, but with such secrecy and prudence as to elude always the vigilance of the rebels, except in a single instance, when in 1655, he was accused of high treason against the spurious government, and suffered a short imprisonment in the Tower, on charges too obscure and doubtful to warrant even the lawless crew which composed it in bringing him to trial. At the restoration he was received but with that moderate grace which Charles the Second, with more policy than feeling, generally bestowed at that time on his father's firmest friends. He was sworn of the Privy Council, and on the first of April, 1661, elected a Knight of the Garter; a favour which it seems he owed to the intercession of Lord Clarendon, to whom the King had sent the Duke of York to offer it to himself. Clarendon modestly declined it, but as he tells us in his memoirs of his own life, "he desired his Highness to put the King in mind of the Earl of Lindsey (with whom he was known to have no friendship; on the contrary, that there had been disgusts between them in the last King's time)—That his father had lost his life with the Garter about his neck, when this gentleman, his son, endeavouring to relieve him, was taken prisoner—that he had served the King to the end of the war with courage and fidelity, being an excellent officer; for all which the King his father had admitted him a Gentleman of his Bedchamber, which office he was now without; and not to have the Garter now, upon his Majesty's return, would in all men's eyes look like a degradation, and an instance of his Majesty's disesteem, especially if the Chancellor should supply the place, who was not thought his friend. So the Earl of Lindsey was created Knight of the Garter, and coming afterwards to hear by what chance it was, he ever lived with great civility towards the Chancellor to his death." He owed no other favours to the Crown, for the office of Lord Great

Chamberlain, which he exercised at the coronation, devolved on him by inheritance. and is at this day vested in his blood under the same right.

Montagu, Earl of Lindsey, died at Campden House, in the parish of Kensington, near London, on the twenty-fifth day of July, 1666, and was buried at Edenham, in the county of Lincoln. He was twice married ; first, to Martha, daughter of Sir Willim Cockayne, of Rushton, in the county of Northampton (ancestor to the Viscounts Cullen of Ireland) and widow of John Ramsey, Earl of Holderness. By this lady he had five sons ; Robert, his successor, whose son and heir was created Duke of Ancaster ; Peregrine ; Richard ; Vere ; and Charles ; and three daughters ; Elizabeth, married to Baptist Noel, Viscount Campden ; Bridget, to Sir Thomas Osborne, afterwards created Duke of Leeds, &c. ; and Catherine, to Robert Dormer, of Dourton, in Bucks. His second Countess was Bridget, daughter and heir of Edward, third son of Sir William Wray, of Glentworth, in Lincolnshire, Bart. (by Elizabeth, his wife, who was daughter and heir to Francis Lord Norreys, and Earl of Berkshire) and had issue by her ; James, who became Lord Norreys in right of his maternal descent, and was afterwards created Earl of Abingdon ; Henry ; and one daughter, Mary, married to Charles Dormer, Earl of Caernarvon.

MARCHES OF WORCESTER
1667

EDWARD SOMERSET,

SECOND MARQUIS OF WORCESTER.

THOUGH much has been written of this nobleman, it can scarcely be doubted that the most important facts of his story remain untold, and indeed undiscovered, nor do we know where to seek them. He was a statesman, a philosopher, and a mechanician, and in each of those stations a mystic. He was a man of parts, or a madman, or both ; yet Charles the First, who had a cool head, and could estimate characters with a just and cautious judgment, thought him worthy, not only of the most implicit confidence, but of a degree of favour so splendid as to amount to a partition with himself of many of the faculties of regality. If an affectionate regard to the person of his Sovereign, perhaps even surpassed by the most earnest devotion to the kingly office, merited such distinctions, no man could have better deserved them. Certainly none ever gave more ample proof of the sincerity of those dispositions, for he sacrificed to them all that the world deems estimable, except his honour.

He was the eldest of the nine sons of Henry, the first Marquis, by Anne, the only child of John, Lord Russell, who died in the life-time of his father, Francis, second Earl of Bedford, to whom he was heir-apparent. The date of his birth is not known, nor have the circumstances of his early life been recorded. His earnest attachment, in common with the whole of his family, to the ancient faith, kept him probably unconnected with a Court which regarded that profession at least with jealousy, while an ardent inclination to the severest scientific studies must have rendered retirement not only delightful but even necessary to his nature and his habits. He had gratified it too in extensive foreign travel, and had gleaned, in a long absence, the most curious intelligence that Europe could afford in every branch of the useful arts. It is not strange then that we should be almost without intelligence of him till the commencement of the grand rebellion, when he joined the royal standard, with his father, who had been lately created Marquis of Worcester, and was soon after appointed to command an army raised by that great royalist and himself in Wales. We find the Parliament, in their petition presented to the King at Oxford in January 1643, N. S. complaining "that he had made the Lord Herbert of Ragland," (the title then used by this nobleman) "and other Papists, commanders of great forces;" and requiring "that he may be restrained from coming within the verge of the Court, and that he may not bear any office, or have any employments concerning State or Commonwealth." Charles answered this part of their petition by presently after appointing the Lord Herbert his governor of South Wales. "There were," says Lord Clarendon, "in the opinion of many, great objections against committing that employment to that noble Lord: first, he had no knowledge or experience in the martial profession: then his religion, being of that sort of Catholics the people rendered odious by accusing it to be most jesuited, men apprehended would produce a greater brand upon the King of favouring papists and popery than he had yet been reproached with. This gave opportunity and excuse to many persons of quality and great interest in those counties, between whom and that Lord's family there has been perpetual feuds and animosities, to lessen their zeal to the King's cause out of jealousy to the other's religion and those contestations had been lately improved, with some sharpness, by the Lord Herbert's carriage towards the Lord Marquis of Hertford to whom the King had committed the government of North Wales." The noble historian however confesses that he was one "whose person many men loved, and very few hated; that he was in truth of a civil and obliging nature, and of a fair and gentle carriage towards all men; and a man of more than ordinary affection and reverence to the person of the King, and one who he was sure would neither deceive nor betray him."

With these recommendations and objections Lord Herbert placed himself at the head of a body of fifteen hundred infantry, and five hundred horse, and marched, in the middle of February, 1643, towards Gloucester, which was then held by the rebels, intending to besiege it, in concert with a part of the royal army under Prince Maurice, which already blockaded it on the other side. On his way, in passing through a little disaffected village in the forest of Deane, called Cover, Colonel Lawley, a brave and practised officer, whom he had appointed his Lieutenant General, and to whom he looked for correction of his own inexperience, was killed by a shot from a window. Lord Herbert was at the moment with the King at Oxford, but his brother, the Lord John Somerset, who commanded the horse, continued the march through the forest, and at length arrived, without further interruption, at the Bishop of Gloucester's palace, called the Vineyard, within half a mile of the town, where he took up his quarters, a position which gave him the controul of the bridge over the Severn. In the mean time Sir William Waller, with two thousand of the rebel horse, made a rapid march, mostly in the night, from Chichester, and, having caused a report to be previously spread that he intended to attack Cirencester, crossed the river in several flat-bottomed boats which he had appointed to be ready six miles west of Gloucester, and presented himself, as it should seem altogether unexpectedly, before the astonished Welchmen. These, though equal in number to the rebels; with advantage of position; and secured by intrenchments against any sudden attack; were seized by a panic; and, instantly sending out to treat, surrendered, without a shot fired or a sword drawn on either side, on the mere grant of quarter. "A submission," to use again the words of Lord Clarendon, "so like a stratagem that the enemy could hardly trust it." Waller sent thirteen hundred infantry, and three troops of horse, prisoners into Gloucester, the rest dispersed themselves, and were re-collected by Lord Herbert, who, in spite of the discouragement, immediately applied himself to the repair of his loss by new levies. A tide however of ill success pursued him, and he became at length wholly unpopular, as well among his troops as in his country. In the succeeding summer he resigned his military command to Sir William Vavasour, retaining only the title of the King's Lieutenant in South Wales.

It may seem strange that, contrary to the custom in earlier times of disgracing Generals because their measures had been unfortunate, Charles should have chosen this very period to advance Lord Herbert to a degree of trust and power, and dignity, never at any other time bestowed on a subject. On the first of April, 1644, the King executed the following stupendous commission or warrant, which remains in the office of the Signet, and, though already to be found in print, must of necessity have a place in this memoir.

"Charles, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To our right trusty, and right well-beloved Cousin, Edward Somerset, alias Plantagenet, Lord Herbert, Baron Beaufort of Caldicote, Grismond, Chepstow, Ragland, and Gower; Earl of Glamorgan, Son and Heir apparent of our intirely beloved Cousin, Henry, Earl and Marquis of Worcester, greeting. Having had good and long experience of your prowess, prudence, and fidelity, do make choice, and by these nominate and appoint you, our right trusty and right well-beloved Cousin, Edward Somerset, &c., to be our Generalissimo of three Armies, English, Irish, and Foreign, and Admiral of a Fleet at Sea, with power to recommend your Lieutenant-General for our approbation, leaving all other officers to your own election and denomination, and accordingly to receive their commission from you ; willing and commanding them, and every of them, you to obey, as their General, and you to receive immediate orders from ourself only. And lest, through distance of place, we may be misinformed, we will and command you to reply unto us, if any of our orders should thwart or hinder any of your designs for our service. And there being necessary great sums of money to the carrying on so chargeable an employment, which we have not to furnish you withal, we do by these empower you to contract with any of our loving subjects of England, Ireland, and dominion of Wales, for wardships, customs, woods, or any our rights and prerogatives ; we by these obliging ourselves, our heirs and successors, to confirm and make good the same accordingly. And for persons of generosity for whom titles of honour are most desirable, we have entrusted you with several patents under our great seal of England, from a Marquis to a Baronet, which we give you full power and authority to date and dispose of without knowing our future pleasure ; so great is our trust and confidence in you as that whatsoever you do contract for or promise we will make good the same accordingly, from the date of this our Commission forwards, which, for the better satisfaction, We give you leave to give them, or any of them, copies thereof, attested under your hand, and seal of arms. And, for your own encouragement, and in token of our gratitude, We give and allow you henceforward such fees, titles, preeminences, and privileges, as do and may belong unto your place and command above-mentioned ; with promise of our dear daughter, Elizabeth, to your son, Plantagenet, in marriage, with three hundred thousand pounds in dower, or portion, most part whereof we acknowledge spent and disbursed by your father and you in our service ; and the title of Duke of Somerset, to you and your heirs male for ever ; and from henceforward to give the Garter to your arms, and at your pleasure to put on the George, and blue ribband. And, for your greater honour, and in testimony of our reality, We have with our own hand affixed our Great Seal of England unto these our Commission and Letters, making them patent. Witness Ourself, at Oxford, the first day of April, in the twentieth year of our Reign, and in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred and forty-four.”

What were the King's motives to these most extravagant concessions is a question which might seem to set all conjecture at defiance. The sacrifices of Herbert and his family had been noble and unbounded, but it is a duty in a Sovereign to limit his bounty, and indeed it is difficult to conceive the degree of merit which could have called for such excessive rewards; neither was it Charles's foible to be over prodigal of his favours. If they were meant to purchase future services, what were they? and what could have been expected from Herbert? His talents, of whatsoever order they might have been, were certainly not of a character to replace fallen Crowns, or to reconcile outrageously contending parties; his splendid patrimony was already nearly exhausted; and with it had fled his local influence. Circumstances of great singularity however occurred shortly after the date of the warrant, which seem to offer a solution of these difficulties. Charles's situation was at that moment truly desperate. Every where unsuccessful in the field; his friends dispirited: their pecuniary resources dissipated; a Scottish army added to the number of his enemies; and the whole system of government menaced, not less than his Crown, by a new-born and nameless party, equally bold, cunning, and malignant, which was hourly increasing; no reasonable hope remained for him but in some effort of a desperate nature, hitherto wholly untried. His Catholic subjects were exceedingly numerous, loyally disposed, and great wealth was divided among them, but, from circumstances of which it is needless to remind the historical reader, they were unconnectedly scattered over the face of the three kingdoms, and had remained inactive, but not indifferent, spectators of the vast contest. If we examine the state of the King's affairs at that unhappy epoch, we shall find that the only vigorous and comprehensive expedient which could afford him even a chance of redeeming them from utter ruin, was to incorporate those dispersed parties, and bring them collectively into action. To accomplish this great end it was necessary to employ the agency of a servant of the purest fidelity to his person as well as to his crown ; of the firmest resolution ; of high rank, and of gracious and conciliating manners and temper ; and above all, of an invincible zeal and constancy in the Romish faith. The due performance of such a service required a delegation of the most extensive powers ; the imminent peril to be incurred by him who should undertake it challenged the most brilliant rewards. Herbert was perhaps the only man about the King in whom were combined all the qualifications which it demanded.

Assuming then, what really appears more than probable, but on which we have not here room for further argument, that Charles at that period meditated the employment of a great Catholic army against his rebellious subjects, let us resume our notices of Herbert, now called Earl of Glamorgan, at the point of time in which they will seem to justify such a conjecture, as well as to connect him with the enterprise in question.

A rebellion without disloyalty, if an expression seemingly so paradoxical may be allowed, had for nearly three years raged in Ireland. It was in fact a horribly ferocious crusade against the protestants. It may be said that the government of the island was at the time divided between the King's Lieutenant and the Pope's Nuncio, who held a sort of Court at Kilkenny, and mixed with an absolute spritual authority no small degree of independence in temporal affairs. To that Prelate, and the Catholic chieftains by whom he was surrounded, Lord Herbert was sent by the King, in the summer of 1645, on a special mission, the objects of which have never been completely divulged. It appears that the Lord Lieutenant, the Marquis of Ormond, was not entirely ignorant of them, but the extreme caution used by him throughout the whole affair, leaves us in doubt whether he was apprised of their full extent. Herbert's first visit was of course to that nobleman, who further accredited him to the leaders of the Catholics. A letter from Ormond, of the eleventh of August, to one of them, Lord Muskery, which seems to have had scarcely any other purpose, concludes thus—"What I have to say is this; that I know no subject in England upon whose favour and authority with his Majesty, and real and innate nobility, you can better rely than upon his Lordship's." Herbert now proceeded to conclude a treaty of peace with the Council of Kilkenny, by which they agreed to furnish an army of ten thousand men, to serve Charles in England, and he granted, in the King's name, the most complete toleration to the Catholic worship throughout Ireland. While the levy was in progress, and Herbert preparing to take the command, that singular person George Lord Digby, who held the now almost nominal office of a Secretary of State to Charles, arrived in Dublin, as it were in a private character, for he was a fugitive from recent military defeat, and, on the twenty-sixth of December, accused Herbert at the Council Table of having counterfeited the King's order authorising the treaty, and demanded that he should be arrested on suspicion of high treason. Ormond and the Council acquiesced, and Herbert was committed to the Castle of Dublin. The King wrote to Ormond, declaring his approbation of these steps; as did Secretary Nicholas on the following day, loading Herbert with blame, and ascribing his conduct to the fury of his zeal, and to weakness of intellect. Nay, so highly did Charles seem to resent it, that we find in the Secretary's letter this bitter passage—"The King has commanded me to advertise your Lordship that the patent for making the said Lord Herbert of Ragland Earl of Glamorgan is not passed the Great Seal

here, so as he is no Peer of this kingdom, notwithstanding he styles himself, and hath treated with the rebels in Ireland, by the name of the Earl of Glamorgan, which is as vainly taken upon him as his pretended warrant, if any such there be, was surreptitiously gotten :” Herbert, however, had been liberated, at the earnest intreaty of the Catholics, before the arrival of these letters, upon his own recognizance of twenty thousand pounds, and those of the Earls of Clanricarde and Kildare, of ten thousand each, for his appearance on thirty days’ notice.

These criminal charges, and demonstrations of anger, were wholly groundless and affected, yet, such was Herbert’s profound devotion to his master, that he endured them, and the scorn and obloquy which followed them, with a patience truly magnanimous. They had arisen from a mere accident. Immediately after the conclusion of the treaty, the Catholic Archbishop of Tuam was killed by a random shot from the garrison of Sligo, and a copy of the articles was found in his pocket. They were presently despatched to London, to the rebel parliament, where they became eminently useful in justifying the unceasing outcry of that body against the King’s inclination to favour popery. Charles had no other means of counteracting the mischiefs consequent on this premature discovery, than by a direct disclaimer on his own part, corroborated by the subsequent steps to which we have just now referred. He wrote accordingly to the Parliament, on the twenty-ninth of January 1646, N. S. in terms little differing from those which he had despatched to Ormond and the Irish Council, and designated Herbert’s treaty as “highly derogatory from his Majesty’s honour and royal dignity, and most prejudicial unto the protestant religion and church there in Ireland.” Doubtless all this was done with Herbert’s privity and concurrence. Charles was, in the meantime, in regular correspondence with him, always addressing him as Earl of Glamorgan. Herbert refused to relinquish the command of the troops raised in conformity to the treaty ; persevered in a constant communication with the heads of the Catholics assembled at Kilkenny; and on the tenth of March availed himself of one of the great faculties with which the extraordinary warrant of the first of April, 1644, had invested him, by offering to the Nuncio to confer the dignity of the Peerage on six of them, and to create one Earl, two Viscounts, and three Barons. The views, however, which his great spirit had, in spite of all disadvantages, still cherished, at length sunk under the chilling influence of his master's denial, artificial as it was, of his authority. The Catholics disbanded the troops which they had raised under it, and negotiated a new treaty with Ormond: Charles indeed, the centre of his hopes and his affections, was presently after stripped of all power, and became a sort of captive in the hands of the Scots. The following letter from the unhappy Prince, immediately after he fell into that thralldom, is a document of peculiar value to this Memoir, inasmuch as it tends powerfully to support the conjecture lately proposed, which might otherwise seem to some persons to savour of extravagance, by proving that he considered his Catholic subjects as his forlorn hope, while it demonstrates the perfect confidence and esteem in which he held the nobleman of whom we are treating:—

“ Glamorgan,

“ I am not so strictly guarded but that, if you send to me a prudent and secret person, I can receive a letter, and you may signify to me your mind, I having always loved your person and conversation, which I ardently wish for at present more than ever, if it could be had without prejudice to you, whose safety is as dear to me as my own. If you can raise a large sum of money by pawning my kingdoms, I am content you should do it; and if I recover them, I will fully repay that money. And tell the Nuncio that if I can come into his and your hands, which ought to be extremely wished for by you both, as well for the sake of England as Ireland

(since all the rest, as I see, despise me), I will do it : and, if I do not say this from my heart, or if in any future time I fail you in this, may God never restore me to my kingdoms in this world, nor give me eternal happiness in the next, to which I hope this tribulation will conduct me at last, after I have satisfied my obligations to my friends, to none of whom am I so much obliged as to yourself, whose merits towards me exceed all expressions that can be used by your constant friend,

The memory of the ill-fated Charles has been rudely attacked, and pusillanimously defended, in idle disquisitions on the question of his right to use the services of his Catholic subjects of Ireland against his English rebels. Dr. Birch, with more candour than is usually to be met with in a Whig controversialist, has laboriously ransacked every source of authority and argument, and produced a large volume to establish the negative. Mr. Carte, in the true spirit of Tory complaisance to what are now called liberal principles, evades the assertion of any direct affirmative, and rests his defence on the supposition that Herbert fabricated his commissions, and that the King was sincere in his expressions of disapprobation. So confined a view of the question was scarcely worthy of the trouble of these demonstrations of boldness by the one, and cowardice by the other. If they had looked a little further, they would have met with coincident probabilities, amounting collectively almost to certainty, that it was Charles's intention to make a grand and final effort for the redemption of his regal authority by the aid of the whole mass of his Catholic subjects—a measure unprohibited by any law or regulation, divine or human, religious, moral, or political.

That such was the King's intention there can be scarcely a reasonable doubt, for can it be supposed that Herbert was invested with the vast and unprecedented authority, conferred by the singular instrument of the first of April, 1644, merely to qualify him to treat for a peace with a body comparatively at that time so insignificant as the Irish rebels, and to raise so moderate a force as ten thousand men? No—the great plan was to be first opened in Ireland; for there, and there only, were Catholics to be found congregated, and already in arms. But this is no place for further argument on the point in question, which indeed has perhaps already been too largely discussed here. The censure which, seemingly in a too cautious policy, the dispirited Charles had affected to cast on Lord Herbert, blasted all his succeeding efforts. He left Ireland with George Leybourn, a Catholic priest, and chaplain to Henrietta Maria, who had been sent thither in the preceding year by the Prince of Wales, as his general agent to all parties, and arrived in Paris in March 1648, N.S., having succeeded to the dignities of his aged and persecuted father in the preceding December.

He remained in France till the Restoration, taking no part, as it should seem, either in the political plans, or the little intrigues of the exiled Court. On his return with the King in 1660, one of the first objects of parliamentary attention was the remarkable warrant, or, as we shall presently find it called, Patent, which we have had occasion so frequently to mention. On the eighteenth of August, 1660, the House of Lords appointed a Committee “to consider of a Patent granted to the Marquis of Worcester, which is a prejudice to other Peers.” The Marquis, on the twenty-third, informed the House that “the Patent was made to him upon conditions on his part to be performed, which he hath not performed, and is willing therefore to submit it to be surrendered, or otherwise disposed, as the King should appoint;” and it was accordingly delivered up to the King on the third of September following, and thus this remarkable instrument became involved in greater mystery than before, for the conditions were never disclosed. The Marquis devoted the long leisure which his absence in France had afforded to the study of experimental philosophy and mechanics, to which he had always been passionately attached ; and in 1663, published in London a syllabus of the results of his labours, with this title—" A Century of the Names and Scantlings of such Inventions as at present I can call to mind to have tried and perfected, which, (my former notes being lost) I have, at the instance of a powerful friend, endeavoured now to set these down in such a way as may sufficiently instruct me to put any of them in practice." It is a mere catalogue of enigmas ; with this difference, that if we had them before us at length, we could not but find most of them absolutely incapable of solution. As a proof of this, as well as a specimen of the whole, take the very first article of the " Century "—

" Several sorts of seals, some showing by screws, others by gages, fastening or unfastening all the marks at once ; others by additional points, and imaginary places, proportionable to ordinary escocheons and seals at arms, each way palpably and punctually setting down (yet private from all but the owner, and by his assent) the day of the month, the day of the week, the month of the year, the year of our Lord, the names of the witnesses, and the individual place where any thing was sealed, though in ten thousand several places, together with the very number of lines contained in a contract, whereby falsification may be discovered and manifestly proved, being upon good grounds suspected. Upon any of these seals a man may keep accompts of receipts and disbursements from one farthing to an hundred millions, punctually showing each pound, shilling, penny, or farthing. By these seals, likewise, any letter, though written but in English, may be understood in eight several languages, and in English itself, to clean contrary and different sense, unknown to any but the correspondent, and not to be read or understood by him neither, if opened before it arrive unto him, so that neither threats, nor hope of reward, can make him reveal the secret, the letter having been intercepted, and first opened by the enemy ; and ten thousand persons may use these seals to all and every of the purposes aforesaid, and yet keep their secrets from any but whom they please."

Those who may wish to know more of this strange little book, which certainly savours much of a disordered imagination, may find it rather largely treated of in Mr. Parke's edition of Lord Orford's Royal and Noble Authors. To return to the really worthy projector of the prodigies enumerated in it, who, with the too common fate of the zealous servants of the late King, seems to have been wholly neglected after the Restoration, it only remains to be added that he died on the third of April, 1667, and was buried at Ragland, in Monmouthshire, having been twice married; first, to Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Dormer (son and heir to Robert, first Lord Dormer, in whose lifetime he died) by whom he had an only son, Henry, who in 1682 was created Duke of Beaufort; and two daughters; Anne, who became the first wife of Henry Frederic, third Earl of Arundel of the Howards; and Elizabeth, married to William Herbert, first Marquis of Powys. The Marquis of Worcester's second lady was Margaret, daughter to Henry O'Brien, Earl of Thomond, who had by him a daughter, Mary, who died an infant.

EARL OF SOUTHAMPTON.

OB. 1607.

THOMAS WRIOTHESLEY,

FOURTH EARL OF SOUTHAMPTON.

IT has been, I believe, remarked in some other part of this work that the lives of persons of constant and exalted virtue furnish subjects unfavourable to the pen of the biographer; and the observation is largely justified by the memorials, or rather deficiency of memorials, which have been preserved of this nobleman, probably one of the greatest, and certainly one of the best, men of his time. The details of his private, and indeed of his public life, are meagre and uninteresting; but two eminent writers, of minds, and tempers, and principles, different almost to contrariety; the one a loyalist, of severe justice and truth, tempered by cordial kindness; the other a factious partisan, and censorious, even to malignity; have so nearly agreed in the views which they have left us of his character, that no room is left for doubt of its excellence.

He was the second, but only surviving, son of Henry, the third Earl, the friend of Essex and patron of Shakspeare, by Elizabeth, daughter of John Vernon, of Hodnet, in Shropshire. His education commenced at Eton school, and was completed at Magdalen College, in Oxford, which he left with the fame of considerable erudition and general learning, and went to the Continent, and long sojourned in France, where he probably married his first Lady, and afterwards in the Low Countries, taking no part however, as it should seem, in the military affairs which then distracted that unhappy land. Soon after his return, he became disgusted at some of the high measures of the government, with the additional motive of having received some personal offence from it, and had a particular prejudice against the Earl of Strafford. The leaders therefore of the discontented party in Parliament applied themselves to him with the utmost eagerness and courtesy, and spared no pains to obtain his countenance and support; but he presently discerned the disloyalty which lurked at the root of their designs, and abandoned, or rather in a great measure forbore to take any concern in, their councils or transactions. We scarcely hear of him therefore in public affairs till the year 1641, when he, and another peer, the Lord Robartes, refused their assent to the protestation against plots and conspiracies proposed by Mr. Pym, which was, on the third of May in that year, signed by every other member present at the time in each of the two Houses. This first demonstration of principles, from which he never after in the smallest degree swerved, was furiously resented by the Commons, who presently voted that "what person soever who should not take the protestation was unfit to bear office in the Church or Commonwealth." He was soon after sworn of the Privy Council, and appointed a Lord of the King's Bedchamber; attended Charles on his final departure from London in the autumn; and became from that time the King's chief secret adviser in all important matters relating to either; while he published, without hesitation, his firm attachment to the Crown, by making himself a party in almost all negotiations with the Parliament.

The warmth of this unalterable disposition in him was however tempered by a happy mixture of prudence. Thus, though with great difficulty, he prevailed on Charles, soon after he set up his standard at Nottingham, to make an offer of peace to the Parliament. So averse was he to this step, that Southampton, who slept in his chamber on the night that it was decided on, declared that the King had passed it sleepless, and in agony; and he is reported to have burst into tears when he consented to the measure. The Earl was himself the messenger, accompanied by two members of the House of Commons, and the insolence of the rebels on this occasion is well known. On his entering the House of Peers, he was not allowed to take his seat, and having been in a manner turned out, they sent a gentleman usher after him to require his message, to whom he replied, that he had been commanded by the King to deliver it himself, and must do so, unless prohibited by a positive order from the House, which they instantly voted. He sent it accordingly by their officer, who presently after returned with their direction "that he should, at his peril, immediately depart the town, and that they would take care that their answer should be sent to him." Such was the first of the long series of indignities which Charles was doomed to receive at the hands of his infatuated Parliament.

The management of the fruitless treaty with the rebel commissioners at Oxford in 1643 was committed chiefly to Southampton. Whitelock tells us that he stood by the King daily during the progress of it, whispering to him and advising him; in the succeeding year he was appointed one of the Council for the Prince of Wales; and was soon after sent, with the Duke of Richmond, to London, to settle with the two Houses of Parliament, and the Deputies from Scotland, the preliminaries for the treaty of Uxbridge, which speedily followed, and for which also he was appointed a commissioner, and was peculiarly distinguished by his discretion and activity in that character. When Charles fled from Hampton Court in November 1647, in the fatally vain hope of quitting England, he took a short refuge in Southampton's house in Tichfield, in Hampshire; and when soon after he returned to the same palace, in bondage in the hands of the army, one of his first requests was that he might be allowed to have the attendance of that nobleman. Southampton was perhaps the very last of the faithful servants who were torn from his person, and was certainly one of the four who were permitted to pay the last solemn duties, in darkness and privacy, to the royal remains.

He was permitted, such is the respect which exemplary goodness may extort even from the worst of mankind, to remain in England in peace and safety, and contrived to maintain with impunity a useful correspondence with the young King, whom he supplied from time to time with great sums. On the Restoration, he was received with every mark of kindness and gratitude by the King, who, on his way to London, invested him at Canterbury with the Order of the Garter, into which he had been, several years before, elected, and shortly after appointed him Lord High Treasurer. Of his conduct in the immediate affairs of that office we shall presently have some report from an acute contemporary of his, and it seems to have been his desire to confine to them, as much as possible, his whole ministerial attention, for he had a spirit which could not condescend to mix in the contemptible intrigues and factions which disgraced most of the statesmen and courtiers of that reign. He was of the Committee appointed by the King for the negotiation of the treaty of marriage to Catherine of Braganza, after which we scarcely hear of him till 1663, when he opposed to his utmost, both in the Council and in Parliament, the bill for liberty of conscience, as it was called, by which Charles proposed to allow, in fact to sell for money, a universal toleration. The King was highly offended, but the Treasurer was not removed; nor could all the efforts of a party, not less crafty than powerful, which then surrounded the throne, and which immediately seized the opportunity, and rose against him, prevail on Charles to dismiss him, and so he held the office for the brief remainder of his life.

His dear and most intimate friend, Lord Clarendon, has left us the following character of him—"The Earl of Southampton was indeed a great man in all respects, and brought very much reputation to the King's cause. He was of a nature much inclined to melancholy, and, being born a younger brother, and his father and elder brother dying upon the point together whilst he was but a boy, he was at first much troubled to be called 'my Lord,' and with the noise of attendance, so much he then delighted to be alone. He had a great spirit. He never had any conversation in the Court, nor obligation to it; on the contrary, he had undergone some hardship from it, which made it believed that he would have been ready to have taken all occasions of being severe towards it. He was a man of great sharpness of judgment, a very quick apprehension, and that readiness of expression upon any sudden debate, that no man delivered himself more advantageously and weightily, and more efficaciously with the hearers; so that no man gave them more trouble in his opposition, or drew so many to concurrence with him in opinion. He had no relation to, or dependence upon, the Court, or purpose to have any, but wholly pursued the public interest. It was long before he could be prevailed with to be a counsellor, and longer before he would be admitted to be of the Bedchamber, and refused both honours the rather, because after he had refused a protestation which both Houses had ordered to be taken by all their members, they had likewise voted that no man should be capable of any preferment in Church or State who refused to take the same, and he would shew how much he contemned those votes. He went with the King to York; was most solicitous for the offer of peace at Nottingham; and was with him at Edge Hill; and came and staid with him at Oxford to the end of the war, taking all opportunities to advance all motions towards peace; and as no man was more punctual in performing his own duty, so no man had more melancholy apprehensions of the issue of the war."

Bishop Burnet, who hated monarchy and royalists, says, the Earl of Southampton was a man of great virtue, and of very good parts. He had a lively apprehension and a good judgment. He had merited much by his constant adhering to the King's (Charles the Second's) interest during the war, and by the large supplies he had sent him every year during his exile, for he had a great estate, and only three daughters to inherit it. He was Lord Treasurer, but he soon grew weary of business, for he was subject to the stone, which returned often and violently upon him, and he retained the principles of liberty, and did not go into the violent measures of the Court. When he saw the King's temper, and his way of managing, or rather of spoiling business, he grew very uneasy, and kept himself more out of the way than was consistent with that high post. The King stood in some awe of him, and saw how popular he would grow if put out of his service, and therefore he chose rather to bear with his ill humour and contradiction than to dismiss him. He was an incorrupt man, and during seven years' management of the treasury, made but an ordinary fortune out of it. Before the Restoration the Lord Treasurer had but a small salary, with an allowance for a table ; but he gave, or rather sold, all the subaltern places, and made great profits out of the estate of the Crown ; but now, that estate being gone, and the Earl of Southampton disdaining to sell places, the matter was settled so that the Lord Treasurer was to have eight thousand pounds a year, and the King was to name all the subaltern officers. It continued to be so all his time ; but, since that time, the Lord Treasurer has both the eight thousand pounds, and a main hand in the disposing of those places."

This nobleman was thrice married ; first to Rachel, daughter of Daniel de Massey, Lord of Rouvigny, in France, by whom he had two sons, Charles and Henry, who died young ; and three daughters ; Elizabeth, married to Edward Noel, eldest son to Baptist, Viscount Campden ; Rachel, first to Francis, son and heir to Richard, Earl of Carbery in Ireland, secondly, to William, third son, but at length heir-apparent to William, first Duke of Bedford, of that family ; and Magdalen, who died an infant. His second Countess was Elizabeth, daughter and co-heir to Francis Booth, Lord Dunsmore, afterwards created Earl of Chichester, who brought him four daughters ;

three of whom, Audrey, Penelope, and another Penelope, his youngest child, died young and unmarried, and Elizabeth, the third, was first married to Jocelyn Percy, Earl of Northumberland, and secondly to Ralph, son and heir to Edward Lord Montagu of Boughton. The Earl of Southampton was married, thirdly, to Frances, daughter to William Seymour, second Duke of Somerset of his family, and widow of Richard, Viscount Molyneux in Ireland. He died at Southampton House, in Bloomsbury Square, on the sixteenth of May, 1667, of a violent attack of the cruel malady mentioned by Burnet, and was buried at Tichfield.

ALTON PERCY,
EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND
OR 1668.

ALGERNON PERCY,

EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

THIS nobleman was the third son, but at length heir and successor, to Henry, the ninth Earl of his family, (not less remarkable for talents, science, and loftiness of spirit, than for his seemingly undeserved, and tedious imprisonment and persecution, on account of the gunpowder plot,) by Dorothy, daughter of Walter Devereux, Earl of Essex, and widow of Sir Thomas Perrot. He was born in, or about, the year 1602, and completed at Christ Church, in Oxford, under the tuition of Robert Hughes, (an eminent scholar, but better known for his skill in geography and mathematics,) an education, the rudiments of which he had probably received at home from the same master, whom the Earl, his father, had drawn from obscurity at an early age, and patronised through life. In 1616, he was one of the many youthful Knights of the Bath then appointed to grace the ceremony of investing Charles with the Principality of Wales; on the accession of that Prince to the throne, he was called by writ to the House of Peers, by the title of Baron Percy; and in 1632, succeeded to the dignities and estates of his ancestors.

The King, moved not only by a personal esteem for him, but by a conscientious desire to compensate, as far as might be, for the injuries which the old Earl had received from the crown, distinguished him by the highest graces. "I courted him," said Charles, on a remarkable occasion, in the hearing of Lord Clarendon, "as my mistress, and conversed with him as my friend, without the least interruption, or intermission of any possible favour and kindness." He was called to the Privy Council summoned on the commencement of the reign, and chosen one of the noblemen who accompanied the King to his coronation in Scotland. On the thirteenth of May, 1635, he was installed a Knight of the Garter, and in the succeeding year was appointed to command the largest fleet that the crown had put to sea since the death of Queen Elizabeth, and, having performed with much credit the services required of him, in the expedition against the Dutch fishery for which it was equipped, applied himself after his return, under the authority of some sort of commission which seems to have been not quite of a public nature, to the management of civil affairs relating to the navy, and the reformation of abuses in that department. These were preparatory studies, probably agreed on between the King and himself, to qualify him for the great office of Lord High Admiral of England, to which he was raised on the thirtieth of March, 1637 ; but the fatal turn of public matters soon after that period called him to a post little less dignified, and then more important, for in 1639 he was appointed Commander in chief of the army then raised to march against the Scottish covenanters. He was at that time held in the utmost estimation by his master, not only as a private friend, but as a minister. Lord Clarendon informs us, and I quote the entire passage chiefly because it so clearly points out the origin, at least in our country, of two political designations so frequently rung in English ears, that "the bulk and burthen of state affairs, whereby the envy attended them likewise, lay principally on the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earl of Strafford, and the Lord Cottington ; the Earl of Northumberland, for ornament ; the Lord Bishop of London, by his place, being Lord High Treasurer of England ; and the two Secretaries, Sir Henry Vane, and Sir Francis Windebank, for service, and communication of intelligence. These were reproachfully called the Juncto, and enviously, at court, the Cabinet Council."

We find here a note of disdain attached to his name, which however delicately expressed, cannot escape observation. The truth is that the Earl of Northumberland, to say no worse of him, possessed neither a heart nor a mind fit to encounter the great trials which were at hand. Even now, in their dawn, and immediately after he had received the highest mark of confidence, as well as the most distinguished appointment, which his Sovereign could bestow, we find in a letter from him to his brother-in-law, the Earl of Leicester, of the seventh of May, 1640, published in the Sidney papers, these lukewarm expressions—"Notwithstanding this dissolution" (of the parliament, in the spring of that year) "the King intends vigorously to pursue his former designs, and to levy the same army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse. About three weeks hence they are to be drawn together; but as yet I cannot learn by what means we are to get one shilling towards defraying this great expense. What will the world judge of us abroad, to see us enter into such an action as this, not knowing how to maintain it for one month? It grieves my soul to be involved in these counsels, and the sense I have of the miseries that are like to ensue is held by some a disaffection in me, but I regard not what these persons say," &c. Immediately after this period, the Earl was seized by a violent and lasting illness, which gave him an opportunity to resign into the King's hands the commission which he seems to have been so little disposed to execute.

But an incident which shortly followed seems to have discovered the true bent of his inclination. Henry Percy, his younger brother, and a firm royalist, being about to pass into France on the King's service, just at the time that an address had been proposed in the House of Commons to request his Majesty not to permit any of his servants to go out of the kingdom, had been attacked and wounded by the country people on the coast of Sussex, from whom he escaped with difficulty, and retired to a place of concealment, whence he despatched to the Earl, his brother, a letter, which, as the event proved, must have imparted matter of great secrecy. This letter, through some monstrous perversion of morals or of intellect, the Earl laid before the Commons, who had previously voted an impeachment of high treason against Henry, for conspiring to raise troops to overawe the Parliament; and he, during the agitation of the matter, found means to quit the country.

Lord Clarendon, in strangely endeavouring to frame an excuse for the Earl's conduct on this remarkable occasion, increases our sense of his culpability. "The truth is," says Clarendon, "that after his brother's being accused of high treason, and then, upon his hurt in Sussex, coming directly to Northumberland House to shelter himself, the Earl, being in great trouble how to send him away beyond the seas after his wound was cured, advised with a confident friend, then in power, whose affection to him he doubted not, and who, innocently enough, brought Mr. Pym into the council, who overwitted them both, by frankly consenting that Mr. Percy should escape into France, which was all the care the Earl had; but then obliged him first to draw such a letter from him as might by the party be applied as an evidence of the reality of the plot, after he was escaped; and in this manner the letter was procured; which made a lasting quarrel between the two brothers, and made the Earl more at the disposal of those persons, whom he had trusted so far, than he had been before." "This," observes the noble historian, "was the first instance of his defection from the King's service, and it produced the worst effects; for, as he then had the most esteemed and unblemished reputation, both in the court and country, of any of his rank in the kingdom, so they who knew him well knew that the greatness of that reputation was but an effect of the singular grace and favour shown to him by his Majesty; and therefore many who observed him purchase this opportunity of dis-serving the King at the price of his brother's honour, and of his own gratitude, concluded that he had some notable temptation of conscience, and that the court was much worse than it seemed to be."

From that period he gave himself wholly over to the popular party, and became, perhaps with better intentions than those of many who did less evil, one of its most formidable engines ; for his concessions were more mischievous than their activity, and his high rank, immense estates, and universal good character, placed his motives above suspicion. In 1641, the lowest rabble of London had been incited to present a petition to the House of Commons, the main prayer of which was, in effect, that the names of those Peers who usually voted for the favourite measures might be accurately disclosed to them ; and the main object, to intimidate the rest by apprehensions of their vengeance. That petition, marvellous to relate, was read, at a conference between the two Houses ; immediately after which the Commons sent Mr. Holles with a message to the Peers, requiring their assistance to deprive the King of the militia ; to which that gentleman added, in reference to the petition, that if the request of the House of Commons should be rejected, he desired that those Lords who were willing to concur would find some means to make themselves known, in order that those might be known who were unwilling ; and in order, said Mr. Holles, "that we may make it known to those who sent us." In the debate, doubtless full of warmth, which followed, the Earl of Northumberland condescended to say that "whosoever refused in that particular to join with the House of Commons were, in his opinion, enemies to the commonwealth." When that House, very soon after, on its own sole authority, commanded him, in his capacity of Lord High Admiral, to equip the royal navy, he obeyed implicitly ; and when it directed him to appoint the Earl of Warwick Admiral of the Fleet, for the service of the year 1642, he did so, in disobedience to the King's express pleasure. In the same weakness of mind, for let us hope that the whole of his conduct may be ascribed to that cause, when Charles, in the summer of that year, demanded his commission, with very little hope of success, he quietly resigned it, answering those of the Parliament who earnestly pressed him to retain it, that "it would ill become him, who had received that charge from the King, with such circumstances of trust and favour, to continue the possession of it against his Majesty's express pleasure, there being a clause in his grant that it should be only during such time as his Majesty should think fit to use his service." He retired accordingly, and the fleet, as might have been reasonably expected, presently after abandoned its allegiance.

The arrival of that miserable epoch which changed the resistance of the House of Commons into positive rebellion, produced no alteration in his conduct. A single instance only of his deviation from a regular passive obedience to the prevailing party can be discovered ; he appears to have been privy to what was called Waller's plot, in 1643 ; but his name was so useful to the rebels that they forbore to institute any process against him. They continued to employ him, but without confidence, and he still accepted their commissions, though he had lost all affection to their cause ; for he had by this time a clear prospect of those dangers against which the history of popular revolutions, not less vainly, by a strange fatality, than frequently, warns men of his degree. Little, however, was now left for him to perform, or rather to endure. He was placed at the head of the commissioners appointed to negotiate with Charles in the several treaties of Oxford, Uxbridge, and Newport ; and in April, 1645, the royal children were committed by the Commons to his custody, and he retained that charge till the murder of their father. Immediately after that sad event, which he had used his best arguments, the only means of which he had not stripped himself, to prevent, he retired to his seat at Petworth, in Sussex, where he remained in privacy till 1660, when, on the arrival of Monk from Scotland, he received that officer with open arms, and, at the head of what was called the moderate Presbyterian party, concerted with him the means of the Restoration. He accepted no public employment under Charles the Second, except those of Lord Lieutenant of the counties of Sussex and Northumberland.

Lord Clarendon tells us that this nobleman "was in all his deportment a very great man, and that which looked like formality was a punctuality in preserving his dignity from the invasion and intrusion of bold men, which no man of that age so well preserved himself from. Though his notions were not large or deep, yet his temper and reservedness in discourse, and his reservedness in speaking, got him the reputation of an able and a wise man, which he made evident in the excellent government of his family, where no man was more absolutely obeyed; and no man had ever fewer idle words to answer for; and in debates of importance he always expressed himself very pertinently. If he had thought the King as much above him as he thought himself above other considerable men, he would have been a good subject; but the extreme undervaluing those, and not enough valuing the King, made him liable to the impressions which they who approached him by those addresses of reverence and esteem that usually insinuate themselves into such natures made in him: so that after he was first prevailed upon not to do that which in honour and gratitude he was obliged to, which is a pestilent corruption, he was with the more facility led to concur in what, in duty and fidelity, he ought not to have done, and so he concurred in all the counsels which produced the rebellion, and stayed with them to support it."

Algernon, Earl of Northumberland, died on the thirteenth of October, 1668, and was buried at Petworth. He had been twice married; first to Anne, daughter of William Cecil, Earl of Salisbury; and, secondly, to Elizabeth, daughter of Theophilus Howard, Earl of Suffolk. By the former Lady he had five daughters ; Catherine, Lucy, and Dorothy, who died young ; Anne, married to Philip, Lord Stanhope, after her death Earl of Chesterfield ; and Elizabeth, to Arthur, Lord Capel, afterwards created Earl of Essex ; by the latter, an only son, Josceline, who succeeded him, and one daughter, Elizabeth, who died an infant.

HENRIETTA MARIA,
QUEEN OF CHARLES THE FIRST.

OB. 1669.

QUEEN HENRIETTA MARIA.

WIFE TO KING CHARLES THE FIRST.

IT has been the inveterate fashion of history to ascribe to the influence of this Lady most of the errors of the reign of her unfortunate consort. Royalist and republican writers have joined in this censure with equal readiness; the one with a view of shifting from the conduct of the King on her defenceless memory the blame of all evil counsels which she might by possibility have suggested, the other to discredit his character by the imputation of a weak and servile compliance with the capricious will of a woman whom he loved. Amidst a cloud of prejudice, and error often wilful, each has been to a certain degree just. Almost all however but her beauty has been in some measure misrepresented, and that indeed, till now, has never received full justice from the graver.

Henrietta Maria was the sixth and youngest child of Henry the Fourth of France, by Mary, daughter of Francis de Medicis, Grand Duke of Tuscany, and was born on the twenty-fifth of November, 1609, exactly six months before the murder of her incomparable father. She had scarcely passed the year of childhood when her kinsman, Charles de Bourbon, Count of Soissons, and second Prince of the blood of France, openly pretended to her hand, and for three years together pressed his suit with a pertinacity to which the opinion of the French Council of Regency, and even a formal prohibition in the name of the minor Monarch, her brother, Louis the Thirteenth, were vainly opposed. The embarrassment produced by the Count's passion, which seems however to have met with little encouragement from herself, had prevented the eligible addresses of some foreign Princes, when at length Charles, passing through Paris in 1623 on his fruitless matrimonial journey to Spain, had an opportunity, himself wholly unobserved, of seeing her at a ball in the Louvre; was struck by her charms; and, on the dissolution of the treaty for the Infanta, determined to solicit his father's permission to his demanding her in marriage. James, though the measure was contrary to much of his habitual policy, was induced, chiefly by the splendour of the alliance, to consent; France, with stronger motives, readily accepted the proposal; and it was presently negotiated at Paris by the Earls of Carlisle and Holland; in a memoir of the latter of which noblemen, which has already appeared in this work, some remarkable particulars relative to the treaty may be found. The ceremony of the espousals was performed by the Cardinal de la Rochefoucault (not de Richelieu, as many writers have it) at Notre Dame, on the eleventh of May, 1625; and on the twenty-second of the next month the young Queen—for James died before the completion of the marriage—landed at Dover.

We have abundant relations of the delicate and refined greetings which occurred on the first meeting of Charles and his lovely bride. A small and superficial narrative, printed in London in 1671, two years after her death, and the only piece of biography hitherto dedicated to her memory, informs us, prettily enough, that "Charles received her at Dover on the top of the stairs, she striving, on her knees, to kiss his hands, and he prevented her with civilities on her lips: that, being retired, she wept, and he kissed off her tears, professing he would do so till she had done, and persuading her that she was not fallen into the hands of strangers, as she apprehended, tremblingly, but into the wise disposal of God, who would have her leave her kindred, and cleave to her spouse; he professing to be no longer master of himself than whilst he was servant to her." Soon after, they fell into more composed conversation, and, says the writer of a private letter, Charles took her up in his arms, kissed her, and, talking with her, cast down his eyes towards her feet, she, seeming taller than report was, reaching to his shoulders; which she soon perceiving, discovered and showed him her shoes, saying to this effect, "Sir, I stand upon mine own feet. I have no help by art. Thus high I am, and am rather higher than lower." But to proceed to matters more serious—

Henrietta Maria was a zealous, not to say bigoted, disciple of the church of Rome, and her family had obtained terms from James on that score, to which it is surprising that a Prince who affected to be the chief patron of the reformers should have consented. She came, says father Daniel, "avec toutes les précautions prisés pour la liberté, et la sureté de sa religion;" but many of these extended far beyond the provisions necessary to secure to her the freedom of religious worship; for example, it was even stipulated by the treaty that the education of her children till they reached the age of thirteen should be solely under her controul. The French clergy who formed part of her suite on her arrival were intoxicated by these concessions. They were in number twenty-eight, with a Bishop at their head, and they came full fraught with hopes and expedients for the restoration of the ancient faith. In this view they lost no time in practising its ceremonies with the utmost publicity, and frequently made her a personal partaker in them; as a most surprising instance of which, they persuaded her to walk through the streets in procession, in a rainy day, from Somerset-house, her residence, to Tyburn, to offer up her prayers for the souls of Catholics who had been executed there; among whom it must be recollected were Percy, and his associates, who had lately suffered for conspiring to destroy at a blow the King and the two Houses of Parliament. Her female attendants, with less ground of excuse, behaved with yet more insolence; claimed places of honour which were not due to them, and in resentment for the denial of them, set the Queen, to use Charles's own words, "in such a humour of distaste against him, as from that hour no man could say that she ever used him two days together with so much respect as he deserved of her." New occasions of disgust and discord now occurred every hour. She positively rejected the establishment which the King had formed for her household, on the plan of that of his late mother; and, upon his refusing to admit her French attendants to the superintendence of her jointure, she told him to "take his lands to himself, for if she had no power to put whom she would into those places, she would have neither lands nor house of his, but bade him give her what he thought fit in pension." These extravagances, though but the hasty ebullitions of a sanguine temper in a girl of sixteen in the hands of bad advisers, required instant correction, and they were met by Charles with coolness and discretion. He dispatched the Lord Carleton to Paris to complain of them, and his instructions to that nobleman, dated at Wansted, on the twelfth of July, 1626, furnished the authority for what has been here reported.

Charles ascribed this waywardness chiefly to the influence of the Queen's French attendants, and his anger against them increased in an equal measure with his averseness to attribute it to the temper of his lovely bride. He had long meditated to send them home. So early as the twentieth of November, in the preceding year, he proposes it in a letter to Buckingham, in which he speaks of "the maliciousness of the Monsieurs, by making and fomenting discontentments in his wife," and concludes by saying, "I am resolute: it must be done, and that shortly." He delayed it however till the summer, when, on the first of July, he communicated his determination to them in person, and refused to hear their apologies; and, on the seventh of August, in a moment evidently of the highest irritation, wrote thus to Buckingham—

"Steenie,

"I have received your letter by Dic Greame—this is my answer. I command you to send all the French away to-morrow out of the town : if you can, by fair meanes, but stick not long in disputing—otherways, force them away lyke so many wylde beastes, until you have shipped them, and so the devil go with them. Let me heare no more answer but of the performance of my command.

“ Your faithfull, constant, loving frend,

“ Oaking,

the 7th of August, 1626.”

That the arrogance and impertinence of these persons had exceeded all due bounds of decency there can be little doubt, but the true cause of the Queen's misbehaviour was wholly unknown to Charles, and in a great measure to herself, and was of a character so singular, and indeed so romantic, that, were it not disclosed to us under an undubitable authority, it would be absolutely incredible. The Duke of Buckingham, who had been to Paris to escort her to England, was mad enough, during his short visit to the French court, to strive to win the affections of Anne of Austria, Louis the Thirteenth's Queen, a lady less remarkable for her prudence than for her beauty. When the day arrived for Henrietta Maria's departure, he tore himself from Paris with the utmost difficulty, and, such was his infatuation, that he left her at Boulogne, pretending that he had that moment received an important commission from his master to the Queen Regent, and hurried back for the sake of one brief interview with Anne, whom he found in bed, and almost alone, and towards whom he behaved with a frantic temerity and extravagance which is curiously described in the conclusion of the fourth volume of De Retz's Memoirs. These circumstances were presently conveyed to Louis, and, had he ventured on such another visit, “ provision,” says Lord Clarendon, “ was made for his reception ; and, if he had pursued his attempt, he had been without doubt assassinated, of which he had only so much notice as served him to decline the danger ; but he swore in the instant that he would see and speak with her, in spite of the strength and power of France: and, from the time that the Queen arrived in England, he took all the ways he could to undervalue and exasperate that Court and Nation; and omitted no opportunity to incense the King against France; and, which was worse than all this, took great pains to lessen the King's affection towards his young Queen, being exceedingly jealous lest her interest might be of force enough to cross his other designs; and, in this stratagem, he had brought himself to a habit of neglect, and even of rudeness, towards the Queen, so that, upon expostulations with her on a trivial occasion, he told her she should repent it; and her Majesty answering with some quickness, he replied insolently to her that there had been Queens in England who had lost their heads." There can be little doubt that the misconduct of her French servants had been indirectly prompted by Buckingham, and formed a part of his wild and ungenerous plan for the gratification of his hatred to their nation, at the expense of the public and private peace of his too beneficent master.

Buckingham lived long enough to carry his vengeance to the utmost by forcing Charles into a war with France, in the midst of which he was taken off by assassination. From the hour of that event, the most perfect cordiality ensued between the King and Queen, founded on a singular agreement, or rather on an harmonious discord, of minds and tempers which had been hitherto restrained by untoward circumstances from their natural action. Charles, the main features of whose character were compliance and confidence, now, freed from doubts and jealousies, became, for the first time since his marriage, the ardent and submissive lover; while his fair consort, who with an equal measure of tenderness mingled a disposition to rule and to persevere, rose as suddenly from an artificial state of almost childish insignificance to participate in the government of an empire. Clarendon, to whose justness and severity of judgment such a contingency could not but have been highly offensive, thus describes, perhaps with some grains of prejudice, the relative situations of these eminent persons at that time, and indeed ever after—

“The King’s affection to the Queen was of a very extraordinary alloy—a composition of conscience, and love, and generosity, and gratitude, and all those noble affections which raise the passion to the greatest height ; insomuch as he saw with her eyes, and determined by her judgment, and did not only pay her this adoration, but desired that all men should know that he was swayed by her, which was not good for either of them. The Queen was a lady of great beauty, excellent wit and humour, and made him a just return of noblest affections, so that they were the true idea of conjugal affection in the age in which they lived. When she was admitted to the knowledge and participation of the most secret affairs (from which she had been carefully restrained by the Duke of Buckingham, whilst he lived) she took delight in the examining and discussing them, and from thence in making judgment of them, in which her passions were always strong. She had felt so much pain in knowing nothing, and meddling with nothing, during the time of that great favourite, that now she took pleasure in nothing but knowing all things, and disposing all things, and thought it but just that she should dispose of all favours and preferments as he had done, at least that nothing of that kind might be done without her privity, not considering that the universal prejudice that great man had undergone was not with reference to his person but his power, and that the same power would be equally obnoxious to murmur and complaint if it resided in any other person than the King himself ; and she so far concurred with the King’s inclination, that she did not more desire to be possessed of this unlimited power, than that all the world should take notice that she was the entire mistress of it ; which, in truth (what other unhappy circumstances soever concurred in the mischief), was the foundation upon which the first, and the utmost prejudices to the King and his government, were raised and prosecuted ; and it was her Majesty's and the kingdom's misfortune that she had not any person about her who had either ability or affection to inform and advise her of the temper of the kingdom, or humour of the people, or who thought either worth the caring for."

Burnet, another contemporary, but more removed from the sphere of action than Clarendon ; more prejudiced, and less faithful in relation, thus characterises her—"The Queen was a woman of great vivacity in conversation, and loved all her life long to be in intrigues of all sorts, but was not so secret in them as such times and such affairs required. She was bad at contrivance, and much worse in the execution ; but by the liveliness of her discourse she made always a great impression on the King ; and to her little practises, as well as to the King's own temper, the sequel of all his misfortunes was owing." It is to pictures like these—to general representations—that we must of necessity in a great measure trust in cases the very nature of which forbids the possibility of obtaining historical proofs of particular facts.

The Queen's exertions of her newly acquired influence, met with frequent contradictions. The carriage of the Lord Treasurer Weston towards her, as has been already observed in a sketch of his life in this work, was marked by a constant alternation of petulant insults and degrading apologies. Having provoked her to anger, his first care, on retiring from her presence, was to discover what she had afterwards said of him in her passion : receiving the news with increased alarm, he appealed sometimes to the King's authority, and sometimes to her compassion ; and in making his peace, generally betrayed those from whom he had gained the intelligence. Her interference in affairs was not more vexatious now to Weston's irritability than afterwards to Strafford's wisdom, and she regarded that great man with fear, and therefore with some degree of aversion. Burnet plainly points her out as the final cause of his death. He says that Lord Holles, who was brother-in-law to the Earl, and a man deeply engaged with the popular party in Parliament, had suggested to Charles, after he had passed the bill of attainder, a plan for saving him, which was this ; that Strafford should prefer a petition to the King for a short respite, and that Charles, in person, should the next day lay it before the two Houses, as for their advice ; Holles promising, says Burnet, “to make interest among his numerous friends to get them to consent to it, and he had prepared a great many by assuring them that if they would save Lord Strafford, he would become wholly theirs, in consequence of his first principles ; and that he might do them much more service by being preserved, than he could do if made an example upon such new and doubtful points ; and in this he had wrought on so many that he believed, if the King’s party had struck into it, he had saved Strafford.” But the Bishop adds that it was whispered to the Queen that a part of Holles’s engagement to his friends was that Strafford should accuse her, and that therefore she not only persuaded the King, instead of moving the Parliament personally on the matter, to send a message to the House of Lords, written with his own hand, by the Prince of Wales, but add ‘o it, at the conclusion, those dastardly and fatal words, “if he must die, it were charity to reprieve him till Saturday.”

A moment’s reflection on the signal grandeur of Strafford’s character will invalidate the whole of this most improbable tale, for if that part of it which relates to him be untrue, and it is incredible that he should have been a party in such a negotiation, no reason remains for believing the vile accusation against the Queen. Amidst the abundance of libels which were about this time poured forth against her, it is remarkable that none are to be found which charge her with a vindictive spirit. She was assailed and threatened by the most brutal and unmanly attacks, which for a short time she disregarded with becoming firmness. She calmly dispatched letters missive, by Sir Kenelm Digby, Walter Montagu, and others, to solicit loans from the Catholics of England and

Wales for the relief of Charles's necessities ; and it has been said that the King was prompted chiefly by her persuasion to the bold and unhappy measure of demanding the impeached members in the House of Commons. Echard, an historian generally of credit, ridiculously tells us that she said furiously to Charles, "Allez, poltron—pull the rogues out by the ears, or never see me more," and completes the absurdity of his story by quoting his authority. "It appears," says he, "from a private account given by Sir William Coke, of Norfolk, from Mr. Anchitel Grey, brother to the Lord Grey of Groby, that the King, going in the morning into the Queen's apartment, finding the Countess of Carlisle with her, retired with her into her closet, where she used those words, which the Countess overheard, and discovered them to Mr. Pym."

This bold spirit, however, was soon daunted for the time. The public disorders increased, and she became suddenly terrified by apprehensions for her personal safety. Sir Philip Warwick says, "the Queen was ever more forward than stout." Be that as it might, these painful impressions became presently so strong as to induce her earnestly to solicit Charles's permission to retire into France. She obtained it just at the period when the bill for depriving the Bishops of their votes had passed the two Houses, and was waiting for the King's assent, which he stedfastly refused ; when it was whispered to her by Sir John Colepeper, a loyal servant, but a friend to that measure, that if Charles persisted in his denial the Parliament would prohibit her journey ; on which she implored the King, with such pathetic importunities, that he finally gave way, and thus that great wound was inflicted on the hierarchy by her fears. The King now accompanied her to Dover, where, on the twenty-third of February, 1642, O.S., she embarked, with her daughter, the Princess of Orange, for Holland.

There were, however, other motives for her visit to the Continent. It was now evident that the contest between the King and the Parliament must be decided by the sword, and he possessed scarcely the means to equip a single regiment. The Queen, who had, before her departure, sent most of her plate to the mint, carried the remainder secretly with her to Holland, together with her own jewels, and many of great value belonging to the Crown, which she there pawned or sold, and laid out the produce in large purchases of arms and ammunition, in spite of the discouragement of the States, who were notoriously adverse to the King's cause. At length, her spirits recruited by safety, and invigorated by reflection on the greatness of the occasion, she sailed to his assistance, the war now fully raging, with a small convoy, furnished by her son-in-law, the Prince of Orange, and disembarked at Burlington, in Yorkshire, where she was met by the Earl of Newcastle, with a sufficient guard. Of the dangers and difficulties which attended her landing, a narrative, written by herself, is extant, a few passages from which perhaps may not be unacceptable—"The next night after we came to Burlington, four of the Parliament's ships arrived, without being perceived by us, and about five of the clock in the morning, begun to ply us so fast with their ordnance that they made us all rise out of our beds and leave the village. One of the ships did me the favour to flank upon the house where I lay, and before I was out of my bed the cannon bullets whistled so loud about me, that all the company pressed me earnestly to go out of the house, their cannon having totally beaten down all the neighbour houses, and two cannon bullets falling from the top to the bottom of the house where I was; so that, cloathed as well as in haste I could be, I went on foot some little distance out of the town, under the shelter of a ditch, like that of Newmarket, whither before I could get, the cannon bullets fell thick about us, and a servant was killed within seventy paces of me. We in the end gained the ditch, and stayed there two hours, whilst their cannon played all the while on us. The bullets flew, for the most part, over our heads;

some few only, grazing on the ditch, covered us with earth, &c., till the ebbing of the tide, and the threats of the Holland Admiral, put an end to that danger."

We discern in this letter a transient spark of the mighty spirit of her father, nor was it instantly extinguished, for now, having been escorted to York by a body of Horse, commanded by the Earl of Montrose and Lord Ogilvie, she presently raised a powerful force, and marched towards the King, with thirty troops of Horse and Dragoons, and three thousand infantry, at whose head she rode as their commander. She met him at Edge Hill, and accompanied him to Oxford, where she remained, with little intermission, till the spring of 1644, when the rebel Commons having impeached her of high treason, and the royal army suffering some sad reverses of fortune, she fell again under the influence of terror, and, quitting Oxford on the seventeenth of April, then great with child, took leave at Abingdon, for ever in this world, of her royal husband; and travelling towards the western coast, arrived at Exeter, where she was delivered of a daughter, and from thence, in little more than a fortnight, to Pendennis, in Cornwall, where she embarked for France, and on the fifteenth of July arrived at Brest. She had exacted two promises from Charles at their parting; the one that he would receive no person who had at any time injured him into his favour or trust without her consent; the other, that he would not make peace with the rebels but through her interposition and mediation, that the kingdom might know the share that she had in procuring it; and his religious observance of those engagements is thought, perhaps erroneously, to have produced ill consequences. The truth is, that she would have sacrificed all for conquest. Her exertions therefore in her exile, while hope remained, were unremitted. From France, where the death of Louis, and of Cardinal Richelieu, had placed her mother once more in the station of Regent, and in absolute power, it is not strange that she should have obtained extensive supplies; but she presently established English agents in most of the Courts of Europe, and raised, and conveyed to England and Ireland, from time to time, immense sums. Her negotiations were chiefly managed by herself, and with a caution, and regularity, and dispatch, which prove her to have possessed talents for which she has hitherto had little credit. It is almost needless to say that these were vain labours. The time approached when she was to be debarred from all duties but such as might strictly and immediately apply to the person of her King and husband, and when it arrived, she wrote, through the French minister in London, to those who ruled there, imploring them to grant her "a pass to come over to him; offering to use all her credit with him to induce him to give them satisfaction; and, if they would not allow her to perform those offices on public grounds, that she might at least be permitted to see him, and to be near him in his uttermost extremity." She received no answer.

After the murder of Charles, and a considerable time passed in privacy in the convent at St. Cloud, the Queen again appeared at the French Court. The Palais Royal, and the Castle of St. Germain, were allotted to her for her residences, and an allowance, suitable to her rank, for the support of her family. That, however, and other of her comforts, were gradually curtailed as Cromwell's government gained strength, and France, under the guidance of Cardinal Mazarin, adopted towards it a complaisant policy. She became at length subjected to serious pecuniary inconveniences, and it has been repeated by several writers, on the doubtful authority of De Retz's Memoirs, that she petitioned the Usurper for a pension, which he refused; but that she should have condescended to this is nearly incredible. In the mean time her life was embittered by the indifference with which the young King, her son, treated that advice which perhaps she was ever too ready to give; and by the resistance offered by him and his counsellors to her constant endeavours to instil into her children the principles of her religious faith. Her chief consolation seems now to have been derived from the society, and the services, of Henry Jermyn, Earl of St. Albans, who had been for many years her favourite servant, and now managed all her affairs, as well domestic as political. It has been surmised, and perhaps truly, that she was privately married to that nobleman, but the rumour rests solely on the authority of a very vague passage in the memoirs of Sir John Reresby. The Queen returned to England on the second of November, 1660, and quitted it again for France on the twenty-fifth of the following January : came once more on the twenty-eight of July, 1662, and left it finally on the twenty-ninth of June, 1665. In these visits we find nothing respecting her worthy of notice, except the highly characteristic circumstances of her conduct on the discovery of the marriage of the Duke of York to the daughter of Lord Clarendon, which are related by that nobleman, at too great length to permit the insertion of them here, in "the Continuation" of his Life.

Queen Henrietta Maria died at the castle of Colombe, four leagues from Paris, on the tenth of August, 1669, N.S., and was buried with her ancestors in the royal abbey of St. Denis.

GEORGE MONK,
DUKE OF ALBEMARLE

OB. 1671.

GEORGE MONK,

DUKE OF ALBEMARLE.

As we are told that we may cover a multitude of our own sins by our charity, so, in another sense, may it be said that we frequently cover those of others by our gratitude. It is difficult even to discern the faults of one from whom we have received great favour ; painful to dwell on the contemplation of them ; and scarcely possible to proclaim them. If these amiable feelings flourish in the common familiar intercourse of mankind, in spite of the innumerable disgusts with which the selfish passions torment small and closely connected societies, how much more forcibly must they operate in those rare cases where the benefactor and the objects of his bounty are, in all other respects, wholly independent of each other ; in which obligations are the more keenly felt because we can never be reproached with them ; and debts readily owned, because they can never be claimed : in which we receive favour without having taken the trouble to deserve it ; and run eagerly to acknowledge it, chiefly because no acknowledgment is expected. Such a benefactor was Monk, and he invested the character with the dazzling glory of a nation's saviour : but it was from those dispositions in mankind to which I have endeavoured to allude, that he purchased for his memory not only the praise, but the forbearance of history.

He descended from a Devonshire family of good antiquity, and royal blood ran in his veins ; for his great-grandfather, Thomas Monk, of Potheridge, in that county, married, for his first wife, Frances, daughter and co-heir of Arthur

Plantagenet, Viscount Lisle, and he sprung from that match. His father, Sir Thomas Monk, of Potheridge, the heir to a decayed estate, married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir George Smith, of Madworth, also in the same county. He was born on the sixth of December, 1608, and was their second son; was only two years old when his father died, and received such education as he had under the protection of his maternal grandfather. It was probably not more than sufficient to qualify him for the life of a gentleman soldier, in which he was placed in his seventeenth year, when he joined the unsuccessful expedition against Spain, under Cecil, Viscount Wimbledon, in the character of a volunteer, and in the following year obtained a pair of colours in the regiment commanded by Sir John Burroughs, in which he served in the equally unfortunate, but less discreditable, affair of the Isle of Rhé. He remained long without promotion, fighting in the Low Countries under the Earl of Oxford, and afterwards Lord Goring, by whom he was at length appointed to a company; but he had studied his profession with the most indefatigable attention, and was not less distinguished by his courage, and with those recommendations returned in 1638 to his country, in that unhappy moment which made it, after a century and half of repose, a field of speculation to military adventurers. On the breaking out of the Scottish rebellion, he obtained, through the interest of his distant kinsman, the Earl of Leicester, and his son, Lord Lisle, the commission of lieutenant-colonel of Lord Newport's regiment, and served with considerable reputation in both the King's expeditions to that country.

Scotland had scarcely assumed a deceitful appearance of tranquillity when the Irish rebellion burst forth. Leicester, a man of lukewarm loyalty, who had been appointed to succeed Strafford in the office of Lord Lieutenant, now sent Monk to Ireland, with the command of his own regiment, and the rank of colonel. He behaved so well in that station, that the Lords Justices, for it does not appear that Leicester ever went to Ireland, nominated him Governor of Dublin ; but the Long Parliament, having just at that period succeeded in establishing a paramount authority there, the charge was given to another, and he received orders from the Marquis of Ormonde, who commanded the King's army, to return with it to England. He did so, but with much unwillingness, for he was in fact devoted to the Parliament. Ludlow expressly tells us that " he made some scruple to quit the Irish service, and engage in that against the Parliament in England, and was for that reason secured on board a ship while the forces were embarking, lest he should have obstructed their going over ; and we find that, on his landing at Bristol, he was met by orders both from Ireland and from Oxford, where the King then was, depriving him of his regiment, and directing Lord Hawley, the Governor, to restrain his person. That nobleman, however, permitted him to go on his parole to Oxford, where he excused himself so plausibly to Lord Digby, the Secretary of State, that the King was induced again to accept his offers of service, and gave him the commission of major-general in a corps called the Irish brigade, then besieging Namptwich, in Cheshire, under the command of Lord Byron.

He arrived at that place almost in the moment that Fairfax had brought up a strong body of the rebel forces to its relief, and was taken prisoner, with his brigade, by that officer, and sent to Hull, and soon after to the Tower of London, where he was chiefly supported by the King's bounty till November, 1646, when his friend, the Lord Lisle, having been appointed Deputy of Ireland by the Parliament, negotiated for his release. Monk now openly abandoned the royal cause, subscribed to the covenant, and accompanied Lisle to that country, where they found the King's friends, headed by the Marquis of Ormonde, so formidable, that, after a considerable time passed in ineffectual endeavours to raise a sufficient opposition, they returned home. He was, however, presently despatched thither again, invested with the chief command of the rebel force in the north, with which he prosecuted for several months that sort of sanguinary chastisement which too frequently occurs in contests between disciplined troops and rude insurgents. Whether this was terminated by the superior strength in that part of Ireland of the royalists, or whether he betrayed to them the cause of his new employers, is somewhat uncertain, but that he concluded a treaty with the Irish chieftain, Owen Roe O'Neil, and was censured for that step by the rebel Parliament at home, are undoubted historical facts. On the tenth of August, 1649, the Commons voted that "they did disapprove of what Major-General Monk had done, in concluding a peace with the grand and bloody rebel, Owen Roe O'Neil, and did abhor the having anything to do with him therein: yet are easily persuaded that the making the same by the said Major-General was in his judgment for the most advantage of the English interest in that nation, and that he shall not be questioned for the same in time to come." Ludlow, the most cautious, as well as the most honest, writer for the rebel cause, more unequivocally says, "he met with a cold reception from the Parliament, upon suggestion that he had corresponded with the Irish rebels." Be this as it might, it is certain that he remained now for a considerable time unemployed, a fact which the good humour of history has generally attributed to the anger excited in him by a suspicion of his integrity.

Cromwell, however, who was now approaching to the zenith of his power, drew Monk from his retirement. A remarkable similarity of character had produced in them, as far as their nature would permit, a mutual regard and confidence. The military skill, and even the bravery of the one, and they shone equally in both, were marked by the same reserve and moroseness which distinguished the other. Both were great masters of the arts of dissimulation, but Monk was free from that affectation of pious enthusiasm which his leader displayed with so much effect, and indeed it was not necessary to his purposes. In 1650 Cromwell, having been appointed to command the forces sent against the Scots, who had proclaimed Charles the Second, gave him a regiment of foot, and the commission of lieutenant-general of the artillery, and they marched together into Scotland. The victory, if the rout of a panic-struck army may be so called, of the English at Dunbar, was ascribed not less to his previous advice, than to his bravery and good judgment in the field ; and his activity in dispersing the numerous bands of irregular troops which still appeared in arms after that decisive battle, crushed, for the time, all hopes for the royal cause in that country. On Cromwell's return he was appointed commander-in-chief in Scotland, and prosecuted the war with signal success, but with a sanguinary fury which sullied the lustre of his exploits ; and we have a frightful instance of this disposition in his conduct at Dundee, where he put Lumsdaine, the Governor, and eight hundred men, to the sword. An ill state of health obliged him soon afterwards to visit his own country, from whence, after a short stay, he departed again for Scotland, with the appointment of a commissioner for the union of that kingdom with the new English commonwealth, and gained much credit with his party by his address in the accomplishment of that affair.

Monk's services were now transferred to the sea. Soon after the commencement of the Dutch war he was joined to Blake and Deane in the command of the fleet, and shared with them the glory of the victories of the second of June, and the thirty-first of July, 1653. He had gained some nautical experience in the outset of his military life, and his utter fearlessness atoned for what was doubtless deficient in him of that skill so abundantly supplied by his two comrades. One of the first acts, however, of the sole government of Cromwell, who in the following December had thrown off the mask, and assumed the title of Protector, was to make peace with the United Provinces, and Monk, who then lay with the fleet on their coasts, remonstrated with warmth to the Parliament against that measure. Cromwell was displeasand is said to have entertained doubts of his fidelity; and Monk, who had perhaps been too imperfectly apprised of the true posture of politics at home to enable him, according to his custom, to regulate his conduct to their complexion, returned, and, in a single closet audience, satisfied the Protector of his perfect devotion. The Scots, anxious to lighten the load of treachery which hung so heavily on their fame, soon after appeared again in arms for the Crown, and he was sent in April, 1654, to reduce them, with an army of which he was appointed commander-in-chief. He was again successful, and the war, if it deserved that name, was terminated by him in less than four months.

He remained there, singly, for nearly a year, ruling, however mildly, by the authority of the sword, when Cromwell appointed seven persons to govern that country, under the denomination of his Council of State for Scotland, and Monk, who was named among them, seems immediately to have assumed, with the tacit consent of his colleagues, the direction of all affairs there. He exercised his power, which was nearly absolute, with remarkable discretion and mildness, and was so affable, which seemed to those who best knew him not well to accord with his nature, towards the leaders of all parties, that Cromwell became jealous of his popularity, and secretly employed various artifices to abate it. Monk's obedience, however, was invariable: he executed with the utmost punctuality all orders that were sent to him; imparted from time to time the minor plots of the loyalists which came to his knowledge: and disclosed to Oliver, with an ostentatious promptitude, a letter, in terms too general to attract suspicion to himself, which he had received from Charles, then at Cologne. Meanwhile he foresaw the downfall of the new and unnatural system by which his country was now ruled, and had probably already determined on taking that part which it fell however to his lot to perform somewhat sooner than he expected. His long absence from the seat of government, for he remained in Scotland for five years, had peculiarly aided him in his endeavours to bring it gradually to maturity. Cromwell during that period watched him with the keenest suspicion, but the caution and vigilance of the General eluded the possibility of specific accusation. This conflict of cunning seems at last to have assumed the air of a sportive trial of skill between two adepts. Cromwell, shortly before his death, wrote a long letter of business to Monk, with the following postscript:—"There be that tell me that there is a certain sly fellow in Scotland called George Monk, who is said to lie in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart. I pray you use your diligence to apprehend him, and send him up to me."

Oliver, however, on his death-bed particularly recommended Monk to his son as a counsellor, of which Richard, on his accession to the usurped sovereignty, immediately apprised him. He answered by an address, full of professions of fidelity, in which he was joined by his officers; and by private letters, in which he advised the new Protector to call a Parliament; to encourage a learned, pious, and moderate ministry in the church; to permit no councils to be held by military men; and to endeavour to make himself master of the army; and he lost no time in proclaiming Richard in Scotland. The poor man endeavoured to follow his directions on all those points, and by so doing completely unhinged the loose remains of an ill-constructed government, which the courage and the talents of Oliver had with difficulty held together. The army, enraged at its attempts to curb their power, and aided by the whole body of the fanatical clergy, forced him to dissolve his new Parliament within five months after it had been elected; and the remains of that which had been last dismissed by Oliver took their places in the House of Commons, in contempt of his authority, and on the mere invitation of the military. Their first acts were to abrogate the office of Protector, and to ordain what they called a Commonwealth, and Monk readily joined in their measures, and subscribed with his officers the engagement required by them against the placing of any single person at the head of the government, but particularly Charles Stuart. This wretched counterfeit of a Parliament was presently after obliged to yield also to the army, which elected a new body of administration, under the title of a Committee of Safety, the last phantom of expiring rebellion.

While these matters were passing, Monk remained in Scotland, apparently occupied merely in his government of that country, and in his military command there. When he interfered in affairs at home, it was with great wisdom, gravity, and temper, and with a show of the most perfect disinterestedness, and he never offered his advice unasked. This conduct, in a time when almost all other public characters were deservedly despised for their folly, or hated for their dishonesty, had gained him a mighty popularity. The nation gradually accustomed itself to look to him for relief, with a daily increasing confidence, and to trust at length implicitly to his judgment, and his good intentions, for the means. This disposition in the people was much increased by the treachery of an abortive attempt made by the Committee of Safety to seize his person at his residence at Dalkeith, and to send him to London in a frigate, which lay for that purpose in Leith Roads, and the discovery of that plot accelerated the opening of the great scene which he had long meditated. In the meantime he carried on a constant correspondence with the Parliament, which continued to sit, though with scarcely any shadow of authority, and had the address to persuade that body that it was his sincere intention to aid it to his utmost in the establishment of a republic. From his brother, Nicholas Monk, a clergyman, and his brother-in-law Clarges, who were the instruments of that intercourse, though both were royalists, and more in his confidence than any other men, he concealed his design with equal caution. The Committee of Safety at length sent several regiments against him under Lambert and Fleetwood, and this military motion, which he affected to consider as an act of rebellion against the Parliament, furnished him with a pretext to march to London with his army, professedly for the defence of that body.

He was received with all respect, and with great demonstrations of joy, and the palace of Whitehall was assigned for his residence. On the sixth of February, 1659, he was introduced with extraordinary ceremonies to the Parliament, where, modestly standing behind a crimson velvet chair which had been placed for him, he amused them with a short speech, thanking God for having made him the instrument of restoring them, acknowledging fully their authority, and warning them equally against the machinations of cavaliers and fanatics. Just at this period, the corporation of London, whether in private concert with Monk, or merely in its inveterate inclination to lend its wisdom to the concerns of the State, protested vehemently against the authority of the House, on the ground of the exclusion of the existing members of the Long Parliament. A vote was hastily passed, directing the general to arrest, by military force, the most active of those citizens. He remonstrated against the severity of the measure; received a more peremptory order; and, instead of obeying it, marched his troops, which were entirely devoted to him, into the city, and joined it in its defiance of the House. A great number of that body, as well as the whole of the secluded members, having now discovered the vast extent of his influence, flocked around him at his call. He once more formed, by his own authority, a governing power, which, without wasting time in considering what denomination it should assume, passed some resolutions, the most important of which were for the abrogation of the engagement made in the preceding December, "to be true to the Commonwealth of England, without a King, or a House of Lords;" and for the calling a new Parliament, to meet on the twenty-fifth of April, 1660. It became now clear to all discerning men, that his intention was to restore a kingly authority. The old leaders among the regicides, to avoid its falling into the hands of Charles, whose vengeance they dreaded, determined to offer it to Monk, whom they mortally hated, and used the strongest arguments that they could devise to persuade him, but he positively refused. He still, however, studiously concealed his sentiments, nor was it till within a few days before the meeting of the Parliament that he suffered them to be imparted to Charles himself, by Sir John Granville, the first person of the many whom the King had from time to time deputed to him that he had admitted to the slightest communication. The Restoration immediately followed.

Monk received his rewards with the same appearance of modesty and simplicity which had always distinguished him. Charles, immediately upon his landing, invested him with the Order of the Garter, and, within a few days, called him to the Privy Council, and appointed him Master of the Horse, and Commander-in-chief of the Forces. He was soon after made first Commissioner of the Treasury, and created Baron Monk, Earl of Torrington, and Duke of Albemarle. To these honours were added the grant of an estate of inheritance of the annual value of seven thousand pounds, and other pecuniary gifts to a great amount. When he took his seat with the Peers, the Commons, a compliment never before practised, waited on him in a body to the door of that House: indeed the benefit which he had conferred on his country was far beyond the reach of any compensation which dignities and wealth could convey. He was afterwards appointed Lord Lieutenant of the counties of Devonshire and Middlesex, and of the borough of Southwark, and in 1664, the management of the Admiralty was committed to his charge. In the following year he was joined to Prince Rupert in the command of the fleet, and in the spring of 1666 sailed once more against the Dutch, and engaged them in a most severe action, the result of which, though all concur in their testimony to the bravery of the English and their leader, has been very differently reported by party writers. This, if we except his being again placed at the head of the Treasury, on the death of the Earl of Southampton, in May, 1667, was his last public employment. The prodigious activity and fatigue of his life had produced a premature decay in a body naturally of great strength. He became dropsical and asthmatic about that period, and, after many amendments and relapses, died at the Cockpit, which had been given to him by the King for his residence, on the third of January, 1670-1; and was buried with prodigious pomp, at the public charge, in Westminster Abbey.

The narrow limits of a work like this prohibit the possibility of attempting to give any detail of a character in which the principal features were invariable caution and reserve, or to estimate the conduct of one, every public act of whose life, till he had attained to the summit of his grandeur, seemed calculated to excite the most opposite passions and prejudices in the minds of conflicting factions. The consideration of Monk's mysterious singularities seems to have confused not only the general judgment, but even the political prejudices, of the two great historical writers of his time, for we might have fairly presumed that he had been long enough a rebel to incur the enmity of Lord Clarendon, and to ensure the good graces of Burnet: and yet Clarendon is his best apologist, and the Bishop the bitterest of his traducers. The former tells us that "when the war broke out in England between the King and the Parliament, Monk fell under some discountenance, upon a suspicion of an inclination to the Parliament;" but that it proceeded "from his want of bitterness in his discourses against them, rather than from any inclination towards them;" that, when he soon after openly turned his back on the crown, and accepted from the rebels a command in their army in Ireland, he did it "because he had pleased himself with an opinion that he did not therein serve against the King:" that the warmth afterwards of his fidelity to Cromwell, notwithstanding, was such that "those of his western friends who thought best of him" (meaning of his inclination to loyalty) "thought it to no purpose to make any attempt upon him whilst Cromwell lived:" and yet, that, "as soon as he was dead, Monk was generally looked upon as a man more inclined to the King than any other in great authority, if he might discover it without too much loss or hazard." But the most astonishing of all the noble writer's assertions respecting him is, that "his professions were so sincere, he being throughout his life never suspected of dissimulation, that all men thought him worthy of trust." It may be observed here, but with no view of charging the virtuous Clarendon with an interested partiality, that for many years following the Restoration, a constant friendship and agreement, as well in political as in private life, subsisted between Monk and himself, though Monk in the end joined the Chancellor's enemies.

Burnet loses no opportunity of defaming him. If we are to give credit to that writer, we must believe that Monk, to use the Bishop's own words, had a very small share in accomplishing the Restoration without bloodshed, though he obtained both the praise and the reward: that the only service he did in the prosecution of that great affair was in seizing the proper moment for proposing it to the Parliament: that, if he had died soon after, he might have been more justly admired, because less known, and seen only in one advantageous light; but that he lived long enough to make it known how false a judgment men are apt to put upon outward appearance: that he and his wife were ravenous, and asked and sold all that was within their reach, nothing being denied to them, till he became so useless, that little personal regard could be paid to him: that on the prosecution of the Earl of Argyle, he had sent to Scotland, with an inexcusable baseness, certain private letters which Argyle had written to him during the rebellion, to be used as evidence on that nobleman's trial: that he was the chief adviser of the sale of Dunkirk, and of Charles's unpopular match with the Infanta of Portugal. Burnet's censures are perhaps just;

for, if we strip the character of Monk of the different varnishes which have been applied to it, the truth seems to be, that he was little more than a great and fortunate military adventurer, who seldom suffered scruples of conscience to stand in the way of his successes.

Monk possessed, in a decent degree, the talent of literary composition. "This man," says Lord Orford, "was an author; a light in which he is by no means known, and yet in which he did not want merit. After his death, was published by authority, a treatise in his own profession, which he composed while a prisoner in the Tower, called 'Observations upon Military and Political Affairs, written by the most honourable George, Duke of Albemarle,' " &c. It consists of thirty chapters, and was placed by him in the hands of his friend and patron the Viscount Lisle, by whose direction it was published in 1671; several of his letters and speeches have also been printed. He married a person who had lived with him some years in a less reputable way, Ann Clarges, a milliner, the daughter of a blacksmith in Drury-lane, and had by her an only child. "Her brother, T. Clarges," says Aubrey, in his Sketches of the Lives of Eminent Men, lately published, "came a ship-board to General Monk, and told him his sister was brought to bed. 'Of what?' said he—'Of a son.'—'Why then,' said he, 'she is my wife.'" She was a woman of masculine character and furious temper, and of considerable powers of mind, and it has been said that Monk had so good an opinion of her understanding, that he often consulted her in great emergencies. She survived her husband but for a few days. Their son, Christopher, who was sixteen years old at the time of his father's death, in whose bedchamber he had been married two days before that event, to Elizabeth, daughter of Lord Ogle, inherited, together with the honours, a real estate of the clear annual rent of fifteen thousand pounds, and sixty thousand pounds in money. He died, however, in 1688, in the flower of his age, without issue ; the titles became extinct ; and the most part of his great fortune, after a tedious suit between his kinsman, John Granville, Earl of Bath, and the Earl, afterwards first Duke, of Montagu, who had married his widow, was decreed, by the Lord Keeper Somers, to the Earl of Bath.

EDWARD MONTAGUE,

EARL OF MANCHESTER.

OB. 1671

EDWARD MONTAGU,

SECOND EARL OF MANCHESTER.

A PASSAGE in Lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion exhibits so many particulars of the early life of this nobleman, and of his entrance on the part which he took in the affairs of that unhappy time, that it will perhaps be better to place it here, as a useful introduction to the sketch which will follow, than to reserve it (as has been a sort of custom in the composition of these Memoirs, with respect to quotations from the noble historian) to illustrate preceding statements, and to decorate the termination.

“ The Lord Mandevile, eldest son of the Lord Privy Seal, was a person of great civility, and very well bred, and had been early in the Court, under the favour of the Duke of Buckingham, a lady of whose family he had married. He had attended upon the Prince when he was in Spain, and had been called to the House of Peers in the lifetime of his father, by the name of the Lord Kimbolton, which was a very extraordinary favour. Upon the death of the Duke of Buckingham, his wife being likewise dead, he married the daughter of the Earl of Warwick, a man in no grace at Court, and looked upon as the greatest patron of the puritans, because of much the greatest estate of all who favoured them, and so was esteemed by them with great application and veneration, though he was of a life very licentious, and un-conformable to their professed rigour, which they rather dispensed with than they would withdraw from a house where they received so eminent a protection, and such notable bounty. Upon this latter marriage, the Lord Mandevile totally estranged himself from the Court, and upon all occasions appeared enough to dislike what was done there, and engaged himself wholly in the conversation of those who were most notoriously of that party, whereof there was a kind of fraternity of many persons of good condition, who chose to live together in one family, at a gentleman's house of a fair fortune, near the place where the Lord Mandevile lived, whither others of that class likewise resorted, and maintained a joint and mutual correspondence and conversation together, with much familiarity and friendship; that Lord, to support, and the better to improve that popularity, living at a much higher rate than the narrow exhibition allowed to him by his wary father could justify, making up the rest by contracting a great debt, which lay heavy upon him; by which generous way of living, and by his natural civility, good manners, and good nature, which flowed towards all men, he was universally acceptable and beloved, and no man more in the confidence of the discontented and factious party than he, and none to whom the whole mass of their designs, as well what remained in chaos as what was formed, was more entirely communicated, and no man more consulted with."

This nobleman, who was born in the year 1602, and whom we find frequently designated, as he is in the above extract, by the title of Lord Mandevile, and, yet more frequently, though not quite correctly, by that of Lord Kimbolton, was the eldest son of an eminent lawyer and statesman, Henry Montagu (who was created a Baron and Viscount by James, and Earl of Manchester by Charles the First) by his first lady, Catherine, daughter to Sir William Spencer, of Yarnton, in Oxfordshire. His education is said to have been much neglected, yet he studied, or was supposed to study, in the university of Cambridge, where we find that he remained till he had taken the degree of Master of Arts, and afterwards, as we have already seen, attended Charles on his remarkable visit to Madrid, and was one of the numerous Knights of the Bath created on the occasion of his presently succeeding Coronation. He was returned to serve in the first Parliament called by that Prince, for the county of Huntingdon, which he represented also in the three which successively followed, when he was summoned to the House of Peers by his father's title of Baron Montagu of Kimbolton. Here he was led by the influence of a family connection to join the discontented party, at a period when it was no discredit to belong to it, but seems to have used little activity in its service till it began to lose that character. We first hear of him in any public capacity in 1640, at the treaty with the Scottish rebels at Ripon, for which he was one of the fifteen commissioners, all of whom the King was obliged by the necessity of the time to select from that faction. In the same ineffectual view of conciliation he was very soon after summoned, with several other Peers of the same class, in a body, to the Privy Council. These steps however seemed but to increase his adverse zeal, which was peculiarly manifested in the prosecution of Strafford, though it has since appeared that he condescended at that very time to listen complacently to a proposal made by the King that he should succeed his father in the office of Lord Privy Seal.

But an unhappy circumstance which immediately followed cut off probably all hope of reclaiming him. He was one of the party of six, and the only one of the Upper House, who were, on the fourth of January, 164 $\frac{1}{2}$, rashly impeached of high treason. As his conduct on that occasion was in no way distinguished from that of the five members of the Commons, little need be said of it than that he fled with them into the City, and a few days after joined them in their triumphant return to Parliament; but it created much surprise on all hands that he should have been singled out from his compeers, among whom were so many whose guilt was of a dye far deeper; for, says a great historian of the time, after expressing that opinion, "the Lord Kimbolton was a civil and well-natured man, and had rather kept ill company than drank deep of that infection and poison that had wrought upon many others." Whatever might have been the motive for this proceeding individually against him, the effect of it, joined to that of the incessant recurrence to it, as an act of the most horrible injustice, in the various remonstrances and petitions of the Parliament with which the King was now daily beset, was to drive him into open rebellion. One of the first acts of preparation for war was to appoint him, and the five impeached members of the Commons, severally to the command of Regiments, which they most readily accepted.

His first appearance in this new capacity was in the battle of Edge Hill, where, as his name is not mentioned in any relation of the action, it may be concluded that his regiment was not engaged. On the fourteenth day after it was fought, his father died, and he became Earl of Manchester. This event perhaps necessarily withdrew him for a time from the army, but he was not without other engagements which warranted his absence, for about the middle of the following January, we find him, with others of both Houses, attending, by order of the Parliament, a common hall of the citizens of London, assembled to receive the King's answer to a petition couched in terms somewhat more decent than were at that time usual, which had been presented to him by the corporation some days before at Oxford. On this occasion he made a speech, which has been preserved, little remarkable but for the anxiety which it betrays to prevent any good effect from the correspondence thus opened between his Majesty and the City.

We hear of him no more in the field till the autumn of 1643, when the Parliament, thrown into some consternation by a short tide of success which had flowed in on the military affairs of the Royalists, as well as by a refractory spirit which had of late appeared in their General, the Earl of Essex, passed an ordinance for the levy of a great army, to be commanded by the Earl of Manchester, and at the same time invested him with the charge of what were called the associated counties, which were Hertford, Essex, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Lincoln. This disposition excited some surprise in the army, and more in the country. It seemed like a preference of zeal and good temper to military experience, but the event justified their choice, the true ground of which however had been to set up a rival to Essex. Manchester spared neither activity nor money in raising troops: Oliver Cromwell was appointed to command his horse; and the army was ordered to march northwards. This route however was presently altered to the direction towards Norfolk, where the Earl had no sooner arrived, than he reduced the town of Lynn, and then, marching into Lincolnshire, engaged at Horncastle the army under the Earl of Newcastle with the most signal success, and afterwards took the town of Lincoln by storm. He now proceeded to join in the siege of York, which soon after surrendered, and had a principal share in the battle of Marston Moor, so fatal to the royal cause; after which, returning westward, and seizing on his way several smaller garrisons in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, he arrived in the neighbourhood of the army under the command of the King in person, in time to be present at the second battle of Newbury, in which he was engaged with his whole force, and with alternate good and ill fortune.

As to the degree of credit due to the sagacious and intrepid Cromwell on the score of these important successes, we will not inquire; thus much however is certain, that immediately after the battle of Newbury he manifested the greatest possible discontent, and that a similar disposition, almost simultaneously, and doubtless prompted by him, broke out in the governing power at Westminster. Cromwell, after indulging for a short time in indistinct murmurs, determined to make the Earl the subject of a specific criminal charge, and this was the first feature developed of the vast plan in the fruition of which that extraordinary person became master of the three kingdoms. Take it in the words of Lord Clarendon, always authentic, and in this instance concise. Those who may be desirous of a more full statement on this singular subject, mostly extracted from the reports of republican writers, will find it in a work which rarely deals in matters of any curiosity, Collins's Peerage.

"Cromwell," says Lord Clarendon, "accused the Earl of Manchester of having betrayed the Parliament out of cowardice, for that he might, at the King's last being at Newbury, when he drew off his cannon, very easily have defeated his whole army if he would have permitted it to have been engaged. That he went to him, and showed him evidently how it might be done, and desired him that he would give him leave, with his own brigade of Horse, to charge the King's army in their retreat; and the Earl, with the rest of his army, might look on, and do as he should think fit; but that the Earl had, notwithstanding all importunity used by him and other officers, positively and obstinately refused to permit him, giving no other reason but that, he said if they did engage, and overthrow the King's army, the King would always have another army to keep up the war; but if that army which he commanded should be overthrown before the other, under the Earl of Essex, should be reinforced, there would be an end of their pretences, and they should be all rebels and traitors, and forfeited and executed by the law."

The Earl justified himself at great length, and, seemingly consoled by the tacit forbearance of the Parliament to enter into any examination of the charge, bore the cruel insult that he had received with great philosophy. He was deprived of his command in 1645 by "the self-denying ordinance," and afterwards accepted the office of Speaker of the small remnant of the House of Lords, which he abandoned in the summer of 1647; put himself under the protection of the army which

Cromwell had encamped on Hounslow Heath, to be in readiness to possess him of the government ; and submitted to be led back, and replaced in the chair, by his hand. We hear no more of him during the usurpation, except that he was base enough to sit among the Peers of Cromwell's new contrivance. History surely cannot furnish a parallel instance of nearly perfect dereliction of all that we ought to esteem noble and generous. A single degradation yet remained. He seized on it, and descended to the utmost——when the Restoration approached he was among the first who presented themselves to the councils which were held to accomplish it. He was a man too powerful to be rejected, and indeed rendered on that great occasion important services, which were most amply rewarded. Charles the Second called him to the Privy Council, appointed him Lord High Chamberlain, and gave him the Order of the Garter ; he was restored to the office of Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, which he had before held for a while during the rebellion, and, on the meeting of Parliament, he was constituted first Commissioner of the Great Seal, and Speaker of the House of Peers, in which character he addressed a congratulatory oration to the King on his arrival at Whitehall.

Edward, Earl of Manchester, died on the fifth of May, 1671. He had been no less than five times married ; first to Susannah, daughter of John Hill, of Honiley, in Warwickshire, who died shortly after without issue ; secondly, to Anne, daughter of Robert Rich, Earl of Warwick, by whom he had Robert, who succeeded to his titles and estates, and two daughters ; Frances, married to Henry, son and heir of Robert Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln ; and Anne, to her kinsman, Robert Rich, first Earl of Warwick and Holland ; his third lady was Essex, daughter of Sir Thomas Cheek, of Pyrge, in Essex, and relict of Sir Robert Bevil, who brought him six sons ; Edward ; Henry ; Charles ; Thomas ; Sydney ; and George ; and two daughters ; Essex, wife to Henry Ingram, Viscount Irwin ; and Lucy. He married, fourthly

Eleanor, daughter of Sir Richard Wortley, of Wortley, in Yorkshire, Bart., and widow of Sir Henry Lee, of Quarendon, in Bucks, Bart.; and, fifthly, Margaret, daughter of Francis, fourth Earl of Bedford, of the Russels, and widow of James Hay, first Earl of Carlisle, of his family. He had no issue by either of his two last Countesses.

ANNE HYDE,
DUCHESS OF YORK.

OB. 1671.

ANNE HYDE,

DUCHESS OF YORK.

THIS lady, whom an accident of passion placed so near to a throne, and who gave birth to two sovereigns, whose reigns form perhaps the most brilliant, at least the most remarkable epoch in our history, was the eldest of the two daughters of that wise and virtuous Chancellor, Edward Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, by Frances, daughter, and at length heir of Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Knight and Baronet, a Master of the Requests in the reign of Charles the First. The circumstances relating to her marriage with the Duke of York, afterwards our James the Second, form nearly the whole of her story; for though she possessed a proud spirit, and a powerful understanding, she seems neither to have aspired to any open influence on state affairs, nor to have mixed in the political intrigues which so eminently distinguished her time. So too in her private life we meet but with passing rumours of the usual errors of a woman of much beauty, and strong passions, raised suddenly to unexpected elevation—of those domestic extravagances, which, by destroying the peace, and distracting the interests, of illustrious families, render their memoirs delightful to posterity.

James himself speaks thus of her, and of their marriage, in the very curious memoirs of his own life, preserved in the Scotch College at Paris, numerous extracts from which may be found in Macpherson's fine Collection of Original Papers. Those memoirs, in which he always mentions himself in the third person, place the character of that unfortunate and imprudent Prince in a more advantageous light than popular prejudice had before allowed to fall on it, and there can be little doubt of their truth and sincerity. "When his sister, the Princess Royal," says he, "came to Paris, to see the Queen Mother, the Duke of York fell in love with Mrs. Anne Hyde, one of her maids of honour. Beside her person, she had all the qualities proper to inflame a heart less apt to take fire than his; which she managed so well as to bring his passion to such a height, as between the time he first saw her, and the winter before the King's restoration, he resolved to marry none but her, and promised her to do it; and though at first, when the Duke asked the King, his brother, for his leave, he refused, and dissuaded him from it, yet at last he opposed it no more, and the Duke married her privately; owned it some time after; and was ever after a true friend to the Chancellor." He says, in another place, that "her want of birth was made up by endowments, and her carriage afterwards became her dignity."

Lord Clarendon in his own life, naturally enough enlarges widely on a subject so important and so dear to him. He tells us that James disclosed the fact of his private marriage to the King, immediately after the restoration; informed him that the Duchess was with child; and besought his brother to suffer him to marry her publicly. Charles, whose indolent good temper nothing could ruffle, listened patiently, and even kindly, to the news, and sent the Marquis of Ormond, and the Earl of Southampton, two of the Chancellor's dearest friends, to break the matter to him; for he declares, and his veracity has never been doubted, that he had not the smallest suspicion of it. The temper in which he received it will best appear from his own words—"He broke out into immoderate passion against his daughter, and said, with all imaginable earnestness, that as soon as he came home he would turn her out of his house as a strumpet, to shift for herself, and would never see her again." And, on their assuring him that she was married to the Duke, he fell into yet greater passion, and exclaimed that "he had rather his daughter should be the Duke's whore than his wife: that, in the former case, no one could blame him for the resolution he had taken, for he was not obliged to keep a whore for the greatest Prince alive, and the indignity to himself he would submit to the good pleasure of God; but, if there were any reason to suspect the other, he was ready to give a positive judgment, in which he hoped the King would concur with him—that the King should immediately cause the woman to be cast into a dungeon, under so strict a guard that no person living should be admitted to come to her; and then that an act of parliament should be immediately passed for the cutting off her head; to which he would not only give his consent, but would very willingly be the first man that should propose it: and whoever knew the man," concludes the Chancellor, still speaking of himself, "will believe that he said all this very heartily." Bishop Burnet, who detested James, and whose word should always be taken with caution, where his passions were concerned, says, rather obscurely, that "she, being with child, called on the Duke to own the marriage, and managed the matter with so much address, that in conclusion he married her, and that he thought to have shaken her from claiming it by great promises, and as great threatenings, but she was a woman of great spirit, and would have it known that she was so, let him use her afterwards as he pleased."

Charles, who certainly had a great affection for his brother, and perhaps little less for the Chancellor, so far from testifying any displeasure, amiably placed himself as a mediator among the parties; but new difficulties presently arose, which even his power could not compose. The Queen Mother, enraged to the utmost, wrote to him from Paris, to inform him that she should instantly set out for England, to do all she could to prevent such a dishonour to the crown. She came, and James, whose conduct in his trying situation seems, in spite of the report of Burnet, to have hitherto been equally firm and honourable, was weak enough to deny his marriage to his mother. In the mean time a party in the Duke's family, headed by Berkeley, Earl of Falmouth, a man whose heroic exit afterwards somewhat atoned for a vile life, availed themselves of these dissensions, in the hope of working the downfall of the Chancellor. Their envy and malice had been raised to the highest pitch, by new favours lately conferred on him by the King ; for Charles, eager to testify his determination to protect his old and faithful servant, had created him a Baron, and added to that dignity a grant of twenty thousand pounds, in the midst of the confusion occasioned at court by the disclosure of the marriage. They contrived to convey indirectly to James the most injurious reports of the Duchess's conduct previously to her union with him ; and he, having easily discovered the authors, resolved to examine them personally. The detail of his intercourse with them, and its consequences, is to be met with only in the Memoires de Grammont, and is given with an ease and vivacity which will render any apology unnecessary, either for quoting the very words of the original, or for the length of the extract.

“ Au milieu de ces différentes agitations il s'ouvrit à Milord Falmouth, et le consulta sur le parti qu'il devoit prendre. Il ne pouvoit mieux s'adresser pour ses intérêts, ni plus mal pour Mademoiselle Hyde. Falmouth lui soutint d'abord, non seulement qu'il n'étoit pas marié, mais qu'il étoit impossible qu'il y eut jamais songé : qu'un mariage étoit nul pour lui sans le consentement du Roi, quand même le parti se fût trouvé d'ailleurs sortable ; mais que c'étoit une mocquerie de mettre en jeu la fille d'un petit avocat, que la faveur du Roi venoit de faire Pair du royaume sans noblesse, et Chancelier sans capacité : qu'à l'égard de ses scrupules il n'avoit qu'à vouloir bien écouter des gens qui l'instruiraient à fond de la conduite que Mademoiselle Hyde avoit tenue avant qu'il la connût, et que, pourvû qu'il ne leur dit point que la chose fût déjà faite, il auroit bien tôt de quoi le déterminer. Le Duc d'York y consentit, et Milord Falmouth, ayant assemblé son conseil et sestemoins, les mena dans le cabinet de son Altesse, après les avoir instruits de ce qu'on leur vouloit. Ces messieurs étoient le Comte d'Arran, Germain, Talbot, et Killigrew, tous gens d'honneur, mais qui préféroient infiniment celui du Duc d'York à celui de Mademoiselle Hyde, et qui de plus étoient révoltés, avec toute la cour, contre l'insolente autorité du premier ministre.

“ Le Duc leur ayant dit, après une espèce de préambule, que quoiqu'ils n'ignorassent pas sa tendresse pour Mademoiselle Hyde ils pouvoient ignorer à quels engagements cette tendresse l'avoit porté : qu'il se croyoit obligé de tenir toutes les paroles qu'il avoit pû lui donner ; mais que comme l'innocence des personnes de son âge étoit exposée d'ordinaire aux médisances d'une cour, et que de certains bruits, faux ou véritables, s'étoient répandus au sujet de sa conduite, il les prioit comme amis, et leur ordonnoit par tout ce qu'ils lui devoient, de lui dire sincèrement ce qu'ils en savoient, d'autant qu'il étoit résolu de régler sur leurs témoignages les desseins qu'il avoit pour elle. On se fit un peu tirer l'oreille d'abord, et l'on fit semblant de n'ôser prononcer sur une matière si sérieuse et si délicate ; mais le Duc d'York ayant réitéré ses instances chacun se mit à deduire par le menu ce qu'il savoit, et peut-être ce qu'il ne savoit pas, de la pauvre Hyde. On y joignit toutes les circonstances qu'il falloit pour appuyer les temoignages. Par exemple, le Comte d'Arran, qui parla le premier, déposa que dans la galerie de Honslaerdyk, ou la Comtesse d'Ossory, sa belle sœur, et Germain, jouoient un jour aux quilles, Mademoiselle Hyde avoit fait semblant de se trouver mal, et s'étoit retirée dans une chambre au bout de la galerie ; que lui, déposant, l'avoit suivie, et que lui ayant coupé son lacet, pour donner plus de vraisemblance aux vapeurs, il avoit fait de son mieux pour la secourir, ou pour la desennuyer. Talbot dit qu'elle lui avoit donné un rendez-vous dans le cabinet du Chancelier, tandis qu'il étoit au

Conseil, á telles enseignes que n'ayant pas tant d'attention aux choses qui étoient sur la table ; qu'à celles qui les occupoient alors, ils avoient fait répandre toute l'encre d'une bouteille sur une dépêche de quatre pages ; et que le singe du Roi, qu'on accusoit de ce désordre, en avoit été long tems en disgrâce."

"Germain indiqua plusieurs endroits où il avoit eu des audiences longues et favorables : cependant tous ces chefs d'accusation ne vouloient que sur quelques tendres privautés, ou tout au plus, sur ce qu'on appelle les menus plaisirs d'un commerce ; mais Killigrew, voulant rencherir sur ces foibles dépositions, dit tout net qu'il avoit eu l'honneur de ses bonnes graces. Il avoit l'esprit vif et badin, et savoit donner un tour agréable à ses récits par des figures gracieuses et sensibles. Il assura qu'il avoit trouvé l'heure du berger dans un certain cabinet construit au-dessus de l'eau à toute autre fin que d'être favorable aux empressemens amoureux ; qu'il avoit eu pour témoins de son bonheur trois ou quatre cygnes, qui pouvoient bien avoir été témoins du bonheur de bien d'autres dans se même cabinet, vû qu'elle y alloit souvent, et qu'elle s'y plaisoit fort.

"Le Duc d'York trouva cette dernière accusation outrée, persuadé qu'il avoit par devers lui des preuves suffisantes du contraire. Il remercia messieurs les témoins à bonne fortune de leur franchise ; leur imposa silence à l'avenir sur ce qu'ils venoient de lui déclarer ; et passa dans l'appartement du Roi. Dès qu'il fut dans son cabinet Milord Falmouth, qui l'avoit suivi, conta ce qui venoit de se passer au Comte d'Ossory, qu'il trouva chez le Roy. Ils se doutèrent bien de ce qui faiscit la conversation des deux frères, car elle fut longue. Le Duc d'York en sortant parut tellement émû qu'ils ne doutèrent point que tout n'allat mal pour la pauvre Hyde. Milord Falmouth commençoit à s'attendrir de sa grace, et se repentoit un peu de la part qu'il y avoit eue, lorsque le Duc d'York lui dit de se trouver, avec le Comte d'Ossory, chez le Chancelier dans une heure."

“Ils furent un peu surpris qu’il eût la dureté d’annoncer lui-même cette accablante nouvelle. Ils trouvèrent à l’heure marquée son Altesse dans la chambre de Mademoiselle Hyde. Ses yeux paroissent mouillés de quelques larmes, qu’elle s’efforçoit de retenir. Le Chancelier, appuyé contre la muraille, leur parut bouffi de quelque chose. Ils ne doutèrent point que ce fut de rage et de desespoir. Le Duc d’York leur dit, de cet air content et serein dont on annonce les bonnes nouvelles—‘Comme vous êtes les deux hommes de la cour que j’estime du plus, je veux que vous ayez les premiers l’honneur de saluer la Duchesse d’York—la voilà.’

“La surprise ne servoit de rien, et l’étonnement n’étoient pas de saison dans cette conjoncture. Ils en étoient pourtant si remplis que pour s’en cacher ils se jetèrent promptement à genoux, pour baiser la main, qu’elle leur tendit avec autant de grandeur et de majesté que si de sa vie elle n’eût fait autre chose.”

Lord Clarendon informs us that Falmouth afterwards confessed fully to James the falsehood of all the charges which had been thus made by himself and his conspirators, and received the Duke’s pardon. From that ill-judged lenity perhaps, as well as from the slander itself, other gallantries were subsequently ascribed to the Duchess. Grammont, an elegant profligate, living in the most profligate court in Europe, speaks largely of a supposed intrigue with Sidney, a younger son of Robert, Earl of Leicester, and a gentleman of the Duke’s bedchamber, and tells us that she went to York in 1664, that she might receive his addresses with the more convenience and privacy; and Burnet adds, that the Duke discovered the amour, and dismissed Sidney with such precipitation and anger that the whole became entirely public; but a passage in Sir John Reresby’s Memoirs tends greatly to invalidate these reports, and indeed expressly contradicts one of them. “His Royal Highness the Duke, and his Duchess,” says Reresby, whose candour is invariable, “came down to York in August, where it was observed that Mr. Sidney, the handsomest youth of his time, and of the Duke's bedchamber, was greatly in love with the Duchess ; and indeed he might be well excused, for the Duchess, daughter to Chancellor Hyde, was a very handsome personage, and a woman of fine wit. The Duchess, on her part, seemed kind to him, but very innocently ; but he had the misfortune to be banished the court afterwards, for another reason, as was reported." Burnet, however, who seems to have delighted in drawing false conclusions from false premises, makes use of this rumour to introduce a long paragraph of disgusting scandal against James, whose debaucheries, he tells us, shortened the lives of the Duchess, and of most of her children, and poisoned the constitutions of the two who survived infancy ; and, not contented with this, affects to trace the venom to its very source, by minutely relating the circumstances of a filthy tale, which may be found in his memoirs of the year 1665. He tells us, also, with equal improbability, that the Duchess, through the discovery of her amour with Sidney, lost the influence which she had over her husband, and that, in the hope of regaining it by flattering his religious prejudices, she determined to embrace the Roman Catholic profession ; and this brings us to one of the most important points of her story.

She had been bred a Protestant, with much strictness, and had always the reputation of a perfect sincerity in that persuasion ; but it was observed for many months before her death that she had not, as usual, received the Sacrament, and that she frequently apologised in conversation for many of those doctrines of the Romish Church which are the most strenuously opposed by the Church of England. At length, on the 20th of August, 1670, she signed, and, as it should seem, in a great measure published, a paper declaring her reconciliation to the ancient religion, in terms so frank and simple, and with so little force or subtlety of argument, as to render it evident that they had been dictated by her own private prejudices, and secretly composed by her own pen. She begins, to use nearly her own words, by calling God to witness that no person, man or woman, directly nor indirectly, had ever said any thing to her since she came into England, or used the least endeavour to make her change her religion ; but that it was a blessing she owed wholly to Almighty God, and to her earnest and constant prayers that she might before she died be in the true religion. That she had entertained no scruples till the preceding November, when, chancing to peruse Dr. Heylin's History of the Reformation, which had been much recommended to her, she found it to contain what seemed to her to be the most horrible sacrileges imaginable, and could find no reason why we left that Church, but three most abominable ones. First, that Henry the Eighth renounced the Pope's authority because he would not give him leave to part with his wife, and marry another in her lifetime ; secondly, because Edward the Sixth was a child, and governed by his uncle, who made his estate out of Church lands ; and, thirdly, because Elizabeth, who was no lawful heiress to the Crown, could have no way to keep it but by renouncing a church that would never suffer so unlawful a thing to be done by one of her children. " I confess," says she, " I cannot think the Holy Ghost to be in such councils." After some wretched reasoning on transubstantiation, the infallibility of the church, confession, and praying for the dead, she concludes thus : " I am not able, nor if I were, would I enter into disputes with any body. I only, in short, say this for the changing of my religion, which I take God to witness I never would have done if I had thought it possible to save my soul otherwise. I think I need not say it is any interest in this world that leads me to it. It will be plain enough to every body that I must lose all the friends and credit I have here by it ; and I have very well weighed which I could best part with, my share in this world, or the next. I thank God I have found no difficulty in the choice."

It has been the fashion of the writers of that time to assert that this lady's abandonment of the Protestant religion was the work of incessant persuasions and threats. It would be absurd to suppose that the approbation, nay the endeavours, of a husband so bigotted as James had been wholly wanting ; but there can be little doubt that the change arose chiefly from her own conscientious inclination. Her father, who had been for some time disgraced, and was then living in exile, regretted this dereliction perhaps more keenly than any of his own misfortunes, and wrote on it to her, and to the Duke, the most earnest expostulations, which however did not arrive till after her death.

The Duchess's constitution had been long declining. She is said to have been very indolent, and a great eater, but there is reason to believe that her end was hastened by domestic anxiety. James was a notoriously unfaithful, and probably negligent, husband ; and the reputation of patience with which she seemed to endure those afflictions was in fact due to the stifled anger of a proud spirit, any active exertion of which might have been worse than useless. Bishop Kennett tells us, that "after a growing corpulency she fell into a long indisposition, and died." Burnet says, that "a long decay of health came at last to a quicker crisis than had been apprehended, and that she fell on a sudden into the pains of death." He adds, that Blandford, Bishop of Worcester, was sent for, to perform the usual offices of the church on such occasions, but that "the Queen being present, he went no further than to say that he hoped she continued in the truth : upon which she asked 'What is truth?' and, her agony increasing, she repeated the word truth, truth, many times, and in a few minutes after, died, very little beloved or lamented, for her haughtiness had raised her many enemies. In another part of his uncharitable memoirs he gives her a high character, still however, with that qualification which it really seems to have required. "The Duchess of York," says he, "was a very extraordinary woman. She had great knowledge, and a lively sense of things. She soon understood what belonged to a Princess, and took state on her rather too much. She writ well, and had begun the Duke's life, of which she shewed me a volume, which was all taken from his own journal. She was generous and friendly, but too severe an enemy."

She died at St. James's Palace, between three and four in the afternoon, on the thirty-first of March, 1671, in the thirty-fourth year of her age, and was buried, as had been all those of her children who died before her, in the vault of Mary Queen of Scots, in Henry the Seventh's Chapel. Of her numerous progeny by the unhappy James none reached maturity except the Queens, Mary the Second, and Anne, her successor. The rest were: Charles, who was born on the twenty-second of October, 1660, and died at Whitehall, on the fifth of May in the following year, while a patent was preparing, to create him Duke and Earl of Cambridge; James, born on the twelfth of July, 1663, who was created Baron of Dauntsey, in Wilts, and Duke and Earl of Cambridge, and invested with the order of the Garter, but died on the twentieth of June, 1666; Charles, born on the fourth of July, in that year, and created Duke of Kendal, who died on the twenty-second of the following May; Edgar, born September the fourteenth, 1667, and also created Duke of Cambridge, but died on the eighth of June, 1671; Henrietta, born on the thirteenth of January, 1668, and died November the fifteenth, 1669; and Catherine, born February the ninth, 1670, who died on the fifth of December, 1671. Burnet, in whom it might have been becoming enough to ascribe the hard and untimely fate of James's line to an interposition of Providence for the protection of the Church of England, has in his inveterate malice to that Prince, thought fit to place it to another account, to which I have before alluded.

EDWARD MONTAGU,

FIRST EARL OF SANDWICH.

THE annals of England present few brighter objects to our view than the character of this eminent person. In thirty years' service, as a soldier, a sailor, and a statesman, such were his uprightness and his prudence, that not the slightest suspicion ever fell reasonably on his public conduct; and such the generosity of his mind, and the sweetness of his temper, that he seems to have lived not only without an enemy, but unassailed, except perhaps in a single instance even by envy. The transcendent purity of his principles enabled him to devote the one half of his life to the rebel government, and the other to the King's, without incurring the reproach of either party. Under the influence of others, and scarcely emerged from boyhood, he engaged with the former, and, joining neither in its intrigues or its hypocrisy, served it with the simplest fidelity: when the spurious sceptre fell from the hand of Richard Cromwell, he proffered his allegiance to Charles, under no temptation or bargain on the one hand, with no sacrifice of principle or betrayal of trust on the other, and was distinguished by the honest zeal which he uniformly displayed in the service of the Crown.

He was the only son of Sir Sidney Montagu, sixth and youngest brother of Edward, first Lord Montagu, of Boughton, by Paulina, third daughter of John Pepys, of Cottenham, in the county of Cambridge, and was born on the twenty-seventh of July, 1625. His father had passed his life in the household service of James and Charles the First; was earnestly attached to their family and to monarchy; and although he had in the beginning of the discontents moderately espoused the popular party in the House of Commons, had been expelled the Long Parliament for refusing to take the absurd oath by which a great majority of its members bound themselves, on the appointment of the Earl of Essex to the command of the rebel army, to "live and die with him." It may be reasonable to presume that the son had received strong impressions of loyalty from such a parent, and so probably he had, when they were presently obliterated by his marriage, at the age of seventeen, to Jemima, daughter of John, Lord Crewe, a nobleman deeply infected by the political schism of the time. Their union took place on the seventh of November, 1642, and the death of his father, not many months after, left him wholly under the influence of this new connexion, and completed his estrangement from the royal party.

The young proselyte was not long unemployed. He received, in August, 1643, a commission from the Parliament to raise a regiment of a thousand men in Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely, and to take the command of it with the title of colonel. It is probable that he owed this early distinction to Cromwell, who was his neighbour in the country, and with whom it is certain that he then, or soon after, formed a personal friendship, warm at least on his part, to which his lasting attachment to the rebel cause seems to have been solely owing. His levies were speedily made, and we find him at the head of his corps, with the troops which stormed Lincoln, on the sixth of May, 1644; in the battle of Marston Moor on the second of the succeeding July; and, in the same month, with the army which then besieged York, where he was appointed one of the Commissioners to receive the capitulation of that city. In the following summer he commanded his regiment at the battle of Naseby, and, a few weeks after, at the siege of Bridgewater; and conducted himself in these several services with so much prudence, as well as bravery, that he was intrusted, in the beginning of September 1645, to lead a brigade of four regiments at the important siege of Bristol, on the surrender of which, in the course of that month, he was despatched by Fairfax and Cromwell to communicate the news to the Parliament.

He had succeeded to his father in the representation of the county of Huntingdon in the House of Commons, and some of his biographers have extolled the public spirit which they say induced him to absent himself from that assembly after it fell under the dominion of the army, in June 1647. He did so, but probably from the mere carelessness of youth, and, it may be presumed, with the approbation of Cromwell, to whom his adherence continued firm. He was besides too young for any but the military purposes of his crafty friend, and the war had now ceased. We lose sight of him therefore for more than five years following that period, when the usurper, on assuming the sovereignty, under the title of Protector, nominated him of the supreme council of fifteen, ordained by the instrument of government provided on that occasion, and shortly after appointed him a Commissioner of the Treasury, and joined him to Desborough, another soldier, for the execution of the office of High Admiral. He now applied himself incessantly to the theory of naval tactics, and with such success that, in the spring of 1656, Cromwell associated him with the gallant Blake, in the command of a fleet, destined to serve in the Mediterranean against the Spaniards, in which expedition, however, little was done beyond the capture of some plate ships in the road of Cadiz. Blake died during this service, and in July, 1657, Montagu was appointed Admiral of the Fleet in the Downs, equipped, as Lord Clarendon tells us, "under the pretence of mediating in the Sound between the Kings of Sweden and Denmark, but in truth to hinder the Dutch from assisting the Dane against the Swede, with whom Oliver was engaged in an inseparable alliance." On this occasion Cromwell secretly designed to use his diplomatic as well as his warlike services

The political talents manifested by him in the Council had not escaped the acuteness of the usurper, to whom too he had of late peculiarly endeared himself by the singular earnestness with which he had argued, not only publicly, but in his private intercourse with Cromwell, for the proposal made to him by his Parliament to assume the title of King. It is said that Montagu was always, to use the strong expression which Lord Clarendon applies to him, even "in love with monarchy;" but in this instance, it must be confessed that, with the common infirmity of ardent lovers, he was blind to the imperfections of the individual object of his affection.

He was with his Fleet, in the Baltic, when Cromwell died. Richard renewed his appointment, and wrote to him, directing him "in all cases, but more particularly in such as might concern the honour of the Flag, rather to use his own discretion than to consider himself bound by the tenor of his orders." On Richard's dismissal, however, from the government, which presently followed, and the assumption of it by his mongrel Parliament, he found a strange reverse. He was already far engaged in a negotiation with the Northern powers, when that assembly issued a new commission, by which they joined with him three of their confidential friends, with the style of plenipotentiaries. Dissensions presently arose among them. One of the party was Algernon Sidney, a cynic in morals, manners, and politics, with whom no man could long agree. To add to his vexation, the Parliament at the same time gave the command of his regiment of horse to another. At this period, Edward Montagu, his cousin, heir to the Lord Montagu of Boughton, a zealous partisan for the excluded Charles, and one of the companions of his flight, disclosed to him the plans which were then ripening in England for the restoration of that Prince. He adopted them without hesitation, and, after a brief communication, by a trusty messenger, with the King, suddenly set sail for England, leaving his brother plenipotentiaries at Copenhagen. When he arrived, however, on the coast, he had the mortification to find that the military insurrection, on which the royalists had built their hopes, had wholly failed, and that the leader, Sir George Booth, was a prisoner in the Tower. Montagu, however, boldly presented himself to the Parliament amidst much clamour; alleged that he had been compelled to return by shortness of provisions; and produced a minute of the concurrence of his flag officers to that effect. He then resigned his command, and the Parliament, abundantly occupied with other causes, which began to threaten its very existence, agreed to defer any further examination of his matter till the coming of the other three commissioners. He was suffered, therefore, says Lord Clarendon, "to go quietly into the country, and remained neglected and forgotten, till they could be more at leisure (for it was then about the time they grew jealous of Lambert), till those revolutions were over which were produced by Lambert's invasion upon the Parliament, and General Monck's march into England; and till near the time that the name and title of that Parliament was wholly abolished and extinguished; and then the secluded members, being restored, called him to resume the command of the fleet."

Monck, as a compliment to that General, was joined with him in this command, which was not confined, as might be inferred from the terms used by Clarendon, to the fleet which he had left in the Baltic, but extended to the entire navy. It was in fact what would have been termed, in times of regular government, a commission for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of England. Montagu, to prove the sincerity of his professions, sent privately to request, and it is needless to say obtained, the King's ratification of the appointment; and Lawson, a celebrated seaman, but an anabaptist republican, to whom the authority of that station had been intrusted, and who had filled the fleet with persons of his own persuasion, consented, without a murmur, to serve under him. The Restoration, to be complete, now waited only for forms, to which Montagu's impatience could not submit. He set sail to the coast of Holland without orders from the Parliament, to the great offence of many members of that body, leaving only two or three of the smaller ships, to convey those who were appointed to wait on the King with a regular invitation. On his arrival, he surrendered his command to the Duke of York, who was appointed High Admiral; and a few days after, received Charles on board his own ship, and on the twenty-sixth of May, 1660, landed him triumphantly at Dover. The King, while on his road to London, sent Sir Edward Walker to the Downs, to invest him with the ensigns of the Garter, and on the twelfth of the following July, advanced him to the Peerage, by the titles of Baron Montagu of St. Neots, Viscount Hinchinbroke, and Earl of Sandwich. Nearly at the same time, he was sworn of the Privy Council, and appointed Admiral of the Narrow Seas, Vice-Admiral of England, and Master of the King's Wardrobe.

In June, 1631, he sailed on an expedition against the piratical states of Barbary, and made a gallant but unsuccessful attack on Algiers, from whence he retired, leaving Lawson, with a force sufficient to block up that port, and visited Tangier, a city on the same coast, which it will be recollected formed the main part of the marriage portion of Catherine of Braganza, and of which he now took formal possession in the name of his master. Having placed an English garrison there, under the command of the Earl of Peterborough, he proceeded to Lisbon, where, having officiated as proxy for Charles in the ceremony of espousing that Lady, she embarked on board his ship, and on the fourteenth of May, 1662, he presented her at Portsmouth to the King, her husband. Two years of peace succeeded, when, in 1664, on the resolution for a war with the Dutch, the commencement of which was so long deferred, he took the command of a fleet of observation, which was no otherwise employed till the month of March, in the following year, when the war being declared, he was appointed to lead the blue squadron, under the Duke of York, who now personally acted as High Admiral. The opening of the campaign was eminently successful. Nearly two hundred rich merchantmen fell into the hands of the English, and, on the third of June, a general engagement occurred, in which eighteen of the finest ships of war in the Dutch service were captured, and fourteen destroyed, in one of which was blown up Opdam, the commander of their fleet. In this action Sandwich practised, perhaps for the first time, the bold expedient, a repetition of which in our day has justly acquired so much credit, of breaking the enemy's line, which accelerated a victory that his skill and bravery had before rendered inevitable.

The fleet now returned to England to refit, and, the Duke having relinquished the command to Sandwich, he sailed from Torbay in the beginning of July for the Texel, where finding that it would be long before the enemy's fleet could again put to sea, he steered northward, with the double view of intercepting a squadron under the celebrated De Ruyter, on its return from Newfoundland, and of falling in with the Turkey and East India fleets, which were said to have anchored for a while at Bergen. Neither of these enterprises succeeded : De Ruyter passed the English, under cover of a fog, with the loss only of eight ships of war, and arrived safely in Holland ; and the usual vigour of the Earl is said to have been restrained at Bergen by his doubts on the actual state of a negotiation which he knew to be in progress between Charles and the King of Denmark. He captured however a great number of rich merchant ships, and received on his return abundant proofs that this partial miscarriage had not impaired his reputation in the opinion either of the King or the people : yet in that moment the keenest vexation that he had ever suffered was closely impending. On his voyage homeward, his flag officers had besought him to distribute among them some part of the merchandise which had been taken, to which he consented, all parties seeming to have forgotten, as probably they really had, the admiralty rule, that bulk, as it is called, of any captured ship shall not be broken till it be brought into port, and adjudged to be lawful prize. Sandwich had, however, the precaution to apply for the King's approbation, which he obtained, but he had put the measure into execution before it arrived, having given to each officer goods estimated at one thousand pounds, and taken for himself to the value of two thousand.

This act of folly, for it deserved no worse name, was no sooner known, than the most furious outcry was raised against him by all who could pretend to take an interest in the affair. Monck, who was at the head of the Admiralty, and had long regarded him with jealousy, sent unnecessary orders to all the ports to seize the property, and omitted no other indignity which his official authority enabled him to practise: Sir William Coventry, who was the Duke's peculiar confidant, used all endeavours to ruin him in the opinion of that Prince, who was already, perhaps with some justice, offended that his Vice-Admiral should have presumed to dispense bounties which it belonged to himself only to bestow: the King was displeased that he should have ventured to act on the royal approbation before he had received it, and the more, because he was angry with himself for having granted it: and all the officers of the navy, with the exception of those whom he had intended to gratify, together with the whole body of seamen, complained loudly that a plan had been laid to defraud them of a part of their prize-money. At length a rumour was raised of an impeachment in Parliament, and the authors of it, Monck and Coventry, persuaded the King that nothing could prevent such a proceeding but the removal of Sandwich from his command, which was indeed their sole object. The King, on the other hand, whose resentments were never lasting, was anxious to protect him, and disposed of him accordingly without disgrace, appointing him Ambassador Extraordinary to the Court of Madrid, a mission always highly honourable, and just at this time requiring extraordinary talents, and undoubted fidelity. I have been the more particular in the foregoing relation, because all the Earl's biographers, with that absurd and servile tenderness which is in the end almost always more injurious than the plain truth to the memory of the eminent dead, have thought fit to leave it wholly untold. It is to be found, given most circumstantially, in Lord Clarendon's Life of himself.

Sandwich arrived at Madrid on the twenty-eighth of May, 1666, and was received with distinctions more cordial and magnificent than were then usually allowed to foreign ministers by that cold and ceremonious Court. His conduct in all circumstances proved how highly he merited them. The objects of his mission were to negociate a treaty of commerce with England, and to mediate a peace between Spain and Portugal; a proposal involving points of great difficulty, inevitable in an effort to reconcile a parent state to the independence of a revolted province. They yielded however to his sagacity. Never was embassy more uniformly successful: and he returned, after an absence of two years, which his friends, his enemies, and himself, had considered but as an honourable exile, to renewed royal favour, and increased popularity; with the reputation of a profound statesman ingrafted on that of a brave and prudent commander. Neither this deviation into the character of a public minister, nor the flattering applause which he had acquired in it, could betray his generous mind into any engagement in political party at home. He accepted, soon after his return, the office of President of the Council of Trade and Plantations, and seems to have confined himself to the performance of the duties which it demanded. He is said to have opposed strenuously in Council the sale of Dunkirk; and to have argued there, with equal warmth, in favour of a strict alliance with Spain, as a counterpoise to the power of Louis the Fourteenth, and we find scarcely any other instances of his interference in state affairs.

At length, fatally for himself, he was restored to the naval service, and in the spring of 1672, on the renewal of the Dutch war, again appointed Vice-Admiral of the fleet under the Duke of York. They sailed to meet the enemy in the Channel, whom on the nineteenth of May they descried some leagues off the coast of Suffolk. A thick fog however prevented them from approaching each other for many days, during which the English lay at anchor in Southwold bay, better known as Solebay. On the twenty-eighth, while they were gaily preparing for the celebration of the following day, the anniversary of the Restoration, they were surprised by the Dutch, so suddenly as barely to allow them time to weigh anchor, and to form a very imperfect line. As the battle began and was fought in confusion, not less confused, and even contradictory, are the accounts of it which have been delivered to us. Thus much only is certain—that the Dutch Admiral, Van Ghent, commenced it by attacking the blue squadron, commanded by Sandwich, whose ship gave the first broadside that was fired: that the Earl, after having performed prodigies of valour, disabled many of the enemy's ships, and lost three-fourths of his men, was suddenly surrounded by fire-ships; that his Vice-Admiral, Jordaine, with his division, basely and disobediently left him at this fearful juncture, to flatter the Duke, who was just then somewhat pressed, by a show of anxiety to succour him; that Sandwich, having sunk three of the fire-ships, was grappled by a fourth, which set his ship in flames; and that, having stedfastly refused to enter the long-boat, in which many of the survivors were saved, he remained almost alone, and perished.

His body was found several days after, floating on the sea, into which it was evident that he had plunged to avoid the greater corporal misery, as marks of burning were strongly visible on his face and breast. He is said to have received an affront from the High Admiral immediately previous to the action, and to have gone into it therefore with a determination to die. Among others, two eminent historians, however discordant as to another particular which they respectively relate, agree in making that report, as well as in ascribing his fatal resolution to the same motive. Burnet tells us that "the Admiral of the blue squadron was burned by a fire-ship, after a long engagement with a Dutch ship much inferior to him in strength," and adds "in it the Earl of Sandwich perished, with many about him, who would not leave him, as he would not leave his ship, by a piece of obstinate courage to which he was provoked by an indecent reflection the Duke made on an advice he had offered of drawing nearer the shore, and avoiding an engagement, as if in that he took more care of himself than of the King's honour." Bishop Kennet says, "the day before there was great jollity and feasting in the English fleet, in the midst of which, my Lord of Sandwich was observed to say that, as the wind stood, the fleet rode in danger of being surprised by the Dutch, and therefore thought it advisable to weigh anchor, and get out to sea. The Duke of York, Lord High Admiral, slighted the advice, and retorted upon the Earl that he spoke this out of fear, which reflection his Lordship is thought to have so far resented as the next day, out of indignation, to have sacrificed his life, which he might have otherwise preserved."

His remains were deposited, with the honours of a public funeral, in Henry the Seventh's chapel, in the same vault with those of his competitor Monck. His character, which has been here but slightly touched on, is given at great length, and with uncommon minuteness, in a manuscript in the French language, which is preserved in the Harleian collection, and exhibits a glowing picture of the perfection of humanity. It is too extensive to be admitted in this place, being in fact a small volume, but the brief description of his person, with which it commences, ought not to be omitted, and it is to be regretted that in a work of this nature such notices cannot be more frequently introduced. "Edouard, Comte de Sanduich," says the manuscript, "est bien fait, de sa personne ; l'air doux, heureux, engageant ; le visage assez plein ; les traits agréables ; la couleur vermeille, tirant sur le clair brun ; les yeux médiocrement grands, bruns, vifs, pénétrants, pleins de feu ; la teste belle, et les cheveux naturellement bouclés, et d'un châtain brun ; la taille plutost grande que petite ; assez d'embonpoint, mais qui ne com~ensa de l'incommoder qu'apres son retour de l'ambassade d'Espagne."

This Nobleman had by his lady, already spoken of, six sons ; Edward, his successor ; Sidney ; Oliver ; John ; Charles ; and James : and four daughters ; Jemima, married to Sir Philip Carteret ; Paulina, who died unmarried ; Anne, wife to Sir Richard Edgecumbe, of Mount Edgecumbe, in Devon ; and Catherine, married to Nicholas Bacon, of Shrubland Hall in Suffolk.

OF CHUDLEIGH.

OB. 1673.

THOMAS, FIRST LORD CLIFFORD

OF CHUDLEIGH.

THERE is no period of English history in which we find it more difficult to estimate correctly the characters of statesmen than the reign of Charles the Second. From a court in whose careless and licentious manners nature stood confessed to open view in unblushing nakedness, we pass to a cabinet in which the motives to an uncertain policy were shrouded in the darkest obscurity. The last remains of that generous simplicity which shed somewhat of grace and dignity even on the faults of monarchy had perished on the scaffold with the late King, and his successor had been called, suddenly and unexpectedly, to rule by new experiments of government a people at once elated by the discovery of that strength which had enabled them to break the charm of allegiance, stung with disappointment at the failure of their visionary hopes of independence, and secretly prepared to meet with defiance the resentment which they anticipated, because they felt that they had so justly merited it. To correct these different dispositions, Charles had recourse alternately to fraud and force, to haughty menaces, and mean condescensions. The characters, therefore, of his ministers were necessarily as various as the features of his system, if it deserved to be so called: some were chosen for their boldness, some for their powers of deception, others for mere pliability of temper, and a few were actually recommended by the total absence of all moral principle. Clifford, not to mention his talents, which were very powerful, was elevated and ruined by his courage.

Of the splendour and antiquity of his family it is needless to speak. He descended from a junior line which branched off in the fourteenth century from that which afterwards produced the Earls of Cumberland, and was the eldest of the three sons of Hugh Clifford, of Ugbrook, in Devonshire, a gentleman who had been intrusted with the command of a regiment of foot for the King in the beginning of the rebellion, by Mary, daughter of Sir George Chudleigh, of Ashton, in the same county, Baronet. He was born on the first of August, 1630, and completed his education at Exeter College, in Oxford, where he became a gentleman commoner on the twenty-fifth of May, 1647, and was "accounted," says Wood, "by his contemporaries there, a young man of a very unsettled head, or of a roving shattered brain." The fervid and sanguine disposition which drew on him this censure from dull and plodding judgments, enabled him to reap the fruits of study without labour, and he left the University in a state of proficiency which astonished those who had uttered it. He travelled for some time on the continent, and on his return, was entered of the Middle Temple, and studied the law with an assiduity which leaves little room to doubt that he then intended to adopt it as a profession. The ancient affection, however, of his native county to his name and family, opened new prospects to him. The borough of Totnes elected him to serve in the Parliament by which Charles the Second was restored, and rechose him for the first which was called by that Prince. He was now in his proper sphere of action. The freedom of debate was suited to his natural impatience of control, and his ambition was soothed by splendid visions of preterment. He possessed all the requisites to establish parliamentary reputation, and exercised them with a freedom and boldness at that time seldom practised. He commenced his career by opposing the measures of government ; grew distinguished and formidable ;

made terms with the King's ministers ; and became a most steady advocate for the royal prerogatives. This character on the political theatre was then a novelty.

His affection to monarchy, however, was sincere. The very name of Clifford was an emblem of loyalty, and he had been bred from his cradle in the strictest habits of implicit obedience to the throne. He now privately engaged himself, in concert with some other members of the House of Commons, to use his most strenuous endeavours to augment, by all practicable means, the authority and revenue of the Crown ; and it has been said, that Lord Clarendon's opposition to those measures was the principal cause of that great man's fall. Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington, and Secretary of State, was his first eminent political friend and patron ; and his strict intimacy with that minister, together with a strong rumour that he had been secretly reconciled to the church of Rome about the time of the Restoration, introduced him to the favour, and shortly after to the confidence, of the Duke of York. In compliment to that Prince, and perhaps to relieve and solace a spirit of peculiar ardency, he attended the Duke in the great sea-fight with the Dutch, of the third of June, 1665, and became so interested in the tremendous novelties which he that day witnessed, that he chose to remain with the fleet after the command had devolved, in the Duke's absence, on the Earl of Sandwich, with whom he sailed, in the beginning of the following August, on the expedition to Bergen, in Norway. Nor was this all, for in the following year he accompanied Prince Rupert and the Duke of Albemarle in that signal battle with the ships of the States General, which continued without intermission for the first four days of June, and in another engagement with the same fleet on the twenty-fifth of July. In these several actions he fought with a bravery so remarkable, that it was afterwards thought fit to record it in the Gazette which notified his admission into the Council, in which we are told that the honour was conferred on him "for the singular zeal wherein he had on all occasions merited in his Majesty's service, and more eminently in the honourable dangers in the late war against the Dutch and French, where he had been all along a constant actor, and had made it his choice to take his share in the warmest part of those services."

In the mean time he had not been employed in any ostensible office, except that of Envoy to the King of Denmark and Sweden for the conclusion of certain treaties, and this he executed very satisfactorily in the intermediate space between his two naval campaigns. On the twenty-sixth of October, 1666, he was appointed Comptroller of the Household, and on the fifth of the following December, sworn of the Privy Council; on the thirteenth of June, 1668, the office of Treasurer of the Household was conferred on him: and presently after, the Treasury being put into Commission on the death of the Earl of Southampton, he was named one of the Lords Commissioners. He became now, perhaps, the King's most confidential adviser; and this was presently after in a manner publicly acknowledged by his reception into that Cabinet Council, which, from the initial letters of the names of the five who composed it, obtained the denomination of "the Cabal." The designs and the conduct of that remarkable body are now so well known, that it would be impertinent to enlarge on them here. In all their plans for the establishment of absolute monarchy, and the restoration of the Romish religion, Clifford joined them with a genuine and disinterested sincerity, which wanted only a better cause to render it public virtue. His zeal indeed, in the prosecution of those views, rose to a pitch of enthusiasm which blinded him to all other political objects but such as tended immediately to favour or to thwart the accomplishment of them, and on such objects he bestowed no consideration but of the simplest and shortest means by which they might be forwarded or removed. The House of Commons was of course odious to him, and he justified the purchased subserviency of Charles to Louis the Fourteenth, by saying, that "if the King must be in a dependence, it was better to pay it to a great and generous Prince than to five hundred of his own insolent subjects." The features of his system were very clearly drawn in a pamphlet which was published, and read with much interest, soon after his death: "This Lord's notion," says the anonymous writer, "was, that the King, if he would be firm to himself, might settle what religion he pleased, and carry the government to what height he would: for, if men were assured in the liberty of their consciences, and undisturbed in their properties; able and upright judges made, in Westminster Hall, to judge the causes of meum and tuum; and if, on the other hand, the fort of Tilbury was finished, to bridle the city; the fort of Plymouth, to secure the west; and arms for twenty thousand men in each of these, and in Hull for the northern parts; with some addition, which might be easily and undiscernedly made, to the force now on foot, there were none who had either will, opportunity, or power, to resist."

Charles, who thirsted for absolute monarchy chiefly for the sake of personal ease, and James, always ready to sacrifice all other considerations to his inveterate affection to the ancient religion, determined to ensure his future services by giving him the strongest proofs of their favour and gratitude. On the twentieth of April, 1672, he was created Baron Clifford, of Chudleigh, in the county of Devon, to which honour was added, as his patrimony was moderate, a grant of considerable estates, chiefly in Somersetshire; and, on the twenty-eighth of the following November, was appointed Lord High Treasurer. An almost incredible tale however is extant, of the immediate motive by which Charles was induced to place him in that great post. In the preceding year the King, who had now become the voluntary vassal of Louis, resolved to gratify that Prince by breaking the league, known by the title of the Triple Alliance, which had been formed against France in the year 1667, between England, Sweden, and the United Provinces, and to make war on the latter of those powers. His coffers were exhausted ; the Parliament not then sitting ; and no reasonable hope to be entertained from assembling it, of obtaining a grant of money for the prosecution of a measure so unpopular. In this dilemma, Charles is said to have declared, that he would give the staff of High Treasurer to any one of his ministers who could contrive a feasible plan to raise fifteen hundred thousand pounds, without an application to Parliament. "The next day," as the story goes, "Lord Ashley," (afterwards the notorious Earl of Shaftesbury) "told Clifford that there was a way to do this, but that it was dangerous, and might, in its consequences, inflame both Parliament and people. Clifford, impatient to know the secret, plied the Lord Ashley with visits, and having drunk him to a proper height, led him insensibly to the subject of the King's indigence. Lord Ashley, warm and unguarded, dropt the important secret of shutting up the Exchequer. Clifford took the hint ; left the Lord Ashley as soon as he could ; went the same night to Whitehall ; and, attending till the King rose, demanded the white staff. The King renewed his promise if the money could be found, and then Clifford disclosed the secret, and was accordingly made Lord Treasurer." The whole of this seems to be fabulous. The wretched and iniquitous project of shutting up, as it was called, the Exchequer, by which the bankers, who had supplied Charles's necessities with money borrowed of others on the security of the revenues, were disabled from fulfilling their engagements, was devised and recommended by Ashley alone.

Lord Clifford held his high appointment for little more than six months. About the time that he obtained it, Charles, at his suggestion, published a declaration for universal liberty of conscience and worship, and for the suspension of the penal laws against dissenters of all descriptions. It was presently perceived that this measure was contrived for the encouragement and benefit of the Roman Catholics ; the House of Commons took it up with great warmth ; voted it to be illegal; and not only endeavoured, by two several addresses, to persuade the King to revoke it, but broke out into open hostility against the Papists, and brought in a bill for a new test, peculiarly framed to disqualify them for all public employments. The Peers received it with more moderation, but Clifford defended it in that house with a haughtiness and violence of expression which provoked the utmost resentment and disgust. It was on that occasion that he applied the often quoted phrase, "monstrum horrendum ingens," to the vote of the Commons, and reproached that branch of the legislature in terms of anger and contempt, never, perhaps, before or since applied to it by a speaker in the upper house. The Lords, however, sanctioned the King's declaration by their vote, but the majority was small, and no less than thirty signed a protest against it. The Chancellor, Shaftesbury, spoke and voted against it, and the King, to whom Clifford had not only previously submitted the plan of his speech, but by whom some additions had been made to it, intimidated by the resentment which it had produced, and the artifices of the Treasurer's enemies, determined to abandon at once his measure, and his minister. Burnet's statement of the matter at this precise period is very curious, and, as he mentions the name of the person who reported it to him from Lord Clifford's mouth, may have a better title to credit than many others of that Bishop's anecdotes. I will give it in his own words.

"In the afternoon of the day in which the matter had been argued in the House of Lords, the Earls of Shaftesbury and Arlington got all those members of the House of Commons on whom they had any influence, (and who had money from the King, and were his spies, but had leave to vote with the party against the Court, for procuring them the more credit) to go privately to him, and to tell him that, upon Lord Clifford's speech, the House was in such fury that probably they would have gone to some high votes and impeachments, but the Lord Shaftesbury, speaking on the other side, restrained them; they believed he spoke the King's sense, as the other did the Duke's: this calmed them. So they made the King apprehend that the Lord Chancellor's speech, with which he had been much offended, was really a great service done him; and they persuaded him farther, that he might now save himself, and obtain an indemnity for his ministers, if he would part with his declaration, and pass the bill. This was so dexterously managed by Lord Arlington, who got a great number of the members to go one after another to the King, who, by concert, spoke all the same language, that before night the King was quite changed, and said to his brother, that Lord Clifford had undone himself, and had spoiled their business by his mad speech; and that, though Lord Shaftesbury had spoke like a rogue, yet that had stopped a fury which the indiscretion of the other had kindled to such a degree that he could serve him no longer. He gave him leave to let him know all this. The Duke was struck with this, and imputed it wholly to Lord Arlington's management. In the evening he told Lord Clifford what the King had said. The Lord Clifford, who was naturally a vehement man, went, upon that, to the King, who scarce knew how to look him in the face. Lord Clifford said he knew how many enemies he must needs make to himself by his speech in the House of Lords, but he hoped that in it he had both served and pleased the King, and was therefore the less concerned in every thing else; but he was surprised to find by the Duke, that the King was now of another mind. The King was in some confusion. He owned that all he had said was right in itself: but he said that he, who sat so long in the House of Commons, should have considered better what they could bear, and what the necessity of his affairs required. Lord Clifford, in his first heat, was inclined to have laid down his white staff, and to have expostulated roundly with the King, but a cooler thought stopped him. He reckoned he must now retire, and therefore he had a mind to take some care of his family in the way of doing it: so he restrained himself, and said he was very sorry that his best meant services were so ill understood."

The King now revoked his declaration, and assented to the bill for the test ; and Lord Clifford resigned an office which, indeed, he could not have retained but by a total sacrifice, not only of his honour, but of those religious principles which he had with such perfect sincerity cherished. He went to the Duke of Buckingham, who had assisted largely in obtaining it for him, and offered in return to lend his aid in forwarding the pretensions of any friend of the Duke's to the vacant post. The appointment of Sir Thomas Osborn, afterwards Duke of Leeds, was the result of that visit. Clifford retired, overwhelmed with chagrin, to the country. Some remarkable particulars of his latter days have very lately appeared in a publication of the diary of his intimate friend, John Evelyn, who tells us that his resignation "grieved him to the heart, and at last broke it." Mr. Evelyn adds, that when he took leave of this nobleman, on his quitting London for ever, Lord Clifford "wrung him by the hand," and said, "God-b'ye—I shall never see thee more—do not expect it—I will never see this place, this city or court, again ;" and couples with these speeches, which evidently refer rather to future life than death, a very idle rumour of the day, that he perished soon after by his own hand. I mention this merely for the sake of denying it. Such a fact, relating to such a man, could not have slept till now, undisturbed by the officiousness of friends, or the malice of enemies. He died, as we are informed by Prince, in his "Worthies of Devon," of a fit of the stone, at his house of Ugbrook, in that county, in September, 1673 ; and his friend, Mr. Evelyn, from whom alone we have any view of his private character, makes some atonement for the blemish so carelessly cast on his memory by recording that he was "a valiant uncorrupt gentleman ; ambitious ; not covetous ; generous ; passionate ; and a most sincere constant friend."

Lord Clifford married Elizabeth, daughter and co-heir of William Martin, of Lindridge, in Devonshire, by whom he had fifteen children. Of his sons, two, each of the name of Thomas, died infants, and a third Thomas, his heir-apparent, who had reached maturity, died unmarried; George, the fourth son, inherited the title and estates, and was succeeded by his brother Hugh, ancestor to the present Lord: Simon and Charles, were the sixth and seventh sons. Of the daughters, Elizabeth died an infant; a second Elizabeth, was married to Henry, only son of Sir Thomas Carew, of Haccombe, in Devonshire, Bart.; Mary to Sir Simon Leech, of Cadleigh, in the County of Derby, Knight of the Bath; Amy, to John Courtenay, of Molland, in Devon; Catherine, Anne, Rhoda and Isabel, died unmarried.

EDWARD HYDE,
EARL OF CLARENDON.

OB. 1674.

EDWARD HYDE,

EARL OF CLARENDON.

FORTUNATELY for the interests of history, and not less fortunately for the honour of his memory, we possess the life of this truly great and good man from his own incomparable pen. Strange to say, to no other hand could it have been safely intrusted: he only, victim as he was to the fury of faction, and to the ingratitude of an unprincipled master, would have delivered it to us with impartiality. Gifted with a penetration into the characters of men and things so acute as to invest him with a sort of prescience of events which were to arise from their influence, and abiding therefore the consequences to himself of those events with a philosophic patience; with a magnanimity which spurned the petulant suggestions of vulgar resentment, and disdained the support of party; and, above all, with a love and reverence for truth which rendered him incapable of misrepresentation; he has recorded all the great scenes in which he acted with the moderation and candour of an indifferent and disinterested spectator. From that pure source therefore has the following humble and superficial memoir been almost wholly drawn.

Lord Clarendon, the third son of Henry Hyde, whose father was a cadet of the very ancient family of Hyde, of Norbury, in the county of Chester, by Mary, daughter and coheir of Edward Langford, of Trowbridge in Wiltshire, was born on the eighteenth of February, 1608-9. He was bred to the profession of the law, in which it may be said that he had a weighty family interest, for two of his uncles, Laurence and Nicholas, had attained to great eminence in it, especially the latter, who was at length raised to the station of Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. He was educated at home till the age of thirteen, when he went to Magdalen College, in Oxford, and having studied there with little industry, as he himself informs us, for scarcely more than two years, was then entered of the Middle Temple, and called to the bar with as much expedition as the rules of the profession allow. He presently acquired extensive practice, but, having made two advantageous marriages, his first wife having lived only six months after their union, and becoming, by the death of his elder brothers heir apparent to his father, he might probably have retired into private life, but for an accident which introduced him to Archbishop Laud, whose favour and confidence he immediately gained. The increased respect which he derived in the courts from such a connection, the honest ambition which it perhaps excited, and the affection which he conceived for Laud, whom he believed, to use his own words, "to be a man of the most exemplary virtue and piety, of any of that age," induced him to remain in London, and to prosecute his labours with increased earnestness. His professional skill and learning were now held in the highest estimation, and the various powers of his capacious mind, adorned by the exact honour and integrity of his moral life, rendered him the centre of a circle of the best and wisest men of the time, who were the constant companions of his leisure hours.

This was his state at the commencement of the Parliament which met on the third of April, 1640, and in which he was elected to serve for the borough of Wotton Basset. The enlarged view which he was now enabled to take of the state of parties, added to the deliberate opinion which he had previously formed of the critical state of the country, determined him to relinquish his gown, and to devote himself wholly to the public service. He commenced his political career with an impartiality equal to the strength of his judgment, and an aversion to the abuses which had crept into the monarchy as fixed as his affection to the monarchy itself. Thus he earnestly proposed the abolition of the Earl Marshal's Court, in the very opening of this short Parliament ; and in that which succeeded, to which he was returned for Saltash, in Cornwall, reiterated and accomplished the measure. He became presently one of the most active members of the Commons, not in an ostentatious display of eloquence, in which however he was equal to any, but in the useful business of the House ; and was chairman of most of the committees to which affairs of the highest importance were referred, especially of those which sat on the complaints against the Courts of York, and of the Marches of Wales ; the conduct of the Judges, particularly in the case of ship money, and, above all, on the great question of suppressing episcopacy. The agitation of the latter measure, which he held in the utmost abhorrence, unveiled the views of the persons with whom he had thus far acted, and his own. They aimed at the overthrow of the Monarchy and Hierarchy ; he at a judicious and temperate removal of their exuberances ; to which having most conscientiously lent his powerful aid to the utmost, he abandoned a party with whom he could no longer act usefully without deceit, and hypocrisy, and threw the weight of his wisdom and integrity into the scale of the Crown, at the very period when it had least power to reward his fidelity.

In addition to those powerful recommendations, his exact knowledge of the views and temper of the House of Commons rendered his advice at that period of the highest importance to the King, who now committed to him the management of his affairs in that assembly, jointly with the Lord Falkland, his dear friend, who had also recently seceded from the republicans, and Sir John Colepeper. The burthen of this employment, as well as the honour of Charles's confidence, fell chiefly on Mr. Hyde. To him was mostly left the secret correspondence with the King, who, early in the year 1642, soon after this arrangement had been made, went to

York, and all the answers to the incessant petitions and remonstrances of the Parliament flowed from his luxuriant pen. In the course of the summer he joined the King at York, as well to avoid a threatened impeachment as in obedience to his Majesty's command, and was soon after specially excepted, by a vote of both Houses, from any general amnesty which might ensue in the event of an accommodation between the King and the Parliament. Charles's favour towards him kept pace with the malignity of the rebels. He had twice declined the office of Secretary of State, to the duties of which he thought himself incompetent, and had till this period served in no public capacity ; but in the beginning of the year 1643 he was prevailed on to accept the appointment of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was at the same time knighted and sworn of the Privy Council. He sat in the Parliament assembled by the King at Oxford in the following January, and was the next winter a commissioner for the treaty of Uxbridge, in which Charles's hopes were chiefly founded on his endeavours, especially in all that related to the church.

The abortive result of that negotiation, and the increasing difficulties and dangers which surrounded the King, produced now a resolution to detach the Prince of Wales from his Majesty's person, lest they might fall together into the hands of the rebels. It was determined that he should retire into the west of England, and on the fourth of March, 1644, Hyde, who had shortly before been named one of the six who were to compose his council, took leave for the last time of the King ; attended his Royal Highness to Bristol ; and from thence, flying before Fairfax, into Cornwall, and finally to the isles of Scilly and Jersey. The Queen now accomplished a design which she had long cherished, and which he had earnestly opposed, to prevail that the Prince should reside with her in France, and Hyde, with others of the Council not less disgusted than himself by that step, declining to accompany him thither, remained in Jersey.

Here he passed between two and three years in a sweet retirement, to the loss of which he ever after looked back with a mixture of satisfaction and regret. "He always took pleasure," to use the words of his own memoirs, written twenty-five years after, "in relating with what great tranquillity of spirit, though deprived of the joy he took in his wife and children, he spent his time here amongst his books, which he got from Paris, and his papers, between which he seldom spent less than ten hours in the day; and it can hardly be believed how much he read and writ there; inso-much as he did usually compute that during his whole stay in Jersey he writ daily little less than one sheet of large paper with his own hand." This passage, and therefore I have quoted it, is not without its value in the literary history of our country, for what can be insignificant that furnishes even the slightest anecdote relative to the composition of that glorious work which will preserve Lord Clarendon's fame when even his wisdom and purity as a minister shall be scarcely recollected? The fruit of the studies to which he alludes was the History of the Grand Rebellion, which was planned, and for the most part written, during his residence in the island of Jersey.

The peace of his retirement however was frequently interrupted. The Queen, who could not but dislike him because he had in many instances opposed her influence in public affairs, sought, though ineffectually, to sow discord between his Royal master and himself, and his pen was still occasionally employed in answering the furious votes and declarations of the Parliament. At length in the spring of 1648 he received the command both of the King and Queen to join the Prince at Paris, and in following his Royal Highness by sea to Holland, whither he had suddenly removed, was captured by some frigates off Ostend, and afterwards so detained by bad weather, that he arrived not at the Hague till the end of August. Here, disgusted by the intrigues and animosities of the Prince's little Court, which for some time he strove in vain to compose, and at length paralysed by the news of the King's murder, he gladly accepted the empty commission of Ambassador extraordinary to Madrid, jointly with the Lord Cottington, and, taking Paris in his way thither, became somewhat reconciled to the Queen, who then resided at St. Germain's. His mission, the object of which it is almost needless to say was to solicit the support of Spain to Charles's forlorn throne, proved fruitless, and after remaining there for several months, he was dismissed by an order from the Court, on the arrival of the news of Cromwell's successes in Scotland, Charles's unfortunate visit to which country had been undertaken against his opinion. He now, in July, 1651, established his residence at Antwerp, where he had fixed his family on his departure for Madrid.

The King, on arriving at Paris after his escape from Worcester, committed his shattered affairs almost wholly to the management of Sir Edward Hyde, and never was the favour of the most powerful and wealthy Prince resented with keener envy and jealousy. His policy too, which was to wait patiently for a favourable change of opinion in England, was opposed by the whole Court, except by his fast friend the Marquis of Ormond; and the Queen, who had again become his implacable enemy, gladly aided the projects of his enemies. The Papists, the Presbyterians, and the old loyalists of the Church of England, united against him, and prepared petitions for his removal, which the firm expressions of the King, who had been apprised of the design, prevented their presenting. At length in 1653, a Mr. Robert Long, who served the King under the title of Secretary of State, accused him in form to the Council of corresponding with Cromwell, and receiving a pension from him: a charge which ended in the confusion of the informant, and the appointment of Hyde to his office. New intrigues against him of less importance succeeded, and in fact formed the whole history of the banished Court for some years while it followed the wanderings of the King in Germany and Flanders, till Charles, as it seems, crushed the hopes of these petty factions by delivering to Sir Edward the Great Seal, with the title of Lord Chancellor, on the death of the Lord Keeper, Sir Edward Herbert, one of the most bitter of his enemies. This mark of the King's complete favour and confidence was bestowed on him at Bruges, in the Christmas week of the year 1657.

Cromwell died in the succeeding autumn, and the first glimpses of the restoration dawned amid the confusion which followed. Of the numerous circumstances of the Chancellor's extensive concern in the accomplishment of that great event it would be impossible here to treat. He had ever advised Charles to reject all proposals to replace him on the throne which might be grounded on alterations and novelties in the government either of the Church or State, the maintenance of which in their fullest integrity was the first principle in all his negotiations with the various parties by the agreement of which the happy change was at length wrought ; and he had now the satisfaction to witness the re-erection of those venerable fabrics in all their former strength and splendour. In the mean time he left untouched those salutary corrections to which himself in the opening of his political life had so largely contributed, and suffered the High Commission Court, the Earl Marshal's Court, and the Star Chamber, those mighty engines of kingly and ministerial power, to remain in the dust to which the late excesses had levelled them ; neither did he endeavour to repeal the acts for triennial Parliaments ; for the prohibition of tonnage, poundage, ship-money, or other abuses which had crept unwarrantably into the royal prerogative. In the same spirit of wisdom, moderation, and justice, he had the courage to institute, and forward to his utmost, the bill of indemnity, and the bill for uniformity of worship ; certain to provoke the enmity of the royalists by the one, and of the presbyterians by the other, and of each he had in the end abundance of bitter experience.

Among the first marks of royal favour and gratitude

dispensed after the King's arrival were those bestowed on the Chancellor, by whom they had been so highly merited. He was presented with grants, but to no immoderate value, of Crown lands. Other valuable gifts were also assigned to him, and among them a sum of twenty thousand pounds, which he received from the King's own hand, and another of twenty-five thousand, charged on the forfeited estates in Ireland, of which last however no more than six thousand were ever paid. He held for some time, together with the Great Seal, the offices of Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Secretary of State, and was afterwards elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and appointed Lord Lieutenant of that County. The King's entire confidence, as well as the whole weight of administration, rested on him; and in addition to this burthen, Charles, who knew not how to deny, and durst not promise unless he could perform, left it to him to satisfy, or rather to dissatisfy, the multitude of claims urged on the score of suffering loyalty. He became presently therefore an object not only of envy but of disgust; and the marriage of his daughter to the Duke of York, which is treated of at large in another part of this work, and which became publicly known soon after the restoration, would probably have been the first signal of a storm against him, had not the King, almost in the instant, damped for the time the hopes of his enemies by new testimonies of esteem. In November, 1660, he was created Baron Hyde of Hindon in Wilts, and, in the following April, Viscount of Cornbury, a manor in Oxfordshire lately granted to him, and Earl of Clarendon. To these dignities the King earnestly wished to have added the order of the Garter, which the Chancellor, perhaps not less careless of the distinction than anxious to avoid the jealousy that his acceptance of it might provoke, positively declined.

It was not long, however, before a faction was regularly arrayed against him. Sir Henry Bennet, afterwards Earl of Arlington, and Mr. William Coventry, a younger son of the late Lord Keeper, who might without injustice be styled political adventurers, had insinuated themselves into the King's favour by proposing new projects for the management of the House of Commons, and undertaking to carry them into execution. The Chancellor, who disliked artifice, and abhorred corruption, discouraged their proceedings, and those persons, of whom the one excelled in dissimulation, and the other in boldness, contrived, without uttering a single expression of resentment or disrespect, to weaken the King's affection towards him. They were joined by the Duchess of Cleveland, the favourite mistress, who could scarcely be expected to entertain any regard for a man of the Chancellor's character; and others, who had waited only for leaders under whom to make the attack, readily lent their aid. Among them was George Digby, Earl of Bristol, a furious and eccentric person, to whose fidelity Charles, in his late tedious season of necessity, had owed some obligations, and with whom Clarendon had lived in intimacy and confidence. Bristol, before the plans of the party were matured, on some sudden pique, accused the Chancellor in a vague and unprepared manner to the House of Peers of high treason, and delivered in a list of articles charging him chiefly with having procured undue favour to the papists, to whose persuasion it is singular that Bristol himself should have been lately reconciled, and with having negotiated the late sale of Dunkirk to the French, with which in fact the Chancellor seems to have had no concern but as an individual member of the Council in which that measure was resolved on, indeed rather against his judgment. This blow, for the time, was ineffectual. The Peers treated it with contempt, and the King with apparent anger. He overwhelmed the Chancellor with professions of esteem and confidence, while his mind secretly teemed with a disgust not infused by the late impotent proceeding, but by the incessant private efforts of Bennet, Coventry, and their associates, and Clarendon's sagacity discovered daily proofs of the decline of his interest, perhaps before it was suspected even by his enemies. Thus he stood at the close of the year 1663.

But the approach, slow as it was, of their victory soon became evident to the whole Court, and they employed all means, even the most despicable, to accelerate it. When Charles returned from his new counsellors, full fraught with graver prejudices, the Duke of Buckingham, at the head of a party of buffoons, entertained him in the private apartments with ridicule and mimicry of the Chancellor. They commonly called him the King's schoolmaster, and, "if the King," says Lord Clarendon himself, "said he would go such a journey, or do such a trivial thing to-morrow, somebody would lay a wager that he would not do it; and when he asked 'why,' it was answered that the Chancellor would not let him," &c. Nay, it was usual for Buckingham to parade about the room, imitating his gait and demeanour, and carrying a pair of bellows for the Great Seal, Colonel Titus walking before him, with a fire-shovel on his shoulder, as the mace. In the mean time his inflexible integrity forwarded the views of his enemies. The acute and unprincipled Lord Ashley, better known afterwards as Earl of Shaftesbury, threw himself into their ranks in revenge for the Chancellor's having refused to put the Seal to an unconstitutional patent devised solely for the emolument of that nobleman, and the King burst at length into plain expressions of anger on his honest opposition to the bill for liberty of conscience contrived in 1664 between the papists and the presbyterians.

The effect of these evils was greatly enhanced by the natural cast of the Chancellor's temper. The gravity and independence of his spirit, contrasted as it now was to unceasing gaiety and flattery, became intolerable to Charles. He tells us himself too, speaking of an earlier part of his life, that "he was in his nature inclined to pride and passion, and to a humour between wrangling and disputing, very troublesome," and it is clear that the King, when these ebullitions prevailed, was often personally treated with very little ceremony. Charles, explaining the causes of his disgust in a letter to the Duke of Ormond, Clarendon's firm friend, charges him with "a certain peevishness of temper;" and the Chancellor himself, in a curious expostulatory original addressed to the King, remaining in the Harleian collection, writes—"I do upon my knees begg your pardon for any bold or sawcy expressions I have ever used to you," and tacitly denies all other causes of offence. To counterbalance this solitary ground of reasonable umbrage, Clarendon had nothing to plead but consummate wisdom, and the purest integrity, qualities now held in little estimation in Charles's Court or Council.

The King, though his affections had become at length totally alienated, was long before he could prevail on himself to dismiss this great minister. The small faction however which had poisoned his mind had exerted itself not less successfully in the Parliament; and the country, always ready to be misled, caught the infection. Clarendon, without a fault or error, became gradually the most unpopular man in the Kingdom. A vulgar outcry ascribed to him all the qualities most disgraceful to a statesman, and all the mishaps that had occurred since the Restoration, insomuch that the King, had he again received him into favour, could scarcely have retained him in office. Of this public prejudice, the result of his own folly and ingratitude, Charles now meanly availed himself to cloak the shame of discharging such a servant. He visited the Chancellor; loaded him with acknowledgments of his wise and faithful services; lamented the aversion which the House of Commons had conceived against him, and his own inability to protect him against the frightful consequences of it; and besought him, as his only means of safety, to resign the Seal. Clarendon refused with a dignified respect, and assigned his reasons; and on the thirtieth of August, 1667, four days after, surrendered it in obedience to the King's express command.

He now believed, to use his own words, "that the storm had been over, for he had not the least apprehension of the displeasure of the Parliament, or of any thing they could say or do against him," but he was presently painfully undeceived. The King, to ingratiate himself with the House of Commons, openly censured him, and, to save himself future trouble, employed secret emissaries to persuade him to quit the Kingdom. The Chancellor, with a courage inspired by conscious innocence, stoutly refused. It was at length determined that he should be accused of high treason, and a charge was prepared by a committee of the Commons, consisting of seventeen articles, the most material of which were notoriously false, and the rest wholly frivolous, in which, after long debate, the House determined that nothing treasonable could be found; yet it was resolved that he should be impeached of that crime, which was immediately done at the Lords' bar by Mr., afterwards Sir Edward Seymour, with a demand that he should be sequestered from that House, and his person secured. The Peers refused to receive the accusation unless some particular charge were exhibited against him, and the Commons, conscious of the weakness of their case, insisted on their right to impeach generally. A long and sharp contest on this question arose between the two Houses, which was at length terminated by the King, who, fearing, as it should seem, that amidst this confusion the Chancellor might escape unhurt, specially commanded him to withdraw himself into a foreign country.

As he had resolved not to quit England but by the order of his master, so on receiving that order he instantly obeyed it. On the twenty-ninth of November, 1667, this illustrious exile embarked in a miserable boat, in the middle of the night, at Erith, and, after remaining at sea amidst the inconveniences and dangers of the worst weather for three days and nights, landed at Calais. He left behind him a representation at large to the House of Peers of his conduct since the Restoration, composed with all the simplicity and modest courage of conscious innocence and truth ; such however was the rage of the prevailing party that it was presently publicly burned, by order of both Houses. They strove to proceed against him for high treason by attainder, but this was prevented by the influence of the King, who, by way of compromise, agreed to a bill of banishment, which was passed in great haste. In the mean time, Buckingham and Arlington, with the most disgraceful malice, pressed the Court of France to forbid his residence in that country, where he passed a considerable time under the continual inspection of an officer sent specially from Paris to remove him as soon as he might recover from a long fit of illness, in the midst of which he was attacked at an inn at Evreux by a brutal mob of English sailors, who believed that he had ruined their country, and narrowly escaped with life, after suffering severe personal injuries. At this period a change in French politics produced a permission that he might remain in that country, and he settled shortly after at Montpellier, where he arrived in July, 1668, and remained nearly for three years.

His first leisure in this retirement was dedicated to the composition of a vindication at large of his ministry, in which he answered severally the charges which had been preferred against him by the House of Commons. This remarkable apology, which was soon after published, he transmitted to his son, Laurence, afterwards Earl of Rochester, who took a speedy opportunity to offer to that House in express terms a challenge, which never was accepted, to prove any one of the allegations. Here closed Clarendon's political life, and here commenced the better and happier days which he consecrated to posterity. "In all this retirement," to use his own words, "he was very seldom vacant, and then only when he was under some sharp visitation of the gout, from reading excellent books, or writing some animadversions and exercitations of his own. He learned the Italian and French languages, in which he read many of the choicest books. Now he finished the work which his heart was most set upon, 'the History of the late Civil Wars, and Transactions to the Time of the King's Return in the Year 1660.' He finished his 'Reflections and Devotions upon the Psalms of David,' which he dedicated to his children. He wrote and finished his 'Answer to Mr. Hobbes his Leviathan.' He wrote a good volume of 'Essays, divine, moral, and political,' to which he was always adding. He prepared 'a Discourse historical of the Pretence and Practice of the successive Popes, from the Beginning of the Jurisdiction they assume.' He entered upon the forming 'a Method for the better disposing the History of England, that it may be more profitably and exactly communicated than it hath yet been.' "

In addition to the works thus enumerated, we have likewise the following pieces from his pen:—An Answer to the Declaration of the House of Commons in 1648 that they would make no more Addresses to the King—The Difference and Disparity between the Estates and Conditions of George Duke of Buckingham and Robert Earl of Essex, printed in the Reliquiæ Wottonianæ—Animadversions on Mr. Cressy's book called 'Fanaticism fanatically imputed to the Catholic Church, by Dr. Stillingfleet, and the Imputation refuted and retorted'—A History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in Ireland—A Collection of the Orders heretofore used in Chancery—A Collection of Tracts published from his original manuscripts in 1727; several of his letters, printed in the Life of Dr. Barwick; and many of his speeches in Parliament after the Restoration, which appeared separately. It is scarcely necessary to add to this list the supplement to his sublime History of the Grand Rebellion, which bears the title of his Life, and from which the contents of these sheets have been derived.

Lord Clarendon removed in 1671 to Moulines, and from thence to Rouen, where he died on the ninth of December, 1674. He was, as has been already stated, twice married ; first, to Anne, daughter of Sir George Ayliffe of Wiltshire, who died childless ; secondly to Frances, daughter, and at length heir, to Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Bart., a Master of Requests, by whom he had four sons ; Henry, his successor ; Laurence, created Earl of Rochester ; Edward, and James, who died unmarried ; and two daughters ; Anne, married to James Duke of York ; and Frances, to Sir Thomas Keighley, of Hartingfordbury in Herts, Knight of the Bath.

JOHN POWLETT,
MARQUIS OF WINCHESTER.
OB. 1674.

JOHN POWLETT,

FIFTH MARQUIS OF WINCHESTER.

THIS nobleman, whose services and sufferings in the cause of King Charles the First justly gained for him the title of "the great Loyalist," was the third son of William, the fourth Marquis, by Lucy, second daughter of Thomas Cecil, second Earl of Exeter of his family. He was born in the year 1597, and received a part of his education in Exeter College, Oxford. His two elder brothers having previously died without issue, he succeeded in 1628 to his family honours, and to the possession of a noble estate, which his father's magnificent hospitality had burthened with an immense debt, to remove which he passed many years in a dignified seclusion, and had barely attained his object when the miserable circumstances of the times compelled Charles to take up arms against his Parliament.

That great and melancholy event drew him instantly from his retirement. He flew to the King; placed in his hands such of the fruits of his honourable frugality as were immediately within his reach; and promised the rest to the service of the royal interest. The pledge was but too soon redeemed. It occurred to the King's military advisers that Basing House in Hampshire, the Marquis's chief seat, might be fortified and garrisoned to much advantage, as it commanded the main road from the western counties to London. It had already, like most of the great houses of that time, many of the requisites of a place of defence, "standing," says the anonymous author of some Memoirs of Cromwell, entitled the Perfect Politician, "on a rising ground, encompassed with a brick rampart, and that lined with earth; a deep dry ditch environing all." As a domestic mansion, its situation, its vast extent of building, the magnificence and convenience of its apartments, and, above all, the splendour of its furniture and decorations, had justly rendered it the chief ornament and pride of that part of England. On every window, or, as some say, which is more likely, on every pane, the Marquis had written with a diamond "Aimez Loyauté;" and the sentiment was engraven too on his heart; for he obeyed the call of his Sovereign's necessity without a moment's hesitation; exchanged at once the delicate enjoyments in which he had always lived for the hardships of a soldier's life; converted his palace into a fortification, his family into a garrison, and himself into a military governor.

The journal of the siege of Basing House forms one of the most remarkable warlike features of the grand rebellion. It commenced in August, 1643, when the whole force with which the Marquis had to defend it, in addition to his own inexperienced people, amounted only to one hundred musketeers, sent to him from Oxford. In this state of comparative weakness, it resisted for more than three months the continued attack of a conjunction of the Parliament troops of Hampshire and Sussex, under the command of five Colonels of distinguished reputation. It was considered of such importance to the royal cause that the Privy Council specially addressed to the King their request that he would, for the sole purpose of relieving it, change the route by which he had then determined to march into the West, but other circumstances rendered this impracticable. In the mean time the Marquis, and his Lady, whom he had sent for safety to Oxford, pressed earnestly for reinforcements from the troops who defended that city, but his request was of necessity denied, for the royal government was then seated there, with a military protection not more than adequate to so important a charge. At length he wrote to the Council that, "for want of provisions he could not defend himself above ten days, and must then submit to the worst conditions that the rebels were like to grant to his person, and to his religion," for he was a steadfast Roman Catholic. The many eminent persons of that persuasion who were then in Oxford had before proposed to form themselves and their servants into a body sufficiently numerous for the enterprise, but the utter improbability of their being able to return through a country over which the enemy's troops were every where scattered, produced at that time a rejection of the gallant offer. Chiefly, however, at the pressing instances of the Marchioness, the Council was persuaded again to entertain the question, when Colonel, afterwards Sir Henry, Gage, that great ornament to the royal service and to his eminent family, volunteered to take the command of the gallant band; "which offer," says Lord Clarendon, "having been made with great cheerfulness by a person of whose prudence as well as courage they had a full confidence, they all resolved to do the utmost that was in their power to make it effectual." The difficulties, the dangers, and the exquisite military skill, which combined to give an almost romantic character to this excursion, are precisely detailed by the noble historian, and form a relation so interesting, that I could wish it were consistent with the design and the scope of this work here to repeat it; but it must suffice to say that the enterprise proved completely successful, and that the party returned to Oxford almost without loss.

The Marquis, thus recruited, continued to sustain the siege with the most determined perseverance and bravery, when it was suddenly discovered (such was the unnatural party virulence of which the history of those sad days afford but too many instances) that the Lord Edward Powlett, his youngest brother, then serving under him in his house, had engaged to betray it to the rebels. Sir Richard Grenville, whom they had sent from London to take possession of it, treacherous in his turn to his employers, quitted his road at Staines, and went directly to Oxford, where he communicated the design to the King, who apprised the Marquis of all the circumstances attending it. Lord Edward was instantly seized, confessed the whole, and impeached the rest of the conspirators; and the Marquis having interceded with his Majesty to spare his life, turned him out of the garrison.

Soon after this event another relief of provisions was thrown into it by Gage, with the same gallantry and dexterity as the former. The attack was continually pressed with the utmost vigour, and the Marquis equally distinguished himself by his bravery in almost daily sallies, and by the good judgment of his measures of defence within the walls. He exposed his person to danger with the courage and coolness of an old soldier. On the third of July, 1644, a musket ball passed through his clothes, and on the twenty-second he was wounded by another. We learn these circumstances from a journal of the siege, then printed at Oxford; which minutely records every day's work from the commencement to the fourteenth of November in that year. That little tract preserves also two short letters from the Marquis, highly characteristic of the noble zeal that inspired him. On the eleventh of the same July, Morley, one of the rebel Colonels, who then commanded the besiegers in the absence of Colonel Norton, a man of a large estate in Hampshire, having, in stern but civil terms, summoned the garrison to surrender, the Marquis replied,

“SIR,

“It is a crooked demand, and shall receive its answer suitable. I keep the house in the right of my Sovereign, and will do it, in despite of your forces. Your letter I will preserve in testimony of your rebellion.

“WINCHESTER.”

And to another summons, from Norton himself, on the second of the following September, "in the name of the Parliament of England," he answers—

"SIR,

"Whereas you demand the house and garrison of Basing by a pretended authority of Parliament, I make this answer ; that without the King there can be no Parliament. By his Majesty's commission I keep this place, and, without his absolute command, shall not deliver it to any pretenders whatsoever.

"Yours, to serve you,

"WINCHESTER."

Norton having gradually lost more than half his men under the walls, abandoned the attack, and was succeeded by a stronger force, under the command of a Colonel Harvey, which had no better fortune. At length Sir William Waller, whom his party affected to call "the Conqueror," advanced against it, at the head of seven thousand horse and foot. These, too, says the author of "The Perfect Politician," above quoted, "did little more than heighten the courage of the besieged, who made frequent desperate sallies on them, till at length, thus outbraving all assailants for years, the place began to be esteemed impregnable." A mighty interest had now arisen for this little band of heroes, and their illustrious chief. Amidst the various objects of the war, none seemed so powerfully to excite the anxiety of Charles as the siege of Basing House. It was a natural feeling, which arose from veneration and gratitude, and therefore the loyalists throughout the kingdom participated in it as with a common assent. The rebels themselves regarded this nobleman with a respectful admiration, and blushed, behind the mask of pretended patriotism, while they looked around in vain among their numerous partisans for a volunteer who fought neither for glory nor for spoil ; who had everything to lose, and nothing to gain ; who had turned suddenly round, from the tedious and painful redemption of his patrimony, to ruin it in the cause of his Sovereign ; whose motives, and whose conduct, seemed to have in them something more than human, merely because they flowed pure and unmixed from the finest principles of humanity.

A sad reverse however was approaching. The fatal battle of Naseby soon after broke the spirits of the loyalists, and the King's strong places surrendered in rapid succession. Cromwell, flushed with success, marched from Winchester, which had fallen with little resistance, upon Basing, where, according to its accustomed port, his summons was proudly rejected. But he was then irresistible. Bold, skilful, fortunate, and secretly inspired with a hope so gigantic that it gave a giant's force to all his endeavours, nothing could effectually withstand them. After a most obstinate conflict, Basing Castle was, on the sixteenth of October, 1645, taken by storm, and be it ever recollected by those who may be inclined to rank Cromwell among heroes, that after his victory he put most of its incomparable garrison to the sword. The Marquis had animated the besieged by his presence and example to the last moment. His life was spared, and he was sent a prisoner to London. What remained of his noble seat, which Hugh Peters after its fall told the House of Commons "would have become an emperor to dwell in," the rebels wantonly burned to the ground, having pillaged it, say all who have recorded this part of the tragical tale, of money, jewels, plate, and household stuff, to the almost incredible value of two hundred thousand pounds. After having been for some time imprisoned, he was permitted to retire, harassed with fines and sequestrations, to his estate at Englefield in Berks, where he passed the long remainder of his life in privacy, innocently dividing his time between agricultural exercise and literary leisure. There the Restoration found him, and left him, for this great creditor of the Crown was never in the smallest degree requited. Impelled perhaps by a spirit at once lofty and dejected, it is not improbable that he might have steadfastly refused any mark of royal favour; and it is more agreeable to entertain that conjecture, than to load the memory of Charles the Second with a new instance of ingratitude.

Three works translated from the French by the Marquis are extant. "Devout Entertainments of a Christian Soul," by J. H. Quarré, D.D., done during his imprisonment, and printed at Paris in 1649: "The Gallery of Heroic Women," by Peter le Moine, a Jesuit, in folio, 1652; and "The Holy History" of Nicholas Talon, in quarto, in the following year, both which were printed in London. He published other books, which, says Anthony Wood, "I have not yet seen."

The Marquis was thrice married: first to Jane, daughter of Thomas, Viscount Savage, by whom he had issue Charles, his successor, who was created Duke of Bolton by King William; secondly, to Honora, daughter of Richard de Burgh, Earl of St. Alban's and Clanricarde, who brought him four sons, of whom two only, John and Francis, lived to manhood; and three daughters; Frances, married to Louis de Richardie, a French gentleman; Anne to John Lord Belasyse; and Honora, who died a spinster. By his third lady, Mary, daughter of William Howard, Viscount Stafford, he had no children. He died on the fifth of March, 1674, and was buried in the parish church of Englefield, where, on an unostentatious tablet, in compliance with the direction of his will, appears this inscription, from the hand of Dryden.

"He who in impious times undaunted stood,
 And 'midst rebellion durst be just and good;
 Whose arms asserted, and whose sufferings more
 Confirm'd, the cause for which he fought before;
 Rests here rewarded, by a heavenly Prince
 For what his earthly could not recompense.
 Pray, reader, that such times no more appear;
 Or, if they happen, learn true honour here.

Ark of his age's faith and loyalty,
Which, to preserve them, Heaven confined in thee.
Few subjects could a King like thine deserve,
And fewer such a King so well could serve.
Blest King! blest subject! whose exalted state
By sufferings rose, and gave the law to fate.
Such souls are rare; but mighty patterns given
To Earth were meant for ornaments to Heaven.

ANNE CLIFFORD.

PEMBROKE & MONTGOMERY

OB. 1675.

ANNE CLIFFORD,

COUNTESS OF PEMBROKE.

IN an age the fashion of which was to confine the minds of women of high birth to the study of school divinity and morality, of the most simple domestic duties, and of a few wretched social forms, which supplied the place of politeness without bearing any resemblance to it; to the gloomy habits of implicit obedience to one, and of absolute rule over many; and to an intercourse only with those of their own rank, in whom, if they were at all disposed to observation, they could but retrace their own imperfect qualifications; we are agreeably surprised at meeting occasionally with one of those rare spirits in which a vigour of natural character opposed itself to the taste, if I may so call it, of a nation, and struggled, with whatever success, to loosen the shackles which had been imposed on it by a declining barbarism: such a one had Anne, Countess of Pembroke.

She was the only surviving child, and at length sole heir, of the gallant and eccentric George Clifford, third Earl of Cumberland, of whom some account will be found elsewhere in this work, by Margaret, third daughter of Francis Russel, Earl of Bedford, and was born at her father's seat of Skipton-Castle, in Yorkshire, on the thirtieth of January, 1589. Unhappy dissensions subsisted between her parents, and they were separated in her childhood; but it was her good fortune to be left to the care of her mother, a woman of equal prudence and probity, by whom the charge of the more important part of her education was entrusted to Samuel Daniel, a poet of no mean fame in those days. From him she acquired a taste for history and poetry, and a fondness for literary composition, which she indulged to a great extent, without publishing, or intending to publish, the fruits of her application. She fell therefore into the common faults with those who write for their own closets, and we find her pen generally careless, often trifling and tedious, and always egotistical; yet in this unpromising mixture we meet frequently with proofs of original genius, and solid intellect, and with scattered examples of the purest and most graceful style of her time. Her chief work is a summary of the circumstances of her own life, which I mention thus early because from that source the materials for the present Memoir will be mostly drawn.

Her picture of her person and mind in her youth is too curious to be omitted, especially as, while it imparts to us her opinion of herself, it betrays features of character of which it is almost certain that she was wholly unconscious. "I was," says she, "very happy in my first constitution, both in mind and body; both for internal and external endowments; for never was there a child more equally resembling both father and mother than myself. The colour of mine eyes was black, like my father's, and the form and aspect of them was quick and lively, like my mother's. The hair of my head was brown, and very thick, and so long that it reached to the calf of my legs when I stood upright; with a peak of hair on my forehead, and a dimple on my chin: like my father, full cheeks; and round face, like my mother; and an exquisite shape of body, resembling my father. But now time and age have long since ended all those beauties, which are to be compared to the grass of the field: (Isaiah, xl. 67, 68; 1 Peter, i. 24:) for now, when I caused these memorables of myself to be written, I have passed the sixty-third year of my age. And, though I say it, the perfections of my mind were much above those of my body: I had a strong and copious memory; a sound judgment, and a discerning spirit; and so much of a strong imagination in me, as at many times even my dreams and apprehensions proved to be true," &c. &c.

She was married to young Richard, third Earl of Dorset of the Sackvilles, a man of lively parts, and licentious life, and probably a polite and negligent husband; and afterwards, when she had passed the age of forty, to Philip Herbert, Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, a person distinguished only by the brutality of his manners, and the most ungrateful disloyalty. She had abundant cause of private offence from each. The first was a spendthrift, and quarrelled with her because she prevented him from dissipating her estate; the second was a tyrant, and distracted her by the savageness of his humour. Yet she speaks well, and even kindly, of both. The one she tells us was in his nature of a just mind, of a sweet disposition, and very valiant: that he excelled in every sort of learning all the young nobility with whom he studied at Oxford; and that he was a true patriot, and an eminent patron of scholars and soldiers. Of the other she says, that he had a very quick apprehension, a sharp understanding, and a discerning spirit, with a very choleric nature; and that he was in all respects one of the most distinguished noblemen in England, and well beloved throughout the realm; all which, except the slight censure of his temper, is expressly contradicted by the best historical evidence. How happened it then, high spirited and clear sighted as she was, that she should thus have sacrificed not only the truth, but her own feelings of resentment, by these unmerited compliments? Probably because she disdained to own, even to herself, an erroneous judgment in the choice of her consorts, and because the burthen of their ill usage had been lightened by the consolation she found in self-preference.

I will insert one more extract from her Memoirs, in her own words; not only as it exhibits a further proof of this singular complaisance, but for the view which it affords us of her character, or rather of her own conception of it, in middle age.

“ I must confess,” says she, “ with inexpressible thankfulness, that, through the goodness of Almighty God, and the mercies of my Saviour Jesus Christ, Redeemer of the world, I was born a happy creature in mind, body, and fortune ; and that those two Lords of mine, to whom I was afterwards by divine Providence married, were in their several kinds worthy noblemen as any there were in this kingdom ; yet it was my misfortune to have contradictions and crosses with them both. With my first Lord, about the desire he had to make me sell my rights in the lands of my ancient inheritance for a sum of money, which I never did, nor never would consent unto, insomuch as this matter was the cause of a long contention betwixt us ; as also for his profusion in consuming his estate, and some other extravagances of his : and with my second Lord, because my youngest daughter, the Lady Isabella Sackville, would not be brought to marry one of his younger sons, and that I would not relinquish my interest I had in five thousand pounds, being part of her portion, out of my lands in Craven. Nor did there want malicious ill willers, to blow and foment the coals of dissention between us ; so as in both their life times, the marble pillars of Knowle, in Kent, and Wilton, in Wiltshire, were to me oftentimes but the gay arbours of anguish ; insomuch as a wise man, that knew the insides of my fortune, would often say that I lived in both these my Lords’ great families as the river Roan, or Rhodanus, runs through the lake of Geneva without mingling any part of its streams with that lake ; for I gave myself wholly to retiredness as much as I could in both these great families, and made good books and virtuous thoughts my companions, which can never discern affliction, nor be daunted when it unjustly happens ; and by a happy genius I overcame all those troubles, the prayers of my blessed mother helping me therein.”

We have indeed abundant proof of the misery in which she must have lived with Lord Pembroke from the following letter, written by her to her uncle, Edward, Earl of Bedford, which remains in the Harleian Collection.

“ MY LORDE, “ Yesterdaye by Mr. Marshe I received your Lordship’s letter, by which I perceived how much you were trubled att the reporte of my beeing sicke, for which I humblé thanke your Lordshipe. I was so ill as I did make full account to die ; but now, I thanke God, I am somthinge better. And now, my Lorde, give me leve to desire that favouer from your Lordship as to speke earnestly to my Lorde for my coming up to the towne this terme, ether to Bainaerde’s Castell, or the Cok-pitt ; and I protest I will be reday to returne backe hether agane whensoever my Lorde appoynttes itt. I have to this purpos written now to my Lorde, and putt it inclosed in a letter of mine to my Ladey of Carnarvan, as desiring her to deliver itt to her father, whiche I know shee will do with all the advantage shee can, to farder this busines ; and iff your Lordshipe will joyne withe her in itt, you shall afforde a charittable and a most acceptable favouer to your Lordship’s cossen, and humble frind to command,

“ If my Lorde sholld deny my comming, then I desire your Lordship I may understand itt as sone as may bee, thatt so I may order my poore businesses as well as I cane witheoutt my one cominge to the towne ; for I dare not ventter to to come upe witheoutt his leve, lest he sholld take that occasion to turne mee out of this howse, as hee did outt of Whitthall, and then I shall not know wher to put my hede. I desire nott to staye in the towne above 10 dayes, or a fortnight att the most.”

This worthless Peer, from whom she had been obliged at length to separate herself, died in 1649; and now, finding herself emancipated from the thralldom under which she had so long laboured, her great spirit bounded, as it were, at once to the proper height which nature had allotted to it. She retired to her own superb estates in the north; not to seclude herself from society, but to cheer and enliven it by a princely hospitality; not to cultivate in mortification the devotions of the closet, but to invigorate the piety, and improve the morals, of a very large community, as well by her instruction as her example; not to increase her revenues by contracting her expenses, but to give loose to a profusion at once magnificent and economical, and to adorn a region with splendid monuments to the fame of her illustrious progenitors, and to the zeal with which she had devoted herself to the celebration of their memory. She was at that time more than sixty years old, but she entered on her task with the ardour and alacrity of youth. Skipton Castle, the chief seat of her family, and its parish Church, had been demolished by a siege during the grand rebellion, and five other castles and mansions of her ancestors were in ruins. All these she gradually restored to their pristine grandeur and convenience. She rebuilt the Church at Bongate, near Appleby, and the neighbouring Chapels of Brougham, Ninekirke, and Mallerstang, and a great part of the Church of Appleby, where also she built, and liberally endowed, a fine hospital for thirteen respectable widows. She testified her filial piety by placing in that town a statue of her beloved mother, and by covering, at Skipton, the ashes of her father with a superb tomb; and her affection to departed genius by erecting a monument for Spenser, in Westminster-abbey, and another for her tutor, Daniel, at Beckingham, in Somersetshire. She reared also in Westmoreland a stately obelisk, the remains of which, on the Roman road called the Maiden Way, are still identified by the name of "Countess Pillar," to mark the spot where, for the last time, she parted with her mother.

"But it is still more to her honour," feelingly and eloquently says Dr. Whitaker, in his History of Craven, "that she patronised the poets of her youth, and the distressed loyalists of her maturer age ; that she enabled her aged servants to end their lives in ease and independence ; and, above all, that she educated and portioned the illegitimate children of her first husband, the Earl of Dorset. Removing from castle to castle, she diffused plenty and happiness around her, by consuming on the spot the produce of her vast domains in hospitality and charity. Equally remote from the undistinguishing profusion of ancient times, and the parsimonious elegance of modern habits, her house was a school for the young, and a retreat for the aged ; an asylum for the persecuted, a college for the learned, and a pattern for all."

Spite of these admirable attributes, and of all the monuments which she herself had raised, the fame of this Lady was sinking fast into oblivion, when it was suddenly revived by the publication, in 1753, in a periodical paper called "the World," of the following letter, alleged to have been written by her to Sir Joseph Williamson, Secretary of State to Charles the Second, who had presumed to recommend to her a candidate for her borough of Appleby.

"I have been bullied by an Usurper ; I have been neglected by a Court ; but I will not be dictated to by a Subject. Your man sha'n't stand.

"ANNE DORSET, PEMBROKE, AND MONTGOMERY."

This letter, not to speak of its value as relating to the Countess's story, was peculiarly recommended to notice by some local circumstances. It appeared in a publication avowedly written by one justly and equally celebrated for the politeness of his literary taste, and for his extensive acquaintance with the later antiquities of his country. It flattered the political prejudices of the hour, and furnished a new theme to the Whigs, drawn from a period comparatively slavish, yet ascribed to one of the highest of the aristocracy. It was viewed as an inestimable curiosity in every point of consideration, and a thousand times quoted or repeated. It found its way even into the "Philosophy of Rhetoric" of Dr. Campbell, who uses it to illustrate a position. After all, I incline strongly to doubt, nay to deny, the genuineness of the document itself. Fond as the Countess was of recording even the most insignificant affairs of her life, there are no traces of it, nor of the circumstance which is said to have occasioned it, in her Memoirs; nor does the work in which it first appeared condescend to favour us with any hint of reference to the original authority from which it was derived. These, however, are but strong grounds for suspicion; but the internal evidence of the thing itself seems completely to destroy all chance of its authenticity. The measured construction and the brevity of each individual sentence; the sudden disjunction of the sentences from each other; the double repetition, in so small a space, of the same phrase; and the studied conciseness of the whole; are all evidently creatures of modern taste, and finished samples of that science of composition which had then (I mean when the Countess acquired her habits of writing,) scarcely dawned on English prose. No instance, I think, can be found of the verb "stand" having been used at that time in the sense to which it is applied in this letter, nor was the quaint and coarse word "bully" known but as a substantive. It is vexatious to be obliged to strip this Lady's life of an anecdote so interesting, but it would have been uncandid to insert it without the remarks which I have taken the liberty to make.

The Countess had the happiness to live very long, with few infirmities. Dr. Whitaker states her age to have been eighty-seven, but the inscription on the splendid tomb which had been erected by herself at Appleby expressly informs us that she was born on the thirtieth of January, 1590, and died, at her Castle at Brougham, on the twenty-second of March, 1675. Rainbow, Bishop of Carlisle, preached a sermon at her funeral, in the dull and conceited strain which then distinguished such orations ; from which, however, I will select a single passage, because we have hitherto received no account of her character but from her own pen. "She had," says he, "a clear soul, shining through a vivid body. Her body was durable and healthful, her soul sprightly ; of great understanding and judgment ; faithful memory, and ready wit. She had early gained a knowledge, as of the best things, so an ability to discourse in all commendable arts and sciences, as well as in those things which belong to persons of her birth and sex to know. She could discourse with virtuosos, travellers, scholars, merchants, divines, statesmen, and with good housewives, in any kind ; insomuch that a prime and elegant wit, well seen in all human learning," (Dr. Donne) "is reported to have said of her that she knew well how to discourse of all things, from predestination down to slea-silk. If she had sought fame rather than wisdom possibly she might have been ranked among those wits, and learned of that sex, of whom Pythagoras, or Plutarch, or any of the ancients, have made such honourable mention : but she affected rather to study with those noble Bereans, and those honourable women, who searched the Scriptures daily ; and, with Mary, she chose the better part, of learning the doctrine of Christ." The Sermon informs us that she left an account of "the Honours, Descents, Pedigrees, Estates, Titles, and Claims, of her progenitors, comprised, historically and methodically, in three volumes of the larger size." Those who have written of her seem to confound this work with the Memoirs of herself, which have already been spoken of, but the Bishop clearly distinguishes them. Lord Orford says that she wrote Memoirs of her first husband, the Earl of Dorset, which remain in manuscript. This has been, apparently with little reason, doubted by some later writers. Many curious effusions from her busy mind probably remain unknown, and buried among the evidences of her posterity.

This great Countess had by Lord Dorset three sons, who died infants, and two daughters ; Margaret, married to John Tufton, Earl of Thanet ; and Isabella, to James Compton, Earl of Northampton. By the Earl of Pembroke she had no children.

JAMES RAY, sculp.

WILLIAM KER,

EARL OF LOTHIAN

1673.

WILLIAM KERR,

THIRD EARL OF LOTHIAN.

SIR ROBERT KERR, created Earl of Ancram in 1633, whose incomparable loyalty, and whose elegant literary taste, rendered him a conspicuous ornament to his country, at a period when it unhappily possessed little of either, married, first, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Murray, of Blackbarony; and, secondly, Anne, daughter of William Stanley, sixth Earl of Derby, and widow of Sir Henry Portman, of Orchard in Somersetshire. His sole issue by the first of those ladies was William, the subject of this memoir. By the other he had several children; and his Earldom, which had been settled first on the fruit of his second marriage, devolved accordingly at his death on Charles, the only son, whose line failing in the next generation, it reverted to this nobleman, whose lineal descendant, the present Marquis of Lothian, now enjoys it. William, though third Earl of Lothian of his family, did not inherit that dignity. He had married Anne Kerr, Countess of Lothian in her own right, daughter and heir to the second Earl, a lady of his own blood, but most distant kindred, and the honour was therefore conferred on him by a new patent, on the 31st of July, 1631. I state these facts thus particularly because they are involved in some degree of intricacy, and have been more than once misrepresented.

This Earl, the chief care of whose parents had been to fix in his mind, even from his cradle, an attachment to monarchical government, and an affectionate veneration towards the person of the reigning king, became, by a strange perverseness, perhaps the most sincere and bitter enemy among his countrymen to both. In this double rebellion, however, at once against his father and his prince, he had the merit at least of consistency, for his fidelity to the cause which he had espoused was invariable, and even unsuspected, and his motives wholly disinterested ; and hence, rather than from his talents, which were not of the highest class, he possessed the entire confidence of his party. He appeared in 1638 among the most vehement of the covenanters, and was in the following year nominated, with thirteen others, to manage the deceitful and vexatious treaty then offered by them to Charles at Berwick. In 1640 he had a command in the Scottish army which invaded England : was present at the siege of Newcastle-on-Tyne, which was the only exploit worth naming in the expedition, and on the reduction of that town was appointed governor of it by the party which then ruled Scotland. He was soon after named one of the four commissioners of the Scottish Treasury, and in 1641 was placed at the head of a deputation of trusty covenanters, who were sent to London to offer to the Parliament a Scottish army to serve against the Irish rebels, and to procure from that assembly an engagement to maintain such troops as might be raised for that purpose. This agreement, which had indeed been previously made, and which had deeper views than the proposed expedition, was presently confirmed. The army was levied, and Lothian, to whom the command of a regiment was given, sailed with it to Ireland, where he seems to have done nothing worth recording.

He was despatched in 1643 to Paris, under the pretence of adjusting some differences relative to the privileges of his countrymen in their commerce with France, but in fact for the purpose of weakening the interest and distracting the measures of Charles in that court. On his return he landed at an English port, and went to Oxford to wait on the King, who, having been apprised of his dealings in France, caused him to be arrested, and he was committed, under an accusation of high treason, to the castle of Bristol, where he remained for several months a close prisoner. Released from thence, in compliance with a petition specially sent for that purpose from the self-appointed government at Edinburgh to the King, he returned into Scotland, and immediately accepted from the same persons a commission, directed to the Marquis of Argyll and himself, for the raising an army to oppose to those brave and generous efforts for the royal cause by which the gallant Montrose was then exciting the admiration even of his enemies. They mustered their friends and dependants, and were presently in the field at the head of a powerful force; but their campaign was short and inglorious. Lothian, who commanded fifteen hundred horse, appears to have been but once engaged, and on that occasion fled ignominiously. It occurred in a skirmish under the walls of Faivy Castle, near Strathbogie, and is thus spoken of by George Wiseheart, afterwards Bishop of Edinburgh, the faithful biographer of Montrose:—"His," (Montrose's) "horse, which were but fifty, being disposed in a place of danger, he timely secured them by lining them with musqueteers; for Lothian charged them with five whole troops, who, before they had crossed over half a field that lay between them, being scared with our shot, wheeled about and returned to the place from whence they came." Argyll soon after abandoned his command, and shut himself up, with a garrison for his own defence, in his castle of Inverary; and Lothian, as we hear no more of him in the field, probably followed the same course.

In the autumn of 1646 he was placed at the head of a commission, under the authority and direction of which himself and some others waited on the King, then in the hands of the Scottish army, to exhort him to accede to the last bitter propositions offered to him by the rebel Parliament in England, which, as is well known, Charles positively and magnanimously refused. The surrender of that Prince's person by the traitors who then governed Scotland speedily followed. Lothian, who had been a willing party to that infamous measure, and had protested in Parliament against a late feeble effort of doubtful loyalty, which is known in the Scottish history by the name of "the Duke of Hamilton's engagement," was now appointed Secretary of State, in the room of that nobleman's brother, the Earl of Lanerick (Lanark), who soon after fled to Holland. In the mean time the close of Charles's miseries approached. A treaty however still subsisted between him and his House of Commons, whose authority, now little less shorn than his own, the leaders of the covenant faction had resolved to support to their utmost; nor were they less anxious to deceive the world into a milder opinion of their late treachery towards the King by some public expression of their horror and resentment of the extremities to which he was reduced by the new military usurpation. With these views, as Lord Clarendon informs us, "the Earl of Lothian, and two others who were known to be most zealous for the covenant, and most enraged and incensed against the proceedings of the army, were made choice of, and presently sent away that they might make all possible haste to Westminster, and were, immediately upon their arrival, to demand permission to wait upon the King, wherever he should be, and to receive from him such further directions as he should judge necessary for his service." They had scarcely arrived in London when Cromwell marched his army thither; dispersed in a moment the frantic and iniquitous assembly, which had for some years usurped the name and authority of a Parliament; and erected his "High Court of Justice" for the condemnation of the King.

The trouble of Lothian's commission was considerably narrowed by these events. He had been directed to flatter this nominal Parliament; to amuse the unhappy Charles with new deceptions: and to enter a cold dissent, should circumstances render it necessary, from any resolution of violence towards the royal person. A large abstract of his instructions, displaying a turpitude of various treachery inconsistent even with the fraud and apathy of the vilest diplomatic negotiations recorded in history, has been preserved by Lord Clarendon. Nothing, however, now remained to be done but to make the protestation against the sacrifice of the King, which was not presented till he had been twice dragged before the tribunal by which he was to be judged, and was couched in terms which scarcely maintained even the affectation of sincerity. The remnant of a legislature which Cromwell had permitted to subsist, partly understood the spirit which had dictated this profession, and, having first murdered the King, returned to Lothian such an answer as they thought would be agreeable to the persons by whom he had been sent, as well as to himself, who, as Lord Clarendon informs us, "had upon all occasions carried the rebellion highest, and showed the most implacable malice to the person of the King."

But, however welcome the treason, some points in the reply of the traitors were little relished by Lothian and his brethren. They were told plainly that the government of England was to be strictly republican, and, almost as plainly, that it was intended to compel Scotland to adopt the same system. The constitution of Scotland, a monarchy with few limitations, had remained untouched; and the covenanters, far from aiming at the destruction of the regal character, looked forward with hope to the authority of the young King, as an instrument which they might easily bend to the accomplishment of all their purposes. The commissioners therefore rejoined, in a tone which gave much offence, and their English friends having neither time nor inclination to expostulate further with them, and foreseeing some probable inconvenience from the liberty of persons of such condition disposed to argue for royalty, shut them up without ceremony; nor were they released till the arrival of a remonstrance from Scotland, when they were sent to Gravesend strictly guarded, and embarked there for their own country. Of Lothian we have no further intelligence after this period, than that he was despatched to Breda by the Parliament in the beginning of the succeeding year, 1650, together with the Earl of Cassilis and others, to invite Charles the Second to Scotland, on the hard conditions so frequently rejected by his royal father, as they now were by himself.

William, third Earl of Lothian, survived till 1675. He had issue by his Countess, who has been mentioned above, five sons ; Robert, the eldest, who succeeded to the dignities, and was in 1701 created Marquis of Lothian ; Sir William ; Charles, ancestor of the Kerrs of Abbotsrule ; Harry, and John, who died young. He had also nine daughters ; Anne, wife of Alexander Fraser, Master of Saltoun ; Elizabeth, married to John Lord Borthwick ; Jane and Margaret, who died young ; Mary, wife of James Brodie, of Brodie ; Margaret, married to James Richardson, of Smeaton ; Vere, to Lord Neil Campbell, second son of Archibald Marquis of Argyll ; Henrietta, to Sir Francis Scott, of Thirlestane ; and Lilius, who died unmarried.
