LAW OF EVIDENCE

SECOND EDITION

PREFACE

TO THE SECOND EDITION

In this second edition a number of radical changes have been made.

(1) The preliminary statements of fact, as found in the original reports, have been included.

(2) The arguments of counsel, whenever published in the original reports, have been included, in salient extracts.

(3) Some history of each principal rule, as well as some modern critical comment on it, has been given a place, by short extracts printed in smaller type.

(4) The total number of cases and extracts has been increased by more than one fifth; the total number of pages has been increased by more than one half.

(5) Perhaps one half of the former cases have been replaced by different cases.

(6) The distribution of the cases, in time and locality, has been changed. About one fourth are English, and three fourths are American. Of the American cases, two fifths are dated since 1895, one quarter since 1904, and one tenth since 1908. The attempt has been to represent all the masters of judicial opinion-writing, of whom so many have in recent years arisen to give distinction to our Supreme Courts.

(7) Statutes are represented in thirty-eight passages. Illustrative dialogues from trials are represented in fifty-eight passages.

(8) In the Appendices are placed two sets of practical exercises. Experience has shown that, after a scientific study of the individual rules, the student still needs (and can profitably seek in a law-school course) two sorts of practical exercise. (1) He needs to study and discuss problems which range indefinitely over the whole mass of the rules and conceal within themselves multiple possibilities. Thus only can he meet the rules under the guise in which they really present themselves at a trial. (2) He needs to do something himself, by way of making or opposing an offer of evidence, as he would be doing it at an actual trial. Thus only can he test whether he has grasped the rule as something to be used, not merely to be learned.

The use of this volume, as planned by the compiler for his own classes, is to furnish materials for the study and teaching of the Rules of Evidence strictly so called, i.e., the rules of law for Admissibility, as determined by the Court. This is the orthodox subject of the traditional law-school course in Evidence.

But there is another and equally important part of the advocate's task of proving a case of facts, viz., the process of reasoning upon the evidence to persuade the jury, — the process of Proof. The weight of the evidence — each separate piece of it, groups of such pieces, and the whole mass — must be analyzed and reasoned upon, so as to make the jury believe or disbelieve the facts alleged and disputed. This is something quite different from the artificial rules of Admissibility, as applied by the Judge. It is, in truth, the culminating process of the whole trial. It involves the main art of reasoning to the truth about human affairs in litigation.

Yet it has never been systematically studied in law schools. It ought to be. There is plenty of science in it; and there are abundant materials for study. It involves logic, psychology, and the general science of human nature. To ignore this great part of the advocate's work is unnatural. Should we not do something to cultivate this part of the field?

A collection of materials, texts, illustrations, and problems, has been made for this purpose in a separate volume, entitled "The Principles of Judicial Proof, as contained in Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials."

That volume, it is believed, can best be used first, before the present one, — in either a separate or an introductory course. Its materials are the natural ones for a student to begin on. They represent what the layman always conceives as the chief thing in a trial, viz., the reasoning to the jury on the persuasive effect of the admitted evidence. They serve to train the student to analyze and correct his loose lay notions of proof, to dissect the logic of circumstances, to estimate the credit of witnesses, and to weigh the total effect of a mass of mixed evidence. Moreover, by first working upon that volume, and thus becoming acquainted with the various sorts of evidence, he gains this additional advantage, viz., that when he then proceeds to study the artificial rules of Admissibility, the materials to which those rules apply are already familiar to him.

He is thus spared that oppressive sense of strangeness and futility which usually attends him in his first (and even later) wrestlings with those rules; and he can make rapid progress with them. Thus, as a help to the more efficient study of the rules of Admissibility, the prior study of the Principles of Judicial Proof is much to be desired.

That volume, and the present one, are constructed independently, and either can be used without the other. But the Compiler is convinced that a future generation will see the present rules of Admissibility much simplified and their importance reduced; while the field for the systematic study of the principles of Proof will be recognized and its field enlarged, — as it ought to be. In that view, he has tried to help forward the arrival of the coming science.

THE LAW OF EVIDENCE

INTRODUCTORY TOPICS

1. HISTORY.[1] The marked divisions of chronology, for our law of evidence, may be said to be seven, — from primitive times to 1200 A.D., thence to 1500, thence to 1700, to 1790, to 1830, to 1860, and to the present time:

(1) A. D. 700–1200. Up to the period of the 1200s, the history of the rules of evidence, in the modern sense, is like the chapter upon ophidians in Erin; for there were none. Under the primitive practices of trial by ordeal, by battle, and by compurgation, the proof is accomplished by a judicium Dei, and there is no room for our modern notion of persuasion of the tribunal by the credibility of the witnesses;[2] for the tribunal merely verified the observance of the due

The Continental system in its history may be more fully studied in the work of Raoul de la Grasserie, "De la Preuve au Civil et au Criminel, en droit français et dans les législations étrangères; Evolution, Comparaison, Critique, Réforme" (2 vols. 1912).

[2] This is indeed elaborately denied by Déclareuil, in "Nouvelle revue hist. du droit fr. et étr.," 1898, XXII, 220 ff.; but all prior students have assumed the contrary. It is no doubt difficult to replace ourselves in the primitive mental attitude.

formalities, and did not conceive of these as directly addressed to their own reasoning powers. Nevertheless, a few marks, indelibly made by these earlier usages, were left for a long time afterwards in our law. The summoning of attesting witnesses to prove a document, the quantitative effect of an oath, the conclusiveness of a seal in fixing the terms of a documentary transaction, the necessary production of the original of a document, — these rules all trace a continuous existence back to this earliest time, although they later took on different forms and survived for reasons not at all connected with their primitive theories.

(2) A. D. 1200–1500. With the full advent of the jury, in the 1200s, the general surroundings of the modern system are prepared; for now the tribunal is to determine out of its own conscious persuasion of the facts, and not merely by supervising external tests. The change is of course gradual; and trial by jury is as yet only one of several competing methods; but at least a system for the process of persuasion becomes possible. In this period, no new specific rules seem to have sprung up. The practice for attesting witnesses, oaths and documentary originals is developed. The rule for the conclusiveness of a sealed writing is definitely established. But during these three centuries the general process of pleading and procedure is only gradually differentiated from that of proof, — chiefly because the jurors are as yet relied upon to furnish in themselves both knowledge and decision; for they are not commonly caused to be informed by witnesses, in the modern sense.

(3) A. D. 1500–1700. By the 1500s, the constant employment of witnesses, as the jury's chief source of information, brings about a radical change. Here enter, very directly, the possibilities of our modern system. With all the emphasis gradually cast upon the witnesses, their words and their documents, the whole question of admissibility arises. One first great consequence is the struggle between the numerical or quantitative system, which characterized the canon law and still dominated all other methods of proof, and the unfettered system-less jury trial; and it was not for two centuries that the numerical system was finally repulsed. Another cardinal question now necessarily faced was that of the competency of witnesses; and by the end of the 1500s the foundations were laid for all the rules of disqualifications which prevailed thenceforward for more than two centuries, and in part still remain. At the same time, and chiefly from a simple failure to differentiate, most of the rules of privilege and privileged communication were thereby brought into existence, at least in embryo. The rule for attorneys, which alone stood upon its own ground, also belongs here, though its reasons were newly conceived after the lapse of a century. A third great principle, the right to have compulsory attendance of witnesses, marks the very beginning of this period. Under the primitive notions, this all rested upon the voluntary action of one's partisans; the calling of compurgators and documentary attestors, under the older methods of trial, was in effect a matter of contract. But as soon as the chief reliance came to be the witnesses to the jurors, and the latter ceased to act on their own knowledge, the necessity for the provision of such information, compulsory if not otherwise, became immediately obvious. The idea progressed slowly; it was enforced first for the Crown, next for civil parties; and not until the next period was it conceded to accused persons. Thus was laid down indirectly the general principle that there is no privilege to refuse to be a witness; to which the other rules, above mentioned, subsequently became contrasted as exceptions. A fourth important principle, wholly independent in origin, here also arose and became fixed by the end of this period, — the privilege against self-crimination. The creature, under another form, of the canon law, in which it had a long history of its own, it was transferred, under stress of political turmoil, into the common law, and thus, by a singular contrast, came to be a most distinctive feature of our trial system. About the same period — the end of the 1600s — an equally distinctive feature, the rule against using an accused's character, became settled. Finally, the "parol evidence" rule enlarged its scope, and came to include all writings and not merely sealed documents; this development, and the enactment of the statute of frauds and perjuries, represent a special phase of thought in the end of this period. It ends, however, rather with the Restoration of 1660 than with the Revolution of 1688, or the last years of the century; for the notable feature of it is that the regenerating results of the struggle against the arbitrary methods of James I and Charles I began to be felt as early as the return of Charles II. The mark of the new period is seen at the Restoration. Justice, on all hands, then begins to mend. Crudities which Matthew Hale permitted, under the Commonwealth, Scroggs put aside, under James II. The privilege against self-crimination, the rule for two witnesses in treason, and the character rule — three landmarks of our law of evidence — find their first full recognition in the last days of the Stuarts.

(4) A. D. 1700–1790. Two circumstances now contributed independently to a further development of the law on two opposite sides, its philosophy and its practical efficiency. On the one hand, the final establishment of the right of cross-examination by counsel, at the beginning of the 1700s, gave to our law of evidence the distinction of possessing the most efficacious expedient ever invented for the extraction of truth (although, to be sure, like torture, — that great instrument of the continental system, — it is almost equally powerful for the creation of false impressions). A notable consequence was that by the multiplication of oral interrogation at trials the rules of evidence were now developed in detail upon such topics as naturally came thus into new prominence. All through the 1700s this expansion proceeded, though slowly. On the other hand, the already existing material began now to be treated in doctrinal form. The first treatise on the law of evidence was that of Chief Baron Gilbert, not published till after his death in 1726. About the same time the abridgments of Bacon and of Comyns gave many pages to the title of Evidence;[1] but no other treatise appeared for a quarter of a century, when the notes of Mr. J. Bathurst (later Lord Chancellor) were printed, under the significant title of the "Theory of Evidence." But this propounding of a system was as yet chiefly the natural culmination of the prior century's work, and was independent of the expansion of practice now going on. In Gilbert's book, for example, even in the fifth edition of 1788, there are in all, out of the three hundred pages, less than five concerned with the new topics brought up by the practice of cross-examination; in Bathurst's treatise (by this time embodied in his nephew Buller's "Trials at Nisi Prius") the number is hardly more; Blackstone's Commentaries, in 1768, otherwise so full, are here equally barren. The most notable result of these disquisitions, on the theoretical side, was the establishment of the "best evidence" doctrine, which dominated the law for nearly a century later. But this very doctrine tended to preserve a general consciousness of the supposed simplicity and narrowness of compass of the law of evidence. As late as the very end of the century

Mr. Burke could argue down the rules of evidence, when attempted to be enforced upon the House of Lords at Warren Hastings' trial, and ridicule them as petty and inconsiderable.[1] But, none the less, the practice had materially expanded during his lifetime. In this period, besides the rules for impeachment and corroboration of witnesses (which were due chiefly to the development of cross-examination), are to be reckoned also the origins of the rules for confessions, for leading questions, and for the order of testimony. The various principles affecting documents — such as the authorization of certified (or office) copies and the conditions dispensing from the production of originals — now also received their general and final shape.

(5) A. D. 1790–1830. The full spring-tide of the system had now arrived. In the ensuing generation the established principles began to be developed into rules and precedents of minutiæ relatively innumerable to what had gone before. In the Nisi Prius reports of Peake, Espinasse, and Campbell, centering around the quarter-century from 1790 to 1815, there are probably more rulings upon evidence than in all the prior reports of two centuries. In this development the dominant influence is plain; it was the increase of printed reports of Nisi Prius rulings.[2] This was at first the cause, and afterwards the self-multiplying effect, of the detailed development of the rules. Hitherto, upon countless details, the practice had varied greatly on the different circuits; moreover, it had rested largely in the memory of the experienced leaders of the trial bar and in the momentary discretion of the judges. In both respects it therefore lacked fixity, and was not amenable to tangible authority. These qualities it now rapidly gained. As soon as Nisi Prius reports multiplied and became available to all, the circuits must be reconciled, the rulings once made and recorded must be followed, and these precedents must be open to the entire profession to be invoked. There was, so to speak, a sudden precipitation of all that had hitherto been suspended in solution. This effect began immediately to be assisted and emphasized by the appearance of new treatises, summing up the recent acquisitions of precedent and practice. In nearly the same year, Peake, for England (1801), and MacNally, for Ireland (1802), printed small volumes whose contents, as compared with those of Gilbert and Buller, seem to represent almost a different system, so novel were their topics. In 1806, Evans' Notes to Pothier on Obligations was made the vehicle of the first reasoned analysis of the rules. In this respect it was epoch-making; and its author in a later time once quietly complained that its pages were "more often quoted than acknowledged." The room for new treatises were rapidly enlarging. Peake and MacNally, as handbooks of practice, were out of date within a few years, and no new editions could cure them. In 1814, and then in 1824, came Phillipps and Starkie, — in method combining Evans' philosophy with Peake's strict reflection of the details of practice. There was now indeed a system of evidence, consciously and fully realized. Across the water a similar stage had been reached. By a natural interval Peake's treatise was balanced, in 1810, by Swift's Connecticut book, while Phillipps and

[1] As to rules of law and evidence, he did not know what they meant; . . . it was true, something had been written on the law of Evidence, but very general, very abstract, and comprised in so small a compass that a parrot he had known might get them by rote in one half-hour and repeat them in five minutes" (1794, Hastings' Trial, Lords' Journal, Feb. 25).

[2] Compare Campbell's account of the conditions when he began to report in 1807 ("Life," I, 214).

Starkie (after a period of sufficiency under American annotations) were replaced by Greenleaf's treatise of 1842.

(6) A. D. 1830–1860. Meantime, the advance of consequences was proceeding, by action and reaction. The treatises of Peake and Phillipps, by embodying in print the system as it existed, at the same time exposed it to the light of criticism. It contained, naturally enough, much that was merely inherited and traditional, much that was outgrown and outworn. The very efforts to supply explicit reasons for all this made it the easier to puncture the insufficient reasons and to impale the irrational rules. This became the office of Bentham. Beginning with the first publication, in French, of his Theory of Judicial Evidence, in 1818, the influence of his thought upon the law of evidence gradually became supreme. While time has only ultimately vindicated and accepted most of his ideas (then but chimeras) for other practical reforms, and though some still remain untried, the results of his proposals in this department began almost immediately to be achieved. Mature experience constantly inclines us to believe that the best results on human action are seldom accomplished by sarcasm and invective; for the old fable of the genial sun and the raging wind repeats itself. But Bentham's case must always stand out as a proof that sometimes the contrary is true, — if conditions are meet. No one can say how long our law might have waited for regeneration, if Bentham's diatribes had not lashed the community into a sense of its shortcomings. It is true that he was particularly favored by circumstances in two material respects, — the one personal, the other broadly social. He gained, among others, two incomparable disciples, who served as a fulcrum from which his lever could operate directly upon legislation. Henry Brougham and Thomas Denman combined with singular felicity the qualities of leadership in the technical arts of their profession and of energy for the abstract principles of progress. Holding the highest offices of justice, and working through a succession of decades, they were enabled, within a generation, to bring Bentham's ideas directly into influence upon the law. One who reads the great speech of Brougham, on February 7, 1828, on the state of the common law courts, and the reports of Denman and his colleagues, in 1852 and 1853, on the common law procedure, is perusing epoch-making deliverances of the century.[1] The other circumstance that favored Bentham's cause was the radical readiness of the times. The French Revolution had acted in England; and as soon as the Napoleonic wars were over, the influence began to be felt. One part of public opinion was resolved to achieve a radical change; the other and dominant part felt assured that if the change did not come as reform, it would come as revolution; and so the reform was given, to prevent the revolution. In a sense, it did not much matter to them where the reform came about, — in the economic, or the political, or the juridical field, — if only there was reform. At this stage, Bentham's denouncing voice concentrated attention on the subject of public justice, — criminal law and civil procedure; and so it was here that the movement was felt among the first. As a matter of chronological order, the first considerable achievements were in the field of criminal law, beginning in 1820, under Romilly and Mackintosh; then came the political upheaval of the Reform

[1] "The great controversy now [1851] is upon the Evidence Bill, allowing the parties to be examined against and for themselves. . . . If it passes, it will create a new era in the administration of justice in this country" (Campbell's "Life," II, 292). "Our new procedure (which is in truth a juridical revolution) is now [1854] established, and people submit to it quietly" (Ibid., II, 328).

Bill, in 1832, under Russell and Grey; next the economic regeneration, beginning with Huskisson and culminating with Peel in the Corn Law Repeal of 1846. Not before the Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852 and 1854 were large and final results achieved for the Benthamic ideas in procedure and evidence. But over the whole preceding twenty years had been spread initial and instructive reforms. Brougham's speech of February 7, 1828, was the real signal for the beginning of this epoch, — a beginning which would doubtless have culminated more rapidly if urgent economic and political crises had not intervened to absorb the legislative energy.

In the United States, the counterpart of this period came only a little later. It seems to have begun all along the line and was doubtless inspired by the accounts of progress made and making in England, as well as by the writings of Edward Livingston, the American Bentham, and by the legislative efforts of David Dudley Field, in the realm of civil procedure. The period from 1840 to 1870 saw the enactment, in the various jurisdictions in this country, of most of the reformatory legislation which had been carried or proposed in England.

(7) A. D. 1860. After the Judicature Act of 1875, and the Rules of Court (of 1883) which under its authority were formulated, the law of evidence in England attained rest. It is still overpatched and disfigured with multiplicitous fragmentary statutes, especially for documentary evidence. But it seems to be harmonious with the present demands of justice, and above all to be so certain and settled in its acceptance that no further detailed development is called for. It is a sub-stratum of the law which comes to light only rarely in the judicial rulings upon practice.

Far otherwise in this country. The latest period in the development of the law of evidence is marked by a temporary degeneracy. Down to about 1870, the established principles, both of common law rules and of statutory reforms, were re-stated by our judiciary in a long series of opinions which, for careful and copious reasoning, and for the common sense of experience, were superior (on the whole) to the judgments uttered in the native home of our law. Partly because of the lack of treatises and even of reports, — partly because of the tendency to question imported rules and therefore to defend on grounds of principle and policy whatever could be defended, — partly because of the moral compulsion upon the judiciary, in new communities, to vindicate by intellectual effort its right to supremacy over the bar, — and partly also because of the advent, coincidently, of the same rationalizing spirit which led to the reformatory legislation, — this very necessity of restatement led to the elaboration of a finely reasoned system. The "mint, anise, and cummin" of mere precedent [1] were not unduly revered. There was always a reason given, — even though it might not always be a worthy reason. The pronouncement of Bentham came near to be exemplified, that "so far as evidence is concerned, the English practice needs no improvement but from its own stores. Consistency, consistency, is the one thing needful. Preserve consistency, and perfection is accomplished." [2]

But the newest States in time came to be added. New reports spawned a

[1] Lumpkin, J., in 33 Ga. 306.

[2] "Rationale of Judicial Evidence," b. X, conclusion. Bentham never failed to preach the impropriety of not furnishing reasons. "'I think, therefore I exist,' was the argument of Descartes; 'I exist, therefore I have no need to think or be thought about,' is the argument of jurisprudence" (b. II, c. x, § 12; so also in b. III, c. iv, note).

multifarious mass of new rulings in fifty jurisdictions, — each having theoretically an equal claim to consideration. The liberal spirit of choosing and testing the better rule degenerated into a spirit of empiric eclecticism in which all things could be questioned and requestioned ad infinitum. The partisan spirit of the bar, contesting desperately on each trifle, and the unjust doctrine of new trials, tempting counsel to push up to the appellate courts upon every ruling of evidence, increased this tendency. Added to this was the supposed necessity in the newer jurisdictions of deciding over again all the details that had been long settled in the older ones. Here the lack of local traditions at the bar and of self-confidence on the bench led to the tedious re-exposition of countless elementary rules. This lack of peremptoriness on the supreme bench, and (no less important) the marked separation of personality between courts of trial and courts of final decision, led also to the multifarious heaping up, within each jurisdiction, of rulings upon rulings involving identical points of decision. This last phenomenon may be due to many subtly conspiring causes. But at any rate the fact is that in numerous instances, and in almost every jurisdiction, recorded decisions of Supreme Courts upon precisely the same rule and the same application of it can be reckoned by the dozens and scores. This wholly abnormal state of things — in clear contrast to that of the modern English epoch — is the marked feature of the present period of development in our own country.

Of the change that is next to come, and of the period of its arrival, there seem as yet to be no certain signs. Probably it will come either in the direction of the present English practice — by slow formation of professional habits — or in the direction of attempted legislative relief from the mass of bewildering judicial rulings — by a concise code. The former alone might suffice. But the latter will be a false and futile step, unless it is founded upon the former; and in any event the danger is that it will be premature. A code fixes error as well as truth. No code can be worth casting, until there has been more explicit discussion of the reasons for the rules and more study of them from the point of view of synthesis and classification. The time must first come when, in the common understanding and acceptance of the profession, "every rule is referred articulately and definitely to an end which it subserves, and when the grounds for desiring that end are stated or are ready to be stated in words." [1]

[1] Mr. Justice Holmes.

2. Definitions. In Procedure, i.e., the method of enforcing legal relations, one of the stages is the Trial, i.e., the parties' attempt to demonstrate to the tribunal the correctness of their respective legal positions. In the trial, the materials used comprise Evidence and Argument. The term Evidence is applied to all adduced materials outside of the tribunal's own mental operations; the term Argument is applied to the parties' words invoking those mental operations upon the evidence adduced.

Evidence may concern either law or fact, so-called, but in common usage is applied to the latter only. Evidence may be offered to either Judge or Jury, — commonly to the latter.

Evidence, as applied to the persuasion of a jury on facts, has three aspects:

(a) The Evidence, strictly so-called, i.e., the materials, data, or "facts," as offered, and each piece of such materials.

(b) The Inference, i.e., the persuasive effect supposed to belong provisionally to each piece of these materials; and

(c) The Proof, i.e., the total persuasive effect of the whole mass of data on the issue before the tribunal.

In the Anglo-American system of procedure, the parties to the cause are expected to obtain the evidence and present it to the tribunal; rarely does the tribunal itself search for evidence. Hence, the rules of evidence are commonly regarded from the party's point of view. Thus regarded, they fall naturally into five broad divisions (here entitled Books):

Book I. What Evidence may be presented (Rules of Admissibility).

Book II. What is the Procedure for presenting Evidence (Offers, Objections, and Rulings).

Book III. To Whom the Evidence is to be presented (Judge or Jury; Law and Fact).

Book IV. By Whom the Evidence is to be presented (Burdens of Proof; Presumptions).

Book V. Of What Matters No Evidence need be presented (Judicial Admissions; Judicial Notice).

BOOK I. RULES OF ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE

2. Definitions (continued). When Evidence is presented, the main object is, of course, to persuade the jury with it. Hence, the logical (or, probative; or, persuasive) power of the evidence (each piece and the whole mass) on the jury's belief, i.e., the Weight of the evidence, its Proof, would naturally be supposed to be the sole consideration. But it is not. Before the evidence is allowed to be presented to the jury, the Judge determines, under the law, its Admissibility; and often rejects it.

This is because long experience in millions of trials has shown plainly the abuses and dangers of unrestricted admission. In the first place, the jurors are untrained in the science and art of estimating evidence, and need to be protected by the law from those dangers. In the next place, the Jurors, and all men, are too susceptible to the false force of some kinds of evidence. In the third place, there are clients and counsel in all epochs and communities, who are unscrupulous or careless or lazy or ignorant enough to present all sorts of false or misleading evidence; and thus the safeguards tested by experience must be uniformly applied in all cases, to prevent the risk of erroneous verdicts. The policies or principles thus found useful in experience are applied to restrict the kinds of evidence that may be used, or to impose conditions on their use. Thus arise the Rules of Admissibility.

These rules of Admissibility therefore are not based on the intrinsic persuasive (logical, probative) effect of the evidence itself. That is, those rules do not exclude the evidence because it does not logically prove or persuade the mind; nor even because its probative value is small. Some of the rules, to be sure, are applied only to evidence having small probative value; but there is always some other special policy combining therewith to justify the rule. Hence, the principles of Logic and Psychology (as examined in the present Compiler's "Principles of Judicial Proof") furnish little or no basis for those Rules of Admissibility. Most of them are based mainly on a broad experience, in trials, of the dangers of misuse of evidence by jurors and parties. The others are based on other policies of civic importance, which override for the time being the quest for truth in trials.

In studying the Rules of Admissibility, therefore, the first caution is, Not to regard them as synonymous with the principles of Proof, or Weight of Evidence; and the second caution is, To look for the practical policy or principle of safeguard, based on trial experience, which is at the basis of each one.

The Rules of Admissibility fall into two groups, according to the purpose of the policy which dictates the rule.

The first group (here termed Part I), Rules of Auxiliary Probative Policy, aim to safeguard against risks of erroneous verdicts. They have regard only for the ascertainment of the truth in litigation. They assume that truth, in the long run, will best be attained by the exclusions or conditions which they impose.

The second group (here termed Part II), Rules of Extrinsic Policy, are based, on the contrary, on outside considerations. They frankly admit that they will hamper the inquiry into truth, but maintain that other interests are paramount, for the time being. They do not carry their scope so far as to stifle the truth; they merely exclude a small part of the materials available for getting at it. And they do this because the incidental loss, viz., the risk of blocking the truth, is small as compared with the gain to the extrinsic interests thereby protected. This group of rules comprises the various so-called Privileges, — husband and wife, attorney and client, State secrets, self-crimination, etc.

PART I. RULES OF AUXILIARY PROBATIVE POLICY

2. Definitions (continued).

The Rules of Auxiliary Probative Policy may best be classified, not according to the kinds of policy involved (which are more or less conglomerate and inseparable), but according to what each rule actually does to the evidence. There are thus five groups (here termed Titles): Eliminative, Preferential, Analytic, Prophylactic, Synthetic.

Title I: Eliminative Rules. These rules simply shut out certain kinds of evidence. The rules are numerous; but the policies which underlie them are mainly three: Undue Prejudice, Unfair Surprise, and Confusion of Issues.

Undue Prejudice. This policy rests on the danger, shown by experience, that juries will be moved by prejudice or ignorance to give inordinate weight to evidence which intrinsically should not persuade them, and that parties will take advantage of this trait. For instance, the jurors, on hearing of an accused's criminal record, may find him guilty of the act now charged, without actually believing that he did it, and merely because he seems a fit man to be punished generally.

Unfair Surprise. This policy rests on the danger, shown by experience, that an opponent may be overcome by false evidence, merely for lack of an opportunity before trial to prepare to refute it. The mere surprise is of no account; but when a man is surprised to find false evidence produced, it might be unfair to him to admit it, if he could not have known in advance the tenor of the false evidence.

Confusion of Issues. This policy rests on the danger, shown by experience, that a cumulation of complex and controverted details on collateral issues may so distract the attention of the jurors that the real issue will be lost from sight, and they will be moved to render their general verdict by some of these collateral details, not by the evidence on the main issues of the case.

These three policies, expressed or implied, appear again and again as the source of most of the rules in this group.

Nevertheless, the slight probative value of certain kinds of evidence enters often as a part of the reason for the rule. I.e., the above policies would not avail to exclude the evidence unless it had been in itself of slight probative value. Thus in many cases, notably under Circumstantial Evidence, the judge will be found discussing the slight probative value of the evidence offered, because the policies of exclusion would otherwise not be applied.

In Testimonial Evidence (Sub-title II), to be sure, there is little said by the judges about the three policies above named; the slight probative value of the testimony is apparently the main consideration. Yet, underlying and unexpressed, is a general policy, allied to that of Undue Prejudice, which fears the danger of the jury being misled by a plausible witness who really is of a class deemed untrustworthy. This policy, being rarely expressed, cannot be given a name. And it tends to be less and less considered; so that testimonial evidence is now more freely admitted than formerly. Nevertheless, in these rules, as in those for Circumstantial Evidence, the distinction should always be looked for between excluding the evidence solely for slight probative value and excluding it because of known dangers of fraud, prejudice, etc.

Title II: Preferential Rules. These rules, declaring one kind of evidence preferable to another, insist that the former must be produced, if it can be; or, otherwise put, they refuse to admit the latter unless the former is shown to be not obtainable. They rest on the known risks of error in the latter sort. Such are the rules for producing the original of a document (instead of a copy), and for producing the attesting witness to a will (instead of a mere bystander).

Title III: Analytic Rules. This type of rule requires that the evidence be tested, to expose its possible weakness, at the time of its admission. There is but one rule exclusively of this type, — the Hearsay rule, i.e., requiring that testimony be delivered in court, where the opponent can cross-examine the witness and the tribunal can observe his demeanor under examination. The benefits of this process are the same that we obtain in chemistry by testing an unknown liquid with litmus-paper or by roasting a salt in a test-tube. The actual process is therefore one of analysis, — separating into plain view the strong or weak elements hitherto lying hidden in the testimony and otherwise unascertainable.

Title IV: Prophylactic Rules. These rules apply to certain kinds of evidence an extra measure of precaution which will counteract its possible dangers. The oath, the separation of witnesses, etc., belong here. The policy of these rules recognizes that there are special dangers of falsity, but realizes that we cannot expect always to detect the falsity, and endeavors to protect against it by an appropriate safeguard; the oath, for instance, is expected to check the witness who might have contemplated telling a falsehood.

Title V: Synthetic Rules. These rules require that two or more kinds of evidence shall be produced together, i.e., that one of them alone shall not be used. Their policy rests on the known experience of weakness in a certain kind of evidence, and seeks protection by uniting other evidence to strengthen it. There now remain but few of these rules, e.g., the rule requiring two witnesses for an act of treason.

TITLE I. ELIMINATIVE RULES

2. Definitions (continued). In taking up the Eliminative Rules, it is necessary to distinguish between the three kinds of evidential materials: Circumstantial Evidence, Testimonial Evidence, and Autoptic Proference. The difference of the materials gives rise to entirely different rules.

Autoptic Proference. This occurs when the tribunal observes the thing with its own senses. The more common name (invented by Bentham, but afterwards misapplied) is Real Evidence, i.e., the evidence furnished by a view of a "res," or thing itself. As a term correct in etymology and analogous usage, Autoptic (autopsy) indicates that the tribunal uses its own senses to observe the thing, and Proference (profert) indicates that the parties produce the thing for that purpose to the tribunal. When a bloody knife is in issue, the Autoptic Proference of it is to be distinguished from Circumstantial Evidence about it (e.g., a cut-mark or blood-stain left on a garment by the knife) and from Testimonial Evidence about it (e.g., a witness' assertion that he saw it).

Autoptic Proference is, in one sense, not evidence of a thing; it is the thing. But that is a matter of theory, and is not important, except in the interpretation of statutes.

Testimonial Evidence. This includes all assertions made by a human being, as a source of the tribunal's belief in the fact asserted. An assertion made out of court before trial is testimonial evidence, as well as an assertion made in court on the witness-stand; the hearsay rule may exclude the former (though not always), but that does not alter its nature.

Circumstantial Evidence. This comprises all evidence not testimonial. The term is an unfortunate one, but cannot be dislodged from usage. Common examples are: the contour of a flesh-wound, as evidencing the kind of bullet that caused it; the occurrence of a storm, as evidencing the probable sinking of a ship; the moral character of a man, as evidencing his probable doing of an act.

The distinction of testimonial from circumstantial evidence is of great practical importance. Testimonial evidence (human assertions) is one general class having more or less common and constant features and conditions, and hence many of the teachings of experience as to its trustworthiness can be reduced to rules fairly applicable to all testimony. But circumstantial evidence is of infinite variety, and precisely the same conditions seldom recur; hence, general rules can seldom be formulated. Moreover, so far as they can be, they deal with a class of materials essentially different from that of testimonial evidence, and therefore form a different branch of learning and can be studied separately.

In the following pages, it will be desirable to take up these three classes in the following order: Autoptic Proference; Circumstantial Evidence; Testimonial Evidence.

SUB-TITLE I. RULES EXCLUDING AUTOPTIC PROFERENCE (REAL EVIDENCE)

3. Ings' Trial. (1820. Howell's State Trials, XXXIII, 1051.) [The "Cato-street conspiracy." High treason; the defendant claimed that he was ignorantly drawn into the movement and did not know of the specific murderous designs of the leaders. A constable produced the conspirators' weapons.]

Mr. Gurney. — Are there now placed upon the table the things which were taken in Cato-street? — Yes.

You gave us an enumeration yesterday of thirty-eight ball-cartridges, fire-lock and bayonet, one powder-flask, three pistols, and one sword, with six bayonet spikes, and cloth belt, one blunderbuss, pistol, fourteen bayonet spikes, and three pointed files, one bayonet, one bayonet spike, and one sword scabbard, one carbine and bayonet, two swords, one bullet, ten hand-grenades; I do not see them? — Here they are, (producing a bag.)

We must have them on the table (they were emptied out.)

There is one hand-grenade much larger than the rest; that is what you call the large hand-grenade? — Yes.

Show the jury the fuse to it? (it was shown to the jury.) — There are some iron spikes tucked in.

Hand one of the small hand-grenades to the jury with a fuse? (it was handed to the jury.)

Are there any fire balls there? (one was shown to the jury.) — I will give you an account, gentlemen, by another witness, of the composition of these. I observe here are some bayonets with screws at the end, and some sharpened files with screws at the end? — There are (they were shown to the jury.)

Produce the pike staves? — (they were produced.) Take one of the pike staves from the rest, and show the adaptation of it. (the witness screwed in one of the pike heads.) They are all made to receive a screw? — Yes.

Have they a ferrule at the top? — They have.

Will you produce the belt and the knife-case found upon the prisoner? (they were produced.) Hand that knife with the knife-case and the belt to the jury: you observe, gentlemen, the knife-case and the belt are of the same cloth.

Ings. — The knife was not found upon me, my lord.

Mr. Gurney. — You observe the handle of the knife, gentlemen, is bound round with wax-end? (it was shown to the jury.) Where are the two haversacks that were found upon the prisoner? (they were handed to the jury.) Show the jury the brass-barrelled blunderbuss (it was shown to the jury.) — Which were the pike staves found in Cato-street? — The bundle I have just shown. . . .

Mr. Gurney. — Now produce to us the things out of the basket covered with the blue apron? — These are flannel bags full of gunpowder; there are also some empty (producing them).

A Juryman. — There is powder in those bags. There is. (One of the bags was opened, and the contents shown to the jury).

Mr. Gurney. — The bags contain one pound each, I believe? — Yes.

Are there four hand-grenades? — There are. (they were handed to the jury). . . .

You found also sixty-three bullets? — I did; here they are. (producing them). . . .

You stated that in a haversack, there were 434 balls; 171 ball cartridges, and 69 without powder (the witness produced the same.) There were three pounds of gunpowder? — There were. (producing them.) . . .

Produce the box you found with the ball cartridges (it was produced). There are 965 ball cartridges in that box, are there? — There are. . . .

Take one of the hand-grenades; you have examined two of them before? — Yes, I have.

Take that to pieces, and show us of what it is composed (it was taken to pieces in the presence of the jury). . . .

Take out the nails and see whether you find a tin case filled with gunpowder? — Here is part of a blanket covering the tin case. . . .

Is it good gunpowder? — Very good.

That would be a quantity of gunpowder sufficient to cause the explosion you speak of? — Yes, there is rather more than we put to burst a nine-inch shell.

I need scarcely ask you, whether that grenade would be a most formidable and destructive instrument? — It certainly would.

Mr. Attorney-General. — That, my lord, is the case on the part of the Crown.

Mr. Adolphus [counsel for the defence, in his address to the jury].

You have had that which produces always a sort of mechanical effect. I do not mean to pay an ill compliment to your understandings; but you have had a display of visible objects, pikes and swords, guns and blunderbuses, have been put before you, to the end that this feeling may be excited in every man's mind, "How should I like to have this sort of thing put to my breast! How should I feel if this were applied to my chimney! and that to my stair-case!" and so on; this is, that the individual feeling of each man may make him separate himself from society, — may make him, through the medium of his own personal hatred of violence or apprehension of danger, think that this contemptible exhibition of imperfect armoury could operate on a town filled by a million of loyal inhabitants or could give the means of overwhelming the empire. When touched by reason, they shrink to nothing, and will never produce a verdict contrary to the evidence of facts. It is like displaying the bloody robe of a man who has been stabbed or murdered; it is like the trick practised at every sessions, where we see a witness pull out some cloak or handkerchief dipped in blood of the person, to produce conviction through the medium of commiseration. They do not trust to description, but rely upon display. That is the effect of the production of these arms.

4. David Paul Brown ("The Forum," 1856. vol. II. p. 448). [This famous Philadelphia advocate is recounting the story of a celebrated trial, in 1834, for the homicide, by a disappointed lover, of the woman he loved]: During the course of the trial there was an occurrence which is entitled to notice. When I first called upon the prisoner, after he had furnished me with some of the prominent details, I asked him how the deceased was dressed at the time of the blow. He said, "in black." I observed, "that was better than if the dress had been white." Upon which the prisoner turned hastily round, and asked what difference that could make. The reply was, "No difference in regard to your offense, but a considerable difference in respect to the effect produced upon the jury by the exhibition of the garments, which, no doubt, will be resorted to." And so upon the trial it turned out. The black dress was presented to the jury, — the eleven punctures through the bosom pointed out; but no stain was observable, no excitement was produced. At last, however, they went further, and produced some of the white undergarments — corsets, etc., all besmeared with human blood. Upon this exhibition there was not a dry eye in the courthouse. And the current of opinion continued to run against the defendant from that moment until the close of the case, and finally bore him into eternity.

5. STATE v. MOORE

SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS. 1909

80 Kan. 232; 102 Pac. 475

APPEAL from District Court, Cowley County; C. L. SWARTS, Judge.

John C. Moore was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 77 Kan. 736, 95 Pac. 409.

John W. Adams, Geo. W. Adams, and L. C. Brown, for appellant. F. S. Jackson, Atty. Gen. (Ed. J. Fleming and Jackson & Noble, of counsel), for the State.

BURCH, J.— On Sunday, December 27, 1906, appellant waylaid his wife as she was returning from church, shot her twice through the body, and killed her on a public street in the city of Arkansas City. He was convicted of murder in the first degree, but the judgment was reversed because of the admission of irrelevant and prejudicial evidence. State v. Moore, 77 Kan. 736, 95 Pac. 409. He was tried a second time, was again convicted of murder in the first degree, and again appeals. . . .

Error is assigned because the jacket which the deceased wore when she was shot was introduced in evidence. It was fully identified, was pierced in the back by two bullet holes, and its lining was stained with blood. When the jacket was offered, counsel for appellant sought to forestall its exhibition to the jury by the statement to the Court that no evidence would be introduced on the part of the defense concerning the shooting. In the case of State v. Jones, 89 Iowa, 182, 56 N. W. 427, the syllabus reads: "The fact that the defendant, in a prosecution for homicide, admits the killing, is not a ground for the exclusion of the weapon with which the crime was committed from evidence." This is true for two reasons: The bare admission of the killing subtracts little from the issues, and it may be very important for the State, with the burden resting upon it to establish all the charges of the indictment or information beyond a reasonable doubt, to make its own case in its own way, and the evidence may be very valuable in illustrating or establishing other material facts. Beyond this, the statement under consideration was too carefully guarded. It did not admit the shooting or any other fact connected with the homicide, not even that appellant's wife was dead. Its import was merely that whatever the State proved relating to the shooting would not be contradicted, and the burden still rested on the State to prove every fact alleged in the information beyond a reasonable doubt. . . . The inanimate garment told clearly and truthfully the story of a woman shot twice in the back, and hence, by legitimate inference, maliciously, willfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, and without justification or excuse. It had a rightful place among the accusing witnesses, none of whom could be set aside at appellant's option because they were numerous.

It is argued that the introduction in evidence of the dead woman's bloody jacket destroyed the mental poise of the jury by riveting their minds upon a scene of carnage, to the exclusion of any calm consideration of appellant's sanity, the only matter finally disputed by way of defense. The State rested under the necessity of establishing a tragedy involving the violent death of a human being from mortal wounds deliberately inflicted with malice aforethought — a thing most likely to include some blood along with the wickedness, perhaps, too, the terrifying report of pistol shots in a peaceful street on a Sunday just after church, the piteous appeals for life, and the agonized death screams of a defenseless woman as she is being shot down, and other shocking things. Such a subject is never a nice one to investigate. Any of the details have a decided tendency to horrify and to appall, but a court cannot arrange for lively music to keep the jury cheerful while the State's case in a murder trial is being presented, and grewsome evidence cannot be suppressed merely because it may strongly tend to agitate the jury's feelings. In the case of Turner v. State, 89 Tenn. 547, 15 S. W. 838, a section of the murdered man's ribs and vertebra was introduced in evidence. Objection was made because the object was calculated to inspire the jury with such horror as to influence their verdict. The purpose of the evidence was to show the direction and lodgment of the bullet, and it was held to be clearly admissible. . . . Innumerable cases might be quoted to the same effect. Generally physical objects, which constitute a portion of a transaction, or which serve to unfold or explain it, may be exhibited in evidence, if properly identified, whenever the transaction is under judicial investigation.

Appellant has cited some cases in which it seems to be indicated that the exhibition of bloody garments serves no purpose when the condition and location of wounds made through them have been described by witnesses. This Court prefers to abide by the well-established rule that, ordinarily, whatever the jury may learn through the ear from descriptions given by witnesses, they may learn directly through the eye from the objects described. State v. Stair, 87 Mo. 268, 273, 56 Am. Rep. 449. Of course spectacular exhibitions may be framed for the purpose of arousing prejudicial emotions, and all such improprieties should be thwarted or promptly suppressed. The production of real evidence should not be permitted to exaggerate, and should not be allowed, through cunning presentation, to stir up passion or unduly excite sympathy or pity, and so lead the jury to act upon sentiment, instead of proof. But the proceeding is always under the control of the trial judge, who has authority to confine the use of such evidence to proper purposes and to regulate the time, manner, and extent of its presentation, and his discretion will not be interfered with unless abused with prejudicial consequences. The chief objection to the exhibition of weapons, wounds, bloody clothing, and the like is that the jury may be led to associate the accused with the atrocity under investigation without sufficient proof. Prof. Wigmore disposes of this objection in the following way: "No doubt such an effect may occasionally and in an extreme case be produced, and no doubt the trial Court has a discretion to prevent the abuse of the process; but, in the vast majority of instances where such objection is made, it is frivolous, and there is no ground for apprehension. Accordingly, such objections have almost invariably been repudiated by the Courts" — citing many cases. Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 2, §§ 1157, 1354. . . . Judgment affirmed.

6. Mansfield, L. C. J. Rules for Views. (1757. Burr. 252). Before the 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, § 8, there could be no view till after the cause had been brought on to trial. If the Court saw the question involved in obscurity which might be cleared up by a view, the cause was put off, that the jurors might have a view before it came on to be tried again. The rule for a view proceeded upon the previous opinion of the Court or judge, at the trial, "that the nature of the question made a view not only proper but necessary"; for the judges at the assizes were not to give way to the delay and expense of a view unless they saw that a case could not be understood without one. However, it often happened in fact that upon the desire of either party causes were put off for want of a view upon specious allegations from the nature of the question that a view was proper, — without going into the proof so as to be able to judge whether the evidence might not be understood without it. This circuity occasioned delay and expense; to prevent which the 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, § 8, impowered the Courts at Westminster to grant a view in the first instance previous to the trial. . . . [He then refers to the other statute of 3 G. II, and to the supposed rule as to the number of viewers necessary.] Upon a strict construction of these two acts in practice, the abuse which is now grown into an intolerable grievance has arisen. Nothing can be plainer than the 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, § 8. . . . The Courts are not bound to grant a view of course; the Act only says "they may order it, where it shall appear to them that it will be proper and necessary." . . . [He then refers to the abuse of repeated postponement of trial to obtain a view.] We are all clearly of opinion that the Act of Parliament meant a view should not be granted unless the Court was satisfied that it was proper and necessary. The abuse to which they are now perverted makes this caution our indispensable duty; and, therefore, upon every motion for a view, we will hear both parties, and examine, upon all the circumstances which shall be laid before us on both sides, into the propriety and necessity of the motion; unless the party who applies will consent to and move it upon terms which shall prevent an unfair use being made of it, to the prejudice of the other side and the obstruction of justice.

7. SPRINGER v. CHICAGO

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1891

135 Ill. 553; 26 N. E. 514

APPEAL from the Appellate Court for the First District; heard in that court on appeal from the Circuit Court of Cook County; the Hon. R. S. TUTHILL, Judge, presiding.

Messrs. Knight & Brown, and Mr. E. H. Gary, for the appellant: It was error to permit the jury to inspect the premises. Doud v. Guthrie, 13 Bradw. 656. . . .

Mr. Jonas Hutchinson, Mr. Clarence S. Darrow, Mr. Byron Boyden, and Mr. H. H. Martin, for the appellee: . . . The order for viewing the premises was proper. . . . It is within the discretion of the trial judge to allow the plaintiff in an accident case to exhibit his injured limb or body to the jury. . . .

Mr. Justice CRAIG delivered the opinion of the Court:

This was an action to recover damages alleged to have been caused to the property of appellant by the construction of Jackson-street bridge and viaduct, and the approach on Canal street, by the city of Chicago. On a trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of defendant, the city of Chicago. The Court overruled a motion for a new trial, and rendered judgment on the verdict. On appeal to the Appellate Court the judgment was affirmed. . . .

After the jury was impaneled, and before the trial commenced, the Court, on motion of defendant, permitted the jury, in charge of an officer, to go upon and view the premises in controversy, and this ruling is relied upon as error. It is not claimed that in the conduct of the men there was any misbehavior on the part of the officer in charge, or on behalf of any of the jury, or on behalf of either representative of the respective parties who accompanied the jury. The naked claim is a want of power on the part of the Court to permit the view. The viaduct was completed in August, 1888, and the trial occurred, and the view was had, in December, 1889. . . .

If the parties had the right to prove by oral testimony the condition of the property at the time of the trial, (and upon this point we think there can be no doubt,) upon what principle can it be said the Court could not allow the jury in person to view the premises, and thus ascertain the condition thereof for themselves? The premises in view may be regarded, as it is termed in the books, "real evidence," and oral testimony in reference to the premises could not be as satisfactory in its character as the real evidence. In 1 Best, Ev. (Morgan's Ed.), § 197, it is said: "Real evidence is either immediate or reported. Immediate real evidence is where the thing which is the source of evidence is present to the senses of the tribunal." In section 198 it is said: "Reported real evidence is where the thing which is the source of the evidence is not present to the senses of the tribunal, but the existence of it is conveyed to them through the medium of witnesses or documents. This sort of proof is, from its very nature, less satisfactory and convincing than immediate real evidence." See, also, Tayl. Ev. (8th Ed.), § 554; 1 Whart. Ev. (3d Ed.), § 345. It is a common practice in the trial of causes in the Circuit Court to permit parties to produce things before the jury for their inspection, and that practice has been approved. Thus, in Iron Works v. Weber, 129 Ill. 535, which was an action to recover for a personal injury, we held that the torn clothing which plaintiff was wearing when injured might properly be shown to the jury. In Express Co. v. Spellman, 90 Ill. 455, — an action against a carrier for the loss of a can of yeast, — it was held to be proper to allow plaintiff to put in evidence a can similar to the one in which the yeast was shipped for the examination of the jury. In Jupitz v. People, 34 Ill. 516, when defendant was on trial for receiving stolen brass couplings, a brass coupling similar to those alleged to have been received was allowed to be submitted to the jury. In other States numerous cases may be found where the same rule of evidence has been adopted. Thus, in an accident case, it is held to be within the discretion of the Court to allow the plaintiff to exhibit to the jury his injured limb or body. Barker v. Town of Perry, 67 Iowa, 146; Railroad Co. v. Wood, 113 Ind. 548, 549; Mulhado v. Railroad Co., 30 N. Y. 370; Hatfield v. Railroad Co., 33 Minn. 130. The clothes of the accused were held admissible in People v. Gonzalez, 35 N. Y. 49, and Drake v. State, 75 Ga. 413; the weapon used by the accused, in Wynne v. State, 56 Ga. 113; surgical instruments in a trial under an indictment for illegal operations on a woman, Com. v. Brown, 121 Mass. 69; the stick with which a burglar struck the prosecutor in a trial on charge of burglary, State v. Mordecai, 68 N. C. 207; tools used, where a burglary has been committed, People v. Larned, 7 N. Y. 445. In State v. Woodruff, 67 N. C. 89, it was held in a bastardy case, that the mother of a bastard child might hold it up for the inspection of the jury. It was also held in Hatfield v. Railroad Co., 33 Minn. 130, on the trial of an accident case, the trial Court had the power to require the plaintiff to walk across the court-room in the presence of the jury, in order that the jury might see how he had been affected by the injury. It is there said: "As the object of all judicial investigations is, if possible, to do exact justice, and obtain the truth in its entire fullness, we have no doubt of the power of court, in a proper case, to require the party to perform a physical act before the jury that will illustrate or demonstrate the extent and character of his injuries." This is in accordance with analogous cases in other branches of the law. When a view of real estate will aid the jury in reaching a conclusion, it is within the discretion of the Court to permit it. When an inspection of an article of personal property will aid them, it is not infrequent to cause the article to be brought into court for the same purpose. Line v. Taylor, 3 Fost. & F. 731; Lewis v. Hartley, 7 Car. & P. 405. The practice in patent and in certain equity cases, of allowing tests to be applied before the court, is somewhat analogous in principle. So is the practice of divorce courts, of ordering an examination of the person of the party in certain cases. . . . In Nutter v. Ricketts, 6 Iowa, 92 where there was a controversy in regard to two horses, and the trial Court allowed the jury to go in the court-house yard and inspect the horses, the action of the Court was sustained. It is there said: "There is no objection, in principle, to a jury seeing an object which is the subject of testimony. By this means they may obtain clearer views, and be able to form a better opinion." See, also, 1 Hale, P. C. 635.

Other cases might be cited where the same doctrine is laid down, but we have referred to enough to establish the rule that on a trial, in a proper case, things may be exhibited to the jury. And, if evidence of that character may be brought before the jury, upon the same principle we perceive no good reason why a jury may not, under proper regulations established by the Court, go upon and view premises which are the subject-matter of the litigation. Had the plaintiff procured a careful survey and plat of the premises, showing the location with reference to streets and alleys, showing the location of all buildings, and showing the improvement made by the city, such a paper would have been competent evidence to go to the jury. Had a photograph or picture of the premises been taken, it would have been competent evidence to go to the jury. If a plat or photograph of the premises would be competent evidence, why not allow the jury to look at the property itself instead of a picture of the same? There may be cases where a trial Court should not grant a view of the premises, where it would be expensive, or cause delay, or where a view would serve no useful purpose. But this affords no reason for a ruling that the power to order a view does not exist or should not be exercised in any case. If the appellant desired to control the effect the view might have on the jury in connection with the other evidence introduced, that might have been done by an appropriate instruction; but, as no instruction was asked on that point, he is in no position to complain.

In what cases a view was allowed at common law is a subject upon which the authorities we have examined are not yet very clear. But a view by jury, as we understand the subject, is sanctioned by the common-law practice. In Stearns on Real Actions, 102, the author says: "In the ancient practice there were two kinds of view on real actions: (1) View by the party; (2) view by the jury." The author further says: "View by the jury was allowed in several real actions, as assize of novel disseisin, waste, and assize of nuisance. In these cases, therefore, a view by the party, being rendered unnecessary, was not permitted by the law. 8 Hen. VI. 27; 50 Edw. III. 11. The design of this proceeding was to enable the jury better to understand the matter in controversy between the parties. It was not confined to real actions, but was allowed in several personal actions for an injury to the realty, as trespass quare clausum fregit, trespass on the case, and nuisance." In Burrow's note in 1 Burrow, 253, [ante, No. 6] the practice in regard to jury views, as settled upon by the King's Bench, is stated. If at common law, independent of any English statute, the Court had the power to order a view by jury, as we think it plain the Court had such power, as we have adopted the common law in this State our Courts have the same power. . . .

Here it is apparent that the jury could obtain a much better understanding of the issue presented by the pleadings by a view of the premises, and, in the exercise of a sound legal discretion, we think the Court did not err in allowing the view. The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

Bailey and Wilkin, JJ.: We do not concur with that portion of the foregoing opinion which relates to the action of the Court in permitting the jury to go upon and view the premises. In our opinion such view by the jury was improper.

SUB-TITLE II. RULES EXCLUDING CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

Topic 1. Moral Character as Evidence[1]

Sub-topic A. Accused's Character as Evidence of an Act

9. Thomas Brewster's Trial. (1663. Old Bailey Sessions. Howell's State Trials, VI, 513, 546). [The defendant, a bookseller, was charged with sedition, in printing and selling the dying speeches of the regicides, executed for sharing in the judgment and execution of King Charles I.]

Justice Tyrrel. — You speak of your behaviour, have you any testimony here?

Brewster. — I do expect some neighbors; Major-General Brown knows me, Capt. Sheldon, Capt. Colchester, and others; I can give a very good account as to my behaviour ever since. . . . My lord, here are now some neighbors to testify that I am no such person as the indictment sets forth, that I did maliciously and seditiously do such and such things.

L. C. J. Hyde. — We will hear them, though I will tell you it will not much matter; the law says it is malice.

Capt. Sheldon sworn. — My Lord, all that I can say is, he was ready at beat of drum upon all occasions. What he has been guilty of by printing or otherwise, I am a stranger to that. I know he was of civil behaviour and deportment amongst his neighbors.

Just. Keeling. — It is very ill that the king hath such trained soldiers in the band.

Capt. Hanson and others, offered to like purpose.

L. C. J. Hyde. — If you have a thousand to this purpose only, what signifies it? . . . I will tell you: Do not mistake yourself; the testimony of your civil behaviour, going to church, appearing in the trained-bands, going to Paul's, being there at common service, — this is well; but you are not charged for this; a man may do all this, and yet be a naughty man in printing abusive books, to the misleading of the king's subjects. If you have anything to say as to that, I shall be glad to find you innocent.

Brewster. — I have no more to say.

You have known William Turner for some years? — I have.

You are acquainted with his general character? — Yes.

He has worked with you I understand? — Yes.

For how many years do you think you have known him? — I have known him twenty years.

He has frequently worked with you? — He has worked with me for these three or four years back at different times.

[1] For the principles of Logic and Psychology here applicable, see the present Compiler's "Principles of Judicial Proof" (1913), Nos. 84–99.

What has been his general character as far as you have known him? —

Mr. Gurney. — I submit to your lordships that the proper question is as to loyalty.

Mr. Cross. — I submit to your lordships that there is no objection to the question as to his general character.

Mr. Denman. — If he is generally a respectable man, an inference arises that he is a loyal man.

Mr. Cross. — It would be a most extraordinary thing if I might put that question generally in case of felony and not on an indictment for high treason.

Mr. Gurney. — If a man is indicted for felony, evidence is produced to his honesty; if for rape, to his chastity, and so on.

Mr. Denman. — Your lordships recollect that in the case of Horne Tooke, evidence as to his writings many years before were received in evidence in order to show it improbable that he should commit treason.

Mr. Justice ABBOTT. — As far as my experience goes, the inquiry into character is always adapted to the charge. . . . The question was objected to as too general and therefore not applying; it was not whether he was a peaceable man, but as to his general character.

11. CANCEMI v. PEOPLE

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1858

16 N. Y. 501

WRIT of error to the Supreme Court. Michael Cancemi was indicted, at the New York General Sessions, for the murder of Eugene Anderson, a policeman. One count of the indictment charged that Cancemi, being engaged in burglariously entering, in the day time, a shoe store, with intent to steal, encountered Anderson, who was about to arrest him, when he was shot with a pistol by the defendant. The indictment was removed to the Oyer and Terminer, and the trial there resulted in a disagreement of the jury. . . . Nineteen witnesses were called by the defendant, all of whom testified to the general good character of the defendant, for peace and quietness, and for honesty and industry, and proved it to have been unexceptionable from his youth upwards. The judge charged the jury, in reference to the evidence of character, in the words of Chief Justice SHAW, of Massachusetts, in the case of Dr. Webster (5 Cush. 325), as follows:

"Where it is a question of great and atrocious criminality, the commission of the act is so unusual, so out of the ordinary course of things, and beyond human experience, it is so manifest that the offence, if perpetrated, must have been influenced by motives not frequently operating upon the human mind, that evidence of character and of a man's habitual conduct, under common circumstances, must be considered far inferior to what it is in the instance of accusations of a lower grade. Against facts strongly proved, good character cannot avail. It is therefore in smaller offences, in such as relate to the actions of daily and common life, as where one is charged with pilfering and stealing, that evidence of a high character for honesty would satisfy a jury that he would not be likely to yield to such a temptation. In every case where the evidence is doubtful, proof of character may be given with good effect, and should preponderate in his favor. But still, even with regard to the higher crimes, testimony of good character, though of less avail, is competent evidence to the jury."

The prisoner excepted to this charge. He was found guilty. The record of proceedings at the circuit ("postea") was sent to the Supreme Court at general term, and judgment was there pronounced. The defendant sued out a writ of error.

Edmon Blankman and John W. Ashmead, for the plaintiff in error. A. Oakey Hall, for the People.

By the Court, STRONG, J. . . . Another question in the case arises upon the charge to the jury in relation to the evidence given by the defendant of his previous good character. A large number of witnesses had testified to the general good character of the defendant for peace and quietness, honesty and industry, and that it had been unexceptionable from his youth upwards. In respect to this evidence, and in connection with many just observations as to the importance and effect of proof of good character by a defendant in criminal cases, the justice stated to the jury that where the question was one of great and atrocious criminality, evidence of good character, and of a man's habitual conduct under common circumstances, must be considered far inferior to what it is in the instances of accusations of a lower grade; but still, even with regard to the higher crimes, testimony of good character, though of less avail, was competent.

The principle upon which good character may be proved is, that it affords a presumption against the commission of crime. This presumption arises from the improbability, as a general rule, as proved by common observation and experience, that a person who has uniformly pursued an honest and upright course of conduct will depart from it and do an act so inconsistent with it. Such a person may be overcome by temptation and fall into crime, and cases of that kind often occur, but they are exceptions; the general rule is otherwise. The influence of this presumption from character will necessarily vary according to the varying circumstances of different cases. It must be slight when the accusation of crime is supported by the direct and positive testimony of credible witnesses; and it will seldom avail to control the mind in cases where the testimony, though circumstantial, is reliable, strong, and clear. But in cases where the other evidence is nearly balanced, but slightly preponderating against the defendant, the presumption from proof of good character is entitled to great weight; and will often be sufficient to turn the scale and produce an acquittal.

I am unable to perceive why this presumption may not, and should not, as a general rule, be as controlling in cases of high crimes as in those of smaller ones. In a case of murder, arson, robbery, or any other great offense, when it is apparent that it must have been planned and committed with great deliberation and the evidence against the accused is uncertain, why should not proof of good character influence the judgment as powerfully as in any case? I can readily see that in cases of great crimes, evidently perpetrated with but little if any forethought, under the influence of some sudden and powerful motive, such proof will be comparatively weak, but it will be so in reference to any other crime with similar circumstances. The attending circumstances must, I think, determine the degree of force which evidence of good character should have; it is not in ordinary cases affected by the grade of the offense. Formerly, such evidence was admissible in capital cases only, but now it will be received in criminal cases generally. (1 McNally's Ev., 320–323; 2 Mass. 317; 18 Ala. 720; 2 Starkie, 303; 2 Bennet & Heard's Leading Criminal Cases, 159, 160; Burrill's Circumstantial Evidence, 530, 532.) The doctrine of the charge which has been considered was stated to the jury in such a manner as to be, if not in effect an instruction controlling the weight of the evidence, calculated to mislead the jury as to the weight which the evidence should receive; and affords, therefore, good ground, under the act of 1855 (Laws of 1855, ch. 337, p. 613), for a new trial. . . . The judgment must be reversed and a new trial be directed. Ordered accordingly.

12. STATE v. SURRY

SUPREME COURT OF WASHINGTON. 1900

23 Wash. 655; 63 Pac. 557

APPEAL from Superior Court, King County. — Hon. ORANGE JACOBS, Judge. Affirmed.

The appellant was charged by information, under § 23 of Hill's Penal Code (Ballinger's Code, § 7058) with an assault with a deadly weapon (a revolver) upon one Edward May, with intent to do bodily injury, no considerable provocation appearing therefor. On the trial upon the information, the jury returned a verdict of guilty of assault and battery, and the Court, after denying his motion for a new trial, sentenced the appellant to pay a fine and to imprisonment in the county jail. It appears from the record that about two o'clock on the morning of October 7, 1898, the appellant, who was then a "merchants' patrolman" and deputy sheriff, and two police officers, discovered the prosecuting witness, Edward May, then a youth of the age of seventeen years, together with three companions, in or about a vacant lot near Madison street and Second avenue, in the city of Seattle. Suspecting from their movements that these four young persons were about to engage in some unlawful transaction, appellant and the two policemen concluded to apprehend them and ascertain what they were doing at that place. . . . One of the officers went down to the lot, and very soon thereafter the complaining witness, May, came up the steps to the sidewalk not far from where the appellant was standing, and ran down Madison street towards First avenue. The appellant ran after him and, as he says, called upon him several times to stop. After he had pursued May for some distance without overtaking him, appellant drew his revolver, while he was running, and fired. After firing the shot he continued the pursuit for the distance of a block and a half, and then gave up the chase. May continued running until he reached the residence of his mother, where he informed her that he had been shot. Physicians were immediately summoned, and, upon examination, it was ascertained that the bullet from the pistol struck May in the back part of the thigh, and, passing upwards, lodged near the groin. . . . It was admitted by the appellant at the trial that he fired the shot that struck May, but he claimed as a defense that he did not shoot, or intend to shoot, at him; that he fired at the sidewalk, and that May's injury was caused by the accidental glancing of the ball.

William Parmerlee, for appellant. James F. McElroy, Prosecuting Attorney, John B. Hart and Walter S. Fulton, for the State. The opinion of the Court was delivered by ANDERS, J. . . .

Complaint is made of the action of the Court in refusing to permit the appellant to prove his reputation as a careful, conservative, and conscientious peace officer in the community in which he resided; and it is insisted that the particular trait of character sought to be proved was in issue, and hence admissible in evidence. But we are unable to assent to that proposition. It is a general rule in criminal cases that evidence of the character of the accused, when offered by him, is relevant and therefore admissible. But the character or reputation he is entitled to prove must be such as would make it unlikely that he would commit the particular offense with which he is charged. Wharton, Criminal Evidence (9th Ed.), § 60. In this case the appellant's character as a peace officer was not involved, but his character as an individual was involved in the offense charged against him, and therefore evidence of his reputation as a peaceable and quiet citizen in the community where he resided would have been admissible. But no such evidence was offered. State v. King, 78 Mo. 555. . . . The judgment is affirmed. FULLERTON and REAVIS, JJ., concur. DUNBAR, C. J., dissents.

13. REGINA v. ROWTON

CROWN CASES RESERVED. 1865

Leigh & Cave 520; 10 Cox Cr. C. 25

THE following case was stated by the Deputy Assistant Judge of the county of Middlesex.

James Rowton was tried before me, at the Middlesex Sessions, on the 30th of September, 1864, on an indictment which charged him with having committed an indecent assault upon George Low, a lad about fourteen years of age. On the part of the defendant, several witnesses were called, who had known him at different periods of his life; and they gave him an excellent character, as a moral and well-conducted man. On the part of the prosecution, it was proposed to contradict this testimony; and a witness was called for that purpose. This was objected to by the defendant's counsel, who contended that no such evidence was receivable, and cited the case of Regina v. Burt. I thought the evidence was admissible; and, after the witness had stated that he knew the defendant, the following question was put to him: "What is the defendant's general character for decency and morality of conduct?" His reply was, "I know nothing of the neighborhood's opinion, because I was only a boy at school when I knew him; but my own opinion, and the opinion of my brothers who were also pupils of his, is that his character is that of a man capable of the grossest indecency and the most flagrant immorality." It was objected that this was not legal evidence at all of bad moral character. I considered that it was some evidence; and I left the weight and effect of it, as an answer to the evidence of good character, to be determined by the jury. The defendant was convicted, and is now in prison awaiting the judgment of your Lordships. The questions upon which I respectfully request your decision are: — First, — Whether when witnesses have given a defendant a good character, any evidence is admissible to contradict? Secondly, — Whether the answer made by the witness in this case was properly left to the jury?[1] This case was argued on the 19th of November, 1864, before POLLOCK, C. B., WILLES, J., CHANNELL, B., BYLES, J., and SHEE, J., by Sleigh, for the prisoner, and Tayler, for the Crown. At the conclusion of their argument the Court took time to consider their judgment; but, there being a difference of opinion among the Judges, a rehearing before the full Court was directed; and accordingly, on the 21st and 28th of January, 1865, the case was again argued before COCKBURN, C. J., ERLE, C. J., POLLOCK, C. B., WILLIAMS, J., MARTIN, B., WILLES, J., CHANNELL, B., BYLES, J., BLACKBURN, J., KEATING, J., MELLOR, J., PIGOTT, B., and SHEE, J.

Sleigh, for the prisoner. — Evidence is not admissible in reply to evidence of good character. . . . Such evidence is inadmissible on the broad principle that character forms no part of the issue on the record. . . .

Tayler, for the Crown. — Evidence in reply to evidence of good character is clearly admissible. . . . (COCKBURN, C. J. — We require no argument upon that point. . . . POLLOCK, C. B. — There is no doubt that evidence of bad character could not be given, unless the prisoner had himself raised the issue by calling witnesses to show he bore a good one.)

[1] [The argument and the opinion on this second point — the Opinion rule — are printed post, as No. 173.]

COCKBURN, C. J. . . . There are two questions to be decided. The first is whether, when evidence of good character has been given in favor of a prisoner, evidence of his general bad character can be called in reply. I am clearly of opinion that it can be. It is true that I do not remember any case in my own experience where such evidence has been given; but that is easily explainable by the fact that evidence of good character is not given when it is known that it can be rebutted; and it frequently happens that the prosecuting counsel, from a spirit of fairness, gives notice to the other side, when he is in a position to contradict such evidence. But, when we come to consider whether the evidence is admissible, it is only possible to come to one conclusion. It is said that evidence of good character raises only a collateral issue; but I think that, if the prisoner thinks proper to raise that issue as one of the elements for the consideration of the jury, nothing could be more unjust than that he should have the advantage of a character which, in point of fact, may be the very reverse of that which he really deserves. . . .

[But on the second question, the evidence having been erroneously admitted, the conviction must be set aside.]

ERLE, C. J. [concurring on the first question]. I concur with the Chief Justice of England on many points of the judgment that he has just delivered. The admissibility of evidence of character for the prisoner stands on peculiar grounds. The question of the admissibility of evidence that the good character given to the prisoner is undeserved is now brought for the first time before us for adjudication. The progress of our law should be adapted to the interests of society; and the rules relating to the admissibility of evidence should be regulated by attending carefully to the interests of truth. If the prisoner, having a bad character, misleads the Court by calling witnesses to say that he has a good one, in the interests of truth and justice the false impression should be removed; and I quite agree with the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench upon the first question, that evidence was admissible in this case to rebut the good character given to the prisoner. . . .

WILLES, J. I am of opinion that . . . the ruling of the judge was right. . . .

The other learned judges concurred in the judgment delivered by the Lord Chief Justice of England.

14. STATE v. LAPAGE. (1876. New Hampshire. 57 N. H. 245, 289). CUSHING, C. J. . . . I think we may state the law in the following propositions: It is not permitted to the prosecution to attack the character of the prisoner, unless he first puts that in issue by offering evidence of his good character. . . . It is a maxim of our law, that every man is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty. It is characteristic of the humanity of all the English speaking peoples, that you cannot blacken the character of a party who is on trial for an alleged crime. Prisoners ordinarily come before the Court and the jury under manifest disadvantages. The very fact that a man is charged with a crime is sufficient to create in many minds a belief that he is guilty. It is quite inconsistent with that fairness of trial to which every man is entitled, that the jury should be prejudiced against him by any evidence except what relates to the issue; above all should it not be permitted to blacken his character, to show that he is worthless, to lighten the sense of responsibility which rests upon the jury, by showing that he is not worthy of painstaking and care, and, in short, that the trial is what the chemists and anatomists call "experimentum in corpore vili." Of course, if the respondent sees fit to put his character in issue by offering evidence tending to show that it is good, it is then permitted to the prosecution to rebut this testimony by showing that it is bad.

15. William Trickett. Character-Evidence in Criminal Cases. (1904. The Forum, Dickinson College of Law, vol. VIII, p. 121.) Character, in a wide sense, imports the sum of the mental and corporal qualities of a man. In a narrower sense, it signifies the moral tendencies, which evince themselves in habitual action. . . . The persistent drifts or tides of emotion, appetite, passion, which characterize men, are equally evidential of their doing or not doing specific acts congenial or uncongenial to them. One whose cupidity has always been feeble, and whose respect for law has been strong, will, with some difficulty, be believed guilty of a crime of which cupidity was the only instigation, be it theft, embezzlement, robbery, burglary or murder. "Evidence of good character," says Rice, P. J., (Commonwealth v. Weathers, 7 Kulp 1; Commonwealth v. Irwin, 1 Cl. 329), "does not operate as a bar to a prosecution (e.g., for murder). It is not of itself a defence. It is simply an item of evidence. The argument to be drawn from it is, that it is improbable that a person of good character for peace and quietness would commit an act of violence," etc. "If you were told," observed McClure, P. J., "some one you knew was honest had been guilty of larceny, you would be slow to believe; your belief would yield to proof, but with reluctance." (Commonwealth v. Kuhn, 1 Pitts. 13.) . . .

It is evident that while a good character makes improbable an act not consonant with it, a bad character lessens the improbability of an act which accords with it. When, however, an act, e.g., of cruelty, is done, and the question is, did A do it, the fact that A had been uniformly kind and gentle for many years more strongly persuades that he did not do it, than the fact that he had been very often cruel persuades that he did it. That the act was done by a cruel man is much more nearly certain, than that it was done by a particular man who is cruel. The cruelty of the act tends to negative the agency of a generally kind man, but it does not negative the existence of many other cruel men than the defendant, or the agency of some unknown one of these men. That he has the congenial trait of character does not tend to show that others have it not, and that some other, having it, has not done the deed. It is a well-established principle, therefore, that the defendant in a criminal case is permitted to prove his character in order to negative his participation in the crime, but the Commonwealth is not permitted in the first instance to show that his character is bad in order to diminish the jury's difficulty in concluding him to be guilty (Commonwealth v. Weber, 167 Pa. 153).

This, perhaps, is an anomaly. It is permissible to the Commonwealth to show that the defendant is of the class, a member of which must have committed the act. It can show, e.g., that he was near the place at the time of the occurrence, and so put him in the class of the possibly guilty. It can prove that he had an instrument, e.g., a gun, a quantity of poison, by the like of which only the crime could have been done, in order to put him within the comparatively small class of the possibly, or probably, guilty. Nobody poisons who does not have poison. When it is proved that A had the poison, he is put into the comparatively small class of persons one of whom must have done the act. . . . The courts, however, will not allow evidence that A is of the cruel, or vindictive, or life-despising class — a comparatively small class — some member of which, in all likelihood, did the deed. The justification for the exclusion is stated by Greenleaf to be "that such evidence is too likely to move the jury to condemnation, irrespective of his actual guilt of the offense charged." (Greenleaf, Evidence, p. 39, 16th ed. Boston. This is not the only rule based on the assumption of the fatuousness of juries.)

Sub-topic B. Character as Evidence of an Act, in Other Cases

16. RUAN v. PERRY

3 Caines R. 120

This was an action of trespass brought against the defendant, who was commander of the United States frigate General Green, for seizing and taking the Danish schooner William and Mary and her cargo, the property of the plaintiff. The declaration contained two counts; one charging the defendant with seizing, arresting, and for a long time detaining, the vessel and cargo, and conveying them towards Jacmel in Hispaniola, out of the course of the voyage on which bound, by means whereof they were attacked, seized, and carried away as prize, by persons on board a French barge, in the service of Toussaint, [the French governor], in consequence of which they became totally lost to the plaintiff. The other with doing the same, and delivering up the vessel and cargo to the barge of Toussaint, by which, etc. The cause was tried before Mr. Justice Livingston, at the New York sittings, in January, 1805.

At the trial the plaintiff examined his captain as a witness, and read the deposition of one of the crew of the schooner, from which it appeared that the vessel and cargo, both the bona fide property of the plaintiff, a Danish subject, sailed from St. Croix bound to Acquim, a port in Hispaniola, about ten leagues from Jacmel, and had arrived within four or five leagues of their destination, when they were brought to by the General Green, a boat from which boarded the William and Mary, took possession of her, ordered out all her hands but the mate, and carried them on board the defendant's ship. That, immediately after this was done, the frigate proceeded in company with the schooner towards Jacmel, and having arrived off that place, fired some guns, within an hour after which an armed barge came out from that port, commanded by a white officer in uniform, said to be Toussaint's, and manned with negroes. That the officer came on board the frigate, delivered letters to the defendant, and received some from him. That the French officer commanding the barge, the master of the William and Mary, and the captain of another Danish vessel brought to by the defendant, dined with him. That about two hours after dinner was over, the defendant gave back the papers of the William and Mary to her captain, and sent him in the frigate's boat on board his own vessel. . . . Upon this the schooner and her cargo were, by the crew of the barge who had taken possession of her, carried into Hispaniola where they were shortly after condemned as prize to a privateer, to which the barge that had taken them belonged. . . .

On the part of the defendant was exhibited a part of his instructions from the navy department, by which he was directed, in order to carry into effect the act "for suspending the commercial intercourse between the United States and France and the dependencies thereof," to take and send in vessels covered by Danish and other papers, if suspected to be really American. Testimony of the defendant's general character was then offered, and objected to, but admitted, because the imputation of a gross fraud was attempted to be proved by mere circumstances, and, therefore, evidence of general character certainly admissible. The defendant then adduced testimony, fully establishing a fair and good reputation.

The learned judge summed up in favor of the defendant, and charged the jury that . . . the defendant was, by his instructions, warranted in examining the William and Mary, and not liable for taking her out of her course during the time necessary for that purpose. That it was doubtful whether Captain Perry had a right to afford protection against the barge of Toussaint; but allowing he had, he certainly was not bound to do so; but if they thought that there was any collusion between the defendant and Toussaint, they ought to decide in favor of the plaintiff. The jury having found a verdict for the defendant, it was submitted, without argument, to the Court, whether it ought not to be set aside and a new trial granted, on some one or all of the following grounds: (1) Because the evidence of character was inadmissible; (2) Because the judge misdirected the jury; (3) Because the verdict was against evidence.

Tompkins, J., delivered the opinion of the Court. . . . The judge directed them, that if they should be of opinion that Captain Perry acted in collusion with the Frenchmen, they should find for the plaintiff. This direction was undoubtedly proper, and affords no ground to support the point of misdirection by the judge. The evidence of character was also, in my opinion, properly admitted. In actions of tort, and especially charging a defendant with gross depravity and fraud upon circumstances merely, as was the case here, evidence of uniform integrity and good character is oftentimes the only testimony which a defendant can oppose to suspicious circumstances. We cannot say we are dissatisfied with the verdict of the jury, or that the same is against the weight of evidence.

Postea to the defendant.

17. Gough v. St. John. (1837. New York. 16 Wend. 645, 652. Action for false representation as to solvency). Cowen, J. Another conclusive ground for a new trial is the admission of testimony to character. Such evidence is, in general, confined to criminal prosecutions involving the question of moral turpitude. To this there is, I apprehend, a chain of authority unbroken in every common law country except New York. The case of Ruan v. Perry, 3 Caines, 120 [ante, No. 16], is to the contrary; but that is virtually exploded by later authorities in this court, and, I should presume, has not for many years been followed at the circuit to any considerable extent. I have never followed it in any instance, but have always confined such proof to the criminal side. Indeed I have hardly heard the case insisted on by any of the bar.

I mean to be understood as speaking of the general distinction. I know there are exceptions. They lie in that class of actions or rather of issues where general character is drawn in question by the pleadings or the points involved in a cause. In slander, the plaintiff's general moral character is an object of inquiry, with a view to the amount of damages which he is entitled to claim. Cases of criminal conversation and breach of marriage promise, also present frequent exceptions. There are some other instances which it is unnecessary to mention. But where a civil action is brought for an injury to property, though the injury was legally criminal and involved moral turpitude, in so much that, on an indictment, character would be obviously receivable, there is no authoritative case, save Ruan v. Perry, which favors its admissibility. The Attorney General v. Bowman, 2 B. & P. 532, note a, is the leading English case. It settles the distinction, and has uniformly been followed at Westminster Hall.

18. Wright v. McKee. (1864. Vermont. 37 Vt. 161). [Action of trover for a package of money]. Aldis, J. Many considerations concur in rejecting such evidence [of character] in civil cases. Evidence of this character has but a remote bearing as proof to show that wrongful acts have or have not been committed, and the mind resorts to it for aid only when the other evidence is doubtful and nicely balanced. It may then perhaps serve to turn the wavering scales. Very rarely can it be of substantial use in getting at the truth. It is uncertain in its nature — both because the true character of a large portion of mankind is ascertained with difficulty, and because those who are called to testify are reluctant to disparage their neighbors, — especially if they are wealthy, influential, popular, or even only pleasant and obliging. It is mere matter of opinion, and in matters of opinion men are apt to be greatly influenced by prejudice, partisanship, or other bias, of which they are unconscious; and in cases which are not quite clear they are apt to agree with the one who first speaks to them on the subject, or to form their opinions upon the opinions of others. The introduction of such evidence in civil causes, wherever character is assailed, would make trials intolerably long and tedious and greatly increase the expense and delay of litigation. It is a kind of evidence that might be easily manufactured — is liable to abuse, and if in common use in the courts, as likely to mislead as to guide aright. The authorities are quite unanimous in excluding such testimony.

19. TENNEY v. TUTTLE

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1861

1 All. 185

TORT for an injury received from a collision of carriages in the highway. At the trial in the superior court the plaintiffs' offered evidence tending to prove, that the defendant left his horses, harnessed to a wagon, standing on his own land within about fifteen feet of his house and within the enclosure adjoining the same, without being tied, or under the charge of any person; and went into the house, out of sight of the horses, to give directions to the workmen employed therein; and that the horses started and ran into the road and against the wagon in which the plaintiffs were riding, and thereby injured the female plaintiff. The defendant offered evidence tending to control and vary this evidence of the plaintiff, and also offered to show his own character as a careful, prudent, and cautious man, as bearing on the question of whether he used ordinary care on this occasion. To this last the plaintiffs objected, and MORTON, J., rejected the evidence. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the defendant alleged exceptions.

G. M. Brooks, for the defendant, cited Adams v. Carlisle, 21 Pick. 146; Baldwin v. Western Railroad, 4 Gray, 333. W. P. Webster, (B. F. Butler with him,) for the plaintiffs.

METCALF, J. — This action is brought to recover damages for an injury caused by reason of the negligence of the defendant, and can be supported only by proof of such want of care as constitutes actionable negligence. At the trial the only fact offered in proof of the alleged cause of action was the defendant's leaving his horses, that were harnessed to a wagon, standing on his land near his house, without tying them or leaving them under the charge of any other person. The verdict shows that this fact, though there was conflicting testimony concerning it, was found by the jury, and that they also found that it was legal proof of such want of care as rendered the defendant liable for the injury sustained by the female plaintiff. And the Court are of opinion that evidence of the defendant's being a careful, prudent, and cautious man was not admissible for the purpose of showing that he used, in this instance, such care of his horses as the law requires in order to exempt him from responsibility for the mischief produced by their escape into the highway. When the precise act or omission of a defendant is proved, the question whether it is actionable negligence is to be decided by the character of that act or omission, and not by the character for care and caution that the defendant may sustain. If such evidence as was offered and rejected at the trial is ever admissible, in a case like this, we incline to the opinion that it is only when the plaintiff attempts to prove the defendant's negligence by merely circumstantial evidence, or, perhaps, by witnesses shown to be of doubtful veracity. These exceptions do not show, nor was it suggested in argument, that the excluded evidence was admissible on either of these grounds. . . . Exceptions overruled.

20. FONDA v. ST. PAUL CITY RY. CO.

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1898

71 Minn. 438; 74 N. W. 166

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the district court for Ramsey county, WILLIS, J., denying its alternative motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, or for a new trial, after a verdict for the plaintiff for $17,640.30. Reversed and a new trial granted.

Munn & Thygeson, for appellant. . . . The Court below erred in admitting evidence of the general incompetency of the motorman. It makes no difference how negligent he may have been at other times prior to the accident. If, as a matter of fact, he handled the car in a prudent and proper manner at the time of the accident, the defendant would not be liable. . . .

Stevens, O'Brien, Cole & Albrecht, for respondent. . . . Evidence is admissible of the general incompetency of the motorman when such incompetency is radical, inherent, and natural, arising out of constitutional defects which render him unfit to perform the duty assigned. . . .

MITCHELL, J. — The plaintiff, a stranger to and not an employee of, the defendant, recovered a verdict for personal injuries caused by the alleged negligence of defendant's servants; and from an order denying its motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, or for a new trial, the defendant appealed. . . . The accident occurred at or near the easterly intersection of Walnut and Seventh streets, in the city of St. Paul. . . . In the forenoon of the day of the accident, plaintiff had traveled southerly, down Walnut street, to Seventh, for the purpose of taking an east-bound car going down town. He had reached the northeast corner of Walnut and Seventh, and then started to cross the latter, for the purpose of getting on the south side of the southerly track in order to take his car. His testimony as to what occurred is as follows:

"Just as I left the sidewalk to cross Seventh street, I looked up, and looked both ways. I saw a car approaching from the east over a block away, and I also looked the other way towards the west, and there was a car coming from that way too; and I walked out on the rails, and my intention was, as I walked out there, to get across the rails, before the east-bound car got down there (the car I was going to take). As I walked out on the track, that east-bound car got down there, and I couldn't cross it. So I hesitated a minute as the car got down by me. Then I started to walk around the tail end. Just as I started to walk around the tail end, and took a few steps, this west-bound car came along, and struck me, and knocked me down." . . .

The conjuncture of circumstances was such as to require peculiar caution on the part of the motorman on the west-bound car. . . . The jury were abundantly justified in finding that he was guilty of negligence. . . .

Upon the trial, the Court, against the objection of defendant, admitted evidence of the general incompetency of the motorman, based on the observations of witnesses who had seen him operate his car on prior occasions. We think this was error. . . . The sole issue, aside from that as to plaintiff's contributory negligence, was whether or not the motorman was guilty of negligence at the time of the accident. When the act or omission is proved, whether it be actionable negligence is to be determined by the character of the act or omission itself, and not by the character of prior acts of the party committing it. If the plaintiff could offer testimony as to the general incompetency or as to prior negligent acts or omissions of the motorman, then with equal propriety the defendant, upon the issue of contributory negligence, might offer evidence of plaintiff's general carelessness, or of his negligent acts on other occasions. Indeed, we do not see why the plaintiff would not, upon the same principle, have the right to introduce evidence that he himself was an habitually careful and cautious man. As the liability of a master for the acts of his servant rests upon the doctrine of respondeat superior, it can make no difference as to the admissibility of such evidence whether the alleged negligent act was committed by the servant or by the master in person. Hence, if the offered evidence was admissible in this case, it would have been equally competent had the defendant been a natural person, and operating the car himself, to prove that he was incompetent to perform such work, or had performed it negligently on former occasions.

There are some cases which hold that where the person injured was killed, and there were no eye-witnesses of the occurrence, the general character of the deceased as a careful and prudent man may be shown for the purpose of raising a presumption that he was not negligent on the occasion in question. But this rule is based upon the supposed necessities of the case, and is repudiated by very eminent authorities. . . . Many of the authorities cited by plaintiff's counsel are cases where a servant brought an action against his master for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. In such cases the doctrine of "respondeat superior" does not apply, the gist of action being the negligence of the master in employing or retaining an incompetent servant. A moment's reflection will show that such cases are not at all in point. . . .

We have examined all of the numerous cases cited on this question, and find that, aside from obiter remarks in one or two in which the question was not involved or raised, only the following at all tend to support plaintiff's contention, viz.: Vicksburgh v. Patton, 31 Miss. 156; State v. Manchester, 52 N. H. 528; Craven v. Central, 72 Cal. 345, 13 Pac. 878; State v. Boston, 58 N. H. 410. But a careful examination of these cases shows that all they hold (unless it is the first) is that when evidence is conflicting as to whether a person, in conducting his business or performing his services, performed a particular act, or performed it in a particular way, it is competent to show that he was in the habit of performing the act, or performing it in that peculiar way, — not as evidence of character or of fitness or unfitness, but simply as having some tendency to show that on the particular occasion in question he probably did the act, or did it in a peculiar way, in accordance with his general habit or custom. Whether this rule is correct or incorrect, it falls short of sustaining the contention of plaintiff's counsel in the present case. The evidence introduced was not directed or limited to showing that the motorman was in the habit of doing or omitting to do some particular act which the other evidence tended to prove that he did or omitted to do on the occasion in question. It was to the effect that he was generally incompetent, as shown in a variety of ways, by his method of managing his car on former occasions. In brief, the inference sought to be drawn is that, if he was generally incompetent, it was more probable that he operated the car improperly on this occasion. Such an inference might at first blush seem to be a legitimate one, but it is too remote and conjectural to be permissible. Any such rule of evidence would drag innumerable collateral issues into the trial of a case; for evidence of general incompetency would necessarily result in the introduction of evidence of particular acts. . . .

For the errors already referred to, the order appealed from must be reversed, and a new trial granted. So ordered.

21. HEIN v. HOLDRIDGE

78 Minn. 468; 81 N. W. 522

ACTION in the District Court for Olmsted County to recover $5,031.50 damages for seduction of plaintiff's daughter. The case was tried before SNOW, J., and a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $531; and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appealed. Reversed.

James E. Bradford and Webber & Lees, for appellant. . . . Evidence of defendant's reputation for chastity and good moral character was admissible. Schuek v. Hagar, 24 Minn. 339; Bingham v. Bernard, 36 Minn. 114. . . .

H. A. Eckholdt, for respondent. . . . Defendant's character was not put in issue, nor impeached. Until attacked, he must rely on the general presumption of good character. Cochran v. Toher, 14 Minn. 293 (385); Lotto v. Davenport, 50 Minn. 99. Schuek v. Hagar, 24 Minn. 339, is contrary to the overwhelming weight of authority elsewhere, and should not be followed. . . .

START, C. J. — This is an action by a father for the alleged seduction of his daughter by the defendant. Verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $531, and the defendant appealed from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The assignments of error present two general questions for our decision. . . . (2) Did the trial Court err in excluding evidence offered by the defendant to show that his general reputation for chastity was good?

The only evidence as to the alleged acts of sexual intercourse between the defendant and the plaintiff's daughter was the testimony of the daughter and of the defendant. They flatly contradicted each other. The daughter, who was at that time a servant in the family of the defendant, testified to such acts, and that the defendant was the father of her illegitimate child. The defendant, who was a married man, positively denied her testimony. Thereupon the defendant offered to show, by witnesses who had known him from his birth, and lived near him, that his general reputation for chastity was good. The Court excluded the evidence, and the defendant duly excepted. Was the ruling correct?

The charge against the defendant involved the commission of a crime by him, and, if this were a criminal case, it is certain that the excluded evidence would have been admissible. The accused in a criminal case, whether the charge be a felony or a misdemeanor, may always prove his previous good character, of which his general reputation is evidence, as tending to disprove the commission of the offense; that is, as tending to show the improbability of a person of his previous character committing the act charged. The rule is not limited to cases where the probative force of the evidence against the accused is weak. There would seem to be no logical reason why the same rule should not apply to civil actions in which the defendant is charged with a crime.

But the accepted general rule is that evidence of the general character of parties to civil actions, where character is not a part of the issue, is inadmissible. The rule seems to be one of practical convenience, for the purpose of avoiding the confusion of issues. 1 Greenleaf, Ev. (16th Ed.), § 14b, subd. 4.

On principle, however, it would seem that there ought to be exceptions to this general rule. In this State, whatever may be the case in other jurisdictions, such exceptions are recognized. Inasmuch as the general rule is not based upon any philosophical reason, but is merely one of convenience, it ought not to be applied to cases where justice to the defendant requires that the inconvenience arising from a confusion of the issues should be disregarded, and he be permitted to give evidence of his previous good character; or, in other words, such evidence ought to be received in a civil action when it is of a character to bring it within all of the reasons for admitting such evidence in criminal cases. Civil actions for an indecent assault, for seduction, and kindred cases, are of this character; for such cases are not infrequently mere speculative and blackmailing schemes. The consequences to the defendant of a verdict against him in such a case are most serious, for the issue as to him involves his fortune, his honor, his family. From the very nature of the charge, it often happens that an innocent man can only meet the issue by a denial of the charge, and proof of his previous good character. Ought a defendant in such a case be deprived of the right to lay before the jury evidence of his previous good character, because it will tend to confuse the issue, while a defendant in a case where the State charges him with a simple assault, involving no more serious consequences than the payment, perhaps, of a fine of five dollars, is accorded the absolute right to give such evidence? The question has been answered in the negative by this Court. If evidence of the previous good character of a defendant is admissible in a civil action for an indecent assault, it necessarily follows that such evidence is admissible in a civil action for seduction, for the cases in this respect cannot be distinguished.

Now, in the case of Schuek v. Hagar, 24 Minn. 339, which was a civil action to recover damages for an indecent assault, the defendant offered evidence of his previous good character; and this Court, reversing the trial Court, held, without dissent, that such evidence was admissible. In the case of Bingham v. Bernard, 36 Minn. 114, 30 N. W. 404, which was a similar action, it was assumed by Court and counsel that the rule of Schuek v. Hagar was correct, and evidence of defendant's good character was received without objection. If the doctrine of Schuek v. Hagar is to be adhered to, it necessarily follows that it is decisive of the question we are now considering. . . . It therefore ought to be adhered to on the ground of "stare decisis," if for no other, and we so hold. We are also of the opinion that the doctrine of that case ought not to be extended to civil actions where the issue relates to a simple assault, or to the fraud, deceit, or negligence of the defendant, or to similar actions, for they are not within the reasons we have suggested for the admission of evidence of good character in exceptional civil actions. Our conclusion is that the trial Court erred in ruling out the proffered evidence.

Order reversed, and a new trial granted.

Collins, J. — The universal rule is that the character of a party to a civil action is not admissible in evidence as tending to prove that he did not do the act in question. The nature of every transaction involved in such an action is to be determined by its own facts and circumstances, and not by the character of the parties. But this rule was departed from by this Court, in 1877, in Schuek v. Hagar, 24 Minn. 339. And, to be consistent, the doctrine of that case should be applied whenever the charge made in a civil action imputes any kind of moral turpitude to a defendant, such as fraud or falsehood or kindred delinquencies; for, whenever the character of a defendant for fraudulent or deceitful practices or for truth or honesty is at issue, he, for the same reasons exactly, ought to be permitted to lay before the jury evidence of his previous good character, as tending to show that he was not morally delinquent, and not inclined to fraud or falsehood. This would be a departure from the well-settled rules of evidence not to be thought of, and yet, on principle, not a step in advance of, or materially different from, that laid down, without discussion and without citation of authority, in the Schuck case. I am convinced that the Court was radically wrong in that case. But on the ground of "stare decisis" I concur in the main opinion.

I am authorized to say that Justice BROWN coincides with these views.

22. McCLURE v. STATE BANKING CO.

COURT OF APPEALS OF GEORGIA. 1909

6 Ga. App. 303; 65 S. E. 33

ERROR from City Court of Hall County; J. C. BOONE, Judge.

Action by the State Banking Company against J. M. McClure. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The bank sued McClure on a note made payable to one Turner and indorsed by him to the bank. The defendant claimed that the note was a forgery, and that Turner had committed the forgery. He offered to prove, in support of this contention, that the general reputation of Turner was very bad and that he bore the general reputation of having been engaged in the business of committing forgeries. The Court declined to allow the proof. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepts to the overruling of his motion for a new trial.

Geo. K. Looper and B. P. Gaillard, Jr., for plaintiff in error. W. I. Hobbs and H. H. Perry, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J.—The rule prevailing in England and in most of the American States, that evidence of character is not usually received when offered for the purpose of throwing light on the probability of the doing of a certain act by the person whose character is in question, is not of force in this state. The contrary doctrine has been recognized in our jurisprudence from a very early date. Civil Code 1895, § 5159, provides: "The general character of the parties, and especially their conduct in other transactions, are irrelevant matters, unless the nature of the action involves such character and renders necessary or proper the investigation of such conduct." The rule is especially applicable to, if not confined to, cases where a particular trait of the person whose conduct is under investigation is involved, or the alleged conduct is such that no person of good character would likely commit it. If only a particular trait is involved, the testimony should be limited accordingly. On the subject generally, see McNabb v. Lockhart, 18 Ga. 496, 512 (in which the party's character for honesty and general trustworthiness was involved); Planters' Bank v. Neel, 74 Ga. 576, 581 (in which a person's character as a man of close attention to business was involved); Falkner v. Behr, 75 Ga. 672, 676 (in which the general character of one of the parties was involved); Du Bose v. Du Bose, 75 Ga. 753 (in which the husband's character for decency was involved in a divorce action); Columbus Ry. Co. v. Christian, 97 Ga. 56 (in which the character of the defendant's agent as a dangerous man was involved); German American Life Ass'n v. Farley, 102 Ga. 720 (in which the plantiff's character was involved on an issue as to whether he had committed fraud in procuring a policy of insurance). In all of these cases it was held that evidence as to the particular or general traits of character involved in the respective actions, was admissible.

Frequently this kind of evidence has a distinct relevancy and a high degree of probative value, because it tends to make the question involved in the issue more or less probable in favor of one side of the case or the other. Even those Courts and text-writers who support and lay down the proposition that the evidence is not admissible do not put it on the ground that the evidence lacks relevancy or probative value, but rather rely on the ancient and well-established character of the rule itself. The Courts of this state, out of deference to the policy expressed in the maxim "Let there be light," have rejected the old rule, which has long outlived the reason from which it sprang.

In the case at bar the maker of the note claimed that Turner had forged his signature. Now, if Turner were a man of good character, this fact would have made the defendant's contention very improbable. Unquestionably the plaintiff would have had the right to prove that Turner was a man of good character, and it was not even necessary for him to prove this to get the benefit of it in the argument; for there is a presumption, until the contrary appears, that every person has a good character, and this presumption is strong enough to afford a basis for argument by counsel and for action by the jury. Goggans v. Monroe, 31 Ga. 331; Bennett v. State, 86 Ga. 404; Ga. Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Dougherty, 4 Ga. App. 614, 616, 618. On the other hand, proof that Turner was a man of bad character, and especially that he had the general reputation of being a frequent and notorious forger, would tend to make the defendant's contention that the signature to the note was a forgery more probable. The conduct charged to Turner in the present inquiry was such as to involve his general bad character, and also his special bad character, as we may call it, and the rule limiting the evidence to a particular trait (Anderson's Case, 107 Ga. 506) was not applicable.

Judgment reversed.

23. THE QUEEN v. RYAN

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT. 1846

2 Cox Cr. 115

THE prisoner was indicted for rape. The prosecutrix was an idiot, and when asked questions in the witness-box, was evidently unconscious of their purport, and not in a condition to understand right from wrong.

PLATT, B., interrogated her father as to her general habits, whether they were those of decency and propriety, and an answer in the affirmative was returned.

PLATT, B., in summing up. — The question is, Did the connection take place with her consent? It seems that she was in a condition incapable of judging; and it is important to consider whether a young person, in such a state of incapacity, was likely to consent to the embraces of this man; because if her habits, however irresponsible she might be, were loose and indecent, there might be a probability of such consent being given, and a jury might not think it safe to conclude that she was not a willing party. . . . The prisoner was convicted.

24. FRANKLIN v. STATE

29 Ala. 14

FROM the Circuit Court of Pike. Tried before the Hon. E. W. PETTUS. Indictment against Philemon J. Franklin for the murder of his brother, Christopher Franklin, by shooting him with a gun. The only evidence in relation to the killing was the testimony of a young man, then about sixteen years of age, who was an eye-witness of it, and whose testimony, in substance, is stated in the opinion of the Court. On the part of the prisoner, evidence of his peaceable character was introduced. . . . The prisoner then offered to prove, "that the general character of the deceased was that of a turbulent and dangerous man"; but this evidence also was excluded by the Court, and the prisoner excepted. . . .

E. C. Bullock, for the prisoner. While the bad character of the deceased, per se, does not in the slightest degree affect the character of the homicide, it yet becomes a legitimate and important subject of inquiry, where the circumstances make the precise grade of the crime doubtful, and where the ferocious temper of the deceased might furnish a key to the whole transaction. . . .

M. A. Baldwin, Attorney-General, contra. The character of the deceased can never become a matter of controversy, under an indictment for homicide, except when involved in the res gestae. When a homicide is committed under such circumstances as tend to show that the prisoner acted in self-defense, then the conduct of the person slain, construed with reference to his known character, becomes a part of the transaction; but, when the evidence not only fails to show any conduct on the part of the deceased which could raise the question of self-defense, but affirmatively shows (as it does here) that his situation and position precluded that question, his bad character cannot be received to mitigate the offense. . . .

WALKER, J. — It has been twice decided in this State, and must now be regarded as law, that the testimony, in prosecutions for murder, may be such as will justify the admission of the bad character of the deceased as evidence for the accused. Quesenberry v. The State, 3 S. & P. 308; Pritchett v. The State, 22 Ala. 39. . . . In both cases, it is carefully and properly denied that the bad character of the deceased can, of itself, lessen the criminality of his murder. The rule is laid down in Oliver's case (17 Ala. 599) that "the necessity which exculpates the accused from guilt, need not be actual; that if the circumstances be such as to induce a reasonable belief that such necessity exists, the law will acquit the slayer of all guilt." It seems to result as a sequence from this principle, that the character of the deceased for turbulence, violence, revengefulness, blood-shed, and the like, where it qualifies, explains, and gives meaning and point to the conduct of the deceased, should be proper evidence. Conduct of a man of peaceable character and harmless deportment might pass by without exciting a reasonable apprehension of impending peril; while, on the other hand, the same conduct, from a man of notoriously opposite character and habits, might reasonably produce a consciousness of the most imminent peril, and a conviction of the necessity of prompt defensive action. Whenever such bad character on the part of the deceased thus illustrates the circumstances attending a homicide, and the circumstances, so illustrated, tend to produce a reasonable belief of imminent danger in the mind of the slayer, the character, as mingled with the transaction, is a part of it, and is indispensable to its correct understanding. Such we understand to be, in effect, the decisions in Quesenberry's and Pritchett's cases. To avoid detriment in the practical application of the rule, it must be understood neither, on the one hand, to excuse the taking of one's life because he is a bad man, nor, on the other, to be limited to those cases where the facts are such as to make it doubtful whether the homicide was committed "se defendendo." The law cannot apportion the criminality of the homicide to the character of the deceased, and it cannot confine the rule to cases of doubt; because, in such cases, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal, and therefore to so limit it would deny to it all practical effect. . . .

We now turn to the testimony, for the purpose of inquiring whether the circumstances were such that, under the rule we have laid down, the character of the deceased, "as a turbulent and dangerous man," ought to have been admitted in evidence. The prisoner and the deceased were brothers, and worked together in a blacksmith shop. The deceased went to the prisoner's house, with a loaded gun, late in the evening, and near the door of the prisoner's house, used reproachful and angry words for some time, but did not use any language of menace, or indicating an intention, either present or prospective, to perpetrate violence upon the prisoner. The deceased afterwards went into the house, where the prisoner was at the time lying upon a bed. Immediately afterwards, the prisoner said to the deceased, "You have come here with your arms, and I have nothing to defend myself." The deceased then placed his gun on the bed on which the prisoner was lying, and turned and walked off about ten feet to a table, and turned and sat down on the table, with his face to the prisoner. As the deceased turned to walk off from the bed, the prisoner seized the gun, cocked and presented it; and at the instant when the deceased sat down on the table, the gun fired, and the load entered the breast of the deceased, who fell forward, with his head towards the bed, and his feet three or four feet from the table, and expired in about half an hour. . . . There was not a word spoken, not an act done, which, illustrated by the character of the deceased, and construed by the prisoner in the light of that character, could tend to produce a reasonable belief of imminent peril. Nor was there any act or word from the prisoner, which, explained by his character, could aggravate his conduct into such a provocation as to mitigate the offense to a lower degree. . . .

The judgment of the Court below must be affirmed, and its sentence executed.

25. WILLIAMS v. FAMBRO

30 Ga. 232

TRESPASS vi et armis, in Pike Superior Court. Tried before Judge CABANNIS, at October Term, 1859. This was an action brought by Allen G. Fambro against Richard W. Williams, for the recovery of damage for killing a negro man slave, named Jim, alias Jim Sheet, the property of plaintiff. The declaration alleged that the negro was worth $1,200, and that he came to his death by wounds inflicted upon him by the defendant. The defendant pleaded the general issue. Upon the trial it appeared from the testimony, that at the time the negro was killed, March 23, 1857, the defendant was overseeing for plaintiff; that the plantation upon which the negro was killed, was in the county of Crawford, and that plaintiff resided about thirty miles distant. None of the witnesses examined was present at the killing; the negro was found dead — stabbed in the left side; the wound having the appearance of having been inflicted with a long knife. . . . When the case was called for trial and plaintiff announced ready, defendant moved for a continuance, on the ground of the absence of a witness who resided in the county, and had been duly subpoenaed, and by whom defendant expected to prove that the negro killed was of bad character, turbulent, and unruly; plaintiff objected to the showing as insufficient; the testimony of the absent witness, as stated by defendant, if procured, being immaterial and inadmissible. The Court held the showing insufficient, and refused the motion to continue, and defendant excepted.

The plaintiff having closed his testimony, the defendant offered to read the depositions of one Robert D. Walker, a witness examined by commission. The substance of the answers of this witness was, that he knew the boy, Jim; that his character in the neighborhood was, that he was hard to manage and control, and of a violent disposition. . . . Nat Lucas and Frank Bacon told witness that the character of the negro was bad, and they wanted him to keep Jim away from their plantations; they said he was a dangerous negro, and of bad habits; witness considered him dangerous. Plaintiff's counsel objected to the reading of these depositions, upon the ground that the testimony was irrelevant and immaterial. Defendant's counsel stated that this testimony was offered for two purposes: (1) To show the character and conduct of the negro. (2) To mitigate the damages. The Court sustained the objections and ruled out the depositions, so far as they went to prove the general character of the negro for violence, unless some act of violence was shown to defendant, or knowledge on his part of the negro's character for violence. To which ruling defendant excepted. . . . The jury found for the plaintiff twelve hundred dollars. Whereupon defendant moved for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence, and because of error in the rulings, decisions, charges, and refusal to charge above stated and excepted to. The Court overruled the motion, and defendant excepted.

By the Court. — STEPHENS, J., delivering the opinion. We think the plaintiff in error was entitled to the continuance to get the benefit of Bacon's testimony, and that he ought also to have had the benefit of Walker's testimony, which was offered but ruled out. We think the testimony of these two witnesses was material and admissible, so far as it related to their own general knowledge of the negro's disposition. . . . The thing to be proven in this case was, not the negro's reputation, but his character, his disposition or nature, and especially his aptness for strife and his proneness to insubordination — a fact which ought to be proven by witnesses who know it, or by the admissions of the opposite party. The fact, if proven from the proper sources, ought to have gone to the jury for two purposes, as tending to aid the theory of the defense that the negro was killed in an act of insubordination, and as tending to lessen the value of the negro, and so to mitigate the damages.

To prove a proneness to insubordination, to be sure, does not prove an act of insubordination, but it does increase the probability of the story when there is, as there was in this case, other evidence suggestive of such an act. Such a story of rebellion, if told by a witness, or indicated by circumstances, ought to be more easily believed concerning a violent, turbulent negro, than concerning a meek, humble one. I think that any mind in search of truth in such a case, or finding itself in doubt, would want to know the character of the negro.

The presiding Judge intimated that he would have allowed this evidence, if it had been shown that this character had been communicated to Williams before he killed the negro. His knowledge or ignorance has nothing to do with that bearing of the character which I have pointed out. The sole purpose for which character was admissible, in this case, on the question of justification, was from the negro's general readiness for rebellion, to render more probable the evidence which tended to show an act of rebellion at the time when he was killed; and this probability is evidently not affected in the slightest degree by Williams' previous knowledge. The light comes from the fact that the negro was one who was apt or likely to do such an act as the one imputed to him, and not from Williams' knowledge of the fact.

As to the bearing of the negro's character upon the question of damages, it is very obvious that a negro's bad character detracts from his value, and ought to lessen the damages for killing him. . . .

Judgment reversed.

26. STATE v. KENNADE

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI. 1894

121 Mo. 405; 26 S. W. 347

APPEAL from St. Louis Criminal Court, — Hon. H. L. EDMUNDS, Judge. Affirmed. The defendant, a German, indicted for the murder of Cora Thompson, a negress, by shooting her with a pistol, was convicted of that crime in the second degree, his punishment being assessed at twenty years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, and he appeals to this Court.

The testimony on behalf of the prosecution was substantially this: On the afternoon of March 20, 1893, defendant was in a saloon on Eighth street, near Clark avenue, in the city of St. Louis. . . . A young negro named Morris came in and was challenged to play by defendant; upon his declining on the score of having no money, defendant agreed to pay for the game, and they began to play. Morris won, and defendant proposed to play for a quarter. Another negro present "staked" Morris, and they played several games, doubling the stakes each time, Morris winning every game, until the amount at stake was four dollars, and the stakeholder paid over the money to Morris, who started to leave the saloon. Defendant went up to him, and without saying a word, slapped him, knocked off his hat, and, putting his hand into his hip pocket, drew out a pistol. Morris ran out the rear door, through a gangway, into the alley near deceased's house. . . . Defendant immediately started toward him, putting his hand in his pistol pocket, and Morris ran past the deceased's house to a vacant lot, and thence back to Eighth street. The deceased was in her room at the time, entertaining a visitor, a negro woman named Reynolds. The door of the room was immediately on the alley, about a foot above the level of the pavement, and had a single stone step in front of it. Hearing a noise in the alley, and some one shouting, "Run, run!" both women went to the door, and just then defendant came up to the door and cried out, "Let me in!" Deceased said, "What do you want in here?" Defendant replied, "I want to get that nigger out of here." Deceased said, "There is no nigger in here; you may look in, but you can't come in." He tried to force his way in, placing his foot on the stone step, when deceased picked up a seashell from her bureau, and raising it in her hand, said, "If you come in here, I'll knock you in the head." Defendant stepped back, and the woman closed the door; he drew out his pistol, advanced, fired twice through the door, and then forced the door open and fired directly at the woman, who fell, shot through the heart, and died almost instantly. . . .

Charles T. Noland, for appellant.

R. F. Walker, Attorney-General, and C. O. Bishop, for the State. . . . The question by appellant of the officer as to what was the reputation of deceased, while she was alive, for peacefulness, as a law-abiding citizen, was properly objected to and the objection rightfully sustained. . . . Second. Because in this case her reputation was immaterial. The mere fact that one is a bad or quarrelsome person is no excuse for killing him. State v. Hardy, 95 Mo. 455. The theory on which the quarrelsome or dangerous character of a deceased may be shown is that, because of defendant's knowledge of that fact, he may more reasonably apprehend danger to life or limb by reason of threats or demonstrations made against him by deceased. . . .

SHERWOOD, J. . . . Even if deceased had a reputation for being quarrelsome and dangerous, evidence of it could not have been received unless it had been previously shown that defendant knew it, and therefore might more reasonably apprehend danger in certain circumstances, than if that reputation had been different. As this knowledge of defendant of the reputation of deceased is affirmatively shown by his own testimony not to have existed, an answer to the question asked the officers was correctly denied. State v. Hicks, 27 Mo. 590. . . .

Judgment affirmed. All concur.

27. PEOPLE v. LAMAR. (1906. California. 148 Cal. 564, 83 Pac. 993). LORIGAN, J. It is the rule in this State that threats of hostile intention made by a deceased, whether communicated or uncommunicated, are admissible evidence for the said purpose when the evidence is equivocal. People v. Scoggins, 37 Cal. 686; People v. Travis, 56 Cal. 251; People v. Tamkin, 62 Cal. 468; People v. Thomson, 92 Cal. 506, 28 Pac. 589. The philosophy which supports this rule as to the admissibility of evidence of such threats, where it is otherwise in doubt from the evidence who was the assailant, is that it is more probable that one who has made threats of hostile intention towards another would, when opportunity permits, attempt to carry such threats into execution and become the assailant, than would one who has made no such threats, or declared no such intention. So, too, with reference to the admissibility of evidence of the reputation of deceased as being a violent, turbulent, dangerous man, such proof, when the evidence as to who was the assailant is in doubt, for a similar philosophic reason should be permitted; it being more probable that one bearing such a reputation would precipitate a deadly contest than would one having no such reputation. Hence, we think the rule should be that whenever the circumstances of a case permit of the admission of evidence of threats made by the deceased against the defendant, either communicated or uncommunicated, evidence of the reputation of the deceased as being a violent, quarrelsome, dangerous man, either known or unknown to the defendant, is equally admissible; the consideration of the jury to be limited by proper instructions of the Court, where the reputation is unknown to defendant, to the same extent that the law limits the consideration by them of uncommunicated threats — to the question solely as to who was the assailant in the fatal encounter. The rule as to such limitation when applied to uncommunicated threats is declared in People v. Scoggins, 37 Cal. 686.

Sub-topic C. Character as an Issue in Civil Cases

28. BUFORD v. M'LUNY

Constitutional Court of South Carolina. 1818

1 Nott & McC. 268

This case was submitted without argument; and the only question for the consideration of the Court was, whether, in an action of slander, the general bad character of the plaintiff may be given in evidence, by way of mitigating the damages? The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Nott, J. — This question may be considered in a two-fold point of view: 1. Whether evidence of plaintiff's character, generally, is admissible, without regard to the particular nature of the offense with which he is charged? And, 2. If that is not to be allowed, whether such evidence may be given, so far as regards his character in that respect, in particular?

1. It is a little remarkable that such a question should have remained so long undecided in our Courts; and it is not less so, that so little is to be found on the subject in the English books. Enough, however, is to be found to satisfy my mind that, upon both principle and authority, such testimony ought to be allowed. It seems to be a rule of law, that what a party cannot plead by way of justification, he may give in evidence by way of mitigation. Buller, 298; Phillipps, 139; and it is admitted, that this matter cannot be pleaded by way of justification. I consider it also to be a rule of law, that character may be given in evidence where it is directly in issue. And I can conceive no case where it is in issue, if it be not in action of slander. In every action of law, the object is to recover reparation for some injury sustained. And, where the injury is to property, the value of the article is the principal object of inquiry. And I can see no good reason why the value of character may not be investigated, as well as that of any other commodity, when the reparation of character is the object of this suit. In other personal actions, such as false imprisonment, assault and battery, and the like, the actual injury sustained, although not the only rule by which damages are to be estimated, always constitutes a necessary ingredient in the question; and it would seem reasonable that the same rule should apply in an action of slander, as in other personal actions. A plaintiff is permitted to give his good character in evidence, by way of enhancing the damages, and, upon the principle of reciprocity, the defendant ought to be permitted to prove the contrary.

If we consider the case upon authority, we are led to the same conclusion. The whole current of American cases, I may almost say, goes to support this opinion. . . .

It is said it would be taking a person by surprise thus to permit an inquiry into his character. But . . . he commences with stating that he is a person of good name, fame, and reputation, and he ought to be prepared to prove that allegation. A person is presumed to be always prepared to defend his general character, if he has a good one; if he has not, it ought to be exposed. . . .

2. On the second question, I apprehend there can be no doubt. . . . In the case of Leicester v. Walter (2 Camp. 251) the defendant was allowed to show that, before and at the time of the publication of the supposed libel, the plaintiff was generally suspected of the crime imputed to him, and that his friends had ceased to associate with him on that account.

In every point of view, I am of opinion, the testimony ought to be allowed, and therefore a new trial must be granted.

Justices Colcock and Johnson concurred.

Mr. Justice Cheves dissented, as follows:

In this case I differ from the majority of the Court. The question is simply, shall the defendant, under the plea of not guilty, be permitted to give the general character of the plaintiff in evidence? The prominent arguments, in support of the affirmative of this question, are:

1. That the pleadings put the character of the plaintiff in issue.

2. That the foundation of damages is the actual injury suffered by the plaintiff in his character, and that where he had no character to lose, he can have sustained no injury.

3. That as the plaintiff may give in evidence his rank and condition in life in aggravation, the defendant may do the same in mitigation. It is believed that all the arguments in the affirmative of this question may be brought under one or other of these three heads; which we will now consider:

1. It is alleged that the pleadings put the character of the plaintiff in issue; now it is not true, in point of law, that the character of the plaintiff is put in issue. . . . Mr. Justice Buller, in Janson v. Stewart, 1 T. Rep. 748, says: "It is not true that the general character of the plaintiff is put in issue"; and a better pleader than he never sat on the English bench; vide also 1 Chitty on Plead. 226, 364.

2. But it is said that the foundation of the damages given in actions of slander is the actual injury suffered by the plaintiff in his character. This is not true. It is upon the presumption of loss (little more than a legal fiction), and not upon the actual loss, that actions of slander are principally founded; and the experience of the profession abundantly attests the fact, that the heaviest damages are often given where the slightest injury is sustained. Are not the heaviest damages given when the slander is uttered against unsullied and impregnable character; where the malice of the calumniator has been shot, "like a pointless arrow from a broken bow?" To the tottering and questionable character, the shafts of the slanderer are fatal and ruinous. In this case, the damage is above compensation. Not only the wreck of reputation is swept away, but hope itself, which sustains us when "we are ready to perish," is not allowed to cheer the sufferer. In such cases, we know that the damages are usually nominal, though the injury is immeasurable and intolerable. . . .

3. The last general ground on which it is supposed this evidence ought to be received, is, that as the plaintiff is permitted to give in evidence his rank and condition in life in aggravation of damages, the defendant should be permitted to do the same in mitigation of damages; this is the point decided in Larned v. Buffinton, 3 Mass. Rep. 546. But I cannot imagine that the rank and condition in life of a man involves his good or bad character in a moral point of view. . . . Rank and condition in life merely, should, perhaps, neither increase or diminish the damages in an action of slander under this government. On the whole, I am clearly and decidedly of opinion that the evidence is inadmissible, and that a new trial ought not to be granted.

Mr. Justice GANTT concurred with Mr. Justice CHEVES.

Gunning, for the motion; Clarke, Solicitor, contra.

29. WILLIAM TRICKETT. Character-Evidence in Civil Cases. (1904. The Forum, Dickinson College of Law, vol. VIII, p. 165.) When character is in issue. — There are civil actions in which the character of a party, or of another specially connected with him, is said to be in issue, and in such cases, this character may be put in evidence. "Putting character in issue," says TILGHMAN, C. J., "is a technical expression and confined to certain actions, from the nature of which the character of the parties, or some of them, is of particular importance. Such is the action brought by one man against another, for seducing his wife, and having criminal connection with her. There the injury done to the plaintiff consists mainly (sic?) in the good conduct of his wife, before her seduction, and, therefore, the defendant is permitted to show that she was unchaste. So in an action of slander, the plaintiff in his declaration, asserts his own good character, and avers the intent of the defendant to rob him of it. He puts his character in issue, therefore, and the defendant is at liberty to impeach it." (Anderson v. Long, 10 S. & R. 55; Porter v. Seiler, 23 Pa. 424.)

When the action seeks to recover damages, altogether or in part for injury to a reputation, the question is, what is the value of that reputation? It is competent for the defendant to disclose any defects in it, prior to his having done the act which is the gravamen of the complaint, in order to show that the reputation he damaged had less than the normal value. . . . By actions for seduction, whether of daughter or other female, damages are in part sought for the injury to the social position and reputation of the plaintiff, through the injury to the reputation of the female. . . . The damages are for injury to the reputation. It matters not whether this reputation is better than is deserved or not. . . . The sexual character of a party to a contract to marry, is relevant in an action on that contract for breach of it. By character here is not meant reputation but conduct. A woman might conceivably have a bad reputation without deserving it. Her misfortune would probably be no bar to an action by her. But if without the knowledge of the man, that she has been lewd and immoral, he contracts to marry her, his subsequent discovery of this fact will excuse him from performing the contract. . . . A slander or libel is a tort which injures or tends to injure reputation, and the action founded upon it seeks to recover compensation for this injury. The character of the plaintiff is therefore in issue in such an action, unless the plea of the defendant excludes it from the issue. The plea of justification confines the defendant to the proof of the truth of his charge, and he is precluded from showing that that character of the plaintiff which the defamation touches, was before the defamation, not good. (Drown v. Allen, 91 Pa. 393.) But when the plea of "not guilty" is pleaded, either alone or in conjunction, as it may be, with that of justification, the defendant may, for the purpose of mitigating the damages, prove the badness of the plaintiff's reputation, prior to the slander or libel. . . . It is pertinent to the issue to inquire whether he had a good character; for if he did not, he could not lose it by the act of the defendant.

30. CLEGHORN v. NEW YORK CENTRAL & HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD CO.

56 N. Y. 44

APPEAL from judgment of the General Term in the fourth judicial department, affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff entered on a verdict, and affirming an order denying motion for a new trial.

This was an action to recover for injuries alleged to have been occasioned by defendant's negligence. On the 17th of September, 1869, plaintiff was a passenger upon a train upon defendant's road. A switchman at Lyons station left the switch open on to a side-track, but gave the signal indicating that all was right; in consequence the train was run off upon the side-track and collided with another train standing there. Plaintiff was seriously injured.

Evidence was given tending to show that the switchman was intoxicated at the time; also that he was a man of intemperate habits, which was known to the station agent, who was authorized to and did hire and discharge the men there employed. This evidence was objected to and received under objection. Further facts appear in the opinion.

Samuel Hand, for the appellant. It was error to receive evidence of the intemperate habits of the switchman. . . .

John F. Seymour, for the respondent. Evidence as to the switchman's intemperance was admissible with a view to punitive damages. . . .

CHURCH, Ch. J.—The accident was caused by the carelessness of the switchman, in neglecting to close the switch after the stock train had passed on to the side-track, and in giving a false signal to the approaching passenger train, that the track was all right. It was a clear case of negligence; and for the injury to the plaintiff produced thereby the defendant is liable in this action.

It is insisted that the Court erred in admitting evidence of the intemperate habits of the switchman, and that the case of Warner v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co. (44 N. Y. 465) is a direct authority against it. That was a case of injury at a road crossing. It was proved that the flagman neglected to give the customary signal, and was intoxicated at the time. The Commission of Appeals held it error to show previous habits of intemperance known to the officers of the company, upon the ground that such evidence had no bearing upon the question of negligence at the time. In that view the decision was right. Previous intoxication would not tend to establish an omission to give the signal on the occasion of the accident. In this case it was sought to be proved, not only that Hartman was intoxicated at the time of the accident, but that he was a man of intemperate habits, which were known by the agent of the company, having the power to employ and discharge him and other subordinates, with a view of claiming exemplary damages. For this purpose the evidence was competent. It is unnecessary in this connection, to speak of the strength of the proof upon which a claim for exemplary damages was made in this case. It is sufficient to say that the evidence was competent upon the question of gross negligence on the part of the defendant in employing or continuing the employment of a subordinate known to be unfit for his position by reason of intoxication.

A more serious question arises upon the charge of the judge in relation to exemplary damages. . . . For the error in the charge, the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

All concur. Judgment reversed.

Topic 2. Conduct as Evidence of a Human Quality or Condition

SUB-TOPIC A. CONDUCT AS EVIDENCE OF ACCUSED'S MORAL CHARACTER [1]

31. ROBERT HAWKINS' TRIAL. (1669. Howell's State Trials, VI, 921, 935, 949). [One Larimore charged the accused, a clergyman, with burglary, by breaking into his house and taking some rings and money. After adducing his evidence to the burglary charged in the indictment, the prosecutor went on to prove other felonies against the accused].

[1] For the principles of Logic and Psychology here applicable, see the present Compiler's "Principles of Judicial Proof" (1913), Nos. 84–99.

L. C. B. HALE. — Larimore, have you any more? . . . Call them, for I will hear all, if I sit until night.

Then Larimore called Dodsworth Croke, William Croke, John Stop, Thomas Welch, Samuel Salter, and William Sanders; all these being sworn, the sum and substance of their evidence was to this effect: That they had heard John Chilton say, that Mr. Hawkins had stolen a pair of boots from him. . . .

L. C. B. HALE. — What, more boots still? Come, Larimore, have you any more?

Larimore said, Yes, my lord, one Mr. Boyce. Who, being sworn, said, That at a certain time, he coming into a house at Chilton, found this Mr. Hawkins, now the prisoner at the bar, and one James Noble (which Noble was then drunk, and asleep upon a bed), and I saw Mr. Hawkins have his hand in Noble's pocket, and the said Noble told me, that at that time he lost a gold ring and a piece of gold out of his pocket. . . .

Hawkins. — Boyce, you might have done well, to have told Mr. Noble of this, when he told you that he had lost his ring and piece of gold; but can you say anything touching Larimore's being robbed, or do you know that I am the person that robbed him?

Boyce. — No, not I, my lord, I cannot charge him. . . .

My Lord Chief Baron HALE's Directions to the jury were to this effect:

L. C. B. said, — You that are of the jury, the prisoner at the bar stands indicted for robbing this Larimore, and you have heard at large both the prosecutor's evidence to prove him guilty (which if you do believe) I never heard a fuller. And 2dly, You have also heard the prisoner's defence, wherein (as I think) he hath as fully answered the same charge. I shall, First, repeat the evidence against him, which consists of two branches; the first is the prosecutor's proof of this indictment; and secondly, his charging him with other crimes of the like nature, as the stealing of Chilton's boots, and the picking of Noble's pocket. . . . Secondly, He seems to charge him with other acts of the like nature; as 1, — He brings in one Chilton to swear, that the prisoner at the bar did steal a pair of boots from him, and four or five persons swear, that they did hear Chilton say he did. 2, — He brings in one Boyce from London (a person, I think, of no great credit); who swears, that he saw the prisoner at the bar about two years ago, have his hand in the pocket of one James Noble, and that Noble said, that he lost a gold ring, and a piece of gold at the same time. This (if true) would render the prisoner now at the bar obnoxious to any jury.

32. JOHN CAMPBELL. Lives of the Chief Justices of England. (Vol. III, p. 24, Amer. ed.) Lord Holt [1688 +] put an end to the practice which had hitherto prevailed in England, and which still prevails in France, of trying to show the probability of persons having committed the offense for which they are tried by giving evidence of former offenses of which they are supposed to have been guilty. Thus, on the trial before him of Harrison, for the murder of Dr. Clench,[1] the counsel for the prosecution calling a witness to prove some felonious design of the prisoner three years before, the Judge indignantly exclaimed, "Hold, Hold! what are you doing now? Are you going to arraign his whole life? How can he defend himself from charges of which he has no notice? and how many issues are to be raised to perplex me and the jury? Away, away! that ought not to be; that is nothing to this matter."

33. Alexander Davison's Trial. (King's Bench, 1808. Howell's State Trials, XXXI, 187.) [Fraud in public accounts, by a former commissary-general.]

Lord Moira (formerly general-in-command), sworn for the defense: "I never had the remotest ground for suspicion [against the accused]. . . . Shall I state the particulars?"

L. C. J. Ellenborough: "One is very unwilling to diminish the scope of these inquiries, but the general inquiry is as to the general character."

John Martin Leake sworn; examined by Mr. Holroyd: "I believe you are one of the comptrollers of the army accounts?" "I am."

"In that character have you at any time had Mr. Davison's accounts before you?" "Yes;"

"Have those been examined by you?"

L. C. J. Ellenborough: "I really must interfere. It would be dangerous as a precedent to permit particular instances to be given in evidence where there can have been no notice. General evidence of general character is admissible; but this is certainly contrary to all rule."

Mr. Holroyd: "I ask this question to show Mr. Leake's means of knowledge."

L. C. J. Ellenborough: "You ask as to his knowledge of the examination of public accounts. Now would it be proper to try a collateral issue for which the other side cannot be prepared? It is as clear a rule of evidence as can be that you must not examine to particular facts." . . .

Mr. Holroyd: "I ask this only as introductory of general character."

L. C. J. Ellenborough: "If you mean only to ask whether the witness has had such means of knowing him as to form the judgment he is about to give, I have no objection to that."

Mr. Holroyd: "Had you opportunities, from examining Mr. Davison's accounts, of knowing his general character?" "I have seen many of his accounts, and many of them were extremely regular; in the years 1794, 1795, and 1796, they were before the comptrollers."

L. C. J. Ellenborough: "I cannot admit this; you must go into general character."

34. PEOPLE v. WHITE

14 Wend. 111

The prisoner was tried at the Washington Oyer and Terminer in 1834, before the Hon. Esek Cowen, one of the circuit judges, on an indictment for having in his possession counterfeit bank bills with the intent to pass the same.

M. Strong, a witness for the prosecution, testified to a conversation between him and the prisoner, in which he inquired of the prisoner about some money which had been stolen from the Rutland Bank, and the prisoner declared his innocence of any participation in the robbery. The witness was proceeding to detail the further conversation of the prisoner at the same time, when the prisoner's counsel objected to his proceeding in the same, unless the district attorney would state his precise object in calling for the confessions of the prisoner. The district attorney stated that a part of the prisoner's conversation was already out, and that he claimed the whole, without apprising the prisoner's counsel of the use he intended to make of it. The judge decided that the witness might state all the conversation of the prisoner at the time alluded to by the witness. To which decision the prisoner's counsel excepted. The witness then stated that the prisoner said he should never have been suspected of robbing the Rutland Bank, if it had not been his misfortune to have once been in the State prison in Massachusetts. Previous and also subsequent to the testimony of Strong, proof was exhibited in support of the prosecution which it is not necessary to detail. When the proofs were closed, the jury were charged, and the judge who delivered the charge commented upon the evidence, and among other things observed that the jury had a right to notice that the prisoner had not given any proof of good character; that he probably could not produce such proof, judging from the circumstances of his former conviction; at any rate, he had not done so. The prisoner's counsel excepted to the charge, and the jury pronounced a verdict of guilty. The indictment and bill of exceptions signed in this case were brought up by certiorari.

D. Russell & S. Stevens, for the prisoner. Green C. Bronson (Attorney general), for the People.

By the Court, SUTHERLAND, J.—The material question presented by this bill of exceptions is, whether the testimony of Moses Strong, to the prisoner's confession that he had been in the State prison in Massachusetts, ought to have been received. . . . The declarations or confessions of the prisoner are competent evidence to establish any fact which could be legally proved in any other manner.

The question then arises, whether the public prosecutor could have proved by the record of conviction, or by the testimony of witnesses, that the prisoner had been in the State prison in Massachusetts. He was on trial upon an indictment for having counterfeit money in his possession, knowing it to be counterfeit, with intent to pass it. The fact of his having been in the State prison in Massachusetts had certainly no direct bearing upon the issue joined in the case; and the general rule is, that the evidence is to be confined to the point in issue; and this rule is applied more rigidly, if possible, in criminal than in civil cases. 1 Phil. Ev. 442.

The only point of view in which it can be contended that it would have been competent for the public prosecutor to prove this fact is, that it went to show the bad character of the prisoner. But the general rule in criminal as in civil cases is, that the prosecutor cannot enter into the defendant's character, unless the defendant enable him to do so, by calling witnesses in support of it; but even then the prosecutor cannot examine to particular facts, the general character of the defendant not being put in issue, but coming in collaterally. . . . Here the prisoner had called no witnesses to support his character, nor was it put in issue by the prosecution. The prosecutor therefore had no right even to impeach his general character, much less to prove specific facts against him.

The evidence seems to have been admitted by the judge, on the ground that the witness had stated a part of the conversation or confession of the prisoner before any objection was made. . . . The district attorney contended, that as part of the conversation had been given in evidence without objection, he had a right to give the whole, and of course that the whole conversation was proper evidence in the case. And so the Court, I think, must have intended to decide. If not, they would have told the jury that the fact that the prisoner had confessed that he had been in the State prison in Massachusetts, ought to be excluded from their consideration in making up their verdict. . . .

I think it highly probable that the prisoner's confession turned the scale against him. The evidence was entirely circumstantial, sufficient perhaps to raise a strong probability of the prisoner's guilt of the crime for which he was indicted; but certainly leaving the fact involved in so much doubt, that the jury might well have come to a different conclusion. It is precisely one of those cases in which the fact that the prisoner had already been convicted of an infamous crime, and been sent to the State prison, would be likely to operate with decisive effect against him. I think the evidence was improperly admitted, and that a new trial should be granted. . . . New trial granted.

35. PEOPLE v. STOUT. (1858. New York. 4 Park. Cr. C. 97). Mr. John Norton Pomeroy [arguing for the defendant]: In its administration of criminal jurisprudence, the Civil [Continental] law allows and requires such evidence. It investigates the antecedent character, disposition, habits, associates, business, — in short, the entire history of an accused person, to discover whether it is probable that he would commit the alleged crime. English and American criminal law, in its practical administration, confines itself to the investigation of the very crime charged, and restricts judicial evidence to circumstances directly connected with and necessary to elucidate the issue to be tried. These two systems are diametrically opposed to each other, and whatever may be said of their comparative merits, the rule of the common law is so firmly established that it lies at the very foundation of criminal procedure, as an inseparable element of trial by jury. Trained judicial minds may be able to eliminate from a mass of irrelevant and general criminative facts those which directly bear upon the crime charged against the prisoner; but the very character of juries, and the theory of trial by jury, require that all prejudicial evidence tending to raise in their minds an antipathy to the prisoner, and which does not directly tend to prove the simple issue, should be carefully excluded from them.

36. STATE v. LAPAGE. (1876. New Hampshire. 57 N. H. 275, 299). [On a charge of murder committed in an attempt to rape, the fact of the defendant's prior rape of another person was offered.]

Mr. Norris [arguing for the defence]: "Making no point of remoteness in time or space, let us see how well this evidence will bear analyzing. Premise to be proved: he committed a rape, in no way, except in kind, connected with this crime. Inference: a general disposition to commit this kind of offence. Next premise this general disposition in him. Inference: he committed this particular offence. . . . It may be tried by the common test of the validity of arguments. Some men who commit a single crime have, or thereby acquire, a tendency to commit the same kind of crimes; if this man committed the rape, he might therefore have or thereby acquire a tendency to commit other rapes; if he had or so acquired such a tendency, and if another rape was committed within his reach, he might therefore be more likely to be guilty; if more likely to be guilty of rape, and if there was a murder committed in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate rape, he might therefore be more likely to be guilty of this rape, and hence of this murder; a sort of an ex-parte conviction of a single rape, from which the jury are to find a general disposition to that kind of crimes in order to help them out in presuming the commission of another rape as a motive or occasion of the murder. We can find nothing like it in the book.

Ladd, J.: It is argued on behalf of the State (if I have not wholly misapprehended the drift of the argument) that the evidence was admitted because, as matter of fact, its natural tendency was to produce conviction in the mind that the prisoner committed rape upon his victim at the time he took her life. . . . I shall not undertake to deny this. If I know a man has broken into my house and stolen my goods, I am for that reason more ready to believe him guilty of breaking into my neighbor's house and committing the same crime there. We do not trust our property with a notorious thief. We cannot help suspecting a man of evil life and infamous character sooner than one who is known to be free from every taint of dishonesty or crime. We naturally recoil with fear and loathing from a known murderer, and watch his conduct as we would the motions of a beast of prey. When the community is startled by the commission of some great crime, our first search for the perpetrator is naturally directed, not among those who have hitherto lived blameless lives, but among those whose conduct has been such as to create the belief that they have the depravity of heart to do the deed. This is human nature — the teaching of human experience. If it were the law, that everything which has a natural tendency to lead the mind towards a conclusion that a person charged with crime is guilty must be admitted in evidence against him on the trial of that charge, the argument for the State would doubtless be hard to answer. If I know a man has once been false, I cannot after that believe in his truth as I did before. If I know he has committed the crime of perjury once, I more readily believe he will commit the same awful crime again, and I cannot accord the same trust and confidence to his statements under oath that I otherwise should. . . . Suppose the general character of one charged with crime is infamous and degraded to the last degree; that his life has been nothing but a succession of crimes of the most atrocious and revolting sort: does not the knowledge of all this inevitably carry the mind in the direction of a conclusion that he has added the particular crime for which he is being tried to the list of those that have gone before? Why, then, should not the prosecutor be permitted to show facts which tend so naturally to produce a conviction of his guilt?

The answer to all these questions is plain and decisive: The law is otherwise.

37. People v. Shay. (1895. New York. 147 N. Y. 78, 41 N. E. 508). Peckham, J.: Two antagonistic methods for the judicial investigation of crime and the conduct of criminal trials have existed for many years. One of these methods favors this kind of evidence in order that the tribunal which is engaged in the trial of the accused may have the benefit of the light to be derived from a record of the whole past life of the accused, his tendencies, his nature, his associates, his practices, and, in fine, all the facts which go to make up the life of a human being. This is the method which is pursued in France, and it is claimed that entire justice is more apt to be done where such course is pursued than where it is omitted. The common law of England, however, has adopted another, and, so far as the party accused is concerned, a much more merciful doctrine. . . . In order to prove his guilt, it is not permitted to show his former character, or to prove his guilt of other crimes, merely for the purpose of raising a presumption that he who would commit them would be more apt to commit the crime in question.

38. William Trickett. Character-Evidence in Criminal Cases. (1904. The Forum, Dickinson College of Law, vol. VIII, p. 127.) How Character is to be Proven. The mental drifts of a human being are revealed to himself only by the thoughts, feelings and volitions which they cast into his consciousness. No other human being can know them, except from his observation of their effects in words and acts. That A is kind can be known to B only by B's having watched him in a variety of circumstances, and seen how he has acted towards other sentient beings within his reach; or by his having learned from one who has thus observed. The tendencies which are secluded in a piece of iron are detected by observation of its behavior in a variety of conditions. No other method discovers the properties of a man. If, then, the question is, is A a chaste man, how is it to be answered but by learning what his words and acts are? If the question is, is he honest, the answer must come from observing how he acts respecting the property of others, his contracts with them, etc. If he is always careful to pay what he owes, if he never seeks to deceive or defraud, if he never appropriates that which is another's, he will be inferred to be honest. . . .

A conceivable way, therefore, of establishing a defendant's character would be the testimony of persons who knew him, to his specific acts, or to so many of them as might be deemed decisive of tendency. The objection to this mode of proof is similar to that which is suggested by Mitchell, J., then in the Common Pleas of Philadelphia, to the proof of the character of the deceased in a murder case: "Evidence of a specific act is not admissible. It would lead to a collateral inquiry, into which we could not enter, to-wit: the circumstances of that case. Nothing could be more unfair than to give in evidence a single act as proof of a brutal and dangerous disposition, without inquiring into all the circumstances of that act. . . . This would be impossible, and without it, the evidence of a specific act would be worse than useless; it would be dangerous." (Commonwealth v. Richmond, 6 W. N. C. 431.) This, the most scientific method, is for the Courts impracticable.

39. French Trials. (1) Trial for the Murder of the Baroness de Valley. (1896. Paris. Albert Bataille. "Causes Criminelles et Mondaines." 1896, p. 249). [On June 16, 1896, Baroness de Valley was found strangled in her apartment in Paris. She was rich, and made a business of lending her money at usurious rates. Robbery was the object of her murderers. A party of several young fellows, Kiesgen, Ferrand, Lagueny and Truel, were charged with the murder. One of them, Kiesgen, son of a merchant, appeared well dressed and well brought up; he had no occupation and his father furnished him with pocket-money. The others were of not so respectable surroundings. Presiding Judge POUPARDIN thus conducted the opening examination at the trial, on November 24.]

JUDGE. — None of you have a criminal record; but that is far from saying that you have a good record.

You, Kiesgen, seem to have a mode of life not at all creditable. You frequent the low saloons of the Latin Quarter. You were an habitué of the Harcourt Café. You have been getting all the money you could from women. Your mistress, Jeanne Prevost, alias Margot, gave you 15 francs a day from her earning as a prostitute. You are a panderer of the worst sort. In your cell at Mazas Prison, you kept writing to Margot, asking her to send you cash. Unfortunately for you, she was at that time herself in St. Lazare Prison. (Laughter in the audience).

As for you, Truel, alias Julien, alias Curlyhead, you are the son of a mechanical draftsman at Charenton. After having a job as apprentice-draftsman in a factory, you were discharged for a brutal assault. After that you lived off your mother, who . . .

Then you became an habitué, like Kiesgen, of the saloons and women of the Latin Quarter. You seem to have been one of a gang of bicycle thieves. In short, after starting as an honest workingman, you gave up that pursuit, and became an agent for houses of ill-fame. You see what you have been brought to by bad company.

You, Lagueny, like your fellow-defendants, are scarcely twenty years old. You are the natural son of an unfortunate woman who died insane, two years ago, at the St. Anne Asylum. During all your boyhood you were left by her to loaf on the streets. You picked up a living by hawking things now and then; selling newspapers, sometimes dogs, sometimes peddling olives at restaurant-doors; sleeping in the public refuges. At twelve years of age, a charitable society had you baptized in the Sacred Heart Church at Montmartre, and next day you partook of your first communion. Your mother seems to have done some questionable errands for Baroness Valley, and told you that the Baroness was your godmother. You, ever since you became a young man, have been an agent for the assignations of girls in the Latin Quarter. That was where you made the acquaintance of Kiesgen and of Julien the Curlyhead. To them you made the proposal to go and rob the Baroness. She had always showed a kind interest in you; she used to give you odd change.

Lagueny. — Gave me money? Well, I guess not! The old skinflint! She would even pick up old crusts of bread in the street.

JUDGE. — Well, at any rate, your mother used to be her housekeeper, and the Baroness sometimes gave you a lunch.

[Then the evidence directly to the crime was put in.]

Nov. 25. The jury found three of the defendants guilty. But in view of the youth and lack of a criminal record for Kiesgen and Truel (the two who did the actual killing), they recommended those two for lenieney. Both were sentenced to hard labor for life. . . .

Lagueny, who had proposed the robbery, was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, Ferrand to five years, and Durlin was acquitted.

40. French Trials. (2) Trial for Blackmailing Max Lebaudy. (1896. Paris. Albert Bataille. "Causes Criminelles et Mondaines," 1896, p. 95). [Max Lebaudy was a young millionaire, foolish and extravagant. About the years 1894–5, he became the prey of a number of blackmailers, some of them journalists, some ex-military men, some mere adventurers. Several different widespread intrigues against him were unearthed. He was bled for various sums,— fr. 30,000; 10,000; 40,000; etc. Various well-known personages, political, literary, and dramatic, more or less innocent, were more or less involved in the scandals.

On March 30, 1896, the trial began, under Presiding Judge Planteau.]

Examination of Viscount Ulrich de Civry.

Judge. — You took part in the war of 1870, and I am bound to say that you behaved very creditably. Leaving the army in 1873, with the rank of cavalry quartermaster, you went back to journalism, and were at last accounts chief editor of the Army Echo. You also went into politics; and were candidate for the Assembly at Yvonne in 1893.

But I am obliged to remind you that you have a record in the criminal court. In 1876, the Paris Court of Appeals sentenced you to one year's imprisonment for illegally wearing military uniform. In 1880, the same Court sentenced you to two months for unlawful eloignment of goods under attachment.

Civry. — My counsel will explain about those convictions.

Judge. — But those are not all. You were convicted by default, in 1877, at the Seine Assize Court, of robbery, and were sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment with hard labor. They had to extradite you from England, and the penalty was commuted to three years. But the judgment was set aside on technical grounds; you had a new trial at Melun, and the public prosecutor withdrew his charge, and you were of course acquitted.

To get the money for your legal expenses, you had borrowed large sums, through several notaries. One of these notaries has himself just been convicted by the Seine Assize Court. The sums you thus borrowed amounted in notes to more than fr. 1,000,000, nominally, though you yourself received only some fr. 500,000.

[The judge then entered into details of the Hennion case, reading from the records. Hennion was a young man of means from the provinces, who had become entangled in the usurers' and speculators' clutches by the medium of Viscount Civry, and the Viscount had narrowly escaped another criminal sentence.]

Judge. — The judgment of the Court there said: "Hennion's ruin was obviously due to the machinations of unscrupulous adventurers, among whom figured Ulrich de Civry. Unfortunately, the Penal Code does not reach all forms of dishonesty."

Well, in spite of these unsavory incidents in your past, you maintained something of a position in a certain section of Parisian society. When you left your regiment in 1891, you were adjutant. What is your business now?

Civry. — Horse-trading.

Judge. — That is not a business. It is reported that you do not do much of anything, and are living as a parasite off other persons. You spent two years in Normandy with an old chum from your regiment, Mr. Davout, but he finally gave you to understand, in correct but unmistakable manner, that you had reached the limits of his hospitality. You then came back to live in Paris, where you ran up debts, even with the house-porter.

Civry. — That was for my room-breakfasts. And I did not have time to pay him; they arrested me too soon. (Laughter in the audience).

JUDGE. — You are still owing two months' rent, besides fr. 170 to that house-porter for breakfasts. You have no regular occupation.

[The examination of the next accused, de Cesti, was thus conducted by the judge.]

JUDGE. — Your name is not "de Cesti," but just "Cesti." Your birth-registry has never been discovered. It is known, however, that you took employment in 1863 by the name of Lionel Werther de Cesti. You were a lieutenant, but were in 1876 placed on the retired list because of unpaid debts. Creditors sued you on all hands, and in 1877 you resigned from the service, — doubtless on request. After that, you went into politics, and were actively mixed up in the Norton scandal.

Cesti. — My only share in that was to lend my office to Mr. Millevoye to arrange a duelling affair with Mr. Clémenceau. That was all I had to do with the Norton scandal.

JUDGE. — You are next found making one of the parties who helped to ruin the unfortunate Hennion [above-mentioned]. A woman friend of his mother testified before the magistrate that you had bled that unfortunate youth unmercifully; she wanted to lay charges against both Mr. Civry and yourself.

Cesti. — Yes. That was the lady who was then going with General Boulanger. I do not know what basis she could have for such testimony.

JUDGE. — You were also mixed up in the affairs of another youth of good family, Mr. Carnegie, whom you also helped to ruin.

Advocate JULLEMIER (for the defense). But Mr. Carnegie himself repudiated that charge.

[The examination of another of the accused, Armand Rosenthal, came on March 12.]

JUDGE. — Your name is Armand Rosenthal. You were born in Paris?

Rosenthal. — Yes, in Paris, Nov. 9, 1853, and I want that fact to be publicly recorded. There has been a good deal of slander about my being born somewhere else.

JUDGE. — You have gone under the alias of Jacques Saint-Cère. You served your army-term first in the 24th Line Regiment, then in the 19th. It is said against you that as a young man you were extravagant with your money. In 1879 your family had to appoint a conservator for you. . . . About that time you left Paris and lived in Germany, where you helped edit a review.

Rosenthal. — It was a Francophile Review, — published in Germany, but aiming to spread French principles in Austrian Poland. Its columns were inspired from France. My associate, Mr. Sacher Masoch, even earned for his services the distinction of being decorated with the Legion of Honor.

JUDGE. — . . Why did you leave France? I am obliged to remind you of a serious incident of the year 1879: You were convicted, by default, of breach of trust and attempt at cheating, and were sentenced by the Seine Police Court to three months in jail. You never served that sentence?

Rosenthal. — I swear that I never even knew a thing about what had been done in that case. The first news I ever had of the astounding affair was from Magistrate Meyer, when he examined me on the present charge. If I had known about that judgment, rendered in my absence, do you suppose that I should have been bold enough to go into Parisian journalism and write such combative articles as I did? That charge in 1879 was concocted by a money-lender who took advantage of my absence from this country.

JUDGE. — But the peculiar thing is that you left France that very year and did not come back till 1884, when the five-year statute of limitations had released you.

Rosenthal. — Excuse me, I did come back to Paris in the interim, several times; and my counsel will prove it. I wish also to say that in 1886 I obtained an order releasing me from the conservatorship, and when I was in Court then, the judge who examined me never said a word about that default-sentence.

JUDGE. — Well, I have the record of that case here in front of me, and I am bound to say that some of the testimony in it has given me a strong impression about you.

[Assistant-Judge PEZOUS then proceeded to read some of the testimony from Rosenthal's above trial in 1879.

The first was that of a cabman, who testified that Mr. Rosenthal had once ridden with him for an entire afternoon in Paris in the Bois, and that Mr. Rosenthal had then gone off without paying, stating that he had lost his purse and had no money.]

Rosenthal. — But see here, Mr. Presiding Judge, how can you expect me to answer to this? You are asking me about a matter that goes back more than sixteen years. How can I remember what I said to some cabman in 1879?

[Assistant Judge PEZOUS next read the testimony in 1879 of another cabman; who testified that Mr. Rosenthal on one occasion when the cabman had taken him to a certain house and was on orders awaiting him, had gone off through the back door of the house and never returned to pay him. The cabman also alleged that Mr. Rosenthal had a habit of cheating cabmen in one way or another.

The deposition was then read of a barmaid in the Place de la Madeleine, Miss Elena, who charged that Mr. Rosenthal had once got from her a watch, to be sold for her, but had never returned either watch or proceeds.

On March 26, the verdict and judgment were rendered.

Joseph de Civry, Georges de Labruyère, Chiarosolo, Rosenthal, and Carle des Perrières were acquitted.

Ulrich de Civry and Cesti were found guilty, and sentenced to thirteen months in jail and 500 francs fine.]

41. HALL v. COMMONWEALTH

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY. 1899

106 Ky. 894; 51 S. W. 804

APPELLANT was found guilty of grand larceny, under an indictment which, in addition to the charge of grand larceny, alleged that she had been twice theretofore convicted of felonies, the punishment of which was confinement in the penitentiary, setting forth the terms and courts at which the former convictions had been had. The evidence of her guilt was circumstantial. It was shown that the prosecuting witness, having divided his money, put thirty-two dollars of it in a sock, which he concealed in a tub in the yard of the house where he was staying; that he slept in the same room with appellant, another woman, and two children; that appellant went out in the yard about four o'clock in the morning; and made purchases of furniture and other things, and paid her rent, on that day. Evidence was also introduced as to two former convictions, which were both for grand larceny. Objection was made both to the admission of this testimony, and to the unofficial character of the person by whom the records of the former conviction were produced; he being a son of the clerk of the penitentiary, and acting as clerk during the clerk's sickness. Appellant testified to the fact that she found the money, not in a sock, but lying in the path leading through the back yard; that she did not know it was the property of prosecutor, and, from his statement made the night before, thought he had no money.

The Court gave the ordinary instruction as for grand larceny; directing the jury that, if they found her guilty, they should fix her punishment at confinement in the penitentiary for not less than one nor more than five years, and gave in addition an instruction that if they found her guilty under the first instruction, and should further believe that she had been twice theretofore convicted of felony, as charged in the indictment, they should so find and state in their verdict.

DURELLE, J., for the Court (after stating the case as above). . . . It is earnestly urged that it was error to permit the introduction of evidence of former convictions at all until the jury should have first found her guilty under the charge for which she was then being tried; that it amounted to the admission of testimony to impeach her general character, which she had not put in issue, and enabled the Commonwealth to show her to the jury in the light of a common thief, and rebut the presumption of innocence which the law gives her by evidence in chief upon a trial for grand larceny.

It is painfully apparent that, with the circumstances shown as to the loss of the money, and evidence of two former convictions for grand larceny, the accused, who is an ignorant negro woman, had not the slightest chance that an average jury would entertain a reasonable doubt of her guilt; while, without the evidence of former convictions, there was a possibility that they might do so. There is considerable force, therefore, in the proposition urged, that this procedure denied the accused a fair trial of the offense whereof she was accused. But the statute as to habitual criminals (Kentucky Statutes, § 1130) seems to have created an additional and higher degree of offense, viz., the commission of a felony having been theretofore twice convicted of a felony, etc. To show the accused guilty of this degree of the offense charged, it is necessary to show the former convictions; and this, of course, is bound to prejudice the accused, — just as evidence showing malice is bound to prejudice the defendant in a murder case, — but it may be shown to make out the higher degree of the offense, which authorizes the severer punishment. The statute has been held constitutional, and it has been held essential to allege the former conviction or convictions in the indictment. Stewart v. Com., 2 Ky. Law Rep. 386; Mount v. Com., 2 Duv. 93; Taylor v. Com., 3 Ky. Law Rep. 783; Boggs v. Com., 9 Ky. L. R. 342, (5 S. W. 307).

The statute requires the jury to find the fact of the former convictions. There is no provision for a separate trial of the fact of former conviction, nor do we think the statute intended there should be one. The law seems to work a hardship, but it is a hardship the Legislature alone can remedy.

Sub-topic B. Conduct as Evidence of Accused's Intent, Knowledge, Motive[1]

42. Hathaway's Trial. (Surrey Assizes, 1702. Howell's State Trials, XIV, 639, 635, as quoted by J. G. Phillimore, "History and Principles of the Law of Evidence," 1850, p. 493.) . . . A very grotesque trial, which illustrates the gross superstition of our forefathers, took place before Lord Holt, in the year 1702. It was that of John Hathaway, for a cheat and impostor. This wretch had pretended to be bewitched, and under that pretence had committed many savage outrages on a helpless old woman, named Morduck, against whom he had done his best to inflame the populace. The imposture was detected once by the good sense of a physician. But, notwithstanding this, the people were dissatisfied, and the patrons of Hathaway, irritated by his detection, pursued the poor old woman with more malice than before; they used her so barbarously, that she was forced to leave Southwark. . . .

[On Hathaway's trial, it was alleged that] one of the impostor's tricks was fasting. To prove this, his counsel called Dr. Hamilton. . . . In order to shew the fraud, evidence was offered of Hathaway's conduct after the time mentioned in the indictment. This was objected to. Again, under the auspices of Holt, common sense obtained a victory.

Serjt. Jenner. — "My Lord, the record bears date the first day of Term: all this [proposed testimony] is since the record."

L. C. J. Holt. — "It is to prove the imposture committed before now. What Mr. Kenry says of his pretending to fast twelve weeks, though two or more be not within the time of the information, I hope they may give it as evidence subsequent to prove what was done before. . . . It is an evidence of his cheating since that time, and that out of the information; but it is evidence also to prove that his pretended fasting was a mere deceit; for he then pretended to have fasted ten weeks before he came thither, and after pretends to continue fasting in the same manner. If that be proved to be a fraud, it is strongly to be inferred that this pretended fasting before was so too."

Serjt. Jenner. — "But then they may not give evidence in matter after."

L. C. J. Holt. — "Matter afterwards, that proves a thing done before." . . .

Serjt. Jenner. — "And will that prove what was before?"

L. C. J. Holt. — "It is certainly so. The thing is, whether I can give in evidence anything after to prove what was done before? If he pretends to fast twelve weeks, ten weeks before he came there and the two weeks after, he did not fast but only pretended it. Whether what he did after, be not evidence of what he did before? Sure, it is. For he that cannot hold out fasting two weeks, but was glad to eat, though he pretend to fast, may strongly be presumed to have eaten during the ten weeks, though then he pretended to fast."

43. VAUGHAN'S TRIAL (1696. Howell's State Trials, XIII, 485, as quoted by J. G. Phillimore, "History and Principles of the Law of Evidence," 1850, p. 483). [At least one overt act was essential to a charge of treason, by the statute 7 Wm. III, c. 3 (1695), and such overt act or acts must be alleged in the indictment. The overt act charged against Vaughan, as an act of levying war, and adhering to the King's enemies, was his cruising and marauding in a ship called the Loyal Clancarty.] The counsel for the Crown offered evidence of hostile acts committed in another boat: this was objected to. . . .

L. C. J. HOLT. — "Consider: if it be not a good indictment without alleging particular acts, then it necessarily follows, that if particular acts are alleged, and you do not prove them, as is alleged, you have failed in the indictment, and so his objection will lie upon you."

The act was read.

L. C. J. HOLT. — "You may give evidence of an overt act that is not in the indictment, if it conduce to prove one that is in it. You cannot give evidence of a distinct act that has no relation to the overt act mentioned in the indictment, though it shall conduce to prove the same species of treason."

The counsel for the Crown argued, that they might give in evidence other acts in other ships.

L. C. J. HOLT. — "I cannot agree to that. . . . Because a man has a design to commit a depredation on the King's subjects in one ship, does that prove he meant to do it in another? Go on, and shew what he did in the Clancarty."

The evidence that the prisoner had gone cruising in the Custom House barge was then rejected. I quote the commentary of the wise, learned, and humane Foster, on this decision: "The rule of rejecting all manner of evidence in criminal prosecutions that is foreign to the point in issue, is founded on sound sense and common justice. For no man is bound, at the peril of life or liberty, fortune or reputation, to answer at once and unprepared for every action of his life. Few, even of the best of men, would choose to be put to it. And had not those concerned in state prosecutions, out of their zeal for the public service, sometimes stepped over this rule in the case of treasons, it would, perhaps, have been needless to have made an express provision against it in that case."

44. REGINA v. DOSSETT

NISI PRIUS. 1846

2 C. & K. 306

ARSON. — The prisoner was indicted for having, on the 29th of March, 1846, feloniously set fire to a rick of wheat-straw, the property of William Cox.

It appeared that the rick was set on fire by the prisoner's having fired a gun very near it; and it was proposed on the part of the prosecution to go into evidence to show that the rick had been on fire on the 28th of March, and that the prisoner was then close to it with a gun in his hand.

J. Jefferys Williams, for the prisoner. — I submit that this evidence is not admissible. It is seeking to prove one felony by another; and it is in effect asking the jury to infer that the prisoner set fire to the rick on the 29th, because he did so on the 28th. The firing of the rick on the 28th, if wilfully done, was a distinct felony.

Maule, J. — Although the evidence offered may be proof of another felony, that circumstance does not render it inadmissible, if the evidence be otherwise receivable. In many cases it is an important question whether a thing was done accidentally or wilfully. If a person were charged with having wilfully poisoned another, and it were a question whether he knew a certain white powder to be poison, evidence would be admissible to show that he knew what the powder was because he had administered it to another person, who had died, although that might be proof of a distinct felony. In the cases of uttering forged bank notes of knowing them to be forged, the proofs of other utterings are all proofs of distinct felonies. I shall receive the evidence.

The evidence was given.

45. BOTTOMLEY v. UNITED STATES

United States Circuit Court. 1840

1 Story 135; 3 Fed. Cas. 971

This is a writ of error to a judgment of condemnation in rem by the District Court upon an information of seizure of two cases and one hundred and fourteen pieces of broadcloth seized on land at Boston, forfeited to the United States, and claimed by James Bottomley, Jr., as owner. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict found for the United States, upon the issue on the first count in the information, and upon this verdict the judgment of forfeiture was pronounced by the District Judge. A bill of exceptions was filed at the trial, and upon that bill of exceptions the present writ of error was brought by the claimant to reverse the judgment. . . .

Upon the first count the claimant filed a plea, alleging that the goods were not unladen or delivered from any ship or vessel within the United States, without a permit or special license for such unlading and delivering, in manner and form, as in the first count was alleged. . . . In point of fact, the goods in the present case were unladen and delivered at the port of New York, upon a permit, regular in form, granted by the deputy collector, to the claimant. But the United States contended, and offered proof, that the permit was obtained by the claimant by a fraudulent conspiracy with the bribery of the deputy collector of the port of New York, and by false and fraudulent invoices produced by the claimant; and the United States contended, that if this state of facts was established in evidence, then the permit was a mere nullity. . . . And for the purpose of explaining and showing the said system of fraudulent collusion and bribery, . . . the counsel for the government further proposed to show, that certain broadcloths of the same character, cost, and value as those imported by claimant in the Roscoe, were shipped in England at or about the time when said claimant's goods by the Roscoe were shipped; that said goods were shipped by the same persons in Liverpool as had shipped the claimant's goods by the Roscoe, and all the other goods of claimant contained in said twenty-three entries before described; that the marks on the cases containing said goods were identical with the marks on the cases of claimant's goods by the Roscoe; that the numbering on said cases was an exact and progressive continuation of the numbering on the cases containing claimant's said goods by the Roscoe; that said goods arrived by four distinct importations at New York, soon after the seizure of the claimant's goods per Roscoe, and before notice of said seizure could possibly have reached England; that said goods, on their arrival, were not entered, but sent to the custom-house stores, where they lay several months; but they were eventually entered by one William Bottomley, as being the property of James Bottomley, Sr., that the invoices had no exporter's oath at the time of shipment, as is usual, but the same was taken in England several months afterwards, and after a lapse of time fully sufficient for the transmission of intelligence to England of said seizure of claimant's goods by the Roscoe; that the said invoices and oaths (when thus after the said lapse of time produced) set forth the cost of said goods at a greatly higher rate and sum than said goods so imported by claimants in the Roscoe, and proposed to submit this evidence to the jury, as tending to show that the said goods in fact belonged to the claimant, and that the cost of said goods, as set forth in the invoices and entries thereof, thus eventually made, show that the cost of the goods by the Roscoe, as entered by the claimant, was knowingly and fraudulently set forth in the entry thereof. . . .

The cause was argued by Mills, District Attorney, and Fletcher and Bartlett, for the United States, and by Sprague and Gray, (with whom was Miller, of New York). . . .

STORY, J.: . . . In respect to the evidence admitted at the trial, I am clearly of opinion that the whole of it was admissible to substantiate the fraud. It divides itself into four heads: . . .

(4) The evidence of the importation of other goods of the same character, cost, and value, as those imported by the claimant in the Roscoe, shipped about the same time with those in the Roscoe, marked with the same marks, and numbered in an exact and progressive continuation of the cases of the goods of the claimant in the Roscoe; and, also, evidence, that the same goods arrived in four different shipments soon after the seizure of the claimant's goods in the Roscoe, and before the news of the seizure could have reached England; that the same goods were not then entered at the custom house, but were entered by one William Bottomley, as being the property of James Bottomley, Sr., after full knowledge of the seizure must have been known in England; and that they were then entered at a greatly enhanced price and rate beyond those imported in the Roscoe. This last evidence was avowedly offered as tending to establish two important facts: 1, That the claimant was the real owner of these shipments; 2, that the cost of the goods by the Roscoe, as entered by the claimant, was knowingly and fraudulently set forth in the entry.

The objection taken to all these three last portions of the evidence excepted to, is, that it is "res inter alios acta," and upon other occasions; and therefore, not properly admissible to establish a fraud in the case of the importation of the goods now before the Court. But it appears to me clearly admissible upon the general doctrine of evidence in cases of conspiracy and fraud, where other acts in furtherance of the same general fraudulent design are admissible, first, to establish the fact that there is such a conspiracy and fraud; and, secondly, to repel the suggestion that the acts might be fairly attributed to accident, mistake, or innocent rashness or negligence. In most cases of conspiracy and fraud, the question of intent or purpose or design in the act done whether innocent or illegal, whether honest or fraudulent, rarely admits of direct and positive proof; but it is to be deduced from various circumstances of more or less stringency and often occurring, not merely between the same parties, but between the party charged with the conspiracy or fraud and third persons. And in all cases where the guilt of the party depends upon the intent, purpose, or design with which the act was done, or upon his guilty knowledge thereof, I understand it to be a general rule that collateral facts may be examined into, in which he bore a part, for the purpose of establishing such guilty intent, design, purpose, or knowledge. Thus, in a prosecution for uttering a bank note, or bill of exchange, or promissory note, with knowledge of its being forged, proof, that the prisoner had uttered other forged notes or bills, whether of the same or of a different kind, or that he had other forged notes or bills in his possession, is clearly admissible as showing, that he knew the note or bill in question to be forged. The same doctrine is applied to a prosecution for uttering counterfeit money, where the fact of having in his possession other counterfeit money, or having uttered other counterfeit money, is proper proof against the prisoner to show his guilty knowledge.

Many other cases may be easily put, involving the same considerations. Thus, upon indictment for receiving stolen goods, evidence is admissible that the prisoner had received, at various other times, different parcels of goods, which had been stolen from the same persons, in proof of the guilty knowledge of the prisoner. In short, wherever the intent or guilty knowledge of a party is a material ingredient in the issue of a case, these collateral facts, tending to establish such intent or knowledge, are proper evidence. Exceptions overruled.

46. STATE v. LAPAGE

SUPREME COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1876

57 N. H. 245

INDICTMENT, charging respondent with the murder of Josie A. Langmaid, who was killed October 4, 1875, about nine o'clock in the morning, while passing over the Academy road, in Pembroke, on her way to school. . . .

The government claimed that the murder was committed in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate rape. As tending to show that the prisoner had an intent to commit such a crime, . . . Julienne Rousse testified that she resided in Joliet, Canada, and was a sister of Joseph Lapage's wife, and knew him; . . . went to a pasture to milk cows while living at St. Beatrice, Canada, and met Lapage there; when she arrived at the pasture the cows were not there; . . . it was seven o'clock in the morning, June, 1871; he tried to catch her; she shouted and tried to run away; after she had gone four or five rails he overtook her, caught hold of her, . . . after she was choked and lost her strength he outraged her; . . . he did not strike her with the stick, but committed rape upon her. . . . To the admission of all the foregoing testimony the respondent excepted. . . .

"You have heard the testimony of Julienne Rousse to the effect that in June, 1871, this prisoner committed a rape upon her. In considering this evidence (if you believe the witness), you will be required to use careful discrimination of the way and manner in which it is to be applied to this case, if it is to be applied at all. We have admitted the evidence, not because it is necessarily connected with the issue which you are to try, — which is, the guilt or the innocence of the prisoner of the offence with which he is here and now charged, — but because it may have a legal bearing upon that issue. . . . It is a fundamental principle of law, that evidence that a defendant committed one offence cannot be received to prove that he committed another and distinct offence. This principle we must take care not to violate. And, therefore, you are not to regard the evidence of Julienne Rousse as any proof or evidence that the prisoner killed Josie Langmaid. Therefore, unless you find from other evidence, entirely independent of that of Julienne Rousse, that the prisoner killed and murdered Josie Langmaid, you must reject her evidence altogether. . . . If you find, from other evidence in the case than that of Julienne Rousse, that the defendant killed Josie Langmaid deliberately and premeditatedly, or in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate rape, you may and your duty is to reject her testimony altogether. But if you are not so satisfied by all the other evidence and circumstances of the case, you may consider her evidence. . . . The evidence you see, therefore, bears only upon the question of the intention of the prisoner in killing Josie Langmaid, and thus upon the degree of guilt, i.e., whether the offence is murder of the first or second degree. . . . The principle upon which such evidence is admitted is, that, 'though the prisoner is not to be prejudiced in the eyes of the jury by the needless admission of testimony tending to prove another crime, yet, whenever the evidence which tends to prove the other crime tends also to prove this one, not merely by showing the prisoner to be a bad man, but by showing the particular bad intent to have existed in his mind at the time when he did the act complained of, it is admissible. . . . Does the testimony of Julienne Rousse, or any other evidence in the case, tend to show the existence in the mind of the prisoner of a motive or passion which would render the commission of, or an attempt to commit, a rape upon Josie Langmaid more probable than it would otherwise seem to you? Does it or not tend to show that such a lustful intent existed in the heart of the prisoner at the time as would render the commission of a rape more probable? Does this evidence supply a motive for the commission of the offence? The crime committed upon Julienne Rousse was four years and more antecedent to the offence under consideration. Since that time a change may have taken place in his mind. There has been time for repentance; and the lustful disposition he bore then may have been eradicated. The more remote the evidence of this mental condition, the less force and weight belong to it. . . ."

The respondent was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be hanged.

Lewis W. Clark, Attorney General (with whom were W. W. Flanders, solicitor, and C. P. Sanborn), for the State. . . . The only question of law raised by the bill of exceptions is, whether the evidence objected to is admissible for any purpose. Does this evidence have a legal tendency to show that the defendant killed the deceased, or that he intended to commit a rape upon her? . . . Although evidence offered in support of an indictment for felony be proof of another felony, that circumstance does not render it inadmissible. If the evidence offered tends to prove a material fact, it is admissible, although it may also tend to prove the commission of another distinct and separate offense.

Suppose the defendant were tried for breaking and entering the store at the north end of Elm street in Manchester — the most northern of all the stores on that street — with intent to steal; suppose it were proved that he broke and entered that store; that he was arrested as soon as he entered it, and the only question was whether he intended to steal; suppose there were one hundred other stores on that street, and he had broken and entered every one of them, and stolen something in every one of them, beginning at the south end of the street and taking the stores in succession, on his burglarious march from one end of the street to the other; suppose he did all this in one night, and was completing his night's work when arrested; on the question of his intent in entering the one hundred and first store, would any one think of objecting to evidence of his one hundred larcenies in the other one hundred stores? His robbing one hundred stores would tend to show that he intended to rob the one hundred and first, just as his passing counterfeit money in the one hundred would tend to show that he intended to pass counterfeit money found in his possession in the one hundred and first. There would be no difference between his presence in the one hundred and first store, and his having counterfeit money in his pocket in that store, that would, on the question of intent, affect the admissibility of the evidence of what he had done in the other hundred stores.

Suppose, instead of robbing stores, he had robbed persons, going from one end of the street to the other, and knocking down and robbing one hundred men, one after the other, and not touching a single woman; suppose when he had knocked down the one hundred and first man, and before he had had time to rob him, he had been arrested, and the question were whether he intended to rob him, — whether his last offense were an attempt to rob, or a mere assault, or an assault with intent to kill; would anybody suppose his robbing the other hundred men, after he knocked them down, was no evidence of the intent with which he knocked down number one hundred and one? Suppose the one hundred and one persons whom he assaulted were women; suppose he touched no man; suppose he had unsuccessfully attempted to ravish one hundred of them, and were arrested at the instant of his knocking down the one hundred and first, and the question were whether his last assault were a mere assault, or an assault with intent to commit a robbery, or an assault with intent to commit a rape; suppose the last woman assaulted should die of her injuries, and the defendant were indicted for her murder; . . . how would you expect, if you were the prosecuting officers, to find any better evidence of the defendant's intent than his attempts upon the other one hundred women? . . .

If a ship-master lands in Congo, obtains a cargo of blacks, and carries them to Cuba, and four years and four months afterwards he is found at another place on the African coast, as far from Congo as Pembroke Academy is from St. Beatrice, with a hundred blacks in his possession, — would anybody think that his proved intent on the former occasion had, as a matter of fact, no tendency to show what he intended to do on the latter occasion? . . . No man on earth would refuse to hear it, or to consider it, unless he were bound by some arbitrary and irrational rule overriding his understanding, and dictating a course at war with his common sense. . . .

The jury having found, on other evidence than that of Julienne Rousse, that the defendant committed the homicide, her testimony was competent to show the intent with which he committed it. . . . If a man's intent to pass counterfeit money at one time is evidence of his intent to pass other counterfeit money found in his possession at another time; if his intent to sell liquor at one time is evidence of his intent to sell other liquor at another time; if his intent to send one negro boy into slavery is evidence of his intent to make the same disposition of another found in his possession, — why is not his intent to commit a rape upon Julienne Rousse, when he took possession of her, evidence of his intent to make the same disposition of Josie Langmaid, when he took possession of her? Manifestly the only objection to this evidence is the remoteness of the rape in point of time and place. . . .

W. T. Norris (with whom were S. B. Page and H. W. Greene), for the respondent, . . . [argued as quoted in part ante, No. 36.]

Cushing, C. J. . . . The admission of the testimony of Julienne Rousse gives rise to by far the most important question in the case. The testimony tended to prove that the prisoner, about four years and a half before the trial, at a place beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, committed the crime of rape upon a person other than the deceased; and the question is, whether that bald, naked fact, being put in evidence, had any tendency to prove any matter in issue between the State and the defendant.

. . . I think we may assume, in the outset, that it is not the quality of an action, as good or bad, as unlawful or lawful, as criminal or otherwise, which is to determine its relevancy. I take it to be generally true, that any act of the prisoner may be put in evidence against him, provided it has any logical and legal tendency to prove any matter which is in issue between him and the State, notwithstanding it might have an indirect bearing, which in strictness it ought not to have, upon some other matter in issue. . . .

I think we may state the law in the following propositions:

(1) It is not permitted to the prosecution to attack the character of the prisoner, unless he first puts that in issue by offering evidence of his good character.

(2) It is not permitted to show the defendant's bad character by showing particular acts.

(3) It is not permitted to show in the prisoner a tendency or disposition to commit the crime with which he is charged.

(4) It is not permitted to give in evidence other crimes of the prisoner, unless they are so connected by circumstances with the particular crime in issue as that the proof of one fact with its circumstances has some bearing upon the issue on trial other than such as is expressed in the foregoing three propositions. . . . The cases of this sort cited by counsel for the government admit of being classified into several distinct groups.

In the first place is the class of cases in which other offenses are shown for the purpose of proving guilty knowledge. To this class belong those cases in which, in the trial of indictments for uttering forged bank notes, or counterfeit coin, the proof of other offenses of the same kind is admitted. It might well happen that a person might have in his possession a single counterfeit bill or coin without knowing it to be such; but he would be much less likely to do so twice, and every repetition of such an act would increase the probability that he knew that the bills or coins were counterfeit. . . .

Another class of cases consists of those in which it becomes necessary to show that the act for which the prisoner was indicted was not accidental, — e.g. where the prisoner had shot the same person twice within a short time, or where the same person had fired a rick of grain twice or where several deaths by poison had taken place in the same family, or where children of the same mother had mysteriously died. In such cases it might well happen that a man should shoot another accidentally, but that he should do it twice within a short time would be very unlikely. So, it might easily happen that a man using a gun might fire a rick of barley once by accident, but that he should do it several times in succession would be very improbable. So, a person might die of accidental poisoning, but that several persons should so die in the same family at different times would be very unlikely. So, that a child should be suffocated in bed by its mother might happen once, but several similar deaths in the same family could not reasonably be accounted for as accidents. So, in the case of embezzlement effected by means of false entries, a single false entry might be accidentally made; but the probability of accident would diminish at least as fast as the instances increased. . . .

There is another class of cases in which proof of the commission of one crime tends to show a motive for the commission of the crime with which the prisoner is charged. . . . So, in Com. v. Ferrigan, the adulterous intercourse of the defendant with the wife of the deceased tends to show a motive for the murder. . . .

Another class of cases consists of those in which the evidence tends to show a general plan or conspiracy, one act of which was that which is in issue. . . . If the indictment were for being a common seller of spirituous liquor, the charge could be proved in hardly any other way than by showing many specific acts; and conversely, if a man were proved to be a professional counterfeiter, that would be evidence tending to show his guilty intent. . . .

It should also be remarked that this being a matter of judgment, it is quite likely that Courts would not always agree, and that some Courts might see a logical connection where others could not. But, however extreme the case may be, I think it will be found that the Courts have always professed to put the admission of the testimony on the ground that there was some logical connection between the crime proposed to be proved other than the tendency to commit one crime as manifested by the tendency to commit the other. In the case under consideration, I cannot see any such logical connection, between the commission of the rape upon Julienne Rousse and the murder of Josephine Langmaid, as the law requires. I am unable to see any connection by which from the first crime can be inferred that the respondent was attempting the commission of a rape when he committed the murder, if he did it, other than such inference as I understand the law expressly to exclude. . . . I think a careful examination of that part of the charge which relates to this evidence will show that it really, in substance, amounted to instructing the jury that they were to find the character of the prisoner from the fact proved by Rousse, and infer from such character that he would be likely to be actuated by passion and lust. It was really instructing the jury that they might find, from a particular act proved, the prisoner's character as a man possessed by unlawful and lustful passion, and infer from that that he was actuated by such passion in his conduct to the deceased. The matter really reduces itself to attacking the prisoner's character by the proof of particular acts, which the authorities clearly show to be inadmissible. . . .

LADD, J. . . . I think the admission of the testimony of Julienne Rousse was error, because it violated the fundamental principle of law, that evidence that a defendant committed one offense cannot be received to prove that he committed another and distinct offense. The other exceptions, I think, should be overruled, for the reasons given by the attorney general in his brief.

SMITH, J. . . . The whole answer to the position, that the evidence of Julienne Rousse was relevant to the issue tried, is, that it does not show or tend to show that the prisoner perpetrated or attempted to perpetrate a rape upon Josie Langmaid. . . . No one will pretend that evidence that the prisoner had committed another murder, in Canada, or Texas, or Europe, could be shown on this trial. One cannot be convicted of murder, by showing that he has at some time and somewhere else committed another murder; or of larceny, by showing that he has committed the crime before, and therefore has an evil disposition inclining him towards that particular crime. The trouble with the position of the State is, that it is not here a question of motive or intent. Certainly, committing a rape in Canada in 1871, would not show any motive for committing a rape in New Hampshire in 1875; nor does it disclose any intent so to do. . . .

Because of the admission of the testimony of Julienne Rousse, there must be a new trial granted.

47. COMMONWEALTH v. ROBINSON

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1888

146 Mass. 571; 16 N. E. 452; and Official Report of Trial, passim

INDICTMENT for the murder of Prince Arthur Freeman by poisoning. At the trial, before FIELD and KNOWLTON, JJ., there was evidence tending to prove the following facts:

In February, 1885, Freeman occupied a tenement in South Boston with his wife, Annie Freeman, who was a sister of the defendant, and their two children. On February 20, 1885, the defendant called upon her sister, staying but a short time, and on February 23, 1885, again went to her sister's house to take care of her, and there stayed until Mrs. Freeman died on February 26, 1885, after an illness of about three weeks. The children had been taken to the defendant's house in Cambridge on February 22, and, immediately after the death of his wife, Freeman went to live with the defendant, and there remained, with his children. The baby died in April, 1885. In 1882 Freeman had taken out a certificate of insurance for $2,000 in the United Order of Pilgrim Fathers, his wife being the beneficiary named in the certificate, and after her death, on or about May 13, 1885, appointed the defendant his beneficiary under the certificate, as authorized by the by-laws of the order. Freeman, while still an inmate of the defendant's family, died, on June 27, 1885, after an illness of about six days, from the effects of arsenic administered to him by the defendant. On July 23, 1886, the boy, Thomas Arthur, died. From a period prior to 1885, the defendant had been indebted to different persons to the amount of six or seven hundred dollars, which she was unable to pay, and for which she had been hard pressed by her creditors, and this indebtedness she paid off out of Freeman's insurance, which she duly received from the order on September 23, 1885.

(1) The prosecution offered, for the sole purpose of establishing the defendant's motive in killing her brother-in-law, to prove that prior to the death of Annie Freeman the defendant had formed the plan and intention of securing to her own use the $2,000 of insurance, and as a means of accomplishing this result, and as a part of the scheme, determined first to kill her, then to induce Freeman to make her the beneficiary under the certificate, and then to kill him. Mr. Stevens, District Attorney, stated the object of the offer. . . .

FIELD, J.: Do you offer it for the purpose of rendering it more probable that she committed the murder charged, or for the purpose of showing the intent of the murder with which she is charged, six months before committing; for the purpose of showing the same motive operating?

Mr. Stevens: I put it as the strongest piece of evidence which has a tendency in this case in showing what was the motive. . . .

FIELD, J.: Does the force of the evidence stop with proving that she formed the intent of killing her brother-in-law before her sister died?

Mr. Stevens: Certainly. . . .

FIELD, J.: But the fact that she killed her sister, is that offered for any purpose except to show that she had the intent of killing her brother-in-law at that time? Is it offered to show if she killed her sister, she killed her brother-in-law?

Mr. Stevens: Not in the slightest degree. . . .

The Court, by FIELD, J., admitted this evidence, in the following terms: . . . If evidence, direct or circumstantial, is offered and admitted tending to show that this defendant knew before her sister's death of the existence of the insurance, and that it could be transferred on the death of her sister to herself and made payable to herself on the death of her brother-in-law; and that she, before the sister's death, had formed in her own mind a plan or intention to obtain this insurance for her own benefit, and this plan or intention continued to exist and be operative up to the time of the death of her brother-in-law; then we are of the opinion that evidence may be offered that her sister died of poison and that this defendant administered it as a part of the method employed by her to carry this plan or intention into effect, in connection with evidence that she administered poison to her brother-in-law as another part of the same plan or intention.

(2) [The prosecution afterwards offered further to prove that after the death of her brother-in-law and her receipt of the insurance money in her own right, as beneficiary, she poisoned the remaining child, Thomas Arthur, in July, 1886. This offer was stated and opposed in the following terms]:

Mr. Stevens: The government has already offered evidence that this money was received for the purpose of taking care of Thomas Arthur Freeman, and the position of the government is that the motive which induced this woman to kill Prince Arthur Freeman was for the purpose of getting two thousand dollars to use for her own benefit. . . . Now, this testimony of the death of Thomas relates back and explains more fully the real motive and the strength of the motive which induced her to kill Prince Arthur. It shows that she did not receive the money for the purpose of using it to take care of Thomas Arthur, but has a tendency to show that the real purpose and the real motive was, not the alleged motive by which she had received it, for the purpose of taking care of Thomas Arthur, but was for her own personal benefit. . . .

Field, J.: Does it not amount to this, that you show she killed Thomas Arthur for the purpose of getting rid of the burden of supporting him?

Mr. Stevens: Not entirely. I do not think it would be admissible simply for that purpose. I do not think it is admissible except on the ground that it relates back to the original motive. . . .

Field, J.: Suppose you prove that she wanted the money for the purposes of the expenses of the family generally, then can the death of any member of her family at any subsequent time be shown in order to relate back and help to prove the original motive? . . .

Mr. Stevens: I should say no, on general principles, unless there was some particular circumstance. It seems to me that that differs from this case. . . .

Field, J.: You know the rule of law is, that you shall not submit the evidence of one crime to prove another. The general rule of law is undoubtedly against it. If you are indicted for assaulting A, it is not competent to prove that you have assaulted B, C, and D.

Mr. Stevens: Because ordinarily it has not any natural tendency to satisfy the reasonable mind that the prisoner committed that crime.

Field, J.: It has some tendency to show that he is a man who is habitually assaulting people.

Mr. Stevens: I tried to argue, — but I did not argue successfully, — in the former trial, that under certain combinations I thought that was admissible, but the Court overruled it, and of course I cannot argue that now.

FIELD, J.: Suppose you are indicted for cheating A in a horse trade, the fact that you have cheated twenty-seven other persons within three months, is, independently of legal rules, some evidence to the point that you have cheated the last person; but yet, it is not admissible if there is no connection between the different acts.

Mr. Stevens: I don't know about that; but the Court says it is not. But if I pass a piece of counterfeit money, and if it is a fact that I had another piece of counterfeit money in my possession, that would be evidence against me. I do not think the rules of law are always consistent.

FIELD, J.: That is an exception, and it goes simply to the point of whether you knew it was counterfeit. The ground is that a man may have one counterfeit half-dollar and not know it; but if he has a good many in his possession and on successive days, it is evidence that he knows that the money is counterfeit.

Mr. Stevens: Where a distinct crime is committed, we do not put it in that position. But does it not have a natural tendency, and is it not connected circumstantially, with the principal fact, in so far as it tends to go back and explain the motive?

FIELD, J.: Is it not more reasonable, on general principles, that if there be any evidence that she killed the son, the motive to do that was formed after the death of the father, than that it was formed before, — on general principles? Is it not merely collateral as connected with the original motive?

Mr. Stevens: I do not think it is, if you go along step by step. . . .

Mr. Goodrich [for the defense]: It is admitted that there was no contract in writing, there was no trust created by any instrument, but she simply acknowledged that she had the care and the charge of the child and was to take care of the child, and she recognized the expense of it. . . . If evidence of the death of Thomas Arthur Freeman is competent in this case, it is because that death was a part of the original scheme. Now, if the original scheme was to get possession of the money, then to make this evidence competent it must appear that it would serve that end, — the scheme of getting the money. Therefore it would be material whether or not the money had been got and spent; because if the prisoner had obtained the money at the time of Thomas Arthur Freeman's death, and had spent it and it was gone, then some other motive except the obtaining of the money must have been the motive for Thomas Arthur's death. Now, in point of fact, it is proper for me to say that the money had been spent and was gone; and, therefore, her only object and motive in committing the murder of Thomas Arthur Freeman must have been to get rid of her responsibility of taking care of him. . . .

[The justices went out for consultation. They then returned and said, by]

FIELD, J.: The justices have considered the question submitted to them and are divided in opinion. The result is that in a capital case, where the point does not concern the general administration of justice, but is dependent upon the particular facts of a particular case, in favorem vitae, the evidence must be excluded.

[In the Supreme Court, the admission of the first part of the evidence above was held proper, in the following terms]:

C. ALLEN, J.: While it is well settled in this Commonwealth that on the trial of an indictment the government cannot be allowed to prove other independent crimes for the purpose of showing that the defendant is wicked enough to commit the crime on trial, this rule does not extend so far as to exclude evidence of acts or crimes which are shown to have been committed as part of the same common purpose or in pursuance of it. In such cases there is a distinct and significant probative effect, resulting from the continuance of the same plan or scheme and from the doing of other acts in pursuance thereof. It is somewhat of the nature of threats or declarations of intention, but more especially of preparations for the commission of the crime which is the subject of the indictment. If, for example, it could be shown that a defendant had formed a settled purpose to obtain certain property which could only be got by doing several preliminary things, the last of which in the order of time was criminal, the government might show, on his trial for the commission of that last criminal act, that he had formed the purpose to accomplish the result of obtaining the property, and that he had done all of the preliminary things which were necessary to that end. This would be quite plain if the evidence of the purpose were direct and clear, — as, if a letter in the defendant's handwriting should be discovered, stating in terms to a confederate his purpose to obtain the property by the doing of the several successive acts the last of which was the criminal act on trial. In such case, no one would question that proof might be offered that the defendant had done all the preliminary acts referred to, which were necessary steps in the accomplishment of his purpose. But such purpose may also be shown by circumstantial evidence. It is, indeed, usually the case that intentions, plans, purposes, can only be shown in this way. Express declarations of intention, or confessions, are comparatively rare; and therefore all the circumstances of the defendant's situation, conduct, speech, silence, motives may be considered. The plan itself, and the acts done in pursuance of it, may all be proved by circumstantial evidence, if they are of themselves relevant and material to the case on trial. In such a case it makes no difference whether the preliminary acts are criminal or not; otherwise, the greater the criminal, the greater his immunity. Such preliminary acts are competent because they are relevant to the issue on trial; and the fact that they are criminal does not render them irrelevant. Suppose, for further example, one is charged with breaking a bank, and there is evidence that he had made preliminary examinations from a neighboring room; that his occupation of such room was accomplished by a criminal breaking and entering would not render the evidence incompetent. It is sometimes said that such evidence may be introduced where the several crimes form part of one entire transaction; but it is perhaps better to say, where they have some connection with each other, as a part of the same plan or induced by the same motive.

. . . The ruling at the trial, therefore, was correct, that if evidence should be offered and admitted tending to show that the prisoner knew before her sister's death of the existence of the insurance, and that it could be transferred on the death of her sister to herself, and made payable to herself on the death of Freeman, and that before her sister's death she had formed a plan or intention to obtain this insurance for her own benefit, and this plan or intention continued to exist or be operative up to the time of Freeman's death, then that evidence might be offered to show that her sister died of poison, and that the prisoner administered it as a part of the method employed by her to carry this plan or intention into effect, in connection with evidence that she administered poison to Freeman as another part of the same plan and with the same general intention. The Court therefore properly held that evidence of this knowledge and plan or intention on the part of the prisoner should first be offered. . . .

We are further of the opinion, that the preliminary evidence which was before the Court . . . certainly tended to show a scheme and plan, entered into before Mrs. Freeman's death, to have the insurance money made payable to the prisoner. Exceptions overruled.

205 N. Y. 275; 98 N. E. 474

APPEAL from Supreme Court, Appellate Division, Second Department.

Frank C. Marrin was convicted of forgery in the first degree. From a judgment of the Appellate Division, Second Department (147 App. Div. 903, 131 N. Y. Supp. 1134) affirming the conviction, he appeals. Affirmed.

On the 3d day of May, 1895, the defendant was indicted for the crime of forgery in the first degree, in that on the 9th of November, 1893, in his capacity as commissioner of deeds, he willfully, falsely, and feloniously certified that a mortgage "purporting to have been made and executed by one James Cahill to one Caroline Barry in the sum of $4000 . . . was acknowledged by a party thereto, to wit, the said James Cahill, . . . whereas in truth and in fact . . . such certifying by him, the said Frank C. Marrin, as such commissioner of deeds, was in all respects false, fraudulent, and spurious, as he, the said Frank C. Marrin, then and there well knew." . . .

The jury found him guilty as charged in the indictment, and the judgment entered on the verdict was unanimously affirmed on appeal to the Appellate Division.

William Travers Jerome, of New York City, for Appellant. John M. Perry, of New York City, for the People.

VANN, J. (after stating the facts as above). Upon the charge that the defendant, as a commissioner of deeds, "willfully certified falsely" that the mortgage in question was duly acknowledged before him, a serious difference of opinion has arisen in regard to the admission of certain evidence given in support of the accusation. The circumstances under which that evidence was received were as follows: The defendant, a practicing lawyer in the city of Brooklyn, had as a client an old lady named Caroline Barry, a resident of that city, who on or about the 3d of November, 1893, gave him $4000 to invest for her. In a short time he delivered to her the paper set forth in the indictment purporting to be a mortgage duly acknowledged before himself as commissioner of deeds and to have been executed by James Cahill, as mortgagor, to Caroline Barry, as mortgagee, to secure the payment of $4000 in three years from date with interest payable semiannually. There was a false certificate of record indorsed on the mortgage, which purported to cover the adjoining halves of two lots in Brooklyn; the division lines passing nearly through the center of the buildings thereon. It was shown that no person named James Cahill had ever been connected with the record, title, or possession of either piece of property. Several persons of that name were called by the prosecution, each of whom swore that he was not the James Cahill named in the instrument, that the signature thereto was not that of any James Cahill known to him, and that he neither signed nor acknowledged it himself. The defendant embezzled said money, but from time to time paid Mrs. Barry what purported to be the interest upon the mortgage as it fell due.

Thereupon, in order to show that James Cahill was a myth, that if any one acknowledged the instrument the defendant knew it was not the person described therein, and that the transaction was part of a continuous scheme to defraud Mrs. Barry, eight similar mortgages were offered and received for that purpose only. At the time they were received, as well as in the charge, the Court carefully instructed the jury to that effect and distinctly told them that such mortgages could not be considered as any evidence of an independent crime or for any purpose except the one thus announced.

These mortgages purported to have been given within a period of less than two years, being dated two or three months apart, and they were all actually recorded, except the last two, which were dated after the one in question and bore false certificates of record. Each was delivered by the defendant to Caroline Barry as evidence of an investment made by him for her of money intrusted by her to him, to be invested in mortgages in her name, shortly before the date of each instrument, but in each case the money, instead of being invested in any way, was converted by him to his own use. Each ran to her as mortgagee, and each covered no unit of realty, but parts of houses on adjacent lots belonging to different owners, or rear ends or sides of lots. In each instance the person named as mortgagor was unknown and could not be found after diligent inquiry. Each was a stranger to the record, title, and possession of the premises covered by the mortgage. Each mortgage was certified by the defendant to have been acknowledged before him as commissioner of deeds, and he paid the interest on each as it became due from money intrusted to him by Mrs. Barry for investment. He used all the money, amounting to over $30,000, for his own purposes.

It was not enough for the people to show simply that the certificate in question as made by the defendant was false. It was necessary for them to go further and show that he knew it was false, as the statute condemns one who "wilfully certifies falsely." "Wilfully," as thus used, means intentionally, so that proof of intention to make a false certificate is expressly required. . . . In order to show knowledge, intention, and the absence of mistake, the district attorney had the right to prove similar acts, done under similar circumstances at about the same time, with intent to defraud the same person by the same means. The common method, purpose, and victim formed the connecting links which strung together the nine successive and successful efforts to defraud pursuant to a common scheme. People v. Dolan, 186 N. Y. 4, 10. The mortgagor named in the indictment may or may not have been a myth; but when eight similar myths appeared as mortgagors in eight similar mortgages, some dated before and some after the one in question, but no two far apart, each given to and used to defraud the same person and each acknowledged before the defendant who received the proceeds of the fraud in each case, the probability that the mortgagor in question was a myth was greatly strengthened. The probative force of such evidence bore logically on the question whether the defendant knew that James Cahill was a myth, and with cumulative power in proportion to the number of instances, tended to exclude the possibility of mistake on his part in that regard. It also tended to show his intention to make a false certificate.

The suggestion that evidence could not be received to show that the same man picked the pocket of the same person on several successive occasions near together does not apply to this case, because the pickpocket knows when he steals. There can be no mistake about it; whereas here there may have been a mistake. James Cahill may not have been a myth. Some one may have assumed to be James Cahill and may have convinced the defendant that he bore that name and was in fact the mortgagor, so that while the certificate was false the defendant may not have known it was false. The people did not know how much evidence might be presented by him tending to show that he was mistaken, and the way was open to the prosecution to reduce the possibility of mistake to a minimum by proving eight similar and connected transactions, each of which as well as the one in question was part of a general scheme to defraud Mrs. Barry by means of spurious mortgages certified by the defendant in the same way and under similar circumstances.

2. The evidence also bore upon intent, not merely the intention of the defendant to make the certificate, but with a special weight upon his intention to commit a crime in making it. If one plan ran through all the transactions and was worked out in the same way, at nearly the same time, by the same means, with intent to defraud the same person, with the same effort to conceal by payment of interest, and a common method, agency, and purpose welded all the mortgages together, all were competent to show that the defendant was not mistaken in doing the single act for which he was tried, because nine mistakes of the same kind, each of which put a large sum of money in his pocket, are impossible of belief.

It is conceded that, where knowledge is a necessary ingredient of a crime, evidence of similar acts by the defendant at or about the same time is admissible. It is further conceded that proof of scienter was necessary in order to show that the defendant knew that any person who may have appeared before him was not the James Cahill described in the mortgage. And, finally, it is conceded that if the eight mortgages had all purported to have been executed by James Cahill, they would have been competent to show knowledge and improbability of deception or mistake.

It seems to me that the distinction between the case and the concession is too narrow for practical use in administering the law. If all the mortgagors in the eight mortgages were myths, the mythical names they bore were of slight importance. The false name was not the material fact, but the false man and the furtive intent in certifying that he was a true man and the mortgagor. If the eight mortgagors were myths, it was probable that the ninth was also, and equally probable that the defendant knew it, whether they bore the same name or different names. The theory of the prosecution was not that because the defendant forged on eight occasions he forged on the ninth, but that on the ninth he was not mistaken, deceived, or misled.

Such evidence has been sanctioned for time out of mind in cases involving the uttering of forged instruments, counterfeiting, obtaining money by false pretenses, receiving stolen property, setting buildings on fire with intent to defraud insurance companies, sexual crimes, violation of the excise law, gambling, and other offenses. See, also, the interesting and instructive chapter of Prof. Wigmore on "Other Offenses, or Similar Acts, as Evidence of Knowledge, Design or Intent." 1 Wigmore on Evidence, c. 12.

The defendant relies upon a case which I regard as a direct authority against him. People v. Weaver, 177 N. Y. 434. The indictment in that case contained two counts, the first for forging the name of one Davis as indorser on a promissory note made by the defendant, and the second for uttering the note so indorsed with intent to defraud. The defendant testified that she believed she had implied authority from Davis to indorse his name on notes made by herself. Evidence given by the prosecution that she had indorsed the name of Davis on another note made by herself was held competent to prove scienter; but evidence that she had forged or uttered other notes which did not purport to have been indorsed by Davis, and which had no connection with the transaction in question, was held incompetent. The evidence held competent in that case was the same in principle as the evidence involved in this, while that held incompetent was clearly so, for it simply tended to prove an independent crime, which had no connection whatever with the crime charged. As was said in People v. Dolan, 186 N. Y. 4, 9, the Weaver Case has not changed the rule upon the subject as laid down in the previous cases.

I think that no error was committed by receiving in evidence the eight mortgages, under the restrictions laid down by the trial court, and, as no other question requires discussion, the judgment should be affirmed.

CULLEN, C. J. (dissenting). On the trial no evidence was given in behalf of the defendant, but against his objection and exception the prosecution was allowed to prove the certification of several other mortgages purporting to be made by persons other than said Cahill to said Caroline Barry, as follows: By David Teare, dated June 15, 1892, for $3000; by John MacKay, dated August 8, 1892, for $2500; by Frederick Hoffman, dated September 7, 1892, for $5000; by William J. Driggs, dated April 21, 1893, for $6000; by Horace J. Tindall, dated June 15, 1893, for $5000; by James Gillen, dated August 5, 1893, for $5500; by Robert F. Griffen, dated December 9, 1893, for $3500; and by Peter V. Ross, dated March 27, 1894, for $2000. As to these evidence was given tending to show that the mortgagors named in them were fictitious persons and that the defendant had falsely certified to the acknowledgments thereof and had embezzled or misappropriated the money represented by them. The only question raised on this appeal is the admissibility of these last-named securities and of the testimony given concerning them.

The general rule of law is well established. Testimony which fairly tends to establish the commission by a defendant of the particular crime for which he is on trial is admissible even though such testimony also tends to prove that the defendant was guilty of 1 or 20 other crimes. But no testimony which does not tend to connect the defendant with the particular crime on trial is admissible on the theory that, because the defendant has been guilty of 1 or 20 crimes, even of the same character, it is probable that he committed the crime charged. Where knowledge is a necessary ingredient of the crime, evidence of similar acts by the defendant at or about the same time is admissible.

So also it would be competent and necessary to prove scienter in this case. But we should not hide ourselves behind generalities. We should analyze and see the exact scienter that could in any view of the case be material. The defendant could be convicted by the jury only upon the prosecution satisfying it of one of two things, either that Cahill was a myth and that no one acknowledged the execution of the mortgage before the defendant, or that, if any one did acknowledge the instrument, it was not the person described in it, and the defendant knew it. As to the first of these no possible scienter could be necessary, for if no one appeared before the defendant to make the acknowledgment, then his certificate was not only necessarily false, but equally necessarily he knew it was false. As to the second theory, that though somebody might have acknowledged the instrument before the defendant, that person was not the person described in the mortgage, proof of scienter doubtless was necessary; that is to say, it was necessary to establish that the defendant knew that the person who appeared before him was not the same James Cahill described in the mortgage. On either of these theories other mortgages purporting to be executed by James Cahill than the one specified in the indictment would have been competent, because they would have tended to show knowledge by the defendant of the personality of Cahill and his ability to produce him or account for him unless he was a myth, or if a person did actually appear before the defendant and acknowledge the instrument, the improbability of the defendant being deceived as to the identity of the person making the acknowledgment, and the more numerous such instruments, the stronger and more convincing would be the evidence. But evidence that the defendant certified to false acknowledgments purporting to be made at other times and by other parties would not in any manner tend to establish either that the defendant did not take the acknowledgment of any one to the instrument charged in the indictment, or that if he did he knew that person was not Cahill, except on the general principle that a man who had committed one crime would very probably commit another. I do not deny the probative force of such evidence to the lay mind and possibly to all minds. If we know of a theft and that several persons have had an opportunity to commit it, if we also know that one of such persons has been a thief, we would very naturally suspect him of the crime. But our law has always been careful to exclude evidence of that character.

I have already said that we should not be misled by generalities. "Error lurks in generalities." Something has been said about the necessity of proving criminal intent. It is not necessary to establish any criminal intent in this case other than to do the act made criminal by the statute; that is to say, to knowingly certify falsely to the acknowledgment. Nor is there any force in the argument that the defendant's acts were part of a general scheme to defraud. Each offense was complete in itself. They were no more parts of a single crime than might be said of the action of a professional thief or pickpocket that it was part of a general scheme to take the money of any one from whose pockets he could successfully extract its contents and whose appearance indicated sufficient prosperity to make the booty worth the risk of detection.

It is not necessary, however, to rest the conclusion which I have reached on principle alone. Authority sustains it. I insist we have decided the exact question in the case of People v. Weaver, 177 N. Y. 434, 447. In that case the defendant was indicted and convicted of having forged the name of one Martin Davis as indorser on her note. On the trial of the action she claimed that she believed that she had Davis' authority to indorse her own note in his name. Other notes negotiable by the defendant with indorsements claimed to have been forged by her were put in evidence by the prosecution. One of these notes purported to bear the indorsement of Davis; the others that of other parties. It was held: "(1) That the $5000 note, purporting to bear the indorsement of Davis, was competent evidence to prove scienter on the part of the defendant. (2) That it was error to allow the witness Davis to testify or refer to the other notes alleged to be forged but which did not purport to be indorsed by Davis. (3) That the admission in evidence of such alleged forged notes was error." For this error the conviction was reversed.

This judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

SUB-TOPIC C. CONDUCT AS EVIDENCE OF CHARACTER IN OTHER CASES

49. MORRIS v. EAST HAVEN

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1874

41 Conn. 252

CASE, for an injury to the plaintiff's intestate, through the negligence of the defendants, by which he lost his life; brought to the Superior Court in New Haven County, and tried to the jury, on the general issue, before PARDEE, J.

On the trial the plaintiff claimed to have proved that on the evening of the 12th of November, 1871, Adam Lamb, the intestate, with his daughter, started from Montowese, in North Haven, for New Haven, riding in a business wagon, and that while they were approaching a bridge in East Haven the horse backed over the embankment on the east side of the bridge, at a place where there was no railing, and they were drowned in the Quinnipiac River.

The plaintiff, for the purpose of proving that the deceased was free from negligence, called several witnesses, and after they had stated that they had often seen him drive horses, inquired of them if he was a careful and prudent driver; to which inquiry the defendant objected on the ground that it was irrelevant, and calling for the expression of an opinion, but the Court overruled the objection and permitted the question to be put, to which the defendants excepted. The jury having returned a verdict for the plaintiff, the defendants moved for a new trial for error in the rulings of the Court.

C. Ives and Doolittle, in support of the motion. Watrous, with whom was Morris, contra Park, C. J. It was incumbent upon the plaintiff in this case to prove, as in all other cases of a like character, that on the occasion complained of his intestate exercised reasonable care to avoid the injury which he received. This he attempted to do by means of witnesses who had on other occasions seen the intestate drive horses, and who, upon their knowledge thus obtained, testified that he was a careful and prudent driver. The question is, whether such evidence tends legitimately to prove that the intestate drove his horse with reasonable care on the occasion complained of. The defendants objected to the admission of this evidence upon two grounds; — first, that the manner in which the intestate drove horses on other occasions had no relevancy to the question how he drove at this time. . . .

First, then, was the evidence irrelevant? All that the witnesses could say was, that on the different occasions that they had seen the intestate drive horses, he drove them carefully and prudently. Whether this comes up to the standard that the law requires, which is reasonable care under all the circumstances, we will not stop to inquire. It is obvious that there are many degrees of care, from the slightest to the greatest, which may be exercised. Care varies in different cases, and the proper degree of it is determined by the danger to be reasonably apprehended, and is affected by the character of the horse driven and by all the other circumstances. Every case has of course its peculiar circumstances, and these must be taken into consideration in determining whether or not in that particular case reasonable care was exercised. Hence, what would be reasonable care in one case might fall far short of it in another, and consequently the question whether it was exercised in one case, would throw no light upon the question whether it was exercised in another. We think it clear that, where the question is how in a particular case a man managed a restive horse in the midst of danger and difficulties, nothing could be gained by ascertaining how he had driven a gentle horse upon some country road, where no danger or difficulties existed. It might as well be proved that a party was negligent on a certain occasion, by showing that he had been negligent on other occasions whether other parties had been injured. And, furthermore, in each instance that either of the witnesses had seen the intestate driving a horse, there might be made a question whether in fact care was exercised by him, involving a long investigation, thus calling the minds of the jury from the main issue in the case to the examination of interminable collateral questions. We think the first ground of objection taken to the evidence was well founded. . . . We think the evidence should have been rejected; and we advise a new trial.

In this opinion the other judges concurred; except PARDEE, J., who having tried the case in the Court below, did not sit.

EXCEPTIONS from Chancery Court, Orange County; GEORGE M. POWERS, Chancellor. Action by James McQuiggan against John Ladd and others. There was a verdict and judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings exceptions. Reversed and remanded. Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and TYLER, MUNSON, WATSON, and MILES, JJ.

Harvey, Harvey & Harvey, for plaintiff. Richard A. Hoar, for defendants.

MILES, J. This is an action for an assault and battery against John Ladd, Daniel Ladd, and Eugene Spicer. John Ladd and Eugene Spicer pleaded the general issue. Daniel Ladd pleaded the general issue and also son assault demesne, to which last plea the plaintiff replied de injuria. The case was tried by jury and comes to this Court on exceptions to the admission of certain evidence, and to the charge of the Court upon the matter of self-defense. It was claimed on the part of the defendants, and their evidence tended to show, that what was done on the occasion complained of was done in self-defense, and that no more force was used by Daniel Ladd, the only defendant who used any actual force upon the plaintiff, than he reasonably believed was necessary under all the circumstances. The defendants further claimed, and their evidence tended to prove, that the plaintiff was under the influence of intoxicating liquor at the time of the alleged assault and battery, which Daniel then detected, and that Daniel knew at that time, by reputation and observation, that when the plaintiff was under the influence of intoxicating liquor he was a quarrelsome and dangerous man. . . . As bearing upon the reasonableness of the force used by Daniel in repelling the claimed assault of the plaintiff, the defendants claimed and gave evidence tending to prove that Daniel knew by observation and reputation at the time of the assault that the plaintiff when under the influence of intoxicating liquor, was a quarrelsome and dangerous man, and that on the occasion in question the plaintiff was under the influence of intoxicating liquor which was then detected by Daniel, and that, in consequence thereof, and having in mind what he knew and had heard of the plaintiff's character under such circumstances, he was afraid of him. It therefore became important for the defendant to show that the plaintiff was under the influence of intoxicating liquor at the time of the alleged assault, and that when under the influence of intoxicating liquor he was a quarrelsome and dangerous man, or was reputed to be such, and that the defendant Daniel Ladd had knowledge of such facts or report at the time of the alleged assault, and believed them to be true.

The plaintiff's first exception is to the admission of the testimony of Mrs. Ladd, Brown, and McCormick, wherein they testify that they had seen the plaintiff on different occasions under the influence of intoxicating liquor at times previous to the assault in question, and that on those occasions he was cross and ugly, as stated above. The plaintiff urges that this was error, because it was an attempt to prove character by specific instances, and he cites numerous authorities outside of this State in support of his contention, and two cases from this State, some of which support his contention and many of which do not. Among those cases which do not support his claim are the two cases cited from our own State, and these cases illustrate the error into which the profession are liable to fall if distinctions are not carefully observed.

The word "character" has an objective as well as a subjective meaning, which is quite distinct. As applied to man, objective character is his actual character. Subjective character is such character as he possesses in the minds of others, and is the aggregate or abstract of other persons' opinions of him. Powers v. Leach, 26 Vt. 270–278. In cases of impeachment, where the question of character most frequently arises, the subjective character is the only one involved; for the law is settled that to create impeachment one must have been so untruthful as to create a reputation in the community where he resides, and hence only general reputation is admissible to establish it. But in a case like the one at bar, where the actions of a third person are to be affected by a knowledge of another's character, not only may the subjective character be involved, but the objective may be as well, for the action of one, influenced by the character of another, is affected to the same extent by a belief in the truth of general report as it is by a knowledge of the fact; because in either case he believes he knows the fact, and it is that belief which is important.

This principle is not new. It was sanctioned in Harrison v. Harrison, 43 Vt. 417–424, a case cited by the plaintiff. . . . The admissibility of evidence tending to show objective character or disposition is also sanctioned in State v. Meader, 47 Vt. 78–81, wherein the rule laid down in Harrison v. Harrison, supra, is approved. The defendant in that case offered to show that the person claimed to have been assaulted, was a quarrelsome, fractious man, which was excluded, because the offer was not accompanied by the further offer to show that the defendant had knowledge of that fact at the time of the alleged assault, and this Court sustained the ruling of the Court below; but the opinion clearly indicates that, had the offer contained a statement of knowledge on the part of the defendant, the evidence would have been admissible. . . .

We are not unmindful of the fact that cases can be found outside of this State somewhat in conflict with the views above expressed; but the admissibility of such evidence is so well settled in our own jurisdiction and upon such well-grounded reasons that we do not feel inclined to depart from former holdings of this Court, and we think that the tendency of the Courts is to extend the rule governing the reception of specific instances in the proof of character, upon the idea expressed by Mr. Wigmore in volume I, §198, of his excellent work on Evidence, wherein he says: "There is no substantial reason against it."

From the foregoing conclusions, it follows that it was admissible for the defendants to show what was observed as to the character of the plaintiff, as to being cross and ugly when under the influence of intoxicating liquor at a time previous to the alleged assault. And, in order to show that, it was necessary to show that he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor on those occasions. And, as the case tends to show that the defendant Daniel knew of those traits of character at the time of the alleged assault and battery, it was not necessary that every occasion observed, which went to make up and establish the existence of those traits of character, should be brought to the knowledge of the defendant in all their details. It was enough that he knew that such traits of character existed, communicated to him by the witnesses who testified respecting them or coming to him from other sources. The evidence objected to was for the jury to say whether such objective character existed as the defendant's evidence tended to show. The plaintiff's first exception, therefore, was not well taken. . . .

The plaintiff's fourteenth exception is to the refusal of the Court to charge as requested and to the charge as made upon that point. Without deciding whether there was or was not error in the Court's omission to charge in the language of the request, we hold that there was error in the charge as made. . . . As the result of our decision sends the case back to the County Court for another trial, we have considered all the exceptions raised on the former trial, notwithstanding that the case could have been disposed of upon the fourteenth alone.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

52. STATE v. GREENE

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA. 1910

152 N. C. 835; 68 S. E. 16

APPEAL from Superior Court, Mitchell County; COUNCILL, Judge. Woodfin Greene was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed. Indictment for murder tried before COUNCILL, J., and a jury at November term, 1909, of the Superior Court of Mitchell County. The prisoner was convicted of murder in the second degree, and from the judgment of the Court appealed.

The evidence tended to prove that the prisoner shot and killed Ed. L. Young on September 9, 1909, about 12 o'clock in the day; that prisoner entered the house of the deceased while he was asleep, shot twice in the ceiling of the room, presumably to awaken the deceased, and then shot him four times. Death resulted in a few minutes. As prisoner walked out of the house he was asked what was the matter, and he replied that "there was a man hurt and hurt bad, and that I had better come and take care of him." The prisoner, not having offered himself as a witness, rested his defense upon the plea of insanity — transitory insanity; that this condition of irresponsibility was occasioned by a statement to the prisoner by his wife a few hours before the homicide. The prisoner was engaged in working at night at, in, or about the Cranberry mines, and on the morning of the 9th of September, about 6 o'clock, he came to his home, met the deceased at his gate, and walked with him to his home, a distance of about 300 yards; in a short time prisoner's wife came for him; they went to their house, ate breakfast, and, as was his custom, prisoner went to his bedroom to sleep. In a short time prisoner's wife came in the room, lay down on another bed, and, thinking the prisoner asleep, began to cry. The prisoner was not asleep, but upon his inquiry as to what was the matter the wife narrated this occurrence: "Fin, Ed. Young made me drunk last night and overpowered me, and threw me back on the bed, and in spite of my efforts and my telling him to leave, he accomplished his purpose." "Young said to me, 'God damn you, I have fixed you.'" That the prisoner jumped up in the floor, wringing his hands and saying, "I want my pistol, I want my pistol! My life is wrecked! My home is ruined." That she refused to give him the pistol, having hidden it; that prisoner demanded it and struck her; that she ran to her sister's, and then to her father's; that prisoner followed her demanding his pistol; that she had a difficulty with him, and threw an ax at him; that finally she told him where his pistol was, when he left her, and the next thing she heard was that he had killed deceased. There was much evidence of prisoner's excited condition, and his wild looks and his open threats to kill Young. There was evidence on the part of the State tending to prove that prisoner had been drinking that morning; that he said he was two-thirds drunk, and that when drunk he was very rowdy. The testimony of prisoner's unusual condition came from non-expert witnesses — his kinpeople who saw him that day before the homicide. Immediately after the homicide the insanity seems to have passed away as he was apparently as rational as ever, and escaped to the woods, where he remained for a day, when he surrendered himself. There was evidence of previous threats made by prisoner against deceased; and there was also evidence of very friendly relations between them. Both men drank whisky to excess. The contest between the State and the prisoner was over the defense of insanity, and both State and prisoner offered much evidence tending to support the one theory or the other.

Chas. E. Greene and S. J. Ervin, for appellant. The Attorney General, Geo. L. Jones, and W. C. Newland, for the State.

MANNING, J. . . . The errors assigned by the prisoner are directed solely to the admission of incompetent, and the rejection of competent, testimony. The trial judge permitted the prisoner's wife to rehearse to the jury, in minute detail, everything she told the prisoner about the conduct of the deceased the night before. The prisoner offered to prove as a substantive and independent fact the truth of the narrative by the wife, but this was excluded by his honor.

His honor's ruling is, we think, clearly sustained by the decision of this Court in State v. Banner, 149 N. C. 519, 63 S. E. 84, in which this Court held:

"When the defense is a plea of insanity and not self-defense, a witness may not testify, as tending to show self-defense, that he had seen deceased armed, on a dark night, at a place where the prisoner would likely pass, some two weeks before the occurrence, though he may testify that he had told the prisoner concerning it, and what the prisoner said and did in consequence, only so far as it may affect the question of insanity, and for that purpose alone."

In People v. Wood, 126 N. Y. 249, 27 N. E. 362, Judge PECKHAM, in a learned and elaborate opinion, held that it was competent for a defendant to offer evidence of communication made to him (in that case the communications offered were of a similar character to those in this case), "for the purpose of showing an adequate cause for the state of mind existing subsequent to the communication." This being the sole purpose of the evidence, the truth or falsity of the communication is not material, and it is not competent to inquire into it. It is, of course, competent to challenge the fact of communication, but not its truth or falsity.

In the present case, his honor permitted the prisoner to show in minute detail the communication to him by his wife, and his conduct, appearance, utterances, and acts immediately thereafter and to the time of the homicide. This was, in our opinion, as far as it was permissible to go. There was no evidence of any disorder of the brain prior to the morning of September 9th, the day of the homicide; the evidence tended to show the prisoner to be a man possessed of an ordinarily normal mind, except occasional outbursts when intoxicated. In a few hours after the homicide the prisoner's mind seemed to recover its balance and to resume its normal condition. It was the contention of the prisoner that the sudden "brain storm," which was so violent as to dethrone reason and make him irresponsible for his acts, was caused by his wife's communication. Of its truth or falsity he could know nothing, and could not have been influenced by such knowledge. The theory of the defense and its plea is that he believed it so strongly and so absolutely that the prisoner was made insane. If the purpose was to show the character of the deceased for violence, it was inadmissible because it did not fall within one of the exceptions to the rule settled in this State for admitting such evidence. State v. Banner, supra; State v. Turpin, 77 N. C. 473, 24 Am. Rep. 455; State v. Byrd, 121 N. C. 688, 28 S. E. 353; State v. McIver, 125 N. C. 646, 34 S. E. 439. In our opinion, therefore, the offered testimony of the wife that the occurrence communicated by her to the prisoner, her husband, was true as an independent and substantive fact was properly excluded. . . . Judgment affirmed.

53. NOYES v. BOSTON & MAINE R. CO.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1912

213 Mass. —; 99 N. E. 457

EXCEPTIONS from Supreme Judicial Court, Worcester County.

Action by Emma L. Noyes against the Boston & Maine Railroad. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepts. Exceptions overruled.

This was an action of tort brought to recover damages for the loss of a barn, and the personal property contained therein, by fire communicated by a locomotive engine of the defendant on August 12, 1908. The evidence introduced by the plaintiff on the issue of the cause of the fire included the testimony of several reputable witnesses; the following was a representative one: Miss Anna Blodgett testified that she was out on the porch and saw a train go by the Noyes place towards Worcester five or ten minutes before the fire; that she watched it for quite a way; that she saw a lot of sparks thrown by the engine and called to her sister, who was with her, "see the sparks"; that soon after she saw a bright spot and called to her father to "see the red moon"; that this bright spot turned out to be a small spot of fire on the roof of the Noyes barn; and that she had often noticed engines throw sparks high up in the air while passing the barn. This evidence was also corroborated by the witness's sister.

The defendant, for the purpose of showing other possible or probable causes for the fire, made the following offer of proof: Emma L. Noyes, the plaintiff in the case, had a son, Leroy Noyes, who was at home on the day when the fire which destroyed the Noyes barn took place, and the defendant offers to show was there at the time of the fire. And the defendant further offers evidence tending to show that when he was a young boy he had a strong inclination to set fires, and did set several fires; that in the fall of 1908 several fires occurred within a radius of a mile from the Noyes homestead. The evidence offered in regard to these fires would tend to show that this boy, Leroy, was very near the place where the fires took place at the time when the fires were discovered. He was arrested by a constable, and admitted to the constable that he set several of these fires. The District Court of Clinton ordered an examination by two physicians, who committed him to the hospital on the ground that he had a mania for setting fires. Said admission to the constable did not in any way refer to the fire mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration.

The plaintiff objected to the admission of any such evidence, and the Court sustained the objections, to which ruling the defendant excepted.

Charles M. Thayer and Alexander H. Bullock, both of Worcester, for the defendant. In the absence of direct evidence it was clearly competent for the plaintiff to endeavor to show by circumstantial evidence the cause of the fire. If such evidence was competent for the plaintiff the only way it could be controlled by the defendant, in the absence of direct evidence, was by evidence tending to show that the fire may have originated in other ways, and such evidence has been repeatedly admitted.

If the foregoing principles are correct the only questions open are, 1. Whether the fact that there was on the premises, at the time of the fire, an uncontrolled fire setting machine, was one from which the jury might properly infer that the fire came from such a source. 2. Whether the evidence offered was of such a nature that even though relevant its admission would complicate to an unwarranted extent the trial of the issue.

1. On the first point the defendant maintains that from the presence of such a person the jurors might as logically draw inferences which would rebut the plaintiff's theory as from the presence of a commodity, like cotton seed, which might ignite from spontaneous combustion, and the right to show the presence of such a commodity in cases of this character has never been questioned. In the absence of direct evidence, the most that can be said about the locomotive, the cotton seed, or the insane man, is that the presence of either one may furnish a satisfactory explanation of the fire. Anything which would give the jury the true nature of the dangerous element must be relevant. It is important to show, as far as possible, the mechanism of this boy, with an established mania, in order that the jury may judge of the strength and activity of his mania, its transient or permanent qualities. And it was competent to show this by evidence of what the boy had done previously. And if the acts thus shown had a tendency to prove a mental condition not, in its nature, temporary or transient, the jury might assume, in the absence of testimony to the contrary, that the condition was the same at the time of the fire for which damage is here claimed.

2. On the second question, the evidence offered divides itself into two parts: the first showing that a man, with a mania for setting fires, was on the premises at the time the fire was discovered; the second, showing certain acts which this man had done. The first proposition was not dependent on the second, and its proof could not have complicated the trial by diverting it into side issues. It should, therefore, have been admitted, whether the other part of the offer was admitted or excluded. It is further submitted that the evidence of the acts done was not properly excluded, if the ground for such ruling was the complication of the trial. The inclination of his boyhood must have been proved by the statement of some person who knew him at that time, and presents none of the features of evidence which would divert the trial from the main issue. The proof of the later fires could not require the attorney for the plaintiff, in order to protect the interests of his client, to investigate the circumstances of each fire; for it is clear that from the fact that a man sets several fires in a short period of time, one of two conclusions must follow, either he has a mania for setting fires or he is a criminal.

If the trial judge had the right to exercise his discretion in regard to this evidence, it was not an absolute discretion, and can and should be revised by this Court.

Webster Thayer, Geo. A. Drury, Fred A. Walker, all of Worcester, for the plaintiff.

1. Even if the defendant had offered legal evidence tending to prove that the young man had set other fires in the vicinity, the Court would have been obliged to exclude such evidence. The other occurrences were "res inter alios." The Court was not called upon to try in this case the question whether previous fires had occurred, whether they were incendiary, or whether other fires were set by Leroy or by the defendant, or by some other person. The questions are collateral and immaterial and would not aid the jury. The only effect of such evidence would be to prejudice the jury, and to compel the plaintiff to try out various other issues.

2. The Court, at least in its discretion, could rightly exclude the evidence regarding the inclination of the boy as too remote both in time and in fact.

3. An inclination to set fires when young has no tendency to prove that in later years a person did climb upon a roof to set a particular fire for which no motive is shown. Even if the son at other times set fires, that fact would have no tendency to prove that he set this fire at this time and that defendant did not set it.

4. There was no evidence to show that the fires mentioned in the offer were of incendiary origin (unless the confession of Leroy is evidence), or upon buildings, or similar in any respect to this fire, and no claim can be made that the fires were a part of a common scheme or occasioned by any peculiar device or method. Further, the alleged admission did not in any way refer to this fire.

5. The admission of proposed evidence would have compelled the plaintiff to explain all the circumstances of the other fires. It might have created an issue regarding each fire. Not only would the whereabouts of the son at the time of the other fires be in issue, but the place, character, means, motives, circumstances, times and causes would be involved. If an inclination to set fires could be shown and could have any bearing, the limitations of that inclination would have to be shown. The evidence offered would not only have created various collateral issues to the confusion of the real issue, but would have prejudiced the jury.

Braley, J. — The plaintiff seeks under St. 1906, pt. 2, § 247, to recover damages for the destruction of a barn with its contents, alleged to have been caused by fire directly communicated by the locomotive engine of the defendant. But, if the loss is unquestioned, the parties were at issue as to the origin of the fire. The defendant could show, by relevant testimony, that it originated from other independent causes; even if the circumstantial evidence introduced by the plaintiff seems to have been clear and abundant, that the ignition of the roof, from which apparently the fire spread through the building, must have been from sparks emitted by the engine. Perley v. Eastern Railroad Co., 98 Mass. 414.

The defendant contends that, if its offer of proof had been admitted in evidence, the jury would have been warranted in finding the fire had been set by a son of the plaintiff, or at least sufficient doubt would have been raised as to its liability to have overcome the burden of proof. But in the absence of any direct evidence connecting him with the occurrence, the defendant endeavored to show, from incidents in his early life, that he had acquired a disposition which had ripened into a habit to set incendiary fires whenever the opportunity offered. A habit of this character is abnormal, and it may be criminal. The defendant was required to satisfy the presiding judge that the course of conduct on which it sought to predicate the commission of an affirmative wrongful act of the character claimed had become so continuous and systematic that the setting of the fire in question would follow as a reasonable and probable consequence. Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112; Thayer v. Thayer, 101 Mass. 111, 113, 114; Com. v. Abbott, 130 Mass. 472, 473; Hathaway v. Tinkham, 148 Mass. 85; Lane v. Moore, 151 Mass. 87, 90; Edwards v. Worcester, 172 Mass. 104; Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 92, 376. If as a young boy he exhibited a strong inclination to set fires, and while still a youth did in several instances set them, proof of these instances would not raise a reasonable presumption that he had destroyed his mother's property wantonly, even if at the time he is shown to have been living at home. It would not follow from common experience, that because on some occasions in the past he may have done a particular thing in a particular manner, that upon another and different occasion he would act in the same way. Robinson v. Fitchburg & Worcester Railroad, 7 Gray 92, 95; Lewis v. Smith, 107 Mass. 334; Peverly v. Boston, 136 Mass. 366. It is because of this variability and uncertainty in the manifestations of individual conduct, even where the circumstances may be more or less uniform, that while an employee's general reputation for incompetency in the performance of work for which he has been engaged is admissible, if the employer knew or by the exercise of reasonable diligence should have known of it, single instances of carelessness are inadmissible. Cooney v. Commonwealth Avenue Street Railway, 196 Mass. 11, 14, and cases cited. The defendant, moreover, if it had been permitted to litigate the likelihood of his conduct by going at large into proof of alleged instances of previous fires, would have presented collateral issues which would have seriously embarrassed and prejudiced the plaintiff, and tended to confuse and mislead the jury. Emerson v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 3 Allen 410, 417; . . . Com. v. Hudson, 185 Mass. 402. The subsequent incendiary fires for which the son may have been responsible, as well as his admission of having set some of them, were occurrences having no connection with the plaintiff's cause of action. Com. v. Campbell, 7 Allen 541. . . .

We are therefore of opinion that the judge in his discretion properly excluded the offer of proof. Exceptions overruled.

54. CLARKE v. PERIAM

HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY. 1741

2 Atk. 333

THIS was a bill brought by the plaintiff, to establish a bond for securing an annuity of sixty pounds per annum given her as a "praemium pudicitiae"; the defendant by a cross-bill insists the plaintiff was a lewd woman and a common prostitute, and for that reason was not entitled to have the annuity established, and therefore prays that the security may be delivered up. . . .

The counsel for the defendant offered evidence to prove the plaintiff guilty of acts of lewdness with a particular person, one Mr. Abingdon, before she was acquainted with Periam. An objection was taken by the plaintiff's counsel, that the charge in the cross-bill is only that Mrs. Clarke was a lewd woman of an infamous character, and that the bill does not require any answer to this, and therefore the defendant in the evidence ought to confine himself to a general character, and not to particular instances, according to the rule of law upon examining to characters; for the charge here is so loose and general, that it was impossible for the plaintiff to know at what time or place, or with what person, they intended to charge her with acts of lewdness. And that, in order to let them into this evidence, they ought to have charged that she was kept by the person they pretend to have had criminal conversation with her. The allegation is general, that she is a lewd woman, but the evidence goes to particular instances of prostituting her chastity. Mr. Murray, on the same side, argued, that they ought to be confined to evidence as general as the allegation; in every case at law, where the character of a person is called in question, there the examination must be general; and goes on good grounds, because they will not suffer witnesses to come upon surprise, with particular instances, where the party is not prepared to answer. . . .

Mr. Attorney General insisted, in support of the propriety of this evidence: . . . It has been said no evidence must be read in this court, unless the nature of the evidence itself is put into issue. Where lewdness is charged upon the woman, is it necessary to set forth at what particular tavern, or with what particular gentleman, she has been guilty of lewdness? Besides, this would be attended with ill consequences, because it would lay open the case too much, and put the adversary party upon their guard, and give them an opportunity of squaring their own evidence, by the proofs of the other side. In cases of insanity, the court never expect particular acts to be charged, and yet the evidence goes to particular instances. . . .

Lord Chancellor HARDWICKE. — The original bill is brought to have satisfaction out of the personal estate of the late Mr. Periam, for the bond. The cross-bill is brought by the widow of Mr. Periam, and is to be relieved against this bond, and to have it cancelled; and the equity is founded upon this, that it was given by Mr. Periam to Mrs. Clarke, "ex turpi causa," and that she was a lewd woman of an infamous character, and therefore it is insisted the Court should relieve against it. . . . The question, upon which this cause stood over, was whether the deposition of one Rogers, taken in behalf of the defendant in the original cause, ought to be read; it is an attempt to prove that Mrs. Clarke, before the time of Periam's giving the bond to her, was kept by a particular person, one Mr. Abingdon, and had criminal conversation with him. The objection is, that the particular facts to which Rogers is examined should have been put in issue specially, and that they are not sufficiently so in this cause. As to the nature of the suits, the original bill is brought to have satisfaction out of the personal estate of the late Mr. Periam, for the bond. The cross-bill is brought by the widow of Mr. Periam, and is to be relieved against this bond, and to have it cancelled; and the equity is founded upon this, that it was given by Mr. Periam to Mrs. Clarke, "ex turpi causa," and that she was a lewd woman of an infamous character, and therefore it is insisted the Court should relieve against it. The counsel for the plaintiff in the original bill insist, that under this allegation in the cross-bill, the plaintiff there is not entitled to examine to anything but her character in general, because it is impossible for Mrs. Clarke to be prepared to give an answer to the particular facts charged; for though everybody is supposed to be ready to support a general character, yet not a particular fact.

But I am of opinion the present case differs from all those cases relating to examinations to general characters, both as to the reason of the thing, and as to the authorities. . . .

From all the authorities may be gathered the uniform sense in those determinations, that it was sufficient to put in issue a general charge of lewdness, and that under this you may give particular evidence; and I think I have heard it laid down so by Sir Joseph Jekyll. . . .

Secondly, as to the reason of the thing. The cases urged by the plaintiff's counsel in the original cause relating to criminal prosecutions, must be allowed to be law; for in examining to characters you can only enter into general facts. . . . In criminal prosecutions it comes in only collaterally and incidentally and is not the particular thing to be tried; and when that is the case, they are not supposed to be prepared with evidence. But compare this with cases where the character is the particular issue to be tried; suppose in the case of an indictment for keeping a common bawdy-house, without charging any particular fact; though the charge is general, yet at the trial you may give in evidence particular facts and the particular time of doing them; the same rule as to keeping a common gaming-house. This is the practice in all cases where the general behavior or quality or circumstance of the mind is in issue; as for instance, in "non compos mentis," it is the experience of every day, that you give particular acts of madness in evidence, and not general only, that he is insane; so where you charge that a man is addicted to drinking, and liable to be imposed upon, you are not confined in general to his being a drunkard, but particular instances are allowed to be given. . . . Wherever the general life or conversation is put in issue, it is notice to the person who is charged that she should be prepared to take off the weight of that evidence; but where it comes in collaterally you shall be confined to general evidence. This seems to me to be the distinction, and the grounds of it; and if I was of a different opinion, I should overturn the constant course of this Court and make the greatest confusion. . . .

The next day, by the consent of the parties in both causes, Lord HARDWICKE ordered that a perpetual injunction be awarded to stay the proceedings at law of the plaintiff in the original cause on the bond in question.

55. MILLER v. CURTIS

158 Mass. 127; 32 N. E. 1039

TORT, for an assault and battery on three separate occasions, the first in March, 1889, at Worcester, and the other two in May, 1889, at Spencer. Answer, a general denial. Trial in the Superior Court, before CORCORAN, J., who allowed a bill of exceptions, in substance as follows.

The plaintiff's evidence showed that an assault and battery was made by the defendant upon the plaintiff, who is a married woman, and attempts by him to have sexual intercourse with her without her consent, at Worcester and at Spencer. The plaintiff and her husband were both witnesses, and, after they had testified, the following evidence was admitted, against the objection of the plaintiff, all of which related to transactions unconnected with and over twenty years before the alleged assaults. . . . Charles Tenney of Westborough, testified that he was eighty years of age, and very deaf; that he worked for the Millers in Westborough twenty-five years ago; that on one occasion he was called down cellar by the plaintiff to do some work, and soon after they got down she rushed up again and complained to her husband that she had been assaulted; and that he was obliged to leave his place without receiving his wages. Patrick Gately of Spencer, testified that he worked for the Millers in Spencer sixteen years ago. He related a conversation with the plaintiff, the details of which were unfit for publication; and which was to the effect that the plaintiff told him that, when they lived in Westborough, her husband got $18 out of a man who assaulted her, and she was so mad because he did not get more that she threw the money in the fire. Charles M. Fay of Westborough, testified that, in 1867, he worked for one Winslow in Westborough, and the Millers lived near them; that the plaintiff at one time told him that she was going to sue Winslow for insulting her; and that the witness told that to Winslow. . . .

The plaintiff and her husband had both been cross-examined regarding each of the incidents testified to by these witnesses, and had denied them wholly. The judge, in admitting the evidence, instructed the jury that it was to be considered only on the question of damages. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant; and the plaintiff alleged exceptions.

The case was argued at the bar in October, 1892, and afterwards was submitted on the briefs to all the judges.

W. A. Gile (C. S. Forbes with him), for the plaintiff. W. S. B. Hopkins (F. B. Smith with him), for the defendant.

Knowlton, J. . . . The defendant was allowed to introduce evidence of several transactions and conversations with the plaintiff, all occurring more than twenty years ago, which tended to show that she had repeatedly made false charges of indecent assaults upon her, with a view to extort money from innocent men. The defendant denies the charge made against him in the suit, and contends that the plaintiff is trying unjustly to obtain money from him. In any case, where the question is whether the defendant has committed a crime, it would naturally affect the opinion of jurors to know that he had often committed similar crimes; but evidence of such facts is never admitted to prove a defendant's guilt. That a person has committed one crime has no direct tendency to show that he committed another similar crime which had no connection with the first; and a person charged with one offense cannot be expected to come to Court prepared to meet a charge of another. If the doing of one wrongful act should be deemed evidence to prove the doing of another of a similar character which has no connection with the first, issues would be multiplied indefinitely without previous notice to the defendant, and greatly to the distraction of the jury. It is too clear for argument, under the authorities, that most of the evidence excepted to was not competent on the question of liability, and the defendant does not seriously contend that it was.

It is argued, however, that it was competent on the question of damages, and the jury were instructed to consider it only on that question. There is much authority for the proposition, that in a suit of this kind, when a plaintiff seeks damages for an injury to her feelings, growing out of the indecency of the defendant's conduct, her character in regard to chastity is in issue, and her damages depend somewhat on the question whether she is a virtuous woman, who would be greatly shocked at the peculiar nature of the assault, or a woman who is accustomed to yield herself to illicit intercourse. If it were permissible to show specific acts of criminal intercourse on the part of the plaintiff to affect the damages to be awarded in actions for an indecent assault, it would not follow that the evidence excepted to in the present case should have been admitted. Most, if not all, of this testimony tended to prove, not that the plaintiff had had criminal intercourse with other men, but that she had falsely pretended that others had indecently assaulted her, with a view to extort money from them. The rule contended for certainly should not be extended so far as to admit testimony of common crimes and ordinary wrongful acts, merely to show general depravity.

But we are inclined to hold the evidence incompetent on broader grounds. It is a general rule, which has been adhered to with great strictness in this Commonwealth, that when character is in issue, it may be shown only by evidence of general reputation, and not by proof of specific acts. . . . The principal reason for this rule is that a multiplicity of issues would be raised if special acts, covering perhaps a lifetime, could be shown. It might be necessary to go into the circumstances attending each act before it could be determined what its nature was and what effect should be given it. It would be impossible for the opposing party to come prepared to meet evidence upon matters in regard to which he had no notice, and great injustice might be done by bearing biased and false testimony to which no answer could be made. . . .

Exceptions sustained.

56. CUNNINGHAM v. AUSTIN & NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY CO.

Supreme Court of Texas. 1895

88 Tex. 534; 31 S. W. 629

Certified question from Court of Civil Appeals for Third District, in an appeal from Travis County.

Appellant sought to recover damages for the death of her husband, James Cunningham, a conductor on one of appellee's trains, caused by a wreck occasioned by the breaking of a car-wheel running from Llano to Austin on the 22nd day of December, 1892. The petition charged the negligence to consist in the fact that the wheel had a crack or flaw in it, which was known to appellee, or could have been known by the use of ordinary care; and that appellee's car inspector (Rownie) at Llano, whose duty it was to carefully inspect wheels before the same left Llano, was incompetent to perform the duties required of him, and that on the day of Cunningham's death he did not inspect said wheel, as was his duty.

There was testimony tending to show that there was an old crack in the wheel, and that it could have been discovered by an inspection made by a competent inspector. The witness Rownie, for defendant, testified, that he inspected the wheel on the morning of the accident, at Llano, he being the only inspector on the road outside of Austin, and during the time inquired about hereafter, and it being his duty to inspect the cars at Llano on said dates, and that at the date of such inspection he could discover nothing wrong with the wheel. On cross-examination the witness Rownie testified, that the reason he said he inspected it on December 22nd was because he understood the accident was on that date, and because he inspected that car every day it was in Llano, and that he did not think there was any other reason for his remembering it, only that he knew he inspected it every day; that he knew it was 7 o'clock that he looked over the coach on that morning, because that was the hour he always went to work. Counsel for appellant thereupon asked the witness whether he inspected the cars at Llano on the 23rd and 27th days of December, 1892; January 6, 1893; February 21, 1893; March 9, 1893, and April 4, 1893, all subsequent to the date of the accident; counsel stating, that the object of the question was to prove by Rownie that on said dates he had not inspected the wheels of appellee's trains at Llano, and if he stated that he had inspected them on any one or all of the above dates, then to offer witnesses who would testify that he did not inspect them on either of said dates. Counsel for appellee objected to this testimony as being incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not tending to prove any issue in the case, and that, since appellant was seeking to recover for an injury inflicted on the 22nd of December, 1892, anything that Rownie may or may not have done after that date was wholly irrelevant and immaterial, and that on such matters the witness could not be impeached.

The Court sustained the objections, and refused to allow the questions.

J. L. Peeler, for appellant. Where a person is charged with negligently omitting to perform a certain duty, it is competent to show that he omitted such duty in the same way afterwards, as tending to show that he omitted the duty at the time in question. . . .

Fisher & Townes, for appellee. The question may be thus stated: Is it permissible, on the cross-examination of a servant shown to be competent and efficient, to make inquiry as to his acts or omissions, transpiring subsequently to the act or omission complained of, where they are similar to, but in nowise connected with, the act or omission, or one of the acts or omissions, relied upon as constituting the negligence contributing to or causing the injury complained of? . . . Similarity of a fact in issue to a disconnected fact sought to be proven will not render admissible evidence of such disconnected fact. The relation between the two must be something in addition to mere similarity. It must amount to causal connection. There is no such connection between the fact in issue in this case and the fact sought to be proven in the testimony excluded. While it may be true, in some sense, that proof of neglect of duty by the inspector on dates subsequent to the 22nd of December, 1892, might have a tendency to prove his neglect of duty on that day, the law does not recognize this as a reason for opening up the interminable issues that would grow out of the adoption of a rule which would permit such testimony. The relation between the facts is merely one of similarity; that is, if he neglected the duty on subsequent dates, similar neglect of duty might be inferred on that date. This is the extent to which the argument in favor of the admission of the testimony could go, and this we see from the authorities is not sufficient. There is no causal connection between the fact in issue and the fact sought to be established by the offered proof. . . .

DENMAN, J. . . . If there was no issue in this case as to Rownie's competency, we are of the opinion that there would be no causal connection between the negligence of Rownie on days subsequent to the injury and the death of Cunningham. Such subsequent neglect of duty to inspect cars might raise a moral probability that he failed to inspect the car on the morning of the accident, but such probability alone would not connect such negligence with the chain of circumstances resulting in the death. In order to prevent confusion and surprise in the trial of causes of this character, Courts have, as a general rule, confined the evidence to circumstances tending to establish facts constituting links in the chain of circumstances having a causal connection with the injury.

The pleadings and evidence, however, raise the issue as to Rownie's competency as a car inspector which involves, first, his skill; and, second, his attentiveness to duty. If he was lacking in either of these qualities, he could not be said to be competent to perform the important duties required of him. It is a matter of common knowledge that some persons are by nature inattentive or thoughtless, and, as a result thereof, frequently neglect the performance of important duties, without any intention so to do. This mental quality can only be evidenced by the outward acts of the person, and, where its existence or non-existence is in issue, evidence of such acts is admissible. If Rownie was an inattentive or thoughtless person, such mental quality was a relevant fact upon the issue as to whether he probably inspected the cars on the particular morning of the accident. . . . Thus it seems that frequent failures to perform this duty at different times would be competent evidence tending to prove this mental condition, and we see no reason why such omissions subsequent to the time of the accident would be less competent than similar omissions prior to the time of the accident. The question here is the existence or non-existence of a mental condition or quality of the servant; inattentiveness or thoughtlessness, rendering him incompetent, such incompetency being direct evidence on the main issue in the case. We see no reason why specific acts cannot be given in evidence upon such issue, just as they could upon the issue of testamentary or contractual capacity.

. . . In the case of Frazier v. Railway, 38 Pa. St. 104, one of the issues being negligence of the company in employing a careless conductor, "the plaintiff offered to prove by the conductor that he had had several collisions on the road before, for which he was fined by the company, and that the agents, etc., of the company knew this; that the former collisions were caused by his carelessness; that they were known to the company, and were so treated by them." Defendants objected, on the ground that previous acts of negligence are not matters for the jury as to general character, and the Court below having admitted the evidence over such objection, the Supreme Court held it error. . . . We are not disposed to follow this case. . . . The question here is the existence or non-existence of a mental condition or quality of the servant, inattentiveness or thoughtlessness, rendering him incompetent, such incompetency being direct evidence on the main issue in the case. We see no reason why specific acts cannot be given in evidence upon such issue, just as they could upon the issue of testamentary or contractual capacity. Brown v. Mitchell, 87 Texas, 140. We are aware of the fact that the Pennsylvania case above cited was referred to, without approval or disapproval, in the case of Railway v. Scott, 68 Texas, 694, and that such reference was treated by Judge Marr as a strong intimation of approval thereof, in Railway v. Rowland, 82 Texas, 171. . . .

It results, from the principles expressed above, that we must answer the question propounded in the affirmative. Exception sustained.

58. PITTSBURGH RAILWAYS COMPANY v. THOMAS

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS. 1909

174 Fed. 591

IN Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania. Action by David T. Thomas against the Pittsburgh Railways Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

James C. Gray, for plaintiff in error. Rody P. Marshall, for defendant in error. Before GRAY, BUFFINGTON, and LANNING, Circuit Judges.

GRAY, Circuit Judge. The defendant in error, David F. Thomas (hereinafter called the plaintiff), brought suit against the Pittsburgh Railway Company, the plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the defendant), to recover damages for injuries to the said plaintiff, occasioned by the alleged negligence of the defendant. There was a verdict, and judgment thereon, in favor of the plaintiff. From the record brought up by the writ of error sued out by the defendant, it appears that the defendant was a corporation of the state of Pennsylvania, operating certain electric street railways in what was formerly called the city of Allegheny, but what is now a part of the city of Pittsburgh. On the 27th day of November, 1907, the plaintiff was a conductor on a motor car on one of the lines in said city. When he arrived at the end of said line, it became his duty to attach a trailer car, which was standing there, to what was then the front of his car but which would be the rear of his car on the return trip to the city. The motorman, one Conway, having stopped the car a distance of from two and a half to five feet from the trailer car, the plaintiff went between the two cars for the purpose of coupling them, and, standing somewhat to one side and holding the drawhead and pin, one in each hand, made a signal to the motorman to move his car up in order to make the coupling. The plaintiff says that after the signal was given, the car came so quickly that he remembered nothing, except that it caught him and crushed him between it and the trailer.

The negligence charged by the plaintiff's statement of claim is the primary negligence of the defendant, as master, in employing Conway, the motorman, who, it was alleged, was incompetent, to the knowledge of the defendant, or in retaining him in its employ after it had, or should have had, knowledge of his incompetence.

The third specification of error raises the interesting question, whether prior specific acts of alleged negligence on the part of the motorman can be submitted to the jury, in order to establish his incompetency or unfitness. This question is a difficult one, and the decisions of the courts have not been uniform in regard to it. On the one hand, it is held that only evidence of general reputation of incompetency or unfitness, and not knowledge of specific acts of negligence, can be admitted to make a master amenable to the charge of negligence in selecting a servant. "Character," says the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in Frazier v. P. R. R., 38 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467, "grows out of special acts, but is not proved by them. Indeed special acts do very often indicate frailties or vices that are altogether contrary to the character actually established. . . . Besides this, ordinary care implies occasional acts of carelessness, for all men are fallible in this respect, and the law demands only the ordinary." This is true, and the Courts constantly make the discrimination, where the question is as to the veracity of a party or witness, between character or reputation and specific acts of falsehood. But it would be unphilosophical and do violence to the common sense and experience of mankind, to say that there may not be repeated specific acts showing incompetence or unfitness in a particular employment, or a continued line of conduct amounting to a habit of negligence in the performance of a given duty, as would render one, with knowledge of such specific acts or such a habit on the part of the person he was about to employ, negligent of his duty to those who should thereafter come within the danger of such incompetence or negligence. But we have no hesitation, where the question is as to negligence of the master in retaining a servant in his employ after he knows, or has reason to know, that he is incompetent or unfit for the service for which he is employed, in holding that previous specific acts of the servant, tending to show incompetence or unfitness on his part, which were or should have been known by the master, are admissible in proof of the master's negligence. The practical application of this proposition requires to be guarded by such instructions from the Court as shall make clear the essential difference between mere negligence and incompetency. A man perfectly competent in all respects for the duty he undertakes to perform, may occasionally be negligent, so that one or two specific acts of negligence do not prove incompetence. It must be either shown that the so-called negligent acts were the result of incompetence, or were of such a character and so constantly committed as to constitute a habit of negligence, rendering the servant unfit to be retained in his position, for unfitness, as well as incompetency, is a disqualification for employment.

Keeping in mind these distinctions, we come to consider the specifications of error pertinent thereto. The two specific accidents in which the motorman, Conway, was concerned, and which were adduced to show incompetence on his part, taken by themselves, hardly present sufficient ground for the inference sought to be drawn from them. Their character is principally proved by the motorman himself, and his explanation of the circumstances under which they occurred would seem to exonerate him from responsibility or blame. In one case, he testifies that he ran into the rear of a car which had suddenly stopped by reason of bumping into another car ahead of it. As it was in the early hours of a November morning and very foggy, he testifies that he could only see ahead as far as his headlight shone, about fifteen yards, and that the fog had made the rails so slippery that, by reason thereof, he was unable to stop his own car in time to avoid the collision. In the other case, which happened in the previous September, he testified as follows:

"The Rebecca Street car was going ahead of me, up Preble avenue, and there is a bridge there for the people going up California avenue, and just as his car was passing, an old man got off the bridge and signaled for the motorman ahead of me to stop the car. It was not a regular stop, and I was coming after him about fifty yards, and before I could stop my car, I slightly touched him."

This is practically the only evidence as to the happening of the two accidents, evidence of which was introduced, not to show negligence, for that would not have been pertinent, but to show incompetence. Standing alone, they do not have probative force in that respect, and should have been withdrawn from the consideration of the jury.

There was, however, other evidence undoubtedly pertinent, as tending to show incompetence. This was the testimony of several of the conductors and motormen who daily congregated, to the number of thirty or forty, in the car barn to the effect that the reputation of Conway, for competence as a motorman, was bad. Undoubtedly, great weight was added to this evidence of reputation by the admission of the testimony in regard to the previous accidents to which reference has been made, and the Court, with entire correctness and fairness, submitted to the jury the general questions as to reputation and as to the facts surrounding the accidents.

But our attention has been called to certain language used by the learned judge of the Court below, as set forth in the last four assignments of error. . . .

The use of this language was evidently the result of inadvertence on the part of the trial judge, but this inadvertence, in the course of the delivery of an oral charge, could hardly fail to confuse in the minds of the jury the distinction that exists between incompetence and the mere negligence of one who is competent.

For reasons stated, the judgment below is reversed, and a venire de novo ordered.

59. DELPHI v. LOWERY

74 Ind. 520

From the Carroll Circuit Court.

C. R. Pollard, L. E. McReynolds, J. R. Coffroth and C. B. Stuart, for appellant. J. Applegate and N. O. Ross, for appellee.

Elliott, J. — The questions, which the record of this case presents, arise upon the ruling denying appellant's motion for a new trial. William A. Lowery, the appellee's intestate, lost his life by drowning in the Wabash and Erie canal, at a point within, or near, the corporate limits of the city of Delphi. There was evidence tending to prove that the intestate's death was attributable to the negligence of the appellant in failing to place barricades about the dangerous place, or to guard it by signals or warnings of danger. There was also evidence tending to show that it was the duty of the city to properly protect passengers from danger, inasmuch as one of the public streets of the city either ran up to and across the dangerous place or terminated in very close and direct proximity to that point. . . . Evidence was given by the appellee, that other persons had received injuries at the place where the deceased was drowned, at times anterior to his death. This the appellant contends, with vigor and ability, was erroneous.

There is some conflict in the authorities. In Collins v. The Inhabitants of Dorchester, 6 Cush. 396 [post, No. 65] such evidence was declared incompetent. It was said to be "testimony concerning collateral facts, which furnished no legal presumption as to the principal facts, which furnished no legal presumption as to the principal facts in dispute, and which the defendants were not bound to be prepared to meet." . . . In Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401 [post, No. 66] the doctrine of Collins v. Dorchester is vigorously assailed in an unusually able and elaborate opinion, and the opposite doctrine declared to be correct, both upon reason and authority. In the recent case of Moore v. The City of Burlington, 49 Iowa 136, the Court adopted in effect, although not expressly, the rule declared in the New Hampshire case. The Supreme Court of Illinois declared, in the case of the City of Chicago v. Powers, 42 Ill. 169, that such evidence was competent. It was said in that case:

"It is insisted that the Court erred in admitting evidence that another person had fallen through the same bridge. If this evidence was admissible for any purpose, then it was not error. The action was based upon the negligence of the city in failing to keep the bridge properly lighted. If another person had met with a similar fate, at the same place, and from a like cause, it would tend to show a knowledge on the part of the city, that there was inattention on the part of their agents having charge of the bridge, and that they had failed to provide further means for the protection of persons crossing on the bridge. As it tended to prove this fact, it was admissible; and, if appellants had desired to guard against its improper application by the jury, they should have asked an instruction limiting it to its legitimate purpose."

In Kent v. The Town of Lincoln, 32 Vt. 591, it was held competent to prove that other persons than the complainant had, at previous times, been injured by the same defect in a highway. A similar ruling was made in the case of Quinlan v. The City of Utica, 11 Hun 217. This case was affirmed without comment by the Court of Appeals, 74 N. Y. 603. . . . This Court has adopted and enforced this doctrine. In the case of The Pittsburgh, etc., R. W. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 294, this question was exhaustively discussed, and the point expressly ruled. It was there held that evidence of specific facts was competent for the purpose of charging the corporation with notice.

We are unable to perceive any difference in principle between the case in hand and the class of cases of which those last cited are types. If specific acts are proper for the purpose of showing notice to the owners of machinery or the employers of servants, it must be competent for the purpose of showing notice to a municipal corporation, that there is a dangerous place within or very near the limits of the highway. The cases directly ruling the point here under immediate mention outweigh the cases in Massachusetts, for the latter are all built upon a single and not very carefully considered case. . . . It also seems to us that the doctrine of Collins v. Dorchester cannot be harmonized with Crosby v. Boston, 118 Mass. 71, but we deem it unnecessary to prolong this opinion by a discussion of the conflict between these two cases. New trial denied.

60. MORROW v. ST. PAUL CITY R. CO.

71 Minn. 326; 73 N. W. 973

APPEAL by plaintiff as administratrix of the estate of George Morrow, deceased, from an order of the district court for Ramsey County, BUNN, J., denying her motion for a new trial after a verdict for defendant by direction of the Court. Reversed.

C. D. & Thomas D. O'Brien, for appellant. Munn & Thygeson, for respondent.

START, C. J. The plaintiff's intestate, George Morrow, was injured by a collision between an electric and cable car of the defendant on March 22, 1895, and died two days thereafter as the result of his injuries. This action was brought to recover the damages which the widow and next of kin sustained by his death. . . . At and prior to the time Morrow was injured the defendant operated an electric railway, on which Morrow was a conductor, from Merriam Park east to Milton street in the city of St. Paul, where it connected with defendant's cable railway, which ran thence east to Broadway street. . . . At the time of the accident the electric car was being switched from the south to the north track, and Morrow was standing on the ground in the act of transferring the trolley from one wire to the other, in the discharge of his duty, when the cable train, upon which Seth Colbeth was the gripman, started forward, and collided with the electric car, and Morrow was caught between the bumpers, and so injured as to cause his death. There seems to be no controversy in this case that Morrow was not, but that Colbeth was, guilty of negligence, in the premises. The complaint charges that the cable was defective, and that the gripman operating the cable train was, to the knowledge of the defendant, incompetent. If the evidence upon either of these claims was such as to take the case to the jury, the trial Court erred in directing a verdict and in denying the motion for a new trial. . . . The trial Court was of the opinion "that there was not sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the question of the knowledge of defendant of the incompetency of the gripman, Colbeth, at the time of the accident, if he was incompetent, as the nature of the accident would indicate." We are of the opinion that there was. The burden of showing the incompetency of the gripman was clearly upon the plaintiff, and we shall assume, for the purposes of this appeal, that the burden of showing notice to the defendant of such incompetency was also on the plaintiff, although the evidence tends to show that the gripman was incompetent not only at the time of the accident, but also at the time he was employed. . . . The evidence as to his incompetency was clearly such as to require the submission of this issue to the jury. We shall not refer particularly to the evidence on this point, but in a general way only, in connection with the evidence on the question of notice to the defendant. Whether the defendant had notice of the incompetency of the gripman was a matter peculiarly within its knowledge; and, further, if such incompetency existed at the time he was employed by the defendant, such fact would be an important item of evidence on the question of notice. These suggestions must be kept in mind in considering the evidence.

The gripman, Colbeth, was, prior to his employment by the defendant, a farmer, unused to machinery, and was given instructions and examined by the defendant's foreman, George J. Burns, as to the duties of a gripman. It was the duty of Burns so to instruct and examine applicants for employment, and to report as to their qualifications to the superintendent; and if, after their employment, he had reason to change his opinion, so to report to the superintendent. On August 21, 1894, he reported Colbeth competent as a gripman, rating him 85 per cent., and he was employed, and placed on the extra list as an extra man. Four days after this an accident occurred, whereby the cable was cut by Colbeth's forgetting to open his grip when he came to the cut-off at the power house. This accident was reported to the superintendent by Burns, who testified as follows:

"Now, I notice that in this slip or report of yours to Mr. Smith with regard to Colbeth, you turned him in as, 'Gripman, O.K.' A. — Yes, sir. Q. — '——— the bearer is O.K?' A. — Yes, sir. Q. — Did you ever change your opinion upon that point? A. — Well, I might have changed my opinion after he got to running as a regular man, — while he was running as an extra man, — and still I might change my opinion after he got to be a regular man. Q. — Did you change your opinion? A. — I did, after the report was made out, so far as his running on the cable was concerned, at the time of that accident; yes, sir. Q. — Did you notify Mr. Smith of your change of opinion? A. — Well, I made a written report of that, — that case that occurred at that time. Q. — You notified Mr. Smith? A. — Yes, sir. Q. — Mr. Smith told you that you would give him another chance, anyway, didn't he? A. — Well, I think that is customary. Q. — Well, didn't Mr. Smith say that 'we'll give him another chance?' A. — Well, I wouldn't swear he did. . . .

On his re-cross and re-direct examination he further testified thus:

"Q. — You discovered the fact that after he had been running [running after this accident] he got to be a capable and competent man, — after that? A. — He was a good man on the extension. No question about that. Q. — I mean, was he a good man on the cable also? A. — I never had any fault to find with him when he was running any trips afterwards. Q. — He never had any other accidents with the cable than this one, did he? A. — No, sir; he did not. Q. — You say you found him a good man on the extension? A. — He was a good man. Q. — That is on the electric cars? A. — Yes, sir. Q. — Within a few days after he started to perform the duties of gripman, he cut the rope? A. — Yes, sir. Q. — Can that be done except by either negligence or incompetency? A. — Oh, yes, we have got good men that do it. Old men do it, too. Q. — How did this man do it? A. — He forgot to open his grip. Q. — Forgot to open his grip when he came to the cut-off? A. — Yes, sir; that is the way it happened."

Colbeth was at no time a regular gripman, but was employed most of the time as a motorman on the extension, or electric line, and was ordered to take extra cable trains, as gripman, as occasion might require. The evidence tends to show that he made in all about fifty trips on the cable trains from the commencement of his service to the date of Morrow's injury. It also tends to show that he was nervous, and liable to lose his presence of mind in an emergency; and, further, there was evidence tending to show that his general reputation was that he was incompetent. The evidence discloses other minor facts and circumstances which, standing alone, would be of little probative force on this question of notice, but, in connection with the rest of the testimony, they are entitled to consideration.

We are of the opinion that the evidence fairly shifted the burden as to defendant's notice of the incompetency of the gripman to it. It is true that a single act of negligence on the part of a servant who has previously shown himself competent and careful is not sufficient per se to charge the master with liability for retaining him in his service. But such is not this case, for the evidence tends to show that this gripman never was competent, and that, after the first accident, the defendant's foreman, in the line of his duty, so reported in effect to its superintendent. It was upon the report of this foreman that this gripman was employed, and shortly thereafter he again reported that he had changed his mind as to the gripman's competency. Surely, it was a question for the jury, if they found such to be the facts, to determine whether the defendant acted with reasonable care and caution in retaining Colbeth in its employment as a gripman, in view of the fact that upon the competency and fidelity of the gripman human lives depend.

Order reversed, and a new trial granted.

61. SPENCELEY v. DE WILLOTT

7 East 108

AT the trial of this action for usury before Lord ELLENBOROUGH C. J., at the sittings after last term at Westminster wherein the usury was alleged to have been committed by the defendant in a contract made by him with the French Marquis de Chambonas, the plaintiff's case was proved by the Marquis, who on his examination in chief swore, in substance, that the defendant had advanced to him the sums of money mentioned in the declaration, at the rate of about 10 per cent. per month, and not by way of partnership; and there was no question of the usury if the Marquis were believed. But the defendant's counsel, intending to discredit the witness, on cross-examination proposed to ask him what contract he had made with a Mr. Schullenburg, and with several other third persons from whom he had also taken up money, on the same and on other days on which the contract in question was made; and this, for the purpose of drawing from the witness the confession that he had taken up sums of money from those third persons on terms of confidence that he was to employ the money so raised according to his own discretion, (which he had suggested to them he was enabled to do to great advantage), and to share with them the profits whatever they might be; the defendant's counsel intending, if the witness answered in the affirmative, to draw from thence a conclusion that he had made the same contract with the defendant (which was suggested to be the fact) with whom as with those third persons he was living at the time in habits of frequent communication and familiarity. . . . Lord ELLENBOROUGH, however, refused to suffer the question to be put to the witness on his cross-examination, conceiving it to be entirely irrelevant to the issue in the cause. . . .

The plaintiff having obtained a verdict for £25,200, Erskine now moved for a new trial, first, on the ground of the rejection of the evidence proposed to be obtained upon the cross-examination of the witness. . . .

The COURT were all decidedly of opinion that it was not competent to counsel on cross-examination to question the witness concerning a fact wholly irrelevant to the matter in issue, if answered affirmatively, for the purpose of discrediting him if he answered in the negative by calling other witnesses to disprove what he said. That in this case, whatever contracts the witness might have entered into with other persons for other loans, they could not be evidence of the contract made with the defendant, unless the witness had first said that he had made the same contract with the defendant as he had made with those persons which he had not said. . . .

And the Court desired to have it understood, that they rejected the motion for a new trial on the first ground, and granted a rule nisi on the second ground alone, i.e., upon the affidavit of the publication and distribution of the plaintiff's statement of his case at the trial.

62. HOWE v. THAYER

17 Pick. 91

ASSUMPSIT against Thayer & Fellows to recover the value of a quantity of provisions furnished to the Mount Pleasant Institution in Amherst, between November, 1831, and April 7, 1832. Fellows was defaulted. Thayer pleaded to the action.

At the trial, before PUTNAM, J., the plaintiff proved that there had existed a partnership between the defendants and one Colton, as proprietors and conductors of the institution, commencing in 1827; that his account was kept with them under the name of the Mount Pleasant Institution, to a period after April 7, 1832; that in October, 1829, he made a written contract with them under that name, to supply them with meats; and that this contract, which expired by its terms in October, 1830, was renewed at that time, for another year, by the same agent of the institution and under the same name as before. The defendant, Thayer, contended that the partnership was dissolved on June 23, 1830; that at the time of such alleged dissolution, Fellows and one Newton formed a copartnership; and that after that, they alone were interested in the concern; and that he had given notice to the plaintiff of his withdrawal from the firm, and of the dissolution of the old partnership, on the morning after it took place. The witness who testified as to such notice, stated in chief, but not in answer to any question on the part of the defendants, that he was "confident all in the neighborhood were notified in two days." On the cross-examination of this witness, the plaintiff's counsel inquired whether he gave the same notice to the other creditors of the firm as he had testified that he gave to the plaintiff, and asked their names. To this the witness replied affirmatively, and mentioned the names of some of the persons to whom he had given such notice. The plaintiff thereupon offered several of the creditors named by the witness, to prove that he had not given them any such notice as he had stated. The defendant objected to the admission of this evidence; but the objection was overruled. . . .

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant excepted.

Forbes & Baker, for the defendant. . . . It was not competent for the plaintiff to introduce other creditors to contradict the defendant's witness as to the notice given by the witness to any other persons than the plaintiff himself. It could make no difference, in the present case, whether other creditors had or had not notice that Thayer had ceased to be a partner. The testimony went merely to prove a fact collateral and irrelevant to the issue. . . .

I. C. Bates, Dewey and E. Dickinson, for the plaintiff. . . . To the point, that under the circumstances, it was competent for the plaintiff to introduce witnesses to prove that they had not received from the defendant's witness such a notice as he had stated that he gave to them. Rice v. New England Mar. Ins. Co., 4 Pick. 439; Atwood v. Welton, 7 Conn. R. 66. . . .

Shaw, C. J., drew up the opinion of the Court. The object of this action is to charge the defendants jointly as partners, for provisions furnished to the Mount Pleasant Institution. The defendant, Fellows, has admitted his liability, by a default; the defendant, Thayer, denies his liability as a partner, and has pleaded to the action. . . . The Court are also of opinion, that the direction in regard to the burden of proof was right, which was, that it was incumbent on the plaintiff in the first instance to prove the defendant, Thayer, a partner, and if this were done, he would be liable, unless he could prove a dissolution, as it regarded himself, and notice of it to the plaintiff, before the supplies. . . .

In respect to the admission of the evidence, that the witness had given a different notice to the other creditors, from that which he stated that he had given to the plaintiff, we are of opinion, that it was rightly admitted. . . . It was material to the issue, not only to show that the witness had given some notice, but the form, substance, and particulars of that notice. It was offered as proof of notice to the plaintiff as a creditor, of the general dissolution of the copartnership carrying on the business of the Mount Pleasant Classical Institution. The plaintiff denied this, and insisted that it was a notice of a different character. The witness stated that he gave notice to all the creditors and customers of the institution at the same time. We think the effect of his testimony was, that he gave to them all, the notice of a general dissolution of the partnership, and that the defendant Thayer had ceased to be concerned. It is then manifest that he intended to give the same notice to all standing in the same relation, and the natural inference would be that he did so. When therefore it was offered to show, that he gave a different notice in form, substance, and effect, to others standing in the same relation, it is not merely to show that the witness is not to be believed, because he has made different statements at different times, indicating a want of recollection or integrity, but it is a fact bearing upon the issue, namely, what was the form and substance of the notice which he in fact gave to the plaintiff. Like all inferences from circumstances, it is founded on experience. A man goes forth to a class of persons, standing in the same relation, to give them a notice affecting their interests alike. If there are ten, and he gives a particular notice to nine, it leads to a probable inference that he gave a like notice to the tenth, where he states that he intended to make no distinction, and believes that he notified all alike. Its tendency is not, therefore, merely to bear upon the credit of the witness, but upon a material fact involved in the issue, to be proved either by the testimony of that witness, or by any other evidence, positive or circumstantial, which is competent and relevant. . . .

Judgment on the verdict.

63. AIKEN v. KENNISON

SUPREME COURT OF VERMONT. 1886

TROVER for the conversion of a horse. Trial by jury, ROSS, J., presiding. Verdict for the defendant.

The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that on the defendant's request, he, plaintiff, told him he would purchase a horse for him, and that defendant might have the horse when he paid for it; that defendant consented, and that thereupon he gave him the following writing to take to one Miller: "Plin Miller: if you trade with E. A. Kennison for a horse, I will pay you for him about the middle of this month. (Signed) G. W. Aiken." On the same day, January 9, 1883, the defendant took the writing to said Miller, traded for the horse, and took it into his possession. At the same time the plaintiff made the following entry in his book in his account against defendant: "January 9. Horse of Pliny Miller." The plaintiff's evidence further tended to show, that on February 16, 1883, he gave a written consent to the defendant that he might exchange this horse for another horse, provided he, plaintiff, had the money paid in exchange, and also a lien on the second horse; that the defendant exchanged the horse, and soon after sold the one received. The defendant denied that plaintiff ever had any interest in or lien upon either of said horses; and his evidence tended to show that he made the purchase of the horse from said Miller in his own name and right, and took a bill of sale from said Miller therefor at the date of the purchase; that plaintiff gave him the writing before mentioned merely for the purpose of assuming the payment of said horse, and not for the purpose of purchasing the said horse for himself, or of acquiring any lien on it.

On the trial the plaintiff produced his book showing his account with the defendant, and showing the entry in pencil above named, and the same were put in evidence without objection. The plaintiff's counsel then proposed to ask the plaintiff, upon his examination in chief, whether he had had other transactions of a similar nature with other people dealing with him. The evidence was excluded. . . .

Crane & Alfred, for the plaintiff. There was error in excluding the evidence offered to show that the plaintiff had had other transactions with other people of a similar nature. . . .

L. H. Thompson, for the defendant. The evidence excluded by the Court related to matter wholly inter alios. It had no tendency to prove that plaintiff had a lien on the horse. . . .

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

ROWELL, J.— Phelps, Dodge & Company v. Conant & Co., 30 Vt. 277, is sufficient authority against the first exception; but as "frequent recurrence to fundamental principles" is as necessary in law as in liberty, we will advert to the general rule under which such evidence is excluded. The maxim "res inter alios acta," that a transaction between two persons ought not to operate to the disadvantage of a third, though somewhat obscure in its application, because it does not show how unconnected transactions should be supposed to be relevant to each other, and though failing in its literal sense, because it is not true that a man cannot be affected by a transaction to which he is not a party, is nevertheless one of the most important and most practically useful maxims of the law of evidence. It means, as Mr. Justice STEPHEN says, that you are not to draw inferences from one transaction to another, that is not specifically connected with it, merely because the two resemble each other; that they must be linked together by the chain of cause and effect in some assignable way before you can draw your inference. Stephen, Digest of Evidence, 198, note vi. But this rule has its exceptions; and one of them is — which is claimed to be applicable here — that where the question is whether a thing was done or not, the existence of any course of office or business according to which it naturally would or would not have been done, is a relevant fact.

But, as here was no offer to show any such course of office or business, the case is not brought within this exception; and as there is no other exception to the rule within which it is brought, it is left to stand on the rule itself, which, as we have seen, excludes similar but unconnected facts. 1 Wharton, Evidence, § 29. Mr. Phillipps says it is considered in general that no reasonable presumption can be drawn as to the making or the execution of a contract by a party with one person in consequence of the mode in which he has made or executed similar contracts with other persons. 1 Phillipps, Evidence, 748. A reference to a few cases will serve to illustrate the rule. In assumpsit for use and occupation, the question being whether the rent was payable quarterly or half-yearly, Lord KENYON would not allow the plaintiff to show that his other tenants like the defendant paid their rents quarterly, and said that it had been solemnly determined in a trial at the bar that evidence of the custom of one manor was no evidence of the custom of an adjoining manor. Carter v. Pryke, Peake 95. So where the question was upon the custom of tithing in the parish of A., evidence that such a custom existed in adjoining parishes was excluded, the custom not being laid as a general custom of the whole country. Furneaux v. Hutchins, Cowp. 807. And see Spenceley v. De Willott, 7 East 108 [ante, No. 61]. . . .

Judgment affirmed.

64. BOCK v. WALL

207 Mass. 506; 93 N. E. 821

PETITION, filed on August 2, 1906, under R. L. c. 196, for damages sustained by the petitioners, upper riparian proprietors on the Stop River, by reason of the flooding of their land by water set back by the respondent's dam below them. The respondent in her answer alleged "that she and those under whom she claims have had peaceable possession and occupation of said mill and water works and dam and have maintained said dam at its present height for more than twenty years prior to the first day of August, 1903." The case was tried in the Superior Court before WAIT, J. The jury found for the respondent; and the petitioners alleged exceptions. The facts material to these exceptions are stated in the opinion.

R. Clapp, for the petitioners. H. E. Ruggles (J. B. Crawford with him), for the respondent.

SHELDON, J. — The question contested was whether the respondent's dam had been maintained at its present height for more than twenty years before the bringing of the petition. The evidence was conflicting. There was evidence that in 1876 one Campbell owned the respondent's premises and an adjacent piece of land upon which a pond had been created by this dam. The respondent was allowed to put in evidence a deed of the adjacent land given in March, 1876, by Campbell to the New York and New England Railroad Company, in which deed Campbell covenanted for himself and his heirs and assigns to maintain this dam "to at least its present height," so that the water in the pond should not be drawn down below its level then existing. The petitioner contends that this was erroneous.

In our opinion the deed was rightly admitted. It created, or could be found to have created, an obligation upon Campbell and his successors in title to keep the dam at the same height that it then was; and there was evidence that this was the same height at which it had been ever since maintained. The deed brought about a permanent condition of affairs affecting the use of Campbell's estate and imposing a duty upon all future owners thereof. The existence of such a duty and obligation furnished a motive, perhaps a strong motive, on the part of Campbell and his successors to comply with its requirements and thus avoid the liability under which they otherwise might be placed. But when it is disputed whether certain persons have done a certain act, the existence of a motive on their part to do or to refrain from doing that act is relevant. Hanson & Parker v. Wittenberg, 205 Mass. 319, 327. This is the underlying element in such cases as Clark v. Brown, 120 Mass. 206, and those cited in Conklin v. Consolidated Railway, 196 Mass. 302, 306. The rule has been frequently applied in criminal cases, in which it is held that while the prosecution is not obliged to show a motive for the commission of an alleged crime, evidence of the existence of such a motive is competent and material. Commonwealth v. Richmond, 207 Mass. 240. Commonwealth v. Jeffries, 7 Allen 548, 566. The rule is stated and the authorities are collected in 12 Cyc. 149, 150.

It follows that this deed was rightly admitted, not as a declaration of the grantor, but to show that he and his successors had a motive to do what the respondent contended that they did do, and thus to corroborate the other evidence upon which she relied. . . .

Exceptions overruled.

Topic 3. Specific Events or Acts as Evidence of a Condition or Cause, etc., in External Inanimate Nature.[1]

65. COLLINS v. DORCHESTER

6 Cush. 396

THIS action was brought for an injury received by the plaintiff in December, 1847, by reason of a defect in a highway, which the defendants were bound to keep in repair. The trial was in the Court of Common Pleas, before HOAR, J., to whose rulings and instructions the plaintiff excepted.

The highway in question passed through a marsh, and was made smooth and passable for the width of at least thirty-one feet; and, on each side, at the edge of and along the road there was a row of posts about six feet apart, extending on each side for twenty rods or more, which had been standing for many years. The plaintiff drove his chaise against one of the posts, so that one wheel passed outside of and locked upon the post; and this accident was the occasion of the injury complained of. It appeared that two or three of the posts, at about the place where the accident occurred, were broken down or removed. The alleged defect was the want of a railing at the place where the accident occurred. . . .

The plaintiff, having introduced evidence of the injury, and of the circumstances under which it occurred, proposed to prove, by one Sprague, that before the happening of the accident complained of, the witness was riding over the same road, at or near the same place, and under similar circumstances, and that an accident similar to the one in question then occurred, which was caused by the same alleged defect, and without any neglect or fault on the part of the witness. But the plaintiff stated, at the same time, that he did not expect to prove, that the defendants had any notice of this accident. The proposed evidence being objected to, the presiding judge ruled, that for the purpose of proving notice to the town, the plaintiff might show, that any inhabitant of Dorchester had known or heard of accidents upon the highway in question; but, that for the purpose of proving the way defective, the plaintiff could not be allowed to show the circumstances of another accident alleged to be similar, as that would raise a collateral issue, and result in testing one point in dispute by another. The evidence was accordingly rejected. . . .

F. Hilliard, for the plaintiff. J. J. Clarke and N. F. Safford, for the defendants.

METCALF, J.: The testimony of Sprague, that he, before the injury complained of by the plaintiff, received a similar injury, at or near the same place, without any negligence on his part, was not competent for the purpose of proving that the road was defective at the time and in the place of the plaintiff's injury. It was testimony concerning collateral facts, which furnished no legal presumption as to the principal facts in dispute, and which the defendants were not bound to be prepared to meet. Standish v. Washburn, 21 Pick. 237; 2 Stark. Ev. 381 et seq.; 1 Greenl. on Ev., §§ 52, 448. . . . Exceptions overruled.

66. DARLING v. WESTMORELAND

52 N. H. 401

CASE by Charles Darling against the town of Westmoreland, for an injury caused by defects in a highway. Verdict for the defendants, and motion of the plaintiff for a new trial. The defects alleged by the plaintiff were, a pile of lumber by the side of the road likely to frighten horses, and an insufficient railing of a bridge. His claim was, that his horse was frightened by the lumber as he crossed the bridge, and ran back, and backed off the bridge. One ground of defense was, that the horse was vicious and unsafe, and much evidence was offered on that point on both sides. The plaintiff introduced the testimony of a Mr. Cressy, who testified that he rode past this pile of lumber with a Mr. Fletcher, and he offered to prove by him that Fletcher's horse was frightened by the lumber; but the Court rejected the evidence, and the plaintiff excepted.

Cushing & Lane & Healy, for the plaintiff. The fact that other horses were frightened by the same pile of lumber, tends to show that it was dangerous, and so an encumbrance, and also tends to rebut the defendant's claim that the plaintiff's horse was unsafe. But it is said, on the authority of Hubbard v. Concord, 35 N. H. 52, that this fact cannot be shown, because the attempt to show it raises a collateral issue which the opposite party cannot be expected to be prepared to try. It seems to us that this objection is entirely unfounded, either in principle or practice. . . .

Wheeler & Faulkner, for the defendants. With such respectable authorities to support the decision in Hubbard v. Concord as Greenleaf, Starkie, Phillipps, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and the uniform ruling at nisi prius of the Court of this State, for a period of at least twenty years prior to the decision in Hubbard v. Concord, any argument in support of the ruling here excepted to would seem superfluous.

Doe, J.: . . . One question of fact was, whether the pile of lumber was likely to frighten horses. . . . Was the fright of Fletcher's horse competent evidence on the question whether the lumber was likely to frighten horses? . . . On the independent and general question of the horse-frightening capacity of a certain pile of lumber, what rule of law considers the fright of [the plaintiff's] horse as important and disregards the fright of Mr. Fletcher's horse as of no consequence at all? . . . If the question were, whether the lumber was capable of floating in water, or making a good fire, or being sawed or cut or planed in a specific manner, or supporting horses and wagons passing over a bridge, there could be no legal objection to the trial of an appropriate experiment upon it in the presence of the jury, or to evidence of experiments that had been tried elsewhere. And there is no reason, outside of the technical rules of law, why its ability to frighten horses should not be tested out of Court, and proved in Court in the same manner. When we want to know whether a certain horse is skittish or is capable of a certain speed, whether a certain substance is poisonous and destructive of animal or vegetable life, whether certain materials are of a certain strength, whether a certain field or a certain kind of soil is likely to produce a certain kind or amount of crop, whether a certain man or brute or machine is likely to perform a certain kind or amount of work, or whether anything can be done or is likely to be done, one way is to speculate about it, and another way is to try it. The law is a practical science, and when it is appealed to to direct what means shall be used to find out whether a certain pile of lumber is likely to frighten horses, if any one asserts that, on this subject, the law prefers speculation to experience, abhors actual experiment and delights in guesswork, the person advancing such a proposition takes upon himself the task of maintaining it upon some legal rule, distinctly stated by him and well established by the authorities. Such a proposition is not sustained by the reason of the law. It is sustained by nothing that can be justly called a principle. By what technical rule, at war with reason and principle, is it supported?

The very few authorities tending to sustain the exclusion of the fright of Fletcher's horse in this case, are based upon the authority or the reason of the decision in Collins v. Dorchester, 6 Cush. 396 [ante, No. 65] and two other Massachusetts cases which rest upon that case. . . . A consideration, substantially disposing of the very few authorities that have any considerable tendency to sustain the ruling in this case, is, that Collins v. Dorchester, on which the others are based, is no authority for the exceptional doctrine it has been supposed to establish. That case being no foundation for the others, and they having no other foundation, they all fall together.

In that case the judge ruled that this evidence was not competent for the purpose of proving the way defective. The whole of the decision of the question raised by that ruling was this: "The testimony of Sprague, that he, before the injury complained of by the plaintiff, received a similar injury at or near the same place, without any negligence on his part, was not competent for the purpose of proving that the road was defective at the time and in the place of the plaintiff's injury. It was testimony concerning collateral facts, which furnished no legal presumption as to the principal facts in dispute, and which the defendants were not bound to be prepared to meet. Standish v. Washburn (21 Pick. 237). Even a judgment recovered by Sprague against the defendants for damages sustained by him by reason of a defect in the road, would not be admissible in evidence in favor of the plaintiff."

In that case, a sufficient railing on the posts would have prevented the plaintiff's wheel going outside of the post with which his carriage came in contact. The question was, whether, in the undisputed condition of the road, the absence of such railing, exposing travellers to the danger of their wheels going outside of and locking upon the posts, was a defect. No experiment or experience of the plaintiff, or Sprague, or any one else, was necessary to show that the posts were capable of being run against. It does not appear that any such experiment or experience would assist the judgment of the jury on the question whether, in the undisputed condition of the road, the posts were likely to be run against. Such a case is no authority for holding that the disputed horse-frightening capacity of a certain pile of lumber cannot be shown by experience. . . .

The only rule relied upon to exclude experimental knowledge in such a case as this, is the rule requiring the evidence to be confined to the issue, — that is to the facts put in controversy by the pleadings, prohibiting the trial of collateral issues, — that is, of facts not put in issue by the pleadings, and excluding such evidence as tends solely to prove facts not involved in the issue. This rule merely requires evidence to be relevant. It merely excludes what is irrelevant. It is a rule of reason, and not an arbitrary or technical one, and it does not exclude all experimental knowledge. A fact as relevant and as directly involved in the issue of guilty or not guilty between these parties, as any fact in controversy, was the likelihood or probability of the lumber frightening ordinary horses. There was nothing collateral — that is, nothing irrelevant — in that. . . .

When a trial is likely to be unreasonably protracted by a great number of witnesses impeaching or sustaining the character of other witnesses, the evil is not remedied by any principle of law prescribing the exact number. Many evils of that kind must necessarily be avoided by the judge determining, as a matter of fact, upon the circumstances of the case, where the line of reasonableness is. As to the number of experiments or experiences on many points, collateral in a certain sense, but relevant in the legal sense, it is impossible in the nature of the case for a limit to be fixed as a matter of law. But it does not follow that the law excludes all evidence of which it cannot measure a reasonable quantity.

Exceptions sustained.

67. MORSE v. MINNEAPOLIS & ST. LOUIS R. CO.

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1883

30 Minn. 465

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Freeborn County, FARMER, J., presiding, refusing a new trial.

This was an action to recover damages for the alleged negligence of defendant, causing the death of plaintiff's intestate while employed as an engineer on its railroad. One of the acts of negligence alleged to have contributed to the injury was defendant's allowing its track to become and remain out of repair; the defects in that respect consisting of a broken rail and defective switch, which caused the engine upon which the deceased was to be thrown from the track and upset. The rail and switch referred to were situated in the yard of defendant at Albert Lea, and near the water-tank, at which point the accident occurred.

The Court, against defendant's objection and exception, allowed plaintiff to show defects generally in all the numerous tracks in defendant's yard, from the round-house, whence the engine started, to the "place where the first work was to be performed," . . . [i.e.] the first snow-drift, situated a short distance ahead of the point where the accident occurred. The engine in question did not pass over any of these tracks except one, and there was nothing tending to show that any defects, except those at or near the place of the accident, in any way contributed to the injury complained of.

J. D. Springer, for appellant. Gordon E. Cole and J. H. Parker, for respondent.

MITCHELL, J. [after stating the facts as above]. 1. We think the admission of this evidence was error. The evidence, under the circumstances, should have been limited to those defects which caused or reasonably might have conduced to produce the injury. The mere existence of other defects in other parts of the road is not evidence that a similar defect existed at the place of the casualty, and caused it. The only exceptions to this rule which now occur to us are where the other defects were shown to be the result of a cause presumptively operating at the place of the casualty, or where such other defects might have caused the defect which produced the injury. But there are no facts bringing this case within any such exceptions. Defects in other tracks in the yard at Albert Lea had no more to do with producing this accident than defects a hundred miles distant. The fact that they were in the same vicinity does not alter the principle. If evidence of these was admissible, we see no reason why defects in any part of defendant's road might not have been shown. The effect of this evidence was to raise false issues. The defendant was not on trial for general negligence; nor was it liable to plaintiff for any acts of negligence except those which caused the injury complained of. L. & N. R. Co. v. Fox, 11 Bush (Ky.) 495; Grand Rapids & Ind. R. Co. v. Huntley, 38 Mich. 537; Pierce on Railroads, 293. . . .

2. There remains one other point which should be considered with reference to another trial. For the purpose of showing the defective character of the switch referred to, plaintiff was permitted to show that other engines and cars missed the track at the same point, both before and after the accident complained of. The competency of such evidence under any circumstances is by many Courts denied. This Court has held it to be competent. Phelps v. City of Mankato, supra; Kelly v. South. Minn. Ry. Co., 28 Minn. 98.

It is, of course, not competent for the purpose of showing independent acts of negligence. But we think on principle it is clearly admissible when it tends to show that the common cause of these accidents is a dangerous or unsafe thing. It would be certainly competent to prove by an expert that, at a time either before or after the accident when the instrument claimed to have caused it was in the same condition as when the accident complained of occurred, he examined and experimented with it, and found it capable of producing like results. Hence there seems no reason for excluding ordinary experience, when confined within the same limits and for the same purpose. These facts are in the nature of experiments to show the actual condition of the instrument. Upon any issue as to the condition or safety of any work of human construction designed for practical use, evidence showing how it has served, when put to the use for which it was designed, would seem to bear directly upon the issue. It is sometimes objected that this presents new and collateral issues of which a defendant has no notice. In a certain sense every item of evidence material to the main issue introduces a new issue; that is, it calls for a reply. In no other sense does it make a new issue; its only importance is that it bears on the main issue, and, if it does, it is competent. Evidence of similar accidents resulting from the same cause has often been held competent for the purpose referred to. Kent v. Lincoln, 32 Vt. 591; Quinlan v. Utica, 11 Hun 217; Willey v. Portsmouth, 35 N. H. 303; Chicago v. Powers, 42 Ill. 169; Piggot v. Eastern Cos. Ry. Co., 3 C. B. 229; House v. Metcalf, 27 Conn. 631; Hill v. Portland & R. R. Co. 55 Me. 438; Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401 [ante, No. 66].

But, to render such evidence competent, it must appear, or at least the evidence must reasonably tend to show, that the instrument or agency whose condition is in issue was in substantially the same condition at such times as it was at the time when the accident complained of occurred. As the evidence upon another trial may not be the same, we content ourselves with stating a general rule, without considering whether all the evidence of this kind introduced was competent within the rule suggested. . . .

We discover no other error, but for those already referred to a new trial must be granted. Order reversed.

68. MATTER OF THOMPSON

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1891

127 N. Y. 463; 28 N. E. 389

APPEAL from order of the General Term of the Supreme Court in the second judicial department, made May 13, 1889, . . . to assess the damages caused by the diversion of the water of the Bronx river from certain lands of Charles Butler. . . .

William Allen Butler, for appellant. . . . The commission erred in excluding the evidence offered by the claimant as to the actual value and rental value and the price paid by the city for the water-power in the Bronx river on premises immediately adjoining the claimant. . . .

Arthur H. Masten, for respondent. . . . It was not error on the part of the commission to reject evidence of what the city had paid for certain water-rights appurtenant to a neighboring parcel. . . .

PARKER, J. — This proceeding was brought pursuant to the powers conferred on the commissioner of public works of the city of New York, by chapter 445 of the Laws of 1877, and the various acts amendatory thereof, to acquire the right to divert, and keep diverted from the Bronx river, all the water of the river north of, and above the dam at Kensico.

The commissioners awarded to the claimant, who was the owner of a large and valuable farm through which the river ran, damages in the sum of $7,270. . . . The only exception to which our attention is called, relates to an effort, on the part of the owner, to prove what had been paid by the petitioner for water-rights appurtenant to a neighborhood parcel, on the same river. At folio 7467 the counsel for the owner offered to prove that the city of New York purchased from Robert White, the right to divert the waters from one-half of the water-shed of the Bronx river, and paying him the sum of $21,991.66, for such rights, and his privileges in connection with a certain mill, upon what is known as the Powder Mill property at Scarsdale. . . . And the question then is, was the rejection of the evidence as to the amount paid by the city for the White water-power, error for which a reversal should be had.

This question has been presented to the Courts of last resort in several of the States, but not with the same result. In Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin, it is held that actual sales of other similar land in the vicinity, made near the time at which the value of the land taken is to be determined, are admissible as evidence for the purpose of arriving at the amount of compensation. Gardner v. Brookline, 127 Mass. 358; Culbertson v. Blair Packing & Prov. Co. v. City of Chicago, 3 Ill. 651; Town of Cherokee v. S. C. & I. F. Town Lot & Land Co., 52 Iowa 279; Concord R. R. Co. v. Greely, 23 N. H. 242; Washburn v. Milwaukee & Lake Winnebago R. R. Co., 59 Wis. 364.

While in some of the other jurisdictions, notably Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Georgia, and California, it is held that sales of similar property are not admissible for the purpose of proving the value of property about to be taken. East Pa. R. R. Co. v. Hiester, 40 Pa. St. 53; P. & N. W. R. R. Co. v. Bunnell, 81 ibid. 414; Pa. S. V. R. R. Co. v. Ziemer, 124 560; Montclair R. Co. v. Benson, 36 N. J. L. 557; C. P. R. R. Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 247–262; Selma R. & D. R. R. Co. v. Keith, 53 Ga. 178.

The reasons assigned for the conclusions reached in the cases last cited are, in the main, that the test in legal proceedings is, what is the present market value of the property which is the subject of controversy? It may be shown by the testimony of competent witnesses, and on cross-examination, for the purpose of testing their knowledge respecting the market value of land in that vicinity, they may be asked to name such sales of property, and the prices paid therefor, as have come to their attention. But a party may not establish the value of his land by showing what was paid for another parcel similarly situated, because it operates to give to the agreement of the grantor and grantee the effect of evidence by them, that the consideration for the conveyance was the market value, without giving to the opposite party the benefit of cross-examination to show that one or both were mistaken. If some evidence of value, then prima facie a case may be made out so far as the question of damages is concerned by proof of a single sale, and thus the agreement of the parties, which may have been the result of necessity or caprice, would be evidence of the market value of land similarly situated and become a standard by which to measure the value of land in controversy. This would lead to an attempt by the opposing party to show, first, the dissimilarity of the two parcels of land; and, second, the circumstances surrounding the parties which induced the conveyance (such as a sale by one in danger of insolvency, in order to realize money to support his business, or a sale in any other emergency which forbids a grantor to wait a reasonable time for the public to be informed of the fact that his property is in the market). Or, on the other hand, that the price paid was excessive and occasioned by the fact that the grantee was not a resident of the locality, nor acquainted with real values, and was thus readily induced to pay a sum far exceeding the market value. Thus each transaction in real estate claimed to be similarly situated might present two side issues which could be made the subject of as vigorous contention as the main issue, and if the transactions were numerous it would result in unduly prolonging the trial and unnecessarily confusing the issues, with the added disadvantage of rendering preparation for trial difficult.

Our attention has not been called to a case in this court where the question has been passed upon in the manner here presented; but there are a number of decisions indicating the tendency of the Court to be against proving value by evidence of the selling price of similar property. . . .

Even under the Massachusetts rule, a reversal here would not be justified because of the extent of the discretion vested in the judge or officer presiding at the trial to determine whether such evidence is admissible, depending of course on various elements, such as the nearness or remoteness of the time of sale; whether the premises are far separated; the condition of the property about the parcel sold and the use made of it, which may have operated to enhance or diminish its selling value; the similarity of the property, not only as to description, but as to its availability for use. Chandler v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Co., 122 Mass. 305; Gardner v. Brookline, 127 ibid. 358–363, and cases cited. In point of time the White sale was a year and one-half prior to the date when the offer was made to prove it. The White water-power was in actual use in the operation of a mill, while the water-power of Mr. Butler had not been utilized in any degree whatever. True, as much water will be diverted from the Butler property as the White property, but it does not follow that the respective water-powers are of equal value. The value of a water-power depends on its availability for use. And as a matter of common observation, that at certain points along a stream the water-power can be more readily and cheaply made available for industrial purposes than at others. So, if appellant's contention as to the admissibility of evidence of that character could be allowed, we should necessarily reach the conclusion that the nature of the evidence offered as to similarity, was not of such a character as to authorize a Court to hold, as matter of law, that the commission improperly exercised their discretion in refusing to admit proof of the price paid for the White parcel. . . .

The order should be affirmed. All concur. Order affirmed.

TORT, for injuries occasioned to the plaintiff's person and property by reason of his horse becoming frightened at a flag suspended across a street in Spencer.

At the trial in the Superior Court, before ALDRICH, J., the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that the defendant, as one of a political committee, caused a campaign flag to be suspended and maintained across Main street, in Spencer; that the flag was raised in July, 1892, and continued to swing until after the presidential election of the same year; that it was suspended by a wire attached to buildings on opposite sides of the street; and it was about thirty-one feet in length and eighteen feet in width, and its lower edge, as suspended and when at rest, was about twelve feet above the central part of the travelled way; that on August 5, 1892, the plaintiff was driving from Maple street in Spencer on to Main street, and his horse, though a large and spirited animal, was safe and gentle in driving; that just as he was turning from Maple street into Main street, and coming in sight of the flag, and about thirty or forty feet distant from it, his horse became frightened at the flag, which was being floated gently by the breeze, and turned suddenly and ran a short distance, wrecking the plaintiff's carriage and harness, and injuring his person. . . . The jury returned a verdict for the defendant; and the plaintiff alleged exceptions.

A. P. Rugg, (J. R. Thayer with him,) for the plaintiff. F. B. Smith, for the defendant.

KNOWLTON, J. To maintain his case the plaintiff was obliged to show that the flag hung across the street was an object which was so likely to frighten horses as to render driving upon the street unsafe, and that in its position there it was a public nuisance. The fundamental question in the case was whether ordinarily safe and gentle horses would be frightened by it. The inquiry was in regard to the effect of an inanimate object upon an animal acting from instinct. The only way in which knowledge on this subject could ever be acquired is by observation of the effect of the object, or of similar objects, upon the animal. Inasmuch as no two flags hung in different places with different surroundings could ever present precisely the same appearance in different aspects to an unreasoning animal, the most satisfactory way of ascertaining the fact would be by observing the effect of this particular flag upon different horses. In all the observations and experiments, one factor in the problem, the swinging flag, would always be the same. The other factor, the horse, would always truly exhibit his real feelings, and the only possible difference in the results of different observations would arise from the difference in the horses. The question of fact whether a particular horse comes within the class of ordinarily safe and gentle horses is not difficult or complicated, and witnesses could easily give the results of their observations of the conduct of horses which they considered ordinarily safe and gentle. We are of opinion that the best way to decide the main question in dispute is to show whether ordinary horses have manifested fear of the flag as it hung over the street. The question is not whether the results of experiments with other ordinary horses might be introduced upon the question whether the flag frightened the plaintiff's horse, — although there is much authority for holding that, where the elements entering into the experiments are so nearly the same, the results may be shown to establish a fact of this kind. But the question is, how a certain kind of animal is commonly affected by the sight of a particular object.

To ascertain the truth, the jury must either use such knowledge as they happen to have on the subject without the aid of testimony, or experts must be called to give their opinions if the subject is one in regard to which experts can be found, or witnesses must be permitted to state particular facts which they have observed, each one of which is an illustration and example of the general fact in dispute. The only objection to testimony of the last kind in such a case is that in testing it collateral issues may be raised. Such an objection in many cases is a sufficient reason for excluding the testimony. Whenever a line of inquiry will give rise to collateral issues of such number and difficulty that they will be likely to confuse and distract the jury and unreasonably protract the trial, it should not be permitted. But the mere fact that a collateral issue may be raised is not of itself enough to justify the exclusion of evidence which bears upon the issue on trial. Most circumstantial evidence introduces collateral issues, and ordinarily it is a practical question, depending upon its relations to the other facts and circumstances in the case, whether it should be received. It may be remote from the real issue or closely connected with it, and in many cases its competency depends upon the decision of questions of fact, affecting the practical administration of justice in the particular case, such that a Court of law will refuse to revise the ruling of the presiding judge, but will treat his ruling as a matter of discretion.

. . . In the present case the only collateral inquiry which could arise is whether a horse called by a witness an ordinarily safe and gentle horse comes within that class. Such an inquiry is certainly simple. We think there would be no particular difficulty in receiving and weighing testimony in regard to the conduct of horses which seem to be like ordinary horses in common use.

This precise question has been decided in favor of the plaintiff's contention by many courts of the highest respectability, and we have been referred to no decisions to the contrary. . . . In Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401 [ante, No. 66], a suit for damages caused by the fright of a horse at a pile of lumber, evidence was received that other horses had been frightened by the same pile. . . . The Court of Appeals of New York takes a similar view of the law. Quinlan v. Utica, 11 Hun 217; s. c. 74 N. Y. 603. Wolley v. Grand Street & Newton Railroad, 83 N. Y. 121.

The defendant relies upon a line of cases in this Commonwealth, brought against cities or towns to recover for accidents received while travelling on highways, in which it has been held that a plaintiff cannot introduce evidence of other similar accidents occurring at the place where he was hurt for the purpose of proving that the way was defective. Collins v. Dorchester, 6 Cush. 396 [ante, No. 69]. Hall v. Lowell, 10 Cush. 260. Aldrich v. Pelham, 1 Gray 510; Kidder v. Dunstable, 11 Gray 342. Hinckley v. Barnstable, 109 Mass. 126. Schoonmaker v. Wilbraham, 110 Mass. 134. Merrill v. Bradford, 110 Mass. 505. The ground on which these cases were decided is, that such collateral inquiries would be opened (before the evidence could be properly received) as would multiply issues for the trial of which the parties had had no opportunity to prepare, and would lead away from the main issue and tend to confuse the jury. In most of these cases the facts and circumstances of other accidents were so diverse and complicated that the decisions rest on grounds which are generally deemed satisfactory. In others, if they were to be considered apart from authority, it may be that an effect of an attempt to pass on another occasion was so closely connected with the alleged defects, and so free from other possible contributing causes, that, as a simple experiment, it might well have been proved. Such evidence has sometimes been received in other jurisdictions. District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 519, 524. Morse v. Richmond, 41 Vt. 435. Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401 [ante, No. 66]. Calkins v. Hartford, 33 Conn. 57. Quinlan v. Utica, 11 Hun 217; S. C. 74 N. Y. 603. Delphi v. Lowery, 74 Ind. 520 [ante, No. 59]. Chicago v. Powers, 42 Ill. 169. Moore v. Burlington, 49 Iowa 136. Augusta v. Hafers, 61 Ga. 48. . . . This Court has established precedents in favor of the plaintiff's contention that accord with those which we have already cited from other Courts. In Reeve v. Dennett, 145 Mass. 23, upon the question of the effect of the use of a certain medicine in dentistry, evidence was received that dental operations performed by a certain dentist who used the medicine were less painful than those performed by other dentists who did not use it. In Brierly v. Davol Mills, 128 Mass. 291, to prove that an attachment would be effective on a certain loom, it was held competent to show that it worked successfully on another loom of similar construction. See also Gahagan v. Boston & Lowell Railroad, 1 Allen 187; Hunt v. Lowell Gas Light Co., 8 Allen 169. . . .

A majority of the Court are of opinion that the evidence offered should have been admitted. Exceptions sustained.

70. CENTRAL VERMONT R. CO. v. SOPER

United States Circuit Court of Appeals. 1894

59 Fed. 879; 8 C. C. A. 341

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. At Law. Action by John E. Soper and others against the Central Vermont Railroad Company for the loss of 3,600 bushels of grain, in the burning of a grain elevator owned by the defendant. Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiffs claimed, in the opening of their case, that the fire originated at the foot of what was known as the "lofting leg." This lofting leg was a piece of machinery by which the grain was carried from the bottom to the top of the elevator. The pulley at the bottom of the lofting leg made about ninety-six revolutions per minute; and the claim of the plaintiffs was that the bearings at the sides of this pulley had become heated, and thereby ignited the dust which had accumulated upon them, from which the fire was communicated to the building.— The plaintiffs introduced as a witness one Aaron Linton, who testified that he was for many years foreman in this elevator, and well acquainted with its construction and method of operation. The witness testified among other things, that the bearings of this pulley at the foot of the lofting leg were beneath the elevator floor, and were oiled by pouring oil into two pieces of pipe, about two feet long, which led from above the floor down into the bearings. He was allowed to testify, against the objection and exception of the defendant, that while he was foreman of the elevator these bearings frequently became heated, that there was a tendency for dust to accumulate at that point, and that there was also a tendency for the pipes to become clogged and filled with dust and grease. — Against the objection and exception of the defendant, a witness, O'Connor, was allowed to testify as follows:

"Q. — Did you ever know the bearings at the foot of the lofting leg to become heated? A. — I do.

"Q. — You have known it? A. — Yes, sir.

"Q. — How long prior to this time had you noticed it? A. — I do not remember.

"Q. — About how long before? A. — I do not remember.

"Q. — Was it a month? A. — It might have been less.

"Q. — You say it might have been a month. Would you say two weeks? A. — I do not remember.

"Q. — All I want to get at is your best understanding. A. — I will say a month.

"Q. — These bearings, you say, would become heated at this point? A. — Yes, sir.

"Q. — Would they ignite any dust or accumulations there? A. — Yes, sir.

"Q. — Have you ever known the dust to become ignited? A. — Yes, sir.

"Q. — Many times? A. — Once.

"Q. — Was this the time you were speaking of? A. — No, sir." . . .

There was no direct evidence in the case tending to show that any shaft in the defendant's elevator was out of line, or that the oil tubes to the bearings at the foot of the lofting leg, or to any other bearings in the defendant's elevator, had become clogged. All the foregoing testimony was introduced by the plaintiffs in the opening of their case. . . . The defendant claimed that, from all the circumstances in the case, it was evident that the fire was of incendiary origin. In reference to this aspect of the case, the Court instructed the jury: "Now, gentlemen, if you should find that this fire did not result from the defective appliances, or from the gathering debris, but was the result of incendiarism, the defendant will not be liable, provided the defendant furnished reasonable watchmen, and other reasonable protection against such hazard. . . ."

C. A. Prouty and Sigourney Butler, for plaintiff in error. The testimony of Mr. Linton, who was foreman at the elevator previous to 1887, that the bearings at the foot of the lofting leg frequently became heated, was inadmissible. The time referred to was more than three years before the happening of the fire. . . . That the employees, whose business it was to oil these bearings when Mr. Linton was foreman, in 1887, neglected their duty on some occasions, had no possible tendency to show that the employees of the defendant also neglected their duty at the time in question. It is not permissible to show that a person is habitually careless, as bearing upon the question whether he has been careless upon a particular occasion. Gahagan v. Railroad Co., 1 Allen 187; Maguire v. Railroad Co., 115 Mass. 239; Whitney v. Gross, 140 Mass. 232; Propsom v. Leathem (Wis.), 50 N. W. 586. . . .

Robert M. Morse (William M. Richardson and Charles E. Hellier, on the brief), for defendants in error. Linton's testimony was properly admitted. . . . The testimony is admissible as showing, and affecting the defendant with knowledge of, a dangerous condition of things at the particular place and as showing the possibility or probability of fire from the causes described. Railroad Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454; Piggot v. Railway Co., 3 Man. G. & S. 229; Sheldon v. Railroad Co., 14 N. Y. 218.

. . . Before COLT and PUTNAM, Circuit Judges, and NELSON, District Judge.

PUTNAM, Circuit Judge. . . . Those portions of the evidence of Linton and Jenkins which were objected to relate entirely to the tendency of things, — inanimate objects, — being, in this case, the machinery. The plaintiff in error has argued as though they related to the peculiar habits of certain specified human beings. The distinction is a broad one; and, if it is kept in mind, the evidence was clearly admissible, for the purpose, not of showing that the employees of the defendant below were negligent, but of showing facts, some of which the jury might, perhaps, have assumed without evidence; namely, that it is the tendency of certain parts of rapidly running machinery to get heated, and of dust in mills where grain is ground or stored to be of a highly inflammable character. These facts might have been properly brought to the attention of the jury, both for the purpose of showing a point where the fire might have originated, and also of showing the necessity of care to guard that point. Maguire v. Railroad Co., 115 Mass. 239, cited by the plaintiff in error, which related to the negligent acts on other occasions of the defendant's driver, for whose unskilfulness he was sued, is not in point. The fact that the tendency to get heated, and the inflammable character of the dust, were explained by witnesses, even if the jury might have assumed a part thereof as true without proof, cannot prejudice either party.

The testimony of O'Connor, objected to, goes a little further. He stated, in substance, that he had known of instances when the bearings at the foot of the lofting leg became heated, and that he had also known the dust to become ignited at this point. This evidence is clearly within the rule established in Railroad Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454, and in the other cases referred to in Railway Co. v. Johnson, 10 U. S. App. 629, 4 C. C. A. 447, 54 Fed. 474. . . .

As the case stands, the plaintiff in error must prevail, on its exception to the refusal of the learned judge to direct a verdict for it on the ground that it appeared that the plaintiffs below did not bring their action for the loss within three months after it occurred.

Judgment reversed. New trial ordered.

71. FISHMAN v. CONSUMERS' BREWING COMPANY

Supreme Court of New Jersey. 1909

78 N. J. L. 300; 73 Atl. 231

On appeal from the District Court of the city of Newark. Before Justices Reed, Trenchard, and Minturn.

For the appellant, Child & Carter (Riker & Riker, of counsel). For the appellee, Philip J. Schotland. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Minturn, J. The plaintiff's horse, top buggy, and other chattels incident thereto were destroyed by a fire, which, as plaintiff alleges, originated in a heap of ashes adjoining the stable of Nicholl & Company, where the property in question was kept. The ash heap was upon defendant's premises close to the stable, and the fire took place about half-past three o'clock of the morning of February 19, 1908. The plaintiff, over continuous objections, deemed it necessary for the purpose of his case, to ask the witness Martin these questions:

"Q. — To your knowledge was there a fire at the same place before this? A. — Yes, sir.

"Q. — When was that? A. — On the 14th of December, 1901.

"Q. — And did you make an investigation at that time? A. — Yes, sir.

"Q. — What did you find at that time might cause the fire? A. — Hot ashes against the weather boards.

"Q. — What burned at that time? A. — Weather boards.

"Q. — Did you make an investigation of the cause of those weather boards burning at that time? A. — Yes.

"Q. — Where were those weather boards you speak of? A. — About the same location as the last fire.

It further appeared from the testimony of this witness that after the 1901 fire a sheet-iron plate had been placed between the ash heap and the stable, and that when this witness reached the scene of the fire shortly after it started, that iron plate was not hot, but cool enough, indeed, to enable him to handle it. It will be perceived, therefore, that the conditions preceding the two fires were essentially different.

The only purpose, apparently, which could actuate the plaintiff in introducing this character of testimony as material to his cause, is the specious reasoning included in the proposition, post hoc, the fire of 1901 originated; ergo propter hoc, the fire in question must have so originated, and it requires no elaboration of argument to expose the fallacy of such a syllogism both in logic and in law. Relevancy of testimony, as defined by Stephen, is "that any two facts to which it is applied are so related to each other that, according to the common course of events, one, either taken by itself or in connection with other facts, proves or renders possible the past, present, or future existence or non-existence of the other." Steph. Dig. Ev. art. I. The testimony in the case made it quite manifest that, since the fire of 1901, conditions had changed, and precautions against fire had been taken by defendant, so that under no reasonable construction of the physical principle of cause and effect could this testimony be applicable. It is inadmissible because of its remoteness in point of time, during which interim changed conditions resulted; but, primarily, as is said in one case, "upon grounds of public policy to prevent the multiplication of issues in a case" without apparent connection. Costello v. Crowell, 129 Mass. 588; State v. Raymond, 24 Vroom 260; Collins v. New York Central Railroad Company, 109 N. Y. 243.

For this reason the judgment is reversed and a venire de novo is awarded.

72. ALCOTT v. PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATION

COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS OF NEW JERSEY. 1909

78 N. J. L. 482; 74 Atl. 499

ON error to the Supreme Court, whose opinion is reported in 48 Vroom 110.

For the plaintiff in error, John W. Wescott. For the defendant in error, Edward Ambler Armstrong. The opinion of the Court was delivered by PARKER, J. Judgment in favor of the plaintiff in error was reversed in the Supreme Court on the ground that the proof showed without contradiction that the switching device in which plaintiff's wagon wheel seems to have caught was of standard pattern, in common use, and had been properly laid and inspected. The propriety of that determination is now before us for review. The circumstances of the accident are set forth in the opinion of the Supreme Court and need not be here repeated in detail. . . .

There was evidence tending to show that the switch was out of order some days prior to the accident in question. This evidence was objected to by defendant, and an exception that was taken to its admission will be dealt with presently. Taken with the other evidence, a jury question was presented whether the switch was out of order and had been allowed to become so by negligence of the defendant, notwithstanding testimony on the part of the defendant that inspections were regularly made and that it was found in good condition.

The judgment of the Supreme Court, reversing the trial Court, should therefore be reversed unless justified by some error at the trial that would vitiate the judgment in the trial Court. Two points are urged by defendant in error: That the trial Court admitted testimony of other accidents at this same switch shortly before and shortly after the accident to plaintiff; and that the Court charged, in effect, that this testimony might be considered as throwing light on the question whether the switch was out of order at the time of the plaintiff's accident. It is claimed, on the authority of Bobbink v. Erie R. R., 75 N. J. Law 913, decided by this Court, that the testimony was improper, and that the Court should not have alluded to it in the charge. We think that the weight of later authority and the better reasoning favor the view that the action of the trial Court was proper. One witness testified that his wagon was stopped in a similar manner, by the wheel catching in the switch, some thirteen days before plaintiff had that experience. Another witness testified that three days after the accident, as a result of his own wagon catching in the switch, he examined it, and his description of it at that time corresponded closely with plaintiff's description of it at the time of the accident in question.

Professor Wigmore, in the sixteenth edition of "Greenleaf on Evidence" (volume 1, p. 81), lays down the doctrine that: . . .

"In evidencing a quality, tendency, capacity, etc., by instances of its effects or exhibitions or operations on other occasions, the natural and logical limitation is that the evidential instances should have occurred under substantially the same circumstances or conditions as at the time in question, because otherwise they might well be attributed to the influences of some other element introduced by the differing circumstances."

He concedes that the logical objection to this sort of evidence is the tendency to unfair surprise and confusion of issues; that, in addition, the tendency of the Courts has been to exclude this class of evidence in cases of deliberate experiment to test the particular quality, and in cases where it has been sought to show, in defense, that the place, or appliance, or what not, had long been in use without accident, and ergo must be safe. Experimental evidence was excluded in Libby, McNeill & Libby v. Scherman, 146 Ill. 540; and the plan of showing safety by previous absence of accident was condemned by our Supreme Court in Temperance Hall Association v. Giles, 33 N. J. Law 260; and outside of this State, in such cases as Baltimore, etc., Turnpike v. Leonhardt, 66 Md. 70, Hodges v. Bearse, 129 Ill. 87, Lewis v. Smith, 107 Mass. 334, and Peverly v. Boston, 136 Mass. 366, although countenance is given to it in Dougan v. Champlain Transportation Co., 56 N. Y. 1.

The learned author continues (page 87):

"'The use that has come most into controversy is that of other injuries at a highway, track, or machine, as evidence of its dangerous character. . . . The doctrines of unfair surprise and confusion of issues . . . have been thought to have an especial bearing here; and for some time . . . much distrust of this sort of evidence was shown. The almost universal attitude of the Courts at the present time, however, apart from minor peculiarities, is to admit such evidence, subject to the limitations already described. . . . The other instances of injuries thus offered in evidence may concern defects in highways or defects in railroad tracks, machines, premises, and the like."

In Collins v. Dorchester [ante, No. 65], decided in 1850, it was held that the existence of a defect in a highway claimed to have caused injury to plaintiff could not be shown by evidence of a similar injury to another person at the same place. The doctrine of this case is said by Professor Wigmore to be in effect repudiated in Massachusetts, and the remarks of the Court in Bemis v. Temple, [ante, No. 69], seem to point that way. At all events, the admission of evidence of this class is supported by such cases as: District of Columbia v. Armes, 107 U. S. 519, decided in 1883, a suit for injury resulting from a defective sidewalk, in which evidence of other accidents at the same place was held proper as showing both the danger of the place and notice thereof to the defendant; . . . and City of Bloomington v. Legg, 151 Ill. 9, a highway case, in which evidence of similar accidents was permitted both as to notice and to show the dangerous character of the place in question. . . .

The case of Darling v. Westmoreland, [ante, No. 66], is cited by Professor Wigmore as a leading case. It was a suit against the municipality for defect in the highway. The defect alleged was a pile of lumber that was likely to frighten horses, and plaintiff's claim was that his horse was frightened by the lumber and backed off a bridge in consequence. Evidence that another horse had been similarly frightened by the same lumber was excluded. The Court, in a long opinion by Doe, J., held that the exclusion was erroneous and reversed the judgment, incidentally criticising the rule in Collins v. Dorchester as not called for by the facts in that case.

Temperance Hall Association v. Giles has been cited in a number of our later decisions, but only twice on the admissibility of evidence as to the occurrence or non-occurrence of other accidents under similar circumstances. . . . The precise point decided in Temperance Hall Association v. Giles is not now in question, and we are not required to decide whether it was rightly decided in that aspect. Bobbink v. Erie R. R. is also clearly distinguishable, as there was no claim in that case that there was any defect in the crossing frog, but only that it might be improved upon, and the rejection of the evidence offered to show this was based on the ground that the rule of law, under the circumstances, required no more than the adoption of an appliance in general use, which the frog in question was conclusively shown to be.

Reverting to the case at bar, we are of opinion that the evidence of a similar accident at the same place some few days before was proper as supporting the plaintiff's evidence as to the condition of the switch at the time of his accident, and as tending to show that that condition had persisted so long that with proper care and inspection it should have been remedied before the plaintiff sustained his injury, and that, as to the evidence of its similar condition two or three days afterwards, this was justified as corroborative of the plaintiff's testimony relative to that condition. . . . There was no error therefore in the admission of this testimony; and, as it was properly admitted, it follows as of course that comment on it by the Court in the aspects we have noted was also proper. The charge of the Court on this point was as follows:

"It has appeared from the testimony in this case that other accidents have occurred at this place. That testimony was introduced not for the purpose of showing any liability on the part of the company beyond this case, but simply as it might throw light upon the question of whether this track, this mate, was out of order at the time when this accident occurred; because the jury might infer that, if an accident occurred just before or just after this occurred, there must be something wrong with the track."

In view of the propriety of this evidence, this was unexceptionable.

There was therefore no error at the trial in any of the aspects we have discussed, and no other point has been brought before us for review.

It follows therefore that the judgment of the Supreme Court must be reversed, and that of the Circuit Court affirmed.

SUB-TITLE. RULES EXCLUDING TESTIMONIAL EVIDENCE

Topic 1. Rules defining Qualifications of Witnesses[1]

75. Simon Greenleaf. Evidence. (1842. § 327). In determining what evidence shall be admitted and weighed by the jury, and what shall not be received at all, or, in other words, in distinguishing between competent and incompetent witnesses, a principle seems to have been applied similar to that which distinguishes between conclusive and disputable presumptions of law, namely, the experienced connection between the situation of the witness and the truth or falsity of his testimony. Thus, the law excludes as incompetent those persons whose evidence, in general, is found more likely than otherwise to mislead juries; receiving and weighing the testimony of others, and giving to it that degree of credit which it is found on examination to deserve. It is obviously impossible that any test of credibility can be infallible. All that can be done is to approximate to such a degree of certainty as will ordinarily meet the justice of the case. The question is not, whether any rule of exclusion may not sometimes shut out credible testimony; but whether it is expedient that there should be any rule of exclusion at all. If the purposes of justice require that the decision of causes should not be embarrassed by statements generally found to be deceptive, or totally false, there must be some rule designating the class of evidence to be excluded; and in this case, as in determining the ages of discretion, and of majority, and in deciding as to the liability of the wife for crimes committed in company with the husband, and in numerous other instances, the common law has merely followed the common experience of mankind. It rejects the testimony of parties; of persons deficient in understanding; of persons insensible to the obligations of an oath; and of persons whose pecuniary interest is directly involved in the matter in issue.

76. Sir Edward Coke. Commentary upon Littleton (1627). 6 a. [As to witnesses to a deed] sometimes, though rarely [objections were allowed], which being found true, they were not to be sworne at all, neither to be joined to the jury nor as witnesses; as, if the witness were infamous, . . . or if the witnesse be an infidell, or of non-sane memory, or not of discretion, or a partie interested, or the like.

77. Statutes.[2]

United States. Revised Statutes (1878), § 858. In the courts of the United States no witness shall be excluded in any action on account of color, or in any civil action because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried; provided, that in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other, as to any transaction with or statement by the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the Court. In all other respects, the laws of the State in which the Court is held shall be the rules of decision as to the competency of witnesses in the courts of the United States in trials at common law and in equity and admiralty.

California.[1] Code of Civil Procedure (1872), § 1879. All persons, without exception, otherwise than is specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and, perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. Therefore, neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding are excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious belief; although in every case the credibility of the witness may be drawn in question, as provided in section 1847.

Ib., § 1880. The following persons cannot be witnesses: 1. Those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination. 2. Children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly. 3. Parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons on behalf of whom an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of such deceased person.

Ib., § 1881. There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore, a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: 1. A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife, without her consent, nor a wife for or against her husband, without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterwards, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other.

Ib., § 1102. The rules of evidence in civil actions are applicable also to criminal actions, except as otherwise provided in this Code.

Ib., § 1322. Except with the consent of both, or in cases of criminal violence upon one by the other, neither husband nor wife is a competent witness for or against the other in a criminal action or proceeding to which one or both are parties.

Ib., § 1323. [If the accused] offer himself as a witness, he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief; . . . his neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him nor be used against him on the trial or proceeding.

No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any criminal case or proceeding by reason of his interest in the event of the same, as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his having been convicted of any crime, but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting his credibility; provided, however, that a defendant in any criminal case or proceeding shall only at his own request be deemed a competent witness, and his neglect to testify shall not create any presumption against him, nor shall the Court permit any reference or comment to be made to or upon such neglect.

Ib., c. 38, § 491, St. 1893, June 17 and St. 1901, May 11, § 3. [The wife or husband is to be competent in any case against the other under the statute punishing abandonment of family] as to any and all matters relevant thereto, including the fact of such marriage and the parentage of such children.

Ib., c. 51, § 1. No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any civil action, suit, or proceeding, except as hereinafter stated, by reason of his or her interest in the event thereof, as a party or otherwise, or by reason of his or her conviction of any crime; but such interest or conviction may be shown for the purpose of affecting the credibility of such witness; and the fact of such conviction may be proven like any fact not of record, either by the witness himself (who shall be compelled to testify thereto) or by any other witness cognizant of such conviction, as impeaching testimony, or by any other competent evidence.

Ib., § 2. No party to any civil action, suit, or proceeding, or person directly interested in the event thereof, shall be allowed to testify therein of his own motion, or in his own behalf, by virtue of the foregoing section, when any adverse party sues or defends as the trustee or conservator of any idiot, habitual drunkard, lunatic, or distracted person, or as the executor, administrator, heir, legatee, or devisee of any deceased person, or as guardian or trustee of any such heir, legatee, or devisee, unless when called as a witness by such adverse party so suing or defending, and also except in the following cases, namely:—First. In any such event, suit, or proceeding, a party or interested person may testify to facts occurring after the death of such deceased person, or after the ward, heir, legatee, or devisee shall have attained his or her majority. Second. When, in such action, suit, or proceeding, any agent of any deceased person shall, in behalf of any person or persons suing or being sued, in either of the capacities above named, testify to any conversation or transaction between such agent and the opposite party or party in interest, such opposite party or party in interest may testify concerning the same conversation or transaction. Third. Where, in any such action, suit, or proceeding, any such party suing or defending, as aforesaid, or any person having a direct interest in the event of such action, suit, or proceeding, shall testify in behalf of such party so suing or defending, to any conversation or transaction with the opposite party or party in interest, then such opposite party or party in interest shall also be permitted to testify as to the same conversation or transaction. Fourth. Where, in any such action, suit, or proceeding, any witness, not a party to the record, or not a party in interest, or not an agent of such deceased person, shall, in behalf of any party to such action, suit, or proceeding, testify to any conversation or admission by any adverse party or party in interest, occurring before the death and in the absence of such deceased person, such adverse party or party in interest may also testify as to the same admission or conversation. Fifth. Where, in any such action, suit, or proceeding, the deposition of such deceased person shall be read in evidence at the trial, any adverse party or party in interest may testify as to all matters and things testified to in such deposition by such deceased person, and not excluded for irrelevancy or incompetency.

be rendered a competent witness, to testify to any admission or conversation, by any deceased partner or joint contractor, unless some one or more of the surviving partners or joint contractors were also present at the time of such admission or conversation; and in every action, suit, or proceeding, a party to the same, who has contracted with an agent of the adverse party, the agent having since died, shall not be a competent witness, as to any conversation or transaction between himself and such agent, except where the conditions are such, that under the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of this Act, he would have been permitted to testify, if the deceased person had been a principal and not an agent; amended by St. 1899, April 24, by inserting after "such agent, the words," "unless such admission or conversation with the said deceased agent was had or made in the presence of a surviving agent or agents of such adverse party, and then only."

Ib., § 5. No husband or wife shall, by virtue of section 1 of this Act, be rendered competent to testify for or against each other as to any transaction or conversation, occurring during the marriage, whether called as a witness during the existence of the marriage, or after its dissolution, except in cases where the wife would, if unmarried, be plaintiff or defendant, or where the cause of action grows out of a personal wrong or injury done by one to the other or grows out of the neglect of the husband to furnish the wife with suitable support; and except in cases where the litigation shall be concerning the separate property of the wife, and suits for divorce; and except also in actions upon policies of insurance of property, so far as relates to the amount and value of the property alleged to be injured or destroyed, or in actions against carriers, so far as relates to the loss of property and the amount and value thereof, or in all matters of business transactions where the transaction was had and conducted by such married woman as the agent of her husband, in all of which cases the husband and wife may testify for or against each other, in the same manner as other parties may, under the provisions of this act. Provided, that nothing in this section contained shall be construed to authorize or permit any such husband or wife to testify to any admissions or conversations of the other, whether made by him to her or by her to him, or by either to third persons, except in suits or causes between such husband and wife.

Massachusetts. Revised Laws (1902), c. 175, § 20. No person of sufficient understanding, whether a party or otherwise, shall be excluded from giving evidence in any proceeding, civil or criminal, in court, or before a person having authority to receive evidence, except in the following cases: First, neither husband nor wife shall be allowed to testify as to private conversations with each other; Second, neither husband nor wife shall be compelled to be a witness on any trial upon an indictment, complaint, or other criminal proceeding, against the other; Third, in the trial of all indictments, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes or offences, a person so charged shall at his own request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness; and his neglect or refusal to testify shall not create any presumption against him.

Ib., § 21. The conviction of a witness of crime may be shown to affect his credibility.

New York. Code of Civil Procedure (1877), § 828. Except as otherwise specially prescribed in this title, a person shall not be excluded or excused from being a witness, by reason of his or her interest in the event of an action or special proceeding; or because he or she is a party thereto; or the husband or wife of a party thereto, or of a person in whose behalf an action or special proceeding is brought, opposed, prosecuted, or defended.

Ib., § 829. Upon the trial of an action, or the hearing upon the merits of a special proceeding, a party or a person interested in the event, or a person from, through, or under whom such a party or interested person derives his interest or title by assignment or otherwise, shall not be examined as a witness in his own behalf or interest, or in behalf of the party succeeding to his title or interest, against the executor, administrator, or survivor of a deceased person, or the committee of a lunatic, or a person deriving his title or interest from, through, or under a deceased person or lunatic, by assignment or otherwise, concerning a personal transaction or communication between the witness and the deceased person or lunatic, except where the executor, administrator, survivor, committee, or person so deriving title or interest is examined in his own behalf, or the testimony of the lunatic or deceased person is given in evidence concerning the same transaction or communication. A person shall not be deemed interested for the purposes of this section by reason of being a stockholder or officer of any banking corporation which is a party to the proceeding or interested in the result thereof.

Ib., § 831. A husband or wife is not competent to testify against the other, upon the trial of an action, or the hearing upon the merits of a special proceeding, founded upon an allegation of adultery, except to prove the marriage or disprove the allegation of adultery. A husband or wife shall not be compelled, or, without the consent of the other if living, allowed to disclose a confidential communication made by one to the other during marriage. In an action for criminal conversation, the plaintiff's wife is not a competent witness for the plaintiff, but she is a competent witness for the defendant, as to any matter in controversy; except that she cannot, without the plaintiff's consent, disclose any confidential communication had or made between herself and the plaintiff.

Ib., § 832. A person, who has been convicted of a crime or misdemeanor, is, notwithstanding, a competent witness in a civil or criminal action or special proceeding; but the conviction may be proved for the purpose of affecting the weight of his testimony, either by the record or by his cross-examination, upon which he must answer any question relevant to that inquiry; and the party cross-examining him is not included by that inquiry.

Ib., § 850. The Court or officer may examine an infant, or a person apparently of weak intellect, produced before it or him as a witness, to ascertain his capacity and the extent of his knowledge.

Penal Code (1881), § 715. The husband or wife of a person indicted or accused of a crime is in all cases a competent witness, on the examination or trial of such person; but neither husband nor wife can be compelled to disclose a confidential communication, made by one to the other during marriage.

Code of Criminal Procedure (1881), § 393. The defendant in all [criminal] cases may testify as a witness in his own behalf, but his neglect or refusal to testify does not create any presumption against him.

Laws (1876), c. 182, § 1. All persons jointly indicted shall, upon the trial of either, be competent witnesses for each other the same as if not included in the indictment.

It makes no difference from which cause this defect of understanding may have arisen; nor whether it be temporary and curable, or permanent; whether the party be hopelessly an idiot or maniac, or only occasionally insane, as a lunatic; or be intoxicated; or whether the defect arises from mere immaturity of intellect, as in the case of children. While the deficiency of understanding exists, be the cause of what nature soever, the person is not admissible to be sworn as a witness.

2 Den. & P. 256

This prisoner was tried before Coleridge, J., assisted by Cresswell, J., at the February sittings of the Central Criminal Court, 1851, for the manslaughter of Moses James Barnes; he was convicted, but a question was reserved for the opinion of this Court, as to the propriety of having admitted a witness of the name of Richard Donelly, on the part of the prosecution.

The deceased and the witness were both lunatic patients in a Mr. Armstrong's Asylum, at Camberwell, at the time of the supposed injury, and they were, at that time, placed in a ward called the Infirmary. It appeared that a single sane attendant (the prisoner) had the charge of this ward, in which as many as nine patients slept, and that he was assisted by three of the patients, of whom the witness Donelly was one.[2] . . . The question for the opinion of this Court was, Whether Richard Donelly was a competent witness? This case was argued on the 3rd May, 1851. Collier appeared for the prisoner; Sir F. Thesiger, Bodkin and Clarkson for the Crown.

Collier. — The witness, Donelly, was non compos mentis in point of fact, according to the medical and legal authorities on that subject. It is a rule, that no person who is non compos mentis is admissible as a witness. There are reasons of public policy, as well as of convenience, against qualifying this rule. Even should the above rule be qualified, this case could not be brought within such qualification. . . . The authorities show that a non compos is inadmissible. (Com. Dig. tit. Testmoigne — Witness, A I). There are two heads of incompetency, to which all others may be referred: First, Want of sufficient understanding to tell the truth; Secondly, Want of trustworthiness in a person of sufficient understanding. A non compos comes under the first head. Infidels, infamous persons, parties to the suit, etc., under the second. . . . Neither Comyn nor Buller [see N. P. 283 (a), 293] mention any qualification of the general proposition than an insane person is inadmissible, except "in lucidis intervallis," i.e., when he is not insane at all; for in the matter of evidence no degrees of lunacy are recognized by the law. [Co. Lit. 6 (a); Ibid. 247 (a)]. . . . If it be said that this rule is too general, and that as the law recognizes degrees of lunacy with reference to other subjects, it should also recognize degrees in the matter of testimony; this broad distinction seems to exist in the very nature of things; viz., that it is comparatively easy to test madness with reference to a past act, but not so with reference to a future act. How can a Judge say whether a witness's whole evidence may not be based on delusion, or that the delusion will not come on while he is giving his evidence? Is every insane witness to be admissible, and his credit left to the jury? That is contrary to all the authorities. If not, what classes of insane persons are to be admitted? Monomaniacs only? What is monomania? Its existence is denied by some medical writers. It seems, therefore, that as soon as the unsoundness of mind is manifested, the inquiry should stop, otherwise the Judge would have to perform the almost impossible task of determining the precise nature and extent of the insanity, and whether it will affect the evidence of the witness at any period of the trial, and under any circumstances that may take place during its progress.

Lord Campbell, C. J. — You admit that it is for the Judge to decide. You must, therefore, go the length of saying, that the Judge is bound to disallow the testimony of any person who is under any insane delusion. In a case tried before Parke, B., it was held that it was for the Judge to decide the question of competency, and for the jury to decide the question of credibility. . . .

Sir F. Thesiger was not called upon.

Lord Campbell, C. J. — The question is important, and has not yet been solemnly decided after argument. But I have no doubt that the rule was properly laid down by Parke, B., in the case which was tried before him, and that it is for the Judge to say whether the insane person has the sense of religion in his mind, and whether he understands the nature and sanction of an oath; and then the jury are to decide on the credibility and weight of his evidence. . . . It has been argued that any particular delusion, commonly called monomania, makes a man inadmissible. This would be extremely inconvenient in many cases in the proof either of guilt or innocence: it might also cause serious difficulties in the management of lunatic asylums. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Judge must, in all such cases, determine the competency, and the jury the credibility. Before he is sworn, the insane person may be cross-examined, and witnesses called to prove circumstances which might show him inadmissible. But, in the absence of such proof, he is prima facie admissible, and the jury must attach what weight they think fit to his testimony. . . .

COLERIDGE, J. — Mr. Collier has referred to several dicta in which the rule is stated without any qualification; but in those cases no qualification was needed. In old times, too, the rules of evidence were much narrower than at present, and more in accordance with those of the Civil and Canon Laws. In this case the evidence showed that the insane person had only a single delusion; as to memory he was like other people; and with regard to the obligation of an oath he was unusually well instructed. Prima facie, therefore, he was quite fit to be sworn. If, however, in the course of the trial, he showed his evidence to be tainted with insanity, then the jury should have attached no weight to it.

PLATT, B., concurred.

TALFOURD, J. — It would be very disastrous if mere delusions were held to exclude a witness. Some of the greatest and wisest of mankind have had particular delusions.

Lord CAMPBELL, C. J. — The rule which has been contended for would have excluded the testimony of Socrates, for he had one spirit always prompting him.

80. WORTHINGTON v. MERCER (1892. Alabama. 96 Ala. 310, 11 So. 72). WALKER, J. One's infirmity may be such as to render it expedient to place him under guardianship, and even to subject him to personal restraints, and yet he may be fully competent to understand the nature of an oath, to observe facts correctly, and to relate them intelligently and truly. A sweeping rule of disqualification which excludes such a person as a witness would be arbitrary and unsupported by sound reason. The true reason for not admitting the testimony of a person non compos mentis in any case is because his malady involves such a want or impairment of faculty that events are not correctly impressed on his mind, or are not retained in his memory, or that he does not understand his responsibility as a witness. When the reason for the exclusion of the witness does not exist, he should be permitted to testify.

1 Leach Cr. L. 4th ed., 199

THIS was a case reserved for the opinion of the twelve Judges by Mr. Justice BULLER, at the Spring Assizes for Reading, in the year 1779, on the trial of an indictment for an assault with intent to commit a rape on the body of Mary Harris, an infant under seven years of age. . . .

The judges assembled at Serjeants'-Inn Hall, 29th April, 1779, were unanimously of opinion, that no testimony whatever can be legally received except upon oath; and that an infant, though under the age of seven years, may be sworn in a criminal prosecution, provided such infant appears, on strict examination by the Court, to possess a sufficient knowledge of the nature and consequences of an oath, for there is no precise or fixed rule as to the time within which infants are excluded from giving evidence; but their admissibility depends upon the sense and reason they entertain of the danger and impiety of falsehood, which is to be collected from their answers to questions propounded to them by the Court; but if they are found incompetent to take an oath, their testimony cannot be received.[1]

The decision of this question [of a child's competency] rests primarily with the trial judge, who sees the proposed witness, notices his manner, his apparent possession or lack of intelligence, and may resort to any examination which will tend to disclose his capacity and intelligence, as well as his understanding of the obligations of an oath. As many of these matters cannot be photographed into the record, the decision of the trial judge will not be disturbed on review, unless from that which is preserved it is clear that it was erroneous.

IN a prohibition, upon a supposed modus decimandi, Yelverton, Solicitor, moved the Court, for a consultation to be granted, for that the plaintiff in the prohibition, had not sufficiently proved his suggestion, the same being only proved by him, by two persons, which were both of them attainted of felony, and so could be no good and sufficient witnesses in law.

COKE, Chief Justice. — It appears by 11 H. IV, fol. 41b, that if one be attainted of felony, and pardoned, he shall not afterwards be sworn of a jury, for that he is not "probus et legalis homo," for "poena mori potest, culpa perennis erit," and therefore such an one shall not be sworn of an inquest; and this is a good challenge to a juror returned to serve, that he hath been before attainted of felony, and though pardoned for the same, yet he is not a fit person to serve of a jury, nor yet to be an indifferent witness. . . . And in this principal case, upon examination, it was found, that the two witnesses, which proved the suggestion for the prohibition, had been attainted of felony, and therefore, by the rule of the Court, the prohibition was disallowed (the suggestion being unduly proved), and a consultation was granted.[1]

86. Chief Baron GILBERT. Evidence. (ante 1727. p. 139). The second sort of persons excluded from testimony for want of integrity are such as are stigmatized. Now there are several crimes that so blemish that the party is ever afterwards unfit to be a witness. . . . And the reason is very plain, because every plain and honest man affirming the truth of any matter under the sanction and solemnity of an oath is entitled to faith and credit, . . . but where a man is convicted of falsehood and other crimes against the common principles of honesty and humanity, his oath is of no weight, because he hath not the credit of a witness, . . . and he is rather to be intended as a man profligate and abandoned than one under the sentiments and convictions of those principles that teach probity and veracity.

87. SIMON GREENLEAF. Evidence. (1842. §§ 373–378). It is a point of no small difficulty to determine precisely the crimes which require the perpetrator thus infamous. The rule is justly stated to require, that the "publicum judicium" must be upon an offence, implying such a dereliction of moral principles, as carries with it a conclusion of a total disregard to the obligation of an oath.' But the difficulty lies in the specification of those offences. The usual and more general enumeration is, treason, felony, and the crimen falsi. In regard to the two former, as all treasons, and almost all felonies were punishable with death, it was very natural that crimes, deemed of so grave a character as to render the offender unworthy to live, should be considered as rendering him unworthy of belief in a Court of Justice. But the extent and meaning of the term, "crimen falsi," in our law, is nowhere laid down with precision. In the Roman Law, from which we have borrowed the term, it included not only forgery, but every species of fraud and deceit. If the offence did not fall under any other head it was called "stellionatus," which included "all kinds of cozenage and knavish practice in bargaining." But it is clear, that the Common Law has not employed the term in this extensive sense, when applying it to the disqualification of witnesses; because convictions for many offences, clearly belonging to the crimen falsi of the civilians, have not this effect. Of this sort are deceits in the quality of provisions, deceits by false weights and measures, conspiracy to defraud by spreading false news, and several others. On the other hand, it has been adjudged, that persons are rendered infamous, and therefore incompetent to testify, by having been convicted of forgery, perjury, subornation of perjury, suppression of testimony by bribery, or conspiracy to procure the absence of a witness, or other conspiracy, to accuse one of a crime and barratry. And from these decisions it may be deduced, that the "crimen falsi" of the Common Law not only involves the charge of falsehood, but also is one which may injuriously affect the administration of justice, by the introduction of falsehood and fraud. . . .

We have already remarked, that no person is deemed infamous in law, until he has been legally found guilty of an infamous crime. But the mere verdict of a Jury is not sufficient for this purpose; for it may be set aside, or the judgment may be arrested, on motion for that purpose. It is the judgment, and that only, which is received as the legal and conclusive evidence of the party's guilt, for the purpose of rendering him incompetent to testify. And it must appear that the judgment was rendered by a Court of competent jurisdiction. Judgment of outlawry for treason or felony will have the same effect; for the party, in submitting to an outlawry, virtually confesses his guilt; and so the record is equivalent to a judgment upon confession. If the guilt of the party should be shown by oral evidence, and even by his own admission (though in neither of these modes can it be proved, if the evidence be objected to), or, by his plea of guilty, which has not been followed by a judgment, the proof does not go to the competency of the witness, however it may affect his credibility.

The disability thus arising from infamy may, in general, be removed in two modes; (1) by reversal of the judgment; (2) by a pardon; [and (3) by serving the sentence].

75 N. Y. 466

APPEAL from judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, in the fourth judicial department, affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff, entered upon a verdict. (Reported below, 12 Hun 231.) This action was brought upon a contract for the sale of a steam tug. The facts material to the point discussed appear sufficiently in the opinion.

A. G. Rice, for appellant. The defendant could not be rendered incompetent to testify by proof of a record of conviction of a felony in another State. .

John C. Strong, for respondent.

RAPALLO, J. The only exception necessary to be considered, is that taken to the exclusion of the question to the defendant while on the stand, whether he was guilty of the offense of which he had been convicted in the State of Ohio thirty-five years previously. . . . The plaintiff, after having given oral evidence, by the cross-examination of the defendant, of his conviction in Ohio in 1839 of the offense of having counterfeit money in his possession, put in evidence the record of conviction.

. . . 1. The first point of inquiry is whether this conviction in Ohio rendered the defendant incompetent to be a witness in the courts of this State. . . . The Revised Statutes provide (2 R. S. 701, § 23) that no person sentenced upon a conviction for felony shall be competent to testify in any cause, etc., unless pardoned by the Governor or Legislature, except in the cases specially provided by law; but that no sentence upon a conviction for any offense other than a felony, shall disqualify or render any person incompetent to be sworn or to testify, etc. The same statute in a subsequent section (p. 702, § 30) defines the term felony, when used in that act or in any other statute, to mean an offense for which the convict is liable, by law to be punished by death or by imprisonment in a State prison. I think it quite clear that the disqualification created by this statute is consequent only upon a conviction in this State. It is found in that part of the Revised Statutes which relates to crimes and their punishment, and is in the nature of an additional penalty consequent upon the sentence. Although the disqualification incidentally affects parties in civil litigations wherein the testimony of the convict may be material, and serves as a protection to those against whom his testimony may be sought to be used, yet the provisions which inflict it must be regarded as a part of the criminal law of this State. Furthermore, the provisions requiring that the offense be a felony, and defining the term felony as used in that act, indicate that the conviction referred to, is a conviction had within this State. Though petty larceny was a felony at common law, it has been held that a conviction of that offense does not constitute a disqualification in this State, but the offense must be a felony as defined in the statute above cited. (Carpenter v. Nixon, 5 Hill 260; Shay v. The People, 22 N. Y. 317.) Crimes might be felonies in other States, which did not fall within our statutory definition.

It was not shown that according to the laws of the State of Ohio, a person convicted of the offense of which this party was convicted, was incompetent to be a witness. But if this fact had been shown, or could be presumed, it could make no difference. There is some conflict of authority on this point. In Chase v. Blodgett, 10 N. H. 24, and State v. Chandler, 3 Hawks 393, it was held that one convicted in another State of an offense conviction of which rendered him incompetent in the State where convicted, and would have had the same effect in the State where he was offered as a witness had he been convicted there, was also disqualified in the latter State. But in Commonwealth v. Green, 17 Mass. 515, the contrary was held. The case last referred to rests upon the ground that the disqualification is in the nature of an additional penalty, following and resulting from the conviction, and cannot extend beyond the territorial limits of the State where the judgment was pronounced; that the constitutional provision requiring that full faith and credit be given to the records, etc., of other States does not require that the same effect be given to them as in the State where rendered, as it was left to Congress to prescribe their effect, and also that this constitutional provision does not apply, and is not in its nature applicable, to criminal proceedings.

In the New Hampshire and North Carolina cases referred to (10 N. H. 22, and 3 Hawks 393), this argument is met by the contention that it is the crime and not the judgment which incapacitates the witness, and that the incapacity is not prescribed as a punishment for the crime, but because by the commission of it the criminal has shown himself a person unfit to be trusted to give testimony affecting the rights of others; that the judgment is required only for the purpose of establishing the fact of the crime by conclusive evidence, and that the constitutional provision requires that the same credit be given in every State to the judgment of a sister State to which it is entitled in the State where rendered. Assuming that this constitutional provision applies to convictions for crimes (which is denied in the Massachusetts case) the answer to the position stated is twofold. First, that whatever reason may lie at the foundation of the law, the law is that the sentence, and not merely the commission of the crime, disqualifies the witness. The crime may be admitted or proved ever so conclusively, even by record, without having that effect. A judgment rendered in a civil action to which plaintiff, defendant, and witness were all parties, finding the witness guilty of forgery, grand larceny, or any other felony, would not disqualify. Such a record might exist, as in cases of justification of libel, actions to cancel forged instruments, etc. The disability to testify can only follow conviction and sentence in a prosecution for the crime. Secondly, a record of conviction for a crime, is not conclusive evidence in a civil action, of the facts upon which it was based. . . .

2. This brings us to the second branch of the case. . . . Error has occurred in the present case. The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, costs to abide the event.

All concur except MILLER and EARL, JJ., absent.

Judgment reversed.

89. STATUTES. [Printed ante, as No. 77]

90. VANCE v. STATE. (1902. Arkansas. 70 Ark. 272, 68 S. W. 37). RIDDICK, J. We take this occasion to call attention to the backward state of the law in this State in reference to the competency of witnesses convicted of felony. The statutes which render such witnesses incompetent belong to a class of antiquated laws which suppress evidence, and which the wisdom of modern ages has discredited and shown to be unreasonable and injurious. They are of the same class as the laws which formerly forbade the parties to the suit from testifying, and closed the mouth of the defendant on trial for his life, and should be repealed, as these laws have been repealed, for such matters should go only to the credit or impeachment of the witness, not to the exclusion of his testimony. There is no valid reason why a person who knows anything material to the decision of a case on trial should not be permitted to tell it, whatever may his character, the jury being allowed to weigh his testimony in connection with his character and antecedents. These statutes not only suppress evidence, but the application of them often presents difficult and doubtful questions, which, being decided in the hurry of trial, frequently results on appeal in reversals, and in this way justice is often thwarted. There are very few States that now retain such laws and we think our legislators might well consider whether they should not be repealed in this State also.

Sub-topic B. Emotional Incapacity [1]

(1) Interest in Litigation

91. Sir Edward Coke. Commentary upon Littleton. (1629. fol. 6 b). It was also agreed, by the whole Court, that in an information upon the statute of usury, the party to the usurious contract shall not be admitted to be a witness against the usurer, for in effect he should be "testis in propria causa," and should avoid his own bonds and assurances, and discharge himself of the money borrowed. . . . And herewith in effect agreeth Britton, that he that challengeth a right in the thing in demand cannot be a witness, for that he is a party in interest.

92. Simon Greenleaf. Evidence, §§ 328*b*, 333*b*; Addenda by John H. Wigmore (16th ed., 1899). Interest, in general, as a Disqualification. At common law, the most important, because most extensive, ground of incapacity was that supposed inclination to falsify which arose from the prospect of gaining or losing by the issue of the proceedings. The circumstance creating this incapacity was known as Interest; and the theory was that "from the nature of human passions and actions there is more reason to distrust such a biased testimony than to believe it." (Gilbert, Evidence, 119.) This theory and policy was, up to the latter part of the eighteenth century, not at all out of harmony with the moral and emotional notions of the time; and in certain regions of our own country it is perhaps still not thought unnatural. It is consistent with any state of society in which violent partisanship colors the whole mental and moral attitude of the man. But with the social changes of the eighteenth century, this policy gradually became incongruous, and by the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Courts had already shown disfavor to it, and the community was ready to perceive this incongruity. The rigors of its application had already been mitigated by numerous exceptions and evasions; but these only served to illustrate the general unsoundness and impolicy of the principle as a whole. The powerful sarcasm of Jeremy Bentham mercilessly exposed its inconsistencies and its fallacies (Rationale of Judicial Evidence, B. ix, pt. iii, c. iii, Bowring's ed., vol. vii, 393). Bentham's doctrines were given currency in this country by the work on Evidence of Chief Justice Appleton, of Maine (see cc. i and iv therein); and by his works, during the first quarter of the nineteenth century, an opinion was created which before long, under the efforts of Lord Brougham and others, took shape in legislation. In 1843 (St. 6–7 Vict., c. 85.) the general rule of disqualification by reason of interest was abolished in England; and the first statute (Rev. St. 1846, c. 102, Sec. 99.) of the same sort seems to have been enacted in this country in Michigan in 1846; to be followed within two or three decades by the remaining jurisdictions. The mass of detailed rules and exceptions depending upon this principle have therefore ceased to be law; and in spite of the continued existence of remnants of the old policy (now to be mentioned), the decisions dealing with interest in general have ceased to be of direct bearing, except in a few respects, and are even for that purpose rarely referred to by the Courts of to-day.

But the abolition of this source of incompetency was not completed at once; nor has complete abolition yet been reached, except in a few jurisdictions. . . . There still remains the disqualification for survivors of a transaction with a deceased person. In almost every jurisdiction in this country, by statutes enacted in connection with or shortly after the statute removing the disqualification of parties and of interested persons in general, an exception was carved out of the old disqualification and allowed to perpetuate its principle within a limited scope. The theory of the original disqualification was that persons interested were likely to bear false witness; the reasons for abolition were in brief (1) that this was true to a limited extent only, (2) that, even if true, yet, so far as they did not testify falsely, the hardship of exclusion was intolerable, (3) that, in any case, the test of cross-examination and the other processes of investigation would with fair certainty expose falsehood; (4) that no exclusion could be so defined as to be simple, consistent, and workable. The reformers in this country did not accept these arguments to their fullest extent; and they preferred to maintain the disqualification for the situation in which it seemed to them that the means of refuting a false claim would be wanting, i.e., a claim by one whose adversary was deceased; since, in the vague metaphor often invoked by way of a reason, "if death has closed the lips of the one party, the policy of the law is to close the lips of the other."

This exception is wholly a creation of statute; for as all interested persons were excluded at common law, the whole embraced a part, and there was no occasion to define the terms of any such partial exclusion. . . . It is enough here to note two lines of distinction between the various statutes, viz., (a) some exclude only parties to the cause, while the others exclude any person interested in the issue; (b) some exclude only testimony to a specific transaction or communication with the deceased person, while the others exclude the disqualified persons from testifying at all in the cause.

As a matter of policy, this survival of the now discarded interest-disqualification is deplorable in every respect; for it is based on a fallacious and exploded principle, it leads to as much or more injustice than it prevents, and it encumbers the profession with a mass of barren quibbles over the interpretation of mere words.

93. Statutes. [Printed ante, in No. 77]

94. LOUIS' ADMINISTRATOR v. EASTON

50 Ala. 470

Appeal from the Circuit Court of Greene. Tried before the Hon. L. R. Smith. This action was brought by William C. Easton, against Thomas C. Clark, as the administrator of the estate of John Louis, deceased; and was founded on an account for goods sold and delivered to said John Louis in his lifetime by the firm of Paschal & Foster, who transferred said account to the firm of Easton, Wymans & Co., by whom it was transferred to the plaintiff. The account was contracted between the 30th July, 1866, and the 29th March, 1867; and the action was commenced on the 4th February, 1870. The defendant pleaded, "in short by consent — 1st, that he denies that the money claimed is the property of the plaintiff; 2d, that the said John Louis owed the money at the time of his death; 3d, the statute of limitations of three years, which is a bar to open accounts"; and issue was joined on these pleas.

On the trial, as the bill of exceptions states, the plaintiff offered W. M. Paschal as a witness, "to prove the correctness of the account sued on, and that the same was just and unpaid." Objection being made as to the competency of this witness, he testified, on his voir dire, "as to his interest in said account, that he, for the firm of Paschal & Foster, transferred said account to Messrs. Morgan & Jolly, as attorneys of Easton, Wymans & Co., in the lifetime of said John Louis, in payment of a claim which Paschal & Foster owed to them, and which had been sent to said attorneys for collection; and that he now had no interest in said account." The Court thereupon overruled the objection to the competency of said witness, and allowed him to testify, as proposed, to the sale of the goods, the correctness of the account, its transfer by delivery, during the lifetime of said John Louis, to said Morgan & Jolly as attorneys for Easton, Wymans & Co.; and further, that said Louis acknowledged the correctness of the account to him, and offered to give his note for the amount. The defendant reserved an exception to the overruling of his objection to the competency of said witness, and also to the admission of his testimony; and he now assigns these matters as error.

J. B. & T. C. Clark, for appellant. Morgan & Jolly, contra.

Brickell, J. The only objection to the competency of witnesses, in civil proceedings, allowed by the statute, is, "that in suits or proceedings by or against executors or administrators (as to which a different rule is not made by the laws of this State), neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other, as to any transaction with, or statement by the testator or intestate, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party." R. C. § 2704. At common law, the transferror of a chose in action was not a competent witness for his transferee to support the claim transferred. This rule of exclusion was not founded on the ground that the transferror had an interest in the event of the suit, but on reasons of public policy; and no release could remove the objection. Houston v. Prewitt, 8 Ala. 846; Clifton v. Sharpe, 15 Ala. 618. This rule of the common law was carried into and formed section 2290 of the Code of 1852. The reason assigned for the rule was, that it would let in the evils of champerty and maintenance, and would operate as an evasion of the rule excluding as witnesses those having a direct and immediate interest in the suit. A party to a contract, finding he had not legal evidence to sustain an action on it, could render himself competent by a transfer to another, while the lips of his adversary were sealed by an inflexible rule of law. The law can never permit indirection, or evasion, to accomplish that which is not capable of being accomplished directly. It was not material that, in the particular case, the transfer was made in good faith, and for a valuable consideration; the evils to be avoided were in some degree the same, and the rule was applied.

The same reasons induce us to hold, that the transferror of a chose in action, on which, if no transfer had been made, suit must have been brought in his name, cannot render himself a competent witness against an executor or administrator under the statute of this State. He may not be within the letter, but he is within the spirit and policy of the statute. The object of the statute is to extend to each party the right and privilege of testifying. This right and privilege must be mutual. It cannot exist in the one party, and not in the other. If death has closed the lips of the one party, the policy of the law is to close the lips of the other. In all actions on contracts for the payment of money, whether express or implied, which must, under our system, be instituted in the name of the party having the beneficial interest, the policy of the statute would be defeated, if, by the machinery of a transfer, the party with whom the contract was made could render himself a competent witness against his deceased adversary. Nor can we think the fact that the transfer was made before the death of the party supposed to be bound by the contract varies the rule. His death destroys the mutuality the statute intends to preserve, and an advantage would thereby accrue to the party suing on the contract, which the statute guards against. . . . The witness Paschal was one of the transferrors, from whom the appellee derived his right of suit. He was called to testify as to the intestate's admission of the correctness of the account, and as to his purchases of the goods charged in the account. He was not a competent witness for this purpose, and the objection of appellant to his admission as a witness and to his evidence should have been sustained. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Peters, C. J. (dissenting). — I am compelled respectfully to dissent from the opinion of a majority of the Court in this case, and its judgment. I think that the construction of the statute brought in question is incorrectly made. The enactment referred to is very clearly intended to remove all objection to a witness on account of interest merely. This overturns the old rule of exclusion on account of interest, in every case, except one only. The language of the Code is this: "In suits and proceedings before any Court or officer, other than criminal cases, there must be no exclusion of any witness, because he is a party or interested in the issue to be tried." Rev. Code, § 2704. This is the new rule.

To this there is one exception, and only one. This is expressed in definite and precise words. O'Neal v. Reynolds, 42 Ala. 197. It is precisely defined; and expressed with equal clearness, as the general rule. It is thus stated: "Except that, in suits or proceedings by or against executors or administrators, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other, as to any transaction with, or statement by the testator or intestate, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party." Rev. Code, § 2704; Jeffries v. Avary, at the January Term, 1873. The witness excluded under the exception is only the "party to the suit." This description does not include a transferror or assignor of a promissory note, or verbal contract, or an account. . . . The Legislature made but one single exception, which could not have been marked out by language of greater clearness. . . . To extend the particular identification of the person named, and thus let in others not named, seems to me against principle, and an unauthorized judicial interference with clear legislative expression. The law, before the statute, allowed a transferror or assignor to be made competent by a release. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 426; but see Houston v. Prewitt, 8 Ala. 846; Brown v. Brown, 5 Ala. 508. . . . The witness offered in this case, being a mere transferror of the claim in suit, and not a party to the record, is not such a person as is excluded by the exception named in the Code. He was, therefore, properly allowed to testify for the plaintiff. . . . The judgment of the Court below should be affirmed.

95. ST. JOHN v. LOFLAND

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH DAKOTA. 1895

5 N. D. 140; 64 N. W. 730

APPEAL from District Court, Steele County; MCCONNELL, J. Action by Sidney S. St. John, administrator of Albert C. St. John, against John F. Lofland. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. The action was to foreclose a mortgage given to secure a promissory note. The note and mortgage were executed by defendant. The consideration for the note was the sale to defendant by Lydia B. St. John, as administratrix of the estate of Albert C. St. John, of certain personal property, constituting a portion of the assets of such estate. The note and mortgage were both executed to such administratrix. Subsequently she died, and the plaintiff was appointed administrator of the estate in her place. The defense to the action is payment. To prove it, the defendant himself testified that he paid the note and mortgage to Lydia B. St. John, as administratrix during her lifetime. This evidence was objected to as incompetent, under the provisions of Comp. Laws, § 5260. The objection was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted. The Court having found on this evidence that the debt had been paid, judgment was rendered for the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed.

George Murray, for appellant, contended that § 5260, Comp. Laws, extended its operation to transactions with the deceased as administratrix. . . .

F. W. Ames, for respondent. . . .

CORLISS, J. (after stating the case as above). The decision of this case will turn upon the construction of Comp. Laws, § 5260. We think that the evidence was competent. The section referred to (5260) reads as follows:

"No person offered as a witness in any action or special proceeding, in any court, or before any officer or person having authority to examine witnesses, or hear evidence, shall be excluded or excused, by reason of such person's interest in the event of the action or special proceeding; or because such person is a party thereto; or because such person is a husband or wife of a party thereto, or of any person in whose behalf such action or special proceeding is brought, opposed or defended, except as hereinafter provided: . . . (2) In civil actions or proceedings by or against executors, administrators, heirs at law, or next of kin, in which judgment may be rendered or ordered entered, for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other, as to any transactions whatever with, or statement by, the testator or intestate, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party. But if the testimony of a party to the action or proceeding has been taken, and he shall afterwards die, and after his death the testimony so taken shall be used upon any trial or hearing in behalf of his executors, administrators, heirs at law, or next of kin, then the other party shall be a competent witness, as to any and all matters to which the testimony so taken relates."

The extent to which this statute seals the lips of a party is with regard to "any transaction with or statement by the testator or intestate." The definite article "the" makes it certain that the testator or intestate referred to is the one whose executor or administrator is the party to the suit, and not any testator or intestate with whom the transaction has been had or by whom the statement has been made. But we are urged to broaden this statute by interpretation, on the theory that its true spirit demands an expansion of its literal meaning. If we were to do this, we must, if we would be logical and consistent, continue in the same line; and hence we would be compelled to hold that a transaction with a deceased agent was within the statute, for in that case, as in this, the surviving party would have the advantage of testifying without the possibility of his evidence being contradicted. So, where one of two partners had died, and the survivor, who, so far as the partnership assets are concerned, occupies a position very similar to that occupied by an administrator, should sue on a partnership claim, we would have to hold that a debtor of the firm could not in such action by the surviving partner swear to a payment made by him to the deceased partner in his lifetime. This so-called "spirit" of the statute would embrace such a case also. So far as a transaction with a deceased agent is concerned, there is express authority for the doctrine that, under such a statute as ours, the transaction may be proved by the testimony of the debtor. Voss v. King (W. Va.), 10 S. E. 402.

This whole argument that the letter of this law should be expanded to the dimensions of the spirit of the statute rests on a false assumption as to the spirit of this legislation. The general policy of the section is to make all persons competent witnesses. So far as the question of the extent of the limitations of that policy is concerned, the only way we can ascertain the scope of this limitation is by looking to the language in which that limitation is expressed. We cannot look beyond the language. We cannot say that it was the purpose of the Legislature to exclude all evidence merely because the witness from whose lips it might fall would enjoy the advantage of testifying to a transaction with a deceased person, who on that account could not confront and contradict him. Statutes which exclude testimony on this ground are of doubtful expediency. There are more honest claims defeated by them, by destroying the evidence to prove such claim, than there would be fictitious claims established if all such enactments were swept away and all persons rendered competent witnesses. To assume that in that event many false claims would be established by perjury is to place an extremely low estimate on human nature, and a very high estimate on human ingenuity and adroitness. He who possesses no evidence to prove his case save that which such a statute declares incompetent is remediless. But those against whom a dishonest demand is made are not left utterly unprotected because death has sealed the lips of the only person who can contradict the survivor, who supports his claim with his oath. In the legal armory, there is a weapon whose repeated thrusts he will find is difficult, and in many cases impossible, to parry if his testimony is a tissue of falsehoods, — the sword of cross-examination. For these reasons, which lie on the very surface of this question of policy, we regard it as a sound rule to be applied in the construction of statutes of the character of the one whose interpretation is here involved, that they should not be extended beyond their letter when the effect of such extension will be to add to the list of those whom the act renders incompetent as witnesses.

There is ample authority for our ruling in the case. The decision of the Court in Palmateer v. Tilton (N. J. Err. & App.), 5 Atl. 105, is directly in point. . . . In fact practically the whole drift of the adjudications is along the line of construction which we follow. . . . The case of Waldman v. Crommelin, 46 Ala. 580, is undoubtedly an authority for plaintiff, but we do not regard it as sound, and it stands alone. The Illinois cases cannot be classed with it, as they were decided under a statute radically different from § 5260, — a statute so broad as to render a party incompetent from testifying in his own behalf as to any fact in a suit in which the adverse party is an executor, administrator, etc. Under such a statute, no question relating to a personal transaction could possibly arise. See Boynton v. Phelps, 52 Ill. 210; Whitner v. Rucker, 71 Ill. 410; Redden v. Inman, 6 Ill. App. 55. Even if these cases supported the plaintiff's contention, we should adhere to the views we have expressed.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed. All concur.

96. ROSS v. DEMOSS

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1867

45 Ill. 447

WRIT of Error to the Circuit Court of Livingston County; the Hon. CHARLES R. STARR, Judge, presiding. This was a suit in equity, brought by Alexander Demoss, in the Livingston Circuit Court, against Riley Ross, Margaret Wood, Daniel J. Wood, and Benjamin W. Gray, to have a mortgage satisfied, and the lands reconveyed to complainant. It appeared that defendant in error, in April, 1858, executed a mortgage with a power of sale, to secure to William Ross $68, on forty acres of land. That subsequently, in September of the same year, to secure the further sum of $300, defendant in error executed a mortgage on another tract of land, containing seventy-five acres, to William Ross, with power of sale. That in the month of October, 1859, Ross advertised and sold the land, and Riley Ross, his son, became the purchaser; that in the following January, Riley Ross reconveyed the lands to his father, for the expressed consideration of $365, and a few cents; that William Ross died in the month of September, 1860, intestate, leaving Riley Ross and Margaret Wood, who was the wife of Daniel J. Wood, his heirs; and that Gray subsequently became the administrator of his estate. It was alleged in the bill, that the sale by Ross was not intended to be a foreclosure of these mortgages, but that it was at the time agreed that defendant in error should have further time to pay and redeem the lands; and that all of the money for which the mortgages were given had been fully paid.

Mr. Charles J. Beattie, and Messrs. Dickey & Rice, for the plaintiffs in error. Messrs. Fleming & Pillsbury, for the defendant in error.

Mr. Justice LAWRENCE (after stating the case as above). On the trial below, the evidence was conflicting, but it seems to preponderate in favor of the decree.

The weight of the evidence of Garner is somewhat impaired from the fact, that he was proved to have been one of the attorneys in the case, and had a conditional fee, dependent on the result of the suit. It is of doubtful professional propriety for an attorney to become a witness for his client, without first entirely withdrawing from any further connection with the case; and an attorney occupying the attitude of both witness and attorney for his client subjects his testimony to criticism if not suspicion; but where the half of a valuable farm depends upon his evidence, he places himself in an unprofessional position, and must not be surprised if his evidence is impaired. While the profession is an honorable one, its members should not forget that even they may so act as to lose public confidence and general respect.

In so much conflict in testimony, it is hard to determine with absolute certainty as to what is proved. But, upon a careful examination of all that is in the record, we are strongly impressed with the belief that the weight is decidedly in favor of the continuance of the mortgage and its ultimate payment by defendant in error. . . . In such a conflict the only course is to reject such portion as seems to be unworthy of belief. The circuit judge has better means of determining which class of witnesses are the most worthy of credit, than we possess. In this case he has given credit to the testimony of the witnesses of defendant in error, and we are unable to see that he erred in that conclusion. The decree of the court below must be affirmed. Decree affirmed.

97. ANON. (1848. 5 Western Law Journal 457). The Attorney as a Witness. The attorney's exclusion should rest on peculiar grounds. He should be rejected, not for the protection of the opposite party, but for his own; not because his integrity may be exposed to temptation, but because it will be exposed to suspicion. Let us consider for a moment the relation which he appears to sustain toward the party he represents. . . . He is paid for the knowledge, industry, talent, and zeal he may exert in the cause. Though his compensation depends on no contingency of success or failure, yet he feels entitled to charge, and his client feels disposed to pay, a higher fee when the cause terminates successfully. His sympathy for a losing client induces him to abate the amount of his charge, and he feels that a fortunate litigant can compensate him more liberally. There are cases, too, in which, from the inability of his client, he must receive nothing, if the case is determined against him. . . . He is perhaps ardent to prevail for the sake of victory. Reputation is greatly enhanced by success. The vulgar generally applaud the winning lawyer, as the winning horse, and have no better criterion of ability than the event of a suit. The successful termination of a case, especially a doubtful one, often attracts other business. In whatever degree some minds may be influenced by such motives, there is no advocate wholly indifferent to the prestige which attends victory. The lawyer who approaches a jury to sustain a case by his testimony, and to advocate it by his eloquence, places himself in an indecent position. Paid for the ability he may exert in obtaining success, deceived by a partial knowledge of the facts, and ardent to win, his testimony must be viewed with distrust. His statement, though perfectly reliable under other circumstances, is received with suspicion by the jury, generally consisting of men whose limited education and position in life give them no enlarged views of things, and no elevated opinion of human nature. The incompetency of the attorney, therefore, need not be placed on the probability of the falsehood of his testimony. He should not be suffered by the Court to place himself in a position that may lessen his character, or diminish the confidence of men in the purity of the administration of justice.

(2) Marital Relationship

98. Sir Edward Coke. Commentary upon Littleton. (1628. fol. 6 b). It hath been resolved by the justices that a wife cannot be produced either for or against her husband, "quia sunt duæ animæ in carne una."

99. Chief Baron Gilbert. Evidence. (ante 1727. p. 133). The second corollary to this general rule [of exclusion from interest] is that husband and wife cannot be admitted to be witnesses for or against each other; for if they swear for the benefit of each other, they are not to be believed, because their interests are absolutely the same, and therefore they can gain no more credit when they attest for each other than when any man attests for himself.

100. CORNELL v. VANARTSDALEN

4 Pa. St. 364

In error from the Common Pleas of Bucks County. December 31 Assumpsit against the executor of Adrian Cornell, who was the father-in-law of plaintiff. The plaintiff declared for goods sold, money laid out and expended, for work and labor done, and for goods sold on a quantum meruit. . . . The defendant pleaded non-assumpsit, and the statutes of limitations. . . . The plaintiff, then, under exception (fourth) gave evidence of the . . . will of Adrian Cornell, dated in 1833, and proved in 1841. By this, after making sundry devises to his sons, he gave the farm on which plaintiff resides, to the children of Jane (the wife of plaintiff), subject to a charge of $2000 at 5 per cent. interest from the time of his decease, and subject to the maintenance of their mother during her life. . . . The defendant called Rachel Cornell, the widow of testator, and showed that her legacy was paid, leaving an unpaid annuity under the will of $300. The rejection of the witness constitutes the fifth bill of exceptions. Having shown a release and assignment of all her interest under the will, he again offered her to prove, (1) That every year during A. Cornell's life, when plaintiff was to pay rent, all previous matters were settled. (2) That Cornell told plaintiff not to make these improvements. (3) That in January, before Cornell's death, plaintiff claimed a balance of $72, which it was agreed should be paid out of the rent. The witness was rejected as incompetent (sixth exception). The seventh bill was to the rejection of the same witness as incompetent to prove enmity existing on the part of plaintiff's witness to testator and his family. . . .

Fox, for plaintiff in error. The competency of Rachel Cornell depends on the subject-matter of her proposed testimony, as she had received her legacy and released all claim under her annuity, the estate being otherwise amply sufficient to cover that. There is no case excluding the widow in a suit between the personal representatives of her husband and a stranger, though I admit she is not competent if confidence is abused. Monroe v. Twisselton, 43 Geo. 3, in Norris' Peake, App. 29, is the leading case, and is cited by Phillips and Starkie. In Aveson v. Lord Kinnaird, 6 East 192, the ground of her incompetency is stated to be, where there would be a violation of confidence reposed in her by her husband. In Beveridge v. Minter, 1 Carr. & Payne 364, the objection, that she is incompetent to do that, after dissolution of the marriage, which she cannot do while it exists, is overruled. So in Coffin v. Jones, 13 Pick. 445, she is said to be competent to prove facts coming to her knowledge from other sources. . . .

Chapman, contra. . . . The witness was interested, for her legacy could be levied on, and a creditor could compel her to refund. 1 Vern. 94, 2 Vern. 205, 1 Ch. Ca. 136. . . .

ROGERS, J. (after stating the pleadings and the evidence excepted to) . . . It remains only to consider the rejection of Rachel Cornell, the widow of Adrian Cornell, as a witness. That she cannot be excluded on the ground of interest, is too plain to admit of argument. If she has any interest, it is in the question which never renders a witness incompetent. Under the will she is but a legatee, and can have no interest excepting the estate be insolvent, which is not pretended here. That a legatee may be admitted in a suit for or against the estate will not admit of doubt, for if the estate is solvent, which is always presumed, his interest cannot be affected. It is a contingent interest which has never been held a disqualification. Besides, the witness executed an assignment, and although it may have been colorable, and probably was, yet that is a matter of which the Court, except in the case of a party to the record, do not undertake to judge. The evidence, under proper directions, is always referred to the decision of the jury.

But it is said to be against the policy of the law, to permit a wife to testify for or against the estate of her deceased husband; that parties are excluded from being witnesses for themselves, and that the same rule applies to husband and wife, neither of them being admissible as a witness in a cause, civil or criminal, in which the other is a party. The exclusion is founded partly upon the identity of their legal rights and interests, and partly on the principles of public policy. And, neither is it material, in some cases, that this relation no longer exists. The great object of these rules being to secure domestic happiness by prohibiting confidential communications from being divulged, the rule is the same to that extent, even though the other party is no longer in being, or has even been divorced and married to another person. The rule is the same in its spirit and extent, as that which excludes confidential communications made by a client to an attorney. And in analogy to this rule, it is held, that the wife, after the death of the husband, is competent to prove facts, coming to her knowledge from other sources not by means of her situation as wife, notwithstanding they relate to the transactions of her husband. The prohibition, where she is a competent witness, being divested of all interest, extends to confidential communications alone, or such as come to her knowledge from her domestic relation. Coffin v. Jones, 13 Pick. 445; Williams v. Baldwin, 7 Vermont, 506, and Wells v. Tucker, 3 Binn. 366.

In the case in hand, it is difficult to imagine in what respect any confidential communication is divulged, or any domestic confidence abused. She is brought forward to testify for the estate, so that a confidential communication, merely, would not be evidence on other grounds, although it might be evidence if permitted against the estate. In every case where the question has arisen, the wife has been offered to charge her former husband or his estate. Indeed, it is somewhat difficult to understand how the point can arise, when her testimony is offered in favor either of the former husband or of his estate after his death. She may have a strong bias it is true, but that goes to her credit and not to her competency; but in what respect public policy arising from the domestic relation forbids her to testify, is not apparent to my mind. In the evidence offered, there is nothing either confidential or improper to be disclosed. It is testimony to facts which must have necessarily come to her knowledge from other sources than confidential communications from her deceased husband. The defendants offer to prove, that every year during the lifetime of her husband, when plaintiff was to pay rent, all previous matters were settled; that Cornell told him not to make those improvements, and that in January before Cornell's death, plaintiff claimed a balance of $72 which it was agreed should be paid out of the rent; and also to prove as rebutting testimony to the evidence of plaintiff's witness, that he, the witness, had enmity to her husband and all her family. . . .

As then the reception of the evidence would contravene no principle of domestic or public policy, we are of opinion the testimony was improperly rejected.

Judgment reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

101. WILLIAM AND MARY COLLEGE v. POWELL

COURT OF APPEALS OF VIRGINIA. 1855

12 Gratt. 372

THOMAS J. POWELL being indebted to William and Mary College, he executed his bond, bearing date the 25th day of April, 1836, with George N. Powell as his surety, to the college, for $1500, payable on demand; and on the same day he executed a deed by which he conveyed to Edmund Christian, who was the bursar of the college, a tract of land in the county of King William, described as containing 390 acres, in trust to secure the payment of said debt. One moiety of this land in quantity, and that part of it on which was the dwelling-house, was the property of Powell's wife, of which he was tenant by the curtesy; the other moiety Powell had purchased of one of the heirs of Mrs. Powell's father. Her moiety was much the most valuable. By deed bearing date the 1st of April, 1841, Thomas J. Powell and Mary E. his wife, in consideration of the sum of $500 in cash, and for the further consideration that George N. Powell should pay Christian, agent of William and Mary College, the debt aforesaid of $1500, with its accruing interest, conveyed to said George N. Powell the said tract of land, described as containing 303 acres. . . . By deed bearing date the 1st day of January, 1839, Thomas J. Powell conveyed to James Bosher a tract of between eighteen and nineteen acres of land lying in the county of Henrico near the city of Richmond, four slaves and some household furniture, in trust for the separate use of his wife Mary E. Powell during her life, with a general power of appointment; and if she should make no appointment, to her heirs. And Mrs. Powell was authorized to direct a sale and reinvestment of any part of the trust property. . . . The land conveyed in the deed of January, 1839, was sold by the direction of Mrs. Powell and the proceeds were invested in a lot in the city of Richmond. Mrs. Powell died prior to 1850, leaving ten children, and without having exercised her power of appointment; and in November, 1850, Bosher, the trustee, conveyed the trust property to her children. He afterwards purchased three of the interests of the children in the property. In 1851, the parties interested in this property instituted a suit in the County Court of Henrico for the purpose of having it sold and divided; and a decree was made appointing Herbert A. Claiborne a commissioner to sell and distribute the proceeds. In February, 1853, the cause came on to be heard, when the Court directed one of its commissioners to ascertain and report the nature and extent of the consideration paid and surrendered by Mary E. Powell for the settlement made upon her by the deed of the 1st day of January, 1839, from Thomas J. Powell to James Bosher.

The defendants introduced before the commissioner Thomas J. Powell as a witness, and he was objected to as incompetent by the plaintiffs, on the ground that he was the husband of Mary E. Powell as well as grantor in the deed. He stated that previous to the execution of that deed, there was an agreement between himself and his wife. That having purchased the tract of eighteen acres of land conveyed in the deed for $1600, and finding he could not pay for it by $600, and still owing the college a debt, Mrs. Powell told him that she had about $600, which she had made from the sale of turkeys, and work, and other savings, which she had been laying up for several years, and that if he would make her a right to this tract of land, she would pay the $600, and convey her interest in the land she had inherited from her father, and in some other lands he had bought adjoining the same, for the express benefit of the college. And he stated that the deed afterwards executed by himself and his wife to George N. Powell was intended to carry out this agreement. . . . The cause came on to be finally heard on the 26th of March, 1853, when the Court held, that the deed of January 1, 1839, from Thomas J. Powell to Bosher, having been made when Powell was indebted to the plaintiffs, was, as to them, null and void, except to the extent of the interests surrendered by Mrs. Powell in relinquishing her right of dower in the lands of her husband, and her right to her own land. And the Court further held that the deed of the 1st of April, 1841, from Thomas J. Powell and wife to George N. Powell, was not fraudulent and void. . . . From this decree the college applied to this court for an appeal which was allowed.

Daniel, for the appellants. Griswold & Claiborne, for the appellees.

Lee, J. — The settlement of Thomas J. Powell upon his wife of the 1st of January, 1839, having been made when he was heavily indebted to the appellants, and as it would seem, insolvent, being of his whole estate, except perhaps his interest in the King William land, which was already incumbered beyond its value by the deed of trust of 1836, and being upon a consideration not at all adequate in value to the property settled, must be held fraudulent and void as to creditors, except so far as it may be sustained for the purpose of rendering to the estate of Mrs. Powell a just equivalent for any interests which she may have surrendered on faith of it. We are therefore to inquire what were the interests, if any, so surrendered, and whether to the extent of those interests the settlement can be held good. And on making this inquiry we are at once met by the objection to the testimony of Thomas J. Powell.

Now it is a pervading principle of the law of evidence, that a husband or wife cannot be a witness in a cause, civil or criminal, in which the other is a party; not for that other, because the law considers them as one person, and their interests as identical; nor against that other, on grounds of public policy; because of the mutual confidence subsisting between them, and for fear of sowing distrust and dissensions and of giving occasion to perjury. Co. Litt. 6b. . . . And if an estate be settled upon a wife, for her sole and separate use, exempt from the debts or control of the husband, the legal identity of interests is regarded as still subsisting, and the husband will not be admitted to testify touching such separate estate, though there may be other parties in respect of whom he would be a competent witness. Windham v. Chetwynd, 1 Burr. R. 424; Davis v. Dinwoody, 4 T. R. 678; Langley v. Fisher, 5 Beav. R. 443; Snyder v. Snyder, 6 Binn. R. 483. So a husband is not a competent witness to prove the execution of a deed conveying property for the benefit of his wife, for the purpose of registration. Johnston v. Slater, 11 Gratt. 321. Nor is it material that the relation of husband and wife no longer exists when the party is offered as a witness, for the incompetency still remains though the marriage have been dissolved by death or a divorce a vinculo matrimonii. Aveson v. Lord Kinnaird, 6 East's R. 188. . . .

This case falls clearly within the rule ascertained by the cases cited. Thomas J. Powell is offered as a witness in support of the settlement made by him upon his wife. By his testimony it is sought to make out the consideration in favor of those now claiming under the wife. For this purpose he was clearly incompetent, nor was his competency restored (as we have seen) by the death of his wife. That he was not himself personally interested because he was bound for the college debt in any event, or that his interest was the same either way, does not vary the case. The authorities cited show that his incompetency does not rest upon the narrow ground of a personal and direct interest in himself, but upon other and different principles. Indeed the incompetency has been maintained even in cases in which the husband's interest was the other way. Thus in an action by the trustee for a wife against the sheriff for taking goods which were separate property, under an execution against the husband, the husband was held to be an incompetent witness for the plaintiff (the wife being regarded as the real plaintiff), although he had an interest on the other side, in having his debt satisfied by the levy of the execution. Davis v. Dinwoody, 4 T. R. 678. . . .

Rejecting then the testimony of Thomas J. Powell, there is no evidence supporting or explaining the item of $600 claimed as part of the consideration of the settlement. . . . But although the claim to this $600 must be abandoned, I am of opinion that the settlement of the 1st of January, 1839, may and should be sustained to the extent of securing to the estate of Mrs. Powell a just and reasonable compensation for the interests in the real property belonging to her, which were surrendered by the deed of the 1st of April, 1841. . . . I am of opinion to affirm so much of the decree as declares the deed of settlement of the 1st of January, 1839, void as to the appellants, except to the extent of the just value of the interests surrendered by Mary E. Powell, in conveying her maiden land and relinquishing her right of dower in the lands of her husband; and also so much of the same as declares the deed from Thomas J. Powell and wife to George N. Powell, of the 1st of April, 1841, to be not fraudulent nor void; but in all other respects to reverse the same, with costs to the appellants. . . .

The other judges concurred in the opinion of LEE, J.

Decree reversed.

102. COMMON LAW PRACTICE COMMISSIONERS. Second Report. (England. 1853. p. 11). The highly satisfactory results of these more enlarged views [represented by the abolition of disqualification by interest in general] induces us to consider whether an exception preserved by the late statute, namely, the exclusion of husband and wife as witnesses for or against each other, may not be abolished.

The incompetency of husband and wife to be witnesses for one another is said to rest on three grounds: 1st, Identity of interest; 2d, the consequent danger of perjury; 3d, the policy of the law, which, as it is said, "deems it necessary to guard the security and confidence of private life, even at the risk of an occasional failure of justice," and which rejects such evidence, because its admission would lead to domestic disunion and unhappiness. The first two grounds are manifestly no longer tenable, since the parties to suits have been themselves made competent to give evidence. It remains to be considered how far the third ground should be allowed to exclude testimony which may be essential to justice. In the first place, it seems clear that no disturbance of domestic happiness need be apprehended from permitting husband and wife to call one another as witnesses. The evidence may in many cases be indispensable A wife often keeps her husband's books, conducts his business in his absence, pays or receives money for him. Even in matters in which she may take a less active part, her testimony may be the only one to prove facts essential to the vindication of her husband's rights, or it may be valuable as confirmatory of the evidence of other witnesses; so, the testimony of the husband may be material to the wife in matters relating to her separate estate, to the proof of her coverture, if sued as a feme sole, and the like. It seems difficult to assign any reason why the law should be more tender of the domestic happiness of married persons than they are themselves disposed to be; the only danger that can be suggested is, that evidence might be extracted from the witness, by the adverse party, prejudicial to the interest of the married plaintiff or defendant, and that some bitterness of feeling might arise in consequence; but of the probability of such a result the married couple are themselves the best judges. Should any fact be thus brought to light which would otherwise have remained unproved, the interests of truth will be thereby promoted, and any transient interruption of conjugal harmony from such a circumstance or from disappointment occasioned by the evidence falling short of what was expected, would be a trifling evil compared to the mischief which must result from the exclusion of testimony essential to the ends of justice and truth.

103. Statutes. [Printed ante, as No. 77]

Sub-topic C. Experiential Capacity [1]

The rulings of Courts applying the requirements of experiential capacity are broadly of two general sorts, answering the questions:

1. On what matters is that general experience, common to every member of the community, a sufficient qualification?

2. When something more than this general experience is necessary, what shall the requirements be, as to such special experience, for the particular matter to be testified to?

More briefly put: 1. On a particular topic, is general experience sufficient? 2. If not, what sort of special experience is necessary?

The rules of law under these two topics form the legitimate subject of the present principle.

In the application of the second inquiry, a third question arises: 3. Has the witness, now offered, the special experience required by the rule for that topic?

104. VANDER DONCKT v. THELLUSSON

COMMON BENCH. 1849

8 C. B. 812

DEBT, on two foreign promissory notes. The first count stated that the defendant, theretofore, to wit, on the 25th of March, 1843, in parts beyond the seas, to wit, at Brussels, in the kingdom of Belgium, according to the law of the said kingdom of Belgium in that behalf, made his promissory note in writing, and delivered the same to the plaintiff, and thereby promised to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 2000 francs at the end of the month of July, 1843, for value received, — which period had elapsed before the commencement of the suit. . . .

The case was tried before PARKE, B., at the spring assizes at Kingston, in 1849. . . . On the part of the defendant, it was objected, that there was a variance between the declaration and the proof, — the declaration describing the notes as payable generally, and the notes themselves, when produced, appearing to be payable at a particular place, viz., the house of M. Legrelle; and that there was no averment or proof of presentment of the notes there. The plaintiff called a witness named De Keyser, who stated that he was a native of Belgium; that he had formerly carried on the business of a merchant and commissioner in stocks and bills of exchange at Brussels, but was now an hotel-keeper in London; and that he was well acquainted with the Belgian law upon the subject of bills and notes. On the part of the defendant, it was objected that M. De Keyser was not an admissible witness to prove the foreign law, he neither being a lawyer, nor a person who was bound, by reason of his holding any office, to have a knowledge of the law of Belgium. The learned judge, however, overruled the objection.

The witness then stated, that, by the law of Belgium, it is not necessary, even though a bill or note is made payable at a particular place, that it should be presented there for payment. Under the direction of the learned judge, — who told them, that, if they believed the law of Belgium to be as stated by De Keyser, they must find for the plaintiff, — the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff.

Willes, in Easter term last, moved for a new trial, on the ground of improper reception of evidence, and misdirection. In order to qualify a person to give evidence of the law of a foreign country, it is essential either that he be a professional man, or that he hold some office which makes it his duty to have a knowledge of such law. In the case of The Queen v. Dent, 1 Carr. & K. 97, it was ruled by WIGHTMAN, J., on an indictment for bigamy, that it is not essential that a witness who is called to prove the law of Scotland as to marriage, should be at all connected with the legal profession. But, in the Sussex Peerage case, 11 Clark & Fin. 85, 134, Lord LYNDHURST, C., in deciding upon the admissibility of the evidence of Dr. Wiseman, as to the law of Rome regarding marriage, says: "He comes within the description of a person peritus virtute officii. I ought to say at once that it is the universal opinion both of the judges and the lords, that the case (The Queen v. Dent), as represented to have been decided by Mr. Justice WIGHTMAN, is not law." . . .

A rule nisi having been granted accordingly, Lush now showed cause. . . . Lush. The witness De Keyser was clearly competent. It was not necessary that he should be a lawyer. . . . This was simply a question of commercial usage. The witness had been a merchant and stock-broker at Brussels, — a person who must be conversant with money securities: and he proves the custom of merchants as to bills and notes. . . . In no case has it ever been held that a lawyer must necessarily be called to speak to foreign law.

Willes, in support of his rule. The simple question is, whether this hotel-keeper is a competent witness to prove the Belgian law. . . . The line must be drawn somewhere: and it would be safer to draw it so as to exclude all except professional men, and persons who, by virtue of their office, may be said to be peritos. (CRESSWELL, J. Would Baron Rothschild be supposed to know anything about the law of England as to bills of exchange?) As a matter of fact, probably he is peritus. . . .

MAULE, J. We must take it to be the law of England, that, in order to prove the law of a foreign country, there must be some special ground for believing that the person who is offered is more than ordinarily capable of speaking upon the subject. In the case of The Queen v. Dent, a witness was called who stated that he was acquainted with the law of Scotland, but it did not appear that he was, or ever had been, connected with the law, or in any situation which made it necessary that he should have made himself acquainted with the Scotch law. The members of the Committee of Privileges in the House of Lords, in the Sussex Peerage case, thought that the ruling of my brother WIGHTMAN in that case was erroneous. We bow to that decision.

The question, then, is, whether the witness who gave evidence of the Belgian law in this case, falls within the principle of exclusion which is implied in the opinion of the lords and the judges in the Sussex Peerage case. Unless he does, he was clearly admissible; for, it is upon that ground only that he is said to be inadmissible. The ground of exclusion relied on, is, as in The Queen v. Dent, that there is a total absence of any peculiar means of information in the witness on the subject upon which he is called to speak. It appeared that he is now carrying on the business of an hotel-keeper, but that he had formerly been a merchant and stock-broker at Brussels. Whatever the line of business he now follows, if he was an expert before, he can hardly be said to be less so now. The question is, whether he is a person having special and peculiar means of knowledge of the law of Belgium with regard to bills of exchange and promissory notes, — one whose business it was to attend to, and make himself acquainted with, the subject. I think, that, inasmuch as he had been carrying on a business which made it his interest to take cognizance of the foreign law, he does fall within the description of an expert. Applying one's common sense to the matter, why should not persons who may be reasonably supposed to be acquainted with the subject, — though they have not filled any official appointment, such as judge, or advocate, or solicitor, — be deemed competent to speak upon it? Persons who have practiced as physicians are frequently examined, and no inquiry is ever made as to whether or not they have a regular diploma. All persons, I think, who practice a business or profession which requires them to possess a certain knowledge of the matter in hand, are experts, so far as expertness is required.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged.

CRESSWELL, J. — I am of the same opinion. . . .

V. WILLIAMS. — I am of the same opinion. It must be taken, upon the evidence of this witness, that it was part of his business as a merchant and broker in Belgium, to acquire a correct notion of the law of that country regarding bills of exchange. He was, therefore, an admissible witness, — though it might turn out that his evidence, like that of many experts and scientific persons, was of very little worth.

105. JONES v. TUCKER

41 N. H. 54

CASE, for injuring, by immoderately driving, a horse, hired of the plaintiff by the defendant. A witness for the plaintiff, whose competency to testify as an expert in the matter was proved to the satisfaction of the Court, was allowed to testify as to the cause, nature, and remedy of the disease of horses called founder, and that the plaintiff's horse was foundered. To the ruling of the Court, admitting this evidence, the defendant excepted, on the ground that the witness was not an expert. A verdict was returned for the plaintiff, which the defendant moved to set aside.

Towle and Bell, for defendant. Hatch & Webster, for the plaintiff.

DOE, J. — When a witness is offered as an expert, three questions necessarily arise: (1) Is the subject concerning which he is to testify, one upon which the opinion of an expert can be received? (2) What are the qualifications necessary to entitle a witness to testify as an expert? (3) Has the witness those qualifications?

1. Experts may give their opinions upon questions of science, skill, or trade, or others of the like kind, or when the subject-matter of inquiry is such that inexperienced persons are unlikely to prove capable of forming a correct judgment upon it without such assistance, or when it so far partakes of the nature of a science as to require a course of previous habit, or study, in order to the attainment of a knowledge of it; and the opinions of experts are not admissible, when the inquiry is into a subject-matter, the nature of which is not such as to require any peculiar habits or study, in order to qualify a man to understand it. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 440; 1 Smith, L. C. 286; Rochester v. Chester, 3. N. H. 349; Petersborough v. Jaffrey, 6 N. H. 462; Whipple v. Walpole, 10 N. H. 130; Beard v. Kirk, 11 N. H. 397; Robertson v. Stark, 15 N. H. 109; Marshall v. Ins. Co., 27 N. H. 157. Upon subjects of general knowledge, which are understood by men in general, and which a jury are presumed to be familiar with, witnesses must testify as to facts alone, and the testimony of witnesses as experts merely is not admissible. Concord Railroad v. Greely, 23 N. H. 237, 243.

2. Experts have been described as "men of science," Folkes v. Chadd, 3 Doug. 157; "persons professionally acquainted with the science of practice," Strickland on Ev. 408; "conversant with the subject-matter," Best's Principles of Evidence, § 346; "persons of skill," Rochester v. Chester, 3 N. H. 349, 365; "experienced persons," Peterborough v. Jaffrey, 6 N. H. 462, 464; "possessed of some particular science or skill respecting the matter in question," Beard v. Kirk, 11 N. H. 397. In Barron v. Cobleigh, 11 N. H. 557, certain lots of land had been surveyed, about fifty years before the trial, by one Snow, a surveyor. The defendants offered one McDuffie as a witness, who testified that he had for many years been a surveyor, and had often run out the lines of the lots surveyed by Snow; and it was said that if the witness had been called to give his opinion, as an expert, whether the marks upon the corners, about which he testified, were ancient marks, he would have been admissible for that purpose. Greater opportunities for observation, and greater study respecting certain subjects, may give the witness superior skill in relation to those subjects, and entitle his opinions to be received as those of an expert. Thus, witnesses who have made it a subject of study and observation, may be admitted to give their opinion respecting handwriting. Robertson v. Stark, 15 N. H. 109, 113. In Marshall v. Ins. Co., 27 N. H. 157, 163, a witness testified that he was a house-joiner, and had always been engaged in that as his business; that he had worked at it himself for many years, and had built a great many houses by contract, employing a great many hands in the prosecution of that business; that during the three preceding years he had built not less than twenty-five houses by contract, and that he considered himself to be well acquainted with the business; and it was remarked by the Court that the witness appeared to have had sufficient experience to entitle him to the character of an expert in his business. An expert must have made the subject upon which he gives his opinion a matter of particular study, practice, or observation, and he must have particular and special knowledge on the subject.

3. The rule determining the subjects upon which experts may testify, and the rule prescribing the qualifications of experts, are matters of law; but whether a witness, offered as an expert, has those qualifications, is a question of fact, to be decided by the Court at the trial. The various disqualifications which render a person incompetent to be sworn and to give any testimony, are fixed by law, but whether the disabilities exist in a particular case is a question of fact. And whether a disability is such that a person cannot testify at all, or only such that he cannot testify as an expert, the existence of the disability is equally a matter of fact, most conveniently and satisfactorily determined at the trial. That an expert must have special and peculiar knowledge or skill, is as definite a rule as that the search for a lost paper, or subscribing witness, must be diligent and thorough; and whether a witness has special and peculiar knowledge, is as much a question of fact as the question whether a search is diligent and thorough. Upon a question of fact, the whole Court will not revise the decision of a presiding justice, unless it is specially reserved by him for revision, and his decision is not subject to exception.

In the present case, it does not appear that the rule of law, prescribing the qualifications of an expert, was disregarded, and the judgment of the presiding justice, as to what the qualifications of the witness were, was conclusive and final. Judgment on the verdict.

106. EVANS v. PEOPLE

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN. 1858

12 Mich. 27

ERROR to Kent Circuit. The plaintiff in error was informed against for murder. . . . On this information defendant was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to the State prison for two years and six months. The case was removed to this court for review, on writ of error and bill of exceptions. The question raised by the exceptions sufficiently appear by the opinion.

Ashley & Chipman, J. T. Holmes and G. V. N. Lothrop, for plaintiff in error. . . . Upon the question as to the prevalence of erysipelas in the neighborhood of the residence of the deceased, physicians alone were competent to testify. . . .

A. Williams, Attorney-General, for the People. . . . The witness residing near the deceased in his lifetime, could testify whether or not there was sickness, but perhaps not, there being sickness, as to the type of it — a point, however, not conceded.

CAMPBELL, J.: Evans, the plaintiff in error, was convicted of manslaughter in killing one Coban Balch. . . . The remaining ground of error alleged is, that one John Hendershot, not being shown to possess any special qualifications, was allowed to answer a question involving an inquiry of medical science, having an important bearing upon the cause of Balch's death. It had been shown that he died of erysipelas, claimed by the prosecution to have resulted from the injuries inflicted by Evans. The defense had introduced medical witnesses, whose evidence tended to prove the existence of that disease in an epidemic form in Balch's neighborhood, previous to his visit to Grand Rapids, where he died two days after the assault upon him. Hendershot was called as a rebutting witness, and was asked, under objection, whether there was "any case of erysipelas about the neighborhood of the residence of the deceased, before his coming to Grand Rapids, in February last"; the witness answered, "No, sir; neither before nor since; no sickness within five or six miles of Coban Balch's residence during the month of February, nor until after that time." There can be no doubt of the importance of these various inquiries, inasmuch as they were aimed at explaining the causes of the death of Balch, and showing how far Evans was responsible for it. It becomes essential, therefore, to consider whether this question was admissible under the circumstances, and also how far the form of the answer may affect the legality of its reception.

If the question was improper, it is because it is supposed to involve obtaining an opinion which no one has a right to give in evidence without an especial knowledge of diseases in general, or of the particular disease named, not supposed to be possessed except by those whose study or attention has been turned in that direction. It is not always easy to determine the propriety of receiving or rejecting testimony concerning matters involving, apparently, to a greater or less extent, medical or other scientific investigation. There are many cases where it is difficult to determine whether the facts to be examined are to be considered beyond the range of ordinary intelligence. And the decisions are by no means clear or satisfactory upon the distinctions. The principles on which the authorities rest are more consistent than the attempts to apply them.

The primary rule, concerning all evidence, is, that personal knowledge of such facts as a court or jury may be called upon to consider, should be required of all witnesses, where it is attainable. . . . And it also follows, that no witness can be permitted to offer such testimony, unless he appears to be qualified, in some degree, at least, to furnish the means of aiding the jury in arriving at a true result. The greatest difficulty encountered in determining questions of competency of testimony, on subjects connected more or less with medical science, is in ascertaining how far it is safe to suppose unprofessional observers are able to form a reliable judgment. There are some simple disorders, which all persons are familiar with. Others require the very highest degree of medical skill to distinguish them from disorders having some resembling appearances or symptoms. In some cases, too, although inquiries arise concerning the existence of health or disease, it does not become important to have accurate information as to the precise character of such disorders as may exist. . . . Thus, when it was held by some authorities that, upon questions touching the mental capacity of a particular person, only physicians and subscribing witnesses could give their opinion, the injury was not made one of science merely, and the scientific expert was put on the same footing, on questions not purely medical, with ordinary witnesses having no scientific knowledge, and whose powers of observation were those possessed by any one in like circumstances. . . .

What is thus true of mental capacity may become equally true in regard to other matters involving some questions of skill. Circumstances may make whole communities familiar with diseases not generally known elsewhere, and reasonably competent to manage ordinary cases of such diseases, and to recognize their symptoms. Such is often the case from necessity in new countries; and the same necessity leads to a more general knowledge of the extent to which a neighborhood has suffered from any prevailing sickness than is usual in populous towns. And it often happens that some persons having no general skill become very familiar with particular subjects. It would be very unwise to exclude such evidence, merely because the range of the witness's knowledge is limited. There are as many grades of knowledge and ignorance in the professions as out of them. The only safe rule in any of these cases is, to ascertain the extent of the witness's qualifications, and, within their range, to permit him to speak. Cross-examinations, and the testimony of others, will here, as in all other cases, furnish the best means of testing his value.

The circumstances of the case, therefore, must be looked at to determine the admissibility, not only of the question put to Hendershot, but also of his answer. As he was not examined concerning his knowledge of erysipelas, or of diseases generally, he could not be asked such a question, if the issue materially required from the witness any such knowledge. The inquiry before the jury was whether the erysipelas, of which Balch died, was dependent on a wound, or was wholly or in part derived from other causes. It was attributed by the defense to his previous exposure to an epidemic. The exact nature, as well as the existence of such epidemic was thus directly in controversy. This question, therefore, could not properly be put to any one not having some knowledge of the disease; and, as the record stands, was erroneously allowed. But Hendershot's answer, denying the existence of any disease whatever in that vicinity, stands on a different footing. The difference between health and any sickness whatever can hardly be regarded as open only to medical knowledge; and his contradiction of the medical testimony is a contradiction of common facts, and not of science. The value of such a sweeping assertion is not to be determined in this Court. The testimony was not incompetent. There was no error in the proceedings, and the judgment must be affirmed.

The other justices concurred.

107. SIEBERT v. PEOPLE

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1892

143 Ill. 571; 32 N. E. 431

WRIT of Error to the Circuit Court of Kane County; the Hon. HENRY B. WILLIS, Judge, presiding.

Messrs. Alschuler & Murphy, and Mr. J. A. Russell, for the plaintiffs in error. . . . The Court erred in admitting improper expert evidence. Boyle v. State, 57 Wis. 472. . . .

Mr. George Hunt, Attorney General, Mr. Frank G. Hanchett, State's Attorney, and Messrs. Hopkins, Aldrich & Thatcher, for the People: . . . A practicing physician, being a graduate of a medical college, may give his opinion founded upon his reading alone. . . .

Mr. Justice CRAIG delivered the opinion of the Court: . . . It is next claimed that the Court erred in allowing Dr. S. C. Gillett and Dr. C. L. Smith to testify as experts on the subject of arsenical poisoning. Dr. Gillett, as to his qualifications as an expert, testified that his profession was that of physician and surgeon; that he was a graduate of Rush Medical College of Chicago; that he had been a practicing physician in Aurora for thirty-four years, and that he was a licensed practitioner under the laws of the State of Illinois. An hypothetical question was then put to him by the prosecution, setting forth the symptoms of the deceased, and he was asked from what cause, in his opinion, the deceased came to his death. This was objected to by both of the defendants, on the ground, among others, that the witness did not properly qualify as an expert, which objection was overruled, the defendants excepting. The witness then testified, in substance: "If I found arsenic, then I should expect he died from the effects of arsenic." The testimony of the other witness did not differ materially from the evidence of Gillett, except that he had been in practice but twelve years. It will be observed that the two witnesses were both graduates of medical colleges, and that they were engaged in general practice and had been for a number of years. Whether they had ever had any experience in a case of poisoning in the practice does not appear from their examination.

It is insisted that it devolved on the prosecution to show that the witnesses had, in their practice, had a case of arsenical poisoning before they could testify. This is a question upon which the authorities are not entirely harmonious. In the State v. Terrell, 12 Rich. (S. C.) 321, on an indictment for murder produced by poison, the same objection was interposed to certain witnesses called by the prosecution as has been raised in this case, but the Court held that medical witnesses, in giving their opinions as experts, are not confined to opinions derived from their own observation and experience, but may give opinions based upon information derived from the books. In Mitchell v. The State, 58 Ala. 417, which was an indictment for murder by poisoning by arsenic, a physician was allowed to give his opinion as to the cause of death, although it did not appear that he had ever attended cases of that character, and in passing on the admissibility of the evidence the Court held that a physician who has had long experience in the practice of his profession, and knowledge of the symptoms of the malady of the deceased, is competent to testify as an expert. . . . The case differs in its facts so widely from the case under consideration that we do not regard it as an authority here. . . . Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co., 6 Allen 146, has also been cited as an authority. The action was one brought to recover damages for an injury to plaintiff's health, caused by an accidental escape of gas. On the trial a witness was called as an expert, but it appeared that he had no experience as to the effects upon the health of breathing illuminating gas. He was merely a physician who had been in practice several years, and the Court held that he was not qualified to testify as an expert, and this ruling was affirmed in the Supreme Court. In the decision it is said: "The mere fact that he was a physician would not prove that he had any knowledge of gas, without further proof as to his experience, for it is notorious that many persons practice medicine who are without learning, and a physician may have much professional knowledge without being acquainted with the properties of gas or its effect on health." What was said in the case cited cannot apply to a case of this character. An ordinary physician might not be acquainted with the properties of gas or its effect on health, but a physician of but slight experience would have no difficulty in telling the effect likely to result from taking into the stomach a deadly poison.

Without, however, extending the discussion of the question any further, we are inclined to hold that the opinions of the witnesses, founded on their practice, were competent evidence. What weight, however, should be given to the evidence was a question for the jury. . . .

After a careful consideration of the entire record we find no substantial error, and the judgment will have to be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

SUB-TOPIC D. PERCEPTION (OBSERVATION, KNOWLEDGE) [1]

(1) In General

108. JOHN AYLIFFE. Parergon. (1726. p. 540). Testimony or evidence ought first of all to be given and founded on some principal corporeal sense of their own, according to the nature and quality of the fact, as on their sight, hearing, touching, tasting, or smelling; and not on the corporeal sense of another person. . . . And thus witnesses ought to depose appositely "de proprio suo sensu," and not "de sensu alieno."

[1] For the principles of Psychology here applicable, see the present Compiler's "Principles of Judicial Proof" (1913), Nos. 234–238.

109. Bushel's Case. (1670. Vaughan, 135). Vaughan, C. J. (noting the difference between a juryman and a witness): A witness swears but to what he hath heard or seen, — generally or more largely, to what hath fallen under his senses.

110. Thomas Starkie. Evidence. (1824. p. 79, 127). To render the communication of facts perfect, the witnesses . . . should possess, in the first place, the means and opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the facts. . . . A witness who states facts ought to state those only of which he has personal knowledge; and such knowledge is supposed, if not expressly stated, upon the examination in chief; and upon cross-examination his means of knowledge may be fully investigated, and if he has not sufficient and adequate means of knowledge, his evidence will be struck out.

111. Evans v. People, 12 Mich. 35, and Elliott v. Van Buren, 33 id., 52 (1863, 1875). Campbell, J. The primary rule concerning all evidence is that personal knowledge of such facts as a Court or jury may be called upon to consider should be required of all witnesses, where it is attainable. . . . No one can be allowed to prove what he has never learned, whether it be ordinary or scientific facts.

112. Walter Bushnell's Trial. (Wiltshire, 1656. Howell's State Trials, V, 633). [The Wiltshire Commissioners summoned Mr. Walter Bushnell, Vicar of Box, near Malmsbury, before them, to answer to a charge of drunkenness, profanation of the Sabbath, gaming, and disaffection to the government; and after a full hearing, and proof upon oath, they ejected him. The Vicar prepared for the press a narrative of the proceedings of the Commissioners. . . . He is now impeaching the testimony of William Pinchin, one of the chief witnesses against him.] William Pinchin goes on in these words: "That about eight years since, when Mr. Bushnell came first to Box, he feasted his friends on the Lord's day, and having drank liberally that day there, Thrift, one of the guests, was killed in the Tower there, but by what means this deponent knoweth not. And said farther, That he knoweth, that Mr. Bushnell have usually till within this two years frequented ale-houses in parish business, and have there drank hard in Mr. Speke's and Mr. Long's company; and have seen him sit there drinking after they have been gone, but cannot say that ever he saw him drunk." . . .

And first I shall tell thee that whatsoever William Pinchin deposeth touching my feasting on the Lord's day, or drinking liberally on that day, or of the death of John Thrift, he hath only upon conjecture, or else upon hearsay. For he then upon oath acknowledged before the Commissioners, that he was not that day at Box, but at Broughton, which is four or five miles distant from Box, and it is like enough he was there at the Revel, that being their Revel day. . . . William Pinchin acknowledgeth himself to be absent, and yet he swears as if he had been at Box. I am not so much a lawyer as to know how far an oath will extend, or to what it will amount, if a man depose nothing but what he hath received by hearsay. . . . "He is a false witness, not only he who tells a lie, but he also who testifies a truth whereof he hath not a certain and undoubted knowledge," that is, if he testify that which he hath neither seen nor heard, nor hath had any experience of. . . . Proportionably say I, If William Pinchin were then at Broughton, it is impossible that he should see it. And if he saw it not, how could he be a witness?

113. R. v. Dewhurst. (1820. 1 State Tr. n. s. 529, 590). Mr. Raines (cross-examining). — Upon your oath, did you not see something very like that which I have read to you?

Witness. — I cannot recollect.

Mr. Raines. — Will you swear you do not believe what I have read to you?

Bayley, J. — It must be belief from recollection.

Mr. Raines. — I should have thought it was a legitimate question capable of being answered.

Bayley, J. — If it admits of a legitimate answer. It may not; because he might say "I believe it, because I have heard people say so."

114. Parnell Commission's Proceedings. (1888. 36th day, Times' Rep. pt. 10, p. 18). [The Irish Land League and its leaders being charged with complicity in certain crimes, particularly in the Phœnix Park assassination of 1882, certain of the known criminals testified that their body, the Invincibles, had received assistance-money from the League. It had turned out, on cross-examining one of them, that his testimony to the receipt of this money from the League officers was not based on his own knowledge at all, but merely on what he had heard from others. Another of these persons was now asked on direct examination as follows:]

Sir H. James. — Tell me of your own knowledge whether you know of his receiving any money from the Land League.

Sir C. Russell. — My Lords, I would ask my learned friend to be particular as to that question "of his own knowledge," after the experience we had of Delaney's evidence. "Did he see any one pay him?" is the proper form of question.

Sir H. James. — I think not.

Sir C. Russell. — With great deference, my Lords, it is. We had a deliberate statement the other day in answer to a similar question put to a witness, "Did you know this?" and "Did you know that?" and, afterwards in cross-examination, it turned out that he did not know it of his own knowledge, but it was what had been told him. I want to guard against a repetition of that. The proper form of question as I submit is, "Did he see any money paid?"

Sir H. James (to the witness). — You understand what I mean — do you know this of your own knowledge?

Sir C. Russell. — I am objecting to the form of the question.

President Hannen. — It is a very usual form of question.

Sir C. Russell. — I respectfully say, in view of the reasons I have given, that the proper question is, "Did he see any money paid?"

President Hannen. — I shall not interfere with the discretion of counsel in asking a question in a manner which is quite usual.

Sir C. Russell. — I have pointed out the danger — the great danger — of putting the question in the form in which my learned friend is putting it.

President Hannen. — Precisely so; and you have also shown where the safeguard lies, namely, in cross-examination.

115. STATE v. FLANDERS

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1859

38 N. H. 324

INDICTMENT, charging the respondent with the crime of forgery, in having altered, at Manchester, in said county, on the fourth day of August, 1857, a bond of that date, in the penal sum of forty thousand dollars, signed by himself as principal, and by Samuel Andrews and Luther Aiken as sureties, given and payable to Thomas P. Webber. The bond was originally written with a condition to indemnify Webber against the attachments made by Asa T. Barron, or by his procurement, on a house at the corner of Union and Concord streets, in Manchester, which the respondent had bargained to sell to Webber for about the sum of $6,000. The alteration, whereby the forgery was charged to have been committed, consisted in adding to the condition of the bond, after the provision to save Webber harmless from the attachments on the house made by Barron, or his procurement, the words, "or from any and every claim whatsoever." . . . It was also admitted that the respondent altered the bond in this material manner, after it was signed by Andrews, without authority first obtained from him.

The principal questions before the jury were, whether the signature of Aiken was upon the bond when the respondent made the alteration; the evidence being clear that Aiken never saw the bond before it was passed to Webber, except when he signed it, and never assented to any alteration afterwards, and whether Andrews assented to the alteration after it was made and before the respondent passed or attempted to pass the bond to Webber as genuine. Upon the first question Webber testified positively that Aiken's signature was upon the bond before the alteration was made. Aiken testified that he read the bond hastily when he signed it, and could not say whether it had then been altered or not, although he had an impression in regard to it. The Court thereupon permitted the counsel for the government to ask him, against the respondent's objection, what his impression was, and he testified that his impression was, that it had not then been altered, but contained an indemnity against the Barron attachment only as originally written. . . .

Joel Parker (of Massachusetts), for the respondent. The evidence of Aiken respecting his impression was inadmissible. . .

A. F. Stevens (Solicitor for Hillsborough County), for the State. The testimony of Aiken, as to his impression, was properly admitted. . . .

SAWYER, J. . . . Another question in the case is, whether the testimony of Aiken, as to his impression, was properly received. He testified that he read the bond hastily when he signed it, and could not say whether it had then been altered or not, but that he had an impression in regard to it. The government then asked what the impression was, to which the respondent objected.

The objection has several aspects. An impression as to a past fact may mean personal knowledge of the fact as it rests in the memory, though the remembrance is so faint that it cannot be characterized as an undoubting recollection, and is therefore spoken of as an impression. This, perhaps, is the sense in which the word is most commonly used by witnesses, in giving their testimony. In this sense the impression of a witness is evidence, however indistinct and unreliable the recollection may be. No line can be drawn for the exclusion of any record left upon the memory, as the impress of personal knowledge, because of the dimness of the inscription. If, therefore, the objection is to be considered as one taken to the general competency of such testimony, it is clear that it was properly overruled.

An impression, however, may mean an understanding or belief of the fact, derived from some other source than personal observation, as the information of others; or it may mean an inference or conclusion of the mind as to the existence of the fact, drawn from a knowledge of other facts. When used in these senses, it is not evidence; and the objection may be understood to be that enough appears in the other statements of the witness, when considered in connection with the subject of his testimony, to show that he intended to use the word in one of these senses as his understanding and belief, or his inference and conclusion, and not as his recollection.

It has been urged in the argument, that when the witness stated that he read the bond hastily, and could not say whether it had then been altered or not, he was fairly to be understood as meaning that he had no such recollection, founded on his personal observation, as would enable him to testify from memory; and that, consequently, by the word impression, he must have meant an understanding or inference, resulting from the information of others, or the operations of his own mind, instead of his personal knowledge of the fact. If it was apparent to the Court that the word was thus used, the objection is well taken. We think, however, that, taking the whole testimony together, it may be understood to mean that, although, from the slight attention which he gave to the bond in his hasty reading, he cannot say positively whether the alteration had been made or not, he nevertheless had an impression upon his memory, derived from reading it, that it had not. At least, it may be said that the jury might so understand him, without doing violence to any fact or statement contained in his testimony. If it was susceptible of that construction, it could not be excluded by the Court merely because a different interpretation might be put upon it, which would render it incompetent. If the parties choose to leave the testimony of a witness doubtful, by refraining to draw from him an explicit declaration of his meaning, when it is susceptible of two interpretations, one of which renders it competent and the other incompetent, it must be submitted to the jury, with proper instructions, of course, as to how they are to regard it, when they have ascertained what his meaning really was. . . .

The jury should have been instructed that, . . . if the respondent subsequently procured his assent to the alteration before delivering the bond to Webber, the respondent should be acquitted, unless, upon other evidence in the case, they found the existence of the fraudulent intent prior to the time of procuring the assent. For this cause a new trial must be granted. The other questions presented by the case may not be material on the new trial, and have not, therefore, been considered. Verdict set aside, and new trial granted.

116. PERRY v. BURTON

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1884

3 Ill. 138

APPEAL from the Superior Court of Cook County; the Hon. JOHN A. JAMESON, Judge, presiding.

Mr. Edmund S. Holbrook, for the appellants. Messrs. Moore & Browning, for the appellees. Messrs. G. & W. Garnett, for the Louisville Banking Company.

Mr. Chief Justice SCHOLFIELD delivered the opinion of the Court: This was a bill for the partition, as first drawn, of a tract of eighty acres of land in Cook County, and to quiet the title thereto. By an amendment to the bill, the north forty acres of the tract were taken out of the controversy, and the allegations and prayer of the bill were limited to the south forty acres. . . . It is contended on behalf of the appellees that the deed of Judd, and the sheriff's tax deed to Cook, constituted color of title in him, obtained in good faith, and that the evidence shows that he paid taxes thereunder for seven successive years. Appellants deny both that those deeds constituted color of title in Cook and that the evidence shows that he paid taxes thereunder for any period of seven years successively. . . . The title to one undivided half was in the heirs at law of John Gibson, deceased, and the title to the other undivided half was in Chambers and Benedict. If it be conceded that a tax title could, under the law then in force, be acquired to an undivided interest in a tract of land, it is obvious there being default in the payment of taxes on either undivided half would have justified the description of the land as it was described in the tax sale and the tax deed. The difficult question is to ascertain whether that undivided half was that held by Chambers and Benedict, or that held by the heirs at law of Gibson. . . .

The evidence of Cook, as we understand it, shows that he paid taxes on the undivided half belonging to Chambers and Benedict, under a claim and belief of ownership, and consequently that the delinquency must have been that of Gibson's heirs at law. He says: "After I received that deed I paid taxes. I paid on the whole, or both undivided halves. I paid taxes on it before I purchased it for taxes. Yes, sir; on the whole of it, I think." Question 14: "And was you certain you paid on your own individual half?" Answer: "Yes, sir." . . . The evidence of the payment of taxes for seven successive years is confined to Cook's statements. In his direct examination he is quite full and positive as to the payment, but in his cross-examination he shows that in fact he knows nothing about it. All that he proves is that he instructed his agent to pay, not these particular taxes, but all his taxes. Thus, he is asked: "Do you remember it" (i.e., the payment of taxes on this property) "clearly?" And he answers: "Well, I judge so from the fact if it had been sold I would have had to redeem it, as I paid taxes right along." Then he is asked: "So your remembrance is one of inference?" To which he replied: "Well, yes. It is a good many years ago. I can't swear to any particular point. That is my general idea of it, to the best of my recollection." He was then asked: "Can you swear positively that you paid any one certain year — say 1850?" He answered: "Well, my impression is that the taxes were paid every year, except by some mishap my agent did not pay it. He was authorized and directed to pay the taxes on my property." Again he says: "Well, I know they were paid, as I had an agent to pay my taxes. I could not say my agent paid every year. It was his business to do it." And again: "I presume it was paid every year." And still again, in speaking of their payment, he says: "It is the presumption. I would not swear positively to anything."

We said in Hurlbut v. Bradford, 109 Ill. 397, where the same kind of question was before us: "Inasmuch as the payment of taxes under color of title operates to defeat the paramount and all other titles, when relied on, the proof must be clear and convincing. Such titles should not be overcome by loose and uncertain testimony, or upon mere conjecture or violent presumptions." This evidence utterly fails to come up to this standard. For the reasons given, the decree below is reversed and the cause remanded. Decree reversed.

117. KILLEN v. LIDE'S ADM'R

65 Ala. 505

Appeal from the Circuit Court of Montgomery. Tried before the Hon. James Q. Smith.

This action was brought by the administratrix of the estate of Charles

W. A. Lide, deceased, against William J. Killen, to recover damages for the alleged conversion of several bales of cotton; and was commenced on the 26th September, 1876. "On the trial," as the bill of exceptions states, "there was evidence tending to show that plaintiff's intestate and defendant cropped together in 1870 and 1871, under an agreement by which the defendant was to furnish the land and teams, and plaintiff's intestate was to furnish and feed the laborers, and share equally the crops made. . . . There was evidence tending to show, on the part of the defendant, various advances in money and supplies to the plaintiff's intestate, on his individual account, during the years 1870 and 1871. There was evidence tending to show that there had never been a settlement between them; and there was other evidence tending to show a full and complete settlement between them in the spring of 1872." . . . The plaintiff introduced one Lide as a witness, who was a nephew of her intestate, and, with his father, had lived and worked on the same plantation with the intestate during the year 1870, and on an adjoining place during the year 1871. "This witness, while being examined by plaintiff's counsel, and not in response to any question propounded by defendant, stated that, if plaintiff's intestate had any money while he lived with defendant, he (witness) would have been apt to know it, and that he did not think he had any. The defendant moved to exclude this statement from the jury; and the Court said, it would not exclude the evidence, if the witness had an opportunity of knowing. The witness then stated: 'I was about there a good deal, and if he had any money, I would have known it. He had none. I had a good opportunity of knowing.' The defendant moved to exclude this evidence from the jury," and he reserved an exception to the overruling of his objection. . . .

Watts & Sons, for appellant. Clopton, Herbert & Chambers, contra.

Stone, J. . . . The testimony of the witness Lide, to the effect that, if intestate had any money, he, witness, would have been apt to know it, and that he did not believe he had any money; and further, that if deceased had money, he, witness, would have known it, and that deceased had no money, was all illegal. Having money or not, is not one of the patent facts, which is open to general observation. Money is not usually carried in sight. That witness was about there (intestate's residence) a great deal, would not tend to show that he would know intestate had, or had not money. Want of knowledge of things open to the senses, in a person who had the opportunity of knowing such fact if it existed, is some evidence, though slight, that the thing did not exist. The present case is not brought within this rule. . . . Reversed and remanded.

118. PITTSBURGH, VIRGINIA & CHARLESTON R. CO. v. VANCE

115 Pa. 326; 8 Atl. 764

FEBRUARY 1, 1887. Before MERCUR, Ch. J., GORDON, PAXSON, STERRETT, GREEN, and CLARK, JJ. TRUNKEY, J., absent. Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Fayette County: Of January Term, 1887, No. 123.

On May 8, 1882, Thomas Vance presented his petition to the Court of Common Pleas of Fayette County for the appointment of viewers to assess damages sustained by him by reason of the location and construction of the Pittsburgh, Virginia & Charleston Railway Company over his land. The Court thereupon, on the nomination of the parties, appointed viewers under the Act of February 19, 1849. The railway company took a strip of the land of Thomas Vance, sixty feet wide and twenty-three hundred feet long. This was a part of a tract of land of 90 acres, used as a farm, and upon which, in addition to the farm buildings, were a grist mill and a saw mill operated by him. The viewers entered upon the discharge of their duties and, on June 21, 1882, filed their report, awarding Thomas Vance $1,100 damages. From this he appealed; the issue was made up and tried before a Court, INGHRAM, P. J., and a jury. Verdict for the plaintiff, Thomas Vance, for $4,532.50, and judgment thereon. The defendant, the Pittsburgh, Virginia & Charleston Railway Company, thereupon took this writ and filed inter alia the following assignments of error: 1. The Court erred in not sustaining the objection of the defendant to the qualification of witness John Brownfield to give an estimate of plaintiff's damages, the offer and objection and ruling being as follows, viz.: Witness John Brownfield, having testified that he is "not much acquainted" with plaintiff's farm, "only the lower part, I was never over it, only on it about the house and railroad and mill," was asked by plaintiff:

Q. — Well, sir, state what you consider, if any, the difference in the market value of that tract of land of about eighty-eight acres, as affected by the location and construction of the railroad upon it?" The defendant objects that the witness has disclosed facts which show that he is not competent to give an estimate. By the Court: "He has answered that he was acquainted with the land before and since the construction of the railroad, and, if the witness is able to answer the question, it is a proper question." Objection overruled, and exception sealed for the defendant. . . .

Nathaniel Ewing, for plaintiff in error. — A perusal of the testimony of each of the witnesses named in the assignments of error will disclose how completely lacking they are in all essential requirements to give estimates of the damages for the guidance of the jury. Such an estimate is, as Justice STRONG said, in Watson v. P. & C. R. R. Co., 1 Wright 481, "but a mere guess, with no substantial foundation upon which to rest." . . .

R. H. Lindsey (A. D. Boyd with him), for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court February 21, 1887. . . . The general selling price of lands in the neighborhood cannot be shown by evidence of particular sales of alleged similar properties; it is a price fixed in the mind of the witness from a knowledge of what lands are generally held at for sale, and at which they are sometimes actually sold, bona fide, in the neighborhood. . . . In order, therefore, that a witness may be competent to testify intelligently as to the market value of land, he should have some special opportunity for observation; he should, in a general way, and to a reasonable extent, have in his mind the data from which a proper estimate of value ought to be made; if interrogated, he should be able to disclose sufficient actual knowledge of the subject to indicate that he is in condition to know what he proposes to state, and to enable the jury to judge of the probable proximate accuracy of his conclusions. . . .

In the case now under consideration, John Brownfield was called as a witness on part of the plaintiff; he stated, in the most unequivocal manner, that he was not much acquainted with the land in question; that he had been on the lower part of it, but that he knew nothing at all about the upper part; that he had seen the lower part a couple of times, seven or eight years ago, but had not seen it for four or five years before the railroad was built; that he knew nothing whatever of the quality of the upper part, which was the greater part of the tract, and that his estimate was made with reference solely to the lower part, which he knew. It certainly does not require much argument to show that Brownfield was an incompetent witness to testify on this question; he had not sufficient knowledge of the requisite facts upon which to base an opinion. In the assessment of damages, regard was to be had to the tract of land, taken as a whole, and yet the greater part of it, he freely confessed, he knew nothing about. He did not pretend to know the general selling price of land in the neighborhood, and admits that he did not know enough about the premises injured to make any estimate whatever.

The first assignment of error is, therefore, sustained. It is unnecessary to refer, in detail, to the testimony of the witnesses mentioned in the second and third assignments; what has been said with reference to the testimony of Brownfield, indicates the course of examination which should be pursued, and, as the cause must go back for a second trial, the same rule of examination will be applicable to all the witnesses named. . . .

The judgment is reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

INDICTMENT for barn burning, tried before EWART, J., at the July, 1895, Term of the Criminal Circuit Court for Buncombe County. The defendant was convicted and appealed. The facts appear in the opinion of Associate Justice FURCHES.

The Attorney-General and Locke Craig, for the State. Messrs. Adams & Parker, for defendant (appellant).

FURCHES, J.: The exceptions not appearing very plainly from the record, it was agreed by the Attorney-General and Mr. Adams, who represented the defendant, to submit the case on three exceptions. . . .

(3) The Court erroneously allowed the evidence of Doskins as to seeing defendant the night of the fire. . . . The third exception cannot be sustained. John Dawkins, among other things, testified: "I recollect the night when the barn was burnt. I met a man whom I took to be Lytle; I was in seven steps of him, the man whom I took to be Lytle, in the road near my house. He was a low, chunky man. It was too dark to see whether he was white or black. He had his back to me, had on a dark sack coat. I have known Lytle ten years, have seen him often. Had I spoken to him, I would have called him Lytle. This was almost 7:30 on the Howard Gap road. This was the night the barn was burnt." This evidence was objected to, allowed, and defendant excepted, and State v. Thorp, 72 N. C. 186, is cited to sustain the exception. But it will be seen that this case is easily distinguished from Thorp's case. That case holds that a witness should not be allowed to give his "impression as to the matters of which he has no personal knowledge," that is, he should not be allowed to give the results of his mind, his reasoning, as evidence, but only the results produced on his senses, as seeing, hearing, etc. In fact, the case of State v. Thorp, sustains the ruling of the Court as does also that of State v. Rhodes, supra.

It is true that it appears from the evidence sent up that upon cross-examination by defendant, the witness Dawkins said, "I only judged it was Lytle from his chunky build and the fact that I had heard he had gone up the road that day." If this had been the evidence called out by the State under the objection of defendant, we would have held that the latter part of the sentence ("and the fact that I had heard he had gone up the road that day") was improper as a means of identifying Lytle. This would have fallen within the criticism of Judge READE in delivering the opinion in State v. Thorp, supra. But there are two reasons why it cannot avail the defendant here: it was called out by him on cross-examination, and it was not objected nor excepted to. Affirmed.

120. GRAYSON v. LYNCH

163 U. S. 468; 16 Sup. 1064

THIS was an action originally begun in the District Court for the Third Judicial District, for the county of Dona Ana, New Mexico, by the appellees, constituting the firm of Lynch Bros., against the appellants, who are members of the firm of Grayson & Co., for loss and damage to a herd of cattle by a disease known as "Texas cattle fever," claimed to have been communicated to them by certain cattle owned by defendants, which had been shipped from infected districts in Texas, and permitted to roam over plaintiffs' range. . . . The case was tried by the District Court, which, having heard the evidence and arguments of counsel, found the issue in favor of the plaintiffs, and entered a judgment against the defendants for the sum of $5,200 damages, together with their costs. . . . Upon this finding, the Court ordered a judgment to be entered affirming the judgment of the Court below, and allowed an appeal to this Court.

Mr. T. B. Catron, for appellants. Mr. Samuel M. Arnel and Mr. S. B. Newcombe, for appellees.

Mr. Justice BROWN delivered the opinion of the Court.

Fourteen assignments of error are addressed to the admission of the depositions of Salmon and Detmers, who testified as experts to the nature and symptoms of the disease, and to the fact that there were certain districts infected with the fever. Salmon resided in Washington, was a professor of veterinary medicine, chief of the United States Bureau of Animal Industry, and at the time in the service of the United States government. He had held this position for more than ten years; had been chief of the veterinary division of the Department of Agriculture; had been in the employ of the Department of Agriculture, investigating the diseases of animals, for over fifteen years, and was called to Washington about 1883 in the discharge of his duties. He had investigated the disease known as the Texas fever. Detmers resided in Illinois, was a veterinary surgeon, and had been in the employ of the Department of Agriculture for the purpose of investigating contagious, infectious, and epizootic diseases of horses, cattle, and swine, and had investigated the disease known as Texas fever, and was acquainted with its symptoms and diagnosis; had made a good many post mortem examinations of cattle that had died with it, and was familiar with the disease. If these gentlemen, who were connected with the Department of Agriculture and made a specialty of investigating animal diseases, were not competent to speak upon the subject as experts, it would probably be impossible to obtain the testimony of witnesses who were.

The fact that they spoke of certain districts of Texas as being infected with that disease was perfectly competent, though they may never have visited those districts in person. In the nature of their business, in the correspondence of the department, and in the investigation of such diseases, they would naturally become much better acquainted with the districts where such diseases originated or were prevalent, than if they had been merely local physicians and testified as to what came under their personal observation. The knowledge thus gained cannot properly be spoken of as hearsay, since it was a part of their official duty to obtain such knowledge, and learn where such diseases originated or were prevalent, and how they became disseminated throughout the country. Spring Co. v. Edgar, 99 U. S. 645; State v. Wood, 53 N. H. 484; Dole v. Johnson, 50 N. H. 452; Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co., 6 Allen 148. . . . As one of these witnesses testified that Oak and Bee Counties in Texas were known to be permanently infected with the fever, and as the Court found that these counties were a part of the infected district; and also found that the cattle in question were shipped from those counties into the Territory of New Mexico, and that the defendants were notified by the plaintiffs of the existence of such disease in these counties at the time they drove their cattle across plaintiffs' range; . . . we see no reason for attacking the findings of the Court in this connection. . . .

There is no error in this case of which the defendants are entitled to complain, and the judgment of the Court below is accordingly affirmed.

Mr. Justice FIELD dissented.

(2) Handwriting[1]

121. LORD FERRERS v. SHIRLEY

Fitzgibbon 195

UPON a feigned issue out of Chancery, directed to be tried at Bar, whether a deed pretended to have been executed by Robert Earl Ferrers, in the year 1683, was his deed, or not, several witnesses were called to swear to the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, now dead; and amongst others one J. J., who would have swore to the handwriting of one J. Cottington, whose name was to the deed as a witness, because he had seen several letters wrote by J. Cottington. Thereupon he was asked, whether he had ever seen the said Cottington write; to which he answered, that he never did, nor never saw the person that wrote the said letters; but that his master, to whom the said letters were wrote for the rent of a part of the estate of the late Earl Robert Ferrers, which his said master held, informed him, they were the letters of J. Cottington, the Lord Ferrer's steward, who was the person pretended to have attested the deed in question. Hereupon it was objected to his testimony, because he could not say with any certainty, whether or no the writer of the letters was the same person that attested the deed; for that the J. Cottington that was supposed to write the letters, might get some other person to write those very letters for him; and the counsel insisted, that in all cases, where a witness would swear to the handwriting, he must be able to say, that he saw such person write.

The COURT rejected the said J. J. because he could not ascertain the identity of the person.

But my Lord RAYMOND said, that it is not necessary in all cases that the witness have seen the person write, to whose hand he swears; for where there has been a fixed correspondence by letters, and that it can be made out that the party writing such letters is the same man, that attested a deed, that will entitle a witness to swear to that person's hand, though he never saw him write.

PAGE, Justice, said: If a subscribing witness to a deed lives in the West Indies, whose handwriting is to be proved in England; a witness here may swear to his hand, by having seen the letters of such person wrote by him to his correspondent in England, because under the special circumstances of that case, there is no other way, or at least, the difficulty will be great, to prove the handwriting of such subscribing witness. But my Lord RAYMOND differed, and said, that those special circumstances could not vary the reason of the thing.

It was further objected to the said witness, that he should produce the letters, that the Court and the jury might be able to judge of the resemblance between the hand to the letters, and that to the deed; but this was overruled by the Court, because the witness might well have acquired a knowledge of Cottington's character, by having seen several letters wrote by him.

122. EAGLETON v. KINGSTON. (1803. Chancery. 8 Ves. Jr. 473). ELDON, L. C. When I first came into the profession, the rule as to handwriting in Westminster Hall in all the Courts was this: You called a witness, and asked whether he had ever seen the party write. If he said he had, whether more or less frequently, that was enough to introduce the further question, whether he believed the paper to be his handwriting. . . . Or you might ask a witness who had not seen him write for a length of time, if you could not get a witness of a subsequent date. . . . This rule was laid down with so much clearness that till very lately I never heard of evidence in Westminster Hall of comparison of handwriting by those who had never seen the party write. [The same judge, in 1814, in WADE v. BROUGHTON, 3 Ves. & B. 172]. . . . Where there has been correspondence by letters, the contents of which are such as to render it probable that they were received [by the genuine person], perhaps impossible to suppose the contrary, that course of correspondence will do; and that has grown up in modern times.

123. ROWT'S ADM'X v. KILE'S ADM'R. (1829. Virginia. Leigh 225). COALTER, J. The reason why a witness must see another write in order to form an opinion of the character of his handwriting, is not, I apprehend, because seeing the party write gives you a knowledge of the character of his hand; he must see the handwriting itself, after the act of writing is performed, in order to acquire that knowledge. But when he sees the manual operation himself, he knows that the handwriting, which he at the same time or afterwards inspects, is the handwriting of the party. He thus acquires a knowledge (more or less perfect, according to frequency and opportunity, and his skill in such matters) of a handwriting, which he knows to be that of a certain individual; and having this knowledge within his mind, as he has of the human countenance, he compares with it a writing, alleged to be the act of the same individual but which he has not seen him write, in order to decide, whether it does or does not possess the same characteristic marks. . . .

But the character of a handwriting, may be as well or even better known, by one who never saw another write, as by one who has. Cases of this kind occur in a course of a long correspondence, on business, between parties who never saw each other write. The perfect knowledge of handwriting arises from frequently seeing the writing itself, not the manual operation — from which, without looking at the writing itself, you can form no opinion. Being accustomed to see the operation, is only full evidence that the writing which you have thus seen, and the character of which is more or less distinctly impressed on your mind, according to circumstances, is the character of the manual writing of that individual. In the course of business and correspondence, you acquire an equally perfect knowledge of the handwriting of the individual; you equally recognize it as an individual hand, which you can distinguish (as you can the human countenance) from any other hand, with as much certainty as you would the handwriting of one you are accustomed to see write; and yet, if you should meet your correspondent in the street, you would not know him. This writing may have been performed by the clerk of the person in whose name it is, and if so, you have no knowledge of the handwriting of that person, though you have of that of his clerk; yet all the correspondence being in one hand, and it being usual for the party himself to carry it on, such witness has been admitted to prove the handwriting to be his. This would be entirely defeated by proof that the letters were written by the clerk; and is weakened in proportion to any doubts that may exist, whether the party, whose handwriting is to be proved, wrote the letters or not.

124. STATE v. ALLEN. (1820. North Carolina. 1 Hawks 6). TAYLOR, C. J. . . . The only methods of proving the handwriting of a person, sanctioned by law, are,

First, By a witness who saw him sign the very paper in dispute;

Secondly, By one who has seen him write, and has thereby fixed a standard in his own mind, by which he ascertains the genuineness of any other writing imputed to him;

Thirdly, By a witness who has received letters from the supposed writer, of such a nature as renders it probable that they were written by the person from whom they purport to come. Such evidence is only admissible where there is good reason to believe that the letters, from which the witness has derived his knowledge, were really written by the supposed writer of the paper in question.

Fourthly, When a witness has become acquainted with his manner of signing his name, by inspecting other ancient writings bearing the same signature, and which have been regarded and preserved as authentic documents. This mode of proof is confined to ancient writings, and is admitted as being the best the nature of the case will allow.

Other modes of proving handwriting, not yet sanctioned by adjudged cases, may possibly come within the reason of the cases enumerated; but I think they ought to appear clearly to do so, before they are admitted.

125. STATE v. GOLDSTEIN

SUPREME COURT OF NEW JERSEY. 1905

72 N. J. L. 336; 62 Atl. 1006

ON writ of error to the Morris Quarter Sessions. Before GUMMERE, Chief Justice, and Justices FORT, GARRETSON, and PITNEY.

The defendant was indicted for and convicted of the crime of indecently exposing his person in a public place. The exposure was made in the grocery store of the defendant, in the town of Butler, on the 29th day of August, 1903, in the presence of one E. B., a girl about fifteen years old, who had gone there to purchase goods. . . . The defendant, being called as a witness in his own behalf, denied having committed the offense charged against him, and for the purpose of substantiating that denial testifies that during the latter part of August, 1903, and particularly on the 29th day of that month, he was engaged in removing his business from a store occupied by him in a building in Butler, belonging to the "Noble estate," into the store in which the indecent exposure was said to have taken place, and that during all of that time, whether he was at the one place or the other, he was never alone, some of his employees being always present at each of the two stores. In order to break the force of this testimony the prosecutor of the pleas, on cross-examination of the defendant, exhibited to him a letter addressed to the executor of the "Noble estate," and signed "Max Goldstein" — the body of which contained a statement that his (Goldstein's) tenancy had expired on the 1st of August, and referred to the fact that a check was enclosed in settlement of the rent due to that date — and asked him if the signature to the letter was not in his handwriting. The defendant denied that it was, or that the letter had been written by his authority.

After the close of the defendant's case the State called Mr. Hinchman, the executor of the "Noble estate," as a witness, and he testified that the defendant had been a tenant of the estate for nearly three years, and that during all of that period a business correspondence had been carried on between himself and the defendant, letters passing between at least as frequently as once a month, on the average. The letter which had been exhibited to the defendant, being then shown the witness, he expressed the opinion that it was in the latter's handwriting. Counsel for the defendant interposed an objection to the witness being permitted to express an opinion as to the authenticity of the letter, on the ground that his testimony failed to show that he had ever seen the defendant write, or that he knew that the letters which he had received during Goldstein's tenancy were written by him, and error is assigned upon the overruling of the objection.

For the plaintiff in error, Willard W. Cutler. For the defendant in error, Charles A. Rathbun, prosecutor of the pleas. The opinion of the Court was delivered by GUMMERE, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Except for the fact that counsel has earnestly contended before us that this testimony was improperly admitted, we should consider the assignment so frivolous as not to be entitled to specific mention. A reference to any text-book in which this subject is discussed will disclose that it is universally admitted that a witness who has a proper knowledge of a party's handwriting may declare his belief in regard to the genuineness of a writing which is in question, and that such knowledge may be acquired, not only by having seen him write, but also by having had correspondence with him concerning business or other matters transacted between them. In West v. State, 2 Zab. 212, the rule is thus tersely stated: "To prove handwriting, in general, a witness must know it by having seen the person write or by having corresponded with him." . . .

The conviction under review should be affirmed.

SUB-TOPIC E. MEMORY (RECOLLECTION) [1]

126. SCROOP'S TRIAL. (1660. Howell's State Trials, V, 1034, 1039). [Murder of King Charles I, the defendant being charged as one of the judges sitting to condemn him.]

Carr (testifying for the Crown). — Amongst others that were judges of that Court, as was printed in a paper which I then had in my hand, I found the name of Mr. A. Scroop, who I saw did there sit and appear. (Mr. Carr looked in that paper when he gave his evidence).

Scroop. — I hope you will not take any evidence from a printed list.

Counsel. — The manner of his evidence is, he saith, this: that he had this printed paper in his hand when the names of that Court were called, and marking the persons in that paper who were present, and that you were one of them who did appear.

Scroop. — . . . By your favour, I do suppose there is no witness ought to use any paper or look upon any paper when he gives evidence.

Sol. Gen. — Ask him the question without the paper; yet nothing is more usual than for a witness to make use of a paper to help his memory.

127. KNOX'S AND LANE'S TRIAL. (1679. King's Bench. Howell's State Trials, VII, 763, 779). [Libel. The prosecution is trying to prove Knox confession.] . . .

Serjeant Maynard. — My lord, now we will call another justice of peace, that took their examinations, and we shall then particularly apply ourselves to Mr. Knox, that seems to make these excuses for himself. Call Mr. Justice Warcup. (Who was sworn.)

Warcup. — I must beg the favor of the Court, because my memory is bad, that I may refer to the informations that were taken before me.

Justice Pemberton. — You may look upon them for the refreshment of your memory.

Warcup. — I answer to every part of this that hath my hand to it, I desire it may be read.

Recorder. — No, that can't be, you must not read them, but only refresh your memory by them.

128. Sir John Friend's Trial. (1696. Howell's State Trials, XIII, 1, 21). Witness. — All that I can say to this business is written in my paper, and I refer to my paper.

Att'y-Gen'l. — You must not refer to your paper, Sir, you must tell all what you know.

L. C. J. Holt. — He may look upon any paper to refresh his memory.

129. Duchess of Kingston's Trial. (1776. Howell's State Trials, XX, 355 619). [Bigamy; a witness was offered to testify to the advice given by a lawyer to the accused as to her right to re-marry.]

Mr. Mansfield. — The witness now intended to be produced to your lordships is Mr. Laroche. The purpose for which he is to be produced is to tell your lordships, that he saw Dr. Collier frequently with the lady at the bar and the late Duke of Kingston, during the suit in the Ecclesiastical Court; that he has himself heard Dr. Collier assure both the parties, the late Duke of Kingston and the lady at the bar, after that sentence in the Spiritual Court, that they were perfectly free to marry, and might marry any one they pleased.

Mr. Laroche sworn.

Mr. Laroche. — My lords, I did not know, until within these few minutes, that it would be necessary to call me. I will endeavor to recollect to the best of my knowledge. I have got some memorandums in my pocket, and I hope I may be at liberty to refer to them.

Lord High Steward. — Are they in your own writing?

Laroche. — A copy of it, and it has been in my possession ever since it was copied.

A Lord. — Copied by his desire?

Laroche. — Yes, from my own notes, and in my presence, and has been in my own custody ever since.

[The witness proceeded to testify.]

130. Anon. (1754. 1 Ambl. 252). L. C. Hardwicke, said: There is no certain rule how far evidence may be admitted from notes; some judges had thought, and he was inclined the same way, that the witness might speak from notes which were taken at the time of the transaction in question, but not if they were wrote afterwards.

131. Davis v. Field. (1884. Vermont. 56 Vt. 426). Rowell, J. The old notion that the witness must be able to swear from memory is pretty much exploded. . . . There seem to be two classes of cases on this subject: 1. Where the witness by referring to the memorandum has his memory quickened and refreshed thereby, so that he is enabled to swear to an actual recollection; 2. Where the witness after referring to the memorandum undertakes to swear to the fact, yet not because he remembers it, but because of his confidence in the correctness of his memorandum. In both cases the oath of the witness is the primary, substantive evidence relied upon; in the former the oath being grounded on actual recollection, and in the latter on the faith reposed in the verity of the memorandum.

132. HENRY v. LEE

2 Chitty 124

Topping moved, on behalf of the defendant, for a rule to show cause why a new trial should not be had, under the following circumstances. The plaintiff was a jeweler at Liverpool, and the indorsee of a bill of exchange, drawn and indorsed by the defendant, and accepted, payable at a banker's, London. The defendant pleaded the general issue and bankruptcy, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff. At the time of the trial, a material witness said he did not recollect a fact; but having looked at a paper which he himself had not written, he said that he distinctly recollected the circumstances, though he had before said that he did not know whether he should recollect the circumstances after looking at the paper; and Topping contended, that this was neither sufficient, nor the best evidence.

Lord Ellenborough, C. J. — It is sufficient if a man can positively swear that he recollects the fact, though he had totally forgotten the circumstance before he came into court; and if upon looking at any document he can so far refresh his memory as to recollect a circumstance, it is sufficient. And it makes no difference, that the memorandum was not written by himself; for it is not the memorandum that is the evidence, but the recollection of the witness. . . . Rule refused.

133. Sir G. A. Lewin. Note to Lawes v. Reed. (1835. 2 Lew. Cr. C. 152). Where the object is to revive in the mind of the witness the recollection of the facts of which he once had knowledge, it is difficult to understand why any means should be excepted to whereby that object may be attained. Whether in any particular case the witness' memory has been refreshed by the document referred to, or he speaks from what the document tells him, is a question of fact open to observation, more or less according to the circumstances. If in truth the memory has been refreshed, and he is enabled in consequence to speak to facts with which he was once familiar, but which afterwards escaped him, it cannot signify, in effect, in what manner or by what means these facts were recalled to his recollection. Common experience tells every man that a very slight circumstance, and one not in point to the existing inquiry, will sometimes revive the history of a transaction made up of many circumstances. . . . Why, then, if a man may refresh his memory by such means out of court, should he be precluded from doing so when he is under examination in court?

134. HUFF v. BENNETT

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1852

6 N. Y. 336

THIS was an action, by the plaintiff, an attorney of the Superior Court, against Bennett, the publisher and editor of the New York Herald, for certain alleged libels upon the plaintiff's character as an attorney, published in that paper.

The libels consisted of alleged reports of proceedings before the Recorder of New York, who had discharged two persons committed to prison by another magistrate, on the entry of bail for their appearance; with comments thereon, assuming that the Recorder acted by the advice of the plaintiff, who was the prisoner's counsel, with a sketch of the plaintiff's history. Also, a report of the proceedings in a case before the Court of Special Sessions, with allusions to the plaintiff's conduct in connection therewith. The defendant justified the publications, on the ground that they were correct reports of public legal proceedings, with fair comments thereon; and that the facts stated in relation to the plaintiff were true.

On the trial, before OAKLEY, J., after proof of publication, and in reply to testimony on the part of the defendant, as to the correctness of the published reports, the plaintiff called the Recorder as a witness, and having placed in his hands a copy of the alleged libelous report of the proceedings before him, asked the following question: "Wherein, as you now remember, is that report incorrect?" The defendant's counsel objected to the question, as incompetent, but the objection was overruled, and an exception taken. . . . The plaintiff had a verdict for $150 damages; and a motion for a new trial, made on a bill of exceptions, having been denied, and judgment perfected in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant took this appeal.

Sandford, for the appellant. Huff, respondent, in propria persona.

JEWETT, J. — On the trial several exceptions were taken by the counsel for the defendant to the decision of the judge in respect to the admission and rejection of evidence; some of which were not attempted to be sustained, on the argument here. I shall, therefore, notice only such as the counsel relied on upon the argument in this Court.

The first was the exception to the decision of the judge, holding that it was admissible for the counsel for the plaintiff, to put into the hands of the witness, Scott, a paper, and to ask him wherein, as he then remembered it, was the report contained therein incorrect. The objection was placed upon the ground that the question was incompetent, but the case does not show the particular ground of the supposed incompetency. On the argument, the ground assumed was, that it called for the testimony of the witness of facts, after having refreshed his memory, by looking at memoranda not made at the time, either by himself, or in his presence. It was insisted, that the rule was, that a witness could only testify to such facts as were within his knowledge, and that his recollection of the facts could only be refreshed by examining memoranda, either made by himself, or in his presence. Although the rule is, that a witness, in general, can testify only to such facts as are within his own knowledge and recollection, yet it is well settled, that he is permitted to assist his memory by the use of any written instrument, memorandum, or entry in a book, and it is not necessary that such writing should have been made by the witness himself, or that it should be an original writing, provided, after inspecting it, he can speak to the facts from his own recollection. (2) Past Recollection Recorded 135. Lord Talbot v. Cusack. (1864. Ireland. 17 Ir. C. L. 213). Hayes, J. ['To refresh the memory of the witness'], that is a very inaccurate expression; because in nine cases out of ten the witness' memory is not at all refreshed; he looks at it again and again, and he recollects nothing of the transaction; but, seeing that it is in his own handwriting, he gives credit to the truth and accuracy of his habits, and, though his memory is a perfect blank, he nevertheless undertakes to swear to the accuracy of his notes.

136. DOE dem. CHURCH & PHILLIPS v. PERKINS

3 T. R. 749

This was an ejectment to recover some premises at Wendover, Bucks. At the trial before Lord Loughborough at the last Spring Assizes for Bucks, a verdict was given for the plaintiff against twenty-two of the defendants. . . . It appeared from the report that the title of the lessors of the plaintiff to the several premises for which the ejectment was brought was not in dispute; but that the only question was at what time of the year the annual holdings of the several tenants expired. That Aldridge, the witness, whose testimony was objected to, went round with the receiver of the rents to the different tenants, whose declarations respecting the times when they severally became tenants were minuted down in a book at the time; some of the entries therein being made by Aldridge, and some by the receiver. When Aldridge was examined the original book was not in Court; but he spoke concerning the dates of the several tenancies from extracts made by himself out of that book, confessing upon cross-examinations that he had no memory of his own of those specific facts; but that the evidence he was giving as to those facts was founded altogether upon the extracts which he had made from the above mentioned book. This evidence was objected to at the time on the part of the defendants, upon the ground that, as the witness did not pretend to speak to those facts from his own recollection, he ought not to be permitted to give evidence from any extracts, but that the original book from which they were taken ought to be produced. The learned judge however being of a different opinion, the evidence was admitted, and the plaintiff had a verdict.

Erskine, Partridge, Bower, Adair, and Wilson showed cause against the rule. Although neither the original book itself, any more than the extracts, could be produced as evidence in themselves, yet the witness, who heard the declarations of the tenants, and either wrote the entries with his own hand, or saw them written by the receiver, might be permitted to refresh his own memory by referring to either. . . .

Law and Lowndes, contra, insisted on the known distinction between cases where the witness swears from his own knowledge of the fact, though his memory may be assisted by memoranda, and where he does not speak from any recollection which he has, but merely from such memoranda; in the latter case it has always been required that the original minutes should be produced, because of the great door which might otherwise be opened to fraud and concealment. For it might happen in a variety of instances that something would appear upon the original paper itself, which would do away the effect of the evidence, but which might be suppressed in a copy, and still more easily in an extract.

The Court did not appear to entertain much doubt as to the inadmissibility of the evidence, but they said that as it was a matter of such general practice, they would consider of it, that the rule might be finally settled for the future. . . .

On the following day Mr. Justice BULLER read another MS. note of Tanner v. Taylor, Hereford Spring Assizes, 1756. "In an action for goods sold, the witness who proved the delivery took it from an account book which he had in his hand, being a copy, as he said, of the day book, which he had left at home; and it being objected that the original ought to have been produced, Mr. Baron LEGGE said, that if he would swear positively to the delivery from recollection, and the paper was only to refresh his memory, he might make use of it. But if he could not from recollection swear to the delivery any further than as finding them entered in his book, then the original should have been produced; and the witness saying he could not swear from recollection, the plaintiff was non-suited." And

Lord KENYON, Ch. J., said, that the rule appeared to have been clearly settled, and that every day's practice agreed with it. And comparing this case with the general rule, the Court were clearly of opinion that Aldridge, the witness, ought not to have been permitted to speak facts from the extracts which he made use of at the trial.

PER CURIAM. Rule absolute for a new trial.

137. BURROUGH v. MARTIN

NISI PRIUS. 1809

2 Camp. 112

ACTION on a charter-party; a witness was called to give an account of the voyage, and the log-book was laid before him for the purpose of refreshing his memory. Being asked whether he had written it himself, he said, that he had not, but that from time to time he examined the entries in it while the events recorded were fresh in his recollection, and that he always found the entries accurate.

The Attorney-General contended, that the witness could make no use of the log-book during his examination, notwithstanding his former inspection of it, and that the only case where a witness could refer to a written paper for the purpose of giving evidence, was where he had actually written it himself, and had thus the surest means of knowing the truth of its contents.

ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J. If the witness looked at the log-book from time to time, while the occurrences mentioned in it were recent, and fresh in his recollection, it is as good as if he had written the whole with his own hand. This collation gave him an ample opportunity to ascertain the correctness of the entries, and he may therefore refer to these, on the same principle that witnesses are allowed to refresh their memory by reading letters and other documents which they themselves have written.

138. BURTON v. PLUMMER

2 A. & E. 341

ASSUMPSIT for goods sold and delivered. Plea, the general issue. On the trial before the secondary of the city of London, on the 31st of October, 1834, a clerk of the plaintiff was called to prove the order and sending out of the goods; and it was proposed, on the part of the plaintiff, that this witness should refresh his memory by the entries in a ledger which he produced. According to the statement of the witness, these entries had been copied by the plaintiff from a waste-book into the ledger: the waste-book was kept by the witness himself, and entries were made in the waste-book by him as the transactions occurred, from his own knowledge: the entries were regularly copied from thence into the ledger, day by day, by the plaintiff, in the presence of the witness, who checked them at the time of such copying, and ascertained their correctness. The waste-book itself not being produced, nor its absence accounted for, the defendant objected that the ledger was only a copy, and could not be used to refresh the witness's memory. The secondary allowed the objection; and, the witness being unable to recollect the transactions without the assistance of the entries, the plaintiff elected to be non-suited. Erle, obtained a rule in this term (Nov. 6th) to show cause why the non-suit should not be set aside, and a new trial had.

W. H. Watson, now showed cause. The witness could not look at this document. The absence of the waste-book was not accounted for: and the ledger was only a copy of the waste-book. . . . In Doe dem. Church v. Perkins, 3 T. R. 749 [ante, No. 136], a witness was not allowed to use extracts made by himself from a book, the entries in which were all made either by him or in his presence.

Erle, in support of the rule. There can be no doubt that the witness might have referred to this paper, if he had made the entries in it himself, while the facts were fresh in his memory. But a memorandum made by another person, under the witness's eye, while the latter has the facts fresh in his memory, and has an opportunity of correcting the entry if erroneous, must fall under the same rule; for such a paper is not, properly speaking, a copy, but is in the nature of an original memorandum made by the witness himself, though not with his own hand, which last circumstance has never been held to be essential; this was decided in Burrough v. Martin, 2 Campb. 112 [ante, No. 137]. So in Henry v. Lee, 2 Chitt. 124 [ante, No. 132], a witness was allowed to look at a paper not written by himself. In Rex v. Duchess of Kingston, 20 How. St. Tr. 619 [ante, No. 129], a witness was allowed, by the House of Lords, to use a copy of his own memorandum, made by another person in his presence. And in Tanner v. Taylor, 3 T. R. 754, given from the notes of Buller, J., in Doe dem. Church v. Perkins, a witness, who produced a copy of a day-book, would have been allowed to use such a copy, if it had been required merely for the purpose of refreshing his memory. Doe dem. Church v. Perkins, 3 T. R. 749 [ante, No. 136], itself is not in point; for there the witness said that, even after looking at the paper, he had no memory of his own as to the specific facts.

Lord Denman, C. J. We are agreed that the secondary was wrong in refusing this evidence. The paper, though called a copy, is not so; for when it was taken from that which is called the original, the witness checked it, and saw that it was correct. And as this was done when the transactions could not but be fresh in his memory, so that he must have been able to verify the correctness of the entry, he might afterwards look at the paper for the purpose of having the facts brought to his mind.

Taunton, J. The witness proved that these entries, like all the others, were shown to him, and that he checked the entries himself. The entries so made by the master stand upon the same footing as if they had been made by the witness himself. . . . Rule absolute.

139. ACKLEN'S EXECUTOR v. HICKMAN

SUPREME COURT OF ALABAMA. 1879

63 Ala. 494

ACTION by James Hickman for the amount due on an account for services rendered to Acklen as agent, money paid, etc.

On the trial, as appears from the bill of exceptions, the plaintiff read in evidence an account in his favor against said William Acklen, which contained, under date of March 21, 1864, the following items: "Paid hauling 24 B. C. to Beirne's, $182.70"; "Bailing, rope, and twine, for 24 B. C., $108.39"; together amounting to $291.09, with interest added, "3 years, 4 mos., $83.77"; making a sum total of $374.53. Indorsed on this account were two memoranda, one signed by J. V. A. Hinds, and the other by said James Hickman; the first being in these words: "The above is correct, by the books of James Hickman, as kept by me, October 30, 1867"; and the other: "Huntsville, Alabama, twenty dollars on the within account." . . .

The plaintiff introduced James V. A. Hinds as a witness.

1. He testified that, in the year 1864, he was the plaintiff's bookkeeper and agent; that . . . said account was in the handwriting of witness, and was taken by him from the books of said Hickman; . . . that the first indorsement on said account was in his handwriting; that, having refreshed his memory by reading said memorandum, he could now testify from memory that said statement was true, and that the same was correctly dated October 30, 1867, and that he drew off said account from the books of the day of the date of said memorandum; that on or about the 30th of October, 1867, he presented said account, with said indorsement on it, to said Acklen, at his residence in Huntsville; and that said Acklen admitted that he owed the account, and that said account was correct. Thereupon, plaintiff offered to read in evidence the said memorandum, or indorsement, dated October 30, 1867. To this the defendant objected, because said memorandum was not legal evidence; admitting that the witness could refer to said memorandum to refresh his memory, but insisting that the same could not be properly received as evidence, because it was an ex parte statement of the witness. The Court overruled the objection, and admitted the memorandum; to which the defendant excepted.

2. The witness further testified that several years afterwards, some four or five years, the plaintiff came to Huntsville, from Nashville, and, at his request, witness went with him to the residence of said Acklen in Huntsville; that the account was the subject of conversation between Hickman and said Acklen; that Hickman told Acklen, he must have some money to go home on, and did not have money to pay his expenses; that Acklen thereupon handed something to Hickman, but he (witness) cannot say whether it was a bank-bill, or the account sued on, or both; that he does not remember what it was; and that Acklen, when he handed this something to plaintiff, said, "I will pay you the balance soon." The witness said, that he could not remember the day, the month, or the year, when he went with Hickman to see Acklen; and that the second indorsement on said account (the credit of $20) was in the handwriting of said Hickman. The Court allowed the witness, against the objection of the defendant, to testify that he saw Hickman make said indorsement on said account, in Huntsville, on the same day, and soon after he and Hickman left Acklen's house, and went up town on the public square; to which ruling the defendant excepted. The Court also allowed the witness, against the objection of the defendant, in the presence of the Court and jury, to look at said indorsement in the handwriting of Hickman, and refresh his memory by the use of said memorandum, and then to testify, against the objection of the defendant, that the said visit of witness and Hickman to said Acklen was made on the 10th November, 1869. The defendant objected to this evidence of the date of said visit, and his reference to said indorsement to refresh his memory; because the effect was, indirectly, to get said indorsement before the jury; and because no memorandum, made by said Hickman, could be properly referred to by said witness; and because it was not shown that the witness knew said indorsement was true. These objections were overruled, and the defendant excepted.

After the argument of counsel was concluded, the Court charged the jury, that said indorsement on the account, dated November 10, 1869, was not evidence. . . .

The rulings of the Court on the evidence, to which exceptions were reserved, as above, and the charge to the jury, are now assigned as error.

Walker & Shelby, for the appellant. . . .

Humes & Gordon, contra.

STONE, J. The law recognizes the right of a witness to consult memoranda in aid of his recollection under two conditions.

First, when after examining a memorandum made by himself, or known and recognized by him as stating the facts truly, his memory is thereby so refreshed that he can testify, as matter of independent recollection, to facts pertinent to the issue. In cases of this class the witness testifies to what he asserts are facts within his own knowledge, and the only distinguishing difference between testimony thus given, and ordinary evidence of facts, is that the witness, by invoking the assistance of the memorandum, admits that without such assistance his recollection of the transaction he testifies to had become more or less obscured. In cases falling within this class, the memorandum is not thereby made evidence in the cause, and its contents are not made known to the jury, unless opposing counsel call out the same on cross-examination. This he may do, for the purpose of testing its sufficiency to revive a faded or fading recollection, if for no other reason.

In the second class are embraced cases in which the witness after examining the memorandum cannot testify to an existing knowledge of the fact, independent of the memorandum, — in other words, cases in which the memorandum fails to refresh and revive the recollection and thus constitute it present knowledge. If the evidence of knowledge proceed no further than this, neither the memorandum, nor the testimony of the witness, can go before the jury. If, however, the witness go further, and testify that, at or about the time the memorandum was made he knew its contents and knew them to be true, this legalizes and lets in both the testimony of the witness and the memorandum. The two are the equivalent of a present, positive statement of the witness, affirming the truth of the contents of the memorandum.

1. Under these rules, the Circuit Court erred in allowing the memorandum to be given in evidence to the jury.

2. The Court erred, also, in allowing the witness to refresh his recollection by the credit indorsed in the handwriting of Hickman. True, he stated he saw the indorsement made; but he did not testify that he knew, or ever had known, it contained a true statement of the facts. If he had testified that he saw the indorsement made, and observed its contents, and knew at the time that they were true, this would have brought the testimony within the second of the rules stated above and would have let in both the testimony and the memorandum, notwithstanding the witness, at the time of the trial, had no independent recollection of the facts shown by the indorsement.

Reversed and remanded.

140. NORWALK v. IRELAND

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1896

68 Conn. 1; 35 Atl. 807

ACTION upon the official bond of a constable to recover damages for an alleged trespass, brought to the Court of Common Pleas in Fairfield County and tried to the Court, CURTIS, J., upon the defendants' demurrer to the complaint. The Court overruled the demurrer, and thereafter the case was tried, upon the defendants' denial, to the Court, DOWNS, J., who found the facts and rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed for alleged errors in the rulings of the Court. No error. . . .

At the time of the attachment Louisa Fawcett, the plaintiff's wife, was engaged in conducting a millinery store with a miscellaneous stock of millinery goods therein. The defendant officer, with a writ of attachment against said Louisa, entered said store and attached the goods therein, including the goods belonging to the plaintiff, and carried the same away. . . . During the attachment the plaintiff came in and informed the officer that some of the goods in the store belonged to him, and asked that he might be allowed to see what he (the defendant) was taking, and make a list of the same. The request was denied. . . . Said Louisa Fawcett and the plaintiff both testified as to the value of the plaintiff's said goods, and the value of said Louisa Fawcett's goods. Concerning the ruling now in question, the finding in full is as follows:

"Said defendant, while testifying in his own behalf, identified a written memorandum, which he testified was an inventory of all the goods attached, made by him at the time of said attachment, partly from his own inspection of the goods and the tags or tickets thereon, and partly from information given him at the time by John Lockwood and Wilbur F. Young, who had been employed by him to assist in attaching and removing said goods. He testified that he could not specify any particular article in said inventory as one upon which he had seen a price mark, and could not say as to any particular item in said inventory, whether he had written it from his own examination of the article, or from information furnished him by one of his said assistants. He also testified that nearly all of the goods attached were marked, and that he used said inventory in making out his return on the writ. The defendants counsel, for the purpose of further showing the manner in which said inventory was made, then read a portion of the deposition of said Wilbur F. Young, as follows:

"Q. — Did you and Mr. Ireland take an inventory of the stock attached? A. — We did.

"Q. — Did you attach to this inventory any value of the stock? A. — Yes.

"Q. — Upon what was this value based? A. — Upon the amount it would bring at forced sale.

"Q. — Were, or were there not, any tags with prices marked upon them affixed to the goods attached? A. — There were.

"Q. — Were or were not these prices so affixed taken by you and Mr. Ireland in making up the value in the inventory? A. — They were. . . . As descriptive of the property attached. As tending to prove the value of the property."

To the admission in evidence of said inventory the plaintiff objected; and the Court excluded the same, but ruled that the witness (said defendant) might use said inventory to refresh his recollection as to the number and description of the articles attached, and the prices marked thereon. The defendants duly excepted to the Court's ruling in refusing to admit said inventory in evidence. The witness did use said inventory to refresh his recollection, and having so refreshed his recollection, testified as to the prices marked on 17 hats, 7 rolls of ribbon, and 4 pieces of velvet trimmings.

On cross-examination he testified that he had selected and testified concerning said 17 hats because, to the best of his belief, he had personally seen the price marks on one-half of the whole number of hats named in said inventory, and, therefore, had selected from said inventory alternate hats to the number of 17; and again stated that he could not select from said inventory any specific article as one he had personally seen a price mark on at the time of the attachment. Thereupon the defendant again offered said inventory in evidence, but the Court refused to admit the same, to which ruling the defendant duly excepted. . . .

John H. Light, for the appellants (defendants). . . . The inventory or memorandum of goods attached, was admissible in evidence. . . .

John C. Chamberlain and Joseph A. Gray, for the appellee (plaintiff). . . . The inventory was properly rejected. Curtis v. Bradley, 65 Conn. 114. . . .

FENN, J. . . . It is claimed that the Court erred . . . in refusing to admit in evidence a certain written inventory. . . .

The inventory in question fails in one, and that the most vital particular, to be admissible. The memorandum was not proved to have been made under such circumstances as to make a correct statement of details as they were then known to the witness who made the memorandum. It testifies to matters to which the witness is unable himself to testify, not from lack of recollection, but from want of personal knowledge. . . . It has never, so far as we know, been seriously claimed that such papers could even be used at all, by a witness under examination, except to refresh his memory, or to assist him to testify to something which he once knew to be true. . . . The trouble was, the inventory, before us as an exhibit, does not show which of the goods were marked. The defendant could not specify any article in said inventory as one on which he had seen a price mark, and could not say as to any item whether he had written it from his own examination, or from information furnished him by one of his assistants. One of these assistants only was called. . . . It is true this witness also stated that some of the goods had tags with price marks affixed, and that these were taken in making up the value of the inventory. But this was all. Finally, the inventory was claimed as descriptive of the property attached. But the same want of knowledge on the part of the witness is evident here throughout. The Court in its above ruling committed no error prejudicial to the defendants. . . .

There is no error in the judgment complained of.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

141. VOLUSIA COUNTY BANK v. BIGELOW

SUPERIOR COURT OF FLORIDA. 1903

45 Fla. 638; 33 So. 704

WRIT of Error to the Circuit Court for Volusia County. . . .

It appears from the abstract in this case that the defendant in error filed a claim affidavit asserting that certain personal property levied upon under execution against her husband, J. E. Bigelow, belonged to her as her separate property, and upon trial the jury found in her favor. . . .

The third assignment of error is that "the Court erred in permitting the claimant's witness, Marion L. Bigelow, to read to the jury memoranda of sums of money claimed by witnesses to have been advanced by her to her husband, J. E. Bigelow." The bill of exceptions recites that claimant claimed to have advanced various sums to her husband during the years from 1891 to 1897, inclusive, and to have made memoranda of those sums; that a memorandum in her hand was made the day before from memoranda she had previously made, none of which were made from memory. When asked to give the amount advanced in each year, witness "commenced to read from memorandum in her hand." Plaintiff in execution thereupon objected to witness's reading said memorandum on the grounds that it was not of itself competent evidence, and that it was made the day preceding her testifying and not at the time of the transaction. The bill of exceptions states that "these objections were overruled and witness permitted to read from said memorandum, to which rule plaintiff in execution excepted."

Isaac A. Stewart (with whom was Egford Bly on the brief), for plaintiff in error. Beggs & Palmer, for defendant in error.

JAMES F. GLEN, Commissioner (after stating the case as above). We think this record sufficiently shows that the memorandum was not used by the witness for the mere purpose of refreshing her independent recollection, but that she relied on the memorandum as the basis of her testimony. There is a clear and obvious distinction between the use of a memorandum for the purpose of stimulating the memory, and its use as a basis for testimony regarding transactions as to which there is no independent recollection. In the former case it is immaterial what constitutes the spur to memory, as the testimony when given rests solely upon the independent recollection of the witness. In the latter case, the memorandum furnishes no mental stimulus, and the testimony of a witness by reference thereto derives whatever force it possesses from the fact that the memorandum is the record of a past recollection, reduced to writing while there was an existing independent recollection. It is for that reason that a memorandum, to be available in such cases, must have been made at or about the time of the happening of the transaction, so that it may safely be assumed that the recollection was then sufficiently fresh to correctly express it. The assumed reliability of the memorandum as a contemporaneous record is the sole justification of its use by the witness; and hence it is essential in such cases that the witness should produce and testify by reference to the original memorandum, or satisfactorily account for its absence, before resort can be had to a copy. Doe ex dem. Church v. Perkins, 3 Term Rep. 749 [ante, No. 136]. . . .

It follows that the Court erred in permitting the claimant to testify from the copy in question as to the sums alleged to have been advanced by her to her husband. . . .

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial had.

142. MURRAY & PEPPERS v. DICKENS

SUPREME COURT OF ALABAMA. 1906

149 Ala. 240; 42 So. 1031

APPEAL from Mobile Circuit Court. Heard before Hon. SAMUEL B. BROWNE. Action by Murray & Peppers against Charles C. Dickens From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff's appeal. Reversed and remanded.

This was an action by the appellants (plaintiffs) against appellee (defendant) on the common counts, to wit: (1) Open account; (2) account stated; (3) work and labor done; (4) merchandise, goods, etc., sold; (5) money paid for defendant; (6) money received by defendant for the use of plaintiffs. And the pleas were the general issue and payment. The matter for which plaintiffs claimed that defendant owed them the amount sued for was for the use of a "steam hoister," which it is claimed did service for defendant under an agreement by which he was to pay $10 per day.

A witness for plaintiffs, Edward Peppers, who was a member of the plaintiff's firm, testified that plaintiffs did in September, 1903, rent the "steam hoister" to defendant; that defendant was to pay $10 per day; that defendant, Dickens, was to give plaintiffs a statement each Saturday night as to how much the "hoister" had worked during the week; that defendant had been asked frequently for the statement, but had never given any, except a little slip, once, with no date on it; that witness did not see the hoister worked, as it was 10 or 12 miles from Mobile; that plaintiff became dissatisfied because of Dickens' failure to furnish the statement, and changed the terms to a regular renting agreement, but this suit is for the amount due before this change was made; that the hoister was a barge, with a steam engine on it, and was used for pulling logs out of the woods; that plaintiff's engineer, Bill Steadham, had charge of the hoister; that he left Mobile with it every Sunday evening or Monday morning and returned Saturday evening, at which time he would report to witness verbally the number of days that the hoister had been worked during that week, and witness would set the amount down in the book (which is offered in evidence); that plaintiffs were paying said Steadham according to the time he worked, and they paid him according to the amounts so set down in said book, and they allowed a half day each week for going to and returning from defendant's place — thus, if he reported 5 days' work they paid him for 5½ days. He also stated that the boat remained through the week at defendant's place, subject to his orders. Bill Steadham testified to the same arrangement; that he made true reports every Saturday night to Mr. Peppers, who entered it at once in the book; also that he would call on Dickens for statements of the work done, but that he never gave but the one, and would tell him that his (Steadham's) word was as good as his (Dickens); that he knew exactly how many days he worked and how many he lost each week, and so reported it; that when he had steam up, under orders, at Dickens' place, he reported it that way; but witness later stated that sometimes Dickens did not come down to work till late in the day, but, if witness had steam up all day, he reported that as a day's work.

The defendant objected to the introduction of said book in evidence, on the ground that it had not been proved, which objection was sustained, and the book was excluded. And the Court then, on motion of defendant, excluded all of the plaintiff's evidence, because it was irrelevant and immaterial, and gave the general charge in favor of the defendant. The chief point of controversy is the action of the Court in ruling out the book as evidence and then excluding all of plaintiffs' testimony. The appellants insist that there was error in this action of the Court, and the appellee sustains the action, because . . . the person making the entries did not himself have personal knowledge of their truth. . . .

William C. Fitts and David H. Eddington, for appellant. — The book was a book of original entry in contemplation of law. . . .

Gregory L. and H. T. Smith, for appellee. — The entries in the book are not admissible . . . because the person making the entries had no personal knowledge of their proof. . . .

Simpson, J. (after stating the facts as above).

1. As to the third exception, while it is true that the expression is found in the authorities that the person making the entry must have knowledge of the correctness of the item, yet it will be found that in those cases there was no proof by any one else of the correctness of the item. And it would seem, on reason, that if one party testifies that he knew of the correctness of the item and gave it correctly to the other, and the other testifies that he entered it as it was given to him, that that would amount to the same thing as if the party who made the entry should swear that he knew of the correctness of the item. So it is laid down that "entries made by a party from data furnished, or memoranda kept by an employee to assist his memory in making a report or return will be admissible, if supplemented by the oath of the party and the testimony of the servant making the memoranda or furnishing the information." 17 Cyc. 386; Miller v. Shay, 145 Mass. 162. . . . The book in this case was not subject to this objection.

2. It is next insisted that the book was properly excluded, because the entries were not made contemporaneously with the transaction. . . . In the case of Stoudenmire v. Harper Brothers, 81 Ala. 242, 245, 1 South. 857, the memorandum sought to be introduced was not an original entry, nor even a copy of the entries on the books, but merely an addition by the witness of certain items which he had taken from the books, and the Court said: "The original must be produced, and must have been made at or near the time of the occurrence." . . . The case of Lane v. May & Thomas Hdw. Co., 121 Ala. 296, 298, merely holds that a memorandum book could not be introduced in evidence when there was no proof that the items were entered "at or about the time the payments were made, nor sufficiently that the witness knew the entries to be correct when they were made."

So there is nothing in our decisions contrary to the general principle laid down, to wit, that, while the entries must be made at or near the time of the transactions, yet no precise time is fixed by law when they should be made. The entry need not be made exactly at the time of the occurrence; but it is sufficient if it be made within a reasonable time. In this particular every case must be made to depend upon its own peculiar circumstances, having regard to the situation of the parties, the kind of business, the mode of conducting it, and the time and manner of making the entries. An entry once a week has been held to be sufficient. Yearsley's Appeal, 48 Pa. 531. . . .

It must be admitted that the cases are in some confusion on this subject, but from an examination of them the above seems to be a reasonable deduction. There are a number of cases where loose memoranda were first made, and then afterwards transferred to a permanent book, and the general trend of decisions is that the loose memoranda are not the entry, but mere helps to the party to remember, and the entry in the permanent book is the original entry, so that it seems that the rule would be the same, whether there were any memorandum or not. In those cases it is held that, in order to admit the entries in the book, it is necessary, not only that the party who made the entry shall swear that the entry was made in accordance with the memoranda, but also that the party who made the memoranda should testify to the correctness of the memorandum when he made it. This testimony we have in the case now under consideration. It is also held in a number of them that unless some reason is shown why the entry was not made in a day or two, either from the nature of the business or otherwise, the entry will not be deemed to be contemporaneous within the meaning of the law; but the cases recognize that circumstances may be such as to justify the delay in making the entry for as long a time as a week. Redlich v. Bauerlee, 98 Ill. 134; Kent v. Garvin, 67 Mass. 148; Vicary v. Moore,

2 Watts (Pa.) 451; Forsythe v. Norcross, 5 Watts (Pa.) 432. As stated in the Redlich case, supra: "It suffices if it be within a reasonable time, so that it may appear to have taken place while the memory of the fact was recent, or the source from which knowledge of it was derived is unimpaired." So, considering the nature of the business in this case, the fact that the boat made weekly trips and there was no opportunity to make the entries until the report came in at the end of the week, that the contract itself provided for weekly reports, and that the service was such as could be easily remembered for that period, we hold that the entries were made within a reasonable time, and admissible. . . .

The Court erred in excluding the book, and in excluding the evidence of the plaintiff, and in giving the general charge in favor of the defendant. The judgment of the Court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Tyson, C. J., and Haralson and Denson, JJ., concur.

143. CURTIS v. BRADLEY

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. 1894

65 Conn. 99; 31 Atl. 591

Action to recover for work and labor and materials furnished, also upon an account stated; brought to the Superior Court in Fairfield County and tried to the Court, Ralph Wheeler, J.; facts found and judgment rendered for the plaintiff and appeal by the defendant for alleged errors of the Court. New trial denied.

In the summer of 1890, the plaintiff sold the defendant a building lot. In September of that year, the defendant decided to have a house erected on the lot. It was then understood that one Simeon E. Plumb, a builder, should build the house, and that the plaintiff, a merchant, should advance the money for the cost of construction. The decision of this case depended on the actual terms of the agreement then made; the defendant subsequently claiming that his only agreement was with the plaintiff, and that by such agreement the plaintiff undertook to have the house built for the agreed price of $1,700. Plumb built the house under the directions of the defendant. The plaintiff paid to Plumb the amount of all bills for labor and materials as they came due. The house was finished in March, 1891, and the defendant accepted and occupied it. . . . The defendant objected to the total amount of the bill, and refused payment. . . . The plaintiff brought the present action. . . .

The appeal contains two distinct grounds for an appeal from the judgment. . . . Second, because the defendant is entitled to a new trial on account of errors alleged to have been made in the admission of evidence. Under this ground of appeal four errors are assigned.

First. The plaintiff offered in evidence certain slips of paper, testifying that Plumb came to the store each Saturday during the building of the house, and gave him the names of the men employed by him during the week and their time; that the plaintiff wrote down at the time in the presence of Plumb on these slips these names, the hours of time, the amount due each man, the total amount due, and the date; that he paid Plumb the total amount of money called for by each slip, and filed the slip on a spindle; and that he had no personal knowledge of the facts so stated to him by Plumb and so written by him on the slips, but that he made such memoranda correctly as Plumb then stated the facts to be. Plumb had already testified that he had employed these men on the Bradley house, and that the slips of paper were correct statements of the facts of each case as far as he could recollect; that he knew them to be correct when made, and that he had given the names, hours of time, and the amounts to the plaintiff, in the manner that the plaintiff subsequently testified, and that after deducting his own wages he paid each man the amount due him. This evidence was offered to prove that the plaintiff had incurred liabilities and paid out moneys upon the order of and as required by Plumb as agent for the defendant, in the manner agreed upon by the parties, and to prove the correctness of the items and prices. The defendant objected to the introduction of these slips, and to the testimony of the plaintiff and of Plumb as shown. The Court admitted the slips, not as themselves evidence apart from the oral testimony, but as memoranda made at the time and in the manner shown, and to be used by the witnesses Plumb and Curtis in the manner indicated, the witness reading the contents of the slips; and admitted the testimony of Curtis and Plumb in connection with them as stated. Said slips were marked as exhibits. . . .

J. C. Chamberlain and Elbert O. Hull, for the appellant (defendant). The Court erred in allowing the statement of Curtis as to what Plumb said at various times in the absence of the defendant about the correctness of various items in the bills. . . . It would also seem as though the Court had departed very far from the usual rule in admitting in evidence and having them marked as exhibits, slips to be used as memoranda by the witnesses, especially as there never was the slightest pretext that the witnesses had any knowledge or recollection of the subject-matter of such slips, which could be refreshed by their use. . . .

Allan W. Paige and George P. Carroll, for the appellee (plaintiff).

HAMERSLEY, J. (after stating the case as above). 1. The use of the slips and bills made at the time of the transaction and known to the witnesses to have been correctly made, as memoranda to be used by them in connection with their oral testimony, comes within the settled rules of evidence. . . .

2. But the defendant claims error in marking the slips as exhibits, on the ground that if they might properly be read by the witness they are not themselves admissible as evidence.

Courts in other jurisdictions have made different rulings as to the admissibility of such a writing. In England it is excluded. In Massachusetts and some other States it is excluded. Costello v. Crowell, 133 Mass. 355; Morrison v. Chapin, 97 Mass. 72; Dugan v. Mahoney, 11 Allen 572. In Vermont it seems to be treated as evidence. Lapham v. Kelly, 35 Vt. 195. In New York and some other States the writing is admitted as evidence. Guy v. Mead, 22 N. Y. 462, 465; . . . Anchor Milling Co. v. Walsh, 18 S. W. Rep. 905. In the Federal jurisdiction the question is still open. In Ins. Cos. v. Weides, supra, the Court indicates the admissibility of the evidence; but the opinion in Bates v. Preble, 151 U. S. 155, shows that the Court is not committed to the general doctrine that such memoranda are admissible for any other purpose than to refresh the memory of the witness. We do not attempt to cite all the cases bearing on the question, or to weigh the conflicting authorities; for we are satisfied on principle that the evidence in question is admissible. The discussion would be endless unless confined to the precise question presented, which may be stated as follows:

The litigated question is, did the plaintiff pay to the agent of the defendant a certain sum on a certain date, as wages due for labor performed by a certain man employed by the agent? The plaintiff and the agent testify that a sum was paid for such purpose; that at the time of payment the agent gave to the plaintiff the exact amount due, and the name of the employee entitled to the same, and the plaintiff then, in the presence of the agent, wrote on a piece of paper the date, the amount, and the name; that these items as then written by the plaintiff were correct; that the paper produced in Court is the identical paper then written upon by the plaintiff and since unchanged; that they have no recollection either before or after examining the paper, of the date, the amount, or the name. Is that paper admissible as evidence?

All Courts concur in holding that the witness may read the statement of such paper to the jury, and that the jury may draw the conclusion that the statement so read to them is a true statement of the facts. But some Courts hold that the paper is not evidence.

It seems to us to be pressing the use of a legal fiction too far, for a Court to permit the statement made by such paper to be read as evidence, while holding that the law forbids the admission as evidence of the paper which is the original and only proof of the statement admitted. In other words, it would seem as if in admitting the paper to be so read, the Court of necessity admitted the paper as evidence, and therefore, by the concurrent authority of all Courts, the paper is itself admissible. But, waiving the question whether in admitting such paper to be read the Courts have gone so far as to make the denial of its admissibility no longer tenable, we will deal with the matter as if wholly undecided. Is the paper itself admissible as evidence? Its admissibility in the first instance depends on its relevancy. Of this there can be no doubt. Being relevant, it must be admitted, unless excluded under some legal principle, or rule of public policy, which forbids the admission of certain classes of evidence, no matter how relevant and material. It cannot be said that the paper is not capable in its nature of being treated as competent evidence. Legal evidence is not confined to the human voice or oral testimony; it includes every tangible object capable of making a truthful statement, such evidence being roughly classified as documentary evidence. In oral evidence the witness is the man who speaks; in documentary evidence the witness is the thing that speaks. In either case the witness must be competent, i. e., must be deemed competent to make a truthful statement; and in either case the competency of the witness must be proved before the evidence is admitted; the difference being that in oral evidence the competency is proved by a legal presumption, and in documentary evidence the competency must be proved by actual testimony; and the further difference, that in oral evidence the credit of the witness is tested by his own cross-examination, while in documentary evidence the credit of the witness is tested by the cross-examination of those who must be called to prove its competency. . . .

The doubt has arisen from the complication of the admissibility of such paper with the right of a witness to refresh his memory. In fact, the two questions may be entirely distinct. The right of a witness to refresh his memory is a settled and necessary rule of evidence. The application of that rule is often difficult, involving delicate distinctions. We are not called upon now to draw the line which limits the right of a witness to the use of such aids as, under the subtle laws of association, serve to refresh his memory. All Courts recognize that right, and rightly hold that the thing used to refresh memory is not by reason of such use itself admissible as evidence. When in the application of the rule a document like the one in question was presented to the witness and absolutely failed to refresh his memory, its exclusion as a means of refreshing his memory became imperative; but the evidence of the document was so clearly essential to a fair and just trial, that its use in some form seemed almost imperative. Instead of treating the paper as itself competent documentary evidence, resort was had to a palpable fiction; the paper is read by the witness, and the knowledge the witness once had of the facts stated by the paper is imputed to him as still existing, and the statement of the paper is received as the testimony of the witness, and the paper itself, the only witness capable of making the statement, is excluded. The use of such a fiction in the administration of justice can rarely if ever be justified. It is certainly uncalled for in this instance. The principles of law invoked to justify the fiction are amply sufficient to support, indeed to demand, the admission of the document as evidence. There is no occasion to sacrifice truth in order to secure justice. As regards its admissibility as evidence, there is no substantial difference between this paper and any other tangible object capable of making a truthful and relevant statement. . . . Suppose the litigated question turns on the dimensions of a man's foot. A witness produces a plaster cast of the foot; the testimony conclusively shows that the cast was so taken that it can state accurately the dimensions of the foot. Another witness produces a paper, on which the exact measurements are written; the testimony conclusively shows that the paper also was so made that it can state accurately the dimensions of the foot. Is it not evident that the paper and the cast is each a witness to the fact that each tends to prove? . . .

The conditions required by law to make such documents legal evidence are: The substance offered as a witness must be proved to have been made or found and preserved in such manner that it states directly, accurately, and truly, a fact relevant and material to the issue. The paper claimed as evidence in this case fulfils these conditions. . . .

3. It does not, however, necessarily follow from the admissibility of such evidence, that the document should be sent to the jury room. Under the general rule of practice the jury must depend on their memory in the case of oral testimony, but may take documentary evidence to their consultation. But there is a difference in documentary evidence. Some is not given to the jury, either because its possession is agreed to be of no consequence or is inconvenient, or the document is of such a nature that it testifies to facts not relevant, in addition to the relevant facts. . . . If the writing admitted in evidence clearly tends to prove nothing but the fact that it was admitted to prove, it should go to the jury. If by reason of peculiar circumstances it clearly may be treated by the jury as evidence of other facts not admissible, it should not go to the jury. Between the two extremes the question is largely one of discretion in the trial judge. . . .

A new trial is denied.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

145. James Ram. On Facts as Subjects of Inquiry by a Jury. (3d Amer. ed. 1873, p. 134). There are two ways of questioning: one, where the words made use of in the question suggest or prompt a particular answer, and which is called a leading question; the other, where the question does not so lead, but is put in general terms, without at all pointing to a particular reply. This may be called an open question; it is open to any answer. "Did not you see this?" or "Did not you hear that?" are leading questions. In them the person questioned is in a manner prompted to answer, he did see or hear this or that particular thing. "It is a good point of cunning for a man to shape the answer he would have in his own words and propositions: for it makes the other party stick the less." [2] "Ye will, therefore (addressing Morris), please tell Mr. Justice Inglewood, whether we did not travel several miles together on the road, in consequence of your own anxious request and suggestion, reiterated once and again, baith on the evening that we were at Northallerton, and there declined by me, but afterward accepted, when I overtook ye on the road near Clobery Allers, and was prevailed on by you to resign my ain intentions of proceeding to Rothbury; and, for my misfortune, to accompany you on your proposed route. 'It's a melancholy truth,' answered Morris, holding down his head, as he gave this general assent to the long and leading question which Campbell put to him."[1] Assuming that the person questioned honestly desires to speak the truth, and that his memory is not defective, a strong probability is that, whether the question be open or leading, he will return precisely the same answer to it.

146. NICHOLLS v. DOWDING. (Nisi Prius, 1815. 1 Stark. 81). Assumpsit on bills of exchange, and for goods sold and delivered. In order to prove that the defendants were partners, the first witness was asked, whether the defendant Kemp had interfered in the business of Dowding. The question was objected to as a leading one.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C. J. — I wish that objections to questions as leading might be a little better considered before they are made. It is necessary, to a certain extent, to lead the mind of the witness to the subject of inquiry. If questions are asked, to which the answer yes or no would be conclusive, they would certainly be objectionable. But in general no objections are more frivolous than those which are made to questions as leading ones.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Dallas. Trover by the defendant against the plaintiffs in error, to recover damages, for the conversion of a promissory note for $1,503.30, made by Wm. Johnson & Co. to the plaintiffs.

Upon the trial, the plaintiffs introduced Frederick Dorr, of the firm of Wm. Johnson & Co. . . . During his examination, the witness had given a description of the note, and its contents. The defendant's counsel, on the cross-examination, asked him if the note was not in his possession, and if he could not find it upon diligent search; he admitted he could. He admitted, also, that he had been several times requested, by the plaintiffs' counsel, to search for it; that he had done so, partially, and could not find it, and had told them so; and that he had no particular desire to find it. . . . Upon the re-examination, the plaintiffs' counsel asked the witness, "Was not the note for $1,503.30?" which question the defendant objected to, as leading. The Court permitted it to be answered, assigning as a reason, as appears from the bill of exceptions, that the witness had given his recollection fully, upon the examination in chief, as to the description of the note; that the effort, on the cross-examination, was to show that the note was different from that described in the declaration; and that the memory of the witness was treacherous. . . .

Hopkins and Gayle, for plaintiffs in error, contended, . . . that a leading question could not be put by the plaintiff, to his own witness, unless, by his demeanor, he had evinced a leaning to the defendant, but the record showed that he was impartial. . . .

Edwards, contra, . . . to show the right of a party to ask leading questions of his own witness, and that it was a matter in the discretion of the Court, cited 1 Starkie, Evidence, 123. . . .

ORMOND, J. — . . . The general course of the examination of witnesses, and the difference between an examination in chief and a cross-examination, is perfectly well understood. The whole doctrine rests upon the supposition, that the witness is more favorable to the party who calls him, than to the other side. Though this may be generally true, it frequently happens that parties have to call witnesses who are unfriendly to them, and if confined to the usual course of an examination in chief, would not be able to elicit the truth. When, therefore, the witness, by his demeanor, manifests an unwillingness to tell what he knows, or betrays a leaning in favor of the other side, the Court will permit leading questions to be put, for the purpose of eliciting the truth. It is clear, however, that this must rest in the discretion of the Court, from the impossibility, in most cases, of putting the facts on record, so that they might be reviewed. (1 Starkie, 131; and see the cases collected by the editors, 2 C. & H. 724, note 506.) It results from this, that the presiding Judge need not state his reasons for permitting a leading question to be put, upon the examination in chief, as they would be mere conclusions, and not facts, susceptible of revision. . . .

Let the judgment be affirmed.

148. HEISLER v. STATE

20 Ga. 153

MISDEMEANOR, in Lee Superior Court. Decided by Judge ALLEN, March Term, 1856. An indictment was found at the June Term, 1855, of Lee Superior Court, charging Elbert Heisler with playing and betting, on the 1st day of April, 1855, "for money and other things of value, at a game of faro, loo, brag, bluff, three-up, poker, vingt-et-un, seven-up, euchre and other games played with cards." At the March Term, 1856, the case came on to be tried. . . .

The State introduced William H. English, who testified, that in the spring of 1855, and before the finding of the indictment, he saw defendant engaged in playing a game of seven-up, being a game played with cards, in the county of Lee. The Solicitor then asked him "if the defendant played for money." Defendant's counsel objected to this question as leading, and the Court sustained the objection. Defendant's counsel moved the Court to exclude the evidence of this witness, on that point, from the jury, contending that the Solicitor, by his leading question, having put the answer to it in the mouth of the witness, should not so vary the question as to make it legal, and thus elicit from the witness information that would be a reply to the objectionable question overruled by the Court. The Court overruled the motion, and permitted the Solicitor to prove by the witness that defendant played for money, and lost twenty dollars. To this decision, counsel for defendant excepted.

No other testimony was introduced, and the jury found the defendant "guilty"; whereupon, the Court fined the defendant one hundred dollars, and all costs, being the highest fine the Court was allowed, by law, to inflict. To this judgment of the Court, defendant's counsel excepted, and now assigns the same, together with the refusal of the Court to quash said indictment, and the refusal to exclude the testimony of the witness, English, as to defendant's playing for money, as error.

R. F. Lyon, for plaintiff in error. Sol.-General, John W. Evans, for defendant in error.

By the Court. — Benning, J., delivering the opinion. . . . Whether a leading question shall be asked on the direct examination, is a matter for the discretion of the Court hearing the examination. The case, therefore, in which this Court would be bound to touch that Court's judgment, allowing or not allowing a leading question to be asked, would be an extreme one.

In this case, the Court would not permit the leading question to be answered; but as the question had been put, and had, therefore, done all the harm it could do, the party hurt by it asked, as the only remedy, that the witness should be prevented from testifying on the point to which the question related. This request the Court refused to grant. This remedy would be worse than the disease. It is one which, so far as we know, has never been applied in practice. If a remedy known to the law, yet, whether it shall be applied in any case, is a matter which, like that as to the asking of leading questions, is for the discretion of the Court presiding.

Upon the whole, this Court cannot say that it sees anything to justify its interfering with the refusal of the Court to prevent the witness from being examined on the point to which the leading question related. That question, it may be remarked, however, was not strongly leading.

A little wholesome punishment inflicted upon the counsel that indulge in such questions, would, no doubt, soon stop the practice. . . . We find no error in this bill of exceptions.

149. TRAVELERS' INSURANCE CO. v. SHEPPARD

SUPREME COURT OF GEORGIA. 1890

85 Ga. 751

ACTION on a policy of accident insurance on the life of the plaintiff's husband. The main defense was that he was not dead. . . . [The plaintiff's case was that Sheppard, her husband, fell into the river accidentally from his boat; the defense maintained that Sheppard had purposely disappeared, to defraud the defendant. More details are given in No. 459, post.]

Henry Jackson, Lanier & Anderson and Hardeman, Davis & Nottingham, for plaintiff in error. Bacon & Rutherford, contra.

BLECKLEY, Chief Justice. — The verdict against the company was for $5,000. . . . It remains to dispose of objections which were taken to the form of the questions by which some of it was elicited. . . . To thirty of the interrogatories propounded to Turner, an exception on this ground [of leading questions] was duly filed, and was overruled by the Court as to each and all of them.

No doubt most of these interrogatories are leading, but many of them relate only to collateral or introductory matters not in dispute and not bearing directly on the merits of the controversy. As to such matters leading questions are allowable. 2 Taylor's Evidence, § 1404; 1 Greenleaf's Evidence, § 434.

But several of the interrogatories assume that Sheppard fell into the river, which was a disputed and most material fact, and one or two of them that he was dead, and that there was news of his death. This sort of assumption is one of the most pernicious forms in which the vice of leading questions can make its appearance, its tendency being to induce the witness to adopt the theory of the facts propounded by the examiner, and shape his testimony in a way to lend support to that theory. Even an honest and well-meaning witness may sometimes be drawn by this device into coloring the letter, if not the spirit, of his evidence more highly than the exact truth, so far as his knowledge of it extends, would warrant. It is not lawful, as a general rule, to propound in chief "questions which involve or assume the answer which the party desires the witness to make, or which suggest disputed facts as to which the witness is to testify." 1 Wharton, Evidence, § 499; Stephen, Digest of Evidence, art. 128. That this rule was flagrantly violated in several instances will be manifest from a mere glance at the following interrogatories. The answers are also set out, — not to elucidate the question whether the interrogatories are leading, for on that question any answers would be irrelevant; but to show that the letter of some of the answers was influenced by the form of the questions, although the witness did not know either that Sheppard was dead or that he fell into the river, and made it perfectly clear elsewhere in his testimony that he had no such knowledge:

Q. — "State what was the nature of the current at the point where Sheppard fell in, whether it was slow or swift?" A. — "Just at the point where the boat lay, there was a little counter-current, but 12 or 15 feet, about, outside there was a very strong current."

Q. — "How far below the mouth of Moccasin Slough was the point where Sheppard fell into the water?" A. — "The point where Sheppard fell in the water was about 600 yards below the mouth of Moccasin Slough."

Q. — "State whether or not there were any logs or tree-tops or rafts, either where Sheppard fell in or just below, and if just below, how far below?" A. — "There was some tree-tops and logs not over 40 yards where we found the boat."

Q. — "What time in the evening was it that Sheppard fell into the river, etc.?" A. — "It was very late in the evening, and very dark and cloudy. It was a dark and gloomy day. It was only a short time before night."

Q. — "Did either you or Boykin or Brown carry the news of Sheppard's death that night to his wife or father and mother? If you say you did not, why did not one of you three go?" A. — "We did not carry the news to the Sheppard family that night. I did not feel able to go."

A few others of the leading questions were calculated to do harm, but perhaps did none, construing all the answers of the witness together. His testimony, in its general effect, makes the impression that he was a truthful and unbiased witness. In several instances the attempt to lead him was unsuccessful, and though the letter of his answers was sometimes shaped by the form of the question, there was no perversion of the spirit and meaning of his testimony, considered in its totality. For this reason we hold that the Court did not abuse its discretion in admitting all the answers that were otherwise competent, notwithstanding the vicious character of many of the interrogatories. To admit or reject evidence drawn out by leading questions is generally discretionary with the trial Court. 150. LOTT v. KING

79 Tex. 292; 15 S. W. 231

APPEAL from Nueces. Tried below before Hon. J. C. RUSSELL.

This was an action of trespass to try title, brought to recover a league and labor of land patented to John B. Bulrese upon duplicate certificate

No. 35/216, issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in lieu of original certificate No. 39, issued by the Board of Land Commissioners of Jefferson County upon Bulrese's headright. Richard King was the original defendant, but he died during the progress of the suit, and appellee became the party defendant in his stead. As we understand from their abstract of title and the evidence offered, the plaintiffs claimed under the heirs of one Nathan Halbert, that Bulrese sold his headright to Halbert before the certificate was issued, and that the original certificate No. 39 was in fact issued to Halbert for one league of land. The defendant claimed under Bulrese through an alleged conveyance of the certificate by Mary C. Halbert as his sole heir.

The plaintiff took the deposition of Mary C. Halbert, and upon a written motion by defendant certain of her answers were suppressed. There were three grounds of the motion, one of which was waived. The grounds insisted upon were as follows: "1. Because the second, third, fourth, sixth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth direct interrogatories were each of them leading, irrelevant, and incompetent." . . . The direct interrogatories and the answers thereto excepted to by defendant were as follows:

"Interrogatory 2. This is a suit in trespass to try title to recover one league and one labor of land situated in Nueces County, Texas, and patented to John B. Bulrese, on the 7th day of August, 1882, by virtue of duplicate headright certificate No. 35/216, issued in lieu of original headright certificate No. 39. The original certificate was issued by the Board of Land Commissioners of Jefferson County, in 1838. Were you ever acquainted with (said) John B. Bulrese? And if yea, when and where did you know him, and for how long did you know him? Is he dead or alive? If you say that he is dead, when and where did he die? Are you related to said John B. Bulrese in any way? If so, how? If you answer that said John B. Bulrese is dead, and that you are a daughter of said John B. Bulrese, now please state whether or not the said Bulrese left any other children surviving him, and if any, how many; and give their names; and if any of them are girls, were they ever married; and if yes, give the names of their husbands. And are any of the said children of Bulrese dead? If yea, how many of them are dead, and what were their names, and when and where did they die? If you say that some of the children of said Bulrese are dead, did they leave any children or other descendants surviving them? And if so, which of them? And give their names. Answer. — I was acquainted with the said John B. Bulrese. I knew him in the States of Louisiana and Texas, and knew him as far back as I can recollect. The said John B. Bulrese is dead. He died somewhere on Grand River in the State of Louisiana. I am related to said John B. Bulrese. He was my father. Yes, the said John B. Bulrese left five children surviving him at his death besides myself, as follows." . . .

"Interrogatory 4. The original land certificate No. 39, issued by the Board of Land Commissioners of Jefferson County to John B. Bulrese for one league of land, recites that he had received the certificate for the labor and that he had sold the league to Nathan Halbert. On February 22, 1837, he, said John B. Bulrese, executed to Nathan Halbert a bond for title by which he bound himself to make title to Nathan Halbert to all of his headright, whether it be for a league and labor or for a third of a league, being the land for which he was entitled as a citizen of Texas before the day of the declaration of independence. Now, were you ever acquainted with said Nathan Halbert? If yea, were you related to him in any way, and if yea, how? Is said Nathan Halbert dead or alive? If you say he is dead, when and where did he die? Answer. — I was acquainted with the said Nathan Halbert, and I was related to him. I was his wife. The said Nathan Halbert is dead; he died near Eagle Springs, in Coryell County, Texas, about the year 1867." . . .

"Interrogatory 10. If you state that you were acquainted with Barnes Parker, now please state whether or not you ever sold and conveyed the headright certificates of John B. Bulrese for one league and one labor of land to said Barnes Parker. Answer. — I never did."

"Interrogatory 11. If in answer to Interrogatory 10 you say you never sold or conveyed the John B. Bulrese certificate for one league and one labor of land, now state whether or not you ever signed a deed or transfer of said certificate to said Barnes Parker. Answer. — I did not."

"Interrogatory 12. Please state whether or not you ever authorized any person to sign your name to a deed or transfer of said certificate to said Barnes Parker. Answer. — I never did authorize any one to sign my name to a deed or transfer to the said certificate of said John B. Bulrese to Barnes Parker.

"Interrogatory 13. Please state whether or not you ever had any business transaction with said Barnes Parker, in which he paid you the sum of $500. Answer. — I never did have any business transaction with said Barnes Parker in which he paid me $500 or any other sum of money." . . .

The motion to suppress these answers was sustained and the plaintiffs excepted. The ruling of the Court upon the motion is assigned as error.

E. H. Lott and D. W. Doom, for appellants. — 1. The direct interrogatories excepted to by defendant were not leading in form. . . .

Wells, Stayton & Kleberg, and Hume & Kleberg, for appellee. — 1. A leading interrogatory is one which may be answered in the affirmative or negative, or one which suggests to the witness the response he is desired to make. . . .

GAINES, Associate Justice (after stating the case as above). . . .

The statement preceding the questions in the second interrogatory is very general, and it is clear that it does not suggest the desired answer to the question, and we think the same may be said of the fourth. The statement of the facts that the certificate recited that Bulrese had sold the league to Halbert and that Bulrese had made a bond for title to Halbert for his right to land does not suggest any particular answer as to questions concerning the relationship of the witness to Halbert or the fact of his being dead or alive. These statements were unnecessary, but we are of opinion that a statement in an interrogatory which merely calls the attention of the witness to the subject-matter of the inquiry is no ground for suppressing the answer. Long v. Steiger, 8 Texas 460.

We are further of the opinion that the tenth interrogatory is not leading. It does not properly admit of an answer "Yes" or "No," and we are not aware of any decision which holds that a question is leading merely because it is put in the form "did or did not." Whether a question in that or a similar form be leading or not depends upon the determination of the inquiry whether it suggests any particular answer; and we think questions in that form which have been held leading are not such as inquire into a single fact, but such as enable the witness to state in two words, such as "he did" or "he did not," a series of group of facts. Such is the case of Tinsley v. Carey, 26 Texas 350. The question there evidently suggested to the witness that it was desired to prove that about January, 1857, Tinsley got money from the sheriff of Bastrop County, and that he was first to satisfy a judgment in favor of a certain person and then to apply the balance upon other debts. That these were the facts desired to be proved is indicated by the questions held leading in that case. But as to the question now under consideration, we think it would puzzle the astutest lawyer, who is uninformed as to the issues in the case, to determine from the question alone whether the examiner desired to prove that the witness had or had not transferred the certificate.

In like manner the other interrogatories objected to we think legal; except the thirteenth, which with some hesitation we hold to be leading.[1]

151. THOMAS HARDY'S TRIAL. (1794. Howell's State Trials, XXIV, 754). [Treason. The witness had testified to the doings at a meeting of the defendant's society. The witness was a member of the Society at the time, and was not known by his colleagues to be attending the meetings to get evidence for the Crown. He is now on cross-examination.]

What was the first time that you were at any of those meetings? On the 20th of January.

How came you to go then? — I was sent by a gentleman. . . . It was a person high in office under his majesty; but permit me to add, I was not desired by that gentleman to conceal his name. . . .

Mr. Gibbs. — Then trusting in you, he sent you to the Globe tavern on the 20th of January, 1794? — Certainly.

Then you never were at any of those meetings in the character of a spy? — As you call it so, I will take it so.

Mr. Gibbs. — If you were not there as a spy, take any title you choose for yourself, and I will give you that.

Mr. Law. — He did not state any title.

Mr. Gibbs. — I did not desire you to take any title in the sense that gentleman is using the term; you object to the term spy, as I called you, and I bid you take any other name.

Lord Chief Justice EYRE. — There should be no name given to a witness on his examination: he states what he went for, and in making observations on the evidence, you may give it any appellation you please. You recollect I made the observation before, when Mr. Erskine did the same thing.

Mr. Gibbs. — I really did not feel that I was going at all out of the way in the cross-examination of a witness, in calling him by a name which suits his character, though he does not like it.

Lord Chief Justice EYRE. — Go on.

Mr. Gibbs. — You went then (not to call you a spy) to these meetings in the character of a person who had no other reason for going there, than that of picking up what information you could, and carrying it again to those employers, in whose confidence you were? — Certainly. . . .

Mr. Gibbs. — You have been giving an account of some conversation that passed there; cannot you recollect who the persons were that had that conversation? — No, I do not know; there was a universal conversation.

Mr. Gibbs. — You going there for the purpose of collecting evidence against individuals, and coming now to give evidence against an individual, you thought it not material to observe who the people were who then used this language — you, a gentleman used to practise at the Old Bailey, and meaning to give evidence afterwards against those persons, did not think it material to learn by whom these conversations were held?

Lord Chief Justice EYRE. — Mr. Gibbs, I am sorry to interrupt you, but your questions ought not to be accompanied with those sort of comments; they are the proper subjects of observation when the defence is made. The business of a cross-examination is to ask to all sorts of acts, to probe a witness as closely as you can; but it is not the object of a cross-examination, to introduce that kind of periphrasis as you have just done.

Mr. Gibbs. — Send to Mr. Erskine, he is in the parlor.

(Mr. Erskine immediately came into court.)

Mr. Erskine. — Will your lordship give me leave to say, it is the universal practice of the Court of King's bench, the first criminal court in this country, in which I have had the honor to practise for seventeen years — we are certainly permitted to go as far as this. I agree with your lordship in what you just now said (and it will be of no consequence whether I did or no, because your lordship must give the rule). But what I take my learned friend to have said to the witness, is this: "You, sir," not meaning it as an insult to the witness, but "you, sir, as a practiser at the Old Bailey, must know the necessity, if you go to any place to get evidence, of having proper materials for that evidence; how do you account for not having done that?" In a cross-examination, counsel are not called upon to be so exact as in an original examination — you are permitted to lead a witness. . . .

Mr. Justice BULLER. — Undoubtedly the practice has increased much within my memory: what Mr. Erskine alludes to now has been universally the practice; that when you are upon a cross-examination, you are permitted to lead a witness more than you can on an original examination. But be so good as to recollect the mode in which the Lord Chief Justice put it yesterday, and I do not think in Guildhall, or any where else, you ever departed from that. You may lead a witness upon a cross-examination to bring him directly to the point as to the answer; but not to go the length as was attempted yesterday, of putting the very words into a witness's mouth, which he was to echo back again.

Mr. Erskine. — Having done that yesterday, I immediately bowed to the admonition I received from my Lord Chief Justice.

Lord Chief Justice EYRE. — . . . With regard to the point, I think it is so clear that the questions that are put are not to be loaded with all the observations that arise upon all the previous parts of the case. They tend so to distract the attention of every body; they load us in point of time so much; and that that is not the time for observation upon the character and situation of a witness is so apparent, that as a rule of evidence it ought never to be departed from. But it is certainly true that it does slide into examinations, and that it is very often not taken notice of, and it saves more time frequently to let it pass than to take notice of it. But there is a rule to which all those sort of things, if once an appeal is made to the Court, ought to be brought, and my judgment is, that after you have got the particular facts upon which that sort of observation is founded, the examination ought to proceed to the other facts upon the case, and the observations upon those former facts ought to make part of the defence. . . .

Mr. Gibbs. — I think you told me that you were a gentleman who practised at the Old Bailey; do you now practise here, or have you left off that practice? — I have not left it off.

You now practise at the Old Bailey? — I have not for some time.

How happens that? — Not this six months.

Your reason for not having practised is, that no business has been brought to you, I presume? — Certainly, you are right there.

Did you or not think it necessary, at this meeting, to attend to the particular persons from whom the conversation that you are now stating, proceeded? — At that time I was a total stranger almost to every one in the room.

You did not endeavor to distinguish what was said by one man from what was said by another? — I did not in conversation.

152. STATUTES. United States Revised Statutes. (1878. § 864). Every person deposing, as provided in the preceding section, shall be cautioned and sworn to testify the whole truth, and carefully examined. His testimony shall be redueed to writing by the magistrate taking the deposition, or by himself in the magistrate's presence, and by no other person, and shall, after it has been reduced to writing, be subscribed by the deponent.

153. ALLEN v. RAND

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1824.

5 Conn. 321

THIS was an action of trespass, tried at Middletown, February Term, 1823, before HOSMER, Ch. J.

To prove a material fact, the defendants offered in evidence the deposition of Mary Trowbridge; to the admission of which the plaintiffs objected, on the ground, that it was written by the agent of the defendants, or of one of them. The circumstances were these. On Monday, previous to the taking of the deposition, the parties met at the house where Mrs. Trowbridge resided, with the magistrate who ultimately took the deposition. He attempted then to take it; but after writing a few lines, Mrs. Trowbridge became faint and exhausted; and the business was adjourned to the next evening. Afterwards, in the absence of the plaintiffs and their counsel, and of the magistrate, Rand, one of the defendants, requested Cornelia Hall, who was living in the house with Mrs. Trowbridge, to write her deposition, from time to time, as she was able to give it. With this request Miss Hall complied; and, at the time adjourned to, the plaintiff not having attended, the paper thus written by her, was presented to the magistrate, and being read to Mrs. Trowbridge, was signed by her, and sworn to. The Chief Justice held, that the deposition was inadmissible; and rejected it. The plaintiffs having obtained a verdict, the defendants moved for a new trial, on the ground of this decision.

Sherman, in support of the motion, contended, that the deposition of Mrs. Trowbridge was legally taken. From her peculiar situation, it was necessary that some person residing in the house with her, who could watch her returns of strength, should write down her testimony for her. An amanuensis was indispensable. Rand requested Miss Hall to act in this capacity. He gave her no instructions. She did not know what use was to be made of the writing. There was not only nothing fraudulent or unfair in the transaction, but there was nothing in the situation of Miss Hall calculated to produce any bias on her mind. Aside from the single circumstance, that the request came from Rand, she acted in as unexceptionable a manner as she could. Then, does this circumstance, of itself, destroy the deposition? It was a lawful act, not prohibited by the statute, and clearly not malum in se. If a request from the party to write a deposition vitiates it; then such a request to the deponent, or to the magistrate, would have that effect. The material inquiry is, not at whose request the writing was done, but in what capacity the writer acted; whether it was done by an agent of the party, by one presumed to have an interest or bias in his favor. This, evidently, was not Miss Hall's situation. If she was the agent of Rand, her act was his act; but did Rand write this deposition? What she did was in aid of her inmate, the deponent, or of the magistrate engaged to take the deposition. It lightened their labor. She was their substitute; but not Rand's.

Staples and Hotchkiss, contra, after remarking upon the salutary nature of the provisions of law intended to guard against fraud in the taking of depositions, and the importance of adhering to the general rule prescribed, without inquiring whether there was any unfairness in the particular case, contended, that Miss Hall was in fact the agent of Rand, and acted as such, in writing the deposition of Mrs. Trowbridge. Whether she lightened Mrs. Trowbridge's labor, or whether she was, in any sense, the amanuensis of Mrs. Trowbridge, is immaterial. Sufficient it is, that Rand employed her to do this service; and in doing it, she acted under his authority. If A. employs B. to do a particular act, and B. does it; is not B., in doing that act, the agent of A.? The writing of depositions by amanuensis employed by the party is a door leading to all the mischiefs the Legislature intended to guard against. That door this Court will not open.

Hosmer, Ch. J. The only question raised in this case, is, whether the deposition of Mrs. Trowbridge was legally rejected. By statute it is enacted, (p. 47) that "the party, his attorney, or any person interested, shall not write, draw up, or dictate any deposition"; and that every such deposition shall be rejected by this Court. Whether the deposition of Mrs. Trowbridge was taken under the above law, or while the preceding statute was in force, does not appear from the motion; but this is perfectly immaterial, as the law now existing is precisely similar to the former, not in words, but in the construction which the Courts had put upon it. The law will not trust an agent to draw up a deposition for his principal; as by the insertion of a word, the meaning of which is not correctly understood, or by the omission of a fact that ought to be inserted, the testimony thus garbled and discolored, will be false and deceptive. Nor is there any possible argument in favor of such a proceeding. The deponent may write the deposition; or procure it to be written, by a disinterested person; or the parties may agree on a fit person for this purpose. The statute, even when strictly construed, is sufficiently lax, when ex parte depositions are taken, at least not unfrequently, to admit of the poisoning of justice in the very fountain; for if the evidence is untrue or partial, the result can never be conformable to right.

The deposition in question was written by Cornelia Hall, in the absence of the plaintiffs, their counsel, and the magistrate, on the procurement of Mr. Rand, one of the defendants. He requested and procured her to write it, from time to time, as the deponent was able to give her testimony. Miss Hall was an agent and attorney, authorized by her principal to do this specific act; for what is an agent but a substitute or deputy, and an attorney but one who is put in the place, stead, or turn of another? 3 Blackstone's Commentaries, 25. A general agent cannot be permitted to draw up a deposition; a fortiori is a special agent objectionable, who, in the situation of Miss Hall, must be influenced, in some degree, by the wishes, feelings, and interest of her employer. As the witness ought to be disinterested, so must the evidence be impartial, comprising the whole truth, as well as nothing but the truth; and this never can be rationally expected, when a deposition is drawn up by an attorney or agent, or what is little less exceptionable, by the party himself. Sickness constitutes no reason for the relaxation of the law; as it produces no actual necessity; and if it did, it would make no difference, as no such exception to the general rule is admissible. It is much preferable, that in particular instances, the party should even be deprived of testimony, than that a principle leading to wide-spread mischief should be adopted; as private disadvantage is a less evil, than general inconvenience.

It is true, that an agent may draw up a deposition impartially; and there is no reason to doubt that the young lady, in the case before us, acted with the most delicate integrity. But the statute was made in prevention of a wrong; and intends not, in any case, to place confidence where it may be abused.

Brainard and Bristol, Js. were of the same opinion.

Peters, J., dissented.

New trial not to be granted.

154. PEOPLE v. MOORE

Supreme Court of New York. 1836

15 Wend. 419

This was the trial of the prisoner on an indictment for murder, at the Onondaga oyer and terminer in September, 1835, before the Hon. Daniel Mosely, one of the circuit judges, presiding. After the public prosecutor had adduced proof in support of the indictment, a witness of the name of Crofoot was sworn on the part of the prisoner, who gave evidence material to the defense of the prisoner; to invalidate which the public prosecutor called the magistrate to whom complaint of the murder was made by Crofoot on the day it happened, who testified to a relation of facts given to him by Crofoot on that day, very different from that given by him in court. The magistrate, on his cross-examination, stated that four days after the complaint made by Crofoot, he took Crofoot's examination as a witness, which was taken pursuant to the statute, though he stated that he did not recollect that the examination was read to the witness, and on that occasion Crofoot's relation of the facts was substantially the same as when the complaint was made. This evidence was objected to by the public prosecutor, but received by the Court. The counsel for the prisoner then offered to read in evidence the examination of Crofoot, for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of the magistrate given on his cross-examination; to which the public prosecutor objected, and the Court ruled that the examination should not be read in evidence, but that the prisoner's counsel might use it for the further cross-examination of the magistrate. To this decision the prisoner's counsel excepted. . . .

B. Davis Noxon, for the prisoner. J. J. Briggs, district attorney of Onondaga, for the People.

By the Court, SAVAGE, Ch. J. — Two questions arise: 1. Should the examination of Crofoot have been received? . . . It has recently been decided by this Court, in conformity, as is supposed, with the weight of authority and correct practice, that when a witness is in any manner impeached, the party calling him may support his testimony by showing, that on other occasions he has given the same relation of facts to which he has sworn on the trial. 12 Wendell 78. In that point of view the defendant was clearly entitled to produce the deposition taken before the magistrate on the examination of the prisoner.

It was also proper for the purpose for which it was offered, to wit, to show that the justice was mistaken in the relation which he had just given of what Crofoot had sworn to. What reasons operated upon the mind of the Court do not appear, as none are stated in the bill of exceptions. The objections now made by the district attorney to the introduction of the deposition taken on the examination, are, 1. That it does not appear to have been correctly taken. On that point, the justice says that the examination was taken in pursuance of the statute, but whether it was read to the witness or not he did not recollect. When the justice swears that the deposition was taken in pursuance of the statute, the presumption is that it was regularly and properly taken; the law presumes every public officer does his duty until the contrary appears. The deposition must therefore be considered properly taken until some irregularity is shown. It is presumed that it was read over to the witness or by him, as it must have been signed by him according to the statute, 2 R. S. 709, § 19. But the statute does not in terms require that the deposition shall be read to the witness, as it does that the examination of a prisoner shall be read to him, 2 R. S. 708, § 16. There is a reason for this difference. The deposition of the witness must be upon oath and signed by him; the examination of the prisoner must not be on oath, and need not be signed by him, but by the magistrate. It is not to be presumed that any man will sign and swear to a deposition, without being properly informed of its contents. Such fact, therefore, if it exists, should be shown on the other side to discredit the deposition. . . .

As they erred in rejecting the testimony offered, a new trial should be granted. It may have been very important. On that subject we cannot judge, as the testimony to support the indictment is not set forth, nor was it necessary that it should be. The jury are to judge of the effect of the testimony. It is enough for us to know that competent testimony has been withheld from the jury to authorize us in awarding a new trial. New trial granted.

155. COWLEY v. PEOPLE

83 N. Y. 464

ERROR to the General Term of the Supreme Court, in the first judicial department, to review judgment entered upon an order made June 11, 1880, affirming a judgment entered upon a verdict convicting the plaintiff error of a misdemeanor. . . . An act of the Legislature was passed in 1876, entitled "An act to prevent and punish wrongs to children." (Laws of 1876, chap. 122, p. 95.) The plaintiff in error was indicted under this statute. The first count charged that he wilfully neglected to provide a child known as Louis Kulkusky, alias Louis Victor, with, and to give him, proper, wholesome, and sufficient food, clothing, and means of cleanliness, and thereby did wilfully cause and permit his health to be injured. . . . There was testimony of what was the food given to this boy from day to day; there was testimony that it was not enough in quantity or variety for the healthy nutrition of a growing child; there was testimony of the state of body and mind in which the lad was found, after months of feeding thus; and that that state was a result of that feeding. . . .

On the trial, the People offered in evidence pictures taken by the photographic process. One picture was claimed to be that of the boy Louis, before he went into the care of the plaintiff in error. Others were of him about two weeks after he had been taken from the custody of the plaintiff in error and to St. Luke's Hospital. They were offered to show the bodily appearance of the child at the several times of taking the pictures. The first one was proven to be a correct likeness of him, a perfect picture of him when he came to this country. The photographic operator who took the others, testified that he was a photographer, doing that business in New York city; that he took them about the 6th of January, which was about two weeks after Louis was taken to the hospital; that they were exactly correct likenesses of Louis, as he appeared at the time of taking them. The house physician at the hospital, testified that the last taken pictures represented the child as he appeared at the hospital, only that from the position in which the pictures were taken, they did not show the emaciation as great as it really existed. Another medical witness, who saw and examined the child a while after the last pictures were taken, testified that they were about correct. Another such witness testified that they were correct. It was also in evidence that the boy improved in condition after he was taken into the hospital, so that the fair inference is, that if the pictures were a correct likeness of him when taken, they did not show a worse appearance of him than it was when he left the house of the plaintiff in error. The plaintiff in error objected to the reception of these pictures in evidence.

Charles Cowley, for plaintiff in error.

Daniel G. Rollins, for defendant in error. The photographs of the child showing his condition at the time he was taken from the custody of the plaintiff in error were properly received in evidence. . . .

Folger, C. J. (after stating the case as above). So far as the circumstances of the taking of these pictures, and the purpose of them in evidence were concerned, in our judgment they were properly received, if copies of objects taken by that process are ever competent in evidence. And we are now to consider whether they are, under a proper state of facts, and for a proper purpose, competent evidence.

We know not of a rule, applicable to all cases, ever having been declared, that they are not competent. Nor do we see, in the nature of things, a reason for a rule that they are never competent. We do not fail to notice, and we may notice judicially, that all civilized communities rely upon photographic pictures for taking and presenting resemblances of persons and animals, of scenery and all natural objects, of buildings and other artificial objects. . . . Photographic pictures do not differ in kind of proof from the pictures of a painter. They are the product of natural laws and a scientific process. It is true that in the hands of a bungler, who is not apt in the use of the process, the result may not be satisfactory. Somewhat depends for exact likeness upon the nice adjustment of machinery, upon atmospheric conditions, upon the position of the subject, the intensity of the light, the length of the sitting. It is the skill of the operator that takes care of these, as it is the skill of the artist that makes correct drawing of features, and nice mingling of tints, for the portrait. Most of evidence is but the sign of things. Spoken words and written words are symbols. Once, a deaf mute born so was presumed in law an idiot (1 Hale 34), but later days look upon him as not incompetent to be a witness, if he in fact have understanding and knows the nature of an oath. (Ruston's Case, 1 Leach, Cr. Cas. 408). He is now taught to give ideas to his fellow men by signs, and his deprivation of some of the common faculties of humanity does not exclude him from the witness-box. The signs he makes must be translated by an interpreter skilled and sworn. So the signs of the portrait and the photograph, if authenticated by other testimony, may give truthful representations. When shown by such testimony to be correct resemblances of a person, we see not why they may not be shown to the triers of the facts, not as conclusive, but as aids in determining the matter in issue, still being open, like other proofs of identity or similar matter, to rebuttal or doubt. A witness who speaks to personal appearance or identity tells in more or less detail the minutia thereof as taken in by his eye. What he says is a description thereof, by one mode of signs, by words orally uttered. If his testimony be written instead of spoken, and is offered as a deposition, it is a description in another mode of signs, by words written; and the value of that mode, the deposition, depends upon the accuracy with which his words uttered are put into words written. Now if he has before him a portrait or a photograph of the person, and it shows to him a correct copy of that person, if it produce to his view a correct description, which he testifies is a likeness, why may not that be given to the jury, as a description of the person by the witness in another mode of signs? The portrait and the photograph may err, and so may the witness. That is an infirmity to which all human testimony is lamentably liable. But when care is taken to first verify that the process by which the photograph was taken was conducted with skill and under favorable circumstances, and that the result has been a fair resemblance of the object, the picture produced may, in many of the issues for a jury, be an aid to determination. . . . In our judgment, the learned recorder did not err in taking the photographs into the evidence. . . .

All concur, except MILLER, J., absent at argument. Judgment affirmed.

156. DE FORGE v. NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD R. CO.

178 Mass. 59; 59 N. E. 669

TORT, under St. 1887, c. 270, for injuries sustained by a freight brakeman while in the employ of the defendant, through the negligence of the engineer of a locomotive engine of the defendant, on which the plaintiff was riding. Writ dated October 13, 1899. At the trial in the Superior Court, before DEWEY, J., the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff; and the defendant alleged exceptions.

As a result of the accident the plaintiff's left foot was injured, and the principal inquiry at the trial was as to the extent of the injury. The plaintiff put in evidence X-ray pictures of the plaintiff's two feet, printed from a glass plate. Each of the pictures was marked under the toes of each foot, "left" and "right" respectively, both words being in lead pencil. One of the plaintiff's witnesses explained that the representation of the foot with the word "left" below it was the left foot and represented the injured foot, and the other, marked "right," was the right foot. He then testified that there had been a dislocation of the bones upward, and that an enlargement of the bone of the foot marked "left" in the picture was, in his opinion, the result of fracture, and that the man would always have a weak foot, and would not be able to perform the duties of a freight brakeman. On cross-examination he testified that, leaving out the question of fracture, there was no reason why the plaintiff could not have a perfectly useful foot; and that leaving the pictures out, there was nothing to the eye to disclose any fracture; although he had suspicions as to a fracture.

The defendant contended and offered to show that the X-ray placed the right foot upon the right side of the plate, and the left foot upon the left side of the plate, and that in printing sensitized paper the objects would be reversed; and that, as matter of fact, the pictures showing an enlargement were pictures of the right foot instead of the left. This evidence was excluded. Immediately before this the defendant had offered the glass plate from which the plaintiff's pictures were taken, and this was excluded. Subsequently other pictures printed from the same plate were offered in evidence and were excluded.

W. S. Robinson, for the defendant. J. B. Carroll & W. H. McClintock, for the plaintiff.

Lathrop, J. (after stating the facts as above). No reason appears in the exceptions why the evidence offered by the defendant was excluded; and we can see no reason why the plate from which the pictures put in evidence by the plaintiff were printed should not have been admitted. . . . It is further contended by the plaintiff that there was some doubt as to the manner in which the plate was made, and that the judge might have excluded it for that reason. We see nothing in the exceptions to substantiate this claim. If it were true, then the plaintiff's pictures should not have been admitted.

It is entirely clear from the testimony that the picture on the glass plate was not taken by a lens but by an X-ray machine; and that it was the impression of a shadow, not a reflection of an object, the plate being below the feet, and the light above them. When pictures were printed from the plate, the position of the feet would be reversed; and this would have been demonstrated had the plate and the pictures taken by the defendant been admitted. The plaintiff assumed, from his marking on the pictures admitted, that the feet as represented on the plate were reversed, which is not in accordance with the testimony given by his own witnesses as to the manner in which the impressions on the plate were produced.

Lastly, it is asserted that the judge might have excluded in his discretion the plate and the pictures offered by the defendant. The rule is thus stated by Chief Justice Gray in Blair v. Pelham, 118 Mass. 420: "A plan or picture, whether made by the hand of man or by photography, is admissible in evidence, if verified by proof that it is a true representation of the subject, to assist the jury in understanding the case. . . . Whether it is sufficiently verified is a preliminary question of fact, to be decided by the judge presiding at the trial, and not open to exception." It is therefore in the matter of verification or authentication that the judge has discretion. But here there was no question of this sort. The plaintiff had put in two pictures printed from the glass plate. The defendant then offered the plate together with two other pictures made from the same plate; and the evidence of verification was stronger in the case of the defendant's pictures than in the case of the plaintiff's. The photographer who took the plaintiff's pictures testified that he did not know much about the X-ray; while the person who took the pictures for the defendant was a physician of high standing who had taken, as he testified, in the neighborhood of a hundred X-ray pictures, and had seen the majority of them developed. On this evidence we do not deem it possible that the judge could have excluded the plate or the pictures on the ground that they were not duly verified. While a picture produced by an X-ray cannot be verified as a true representation of the subject in the same way that a picture made by a camera can be, yet it should be admitted if properly taken. Bruce v. Beall, 99 Tenn. 303.

The rule laid down by Chief Justice Gray in Blair v. Pelham is in accordance with earlier and later cases in our reports. Hollenbeck v. Rowley, 8 Allen 473. Marcy v. Barnes, 16 Gray 161, 163. Randall v. Chase, 133 Mass. 210, 213. Turner v. Boston & Maine Railroad, 158 Mass. 261, 265. Commonwealth v. Morgan, 159 Mass. 375. Farrell v. Weitz, 160 Mass. 288. Van Houten v. Morse, 162 Mass. 414, 422.

It is true that the opinion in Gilbert v. West End Street Railway, 160 Mass. 403, after stating many reasons why the photograph offered in evidence in that case was properly rejected, concludes in these words: "We think at least it was in the discretion of the Court to reject it," citing Farrell v. Weitz, ubi supra. But the case cited was not decided on the ground that the judge had discretion except on the matter of verification; and we do not think that the Court intended to lay down a broader rule than that stated in Blair v. Pelham.

It is also true that in some cases a somewhat broader rule is laid down. See Verran v. Baird, 150 Mass. 141. Harris v. Quincy, 171 Mass. 472. Carey v. Hubbardston, 172 Mass. 106. An examination of the papers in these cases leaves no doubt in our minds that the cases were properly decided, whether the reasons given were in accordance with the rule laid down in Blair v. Pelham or not.

In Beals v. Brookline, 174 Mass. 1, where photographs were admitted, it was said: "In the admission of such evidence much must be left to the discretion of the presiding justice, and we are not prepared to say that there was error in law in permitting them to be shown to the jury." But in this as in other matters, which may be left generally to the discretion of the trial judge, his discretion is not unlimited, and the judge is not at liberty to disregard the rules of law, by which the rights of the parties are governed. See Woodward v. Leavitt, 107 Mass. 453, 460. Chandler v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct, 122 Mass. 305.

We are of opinion that the rights of the defendant in this case were violated, and that the glass plate, the pictures taken by the defendant, and the evidence offered by the defendant and excluded should have been admitted. It was clearly competent for the defendant to introduce evidence to show that the plaintiff's pictures showing an enlargement of one of the feet, and from which a witness for the plaintiff discovered a fracture, did not represent the left foot but the right, and for this purpose to show the difference between an ordinary photograph and one taken by an X-ray.

As the only exception relating to the question of liability has been overruled, the new trial will be on the question of damages only.

So ordered.

(2) Opinion

160. History.[1] On the principle of Testimonial Knowledge (ante, Nos. 108–125), i.e. that the witness must speak as a perceiver, not merely a guesser, a witness, speaking (for example) to a sale of goods who declares that he thinks or believes or is persuaded that the sale was not made, cannot be heard, so far as he means that he did not see the transaction in question but believes so on rumor alone or on supposition. This principle of personal observation came early into play in emphasizing the impropriety of testimony by one who speaks only from hearsay. Thus, in Archbishop Laud's Trial (1644. 4 How. St. Tr. 315, 399), a witness, testifying to rumors of the bishop's tampering with a jury, said "and thereupon, as he conceives, the petty-jury was changed"; and the defendant argues: "[This evidence] is not the knowledge, but the conceit only of the witness; he 'conceives,' which I am confident cannot sway with your lordships for a proof." At this stage, then, and as the distinct first meaning of the disparaging references to "opinion," the profession had in mind a witness who turns out upon examination to have no facts to contribute, no knowledge, no personal acquaintance with the man or the land or the loan or the affray about which he is speaking.

But, at the same time, or shortly after, there occurs a general recognition of what seemed at the time as an exception to it, — the use of skilled witnesses. A witness is called to the stand, but appears to have no personal acquaintance with the circumstances in dispute; then how can we listen to his mere opinion? Because he is a skilled witness on these matters, says the counsel. Lord Mansfield in effect answered the objection that the expert had no personal knowledge, no facts, by pointing out that the subject was in truth one of fact, but of a class of facts about which expert persons alone could have knowledge. In short, it was only "opinion" as a mere guess or a belief without observation which they rejected; but "opinion" as an inference or conclusion from personally-observed data they did not think of disparaging. "Mere opinion," said Lord Mansfield, in Carter v. Boehm, is not evidence; "mere abstract opinion," says the Pennsylvania Court in 1803, is not evidence; "opinions not coupled with the facts," "opinion without assigning a reason," say other judges, is no evidence; because, of course, it does not appear that the witness has any personal knowledge.

But, in another generation's time, there occurs the modern mutilation of this idea, chiefly seen in the United States. The English writers and judges and the early American judges, when they disparaged "mere opinion," never had in mind the case of the lay-witness who, having a "fact"-knowledge, included in his testimony an opinion or inference based on those data, — as in the leading instances (used by those writers and judges) of handwriting, character, and sanity. But when, by careless usage, the phrase came to be passed along that "opinion is not evidence," the distinction for skilled witnesses not having a "fact-knowledge was readily enlarged, and was made to apply to the lay witness who had a "fact"-knowledge, and to support the new and broad idea that "opinion" in general was not evidence. That distinction or test was, as put by Mr. Garrow, in Beckwith v. Sydebotham, excluded opinion which "was an inference which it was for the jury to draw, if the facts would warrant it."

This extension — logical enough, it is true, and correct in theory, but pernicious (as it has proved) in practice — is a peculiarly American doctrine. It has apparently not taken place in England in any important degree.

The sum of the history is, then, that the original and orthodox objection to "mere opinion" was that it was the guess of a person who had no personal knowledge, and the "mere opinion" of an expert was admitted as a necessary exception; the later and changed theory is that wherever inferences and conclusions can be drawn by the jury as well as by the witness, the witness is superfluous, and thus an expert's opinion is received because and wherever his skill is greater than the jury's, while a lay opinion is received because and whenever his facts cannot be so told as to make the jury as able as he to draw the inference. The old objection is a matter of testimonial qualifications, requiring personal observation; the modern one rests on considerations of policy as to the superfluity of the testimony. In the old sense, "opinion" — more correctly, "mere opinion" — is a guess, a belief without good grounds; in the modern sense, "opinion" is an inference from observed and communicable data.

161. NEW ENGLAND GLASS CO. v. LOVELL

7 Cush. 319

THIS was case for negligence against the owners of a vessel, as common carriers, in not stowing properly under deck, conveying safely, packages of glassware, by means of which they were lost. They had been laden on board the defendants' schooner, at Boston, and bills of lading given, promising to carry them safely to New York, "dangers of the seas excepted;" and the question was, whether the loss was within the exception.

It was proved that the schooner, whilst prosecuting this voyage, was driven ashore on Hart Island, at the head of Long Island Sound, and the goods lost. It was alleged by the plaintiffs, but denied by the defendants, that the goods lost were carried on deck, instead of being securely stowed under deck; and that became substantially the fact in issue. It was conceded, that if the packages of glassware were stowed on deck, without the permission of the shippers, it was proof of negligence, which would render the carriers responsible for the loss. Much evidence was offered on both sides, upon the controverted fact, whether the packages of glassware were stowed under deck, and as incident thereto, the plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to show, that if they had been stowed under deck, they would have been found there, although in a damaged condition, so that they could be identified; because, upon the facts proved, they could not have been washed out or broken to pieces, if they had been there. On the other hand, the defendants attempted to prove that the main hatch was forced off, and holes beaten in the bottom of the vessel, by force of the wind and sea, at the time the schooner stranded, by means of which the packages might have been washed out.

In this state of the evidence, Brown, a witness for the plaintiff, stated that he had been acquainted with the navigation about Hart Island thirty years, and been stranded there, and was employed in saving and getting off wrecked vessels, and was near the place on the night in question. The plaintiffs then proposed to ask him whether, taking into view the condition and situation of the vessel, and all the accompanying circumstances of the case, the goods in question could, in his opinion, have been broken to pieces in the hold, or washed out of the hold, if they had been stowed therein, in the manner testified to by the defendants' witnesses. This was objected to and rejected. The question on this exception is, whether it should have been admitted.

Shaw, C. J. (after stating the case as above). In weighing circumstantial evidence, the opinion of a witness is often useful, and indeed necessary; but as its admissibility is contrary to the general rule, and limited to particular cases. It depends so much upon the other evidence which has been given, the nature of the facts to be proved, and the particular posture of the case, it is often extremely difficult to apply it in practice. The principle, upon which this evidence is admissible, is clear and entirely just. In applying circumstantial evidence, which does not go directly to the fact in issue, but to facts from which the fact in issue is to be inferred, the jury have two duties to perform; first, by a rigid scrutiny of the evidence to ascertain the truth of the fact to which the evidence goes, and thence to infer the truth of the fact in issue. This inference depends upon experience. When we have ascertained by experience that one act is uniformly or generally the cause of another, from proof of the cause we infer the effect, or from proof of the effect we infer the cause. For instance; it being ascertained by long experience that arsenic is a deadly poison, if it were proved that one took arsenic and was found dead, the inference would be, that his death was caused by that poison; or, if, upon a post mortem examination, arsenic were found in the stomach, it would be inferred that the death was caused by it.

Now when this experience is of such a nature that it may be presumed to be within the common experience of all men of common education, moving in the ordinary walks of life, there is no room for the evidence of opinion; it is for the jury to draw the inference. It is not because a man has a reputation for superior sagacity, and judgment, and power of reasoning, that his opinion is admissible; if so, such men might be called in all cases to advise the jury, and it would change the mode of trial. But it is because a man's professional pursuits, his peculiar skill and knowledge in some department of science, not common to men in general, enable him to draw an inference, where men of common experience, after all the facts proved, would be left in doubt. Suppose a vessel has been stranded, and the charge is, that it resulted from unskilful and careless navigation. After all the evidence given of the state of the wind and weather, the position and distance of the land, the sail carried, the course steered, and the nautical manoeuvres adopted, landsmen, men of common experience would be unable to infer that the disaster was caused by bad seamanship, rather than inevitable accident; whereas, a man of nautical expérience might draw a certain inference, and pronounce it attributable to the one or the other cause. Folkes v. Chadd, 3 Doug. 157; 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 440; 6 N. H. 463.

In the present case, this Court are of opinion, with the judge who tried the cause, that these questions were not proper for the opinions of the witness; they were inferences to be drawn from facts within common experience, not depending on peculiar experience, especially such as the witness said he possessed. We think the same rule applies to the rejection of the opinions of the other witnesses, as stated in the answers given in their depositions, which were objected to, and rejected by the Court.

In view of the difficulty of laying down any rule on this subject, precise enough for practical application, the only proper course seems to be, to keep the principle steadily in view, and apply it according to all the existing circumstances affecting the particular case. Exceptions overruled.

W. Sohier, for the plaintiffs. B. F. Hallett, for the defendants.

162. COMMONWEALTH v. STURTIVANT

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1875

117 Mass. 122

INDICTMENT for the murder of Simeon Sturtivant, at Halifax, in the county of Plymouth, on February 15, 1874. Trial before WELLS and AMES, JJ., who allowed a bill of exceptions in substance as follows:

1. There was evidence tending to show that Simeon Sturtivant and Mary Buckley, his housekeeper, were last seen alive about half past six o'clock on Sunday evening, February 15, 1874, and that Thomas Sturtivant was last seen alive about half past four o'clock on the afternoon of the same day; that about half past seven o'clock on the morning of the sixteenth, Mary Buckley was found lying dead in a field about thirty-five rods from the dwelling-house of the Sturtivants, and soon afterwards the dead body of Thomas was found lying in one room of the house, and that of Simeon in another room; that between these rooms was another large room, all the doors of which were closed. The only evidence tending to show who was the murderer of either of these persons was circumstantial. The government contended that the evidence tended to show that the three persons were killed by the same person, with the same weapon, at the same time. Two other indictments against the defendant had been found, and were pending in this Court, for the murder of Thomas Sturtivant and Mary Buckley. . . .

2. A chemist having stated that he was accustomed to make chemical and microscopic examination of blood and blood-stains, for the purpose of determining whether they were human blood or the blood of other animals, was admitted as a witness for the government, and testified in regard to the tests which he had applied to certain stains upon articles of clothing belonging to the defendant. He was then asked to give an opinion as to the direction from which a certain stain upon the defendant's overcoat had come. The defendant's counsel objected, contending that the limit to which the witness could go was a full description of the stain as it appeared under the microscope or otherwise and illustrations before the jury (which the witness made). The objection was overruled, and the witness stated that the blood came from below upward. It was not shown that he had made or witnessed any experiments with blood or other fluids in regard to this matter. The examination of the witness and the rulings of the Court upon this point were as follows:

Q. — "I wish to inquire what the stains upon the coat would indicate as to the direction from which the blood came?" The defendant's counsel objected that this was not chemistry or any other branch of science. . . .

Wells, J. — "I think your first inquiry would be, whether there was anything discovered that indicated anything of that sort."

Q. — "At the time you made your first examination, was there anything discoverable that indicated the direction from which the stains had come that you found upon the coat?"

A. — "Yes, sir."

Q. — "What?"

A. — "The appearance of the stains."

Q. — "Will you tell us what direction they had come from?"

Defendant's counsel. — "So far as the stains are concerned that are upon the coat, the jury can judge as well as he can."

Wells, J. — "I think the witness can describe what it was that he saw that indicated the direction, and show what it was, rather than to give a general opinion as to what the direction was."

Defendant's counsel. — "I wish to reserve an exception, so far as the stains that are now upon the coat are concerned, and which the witness says are the same now that they were then, excepting the change resulting from the natural handling of the coat."

Wells, J. — "I understand, also, that he says that there were indications then that are not apparent now; that he examined it with a lens, and that that aided his examination. It is in that view that he is allowed to describe what the indications were which indicated the direction."

Defendant's counsel. — "What is not there now, we do not object to the witness describing; but so far as anything now visible, indicating in which direction the blood came, is concerned, we object to that. We think the distinction should be observed by the witness; and unless your Honors are of a different opinion, we ask that he may be confined to that."

WELLS, J. — "We think he may give the whole description, as it was found."

A. — "It is an oval stain between one-eighth and one-fourth of an inch long, and one inch from the edge of the coat, on the right-hand side, front, and three and three-fourths inches below the last button-hole, the bottom button-hole. The direction of the stain is diagonal. Using my own coat as an illustration, the stain lay in this direction (illustrating). The upper portion of the stain contained more blood than the lower, which it does not contain now, on account of its having been rubbed off."

Q. — "What does that indicate as to the direction?"

Defendant's counsel. — "One moment. If it is chemistry, we do not object; if it is anything else, we do."

WELLS, J. — "I think if the witness explains the reasons at the same time that he gives the result, he may do so."

A. — "If the force of a stream of fluid, whatever it may be, and especially blood, be from below upward, the heaviest portion of the drop will stop at the further end of the stain; if from above downward, it will stop below."

Defendant's counsel. — "That is pure opinion as to a matter of mechanics, not chemistry. Any butcher is just as good an expert on that as this witness."

WELLS, J. — "The evidence is admitted subject to exception."

A. — "It can only be seen with a lens in a small stain."

Q. — "Now, you have described one, the direction of which was upward and diagonal. Is there any other?"

A. — "Not upon the coat."

The jury returned a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree; and the defendant alleged exceptions.

B. W. Harris. . . . The opinion of the chemist who testified from the appearance of the drop of blood, that it came from below upward, was incompetent evidence. The expert should have been limited to a statement of what he was, by his superior knowledge, better qualified to testify about than another, and concerning which the jury, from that knowledge common to mankind which they were supposed to possess, would be unable to determine for themselves and without his aid. The case finds "that it was not shown that he had made or witnessed any experiments with blood or other fluids, in regard to this matter." He was, nevertheless, permitted to give his opinion that the drop of blood came from below upward. . . . The witness had minutely described the shape of the stain, its position on the coat, that its direction was diagonal, and that the upper portion of it contained more blood than the lower. The jury, therefore, had all the facts, and it was for them to draw the inference from whence the blood came, for the witness had no more knowledge derived from experiment than they. . . .

C. R. Train, Attorney-General, (W. G. Colburn, Assistant Attorney-General, with him), for the Commonwealth.

Endicott, J. . . . The principal exception is to the competency of the evidence in regard to the blood-stain. The question here is whether a witness, who is familiar with blood and has examined, with a lens, a blood-stain upon a coat, when it was fresh, can also testify that the appearance then indicated the direction from which it came, and that it came from below upward, although he has never experimented with blood or other fluid in this respect. The witness had previously testified to its appearance at the time he examined it, and to the fact that at the trial it was not in the same condition, some of the blood having been rubbed off.

The exception to the general rule that witnesses cannot give opinions is not confined to the evidence of experts testifying on subjects requiring special knowledge, skill, or learning; but includes the evidence of common observers, testifying to the results of their observation made at the time in regard to common appearances or facts, and a condition of things which cannot be reproduced and made palpable to a jury. Such evidence has been said to be competent from necessity, on the same ground as the testimony of experts, as the only method of proving certain facts essential to the proper administration of justice. Nor is it a mere opinion which is thus given by a witness, but a conclusion of fact to which his judgment, observation, and common knowledge has led him in regard to a subject-matter which requires no special learning or experiment, but which is within the knowledge of men in general.

Every person is competent to express an opinion on a question of identity as applied to persons, things, animals, or handwriting, and may give his judgment in regard to the size, color, weight of objects, and may estimate time and distances. He may state his opinion in regard to sounds, their character, from what they proceed, and the direction from which they seem to come. State v. Shinborn, 46 N. H. 497. The correspondence between boots and footprints is a matter requiring no peculiar knowledge, and to which any person can testify. Commonwealth v. Pope, 103 Mass. 440. So a person not an expert may give his opinion whether certain hairs are human hairs. Commonwealth v. Dorsey, 103 Mass. 412. And a witness may state what he understood by certain "expressions, gestures, and intonations," and to whom they were applied; otherwise the jury could not fully understand their meaning. Leonard v. Allen, 11 Cush. 241.

In this connection may be noticed a large class of cases, where, from certain appearances more or less difficult to describe in words, witnesses have been permitted to state their conclusions in relation to indications of disease or health, and the condition or qualities of animals or persons. As, when a witness testifies that a horse's foot appeared to be diseased, he states a matter of fact, open to the observation of common men. Willis v. Quimby, 31 N. H. 485. And it is proper for a witness to give his opinion that a horse appeared to be sulky and not frightened at the time of an accident; Whittier v. Franklin, 46 N. H. 23; or he may testify as to the qualities and appearance of a horse. State v. Avery, 44 N. H. 392. . . . It is competent for a witness to testify to the condition of health of a person, and that he is ill or disabled, or has a fever, or is destitute and in need of relief; Parker v. Boston & Hingham Steamboat Co., 109 Mass. 449; Wilkinson v. Moseley, 30 Ala. 562; Barker v. Coleman, 35 Ala. 221; Autauga County v. Davis, 32 Ala. 703; and one may testify that another acted as if she felt very sad; Culver v. Dwight, 6 Gray 444. So those who have observed the relations and conduct of two persons to each other may testify whether, in their opinion, one was attached to the other. And in M'Kee v. Nelson, 4 Cowen 355, the Court say: "The opinion of witnesses on this subject must be derived from a series of instances passing under their observation, which yet they never could detail to a jury." See Trelawney v. Colman, 2 Stark. 191. A witness may also give his judgment whether a person was intoxicated at a given time; People v. Eastwood, 4 Kernan 562; or whether he noticed any change in the intelligence or understanding, or any want of coherence in the remarks of another. Barker v. Comins, 110 Mass. 477. Nash v. Hunt, 116 Mass. 237. . . .

It would seem to be within the knowledge of men in general, when looking at the effects of a blow upon a solid body, to determine from the external marks and indications, if any exist, the direction from which it came. . . . Suppose the panel of a carriage door is broken in by a collision; different appearances would follow from a horizontal blow delivered at right angles, than from a blow from the front or rear, from above or below. Such appearances the common observer can detect, some more accurately and clearly than others, but it is presumed to be within the power of all; and the opinion of an expert, who has experimented by blows on similar surfaces, and is learned in the law of forces, is not necessary or required. If the panel itself is introduced to the jury, they are competent and able to decide the question. If it cannot be, the witness who saw it may describe, as well as he can, what he saw, and state the conclusion he formed at the time. It would also seem to be within the range of common knowledge to observe and understand those appearances, in marks or stains caused by blood or other fluids, which indicate the direction from which they came, if impelled by force. . . .

The competency of this evidence rests upon two necessary conditions: first, that the subject-matter to which the testimony relates cannot be reproduced or described to the jury precisely as it appeared to the witness at the time; and second, that the facts upon which the witness is called to express his opinion are such as men in general are capable of comprehending and understanding. When these conditions have been complied with or fulfilled in a given case, the Court must then pass upon the question, whether the witness had the opportunity and means of inquiry and was careful and intelligent in his observation and examination. . . .

In the case at bar the admission of the evidence by the Court involved the decision: (1) that the stain was not in the same condition, and did not exhibit the same appearance at the trial as it did when examined by the witness, and cannot be reproduced to the jury: upon this as a matter of fact there is no question; (2) that the stain might in itself furnish indications from what direction it came, capable of being observed by a witness, who though familiar with blood and its qualities, had not made or seen experiments made with it or other fluids in this respect; and (3) that the witness had made that thorough, careful, and intelligent observation of the appearances, which would entitle him to testify. We must take the decision of the Court on this last point to be conclusive.

Whether the reasons the witness gave for his opinion of the direction of the stain were sound or unsound, does not affect the question of competency, and of course the defendant had full opportunity to test him by cross-examination, or to show by evidence or argument that his reasons were unsound. . . . Exceptions overruled.

163. HARDY v. MERRILL

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUDICATURE. 1875

56 N. H. 227

APPEAL, by William H. Hardy against Isaac D. Merrill, from the decree of the judge of probate approving and allowing, in solemn form, the will of Joseph Hardy, deceased. Said will was dated July 26, 1870. . . . The issues were in common form. In the first, the executed alleged that the said Joseph Hardy was of sound mind; and in the second, he alleged that said will was not obtained by undue influence: upon both of which allegations issue was taken by the appellant. . . . Solomon Hardy, a brother of the testator, was called as a witness by the appellant, and the following questions, among others, were put to him:

1. "Being a brother of Joseph Hardy, from your observation of his appearance and conduct at the time you saw him at your house in June, 1869, state whether or not, in your opinion, he was, at the time, of sound and disposing mind and memory." 2. "Being a brother of the testator, from what you had observed as to his conversation, conduct, and general deportment as to all subjects, up to July 26, 1870, have you any opinion as to his sanity at that date, and, if so, what is it?"

The referees excluded these questions, and the appellant excepted. . . .

. . . Josiah C. Hardy, a witness for the appellant, testified, among other things, that the "testator appeared like a failing man in every respect," which was excluded, and the appellant excepted. Madison M. Howe, a witness for the appellant, testified that the testator "appeared like a man who did not seem to know what he was talking about half the time," which was excluded, and the appellant excepted; but he was allowed to state, subject to the exceptions of the appellee, that "he (the testator) appeared very weak in his mind." George B. Hardy, a witness for the appellant, stated, subject to exception of the appellee, that "he (the testator) appeared childlike — appeared feeble in body and mind — more like a child than a rational man." Samuel C. Hardy, a witness for the appellant, testified that "it looked to me as though he was failing in his business capacity, or in his mind," which was excluded, and appellant excepted. . . .

In the Circuit Court, at the April Term, 1875, it was ordered that the questions of law raised by the report of the referees be reserved and transferred to this Court for determination.

Mugridge, for the appellant. We submit that the questions put to Solomon Hardy, the brother of the testator, whether he had any opinion as to the sanity of the testator when the will was made, and if so, what it was, was improperly excluded by the Court. We know that this suggestion is in conflict with certain decisions, referred to by the other side, in which this kind of testimony has been rejected; but feeling, as we do, that the existing rule on this subject is clearly wrong, we most respectfully ask the Court to reconsider it, in the hope that, its fallacies appearing, it may be condemned as tending to subvert rather than promote the ends of justice, and as being no longer worthy of toleration.

The first time that the precise question now under consideration was before the Court in this State was in Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H. 120, and the decision was then made by a divided Court. The opinion of a majority of the judges in that case seems to be based on the general doctrine, recognized in some of the prior cases referred to by counsel on the other side, that ordinarily the opinions of witnesses other than experts are not admissible. . . . We wish to refer the Court, also, to the learned and exhaustive dissenting opinions of Judge Doe, in State v. Pike, and Boardman v. Woodman, as indicating what we claim to be the true rule of evidence, and the one abundantly supported by the weight of judicial authority. We would suggest, that no more odious law of practice exists than the one under consideration, and that its rigid enforcement is one of the greatest embarrassments and hindrances in the administration of justice that can be found in the practice of this State.

To render evidence as to mental condition competent, it must be purely and essentially descriptive in its character; and any statement partaking at all of the nature of an opinion is at once rejected. By witnesses who are not capable readily of making that accurate discrimination required to keep opinion and fact, oftentimes so intimately blended, separate in testifying, the rule is most difficult of comprehension, and much testimony is many times excluded on account of the inability of the witness to make the true distinction demanded. . . .

Again: we suggest that a class of evidence, which would with every intelligent jury be the most satisfactory, is now peremptorily excluded. A parent, brother, or friend, who may have associated with the testator on terms of the closest intimacy every day of his life, and become, by the closest observation and study, perfectly familiar with every phase of his character, no matter how great his learning and intelligence on other subjects, unless he has made mental diseases a study, so that he can be recognized as an expert in such matters, is debarred from expressing his opinion, while that of the expert, who never saw the party, and had no actual knowledge of him, upon a hypothetical case is admitted. . . .

Sargent & Chase, for the executor. . . . The questions to Solomon Hardy were not competent, he not being a subscribing witness to the will, nor an expert. The general rule, that the opinions of witnesses not experts are not competent evidence, is well established and everywhere admitted. The subscribing witnesses to a will are an exception to this rule, well marked and defined. The statute has made another exception as to the value of property — Gen. Stats. ch. 209, § 24. There is no good reason why insanity should be treated as an exception to this general rule. . . .

FOSTER, C. J. . . . . The case before us involves an inquiry into the nature and extent of the exceptions to the general rule, that testimony of facts alone is admissible in courts of justice, and that the opinions of witnesses are to be excluded. The same questions are presented which were considered by the late Supreme Court in Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H. 120, and State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399. In both these cases a majority of the Court sustained the doctrine of the exclusion of the opinions of non-professional witnesses upon questions of mental condition. . . . But the subject is so rapidly increasing in importance, that its thorough re-examination ought to be no longer postponed. . . .

It would be merely a repetition of the historical part of Judge DOE's opinion, in State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 421, 423, if I were to relate how, after the eminent jurists, who presided in our courts between the years 1811 and 1833, had all passed off the stage, the "Massachusetts exception" gradually worked into favor in New Hampshire, it having been erroneously declared by the Massachusetts Courts to be an expression of the English common law. . . . A tolerably careful investigation authorizes me to repeat the language of Judge DOE, that "in England no express decision of the point can be found, for the reason that such evidence has always been admitted without objection. It has been universally regarded as so clearly competent, that it seems no English lawyer has ever presented to any Court any objection, question, or doubt in regard to it." State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 408, 409. I presume, however, it will not be denied that in the ecclesiastical Courts, where questions of testamentary capacity are generally tried, such opinions have always been received. . . . The practice in the Courts of the common law has been universal and unwavering in the same direction; and "the number of English authorities is limited only by the number of fully reported cases in which the question of sanity has been raised." State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 409. . . .

It is proper for me to invite attention to the history of what I have called the Massachusetts exception. . . . The exception grew and dilated, finding larger and stronger expression along through the years and the course of the cases of Hathorn v. King, 8 Mass. 371, Dickinson v. Barber, 9 Mass. 225, Needham v. Ide, 5 Pick. 510, Com. v. Wilson, 1 Gray 337, down to Com. v. Fairbanks, 2 Allen 511 (1861), when it was held per curiam, "that the incompetency of the opinions of non-experts was not an open question in Massachusetts;" though Judge THOMAS had recently said, in Baxter v. Abbott, 7 Gray 79, that "If it were a new question (he) should be disposed to allow every witness to give his opinion, subject to cross-examination upon the reasons upon which it is based, his degree of intelligence, and his means of observation."

In very recent times, however, we observe a more liberal disposition on the part of the Massachusetts Courts — see Barker v. Comins, 110 Mass. 477 (1872), and Nash v. Hunt, 116 Mass. 237 (1874). In the former of these cases, it was held that persons acquainted with the testator, although neither witnesses to the will nor medical experts, may testify whether they noticed any change in his intelligence, and any want of coherence in his remarks. GRAY, J., said,

"The question did not call for the expression of an opinion upon the question whether the testator was of sound or unsound mind, which the witnesses, not being either physicians or attesting witnesses, would not be competent to give. The question whether there was an apparent change in a man's intelligence or understanding, or a want of coherence in his remarks, is a matter not of opinion but of fact, as to which any witness may testify, in order to put before the court or jury the acts and conduct from which the degree of his mental capacity may be inferred." . . .

With deference and great respect I may be allowed to say, that I rejoice much more in the results attained in these later cases, than in the modus operandi of judicial reasoning by which the conclusions were reached. They indicate decided and accelerating progress of the Massachusetts Courts in the right direction. The full establishment of the true doctrine there, is a question of time only.

Courts and text-writers all agree that, upon questions of science and skill, opinions may be received from persons specially instructed by study and experience in the particular art or mystery to which the investigation relates. But without reference to any recognized rule or principle, all concede the admissibility of the opinions of non-professional men upon a great variety of unscientific questions arising every day, and in every judicial inquiry. These are questions of identity, handwriting, quantity, value, weight, measure, time, distance, velocity, form, size, age, strength, heat, cold, sickness, and health; questions, also, concerning various mental and moral aspects of humanity, such as disposition and temper, anger, fear, excitement, intoxication, veracity, general character, and particular phases of character, and other conditions and things, both moral and physical, too numerous to mention. . . . Opinions concerning matters of daily occurrence, and open to common observation, are received from necessity; and any rule which excludes testimony of such a character, and fails to recognize and submit to that necessity, tends to the suppression of truth and the denial of justice. The ground upon which opinions are admitted in such cases is, that, from the very nature of the subject in issue, it cannot be stated or described in such language as will enable persons, not eye-witnesses, to form an accurate judgment in regard to it. How can a witness describe the weight of a horse? or his strength? or his value? Will any description of the wrinkles of the face, the color of the hair, the tones of the voice, or the elasticity of step, convey to a jury any very accurate impression as to the age of the person described? And so, also, in the investigation of mental and psychological conditions, — because it is impossible to convey to the mind of another any adequate conception of the truth by a recital of visible and tangible appearances, — because you cannot, from the nature of the case, describe emotions, sentiments, and affections, which are really too plain to admit of concealment, but, at the same time, incapable of description, — the opinion of the observer is admissible from the necessity of the case; and witnesses are permitted to say of a person, "He seemed to be frightened;" "he was greatly excited;" "he was much confused;" "he was agitated;" "he was pleased;" "he was angry." . . . All evidence is opinion merely, unless you choose to call it fact and knowledge as discovered by and manifested to the observation of the witness. . . . And it seems to me quite unnecessary and irrelevant to crave an apology or excuse for the admission of such evidence, by referring it to any exceptions (whether classified, or isolated and arbitrary) to any supposed general rule, according to the language of some books and the custom of some judges.

There is, in truth, no general rule requiring the rejection of opinions as evidence. A general rule can hardly be said to exist, which is lost to sight in an enveloping mass of arbitrary exceptions. . . . Suppose, the day before or a week before the death, a lawyer, farmer, and blacksmith saw the deceased, and had an opportunity to see whether he appeared to be well or sick: suppose the lawyer is asked, "Did you observe any indications of his being well or sick?" and the answer to be, "I observed no indication of his being sick; he appeared as well as usual, as well as I ever saw him;" suppose the farmer is asked, "Did you notice anything unusual in his appearance or conduct?" and the answer is, "No, I did not;" suppose the blacksmith is asked, "In your opinion was he well or sick?" and the answer is, "In my opinion he was perfectly well; his spirits, looks, and behavior, all showed, in my opinion, freedom from weakness and pain;" what legal distinction can be drawn between these questions and answers, to make one competent, and either of the others incompetent? It is all opinion, and nothing but opinion, of the man's physical condition in relation to health or disease. The use or the omission of the word "opinion," in either of those questions or answers, does not affect the character of the testimony in the slightest degree. Calling such testimony "opinion" does not make it "opinion;" and calling it something else does not make it something else. . . .

Now let us imagine a scene that might very probably be exhibited in any Court where the Massachusetts rule prevails. One witness says: "He did not appear as usual; he did not appear natural." "Very well," says a learned barrister, "very well, Mr. Witness. You may say that, — that is quite regular, — that is your opinion. Now tell us in what respect he did not appear 'as usual' or 'natural.'" "Well, I can't describe it, but I should call it wandering, delirious; he was incoherent in his talk." "Very well, Mr. Witness, you acquit yourself like a sensible man. Now tell the jury whether in your opinion he was then of sound mind." "I object," thunders the learned barrister on the other side. "I object," thunders the opposing junior. "Counsel knows better; it is an insult and an outrage to put such a question." . . . The witness is confounded. The jury are confounded. Everybody is confounded, — except those who understand that "incoherence of thought" and "delirium," vulgarly called "wandering," is not a state of mental unsoundness, is not mental disease; and that "as usual" or "natural" is not a condition of mental health. Whether it is such condition or not is a question then solemnly debated. . . . At the close of the scene which I have described, not a man of the laity goes out of the room without being disgusted with this exhibition of the law as a system of arbitrary rules, that ignoring all legal ideas decides upon a distinction purely verbal. And why should not the laymen be disgusted with the senseless subtlety which permits one party to show by his witness that a testator "appeared perfectly natural," and forbids the adverse party to offer the testimony of another witness that "he didn't appear to be in his right mind"? . . .

In the case now before us, the learned judge and his associates, to whom the trial was referred, evidently and inevitably experienced great embarrassment and confusion of mind in their effort to conform to the supposed rule. The futility of their endeavors is notably apparent. Mr. McAlpine was permitted to say of the testator, "He seemed to be all broken down in body," but was forbidden to say, "He seemed to be all broken down in mind;" and yet, the same witness (without specification of mental or bodily infirmity) was permitted to say that, between certain dates, "he had changed very much;" "his mind was such that he could not give any intelligent answer;" "he didn't seem to have any memory;" "I discovered that he had failed;" "his conversation was childish." The following questions were ruled out: First. "Being a brother of Joseph Hardy, from your observation of his appearance and conduct at the time you saw him at your house, in June, 1869, state whether or not, in your opinion, he was at the time of sound and disposing mind and memory." Second. "Being a brother of the testator, from what you had observed as to his conversation, conduct and general deportment as to all subjects, up to the 26th day of July, 1870, have you any opinion as to his sanity at that date, and if so, what is it?" Mr. Hardy was not allowed to say that the testator "appeared like a failing man in every respect." . . .

The Massachusetts rule is, that non-experts' opinions shall be excluded. But the rule itself does not exclude them; it only excludes the use of certain words. It admits the opinions, and merely embarrasses the witness and confounds the jury by requiring the witness to express his opinion without using certain forbidden terms, and by using others that are understood by the jury and everybody else to be precisely synonymous. A non-expert, who has been watching by the bedside of a sick man, may say, "He was delirious all night;" a farmer may say that his neighbor's boy is so lacking in intelligence as to be "below par;" anybody may say that a man was "crazy drunk;" that a testator didn't seem to understand anything that was said to him — seemed senseless, unnatural, not as usual; or, that "no change was perceptible in his intelligence," "no incoherence of thought," nor anything unusual or singular in respect to "his mental condition;" was healthy or sickly in body; — but in giving his opinions of mental health or disease, the non-expert must not use the words "sane," "insane," "mentally disordered," or "deranged." . . . The selection of the phraseology in which such an opinion may be expressed, and that in which it cannot be uttered, depends on no legal principle, but on the mere whim of the Court. Such an arbitrary and senseless choice or rejection of terms in which to express an admissible opinion is mere, sheer logomachy, a waste of precious time given us for better purposes, a verbal quibble unworthy of the law, and calculated to bring it into contempt. . . .

Thus supported upon principle and authority, I am satisfied that the time has arrived when this Court is called upon to declare the law to be in conformity with the views I have expressed.

Ladd, J. I think it is shown by proofs which fall little, if at all, short of demonstration, that the doctrine excluding the opinions of non-experts on the question of insanity has grown up in this State within the memory of men now living in the profession; that it had no place in the common law brought here from England, nor in the jurisprudence or practice in this State, from the constitution down to a comparatively recent date; that it is contrary to reason, extremely difficult of application, and inconvenient in practice; that the great weight of judicial opinion and authority outside this State is against it; and that, even if we look at the condition of authority as shown by the expression of judicial opinion and practice in this State, the balance cannot fairly be said to be in favor of the rule. No titles are to be disturbed by adopting a rule more consonant with reason, and which accords with the almost universal practice in jurisdictions where the common law is used the world over. I therefore concur fully with my brother Foster in the conclusions at which he has arrived.

Cushing, C. J., concurred. Case discharged.

164. FISKE v. GOWING

SUPREME COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1881

61 N. H. 431

DEBT, on the statute (G. L., c. 236, s. 19). Plea, the general issue. Verdict for the defendant.

The plaintiff recovered judgment against Milan Harris, A. R. Harris, and S. G. Griffin, who were stockholders in the M. Harris Woollen Co., a corporation of which the defendant was treasurer; the execution issued thereon was placed in the hands of the sheriff for collection, who exhibited it to the defendant at his office in Boston, and at the time gave to him a proper and sufficient written request for a certificate of the number of shares, etc., of the judgment debtors in the corporation; and the defendant did not then, or ever, furnish such certificate. The defense was, that after giving the written request the sheriff waived or withdrew it. Both the sheriff (produced as a witness by the plaintiff) and the defendant testified fully in respect to all the conversation, facts, and circumstances which took place during their interview. Subject to the plaintiff's exception, the Court allowed the following question to be put to the defendant, and his answer to be taken: "Did you, or not, understand from what Mr. Holt [the sheriff] said, and from his conduct, that he waived or withdrew his request for a certificate?" Ans. — "I fully so understood it; that was the reason I took no steps towards giving a certificate." . . .

Lane & Dole, for the plaintiff. B. Wadleigh and S. Hardy, for the defendant.

SMITH, J. The precise question raised in this case was decided in Eaton v. Rice, 8 N. H. 378, where it was held that a witness may state generally what he understood a contract between two persons to have been from their conversation, although he may not be able to state the language used in making the agreement. It rarely happens that two persons are able to give precisely the same account of a conversation. Their narration will differ more or less according to their intelligence, their interest in the subject-matter, their opportunities for hearing, their prejudices for or against the parties, the lapse of time since the conversation occurred, and a variety of other circumstances. Emphasis thrown upon the wrong word might convey a meaning different from that originally intended. Often the manner in which a remark is made, and the conduct and appearance of the party, may have much to do in producing the understanding that was received, much of which it is difficult and sometimes impossible for a witness to describe. It was a vital question whether the defendant understood or had a right to understand, from what was said and done, that the request for a certificate was waived or withdrawn. He might have received his understanding in part from the conduct of the officer, and in part from what was said between them and from the way it was said. To confine the witness to a mere narration of the language used, if he were able to recall it, might give the jury an imperfect and erroneous idea of the actual understanding of the parties.

The request for a certificate might be waived expressly, or by a mutual understanding that it was waived. . . . It was a question of mutual understanding. Such evidence has been so commonly received that the question of its admissibility can hardly be said to be an open one.

Case discharged.

165. MARCOTT v. MARQUETTE, HOUGHTON & ONTARIO R. CO.

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN. 1882

49 Mich. 101; 13 N. W. 374

ERROR to Marquette. Submitted June 22. Decided October 4. Case. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

. . . The case was submitted to the jury upon the facts, and they returned a verdict for the defendant. The action was for causing the death of plaintiff's intestate, a child two or three years old, who got upon the track of the railroad, and was struck by a passing train. The train was an irregular train, consisting of a locomotive and a single passenger car, and was moving, as the jury found, at the rate of twenty-four miles an hour. Plaintiff lived very near the track, and there was no fence between the track and his house. Plaintiff was a laborer in defendant's employ. He had two small children, and when he went to his labor in the morning, left them with their mother, who at this time was unwell. The children went out of the house by themselves, and were observed by a neighbor upon the track when the train was approaching. One of them got off in time, and the other was killed. No one appears to have seen them when they went upon the track and the testimony of the engineer tended to show that they had probably been in a ditch by the side of an embankment on which the track was laid, and that they had come upon the track in haste when they were first observed. The jury negatived any carelessness in the parents in suffering them to go out unattended. . . . When the engineer was on the stand as a witness for the defense, he was asked why he did not see the children upon the track. He answered, "The children could not possibly be on the track and I not see them, unless they got on from the ditch on the left-hand side of the engine." This was objected to as a mere opinion, but the Court held it to be competent.

F. O. Clark, for appellant. A witness cannot swear to mere deductions. . . . W. P. Healy, for appellee.

COOLEY, J. (after stating the case as above). — The Court was right in this ruling. The engineer was watching the track for obstacles and discovered none. The sweep of vision he could testify to, and if the fact was that the children could not come upon the track without coming within the range of his vision, except by coming from the left-hand ditch, it was entirely proper that he should testify to that fact. It was not matter of opinion, but of knowledge.

But the Court is said to have ruled differently on evidence offered for the plaintiff. Mrs. LaCoss, a neighbor of the plaintiff, had testified that she was in the garden by her house for ten or fifteen minutes before the train passed, and that she did not hear any whistle blown. She was then asked: "Could the whistle have blown anywhere near Champion station and you not have heard it?" This was objected to and ruled out. It is contended that a fact was called for in this case just as much as in the other. We do not think so. It might be a fact that Mrs. LaCoss heard or noticed no ringing of a bell, but whether a bell could have rung without her hearing it is another matter altogether. It is probably within the knowledge of every reflecting person that familiar sounds within his hearing often fail to be noticed by him at all, where the circumstances are such that he has no occasion to notice them. The striking of a clock, and the customary railroad signals, are familiar illustrations: the sound strikes the ear without securing mental attention, and immediately afterwards the person cannot say he heard it at all. If one under such circumstances swears that there was no sound, because if there had been he would have heard it, he testifies very carelessly, unless indeed he had his mind on the signal at the time, and was awaiting it. . . . But the case was one in which the jury could judge as well as the witness herself. When she had given the facts of distance, and whether there was any interfering obstacle, there was no good reason why her judgment of the probability of hearing a whistle should be taken, rather than that of the jury, or why her judgment should direct theirs in a matter which related to a fact of common observation and common experience. They could apply and should apply their own good sense to the case; and if she had sworn positively there was no bell, merely because she did not notice it, the jury might disregard the statement, if other evidence satisfied them that it was erroneous, without any imputation upon her veracity. Mistakes are too easy and too common in such matters to afford much ground for serious accusation. . . .

We find no error of substance in the record, and the judgment must stand affirmed.

The other justices concurred.

166. GRAHAM v. PENNSYLVANIA CO.

SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA. 1890

139 Pa. 149; 21 Atl. 131

ON October 23, 1888, William S. Graham and Maria E. Graham, his wife, in right of said wife, brought trespass against the Pennsylvania Company, operating the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago railway, to recover damages for personal injuries received by Mrs. Graham and alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant company. Issue.

At the trial on April 1, 1890, it was shown that the arrangement of the Federal street station, Allegheny City, where Mrs. Graham received her injuries, was as follows: Along the track upon which Mrs. Graham arrived, were two platforms, together about 23 feet wide, the two covered with a shed. Next the track was a platform 3 feet 10 inches wide (as given in the appellant's paper-book, 4 feet 9 inches, as given in that of the appellees), extending the length of the train eastwards towards the exit gate. This platform was 9 inches below the lowest car step. On the other edge of it from the train, was a descent of 9 inches to the main platform, which was about 19 feet wide, extending across to the north main track. The posts of the shed, on one side, were at the inner edge of the narrow platform; on the other, about 12 feet, perhaps, to the south. The shed was lighted by electric lights of 50-candle power, suspended under the comb of the roof.

Mrs. Graham testified that on the evening of February 6, 1888, about 8 o'clock, her train reached the station, when she alighted and with a basket on her arm started east towards the exit; that, after walking about 12 feet, "edging" to the right to get within the line of the posts, she fell and sustained severe injuries; that she had frequently stopped at Federal street station from defendant's trains, but never before had she alighted upon this raised platform; and she could not imagine at first what caused her to fall, as she supposed she had alighted upon the main platform, until she looked about her and observed the descent from the narrow platform to the other, and that was the first she knew of the offset there.

William Graham, a son of the plaintiffs, called on their behalf:

Q. — "State whether, in your judgment, from your observation there, your knowledge of the platform, that is a safe platform upon which to alight from trains?" Objected to, as incompetent and irrelevant. By the Court: "Objection overruled." Exception. A. — "I think it is an unsafe platform to arrive on, for the light shines towards you, and the elevation is in front of you, and the light shining against this elevation would make the platform appear one, unless you were looking for it; unless you were warned against it. . . ."

Other witnesses for the plaintiffs were permitted to testify under objection and exception, to the same effect. . . . The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $3000. A rule for a new trial having been discharged, judgment was entered, when the defendant took this appeal, assigning for error: 1, 2. The admission of plaintiffs' offers.

Mr. George B. Gordon (with him Mr. John H. Hampton and Mr. William Scott), for the appellant: (1) The question at issue was whether the platform provided by the defendant was so constructed that it could be used by passengers, by the exercise of ordinary care on their part, without injury. There was involved in the case no question of any particular technical knowledge, with reference to the platform. It was a plain, ordinary contrivance, of which any juror of ordinary knowledge was competent to judge, when put in possession of the facts. Having the location, the distance of this offset from the train, the height of the offset, and the width of the platform below, the jury were as competent to pass upon the fact whether it was dangerous or not, as upon a like question connected with a step in a sidewalk or pair of stairs. The offers objected to were, therefore, inadmissible. . . .

Mr. R. B. Petty (with him Mr. J. O. Petty and Mr. K. T. Friend), for the appellees: (1) The witnesses whose testimony was admitted, under objection, were not called and permitted to testify as experts. They did not testify as experts at all. Before they were permitted to give their judgments, they testified that they were familiar with the platform from daily use . . . and, upon showing their knowledge of all the facts, they were permitted to give their judgments. The question is settled by the rulings in Bearry v. Gilmore, 16 Pa. 463. . . .

Opinion, Mr. Justice MITCHELL. That the opinions of witnesses are in some cases admissible as evidence, even when not coming properly under the head of expert testimony, has long been established in practice. In several classes of questions, the line between the witness's judgment or opinion and his affirmation of a fact is so indistinct that it cannot be marked out in practice. Such are questions of identity of persons or things, of the lapse of time, of comparative shape or color or sound, of expression and through it of meaning, etc. In all of these, however positively the witness may affirm facts, what he says is after all largely his opinion, but so blended with knowledge and recollection that the line where opinion ends and fact begins cannot be distinguished. Hence, both must be admitted or both excluded, and to do the latter is often to shut out the only light the case admits of. In questions, therefore, of identity, of sanity, of handwriting, and some others of like nature, opinions of witnesses, having sufficient knowledge of the particular circumstances to form the basis of a responsible judgment, have been admitted without hesitation. Such is the elementary doctrine laid down in Greenleaf and other authoritative works, but the theory on which such evidence is admitted is very slightly developed. The cases, however, have extended far beyond the classes mentioned in the text books, and may be said not only to have become legion, but legion against legion. An examination of a large number of them, while not enabling us to reconcile all the practical applications, does, we think, show that the ground on which such evidence must always rest, as expert testimony strictly so called does, is a clear necessity. . . .

In those matters where mere descriptive language is inadequate to convey to the jury the precise facts or their bearing on the issue, the description by the witness must of necessity be allowed to be supplemented by his opinion, in order to put the jury in position to make the final decision of the fact. It is thus expressed in Commonwealth v. Sturtivant, 117 Mass. 122 [ante, No. 162], where a large number of illustrations are given (some of which, I may say, in passing, seem to us extremely questionable):

"The exception . . . includes the evidence of common observers testifying to the results of their observation, made at the time, in regard to common appearances or facts, and a condition of things which cannot be reproduced and made palpable to a jury."

But, as necessity is the ground of admissibility, the moment the necessity ceases, the exception to the general rule that requires of a witness facts and not opinions ceases also. Hence, whenever the circumstances can be fully and adequately described to the jury, and are such that their bearing on the issue can be estimated by all men, without special knowledge or training, opinions of witnesses, expert or other, are not admissible. This is well stated by Chief Justice SHAW, in New England Glass Co. v. Lovell, 7 Cush. 321 [ante, No. 161]:

"The principle upon which this evidence is admissible is clear and entirely just. In applying evidence which does not go directly to the fact in issue, but to facts from which the fact in issue is to be inferred, the jury have two duties to perform: first, . . . to ascertain the truth of the fact to which the evidence goes, and thence to infer the truth of the fact in issue. This inference depends on experience. . . . Now, when this experience is of such a nature that it may be presumed to be within the common experience of all men of common education, moving in the ordinary walks of life, there is no room for the evidence of opinion; it is for the jury to draw the inference." . . .

This examination of elementary principles and general authorities has seemed necessary, because our own cases on the exact point are few, and supposed not to be in entire harmony. . . .

Some occasional difference in application may be unavoidable, because, as said by Chief Justice SHAW in New England Glass Co. v. Lovell, supra, there is extreme difficulty in laying down any rule precise enough for practical application, and the only proper course is to keep the principle steadily in view, and apply it according to the circumstances of each case. . . .

In the present case, the alleged dangerous place was a raised part of the platform, or broad step, 4 feet wide and 9 inches high. It came clearly within the range of ordinary experience. The briefest statement would convey a perfect comprehension of the place, and every juryman who ever got in or out of a car, or went up or down a flight of steps, was as capable of judging of the alleged danger as the witnesses who gave their opinions. The first and second assignments of error must be sustained. . . .

However, it is clear that the admitted facts fail to establish any negligence of defendant, and that the plaintiff must, as a matter of law, always fail to recover. It would, therefore, be useless to send the case back for another trial. Judgment reversed.

167. SCHAEFER & CO. v. ELY

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1911

84 Conn. 501; 80 Atl. 775

APPEAL from Superior Court, Fairfield County; HOWARD J. CURTIS, Judge.

Action by John V. Schaefer, Jr., & Co. against Elizabeth L. Ely and others on a building contract, to recover the balance due thereunder, and for the value of extra work done in connection therewith. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John C. Chamberlain and George G. McNall (Ivins, Mason, Wolf & Hoguet, on the brief), for appellants. Edwin L. Scofield and Wilbur S. Wright, for appellee.

WHEELER, J. In the second count of the complaint, the plaintiff alleges that, on October 2, 1905, the plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement, whereby the plaintiff was to furnish all material and labor for the erection of the buildings known as the Misses Ely School Building, at Greenwich, Conn., in accordance with the plans and specifications of Carrere & Hastings, architects, with such modifications as might be desired by the defendants, in consideration of the payment to it by the defendants of a sum equal to the cost of the work and $7,500 commission and 5 per cent. upon the cost of the added or modified work. The plaintiff alleges that there is still due and unpaid, according to the architects' certificate, $38,665.89.

One ruling only is made a ground of appeal. Mr. Brainerd, a construction engineer, and of the firm of architects intrusted with the building of the Ely School, qualified as an expert upon the character and manner of the construction of the Ely School Building and the west wing. He testified that he drew the plans, specifications, and contract, and was familiar with and knew of all subsequent changes and additional work, and that as the work progressed it was constantly within his knowledge, through the books, reports, and records in his office, and that he made an examination of the work in April, 1907, for the purpose of enabling him to determine as to the acceptance of the work and the issuance of the final certificate. He was inquired of as to whether he was satisfied from that examination that the work called for by the contract, and as in fact done, had been done in a workmanlike manner. The defendants objected to the question, because not a subject for an opinion.

The main objection to this evidence was that the opinion of the witness could not be given; that he must state in detail what he saw, and the various defects, and leave the conclusion of compliance with the contract to be drawn between the contract and the work done by the Court. This is an erroneous view. The witness who qualifies as an expert and testifies to his familiarity with contract, plans, specifications, and changes therein, and with the work done, may give his conclusions as to the comparison between these, without detailing at length the manner in which each item of the work done had been performed. When the opinion of the witness in a case is evidence otherwise competent, and that the subject of the investigation will be made clearer by its introduction, the opinion should be received.

When facts sought to be proved are of so voluminous or complicated a character that their introduction would occupy much time, and might be difficult of understanding by themselves, and these many facts are to be proved for the purpose of drawing a conclusion from them, the Court may permit a witness who is qualified upon the subject of investigation, and has made the investigation, to express an opinion, without giving the details on which the opinion rests.

The opinion of the expert as to whether a building is furnished in a workmanlike manner, or according to certain plans and specifications, is admissible for the same reason as is the opinion of the accountant as to the result of his examination of the books of account, or as to schedules taken from the books, verified by him (Elmira Roofing Co. v. Gould, 71 Conn. 629, 631, 42 Atl. 1002), or as summaries or averages from voluminous or complicated records are admitted. Wigmore on Evidence, (1904 Ed.) § 1231.

The necessities of the situation, taken in connection with the improbability of liability to misrepresentation, led to the rule admitting the opinion of the accountant and the record searcher, and the situation is as urgent permitting the qualified architect or mechanic to testify as to whether work is done in a workmanlike manner, or according to a contract. The opportunity of cross-examination, and the presence in court of contract, plan, and specifications, and the ability of the opposing party to examine the work done and test the sufficiency of the opinion, render such a source of evidence practically safe against misrepresentation.

The authorities upon this, as upon many subjects of opinion evidence, are variant, with a strong tendency to widen the scope of opinion evidence. Atwood v. Atwood, 79 Atl. 59. The following are instances of correct applications of the general rule:

The qualified witness may state that the work is well done. Wood v

Brewer & Brewer, 57 Ala. 515, 517; Ward v. Kilpatrick, 85 N. Y. 413. He may state that the machine was built in a good and workmanlike manner. Curtis v. Gano, 26 N. Y. 427. He may state whether a railroad was properly constructed at a certain point. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Johnston, 78 Tex. 536, 15 S. W. 104; Kreuzberger v. Wingfield, 96 Cal. 251, 31 Pac. 109. He may state the cost of erecting a building from plans, or similar to one destroyed. Joske Bros. v. Pleasants, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 433, 440, 39 S. W. 586; Woodruff v. Imperial Fire Ins. Co., 83 N. Y. 133, 138. He may state that the building was constructed in accordance with the contracts. J. T. Stark Grain Co. v. Harry Bros. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 122 S. W. 947. He may give his opinion as to the difference in value of a vessel as repaired, and what her value would have been if repaired according to the contract. Sikes v. Paine et al., 32 N. C. 280, 51 Am. Dec. 389. . . .

There is no error. The other Judges concurred.

168. JOHN H. WIGMORE. A Treatise on the System of Evidence at Common Law. (1905. Vol. III, § 1929.)

Future of the Opinion Rule. If one were asked to name the rules most peculiar to the Anglo-American evidence-law, he ought perhaps to name the Character rule, the Hearsay rule, and the Opinion rule. Neither is found on the Continent. All three are indigenous judicial developments. All are the product of the jury-system. All are founded on a peculiar cautiousness in our law, and all have been developed with an equally peculiar rigidity and stolid disregard of practical consequences. All three are complex and far-reaching in application, as well as voluminous in detailed development. But a radically different future may be predicted for them. The Hearsay rule and the Character rule will always remain in our law, in a more or less relaxed form; while the Opinion rule will in substance disappear. An important difference between them is that the first two are the solid growth of experience; while the last rule, in its American development, is merely the logically technical development of a misunderstood term. The Opinion rule day by day exhibits its unpractical subtlety and its useless refinement of logic. Under this rule we accomplish little by enforcing it and we should do no harm if we dispensed with it. We accomplish little, because, from the side on which the witness appears and from the form of the question, his answer, i.e., his opinion, may often be inferred. We should do no harm, because, even when the final opinion or inference is admitted, the inference amounts in force usually to nothing unless it appears to be solidly based on satisfactory data, the existence and quality of which we can always bring out, if desirable, on cross-examination. Add to this that, under the present illiberal application of the rule, and the practice as to new trials, a single erroneous ruling upon the single trifling answer of one witness out of a dozen or more in a trial occupying a day may overturn the whole result and cause a double expense of time, money, and effort; and we perceive the absurdly unjust effects of the rule. Add, finally, the utter impossibility of a consistent application of the rule, and the consequent uncertainty of the law, and we understand how much more it makes for injustice rather than justice. It has done more than any one rule of procedure to reduce our litigation towards a state of legalized gambling. It must go. Better to cut it out, root and branch.

(b) Opinion to Character

170. Layer's Trial. (1722. Howell's State Trials, XVI, 253). Counsel [asking as to the credit of witness]. Is he a man as may be believed, even upon his oath, or not?

Witness. — I must tell you that I found him in so many mistakes about his own wife that, by God, I would not take his word for a halfpenny.

Counsel. — Go on, but don't swear "by God" any more.

171. Lord Chancellor Macclesfield's Trial. (1725. 16 How. St. Tr. 1239). Common Serjeant [asking as to the credit of a principal witness for the prosecution.] We desire that Mr. Price may give your Lordships an account of what he knows of the character of Mr. Cothingham and how long he hath known him.

Mr. Price. — My lords, I have known him upwards of twenty years; I never knew anybody say anything amiss of him. . . . I know no man in his place behaved himself better than he hath done.

Common Serjeant. — We desire to ask not only to what Mr. Price's opinion is, but to what is the opinion of others, as to his general character.

Mr. Price. — I believe, if you ask his character of an hundred people, ninety of them will give him rather a greater character.

172. Alexander Davison's Trial. (1808. 31 How. St. Tr. 186). [The accused, a commissary-general in the army, was charged with fraud in the public accounts]. Lord Moira sworn.

Q. — Had your lordship (as general-in-command) an opportunity of observing his [the accused's] public conduct? Q. — His conduct was clear and punctual, answering every expectation I had formed, strictly delicate in refusing emoluments which he might well have claimed.

Q. — From your lordship's general knowledge of his conduct, is he a person whom your lordship would think capable of committing a fraud? A. — Certainly not.

[After an interruption on another point.] L. C. J. Ellenborough. — The correct inquiry is as to the general character of the accused, and whether the witness thinks him likely to be guilty of the offense charged in the indictment.

Sir Andrew Hammond sworn.

L. C. J. Ellenborough. — From your knowledge of Mr. Davison's character and conduct, do you think him capable of committing a fraud? A. — I should have thought him the last man in the world that would have attempted anything of the kind, or even to have been a cause of it.

Mr. James Davidson sworn.

Q. — From all that you have observed of him [Mr. D.] and all that you have known and heard of him, what is your opinion of his general character? A. — You say "known and heard"; all that I have known of him is that he has been an honest man, an honest dealer with me as a merchant.

Q. — From what you have heard in the world at large, what is your opinion of him? A. — There are a variety of reports concerning Mr. Davison; those I know only as the world knows; but as to his dealings with me, I always found him an honorable and honest man.

173. REGINA v. ROWTON

Leigh & Cave 520; 10 Cox Cr. C. 25

[THE facts and evidence in this case, with the ruling on the first question, are printed ante, No. 13. On the second question reserved by the trial judge, viz., whether the personal opinion of the Crown's witness to the bad moral character of the accused was admissible, the arguments and the opinions were as follows:]

Sleigh, for the prisoner. . . . Secondly, this evidence was wrongly admitted, on the ground that evidence of general reputation only can be given, and that nothing which amounts to an individual opinion can be received. Character and reputation both mean credit derived from public opinion or esteem. When the witness in this case said that he knew nothing of the opinion of the neighborhood, he should have been stopped. The best definition of character is to be found in a speech of Erskine's, when he was counsel for Hardy (24 St. Tr. 1079):

"You cannot," he says, "when asking to character, ask what has A. B. C. told you about this man's character. No; but what is the general opinion concerning him. Character is the slow-spreading influence of opinion, arising from the deportment of a man in society. As a man's deportment, good or bad, necessarily produces one circle without another, and so extends itself till it unites in one general opinion; that general opinion is allowed to be given in evidence."

Tayler. — As to the second point, there is no rule of law excluding the answer here given. It was scrupulous and conscientious evidence of character. The witness says, in effect, "In my opinion as a pupil the defendant's character was very bad." (COCKBURN, C. J. — Is general evidence of good character to be met by the particular opinion of an individual?)

Tayler. — All evidence is admissible, unless it be excluded by some rule. What was given in evidence here was evidence of the prisoner's disposition; for that, and not reputation, is the sense in which the word "character" is used in these cases. (COCKBURN, C. J. — I do not understand that to be the meaning of the word "character." ERLE, C. J. — I agree with Mr. Tayler that the question of character is a question of disposition, and that reputation is admissible only because it is some evidence of disposition.)

Tayler. — The prisoner, by giving evidence of character, raises the issue that he is of such a disposition as to make it more than ordinarily improbable that he should have committed the offense charged against him. Character, in that sense, and reputation do not stand on the same basis. The latter should rather be defined as estimated character. . . .

COCKBURN, C. J. — This case turns upon the admissibility of an answer given by a witness who was called to rebut evidence of good character which had been given in favor of the prisoner, and who was asked what was the prisoner's general character for decency and morality. The answer was in these terms:

"I know nothing of the neighborhood's opinion, because I was only a boy at school when I knew him; but my own opinion, and the opinion of my brothers who were also pupils of his, is that his character is that of a man capable of the grossest indecency and the most flagrant immorality."

The chief question for us is whether that answer was proper to be left to the consideration of the jury. I am of opinion that it was not, and that the conviction cannot stand.

Cockburn, C. J. (for the majority). The second question is, Was the answer which was given in this case, in reply to a perfectly legitimate question, such an answer as could be properly left to the jury? Now, in determining this point, it is necessary to consider what is the meaning of evidence of "character." Does it mean evidence of general reputation, or evidence of disposition? I am of opinion that it means evidence of general reputation. What you want to get at is the tendency and disposition of the man's mind towards committing or abstaining from committing the class of crime with which he stands charged; but no one has ever heard the question, What is the tendency and disposition of the prisoner's mind? put directly. The only way of getting at it is by giving evidence of his general character founded on his general reputation in the neighborhood in which he lives. . . . In my judgment it must be restricted to the man's general reputation, and must not extend to the individual opinion of the witness. . . . If that be the true doctrine as to the admissibility of evidence to character in favor of the prisoner, the next question is, Within what limits must the rebutting evidence be confined? I think that that evidence must be of the same character and confined within the same limits — that, as the prisoner can only give evidence of general good character, so the evidence called to rebut it must be evidence of the same general description, showing that the evidence which has been given in favor of the prisoner is not true, but that the man's general reputation is bad. In this case the witness disclaims all knowledge of the general reputation of the accused. . . .

I find it uniformly laid down in the text books that the evidence to character must be general evidence of reputation; and, dealing with the law as I find it, my opinion is that the answer given in this case was inadmissible, and that the conviction ought not to stand.

Erle, C. J. . . . With respect to the second question, . . . What is the principle on which evidence of character is admitted? It seems to me that such evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing the disposition of the party accused, and basing thereon a presumption that he did not commit the crime imputed to him. Disposition cannot be ascertained directly; it is only to be ascertained by the opinion formed concerning the man, which must be founded either on personal experience, or on the expression of opinion by others, whose opinion again ought to be founded on their personal experience. The question between us is, whether the Court is at liberty to receive a statement of the disposition of a prisoner, founded on the personal experience of the witness, who attends to give evidence and state that estimate which long personal knowledge of and acquaintance with the prisoner has enabled him to form.

I think that each source of evidence is admissible. You may give in evidence the general rumor prevalent in the prisoner's neighborhood, and, according to my experience, you may have also the personal judgment of those who are capable of forming a more real, substantial, guiding opinion than that which is to be gathered from general rumor. I never saw a witness examined to character without an inquiry being made into his personal means of knowledge of that character. The evidence goes to the jury depending entirely upon the personal experience of the witness who has offered his testimony. Suppose a witness to character were to say, "This man has been in my employ for twenty years. I have had experience of his conduct; but I have never heard a human being express an opinion of him in my life. For my own part, I have always regarded him with the highest esteem and respect, and have had abundant experience that he is one of the worthiest men in the world." The principle the Lord Chief Justice has laid down would exclude this evidence; and that is the point where I differ from him. To my mind personal experience gives cogency to the evidence; whereas such a statement as, "I have heard some persons speak well of him," or, "I have heard general report in favor of the prisoner," has a very slight effect in comparison. Again, to the proposition that general character is alone admissible, the answer is that it is impossible to get at it. There is no such thing as general character; it is the general inference supposed to arise from hearing a number of separate and disinterested statements in favor of the prisoner. But I think that the notion that general character is alone admissible is not accurate. . . .

The arguments of Mr. Tayler upon this branch of the case have commanded my assent. They are strongly confirmed by the case of Rex v. Davison (31 St. Tr. 99 [ante, No. 172]). In that case Lord Ellenborough held — and all the counsel engaged in it were of the same opinion — that the personal experience of a witness, or his opinion founded upon his personal experience, was admissible. . . . On the general principle which I have stated, I think that both questions ought to be answered in the affirmative, and that the conviction should stand. . . .

Willes, J. . . . With respect to the second question, I agree in opinion with the Lord Chief Justice Erle. . . . The ultimate fact to be arrived at by such evidence is that the prisoner's character, in the sense of the particular disposition which nature or education may have given him, is good and not evil. You can, no doubt, go into the question of reputation, and inquire as to the opinion of others concerning the man. But I apprehend that the man's disposition is the principal matter to be inquired into, and that his reputation is merely accessory, and admissible only as evidence of disposition. . . . The judgment of the particular witness is superior in quality and value to mere rumor. Numerous cases may be put in which a man may have no general character — in the sense of any reputation or rumor about him — at all, and yet may have a good disposition. For instance, he may be of a shy, retiring disposition, and known only to a few; or again, he may be a person of the vilest character and disposition, and yet only his intimates may be able to testify that this is the case. One man may deserve that character [reputation] without having acquired it, which another man may have acquired without deserving it. In such cases the value of the judgment of a man's intimates upon his character becomes manifest. In ordinary life, when we want to know the character of a servant, we apply to his master. A servant may be known to none but members of his master's family; so the character of a child is known only to its parents and teachers, and the character of a man of business to those with whom he deals. . . . According to the experience of mankind, one would ordinarily rely rather on the information and judgment of a man's intimates than on general report; and why not in a court of law? . . . The evidence in this particular case was of a very peculiar character, because the prisoner was charged with an offense which would not only be committed in secret if it were committed at all, but would be likely to be kept secret by the persons who were subjected to it. Such being the case, in order to ascertain the prisoner's character for morality and decency, the persons of whom you would inquire would be those who had been within reach of his influence — persons who would not be likely to communicate his conduct to the neighborhood or to one another. . . . It appears to me that that evidence of the man's character comes within the scope of the principle I have been referring to, and ought to have been admitted, if any evidence of the prisoner's bad character is to be admitted at all. . . .

The other learned Judges concurred in the judgment delivered by the Lord Chief Justice of England. Conviction quashed.

174. John H. Wigmore. Note on R. v. Rowton. (Treatise on Evidence, 1905, vol. III, 1981, n. 21). In R. v. Rowton the opinion of Cockburn, C. J., for the majority, does not cite a single precedent in its favor. The completeness of the historical misunderstanding in the mind of the learned but dogmatic Chief Justice may be judged from his following statement, which should be compared with the preceding list of citations: "No one has ever heard the question, 'What is the tendency and disposition of the prisoner's mind?' put directly." The Chief Justice's citation of Phillipps on Evidence seems to show that he reached his conclusion solely on that authority, the frailty of which may be seen in a few words. In the first edition, of 1814, at p. 72, was the following passage, quite consistent with the law as explained above: "In trials for felony the prisoner is always permitted to call witnesses to his general character"; repeated in substance up to the 3d edition; then, in the 4th, in 1820, comes the following insertion: "What, then, is evidence of general character? One medium of proof is by showing how the person stands in general estimation; proof that he is reputed to be honest is evidence of his character for honesty, and the species of evidence most commonly resorted to in such inquiries. It frequently occurs that witnesses, after speaking to the general opinion of the prisoner's character, state their personal experience of his honesty; and this statement is admitted, rather from favor to the prisoner, than strictly as evidence of general character." This passage is made more emphatic in later editions, ending with the 10th (I, 507) in 1852. But not a single authority was vouchsafed for the above passage until in 1824, in the 6th edition, R. v. Jones, the single misleading utterance, above explained, was referred to; and, in spite of the score of instances in the 1800s alone, no other citation was made, nor could be, indeed, to justify that passage. Thus, curiously and unfortunately enough, the law of England as repeatedly declared for two centuries was overturned by a passage invented and inserted by a text-writer without the citation of a single precedent.

175. Sir James Fitzjames Stephen. Note on R. v. Rowton. (Digest of the Law of Evidence, 3rd ed., Note XXV, to Chapter VI.), Character, when Relevant. The subject is considered at length in R. v. Rowton, 1865, 1 L. & C. 520. One consequence of the view of the subject taken in that case is that a witness may with perfect truth swear that a man, who to his knowledge has been a receiver of stolen goods for years, has an excellent character for honesty, if he has had the good luck to conceal his crimes from his neighbors. It is the essence of successful hypocrisy to combine a good reputation with a bad disposition, and according to R. v. Rowton, the reputation is the important matter. The case is seldom if ever acted on in practice. The question always put to a witness to character is, What is the prisoner's character for honesty, morality, or humanity? as the case may be; nor is the witness ever warned that he is to confine his evidence to the prisoner's reputation. It would be no easy matter to make the common run of witnesses understand the distinction.

176. HAMILTON v. PEOPLE

Supreme Court of Michigan. 1874

29 Mich. 172

Error to Calhoun Circuit. Information for burning a barn with intent to defraud insurers. Defendant Thomas W. Hamilton brings error. Reversed and new trial ordered.

The defendants were indicted for burning a barn, with intent to defraud an insurance company. The conviction was had of this plaintiff in error (defendants below being tried separately) upon the testimony of William Fuller, who was sworn as State's evidence. . . . The theory of the prosecution depended entirely on the evidence of the respondent Fuller, who swore to a plan, made in advance, to burn the barn in question, by putting a lighted candle in a place where, as it burned low, it would reach litter and other combustible material, and set it on fire. . . . A witness, William Gayton, having been sworn to sustain Fuller's reputation for truth and veracity, was asked whether he had not said at a certain time and place that he would not believe Fuller under oath, and answered that he did not think he had done so at that time, but that it was likely he might have said so at the time of Fuller's arrest for this crime. This answer was stricken out as not responsive. He was then asked whether the arrest affected his opinion of Fuller, one way or the other. This was ruled out, as well as a proposition to show his statements to different persons to the same effect, that he would not believe Fuller under oath. . . .

Brown & Patterson and M. S. Brackett, for plaintiff in error. Byron D. Ball, Attorney-General, for the People.

CAMPBELL, J. . . . Was it proper, then, to ask a sustaining witness on cross-examination, whether he had said he would not believe the impeached witness under oath?

The purpose of any inquiry into the character of a witness is to enable the jury to determine whether he is to be believed on oath. Evidence of his reputation would be irrelevant for any other purpose. And a reputation which would not affect a witness so far as to touch his credibility under oath could have no proper influence. The English text books and authorities have always, and without exception, required the testimony to be given directly on this issue. The questions put to the impeaching and supporting witnesses relate, first, to their knowledge of the reputation for truth and veracity of the assailed witness; and, second, whether from that reputation they would believe him under oath. The only controversy has been whether or no the grounds of belief must rest upon and be confined to a knowledge of reputation for veracity only. But confined to that, the authorities are harmonious. — 1 Stark. Ev., 237 and seq.; 2 Phil. Ev. (Edwards' Ed.), 955, 958. A very recent decision is found in Queen v. Brown & Hedley, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 70.

The reason given is that, unless the impeaching witness is held to showing the extent to which an evil reputation has affected a person's credit, the jury cannot accurately tell what the witness means to express by stating that such reputation is good or bad, and can have no guide in weighing his testimony. . . . It has also been commonly observed that impeaching questions as to character are often misunderstood, and witnesses, in spite of caution, base their answer on bad character generally, which may or may not be of such a nature as to impair confidence in testimony. When the question of credit under oath is distinctly presented, the answers will be more cautious.

Until Mr. Greenleaf allowed a statement to creep into his work on evidence to the effect that the American authorities disfavored the English rule, it was never very seriously questioned. — See Greenl. Ev., § 461. It is a little remarkable that of the cases referred to to sustain this idea, not one contained a decision upon the question, and only one contained more than a passing dictum not in any way called for. — Phillips v. Kingfield, 1 Appleton's (Me.) R. 375. The authorities referred to in that case contained no such decision, and the Court, after reasoning out the matter somewhat carefully, declared the question was not presented by the record for decision. . . .

The objection alleged to such an answer by a witness is, that it enables the witness to substitute his opinion for that of the jury. But this is a fallacious objection. The jury, if they do not act from personal knowledge, cannot understand the matter at all without knowing the witness' opinion, and the ground on which it is based. It is the same sort of difficulty which arises in regard to insanity, to disposition or temper, to distances and velocities, and many other subjects, where a witness is only required to show his means of information, and then state his conclusions or belief based on those means. If six witnesses are merely allowed to state that a man's reputation is bad, and as many say it is good, without being questioned further, the jury cannot be said to know much about it. Nor would any cross-examination be worth much unless it aided them in finding out just how far each witness regarded it as tainted.

So far as the reports show, the American decisions, instead of shaking the English doctrine, are very decidedly in favor of it, and have so held upon repeated and careful consideration, and we have not been referred to, nor have we found any considerable conflict. — See in New York, People v. Mather, 4 Wend. R. 229. . . . In New Hampshire, Titus v. Ash, 4 Foster 319; in Pennsylvania, Bogle's Exrs. v. Kreitzer, 46 Pa. St. 465; Lyman v. Philadelphia, 56 Pa. St. 488; in Maryland, Knight v. House, 29 Md. 194; in California, Stevens v. Irwin, 12 Cal. 306; People v. Tyler, 35 Cal. 553; in Illinois, Eason v. Chapman, 21 Ill. 33; in Wisconsin, Wilson v. State, 3 Wis. 798; in Georgia, Stokes v. State, 18 Ga. 17; Taylor v. Smith, 16 Ga. 7; in Tennessee, Ford v. Ford, 7 Humph. 92; in Alabama, McCutchen v. McCutchen, 9 Port. 650; in Kentucky, Mobley v. Hamit, 1 A. K. Marsh. 590; also in Judge McLean's Circuit, in U. S. v. Van Sickle, 2 McLean 219.

Mr. Greenleaf himself intimates that it might be a proper inquiry on cross-examination. We think the inquiry proper, when properly confined and guarded, and not left to depend on any basis but the reputation for truth and veracity. And we also think that the cross-examination on impeaching or sustaining testimony should be allowed to be full and searching. . . .

For the reasons we have given the judgment must be reversed and a new trial granted, and the respondent must be remanded into the custody of the proper sheriff, to be held in custody until bailed or otherwise dealt with according to law.

Cooley, J., and Graves, Ch. J., concurred.

Christiancy, J., did not sit in this case.

177. William Trickett. Character-Evidence in Criminal Cases. (1904. The Forum, Dickinson College of Law, Vol. VIII, p. 128.) But little trace, if any, of an attempt to prove a defendant's character by the summarized impressions of those who have known him, is to be found in the Pennsylvania reports. (Men who knew the defendant well seem to have testified from that knowledge to his chastity in Commonwealth v. Brubaker, 13 Super. 14.) It is not clear that this would not be a feasible method, nor that it would not be more reliable and satisfactory than the method actually in vogue. "The most natural way to learn what disposition to truth-telling is possessed by a witness, would be," says Prof. Wigmore (Greenleaf's Evidence, p. 582, 16th ed.), "to receive the estimates of those who are personally and intimately acquainted with him, and have had ample opportunity to learn his character; and such was the original and orthodox practice, both in England and in this country. Such continues to be the rule in England." As the veraciousness of a man can be discovered best by those who are acquainted with him, so can any other personal quality. For some reason, not at all satisfactory, this testimony of those who know the man, is not receivable as to his traits.

The specific acts of a man cannot be proved in order that the jury may induct from them his character. The inductions of witnesses, who have observed his acts and are competent to make and report inductions from them, cannot be heard from the witnesses themselves. How, then, can the character of a defendant be shown? Only in one way, viz., by his reputation. The objections to this vehicle of proof are striking. The reputation, if well grounded, emanates from those who have seen the specific acts, and have reported them, or from those who have seen these acts, have generalized and inducted character from them, and have stated their generalizations and inductions. The witness who testifies to reputation testifies, in substance, that he has heard A, and B, and C, and D, and twenty or forty others, say that the accused was this or that sort of a man. The witness may or may not correctly represent what he has heard from others. These others may have repeated only what still others had told them, and these may not have correctly reported what they heard. But, the value of the original reporter would depend on his being an observer of an adequate number of the acts of the defendant, and on his properly inducting character from them. If these observers were before the court, the content and the value of their opinions could be more surely learned, than when, invisible themselves, their identities even being unascertained, reports at first, second, tenth, nay, so far as can be known, at thousandth hand, of what they have said, are the only evidence of their opinions.

The propriety of receiving reputation, so far as it is composed of the opinions of non-observers, rests on the unverified assumption that this reputation will faithfully represent the opinions of the observers. This assumption is not only unprovable, but improbable. It is true that, Lowrie, C. J. (Hoffman v. Kemerer, 44 Pa. 452) remarks, "there is no danger of any person having a better reputation in ordinary conduct than he deserves," a dictum which could be justified only by an investigation of a very large number of reputations, and of the conduct of the persons affected by them; for such things are not self-evident. We are not aware that any sociological students have conducted such investigations. Socrates was believed at Athens to be a much worse man than he was, and prophets are without honor where they ought to be best known. It is quite as easy to think that a reputation may be better than is deserved as that it may be worse. It would be a miracle if, in a large percentage of cases, the reputation exactly corresponded with the facts of conduct and character. The annals of crime not infrequently exhibit shocking and startling discrepancies between the good repute of men and what the evidence shows to have been their actual character. . . . But, whatever may be the justification of assuming that, in the long run, reputation will correspond with the conduct of the subject, so far as it is visible to observers, there is scarcely a word to be said in favor of employing the reputation as the evidence of the tenor of conduct, to the exclusion of the judgments of those who know the party whose conduct or character is in question.

(c) Opinion to Handwriting

179. Algernon Sidney's Trial. (1683. Howell's State Trials, IX, 851, 864.) [Seditious libel.] Mr. Sheppard sworn.

Att'y-Gen. — Pray, will you look upon these writings [shewing the libel]. Are you acquainted with Colonel Sidney's hand?

Sheppard. — Yes, my lord.

Att'y-Gen. — Is that his handwriting?

Sheppard. — Yes, sir; I believe so. I believe all these sheets to be his hand.

Att'y-Gen. — How come you to be acquainted with his hand?

Sheppard. — I have seen him write the indorsement upon several bills of exchange.

Col. Sidney. — My lord, I desire you would please to consider this, that similitude of hands can be no evidence.

L. C. J. Jeffries. — Reserve yourself until anon, and make all the advantageous remarks you can. . . .

Sidney. — Now, my lord, I am not to give an account of these papers; I do not think they are before you, for there is nothing but the similitude of hands offered for proof. The similitude of hands is nothing; we know that bonds will be counterfeited, so that no man shall know his own hand.

180. Hales' & Kinnersley's Trial. (1729. Howell's State Trials, XVII, 267.) . . . Mr. Strange. — May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, this is an indictment against the two prisoners William Hales and Thomas Kinnersley. This indictment sets forth, that they being persons of ill fame, and intending to deceive Mr. Edwards, etc., on the 2d of March, in the first year of his majesty's reign, did forge a writing purporting to be a promissory note, etc. . . .

(Note read:) — "I promise to pay to Mr. Thomas Kinnersley, or his order, within six months after date, the sum of sixteen hundred and fifty pounds, for ye value received,

"March 30, 1728. Samuel Edwards."

Indorsement. "Thomas Kinnersley."

Serjt. Whitaker. — The gentlemen of the jury should see it now. . . .

Mr. Thomas Bird sworn.

Att'y-Gen. — Sir, whose hand is that? [showing him a different note, of earlier date.]

Bird. — Mr. Kinnersley, Sir, owned that to be his handwriting.

Att'y-Gen. — Was it showed by you to Mr. Kinnersley at that time when he owned it?

Bird. — Yes, Sir.

Kinnersley. — And did I own it, Sir?

Att'y-Gen. — Why, you owned it in court. This is the old note.

Kinnersley. — I beg your pardon, Sir; I did not understand that.

Att'y-Gen. — Give that note to the jury to compare it with the other note that is now before them. . . .

Mr. Lincoln sworn. . . .

Serjt. Whitaker. — Mr. Lincoln, those receipts which you produced, did Mr. Kinnersley actually write them?

Lincoln. — I saw him write them all.

Serjt. Whitaker. — Show them to the jury.

Judge Reynolds. — Gentlemen of the jury, in that book you will find some receipts wrote by Mr. Kinnersley, which Mr. Lincoln swears are his hand; that he saw him write them all.

181. History of the Rule.[1] The trials of the 1500s and 1600s illustrate (1) that the term "similitude" or "comparison of hands" covered all modes of proving handwriting (in the strict sense, i.e., every way in which the type of writing was the source of belief, and that this kind of evidence was much distrusted; (2) that the orthodox use of such proof was confined at least to civil causes; (3) that the only accepted mode of such proof was by those who had seen the person write. But a gradual expansion took place of the limits of the doctrines under (2) and (3). (2) We first find the doctrine that in criminal cases proof by "similitude of hands" is admissible if the disputed paper was found in the accused's possession. (3) The Crown lawyers had already begun and incessantly kept up the practice of offering witnesses who had an inferior knowledge, based on specimens seen by them and somehow known to them as genuine otherwise than by seeing them written. The great case of Lord Ferrers v. Shirley, in 1731 (ante, No. 121) stamped this new doctrine as orthodox. By the beginning of the 1800s this class of testimony takes its place on an equal footing with the older kind, but as distinctly modern and parvenu.

Thus the opposition to proof by "comparison of hands" had been forced to give way, and the use of such proof had been enlarged. But the old stigma remained, and the old literature discountenancing it was still perused. Thus, when now still other varieties of it were attempted to be availed of, it came about that the argument against them was that they involved "comparison of hands" and were thus unlawful.

What we have as the 1800s came in (the time when reasons and principles for the rules of evidence began much to be thought about) is (1) the acceptance of witnesses who had seen the person write; (2) the acceptance of witnesses who had received writings subsequently treated by him as genuine or who had had the custody of ancient documents of the same person's; (3) the permission, for such persons, of bringing into court the specimens they knew and juxtaposing them; (4) the exclusion of any other mode of testimony under the condemnatory phrase "comparison of hands."

(A) Kinds of Witnesses. The other kinds of witnesses that were thus excluded would be (a) an ordinary witness who knew nothing about the handwriting but merely juxtaposed specimens and compared; (b) the same testimony by one skilled in handwriting generally.

[1] Adapted from the present Compiler's "Treatise on Evidence" (1905, Vol. III, §§ 1991–1993).

(a) Now the former was of course barred absolutely by the Opinion rule, well expounded in this connection in the following passage:

1770, YATES, J., in Brookbard v. Woodley, Peake N. P. 21, note: "Where it is merely opinion on similitude of the writing collected from barely comparing them, the jury may compare them as well as anybody else, and any two people may think differently."

(b) The other kind of testimony thus excluded was that of experts speaking from juxtaposition. This it was now strenuously sought to introduce. It is no matter of surprise that the judges instinctively hesitated; for the idea of expertism in handwriting was then a novel one. But the significant circumstance is that those who tried to use this kind of testimony were obliged to strive to remove from it the stigma of being "comparison of hands." They failed for a long time to introduce the new kind of testimony; and the Legislature had finally to step in with its aid. But the result of the discussion was that the stigmatized "comparison of hands" now obtained definitely a narrow meaning; it covered the testimony of all witnesses whose knowledge was acquired solely by examination of specimens for the purpose of the trial; it no longer applied to witnesses who had gained a knowledge by seeing the person write or by receiving correspondence or the like. . . .

(B) Submission of Specimens to the Jury. There is, of course, a sole remaining way of attempting to prove the genuineness of handwriting, viz., without asking the opinion of any witness, to lay before the jury some specimens of the writing of the person in question. In the early practice before 1800 there was no objection to the jury's examination purely as such. The witness who had seen the person write (or later, had received papers, or possessed old documents learned to be genuine) might bring the writing in, if he had it, and the jury would incidentally look at it. Thus the stigma of "comparison of hands" was not applicable to the fact of the jury's examination as such; the struggle was against the use of a certain kind of witness, not against what he did if admitted. But now the controversy (above mentioned) over expert testimony by juxtaposition was in full array; the new and narrow sense of the stigmatized "comparison of hands" naturally associated itself with any and every process of "comparison" or manual juxtaposition; and doubts about the propriety of the time-honored inspection by the jury thus arose. The Court of Exchequer, in 1830, and the King's Bench, in 1836, after canvassing the whole subject from the point of view of policy, put a limitation upon the practice — confining it to documents already in the case — which remained the law, until the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854 speedily reverted to the early tradition, and substituted its more satisfactory rule.

If the foregoing exposition has been clear, we may understand that the classes of witnesses who may testify to handwriting have increased in number by successive enlargements; that the whole meaning of "comparison of hands" has changed; that the mere process of juxtaposition coram judicio, whether for witness or for jury, was historically orthodox and unquestionable; and that the opposite fates at common law of juxtaposition by experts and juxtaposition by jury — exclusion for the former, but limited sanction for the latter — were due simply to the fact that the former had never been attempted till the 1800s and was merely prevented from coming into existence, while the latter had always existed and was thus able to survive the attempts on its life.

QUEEN'S BENCH. 1836

EJECTMENT for land in Cumberland. At the trial before COLERIDGE, J., at the last assizes at Carlisle, it appeared that this action was brought by the heir at law of one Brockbank against the defendants, who claimed as devisees under the will of the same individual. In February last the testator died, as was supposed intestate. Some weeks afterwards, in removing the bed in which he had died, a document was found, which the defendants alleged to be his will. The question at the trial was, as to the genuineness of this document. It was dated in 1833, and was witnessed by three persons, all of whom were dead at the time of the discovery of the will; and it was not known by whom it had been written. Evidence was given, on the part of the defendants, of belief in the handwriting of the testator and attesting witnesses. On cross-examination the same persons proved that various letters produced to them by the plaintiff's counsel, and purporting to be letters written and signed by the testator and two of the persons attesting the will, were respectively in their handwriting. On the part of the plaintiff witnesses were afterwards called, who negatived, according to their belief, the alleged handwriting of the testator and attesting witnesses; and it was then proposed to give in evidence the before-mentioned letters, proved to have been undoubtedly written by the testator and witnesses respectively, in order that the jury might compare the handwriting contained in those letters with the signatures to the will, and thus detect an alleged dissimilarity between such letters and signatures. This evidence was rejected by the learned judge. A verdict was found for the defendants.

Alexander now moved for a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that this proof had been improperly rejected. "The general rule of evidence on this subject is stated to be, that handwriting cannot be proved by a comparison of the paper in dispute with any other papers, although acknowledged to be genuine. The generality of the proposition was, however, limited by Griffith v. Williams, 1 Cro. & J. 47. In that case the Court of Exchequer held, that the rule does not apply where the writing acknowledged to be genuine is already in evidence in the cause, and that in such case the jury may compare the two documents. Nor was this the earliest decision upon the point; for in Allesbrook v. Roach, 1 Esp. 351, not noticed in the last-cited case, Lord KENYON allowed the signature of the defendant to several bills of exchange to be compared by the jury with his alleged signature to the bill on which that action was brought. The bills there allowed to be made the subject of comparison were no more connected with the matter in dispute than the letters proposed to be given in evidence in the present action. . . . The question, therefore, will be, the propriety of such a limitation. Two reasons have been assigned in its support: first, that the jury may be wholly illiterate, and unable, therefore, to institute the comparison; the second, that the party interested has it in his power to select, and probably will select, out of a number of documents, such only as suit his purpose, and will keep back the rest. The first reason, however applicable at former times, will scarcely have any weight at the present day. The second would apply with equal stringency to cases of ancient documents, which are undoubtedly provable by a comparison of handwriting, and yet in such cases the interested party possesses the same power of producing or keeping back any specimens he may deem favorable or otherwise to his view of the case. Such a course of proceeding is open to inquiry and observation, and affords a test, rather for the value, than for the admissibility, of this description of evidence. It is difficult to see on what solid grounds the distinction can rest between the admissibility of documents already in evidence in the cause, and those offered for the purpose of comparison. Both are avowedly in the handwriting of the party; and the question being the genuineness of the alleged writing, they afford an equal criterion.

Lord DENMAN, C. J. — This is a point on which we ought not to raise any doubt. I rather think the decision in Griffith v. Williams, 1 Cro. & J. 47, has been considered to go a long way; but the real ground upon which that rests appears to me to be that the comparison is unavoidable. There being two documents in question in the cause, one of which is known to be in the handwriting of a party, the other alleged, but denied to be so, no human power can prevent the jury from comparing them with a view to the question of genuineness; and, therefore, it is best for the Court to enter with the jury into that inquiry, and to do the best it can, under circumstances which cannot be helped. . . .

PATTERSON, J. — I always thought that the rule laid down in Griffith v. Williams, 1 Cro. & J. 47, was limited to documents which were already before the jury. It is not said in the report of that case that necessity was the ground upon which the comparison was allowed; but I think that must have been so. It was impossible, in such a case, to prevent the jury from making a comparison. I have rejected evidence, upon the ground of distinction now taken, in a case which came before me at Gloucester, I think on the Crown side. . . .

WILLIAMS, J. — I doubt if the facts of Allesbrook v. Roach, 1 Esp. 351, are correctly given; for the rule, if laid down there as it is stated, does not appear to have been acted upon since, although it might be supposed that such a decision by Lord KENYON, whose judgment on points of evidence is so much respected, would have been followed up in other cases. I question the authority of the case, as there has been no corresponding practice. If the comparison here contended for were admitted, the party disputing a document ascribed to him might produce to the jury for that purpose a selection from any number of papers written by himself, which would be very dangerous. The decision in Griffith v. Williams, 1 Cro. & J. 47, no doubt proceeded upon the ground that comparison of the documents, when they are in evidence for other purposes, cannot be avoided, and, therefore, it is better that the comparison should be made under the direction of the Court than in a corner. . . .

Coleridge, J. — I am of the same opinion. I only wish to say a word in respect to that instance on which Mr. Alexander relied with respect to ancient handwriting. . . . I have always understood that to be an excepted case; but that exception has been founded on the same principle which justifies it in others. The exception is of necessity; the handwriting cannot be proved in any other way. Doubtless it is less open than modern writing would be to the objection that the selection may be an unfair one.

I will add another reason why I think the evidence was properly rejected, — that many irrelevant issues would be thereby raised. It is all very well if the jury are to look only at the documents that are otherwise in evidence in the cause. Whether those documents are or are not in the handwriting of the party must be proved in the course of the case. If the rule is extended to documents that have nothing to do with the matter in dispute, on every one of those an issue is raised quite irrelevant to the main point; with this additional objection to be made to it, that the other party cannot know what documents are going to be produced, and does not come prepared to answer inferences arising from their production. This seems an additional reason why the rule should be narrowed. Rule refused.

Ejectment for messuages, etc., in Suffolk. On the trial before Vaughan, J., at the Suffolk Spring assizes, 1835, a verdict was found for the defendant. In Easter term, 1835, Storks, Serjt., obtained a rule for a new trial on the ground of an improper rejection of evidence. The question in the cause was the due execution of a will; and the three attesting witnesses were called. It was supposed that one of them, Stribling, was deceived in swearing to his own attestation, and that, although he had attested a will for the testator, the document produced was not that will, but a forgery, and that the attestation was in truth a counterfeit. Upon cross-examination, two signatures, purporting to be his, and to have been subscribed to depositions, made by him in proceedings relating to the same will in another court, and also sixteen or eighteen signatures, apparently his, pasted on a sheet of pasteboard, were shown to him; and he said he believed they were all of his handwriting. At the time he gave his evidence, another witness was in court, and, the cause lasting to the second day, was called. He had never seen Stribling write, nor had any other means of acquiring a knowledge of the character of his handwriting, but from an examination of the signatures so produced: this he had made on the first day, and, from this, he stated that he thought he had acquired a knowledge of the character of his handwriting; and he was asked whether he believed the attestation to the will to be the handwriting of Stribling. This was objected to, and, on argument, determined to be inadmissible.

. . . Cause was shown by Kelly and Gunning; and Storks, Serjt., and Byles, were heard in support of the rule. The Court took time to consider; and in Trinity term, 1837 (June 8th), their Lordships, differing in opinion, delivered judgment seriatim. . . .

Coleridge, J. . . . In my opinion, after much consideration, the evidence was properly rejected.

The rule as to proof of handwriting, where the witness has not seen the party write the document in question, may be stated generally thus. Either the witness has seen the party write on some former occasions, or he has corresponded with him, and transactions have taken place between them upon the faith that letters purporting to have been written or signed by him have been so written or signed. On either supposition, the witness is supposed to have received into his mind an impression, not so much of the manner in which the writer has formed the letters in the particular instances, as of the general character of his handwriting; and he is called on to speak as to the writing in question by a reference to the standard so formed in his mind. It is obvious that the weight of this evidence may vary in every conceivable degree; but the principle appears to be sound, both in regard to the test of genuineness, and the acquisition of the means of applying it. The test of genuineness ought to be the resemblance, not to the formation of the letters in some other specimen or specimens, but to the general character of the writing, which is impressed on it as the involuntary and unconscious result of constitution, habit, or other permanent cause, and is, therefore, itself permanent. And we best acquire a knowledge of this character by seeing the individual write at times when his manner of writing is not in question, or by engaging with him in correspondence; either supposition giving reason to believe that he writes at the time not constrainedly, but in his natural manner. . . .

Upon these grounds directly, I conceive, although not on these alone, our law has not, during a long course of years, permitted handwriting to be proved by the immediate comparison, by a witness, of the paper in dispute with some other specimen proved to have been written by the supposed writer of the first. . . . It is familiar to lawyers that many attempts have been made to introduce this mode of proof, according to the practice of the civil and ecclesiastical laws; and a text writer, to whose opinions I shall always pay the greatest respect, Mr. Starkie I mean, has given this mode of proof the sanction of his authority, as preferable on principle to our own; 2 Starkie on Evidence, 375, Ed. 2. But, after some uncertainty of decision, the attempts have finally failed. Rex v. Cator, 4 Esp. 117, though a Nisi Prius decision, brings this matter very fully under review; and, to the extent at least of what is rejected, has always since been considered as laying down the rule correctly. In my humble judgment, that ought not to be departed from. Assuming that no dispute exists as to the genuineness of the standard, or the fairness with which it has been selected, such a comparison leads to no inference as to the general character of the handwriting. The two specimens may be much alike, or very different; yet, in the former case, they may proceed from different hands, in the latter case from the same. If the points, which I have just supposed to be conceded, be brought into question, other and more serious objections arise to this mode of proof. If the genuineness be disputed, a collateral issue is raised, and that upon every paper used as a standard; an issue, too, in which the proof may be exactly of the same nature as that used in the principal cause, namely, mere comparison; with the additional disadvantages, that the former standard is not produced, and that the opposing party can avail himself of no counterproof. It is easy to see too, as has been well observed by Mr. Starkie, that this inquiry might lead to an endless series of issues each more unsatisfactory than the preceding.

Upon the grounds, therefore, that our rule is a sound one, and well established, both in what it admits and what it rejects, sound in principle, and convenient with reference to the mode of trial to which it is to be applied, and that the present facts are substantially within the latter branch of it, I am of the opinion that the learned Judge rightly rejected the evidence tendered. . . .

Williams, J. — This was an action of ejectment, to try the validity of a will. . . . The question seems mainly to be reduced to this point, whether the knowledge, which the witness professed to have, was acquired by means prohibited by any known and established rule of law. . . . And the objection is twofold; first, that it was acquired merely by the comparison of writing; and next, that, at all events, it was not acquired by either of the legitimate and recognized modes, already referred to, having seen the party write, or corresponded with him.

As to the first, . . . it seems to me that the evidence, so far as this objection is concerned, was admissible, because it was not the comparison of handwriting, in the proper and ordinary sense of the term. To reject it, because what was equivalent to a comparison of handwriting took place, would go far, so far as the reason of the thing is concerned, towards disturbing the rule altogether, and letting in a comparison of handwriting as a medium of proof in all cases whatsoever, or excluding, in a great degree, all possibility of proof. What is to be said, where the means of knowledge are derived from a bygone correspondence of considerable standing? What is it but comparing a distant, and (in proportion to the length of time) faint image in the mind with the writing in question? . . .

I come now to consider, whether the witness in this case had any legitimate means of knowledge to authorize the question, the answer to which was rejected. It has been said that the specimens selected may have been garbled and fallacious, "calculated to serve the purpose of the party producing them, and, therefore, not exhibiting a fair specimen of the general character of the handwriting." . . . I cannot perceive how it can be affirmed that this was a partial selection by those who wished to use the papers. The selection was not depending upon their power merely. The whole was subject to the answer of the witness. The papers produced might all have been admitted to be of his handwriting, or one-half, or any other portion of them, or all might have been denied. When the papers were so admitted, was there not then some proof that they were of the witness's handwriting? And if so, how can the case differ in kind, though it may in amount or degree of proof, from the perusal or reperusal of a couple of letters, written, the one ten, the other five, years before? Why may the witness give an opinion of any person's handwriting from a study of such letters? Because the writer has, in some manner, authenticated them to be his. Why might the witness have been asked the proposed questions in this instance? Because the witness had sworn that the papers were of his handwriting. In each case, it is from the perusal of papers (and papers only) that the knowledge is acquired. In each case there is some proof that the papers to be perused, in order to form a judgment, are those of the parties respectively, respecting whose handwriting in the particular case the question and inquiry arise. . . . Anything, I presume, from which the identity of the writer is established, may suffice. If then, from such proof, whence a reasonable inference may arise that the letter or signature is by such or such person, an opinion of his handwriting may be given, the question recurs, whether there be not some foundation for opinion, where the party has upon his oath declared that the papers perused by the witness were written by himself. That no person has, hitherto, been allowed to speak of his belief of handwriting, except he has acquired his knowledge by one or other of the prevalent methods (having seen the party write, or receive writing from him), may doubtless be true; but it is, I fear, but an imperfect solution of the present difficulty. May not the answer be, that the case is new? In truth, has it ever arisen before? If not, we are called upon, as in the various and ever varying combinations of human affairs continually does and must occur, to apply, as well as we can, the principles and analogies having the nearest and most direct affinity to the subject, to this fresh question. . . .

Upon the whole, with sincere respect for the contrary opinions, I think the evidence was improperly rejected, and that there ought to be a new trial.

PATTESON, J. — In this case, . . . the learned Judge rejected his testimony; and the question is whether he was right in so doing. . . .

All evidence of handwriting, except where the witness sees the document written, is in its nature comparison. It is the belief which a witness entertains upon comparing the writing in question with an exemplar in his mind derived from some previous knowledge. That knowledge may have been acquired, either by seeing the party write, in which case it will be stronger or weaker according to the number of times and periods, and other circumstances under which the witness has seen the party write, but it will be sufficient knowledge to admit the evidence of the witness (however little weight may be attached to it in such cases), even if he has seen him write but once, and then merely signing his surname. . . . Or the knowledge may have been acquired by the witness having seen letters or other documents professing to be the handwriting of the party, and having afterwards communicated personally with the party upon the contents of those letters or documents, or having otherwise acted upon them by written answers, producing further correspondence, or acquiescence by the party in some matter to which they relate, or by the witness transacting with the party some business to which they relate, or by any other mode of communication between the party and the witness which, in the ordinary course of the transactions of life, induces a reasonable presumption that the letters or documents were the handwriting of the party. . . . A third mode is now sought to be introduced, namely, by satisfying the witness by some information or evidence that a number of papers are in the handwriting of the party, and then desiring him to study those papers, so as to acquire a knowledge of the handwriting, and fix an exemplar in his mind, and afterwards putting into his hand the writing in question, and asking his belief respecting it, or by merely putting certain papers into the witness's hands, without telling him who wrote them, and desiring him to study them, and acquire a knowledge of the handwriting, and afterwards showing him the writing in question, and asking his belief whether they are written by the same person, and calling evidence to prove to the jury that the former are the handwriting of the party, which perhaps may be considered as the same process in effect, expressed in other words. The very foundation of this mode is the establishment of the fact that the papers, from studying which the witness is to acquire his knowledge, are the handwriting of the party. Now that fact must be established, either by the acknowledgment of the party, or by the information of third persons.

Assuming the witness to be the only person to be satisfied of the fact, it is obvious that the acknowledgment of the party, if the witness be called to affirm the handwriting, would be a most unsafe ground on which to act, and was so considered by Lord KENYON in Stranger v. Searle,

1 Esp. 14; and, if the witness be called to disaffirm the handwriting, the acknowledgment of the party, unless he be a party to the suit, ought not to bind the litigants; and, if he be a party to the suit, it may fairly be urged that the case would come within the second mode of acquiring knowledge above suggested, namely, by a direct communication with the party. The other mode of satisfying the witness, viz., by the information of third persons, is equally open to objection, as it must be given behind the back of one or both of the litigant parties, and would obviously be most unsafe and unfair.

The jury, therefore, must be satisfied of the fact. Now that must be by evidence, and will raise a number of collateral issues, foreign to those on the record, and for which one of the litigants must of necessity be wholly unprepared, in addition to the danger of unfair selection by the other litigant who produces the papers. I need hardly advert to the great inconvenience and waste of time which will be incurred by such a wide range of collateral matter, nor to the observation that the proof of the papers in those collateral issues might be by calling a witness who had acquired his knowledge of the handwriting in the very same way from other papers, which would equally require to be proved; and so it is obvious that the same process, as is now attempted, might be repeated ad infinitum, and lead to no conclusion. This Court recently, in the case of Doe dem. Perry v. Newton [ante, No. 182], 1 Nev. & P. 1., has expressly determined that documents irrelevant to the issues on the record shall not be received in evidence at the trial, in order to enable a jury to institute such a comparison. Much less can it be permitted to introduce them in order to enable a witness to do so. . . .

I do not, under these circumstances, feel that I am obliged by authorities to admit of any mode of acquiring a knowledge of handwriting, except the two above suggested, and, for the reasons already stated, I am of opinion that no other mode ought to be introduced, and that the learned Judge was right in rejecting the evidence.

Lord DENMAN, C. J. . . . We are bound to consider whether, as a matter of strict law, the plaintiff had a right to lay before the jury the evidence that was withholden from them. . . .

Taking it, then, as clear that the undeniable peculiarities of this case do not preclude evidence of opinion as to the handwriting, the only question is, whether the witness called to pronounce one had a sufficient material for forming one, to be admissible for that purpose. And he appears to stand in exactly the same situation as he would have done, if called to speak of the handwriting of a party to the suit, whether for or against the genuineness of the document. He may have been called for the plaintiff to prove the defendant's signature to a bill or bond. He did not see him sign it; nor has he ever seen him write: but this is confessedly immaterial, if he has had other adequate means of obtaining a knowledge of his hand, 2 Starkie on Ev. 372, Ed. 2. . . . The clerk who constantly read the letters, the broker who was ever consulted upon them, is as competent to judge whether another signature is that of the writer of the letters, as the merchant to whom they were addressed. The servant who has habitually carried letters addressed by me to others has an opportunity of obtaining a knowledge of my writing, though he never saw me write, or received a letter from me. . . . In ancient documents, knowledge of an officer's handwriting is frequently obtained by an observation of his signature to papers which he would be called upon officially to sign; and a witness speaking from that knowledge may give an opinion whether any particular writing was made by the same person. The process is, therefore, recognized as one which may enable one man to form a competent opinion as to the writing of another.

Pausing here for a moment, I must fairly say that I think the syllogism complete. Opinion is evidence of handwriting, where it is founded on knowledge obtained from inspection of documents proved to be written by the same party. The opinion tendered here was founded on such knowledge. If, however, any rule excluding such evidence had been promulged by competent authority, I should at once have yielded my own views. I find no such rule laid down. . . .

From the substitution of a witness for the jury, in forming an opinion on the genuineness of handwriting, an advantage follows so great and obvious, that it would form a strong motive for so framing the rule of evidence; I mean the prevention of that distracting multiplicity of issues which a jury might be called upon to try, arising out of every one of the whole number of documents placed before them. . . . On these points the party could not be expected to come prepared; and infinite injustice might ensue from prejudices of every kind. I therefore entirely adhere to Doe dem. Perry v. Newton [ante, No. 182], 1 Nev. & P. 1, in which we refused a rule nisi for a new trial, moved for on the ground that my brother COLERIDGE had excluded papers tendered evidence for the mere purpose of being compared with some which were proved. . . .

On the whole, I think the question regular, and the exclusion of the evidence improper; but, the Court being equally divided, the rule for a new trial must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

184. MORRISON v. PORTER

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1886

35 Minn. 425; 29 N. W. 54

THE plaintiff brought this action in the District Court for Hennepin county to determine the defendant's adverse claims to certain land, and appeals from an order by LOCHREN, J., refusing a new trial.

P. M. Babcock, for appellant. . . . John D. Howe and S. L. Perrin, for respondents.

Dickinson, J. — The defendant railroad corporation has title to the land in controversy through a chain of conveyances running back to the plaintiff, if in fact the plaintiff executed a certain deed of conveyance in the year 1860, the execution of which the plaintiff disputes. The Court found that it had been executed by her.

The first point to be considered arises upon the admission in evidence of an instrument (Exhibit Y) containing a signature of the plaintiff admitted to be genuine, to enable a comparison to be made between that signature and the disputed signature in issue, Exhibit Y being not otherwise relevant to the issue. Expert witnesses were allowed to give their opinions, based upon such comparison. Upon the question thus presented, as to whether a writing, admitted to be in the hand of the person whose signature is in issue, may be received in evidence for the purpose of comparison, the authorities are so at variance that we are at liberty to adopt the rule of evidence which seems to be most consistent with reason, and conducive to the best results. At common law, and generally in the United States, it has been the rule that where other writings, admitted to be genuine, are already in evidence for other purposes in the case, comparison may be made between such writings and the instrument in question. If such a comparison is conducive to the ends of truth, and is allowable, there would seem to be but little reason for refusing to allow a comparison with other writings admitted to be genuine, although not in evidence for other purposes.

The objections which have been urged to receiving other instruments, for the purpose of comparison, have been the multiplying of collateral issues; the danger of fraud or unfairness in selecting instruments for that purpose, from the fact that handwriting is not always the same, and is affected by age, and by the various circumstances which may attend the writing; and the surprise to which a party against whom such evidence is produced may be subjected. When the writings presented are admitted to be genuine, so that collateral issues are not likely to arise, nor the adverse party to be surprised by evidence which he is unable to meet, these objections seem to us to be insufficient as reasons for excluding the evidence. If such evidence has apparent and direct probative force, it should not be excluded unless for substantial reasons. In general, and from necessity, the authenticity of handwriting must be subject to proof by comparison of some sort, or by testimony which is based upon comparison, between the writing in question and that which is in some manner recognized or shown to be genuine. This is everywhere allowed, through the opinions of witnesses who have acquired a knowledge, more or less complete, of the handwriting of a person, as by having seen him write, or from acquaintance with papers authenticated as genuine. In such cases the conception of the handwriting retained in the mind of the witness becomes a standard for comparison, by reference to which his opinion is formed, and given in evidence. It would seem that a standard generally not less satisfactory, and very often much more satisfactory, is afforded by the opportunity for examining, side by side, the writing in dispute and other writings of unquestioned authenticity; and this, we think, is in accordance with the common judgment and experience of men.

The evils that may be suggested as likely to arise from the selection of particular writings for the purposes of comparison may be left, as all unfair or misleading evidence must be, to be corrected by other evidence, and by the intelligent judgment of the Court or jury. In our opinion, such evidence is conducive to the intelligent ascertaining of the truth, and the receiving of it in this case was not error. We cite authorities sustaining this view, some of which go further in this direction than does our present decision. Tyler v. Todd, 36 Conn. 218; Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 490; State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 452; Adams v. Field, 21 Vt. 256; State v. Ward, 39 Vt. 225; Farmers' Bank v. Whitehill, 10 Serg. & R. 110; Travis v. Brown, 43 Pa. St. 9; Chance v. Indianapolis & W. G. R. Co., 32 Ind. 472; Macomber v. Scott, 10 Kan. 335; Wilson v. Beauchamp, 50 Miss. 24.

The conclusion of the Court that the plaintiff executed the deed in question is very satisfactorily sustained by the evidence. It is opposed by the bare denial of the plaintiff. The deed purported to have been executed by herself and by her husband, and to have been acknowledged in the manner prescribed by law, and has been on record more than twenty years. The fact of its execution is sustained, not merely by the statutory authentication, but by the evidence of the subscribing witnesses, although they do not now recollect the fact itself. Evidence of a circumstantial nature, relating to the signature itself, went also to show that the plaintiff's name was not a forged writing. Clear and convincing proof is required to oppose the statutory authentication by which the proof of deeds is established. . . .

The deed of the plaintiff, being sustained, determines the case, and it is unnecessary to consider the respondents' further claim of title by prescription. Order affirmed.

185. UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS v. SPALDING

SUPREME COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1900

71 N. H. 163; 51 Atl. 731

DEBT, on a bond. Solomon Spalding was the only defendant named in the writ who was resident in this State, and the only one upon whom service was made or who appeared. Trial at the January Term, 1901, of the Supreme Court, before PARSONS, J., and a jury, and verdict for the defendant. . . .

The defendant's signature as surety and the breach of the bond were admitted. The defense was that after the bond was signed, and before it was delivered to the plaintiffs, the name of one surety was erased and another written over it, and that the appearance of the signatures was such that ordinary care would have disclosed the erasure and substitution to the plaintiffs before acceptance of the bond. An enlarged photographic copy presented faint lines of the writing alleged to have been erased. The plaintiffs claimed that the erasure was of a part of the defendant's name accidentally written by him upon the line below his full signature, while the defendant denied that the words erased were in his handwriting. For the purpose of comparison the defendant introduced in evidence his signatures written upon stock certificates, and sworn to be genuine by him and by the treasurer of the corporation. The plaintiffs excepted to this evidence on the ground that the signatures were neither admitted to be genuine, nor found in papers otherwise in the case, and, further, that they appeared to have been written at a date subsequent to the execution of the bond. . . .

Charles J. Hamblett, Charles H. Burns, and John S. H. Frink, for the plaintiffs. George B. French and Oliver E. Branch, for the defendant.

REMICK, J. . . . The exception next considered presents the question whether signatures of the defendant on papers otherwise irrelevant, and not admitted to be genuine, were admissible for the mere purpose of comparison with the signature in dispute.

By the general rule of the common law, comparison by juxtaposition was limited to the writing in issue and writings in the case for other purposes. The introduction of writings otherwise irrelevant for the mere purpose of comparison was permitted only when the writing in issue was so ancient as not to admit of proof based on knowledge derived from seeing the party write or its equivalent. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 580; . . . Doe v. Newton, 5 A. & E. 514 [ante, No. 182]; Doe v. Suckermore, 5 A. & E. 703 [ante, No. 183]; Griffits v. Ivery, 11 A. & E. 322; Hickory v. United States, 151 U. S. 303. This general rule of the common law has been adopted and is enforced in its integrity in the United States courts. Strother v. Lucas, 6 Pet. 763; Rogers v. Ritter, 12 Wall. 317; Moore v. United States, 91 U. S. 270; Williams v. Conger, 125 U. S. 397, 414; Hickory v. United States, 151 U. S. 303; Stokes v. United States, 157 U. S. 187. . . . The tendency, however, of legislation and judicial decisions is away from this strict and narrow rule toward the more liberal one permitting comparison with any writing established to be the writing of the party whose hand is in issue, whether otherwise relevant or not, and without reference to the age of the particular writing in controversy. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d ed.), 265, 269. The rule has been so enlarged in England by the statute of 17 & 18 Vict., ch. 125, sec. 27. Also by statute in many of the States of this country. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d ed.), 270. In other States the same result has been reached by judicial decisions. . . . While more or less has been said to the same effect by the Courts in this jurisdiction, much, not in terms overruled, has also been said to the contrary. . . . While the law remains in the conflicting and inconclusive shape disclosed by the foregoing review of the authorities, confusion and controversy are inevitable. Consistency and efficiency alike require a definite rule, authoritatively declared. In this view, we have re-examined the question, both from the point of reason and authority.

It may be safely stated as a fundamental proposition that, on the question whether a given signature is in the handwriting of a particular person, comparison of the disputed signature with other writings of that person known to be genuine is a rational method of investigation, and that similarities and dissimilarities disclosed are probative, and as satisfactory in the instinctive search for truth as opinion formed by the unquestioned method of comparing the signature with an exemplar of the person's handwriting, existing in the mind, and derived from direct acquaintance, however little, with the party's handwriting. The objections upon which the common-law rule of exclusion is founded are threefold: (1) Ignorance of jurors, and their inability to make intelligent comparison; (2) danger of unfairness and fraud in the selection of specimens, with no sufficient opportunity for the opposing party to investigate and expose; (3) collateral issues to the genuineness of specimens presented.

(1) The first objection, however justified by the state of English society when it was originally announced, has no weight at the present time in a jurisdiction where intelligence and education are general, and needs no further comment. (2) Since the right to produce specimens under a rule allowing a comparison is equally open to both parties, and the specimens are all subject to examination and cross-examination, the opportunity for advantage from unfair selections is too slight to furnish reason for closing the door against this important avenue of investigation. (3) The third objection — that to permit comparison with specimens not otherwise in evidence, and admitted for the mere purpose of comparison, would introduce collateral issues, and confuse and distract the jury — is, when applied to specimens neither admitted by the parties nor found by the Court to be genuine, firmly grounded in reason and authority. The whole doctrine of comparison presupposes the existence of genuine standards. Comparison of a disputed signature in issue with disputed specimens would not be comparison, in any proper sense. When the identity of anything is fully and certainly established, you may compare other things with it which are doubtful, to assert in whether they belong to the same class or not; but, when both are doubtful and uncertain, comparison is not only useless as to any certain result, but clearly dangerous, and more likely to bewilder than to instruct a jury. If disputed signatures were admissible for the purpose of comparison, a collateral inquiry would be raised as to each standard; and the proof upon this inquiry would be comparison against, which would only lead to an endless series of issues, each more unsatisfactory than the first, and the case would thus be filled with issues aside from the real question before the jury. Juries are indeed more intelligent than when the common law denied them even the right to make comparison with admitted signatures not otherwise in the case; but the time has not yet come when they should be left without chart or compass. It is due to them and to the administration of justice that when called upon to pass upon the identity of a signature the standards furnished for this purpose should be genuine standards. The jury should not be required, nor should they be permitted, to make comparison with disputed standards, and to settle for themselves the collateral question of the genuineness of the standards, which might often be more difficult than the main question of the genuineness of the writing in issue. Such a practice is not only indefensible in reason, but it is against the judicial and legislative opinion of the world, almost without exception. . . . The controversy in the great case of Doe v. Suckermore was not to secure the admission of disputed signatures to be passed upon by the jury, but to the end that specimens already established to be genuine might be used as a basis of comparison; WILLIAMS, J., and DENMAN, C. J., while contending in that case for the right to compare specimens admitted to be genuine, expressly conceded that disputed specimens should not be permitted to go to the jury. . . . In St. 17 & 18 Vict., ch. 125, sec. 27, . . . while the refinements, distinctions, and exceptions which had confused the subject and embarrassed the administration of justice were thus wiped away, and the door opened wide for comparison with genuine specimens, it is to be noted that the essential principle of the common law forbidding disputed signatures and collateral issues was distinctly preserved, by the provision limiting comparison to writings "proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine." So, wherever the door has been opened to this class of proof, whether by legislation or by judicial expansion and adaptation of the common law, the same safeguard has been preserved. . . .

The true rule is that, when a writing in issue is claimed on the one hand and denied on the other to be the writing of a particular person, any other writing may be admitted in evidence for the mere purpose of comparison with the writing in dispute, whether the latter is susceptible of or supported by direct proof or not; but, before any such writing shall be admissible for such purpose, its genuineness must be found as a preliminary fact by the presiding judge, upon clear and undoubted evidence. This involves, indeed, a marked departure from the common law. It does away with the common-law limitation of comparison to standards otherwise in the case, and hence with its exceptions, and the controversy and confusion which have grown out of them. . . . In some States, as already shown, legislation has been deemed essential to bring about such changes; but in others, as we have also shown, the same result has been accomplished by judicial action. As the common-law rule was based primarily upon the assumed incapacity of jurors to make intelligent comparison, such judicial action would seem warranted under the power to adapt the common law to new conditions. The value of comparison as a method of proof being now generally conceded, juries being no longer too ignorant to derive benefit from that source, and the danger of spurious specimens and the objections to collateral issues being fully met by requiring the genuineness of the standard to be determined as a preliminary fact by the trial judge, there remains, it would seem, no satisfactory reason for the old limitations and exceptions. And it is fair to assume that, had no statute been enacted, the common law of England, adjusting itself to changed conditions, would now accord with the rule we have announced. Such a tendency was indicated by the discussion and decision in [Doe d.] Mudd v. Suckermore, which was so soon followed by the act of Parliament referred to. In any event, the essential principle of the common law is preserved, and the dangers and objections against which it was aimed met, by requiring the genuineness of the standard to be found by the Court as a preliminary fact, upon clear and positive testimony.

In the present case, no objection appears to have been made to the introduction of the specimen signatures upon the ground that their genuineness had not been predetermined by the Court. . . .

The exception to the admission of the signatures because they were made subsequent to the time the bond purported to have been made cannot be sustained. True, "the claimed author of disputed writings cannot make testimony in his favor by bringing in for comparison a writing manufactured by him for that very purpose after the controversy has arisen. . . ." Sanderson v. Osgood, 52 Vt. 309; King v. Donahue, 110 Mass. 155; Hickory v. United States, 151 U. S. 303. There is no pretense in the present case that the signatures introduced for the purpose of comparison were made after controversy arose, or that they were manufactured for the purpose of comparison. The mere fact that they were made subsequent to the execution of the bond is not sufficient to render them inadmissible.

Exceptions overruled.

PARSONS, J., did not sit; the others concurred.

186. STATUTES. England (1854, Common Law Procedure Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, § 27). Comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine shall be permitted to be made by witnesses; and such writings, and the evidence of witnesses respecting the same, may be submitted to the Court and jury as evidence of the genuineness, or otherwise, of the writing in dispute.

California. (C. C. P. 1872, § 1944). Evidence respecting the handwriting may also be given by a comparison made by the witness or by the jury, with writings admitted or treated as genuine by the party against whom the evidence is offered, or proved to be genuine to the satisfaction of the judge.

New York. (Laws 1880, c. 36, § 1; Laws 1888, c. 555). Comparison of a disputed writing, with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the Court to be genuine, shall be permitted to be made by witnesses in all trials and proceedings, and such writings and the evidence of witnesses respecting the same may be submitted to the Court and jury as evidence of the genuineness, or otherwise, of the writing in dispute. § 2 (amendment of 1888) [same for the first eighteen words; then] handwriting of any person claimed on the trial to have made or executed the disputed instrument or writing, shall be permitted and submitted to the Court and jury in like manner.

189. LORD MELVILLE'S TRIAL. (1806. House of Lords, Howell's State Trials, XXIX, 1065). [Henry Dundas, Lord Melville, was impeached for embezzlement of the public funds while treasurer of the navy. The prosecution is seeking to prove the profit made on the misuse of a certain portion of the funds.]

Mr. Serjeant Best. . . . The Commons now propose to prove, by a calculation, the amount of the interest which Lord Melville has saved, applying particularly to those sums which are paid into the Bank of Scotland, upon which your lordships have it in evidence, he, Lord Melville, would have been charged with interest; and also the dividends he has received; they amount to 21,571£. 5*s*. 9*d*., which Lord Melville has derived from the use of the public money, which the managers have traced into his hand, upon these stocks.

Then Joseph Kaye, Esq., was called in, and being sworn, was examined as follows:

Mr. Serjeant Best. — Have you made any calculation, as to the profit made upon the different sums which have just been mentioned?

Mr. Kaye. — I have.

Mr. Serjeant Best. — Does the paper that you hold in your hand contain those calculations? — Mr. Kaye. — It does.

Mr. Plumer. — Do your lordships think that this is a proper subject of evidence? . . .

Mr. Adam. — I conceive this to be by no means admissible evidence. In the first place, the learned manager states, as an assumption of his, that here are certain matters proved; my lords, I say, therefore, that the data are assumed in the first instance. In the data be assumed, it is impossible for your lordships to receive any calculation upon those assumed data as evidence. . . .

A Lord. — I submit to your lordships, that the data stand where they did; they must stand or fall by the proof. There is nothing more common than to put to a witness: "Provided such and such a sum has been received, what is the amount of interest?" and it is merely casting upon the witness the labor of doing that which all the lords might do with a pen themselves; but which is done through the medium of the witness in a more compendious manner; the data and facts stand as they did; it is a mere hypothetical question to the witness, "If the fact stands so and so, what is the arithmetical result?"

Lord Chancellor. — I take it to assume no facts whatever; it proceeds on certain data. If you take away the foundation upon which it is made, which is matter for the Court afterwards, there is an end of the superstructure.

Mr. Serjeant Best. — Is that calculation, which you hold in your hand, a correct calculation upon these sums?

Mr. Kaye. — It is as correct as I can make it. I believe every figure will be found right. . . .

(Then Joseph Kaye, Esq., was cross-examined as follows): . . .

Mr. Plumer. — From what did you take the data?

Mr. Kaye. — I must state the items, in order to answer that question. The first item is 13,500 £ India stock; I took that from the data of the credit in the signed accounts in these books of Messieurs Coutts and Company, to the day that was carried to the credit of Mr. Trotter, as has appeared in evidence.

Lord Chancellor. — All the witness has done, is to establish, by calculation, that such a stock, from such a time, will produce so much. He does not himself prove any fact, and the calculations he has made must therefore depend upon the facts which are proved by others.

Mr. Plumer. — Does that document contain all the data upon which the calculation is made?

Mr. Kaye. — Yes, the learned counsel may refer to every document that has been given in evidence. The entries of the books have been given in evidence, from which I have taken this account. . . .

Mr. Plumer. — Then upon the India stock alone, there arises a profit according to your calculation of about 10,000 £.

Mr. Kaye. — Yes, the profit and excess of dividends above the interest.

Mr. Serjeant Best. — Does this account include the 10,600 £ on the Chest account?

Mr. Kaye. — No, here is nothing here upon the Chest account. . . .

A Lord. — Before Mr. Trotter is called, I wish to suggest whether this paper should be entered on your lordship's minutes; if it should turn out that there is no foundation for these facts, it will have an improper effect, by having been entered.

Another Lord. — All the inconvenience that might result from this entry, would be obviated by stating that if it is proved, or shall be proved, that such and such facts exist, that is the calculation of the profits; but that will not be an admission of the facts.

A Lord. — I submit, whether it is not proper to ask the witness on what suppositions he makes these calculations.

On what suppositions, or admissions, do you make these calculations which you have given to the Court?

Mr. Kaye. — The first item of 13,500 £ India stock I have taken at the value which was paid into Mr. Trotter's account.

A Lord. — Is not the foundation of your making these calculations, a supposition that these are the facts?

Mr. Kaye. — Yes.

A Lord. — Read the title.

Mr. Kaye. — "A statement of the profits made by investments in the funds, on account of Lord Melville, and by advances made for interest of money." . . .

A Lord. — I submit that this might be all set right, if the honorable manager would put one question to the witness: "Supposing such and such facts to have been proved, is that the calculation?"

Another Lord. — Is that calculation formed on the assumption by you, that all the facts stated in that paper are proved?

Mr. Kaye. — Most certainly. . . .

The paper was delivered in.

190. M'Naghten's Case. (1843. House of Lords. 10 Cl. & F. 207). Question for the Judges: "Can a medical man conversant with the disease of insanity, who never saw the prisoner previously to the trial, but who was present during the whole trial and the examination of the witnesses, be asked his opinion as to the state of the prisoner's mind at the time of the commission of the alleged crime, etc.?" Maule, J. In principle, it is open to this objection, that as the opinion of the witness is founded on those conclusions of fact which he forms from the evidence, and as it does not appear what these conclusions are, it may be that the evidence he gives is on such an assumption of facts as makes it irrelevant to the inquiry.

191. Dickenson v. Fitchburg. (1859. Massachusetts. 13 Gray 546, 555). Shaw, C. J. The respondents have offered the testimony of a witness, that in his opinion the market value of the estate was enhanced by the widening of the street, the witness was asked by the respondents to state the grounds and reasons upon which his opinions were founded; this was objected to by the petitioners, and rejected by the sheriff. . . . It is objected that the admission of this evidence would open the door to evidence entirely incompetent, by allowing the witness to state the facts on which the opinion is founded, facts not proved by competent evidence. This objection seems to us to be founded on a misconception of the manner in which the investigation is to be conducted, and the testimony of experts received and applied. It assumes that the facts will be taken to be true because the witness has stated that he found his opinion upon them. But this is quite a mistake. In order to obtain the opinion of a witness on matters not depending upon general knowledge, but on facts not testified of by himself, one of two modes is pursued: either the witness is present and hears all the testimony, or the testimony is summed up in the question put to him; and in either case the question is put to him hypothetically, whether, if certain facts testified of are true, he can form an opinion, and what that opinion is? The jury will then be instructed, if the truth of any such fact is contested, first to consider whether the fact on which such opinion rests is proved to their satisfaction; if it is, then to give such weight to the opinion resting on it as it deserves; but if the fact is not proved by the evidence, then to give the opinion no weight. This is necessary to enable the jury, upon the true theory of jury trial, to decide all questions of fact, upon competent evidence laid before them. M'Naghten's Case, 10 Cl. & Fin. 200 [ante, No. 190].

192. BELLEFONTAINE & INDIANA RAILROAD CO. v. BAILEY

SUPREME COURT OF OHIO. 1860

11 Oh. St. 333

ERROR to the District Court of Darke county.

Peter Bailey brought this action against the Bellefontaine and Indiana Railroad Company, before a justice of the peace of Darke county, to recover damages for the killing of his two horses, through the carelessness and negligence of the cars. . . . The company answered simply denying the negligence charged. . . .

On the trial of the case in the Common Pleas, it appeared from a bill of exceptions embodied in the record, that the defendant, to maintain the issue joined on its part, called to the stand, as a witness, Aloah Skilton, who testified that he was acting as locomotive engineer on the train which killed the horses for which the action was brought, at the time of said killing, and saw said horses in the act of coming upon the railroad track; that he was acquainted with the business of running railroad engines and trains, and had been engaged in the business for the last five years. The defendants' counsel then asked said witness his opinion as to the possibility of avoiding the injury to the said horses, in view of the distance between the train and the plaintiff's horses when the latter came upon the railroad track? To which question the plaintiff objected; which objection the Court sustained, and refused to allow the question to be answered; to which decision of the Court the defendant excepted. . . .

Conklin & Thompson and Murray, for plaintiff in error. Wilson and Allen & Meeker, for defendant in error.

BRINKERHOFF, J. (after stating the case as above). — That the running and management of railroad locomotives and trains is so far an art, outside of the experience and knowledge of ordinary jurors, as to render the opinions of persons acquainted with the running and management of such locomotives and trains, as experts, admissible and proper testimony, in proper cases, is very clear on principle, and is so recognized in Quimby v. Vermont Central Railway, 23 Vt. R. 394, and Illinois Central Railway v. Ready, 17 Ill. R. 580. . . .

1. The objection that the witness is put in the place of the jury, and is made to perform their proper function, applies, so far as it has any foundation at all, to all testimony of this kind. The truth is, as is well remarked by Mr. Redfield in the note above referred to, the testimony of scientific witnesses and experts is a sort of education of the jury, upon subjects in regard to which they are not presumed to be properly instructed; and they at last are entitled and required to pass upon the weight and credit to be attached to the opinions given them, weakened or strengthened, as they may be, by the sifting process of cross-examination, and by counter or corroborating testimony.

2. It is objected, in the second place, that the question put to the witness does not suppose or assume a state of facts on which his opinion was to be based. Undoubtedly, if the witness had been a stranger to the actual facts, it would then have been necessary to assume a state of facts as the foundation of any opinion he might give; but no such assumption, it seems to us, is necessary when the witness is, or is properly presumed to be, himself personally acquainted with the material facts of the case. The witness here was himself the engineer of the locomotive, by which the injury was done; he saw the horses when they came upon the track; we think it is fairly presumable that he knew something of the distance between the engine and the horses when they came upon the track; the velocity and weight of the train; the character of the grade; the means of checking the velocity of the train; and the time and distance which would be required to check the progress of, or stop the train. If an expert may give his opinion on facts testified to by others, we see no reason why he may not do so on facts presumably within his own personal knowledge; and if his knowledge of any material fact be wanting or defective, the parties have ample opportunity to show it by cross examination, and by testimony aliunde. A physician or surgeon called on to give an opinion as to the state of health, or the cause of the death of any person, and having no personal knowledge of the person's symptoms, must of necessity testify hypothetically from assumed or supposed symptoms; but surely the attending physician or surgeon of the patient, having himself the best opportunity of personally knowing his symptoms and condition, is not, in the first instance presumed to be under any such necessity. The question before us is, in principle, it seems to us, the same; and we think the Common Pleas erred in refusing to allow the question to be answered.

The judgment of the District Court and of the Common Pleas will be reversed, and the cause will be remanded to the Common Pleas for further proceedings.

SCOTT, C. J., and SUTLIFF, PECK and GHOLSON, JJ., concurred.

193. PEOPLE v. McELVAINE

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1890

121 N. Y. 250; 24 N. E. 465

APPEAL from judgment of the Court of Sessions of Kings County, rendered October 23, 1889, entered upon a verdict convicting defendant of the crime of murder in the first degree.

George M. Curtis, for appellant. . . . The evidence of Dr. Lanton C. Gray was improperly admitted. . . .

James W. Ridgway, for respondent. . . . It is no objection to a hypothetical question that the state of facts which it assumes is erroneous, if within the possible or probable range of the evidence, since the judge cannot decide as a preliminary question on objection to the evidence, whether it is erroneous or not, the question being for the jury. . . .

Ruger, Ch. J. — The defendant, upon trial, was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, for having killed one Luca in his own house in Brooklyn, about three o'clock in the morning of the 23rd day of August, 1889. . . .

The sole defense attempted was the alleged insanity of the accused. Considerable evidence was given on the trial in his behalf tending to show that he possessed a defective mental organization and was subject to delusions and hallucinations, which were claimed to be evidence of his insanity. Two witnesses were called on his behalf, as experts, who respectively gave evidence tending to show a belief that he was, to a certain degree, insane. Two expert witnesses were also called on behalf of the prosecution, to give opinions upon the question of the defendant's sanity, and each testified that he was, in their opinion, sane. It cannot be questioned but that the evidence of these witnesses was material and had weight with the jury upon the question of the defendant's mental condition. If these opinions were based upon an erroneous hypothesis and were founded in any material respect upon indefinite or unascertainable conditions, or upon considerations which were not the proper subject of expert evidence, they must be regarded as having been erroneously admitted.

The only serious objection to the convictions arises upon an exception to the ruling of the Court, permitting Dr. Gray, a witness for the prosecution and an expert of high reputation and character, to answer, against objection, a hypothetical question as to the defendant's sanity. The question put by the district attorney, and the proceedings accompanying the question were as follows:

"Q. Now, are you able to say whether in your judgment, based upon all the testimony, the acts of the defendant on the night of the homicide, the testimony as to his past life given by the witnesses in his defense, and based upon the whole case, whether this young man is sane or insane?

"Mr. Curtis. — I object, as it is not a question properly put.

"The Court. — Why not?

"Mr. Curtis. — It is too vague and indefinite. In order to put a hypothetical question properly, so say the Court of Appeals, it must consist of specifically proven facts, which come within the pale of the proof; not where a person for instance, is permitted to give an anomalous opinion. . . .

"The Court. — Where a medical witness, who is called as an expert, has been in court during the whole trial and heard all the testimony in the case, everything that has been done and said by everybody, I don't see why it is not competent to ask him whether upon these facts, all he heard testified to, he thinks the defendant is sane or insane. This witness has heard all that has been sworn to by everybody.

"To the Witness:

"You have heard all the testimony in the case?

"The District Attorney. — Based upon the whole testimony of the prosecution and the defense, including the hypothetical question put by Judge CURTIS, and everything that you have heard sworn to here; now will you answer the question?

"The defense excepts.

"A. — I have formed an opinion.

"Q. — State it?

"The defense excepts.

"A. — I believe the defendant is sane.

"Q. — What do you believe he was at the time of the commission of the offense?

"A. — I believe he was sane at the time of the commission of the offense."

We cannot doubt but that this question was improper. The witness was thus permitted to take into consideration all the evidence in the case given upon a long trial extending over nine days, and, upon so much of it as he could recollect, determine for himself the credibility of the witnesses, the probability or improbability of their statements, and, drawing therefrom such inferences as, in his judgment, were warranted by it, pronounce upon the sanity or insanity of the defendant. It cannot be questioned but that the witness was by the question put in the place of the jury and was allowed to determine upon his own judgment what their verdict ought to be in the case. . . .

The rule as to the conditions governing the formation of hypothetical questions to experts, has frequently been discussed and illustrated in the reported cases in this Court. . . . In Reynolds v. Robinson, 64 N. Y. 589, 595, Judge EARL, in speaking of evidence attempted to be given under a hypothetical question, says:

"In such a case it is not the provision of the witness to reconcile and draw inferences from the evidence of other witnesses and to take in such facts as he thinks their evidence has established, or as he can recollect and carry in his mind, and thus form and express an opinion. His opinion may be obtained by stating to him a hypothetical case, taking in some or all of the facts stated by witnesses, and claimed by counsel putting the question to be established by their evidence, and when the question is thus stated the witness has in his mind a definite state of facts, and the province of the triers, whether referees or jurors, is not interfered with." . . .

No other decisions from this State are cited, and we deem it unnecessary to discuss or consider the rules prevailing in other countries in view of the reported decisions made in our own Courts.

An attempt was subsequently made to, in some degree, cure the error committed, by proving by the witness that in answering the question he assumed the truth of the evidence given by the defendant's witnesses; but we think this did not remove the vice inhering in the question. Even as thus affected, it left the uncertainty of his memory as to all of the evidence in the case, and the freedom of his judgment as to all other evidence to give such weight as he should in his own mind determine it was entitled to, and substantially allowed him to usurp the functions of the jury in deciding the questions of fact.

We think it is not competent in any case to predicate a hypothetical question to an expert upon all of the evidence in the case, whether he has heard it all or not, upon the assumption that he then recollects it, for it would then be impossible for the jury to determine the facts upon which the witness bases his opinion, and whether such facts were proved or not. Suppose the jury concluded that certain facts are not proved, how are they, in such an event, to determine whether the opinion is not, to a great degree, based upon such facts? When specific facts, either proved or assumed to have been proved, are embraced in the question the jury are enabled to determine whether the answer to such question is based upon facts which have been proved in the case or not, and whether other facts bearing upon the correctness and force of the answer are contained therein, or have been omitted from it; but in the absence of such a question the evidence must always be, to a certain extent, uncertain, unintelligible, and, perhaps, misleading.

We regret that an error of this character is found in a case which was otherwise tried by the learned Court with an intelligent understanding of and adherence to the rules of law applicable to the case, and a strict regard to the rights of the accused; but, in compliance with the uniform practice of Courts in capital cases to avoid even the possibility of injustice to the accused, we think the error referred to requires a new trial.

All concur. Judgment reversed.

194. PEOPLE v. FABER

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1910

199 N. Y. 256; 92 N. E. 675

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court, rendered July 10, 1909, at a Trial Term for the county of Warren, upon a verdict convicting the defendant of the crime of murder in the first degree.

J. Edward Singleton, for appellant. The expert witnesses sworn on behalf of the People were erroneously allowed to express their opinions as to the sanity of defendant without first giving the facts on which the opinion was based. . . .

John H. Cunningham, for respondent. . . . It is not legal error to permit a medical expert, who has made a personal examination of a person for the purpose of determining his mental condition, to give an opinion as to that condition at the time of the examination without, in the first instance, disclosing the particular facts upon which the opinion is based. . . .

CHASE, J. — The defendant has been convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree. It is not denied that he shot and killed Maude Bumps, otherwise known as Maude Ryan. It is contended on behalf of the defendant that the evidence of premeditation and deliberation is not sufficient to sustain the judgment rendered, and it is also contended in his behalf that the defendant at the time of the commission of the act was laboring under such a defect of reason as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or that the act was wrong.

We have fully examined the record and are of the opinion that the judgment should not be reversed as a matter of fact, but that the trial judge erred in his charge in relation to the duties of jurors. . . .

It is unnecessary to consider the other alleged errors claimed in behalf of the defendant, as the questions so presented may not arise upon a new trial, except as to the contention of the defendant that the Court erred in allowing the admission of certain opinions as to the defendant's sanity which were given by physicians who are skilled and experienced alienists, without requiring the prosecution to first disclose the personal conversations, observations and examinations upon which such experts severally based their opinions. . . . We will consider such rulings now, that the trial Court may have the opinion of this Court in regard thereto upon the new trial.

In the early history of the Courts of England mere opinion evidence was wholly rejected. The admission of opinions as evidence by persons specially qualified by skill and experience to speak as experts has been a matter of development both in England and in this country. The history of the admission of such evidence with illustrations from decisions of the Courts is given by Wigmore in his exhaustive work on Evidence, and in connection therewith he refers to the practice of admitting opinion evidence by experts based upon observation, and concludes that evidence by experts of conceded skill and experience may be received when based upon the observation of the witness without in the first instance necessarily requiring that the facts observed be stated to the Court and jury. In connection with his discussion of the question as to the admissibility of opinion evidence and of the early opposition to the admission of such evidence in any case, he says:

"It has already been seen in reviewing the history of the doctrine, that in the beginning the disparagement of opinion rested on grounds totally different from those now received. It was objected to because as a mere guess, the belief of one having no good grounds, it lacked the testimonial qualification of observation; hence, a mere opinion, as soon as it appeared to be such, must be rejected. In a few jurisdictions the modern doctrine has been confused with the earlier one, and it is laid down as a general rule that opinions must be accompanied with the facts on which they are based — usually with the exception that expert witnesses are exempted from this rule.

Now, in no respect is this rule sound. In the first place, then, there is no principle and no orthodox practice which requires a witness having personal observation to state in advance his observed data before he states his inferences from them; all that needs to appear in advance is that he had an opportunity to observe and did observe, whereupon it is proper for him to state his conclusions, leaving the detailed grounds to be drawn out on cross-examination. Any other rule cumbers seriously the examination, and amounts in effect to changing substantially the whole examination into a voir dire — an innovation on established methods which is unwarranted by policy." (§ 1922.)

He further says:

"All opinions or conclusions are in a sense hypothetical. But does it follow that, when the opinion comes from the same witness who has learned the premises by actual observation those premises must be stated beforehand, hypothetically or otherwise, by him or to him? For example, the physician is asked, 'Did you examine the body?' 'Yes.' 'State your opinion of the cause of death.' Is it here necessary that he should first state in detail the facts of his personal observation, as premises, before he can give his opinion? In academic nicety, yes; practically, no; and for the simple reason that on cross-examination each and every detail of the appearances he observed will be brought out and thus associated with his general conclusion as the grounds for it, and the tribunal will understand that the rejection of these data will destroy the validity of his opinion. In the opposite case, where the witness has not had personal observation of the premises, they are not to be got from him on cross-examination, because he had no data of personal observation; and that is precisely the reason why they must be indicated and set out in the question to him, for thus only can the premises be clearly associated with the conclusion based upon them. Through failure to perceive this limitation, courts have sometimes sanctioned the requirement of an advance hypothetical statement even where the expert witness speaks from personal observation." (§ 675.)

There is a great difference in the decisions of the Courts of the States upon this subject, but it seems unnecessary to consider such authorities other than those of this State. We are in accord with the conclusions reached by Mr. Wigmore in his work on Evidence; and such conclusion is in accord with the weight of authority in this State. In People v. Youngs, 151 N. Y. 210, the question was directly before this Court, and its determination was essential to the disposition of the appeal. Evidence of the opinions of experts was received in that case without first requiring that the observations upon which such opinions were based be given in evidence. The judgment appealed from, by which the defendant had been sentenced to death, was affirmed, and this Court said: . . .

"It may be true that the Court in the exercise of a sound discretion may require the witness to state the facts before expressing the opinion; and in all cases the opposite party has the right to elicit the facts upon cross-examination. But the precise question here is whether the Court committed an error in permitting the witness to give the opinion before the facts upon which it was founded were all disclosed. And we think that when it is shown that a medical expert has made the proper professional examination of the patient in order to ascertain the existence of some physical or mental disease he is then qualified to express an opinion on the subject, though he may not yet have stated the scientific facts or external symptoms upon which it is based. People v. Kemmler, 119 N. Y. 580; People v. Taylor, 138 N. Y. 398; People v. Hoch, 150 N. Y. 291.)" (p. 218.) . . .

A witness to a will, although a non-expert, may testify to the competency of the testator to make a will. In common practice in the Courts a physician who has examined a patient is allowed to testify directly as to the disease from which the patient is suffering. There seems to be no good reason for requiring a physician to specify in detail his observations before expressing an opinion as to the sanity or insanity of a person examined by him any more than he should be required to recount such observations in advance of expressing an opinion as to whether a person had typhoid fever or was suffering from an epileptic fit. . . .

The trial Court did not err in allowing the physicians to express their opinions in regard to the sanity of the defendant without previously stating in detail the observations upon which the opinions were based. For the reasons stated the judgment of conviction should be reversed and a new trial granted.

CULLEN, Ch. J., HAIGHT, WILLARD BARTLETT and HISCOCK, JJ., concur; GRAY, J., absent.

Judgment of conviction reversed, etc.

Topic 2. Rules Limiting Impeachment of Witnesses

SUB-TOPIC A. GENERAL CHARACTER TRAITS[1]

196. LORD CHANCELLOR MACCLESFIELD'S TRIAL. (1725. Howell's State Trials, XVI, 1239). Common Serjeant: We desire that Mr. Price may give your Lordships an account of what he knows of the character of [the witness] Mr. Cothingham and how long he hath known him.

Mr. Price. — My lords, I have known him upwards of twenty years; I never knew anybody say anything amiss of him. . . . I know no man in his place behaved himself better than he hath done.

Common Serjeant. — We desire to ask not only to what Mr. Price's opinion is, but to what is the opinion of others, as to his general character.

Mr. Price. — I believe, if you ask his character of an hundred people, ninety of them will give him rather a greater character.

197. REX v. WATSON. (1817. 32 How. St. Tr. 1, 495, 2 Stark. 154). ABBOTT, J. The usual question put for the purpose of discrediting the testimony of a witness is, Would you believe that witness upon his oath?

BAYLEY, J. — The witnesses may state that he is not a man to be believed upon his oath.

James Lawson sworn. — Examined by Mr. Wetherell. Q. — Do you know a person of the name of John Heyward, alleged to abide at No. 6, Stangate-wall, Lambeth, in the county of Surrey, stock-broker? A. — I know the person you allude to. Q. — How many years have you known him? A. — Upwards of ten years; in fact, I have known him from a boy. Q. — Would you believe him upon his oath; or in your judgment, is he a person to be believed upon his oath? A. — I believe not; I would not believe him upon his oath. Q. — You would not; and you believe he is not a person to be believed upon his oath? A. — I do.

198. STATE v. RANDOLPH

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1856

24 Conn. 363

ELLSWORTH, J. . . . Another subject has been discussed, respecting which there is a diversity in the practice of the Courts of justice. We mean, the proper question to be put to a witness who is called to impeach the character of another witness.

One thing, however, is obvious, that in all Courts, whatever be the form or extent of the inquiry, the thing aimed at is one and the same, the character of the witness for truth; and where the question assumes a more general form, it is allowed only for its supposed bearing on the truthfulness, or the reverse, of the witness. His character for truth is all that is pertinent and material to the point, and all that the jury should inquire after; other facts, other offences, tried or untried, not being crimen falsi, have no bearing upon the inquiry whatever, and should not be brought into the case.

In the English Courts, the inquiry is in this form: "Are you acquainted with the character of the witness? — What is his general character? — Would you believe him under oath?" As a general rule of practice this has been found satisfactory in that country and elsewhere; and doubtless would be so here, if our Courts had not, at an early period, adopted a different rule, which has proved to be satisfactory and sufficient, and which we are not willing, at this late day, to abandon for another, certainly not better, if as good. The more general inquiry in England is adopted, as we have said, to learn the witness' character for truth; ours is adopted for the same purpose, but is more single and direct. In our Courts, the inquiry put is: "Is the character of the witness for truth on a par with that of mankind in general?"

The English rule has this advantage, that it brings the general character of the witness before the triers, which is important, where the witness has not acquired a specific character on the subject of truth, and hence it is urged, with some force, that in such a case, the general inquiry is essential, for no other will reach the case; and further, that the testimony of the impeaching witness that, from his acquaintance with the witness' character, he would, or would not, believe the witness under oath, will throw light on the credit and standing of the witness. We do not deny that there is much good sense in this course of reasoning. But on the other hand, our rule, proceeding upon the same idea, goes to the question of truth at once, nor does it leave anything to the mere inference of the impeaching witness, whether he would, or not, believe the witness under oath. By our rule, he states the premises, or character for truth, from which he draws the conclusion, and as, in other cases, leaves the triers to draw their own inferences. . . .

The English rule, as laid down by Greenleaf, has been practiced upon in several of the States of the union, while in others a more restricted and specific one has been preferred. . . . Whether we ought to go further, and allow the English questions to be put to the witness, has not been decided, certainly not in this Court, although we believe it has often been done on the circuit. General bad character is undoubtedly a serious blemish in a witness, and might justly detract from the weight of his testimony, and so might the character of a witness for the specific blemish of licentiousness, especially in the female sex. But where shall we stop the inquiries? Witnesses, who can have no opportunity to exculpate themselves, or give explanations of their acts, ought not to be exposed to unjust obloquy, nor should the trial be complicated and prolonged by trying collateral issues. If it were wise and just to inquire for one's reputation for virtue, why not for gambling, horse-racing, drunkenness, sabbath-breaking, etc.? These are serious blemishes on character. Now the general inquiry in the English Courts, and the more limited one in ours, is free from the objections to specific acts, or the character of specific habits; which, if allowed to be proved, would be very uncertain in effect, for they would be differently estimated and viewed by the triers, and hence, general character, which every witness is supposed to be able to establish, whenever attacked, is held to be all that is necessary or proper. For a more full and satisfactory discussion of these questions, we refer to an elaborate opinion of McLean, J. in United States v. Van Sickle, 2 McLean R. 223.

199. CALHOON v. COMMONWEALTH

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY. 1901

64 S. W. Rep. 965

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Green County. Thomas Calhoon was convicted of the offense of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed.

Henry & Woodward, for appellant. Clem J. Whittemore, for the Commonwealth.

WHITE, J. — The appellant was indicted in the Circuit Court of Green County, charged with the crime of murder. On trial he was convicted of manslaughter, and his punishment fixed by the jury at twenty years in the penitentiary, and he appeals.

The errors assigned and complained of by appellant are the admission of testimony and as to instructions. The testimony objected to was that of several witnesses called for defense to prove the general character of deceased, Tilden Morr, as to peace and quietude. After these witnesses had testified as to the general character of Morr as to peace and quietude, and that it was bad, the prosecution was allowed, over objection, to prove by a witness that the general character of accused as to peace and quietude was bad. As an indication of the questions asked, we quote from the bill of exceptions: "witness was asked if he was acquainted with the general character of the defendant for peace and quiet in the neighborhood where he resided, from having heard his neighbors speak of it, and the witness answered, 'I have heard that the defendant's character was bad.'" . . . At the time of the admission of this testimony accused had testified in his own behalf, but had offered no testimony as to his own character, — neither as to peace and quiet, nor any other way. This action of the Court is complained of as error.

The object of this testimony, evidently, was to show that accused was given to quarreling and raising disturbances generally. It could not have been to impeach him as a witness. We are of opinion that the testimony was incompetent for any purpose. Appellant had not presented an issue as to his general character as a peaceable, law-abiding citizen, and until he had done so the prosecution had no right to show that his character and reputation in that particular were bad. When appellant testified for himself, he invited an investigation of his character for truth, the same as any other witness; but, as to any other traits of character, they were not put in issue. It is clearly incompetent to attempt to impeach a witness by showing that he has a bad character for peace and quietude. The testimony, being incompetent, was prejudicial to appellant. . . .

The judgment of conviction is reversed, and cause remanded for new trial, and for proceedings consistent herewith.

200. STATE v. BECKNER

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI. 1905

194 Mo. 281; 91 S. W. 893

APPEAL from Jackson Criminal Court. — Hon. JOHN W. WOFFORD, Judge. Reversed and remanded.

This was a prosecution for murder. . . . The defendant was duly arraigned and entered his plea of not guilty. On the 8th day of May, 1905, defendant was put upon his trial, and on May 12, 1905, the jury returned a verdict finding him guilty of murder in the second degree. . . . At the close of the defendant's evidence in chief, the State offered various witnesses for the purpose of impeaching the general reputation of the defendant, for peace and good order, and to show that his general reputation was that of a violent, turbulent and dangerous man, over the objections and exceptions of the defendant. Thereupon the defendant offered evidence on his part tending to prove that his general reputation was that of a quiet, peaceable, law-abiding citizen. . . . The defendant was sentenced in accordance with the verdict of the jury, and now prosecutes his appeal from the said judgment and sentence. . . .

Boyle, Guthrie & Smith for appellant; J. S. Brooks of counsel. The trend of authority is to the effect that a witness may be impeached by showing his general reputation for truth and veracity and his general moral character for the purpose of affecting his credibility as a witness; but it has always been held in all the Courts that a man's bad character for turbulence and violence could not be put in issue by the State unless the defendant had first introduced witnesses to show his character was good. . . .

Herbert S. Hadley, Attorney-General, Frank Blake, Assistant Attorney-General, and I. B. Kimbrell, for the State. The testimony respecting the general reputation of defendant for being a violent, turbulent and dangerous person was admissible to impeach him as a witness. That any witness in a case may be impeached not only by showing that his general reputation for truth and veracity is bad, but also by showing that his general reputation for morality and for possessing the various attributes of an immoral character is bad, has been the settled law of this State since the case of State v. Shields, 13 Mo. 236, decided in 1850. . . .

GANTT, J. (after stating the case).

Various errors are assigned for the reversal of the judgment herein, but the most important and serious question raised by the defendant is as to the action of the Court in permitting the prosecuting attorney, over the objection of the defendant, to call various witnesses and to propound to them this question: "Do you know the general reputation of the defendant for peace and quietness or turbulence and violence in the neighborhood where he lives?"

1. In this State, from a very early period, it has been the uniform rule of decisions that the character of a defendant, charged with a criminal offense, cannot be assailed by the State until the accused has offered proof as to his character, or, in other words, put his character in issue. (State v. Creson, 38 Mo. 372; State v. Martin, 74 Mo. 547; State v. Palmer, 88 Mo. 568; State v. Hart, 66 Mo. 208; State v. Hudspeth, 159 Mo. 178.) And this is the general doctrine announced by trustworthy commentators on Criminal Law. (Wharton's Criminal Evidence, 9th Ed., § 64, and cases cited; 3 Greenleaf's Evidence, § 25; State v. Hull, 20 L. R. A. 609, and cases collated in the note.) The Criminal Court, however, admitted this evidence on the ground that the defendant had offered himself as a witness and, having done so, he occupied the position of any other witness, and was liable to be cross-examined as to any matter pertinent to the issue and might be contradicted and impeached as any other witness, and subjected to the same tests.

At a very early day in the judicial history of this State and before the defendant was permitted to testify in his own behalf, it was held, in State v. Shields, 13 Mo. 236, that for the purpose of discrediting a witness, the opposite party is not restricted to inquiring into the general reputation of such witness for truth and veracity, but may inquire as to the witness's moral character generally. NAPTON, J., speaking for the Court, said:

"It seems to be a better and more settled opinion, in discrediting a witness, a party is not restricted to inquiries into the character of the witness for veracity. A bad moral character generally, or a depravity not necessarily allied to a want of truth, may yet to some extent shake the credibility of the witness, and, therefore, is a fair subject of investigation. The questions propounded in this case were proper, although they must necessarily, to have had any sensible impression upon the case, been followed by others eliciting the opinion of the witness upon the effect which the general or specific moral depravity spoken of, had upon the credibility of the witness attacked. The entire exclusion of the question seems to have proceeded upon the ground that general bad character was inadmissible, unless it was general bad character for truth and veracity." (Day v. State, 13 Mo. 422.)

The doctrine thus announced has been followed in this State from that day until the present. . . . The last announcement on this subject is in State v. Pollard, 174 Mo. 607, in which Judge FOX said:

"We will say in respect to this complaint, that the learned trial judge accepted and followed the rule adopted by a long line of decisions in this State, commencing with the case of State v. Shields, and followed in the cases (citing all the cases hereinbefore referred to). These cases announce the rule as to the impeachment of witnesses, that the inquiry need not be confined to the trait of character in issue, but may be extended to general moral character. In view of the long and uniform adherence as announced in the cases quoted, and as this only constitutes one division of this Court, I will not undertake to overrule the doctrine thus announced, but will say for myself, that the rule upon the impeachment of witnesses should be restricted to the trait of character directly involved, that of truth and veracity."

Thus we have two well-defined rules of law which apparently conflict. When a defendant, under statutes like ours, is permitted to testify, and he avails himself of his privilege, it is at once obvious that he occupies a dual position, that of witness and accused. . . . The proof of character offered as a defense to a charge of crime and evidence rebutting such character must be such as bears analogy and reference to the nature of the charge on which the defendant is being tried. (1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 59, and cases cited in note.) The ground upon which such testimony is admissible is that good character tends to lessen the probability of guilt. . . . On the other hand, the defendant in his character as a witness is not entitled to offer his good character in evidence to corroborate his testimony until it has been attacked by the State. (2 Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 891, 1104.)

The difficulty arising out of the foregoing rules, when a statute like ours permits a defendant in a criminal prosecution to testify in his own behalf, has been encountered by the Courts of last resort in many of the States, as it was by this Court in State v. Clinton, 67 Mo. 380. In Lockard v. Commonwealth, 87 Ky. 201, under a statute very similar to ours on this subject, the defendant testified in his own behalf, but offered no evidence as to his character. The Commonwealth then introduced several witnesses, who were, over the appellant's objection, permitted to testify that while they knew nothing of defendant's character for truthfulness, yet his general moral character was bad. In Kentucky, as in this State, it had been decided at an early day that evidence of the general moral character of a witness was admissible upon the ground, as was said in the case of Tacket v. May, 3 Dana 80, that "a witness whose moral character is bad, is not as credible as one whose moral character is good." HOLT, J., speaking for the whole Court, discussed the effect of the statute in view of the settled rule of decision in that State that the general bad character of any witness might be shown to impeach him. He met the objection urged by many law-writers and many able judges, that the impeachment of the general moral character of a defendant as a witness would affect him as a defendant, and would violate the rule that until he put his character in issue, the State could not assail it, and said, "When, however, the defendant becomes a witness, he voluntarily assumes another character," and . . . held that these considerations must prevail over the suggestion that if the general moral character of the accused, when he becomes a witness, can be assailed, it is in effect a violation of the rule that in a criminal case the defendant alone can put it in issue. . . .

2. Whatever may have been the differences in this Court as to whether certain specific traits of immorality affected the credibility of a witness, it is clear that the case of State v. Shields, 13 Mo. 236, which is the foundation for the rule that in impeaching a witness the inquiry may extend to his moral character generally, is predicted upon the ground that the loss of moral principle evidenced by the practice of a particular vice affects his credibility. But accepting this as the established rule, was it competent for the State to assail the defendant's character, before he placed his character in issue, by proving that he was a violent and turbulent man? As we have already seen, the Alabama Court, while adopting the rule that when a defendant offered himself as a witness he could be impeached by proving his general bad character for morality, yet rejected evidence in a homicide case of the character for violence or turbulence as casting no light on his credibility. It will be observed that the question propounded to the impeaching witnesses in this case did not involve his general reputation for truth and veracity, nor his general reputation for immorality, but was confined to the specific charge as to his reputation of being a violent and turbulent man. This evidence, we think, was not directed to the impeachment of the defendant in his character as a witness, but was direct evidence tending to impeach his character as a defendant only for turbulence and violence, when he had not put his character in issue. . . .

In our opinion, our esteemed brother of the Criminal Court erred in holding that a reputation for being violent and turbulent was tantamount to evidence of a reputation of general bad character and admissible to impeach the credibility of the defendant as a witness. . . . It seems clear to us that this evidence went directly to the character of the defendant as a defendant in the case and not to his credibility as a witness, and this being so, we must hold it was reversible error.

SUPREME COURT OF IOWA. 1879

52 Ia. 626; 3 N. W. 636

ACTION at law to recover for services rendered to defendant by plaintiff, who is a surgeon. There was a judgment for plaintiff, from which he appeals. The facts of the case appear in the opinion.

Holmes & Reynolds, for appellant. Kidder & Crooks, for appellee.

BECK, Ch. J. — 1. The petition declares upon an account for services rendered by plaintiff, as a surgeon, in reducing fractures of the bones of defendant's leg, the amputation of the thigh, and attendance until the defendant's recovery. The answer admits the services, but as a defense pleads that there was a difference between the parties as to the true and just amount of plaintiff's bill, and thereupon they had a settlement and plaintiff agreed to charge $250 for his services, which defendant then undertook to pay. . . . The defendant testified to the settlement as alleged in his answer; it was denied by plaintiff. It can hardly be said that defendant's testimony is corroborated, but the abstract does not purport to give all the evidence.

The plaintiff introduced a physician who testified that he had known the defendant from a time prior to the amputation of his limb. He was then asked to state the condition of defendant's mind as to memory before and after the injury; to state the effect of the injury upon the defendant's memory as to money and finances in particular, and to state whether, in the opinion of the witness, the mind of defendant was greatly impaired. The evidence, upon defendant's objection, was rejected. We think the ruling erroneous. Surely, if defendant was suffering from an impaired mind, which affected his memory, the fact would tend to lessen the credit to be given to his testimony. Can it be doubted that the credibility of a witness may be assailed by showing his want of mental capacity? It is said that the infirmity of memory should be shown by cross-examination. But it might not be made to appear in that way, though it really existed. The witness was a physician and knew the defendant before and after the injury and the condition of his mind as to memory. He was surely competent to state the fact of defendant's loss of memory, and in our judgment he was competent to state his opinion of the defendant's mental condition, based upon his knowledge and observation of the defendant before and after the injury. If in this way it should be made to appear that defendant's memory was impaired by disease, his credibility would be impeached.

Under familiar rules of the law the credibility of a witness may be impeached by showing moral defects. Mental defects in the witness, or loss or impairment of memory, will, according to the observation of all men, detract from the credibility otherwise due a witness, just as surely as do moral defects. It is not reasonable to hold that the law will permit impeachment of a witness by showing the moral defects of his character, and will not permit impeachment by proof of defects of memory caused by diseases of the body or mind. Under the rules of evidence, and statutes of this State, a witness may be impeached by proof of his bad moral character, and that his reputation for veracity is so low that he cannot be believed under oath. The impeaching witness states his conclusions, belief or opinions, based upon knowledge of the character and reputation of the witness whose credibility is brought in question. The like course was proposed in this case, to impeach the defendant by showing his mental defects. The testimony excluded was of the conclusion, belief and opinion of the witness, based upon knowledge that defendant's memory was impaired by disease affecting the mind.

It is proper to say that the rule we recognize extends no farther than to permit the impeachment of a witness by showing an abnormal condition of the mind caused by disease, or habits which impair the memory. It will not permit evidence of the want of strength or accuracy of memory of a witness whose mind is not shown to be in an abnormal condition. While it is true that the memories of men of sound physical and mental health are not equally strong and accurate, or they are unequal in other faculties of the mind and in physical development, the law can devise no standard of measurement or test of the mind in its normal condition. It cannot be compared with the mind of others in order to impeach or support the memory. . . .

For the error in excluding the evidence offered by plaintiff, the judgment of the District Court is reversed.

Seevers, J. — I concur in the result reached in the foregoing opinion, but as I understand it goes further than I am willing to go. That evidence is admissible to show that the mind or memory of a witness has become impaired or abnormal by reason of disease I think is true, and this in substance the plaintiff offered to show; but he went farther and by another question offered to show the "effect of the injury upon defendant's memory, as to money and finances in particular." This was not in my judgment admissible. The impaired or abnormal condition of the mind being shown, the effect was for the jury to determine.

202. Rookwood's Trial. (1696. Howell's State Trials, XIII, 209). Sir B. Shower (for the defendant): We will call some other witnesses to Mr. Porter's [the chief witness for the Crown] reputation and behavior; we think they will prove things as bad as an attainder. . . .

L. C. J. Holt. — You must tell us what you call them to.

Sir B. Shower. — Why, then, my lord, if robbing upon the highway, if clipping, if conversing with clippers, if fornication, if buggery, if any of these irregularities will take off the credit of a man, I have instructions in my brief of evidence of crimes of this nature and to this purpose against Mr. Porter; and we hope that by law a prisoner standing for his life is at liberty to give an account of the actions and behavior of the witnesses against him. I know the objection that Mr. Attorney [-General] makes, — that a witness does not come prepared to vindicate and give an account of every action of his life, and it is not commonly allowed to give evidence of particular actions. But if those actions be repeated, and a man lives in the practice of them, and this practice is continued for several years, and this be made out by evidence, we hope that no jury that have any conscience will upon their oaths give any credit to the evidence of a person against whom such a testimony is given. . . .

Mr. Attorney-General Trevor. — My lord, they themselves know that this sort of evidence never was admitted in any case, nor can be, for it must tend to the overthrow of all justice and legal proceedings; for, instead of trying the prisoner at the bar, they would try Mr. Porter. It has been always denied, where it comes to a particular crime that a man may be prosecuted for; and this, it seems, is not one crime or two, but so many and so long continued, as they say, and so often practised, that here are the whole actions of a man's life to be ripped up; which they can never show any precedent when it was permitted, because a man has no opportunity to defend himself. Any man in the world may by this means be wounded in his reputation, and crimes laid to his charge that he never thought of, and he can have no opportunity of giving an answer to it, because he never imagined there would be any such objection. It is killing a man in his good name by a side-wound, against which he has no protection or defence.

Sir B. Shower. — My lord, . . . we conceive, with submission, we may be admitted in this case to offer what we have offered. Suppose a man be a common, lewd, disorderly fellow, one that frequently swears to falsehood for his life. We know it is a common rule in point of evidence that against a witness you shall only give an account of his character at large, of his general conversation. But that general conversation arises from particular actions; and if the witnesses give you an account of such disorderly actions repeated, we hope that will go to his discredit; which is that we are now laboring for.

L. C. J. Holt. — Look ye, you may bring witnesses to give an account of the general tenor of his conversation; but you do not think sure that we will try now at this time whether he be guilty of robbery or buggery.

203. Layer's Trial. (1722. Howell's State Trials, XVI, 246, 256). Mr. Hungerford [on being stopped by the Court, when offering testimony to various misdeeds of another witness]. If my brief be true, the whole Ten Commandments have been broken by him.

L. C. J. Pratt. — Very well, and so you charge him with the breach of the Ten Commandments, and he must let it go for fact, because he cannot have an opportunity of defending himself! . . . [Later, forbidding a similar offer] you have been so often admonished by the Court, but it signifies nothing. You are charging Mrs. Mason with being a bawd, when you ought only to inquire as to her general character. . . . At this rate the most innocent persons may be branded as the most infamous villains, and it is impossible for them to defend themselves.

204. Watson's Trial. (1817. Howell's State Trials, XXXII, 1, 486). [One Castle had been a principal witness for the Crown. The defence now proposed to call a witness to show Castle to have lived in bigamy. This was objected to.]

Wetherell and Copley, for defendant, argued "that a man might be able to prove that a witness was not to be believed upon oath, by showing that he had been guilty of a number of criminal acts, although he could not produce a single record of conviction; that since it might be proved indirectly that the witness is not credible upon oath, it was too strong a proposition to say that the same conclusion might not be proved directly by actual proof of accumulated crimes which demonstrated the infamy of the witness; . . . that the consequences would be enormous and alarming to the administration of justice, if such evidence were to be shut out; a witness who had committed a multitude of crimes, but who had not been convicted of one, would stand as a fair and credible witness in a court of justice.

Ellenborough, L. C. J. — This is so clear a point and so entirely without a precedent that it would be a waste of time to call for a reply. . . . The Court does not sit for the purpose of examining into collateral crimes. It would be unjust to permit it, for it would be impossible that the party should be ready to exculpate himself by bringing forward evidence in answer to the charge; there would be no possibility of a fair and competent trial upon the subject, and therefore it is never done.

Bayley, J. — If this evidence were admissible, it would be impossible to proceed in the administration of justice, because on every trial the Court would have to try one hundred different issues, and juries, instead of having one issue to try, would have their attention withdrawn from one single point to look into an indefinite number of crimes. The rule is that a party against whom a witness is called may examine witnesses as to his general character, but he is not allowed to prove particular facts in order to discredit him, . . . for although every man be supposed to be capable of defending his general character, he cannot come prepared to defend himself against particular charges without notice. . . . If the witness were apprised of the charges, he might come prepared with evidence to show that, although there was prima facie evidence against him, they were in reality unfounded.

205. PEOPLE v. JACKSON

SUPREME COURT OF NEW YORK. 1857

3 Parker Cr. C. 391

INDICTMENT for rape. This was a certiorari to the Kings Oyer and Terminer, in which court the prisoner had been convicted, before S. B. STRONG, one of the justices of this Court, and Samuel D. MORRIS, county judge, and the justices of the Sessions. . . . The jury found the prisoner guilty.

John G. Schumaker (District Attorney), for the People. . . . Alexander Hadden, for the prisoner. . . .

By the Court, S. B. STRONG, J. — The defendant was tried at the Court of Oyer and Terminer held in the county of Kings on an indictment against him and another for a rape upon Catharine Sullivan. The trial occupied eight days, and resulted in his conviction. The complainant was asked, on her cross-examination by the counsel for the accused, whether upon her passage from Liverpool to New York, previous to the alleged outrage, she had illicit intercourse with a fellow passenger; to which she answered unhesitatingly that she had not. Subsequently the counsel for the accused offered to prove by another witness particular acts of such illicit sexual intercourse between the complainant and the same passenger during such voyage. The district attorney objected to the admission of the proposed evidence; and the Court decided that the defendant might prove the general bad character of the prosecutrix for chastity, but that evidence of particular acts of unchaste conduct by her, with any person other than the accused, at any period previous to their intercourse, was inadmissible, and rejected the evidence as to such alleged acts offered in behalf of the accused, to which his counsel excepted. The only question raised by the bill of exceptions is whether this rejection of the proposed evidence was proper. . . .

Generally the conduct of a witness in matters disconnected from the subject of the trial, being irrelevant, cannot be given in evidence. The objections to admitting such evidence are, that it raises collateral issues, and that the party against whom it may be offered would generally be taken by surprise, and not be prepared to meet it. It is very desirable that the inquiries upon a trial should be confined to the issues actually joined between the parties. They attend to try those only; the attention of the jury is or should be exclusively directed to them, and not adverted to other and irrelevant matters which have a tendency to confuse their minds, and an investigation into collateral matters would protract issues into inconvenient and intolerable length. . . .

If there should be anything to require the rejection of the proposed evidence, or to diminish the force of what is actually adduced, it may be proved, provided it does not raise or tender a collateral issue. Thus it may be proved that a proposed witness has been convicted of an infamous offence by producing the record. That raises no collateral issue of fact, as the record is conclusive, and there can be no further inquiry. But it is not competent to prove that the witness has in fact committed a crime, if he has not been convicted, — although the actual perpetration of the crime is what renders him unworthy of belief. That, if permitted, might raise a collateral issue for trial. So, too, a witness may be asked if he has not perpetrated some offence, or been guilty of some moral obliquity, which would if true impair the weight of his evidence. He may indeed refuse to answer whether he has been guilty of an act which would render him liable to an indictment or a prosecution for a penalty, or of any act disconnected with the main transaction which would have a tendency to degrade him. But he may confess either, at his option, and the evidence would be admissible. That would not, however, raise any issue for trial, as whatsoever his answer might be the party asking the question could not controvert it. . . .

There can be no doubt but that, in ordinary cases, an inquiry, addressed to any other than the assailed witness, as to any particular act derogatory to his character, or as to any specific blemish in his reputation, should be excluded.

It was contended on the argument, however, that the rule had been relaxed in reference to the testimony of the prosecution in trials for rape, and in such cases the door had been opened sufficiently wide to admit the evidence offered and rejected in the Court below. It is certainly right that the testimony of the female preferring the complaint should be subjected to the strictest scrutiny compatible with the due administration of justice; she is a necessary and generally the sole witness of the transaction. Experience has shown that the charge is frequently unfounded and instituted from impure motives. . . . They are permitted to prove that the general character of the prosecutrix for chastity is bad, or that she had previously had sexual intercourse with the accused. In either case, the probability of any considerable resistance would be very slight. . . . But the reasons for the admission and against the rejection of evidence as to the general character of the prosecutrix for chastity, and her illicit previous intercourse with the accused, are inapplicable to the proof of sexual intercourse between her and another, which was offered and rejected in this case. . . . If proof of particular instances should be admissible, rebutting evidence would be allowable, and thus there might be one or more collateral issues to occupy the time and divert the attention of the jury. Such would be the evils if the prosecution could require previous and timely notice of the particulars of the intended attack upon the conduct of the complainant; but as no such notice can be exacted, there would be no means of meeting the evidence, often of the dissolute companions of the accused, however mistaken or corrupt it might be, and thus the character of an innocent and greatly abused female might be sacrificed, and the ends of public justice be defeated. The weight of authority is decidedly against the admissibility of such evidence. . . .

As the proffered evidence in this case was properly rejected, the motion for a new trial must be denied, and the record must be remitted to the Court of Oyer and Terminer, with instructions to sentence the defendant conformably to his conviction. Proceedings affirmed.

206. Lord Castlemaine's Trial. (1680. Howell's State Trials, VII, 1082). [Treason.]

Att. Gen. — Swear Mr. Dangerfield.

Pris. — Pray stay.

L. C. J. Scroggs. — Why so?

Pris. — Here I am a prisoner, my lords, and submit it to your lordships, whether or no Mr. Dangerfield, who hath had the censure of this Court, may be a witness? Whether or no counsel shall show reasons to your lordships, whether he may speak or no?

Justice Jones. — You must show your exceptions that you have against him.

Pris. — My exception is this: that he was convicted of felony, that he broke prison, and was outlawed upon it. Besides this, my lord, he is a stigmatick, hath stood in the pillory, and was burnt in the hand. . . .

Just. Jones. — When was he outlawed?

Att. Gen. — In the 27th year of the King, and we say he hath a pardon in the 30th year of the King. . . . (A record produced.)

Att. Gen. — That record we confess; show the pardon, show the pardon. . . . (The pardon read: "Decimo tertio die Januarii, Anno Regni, &c.") . . .

L. C. J. — Now you see, my lord, you think Dangerfield ought not to be a witness, who hath gone through so many punishments, outlawed for felony, and burnt in the hand for felony: Mr. Attorney makes answer, We have a pardon, and by that he is restored, as he says, to be a witness again. . . . If so be that you should insist upon it, and he be capable of being a witness, supposing it so, yet I must say you may give in the evidence of every record of the conviction of any sort of crimes he hath been guilty of, and they shall be read. They say last day there were sixteen; if there were an hundred they should be read against him, and they shall all go to invalidate any credit that is to be given to anything he shall swear.

Pris. — My lord, I humbly submit myself to your lordship, sixteen we have, I bring but six, you shall have them, Mr. Attorney, when you please. . . .

L. C. J. — What think you, Mr. Attorney, if a man be convicted of felony, and afterwards hath a general pardon, is he a witness?

Att. Gen. — Yes truly, my lord, it signifies the same thing, my lord, as to be a free man again. . . .

Recorder. — My lord Hobart says, A pardon takes away the guilt.

L. C. J. — It takes away guilt so far as he shall never be questioned; but it does not set a man as if he had never offended. It cannot in reason be said, a man guilty of perjury is as innocent as if he had never been perjured. . . .

Att. Gen. — My lord, if you please, Mr. Dangerfield may be sworn, if your lordship pleases.

L. C. J. — My lord shall have the benefit of excepting against his credibility. . . .

Att. Gen. — If it restore him to his credit, I hope it shall not blemish him so much when he is sworn, that he shall not be believed.

L. C. J. — We will not have any prepossession in that case, his crimes shall be all taken notice of; is it fit to have men guilty of all sorts of villanies, and not to observe it?

208. KOCH v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN. 1906

126 Wis. 470; 106 N. W. 531

ERROR to review a judgment of the Municipal Court of Milwaukee County; A. C. BRAZEE, Judge. Reversed. Plaintiff in error was tried jointly with one Meyers upon an information for robbery and larceny from the person under § 4378, Stats. 1898. From which judgment and conviction plaintiff in error sued out his writ of error.

W. B. Rubin, for the plaintiff in error.

For the defendant in error there was a brief by the Attorney-General and A. C. Titus, assistant attorney-general, and oral argument by Mr. Titus.

KERWIN, J. — The errors assigned raise the following questions for review: First, the exclusion of testimony. . . .

The State produced as a witness one Kanter, who testified to facts tending to connect plaintiff in error with the crime charged. On cross-examination he was asked the following question: "Have you ever been arrested and convicted of being drunk and disorderly?" The question was objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and the objection sustained, and this ruling is assigned as error. It is contended that the evidence sought to be adduced was proper under § 4073, Stats. 1898. . . . § 4073 provides that a person who has been convicted of a criminal offense is, notwithstanding, a competent witness, but the conviction may be proved to affect his credibility, either by the record or his own cross-examination. . . . § 1561 makes it a criminal offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any person to be found in any public place in such state of intoxication as to disturb others, or unable, by reason of his condition, to care for his own safety or the safety of others. . . .

1. At common law it was only convictions of crimes which rendered the person infamous that excluded him from being a witness, and it was regarded a point of no small difficulty to determine precisely the crime which rendered the perpetrator thus infamous. It was the infamy of the crime, not the nature or mode of punishment, that rendered the witness incompetent. 1 Greenleaf Evidence (16th ed.) §§ 372, 373; Bartholomew v. People, 104 Ill. 601; State v. Taylor, 98 Mo. 240. The rule of the common law, however, has been regulated by legislative enactment. In England, by statute, "a witness may be questioned as to whether he has been convicted of any felony or misdemeanor." 3 Taylor, Evidence, § 1437. Statutes exist in many of the States regulating the subject. In some States such statutes have been held to remove the common-law disability and permit proof of former conviction of infamous crimes only to affect credibility (Card v. Foot, 57 Conn. 427; Bartholomew v. People, supra; Coble v. State, 31 Ohio St. 100); while in other States statutes providing that a party who has been convicted of a criminal offense may testify, but that the conviction may be proved to affect his credibility, apply to misdemeanors as well as felonies. In New York, under a statute quite similar to ours, it is held that the statute was intended to establish a uniform rule and permit the conviction of a witness of any crime to be proved, and allow the effect of such conviction upon his credibility to be passed upon by the jury. People v. Burns, 33 Hun 296. The same rule has been held in other States. In State v. Sauer, 42 Minn. 258, it is said: "From the earliest legislation in this State, all felonies and all misdemeanors have been denominated as 'crimes,'" and it is held that the conviction of any crime may be received to affect the weight of the witness's testimony. In Massachusetts, under a statute providing that "conviction of any crime may be shown to affect the credibility of any person testifying," it was held that the statute applied to any crime, and it is said: "It is obvious that some offenses that are not felonies may affect one's credibility much more than some felonies." See Comm. v. Hall, 4 Allen 305; Comm. v. Ford, 146 Mass. 131; Arhart v. Stark, 27 N. Y. Supp. 301.

Our statute on this subject (§ 4073) provides:

"A person who has been convicted of a criminal offense is, notwithstanding, a competent witness, but the conviction may be proved to affect his credibility, either by the record or by his own cross-examination, upon which he must answer any question relevant to that inquiry, and the party cross-examining him is not concluded by his answer." Under a similar statute in Missouri, the Court holds that the term "criminal offense," as used in the statute, includes both felonies and misdemeanors, and that evidence tending to show that witnesses had been convicted of misdemeanors was competent as affecting their credibility. State v. Blitz, 171 Mo. 530. We think it clear, therefore, that "criminal offenses," within the meaning of § 4073, Stats. 1898, includes a misdemeanor. Stoltman v. Lake, 124 Wis. 462; In re Bergin, 31 Wis. 383; State v. Blitz, supra; Comm. v. Ford, supra; State v. Sauer, supra; People v. Burns, supra.

2. But the question arises here whether a conviction under a city ordinance is a criminal offense within the meaning of § 4073. § 2598 defines a criminal action as one prosecuted by the State as a party against a person charged with a public offense. A crime or misdemeanor is defined to be "an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either prohibiting or commanding it." 4 Bl. Com. 5; In re Bergin, 31 Wis. 383. . . . It has been held in New York, under a statute providing that a person who has been convicted of a crime or misdemeanor is, notwithstanding, a competent witness, but the conviction may be proved for the purpose of affecting the weight of his testimony, either by the record or upon cross-examination, that a conviction under a city ordinance was not a conviction of a misdemeanor within the meaning of the statute. Arhart v. Stark, supra. See, also, on this proposition, Stoltman v. Lake, supra; Coble v. State, 31 Ohio St. 100; Williams v. Augusta, 4 Ga. 509; Madison v. Horner, 15 S. D. 359; Davenport v. Bird, 34 Iowa 524; Brookville v. Gagle, 73 Ind. 117; Kansas v. Clark, 68 Mo. 588; Byers v. Comm. 42 Pa. St. 89; Wiggins v. Chicago, 68 Ill. 372. . . . We are therefore forced to the conclusion, upon principle and authority, that the term "criminal offense," within the meaning of § 4073, Stats. 1898, includes misdemeanors as well as felonies, but that conviction under a municipal ordinance is not a conviction of a criminal offense within the meaning of such statute. . . .

It is contended by counsel for the State that the offense sought to be proved by the question to this witness is not a criminal offense under § 4073, Rev. St. 1898, because not made such in localities where there is a municipal ordinance or regulation for the punishment of drunkenness, and that in the city of Milwaukee such offense is so punishable. We have discovered no evidence in the record to the effect that there is any ordinance or regulation upon the subject in the city of Milwaukee, nor is the question confined to the commission of a criminal offense in the city of Milwaukee. So far as appears from the record and the form of the question asked, the criminal offense sought to be proved may as well have been committed in any other locality as in the city of Milwaukee, and obviously may have reference to the commission of an offense some place within the State of Wisconsin where there was no municipal ordinance or regulation respecting the matter. § 1561 being in force in all parts of the State, and the question not being confined to any locality, it must be deemed to have reference to a locality where no municipal ordinance or regulation had been passed. . . .

It follows, therefore, that the Court erred in excluding evidence on cross-examination, in permitting the verdict to be amended, and in denying the motion for new trial.

By the Court. — Judgment of the Court below is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

209. Oxier v. United States. (1896. Indian Territory. 1 Ind. T. 85, 38 S. W. 331). Lewis, J. There is a clear distinction recognized by the authorities cited above, between impeaching a witness by proof of facts which discredit him, made independently of his examination, and by proof of the same facts elicited in his cross-examination. Proof of particular facts tending to impair his credibility, made independently of his own examination, is excluded for the reason that its admission would engender a multiplicity of collateral issues, and would frequently surprise a witness with matter which he could not be prepared to disprove. But these reasons do not apply to his cross-examination as to the same facts, because the witness, better than any one else, can explain the impeaching matter, and protect himself to the extent that explanation will protect him; the cross-examining party being bound by his replies. . . .

210. R. v. Castro, alias Tichborne. (1873. 32d day, Kenealy's ed., I, 396, Report of the Charge, II, 720, 722). [Lord B., who had testified to the tattoo-marks on Roger Tichborne, was cross-examined.] Dr. Kenealy, counsel for defendant: Did you play a practical joke [on Captain H.]? . . .

L. C. J. Cockburn. — It may be a practical joke of such a nature that the jury would disbelieve the evidence on his oath, on its being made known to them. We must leave that to the discretion of Dr. Kenealy. . . .

Dr. Kenealy. — It was not a practical joke. Did you take away his wife?

Lord B. — I cannot answer that question. . . .

Dr. Kenealy. — Did you seduce his wife and make her elope from her husband? . . . I am sorry to have to ask my lord to tell you you must answer it.

L. C. J. Cockburn. — I certainly shall not.

Dr. Kenealy. — Indeed you must, my lord! It goes to the witness' credit. I must have it answered, my lord. . . .

L. C. J. Cockburn. — I am afraid, if the question is pressed, you [the witness] must answer it. It is one of the consequences of being brought into a court of justice as a witness that whatever he has done may be brought up against him.

[Upon charging the jury, L. C. J. Cockburn adverted to this examination as follows]: Lord B. has committed a wofully sad sin; . . . another man's wife left her husband and joined him, and they have lived together. . . . [Counsel] asks you deliberately to come to the conclusion that because of this offense Lord B. is not to be believed upon his oath, — nay, more, that you must assume him to be perjured. Is that, do you think, a view that you can properly adopt? Is it because a man has committed a breach of morality, however flagrant, that those to whom his testimony may be important in a court of justice are to be deprived of it? . . . There are crimes and offenses which savor so much of falsehood and fraud that they do go legitimately to the credit of witnesses. There are offenses of a different character, and grievous offenses if you will, but which do not touch that particular part of a man's moral organization — if I may use the phrase — which involves truth; and there is an essential distinction between this species of fault and those things which go to the very roof of honesty, integrity, and truth, and so do unfortunately disentitle witnesses to belief.

211. BUEL v. STATE

104 Wis. 132; 80 N. W. 78

THE accused was charged with the murder of one Nelson, a companion who had in his possession at the time a sum of money. The further facts of the supposed homicide are stated more fully in No. 518, post.

Error to review a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sawyer County; JOHN K. PARISH, Circuit Judge. Reversed.

The Court against objection permitted the prosecuting attorney on cross-examination to ask the accused these questions: "Did you have any trouble with any man there in that house while you were there?" "Do you remember of making an assault upon a man there and breaking his arm?" "Did you kill a man at Ord, Nebraska?" "Did you kill two men at Ord, Nebraska?" "State the trouble you had at Ord that caused you to leave there?" "Did the insurance company give you any reason for not giving you the insurance money?" referring to the insurance on a house belonging to the accused which was burned. "Did you ever have any talk with any of them that the reason they would not pay it was that you burned the house yourself?" "What was the insurance on the house?" To the last question the accused answered $200, and to each of the others he gave a negative answer. The Court frequently cautioned him that he need not make answers to any question that would tend to incriminate him.

For the plaintiff in error there was a brief by J. B. Alexander, attorney, and V. W. James, of counsel, and oral argument by Mr. Alexander.

For the defendant in error there was a brief by the Attorney-General, and oral argument by C. E. Buell, first assistant attorney-general.

MARSHALL, J. (after stating the case as above). . . . It is argued in support of the conduct of the trial at this point, that on cross-examination the previous life and character of the witness, especially when he is a party, may be inquired into to such an extent as in the sound judgment of the trial Court may seem proper. Such is undoubtedly the settled rule, and it is resorted to generally where the person accused of crime offers himself as a witness in his own behalf. There is no rule by which the exercise of that discretionary power of the Court can be guarded with exactness. The range is necessarily broad in order to fit the facts of particular cases, but there is a limit beyond which it cannot go. That limit is clearly reached and passed when questions are asked, manifestly, for the mere purpose of creating prejudice in the minds of the jurors, or the examination is carried on to such an extent and in such a manner as to become oppressive, and is not warranted by anything in the case. Questions as to previous convictions of criminal offenses, or serving terms in prison or in jail from which convictions will be presumed, are uniformly permitted when the instances are not too remote, upon the theory that a person of that character will not be as likely to testify truthfully as a man whose life has not been thus blackened. Our statute (§ 4073, Stats. 1898) expressly allows that kind of cross-examination. Questions relating to mere criminal charges, or acts which might be the foundation for criminal prosecutions, are usually rejected. They should not be permitted unless there are circumstances in the case suggesting that justice will or may be promoted thereby.

It would be a clear abuse of judicial discretion to permit such questions where the indications are plain that the purpose is not to bring out the truth in regard to the witness's life and character, and to thereby discredit his testimony, but for the purpose of discrediting the witness regardless of whether there is any warrant for the questions or not, and if he be a party, in that way to influence the minds of the jurors into a verdict against him. The administration of justice requires that trial Courts shall not have their discretionary powers circumscribed by any very narrow boundaries, but does require that such limit shall be placed upon them as will prevent any mere prejudice to be built up in the course of a trial, especially in an important case like this, which will tend to influence a jury to determine the facts otherwise than from the legitimate evidence produced in Court. It seems clear that such limit was passed in allowing the cross-examination in question, to the extent to which it was carried. It is one thing to honestly ask questions on cross-examination for the purpose of discrediting a witness, and quite another to ask questions of a witness who is a party, especially in a serious criminal case, for the purpose of injuring his cause in the eyes of the jury, and leading them to believe he was likely, because of his bad character, to have committed the offense charged.

A reading of the questions under consideration leads to the irresistible conclusion that no idea was entertained by the cross-examiner that proof would be elicited of the matters implied by them. We say "implied"; because the asking of the direct questions in the manner in which they were asked implied to some degree that the examiner was possessed of information upon which the questions were based; and although the answers were in the negative, the bad effect of the insinuations thrown out by the questions was not and could not have been removed entirely from the minds of the jurors. . . . The general rule, that the previous life and character of a witness can be inquired into, must be preserved, and the broad discretionary power of trial Courts in administering such rule fully recognized. The trouble here is that the cross-examination was allowed to be carried on manifestly without any reason except to create prejudice against the accused in the minds of the jurors. It was well calculated to have that effect and to bear materially on the ultimate result, especially since the whole case rested on circumstantial evidence.

It is clearly reversible error, that cannot be overlooked without lowering the standard of justice which it is the duty of the Court to rigorously maintain.

212. PEOPLE v. CRANDALL

SUPREME COURT OF CALIFORNIA. 1899

125 Cal. 129; 57 Pac. 785

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and from an order denying a new trial. B. N. SMITH, Judge. The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. H. Shinn, and Earl Rogers, for appellant. W. F. Fitzgerald, Attorney-General, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. — The defendant was tried upon a charge of murder and convicted of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. . . .

The defendant's wife was called as a witness and gave important evidence in his behalf. On cross-examination, for the avowed purpose of impeaching her, the district attorney, against continuous objection and protest on the part of the defendant, was allowed to ask a series of questions which, if answered affirmatively, would disgrace and degrade the witness. They were all wholly collateral and outside the issues in the case, and did not refer to the relation of the witness to the parties, to the subject of the action, or to the previous testimony of the witness. The asking of the questions implied, at least, an assertion of a belief on the part of the attorney that the witness had been guilty of gross immorality. It is charged by the defense that the questions were not asked for the purpose of getting before the jury the testimony of the witness upon the subject of investigation, but to insinuate damaging charges against the witness, which, by the rules of evidence, neither the witness nor the party could rebut, save by the denials of the witness, whose credibility was affected by the insinuations. That this charge was well founded is proven beyond cavil by the record. She was asked by a great variety of questions if she did not live by prostitution. She was questioned in reference to particular times and places, and to particular men, and as to whether she did not practice special modes of solicitation for immoral purposes. To all these questions the witness answered in the negative.

The defendant's contention, that by the decisions in this State this line of cross-examination is not allowable, is correct. Sec. 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure says:

"A witness may be impeached, by the party against whom he was called, by contradictory evidence, or by evidence that his general reputation for truth, honesty or integrity is bad, but not by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown by the examination of the witness, or the record of the judgment, that he had been convicted of a felony."

In other States there is apparently a conflict of decisions upon the subject. (See Carroll v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. App. 431, 40 Am. St. Rep. 786, where the matter is discussed, and the cases cited.) But while there is a controversy as to whether such questions can be permitted, there is no difference in holding that when allowed the answer of the witness must be accepted as conclusive. In asking such questions the questioner takes that risk, and justly so, because under the rules of evidence no other witness can be allowed to testify upon the subject. . . . It has further been repeatedly held [in this State] that such collateral matters cannot be gone into, even upon cross-examination. Sec. 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure expressly forbids the impeachment of a witness "by evidence of particular wrongful acts." . . .

In the case under consideration, after the prosecuting officers had gone out of their way in putting such questions, which were negatively answered, and which answers under all rules are made conclusive of the facts, they proceeded in their argument to insinuate to the jury that the answers were not true. This demonstrated conclusively that the purpose of asking the improper questions was to make insinuations against the character of the witness, and not to impeach her testimony, and by this improper mode of procedure to prejudice the defendant. . . .

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

Garoutte, J., McFarland, J., and Harrison, J., concurred.

Temple, J., concurring. — I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Mr. Justice Van Dyke, except that I do not agree that questions irrelevant to the issues in a case, asked for the purpose of discrediting a witness, can never, in the discretion of the trial judge, be asked of a witness.

It is said that §§ 2051 and 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure prohibit such evidence. In express terms these sections certainly do not. It is stated that a witness may be impeached: 1. By contradictory evidence; 2. By evidence that his general reputation for honesty and integrity is bad; and 3. By proving inconsistent statements. Other modes of impeachment are not expressly prohibited, and ever since the existence of the statute other modes have been freely resorted to. . . . The statute has, in fact, never been treated as prohibiting other usual modes of impeachment. . . .

We all agree that a witness cannot be asked questions merely for the purpose of degrading him; and while there has been much controversy as to admissibility of such evidence, no one contends that a party has an absolute right to indulge in such examination. It is not permissible to go into the former life of a witness and unnecessarily drag to light ancient scandals. The matter is almost entirely within the discretion of the trial Court, and such examination should be permitted only when and so far as it seems to be required for the ends of justice. . . . Rice in his work on Evidence considers the question quite elaborately. He states the rule to be that: "Such questions should be allowed when there is reason to believe it may tend to promote the ends of justice; but they may be properly excluded when a disparaging course of examination seems unjust to the witness or uncalled for by the circumstances of the particular case." He cites the case of Great Western etc. Co. v. Loomis, 32 N. Y. 127, where the discretion of the trial Court is asserted [in the following language, by PORTER, J.:

"It has been understood, that the range of irrelevant inquiry, for the purpose of degrading a witness, was subject to the control of the presiding judge; who was bound to permit such inquiry, when it seemed to him, in the exercise of a sound discretion, that it would promote the ends of justice, and to exclude it, when it seemed unjust to the witness, and uncalled for by the circumstances of the case. The judgment now under review was rendered, on the assumption, that it is the absolute legal right of a litigant to assail the character of every adverse witness, to subject him to degrading inquiries, to make inquisition into his life, and drive him to take shelter under his privilege, or to self-vindication from unworthy imputations, wholly foreign to the issue on which he is called to testify. See Elliott v. Boyles, 31 Penn. St. 66–7.

"The practical effect of such a rule would be, to make every witness dependent on the forbearance of adverse counsel, for that protection from personal indignity which has been hitherto secured from the Courts, unless the circumstances of the particular case made collateral inquiries appropriate. This rule, if established, will be applicable to every tribunal having original jurisdiction. It will, perhaps, operate most oppressively in trials before inferior magistrates, where the parties appear in person, or are represented by those who are free from a sense of professional responsibility. But it may well be questioned, whether, even in our courts of record, it would be safe or wise, to withdraw the control of irrelevant inquiry from the judge, and commit it to the discretion of adverse counsel. The interposition of the Court has often been necessary to protect witnesses from the rigor of examinations, conducted on the supposition that they were entitled to such protection. When this power of protection is withdrawn, is it to be expected, that counsel, deeply enlisted for their clients, and zealous to maintain their rights, would feel bound to exercise toward witnesses a forbearance which the courts themselves refuse? . . . Few men of character, or women of honor, could suppress, even on the witness-stand, the spirit of just resentment, which such an examination, on points alien to the case, would naturally tend to arouse. The indignation with which sudden and unworthy imputations are repelled, often leads to injurious misconstruction. A question, which it is alike degrading to answer or decline to answer, should never be put, unless, in the judgment of the Court, it is likely to promote the end of justice. . . .

"Much confusion and conflict in the treatment of this subject is apparent in the English text-books, as well as our own. This is mainly due to the fact, that the question usually arises only at nisi prius. . . . The decisions in these, as in all other cases, resting in mere discretion, have been, of course, inharmonious, according to the views of different judges, and the varying circumstances of the cases in which the question was presented. The text-writers, as well as the judges, differ in their views as to the rules which should control the exercise of this discretion; some being predisposed in favor of the liberal allowance of irrelevant crimination, and others preferring the practice of rigid exclusion. . . . But when we reflect, that both authors, in what they wrote, had in view the existing practice of England, by which the limits of collateral examination were under the control of the presiding judge, the seeming conflict disappears, and their respective conclusions harmonize with each other, and with the cases on which they rest. It is entirely true, as affirmed by Roscoe, that inquiries on irrelevant topics, to discredit the witness, may be permitted on the trial, in the discretion of the judge; and equally true, as affirmed by Peake, that such inquiries may be excluded, without infringing any legal right of the parties."]

Nor do I admit that a different rule has been established here. Most of the cases cited have no bearing upon the general proposition. Of course, such examination is not allowable in every case. Where it is manifest, as in People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 462, and in People v. Un Dong, 106 Cal. 88, that the examination was not for the purpose of proving the immorality, but to prejudice by insulting questions, it should not be tolerated, and it would be error to permit it. . . .

213. STATE v. GREENBURG

Supreme Court of Kansas. 1898

59 Kan. 404; 53 Pac. 61

Appeal from Bourbon District Court. Walter L. Simons, Judge. Opinion filed May 7, 1898. Affirmed.

J. I. Sheppard, County Attorney, for the State. W. R. Biddle and Perry & Crain, for appellant.

Johnston, J. — Jacob Greenburg was convicted in the District Court of Bourbon County of feloniously receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen. The punishment imposed was imprisonment in the State Penitentiary for a period of two and one-half years. Upon this appeal he complains:

1. Of rulings made in the admission of testimony. The county attorney was a witness for the State and gave considerable testimony in narrative form, some of which may have been open to objection, but no objection thereto was made nor was any exception saved. Meyer Berkson, who testified in behalf of the defendant, was cross-examined as to his past life and conduct, with a view of impairing his credit, and, after he had stated that he had been under arrest, he was asked what he had been arrested for, when an objection was made that the record was the best evidence, and further that it was only a civil arrest. No other or more specific objection was made. The defendant went upon the witness-stand and testified in his own behalf. He stated in answer to an inquiry, without objection, that he had previously been under arrest in Fort Scott. When asked the cause for his arrest, an objection was made that it was a civil arrest and that his testimony was not the best evidence of it. These were the only objections made, and in both instances they were overruled. Each of the witnesses testified that he had been arrested several times upon charges of fraud.

Granting that the objections were sufficient to raise the question, the testimony was permissible under the rule which has long been recognized in this State. For the purpose of judging the character and credit of a witness, he may be cross-examined as to specific facts tending to disgrace or degrade him, although collateral to the main issue and touching on matters of record. Such questions are allowed when there is reason to believe that allowing them will tend to the ends of justice and they are asked for the purpose of honestly discrediting the witness. It is the duty of the Court to see that the rule is not abused or the cross-examination unreasonably extended. When the defendant became a witness in his own behalf he took the hazard of such questions, and could be subjected to the same tests and be discredited in the same way as any other witness. The State v. Pfefferle, 36 Kan. 90; The State v. Probasco, 46 id. 310; The State v. Wells, 54 id. 161; The State v. Park, 57 id. 431; Hanoff v. The State, 37 Ohio St. 178; Brandon v. The People, 42 N. Y. 265. . . .

The judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

Doster, C. J. (dissenting). — I dissent from the application of the first syllabus to the facts of this case. . . . As raising the question whether, for the purpose of judging of the character and credit of a witness, he may be asked if he had been formerly arrested. I have positive convictions that he cannot be so asked.

An arrest is nothing more than an accusation of crime or other act of turpitude. That it is made in the form of a forcible restraint of the person, based upon a sworn complaint, makes it, for purposes of disgrace or discredit, no stronger evidence of the truth of the accusation than an oral statement by the accuser would be. No one would contend that a witness could be asked whether another person had not orally accused him of crime. Why should the rule be different when the accusation has been written out and sworn to? It is but an accusation in each case. Why should it be different when the sworn accusation is followed by an arrest? The arrest is but a reassertion of the accusation in another form. It is quite different, however, when the accusation has been proved. When the proceeding has passed from accusation to conviction, evidence of the turpitude of the witness exists; — not what somebody said of him, but what the judicial tribunals sitting in judgment upon the accusation have found against him. He may be asked whether he has been convicted of crime; but he ought not to be asked whether he has been accused of crime. Conviction is evidence of his baseness. Accusation is only an insinuation against his character. Three of the four former decisions of this Court cited in the foregoing opinion of the majority were cases in which the admissibility of convictions, not accusations, was upheld. In the other one the witness was asked as to the fact of his commission of an offense. That, of course, was equally permissible as a question relating to conviction would be. There has been, therefore, up to this time, no rule upon the subject in this State; and in my judgment there are no well considered decisions in other States sustaining the majority opinion in this case.

214. Sir James Stephen. History of the Criminal Law. (1883. Vol. I, p. 433). The most difficult point as to cross-examination is the question how far a witness may be cross-examined to his credit by being asked about transactions irrelevant to the matter at issue, except so far as they tend to show that the witness is not to be believed upon his oath. No doubt such questions may be oppressive and odious. They may constitute a means of gratifying personal malice of the basest kind, and of deterring witnesess from coming forward to discharge a duty to the public. At the same time it is impossible to devise any rule for restricting the latitude which at present exists upon the subject, without doing cruel injustice. I have frequently known cases in which evidence of decisive importance was procured by asking people of apparent respectability questions which, when first put, appeared to be offensive and insulting in the highest degree. I remember a case in which a solicitor's clerk was indicted for embezzlement. His defence was that his employer had brought a false charge against him to conceal (I think) forgery committed by himself. The employer seemed so respectable and the prisoner so discreditable that the prisoner's counsel returned his brief rather than ask the questions suggested by his client. The prisoner thereupon asked the questions himself, and in a very few minutes satisfied every person in court that what he had suggested was true. . . . It is also to be remembered that cross-examination to credit may be conducted in very different ways. It is one thing to throw an insulting question coarsely and roughly in the face of a witness. It is quite another thing to follow up a point by questions justified by the circumstances. . . .

The most difficult cases of all are those in which the imputation is wek founded, but is so slightly connected with the matter in issue that its truth ought not to affect the credibility of the witness in reference to the matter on which he testifies. The fact that a woman had an illegitimate child at eighteen is hardly a reason for not believing her at forty, when she swears that she locked up her house safely when she went to bed at night, and found the kitchen window broken open and her husband's boots gone when she got up in the morning. Cases, however, may be imagined in which a real connection may be traced between acts of profligacy and a man's credibility on matters in no apparent way connected with them. Seduction and adultery usually involve as gross a breach of faith as perjury, and if a man claimed credit on any subject of importance, the fact that he had been convicted of perjury would tend to discredit him.

No general rule can be laid down in matters of this sort. All that can be said is that whilst the power of cross-examining to a witness's credit is essential to the administration of justice, it is of the highest importance that both judges and counsel should bear in mind the abuse to which it is liable, and should do their best not to ask, or permit to be asked, questions conveying reproaches upon character, except in cases in which there is a reasonable ground to believe that they are necessary.

The Same Author. Digest of the Law of Evidence, 3rd ed. Note XLVI to Article 129, Limits of Cross-examination. This article states a practice which is now common, and which never was more strikingly illustrated than in the case referred to in the illustration [R. v. Castro, ante, No. 210]. But the practice which it represents is modern; and I submit that it requires the qualification suggested in the text [i.e., that the Court has discretion to set limits]. I shall not believe, unless and until it is so decided upon solemn argument, that by the law of England a person who is called to prove a minor fact, not really disputed, in a case of little importance, thereby exposes himself to having every transaction of his past life, however private, inquired into by persons who may wish to serve the basest purposes of fraud or revenge by doing so. . . . If this is the law, it should be altered. The following section of the Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872) may perhaps be deserving of consideration. After authorising in § 147, questions as to the credit of the witness, the Act proceeds as follows, in § 148: —

"If any such question relates to a matter not relevant to the suit or proceeding, except so far as it affects the credit of the witness by injuring his character, the Court shall decide whether or not the witness shall be compelled to answer it, and may, if it thinks fit, warn the witness that he is not obliged to answer it. In exercising this discretion, the Court shall have regard to the following considerations:

"(1) Such questions are proper if they are of such a nature that the truth of the imputation conveyed by them would seriously affect the opinion of the Court as to the credibility of the witness on the matter to which he testifies.

"(2) Such questions are improper if the imputation which they convey relates to matters so remote in time or of such a character that the truth of the imputation would not affect, or would affect in a slight degree, the opinion of the Court as to the credibility of the witness on the matter to which he testifies.

"(3) Such questions are improper if there is a great disproportion between the importance of the imputation made against the witness's character and the importance of his evidence."

Order XXXVI., rule 38 [Rules of Court, 1883], expressly gives the judge a discretion which was much wanted, and which I believe he always possessed.

Sub-topic C. Contradiction and Self-Contradiction [1]

216. Whitebread's Trial. (1679. Howell's State Trials, VII, 311, 374). [The Popish Plot. The defendant offered to prove that the principal crown witness, Oates, had made a false statement as to his companions, in his testimony at a prior trial of one Ireland for the same Popish Plot.]

L. C. J. North. — That is nothing to the purpose. If you can contradict him in anything that hath been sworn here, do.

Defendant. — If we can prove him a perjured man at any time, we do our business.

L. C. J. North. — How can we prove one cause in another? . . . Can he come prepared to make good everything that he hath said in his life?

[1] For the principles of Logic and Psychology applicable to this topic, with copious further illustrations, see the present Compiler's "Principles of Proof" (1913), Nos. 314–355.

Another defendant. — All that I say is this, If he be not honest, he can be witness in no case.

L. C. J. North. — But how will you prove that? Come on, I will teach you a little logic. If you will come to contradict a witness, you ought to do it in a matter which is the present debate here; for if you would convict him of anything that he said in Ireland's trial, we must try Ireland's cause over again.

217. Earl of Castlemaine's Trial. (1680. Howell's State Trials, VII, 1067, 1101.) [Treason. The chief witness for the prosecution, Titus Oates, was cross-examined as to having said things about the accused's divorce, and witnesses were then called by the defendant to contradict his answers.] Attorney-General (objecting). If he may ask questions about such foreign matters as this, no man can justify himself; . . . any man may be catched thus. Defendant. How can a man be catched in the truth?

L. C. J. Scroggs. — We are not to hearken to it. The reason is this, first: You must have him perjured, and we are not now to try whether that thing sworn in another place be true or false; because that is the way to accuse whom you please, and that may make a man a liar that cannot imagine this will be put to him; and so no man's testimony that comes to be a witness shall leave himself safe.

218. ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. HITCHCOCK

1 Exch. 91

Information at the suit of the Attorney-General, which charged the defendant, a maltster, with having used a certain cistern for making malt without having previously entered it, as required by statute.

At the trial, before Pollock, C. B., a witness of the name of Spooner, who deposed to the fact of the cistern having been used by the defendant, was asked, on cross-examination by the defendant's counsel, whether he had not said that the officers of the Crown had offered him £20 to say that the cistern had been used. Spooner denied having said so, and thereupon the defendant's counsel proposed to ask another witness of the name of Cook, whether Spooner had not said so. The Attorney-General objected to this question, and the Lord Chief Baron, being of opinion that the question was irrelevant to the issue, and that it also tended to raise a collateral issue, held the objection good, and ruled that it could not be put.

Bovill obtained a rule for a new trial, on the ground that this evidence was improperly rejected, and cited Meagoe v. Simmons, 3 C. & P. 75, and Yewin's Case, 2 Campb. 638, note.

The Attorney-General (J. Wilde with him) showed cause. — This is a very important question, and one which is not directly affected by any decided cases; for such as are applicable to it, which are mere Nisi Prius decisions, cannot be said to lay down any definite principle or fixed rule by which this case can be governed. The principle upon which it must depend is correctly laid down in Phillipps on Evidence, where it is stated that "it is a general rule that a witness cannot be cross-examined as to any fact, which, if admitted, would be wholly collateral, and wholly irrelevant to the matters in issue, for the purpose of contradicting him by other evidence, and in this manner to discredit his testimony. And if the witness answer such an irrelevant question before it is disallowed or withdrawn, evidence cannot afterwards be admitted to contradict his testimony on the collateral matter. The point for consideration, therefore, is, what question, or what matter is wholly irrelevant?" 2 Phillipps on Evidence, 9th ed. p. 398. This is the correct rule, and the criterion of relevancy depends, as it is submitted, upon this, — Could the defendant substantially have proved, as a part of his own case, that the witness had said what was imputed to him by the question? . . .

Bovill, in support of the rule. — The evidence was improperly rejected. It was admissible to show the motives of the witness, and also to contradict his statements made upon oath, and thereby to show that he was guilty of perjury. A witness may be contradicted on any matter, provided it be not collateral to the subject of inquiry, and this is the only limitation. . . . The case of Spencely v. De Willot, 7 East 108, was a penal action for usury, where the defendant's counsel were not permitted to cross-examine as to other contracts made on the same day with other persons, in order to show that the contracts in question were of the same nature, and not usurious, if the witness answered one way, or to contradict him if he answered the other, — proceeds thus: — "And should such questions be answered, evidence cannot afterwards be adduced for the purpose of contradiction. The same rule obtains, if a question as to a collateral fact be put to a witness for the purpose of discrediting his testimony; his answer must be taken as conclusive, and no evidence can afterwards be admitted. This rule does not exclude the contradiction of the witness as to any facts immediately connected with the subject of the inquiry." . . . There must, no doubt, be some connection with the particular matter of inquiry, in order to give the power of contradicting the witness. Here the question is sufficiently connected, both with reference to the motives which influence and act upon the mind of the witness, and as impeaching his testimony on a point which is materially connected with the inquiry. The question in dispute is the use of the cistern, and this person being a witness to prove the use of it, and being on his trial as to his veracity on that subject, every expression uttered by him, as to its use, is not collateral, but is most materially connected with the matter in dispute. It is submitted, therefore, that for these reasons the evidence should have been received. . . . Yewin's Case is an authority to show that the witness is interested by some motive which may influence his testimony. In Lord Stafford's Case, 7 How. St. Tr. 1400, proof was admitted, on the part of the prisoner, that Dugdale, one of the witnesses for the prosecution, had endeavored to suborn witnesses to give false evidence. (POLLOCK, C. B. — If it had been sought to inquire from the witness Spooner whether he had offered a bribe to another witness, the cases would have been parallel. ALDERSON, B. — You endeavor to fix the corrupt state of mind upon the person to whom the offer is made, and not upon him who makes the offer. The offer, without the acceptance, is nothing, as regards the person to whom the offer is made.) It is not contended that the acceptance has any bearing on the present issue.

POLLOCK, C. B. — I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged; and I may also add, that my brother PARKE, expressed himself to be of that opinion before he left the Court. The question is, whether the witness Spooner, who had been asked if he had not said that the officer had offered him a bribe for the purpose of saying that the cistern had been used, and who stated that he had not said so, could be contradicted by asking the other witness, Cook, if Spooner had not made that statement to him? . . .

In this case it is admitted, that, with reference to the offering of a bribe, it could not originally have been proved that the offer of the bribe had been made to the witness to make a particular statement, the bribe not having been accepted by him. And the reason is, that it is totally irrelevant to the matter in issue, that some person should have thought fit to offer a bribe to the witness to give an untrue account of a transaction, and it is of no importance whatever, if that bribe was not accepted. It is no disparagement to a man that a bribe is offered to him: it may be a disparagement to the person who makes the offer. If, therefore, the witness is asked the fact, and denies it, or if he is asked whether he said so and so, and denies it, he cannot be contradicted as to what he has said. Lord Stafford's Case was totally different. There the witness himself had been implicated in offering a bribe to some other person. That immediately affected him, as proving that he had acted the part of a suborner for the purpose of perverting the truth.

My view has always been that the test whether the matter is collateral or not is this: If the answer of a witness is a matter which you would be allowed on your part to prove in evidence, if it have such a connection with the issue that you would be allowed to give it in evidence, then it is a matter on which you may contradict him. . . . I think the expression "as to any matters connected with the subject of inquiry" is far too vague and loose to be the foundation of any judicial decision. And I may say I am not at all prepared to adopt the proposition in those general terms, that a witness may be contradicted as to anything he denies having said, provided it be in any way connected with the subject before the jury. It must be connected with the issue as a matter capable of being distinctly given in evidence, or it must be so far connected with it as to be a matter which, if answered in a particular way, would contradict a part of the witness' testimony; and if it is neither the one nor the other of these, it is collateral to, though in some sense it may be considered as connected with, the subject of the inquiry. A distinction should be observed between those matters which may be given in evidence by way of contradiction as directly affecting the story of the witness touching the issue before the jury, and those matters which affect the motives, temper, and character of the witness, not with respect to his credit, but with reference to his feelings towards one party or the other. It is certainly allowable to ask a witness in what manner he stands affected toward the opposite party in the cause, and whether he does not stand in such a relation to that person as is likely to affect him and prevent him from having an unprejudiced state of mind, and whether he has not used expressions importing that he would be revenged on some one or that he would give such evidence as might dispose of the cause in one way or the other. If he denies that, you may give evidence as to what he said, — not with the view of having a direct effect on the issue, but to show what is the state of mind of that witness in order that the jury may exercise their opinion as to how far he is to be believed. But those cases, where you may show the condition of a witness or his connection with either of the parties, are not to be confounded with other cases where it is proposed to contradict a witness on some matter unconnected with the question at issue. . . .

Alderson, B. — The question is this, Can you ask a witness as to what he is supposed to have said on a previous occasion? You may ask him as to any fact material to the issue, and if he denies it you may prove that fact, as you are at liberty to prove any fact material to the issue. . . . The witness may also be asked as to his state of equal mind or impartiality between the two contending parties, — questions which would have a tendency to show that the whole of his statement is to be taken with a qualification, and that such a statement ought really to be laid out of the case for want of impartiality; [and these answers may be contradicted]. . . . Such, again, is the case of an offer of a bribe by a witness to another person, or the offer of a bribe accepted by a witness from another person; the circumstance of a witness having offered or accepted a bribe shows that he is not equal and impartial. . . . But with these exceptions I am not aware that you can with propriety permit a witness to be examined first and contradicted afterwards on a point which is merely and purely collateral. . . . Perhaps it ought to be received, but for the inconvenience that would arise from the witness being called upon to answer to particular acts of his life, which he might have been able to explain if he had had reasonable notice to do so, and to have shown that all the acts of his life had been perfectly correct and pure, although other witnesses were called to prove the contrary. The reason why a party is obliged to take the answer of a witness is, that if he were permitted to go into it, it is only justice to allow the witness to call other evidence in support of the testimony he has given, and as those witnesses might be cross-examined as to their conduct, such a course would be productive of endless collateral issues.

ROLFE, B. — I am of the same opinion. The laws of evidence on this subject as to what ought and what ought not to be received, must be considered as founded on a sort of comparative consideration of the time to be occupied in examinations of this nature, and the time which it is practicable to bestow upon them. If we lived for a thousand years instead of about sixty or seventy, and every case were of sufficient importance, it might be possible, and perhaps proper, to throw a light on matters in which every possible question might be suggested, for the purpose of seeing by such means whether the whole was unfounded, or what portion of it was not, and to raise every possible inquiry as to the truth of the statements made. But I do not see how that could be; in fact, mankind find it to be impossible. Therefore some line must be drawn. . . .

It is proposed to contradict the witness by showing, not that he had received a bribe, — not that he had said that he had received a bribe (which might have had a bearing on the bias of his mind,) — but by showing that, on some occasion, he had said he had been offered a bribe. If that were to be allowed, as my brother ALDERSON has pointed out, endless inquiries might be entered into. It has not the smallest bearing on earth on the question as to the credibility of his testimony, as even the offer would be nothing if rejected; therefore I think it had no bearing on the subject of inquiry, and was very properly rejected. . . . I am, therefore, of the same opinion with the rest of the Court, that this rule ought to be discharged. Rule discharged.

219. CHICAGO CITY R. CO. v. ALLEN

169 Ill. 287; 48 N. E. 414

APPEAL from the Appellate Court for the First District; — heard in that Court on appeal from the Superior Court of Cook County; the Hon. JOHN BARTON PAYNE, Judge, presiding. This was an action on the case, instituted in the Superior Court of Cook County by appellee, against the appellant company, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of the negligence of the servants of the appellant company. The declaration alleged that while the appellee, with all due care, was endeavoring to enter one of appellant's cars, which had stopped at the crossing of Thirty-second street and Cottage Grove avenue for the purpose of receiving passengers, the servants of the company in charge of the car negligently and recklessly caused the car to be suddenly and violently started and put into rapid motion, whereby the appellee was jerked and thrown from the car to and upon the ground with great force and violence, his collar-bone broken and other injuries to his person inflicted.

The trial Court refused to allow a witness produced on behalf of the appellee to answer the following question propounded by the appellant: "In what polling precinct was the corner of South Park avenue and Thirty-second street on September 6, 1892?" And also refused to allow the same witness to answer another question, viz.: "Can you tell me now which of those precincts the corner of South Park avenue and Thirty-second street, — any corner, — is?" The exclusion of the evidence sought to be elicited by these questions is urged as ground for the reversal of the judgment.

Whether the car in question came to a stop at the intersection of Thirty-second street and Cottage Grove avenue for the purpose of permitting passengers to enter it, or whether appellee endeavored to get aboard the car while it was in motion, was a material fact to be determined by the jury. Louis Hutt, a witness introduced on behalf of the appellee, testified he was at the place in question and saw the car stop and soon after start again, and immediately thereafter saw the appellee lying on the ground, apparently injured. The witness accounted for his presence at the crossing by stating he had gone there and voted at a primary for the election of delegates to a convention. He also stated he lived at the south-west corner of South Park avenue and Thirty-second street, and had lived there for more than forty years. Appellant contends, if answers had been permitted to have been made to the questions hereinbefore set out, it would have been disclosed the residence of the witness Hutt was not in the voting precinct within which the primary election was being held, on Cottage Grove avenue near Thirty-second street, and hence it would have appeared he was not entitled to vote at the primary at which he testified he cast his ballot. The argument of appellant is, such testimony would have tended to contradict the statement of the witness Hutt that he was present at the time when and place where appellee received the injury.

The trial before the Court and jury resulted in a judgment in favor of the appellee in the sum of $2000. That judgment was affirmed by the Appellate Court for the First District, and the appellant company perfected this appeal to this Court.

William J. Hynes, for appellant. Case & Hogan, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Boggs (after stating the case as above), delivered the opinion of the Court:

It is competent for a party to produce testimony to contradict material statements of an adverse witness, though such statements do not relate directly to the matter in issue between the litigants. The purpose of such testimony is to discredit the witness, and therefore direct contradiction of the statement of the witness as to any fact or circumstance which tended to corroborate or strengthen his testimony is admissible. (Butler v. Cornell, 148 Ill. 276; 29 Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law, 783.) In the case at bar it was competent for the appellant company to contradict the statement of the witness Hutt that he was at the crossing where the injury is alleged to have occurred at the time in question, and also that he voted at the primary. The latter statement offered a reason for his presence there, and tended to strengthen his assertion that he was there at the time and place of appellee's injury. He did not state he lived in the precinct for which the primary election was being held, and therefore the excluded testimony would not have directly contradicted any statement made by him.

It was not, of course, proper to receive it for the purpose of showing the witness had illegally voted at the primary, for that in nowise concerned the issue to be determined by the jury. The questions, answers to which were excluded, called upon this witness to state in what precinct any corner of the intersection of Thirty-second street and South Park avenue was in, and an answer thereto, if permitted, might have had no relation whatever to the question whether the witness lived in the precinct wherein the primary in question was being held.

Altogether, we think no sufficient reason appears for reversing the judgment because of the rulings under consideration. . . .

Judgment affirmed.

220. HOAG v. WRIGHT

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1903

174 N. Y. 36; 66 N. E. 579

APPEAL from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the second judicial department, entered March 17, 1902, affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff entered upon a verdict and an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff was the son and sole surviving descendant of the defendants' testatrix, Hester Hoag, who died on the 15th of February, 1895, in the eighty-first year of her age. The action was upon two promissory notes — one for $2,000, dated October 16, 1890, payable to the order of the plaintiff; and the other for $4,000, dated November 13, 1894, payable to the plaintiff — without words of negotiability. The complaint was in the usual form, and by their answer the defendants denied the making and delivery of both notes, and alleged that, if made or delivered, they were without consideration. . . .

Experts were called by both parties to give their opinions as to the genuineness of the signatures to the notes after comparing them with the indorsement of the decedent upon certain checks read in evidence as standards of comparison. Upon the cross-examination of an expert named Reed, called by the plaintiff, it appeared that during his testimony upon a previous trial of this action he had been shown two papers so folded as to disclose only what purported to be the signature of the decedent upon each. He testified, in substance, that upon the other trial, after comparing these signatures with the standards in evidence, he had pronounced them genuine, and had sworn that all were written by the same hand. Each of the papers, when unfolded, was a total blank, and the signatures were obviously spurious. The witness was thus compelled to admit that he had been mistaken in his opinion as an expert, upon the previous trial, in relation to the signature of the decedent, and had testified that the spurious signatures were genuine.

After this witness had left the stand, another expert was called by the plaintiff, who, also testifying by comparison, stated that the signatures to the notes were genuine. Upon cross-examination an effort was made by the defendants' counsel to show that he had made the same mistake upon the previous trial as Mr. Reed. For this purpose he was shown the two papers, folded so as to expose only the spurious signatures, and was asked if he remembered that these signatures had been shown him on the former trial. The counsel for the plaintiff objected to "showing the witness any papers which are not in evidence." The Court thereupon said: "The objection is sustained. I think it is incompetent. On reflection, I will strike out the testimony in regard to these two papers which has been given by Mr. Reed. (To the jury) I will strike it out and you will pay no attention to it." The defendants' counsel duly excepted and thereupon asked: "Do you not remember that you testified before Judge JENKS, when the papers that I now show you were presented, that in your opinion the same hand wrote the words 'Hester Hoag' before the seals on those papers that wrote the words 'Hester Hoag' upon the indorsement upon the checks." This was objected to as incompetent and immaterial, "and especially that these papers are not in evidence." The objection was sustained, and the defendants, after duly excepting, offered the papers in evidence "to obviate that objection." This was objected to "on the grounds that they have not been proven so as to be admitted as standards of comparison, and the papers themselves are wholly immaterial." The objection was sustained and the defendants excepted. Afterward the same rulings in substance were made when the third expert of the plaintiff was upon the stand, and similar exceptions were taken.

James M. Hunt, for appellants. . . . Error was committed upon the trial in refusing to permit a full cross-examination of plaintiff's handwriting experts. . . .

Isaac N. Mills and Joseph Hover, for respondent. . . . The plaintiff was properly permitted to testify that the signatures attached to the notes were in the genuine handwriting of the testatrix. . . . The testimony, upon cross-examination of several expert witnesses for the plaintiff, as to two spurious signatures of decedent, was properly excluded.

PER CURIAM (after stating the case as above). The opinions of experts upon handwriting, who testify from comparison only, are regarded by the Courts as of uncertain value, because in so many cases where such evidence is received, witnesses of equal honesty, intelligence and experience reach conclusions not only diametrically opposite, but always in favor of the party who called them. The right to cross-examine such witnesses is of great importance, and, while it should be confined within reasonable limits, it should not be so restricted as to deprive it of all value.

The evidence stricken out in this case was not only competent and material, but was of decided value, and might have turned the scale toward the defendants upon an issue so closely contested. It tended to cast doubt upon the credibility of the witness and his skill as an expert. It suggested the question whether, if the witness was at fault as to the spurious signatures, he was not at fault as to the signatures in question. It made a direct attack upon the value of his opinion. The maxim, "falsus in uno falsus in omnibus" applies, but with less force, to the statements of a witness which, although not intentionally false, are in fact untrue, especially when they involve matters of judgment and skill. Each witness was asked in substance, "Did you not on another trial swear that these bogus signatures were genuine?" What better test could be applied? The effort was to show, not that the witness had been mistaken as to the signature of some third person, or even as to some signature of the decedent not in evidence, but with reference to the very signatures which were then the subject of investigation, for by confounding the spurious with the genuine he demonstrated that he could not tell one from the other. One witness virtually confessed his error, so that there was no necessity for contradiction as to him, and the other two might have been forced into the same situation if the trial judge had not intervened.

. . . Owing to the dangerous nature of expert evidence, and the necessity of testing it in the most thorough manner in order to prevent injustice, we are disposed to go farther, and to hold that, where a witness makes a mistake in his effort to distinguish spurious from genuine signatures, and he does not acknowledge his error, it may be shown by other testimony. The test sought to be applied in this case was one of the most practical and conclusive that can be employed to determine whether the witness is really an expert or not. It bears not only upon his competency to express an opinion, but upon the value of his opinion when expressed. . . . The good sense of the trial judge will confine it within proper bounds, and prevent an unnecessary consumption of time. It is better to take a little time to see whether the opinion of the witness is worth anything, rather than to hazard life, liberty, or property upon an opinion that is worth nothing. The evils and injustice arising from the use and abuse of opinion evidence in relation to handwriting are so grave that we feel compelled to depart from our own precedents to some extent, and to establish further safeguards for the protection of the public. As the hostility of witnesses to a party may be shown as an independent fact, although it protracts the trial by introducing a new issue, so, as we think, the incompetency of a professed expert may be shown in the same way and for the same reason; that is, because it demonstrates that testimony, otherwise persuasive, cannot be relied upon. We think that any testimony of an alleged expert upon handwriting which bears on his competency to express an opinion, may, within reasonable limits, be contradicted by the testimony of other witnesses. We deem it our duty to limit such cases as People v. Murphy (135 N. Y. 450) and Van Wyck v. McIntosh (14 N. Y. 439) in so far as the conclusion thus announced is inconsistent with the views therein expressed.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide event.

221. LAMBERT v. HAMLIN

SUPREME COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1905

73 N. H. 138; 59 Atl. 941

CASE for personal injuries. Trial by jury, and verdict for the plaintiff. Transferred from the May Term, 1904, of the Superior Court by SPIKE, J. The defendant's exceptions to the exclusion of evidence, and the argument of the plaintiff's counsel, are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

The plaintiff is seventy-one years old. When injured, on the evening of August 21, 1903, she was keeping a small store, which she rented of the defendant, and in which she sold bread, milk, etc. The negligence complained of is the defendant's failure to use ordinary care in the removal of the doorsteps while repairing the underpinning of the store, in that he did not notify the plaintiff that they had been removed. She alleges that, in ignorance of their removal, and while in the exercise of due care, she attempted to step out of doors to get a bill changed, and fell and sustained her injuries. The defendant admits removing the steps while repairing the underpinning, but claims that they were replaced before the accident occurred. He also claims that the plaintiff sustained her injuries by walking off the side of the steps while descending, and that she was intoxicated at the time.

Doyle & Lucier and Ivory C. Eaton, for plaintiff. George W. Clyde, Henry B. Atherton, and Wason & Moran, for defendant.

BINGHAM, J. — One of the issues in the case bearing upon the plaintiff's exercise of care was whether she was intoxicated when she went out of her store on the evening of August 21, 1903. The plaintiff claimed that the defendant had removed the steps over which she was to pass in going from the store, and that he was negligent in failing to inform her that he had removed them. The defendant claimed that the steps were in position, and that the plaintiff was intoxicated, and sustained her injuries by stepping off the side of the steps. The plaintiff called the defendant as a witness. He testified that the plaintiff sold beer in the store at or about the time of the accident. The plaintiff, being subsequently called in her own behalf, testified in her examination in chief, and without objection, that she never sold beer in the store. In reply to this the defendant offered to show that she had been convicted four times for selling beer, the last conviction being in 1898; that she pleaded guilty to the charges; and that during the time covered by the sales she was occupying the store. This evidence the Superior Court excluded, both as a matter of law and in the exercise of its discretion, and the defendant excepted. The defendant now urges (1) that the evidence offered by him was relevant and material to the issue, and (2) that, if that portion of the plaintiff's evidence which he offered to contradict was collateral and irrelevant, she ought not for that reason to be heard to object, as it was testified to in her direct examination; that the rule preventing the contradiction of immaterial evidence, brought out on cross-examination for the purpose of impeaching a witness, does not apply in such a case.

1. If the evidence offered by the defendant was relevant to the issue, still it was of so remote a character as to be properly excluded by the Court in the exercise of its discretion. Kendall v. Flanders, 72 N. H. 11; Pattee v. Whitcomb, 72 N. H. 249.

2. In the cases adopting the view contended for by the defendant in his second proposition, it seems to have been considered that the main reason for the rule which prevents a cross-examination upon immaterial matters, for the mere purpose of contradicting a witness, is that he cannot be presumed to come prepared to defend himself on such collateral questions, and, as this reason fails when the testimony is voluntarily given, the rule itself does not in that case apply. But, as said in Blakey's Heirs v. Blakey's Ex'x, 33 Ala. 611, 620:

"The reason referred to is doubtless one of those on which the rule is founded, but it is not the only, or even the chief, one. The principal reasons of the rule are, undoubtedly, that but for its enforcement the issues in a cause would be multiplied indefinitely, the real merits of the controversy would be lost sight of in the mass of testimony to immaterial points, the minds of jurors would thus be perplexed and confused and their attention wearied and distracted, the costs of litigation would be enormously increased, and judicial investigations would become almost interminable."

Similar reasons are assigned for the rule in Seavy v. Dearborn, 19 N. H. 351, 356. See, also, Attorney-General v. Hitchcock, 1 Exch. 91, 104; Powers v. Leach, 26 Vt. 270, 277. According to the weight of authority, the reasons above assigned apply equally whether the evidence on such collateral matters is brought out on the examination in chief or upon cross-examination, and whether the witness gives it voluntarily or in response to questions calling for it. Blakey's Heirs v. Blakey's Ex'x, supra; Commonwealth v. Buzzell, 16 Pick. 163, 168; 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 461e; 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1007. The portion of the plaintiff's testimony which related to sales prior to and including 1898 was collateral and immaterial to the issue, and applying the above principle, the defendant was not entitled to contradict it for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of the plaintiff, though it was introduced by her on direct examination. . . .

Exceptions overruled. All concurred.

222. SIMMS v. FORBES

SUPREME COURT OF MISSISSIPPI. 1905

86 Miss. 412; 38 So. 546

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Adams County; M. H. WILKINSON, Judge. Action by Miss Oelean E. Forbes against A. P. Simms to recover the sum of $10,000 damages for injuries sustained by her in falling into an open elevator shaft in defendant's store. Defendant pleaded the general issue, and gave notice that evidence would be introduced to show that plaintiff's damage was caused by her contributory negligence. . . .

From a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $1,741, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Brown & Martin, for appellant. Dabney & McCabe, for appellee.

COX, Special Judge. . . . The plaintiff, after having testified in her own behalf, was recalled and questioned touching a conversation with W. J. Foster, a witness for defendant, some days before trial, at plaintiff's home. Foster was the clerk in defendant's store who was showing plaintiff the bookcases at the time she fell in the elevator opening, and had testified that he called plaintiff's attention to the opening a few moments before she fell. Plaintiff was asked by her counsel: "When Mr. Foster came down to see you, as a part of the conversation he had with you, did you say to him that you heard that they intended to say that you were warned about that place?" This was objected to, and objection sustained. She was then asked: "As a part of that conversation, did you say to him that you had not been warned?" This question was objected to, objection overruled, and defendant excepted. Plaintiff replied: "I looked him right in the face most impressively, and said it very slowly: 'I hear your people say that I was warned. I wasn't warned.' And he said nothing."

There is no ground upon which this testimony was admissible. It is clearly nothing but hearsay, and not within any of the exceptions to the rule which excludes hearsay evidence. It is true that when Foster was on the stand a predicate was laid for contradicting him upon this point. But the rule is well established that a witness may not on cross-examination be questioned as to collateral and irrelevant matters with a view to self-contradiction of his answer. In such cases the cross-examiner is bound by his answer. The rule against hearsay would be of but little value if it could be evaded by the transparent device of introducing it in contradiction of the adversary's witness upon collateral matters. Unless a party has the right to offer a conversation or statement directly, he cannot get it before the jury merely by way of contradicting a witness on matters brought out on cross-examination.

Again, plaintiff was asked: "When Mr. Foster came down to see you, did he make a statement to you in which he said, 'I take great blame for that accident myself?'" To this she replied: "I cannot say whether he did say that, exactly, but he said, 'I take great blame,' or he said, 'I blame myself for the accident,' and my reply was, 'Somebody was to be blamed, certainly.'" Defendant moved to strike out the last question and answer. Motion was overruled, and exception taken. The last answer was obnoxious to the same objection as the former. It was mere hearsay. Plaintiff could not have availed of it as a part of her case, nor could she have shown it in evidence for any purpose, independently of the self-contradiction of Foster. Such being the case, it was not available in any form or for any purpose. Wigmore on Evidence, § 1020; V. & M. R. Co. v. McGowan, 62 Miss. 698, 52 Am. Rep. 205; Williams v. State, 73 Miss. 821, 19 South. 826.

This evidence must have been highly prejudicial to defendant. For the error of the Court in admitting it, the judgment must be reversed.

Reversed and remanded.

223. THE QUEEN'S CASE

House of Lords. 1820

2 B. & B. 313

Abbott, C. J. [answering a question put to the Judges by the Lords.] . . . If it be intended to bring the credit of a witness into question by proof of anything he may have said or declared touching the cause, the witness is first asked, upon cross-examination, whether or no he has said or declared that which is intended to be proved. If the witness admits the words or declarations imputed to him, the proof on the other side becomes unnecessary, and the witness has an opportunity of giving such reason, explanation, or exculpation of his conduct, if any there may be, as the particular circumstances of the transaction may happen to furnish; and thus the whole matter is brought before the Court at once, which in our opinion is the most convenient course. . . .

[If the witness denies the utterance or claims the privilege of silence], the proof in contradiction will be received at the proper season. But the possibility that the witness may decline to answer the question affords no sufficient reason for not giving him the opportunity of answering and of offering such explanatory or exculpatory matter as I have before alluded to; . . . not only for the purpose already mentioned, but because, if not given in the first instance, it may be wholly lost, for a witness who has been examined and has no reason to suppose that his further attendance is requisite often departs the Court, and may not be found or brought back until the trial be at an end. So that, if evidence of this sort could be adduced on the sudden and by surprise, without any previous intimation to the witness or to the party producing him, great injustice might be done, . . . and one of the great objects of the course of proceeding established in our Courts is the prevention of surprise, as far as practicable, upon any person who may appear therein.

224. DOWNER v. DANA

DEBT upon a jail bond. Plea, non est factum, with notice of special matter of defense, and trial by jury, March Term, 1845, HEBARD, J., presiding. On trial it appeared that the defendant Dana had heretofore been committed to the common jail in Orange county, upon execution in favor of the plaintiffs, and that the bond in suit was executed, in common form, upon his being admitted to the liberties of the prison. . . . The plaintiffs also gave in evidence the deposition of one Smith, taken ex parte, and the deposition of one Rutter, taken with notice to the defendants, but at the taking of which the defendants did not attend, — which depositions tended to prove a breach of the condition of the bond declared upon. . . .

The defendants also, for the purpose of impeaching the witness Rutter, offered to prove declarations made by him previous to the giving of the deposition used in the case by the plaintiffs, but in reference to which no preliminary inquiry had been made of him. To this the plaintiffs objected; but the evidence was admitted by the Court. . . . Verdict for defendants. Exceptions by plaintiffs.

Hunton and Tracy & Converse, for plaintiffs. . . . The Court erred in admitting the evidence as to the witness Rutter. The deposition was taken with notice, and the defendants had an opportunity to inquire of the witness as to the conversation concerning which the evidence was given, but did not do so. Queen's Case [ante, No. 223], Angus v. Smith, 1 M. & M. 473; 1 Stark. Ev. 145, 146.

O. P. Chandler and L. B. Vilas, for defendants. . . . The testimony admitted to impeach the deposition of Rutter was properly received. We recognize the rule contended for by the plaintiffs, when applied to witnesses in Court; but in reference to depositions it is inapplicable. There can be no distinction between ex parte depositions and those taken with notice.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by DAVIS, J.:

The first question which arises is, whether the decision of the County Court was right in admitting the defendant to show the previous declarations of Rutter, with a view to impeach his deposition introduced by the plaintiff, — it appearing, that, at the time of taking the same, no person appeared on behalf of the defendants, although they had due notice, and that consequently the deponent was not interrogated in respect to such declarations.

It is indeed an established rule of practice in this State, that testimony of this kind cannot be received to impeach a witness produced upon the stand, unless an opportunity be first afforded to the witness, whose testimony it is proposed to impeach, to explain or qualify the imputed declarations. This rule is carried so far in England, as to admit of no exception, in cases where, when the cross-examination was closed, the party wishing to impeach had no knowledge of the variant declarations, or inconsistent conduct, and the witness has departed from Court and cannot be recalled. Queen's Case, in House of Lords, 2 Brod. & Bing. 284 [ante, No. 223]. This Court have fully sanctioned the rule as existing in England. In Massachusetts it has never been adopted. Tucker v. Welsh, 17 Mass. 160. I infer, also, that it has never been adopted in New Hampshire; French v. Merrill, 6 N. H. 465; nor in Connecticut; Judson v. Blanchard, 3 Conn. 557.

As observed by Ch. J. PARKER, in Tucker v. Welsh, the rule seems to be of recent origin in England, as no mention is made of it by either Peake, or Phillips, in their treatises upon the law of evidence. Starkie recognizes it in his text as settled law. He is, I think, the first English writer that does so. 3 Starkie, Evidence, 1753–4. Ch. J. PARKER says, it has never been adopted in this country. This remark was made as long ago as 1821. At that time I think no lawyer in Vermont had heard of such a rule here; and even now I do not find it naturalized anywhere, except here. It is not adopted in Maine. Ware v. Ware, 8 Greenl. 42. Prof. Greenleaf, in his valuable treatise on evidence, (1 Greenleaf Evidence, 514), adopts the English law in his text, without scruple, and in a note adds, that in this country the same course is understood generally to have been adopted, except in Maine, and perhaps Massachusetts.

Were the question "res integra," I confess I could see no advantages to the cause of truth and justice, from the adoption of this rule of evidence, which are not equally well secured by the old practice of allowing the party whose witness has in that way been attacked to recall him, if he choose, for the purpose of contradicting or explaining the conduct or declarations imputed to him. Indeed, I have seen no objections of consequence to that course, except that it may sometimes happen that the witness may have departed from Court supposing his attendance no longer necessary. Such an objection practically is entitled to very little weight, as it would be provided against by requiring, as is in fact generally done for other reasons, witnesses to remain in court until the testimony is finished. On the other hand, this rule would be productive of intolerable mischiefs, were it not mitigated by the somewhat awkward and inconvenient expedient of suspending the regular course of testimony for the purpose of recalling the witness proposed to be impeached and laying a foundation for the impeaching testimony by interrogating him whether he did or said the things proposed to be proved. Besides, the privilege of doing this will be lost in all those cases where the witness has left Court and cannot be found; the opposite party has every inducement to cut off this opportunity by immediately discharging all such as he may have reason to suspect are liable to be impugned. In addition to this, the avowed attempt to produce self-impeachment, made of course in a tone and manner evincing distrust of the general narrative, too often both surprises and disconcerts a modest witness. He answers hastily and confusedly, as is natural from having such a collateral matter hastily sprung upon him. Every one conversant with judicial proceedings must have often observed with pain an apparent contradiction produced in this way, when he is satisfied none would have existed under a different mode of proceeding.

Although to my mind these considerations present very formidable objections to the practice first authoritatively developed on the trial of the Queen in the House of Lords, yet I acquiesce in it as the settled practice in this State.

It remains to be considered, whether it can be properly applied in the case of depositions.

In the case of Tucker v. Welsh, already cited from Massachusetts, the Court were urged to adopt the practice in respect to testimony taken in that form, though they should not be disposed to do so in other cases. The Court, however, could perceive no special reasons in favor of such a discrimination. We think there are substantial reasons why a discrimination should be made the other way. The rule thus applied would impose on a party, wishing the privilege of impeachment, the necessity of attending in person, or by counsel, at the taking of every deposition to be used against him, within or without the State, which, on any other account, he might not be disposed to do. Besides, in many cases the deponent may be wholly unknown to him; he may have no knowledge of the matter to be testified to, until actually given; the notice of the taking may be barely sufficient to enable him to reach the place, perhaps hundreds of miles distant, in season to be present. It would be idle, under such circumstances, to expect a party to be prepared to go through with this preliminary ceremony. The result would be, he would be least able to shield himself against partial or false testimony, precisely when such protection is most needed. It is true, the deponent, being absent from the trial, hears not the impeaching testimony, and cannot be called upon to contradict or explain it. This may be an evil, but is unavoidable from the nature of the case. It would be a worse evil to deny the right of impeaching depositions, unless under regulations, which would reduce the right to a nullity.

We attach no importance to the circumstance, that the defendants, though notified, were not present at the taking of Rutter's depositions. Had they been present, the result would have been the same. In our opinion the rule adverted to has no proper application to testimony taken in the form of depositions. The impeaching testimony was therefore properly admitted. . . .

On the whole the judgment of the County Court is affirmed.

225. Unis v. Charlton's Administrator. (1855. Virginia. 12 Gratt. 495). Daniel, J. In the case of Downer v. Dana, 19 Verm. R. 338 [ante, No. 224] a distinction is taken between the case of a witness examined in court and one who has given his testimony in the form of a deposition. In that case the Court sanctions, and expresses a determination to adhere to, the rule, that testimony, as to the previous declarations of a witness produced upon the stand, offered for the purpose of impeaching him, is not to be received, unless an opportunity be first offered him to explain or qualify the imputed declaration. But it still decides that the rule has no application to testimony in the shape of depositions, whether taken with or without notice, and whether the adverse party attended at the taking or not, and that the adverse party may in such case, without previous inquiry, prove any inconsistent declarations or conduct of the witness.

After a careful examination of the opinion in which this distinction is taken, I have been unable to perceive the force of the reasoning on which it is made to rest. The principal reason assigned by the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the Court for refusing to apply the rule to depositions is that such a practice would impose on a party wishing the privilege of impeachment the necessity of attending in person or by attorney at the taking of every deposition to be used against him, within or without the State, which on any other account he might be disposed to do. This argument ab inconvenienti is not wholly without show of reason when urged in behalf of the exercise of the privilege of impeachment by a party who had had no notice of the taking, or who, though notified, did not attend at the taking of a deposition which he seeks to discredit, but seems to me devoid of weight when extended to the case of a party who was present at the taking of the deposition, and had thus the same opportunity of cross-examining the witness and calling his attention to the imputed inconsistent statements that he would or might have had in case the witness had been examined in court. . . . The rule proceeds from a sense of justice to the witness; . . . these reasons, it is obvious, apply just as forcibly to depositions as to oral examinations in court. And indeed there are considerations which urge the application of the rule to the case of an impeachment of a witness who has given his testimony in the form of a deposition, which may not arise in an effort to discredit a witness who has been examined in court. In the latter case the witness usually remains in or about the court till the trial is concluded; and if an assault is made upon him by proof of inconsistent statements, he might, even before the adoption of the rule requiring him to be first examined as to such statements, be recalled and re-examined by the party in whose favor he had testified; and he may thus have an opportunity of repelling or explaining away the force of the assault; whereas the witness whose deposition has been taken is usually absent from the scene of the trial, and has no shield against attacks on his veracity other than that provided by the rule. . . . There are no peculiar considerations calling upon us to exempt this case from the operation of the rule; for it appears from the deposition that the plaintiff's counsel was not only present at the taking, but exercised on the occasion his privilege of cross-examining the witness.

226. ADAMS v. HERALD PUBLISHING CO.

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1909

82 Conn. 448; 74 Atl. 755

APPEAL from Court of Common Pleas, Hartford County; JOHN COATS, Judge. Action for breach of contract by Eugene Adams against the Herald Publishing Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant is a corporation engaged in the publication of a newspaper and doing printing. . . . A business office was maintained in the building where the paper was printed and issued. . . . One Schmidt was employed as the head of this office. His duties consisted in ascertaining and carrying out the directions of the directors, except in routine matters concerning which there could be no reasonable doubt. On the morning upon which Schmidt first went to work, the plaintiff visited the office, inquired for the business manager, and by some one was referred to Schmidt. . . . He proposed to Schmidt to enter into a contract with the defendant for the canvass of New Britain for four-line advertisements, . . . his proposal to be signed by the defendant. Schmidt expressed a desire to think over the matter and to consult others, and the plaintiff left, leaving the forms of contract with him. Schmidt later accepted the proposition and signed the contract in the name of the defendant by himself as business manager. . . . Schmidt in fact, did not consult with either of the directors or officers in relation thereto, and had no authority to enter into such a contract on behalf of the defendant, and it was not within the apparent scope of his authority to do so. . . . None of the proposed advertisements were ever published, and no benefit therefrom ever accrued to the defendant, who repudiated the contract entered into by Schmidt when its existence became known to it, and refused to pay the plaintiff thereunder. The other pertinent facts are stated in the opinion.

Charles S. Hamilton and James Roche, for appellant. Bernard F. Gaffney, for appellee.

PRENTICE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff seeks to enforce against the defendant the terms of a written contract which was not otherwise executed on the latter's behalf than by one who at the time of its execution was known to the plaintiff to be an agent. . . .

The plaintiff offered evidence in chief tending to show that Schmidt submitted the contract to the two officers of the corporation, who were also its only directors, before it was executed, and that it was approved by them. This the two persons concerned denied. Upon rebuttal a witness was called for the purpose of contradicting one of these directors — the president, one Cochran. This witness was asked concerning a conversation which he testified he had with Cochran within a few days after the contract was entered into, for the purpose of showing, as claimed, that Cochran then informed the witness about it. Counsel for the defendant objected to the inquiry, upon the ground that Cochran's attention had not been called to the claimed conversation, and the proper course, as outlined in 22 Conn., 58 Am. Dec., pursued, and the inquiry was not permitted. The case to which counsel thus appealed for the exclusion of the proffered testimony was that of Hedge v. Clapp, 22 Conn. 262, 58 Am. Dec. 424, wherein the question of the power and duty of a Court in dealing with a situation like that before the Court in the present case was fully discussed and clearly defined. In that case it was contended that it was reversible error to receive evidence of the declarations of a witness, made out of Court, contradictory of his statements sworn to on the trial, without requiring that the attention of the witness should have been first called upon cross-examination to the claimed contradictory declarations. Such is the unbending rule of law in many, if not most, jurisdictions to-day. Wigmore on Evidence, § 1028.

This Court, however, refused to join in the procession of those who have created, out of the decision of the judges in The Queen's Case, 2 B. & B. 313 [ante, No. 223], any such inflexible principle. But, while this is true, it gave no encouragement to a general practice on the part of the Courts of admitting such contradictory declarations quite regardless of whether or not the attention of the witness sought to be contradicted had been first directed to them. Much less did that authority hold or suggest that the refusal to hear such contradictory testimony under any and all circumstances would be reversible error. The conclusion of the Court was that there was no inflexible rule to govern the conduct of a trial Court under the conditions suggested, that the practice sought to be established as an unyielding rule by the plaintiff in error was a safe and conservative one to pursue in many, if not most, cases, and one very proper to be adhered to in such cases, but that it was one from which a Court in the exercise of that discretion, with which it is liberally endowed, might well and properly depart, if, with the circumstances before it, it was of the opinion that the ends of fairness and justice would thereby be best subserved. The principles of this leading case have been strictly adhered to in this jurisdiction, and they embody familiar law. State ex rel. Woodford v. North, 42 Conn. 79; Tomlinson v. Derby, 43 Conn. 562, 565; Bradley v. Gorham, 77 Conn. 211, 213. It is clear therefore that the ruling of the Court was not one which deprived the plaintiff of any right, and that it was one which lay within the domain of the judicial discretion. . . .

We have said that error cannot be predicated upon a ruling made in the exercise of this discretion. State ex rel. Woodford v. North, 42 Conn. 79; Tomlinson v. Derby, 43 Conn. 562, 565. If, however, it be assumed that a case might arise which disclosed such a clear abuse of discretion as to warrant a review this clearly is not such a case. . . . There is no error. The other Judges concur.

Sub-topic D. Who may be Impeached

228. History.[1] — The history of the rule is singularly obscure, considering its practical frequency and importance. But the following stage of its development are fairly clear:

In the primitive modes of trial, persons who attended on behalf of the parties were not witnesses, in the modern sense of the word. They were "oath-helpers," by whose mere oath, taken by the prescribed number of persons and in the proper form, the issue of the cause was determined. They were chosen, naturally and usually, from among the relatives and adherents of either party. They went up to the court literally to "swear him off," and the two sets of oath-takers were marshalled in opposing bands. This traditional notion of a witness, that of a person ex officio a partisan pure and simple, persisted as a tradition long past the time when their function had ceased to be that of a mere oath-taker and had become that of a testifier to facts. So long as such a notion persisted, it was inconceivable that a party should gainsay his own witness; he had been told to bring a certain number of persons to swear for him; if one or more did not do so, that was merely his loss; he should have chosen better ones for his purpose. This notion that a party must stand or fall by what his partisan affirms was long in disappearing.

It was a natural consequence of this notion that the party should not be allowed to dispute what his own chosen witness says. Such (presumably) was the instinctive thought all through the earlier periods of our recorded trials, and long after the time when witnesses in the modern sense had taken the place of compurgators. Its beginnings are seen at the end of the 1600s, in criminal trials. Until that time, the accused had no legal right to summon witnesses (ante, § 575), and apparently the prosecution was not before then hampered by any rule against impeachment. In that period a rule begins to be hinted at, as against the accused's witnesses, though the prosecution is still exempt.

By the beginning of the 1700s a general rule makes a casual appearance, and is applied in civil cases equally. But it had not yet received common acceptance; for it is not mentioned in any of the early editions of the treatises on trial practice. By the end of the 1700s, however, it is notorious and unquestioned. Its enforcement in the trial of Warren Hastings, in 1788, seems to have been the immediate cause of its general currency; for thereafter it receives mention in the treatises.

229. Stephen Colledge's Trial. (1681. Howell's State Trials, VIII, 637.) [Treason. The accused was a Protestant joiner, said to have shared in a Presbyterian Plot against the King. A principal witness against him was one Turbervile. Colledge now calls witnesses to discredit Turbervile.]

Colledge. — Pray, my lord, give me leave to call Mr. Ivy.

Serj. Jeff. — Do, if you will. (He stood up.)

Colledge. — What was that you heard Turbervile say of me, or of any presbyterian Plot?

Ivy. — I never heard him say any thing of a Presbyterian Plot in my life.

Colleged. — Did you not tell Zeal of such a thing?

Ivy. — No, I never did. . . .

Colledge. — Did not you call me out with Macnamarra and Haynes, to the Hercules Pillars?

[1] Adapted from the present Compiler's "Treatise on Evidence" (§ 896).

L. C. J. Scroggs. — Look you, Mr. Colledge, I will tell you something for law, and to set you right; whatsoever witnesses you call, you call them as witnesses to testify the truth for you; and if you ask them any questions, you must take what they have said as truth. Therefore, you must not think to ask him any questions, and afterward call another witness to disprove your own witness.

Colledge. — I ask him, was he the first time with us, when I was called out of the coffee-house to hear Haynes's discovery?

L. C. J. — Let him answer you if he will; but you must not afterwards go to disprove him. . . .

Colledge. — I ask whether he hath given any evidence against me any where?

Ivy. — I am not bound to answer you.

L. C. J. — Tell him, if you have.

Ivy. — Yes, my lord, I have.

Colledge. — Then I think he is no good witness for me, when he hath sworn against me. . . . Call Mr. Lewes. (Who appeared.)

L. C. J. — What is your Christian name?

Lewes. — William.

Colledge. — Pray, Mr. Lewes, what do you know about Turbervile?

Lewes. — I know nothing at all, I assure you, of him that is ill.

Colledge. — Do you know anything concerning any of the evidence that hath been given here?

Lewes. — If I knew any thing relating to you, I would declare it; but I know something of Mr. Ivy; it has no relation to you, as I conceive, but against my lord of Shaftesbury.

L. C. J. — You would call Ivy for a witness, and now you call one against him; and that I told you, you must not do.

230. Buller, J. Trials at Nisi Prius. (Ante 1767. p. 297). A party shall never be permitted to produce general evidence to discredit his own witness, for that would be to enable him to destroy the witness if he spoke against him, and to make him a good witness if he spoke for him, with the means in his hands of destroying his credit if he spoke against him.

231. EWER v. AMBROSE

3 B. & C. 746

Assumpsit for money had and received, and on an account stated. John Baker suffered judgment by default, and afterwards died, and his death was suggested on the roll. Plea, in abatement by Ambrose, that the promises were made by him jointly with John and Samuel Baker. Replication that they were made jointly by defendant and J. Baker, and not by the three, and issue thereon. At the trial before Gaselee, J., at the Summer assizes, for the county of Suffolk, 1824, the defendant called Samuel Baker, the alleged joint contractor, to prove the plea in abatement. He denied that he ever was a partner, but he admitted that articles of partnership were prepared, but not executed, by which he was to have been a partner. . . . The defendant's counsel, in order to prove that S. Baker was a partner, proposed to read in evidence, an answer in Chancery of John and S. Baker, to a bill filed against them by Ambrose, in 1821, for a dissolution of the partnership and an account. The learned judge inclined to think that the evidence was not admissible, on the ground that it was produced in order to contradict the defendant's own witness; but, in order to prevent the cause coming down again, he received it, reserving liberty to the plaintiffs, in case the verdict should be against them, to move the Court to enter the verdict for them. By the answer it appeared that in 1816, Samuel Baker had become a partner with his father, John Baker, and Ambrose, and that that partnership continued down to the time when the answer was filed in April, 1821. The defendant then called two other witnesses to prove that Samuel Baker was a partner. This evidence was objected to on the ground the that defendant could not contradict his own witness. . . . The learned judge left it to the jury to find for the plaintiff or defendant according as they gave credit to Samuel Baker's answer in Chancery, or to his testimony given in Court. They found a verdict for the defendant. A rule nisi having been obtained in Michaelmas term, to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, on the objections taken at the trial.

Storks, and Dover, now showed cause. Alexander v. Gibson, 2 Camp. 555, is an authority to show that if a witness proves facts in a cause which make against the party who calls him, the party may call other witnesses to contradict him as to those facts. In such case the facts are evidence in the cause, and the other witnesses are not called directly to discredit the first witness, the impeachment of his credit is incidental and consequential only.

Rolfe, contra. The effect of the answer was to impeach the credit of the witness called by the defendant, and upon whose credit he rested his case. Now that was clearly inadmissible. The same observation applies to the other witnesses. They were called to prove the fact of Samuel Baker, being a partner, he himself having disproved it. . . .

Bayley, J. — There have been cases in which, when a witness called to make out a substantive case disproved that case, the party calling him has been allowed to prove it by other witnesses. But those were cases where a witness was forced upon the party by law; as, for instance, a subscribing witness to a deed or will. Thus in Lowe v. Joliffe, 1 Black. 365, the subscribing witness to a will swore to the testator's insanity, yet the plaintiff was allowed to examine other witnesses in support of his case, to prove that the testator was sane. So in Pike v. Badmering, cited in 2 Strange 1096, where the three subscribing witnesses to a will denied their hands, the plaintiff was permitted to contradict that evidence. This case differs from those, inasmuch as the witness was not forced on the party. But I have no doubt that if a witness gives evidence contrary to that which the party calling him expects, the party is at liberty afterwards to make out his own case by other witnesses, Richardson v. Allan, 2 Stark. 334.

I doubt, however, whether the defendant was at liberty to put in the answer in Chancery of the witness in order to discredit him. . . .

I think, however, that the evidence of Wing and Spark, was admissible to prove the fact of the partnership, and that it ought to have been left to the jury to consider whether they were not satisfied from their evidence, coupled with the other facts of this case, that there was an ostensible partnership between the two Bakers, and Ambrose.

Holroyd, J. — I also think there ought to be a new trial. I take the rule of law to be, that if a witness proves a case against the party calling him, the latter may show the truth by other witnesses. But it is undoubtedly true, that if a party calls a witness to prove a fact, he cannot, when he finds the witness proves the contrary, give general evidence to show that that witness is not to be believed on his oath. . . .

It may admit of doubt whether the answer were admissible at all. It certainly was not admissible to prove generally that the witness was not worthy of any credit. It might, perhaps, be admissible if the effect of it were only to show that, as to the particular fact sworn to at the trial, the witness was mistaken. But if its effect were only to show that the witness was not worthy of credit, then it was not admissible. . . .

Littledale, J. — Where a witness is called by a party to prove his case, and he disproves that case, I think the party is still at liberty to prove his case by other witnesses. It would be a great hardship if the rule were otherwise, for if a party had four witnesses upon whom he relied to prove his case, it would be very hard, that by calling first the one who happened to disprove it, he should be deprived of the testimony of the other three. If he had called the three before the other who had disproved the case, it would have been a question for the jury upon the evidence whether they would give credit to the three or to the one. The order in which the witnesses happen to be called ought not therefore to make any difference.

It may be a doubtful question, whether the answer in Chancery was properly received to prove a different state of facts from that which the witness had sworn to at the trial. At all events it could only be admissible to contradict the particular fact to which the witness had then sworn; and whether it was admissible in the latter point of view, it is not necessary to decide. Rule absolute for a new trial.

232. SELOVER v. BRYANT

Supreme Court of Minnesota. 1893

54 Minn. 434; 56 N. W. 58

Appeal by defendant, John W. Bryant, from an order of the District Court of Hennepin County, C. B. Elliott, J., made March 1, 1893, denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiffs, George H. Selover and Charles D. Gould, were attorneys at law, practicing at Minneapolis. Between July 15, and September 23, 1892, they rendered professional services for Lucia A. Bryant. She employed them to bring suit against her husband, George M. Bryant, for divorce, and for a share of his property. They did so, and conducted the case to an amicable settlement on the latter date. They brought this action on October 25, 1892, to recover for their services. They alleged that on the settlement the husband agreed with his wife to pay them their reasonable fees and charges in the divorce suit. That the value of their services was $500, of which $90 only had been paid. They asked judgment for the residue. Defendant denied the agreement to pay his wife's attorneys, and denied that their services were worth more than the $90 she had paid.

On the trial November 17, 1892, plaintiffs called Lucia A. Bryant as a witness and asked her as to the agreement of her husband to pay her attorneys. She testified that she did not hear anything said on the settlement about the fees of her attorneys; that her husband did not agree with her to pay them. She further testified that she did not state to Mr. Gould, the day before, that her husband had so agreed. Plaintiffs then called Mr. Gould and offered to prove by him that she did so state to him on the previous day Defendant objected, but the objection was overruled. Defendants excepted, and the witness so testified. . . .

The jury found a verdict for plaintiffs and assessed their damages at $345. Defendant died January 23, 1893, and John W. Bryant, the administrator of his estate, was substituted as defendant in his stead. He moved for a new trial, and, being denied, appeals.

George R. Robinson, for appellant. The plaintiffs, knowing that the wife could not testify against her husband without his consent (1878, G. S. ch. 73, § 10), placed her upon the stand, and, after having her testimony, they were allowed, not only to contradict and discredit their witness, but to show, by the testimony of other witnesses, her alleged statements against her husband made when not under oath. . . .

Boardman & Boutelle, for respondents. Plaintiffs had the right to show contradictory statements of their own witness. This is sustained by the great weight of authority in cases where the witness has been called, upon the strength of his prior statements, and upon the supposition that he will testify in accordance therewith, and when upon the stand he surprises the party calling him, by testifying directly to the contrary, and in the interest of the adverse party. . . .

Dickinson, J. . . . The case justified the conclusion of the Court that the plaintiffs were surprised by the adverse testimony. It is one of the controverted questions in the law of evidence whether a party calling a witness, and who is surprised by his adverse testimony, may be permitted to show that he had made previous statements contrary to his testimony. A learned writer has said that the weight of authority seems to be in favor of admitting such proof. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 444.

We are in doubt whether the weight of authority is not the other way; but we feel confident that the well-recognized reasons and principles of the law of evidence support the proposition that, at least in the discretion of the trial Court, such evidence is admissible. It is perfectly well settled, and upon satisfactory reasons, that if the defendant had called the witness to the stand, and she had testified as she did as to the fact in issue, the plaintiffs, after proper preliminary proof, would have been allowed to show by other witnesses that she had made statements contrary to her testimony. This rule, now everywhere recognized, rests upon the obvious propriety and necessity of informing the jury of circumstances so directly bearing upon the credibility of the witness and the value of his testimony as do contradictory statements by him of the controverted facts concerning which he testifies, and which the jury must determine. But this controlling reason for allowing such discrediting evidence exists, and with precisely the same force, whether the witness has been called to stand by the opposite party or by the party who offers the impeaching proof; and if the witness may be thus discredited by the party who did not call him, but may not be discredited by the party who called him, the reason must be that by calling the witness to the stand the party holds him forth as being worthy of credit, and hence he should not be allowed afterwards to impeach his credibility. And this is the proposition which, in one form or another, is generally assigned as the reason of the rule disallowing such impeachment wherever that rule has prevailed. This rule and the reason for it has been so generally accepted and applied with reference to an impeachment by a party of the general reputation of a witness whom he has called that it is perhaps not now to be questioned; but as respects the particular discrediting proof which we are considering, the practice has been less uniform, and the excluding of the discrediting proof has been more strenuously opposed by the best authorities.

The reason upon which it rests is, we think, plainly fallacious. The fault in the reason lies in the premise that, by calling the witness, the party presents him as being worthy of credit, or, in any sense, vouches for his truthfulness. In some sense and measure this may be true. But laying aside the subject of general impeachment, and directing our attention only to the question of allowing proof of statements contrary to the testimony by which a party is surprised at the trial, the above-stated reason is of no controlling force, except as it includes and implies such a degree of responsibility for the credit of the witness — such a personal voucher of his truthfulness — that it would be bad faith, double dealing, trifling with the Court, or something akin thereto, for the party to afterwards throw discredit upon his testimony. The premise is not tenable. A party is not to be held to have assumed any such responsibility as to the truthfulness of a witness, and ordinarily, at least, there can be no imputation of bad faith, or anything like it, when, the party being surprised by his own witness testifying directly in favor of the adverse party, he offers to show his preliminary statements to the contrary, as impeaching his credibility. One has not all the world from which to choose the witnesses by whose testimony he must prove his case. He has not the freedom of choice that one has in the selection of an agent. He can only call those who are supposed to know the facts in issue. He is entitled to have their testimony placed before the jury, not as the statements of his agents or representatives by which he is to be concluded, but as the testimony of witnesses whose credibility he cannot be expected to vouch for, but which the jury are to determine.

It is everywhere admitted that a party whose witness testifies against him is not concluded thereby. He may prove the fact to be contrary to such testimony, although that does discredit a witness whom he has called. We deny that, by calling a witness to the stand, a party becomes responsible for his credibility in any such sense that he is absolutely precluded, when surprised by adverse testimony, from showing that the witness had made statements of the facts contrary to his testimony. It is at least within the discretion of the Court to allow this. It has been suggested that this affords an opportunity to fraudulently get before the jury the unsworn statement of a witness which the jury may accept as evidence of the fact. But the same objection may be urged in opposition to allowing a party to discredit in this way a witness called by the adverse party; yet this is always allowed. The direct, certain, and obvious effect of such evidence, in enabling the jury to rightly weigh the testimony, should prevail over the far more remote, improbable, and collateral considerations that opportunity may be thus afforded to a dishonest party to collude with a dishonest witness to make a false statement of facts, which the witness would not swear to, in order that, after the witness shall have testified the truth, the false unsworn statement to the contrary may be shown. There are so many contingencies in the way of such barely possible results that the remote possibility is not of much weight, as against the plain practical considerations opposed to it.

While, perhaps, the weight of authority is in favor of excluding such evidence, we feel that, in holding it to be within the discretion of the Court to receive it, we are justified, not only by reason, but by a sufficient array of authority. In the English Courts both views have been sanctioned. A strong presentation of the rule allowing such proof was made by Lord Chief Justice DENMAN in Wright v. Beckett, 1 Moody & R. 414. This view is preferred in Starkie, Evidence (Sharswood's Ed.) 245; 2 Phillips Evidence, pp. 985–995; 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, 444; Cowden v. Reynolds, 12 Serg. & R. 281, 283; Bank of the Northern Liberties v. Davis, 6 Watts & S. 285; Smith v. Briscoe, 65 Md. 561, (5 Atl. Rep. 334); Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 44, 76; Hemingway v. Garth, 51 Ala. 530; Moore v. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. Railroad Co., 59 Miss. 243; and see Johnson v. Leggett, 28 Kan. 590, 606. See, also, a discussion of this subject in 11 Am. Law Rev. 261. It may be added, as indicating what it has been considered the rule ought to be, that in England and in several of our States statutes have been enacted allowing such proof to be made. Our conclusion on this point is that the Court did not err in receiving the evidence. . . . Order affirmed.

234. STATE v. SLACK

69 Vt. 486; 38 Atl. 311

Indictment for assault with intent to rob. Plea, not guilty. Trial by jury at the December Term, 1896, Windsor County. Munson, J., presiding. Verdict, guilty. The respondents excepted.

In the cross-examination of Orson Sargent, he was asked in behalf of the State whether he had not been convicted in the United States Circuit Court for selling liquor without a government license, and replied that he had not, that the matter had been settled up in some other way, but exactly how he did not remember.

G. A. Davis and D. A. Pingree, for the respondent Slack; W. E. Johnson and Wm. Batchelder, for the respondent Clough. . . . The general rule precluding parties from impeaching their own witnesses applies to this State. . . .

J. G. Harvey, State's Attorney, and W. W. Stickney, for the State.

Rowell, J. — The State, in its opening, called Orson Sargent as a witness, to prove flight. The prisoners called him in defense, to prove innocence. On cross-examination, to impeach him, the State was allowed to ask him if he was not convicted in the United States Circuit Court for selling liquor without a license, and he said he was not, that he settled it, but could not tell just how it was done. The State was also allowed, for the same purpose, to introduce a copy of the record of his conviction in 1883 for selling liquor contrary to law, and to prove by him that he was the person convicted. Before said copy of record was offered and Sargent inquired of concerning it, the prisoners, on cross-examination of the State's witness Armstrong, had shown by him without objection that he had been convicted at that term of selling liquor contrary to law. . . .

1. The principal question is, whether the prisoners can object to the State's impeaching Sargent in the same way, provided it could impeach him at all. They say that the State could not impeach him at all, save as allowed by statute, because it first called him, wherefore he was its witness throughout. This is the general rule; but the question is, whether it is applicable to the State in a criminal case.

As reason is the soul of the law, the maxim is that when the reason of a law ceases the law itself ceases. Or, as WILLES, C. J., puts it in Davies v. Powell, referred to in argument in Morgan v. The Earl of Abergaveny, 8 C. B. 786, "when the nature of things changes, the rules of law must change too." Now the reason of the rule that a party cannot impeach his own witness is, that by calling him in proof of his case, he represents him to be worthy of belief, and that to attack his general character for truth after that, would be not only bad faith to the Court, but, in the language of BULLER, J., [ante, No. 230] would enable the party to destroy him if he spoke against him, and to make him a good witness if he spoke for him. But cases of what are called instrumental witnesses do not come within that rule, certainly not fully if at all; for there the reason of the law fails, as the law compels the party to call such witness, and therefore they are the witnesses of the law rather than of the party, and it would be absurd to say that the party accredits a witness whom the law compels him to call. . . .

In Thornton's Executors v. Thornton's Heirs, 39 Vt. 122, where it was held that a party calling a subscribing witness to prove a will could impeach him by showing prior contradictory statements, as the law compelled the party to call him, the Court said that many, but not all, of the reasons for permitting that kind of impeachment applied to an impeachment of a general nature. . . . We think no such distinction can logically be made, for the same reason that makes the rule inapplicable to one mode of impeachment makes it equally inapplicable to all modes, as the different modes are but different ways of doing the same thing, namely, discrediting the witness, and they are equal in degree and alike in essence. The reason of the rule does not fail in part and stand in part — fail as to one mode of impeachment and stand as to another mode — it is indivisible, and stands or falls as a whole. . . .

As the public, in whose interest crimes are prosecuted, has as much interest that the innocent should be acquitted as that the guilty should be convicted, we hold it to be the duty of the State to produce and use all witnesses within reach of process, of whatever character, whose testimony will shed light upon the transaction under investigation and aid the jury in arriving at the truth, whether it makes for or against the accused, and that therefore the State is not to be prejudiced by the character of the witnesses it calls. State v. Magoon, 50 Vt. 333; State v. Harrison, 66 Vt. 523. This doctrine, carried to its logical result, exempts the State in criminal cases from the operation of the rule in question, and places it in the position of a party calling an instrumental witness, and for the same reason.

We are aware that in many, if not most, jurisdictions the rule is applied to the State in criminal cases; but it is upon the ground that the State stands like any other party, and accredits a witness by calling him; from which we infer that they do not hold, as we do, that the State is bound to call all witnesses, but is at liberty to choose and to call whomsoever it will.

We are the more satisfied with the conclusion here reached, because we think the State ought not to be hampered by such a rule. Prosecutions are carried on by the government, through the agency of sworn officers elected for that purpose, who have no private interests to serve nor petty spites to gratify, but whose sole and only duty is, to faithfully execute their trust, and do equal right and justice to the State and to the accused. The course of public justice, thus directed, ought not to be obstructed by a rule without a reason. The ascertainment of the truth, which is the object of the prosecution, is of more consequence than the instrumentalities by which it is sought to be ascertained; and when an instrumentality becomes an obstruction to the course of justice, the State should be at liberty to remove it, and by trampling upon it if necessary.

2. But the prisoners further say that if the State was at liberty to impeach the witness, it could not do it by showing that he had been convicted of selling liquor, for that is not an infamous crime. But whether an infamous crime or not, the prisoners, against objection, were allowed to impeach the State's witness Armstrong in the same way, and therefore they cannot be heard to say that the State could not afterwards impeach in that way. This is a just application of the maxim that he is not to be heard who alleges things contradictory to each other; or, as Lord KENYON once said, a man cannot be permitted to "blow hot and cold" concerning the same transaction. . . .

Judgment that there is no error in the proceedings of the County Court.

235. STURGIS v. STATE

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS OF OKLAHOMA. 1909

2 Okl. Cr. 362; 102 Pac. 57

APPEAL from Tulsa County Court; N. J. GUBSER, Judge.

Norman Sturgis was convicted under an information charging the selling of intoxicating liquor and the conveying of intoxicating liquor from one place to another in the state, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

On the 31st of December, 1907, a prosecution was instituted against

Norman Sturgis, Arthur Sturgis, and Walter Sturgis, by information, charging them with the commission of two separate and distinct offenses, viz.: First. Selling intoxicating liquors to certain parties whose names were unknown. Second. With transporting and conveying intoxicating liquors from one place in the state to another place in the state, but not designating such places. The case being called for trial, the defendants assailed the information upon the ground of duplicity, in that it attempted to charge two offenses based upon separate and distinct acts of the defendants. This motion was, by the Court, overruled, and the defendants then obtained a severance. Walter Steen was placed upon trial first. Norman Sturgis, who will hereinafter be called the defendant, was placed upon trial and found guilty by the jury. A motion for a new trial was filed and overruled, and the case is regularly before us on appeal.

Sleeper & Davidson, for appellant.

Fred S. Caldwell, for appellee.

FURMAN, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). . . .

Fourth. The twelfth assignment of error presents two questions as to the admissibility of evidence: . . . Second. As to the circumstances and conditions under which a party can contradict or impeach his own witness. The proper presentation of these questions requires a statement of the evidence admitted upon the trial.

John McKinley, on behalf of the state, testified that on the 31st day of December, 1907, he went to the iron-roofed building mentioned, for the purpose of securing work there; that Joe Holmes had told him that if he would come around there on that day he thought he could get a job; that he didn't find Joe Holmes there at that time, but some one in the building, whom he did not know, handed him a sack and asked him to go across the wagon yard to the "old stone jail" and to go into that building, and out of an empty barrel which he would find there get six bottles of beer, put them in the sack, and bring them back to him; that he took the sack and went across to the "old stone jail," and, by means of a key which had been given him by the man who sent him, entered it; that he found the barrel referred to, and took one bottle of beer out of it and put it in the sack, and was in the act of passing a second bottle from the barrel into the sack when he was arrested by Deputy Gilchrist; that it was his intention, if he had not been disturbed by the officer, to get the six bottles of beer, and take them back to the man who had sent him. Defendant objected to this testimony because incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, but the Court overruled his objection, to which he excepted. The witness also testified on direct examination that he did not tell Deputy Gilchrist when he was arrested, or at any other time, that he was working for Sturgis and Steen, or that he was getting one dollar per day from them for washing and repacking beer bottles, or that in substance; that he did not tell him that he had been sent for the beer by defendant, or either of the other defendants, or any one else whom he knew. He also testified that on the 31st day of December, 1907, he was not in the employment of defendant or either of the other defendants, and did not even know the defendant or Arthur Sturgis. . . .

The county attorney, M. A. Breckinridge, then introduced himself as a witness on behalf of the state to contradict and impeach the witness McKinley, alleging that McKinley had taken him by surprise in testifying that he was not in the employment of defendant and Arthur Sturgis and Walt Steen on December 31, 1907, and did not wash empty beer bottles or repack them in barrels for them, and did not get a dollar a day for his services, and testified that on December 31, 1907, in his office, the witness McKinley stated to him, in the presence of Lon Lewis and A. C. Gilchrist and others, that on December 31, 1907, he was working for Sturgis and Steen and got a dollar a day from them for his services, which were to wash empty beer bottles and repack them in barrels. Defendant objected to this testimony, because incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and tending to impeach McKinley, but the Court overruled his objection, to which he excepted.

By leave of Court, counsel for defendant then examined the witness touching his being taken by surprise, and he stated under this examination that a few days before, on the trial of Walt Steen on this same information, McKinley had testified and had stated on that trial that he was not in the employment of defendant or Arthur Sturgis or Walt Steen on December 31, 1907, and did not wash empty beer bottles or repack them in barrels for them or either of them, and did not get a dollar a day for his services; and that he had denied on that trial that he made such statements to the county attorney in his office on December 31, 1907, in the presence of Lon Lewis or A. C. Gilchrist, or any one else.

The defendant then moved the Court to exclude the testimony of this witness from the jury, and instruct them not to consider it for any purpose; but the Court overruled this motion, and refused to so exclude said testimony to so instruct the jury, to which ruling defendant excepted.

The county attorney then introduced Lon Lewis and A. C. Gilchrist to contradict and impeach McKinley by testifying that McKinley had said in their presence in the county attorney's office on December 31, 1907, that on that day he was in the employment of Sturgis and Steen, and got a dollar a day for his services washing empty beer bottles and repacking them in barrels. They each so testified over the objection of defendant, because incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, who saved his exceptions to the Court's ruling thereon.

Was the introduction of this impeaching testimony proper? Originally the law was that, when a party voluntarily introduced a witness in proof of his case, he thereby represented him as worthy of belief. The parties were presumed to know the character of the witnesses they produced and the facts to which they would testify, and, having thus presented them, the law would not permit the party afterwards to impeach them. All of the earlier decisions are to this effect, and some later authorities still adhere to this rule. But law, while conservative, is a progressive science, and keeps even step with the progress of mental development, and adapts itself to the changing conditions among men in their relations to each other, and the requirements of justice owing to these changes. If it were not for this, the world would be ruled by the dead and not by the living. The former rule is that of China; the latter rule is that of America.

So the ancient rule prohibiting a party from impeaching his own witness has been modified in those particulars wherein experience and reason have shown it to be unjust. A party cannot now impeach his own witness by proving the bad character of such witness for truth, because this is something of which the party can and should inform himself before placing a witness upon the stand. But suppose a witness makes a statement to a party which would be highly beneficial to such party, and the party, thus having reasonable ground to believe that the testimony of the witness would be in substance the same as the statement made, in good faith places the witness upon the stand, and the witness, instead of swearing to the statement previously made, testifies to matters which are injurious to the party calling him, it would be a manifest perversion of justice to say that the party so surprised, deceived, and imposed upon is bound by such testimony. Under these conditions the great weight of modern authority is that a party, upon grounds of surprise at and injury from the testimony so given may, in the discretion of the trial Court, offer in evidence previous statements of such witness which contradict the injurious portion of his testimony. This rule is necessary for the protection of litigants against the contrivance of artful and designing witnesses. If a witness had deceived the party calling him (to the injury of such party), it would be manifestly unjust to hold the party to be bound by such deception and to prevent him from relieving himself of such injury. This is the philosophy of the law, upon which parties are permitted to offer contradictory statements made by their witnesses, for the purpose of impeaching them.

But this rule is subject to certain conditions: First. The party must be surprised at the testimony of the witness sought to be so impeached, and this surprise must exist as a matter of fact; that is, it must be based upon such facts as would give the party reasonable ground to believe that the witness would testify favorably to such party. If the facts were such that the party had no reasonable ground to believe, when he placed such witness on the stand, that the witness would so testify, then no surprise could exist at the failure of the witness to give such testimony, and statements previously made by the witness, contradicting the testimony given, would not be admissible. Second. It is not enough that the witness failed to testify favorably to the party calling him, in order that previous contradictory statements made by such witness may be introduced in evidence, but the witness must have testified to facts injurious to the party calling him before he can be so impeached. In other words, such contradictory statements are permissible alone for the purpose of impeaching the witness, and are not original substantive evidence against the adverse party. Third. When such contradictory statements are admitted in evidence, under proper conditions, the Court should clearly inform the jury that such contradictory statements can only be considered by them for the purpose of affecting the credibility of the witness, and that it is for the jury alone to determine whether they do have this effect or not, and that such contradictory statements are in no case to be considered as original evidence against the adverse party.

In the case at bar there is no testimony in the record that the county attorney had reasonable ground for surprise at the testimony of the witness McKinley. This witness had testified on the trial of Steen, only a few days prior to this trial, substantially as he testified in this case. This put the county attorney upon notice of what he would swear. With a full knowledge of this fact, the county attorney placed McKinley on the stand as a witness for the State. He is therefore not in a position to claim surprise. He made no showing that anything had occurred since the Steen trial which gave him the least right to expect that the testimony of McKinley would in this case be different from the testimony which he gave in the Steen trial. The testimony of the county attorney entirely shuts out the idea of surprise. Again, when McKinley was examined in chief by the county attorney, and before the effort to impeach him had been made, the witness had not stated a single fact favorable to the defendant or anything inconsistent with the testimony of the other witnesses for the State. His evidence was negative, and he only failed to swear what the county attorney desired him to testify to. Under these conditions, the statements made by the witness out of court, injurious to defendant, were not admissible in evidence, because he had not testified to a single fact which injured the State's case.

The defendant requested the Court to instruct the jury that they would consider said testimony for no other purpose than that of impeaching or contradicting, if it in any wise did impeach or contradict, the witness John McKinley. The Court overruled this motion and refused to instruct the jury. This was error. If this testimony was competent at all, it was competent for no other purpose than that of impeaching and contradicting McKinley, and the Court should have so instructed the jury. Who can say but that the jury did not consider this testimony as original substantive evidence, showing that McKinley and the defendant were connected or acting together in committing the acts charged in the information? They would be warranted in so considering it after the Court had refused in their presence to limit the scope to that of impeaching and contradicting McKinley.

The restrictions, above stated, upon the right of a party to impeach his own witness by showing contradictory statements made by such witness, are supported by the soundest reasons, and are based upon the highest considerations of public policy. If the State has the right, upon the plea of impeaching its own witness, to introduce statements made by such witness contradictory of his testimony given in Court, and thus get hearsay before the jury, as original substantive evidence against a defendant, then in all fairness and justice we would be compelled to hold that the defendant had the same right. The far-reaching and ruinous consequences of such a rule are manifest. A defendant could place a witness upon the stand and, after asking him a few general questions, could then ask the witness if he had not made a statement (giving the statement in full) to the defendant, and other persons, which would constitute a complete defense. Upon the denial of the witness that he had made such a statement, the defendant could then place the parties named upon the witness stand and prove that the first witness had made such statements. If a defendant could do as was permitted to be done by the State in this case, it would be impossible to secure a single conviction, and no one would be subject to the pains and penalties of perjury. There are already too many loopholes for the escape of the guilty. This court will not add to or enlarge these avenues of escape; on the contrary, it is our purpose to close them up as far as possible.

For the reasons hereinbefore given, the Court erred in permitting the State to introduce evidence to impeach its own witness McKinley, and erred again in refusing to give the instruction requested by the defendant with reference to such evidence. We are supported in this view by many eminent authorities and well-reasoned cases. . . .

Reversed and remanded.

236. JOHNSTON v. MARRIAGE

SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS. 1906

74 Kan. 208; 86 Pac. 461

ERROR from District Court, Kiowa County; E. H. MADISON, Judge. Action by P. A. Johnston against John Marriage, Jr. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

P. A. Johnston suffered severe loss from a fire which apparently originated upon or near the premises of John Marriage and spread over a large tract of country. He sued Marriage to recover compensation, alleging that his injury was occasioned by Marriage's having "negligently and carelessly set fire to the dry grass of the prairie" while engaged in charring posts. A jury trial was had, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff prosecutes error. . . .

J. W. Davis, for plaintiff in error. L. M. Day, for defendant in error.

MASON, J. (after stating the case as above). The only remaining specification of error requiring discussion relates to an attempt made by the plaintiff to impeach one T. M. Ellsworth, a witness called by the defendant, by showing that he had made a statement out of Court inconsistent with his testimony. This witness was originally called by the plaintiff. He was an employee of the defendant, both when the fire occurred, and at the time of the trial. There is nothing in the record, however, to indicate that this circumstance affected either his manner upon the stand or what he there said, or that the plaintiff was misled by him. He told at the instance of the plaintiff what he knew of the occurrences on the day of the fire, but showed no personal knowledge as to how it originated. Later he was called by the defendant, and went over much the same ground, giving additional particulars as to physical conditions observed by him before, during, and after the fire. On cross-examination he was asked if he had not, at a time and place specified, told two persons that Marriage had been charring posts, and had let the fire get out. He answered that he had not. Upon the rebuttal the plaintiff produced these two persons, and offered to show by them that Ellsworth had made such a statement to them. An objection to the offer was made by the defendant, and the Court sustained the objection. This ruling is the one involved in the specification of error now under consideration. Manifestly the evidence offered was incompetent, except as it might be deemed admissible for the purpose of impairing the credibility of Ellsworth; that is, of impeaching him. The question is therefore presented whether a litigant who first uses a witness may afterwards attempt to impeach him if in the meantime he has been called upon to testify in behalf of the adverse party.

This question is considered in Wigmore on Evidence, where the whole subject of the impeachment of witnesses is discussed historically, with the painstaking thoroughness, and in the light of reason, with the discriminating insight characteristic with that work. The conclusion is there reached (volume 2, § 913) that the usual rule which forbids a party to impeach his own witness operates to prevent an attempted impeachment by one who has first used a witness, notwithstanding that the opposite party afterwards calls him. The rule referred to is enforced in this State, where there are no special circumstances which would make its application work an injustice. State v. Keefe, 54 Kan. 197; 38 Pac. 302. No such circumstances are here shown. We think that for the purpose of this rule Ellsworth was to be deemed the plaintiff's witness, and that it was not error for the Court to refuse to admit the impeaching evidence. The judgment is affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

237. KOESTER v. ROCHESTER CANDY WORKS

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1909

194 N. Y. 92; 87 N. E. 77

APPEAL from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in the fourth judicial department, entered November 16, 1907, affirming a judgment in favor of plaintiff entered upon a verdict and an order denying a motion for a new trial. . . . The action is brought, servant against master, to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the defendant's negligence. The complaint charged the defendant, which conducted a candy factory, with employing the plaintiff, who at the time was an infant under the age of fourteen years, in the operation of dangerous machinery in violation of § 70 of the Labor Law (L. 1897, ch. 415), and that the machinery was not protected by proper safeguards as required by § 81 of that law. The answer put in issue the extent of the plaintiff's injuries and the other allegations of the complaint, except plaintiff's employment and the character of the business carried on by the defendant. The plaintiff recovered a verdict at the Trial Term, which has been affirmed by the Appellate Division by a divided Court.

On the trial, evidence was given by the plaintiff's parents as to the date of his birth, which established that at the time of the accident he was a few months less than fourteen years of age. The defendant gave evidence to the effect that when the plaintiff sought employment he represented that he was more than sixteen years old. . . .

On the trial the plaintiff did not testify in his own behalf as to his age. The question, however, was asked him by the defendant on cross-examination. His testimony was in accord with that given by his parents. For the defense it was sought to prove various declarations made by the plaintiff as to his age. That made to the defendant at the time of his employment was admitted, but those made to third parties at other times were excluded. The ruling is sought to be justified . . . on the further ground that the defendant by examining the plaintiff as to his age made him its own witness and could not impeach him.

P. M. French, for appellant. . . . The trial court erred in rejecting evidence of admissions and other representations of plaintiff as to his age. . . .

George H. Harris, for respondent. . . . The trial Court committed no error in rejecting evidence of other alleged representations of plaintiff as to his age. . . .

CULLEN, Ch. J. (after stating the facts above). The limitations of the rule which forbids a party to impeach his own witness (assuming the plaintiff to have been such, which we do not decide) are well settled. He may not thereafter introduce witnesses to prove that his general reputation is bad and that he is unworthy of credit; nor can he prove statements made out of Court in contradiction of his testimony on the stand, and he cannot contradict him as to collateral facts. But he may prove by competent testimony that the facts material to the issue are the exact reverse of those testified to by his witness, and may ask the jury to disbelieve his statement, and credit that of the later witnesses.

When, however, it is said that one cannot impeach his own witness by contradictory statements made out of Court, this statement must be limited to the case of a witness who is not the adverse party. The effect of such contradictory statements in the case of other witnesses is merely to impeach the witness, because they are mere hearsay and are not proof of the fact stated. The case of an adverse party is the exact reverse. In a civil action the admissions by a party of any fact material to the issue are always competent evidence against him, wherever, whenever or to whomsoever made, excepting, of course, confidential communications the disclosure of which is prohibited by statute, such as from client to counsel, from patient to physician, from penitent to clergyman or priest, and the like.

The cases relied upon by the learned counsel for the plaintiff as asserting a contrary doctrine are not in point. . . . In Coulter v. American M. U. Ex. Co. (56 N. Y. 585) the witness whom it was sought to contradict was not the adverse party. The situation was the same in Fall Brook Coal Co. v. Hewson (158 N. Y. 150). The misconception as to the rule arises from the failure to distinguish between declarations and the admissions of a party, which latter, though undoubtedly declarations, are also very much more. Declarations, as a general rule, are mere hearsay, and, therefore, incompetent, while admissions of a party are original evidence against the party making them, and are as a rule sufficient to establish a cause of action or defense without further evidence of the fact.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

Edward T. Bartlett, Haight, Vann, Hiscock and Chase, JJ., concur; Werner, J., not sitting. Judgment reversed, etc.

238. John H. Wigmore. A Treatise on the System of Evidence, etc. (1905. Vol. II, § 899). The truth is that many Courts affecting to find reasons for this rule against impeaching one's own witness have sought too much in the realm of objective arguments. They have thought of visiting punishment on the head of offending parties, or of leaving them to suffer the consequences of their mistakes. This is not a high-minded nor a practical attitude for a tribunal seeking truth, nor is it in harmony with the policy of other rules of Evidence. This whole attitude must be abandoned. What we are to ask is, Is there anything in the process of impeaching one's own witness which tends to restrict or impair the sources of evidence, to make competent evidence less plentiful or less trustworthy? We should ask, not what the conduct of the party is, but what the effect is upon the witness. Taking this subjective point of view, we find that there is something of a reason — a reason easy to grasp, founded on reality, not on cant, legitimate in its policy, orthodox in its history, though narrow in its scope, — the reason that the party ought not to have the means to coerce his witnesses. It was laid down by Mr. Justice Buller, a century and a half ago, in terms which have been frequently quoted, — more often quoted than acknowledged (as Serjeant Evans once said of his own writings).

The true foundation of policy (so far as there is any) is thus manifest. If it were permissible, and therefore common, to impeach the character of one's witness whose testimony had been disappointing, no witness would care to risk the abuse of his character which might then be launched at him by the disappointed party. This fear of the possible consequences would operate subjectively to prevent a repentant witness from recanting a previously falsified story, and would more or less affect every witness who knew that the party calling him expected him to tell a particular story. Of this sort of abuse from the opposite side the witness is even now sufficiently afraid; were he liable to it from either side indiscriminately, the terrors of the witness-box would be doubled. Speculative as this danger may be, it furnishes the only shred of reason on which the rule may be supported. Moreover, it is the only reason which allows the details of the rule to be worked out consistently. What is this fear which we desire to save the witness? It must be a fear that would operate upon the ordinary witness honestly inclined. The fear that his character will be abused, — this is certainly a tangible and sufficient consideration. On the other hand, the fear that he will be shown to be affected by bias or interest, — this involves nothing disgraceful or derogatory to character, and is hardly worth considering. Thus this reason tests efficiently the various details of the rule.

But, after all, it is a reason of trifling practical weight. It cannot appreciably affect an honest and reputable witness. The only person whom it could really concern is the disreputable and shifty witness; and what good reason is there why he should not be exposed? That he would adhere to false testimony solely for fear of exposure by the party calling him is unlikely; because his reputation would in that case equally be used against him by the opponent. It therefore becomes merely a question which of the two parties may properly expose him. Is there any reason of moral fairness which forbids this to the party calling him? The rational answer must be in the negative.

There is no substantial reason for preserving this rule — the remnant of a primitive notion. Except the Opinion rule, no other rule of evidence does so much harm and so little good. It ought to be completely discarded.

Topic 3. Rules Limiting Corroboration of Witnesses

240. BATE v. HILL

This was an action for seducing the plaintiff's daughter. . . .

The whole of the cross-examination went to show, that the plaintiff's daughter had conducted herself immodestly towards the defendant before the seduction, and that she kept improper company. Several witnesses were then called, on the part of the plaintiff, to prove the general good character, and modest deportment of the plaintiff's daughter, and the general respectability of the family. The defendant called no witnesses.

Verdict for the plaintiff, damages, 50£.

Reporter's Note. This controverts the case of Dodd v. Norris, 3 Camp. N. P. C. 519, where Lord Ellenborough ruled, that witnesses to show the general good character of the daughter, could only be called, if her character had been attacked by witnesses called for the defendant, to prove her general bad character; but if her character was only attacked in her cross-examination, the plaintiff's counsel were only entitled to set it right by her re-examination, and not to call witnesses to give her a good character; and in that case, her character having been attacked only in her cross-examination, Lord ELLENBOROUGH refused to allow witnesses to be called by the plaintiff's counsel in favor of her general character. The course allowed by Mr. Justice PARK, in the present case, is much more conducive to the attainment of justice; for it can signify very little, whether the daughter's character is attacked by witnesses, or by cross-examination; and if it is right in one case, where it is attacked, to give further evidence, so it must be in the other. Lord ELLENBOROUGH says, that it is to be set right in re-examination. This looks very well in theory. Those used to Courts of Justice well know, that if the character of a party seduced is attacked in her cross-examination, though the witness may deny the things insinuated, a jury very often believe, that, though denied, there is some foundation for the insinuation, if witnesses are not called to convince them of the contrary. It is a little too much, to allow a defendant to blast the character of a person he has seduced by insinuations, and then not to allow her to clear her character by the best means in her power.

241. TEDENS v. SCHUMERS

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1884

112 Ill. 263

APPEAL from the Appellate Court for the First District; — heard in that court on appeal from the Circuit Court of Cook County; the Hon. JOHN G. ROGERS, Judge, presiding.

Mr. Edward F. Comstock, and Mr. J. Edwards Fay, for the appellants. As a general rule it is not competent to give evidence of the general character of a witness for truth and veracity, unless an attempt has been made to impeach him. A mere contradiction in the testimony of witnesses does not necessarily involve their moral character, and does not, alone, authorize the admission of evidence in support of their general reputation for truth. . . .

Mr. W. C. Minard, and Mr. W. H. Skelly, for the appellee. After the defendants had assailed the character of the plaintiff by an effort to prove that he was a thief, and attempted to impeach him by proof that he had made contradictory statements out of Court to his testimony, the admission of evidence of his good character was proper. Craig v. Rohrer, 63 Ill. 335. . . .

Mr. Justice WALKER delivered the opinion of the Court:

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by Schumers, in the Circuit Court of Cook County, against J. H. Tedens and J. Thormahlm. There was filed the general issue, under which a trial was had, resulting in a verdict and judgment against defendants for $1379. . . .

It appears from the evidence that appellants owned a general store, which was kept by them in Lemont, in Cook County. Appellee, after being in their employment for thirteen or fourteen years, commenced business on his own account; but, it proving unsuccessful, he soon abandoned it, and returned to the employment of appellants, and he so remained until on the 1st of June, 1879, when, on a settlement, they were found to be indebted to him in the sum of $2100, to evidence which they drew and gave to him a due bill, drawing eight per cent. interest. Appellee continued in their employment until in March, 1880, when defendants claimed to have discovered that appellee was secretly removing goods from the store without either paying for or charging them to himself. They also claimed that he confessed that he had so acted for near four years past. They claimed the amount so taken aggregated $4000, and, after several interviews, they claim that it was arranged that to satisfy their demand he surrendered the due bill, and they cancelled it, and have since held it. Appellee insists that he did not surrender the due bill as a satisfaction of such claim on the part of appellants, but that it was agreed that they should hold it until they could examine and ascertain the amount he owed them for goods thus taken, credit the amount on the due bill, and pay him the balance, if any, which they have never done.

On the trial, appellee testified to his theory of the case. Appellants, on the stand, contradicted him, and testified to their version of the matter. In some portions of their evidence they are corroborated by other witnesses. Appellee, to support his testimony, called a number of witnesses to prove his general character for truth and veracity, to which appellants objected, but the Court admitted the evidence, and they excepted, and urge its admission as error.

Appellee claims this evidence was admissible, on the ground that his character for truth and veracity was attacked by being contradicted by other witnesses. This is, we think, a misconception of the rule. As we understand the rules of evidence, a witness cannot call witnesses to support his general character for truth and veracity until it is assailed. Mere contradictions, or different versions by witnesses, do not justify the application of the rule that he may call witnesses to support his character for truth. When witnesses are called who say his general character is bad, then he may call witnesses in support of his general character. Before he can do so his general character must be attacked. If the practice sanctioned the calling of witnesses to prove general character whenever a witness is contradicted, it would render trials interminable. The greater portion of the time of Courts would be liable to be engaged in the attack and support of the characters of witnesses. If permitted, each of the contradicting witnesses would have the same right, and not only so, but all of the supporting witnesses on each side contradicting each other would be entitled to the same privilege. It is thus seen that the rule must be limited to cases where witnesses are called to impeach the general character of a witness; otherwise, instead of reaching truth by the verdict, it would tend to stifle it under a large number of side issues, calculated to obscure and not to elucidate them. It may be that some Courts have made exceptions to the rule, but we are not inclined to adopt them as the rule. Many cases referred to were where the witness was charged with crime by other witnesses, when it was held he might call witnesses to support his character for honesty. . . .

For the errors indicated, the judgment of the Appellate Court is reversed, and the cause remanded. Judgment reversed.

Scohlfield, Ch. J., and Dickey and Mulkey, JJ., dissenting.

242. GERTZ v. FITCHBURG R. CO.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. 1884

137 Mass. 77

Tort, for personal injuries received by the plaintiff while in the defendant's employ. At the trial in the Superior Court, before Aldrich, J., the jury returned a verdict for the defendant; and the plaintiff alleged exceptions to the exclusion of certain evidence, which appears in the opinion.

J. J. Myers, for the plaintiff. C. A. Welch, for the defendant.

Holmes, J. — In this case, the plaintiff having testified as a witness, the defendant put in evidence the record of his conviction in 1876, in the United States District Court, of the crime of falsely personating a United States revenue officer. The plaintiff then offered evidence of his character and present reputation for veracity, which was excluded, subject to his exception.

We think that the evidence of his reputation for truth should have been admitted, and that the exception must be sustained. There is a clear distinction between this case and those in which such evidence has been held inadmissible, for instance, to rebut evidence of contradictory statements; Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. 143; Brown v. Mooers, 6 Gray 451; or where the witness is directly contradicted as to the principal fact by other witnesses. Atwood v. Dearborn, 1 Allen 483.

In such cases, it is true that the result sought to be reached is the same as in the present, — to induce the jury to disbelieve the witness. But the mode of reaching the result is different. For, while contradiction or proof of contradictory statements may very well have the incidental effect of impeaching the character for truth of the contradicted witness in the minds of the jury, the proof is not directed to that point. The purpose and only direct effect of the evidence are to show that the witness is not be to believed in this instance. But the reason why he is not to be believed is left untouched. That may be found in forgetfulness on the part of the witness, or in his having been deceived, or in any other possible cause. The disbelief sought to be produced is perfectly consistent with an admission of his general good character for truth, as well as for the other virtues; and until the character of a witness is assailed, it cannot be fortified by evidence.

On the other hand, when it is proved that a witness has been convicted of a crime, the only ground for disbelieving him which such proof affords is the general readiness to do evil which the conviction may be supposed to show. It is from that general disposition alone that the jury is asked to infer a readiness to lie in the particular case, and thence that he has lied in fact. The evidence has no tendency to prove that he was mistaken, but only that he has perjured himself, and it reaches that conclusion solely through the general proposition that he is of bad character and unworthy of credit. 1 Gilbert, Evidence (6th ed.) 126. The conviction in the United States District Court was for a felony punishable with imprisonment. . . . And when a conviction is admitted for that purpose, it always may be rebutted by evidence of good character for truth. Commonwealth v. Green, ubi supra. Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. 143, 154. Rex v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241. Webb v. State, 29 Ohio St. 351.

It is true that a doubt is thrown upon this doctrine in Harrington v. Lincoln, 4 Gray 563, 568; but that case was decided on the ground that the cross-examination which showed that the witness had been charged with a crime also showed that he had been acquitted, and cannot be regarded as an authority against our decision, whether the "ratio decidendi" adopted be reconcilable with later cases or not. Commonwealth v. Ingraham, 7 Gray 46. . . . Whether any different rule would apply when the fact is only brought out on cross-examination we need not consider.

The exception to the exclusion of evidence that the witness was innocent of the offence of which he was convicted, and explaining why he was convicted, is not much pressed, and is overruled. Commonwealth v. Gallagher, 126 Mass. 54. Exceptions sustained.

243. Knox's and Lane's Trial. (1679. Howell's State Trials, VII, 763, 787). [The defendants were charged with libelling Messrs. Oates and Bedlow, who had been witnesses for the Crown in the Popish Plot trial.]

Recorder. — Call Henry Wiggins and his mother. (Who were both sworn.)

Att. Gen. — Come on, Mr. Wiggins, what do you know of any endeavors of Knox or Lane, or any of these persons, to take off or scandalize Mr. Oates's or Mr. Bedlow's testimony?

L. C. J. — What is this man's name?

Att. Gen. — Henry Wiggins.

Wiggins. — About the latter end of February last, Mr. Knox and I met at Charing Cross, and we went in and drank together; and he proposed several things to me; first he desired that I would get for him a copy of the papers my master had.

L. C. J. — Who is your master?

Wiggins. — Mr. Bedlow. And especially what concerned my Lord Treasurer; as also to take a journal of all my master's actions; and the names of the persons that came to him. . . . And he said, moreover, my lord, Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow were two great rogues; that the king believed not a word they said; and as soon as he had heard all they could say, they should be hanged. . . .

Mr. Williams. — Call Mr. Palmer. (Who was sworn.) We call him to corroborate what that young man Wiggins hath said.

Palmer. — What he hath told here, he discovered first to me, and I discovered to his master, that Mr. Knox would have had him to take a journal of his master's actions, and to give it him every day. My lord, I am one of the yeomen of the guard, and I waited upon Mr. Bedlow, and he desired me to help him to a clerk; and I helped him to Wiggins, this young man. He had not been there three weeks, or a very little time, when Knox came to him to tempt him; and being a stranger to his master he knew not how to discover it to him, and told me, "such a thing is offered to me, but I am a stranger to my master, and I know not how to break it to him."

L. C. J. — The use you make of this, is no more, but only to corroborate what he hath said, that he told it him while it was fresh, and that it is no new matter of his invention now.

Mr. Recorder. — It is very right, my lord, that is the use we make of it.

244. Chief Baron Gilbert. Evidence. (Ante 1726. fol. 68, 150). Though hearsay may not be allowed as direct evidence, yet it may be in corroboration of a witness' testimony, to show that he affirmed the same thing before on other occasions and that the witness is still consistent with himself; . . . [he then makes an exception for former sworn testimony,] for if a man be of that ill mind to swear falsely at one trial, he may well do the same on the other on the same inducements; but what a man says in discourse without premeditation or expectation of the cause in question is good evidence to support him.

245. STOLP v. BLAIR

68 Ill. 541

Appeal from the Court of Common Pleas of the city of Aurora; the Hon. Richard G. Montony, Judge presiding.

Mr. B. F. Parks, for the appellant. Messrs. Wheaton, Smith & McDole, for the appellee.

Mr. Justice Sheldon delivered the opinion of the Court:

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by Blair against Stolp, to recover $500, money alleged to have been loaned by the former to the latter. The plaintiff below recovered, and the defendant appealed. Three certain rulings of the Court below in the admission of evidence are assigned for error, as also that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

The first ruling excepted to was, in allowing Blair to testify as to his manner of doing business with other persons in the respect of making loans of money without taking notes. He had testified that, on the 18th of September, 1871, he lent Stolp $500 for six months, and that he took no note. The uncommonness of making a loan of money, of such an amount, for so long a time, might have afforded ground for an unfavorable inference against the truth of the statement of the witness. . . .

The other ruling excepted to was, in the admission of the following testimony of the witness Bailes: "I borrowed $10 of Blair; am not positive about date, but I think it was on Friday of that week (of Sept. 18, 1871). I spoke of giving a note for the money I borrowed, and Blair said: 'I loaned $500 to Mr. Stolp, and did not take a note; I would not think of taking a note of you for $10.'" The witness further stated, Blair said he let Henry Stolp have $500. The 18th day of September, the day of the alleged loan, was Monday. It is contended by appellee's counsel that this statement of Blair, of his loan of $500 to Stolp, was properly admitted as rebutting testimony to sustain Blair, after the defendant below had attempted to impair the credibility of Blair on cross-examination, and by testimony contradicting him.

This Court, in Gates v. The People, 14 Ill. 434, recognized the existence of a conflict of authority upon the question whether the former declarations of a witness, whose credibility is attacked, may be given in evidence to corroborate his testimony, but did not find it necessary in that case to determine in regard to the general rule, as that case came within one of the admitted exceptions to the rule of exclusion. We find the decided weight of authority to be, that proof of declarations made by a witness out of court, in corroboration of testimony given by him on the trial of a cause, is, as a general rule, inadmissible, even after the witness has been impeached or discredited; and we are satisfied with the correctness of the rule. The following may be referred to among the authorities sustaining such rule: 2 Phillipps, Evidence, 5th Ed. 973, marginal; 1 Starkie, Evidence, 147; 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 469; Robb et al. v. Hackley et al., 23 Wend. 50; Gibbs v. Tinsley, 13 Verm. 208; Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Pet. 412; Conrad v. Griffey, 11 How. 480. . . .

In some places, as in England and New York, the rule has been adopted in the place of a prior contrary one. As recognized in Gates v. The People, supra, the authorities agree that the former statements of the witness may, in some instances, be introduced for the purpose of sustaining his testimony; as, where he is charged with testifying under the influence of some motive prompting him to make a false statement, it may be shown that he made similar statements at a time when the imputed motive did not exist, or when motives of interest would have induced him to make a different statement of facts. So, in contradiction of evidence tending to show that the witness' account of the transaction was a fabrication of a recent date, it may be shown that he gave a similar account before its effect and operation could be foreseen. In some cases the admission of the confirmatory statement has been confined to the sole case of an impeachment by a contradictory statement of the witness; and again, such confirmatory statements have been held to be especially not admissible, if they were made subsequent to the contradictions proved on the other side, as in Ellicott v. Pearl, supra, and Conrad v. Griffey, supra.

In the case under consideration, there were no contradictory statements of Blair introduced in evidence. There was nothing further in the way of impeachment than that it was sought to impeach him on cross-examination, and that there was contradictory testimony to his in the case. The statement of Blair, which was admitted, does not come within any of the admitted exceptions to the general rule of inadmissibility. It was his mere declaration of the fact made not under oath, which was not evidence. We are of opinion that, on principle and authority, it was not competent, and was wrongly received. As we find this a sufficient ground for reversal, we will express no opinion upon the weight of the evidence.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded. Judgment reversed.

246. STATE v. PARISH

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA. 1878

79 N. C. 610

INDICTMENT for larceny, tried at May Term, 1878, of Wake Criminal Court, before STRONG, J.

It was in evidence that John Jones had lost two sheep between the 20th and 28th of August, 1876, and that the defendant at that time owned no sheep. One Dick Young, a witness for the State, testified that soon after Jones lost them he saw the sheep shut up in an old out-house in possession of defendant, and a short distance from his residence; that when he saw them he was in company with his son, Thomas Young, the witness next introduced, whose testimony corroborated the above, and during whose examination he was ordered by the Court to stop, but failing to do so, was ordered several times by the defendant's counsel in a loud and disrespectful manner, to stop. The State next proposed to prove by one Lewis Jones, in order to confirm the evidence of the two first witnesses, that Thomas Young, shortly after the loss of the sheep and before the defendant had been accused of the larceny or receiving, etc., had made the same statement to the witness that he had given to the jury. The defendant objected to the evidence, the Court overruled the objection, and the witness said that Young had made the same statement to him. . . .

There was a verdict of not guilty of larceny, but guilty of receiving, etc. Judgment. Appeal by the defendant.

Attorney-General, D. G. Fowle and W. H. Pace, for the State. Mr. T. M. Argo, for the defendant.

READE, J.: It can scarcely be satisfactory to any mind to say that if a witness testifies to a statement to-day under oath, it strengthens the statement to prove that he said the same thing yesterday when not under oath. If the proposition were reversed, as if one make a statement to-day not under oath, it strengthens the statement to show that he said the same yesterday under oath, it would be conceded because of the sanction of the oath. And yet it must be conceded that it is settled by the weight of authority both of text writers and decided cases, that when a witness testifies to a statement under oath, and the witness is impeached, he may be supported by proving that on a former occasion he had made the same statement, although not under oath. As first administered, the rule was sensible and useful. A witness was called and testified and impeached upon the ground of some new relation to the cause or to the parties, and then other witnesses were called to prove that he had made the same statement prior to such new relation or supposed influence, or where from lapse of time his memory was impeached it was proved that he made the same statement when the memory was fresh. All that was sensible and useful. But the idea that the mere repetition of a story gives it any force or proves its truth, is contrary to common observation and experience that a falsehood may be repeated as often as the truth. Indeed it has never been supposed by any writer or judge that the repetition had any force as substantive evidence to prove the facts, but only to remove an imputation upon the witness. It is like to evidence of character which only affects the witness.

For illustration: Thomas Young, one of the witnesses for the State, swore that he saw the stolen property in the possession of the defendant. He was not cross-examined, not contradicted, his character was not assailed, nor was he in any way impeached, but stood before the Court as any other witness upon his merits. And the State, lest his story might not be believed, proved by another witness that he had heard him tell the same story before. Now suppose Thomas Young had not been a witness at all, would it have been competent for the State to prove that he had said upon some occasion that he had seen the stolen property in the defendant's possession? Of course not. It would have been nothing but hearsay. If then it would not have been evidence to prove the fact, if Thomas Young had not been a witness, how was it evidence to prove the fact, he being a witness? It was not evidence to prove the fact in the one case more than in the other. He being a witness, such testimony would have been competent to remove some imputation upon him if any had been cast, and for that purpose only; and as no imputation had been cast upon him, there was no purpose for which it was competent. If he stood before the Court unimpeached, it was unnecessary and mischievous to encumber the Court and oppress the defendant with his garrulousness out of Court and when not on oath. . . .

But a more palpable error than this was committed. The former declarations of Thomas Young were admitted not only to "confirm his own evidence" but to "confirm the evidence" of another witness, Dick Young. This is without precedent. As well might it be said that to prove one of a dozen witnesses to be of good character is to prove all to be so, or to sustain one is to sustain all. This is put upon the ground that both witnesses testified as to the same facts, and therefore, if one was to be believed, so was the other. Let us see if that is so: — A and B both swore that they were in the city of New York on the 4th of July last and witnessed the celebrations of the day which they describe. A was in fact there, but it is proved by a dozen witnesses that B was not there but was in Raleigh; would it "confirm the evidence" of B to prove that A had given the same account of the celebration before the trial as upon the trial? Clearly not. No more does the former consistent account of Thomas Young "confirm the evidence" of Dick Young. . . . Error.

Venire de novo.

247. HEWITT v. COREY

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1890

150 Mass. 445; 23 N. E. 223

TORT by a married woman against a deputy sheriff for the conversion of a horse. Trial in the Superior Court, before DUNBAR, J., who allowed a bill of exceptions, which appear in the opinion.

Mrs. Hewitt sued for the conversion of a horse, which the defendant had attached as property of her husband. The question was, whether the horse belonged to her or to her husband. He testified in her behalf that he was not the owner. In order to discredit his testimony, it was shown on his cross-examination that he had formerly included it in a mortgage of personal property given by him; but he added, that he did not know that the horse was included when he signed the mortgage, and that as soon as he found that it was, he went to the mortgagee and told him that the horse did not belong to him, and ought not to be embraced in the mortgage. This testimony came in without objection, and the defendant made no motion to strike it out as irresponsive or incompetent. The plaintiff, afterwards, called one of the mortgagees, by way of confirmation of her husband's explanation, who testified, that a day or two, perhaps longer, after the mortgage was signed, the husband came to him and told him the horse did not belong to him and ought not to be in the mortgage. This, according to the testimony, was before the attachment by the defendant. The defendant's exception is to this testimony by the mortgagee.

The case was argued at the bar in October, 1889, and afterwards was submitted on the briefs to all the judges except MORTON, C. J.

W. H. Fox, for the defendant. S. M. Thomas, for the plaintiff.

C. ALLEN, J. (after stating the case as above). It was held in Commonwealth v. Wilson, 1 Gray 337, 340, that the rule excluding such testimony does not apply to a case where the other party has sought to impeach the witness on cross-examination. This decision was affirmed in Commonwealth v. Jenkins, 10 Gray 485, 489, 490, where it is said that such confirmatory evidence is competent where a witness is sought to be impeached by evidence tending to show that, at the time of giving his evidence, he is under a strong bias, or in such a situation as to put him under a sort of moral duress to testify in a particular way; or where an attempt is made to impeach the credit of a witness by showing that he formerly withheld or concealed the facts to which he has now testified. In the present case, the witness had done an act which, unexplained, appeared to be inconsistent with his testimony, and to show that at the time of giving the mortgage he claimed to own the horse. His explanation, if believed, went to show that he did not consciously do anything which amounted to an assertion of title in himself. His statement to the mortgagee, made before the present controversy arose, would have a legitimate tendency to confirm his explanation, and if he might himself testify to this statement, there can be no good reason why the mortgagee might not also testify to the same thing.

Clearly distinguishable from this is a case where it appears that the witness has at other times made statements inconsistent with his testimony, and where it is plain that he must have been false at one time or the other. In such case he is discredited by reason of his contradictory statements at different times, and it is no restoration of his credit to show that at still other times he has made statements in accordance with his testimony. This distinction is clearly pointed out and dwelt upon in Commonwealth v. Jenkins, ubi supra. In the present case, let it be assumed, by way of making a strong illustration, that the witness when signing the mortgage was the victim of imposition or fraud, whereby the horse was inserted therein without his knowledge, he being blind, or illiterate, and that he made a great outcry as soon as he discovered the fact, and took steps to correct the mistake and to punish the perpetrators; certainly this would be fair testimony for the consideration of any tribunal which might have to pass upon the facts. The testimony of the mortgagee in the present case does not differ in principle, and its competency is supported, not only by the authorities cited, but by the decisions of other courts, and by various text-books. Robb v. Hackley, 23 Wend. 50. Hester v. Commonwealth, 85 Penn. St. 139, 158. . . .

For these reasons, in the opinion of a majority of the Court, the entry must be Exceptions overruled.

Topic 4. Rules Excluding Party's Admissions and Confessions

Sub-topic A. In General

250. Theory.[1] (1) Just as a witness' testimony is discredited when it appears that on another occasion he has made a statement inconsistent with that testimony, so also the party is discredited when it appears that on some other occasion he has made a statement inconsistent with his present claim. This is the simple theory upon which a party's admissions— of the informal sort, which might better be termed "quasi-admissions" — are every day received in evidence on behalf of his opponent. A witness speaks in court through his testimony only, and hence his testimony forms the sole basis upon which the inconsistency of his other statement is predicated. But the party, whether he himself takes the stand or not, speaks always through his pleadings and through the testimony of his witnesses put forward to support his pleadings; hence the basis upon which may be predicated a discrediting inconsistency on his part includes the whole range of facts asserted in his pleadings and in the testimony relied on by him. Thus, in effect, and broadly, anything said by the party may be used against him as an admission, provided it exhibits the quality of inconsistency with the facts now asserted by him in pleading or in testimony.

(2) It follows that the subject of an admission is not limited to facts against the party's interest at the time. No doubt the weight of credit to be given to such statements is increased when the fact stated is against the person's interest at the time; but that circumstance has no bearing upon their admissibility. On principle, it is plain that every prior statement of the party, exhibiting an inconsistency with his present claim, tends to throw doubt upon it, whether he was at the time speaking apparently in his own favor or against his own interest. For example, a plaintiff who now claims a debt of $100 is clearly discredited by having made a demand a month ago for only $50, even if at the time the debtor conceded only $25 and thus put the demandant in the position of making an assertion purely in his own favor and for the aggrandizement of his claim. If the principle upon which admissions were received rested at all upon the disserving quality of the fact asserted at the time of assertion, all such statements would be as certainly rejected when offered by the opponent as they would be when offered by the party himself in his own favor.

251. State v. Willis. (1898. Connecticut. 71 Conn. 293, 41 Atl. 820). Hamersley, J. Admissions are not admitted as testimony of the declarant in respect to any facts in issue. . . . They are admitted because conduct of a party to the proceeding, in respect to the matter in dispute, whether by acts, speech, or writing, which is clearly inconsistent with the truth of his contention, is a fact relevant to the issue.

252. HEANE v. ROGERS

9 B. & C. 577

Trover for goods and chattels. Plea, not guilty. At the trial before Gaselee, J., at the Summer assizes for the county of Gloucester, 1828, it appeared that in August, 1826, a commission of bankrupt had issued against the plaintiff, under which he was declared a bankrupt. The defendants were his assignees, and in that character had possessed themselves of and sold the goods mentioned in the declaration. The action was brought to try the validity of the commission, the plaintiff contending that he was not a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt laws. . . .

The defendants contended that even if the plaintiff was not a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt law, he was estopped by his conduct from disputing the validity of the commission. The evidence to that point was as follows: About a week before the sale of the goods, the plaintiff, the auctioneer, and the assignees, met and consulted together as to the best means of disposing of the property. The plaintiff, at the time when the commission issued, was in possession of a farm, which he held under a lease from Messrs. Wilkins, at an annual rent of 350£, for a term of which more than a year and a half was unexpired. The farm had not yielded him any profit for the two preceding years. On the 12th of September, 1826, the plaintiff, pursuant to the statute 6 G. 4, c. 16, s. 75, gave the following notice to W. Wilkins, Esq., and W. Wilkins, Esq., the younger: — "I, the undersigned, James Heane, of the city of Gloucester, brickmaker, dealer, and chapman, a bankrupt, do hereby give you notice that I am ready and willing, and hereby offer to give up and deliver unto you a certain indenture purporting to be a lease of Walsworth Hall estate, dated the 17th of September, 1817, made between you the said W. Wilkins and W. Wilkins the younger, of the one part, and myself of the other part, and also the possession of the messuages, lands, hereditaments, and premises therein comprised." In consequence of this notice the lessors accepted the lease, and received possession of the premises. Upon this evidence it was contended . . . by the defendant's counsel, that assuming the commission to be invalid, the plaintiff, who had availed himself of it to get rid of his lease, and his liability thereon, was estopped from disputing the validity of the commission under which the defendants acted; and Watson v. Wace, 5 B. & C. 155, was cited. . . . The learned judge told the jury that, in his opinion, the defendants were entitled to a verdict; but he desired them to find specially whether the land had or had not been taken for the express purpose of making bricks, and they found that it had. He then directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants, but reserved liberty to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for 440£., the value of the goods, if the Court should be of opinion that he was not estopped, and also that he was not a person liable to become bankrupt within the meaning of the 6 G. 4, c. 16, s. 2. A rule nisi having been obtained for that purpose, Taunton, Campbell, and Phillpotts, showed cause. The plaintiff was a trader within the meaning of the 6 G. 4, c. 16, s. 2. . . . But assuming that the commission cannot be supported in that respect, the bankrupt is estopped by his own acts from disputing its validity, for he interfered in the sale of the goods. . . .

Ludlow and Russell, Serjts., contra. The plaintiff's interference in the sale was such as to show, not that he assented to the commission, but that he intended to take care of the property, so that the most should be made of it. . . .

Bayley, J., now delivered the judgment of the Court:

Upon the report in this case, two questions arise for our consideration first, Whether the plaintiff was estopped from disputing the validity of the commission under which the defendant acted; and, secondly, if he was not, whether the commission was valid.

1. The circumstances relied upon at the trial, and by the defendant's counsel in argument, as precluding the plaintiff from contesting his bankruptcy, were, first, his interference relative to the sale of his effects, for the conversion of which by such sale, this action was brought; and, secondly, his having given notice to the landlords of a farm which he held (Messrs. Wilkins), describing himself as a brickmaker, dealer and chapman, and a bankrupt, and offering to give up his lease, which appears to have been afterwards accepted. The learned Judge thought on the trial, that the interference of the plaintiff in the sale was referable to an intention on his part, to take care of the property, and see that the most was made of it; and that it did not amount to a consent to the sale, and that he was not estopped on that ground; but he thought that as he had availed himself of the commission to derive a benefit from it, by the surrender of his lease, he was estopped by that act from saying that he was not a bankrupt; though he reserved the point for the consideration of the Court. In the former opinion we entirely concur, in the latter we are not able to acquiesce. There is no doubt but that the express admissions of a party to the suit, or admissions implied from his conduct, are evidence, and strong evidence, against him. But we think that he is at liberty to prove that such admissions were mistaken or were untrue, and is not estopped or concluded by them, unless another person has been induced by them to alter his condition; in such a case the party is estopped from disputing their truth with respect to that person (and those claiming under him), and that transaction; but as to third persons he is not bound. It is a well established rule of law, that estoppels bind parties and privies, not strangers. (Coke on Littleton, 352 a. Comyn's Digest, Estoppel (C.).) The offer of surrender made in this case, was to a stranger to this suit. . . .

2. The second question is, Whether the commission was invalid. The objection is, that the bankrupt was not a trader, and we are of opinion that he was not. . . .

Therefore, we are of opinion that the plaintiff was not a trader; and as he was not estopped from resisting this commission against him, the rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff for 440£. must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

253. Corser v. Paul. (1860. New Hampshire. 31 N. H. 24, 31). Bell. J, C. There is a class of admissions which may be either express or implied from silence, or acquiescence, which are conclusive. Such are admissions which have been acted upon, or those which have been made to influence the conduct of others, or to derive some advantage to the party, and which, therefore, cannot be denied without a breach of good faith. As if, for example, in the present case, the defendant had stood by and seen this note offered to the bank for discount; and, being aware of what was doing, had been silent; or if, before the discount he had been spoken to by any of the officers of the bank in relation to the note, and, being aware of the facts, had forborne to deny the signature — by these tacit admissions he would be forever concluded to deny the note to be his, in case the bank discounted it. This is but an application of the same principle that is applied in the case of deeds of real estate, that he who stands by, at the sale of his property by another person, without objecting, will be precluded from contesting the purchaser's title.

254. KITCHEN v. ROBBINS

29 Ga. 713

Certiorari, in Richmond Superior Court. Decision by Judge Holt, at October Term, 1859.

This cause arose in the City Court of Augusta, being an action on the case brought by William K. Kitchen, against Stephen B. Robbins, to recover the value of a gold watch and eighty-five dollars in money, alleged to have been stolen from plaintiff, on the night of the 27th day of December, 1858, from the room occupied by him in the inn or hotel, kept by defendant in the city of Augusta, and while plaintiff was asleep in the room. After proving that the defendant kept a common inn in the city of Augusta, on or about the 27th day of December, 1858, and that on or about that day, plaintiff and his family were guests at said inn, plaintiff proved by Curtis H. Shockley, who was examined by commission, that during the month of December, 1858, the defendant, Stephen B. Robbins, informed him, that the plaintiff had lost some money and (as witness thought) a gold watch also.

Plaintiff, by his attorneys, then offered as evidence, his own testimony, taken by commission, for the purpose of proving his actual loss. . . . The Court ruled out the testimony of the plaintiff, who excepted at the time to the decision. The plaintiff then placed the defendant, Stephen B. Robbins, on the stand; by whom he proved that on the night of the 27th day of December, 1858, the plaintiff, his wife and daughter were guests at his inn, and that he had been paid in full for their board. Plaintiff's counsel then asked of the defendant, whether or not he believed that the plaintiff was robbed of said watch and money on said night, and requested him to give the reasons of his belief. The defendant replied that he had no belief except what was founded upon the statements of the plaintiff to him. The Court refused to allow the defendant to give his belief, though insisted upon by plaintiff's counsel; to which refusal the plaintiff excepted. Plaintiff again offered in evidence his own testimony, upon the grounds aforesaid, which the Court refused to allow as evidence, and plaintiff again excepted. The case was then submitted to the jury, who found for the defendant.

Upon this statement of facts, a writ of certiorari was granted; and after argument on both sides in the Superior Court for said county, the Judge of that Court ordered a new trial, upon the grounds that "the loss having been proven by the admissions of the defendant," the "testimony of the plaintiff was admissible to prove the amount and value of the property lost." And, secondly, that the plaintiff, when the defendant was put upon the stand, "was entitled, on the direct examination, to have his belief, and the reasons of his belief."

To which decision defendant, by his counsel excepted, and tenders this bill of exceptions, and says that Court erred: 1st. In holding that the admission of the defendant, founded upon the statements of the plaintiff, was sufficient evidence of the fact of loss, to admit any evidence of the value of the loss. . . . 3rd. In deciding that the defendant when placed upon the stand by the plaintiff as his witness, might be compelled, on the direct examination, to give his belief, and the reasons of his belief, as to any fact not within his own knowledge.

John H. Hull, and Edward J. Walker, for plaintiff in error. Millers & Jackson, contra.

By the Court, — STEPHENS, J., delivering the opinion:

(1) The first error assigned is on the ruling that the admissions of the defendant founded on statements to him by the plaintiff, were sufficient proof of the fact of loss, to authorize the introduction of evidence concerning the amount of the loss. I remark in the first place, the admission did not appear to have been founded on statements of the plaintiff, so far as was disclosed by Mr. Shockley, who was the witness that testified to the admissions. He stated the admissions to have been made without any qualification or suspicion expressed as to their truth, and without any mention of the source from which the defendant's knowledge of the facts had been derived. We think the testimony of this witness was sufficient proof of the fact of loss, to authorize the introduction of evidence to show its amount, and it was not for the Judge to pronounce that the testimony of this witness was to be weakened or destroyed by the subsequent statement of the defendant, that all his knowledge had been derived from the plaintiff. The jury was the tribunal to compare the witnesses, and weigh the evidence. But why should not the admissions be good evidence even if founded on the statements of the other party? Are no admissions good against a party, unless founded on his personal knowledge? The admissions would not be made except on evidence which satisfies the party who is making them against his own interest, that they are true, and that is evidence to the jury that they are true.

Admissions do not come in on the ground that the party making them is speaking from his personal knowledge, but upon the ground that a party will not make admissions against himself unless they are true. The fact that he makes them against his interest can be reasonably explained only on the supposition that he is constrained to do so by the force of the evidence. The source from which a knowledge of the facts is derived, is a circumstance for the party to consider, in estimating the value of the evidence, but that is all.

(2) And on the same principle as well as on another, we think the plaintiff had a right to the belief of the defendant when the latter was on the stand as a witness, under our statute. He was a party as well as a witness, and on the principle just stated, the plaintiff would have been permitted to prove, that the defendant had said, he believed the plaintiff had lost the watch and money. He would have been permitted to prove that the plaintiff had said so, in the presence of the defendant, and that the latter did not deny it. This evidence would show no personal knowledge of the fact stated, on the part of the silent party, but it raises a presumption that he believed it. The belief of a man against his own interest is a fact for the jury to consider as evidence, and if this belief may be proven by admissions before witnesses or inferred from silence, surely it may be proven by the oath of a witness who knows, as the party does know, what his belief is. Courts of equity will require parties to answer not only according to their knowledge, but also according to their belief; and our Act, which permits one party to put the other on the stand as a witness, is stated in its very caption to be a mode of obtaining a discovery at common law, in lieu of going into equity. And this is the additional principle on which the belief of the defendant was admissible evidence. . . . Judgment affirmed.

255. THE KING v. THE INHABITANTS OF HARDWICK

11 East 578

An appeal against an order for the removal of Joseph Vipond, Mary his wife, and their children, by name, was entered at the sessions in the name of "The Churchwardens and Overseers of the Poor of the Parish of Hardwick in the County of Norfolk, Appellants, and the Churchwardens and Overseers of the Poor of the Parish of Fulham Saint Mary the Virgin, in the same County, Respondents." And upon the hearing of the appeal, the Sessions confirmed the order, subject to the opinion of this Court upon a case which stated,

That John Vipond, the father of the pauper Joseph, was a settled inhabitant of the parish of Forncett St. Mary, in Norfolk, and about forty years ago came to reside in the parish of Hardwick, in the same county, on a tenement at the rent of 5 £. 10 s. per annum. The pauper, Joseph Vipond, who is now thirty-seven years of age, was born in that parish. . . . The respondents, in order to prove the pauper's settlement in Hardwick, called the father, who, being a settled inhabitant of that parish, refused to be examined. They then called the pauper himself, who proved from his knowledge, that his father had resided on the tenement at Hardwick for twenty-five years, and that it was now worth more than 10 £. per annum. And the Court admitted the pauper to give evidence of his father's declarations to him, that he (the father) had purchased the house when the pauper was sixteen years of age for 87 £. and that he had about ten years ago laid out above 100 £. on the premises. The Court were of opinion, that the pauper was not emancipated by his residing in Besthorpe under the indenture of apprenticeship, nor by any other act subsequent to it; and therefore confirmed the order.

Alderson, in support of the orders, said, . . . The declarations of the father, that this estate was his own by purchase for 87 £., would be let in, upon the authority of The King v. Woburn, 10 East 395, 402, as the declaration of one of the parties to the cause, objection having been made on that ground to his examination by the adverse party. . . .

Garrow and Frere, Serjt., contra, contended . . . that it did not necessarily follow from the determination in The King v. Woburn, 10 East 395, that because a payer of the parish might refuse to answer as a witness when called by the adverse party, therefore his declarations upon the subject might be given in evidence. . . . The common case, where declarations of parties have been given in evidence, is where they are parties on the record; whereas the nominal parties to an appeal of this sort are the parish officers. The rule was considered to be so technical in Bauerman v. Radenius, 7 Term Rep. 663, that the declaration of a trustee, who was the nominal plaintiff on the record, was admitted to defeat the action of his cestui que trust, the real party. (BAYLEY, J. That case only decided that the declarations of the nominal party on the record were evidence against him; but not that the declarations of the real party would not also have been evidence. Then, taking the inhabitants of the parish to be the real parties to the appeal, still they are not such parties whose declarations are admissible within the true meaning and sense of the rule; which is founded upon a reasonable presumption that no person will make any declaration against his interest, unless it be founded in truth; but the interest of all aggregate bodies, such as corporators, hundreds, parishioners, and the like, upon a matter affecting the whole community alike, is too minute to insure an accurate attention to declare nothing but the truth. Upon this ground of the minuteness of their interest, they have in some cases been held to be witnesses. LE BLANC, J. In The King v. Woburn, the parishioner was not rejected as a witness on the ground of interest; for his interest was opposed to that of the party who wished to call him; but he was held to be privileged from answering, on the ground of his being one of the real parties to the suit.) . . . Considering him as a party, yet as the interest of each inhabitant is several, his declarations would not be evidence to charge the others; as an admission made by one of the defendants in trespass is no evidence against the others. The inconvenience of letting in this evidence will be very great in practice.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH, C. J. Evidence of an admission made by one of several defendants in trespass will not, it is true, establish the others to be co-trespassers; but if they be established to be co-trespassers by other competent evidence, the declaration of the one, as to the motives and circumstances of the trespass, will be evidence against all who are proved to have combined together for the common object.

With respect to the case at the bar, two questions have been made; but that which has been argued most at length, and is considered to be of most importance, is, Whether the declarations of the father, as proved by the son, were admissible evidence? . . . The question then is, Whether the declaration of a parishioner respecting the circumstances of a settlement, of which he could not be compelled to give evidence as a party to the appeal depending, be admissible in evidence? I consider all appeals against orders of removal, though technically carried on in the names of the churchwardens and overseers of the respective parishes, yet in substance and effect to be the suits of the parishioners themselves, who are to contribute to the expense of maintaining the paupers. The parishioner, therefore, being a party, could not be called upon as a witness.

Then what is there to differ this from other cases of aggregate bodies, who are parties to a suit? In general cases it cannot be questioned that the declarations of the parties to a suit are evidence against them; and how is this case distinguishable from those upon principle? What credit is due to such evidence is another consideration. His declaration does not conclude the parish; but will be more or less weighty according to his means of knowledge, the genuineness of the declaration, and other circumstances of which the Court would judge. A declaration made by such a party loosely, and without competent grounds of knowledge of the fact, would not be entitled to weight; but the credibility of such evidence is quite a different question from its competency; and it is always open to contradiction like other evidence. Here, however, the father had very competent means of knowledge as to the fact declared by him; but it is sufficient for us to say, that the evidence was competent to be received. . . .

LE BLANC, J. . . . The point comes now to be judicially considered, for the first time, whether such a declaration be receivable in evidence: whether when a suit be pending against a great number of persons who have a common interest in the decision, a declaration made by one of those persons concerning a material fact within his knowledge be evidence against him and all the other parties with him to the suit? And it still seems to me to follow as a corollary from the decision of the Court in the former case, that such a person, not being liable to be called upon to give evidence upon oath of the fact, as being a party to the suit, his declaration of it must be evidence for the opposite party. . . .

Bayley, J. . . . The declaration of every such rated inhabitant, as to the matters in question, made at the time he was a rated inhabitant, is evidence. . . . Orders confirmed.

256. GIBBLEHOUSE v. STONG

3 Rawle 437

Frederick Stong, the defendant in error, brought an ejectment against the plaintiffs in error, John Gibblehouse and John Brandt, to recover two lots of ground in Whitpain township, one of them containing three-quarters of an acre, with a dwelling-house, and other buildings erected on it, and the other containing five acres. The plaintiff below claimed under a deed dated 1st of April, 1813, from David Johnson, in whom it was admitted the legal title to both the lots was vested, one of them by deed dated the 1st of April, 1811, from S. Slingluff, and wife, the other by deed dated the 13th of May, 1811, from Samuel Ashmead to him. Gibblehouse was the tenant of Brandt, who alleged that David Johnson was the mere trustee of his brother Edward Johnson, for whose use he held the legal title to the lots in dispute, and that he, Brandt, had purchased them as the property of Edward Johnson at a sheriff's sale under an execution upon a judgment obtained by Brandt against Edward Johnson.

George Gregor was produced and affirmed as a witness, for the plaintiffs in error. He testified as follows: "Edward Johnson bought the three-quarter acre lot from Slingluff. David Johnson and Edward Johnson told me so." The counsel for the plaintiff below, then objected to this evidence, when the defendant's counsel offered to give in evidence, "declarations made by David Johnson, after the purchase of the property in dispute from Slingluff and Ashmead, and while he held the legal title to it, and before it was afterwards sold to any one, that he had never paid any part of the purchase-money, but that he held the title for the property as the trustee of Edward Johnson, and that Edward Johnson had paid the purchase-money for it." To this evidence the counsel of the plaintiff below objected; upon which the Court decided "that the witness could not give any evidence of any declarations made by David Johnson, unless such declarations were made at the time or immediately before, or immediately after, the execution of the deeds to him, or by him to the plaintiff, Frederick Stong, or in the presence of the opposite party; the said David Johnson being a competent witness, and from anything which appears to the contrary, in full life, and within reach of the process of the court." To this opinion the counsel of the defendant below excepted, and assigned it for error in this Court.

The cause was argued by T. Sergeant, for the plaintiff in error, and by Kittera, for the defendant in error; after which

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

ROGERS, J. 1. The declarations of a person, while in the possession of the premises, against his title, are always admissible, not only against him, but against those who claim under him. The general principle is conceded; but with this qualification, that when the person whose acknowledgment is relied on is alive and a competent witness, that then he must be examined: that his declarations cannot be received. I have examined all the cases, and I cannot perceive a trace of any such exception. In most cases it is true the party was dead, and this is usually the case in fact, for it is the declarations of an ancestor that are most commonly offered in evidence. It has in no case however been made a subject of inquiry whether the person was dead or alive, a competent witness or otherwise, and this surely would have been the case had any such qualification of the general rule existed. The reason of the rule is at war with the exception. The point falls within the well-established principle that although a man's declarations are not evidence for him, they are strong evidence against him. The principle is founded on a knowledge of human nature. Self-interest induces men to be cautious in saying anything against themselves, but free to speak in their own favor. We can safely trust a man when he speaks against his own interest. It is not conclusive, but is unquestionable evidence, entitled to some weight against himself, and those who claim under him. Bassler v. Neisly et al., 2 Serg. & Rawle 353.

2. The defendant's counsel offered to prove declarations made by David Johnson, after the purchase from Slingluff and Ashmead, and before the sale of the property to any person, that he, David Johnson, never paid any part of the purchase-money, but that he held the title as trustee for Edward Johnson, and that Edward Johnson had paid the purchase-money for it. The Court decided that the witness could not give any evidence of any declarations made by David Johnson, unless such declarations were made at the time, or immediately before, or immediately after the execution of the deeds to him, or by him to the plaintiff, or in the presence of the opposite party; David Johnson being a competent witness, and from anything which appears to the contrary, in full life, and within reach of the process of the Court. Suppose this declaration had been in writing, can David Johnson by a subsequent conveyance, prevent the party in whose favor the declaration was made, from giving it in evidence against the party who claims under him? And where is the difference between written and parol testimony, except in the certainty; and particularly in cases of personal property, which may pass by parol, and to which the principle also applies? . .

We think there was error in rejecting the testimony, and that the judgment should be reversed.

HUSTON, J.: The only error assigned in this record is contained in a bill of exceptions to the opinion of the Court in rejecting certain testimony. . . . The Court decided that the witness could not give any evidence of any declaration made by David Johnson, unless it were made at the time, or immediately before or after the execution of the deed to him, or by him to the plaintiff, Frederick Stong, or in the presence of the opposite party, he, David Johnson, being a competent witness, in full life, and within reach of the process of the Court. To this exception was taken; and I see no error, at least against the defendants.

It has been contended that by a series of decisions in this State it is settled, that the declarations of a former owner of property, made while he was owner, are evidence against the party claiming under him; and that this rule is universal, and applies to cases where such former owner is alive, is entirely disinterested in the matter trying, and is standing in Court and there is no objection to examining him as a witness. On the other hand, it is contended that the rule is not universal: That declarations of a former owner are only evidence to establish boundary, pedigree, and custom: That it does not extend to permit parol evidence to contradict written and recorded deeds, and destroy titles good by such deeds, and proved by those who never heard of such parol declarations: and at all events it is limited to cases in which the person whose declarations are proved is interested, and cannot be examined, or is dead, or out of the reach of the process of the Court; but that if he is alive, in Court, or can be brought there, and is totally disinterested, he must be examined on oath, an opportunity given to cross-examine, and his declarations not on oath, are not in such case to be proved; and that the statute of frauds forbids that a title depending by law on written and recorded deeds, should be destroyed by parol evidence of parol declarations, which may have been made, or may not, and which if made, did not at all affect the rights of him who uttered them, except as to those who may have purchased on the faith of such declarations. . . .

The opinion of the Court in all the cases cited, and most if not all those in our reports, which I have found, were delivered by the late Chief Justice. And in Buchannan v. Moore, 10 Serg. & Rawle 275, the same judge in delivering the opinion of the Court, quoting Phillipps' Evidence,

"In all cases which have been mentioned on this subject (parol evidence of declarations) the person who made the declaration was deceased at the time of trial;" and he adds, "there is great reason for the law being so held. Why should the declarations without oath of a person who may be produced and examined on oath, be evidence? Why should the party against whom the evidence is offered be deprived of the opportunity of cross-examining? In the case of death there is a necessity. But while the witness is living there is no pretence for dispensing with the general rule which rejects all testimony except on oath, and in the presence of the parties to the suit." . . .

Believing, then, the law to have been settled in this state by Buchannan v. Moore, 10 Serg. & Rawle 275, and so considered by the profession, and by the several Courts of Common Pleas, as well as the one which tried this cause, I would not lightly change, but, on full reflection, I believe, it was then settled on principle, and ought not to be changed. . . . The Court admitted declarations to the plaintiff, rejected parol declarations to others, and, I think, rightly, whether the former owner was dead or alive, unless they went to prove boundary in the sense I have stated, or pedigree or custom; and further, that where such declarations can be proved, it is only when the person who used them was owner when he used them, and is dead, or out of the reach of the process of the Court, or interested.

KENNEDY, J. . . . It is argued that the declarations of David Johnson were rightly rejected, upon the principle that they were not made upon oath or affirmation, nor yet in the presence and hearing of the adverse party, but made in his absence when no opportunity was afforded of a reply, much less of a cross-examination, and as David Johnson was within the jurisdiction of the Court, and was a competent witness, he might have been produced to testify to the facts, which would have been better evidence than his declarations or admissions. And in support of this, Buchannan and others v. Moore, 10 Serg. & Rawle 281, is cited. . . . The decision of the Court here was not only correct, but I am willing to admit that everything said by the Chief Justice is likewise so. But it will be seen in the sequel, I think, that it is not applicable to the case before us.

The testimony in Buchannan v. Moore was purely of hearsay character, with regard to which the general rule is well settled, as there stated, that it cannot be received except in certain cases from necessity, when the facts offered to be proved from their very nature are incapable of the ordinary means of proof; such as questions of pedigree, character, prescription, custom, boundary, and the like. It is manifest that some of these matters from their very nature, and others from their antiquity, do not admit of the ordinary and direct means of proof by living witnesses; and hearsay would seem to be the next best evidence to which recourse must therefore be had. 1 Stark. Evi. 54, part I.; Bull. N. P. by Bridg. 294, b, n. (d).

But in the case before us the testimony offered and rejected, was not of that character, which in a technical and legal sense, comes under the denomination of hearsay. It comes under what is considered the declarations or admissions of the party to the suit or his privies, that is, those under whom he claims; in respect to which the general rule of law is just as well settled that they shall be received in evidence as that hearsay shall not. All a man's own declarations and acts, and also the declarations and acts of others to which he is privy, are evidence, so far as they afford any presumption against him, whether such declarations amount to an admission of any fact, or such acts and declarations of others to which he is privy afford any presumption or inference against him. . . . The confessions of the party himself (which I do not understand to be denied) have always been considered good and admissible evidence of any fact admitted by them to be true, and may be given in evidence to prove it, notwithstanding the confessions might be such as to show that twenty witnesses were present who could all testify to its existence or non-existence, and who might all appear to be in the Court-house at the time when such confessions should happen to be offered in evidence against the party making them. And this rule of admitting the confessions or declarations of the party extends not only to the admission of them against himself, but against all who claim or derive their title from him; in other words, between whom and himself there is a privity. There are four species of privity: privity in blood, as between heir and ancestor; privity in representation, as between testator and executor, or the intestate and his administrators; privity in law, as between the commonwealth by escheat and the person dying last seised without blood or privity of estate; and privity in estate as between the donor and the donee, lessor and the lessee, vendor and the vendee, assignor and the assignee, etc. . . . Upon this same principle it is, that executors and administrators, as also devisees, legatees, heirs and the next of kin, are all bound by the promises, whether written or verbal, of their respective testators or intestates, so far as they may have received estates from them that are liable, and the declarations and admissions of such testators and intestates are uniformly received in evidence against their devisees, legatees, heirs, and next of kin, so as to affect the estates which have passed to them. Privies in estates, such as vendee and vendor, assignee and assignor, stand upon the same footing in this respect to each other that privies in blood do. I know of no distinction. That which is binding upon the vendor will generally be equally so upon his vendee; and whatever would have been admissible as evidence against the former, ought not only to be so against the latter, but ought to have the same effect too.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH has given the true reason of the rule for admitting the declarations of a party in evidence, 11 East 584, where he says, it "is founded upon a reasonable presumption that no person will make any declaration against his interest, unless it be founded in truth." If true when made, and therefore receivable in evidence, his selling or disposing of the property afterwards cannot make his former declaration in respect to it untrue, nor furnish any reason, that I can perceive, which ought to derogate from its character as evidence. But I cannot avoid believing that as long as the great object of receiving testimony is to aid in and to promote the investigation of truth, the declarations or admissions of a vendor or assignor against his interest, made before the sale or assignment, may be more safely relied on and received in evidence against his vendee or assignee, than the testimony that would be given by such vendor or assignor himself, if the party claiming in opposition to his vendee or assignee, must be compelled to resort to him. . . . Is it not most apparent from what we know by experience of human nature, that a vendor who had placed himself in such a situation would in many, if not most instances, swerve from the truth, in order to rescue himself from the imputation that was about to be made against his integrity? His temptation, to say the least of it, would frequently be very strong to give such a coloring to the whole transaction as he might think would present his own conduct in the most favorable point of view, without much regard to the truth of the case. . . .

The judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed and a venire de novo awarded.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

257. FRANKLIN BANK v. PENNSYLVANIA, DELAWARE & MARYLAND STEAM NAVIGATION CO.

COURT OF APPEALS OF MARYLAND. 1839

11 G. & J. 28

IN an action for the loss of a package sent by the plaintiffs through the defendant, the cashier, Mitchell, of the bank to which the package was consigned testified: that he was absent from Philadelphia from about the 10th until the 27th of November, 1834; that on his return he found two letters at the Mechanics' Bank, addressed to him from the cashier of the plaintiffs; the first of the 17th of November, 1834, advising him of the forwarding of the package by the steam boat line of the defendant, which had been received at the bank, and opened in his absence, which it was the duty of the president to do; and the second of the 21st of the same month, requesting him to make inquiry at the office of the steam boat line, by which the package had been forwarded; that within a day or two after his return, he applied at the office, to Davidson the agent of the defendants, for the package, and thinks he showed him the letter from the cashier of the plaintiffs of the 21st of November, 1834, who told him, that on the evening of the 18th of November, 1834, there were a number of persons in the office, when the trunk was opened by the clerk, and the packages handed out by the porter to the clerk; that there was a package addressed to Mr. Mitchell; but whether to Mr. Mitchell the witness, or to a dry goods merchant of that name, he did not know, nor did he know that it contained bank notes; and that the package was thrown upon the desk, and which was the last that he, Davidson, knew of it.

In the progress of the trial, the defendant's counsel objected to the admissibility of a part of the plaintiff's proof, and the Court below (ARCHER, C. J., PURVIANCE, A. J.) sustained the objection and excluded it. The plaintiffs excepted, and the verdict and judgment being against them, they prosecuted the present appeal.

The cause was argued before BUCHANAN, C. J., STEPHEN, and CHAMBERS, JJ.

By Meredith, for the appellants, and by McMahon, for the appellees.

BUCHANAN, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court:

The suit is to recover the value of a package of bank notes, which it is alleged, the defendants undertook to carry safely from Baltimore, and deliver at Philadelphia, and which is charged to have been lost by reason of gross negligence.

The evidence offered in this case and rejected by the Court below, is of a conversation alleged to have taken place between Davidson, the agent of the defendants, and the witness, some eight or ten days after the transaction to which it relates, and after the loss of the package in question, when the agency for the delivery of it to the person to whom it was addressed had ceased, not constituting a part of the transaction, but a subsequent account only of what had before occurred respecting it. It cannot therefore be treated as a statement or admission by the defendants, and as such binding upon them, and admissible in evidence; but must be considered as a mere narrative of facts by Davidson, of his own authority, to be proved by him on oath, if within his own knowledge, or by some other witness, and not by evidence of his statement of them, which is forbidden by the general rule of law in relation to hearsay evidence. The principle upon which the declarations or representations of an agent, within the scope of his authority, are permitted to be proved, is, that such declarations, as well as his acts, are considered and treated as the declarations of his principal. What is so done by an agent, is done by the principal through him, as his mere instrument. So whatever is said by an agent, either in the making a contract for his principal, or at the time, and accompanying the performance of any act, within the scope of his authority, having relation to, and connected with, and in the course of the particular contract or transaction in which he is then engaged, is, in legal effect, said by his principal, and admissible in evidence; not merely because it is the declaration or admission of an agent; but on the ground, that being made at the time of and accompanying the contract or transaction, it is treated as the declaration or admission of the principal, constituting a part of the "res gestæ," a part of the contract or transaction, and as binding upon him as if in fact made by himself. But declarations or admissions by an agent, of his own authority, and not accompanying the making of a contract, or the doing of an act, in behalf of his principal, nor made at the time he is engaged in the transaction to which they refer, are not binding upon his principal, not being part of the "res gestæ," and not admissible in evidence, but come within the general rule of law, excluding hearsay evidence; being but an account or statement by an agent of what has passed or been done or omitted to be done, — not a part of the transaction, but only statements or admissions respecting it.

This distinction between the declarations or admissions of an agent, accompanying the making of, and constituting therefore a part of the contract or transaction, and such as are made at another time, runs through the books, and is clearly settled. . . . In Biggs and others v. Lawrence, 3 Term. Rep. 454, Justice BULLER permitted a receipt given by an agent for goods directed to be given to him, to be read in evidence against the principal. But that decision is condemned by DALLAS, Ch. J., in Betham v. Benson, 5 Eng. Com. Law Rep. and disapproved of in Fairlie v. Hastings, 10 Vesey Jr.; and in Bauerman v. Radenius, 7 Term. Rep. 665, it is said to have passed without much observation, and that Lord KENYON, who was on the bench at the time, had since frequently ruled the contrary, without its having ever been questioned. Biggs et al. v. Lawrence, may therefore be considered as overruled. . . .

That portion therefore of Mitchell's evidence, which was objected to at the trial, was properly rejected, as inadmissible to bind or affect the defendants. . . . The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

258. ASHMORE v. PENNSYLVANIA STEAM TOWING & TRANSPORTATION CO.

SUPREME COURT OF NEW JERSEY. 1875

38 N. J. L. 13

ARGUED at February Term, 1875, before BEASLEY, Chief Justice, and Justices DALRIMPLE, DEPUE and KNAPP.

For the motion, E. T. Green. Contra, Alfred Reed.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

BEASLEY, Ch. J.:

This suit was for damage caused by the carelessness of the defendant in towing a boat of the plaintiff's. The alleged want of care consisted in running upon a snag, whereby the plaintiff's boat was injured and sunk; and, at the trial, the central fact in dispute was, whether the existence of the snag in question was known to the agent of the defendant. To prove this fact of knowledge, several witnesses testified that the agent in charge of the boats of the defendant, and who is here to be regarded as the general agent in charge of this business of towing, admitted to them that he knew of this snag before the happening of the accident. These conversations, embracing these admissions, were entirely casual, and were not connected with the doing of any act within the scope of the agent's authority. It is now insisted that these conversations were not admissible in evidence.

At the trial, the alternative was between letting in this evidence, or non-suiting the plaintiff; and as some of the books intimate that a distinction exists with respect to the rules of evidence between the statements made by a general agent and those made by a special agent, whereby the former are placed on a broader principle than the latter, it was thought best, though with much misgiving, not to rule out the offered testimony. Favorable to the view thus taken at Nisi Prius, is the statement in note 239, appended to Phillipps' Evidence, to the effect that some of the cases put the power of the general agent to make admissions on the same footing as the power of the principal himself. But upon carefully examining the authorities referred to, they do not support this doctrine, except in a very loose sense. I do not find any of them rule the point. And even if any of them maintained such a rule, they ought not to be followed, for such a rule would, as it seems to me, be inconsistent with true policy and correct principle. With regard to the law of evidence, I think there should be no difference, whatever, between the binding effect of the admissions of a general and a special agent. In both cases alike, the rule should be that the admission, to be evidence, was made in pursuance of the power conferred. In this particular there is no difference between the acts and the words of the agent; with respect to the first, he must be authorized to do them; with respect to the latter, he must be authorized to speak them. In each set of instances it is a question of authority. Upon the basis of this rule, then, the authority of the general agent to bind his principal by his statements, would be broader than that of the special agent, in the ratio of the transcendence of the power of the former over that of the latter, but the right of each to speak for his principal would rest on the same ground, that is, his authority to conduct the business confided to him. All statements made in the conduct of such business, are evidence against the principal; all others are inadmissible, because they are unauthorized. By considering the words of the agent in the light of acts — verbal acts — the subject will be cleared of all obscurity, and there will be no more difficulty in deciding when such words are admissible, than there is in concluding what acts of the agent can be proved. When the word or the act is done in pursuance of the agent's duty, it can be proved against the principal, otherwise, not. Upon this ground, I think all the cases can be made to stand. I shall not mention particularly these decisions; many of them will be found upon turning to the note in Phillipps on Evidence, already referred to, and to Story on Agency, sec. 134, et seq. The doctrine is also very clearly stated, and its limits defined, in the latest English case upon the subject, being that of The Kirkstall Brewery Co. v. The Furness Railway Co., L. R., 9 Q. B. 468.

Manifestly, then, the rule thus defined does not embrace statements, declarations, or admissions of the agent, which are not made in the execution of the agency. That they relate to the business of the agency, is not sufficient; but they must be in performance of it. This test excludes mere narrations and casual conversations, having a reference to, but no effect in the discharge of the delegated duty. For the purpose of illustration: In the case of Morse v. Connecticut River Railroad Co., 6 Gray 450, it was correctly held that, in an action against the corporation for the loss of a trunk, the admissions of the conductor, baggage master, or station master, as to the manner of the loss, made in answer to inquiries of the passenger, the next morning after the loss, are admissible in evidence against the corporation, for the reason, in the words of the Court that, "it was part of the duty of those agents to deliver the baggage of passengers, and to account for the same, if missing, provided inquiries for it were made within a reasonable time." While, in the case of The Michigan Central Railroad Company v. Gougar, 55 Ill. 503, it was decided that the declarations of an engineer in charge of an engine, made subsequently to the happening of the accident, at a time when he was not doing any business of the company in relation thereto, could not be received as evidence against the corporation. These two examples place in a clear light the line of demarcation between, in cases of this class, such admissions of the agent as will bind, and such as will not bind the principal, showing, that to make them receivable, they must not only refer to the business of the principal, but must be made in pursuance, and as a part of such business.

Applying this test, the evidence in question in the present instance should have been overruled. It was a statement made by a general agent with respect to the business of his principal; but it was a mere voluntary statement, made to a person having no interest in the subject to which it referred, and was not in the performance of any part of the duty.

A new trial should be granted.

260. STARR BURYING GROUND v. NORTH LANE CEMETERY ASSOCIATION

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1904

77 Conn. 83; 58 Atl. 467

ACTION to condemn certain land for the enlargement of a cemetery, and for an adjudication that the defendant was not organized in good faith but to prevent the plaintiff from acquiring said land, brought to the Superior Court in New London County, where a demurrer to the complaint was overruled (THAYER, J.) and the cause was afterwards tried to the Court, RALPH WHEELER, J.; facts found and judgment rendered for the plaintiff, and appeal by the defendant. No error.

Abel P. Tanner and Christopher L. Avery, for the appellant (defendant). Hadlai A. Hull, for the appellee (plaintiff).

HAMERSLEY, J. . . . The plaintiff is an association formed and incorporated in 1857, in pursuance of the statute of 1841, and has since maintained an ancient burying-ground, enlarged at different times through the purchase of adjoining land. In 1897 the plaintiff association found it necessary and desired to enlarge its burying-ground by adding thereto the adjoining land of John J. Copp. It passed the necessary vote for obtaining this enlargement through purchase or condemnation. In 1898 the plaintiff attempted to agree with said Copp for the purchase of said land. The negotiation was postponed, to be renewed at a meeting of the parties at a time agreed upon. Before this time arrived said Copp, on May 25, 1898, with his two brothers, formed an association called the North Lane Cemetery Association for the declared purpose of establishing and permanently maintaining a cemetery for the burial of the dead and of procuring land for that purpose, and on the same day John J. Copp conveyed to the association the land required for the enlargement of the plaintiff's burying-ground, for the purchase of which negotiations between him and the plaintiff were then pending. . . .

The plaintiff being unable to agree with the defendant as to the purchase of the land required, brought this application to the Superior Court alleging, among other things, that the plaintiff's burying-ground is maintained as a public burial ground, and asking the condemnation of the land described. . . . The defendant then answered, admitting the ownership of the land described, and denying the other material allegations of the application, and also alleging . . . that the land mentioned is now held and appropriated by the defendant to the uses of a public cemetery. . . . The defendant claims that the Court erred in overruling the demurrer, as well as in overruling various claims of law made upon the trial, and in the admission of certain testimony. . . .

There remain for consideration the questions of evidence. Upon the trial the witness Hull was permitted, against the objections of the defendant, to testify to certain declarations made by J. J. Copp — who conveyed the land in question to the defendant association and who was its secretary and treasurer — and by his brother, Belton A. Copp, president of the defendant association, as to their purpose in organizing the association; J. J. and B. A. Copp, with their brother William Copp, being the only persons who organized the association and its only members. It is now urged that the purpose or intention of a corporation is properly shown by its charter and corporate votes, and that an admission made by the members of a corporation in respect to its purpose or intention cannot be shown in a suit against a corporation, because it is the admission of natural persons not parties to the suit and not of the entity consisting of those natural persons which is the party.

This distinction between a corporation as being an impalpable entity, and a corporation as being the living persons of whom it consists, is, for many purposes, a substantial distinction necessarily involved in the creation and use of corporations; but for some purposes it is not only a fiction but a useless and unreasonable fiction; and it is a settled principle that in certain cases where the fiction can serve no purpose but to accomplish injustice and to screen the corporation from the just consequences of its wrongs, the Court will not permit this legal fiction to prevail against real substance. It is certainly true, as a general proposition, that the admissions of individuals affecting the interests of a corporation of which they are members cannot have the effect of an admission by the corporation. But the distinction between the interest of the corporate entity and that of the corporate members may become a difficult one to draw in certain kinds of corporations, and this is especially true of one like the defendant. In speaking of a similar corporation, we have said: "It is impossible to separate the interest of the individual members, in such a corporation as this, from the interest of the corporation itself." Edwards v. Stonington Cemetery Asso., 20 Conn. 466, 478. If this evidence were material only as tending to show a corporate purpose, we are not prepared to say that the admission of the organizers and members of the corporation, as to their purpose in organizing it, must be excluded because the corporate entity is the party to the suit.

It is not, however, necessary to determine this question. The testimony was material and admissible for other purposes than to prove a technical corporate intention. This proceeding is one to condemn a particular piece of land owned by the defendant association. It is immaterial whether the defendant is a voluntary association or a corporation. . . . The defendant association was organized as a cemetery association when its articles were signed by the three Copp brothers. The intention and purpose the Court has to find is that involved in this act of the Copp brothers. . . . As tending to prove that the North Lane Cemetery Association, whether or not it remained a voluntary association or subsequently became a corporation, was organized by the three Copp brothers with the intent and purpose designated, the declarations of each against his interest would be admissible, against him, to show his purpose in joining in the formation of the association. The objection taken to the reception of these declarations was, in each instance, a general one. It was that they were not admissible at all; not that they were not admissible as against any of the parties in interest other than the person who made them. This general objection was properly overruled.

The testimony of the witness Hull as to his negotiations on behalf of the plaintiff with the president, secretary and treasurer of the defendant association for the purpose of reaching an agreement as to the acquirement of the land in question by purchase, was properly admitted.

There is no error in the judgment of the Superior Court.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

261. STATE v. WALKER

SUPREME COURT OF IOWA. 1904

124 Ia. 414; 100 N. W. 354

APPEAL from District Court, Polk County; JOSIAH GIVEN, Judge.

Defendant was indicted for the crime of murder in the first degree, and on trial by a jury he was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of eight years. From this sentence he appeals. Reversed.

About 10 o'clock in the evening of August 5, 1902, one Isaac Finkelstein was found lying on the north side of East Walnut street, in the mouth of the alley between East Sixth and Seventh streets, in Des Moines, with one side of his head mashed, apparently by a club of some kind, and he died within a few minutes after he was found. One Harris Levich, and the defendant, John Walker, the latter being a colored man, were indicted for the crime of murder in causing the death of Finkelstein. Levich was tried first and acquitted. Subsequently, when this defendant was tried, the prosecution, after proving the corpus delicti, and introducing evidence tending to show that the mortal wound on the head of the deceased had probably been inflicted with a singletree (found lying in the alley near the body of Finkelstein) that had apparently been taken from a wagon belonging to Harris Levich, which was discovered in an alley about a block away, and showing the facts as to the arrest of the defendant Walker, the next morning in West Des Moines, and before any evidence whatever had been introduced tending directly to connect defendant with the commission of the crime, sought to show by witnesses, prior to the time of the commission of the crime, that Levich had made declarations, not in the presence of Walker, indicating the employment by him of Walker to do "up" Finkelstein. This testimony was objected to, on the ground that, in the absence of evidence tending to show conspiracy between Levich and the defendant, the declarations of Levich were not admissible as against the defendant. The following colloquy was then had, as appears from the record, between the trial judge and the attorney for the prosecution: State: "We claim two grounds upon which we have a right to declarations of Levich in the absence of Walker: First, that this was just a short time preceding the murder; second, they having been much together, and having been seen together at so short a time before the fatal blow was struck. Court: Will the evidence sought to be elicited here have any tendency to prove conspiracy itself? State: We think it would, and that is the object and purpose of this evidence. Court: Then we need not trouble much about other rules. I think the rule is this: that where the prosecution relies, in part at least, upon conspiracy, before we can charge either party with the declarations of the other, the State may be required to first give in evidence some testimony of the conspiracy, or it may be permitted to introduce the evidence, and it will be left or taken from the jury according as they follow it with evidence of some conspiracy. Whether there be evidence to go to the jury may be a question. But if the declaration itself preceded the act, and tends to establish conspiracy, then it is admissible, regardless of either of the rules. Therefore the objection will be overruled." The prosecution was then allowed, over the defendant's objections, to show declarations of Levich tending to establish the fact that Levich had arranged with the defendant to inflict death or severe bodily injury upon Finkelstein, and that Levich made this arrangement in a spirit of revenge, by reason of real or fancied injuries done to him and his business by Finkelstein.

Charles Mackenzie, J. B. Rush, and John T. Mulvancy, for appellant. Charles Mullan, Atty. Gen., Jesse A. Miller and Robert O. Brennan, for the State.

McClain, J. (after stating the case as above). It seems from the colloquy above set out that the prosecution was contending that the fact that such a declaration was made by Levich just a short time preceding the commission of the crime would render the declaration admissible, and that the trial judge seemed to entertain the view that the fact of conspiracy, which must be established to make the declarations of Levich admissible, might be taken as established by such declaration alone, although no other evidence of conspiracy should be introduced. Perhaps the position taken by the prosecution and the trial judge are not accurately represented in the colloquy. However this may be, it is plain that unless the declarations were part of the res gestæ they were not admissible as independent evidence, and could not be considered at all without there was some evidence, apart from the declarations themselves, tending to show a conspiracy previously entered into between Levich and defendant with reference to the commission of the crime.

The first contention on behalf of defendant is that the Court should have required the conspiracy to be proven by independent evidence before receiving the declarations. With reference to this question, the contention for the State is that it is within the discretion of the trial Court to admit proof of acts and declarations of joint conspirators even before a prima facie case of conspiracy has been made, provided the State promises in the further progress of the trial to introduce such prima facie evidence; and such a rule seems to have been announced in broad terms in State v. Grant, 86 Iowa, 216, 53 N. W. 120, and State v. Mushrush, 97 Iowa, 44, 66 N. W. 746. We have no occasion to question the correctness of this general proposition, but in the first place it does not appear from the record that in this case the State made any such promise. So far as we can gather, the assertion on the part of the prosecution was that the declarations of Levich which were to be proven would tend to show a conspiracy. This clearly would not be enough, for, as already stated, and as the rule unquestionably is, the evidence tending to show a conspiracy must be outside of and in addition to the declarations of the co-conspirators whose declarations are sought to be introduced. The safer rule, undoubtedly, is to require the proof of conspiracy to be made before the declarations are allowed to be shown. . . . Those declarations were so likely to prejudicially affect the minds of the jury with reference to the defendant that no subsequent acts of the court in striking them out and directing the jury not to consider them could free the jurors' minds of the prejudicial result, should it subsequently appear that there was no evidence whatever, aside from the declaration of Levich himself, that defendant had entered into an arrangement with Levich to do violence to Finkelstein. We would not reverse the case on this ground alone, had there been independent evidence of a conspiracy such as to make out a prima facie case, but in view of a new trial we feel justified in suggesting that it will be difficult to adequately protect the right of defendant to be tried only on competent evidence without requiring a prima facie case of conspiracy to be made out before the declarations of Levich are received.

It is further contended for the defendant that, without regard to the order of procedure, there is no competent evidence in the record to show a conspiracy between Levich and Walker, aside from the declarations of Levich himself. . . . We concede that it is not necessary on the one hand that such a conspiracy be shown by direct evidence, and that circumstantial evidence may be sufficient for the purpose. Gardner v. Preston, 2 Day 205, 2 Am. Dec. 91; State v. Thompson, 69 Conn. 720, 38 Atl. 868; Roscoe, Criminal Ev. 430. But, on the other hand, it is well said that it is not enough that the evidence introduced tends to raise a suspicion. "The humane presumption of the law is against guilt, and though a conspiracy must ordinarily be proved by circumstantial evidence, yet it is not to be forgotten that the charge of conspiracy is easily made. . . . Mere suspicion, possibility of guilty connection, is not to be received as proof in such a case, and especially in such a case, because, when the connection is proved, the acts and declarations of others become evidence against the party accused." Benford v. Sanner, 40 Pa. 9, 80 Am. Dec. 545, 549. And see People v. Stevens, 68 Cal. 113, 8 Pac. 712. We reach the conclusion that, had the trial Court required that the evidence tending to show the conspiracy between Levich and defendant been introduced before allowing the declarations of Levich to be proven, and no further evidence of the fact had been introduced than appears in this record, it would have been error to overrule defendant's objection to the introduction of such declarations, for whatever may be the rule in some States, we have recognized the rule here to be that the sufficiency of the proof of conspiracy, to justify introduction of the declarations of one conspirator against another, in the first instance, is to be determined by the trial judge ruling on the admissibility of such declarations. State v. Nash, 7 Iowa, 347, 384; State v. Crofford (Iowa) 96 N. W. 889. And this is the general rule. . . . Therefore the Court should not have left it to the jury to say in the first instance whether or not there was sufficient evidence of conspiracy, aside from the declarations of Levich, to justify them in considering such declarations in determining whether defendant was guilty of the crime. . . .

We think there is another good reason why the declarations of Levich should have been excluded from the consideration of the jury. What Levich said, as testified to by the witnesses, was, in substance, that he had a grudge or grievance against Finkelstein, and that he had hired defendant to do him an injury. This declaration was not made in furtherance of the unlawful plan; it had no relevancy to the carrying out of that plan; but it was a mere narrative of a fact, made by Levich upon his own responsibility, and not purporting in any way to represent the defendant. The rule, as usually stated, with reference to the admissibility of the declarations of one conspirator as against another, is that such declarations are admissible only where they are made pending the conspiracy, and in furtherance of its unlawful purpose. State v. Crofford (Iowa) 96 N. W. 889. . . . It is true that in many, if not all the cases cited, the rule as thus stated is invoked to exclude declarations made after the conspiracy had been completed, or abandoned with reference to what took place while the conspiracy was in existence, but in principle the same reasons are applicable to declarations made while the conspiracy is pending, but not in furtherance of the unlawful purpose. The declarations of one conspirator are admissible against another on the theory that each is acting for all — that is, on the principle of agency — and certainly an alleged conspirator is not to be charged with statements made by another which have no relation to the carrying out of the common design. The fact appears to be that Levich made the declarations, to which the witnesses testified, in a spirit either of bravado, or, as one of the witnesses says, in a joking way, and his declarations were not taken seriously, nor did they apparently receive any attention until after the death of Finkelstein, when it was sought through them to connect defendant with the crime. If these declarations were of any significance, they were much more incriminating as against Levich himself than as against defendant. It is also to be noticed that some of the declarations to which the witnesses testified were made at a time prior to any connection or relation between Levich and defendant, so far as the other evidence in the case tends to establish it. Of course, declarations of Levich made prior to the formation of the conspiracy, and not in furtherance of any plan with which defendant was shown to have been connected, were not admissible. . . .

For the errors pointed out, the case is remanded for a new trial. Reversed.

266. ARMORY v. DELAMIRIE (1722. King's Bench, 1 Str. 505). In Middlesex, coram PRATT, C. J. The plaintiff being a chimney sweeper's boy found a jewel and carried it to the defendant's shop (who was a goldsmith) to know what it was, and delivered it into the hands of the apprentice, who, under pretence of weighing it, took out the stones; and calling to the master to let him know, it came to three halfpence, the master offered the boy the money, who refused to take it, and insisted to have the thing again; whereupon the apprentice delivered him back the socket without the stones. And now in trover against the master these points were ruled: . . .

As to the value of the jewel, several of the trade were examined to prove what a jewel of the finest water that would fit the socket would be worth; and the Chief Justice directed the jury, that unless the defendant did produce the jewel, and show it not to be of the finest water, they should presume the strongest against him, and make the value of the best jewels the measure of their damages; which they accordingly did.

Q. — Do you know of any prosecution carried on against the plaintiff by the defendant for murder?

(The question is objected to by the counsel for the defendant.)

Mr. Fitz-Gibbon, of counsel for the plaintiff. — My lord, this witness is brought to show that the lord Anglesea, knowing that the plaintiff claimed the estate of the family, as son and heir to the late lord Altham, expended vast sums of money on a prosecution, which he set on foot against him for the murder of an unfortunate man at Staines, in Middlesex, though the person killed stood in no degree of relation to my lord Anglesea that could have engaged him to have taken up this matter; and that the relations of the deceased being convinced that the killing was only accidental, had intended a very slight prosecution; but that the defendant, who was no way related to, or acquainted with the person killed, employed a solicitor, and carried on a severe prosecution against Mr. Annesley at a very great expense, and declared "he would spend £10,000 to get him hanged."

It will also appear, that while he labored to convict the plaintiff for murder, he knew the person, whose death gave occasion for the prosecution, was killed by accident. And this we apprehend to be a circumstance proper to be laid before the jury, to show that my lord Anglesea, conscious of the plaintiff's title, took these methods to cut him off.

Mr. Recorder (Eaton Stannard, Esq.), of counsel for the defendant. . . . This evidence is offered, as I apprehend, to raise a presumption that the plaintiff is the legitimate son of the lord Altham, because the defendant endeavored to destroy him; and then the question will be, Whether such evidence is proper to be admitted? It would be a question whether any improper measure taken to affect the life of the plaintiff would be evidence; but where, from their own opening the case, it does appear to your lordship nothing more than a proceeding according to the regular and open course of the law, with humble submission, that in this case or any case whatsoever, is not to be imputed to a man as a crime. . . .

Mr. Harward, for the plaintiff. — My lord, I apprehend, that every matter which in any degree tends to show whether the plaintiff was the lawful son of the late lord Altham, or no, is proper evidence to be laid before the jury. This evidence now offered, is to show that the present lord Anglesea, conscious of the plaintiff's legitimacy, undertook the prosecution to take away his life, and spent great sums of money in it. If it is an act of the defendant's, it is proper for the jury to consider, quo animo he undertook it, whether from a public spirit of justice, or a private view to take away the life of this rival to his estate; for every act of the defendant that can give light to the jury of the opinion that my lord himself had of the plaintiff's right, is proper evidence to be offered to them. We have already laid evidence before the jury that we apprehend clearly shows that the lord Anglesea had, several years ago, spirited away this plaintiff, to prevent his asserting his right to the estate. This now offered is a further proof of my lord Anglesea's opinion concerning his right; and to corroborate that evidence that has already been laid before the Court, we have a right to produce it, as a further instance of this lord's own opinion, that it was necessary for him to come at his life at any rate. The question is not now, whether the prosecution was just or not? Whether Mr. Annesley was guilty or not of the murder charged on him? He has been acquitted. I must beg leave to say, if he had been found guilty, and got a pardon, and came to seek his right in this Court, my lord's carrying on the prosecution might have been imputed to a zeal for justice; but being acquitted, there is room for the jury to consider, whether his interfering was not owing to some other motive, and some other end than that of public justice. . . .

L. C. Baron Bowes. — This witness was produced to show that the prosecution against the plaintiff, for killing a man at Staines, was promoted and carried on by the defendant, and at his expense; which, as it was an attempt to take away the plaintiff's life, his counsel have insisted is proper to be laid before the jury, as further proof of the present defendant's distrust of his own title, and his opinion of the now plaintiff's right. . . .

This is a new attempt, and were it necessary for me now to give my opinion, I should think it ought not to be admitted.

The prosecution in itself was not unlawful; on the contrary, it is the duty of every man, especially in the case of blood, to take care that the offender be put upon his trial. And therefore, without entering into the merits of that case, the motives of the prosecution cannot appear; and those alone can, in my apprehension, introduce this evidence as pertinent to the matter in issue in this cause: who, without going farther, can say, this prosecution, though lawful, was carried on with an unlawful intention? I apprehend the Court cannot judge whether the prosecution was frivolous or malicious, unless the indictment was tried over again here. But as it is a matter worthy of deliberate consideration, and this trial will last another day, the counsel for the plaintiff may proceed to some other evidence, and we, if it be insisted on, will give you our opinions in the morning.

Mr. Baron Mounteney. . . . My present opinion is, that the evidence now offered ought to be admitted. . . . The foundation of my opinion is this: Every act done by the defendant, which hath a tendency to show a consciousness in him of title in the lessor of the plaintiff, must I think be admitted, beyond all controversy, to be pertinent and legal evidence in the present cause. I think that the evidence now offered hath that tendency, and consequently is proper to be admitted. This evidence of the prosecution, in my apprehension, stands exactly on the same footing with the evidence of the kidnapping, . . . for I can by no means enter into the distinction of lawful and unlawful acts, which seems to have so much weight with my lord chief baron. That unlawful act was not therefore, in my apprehension, to be admitted in evidence because unlawful, but because it had a tendency to show such a consciousness as I have mentioned in the defendant; and if the carrying on the prosecution (which must be admitted to be a very extraordinary, though lawful, act of the defendant) hath the same tendency, it ought upon the same principle to be admitted.

[The evidence was admitted.] . . .

Bowes, C. B. [charging the jury]: . . . You will also consider whether these acts [above testified to] are not evidence to satisfy you that the defendant, in his own thoughts and way of reasoning, considered the staying of the boy here as what might some way prejudice his title. But whether, as insisted upon by the plaintiff's counsel, you ought to take this as an admission on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff was the lawful son of Lord Altham [earl of Anglesea], will deserve further consideration. Undoubtedly, there is a violent presumption, because no man is supposed to be wicked without design, and the design in this act must be some way or other relative to the title; but whether or no it was the opinion of the trouble he might have from this lad that induced him to do the act, or a consciousness that the lad was the son of Lord Altham, must be left to your determination.

268. ROE DEM. HALDANE & URRY v. HARVEY

4 Burr. 2484

In ejectment for certain premises in Newton, alias Frankville, in the Isle of Wight. The demises were laid on the 6th of October, 1768. The cause was tried before Mr. Justice Aston at Winchester.

He reported, that the title opened for the plaintiff was under Mrs. Haldane, as devisee of Robert Holmes. . . . Then the will of Robert Holmes was produced and proved, dated 24th of January, 1738. It appeared that he died the 9th of April, 1751, and by his will devised all the rest and residue of his estate whatsoever and wheresoever to his wife Elizabeth, her heirs, executors, and administrators. It was proved that Mrs. Elizabeth Holmes married Captain Haldane, and that he was dead. There was no proof of any receipt of rents since the Blachfords: and William Clark, a witness produced for the plaintiff, upon his cross-examination, said, "that Mrs. Haldane had, before the 6th of October, 1768, conveyed away her interest in the premises to Mr. Thomas Urry, and that the deed was in Court."

Upon this it was insisted by Mr. Serjeant Burland, for the defendant, "That the plaintiff's own witness proving the title out of Mrs. Haldane, and that the deed of conveyance to Urry was in Court, it ought to be produced in evidence, to show a title in Thomas Urry, the other lessor of the plaintiff." The deeds being in Court, or at least in the plaintiff's power, was not controverted. But, for the plaintiff, it was insisted "that no notice having been given by the defendant, for the plaintiff to produce this deed, they were not obliged to do it. . . . It was answered, "That this was not a case which required notice, that the defendant did not claim under this deed; it was only then disclosed by the plaintiff's own evidence; and to be produced, to complete his title derived from Urry."

Under the above circumstances, Mr. Justice ASTON thought "the plaintiff ought to give further evidence, to ascertain the title, under which he was to recover the term." But the plaintiff rested his case, and was nonsuited; the defendant agreeing "that the plaintiff should be at liberty to move for a new trial, without payment of costs."

A motion was accordingly made; a rule to show cause, and cause now shown. This case was strenuously argued at the bar, by several eminent counsel on both sides.

It was urged, on behalf of the defendant, that the deed being confessedly in Court, and in the power of the plaintiff, ought to have been produced by him, in order to show that Urry had a title. For, his own witness (William Clark) had proved that no title remained in Mrs. Haldane; she having conveyed it away: and none appeared in Urry; as they refused to produce the deed, though actually in Court, upon which they pretended that his title was founded. So that instead of showing that Urry had a title, this refusal to produce the deed was a good ground of presumption "that in fact he had none;" and that there was "some defect in this deed, or something or other contained in it, which, if it had been produced, would have shown that he had none; and that they did not dare to produce it, because it would destroy their title instead of proving it." . . .

On the other hand, it was argued by the plaintiff's counsel — That even admitting "that there was no need of their having had notice to produce it," or taking it upon the same footing as if such notice had been actually given to them; yet they were not under any obligation to produce it. They laid it down as a known and established rule of evidence, "That though a party had regular and full notice to produce a deed, the only consequence of his not producing it, was, that the adverse party should be let in to prove the contents of it by an inferior species of proof, as, for instance, by reading a copy of it, or by parol evidence;" which the defendants had not, in the present case, either done or attempted to do. And as to the pretended presumption "that there might be some defect in it, or something contained in it which destroyed the validity or effect of it," it was grounded upon mere imagination. . . . They insisted, with great vehemence, that instead of being nonsuited, the plaintiff ought to have had a verdict; for, that his title appeared to be a good one, without the assistance of this deed. He had laid a double demise; one from Mrs. Haldane, the other from Urry. The evidence given by William Clark was, "that Mrs. Haldane had had an interest, but had conveyed it to Mr. Urry." Therefore, most manifestly, there was an interest remaining in one of the two lessors of the plaintiff; and it was indifferent to the plaintiff, in which of the two it subsisted. . . .

Lord MANSFIELD, C. J., reasoned from the nature of an ejectment, and the course of proceeding upon it. He laid it down as a position, "that in this action, the plaintiff cannot recover, but upon the strength of his own title." He cannot found his claim upon the weakness of the defendant's title. . . .

He principally laid stress upon the plaintiff's refusing to produce the conveyance from Mrs. Haldane, which was in Court. The want of notice was no objection in this case; because they had the deed in Court. The refusal to produce it was an unfair attempt to recover, contrary to the real merits; and being a deliberate refusal, by the advice of counsel, contrary to the recommendation of the judge, warranted the strongest presumption "that the deed would show that neither of the lessors of the plaintiff had any title."

Mr. Justice YATES thought the plaintiff sought to have had a verdict. . . .

Mr. Justice ASTON. . . . I was not called upon to leave it to the jury. I thought the refusing to produce the deed was a want of fairness; and that the plaintiff had not made a complete title, without it. But if there is any doubt in the Court, I have no objection to a new trial.

Mr. Justice WILLES thought the direction was right. In ejectment the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title. The only proof here is, "that the witness said that Mrs. Haldane had conveyed to Urry;" but he would not produce the deed of conveyance to Urry, though actually in Court. I do not say that the Court could oblige them to produce this deed. But I think the title of the plaintiff was not complete; the deed not being produced. . . .

Lord MANSFIELD observed, that in civil causes, the Court will force parties to produce evidence which may prove against themselves, or leave the refusal to do it (after proper notice) as a strong presumption to the jury. The Court will do it in many cases, under particular circumstances, by rule before the trial; especially, if the party from whom the production is wanted applies for a favor. But in a criminal or penal cause, the defendant is never forced to produce any evidence, though he should hold it in his hands in Court. (1 Tidd, 515. 1 T. R. 689.)

Per Cur. Rule discharged.

269. MORSE v. MINNEAPOLIS & ST. LOUIS R. CO.

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1883

30 Minn. 465; 16 N. W. 358

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Freeborn County, FARMER, J., presiding, refusing a new trial.

J. D. Springer, for appellant. Gordon E. Cole and J. H. Parker, for respondent.

MITCHELL, J. — This was an action to recover damages for the alleged negligence of defendant, causing the death of plaintiff's intestate while employed as an engineer on its railroad. One of the acts of negligence alleged to have contributed to the injury was defendant's allowing its track to become and remain out of repair; the defects in that respect consisting of a broken rail and defective switch, which caused the engine upon which deceased was to be thrown from the track and upset. The rail and switch referred to were situated in the yard of defendant at Albert Lea, and near the water-tank, at which point the accident occurred. . . .

Plaintiff was also permitted to show that, after the accident, defendant repaired the switch alleged to have been defective. The Court held in O'Leary v. City of Mankato, 21 Minn. 65, that such evidence was, under certain circumstances, competent. This case was followed in Phelps v. City of Mankato, 23 Minn. 276, and Kelly v. South. Minn. Ry. Co., 28 Minn. 98, and this position is not without support in the decisions of other Courts. But, if competent, such evidence is only so as an admission of the previous unsafe condition of the thing repaired or removed; and, to render it admissible as such, the act must have been done so soon after the accident and under such circumstances as to indicate that it was suggested by the accident, and was done to remedy the defect which caused it. All Courts who admit the evidence at all so hold. In the present case the change in this switch was made over a year after the accident, and after it had been removed to another place. Under such circumstances the repairs were, presumably, merely an ordinary betterment. Under such a state of facts such evidence would not be admissible under any rule, and its admission was, therefore, error.

But, on mature reflection, we have concluded that evidence of this kind ought not to be admitted under any circumstances, and that the rule heretofore adopted by this Court is on principle wrong; not for the reason given by some Courts, that the acts of the employees in making such repairs are not admissible against their principals, but upon the broader ground that such acts afford no legitimate basis for construing such an act as an admission of previous neglect of duty. A person may have exercised all the care which the law required, and yet, in the light of his new experience after an unexpected accident has occurred, and as a measure of extreme caution, he may adopt additional safeguards. The more careful a person is, the more regard he has for the lives of others, the more likely he would be to do so, and it would seem unjust that he could not do so without being liable to have such acts construed as an admission of prior negligence. We think such a rule puts an unfair interpretation upon human conduct, and virtually holds out an inducement for continued negligence. Dougan v. Champlain Transp. Co., 56 N. Y. 1; Sewell v. City of Cohoes, 11 Hun 626; Baird v. Daly, 68 N. Y. 547; Payne v. Troy & B. R. Co., 9 Hun 526; Salters v. Delaware & H. Canal Co., 3 Hun 338; Dale v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 73 N. Y. 468. . . .

We discover no other error, but for those already referred to a new trial must be granted. Order reversed.

270. BROCK v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF ALABAMA. 1898

123 Ala. 24; 26 So. 329

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Lauderdale county; JAMES J. BANKS, Judge.

Polly Brock was convicted of living in adultery with Bill Coppin, and appealed. Reversed.

Under the opinion on this appeal, it is unnecessary to set out in detail any of the facts relating to the rulings of the trial Court to which exceptions were reserved, except that in reference to the argument of the solicitor. In reference to this ruling the bill of exceptions contains the following recital:

In the course of his argument the solicitor stated to the jury that Bill Coppin had failed to take the stand and deny his illicit intercourse with the defendant, or explain what he was doing out in the woods. Defendant objected, and excepted to this statement of the solicitor, because Bill Coppin was one of the defendants, and his failure to testify could not be made the subject of comment. The Court refused to sustain this exception, but stated that the argument was legitimate, and to this action of the Court the defendant then and there duly excepted.

Emmett O'Neal, for appellant. Chas. G. Brown, Atty. Gen., for the State.

SHARPE, J. . . . The defendant and one Bill Coppin being indicted jointly, a severance of the trial was obtained. The solicitor, in his argument to the jury, commented upon the fact that Coppin "had failed to take the stand and deny his illicit intercourse with the defendant, or explain what he was doing out in the woods." Upon objection by defendant's counsel to this comment, the Court stated that the argument was legitimate. There is a recognized rule of evidence which authorizes a presumption unfavorable to a party failing to produce a witness having peculiar knowledge of facts from which the party claims a benefit, and where the witness is accessible to such party and not to his adversary. In Bates v. Morris, 101 Ala. 282, 13 South. 138, this rule was referred to, and it was added that "such presumption is, however, indulged with great caution, and only when it is manifest the evidence is within the power of one party, and is not accessible to his adversary." In that case the question involved the bona fides, as to creditors of Bates, of a transfer of property by him to his wife, and it was held that the last rule stated was applicable, and that no unfavorable inference could be raised against the wife from her failure to introduce her husband as a witness, though he was present at the trial. While there has been diversity of opinion in courts of other States as to the right of the jury to consider the nonproduction of witnesses as a circumstance against the party to whom they are available, the decisions of this State appear without conflict to sustain the rule as stated in Bates v. Morris, supra; Patton v. Rambo, 20 Ala. 485; Jackson v. State, 77 Ala. 18; Carter v. Chambers, 79 Ala. 223; Pollak v. Harmon, 94 Ala. 420, 10 South. 156; Crawford v. State, 112 Ala. 1, 21 South. 214. The last-quoted case denied the right of counsel to comment in argument upon the failure of the opposite party to examine a witness who was accessible to both parties. The authorities rest upon the consideration that there is, in such cases, no presumption that the testimony, if taken, would be more favorable to one party than to the other, and no room for conjecture as to what might have been shown by an examination.

In the present case, Coppin could not have been compelled to testify to any fact tending to criminate himself. The offense being one of which he and the defendant must both have been either guilty or innocent, his mere refusal upon the ground of self-incrimination might have been construed by the jury to the defendant's disadvantage. On the contrary, if he had not declined, the credibility of his testimony would have been open to assault upon the ground of interest. If, in view of the fact that the scope allowed to his examination would have depended largely upon Coppin's own volition, the testimony could be deemed accessible to the defendant, yet it does not appear to have been less accessible to the State. Under the circumstances, no presumption could arise that the testimony was witheld from sinister motives, and the jury should have been left to try the issue upon the evidence introduced.

The proneness of the jury to consider a defendant's failure to testify in his own behalf, and the prejudice to the defendant which would naturally result therefrom, induced the legislative prohibition against any adverse comment in argument upon such failure. The statute does not cover this precise case, but the argument was improper under the general rule before stated; and, in determining its effect, we are impressed with the consideration that the same results which the statute intended to forestall when the defendant is not examined may follow, as well, when the person not produced is one jointly implicated with the defendant. The argument objected to was, therefore, forcibly calculated to injure the defendant's case, and the error committed in its indulgence must work a reversal of the judgment. . . .

Tyson, J. (dissenting). The opinion in this case practically destroys all room for the application of the universal rule or doctrine recognized by this Court and all courts of last resort, as will be shown by a careful examination of the facts as presented by the record and a proper analysis of the cases of this court cited in the opinion, and of the opinions of other Courts, upon the point here involved.

One of the theories for a refusal to apply the rule, recognized by the writer of the opinion in this case, is based upon the idea that Coppin was "accessible" as a witness for the State. To my mind the writer has misconceived the meaning of the word "accessible," and the rule or doctrine involved in this case. He limits the meaning of the word "accessible" to the presence in person of the witness, or the power of the State to procure his personal presence. Such an interpretation, I repeat, not only practically abolishes the application of the rule, but practically destroys it, by limiting it in its application to only those cases where the whereabouts of the witness is known to, and he is accessible to, the defendant, and unknown to the prosecuting officers of the State. . . . It is inconceivable how a witness can be "accessible," in the sense in which Justice Sharpe limits the meaning of the phrase quoted by him, to one party litigant, and inaccessible to his adversary, if the witness' whereabouts is known to both. Each of the parties litigant are equally entitled to all the processes of the Court to compel his attendance, and therefore can compel him to attend. This right to process to compel the attendance of the witness, doubtless, existed at the time the rule under consideration originated. This being true, just how the rule — admitting, for the sake of this discussion, that it was correctly stated in Bates v. Morris, which, however, we will show, later on, is not the true one — was called into being and became almost universally recognized and adopted by the courts, is beyond comprehension.

Bearing in mind that it is not so much the presence of the witness that a party litigant stands so much in need of, as it is the testimony to which the witness will depose with fairness, impartiality, and truthfulness, it is the latter that makes the witness accessible or available to both parties litigant. It is within the experience of all connected with the administration of justice and the trial of causes that witnesses are more or less influenced by the circumstances surrounding them at the time of the trial, their relation to the parties litigant, etc. . . . So partisan do they become at times that, however honest they may be, they are not available, to the party to the suit to whom they are hostile, to elicit the truth in full of the transaction of which they possess a full knowledge.

The foregoing considerations are conclusive to my mind of the mistaken meaning of the word "accessibility," and conclusive that a witness to the transaction may be present in the court during the trial, and ye[t] not be accessible to the State, in the sense that he may be so hostile to the prosecution, or so connected with the defendant, as that his testimony would be unavailable to the State.

But the extract from the case of Bates v. Morris, made use of by Justice SHARPE, is a much stronger statement of the rule than can be found in any cases where the question has arisen, and is not in harmony with any statement of the rule that I have been able to find, and it would seem, upon principle, that it is too strongly stated. The rule, in my judgment, was correctly stated . . . by Justice CLOPTON in Pollak v. Harmon, where he said: "There is also another rule, that when a party has the means of producing a witness who possesses peculiar or higher knowledge of the transaction, and fails to produce him, this affords ground for suspicion that the testimony of such better-informed witness would be unfavorable to his claim." . . . The presumption, or, more properly speaking, the unfavorable inference, under the rule as laid down in the cases of Carter v. Chambers and Pollak v. Harmon, the jury may be authorized to indulge, arises, not out of the accessibility or inaccessibility of the witness to either of the parties litigant, but out of the failure of a party to explain or otherwise rebut damaging facts introduced in evidence against him by a witness, accessible to him, possessing a knowledge of the transaction supposed to be favorable to him, if such favorable fact exists. In no case in this court have the facts of the case warranted the application of the rule. . . .

We not are, however, without cases in which the rule has been applied in other jurisdictions. These cases are numerous, and the rule, as stated in them, comports with the one laid down in Carter v. Chambers and Pollak v. Harmon. Many of them are criminal cases, and involve the correctness of the prosecuting attorney's comment, as here, upon the defendant's failure to explain, by a witness, accessible to him, possessing a knowledge of the incriminating facts introduced by the State against him. Notably among these is the case of Graves v. U. S., 150 U. S. 118, where the rule is clearly stated to be as follows: "It was said by Chief Justice SHAW in the case of Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 316: 'But when pretty stringent proof of circumstances is produced tending to support the charge, and it is apparent that the accused is so situated that he can offer evidence of all the facts and circumstances as they existed, and show, if such was the truth, that the suspicious circumstances can be accounted for consistently with his innocence, and he fails to offer such proof, the natural conclusion is that the proof, if produced, instead of rebutting, would tend to support, the charge.' The rule, even in criminal cases, is that, if a party has it peculiarly within his power to produce witnesses whose testimony would elucidate the transaction, the fact that he does not do it creates the presumption that the testimony, if produced, would be unfavorable." . . .

The other theory upon which Justice SHARPE declines to apply the rule in this case is that Coppin's testimony was not accessible to the defendant, for the reason that he could not have been compelled to testify to any fact tending to criminate himself. . . .

There was no allusion in the remarks of the solicitor to her failure to testify, but simply her failure to introduce Coppin, who could have contradicted the evidence introduced by the State tending to establish his illicit intercourse with her, or who could have explained what he was doing out in the woods with her. Besides, the objection to these remarks was not made on this ground, but exclusively upon the idea that Coppin's failure to testify could not be made the subject of comment. This precise question was passed upon in the following cases, cited supra: Jackson v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. 342; State v. Weddington, 103 N. C. 364; People v. McGrath, 5 Utah 525; Sutton v. Com. 85 Va. 128; and State v. Mathews, 98 Mo. 128, — in which it was held that similar comments, as here, did not offend statutes containing substantially the same provisions as ours. The defendent failing to introduce any testimony whatever, clearly her conduct in this respect was the subject of comment, and this record discloses a case where the rule ought to be applied and enforced, as it is applied and enforced by the Courts of other States. . . . In my opinion, the judgment of conviction ought to be affirmed.

271. STEVENS v. BOSTON ELEVATED RAILWAY CO.

184 Mass. 476; 69 N. E. 338

Two actions of Tort by the administratrix of the estate of Charles N. Stevens, the first for the suffering of the intestate and the second for his death, both alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants in operating a car of the defendant. Writs dated respectively November 19, 1900, and September 20, 1901. In the Superior Court the cases were tried together before FESSENDEN, J., without a jury.

The plaintiff's intestate was a hackman driving a carriage in a funeral. According to the plaintiff's evidence the car came up from behind, and struck one of the forward wheels of the carriage and one of the horses. It was admitted that neither before nor at the time of the accident did the motorman sound the gong. The judge found for the plaintiff in both cases, assessing damages in the first case at $2,500, and in the second case at $4,000. The defendant alleged exceptions. The exception relied upon was as follows:

The plaintiff offered in evidence one of the rules in a certain book admitted by the defendant to be a book of rules issued by the defendant company to its motormen and conductors, and admitted to have been the book of rules that was in force on the day of the accident. The rule which the plaintiff offered was Rule 83, and was as follows:

"Gong Ringing. The gong must always be sounded before starting, when starting, and before reaching, and at all street crossings, when passing other cars or vehicles, and at all points where vehicles or foot passengers are crossing or are liable to cross the tracks. The gong must not be sounded wantonly or unnecessarily, and when passing places of worship during service hours, making as little noise as possible. Upon approaching streets or crossings the power must be shut off and the car kept under perfect control. This rule must be strictly observed during all hours of the day and night."

To the admission of this rule the defendant objected. The counsel for the plaintiff said: "I put it in as a rule of conduct for your motorman by which he is to be judged to some degree." The judge then said: "I suppose it is put upon the same ground that an ordinance is put upon as bearing upon the carelessness or negligence of the person by whom the rules are to be followed. I will admit the evidence and save Mr. Thompson his exception." The rule was then admitted in evidence.

W. G. Thompson, for the defendant. S. L. Whipple and W. R. Sears, for the plaintiff.

KNOWLTON, C. J. — The only exception now relied on by the defendant is to the admission in evidence of the defendant's rule in regard to sounding the gong, in connection with testimony that the defendant's motorman disobeyed the rule and that this disobedience was one of the causes of the accident. The decisions in different jurisdictions are not entirely harmonious upon the question now raised. But we are of opinion that the weight of authority and of reason tends to support the ruling of the judge in the present case.

It has been settled by various adjudications in this Commonwealth that the adoption of additional precautions for safety by a defendant, after an accident, cannot be proved, as tending to show liability for the method used at the time of the accident. . . . This is the general rule in other jurisdictions. Morse v. Minneapolis & St. Louis Railway, 30 Minn. 465 [ante, No. 269]; Columbia & Puget Sound Railroad v. Hawthorne, 144 U. S. 202, 207, 208, and cases there cited. On the other hand, a violation of rules previously adopted by a defendant in reference to the safety of third persons has generally been admitted in evidence as tending to show negligence of the defendant's disobedient servant for which the defendant is liable. The admissibility of such evidence has often been assumed by this Court without discussion. Mayo v. Boston & Maine Railroad, 104 Mass. 137, 140. . . . Similar statements of the law may be found in numerous cases. Dublin, Wickford & Wexford Railway v. Slattery, 3 App. Cas. 1155, 1163. . . . The only decision to the contrary of which we are aware is in the case of Fonda v. St. Paul City Railway, 71 Minn. 438, 449.

It is contended by the defendant that there is no sound principle under which such evidence can be admitted. The evidence is somewhat analogous to proof of the violation of an ordinance or statute by the defendant or his servant, which is always received as evidence, although not conclusive, of the defendant's negligence. Wright v. Malden & Melrose Railroad, 4 Allen 283; Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136; Hall v. Ripley, 119 Mass. 135; Hanlon v. South Boston Horse Railroad, 129 Mass. 310. Such an ordinance or statute, enacted by a body representing the interests of the public, imposes "prima facie" upon everybody a duty of obedience. Disobedience is, therefore, a breach of duty, unless some excuse for it can be shown which creates a different duty, that, as between man and man, overrides the duty imposed by the statute or ordinance. Such disobedience in a matter affecting the plaintiff is always competent upon the question whether the defendant was negligent. So a rule made by a corporation for the guidance of its servants in matters affecting the safety of others is made in the performance of a duty, by a party that is called upon to consider methods, and determine how its business shall be conducted. Such a rule, made known to its servants, creates a duty of obedience as between the master and the servant, and disobedience of it by the servant is negligence as between the two. If such disobedience injuriously affects a third person, it is not to be assumed in favor of the master that the negligence was immaterial to the injured person, and that his rights were not affected by it. Rather ought it to be held an implication that there was a breach of duty towards him, as well as towards the master who prescribed the conduct that he thought necessary or desirable for protection in such cases. Against the proprietor of a business, the methods which he adopts for the protection of others are some evidence of what he thinks necessary or proper to insure their safety.

A distinction may well be made between precautions taken voluntarily before an accident, and precautions which are suggested and adopted after an accident. This distinction is pointed out in Columbia & Puget Sound Railroad v. Hawthorne, 144 U. S. 202, 207. . . . In Morse v. Minneapolis & St. Louis Railway, 30 Minn. 465 [ante, No. 269], it is said, referring to the same subject, that "A person may have exercised all the care which the law required, and yet, in the light of his new experience, after an unexpected accident has occurred, and as a measure of extreme caution, he may adopt additional safeguards." See also Illinois Central Railroad v. Swisher, 61 Ill. App. 611. In Menard v. Boston & Maine Railroad, 150 Mass. 386, and in some of the earlier cases there is language which goes further than the decision, and which might imply that such evidence as was received in this case is incompetent, but the case is authority only for that which was decided.

Exceptions overruled.

274. HORNE TOOKE'S TRIAL. (1794. Howell's State Trials, XXV, 1, 120). [Treason. A certain paper, addressed to Mr. Tooke and found at his house, was offered against him].

Mr. Tooke. — I do not know what papers may have been taken from my house; but are letters written to me to be produced as evidence against me?

L. C. J. EYRE. — Being found in your possession, they undoubtedly are producible as evidence; but, as to the effect of them, very much will depend upon the circumstances of the contents of those letters, and whether answers to them can be traced, or whether anything has been done upon them. A great number of papers may be found in a man's possession which will be, prima facie, evidence against him, but will be open to a variety of explanations; and it is always a very considerable explanation that nothing appears to have been done in consequence of the paper being sent to him. But all papers found in the possession of a man are prima facie evidence against him, if the contents of them have application to the subject under consideration.

Mr. Tooke. — The reason of my asking it is, I am very much afraid that, besides treason, I may be charged with blasphemy.

Lord Chief Justice EYRE. — You are not tried for that.

Mr. Tooke. — It is notorious I do not answer common letters of civility, but I have received and kept many curious letters. I received some letters from a man whose name is Oliver Verall, and he endeavoured to prove to me that he was God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. He proved it from the Old Testament; in the first place that he was God the Father, because God is O Veral: that is, God over all. He proved he was God the Son, from the New Testament — verily, verily I am he; that is, Veral I, Veral I, I am he. Now, if these letters, written to me, which I, from curiosity, have preserved, but upon which I have taken no step, and to which I have given no answer, are produced against me, I do not know what may become of me.

L. C. J. EYRE. — If you can treat all the letters that have been found upon you with as much success as you have these letters of your correspondent, you will have no great reason for apprehension, even if that letter should be brought against you.

MONEY had and received. Plea — General issue. The plaintiff had sent a letter to the defendants, demanding a sum of money as due to him. But no answer had been returned by the defendants. The plaintiff's counsel called for the letter under a notice to produce, with a view to reading it in evidence, as a part of their case.

Scarlett, A. G., for the defendants, objected . . . an answered letter, written by the plaintiff, was not evidence in his own favour; for otherwise a party would only have to write a letter to make evidence for himself.

F. Pollock, contra. Certain things are stated in this letter, which the defendants might deny by answering it; and I submit that it is evidence, exactly the same as what is said verbally in the presence of a defendant is evidence against him, though he may make no answer.

L. C. J. TENTERDEN. — I am slow to admit that. What is said to a man before his face, he is in some degree called on to contradict, if he does not acquiesce in it. But the not answering a letter is quite different; and it is too much to say that a man, by omitting to answer a letter, at all events admits the truth of the statements that letter contains. . . . You may have that single line read, in which the plaintiff makes a demand of a certain amount, but not any other part which states any supposed fact or facts.

276. MATTOCKS v. LYMAN

16 Vt. 113

ASSUMPSIT. The declaration set forth in substance, in several counts, that the plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement, by which the defendants were to furnish money, and the plaintiff was to purchase wool for them, which the defendants were to sell, and, if the profits exceeded $200, to pay to the plaintiff for his services one half of the amount of profits, — but if they were less than that sum, then to pay the plaintiff one third; and the plaintiff averred that the money had been furnished and the wool purchased, as agreed, and that the defendants had sold the same at a profit, but had refused to pay to the plaintiff his share. The declaration also contained counts in indeb. assumpsit for work and labor, goods sold and delivered, and the money counts. The defendants pleaded the general issue, and also a plea in set-off. Trial by jury.

The plaintiff, to prove the allegations in his declaration, introduced one Bradley as a witness, who testified that, at the request of the plaintiff, he called with him at the defendants' store, and that the plaintiff stated to the defendant Lyman the terms of the contract, as set forth in the declaration, and said he was informed that the wool had been sold for a price which would entitle him to one-half of the profits, and demanded said proportion, — and that Lyman's only reply was, that he was ready to settle with him, plaintiff; but that they did not owe him anything, but that he, plaintiff, owed them. . . . The defendants, under their plea in offset, gave in evidence a note for $25, which they held against the plaintiff. The defendants requested the Court to charge the jury, — 1. That the evidence was insufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover. . . .

The jury were also told that the testimony of Bradley was competent evidence, as tending to prove, by an implied admission on the part of the defendant Lyman, that the contract was as claimed by the plaintiff; — but that its weight must depend upon the circumstances attending it, of which they were judges. . . . The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. Exceptions by defendants.

C. D. Kasson, for defendants. . . . The testimony of the witness Bradley was not evidence even tending to prove a special contract. No inference of any admission of the correctness of the plaintiff's claim can legally be drawn from it. . . .

Maeck and Smalley, for plaintiff.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Redfield, J. . . . The most important practical question, by far, discussed in the case, remains to be determined. It seems to have been generally considered that all conversation had in the presence of a party, in regard to the subject of litigation, might properly be given in evidence to the jury. But in Vail v. Strong, 10 Vt. 457, and in Gle v. Lincoln, 11 Vt. 152, some qualification of this rule is established. It is there held, that unless a claim is asserted by the claimant or his agent, and distinctly made to the party, and calling naturally for a reply, mere silence is no ground of inference against one. And we think even in such a case that mere silence ought not to conclude a party, unless he thereby induces a party to act upon his silence in a manner different from what he otherwise would have acted.

There are many cases of this character when one's silence ought to conclude him. But when the claim is made for the mere purpose of drawing out evidence, as, in the present case, it is obvious must have been the fact, or when it is in the way of altercation, or, in short, unless the party asserting the claim does it with a view to ascertain the claim of the person upon whom he makes the demand, and in order to know how to regulate his own conduct in the matter, and this is known to the opposite party, and he remains silent, and thereby leads the adversary astray, mere silence is, and ought to be, no ground of inference against any one. The liabilities to misapprehension, or misrecollection, or misrepresentation are such, that this silence might be the only security. To say, under such a dilemma, that silence shall apply assent to all which an antagonist may see fit to assert, would involve an absurdity little less gross than some of the most extravagant caricatures of this caricature loving age. With some men, perhaps, silence would be some ground of inferring assent, and with others none at all. The testimony then would depend upon the character and habits of the party, — which would lead to the direct trial of the parties instead of the case.

It is true, when a claim is the subject of conversation in the hearing of a party against whom the claim is made, and he takes any part in such conversation, the whole evidence must go to the jury; for, by consenting to enter into the conversation, he thereby makes his declarations upon the subject evidence, if his adversary sees fit to avail himself of them, — and by consenting to make any declaration in regard to the matter, he thereby puts the matter upon a much stronger ground against him than would mere silence. But even in such a case the jury should be told, in the charge of the Court, that neither his declarations, nor his silence, are to be construed into an implied admission of facts beyond the scope of the declarations themselves.

In the present case the declarations of the defendant, Cole, were a virtual denial of the claim made upon them by the plaintiff. . . . The declaration or the silence of Cole had no tendency to prove an admission of the plaintiff's claim.

We understand the English cases, in regard to admissions implied from silence, to go no farther than we now decide, although it is true the dicta of many of the elementary writers go farther. The cases cited in Starkie's Evidence, 2d vol., p. 26, to support the general proposition that a presumption may be made of an admission of a party from acquiescence, or silence, are all where the party lies by, during the exercise of a right interfering with his claim, or where the party, by his silence, has led another into a mistake, which amounts to a virtual fraud, unless he were to abide by his silence. Steele v. Prickett, 2 Stark. R. 463 (3 E. C. L. 490); Doe v. Allen, 3 Taunt. 78; Duncan v. Scott, 1 Camp. 100. They are cases of acquiescence in the conduct of a party based upon that acquiescence, rather than of silence under the mere assertion of a claim, and when denial could be of no avail, but to lead to altercation. In this latter class of cases, I have not been able to find any decision justifying the presumption of admission from silence merely.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

277. COMMONWEALTH v. KENNEY

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1847

12 Metc. 235

LARCENY of a bag of money. . . . John S. Brewer was called by the attorney for the Commonwealth, and testified that he was in one of the watch houses, in Boston, between eleven and twelve o'clock in the evening of September 5, 1846, and that while he was there two of the watchmen of the city, having the defendant in custody, came in; that one of the watchmen said, "here is a man that has been robbing a man;" that presently Russell, the person named in the indictment as having been robbed, came in crying, and said, "that man," pointing to the defendant,

"has stolen my money;" . . . that the witness . . . saw a bag, which he took up, and thereupon said, "here is the bag;" the defendant then being on the stairs, going down cellar, and within hearing; that Russell immediately said, "that is my bag;" that Baxter then took the bag, and counted the money in it; and that while Baxter was counting the money — the defendant then standing in the watch house — Russell said, "that was all the money I had in the world;" and that the defendant made no reply to any of the aforesaid declarations. . . .

The defendant's counsel objected to the admission of the declarations of Russell, on the ground that the testimony of Russell himself was the best evidence, and that the defendant was entitled to it, and to the right of cross-examining him. The judge admitted the declarations of Russell, as above reported. The defendant was found guilty by the jury, and alleged exceptions.

W. H. Whitman, for the defendant. S. D. Parker, for the commonwealth.

SHAW, C. J. — The defendant was indicted for stealing money and a bag, the property of Barzillai Russell, from the person of said Russell. The averment of the fact of stealing, and that the money was the property of Russell, were material averments. Russell was not called as a witness, doubtless because he could not be found. But evidence was offered to show that declarations were made at the watch house, by Russell, in the presence and hearing of the defendant, in regard to the theft, to which the defendant made no reply. This evidence was objected to by the defendant, but was admitted by the Court; and this is the ground of exception. . . .

The evidence, if competent at all, was competent on the ground of admission by the defendant, which, though often slight as to weight, is not secondary.

But on another ground, we take a different view of the admissibility of the evidence, depending on the question whether the statements of Russell in the hearing of the defendant, and the silence of the latter, do amount to a tacit admission of the facts stated. It depends on this: If a statement is made in the hearing of another, in regard to facts affecting his rights, and he makes a reply, wholly or partially admitting their truth, then the declaration and the reply are both admissible; the reply, because it is the act of the party, who will not be presumed to admit anything affecting his own interest, or his own rights, unless compelled to it by the force of truth; and the declaration, because it may give meaning and effect to the reply. . . . In some cases, where a similar declaration is made in one's hearing, and he makes no reply, it may be a tacit admission of the facts. But this depends on two facts: first, whether he hears and understands the statement, and comprehends its bearing; and secondly, whether the truth of the facts embraced in the statement is within his own knowledge, or not; whether he is in such a situation that he is at liberty to make any reply; and whether the statement is made under such circumstances, and by such persons, as naturally to call for a reply, if he did not intend to admit it. If made in the course of any judicial hearing, he could not interfere and deny the statement; it would be to charge the witness with perjury, and alike inconsistent with decorum and the rules of law. So, if the matter is of something not within his knowledge; if the statement is made by a stranger, whom he is not called on to notice; or if he is restrained by fear, by doubts of his rights, by a belief that his security will be best promoted by his silence; then no inference of assent can be drawn from that silence. Perhaps it is within the province of the judge, who must consider these preliminary questions in the first instance to decide ultimately upon them. . . .

The circumstances were such, that the Court are of opinion that the declaration of the party robbed, to which the defendant made no reply, ought not to have been received as competent evidence of his admission, either of the fact of stealing, or that the bag and money were the property of the party alleged to be robbed. The declaration made by the officer, who first brought the defendant to the watch house, he had certainly no occasion to reply to. The subsequent statement, if made in the hearing of the defendant (of which we think there was evidence), was made whilst he was under arrest, and in the custody of persons having official authority. They were made, by an excited, complaining party, to such officers, who were just putting him into confinement. If not strictly an official complaint to officers of the law, it was a proceeding very similar to it, and he might well suppose that he had no right to say anything until regularly called upon to answer.

We are therefore of opinion that the verdict must be set aside and a New trial granted.

278. PARULO v. PHILADELPHIA & READING R. CO.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK. 1906

145 Fed. 664

MOTION by defendant to set aside the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff and for a new trial, on the grounds that the verdict is contrary to the evidence and law and upon the exceptions taken upon the trial.

Thomas J. O'Neill, for plaintiff. Pierre M. Brown, for defendant.

RAY, District Judge. — This action has been twice tried. On the first trial the jury disagreed. On the second trial the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,000. On the evening of November 7, 1902, the plaintiff, who was working as a stone mason at a place called "Rock Hill," a few miles north of Perkasie, a station on defendant's railroad, being at Perkasie and desiring to go to his home, and having five pounds of meat in a package, went down to the station. He claims that as he arrived close to the station he found a freight train at a standstill, with the engine near the water tank a short distance above and north of the station, the cars extending for some distance to the south of it; that he clambered up the side and to the top of the car some three or four cars back and to the south of the engine, and seated himself on the front end of the car, with his feet hanging down between it and the one next in front. He claims that a few seconds after he had so seated himself the train started on north, and that it had proceeded but a few hundred feet when a man with a lantern, whom he does not claim to recognize, came up behind him, and told him, "Get off the train. I told him a couple of times 'Wait until the train stops.' He said, 'You won't get off, you son of a bitch.' I said, 'wait until the train stops,' and he kicked me right off between the two cars." . . . One foot was crushed partially off, and the other wholly severed. . . . The engineer, fireman, and conductor say they were on the engine or tender, and that the brakeman was there also, as they passed Perkasie, and that the flagman was in the top of the caboose at the rear end of the train. They all say they did not see any one on the train except this crew, and did not push or kick any one off.

The contention was and is that the plaintiff did not furnish any evidence that any employé of defendant on that train either pushed or kicked him off; that there is no evidence to sustain such a finding, or to justify the Court in submitting the question to the jury. . . . It was a fair question of fact for the jury whether or not this brakeman kicked the plaintiff off the train when it was in motion at the place in question.

The defendant excepted to the ruling of the Court sustaining objections to certain questions put to Dr. Williams and to the witness Levi Texter. After the accident and the finding of the plaintiff he was taken into a freight car — one on a siding. Dr. Williams, the local physician of the defendant, was sent for, and he saw the plaintiff. He says:

"Part of one foot was cut off, and the other was cut off near the heel. It was smashed. . . . He was not unconscious at any time when I saw him. At no time. . . . It was a dangerous wound; if not attended to properly it would be fatal. He seemed to be suffering great pain. Q. — Did you have any conversation direct with him yourself while he was there in the railroad station? A. — I made an effort to, but I could not get anything out of him one way or the other for a long time, and the section hands, I asked them to ask him, and he said something to them and they told me. Q. — You did not talk directly to him yourself, did you? A. — No, sir. Q. — You cannot speak Italian? A. — No, sir; the section hands were Italians. . . . Q. — Then after you had asked the sectionman to ask the plaintiff how the accident occurred, did the sectionman talk to the plaintiff in Italian? A. — I do not know what he talked. He talked something. I cannot tell you what it was. He did not talk English, I know that. Q. — He said something to him? A. — Yes, sir. Q. — Did the plaintiff say something to the sectionman after that? A. — The sectionman;

yes, sir. Q. — Did the sectionman then say something to you? A. — Yes. Q. — What did the sectionman say to you? Was this in the presence of the plaintiff? A. — Yes. Q. — What did the sectionman say to you?"

This was objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and plaintiff's counsel said: "I suppose the theory upon which it is offered is that this sectionman is supposed to have correctly interpreted what he told him." To this defendant's counsel by silence assented. The Court: "You mean there is no proof that the sectionman understood what was said to him?" Plaintiff's Counsel: "Yes." The Court: "Or that this man stated correctly what he said?" Plaintiff's Counsel: "Absolutely." The Court then sustained the objection. Defendant's Counsel: "Do you admit that the plaintiff understood English to any extent?" Plaintiff's Counsel: "No, I do not know how much English he spoke." Defendant's counsel then excepted. At this time there was no evidence before the Court that the plaintiff could speak or understand a word of English. . . .

A. M. Sperry was then called by the defendant, and he said that on the Monday following the accident he went to the hospital, and talked with the plaintiff in English, and he understood plaintiff and plaintiff seemed to understand him. "I asked him first where he lived, and all about him, and he told me he worked in a stone crusher at Rock Hill, and he had been down to Perkasie, and was getting back, and walking up along the railroad, and he stopped to light his pipe, and the wind blew him under the train." Says his talk with the plaintiff was just long enough for him to tell him (witness) that. . . . These Italian sectionmen were not produced. Their absence was attempted to be accounted for by the statement of a witness that they left the employment of defendant in July after the accident, stating they were going to Italy. It is now claimed that it was error to reject the statement of the sectionman made to Dr. Williams in the presence of the plaintiff when he lay in the condition described, and under the circumstances described, as his silence might be considered as an acquiescence in that statement.

It is not everything that is said in the presence of a party to a litigation in reference to the subject-matter thereof that may be given in evidence against him when he remains silent, and his silence is relied upon as an implied admission of the truth or correctness of the statement. If the party in whose presence the statement was made was physically and mentally able to hear and understand, and sufficiently near to hear, and the statement was of a character that would under the circumstances naturally call upon him for a denial or qualification if untrue, and he was at liberty to deny or qualify, then it may be given in evidence against him; otherwise, not. Schilling v. Union R. Co. of N. Y. C., 77 App. Div. 74, 78 N. Y. Supp. 1015; Commonwealth v. Kenney, 12 Metc. 235 [ante, No. 277]; People v. Koerner, 154 N. Y. 357, 374, 375; Lanergan v. People, 39 N. Y. 41; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (15th Ed.), § 197; 2

Wigmore on Evidence, § 1071. . . . Whether the circumstances are such as to call for a reply is a preliminary question for the Court. . . .

Applying these rules to the case now before the Court, it is evident that the statement made by the sectionman, whose ability to understand English and whose plainness of speech in English were not disclosed, under the circumstances of this case was not proper to go to the jury, and was properly excluded. Within a very short time before the statement was made in his presence both feet had been crushed off. The shock was great, and he was exhausted from great pain and loss of blood. The doctor was unable to get anything from him. It was with great difficulty and only after repeated efforts that they ascertained his name. There was no shadow of evidence that he heard or paid any attention to what this sectionman said to the doctor. Clearly, "no reasonable inference of acquiescence could be drawn from the silence" of the plaintiff under the circumstances proved by the witnesses and not disputed. Under such circumstances, it cannot be properly presumed or inferred, or even reasonably supposed, that he listened or paid attention to, much less understood or comprehended, what was said to the doctor by this Italian laborer, who soon thereafter left for Italy, assuming he did, and whose knowledge of and ability to speak English must have been imperfect. If the plaintiff could not understand the English of the doctor, is it reasonable to suppose he understood that of this Italian sectionman who was speaking to the doctor and not to him? The case is within and governed by the Schilling Case and the Koerner Case cited, as well as by the general rule laid down by Greenleaf and Elliott, supra. . . .

As there was no prejudicial error, the motion for a new trial is denied.

279. WIEDEMANN v. WALPOLE

L. R. 1891, 2 Q. B. 534

MOTION to enter judgment for the defendant on one of the issues in an action tried before POLLOCK, B., and a jury. The action was brought to recover damages for the breach of the defendant's promise to marry the plaintiff; to recover damages for libel, and to recover the amount of expenses incurred by the plaintiff in making certain journeys at the defendant's request. The defendant pleaded a denial of the promise to marry, and of the libel, and further, that the occasion of publishing the alleged libel was privileged. . . .

The plaintiff produced at the trial copies of letters written by her to the defendant subsequently to her meeting with his mother, the first being a letter of November 27, 1882, written from the hotel at Cannes, in which letters she stated that he had promised to marry her. The plaintiff also produced a copy of a letter, dated January 3, 1883, and written to the defendant by her brother-in-law, a burgomaster of Nordhausen. This letter contained no reference to the alleged promise of marriage, but asked the defendant to communicate his intentions and resolutions for the future of the plaintiff as soon as possible, and said that the defendant must have considered that the compromised honor of the family could not be received without further explanation. The plaintiff further produced a copy of a letter written to the defendant about February 3, 1884, by the pastor of the German Church at Sydenham, asking the defendant whether he intended to fulfil his promise to marry the plaintiff, and threatening that the writer would see by means of the law and the press that justice was done to his countrywoman.

The defendant did not answer any of these letters. . . . At the close of the plaintiff's case, POLLOCK, B., ruled that the fact of the defendant not having answered the letters was such material evidence in corroboration of the promise as was required by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, s. 2, and declined to enter judgment for the defendant on the issue of breach of promise of marriage. The defendant was called, and admitted having received the letters, and that the copies produced were substantially correct. The jury found a general verdict for the plaintiff for 300 £. on all the issues. The defendant now moved to have judgment entered for himself on the issue of breach of promise of marriage.

Lockwood, Q. C., and W. Graham, for the defendant. The letters in question were not evidence in corroboration of the plaintiff's testimony within 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, s. 2, which provides "that no plaintiff in any action for breach of promise of marriage shall recover a verdict unless his or her testimony shall be corroborated by some other material evidence in support of such promise." The fact that a man does not answer a letter from a woman alleging that he has promised to marry her is no evidence that he admits the allegation. . . .

Thomas Terrell (E. F. C. Philips, and Warraker, with him), for the plaintiff. The defendant's omission to answer the letters was some evidence for the jury of corroboration. It is for the jury to say whether the evidence is material. . . .

Lord ESHER, M. R. — The first and main question to be decided in this case is a question of law, and I shall give no opinion upon any other questions in dispute between the parties. The point of law is whether in such a case as this — where nothing has happened beyond what has happened here — the mere fact of the defendant not answering any of the letters which have been brought before us is any such evidence in corroboration of the promise to marry as is required by the statute. We have not to determine whether or not a promise to marry was given. That was a question for the jury. The question for us is whether, according to law, the fact of the defendant not answering the letters could be taken as any evidence of the corroboration required by the statute. . . .

The first letter put forward by the plaintiff's counsel is one written by the plaintiff to the defendant, in which she states in effect to the defendant that he had promised to marry her. He did not answer it. When one comes to think what is meant by "not answering it," it is impossible to see how that could be any evidence in corroboration of the promise to marry. The argument that it was such evidence must be that not answering was an admission by the defendant of the truth of what was alleged against him in the letter. Now the allegation in the present case was that he had promised to marry the plaintiff. Suppose, however, the letter had charged against him some grievous offence or misconduct, and the writer had stated that unless the defendant paid something he would be exposed. The argument, if true at all, must be that by not answering such a letter the man who receives it must be taken to admit that he is guilty of the charges contained in it. Now there are cases — business and mercantile cases — in which the Courts have taken notice that, in the ordinary course of business, if one man of business states in a letter to another that he has agreed to do certain things, the person who receives that letter must answer it if he means to dispute the fact that he did so agree. So, where merchants are in dispute one with the other in the course of carrying on some business negotiations, and one writes to the other, "but you promised me that you would do this or that," if the other does not answer the letter, but proceeds with the negotiations, he must be taken to admit the truth of the statement. But such cases as those are wholly unlike the case of a letter charging a man with some offence or meanness. Is it the ordinary habit of mankind, of which the Courts will take notice, to answer such letters; and must it be taken, according to the ordinary practice of mankind, that if a man does not answer he admits the truth of the charge made against him? If it were so, life would be unbearable. A man might day by day write letters, which, if they were not answered, would be brought forward as evidence of the truth of the charges made in them. The ordinary and wise practice is not to answer them — to take no notice of them. Unless it is made out to be the ordinary practice of mankind to answer, I cannot see that not answering is any evidence that the person who receives such letters admits the truth of the statements contained in them. I have, therefore, no doubt that the mere fact of not answering a letter stating that the person to whom it is written has made a promise of marriage, is no evidence whatever of an admission that he did make the promise, and therefore no evidence in corroboration of the promise.

I do not say there may not be circumstances, occurring in a correspondence between a man and woman, which would or might make the omission to answer one letter in the correspondence some evidence of an admission of the truth of the statements contained in the letter. There might be cases in which the Court thought that, having regard to the nature of the correspondence and the circumstances of it, the not answering one letter in that correspondence did amount to evidence of an admission; but this is not one of those cases. Here we have only to say whether the mere fact of not answering the letters, with nothing else for us to consider, is any evidence in corroboration of the promise. . . . I am of opinion that there was no evidence of the corroboration of the promise to marry required by the statute. The judge, therefore, ought to have non-suited the plaintiff with respect to her claim for damages for breach of promise of marriage, and upon that issue there should be judgment for the defendant.

BOWEN, L. J. — It seems to me that, with respect to the question of law for our decision in this case, the matter admits of no doubt. It would be a monstrous thing if the mere fact of not answering a letter which charges a man with some misconduct was held to be evidence of an admission by him that he had been guilty of it. There must be some limitation placed upon the doctrine that silence when a charge is made amounts to evidence of an admission of the truth of the charge. The limitation is, I think, this: Silence is not evidence of an admission, unless there are circumstances which render it more reasonably probable that a man would answer the charge made against him than that he would not. That appears to me good sense, and it is in substance the principle laid down by WILLES, J., in Richards v. Gellatly, Law Rep. 7 C. P. 127, p. 131. He says:

"It seems to have been at one time thought that a duty was cast upon the recipient of a letter to answer it, and that his omission to do so amounted to evidence of an admission of the truth of the statements contained in it. But that notion has been long since exploded, and the absurdity of acting upon it demonstrated. It may be otherwise where the relation between the parties is such that a reply might be properly expected." . . .

KAY, L. J.: The plaintiff's counsel relies upon various matters as evidence which corroborated the plaintiff's testimony that the defendant promised to marry her. . . . I agree with what has been said by the rest of the Court in this respect, and I think that the proper course which the learned judge at the trial ought to have taken was to say that the plaintiff's evidence with respect to the promise had not been materially corroborated in such a way that there was anything left to go to the jury on the issue of breach of promise of marriage.

Motion granted accordingly.

280. RUDD v. ROBINSON

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1891

126 N. Y. 113

APPEAL from judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court in the first judicial department, entered upon an order made May 7, 1889, which denied a motion for a new trial made upon a case and exceptions under § 1001 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and which modified and affirmed as modified a judgment in favor of plaintiff entered upon a decision of the Court on trial at Special Term.

Thomas Darlington, for appellant. The exception to the admission as evidence of the books of account of the Goodwillie-Wyman Company was well taken. . . .

Benjamin F. Blair, for respondent. The account-books of the Goodwillie-Wyman Company were properly received in evidence. . . .

EARL, J. — The plaintiff is receiver of the Goodwillie-Wyman Company, an insolvent manufacturing corporation organized under the laws of this State. The action was brought in equity to charge the defendant as a trustee of the corporation for the unlawful receipt and appropriation of its money and property. An interlocutory judgment was rendered against him charging him with a large amount of money thus improperly received, and appropriated. The liability of the defendant for this money was, in the main, established by the account-books of the corporation, and the principal contention on his behalf upon this appeal is that those books were improperly received as evidence against him.

The capital of the corporation was $50,000, of which Robinson, Briggs and Innet, three of the directors, owned $1,000 each; and the balance of the stock was owned by Fisk and Goodwillie, the two other directors. Goodwillie was president, Fisk treasurer, and Briggs vice-president and secretary of the corporation. There was no proof that the defendant had actual knowledge of the entries contained in the books which were used as evidence against him, or that he authorized such entries or caused them to be made. There was no proof from which the law would raise a legal presumption that he had knowledge of the entries, unless he is chargeable with such knowledge from the mere fact that he was a stockholder and trustee of the corporation.

There is no rule of law which charges a director or stockholder or corporation with actual knowledge of its business transactions merely because he is such director or stockholder. In this case the broad claim is made that in an action by a corporation against one of its members to enforce a personal liability to the corporation, its books are competent evidence against him, to show the condition of the accounts between him and it and to establish the extent of his liability to it, upon their simple production and proof that they are the books of the corporation kept as such by its officers and agents. The proposition is thus announced in the points of the learned counsel for the plaintiff: "Between a corporation and its members all its books regularly kept by its officers and agents for the purpose of recording its transactions and properly conducting its business are per se evidence."

The cases reported in this country and England bearing upon this question are very numerous, and the general expressions of judges contained in their opinions are not entirely harmonious. The conflict, however, is mainly in the dicta of judges, and not in decisions actually made. The books of corporations for many purposes are evidence, not only as between the corporation and its members, and between members, but also as between the corporation or its members and strangers. They are received in evidence generally to prove corporate acts of a corporation such as its incorporation, its list of stockholders, its by-laws, the formal proceedings of its board of directors and its financial condition when its solvency comes in question. But we have not been able, after a careful examination of the authorities cited by the counsel for the plaintiff, and many others, to find any case in which it has been decided that the books of account of a corporation are competent evidence, of themselves, to establish an account or claim against a trustee or stockholder in an action brought in behalf of the corporation: and it has been repeatedly said by judges and text writers that they are not competent for that purpose. . . . In Hill v. Manchester, etc., Water Works Co. (5 B. & Adol. 866), by a clause in the charter of the defendant, it was enacted that its clerks should, in a book provided by the company, keep an account of all acts, proceedings and transactions of the company, and that every proprietor should have liberty to inspect the same and take copies of the entries; and it was held that entries of the proceedings in the books thus kept by the clerk were not admissible in evidence on behalf of the company against one of their own members suing them. DENMAN, Ch. J., writing the opinion and speaking of certain facts to be proved, said:

"These points of fact, however, could only be established by the books kept by the clerk of the company; and the question now to be decided is whether they are evidence against the plaintiff. It is argued that they were because he was a proprietor, and the books of a partnership are evidence against any one of the partners, and more particularly as the act requires such books of the proceedings to be kept, and that all the proprietors shall have free access to them at all reasonable times. We are, however, of opinion that the principle on which partnership books are evidence against the partners, is that they are the acts and declarations of such partners, being kept by themselves or by their authority, by their servants and under their direction and superintendence. But the clerk of the company, once appointed, is subject to the control of no individual member, and the free access provided for is only for the purpose of inspection. A proprietor entering into a contract with the company must be deemed a stranger, and can be affected by no entry made under orders from the entire body."

. . . We can perceive no principle upon which the account-books of a corporation can be evidence, against a member of the corporation, of the accounts and entries therein made in a suit brought by the corporation or its representatives against him to enforce his liability upon such account. The officers and book-keepers of a corporation are in no sense his agents. Individually he has no control over their acts, and has no responsibility therefor; and in making the entries they do not, in any legal sense, represent or bind him. As to the competency of such books, directors and stockholders of a corporation stand upon the same footing. It is quite true that a director stands in a more favorable position to know what is going on within the corporation and to be more familiar with its books in some cases than a stockholder. He has the right to inspect the books of the corporation, and so has a stockholder. A stockholder having the ability is just as able to become familiar with the contents of the books of a corporation to which he belongs as a director; and there is no principle of law by which a director can be charged with knowledge of the entries in the books of a corporation which is not equally applicable to its stockholders. . . . It would be quite a dangerous and we, think, startling proposition to hold that a clerk or other officer in a business corporation could enter charges in its books of account against a director or stockholder which could be proved in favor of the corporation by the mere production of the books, thus throwing upon him, or his personal representatives after his death, the burden of explaining the entries or showing them to be untrue, and we believe the doctrine has no support in principle or authority.

It was admitted on the argument of this case that the evidence furnished by the account-books was vital to the plaintiff's case, and we, therefore, do not deem it important to examine the other points zealously and ably argued before us.

For the error pointed out the judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide event.

All concur. Judgment reversed.

282. HARTFORD BRIDGE CO. v. GRANGER

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. 1822

4 Conn. 142

[Action on a covenant to build a drawbridge according to plans.] . . . The plaintiffs offered to prove by James R. Woodbridge, that long after the first of March, 1819, the defendant Granger came to his, Woodbridge's store, where he met with Ward Woodbridge, one of the directors of the company, who complained to Granger, that the draw was not such as it ought to be; to which Granger replied, that he knew it was not such an one as they wanted, and that if the directors would furnish him with a plan, he would conform the draw to such plan, but that he could not make it conformable to the plan of Eli Whitney, because it would cost too much. The defendant's counsel, for the purpose of raising an objection to this evidence, asked James R. Woodbridge, if such conversation was not had with a view to a compromise; to which the witness answered, that in the conversation, Granger asked Ward Woodbridge how much money he would accept, and discharge him from doing anything more to the draw. The defendants then urged their objections to the evidence offered by the plaintiffs; and the judge rejected it.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendants; and the plaintiffs moved for a new trial, on the ground, that the several decisions of the judge, admitting the evidence of the defendants, and rejecting that offered by the plaintiffs, were erroneous. . . .

N. Smith and A. Smith, in support of the motion, contended . . . that the testimony of James R. Woodbridge as to the admissions of Granger, ought to have been received. Facts, admitted by a party, may always be proved: but concessions or offers, made with a view to a compromise, cannot be. Gregory v. Howard, 3 Esp. Rep. 113. Buller, Nisi Prius, 236. The admission, which the plaintiffs proposed to prove, was simply of the fact, that the draw was not such as it ought to be. No rule of law requires the rejection of this evidence, because the party, in the course of the conversation, inquired for what sum of money he could be discharged. . . .

N. Terry and T. S. Williams, contra, contended . . . that a new trial ought not to be granted, for the rejection of James R. Woodbridge's testimony. First, it related to an offer made with a view to compromise. The sole business of the meeting was to settle a controversy: and when this is the object, the party is to be protected throughout the conversation. Secondly, the testimony was of no importance. It did not show, that the draw was not made according to the agreement; but merely, that it was not such as Ward Woodbridge wanted. . . . The proposed evidence was material to the issue; and when the admission was made, there had been no conversation with the view above-mentioned. But if the contrary were true, it would not authorize the rejection of the offered testimony.

Hosmer, Ch. J. — This case presents four questions for determination. . . . The plaintiffs offered to show, by James R. Woodbridge, the admission of Granger, one of the defendants, that the draw was not complete; and the Court overruled the testimony as being conversation with a view to a compromise.

The law on this subject has often been misconceived; and it is time that it should be firmly established. It is never the intendment of the law to shut out the truth; but to repel any inference which may arise from a proposition made, not with design to admit the existence of a fact, but merely to buy one's peace. If an admission, however, is made, because it is a fact, the evidence to prove it is competent, whatever motive may have prompted to the declaration. In illustration of this remark, it may be observed, that if A. offer to B. ten pounds, in satisfaction of his claim of an hundred pounds, merely to prevent a suit, or purchase tranquillity; this implies no admission that any sum is due; and therefore, testimony to prove the fact must be rejected, because it evinces nothing concerning the merits of the controversy. But if A. admit a particular item in an account, or any other fact, meaning to make the admission as being true, this is good evidence, although the object of the conversation was to compromise an existing controversy. The question to be considered is, what was the view and intention of the party, in making the admission; whether it was to concede a fact hypothetically, in order to effect a settlement, or to declare a fact really to exist. There is no point of honour guarded by the Court, nor exclusion of evidence, lest it should deter from a free conversation. But testimony of admissions or declarations taking facts for granted, not because they are true, but because good policy constrains the temporary yielding of them to effectuate a greater good, is not admissible; truth being the object of evidence.

CHAPMAN, BRAINARD, and BRISTOL, JJ., were of the same opinion.

PETERS, J., dissented. New trial not to be granted.

283. TRUBY v. SEYBERT

SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA. 1849

12 Pa. St. 101

ERROR to the Common Pleas of Armstrong.

This was an action of ejectment, brought by Sebastian Seybert against Jacob Truby, to recover 100 acres of land, being the settler's part of the Samuel Campbell warrant, which Truby had entered into articles with Seybert to sell to him. Truby derived his title to the land in dispute from a sheriff's sale of three hundred acres, in a certain case of Truby v. McIntyre and others.

The defence set up by Truby to this action was, that the survey upon the ground, under the Samuel Campbell warrant, excluded the forty acres, the land really in dispute, embraced in a survey of the settler's part, made long after the original survey of the whole tract warranted. To meet this, the plaintiff offered evidence to show that the Samuel Campbell survey, as made upon the ground, included the land in dispute; and for that purpose further offered the record of a suit, Charles Campbell v. Jacob Truby (the defendant here), which was an action of debt on a bond, to which was pleaded payment, &c., and in which the verdict was for the plaintiff; to be followed by proof that the defence in said action was, "that the bond was given in part payment for the purchase by Truby of certain land, and that part of said land, as appeared by the return of survey on the Samuel Campbell warrant, to the extent of 41 acres (being the land here in dispute), was embraced in that survey." This offer was made for the purpose of showing that, on that occasion, which was seven years after the sale to Seybert, Truby contended that the Samuel Campbell warrant embraced the now disputed portion of the settler's part of that warrant. To the record and offer Truby objected, and the objection being overruled, the evidence was received under exception.

The verdict was for the plaintiff. The error assigned here was to the admission of the evidence excepted to.

Purviance and Lee, for the plaintiff in error. Seybert was neither party nor privy to that record; it was as to him "res inter alios acta." . . . Truby's defence in that action was no admission; it was manifestly not made independently, because true, but only as a convenient assumption for the purpose in hand: 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 204. It is to be treated as the mere suggestion and allegation of counsel. . . .

Phelps, for the defendant in error. — It is to be presumed that Truby would not have made any admission against his interest, unless it was true. The record was admissible without Seybert being a party to it. A record admission or judicial declaration is admissible against the party making it in favor of a stranger to the record. . . .

The opinion of this Court was delivered by Bell, J. — The proceeding had in Campbell v. Truby being "inter alios acta," the record of the trial, verdict and judgment was not, of course, admissible in this action to prove any fact upon which that judgment professes to be founded. . . . But though the parties be different, a record is admissible to prove the existence of a former action with its legal consequences, as an independent fact; for the mere fact that such a suit was brought and a verdict and judgment rendered, it is said, cannot be considered as "res inter alios acta." Where, therefore, the introduction of a former judgment is necessary by way of inducement to the full understanding of a collateral fact, or the admissions and allegations of a party to it, the record is always received, not only as legal evidence of the rendition of such a judgment, but as conclusive for that purpose. . . .

So, also, it is admissible against one of the parties in favor of a stranger, as containing a solemn admission or judicial declaration by such parties, in regard to any particular fact. But in these instances, it is received, not as an adjudication conclusively establishing the fact, but as the declaration or admission of the party himself that the fact is so . . . . . As an illustration of this rule, the case of Tyley v. Cowling, 1 Ld. Ray. 744, S. C. Bull. N. P. 243, may be cited. It was trover by a common carrier against a person to whom he alleged he had delivered the goods intrusted to him to be carried, and Lord Holt laid it down that the record of the action would be admissible in a subsequent suit to be brought by the owner against the carrier, as showing the confession of the latter in a Court of record that he had been put in possession of the plaintiff's goods. . . . "The allegations in the declaration and pleadings, in a suit at law, are receivable in evidence against the party in a subsequent suit between him and a stranger, as his solemn admission of the truth of the facts recited, or of his understanding of the meaning of an instrument, though the judgment could not be made available as an estoppel, unless between the same parties or others in privity with them." (1 Greenleaf, § 195.) The same effect is accorded to an answer in chancery, as an instrument of evidence deriving its value solely from its character of a confession or admission (Ewer v. Ambrose, 6 D. & R. 127; 10 Eng. C. L. R. 220; Grant v. Jackson, Peake's C. 203; Digby v. Steele, 3 Camp. 115); though a bill in chancery is not admissible, because, as it is said, many of the facts are the mere suggestions of counsel, made for the purpose of extorting an answer from the defendant: Owens v. Dawson, 1 W. 149; and for a similar reason cases stated for the opinion of the Court are also excluded — McLugan v. Bovard, 4 W. 313; Darlington v. Gray, 5 Wh. 502; Hart's Appeal, 8 Barr, 37.

In the case at bar, the record in question was offered, not as an estoppel, but to show the fact of its existence, and as introductory to the oral evidence. We have seen it was competent for this purpose, and had the defense made in that action been put upon the record by a special plea, as it might have been, no doubt could be entertained of its availability to show the allegation as a truth averred by the defendant in relation to the point now in controversy. But what possible difference can it make in the determination of the question of evidence, that the party chose rather to introduce his defense under the general issue, with notice, as is permitted by the liberality of our practice? I can perceive none. A declaration or confession, made in or out of a cause, may be proved "per testes," as well as by record, the only difference being in the degree of credit which the mode of proof may command. . . .

The principle of "res inter alios acta," is never permitted to exclude such proof, proceeding either immediately from the party himself or authorized or assented to by him: 1 Starkie's Evidence, 60. These depend for their value, not upon the contest in which they occurred, but upon the fact that they proceeded from the party to be affected by them; and he is equally bound by the concessions of those authorized to represent him. Thus, the concessions of attorneys of record bind their clients in all matters relating to the trial and progress of the cause: 1 Greenleaf, § 186; and this is also true of an admission before suit brought, provided the attorney was then retained in the cause; Marshall v. Cliff, 4 Camp. 133. In Young v. Wright, 1 Camp., an admission by a deceased attorney of record, that a bill of exchange sued was an accommodation bill, in order to excuse the want of notice of dishonor, was admitted by Lord ELLENBOROUGH, on a new trial, as evidence of the fact, with the observation that it must be supposed the attorney had authority to make the concession, and it therefore bound the client. So in Wetherill v. Bird, 7 C. & P. 6, 32 E. C. L. R. 415, the admission of former attorneys, who had since withdrawn from the case, in contemplation of a trial, was received on the second trial of the cause, though notice had been given that the agreement for that purpose was withdrawn.

It is true, it has been ruled that what an attorney says in the course of casual conversation, relating to the controversy, is not evidence. The reason of the distinction is founded in the nature and extent of the authority given: the attorney being constituted for the management of the cause in Court, and, in England, for nothing more.

It is not necessary further to elaborate this train of reasoning. Enough has been said to show that the line of defense assumed by the defendant, through his counsel, on the trial of the action brought against him by Campbell, consisting of an assertion directly pertinent in the present inquiry, was good evidence for the now plaintiff, as the concession of a truth within the knowledge of the party. Judgment affirmed.

284. DENNIE v. WILLIAMS

135 Mass. 28

CONTRACT, in the name of the Treasurer of the city of Boston, for the benefit of R. C. Simpson, upon whom a constable's bond given by the defendant Williams as principal, and the other defendants as sureties, to enforce payment of a judgment recovered by Simpson against Williams for the conversion of certain goods. Trial in the Superior Court, without a jury, before BLODGETT, J., who found for the defendants; and the plaintiff alleged exceptions, which appear in the opinion.

J. L. Newton and T. S. Dame, for the plaintiff. R. Lund, for the defendants.

COLBURN, J. . . . The remaining exception is to the refusal of the Court to rule that the answer of the defendant Williams, in the suit of Simpson against him, was evidence against all the defendants in this suit that the taking of the property by Williams, for which that suit was brought, was under color of his office as constable.

1. It appears that the admission of one of several joint obligors, or joint contractors, made without collusion, is evidence against the others. Martin v. Root, 17 Mass. 222; Hunt v. Bridgham, 2 Pick. 581; Bridge v. Gray, 14 Pick. 55; Amherst Bank v. Root, 2 Met. 522, 541. So a clear and unqualified admission by Williams that the property, for the taking of which judgment in the suit of Simpson was recovered against him, was taken under color of his office, would be evidence against all the defendants in this suit. It is not very apparent how the answer in question, which denies any conversion, with an averment that, if the defendant took any of the goods, he did so as a constable, by virtue of a writ of replevin, can be considered as an admission that he took the goods described in the declaration under color of his office.

2. But, passing this by, we cannot consider the answer filed by Williams in the suit of Simpson admissible as evidence against the defendants in the present suit. It would not have been admissible as evidence in the former suit; Pub. Sts. c. 167, §§ 76, 78; and the reason for § 78, which was first introduced into the Rev. Sts. as § 18 of c. 100, with a note by the commissioners, would seem to apply with nearly as much force to another suit, as to the one in which the answer is filed.

Without deciding how far, under any circumstances, an answer filed in one suit may be evidence in another suit, against the party filing the answer, it is sufficient in this case to decide that the answer in question, which was signed by attorney, with nothing to indicate how far the attorney was particularly instructed by the defendant, was not competent evidence against Williams in this suit, — especially as, if evidence against him, it would be evidence against the other defendants. Baldwin v. Gregg, 13 Met. 253; Walcott v. Kimball, 13 Allen, 460; Boileau v. Rutlin, 2 Exch. 665; Combs v. Hodge, 21 How. 397; Church v. Shelton, 2 Curt. C. C. 271.

In Baldwin v. Gregg, ubi supra, Chief Justice SHAW says:

"The pleadings are usually filed by the attorneys; and they are filed with a view of laying the merits of the respective parties before the court, in a technical form, and can hardly be considered as the act of the parties. It is not competent for the jury to hear evidence, and inquire and decide whether a specification of defence was filed bona fide or mala fide. A bill of particulars filed by a plaintiff, or a specification of defence filed by a defendant, is usually a formal document, drawn up by counsel, after some examination of his client's case, and is made broad enough to cover all which the party can expect, in any event, to prove; and in most instances, probably, is not seen by the party in whose behalf it is filed."

In Boileau v. Rutlin, ubi supra, Baron PARKE says:

"But the statements of a party in a declaration or plea, though, for the purposes of the cause, he is bound by those that are material, and the evidence must be confined to them upon an issue, ought not, it should seem, to be treated as confessions of the truth of the facts stated."

3. In some cases the declaration in one suit has been admitted in evidence in another suit. But this is upon the ground that the particular allegations in the declarations were obviously made by direction of the plaintiff, and were not merely the suggestions of his attorney; or upon the ground that, after the plaintiff knew what the allegations were, he adopted them, by prosecuting the action upon them, as the foundation of his claim. Gordon v. Parmelee, 2 Allen 212; Bliss v. Nichols, 12 Allen 443; Boston v. Richardson, 13 Allen 146, 162; Elliott v. Hayden, 104 Mass. 180; Bogle v. Chase, 117 Mass. 273. In Elliott v. Hayden, which was an action of tort, in which the plaintiffs offered in evidence a bill in equity, brought by the defendants against them, Mr. Justice GRAY says:

"As no action of the Court was obtained upon the bill in equity, the statements therein, if they had not been made upon the oath of the plaintiffs, might have been considered as mere suggestions of the counsel and not competent evidence of admissions by the parties. . . . But, being upon the oath of the parties in whose behalf the bill was filed, they are competent evidence as solemn admissions by them in person of the truth of the facts stated — upon the same ground upon which sworn answers and pleas in chancery, or allegations concerning the substance of the action in a declaration at common law, have been held admissible in evidence in another suit." 104 Mass. 183.

These cases relating to declarations and sworn pleadings in chancery are exceptions to the general rule, and do not affect the question in the case. Exceptions overruled.

285. BOOTS v. CANINE

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA. 1883

94 Ind. 408

FROM the Montgomery Circuit Court.

E. C. Snyder, P. S. Kennedy and W. T. Brush, for appellants. J. M. Thompson, W. H. Thompson, J. E. McDonald, J. M. Butler and A. L. Mason, for appellee.

ELLIOTT, J. — This case is here for the second time. When it was in this Court the first time, it was decided that the award sued on was a common law and not a statutory award, and that the complaint as it then stood was good. Boots v. Canine, 58 Ind. 450. These questions are conclusively settled. . . . The award states that the agreement to submit was in writing, and the appellants argue that parol evidence was not competent to show that it was an oral one. We do not regard the recital in the award as being either within the spirit or the letter of the rule prohibiting the introduction of parol evidence to vary or alter a written instrument. . . .

The trial Court did not err in permitting appellee to read in evidence answers filed by the appellants, although they were subsequently superseded by amendment or withdrawn. The question is presented in a peculiar form, and, as presented, we are clear that this ruling should not be allowed to reverse the judgment. The record shows that there had been issues formed and a trial had; that the appellants successfully relied upon their answers, and the case came to this Court, and the judgment was reversed, but not upon the answers; and that after this reversal the original answers were superseded by amendment. The record thus recites the proceeding on the trial: "The plaintiff then offered in evidence the original complaint and answers for the purpose of proving by one of the paragraphs of the answer that the defendant had admitted that the agreement to submit to arbitration was verbal, and not in writing, to the introduction of which evidence the defendants objected, on the grounds that the statements of a party made in his pleadings, where they are not sworn to, are not admissible against him." It will be observed that the answers had stood through one trial and through an appeal as statements of the appellants' defense, and that they had placed these pleadings before the trial and appellate Courts as true statements of the facts of their case. We can perceive no reason why the answers did not, under these circumstances, constitute some evidence of the facts stated in them. . . .

1. It is not doubted that admissions in pleadings are not conclusive, when used merely as evidence and not as part of the proceedings in the cause. On the contrary, they are, when so used, fully open to contradiction or explanation. We shall presently speak of cases where these admissions assume a conclusive character. Just now we are speaking of their admissibility as evidence. We think the rule is correctly stated by Mr. Wharton, who says: "It is proper to add at this place that the pleadings of a party in one suit may be used as evidence against him in another, not as estoppel, but as proof, open to rebuttal and explanation, that he admitted certain facts." 1 Wharton, Evidence, § 838. This is what we rule here. The answer, having been affirmed to be true for several years, and acted upon through one trial and one appeal, should be deemed evidence of admissions, but evidence open to explanation.

It is well known that the common law recognized fictions in pleading, and did not, in any way, require pleadings to state the truth, but even under that system the decided weight of authority was that the pleadings of a party were admissible against him. Bliss v. Nichols, 12 Allen 443; Currier v. Silloway, 1 Allen 19; Gordon v. Parmelee, 2 Allen 212; Hammatt v. Russ, 16 Maine 171; Tabb v. Cabell, 17 Grat. 160.

But it is not necessary to refer to common law authorities, for our statute has adopted the equity practice. We treat pleadings as statutory fact not fictions. All the cases upon this subject agree upon this point. We are therefore to look to chancery rather than common law rules. Scott v. Crawford, 12 Ind. 410; Pomeroy, Remedies, §§ 507, 508, 517. Commencing with the early authorities, we shall find an unbroken line arrayed in favor of the doctrine that pleadings in chancery are always admissible in evidence. It is said by an author whose book has long occupied a high place, that "The bill in chancery is evidence against the complainant, for the allegations of every man's bill shall be supposed true; nor shall it be supposed to be preferred by a counsel, or solicitor without the party's privity, and therefore it amounts to the confession and admission of the truth of any fact." Buller, Nisi Prius, 235. The ground given by this author for his conclusion applies to all pleadings, and more strongly to code pleadings than others, for, under the code, pleadings are required to state facts. It surely would be a violation of all rules to treat a pleading as a mere meaningless collection of words, or else as a mere collection of fictions. It is to be observed that the reason why bills in chancery are evidence is, not because they are sworn to, but because they are presumed to state facts. This is clear from what appears in our quotation as well as from the known rule that bills were not always required to be verified. . . . If it can be said that Courts can presume that an answer under our code does not state facts, then it may be logically said that it is not evidence; but if the presumption is, that it does state facts, then it is logically inconceivable that it should not be evidence against the party.

But we need not go outside of our own State for authorities. In McNutt v. Dare, 8 Blackf. 35, it was said: "There is another reason why the plaintiffs could not object to the evidence. It was a part of their own answer to the bill of discovery; and the answer of a party is legal evidence against him." . . . It seems clear that as we have substantially adopted the chancery practice, pleadings must be presumed to be true, and, therefore, to constitute evidence, and this, without further discussion, should settle the case.

When we turn to the provisions of the code, and to the decisions of the Courts where the code practice prevails, we shall find that there are still stronger reasons for holding that pleadings are admissible in evidence. Our code imperatively requires that pleadings shall state facts, but it does not stop with this command. It provides that "All fictions in pleadings are abolished." R. S. 1881, § 378. It is several times declared that pleadings not sworn to shall have the same effect as pleadings sworn to. It is simply absurd to say that under our code the statements in the pleadings are mere fictions, and if they are not fictions then they are facts, and if facts in some cases, and in others conclusive admissions of record, then they are evidence. An admission in a pleading is the admission of matters of fact; this seems so plain that it is difficult to understand how the contrary doctrine can be seriously asserted. . . .

The Courts of the States where the code practice prevails are unanimous on the right to introduce admissions contained in pleadings in evidence, with the possible exception of California, where there seems to be a direct conflict. . . . These authorities are conclusively in favor of the ruling of the Court below, and in opposition to them are cited the cases from California and one from New Hampshire. The former cases, as we have said, are directly in conflict with another decision of the same Court, and no authority is cited in their support, and the reasoning is far from satisfactory. The New Hampshire case of Kimball v. Bellows, 13 N. H. 58, is not applicable to pleadings under the code system; but if it were, it could not be followed, because it is in conflict with the great weight of authority as to the admissibility of common law pleadings; it is, indeed, in direct conflict with a decision of the same Court, that of Cilley v. Jenness, 2 N. H. 87.

Admissions in pleadings are sometimes conclusive, but they are not so in a case like the present. One class of cases where the admissions are conclusive is that in which judgment has been pronounced upon the issues joined. Another class is that in which the pleadings, without diversity of statement, make distinct admissions and are left standing. As an example of the latter class may be given that of a defendant pleading payment only to a complaint on a promissory note. In such a case he cannot dispute the execution of the note. In the present case the admissions, like ordinary verbal or written admissions, are fully open to explanation, but they are nevertheless admissions, and as such are competent evidence. Like other admissions, all the statements of the whole pleading are to be taken together, what makes for the pleader as well as what makes against him. . . .

2. We should feel that we were doing an idle thing if we should undertake to cite authority upon the proposition that a party can not be deprived of his rights to give in evidence an admission because the latter had withdrawn it. Even in criminal cases, an admission made by the accused before the examining magistrate is not rendered incompetent by a subsequent withdrawal. The withdrawal of an admission may, in proper cases, go in explanation, but it can not change the rule as to its competency. We have never, until the argument in this case, known it to be asserted that the withdrawal of a confession or an admission destroyed its competency as evidence against the person making it. If it did, then criminals might destroy evidence by retraction, and parties escape admissions by a like course. The law tolerates no such illogical procedure. It is proper to show the withdrawal and all attendant circumstances, for the purpose of determining the weight to be attached to the admission, but not for the purpose of destroying its competency. The cases of Colter v. Galloway, 68 Ind. 219, and New Albany, etc., P. R. Co. v. Stallcup, 62 Ind. 345, are in line with what we here decide, and are well sustained. . . .

3. In the last brief of appellants' counsel it is virtually conceded that the superseded answers would be admissible in a different case, but not in the same case in which they were originally filed. Many of the cases we have cited expose the fallacy of this argument, but it is so apparent that it does not require authority to overthrow it. An admission is an admission, however made, and is just as competent in one case as in another. The competency of an admission does not depend upon the case in which it is offered. If it was voluntarily made and is relevant to the issue, it is admissible against the party making it, although made in the progress of the same cause. If the position of counsel were correct, then the plaintiff, to get the benefit of the admission in the pleading, must dismiss the pending case and commence another, and surely there is neither reason nor law for such a course.

We rule that under the circumstances of this case these was no available error in admitting the answers in evidence, and this is all the record requires us to decide, and it is all we do decide upon this point.

Judgment affirmed.

286. PERSON v. BOWE

79 Minn. 238; 82 N. W. 480

ACTION in the Municipal Court of Mankato to recover $119 and interest for wages. The case was tried before SHISSLER, J., who found in favor of plaintiff for $109 and interest. From an order denying motion for a new trial, defendant appealed. Affirmed.

Action for wages as a farm laborer. The complaint alleged that the plaintiff worked for the defendant seven months for the agreed price of $17 per month, and that no part of his wages had been paid, except $10. The answer alleged that the plaintiff agreed to work for the full term of eight months, for $16 per month for the first four months of the term, and at $18 per month for the last four months thereof; that the services mentioned in the complaint were performed pursuant to such special contract, and that after working seven months the plaintiff abandoned the contract without the consent of the defendant; and, further, that the plaintiff had been paid on such contract $15. The trial Court found, in effect, that the allegations of the complaint were true, and ordered judgment for the plaintiff for $109. The defendant appealed from an order denying his motion for a new trial. . . .

W. R. Geddes, for appellant. W. E. Young, for respondent.

START, C. J. (after stating the case as above). Evidence on behalf of the plaintiff was received by the Court, over the defendant's objections, to the effect that when the plaintiff demanded his pay for his services the defendant said that he could not then pay, but would let the plaintiff have $20, and would pay the rest about the middle of November: that, if the plaintiff "would throw off five dollars," he would at once pay the claim. It is here urged that this was reversible error, for the reason that it violated the rule that an offer to compromise a disputed matter is not admissible in evidence against the party making the offer. The evidence objected to was not within this rule: for it did not relate to any matter then in dispute between the parties, or to any attempt to compromise a disputed claim. On the contrary, it was an offer of present payment of a then undisputed claim, if the proposed discount was allowed. The evidence was competent and relevant upon the issue whether the contract was for seven months' service, as claimed by the plaintiff. It tended to show an indirect admission on the part of the defendant that the plaintiff had performed his contract: for, if true, no claim was made to the contrary by the defendant when the demand for payment was made. Order affirmed.

Sub-topic E. Confessions

288. History.[1] There may be noted four distinct stages in the history of the law's use of confessions. In the earliest stage (going for present purposes no further back than the times of the Tudors and the Stuarts) there is no restriction at all upon their reception. In the next stage, comprising the second half of the 1700s, the matter begins to be considered, and it is recognized that some confessions should be rejected as untrustworthy. In the third stage, comprising the 1800s, the principle of exclusion is developed, under certain influences, to an abnormal extent; and exclusion becomes the rule, admission the exception. In the last phase a reaction sets in here and there, but it represents a future rather than a present movement, and little is accomplished in the way of changing the law or the practice.

(1) In the first period is that there is no doctrine about excluding "confessions" in the modern sense; that is, all narratives avowing guilt are accepted in evidence without discrimination, and particularly without question as to their proceeding from hope of promises or from fear of threats, even of torture. There is a doctrine that a plea of guilty in court should not ordinarily be received; and there is a rule that a confession may dispense with the two overt-act witnesses in treason. But these were the only doctrines about "confessions" up to the middle of the 1700s. That, apart from these doctrines, there were no others as to confessions, appears not merely from the general lack of record of such doctrines, but from several other circumstances. In the first place, the reports of trials, down to the middle of the 1600s at least, show the tribunal proceeding, without let or hindrance, upon whatever they could get from him by way of confession. In the next place, we find that, up to the middle of the 1600s at least, the use of torture to extract confessions was common, and that confessions so obtained were employed evidentially without scruple;[2] and it is clear that such a practice is inconsistent with the slightest recognition of the modern doctrine about the admissibility of confessions.

[2] 1836, Jardine, "Use of Torture in the Criminal Law of England," 58 ff. Mr. Jardine says, further: "The last instance of torture in England, of which I can find any trace, occurred in the year 1640"; and this result seems to be adopted in the acute and interesting articles on the subject by Mr. A. Lawrence Lowell, "Judicial Use of Torture," 11 Harv. L. Rev. 293. Yet in 1664, in Tong's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 259, the defendant is found saying, "I confess I did confess it in the Tower, being threatened with the rack." In Scotland, it was applied even much later; 1676, Mitchel's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 1207, 1232; 1680, Gordon's Trial 11 id. 51; 1684, Semple's Trial, ib. 985; 1684, Carstair's Trial, 10 id. 687; 1688, Standfield's Trial, 11 id. 1371, 1387; 1689, Renwick's Trial, 12 id. 569, 576; 1690, Pain's Trial, 10 id. 754. Sir Walter Scott, in "Old Mortality," describing, as of 1679, the examination and torture of the Cameronian preacher Macbriar (ch. 36), confessedly relies in part for his authority on this very trial of Mitchel, supra. In the Colonies, it was known at as late a time as Mr. Jardine mentions: 1642, Bradford's History of Plymouth Plantation, 473; 1641 and 1660, Mass. Body of Liberties, c. 45. For the history of the abolition of torture in modern times on the Continent, see "Pertile Storia del diritto italiano," 2d ed., 1900, vol. VI, pt. 1, p. 449.

(2) In 1775, in Rudd's Case (1 Leach Cr. L. 135) where the accused had applied for release in consequence of having confessed under an assurance of pardon to be received as an accomplice testifying for the Crown, Lord Mansfield, in discussing the practice of using approvers' confessions, seemed to see nothing unlawful in it; but at the same time he made the first judicial utterance limiting the admissibility of ordinary confessions: "The instance has frequently happened of persons having made confessions under threats or promises; the consequence as frequently has been that such examinations and confessions have not been made use of against them on their trial." He was here, clearly, thinking only of persons "being drawn by promises and assurances to answer to an examination and to swear to it on oath," and not of confessions in general; moreover he does not intimate that anything more than a common practice (not a rule) existed. But in 1783, in Warickshall's Case, before Nares, J., and Eyre, B., the modern rule received a full and clear expression, and confessions not entitled to credit because of the promises or the threats by which they had been obtained were declared inadmissible in evidence.

(3) At this stage, then, the doctrine was a perfectly rational one. Confessions apparently untrustworthy as affirmations of guilt are excluded. Under this principle very few were in fact excluded. Doubts about situations which subsequently became questionable were never heard of. Confessions were thought of in general as "the highest evidence of guilt"; and there was no general sentiment against them, — no prima facie doubt of their propriety. But by the beginning of the 1800s, the attitude of the judges had changed, through influences which we may attempt later to estimate. There was a general suspicion of all confessions, and an inclination to repudiate them upon the slightest pretext. This attitude continued for half a century, becoming more and more irrational by contrast with newer conditions. That a confession should be excluded because it was made upon a promise to give a glass of gin; because the prosecutor said, "If the prisoner would only give him his money, he might go to the devil if he pleased"; because a handbill, offering a few pounds reward for evidence, was posted in the magistrate's office; because the prisoner was told that "what he said would be used against him"; — that such results, chronicled in the reports of the first half of the 1800s, could be reached in the name of the investigation of truth seems almost incredible. In the middle of the 1800s the perversion of normal reasoning had gone so far that counsel were able to advance seriously the argument that "the law assumes that a man may falsely accuse himself upon the slightest inducement." It even came to be urged that an accused person should be dissuaded from confessing; so that this notion had to be rebuked from the bench. This sentimental irrationality of the law, and its obstruction to the administration of justice, has often been conceded by judges. "I confess," said Baron Parke, "that I cannot look at the decisions without some shame when I consider what objections have prevailed to prevent the reception of confessions in evidence; and I agree with the observation of Mr. Pitt Taylor, that the rule has been extended quite too far, and that justice and common sense have been too frequently sacrificed at the shrine of mercy"; and Mr. J. Erle added: "I am much inclined to agree with Mr. Pitt Taylor; and, according to my judgment, in many cases where confessions have been excluded, justice and common sense have been sacrificed, not at the shrine of mercy, but at the shrine of guilt." The spirit that thus tended to prevail in the law has been properly described "as a weak sentimentalism towards criminals," and it assuredly had unfortunate results. But every fact of life has its explanation; what was the explanation of this one?

(a) A first reason certainly was the sort of person usually brought before the English judges on charges of crime. In all countries having the social cleavages and the feudal survivals of England in the 1700s and early 1800s, the offenders against the criminal law come in the far greater proportion from what are known as the "lower classes." This was especially the case (down to the era of the Reform Bill, when nearly two hundred capital crimes were swept from the statute-book) at the time when the great multitude of grave offenses involved merely those petty forms of property-crime which may be the natural result of only hopeless poverty and not necessarily of an abandoned life or a professional profligacy. Furthermore, the same social cleavage is also accompanied, in all countries, with a subordination, a submission, half-respectful and half-stupid, on the part of the "lower classes" towards those in authority, — an attitude especially marked, though not solely found, among the peasantry and towards the squires and other landed superiors on whose will hangs the tenant's fortune. The situation of such a peasant charged by his landlord with poaching and urged to confess, the situation of the maid urged and threatened by her mistress to confess a petty theft, involves a mental condition to which we may well hesitate to apply the test of a rational principle. We may believe that rationally a false confession is not to be apprehended from the normal person under certain paltry inducements or meaningless threats; but we have here perhaps a person not to be tested by a normal or rational standard.[1] This, then, was certainly one of the reasons why, in one way or another, on principle or without principle, many judges came to set themselves against the use of confessions, and to exclude them on pretexts which were in themselves trifling and irrational but in fact represented a fixed judicial sentiment.

(b) Another reason is found in the absence at that time of the right of appeal in criminal cases, and the practical creation of the law of confessions by isolated judges at Nisi Prius without consultation and on independent responsibility. In order to solve any doubts which might arise in his mind, the Nisi Prius judge was obliged to consult casually-accessible colleagues or to reserve the question for a meeting of all the judges; and the natural disinclination to such a delay, to becoming the source of trouble to his professional associates, and to bringing perhaps upon himself the reflection of having had unnecessary doubts, made this course always a disagreeable one and a last resort. The result was that the judges commonly preferred to eliminate the questionable evidence altogether, to try the case on whatever other evidence could be mustered, and to solve all questions that were even arguable (whether the judge himself had doubts or not) in favor of the accused. Thus many confessions were excluded.

(3) A third reason, and one amply sufficient in itself to account for the narrowness of confession rulings, and for much besides, was the extraordinary handicap placed upon the accused at common law in the shape of his inability either to testify for himself or to have counsel to defend him. The right to have the aid of counsel was not granted as a general one until 1836; and although as early as 1750 it had become customary to allow counsel to cross-examine for the accused and to do everything but address the jury, this custom was by no means unbroken and fell far short in efficacy of being equivalent to a right. The competency to testify on his own behalf was for long withheld (until 1898) from the accused person; and the unsworn address to the jury, which he was allowed to make, was very different from the right to testify in his own behalf, and was probably not of great consequence as furnishing testimonial material. In view of the apparent unfairness of a system which practically told the accused person, "You cannot be trusted to speak here or elsewhere in your own behalf, but we shall use against you whatever you may have said," it was entirely natural that the judges should employ the only makeweight which existed for mitigating this unfairness and restoring the balance, namely, the doctrine of confessions. They tried to restore the balance by excluding confessions upon every available pretext.

In view of these considerations, it is easy to see why the law of confessions in England came to develop what seem to us, in another country and in other times, absurd and dangerous sentimentalities, and why there is no necessity for our retention of the distortions and irrational excrescences which, as handed down to us in the English rulings of the early 1800s, have served to obscure the correct and entirely rational principle of exclusion applicable to confessions. No one of these three considerations above pointed out applies to our conditions. The spirit of our community, whether we choose to call it by the name of liberty or by the name of anarchy (and it has certainly the evil as well as the good savor), is a spirit of fearlessness of superior social and political power; of restiveness and struggling against bonds, not of orderly submission; of bold (if superficial) readiness to claim "rights," not of ignorant surrender to demands; and, in general, of keen appreciation of the possibilities of evading justice, rather than of cowed obedience to any authority however oppressive. Furthermore, the power of revision of confession-law on appeal to the higher tribunal is universal. Finally, the accused person may everywhere testify for himself, and has the fullest assistance of a bar not remarkable for its scrupulousness in criminal cases. All those circumstances are thus wanting which explain and excuse the unnatural development of the law of confessions in the hands of the English judges of a past generation. There is for us no such explanation and no such excuse. The perpetuation here of the Nisi Prius doctrines of the first part of the 1800s is now nothing but sentimentalism, a false tenderness to criminals, and an unnecessary deviation from principle.

289. WARICKSHALL'S CASE

Old Bailey Sessions. 1783

1 Leach Cr. L. 248, 3*d ed.* 298

At the Old Bailey, in April Session, 1783, Thomas Littlepage was indicted before Mr. Justice Nares, present Mr. Baron Eyre, for grand larceny; and the same indictment charged Jane Warickshall, as an accessary after the fact, with receiving the property knowing it to have been stolen.

The accessary had made a full confession of her guilt; and in consequence of it the property had been found in her lodgings, concealed between the sackings of her bed. The confession, however, having been obtained by promises of favor, the Court refused to admit it in evidence against her; and it was contended by her counsel, that as the fact of finding the stolen property in her custody had been obtained through the means of an inadmissible confession, the proof of that fact ought also to be rejected; for otherwise the faith which the prosecutor had pledged would be violated, and the prisoner made the deluded instrument of her own conviction.

The Court. — It is a mistaken notion, that the evidence of confessions and facts which have been obtained from prisoners by promises or threats, is to be rejected from a regard to public faith: no such rule ever prevailed. The idea is novel in theory, and would be as dangerous in practice as it is repugnant to the general principles of criminal law. Confessions are received in evidence, or rejected as inadmissible, under a consideration whether they are, or are not entitled to credit. A free and voluntary confession is deserving of the highest credit, because it is presumed to flow from the strongest sense of guilt, and therefore it is admitted as proof of the crime to which it refers. But a confession forced from the mind by the flattery of hope, or by the torture of fear, comes in so questionable a shape when it is to be considered as the evidence of guilt, that no credit ought to be given to it; and therefore it is rejected.

This principle respecting confessions has no application whatever as to the admission or rejection of facts, whether the knowledge of them is obtained in consequence of an extracted confession, or whether it arises from any other source; for a fact, if it exists at all, must exist invariably in the same manner, whether the confession from which it is derived be in other respects true or false. Facts thus obtained, however, must be fully and satisfactorily proved, without calling in the aid of any part of the confession from which they may have been derived; and the impossibility of admitting any part of the confession as a proof of the fact, clearly shows that the fact may be admitted on other evidence; for as no part of an improper confession can be heard, it can never be legally known whether the fact was derived through the means of such confession or not; and the consequences to public justice would be dangerous indeed; for if men were enabled to regain stolen property, and the evidence of attendant facts were to be suppressed, because they had regained it by means of an improper confession, it would be holding out an opportunity to compound felonies. The rules of evidence which respect the admission of facts, and those which prevail with respect to the rejection of parole declarations or confessions, are distinct and independent of each other.

It is true, that many able judges have conceived that it would be an exceeding hard case, that a man whose life is at stake, having been lulled into a notion of security by promises of favor, and in consequence of those promises has been induced to make a confession by the means of which the property is found, should afterwards find that the confession with regard to the property found is to operate against him. But this subject has more than once undergone the solemn consideration of the twelve judges; and a majority of them were clearly of opinion, That although confessions improperly obtained cannot be received in evidence, yet that any acts done afterwards might be given in evidence, notwithstanding they were done in consequence of such confession.

290. BRAM v. UNITED STATES

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. 1897

168 U. S. 532; 18 Sup. 112

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

Asa P. French and James E. Cotter, for plaintiff in error. Assistant Attorney-General Boyd, for the United States.

Mr. Justice WHITE delivered the opinion of the court.

This writ of error is prosecuted to a verdict and sentence thereon, by which the plaintiff was found guilty of murder, and condemned to suffer death. The homicide was committed on board the American ship Herbert Fuller, while on the high seas, bound from Boston to a port in South America. The accused was the first officer of the ship, and the deceased, of whose murder he was convicted, was the master of the vessel. The bill of exceptions, after stating the sailing of the vessel from Boston on the 2d of July, 1896, with a cargo of lumber, gives a general summary of the facts leading up to and surrounding the homicide, as follows:

She had on board a captain, Charles I. Nash; Bram, the defendant; a second mate, August W. Blomberg; a steward; and six seamen; also the captain's wife, Laura A. Nash, and one passenger, Lester H. Monks.

The vessel proceeded on her course towards her port of destination until the night between July 13th and July 14th. On that night, at 12 o'clock, the second mate's watch was relieved by the mate's watch, of which Bram, the defendant, was the officer in charge. The captain, his wife, the passenger, Monks, and the first mate and the second mate, all lived in the after-cabin, occupying separate rooms. . . . The crew and the steward slept forward in the forward house.

When the watch was changed at midnight, Bram, the defendant, took the deck, the seamen Loheac and Perdok went forward on the lookout, and Charles Brown (otherwise called Justus Leopold Westerberg, his true name) took the wheel, where it was his duty to remain till two o'clock, at about which time he was relieved by Loheac. The second mate went to his room and the seamen of his watch to their quarters at twelve midnight, and there was no evidence that any of them or the steward appeared again till daylight.

The passenger, Monks, who occupied a room on the starboard side of the cabin, between the chart room where the captain slept and the room on the forward starboard side where Mrs. Nash slept, with doors opening from the passenger's room into both the chart room used by the captain as his room and that of Mrs. Nash, was aroused not far from two o'clock (the exact time is not known, as he says) by a scream, and by another sound, characterized by him as a gurgling sound. He arose, went to the captain's room, and found the captain's cot overturned, and the captain lying on the floor by it. He spoke, but got no answer; put his hand on the captain's body, and found it damp or wet. He then went to Mrs. Nash's rooms; did not see her, but saw dark spots on her bedding, and suspected something wrong. He went on deck, and called the mate, the defendant, telling him the captain was killed. Both went below, took down the lantern hanging in the main cabin, burning dimly, turned it up, and went through the captain's room to the passenger's room, and the passenger there put on a shirt and pantaloons. They then both returned to the deck, the mate on the way stopping a brief time in his own room. Bram and Monks remained talking on deck till about daybreak, when the steward was called, and told what had happened. Up to this time no call had been made for the second mate, nor had any one visited his room. Later it was found that Captain Nash, his wife, and Blomberg, the second mate, were all dead, each with several wounds upon the head, apparently given with a sharp instrument, like an ax, penetrating the skull, and into the substance of the brain; and the second mate lying on his back, with his feet crossed, in his berth; Mrs. Nash in her bed, in her room, and at the back side of the bed; and Captain Nash in his room, as already stated. . . .

In a day or two, suspicion having been excited in respect to the seaman Brown, the crew, under the supervision of Bram, seized him, he not resisting, and put him in irons. All the while the officers and seamen remained on deck. Bram navigated the ship until Sunday before they reached Halifax, on Tuesday, and after the land of Nova Scotia was in sight, when, Brown having stated to his shipmates, or some of them, that he saw into the cabin through a window in the after-part and on the starboard side of the house, and saw Bram, the mate, kill the captain, in consequence of this statement of Brown, the crew, led by the steward, suddenly overpowered the mate, and put him in irons, he making no resistance, but declaring his innocence. Bram and Brown were both carried into Halifax in irons.

The bill of exceptions further states that, when the ship arrived at Halifax, the accused and Brown were held in custody by the chief of police at that place, and that, while in such custody, the accused was taken from prison to the office of a detective, and there questioned, under circumstances to be hereafter stated. . . .

Nicholas Power, of Halifax, called by the government, testified that he was connected with the police department of Halifax, and had been for thirty-two years, and for the last fifteen years of that time as a detective officer; that after the arrival of the Herbert Fuller at Halifax, in consequence of a conversation with Charles Brown, he made an examination of Bram, the defendant, in the witness' office, in the city hall at Halifax, when no one was present besides Bram and the witness. The witness testified that no threats were made in any way to Bram, nor any inducements held out to him.

The witness was then asked: "What did you say to him and he to you?"

To this the defendant's counsel objected. . . . The witness stated that the conversation took place in his office, where he had caused the defendant, Bram, to be brought by a police officer; that up to that time the defendant had been in the custody of the police authorities of Halifax, in the custody of the superintendent of police, John O'Sullivan; that the witness asked that the defendant should be brought to his office for the purpose of interviewing him; that at his office he stripped the defendant, and examined his clothing, but not his pockets; that he told the defendant to submit to an examination, and that he searched him. . . .

The witness answered questions by the Court as follows:

"You say there was no inducement to him in the way of promise or expectation of advantage?

"A. — Not any, your honor.

"Q. — Held out?

"A. — Not any, your honor.

"Q. — Nor anything said in the way of suggestion to him that he might suffer if he did not, — that it might be worse for him?

"A. — No, sir; not any.

"Q. — So far as you were concerned, it was entirely voluntary?

"A. — Voluntary, indeed.

"Q. — No influence on your part exerted to persuade him one way or the other?

"A. — None whatever, sir; none whatever." . . .

The objection was overruled, and the defendant excepted on all the grounds above stated, and the exceptions were allowed.

The witness answered as follows:

"When Mr. Bram came into my office, I said to him: 'Mr. Bram, we are trying to unravel this horrible mystery.' I said: 'Your position is rather an awkward one. I have had Brown in this office, and he made a statement that he saw you do the murder.' He said: 'He could not have seen me. Where was he?' I said: 'He states he was at the wheel.' 'Well,' he said, 'he could not see me from there.' I said: 'Now, look here, Bram, I am satisfied that you killed the captain from all I have heard from Mr. Brown. But,' I said, 'some of us here think you could not have done all that crime alone. If you had an accomplice, you should say so, and not have the blame of this horrible crime on your own shoulders.' He said: 'Well, I think, and many others on board the ship think, that Brown is the murderer; but I don't know anything about it.' He was rather short in his replies.

"Q. — Anything further said by either of you?

"A. — No; there was nothing further said on that occasion." . . .

The contention is that the foregoing conversation, between the detective and the accused, was competent only as a confession by him made; that it was offered as such; and that it was erroneously admitted, as it was not shown to have been voluntary. . . . It is manifest that the sole ground upon which the proof of the conversation was tendered was that it was a confession, as this was the only conceivable hypothesis upon which it could have been legally admitted to the jury. It is also clear that, in determining whether the proper foundation was laid for its admission, we are not concerned with how far the confession tended to prove guilt. Having been offered as a confession, and being admissible only because of that fact, a consideration of the measure of proof which resulted from it does not arise in determining its admissibility. If found to have been illegally admitted, reversible error will result. . . .

The principle on the subject is thus stated in a note to § 219 of Greenleaf on Evidence: "The rule excludes not only direct confessions, but any other declaration tending to implicate the prisoner in the crime charged, even though, in terms, it is an accusation of another or a refusal to confess." . . .

In cases where statements of one accused had been made to others than the magistrate upon an examination, differences of opinion arose among the English judges as to whether a confession made to a person not in a position of authority over the accused was admissible in evidence after an inducement had been held out to the prisoner by such persons. Rex v. Spencer (1837), 7 Car. & P. 776. It was finally settled, however, that the effect of inducements must be confined to those made by persons in authority (Reg. v. Taylor (1839), 8 Car. & P. 734; Reg. v. Moore (1852), 2 Denison, Cr. Cas. 522), although, in the last cited case, while former precedents were followed, the Court expressed strong doubts as to the wisdom of the restriction (2 Denison, Cr. Cas. 527). There can be no question, however, that a police officer, actually or constructively in charge of one in custody on a suspicion of having committed crime, is a person in authority within the rule. . . .

Many other cases in the English reports illustrate the application of the rule excluding statements made under inducement improperly operating to influence the mind of an accused person. . . . In the cases following, statements made by a prisoner were held inadmissible, because induced by the language set out in each case: In Rex v. Griffin (1809), Russ. & R. 151, telling the prisoner that it would be better for him to confess. In Rex v. Jones, Id. 152, the prosecutor saying to the accused that he only wanted his money, and, if the prisoner gave him that, he might go to the devil, if he pleased. In Rex v. Kingston (1830), 4 Car. & P. 387, saying to the accused: "You are under suspicion of this, and you had better tell all you know." In Rex v. Enoch (1833), 5 Car. & P. 539, saying: "You had better tell the truth, or it will lie upon you, and the man go free." In Rex v. Mills (1833), 6 Car. & P. 146, saying: "It is no use for you to deny it, for there is the man and boy who will swear they saw you do it." In Sherrington's Case (1838), 2 Lewin, Cr. Cas. 123, saying: "There is no doubt, thou wilt be found guilty: it will be better for you if you will confess." In Rex v. Thomas (1833), 6 Car. & P. 353, saying: "You had better split, and not suffer for all of them." In Rex v. Simpson (1834), 1 Moody, 410, and Ryan & M. 410, repeated importunities by neighbors and relatives of the prosecutor, coupled with assurances to the suspected person that it would be a good deal worse for her if she did not, and that it would be better for her if she did confess. In Rex v. Upchurch (1836), 1 Moody, 465, saying: "If you are guilty, do confess. It will perhaps save your neck. You will have to go to prison. If William H. [another person suspected, and whom the prisoner had charged] is found clear, the guilt will fall on you. Pray tell me if you did it." In Reg. v. Croydon (1846), 2 Cox, Cr. Cas. 67, saying: "I dare say you had a hand in it. You may as well tell me all about it." In Reg. v. Garner (1848), 1 Denison, Cr. Cas. 329, saying: "It will be better for you to speak out." . . . In the leading case of Reg. v. Baldry (1852), 2 Denison, Cr. Cas. 430, after full consideration, it was held that the declaration made to a prisoner, who had first been cautioned that what he said "would" be used as evidence, merely imported that such statement "might" be used, and could not have induced in the mind of the prisoner a hope of benefit sufficient to lead him to make a statement. . . .

The latest decision in England on the subject of inducement, made by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, is Reg. v. Thompson (1893), 2 Q. B. 12. . . .

While, as we have said, there is no question that a police officer having a prisoner in custody is a person in authority, within the rule in England, and, therefore, that any inducement by him offered, calculated to operate upon the mind of the prisoner, would render a confession as a consequence thereof inadmissible, there seems to be doubt in England whether the doctrine does not extend further, and hold that the mere fact of the interrogation of a prisoner by a police officer would "per se" render the confession inadmissible, because of the inducement resulting from the very nature of the authority exercised by the police officer, assimilating him in this regard to a committing or examining magistrate. . . . Whatever be the rule in this regard in England, however, it is certain that, where a confession is elicited by the questions of a policeman, the fact of its having been so obtained, it is conceded, may be an important element in determining whether the answers of the prisoner were voluntary. The attempt on the part of police officer to obtain a confession by interrogating has been often reproved by the English Courts as unfair to the prisoner, and as approaching dangerously near to a violation of the rule protecting an accused from being compelled to testify against himself. Berriman's Case (1854), 6 Cox, Cr. Cas. 388; Cheverton's Case (1862), 2 Falc. & F. 833; Mick's Case (1863), 3 Falc. & F. 822; Reagan's Case (1867), 17 Law T. (N.S.) 325; and Reason's Case, (1872), 12 Cox, Cr. Cas. 228.

We come, then, to the American authorities. In this Court the general rule that the confession must be free and voluntary — that is, not produced by inducements engendering either hope or fear — is settled by the authorities referred to at the outset. The facts in the particular cases decided in this Court, and which have been referred to, manifested so clearly that the confessions were voluntary that no useful purpose can be subserved by analyzing them. In this Court also it has been settled that the mere fact that the confession is made to a police officer, while the accused was under arrest in or out of prison, or was drawn out by his questions, does not necessarily render the confession involuntary; but, as one of the circumstances, such imprisonment or interrogation may be taken into account in determining whether or not the statements of the prisoner were voluntary. Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574, 4 Sup. Ct. 202; Sparf v. U. S., 156 U. S. 51, 55, 15 Sup. Ct. 273. And this last rule thus by this court established is also the doctrine upheld by the state decisions.

In the various State Courts of last resort the general rule we have just referred to, that a confession must be voluntary, is generally recognized. . . . In the following cases the language in each mentioned was held to be an inducement sufficient to exclude a confession or statement made in consequence thereof: In Kelly v. State (1882), 72 Ala. 244, saying to the prisoner: "You have got your foot in it, and somebody else was with you. Now, if you did break open the door, the best thing you can do is to tell all about it, and to tell who was with you, and to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.". . . In Com. v. Myers (1894), 160 Mass. 530, 36 N. E. 481, saying to the accused: "You had better tell the truth." In People v. Wolcott (1883), 51 Mich. 612, 17 N. W. 78, saying to the accused: "It will be better for you to confess." . . . In State v. Drake (1893), 113 N. C. 624, 18 S. E. 166, saying to the prisoner: "If you are guilty, I would advise you to make an honest confession. It might be easier for you. It is plain against you." . . .

We come, then, to a consideration of the circumstances surrounding, and the facts established to exist, in reference to the confession, in order to determine whether it was shown to have been voluntarily made. . . . The situation of the accused, and the nature of the communication made to him by the detective, necessarily overthrow any possible implication that his reply to the detective could have been the result of a purely voluntary mental action; that is to say, when all the surrounding circumstances are considered in their true relations, not only is the claim that the statement was voluntary overthrown, but the impression is irresistibly produced that it must necessarily have been the result of either hope or fear, or both, operating on the mind.

It cannot be doubted that, placed in the position in which the accused was when the statement was made to him that the other suspected person had charged him with crime, the result was to produce upon his mind the fear that, if he remained silent, it would be considered an admission of guilt, and therefore render certain his being committed for trial as the guilty person; and it cannot be conceived that the converse impression would not also have naturally arisen that, by denying, there was hope of removing the suspicion from himself. If this must have been the state of mind of one situated as was the prisoner when the confession was made, how, in reason, can it be said that the answer which he gave, and which was required by the situation, was wholly voluntary, and in no manner influenced by the force of hope or fear? To so conclude would be to deny the necessary relation of cause and effect. . . . As said in the passage from Russell on Crimes already quoted: "The law cannot measure the force of the influence used, or decide upon its effect upon the mind of the prisoner, and therefore excludes the declaration if any degree of influence has been exerted." In the case before us, we find that an influence was exerted, and, as any doubt as to whether the confession was voluntary must be determined in favor of the accused, we cannot escape the conclusion that error was committed by the trial Court in admitting the confession under the circumstances disclosed by the record.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to set aside the verdict and to order a new trial.

Mr. Justice BREWER, dissenting.

I dissent from the opinion and judgment in this case —

First, because I think the testimony was not open to objection. "A confession, if freely and voluntarily made, is evidence of the most satisfactory character." Hopt v. People, 110 U. S. 574, 584, 4 Sup. Ct. 202, reaffirmed in Sparf v. U. S., 156 U. S. 51, 55, 15 Sup. Ct. 273. The fact that the defendant was in custody and in irons does not destroy the competency of a confession. "Confinement or imprisonment is not in itself sufficient to justify the exclusion of a confession, if it appears to have been voluntary, and was not obtained by putting the prisoner in fear or by promises." Sparf v. U. S. supra. See, also, Wilson v. U. S., 162 U. S. 613–623, 16 Sup. Ct. 895.

The witness Power, when called, testified positively that no threats were made nor any inducements held out to Bram; and this general declaration he affirmed and reaffirmed in response to inquiries made by the Court and the defendant's counsel. The Court, therefore, properly overruled the objection at that time made to his testifying to the statements of defendant. . . . The first part of that conversation is as follows: "When Mr. Bram came into my office, I said to him: 'Bram, we are trying to unravel this horrible mystery.' I said: 'Your position is rather an awkward one. I have had Brown in this office, and he made a statement that he saw you do the murder.' He said: 'He could not have seen me. Where was he?' I said: 'He states he was at the wheel.' 'Well,' he said, 'he could not see me from there.'" In this there is nothing which by any possibility can be tortured into a suggestion of threat or a temptation of hope. Power simply stated the obvious fact that they were trying to unravel a horrible mystery, and the further fact that Brown had charged the defendant with the crime, and the replies of Bram were given as freely and voluntarily as it is possible to conceive. It is strange to hear it even intimated that Bram up to this time was impelled by fear or allured by hope caused in the slightest degree by these statements of Power.

The balance of the conversation is as follows: "I said: 'Now, look here, Bram, I am satisfied that you killed the captain from all I have heard from Mr. Brown. But,' I said, 'some of us here think you could not have done all that crime alone. If you had an accomplice, you should say so, and not have the blame of this horrible crime on your own shoulders.' He said: 'Well, I think, and many others on board the ship think, that Brown is the murderer; but I don't know anything about it.' He was rather short in his replies." And here, it is argued, was a suggestion of a benefit, — the holding out of a hope that a full disclosure might somehow inure to his advantage. To support this contention involves a refinement of analysis which, while it may show marvelous metaphysical ability, is of little weight in practical affairs. But, even if did carry any such improper suggestion, it was made at nearly the close of the conversation; and that this suggestion then made had a retroactive effect, and transformed the previous voluntary statements of Bram into statements made under the influence of fear or hope, is a psychological process which I am unable to comprehend. . . . With all respect to my brethren who are of a different opinion, I can but think that such a contention is wholly unsound, and that in all this conversation with Bram there was nothing of sufficient importance to justify the reversal of the judgment.

The Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Brown concur in this dissent.

291. COMMONWEALTH v. CRESSINGER

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. 1899

193 Pa. 326; 44 Atl. 433

Argued October 16, 1899. Appeal, No. 231, Jan. T., 1899, by plaintiff, from judgment of O. & T. Northumberland Co., Dec. T., 1898, No. 3, on a verdict of guilty of murder. Before Sterrett, C. J., Green, McCollum, Mitchell, Dean and Fell, JJ. Affirmed.

Indictment for murder. Before Savidge, P. J. At the trial it appeared that on October 10, 1898, Daisy Smith, a girl about sixteen years of age, residing in Lower Augusta township, was shot and killed on her father's farm. Suspicion was directed toward the prisoner, the son of a neighboring farmer. Two of the neighbors went to defendant's home where they found him washing a shirt bespattered with blood.

Counsel for the Commonwealth offered to prove by L. L. Grimm that he, in company with Miles Dougherty, called at the county jail; that the prisoner was brought into the jail office and that they there had a conversation with him and that he confessed to the commission of the crime. Counsel for the prisoner objected, because when the prisoner was interrogated he had been but recently placed under duress without process of law. . . . That while he was yet subjected to the fear and terror incident upon his arrest and incarceration in the middle of the night, and before he had time to acquire even proper composure, in ignorance of his rights, he was, with undue haste, visited by the officers of the law, who immediately informed him who they were, thus being placed in a situation which must necessarily have terrorized him, which circumstances were followed by an artifice and trick by which he was induced to make a statement which they allege to be a confession, and by reason of the artifice and trick might have been induced with the hope of some benefit, or at least while he was under the influence of fear, to make statements which it is proposed to use to his injury: and because the evidence offered is incompetent and illegal.

The COURT. — "Whether the trick in this case was such as to excite hope or fear cannot be known until we hear what it was. . . . I suppose it is of very little consequence which side finds out what the trick was."

Mr. Mahon, of counsel for Commonwealth. — "Go on and state what you said to the prisoner on the evening of October 11, without giving what he said to you. What did you first say to him when he was brought into the office?"

The COURT. — "That he has explained to us already, and after he had explained what he had said, leading up to the confession, Mr. Oram asked whether he had resorted to any trick, and he said he had."

Q. — "Go on and state what you characterized as a trick on your part on that occasion." A. — "Why, we discovered that the knife was bought down at Mrs. Bohner's, but we could not get any trace of who bought on the Monday previous, being the last knife of the kind that she had, but we also found that she got her knives from Mr. Hackett in town. . . . I went into Hackett's store and asked him for a pocket knife of the kind that Mrs. Bohner got; and he said she bought three or four different kinds, and he asked what kind I had reference to and I said I would like to get a two-bladed barlow, both at one end, and he said, 'I have some of that kind,' and he got one; and I says, 'I would like to borrow this for a few days and if I don't bring it back I will pay for it,' and I put it in my pocket and went to the jail; and after talking a while I reached down in my pocket and pulled this out and I said, 'Ed, I found your knife.'"

Mr. Oram: Q. — "Then the statement he made was induced by that?" A. — "Yes, sir: in that way."

The COURT. — "Is that all, by way of trick?" A. — "I gave it to the prisoner and he examined it. He asked, 'Where did you get it?' I said, 'Just where you put it,' and he asked me the second time and I gave him the same answer, and he asked the third time, 'I would like to know where you got it;' and I says, 'Nobody knows better than you; I got it just where you put it,' and then he began and told me where I got it."

Counsel for the prisoner renews objections previously made.

The COURT. — "We are of the opinion that we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the trick spoken of by the witness was calculated to produce such a state of hope or fear on the mind of the prisoner as would lead to an untrue confession. We therefore overrule the objection and admit the testimony."

Exception for the prisoner and bill sealed. . . .

Mr. Oram: Q. — "Go on and state all that occurred, which led up to this confession that you have in this writing." A. — "When I told him, 'Nobody knows better than you,' he says, 'You must have found it at the apple tree where the wash bench stands;' I said, 'Certainly, you knew where you put it.' I looked at him straight and says, 'Ed, why did you do it?' And just at that time Dougherty says, 'Did you have a quarrel?' And Ed says, 'Yes, she slapped me,' and Dougherty kind of raised himself up, and said, 'I don't want you to say another word, unless it is voluntarily, because anything you say we will use against you.'" Q. — "Is this confession in your handwriting?" A. — "Yes, sir, it don't show it very plainly because I was kind of nervous when I wrote it."

Counsel for the Commonwealth renewed offer to read the confession.

Counsel for the prisoner objected. . . .

The COURT: Objection overruled and bill sealed for the prisoner. . . .

Verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, and sentence passed upon the verdict. . . .

Charles M. Clement and William H. M. Oram, for appellant. . . . The confession was inadmissible. . . .

P. A. Mahon, with D. W. Shipman, district attorney, for appellee. . . .

Opinion by Mr. Justice MITCHELL, October 30, 1899. . . . The evidence of the confession made to Grimm was properly admitted. The fact that it was obtained by a trick is no objection to its competency, unless the circumstances are such as to suggest an inference that through fear or hope a false confession may be made. There were no such circumstances in the present case, nor anything which required the judge to dwell particularly upon them in his charge. A knife was produced and the prisoner led to believe that it was his. Under this supposition he told where he had hidden his and then told the story of the murder. The object of evidence is to get at the truth, and a trick which has no tendency to produce a confession except one in accordance with the truth is always admissible. Society and the criminal are at war, and capture by surprise, or ambush, or masked battery is as permissible in one case as in the other. Com. v. Goodwin, 186 Pa. 218; McClain v. Com., 110 Pa. 263, 269. . . .

Judgment affirmed and record remitted for purpose of execution according to law.

292. COMMONWEALTH v. STORTI

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1901

177 Mass. 339; 58 N. E. 102

INDICTMENT for murder, returned against Luigi Storti and Vincenzo Bocielli by the grand jury, December 9, 1899. The defendant Bocielli was not apprehended. The defendant Storti was tried in the Superior Court, before BOND and LAWTON, JJ. The case came up on appeal and bill of exceptions. . . .

By the bill of exceptions it appeared that on the night of November 6, 1899, the two defendants, Luigi Storti and Vincenzo Bocielli, of whom Storti alone was on trial, occupied a room in a house on Charter street in Boston with five others, one of whom was Michele Calucci, the deceased. At an early hour of the morning of November 7th it was discovered by some of the occupants of the room that Calucci had been murdered in his bed with an axe, and that Storti and Bocielli had fled. Storti was arrested on the following day at Hudson, Massachusetts. He, there and on the way to Boston, made incriminating statements to the officers, and later, at police headquarters in Boston, made a confession through an interpreter. . . .

P. S. Maher and C. W. Rowley, for the defendant.

M. J. Sughrue, First Assistant District Attorney, and J. D. McLaughlin, Second Assistant District Attorney, for the Commonwealth. . . .

HOLMES, C. J. . . . The admission of statements made by the defendant to the officers who arrested him was excepted to, mainly on the ground that the statements were not voluntary. The judges who tried the case were warranted in finding that the statements were freely made, and whatever latitude we may use in reviewing these findings of fact, we cannot say that they were wrong. Commonwealth v. Bond, 170 Mass. 41.

The first conversation was in the station-house, just after the arrest on the day following the murder. In this nothing of great importance was said. But the defendant in denying his guilt said that he never was in Boston, which of course was evidence against him. In the next, on the following day at the same place, the defendant admitted striking the deceased with an axe. So far no inducements had been held out to him, and the facts that the prisoner was in custody and was questioned by an officer are not conclusive against this evidence. . . .

The first full and extended examination was in the Boston station-house, in the presence of three officers, one of whom put questions through an interpreter, and the questions and answers were taken down by a stenographer. The interpreter was a witness at the trial, and swore that he accurately translated all that was said by the officer to the prisoner and all the answers which the prisoner made. The stenographer testified that he accurately took it all down. What seems to be the chief ground of objection to this examination is that according to his own testimony the interpreter said to the prisoner that "what would be against him, that will be brought in court against him, or in favor, as it was." We understand this to mean in imperfect English that whatever was said would be used in court, against the defendant if unfavorable, or for him if favorable. It is hard to find an inducement to make a confession or to say things unfavorable to himself in these words. But, if it be thought that there was an inducement to speak when otherwise he might have remained silent, Bram v. United States, 168 U. S. 532, 549, 550 [ante, No. 290], it is enough to say that, according to the testimony of the stenographer from his notes, the prisoner was asked if he wished to make any statement of his own free will, answered yes, and then was cautioned simply that everything he said might be used against him in court. This is confirmed by other evidence, and, to say the least, the presiding judges were warranted in taking it as the true account. . . .

The only exception which causes hesitation on our part is to the exclusion of evidence that, at the talk in the Hudson station-house, Rooney, one of the officers, said in English to Rosatto, another, who was speaking with the prisoner in Italian, "Tell him it will be better for him if he tells." But it appears that the defendant did not speak or understand English, and not only was there no evidence that such a suggestion was communicated to the prisoner, but all the testimony was that it was not communicated, if such a statement was made. It did not even appear that Rooney spoke in the prisoner's hearing. . . .

Decree overruling motion to quash affirmed; exceptions overruled.

293. AMMONS v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF MISSISSIPPI. 1902

80 Miss. 592; 32 So. 9

FROM the Circuit Court of Warren County. Hon. GEORGE ANDERSON, Judge.

Ammons, appellant, was indicted, tried, and convicted of burglary. On the trial certain confessions of the defendant, obtained by the aid of a sweat-box in the manner mentioned in the opinion of the Court, were offered in evidence against defendant over his objection. Without the confession there was not sufficient evidence to support the verdict. From the conviction the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, assigning as error the admission of the confessions.

D. Marshall and Theodore G. Burchett, Jr., for appellant. Before a confession can be introduced it must be shown to be voluntary. . . . By the direction of the chief of police the defendant was thrown into the "sweat-box." . . . If the confession has been extorted by duress or fear, as by threat of violence, or any increased rigor of confinement, or by any other menace which can inspire dread or alarm, it will be excluded. . . . Of course, a mere exhortation to tell the truth does not render the confession inadmissible, but when an officer, without advising a prisoner of his privilege of not answering the questions, tells him he had better tell what is right, and it would be better to tell the truth, the Courts have uniformly excluded such a confession. Regina v. Romp, 17 Ont. Rep. 567; Regina v. Diherty, 13 Cox C. C. 23; Commonwealth v. Meyers, 160 Mass. 530. . . .

Monroe McClurg, Attorney-General, for appellee. The brief of counsel for appellant pictures the "sweat-box" in the city jail as a most horrible place. Much of the picture is drawn from imagination. The record shows that the apartment called the "sweat-box" was simply a small room in one corner of a large room. . . .

Calhoon, J. — The chief of police testified that the accused made to him a "free and voluntary" statement. The circumstances under which he made it were these: There was what was known as a "sweat-box" in the place of confinement. This was an apartment about five or six feet one way and about eight feet another. It was kept entirely dark. For fear that some stray ray of light or breath of air might enter without special invitation, the small cracks were carefully blanketed. The prisoner was allowed no communication whatever with human beings. Occasionally the officer, who had put him there, would appear, and interrogate him about the crime charged against him. To the credit of our advanced civilization and humanity it must be said that neither the thumbscrew nor the wooden boot was used to extort a confession. The efficacy of the sweat-box was the sole reliance. This, with the hot weather of summer, and the fact that the prisoner was not provided with sole leather lungs, finally, after "several days" of obstinate denial, accomplished the purpose of eliciting a "free and voluntary" confession. The officer, to his credit, says he did not threaten his prisoner, that he held out no reward to him, and did not coerce him. Everything was "free and voluntary." He was perfectly honest and frank in his testimony, this officer was. He was intelligent, and well up in the law as applied to such cases, and nothing would have tempted him, we assume, to violate any technical requirement of a valid confession — no threats, no hope of reward, no assurance that it would be better for the prisoner to confess. He did tell him, however, "that it would be best for him to do what was right," and that it "would be better for him to tell the truth." In fact, this was the general custom in the moral treatment of these sweat-box patients, since this officer says, "I always tell them it would be better for them to tell the truth, but never hold out any inducement to them." He says, in regard to the patient, Ammons, "I went to see this boy every day, and talked to him about the case, and told him it would be better for him to tell the truth; tell everything he knew about the case." This sweat-box seems to be a permanent institution, invented and used to gently persuade all accused persons to voluntarily tell the truth. Whenever they do tell the truth — that is, confess guilt of the crime — they are let out of the sweat-box. Speaking of this apartment, and the habit as to prisoners generally, this officer says, "We put them in there (the sweat-box) when they don't tell me what I think they ought to." This is refreshing.

The confession was not competent to be received as evidence. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 531, note 3; Id., p. 550, note 7; Hamilton v. State, 77 Miss. 675 (27 So. 606); Simon v. State, 37 Miss. 288. Defendant, unless demented, understood that the statement wanted was confession, and that this only meant release from this "black hole of Calcutta." Such proceedings as this record discloses cannot be too strongly denounced. They violate every principle of law, reason, humanity, and personal right. They restore the barbarity of ancient and medieval methods. They obstruct, instead of advance, the proper ascertainment of truth. It is far from the duty of an officer to extort confession by punishment. On the contrary, he should warn his prisoner that every statement he may choose to make may be used against him on his trial.

Reversed and remanded.

294. STATE v. FINCH

SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS. 1905

71 Kan. 793; 81 Pac. 494

APPEAL from District Court, Finney County; WM. EASTON HUTCHISON, Judge. O. W. Finch was convicted of manslaughter in the fourth degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

G. L. Miller, for appellant. C. C. Coleman, Attorney-General, and Albert Hoskinson, for the State.

JOHNSTON, C. J. — In an information, containing two counts, O. W. Finch was charged with manslaughter in the third and fourth degrees for the killing of M. Brooks. He was found guilty of manslaughter in the fourth degree, as charged in the second count. In his appeal numerous errors are assigned. . . .

The principal complaint of the defendant is the admission of testimony given by himself at the coroner's inquest. . . . We find nothing in the record showing that it was not admissible. Like others, the defendant was subpoenaed as a witness to testify at the inquest as to the cause of Brooks' death. For aught that appears, he may have been anxious and swift to testify. There is not a hint in the record that he was led to testify through any inducement of promised favor or by reason of any fear, menace or duress. Ordinarily, all that a defendant has said pertinent to the subject of inquiry may be received in evidence against him. The exceptions to this rule are when admissions have been extracted from him by means of promises or threats, or where statements made or testimony given have been compulsory or involuntary. The test of admissibility in this and like cases is, Were the statements made voluntarily and without compulsion?

In this instance they were made in an inquiry where the defendant was a witness, and not a party, and where he might have claimed the privileges of a witness. He was not in custody, nor had any accusation been made against him. Indeed, it does not appear that Brooks' death was then thought to have been caused by any criminal act. . . . If the testimony which defendant gave was incriminating, was it inadmissible merely because he was subpoenaed as a witness and gave his testimony at a formal inquest before the coroner? There was no compulsion to testify, unless the mere fact that he was subpoenaed to give his testimony can be so regarded. There is considerable diversity of opinion in the cases as to the admission of such testimony, and these may be found compiled and classified in 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 851, and the appended note. In an early New York case the subject was examined and the cases reviewed, and it was held that upon a trial for murder statements made by the prisoner at a coroner's inquest upon the body of the deceased, when the witness was not under arrest or accused of the crime, were admissible against him. Hendrickson v. The People, 10 N. Y. 13, 61 Am. Dec. 721. In a later case a witness at a coroner's inquest, who appeared in response to a subpoena, testified, and on his subsequent trial the testimony was admitted against him, although he knew at the time he testified that he was under suspicion of having committed the crime under investigation, and would probably be arrested. Teachout v. The People, 41 N. Y. 7. In People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 61 N. E. 286, 62 L. R. A. 193, the defendant was charged with murder at an inquest over the body of the deceased; the defendant testified in pursuance to a subpoena issued by the coroner, and he was threatened with punishment if he refused to testify; at the close of the inquest he was arrested, charged with the crime. The Court said, on page 331 of 168 N. Y:

"When a person is called upon to testify at a coroner's inquest, convened to inquire into a crime, for the commission of which such person is then under arrest, or upon which he has been formally accused, he occupies the same position and he has the same rights, as though he were before an examining magistrate. People v. Mondon, 103 N. Y. 211, 8 N. E. 496, 57 Am. Rep. 709. So, on the other hand, if the person who testifies at the inquest does so simply as a witness, he has none of the rights or immunities of a party. This is the foundation of the rule which is now firmly established in this State — that when a person testifies at an inquest as an accused or arrested party his testimony cannot be used against him upon a subsequent trial of an indictment growing out of the inquest, unless his testimony has been voluntarily given after he has been fully advised of all his rights and has been given an opportunity to avail himself of them. People v. Chapleau, 121 N. Y. 267. The logical and necessary corollary of that part of the rule stated is that when a person testifies simply as a witness, and not as a party, his testimony can be used against him even though he is afterwards indicted and tried for the commission of the crime disclosed by the inquest."

Other authorities supporting this rule are Wilson v. The State, 110 Ala. 1; Jones v. The State, 120 Ala. 303; State v. Coffee, 56 Conn. 399, 16 Atl. 151; State v. Gilman, 51 Me. 206; Shoeffler v. The State, 3 Wis. 823; Williams v. The Commonwealth, 29 Pa. 102; Newton v. The State, 21 Fla. 53; Kirby v. The State, 23 Tex. App. 13; The People v. Taylor, 59 Cal. 640; 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (15th Ed.) § 225; 1 Roscoe's Criminal Evidence (8th Ed.) 95. Some of the Courts have taken a different view. State v. Young, 119 Mo. 495; State v. Young, 60 N. C. 126; State v. Senn, 32 S. C. 392; State v. O'Brien, 18 Mont. 1. . . .

Attention is called to the case of State v. Taylor, 36 Kan. 329; but there the testimony at the coroner's inquest was admitted because it did not appear to be voluntary. In the course of the opinion it is said that, if the defendant was compelled, by subpoena or otherwise, to give his testimony before the coroner's inquest, and there was duress, it should be excluded. But that case is not an authority that testimony given under a subpoena and without compulsion and duress is inadmissible. Testimony as to the cause of a death at a coroner's inquest, given by a witness who is not accused nor under arrest, is not deemed to be involuntary merely because he testified in response to a subpoena. Of course, if it appeared that he testified as a party, rather than as a witness, or if he had been induced to testify by promises or threats or other improper influences, his testimony might not subsequently be used against him. In this case there are no circumstances indicating coercion, nor anything inconsistent with the view that the defendant desired or sought the opportunity to testify. . . . Finding no prejudicial error, the judgment will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

295. STATE v. CAMPBELL

SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS. 1906

73 Kan. 688; 85 Pac. 784

APPEAL from District Court, Wyandotte County; J. McCabe Moore, Judge.

Frank M. Campbell was convicted of bribery, and appeals. Affirmed.

[The facts and the evidence objected to are printed post, in No. 654.]

PORTER, J. (after stating the facts). The appellant contends . . .

that the Court erred in allowing members of the grand jury which indicted appellant to testify to statements made by him while a witness before the grand jury. It is contended: (1) That, before such testimony was competent, the State should have shown that the statements of appellant were voluntary. . . . It is insisted that the same rule applies to the admissibility of statements and declarations of a defendant in a criminal action as obtains in reference to a confession.

The distinction between a confession and a statement or declaration is one recognized by Courts and text-writers because it is a patent distinction in the very nature of things. The only reason why confessions are sometimes not admitted in evidence is because experience has shown that, when made under certain circumstances, they cannot be relied upon as true. It is not out of any consideration for the rights of the party alleged to have made the confession that it is excluded, but simply because of the inherent probability of its untruthfulness, unless it first appears to have been made voluntarily and not under the influence of fear or duress, occasioned by threats or hope of immunity by reason of promises.

"A 'confession,' in a legal sense, is restricted to an acknowledgment of guilt made by a person after an offense has been committed, and does not apply to a mere statement or declaration of an independent fact from which such guilt can be inferred. State v. Reinhart, 26 Or. 466, 38 Pac. 822. . . .

In 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 821, p. 930, the author says:

" (3) An acknowledgment of a subordinate fact, not directly involving guilt, or, in other words, not essential to the crime charged, is not a confession, because the supposed ground of untrustworthiness of confessions is that strong motive impels the accused to expose and declare his guilt as the price of purchasing immunity from present pain or subsequent punishment, and thus, by hypothesis, there must be some quality of guilt in the fact acknowledged. Confessions are thus only one species of admissions, and all other admissions than those which directly touch the fact of guilt are without the scope of the peculiar rules affecting the use of confessions." . . .

Tested by these well established rules, how can it be said that the statements of appellant before the grand jury amounted to a confession? They were made in positive denial of guilt and for the purpose of exculpating himself. He admitted the making of the contract with Gilhaus; there was no guilt, no crime, no offense in that. He admitted the receipt of $412 from Gilhaus; but, if the story he told was true, and this money was in payment of the purchase price of the steam valve which he had sold to Gilhaus, there was no offense in that. No statement by itself amounted to an acknowledgment of guilt; nor could his guilt be necessarily inferred by the jury from all his statements taken together. The constitutional right which every man has to refuse to answer any questions which may incriminate him seems, in these days of "immunity pleas," to be fully recognized and appreciated. It furnishes ample protection and does not, in our opinion, require reinforcement by the adoption of the rule contended for by the appellant. . . .

The judgment will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

TITLE II. PREFERENTIAL RULES

296. INTRODUCTORY.[1] The nature of the Preferential rules is that they prefer one kind of evidence to another. This may be done in one of two ways: (a) they may require one kind of evidence to be brought in before any other can be resorted to, and may refuse provisionally to listen to the latter until the former is procured or is shown to be inaccessible; or (b) they may prefer one kind of evidence absolutely, i.e. they may require its production, and, so long as it is available, consider no other kind of evidence, after the preferred kind has been supplied.

With reference to the kinds of evidence thus preferred, these rules are of the following scope:

(1) There is a rule of preference for the inspection of the thing itself, in place of any evidence, either circumstantial or testimonial, about the thing; this is the rule of Primariness, as sometimes termed, and concerns itself solely with documents.

(2) There is, next, a preference as between various kinds of testimonial evidence. One kind of witness may, for various reasons, be required to be called in preference to another. Here the two kinds of preference, conditional and absolute, are both found. (a) The chief example of the former sort is the rule requiring an attesting witness to be called. Other examples of this kind of rule are sometimes found in requirements that the eye-witnesses to a crime must all be called, or that the owner of stolen goods must be called to prove their loss, or that the alleged writer of a document must be called to identify it. (b) Of the absolute preference of one witness above another, the chief example is the rule preferring a magistrate's official report of testimony delivered before him. Another example of such a rule is the preference given to the enrolment of a statute as certified to by the presiding officers of the Legislature, the Governor, and the Secretary of State.

297. Professor JAMES BRADLEY THAYER. Preliminary Treatise on Evidence. (1898, pp. 489 ff.). The "Best Evidence" rule. The phrase ["best evidence"] first appears in Chief Justice Holt's time, . . . and continued to hold a great place throughout the eighteenth century. Chief Baron Gilbert introduced the expression into his book on Evidence, and recognized the rule which requires of a party the best evidence that he can produce, as the chief rule of the whole subject. . . . It is said in Gilbert's book that "the first, therefore, and most signal rule in relation to evidence is this, that a man must have the utmost evidence the nature of the fact is capable of." . . . The true meaning of the rule of law that requires the greatest evidence that the nature of the thing is capable of is this, that no such evidence shall be brought which "ex natura rei" supposes still a greater evidence behind, in the parties' own possession and power. Why did he not produce the better evidence? he asks; and he illustrates by what was always the stock example, the case of offering "a copy of a deed or will where he ought to produce the original." . . . The Court also were using the same and even more emphatic language. In 1740, Lord HARDWICKE declared that "the rule of evidence is that the best evidence that the circumstances of the case will allow must be given. There is no rule of evidence to be laid down in this court but a reasonable one, such as the nature of the thing to be proved will admit of." And in 1792 Lord LOUGHBOROUGH said "that all common-law courts ought to proceed upon the general rule, namely, the best evidence that the nature of the case will admit, I perfectly agree." But the great, conspicuous instance in which this doctrine was asserted and applied was in the famous and historical case of Omychund v. Barker, in 1744, growing out of the extension of British commerce in India, where the question was on receiving in an English court the testimony of a native heathen Hindoo, taken in India, on an oath conformed to the usage of his religion. In this case, WILLES, J., resorted to this rule, and Lord HARDWICKE, sitting as Chancellor, with great emphasis said: "The judge and sages of the law have laid it down that there is but one general rule of evidence, the best that the nature of the case will allow." . . .

[By the 1800s,] an old principle which has served a useful purpose for the century while rules of evidence had been forming and were being applied, to an extent never before known, while the practice of granting new trials for the jury's disregard of evidence had been developing, and judicial control over evidence had been greatly extended, — this old principle, this convenient, rough test, had survived its usefulness. A crop of specific rules and exceptions to rules had been sprouting, and hardening into an independent growth. It had become perfectly true that in many cases it made no difference whatever whether a man offered the best evidence that he could or not, — the best evidence that the nature of the case admitted, the best "ex natura rei," as some judges said, or the best "rebus sic stantibus," as others said; none the less it was, in many cases, rejected. . . . As regards the main rule of the Best Evidence, in its general application the text-books which followed Gilbert, beginning with Peake in 1801, and continuing with the leading treatises of Phillips in 1814, Starkie in 1824, Greenleaf in 1842, Taylor in 1848, and Best in 1849, all repeat it. But it is accompanied now with so many explanations and qualifications as to indicate the need of some simpler and truer statement, which should exclude any mention of this as a working rule of our system. Indeed it would probably have dropped naturally out of use long ago, if it had not come to be a convenient, short description of the rule as to proving the contents of a writing. Regarded as a general rule, the trouble with it is that it is not true to the facts and does not hold out in its application; and in so far as it does apply, it is unnecessary and uninstructive. It is roughly descriptive of two or three rules which have their own reasons and their own name and place, and are well enough known without it.

SUB-TITLE I. RULE OF PREFERENCE FOR DOCUMENTARY ORIGINALS

298. History.[1] The rule requiring the production of writings before the tribunal is one of the few rules in our system of evidence that run back earlier than the 1700s. In this rule we find a continuous existence, under one form or another, as far back as the history of our legal system takes us. But this history finds the rule in three stages: first, the stage of a form of trial, — trial by carta or document; next, the stage of a rule of pleading in jury trial, — the rule of profert; and finally the modern rule of production in evidence.

(1) Trial by documents. This is the primitive aspect of the rule. Here the contrast and competition is between trial before the judges with deed-witnesses and trial by the jury; but this contrast tends to disappear, and the witnesses go out with the jury and investigate the deed.

(2) Profert in pleading. In the second stage, the contrast is between documents which are brought into court and formally presented in pleading to the consideration of the jury, and documents which are taken into consideration by the jury without this formal presentation. The jury at this time might freely go upon their own knowledge in reaching a verdict. This had changed by the 1700s; but in the meantime the tendency in that direction is here seen in the rule requiring important documents to be presented ("profert and oyer") before the jury in Court, and forbidding them to be dealt with by the jury unless so presented.

(3) The rule of production in evidence. The contrast that remains to investigate is that between a rule requiring the production in evidence of writings and the absence of such a rule. It is apparent that, so far as the rule of profert in pleading obtained, and from the earliest time of its obtaining, there was in effect a rule of evidence on the subject. But the rule of profert applied (1) in the first place only to documents under seal and to judicial records. (2) Furthermore, it applied in civil cases only; there thus remained practically the entire scope of criminal trials to be covered by the rule of evidence. (3) Finally, the rule was dispensed with — at least by gradual steps, stretching over two centuries — where the document was lost, or in the hands of the opponent, or, in certain cases, in the hands of a stranger, or was only collateral to the main issue; but these limitations (except the last) were also perpetuated in the rule of evidence, so that there are under this head no radical steps of expansion to be noted.

At what time, then, did the rule of evidence come to include in its scope the documents exempted by the first two above limitations of the rule of profert?

(a) In civil cases, it is plain that during the 1500s no independent rule of evidence yet required the production of writings in general. At this period, whatever document was not brought in by virtue of the profert rule in pleading might be testified to without any production. By the beginning of the 1700s and onwards the rule is found applied to miscellaneous writings; although when a formal statement of it is made, the scope is still sometimes not so broad; and only by the beginning of the 1800s do the practitioners and writers of treatises explicitly state it to cover all kinds of writings. Moreover, all through the 1700s the rule was understood not to apply to writings which were only "collateral" to the issue, — a limitation borrowed from the profert tradition.

(b) In criminal cases, the rule appears, as late as the 1600s, not to have been settled as broadly applicable, even to records. No fixed rule of production existed for miscellaneous writings. They were often produced, and often not produced nor accounted for; and when they were accounted for, the explanation was made, as likely as not, only on cross-examination, or to forestall the jury's suspicion or the judge's criticism, and not as a preliminary required by firm and accepted rule. Under Lord Holt, however, the first quarter of the 1700s finds the rule (coincidently with its progress in civil cases) regularly acknowleged in practice, and applied to all kinds of writings. And yet fifty years later it was possible to dispute and necessary to decide plainly that there was no difference in the doctrine for criminal cases: BULLER, J., in Att'y-Gen'l v. Le Merchant, 2 T. R. 201 (1772): "The rule of evidence in both cases [criminal and civil] is the same, that is, to have the best evidence that is in the power of the party to produce, which means that, if the original can possibly be had, it shall be required."

299. FRANCIS FRANCIA'S TRIAL. (1717. Howell's State Trials, XV, 897, 919). [Treason. The witness is telling of some letters found on the accused].

Lord Townsend. — Upon the issuing out the warrant, the prisoner was seized, and his letters were brought to Mr. Walpole. The next day I sent for the prisoner to be examined. . . . I asked him whether he knew the hand, and whether those letters were not for him? He owned the letters, but said he could not help what was in those letters, and that what others wrote to him could not make him guilty. . . . . On the perusal of the letters, I found he was not a bare conveyor of them, or came by chance to the knowledge of what he explained in them, but that he was wrote to, as one of the managers. . . . About a morning or two after, one Curtis, who was in the same messenger's house, brought a letter to the office, which he had found dropped by this man's bed-side. It was directed to his wife, and the subject was to bid her not afflict herself; . . . that the government had nothing against Mr. Harvey, but a general suspicion that he was against the government, which three parts in four of the nation were; and that he himself laughed at any thing the government could do against him the prisoner. . . .

Mr. Hungerford. — I would propose to the judgment of the Court, whether is it proper to give evidence of the substance of a letter without offering the letter itself.

Just. PRATT. — This comes in answer to Mr. Ward's question. . . .

Mr. Hungerford. — But to give an account of the substance of a letter without producing it, I apprehend, is not according to the rules of evidence.

Sir J. Jekyll. — If the counsel for the prisoner desires the letter to be read, it shall be read. . . .

Mr. Hungerford.— If in the course of the evidence the letter is read, I do not press it.

Then Mr. Horatio Walpole was called again, and the letter was showed to him.

Att. Gen. — Pray, Sir, will you give an account of what you know of this letter, and how it came into your hands?

300. JOHN TUTCHIN'S TRIAL. (1704. Howell's State Trials, XIV, 1114). [Seditious libel. The accused was charged as the author of certain printed papers, serial numbers of the "Observator." The printer is called.]

Att. Gen. — Now we will show these papers to Mr. How, for these are all that are in the book. (They were shown him.) Mr. How, pray tell us who was the author of these papers? How. — Mr. Tutchin.

L. C. J. — How do you know that? How. — I had them of him.

Att. Gen. — Did you pay him for them? How. — I paid him for these very papers.

Mr. Mountague. — What, these papers that are now produced? You never showed them to him, did you? How. — No; but I showed him the same number.

Mr. Mountague. — Have you read them to him? How.— He has owned them all; he has owned them an hundred and an hundred times, all of them.

Mr. Mountague. — Have you the copy of these papers by you? How. — No.

Mr. Mountague. — Did you search for them? How. — No, I have not.

Mr. Harris. — My lord, if we had seen these papers, then we might have seen what alterations were made in them. . . .

Att. Gen. — Did not Mr. Borret send to you about the original papers? How. — Yes.

Att. Gen. — Did you look out what you had? How. — Those that I had were looked out.

Att. Gen. — What became of them? . . .

How. — Those that I have now are but two or three.

Att. Gen. — Did you carry all the original papers you had to Mr. Borret? How. — Yes, all that I know of. . . .

L. C. J. — Then Mr. Borret must be sworn. (And he was sworn accordingly.) . . .

Mr. Mountague. — Did you send to Mr. How, to ask for the original of these papers here named? Borret. — I did.

Mr. Mountague. — Will you produce the papers you have? B. — My lord, they have taken those original papers; and if they were produced, you would see how they are mangled.

Topic 1. The Rule Itself

302. Dr. Leyfield's Case. (1611. Kings Bench, 10 Co. Rep. 92a). Per Curiam. It was resolved that the lessee for years in the case at bar ought to shew the letters patent made to the lessee for life. For it is a maxim in the law that . . . although he who is privy claims but parcel of the original estate, yet he ought to shew the original deed to the Court. And the reason that deeds being so pleaded shall be shewed to the Court is that to every deed two things are requisite and necessary; the one, that it be sufficient in law, and that is called the legal part, because the judgment of that belongs to the judges of the law; the other concerns matter of fact, sc. if it be sealed and delivered as a deed, and the trial thereof belongs to the country. And therefore every deed ought to approve itself, and to be proved by others, — approve itself upon its shewing forth to the Court in two manners: 1. As to the composition of the words to be sufficient in law, and the Court shall judge that; 2. That it be not razed or interlined in material points or places; . . . 3. That it may appear to the Court and to the party if it was upon conditional limitation or power of a revocation in the deed. . . . And these are the reasons of the law that deeds pleaded in court shall be shewed forth to the Court. And therefore it appears that it is dangerous to suffer any who by the law in pleading ought to shew the deed itself to the Court, upon the general issue to prove in evidence to a jury by witnesses that there was such a deed, which they have heard and read; or to prove it by a copy; for the viciousness, rasures, or interlineations, or other imperfections in these cases will not appear to the Court, or peradventure the deed may be upon conditional limitation or with power of revocation, and by this way truth and justice and the true reason of the common law would be subverted. . . . Yet in great and notorious extremities, as by casualty of fire, that all his evidences were burnt in his house, there, if that should appear to the Judges, they may, in favor of him who has so great a loss by fire, suffer him upon the general issue to prove the deed in evidence to the jury by witnesses, that affliction be not added to affliction.

303. READ v. BROOKMAN. (1789. 3 T. R. 151). [A demurrer, to a plea excusing profert on the ground that it was "lost and destroyed by time and accident," was overruled]. BULLER, J. The rule laid down by Lord Coke [in Leyfield's Case] extends to all cases of extreme necessity; those which he mentions are only put as instances; and wherever a similar necessity exists, the same rule holds.

304. THE QUEEN v. KENILWORTH

QUEEN'S BENCH. 1845

7 Q. B. 632

ON appeal against an order of justices, whereby Charles Dencer, his wife and three children, were removed from Bermondsey in Surrey to the parish of Kenilworth in Warwickshire, the Sessions confirmed the order, subject to a case which was substantially as follows.

The ground of removal was an alleged settlement of the pauper in Kenilworth, by the apprenticeship of Joseph Dencer, the deceased father of the male pauper. The indenture of apprenticeship was not produced, either before the removing magistrates or at the Sessions. The appellants objected, under their grounds of appeal, that there was not sufficient proof to let in secondary evidence of the contents of the indenture; and they urged, principally, that a proper and sufficient search was not proved, and that the evidence consisted of the mere proof of parol declarations of third parties not upon oath. . . . The objection was overruled in each instance; but the Sessions reserved the points for the opinion of this Court. . . .

The evidence given at the Sessions with respect to the indenture was as follows:

William Cornwell. — "I am in the vestry clerk's office at Bermondsey. In July, 1840, I searched for the indenture of apprenticeship of Joseph Dencer. I went to Kenilworth, and inquired for Susannah Dencer, the mother of the pauper. I found her in Warwick Union house. She was in bed; her husband was dead. I asked her if she had the indenture; she said she gave it to the master of the workhouse, Mr. Squires. I then went from Warwick to Kenilworth, and saw Mrs. Squires, who said she was a widow, and that she had all her husband's papers up stairs. She brought them down; and I looked over them, but could not find any indenture. She said she had never seen any indenture of Dencer's. The pauper then ceased to be chargeable. I went again in July, 1843, to Mrs. Squires. She said she had given all her papers to Mr. Sutton, the assistant overseer. I saw Sutton; and he said he had received them, but that he had seen no indenture of Dencer's. He said he had given them to Mr. Hopkins, the then assistant overseer. Hopkins said that he had received all the papers from the late assistant overseer, but that he had seen no indenture of Dencer's. I waited while he searched again; but I did not go up stairs with him. When he came down, he said he could not find such an indenture. I then went to Mr. Watts, at Kenilworth, who prepared the indenture. He was dead; and I saw his widow, who said that all her husband's papers were delivered to Messrs. Poole and Haynes, solicitors, of Leamington. I went there, and saw Mr. Haynes's clerk. We both searched, he up stairs, and I down stairs; but we could not find it. We found no bill, nor draft, nor any memorandum about it. Mrs. Dencer died in the Warwick Union house; and the master and matron said she had left no papers. I have used all due diligence to find the indenture.

"I have not searched the parish chest, nor the offices of the parish officers, it not being a parish indenture."

Charles Dencer, the pauper.

"Joseph Dencer was my father; he died in 1835. My mother is also dead. I have seen my father's indenture in my mother's possession; that was in 1835, after my father's death. . . ."

The appellants, at each stage of the evidence, objected to the admissibility of the parol statements of the different parties, namely Susannah Dencer, Mrs. Squires, William Sutton, William Hopkins, Mrs. Coates, and the master and matron of the Warwick Union workhouse, respectively; and they also objected to the admissibility and sufficiency of the parol evidence of the contents of the indenture; but the objection was, in each instance, overruled, and the order was confirmed, subject to the opinion of this Court. . . .

Wallinger, in support of the order of Sessions. Perhaps no very distinct rule can be laid down as to the search sufficient to let in secondary evidence; no two cases are precisely alike; but Freeman v. Arkell, 2 B. & C. 494, resembles the present in many respects. There Bayley, J., citing Brewster v. Sewell, 3 B. & Ald. 296, said that, "Where a paper is useless, so that its loss or destruction may reasonably be presumed, very slight evidence of its loss and destruction is sufficient to let in secondary evidence." Here the paper had become useless to the father, and the inquiry was pursued as far as was reasonably practicable. Cornwell was indeed guided, in some steps of his search, by what is objected to as hearsay evidence; but that part of the evidence may be rejected as superfluous. . . .

Watson and Bovill, contra. The party seeking to introduce secondary evidence was bound to show that he has searched in the proper place; here the propriety of the place in which the search has been made is shown by hearsay evidence. . . .

Lord Denman, C. J. — I should be very unwilling to come to a decision which might have the effect of making parties lax in the custody of documents, or careless in the search for them. I think, however, that we may collect from Rex v. Morton, 4 M. & S. 48, the only rule, namely, that no general rule exists. The question in every case is, whether there has been evidence enough to satisfy the Court before which the trial is had that, to use the words of BAYLEY, J., in Rex v. Denio, 7 B. & C. 620, "a bona fide and diligent search was made for the instrument where it was likely to be found."

But this is a question much fitter for the Court which tries than for us. They have to determine, whether the evidence is satisfactory, whether the search has been made bona fide, whether there has been due diligence, and so on. It is mere waste of time on our part to listen to special pleading on the subject. To what employment shall we be devoted, if such questions are to be brought before us as matters of law! The Court below must exercise their own judgment as to the reasonableness of the search, taking into consideration the nature of the instrument, the time elapsed, and numerous other circumstances which must vary with every case. . . . In the present case I should have come to the same conclusion with the Sessions. And I think we must adhere to their decision, unless we pretend to act on a rule which the nature of the case makes impossible.

As to what is called the hearsay evidence, I am distinctly of opinion that it was receivable: it would have been absurd not to act upon it. When the party got a reasonable account which showed that the documents could not be found, why was he to go farther?

I am, on the whole, satisfied, first, that it was not necessary for the search to go farther, and, secondly, that the evidence given was quite enough to satisfy the Sessions. I only regret that they thought it a question for us at all. They were in the position of a jury; unless we feel certain that they have come to a wrong conclusion we ought not to interfere. . . .

WILLIAMS, J. — You cannot have an absolute certainty of the loss of a document, unless where you can call a party who witnessed its destruction. The question always is, whether due diligence is shown. . . .

COLERIDGE, J. — I am of the same opinion. . . . In the case of inquiry by a Court, if there has been any evidence sufficient for the Court to act upon, we do not set aside their decision, because the same difficulty can not be supposed to exist as in the case of a jury.

Order of Sessions affirmed.

305. BAGLEY v. McMICKLE

SUPREME COURT OF CALIFORNIA, 1858

9 Cal. 430

APPEAL from the District Court of the Fourth Judicial District, County of San Francisco. This action was commenced on the 4th of April, 1855, by the appellant, against the respondents, on three promissory notes made and delivered by G. C. McMickle, deceased, to Bagley and Sinton, and by them assigned to Bagley. On the death of McMickle, the claim, duly verified, was presented to the administrators of his estate, and rejected, and suit brought within three months thereafter. . . .

On the trial, the plaintiff's counsel read to the Court, for the purpose of laying the foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence of the notes sued on to the jury, the following affidavits, viz.: . . .

"Grove C. McMickle made and delivered to the firm of Bagley & Sinton three promissory notes of that date, described and referred to in a certain instrument in writing of that date, signed by this plaintiff, and R. H. Sinton and Grove C. McMickle, and acknowledged before J. P. Haven, notary public; that said notes remained in the possession of said Bagley & Sinton for some time after their maturity; and that, in the demand for the same, said Bagley & Sinton had been very lenient and indulgent to said McMickle, and had resorted to no legal proceedings to collect the same; and that said McMickle, having repeatedly requested said firm not to sell or negotiate said notes, and fearing a negotiation to some person who might be more rigorous in the collection of the same, the parties altogether, viz., said Bagley, Sinton and McMickle, consented and agreed that said notes, for the sole purpose of preventing their negotiation into the hands of some other party, or of their getting into the market, might be destroyed, and believing, also, that the rights of the parties would remain the same as before the destruction; and the said notes were then and there, to wit, about the 15th day of August, A.D. 1852, torn up into small pieces and thrown away, in the presence of all the parties. That said destruction was done for the purpose aforesaid, and by the agreement of the parties was not to affect the right of the said Bagley & Sinton to recover on said notes, and with full intention the part of all the parties, that the rights of the parties should be as if the notes continued to exist." . . .

The plaintiff's counsel then offered in evidence to the jury, the following instrument in writing. . . . It was then and there admitted, by the defendant's counsel in open Court, in the presence of the Court and jury, that the signatures to the foregoing instrument were genuine, and that the same was executed in duplicate, one part of which was then in the possession of the plaintiff, and one of the defendants, as the representatives of the intestate.

To the admission of this instrument in evidence to the jury the defendants' counsel objected, but the Court overruled the objection, and permitted it to be read in evidence to the jury, which was done. . . . The defendants offered no evidence.

The Court instructed the jury, without being requested by either party, as follows: "The bond is sufficient evidence of the making of the notes therein described. The affidavits of plaintiff and Sinton are addressed to the Court for the purpose of accounting for the non-production of the notes sued upon, and laying the foundation for secondary evidence, and are not evidence for the jury. These affidavits show that the maker of the notes peaceably acquired their possession, and destroyed them with plaintiff's consent. Under these circumstances, I feel it my duty to instruct you that there is no testimony to show there is any amount due upon the notes sued upon. . . ." The jury found in favor of defendants, under these instructions.

Plaintiff moved the Court for a new trial, which motion was denied. Plaintiff appealed to this Court, and assigned as error the instructions of the Court.

Hoge & Wilson, for appellant. The foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence may be made either by the party's own affidavit or that of another person. . . . The District Court, after receiving the preliminary proofs, to lay the foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence, admitted the secondary evidence to go to the jury, though objected to by defendants' counsel. . . . After the secondary evidence went to the jury, it was solely for the jury to determine the issues of fact on the evidence introduced before them. . . .

Glassel & Leigh, for respondents. . . .

FIELD, J. — delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

This is an action upon three promissory notes executed by McMickle, deceased, to Bagley & Sinton, and by them transferred to the plaintiff. At the solicitation of the maker, the notes were delivered to him in August, 1852, by the holders, and in their presence and with their consent were then destroyed. On the trial, the plaintiff, in order to account for the non-production of the notes, and to lay the foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence of their contents, read to the Court his own and his co-payee's affidavits, detailing the circumstances and motives which occasioned the destruction of the notes. These affidavits were held by the Court sufficient to authorize the admission of the secondary evidence. . . . The verdict and judgment were for the defendants, and a motion for a new trial having been denied, the plaintiff appealed, and assigns these instructions as error.

It is not a matter of course to allow secondary evidence of the contents of an instrument in suit upon proof of its destruction. If the destruction was the result of accident, or was without the agency or consent of the owner, such evidence is generally admissible. But, if the destruction was voluntarily and deliberately made, by the owner, or with his assent, as in the present case, the admissibility of the evidence will depend upon the cause or motive of the party in effecting or assenting to the destruction. The object of the rule of law which requires the production of the best evidence of which the facts sought to be established are susceptible, is the prevention of fraud; for, if a party is in possession of this evidence, and withholds it, and seeks to substitute inferior evidence in its place, the presumption naturally arises, that the better evidence is withheld for fraudulent purposes which its production would expose and defeat. When it appears that this better evidence has been voluntarily and deliberately destroyed, the same presumption arises, and unless met and overcome by a full explanation of the circumstances, it becomes conclusive of a fraudulent design, and all secondary or inferior evidence is rejected. If, however, the destruction was made upon an erroneous impression of its effect, under circumstances free from suspicion of intended fraud, the secondary evidence is admissible. The cause or motive of the destruction is then the controlling fact which must determine the admissibility of this evidence in such cases. . . .

Authorities to the same effect might be cited almost ad infinitum. From them it is clear that the cause or motive of the destruction of the instrument in suit, when voluntarily made, must determine the question of the admissibility of secondary evidence of its contents. From them it is also clear that the facts and circumstances of the destruction must be shown in the first instance to the Court, to enable it to judge of the propriety of admitting or refusing the secondary evidence. . . . The naked fact of voluntary destruction, without explanation, is held such presumptive evidence of fraudulent design as to preclude all secondary evidence (Blade v. Noland, 12 Wend. 173); and the restriction placed upon the rule by the Court below in this case would deprive it of all practical benefit in the numerous and by far the largest class of cases, where the destruction has taken place when no third party was present. We do not think, therefore, that the affidavits read to the Court below, in explaining the possession and destruction of the notes in suit by the maker, went "beyond their true purpose." . . .

The preliminary proof is addressed to the Court, and of its sufficiency the Court is the sole judge. We do not find in the cases cited, nor have we been able to find any authority for the ruling that a presumption against the plaintiff, arising upon facts detailed in the preliminary affidavits, is to be explained by evidence to the jury; or for the observation of the Court below, in its opinion on the motion for a new trial, that "sometimes the facts and circumstances connected with the destruction have been submitted to the jury to be passed upon by them in considering their verdict," unless such facts and circumstances were disclosed in the evidence offered to the jury after the question of the admissibility of secondary evidence had been disposed of by the Court. . . . The secondary evidence being admitted, it became the province of the jury to judge of its credit and weight. It took the place of the primary evidence, and was entitled to the same consideration. It was a substitute for the original notes, and if sufficiently full as to their contents, it placed the plaintiff in the same position in Court as though the secondary evidence had never been required. (Jackson v. Betts, 9 Cow. 208.) The distinction between primary and secondary evidence has reference to its quality, and not to its strength. Secondary evidence may be equally conclusive as primary. In the present case, the former existence of the notes, their contents, their execution by the intestate to Bagley & Sinton, and their assignment to the plaintiff, were fully established by the secondary evidence; yet the consideration of this evidence was taken from the jury by the instructions. . . .

The judgment of the Court below is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

306. PRUSSING v. JACKSON

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1904

208 Ill. 85; 69 N. E. 771

WRIT of Error to the Appellate Court for the First District; — heard in that Court on writ of error to the Circuit Court of Cook County; the Hon. GEORGE W. BROWN, Judge, presiding.

Ernest Saunders, for plaintiff in error. It is not matter of course to allow secondary evidence of the contents of an instrument in suit on proof of its destruction. The motive and intent of the destruction are necessary to be shown before secondary proof will be admitted. Bagley v. McMickle, 9 Cal. 430. Secondary evidence of contents of a document cannot be given if the original is in possession of a stranger unless a subpoena duces tecum be served, or if the original is in the possession of an adverse party, unless notice to produce be served. . . .

Collins & Fletcher, for defendant in error. . . .

Mr. Justice BOGGS delivered the opinion of the Court.

This was an action for libel, against the plaintiff in error by the defendant in error. The declaration charged that the plaintiff in error composed and caused to be published in the Chicago "Times-Herald," a daily newspaper published in the city of Chicago, a certain false, scandalous, defamatory and libelous article, set forth in haec verba, with appropriate innuendoes, in the declaration. . . . The plaintiff in error filed the plea of not guilty, and the cause was submitted for trial before the Court and a jury. The jury returned a general verdict finding the plaintiff in error to be guilty and assessing the damages of defendant in error at the sum of $20,000. . . .

We think, however, the plaintiff in error has lawful right to complain of an erroneous ruling of the Court as to the admissibility of evidence. It was sought to maintain the action against the plaintiff in error as the author of the alleged libelous publication which appeared in the Chicago "Times-Herald." He was in nowise connected with the management, control or publication of the newspaper and had no interest therein. The action was against him on the alleged ground that he was the author of a statement, in the form of a letter, which appeared as a part of the publication, and that he had given, or permitted one Varian, a reporter for the newspaper, to take, the letter under such circumstances as that he should be held to have procured it to be published. The cause was tried before the Court and a jury.

The defendant in error, plaintiff below, was produced as a witness in his own behalf, and, among other things, testified that he, together with one William B. Kent, had an interview with the plaintiff in error. . . . Counsel for the defendant in error then produced a copy of the newspaper which contained the alleged libelous publication and asked the witness if that was the statement about which they were talking. The plaintiff in error then objected. . . .

We think the objections preferred by counsel for the plaintiff in error called upon the Court to rule whether the printed publication was admissible in evidence without the production of the writing of which the plaintiff in error was the author and which it was asserted had been reproduced in the printed article, and which, so reproduced, constituted the alleged libel. Counsel for the defendant in error insist that no definite and specific objection of that nature was made. . . . Counsel for the defendant in error read to the Court the notice which had been served calling for the production of the original writing in Court. In response to this, counsel for the plaintiff in error stated in open Court that the document was not in their possession or in the possession of their client and had never been in their possession, and had not been in the possession of their client since it was taken from his office by a Mr. Varian, a reporter for the "Times-Herald." . . . The printed article was then received in evidence and read to the jury. . . .

We find that the defendant in error produced as a witness one Herman L. Reiwitch, city editor of the Chicago "Times-Herald," for the purpose of laying the foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence of the contents of the manuscript, which was in the handwriting of the plaintiff in error, by showing that the original had been lost or that it was not in the power of the defendant in error to produce the same. The testimony of this witness was received by the Court as sufficient to justify the admission of such secondary proof.

In this the Court was in error. This witness, after stating that he had charge of the department of the "Times-Herald," office in which the printed article in question was prepared, testified further, to quote from the abstract, as follows:

"I saw something similar to it in the afternoon preceding the day of the publication. One of the reporters brought it to me. His name was Varian. I do not know where Varian is now. It is about one and one-half years since he has been connected with the Chicago 'Herald.' I don't recall whether letter was in manuscript or typewritten."

Q. — "Is that 'Exhibit I' that you hold in your hand a copy of a communication that Mr. Varian brought you, or not?" (Objection by defendant; sustained.)

Q. — "Of what is that a copy, if you know?" (Objection by defendant; overruled and exception.) A. — "To the best of my recollection it is a reproduction of that letter brought in by Mr. Varian. I don't recall whether any name was appended to that letter. . . ."

Judge COLLINS. — "Have you made search for that paper writing?" (Objection by defendant as leading; overruled and exception.) A. — "No, sir."

Q. — "Have you ordered a search made?" A. — "No, sir; it would be absolutely impossible to find it now." (Objected to by defendant as not responsive.)

Witness. — "We destroy manuscript of that kind within a few days after they are used, unless there is some particular occasion for saving it." (Motion to strike out by defendant; denied and exception.) "This was saved for, I think, some little time. Can I state the circumstances under which it was saved?" A. — "Yes."

A. — "The letter was of a peculiar character, of course, and I thought perhaps it might be questioned." (Objection by defendant and ordered stricken out.) "And I told the reporter to keep that letter." (Answer objected to by defendant.)

The Court. — "What did you do with it? Have you got it now?"

A. — "No, sir."

Judge COLLINS. — "It has been destroyed, has it?" A. — "So far as I know, it is destroyed."

Mr. Saunders. — "You don't know whether it is destroyed or not, do you?" A. — "No, sir. The original letter was kept by the reporter. There is no particular place in the 'Herald' office where such matters are kept."

Q. — "If this has been preserved by the 'Herald' company where would you go to find it?" (Objection by defendant; overruled and exception.) A. — "It would be in my possession, most likely." (Answer objected to by defendant with motion to strike out.

Q. — "This article is not now in your possession?" A. — "No, sir."

This evidence was insufficient to justify the admission of secondary evidence as to the contents of the communication which was written by the plaintiff in error. The witness testified that search had not been made for the writing; that while it was the custom to destroy manuscripts of that kind, there was an exception to that custom when occasion required, and that under this exception the manuscript in question was saved and not destroyed; that it was given to Varian, the reporter, to be kept by him; that if it had been preserved by the "Herald" company it would most likely be in his (the witness') possession, but that it was kept by said Varian. No effort to procure the manuscript from Varian was proven. It was shown that Varian was not in the employ of the "Times-Herald"; but no attempt was made to show but that he continued to reside in the city, or that he could not be found, or that any effort had been made to find him or to get the paper from him.

The rule is, in order to let in secondary evidence of the contents of a written instrument the person in whose possession it was last traced must be produced, unless shown to be impossible, in which case search among his papers must be proved, if that can be done. In all events, search must be made for the paper with the utmost good faith, and be as thorough and vigilant as if the rule were that all benefit of the paper would be lost unless it be found. Mariner v. Saunders, 5 Gilm. 113; Sturges v. Hart, 45 Ill. 103; Chicago & Northwestern Railway Co. v. Ingersoll, 65 id. 399; Williams v. Case, 79 id. 356. . . .

The judgment of the Appellate Court and that of the Circuit Court are each reversed, and the cause will be remanded to the Circuit Court for such other and further proceedings as to law and justice shall appertain. Reversed and remanded.

307. ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LE MERCHANT

2 T. R. 201

INFORMATION for the illegal importation of tea. In the course of the trial, the Attorney General offered to read some letters concerning this tea, which had been sent by the defendant to Channon, a witness for the crown, which letters were proved to have come to the defendant's hands under an order made by the Lord Chancellor for the delivery up to him of all papers and letters seized under a commission of bankrupt against Channon, among which were these letters. The solicitor of the excise had contrived to take copies of them whilst they were in the hands of the clerk of the commission; and notice having been given to the defendant to produce the original letters, and that being refused, the Attorney General offered to read these copies.

This was objected to by the counsel for the defendant, upon the ground principally, that a defendant in a criminal case was never bound to produce evidence against himself; that he was guilty of no crime in not producing them; and that the Attorney General had no right to call upon him to produce them, or ask a single question concerning them; consequently no copies could be admitted in evidence.

But EYRE, Baron, admitted the evidence, though he said he had some doubt about it. . . .

SMYTHE, L. C. B. First, it was objected, that copies of letters or papers in the hands of the adversary ought not to be read in criminal cases; that was one general objection. And the other, that supposing, for argument's sake, they ought to be admitted, yet in this particular instance the notice which was given was not sufficient. As to the first objection, that copies are not admissible in any criminal case, because that would be to oblige a man to produce evidence against himself; in answer to it, I do not recollect that they have produced any one case to show any difference at all as to the rule of evidence in criminal, and in civil cases; therefore the rule of evidence in both cases is the same, that is, to have the best evidence that is in the power of the party to produce, which means that, if the original can possibly be had, it shall be required, but if that original be destroyed, or if it be in the hands of the opposite party who will not produce it, then in case of a deed, a counter one, or sometimes a copy of the deed, or copy of the paper, is evidence to be admitted. . . .

It was likewise said, in support of the motion, that the reason why copies are permitted to be evidence in common cases is because the party who has them in his custody, and does not produce them, is in some fault for not producing them; it is considered as a misbehavior in him in not producing them, and therefore in criminal cases a man who does not produce them is in no fault at all, and for that reason a copy is not admitted. But I do not take that to be the rule; it is not founded upon any misbehavior of the party, or considering him in fault; but the rule is this: the copies are admitted when the originals are in the adversary's hands for the same reason as when the originals are lost by accident; the reason is because the party has not the originals to produce. . . .

Another objection has been made that this notice is not sufficient; the answer is, I know no difference between the rule of evidence in civil and criminal cases. Then, if there be no such difference, the rule which has always been followed and allowed in civil cases is that notice be given to the attorney or agent of the adverse party. Now in this case, without going minutely into the consideration, whether the notice was proved to the defendant himself, and was good, here is unquestionable notice proved to Sayer who is the agent and solicitor of Le Merchant, into whose hands it appears that these letters had actually been delivered; and then there is a notice likewise to Davy, who is the attorney for the defendant in this very cause, and no attempt was made on the part of the defendant to prove what was become of these letters, or that it was not in his power to produce them. Rule discharged.

308. LAWRENCE v. CLARK. (1845. Exchequer. 14 M. & W. 250, 253). ALDERSON, B. All these cases depend on their particular circumstances; and the question in each case is whether the notice was given in reasonable time to enable the plaintiff to be prepared to produce the document at the time of the trial. POLLOCK, C. B. What is sufficient in one case may not be so in another; and much therefore must be left to the discretion of the presiding judge, subject, of course, to correction by the Court.

309. DWYER v. COLLINS

7 Exch. 639

ACTION by the indorsee against the acceptor of a bill of exchange; to which the defendant pleaded, inter alia, that the bill was given for a gaming debt.

On the trial, before the Lord Chief Baron, the defendant proceeded to prove his plea; and for that purpose gave evidence of the gaming, and swore that the only bill he ever gave to the drawer of the bill which was declared on, was by way of payment of the debt then incurred. The defendant's counsel, being required to prove that the identical bill declared upon was that which was given on that occasion, called for the bill, which the plaintiff's counsel declined to produce. . . . The plaintiff's attorney having admitted that the bill was in his possession and in Court, the defendant's counsel called for its production; which being refused, he then offered to give secondary evidence of its contents. . . . The plaintiff's counsel objected that there ought to have been a previous notice to produce; and the Lord Chief Baron, after consulting the judges, ruled in favor of the defendants.

Humfrey obtained a rule nisi accordingly. . . .

Hawkins (James with him) showed cause. . . . The notice to produce the bill was given in sufficient time, as it was shown that that document was at the time in Court. . . . In Lawrence v. Clark, [ante, No. 308], where to a declaration upon a bill of exchange the defendant pleaded a plea of fraud and covin, it was held that the plaintiff was not bound to produce the bill on the trial without a notice given in due time; and Alderson, B., in his judgment, says — "All these cases depend on their particular circumstances, and the question in each is, whether the notice was given in reasonable time to enable the plaintiff to be prepared to produce the document at the time of the trial." . . . (Parke, B. . . . The question really turns upon the principle of the rule on which a notice to produce is required. In Starkie on Evidence, p. 404, the rule is laid down in the following terms: — "Proof that the adversary or his attorney has the deed or other instrument in Court does not supersede the necessity of notice; for the object of the notice is not merely to enable the party to bring the instrument itself into Court, but also to provide such evidence as the exigency of the case may require to support or impeach the instrument." If, on the other hand, the object of the notice is to require the production of a particular document, or, in case the document is not produced, to authorize the party giving the notice to give secondary evidence of the contents of that document, then all that is necessary is that the notice should be given in sufficient time to the opposite party to enable him to be ready to produce the document at the trial. I have always been of opinion that this is the true object of the notice; and if this be so, the inquiry relating to the sufficiency of the notice is a simple one; but if the proposition laid down by Mr. Starkie in his work be correct, the inquiry would often be one of an extremely complicated character; for it might depend upon the nature of the document and many extrinsic circumstances.) . . .

The Court then called upon

Udal (with whom was Humfrey) to support the rule. . . . The notice was insufficient. The authorities and text-writers are expressly in favor of the plaintiff upon this point. . . .

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by

PARKE, B. . . . We do not propose to . . . consider the question, whether the pleadings themselves give as much notice that the bill will be the subject of inquiry as they do in an action of trover for a written instrument, where a notice to produce is unnecessary — it having been decided by the Court of Queen's Bench in Read v. Gamble, 10 A. & E. 597, n., and in Goodered v. Armour, 3 Q. B. 596, and followed by this Court in Lawrence v. Clark, 14 M. & W. 250, that in a case like the present the pleadings do not give constructive notice. We wish to decide this case upon the more general ground, the principal subject of the argument at the bar. . . .

Whether, on his refusal, it was competent for the defendant to give secondary evidence of its contents, no previous notice to produce having been given. We are of opinion that the ruling of my Lord Chief Baron was right. . . .

The question is whether, the bill being admitted to be in court, parol evidence was admissible on its non-production, or whether a previous notice to produce was necessary. On principle, the answer must depend on the reason why notice to produce is required. If it be to give his opponent notice that such a document will be used by a party to the cause, so that he may be enabled to prepare evidence, to explain or confirm it, then no doubt a notice at the trial, though the document be in Court, is too late. But if it be merely to enable the party to have the document in Court, to produce it if he likes, and if he does not, to enable the opponent to give parol evidence, — if it be merely to exclude the argument that the opponent has not taken all reasonable means to procure the original (which he must do before he can be permitted to make use of secondary evidence), then the demand of production at the trial is sufficient. . . . If this [the former] be the true reason, the measure of the reasonable length of notice would not be the time necessary to procure the document — a comparatively simple inquiry, — but the time necessary to procure evidence to explain or support it, — a very complicated one, depending on the nature of the plaintiff's case and the document itself and its bearing on the cause; and in practice such matters have never been inquired into, but only the time with reference to the custody of the document and the residence and convenience of the party to whom notice has been given, and the like. We think the plaintiff's alleged principle is not the true one on which notice to produce is required, but that it is merely to give a sufficient opportunity to the opposite party to produce it and thereby secure if he pleases the best evidence of the contents; and a request to produce immediately is quite sufficient for that purpose, if it be in court. . . .

We think that the rule must be discharged; and it would be some scandal to the administration of the law if the plaintiff's objection had prevailed. Rule discharged.

310. UNITED STATES v. DOEBLER

United States District Court. 1832

Baldw. 519; 25 Fed. Cas. 883

[Indictment for forging a bank-note. . . . After evidence of the forging of the note in question], one Empich was examined, who proved that at the Lancaster races, at the time testified by Rallston, the defendant delivered him a twenty dollar note, stating that it was not good, and requested the witness to play it off at a faro table, which he did not do, but after some time returned it to the defendant. Mr. Gilpin, after stating that this note was not the subject of an indictment, but that the evidence in relation to it was offered to prove the scienter as to the notes charged in the indictment, asked the witness to describe the twenty dollar note, as to the bank, etc., it was on, which was objected to, on the ground that this was matter collateral to the indictment, of which notice ought to have been given to the defendant, and that it was not evidence of the scienter, because the delivery of the note to Empich was subsequent to the delivery of the note which was the subject matter of the indictment; and the question was elaborately argued. . . .

Baldwin, J. . . . As the intention and knowledge with which the act is done, constitute the crime, it may be made out by evidence of other acts of a similar kind with that charged in the indictment. This being the well settled and well known rule in such cases, the prisoner cannot be taken by surprise; when such evidence is offered, he must come prepared to meet not only the evidence which applies directly to the specific act charged, but all other acts which, according to the known rules of evidence, a prosecutor may adduce to prove the act charged. If the note he is charged with forging, passing, or delivering, is of the same kind with others which he has disposed of or retained in his possession, he has notice in effect that, if practicable to procure it, evidence will be given of their counterfeit character, and of his having passed them as true. It is notice in law, by which a party is as much bound both in civil and in criminal cases as by notice in effect. Notice in fact is notice in form; notice in law is notice in effect; and either are sufficient. . . .

Knowing that proof of all these facts is as competent to the prosecutor as the one specifically charged, no injustice is done him.

He ought to answer for, and be prepared to meet them, on the same rules of evidence which apply to the principal act for which he is on trial. The indictment is notice of that, and we think it also notice of the other acts, which are as admissible in evidence as the one charged. . . . The indictment in all cases of forgery, is in itself notice that all competent evidence will be produced; the defendant cannot, therefore, be taken by surprise, when the passing of any other forged notes of a manufacture similar to the one laid in the indictment is offered; whether the mode of proof is by the production of letters, copies, or proof of their contents, or by the notes, is immaterial, so that the evidence conduces to prove the scienter as to the one charged.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the evidence of . . . the note delivered by the defendant to Empich is admissible. . . .

The jury found the defendant not guilty.

311. EURE v. PITTMAN

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA. 1824

3 Hawks 364

THE plaintiffs offered for probate a paper writing as the last will and testament of Edward Crowell, deceased; there was a caveat in the county court, and after trial there it was carried by appeal to the superior court. The wife of the legatee named in the paper (Thomas W. Crowell, son of Edward) is now one of the plaintiffs. . . .

The defendant contended that this will was revoked by a subsequent will made by Edward Crowell, and that the last will had been destroyed or suppressed by the plaintiffs or by those under whom they derived an interest, or by some other person under their advice and procurement, and offered to prove the same by the subscribing witnesses to the last will. This was objected to by the plaintiffs, because they had no notice to produce the will. The Court was of opinion, that if the plaintiffs had the last will or had been the cause of its suppression, or claimed under those who had, then such conduct would be illegal and fraudulent, and the defendant was not bound to give notice to produce it in order to be let into parol proof of its contents. The plaintiffs further objected to any parol proof of its contents. . . .

The defendant then called as witnesses, Jacob Pope and his daughter. Pope deposed that Edward Crowell died on Wednesday. On the preceding Sunday, May 26, 1820, he came to the house of Pope, with a paper writing in his hand, having his name signed to it, and said that it was his last will and testament, and requested Pope to attest it; Pope did subscribe it as a witness in Crowell's presence. . . . The defendant then produced another witness, who swore that Crowell, on the 27th of May, 1820, placed the last mentioned will in the possession of one Rebecca Tillery, who was the sister of Mrs. Eure, one of the plaintiffs, and who resided at the house of Mrs. Eure's then husband, Thomas W. Crowell, only son of the testator. . . . Rebecca Tillery was summoned by both parties, but did not appear. . . .

[The Court thus instructed the jury:] The jury should, if they believed the evidence, find the paper now offered to be the last will of Edward Crowell, unless they should be of opinion, from all the evidence, that the last will had been suppressed by the plaintiffs, or those under whom the plaintiffs claim, or by their advice or procurement; in that case, they ought to find a verdict for the defendant, because they might presume a revocation or contradictory devises from the fact of suppression. But if the jury should be of opinion that Rebecca Tillery, of her own accord, destroyed the last will without the consent or knowledge of the plaintiffs, or those under whom they now claim, or if the testator destroyed it, then, in either of these events, they should find for the plaintiffs. . . .

Verdict for defendant; judgment accordingly, and appeal by plaintiffs.

Gaston, for appellant. 1. Evidence of the execution or contents of the last will was improper under the circumstances. The principle on which we object is that the best evidence is required; the instrument itself shall always be produced if possible. . . . If it was in the possession of the plaintiffs, they should have had notice to produce it. 2 Term R., 201–2.

There was here no proof of its destruction, no subpoena duces tecum to the witness, no notice to the plaintiffs to produce it; in short, no pains taken at all to procure the best evidence, or furnish a legal ground for the admission of inferior testimony. . . .

Seawell, contra. The principle upon which notice to produce a paper is required, is to prevent surprise, where, from the nature of the controversy, it is uncertain whether such evidence will be material on the trial. . . . Here there could be no surprise. If the plaintiffs had possession of the will, it was a fraud to attempt the proof of the prior will, and in such case no notice is necessary. . . .

Reply: . . . The bare circumstance of a party not having it in his power to produce a paper is not sufficient reason for admitting parol evidence. . . . It seems there is no case where parol evidence has been admitted merely because the paper is in the hands of a third person and a subpoena duces tecum has been refused. . . .

Taylor, C. J.—There is no proof that the second will was ever in the plaintiff's possession, and therefore a notice to produce it would be totally unnecessary. But there is evidence that the will was placed by the testator in the hands of Rebecca Tillery, since which period it has been traced no farther. Now the ground upon which the defendant offers proof of the execution of the will is the charge of suppression against the plaintiff, or those under whom she claims. It appears to me that this fact should be first established by the best evidence the nature of the case admits of, that is, the testimony of Rebecca Tillery and the production of the paper enforced by a subpoena duces tecum.

I understand it to be an elementary rule that, when the ground of admitting the secondary evidence is the loss of the original, it ought to be shown that diligent inquiry has been made; and the last person into whose possession the paper has been traced should be called to give an account of it. . . . In all such cases the invariable rule is for the Court to pronounce, in the first instance, whether there is sufficient proof of the loss or destruction of the paper, or whether sufficient inquiry has been made to render parol evidence of the contents admissible. But here the whole evidence, that of the suppression of the instrument, and the secondary evidence of its execution, was all submitted to the jury in the first instance, for which practice I cannot find a single authority. And the principle of evidence is directly opposed to it; for if the Court had pronounced in the first instance whether the evidence of the suppression was sufficient to authorize the secondary evidence, it seems evident to me that it must have been rejected, both for its insufficiency as to the suppression and its defect in not showing that proper inquiries respecting the paper had been made of Rebecca Tillery; and then all the evidence respecting the execution of the will, and the inferences drawn from it that it operated a revocation of the first will, must have been excluded. The danger of such evidence consists in this, that it may unconsciously influence the judgment of the jury, and make impressions upon it which no subsequent advice of the Court will be able to deface. The effect of such a procedure in this case has been that, because the will was placed in the hands of Rebecca Tillery, who was a sister to the wife of the younger Crowell, the jury have inferred a suppression by him or by her; and because it was suppressed it was further inferred that it amounted to a revocation of the first will; a string of inferences that might have been broken by the testimony of Rebecca Tillery or by inquiries of her. The paper might have been produced, and might have turned out not to be a will, or, if a will, not amounting to a revocation of the first. . . .

HALL, J. — I think the defendants ought not to have been permitted to prove the execution and existence of another and subsequent will before they made it appear to the Court that they had made reasonable efforts to procure it. . . . For the reason I have first assigned, I think there should be a new trial.

HENDERSON, J., dissenting — The paper which the defendants allege revoked the will in question, not belonging to them or being within their control, excuses them for its non-production on the trial, for the law imposes on no one a thing beyond his power. If the paper is alleged to be in the possession of the adversary, notice must be given to him to produce it on the trial before parol evidence shall be received of its contents; but if it is destroyed, no such notice is necessary. These preliminary facts to let in the secondary evidence, both as to their truth and sufficiency when shown, belong to the Court, and not to the jury. See a very clear and able opinion on the latter question delivered by Judge SPENCER in 16 Johns. 193.

But neither of these questions arises in the present case. . . . From these facts the defendant insisted that Crowell had destroyed the latter writing, and that "in odium spoliatoris" the jury should presume either that the writing contained a clause of revocation or was inconsistent with the will offered. There was no parol evidence of the contents of the will by copy, or other evidence of a like kind; nor was any argument drawn of its being a revocation, but from the fact of its destruction by Crowell, or some one by his connivance or direction. With the fact of destruction the Court had nothing to do, nor with inferences to be drawn from it. They both belonged to the jury. They were not preliminary questions to the introduction of secondary evidence; for this reason notice to produce the original was unnecessary. And here there was no inferior evidence offered; it was all primary; for every fact deposed to went to the making and destruction of the paper. Whether they were sufficient to establish them belonged to the jury.

312. BOWDEN v. ACHOR

95 Ga. 243

EQUITABLE petition. Before Judge CLARK. Clayton Superior Court. March Term, 1894. [Petition to set aside deeds obtained by fraud from the petitioner, Lou Achor.] She was the daughter of Nancy Wright, who before her death owned lots 8, 9 and 24 in the 13th district of Clayton county. . . . On September 28, 1887, Nancy Wright by will devised these three lots to petitioner, her only child. . . .

About November 9, 1891, one Morris, with his attorney Albert, visited petitioner's home in Alabama, and after securing the services and influence of J. M. Phillips, who was known by them to be the friend and adviser of petitioner, falsely and fraudulently represented to her that her attorneys could do nothing for her, and by all kinds of misrepresentations and fraudulent practices induced her to sign some kind of paper, she did not know what, except that the same was without consideration save the paltry sum of $100, conveying the land. She has been informed and believes that the $100 was paid by them to Phillips, as the price of his influence with her to induce her to sign papers of their own drawing. She is now informed that this last mentioned paper is claimed to be a deed to Bowden, but he was not present and she believes knew nothing about it and has never even seen the paper. . . .

Under the evidence and charge of the Court, the jury found for the plaintiff. . . . Bowden and Morris moved for a new trial, which was denied; and they excepted. The grounds of the motion proper to be here stated are, in brief, as follows: . . . Error in refusing to allow W. J. Albert to testify, that the power of attorney shown him by Monroe Phillips on November 9, 1891, was from plaintiff, giving Phillips authority to bring suit for the land in dispute, or to compromise whatever right plaintiff might have in said land, but the right to sign conveyances being retained in plaintiff; and that Monroe Phillips was, on November 9, 1891, and ever since had been a citizen of Alabama. This was excluded on the ground that the power of attorney was the best evidence; defendant's counsel contending that as the paper was out of the jurisdiction of the Court, its contents could thus be shown. . . .

LUMPKIN, Justice. . . . Where a paper of any kind is material as bearing upon the issue under investigation, the paper itself is generally the best evidence of its contents. Secondary evidence may be resorted to when the original is inaccessible. The Courts of this State have no power to compel the production of a paper in the possession, custody or control of a person in another State, when such person is not a party to the cause. In such an instance, the paper may well be said to be inaccessible. If it were a duly recorded paper of which a legally certified copy could be obtained, it might be incumbent upon the party desiring the benefit of this evidence to produce such a copy; but where no such secondary evidence is obtainable, a witness may be permitted to testify to the contents of the original, if within his personal knowledge and he is competent to do so. In this connection see Lunday et ux v. Thomas et al., 26 Ga. 537. . . . Judgment reversed.

313. SHEA v. SEWERAGE & WATER BOARD

SUPREME COURT OF LOUISIANA. 1909

124 La. 299; 50 So. 166

APPEAL from Civil District Court, Parish of Orleans; FREDERIC DURIEVE KING, Judge. Action by Thomas J. Shea against the Sewerage & Water Board of New Orleans. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The plaintiff, T. J. Shea, was awarded contracts C. & F. of the numerous contracts for the laying of sewers and appurtenances in the city of New Orleans. He completed contract F., and had constructed the sewers under contract C., and had cleaned the most of them, ready for inspection, when differences arose between him and the defendant board, over the responsibility for failures which had developed in the sewers, which led him to abandon the contract and bring this suit. He avers that he fulfilled these contracts, and demands $145,483.60, which, he alleges, is the balance due him. The claim is divided into amounts for regular work under the contracts, for extras, and for damages. The claims for extras and damages are itemized in exhibits annexed to the petition.

The defenses are a general denial and the special defenses; that plaintiff was paid all that was due under contract F; that he abandoned contract C incomplete; that there was to his credit at that time on the books of defendant $79,607.28; but that defendant has since then completed the sewers at the expense of plaintiff, as it had a right to do under the contract, at a cost of $54,014.92, and has, moreover, expended, in repairing damage caused by plaintiff and in other extra work, as set forth in detail, $1,564.26; that these expenses offset pro tanto the said credit of plaintiff; and that plaintiff owes, in addition, $41,100, liquidated damages for delay in the completion of said contract, being 411 days at $100 per day, as stipulated in said contract, which more than offsets the balance to the credit of plaintiff, leaving him indebted to the defendant in the sum of $16,378.90, for which defendant prays judgment. . . .

Omer Villere (E. H. Block and Thomas H. Thorpe, of counsel), for appellants.

McCloskey & Benedict and Clegg & Quintero, for appellee.

PROVOSTY, J. (after stating the facts as above). Coming to the consideration of the items which compose the demand of plaintiff, and of the character of evidence and degree of proof which ought to be required of plaintiff, we find that defendant would hold plaintiff to the same strictness of proof as if the case involved but one item and were a mere ordinary case of a plaintiff suing on an open account. But, manifestly, that view cannot be accepted. On that theory the trial of the case, which occupied the lower court some eight months, 128 actual trial days, would have occupied it eight years. The plaintiff, the members of the defendant board, the judge, the lawyers, and the witnesses would all have had time to die before the evidence could have been taken. As matters stand, the case has monopolized the time of the courts far beyond all reasonable limits. By express terms of the contract, the defendant was entitled to have its inspector keep an account of every hour of labor and every piece of material that went into the work, and such an account was kept, and a daily report made of it to defendant, and defendant has these reports in his possession. By means of these reports and of the other data in its office, the defendant could have put its fingers upon every cent of overcharge, if any, contained in the exhibits presented by the plaintiff. These exhibits are models of clearness and precision. They are easily intelligible even to the non-expert. They show exactly what every cent is charged for. As a matter of fact, the engineer of plaintiff and the engineers of the defendant board went over these exhibits together and agreed as to most of the items, and have on the witness stand given the reasons why they disagreed as to the others.

With respect to the admissibility in evidence of summaries, or complications, such as these exhibits, the law is stated by Wigmore, as follows:

"Where a fact could be ascertained only by the inspection of a large number of documents made up of very numerous detailed statements — as, the net balance result from a year's vouchers of a treasurer or a year's account in a bank ledger, — it is obvious that it would often be practically out of the question to apply the present principle by requiring the production of the entire mass of documents and entries to be perused by the jury or read aloud to them. The convenience of trials demands that other evidence be allowed to be offered, in the shape of the testimony of a competent witness who has perused the entire mass and will state summarily the net results. Such a practice is well established to be proper. Most courts require, as a condition that the mass thus summarily testified to shall, if the occasion seems to require it, be placed at hand in the court, or at least be made accessible to the opposing party in order that the material for cross-examination may be available." Wigmore, Evidence, § 1230, p. 1473. See, also, Greenleaf, Evidence (16th Ed.) Vol. I, p. 690; State v. Mathis, 106 La. 263, 30 So. 834.

The requirement that the "mass" or data from which such a compilation has been made should be offered in evidence has been complied with in this case. The said data consists of the reports of plaintiff's foremen on the work, of the notes and calculations of measurements made by the engineer of plaintiff, and of the sheets of defendant's monthly estimates. Only in a few unimportant instances are the compilations not based upon the data in the record. Of these foremen's reports alone there are 2,730. Of the estimates there are 47 large sheets covered with small figures, the labor of going through which would be simply stupendous. Of the other data, there is a large number of bound volumes. . . . We think that, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, and in view of the practical impossibility of trying the case in any other way, the Court can accept the said exhibits as correct, except as to the items specially objected to; and the trial Court is, accordingly, directed so to do. The items specially objected to, we now proceed to consider and pass on, in so far as the condition of the record will permit.

314. Chief Baron Gilbert. Evidence (ante 1726, fol. 7). Records, being the precedents of the demonstrations of justice, to which every man has a common right to have recourse, cannot be transferred place to place to serve a private purpose; and therefore they have a common repository, from whence they ought not to be removed but by the authority of some other Court; and this is in the treasury of Westminster. And this piece of law is plainly agreeable to all manner of reason and justice; for if one man might demand a record to serve his own occasions, by the same reason any other person might demand it; but both could not possibly possess it at the same time in different places, and therefore it must be kept in one certain place in common for them both. Besides, these records, by being daily removed, would be in great danger of being lost. And consequently, it is on all hands convenient that these monuments of justice should be fixed in a certain place, and that they should not be transferred from thence but by public authority from superior justice. The copies of records must be allowed in evidence, for . . . the rule of evidence demands no farther than to produce the best that the nature of the thing is capable of; for to tie men up to the original that is fixed to a place, and cannot be had, is to totally discard their evidence, . . . for then the rules of law and right would be the authors of injury, which is the highest absurdity.

315. Rex v. Gordon. (1781. Dougl. 572, Reporter's note). It is a general notion, that copies of nothing but records are admissible, if the originals exist; and I remember a motion by Dunning, in M. 12 Geo. 3, (27 Nov. 1771), for a rule on the East India Company, to show cause, why they should not permit their original transfer books to be produced, on the ground that copies from them could not be read. He, on that occasion, stated the principle to be what I have just mentioned, and said there had been many nonsuits for want of producing the original journals of the House of Commons. But the Court denied the rule to be as he stated it, and mentioned several instances where copies of matters, not of record, are admissible; as copies of court-rolls, of parish-registers, &c., and Lord MANSFIELD expressly said, that copies of the [Commons] journals are evidence, and that he particularly remembered their being admitted on a trial at bar, in a cause in which he was leading counsel for the late Sir Watkin William Wynne, against Middleton, the sheriff of Denbighshire, on an action for a false return. That Mr. Onslow, then speaker of the House of Commons, made a point with his Lordship, that the copies should be offered in evidence, though nothing would have been so easy in that case as to produce the original journals. The Court added, that the reason "ab inconvenienti," for holding it not necessary to produce records, applied, with still greater force, to such public books as the transfer books of the East India Company; for the utmost confusion would arise, if they could be transported to any the most distant part of the kingdom, whenever their contents should be thought material on the trial of a cause. . . .

The correct principle, therefore, seems to be as laid down by Lord HOLT, in a case of Lynche v. Clerke, viz., "That, whenever an original is of a public nature, and would be evidence if produced, an immediate sworn copy thereof will be evidence." 3 Salk. 154, [post, No. 318.]

316. HENNELL v. LYON

1. B. & Ald. 182

ASSUMPSIT for goods sold by plaintiff to intestate. Plea, 1. Non assumpsit. 2. Plene administravit. At the trial before ABBOTT, J., at the London sittings, plaintiff having proved the goods sold, in order to show assets in hand of the defendant as administrator, produced an examined copy of a bill, and an answer, purporting to be an answer by Charles Lyon to a bill filed in Chancery against him in his character of administrator of Mary Lyon. The bill was filed by Messrs. Maltby & Co., as well on their own behalf as on that of all other creditors, praying an account. The plaintiff in this action was not a party to that suit. It was objected, that that was insufficient evidence, for it was "res inter alios acta": that the plaintiff should have produced the original answer, and verified the handwriting, or he should have shown that this defendant was the defendant in that suit: that in the absence of such evidence there was no proof of identity. The learned Judge, however, received the evidence, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, Walton having obtained a rule nisi for setting aside that verdict, and entering a nonsuit.

Marryat and Platt showed cause. To prove matter of record or documents of a public nature, it is not necessary to have the original record or document, or, where it is signed, to verify the handwriting. . . .

Walton, contra. . . .

Lord ELLENBOROUGH, C. J. — The admission of copies in evidence is founded upon a principle of public convenience, in order that documents of great moment should not be ambulatory, and subject to the loss that would be incurred if they were removable. The same has been laid down in respect of proceedings in Courts, not of record, copies whereof are admitted, though not strictly of a public nature. In all these cases it may be laid down as a general principle, that copies should be received. In this case, the answer being a proceeding in a Court of Justice, must have been received there in the usual course, and verified by the person putting it in, as the answer of the person sustaining the character which it imports him to bear; and there is no question here, as to that answer having been put in by a person bearing that name and character. But it is said, that the evidence wants a further link to connect it with the defendant, and that it ought to be shown that the Charles Lyon in the answer is the present litigant. I do not know any way by which that circumstance can be supplied, but by the description in the answer itself, which tallies in almost every particular. Still, however, it may be shown that he is not the same person. . . .

BAYLEY, J. — The bill and answer being proceedings in a Court of Justice, it is of the utmost importance, that the originals should be preserved; and great inconvenience would result if they were moved about from place to place; and indeed they might be wanted at more than one place at the same time. On this ground, therefore, such proceedings are provable by examined copies. Then the question is, whether the copy of the answer in this case was sufficient, or whether the identity should not also have been proved; but I think that it did afford prima facie evidence, to show that the defendant was the same person. . . .

HOLROYD, J. — I am of the same opinion, that the copy of the bill and answer was properly received. It has been holden from the time of HOLT, C. J., that where the original itself is evidence, the immediate copy of the original is also evidence. . . . Rule discharged.

317. CLEMENT v. GRAHAM

SUPREME COURT OF VERMONT. 1905

78 Vt. 290; 63 Atl. 146

PETITION for Mandamus to the Auditor of Accounts, brought to the Supreme Court for Rutland County at its October Term, 1904. Heard at the January Term, 1905, on petition, answer, and testimony taken and filed. The opinion fully states the case.

Cowles and Moulton, for the relator. The vouchers required by law to be kept in the office of the State Auditor are public records. . . . A citizen and taxpayer, having a legitimate purpose for so doing, has a right, at proper times and under reasonable regulations, to examine public records. . . .

W. W. Miles, and Horace F. Graham, for the defendant. . . . A public record is a written memorial made by a public officer, who is authorized by law to make it. That term does not include the files and papers from which the record is made. . . . If these vouchers are public records, in order to make it the duty of defendant to exhibit them to the relator, he must allege and prove that he has a pecuniary interest in them. . . .

Watson, J. — This is a complaint for mandamus to the Auditor of Accounts commanding him forthwith and without delay to exhibit the vouchers on file in his office to the relator, or to his agent and attorney. . . . The defendant denies that the vouchers which the relator wished to inspect are public records, and if this contention is sound it is decisive against the existence of the right of inspection claimed by the relator.

1. Of what do the vouchers consist? In determining this question, it becomes necessary to examine the statute prescribing the auditor's duties. By Vermont Statutes, . . . Sec. 305, "He shall require all bills presented to him for allowance to be fully itemized and accompanied, as far as possible, with vouchers, which shall be kept in his office." . . . The term "bill," as used in the last named section, includes all claims and accounts which by law may be presented to the auditor for allowance; and the term "vouchers," as there used, includes all books, papers, receipts, receipted bills, and documents which serve to prove the truth of the claims and accounts so presented.

It is a basic principle of evidence that where a document is of a public nature, a copy of it is evidence; for the production of the original is dispensed with on account of the inconvenience which would result from the frequent removal of public documents, and consequently the absence of the original affords no presumption of fraud. Starkie, Evidence, Part III, § 14; Lynch v. Clarke, 3 Salk. 154, 11 Eng. R. C. 450; Wigmore, Evidence, § 1218; Mattocks v. Bellamy, 8 Vt. 463.

True, under this rule, it had been held in England that copies of the books of the Bank of England and of the East India Company, and perhaps of some other companies, legally private corporations, might be used, since the books are not removable on the ground of public inconvenience. But these books have been held to be of a public nature. Thus they are brought within the rule rather than made an exception to it. Marsh v. Collnett, 2 Esp. 665, 11 Eng. R. C. 508; Doe v. Roberts, 13 M. & W. 520. The same is true regarding the books of the Bank of the State of Alabama and its branches. The banks are held to be the property of the public and their books are held to be public writings. Crawford v. Bank, 8 Ala. 79. In the case of People v. Hurst, 41 Mich. 328, the rule seems to be extended to banks generally, and there may be other instances of like nature. The generally recognized rule, however, at common law is that this principle does not apply to documents of a private nature. Respecting them, a copy is not evidence unless the original is lost, destroyed, or in the hands of a third person who cannot be compelled to produce it.

In Wigmore on Evidence, § 1218, in stating the conceivable scope of this principle allowing proof by copies, it is said among other things:

(1) "When by statute or by regulation a document in official custody is expressly or impliedly forbidden to be removed, it is clear that the principle applies and production dispensed with. (2) Where the document is one of the working documents of the office containing the official doings or being a paper made and consulted there officially in the course of office duty, it is equally clear that it need not be produced. (3) When the document is one made by a private person and filed in a public office, the principle does not apply, if a statute or regulation does not expressly require it to be filed and kept there; if it does so require, then the principle applies; although the rulings lay down no clear distinction on the subject, and most of the instances are dealt with by a statute in general or specific terms. (4) Where the document is one made by a private person and required by law to be recorded in the public office, but not to be kept there, the principle does not at common law apply. (5) Where the document is made by a public officer and is delivered, after being recorded, to a private person (as, a government land-certificate), the principle does not apply; but by statute in many instances it has either been made to apply or the record has been constituted the basis of title, so that the record, as the original being in official custody, need not be produced."

It will be observed by this classification that in all instances where by law or regulation the document is filed in a public office and required to be kept there, it is of a public nature as far as the law of evidence is concerned. The same test has often been applied, and we think rightly so, in determining the nature of books and documents in proceedings to compel the allowance of their inspection.

Claims are not to be allowed against the State unless they are based on law and are supported by evidence equivalent to testimony upon oath, or a certificate of some commissioned officer of the State officially cognizant of the claim. By the provision of the statute that vouchers shall be required by the Auditor to accompany as far as possible all bills presented for allowance, the General Assembly has declared for the production of that which, in contemplation of law, is generally the best evidence for that purpose. And that this evidence may be preserved for any future use or examination which may lawfully be had, the statute provides that the vouchers, whatever may be their specific nature, shall be filed and kept in the Auditor's office. Certainly they are within the first class named by Wigmore, and may be within the third. If vouchers so used, filed, and kept were not before of a public nature because made or presented by some other public officer in the discharge of a public duty, they thereby are stamped with that character and thenceforth are public documents. Brown v. County Treasurer, 54 Mich. 132, 52 Am. Rep. 800; Ferry v. Williams, 12 Vroom, 332, 32 Am. Rep. 219; People v. Jewell, (Mich.) 101 N. W. 835; Conran v. Williams, before cited; Clay v. Ballard, 87 Va. 787. . . .

Moreover, it would seem that all vouchers, files, papers, and records required by law to be kept in the office of the Auditor of Accounts are, by the law-making power, deemed of a public character; for at the last session of the General Assembly, the Auditor was made a certifying officer whose certified copy of any such voucher, file, paper, or record, shall be admitted in any suit, civil or criminal. And it is made his duty to furnish such copies to any person desiring the same on the payment or tender of the specified legal fee therefor. Laws of 1904, No. 24.

2. Since the vouchers in question are public documents in a public office, the question arises whether citizens and taxpayers of the State have a right to inspect them. . . .

We think it may be safely said that at common law, when not detrimental to the public interest, the right to inspect public records and public documents exists with all persons who have a sufficient interest in the subject-matter thereof to answer the requirements of the law governing that question. . . . Upon principle and authority we think the interest of the relator, as a citizen and taxpayer, in the matters and things to which the vouchers in question pertain is sufficient to entitle him to an inspection of the vouchers for the purpose which he has stated. . . .

Judgment that the prayer of the complaint is granted. . . .

Wherever an original is of a public nature, and would be evidence, if produced, an immediate sworn copy thereof will be evidence, as the copy of a bargain and sale, or of a deed inrolled, or church register, &c.; but where an original is of a private nature, a copy is not evidence, unless the original is lost or burnt.

319. PEAY v. PICKET

Court of Appeals of South Carolina. 1825

3 McC. 318

This was an action of trespass to try title to 500 acres of land, originally granted to John Heard, on the 25th of August, 1774. The plaintiff would have deduced to himself a title by deed thus: From the guarantee to William Nesbit in 1775; from Nesbit to John Dart, in 1779; from Dart to Rout, in 1779; the last will and testament of Rout in 1802, to his executors, to sell; and their title to the plaintiff, 25th February 1815.

The only question made, was whether the deed from Nesbit to Dart was sufficiently proved? The original was not produced. It was proved that diligent search had been made for it, without success, in the register's office, and among the papers of Rout, from whom the plaintiff purchased. A certified copy of it from the register's office, in Charleston, which was then the only recording office in the State, was offered in evidence; and besides the certificate of the register, it was proved, by a witness, present in Court, to be a correct copy of the record, with which he had compared it. The deed, of which this was a copy, was dated 10th August, 1779.

This copy was objected to, on the ground that a copy deed was no evidence. . . . It was contended by the counsel for the plaintiff, that after so great a lapse of time, the Court would presume that all had been done which the law required, and that the officer would not have recorded the deed unless it had been proved. And that the evidence of diligent search, without success, and the possession by the plaintiff of all the title deeds from the grant down, together with the ravages of the War of the Revolution, were circumstances sufficient to be left to the jury, and from whence to presume, that the deed had been executed from Nesbit to Dart.

The presiding judge (GANTT, J.), thought otherwise; and said that the act of 1731, (Pub. Laws, 130), admitting copy-deeds, was in abrogation of the common law, and that all acts which are so, must be construed strictly. That by the terms of the Act of Assembly, it appeared, that a copy is only admissible in evidence, when certain prerequisites have been complied with; particularly, that the deed shall have been proved in the usual way, before recorded. So that to entitle such copy to admissibility in evidence it must appear that the deed had been proved and recorded. That the paper adduced, as a copy, purported to be a deed of this land from Nesbit to Dart, but it furnished no evidence of the same having been proved in the "usual" or any other way; it also purported to have been executed in the presence of one witness only; and that the presumption arising from the want of probate of the deed was a fact from whence the conclusion was to be drawn, that it was never proved. He thought that the landed interest of the country would be secured by a tenure most precarious if the rule contended for were to prevail. . . .

The jury found a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed and moved for a new trial. 1st, Because his Honor, the presiding judge, refused to admit the copy deed from Nesbit to Dart in evidence. . . .

W. F. De Saussure, for the motion, — cited the case of Anderson v. Gilbert (1 Bay 368), where a copy of a deed of conveyance, recorded, and certified from the register's office in Charleston, as in this case, was held admissible, and was admitted without any proof of loss. . . .

Clarke, on the same side — said, copies of public records are always admissible. (Lynch v. Clark, 3 Salk. 153 [ante, No. 318].) A deed of bargain and sale recorded in a public record. (2 Black, 238.) He also cited 2 Bacon, Abridgement, 646, Tit. Evidence, A.

COLCOCK, J. — From the earliest enactments of the British parliament on the subject, to the present day, a period of about 280 years, it has been the established law of that country, that a copy of a deed, duly enrolled, is as good evidence as the original itself (Phill. 351); and I think I do not say too much, when I assert, it was generally considered to be the law of this land from the first enactment on the same subject here, in 1731 (P. L. 133), to the decision of Purvis & Robinson (1 Bay 485), a decision much to be regretted, in which it was determined that the loss of the original must be proved, to admit the introduction of the copy.

But in conformity with that decision, which is considered as obligatory on us, I think the plaintiff entitled to a new trial. All the circumstances of the case and the evidence offered, together with the historical facts of the country, afford sufficient proof of the loss to have authorized the introduction of the office copy; for we are not warranted by any thing in the decision itself of Purvis & Robinson, to suppose that any other evidence of loss was intended than such as is required by the rules of the common law. . . . Now, what are the circumstances and the proof before us in this case? The plaintiff makes out a long chain of title, consisting of seven links, tracing a title back to a grant made in 1774. One of the links in his chain is broken. A deed from Nesbit to Dart, executed in 1779, is lost. To supply the place of which, he offers a copy taken from the register's office in Charleston. He proves that he has made diligent search for it everywhere. But from the facts of the case, connected with the history of the times, in which this deed was made and recorded, there arises a presumption, stronger than is afforded in one case in a thousand, that the deed was lost or destroyed by the enemies of the country. In which case, no further evidence is necessary to be produced. For when it is proved that a deed is destroyed, it follows that there is no occasion to prove that it has been sought for. (Phill. 347.)

This deed was executed in August, 1779. The city of Charleston fell into the hands of the British on the 6th of May following. There was at that time but one recording office in the State, and consequently a great deal of business to be done; so that one would not have had a right to expect that his deed would be very expeditiously recorded. The deed was recorded, but on what particular day does not now appear. Under those circumstances there is a strong probability that the original was yet in the register's office at the time the town fell, and might have been lost or destroyed in the removal of the papers for the purpose of safe keeping. But if it were not lost in this particular manner, the confusion of the times would furnish innumerable occasions on which it might have been lost; and the great length of time which has elapsed puts it out of the power of the party to furnish any better evidence of the fact. . . .

It is the opinion of the Court that the copy deed should have been admitted, and therefore a new trial is granted.

320. COMMONWEALTH v. EMERY

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1854

2 Gray 80

THE defendant was tried on the charge of being a common seller of intoxicating liquors. The district attorney, in order to prove that the house was owned by the defendant, and that the business carried on there was his, offered a paper purporting to be a registry copy of a deed of the premises to the defendant, certified by the register of deeds for this county. The defendant objected to the admission of the copy of the deed as evidence, for the reason that he had had no notice to produce the original deed; but PERKINS, J., overrruled the objection.

J. G. Abbott, for the defendant. The copy was erroneously admitted in evidence; the original deed to the defendant must be presumed to be in his possession; and when such is the case, a copy can never be used, without notice to the party to produce the original. . . .

J. H. Clifford, Attorney-General, for the Commonwealth. . . .

SHAW, C. J. — Upon consideration, the Court are of opinion that this copy of a deed ought not to have been admitted, without notice to the defendant to produce the original.

The rule, as to the use of deeds as evidence, in this Commonwealth, is founded partly on the rules of the common law, but modified, to some extent, by the registry system established here by statute. The theory is this: . . . In all cases original deeds should be required if they can be had; but as this would be burdensome and expensive, if not impossible in many cases, some relaxation of this rule was necessary for practical purposes. . . . Our system of conveyancing, modified by the registry law, is that each grantee retains the deed made immediately to himself, to enable him to make good his warranties. Succeeding grantees do not, as a matter of course, take possession of deeds made to preceding parties so as to be able to prove a chain of title by a series of original deeds. Every grantee, therefore, is the keeper of his own deed, and of his own deed only. . . . When, then, he has occasion to prove any fact by such deed, he cannot use a copy, because it would be offering inferior evidence, when in theory of law a superior is in his possession or power; it is only on proof of the loss of the original, in such case, that any secondary evidence can be received. . . .

In cases, therefore, in which the original, in theory of law, is not in the custody or power of the party having occasion to use it, the certified office copy is prima facie evidence of the original and its execution, subject to be controlled by rebutting evidence. But as this arises from the consideration, that the original is not in the power of the party relying on it, the rule does not apply where such original is, in theory of law, in possession of the adverse party; because upon notice the adverse party is bound to produce it, or put himself in such position that any secondary evidence may be given.

The Court being of opinion that evidence was received which was not competent and ought not to have been admitted, the verdict is set aside, and a new trial ordered in the Court of Common Pleas.

322. SCOTT v. BASSETT

Supreme Court of Illinois. 1898

174 Ill. 390; 51 N. E. 577; 57 N. E. 835

Appeal from the Circuit Court of Mercer County; the Hon. John J. Glenn, Judge, presiding.

This is an action of ejectment, brought in the Circuit Court of Mercer county, by the appellees against the appellant, to recover the possession of forty acres of land in that county. The suit was commenced on August 1, 1895. The plea was the general issue of not guilty. The case was tried before the court and a jury. The jury found the defendant guilty, and that the plaintiffs were the owners of the premises in fee simple, and fixed the damages at one cent. Motion for new trial was overruled and judgment was rendered upon the verdict. The present appeal is prosecuted from such judgment. The appellees, who were the plaintiffs below, did not attempt to show themselves to be the owners of the paramount title, but introduced certain deeds as color of title, and sought to establish, by proof, possession and payment of taxes for seven years under such color of title.

Appellees, on the trial below, introduced the records of the following deeds, to-wit:

1. The record of a deed dated November 8, 1867, executed by the master in chancery of Mercer county to one Randolph Keig, conveying the lands described in the declaration, and other lands, and recorded in the Recorder's office of said county.

[2–6. The records of five deeds of intervening grantees.] . . .

7. The record of a deed, executed by F. C. Grabel to Frank C. Taggart, dated September 27, 1886, and conveying said premises.

8. An original deed from Frank C. Taggart and wife to the appellees, dated July 17, 1895, and recorded on July 29, 1895, conveying the said premises. . . .

Scott & Cooke, and James M. Brock, for appellant. Bassett & Bassett, for appellees.

Mr. Justice MAGRUDER delivered the opinion of the Court.—

In this case we forbear to express any opinion upon the question, whether or not the appellees proved possession and payment of taxes under claim and color of title for seven years. We also forbear to express any opinion as to the validity or invalidity of the tax deed introduced by the appellant upon the trial below.

The appellees introduced only the records of the deeds relied upon by them as color, but did not introduce the originals of any of such deeds, except the last deed from Taggart to themselves. Before they were entitled to introduce the records of the deeds, it was necessary to lay a foundation for the use of secondary evidence. Such a foundation was not here properly laid, so as to justify the introduction of the records instead of the original instruments.

Section 36 of the Act in regard to conveyances is as follows: [printed ante, No. 321] . . . The testimony introduced in supposed compliance with this statute did not meet its requirements. One of the appellees took the stand as a witness, and his testimony is the only evidence upon this subject in the record. That testimony is as follows: "I have not the original deeds. They are not in the hands of the plaintiffs in this case, and never have been, and I have never seen them. I think I did have the original deed from the master in Chancery to Keig. That's the only one I ever had. . . . The deed from the master in chancery is not in my possession. I have no control over it. None of the deeds mentioned are destroyed so far as I know." Joseph S. Bell in his testimony states, that after the death of his father, James C. Bell, his brother, James, took his father's papers to Burlington, Ia., and he says he expects those papers could be found. . . .

In Dickinson v. Breeden, 25 Ill. 186, it was held that, where the affidavit of the party disclosed a knowledge of the residence of the grantee in a lost deed, the deposition of such grantee should be taken to prove the existence of the original deed, and that it was lost, or so mislaid that it could not be found after diligent search, and that such grantee had in good faith made such search with a view of finding it. In that case the Court remarked upon the danger of allowing the introduction of copies of deeds conveying valuable lands, without fully establishing the fact of the existence at some time of an original, and of its subsequent loss or destruction, so that after diligent search it could not be found. . . . In Prettyman v. Walston, 34 Ill. 175, the affidavit, offered as preliminary proof for the purpose of laying a foundation for the introduction of the record copy of a deed, stated that the affiant "had not in his possession, power, or control" the instrument declared on; and that affiant had not had since the commencement of the suit the original instrument, and had never seen it, and that it was not "within his possession, control or power to produce on the trial." In Nixon v. Cobleigh, 52 Ill. 387, the plaintiff swore, in order to lay the foundation for the introduction of the record of a deed, "that he did not have the deed in his possession; that he did not know where it was," and his testimony was held to be sufficient. . . .

The testimony in the case at bar does not go as far as the affidavit in the Prettyman case. That testimony merely states, that the appellee giving it, to-wit, Isaac N. Bassett, had no control over the deed from the master in chancery to Keig, but the testimony does not show that the witness may not have had control over the originals of the other deeds mentioned in the statement preceding this opinion. . . .

The appellee, Isaac N. Bassett, does not state that the original deeds are not "in the power" of the appellees to produce the same, but that they are not "in the hands" of the appellees. A deed might not be in the manual possession of the plaintiff, and yet might be where the plaintiff could control its possession and its production. The statute is, that the preliminary proof must show that the original was lost, or not "in the power" of the party wishing to use it, etc. The testimony here does not come within the purview of the testimony or affidavits in the cases above referred to. Originals of the deeds referred to by the witness, Bassett, may never have been in the hands of himself or his co-appellee, and they may never have seen such original deeds, and yet it may have been in their power to produce the same.

In addition to this, § 36 of the Act of 1872, which is now in force, requires that the plaintiff in his affidavit or testimony should state, that, to the best of his knowledge, the original deed was not intentionally destroyed, or in any manner disposed of for the purpose of introducing a copy thereof in place of the original. The evidence of the appellee Bassett does not meet this requirement. He merely says: "None of the deeds mentioned are destroyed so far as I know." They may not have been destroyed, and yet in some manner they may have been disposed of for the purpose of introducing copies in place of the originals. . . .

For the reasons above indicated the judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court.

Reversed and remanded.

323. CARPENTER v. DRESSLER

SUPREME COURT OF ARKANSAS. 1905

76 Ark. 400; 89 S. W. 89

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Arkansas County; GEORGE M. CHAPLINE, Judge.

Two separate actions by one Carpenter against one Dressler. From judgments for defendant in each action, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. A. & J. R. Parker and John F. Park, for appellant. By the statute (Kirby's Dig. §§ 3057, 3064) copies of entries made in the books of the land office, certified by the proper officer, are made evidence to the same extent as the original books and papers would be, if produced. The transcript of the record entries of the land office was sufficient as a link in the chain of title in ejectment. . . .

Lewis & Ingram and H. Coleman, for appellee. The certified transcript from the land office is not of equal evidentiary value to the patent itself, but is only secondary evidence of the existence thereof. Cf. Kirby's Dig. §§ 3057, 3064, 4746 et seq. The loss of the patent must be first shown as a foundation for the admission of such secondary evidence. 57 Ark. 158. . . .

H. A. & J. R. Parker and John F. Park, for appellant, in reply: The certified copy of the record of the land office was equal in evidentiary value to the patent certificate itself. 55 Ark. 286. . . .

HILL, C. J.—The issues in these cases are identical, and they will be treated for the purposes of the opinion as one case.

1. The first question for consideration is the effect to be given to a certified transcript from the office of the Land Commissioner, when offered in evidence to prove a transfer therein shown. The statute (§ 3064, Kirby's Dig.) only provides that, when properly certified, it shall be received in evidence of the existence of the records of which the transcript is a copy. It does not provide whether it shall be primary or secondary evidence, and the question here is whether such transcript can be received as original evidence to prove the issuance of a certificate or deed, without first accounting for the deed or certificate. In other words, does this statute make the record of the transaction required by law to be kept in the land office of the same grade of evidence as the certificate or deed issuing from the land office as a result of the transaction there recorded?

One view to take of it is that the law requires a record to be had of the transaction, say a land sale, and as evidence of the consummation of that sale the deed is issued, and it is evidence, but not the only evidence, of the sale; for this record must precede the issuance of the deed, and the deed is based upon the transaction therein recorded. In this view the record and deed would be original evidence of equal grade, and this statute makes the certified transcript of the record equal to the record itself. This is the view taken, under closely analogous statutes, in Mississippi and Alabama. Boddie v. Pardee, 74 Miss. 13, 20 So. 1; Wood-Stock Iron Co. v. Roberts, 87 Ala. 436, 6 So. 349.

In Boynton v. Ashabranner, decided at this term, and reported in 88 S. W. 566, this view prevailed. However, the question was not fully considered, as the Court was then of opinion, as therein indicated, that Dawson v. Parham, 55 Ark. 286, 18 S. W. 48, had settled this question in this way. In the argument of this case, counsel pointed out the error of the Court in misconceiving the scope of Dawson v. Parham. That case did not reach to this point, but to the effect of the certified transcript being of equal dignity to the record in the land office, and did not decide the effect of the record itself (or its copy made pursuant to the statute), as original evidence to prove the transfer without accounting for the deed or certificate itself. The question arising again in this case and in Covington v. Berry (this day decided), 88 S. W. 1005, has caused the Court to re-examine the ruling in Boynton v. Ashabranner, as well as in the cases now at bar.

The other view of the question is that the record in the land office is a public memorandum of the transaction, and that the primary evidence of the transaction is the deed or certificate issued by the Land Commissioner, and this public memorandum is only admissible evidence after the loss or destruction of, or inability of the party to produce, the original is shown, and then this public record (and by statute certified transcripts thereof) becomes the highest grade of secondary evidence to prove the transaction therein recorded. This subject is fully and exhaustively treated by Wigmore in his recent treatise on the Law of Evidence, and statutes and decisions from almost every State in the Union are collected, in a note following the discussion on the subject. 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1239, and note pages 1484–1488. This latter view is more consonant to the previous decisions of this Court. See

Stewart v. Scott, 57 Ark. 158, 20 S. W. 1088; Driver v. Evans, 47 Ark. 300, 1 S. W. 518. This view seems to be sustained by the weight of authority also.

The Court concludes that the transcript from the land office is not admissible until the party offering it accounts for the loss or destruction of the deed or certificate, or shows it to be inaccessible to him or the process of the court, or in unknown hands, or otherwise not subject to production, as a foundation to admit the transcript as secondary evidence. A supplemental opinion will be filed in Boynton v. Ashabranner to the same effect, and the mandate recalled to contain it.

2. The Court was right, therefore, in excluding the transcript as evidence of the transfer of title; but the Court erred in not then permitting appellant to lay the necessary foundation to admit the transcript, or to allow appellant to take a nonsuit in order to complete his evidence in a new suit. . . .

For the error indicated, the cause is reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

BATTLE, J., absent.

Topic 2. Limits to the Application of the Rule

325. PHILIPSON v. CHASE

NISI PRIUS. 1809

2 Camp. 110

ACTION on an attorney's bill. Plea, the general issue.

To prove that a copy of the bill had been delivered pursuant to 2 Geo. II, c. 23, the plaintiff's clerk was called, who swore that he had delivered to the defendant a bill signed by the plaintiff, containing an account of the business done. He was then proceeding to state the items of this bill from the plaintiff's books, when the defendant's counsel objected that no notice had been given to produce it.

Topping and Espinasse, for the plaintiff, insisted, that this was unnecessary. In Jory v. Orchard, 2 Bos. & Pull. 39, the Court of C. P. held, that it was unnecessary to give a notice to produce the written demand of a copy of a warrant pursuant to 24 Geo. II, c. 44, before giving evidence of its contents; and the very point before the Court was decided in Anderson v. May, 2 Bos. & Pull. 237, where it was held that a copy of an attorney's bill, the original of which has been delivered to the defendant, may be admitted in evidence without proof of notice to produce the original. This had always been considered like the case of a notice to quit, in which no notice to produce was ever required.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH. — If there are two contemporary writings, the counterparts of each other, one of which is delivered to the opposite party, and the other preserved, as they may both be considered as originals, and they have equal claims to authenticity, the one which is preserved may be received in evidence, without notice to produce the one which was delivered. So it must have been in the cases which have been cited; and if a duplicate of the bill delivered is offered, I am ready to receive it. But I am quite clear that this evidence from the plaintiff's books is inadmissible to prove that a bill was delivered according to the statute. I approve of the practice as to notices to quit; and I remember when the point was first ruled by Mr. Justice WILSON, who said that if a duplicate of the notice to quit was not of itself sufficient, no more ought a duplicate of the notice to produce, and thus notices might be required in infinitum.

Plaintiff nonsuited.

Topping and Espinasse, for the plaintiff. Garrow, for the defendant.

326. REX v. WATSON

2 Starkie, 116

[HIGH treason. It appeared that on the 26th of November a person of the name of Castle took a manuscript to Seale, a printer, in order that he might print 500 large copies for placards and 4,000 small ones, advertising a meeting at Spa Fields on the 2d of December, and that the prisoner Watson afterwards called upon him, Seale, and took away twenty-five of the large placards. Seale upon the trial produced one of the large ones, and another witness was afterward asked whether similar placards had not been posted upon the walls of the metropolis.]

It was objected for the prisoner, that no evidence of the contents could be received without notice to the prisoner to produce the original manuscript; that the original ought either to be produced, or proved to be destroyed, or in the possession of the prisoner; that notice must be proved to have been given to him to produce it before secondary evidence could be received; that all the printed placards were to be considered as copies, and not as originals; and that it by no means followed that all were alike because all were printed. And the case was assimilated to that of Nodin v. Murray, 3 Camp. 228, which was tried before Lord ELLENBOROUGH, where his Lordship held that a copy of a letter proved to have been taken by a letter-copying machine, and which was therefore necessarily a true copy, could not be received in evidence without notice to produce the original. It was also urged that notice ought to have been given to produce the 25 copies which had been taken away by the prisoner.

ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J. (overruling the objection). An order having been given to print 500 copies, Watson fetched away 25; by this he adopted the printing as done in the execution of an order which he had given; and when he took away 25 out of a common impression, they must be supposed to agree in the contents.

Bayley, J. — The objection is, that without notice to produce the original any other evidence of the contents is but secondary evidence. It appears to me that that is not the case, for that every one of those worked off are originals, in the nature of duplicate originals; and it is clear that one duplicate may be given in evidence, without notice to produce the other. If the placard were offered in evidence in order to show the contents of the original manuscript, there would be great weight in the objection; but when they are printed they all become originals; the manuscript is discharged; and since it appears that they are from the same press, they must all be the same.

Abbott, J. — If this paper were offered in order to show what were the contents of the original manuscript, it might be contended that sufficient preparatory evidence had not been given. But in another point of view it appears to me that the evidence is admissible, in order to prove that Mr. Watson knew the contents of a placard posted in the streets, relating to a meeting in Spa Fields, on the 2d of December.

327. ANHEUSER-BUSCH BREWING ASSOCIATION v. HUTMACHER

127 Ill. 652; 21 N. E. 626

Appeal from the Appellate Court for the Third District; heard in that Court on appeal from the Circuit Court of Adams county; the Hon. William Marsh, Judge, presiding.

Mr. George W. Fogg, for the appellant. . . . If a telegraph dispatch is sought to be introduced in evidence, the original must be produced and its execution proved precisely as any other instrument, or its loss or destruction shown, and then a copy must be proved to be a true and compared copy. . . .

Messrs. Carter & Govert, for the appellee. . . . The telegraph company is the agent of the sender, and the telegram as received at the end of the line is the original, and is primary evidence. . . .

Mr. Justice Bailey delivered the opinion of the Court.

This was a suit in assumpsit, brought by Rudolph Hutmacher against the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association, a corporation organized and doing business at St. Louis, Missouri, to recover for work, labor and services of the plaintiff in superintending the erection of an ice house and cutting, storing and purchasing ice for the defendant. The trial in the Circuit Court resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1640 and costs, which judgment was affirmed by the Appellate Court on appeal, and by a further appeal the record has been brought to this court. . . .

A number of telegrams in relation to the labor and services sued for, and purporting to have been sent by the defendant to the plaintiff, were produced by the plaintiff, and on proof that they were received by him from the telegraph company in the usual course of business, they were admitted in evidence, against the objection and exception of the defendant. Several letters, of dates contemporaneous with the telegrams, written by the defendant to the plaintiff, were also read in evidence, in which the defendant admitted having communicated with the plaintiff by telegraph, and in some of which letters copies of the telegrams sent were given, the same being exact copies of telegrams of the same date read in evidence. The position now taken is, that the papers delivered by the telegraph company to the plaintiff are only copies, the originals being the telegrams signed by the defendant and delivered by it to the telegraph office from which the message was sent, and it is urged that such originals should have been produced or some proper foundation laid for the introduction of secondary evidence of their contents.

The application of the rule of evidence here contended for must depend upon whether the messages delivered by the telegraph company to the plaintiff or those delivered by the defendant to the telegraph operator are, as between the parties to this suit, to be deemed the originals. In Durkee v. Vermont Central Railroad Co., 29 Vt. 127, the rule which we consider the most reasonable one is laid down, viz., that the original, where the person to whom it is sent takes the risk of its transmission, or is the employer of the telegraph, is the message delivered to the operator; but where the person sending the message takes the initiative, so that the telegraph is to be regarded as his agent, the original is the message actually delivered at the end of the line. See also Saveland v. Green, 40 Wis. 431; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Shotter, 71 Ga. 760; Wilson v. M. & N. W. Railroad Co., 31 Minn. 481; Dunning v. Roberts, 35 Barb. 463; Gray on Communications by Telegraph, §§ 104, 129. The same rule was adopted by this Court in Morgan v. The People, 59 Ill. 58. The fact that the defendant took the initiative in sending the telegrams, thus employing the telegraph company as its agent, is clearly shown by its letters to the plaintiff read in evidence. Having thus employed such agent to convey communications to the plaintiff, it must be held to be bound by the acts of its agent to the extent at least of making the messages delivered originals, thereby constituting them primary evidence of the contents of the messages sent.

It should be observed that there is no suggestion that any of these messages were erroneously transmitted, and the case therefore does not present the question, upon which there is some conflict in the authorities, whether the sender of a telegram makes the telegraph company its general agent so as to become responsible for the acts of such agent where there is a departure from the authority actually given, by transmitting the message incorrectly. . . .

We find no error in the record, and the judgment of the Appellate Court will therefore be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

328. PEAKS v. COBB

192 Mass. 196; 77 N. E. 881

TORT, against the owner of a building number 102 on Huntington Avenue in Boston, by Julia F. Peaks, who hired a room from one Mrs. St. Ledger, the lessee of an apartment or suite of rooms in that building, for personal injuries from falling on a walk leading from the entrance of the building to the sidewalk of Huntington Avenue. Writ dated March 25, 1901.

At the trial in the Superior Court before HITCHCOCK, J., the defendant was allowed, against the objection and exception of the plaintiff, to testify to the language of the covenant in the lease from him to Mrs. St. Ledger which is mentioned in the opinion and under the circumstances there stated. The judge ordered a verdict for the defendant; and the plaintiff alleged exceptions.

E. R. Anderson (A. T. Smith with him), for the plaintiff.

W. H. Hitchcock, for the defendant.

HAMMOND, J. — One of the grounds of the defence was that in the lease from the defendant to Mrs. St. Ledger, from whom the plaintiff hired the room, there was a clause to the effect that the lessee should not lease, under-let nor permit any other person to occupy the premises named in the lease, without the written consent of the lessor; and the defendant undertook to prove the existence of such a provision.

The lease was executed in duplicate, one being retained by the lessor and the other given by him to the lessee. Each was therefore an original, and as evidence of the contract could have been introduced without the production of the other. The defendant testified that he had searched for his paper and could not find it. Upon this evidence the judge could have found, and it is to be assumed that he did find, that it was lost.

If this had been the only original, secondary evidence of its contents of course could have been admitted. But it was not the only original. The other was presumed to be in the possession of Mrs. St. Ledger, the lessee, to whom the defendant had given it. A witness called by the plaintiff testified on cross-examination that Mrs. St. Ledger was living on Massachusetts Avenue in Boston, the place of the trial, and that the witness knew of no reason why she could not be present at the trial. It does not appear that any effort whatever was made to procure the original which had been delivered to her. Upon the evidence it is to be presumed that the paper was within the jurisdiction of the Court.

Here, then, is the case of two originals, one lost and one presumably still in the hands of a third party within reach of the Court. Under these circumstances the rule is that no secondary evidence of the contents of either is admissible until it is shown that reasonable effort had been made to procure the other. All originals must be accounted for before secondary evidence can be given of any one. Starkie, Evidence (10th Am. ed.) 542, ad finem, and cases therein cited. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 563, and cases cited. 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1233, and cases cited. See also Poignand v. Smith, 8 Pick. 272. The exception to the admission of the oral evidence of the contents of the lease must be sustained. . . .

Exceptions sustained.

329. INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO. v. ELFSTROM

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1907

101 Minn. 263; 112 N. W. 252

ACTION in the District Court for Chisago county to recover $115, and interest, on an alleged contract. The case was tried before CROSBY, J., and a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $116.47. From an order denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or for a new trial, defendant appealed. Affirmed.

George S. Grimes, for appellant. The Court erred in admitting in evidence, and in refusing to strike out, exhibit A, a carbon copy of the contract. Exhibit A was not the best evidence. The original contract was in existence. . . .

Buffington & Buffington, for respondent. Instruments signed in duplicate are both originals. And where a contract is executed in duplicate or triplicate form the parts are denominated duplicate or triplicate originals, the one as much so as the other. It does not require in order to introduce one of the duplicates that notice should be given to produce the other. They are all primary evidence. . . .

ELLIOTT, J. — This was an action brought to recover upon a written contract for the purchase price of a certain McCormick binder, which the plaintiff claimed it sold and delivered to the defendant. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the appeal is from an order denying the alternative motions for judgment in favor of the defendant notwithstanding the verdict or for a new trial. . . .

The remaining question relates to the reception in evidence of what the appellant claims was a mere copy of the contract without having first accounted for the absence of the original. This presents an interesting and somewhat novel question, but which, by reason of the introduction of labor-saving devices in modern offices, is liable to arise more frequently in the future. A sheet of carbon paper was placed between two sheets of order paper, so that the writing of the order upon the outside sheet produced a fac-simile upon the one underneath. The signature of the party was thus reproduced by the same stroke of the pen which made the surface, or exposed, impression. In State v. Teasdale, 120 Mo. App. 692, 97 S. W. 996, it was held that a carbon copy of a letter was not admissible in evidence until the original letter from which it was made was accounted for. The signature would not, under ordinary circumstances, appear upon the carbon copy of such a letter. In Chesapeake v. Stock, 104 Va. 97, 51 S. E. 161, it was held that a carbon copy made at the same time and by the same impression of type may be regarded as a duplicate original of the letter itself and admitted in evidence without notice to produce the letter.

We think this view can be sustained, and that a clear distinction exists between letter-press copies of writings and duplicate writings produced as was the contract in the case at bar. It is well settled that, where a writing is executed in duplicate or multiplicate, each of the parts is the writing which is to be proved, because by the act of the parties each is made as much the legal act as the other. Crossman v. Crossman, 95 N. Y. 145, 148; Hubbard v. Russell, 24 Barb. 404, 408; Lewis v. Payn, 8 Cow. 71, 18 Am. Dec. 427; Jackson v. Denison, 4 Wend. 558; Barr v. Armstrong, 56 Mo. 577, 586; Weaver v. Shipley, 127 Ind. 526, 27 N. E. 146; Cleveland v. Perkins, 17 Mich. 296; Philipson v. Chase, 2 Camp. 110 [ante, No. 325]. It is very generally held that a reproduction of a writing by a letter-press cannot be considered as a duplicate. 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1234, and cases there cited; Menasha v. Harmon, 128 Wis. 177, 107 N. W. 299.

The distinction between letter-press copies and instruments produced by the use of carbon paper, as in this instance, seems reasonably clear and satisfactory. What makes two numbers of an instrument duplicates and equivalents is the fact that the legal act of the parties as consummated embraces them both. Letter-press copies are produced by an act distinct from and subsequent to the consummation of the legal act of execution. It may or may not be the act of the parties to the contract. We know from common experience that such copies are ordinarily produced by the labor of clerks and other employes, and that the results are not always satisfactory. But all the numbers of a writing result from the completion of the legal act of the parties, although aided by mechanical devices or chemical agencies, meet the requirements of originals. If the reproduction is complete, there is no practical reason why all the products of the single act of writing the contract and affixing a signature thereto should not be regarded as of equal and equivalent value. In this instance the same stroke of the pen produced both signatures. The argument that the recognition of these instruments as duplicates would encourage fraudulent practices does not touch the principle involved.

The order of the District Court is affirmed.

330. COLE v. GIBSON

CHANCERY. 1750

1 Ves. Sr. 503

IN 1733, on a treaty of marriage between Philip Bennet and Miss Hallam, then about twenty years old, articles were entered into, to which were made parties the intended husband and wife, the defendant and Mr. Ralph Allen. The first clause therein was for securing an annuity of £100 to the defendant out of the wife's estate: but every other provision therein for benefit of the wife and issue of the marriage was made revocable by the wife, after the marriage should be had. About the same time with the articles, a bond was given by Mr. Bennet before the marriage to pay the defendant £1000, which bond was afterward delivered up to be canceled; but at what particular time did not appear. A recovery was afterward suffered to the uses of the articles. In 1736 a new grant was made to the defendant of this annuity; which was continued to be paid for some time after the wife's death. But the present bill was now brought to set it aside.

Evidence for the plaintiff to prove the contents of the bond was objected to, as never done unless where the instrument itself cannot be had: whereas it appeared from the answer read, that the bond was delivered up to plaintiff, and must be in his custody. Counsel for plaintiff. This bill is not to be relieved against the bond; for then the objection would be good; but here it is made use of as collateral evidence, as being part of the transaction, and to prove that it was on account of the marriage, and on no other consideration.

Lord CHANCELLOR [HARDWICKE]. The objection is founded on the proper and common rule of evidence; and in consequence the plaintiff cannot be admitted to give parol evidence of the contents of this bond, as the case at present stands. The general rule is, the best evidence should be given the nature of the thing will admit: and therefore as to all deeds, writings, and letters they must be proved themselves unless under certain circumstances; as when shown to be in the adverse party's hands; for then you will be permitted to prove the contents; or if shown to be destroyed, you may then read reasonable proof of the destruction and parol evidence to the contents; which is then made the best the thing will admit. . . . The plaintiff has read, what is made evidence out of the answer, that the bond was executed, and that the defendant delivered it up to the plaintiff: which is evidence that it is in plaintiff's custody. And to prove the contents it must be produced. . . .

A distinction is endeavored between a bill to set aside the bond or other instrument, and a case wherein it is made use of only by collateral evidence; but there is no such distinction in point of evidence, the rule being the same whether it comes in by way of collateral evidence, or the very deed which the bill is brought to impeach.

331. LAMB v. MOBERLY

COURT OF APPEALS OF KENTUCKY. 1826

3 T. B. Monr. 179

THE plaintiff in the Court below, sued the defendant, in an action of assumpsit, for so much money for a note made by a third person, and sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. On the trial of the issue of non assumpsit, the plaintiff introduced the confessions of the defendant that he had bought such a note, and had promised to pay a certain sum therefor, at a period, or rather on a contingency which had happened, substantially agreeing with some of the counts in the declaration. The counsel for defendant moved the Court to exclude that evidence, until the plaintiff should produce the note itself as the best evidence. The Court sustained this motion.

MILLS, J. (after stating the case as above). We cannot agree with the Court below . . . that the production of the note was necessary. It could only be held necessary by not attending to the distinction between proving the existence and contents of a note and the sale of a note. Of the former, the note is the better evidence; but of the latter the note furnishes no evidence. . . . The existence of a note is as certainly perceived by the senses or acknowledged in conversation as that of any other article of commerce; and it might as well be urged that before the acknowledgments of a sale of any other article could be given in evidence the article itself must be produced in Court in order that the Court might see that it really existed, as that a note thus sold should be produced. Judgment reversed.

332. TILTON v. BEECHER

CITY COURT OF BROOKLYN, N. Y. 1875

Abbott's Rep. 1, 389.

[THE plaintiff desired to prove certain admissions made by the defendant.]

Witness for plaintiff: [Mr. Tilton had written the story of the whole affair for publication and wanted Mr. Beecher to hear it before publication,] and Mr. Tilton said to Mr. Beecher, "I will read to you one passage from this statement, and if you can stand that, you can stand any part of it," and he read to him a passage from the statement, which was about as follows as nearly as I can recollect.

Mr. Evarts, for defendant: The statement will speak for itself.

Mr. Fullerton, for plaintiff: What did he read?

Mr. Evarts: We want that paper and the part of it that was read, as it appeared in that paper, and it is not competent to recite out of a written paper by oral proposition what the written paper is the best evidence of.

Mr. Fullerton: I propose to show what communication was made by Mr. Tilton on that occasion to Mr. Beecher; I do not care whether it originated in his own mind, or whether it was read from a paper, printed or written; it makes no difference; what it was that he said to him is what I have a right to.

Judge Neilson: I think the witness can state what was said to Mr. Beecher, although he stated matter that had been incorporated in writing.

333. MASSEY v. BANK

Supreme Court of Illinois. 1885

113 Ill. 334

Appeal from the Appellate Court for the Third District; — heard in that Court on appeal from the Circuit Court of Sangamon county; the Hon. C. S. Zane, Judge, presiding.

Messrs. Morrison & Whitlock, for the appellant. As to the rule requiring the best evidence to be produced, . . . the best evidences were the deeds and mortgages. . . .

Messrs. Ketcham & Gridley, and Mr. L. H. Hatfield, for the appellee.

Mr. Justice Mulkey, delivered the opinion of the Court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Appellate Court for the Third District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court of Sangamon county, in favor of the National Bank of Virginia, and against Henderson E. Massey, for the sum of $6439.56. The action below was upon a promissory note purporting to have been executed by Henry C. Massey, Henderson E. Massey and George W. Laurie. . . . The note was given for money borrowed from the bank by Henry C. Massey. The appellant filed a plea, verified by affidavit, denying the execution of the note, and the cause was tried upon that issue, alone. . . .

The point which seems to be chiefly relied on, arises upon a motion to suppress part of the answer to the following interrogatory: "You may state whether the note" (referring to the one sued on) "was a renewal note." Objection being made, unless the note was produced, the witness then, as we understand the record, produced it, and proceeded first to read the credits indorsed on it, the whole answer being as follows: "Paid, July 25, 1879, $275 and interest on note to date. Paid August 5, 1879, $1782.75 and interest on note to date. That $1782.75 my father owed, — that is, he gave me a deed to one hundred acres of land in 1866; told me to go to work on it, and improve it, and suit myself," (objection by defendant,) "but had never given me a deed, and after he received notice from the bank in 1879, he goes to Jacksonville and deeds this one hundred acres of land away from me, with the exception of forty acres where the house and barn stand, and said to me and told me to give him a mortgage for $3000, and he would enable me to get a loan of $2000 on it, to pay upon this note. He did that. I had to give him a mortgage for $3000, while I never owed him a dollar in the world. He did that to fix the bank so they couldn't get anything off of me, and he was going to put his property out of his hands, to avoid this note." . . .

Construing the motion according to its literal terms, the Court really sustained it, instead of denying it, hence there is no ground to complain. We are not inclined, however, to rest our decision of the question solely upon this view, but rather prefer to place it upon the broad ground that the general principle upon which appellant bases the objection, — namely, that the best evidence by which a fact is susceptible of being established must always be produced, or its absence accounted for, — has no application to the facts above stated. We fully recognize the rule that whenever the existence of a deed or other writing is directly involved in a judicial proceeding, whether as proof of the precise question in issue or of some subordinate matter that tends to establish the ultimate fact or facts upon which the case turns, such deed or other writing itself must be produced, or its absence accounted for, before secondary evidence of its contents is admissible. Yet while this rule is fully conceded, it is also true that a witness, when testifying, may, for the purpose of making his statements intelligible, and giving coherence to such of them as are unquestionably admissible in evidence, properly speak of the execution of deeds, the giving of receipts, the writing of a letter, and the like, without producing the instrument or writing referred to. To hold otherwise would certainly be productive of great inconvenience, and in some cases would defeat the ends of justice. References to written instruments by a witness for the purpose stated are to be regarded as but mere inducement to the more material parts of his testimony.

The present case well illustrates the principle in question. As remotely bearing upon the issue to be tried, the plaintiff sought to show the appellant had avowed a purpose not to pay the note — that he had said he was going to put his property out of his hands in order to defeat the claim. Now this, under the issue, is the important part of the answer to the question ["whether the note was a renewal note"], if indeed any of it can be so regarded. All, therefore, that was said about the deeding of the land, the giving of the mortgage, and getting the loan of $2,000, we regard as mere matter of inducement to the more important part of the testimony.

In short, we see no substantial error in the record, and the judgment will therefore be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

334. MINNESOTA DEBENTURE CO. v. JOHNSON

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1906

96 Minn. 91; 107 N. W. 740

ACTION of ejectment in the District Court for Hennepin county, The case was tried before HOLT, J., who directed a verdict in favor of plaintiff. From an order denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or for a new trial, defendant appealed. Plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground of defective notice. Motion to dismiss denied. Order affirmed.

Savage & Purdy, for appellant. John F. Fitzpatrick, for respondent. . .

On May 4, 1906, the following opinion was filed:

ELLIOTT, J. — In an action of ejectment the plaintiff prevailed and from an order denying a new trial the defendant appealed to this Court where the order was reversed and a new trial granted. 94 Minn. 150, 102 N. W. 381. After a second trial the case now comes here on appeal by the defendant from an order denying a motion for judgment for the defendant notwithstanding a verdict for the plaintiff, or for a new trial.

The facts are fully stated in the former opinion. On the first trial the plaintiff traced the title from the United States Government by mesne conveyances to George F. Dean and showed the entry of a judgment on February 4, 1899, against Dean, quieting the title to the land in the plaintiff. . . . The plaintiff would therefore be entitled to the land as against Dean, and if the defendant Johnson was Dean's tenant under a lease made after the entry of the judgment, his rights were no greater than those of Dean. Blew v. Ritz, 82 Minn. 530; 1 Freeman, Judgments, § 169.

On the second trial the plaintiff, instead of disclosing its title, proved to the satisfaction of the trial Court that Johnson was Dean's tenant and made no other claim to the land. . . . Therefore if Johnson in this action claimed only through Dean, he is in privity with him and bound by the judgment which determined Dean's rights.

The defendant when called by the plaintiff, testified as follows:

Q. — "Did you ever claim, or do you claim now to own the land in this lawsuit, yourself?" A. — "No, it is not my land."

Q. — "During all the time that you were on the land, did you hold it under George F. Dean?" A. — "Yes, I rented it from him."

This is definite and clear; and it would doubtless surprise Johnson to learn that he was not Dean's tenant and that he has any interest in the land other than as such tenant. He further testified that he first rented the property about 1895; that he had had many leases but did not remember how many, and that he "had one for the year before last," which would be 1903, which he burned up because he moved. It thus clearly appeared that about 1895 Johnson took possession of the property as the tenant of Dean and that the lease was renewed or a new lease made, after the entry of the judgment in 1899.

But the defendant contends that the evidence by which this was shown was improperly received, because it called for the contents of the written leases and an opinion as to the character of the defendant's possession.

1. It was a question of the application of recognized rules governing the production of evidence. The existence of certain relations, although created by certain instruments in writing, may be shown by parol. Widdifield v. Widdifield, 2 Binn. 245; Cutler v. Thomas, 25 Vt. 73; Rosenbaum v. Howard, 69 Minn. 41, 71 N. W. 823; Alderson v. Clay, 1 Starkie, 405. The terms of the tenancy were not in issue. They could have been shown only by the production of the writings or, under proper conditions, by secondary evidence. But whether the witness was in possession of the land as a tenant of Dean was an independent fact within his personal knowledge, and there could be as against him no better evidence of the character of his claim than the witness's own statement. In 1 Greenleaf, Evidence (16th ed.), § 87, it is said that, "if the fact of the occupation of land is alone in issue without respect to the terms of the tenancy, this fact may be proved by any competent oral testimony such as payment of rent or declarations of the tenant, notwithstanding it appears that the occupancy was under an agreement in writing; for here the writing is only collateral to the fact in question." So in 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1246, it is said, "the fact that a person occupies the relation of tenant as to a piece of land or its owner, is a distinct fact; for he may have become tenant by parol or by writing and the tenancy is the result of the transaction and is not the transaction itself." The rule is applied in Rex v. Holy Trinity, 7 B. & C. 611; Taylor v. Peck, 21 Gratt. 1; and Raynor v. Lee, 20 Mich. 384. See 1 Elliott, Evidence, § 574 and 1 Greenleaf, Evidence (16th ed.), § 563k.

2. Even though the question directed to the witness called upon him to make admissions as to the contents of written documents, it would not necessarily follow that the rulings of the trial Court were erroneous. There is ample authority to support the rule that it is not necessary to produce a document when its contents can be proven by the admissions of the adverse party. The leading case of Slatterie v. Pooley, 6 M. & W. 664 [post, No. 335], established the rule in England that a parol admission by a party to a suit is admissible in evidence against him although it relates to the contents of a deed or other written instrument. Although there are American authorities to the contrary, some of which are cited by defendant, the better authorities in this country have apparently accepted the rule of Slatterie v. Pooley. The question is fully discussed in 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1256, et seq. But we are not required to determine this question, as the case is disposed of by the rule to which reference has already been made.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

335. SLATTERIE v. POOLEY

EXCHEQUER. 1840

6 M. & W. 664

ACTION on a covenant to indemnify the plaintiff against debts scheduled in a composition-deed and due to creditors not signing it; plea, that the debt in question was not contained in the schedule.

At the trial, the composition deed and schedule were produced in evidence for the plaintiff; but the latter, not being duly stamped, was rejected. Whereupon the plaintiff's counsel tendered in evidence a verbal admission by the defendant that the debt mentioned in the declaration was the same with one entered in the schedule. This evidence was objected to, on the ground that the contents of a written instrument, which was itself inadmissible for want of a proper stamp, could not be proved by parol evidence of any kind; and the learned judge being of that opinion, the plaintiff was nonsuited.

Sir F. Pollock and Warren showed cause in Michaelmas Term. — This evidence was not receivable. To admit a parol statement of the matter inserted in the schedule in this case, would be a direct violation of a settled principle of the law of evidence, viz., that the contents of a written instrument cannot be proved otherwise than by the instrument itself, unless satisfactory grounds be shown for its non-production, in which case secondary evidence of its contents is receivable. . . . No case appears to have been decided the other way, until that of Earle v. Picken (5 C. & P. 542), where PARK, J., certainly laid it down as a general rule of law, that "what a party says is evidence against himself, as an admission, whether it relate to the contents of a written paper, or to anything else." There, however, the admission did not necessarily involve the contents of a written instrument. . . . (PARKE, B. — Other subsequent cases to the same effect are referred to in Phillipps on Evidence, vol. I, p. 364, and a reason is given for the admissibility of the evidence. In one sense, no doubt, the best evidence is the production of the instrument itself; but the question is, whether the admission by the party himself of its contents is not receivable, as affording a presumption of truth, whereas parol evidence of its contents aliunde, without its non-production being first accounted for, leads to a contrary presumption.) The admission of such evidence is of dangerous precedent, since thereby as well the rule which enjoins the calling of the subscribing witness, as also the reading of the instrument itself, is dispensed with. . . . Such evidence has in no case been admitted, where the contents of the deed or written instrument were directly in issue. . . .

On a subsequent day, Erle and Busby appeared to support the rule, but

PARKE, B., said: — The Court did not think it necessary to trouble

Mr. Erle in support of the rule in this case; as we who heard the argument (my Brother ALDERSON, who is absent, as well as ourselves) entertain no doubt that the defendant's own declarations were admissible in evidence to prove the identity of the debt sued for, with that mentioned in the schedule, although such admissions involved the contents of a written instrument not produced; and I believe my Lord ABINGER, who was not present at the argument, entirely concurs. The authority of Lord TENTERDEN at Nisi Prius, in the case of Bloxam v. Elsee (Ry. & M. 187, 1 C. & P. 588), is no doubt to the contrary: but since that case as well as before, there have been many reported decisions, that whatever a party says, or his acts amounting to admissions, are evidence against himself, though such admissions may involve what must necessarily be contained in some deed or writing.

If such evidence were inadmissible, the difficulties thrown in the way of every trial would be nearly insuperable. The reason why such parol statements are admissible . . . is that they are not open to the same objection which belongs to parol evidence from other sources, where the written evidence might have been produced; for such evidence is excluded from the presumption of its untruth arising from the very nature of the case where better evidence is withheld; whereas what a party himself admits to be true may reasonably be presumed to be so. The weight and value of such testimony is quite another question.

Lord ABINGER, C. B., said, he was not present at the argument, but concurred in what was said by PARKE, B.; and stated that he had always considered it as clear law, that a party's own statements were in all cases admissible against himself, whether they corroborate the contents of a written instrument or not.

GURNEY, B., and ROLFE, B., concurred. Rule absolute.

336. LAWLESS v. QUEALE. (1845. Ireland, 8 Ir. L. R. 382, 385). PENNEFATHER, B. I cannot subscribe to what was said by PARKE, B., in that case [of Slatterie v. Pooley]. . . . The doctrine there laid down is a most dangerous proposition. By it a man might be deprived of an estate of £10,000 per annum, derived from his ancestors by regular family deeds and conveyances, by producing a witness, or by one or two conspirators, who might be got to swear they heard the defendant say he had conveyed away his interest therein by deed, had mortgaged or otherwise incumbered it; and thus, by this facility so given, the most open door would be given to fraud, and a man might be stripped of his estate through this invitation to fraud and dishonesty. It is said, it is evidence against the person himself who made this admission, and that there is no danger of untruth in what a man admits against himself. Supposing the admission to be proved, is there no danger of mistake or misconception of the terms of a written instrument? It may be long and difficult; one part or clause may explain or qualify another; an unprofessional or ignorant man may be led to believe it may be so-and-so, whereas the real and true meaning may be the very reverse or something very different. But, produce the deed or writing; "litera scripta manet." On which side is the security, and why depart from the rule that, if you want to give evidence of the contents of a writing, the writing itself must be produced? Is there no danger of untruth or misrepresentation, when used against the party making the admission? That is the ground put by PARKE, B., and in which I cannot agree, when I know by experience how easy it is to fabricate admissions, and how impossible to come prepared to detect the falsehood. Why are writings prepared at all but to prevent mistakes and misrepresentations? And why, having taken that precaution, with such writing at hand and capable of being produced, is the same to be laid aside and inferior and less satisfactory evidence resorted to?

338. THE QUEEN'S CASE

2 B. & B. 286

[BILL for divorce on the ground of adultery and improper conduct. The House of Lords put the following questions to the Judges:] First, whether, in the Courts below, a party on cross-examination would be allowed to represent in the statement of a question the contents of a letter, and to ask the witness whether the witness wrote a letter to any person with such contents, or contents to the like effect, without having first shown to the witness the letter, and having asked that witness whether the witness wrote that letter and his admitting that he wrote such letter? . . . Thirdly, whether, when a witness is cross-examined and, upon the production of a letter to the witness under cross-examination, the witness admits that he wrote that letter, the witness can be examined, in the courts below, whether he did not in such letter make statements such as the counsel shall, by questions addressed to the witness, inquire are or are not made therein; or whether the letter itself must be read as the evidence to manifest that such statements are or are not contained therein?

ABBOTT, C. J., for the Judges [answering the first question in the negative]. The contents of every written paper are, according to the ordinary and well-established rules of evidence, to be proved by the paper itself, and by that alone, if the paper be in existence; the proper course, therefore, is to ask the witness whether or no that letter is of the handwriting of the witness; if the witness admits that it is of his handwriting, the cross-examining counsel may at his proper season read that letter as evidence. . . .

[The other question was answered thus:] The Judges are of opinion, in the case propounded, that the counsel cannot, by questions addressed to the witness, enquire whether or no such statements are contained in the letter, but that the letter itself must be read, to manifest whether such statements are or are not contained in that letter. . . . [The Judges] found their opinion upon what in their judgment is a rule of evidence as old as any part of the common law of England, namely, that the contents of a written instrument, if it be in existence, are to be proved by that instrument itself and not by parol evidence.

339. HENRY BROUGHAM. Speech on the Courts of Common Law. (Hansard, Parl. Deb., 2d ser., XVIII, 213, 219, Feb. 7, 1828). If I wish to put a witness' memory to the test, I am not allowed to examine as to the contents of a letter or other paper which he has written. I must put the document into his hands before I ask him any questions upon it, though by so doing he at once becomes acquainted with its contents, and so defeats the object of my inquiry. That question was raised and decided in the Queen's Case, after solemn argument, and, I humbly venture to think, upon a wrong ground, that the writing is the best evidence and ought to be produced, though it is plain that the object is by no means to prove its contents. Neither am I, in like manner, allowed to apply the test to his veracity; and yet, how can a better means be found of sifting a person's credit, supposing his memory to be good, than examining him to the contents of a letter, written by him, and which he believes to be lost? . . . I shall not easily forget a case in which a gentleman of large fortune appeared before an able arbitrator, now filling an eminent judicial place, on some dispute of his own, arising out of an election. It was my lot to cross-examine him. I had got a large number of letters in a pile under my hand, but concealed from him by a desk. He was very eager to be heard in his own cause. I put the question to him: "Did you never say so and so?" His answer was distinct and ready, — "Never." I repeated the question in various forms, and with more particularity, and he repeated his answers, till he had denied most pointedly all he had ever written on the matter in controversy. This passed before the rules in evidence laid down in the Queen's Case; consequently I could examine him without putting the letters into his hand. I then removed the desk, and said, "Do you see what is now under my hand?" pointing to about fifty of his letters. "I advise you to pause before you repeat your answer to the general question, whether or not all you have sworn is correct." He rejected my advice, and not without indignation. Now, those letters of his contained matter in direct contradiction to all he had sworn. I do not say that he perjured himself, — far from it. I do not believe that he intentionally swore what was false; he only forgot what he had written some time before. Nevertheless he had committed himself, and was in my client's power.

340. STATUTES. (1854. England, St. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, § 24). A witness may be cross-examined as to previous statements made by him in writing or reduced into writing, relative to the subject-matter of the cause, without such writing being shown to him; but if it is intended to contradict such witness by the writing, his attention must, before such contradictory proof can be given, be called to those parts of the writing which are to be used for the purpose of so contradicting him; provided always that it shall be competent for the judge, at any time during the trial, to require the production of the writing for his inspection, and he may thereupon make such use of it for the purposes of the trial as he shall think fit.

341. THE CHARLES MORGAN

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. 1884

115 U. S. 69

THIS is a suit in admiralty, brought by the owners of the steamboat "Cotton Valley," to recover for the loss of their boat, and certain articles of personal property belonging to Martin H. Kouns alone, in a collision on the Mississippi River with the steamboat "Charles Morgan." In the original libel filed in the District Court, claim was made only for the value of the boat, and for an itemized account for clothes, jewelry, furniture, etc., of the libellant Kouns. . . . When the case got into the Circuit Court, leave was granted the libellants to file a supplemental and amended libel setting up their claim for stores, supplies, and cash, proved before the commissioner in the District Court, but rejected by that Court because not included in the original libel. . . . A decree was rendered against the Morgan and her owners and stipulators for the value of the Cotton Valley, and for the value of the personal property belonging to Kouns, the same as in the District Court, and also for the value of the stores, supplies, etc., set forth in the supplemental libel, $1,376.16. From that decree this appeal was taken. . . .

It is also shown by another bill of exceptions in the record, that, after the depositions of Albert Stein, Harry W. Stein, Sylvester Doss, John B. Evelyn, and Livingston McGeary had been read on behalf of the claimant of the Morgan, the libellants, for the purpose of impeaching and contradicting their evidence, offered certain depositions of the same witnesses used on the trial of certain other suits, growing out of the same collision, between one Menge and some insurance companies, to which the claimant was not a party. To the introduction of this evidence the claimant objected, on the ground that no basis for offering said purported depositions had been laid, it not having been shown or pretended that said purported depositions were ever submitted to the said witnesses, or otherwise verified as their evidence in said causes; but as, "in the cross-examination of each of said witnesses in this case, the attention of the witness was called to the evidence given by him in the cases of Menge v. Insurance Companies, . . . and the witnesses were specifically examined as to the correctness of said evidence, and admitted having testified therein," and "no objection was made that the evidence offered was not the evidence of said witnesses respectively, or that the same had been imperfectly taken or reported," the depositions were admitted for the purpose for which they were offered. The cross-examination referred to is not set forth in the bill of exceptions. To the admission of this evidence the claimant excepted. . . .

Mr. T. D. Lincoln (Mr. R. H. Marr also filed a brief) for appellants.

Mr. Richard H. Browne (Mr. Charles B. Singleton was with him) for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE (after stating the facts as above) delivered the opinion of the Court.

The specific objection to the depositions in the Menge cases that were offered for the purpose of impeachment, is that they were not exhibited to the witnesses whose testimony was to be impeached upon their cross-examination, or otherwise verified, as the evidence of the witnesses in the former causes. The rule is, that the contradictory declarations of a witness, whether oral or in writing, made at another time, cannot be used for the purpose of impeachment until the witness has been examined upon the subject, and his attention particularly directed to the circumstances in such a way as to give him full opportunity for explanation or exculpation, if he desires to make it. Conrad v. Griffey, 16 How. 38, 46. If the contradictory declaration is in writing, questions as to its contents, without the production of the instrument itself, are ordinarily inadmissible, and a cross-examination for the purpose of laying the foundation of its use as impeachment would not, except under special circumstances, be allowed until the paper was produced and shown to the witness while under examination.

Circumstances may arise, however, which will excuse its production. All the law requires is, that the memory of the witness shall be so refreshed by the necessary inquiries as to enable him to explain, if he can and desires to do so. Whether this has been done is for the Court to determine before the impeaching evidence is admitted. Here the cross-examination, on which the right to use the depositions depended, has not been put into the record, but the bill of exceptions shows "that, in the cross-examination of each of said witnesses, the attention of the witness was called to the evidence given by him in the cases of Menge, . . . and the said witnesses were specifically examined as to the correctness of said evidence, and admitted having testified therein." From this, and the failure to incorporate the cross-examination into the bill of exceptions, we must presume that ample foundation was laid for the introduction of the evidence, unless the failure to show the depositions to the witnesses at the time of their cross-examination was necessarily and under all circumstances fatal. The objection is not to the cross-examination as to the contents of the depositions without their production, but to the admission of the depositions after a cross-examination which was, as we must presume, properly conducted in their absence. It is also stated in the bill of exceptions that, "at the offering, no objection was made that the evidence offered was not the evidence of said witnesses respectively, or that the same had been imperfectly taken or reported." This shows that the depositions must have been sufficiently identified as the evidence of the witnesses in the former cases.

In the case, as it comes to us, we find no error.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed and interest allowed.

Topic 3. Rules Preferring One Sort of Secondary Evidence to Another

343. DOE DEM. GILBERT v. ROSS

EXCHEQUER. 1840

7 M. & W. 102

EJECTMENT by the lessors of the plaintiff, who claimed as co-heiresses at law of Arthur Gramer Miller. . . . They sought to give evidence of the marriage settlement of A. G. Miller, executed by him in 1789, after his father's death, in order to show that he had acquired the fee by exercising the power of appointment. This settlement was in the possession of Mr. Baxter, the defendant's attorney, who had been subpoenaed to produce it. . . . Mr. Baxter stated that he claimed a lien on the deeds for professional business done for Mr. Weetman, and he declined to produce it on this ground. Mr. Weetman himself was in Court, but was not examined, or called on to produce the deed.

Upon Mr. Baxter's refusal to produce the deed, the lessors of the plaintiff proposed to give secondary evidence of its contents. This was objected to on the part of the defendants, but Lord DENMAN ruled that such evidence was admissible. The lessors of the plaintiff then tendered in evidence a copy of the deed; but upon examination it appeared that this had been made an attested copy, and was unstamped, and it was consequently rejected. It was then proposed to read, as secondary evidence of the contents of the deed, a short-hand writer's notes of the proceedings of the trial in the former action, when the settlement had been produced and proved by the then defendant Weetman. This evidence was objected to, but Lord DENMAN allowed it to be admitted, and the short-hand writer's notes were read. The ground of appeal was that the short-hand writer's notes were not receivable when it appeared that a copy of the settlement was in existence.

Adams, Serjt., in Easter Term last, moved for a nonsuit or a new trial, on several grounds. . . . 2dly, that even if secondary evidence was receivable, the shorthand writer's notes were not admissible evidence. . . . In Villiers v. Villiers, 2 Atk. 71, Lord HARDWICKE says — "The rule of evidence is, that the best evidence that the circumstances allow must be given. If an original deed be lost, the counterpart may be read; and if there is no counterpart forthcoming, then a copy may be admitted; and if there should be no copy, there may be parol evidence of the deed, and of the manner of its being lost." . . . (PARKE, B. — You must contend, then, that there is to be primary, secondary, and tertiary evidence. If an attested copy is to be one degree of secondary evidence, the next will be a copy not attested; and then an abstract: then would come an inquiry, whether one man has a better memory than another, and we should never know when to stop. . . .) . . . In Buller's Nisi Prius p. 256, the same rule is laid down as in Villiers v. Villiers.

Lord ABINGER, C. B. — There can be no rule upon this point. Upon examination of the cases, and upon principle, we think there are no degrees of secondary evidence. The rule is that if you cannot produce the original, you may give parol evidence of its contents. If indeed the party giving such parol evidence appears to have better secondary evidence in his power which he does not produce, that is a fact to go to the jury, from which they might sometimes presume that the evidence kept back would be adverse to the party withholding it. But the law makes no distinction between one class of secondary evidence and another.

PARKE, B. — I concur entirely in refusing the rule on this ground. There can be no doubt that an attested copy is more satisfactory, and therefore, in that sense, better evidence than mere parol testimony; but whether it excludes parol testimony, is a very different thing. . . . As soon as you have accounted for the original document, you may then give secondary evidence of its contents. . . . Does it then become inadmissible, if it be shown from other sources, that a more satisfactory species of secondary evidence exists? I think it does not; and I have always understood the rule to be, that when a party is entitled to give secondary evidence at all, he may give any species of secondary evidence within his power. . . .

ALDERSON, B. — I agree with my Brother PARKE, that the objection must arise from the nature of the evidence itself. If you produce a copy, which shows that there was an original, or if you give parol evidence of the contents of a deed, the evidence itself discloses the existence of the deed. But reverse the case; the existence of an original does not show the existence of any copy; nor does parol evidence of the contents of a deed show the existence of anything except the deed itself. If one species of secondary evidence is to exclude another, a party tendering parol evidence of a deed must account for all the secondary evidence that has existed. He may know of nothing but the original, and the other side at the trial may defeat him by showing a copy, the existence of which he had no means of ascertaining. Fifty copies may be in existence unknown to him, and he would be bound to account for them all.

GURNEY, B., concurred.

344. HARVEY v. THORPE. (1856. Alabama, 28 Ala. 250, 262). GOLDTHWAITE, J. [The American weight of authority requires that] the best kind of that character of evidence which appears to be in the power of the party to produce must be offered. We confess that the American rule appears to us more reasonable than the English; and we see great propriety, if there was an examined copy of an instrument in the possession of a party, in refusing to allow him to prove it by the uncertain memory of witnesses. A copy of a letter, taken by a copying press, would unquestionably be better evidence of the original than the recollection of its contents by a witness; and the same reasons which would require the production of the original if in the control of the party, would operate in favor of the production of the fascimile or of the examined copy. But in all these cases the strength of the proposition consists in the fact that there is secondary evidence in its nature and character better than that which the party offers, and that it is in his power to produce it.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MAINE. 1885

ON Exceptions. Indictment for keeping a liquor nuisance.

At the trial, George S. Winn, a clerk in the office of the collector of internal revenue, testified that he had the custody of the records and had made a true copy therefrom of certain names. This copy was admitted to show that the defendant had procured a license as retail liquor dealer, and the defendant alleged exceptions.

True P. Pierce, county attorney, for the State. . . .

D. N. Mortland and J. E. Hanley, for the defendant. — We think it is a well settled rule that the record itself or a copy attested by the proper officer is the only evidence admissible of such a record. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, 483, 484; Mammatt v. Emerson, 27 Maine 308; State v. Gray, 39 Maine 353. The fact that the clerk testified that the paper was a true copy of the record did not make the paper admissible; neither was it competent for the clerk to testify, it was nothing more nor less than allowing a person to testify what the record was without producing it. The production of a paper made by himself and which he certified to be a true copy was simply allowing him to testify from a memorandum what the record contained. The collector, himself, could not be permitted to give such testimony while an authentic copy made by him might be evidence.

PETERS, C. J. The original record of payments for licenses, kept in the office of the collector of internal revenue, would have been proper evidence; and a copy of the same, certified by the collector himself, would have been. A copy of the record authenticated merely by a clerk in the collector's office, an unofficial person, standing without other proof, would be neither sufficient nor admissible. But it was in this case supported by the testimony of the clerk as a witness, who swears that he personally examined the record and made a true copy. The copy, sustained by his oath, was admissible, if the mode of proof styled "sworn copies" or "examined copies" is allowable by the practice in this State.

Examined copies are, in England, resorted to as the most usual mode of proving records. Wharton, Evidence, § 94. The mode is explained and commended in Best's work on evidence, § 468. It seems to have prevailed in many of the States, including Pennsylvania and New York. It was at an early date adopted in some of the federal circuit courts. 4 Dall. 412 (U. S. v. Johns). It is not an unknown mode of proof in New England. It is spoken of as a well settled doctrine in New Hampshire. Whitehouse v. Bickford, 29 N. H. 471. In Spaulding v. Vincent, 24 Vt. 501, it is said: "The more usual method" (of proving a discharge in a foreign court of bankruptcy) "is a sworn copy." Mr. Greenleaf says (1 Evidence, § 485), "Where the proof is by copy, an examined copy, duly made and sworn to by any competent witness, is always admissible." In Atwood v. Winterport, 60 Maine 250, the rule is casually approved, APPLETON, C. J., there saying, whilst speaking of the mode of proving an army record, "A sworn copy is admissible or a copy certified by the proper certifying officer."

Why not admissible? The evidence is as satisfactory certainly as a certified copy. In the latter case we depend upon the honor and integrity of an official, and in the former upon the oath of a competent witness. In either case, an error or fraud is easily detectible. Probably the reason why such a mode of proof had not been much known, if known at all, in our practice, is that it is cheaper and easier to produce [certified] copies; and if a witness comes instead, it is more satisfactory to have [as here] the officer who controls the records bring them into Court. . . .

Exceptions overruled.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MAINE. 1904

EXCEPTIONS by defendants. Overruled. Indictments for burglary in the night time. The respondents were each indicted for breaking and entering the dwelling-house of one John Vehue in the night time. . . .

Fred D. Bartlett, one of the respondents who was a witness, was asked by the County Attorney if he had ever been convicted of crime before, which was objected to, but the Court overruled the objection and directed him to answer.

H. S. Wing, County Attorney, for State.

H. L. Whitcomb, for defendants. In all cases the best evidence is required. It is an indispensable rule of law that evidence of an inferior nature, which supposes evidence of a higher in existence, and which may be had, shall not be admitted. . . . The fact that a witness has been in the house of correction cannot be proved by cross-examination of the witness, but must be proved by the record of his conviction. . . .

Powers, J. — The respondents were severally indicted for burglary and tried together by agreement. . . .

The respondent Bartlett was a witness in his own behalf, and upon cross-examination was asked by the county attorney if he had ever been convicted of crime. Objection was made, but the presiding justice overruled the objection and directed the respondent to answer, and in his charge instructed the jury that the evidence thus elicited could only affect the credibility of the party convicted.

Whether to impeach his credibility the conviction of a witness may be proved by questioning him on cross-examination, has been variously decided by different judicial tribunals. Formerly, when conviction of an infamous crime rendered a witness incompetent, it was universally held that for that purpose the conviction could be proved by the record alone. In many of those jurisdictions, however, where the conviction of crime no longer affects the competency but simply goes to the credibility of the witness, there has been a tendency, sometimes by legislative enactment and sometimes by judicial decision, to broaden the sources of evidence and permit the conviction to be shown by cross-examination of the witness himself. In a technical sense, the record may be the best evidence and the rule of primariness may require its production. This general rule, however, is of no great value unless in its application to the subject under consideration, it is necessary for the interests of justice to avoid error, exclude falsehood, and promote the truth. It can hardly be claimed that a record of conviction is any more convincing to the mind, or less liable to error, than is the witness' own admission of the fact under oath. He may well be presumed to know what the truth is. There is very little possibility of his being mistaken as to the fact of the conviction and none as to the identity of the party convicted. He has every inducement of self-interest to protect his good name and reputation, and it is inconceivable that he will falsely accuse himself. In many cases also the prompt and proper administration of justice requires the acceptance of a broader and more liberal rule of evidence. The opposing party frequently has no knowledge that the witness is to testify until he takes the stand. It may then be too late to obtain a record of his conviction from other courts or counties, or even from distant States, without delaying the trial. Even if possible to obtain it, its production may be accompanied by great expense. Why should this burden be imposed upon a party seeking to impeach the credibility of the witness, if the witness himself is willing to admit the fact sought to be proved? If he does not admit it, it must then be proved by the record and the record is conclusive. If he does admit it, it would seem only reasonable to explore the source of evidence which is ready at hand rather than to seek for that which is far away and which it may require considerable time and money to produce, when there is apparently as little liability of error in the one source of evidence as in the other. Reason is the life of the law. "Cessante ratione legis cessat ipsa lex." . . .

We believe the result here reached to be fully sustained by authority as well as reason. In 1 Greenleaf's Evidence, 16 thed., § 461 b, it is said that "the propriety of proving the conviction by cross-examination has come in most jurisdictions to be conceded." . . .

It is claimed that the question here presented is no longer an open one in this State, but has been settled in support of the respondent's contention. A careful examination of the cases relied upon, while they may contain some dicta favorable to the respondent's contention, shows that the question here raised has not before received the full consideration of this Court. . . .

As we are free, therefore, to follow the dictates of our own reason, and the result reached is not opposed to any previous decision of this Court, but is fully sustained as we believe by other Courts of the highest authority, we hold that when the respondent Bartlett offered himself as a witness in his own behalf his previous conviction might be shown by his own cross-examination. In both cases. Exceptions overruled.

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1871

ASSUMPSIT for goods sold; brought to the Superior Court in Fairfield County, and tried to the jury, on the general issue, before GRANGER, J. Verdict for the plaintiffs, and motion for a new trial for error in the rulings and charge of the court. The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Sturges, in support of the motion. Beardsley, contra.

FOSTER, J. There are not grounds for disturbing the verdict and granting a new trial in this case. . . .

The remaining question is as to the admissibility in evidence of a copy of a letter said to have been written by the plaintiffs to the defendant.

The plaintiffs offered to prove that on the 13th of March, 1868, a letter was written by them addressed to the defendant, in which was enclosed a statement of their account against him, which statement, it was admitted, the defendant had previously requested the plaintiffs to forward him by mail. It must be presumed that defendant was notified to produce this letter, though the motion does not state the fact. It does state however that to prove the contents of the letter, the defendant claiming that the original was not in his possession, the plaintiffs offered a writing which A. J. Cameron, one of the plaintiffs, swore was a true copy of the original letter forwarded by mail to the defendant enclosing a statement of their account. On cross-examination the witness testified that the copy offered in evidence was copied from the plaintiffs' letter book, which contained an impression of the original, made at the time it was written, by the copy-press process, and that he knew this to be an exact copy of the original letter. The defendant objected to the admission of the copy in evidence, solely on the ground that it was a copy of a copy, but the Court admitted it.

This objection is purely technical, and may be considered therefore on technical grounds.

In the argument before us the defendant's counsel assume that the machine copy was in the possession and so in the power of the plaintiffs. Such may have been the fact, but the motion is silent on the subject. For aught that appears the letter book, containing this machine copy, was not in existence. Nor does the motion disclose when the copy offered in evidence was made. It may have been made at the same time that the machine copy was made, and if so it would clearly be admissible as one of two duplicate copies. But if made afterwards, as most probably it was, we still think it was admissible.

The sole objection to its admissibility, it must be borne in mind, is, that it was a copy of a copy. The ground of the objection supposes the original to be lost, or out of reach of the plaintiff. If that were not so, the objection to any copy would be insuperable. Now the rule that a copy of a copy is not evidence properly applies to cases where the original is still in existence and capable of being compared with it; or where it is the copy of a copy of a record, the record being still in existence, and being by law as high evidence as the original. The reason of the rule is the same in both cases, the copy offered is two removes from the original. But it is quite a different question where the original is lost, and the record is not deemed in law as high as the original. Winn v. Patterson, 9 Pet. Rep. 677, per STORY, J. In Robertson v. Lynch, 18 Johns. Rep. 450, after notice to the defendant to produce an original letter, the Court admitted in evidence to prove its contents a copy made from the letter book of the plaintiffs, on the testimony of a clerk who testified that he copied the original into the letter book, and that the copy offered in evidence was a true copy of the copy in the letter book; on a motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, the case went off on another point, but the Court say, — "We are inclined to think that none of the other objections" (this was one) "are well founded."

The witness in this case testified that he knew the paper offered to be an exact copy of the original letter. That, we think, made it admissible; the proper foundation for the admission of secondary evidence having been previously laid. The facts elicited on the cross-examination, at the most, go no farther than to show that this was a second copy, verified as a true copy of the original. It was properly admitted.

There should be no new trial.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

SUB-TITLE II. RULES OF PREFERENCE AS BETWEEN DIFFERENT KINDS OF WITNESSES

Topic 1. Rule Preferring the Attesting Witness

351. History.[1] The rule requiring the calling of a person who has attested a deed by his subscription comes down to us as the survival of a very early procedure. The connection by tradition is direct, though the original rule belongs to an epoch wholly alien in its ideas of proof and trial. Its history has been thus set forth:

Professor James Bradley Thayer, "Preliminary Treatise on Evidence" (1898, p. 502). "[The rule] has a clear and very old origin. Such persons belonged to that very ancient class of transaction or business witnesses, running far back into the old Germanic law, who were once the only sort of witnesses that could be compelled to come before a court. Their allowing themselves to be called in and set down as attesting witnesses was understood to be an assent in advance to such a compulsory summons. Proof by witnesses could not be made by those who merely happened casually to know the fact. However exact and full the knowledge of any person might be, he could not, in the old Germanic procedure, be called in court as a witness, unless he had been called at the time of the event as a preappointed witness. It was a part of such a system and in accordance with such a set of ideas that witnesses formally allowed their names to be written into deeds in large numbers. When jury trial, or rather proof by jury, as it originally was, came in, the old proof by witnesses was joined with it when the execution of the deed was denied; and the same process that summoned the twelve, summoned also these witnesses. The phrase of the precept to the sheriff was summone duodecim (etc. etc.) cum aliis. The presence of these witnesses was at first as necessary as that of the jury. Great delays and embarrassments attended such a requirement where the number of witnesses might be so great; the jury was cumbersome enough anyway. Accordingly, in 1318, the presence of the witnesses was made no longer absolutely necessary; they must still be summoned, but the case might go on without them. After another century and a half the process against the witness became no longer a necessity. It was not issued unless it were called for. After still another century, in 1562–3, process against all kinds of witnesses was allowed, requiring them to come in, not with the jury or as a part of the jury, but to testify before them in open court, and then the old procedure of summoning such witnesses with the jury seems to have died out; [but they must still be summoned as witnesses.] . . . As late as the early part of the eighteenth century it was doubtful whether a deed could be proved at all, if the attesting witnesses came in and denied it. Half a century later, Lord Mansfield, while reluctantly yielding to what he stigmatized as a captious objection that you must produce the witness, declared that 'It is a technical rule that the subscribing witness must be produced; and it cannot be dispensed with unless it appeared that his attendance could not be produced.'"

This ancient rule thus continued to be enforced long after the disappearance of the primitive system of trial and the notions of proof in which it had its origin. By the end of the 1700s rules of evidence began to be argued out, but no sound reason could in truth be furnished for the strict and entire perpetuation of the rule. Under such circumstances, insufficient and inconsistent reasons were likely to be advanced.

(1) A favorite reason was that the parties to the document had agreed to make the attester their witness to prove execution. The difficulty about this reason is that no such agreement can be implied, particularly where attestation is required by law.

(2) Another reason, suggested almost as often, was that the opponent is entitled to the benefit of cross-examining the attesting-witness as to the circumstances of execution; or, put in another way, that the attester may not only know more than some other person observing the execution, but may be able to speak as to fraud, duress, or other matters of defence. The objections to this reason are numerous. First, it is inconsistent with the rule itself; for the rule applies even where fraud, duress, and time are not in issue, and even where the maker himself is competent as a witness. Again, the attester is in practice not usually a person who knows anything about the circumstances preceding the document's execution, or knows more than any other person who by being present would be a qualified witness. Finally, if the witness does possess special knowledge about some affirmative issue, the opponent is the proper person to call the witness, if he desires him. This reason for the rule, then, is no more capable of defence than the first.

(3) Has the rule, then, no justification in policy? It certainly has none, in its original broad form. But in most jurisdictions it has by statute been limited to documents required by law to be attested; and in this shape it seems to be entirely justifiable. In the first place, the attestation is in such cases required by law as a special precaution against forgery; thus the attestation itself must in any case be proved as an element in the validity of the document, and there seems to be no special hardship in obtaining the witness rather than in obtaining evidence of his signature. In the next place, such documents are, in most jurisdictions, wills of deceased persons and deeds of illiterate persons; for such documents, the maker himself being either deceased or not acquainted with writings, the attester's testimony is almost inevitably the most desirable and most trustworthy source of information as to the fact of execution; moreover, it is in such cases that the defences of fraud or undue influence are most likely to be made, and here also the attester's testimony is likely to be of use and ought to be obtained if possible. Still further, in these and all other cases where attestation is legally required, the situation is one in which by hypothesis the risk of a false document is serious.

At common law the rule was applied to all kinds of documents whatever, when purporting to bear an attestation, whether or not the document was sealed, whether or not it was in the nature of a specialty, and whether or not the attestation was required by law as an element of the document's validity. But by the beginning of the 1800s the unnecessary hardship and the mere technicality of the rule in this broadness of scope began to be recognized. It may be supposed, too, that the then increasing resort to handwriting-testimony made it easier to rely less upon attesting witnesses. Accordingly, in 1854, England restricted the rule thereafter to documents required by law to be attested, and this statute has been adopted in Canada also.

In the United States, the common-law doctrine was recognized to have the same scope as in England; except that by a few Courts it was confined to documents under seal. In most jurisdictions, however, a statutory restriction has been enacted similar to that of England. Under such restrictions, the rule comes into application chiefly for wills and for illiterates' deeds, and, in England, for powers of appointment. Moreover, even where the common-law rule obtains in strictness, the principle which dispenses with it for proof by copies of registered instruments relieves nowadays in most instances from its harshness.

352. STATUTES. England. (1854, St. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, § 26). It shall not be necessary to prove by the attesting witness any instrument to the validity of which attestation is not requisite; and such instrument may be proved by admission, or otherwise, as if there had been no attesting witness thereto.

Illinois. (Revised Statutes 1874, c. 51, § 51). [Whenever any instrument] not required by law to be attested by a subscribing witness [is offered in a civil cause,] and the same shall appear to have been so attested, and it shall become necessary to prove the execution of any such deed or other writing otherwise than as now provided by law, it shall not be necessary to prove the execution of the same by a subscribing witness to the exclusion of other evidence, but the execution of such instrument may be proved by secondary evidence without producing or accounting for the absence of the subscribing witness or witnesses.

Massachusetts. (St. 1897, c. 386, Revised Laws 1902, c. 175, § 70). The signature to an attested instrument or writing, except a will, may be proved in the same manner as if it were not attested.

New York. (Laws 1883, c. 195, § 1). Except in the case of written instruments to the validity of which a subscribing witness, or subscribing witnesses, is, or are necessary, whenever, upon the trial of any action, civil or criminal, or upon the hearing of any judicial proceeding, a written instrument is offered in evidence, to which there is a subscribing witness, it shall not be necessary to call such subscribing witness, but such instrument may be proved in the same manner as it might be proved if there was no subscribing witness thereto.

353. BOOTLE v. BLUNDELL

CHANCERY. 1815

19 Ves. Jr. 494

THE bill was filed by devisees; praying, that the Will of Henry Blundell may be established against the heir at law.

John Blanchard by his depositions proved the will, dated the 24th of July, 1809, in the regular form; and that the testator at the time of signing and publishing the said Will was of sound and disposing mind, memory, and understanding, as the examinant verily believes. The same witness proved a Codicil, dated the 25th of May, 1810, also in the regular form. . . . When the witnesses were called in, Stonor said aloud to the testator, that the witnesses to the Codicil were come; but the examinant cannot recollect whether he made any answer, either by word, sign, or otherwise.

Henry Holland proved the execution of the Will; and stated, that at the time of signing and publishing the Will he did not form any opinion or belief whether the testator was or was not of sound or disposing mind, &c., and cannot now say, whether he was or was not so at the time. The testator's butler requested the examinant to go to the testator's house, where he met Blanchard and James Goore in the servant's hall. He imagined they were there to witness Mr. Blundell's Will; as the same persons had done so six or seven times before. They found with the testator Stonor, and a servant woman, named Gibbing. Stonor said to him with a loud voice, "The witnesses to your Will are come, Sir;" and the testator seemed to understand what was said, and said something to the servant, who immediately left the room. The Will was then actually sealed; and the testator then signed his name; and taking a seal, then lying upon the table, in his hand, put it upon the wax; and Stonor said, "Now publish and declare this to be your last Will;" and the testator then uttered those words, or to the like effect. The examinant and the other witnesses then subscribed in the presence of the testator and of Stonor. . . .

This witness also proved the Codicil; but stated, that he had great doubts, whether at the time of signing the Codicil the testator was of sound mind, &c., as it is hard to know what is within a man, except he saw and knew more of a man than he did of Mr. Blundell. He appeared to be dozing. Stonor put his hand on his shoulder, and said, the witnesses were come to witness his will, and Blundell not appearing to understand repeated it; to which he answered by his manner, and the noise, which issued from his mouth, as if he understood and assented to it. The Codicil was then placed before him, and a pen given to him, by Stonor. Blundell began to write his name; but Stonor seeing the pen did not mark, took it up, and dipped it in the ink, and returned it to Blundell; who then signed his name. . . . When they went down to the servant's hall, the examinant declared to the other witnesses, and the butler, that they were damned rogues for what they had just been doing, for there was something damnably wrong, he was sure; at which time there was a general laugh; but Blanchard said, "We do not know what is in a man." After the execution of the Codicil the examinant and the other witnesses signed a paper, written by Stonor, expressing that the testator had acknowledged, that he had heard the Codicil read. . . .

James Goore, the third attesting witness, proved the execution of the Will; and stated, that he cannot tell, whether at the time Mr. Blundell signed he was of sound mind, &c. "I neither believe, nor I don't disbelieve it; for I cannot say it." He also proved the Codicil; stating, that it is more than he can say, whether at the time of signing it Mr. Blundell was of sound and disposing mind, &c. "He was so deaf and blind, that it is more than the examinant can say;" and he never saw him after it was signed.

Mr. Stonor stated, that on the 21st of July he read over and fully explained the draft of the Will to Mr. Blundell; who expressed his satisfaction. . . .

An issue, Devisavit vel non, was directed. At the trial, at the Assizes for the county of Lancaster, the counsel for the plaintiffs examined Blanchard, to prove the Will and Codicil; declining to call the other two subscribing witnesses; and after the examination of the surgeon and physician, whose evidence was strong as to the general capacity, with temporary stupor, the consequence of an attack of jaundice, the counsel for the defendant, who was present, with his consent gave up the cause.

Sir Samuel Romilly and Mr. Roupell, for the defendant, moved for a new trial; complaining of the manner in which this issue, directed for the satisfaction of the Court, was tried, without examining all the attesting witnesses.

Mr. Hart, Mr. Bell, and Mr. Horne, for the plaintiffs, contended, that the rule requiring the examination of all the witnesses was confined to the Court of Equity; and could not be applied to a trial at Law either by ejectment or in an issue.

The Lord Chancellor (Eldon). — The rule of this court, requiring that to establish a Will of real estate all the three witnesses shall be examined, is not by any means, as it has been represented, a merely technical rule. . . . This proceeding is in Equity, to establish a Will, aiming to say to the heir, that, if the will shall be once established against him, he can never claim the devised property again, . . . therefore, before an heir shall be deprived of that opportunity which the Law gives him, . . . the Court, as it will know the whole truth, expects that all the witnesses shall be examined on the one side or the other. . . .

February 13th. The Lord Chancellor (Eldon).— From the account I have seen of what passed at the trial, I perceive that one of the counsel, referring to a dictum (2 Bro. C. C. 503) of Lord Thurlow, in the case of Powel v. Cleaver, seems to consider the rule of this Court, as to proving a will, doubtful. I now, therefore, state the general rule, that all the witnesses must be examined. That rule is laid down by Lord Hardwicke in a MS. note by Mr. Joddrell; where, two only of the witnesses having been examined, it was contended on a Bill of Review, that this was error apparent on the Record; but as the third witness was dead, Lord Hardwicke held that to be a necessary exception out of the rule. So in another case in 1741, Billing v. Brooksbank, as the witness, being out of the kingdom, could not be examined, Lord Hardwicke considered that another case of exception out of the general rule; which, I repeat, is, that all the witnesses must be examined; that general rule admitting necessary exceptions, and perhaps not applying where the will is not wholly, but only partially, in question. . . .

No one of these three witnesses denies his attestation. Upon the point of competency Blanchard says, he thinks the devisor was of competent mind at the execution of the will, doubting a little as to the codicil. Holland says, he gave a sign, and seemed to assent; and Goore will not say, that he was not competent. If they had all denied their attestation, but it could be proved by circumstances that they unjustly denied it, the will might be proved to be a good will by other circumstances.

The whole of the evidence then must be taken together; and upon the neutral effect of Holland's and Goore's testimony, putting this question to a jury, was he upon the 24th of July, and in that hour (for I should put it as close as that), when he executed his will, competent to understand that, which he did undeniably understand on the 21st, and direct to be prepared for his execution, attending to the rules of evidence, and the legal weight to be given to testimony, both of the attesting witnesses (differing, as I do, in some shades from what I have heard upon that), I should have felt myself bound to say, this was a good will. . . .

Therefore, though the rule is clear, that a will cannot be established, unless all the three witnesses are examined, with the exception of cases of necessity, such as I have mentioned, . . . yet, guarding this case as a precedent, I will not grant a new trial, the heir having judged for himself at the time of this trial; and I so determine with the less reluctance, thinking it impossible to shake this will, and in all probability equally impossible to shake the codicil.

354. HOLMES v. HOLLOMAN

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI. 1849.

12 Mo. 536

APPEAL from Ste. Genevieve Circuit Court.

This was a proceeding in the Circuit Court of Ste. Genevieve county, to establish the will of Elizabeth S. Holmes, probate of which had been denied by the County Court of that county. Richard M. Holmes and James W. Holmes were the attesting witnesses, and they were heirs at law to the testatrix. It appeared that by the will of Elizabeth Holmes, all her property was left to her nephew, Allen Augustus Holloman, a minor, by whose prochein ami this proceeding was instituted. The proceedings of the Probate Court, in relation to the will, which were read in the Circuit Court without objection, showed that the execution of the will was sworn to by both of the attesting witnesses, but one of these testified that the testatrix was of unsound mind.

Upon the trial of the issue, devisavit vel non, in the Circuit Court, the two subscribing witnesses to the will, who had been heirs at law cited to appear, refused to testify. The Court thereupon admitted other witnesses, who established the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, and the handwriting and signature of the testatrix, as well as the facts that the will was signed and attested by the testatrix, and the witnesses in the presence of each other, and that she was of sound mind. These facts were found by the jury upon instructions from the Court.

Frissell, for appellant. . . . A will cannot be established by other evidence that that of the subscribing witnesses, unless they are dead or out of the jurisdiction of the court. 1 Phillipps' Evidence (Hill & Cowen) 496. In the probate of a will made in the Circuit Court, the subscribing witnesses must be examined unless they are dead, or cannot be found. Mo. Stat. 1083, § 34.

Fitzgerald, for appellee. . . . If witnesses refuse to testify, the attestation may be proved by other testimony. 1 Starkie's Evidence, 324, and notes. 3rd. If witnesses of a will be interested, on proof of that fact, other testimony may be offered to establish the will. . . .

NAPTON, J. (after stating the facts as above). The only points relied on in this cause are in relation to the admissibility of the witnesses who were permitted to prove the execution of the will. . . . Our statute requires a will to be attested by two or more competent witnesses, but if the witnesses are competent, at the time of the execution of the will, a subsequent incompetency will not affect the validity or formality of its execution. If this was so, the purposes of a testator might be defeated by events which no precaution on his part could anticipate or prevent. Hence, it is held, that where a witness to a will is competent, when he attests, a subsequent commission of a crime or succession to an estate under the devise, will not invalidate the execution, but in such cases the handwriting of the witnesses may be proved.

Our statute has provided for several cases of this kind. Thus, where the witnesses, or either of them, are dead, insane, or their residences unknown, secondary evidence is expressly authorized. These instances are not, I apprehend, to be construed upon the maxim of "expressio unius exclusio alterius," but are merely a codification of what was already the common law, and a recognition of the principle upon which secondary evidence may be admitted. This principle will apply as well to other cases of incompetency arising subsequent to the execution of the will as to the cases put.

The witnesses to the will were clearly competent at the time of subscribing. They were heirs at law, and not legatees or devisees under the will. Their interest was against the establishment of the will, and under such circumstances this Court has recognized their competency in several cases. They relied upon their exemption as parties to the record, and relying upon the privileges incident to such a position, refused to testify. If such a refusal should have the effect now claimed, and prevent the introduction of other testimony to establish the will, the intentions of the testator must be very often liable to be defeated, and a will valid at the date of its execution, be rendered inoperative by subsequent circumstances not likely to be foreseen.

Judgment affirmed.

355. McVICKER v. CONKLE

SUPREME COURT OF GEORGIA. 1895

96 Ga. 584; 24 S. E. 23

COMPLAINT for land. Before Judge HUNT. Henry Superior Court. April Term, 1894.

The plaintiff in error, A. V. McVicker, in his representative capacity as administrator upon the estate of Kellett Babb, brought an action of ejectment against the defendant for the premises involved in the pending controversy. Both parties claimed under Kellett Babb; the former by virtue of his possession as administrator, and the latter, being the grandson of Kellett Babb, claimed title under and by virtue of a deed alleged to have been executed by Kellett Babb on the 11th day of August, 1870, to his daughter Rebecca E. Babb, and a deed from Rebecca E. Babb to himself, dated November 8th, 1890. The deed from Kellett Babb to Rebecca E. Babb purports to have been signed by the maker in the presence of two witnesses, Miles H. Campbell and Colville Babb, a son of Kellett Babb the maker. Upon the trial, it appeared that both the maker and the subscribing witnesses were dead, and it was proven that the names subscribed to the deed as attesting witnesses were in the handwriting, respectively, of the two persons who purported to be subscribing witnesses. No witness testified to the actual signing of the deed by the maker, and no evidence was offered showing the signature of the alleged maker to have been in the handwriting of Kellett Babb. To the introduction of this deed the plaintiff objected, upon the ground that no such evidence of its execution had been submitted as would authorize its admission in evidence, which objection was overruled, and this is one of the principal grounds urged in support of the plaintiff's motion for a new trial which was subsequently made.

E. J. Reagan, for plaintiff. G. W. Bryan and W. T. Dicken, for defendant.

ATKINSON, Justice (after stating the facts as above). The ruling has been long established, that an instrument purporting to be attested by a subscribing witness must be proved by the testimony of that witness, if he be accessible; the exceptions to the general rule being in favor of ancient documents which, upon the presumption of authenticity resulting from old age and attendant circumstances of verity, are said to prove themselves; official bonds required by law to be approved or attested by a particular officer; those papers which are only incidentally or collaterally material to the case. Our Code provides, that if the witness is not produced, or, being produced, cannot recollect the transaction, the Court may hear any other evidence to prove its execution. See § 3838. If there be several attesting witnesses, the absence of all must be accounted for before secondary evidence will be received; but when the absence of all the attesting witnesses is accounted for, it will be deemed sufficient, in order to establish the execution of the writing, to prove the handwriting of one of them. In such a case, proof of the subscribing witness' handwriting is evidence of the execution of the instrument by the party therein named whose signature the instrument purports to bear. It will not be necessary to prove the handwriting of the party. Phillipps on Evidence, vol. 2, p. 214. . . .

In the case of Stebbins v. Duncan, 108 U. S. 44, the Court, in stating the rule, employs the following language: "As the witnesses to the deed were shown to be dead, the method pointed out by law to establish the execution of the deed was by proof of the handwriting of the witnesses to the deed," citing Clark v. Courtney, 5 Peters 319; Cooke v. Woodrow, 5 Cranch, 13. . . . In the case of Watts v. Kilburn, 7 Ga. 358, Judge LUMPKIN, speaking for the Court, states the rule to be: "But if the witness be dead, or blind, or insane, or infamous, or interested since the execution of the paper, or beyond the process or jurisdiction of the court, or not to be found after diligent search and inquiry, the course is to prove his handwriting." Upon the general features of the rule, he makes the following observation: "Distinguished judges have thought that proof of the handwriting of the party executing the instrument is better evidence of the execution than proof of the handwriting of the attesting witness;" and for this observation, he cites 3 Binn. 192; 2 Johns. 451; 11 Mass. 309. . . .

While, as a rule of evidence, the one announced is too firmly established in the jurisprudence of this State to be called in question or disregarded by the judiciary, the writer, in the discussion which follows, speaking for himself alone, is of the opinion that it may well be doubted whether its literal application is likely to produce the most satisfactory results in the course of judicial investigation. . . . Our investigations have led us to inquire what reasons were assigned by the first judges who undertook to declare the rule in question; for investigation will reveal that none of those rules which enter into and constitute the great body of the law, and which, among the vulgar and uninformed, are sometimes erroneously termed technicalities of the law, were in the first instance either unwise or arbitrary, but were always based upon correct principles of reasoning and made necessary to meet conditions existing in society, and were really designed to be, and were at the time of their adoption, in furtherance of substantial justice. But times change, and men and conditions change with them, and hence that other maxim of the law, that when the reason of the law ceases, the law ceases with it. . . .

In the earlier history of England, when the system of transferring estates by written evidence of title was first invented, but few, even of the nobility, were familiar with the art of writing; and it seems that about the time of the Norman Conquest, and before, seals were employed as representing and standing in lieu of the actual signature to an instrument by the maker. . . . To the end that the fact of execution might be established, it was requisite that this signing and sealing should be in the presence of witnesses, who, in that day and time, if the deed were called in question, were required to sit upon the jury to assist in arriving at what was the true contract between the parties. . . . From this circumstance, with the advance of knowledge, and the improvements in the method of administering the law, the rule was evolved which required the party affirming a deed to prove its execution by those who were called to witness the same, and not otherwise. . . . Inasmuch as few of them were themselves able to write, they were not required to sign in person their own names upon the deed; but in earlier times they were indorsed there by the clerk or scrivener who drafted the deed, he himself acting in the capacity of a species of superior subscribing witness; and inasmuch as usually the grantor himself was incapable of signing his name, in case of the death or inaccessibility of all of these witnesses especially selected to attest the execution of the instrument, the next highest and best evidence would be proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses. These were the conditions at the time we get the first glimpse of the existence of the rule which authorizes the proof of the execution of an instrument by the maker, by evidence of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses; and they afford a good reason for the adoption of the rule in question. It arose from the necessity of the case. The dense and almost universal ignorance of letters which prevailed in England, made the adoption of any other impracticable. . . .

If this be the correct reason for the existence of the rule, and we know of no other or better that has been assigned, there is little reason why in this day and generation it should be continued. In the onward march of civilization and of letters, man has advanced to a point where there are relatively but few who cannot now subscribe their names. . . . Therefore, whenever an issue is made upon the execution of a deed, the primary inquiry is, Was it signed by the alleged maker? . . . The real question then upon the execution of a deed being as to the actual signing, the primary inquiry should be as to the fact. . . . Let us assume that the evidence is doubtful as to the signatures of the subscribing witnesses, but direct and positive as to the actual execution of the instrument by the maker; who can doubt but that, in a court of justice seeking for the purest and most direct sources of information, such a deed ought to be established? The real issue being, in such cases, whether the maker in fact signed his name to the paper, the chosen witnesses should first be called to prove that fact; but if they be not in existence or be inaccessible, then the next best evidence is that which establishes most directly the point at issue, and that evidence would be either the testimony of some witness not called upon to attest the deed, but who saw the maker sign it, or evidence that the signature attached to the deed was in the actual handwriting of the maker. And yet, according to the rule under discussion, Courts are required to reject such direct testimony, and submit to the jury the question as to whether or not the execution is satisfactorily proven by the inference resulting from proof of the handwriting of the alleged subscribing witnesses. . . .

As an abstract principle of law, the rule in question has been always of force in Georgia; but under §§ 3838 and 3839 of the Code, which provide, in speaking of subscribing witnesses, that "if the witness is not produced, or, being produced, cannot recollect the transaction, the Court may hear any other evidence to prove its execution"; "proof of handwriting may be resorted to in the absence of direct evidence of execution," the circuit judges have been accustomed in many instances to relax somewhat of its severity, and, assuming that under the sections quoted, a certain discretion was conferred upon them, in the classification of secondary evidence, have required that the evidence be directed to proof of the handwriting of the maker of the instrument, rather than to the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses. The writer is of the opinion, that since no better reason can be assigned for the existence of this rule than its antiquity, and since under conditions at present existing the reason of the rule has long since ceased, the Legislature might well abrogate it, and substitute therefor another, less arbitrary, less technical, and better adjusted to our judicial system. . . . Judgment reversed.

356. GILLIS v. GILLIS

SUPREME COURT OF GEORGIA. 1895

96 Ga. 1; 23 S. E. 107

APPEAL. Before Judge GAMBLE, Emanuel Superior Court. April Term, 1894.

Williams & Smith, Hines & Hale and Felder & Davis, for plaintiffs in error.

Cain & Polhill, Evans & Evans, Alfred Herrington, F. H. Saffold, H. R. Daniel and H. D. D. Twiggs, contra.

LUMPKIN, Justice. — The nominated executors of the alleged last will of Sarah Gillis propounded the same for probate, and a caveat was filed by some of her heirs at law. On the trial in the Superior Court, to which court the case had been carried by appeal, there was a verdict for the propounders; and the caveators bring up for review a judgment overruling their motion for a new trial. . . .

The paper purporting to be the will was executed by the testatrix on the 12th day of March, 1873. It bears the names of four witnesses, but it was conceded that the last of them signed his name some time after the execution of the paper by the testatrix and its attestation by the other witnesses, and it does not appear that he signed in her presence. The appearance, therefore, of the name of this witness upon the paper counts for nothing in determining the question of the legality of its execution.

Accordingly, the fact that he signed will be ignored altogether, and it will be understood that in speaking of the subscribing witnesses to the paper, reference to the other three only is intended. One of these signed by making her mark. Another died before the testatrix. The usual and formal attestation clause was used. The paper was offered for probate soon after the death of the testatrix, and about twenty years after its execution and attestation. At the time of probate, the two subscribing witnesses then in life were produced. The one who wrote his own name proved the due execution of the paper as a will. The signature of the deceased witness was shown to be in his handwriting. The illiterate witness testified that she had no recollection of attesting the will, and could not swear to the making of her mark. At the same time, however, she did not expressly swear that she did not attest by her mark the paper propounded. . . .

Error was assigned upon the admission in evidence of the paper propounded, over the objection that there was no sufficient evidence from the subscribing witnesses as to its execution; and also upon admitting the testimony of Mary Gillis as to the execution of the paper by the testatrix and its attestation by the subscribing witnesses, over the objection that she, not being herself a subscribing witness, was incompetent to testify as to these matters.

It is well settled that the subscribing witnesses to a will must, if practicable, be called and examined; but the fate of a will does not depend entirely upon their testimony. Upon the trial of an application to prove a will in solemn form, they are, all of them, unless accounted for, indispensable necessary witnesses; but the testimony, even as to the factum of execution, is not confined to them. The fact to be established is the proper execution of the will. If that is proved by competent testimony, it is sufficient, no matter from what quarter the testimony comes, providing the attesting witnesses are among those who bear testimony, or their absence is explained. The inquiry, as in other cases, is whether, taking all the testimony together, the fact is duly established. It is not required that any one or more of the essential facts should be proved by all, or any number, of the attesting witnesses. The right is simply to have the attesting witnesses examined, no matter what their testimony may be. The law does not allow proof of the valid execution and attestation of a will to be defeated at the time of probate by the failure of the memory on the part of any of the subscribing witnesses. Deupree v. Deupree, 45 Ga. 442–443; . . . Lawyer v. Smith, 8 Mich. 411, 77 Am. Dec. 460; Brown v. Clark, 77 N. Y. 369; . . . Or, by their even denying their signatures to the will altogether, when such denial is overcome by other competent evidence. Pearson v. Wightman, 1 Mill 336, 12 Am. Dec. 636; Matter of Higgins, 94 N. Y. 554. . . . Gardner v. Granniss, 57 Ga. 555. In Deupree v. Deupree, supra, decided in the year 1872, McCay, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: . . .

"How many wills do not come up for probate until many years after the execution of them! Sometimes, the witnesses can only recognize their own handwriting; sometimes they only remember the fact that the testator signed, and perhaps only that they signed. Who was present, and all other details, have passed from memory. To say that under such circumstances the will is not to be probated, would be a death-blow to wills." . . .

There is nothing in § 2424 of the Code, upon the probate of wills in solemn form, which, rightly construed, conflicts with the law as declared in this opinion. This section does not require that the subscribing witnesses "in existence and within the jurisdiction of the court" shall each swear, at the time of probate, to their own subscriptions and to the signature and testamentary capacity of the testator, in order to make a will valid; for thus construing the section would lead to obvious and glaring wrongs and absurdities. It simply means that they must be produced for the purpose of testifying to these facts, if competent. This section of the code must be taken, not literally but in accordance with common sense and the usual rules of construction. . . . The main reason of the rule for calling all witnesses in a proceeding for probate in solemn form is, to give the other party an opportunity of cross-examining them; and while the law requires a will to be attested by three witnesses, it does not necessarily mean that all three must concur in their testimony to prove it on probate. To do this would make the validity of the will depend upon the memory and good faith of the witnesses, and not upon that reasonable proof the law demands in other cases. . . .

§ 2424 does not, when considered in connection with the well-established law on the subject of the attestation and proof of wills, as already shown, prevent the probate of a will on account of defect of memory, or even perjury, of a subscribing witness, when the deficiency is supplied by other evidence; because the general rules of evidence, and the force and effect of legal evidence, were not intended to be disregarded in probating wills even in solemn form. . . . Judgment affirmed.

357. MORE v. MORE

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1904

211 Ill. 268; 71 N. E. 988

WRIT of Error to the Circuit Court of DeWitt county; the Hon. W. G. COCHRAN, Judge, presiding.

On the 15th day of October, 1898, the plaintiff in error produced in the County Court of DeWitt county an instrument in writing purporting to be the last will and testament of one George More, together with her certificate and affidavit, duly subscribed and sworn to before the clerk of said county court, showing that the said George More departed this life on the 27th day of September, 1898. So much of the alleged will as is necessary to be here shown is as follows:

"In the name of God, amen. I, George More, of the county of De Witt, in the State of Illinois, of the age of about fifty-four years, being of sound mind and memory and understanding but considering the uncertainty of this transitory life, do make and publish this my last will and testament in manner and form following, to-wit: . . . (Here follow devises and bequests contained in four clauses not important to be recited.)

"And lastly, I nominate, constitute and appoint my said wife, Matilda More, to be the executrix of this my last will, hereby revoking all other wills by me made and declaring this and no other to be my last will and testament; and further, that my wife have the right to letters of executrix without giving bond.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 17th day of June, A.D. 1881.

George More. (L. S.)

"Witnesses: Wm. Fuller, of Clinton, Illinois.
Jas. A. Wilson, Clinton, Illinois."

It was proven that William Fuller and James A. Wilson, whose names appear as witnesses to said will, had each departed this life prior to the death of the said George More, deceased.

Such proceedings were had in said County Court as resulted in an order admitting the instrument to probate as the last will and testament of the said George More, deceased. From this order an appeal was prosecuted to the Circuit Court of DeWitt county. . . . No testimony was offered except that produced in behalf of the plaintiff in error. It appeared from the proof that the will bore the signature of the said George More, deceased, as the maker thereof, and also the genuine signatures of the said William Fuller and James A. Wilson as witnesses thereto; that the body of the will was in the handwriting of the witness William Fuller, and that the word "witnesses" was also in the handwriting of said Fuller; that both of said witnesses were dead and had died prior to the death of the testator, the maker of the will; that said Fuller was a lawyer and had been for many years engaged in the practice of his profession; that James A. Wilson was a well known citizen of DeWitt county and had served for several terms as county treasurer of the county.

The contention of the defendants in error is that there was no proof whatever that the testator was of sound mind and memory when he signed the will, or that the witnesses signed in the presence of each other, or in the presence of the testator, or at his request, as they contend is required by the statute to be proven. . . .

It was adjudged that the evidence produced was insufficient to authorize the probate of the will, and an order was entered refusing probate thereof. This is a writ of error sued out of this court to bring the order of the circuit court into review. . . .

John Fuller and George W. Herrick, for plaintiff in error. O. E. Harris, and E. B. Mitchell, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Boggs (after stating the facts above) delivered the opinion of the Court:

Section 2 of chapter 148, entitled "Wills," (Hurd's Stat. 1903, p. 1905), declares what shall be required to be done and proven in order to entitle a will to be probated in cases where the attesting witnesses are living. Section 6 of the same chapter provides for the proof necessary to be made where any one or more of the attesting witnesses shall have died. . . . We think the proof submitted on the hearing in the Circuit Court met the requirements of the provisions of said section 6, and that the trial Court erred in refusing to admit the will to probate.

In Hobart v. Hobart, 154 Ill. 610, we said (p. 614):

"The death of the witness merely changes the form of the proof. It permits secondary evidence to be introduced of the due attestation and execution of the will. The attestation is then to be shown, as it would be in case of deeds, by proof of the handwriting of the witness. As to him it is to be presumed that he duly attested the will in the presence of the testator."

Out of the evidence in this case the presumption arose that the witnesses duly attested the will in the presence of the testator. If a perfect and formal attestation clause, reciting that all statutory requirements had been complied with, had been signed by the attesting witnesses, the presumption of regularity and compliance with statutory requirements would have arisen and warranted the admission of the will to probate. (1 Underhill on Wills, 275, 276). . . . It is not indispensable, however, that the witnesses shall sign a formal clause of attestation. (Robinson v. Brewster, 140 Ill. 649.) The attestation clause may consist of a single word, as "witness," "attest" or "test," or there may be no words at all. (Robinson v. Brewster, supra; 1 Redfield on Wills, 132.) In case of the death of the witnesses to a will which on the face thereof appears to have been regularly executed and is shown to bear the genuine signatures of the testator and the witnesses, compliance with the statutory requirement is to be presumed, in the absence of express recitals to that effect. 1 Jarman on Wills, pp. 219, 220.

The act of attestation of a will is not merely to witness the mere fact that the testator signed the will or acknowdged that he had signed the same, but the attention of the witnesses is called, by the act of attestation, to the mental condition of the testator and as to whether he is possessed of a sound, disposing mind, and, therefore, if the will appears on the face thereof to have been duly executed and it is proven that the signatures thereto are the genuine writing of the maker and the witnesses, if the attesting witnesses be dead an inference arises, from the mere fact of attestation, that the witnesses believed that the testator possessed testamentary capacity at the time of the execution of the will, though there be no formal recital to the effect. . . . This inference fairly arose in the case at bar, and was supplemented by the testimony which disclosed that the deceased, at the time of making the will, transacted intelligently, ordinary business affairs of life. It was therefore established prima facie by the proof, and the inferences and presumptions legally arising therefrom, that said George More signed the said will in the presence of the said witnesses; that they signed it as witnesses in the presence of the testator and in the presence of each other as attesting witnesses; that they believed him to be of sound and disposing mind and that he in fact had sufficient mental capacity to execute a will.

The will should have been admitted to probate. The order of the Circuit Court will therefore be reversed and the cause will be remanded to that Court, with directions to enter an order admitting the instrument to probate as the last will and testament of the said George More.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

358. STATUTES. California. (C. C. P. 1872, § 1308.) [In uncontested wills,] the testimony of one of the subscribing witnesses [suffices]. Ib. § 1315. [In contested wills] all the subscribing witnesses who are present in the county and who are of sound mind must be produced and examined, and the death, absence, or insanity of any of them must be satisfactorily shown to the Court; if none of the subscribing witnesses reside in the county at the time appointed for proving the will, the Court may admit the testimony of other witnesses to prove the sanity of the testator and the execution of the will; and, as evidence of such execution it may admit proof of the handwriting of the testator and of the subscribing witnesses or any of them.

Illinois. (Revised Statutes 1874, c. 148. § 6.) [Where] any one or more of the witnesses of any will . . . shall die, be insane, or remove to parts unknown to the parties concerned, so that his or her testimony cannot be procured, . . . it shall be lawful . . . to admit proof of the handwriting of any such deceased, insane, or absent witness, as aforesaid, and such other secondary evidence as is admissible in courts of justice, to establish written contracts generally in similar cases.

Wisconsin. (Statutes, 1898, § 3788.) If none of the subscribing witnesses shall reside in this State . . . or if any one or more of them shall have gone to parts unknown and the Court shall be satisfied that such witness, after due diligence used, cannot be found, [then the Court may admit other testimony to prove sanity] and the execution of the will, and may admit proof of his handwriting and of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses.

Topic 2. Rules of Preference for Sundry Kinds of Witnesses

359. UNITED STATES v. GIBERT

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT. 1834

2 Sumner 19

INDICTMENT against the officers and crew of the ship Panda, for piracy committed on the brig Mexican. The brig Mexican belonged to Salem, and was owned by Joseph Peabody. It sailed from Salem for Rio Janerio on the 29th August, 1832, under the command of Captain Butman; having on board a valuable cargo, and twenty thousand dollars in specie. On the 20th September, in 33° N. lat. and 34° 30′ W. Lon., she fell in with a suspicious-looking vessel, from which she made many efforts, but unsuccessfully, to escape. . . . Informaton of what had taken place was immediately disseminated throughout this and other countries, and reached the coast of Africa, where Captain Trotter, commanding the British brig of war Curlew, was then cruising. Circumstances led that gentleman to believe that the schooner Panda, then lying in the river Nazareth, was the vessel which had captured the Mexican. He immediately, therefore, proceeded to take measures against her. These measures resulted in the capture of the Panda, but the escape, for the time, of her crew. No ship's papers or log-book were found on board of her, although diligently sought for; and, owing to some accident, she shortly afterwards blew up, thereby killing several of the Curlew's men. Captain Trotter then sailed to other ports, still making efforts to discover the crew of the Panda, and at last succeeded in arresting the prisoners, and carried them into Portsmouth, England. By the British government, they were sent to this country for trial, the offence of which they were charged having been committed on board a vessel of the United States.

After verdict and before judgment, the following motion for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment, was filed by the counsel for the prisoners: . . . 12. Because the said Court declined to instruct the jury that the failure of the government to produce, in evidence of the attempt by said Ruiz to blow up the said Panda, the only witness who saw the match, as applied for that purpose, and who is testified to have removed it, affords a legal presumption against the truth of the alleged attempt by said Ruiz to destroy the said Panda. . . .

Story, J. — The next and last specification under this head is that the Court declined to instruct the jury that the failure of the government to produce the witness, who (it was testified) saw the match applied for the purpose of blowing up the Panda, and removed it, afforded a legal presumption against the truth of the alleged attempt by the prisoner Ruiz to destroy the Panda. . . . The argument now is, that although Mr. Quentin, who was upon the stand, stated that he was on board at the same time with the witness, that he saw the smoke coming from the cabin, and the absent witness go down, and bring up the match, and many other circumstances to establish an intention to set the Panda on fire and blow her up; yet that his testimony was not the best evidence on this point, and ought to be rejected. . . .

It appears to me that the whole basis of the argument is founded upon a mistake of the meaning of the rule of law as to the production of the best evidence. The rule is not applied to evidence of the same nature and degree; but it is applied to reject secondary and inferior evidence in proof of a fact which leaves evidence of a higher and superior nature behind in the possession or power of the party. Thus, if the party offers a copy of a paper in evidence, when he has the original in his possession, the copy will be rejected, for the original is evidence of a higher nature. . . . But the rule does not apply to several eye-witnesses testifying to the same facts or parts of the same facts, for the testimony is all in the same degree, and where there are several witnesses to the same facts, they may be proved by one only. All need not be produced. If they are not produced, the evidence may be less satisfactory or less conclusive, but still it is not incompetent.

And to apply the principle to the present objection, Mr. Quentin was a competent witness to prove all the facts, which he knew, which went to establish an intention to blow up the Panda. That another witness might have proved more and other facts to the same purpose, which might have been more full and satisfactory and conclusive to the jury, does not render Mr. Quentin's testimony incompetent. The defects in the evidence, whatever they might be, are very proper matters of observation to the jury, to create doubts or justify disbelief of any intention to blow up the Panda. But the jury were to judge of all these matters in weighing the whole evidence on this particular point. A witness who has seen a party write several times is a good witness to prove his handwriting. But a clerk in the counting-room of the party, who has seen him write innumerable times, would be in many cases a more satisfactory witness to prove the handwriting. But nobody can doubt that each would be competent witness of the facts within his knowledge to prove the handwriting. . . .

I agree with the presiding judge, in the views which he has expressed on the motion in arrest of judgment, as well as with those on the motion for a new trial, excepting in the instance which I have specified, and in the result, that the motions be overruled.

360. REGINA v. CHRISTOPHER

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL. 1850

4 Cox Cr. 76

THE following case was stated by the Recorder of Liverpool, for the opinion of the judges, under stat. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78.

The prisoners, John Christopher, John Smith, and George Thornton, were indicted at the General Quarter Sessions, holden in and for the borough of Liverpool, on the 22nd day of October, 1849, for felony. When the prisoners were first brought before the magistrate, and charged with the felony, the witnesses were sworn, examined by the magistrate and cross-examined by the prisoners, and written minutes of the examination and cross-examination were made by the clerk of the magistrate under the inspection of the magistrate.

These minutes were then sent to the office of the clerk of the magistrate, and there delivered to a clerk named Tasker, who proceeded to write the depositions from the minutes. The witnesses attended in the office, and in the course of writing the depositions Tasker put some questions to each of them for the purpose of rendering the depositions more correct, clear and complete. The answers given to these questions were inserted in the depositions. The magistrate was not present, nor were the prisoners, at the office of the clerk to the magistrate. The depositions having been thus written, the witnesses appeared again before the magistrate, and in the presence of the prisoners were re-sworn; the depositions were read over to them, and a full opportunity was afforded for cross-examination before the depositions were signed by the witnesses.

Under these circumstances appearing on the trial, the counsel for the prisoners proposed to ask one of the witnesses for the Crown the following question, — "Did you not tell Mr. Tasker that you were watching the prisoner Christopher till a quarter before one o'clock?" This question was material. The question had reference to what was said by the witness in answer to some question put by Mr. Tasker, as above stated, in the course of writing the depositions, and the witness's answer would, according to the evidence, appear on the depositions.

The depositions were not read or tendered in evidence.

The counsel for the prosecution objected to the question proposed, and the question was overruled by the Court.

The prisoners were all convicted of felony.

Judgment was postponed, and the prisoners were committed to prison until it should have been considered and decided whether the question proposed to be asked was properly overruled, and whether the prisoners were duly convicted. . . .

Hills. — Even assuming that the depositions were sufficiently taken to render them admissible in evidence, it by no means follows that the question put to the witness ought not to have been answered. The depositions profess only to contain the statements made before the magistrate, and the question asked related to a statement made, not before the magistrate, but to the magistrate's clerk in the magistrate's absence. Upon what principle can parol evidence of that statement be excluded?

Alderson, B. — What was said to Tasker is not to be excluded because it was also said before the magistrates. Tasker was not a judicial officer, and no one was bound by what he wrote.

Paget, contra, was directed to confine himself, in the first instance, to the last point.

Alderson, B. — Suppose the depositions to be perfect, and that the answer would appear upon them; still, cannot the prisoner ask the witness what he said, not before the magistrate when the depositions were being taken, but at some other time?

Paget. — The finding of the case is conclusive as to that. It is found that "the question had reference to what was said by the witness in answer to some question put by Mr. Tasker, as above stated, in the course of writing the depositions, and the witness's answer would, according to the evidence, appear on the depositions." If that be so, the depositions are the proper evidence.

ALDERSON, B. — There is the fallacy. The depositions contain that which Tasker wrote, and that which the witness afterwards stated to be true. They may contain the true answer to the question "What did the witness say to Tasker?" But the witness might say that he had given a different answer to Tasker from that which the deposition contained. . . .

Paget. — This statement has been read over to the witness, and signed by him as and for the true account. If the witness had employed Tasker to write his statement, had seen it when written, had signed it and transmitted it to a third party, the witness could not have been asked a question about any statement in that paper until the paper had been put into his hands (The Queen's case, 2 B. & B. 289).

ALDERSON, B. — That was the case of a letter, and it did not appear that the writer had made any statement except in writing. In this case there was an oral statement previously to the writing; could it not have been given in evidence if it had never been written down? . . .

Paget. — For this part of the case the depositions are assumed to be correctly taken under the authority of the magistrate; and the presumption therefore is, that they contain all that was material in the testimony of the witnesses. That being so, they ought to be produced before any question can be asked as to what the witness said. In Leach v. Simpson (5 Mee. & W. 312), PARKE, B., said:

> "The presumption is, until the contrary is shown, that the magistrate took down all that was material in the testimony of the witness. The written deposition, therefore, is the best evidence of what he said, and must first be produced before you can inquire by other means as to what passed on the occasion; then, if it appear on production of the deposition that any particular statement alleged to have been made is not contained in it, you may add to it by parol evidence of that statement."

If a merchant were to dictate a letter to a clerk, to sign it, and to send it, he could not be asked what he had dictated unless the letter were first put in.

MAULE, J. — Mr. Tasker was not a subordinate, writing at the dictation of the witness, but a person assuming to have authority to write down what the witness said.

ALDERSON, B. — In such a case it is the communication that is the evidence; the letter is the communication, and therefore the letter must be put in; but in cases in which the declaration is the evidence, and the declaration was by words spoken, the words spoken must be proved, though they were written down after they were spoken. This matter is correctly and ably treated in a note to Jeans v. Wheedon (2 Mo. & R. 487).

Paget. — In that case the document was not signed, and therefore no deposition. As to the first point — (He was stopped.)

WILDE, C. J. — It is unnecessary to hear any further argument on this first point, because we are all of opinion that the question, the right to put which is raised by the second point, ought to have been allowed, and that an answer to it ought to have been required. The question was, "Did you not tell Mr. Tasker that you were watching the prisoner Christopher till a quarter before one o'clock?" The objection was that the answer to the question was to be found in a paper written by Tasker immediately after the supposed statement to Tasker took place, and afterwards signed by the witness. Was that paper the primary evidence of what the witness had told Tasker? . . .

The authority of a deposition is derived from the fact that the law has charged the magistrate with the duty of recording what the witness has said. The law presumes that he will do his duty; and, therefore, that which he so does becomes the best evidence. Had this paper prepared by Tasker any analogy to the deposition which it afterwards became? Was there in the paper at the time it was written any legal character, the effect of which was to exclude parol evidence of what was in fact said? The Court thinks that there was not. At the time Mr. Tasker wrote, he was doing an act to which the law gave no sanction, and, therefore, doing it as a mere volunteer between himself and the witness. The primary evidence was what the witness said, and what he said cannot be excluded because another man committed it to writing. . . . The law has, in this case, no security that what the witness said at the time to which the question is confined was committed to writing.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the question was improperly overruled, that the conviction cannot be sustained, and that a verdict of not guilty ought to be entered. Conviction reversed.

361. BRICE v. MILLER

SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA. 1891

35 S. C. 537; 15 S. E. 270

BEFORE KERSHAW, J., Fairfield, February, 1891.

Action by Calvin Brice & Co. against Elizabeth Miller. The charge to the jury was as follows:

"This action is founded upon two notes; notes which the defendant here, Mrs. Elizabeth Miller, does not deny that she made. . . . So, if you find that she made these notes and mortgage, your next important inquiry will be whether the transaction was one that had relation to her separate property. . . . I think she is liable, and the plaintiffs ought to have a verdict, if that is the nature of this transaction. . . .

"It has been urged upon me to charge you, . . . that when there is a record kept of a fact in writing made at the time, it is better evidence than the unaided recollection of any one. Now, as to this point, about what this good lady, Mrs. Miller, testified to at the last court: Mr. Brice undertook to tell what he recollected about it, and it has been urged upon you that his recollection is not correct, and the record kept by the stenographer, a sworn officer of the court, was read, in order to show that Mr. Brice did not recollect what the lady said at the last trial. In a point of that kind, you will go by what the stenographer took her down as saying at the time. It is more worthy of belief than the statement of the witness; the preponderance is in favor of what the stenographer took down at the time.

"The plaintiff must satisfy you by the preponderance of the testimony that he is entitled to recover. . . . We have the word of Mr. Brice as to what he remembers this lady to have said, and we have the written testimony of the stenographer as to what she said. It is man against man, but the preponderance is in favor of the stenographer's notes rather than the witness. That is what is meant by the preponderance of the evidence. . . ."

Verdict was for plaintiff, and defendant appealed on the following exceptions: . . . 4. For that his honor erred in permitting the plaintiff to testify his recollection as to what the defendant said while testifying on a former trial of this cause, her testimony being in writing and preserved as the records of the court, and she being then in court and subject to examination by him. . . .

Messrs. Ragsdale & Ragsdale, for appellant. Messrs. McDonald & Douglas, contra.

March 23, 1892. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice McIver. This is an action on two notes alleged to have been made by the defendant in favor of the plaintiffs, and the complaint is in the ordinary form appropriate to such an action. The only defence was, that defendant is, and was at the time of the execution of the notes, a married woman, and was; therefore, incapable of making the contract evidenced thereby. . . .

The fourth subdivision cannot be sustained. There can be no doubt that it is competent for one party to show what the other party to the action has admitted, or said, as to the subject-matter of controversy on a previous occasion, whether on a former trial or not. But the point of this particular allegation of error seems to be that, inasmuch as the testimony of the defendant at the former trial had been taken down by the stenographer in writing, that constituted the best evidence as to what her testimony had been, and, therefore, it was not competent for the plaintiff to state what the defendant had said on a former trial.

We know of no rule of law which would sustain this position. While it may be true that what a witness writes down himself, or what is contained in some paper written by another and signed by himself, may be the best evidence of what the witness has said on a former occasion, it does not follow that where a third person, be he a stenographer or not, takes down in writing what a witness said, this writing is the best evidence, in such a sense, as to exclude any other. Stenographers are no more infallible than any other human beings; and while, as a rule, they may be accurate, intelligent, and honest, they are not always so; and therefore it will not do to lay down as a rule that the stenographer's notes, when translated by him, are the best evidence of what a witness has said, in such a sense as to exclude the testimony of an intelligent bystander, who has heard and paid particular attention to the testimony of the witness, as to what such witness may have said on a former trial. The Circuit Judge, in his comments to the jury upon this subject, went quite as far (if not too far) as it was proper to go, when he told them that the stenographer's notes would outweigh the testimony of a person who spoke from memory only. . . .

The judgment of this Court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

TITLE III. ANALYTIC RULES (HEARSAY RULE)[1]

SUB-TITLE I. THE HEARSAY RULE ITSELF

Topic 1. Theory and History of the Rule

364. INTRODUCTORY. There is but one rule of the Analytic type, — the Hearsay rule, though this rule rule involves two branches or processes, Cross-examination and Confrontation.

Nature of Hearsay, as an Extra-Judicial Testimonial Assertion. When a witness A on the stand testifies, "B told me that event X occurred," his testimony may be regarded in two ways: (1) He may be regarded as asserting the event X upon his own credit, i.e. as a fact to be believed because he asserts that he knows it. But when it thus appears that his assertion is not based on personal observation of event X, his testimony to that event is rejected, because he is not qualified by proper sources of knowledge to speak to it. This involves a general principle of Testimonial Knowledge, already examined (ante, Nos. 108–120), and does not involve the Hearsay rule proper.

(2) But suppose, in order to obviate that objection, that we regard A as not making any assertion about event X (of which he has no personal knowledge), but as testifying to the utterance in his hearing of B's statement as to event X. To this, A is clearly qualified to testify, so that no objection can arise on that score. The only question, then, can be whether this assertion of B, reported by A, is admissible as evidence of the event X, asserted by B to have occurred. It is clear that what we are now attempting to do is to prove event X by B's assertion; the utterance of B's assertion being itself proved by A's testimony to it. In other words, merely the making of B's assertion is properly proved by A; but the occurrence of event X is also sought to be proved, by this assertion of B, which was uttered out of court, but is offered testimonially for the same purpose as if it were being made presently by B on the stand. It is these extra-judicial testimonial assertions which the Hearsay rule prohibits. The Hearsay rule points out that B's assertion, offered testimonially, is not made on the stand and presently, but out of court anteriorly, and challenges it upon that ground. It tells us that B's assertion cannot be accepted, because it has not been made at a time and place where it could be subjected to certain essential tests or investigations calculated to demonstrate its real value by exposing such latent sources of error. The Hearsay rule predicates a contrast between assertions untested and assertions tested; it insists upon having the latter.

What is the nature of the test thus required by the Hearsay rule?

The fundamental test, shown by experience to be invaluable, is the test of Cross-examination. The rule, to be sure, calls for two elements, Cross-examination proper, and Confrontation; but the former is the essential and indispensable feature, the latter is only subordinate and dispensable. The theory of the Hearsay rule is that the many possible deficiencies, suppressions, sources of error and untrustworthiness, which lie underneath the bare untested assertion of a witness may be best brought to light and exposed by the test of Cross-examination.

[1] In No. 2, ante, the distinction between these several groups of rules have been explained.

Confrontation. A process commonly spoken of as Confrontation is also often referred to as an additional and accompanying test or as the sole test. Now Confrontation is, in its main aspect, merely another term for the test of Cross-examination. It is the preliminary step to securing the opportunity of cross-examination. The witness is confronted with the party, so that the party may cross-examine him. Confrontation also involves a subordinate and incidental advantage, namely, the observation by the tribunal of the witness' demeanor on the stand, as a minor means of judging the value of his testimony. But this minor advantage is not regarded as essential, i.e. it may be dispensed with when it is not feasible. Cross-examination, however, the essential object of confrontation, remains indispensable.

Cross-examination as a Distinctive and Vital Feature of our Law. For two centuries past, the policy of the Anglo-American system of evidence has been to regard the necessity of testing by cross-examination as a vital feature of the law. The belief that no safeguard for testing the value of human statements is comparable to that furnished by cross-examination, and the conviction that no statement (unless by special exception) should be used as testimony until it has been probed and sublimated by that test, has found increasing strength in lengthening experience. Not even the abuses and the puerilities which are so often found associated with cross-examination have availed to overbalance its value. It may be that (in more than one sense) it takes the place in our system which torture occupied in the medieval system of the civilians. Nevertheless, it is beyond any doubt the greatest legal engine ever invented for the discovery of truth. However difficult it may be for the layman or the foreign jurist to appreciate this its wonderful power, there has probably never been a moment's doubt upon this point in the mind of a lawyer of experience. "You can do anything," said Wendell Phillips, "with a bayonet — except sit upon it." A lawyer can do anything with a cross-examination, — if he is skilful enough not to impale his own cause upon it. He may, it is true, do more than he ought to do; he may "make the worse appear the better reason, to perplex and dash maturest counsels," — may make the truth appear like falsehood. But this abuse of its power is able to be remedied by proper control. The fact of this unique and irresistible power remains, and is the reason for our faith in its merits. If we omit political considerations of broader range, then cross-examination, not trial by jury, is (as Bentham said) the great and permanent contribution of the Anglo-American system of law to improved methods of trial-procedure.

Striking illustrations of its power to expose inaccuracies and falsehoods are plentiful in our own records.

Illustrations of the theory and the art. To illustrate the theory and the art of cross-examination, the following examples must here suffice.

1. Examples of the utility of a cross-examination, in bringing out desirable facts of the case, modifying the direct examination or otherwise adding to the cross-examiner's own case:

. David Paul Brown, The Forum, (1856) II, 456 [this celebrated Pennsylvanian advocate is describing a case of alleged infanticide by poison, administered by its mother, whose seducer had deserted her:] "It was shown that a day or two before the death of her infant, the mother had sent for half-an-ounce of arsenic to a grocer's. That after the death the arsenic was taken to the grocer's, and was weighed, and had lost twenty-four grains in its weight. This circumstance, together with the opinion of the chemist, presented a strong case. Neither was sufficient in itself, but together they were dangerous. Of course, the cross-examination as to the weight was very rigid and severe. Upon this particular point it ran thus: 'When the arsenic was purchased, how did you weight it?' 'I weighed it by shot.' 'How many shot?' 'Six.' 'Of what description?' 'No. 8.' 'When it was returned, did you weigh it in the same scales?' 'Yes.' 'Did you weigh it with the same shot?' 'I weighed it with shot of the same number — for I had no other number.' 'How much less did it weigh?' 'Twenty-four grains less.' It was plain that this testimony bore hard upon the prisoner — but at this stage of the case the Court adjourned. Immediately my colleague (Mr. Boyd) and myself visited the stores of all the grocers, and took from various uncut bags of No. 8, the requisite number of shot, subjected them to weight in the most accurate scales, and found that the same number of these different parcels of shot varied more in weight than the difference referred to as detected in the arsenic at the time of its return. The shot — the grocers — the apothecary — the scales — were all brought before the Court. They clearly established the facts stated, and enabled us fairly to contend that there had been no portion of the arsenic used, — which argument, aided by the excellent character of the prisoner, proved entirely successful, and after a painful and prolonged trial, she was acquitted; so that her life may be said to have been saved by a shot."

John C. Reed, Conduct of a Lawsuit (1885) § 400: "When your evidence is but slight and that of the other side is very strong, you may be reckless in spurring his witnesses to make a complete statement. Your case is so bad that any change in it may be for the better. We add an entertaining and apt illustration. Some time ago the writer while waiting in Court watched the trial of a case where the plaintiff sought to recover damages for a breach of warranty. The defendant had sold him a horse with an express warranty that he was sound and kind and free from all 'outs.' The next day the plaintiff noticed that a shoe was loose, and he undertook to drive him to a blacksmith's shop to have him shod, when the horse exhibited such violent reluctance that he was obliged to abandon the attempt. Repeated efforts made it evident that he never would be shod willingly, and therefore he was obliged to sell him. The defendant called two witnesses. The first, an honest, clean-looking man, testified that he was a blacksmith, that he knew the horse in question perfectly well, and he had shod him about the time referred to in the plaintiff's testimony. 'Did you have any difficulty in shoeing him?' asked the defendant's counsel. 'Not the least. He stood perfectly quiet. Never had a horse stand quieter.' The other, a venerable-looking man, with a clear, blue eye, testified that he had owned the horse and that he was perfectly kind. 'Did you ever have any trouble about getting him into a blacksmith's shop?' 'Well, sir, I don't remember that I ever had occasion to carry him to a blacksmith's shop while I owned him.' The plaintiff's counsel evidently thought that cross-examination would only develop this unpleasant testimony more strongly, so he let the witnesses go. The jury found for the defendant. The next morning, as the writer was sitting in court waiting for a verdict, a man behind him, whom he recognized as the blacksmith, leaned forward and said, 'You heard that horse case tried yesterday, didn't you? Well, that fellow who tried the case for the plaintiff didn't know how to cross-examine worth a cent. I told him that the horse stood perfectly quiet while I shod him; and so he did. I didn't tell him that I had to hold him by the nose with a pair of pincers to make him stand. The old man said he never took him to a blacksmith's shop while he had him. No more he did. He had to take him out into an open lot and cast him before he could shoe him.' Of course the plaintiff's counsel should have been more searching in the examination, where he could not possibly have made his own case worse."

2. Examples of the utility of a cross-examination, in bringing out, from the witness himself, facts to lessen his personal credit.

LANGHORN'S TRIAL (1679, HOWELL'S State Trials, VII, 417, 452). [Oates, the informer, had testified that the Popish Plotters met in London on April 24, and that he had come over to the meeting from the Jesuit College at St. Omer in France with Sir John Warner. One of the Jesuit attendants was put on by the defense to prove that Warner had not left the College at that time.]

Witness: "He lived there all that while."

Mr. J. PEMBERTON: "Was Sir John Warner there all June?" Witness: "My lord, I cannot tell that; I only speak to April and May."

L. C. J. SCROGGS: "Where was Sir John Warner in June and July?" Witness: "I cannot tell."

L. C. J.: "You were gardener there then?" Witness: "Yes, I was."

L. C. J.: "Why cannot you as well tell me, then, where he was in June and July, as in April and May?" Witness: "I cannot be certain."

L. C. J.: "Why not so certain for those two months as you are for the other?" Witness: "Because I did not take so much notice."

L. C. J.: "How came you to take more notice of the one than the other?" Witness: "Because the question that I came for, my lord, did not fall upon that time."

L. C. J.: "That, without all question, is a plain and honest answer."

Mr. J. DOLBEN: "Indeed, he hath forgot his lesson; you should have given him better instructions."

L. C. J.: "Now that does shake all that was said before, and looks as if he came on purpose and prepared for those months."

JAMES RAM, On Facts as Subjects of Inquiry by a Jury. (3rd Amer. ed., 1873, p. 140). "Whenever any person makes a relation of facts, be it on a judicial inquiry or not, and whether he tells his story spontaneously, and without being questioned, or on request and through questions put to him, it is certain the tale is often imperfectly or falsely told; and when this is known or suspected to be the case, and it is desired to have the exact truth, to ascertain what part of the story is true, what false, and what is left out, these matters may be learned by searching for them through questions put to the relator; an inquiry that is called cross-examination.

'He that is first in his own cause seemeth just, but his neighbor cometh and searcheth him.' [1]

The command by the mouth of Samuel to Saul was 'Go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have; slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass.' Saul's imperfect tale, — 'I have performed the commandment of the Lord,' would not bear the scrutiny of Samuel; who instantly replied, 'What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear?' [2] . . .

[1] Proverbs, xviii.

[2] 1 Samuel, xv.

"Fingal being talked of, Dr. Johnson averred his positive disbelief of its authenticity. And on a gentleman then saying, 'Fingal is certainly genuine, for I have heard a great part of it repeated in the original,' Dr. Johnson asked him, 'Sir, do you understand the original?' And the reply being, 'No, sir.' 'Why, then,' said Dr. Johnson, 'we see to what this testimony comes.'" [1]

On a trial, the cross-examination of witnesses is often of the utmost importance and service toward discovering the truth, and the extent to which the witnesses are to be believed. . . . For on every trial, after a witness' examination by his own side, or examination in chief as it is called, is closed, these considerations may arise in the mind of the opposite party: The witness may have spoken truth, but not the whole truth; or he may have spoken the truth, and something besides the truth; or some of the truth may not have been brought out, because questions suited to elicit it were not put to him; the witness may be mistaken in a matter which he has stated as a fact; he may have misapprehended it; he may not have seen what he thinks he saw, or heard what he thinks he heard; he may have spoken to a fact with greater confidence than is justified by his imperfect knowledge of it; his present story may not be consistent with his relation of it on some former occasion; the witness' character may require to be searched into, to judge how far his evidence is to be believed.

On certain criminal trials, a cross-examination has had the following objects:

1. To show that the witness did not see what he said he saw: as, . . . that the witness, who said he saw the prisoner coming from a particular place, was at the time of seeing him (as he said) unable, from the distance (220 yards) of the prisoner from him, to recognize the prisoner, to distinguish his features, to know him to be the prisoner; or, that the witness, who said he saw the prisoner fire a pistol at another man, was at the time of seeing him (as he said) unable, from the distance (220 yards) of the prisoner from him, to recognize the prisoner.

2. To show that the witness did not hear what he said he heard: as, that the witness, who said he heard particular words spoken by the prisoner to a clamorous mob, was, at the time he heard (as he said) the words, under some agitation of mind, was in a degree in a considerable flurry of spirits; or, that at the time when the witness (as he said) heard certain words spoken by a man at the head of a mob, and addressed to the witness and others, the witness being nearest to the speaker, there was a good deal of noise and confusion; and that the witness was alarmed; and that, considering the noise that prevailed at the time, and the witness' situation, and his alarm, the witness might not be able to swear positively to the precise words used.

3. To show that the witness spoke from hearsay: as, that the witness, who said a mob set fire to a chapel, did not see them do it; that it was on fire when the witness first saw it, and who set it on fire he did not know; nor did he know that it was a chapel, only somebody told him so.

4. To test the truth of what the witness has said in general terms, by making him particularize: as, when the witness has spoken in general terms of many persons, saying, for instance, that many persons were present at a particular place, or many persons were forced to do a particular act against their will, to test the truth of the witness' evidence by asking him to tell the names of some persons, or the name of even one person present, or forced to do the act mentioned; or, when the witness has given evidence of words spoken by the prisoner to a large body of men, to test the truth of his evidence by asking the witness whether he can name any person who was present when the prisoner spoke the words mentioned.

6. To procure an explanation of words used by the witness: as, that the witness, who said the prisoner was at home on particular days, did not mean that the prisoner did not go out on those days, but only that he was at home some part of each of those days.

7. To show that the conduct of the prisoner was consistent with his innocence, was inconsistent with guilt, was open, without concealment: as, that, with regard to papers which the witness found and seized at the prisoner's house, during the whole time the witness was employed in searching for them, there was not any endeavor made by the prisoner, or any of his family, to conceal or secrete any of them; . . . or, that the prisoner, who went on board a ship at Portsmouth about a week before it sailed, and who, on the part of the prosecution, it was alleged, went on board to fly from the accusation against him, did, when on board, pass by his own name, and at Portsmouth came on shore several times, and went publicly about the streets.

365. HISTORY.[1] I. Hearsay statements in general. (1) In the first period, then, there is no exclusion of hearsay statements. Through the 1500s and down beyond the middle of the 1600s, hearsay statements are constantly received, even against opposition. They are often objected to by accused persons, and are sometimes said by the judge to be of no value or to be insufficient of themselves, and are even occasionally excluded. In short, they are regarded as more or less questionable, and the doubt particularly increases in the 1600s; but, in spite of all, they are admissible and admitted. Nor is this result due to any abuse or irregularity peculiar to trials for treason or other State prosecutions; it is equally apparent in the rulings in the few civil cases that are reported. The practice is unmistakable.

(2) In the meantime, the appreciation of the impropriety of using hearsay statements by persons not called is growing steadily. By the second decade after the Restoration, this notion receives a fairly constant enforcement, both in civil and in criminal cases. No precise date or ruling stands out as decisive; but it seems to be between 1675 and 1690 that the fixing of the doctrine takes place.

(3) In the meantime, the general rule excluding hearsay statements came over into the 1700s as something established within living memory. It is clear that its firm fixing (as above observed) did not occur till about 1680; and so in the treatises of the early 1700s the rule is stated with a prefatory "It seems." By the middle of the 1700s the rule is no longer to be struggled against; and henceforth the only question can be how far there are to be specific exceptions to it.

II. Hearsay statements under oath. (1) As early as the middle of the 1500s a first step had been attempted by statute towards requiring the personal production of those who had already made a statement upon oath. This requirement was limited to trials for treason.

[1] Abridged from the present Compiler's "Treatise on Evidence" (1905), Vol. II, § 1364.

This statute of 1553 was St. 5 Edw. VI, c. 12, § 22. This was followed by a similar provision in 1554, St. 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 10, § 11. But this early step was premature; the innovation was too much in advance of the times; and it had only a short life. From the very year of the latter enactment, until the end of the succeeding century, it remained by judicial construction a dead letter. This judicial construction was perhaps strained, and was abandoned after the Revolution and under William III's government. Nevertheless it was clear law for a century and a half; and, when Sir Walter Raleigh insisted so urgently on the production of Lord Cobham, he was truly answered by Chief Justice Popham that "he had no law for it."

Raleigh's trial is a good example of the older practice, before the rule was established:

Sir Walter Raleigh's Case (J. G. Phillimore, "History and Principles of the Law of Evidence," 1850, p. 157). (1603. Raleigh was tried for a conspiracy of treason to dethrone Elizabeth and to put Arabella Stuart in her place, by the aid of Spanish money and intrigue. Sir Edward Coke, attorney-general, conducted the prosecution. The principal evidence against him was the assertion of Lord Cobham, a supposed fellow-conspirator, who had betrayed Raleigh in a sworn statement made before trial. Cobham himself was in prison, and was not produced on the trial.) To dilate upon Sir Walter Raleigh's murder is almost superfluous. No one, without reading it, can form a complete notion of what then went by the name of a trial in an English Court of Justice, or of the unspeakable malignity of Cecil. . . . How the law was enforced, and how these rights were protected by English judges in a criminal trial, where the life of perhaps the most illustrious man England ever has produced was at stake, the following extracts may serve to shew: —

Raleigh. "But it is strange to see how you press me still with my Lord Cobham, and yet will not produce him; it is not for gaining of time or prolonging my life that I urge this; he is in the house hard by, and may soon be brought hither; let him be produced, and if he will yet accuse me or avow this confession of his, it shall convict me and ease you of further proof."

Lord Cecil. "Sir Walter Raleigh presseth often that my Lord Cobham should be brought face to face; if he ask a thing of grace and favour, they must come from him only who can give them; but if he ask a matter of law, then, in order that we, who sit here as commissioners, may be satisfied, I desire to hear the opinions of my Lords, the judges, whether it may be done by law."

The Judges all answered, "that in respect it might be a mean to cover many with treasons, and might be prejudicial to the King, therefore, by the law, it was not sufferable."

Popham, C. J. "There must not such a gap be opened for the destruction of the King as would be if we should grant this; you plead hard for yourself, but the laws plead as hard for the King. Where no circumstances do concur to make a matter probable, then an accuser may be heard; but so many circumstances agreeing and confirming the accusation in this case, the accuser is not to be produced; for, having first confessed against himself voluntarily, and so charged another person, if we shall now hear him again in person, he may, for favour or fear, retract what formerly he hath said, and the jury may, by that means, be inveigled.". . .

Raleigh. — "I never had intelligence with Cobham since I came to the Tower."

Lord Cecil. — "Sir Walter Raleigh, if my Lord Cobham will now affirm, that you were acquainted with his dealings with Count Aremberg, that you knew of the letter he received, that you were the chief instigator of him, will you then be concluded by it?"

Raleigh. — "Let my Lord Cobham speak before God and the King, and deny God and the King if he speak not truly, and will then say that ever I knew of Arabella's matter, or the money out of Spain, or the Surprising Treason, I will put myself upon it."

Lord Henry Howard. — "But what if my Lord Cobham affirm anything equivalent to this; what then?"

Raleigh. — "My Lord, I put myself upon it."

Attorney-General. — "I shall now produce a witness viva voce:"

He then produced one Dyer, a pilot, who, being sworn, said, "Being at Lisbon, there came to me a Portugal gentleman, who asked me how the King of England did, and whether he was crowned? I answered him, that I hoped our noble king was well, and crowned by this; but the time was not come when I came from the coast for Spain. 'Nay,' said he 'your king shall never be crowned, for Don Cobham and Don Raleigh will cut his throat before he come to be crowned.' And this, in time, was found to be spoken in mid July."

Raleigh. — "This is the saying of some wild Jesuit or beggarly priest; but what proof is it against me?"

Attorney-General. — "It must perforce arise out of some preceding intelligence, and shews that your treason had wings." . . .

Thus on the single evidence of Cobham, never confronted with Raleigh, who retracted his confession, and then (according to the advocates of the Crown) recalled his retractation, did an English jury, to the amazement and horror of the bystanders, and the perpetual disgrace of the English name, find the most illustrious of their fellow subjects guilty of high treason.

(2) That at this time, then (say, until the early 1600s), the general absence of any hearsay rule allowed the use of extrajudicial statements taken under oath, is clear enough. It appears as well in ordinary felony trials as in treason trials.

(3) About this time, however, and markedly by the middle of the 1600s (coincidently with the general movement already considered), the notion tends to prevail, and gradually becomes definitely fixed, that even an extrajudicial statement under oath should not be used if the deponent can be personally had in court. This much has now been gained; and it is seen in civil and in criminal trials equally. But no further settlement came under the Commonwealth, nor under the Restoration, nor directly upon the Revolution.

(4) By 1680–1690 (as already noted) had come the establishment of the general rule against unsworn hearsay statements. This must have helped to emphasize the anomaly of leaving extrajudicial sworn statements unaffected by the same strict rule. By 1696, or nearly a decade after the Revolution, that anomaly ceased substantially to exist. In that year it was decisively achieved in the trials of Paine and of Sir John Fenwick. The former was a ruling by the King's Bench after full argument, and came in January.[1]

[1] R. v. Paine, 5 Mod. 163 (libel; a deposition of B., examined by the mayor of Bristol upon oath but not in P.'s presence, was offered; it was objected that

The latter, coming in the next November, involved a lengthy debate in Parliament; and, though the vote finally favored the admission of the deposition, the victory of reaction was in appearance only; for the weighty and earnest speeches in this debate must have burned into the general consciousness the vital importance of the rule securing the right of cross-examination, and made it impossible thereafter to dispute the domination of that rule as a permanent element in the law.[1] From the beginning of the 1700s the writers upon the law assume it as a settled doctrine; and the reason of the rule in this connection is stated in the same language already observed in the history of the rule in general, namely, that statements used as testimony must be made where the maker can be subjected to cross-examination.

Topic 2. Modes of Satisfying the Rule of Cross-Examination

368. CAZENOVE v. VAUGHAN

King's Bench. 1813

1 M. & S. 4

Park in the last term obtained a rule nisi for entering a nonsuit in this action, which was upon a policy of assurance, (in which the plaintiffs had recovered a verdict before Lord Ellenborough, C. J., at the London sittings,) upon an objection made to the admissibility of the deposition of one Lewis Plitt, which had been received in evidence for the plaintiffs; respecting which it appeared by his Lordship's report, that the plaintiffs, after the commencement of this action on the 5th of May last filed a bill in the Court of Chancery against the defendant, for a commission to examine witnesses abroad, and for the examination of the said Plitt "de bene esse," to which the defendant did not put in any answer; on the 15th of May the plaintiffs obtained an order of the Court for the examination of Plitt de bene esse, and gave regular notice thereof to the

"B. being dead, the defendant had lost all opportunity of cross-examining him," and the use of examinations before coroners and justices rested on the special statutory authority given them to take such depositions; the King's Bench consulted with the Common Pleas, and "it was the opinion of both Courts that these depositions should not be given in evidence, the defendant not being present when they were taken before the mayor and so had lost the benefit of a cross-examination."

[1] Fenwick's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 537, 591–607, 618–750 (the sworn statement before a justice of the peace of one Goodman, said to have absented himself by the accused's tampering, was offered on a trial in Parliament; a prolonged debate took place, and this deposition, termed hearsay, was opposed on the precise ground of "a fundamental rule in our law that no evidence shall be given against a man, when he is on trial for his life, but in the presence of the prisoner, because he may cross-examine him who gives such evidence," "by which much false swearing was often detected"; the deposition was finally admitted, Nov. 16, by 218 to 145 in the Commons, and the attainder passed by 189 to 156 in the Commons and by 66 to 60 in the Lords).

defendant, and served him with a copy of the interrogatories in chief; and the witness was examined on the evening of that day; at which time no cross-interrogatories were filed, nor did any one on the part of the defendant attend such examination. On the 25th of June following, the plaintiffs obtained a further order for publication, which after reciting that it was prayed that the depositions of Plitt, taken de bene esse in the cause, under the order of that Court might be published, in order that the same might be read as evidence for the plaintiffs at the trial of this and other actions mentioned in the bill; the order then proceeded thus, "Whereupon and upon hearing counsel for the defendant, this Court doth order that the depositions of L. Plitt in this cause be forthwith published." On the day after his examination, Plitt, who was a foreigner, left London for the coast, from whence he embarked in a few days for Sweden, where he still remains.

The Solicitor-General and Scarlett, who now showed cause, after stating that the reading of the deposition was opposed at the trial on the general rule, that depositions before an answer put in are not admitted to be read, agreed to that rule, but contended that it was subject to the following exceptions; viz.: unless the defendant appear to be in contempt, or has had liberty to cross-examine; and that his declining to cross-examine will not vary the exception. The necessity of such qualifications of the rule is apparent, for otherwise it would be in the power of any defendant, by his obstinacy in refusing to answer, or cross-examine the witnesses, to deprive the adverse party of the benefit of their testimony. Here it appears that the defendant had due notice of the interrogatories proposed to be put to the witness, and it was his fault that he did not put cross-interrogatories; he cannot therefore be permitted afterwards to avail himself of his own neglect.

Park, (with Richardson and Newnham,) contra, admitting the exceptions, contended nevertheless that the general rule ought to prevail, unless the defendant is clearly brought within one of the exceptions; and that the party who claims to read the deposition is bound to show the adverse party either in contempt, or that he has had liberty to cross-examine according to the practice of the court, and has neglected it. Here it is plain the defendant was not in contempt, and it does not appear that according to the practice of the Court of Chancery, he had liberty to cross-examine; for the order for examination was only made on the 15th of May, and on the same evening the witness was examined, and left London the next morning. The presumption therefore is, that the defendant had no time to prepare and file his cross-interrogatories according to the practice of the court.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH, C. J. — Perhaps it may be as well to state what the rule of the common law is upon this subject, which puts an end to the question. The rule of the common law is, that no evidence shall be admitted but what is or might be under the examination of both parties; and it is agreeable also to common sense, that what is imperfect, and, if I may so say, but half an examination, shall not be used in the same way as if it were complete. But if the adverse party has had liberty to cross-examine, and has not chosen to exercise it, the case is then the same in effect as if he had cross-examined; otherwise the admissibility of the evidence would be made to depend upon his pleasure, whether he will cross-examine or not; which would be a most uncertain and unjust rule.

Here then the question is whether the defendant had an opportunity of cross-examining.

Now it appears that the plaintiffs filed their bill for the express purpose of examining the witness; and when they obtained the order for his examination, gave the defendant a regular notice of it, and of the interrogatories intended to be put to the witness. But it is said that the defendant had no time to file cross-interrogatories, and therefore the notice was of no use; yet if he had intimated a wish to cross-examine, and addressed himself to the Court praying for further time for that purpose, there can be no doubt but that he might have obtained it; but he contents himself simply with paying no attention to the notice. Then comes the order for publication. . . .

I must conclude then that the judge was satisfied before he directed such order to be made, that the adverse party had all the liberty to cross-examine which the practice of the court requires; and upon the principle of the common law I have already stated that there is no objection.

GROSE, J., concurred. . . .

BAYLEY, J. — I think it must be taken, from the circumstances stated, that the defendant had liberty to cross-examine, and did not choose to exercise it; for when the interrogatories in chief were served upon him, he might have applied for time, had he been desirous of putting cross-interrogatories; and there was no proof at the trial that it was his intention to cross-examine. Rule discharged.

369. STATUTES. England. Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883 (under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 77, § 17), ORDER XXXVII: I. Evidence Generally. 1. In the absence of any agreement between the solicitors of all parties, and subject to these Rules, the witnesses at the trial of any action or at any assessment of damages shall be examined viva voce and in open court, but the Court or a Judge may at any time for sufficient reason order that any particular fact or facts may be proved by affidavit, or that the affidavit of any witness may be read at the hearing or trial, on such conditions as the Court or Judge may think reasonable, or that any witness whose attendance in court ought for some sufficient cause to be dispensed with, be examined by interrogatories or otherwise before a commissioner or examiner; provided that where it appears to the Court or Judge that the other party bona fide desires the production of a witness for cross-examination, and that such witness can be produced, an order shall not be made authorising the evidence of such witness to be given by affidavit.

ORDER XXXVIII: Affidavits and Depositions: 1. Upon any motion, petition, or summons evidence may be given by affidavit; but the Court or a Judge may, on the application of either party, order the attendance for cross-examination of the person making any such affidavit.

Order XXXVII, Rule 20: Any party or witness having made an affidavit to be used or which shall be used on any proceeding in the cause or matter shall be bound, on being served with such subpœna [from the opposite party], to attend before such officer or person [appointed by the Court] for cross-examination.

Order XXXVII: II. Examination of Witnesses. . . . 5. The Court or a Judge may, in any cause or matter where it shall appear necessary for the purposes of justice, make an order for the examination upon oath before the Court or Judge or any officer of the Court, or any other person, and at any place, of any witness or person, and may empower any party to any such cause or matter to give such deposition in evidence therein on such terms, if any, as the Court or a Judge may direct. . . . 10, 11. Where any witness or person is ordered to be examined before any officer of the Court, or before any person appointed for the purpose,. . . . the examination shall take place in the presence of the parties, their counsel, solicitors, or agents, and the witnesses shall be subject to cross-examination and re-examination.

United States. (Revised Statutes, 1878. § 863). (For depositions de bene esse, "reasonable notice must first be given in writing"; and "whenever, by reason of the absence from the district and want of an attorney of record or other reason, the giving of the notice herein required shall be impracticable, it shall be lawful to take such depositions as there shall be urgent necessity for taking, upon such notice as any judge authorized to hold courts in such circuit or district shall think reasonable and direct"); § 866 (for depositions by "dedimus potestatem" "to prevent a failure or delay of justice," the provisions of the above section "shall not apply").

Illinois. (Revised Statutes, 1874, c. 51). Depositions of Resident Witnesses, in Chancery. § 24. When the testimony of any witness, residing or being within this State, shall be necessary in any suit in chancery in this State, the party wishing to use the same may cause the deposition of such witness to be taken before any judge, justice of the peace, clerk of a court, master in chancery or notary public, without a commission or filing interrogations for such purpose, on giving to the adverse party or his attorney ten days' notice of the time and place of taking the same, and one day in addition thereto (Sundays inclusive) for every fifty miles' travel from the place of holding the court to the place where such deposition is to be taken. If the party entitled to notice and his attorney resides in the county where the deposition is to be taken, five days' notice shall be sufficient. (R. S. 1845, p. 234, § 11.)

Deposition of Resident Witnesses, in Law. § 25. And it shall also be lawful, upon satisfactory affidavit being filed, to take the depositions of witnesses residing in this State, to be read in suits at law, in like manner and upon like notice as is above provided, in all cases where the witness resides in a different county from that in which the court is held, is about to depart from the State, is in custody on legal process, or is unable to attend such court on account of advanced age, sickness or other bodily infirmity. (R. S. 1845, p. 234, § 11.)

Deposition — When Witness is Non-Resident, etc. — Notice. § 26. When the testimony of any witness residing within this State more than one hundred miles from the place of holding the court, or not residing in this State, or who is engaged in the military or naval service of this State or of the United States, and is out of this State, shall be necessary in any civil cause pending in any court of law or equity in this State, it shall be lawful for the party wishing to use the same, on giving to the adverse party, or his attorney, ten days' previous notice, together with a copy of the interrogatories intended to be put to such witness, to sue out from the proper clerk's office a dedimus potestatem or commission, under the seal of the court, directed to any competent and disinterested person, as commissioner, or to any judge, master in chancery, notary public or justice of the peace of the county or city in which such witness may reside, or in case it is to take the testimony of a person engaged in such military service, "to any commissioned officer in the military or naval service of this State or the United States," authorize and requiring him to cause such witness to come before him, at such time and place as he may designate and appoint, and faithfully to take his deposition upon all such interrogatories as may be inclosed with or attached to said commission, both on the part of the plaintiff and defendant, and none others; and to certify the same, when thus taken, together with the said commission and interrogatories, into the court in which such cause shall be pending, with the least possible delay. (R. S. 1845, p. 233, § 10).

27. Notice to Non-Resident Party, etc. § 27. When the deposition of any witness is desired to be taken under the provisions of this act, and the adverse party is not a resident of the county in which the suit is pending, or is in default, and no attorney has appeared for him in such cause, upon filing an affidavit of such fact and stating the place of residence of such adverse party, if known, or that upon diligent inquiry, his place of residence cannot be ascertained, the notice required by this act may be given by sending a copy thereof by mail, postage paid, addressed to such party at his place of residence, if known, or if not known, by posting a copy of such notice at the door of the court house where the suit is pending, or publishing the same in the nearest newspaper, and when interrogatories are required, filing a copy thereof with the clerk of the court ten days before the time of suing out such commission. (L. 1845, p. 580, § 1).

Oral Examination. § 28. When a party shall desire to take the evidence of a non-resident witness, to be used in any cause pending in this State the party desiring the same, or where notice shall have been given that a commission to take the testimony of a non-resident witness will be applied for, the opposite party, upon giving the other three days' notice in writing of his election so to do, may have a commission directed in the same manner as provided in section 26 of this act, to take such evidence, upon interrogatories to be propounded to the witness orally; upon the taking of which each party may appear before the commission, in person or by attorney, and interrogate the witness. The party desiring such testimony shall give to the other the following notice of the time and place of taking the same, to-wit: ten days, and one day in addition thereto (Sundays included) for every one hundred miles' travel from the place of holding the court to the place where such deposition is to be taken. . . .

How Depositions Taken and Certified. § 30. Previous to the examination of any witness whose deposition is about to be taken as aforesaid, he or she shall be sworn (or affirmed) by the person or persons authorized to take the same, to testify the truth in relation to the matter in controversy, so far as he or she may be interrogated; whereupon the said commissioner, judge, master in chancery, notary public, justice of the peace, clerk, or other person authorized to take depositions (as the case may be), shall proceed to examine such witness upon all such interrogatories as may be inclosed with or attached to any such commission as aforesaid, and which are directed to be put to such witness, or where the testimony is taken upon oral interrogatories, upon all such interrogatories as may be directed to be put by either party litigant; and shall cause such interrogatories, together with the answers of the witness thereto, to be reduced to writing in the order in which they shall be proposed and answered, and signed by such witness; after which, it shall be the duty of the person taking such deposition to annex at the foot thereof a certificate, subscribed by himself, stating that it was sworn to and signed by the deponent, and the time and place when and where the same was taken. And every such deposition, when thus taken and subscribed, and all exhibits produced to the said commissioner, judge, master in chancery, notary public, justice of the peace, or clerk, or other person authorized to take depositions, as aforesaid, or which shall be proved or referred to by any witness, together with the commission and interrogatories, if any, shall be inclosed, sealed up, and directed to the clerk of the court in which the action shall be pending, with the names of the parties litigant indorsed thereon: Provided, that when any deposition shall be taken as aforesaid, by any judge, master in chancery, notary public, or justice of the peace out of this state, or other officer, such return shall be accompanied by a certificate of his official character, under the great seal of the state, or under the seal of the proper court of record of the county or city wherein such deposition shall be taken. (R. S. 1845, p. 234, § 12).

Deposition — Unsealed, Etc. — Informal. § 31. Every deposition that shall be returned to the court unsealed, or the seal of which shall be broken previous to its reception by the clerk to whom it is directed, shall, if objection be made thereto in proper time, be regarded by the court as informal and insufficient. (R. S. 1845, p. 235, § 16).

Opening Deposition — Penalty. § 32. It shall not be lawful for any party litigant, or the clerk of the court into which any deposition may be returned as aforesaid, to break the seal of the same, either in term time or in vacation, unless by consent of parties or their attorneys, indorsed thereon by permission of the court. . . .

Dictating, Etc., Effect of. § 33. The party, his attorney, or any person who shall in anywise be interested in the event of the suit, shall not be permitted to dictate, write or draw up any deposition which may at any time be taken under this Act, or be present during the taking of any deposition by written interrogatories; and every deposition so dictated, written or drawn up, or during the taking of which any such party, his attorney, or any person interested is present when the same is taken upon written interrogatories, as aforesaid, shall be rejected by the court as informal and insufficient. (R. S. 1845, p. 235, § 16).

Effect of Deposition. § 34. Every examination and deposition which shall be taken and returned according to the provisions of this act, may be read as good and competent evidence in the cause in which it shall be taken, as if such witness had been presented and examined by parol in open court, on the hearing or trial thereof. (R. S. 1845, p. 235, § 13).

370. EVANS v. ROTHSCHILD

SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS. 1895

54 Kan. 747; 39 Pac. 701

ERROR from Washington District Court.

Replevin by Emanuel Rothschild & Bros. against Evans, as sheriff, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. The defendants bring the case here.

This was an action of replevin, brought by the defendants in error as partners, under the firm name of E. Rothschild & Bros., against the sheriff of Washington county, to recover certain merchandise. On his own application, William Morrison was made a party, and answered, claiming ownership of the property in controversy. On the 22d of October, 1890, the plaintiffs served a notice on the attorney for the sheriff that they would take depositions in Chicago on the 28th of October, 1890, between the hours of 8 o'clock A.M. and 6 o'clock P.M. They also, at the same time, served another notice that they would take depositions on the day stated in the other notice, in St. Joseph, Mo. The defendant appeared by attorney, and attended the taking of depositions at St. Joseph, but did not appear at Chicago. Before the commencement of the trial, the defendants duly excepted to the depositions taken at Chicago, on the ground that they had elected to appear and attend the taking of the depositions at St. Joseph, and that they could not be required to attend in two places, distant from each other, at the same time. The Court overruled the exceptions, and permitted both depositions to be read at the trial.

Omar Powell, for plaintiffs in error. T. P. Roney, and J. W. Rector, for defendants in error.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

ALLEN, J. (after stating the facts as above).

Section 352 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for the service of a notice of the time and place of taking depositions, as follows: "The notice shall be served so as to allow the adverse party sufficient time, by the usual route of travel, to attend, and one day for preparation, exclusive of Sunday and the day of service." Does this permit the service of two or more notices to take depositions at places widely separate from each other, on the same day, provided only the notice is served in sufficient time to give the party an opportunity to go to either place designated? We think the spirit, if not the letter, of the statute, clearly prohibits any such practice.

Where testimony is taken by deposition, it is in one sense a part of the trial of the cause, and the only chance given to the opposing party to confront the witnesses whose depositions are taken under the notice is to attend before the officer who takes them. The only opportunity to apply the tests necessary to correct errors or detect falsehood in the statements drawn out on direct examination is that afforded by cross-examination at the same time. A party to an action has a right, if he deems it necessary, to be personally present when depositions are being taken affecting his interests. He is not required to employ a multitude of attorneys to protect his interests at different places on the same day, nor does the fact that he chooses to intrust his interests to the care of an attorney (other than the one who tries the case for him) at one place, require him or his principal counsel to attend on the same day at another place. A reasonable construction of the statute, in the light of its evident purpose, constrains us to hold that a party giving notices to take depositions at different places must so arrange the times as to allow the adverse party to attend each one, and that sufficient time must elapse after the conclusion of the taking of one deposition to allow the party at least time sufficient to reach the place where another is to be commenced. (Weeks, Dep., § 264; Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187.)

As the testimony included in the deposition taken at Chicago is of vital importance to the plaintiffs' case, and as the defendant had no opportunity to appear and cross-examine the witnesses, the error in refusing to suppress the deposition compels a reversal of the case. . . . The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

All the justices concurring.

371. WALKERTON v. ERDMAN

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA. 1894

23 Can. Sup. 352

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, affirming the judgment of the Divisional Court by which a new trial was ordered.

The action in this case was brought under Lord Campbell's Act in consequence of the death of John B. Erdman, from injuries received by falling into an excavation in one of the streets of the town. Erdman before his death had instituted an action, for damages for such injuries, in which by order of the Court his evidence was taken de bene esse, counsel for the town appearing at such examination and cross-examining. The sole question to be decided on this appeal is whether or not such evidence was admissible on the trial of the present action. . . .

The writ in that action was issued on 9th March, 1892. On 17th March Erdman's solicitors gave to the town notice that they would apply to a master on the 21st March for an order for his examination. Prior to the 21st March the town gave notice to Heughan of a motion to be made to the local High Court Judge that he should be made a co-defendant under the act of Ontario, 55 Vict. c. 42, § 531. Such an order was duly made on the 25th March, 1892. Upon the return of Erdman's summons on 21st March, 1892, the master ordered that the examination of Erdman de bene esse be made on the 23rd March upon notice to defendants, and to Heughan, who was stated in the order to have been served with a third party notice by defendants. The examination of Erdman took place on 23rd March, the solicitor for the town appearing and cross-examining, but, so far as appears, notice of the examination was not served on Heughan, he not having then in fact been made a party to the suit. Erdman died on 1st April, 1892, and his widow, having proved his will, began this action on the 6th June, 1892, for her own benefit as his widow, and for the benefit of four of his children.

Upon the trial, before STREET, J., the deposition of Erdman was tendered in evidence and rejected, and there being otherwise no proof of the cause of the injury the plaintiff was non-suited. The non-suit was set aside and a new trial ordered by the Divisional Court (ARMOUR, C. J., and FALCONBRIDGE, J.) and such judgment has been affirmed by the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal.

Aylesworth, Q. C., for the appellants. Lord Campbell's Act gives a new cause of action and one entirely different from that which deceased had in his lifetime. . . .

As regards this action the plaintiff is in no way in privity with the deceased. . . .

Shaw, Q. C., for respondent. The issues in both actions are substantially the same, and the evidence comes within the rules laid down in the books. . . .

O'Connor, Q. C., for third party.

FOURNIER, J. — I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

TASCHEREAU, J. — I would allow this appeal. I concur in my brother GWYNNE'S opinion.

GWYNNE, J. . . . The question is whether the depositions of the said John B. Erdman, so taken, are admissible as evidence for the plaintiff in the present action, against the contention of the defendants, the Corporation and Heughan, that they are not; and I am of opinion that the learned trial Judge's decision that they were not was correct and sound, and should be maintained upon the grounds following:

Upon the authority of the recent cases and especially since the judgment of the Privy Council in Robinson v. Canadian Pacific Railway Co. (1892, A. C. 481) it cannot be disputed in this court that the present action at the suit of the widow of the deceased, John B. Erdman, is a wholly different action in every particular from that instituted by Erdman in his lifetime. It is between wholly different parties and founded upon wholly different rights. Although the plaintiff is personal representative of the deceased she claims not in right of the deceased or of his estate, but being personal representative she is by statute authorized in that character to assert her own independent rights and those of her children.

The evidence is sought to be used in the present action not only against the Corporation of Walkerton but against the defendant Heughan also, and as no judgment in favor of the plaintiff can be rendered herein which is not conclusively binding upon Heughan as well as upon the corporation, he cannot be affected by depositions taken in an action to which he was not a party; "et ergo" depositions so taken cannot be used as evidence for the plaintiff in the present action. . . .

For these reasons I am of opinion that the learned trial judge was correct in his ruling at the trial and that therefore this appeal must be allowed with costs and that judgment of non-suit be ordered to be entered in the court below.

SEDGEWICK, J. — I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed. I think the evidence was properly admitted.

KING, J. . . . Notwithstanding the able argument of Mr. Aylesworth, I think that the judgment of the appeal court should be affirmed.

The rule of evidence is thus stated in Taylor on Evidence, § 464:

"Where a witness has given his testimony under oath in a judicial proceeding, in which the adverse litigant had the power to cross-examine, the testimony so given will, if the witness himself cannot be called, be admitted in any subsequent suit between the same parties, or those claiming under them, provided it relates to the same subject or substantially involves the same material questions."

And thus, in another work on evidence (Stephen, Art. 32.) —

"Evidence given by a witness in a previous action is relevant for the purpose of proving the matter stated in a subsequent proceeding . . . when the witness is dead, provided the person against whom the evidence is to be given had the right and opportunity to cross-examine the declarant when he was examined as a witness; that the questions in issue were substantially the same in the first as in the second proceeding; and that the proceeding, if civil, was between the same parties, or their representatives in interest."

The evidence of Erdman was testimony under oath in a judicial proceeding, and (as Mr. Justice OSLER points out) was not the less so because taken de bene esse and never actually used on the trial of the action in which it was taken.

1. Subject to the observations to be made respecting the position of the third party, it also satisfies the rule that the party against whom it is offered in the present action, viz.: the Corporation of Walkerton, had the right and opportunity to cross-examine the declarant when he was examined as a witness, and in fact exercised the right.

2. Then as to the second requirement of the rule, viz.: that the questions in issue shall be substantially the same, or (as stated in Taylor) that the evidence relate to the same subject, or substantially involve the same material question, — this does not require that all the issues in the two actions shall correspond. It is satisfied if the evidence relates to any material issues that are substantially the same in both actions. Now the question of fact whether the injury to Erdman (the alleged cause of his death) was occasioned by the negligent act or omission of the town was a material issue in the action brought by him, and it is equally a material issue in the present action, as the plaintiff is bound to show that the death was occasioned by an act or default of the town which gave to Erdman a right of action against the town at the time of his death. And the evidence in question was tendered in support of that issue.

If indeed the admissibility of the evidence were to depend upon the causes of action being the same the respondent could not hope to succeed, because it is conclusively established that the cause of action given by the statute is different from that which the deceased had in his lifetime. . . . But, while the present cause of action is new and different from that brought in his lifetime by Erdman, it is nowhere stated that the causes of action are to be identical in order to render admissible in a later action evidence given in an earlier one. It is sufficient that material issues to which the evidence is relevant, and for the proof of which it is in each case adduced, are substantially the same in both proceedings. Here the second cause of action embraces what goes to constitute the first together with other things. I conclude therefore that the second requirement of the rule is met.

3. Then as to the third requirement, viz.: that the proceedings in the two actions shall be between the same parties, or those claiming under them. The plaintiff in this action, although suing as executrix, fills a mere nominal or formal position in the action. As expressed in more than one case, the plaintiff so suing is a mere instrument acting on behalf of the person (whether widow, child or parent) claiming to have sustained pecuniary loss through the death of the deceased. What has to be regarded, therefore, is the relation which the beneficial parties to the action bear in point of interest to the deceased. Can they be said to claim under him? . . . In the interpretation of the provision of the statute that the wrongful act causing the death shall be such as would, but for the death, have entitled the person injured to maintain an action, it has been held that this means a right of action subsisting in him down to the time of his death; and that, if previously having a right of action, he released it, or discharged it by accord and satisfaction, the statutory cause of action could not arise upon the death. This is the result of decisions such as Read v. Great Eastern Railway Co. (L. R. 3 Q. B. 555), and is supported by the before quoted observations of Lord Selborne, in Seward v. Vera Cruz, 10 App. Cas. 59. I think it follows upon this that the persons seeking the benefit of this action, the widow and children of Erdman, are in effect claiming through him. . . .

I therefore think that the judgment below is correct.

I also agree that the case is not affected by the circumstance of the third party proceedings. The plaintiff may succeed against the town and fail as to Heughan. . . . In order to make the third party liable it must be established on the trial, as against him, that the damages were sustained by reason of an obstruction, excavation or opening placed, made, left or maintained by him. This is not made out as against him by evidence admissible against the town but not against him, although such evidence may establish a case against the original defendant. . . .

For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

372. ANSONIA v. COOPER

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1895

66 Conn. 184; 33 N. E. 905

ACTION in the nature of interpleader, brought to the Superior Court in New Haven County and tried to the Court, GEORGE W. WHEELER, J.; facts found and judgment rendered in favor of Henry G. Alling, and appeal by Elizabeth Downs for alleged errors in the ruling of the Court. No error. The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

George B. Carroll, for the appellant, Elizabeth Downs. . . . The Court erred in its ruling respecting the depositions. . . .

V. Munger, for the appellee, Henry G. Alling. . . . The Court committed no error in respect to the depositions. The deposition taken at the instance of a party to an action, and not used by him, may be read in evidence by the opposite party, against the objection of the party at whose instance it was taken. . . .

TORRANCE, J. — This is a proceeding in the nature of a bill of interpleader between Henry G. Alling and Elizabeth Downs, to determine which of them is entitled to a fund paid into Court by the town of Ansonia, as the appraised value of land taken by said town for a schoolhouse site. . . .

We come now to the rulings upon questions of evidence, the more important of which relate to the depositions used in the case.

It appears that the appellant had taken in due form the depositions of Alfred Cooper, and of his wife and daughter. Counsel for both parties had stipulated that the depositions should be filed with the clerk, and might be opened and taken away by counsel for Downs, to be typewritten and copied for the convenience of Court and counsel, and that one typewritten copy should be considered as the original. The original and typewritten copy were both lying upon the table before the Court, and apparently in the physical possession of counsel for appellant. Alling offered to read from these depositions and to lay in evidence the portion so read. Thereupon the appellant objected, chiefly on the ground that she herself had not offered them in evidence. The Court, against the objection of the appellant, ruled that under these circumstances Alling might use them.

Upon a careful examination of the record, it is difficult to see how this ruling, even if erroneous, can have harmed the appellant. The depositions were those of her own witnesses, whose testimony, from the nature of the case, would presumably, be favorable to her. A good deal of that testimony, so far as it appears on the record, relates to matters not seriously disputed, and as a whole it appears to be favorable to her, or at least it does her no harm. The fact that the ruling did not harm the appellant would justify us in passing this matter without further consideration; but as the question involved is one which, so far as we are aware, has not been decided by this Court, and is one of some importance in practice, it seems advisable to express our views upon it.

In most cases depositions are taken for the purpose of being used by the party taking them. The cases where they are not so used are comparatively few in number; but in such cases if the right to use the depositions be denied to the adverse party, it may work a great hardship and injustice. It will seldom be known in advance of the actual trial, whether the party taking the deposition does or does not intend to use them, and when it is known that he will not use them, it will usually be too late for the adverse party to avail himself of the testimony of the deponents in any way, although he may have relied on that testimony in support of his case. If this right be denied to the adverse party, it will in very many cases necessitate the taking of two sets of depositions of the same witnesses, involving a useless expenditure of time and money. We see no good reason why this should be done, at least not in cases like the present, where the depositions were filed with the clerk, in whose custody they must by statute remain, unless suppressed by the Court, until final judgment in the cause.

On the whole, we see no good reason on principle for denying this right to the adverse party; and such appears to be the prevailing opinion as expressed in statutes, or rules of practice, or by the decisions of Courts. See the authorities cited in 5 Amer. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 607. It is true, as claimed by the appellant, that some of the authorities there cited in support of this right, are not in point, as for instance the case of Henshaw v. Clark, 2 Root 103; but after all, we think it does appear that the weight of authority is in favor of this right. We think the Court did not err in ruling as it did on this point. . . .

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

Topic 3. Modes of Satisfying the Rule of Confrontation

373. Introductory. In the period when the Hearsay rule is being established, and ex parte depositions are still used against an accused person, we find him frequently protesting that the witnesses should be "brought face to face," or that he should be "confronted" with the witnesses against him. The final establishment of the Hearsay rule, in the early 1700s, meant that this protest was sanctioned as a just one, — in other words, that Confrontation was required. What was, in principle, the meaning and purpose of this Confrontation?

It is generally agreed that the process of confrontation has two purposes, a main and essential one, and a secondary and subordinate one. (1) The main and essential purpose of confrontation is to secure the opportunity of cross-examination. The opponent demands confrontation, not for the idle purpose of gazing upon the witness, or of being gazed upon by him, but for the purpose of cross-examination, which cannot be had except by the direct and personal putting of questions and obtaining of immediate answers.

(2) There is, however, a secondary advantage to be obtained by the personal appearance of the witness; the judge and the jury are enabled to obtain the elusive and incommunicable evidence of a witness' deportment while testifying, and a certain subjective moral effect is produced upon the witness. This secondary advantage, however, does not arise from the confrontation of the opponent and the witness; it is not the consequence of those two being brought face to face. It is the witness' presence before the tribunal that secures this secondary advantage, — which might equally be obtained whether the opponent was or was not allowed to cross-examine. In other words, this secondary advantage is a result accidentally associated with the process of confrontation, whose original and fundamental object is the opponent's cross-examination.

Nevertheless, the secondary advantage, incidentally obtained for the tribunal by the witness' presence before it — the demeanor-evidence — is an advantage to be insisted upon wherever it can be had. But it is merely desirable. Where it cannot be obtained, it need not be required. It is no essential part of the notion of confrontation; it stands on no better footing than other evidence to which special value is attached; and just as the original of a document, or a preferred witness, may be dispensed with in case of unavailability, so demeanor-evidence may be dispensed with in a similar necessity. Accordingly, supposing that the indispensable requirement of cross-examination has already been satisfied, the only remaining inquiry is whether the demeanor-evidence, to be obtained by the witness' production before the tribunal, is available.

374. STATUTES. England. Rules of Supreme Court, under Judicature Act of 1875, c. 77, Order XXXVII, Rule 18. Except where by this Order otherwise provided, or directed by the Court or a Judge, no deposition shall be given in evidence at the hearing or trial of any cause or matter without the consent of the party against whom the same may be offered, unless the Court or Judge is satisfied that the deponent is dead or beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, or unable from sickness or other infirmity to attend the hearing or trial.

United States. Constitution (1787), Amendment VI. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him.

Ib. § 865. Unless it appears to the satisfaction of the Court that the witness is then dead, or gone out of the United States, or to a greater distance than 100 miles from the place where the Court is sitting, or that, by reason of age, sickness, bodily infirmity, or imprisonment, he is unable to travel and appear at court, such deposition shall not be used in the cause.

Ib. § 866. In any case where it is necessary, in order to prevent a failure or delay of justice, any of the courts of the United States may grant a "dedimus potestatem" to take depositions according to common usage; . . . and the provisions of § 863, 864, and 865 shall not apply to any deposition to be taken under the authority of this section.

375. GREENLEE v. MOSNAT

SUPREME COURT OF IOWA. 1907

136 Ia. 639; 111 N. W. 996

APPEAL from District Court, Benton County; OBED CASWELL, Judge.

Action to recover money received by J. J. Mosnat, deceased, as attorney for plaintiff, on certain fire insurance policies placed in his hands by plaintiff for collection. For defendant a settlement was pleaded in which, as alleged, the full amount of the money received by Mosnat beyond his reasonable fees as attorney for plaintiff had been paid over or accounted for. The action was first commenced during the lifetime of Mosnat, and there was a judgment for plaintiff on a verdict in his favor which was reversed on appeal. See 116 Iowa, 535. On a second trial there was again a verdict for plaintiff, which was reversed on appeal. See 126 Iowa 330. Pending the second appeal the death of the defendant was suggested, and his executrix was substituted. The present appeal is by defendant from a judgment on a verdict in plaintiff's favor rendered on the third trial of the case. Reversed.

Tom H. Milner, Nichols & Nichols, and Randall & Harding, for appellant.

C. W. E. Snyder, Whipple & Brown, and Montgomery & Chambers, for appellee.

MCCLAIN, J.—For the purpose of determining the question of law now submitted to us, it is sufficient to say that the issues of fact were as to whether there was an oral contract between plaintiff and deceased by which deceased was to receive ten per cent. of the money collected for plaintiff on the insurance policies, and was therefore bound to account to plaintiff for all the money received by him as plaintiff's attorney in excess of the agreed consideration, the claim of defendant being that no agreement as to the amount of the fee had been made, and whether a certain payment by check of deceased to plaintiff was in full satisfaction of all claims with reference to the money received by deceased for plaintiff, it being claimed by plaintiff that the check was expressly accepted only as payment on account. On the former trial both plaintiff and the deceased, who was then alive, testified as to whether there was an oral agreement for a ten per cent. fee, and as to whether there was any statement by plaintiff at the time the check was received that it was only accepted in part payment. Testimony of the defendant was offered with reference to services rendered by him to plaintiff as attorney before the insurance policies were placed in his hands for collection, but this testimony was excluded, and the judgment for plaintiff was reversed for this reason. On the trial from the judgment in which his appeal is taken, plaintiff was called as a witness, and testified with reference to the fire insurance policies and the institution of suit thereon by deceased as his attorney, but his offered testimony as to a conversation with deceased with reference to employment in the insurance cases was objected to because of the incompetency of plaintiff as a witness to testify to personal transactions or communications with deceased in view of the provisions of Code, § 4604, which prohibit a party to any action being "examined as a witness in regard to any personal transaction or communication between such witness and a person in the commencement of such examination deceased, insane or lunatic, against the executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee or survivor of such deceased person, or the assignee or guardian of such insane person or lunatic." This objection being sustained, the transcript of the shorthand notes of the evidence of plaintiff given on the former trial while Mosnat was living and the defendant in the case was offered, and over defendant's objection was received, as tending to show the terms of the employment of deceased by plaintiff, and as bearing on the question whether the check then given by deceased to plaintiff was accepted in full satisfaction and by way of settlement. In the same manner the transcript of the testimony of plaintiff with reference to a conversation with deceased in the presence of a witness whose testimony on the former trial was read in defendant's behalf was received in rebuttal. The admissibility of the testimony of plaintiff thus introduced by means of the transcript of the shorthand notes of the evidence on the former trial is the sole question presented for consideration. If the ruling of the Court admitting the testimony of plaintiff introduced by means of the transcript was correct, the judgment is to be affirmed. If it was erroneous, a reversal must necessarily follow, for without this testimony plaintiff had no proof of the contract relied upon by him that the fees of deceased should be limited to ten per cent. of the recovery on the insurance policies.

The admissibility in evidence of the transcript of plaintiff's testimony on the former trial is contended for under the provisions of chapter 9, p. 16, Acts 27th Gen. Assem. (Code Supp. 1902, § 245a), the material portion of which is as follows: "The original shorthand notes of the evidence, or any part thereof, heretofore or hereafter taken upon the trial of any cause or proceeding, in any court of record in this State, by the shorthand reporter of such court, or any transcript thereof, duly certified by such reporter, when material and competent, shall be admissible in evidence on any retrial of the case or proceeding in which the same were taken, and for purposes of impeachment in any case, and shall have the same force and effect as a deposition, subject to the same objections so far as applicable." For convenience we will separately discuss two views presented by appellee with reference to the admissibility of plaintiff's evidence given on the former trial: First, would such evidence be competent as against the prohibition of Code, § 4604; and, second, is it rendered competent by an accompanying statutory provision to which reference will be made in the second division of this opinion?

1. It is evident that the objection under Code, § 4604, is as to the witness as witness, and not to the testimony as evidence. McDonald v. Young, 109 Iowa 704; Burdick v. Raymond, 107 Iowa 228. The provision is that "no party . . . shall be examined as a witness in regard to any personal transaction," etc. The incompetency of a witness may be based on various grounds. He may be incompetent because of insanity, and the objection on that ground would be available in any case, or at common law he might be incompetent on account of interest in the particular case; and the objection on either ground might exist at one trial, and not at a subsequent trial, or vice versa. It is evident, therefore, that the question of incompetency of a witness depends for its solution on the particular ground as to which it is urged. If the witness has died after the first trial or has become incompetent to testify by reason of insanity or interest under the common-law rule, his testimony on the first trial may be proven. No doubt the same reasoning applies with reference to the common-law rule that conviction for felony disqualifies as a witness, with the result that testimony given before conviction for a felony may be subsequently used when the witness has become incompetent by reason of such conviction. Likewise, inability to produce the witness on account of illness, or infirmity or because he is beyond the reach of process will be a reason for admitting his testimony on a former trial. Central R. & B. Co. v. Murray, 97 Ga. 326; Jack v. Woods, 29 Pa. 375; State v. New Orleans Waterworks Co., 107 La. 1; Evans v. Reed, 78 Pa. 415; Wells v. Insurance Co., 187 Pa. 166; State v. Valentine, 29 N. C. 225; 2 Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 1401–1410; 2 Jones, Evidence, §§ 339–345.

But all of these illustrations relate to incapacity in general to give any testimony whatever at the time of the second trial. The objection we are now considering, however, relates to incapacity to testify as to a particular subject-matter; that is, the objection is not to the capacity of the witness, but to any testimony by him relating to the subject inquired about. The statutory prohibition seems to be as to the admissibility of the witness' testimony at the time of the trial when it is offered, if at the commencement of such trial the other party to the transaction or communication against whose executor or administrator the testimony is to be used is dead; and we think it is immaterial, under the statute, whether the evidence of such witness is offered by way of oral testimony at the trial, or by way of proof of the evidence given by him on a former trial. With reference to such transaction or communication, he has become incompetent to speak, and he can neither speak at that time nor can he then speak through his testimony given at another time. Counsel on either side have referred to several cases in this State as throwing light on the particular question now before us, but we do not find that the point has been considered, and we must now reach a solution of the language and reason of the statute.

Some light is thrown upon the question, however, by what has been decided with reference to the introduction after the decease of one party of depositions previously given by the adverse party with relation to a personal transaction or communication between them. If the witness is in Court, his deposition in a law case cannot be introduced. Lanza v. Le Grand Quarry Co., 124 Iowa 659. But in analogy to the rule in regard to testimony given on a former trial it has been held that a deposition taken before the incompetency of the witness accrues may be used after he has become incompetent by reason of insanity, interest, or otherwise, although he is physically present. Tift v. Jones, 74 Ga. 469; 2 Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 1401–1411; 13 Cyc. 995. Now, this Court has held prior to the enactment of Code, § 4605, referred to in the second division of this opinion, and under a provision corresponding to Code, § 4604, that the deposition of one party taken before the death of the adverse party, and relating to a personal transaction or communication between them, could not be introduced after the objection by reason of the death of the adverse party had arisen, and the Court says that the objection is as to the right to testify and that by a deposition the witness testifies when such deposition is offered in evidence. Quick v. Brooks, 29 Iowa 484. There are cases to the contrary. See Armitage v. Snowden, 41 Md. 119; Neis v. Farquharson, 9 Wash. 508.

But so much depends on the language of the statute to be construed that we cannot give these cases controlling weight. Our statute says that no party shall be examined as a witness in regard to such transactions, and in the last sentence of the section the question whether the testimony of the living witness shall be received is made to depend on whether the testimony of the deceased party is given in evidence, from which we infer that the whole section has relation to the receipt of the testimony at the trial in whatever form it may be taken or preserved.

Much is said by counsel for appellee in favor of the general proposition that, as plaintiff was competent to testify when his former testimony was given and has only been rendered incompetent by subsequent events, his former testimony ought to be accepted. But the policy of the statute seems not to be in harmony with this view. It is not on account of anything which has happened to the witness that he is unable to testify on this trial. It is because an obstacle has arisen to the enforcement of his claim as based on his own testimony by reason of the death of the other party, and that obstacle, as the statute provides, renders his testimony incompetent, unless in some way such obstacle is removed. If in this conclusion there is any apparent injustice, it is one incident to the application of the Code provision. It is not of infrequent occurrence that the prohibitions of that section prevent the establishment of meritorious claims against the estate of a deceased person. With the general policy of the statute we have nothing to do.

The Legislature has seen fit to fix a rule of evidence for our guidance which in some cases works injustice, but which it must be presumed on the whole tends to the promotion of Justice. The rule may be a hard one in individual cases, but it is not for us to abrogate it on that account.

We think that this case furnishes an illustration of the ultimate expediency of the rule which the Legislature has prescribed. As already indicated, the deceased was denied the right on the former trial, erroneously as was held on the former appeal, to testify with reference to defensive matter against this very claim. If plaintiff is allowed to establish it by his own testimony given on a former trial, the case must now be decided without the advantage which the defendant should have had from such excluded testimony. The best we can do in any event is to apply the rule of the statute in the cases in which it is found to be applicable. . . .

We reach the conclusion that the transcript of plaintiff's testimony in the former trial was erroneously admitted, and the judgment is reversed.

SHERWIN, J.—I cannot agree to the rule announced in the second division of the opinion.

DEEMER, J.—On authority of Lanza v. Quarry Co., 124 Iowa 659, 100 N. W. 488, I concur in the dissent of SHERWIN, J. The question is not the competency of the testimony, but of the witness. Under section 4605 the testimony was competent by statute and the witness was made competent by statute. Regard must be had of the change in the statute brought into the law by Chapter 9, p. 16, Acts 27th Gen. Assem.

376. HUGHES v. CHICAGO, ST. PAUL, MILWAUKEE & OMAHA R. CO.

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN. 1904

122 Wis. 258; 99 N. W. 897

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Douglas County; A. J. VINJE, Judge.

Action by Thomas Hughes, by guardian ad litem, against the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeal. Reversed.

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by being struck by an engine of the defendant while crossing Ogden avenue, in Superior. Issue being joined, and trial had, the jury returned a special verdict. . . . From the judgment entered upon that verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount stated, the defendant brings this appeal. . . .

Pierce Butler and S. L. Perrin, for appellant. W. P. Crawford and W. D. Dyer, for respondent.

CASSODAY, C. J. (after stating the facts). The defendant claims that a verdict should have been directed in favor of the defendant on several grounds. . . .

5. November 29, 1902, under section 4096, Rev. St. 1898, the plaintiff examined J. P. Cleary, who was the conductor of the train in question at the time of the accident, and also Robert G. Wilson, who was the engineer on the locomotive in question at the time of the accident. At the time of the trial, in June, 1903, and when the plaintiff offered in evidence the depositions of those two witnesses so taken under section 4096, the defendant objected to the same on the ground that both of such witnesses were then and there present in the Court; and it appears in the record that they were both, in fact, then and there present in the courtroom. The Court overruled the objection, and the defendant excepted.

This Court held, 20 years ago, and repeatedly since, that the section of the statute under which these depositions were taken "was intended as a substitute for a bill of discovery," but that "the examination of a party under" that section was "not limited to the cases in which a discovery might have been had in equity." Cleveland v. Burnham, 60 Wis. 16; Kelly v. C. & N. W. Ry. Co., 60 Wis. 480, 521; Whereatt v. Ellis, 65 Wis. 639; Meier v. Paulus, 70 Wis. 165, 170, 171; Frawley v. Cosgrove, 83 Wis. 441; Schmidt v. Menasha Wooden Ware Co., 92 Wis. 529. In Meier v. Paulus, supra, Mr. Justice TAYLOR said:

"The very object of the old bill of discovery was to procure evidence against the opposite party, to be used on the trial of an action; and it was never held that the answer of the party to the bill could not be used against him if he appeared at the trial of the action in aid of which it was taken, and was willing to submit himself to an examination in such action. . . . The examination of a party is in the nature of an admission, so far as his answers are material to the issues in the action, and such admissions are always admitted as original evidence against him."

Subsequently to the Revision of 1878 the scope of the section was enlarged so that, "in case a private corporation be a party, the examination of the president, secretary or other principal officer or general managing agent of such corporation" might be taken by deposition at the instance of the adverse party. Section 4096, Rev. St. 1898. By a recent statute the section has, in terms, been extended to the "agent or employé" of such corporation or of such adverse party. Chapter 244, p. 328, Laws 1901.

Neither of the witnesses in question was an officer of the defendant, nor in any sense a party to this action. On the contrary, each was a mere employé in the capacity mentioned. Assuming that their depositions were rightfully taken under the statute cited, the question recurs whether it was error to allow the same to be read in evidence on the trial against the objection of the defendant, when both witnesses were then and there present in Court, subject to be called and examined as witnesses in the ordinary way. Certainly there is no adjudication of this Court justifying such admission under the circumstances mentioned. The cases cited are to the effect that such "deposition of a party" so taken "is admissible on the trial as original evidence against him, although he is present at the trial," on the ground that such "examination of a party is in the nature of an admission so far as his answers are material to the issues in the action, and such admissions are always admitted as original evidence against him." Meier v. Paulus, supra. At the time of Blackstone the want of power to examine witnesses abroad was troublesome to Courts of law, but he said it might "be done indirectly at any time, through the channel of a Court of equity, but that such practice had never been directly adopted as the rule of a Court of law." 3 Blackstone, Commentaries, 383. Mr. Greenleaf discusses at length the question of taking the testimony of absent witnesses by depositions, and, among other things, says, in effect, that "the Court of chancery has always freely exercised this power" of taking depositions in such cases; that the inconvenience to Courts of law was remedied by statutes in England and this country; and finally concludes that "depositions thus taken may be used at the trial by either party, whether the witness was or was not cross-examined, if it shall appear, to the satisfaction of the Court, that the witnesses are then dead, or gone out of the United States, or more than a hundred miles from the place of trial, or that by reason of age, sickness, bodily infirmity, or imprisonment, they are unable to travel and appear at court." 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, §§ 320–322. . . . Mr. Weeks, in his work on the Law of Depositions, gives similar views, and, among other things, says that "depositions are a species of evidence of a secondary character, admissible where the viva voce testimony or examination of the deponent is not attainable." Sections 4–6. Such was the common law when our Constitution was adopted, and that declares that "the testimony in causes in equity shall be taken in like manner as in cases at law, and the office of master in chancery is hereby prohibited." Section 19, art. 7, Const. Wis. This provision seems to recognize the rule of the common law for the taking of testimony "in cases at law," and to require that the "testimony in cases in equity shall be taken in like manner as in cases at law." The question was not squarely involved in Noonan v. Orton, 5 Wis. 60, 61, but the Court there said that:

> "We have no doubt that each party to a suit in chancery is, under our Constitution, entitled to have his witnesses examined in open court, subject, of course, to the occasional exceptions provided for in cases at law. He may, perhaps, be entitled, if he demands it, to have the witnesses of the adverse party so examined, subject to the like occasional exceptions."

Such expressions were fully sanctioned in the later case of Brown v. Runals, 14 Wis. 693, where it was held that, under the constitutional clause in question, "a party to an action such as was formerly denominated equitable is entitled to have the testimony in the case taken in open Court, subject to the same exceptions as are allowed by law in actions such as were formerly denominated legal." That was an action in equity, and it was reversed because it was referred to take the testimony against the objection of the defendant. After referring to the clear and terse language of the provision of the Constitution in question, it is said in the opinion of the Court that:

"How is testimony taken in actions at law? With few exceptions, it is taken by the examination of witnesses on the trial before the Court and jury. This is the almost universal practice of taking testimony in common-law cases. And the advantages of this method of investigating facts, where the witnesses are orally examined, and where their appearance, manner, and conduct in giving their testimony can be seen by the Court and jury, are too obvious to need comment. . . . It was the benefit of this system of taking testimony which the framers of the Constitution intended to secure to the parties in equity cases." Page 698.

That opinion was reaffirmed a few months afterwards, and it was held that an act of the Legislature requiring all testimony in a certain class of equity cases to be taken before a referee was void, among other reasons, because it deprived the party of his constitutional right to have his witnesses examined in open Court. Oatman v. Bond, 15 Wis. 20, 27, We must hold that it was error to allow the depositions to be read against the objections of the defendant.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

377. STATE v. HEFFERNAN

Supreme Court of South Dakota. 1909

24 S. D. 1; 123 N. W. 87

On rehearing. Judgment affirmed.

For former report, see 118 N. W. 1027.

McCoy, J.—The former opinion in this case, reversing the judgment of the trial Court, is reported in 118 N. W. 1027. Petition for rehearing having been granted, the cause is again before this Court for all purposes upon reargument of the entire record. There is but one debatable question in the record. The defendants were convicted of the crime of adultery. On the trial in the Circuit Court certain witnesses, children of the defendant Taylor, were absent from this State and beyond the jurisdiction of the trial Court, having but a short time prior to the trial left the State of South Dakota and gone to the State of Iowa. These witnesses testified in behalf of the State on the preliminary examination held before the county judge of Kingsbury county acting as committing magistrate in the presence of defendants, and were cross-examined by defendant's counsel, and the testimony thus given was taken in shorthand by a stenographer. On the trial in the Circuit Court, after showing the absence of these witnesses from the jurisdiction of the Court, the State called Mr. Scott, the stenographer who took the testimony on the preliminary hearing, as a witness, and by him, using his transcript of the evidence of said witnesses to refresh his memory, gave the testimony of each of said witnesses before the jury. The defendants made proper objections to the offer and admission of this testimony, which objections were overruled, and proper exceptions taken thereto. Defendants now, as on the former hearing, urge that the admission of such evidence was reversible error.

It is contended on the part of defendants that the admission of this testimony was in violation of section 7, Code Cr. Proc., which, among other things, provides that: "In a criminal action the defendant is entitled to be confronted with the witnesses against him in the presence of the Court." It is evident the learned trial Court overrruled the objections to the testimony in question on the theory that it was admissible under a well-known exception to the "hearsay rule." The reason for excluding hearsay evidence is that it was not given under the sanction of an oath, and that there was no opportunity for cross-examination.

It has long been a settled rule of evidence, as one of the exceptions to the general rule excluding hearsay, that the testimony of a witness given in a former action, or at a former stage of the same action, is competent in a subsequent action, or in a subsequent proceeding of the same action, where it is shown that such witness is dead, has become insane or disqualified, is beyond the jurisdiction of the Court (that is, out of the State), cannot conveniently be found, or has been kept away by the opposite party, where it is also shown that the former giving of such testimony was under oath, and that opposing party cross-examined or was afforded an opportunity to cross-examine such witness. This rule has been generally applied in criminal causes, and has been held not to be in conflict with article 6 of the United States Constitution amendments, providing that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to be confronted with the witnessses against him," nor in conflict with the State Constitution, such as ours (article 6, § 7), which provides that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right to meet the witnesses against him face to face"; it being held that, where the defendant has once at some proper stage of the proceeding been confronted with and met such witness face to face, has cross-examined him, or been given the privilege to do so, the provisions of these Constitutions have been satisfied, and that such evidence is not objectionable on that account. Elliott, Evidence, § 503; Jones, Evidence, § 339; Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 1365–1395; 12 Cyc. 543; 16 Cyc. 1091; Mattox v. United States, 156 U. S. 237, 15 Sup. Ct. 337, 39 L. Ed. 409; Bishop, Crim. Pro. 1194; State v. Mannion, 19 Utah, 505, 67 Pac. 542, 45 L. R. A. 638, 75 Am. St. Rep. 753. This rule seems to have come into existence of necessity by reason of the fact that to hold otherwise would often result in a failure or miscarriage of justice. The defendant in the case at bar contends that because the legislators of this State who framed this section 7, Code Cr. Proc., added thereto the clause "in the presence of the Court," it confers upon a defendant in a criminal action some greater or broader or additional right than is conferred by the provisions of the State and Federal Constitutions, and that the adding of this clause, "in the presence of the Court," has the effect to limit the former testimony that may be given under the above-mentioned exception to the "hearsay rule" to only such testimony as might be given "in the presence of the Court wherein the action is being tried"; or, in other words, that the confrontation mentioned in this section of the Code can only take place in the presence of the Court wherein the action is being tried. Upon further and more careful consideration, we are of the opinion that this position is unsound and untenable, and not sustained by authority.

Formerly, according to the history of these provisions of the State and Federal Constitutions and like statutes, defendants in criminal actions were prosecuted and convicted upon ex parte depositions and affidavits, taken in the absence of the defendant and his counsel, and to remedy this evil such constitutional provisions and statutes were brought into existence, the intended effect of which was to secure to the defendant the right or privilege of cross-examination of the witnesses against him, that he might propound or have propounded to such witnesses personally questions which they were required to answer on oath in his presence. It seems to be held everywhere and by all Courts of last resort that "to be confronted with the witnesses against him" and to "meet the witnesses face to face" mean one and the same thing; that is, that the accused shall have the right or privilege to cross-examine the witnesses against him. To confront a witness means that you shall have the right or privilege or opportunity to meet such witness personally face to face for the purpose of cross-examination. Elliott, Evidence, § 503; Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 1365–1395; 12 Cyc. 543; Mattox v. U. S., 156 U. S. 237, 15 Sup. Ct. 337, 39 L. Ed. 409; Bishop, Crim. Pro. 1194, 1197, 1294; State v. Mannion, 19 Utah, 505, 57 Pac. 542, 45 L. R. A. 638, 75 Am. St. Rep. 753. It would be an absurdity, and statement of a physical impossibility, to say that the "confrontation" or meeting of a witness "face to face" which resulted in cross-examination in the presence of the defendant could take place without the witness being personally present at the place of the "confrontation" or place of such meeting "face to face." It is plainly apparent that the framers of the State and Federal Constitutions contemplated and had in mind and impliedly intended that this "confrontation" and "meeting face to face" should take place somewhere. It is also plainly apparent that they did not intend that such confrontation and meeting face to face should take place out on the railroad track or in some dimly lighted back alley, but it is evident they intended it should take place in the presence of the Court or tribunal where the cross-examination or opportunity to cross-examine might properly and lawfully take place. Elliott, Evidence §§ 503–507; Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 1373, 1375, 1395. In general, the principle is clearly accepted that testimony taken before any tribunal employing cross-examination as a part of its procedure is admissible. Wigmore, Evidence, § 1373. These constitutional provisions mean that the "confrontation" or "meeting face to face" must take place in the presence of the Court having jurisdiction to permit the privilege of cross-examination. They could by no possibility mean otherwise. Hence there was nothing added to the legal effect of section 7, Code Cr. Proc., by the incorporation therein of the clause "in the presence of the Court," as used in this section of the statute. . . .

But considering this section of the statute in the light of the purpose sought to be obtained, and in the light of the reasons which brought it about, viz., to remedy the evil of ex parte depositions and affidavits by securing to the defendant the right to cross-examine the witness against him, it is plainly apparent that the legislative mind by the use of the clause "in the presence of the Court" had in view the court wherein this right or privilege of cross-examination might be legally exercised, whether it was Justice court, county court, or Circuit court; the object being to shut out all possibility of the use of ex parte depositions not taken in the presence of the accused. It was simply re-enactment of the constitutional right then already existing. This is, in effect, the view taken by the United States Supreme Court in Mattox v. United States, supra. . . . This seems to be the view taken by the Courts of last resort of other States having similar statutes. . . . The case of People v. Fish, 125 N. Y. 136, 26 N. E. 319, holds that neither this same section 8, Code Cr. Proc. N. Y., containing this clause, "in the presence of the Court," nor section 14 of the New York Bill of Rights (1 Rev. St. pt. 1, c. 4), nor the Federal Constitution, were ever intended to secure the accused the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him upon his final trial, but to protect him against ex parte affidavits and depositions taken in his absence. . . .

Mr. Wigmore, in his valuable work on Evidence, reaches the same conclusion. He has gone into the history and purpose of this question so thoroughly and to such length that it is impracticable to fully quote the whole of his argument. Volume 2, §§ 1365–1418, inclusive. In the period when the hearsay rule is being established and ex parte depositions are still used against an accused person, we find him frequently protesting that the witnesses should be "brought face to face" or that he should be "confronted" with the witnesses against him. The final establishment of the hearsay rule meant that this protest was sanctioned as a just one; in other words, that confrontation was required. What was, in principle, the meaning and purpose of this confrontation? So far as there is a rule of confrontation, what is the process that satisfies this rule? It is generally agreed that the process of confrontation has two purposes — the main and essential one, and a secondary one. The main and essential purpose of confrontation is to secure the opportunity of cross-examination. The opponent demands confrontation, not for the idle purpose of gazing upon a witness or of being gazed upon by him, but for the purpose of cross-examination, which cannot be had except by the direct and personal putting of questions and obtaining immediate answers. That this is the true and essential significance of confrontation is demonstrated by counsel and judges from the beginning of the hearsay rule to the present day. There is, however, a secondary advantage to be obtained from the personal appearance of the witness. The judge and jury are enabled to obtain the elusive and incommunicable evidence of a witness' deportment while testifying, and a certain subjective moral effect is produced upon the witness. This secondary advantage, however, does not arise from the confrontation of the opponent and the witness. It is not the consequence of those two being brought face to face. It is the witness' presence before the tribunal that secures this secondary advantage, which might equally be obtained whether the opponent was or was not allowed to cross-examine. In other words, this secondary advantage is a result accidentally associated with the process of confrontation, whose original and fundamental object is the opponent's cross-examination. The witness' presence before the tribunal may be dispensed with if not obtainable. The question, then, whether there is a right to be confronted with opposing witnesses, is essentially a question whether there is a right of cross-examination. If there has been a cross-examination, there has been a confrontation. The satisfaction of the right of cross-examination disposes of any objection based on the so-called right of confrontation. Nevertheless, the secondary advantage incidentally obtained for the tribunal by the witness' presence before it — the demeanor-evidence — is an advantage to be insisted upon whenever it can be had. No one has doubted that it is highly desirable if only it is available. But it is merely desirable. Where it cannot be obtained, it need not be required. It is no essential part of the motion of confrontation. It stands on no better footing than other evidence to which special value is attached, and just as the original of a document, or a preferred witness may be dispensed with in case of unavailability, so demeanor-evidence may be dispensed with in a similar necessity. Accordingly, supposing that the indispensable requirement of cross-examination has been satisfied, the only remaining inquiry is whether the demeanor-evidence, to be obtained by the witness' production before the tribunal, is available.

This inquiry, the conditions of unavailability of demeanor-evidence by reason of death, illness, and the like, remains now to be made. But first the effect must be considered of the constitutional sanction in the United States of the principle of confrontation; for this has often erroneously affected the judicial attitude towards demeanor-evidence. In the United States most of the Constitutions have given a permanent sanction to the principle of confrontation by provisions requiring that in criminal cases the accused shall "be confronted with the witnesses against him" or "brought face to face" with them. The question thus arises whether these constitutional provisions affect the common-law requirement of confrontation otherwise than by putting it beyond the possibility of abolition by an ordinary legislative body. The only opening for argument lies in the circumstance that these brief provisions are unconditional and absolute in form; i.e., they do not say that the accused shall be "confronted" except where the witness is deceased, ill, out of the jurisdiction, or otherwise unavailable, but imperatively prescribes that he "shall be confronted." Upon this feature the argument has many times been founded that, although the accused has had the fullest benefit of cross-examining a witness now deceased or otherwise unavailable, nevertheless, the witness' presence before the tribunal being constitutionally indispensable, his decease or the like is no excuse for dispensing with his presence.

That this argument is unfounded is doubtless; and the answer to it may be put in several forms: (1) There never was at common law any recognized right to an indispensable thing called confrontation as distinguished from cross-examination. There was a right to cross-examine as indispensable, and that right was involved in and secured by confrontation. It was the same right under different names. This much is clear enough from the history of the hearsay rule, and from the continuous understanding and exposition of the idea of confrontation. It follows that, if the accused has had the right of cross-examination, he has had the very privilege secured to him by the Constitution. (2) Moreover, this right of cross-examination thus secured was not a right devoid of exceptions. The right to subject opposing testimony to cross-examination is the right to have the hearsay rule enforced, for the hearsay rule is the rule requiring cross-examination. Now, the hearsay rule is not a rule without exceptions. There never was a time when it was without exceptions. There were a number of well-established ones at the time of the earliest Constitutions, and others might be expected to develop in the future. The rule had always involved the idea of exceptions, and the Constitution makers indorsed the general principle merely as such. They did not care to enumerate exceptions. They merely named and described the principle sufficiently to indicate what was intended. The rule sanctioned by the Constitution is the hearsay rule as to cross-examination, with all the exceptions that may legitimately be found, developed, or created therein. (3) The net result then, under the constitutional rule, is that, so far as testimony is required under the hearsay rule to be taken infrajudicially (that is, within the presence of the Court), it shall be taken in a certain way, namely, subject to cross-examination, not secretly or ex parte away from the accused. 2 Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 1365, 1395, 1396, 1397. For decisions sustaining the view that these provisions of the Constitutions were passed in view of the hearsay rule, and in view of the exceptions thereto, and did not have the effect of destroying such exceptions, see Jackson v. State, 81 Wis. 127, 51 N. W. 89; Summons v. State, 5 Ohio St. 341; State v. McO'Blenis, 24 Mo. 416, 435; Mattox v. U. S., supra; State v. Mannion, 19 Utah 505, 57 Pac. 542.

And, again, the statute in question is general, and contains no exceptions, any more than does the Federal or State Constitutions. And if it is to receive a literal construction without exception, then it logically and necessarily follows that dying declarations and the former testimony of deceased witnesses must hereafter be rejected in this State, as those exceptions are in the same category and stand upon the same basis as the former testimony of a witness who is beyond the seas or out of the jurisdiction of the Court. But, if it was the intention that this section of our statute was passed in view of the hearsay rule, with all the exceptions thereto, which we are constrained to believe, then all the recognized exceptions to that rule are available just the same under the provisions of the Federal and State Constitutions. . . .

The former testimony of a witness who is absent from the State—that is, beyond the jurisdiction of the Court—is one of the well-recognized necessities within the exceptions of the hearsay rule. A party desiring to offer the testimony of a witness who is out of the jurisdiction and beyond the reach of a subpœna or other compulsory process of the trial Court is helpless. This branch of the rule stands upon the same reasoning and basis as the former testimony of a deceased witness. Wigmore, Evidence, § 1404; Jones, Evidence, § 345; 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 163; 1 Elliott, Evidence, § 500.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

SUB-TITLE II. EXCEPTIONS TO THE HEARSAY RULE

380. INTRODUCTORY. Principle of the Exceptions to the Hearsay Rule. The purpose and reason of the Hearsay rule is the key to the exceptions to it. The theory of the Hearsay rule is that the many possible sources of inaccuracy and untrustworthiness which may lie underneath the bare untested assertion of a witness can best be brought to light and exposed, if they exist, by the test of cross-examination. But this test or security may in a given instance be superfluous; it may be sufficiently clear, in that instance, that the statement offered is free from the risk of inaccuracy and untrustworthiness, so that the test of cross-examination would be a work of supererogation. Moreover, the test may be impossible of employment — for example, by reason of the death of the declarant—, so that, if his testimony is to be used at all, there is a necessity for taking it in the untested shape. These two considerations — a Circumstantial Guarantee of Trustworthiness, and a Necessity for the evidence — may be examined more closely, taking first the latter.

(1) Necessity. The Necessity principle implies that since we shall lose the benefit of the evidence entirely unless we accept it untested, there is thus a greater or less necessity for receiving it. The reason why we shall otherwise lose it may be one of two. (1) The person whose assertion is offered may now be dead, or out of the jurisdiction, or insane, or otherwise unavailable for the purpose of testing. This is the commoner and more palpable reason. It is found in the exception for Dying Declarations and in the next ensuing ones. (2) The assertion may be such that we cannot expect, again or at this time, to get evidence of the same value from the same or other sources. This appears more or less fully in the exception for Spontaneous Declarations, for Reputation, and in part elsewhere. Here we are not threatened (as in the first case) with the entire loss of a person's evidence, but merely of some valuable source of evidence. The necessity is not so great; perhaps hardly a necessity, only an expediency or convenience, can be predicated. But the principle is the same.

(2) Circumstantial Guarantee of Trustworthiness. The second principle, which, combined with the first, satisfies us to accept the evidence untested, is in the nature of a practicable substitute for the ordinary test of cross-examination. This circumstantial guarantee of trustworthiness is found in a variety of circumstances sanctioned by judicial practice. The following different classes of reasons can be distinguished:

(a) Where the circumstances are such that a sincere and accurate statement would naturally be uttered, and no plan of falsification be formed;

(b) Where, even though a desire to falsify might present itself, other considerations, such as the danger of easy detection or the fear of punishment, would probably counteract its force;

(c) Where the statement was made under such conditions of publicity that an error, if it had occurred, would probably have been detected and corrected.

It is not always that an exception is founded merely on a single one of these considerations. Often it rests on the operation, in different degrees, of two of them. For example, the exceptions for Declarations of Mental Condition, Spontaneous Declarations, and Declarations against Interest rest entirely on Reason a; while the exception for Declarations about Family History (Pedigree), rests largely upon Reason a, though partly also on Reason c. The exception for Dying Declarations rests entirely on Reason b (the fear of divine punishment). The exception for Regular Entries rests chiefly on Reason b, though partly also on Reasons a and c. The exception for Official Statements rests chiefly on Reasons b and c, though a also enters. Mixed considerations have thus often prevailed. The exceptions have been established casually, in the light of practical good sense, and with little or no effort (except in modern times) at generalization or comprehensive planning. The Courts have had in mind merely to sanction certain situations as a sufficient guarantee of trustworthiness.

(3) Witness-Qualifications, and other Rules, also to be applied to Statements admitted under the Exceptions. The Hearsay rule is merely an additional test or safeguard to be applied to testimonial evidence which would be otherwise admissible. Hence, these extrajudicial statements may be inadmissible because of their failure to fulfil the ordinary rules about testimonial qualifications.[1] For example, in the Pedigree Exception there are rules about membership in the family, which rest solely on the necessity of knowledge in the person whose statement is offered, — i.e. a rule of Testimonial Qualifications. In the same way, the allowance of an exception to the Hearsay rule does not of itself dispense with the application of the other Auxiliary Rules of Policy, of which the Hearsay rule is only one. For example, when a written entry is offered under an exception to the Hearsay rule, the rule about Producing the Original of a Document comes into application and must be observed; in offering a dying declaration, the rule of Completeness may come into play; and the rules of Testimonial Preference are often invoked throughout the exceptions. These, with the rule of Authentication, and the rule of Integration or Parol Evidence, are the auxiliary rules that find most frequent application to testimony admitted under hearsay exceptions.

Topic 1. Dying Declarations

381. WRIGHT DEM. CLYMER v. LITTLER

KING'S BENCH. 1761

3 Burr. 1244

THIS was an ejectment for certain copyhold lands within the manor of Barnes in the county of Surrey; in which manor, there is a custom of Burrough-English.

The lessor of the plaintiff, William Clymer, made out his title, under a regular and undisputed will of his grandfather John Clymer, dated 17th February, 1743. . . . The title of the defendants (who were purchasers under another William Clymer, second and youngest son of John, and uncle to William the lessor of the plaintiff) depended upon another subsequent will (or instrument which they called a will) made by the said John, as they alleged, on the 20th of September, 1745; which, they

[1] 1881, Lord Blackburn, in Dysart Peerage Case, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 489, 504: "It is impossible to say that if a person said something, and could not himself if alive have been permitted to give testimony to prove it, he can by dying render that statement admissible. I think that is a self-evident proposition."

contended, was at least a revocation of his former will in 1743. And if it be only a revocation of the former will, then William the youngest son of John must inherit as heir in Burrough-English. This will or instrument of 1745 (which was not under seal) was all written by one William Medlicott, who was son-in-law to the said John Clymer, (having married his only daughter Amey.) It was also endorsed on the back, in the same handwriting of the said William Medlicott, in these words — "The Covenant and Agreement of John Clymer;" and it was witnessed by the same William Medlicott and one Elizabeth Mitchell. . . .

William Medlicott died in May, 1747. He had the custody of both wills, till a few weeks before his death. The latter will was found amongst his papers. At the trial, the lessor of the plaintiff produced and proved the will of 1743; under which, he was devisee of this estate, in fee. To encounter this evidence, the defendants produced this will or instrument of 1745; and both the witnesses to it (Elizabeth Mitchell and William Medlicott) being dead, they proved their handwritings, and also the handwriting of old John Clymer, in the common and ordinary form.

Whereupon the plaintiff's counsel insisted, that this will or instrument was, in the first place, an absolute forgery. . . . And they called Mary Victor, sister to the said William Medlicott, who was one of the subscribing witnesses to the will or instrument of 1745: which Mary Victor swore, "That whilst she was attending her said brother William Medlicott in his last illness, and about three weeks before his death, he pulled out of his bosom the will of 1743, and said, 'It was the true will of John Clymer;' and then delivered it to her, with directions to deliver it over to William Clymer the lessor of the plaintiff, or to Mr. Faulkner." . . . Upon Mary Victor's cross-examination by the counsel for the defendants, she not only persisted in what she had before deposed, but also added that at the same time that William Medlicott produced the will of 1743, as the true will of old John Clymer, he acknowledged and declared to her "That the said will or instrument of 1745 was forged by himself." No objection was made to this evidence, by the counsel for the defendants, at the trial.

The judge and jury (a special one) perused and examined the two instruments of 1743 and 1745, and their different signatures; — and took notice of the circumstances of the latter, being all of the handwriting of this William Medlicott himself; and disposing of a fee to Medlicott's own wife; and, upon the whole, they were all of opinion, "That it was a forgery." And the judge directed the jury to find for the plaintiff; which they did. . . .

This cause coming on to be argued yesterday, (19th November, 1761,) Mr. Justice WILMOT reported the evidence from Lord Chief Justice WILLES, who tried the cause, and who was satisfied with the evidence, and reported that no objection was made, at the trial, to the evidence given by this witness Mary Victor. . . .

Mr. Norton proceeded. He objected to the admission of this evidence, as being only hearsay evidence. What Medlicott said, ought not to be admitted or regarded; for it was not said upon oath, nor was there any opportunity of cross-examining him. . . .

Mr. Harvey and Mr. Lee argued for the lessor of the plaintiff, William Clymer, the grandson. . . . As to the evidence itself, — it was strictly and legally admissible. It was not given in order to prove the forgery; but to discredit their evidence arising from the proof of Medlicott's hand. . . . This evidence is admissible; because it was the solemn declaration of a dying man to his nearest relation; which is equal to an oath; for such declarations of dying men have been admitted as evidence even in cases of murder. So that it ought not to be called "mere hearsay evidence." . . .

Lord MANSFIELD. . . . As to the first ground, the defendants complain, that the Chief Justice misdirected the jury, by leaving to them as evidence of the declaration of Medlicott "That he forged it."

Answer. — It came out upon their own examination; they made no objection to it at the trial; and it certainly was a circumstance proper for the jury to consider.

The competence of evidence depends upon the circumstances under which it is given. The will of 1743 is set up after fifteen years. It was necessary to show how it was secreted, and how discovered; the declaration of Medlicott in his last illness, when he produced and delivered it for the use of the plaintiff, is allowed to be competent and material evidence. The instrument of 1743 was equally in his custody and secreted. The account he gave of it in his last moments is equally proper, . . . as the account was a confession of great iniquity, and as he could be under no temptation to say it, but to do justice and ease his conscience; I am of opinion "The evidence was proper to be left to the jury." . . .

The three other judges declared their entire concurrence; but declined expatiating upon it, or entering into particulars, as Lord MANSFIELD had so very fully gone through it.

382. STOBART v. DRYDEN

EXCHEQUER. 1836

1 M. & W. 615

COVENANT on a mortgage deed for the payment of 800£. with interest at 4£. per cent. Pleas — first, non est factum. . . .

At the trial before Lord ABINGER, C. B., at the last Summer Assizes for Durham, the deed on which the action was brought being produced in evidence there appeared to be two attesting witnesses to its execution by the defendant; one named Potts, the other M'Cree. M'Cree was dead; but Potts being called, denied all recollection of his having attested such a deed, and stated that he doubted the genuineness both of his own signature and the defendant's. A witness was then called, who proved the handwriting of M'Cree. . . . For the defence, it was proposed to give evidence of certain letters and statements of M'Cree, subsequent to the execution of the deed, which, although they did not in terms admit that the deed was a forgery, contained admissions that he had been guilty of some improper dealings with respect to it, and might, as it was alleged, have induced the jury to believe that the deed was either forged or fraudulently altered by M'Cree. The Lord Chief Baron, however, rejected the evidence. Witnesses were then called, who denied the genuineness of the defendant's and plaintiff's signatures. The jury, however, found a verdict for the plaintiff.

In Michaelmas Term, Cresswell obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground that the evidence rejected ought to have been admitted: citing Wright v. Littler, 3 Bur. 1244, 1 W. Bla. 346. . . .

Alexander and W. H. Watson showed cause. — The declarations of M'Cree, even assuming that they would have gone to the extent of proving a forgery of the deed, were inadmissible in evidence. . . . Then, does this case fall within any of the recognized exceptions to the general rule of law? They are stated by Mr. Phillipps to consist of the following classes: — First, dying declarations; secondly, hearsay in questions of pedigree; thirdly, hearsay in questions of public right, custom, boundary, &c.; fourthly, old leases, rent-rolls, surveys, &c., in certain cases; fifthly, declarations against interest; sixthly, rectors' and vicars' books; and lastly, tradesmen's books. (PARKE, B. — The sixth are rather a class of the fourth). It is submitted that the declarations tendered in this case fall within none of these classes. It is said that the case of Wright v. Littler affords an authority in support of their admissibility; but it is not so, when that case is carefully looked at. . . . At that period, dying declarations were held admissible and material on many questions, though they have since been restricted to the single case where the death of the party is itself the subject of inquiry, Doe v. Ridgway, 4 B. & Ald. 53; Rex v. Mead, 2 B. & C. 605. . . .

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by

PARKE, B. — This was an action on a covenant in a mortgage deed, to which there was a plea of non est factum. . . . We who heard the argument are all of opinion that the evidence was properly rejected.

The general rule is, that hearsay evidence is not admissible as proof of a fact which has been stated by a third person. This rule has been long established as a fundamental principle of the law of evidence; but certain exceptions have also been recognized, some from very early times, upon the ground of necessity or convenience. The simple question for us to decide is, whether such a declaration as this be one of the allowed exceptions to the general rule. . . .

The first case referred to is that of Wright v. Littler [ante, No. 381]. . . .

From this report it is clear, that Lord MANSFIELD by no means lays it down distinctly as an established rule of evidence, that such a declaration, even when made "in extremis," is admissible. If it had been in his opinion a rule of law, that such statements were evidence, it is not likely that he would have assigned so many other reasons for refusing a new trial; and if we look at the report of the same case in Sir William Blackstone's Reports, that impression is confirmed; for his lordship is stated to have declared distinctly, that "no general rule could be drawn from it," and that unless manifest injustice had been done in the whole case, there was no ground for a new trial. . . .

And when it is considered in how qualified a manner the opinion of Lord MANSFIELD, the origin and foundation of the others, is expressed; and when it is recollected that both then and at the time of the Nisi Prius trial before Mr. Justice HEATH, an opinion prevailed (which is now properly exploded), that any declaration "in extremis" was admissible, on the ground that the solemnity of the occasion was equivalent to a declaration on oath, which consideration certainly had an influence on the mind of Lord MANSFIELD at least, it is impossible to say that there is any such weight of authority, however great our respect for the eminent Judges whose names have been mentioned, as to induce us to hold that this case is established and recognized as an exception from the great principle of our law of evidence, that facts, the truth of which depends on parol evidence, are to be proved by testimony or oath.

If we had to determine the question of the propriety of admitting the proposed evidence, on the ground of convenience, apart from the consideration of the expediency of abiding by general rules, we should say that it was at the least very doubtful, whether, generally speaking, it would not cause greater mischief than advantage in the investigation of truth. An extreme case might occur, as there seems to have done before Mr. Justice HEATH, where the exclusion of evidence of a death-bed declaration would probably have been the exclusion of one mode of discovering the truth. The same may, perhaps, be said of all solemn assertions "in extremis" by deceased witnesses. But, on the other hand, if any declarations, at any time from the mouth of subscribing witnesses who are dead are to be admitted in evidence (and you cannot stop short of that, for no one contends that the exception is to be confined to death-bed declarations, and if so confined, the evidence would be inadmissible in the present case), the result would be, that the security of solemn instruments would be much impaired. . . .

We therefore think the rule for a new trial must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

383. J. G. PHILLIMORE. History and Principles of the Law of Evidence. (1850. p. 554). I now come to a case which, to the scandal of our jurisprudence, has been overruled; though I still hope, for the honour of the Bar, that such a triumph over reason will not be considered final. I allude to the case of Wright on the demise of Clymer against Littler [ante, No. 381], in which Lord Mansfield admitted evidence of the dying declarations of a witness that he had forged a bond.

Inconceivable as the narrowness of our judges often is, and shocking as the consequences are to which it leads, I do not know any case, from Lord Coke downwards, in the whole disgusting series of judicial bigotry, that exemplifies it in a manner more humiliating than that of Stobart v. Dryden [ante, No. 382], in which this case was overruled. . . .

It shews that the incapacity for large and liberal views, and for reasoning on general principles, which the study of our law develops, becomes, after a certain time, incorrigible. Lord Mansfield, as I have mentioned, had, in the case of Clymer v. Littler, admitted the solemn declaration of a dying man that he had forged a will. . . . The ground upon which these cases were placed, was not the narrow and sandy basis suggested by the Court of Exchequer; but the deep, broad, adamantine foundation, which alone can support the pillars of jurisprudence. The reason of its admission was drawn from the principles of our common nature, — principles attested by those for whom the heart of man had no secrets, and whom age after age had revered as the almost inspired oracles of all the hopes, fears, wishes and intentions, that had ever fluttered and throbbed within it. These great men did not think, with the Barons of the Exchequer, that the declarations on a death-bed are lightly made and heedlessly repeated: they thought that > "The tongues of dying men > Enforce attention, like deep harmony." . . .

Poets, moralists, and philosophers, have, in all ages, arrived at a conclusion directly the reverse of that which the Barons of the Exchequer have done what they could to brand upon the law of England, by the decision in Stobart v. Dryden, — that monumental proof of judge-made law! For the Court of Exchequer were not content without a flimsy distinction: covetous of technicality, they have actually decided that dying declarations are admissible precisely where they are most suspicious; that though they are inadmissible on all other occasions, they may be used to shew how the dying man came by his death, and for no other purpose.

384. MONTGOMERY v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA. 1881

80 Ind. 338

FROM the Elkhart Circuit Court.

J. M. Vanfleet, for appellant. D. P. Baldwin, Attorney-General, J. S. Drake, Prosecuting Attorney, and W. L. Stonex, for the State.

ELLIOTT, C. J. — Appellant was tried and convicted upon a count in an indictment charging him with a violation of section 1923 of the R. S. of 1881. That section reads thus: "Whoever prescribes or administers to any pregnant woman, or to any woman whom he supposes to be pregnant, any drug, medicine, or substance whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman; or, with like intent, uses any instrument or means whatever, unless such miscarriage is necessary to preserve her life, — shall, if the woman miscarries or dies in consequence thereof, be fined not more than five hundred dollars nor less than fifty dollars, and be imprisoned in the State prison not more than fourteen years nor less than three years." It is charged in the indictment, and there is evidence tending to prove, that the woman upon whom the wrongful act is alleged to have been committed died from its effect.

Over the appellant's objection, the State was permitted to give in evidence the dying declarations of the woman. This ruling presents the controlling question in the case.

1. It is contended on the part of the prosecution that the death of the woman is the gravamen of the offence, and that, where death results from an unlawful act in producing abortion, the crime is homicide. . . . It has long been settled that dying declarations are admissible only in cases of homicide. Starkie says of the rule admitting dying declarations: "But so jealous is the law of any deviation from the general rule, that it confines the exception to the necessity of the case, and only renders such declarations admissible when they relate to the cause of death, and are tendered on a criminal charge respecting it." Starkie, Ev. 32. The generally accepted doctrine is that stated in Rex v. Mead, 2 B. & C. 605, where it was said that they are only admissible "where the death of the deceased is the subject of the charge, and the circumstances of the death the subject of the dying declaration." Wharton's Criminal Evidence, § 288; Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, p. 32; 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 156. This Court has adopted and enforced this principle. Binns v. The State, 46 Ind. 311; Duling v. Johnson, 32 Ind. 155; Morgan v. The State, 31 Ind. 193. It has been often decided, that in prosecutions for producing an abortion, dying declarations are not admissible. Rex v. Lloyd, 4 C. & P. 233; Wilson v. Boerem, 15 Johns. 286; Regina v. Hind, 8 Cox C. C. 300; Wooten v. Wilkins, 39 Ga. 223. If the prosecution were for producing an abortion, and death were not an essential ingredient of the crime, our way would be plain. We should be compelled to declare that the evidence was incompetent.

There are peculiar features distinguishing the case from one where the only charge is that an abortion was produced by the accused. The statute makes death an element of the offence, and death is, therefore, the subject of judicial investigation. The death was the result of an unlawful act, for to produce the abortion was expressly forbidden by law. If there were no special statutory provision upon this subject, the crime of which the appellant is accused would have been a felonious homicide. . . . Is the offence any the less homicide because of the prosecution being under one statute rather than another? Is the manner of the death any the less the subject of investigation than it would have been if the indictment had charged manslaughter or murder? . . .

If the statute had in express terms declared that the offence should be deemed murder or manslaughter, the evidence would have been competent. Can it make any difference that the statute either gives the offence no name or names it something else than murder or manslaughter? Courts are to look to the substance of the offence defined; they are not to be guided by mere names. If, in reality, the offence is homicide and the subject of inquiry the manner of the deceased's death, the settled rules of evidence which prevail in such cases should be enforced. Wisconsin has a statute very similar to ours. The principal difference between the two statutes is that the former declares that the person producing the abortion which results in death shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter. It was held in State v. Dickinson, 41 Wis. 299, that, in a prosecution under the statute referred to, dying declarations were admissible. . . . The statute of Ohio is somewhat like ours, and it was held in The State v. Harper, 35 Ohio St. 78, that the dying declarations of the deceased were not competent. . . . We think that the unlawful act possesses all the distinctive and essential features of felonious homicide, and that to declare that it is not homicide is to sacrifice the substance to the shadow. Whether the statute characterizes the act as a felonious killing or not, is immaterial, if it plainly appears that it is such. . . .

We conclude, where death results from the unlawful attempt to produce an abortion, that death is the subject of enquiry, and that dying declarations are competent. If we adopt any other view, we shall sacrifice principle to a mere form of words, and give an effect to a statute, intended to secure punishment by an explicit definition of an offence, exactly the reverse of what its framers intended. We regard the statute as clearly intending that death shall be deemed a controlling element of the offence, and in this respect it differs from the statutes of New York and Ohio, as construed by the courts of those States. . . .

Specific objections were made to the statement of the dying woman, and these now require consideration.

2. It is undoubtedly the law that the statements must be such as would have been admissible had the dying person been sworn as a witness. A statement in a dying declaration, which a witness upon the stand would not be allowed to make, is not competent. Jones v. The State, 71 Ind. 66; Binns v. The State, 46 Ind. 311. Matters of opinion contained in a dying declaration are not admissible. Wharton, Criminal Evidence, § 294.

It is earnestly contended that the sentence contained in the statement reading as follows: "The operation was performed for the purpose of producing an abortion," should have been excluded. We think this position must be sustained. What the purpose of an act was is an inference from facts, and witnesses must state the facts and not their conclusions. A witness would have been required to state what was said and done. . . . But we need not discuss this question, for it is well settled that dying declarations must speak to facts only, and not to mere matters of opinion. Binns v. State, supra; Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, 32; Wharton, Criminal Evidence, § 294; Warren v. State, 35 Am. R. 745.

3. Dying declarations are admissible to prove what was done at the time of the commission of the unlawful act which caused death, but they are not admissible to prove what occurred before or afterwards. The cases of Jones v. State, supra, and Binns v. State, supra, declare that they are not competent for the purpose of proving what occurred anterior to the time the act which produced death was done, and this doctrine is well supported by the text-writers and the adjudged cases. McHugh v. The State, 31 Ala. 317; Barnett v. The People, 54 Ill. 325; Mose v. The State, 35 Ala. 422; Nelson v. The State, 7 Humph. 542. . . . The rule is confined to a statement of the circumstances connected with the fatal act and forming part of the same transaction. . . . In the case at bar, statements were included in the dying declaration, of the condition of the woman several days after the unlawful act was committed, and also of a fact entirely distinct from the act itself. In admitting these statements the Court plainly erred. . . .

Judgment reversed. The clerk will enter the proper order for the return of the prisoner.

Topic 2. Statements of Facts against Interest

385. MIDDLETON v. MELTON

KING'S BENCH. 1829

10 B. & C. 317

[ACTION against a surety on a bond given by one Squire, a collector of taxes.]

Plea, that Squire in his lifetime paid the sums collected by him, and upon that issue was joined.

At the trial before ALEXANDER, C. B., at the Spring Assizes for the county of Surrey, 1829, it appeared that the defendant, together with John Frost and Squire, had executed the bond stated in the declaration; that a duplicate assessment had been delivered to Squire, in which he occasionally made entries of the sums received from the persons assessed; from the entries made in that assessment, it did not appear that he had received any monies that he had not paid over to the commissioners. It appeared also that for his own convenience he kept a private book, containing entries (copied from the duplicate assessment) of the names of the persons, and of the sums for which they were respectively assessed, and that it was his usual habit to collect by that private book, and to mark with ticks all the sums he received from the several persons therein mentioned. . . . The sums which appeared to be due from Squire by the entries he himself had made in the private book, over and above what appeared by the duplicate assessment to have been collected by him, amounted to 996£.; for some of these sums the plaintiff further produced receipts given to several persons for taxes paid to Squire, and signed by him. It was objected, first, that the receipts were not receivable in evidence, because the parties who paid the money might have been called; and, secondly, that although entries made by Squire in any book which he in the course of his duty as collector was bound to keep would be evidence against the surety, yet that entries made by him in a private book kept for his own convenience were not receivable in evidence to charge the surety.

The learned Judge received the evidence, but reserved liberty to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit, if the Court should be of opinion that neither the entries in the private book nor the receipts were evidence, or to reduce the verdict, if they should be of opinion that the entries in the private book were not admissible in evidence, but that the receipts were. A verdict having been found for the plaintiff for 996£. a rule nisi had been obtained pursuant to the leave reserved.

Andrews Serjt. and Hutchinson, now showed cause. The entries in the private book of the deceased collector were declarations made by him against his interest, for he thereby charged himself with the receipt of certain sums of money, which he was bound by law to pay over to other persons. The entries were therefore admissible in evidence on the ground that they were made by an individual cognizant of a fact not in dispute, and who at the time when they were made had no interest in making false entries, and that they tended to charge himself. . . .

Spankie Serjt. and Chitty, contra. The question is, whether the entries made by Squire in his private book, if that book had been produced, would have been admissible against the defendant as surety? . . . Entries made by a principal for his own purposes might have been evidence against the principal himself, but are not to charge a surety. The best evidence should be produced. Cutler v. Newlin (Manning's Digest, 137) shows that an admission by a principal is not, while he is alive, sufficient to charge a surety.

Bayley, J. — The question in this case is, Whether a private book kept by a collector of taxes, containing entries wherein he acknowledges the receipt of sums of money in his character of collector, can be given in evidence against a surety, the collector having been appointed to collect the taxes mentioned in the bond pursuant to the provisions of an act of Parliament. In this case Squire was the collector, and his private book was found after his death, and given by his daughter to the defendant. There was evidence to show, therefore, that it was left in the defendant's possession, and he having refused to produce it at the trial after notice, secondary evidence of its contents was admissible. It was proved that it was the collector's usual habit to collect by his private book, and to mark the sums he received with ticks, and that those ticks denoted that those sums had been received by him. If the entries mentioned in the book were admissible evidence to show that he received those sums, they will be sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to retain the verdict for the full amount; and the question as to the admissibility of the receipts will not necessarily arise. . . . The question then is, Whether such an entry, made by an individual against his own interest, may be evidence of the fact of the receipt of the money against a third party? It is a general principle of evidence, that declarations or statements of deceased persons are admissible when they appear to have been made against their interest. An entry in a book, whereby the party making it charges himself with the receipt of money on account of a third person, or acknowledges the payment of money due to himself, has been held to be evidence of the receipt or payment of such money. . . . These cases establish that where a person makes an entry charging himself with the receipt of a sum of money, that entry is evidence of the fact of the receipt of that money against a third person. The question as to the receipts then becomes immaterial. But if the entries in the book are admissible in evidence, because the tick marked against them denotes that the collector had received the money, the receipts signed by him must be evidence of the fact of such receipt of the money upon the same principle.

LITTLEDALE, J. — I am of the same opinion. I at one time entertained great doubts whether entries made in a private book kept by a person for his own convenience could be evidence against a third party. . . . Warren v. Greenville, 2 Str. 1129, Barry v. Bebbington, 4 T. R. 514, and Higham v. Ridgway, 10 East, 109, establish this general principle, that where a person has peculiar means of knowing a fact, and makes a declaration or written entry of the fact, which is against his interest at the time, it is evidence of the fact as between third persons after his death.

PARKE, J. — I am of the same opinion. . . . The general rule undoubtedly is, that facts must be proved by testimony upon oath. This case, however, falls within the exception necessarily engrafted upon that rule, viz., that an admission of a fact made by a deceased person, which is against the interest of the party making it at the time, is evidence of that fact as between third persons. Upon that ground entries made by receivers, stewards, and other agents, charging themselves with the receipt of money, have been held, after their death, to be admissible in evidence, to prove the fact of the receipt of such money, and that without reference to the particular character of the person who made such entries. In Warren v. Greenville (2 Str. 1129), the party who made the entry was an attorney; in Manning v. Lechmere (1 Atk. 453), a bailiff; in Higham v. Ridgway (10 East, 109), a surgeon. . . . I think those decisions may be supported on the more general principle, that an entry made by a party cognizant of a fact, and having no interest to make a false entry, whereby he charges himself with the receipt of a sum of money, is evidence of the fact of the receipt of such money. It is unnecessary to consider the question as to the receipts, because the entries in the book, if admissible, are sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the full amount of the damages which he has recovered. But I cannot help thinking that they were admissible; and I doubt the propriety of that part of the decision in the case of Goss v. Watlington (3 Brod. & Bingh. 132), by which the receipts of the deceased collector were held inadmissible. Rule discharged.

386. SMITH v. MOORE

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA. 1906

142 N. C. 277; 55 S. E. 275

APPEAL from Superior Court, New Hanover County; W. R. ALLEN, Judge.

Action by Louise B. Smith against Susan E. Moore and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant Susan E. Moore appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

The object of the action is to set aside a deed for a lot in the city of Wilmington at the northeast corner of Second and Red Cross streets which was executed to Mr. Moore, the husband of the defendant Susan E. Moore, and the father of her codefendants, by Mrs. Mary E. Smith and her daughter, the plaintiff, and which it is alleged was obtained by fraud. . . . The plaintiff attacked the deed from her mother and herself to Mr. Moore upon the ground that, at the time it was executed, his attorney stated to her in the presence of her mother and Mr. Moore that it was a will; that she was ill at the time and confined to her bed, and that she signed the deed thinking that it was a will and she did not know it was a deed until after Mr. Moore's death. . . . The plaintiff put in evidence a letter from Mrs. Smith to Mrs. Moore's attorney, dated March 2, 1885, in which she expressed the greatest affection and esteem for her son-in-law, Mr. Moore. . . . The defendant put in evidence the deposition of Mrs. Boudinot, and proposed to prove by her that Mrs. Smith, who was her sister, had stated to her that she had executed the deed to Mr. Moore, and gave substantially the same reasons for so doing as those set forth in the letter to the attorney. The testimony was excluded by the court, and the defendants excepted. On cross-examination she testified that Mrs. Smith had told her the deed had been executed, giving in detail what was said by her about the deed. . . . The jury for their verdict found that the deed was procured by fraud, and, judgment having been entered thereon, the defendant appealed, and especially assigned as errors the several rulings and the instructions of the court to which exceptions had been taken.

Rountree & Carr and Bellamy & Bellamy, for appellant. John D. Bellamy & Son and E. K. Bryan, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case). . . .

The second assignment of error, embracing the next six exceptions, relates to the exclusion of a part of Mrs. Boudinot's testimony which was taken by deposition. She deposed, among other things, that Mrs. Smith, who was her sister, had told her that she had made a deed to Mr. Moore for the lot, and, in the conversation with her, used language substantially similar to that which is contained in her letter to Mr. Moore's attorney, dated March 2, 1885. . . . The testimony was evidently ruled out by the Court because it was regarded as nothing more than hearsay, but we think it comes within one of the well-known exceptions to the rule excluding such testimony. Declarations of a person, whether verbal or written, as to facts relevant to the matter of inquiry, are admissible in evidence, even as between third parties, where it appears: (1) That the declarant is dead; (2) that the declaration was against his pecuniary or proprietary interest; (3) that he had competent knowledge of the fact declared; (4) that he had no probable motive to falsify the fact declared. 1 Elliott on Evidence, §§ 439–454, where the subject is fully discussed. . . . The earliest case on the subject of such declarations is Searle v. Lord Barrington, 2 Strange, 826; Lord Barrington v. Searle (on appeal) 3 Brown's Cases, 535; Id., 8 Mod. 278. In that case, decided in 1730, an indorsement of a payment of interest on a note was admitted to repel the statute of limitations. . . . It is regarded as the first and leading case, and is reviewed, in connection with the subsequent cases on the same question to the year 1833, in Gleadon v. Atkin, 3 Tyrwh. 289. . . . The rule as thus established is said to be founded on a knowledge of human nature. Self-interest induces men to be cautious in saying anything against themselves, but free to speak in their own favor. We can safely trust a man when he speaks against himself, and the law, in this instance, substitutes for the sanction of a judicial oath the more powerful one arising out of the sacrifice of a man's own interests. This natural disposition to speak in favor of, rather than against interest, is so strong, that when one has declared anything to his own prejudice, his statement is so stamped with the image and superscription of truth that it is accepted by the law as proof of the correctness and accuracy of what was said, and the fact that it was against interest is taken as a full guaranty of its truthfulness in place, not only of an oath, but of cross-examination as well, they being the usual tests of credibility. A discussion of this rule of evidence, which shows how thoroughly it has been adopted by the Courts, whether the declarations are in the form of mere words or of written entries will be found in 1 Greenleaf, Evidence (16th Ed.) §§ 147–154; 2 Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 1455–1471; McKelvey on Evidence, pp. 254–261. The case of Higham v. Ridgeway, 10 East, 109, 3 Smith's L. C. (9th Am. Ed.) 1, recognized the principle to its fullest extent and held that it embraced, not only the particular statement which was against interest, but others contained in it, Lord Ellenborough saying that it is idle to admit a part without the context. "All parts of the speech or entry may be admitted which appear to have been made while the declarant was in the trustworthy condition of mind which permitted him to state what was against his interest." 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1465. Especially should the part of the declaration that is not disserving be admitted if it is not in itself self-serving and tending, therefore, to promote the interest of the declarant. . . .

The three leading cases we have cited have been approved in the later decisions, and are regarded by the law-writers as having firmly settled the principle to which they severally relate. This species of evidence was at one time said to be anomalous and to stand on the ultimate rule of competent testimony, but an unbroken line of decisions in England, and one almost so in this country, have established beyond question that verbal declarations are receivable under the conditions we have mentioned, even in controversies between third parties.

There is nothing that so strongly attests the truth of what a person declares, not even his oath and the searching light of a cross-examination, as when he has asserted the existence of a fact and it appears that his interest at the time lay the other way. Doe v. Jones, supra. The words of sacred writ, "He that sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not," were uttered long before the era of our jurisprudence, and set before us, not only one of the most exalted attributes possessed by the exemplar of true virtue and probity, but embodied at the same time the highest standard by which we can safely gauge our trust and confidence in human testimony. It is not at all a matter for surprise, therefore, that the common-law jurists should have regarded it as a perfectly safe test for discerning the truth in judicial investigation.

We must now consider whether the declaration of Mrs. Smith to Mrs. Boudinot comes within the rule stated. Was it a declaration against her interest at the time she made it? We think it was. She was then in possession of the lot and ostensibly the owner thereof, and when she declared that she had parted with her title and did not own the estate of which she was apparently seised, it could not be anything other than such a declaration. We have seen that any other statement associated in the declaration with the one against interest is just as competent as the latter, and especially is that true in a case like the one at bar where the collateral statement bears directly on the other and tends to confirm and strengthen it. The deed to Mr. Moore is attacked for fraud, because what was in fact a deed was represented to be a will, and the declaration by Mrs. Smith to Mrs. Boudinot was, not only that she had made a deed, and therefore, knew the character and contents of the paper writing, but that she executed it upon a meritorious consideration, and substantially that she acted freely and voluntarily when she did so. What could be more against her interest than such a statement, and what could carry with it more conclusive evidence of its truth and accuracy? It was in disparagement of her apparent title and made at a time which was recent with respect to the date of the main transaction, when it must be supposed she had a clear recollection of what had occurred, and also long prior to the beginning of this controversy — ante litem motam. . . . But it may be suggested that she was not in privity with her daughter, the plaintiff, as she had but a life estate and her daughter a contingent remainder, which, since the death of her mother, has become a vested one in interest and possession. This is true, but it does not prevent the application of the rule, for, the declaration being against interest, it is admitted because of the likelihood of its being true and of its general freedom from any reasonable probability of fraud or imposition, and is for that reason held to be competent as to third parties. It is not, therefore, within the principle of exclusion, as being res inter alios acta. Lyon v. Ricker, 141 N. Y. 225; Higham v. Ridgeway, supra. . . . We are constrained to think that the evidence is both competent and relevant, and should be heard by the jury in its entirety.

For the reason we have already stated a new trial is awarded.

New trial.

HOKE, J., concurs in the result.

386*a*. DONNELLY v. UNITED STATES

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. 1913

228 U. S. 243; 33 Sup. 449

PLAINTIFF in error was convicted in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, upon an indictment for murder, and, having been sentenced to life imprisonment, sues out this writ of error. The indictment charged him with the murder of one Chickasaw, an Indian, within the limits of an Indian reservation known as the Extension of the Hoopa Valley Reservation, in the County of Humboldt, in the State and Northern District of California. The evidence tended to show that Chickasaw, who was an Indian and a member of the Klamath Tribe, was shot through the body and mortally wounded while he was in or near the edge of the water of the Klamath River, at a place within the exterior limits of the Extension.

The trial proceeded upon the theory that the crime was committed within the river bed and below ordinary high-water mark — a theory favorable to the plaintiff in error, in that it furnishes the basis for one of the principal contentions made in his behalf. . . . It was contended that the Circuit Court was without jurisdiction, first, because the place of the commission of the alleged offence was not within the limits of the Extension of the Hoopa Valley Reservation, but was upon the Klamath River, and therefore outside of those limits; and, secondly, because it did not appear that the defendant was an Indian. . . . In addition, it was contended that the Circuit Court erred in refusing to permit the plaintiff in error to introduce evidence tending to show that one Joe Dick, a deceased Indian, had confessed just before his death that it was he who had shot and killed the Indian Chickasaw.

Mr. Justice PITNEY (after stating the case as above) delivered the opinion of the Court.

. . . In our opinion, the offence with which the plaintiff in error was charged was punishable in the Federal Courts under §§ 2145 and 5339 Rev. Stat.

The only remaining question arises out of the exclusion by the trial judge of testimony offered by the plaintiff in error for the purpose of showing that one Joe Dick, an Indian, since deceased, had confessed that it was he who had shot Chickasaw. Since the circumstances of the crime, as detailed in the evidence for the Government, strongly tended to exclude the theory that more than one person participated in the shooting, the Dick confession, if admissible, would have directly tended to exculpate the plaintiff in error. By way of foundation for the offer, plaintiff in error showed at the trial that Dick was dead, thereby accounting for his not being called as a witness, and showed in addition certain circumstances that, it was claimed, pointed to him as the guilty man, viz., that he lived in the vicinity and therefore presumably knew the habits of Chickasaw; that the human tracks upon a sand bar at the scene of the crime led in the direction of an acorn camp where Dick was stopping at the time, rather than in the direction of the home of the plaintiff in error; and that beside the track there was at one point an impression as of a person sitting down, indicating, as claimed, a stop caused by shortness of breath, which would be natural to Dick, who was shown to have been a sufferer from consumption.

Hearsay evidence, with a few well recognized exceptions, is excluded by Courts that adhere to the principles of the common law. The chief grounds of its exclusion are, that the reported declaration (if in fact made) is made without the sanction of an oath, with no responsibility on the part of the declarant for error or falsification, without opportunity for the Court, jury, or parties to observe the demeanor and temperament of the witness, and to search his motives and test his accuracy and veracity by cross-examination, these being most important safeguards of the truth, where a witness testifies in person, and as of his own knowledge; and, moreover, he who swears in court to the extra-judicial declaration does so (especially where the alleged declarant is dead) free from the embarrassment of present contradiction and with little or no danger of successful prosecution for perjury. It is commonly recognized that this double relaxation of the ordinary safeguards must very greatly multiply the probabilities of error, and that hearsay evidence is an unsafe reliance in a Court of justice.

One of the exceptions to the rule excluding it is that which permits the reception, under certain circumstances and for limited purposes, of declarations of third parties made contrary to their own interest. But it is almost universally held that this must be an interest of a pecuniary character; and the fact that the declaration, alleged to have been thus extra-judicially made, would probably subject the declarant to a criminal liability is held not to be sufficient to constitute it an exception to the rule against hearsay evidence. So it was held in two notable cases in the House of Lords — Berkeley Peerage Case (1811), 4 Camp. 401; Sussex Peerage Case (1844), 11 Cl. & Fin. 85, 103, 109; 8 Eng. Reprint 1034, 1042, — recognized as of controlling authority in the Courts of England.

In this country there is a great and practically unanimous weight of authority in the State courts against admitting evidence of confessions of third parties made out of Court and tending to exonerate the accused. . . . A few of them (West v. State, 76 Ala. 98; Davis v. Commonwealth, 95 Ky. 19; and People v. Hall, 94 Cal. 595, 599) are precisely in point with the present case, in that the alleged declarant was shown to be deceased at the time of the trial. . . . In People v. Hall it appeared that defendant and one Kingsberry were arrested together for an alleged burglary, attempted to escape, were fired upon and wounded by one of the captors; that a physician was sent for to treat them, and that Kingsberry died from the effects of his wound before any complaint was filed against either of the parties. "In his own behalf the defendant offered to prove that after a careful examination the physician was satisfied that Kingsberry's wounds were necessarily fatal, and that he so informed him at the time; that Kingsberry admitted to the physician that he fully realized that he was mortally wounded and was on the point of death, and had given up all hope of ever getting well; that he was conscious of death, and that thus having a sense of impending death, and without hope of reward, he made a full, free, and complete confession to said physician in relation to this alleged crime, stating that he himself had planned the entire scheme, and that Hall had nothing to do with it and was not connected with the guilt, and was in all respects innocent of any criminal act or intent in the matter." This evidence was excluded, and the Supreme Court of California sustained the ruling, saying: "The rule is settled beyond controversy that in a prosecution for crime the declaration of another person that he committed the crime is not admissible. Proof of such declarations is mere hearsay evidence, and is always excluded, whether the person making it be dead or not" (citing cases that are among those included in the note).

We do not consider it necessary to further review the authorities, for we deem it settled by repeated decisions of this Court, commencing at an early period, that declarations of this character are to be excluded as hearsay: . . . Mima Queen and Child v. Hepburn (1813), 7 Cranch. 290, 295; Davis v. Wood (1816), 1 Wheat. 6, 8; Lessee of Scott v. Ratliffe (1831), 5 Pet. 81, 86; Ellicott v. Pearl (1836), 10 Pet. 412, 436, 437; Wilson v. Simpson (1850), 9 How. 109, 121; Hopt v. Utah (1883), 110 U. S. 574, 581. And see United States v. Mulholland, 50 Fed. 413, 419.

The evidence of the Dick confession was properly excluded.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment is Affirmed.

Mr. Justice Van Deventer concurs in the result.

Mr. Justice Holmes, dissenting. — The confession of Joe Dick, since deceased, that he committed the murder for which the plaintiff in error was tried, coupled with circumstances pointing to its truth, would have a very strong tendency to make any one outside of a Court of justice believe that Donnelly did not commit the crime. (I say this, of course, on the supposition that it should be proved that the confession really was made, and that there was no ground for connecting Donnelly with Dick.) The rules of evidence in the main are based on experience, logic, and common sense, less hampered by history than some parts of the substantive law. There is no decision by this Court against the admissibility of such a confession; the English cases since the separation of the two countries do not bind us; the exception to the hearsay rule in the case of declarations against interest is well known; no other statement is so much against interest as a confession of murder, it is far more calculated to convince than dying declarations, which would be let in to hang a man, Mattox v. United States, 146 U. S. 140; and when we surround the accused with so many safeguards, some of which seem to me excessive, I think we ought to give him the benefit of a fact that, if proved, commonly would have such weight. The history of the law and the arguments against the English doctrine are so well and fully stated by Mr. Wigmore that there is no need to set them forth at greater length. 2 Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 1476, 1477.

Mr. Justice LURTON and Mr. Justice HUGHES concur in this dissent.

Topic 3. Statements about Family History

387. VOWLES v. YOUNG

CHANCERY. 1806

13 Ves. Jr. 140

AN issue having been directed under a bill of redemption, the plaintiffs claiming as co-heirs at law, upon the trial before Baron GRAHAM, at the Assizes, a verdict was found for the plaintiff.

A motion was made for a new trial, upon two grounds: 1st. That the Judge had improperly rejected the evidence of Thomas Roberts, that he had heard Samuel Noble, the husband of Mary Noble, say, she was illegitimate. . . .

The Solicitor-General and Mr. Hart, in support of the motion, observed, that the first point was a question rather of construction than of law: viz., whether the husband is to be considered for this purpose as a part of the wife's family; and contended that as the declarations of any person connected with the family of the person from whom the pedigree is deduced, are clearly to be admitted, declarations by the husband ought to be received in preference to those of a first or second cousin. . . .

Serj. Lens, Mr. Richards, Mr. Burrough, and Mr. Heald, in support of the verdict. The general rule, that declarations by any person connected with the family are to be received, is admitted. But the effect of the guarded manner in which the question was put to this witness upon the trial, is, that the husband must be considered as a mere stranger; and therefore within the rule, as laid down by Lord KENYON, and always acted upon, that declarations by a mere stranger to the family cannot be received. . . .

The Solicitor-General, in reply. The foundation of this evidence is tradition, collected from declarations at different times as to the fact of legitimacy, by a person a part of the family. . . . The attempt to distinguish the husband from the family, for this purpose, was never before made; and is most unreasonable. Evidence of declarations by a woman, that her third cousins, once removed, were her nearest kin, have been admitted; and can the husband's declarations as to the legitimacy of his wife be refused? A point certainly of some importance to him, if the stigma is considered. . . .

The Lord CHANCELLOR [ERSKINE]. Two questions arise upon this application for a new trial: 1st. Whether Roberts ought to have been received to say that he had heard Samuel Noble declare his wife, Mary Noble, was illegitimate. . . .

The first of these questions is certainly of very considerable moment. Courts of law are obliged in cases of this kind to depart from the ordinary rules of evidence, as it would be impossible to establish descents according to the strict rules by which contracts are established, and subjects of property regulated; requiring the facts from the mouth of the witness who has the knowledge of them. In cases of pedigree therefore recourse is had to a secondary sort of evidence, — the best the nature of the subject will admit, establishing the descent from the only sources that can be had. . . . If the declaration of the husband is not to be received to prove the legitimacy or illegitimacy of his wife, as a distant relation might, which seems to be contended, the extent of that proposition must be considered. Suppose the question were whether she was the daughter of A. or B., his evidence might equally be rejected upon the question whether she descended from one stock or another; yet, as far as hearsay is evidence of anything within the knowledge of a man, no man can be supposed ignorant of the reputation of the descent of his wife; and the law, admitting probability upon such a subject, always receives reputation of descent. . . . Upon questions of pedigree, inscriptions upon tombstones are admitted, as it must be supposed the relations of the family would not permit an inscription without foundation to remain. So engravings upon rings are admitted, upon the presumption that a person would not wear a ring with an error upon it. — I take this question with the qualification that has been stated, not whether the husband had heard the fact from any of his wife's relations, but whether he knew it; viz. whether he had such knowledge as is necessary to establish that kind of fact.

My opinion is, that the Judge has given too narrow a construction to "the family" of the person whose descent or legitimacy is to be established. . . . The law resorts to hearsay of relations upon the principle of interest in the person from whom the descent is to be made out; and it is not necessary that evidence of consanguinity should have the correctness required as to other facts. If a person says another is his relation or next of kin, it is not necessary to state how the consanguinity exists. It is sufficient that he says A. is his relation, without stating the particular degree, which perhaps he could not tell if asked. But it is evidence, from the interest of that person in knowing the connections of the family. Therefore the opinion of the neighborhood, of what passed among acquaintance, will not do. . . .

Upon that point I think there must be a new trial.

388. JOHNSON v. LAWSON

COMMON PLEAS. 1824

2 Bing. 86

THE question for the jury was, whether one Francis Lidgbird (whose claim the plaintiff supported) or Henry Wilding (whose claim the defendant supported) was heir-at-law to Henry Lidgbird, who died seised of certain lands in October, 1820, and was the son of John Lidgbird, formerly sheriff of Kent. In consequence of a separation having taken place between John the sheriff and his wife, their son Henry was brought up, from about the age of nine months, with Miss Weller, afterwards Mrs. Hollinworth, till he went to college, and he spent his vacations at Mrs. Hollinworth's house: John Lidgbird, the sheriff, was on the point of marriage with Mrs. Hollinworth (which was prevented by his son Henry), and after the death of John, Henry lived with Mrs. Hollinworth for twenty-three or twenty-four years, and she was the only person in his confidence; this was proved by Mrs. Lucretia Pakenham, niece of Mrs. Hollinworth, who had died before the trial. On the part of the plaintiff it was proposed, among other evidence, to give evidence of declarations made by Mrs. Hollinworth, as to Francis Lidgbird being the heir of Henry, who died seised; but the learned judge refused to receive such evidence. It was then proved by Mrs. Elizabeth Withers, that a Mrs. King had been Henry Lidgbird's housekeeper for twenty-four years, and it was proposed to give evidence of declarations by Mrs. King, who was no longer living, as to Francis Lidgbird being the heir to Henry, but this was objected to by defendant's counsel: and Mr. Baron GRAHAM rejected it, saying "that it seemed to him to be carrying the principle of hearsay evidence too far; DE GREY, C. J., having laid it down, that it must be confined to persons who are members of the family."

A verdict having been found for the defendants, Peake, Serjt., obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, against which

Taddy, Serjt., was to have shown cause; but the Court called on Peake to support his rule. In questions concerning pedigree the declarations of persons related to the family have always been received in evidence, upon the ground, that men are supposed to take an interest in knowing the number and particulars of their kindred. But upon this principle it will be most expedient to admit, and most unjust to exclude, the declarations of persons who have long lived in a family as respected and confidential servants, or as intimate acquaintances. It is obvious that such persons must have a more lively interest in, and from frequent conversation a more accurate knowledge of the concerns of the family, than a distant relation, who may never have conversed with any of the parties concerned; and yet the declarations of such distant relation would be admitted without scruple. . . . The declarations of a husband have been received with regard to the kindred of his wife; and in Vowles v. Young, 13 Ves. 146 [ante, No. 387], and Whitelocke v. Baker, 13 Ves. 514, the arguments of the Lord Chancellor only go to the exclusion of entire strangers. BULLER, J., in Rex v. Eriswell, 3 T. R. 719, says, that declarations of persons not of the family may be received, and he refers to Brown v. Shelly, Easter, 1776. (BURROUGH, J. — I went the same circuit as BULLER, J., and I never knew such evidence admitted.) . . .

BEST, C. J. — This is a question of great importance. . . . As a general rule, hearsay is not admissible evidence, but to this general rule pedigree-causes form an exception, from the very nature of the case. . . . But evidence of that kind must be subject to limitation, otherwise it would be a source of great uncertainty, and the limitation hitherto pursued, namely, the confining such evidence to the declarations of relations of the family affords a rule at once certain and intelligible. . . . What then, has been the practice? To limit the admissibility to declarations of members of the family. It is true, a different opinion was expressed by a most learned judge in Rex v. Eriswell. But that judge must have been misled into the opinion by the manuscript case which has been cited. . . .

PARK, J. — I am of the same opinion. . . . My objection to the proposed evidence is, that if it were to be admitted the practice would be so loose as to occasion great inconvenience; whereas, if the rule be confined to members of a family, the path to be pursued is clear and certain. I think, therefore, we ought to adhere to the old rule, and not admit anything so vague as that which is now proposed.

BURROUGH, J. . . . This exception, from the general rule that hearsay shall not be admitted, must be construed strictly; and the natural limits of it are the declarations of members of the family. If we go beyond, where are we to stop? Is the declaration of a groom to be admitted? of a steward? of a chambermaid? of a nurse? may it be admitted if made a week after they have joined the family? and if not, at what time after? We should have to try in every case the life and habits of the party who made the declaration, and on account of this uncertainty such evidence must be excluded. The argument for the defendant rests on here and there a loose expression from a judge, and on the circumstance that there is no case in which such evidence is reported to have been excluded; but before we can admit it, we must be referred to some case to warrant its admission. We have heard of no such case, and therefore the present rule must be discharged.

389. HARTMAN'S ESTATE

SUPREME COURT OF CALIFORNIA. 1910

157 Cal. 206; 107 Pac. 105

APPEAL from the Superior Court of San Joaquin County — FRANK H. SMITH, Judge.

The record presents two appeals, one from an order distributing the estate of William Hartman, deceased, and the other from an order denying a new trial of the matter.

By the provisions of his will the deceased left the sum of two thousand dollars to the Stockton Branch of the California Conference Association of the Seventh Day Adventists, and the entire residue of his estate to the said California Association of the Seventh Day Adventists. The petition for distribution stated these facts and asked distribution accordingly. The last named body is an eleemosynary or charitable corporation and it includes the so-called Stockton Branch, named as the recipient of the two thousand dollar legacy. Hartman executed said will more than thirty days before his death. He died on February 8, 1904. Annie Hartman Burns appeared and filed a counter petition for distribution, alleging that she is the daughter of Peter Hartman, deceased, and that Peter was a brother of the testator, William Hartman, that she is an heir of the testator, that the gift of the entire estate to said charitable corporation is void, under section 1313 of the Civil Code, except as to one-third thereof, and asking that the two-thirds be distributed to her as the only heir. The corporation appeared and denied her relationship to the testator. The Court found that she is a niece of the testator, as alleged, and his only heir at law. Distribution was made, accordingly, of two-thirds to her and one-third to said corporation, $2000 thereof being for the use of the Stockton Branch. The corporation is the appellant.

For Appellants, E. E. Perlin. For Respondent, O. B. Parkinson. For Executor, Aylett R. Cotton.

SHAW, J. (after stating the case as above). The main question presented is the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that Annie Hartman Burns is a niece of the testator. We think there was evidence justifying that conclusion. A brief statement of the facts which the evidence tends to prove will show its sufficiency.

William Hartman came to San Joaquin county prior to 1864 and continued to reside there until his death. So far as known, he never married and left no children. He was a native of Hanover, Germany, and was naturalized in 1866. In 1864 he boarded at a hotel in Stockton, California, kept by Jacob Byer, now of Lancaster, New York. He told Byer at that time that he came from Lancaster, but did not say whether it was in New York or Pennsylvania. In 1862, Peter Hartman lived at Lancaster, New York. He and one William Hartman were together there at that time, in presence of E. J. Silvernail. They called each other brother, and by their first names, William and Peter. William talked of going to California and was trying to persuade Peter not to enlist in the army of the United States. Peter enlisted and in July, 1862, he and Silvernail's father, who had enlisted in the same company, were both injured by lightning and were sent home to Buffalo on furlough. . . . No other William Hartman had ever been known to reside in San Joaquin county. Annie Hartman Burns testified that she was the daughter of Peter Hartman and Mary Hartman, who were husband and wife, that she was born on January 22, 1868, at East Aurora, that her father died at Cowlesville, New York, in 1879, that her mother died in 1903, that she had no living brother, sister or other relative to her knowledge, that her father had told her he had a brother named William Hartman, who had gone to California at the time of the Civil War, and who lived there, that he had received letters from William Hartman, that he several times spoke of having a brother William, in California. East Aurora, Cowlesville, and Lancaster are towns in western New York a few miles apart.

The declarations of Peter Hartman to his daughter, made in the lifetime of William Hartman, that he had a brother William in California, were properly admitted in evidence to prove the relationship. The appellant on this point cites the rule given in Taylor on Evidence and in some of the decisions on the question. Taylor states it as follows: "Before, however, a declaration can be admitted in evidence, the relationship of the declarant with the family must be established by some proof other than the declaration itself." (1 Taylor on Evidence, 640.) To this Mr. Wharton adds: "for it would be a petitio principii to say that the declarations are receivable because he is a member of the family and he is a member of the family because his declarations are receivable." (1 Wharton, Evidence, § 218.)

On the other hand, however, it seems absurd to require, as a foundation for the admission of the declaration, proof of the very fact which the declaration is offered to establish. The preliminary proof would render the main evidence unnecessary. There are statements in the cases which seem to recognize a rule thus rigid and absurd. (Wise v. Wynn, 59 Miss. 588; Anderson v. Smith, 2 Mackey 381; Blackburn v. Crawford, 70 U. S. 187.) But for the most part the statements to this effect in the opinions mean no more than that the declarations of persons not of kin, either to the claimant or to the person from whom descent is claimed, can not be admitted to prove kinship. (See Rulofson v. Billings, 140 Cal. 459; Est. of James, 124 Cal. 661.) . . .

In the present case it was sufficiently shown that Peter Hartman was a member of the family, within the meaning of the rule. Annie Hartman Burns, his daughter, is the claimant and she testified to the relationship between herself and Peter Hartman. On this question the latest edition of Greenleaf on Evidence says:

"It is sometimes said that where, for example, the question is whether A is B's heir, the declarant must appear to be related to B, and not merely to A; this seems erroneous, however, since all relationship is mutual, and the question whether A is related to B or a member of B's 'family' is also and just as much a question whether B is related to A or a member of A's family, and on this point a person claiming to belong to A's family is competent to speak; the circumstance that the estate to be claimed is in A's or B's family being immaterial." (1 Greenleaf on Evidence, 16th ed., sec. 114c.)

Mr. Wigmore treats the question at greater length, as follows:

"It follows, in applying the foregoing principle, that where an alleged relationship between Doe and Roe is to be testified to, a relation of Doe may speak to it, because it concerns the relationships of Doe's family, while a relation of Roe may equally speak to it, because it concerns the relationships of Roe's family; hence, all that is required of the declarant is a connection with either one or the other, but not with both. This truth, however, has been obscured by what must be regarded as erroneous rulings. The question being whether Doe is related to Roe (for example, so as to share in Roe's inheritance), the argument has been that it would be idle to require merely that the declarant should be shown to be related to Doe alone, because then any family could connect itself with any other by its members' mere assertion of the relationship. But the proper way to approach the question seems to be a different one, and is as follows: Any member of D's line may declare as to the relationships (i.e. memberships) of that family, and any member of Roe's line may declare as to the relationships (i.e. memberships) of that family; and the qualifications of the declarant, as such member, must of course be shown beforehand, like the qualifications of any witness (ante, sec. 1486). Thus, before declarations of a supposed member of Doe's family can be admitted, the declarant's membership in Doe's family — for example, that he is Doe's son — must be shown. But that is the whole effect of this requirement. The further question, if any, is, whether a declaration of Doe's son that Doe is related to Roe (for example, is Roe's cousin) is a declaration as to Doe's family at all, — i.e. whether it is not, for the case in hand, solely a declaration about Roe's family-relationships, as to which Doe's son is by hypothesis not yet shown to be a qualified declarant. Now the state or condition of relationship must always in effect, though not in form, be double or mutual; i.e. the fact that Doe is cousin to Roe is also the fact that Roe is related as cousin to Doe. Hence, a statement of Doe's son that Doe is cousin to Roe, though in one form an assertion of Roe's relationships, is also equally a declaration that one of the relations of Doe (i.e. one of the members of Doe's family) is Roe, — for example, that one of the grandsons of Doe's grandfather is Roe. It is therefore a declaration upon which Doe's son is qualified to speak. The doubt, then, can only be as to whether it should make any difference that in the case at hand it is Roe's descendants who are seeking Doe's estate, or Doe's who are seeking Roe's estate. This surely can not affect the evidential value of the declarations; for that must depend on the circumstances at the time of making, and no one has ever contended that, apart from the lis mota and kindred limitations (ante, secs. 1483, 1484), it makes any difference whether a parent belongs to a poor or obscure branch of the family or to a rich and notorious one. Moreover, it is usually at a later day only that it has become apparent which branch would have a pecuniary interest in connecting itself with the other. The difference, then, is a matter of the form of the statement only, and such assertions as the above must be treated as in substance declarations as to Doe's family-relationships; whether it is Doe's or Roe's family that now happens to be seeking the inheritance is immaterial." (2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1491.)

The following cases are in accord with this doctrine: Sitler v. Gehr, 105 Pa. St. 597; Fowler v. Simpson, 79 Tex. 614; Louder v. Schluter, 78 Tex. 105; De Leon v. McMurray, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 283; Brown v. Lazarus, Id. 84.

The confusion seems to have arisen from the idea that such declarations were competent as admissions against interest. They do not derive their evidential value or competency from that consideration. They are admitted from reasons of necessity, because otherwise it would frequently be impossible to prove the kinship of members of a family after those who knew the facts are dead. Their evidential value comes not from their being admissions against the interest of the person making them, but, as Wigmore points out, from "the probability that the 'natural effusions' (to use Lord Eldon's often-quoted phrase) of those who talk over family affairs when no special reason for bias or passion exists are fairly trustworthy." (2 Wigmore on Evidence, sec. 1482.) "The evidence is in its nature of an unsuspicious kind; it is generally brought from remote times, when no question was depending or even thought of, and when no purpose would apparently be answered." (Rex v. Eriswell, 3 T. R. 720.)

Such declarations are safe-guarded against the possibility of their being declarations in the interest of the party making them by the requirement that they must appear to have been made before any controversy over the property arose. To satisfy the rule that the best evidence must be produced and to show necessity, it is made a condition of their admission that the declarant is dead at the time they are offered; or out of the jurisdiction; and they are sometimes excluded when it appears that there are living persons whose testimony on the subject could be produced.

. The orders appealed from are affirmed.

Sloss, J., and Angellotti, J., concurred.

Hearing in Bank denied.

Topic 4. Regular Entries

391. History.[1] (1) (a) First, there appears in England, at least as early as the 1600s, a custom to receive the shop-books of "divers men of trades and handicraftsmen" in evidence of "the particulars and certainty of the wares delivered"; and this whether the books were kept by the party himself or by a clerk, and whether the entrant were living or dead. But there was more or less abuse of this evidence, in "leaving the same books uncrossed and any way discharged" and still suing for the claim. Moreover, the whole proceeding was also discredited as involving the making of evidence for one's self, for "the rule is that a man cannot make evidence for himself." In 1609, then, a statute (7 Jac. I, c. 12) after reciting these considerations, forbade this use of parties' shop-books "in any action for any money due for wares hereafter to be delivered or for work hereafter to be done," except within one year after the delivery of the wares or the doing of the work, or where a bill of debt existed, or "between merchant and merchant, merchant and tradesman, or between tradesman and tradesman," for matters within the trade. The higher Courts, applying the principle that a man cannot make evidence for himself, ultimately made this exclusion complete, by refusing to recognize these books at all, after the expiration of the year. In the lower courts, it is true (the Small Causes Court of London and provincial Court of Requests, succeeded by the County Courts), where the jurisdiction was limited to small claims, the use of these books continued to be a common practice, in many if not in all, — where indeed the general rules of evidence were perhaps, in the absence of counsel, more or less relaxed. But, apart from this local usage, the books of a party ceased after the 1600s to form the subject of a hearsay exception at common law in England. They came in again only under statutory rules of the late 1800s.

(b) Next, however, it appears that before the end of the same century of the above statute (1600) the entries of a deceased clerk (even a clerk of a party) began to be admitted, on a principle distinctly that of the preceding Hearsay exceptions — necessity and trustworthiness. The admission of these books was treated as anomalous, and it was distinctly understood that their use, though affording some concession to parties, was an essentially different thing from the use of books kept by a living party himself. The cases begin with the 1700s; Price v. Lord Torrington is the one most frequently taken as the landmark of the rule.

The admission thus far made covered only the books of the clerk of a party. But already there were instances foreshadowing a wider principle. In several rulings, books regularly kept by persons then deceased had been admitted, his death and the regularity of the book being more or less explicitly recognized as the grounds of admission. Finally, in 1832, in Doe v. Turford, following one or two minor cases, the doctrine was placed on a firm footing, and the general scope of the exception was recognized. It was understood to cover all entries made "by a person, since deceased, in the ordinary course of his business and duty" whether a person wholly unconnected with the parties, or the clerk of a party; and it is this general exception that to-day is universally recognized.

(2) (a) The history of the doctrine was widely different in the United States. The English statute of 1609, or a similar one, for parties' shop-books, was in force, to a considerable extent, in the Colonies. In the Plymouth Laws, as well as in the later laws of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and other New England States, the use of parties' account-books was limited, but still authorized, by statutes; a special action of "book-debt" was in some places authorized. In New York and New Jersey the use seems clearly traceable to Dutch practice, which however did not vary in essentials from the English. In most of the jurisdictions (though not in all) the party was allowed and required to verify the accounts by a "supplementory" oath; but in all jurisdictions, though there were practically no limitations of time (as there were in England) to the use of the books, there were many restrictions as to the kind of business, the kind of transaction, and the like, which rested on the same distrust of a party's own evidence and seriously limited the use of the books. But a cardinal feature of the attitude of the Courts, peculiar to the United States, was that the evidence was treated on the same grounds already set forth as underlying the Hearsay exceptions generally, — the principles of necessity and of a circumstantial guarantee of trustworthiness. The necessity was the fact that so many small traders, in the then condition of the country, keeping no clerk, and being as parties incompetent to take the stand, were totally bereft of any means of proof except their own extrajudicial statements in these books. The guarantee of trustworthiness was that which we now recognize in the regularity of the entries. What is to be noticed, then, is that the books were received practically on the footing of a special Hearsay exception.

At that time the party was unavailable as a witness for himself. But between 1850 and 1870 statutes everywhere made parties competent to take the stand. Thus the necessity for a hearsay exception ceased. Nevertheless, by other statutes this exception had been expressly sanctioned; and these statutes were not repeated. Hence, the Exception survives in statutory form, though needless.

(b) Up to the earliest part of the 1800s, no other exception of the sort appears to have been recognized in the United States, — that is, there was no using of regular entries except this limited use of a party's shop-books. But a knowledge of the doctrine of Price v. Lord Torrington (1703) seems to have been then brought about; and shortly after 1813, some well-considered rulings established on a firm footing the large and general principle of admitting regular entries by deceased persons. In these two decisions the Exception found a recognition entirely independent of the use of parties' books; and it was only in the course of time, especially through Professor Greenleaf's treatment in his work on Evidence, that the two branches of the exception became associated and their analogy recognized.

When this relation came to be appreciated, certain difficulties had to be solved; for example, one of the questions presented to American Courts was whether the books of a deceased or an absent party should be treated according to the parties'-books doctrine or from the point of view of the broad and inclusive exception admitting regular entries of deceased persons generally. Another and analogous question was the place to be assigned to books kept by a deceased clerk of a party. These questions concerning the delimitation of the two divisions still trouble the waters of precedent.

Sub-topic A. Party's Books of Account

392. EASTMAN v. MOULTON

Superior Court of Judicature of New Hampshire. 1825

3 N. H. 156

Assumpsit. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and filed, by way of set-off, an account, one item of which was a charge of 1109 yards of cloth, and another item a charge of 187 yards of cloth. The cause was tried here at February term, 1824.

To prove his set-off, the defendant offered in evidence his book of accounts, accompanied with his own oath, that the book offered contained the original entries of the articles mentioned in his set-off; that the entries were made at the times they purported to be made, and at or near the time when the respective articles were delivered. He was then cross-examined by the plaintiff's counsel in the same manner, that witnesses in chief are cross-examined; . . . He stated, that the said parcels of cloth, mentioned in the set-off, were delivered not to the plaintiff, but to the servants of the plaintiff. After the arguments of counsel to the jury, on both sides, were closed, the plaintiff's counsel objected, that the book of accounts could not go to the jury, as evidence of the delivery of the cloth, because it appeared, that it was in the power of the defendant to produce better evidence, the testimony of those, to whom it was delivered. But the Court overruled the objection, as made too late.

The jury having returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff moved the Court to grant a new trial, on the ground, . . . that the book of the defendant had been improperly submitted to the jury, as evidence of the delivery of the cloth.

Noyes, for the plaintiff.

Webster, for the defendant.

RICHARDSON, C. J.— It has long been the settled practice in this State, to permit the account books of a party, supported by his supplementary oath, to go to the jury, as evidence of the delivery of articles sold, and of the performance of work and labor. But as this is in truth the admission of a party to be a witness in his own cause, the practice is confined to cases where it may be presumed there is no better evidence, and has many limitations.

In the first place, it must appear that the charges are in the handwriting of the party who is sworn; because, if the charges are in the handwriting of a third person, such third person is presumed to know the facts, and may be a witness; so that there is no necessity of admitting the party to testify in his own cause. The book is, therefore, in such a case, rejected.

The charges in the handwriting of the party must appear in such a state, that they may be presumed to have been his daily minutes of his transactions and business. For if it appear in any way, that many charges, purporting to be made at different dates, were in fact made at the same time, the book is not evidence. The charges must appear to be the original or first entries of the party, made at or near the time of the transactions to be proved; and if the contrary appear, the book cannot be admitted as evidence.

There must be no fraudulent appearances upon the book, such as gross alterations. And where it appears by post marks, or otherwise, that the account has been transferred to another book, such other book must be produced.

If it appear by the book itself, or by the examination of the party, that there is better evidence, the book cannot go to the jury as evidence.

Thus, if an article be charged in the book as delivered by or to a third person, or if the party on his examination admit that to be the fact, the book is not evidence of the delivery of such article.

The party, when called, is in the first instance permitted to state only, that the book produced is his book of original entries; that the charges are in his handwriting; that they were made at the times they purport to have been made, and at or near the time of the delivery of the articles, or of the performance of the services. He may, however, be cross-examined by the other party. . . .

[In] the case now before us, as soon as it appeared that the cloth was delivered to a third person, the book became incompetent evidence to prove the delivery of that article; and the jury ought to have been so instructed. New trial granted.

393. STATUTES. Georgia. Code 1895, § 5182. The books of account of any merchant, shopkeeper, physician, blacksmith, or other person doing a regular business and keeping daily entries thereof, may be admitted in evidence as proof of such accounts, upon the following conditions: 1. That he kept no clerk, or else the clerk is dead or otherwise inaccessible, or for any other reason the clerk is disqualified from testifying; 2. Upon proof (the party's oath being sufficient) that the book tendered is his book of original entries; 3. Upon proof (by his customers) that he usually kept correct books; 4. Upon inspection by the Court, to see if the books are free from any suspicion of fraud.

Illinois. Revised Statutes 1874, c. 51, § 3. Where in any civil action, suit, or proceeding, the claim or defense is founded on a book account, any party or interested person may testify to his account-book, and the items therein contained; that the same is a book of original entries, and that the entries therein were made by himself, and are true and just; or that the same were made by a deceased person, or by a disinterested person, a non-resident of the State at the time of the trial, and were made by such deceased or disinterested person in the usual course of trade, and of his duty or employment to the party so testifying; and thereupon the said account-book and entries shall be admitted as evidence in the cause.

Iowa. Code 1897, § 4622. The entries and other writings of a decedent, made at or near the time of the transaction and in a position to know the facts stated therein, may be read as prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein, . . . 2, when it [the entry] was made in a professional capacity, or in the ordinary course of professional conduct; 3, when it was made in the performance of a duty specially enjoined by law.

Ib. § 4623. Books of account, containing charges by one party against another, made in the ordinary course of business, are receivable in evidence only under the following circumstances. . . . First, the books must show a continuous dealing with persons generally, or several items of charges at different times against the other party in the same book or set of books; Second, it must be shown, by the party's oath or otherwise, that they are his books of original entries; Third, it must be shown in like manner that the charges were made at or near the time of the transaction therein entered, unless satisfactory reasons appear for not making such proof; Fourth, the charges must also be verified by the party or the clerk who made the entries, to the effect that they believe them just and true, or a sufficient reason must be given why the verification is not made.

394. CONKLIN v. STAMLER

COMMON PLEAS OF NEW YORK CITY. 1859

8 Abb. Pr. 400

APPEAL from a judgment.

By the Court. BRADY, J.—The only proof made in the Court below, was that the plaintiff had no clerk or bookkeeper, and that persons dealing with him had settled with him by his books. There is no evidence either that the defendant dealt with him, or of the delivery of any one of the articles named in the bill of items. The Courts have required, in similar cases, that a foundation should be laid for the introduction of this kind of evidence, which consists of proof that the plaintiff had no clerk; that some of the articles charged have been delivered; that the books produced are the account-books of the party; and that he keeps fair and honest accounts, and this by those who have dealt and settled with him. (Per curiam, Vosburgh v. Thayer, 12 Johns. 461; Lemuel v. Sutherland, 11 Wend. 568.) The admissibility of the books, on such proofs, is put upon the ground of necessity, arising from the former incompetency of the claimant to be a witness in his own behalf.

The reason of the rule seems to have been destroyed by the act of the Legislature, authorizing the examination of parties in their own behalf; but, however that may be, the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff was not sufficient to make the book produced evidence, and the judgment must be reversed. There was neither evidence that the defendant dealt with the plaintiff, nor of the delivery of any of the articles. Judgment reversed.

DALY, F. J.—In Morrill a. Whitehead (4 E. D. Smith 239), it was proved that the books produced were the account-books of the party; that he had no clerk, and that he kept fair and honest accounts; but as there was no proof that any one of the services entered in the book had been actually rendered, we reversed the judgment. This is the first case in this State that has gone, I think, that length, or in which it was distinctly determined that some of the articles or services charged in the account must be shown to have been actually delivered or rendered; though it has been frequently intimated that that proof was essential before the books could be received or used in evidence. (Vosburgh a. Thayer, 12 Johns. 461; Sickles a. Mather, 20 Wend. 76; Foster a. Coleman, 1 E. D. Smith 86.) The decision in Morrill a. Whitehead is decisive in the present case, as the only proof before the justice here was that the plaintiff had no clerk, and that persons who had dealt with him and had settled by his books had found them to be correct.

But even if this proof had been supplied, I am of opinion that it would not now be sufficient to authorize a judgment. The practice of allowing the party's books of accounts to be received as sufficient evidence of the existence of the debt, which was contrary to the English rule, came into use in this State and in New Jersey with the early Dutch colonists, in whose courts merchants and traders were always allowed to exhibit their books of accounts, where it was acknowledged or proved that there had been a dealing between the parties, — provided the books had been regularly kept, with the proper distinction of persons, things, year, month, and day. Full faith and credit were then given to them, especially where they were strengthened by the oath of the party, or where the creditor was dead. And the practice, long established in the Eastern States, of receiving such books as evidence, is presumed to have been introduced by the English colonists from Holland, who settled New England. In the Dutch colonial courts, the parties appeared before the court and made their own statement, and if they differed as to a fact which the Court thought material, either party might be put to his oath; so that the objection made to this species of evidence was, in these tribunals, of less force, as the party who made the entries could be interrogated in respect to the truth or correctness of each item. In New England, they very wisely retained the feature of the suppletory oath of the party substantiating the truth of the entries, in connection with the practice of allowing such books as evidence; and where the matter is not regulated by statute, which is the case in Maine and Rhode Island, long usage has established that the books of account must be supported by the oath of the party. In Case a. Porter (8 Johns. 211), the practice of allowing the entries of the parties made in the usual course of business to be received as evidence, was recognized as a usage established in the courts of this State. . . .

But the important change recently made in the law of this State, by which a party may testify the same as any other witness, has obviated the difficulty that was supposed to exist when the rule above referred to was made, and there is now no occasion for resorting to the books, unless it may be to refresh the party's memory as to the items, or in cases where there is a failure of recollection. In the latter case, the books, if they contain the original entries of the transaction, would still, I apprehend, be evidence within the rule recognized in Merrill a. Ithaca & Oswego Railroad Company (16 Wend. 586); that is, if the party who made the entries had entirely forgotten the facts which he recorded, but can swear that he would not have entered them if he had not known them at the time to be true, and that he believes them to be correct. But I agree with Judge Brady, that the books, except in the cases above put, can no longer be received as sufficient evidence of the sale and delivery of goods, or of the performance of services, by merely probing the preliminary facts which heretofore made them sufficient evidence; but that the party, if he had no other means of establishing the facts, must go upon the stand as a witness, resorting to his books only where it is necessary to refresh his memory as to the items, or where, from a failure of recollection, he is compelled to rely upon them alone, and can swear to what is required to warrant their introduction as evidence to be submitted to the tribunal that is to pass upon the facts.

Judgment reversed.

395. HOUSE v. BEAK

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1892

141 Ill. 290; 30 N. E. 1065

APPEAL from the Appellate Court for the First District;—heard in that court on appeal from the Circuit Court of Cook County; the Hon. GEORGE DRIGGS, Judge, presiding.

This is an action of assumpsit, begun, on April 16, 1889, in the Circuit Court of Cook County, by Amelia Beak and Alfred Bucher, late partners under the firm name of Beak & Bucher, suing for the use of Wight Bros., a firm composed of Louis Wight and J. Franklin Wight against Sidney Guy Lea, Belden Seymour, Jr., W. T. Moore, Frank Conover and Everett House, composing the firm of Lea & Co. Of the defendants, Lea and House alone were served with process; the other defendants were not found by the Sheriff. The declaration consists of the common counts only. Default was entered against Lea. The appellant, House, entered his appearance, and filed plea of general issue, with affidavit of merits. The case was tried before a jury. The only evidence introduced was produced by the plaintiffs. The jury returned a verdict of $4089.91 in favor of the plaintiffs, upon which the Circuit Court entered judgment. The Appellate Court has affirmed the judgment of the Circuit Court, and from such judgment of affirmance the present appeal is prosecuted.

Beak & Bucher were wholesale merchants in Chicago, engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling furs, hats and caps. They failed in the latter part of December, 1885, and assigned their accounts to Wight Bros. . . . By the books and other evidence, it was shown, that, between September 17 and December 23, 1885, Beak & Bucher consigned to Lea & Co. goods to the amount of $6832.03, upon which amount they were entitled to credits of $3097.50, leaving a balance of $3734.53; and that, between September 17 and December 17, 1885, they sold to Lea & Co. goods to the amount of $2257.02, upon which credits to the amount of $1902.44 were due, leaving a balance of $355.38; making the entire claim, on both accounts, $4089.91. The two accounts consisted of a large number of items on both the debit and credit sides thereof.

Alfred Bucher swore that he was the book-keeper of the firm; that Beak & Bucher sold and consigned goods to Lea & Co. . . . that witness made the entries on the ledger and cash-books, but not on the sales-books, or delivery books, or receipt books; . . . . that he had checked up the charges for bills as rendered with the receipts, that is, the total of each delivery, and found the receipts to correspond. Lewis Henry swore, that he was bill-clerk for plaintiffs during said months; that he entered the charges for goods sold; that he kept the original sales-books and the assignment book and made the entries therein; that the entries were made therein in the regular course of trade at the times when they bear date, and as a part of his duty, and were true and correct; . . .

Charles Felcher also testified, that he drove an express wagon for Beak & Bucher during said period, and delivered to Lea & Co. at their store in Chicago, boxes and packages of goods, and took receipts from them for the goods; . . .

Edward E. Gray, one of the attorneys for plaintiffs, swore that he presented the account sued upon to Lea in the latter part of December, 1885, and informed him of its assignment to Wight Bros., and told him to make payments at the office of said attorneys; that Lea took the account and said "all right;" that the books of Beak & Bucher have been in the possession of said attorneys from December, 1885, to April, 1889, and a great many statements have been made from them and they have been found correct.

Messrs. Flower, Smith & Musgrave, for the appellant.

Messrs. Weigley, Bulkey & Gray, for the appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice MAGRUDER delivered the opinion of the Court:

It is assigned as error, that the trial Court received in evidence the books of account of Beak & Bucher, showing the items of the accounts sued upon. It is claimed that a proper foundation was not laid for the introduction of the books, and that, therefore, they should not have been admitted.

We think that the books were properly admitted, in connection with the evidence set forth in the statement of facts. . . .

The third section of the Act in regard to Evidence and Depositions in Civil Cases is as follows: [ante, No. 393] . . . This statute permits the party himself to testify to his own books. The party himself was not allowed so to testify at common law. The common law requires that the entries in the book should be proved by the clerk or servant who made them, if such clerk or servant be alive and can be produced. (Burnham v. Adams, 5 Vt. 313.) . . . Section 3, which was first passed in 1867 (Laws of 1867, § 3, p. 184,) adds to and enlarges, but does not repeal, the common law rule. A contrary statement made in Presbyterian Church v. Emerson, 66 Ill. 269, was mere dictum, and not necessary to the decision of the case. It was not the intention of the statute to prohibit the introduction in evidence of account kept by a clerk, when such clerk is living in the State and is able to testify to the correctness of the books. In Taliaferro v. Ives, 51 Ill. 247, we said that this statute of 1867 did not materially change the rule announced in Boyer v. Sweet, 3 Scam. 120. . . . The existence of the common law rule, which permits the clerk who has kept the books to testify, was again recognized in Stettauer v. White, 98 Ill. 72.

In a number of cases, we have held, that there are certain limitations upon the rule permitting such books of account to be introduced in evidence. In Boyer v. Sweet, supra, where the party kept the books himself, the books of original entries were held to be admissible to sustain an account composed of many items, upon proof being made that some of the articles were delivered at or about the time the entries purported to have been made; that the entries were in the handwriting of the party producing the books; that he kept no clerk at the time; and that persons having dealings with him had settled by the books, and found them to be fair and correct.

In Humphreys v. Spear, 15 Ill. 275, the same state of facts was shown to exist as in Boyer v. Sweet, except that the books were kept, not by the tradesman himself, but by his clerk; the clerk was introduced as a witness and gave evidence tending to show the correctness of the account; and we there said:

> "It is very clear that the books were admissible in evidence in connection with the testimony of the clerk. . . . If it appears that some of the goods were delivered contemporaneously with the entries made by the clerk, and that the books were fairly and honestly kept, the jury may reasonably conclude that the entire account is correct."

(See also, Lawrence v. Stiles, 16 Brad. 489.) The doctrine of Humphreys v. Spear was not changed by the statute of 1867.

In Stettauer v. White, supra, it was held, that, where the clerk who makes the entries has no knowledge of their correctness, but makes them as the items are furnished by another, it is essential that the party furnishing the items should testify to their correctness, or that satisfactory proof thereof (such as the transactions were reasonably susceptible of,) from other sources should be produced. It is to be observed that, in the Stettauer case, there was no evidence except the carrier's shipping receipt, that any portion of the articles had been delivered. In Kent v. Garvin, 1 Gray 148, one of the cases upon which the Stettauer case is based, the failure "to show that at the time the charges were made, any articles, similar in character to those charged, were delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant" is commented upon as significant.

In the case at bar, there is evidence that, of the goods described in the accounts, an amount exceeding in value $5000.00 was delivered to the defendants; and not only does Henry, who kept the books of original entries, swear to their correctness; but, in addition to this, Richard Beak, who furnished the items to Henry, testifies to the correctness of the items.

The proof establishes all the facts necessary to bring the present case within the requirements of the cases of Boyer v. Sweet, Humphreys v. Speer, Ruggles v. Gatton, (50 Ill. 412) and Stettauer v. White, — except as to one matter. We find no evidence by any customer of Beak & Bucher, that he settled with them by their books and found them correct.

(Ingersoll v. Banister, 41 Ill. 388.) The failure of the proof, however, in this regard would not have justified the exclusion of the books, in view of the facts that the defendants paid $1000.00 upon the account late in December without questioning it, and accepted a statement of the account as assigned, with the remark that it was "all right," and, although more than three years elapsed after the account was presented before suit was brought, during which time many applications were made to them or some one of them for payment, they at no time ever urged any objections to the correctness of the account. A careful examination of the authorities hereinbefore referred to will show, that, before the statute of 1867 was passed, testimony from third persons as to settlements made by the books was more especially required in cases where the tradesman had no clerk but kept his own books. In such cases, the party testifying to the correctness of the books being interested, it was held that his testimony should be supported by that of customers who had settled by the books. (Boyer v. Sweet, supra; Ingersoll v. Banister, supra; Ruggles v. Gatton, supra; Waggeman v. Peters, 22 Ill. 42.) . . .

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

396. LEWIS v. ENGLAND

SUPREME COURT OF WYOMING. 1905

14 Wyo. 128; 82 Pac. 869

ERROR to District Court, Carbon County; DAVID H. CRAIG, Judge.

Action by Ida Lewis, as administratrix of the estate of Charles Lewis, deceased, against Mary England, as administratrix of the estate of Richard England, deceased. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

On November 21, 1901, Charles Lewis, as plaintiff, brought an action in the District Court of Carbon county against the defendant in error alleging that Richard England during his lifetime, and on the 26th day of May, 1901, was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,821.95 for balance due on an account for goods sold and delivered and for divers sums of money advanced to the said England by the plaintiff. The petition further alleges that Richard England died intestate on the 26th day of May, 1901, and thereafter the defendant in error was duly appointed administratrix of the said England's estate, and that on the 18th day of November, 1901, the account sued upon, verified as required by law, was presented to the defendant as administratrix and by her rejected and disallowed. . . . On the 14th day of March following the Court approved and confirmed the report and findings of the commissioner in all respects, and entered judgment generally against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant. From this judgment, plaintiff prosecutes error to this court.

The original plaintiff, Lewis, was a saloon keeper at Medicine Bow, and, being unable either to read or write, was obliged in the conduct of his business to intrust the keeping of his accounts to others. The evidence discloses that the accounts were kept by his employees, by his wife, and in two instances by school teachers who lived at his house. It also appears that regular books of account, as the term is generally understood, were not kept by the plaintiff. At the saloon there was kept what was called a "tablet," consisting of plain sheets of paper. Each day there was entered on the tablet the charges that were made against various parties during that day; the date being entered at the head of each sheet as the same was used. . . . Each day the sheets containing the charges for the day's business were filed away, and at frequent periods these "day slips," as they were called, were taken to Lewis' house, and there transferred to other slips of paper called "ledger slips." . . . These charges, on being transferred to the ledger slips, were entered against the individuals separately; in other words, the account of each individual was entered on the ledger slips under his name. The day slips and ledger slips were both offered in evidence by the plaintiff and objected to by the defendant. It was contended by counsel for defendant that the day slips and ledger slips had not been kept in such a manner, as books of account, as to entitle them to admission as evidence. The commissioner in his findings admitted the day slips, but refused to admit the ledger slips, on the ground that they did not constitute books of original entry. The failure of the commissioner to admit the ledger slips is assigned as error. . . .

W. R. Stoll, for plaintiff in error. N. R. Greenfield, for defendant in error.

Van Orsdel, J. (after stating the facts as above). The law prescribes no regular mode or method in which accounts must be kept in order to make them competent as evidence. The question of competency must be determined by the appearance and character of the book; regard being had to the degree of education of the party, the nature of his business, the manner of his charges against other people, and all other surrounding circumstances. . . .

Certain essential requirements, however, must be observed in order to justify the reception of books of account as evidence.

1. It must appear that they were the regular method of keeping accounts adopted by the party, containing the regular entries of his transactions in the regular course of business, and made so near the time of the transactions as to establish the presumption that they were fairly and honestly kept. . . . We are of the opinion that the evidence sufficiently discloses in this case that the books of account of Lewis were kept with sufficient regularity in the general course of the transaction of his business, and with all persons with whom he did business alike, to render them competent evidence in this case.

2. The day slips having been admitted in evidence, the plaintiff has no complaint as to their admission. But it is contended that the ledger slips should likewise have been admitted. As above stated, the ledger slips contain many original entries. These entries were sometimes made at the direct request of Lewis or from scraps of paper containing a memorandum of the item or items to be charged. It is clear that the ledger slips, if competent evidence, could only be so in so far as they contain accounts of original entry, or are explanatory of accounts appearing on the day slips. It appears that the amounts charged upon the day slips were indicated by figures, usually without decimal marks, or other specific indication as to whether the figures represented dollars or cents, though we think the various entries on the day-slips, taken together and in connection with the subject of the charges, fairly show the meaning of the several figures. When entered upon the ledger slips, the figures are clearly explained, and in no way contradictory of the day slips in that respect. Hence, for the purpose of explaining such figures in case of doubt, the ledger slips were admissible. McGoldrick v. Traphagen, 88 N. Y. 334. We are therefore of the opinion that the ledger slips were admissible for these purposes. . . .

3. The account sued upon contains numerous items of cash advanced from time to time. It appears from the evidence that England was in the habit of borrowing from Lewis small amounts of money at various times. These cash items were sometimes entered upon the day slips, but frequently they were only entered upon the ledger slips, as the evidence discloses that the money was often procured by England at the house, either from Lewis or from Mrs. Lewis, who testified that her husband had directed her to give England money when he requested it. It was held by the commissioner that these cash items were not proper items of book account, and therefore the books could not be considered as competent evidence against the defendant as to such items. There are authorities which hold that there is not and never was a necessity for making books of account evidence of the payment or the lending of money (Inslee v. Prall, 23 N. J. Law, 463). But we think the great weight of modern authority is to the effect that where cash entries appear in the general course of accounts, as a part of the regular course of business transacted, that such entries should be admitted as competent evidence. As stated by KILPATRICK, C. J., in Wilson v. Wilson, 6 N. J. Law, 99:

"Upon principle I can see no reason why a book should be lawful evidence of one item and not of another, — why it should be evidence of goods sold and delivered, and not of money paid or advanced. Why should there be witnesses called or receipts taken in the one case more than in the other? If necessity be pleaded for the one, may it not for the other also? For they are both transactions in the common course of business, equally necessary, and, I should think, equally frequent or nearly so."

See, also, Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 1548, 1549. . . .

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

SUB-TOPIC B. THIRD PERSON'S ENTRIES

397. PRICE v. EARL OF TORRINGTON (1703. 2 Ld. Raym. 873). In indebitatus assumpsit for beer sold and delivered to the defendant, upon non assumpsit pleaded, at the trial at Guildhall before HOLT, Chief Justice, the evidence against the defendant was, that the usual way of the plaintiff's trading was, that the drayman came every night to the plaintiff's clerk, and gave account to him of all the beer that he had delivered that day; and an entry was made of it in a book, which the drayman and clerk subscribed; and that there was such an entry of ——— barrels of beer delivered to the defendant, &c., and that the drayman was dead, and the subscription was proved to be of his writing.

And HOLT, Chief Justice, held this good evidence to charge the defendant. And a verdict was given against him, &c.

398. KENNEDY v. DOYLE

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1865

10 All. 161

THIS action was brought against two sisters upon an agreement of both to pay money borrowed by them on their joint account from the plaintiff. One of them suggested her insolvency and set up no other defence. The other pleaded infancy at the time of the agreement. . . .

The parties being at issue upon the point whether the defendant was of age when she made the agreement, the plaintiff, to prove that she was, offered a book, which was admitted to be the church record of baptisms in a Roman Catholic church in Lowell, regularly kept by McDermott, the priest of that church for a series of years, produced from the custody of O'Brien, the present priest, into whose hands it came upon the death of McDermott, and containing the following entry in McDermott's handwriting, and signed by him: "1837, December 17th. Baptized Joanna, born 12th, of Michael and Mary Doyle. Sponsors, Jeremiah Kennedy and Bridget Doyle." There was also evidence that the defendant in this action was the Joanna Doyle named in this record. It does not appear to have been denied at the trial, and it was assumed at the argument, that the priest performed the rite of baptism and made the entry upon the record in the discharge of his ecclesiastical duty according to the rule and custom of his church. But there was no evidence that he was a sworn officer, or that the book was required by law to be kept; and upon this ground the defendant objected to its admission. The presiding judge, however, admitted it, as competent evidence of the date of the baptism only.

J. P. Converse, for the defendant. A. R. Brown, for the plaintiff.

Gray, J. [after stating the case as above, held that the book did not satisfy the requirements of the exception for Official Registers; this part of the opinion being quoted post, as No. 416; and then proceeded:]

It becomes necessary, therefore, to determine whether his death has made his register competent evidence [as a book of regular entries]. . . .

The leading cases upon this subject are those in which Lord Holt held that entries, made in a tradesman's books by his servant or drayman in the usual course of his employment, were admissible in evidence after the death of the latter, upon proof of his handwriting. Pitman v. Maddox (2 Salk. 690; s. c. 1 Ld. Raym. 732; Holt, 298); Price v. Torrington (1 Salk. 285; s. c. 2 Ld. Raym. 873; [ante, No. 397]). . . . Lord Chancellor Plunket repeatedly admitted the books of a Roman Catholic chapel in Dublin, made by Roman Catholic priests whose deaths and handwriting were proved, as evidence of marriages and baptisms, and on the last occasion, after argument, gave this reason for their admission: "They are the entries of deceased persons, made in the exercise of their vocation contemporaneously with the events themselves, and without any interest or intention to mislead." O'Connor v. Malone (6 Cl. & F. 576, 577); Malone v. L'Estrange (2 Irish Eq. R. 16). . . . In the United States, the law is well settled that an entry made by a person in the ordinary course of his business or vocation, with no interest to misrepresent, before any controversy or question has arisen, and in a book produced from the proper custody, is competent evidence, after his death, of the facts thus recorded. In a very early case the Supreme Court of Connecticut admitted the record of a baptism by a minister of a parish, who had since died, as evidence of the fact of baptism. Huntly v. Comstock (2 Root 99). It has been repeatedly held in this Commonwealth that the book of a bank messenger or notary public, kept in the usual course of business, though not required by law, is competent evidence after his death. Welsh v. Barrett (15 Mass. 380); Porter v. Judson (1 Gray 175). . . . In the case before us, the book was kept by the deceased priest in the usual course of his office, and was produced from the custody of his successor; the entry is in his own handwriting, and appears to have been made contemporaneously with the performance of the rite, long before any controversy had arisen, with no inducement to misstate, and no interest except to perform his official duty. The addition of a memorandum that he had been paid a fee for the ceremony could not have added anything to the competency, the credibility, or the weight, of the record as evidence of the fact. An entry made in the performance of a religious duty is certainly of no less value than one made by a clerk, messenger, or notary, an attorney or solicitor, or a physician, in the course of his secular occupation. Exceptions overruled.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1909

202 Mass. 359; 88 N. E. 776

TORT for personal injuries received by the plaintiff while in the defendant's employ, as stated in the opinion. The declaration contained two counts, the first being at common law, alleging failure on the part to the defendant to supply the plaintiff with a reasonably safe place in which, or materials with which to work, or to warn him of the dangers surrounding his work, and the second being under R. L. c. 106, § 71, cl. 2, alleging negligence of the defendant's superintendent. Writ in the Superior Court for the county of Middlesex, dated April 24, 1906.

The case was tried before BELL, J. . . .

The jury found for the plaintiff; and the defendant alleged exceptions.

R. Spring (W. Rand with him), for the defendant. C. F. Choate, Jr., for the plaintiff.

HAMMOND, J. . . . The records of the Massachusetts General Hospital were properly excluded.

1. The defendant does not contend that they were admissible under the common law, but insists that they are admissible under St. 1905, c. 330. But the records were made before that statute. The first section of the statute imposes upon certain hospitals, including, as we understand, the Massachusetts General Hospital, the duty "to keep records of the cases under their care and the history of the same in books kept for that purpose." The words "such records" in the second section embrace only the records which thereafter shall be kept under the first section. The question is not whether the statute is retroactive, as a rule of evidence or of procedure, in the sense in which those words are used in cases like Stocker v. Foster, 178 Mass. 501, and Woodvine v. Dean, 194 Mass. 40, as contended by the defendant, but rather what kind of records shall be admitted. If the records are those described in the statute, then they are admissible without reference to the time of the trial; but if they are not of the kind described in the statute, then they are not admissible, no matter what may be the time of the trial. The records of the hospital were not those described in the statute, and were therefore inadmissible. This statute has since been amended (St. 1908, c. 269), but the case was tried before the amending statute became operative. So far as respects the admissibility of the records of the Carney Hospital under St. 1905, c. 330, the same rule applies, because these records also were made before it was passed.

2. The defendant insists, however, that the records of this hospital are admissible under the common law. While it is true that the records were not made in accordance with a requirement of law and therefore were not legal records within the meaning of the rule that legal records or copies thereof are generally admissible, still it appears that they were made in the usual course of business by a person in the discharge of a duty, who appears not only as the maker of them but as their custodian. If she had died and her handwriting had been proved, in the absence of any other testimony as to the manner in which they were made up, they would have been admissible. As in the case of Townsend v. Pepperell, 99 Mass. 40, it would have been assumed that the records were of facts known to her.

The rule applicable to such records ordinarily is that the entries must be made by a person having personal knowledge of the truthfulness of the statements. This test has been applied by this Court in the case of shop books offered to prove delivery of goods, and it has been held that where the clerk who made the entries had no knowledge of the facts the entries are not admissible, although the clerk testified that he correctly put down the information he received from the person by whom the delivery was said to be made. Kent v. Garvin, 1 Gray, 148. Miller v. Shay, 145 Mass. 162. It is true that this rule has not been applied with the same strictness to other memoranda. But in substance the general principle is the same. . . . And the rule has been adhered to quite generally, except where in the course of the business the clerk making the entry receives his information either orally or in writing from various persons whom he cannot expect to remember and whom it will be impracticable to call. To apply the rule in such a case and to require the evidence of every person in the long line of persons who have had anything to do with the transaction recorded, would be practically impossible, and so as a practical necessity the record is admitted upon the oath of the recorder, if alive, or upon proof of handwriting if he be dead. It is probable that the exception has been carried farther elsewhere than in this State. For a general discussion of the subject see Wigmore on Evidence, § 1530, and cases cited in the notes. In our own State this exception seems to have been recognized in Briggs v. Rafferty, 14 Gray 525; Adams v. Coulliard, 102 Mass. 167.

In the present case the records were produced by the witness Gahagan. It appeared that the records were made by her, and that she was the proper custodian of them. But it further appeared that she never had any personal knowledge of the facts stated therein; that she received slips of paper from Dr. Painter, the physician, and copied them into the record; and that was all she knew about them. The record was offered as evidence to show that the statements therein made were true. As handed to the witness by the physician they were simply statements of the physician as to what the patient had said to him, or as to the diagnosis made by the physician. The records were comparatively recent. It was not shown that the physician was not living and within the jurisdiction of the court. No necessity was shown, therefore, for the introduction of this hearsay testimony. For aught that appeared there was better evidence. Under these circumstances the reason upon which the general rule was based, namely, that the record should be a record of facts of which the writer had personal knowledge, should be applied. The case is not within the above mentioned exception to the general rule. . . . These records were properly excluded. . . .

Exceptions overruled.

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Hopkins County. Action by Louis Daniel against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Benjamin D. Warfield and Clifton J. Waddill, for appellant. Gordon, Gordon & Cox, for appellee.

O'REAR, J.—Appellee alleges that while walking across appellant's railroad tracks in its yard at Madisonville, at a point between Broadway and Sugg streets, where the public had been permitted by the railroad company to so use its tracks as a passway for more than 20 years, he was injured by being run against by a car detached from the engine. . . . It is conceded that appellee was stealing a ride on one of appellant's freight trains passing through Madisonville. . . . Appellee does not claim that he was injured while on this train, or was injured by it. His claim is that it stopped at Madisonville, and then he got off and started to cross another track; that he saw an engine coming down the track, and after it passed he undertook to cross the track behind it, when he was hallooed at by some one in the dark. Looking up, he saw a freight car rapidly approaching him on the same track, following the engine, but without a light; that he had not seen or heard it before, and, not knowing of it, it ran against him before he could get out of the way. Appellant contends that his story is a fabrication or an hallucination. It asserts that there was no other engine or train at Madisonville at that time, nor for some hours before or after. . . . It was, therefore, very material to show whether there was any other train at that point at or near that time. The depot agent and the operator and assistant testify that there was not. The engineer, conductor, and brakeman also testify to the same fact. They all testify, also, that that freight train did not stop at Madisonville on that occasion.

Appellant offered to prove by its train dispatcher that he kept an accurate record of the movements of all trains on that division of appellant's road; that it was his duty to do so; that this record was made up at the time from his own orders, upon which all trains on that division moved, and from telegraphic reports transmitted to him from the stations along the line as each train arrived and departed, from which he at the time made an entry on his record; that the record was made accurately at the time, and was true. He produced his record, called a "train sheet," or telegraphic register of trains. This sheet purported to show the time of the arrival and departure of every train passing over that road on that day, at Madisonville, as well as all other telegraphic stations on that division. Appellant offered to introduce it as evidence on its behalf on this trial, but upon objection of appellee it was rejected. The witness was permitted to state what he knew personally about it, based upon his personal knowledge and recollection. But he was compelled to state and did state that he had little or no personal knowledge on the point, as he was stationed at Earlington, the end of the division, and not at Madisonville, on that date, and could not recollect, from the nature of the business, many days afterwards, where so many trains were at a given day and moment; that he had to rely and did rely exclusively upon his record, made at the time as stated. The question for decision is, was the record admissible as evidence on appellant's behalf? We think it was, and will give our reasons for the ruling.

Books of original entry, called shopkeepers or parties' books, have for centuries been admitted as evidence in favor of the party keeping them. Numerous limitations upon the rule are noted. The rule itself has been subjected to not a few changes in judicial application, and to many more by legislative action. While very narrow originally, the tendency has been upon the whole to broaden its application, though it is believed that the first principles upon which it was founded are to be clearly recognized in every change that it has undergone. These are, in fine, that, as the Courts require the production of the best evidence the nature of the case admits of, necessity and circumstantial guaranty of trustworthiness of such entries may render them, not only the best, but the only reliable, evidence practicable to be obtained to establish the disputed fact. It is scarcely within the scope of the questions here involved, even if it were necessary at this day, to trace the origin of the rule or to follow its course and deviations. Of this rule of the common law, as interpreted by English and American Courts, it can be truly said, as of many others, proving the wisdom and elasticity of the systems, that it adapts itself logically to conditions undreamed of in its origin. Commerce has grown enormously in magnitude and variety since then. What was possible, and not unreasonably practicable, a century ago, would be intolerable in the conducting of business in this age. But the necessity of rules of evidence are the same, and the reasons for them, in the main, are not different. If a fact is in dispute, to be determined in or out of court, the safe course is a resort to the best evidence of which the nature of the case will admit, and such as has been found most reliable in the practical adjustment of such matters among those whose constant business it is to adjust them. Mercantile and industrial life, producing, as they do, nearly all the transactions of men that come before the courts of law and equity, are essentially practical. That which is the final basis of action, of calculation, reliance, investment, and general confidence in every business enterprise, may safely, in general, be resorted to to prove the main fact. The Courts need not discredit what the common experience of mankind relies upon.

Such is the use of books or records of original entries made under circumstances that are a guaranty of their trustworthiness. In the conduct of a modern railroad system, it is indispensable that in the movement of trains an exact knowledge should be had, at a central point of observation and direction, of the location of each train in operation over a given line or between given terminals, and that this knowledge should accompany each movement of each train until it has arrived at its destination. . . . The train dispatcher, who directs them and who keeps tab on the movement of each, and maintains as it were a birdseye view of the whole system under his control, is the practical solution of this difficulty as it now exists. It would be folly for him to endeavor to trust to his memory, even for the hour, as to the whereabouts or condition of each train. He must have a record before him upon which he can rely, to which he can resort at any moment to acquaint his mind with those important facts as verities. As the district within his charge usually covers a considerable distance, say 100 miles or more, he can know only what is reported to him from the numerous intermediate points of observation by those in charge. This is done by the use of the telegraph. Thus as promptly as by word of mouth by clerks in his presence he gets the information. He immediately records it on the record, which he is required to and does keep for that purpose. The very nature of the matter, its grave importance to so many lives, not to mention fortunes, dependent upon his record's being accurately kept, are the strongest possible guaranties to the general accuracy of the entries. No motive, not criminal in the highest degree, could exist for fabrication in making such original entries. He has no personal interest whatever to serve by making a knowingly false entry. On the contrary, the security of his position, the prospect of advancement, the fear of the awful consequences of mistake, the impossibility of keeping a false record as a working record in the matter without immediate disaster and detection, all combine to insure against any motive on his part for fabrication.

To the objection that his record is not his own personal knowledge, the answer is that the intelligence transmitted to him by his subordinates is all of the same kind and grade as that recorded in his entries. Its trustworthiness is supported by the same considerations. It is at least as reliable as salesmen's, draymen's, porters', or wharfingers' information conveyed to a bookkeeper, who makes the original entries thereof, all of which is now nearly everywhere allowed to be proven by the introduction of the book entries so made, as evidence of the facts shown by the entries. Wigmore on Evidence, § 1530. The entrant discharges a duty which he has assumed only in the keeping of an accurate record of his entries. He makes them contemporaneously with the act which they represent.

They are made in the regular course of transactions, which, to be utilized in the business, must from greatest necessity be precise and true. They are made in the habit and system of keeping such a record with regularity. Every consideration by which it is possible to establish the existence of a past event, by testing the accuracy of the evidence of it, is satisfied by such a record. It is less apt to be mistaken than the person who made it would be if testifying to it from memory subsequently. That it is made up of details furnished by different persons widely apart, and all acting under a high incentive for accuracy, and who report that which is transpiring at the moment under their eyes, is better evidence, because more apt to be a true picture of the real situation, than if it were possible for one person to have the whole as a panorama before his own eyes, and then attempt to set it down in the record, much less to have to depend on his memory afterward to truthfully recall and relate it. If every telegraph operator along the line were to come to court, and all testify to their recollections of the position of trains at or near their stations at a given hour and day, the result would be neither more certain, nor the truth clearer, than by the use of the original record made at the time the events were happening. In addition, to call all these men away from their posts to the court, to bring a regiment of witnesses to prove minute details of a status more easily and truly shown by a contemporaneous record, would be to discard the better for the worse, and to trammel the administration of justice. . . . Records of the kind offered and rejected in this case, and now being discussed, were admitted in Donovan v. B. & M. R. Co. (Mass.) 33 N. E. 583, Fireman's Ins. Co. v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. (N. C.) 50 S. E. 452, and T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Birdwell (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 1067. Where the witness who made the record is produced, if within the jurisdiction of the court, and testifies that the record offered was made by him in the regular course of the business, that it was his duty to keep such a record, and that its entries were correct when made, nothing appearing to show that the record has since been altered, it is receivable as evidence of the fact it recites; or if the person who made the record be dead, or beyond the jurisdiction of the court, if the record be otherwise proved to be the original entry so kept, it is receivable on the same grounds and to the same extent as any other book or record of original entry. . . .

The Court is further of opinion that a new trial should have been granted in this case because the verdict was palpably against the weight of the evidence.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to award a new trial under proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

401. COOLIDGE v. TAYLOR

SUPREME COURT OF VERMONT. 1911

85 Vt.—; 80 Atl. 1039

EXCEPTIONS from Windsor County Court; E. L. WATERMAN, Judge.

Action by John C. Coolidge against Warren R. Taylor, defendant, and another, as trustee. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant excepted. Judgment reversed and remanded.

Argued before ROWELL, C. J., and MUNSON and WATSON, JJ.

William W. Stickney, John G. Sargent, and Homer L. Skeels, for plaintiff. Davis & Davis and Frank A. Waker, for defendant.

ROWELL, C. J. This is a statutory "trustee suit" for the collection of a tax assessed against the defendant on his grand list in Plymouth in 1898. . . .

The defendant claimed, and his evidence tended to show, that his taxable residence was in Woodstock the 1st day of April, 1898, whither he moved from Sherburn in March of that year. It appeared that he hired a box in the Woodstock post office, and held it during that year, and received his and his wife's mail through that office. . . . The defendant claimed, and his evidence tended to show, that he moved from the Taylor farm in Plymouth to Sherburn in the spring of 1888, and resided in Sherburn till he moved to Woodstock in March, 1898.

It was error to admit the milk book of the cheese factory containing entries purporting to show the delivery of milk there in 1897 in the name of the defendant, and to admit the testimony of the secretary of the cheese company based thereon, who knew nothing about the correctness of the entries except that he transcribed them from daily memoranda kept by the cheesemaker as the milk was delivered, and who was not called as a witness nor his absence accounted for.

It is not that the entries are not original because thus transcribed, but that the correctness of the memoranda was not shown by the person who made them, nor in any other way. Without this, the entries in the book, and the testimony of the witness based thereon, were mere hearsay. In Chaffee v. United States, 18 Wall. 516, 541, the rule that governs the admissibility of entries made by private persons in the ordinary course of business is said to require, with some exceptions not included in that case, not merely that they shall be contemporaneous with the facts to which they relate, but that they shall have been made by persons having personal knowledge of the facts, and be corroborated by their testimony, if living and accessible, or by proof of their handwriting if dead, insane, or beyond the reach of the process or commission of the Court. And this, because the testimony of living witnesses personally cognizant of the facts of which they speak, given under the sanction of an oath in open Court, where they may be subjected to cross-examination, affords the greatest security for truth; but that their declarations, verbal or written, must sometimes be admitted when they themselves cannot be called, in order to prevent a failure of justice, in which cases the admissibility of the declarations is limited by the necessity on which it is based. Connecticut Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Schwenk, 94 U. S. 593, 598, is to the same effect.

Mr. Wigmore says that there can be no doubt that the general principles of testimonial evidence should apply here as elsewhere; namely, that the person whose statement is received as testimony should speak from personal observation or knowledge, and that this principle has often been invoked in excluding entries made by a person who had no personal knowledge of the supposed facts recorded. But he suggests that this principle does not necessarily exclude all entries made by persons not having personal knowledge of the facts entered, and submits that where an entry is made by one person in the regular course of business, recording an oral or a written report made to him by one or more other persons in regular course of business, of a transaction lying in the personal knowledge of the latter, there is no objection to receiving that entry, provided the practical inconvenience of producing on the stand the numerous persons thus concerned would, in the particular case, outweigh the probable utility of doing so. 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1530. But, however that may be, this case does not come within that suggestion, but belongs to the same class as Chaffee v. United States and Connecticut Mutual Life v. Schwenk, to which we have referred. See, also, 17 Cyc. 392, 394; Kent v. Garvin, 1 Gray (Mass.) 148; Stettauer v. White, 98 Ill. 72, stated in House v. Beak, 141 Ill. 290 [ante, No. 395]. . . .

Both judgments reversed and cause remanded.

On reargument. . . . It appears from the amended exceptions that the secretary of the company was also its treasurer and financial man, and received the avails of cheese sold, and distributed them to the patrons in proportion to the milk delivered by them, after deducting the cost of making. . . . The plaintiff claims that . . . the book as made by the treasurer was used by him as a basis for computing the dividends, and in connection with his testimony, and to the extent used, was properly admitted, (1) because the witness could use it as a memorandum used by him at the time he made the dividends, to refresh his recollection, and (2) because it was not directly in issue, but related to a collateral matter, and so not within the best evidence rule.

But this claim still erroneously assumes that the book was evidence that milk was delivered from the Taylor farm. And, as to refreshing recollection, it could refresh no further than to the fact that the witness made the entries in the book from memoranda kept by the cheesemaker, about the correctness of which he knew nothing. Such a refreshing did not make the book admissible for what the plaintiff says it was used.

Nor does the fact, if it is a fact, that the book relates to collateral matter, and not within the best evidence rule, make any difference, for this is not a question of degree, but of admissibility regardless of degree. . . . Reversed and remanded as before.

Topic 5. Statements by Deceased Persons in General

402. SUGDEN v. ST. LEONARDS. (1876. L. R. 1. P. D. 154). MELLISH, L. J. I have not the least hesitation in saying that I think it would be a highly desirable improvement in the law if the rule was that all statements, made by persons who are dead, respecting matters of which they had a personal knowledge, and made "ante litem motam," should be admitted. There is no doubt that by rejecting such evidence we do reject a most valuable source of evidence. . . . [But] it appears to me that it would be better to leave it to the Legislature to make the improvement, which in my opinion ought to be made, in our present rules with regard to the admissibility of evidence of that description.

403. STATUTES. Massachusetts. (St. 1898, c. 535, Rev. L. 1902, c. 175, § 66). No declaration of a deceased person shall be excluded as evidence on the ground of its being hearsay, if it appears to the satisfaction of the judge to have been made in good faith before the beginning of the suit and upon the personal knowledge of the declarant.

404. NAGLE v. BOSTON & NORTHERN STREET R. CO.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1905

188 Mass. 38; 73 N. E. 1019

Two actions of Tort against the Boston and Northern Street Railway Company for the suffering and death of one motorman and for injuries to another from a collision of two cars running in opposite directions upon the same single track of the defendant, the first action by the administratrix of the estate of James E. Nagle, who also sued under R. L. c. 106, § 73, as his widow, and the second by Henry P. Hart. Writs dated February 27, 1902, and January 20, 1902.

In the Superior Court the cases were tried together before GASKILL, J. Against the objection of the defendant, the judge admitted the declarations of James E. Nagle, which are stated in the opinion, and refused to order a verdict for the defendant. In each case the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, in the first case in the sum of $5,000, of which $3,000 was for conscious suffering of the plaintiff's intestate, and $2,000 for causing the death of the plaintiff's husband, and in the second case in the sum of $350. The defendant alleged exceptions.

J. P. Sweeney, for the defendant. J. G. Walsh, for Nagle. W. J. Bradley, for Hart, submitted a brief.

BARKER, J.: . . . The collision occurred because the car of which Nagle was motorman, instead of stopping at the point where under the general running orders in force it should stop, unless in any instance special directions otherwise had been given, until the car of which Hart was motorman had arrived and passed upon a double track, failed to stop, and ran on upon a single track leading to the Willows. Hart's car was running in accordance with the general order.

As Nagle's car went on to the single track instead of stopping, his conductor said to him, "Jim, did you have orders to go to the Willows?" Nagle said, "Yes," and nodded. After the collision, as the conductor was riding in the ambulance with Nagle, the conductor said to him, "Jim, did you get orders to go to the Willows?" and he said, "Yes, I did." This was the evidence admitted under exception.

It is urged in support of the exception, that the declarations of Nagle were inadmissible because made in answer to leading questions, and because they merely embody the declarant's inference as to what had been done or said by others. But the statute applies to every declaration of a deceased person found to be made in good faith before the commencement of the action and upon the personal knowledge of the declarant. If the statute was not intended to apply to declarations made in answer to leading questions, the Legislature would have so said. Its words are not to be "narrowed from their natural meaning." O'Driscoll v. Lynn & Boston Railroad, 180 Mass. 187, 189.

We think the questions put by the conductor were such under the circumstances as clearly to call upon Nagle for a fact within his own knowledge rather than any inference of his own; and that it was for the jury to say whether he proceeded without stopping to wait for the other car in consequence of an express order to that effect given to him. See Huebener v. Childs, 180 Mass. 483, 485. The statute has been construed liberally, the declarations when admitted being regarded as those of a witness and given probative effect. . . . We think the evidence was admitted rightly. . . . Exceptions overruled.

Topic 6. Reputation

407. BADGER v. BADGER

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1882

88 N. Y. 546

APPEAL from judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court in the second judicial department, entered upon an order made September 13, 1881, which affirmed a judgment in favor of defendants, entered upon a decision of the Court on trial at Special Term. This action was brought for admeasurement of dower. The plaintiff claims dower in the lands of Jacob Badger, deceased, whom she alleges to have been her husband. The defendants deny the marriage, and so raise an issue of fact which forms the vital point of the controversy. No formal or ceremonial marriage is proven, nor any express agreement between the parties constituting such relation. The proof offered is that of cohabitation continued for a long period of time, and characterized by general repute, and by conduct and conversation indicating, as is claimed, an intercourse rather matrimonial than meretricious. . . .

George B. Ely, for appellant. The proof of acknowledgment of marriage, matrimonial cohabitation, habit and repute was so clear and for so long a period as to establish the marriage, and the burden of disproving it was upon the defendants. . . .

S. M. Parsons, for respondents. A local or a partial divided repute of marriage is of no avail. . . .

FINCH, J. (after stating the facts as above). The decedent appears to have lived two lives. They ran parallel with each other for more than a third of a century, and without approach or collision. In one locality, and among his own relatives and friends, he seemed to be a bachelor possessing considerable wealth; at the head of a respectable business; occupying rooms with his sister and with others during much of the period; and if not always at home, yet not so frequently absent as to arouse suspicion or remark. In another locality in the same city, but perhaps in an humbler neighborhood, he appears as John Baker; living with the plaintiff as his wife; introducing her as such; called uncle by her nephew, and deemed father by her daughter; paying her bills and expenses; furnishing her with the food and shelter which he shared; nursing her through severe and continued illness; seldom absent at night; attending her mother's funeral as one of the family of mourners; the intercourse creating no scandal, but reputed to be virtuous and respectable, and that of husband and wife. It is over this cohabitation, and its true character and meaning, that the controversy arises. . . .

The reputation attending this cohabitation in the neighborhood where it existed and was known among those brought into its presence by relationship, business, or society, was that which ordinarily attends the dwelling together of husband and wife. It has been well described as the shadow cast by their daily lives. (1 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, § 438.) In the general repute surrounding them, the slow growth of months and years, the resultant picture of forgotten incidents, passing events, habitual and daily conduct, presumably honest because disinterested, and safer to be trusted because prone to suspect, we are enabled to see the character of the cohabitation, and discern its distinctive features. It is for that reason that such general repute is permitted to be proven. It sums up a multitude of trivial details. It compacts into the brief phrase of a verdict the teaching of many incidents and the conduct of years. It is the average intelligence drawing its conclusions. . . .

The defendants were permitted to prove, under repeated objections and exceptions, that Jacob Badger was reputed to be a bachelor and unmarried. This proof was given by persons who were his friends and acquaintances, but who knew nothing of the plaintiff, were unconscious of her existence, and in total ignorance of her cohabitation with the decedent. The repute thus proven was not the product of the cohabitation, and did not tend to explain it, or solve its character. It could not by possibility bear upon it. It was not its shadow, for it cast none into the locality where these witnesses were. . . . The life of John Baker in McDougal street was ambiguous, in the sense that it might indicate an illicit intercourse or a matrimonial connection. To ascertain which, the shadow it cast upon surrounding society could be examined and studied usefully for the solution of the doubt. The life of Jacob Badger in Joralemon street was not ambiguous at all, and needed no help to solve its character. It is, indeed, said that the purpose was to show a divided repute, and so contradict the reputation of marriage, which to be effective must be general. But the general repute proved, and that required to be shown, does not and cannot go beyond the range of knowledge of the cohabitation. If within that range there is division as to the character of the fact, the divided repute merely continues the ambiguity and determines nothing.

In Clayton v. Wardell (4 N. Y. 230), the divided repute was of a marriage, among some friends, and a disreputable connection, among others; thus negativing a general repute of connubial intercourse among those having knowledge of the cohabitation. In Commonwealth v. Stump (53 Penn. St. 135), the reputation shown related to the parties and their association, and was that they were not married. . . . In Lyle v. Ellwood (L. R. 19 Eq. Cas. 98), the repute was divided, and that of marriage allowed to prevail, but it was among those cognizant of the cohabitation and having reference to it as a fact to be explained. We have been able to find no case where such evidence as was here given, upon its admissibility being challenged by objection, has been held competent.

The evidence of reputation, when admitted, is an exception to general rules. . . . In its application to the fact of marriage it is more than mere hearsay. It involves and is made up of social conduct and recognition, giving character to an admitted and unconcealed cohabitation. But, in its application to a man living in appearance a single life, it adds nothing to that fact, it creates no further contradiction to an intercourse carried on elsewhere under the appearance of matrimony, and throws no additional light upon it. It amounts to bare hearsay, and the unsworn declarations of persons knowing nothing of the facts in controversy. In the present case twenty-three different witnesses were allowed to testify to the reputation of the decedent as a bachelor, not one of whom before his death had seen or heard of the plaintiff, or known of her connection with him. We do not think this evidence was admissible. Its very volume and frequency indicates the dangerous effect it may have produced upon the mind of the Court, and we cannot disregard the error. . . .

The judgment should be reversed, and new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

All concur.

ANDREWS, Ch. J., MILLER and TRACY, JJ., concurring in result.

Judgment reversed.

408. BLAND v. BEASLEY

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA. 1906

140 N. C. 628; 53 S. E. 443

APPEAL from Superior Court, Pender County; COUNCILL, Judge.

Action by J. T. Bland and others against L. A. Beasley and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Civil action to recover land. The plaintiffs derive title by mesne conveyances under a grant from the State to William and James Hall dated December 22, 1819. The question at issue was one chiefly of boundary, and depended to a great extent on the correct location of this grant. The description was said to begin on "a pine, Abram Hall's corner." As an aid to the true location of this corner, the plaintiffs put in evidence a grant to Abram Hall dated May, 1816, which was said to "begin at a pine on Halsey's line," and as a further circumstance tending to show that the beginning corner of his grant was located as claimed by the plaintiffs, it became material, certainly relevant, to show that the beginning corner of this Abram Hall grant was at a pine in "Halsey's line," and in this way the existence and correct placing of this "Halsey line" became relevant. For that purpose the surveyor (Colvin) in the course of his examination by the plaintiffs was asked: "Q. — Do you know where the Halsey line is? A. — I only know what people say. Q. — What indicates the Halsey line on the map? A. — The line A, D, K, 43, 42, and from 42 back to A. Q. — Did you ever run that patent except in 1884? A. — No. Q. — How long have you known that line by general reputation as the Halsey line? A. — Since 1884. The eastern end of the line is at A. The western end is at K." To all and each of these questions and answers, except the first, the defendants excepted. On cross-examination, touching this Abram Hall patent and Halsey line, the same witness made answer to questions as follows: "Q. — Who first told you, since the survey began, that that was the Halsey line from 30 to the ditch branch, and from A to K? A. — All I know is from the survey. Q. — You say Jim Cowan is the only man you ever heard say that was the Halsey line? A. — Yes." Jim Cowan was living, and a witness in the case. The defendants then moved to strike out the testimony of this witness as to reputation of the location of the Halsey line. The motion was denied and the defendants excepted. The evidence was admitted as substantive evidence on the location of the Halsey line. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants excepted and appealed.

Stevens, Beasley & Weeks and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellants. Jas. O. Carr, J. D. Kerr, and E. K. Bryan, for appellees.

HOKE, J. (after stating the case). The correct placing of the Halsey line was a fact pertinent to the issue, but if the plaintiffs considered this material to the case they should have established it by proper testimony. It is contended by the plaintiffs that common reputation is admissible on questions of boundary, that the testimony above set out is of that character and the rulings of the Court concerning it can be sustained on that ground. It is true that evidence of both hearsay and common reputation is received with us in cases of disputed private boundary. But this is an exception to the general rule, which requires that the rights of ligitants must be determined on sworn testimony. Such testimony, in England, is not admitted in questions of private right, and the principle was only adopted here from necessity, and where, from lapse of time or changing conditions, it has become "difficult, if not impossible," that better evidence should be had. Speaking of such testimony (hearsay) in Sasser v. Herring, 14 N. C. 342, HENDERSON, J., says:

"It is the well established law in this State. And if the propriety of the rule was now res integra, perhaps the necessity of the case, arising from the situation of our country, and the want of self-evident termini of our lands would require its adoption. For although it sometimes leads to falsehood, it more often tends to the establishment of truth. From necessity, we have in this instance sacrificed the principles upon which the rules of evidence are founded."

While such testimony is thus received of necessity, it should be confined to the reasonable requirements of the necessity that called it forth, and the rules and limitations for safeguarding its application should be carefully observed. In Hemphill v. Hemphill, 138 N. C. 504, the Court in speaking of this character of evidence said:

"It is the law of this State that, under certain restrictions, both hearsay evidence and common reputation are admissible on questions of private boundary."

Citing Sasser v. Herring, 14 N. C. 340, Shaffer v. Gaynor, 117 N. C. 15, 23 S. E. 154, and Yow v. Hamilton, 136 N. C. 357, 48 S. E. 782. And in the same opinion, speaking of the restrictions placed upon evidence of common reputation, the Court said:

"'This reputation whether by parol or otherwise should have its origin at a time comparatively remote and always 'ante litem motam.' Second, It should attach itself to some monument of boundary or natural object, or be fortified by evidence of occupation and acquiescence tending to give the land some fixed and definite location."

Citing Tate v. Southard, 8 N. C. 45, Dobson v. Finley, 53 N. C. 496, Mendenhall v. Cassells, 20 N. C. 43, Westfelt v. Adams, 131 N. C. 379, and Shaffer v. Gaynor, 117 N. C. 15.

Applying the principles set forth in these cases, we are of the opinion that the testimony of the witness Colvin on the matter in question does not comply with the conditions required for its reception. Here, the true location of the Halsey line had become a relevant circumstance, and, granting for the present that the statement of this witness amounts to evidence of common reputation, this line as shown by the plat was one boundary line of a large tract of land lying adjacent to the land in dispute. No deed covering this tract of land is introduced, no monument or natural object is shown as marking the boundary of this tract, and no occupation or possession of any such tract by Halsey, or any of his descendants or grantees, is established tending to give it any fixed or definite location. As said by DANIEL, J., in Mendenhall v. Cassells, 20 N. C. 45:

"In a country recently and of course thinly settled, and where the monuments of boundaries were neither so extensively known nor so permanent in their nature as in the country of our ancestors, we have from necessity departed somewhat from the English rule as to traditionary evidence. We receive it in regard to private boundaries, but we require that it should either have something definite to which it can adhere, or that it should be supported by proof of correspondent enjoyment and acquiescence. A tree, line, or watercourse may be shown to have been pointed out by persons of a bygone generation as the true line or watercourse called for in an old deed or grant. A field, house, meadow, or wood may be shown to have been reputed the property of a particular man or family, and to have been claimed, enjoyed, and occupied as such. But a mere report, unfortified by evidence of enjoyment or acquiescence, that a man's paper title covers certain territory, is too slight and unsatisfactory to warrant a rational and conscientious person in making it the basis of a decision affecting important rights of his fellow men, and therefore, as far as we are advised, has never been received as competent testimony."

And, in reference to the time, it has been held in this State that in order to admit evidence of general reputation, unlike hearsay in this particular, it is not necessary to show that such reputation had its origin in the declarations of persons who are dead. Dobson v. Finley, supra. But the decisions are also to the effect that, to justify the reception of such evidence, the time at which the common reputation had its origin should be at a remote period. "Comparatively remote" is the term used in Hemphill's Case, supra. It was so used for the reason that, as the principle was established of necessity, when from changing conditions and the absence of permanent monuments, better evidence of boundary could not be procured; so the time may vary to some extent, as the facts and circumstances may show that the necessity does or does not exist. On the admission of such testimony as to the time required, and the test to be applied, it is held in Nieman v. Ward, 1 Watts & S. (Pa.) 68, that: "Reputation and hearsay is such evidence as is entitled to respect when the lapse of time is so great as to render it difficult to prove the existence of original landmarks." This alleged general reputation had its origin no further back than 1884, less than 17 years before action brought. It grew out of the survey, the witness said, and on the facts and circumstances of the case we are of opinion that it is not sufficiently remote to be admitted as evidence.

2. While we have discussed the question on the idea that a general reputation has been testified to, because it was very earnestly contended that the ruling of the Court should be sustained on that principle, as a matter of fact the testimony does not make out a case of general reputation at all, and we could well hold that there was error in not striking out this portion of the evidence in accordance with the defendant's motion. The witness said he knew the line was the Halsey line from "what people said." Again, he said his knowledge grew out of the survey in 1884; and the only person he ever heard say so was Jim Cowan, who was alive and a witness in the case. This is no testimony of a general reputation, but simply the assertion of a fact by an individual who is still living. A general reputation must be the common report of the community, and while it may be established by the assertion of individuals "such assertion must be in effect the statement of the reputation." As stated in the books, "an individual declaration must thus appear to be the result of a received reputation, and the individual declarant is thus merely the mouthpiece of the reputation." 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 139; 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1584 — both authors citing Wood, Baron, in Moseley v. Davis, 11 Price 180.

There was error in admitting the testimony, and a new trial is awarded.

New trial.

409. Bucklin v. State. (1851. Ohio. 20 Oh. 23). Caldwell, J. The term "character," when more strictly applied, refers to the inherent qualities of the person, rather than to any opinion that may be formed or expressed of him by others. The term "reputation" applies to the opinion which others may have formed and expressed of his character. So that, as has been remarked in some of the books, when treating on this subject, a man's "character" may really be good when his "reputation" is bad, and, on the other hand, his "reputation" may be good when his "character" is bad. But, as we have before intimated, the terms when used in connection with this subject are generally used in contradiction to this distinction, — the term "general character" being used in legal signification, as it is frequently used in common parlance, to express the opinion that has generally obtained of a person's character, — the estimate the community generally has formed of it. When you ask a witness, then, in this sense of the term, what a man's "general character" is for truth and veracity, he is called on to answer as to what opinion is generally entertained and expressed of him by those acquainted with him.

410. ATLANTIC & BIRMINGHAM R. CO. v. REYNOLDS

SUPREME COURT OF GEORGIA. 1903

117 Ga. 47; 43 S. E. 456

ACTION for damages. Before Judge DART. City Court of Douglas. May 13, 1902.

Reynolds sued the Waycross Air Line Railroad Company for damages alleged to have been sustained by him in consequence of injuries received by the falling of a telephone pole, forming a part of a telephone line owned and operated by the defendant company, which pole he, in the course of his employment by the company as a lineman, had ascended for the purpose of repairing a broken telephone wire. One of the grounds of the motion for a new trial alleges that the Court erred in "sustaining the objections of plaintiff's counsel to defendant's witnesses C. J. Hendry, John Hayes, J. B. Quarterman, and Dan Hall, testifying that, while they did not know plaintiff's reputation where he lived in Waycross, yet they were well acquainted with him and knew his general reputation up and down the Waycross Air Line Railroad, where he worked, which was bad, and from that they would not believe him on oath." Upon the trial there was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a new trial, which motion being overruled, it excepted.

J. L. Sweat, for plaintiff in error.

Leon A. Wilson and Quincey & McDonald, contra.

FISH, J. (after stating the facts as above): We think that the ground for the motion was well taken. . . . As the general reputation of a man is usually formed in the neighborhood where he spends most of his time, and most frequently comes in social and business contact with his fellowmen, it is usual to limit the inquiry as to a witness' general character to his general reputation in the neighborhood where he lives; that is, where he has his home. We do not think, however, there is any hard and fast rule which requires this to be done in every possible case. The very reason for so limiting the inquiry generally may be a good reason for allowing more latitude in an exceptional case. The reason for so limiting the inquiry generally, as already indicated, is that the place in which to ascertain a man's true reputation is the place where people generally have had the best opportunities of forming a correct estimate of his character. It is obvious that this may not, in every instance, be the neighborhood where a man's home is situated. . . . We apprehend that there may be cases in which a person has established no general reputation in the immediate neighborhood of his home, but has established such a reputation elsewhere. This may arise from the fact that his home is located in one place and his daily business or work is carried on in another, in which latter place he spends nearly all of his time, and hence is well known to people generally, while he rarely comes in social or business contact with people, outside of his family circle, in the neighborhood of his home.

That the general reputation with which a witness called to impeach another, under this section of the Civil Code, must be acquainted, before he is qualified to testify upon the subject, is not necessarily confined to general reputation in the immediate neighborhood where the witness sought to be impeached resides, is shown by the decision of this Court in Boswell v. Blackman, 12 Ga. 591. In that case the defendants in the Court below introduced two witnesses for the purpose of impeaching Burrel Blackman, a witness who had testified for the plaintiff. These two witnesses testified that they had known the witness Blackman, for the last eight or ten years, in Russell County, Alabama; that he was generally known and had a general reputation in that county. Defendants then proposed to ask these witnesses if they knew the general character of Blackman for truth and veracity in the county of Russell; the Court ruled out the question, deciding that it should be confined to the character of the witness in the neighborhood where he lived; this ruling was excepted to, and this Court held that it was erroneous; NISBET, J., who delivered the opinion, said:

"The impeachment must be by persons acquainted with the witness. And they are called to speak of his general character for truth and veracity — not the world over, or in London, or Paris, or Columbus, but in that circle where his real character is best known, to wit, in the neighborhood where he lives. Now, when a witness is generally known, and has a general reputation in a county, that county may be fairly considered his vicinage; it is fair to infer, under such circumstances, that his true character for truth is as well known in that county, as men's character for truth ordinarily is known in their neighborhood." . . .

Here, again, we see that the paramount idea is, that the witness called to impeach another must know what the general reputation of the latter is in a neighborhood or community the people of which have had good opportunities for ascertaining his true character, and that if the impeaching witness does know this, he is not disqualified to testify on the subject because he does not know what the general reputation of the other witness is in the particular neighborhood where he happens to live at the time that the attack is sought to be made upon his testimony.

In the present case, the witness sought to be impeached was a telephone lineman, who lived in Waycross, but was employed by the defendant railroad company to keep the wires and telephones of its telephone line, running along its railroad from Waycross to Fitzgerald, in proper order and condition; and we think that witnesses who did not know his general reputation in the city of Waycross, but "were well acquainted with him and knew his general reputation up and down the Waycross Air Line Railroad where he worked," were competent to testify as to his general character, and whether, from that character, they would believe him upon his oath, the weight of such testimony being a matter for the jury. . . .

Judgment reversed. By five Justices.

Topic 7. Official Statements

412. Introductory. Official statements may of course be classified from various points of view. The material one here is the implied authority of officers, which suggests something as to the admissibility of a given document. The form and the custody of the document are important. As to form, the statements may be regularly made in a series and collected in a general register or record, or they may be drawn up for each occasion as separate documents. As to custody, they may be preserved by the officer in official custody, or they may be given out to be carried away by the person wishing to use them. There thus arises three classes, in general sufficiently distinct, within which all the various sorts of documents may be subsumed, namely, Registers (or Records), Returns (including Reports), and Certificates (including Certified Copies).

A register or record differs from a return or report in that it comprises in a single volume a series of homogeneous statements, recorded by entries made more or less regularly; it differs from a certificate in that it is kept in the official custody. A return or report differs from a register in that it is a single document, made separately for each transaction as occasion arises, — perhaps filed or indexed with others, but having a separate existence of its own; usually because it deals with something done without the official precincts and therefore not so fitted for entry in a single office volume. The return differs from the certificate in that it is preserved in official custody. A further distinction, within this class, between a return proper and a report is that the former deals with something personally done or observed by the officer himself, while the latter may record the results of his investigations as to something that has occurred out of his presence. A certificate differs from a return in that it is not preserved by the official, but is given out by him to an applicant for the latter's use. It differs from a register in that it is not a series of entries in a single volume.

In general, the practical importance of this distinction of terms appears in the following ways: A register is usually authorized by implication to be kept by every officer to record his doings, and is therefore generally admissible without express authority to keep it. A return is also usually by implication authorized for any officer whose duties involve the doing of things outside of the premises of his office, — for example, a sheriff or a surveyor; yet, so far as it is merely a report — i.e. not based on personal knowledge — few officers, if any, are found vested by implication with such authority, and consequently an express authority must be sought; moreover, the number of officers whose duties necessarily authorize the making of a return proper is small. A certificate seems at common law rarely, if ever, to have been regarded as authorized by implication, and therefore an express authority must be sought in each instance. Thus, the distinction between the three classes has important consequences in determining the admissibility of the various sorts of official statements.

The terms above taken are not, it is true, employed in common usage with such precision to mark these specific distinctions; nevertheless, they are sufficiently typical.

413. Rex v. Aickles. (Nisi Prius. 1785. 1 Leach Cr. L. 3d ed. 436). Indictment for returning from transportation beyond seas within seven years after discharge from jail. It was held incumbent on the prosecutor to prove the precise day on which the prisoner was discharged; and for this purpose Mr. Newman, clerk of the papers of the prison, produced a daily book, which he kept, containing entries of the names of all the debtors and criminals who are brought into the prison, and the times when they were discharged. But it appeared that those entries were not made from Mr. Newman's own knowledge of the facts, but that he generally made them from the information of the turnkeys, and frequently from the turnkey's indorsements on the back of warrants, which warrants were afterwards regularly filed.

It was contended by the prisoner's counsel, Mr. Garrow, that these were not original entries of the facts; and therefore that the turnkey himself by whom Aickles was discharged, or the original minute from which the entry of his discharge had been made, should be produced, because they alone were the best evidence upon this subject, and it was in the prosecutor's power to produce them. It was compared to the production of a tradesman's ledger in order to prove the delivery of goods, instead of producing the original memorandum or day-book from which the ledger had been posted; and it was argued, that no credit could be given to entries made entirely from hearsay and information, and therefore they ought not to be received as evidence.

Per Curiam (admitting the book). The law reposes such confidence in public officers that it presumes they will discharge their several trusts with accuracy and fidelity; and therefore whatever acts they do in discharge of their public duty may be given in evidence and shall be taken to be true, under such a degree of caution as the nature and circumstances of each case may appear to require. . . . In the present case Mr. N. has no private interest whatsoever in this book to induce him to make factitious entries in it. He is a public officer recording a public transaction.

414. Gaines v. Relf. (1851. Federal Supreme Court. 12 How. 472, 570). Wayne, J. Such writings [those which the law requires to be kept for the public benefit] are admissible in evidence on account of their public nature, though their authenticity be not confirmed by the usual tests of truth, namely, the swearing and the cross-examination of the persons who prepared them. They are entitled to this extraordinary degree of confidence partly because they are required by law to be kept, partly because their contents are of public interest and notoriety, but principally because they are made under the sanction of an oath of office, or at least under that of official duty, by accredited agents appointed for that purpose. Moreover, as the facts stated in them are entries of a public nature, it would often be difficult to prove them by means of sworn witnesses.

Sub-topic A. Registers and Records

415. MERRICK v. WAKLEY

King's Bench. 1838

8 A. & E. 170

Case for a libel imputing mala praxis to the plaintiff as a surgeon employed to attend the poor of a parochial union under stat. 4 & 5 W.

IV, c. 76. The defendant pleaded the general issue and pleas of justification, to which the plaintiff replied de injuria, and issues were joined thereupon.

On the trial, before ALDERSON, B., at the last Herefordshire assizes, it appeared that the plaintiff, at the time in question, was employed as a medical officer of the Kington union, Herefordshire, by appointment of the guardians; and that the poor-law commissioners, acting under stat. 4 & 5 W. IV, c. 76, s. 15, had duly made rules and regulations for the government of the workhouse of the above union, prescribing, among other things, the duties of the medical officer. One of these was stated as follows: "To make a weekly return to the board of guardians in a book prepared according to the form I." (subjoined); "in which book he shall insert the date of every attendance at the workhouse, and make any reports relative to the sickness prevalent within his district which the board of guardians or the poor-law commissioners may require; and shall attend the board of guardians when summoned by them for that purpose." The plaintiff kept such a book, which was laid on the table of the guardians at their weekly meetings, to be inspected by them. The book was produced and identified at the trial; and the plaintiff's counsel proposed to read some entries in it, for the purpose of showing what had been the plaintiff's attendance upon, and treatment of, a person whose case was commented upon in the libel, and whom the plaintiff was therein alleged to have neglected. The learned judge held this evidence inadmissible for the plaintiff. A verdict was given for one farthing damages, and the learned judge certified to deprive of costs, under stat. 43 Eliz. c. 6, s. 2. In this term, Ludlow, Serjt., moved for a new trial, stating, as one ground, the rejection of the above evidence. . . . The book made up and left for inspection at the meetings of guardians, in pursuance of such rules, was admissible in evidence as a public book, kept under the direct authority of an act of parliament. It may indeed be considered as embodied in the rules, and sanctioned by the act in the same degree as they are. The entries were made before any dispute on the matters involved in this action.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord DENMAN, C. J., now delivered the judgment of the Court.

A point of evidence which arose in this case was, whether certain entries could be read from a book kept by the plaintiff as a medical officer, under rules of the poor-law commissioners, which book contained entries of professional visits, and was produced at the weekly meetings of the guardians. The endeavor was to put this document upon the same footing with the register of the Navy-office, the log-book of a man of war, the books of the Master's office, and other public books which are held to be admissible in evidence. But in these cases the entries are made by an officer in discharge of a public duty; they are accredited by those who have to act upon the statements; and they are made for the benefit of third persons. Here, it is true, the book is kept by a public officer; but no credit is given him in respect of the entries; they are merely a check upon himself. If we held this book admissible, we should make the entries of any public accountant evidence on a similar occasion. There will therefore be no rule. Rule refused.

416. KENNEDY v. DOYLE

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1865

10 All. 161

[The facts and the evidence in this case have been already given in No. 398, ante.]

GRAY, J. . . . In England, a church record of baptisms, kept by a clergyman of the Established Church, is admissible, even before his death, accompanied by evidence of the identity of the child, to prove the date of its baptism; but not the time of its birth, because the clergyman has no authority to make inquiry about the time of birth or any entry concerning it in the register: Draycott v. Talbott (3 Bro. P. C. (2d ed.) 564); May v. May (2 Stra. 1073); Wihen v. Law (3 Stark. R. 63), and other cases cited in Stark. Ev. (4th Eng. ed.) 299, note f.; Doe v. Barnes (1 M. & Rob. 389). In the Church of England, from the time of the Reformation, registers of baptisms, weddings, and burials were kept by order of the Crown as head of that church; and in the words applied by Lord Chief Baron Gilbert to the original order of Henry VIII. on this subject, "when a book was appointed by public authority it must be a public evidence." Gilb. Ev. (3d ed.) 77. . . . The English judges, adhering to the principle of admitting in evidence as public documents those registers only which the law required to be kept, have considered all others as mere private memoranda, and have refused to admit registers regularly kept by dissenters unless supported by the testimony of the person keeping them by other witnesses: Birt v. Barlow (1 Doug. 171); Newham v. Raithby (1 Phillim. R. 315); Ex parte Taylor (1 Jac. & Walk. 483; s. c. 3 Man. & Ry. 430 n.); Doe v. Bray (8 B. & C. 813; s. c. 3 Man. & Ry. 428); Whittuck v. Waters (4 C. & P. 375). Vice Chancellor SHADWELL refused even to admit an entry in the register of the Roman Catholic chapel of the Sardinian ambassador in London as evidence of the baptism of the ambassador's son; D'Aglie v. Fryer (13 Law Journal, N. S. Ch. 398). "The principle on which entries in a register are admitted," said Mr. Justice ERLE in a recent case, "depends upon the public duty of the person who keeps the register to make such entries in it, after satisfying himself of their truth." Doe v. Andrews (15 Q. B. 759).

Almost two centuries before the passage of the statute of Will. IV., the founders of the Massachusetts Colony, though not less attached than other Englishmen to their own forms of religious worship, had the wisdom to perceive that it was more important for the civil government to preserve exact records of the dates of births and deaths, than of religious ceremonies from which they might be imperfectly inferred; and that the importance of recording those facts did not depend on the particular creed or church government of the individual, but applied equally to the whole people. They accordingly left the baptism of the living and the burial of the dead to the churches; but by an ordinance of 1639 enacted "that there be records kept of the days of every marriage, birth and death of every person within this jurisdiction;" and similar statutes have been ever since in force in Massachusetts. The record of a marriage by the justice of the peace or minister, or the town clerk's or registrar's record of births, marriages, and deaths, kept as required by these statutes, or a duly certified copy of either, is held competent evidence; 2 Dane Ab. 296; Milford v. Worcester (7 Mass. 56); Commonwealth v. Norcross (9 Mass. 492). . . . Similar decisions have been made in other States, generally upon the ground of the record having been kept in the performance of a duty imposed by law; and those cases, in the reports of which no statute is referred to, may yet have controlled by statute. . . .

It is perfectly true that in this Commonwealth the law makes no distinction between different sects of Christians, and the record of a Roman Catholic priest is of no less weight as evidence than that of a Congregational, or Protestant Episcopal, or any other minister. But our law not requiring any record of baptisms, the church book offered in evidence in this case, not having been kept under any requirement of law, was not a public record, and would not, had the priest who made the entries been still alive, have been admissible in evidence, unsupported by his testimony.[1]

418. HISTORY.[2] No general system of registration of deeds was ever adopted in England down to the end of the 1800s. But statutes of a narrow scope had existed for several centuries. These statutes, seven in substance, covered, first,

[1] [The remainder of the opinion, on another rule of law, is printed ante, No. 398.]

[2] [Abridged from the present Compiler's "Treatise on Evidence" (1905), Vol. III, § 1650.]

all deeds in the ancient form of bargain and sale, and, next, all deeds whatever in the counties of York and Middlesex and certain Crown lands. In some of them a means of probate by witnesses before the registrar was provided for, and in some of these the grantor's acknowledgment was also sanctioned; in two alone (the North Riding of York and Crown lands) was it expressly declared that the registry-copy should be admissible to prove (apparently) the deed's execution, and this only where the original was accidentally destroyed. There was therefore ample opportunity for the judicial development of a principle to test the admissibility of such registers as evidence of the recorded deed's execution. But the rulings unfortunately present only a perplexing conflict. Up to the middle of the 1700s, it may be gathered that the enrolment or registry of a deed belonging to the class authorized or required to be enrolled was regarded as admissible. But it was otherwise for deeds enrolled (as was not uncommon, for example, for safe custody in a court) without statutory authority (although even for these last, the enrolment was receivable as against the party enrolling, because it virtually contained his admission). This much is clearly laid down in accordance with strict and straightforward principle, by Chief Baron Gilbert, writing in the early 1700s:

Gilbert, C. B. Evidence (ante 1726), p. 24, 97: "Where the deed needs enrolment, there the enrolment is the sign of the lawful execution of such deed, and the officer appointed to authenticate such deeds by enrolment is also empowered to take care of the fairness and legality of such deeds. . . . But where a deed needs no enrolment, there, though it be enrolled, the inspeximus of such enrolment is no evidence; because since the officer hath no authority to enrol them, such enrolment cannot make them public acts."

Nevertheless, by the beginnings of the 1800s the rulings bear increasingly against that proposition. By the end of the first half of the 1800s the opinion seems clearly to prevail in England that it is not the law; as the following passage indicates:

Thomas Starkie. Evidence (1824) p. 412: "It would be manifestly inconsistent with the plainest principles of justice to admit such enrolments to be evidence against those who have not acknowledged them, without proof of the execution of the deeds; . . . and although it appears that an opinion once prevailed to this effect, yet it seems to be so destitute of principle that it is not probable it would now be acted upon."

But the rule of Chief Baron Gilbert was to our early judges an inherited common-law principle, and is constantly thus referred to in their opinions. At an early date there had grown up a general registry-system in the colonies and the original States. In every jurisdiction where the inquiry came before the Courts, the conclusion was reached that the register was admissible, on common-law principles, as evidence of the execution and contents of the recorded deed.[1] In

[1] Womack v. Hughes (1821. Kentucky. Litt. Sel. C. 291, 294). Mills, J. The Acts directing the mode of recording deeds do not direct that they shall thereafter be given in evidence in any court on the trial of an issue without any other proof than the ex parte authentication which entitles it to a place on its own record; nor is there any statutory provision which so directs, within the recollection of the Court. But the common-law principle relative to enrolled deeds has been uniformly applied by this Court to deeds recorded according to our statutes.

It is not, however, every placing a deed upon record which makes it a record only a few of the earlier States was this result expressly provided for by statute. But as time went on, and other States were formed, express statutory declarations became common; and now in almost every jurisdiction such provisions exist. For judicial rulings, then, the field is now restricted chiefly to two classes of questions, — the kind of document thus provable, and the regularity of the recording under the statutory requirements.

The statutes usually point out the officer or Court before whom the deed is to be acknowledged, what the acknowledgment shall consist of, and how and to whom it shall be certified, and they are equally positive as to the time in which the different acts shall be done. Within these periods the recording officers have authority to record the instrument; afterwards, such authority ceases.

casual ejector, and C. B. Shivey, tenant in possession, for lot number 366 in said county. Plaintiff's counsel read in evidence a grant of said lot from the State to Eady, dated January 15, 1821. They then produced an affidavit by said Smith, "that the title deeds composing the chain of title from the owners and as they are recorded are not in his possession, power or custody, that he has made diligent search and inquiry and has been unable to find them; hence he believes they are lost or destroyed;" and an affidavit from said Sarah A. Cook, stating, "that the deeds that appear on record in the Clerk's office of said county, to lot of land number 366, in the 26th district, the lot for which the said S. A. Cook, executrix, and Thomas J. Smith, are suing C. B. Shivey, in an action of ejectment, are not in her possession, and, as she believes, are lost or destroyed and she makes this affidavit that copies of the same from the records may be used in said case."

Thereupon, plaintiff's attorneys offered in evidence copies of deeds to said lot, duly certified from the records, from Eady to Thomas Broddus, from Broddus to David Merriwether and others, a deed from them, the heirs of Broddus, to said Smith, and from Smith to said Cook. Defendant's counsel objected to these copies; and they were rejected, upon the ground (as was said in argument) that there was no proof that such original deeds had ever existed.

McCay, J.— We think the Court erred in rejecting the copy deeds. The affidavits conformed strictly to the forty-second rule of Court.

It is true, there was nothing in the affidavits affirming, directly, the existence and genuineness of the originals. We are of the opinion that this was proven prima facie, by the certified copies from the record. . . . Why should not the existence of a proper record be evidence of the existence and contents of a lost original? To go to record, a deed must be probated, either executed or acknowledged before a magistrate, or proven by the affidavit of one of the witnesses. The very object of the record is to preserve a copy of the deed to be used if the original is lost or destroyed; and it would largely lessen the uses of a record if it were necessary before it could be used to prove the existence of the original by any other evidence. . . . Unless there be forgery or false swearing, nothing but a genuine existing deed can go upon the record properly, and the copy will show upon its face if the requirements of the statute have been complied with. We recognize fully the rule that the genuineness and existence of an original must be shown before the contents of it can be shown by secondary evidence. But in our judgment this is done by evidence that there is a duly executed record of what purported to be an original duly probated according to law.

The cases referred to, 13 Ga. 515, 14 Ga. 185, 16 Ga. 268, and 30 Ga. 391, do not support the position of the plaintiff in error. In Jones v. Morgan, 16 Ga. 515, the deed had not been properly recorded, it did not purport to have been delivered, and this court put its decision rejecting the copy, on that ground. The case in 30 Ga. 391 turned upon the same principle; the copy produced, showed a deed executed by two witnesses, neither of them a magistrate and there was no probate. This want of a proper probate was the ground on which the court put both those cases, and so far from being against the position we take, they are authorities in favor of it, — since both cases admit that if the deed had been properly recorded, the copies would have been admissible.

The other cases referred to were not copies of records, and only establish, what is without doubt the law, that the existence and genuineness of an original must be proven.

More especially is this use of a copy of the record proper under our law. The opposite party can always force upon the producer of even an original deed the proof of its execution, by making the affidavit required by section 2670 of the Code. He can thus do away with the effect of the record. He can force the actual proof of existence and genuineness of a lost, or destroyed original, in case like the present, in the same manner. Until that affidavit is made, we hold that the existence and genuineness of the original deeds, as well as their contents, is proven by the production of a copy from the record of duly probated and recorded originals: See Code, § 2671.

Upon the other point we express no opinion, as we think a new trial ought to be had, on the first point.

421. WILCOX v. BERGMAN

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1905

96 Minn. 219; 104 N. W. 955

APPEAL from District Court, Pine County; F. M. CROSBY, Judge.

Action by C. H. Wilcox against Christina C. Bergman and August Bergman. Judgment for defendant. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. D. Austin and Robert C. Saunders, for appellant. Gjertsen & Lund, for respondents.

BROWN, J.— This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged fraud of defendants in conveying certain property to a third person after having previously conveyed it by warranty deed to plaintiff. The complaint alleges, among other things, that the defendant Christina Bergman was on the 10th day of August, 1900, the owner of the land mentioned, and that she and her husband, defendant August Bergman, for a valuable consideration, conveyed the same by warranty deed to plaintiff; that by inadvertence plaintiff neglected to record the deed in the office of the register of deeds, as required by the laws of the state of North Dakota, where the land was located; that thereafter, in February, 1902, defendants conveyed the same land by warranty deed to one A. L

Beggs, an innocent purchaser for value and without notice of the prior deed; and that Beggs in turn conveyed to one Rickords, who was also an innocent purchaser for value and without notice of the deed to plaintiff. Both the later deeds were, the complaint alleges, duly recorded in the proper office of the register of deeds of North Dakota. The complaint also alleges that provision is made by the statutes of the State of North Dakota for the record of all deeds and other instruments affecting the title to real property located in that State, and that by reason of the record of the deeds to Beggs and Rickords plaintiff has been wholly deprived of the property conveyed to him by his unrecorded deed. The answer is a general denial. When the case came on for trial plaintiff offered in evidence the deed claimed to have been executed and delivered to him by defendants, which was received over defendants' objection, and then offered a copy of the deeds to Beggs and Rickords, properly certified by the register of deeds of Dickey county, N.D., wherein they were recorded. These documents were objected to on the ground that "there is no statute in Minnesota authorizing the introduction in evidence of recorded title in a foreign State by certified evidence," and on the further ground that the evidence was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not the best evidence. The objection was sustained, whereupon plaintiff rested his case, and on motion of defendants it was dismissed for failure on the part of plaintiff to prove the allegations of his complaint. Thereafter plaintiff moved for a new trial, and appealed from an order denying it.

The only question presented for consideration upon this appeal is whether the Court below erred in excluding the certified copies of the North Dakota records. . . .

The Constitution of the United States (article 4, § 1) provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State, and that Congress may prescribe the manner in which such acts and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof. In 1790, by authority of this provision of the Constitution, Congress prescribed the manner in which judicial acts and proceedings might be proven in the Courts of the several States, but made no provision respecting the proof of other records. Section 906, Rev. St. U. S. [post, No. 439], covering all records other than those of a judicial character, was enacted in 1804. . . . There is no question in the case at bar that the records here sought to be introduced in evidence were properly authenticated as required by this act of Congress; but, as already stated, there was no offer of the statutes of North Dakota, from which the records came, either showing that such records were there provided for, or showing the effect given to properly authenticated copies as evidence in that State. We have no statute in this State under which certified copies of documents, not of a judicial nature, coming from a sister State, may be used as evidence in our Courts. Judicial records are provided for, but records of that nature only (Gen. St. 1894, § 5706); and the question presented is whether the act of Congress is valid as a rule of evidence by which the Courts of this State are controlled.

Whether Congress may establish a rule of evidence for State Courts, and whether the act of Congress just referred to is binding upon the Courts of the several States, is a question that has been more or less discussed by the various State Courts. By the later authorities the rule is laid down that the act of Congress is a valid exercise of the powers given by the Constitution, and binding on the State Courts. The better opinion is that the act of Congress should be sustained, not only because authorized by the Constitution, but for the further reason that it establishes a uniform, definite, and certain rule by which official records in the several States may be shown. If the record of instruments be provided for by the laws of the several States, and certified copies thereof made evidence in the State where made, either by statute or rule of court, no reason occurs to us why the act of Congress should not be applied and enforced by the Courts of all other States. Its enactment was clearly within the terms of the Constitution, for authority is there conferred to prescribe rules of evidence, not only with reference to judicial acts and records, but all other official records. The question recently came before the Supreme Court of New Jersey (Chase v. Caryl, 57 N. J. Law, 545, 31 Atl. 1024), where it received a very thorough and careful consideration, and the act of Congress was held controlling in that State. A large number of authorities are collected and analyzed, and we refer to it as a complete answer to every objection that may be raised against the operation and validity of the act. See, also, 2 Elliott on Evidence, § 1349; 1 Jones on Evidence, § 551; 3 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1648; 17 Cyc. 323 et seq., and cases cited.

But to render copies of such records competent evidence under the act of Congress in the Courts of other States it must appear (1) that the statutes of the States in which the record was made provided for and authorized it, and (2) the force and effect given to such evidence in the Courts of that State. In the absence of such showing, copies are incompetent and inadmissible. While the decisions of the Courts and text-writers are not, perhaps, in entire harmony upon this subject, it occurs to us that the act of Congress will permit of no other view. The act declares that properly authenticated records shall have such force and effect given them in every Court within the United States as they have by the law of the State from which they are taken. In cases like the case at bar, when by the pleadings the execution of the instrument, a copy of which is offered in evidence, is in issue, the original document is the best evidence, and must be produced, unless by some statute or rule of court of the State from which it is taken a certified copy of the record thereof prima facie establishes that fact. But there is no presumption that such effect is given to copies of records in another State. At least, this Court has held that no judicial notice will be taken of the statutory law of a sister jurisdiction. Myers v. Ry. Co., 69 Minn. 476. In this State a certified copy is received in evidence with like force and effect as the original, and prima facie proves the execution of the original. Gen. St. 1894, § 5733; Ellingboe v. Brakken, 36 Minn. 156. But we cannot presume that such rule obtains in North Dakota.

The question has come before several of the leading State courts, where the subject is not expressly covered by local statutes, and the rule here indicated had been laid down and followed. Florsheim v. Fry, 109 Mo. App. 487. . . . In Garrigues v. Harris, 17 Pa. 344, it was held that the record of a mortgage of land in New Jersey, though but an abstract of the mortgage, the record being according to the laws of New Jersey, is competent evidence in Pennsylvania, when authenticated according to the act of Congress. "We are required to take judicial notice that the recording of an 'abstract' of a mortgage is all that there is there enjoined, and that a certified copy of that record is competent evidence in that State." The case goes further than the authorities generally will warrant. At least the decisions of our State, as already suggested, are to the effect that no presumption exists that the statutes of foreign States are the same as our own. The common law is presumed to be the same in all States, but not the statutes. Crandall v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 83 Minn. 190. . . . In Lee v. Mathews, 10 Ala. 682, it was held that, to authorize the certified copy of the deed by the public register of Halifax county, N. C., to be read in evidence, it was necessary to prove by the law of that State that such instruments were required to be recorded. See, also, 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1652. . . .

Our conclusion is that, to render certified copies of records from a sister State competent evidence in the Courts of this State, it must be shown that the statutes of that State provided for and authorized the record to be made, and also the particular force and effect given to certified copies as evidence in the Courts of that State. And, for the reason that there was no proof of the statutes of North Dakota in the case at bar, the objection to the introduction of the copies was properly sustained. We are not aware of any rule of evidence at common law under which certified copies of foreign records of the character of these here mentioned are admissible in evidence in the absence of proof of the statutes under which they were made. . . . Order affirmed.

423. ELLICOTT v. PEARL

Supreme Court of the United States. 1836

10 Pet. 412

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States, for the district of Kentucky. The plaintiffs in error, citizens of the State of Maryland, on the 17th day of January, 1831, sued out of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Kentucky, a writ of right against William Pearl, for a tenement containing one thousand acres of land, in the county of Laurel, in the State of Kentucky. . . . At May Term, 1834, the case was tried by a jury, who returned into court the following verdict: "We, the jury, find that the tenant has more right to have the tenement, as he now holds it, than the demandants to have it;" and the Circuit Court gave judgment for the tenant accordingly. . . .

On the trial of the case, the following bill of exceptions was filed: . . . The tenants, in order to prove the boundaries of the demandants' land, as laid down in the plat, and claimed by them; gave in evidence the original plats and certificates of survey of Kincaid's two thousand and one thousand acre tracts; and then examined M'Neal, a witness of the demandants, who was first introduced to prove their boundary: who stated that the water courses, as found on the ground, did not correspond with those represented on the said plats: and after being examined by the demandants, for the purpose of proving that the marks on the trees, claimed by them as the corner and lines of their surveys, were as ancient as the said surveys, and also as to the position and otherwise of the lines and corners claimed by them, and represented on the plat made and used at the trial: stated, on the cross-examination of the tenants' counsel, that some of the lines, marked to suit the calls of the said surveys, appeared to be younger, and others, from their appearance, might be as old as the date of the said plats. The demandants, to counteract this evidence, and to sustain their claim, offered in evidence a survey, made out by M'Neal, in an action of ejectment formerly depending between the same parties for the same land, of which survey Pearl had due notice. The tenants objected to the reading of the explanatory report accompanying this survey, and the Court refused to allow so much thereof as stated the appearance as to age and otherwise of the lines and corners to go in evidence to the jury; and accordingly caused to be erased from the plat the words following, viz. "ancients" (chops); — "John Forbes, Jun., states he cut the same letters and figures;" — "on the east side, the chops appear to have been marked with a larger axe, than the chops on the beginning tree;" — and then permitted the residue of the report and plat to go in evidence. This constitutes the third exception of the demandants. . . .

The case was argued by Mr. Underwood, and by Mr. Hardin, for the plaintiffs in error. No counsel appeared for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the Court.

We are of opinion, that there was no error in this refusal of the Court.

The evidence was inadmissible upon general principles. It was mere hearsay. The survey, made by a surveyor, being under oath [of office] is evidence as to all things which are properly within the line of his duty. But his duty is confined to describing and marking on the plat the lines, corners, trees, and other objects on the ground, and to subjoin such remarks as may explain them. But in all other respects, and as to all other facts, he stands, like any other witness, to be examined on oath in the presence of the parties and subject to cross-examination. . . . It has never been supposed that if in such a survey the surveyor should go on to state collateral facts, or declarations of the parties, or other matters not within the scope of his proper official functions, he could thereby make them evidence as between third persons. . . .

424. UNITED STATES LIFE INSURANCE CO. v. VOCKE

Supreme Court of Illinois. 1889

129 Ill. 557; 22 N. E. 463

Appeal from the Appellate Court for the First District; — heard in that court on appeal from the Superior Court of Cook County; the Hon. Kirk Hawes, Judge, presiding.

This was assumpsit, originally brought by Elizabeth Kielgast, administratrix of the estate of Otto Wilhelm Kielgast, deceased, against the appellant, to recover upon a policy of life insurance on the life of the intestate. The policy was dated July 22, 1884, and contained, among other things, a condition that if, within three years of said date, the insured should die by any act of self-destruction, whether voluntary or involuntary, whether sane or insane, the contract of insurance should become null and void. The insured died January 17, 1885. The material facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Isham, Lincoln & Beale, for the appellant. . . . The certified copy of the verdict of the coroner's jury was admissible in evidence as part of these proofs. . . . Inquisitions of lunacy are admissible in evidence. . . . Inquests of office are admissible in evidence, and a coroner's inquest was, at common law, simply an inquest of office. . . .

Mr. George F. Westover, for the appellee. The proceedings before the coroner were properly excluded from the jury, because they were no part of plaintiff's proof of death of the assured. . . . The verdict at the coroner's inquest could not bind plaintiff in this case. . . .

Mr. Justice Craig delivered the opinion of the Court: . . .

It appears that a coroner's inquest was held over the body of the deceased by the coroner of Cook county and a jury, and in making proofs of death a certified copy of the record of the coroner's inquest, consisting of the inquisition and the deposition of three witnesses, was returned to the insurance company as a part of the proofs of death. The inquisition shows on its face that Kielgast came to his death on the 17th day of January, 1885; that the death was caused by a pistol shot fired by the hand of the deceased while laboring under a fit of temporary insanity. On the trial the defendant offered in evidence the certified copy of the inquisition, which had been returned to defendant as a part of the proofs of death. The Court excluded the evidence. The defendant then offered in evidence the original papers of which those previously offered were copies, offering the entire set of papers together, including the verdict and testimony. This evidence was also excluded. The defendant excepted to the decision of the Court in excluding the evidence so offered, and the determination of the ruling of the Court on the evidence is the principal question presented by the record. . . .

We shall not stop to inquire whether the Court erred in excluding the offered evidence as a part of the proofs of death. But we will proceed at once to determine the question whether the inquisition was competent evidence for the defendant, under its special plea, tending to prove that Kielgast came to his death by his own hand.

The office of coroner, at the common law, is an ancient one. . . . Blackstone says, (1 Blackstone's Com. 348): "The office and power of a coroner are also, like those of a sheriff, either judicial or ministerial, but principally judicial. This is in great measure ascertained by statute 4 Edw. I, 'de officio coronatoris,' and consists, first, in inquiring, when any person is slain, or dies suddenly, or in prison, concerning the manner of his death. And this must be 'super visum corporis,' for, if the body be not found, the coroner can not sit." . . .

The earliest English statute relating to coroners was passed in the fourth year of Edward I, and it is said by Jarvis on Coroners, 29, that it was merely directory, and in affirmance of the common law. The first act of the Legislature of this State regulating the duties of coroners was passed March 2, 1819. The next statute was passed January 20, 1821. (Laws of 1821, p. 22.) This act, upon an examination, will be found to be substantially like the statute of 4 Edw. I. Our present statute does not differ materially from the earlier acts. . . . Section 21 requires the coroner to reduce to writing the testimony of each witness examined at the inquest, which testimony shall be filed by the coroner in his office and preserved. Section 22 provides that the coroner shall keep a record of each inquest. Section 26 provides that if a person implicated by the inquest is not in custody, the coroner shall apprehend and commit such person to the jail of the county, there to remain until discharged by due course of law.

The foregoing are the principal sections of the statute which relate to the inquest of the coroner, and, from the nature and character of the proceeding as it has been recognized by Courts and law writers, we must determine whether a coroner's inquest should be used as evidence in a case of this character. It will be observed that the evidence of all witnesses examined before the coroner is required to remain in his office, while the inquest must be sealed up and returned to the clerk of the circuit court of the county, where it shall be filed. Thus the inquest becomes, by force of the statute, a record of the circuit court, — a public record of the county where the inquest is held. It is a record containing the results of a public inquiry, made by a public officer under authority of law, relating to matters in which the public have an interest. Shall it be held that a public record of this character shall not be evidence, in a judicial proceeding, tending to prove the facts found to be true on the face of such record? We are not prepared to adopt a rule of that kind; moreover, we believe the weight of authority to be in favor of the admission of such evidence.

Starkie (vol. 1, p. 258,) seems to lay down the rule that an inquisition is admissible in evidence. . . . Greenleaf, (vol. 1, § 556,) in speaking of inquisitions, says:

"These are the result of inquiries, made under competent public authority, to ascertain matters of public interest and concern. They are said to be analogous to proceedings in rem, — being made in behalf of the public, — and that therefore no one can strictly be said to be a stranger to them. But the principle of their admissibility in evidence between private persons seems to be, that they are matters of public and general interest, and therefore within some of the exceptions to the general rule in regard to hearsay evidence." . . .

In the People v. Devine, 44 Cal. 542, the question arose whether the evidence of a witness taken before the coroner could be used to contradict the evidence of the same witness subsequently given on a trial in court. In considering the question it is said: . . .

"In our investigations we have not found any authority in text-books or adjudicated cases which distinguish between these and any other official proceedings taken and returned in the discharge of official duty, as to their admissibility in evidence upon the principle referred to."

See, also, Fielder v. Silk, 3 Campb. 126, and Silas v. Brown, 38 E. C. L. 601.

The citation of other authorities would seem to be unnecessary. We are satisfied, both upon principle and authority, that the coroner's inquisition was admissible in evidence. The inquisition was made by a public officer, acting under the sanction of an official oath, in the discharge of a public duty enjoined upon him by the law, and when it is returned into court, and is filed, we see no reason why it should not be competent evidence tending to prove any matter properly before the coroner which appears upon the face of the inquisition. We do not hold that such evidence is conclusive, but only that it is competent evidence to be considered. . . .

We are of opinion that the Court erred in excluding the inquisition, and for that reason the judgments of the Appellate and Superior courts will be reversed, and the cause remanded to the Superior Court for another trial. Judgment reversed.

Mr. Justice BAILEY, having heard this case in the Appellate Court, took no part in its decision here.

Separate opinion by Mr. Justice BAKER — I concur in the view of the case taken in the opinion of Mr. Justice CRAIG. . . . At common law, and in this State until the adoption of the Constitution of 1848, a coroner and his jury holding an inquest post mortem constituted a court with judicial powers. . . .

The rule which now obtains, as appears from the text-books, and also, almost without exception, from the decided cases, is that inquisitions post mortem are admissible in evidence, but are not conclusive. The general doctrine, as stated in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (§ 556), is, that these inquisitions are within the exceptions to the rule in regard to hearsay evidence, and are distinguished from other hearsay evidence in having peculiar guarantees for their accuracy, and are the results of inquiries, made under competent public authority, to ascertain matters of public interest and concern, and that no one can be considered a stranger to them. The only difficulty in respect to the admissibility in evidence of the inquisition itself, is found in the fact that section 1 of Art. 6 of the Constitution of 1870 provides that "the judicial powers, except as in this article is otherwise provided, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, circuit courts, county courts, justices of the peace, police magistrates, and in such courts as may be created by law in and for cities and incorporated towns." Said article 6 disposes of all the judicial power of the State, and completely exhausts the subject, and a coroner's inquest is not provided for therein. So it is certain that in this State, and under its present constitution, the coroner and his jury do not constitute a court, and are not clothed with judicial powers, as was the case at common law.

The inquisition not being the result of a judicial proceeding, is the old common law rule of evidence, that it is competent testimony, thereby abrogated? I think not, and am of opinion that common law principles and the analogies of the law, and the decisions of this Court, justify such conclusion. The provision found in section 1 of article 5 of the Constitution of 1848 was substantially that contained in the present Constitution. An act of March 3, 1845, made provision for an inquiry before a sheriff and a jury, into the right of parties claiming property on which the sheriff had levied an execution. In Rowe v. Bowen, 28 Ill. 116, the point was made that this inquest or trial of the right of property, created by the statute for the purpose of enabling the sheriff to interpose the verdict of a jury as his justification for selling the property or restoring it to the claimant, as the verdict might direct, had been abolished by the constitution of 1848. The Court held otherwise, and that said law was in no respect in derogation of the Constitution. . . .

So, also, at common law, inquisitions of lunacy and inquests of office are admissible in evidence, and it is not understood that the provision of our State Constitution in question has rendered them incompetent as testimony. Moreover, under our statutes, the findings, reports or schedules of various commissioners, boards and officers are either made competent evidence or prima facie evidence in express terms, or are given the legal effect of evidence. . . .

My conclusion is, that while, under the Constitution, the coroner and coroner's jury no longer compose a court with judicial powers, yet the inquisition or verdict made by them, and which is required to be returned to and filed in the office of the clerk of the Circuit Court, and which thereby becomes a record of that court, is competent testimony, and that the ruling of the trial court in the case at bar, refusing to admit in evidence the verdict of the coroner's jury which inquired into the matter of the death of Otto Wilhelm Kielgast, deceased, was erroneous, and I concur in the conclusion that for that error the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the Superior Court for another trial.

425. JONES v. GUANO CO.

94 Ga. 14; 20 S. E. 265

Complaint on note. Before Judge Fish. Lee Superior Court. March Term, 1893. The Guano Company sued Jones and Gill upon a promissory note for $1,000, dated March 9, 1891, due October 15, 1891, given for four hundred sacks of "Pride of Dooly" guano. The noted stated that the guaranteed analysis was on each sack as required by law, and that the guano was purchased on the judgment of the makers, waiving all guarantee as to its effects on crops. Defendants pleaded the general issue; failure of consideration, in that the guano was worthless and not reasonably suited for the use for which it was bought, and was of no benefit to the crops whereon it was used. . . .

On the trial plaintiff introduced the note, and closed. Gill testified that the note was given for a lot of guano bought of plaintiff, witness taking part and Jones the remainder; . . . that of the guano which the witness got he, when he used it in March or April, took a bottle full out of one of the sacks and kept it carefully locked up in his bureau; that no representative of plaintiff was present when he did so; that in July of that year he carried the bottle of guano to Atlanta and delivered it for analysis to the State commissioners of agriculture, who called the State chemist and ordered him to have it analyzed, and he took it off to analyze it. . . .

Defendants offered the certificate or document addressed to Gill, dated July 16, 1892, showing the analysis of said sample made for Gill by Payne, chemist for the department of agriculture, certified to be a true and correct copy from the records, and signed "R. T. Nesbitt, commissioner of agriculture, per W. H. Joyner, clerk." Plaintiff objected on the grounds, that the act of 1890 had not been complied with, and that the certificate had not been proved. This objection was sustained. . . .

Verdict and judgment for the amount of the note were rendered for plaintiff, and defendants excepted.

Fort & Watson and Wooten & Wooten, for plaintiffs in error. Clarke & Hooper, contra.

LUMPKIN, J.—Section 1553b of the Code declares that "a copy of the official analysis of any fertilizer or chemical, under seal of the department of agriculture, shall be admissible as evidence in any of the courts of this State, on the trial of any issue involving the merits of said fertilizer." As it requires express legislation to render any copy of an analysis of a fertilizer admissible as original evidence, necessarily the terms of the law must be fully and exactly complied with, in order to obtain the benefit of its provisions. Therefore, the analysis must be an official one, or a copy of it taken from the records of the department of agriculture cannot be introduced. As we understand our system for the inspection and analysis of commercial fertilizers, samples are taken by the inspectors, and submitted for analysis to the State chemist, who makes reports to the commissioner of agriculture, which reports are recorded in the office of the latter. Analyses thus made are official. We know of no law making official an analysis by the State chemist at the instance or request of a purchaser of fertilizers. Indeed, as we understand it, the State chemist is under no obligation to make an analysis for any private person at all. If he does so, it is simply a matter of courtesy; and although he may report an analysis thus made to the department of agriculture and it may be entered upon the records of that department, this will not give to that analysis an official character by virtue of which a copy of it will be rendered admissible as evidence in the courts.

Strictly speaking, the commissioner of agriculture should not have recorded in his department any analysis made by the State chemist, except such as the law requires the latter to make and report to that department. It follows that any analysis which is of record in the agricultural department is prima facie official, because, presumably, any analysis of fertilizers made by the State chemist and reported by him to the commissioner of agriculture is of a sample, or samples, furnished the chemist officially by an inspector of fertilizers. Therefore, unless it appears that an analysis of fertilizers made by the State chemist was of a sample received from some other source, a copy of an analysis made by him and certified under the seal of the department of agriculture is admissible in evidence under the section of the code above cited. . . .

427. Omichund v. Barker. (1744. Willes 538, 549). Willes, L. C. J. [Disapproving the latter part of the ruling in Alsop v. Bowtrell, Cro. Jac. 541, where a foreign clergyman's certificate was admitted to show not only his performance of the marriage ceremony, but also the parties' subsequent cohabitation]. For our law never allows a certificate of a mere matter of fact, not coupled with any matter of law, to be admitted as evidence. Even the certificate of the King under his sign manual of a matter of fact (except in one old case in Chancery) has been always refused. . . . Besides, it is not the best evidence that the nature of the thing will admit; but the proper and usual evidence of a fact arising beyond sea is an affidavit or deposition. . . .

428. TOWNSLEY v. SUMRALL

United States Supreme Court. 1829

2 Pet. 170

The original action was brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, as one of the firm of Thomas F. Townsley & Co., to recover the amount of a bill of exchange, drawn, at Maysville in Kentucky, on the 27th of November, 1827, by one Richard S. Waters, on Messrs. Townsley & Co., at New Orleans, at 120 days after date for $2000, payable to Sumrall or order, which had been dishonored by the drawees. . . .

The bill was drawn and remitted to New Orleans, and not being paid, was returned under protest to Kentucky, and this suit was brought. . . . The bill of exceptions stated, that the plaintiff offered in evidence the bill of exchange and the protest of the notary public at New Orleans, to which evidence the defendant objected, but the Court admitted the testimony.

Mr. Coxe, for the plaintiff in error, contended: . . .

Upon the question, whether, if a bill be drawn in Kentucky, on a person in New Orleans, the protest is, in itself, evidence of demand and refusal: in Nichols v. Webb, 8 Wheaton, 326, it was held, that the protest of a foreign bill is sufficient; but a distinction is taken between foreign bills, and those instruments in which a protest is not necessary, and therefore not the official act of the officers. In cases of inland bills the protest cannot be read. Chesmer v. Noyes, 4 Camp. 129. 2 Barn. & Ald. 696. . . .

Mr. Nicholas, for the defendant in error. . . .

The law of Kentucky requires that a bill drawn on a person out of the State shall be protested. 2 Littell's Laws, 103, 105. It not only authorizes a protest, but upon its being made, creates an additional liability for damages. Thus, therefore, the protest is by a statute, by provision, made necessary, and it becomes of course prima facie evidence of demand and refusal to pay. . . .

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the district of Kentucky. . . . The first question that arises is upon the admissibility of the protest of the notary public at New Orleans, as proof of the dishonor of the bill. The protest is for non-payment for want of funds; and it does not appear that there had been any prior protest for non-acceptance. Bills of exchange payable at a given day after date, need not be presented for acceptance at all; and payment may at once be demanded at their maturity. The objection now made does not turn upon this point, but upon the point, that the present is not a foreign, but an inland bill of exchange; being drawn in Kentucky, and payable at New Orleans in Louisiana; and that a notarial protest is not in such cases evidence of a demand and refusal of payment. We do not think it necessary in this case to decide, whether a bill drawn in one State upon persons resident in another State, within the union, is to be deemed a foreign, or an inland bill of exchange. . . . It is admitted, that in respect to foreign bills of exchange the notarial certificate of protest is of itself sufficient proof of the dishonour of a bill without any auxiliary evidence. It has long been adopted into the jurisprudence of the common law, upon the ground that such protests are required by the custom of merchants; and being founded in public convenience, they ought, everywhere, to be allowed as evidence of the facts which they purport to state. The negotiability of such bills, and the facility as well as certainty of the proof of dishonor, would be materially affected by a different course; a foreign merchant might otherwise be compelled to rely on mere parol proof of presentment and dishonor, and be subjected to many chances of delay, and sometimes to absolute loss, from the want of sufficient means to obtain the necessary and satisfactory proofs. The rule, therefore, being founded in public convenience, has been ratified by courts of law as a binding usage. But where parties reside in the same kingdom or country, there is not the same necessity for giving entire verity and credit to the notarial protest. The parties may produce the witnesses upon the stand, or compel them to give their depositions. And accordingly, even in cases of foreign bills, drawn upon, and protested in another country, if the protest has been made in the country where the suit is brought; Courts of justice sitting under the common law, require that the notary himself should be produced if within the reach of process, and his certificate is not per se evidence. This was so held by Lord ELLENBOROUGH, in Chesmer vs. Noyes, 2 Campbell's R. 129.

It is not disputed, that by the general custom of merchants in the United States, bills of exchange drawn in one State on another State, are, if dishonoured, protested by a notary; and the production of such protest is the customary document of the dishonor. It is a practice founded in general convenience, and has been adopted for the same reasons which apply to foreign bills in the strictest sense. The distance between some of these States, and the difficulty of obtaining other evidence, is far greater than between England and France, or between the continental nations of Europe, where the general rule prevails. We think upon this ground alone, the reason for admitting foreign protests would apply to cases like the present, and furnish a just analogy to govern it. . . . Wherever a protest is required to fix the title of the parties; or by the custom of merchants is used to establish a presentment or dishonour of a bill; it is competent evidence between the parties, who contract with reference to the presentment and dishonor of such bill.

Judgment affirmed.

430. KIDD'S ADMINISTRATOR v. ALEXANDER'S ADMINISTRATOR

COURT OF APPEALS OF VIRGINIA. 1823

1 Rand. 456

THE administrators of Isaac Kidd, filed their bill to enjoin a judgment obtained against them by Benjamin Alexander, on a bond executed by their intestate, as security to one John Segar. They allege that considerable payments had been made towards the discharge of the said bond; one in particular, in William Hill's bond for 106£. paid to John Scott, to whom at that time the bond aforesaid of John Segar had been transferred, though not legally assigned. . . . They therefore pray an injunction, and other relief. The injunction was awarded.

The deposition of one John Scott, a transferee, was objected to on the ground of his interest. Before his deposition was taken, Israel and John Pleasants executed a release to Scott under their seal, relinquishing all claim on the said Scott, on account of the transfer of the bond to them. The execution of this release was certified by John Gill, notary public of the State of Maryland, in the form in which notarial acts are usually executed. . . .

The chancellor referred the accounts between the parties to a commissioner, who reported a balance of $399.48, to be due from Segar and Kidd, to Israel and John P. Pleasants. Exceptions were filed, and the chancellor decreed, that the injunction should be dissolved as to the sum of $177.15, with interest, &c. (that being the balance due, after applying to the plaintiff's credit due proportion of Hill's bond, in the proceedings mentioned,) and that the injunction be perpetuated as to the residue of the said judgment. From this decree, the plaintiffs appealed.

BROOKE, J. — The Court, not deciding whether, if proved, the release in the record would be effectual to bind the late house of Israel and John P. Pleasants, is of opinion, that the certificate of the notary public, John Gill, that John P. Pleasants, partner in the late house of Israel and John P. Pleasants, acknowledged it to be his act and deed, was inadmissible evidence to prove the execution of the said release. To effect that object, the deposition of the notary public, or some equivalent testimony ought to be before the Court. In the absence of such proof, the Court is of opinion, that John Scott, the assignee of the bond in question, was an incompetent witness, and his deposition and affidavit, also inadmissible testimony. Decree reversed.

431. STATUTES. California (C. C. P. 1872, § 1948). Every private writing, except last wills and testaments, may be acknowledged or proved and certified [like conveyances of realty, and the certificate is evidence of execution].

Illinois (Rev. St. 1874, c. 30, § 35). [An instrument affecting land, duly acknowledged or proved,] whether the same be recorded or not, may be read in evidence without any further proof of the execution thereof.

Iowa (Code 1897, § 4621). Every private writing, except a last will and testament, after being acknowledged or proved and certified in the manner prescribed for the proof or acknowledgment of conveyances of real property, may be read in evidence without further proof.

432. JOHN H. WIGMORE. A Treatise on Evidence (1905. Vol. III, § 1676). Not only did the common law not recognize any officer having power to certify to the execution of an unrecorded deed or other instrument of grant or contract; but its peoples seem also to have felt a repugnance to any system of authenticating deeds in that manner; so that a long time elapsed, even after the institution of the registry system, before such an innovation was attempted. The notary, that prominent figure in the legal profession on the Continent, who draws up the

"act" for the parties and proves its execution by his certificate, is wanting in our legal history. First appearing, with the introduction of written documents, in the countries of southern Europe, he seems never to have found favor among Germanic peoples, except as a character imported with the Roman and Italian law.

In this country an occasional early statute made provision for recognizing the certificates of foreign notaries or magistrates. The habits of the civil law of Europe had been adopted from the beginning into Louisiana practice, and had also become familiar to the profession in Missouri, Texas, and California, where the French and Spanish archives of the original governments were a part of the legal sources. Moreover, in Pennsylvania, the practice was already sanctioned before the 1800s by a venturesome piece of judicial legislation. But these instances seem to have remained purely local. The doctrine of the common law, refusing to recognize such certificates, prevailed in the general understanding and practice. The codification reforms in New York, between 1830 and 1840, under the leadership of Mr. David Dudley Field, made apparently the first important attempt to introduce the broad functions of the Continental notary into our jurisprudence. The draft of those laws served as a model for the early Codes of Dakota, California, and Iowa. The lack of appurtenant traditions, and of a true notarial profession, and the loose and informal methods thus likely to prevail, were unfavorable to a wide recognition of the notary's functions and a thorough trust in his services. Yet the new system was carried by these Codes into a number of other jurisdictions, and finally found a legal recognition even in the home of the great Code champion himself. Still, however, the marks of racial tradition and cautious hesitation are easily to be traced; for the method is in several States adopted to a limited extent only, and is expressly refused sanction for commercial paper and testaments. There is no reason why the system should not with us be as extensive in scope and practice as on the Continent and in the rest of the world, provided only the administrative machinery is duly furnished and safeguarded.

433. Chief Baron GILBERT. Evidence, 11 (ante 1726). The next thing is the copies of all other records [than statutes] and they are twofold: under seal, and not under seal.

First, under seal; and these are called by a particular name, Exemplifications, and are of better credence than any sworn copy; for the Courts of justice that put their seals to the copy are supposed more capable to examine and more critical and exact in their examinations than any other person is or can be; and besides there is more credit to be given to their seal than to the testimony of any private person. . . .

Exemplifications are twofold: under the Broad [Great] Seal, or under the seal of the Court. . . . When a record is exemplified under the Great Seal, it must either be a record of the Court of Chancery, or be sent for by a certiorari into the Chancery (which is the centre of all Courts), and from thence the subjects receive a copy under the attestation of the Great Seal; for in the first distribution of the Courts, the Chancery held the Broad Seal, from whence the authority issued to all proceedings, and those proceedings cannot be copied under the Great Seal unless they come into the Court where that seal is lodged. . . .

The second sort of copies under seal are the exemplifications under the seal of the Court, and these are of higher credit than a sworn copy. . . . Seals of public credit are the seals of the King and of the public Courts of justice, time out of mind. . . . But the seals of private Courts or of private persons are not full evidence by themselves without an oath concurring to their credibility. . . .

The second sort of copies are those that are not under seal, and these are of two sorts, sworn copies, and office-copies. . . . A copy given out by the officer of the Court that is not trusted to the purpose . . . is not evidence without proving it actually examined.

434. Justice Buller. Trials at Nisi Prius, 229 (ante 1767). Here a difference is taken between a copy authenticated by a person trusted for that purpose, for there that copy is evidence without proof; and a copy given out by an officer of the court, who is not trusted for that purpose, which is not evidence without proving it actually examined. The reason of the difference is, that where the law has appointed any person for any purpose, the law must trust him as far as he acts under its authority; therefore the chirograph of a fine is evidence of such fine, because the chirographer is appointed to give out copies of the agreements between the parties that are lodged of record. . . . Therefore it is not enough to give in evidence a copy of a judgment, though it be examined by the clerk of the Treasury, because it is no part of the necessary office of clerk, for he is only intrusted to keep the records for the benefit of all men's perusal, and not to make out copies of them.

435. Appleton v. Braybrook. (1816. 6 M. & S. 37). Holroyd, J. The distinction is plain between that which proceeds from the officer in the course of his duty in the office, and that which he is not specially authorized by his office to do. . . . An exemplification is under the seal of the Court, which shows it to be the act of the Court, and it is equivalent when the act is done by an officer who has a duty cast on him for the express purpose.

436. CHURCH v. HUBBART

Supreme Court of the United States. 1804

2 Cr. 187, 198, 239

Action on policies of marine insurance; defence, that the vessels were seized by the Portuguese and condemned for illicit trade, within the exceptions of liability in the policy. To prove this defence, certain laws and proceedings were offered, with the following certificates of copy: "I, William Jarvis, consul of the United States of America, in this city of Lisbon, &c., do hereby certify to all whom it may or doth concern, that the law in the Portuguese language, hereunto annexed, dated from 18th March, 1605, is a true and literal copy from the original law of this realm of that date, prohibiting the entry of foreign vessels into the colonies of this kingdom, and as such, full faith and credit ought to be given it in courts of judicature or elsewhere. I further certify, that the foregoing is a just and true translation of the aforesaid law.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal of office, at Lisbon, this 12th day of April, 1803.

(Signed) "William Jarvis."

"Para, 27th June, 1801. D. Jono de Almeida de Mello de Castro, of the Council of State of the Prince Regent our Lord and his Minister and Secretary of State of the foreign affairs and war departments, &c., do hereby certify that the present is a faithful copy taken from the original deeds relative to the brig Aurora. In witness whereof I order this attestation to be passed and goes by me signed and sealed with the seal of my arms. Lisbon the 27th January, 1803.

(Signed) "D. Jono de Almeida de Mello de Castro."

"I, William Jarvis, Consul of the United States of America in this city of Lisbon, &c. do hereby certify unto all whom it may concern that the foregoing is a true and just translation of a copy from the proceedings against the brig Aurora, Nathaniel Shaler, master, at Para in the Brazils which is hereto annexed and attested by his Excellency Don Jono de Almeida de Mello de Castro, whose attestation is dated the 27th January, 1803.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal of office, in Lisbon, this 16th day of April, one thousand eight hundred and three. "William Jarvis."

Over objection, these documents were admitted.

Stockton, for plaintiff in error, contended that, . . . the Circuit Court erred in admitting the evidence which was objected to. It did not appear to be the sentence of a Court having competent jurisdiction. . . .

But the laws themselves are not sufficiently authenticated. They are only certified by a Secretary of State with his sign manual and private seal. They ought at least to be certified under the great seal. A private act of this country must be proved by a sworn copy compared with the roll. So of foreign laws. They must be proved as facts, by testimony in court. . . .

The sentence is not duly authenticated. Is a secretary of State a proper certifying officer of a judgment of a Court in the colonies? To ascertain what is a sufficient mode of authentication, the principles of the common law must be our guide. By that law there are only three modes: 1. Exemplification under the great seal. 2. A sworn copy proved by a person who has compared the copy with the original. 3. The certificate of an officer specially authorized ad hoc.

It has not even the seal of the Court. If the Court had no seal, that fact ought to have been proved. Why was it not certified under the great seal? One nation will take notice of the national seal of another. Why was not the American consul sworn? Of what validity is the certificate, or the seal of a consul? Why have they not produced a sworn copy of the proceedings? An American consul is not a certifying officer. The Court can take no more notice of his certificate, than that of a private person. There is no case to be found in a court of common law where it has ever been received as evidence. Buller, N. P. 226. . . .

Adams, for defendant. . . . The objection against the evidence divides itself into two branches: 1. Against the two Portuguese laws. 2. Against the sentence of condemnation by the governor at Para. . . .

1. It is said that foreign laws must be put on the footing of private laws, and must be authenticated, 1st, by an exemplification under the great seal; or, 2d, by a sworn copy from the rolls.

To this we answer, First, That the rules for the proof of foreign laws, ought not to be put upon the footing of private laws. . . . It is not the practice of all foreign governments to issue exemplifications under the great seal; or to keep their laws in rolls of parchment. It is not the practice, for instance, in Portugal, as is apparent from these laws themselves. . . . A copy from the rolls, therefore, where there are no rolls to copy; an exemplification under the great seal of Portugal, of records in the chancery of Spain, are impossible things; a party can never be required to produce them. . . .

But with all submission to the opinion of the Court, I contend, that under the circumstances of this case, the certificate of the consul was the best evidence, which in the nature of the thing could be produced, of these laws. To whom else could the parties have applied? Even in England, a copy of public acts of parliament, from the rolls, would not be furnished to individual applicants. In Portugal there is every reason to presume no such copy could be obtained. . . . And after all, when obtained, would the great seal of Portugal, or the signature of the chancellor of Portugal, have been so well known to this Court as the seal and signature of an officer of our own government residing there?

We are asked for an office copy, certified by an officer entrusted ad hoc. But why is credit given to office copies? Because the officer is publicly known; because his business to keep the records is equally notorious, and courts of justice will take notice of it. Surely this can give no credit to the office copy of a Portuguese clerk or secretary. Surely neither the name, nor office, nor trust, nor duty of a scribe in the chancery at Lisbon, can be so well known to this Court, as the consul, commissioned by the executive government of our own country.

We are called upon for a sworn copy; but by whom should the affidavit be made? By the consul, said the gentleman. And before whom? This he did not say, but it could be only before a Portuguese magistrate. And who is to authenticate the magistrate's certificate of the oath? The consul. So that in the end the authenticity of the whole transaction must depend upon the consul's certificate. . . .

2. The same reasons apply still more forcibly to the sentence of the Governor of Para. How is it possible to require that a suitor should produce an exemplification, a sworn copy or an office copy, of a document, when he is forbidden, on pain of death and confiscation, to set his foot in the country where alone those modes of authentication could be obtained? The practice of the Portuguese government appears upon the face of these papers. The Governor transmits to the Secretary of State at Lisbon the original sentence of condemnation, with the proceedings upon which it was founded. And the Secretary of State, who remains in possession of these original papers, furnishes, under his hand and seal, a copy of them to the public agent of the nation to which the condemned vessel and cargo belonged. . . .

The laws, therefore, and the sentence of the Governor, are authenticated by the best evidence which, in the nature of things, was attainable by the party.

Marshall, C. J. — To prove that the Aurora and her cargo were sequestered at Para, in conformity with the laws of Portugal, two edicts and the judgment of sequestration have been produced by the defendants in the Circuit Court. These documents were objected to on the principle that they were not properly authenticated, but the objection was overruled, and the judges permitted them to go to the jury.

The edicts of the crown are certified by the American consul at Lisbon to be copies from the original law of the realm, and this certificate is granted under his official seal. . . . In this case the edicts produced are not verified by an oath. The consul has not sworn; he has only certified that they are truly copied from the original. To give to this certificate the force of testimony it will be necessary to show that this is one of those consular functions to which, to use its own language, the laws of this country attach full faith and credit. Consuls, it is said, are officers known to the law of nations, and are entrusted with high powers. This is very true, but they do not appear to be entrusted with the power of authenticating the laws of foreign nations. They are not the keepers of those laws. They can grant no official copies of them. There appears no reason for assigning to their certificates respecting a foreign law any higher or different degree of credit, than would be assigned to their certificates of any other fact. . . . The paper offered to the Court is certified to be a copy compared with the original. It is impossible to suppose that this copy might not have been authenticated by the oath of the consul as well as by his certificate. It is asked in what manner this oath should itself have been authenticated, and it is supposed that the consular seal must ultimately have been resorted to for this purpose. But no such necessity exists. Commissions are always granted for taking testimony abroad, and the commissioners have authority to administer oaths and to certify the depositions by them taken. The edicts of Portugal, then, not having been proved, ought not to have been laid before the jury.

2. The paper offered as a true copy from the original proceedings against the Aurora, is certified under the seal of his arms by D. Jono de Almeida de Mello de Castro, who states himself to be the Secretary of State for foreign affairs, and the consul certifies the English copy which accompanies it to be a true translation of the Portuguese original. Foreign judgments are authenticated [either], 1, by an exemplification under the Great Seal, [or] 2, by a copy proved to be a true copy, [or] 3, by the certificate of an officer authorized by law, which certificate must itself be properly authenticated. These are the usual, and appear to be the most proper, if not the only, modes of verifying foreign judgments. . . . If it be true that the decrees of the colonies are transmitted to the seat of government and registered in the department of State, a certificate of that fact under the Great Seal, with a copy of the decree authenticated in the same manner, would be sufficient evidence of the verity of what was so certified, but the certificate offered to the Court is under the private seal of the person giving it, which cannot be known to this Court, and of consequence can authenticate nothing. The paper, therefore, purporting to be a sequestration of the Aurora and her cargo in Para ought not to have been laid before the jury. . . .

The judgment must be reversed with costs and the cause remanded to be again tried in the Circuit Court, with instructions not to permit the copies of the edicts of Portugal and the sentence in the proceedings mentioned, to go to the jury, unless they be authenticated according to law.

437. UNITED STATES v. PERCHEMAN

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. 1833

7 Pet. 51, 85

APPEAL from the Superior Court for the eastern district of Florida.

On the 17th of September, 1830, Juan Percheman filed in the clerk's office of the Superior Court for the eastern district of Florida, a petition, setting forth his claim to a tract of land containing two thousand acres, within the district of East Florida, situated at a place called the Ocklikwaha, along the margin of the river St. John. The petitioner stated that he derived his title to the said tract of land under a grant made to him on the 12th day of December, 1815, by Governor Estrada, then Spanish governor of East Florida, and whilst East Florida belonged to Spain. The documents exhibiting the alleged title annexed to the petition were the following: . . .

"St. Augustine, of Florida, 12th December, 1815. Whereas this officer, the party interested, by the two certificates inclosed, and which will be returned to him for the purposes which may be convenient to him, has proved the services which he rendered in the defense of this province, and in consideration also of what is provided in the royal order of the 29th March last past, which he cites, I do grant him the two thousand acres of land which he solicits, in absolute property, in the indicated place; to which effect let a certified copy of this petition and decree be issued to him from the secretary's office, in order that it may be to him in all events an equivalent of a title in form. ESTRADA."

"I, Don Thomas de Aguilar, under-lieutenant of the army, and secretary for his majesty of the government of this place, and of the
