province thereof, do certify that the preceding copy is faithfully drawn from the original, which exists in the secretary's office, under my charge: and in obedience to what is ordered, I give the present in St. Augustine, of Florida, on the 12th of December, 1815. TOMAS DE AGUILAR."

. . . . . .

On the hearing of the case before the Supreme Court for the district of East Florida, the claimant, by his counsel, offered in evidence a copy from the office of the keeper of public archives of the original grant on which this claim is founded; to the receiving of which in evidence the said attorney for the United States objected, alleging that the original grant itself should be produced, and its execution proved, before it could be admitted in evidence, and that the original only could be received in evidence; which objection, after argument from the counsel, was overruled by the Court, and the copy from the office of the keeper of the public archives, certified according to law, was ordered to be received in evidence. . . . The Court proceeded to a decree in the case, and adjudged that the claim of the petitioner as presented was within its jurisdiction — "that the grant is valid, that it ought to be, and by virtue of the statute of the 26th of May, 1830, and of the late treaty between the United States and Spain, it is confirmed."

The United States appealed to this Court.

The case was argued by Mr. Taney, Attorney-General, for the United States; and by Mr. White, for the appellee.

For the United States it was contended: 1. That the copy of the grant and other proceedings produced by the petitioner, were not admissible in evidence, but the original papers ought to have been produced. . . .

Mr. White, for the appellee. . . . How is it attempted by the government agents to defeat so just and equitable a claim? The first ground taken is, that "the copy of the grant is not admissible evidence; but the original ought to have been produced and proved." This involves the question, what is a copy, and what an original, under the Spanish government; as defined by the Spanish laws. This is a paper certified by the escribano of government to be a full copy of the petition and decree of the governor of East Florida. It is, in fact, the original grant. The petition and decree of the governor are preserved in the office of the escribano, are placed there in paper books as composing the diligencias of his office. These papers never go out, any more than the notes of the surveyors, upon which a grant issues in the United States. In this country the original patent, signed by the governor or president, is delivered to the patentee, and the copy is retained in the office. Now, if we are asked why this is so, the answer is, "ita lex scripta est." It is the law and the custom of Spain and her provinces; and it would be as reasonable to ask, why has she not adopted the common law of England? The decree of the governor has been certified under his seal of office, and the seal and signature proved. . . .

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is an appeal from a decree pronounced by the judge of the Superior Court for the district of East Florida, confirming the title of the appellee to two thousand acres of land lying in that territory, which he claimed by virtue of a grant from the Spanish governor, made in December, 1815. . . .

It appears, from the words of the grant, that the original was not in possession of the grantee. The decree which constitutes the title, appears to be addressed to the officer of the government whose duty it was to keep the originals and to issue a copy. Its language, after granting in absolute property, is, "for the attainment of which let a certified copy of this petition and decree be issued to him from the secretary's office, in order that it may be to him in all events equivalent to a title in form." This copy is, in contemplation of law, an original. . . . The act of the 26th of May, 1824, "enabling the claimants of lands within the limits of the State of Missouri and territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," in its fourth section, makes it the duty of "the keeper of any public records who may have possession of the records and evidence of the different tribunals which have been constituted by law for the adjustment of land titles in Missouri, as held by France, upon the application of any person or persons whose claims to land have been rejected by such tribunals or either of them, or on the application of any person interested, or by the Attorney of the United States for the district of Missouri, to furnish copies of such evidence, certified under his official signature, with the seal of office thereto annexed, if there be a seal of office." . . . Whether these acts be or be not construed to authorize the admission of the copies offered in this cause, we think, that, on general principles of law, a copy given by a public officer whose duty it is to keep the original, ought to be received in evidence.

We are all satisfied that the opinion was perfectly correct, and that the copies ought to have been admitted.

Books, or records of this character, being themselves evidence, and being usually restricted to a particular custody, their contents may be proved by an immediate copy. . . . Whether a copy, certified by the officer making the record, or having the legal custody of the book or document — he not being specially appointed by law to furnish copies — is admissible, has been doubted in many cases; but the weight of authority seems to have established the rule, that a copy, given by a public officer whose duty is to keep the original record, ought to be received in evidence. . . . 440. Chief Baron GILBERT. Evidence, 11 (ante 1726). My Lord Chief Justice Parker allowed the printed statute to be evidence, in the case of the College of Physicians and Dr. West, of the truth of a private act of Parliament touching the institution of the College of Physicians; because the printed statute-book is printed by the Queen's authority, and therefore, though it be not so good evidence as an exemplification under seal, yet it must be supposed as good an evidence of the truth of a copy as a copy compared with the rolls and sworn to by the testimony of any witness, which is allowed daily as a good proof of the copy of a record; for a copy printed by the public authority derives more credit from that authority than it would from the testimony of any living witness that had compared it.

Topic 8. Statements of a Physical or Mental Condition

445. AVESON v. KINNAIRD. (1805. 6 East 195). [Evidence was offered of declarations on a sickbed by the plaintiff's wife that she was not well on the previous Tuesday, when she went to be insured.] ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J. A witness has been received to relate that which has always been received from patients to explain — her own account of the cause of her being in bed at an unseasonable hour with the appearance of being ill. . . . What were the complaints, what the symptoms, what the conduct of the parties themselves at the time, are always received upon such inquiries, and must be resorted to from the very nature of the thing. . . . The declaration was upon the subject of her own health at the time which is a fact of which her own declaration is evidence; and that too made unawares before she could contrive any answer for her own advantage and that of her husband, and therefore falling within the principle of the case in Skinner which I have alluded to.

446. BACON v. CHARLTON

7 Cush. 581

ACTION on the case to recover damages for an injury sustained by the plaintiff, in being thrown from his carriage, while traveling through the town of Charlton, in consequence of an obstruction in the highway. . . . The presiding judge ruled that groans or exclamations of pain, made by the plaintiff, at any time, were admissible in evidence, although they referred either by word or gesture to the locality of the pain; as if a man should put his hand upon his side and groan, or should say, "Oh, my head!" or utter similar complaints, being an expression of present pain or agony; but that any statement of his condition or feelings, made in answer to a question, or as a narrative, or with a view to communicate information, was not admissible. And a witness was accordingly allowed, against the defendant's objection, to testify that the plaintiff made exclamations of pain all the way home from the place of the accident; that he made complaints of pain for three or four days after the accident, and stated the locality of the pains; and that he sometimes put his hand upon his hip and sometimes upon his left side.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $561, and the defendant's alleged exceptions.

E. Washburn, for the defendants. The plaintiff's own declarations as to the extent and degree of the injury, made subsequent to the time of the injury, and especially those made after the lapse of one or two days, were not admissible in evidence.

B. F. Thomas and G. F. Hoar, for the plaintiff.

Bigelow, J. — The next objection raised by the exceptions relates to the admission in evidence of expressions and complaints of pain by the plaintiff, after the accident. The rule of law is now well settled, and it forms an exception to the general rules of evidence, that, Where the bodily or mental feeling of a party are to be proved, the usual and natural expressions of such feelings, made at the time, are considered competent and original evidence in his favor. And the rule is founded upon the consideration that such expressions are the natural and necessary language of emotion, of the existence of which, from the very nature of the case, there can be no other evidence. . . .

Such evidence, however, is not to be extended beyond the necessity on which the rule is founded. Anything in the nature of narration or statement is to be carefully excluded, and the testimony is to be confined strictly to such complaints, exclamations, and expressions as usually and naturally accompany and furnish evidence of a present existing pain or malady. . . .

These remarks as to the limitation of the rule are not intended to apply to the statements made by a patient to a medical man, to which a different rule may be applicable.

The ruling of the Court below on this point was strictly in conformity with the rules of law, and was properly guarded and limited.

Exceptions overruled.

447. ROOSA v. LOAN CO.

132 Mass. 439

Tort for assault and battery. At the trial in the Superior Court, before Brigham, C. J., the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff; and the defendant alleged exceptions, which appear in the opinion.

N. B. Bryant, for the defendant.

G. W. Morse, for the plaintiff.

Endicott, J. — When the bodily or mental feelings of a party are to be proved, his exclamations or expressions indicating present pain or malady are competent evidence; and in Bacon v. Charlton, 7 Cush. 581, 586, where this rule is stated, it was said by the Court: "Such evidence, however, is not to be extended beyond the necessity on which the rule is founded. Anything in the nature of narration or statement is to be carefully excluded, and the testimony is to be confined strictly to such complaints, exclamations, and expressions as usually and naturally accompany, and furnish evidence of, a present existing pain or malady." The opinion closes with this precaution: "These remarks as to the limitation of the rule are not intended to apply to the statements made by a patient to a medical man, to which a different rule may be applicable." In Chapin v. Marlborough, 9 Gray 244, it was held, on the authority of Bacon v. Charlton, that a physician could not testify to a statement, made by the plaintiff, that his leg had been struck by a horse.

The facts in that case, as in Chapin v. Marlborough, are similar to those recited in this bill of exceptions. The plaintiff here testified that she was struck in the stomach by the defendant's servant. The physician, in answer to the question, "What did the plaintiff tell you about her condition?" replied, "She stated that she had received a blow in the stomach." It would clearly have been competent for a physician, after having testified to the condition of the plaintiff, and to the complaints and symptoms of pain and suffering stated by her, to have given his opinion that they were such as might have been expected to follow the infliction of a severe blow. Such evidence was admitted without objection. But it was not competent for the physician to testify to her statement that she had received a blow in the stomach.

While a witness, not an expert, can testify only to such exclamations and complaints as indicate present existing pain and suffering, a physician may testify to a statement or narrative given by his patient in relation to his condition, symptoms, sensations, and feelings, both past and present. In both cases these declarations are admitted from necessity, because in this way only can the bodily condition of the party, who is the subject of the injury, and who seeks to obtain damages, be ascertained. But the necessity does not extend to declarations by the party as to the cause of the injury, which is the principal subject-matter of inquiry, and which may be proved by other evidence.

Exceptions sustained.

448. ROCHE v. RAILROAD CO.

105 N. Y. 294; 11 N. E. 630

Appeal from judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court in the second judicial department, entered upon an order made September 9, 1884, which affirmed a judgment in favor of plaintiff entered upon a verdict and affirmed an order denying a motion for a new trial.

This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff while a passenger on one of defendant's cars, and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence.

The facts, so far as material to the questions discussed, are stated in the opinion.

Samuel D. Morris, for appellant. The Court erred in allowing the witness McElroy, who was not an expert, to testify as to the condition of plaintiff's arm and as to what she said about it.

George W. Roderick, for respondent. . . .

PECKHAM, J. — The only question in this case arises upon the admission of the testimony of a third party that the plaintiff, some days after the happening of the accident which caused her injury, complained that she was suffering pain in her injured arm. The witness did not testify that on these occasions the plaintiff screamed or groaned, or gave other manifestations of a seemingly involuntary nature and indicative of bodily suffering, but he proved simple statements or declarations made by plaintiff, that she was at the time of making them suffering with pain in her arm. The plaintiff was herself sworn and proved the injury and the pain. The condition of the arm the night of the accident was also proved; that it was very much swollen and black all around it, and subsequently red and inflamed, and continued swollen and inflamed more or less for a long time. The defendant challenges the evidence of complaints of pain thus made, on the ground that it was incompetent, and the argument made was that the evidence as to the injury and its extent could not be thus corroborated by mere hearsay.

Prior to the time when parties were allowed to be witnesses, the rule in this class of cases permitted evidence of this nature. Caldwell v. Murphy, 11 N. Y. 416; Werely v. Persons, 28 N. Y. 344. These cases show that the evidence was not confined to the time of the injury, or to mere exclamations of pain. The admissibility of the evidence was put, in the opinion of Judge DENIO, in 11 N. Y., supra, upon the necessity of the case, as being the only means by which the condition of the sufferer as to enduring pain could, in many instances, be proved. . . . After the adoption of the amendment to the Code, permitting parties to be witnesses, the question under discussion was somewhat mooted in Reed v. Railroad, 45 N. Y. 574, by ALLEN, J., in the course of his opinion, although the precise point was not before the court. . . . The case of Hagenlocher v. Brooklyn R. R., 99 N. Y. 136, decides that, even since the Code, evidence of exclamations indicative of pain made by the party injured is admissible. The case does not confine proof of these exclamations to the time of the injury. The question was asked of the plaintiff's mother: "How long after injury was your daughter confined in the bed?" Answer: "She was for about four weeks." Question: "What expressions did she make, or what manifestations, showing that she suffered pain?" This shows there was no confinement of the evidence to the time of the injury. The evidence given, however, was of screams when the plaintiff's foot was touched, and of her exclamations of pain when even the sheet was permitted to touch the foot. The evidence was permitted on the ground that it was of a nature which substantially corroborated the plaintiff as to her condition.

Having thus admitted evidence of this kind since the adoption of the Code amendment permitting parties to be witnesses, the question is whether there is such a clear distinction between it and evidence of simple declarations of a party that he was then suffering pain, but giving no other indications thereof, as to call for the adoption of a different rule. It seems to us that there is. Evidence of exclamations, groans, and screams is now permitted, more upon the ground that it is a better and clearer and more vigorous description of the then existing physical condition of the party by an eye-witness than could be given in any other way. It characterizes and explains such condition. Thus, in the very last case cited, it was shown that the foot was very much swollen, and so sore that the sheet could not touch it. How was the condition of soreness to be shown better than by the statement that, when so light an article as a sheet touched the foot, the patient screamed with pain? It was an involuntary and natural exhibition and proof of the existence of intense soreness and pain therefrom. True, it might be simulated, but this possibility is not strong enough to outweigh the propriety of permitting such evidence as fair, natural, and original corroborative evidence of the plaintiff as to his then physical condition. Its weight and propriety are not, therefore, now sustained upon the old idea of the necessity of the case.

But evidence of simple declarations of a party, made some time after the injury, and not to a physician for the purpose of being attended to professionally, and simply making the statement that he or she is then suffering pain, is evidence of a totally different nature, is easily stated, liable to gross exaggeration, and of a most dangerous tendency, while the former necessity for its admission has wholly ceased. As is said by Judge ALLEN, in Reed v. Railroad, supra, the necessity for giving such declarations in evidence, where the party is living and can be sworn, no longer existing, and that being the reason for its admission, the reason of the rule ceasing, the rule itself, adopted with reluctance and followed cautiously, should also cease. . . . For these reasons, the evidence of Mr. McElroy, as to the plaintiff's declarations of existing pain, when they were walking in the street together, long after the accident, should not have been received.

The judgment of the General Term and Circuit should be reversed and new trial granted, costs to abide event.

All concur, except DANFORTH, J., dissenting.

Judgment reversed.

449. WILLIAMS v. GREAT NORTHERN R. CO. (1897. 68 Minn. 55, 70 N. W. 860). MITCHELL, J. — It is necessary to note the distinction, often overlooked, between mere descriptive statements of pain, or other subjective symptoms of a malady which furnish no intrinsic evidence of their existence, and those exclamations or complaints which are the spontaneous manifestations of distress, and which naturally and instinctively accompany and furnish evidence of existing suffering. . . .

It may not always be easy to draw the line between such complaints or expressions and mere descriptive statements, but the authorities all recognize and make the distinction, which is one that accords with the experience and observation of every one. Hagenlocher v. Coney Island, 99 N. Y. 137; Roche v. Brooklyn, 105 N. Y. 294, [ante, No. 448]. . . .

According to the great weight of modern authorities, the mere descriptive statements of a sick or injured person as to the symptoms and effects of his malady are only admissible under the following circumstances: First,—They must have been made to a medical attendant for the purposes of medical treatment. Second, — They must relate to existing pain or other symptoms from which the patient is suffering at the time, and must not relate to past transactions or symptoms, however closely related to the present sickness. This was probably always the rule, but the Courts are now disposed to apply it more strictly than formerly. Third, — Such statements are only admissible when the medical attendant is called upon to give an expert opinion based in part upon them. . . .

CANTY, J. — I concur in the result arrived at in this case, but not in the distinctions made in the foregoing opinion between statements that are admissible when made to a layman. Where the statements of the person are representations or complaints as to his then existing pain or suffering, the law should hold such statements to be a part of the res gestae, and competent evidence, whether made to a physician or a layman. To be strictly logical, perhaps, nothing should be regarded as a part of the res gestae except those gestures, exclamations, and expressions of suffering which are forced from the person when the pain or affliction itself speaks. But so narrow and strict a rule is not practicable. The expression of suffering may be one-half groans and exclamations and one-half words, or nine-tenths of the former and one-tenth or the latter, or vice versa. How can the law say how much of the utterance shall consist of words, and how much of groans, sighs, and exclamations; or that it may not all consist of words? Again, how can the law say with what degree of anguish the words shall be uttered? One person complains cheerfully, and even laughs and jokes, when he is suffering intense agony, while another complains most dolefully about the slightest affliction. For these reasons I cannot agree with the majority, or with the New York cases, which attempt to make a distinction between words describing present existing suffering and other exclamations indicating such suffering, but such words as well as such exclamations should be held to be a part of the res gestae.

But, as to statements made by the patient to his physician, the great weight of authority goes much further than this, and holds that evidence of such statements, describing past suffering or past symptoms, is admissible as original evidence to prove that such suffering or such symptoms existed as stated. In my opinion, such a statement, even though made to a physician, is neither independent, original evidence, nor corroborative evidence. It is admissible merely for the purpose of showing that at the time the physician was correctly informed, made his investigations in the light of all the known facts, and was therefore likely to have reached a correct conclusion as to the nature, extent, and cause of the malady. . . .

I concede that the weight of authority is against my position here, as well as against the position taken in the majority opinion. But if that authority is clearly and unquestionably wrong, the Courts ought not to follow it. The Courts have simply been running in a rut of error, and the longer they so run, the deeper the rut will become.

450. DOE DEM. SHALLCROSS v. PALMER

16 Q. B. 747

EJECTMENT. The plaintiff's lessor claimed as devisee of Francis Brookes, who was heir-at-law of his brother William Brookes. The defendant claimed in right of his wife Appollina, as devisee of William Brookes. The will appeared to have been drawn originally so as to give the property in fee to Francis, and to have been changed in William's handwriting so as to give it to Francis for life with remainder to Appollina. The question was whether the alterations had been made before or after the execution of the will.

The defendant's counsel proposed to call witnesses to prove declarations of the testator, before the will was executed, that he intended to make provision by his will for Appollina Biddulph. This evidence was objected to; but the Lord Chief Justice received it, subject to the opinion of the Court upon its admissibility.

Dr. Knight, a physician at Stafford, was then called, and stated, in his examination in chief, that he knew the testator well, and attended him professionally; that he was one of his executors; that he had heard him talk of a testamentary disposition; and that he had frequently heard testator say that he should make provision for Appollina Biddulph, of whom he appeared to be very fond. . . . Ann Lockesly was recalled, and stated that, many a time before the will was executed in July, she had heard the testator say that, die when he might, he would leave Appollina two or three houses. . . .

The Lord Chief Justice permitted the jury to look at the will, and left it to them to say whether, from the evidence, they were satisfied that the alteration was made before the will was executed. The jury said they were so satisfied. The Lord Chief Justice then directed a verdict for the defendants, with leave to move to enter a verdict for the lessor of the plaintiff if the Court should be of opinion that there was no admissible evidence to show that the alteration was made before the will was executed.

Whateley, in the ensuing term, obtained a rule nisi accordingly. In Hilary Term and Vacation, 1851, Keating and Whitmore showed cause, and Whateley and Phipson supported the rule. . . .

The counsel for the defendants contended that . . . the fact that the testator, at the time the will was executed, intended to execute a will providing for Appollina Biddulph, raised a presumption that the alterations which provided for her were made at that time; and that the testator's intention at that time was properly proved by declarations either previous to or shortly after the execution of the will. . . .

For the plaintiff it was argued that declarations by a testator, though admissible for many purposes, were not admissible to show the time of alteration.

CAMPBELL, L. C. J. — The evidence relied upon consisted of declarations by the testator, frequently made, before and nearly down to the time when the will was executed, that he intended to make provision by his will for Appollina Biddulph (the now defendant, Mrs. Palmer), coupled with the fact that without this alteration the will, which disposes of the whole of his property, real and personal, makes no provision for her. . . . I allow we cannot be guided alone by the consideration that both parties claim under the testator; for declarations of the testator after the time when a controverted will is supposed to have been executed would not be admissible to prove that it had been duly signed and attested as the law requires; and, for the same reason, a declaration by the testator after the will was executed, that the alteration had been made previously, would be inadmissible. But the previous declarations of the testator as to his testamentary intentions do not seem to be liable to the same objections. They demonstrate that the alteration is not an after-thought. . . .

Although no decision can be quoted in which such evidence for rebutting this specific presumption has been admitted, no case has occurred in which it has been rejected; and in cases closely analogous similar evidence has often been received. . . .

We therefore think that the jury were fully justified in coming to the conclusion that the alteration was made before the will was executed. . . . It being quite certain that the testator intended that Appollina Biddulph should take the premises after the death of Francis, and the intention appearing to us to be testified according to the rules of law, we think that she ought to be allowed to remain in the possession of them; and that this rule to enter the verdict for the lessor of the plaintiff ought to be discharged. Rule discharged.

451. COMMONWEALTH v. TREFETHEN

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1892

157 Mass. 180; 31 N. E. 961

EXCEPTIONS from Superior Court, Middlesex County.

Indictment against James Albert Trefethen and William H. Smith for the murder of Deltena H. Davis by drowning. There was a verdict of guilty as to Trefethen and not guilty as to Smith. Defendant Trefethen excepted, and asked that the case be reported to this Court for determination. Verdict against Trefethen set aside.

A. E. Pillsbury, Atty.-Gen., for the Commonwealth. John D. Long and Wm. Schofield, for defendants.

Field, C. J. — The principal exception is to the refusal of the Court to admit the testimony of Sarah L. Hubert. The exceptions recite that: "Sarah L. Hubert, a witness called in behalf of the defendant, testified that her business, which she advertised in the newspapers, was that of a trance medium; that on December 22, 1891, in the forenoon, after 10 o'clock, a young woman called at her place of business in Boston for consultation. There was sufficient evidence to go to the jury of her identification as Deltena J. Davis. Upon objection being made to the testimony of this witness, counsel for the defendants stated to the Court, aside from the jury, that they offered to prove by this witness that at the interview on December 22d, the young woman aforesaid stated to the witness that she was five months pregnant with child, and had come to consult as to what to do, and added later in the interview that she was going to drown herself. The Court refused to admit the testimony, and the defendants duly excepted. . . . On the 10th day of January, 1892, her dead body was found in the Mystic river, a short distance below the Wellington bridge, about three miles from her home. . . . There was evidence in the case tending to negative the circumstances relied upon by the Commonwealth, and to support the theory of suicide." . . . When evidence of declarations of any person is offered for the purpose of showing the state of mind or intention of that person at the time the declarations were made, the declarations undoubtedly may be so remote in point of time, or so altered in import by subsequent change in the circumstances of the maker, as to be wholly immaterial, and wisely to be rejected by the judge. . . .

In the case at bar the evidence offered was that the declaration of the deceased was made the day before her death, and was made in a conversation concerning her pregnancy, which continued until her death. The declaration, therefore, was not made at a time remote from the time of her death, and there had been no change of circumstances which made it inapplicable to the condition of the deceased at the time of her death. It was clearly competent for the jury to find from the evidence recited in the exceptions that, if Deltena J. Davis had an intention to commit suicide on December 22d, she continued to have the same intention on December 23d. . . .

The main argument of the attorney general is: First, that it is immaterial whether the deceased, at or before the time of her death, had or had not an intention to commit suicide; and, secondly, that, if she had such an intention, it could not be proved by evidence of her declarations that she was going to drown herself. . . . If it could be shown that she actually had an intention to commit suicide, it would be more probable that she did in fact commit it than if she had had no such intention. . . . It is a question of more difficulty whether evidence of the declarations of the deceased can be admitted to show such an intention. The argument, in short, is that such evidence is hearsay. It is argued that such declarations are not made under the sanction of an oath, and that there is no opportunity to examine and cross-examine the person making them, so as to test his sincerity and truthfulness, or the accuracy and completeness with which the declarations describe his intention or state of mind; and that, even if such declarations would have some moral weight in the determination of the issue before the court, they are not within any of the exceptions, to the exclusion of hearsay, which the common law recognizes.

The counsel for the defendant concede that the declaration in this case is not, under our decisions, admissible as a part of what has been called the "res gestæ," although they contend that some courts have admitted similar declarations on that ground. They concede that to make a declaration admissible on that ground it must accompany an act which, directly or indirectly, is relevant to the issue to be tried, and must in some way qualify, explain, or characterize that act, and be, in a legal sense, a part of it. . . . They contend that the declaration is some evidence of the state of mind or intention of the deceased at the time she made it, and that the intention which it tends to prove is a material fact, which, in connection with other facts proved, tends to support the theory of suicide. They contend that the state of mind or intention in the mind of a person, when material, can be proved by evidence of his declarations as well as of his acts, particularly when that person has deceased, and cannot be called as witness, and the declarations were made before the controversy arose which is the subject of the trial. . . .

The fundamental proposition is that an intention in the mind of a person can only be shown by some external manifestation, which must be some look or appearance of the face or body, or some act or speech; and that proof of either or all of these, for the sole purpose of showing the existing state of mind or intention, may be inferred. For example, the exceptions recite that on the day when the deceased disappeared Trefethen called at the house of her mother "about 10 in the forenoon, and was there some time with Tena, and that Tena that day appeared bright and cheerful, and 'full of smiles,' but at times during the month prior thereto had been depressed in spirits." The only apparent object of this testimony was to show that on the day she disappeared she was happy, and, therefore, could not have contemplated suicide. Her bright and cheerful appearance might have been real or feigned, but this was for the jury. If the deceased at the same interview had said, "I was never so happy in my life as I am to-day," it is contended that this declaration might be as significant of her state of mind as her cheerful appearance, and that speaking, as an indication of what is in the mind of the speaker, is as much an act as smiling or conduct generally. The only obvious distinction between speech and conduct is that speech is often not only an indication of the existing state of mind of the speaker, but a statement of a fact external to the mind, and as evidence of that it is clearly hearsay. There is, of course, danger that a jury may not always observe this distinction, but that has not availed to exclude testimony which is admissible for one purpose and not admissible for another, to which there is danger the jury may apply it. . . . If, the day before her death, she had written a note, addressed to her mother, stating her condition, and declaring her intention to drown herself, and had left it in her desk when she went from home the following day, the admissibility of such a letter in evidence, after proof that she had written it, depends upon the same considerations as the admissibility of evidence of similar oral declarations. . . . Certainly, to confine the evidence to acts, appearance, or speech which is wholly involuntary, would be impracticable and unreasonable, for almost every expression of thought or feeling can be simulated; and, although evidence of the conscious declarations of a person as indications of his state of mind has in it some of the elements of hearsay, yet it closely resembles evidence of the natural expressions of feeling, which has always been regarded in the law not as hearsay, but as original evidence, — 1 Greenleaf, Evidence § 102, (5th Ed.;) and when the person making the declarations is dead, such evidence is often not only the best, but the only, evidence of what was in his mind at the time. On principle, therefore, we think it clear that when evidence of the declarations of a person is introduced solely for the purpose of showing what the state of mind or intention of that person was at the time the declarations were made, the declarations are to be regarded as acts from which the state of mind or intention may be inferred in the same manner as from the appearance of the person, or his behavior, or his actions generally. In the present case the declaration, evidence of which was offered, contained nothing in the nature of narrative, and was significant only as showing the state of mind or intention of the deceased.

But it is argued that this is not the law, and that it is not competent for this Court to change the established rules of evidence. We have been shown no case exactly like the present, but there are decisions closely analogous, and, while they are not uniform, yet we think the weight of modern authority is in favor of admitting evidence like that offered in the present case for the purpose stated. The latest decision on the subject is Hillmon v. Insurance Co., 145 U. S. 285, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 909, and many of the cases are cited in the opinion. See, also, Puryear v. Com., 1 S. E. Rep. 512; Blackburn v. State, 23 Ohio St. 146; Boyd v. State, 14 Lea, 162; Goersen v. Com., 99 Pa. St. 388; Jumpertz v. People, 21 Ill. 375. . . . This Court admits exclamations and declarations as evidence of existing pain in case of injuries. In the case of wills, upon the issue of sanity or undue influence, this Court has always admitted evidence of declarations which tend to show the condition of the mind of the testator, and his intention with regard to the disposition of his property, or his fear of the person alleged to have exercised undue influence. . . . In actions by the husband for seducing his wife and alienating her affections from him the declarations and statements of the wife, made before the alleged seduction, indicating the state of her affections towards her husband, have uniformly been admitted upon the question of damages. Palmer v. Crook, 7 Gray, 418. . . . Evidence of threats of the deceased against the defendant have been admitted when the question was whether the defendant or the deceased made the first assault, and whether the defendant acted in self-defense. Wiggins v. People, 93 U. S. 465. . . . It is not necessary, in the present case, to determine what limitations, if any, in practice must be put upon the admission of this kind of evidence, because all the limitations exist which have ever been suggested as necessary. The person making the declaration, if one was made, is dead. She had an opportunity to commit suicide, and it was competent for the jury to find that she had a motive to commit it; and the declaration, if made, was made under circumstances which exclude any suspicion of an intention to make evidence to be used at the trial. . . . We are of opinion that the presiding judges erred in refusing to receive this evidence, and that, for this reason, the verdict against Trefethen must be set aside. . . .

452. WATERMAN v. WHITNEY

11 N. Y. 157

JOSHUA WHITNEY died in April, 1845, and in July, 1846, the surrogate of Broome county made an order refusing to admit his will to probate; from this order, Waterman and others appealed to the circuit judge, who reversed the order, and directed feigned issues to be made: 1. As to whether the alleged will was duly made and executed by the testator; 2. As to whether the testator, at the time of the execution, was of sound and disposing mind; 3. As to whether the alleged will was procured by undue influence, fraud or deception.

On the trial of the issues, before MASON, J., after evidence had been given tending to prove want of mental capacity in the testator, the defendants called one Emory, as a witness, and offered to prove by him, that after the execution of the will, the testator stated to him, how he had disposed of his property, which entirely differed from that made by the will in question. This was overruled, and an exception taken. The defendants further offered to prove, that the deceased "made similar declarations to others, from the time of the execution of the will, up to the time of his death." This was also excluded, and an exception taken.

The jury found for the plaintiffs, Waterman and others, upon all the issues, thereby establishing the will; and the Supreme Court having denied a motion for a new trial, upon a bill of exceptions, the parties contesting the probate took this appeal.

Dickenson, for the appellants. Noxon, for the respondents.

SELDEN, J. — The principal question presented by the bill of exceptions in this case is, as to the admissibility of the declarations of the testator, made after the execution of the will.

The subject to which this question belongs is of very considerable interest, and one upon which the decisions are to some extent in conflict. Much of the difficulty, however, has arisen from the omission to distinguish with sufficient clearness, between the different objects for which the declarations of testators may be offered in evidence, in cases involving the validity of their wills. It will tend to elucidate the subject, to consider it under the following classification of the purposes for which the evidence may be offered, viz.: 1. To show a revocation of a will, admitted to have been once valid. 2. To impeach the validity of a will, for duress, or on account of some fraud or imposition practised upon the testator, or for some other cause not involving his mental condition. 3. To show the mental incapacity of the testator, or that the will was procured by undue influence. The rules by which the admissibility of the evidence is governed, naturally arrange themselves in accordance with this classification. . . .

1. Under these statutes, therefore, the only possible purpose for which evidence of the declarations of the testator can be given, upon a question of revocation, is to establish the "animus revocandi"; in other words, to show the intent with which the act relied upon as a revocation was done. The cases on this subject are in the main in harmony with each other. . . .

I consider these cases as establishing the doctrine that, upon a question of revocation, no declarations of the testator are admissible, except such as accompany the act by which the will is revoked; such declarations being received as part of the res gestae, and for the purpose of showing the intent of the act. . . .

2. In regard to the second class of cases, viz., where the validity of a will is disputed on the ground of fraud, duress, mistake or some similar cause, aside from the mental weakness of the testator, I think it equally clear, that no declarations of the testator himself can be received in evidence, except such as were made at the time of the execution of the will, and are strictly a part of the res gestae. . . .

3. I have referred thus particularly to these numerous cases, in which the declarations of testators have been held inadmissible, upon contests respecting the validity of their wills, for the purpose of showing that they all apply to one or the other of the first two of the three classes into which I have divided the cases, on the subject. None of them have any application to cases in which the will is assailed on account of the insanity or mental incapacity of the testator, at the time the will was executed, or on the ground that the will was obtained by undue influence.

The difference is certainly very obvious, between receiving the declarations of a testator, to prove a distinct external fact, such as duress or fraud, for instance, and as evidence merely of the mental condition of the testator. In the former case, it is mere hearsay, and liable to all the objections, to which the mere declarations of third persons are subject; while in the latter, it is the most direct and appropriate species of evidence. . . . It is abundantly settled that, upon either of these questions, the declarations of the testator, made at or before the time of the execution of the will, are competent evidence. The only doubt, which exists on the subject is, whether declarations made subsequent thereto may also be received.

Clear and accurate writers have been led into confusion on this subject, by not attending to the distinctions growing out of the different purposes for which the evidence may be offered. . . . The case of Reel v. Reel, 1 Hawks 247, is a leading case on this subject. . . . The offer in Reel v. Reel was, to prove repeated declarations of the testator, made after the execution of the will, in which he stated its contents to be materially and utterly different from what they were. These declarations were offered in connection with conflicting testimony upon the point of testamentary capacity. . . . The decision of the Court, in holding the evidence admissible, is not in conflict, so far as I have been able to discover, with any adjudged case, either in this country or in England, and on the other hand, is in entire harmony with what seems to be the established doctrine, that the insanity or imbecility of the testator, subsequent to making the will, may be proved, in connection with other evidence, with a view to its reflex influence upon the question of his condition at the time of executing the will. Indeed, if the latter doctrine be sound, it necessarily follows that the decision is right.

The conclusion is, of course, decisive of the present case, which is identical in principle with that of Reel v. Reel. . . .

It does not follow from this, that evidence of this nature is necessarily to be received, however remote it may be in point of time, from the execution of the will. The object of the evidence is, to show the mental state of the testator, at the time when the will was executed. Of course, therefore, it is admissible only where it has a legitimate bearing upon that question; and of this, the Court must judge, as in every other case, where the relevancy of testimony is denied. . . .

There is no conflict between the doctrine here advanced, in regard to the admissibility of the species of evidence in question, and the rule before adverted to, which excludes it, when the issue is as to the revocation of a will. The difference between the two cases consists in the different nature of the inquiries involved; one relates to a voluntary and conscious act of the mind; the other, to its involuntary state or condition. To receive evidence of subsequent declarations, in the former case, would be attended with all the dangers which could grow out of changes of purpose, or of external motives operating upon an intelligent mind; no such dangers would attend the evidence, upon inquiries in relation to the sanity or capacity of the testator. . . .

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

GARDINER, C. J., dissented.

453. SUGDEN v. ST. LEONARDS

PROBATE DIVISION. 1876

L. R. 1 P. D. 154

THE plaintiffs, the Hon. and Rev. Frank Sugden, the Hon. Charlotte Sugden, and John Reilly, propounded, as executors, the contents of a lost will dated on or about the 13th of January, 1870, of the Right Hon. Edward Burtenshaw [Sugden,] Baron St. Leonards, late of Boyle Farm, in the county of Surrey, deceased, who died at Boyle Farm on the 29th of January, 1875, at the age of ninety-three. They also propounded eight codicils to the said will, such codicils being produced and filed in the registry.

The declarations, after alleging, 1st, the due execution of the will and codicils, went on to allege: —

2. That the said will never was revoked or destroyed by the testator, nor by any other person in his presence or by his direction, with the intention of revoking the same, and that the same was, at the time of his death, a valid and subsisting will, but that the same cannot be found.

3. That the contents of the said will were, in substance or to the effect, as follows: . . .

The defendant, the Right Hon. Edward Burtenshaw Lord St. Leonards, the grandson and heir-at-law of the deceased, and his brothers and sisters, who were minors, and appeared by their mother as their guardian, pleaded. . . .

2. That the said alleged will was duly revoked by the said deceased by destroying the same with the intention of revoking it.

3. That the contents of the said alleged will were not as set out in the declaration. . . .

On the 17th of November, 1875, the cause came on for hearing before Sir J. HANNEN (President) without a jury. . . .

The principal witness as to the preparation and the execution of the will, and the only witness who was able to give evidence as to its contents, was the Hon. Charlotte Sugden, one of the plaintiffs. She was the only unmarried daughter of the deceased, and had lived with him for many years prior to and up to the time of his death. . . . The will and all the codicils were holograph, that they were all kept in a small black box, something like a dispatch box, of which the deceased had the key; that the box was usually placed in the saloon used by the deceased as his sitting-room at Boyle Farm; that the will was last seen by Miss Sugden on the 20th of August, 1873, when the last codicil was executed, and it was then replaced in the box; that during an illness of the deceased from September, 1873, until December, 1873, and again from March, 1874, when the deceased was attacked with his last illness, until his death, the box was in the custody of Miss Charlotte Sugden, and that after his death, although the codicils and some other testamentary papers were found in the box, the will was not there. Every possible search had been made for it, but it could not be found. There was evidence that the box was usually kept locked, and that the key was on a bunch kept by the deceased; that there was a duplicate key kept in an escritoire; and that there were five keys in the house by which the escritoire could be opened, one of these keys belonging to a wine cupboard in charge of the butler. Immediately after the will was found to be missing from the box, Miss Charlotte Sugden said that she recollected its contents, and then, at the suggestion of her solicitor, Mr. Trollope, she wrote out from memory, without reference to the codicils and other testamentary papers which were in the box, the following statement. . . .

At the close of the evidence, . . .

Nov. 25, Sir J. HANNEN (President). — I have on this occasion to discharge the functions of a jury, and to give my verdict upon certain questions of fact. . . . Believing, as I do, the testator made these statements [alluding to the existence of the will] showing a belief in his mind that the will was in existence at a time subsequently to that at which he could have revoked it, I am led to the conclusion that he had not in fact revoked it at any time when he had the opportunity of getting access to it. . . . I come to the conclusion that his declarations down to the latest period of his life show that he died under the belief that that will was still in existence, and rebut the presumption that he had revoked it. . . . I find, as a fact, that the will of 1870 was duly executed and attested; that the several codicils were also duly executed and attested; and I further find that the contents of the will were as set out in the declaration, with the exception I have mentioned. . . .

An appeal was also brought by Mr. and Mrs. Henderson. The appeals came on to be heard on the 7th of March, 1876. On the opening of the appeals, Hawkins, Q. C., Inderwick, Q. C., and Dr. Tristram, for the plaintiffs. . . .

Sir H. Giffard, S. G. (Dr. Deane, Q. C., and Bayford with him), for Lord St. Leonards, and some of his brothers and sisters. . . .

Thesiger, Q. C., and Bayford, for brothers and sisters of Lord St. Leonards.

Davey, Q. C. (with whom was G. Browne, and Keogh), for Mr. and Mrs. Henderson.

COCKBURN, L. C. J. — This is an appeal against a decree of the President of the Probate Division, granting probate of a paper purporting to be the substance of the will of the late Lord St. Leonards. The will was last seen on the 20th of August, 1873; the death of the testator took place on the 29th of January, 1875. The will was kept in a small box placed on the floor of a room called the saloon, on the ground floor of the testator's house. Upon his death it was looked for in that box by the solicitor employed by the executors, and it could not be found. Several questions arise from this state of facts. In the first place, was the will destroyed by the testator animo revocandi or not; secondly, can secondary evidence be given of its contents; thirdly, if so, have we satisfactory evidence of the contents; and lastly, if the evidence is satisfactory, so far as it goes, but not altogether complete, ought probate to be granted, so far as the evidence which we have before us shows what were the contents? . . . The last time the will was seen was by Miss Sugden, on the 20th of August, 1873. Lord St. Leonards was taken ill in September, 1873, and was confined to his room from that time to Christmas, 1873, and during the whole of that time the box was kept by Miss Sugden, as she tells us, in her own room; when he again rejoined the family down stairs, she replaced the box in the saloon, that he might not miss it, and it remained there until his last illness commenced, in March, 1874. It was then again taken possession of by Miss Sugden, and kept by her until Lord St. Leonards' death; therefore it could only have been got at by him between Christmas, 1873, and March, 1874. Long after March, when he was stricken with his last illness, and from which time he was confined to his own bed-room, he again and again referred to the various provisions he had made by the will, in other words, referred to the will itself as still subsisting, and this again adds to the vast improbability of his having destroyed the will. . . .

Declarations of deceased persons are in several instances admitted as exceptions to the general rule; where such persons have had peculiar means of knowledge and may be supposed to have been without motive to speak otherwise than according to the truth. It is obvious that a man who has made his will stands pre-eminently in that position. He must be taken to know the contents of the instrument he has executed. If he speaks of its provisions, he can have no motive for misrepresenting them, except in the rare instances in which a testator may have the intention of misleading by his statements respecting his will. Generally speaking, statements of this kind are honestly made, and this class of evidence may be put on the same footing with the declarations of members of a family in matters of pedigree. . . . I am at a loss to see why, when such evidence is held to be admissible for the two purposes just referred to, it should not be equally receivable as proving the contents of the will. If the exception to the general rule of law which excludes hearsay evidence is admitted, on account of the exceptional position of a testator, for one purpose, why should it not be for another, where there is an equal degree of knowledge, and an equal absence of motive to speak untruly?

Jessel, M. R. — [The reasons for the exceptions to the Hearsay rule]

all exist in the case of a testator declaring the contents of his will. . . . Having regard to the reasons and principles which have induced the Courts of this country to admit exceptions in the other cases to which I have referred, we should be equally justified and equally bound to admit it in this case. . . . We have a witness peculiarly likely to know what the contents of the will were. Besides that, we have a witness of unimpeached and unimpeachable integrity. We have the gratification of knowing, in deciding this case, that there has been no question raised as to the credibility of Miss Sugden, and this appears to be an answer to that assumed danger which might apply to other cases in allowing such proof as this to establish wills. . . . The case is singular in that respect, and I should think it is very likely to remain singular, as regards subsequent cases; therefore there is no danger in admitting this evidence in this particular case, and I see no reason why we should refuse to do justice now because other persons, not credible witnesses, may be induced in other cases to attempt to substantiate fictitious wills.

JAMES, L. J. . . . In this case it is conceded that every one of those declarations was admissible and was properly admitted for some purpose in the cause, and thereby those declarations of the testator have become legitimately known to me. I believe them to have been made by him, and I believe them to be true, and, having those declarations before me and so believing them, it would be a judicial lie if I were to pretend that I did not act upon them in coming to the conclusion that the evidence of the witness as to the actual contents of the will is true.

MELLISH, L. J. . . . The difficulty I feel is this, that I cannot satisfactorily to my own mind find any distinction between the statement of a testator as to the contents of his will, and any other statement of a deceased person as to any fact peculiarly within his knowledge, which, beyond all question, as the law now stands, we are not as a general rule entitled to receive. . . . A declaration after he has made his will, of what the contents of the will are, is not a statement of anything which is passing in his mind at the time; it is simply a statement of a fact within his knowledge, and therefore you cannot admit it unless you can bring it within some of the exceptions to the general rule that hearsay evidence is not admissible to prove a fact which is stated in the declaration. It does not come within any of the rules which have been hitherto established, and I doubt whether it is an advisable thing to establish new exceptions in a case which has never happened before, and may never happen again, for you then establish an exception which more or less throws a doubt on the law.

The Master of the Rolls has referred to the several exceptions which have been made to the rule, but none of them appear to me to be applicable to this case. I think there is a most material distinction, as was pointed out by Lord CAMPBELL in Doe v. Palmer, 16 Q. B. 747 [ante, No. 450], between declarations made before a will is executed, and declarations made subsequently. The declarations which are made before the will are not, I apprehend, to be taken as [direct] evidence of the contents of the will which is subsequently made — they obviously do not prove it; and [but?] wherever it is material to prove the state of a person's mind, or what was passing in it, and what were his intentions, there you may prove what he said, because that is the only means by which you can find out what his intentions were.

It appears to me that it would be better to leave it to the Legislature to make the improvement, which, in my opinion, ought to be made, in our present rules with regard to the admissibility of evidence of that description. In all other respects I entirely agree with the judgments which have been given.

Baggallay, J. A. . . . I particularly desire to express my concurrence in that portion of the judgment which has reference to the admissibility, as evidence, of the declarations made by the testator in this case. . . .

Cockburn, C. J. The appeals will be dismissed with costs.

Appeals dismissed.[1]

454. MOONEY v. OLSEN

Supreme Court of Kansas. 1879

Error from Leavenworth district court.

Action brought by Olsen against Mooney and another to set aside the will of Lydia Foster, who died July 8, 1876. Trial by a jury, at the March term, 1877, of the district court, and verdict against the will. The defendants below filed their motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, Olsen, upon the verdict of the jury. Defendants bring the case here.

Taylor & Gillpatrick, for plaintiffs in error. . . .

The only issues involved in this case were, was Lydia Foster of sound mind and memory at the time she executed her will? and, if so, did she execute the same by reason of undue influence? These being the issues, the court permitted the plaintiff below, time and again, over the objections of the defendants below, to introduce incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and hearsay testimony, which tended to and did prejudice the substantial rights of the defendants below. The declarations of a party to a deed or will, whether previous or subsequent to its execution, are nothing more than hearsay evidence, and nothing can be more dangerous than the admission of it to destroy the construction of the

H. T. Green, for defendant in error. . . . The plaintiffs in error insist that the declarations of Lydia Foster before and after the signing of the will were not competent evidence. Why? Those made before the will were competent to show that she did not like Dennis Mooney; he was no friend of hers; she feared him; and the other statement, on page 9 of plaintiffs' brief, shows every reason why she would not, if not under duress, have given him anything, she believing that he tried to kill her husband, and, while she was helpless, his intrusion into her house was enough to arouse her fears and overpower her free will.

These declarations, taken in connection with the five hours spent in forcing her to make the will, throw light on the subject, and were competent evidence. Redfield, Wills, 510, 511, note 2.

Brewer, J. — Action to set aside a will. Trial by a jury, and verdict against the will. The first matter which we shall notice is the alleged error in the admission of testimony. The will was challenged on the ground of undue influence, as well as on the ground that the decedent, at the time of its execution, was not of sound mind and memory. It appeared that the decedent was taken sick July 3d, and died on the 8th; that Dennis Mooney and Mrs. Mary McCarthy, the principal devisees and legatees under the will, were in attendance upon her during most of this time, and that the will was written the day before her death. Over objection, the court permitted testimony of the conduct of these devisees, not merely at the time of making the will, but also while present at the home of the decedent during the sickness, and immediately after her death; also of the statements of the decedent made prior to her sickness, (some a long time prior,) showing estrangement from and ill feeling towards Dennis Mooney; also of letters from him to her tending to show the same state of facts; also of an engagement of marriage, expected to be consummated on the tenth of July, to one who was present during most of the sickness, and was not mentioned in the will. . . .

The question of undue influence is one of peculiar character. It does not arise until after the death of the one who alone fully knows the influences which have produced the instrument. It does not touch the outward act, the form of the instrument, the signature, the acknowledgment; it enters the shadowy land of the mind in search of its condition and processes. Was the mind strong, or weak? clear of comprehension, or only feebly grasping the facts suggested? Was the will resolute and firm, or enfeebled by disease and bodily weakness? What prompted the making of the will? Was it the thought of the testatrix, or the suggestion of interested parties? What influences were brought to bear to secure its execution, or the disposition of any specific property? These are inquiries always difficult of solution, often made more so by the fact that the parties most competent to give information are the ones most interested to withhold it. To fully inform the jury, they should know the condition of the testatrix's mind at the time of the execution, the circumstances attending the execution, the relations and affections of the testatrix, and such other matters as tend to show what disposition if in health and strength, and uninfluenced, she would probably have made of her property. This opens a broad field of inquiry, and gives to such a contest over a will a wider scope of investigation than exists in ordinary litigation. "Put Yourself in His Place," is the title of a recent popular novel, and is appropriate to indicate the scope of such an inquiry. . . .

It is sometimes broadly stated that the declarations of a testator, whether prior or subsequent to the execution of the will, are inadmissible for the purpose of impeaching it. In a certain sense this is doubtless true. As a mere matter of impeaching the will, they are hearsay and inadmissible. They are not like statements of an ancestor in derogation of title or elimination of estate, which, being declarations against interest, are admissible against the heir, for there is no adverse interest in a devisor against the will or the devisee. They are more like declarations of a grantor, after grant, in limitation of his grant, and are strictly hearsay. Thus, if a testator, after executing a will, should say that the will was forced from him, or that it was executed against his will, and through undue influence, such statement, of itself, would be hearsay and inadmissible. . . .

But while declarations are not admissible as mere impeachment of the validity of a will, they are admissible as evidence of the testator's state of mind. A man's words show his mental condition. It is common to prove insanity by the party's sayings as well as by his acts. One's likes and dislikes, fears and friendships, hopes and intentions, are shown by his utterances; so that it is generally true that, whenever a party's state of mind is a subject of inquiry, his declarations are admissible as evidence thereof. In other words a declaration which is sought as mere evidence of an external fact, and whose force depends upon its credit for truth, is always mere hearsay if not made upon oath; but a declaration which is sought as evidence of what the declarant thought or felt, or of his mental capacity, is of the best kind of evidence. . . . Therefore where, as in a case like this, the circumstances attending the execution raise a doubt as to the mental strength of the testatrix, evidence that the disposition of the property runs along the line of her established friendships and previously-expressed intentions tends strongly against the idea of any undue influence; while evidence that it is contrary to such friendships and intentions makes in favor of improper influences. The testimony of her declarations shows a state of mind unfriendly to one of the principal devisees, and his letters to her indicate a mutual understanding of this estrangement and ill-will. Such an estrangement is out of harmony with the recognition in the will.

We see nothing in the record to justify a reversal of the judgment, and it will be affirmed.

455. HOBSON v. MOORMAN

SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE. 1905

115 Tenn. 73; 90 S. W. 152

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Fayette County; R. E. MAIDUN, Judge.

Petition by H. C. Moorman, as executor of the will of Jane B. George, deceased, to establish the same, to which Dan Hobson and others filed objections. From a decree sustaining the will contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Bullock & Timberlake and Chas. A. Stainback, for appellants. T. K. Riddick, T. J. Flippin, Wm. M. Mayo, and C. W. Crawford, for appellee.

MCALISTER, J. This is an issue of devisavit vel non from the circuit court of Fayette county. The will in controversy was executed by Mrs. Jane B. George, on the 23d day of October, 1899, and is attacked upon the ground of undue influence and want of testamentary capacity. The contestants are Lizzie Hobson, John D. Boyd, and Harry Boyd, family servants of the testatrix, and legatees under a prior will executed on the 29th day of June, 1898. The proponent of the present will is H. C. Moorman, who was appointed administrator cum testamento annexo. . . . The last trial, in November term, 1904, resulted in a verdict sustaining said paper writing as the last will and testament of Mrs. Jane B. George. . . . Under the first will the testatrix made no bequest whatever to Mrs. Mattie Goosman, while under the last will she is given an undivided one-sixth interest in the estate, after deducting the legacy given to her son George. . . . It is said in the brief of counsel for the proponent, that . . . shortly after the execution of the codicils to the first will, in April and September, 1899, Mrs. George sustained a very serious fall, which confined her to her bed, and that while so prostrated she fell under the influence of Mrs. Goosman, Mrs. Riley, and others, who induced her to make the second will, which did not represent her testamentary wishes, but in reality was the testament of those exerting this undue influence. . . .

"Up to June, 1898, Mrs. George had intended to bequeath her property to Mrs. Goosman, her son, George Goosman, and to the nieces and nephews of Mrs. George herself. Mrs. Goosman was the second cousin and adopted daughter of Mrs. George. Their relations were as intimate and friendly as they could have been, until June, 1898, when Mrs. George was led to believe that Mr. and Mrs. Goosman tried to poison her in order to get her property. Under the influence of this belief, she made a will, on June 29, 1898, disposing of her property in an entirely different way from what she had previously contemplated. There is no pretense that this belief was well founded, but Mrs. George persisted in it for several months. Proponent's theory is that she was encouraged in this belief by Mrs. Hazelwood, Lizzie Hobson, and John Harvey McElwee, but they deny it. Early in the year 1899, however, she became convinced that she had been poisoned, and immediately began to change her will. She added one codicil in April, 1899, and one in September, 1899. These codicils changed the will so much that, to use her own expression, she 'hardly knew what was in it.' So she finally resolved to make a new will altogether, which she did on October 23, 1899. This contained practically the same disposition of her property which she intended to make prior to the poisoning episode, and is the will now under contest." . . .

The first assignment of error made by contestants is based upon the action of the trial judge in excluding evidence of the declarations of the testatrix, made prior to the execution of the will in issue, for the purpose of establishing undue influence. . . .

As illustrating the effect of the charge of the Court in excluding evidence of previous declarations on the part of the testatrix, counsel for contestants have formulated the following propositions, viz.:

"(1) The hostile feelings of testatrix for Mrs. Goosman and her intention to exclude her from any testamentary disposition, evidenced by her declarations to third parties, her letters, and the first will, were competent and material facts to be considered as directly bearing upon the issue of undue influence; that is to say, whether the change in the will in issue from the previously expressed feelings and intentions of testatrix was attributable to the volition of the testatrix or to the exercise of an undue influence. . . .

"(7) That the declarations of Mrs. George, to the effect that Mrs. Goosman was intimidating her and endeavoring to get her to make another will, were competent and material evidence to be considered as bearing directly upon the question of undue influence." . . .

An examination of the record will show that a very wide scope was given to the introduction of the declarations of the testatrix as evidence, and that they were held competent by the circuit judge in his instructions to the jury for every purpose, except to establish the fact of undue influence.

The cardinal inquiry presented upon the first assignment of error is whether as a matter of law such declarations were competent as substantive evidence of undue influence. It is conceded on the brief of counsel for contestants that subsequent declarations are not competent evidence to establish undue influence. The law on this subject is well settled in this State. Peery v. Peery, 94 Tenn. 328, 29 S. W. 1; Earp v. Edgington, 107 Tenn. 31, 64 S. W. 40. But the contention now made is that there is a difference in principle between declarations of the testatrix, made prior to the execution of the will, and those subsequently made. Hence it is earnestly insisted that, while the evidence of subsequent declarations has been uniformly rejected, proof of prior declarations, tending to establish the fact of undue influence, has been received in this State. It will be useful at this point to review our decisions on this subject, at least so far as they are claimed by contestants to support the propositions now propounded. . . .

Mr. Wigmore, in his exhaustive treatise on the Law of Evidence (volume 3, § 1734), divides the declarations of a testator into seven different classifications, and states that in using any of these it is essential to keep in mind (1) what is the fact which the utterance is offered to evidence; (2) whether this fact is relevant, and in what way; (3) supposing it to be relevant, whether the utterance is admissible to evidence it. Under the fifth classification the author considers declarations that a particular will was procured by fraud or undue influence. At § 1738 the author treats this subject as follows:

"Utterances of the fifth and sixth classes, already enumerated, may be regarded in several aspects. The chief distinction is between their use as direct assertions of the fact of fraud or undue influence, for here they are met immediately by the hearsay rule, and their use as indicating directly or indirectly a condition of mind relevant to the issue, for here they are admissible either as circumstantial evidence or as statements of a mental condition under the present exception.

"The testator's assertion that a person, named or unnamed, has procured him, by fraud or by pressure, to execute a will, or to insert a provision, is plainly obnoxious to the hearsay rule, if offered as evidence that the fact asserted did occur:

"1868, Colt, J., in Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 122: When used for such purpose, they are mere hearsay, which, by reason of the death of the party whose statements are so offered, can never be explained or contradicted by him. Obtained, it may be, by deception or persuasion, and always liable to the infirmities of human recollection, their admission for such purposes would go far to destroy the security which it is essential to preserve. They are thus inadmissible, so far as they form 'a declaration or narrative to show the fact of fraud or undue influence at a previous period.' . . .

"But these utterances may be nevertheless availed of as evidence of the testator's mental condition, if the latter fact is relevant. Though the issue is as to his mental condition, with regard to deception or duress at the time of execution, yet his mental state, both before and afterwards, is admissible as evidence of his state at that time (on the principles of sections 230, 242, 394, 395, ante). Thus the question is reduced to a simple one, namely, what particular mental conditions of the testator, thus evidenced, are material as being involved in the broader issue of deception or undue influence? There are here recognized by the Courts two distinct sorts of mental condition.

"(1) The existence of undue influence or deception involves incidentally a consideration of the testator's incapacity to resist pressure and his susceptibility to deceit, whether in general or by a particular person. This requires a consideration of many circumstances, including his state of affections or dislike for particular persons benefited or not benefited by the will, of his inclinations to obey or to resist these persons, and, in general, of his mental and emotional condition, with reference to its being affected by any of the persons concerned. All utterances and conduct, therefore, affording any indication of this sort of mental condition, are admissible, in order that from these the condition at various times not too remote may be used as the basis for inferring his condition at the time in issue. This use of such data is universally conceded to be proper:

"1883, Dixon, J., in Rusling v. Rusling, 36 N. J. Eq. 603, 607: 'When undue influence is set up in impeachment of a will, the ground of invalidity to be established is that the conduct of others has so operated upon the testator's mind as to constrain him to execute an instrument to which of his free will he would not have assented. This involves two things: First, the conduct of those by whom the influence is said to have been exerted; second, the mental state of the testator, as produced by such conduct, which may require a disclosure of the strength of mind of the decedent and his testamentary purposes, both immediately before the conduct complained of and while subjected to its influence. In order to show the testator's mental state at any given time, his declarations at that time are competent, because the conditions of the mind are revealed to us only by its external manifestations, of which speech is one. Likewise the state of mind at one time is competent evidence of its state at other times not too remote, because mental conditions have some degree of permanency. Hence, in an inquiry respecting the testator's state of mind, before or pending the exertion of the alleged influence, his words, as well as his other behavior, may be shown for the purpose of bringing into view the mental condition which produced them, and, through that, the antecedent and subsequent conditions. To this extent his declarations have legal value. But, for the purpose of proving matters not related to his existing mental state, the assertions of the testator are mere hearsay. They cannot be regarded as evidence of previous occurrences, unless they come within one of the recognized exceptions to the rule excluding hearsay testimony.'" . . .

Now, recurring to the charge of the Court in the present case, we have already seen that his honor distinctly instructed the jury that they might look to the previous and subsequent declarations of Mrs. George, along with all the other proof in the case, for the purpose of determining what the condition of her mind was, at the time she performed the alleged testamentary act. The authorities already cited announce this rule so distinctly charged by the trial judge.

It is insisted, however, that he erred in his instruction that they could not look to these declarations as substantive evidence of undue influence, or, as he expressed it in another place, "such declarations could not be regarded as evidence of or as proving the fact of undue influence." . . . This question has been much mooted in the Courts of very many of the States, but has never been distinctly decided in this State, so far as we are apprised by any reported opinion.

In our opinion, the great weight of authority confirms the rule, announced by the circuit judge in his instructions to the jury, that such previous declarations are always admissible for the purpose of illustrating the mental capacity of the testator and his susceptibility to extraneous influence, and also to show his feelings, intentions, and relations to his kindred and friends, but such declarations are not admissible as substantive evidence of undue influence. . . .

For the reasons herein stated the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Topic 9. Spontaneous Exclamations

457. THOMPSON v. TREVANION. (1693. King's Bench, Skinner, 402). Ruled upon evidence, that a mayhem may be given in evidence, in an action of trespass of assault, battery, and wounding, as an evidence of wounding, per HOLT, Chief Justice; and in this case he also allowed, that what the wife said immediate upon the hurt received, and before that she had time to devise or contrive any thing for her own advantage, might be given in evidence; quod nota; this was at Nisi Prius in Middlesex for wounding of the wife of the plaintiff.

458. UNITED STATES v. KING. (1888. 34 Fed. 314). LACOMBE, J., (charging the jury). There is a principle in the law of evidence which is known as "res gestae," that is, the declarations of an individual made at the moment of a particular occurrence, when the circumstances are such that we may assume that his mind is controlled by the event, may be received in evidence, because they are supposed to be expressions involuntarily forced out of him by the particular event, and thus have an element of truthfulness they might otherwise not have. . . . But you are not to give any more weight to a declaration thus made, or any weight at all, unless you are satisfied that it was made at a time when it was forced out as the utterance of a truth, forced out against his will or without his will, and at a period of time so closely connected with the transaction that there has been no opportunity for subsequent reflection or determination as to what it might or might not be wise for him to say.

459. TRAVELERS' INSURANCE CO. v. SHEPPARD

SUPREME COURT OF GEORGIA. 1890

85 Ga. 751, 768; 12 S. E. 18

[ACTION on a policy of life insurance. Sheppard, the insured, was said to have been drowned, while on a hunting trip. The defence maintained that Sheppard had planned to defraud the insurers by pretending death; that he had in fact got out of his boat and swam ashore, and was now in hiding. See the further facts given ante, in No. 149.]

Boykin and Turner were the persons engaged with Sheppard in the hunt for deer which terminated in Sheppard's disappearance. . . . Turner was examined by interrogatories, and a portion of his testimony, some of it in answer to direct and some to cross-interrogatories, was, in substance, as follows: "Boykin and myself were to go down the river by land, and Sheppard was to run down in a boat, about three quarters of a mile, to a certain shanty, there to get out and make a stand. We were to rejoin him at that point. I went out 100 or 150 yards from the river, and Boykin was between the river and me, but how far from the river I do not know. As we were driving along down the river for deer, I heard a gun fire in the direction of the river, and afterwards some noise, but for some time I did not stop to listen. When I did stop, I heard some one calling me excitedly, and I went in that direction, and in a very short time met Boykin coming towards me in a run, and calling as he came. He was very much excited and looked very wild. When he came up he said, Tom Sheppard had killed himself, or had shot himself; which of these expressions he used I do not remember. We hurried back to the place. On the way back he said he heard the gun fire and heard a splash in the water, and thought he glimpsed Sheppard as he fell from the boat. He said he was right out there, indicating with his hand a spot about 15 or 20 yards from where Sheppard was, and there was a thick strip of canebreak between him and Sheppard. . . . The boat was found about 200 yards below where Boykin and I got out, and about 100 or 150 yards from where I was when the gun fired, at which time I had gone about 300 or 400 yards. I saw Boykin in a few minutes after I heard the gun." BLECKLEY, C. J. . . . Were the declarations made by Boykin to Turner admissible evidence as part of the res gestae?

The fact in issue was the accidental death of Sheppard. No witness saw him die or knew certainly that he was dead. . . . "Declarations accompanying an act, or so nearly connected therewith in time as to be free from all suspicion of device or afterthought, are admissible in evidence as part of res gestae." Code, § 3733. What the law altogether distrusts is not after-speech but after-thought. The Code introduces no new rule, but frankly recognizes in its letter the full breadth of the temporal element in the rule which it found existing, as expounded in the luminous and able opinion of Judge NISBET in Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 615, an opinion delivered in 1852. . . .

The rule contemplates that all the res gestae, including declarations forming part thereof, must transpire within the present time of the transaction. But that time, while it cannot be less, may be more extended than the present of the principal fact, in some instances a little, in others much, and in others very much more. Usually if they can all be ascertained, some of the res gestae will be found simultaneous with, and some anterior and others posterior to the principal fact. Thus, suppose an electric discharge during a summer shower to be the principal fact, the formation of the cloud, the falling of the rain, the thunder and its reverberation would all, for some purposes, be within the res gestae of the event, though the principal fact was but a flash of lightning.

This example may serve as a figure to characterize the instances in which declarations subsequent to the fact are receivable in evidence.

Let thunder represent mental impressions produced by the event. Then reverberation will represent admissible declarations reporting these impressions. It will represent them by a close analogy in two respects, first in being speedy, second in being spontaneous. That they shall be or appear to be spontaneous is indispensable, and it is for this reason alone that they are required to be speedy. There must be no fair opportunity for the will of the speaker to mould or modify them. His will must have become and remained dormant, so far as any deliberation in concocting matter for speech or selecting words is concerned. Moreover, his speech, besides being in the present time of the transaction, must be in the presence of it in respect to space. He must be on or near the scene of action or of some material part of the action. His declarations must be the utterance of human nature, of the genus homo, rather than of the individual. Only an oath can guarantee individual veracity. But spontaneous impulse may be a sufficient sanction for the speech of man as such, man as distinguished from this or that particular man. True, the verbal deliverance in each instance is that of an individual person. But if the state of his mind be such that his individuality is for the time being suppressed and silenced, so that he utters the voice of humanity rather than of himself, what he says is regarded by the law as in some degree trustworthy. Boykin's connection with Sheppard, his interest in what befel him, and his relation to Turner rendered it proper for him to make the communication which he did to Turner, and he made it upon the first opportunity, which opportunity was gained by running in quest of him, and in such a short time as reasonably to exclude any suspicion of device or afterthought. . . .

While we think it is not necessary to invoke the rule of discretion, yet under the operation of that rule it is safe to hold that there was no error in admitting the evidence.

460. Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & S. Louis R. Co. v. Haislup. (1907. 39 Ind. App. 394, 79 N. E. 1035). Roby, P. J. — A standard author states: "The typical case presented is a statement or exclamation by an injured person immediately after the injury, declaring the circumstances of the injury, or by a person present at an affray, a railroad collision, or other exciting occasion, asserting the circumstances of it as observed by him." 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1746, p. 2248. The general rule relative to the admission of evidence of this character has been frequently stated by the Courts of this State. . . . In the application of this general rule there is the greatest difficulty. "There is a lamentable waste of time by Supreme Courts in here attempting either to create or to respect precedents. Instead of struggling weakly for the impossible, they should decisively insist that every case be treated upon its own circumstances. They should, if they are able, lift themselves sensibly to the even greater height of leaving the application of the principle absolutely to the determination of the trial court. Until such a beneficial result is reached, their lucubrations over the details of each case will continue to multiply the tedious reading of the profession." 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1750, p. 2257.

SUB-TITLE III. HEARSAY RULE NOT APPLICABLE (RES GESTAE)

462. Introductory. The prohibition of the Hearsay rule, then, does not apply to all words or utterances merely as such. If this fundamental principle is clearly realized, its application is a comparatively simple matter. The Hearsay rule excludes extrajudicial utterances only when offered for a special purpose, namely, as assertions to evidence the truth of the matter asserted.

What here remains, then, is to distinguish and mark off the various classes of utterances which legally pass the gauntlet of the Hearsay rule because it does not apply to them. The classes of utterances thus exempt may be grouped under three heads:

1. Utterances material to the case as a part of the issue;

2. Utterances accompanying an ambiguous or equivocal act, itself material, and serving to complete the act and give it definite legal significance; i.e. verbal parts of an act;

3. Utterances used circumstantially, as giving rise to indirect inferences, but not as assertions to prove the matter asserted.

463. Professor James Bradley Thayer. (XV American Law Review 5, 81; 1881). If it be true, as it seems to be, that the phrase [res gestae] first came into use in evidence near the end of the last century, one would like to know what started the use of it just then. That is matter for conjecture rather than opinion. It would seem probable that it was called into use mainly on account of its "convenient obscurity." . . . The law of hearsay at that time was quite unsettled; lawyers and judges seem to have caught at the term "res gesta,"—. . . which was a foreign term, a little vague in its application, and yet in some applications of it precise, — they seem to have caught at this expression as one that gave them relief at a pinch. They could not, in the stress of business, stop to analyze minutely; this valuable phrase did for them what the limbo of the theologians did for them, what a "catch-all" does for a busy housekeeper or an untidy one — some things belonged there, other things might for purposes of present convenience be put there. We have seen that the singular form of phrase soon began to give place to the plural; this made it considerably more convenient; whatever multiplied its ambiguity, multiplied its capacity; it was a larger "catch-all." To be sure, this was a dangerous way of finding relief, and judges, text-writers, and students have found themselves sadly embarrassed by the growing and intolerable vagueness of the expression.

464. Cherry v. Slade. (1823. North Carolina. 2 Hawks 400). Mr. Gaston (afterwards Judge), (arguing pro querente against declarations of residence): It is sometimes said that there is an exception when words are the "res gestae" or part of the "res gestae." But this seems not to be accurate. The words are then received, not as evidence of the truth of what was declared, but because the speaking of the words is the fact, or part of the fact, to be investigated. There may be a controversy whether A. B. at a certain time spoke certain words, and those who heard him are of course received to prove the fact. The words spoken concurrently with an act done are often a part of the act, and give it a precise and peculiar character, and therefore must be testified, — not to show that the words spoken are true, but to show that they were in fact spoken. For example: Did A commit an assault on B? What he said when he laid his hands on B will show whether it was an angry or friendly act. Did the agent of defendant make a certain representation in the course of a bargain? If so, that representation was an ingredient in the bargain.

465. FABRIGAS v. MOSTYN

20 How. St. Tr. 137

[Action for false imprisonment of the plaintiff by the Governor of Minorca; defence, that the plaintiff excited sedition and riot. The reasonableness of the governor's apprehension of riot came into issue. The aide-de-camp to the governor testified that a native magistrate came to him to report that "Fabrigas said he would come with a mob . . . and they would see better days tomorrow."]

Mr. Peckham (for the defence). — You need not mention what the mustastaph told you; that is not regular.

Mr. J. Gould. — I should be glad to know how the Governor can be apprized of any danger unless it is by one or other of his officers informing him there is likely to be such and such a thing happen?

Mr. Peckham. — Hearsay is no evidence. . . .

Mr. J. Gould. — We do not take it for granted that it is really so; only that this gentleman, hearing of this, tells the Governor.

Mr. Lee (for the defence). — It is no evidence of the fact; if you mean it only as a report, we do not object.

466. TILTON v. BEECHER

Abbott's Rep. I, 800

[Action for criminal conversation. With reference to the plaintiff's having made inconsistent statements or admissions of the falsity of his claim, by stifling the matter when first publicly investigated, it was desired on his behalf to show the true significance of his conduct in handing to his agent, Mr. Moulton, a statement to be given by the agent to the investigating committee, appointed by the church to which the parties belonged.]

Mr. Fullerton (for the plaintiff, to the witness, Mr. Moulton). — What did he [the plaintiff] say in regard to it at the time he gave it to you? [Objected to.] . . . If I hand your Honor a certain paper, with a request to do a certain thing with it, for a certain purpose, is not that direction evidence?

Mr. Beach (for the plaintiff). — Let me put an illustration to your Honor. . . . Suppose Mr. Evarts comes to me and delivers a blow in my face, and at the instant of delivering that blow he accuses me of having injured him in some form; he gives the motives and the purpose with which he delivers that act; can that act be proved against Mr. Evarts, without permitting him to give the declaration accompanying the act?

Mr. Evarts (for the defendant). — That is a spoken act. That is not hearsay. It is a part of the blow; it is a spoken act. Some confusion, no doubt arises in lawyers' discussions about hearsay evidence that comes by word of mouth in connection with that act; but your Honor is familiar with the distinction that our learned friend has given. . . . Now if he [Mr. Tilton] gave instructions to take that paper and lay it before the council, or carry it to Mr. Beecher, that is a part of the act of delivering it to him. But this question is large enough to draw out, and so I suppose is intended to draw out, a larger line of hearsay evidence, to wit, conversations between Mr. Moulton and Mr. Tilton, with which Mr. Beecher cannot be affected.

Judge Neilson. — That distinction must be observed.

467. PARNELL COMMISSION'S PROCEEDINGS

11th, 13th, 17th, 18th days, Times' Rep. p. 103, 179

[The Irish Land League and its leaders being charged by "The Times" with a conspiracy to encourage outrage and agrarian violence, and the general state of the country as to disquiet and apprehension being a part of the issue, it was conceded that the fact of repeated complaints being made to the police and to employers by tenants and others was provable. In this process, testimony was offered, by "The Times," from employers, as to reports made to them by herdsmen and others of injuries to cattle, etc.; the reports being offered in verbal detail. To this Sir Charles Russell objected, for Mr. Parnell, as hearsay.]

The Attorney-General (in reply). — I would respectfully submit that my learned friend has forgotten the rule that the "res gestæ" may be proved; and if in the course of the proof of the facts it is shown that servants have made inquiries with regard to them and reported the result, those reports form part of the "res gestæ" for the purpose of ascertaining under what circumstances the occurrences took place.

Sir C. Russell. — As regards the "res gestæ," what is the "res"? That certain cattle were injured. How can it be part of the "res gestæ" that a man who was present, and saw the injury, afterwards made a statement to a third person of what he had seen? To say that this is part of the "res gestæ" is an entire misapprehension of the rule. . . .

President HANSEN. — The fact that a particular report had been made by a person in discharge of his duty was admissible in evidence, not that the contents of that report should be taken as evidence of the facts to which it related. If the matter rested there, without there being any other evidence of the facts except that contained in the report, that could not be regarded as evidence of the facts by the Court. . . . There is a broad distinction between a thing being merely admissible in evidence and its being taken as proof of the facts alleged.

468. WEBB v. RICHARDSON

42 Vt. 462

TRESPASS, q. c. f. Plea, the general issue. Trial by jury, September term, 1868, STEELE, J., presiding. Special verdict for the defendant. Exceptions by the plaintiff. This suit was commenced January 18, 1866. The land in question is lot 64, 2d div., Brunswick, except the north twenty acres. . . . The plaintiff did not claim to hold the land by any title derived by deed or chain of deeds from the original proprietor, but before resting offered evidence tending to prove that his possession was earlier than the defendant's, and also to prove that he had acquired the land by fifteen years' adverse possession. . . . The defendant claimed that the plaintiff could avail himself of no possession prior to 1822, because he had no color of title, but the Court ruled that inasmuch as there was a good line of marked trees around the lot, though not marked by Hawkins, that if Hawkins occupied a part of the lot and claimed the whole of it prior to 1822, that time should be reckoned in determining whether the plaintiff's grantors acquired the lot by possession. . . . This lot (64) has never been enclosed, and the larger part of it has never been improved, but the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the plaintiff's grantors, in his said line of deeds from Reuben Hawkins, had used different parts of it at different times and seasons for wood, timber, pasture, and crops, continuously since 1814, and had during the same period occupied the other lands covered by the said deed. The defendant's evidence tended to prove the contrary. In March and April, 1800, Reuben Hawkins purchased the rights of Stephen Noble and Zadoc Clark, one from Joseph Wait, the other from Hazen French, and these made what in some of the deeds in the plaintiff's chain of colorable title is called the "Hawkins Farm"; adjacent to this farm, and within sight of the buildings, was this lot 64. The plaintiff was permitted, against the defendant's objection, to prove that, prior to 1822, Reuben Hawkins, while working on lot 64, called it his "possession lot," and explained that he was claiming and getting it by possession, to which the defendant excepted. The plaintiff offered also to show that, at other times prior to 1822, the said Hawkins said the same things, when not on lot 64, but at his house and in sight of it, and pointing it out; which testimony the Court excluded, to which the plaintiff excepted. . . .

The jury found against the plaintiff in each respect.

H. & G. A. Bingham, for the plaintiff. Ray & Ladd and Henry Heywood, for the defendant.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Peck, J. — The Court properly admitted proof of the declarations of Reuben Hawkins, made while working on lot sixty-four to the effect that he called it his "possession lot," and that he was claiming and getting it by possession.

But the Court was in error in excluding "evidence to show that at other times, prior to 1822, the said Hawkins said the same things when not on lot sixty-four, but at his house and in sight of it, and pointing it out." To constitute a continuous possession it is not necessary that the occupant should be actually upon the premises continually. The mere fact that time intervenes between successive acts of occupancy does not necessarily destroy the continuity of the possession. The kind and frequency of the acts of occupancy, necessary to constitute a continuous possession, depend somewhat on the condition of the property, and the uses to which it is adapted in reference to the circumstances and situation of the possessor, and partly on his intention. If, in the intermediate time between the different acts of occupancy, there is no existing intention to continue the possession, or to return to the enjoyment of the premises, the possession, if it has not ripened into a title, terminates, and cannot afterward be connected with a subsequent occupation so as to be made available toward gaining title; while such continual intention might, and generally would, preserve the possession unbroken. This principle is tersely stated in the civil law, thus: a man may retain possession by intention alone, yet this is not sufficient for the acquisition of possession. . . . If the admissibility of such declarations is put on the ground of declarations constituting part of the res gestæ, they are admissible, as the res gestæ is not confined to a particular act of occupancy done upon the premises, but is the continual possession, which includes the successive acts of occupancy. Since a party who has once commenced a possession of land, by actual entry and acts of occupancy upon it, may continue to possess it during intervals when not upon it, he may claim it during such intervals as well as when actually upon the land doing acts of possession; and the fact of his making such claim is provable by evidence of his declarations made at the time, in the same manner and to the same effect as if made while on the land, doing an act of possession. Such declarations to show the adverse character of the possession are quite as much in the nature of facts as in the nature of a medium of proof.

The judgment of the County Court is reversed, and a new trial granted.

469. STATE v. FOX

SUPREME COURT OF NEW JERSEY. 1856

25 N. J. L. 566, 602

[MURDER. A witness for the prosecution testified to meeting the accused on the day of the murder, and proceeded to fix the time and place.] "It was between twenty and twenty-five minutes past ten o'clock when I reached home; I cannot fix the time by any other way than what my sister said; my sister remarked that I had been very quick, and that made me look at the clock." The counsel for the defendant here objected to the reception of the conversation of the said witness with her said sister as evidence in this cause, and moved the Court to overrule the same. The counsel for the State objected, and the Court thereupon admitted the said conversation in evidence, and refused to overrule the same.

To the question, "When was your attention first called to the fact of meeting the man referred to by you," the witness answered: "My attention was first called to the matter by being sent for to Brunswick by Mr. Jenkins. I first saw it in the papers; I think it was the 'New York Daily Times;' I think this was the following Tuesday. I heard of it from a neighbor before I left Brunswick, but I did not know that I knew about the affair. . . . What I saw in the 'Times' called my attention to the fact of having been to Brunswick that day, and meeting that man, and I mentioned it." Q. — "What particular feature in the affair did the neighbor call your attention to before you left New Brunswick?" A. — "She said, perhaps the man I met on Thursday morning might have had something to do with it." The counsel for the defendant here objected to the reception, as evidence in this cause, of the said conversation of the said witness with the said neighbor, and the remark of the said neighbor to the said witness, and moved to overrule the same. To which the counsel for the State objected. The Court thereupon admitted the said conversation and remark in evidence. . . .

The fifth and sixth errors assigned are, that the Court admitted in evidence the conversations of third persons with the witness.

GREEN, C. J. — The evidence was not offered or admitted to prove the truth of the facts stated to the witness, but merely to show what it was that called the attention of the witness to a fact stated by her or that fixed the fact in her recollection. Whether the statement of the third person was true or false was perfectly immaterial. The fact that the communication was made, and not its truth or falsity, was the only material point. The conversations were not hearsay, within the proper meaning of the term.

There is no error apparent in the record. The judgment must be affirmed.

470. STATE BANK v. HUTCHINSON

SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS. 1900

62 Kan. 9; 61 Pac. 443

ERROR from Reno District Court; MATTHEW P. SIMPSON, Judge. Opinion filed June 9, 1900. Affirmed.

This was an action brought by the State Bank of Chatham, New York, against W. E. Hutchinson, and Annie P. Hutchinson, his wife, on two promissory notes and separate mortgages securing them. One of the notes was for $4000, and the mortgage securing it was given on property in the city of Hutchinson, part of which constituted the homestead of the Hutchinsons. The other note was for $6000, and the mortgage securing it was given on a section of farming land. The Valley State Bank and the Bank of Hutchinson, being claimants to a mortgage lien on the section of land, were made defendants to the action.

W. E. Hutchinson was the president of the Valley State Bank, of Hutchinson. He was indebted to the State Bank of Chatham on a personal obligation in the sum of $10,000. As collateral security to his indebtedness, he had transferred certain notes and chattel mortgages on cattle. One George L. Morris, the president of the plaintiff bank, came to Kansas to investigate the chattel-mortgage collaterals and adjust the Hutchinson indebtedness. He could not find the cattle described in the mortgages nor the makers of those instruments. He accused Hutchinson of fraud, and threatened to prosecute him criminally and cause him to be sent to the penitentiary unless the indebtedness due to his bank was at once paid or secured. These threats were not made to Hutchinson personally, but were made to one C. B. Wilfley and one John J. Welch, officers of the bank of which Hutchinson was president. They communicated the threats to Hutchinson, who, in turn, communicated them to his wife. In order to satisfy Morris, as agent of the plaintiff bank, and induce him to forego a criminal prosecution against Hutchinson, the latter, together with Wilfley and Welch, the other officers of the Valley State Bank, agreed with Morris to convey to Mrs. Hutchinson a section of farming land, owned by the bank, in order that the Hutchinsons might give a mortgage on it, along with their homestead and other city property, as security for the debt which Hutchinson owed to the State Bank of Chatham. This conveyance was made. . . .

The jury found that the note and mortgage of $4000 on the homestead were executed by Mrs. Hutchinson under the duress of her fears excited by Morris's threat to arrest and criminally prosecute her husband. As before stated, this threat was not made to her, nor was it made to her husband, but it was made to her husband's business associates and by them communicated to him and by him to her. A daughter of the Hutchinsons testified that she overheard the conversation between her father and mother, in which the former disclosed to the latter the threats which Morris had made. This was objected to, and its admission was assigned as error.

McKinstry & Fairchild, for plaintiff in error. The daughter's testimony to what the father said was hearsay.

Martin & Roberts, and H. Whiteside, for defendants in error.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

DOSTER, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). . . . Counsel for plaintiff in error contend against the admissibility of this testimony, upon the ground that it was hearsay in character. . . . Neither of these contentions is sound.

There were three substantive litigated questions in the case — First, were threats made? And, if so, secondly, were they communicated to Mrs. Hutchinson? And, if so, thirdly, did they produce the claimed effect? As to the second of these as well as the first, the meritorious question was, had a verbal act been done? That is, had a communication been made? That act, if done, was not incidental or collateral in nature. It was one of the three principal litigated matters in the case, and, being such, the performance of the act was provable by the testimony of any one who, if competent, was a witness to it. The question was not whether Hutchinson's communication to his wife was truthful, but it was whether the communication had been in fact made. The rule is general that, where a substantive litigated fact is the speech of a person, one who heard the utterance is admitted to testify to it, and the testimony so received is not hearsay. . . . It is a general rule in the law of evidence that, when the inducing cause of the action of a person is the subject of inquiry, the information upon which he acted may be stated, although it consists of the speech of third persons. A familiar illustration of this rule is afforded in cases of defense against assaults. It is always admissible in such case to show the making of threats by those who overheard them, and their communication to the defendant, upon the strength of which he armed himself, and resisted the assault of his antagonist. Judgment affirmed.

471. PIEDMONT SAVINGS BANK v. LEVY

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA. 1905

138 N. C. 274; 50 S. E. 657

APPEAL from Superior Court, Surry County; O. H. ALLEN, Judge.

Action by the Piedmont Savings Bank, as trustee, against L. Levy. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

This is an action by the plaintiff, as trustee in bankruptcy of N. D.

Young & Co., against the defendant, for the recovery of possession of a stock of goods which the defendant had acquired from the bankrupt a short time prior to the bankruptcy. Upon the trial below the Court submitted the following issues: (1) Was the conveyance of the stock of goods from Young & Co. to Levy made with the intent and purpose on their part, or either of them, to hinder, delay, or defraud their creditors, or any of them? Ans. Yes: (2) Did the defendant purchase in good faith, and without knowledge or notice of such fraudulent intent on the part of Young & Co., or either of them? Ans. Yes. (3) Is the plaintiff trustee the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of the property described in the complaint? Ans. . . .

Louis M. Swink, Lindsay Paterson, and Watson, Buxton & Watson, for appellant. Manly & Hendred, for appellee.

Brown, J.—Upon the trial of this action the plaintiff, for the purpose of proving fraud on the part of the transferrors, N. D. Young & Co., as well as the transferee, the defendant, offered in evidence certain declarations of John A. Stone, which were admitted by the Court upon the first issue, but excluded as evidence against the defendant on the second issue. As this was erroneous, and necessitates a new trial, we will notice no other exception.

The entire evidence tended to prove that John A. Stone was the owner of the business, goods, and merchandise of Young & Co., at Pilot Mountain; that Young "loaned Stone the use of his name," and acted as clerk. It is contended by defendant that this stock of goods, which is the subject of the controversy, was purchased by the defendant from Stone on April 6, 1903. There is no evidence that Young knew anything of such alleged purchase until April 21, 1903. There is no evidence that the goods were taken possession of by the defendant until after April 21st. The defendant himself testifies that he did not take possession until April 21st, when a deputy sheriff levied on the goods under an execution against N. D. Young & Co., but claims that Stone was to hold the goods for the defendant as his bailee. Defendant never notified Young that he claimed the goods or had any interest in them until April 21st. All the evidence shows that the goods were in the actual possession of John A. Stone and his clerk, Young, up to April 21st, and that the receipts from sales were paid over to Stone every day by Young, and the business conducted just as it had been since its establishment in December, 1902.

The declarations of Stone, claiming the goods, and inconsistent with an absolute sale, made to several persons at different times between April 6th and April 21st, are contended by plaintiff to be competent evidence upon the question of fraud as against the defendant upon two grounds: (1) Because there is evidence tending to prove a conspiracy between Stone and Levy to defraud Stone's creditors; (2) because Stone remained in actual possession and control of the goods until April 21st, and there was no change in the conduct of the business until then.

As we think the evidence is clearly competent against the defendant upon the second ground, we will not consider the first. . . . .

(2) The possession and control of the goods having been retained by the debtor, Stone, up to April 21st, and after his alleged sale to the defendant on April 6th, was sufficient of itself to impress upon the transaction a fraudulent character. It was incumbent upon the defendant to explain the character of that possession. The defendant offered his own evidence, tending to remove the legal presumption of fraud, and to prove that, without any knowledge upon the part of Young, or any one else, the defendant left Stone in possession as defendant's agent and bailee. Was such possession of Stone in fact and truth the possession of a bailee of the purchaser, or was it merely colorable, and a part of the machinery of fraud? The character of Stone's possession thus became a most material inquiry upon the second issue. This rule of evidence is the same in respect to real and personal property. Wigmore on Evidence, § 1083.

The general doctrine, as laid down by all the text-writers and innumerable adjudications, is that the declarations of the vendor made after the sale may be given in evidence if the vendor continues to hold possession of the goods. The rule is often stated that the declarations of a party in possession either of real or personal property explanatory of and characterizing his possession constitute a part of the res gestæ, and may properly be allowed in evidence. . . . The underlying basic principle of the rule is that, the debtor transferror's intent being a necessary part of the issue of fraud, all his conduct and declarations while in possession of the property, real or personal, and dealings with it, which indicate his intent, are receivable in evidence against him and his transferee, inasmuch as the conduct and utterances of a person are indicative of his knowledge, beliefs, purposes, or intent when they are facts in issue. . . . In Askew v. Reynolds,[1] which is a case on all fours with this, Judge Gaston, after stating that the possession of the slaves having been retained by the debtor after the execution of his bill of sale was sufficient to impress upon the transaction the character of a fraudulent transfer, unless from other facts and circumstances another character could clearly be assigned to it, decides that the declarations of the grantor, as evidence against the grantee upon the question of fraud, were competent, and should have been received in evidence. This learned and accomplished jurist says:

"Generally the acts or declarations of a grantor after the conveyance made are not to be received to impeach his grant. The rights of the grantee ought not to be prejudiced by the conduct of one who at the time is a stranger to him and to the subject-matter of those rights. But the acts and declarations rejected in this case were those of the possessor of the property, were connected with that possession, and formed a part of its attendant circumstances. They were collateral indications of the nature, extent, and purposes of that possession. They were to be admitted, not because of any credit due to him by whom they were done or uttered, but because they qualified and characterized, or tended to qualify and characterize, the very fact to be investigated."

Prof. Wigmore, in his elaborate treatise on Evidence, § 1086, p. 1300, quotes the larger part of Judge Gaston's opinion, and says: "This theory can hardly be impugned in its logic. Reduced to a rule, it admits the declarations when made during possession, whether or not the debtor is a party to the cause." We have not only the high authority of Judge Gaston in support of our view, but we have the equally high authority of Chief Justice RUFFIN, who says in Foster v. Woodfin, 33 N. C. 339, after fully endorsing the opinion of Judge GASTON:

"Where a man has conveyed a personal chattel, but still retains the possession, his acts and declarations, even subsequent to such conveyances, while he remains in possession, are evidence against the vendee or grantee on a question of fraud." . . .

There are a number of other cases in our own Reports, which with striking uniformity sustain the view we have here presented. It would be a work of supererogation to add anything more to the weight of authority which we have invoked.

As there was much debate as to the competency and scope of the evidence offered, we have gone into the question more fully than we otherwise would. . . .

New trial.

TITLE IV. PROPHYLACTIC RULES

472. Introductory. These Prophylactic Rules operate in one or both of two slightly different ways. The expedient which they apply serves either to eliminate the supposed testimonial danger by counteracting its influence in advance, or to furnish a means by which it can be discovered and other measures can be taken to counteract it at the trial. The Oath operates in the first way only, by setting against the witness' motives to falsify his fear of divine punishment and thus nullifying in advance the influence of the former. The Perjury-Penalty operates in the same way, merely substituting the fear of temporal punishment for the fear of divine punishment. The Publicity rule operates in both of the above ways, first, by subjecting the witness to the fear of the later consequences of public opinion and of a present exposure by interested bystanders, and, next, by providing the means of counteracting his possible falsities through the presence of those who can contradict him. The Sequestration of Witnesses operates partly in the first way, by preventing collusion, but chiefly in the second way, by furnishing a means of exposing that collusion if it has already taken place. The Notice of Evidence to the Opponent operates only in the second way, by furnishing the opponent, in advance of the trial, with knowledge of the proposed evidence, and by thus enabling him to prepare to expose false evidence; though perhaps there is also involved an effect of the first sort, in subjectively deterring the opponent from offering that which he knows can be shown false.

SUB-TITLE I. OATH

473. History. The employment of oaths takes our history back to the origins of Germanic law and custom, where, as in all primitive civilizations, the appeal to the supernatural plays an important part in the administration of justice. But the use of oaths for witnesses appears as only a single and subordinate phase of the general resort to oaths. The early Germanic modes of trial consisted largely in a reference, in one form or another, to the judicium Dei. By oaths formally taken one might even establish his claim or his plea beyond attack. It was not a matter of weighing the credibility of a sworn statement; the thought was rather that such an appeal could not be falsely made with impunity. To such an invocation a judicial and determinative effect was attributed by the religious notions of the times.

The progress from this notion of the oath at large (which left its traces as late as the 1800s in some of the common modes of procedure) to the second stage of a test or security for credibility was slow and gradual.

In the 1700s came the beginning of a third stage of development, in which legislation sanctioned what the community had come finally to believe, namely, that the inexorable requirement of an oath worked injustice and that theological belief should not obstruct the admission of competent witnesses. In this stage the tendency has been either to make the application of the oath optional with the witness, or to abandon its essential feature by rendering theological belief unnecessary.

It is with the second stage that the common law has to deal; the ideas of the first stage having practically disappeared entirely from the common law of the last three centuries. The changes constituting the third stage of abandonment or election have everywhere been made by legislation. The common-law questions are: (1) What was the nature and what the form of a testimonial oath? (2) What was the capacity necessary in order to be able to take the oath? (3) What testimony is required to be subjected to it?

474. Joseph Chitty. The Practice of the Law. 4th Amer. ed., (1841) I, 616. The form at the assizes or sessions is, for the clerk of arraigns or of the peace to desire the witness to take the book in one hand, and, when that is done, to say to him, "The evidence you shall give between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoner at the bar shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, So help you God!" upon which the witness kisses the book.[1]

475. Clinton v. State (1877, Ohio, 33 Oh. St. 33). Ashburn, J. The purpose of the oath is not to call the attention of God to the witness, but the attention of the witness to God; not to call upon Him to punish the false-swearer, but on the witness to remember that he will surely do so. By thus laying hold of the conscience of the witness and appealing to his sense of accountability, law best insures the utterance of truth.

476. Lady Lisle's Trial. (1685, Winchester, 11 How. St. Tr. 325). [The duke of Monmouth had raised a rebellion in the West, to dethrone James II and oust the Roman Catholic influence. The duke's army was made up of Puritans and other sections of Protestants. It was defeated and fled. To try the captured rebels, Chief Justice Jeffreys started on the "Bloody Assizes" in August. At Winchester, Lady Lisle, sainted and honoured in the community, was charged with harboring some of the fleeing rebels, was found guilty, and executed. The following testimony was exacted from one of the rebels who had received the shelter.]

Mr. Pollexfen. — Next, my lord, we come to prove the message and correspondence between this same Hicks, and the prisoner Mrs. Lisle.

Mr. Jennings. — Swear Mr. James Dunne. (Which was done.)

Mr. Pollexfen. — If your lordship please to observe, . . . I must acquaint your lordship, that this fellow, Dunne, is a very unwilling witness; and therefore, with submission to your lordship, we do humbly desire your lordship would please to examine him a little more strictly.

L. C. J. — You say well. Now mark what I say to you, friend. . . . Thou hast a precious immortal soul, and there is nothing in the world equal to it in value. . . . Consider that the Great God of Heaven and Earth, before whose tribunal thou and we and all persons are to stand at the last day, will call thee to an account for the rescinding his truth, and take vengeance of thee for every falsehood thou tellest. I charge thee, therefore, as thou will answer it to the Great God, the judge of all the earth, that thou do not dare to waver one tittle from the truth, upon any account or pretense whatsoever; . . . for that God of Heaven may justly strike thee into eternal flames and make thee drop into the bottomless

[1] The usual form of words in civil cases differed slightly:

"The evidence that you shall give to the Court and jury, touching the matters in question, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; So help you God!"

lake of fire and brimstone, if thou offer to deviate the least from the truth and nothing but the truth. . . .

According to the command of that oath that thou hast taken, tell us who employed you, when you were employed, and where? Who caused you to go on this message, and what the message was? . . .

L. C. J. — Who shewed thee the way to thy lodgings? Dunne. — The girl.

L. C. J. — Who else didst thou see in the house? Dunne. — I saw no body at all.

L. C. J. — Then who shewed thee thy way to the stable, and helped thee with horse-meat? Dunne. — Nobody helped me to horse-meat.

L. C. J. — Why, thy horse did not feed on thy cake and cheese, did he? Dunne. — There was hay in the rack, my lord.

L. C. J. — Was the stable door locked or open? Dunne. — The stable door was latched, and I plucked up the latch. . . .

L. C. J. — . . . . Didst thou see that man Carpenter the bailiff that thou spokest of? Dunne. — Mr. Carpenter gave my horse hay. . . .

L. C. J. — Did you see anybody else but that girl you speak of? Dunne.— My lord, I did see the girl there. . . .

L. C. J. . . . . Sirrah, tell me plainly did you see nobody else? Dunne. — No, my lord.

L, C . J. — Not anybody? Dunne. — No, my lord, not any one. . . .

L. C. J. — Recollect yourself, and consider well of it. Dunne. — Truly, my lord, I do not know of anybody else.

L. C. J. — Now upon your oath tell me truly, who it was that opened the stable door, was it Carpenter or you? Dunne. — It was Carpenter, my lord.

L. C. J. — Why thou vile wretch, didst not thou tell me just now, that thou pluckedst up the latch? Dost thou take the God of heaven not to be a God of truth, and that he is not a witness of all thou sayest? Dost thou think because thou prevaricatest with the court here, thou canst do so with God above, who knows thy thoughts? And it is infinite mercy, that, for those falsehoods of thine, he does not immediately strike thee into hell! Jesus God! there is no sort of conversation nor human society to be kept with such people as these are, who have no other religion but only in pretence, and no way to uphold themselves but by countenancing lying and villainy! Did not you tell me that you opened the latch yourself, and that you saw nobody else but a girl? How durst you offer to tell such horrid lies in the presence of God and of a court of justice? . . . Thou art a strange prevaricating, shuffling, sniveling, lying rascal.

Mr. Pollexfen. — We will set him by for the present, and call Barter, that is the other fellow. . . .

L. C. J. — Then let my honest man, Mr. Dunne, stand forward a little. Come, friend, you have had some time to recollect yourself; let us see whether we can have the truth out of you now. . . . I charge thee, therefore, as thou wilt answer it to that God of truth, and that thou mayest be called to do, for aught I know, the very next minute, and there thou wilt not be able to palliate the truth; what was that business you and my lady spoke of? (Then Dunne paused for half a quarter of an hour, and at last said):

Dunne. — I cannot give an account of it, my lord.

L. C. J. — Oh blessed God! Was there ever such a villain upon the face of the earth; to what times are we reversed! Dost thou believe that there is a God? Dunne. — Yes, my lord, I do.

L. C. J. — Dost thou believe, that that God can endure a lie? Dunne. — No, my lord, I know he cannot.

L. C. J. — And dost thou believe then that He is a God of truth? Dunne. — Yes, my lord, I do.

L. C. J. — Dost thou think, that that God of truth may immediately sink thee into hell-fire if thou tellest a lie? Dunne. — I do, my lord.

L. C. J. — I therefore once more adjure thee, as thou wilt answer it to that God, that is the Searcher of the hearts and trier of the reins, to whom all hearts are open, and from whom no secrets are hid, that thou make me a plain answer to my question; and as thou hast called God to bear witness to the truth of the evidence thou givest here in this court, so I charge thee, in His name, to declare the truth, and nothing but the truth. Now tell us what was the business you spoke of? (But he made no answer.) . . .

Mr. Rumsey. — Now, my lord, Dunne says he will tell all, whether it make for or against him.

L. C. J. — Let him but tell the truth, and I am satisfied. Dunne. — Sure, my lord, . . . when we came to my Lady Lisle's on the Tuesday night, somebody took the two horses, I cannot tell who, if I were to die; the two went in; and after I had set up my horse, I went in along with Carpenter up into the chamber to my lady, and to this Hicks and Nelthorp; and when I came there, I heard my lady bid them welcome to her house; and Mr. Carpenter, or the maid, I cannot tell which, brought in the supper, and set it on the table. . . .

L. C. J. — And why didst thou tell so many lies then? Jesus God! that we should live to see any such creatures among mankind. . . . I pity thee with all my soul and pray for thee, but it cannot but make all mankind to tremble and be filled with horror, that such a wretched creature should live upon the earth.

477. OMICHUND v. BARKER

Willes 538; 1 Atk. 45; 1 Wils. 84

SEVERAL persons resident in the East Indies and professing the Gentoo religion, having been examined on oath administered according to the ceremonies of their religion under a commission sent there from the Court of Chancery, it became a question whether those depositions could be read in evidence here; and the Lord Chancellor, conceiving it to be a question of considerable importance, desired the assistance of LEE, Lord Chief Justice, B. R., WILLES, Lord Chief Justice, C. B., and the Lord Chief Baron PARKER, who after hearing the case argued[1] were unanimously of the opinion that the depositions ought to be read. . . .

WILLES, C. J. — As to the general question, Lord Coke has resolved it in the negative, Co. Lit. 6 b, — that an infidel cannot be a witness; and it is plain by this word "infidel" he meant Jews as well as heathens, that is, all who did not believe the Christian religion. . . . Having now, I think, sufficiently shown that Lord Coke's rule is without foundation either in Scripture, reason, or law, that I may not be understood in too general a sense, I shall repeat it over again, that I only give my opinion that such infidels who believe a God and that he will punish them if they swear falsely, in some cases and under some circumstances, may and ought to be admitted as witnesses in this though a Christian country. And on the other hand, I am clearly of opinion that such infidels (if any such there be) who either do not believe a God, or if they do, do not think that he will either reward or punish them in this world or in the next, cannot be witnesses in any case nor under any circumstances, for this plain reason, because an oath cannot possibly be any tie or obligation upon them.[1] . . .

[1] A case of which Burke said in 1794 (Works, Little, Brown & Co's. ed., XI, 77): "one of the cases the most solemnly argued that has been in man's memory, with the aid of the greatest learning at the bar, and with the aid of all the learning on the bench, both bench and bar being then supplied with men of the first form."

In order to obtain justice the plaintiff in this cause laid his case properly before the Court of Chancery, and prayed a commission to Calcutta; and the Court of Chancery, I think very rightly and with great justice, ordered a commission to go, and that the words "on the Holy Evangelists" should be omitted, and the word "solemnly" inserted in their room; and likewise very prudently directed that the commissioners should certify upon the return of the commission in what manner the oath was administered to the witnesses examined on the commission; and what religion they were of. The commissioners accordingly returned that the oath was administered to the witnesses in the same words as here in England, which fully answers the objection (if there was anything in it) that the form of the oath cannot be altered; and they certified that after the oath was read and interpreted to them, they touched the Bramin's hand or foot, the same being the usual and most solemn manner in which oaths are administered to witnesses who profess the Gentoo religion, and in the same manner in which oaths are usually administered to persons who profess the Gentoo religion on their examination as witnesses in the Courts of justice erected by virtue of his Majesty's letters-patent at Calcutta; and they further certified that the witnesses so examined were all of the Gentoo religion. This certificate, I think, fully answers the objection that it does not appear that the witnesses believe a God, or that he will punish them if they swear falsely; which, as I have already said, I admit to be requisites absolutely necessary to qualify a person to take an oath. . . . Lord Stairs, in his Institutes of the Laws of Scotland, p. 692, confirms this, where he says, "It is the duty of Judges in taking the oaths of witnesses to do it in those forms that will most touch the conscience of the swearers according to their persuasion and custom; and though Quakers and fanatics deviating from the common sentiments of mankind refuse to give a formal oath, yet if they do that which is materially the same, it is materially an oath." . . . The form of oaths varies in countries according to different laws and constitutions, but the substance is the same in all. . . . It would be absurd for him to swear according to the Christian oath, which he does not believe; and therefore, out of necessity, he must be allowed to swear according to his own notion of an oath.

[1] [In another of the reports, his words are: "Though I am of opinion that infidels who believe a God and future rewards and punishments in the other world may be witnesses, yet I am as clearly of opinion that if they do not believe a God or future rewards and punishments, they ought not to be admitted as witnesses." Ed.]

HARDWICKE, L. C. . . . (approving a passage from Bishop Sanderson): "Juramentum," saith he, "est affirmatio religiosa." All that is necessary to an oath is an appeal to the Supreme Being, as thinking him the rewarder of truth and the avenger of falsehood. . . .

The next thing . . . is the form of the oath. It is laid down by all writers that the outward act is not essential to the oath. . . . It has been the wisdom of all nations to administer such oaths as are agreeable to the notion of the person taking.

478. MILLER v. SALOMONS. (1852. Exchequer. 7 Exch. 535, 558, 615). ALDERSON, B. Omichund v. Barker has settled that it ought to be taken in that form and upon that sanction which most effectually binds the conscience of the party swearing. Thus, a Jew is to be sworn on the Book of the Law and with his head covered, a Brahmin by the mode prescribed by his peculiar faith, a Chinese by his special ceremonies, and the like.

POLLOCK, C. B. . . . It appears to me to have decided merely this, — that the common law of England agrees with the law of nations, that the form of an oath is to be accommodated to the religious persuasion which the swearer entertains.

MARTIN, B. . . . The doctrine laid down [in Omichund v. Barker] was that the essence of another oath was an appeal to the Supreme Being in whose existence the person taking the oath believed, and whom he also believed to be a rewarder of truth and an avenger of falsehood.

479. PEOPLE v. MATTESON. (1824. New York. 2 Cow. 433). WALWORTH, J. I apprehend the true test of the competency of a witness to be this: Has the obligation of an oath any binding tie upon his conscience? Or in other words, does the witness believe in the existence of a God who will punish his perjury? If he swears falsely, does he believe he will be punished by an overruling Providence, either in this world or in the world to come?

480. BRADDON'S TRIAL

(1684. 9 How. St. Tr. 1127, 1148)

Attorney General. What age are you of? Witness. I am thirteen, my lord.

A. G. Do you know what an oath is? W. No.

L. C. J. JEFFERIES. Suppose you should tell a lie; do you know who is the father of liars? W. Yes.

L. C. J. Who is it? W. The devil.

L. C. J. And if you should tell a lie, do you know what will become of you? W. Yes.

L. C. J. If you should call God to witness to a lie, what would become of you then? W. I should go to hell-fire. L. C. J. That is a terrible thing. [And the child was admitted].

481. CHARLES DICKENS. Bleak House (1852). Chap. XI. [Little Joe, the crossing-sweeper, is called to the coroner's inquest, to say what he knows of the dead lodger, and these are his answers]: "Name, Jo. Nothing else that he knows on. . . . No father, no mother, no friends. Never been to school. What's home? Knows a broom's a broom, and knows it's wicked to tell a lie. Don't recollect who told him about the broom, or about the lie, but knows both. Can't exactly say what'll be done to him after he's dead if he tells a lie to the gentlemen here, but believes it'll be something wery bad to punish him, and serve him right, and so he'll tell the truth." "This won't do, gentlemen!" says the coroner, with a melancholy shake of the head. "Don't you think you can receive his evidence, sir?" asks an attentive juryman. "Out of the question," says the coroner. "You have heard the boy. 'Can't exactly say,' won't do, you know. We can't take that, in a court of justice, gentlemen! It's terrible depravity. Put the boy aside." Boy put aside; to the great edification of the audience; especially of Little Swills, the comic vocalist.

482. HUGHES v. DETROIT, GRAND HAVEN & MILWAUKEE R. CO.

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN. 1887

65 Mich. 10; 31 N. W. 605

ERROR to Superior Court of Detroit. (CHIPMAN, J.) Argued October 21 and 22, 1886. Decided February 10, 1887. Case. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Plaintiff, a little colored boy, who is now between six and seven years old, and was, when injured, five years old or under, recovered judgment in the superior court of Detroit for personal injuries causing the loss of a leg and some other damage. In July, 1884, towards the close of the day, but during daylight, according to the claim of his declaration, he was on the front of a switching locomotive which was making up and distributing freight trains, and standing upon a plank step used for switchmen and brakemen to stand upon in their yard-work, and, as he asserts, was thrown off by a sudden start or a sudden stop, and run over. The negligence alleged was the failure of the train-men to put him off before moving, and the rapid action in starting and stopping. . . .

George Jerome (E. W. Meddaugh, of counsel), for appellant. S. E. Engle, for plaintiff.

CAMPBELL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). . . . Under the charge, as already given, the jury were directed not to find for plaintiff unless the engineer actually saw the plaintiff on the foot-board. . . . It was not disputed, but admitted on the argument in this court, that, if the engineer actually saw the boy on the foot-board before moving, he would be bound to use efficient care to prevent injury to him; but he is denied that he was on the foot-board, or, if so, was seen by the engineer, or any one else, in that position. The fact that the boy himself is the only witness who says the engineer saw him renders another question important, which is how far this testimony was admissible. . . .

There was conflicting testimony as to the likelihood or possibility of seeing him on the board. He himself says he ran back and forth over it while the engine was not moving, and finally got on it just before starting, and then stayed on till he fell off. He also says he faced the engine, while the other testimony would not so indicate. All of this shows the great importance of this particular fact, and the danger of assuming it when the testimony conflicted. So it was equally important to know whether, if seen at all, he was seen before starting. . . . The boy's own testimony as to how he fell off is not quite the same in the direct as on the cross-examination. On the direct, the impression he gives is that he was thrown off by a sudden starting and jerk. On the cross-examination he says he was carried forward, and in no other direction, with the engine, until near the switch, and then fell off close by the switch. Rosa Bushy, one of his witnesses, on the other hand, says the engine went back with him towards Hastings street before taking him east to the switch. . . .

The charge seemed to go upon the idea that the plaintiff's account was the one to be chiefly acted on by the jury. . . . Passing by minor points, this makes it necessary to determine concerning the admissibility of this proof. It has been held by this Court, as well as Courts generally, that the fact that a child is under seven years does not create an absolute disability to testify. This was held in McGuire v. People, 44 Mich. 286, and is the doctrine of the text-books. But the authorities all agree that a child cannot testify unless capable of appreciating the obligation of oath, if he takes an oath, or of his affirmation if that is substituted. And this is upon the ground that a witness must be under some pressure, arising out of the solemnity of the occasion, beyond the ordinary obligation of truth-telling. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 367; 1 Phillipps, c. 2, (C. & H.) and notes. One or the other of these methods of attestation is required of all witnesses, children or adults, and persons unsworn cannot testify unless they prefer the other form, which in this State is under the pains and penalties of perjury.

The fact that the child was to be put under oath or affirmation was not brought to his attention at all, so as to show whether he did or did not understand the bearing or effect of it. He merely said he must tell the truth, or he would go to hell; but, when asked about any other consequences, he showed entire ignorance, and only said that his mother told him the day before that he would go to hell if he did not speak the truth. This is all that he said bearing on his veracity. He was examined by counsel, and not particularly tested by the Court, and the Court, without making any personal examination, certifying or in any way giving an opinion that the boy understood the nature or obligation of an oath or affirmation, left it all to the jury, to be tested by the ordinary questioning and cross-questioning by counsel. This is what might, no doubt, be safe with many other persons besides children who usually tell the truth, and may have their truth substantially tested, whether sworn or not. But the law entitled parties to insist that all witnesses shall be put under some solemn obligation before testifying, and excludes witnesses who are incapable of understanding its sanction. . . . It is necessary to be left very much to the discretion of the trial judge if he undertakes to exercise that discretion, and acts upon such an examination as satisfies his own mind. He should conduct this examination as in his judgment will be effectual. It cannot safely be left to counsel to make the examination. In McGuire's Case, before referred to, the judge gave a careful personal examination to the child, and formed a distinct opinion of his own, founded on that examination. As the preliminary inquiry cannot be and is not under oath, there is the strongest reason for very careful action by the judge himself on his official responsibility. The cases and text-books recognize this distinctly. See 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, §§ 367, 368, and notes; 1 Edw. Phillipps, Evidence, 11, and notes. In England it has been held that recent teaching for the occasion is not in itself sufficient, because the knowledge thus received may not be comprehended. 1 Edw. Phillipps, Evidence, 11; Rex v. Williams, 7 Car. & P. 320.

. . . We are compelled to apply the law as we find it, until changed by legislation.[1] But we are greatly impressed with the practical imperfection of the present rules. In France, and probably elsewhere, the courts refuse to administer an oath to children of tender years, and allow them to be examined without anything more than suitable cautions, leaving their statement on direct and cross examination to be taken for what they are worth. This seems to be a sensible proceeding, and is probably quite as efficacious as our own system, and less likely to abuse. There is a proper desire in courts to receive such testimony as will throw light on the case, and there is no doubt that in practice children are often allowed to testify whose legal capacity to do so is very liberally construed.

[1] Act No. 82, Laws of 1887, provides:

"That whenever a child under the age of ten years is produced as a witness, the Court shall, by an examination made by itself publicly or separately and apart, ascertain to its own satisfaction whether such child has sufficient intelligence and sense of obligation to tell the truth to be safely admitted to testify, and in such case such testimony may be given on a promise to tell the truth, instead of upon oath or statutory affirmation, and shall be given such credit as to the court or jury, if there be a jury, it may appear to deserve."

It would be better, we think, to put their testimony on the more rational ground that it is calculated to be of some value, and capable, under a proper examination, of being reasonably well weighed for what it is worth.

For the reasons given, the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

CHAMPLIN and SHERWOOD, JJ., concurred.

MORSE, J.—In this case there is ample testimony, outside of the evidence of Hughes, that the boy was standing on the foot-board of the engine in such a position as to be easily discernible by the engineer and fireman.

In order to prevent a recovery in this case it is necessary to get rid of the boy's testimony; and an earnest argument was directed to this court to establish the proposition that the age of the child, and his ignorance of the nature of an oath, as developed by his preliminary examination in the court below, should have led in that court to the rejection of his testimony. I, for one, take no stock in this proposition, and have but little patience to examine such an argument. I cannot consent for a moment to any rule of law, however fortified by remote or later decisions of the courts, that will practically exclude the testimony of children under seven years of age, and leave them, in many cases, without redress for wrongs committed upon them. Our criminal annals are full of cases where little girls under seven years of age are outraged and maltreated by fiends in human form. They are entitled, above all others, to the thorough and complete protection of the law; and I shall place no obstacles in the way of the punishment of the miserable and depraved beings who are capable of such crimes against nature and the law. If an extraordinary intelligence is required in the child, if she must understand the nature of an oath or affirmation, and that without any recent teaching, as one English case seems to hold, (Rex v. Williams, 7 Car. & P. 320,) before she can testify, then there is necessarily an absolute prohibition against her testimony; and any injury to her, unless some one is present to witness the act except the perpetrator, must go unpunished and unredressed. The most ignorant and depraved adult, under all the authorities, can testify under oath or by affirmation, and no preliminary examination to test his intelligence is required or provided for. There can be found but few, if any, children of the age of this colored boy that have any idea, without teaching, of the nature of an oath. Though we may take pains to instruct our children from the moment they can prattle that they must tell the truth, it is seldom, if ever, that we take the trouble to instruct our infants in the practice of the courts, or the nature or the obligations of oaths there taken. But if an injury should happen to one of them, which ought to find redress in the courts, we would be apt, and I think we would have the right, to then instruct the child, not only to tell the truth, but of the nature and obligation of the oath which it would be required to take. The object of all judicial inquiry is to ascertain and determine the truth, and an oath is but a means to that end.

It is not necessary now that an adult should believe in hell, or any other punishment after death, in order to be a competent witness; and the catechism of a child upon that subject, as was done in this case, is not only ridiculous, but absurd. Children should have at least equal rights with adults in this respect. There can be but little, if any, trouble, in these cases, of determining the truth or falsity of the testimony of a child. The danger of perjury comes from the examination of older and more experienced persons, who take the oath at once, without fear and without question. The proper way, in my judgment, is to examine the child upon the subject of its intelligence, and, if found capable by the trial judge of understanding the nature and force of the oath or obligation to be taken, after proper instruction by the Court as to the duty of telling the truth, and the consequences attending falsehood, the oath should be administered, and the testimony received by the court, to be tested and weighed by the jury according to the usual standard.

In the present case, the boy evidently understood that he must tell the truth, and that he would be punished here for a falsehood, though he did not know what the punishment would be, and thought that God would inflict it. Who will say that he was not right even in this, or deny that Deity does not in this world find means to punish the evil-doer with the pangs of conscience, if not otherwise? . . .

I think the Court did not err in this action, and that his remarks were sound, in common sense and in law. The boy was clearly and keenly cross-examined by competent and shrewd counsel, and displayed an intelligence upon such examination not surpassed by any witness, and not equaled by some. And his evidence impresses me with its truth. His story of the transaction is candid and straightforward throughout, and unusually intelligent in its detail. The jury believed it, and there is, in my opinion, absolutely no reason for shutting it out of the case. If we are to discard the simple, unaffected narration of this child because he is not of an age to be punished criminally for telling a lie, and yet to receive in all cases, as we do, the evidence of suspected and condemned felons, subject only to the credence that a jury may give them, then the law is not, as I understand it, a safeguard and a protection to the innocent, and a terror to the evil-doer.

I find no error in the proceedings, and believe that the judgment is right as it now stands.

484. HRONEK v. PEOPLE

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1890

134 Ill. 139; 24 N. E. 861

WRIT of Error to the Criminal Court of Cook county; the Hon. LORIN C. COLLINS, Judge, presiding.

The plaintiff in error, John Hronek, was indicted, with Frank Chapek, Frank Chleboun and Rudolph Sevic, for violation of an act of the Legislature of this State, entitled "An act to regulate the manufacture, transportation, use and sale of explosives, and to punish an improper use of the same," approved June 16, 1887, and in force July 1, 1887. . . . The defendant Hronek was alone put upon trial, and that trial resulted in a verdict of guilty, and fixing his punishment at twelve years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. . . .

Objection was made to the competency of Frank Chleboun, a witness for the People, who was permitted to testify, over the objection of the defendant. He was examined upon his voir dire, and avowed his belief in the existence of God, and "a hereafter;" that he believed if he swore falsely he would be punished under the criminal laws of the State; that he had never thought seriously of whether God would punish him, either in this world or the next, and had never considered the question whether he would be punished for false swearing in any other way than by that inflicted by the law. He had, it seems, no religious belief or conviction of his accountability to the Supreme Being, either in this world or in any after life.

Mr. Julius Goldzier, for the plaintiff in error. . . . Chleboun, not believing in a future state of existence and future rewards and punishment, was not a competent witness. . . .

Mr. George Hunt, Attorney-General, for the People. . . .

Mr. Justice Baker (after stating the case as above) delivered the opinion of the Court:

1. The test of the competency of a witness in respect to religious belief, as generally held, is, does the witness believe in God, and that He will punish him if he swears falsely. . . . In Central Military Tract Railroad Co. v. Rockafellow, 17 Ill. 541, where, after a consideration of the authorities, it was held that all persons are competent to be sworn as witnesses who believe there is a God, and that He will punish them, either in this world or in the next, if they swear falsely; and that a want of such belief rendered them incompetent to take an oath as witnesses. This case, seemingly, overruled the doctrine of the earlier case of Noble v. The People, Beecher's Breese, 54.

Without pausing here to determine whether the Court erred in subjecting the witness to an examination touching his religious belief, (Rapalje on Witnesses, § 12, and cases cited), it may be said that the better practice, and that which now prevails, forbids the examination of the witness in respect thereof on his voir dire. If there was error in this regard, it was committed at the instance of the defendant, and in his interest, and he can not complain.

Returning to the question of the competency of the witness, the rule seems to be as above stated, unless changed by constitutional provision or legislative enactment. The tendency of modern times, by the Courts and in legislation, is towards liberalizing the rule, and in many jurisdictions incompetency for the want of religious belief has been abolished. See Rapalje on Witnesses, § 13; Wharton on Evidence, § 395.

2. Has the rule announced by this Court in Central Military Tract Railroad Co. v. Rockafellow, been changed in this State? By section 3 of article 2 of the Constitution of 1870, it would seem that a radical change was effected in respect to the matter under consideration. This section guarantees non-interference of the State with the religious faith of its citizens. . . . No religious belief is required to qualify a citizen to take an oath, and no citizen can be excused from taking an oath or affirmation because of his religious belief. The liberty of conscience secured by the Constitution is not to be construed as dispensing with oaths or affirmations in cases where the same are required by law. No man, because of his religious belief, is to be held to be excused from taking the prescribed oath of office before entering upon the discharge of the public duty; nor can he be permitted to testify, because of such religious belief or opinion, except upon taking the oath or making the affirmation required by law. Now, as before the adoption of this provision, oaths are to be taken and affirmations made whenever required by law, but the right to take such oath or make such affirmation, if such right be a civil right, privilege or capacity, can not be denied to any citizen. . . . The Constitution provides that no person shall be denied any civil or political right, privilege or capacity on account of his religious opinions. . . . The obvious meaning of the provision in the Constitution is, that whatever civil rights, privileges or capacities belong to or are enjoyed by citizens generally, shall not be taken from or denied to any person on account of his religious opinions. As said by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, in construing a similar provision of the Constitution of that State in Bush v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky 244:

"It is a declaration of an absolute equality, which is violated when one class of citizens is held to have the civil capacity to testify in a court of justice because they entertain certain opinions in regard to religion, while another class is denied to possess that capacity because they do not conform to the prescribed belief."

It is manifest, that if the Legislature may prescribe the test of belief in rewards and punishments, they may impose any other test or qualification that, in the judgment of those entertaining the dominant belief, may be necessary to afford the requisite sanction. . . .

We are of the opinion that the effect of this constitutional provision is to abrogate the rule which obtained in this State prior to the constitution of 1870, and that there is no longer any test or qualification in respect to religious opinion or belief, or want of the same, which affects the competency of citizens to testify as witnesses in courts of justice. It follows, that there was no error in permitting the witness to testify. . . .

Judgment affirmed.

SUB-TITLE II. SEQUESTRATION OF WITNESSES

486. The History of Susanna. (Apocrypha). [Two elders coveted Susanna, a very fair woman and pure, the wife of Joacim; they tempted her, but she resisted; then they plotted, and charged her with adultery; and she was brought before the assembly to be tried;] and the elders said: "As we walked in the garden [of Joacim] alone, this woman came in with two maids, and shut the garden doors, and sent the maids away. Then a young man, who there was hid, came unto her, and lay with her. Then we that stood in the corner of the garden, seeing this wickedness, ran unto them. And when we saw them together, the man we could not hold, for he was stronger than we and opened the door and leaped out. But having taken this woman, we asked who the young man was, but she would not tell us. These things do we testify." Then the assembly believed them, as those that were the elders and judges of the people. . . . [But Daniel,] standing in the midst of them, said . . . "Are ye such fools, ye sons of Israel, that without examination or knowledge of the truth ye have condemned a daughter of Israel?" . . . Then Daniel said unto them, "Put these two aside, one far from another, and I will examine them." So when they were put asunder one from another, he called one of them, and said unto him: "Now then, if thou hast seen her, tell me, under what tree sawest thou them companying together?" who answered, "Under a mastick tree." And Daniel said, "Very well; thou hast lied against thine own head." . . . So he put him aside, and commanded to bring the other, and said unto him, . . . "Now therefore tell me, under what tree didst thou take them companying together?" who answered, "Under an holm tree." Then said Daniel unto him: Well; thou hast also lied against thine own head." . . . With that, all the assembly cried out with a loud voice, and praised God who saveth them that trust in him. And they arose against the two elders, for Daniel had convicted them of false witness, by their own mouth. . . . From that day forth was Daniel had in great reputation in the sight of the people.

487. Kerne's Trial. (1679, 7 How. St. Tr. 707, 709). [Charge of being a Roman priest; two women, Edwards and Jones, were offered to testify to hearing him say mass.]

Defendant. I desire to ask her what discourse she had with Mary Jones, the other witness, for she has been instructing her what to say, and that they may be examined asunder; (which was granted).

L. C. J. Scroggs. Did she [Jones] tell you what she could say?

Edwards. She did.

L. C. J. What?

Edwards. She went once to hearken, and she heard Mr. Kerne say something in Latin, which she said was mass.

L. C. J. Call the other woman; you shall now see how these women agree.

Clerk. Call Mary Jones.

L. C. J. Let the other woman [Edwards] go out. . . . What did you [Jones] tell her you could say?

Jones. I told her . . . he said somewhat aloud that I did not understand.

L. C. J. Did you not tell Margaret Edwards that you heard him say mass?

Jones. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Call Margaret Edwards again. Margaret Edwards, did Mary Jones tell you that she heard Mr. Kerne say mass?

Edwards. Yes, my lord.

Jones. No, I am sure I did not, for I never heard the word before, do not know what it means.

L. C. J. So they contradict one another in that.

488. Golden v. State. (1858. Arkansas, 19 Ark. 590). Hanley, J. The course in such case is either to require the names of the witnesses to be stated by the counsel of the respective parties by whom they were summoned, and to direct the sheriff to keep them in a separate room until they are called for; or, more usually, to cause them to withdraw by an order from the bench accompanied with notice that if they remain they will not be examined.

489. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. York. (1902. Alabama, 128 Ala. 305). McClellan, C. J. The purpose to be subserved in putting witnesses under the rule is that they may not be able to strengthen or color their own testimony, or to testify to greater advantage in line with their bias, or to have their memories refreshed, sometimes unduly, by hearing the testimony of other witnesses; and it is legitimate argument against the veracity or fairness of a witness to say that his testimony has been developed along the lines of his inclination in the case by the opportunities he has had, from hearing the other witnesses, to refute them or to amplify his own statements to meet the exigencies of the trial.

490. Statutes. California (P. C. 1872, § 867). [A committing magistrate] may exclude all witnesses who have not been examined; he may also cause the witnesses to be kept separate, and to be prevented from conversing with each other until they are all examined.

Ib., § 868. [He] must also, upon the request of the defendant, exclude from the examination every person except his clerk, the prosecutor and his counsel, the attorney-general, the district attorney of the county, the defendant and his counsel, and the officers having the defendant in custody.

Ib. (C. C. P. 1872, § 2043). If either party requires it, the judge may exclude from the court-room any witness of the adverse party; [amended by the Commissioners in 1901, by adding:] but a party to the action or proceeding cannot be so excluded, and if a corporation is a party thereto, it is entitled to the presence of one of its officers, to be designated by its attorney.

491. LAUGHLIN v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF OHIO. 1849

18 Oh. 99, 102

THE plaintiff in error was indicted for rape, and for an assault with intent to commit a rape, and convicted and sentenced upon the latter charge. . . .

Before the examination of the witnesses had been commenced, the counsel for the defendant requested that the witnesses for the State should be examined out of the hearing of each other; and that they should be ordered to withdraw from the court room, and the order was made as requested. Notwithstanding this order, Robert Johnson, the father of the girl, whose name was not on the subpœna as a witness, but who was sworn with the other witnesses before they retired, and who remained in court, seated by the counsel for the State, and heard the testimony of his daughter and the other witnesses who were examined, was offered as a witness on the part of the State. The counsel for the defendant objected to his being examined, he having, contrary to the order of the Court, remained within the bar. When inquired of by the Court why he disobeyed the order in remaining within the bar, he stated that he heard the order of the Court, but did not understand the meaning of it. The Court overruled the objection, and Johnson was examined as a witness. . . .

CALDWELL, J. The most important question arising in the case, and the only one that the counsel for the accused have relied on in argument, arises on the admission of Robert Johnson, the father of the girl, as a witness.

This is a question of no little delicacy. It relates exclusively to the fairness of proceeding on the trial. Much may be said on both sides of the case, and on part of the accused in this case, many considerations meriting a careful examination have been presented. On the one side, where the order of the Court has been made for the witnesses to retire, and be examined out of the hearing of each other, if a witness remains in violation of the order, it furnishes strong ground of suspicion that the witness is not fairly disposed in the cause, and that he wishes to avail himself of the testimony of the other witnesses, in order to make his statements as potent as possible, by making them correspond with theirs. Where, too, a party in interest in the cause, after the order has been made, should procure his witnesses to be present in violation of such order, it is equally suspicious that he intends a similar degree of wrong and unfairness. On the other hand, when we consider the little control that a party can have over his witnesses; the little attention he is likely to be able to give to their movements; the crowds and the confusion that generally exist during exciting trials; the questions that may arise on the trial that could not be anticipated, and which may require bystanders to be called in as witnesses, who have been present and heard the other witnesses testify, — these, and other considerations which might be presented, render it difficult and we think impossible to establish any general rule of exclusion that would not in many cases deprive parties of important and necessary testimony for the fair presentation of their cause.

We do not find that any rule has been established, in this country, that would justify this Court, as a Court of errors, in deciding that it was error in an inferior Court to admit a witness who had violated the order, and heard the other witnesses testify. We think the law is the other way; and that the Court of Common Pleas in this instance had the right, in their discretion, to admit the witness. Judgment affirmed.

SUB-TITLE III. DISCOVERY BEFORE TRIAL.

492. History. I. Discovery of one's evidence to the opponent before trial is a measure which assists greatly to promote fairness and to shorten controversy.

Where the testimony intended to be produced is false, the opponent would thus have the knowledge and opportunity to demonstrate on the trial its falsity, by bringing other testimony; without such prior knowledge, he would not be prepared; it would be an instance of "unfair surprise" (ante, No. 2). Moreover, even where the testimony is not actually false, yet it might be explainable or rebuttable by other facts, and here also a prior knowledge would be fair and useful.

Furthermore, controversy would be shortened; because a party who might otherwise intend to adduce false or misleading testimony would know it to be useless, if the opponent could have prior notice and an opportunity to prepare to refute or to explain it. Thus, a false claim or defense would often be abandoned, and a settlement reached, without trial, because the attempt to prove it on the trial would be futile.

For these reasons, discovery to the opponent before trial is a valuable prophylactic measure.

Nevertheless, it involves dangers. It presupposes the party thus forced to give discovery is the party having a dishonest or unfounded claim or defense, and that the opponent is the honest party who needs protection. But in fact the case may be the exact opposite; and thus the prior discovery given by the honest party may enable the dishonest opponent to prepare false testimony in refutation. Experience shows this to be a frequent situation. Hence, a rule requiring unlimited discovery is not of unalloyed benefit. Just where the line should be drawn practically is a difficult question.

II. But at common law there was little or no attempt to draw a line. The principle of common law trials was in general that no discovery at all need be given. Each party went to the trial without being obliged to disclose to the opponent the evidence held in readiness. This feature was due to the surrounding — the Anglo-Norman traditions of landed aristocracy and bold manhood — amidst which the common law was developed.

The common law, originating in a community of sports and games, was permeated essentially by the instincts of sportsmanship. This has had both its higher aspects and its lower aspect. On the one hand, it has contributed a sense of fairness, of gentlemanliness, of chivalrous behavior to a worthy adversary, of carrying out a contest on equal and honorable terms. The presumption of innocence, the character rule, the privilege against self-crimination, and other specific rules (to name those of evidence alone), show the effect of this instinct against taking undue advantage of an adversary. The minor rules of professional etiquette (now surviving much more markedly in England than in the United States) illustrate the same tendency even more clearly. On the other hand, it has contributed to lower the system of administering justice, and in particular of ascertaining truth in litigation, to the level of a mere game of skill or chance. Now one of the cardinal moral assumptions in a contest of skill or chance is that a player need not betray beforehand his strength of resource, and that the opponent cannot complain of being surprised. The accepted laws and moral standards of whist protect the player from exposing his cards before playing them; the owner of the racing-stable keeps as a valuable secret the time made by his horse in the last private trial before the race; and a chess-player's skill consists largely in concealing from his opponent the far-seeing sequence of moves which he has planned. It is this feature of games and sports that has influenced powerfully the policy of the common law in the present aspect. "Nemo tenetur armare adversarium suum contra se." To require the disclosure to an adversary of the evidence that is to be produced, would be repugnant to all sportsmanlike instincts. Rather permit you to preserve the secret of your tactics, to lock up your documents in the vault, to send your witness to board in some obscure village, and then, reserving your evidential resources until the final moment, to marshal them at the trial before your surprised and dismayed antagonist, and thus overwhelm him. Such was the spirit of the common law; and such in part it still is. It did not defend or condone trickery and deception; but it did regard the concealment of one's evidential resources and the preservation of the opponent's defenceless ignorance as a fair and irreproachable accompaniment of the game of litigation. There is no accounting for this except as in part a product of a characteristic instinct of the Anglo-Norman community in which our law grew up.

There were but two marked exceptions to the rule that no discovery need be given before trial. (a) The ancient doctrine of Profert and Oyer permitted a party to obtain inspection, before trial, of sealed instruments material to his opponent's case. The principle was partly extended by Lord Mansfield; but this extension lost ground after his death. (b) In Chancery, a bill of discovery would enable a party to obtain discovery of documents in the opponent's possession and of the opponent's personal testimony. But even this bill of discovery was limited in its scope; and the expense and tediousness of employing it made it useless except in the most important litigation.

III. By the middle of the 1800s, the obstructions to justice, due to a lack of discovery in common law trials, was fully appreciated. Long before this, indeed, an early step had been taken in criminal cases (in the early 1700s), by a statute allowing the accused to be furnished with a list of the prosecution's intended witnesses; but this applied only to trials for treason. By the middle of the 1800s, statutes had everywhere made large inroads upon the common law rules.

In criminal cases, the prosecution was required to furnish the accused, on demand, with a list of the witnesses.

In civil cases, the party was required (a) to give discovery of his own testimony to the opponent, though not to give discovery of the names or expected testimony of his witnesses, and (b) to give discovery of his documents. In some statutes the apparent object was merely to transfer to common law trials the chancery practice, with its existing limitations; in others the apparent purpose was a broader one.

The construction of the effect of these statutes upon the traditional common law practice is the main subject of present-day judicial rulings.

493. Stephen Colledge's Trial (1681. Howell's State Trials, VIII, 569). [The accused was a Protestant joiner at Oxford, charged with fomenting a so-called Presbyterian plot against the King. Chroniclers agree that the politicians in power were determined to convict him, as an example against meddlers. The principal witnesses against him turned out later to be arrant perjurers. On his arraignment Colledge thus complained of his unfair treatment.]

Then the prisoner was brought to the bar.

Cl. of Cr. — Stephen Colledge, hold up thy hand. (Which he did). . . . How sayest thou, Stephen Colledge, art thou guilty of this high treason, whereof thou standest indicted, and hast now been arraigned, or not guilty?

Colledge. — My lord, I do desire, if it please your lordship, to be heard a few words.

L. C. J. Scroggs. — Look you, Mr. Colledge, the matter that hath been here read unto you is a plain matter, and it hath been read to you in English, that you may understand it. It is an indictment of High Treason. . . .

Colledge. — Will you please to spare me, that I may be heard a few words. I have been kept a close prisoner in the Tower ever since I was taken. I was all along unacquainted with what was charged upon me. I knew not what was sworn against me, nor the persons that did swear it against me, and therefore I am wholly ignorant of the matter. I do humbly desire, I may have a copy of the indictment, and a copy of the jury that is to pass upon me, and that I may have counsel assigned me, to advise me, whether I have not something in law pleadable in bar of this indictment.

L. C. J. — These are the things you ask, you would have a copy of the indictment, you would have counsel assigned to you, to advise you in matter of law, and a copy of the jury. . . . Now for those things that you demand, you cannot have them by law. No man can have a copy of the indictment by law. . . . For a copy of the jury, that you cannot have neither, for there is no such thing as yet. . . . So as to what you say as to want of preparation for your trial, we cannot enquire what notice you have had; and yet if you had never so little time, there is no cause why you should not plead, though you were but just now taken and brought to the bar to answer it, and never heard of any thing of it before. So that I think you ought to plead presently. . . .

Colledge. — I had some papers, my lord, that were taken from me, which I desire may be restored to me. I only plead, that I may have my birthright, and that which the law gives me; if I may have justice, I desire no more. Those papers were taken from me in the house over the way since I was brought from the prison; they were papers that concerned my defence; some directions and instructions how to manage myself in that defence. If you please to let me have those papers, I will not take up much of your time; I desire to have but common justice, and that which is my right by law. . . .

L. C. J. — You can say whether you are not guilty, without any papers. . . .

Colledge. — If I had those papers, I could tell what I should plead. . . .

Cl. of Cr. — You have heard the opinion of the Court, you must first plead.

Colledge — I cannot plead first. I must lose my life, if I must; I neither know who accuses me, nor what it is they accuse me of; it is impossible I could defend myself if I have not my papers.

L. C. J. — We know not what papers you mean.

Colledge. — The gaoler took them from me, and one of the king's messengers. . . .

Just. Jones. — But this is a matter of fact, and therefore you may plead not guilty, as well without your papers, as if you had them. . . .

L. C. J. — Why don't you plead not guilty, then? . . . .

Colledge. — Mr. Attorney, pray let me have a copy of the indictment.

Att. Gen. — Apply yourself to the Court for it, we must receive our directions from thence.

L. C. J. — You have had the opinion of the Court, you can't have it. . . . If you desire the indictment read over again distinctly, that you may have.

Att. Gen. — Ay, with all my heart.

Colledge. — Pray let me hear it again, my lord, if you please.

L. C. J. — Read it over again to him, and read it distinctly. . . .

Colledge. — Pray, my lord, either give me my papers or assign me counsel, or else I may throw away my life, for I am wholly ignorant of the law.

L. C. J. — When you have pleaded, we will hear any motion you will make, and do that which is just upon it; but I see no use you can have of papers to plead guilty, or not guilty, which is the only question is asked you. . . .

Just. Jones. — You have heard the indictment read, what say you? For you must propose the matter. . . .

Colledge. — I pray I may have my papers again; if there be no other plea for me, pray let me have my papers again.

L. C. J. — You have heard the opinion of the Court; you must plead. . . .

Cl. of Cr. — Are you guilty or not guilty?

Colledge. — Why then, as they have laid it in that indictment, in manner and form as it is there laid, I am not guilty. . . .

L. C. J. — Now he has pleaded, Mr. Attorney. He speaks of some papers, if there be any memorandums, or anything that must assist him that is necessary for his defence in his trial in those papers, it will be hard to deny him them.

Att. Gen. — If your lordships please to give me leave, I will give you an account of them. The messengers just now did deliver these papers to be delivered to the Court. . . . But if it please your lordship, I desire you would enter into the examination of this matter; for I have an account from London by a special messenger, that there are several persons go up and down to procure witnesses against the king's evidence, making it a public cause; and here, my lord, is another paper which is a list of men as witnesses picked up together against the king's witnesses.

L. C. J. — He must have that, deliver him that presently.

Att. Gen. — But, my lords, others have gone about and framed witnesses for him.

L. C. J. — You must give him the list of his witnesses, for I see not what use you can make of it. . . . What hurt is there, if the papers be put into some trusty hands, that the prisoner may make the best use of them he can, and yet they remain ready to be produced upon occasion: if a man be speaking for his life, though he speak that which is not material, or nothing to the purpose, there will be no harm to permit that. . . .

Att. Gen. — If people are permitted to go up and down and ask counsel of persons, and bring it in papers to the prisoner, it is the same thing as if counsel came to him. . . .

Colledge. — Shall I not have the use of my papers, my lord: will you not please to deliver them back to me now you have perused them? . . .

L. C. J. — For that which contains the names of the witnesses, that you have again: for the other matters, the instructions in point of law, . . . that were to give you counsel in an indirect way, which the law gives you not directly.

Colledge. — If I am ignorant what question to ask of the witnesses, shall not my friends help me, my lord?

L. C. J. — We will sift out the truth as well as we can, you need not fear it. . . .

Colledge. — Will you please to give me the paper that has the questions in it, to ask the witnesses?

L. C. J. — There are no papers with any particular questions to any one witness, but only instructions how to carry yourself in this case. . . . We have ordered that you shall have a transcript of the paper of instructions, leaving out that which is scandalous.

Colledge. — I desire I may have a copy of the whole.

Just. JONES. — No, we do not think fit to do that.

Colledge. — Pray let me know which you do except against.

L. C. J. — Look you, Mr. Attorney, I think we may let him have a copy of the whole.

494. Sir JAMES STEPHEN. History of the Criminal Law. (1883, Vol. I, pp. 225, 398). I do not think any part of the old procedure operated more harshly upon prisoners than the summary and secret way in which justices of the peace, acting frequently the part of detective officers, took their examinations and committed them for trial. It was a constant and most natural and reasonable topic of complaint by the prisoners who were tried for the Popish Plot that they had been taken without warrant, kept close prisoners from the time of their arrest, and kept in ignorance of the evidence against them till the very moment when they were brought into Court to be tried. This is set in a strong light by the provisions of [1709, St. 7 Anne, c. 21, § 14, allowing a list of witnesses in treason]. . . . This was considered as an extraordinary effort of liberality. It proves, in fact, that even at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and after the experience of the State trials held under the Stuarts, it did not occur to the Legislature that, if a man is to be tried for his life, he ought to know beforehand what the evidence against him is, and that it did appear to them that to let him know even what were the names of the witnesses was so great a favor that it ought to be reserved for people accused of a crime for which legislators themselves or their friends and connections were likely to be prosecuted. It was a matter of direct personal interest to many members of Parliament that trials for political offences should not be grossly unfair; but they were comparatively indifferent as to the fate of people accused of sheep-stealing or burglary or murder. . . . [The prisoner] was not allowed as a matter of right, but only as an occasional exceptional favor, . . . to see his [own] witnesses or put their evidence in order. When he came into Court, he was set to fight for his life with absolutely no knowledge of the evidence to be produced against him.

496. STATE v. MYERS

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI. 1906

198 Mo. 225; 94 S. W. 242

APPEAL from Clay Circuit Court. — Hon. J. W. ALEXANDER, Judge. Affirmed.

At a special term of the Circuit Court of Clay county, convened on the 5th day of June, 1905, the defendant was put upon her trial and convicted of murder in the first degree. Motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were duly filed, heard, and overruled, and exceptions saved. Thereupon the defendant was duly sentenced on the 24th day of June, 1905, in accordance with the verdict of the jury. From that judgment and sentence she has appealed to this Court. . . .

The first error alleged by the defendant is the refusal of the Circuit Court to grant the defendant a continuance after both parties had announced ready for trial, and after the jury had been impaneled, on the grounds that the names of the witnesses Frank Hottman, Nettie Hottman, Bertha Hottman, Ella Hottman, and John Hottman were not indorsed upon the information until after the jury were sworn to try the case, and because the defendant had not been otherwise notified that said witnesses were to be used against her until after the jury was sworn. The names of 54 witnesses were indorsed on the information. The record does not disclose what names of witnesses were indorsed when the information was filed in court, but it does show that 49 names were indorsed on the information by the prosecuting attorney by leave of the Court on the 16th day of March, 1905. After the jury was sworn to try the case, and before any evidence was offered, the prosecuting attorney by leave of the Court, over the objection of the defendant, indorsed on the information the additional names of the witnesses Frank, Nettie, Bertha, Ella, and John Hottman. After the opening statement of the prosecuting attorney, the defendant further objected to going to trial, for the reason that the opening statement of the prosecuting attorney of Jackson county, Mo., to the jury, disclosed a state of facts which was to be sustained and proved only by said Hottmans, and that the defendant was not prepared to meet their testimony. The Court overruled the objection, and the defendant excepted. The defendant afterward filed an affidavit in support of her exception and objection.

Frank Gordon, R. B. Ruff, W. E. Fowler, and Jos. S. Brooks, for appellant. (1) The Court erred in refusing to grant defendant a continuance, on the ground that the names of the witnesses Frank Hottman, Nettie Hottman, Bertha Hottman, Ella Hottman and John Hottman, were not indorsed upon the information, and defendant was not otherwise notified that such witnesses were to be used against her till after the jury was impaneled and sworn to try the cause. Sec. 2517, R. S. 1899. . . .

Herbert S. Hadley, Attorney-General, and John Kennish, Assistant Attorney-General, for the State. (1) The Court did not err in refusing to grant the defendant a continuance on the ground that the names of Frank Hottman, Nettie Hottman, Ella Hottman and John Hottman, witnesses for the State, were not indorsed upon the information and that defendant was not otherwise notified that such witnesses were to be used against her until after the jury was impaneled and sworn to try the cause. . . . If during the trial of the case it had been made to appear to the Court that the State had taken an undue advantage of defendant by purposely refraining from indorsing on the information the names of the material witnesses for the State, it would nevertheless have been the duty of the Court to have proceeded with the trial, and in case the jury returned a verdict of guilty to have granted a new trial to defendant for that reason.

GANTT, J. (after stating the case as above): The action of the Court in permitting the State to call, and the said witnesses to testify, as witnesses for the State presents the first question for our determination. The contention of the defendant, it will be observed, is based upon section 2517, Rev. St. 1899, which provides: "When an indictment is found by the grand jury, the names of all the material witnesses must be endorsed upon the indictment; other witnesses may be subpœnaed or sworn by the State, but no continuance shall be granted to the State on account of the absence of any witness whose name is not thus endorsed on the indictment, unless upon the affidavit of the prosecuting attorney showing good cause for such continuance." This statute has been before this Court for construction many times. It was enacted for the first time in 1879 as section 1802.

The common law did not require the names of any of the witnesses to be indorsed upon the indictment for any purpose connected with the trial. In Hill v. People, 26 Mich. 496, CHRISTIANCY, C. J., said:

"But, as the witnesses who were to testify before the grand jury were sworn in open Court before they were sent to the grand jury, a list of the witnesses intended to be examined before that jury was required to be indorsed on the back of the bill as drawn up to be laid before them. This was required for two purposes: First that the crier, or other officer whose duty it was to swear the witnesses, might know who would be called and sworn, and that he might certify to their being sworn, which he did by adding after their names 'sworn in Court'; and second, that the grand jury might know what witness to call and who had been sworn. In this mode, it is true, a defendant for a misdemeanor incidentally got the benefit of a list of the witnesses who had testified before the grand jury, because, in cases of misdemeanor, he was entitled to a copy of the indictment. But, in cases of felony, he failed to receive even this incidental benefit, as in such cases he was not entitled to a copy of the indictment. It follows that, apart from the express or implied requirement of some statute, there is at common law no rule of evidence excluding witnesses whose names have not been furnished to the accused; nor is there any rule of preliminary procedure permitting the accused to obtain such a list by motion before trial."

3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1850; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 869a; Ballard v. State, 19 Neb. 609, 28 N. W. 271.

Our statute was evidently enacted to cure this defect in the common law. It was ruled in State v. Roy, 83 Mo. 268, and State v. Grady, 84 Mo. 220, that a complete failure to indorse the names of the material witnesses on an indictment was a sufficient ground to quash it. . . . It is right that, when a citizen's liberty or life is endangered, he should know the names of the witnesses by whom the charge is to be made good, but, while this is true, it cannot be said that, if the State discovers evidence that the grand jury could not obtain, the State shall not avail itself of this evidence if discovered before it closes its case. Indeed, section 4097, Rev. St. 1889, now 2517, Rev. St. 1899, expressly provides: "Other witnesses may be subpœnaed or sworn by the State." And in State v. Henderson, 186 Mo., loc. cit. 482, it was said:

> We have not held in any case that, where the prosecuting attorney has indorsed the names of the witnesses for the State, the omission of one name would afford a ground for new trial on the mere objection that the name of such witness had not been indorsed on the indictment or information.

And in the recent case of State v. Barrington this same view was expressed.

In the Henderson Case and in the Barrington Case, the view was expressed that there might be a case so flagrant as to amount to a surprise, and upon a proper showing that the defendant, if advised that the particular witness would be called against him, would have been able to impeach his character or contradict his testimony by other witnesses and in such a case, the Court, by virtue of its inherent power and in furtherance of justice, could grant a new trial. But, in this case, it is not contended that the prosecuting attorney purposely refrained from indorsing the names of the witnesses on the information, in order to obtain an undue advantage of the defendant. Indeed, the testimony of the prosecuting attorney clearly negatives such a purpose. To hold that the State cannot use any witness other than those indorsed upon the indictment or information would be to nullify that portion of the section which gives to the State the right to use other witnesses than those whose names are indorsed on the indictment, although the prosecuting attorney learned of their evidence after the finding of the indictment or the filing of the information, and although the common law made no such requirement. We are of the opinion that the Circuit Court committed no error in permitting the State to call and examine the witnesses above named who were not indorsed upon the information, and did not err in refusing to grant a continuance on the ground that other names were not indorsed on the information, and this ruling is applicable likewise to the witnesses Meinsen, McClaskey, Prewitt, Bowen, and Stohl, whose names also were not indorsed on the information. . . .

The judgment of the Circuit Court must be and is affirmed, and the sentence which the law pronounces is directed to be carried into execution.

Sub-topic B. Civil Cases

497. Sir James Wigram, V. C. Discovery. (1836. §§ 31, 32, 148). Proposition I: It is the right, as a general rule, of a plaintiff in equity to examine the defendant as to all matters of fact which, being well pleaded in the bill, are material to the proof of the plaintiff's case and which the defendant does not by his form of pleading admit. Proposition II: Courts of equity, as a general rule, obliged defendant to pledge his oath to the truth of his defense. With this (if a) qualification, the right of a plaintiff in equity to the benefit of the defendant's oath is limited to a discovery of such material facts as relate to the plaintiff's case, and does not extend to a discovery of the manner in which or the evidence by means of which the defendant's case is to be established, or to any discovery of the defendant's evidence. . . . If it were now for the first time to be determined whether in the investigation of disputed facts truth would be best elicited by allowing each of the contending parties to know before the trial in what manner and by what evidence his adversary proposed to establish his own case, arguments of some weight might "a priori" be adduced in support of the affirmative of this important question. Experience, however, has shown — or, at least, Courts of justice in this country act upon the principle — that the possible mischiefs of surprise at a trial are more than counterbalanced by the danger of perjury which must inevitably be incurred when either party is permitted before a trial to know the precise evidence against which he has to contend. And accordingly, by the settled rules of Courts of justice in this country (approved as well as acknowledged) each party in a cause has thrown upon him the onus of supporting his own case and meeting that of his adversary without knowing beforehand by what evidence the case of his adversary is to be supported or his own opposed.

498. Common Law Practice Commissioners. Second Report (1853), p. 35. As to facts within the knowledge of an adverse party, the Courts of law possess no power of compelling discovery; except, indeed, that by the recent change [of 1851] in the law each party may be called as a witness [on the trial] by his opponent; but it is obvious that this course will only be resorted to in the most desperate emergency. It cannot reasonably be expected that a party ignorant of what his adversary may be prepared to swear, shall put so adverse and interested a witness into the box, without having had any opportunity of previous interrogation. For the purpose of discovery, previous to the trial, whether of facts or of documents, the party desiring it has now no alternative but to resort to a Court of equity. We have no hesitation in saying that this is altogether wrong. We assert as an indisputable proposition, that every Court ought to possess within itself the means of administering complete justice within the scope of its jurisdiction. . . . This opportunity for examination prior to the trial will be useful, not only for the purpose of discovering facts exclusively in the knowledge of the opposite party, but as the means of sparing the trouble and expense of producing evidence of facts which he may be prepared to admit; while, on the other hand, it will tend to make more clearly manifest the matters which are alone in contest between the parties. In some cases, such a preliminary discovery may even altogether obviate the necessity of any trial, by compelling the one party or the other to admit facts decisive of the case upon the merits, so as to show that proceeding to trial would be a mere abuse of the forms of justice. A power of preliminary discovery would likewise tend to expose the motives of groundless actions brought for vexation, and of unfounded defences set up and persisted in for delay. It would, moreover, have a most wholesome effect in preventing false pleas from being put on the record; for as soon as the examination of the party had made manifest the falsehood of the plea, a judge might be applied to disallow the pleading at the expense of the party pleading it. If the very existence of such a power had not the effect of preventing the necessity of its exercise, it would at least aid the Court in extirpating frivolous and improper litigation.

We propose that either party in a cause shall be at liberty to deliver to the opposite party, provided such party would be liable to be called as a witness, or his attorney, written questions on the subjects on which discovery is sought; and to require such party, within a time to be fixed, to answer the questions in writing upon oath, sworn and filed in the same manner and under the same sanction, in case of falsehood, as an affidavit; and that the party omitting to answer within the prescribed time shall be subject to the consequences of a contempt of the Court. But we by no means propose to confine the power of interrogating such adverse party to the written questions above referred to. We think that in many cases an opportunity should be afforded for oral examination. At the same time, care must be taken that the power of personal examination be not abused by being made a means of vexation and oppression, when used against weak or timid persons. We propose, therefore, not to leave it at the option of a party to demand an oral examination, but to give the Court, or a judge, discretion, on the application of either party, in case of an insufficient answer to the written questions before referred to, or in any other case in which it may be made to appear essential to justice, to direct an oral examination of the other party before either a judge or a master of the Court.

499. Statutes. Illinois. Revised Statutes, 1874, c. 51, § 6. Any party to any civil action, suit or proceeding, may compel any adverse party or person for whose benefit such action, suit, or proceeding is brought, instituted, prosecuted, or defended, to testify as a witness at the trial, or by deposition, taken as other depositions are by law required, in the same manner, and subject to the same rules, as other witnesses.

St. 1905, May 18 (Municipal Court in Chicago), § 32. The Municipal Court in any civil suit pending therein, at any time before the trial or final hearing thereof, may permit the filing therein of interrogatories to be answered by any party to such suit or any person for whose immediate benefit such suit is prosecuted or defended, or by the directors, officers, superintendent or managing agents of any corporation which is a party to the record in such suit, at the instance of the adverse party or parties or any of them, and to require an answer under oath to all such interrogatories as the party to be interrogated might be required to answer, if called as a witness upon the trial or hearing of such suit, but the party filing such interrogatories shall not be concluded by the answers thereto, if he shall elect to introduce the same or any or either of them upon the trial or final hearing.

Massachusetts. Revised Laws, 1902, c. 173, §§ 35, 57–63 (quoted post, No. 396).

New York. C. C. P. 1877, § 870. The deposition of a party to an action pending in a Court of record, or of a person who expects to be a party . . . may be taken at his own instance or at the instance of an adverse party or of a co-plaintiff or co-defendant at any time before the trial.

500. Ex parte SCHOEPF

74 Oh. 1; 77 N. E. 276

Error to Circuit Court, Hamilton County. Habeas corpus proceedings by J. H. Schoepf to secure petitioner's discharge from custody. From a judgment remanding petitioner, he brings error. Judgment reversed, and petitioner discharged.

On the 18th day of June, 1902, one Josephine Pace filed a petition in the court of common pleas of Hamilton county against the Cincinnati Traction Company, alleging in substance that the defendant is a corporation organized and doing business under the laws of the State of Ohio; that it owned and used a street railroad leading from Cincinnati to the village of College Hill, on which cars were operated by means of electricity; and that on the 17th day of May, 1902, while the plaintiff was a passenger on one of the cars of the defendant, "the said defendant, by its agents or servants, so carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully and improperly managed and conducted said car that the same was caused to run roughly and unevenly and was jolted so that this plaintiff, through no fault or negligence on her part, was violently jolted and thrown from the said car and on to the street or roadway alongside said railroad," whereby she was severely injured. On the 26th day of July, 1902, the defendant answered the said petition, admitting that it was a corporation as alleged, and that it used a certain street railroad leading from Cincinnati to College Hill, with cars operated by means of electricity; but it denied that it owned the said street railroad, and denied each and every allegation contained in the petition, except as expressly admitted in said answer. Thereafter, on the 11th day of August, 1904, one Charles E. Tenney, a notary public, before whom notice had been given to take depositions, issued a subpœna duces tecum to the plaintiff in error, J. H. Schoepf, to appear before him and give testimony in the case then pending, wherein Josephine Pace was plaintiff and the Cincinnati Traction Company was defendant, and containing the following clause: "And to bring with you any reports you may have control over, or in your possession, made by the motorman or conductor of a College Hill-Main car of the Cincinnati Traction Company, concerning any accident occurring May 17, 1902, because of which this suit was brought."

The plaintiff in error appeared before the said notary public on the 16th day of August, 1902, pursuant to the subpœna, and on examination testified that he was the claim agent of the Cincinnati Traction Company. . . . He was asked: "Q. 3. On the 17th day of May, 1902, a woman fell or was thrown off a car belonging to the Cincinnati Traction Company, at or near the corner of Oak and Belmont streets, College Hill. Who was the conductor in charge of this car?" Also the following question: "Q. 5. Do you know the name of this conductor?" Also the following question: "Q. 6. Do you know the name of the motorman of this car?" Also the following question: "Q. 7. Were there any other persons on this car besides the plaintiff, conductor, and motorman?" Also the following question: "Q. 8. Were there any persons that you know of, besides the plaintiff, conductor, and motorman, present at the time of the accident, and who witnessed it?" To each of the aforesaid questions the counsel for the defendant company objected, and the witness refused to answer the same upon the advice of counsel, for the reason that the same were immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and for the reason that these questions call for hearsay testimony. . . . Thereupon the said notary public ordered the plaintiff in error to be committed to jail until he should answer the said questions and produce the said reports.

Plaintiff in error began these proceedings by an application in the Court of Common Pleas of Hamilton county for a writ of habeas corpus. . . . The Circuit Court held that these five questions should be answered, and ordered that Schoepf be remanded to the custody of the sheriff until he should answer the . . . five questions above set forth, and also should produce the said reports. This judgment of the Circuit Court is here assigned for error; plaintiff in error seeking to have both the judgment of the Circuit Court and the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas reversed and held for naught.

Davis, J.[1] (after stating the facts). — 1. It is earnestly argued in behalf of the defendant in error, and that also seems to be the view entertained by the Circuit Court and the court of Common Pleas, that a witness who is testifying in a deposition before a notary public may be compelled to produce any document which by any possibility may become pertinent on the trial of the case in which the deposition is taken. It is asserted that In re Rauh, 65 Ohio St. 128, 61 N. E. 701, is authority for this proposition; and it is contended that the reports which had been made to the plaintiff in error, as the claim agent of the company, are admissions by the company, and that if the motorman and conductor who made these reports should testify on the trial of the case, the company and its agents might be compelled to produce the reports for the possible purpose of contradiction. It is also asserted, although it is not even suggested how or why it might be so, that these reports may become evidence relating to the merits of the action, and as such the company might be compelled to produce them for evidence or inspection. It is even seriously maintained that a party taking a deposition has a greater privilege under the law than he would have on the trial of his case, in that the witness must produce any document called for, although he may believe that it is privileged, and in that the witness must answer impertinent and incompetent questions, although he may believe that the answers would be privileged, and although the answers would not be admissible if offered to the jury on the trial of the case. And here again it is claimed that the case of Rauh, supra, and other cases in this court and elsewhere, support this contention. It was clearly pointed out in Ex parte Jennings, 60 Ohio St. 319, 54 N. E. 262, [post, No. 703,] that neither the officer who takes a deposition nor the court on the trial of the case has power to punish a witness for disobedience of a subpœna or a refusal to answer except when the witness has been "lawfully ordered." Section 5252, Rev. St. 1906. And in that case and the Rauh Case also it was said that when the witness undertakes to decide upon the question whether he has been "lawfully ordered" he does so at his own peril. It is the same whether a question of privilege is involved, or whether it is only a matter of incompetent or irrelevant evidence. It is true that in the Rauh Case the qualifying clause, "unless the interrogatory involves a question of privilege," was thrown in. It would have been clearer if that clause had been omitted or if it had been said "a question of conceded privilege"; but it is plain that when the privilege claimed is disputed the witness takes the same chances upon a refusal that he does upon a refusal to answer an incompetent question. Accordingly it was nowhere said in either of the decisions of this Court already referred to, nor was it intended to be inferred, that a witness might be compelled to surrender to his adversary a coveted document, before the right to compel production of it had been submitted to the judgment of a competent tribunal; but the correlative proposition that a witness might take the chances of being sustained on a refusal to answer an incompetent or irrelevant question was distinctly asserted. It would seem, therefore, that the power of a notary public in the taking of depositions and the limitations imposed thereon have been clearly defined by the statutes and the previous decisions of this Court.

The counsel for the defendant in error concede in their brief that questions 3, 5, 6, 7, and 8, which the witness refused to answer upon advice of counsel because they were immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent and because they call for hearsay testimony, "would be inadmissible if offered to a jury on the trial of the case, because of the rule against hearsay." Yet counsel still insist that the witness may be compelled by imprisonment to disclose facts which they admit could not be admissible on the trial. From what we have already said, it results that the notary public had no such power. In Ex parte Jennings, it was said in the opinion: "Indeed, it does not seem to have been finally determined in any case that the personal liberty of the citizen is of so little importance that it should yield to a desire to gather food for idle gossip." But in the present case this is all that such a fruitless extortion of testimony would result in, unless it would be to disclose to the plaintiff the names of witnesses for or against her adversary; and it is elementary that a party cannot be required to aid his opponent in that way.

In answer to this, it is urged that an objection to the relevancy or competency of evidence cannot be made by a mere witness, but it must come from a party to the action. However plausible this argument may seem, Ex parte Jennings conclusively shows that it is not universally sound. Besides, the witness in this case was an officer and representative of the defendant company, and it is through and by means of him that the plaintiff is here seeking to compel answers to questions and to compel the production of papers which are shown not to be in the possession or control of the witness, except constructively by virtue of his authority as an official of the defendant company. The Common Pleas Court held that the witness was not in contempt for refusing to answer these questions, and in this we think the judgment of that Court was right. . . .

[Had the desired answers been relevant, the notary could enforce them, unless some privilege protected them.] It was held in the Case of Rauh, supra, that a notary public has power to punish a witness for contempt by imprisonment when the witness refuses to obey a subpœna duces tecum directing him to bring with him any book, writing, or other thing under his control, which he may be compelled to produce as evidence.

2. What may he be compelled to produce? And how may he be compelled to produce it?

These questions are clearly answered by sections 5289 to 5293, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes, of 1906. Section 5289 provides that the Court may require the parties to an action "to produce books and writings in their possession or power which contain evidence pertinent to the issues, in cases and under circumstances where they might heretofore have been compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery." The sections providing for inspections and copies of writings for reference to a master and for action for discovery may be passed over as not material to the present discussion. Section 5289 limits the power to compel the production of books and writings (1) to such as are pertinent to the issue, and (2) to cases and under circumstances where the parties might heretofore have been compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery. Under these limitations, could the court compel the production of the reports which were made to this witness under the rules of his company and for the purpose stated?

The rule in chancery as to compelling the production of documents for the purposes of evidence and inspection is generally recognized and clearly defined. It is to the effect that a plaintiff is entitled to a discovery of such facts or documents in the defendant's possession or under his control as are material and necessary to the plaintiff's case, but that this right does not extend to a discovery of the manner in which the defendant's case is to be established, nor to evidence which relates exclusively to the defendant's case. This rule is also applied conversely, to the defendant in an action. Wigram on Discovery, Prop. 3, § 342–347; Combe v. Loudon, 4 Y. & C. 139, 155; 6 Ency. Pl. & Prac. 791, 792, 794, 795, 804–806. "It may be added that the principle of a bill of discovery was never considered to be applicable to third persons not parties so as to secure from them before trial a disclosure of possible evidence." 3 Wigmore on Evidence, p. 2427, § 1856. One question here is whether the reports which were sent to the witness and which were by him turned over to the counsel for the corporation relate to the plaintiff's case and are necessary and material in establishing her case. It lies upon the plaintiff to show this, and we think that she has not done so. The efforts of the plaintiff appear to us to be directly toward "fishing" for the nature of the defense and the persons by whom it is to be established, rather than to obtain competent and necessary evidence to sustain the plaintiff's petition.

3. Another question is: Are the reports privileged? The statement of the witness that the reports were made in anticipation of a possible litigation and that they are in possession of counsel for use in the suit which did ensue stands uncontradicted, and must, therefore, be taken as true. This clearly brings the documents within the rule as to privilege; and we see no reason to limit or modify the rule because the defendant is a corporation and obtained its information and made its memoranda for the purpose stated, through the usual agencies of a corporation. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 99, 100, notes 1, 2, and 3; Davenport Co. v. Railroad Co., 166 Pa. 480, 31 Atl. 245; Carrol v. Railway Co., 82 Ga. 452, 10 S. E. 163, 6 L. R. A. 214; Cully v. Railway Co., 35 Wash. 241, 77 Pac. 202. The plaintiff's counsel argue with a great deal of earnestness that they have the right to extort the reports from the defendant for the purpose of using them as admissions against interest. While it does not appear what the reports contain, nor whether they contain any statements which would make against the defendant on the trial, it is certain that the defendant has not made any statement to another which could be used against it; for confidential communications between a principal and his agent are not admissions. In re Devala, 22 Ch. Div., 593.

We are of the opinion that the commitment of the witness for refusal to answer any of the questions which he did refuse to answer, and for refusal to produce the reports was not "lawfully ordered"; and accordingly the judgments of the Circuit Court and the Court of Common Pleas are reversed, and the petitioner discharged.

Shauck, C. J., and Price, Crew, Summers, and Spear, JJ., concur.

500*a*. Meier v. Paulus. (1887. 70 Wis. 165, 35 N. W. 301). Taylor, J. — Was it error to refuse to permit the plaintiff to read to the jury the deposition of the defendant taken before the trial in the manner by § 4096, R. S.? It seems to us very clear that the very object of the statute giving a party the right to examine the opposite party, when such examination is made after issue joined in the action, was for the purpose of obtaining evidence in favor of the party seeking the examination and against the party examined. . . . The statute declares that this examination shall in all respects take the place of the old bill of discovery. The very object of the old bill of discovery was to procure evidence against the opposite party, to be used on the trial of an action. . . . The statute undoubtedly goes further than the bill of discovery, and not only allows an examination of the party as to those matters which the party seeking the examination cannot prove by other witnesses or testimony, but it allows an examination as to all the material issues in the action. . . . The examination of a party is in the nature of an admission so far as his answers are material to the issues in the action, and such admissions are always admitted as original evidence against him.

Topic 2. Documents

501. Wm. Tidd. Practice. (9th ed., 1828, I, 586). Oyer of deeds, etc., is demandable by the defendant or by the plaintiff. If the plaintiff in his declaration necessarily make a "profert in curia" of any deed, writing, letters of administration, or the like, the defendant may pray oyer of the deed, etc., and must have a copy delivered to him, if demanded, paying for the same at the rate of fourpence per sheet. And a defendant who prays oyer of a deed is entitled to a copy of the attestation and names of the witnesses, as well as of every other part of the deed. So likewise, if the defendant in his plea makes a necessary "profert in curia" of any deed, etc., the plaintiff may pray oyer, and shall have a copy at the like rate. And the party of whom oyer is demanded is bound to carry the deed to the adverse party. . . . Formerly all demands of oyer were made in court, where the deed is by intendment of law when it is pleaded with a profert in curia; and therefore, when oyer is craved, it is supposed to be of the Court, and not of the party; and the words "ei legitur in hæc verba," etc., are the act of the Court. In practice, however, oyer is now usually demanded and granted by the attorneys.

502. BOLTON v. LIVERPOOL

1 Myl. & K. 88, 91

The plaintiffs, who were merchants and copartners in Liverpool, were defendants in an action, brought by the corporation, for the recovery of certain dues levied by the corporation upon the traders of that town. The bill was filed for the purpose of obtaining a discovery from the corporation in aid of the plaintiff's defence to the action at law. The bill among other things charged that divers cases had been lately submitted to counsel, for their opinion, touching the right of the corporation to receive the tolls and duties, and from which, if produced, it would appear that the corporation had no such right, and that all such cases were then in the possession or power of the defendants; and it further charged that the defendants had in their possession or power divers charters, grants, deeds, books, accounts, letters, copies of and extracts from letters, cases, written statements, tables or lists of town dues, tolls or duties, bills, informations, pleas, answers, memorandums, papers, and writings, relating to the matters contained in the bill; and by which, if produced, the truth of those matters would appear.

The defendants admitted that they had then, in their possession, certain grants, deeds, documents, and papers, relating to the matters aforesaid, and that they had in the third schedule to their said answer, and which they prayed might be taken as part thereof, set forth a list of such grants, deeds, documents and papers. But the defendants said that many of such grants, deeds, and documents were the title deeds and documents evidencing and showing the title of the corporation to the town and lordship of Liverpool, and to the town dues and customs aforesaid; and that many of such documents and papers were copies of accounts from public offices, and that they had in the said schedule particularized and distinguished which of the said grants, deeds, and documents were the title deeds and documents evidencing the title of the corporation to the town and lordship of Liverpool, and town dues and customs aforesaid, and which of the said documents and papers were copies of accounts from public offices; and the defendants submitted that they ought not to be compelled to produce such grants, deeds, documents, and papers.

A motion was made before the Vice-Chancellor that the plaintiffs and their agents might be at liberty to inspect and take copies of the cases or statements and documents mentioned in the defendants' further answer, and in the second and third schedules thereto. The Vice-Chancellor refused the application, except in so far as it related to certain cases submitted to counsel on the defendants' behalf many years ago, and long before the present legal proceedings were in contemplation. And the motion was now renewed.

Mr. Pepys and Mr. Kindersley, for the motion; and the Solicitor-General (Sir W. Horne), Sir C. Wetherell, Sir E. Sugden, and Mr. Duckworth, against it, followed. . . .

Brougham, L. C. — I take the principle to be this: A party has a right to the production of deeds sustaining his own title affirmatively, but not of those which are not immediately connected with the support of his own title and which form part of his adversary's. He cannot call for those which, instead of supporting his title, defeat it by entitling his adversary. Those under which both claim he may have, or those under which he alone claims. . . . The plaintiff here does not claim anything positively or affirmatively under the documents in question; he only defends himself against the claims of the corporation, and suggests that the documents evidencing their title may aid his defence. How? By proving his title, he says. But how can those documents prove his title? Only by disclosing some defect in that of the corporation. . . . He rests on the right which he has in common with all mankind to be exempt from dues and customs; and he says, "Prove me liable if you can." The corporation have certain documents which they say prove this liability. He cannot call for these documents merely because they may upon inspection be found not to prove his liability, and so help him and hurt his adversary whose title they are.

The case of the Princess of Wales v. Lord Liverpool, 1 Swan., 114, 580, was cited; and it is, perhaps, a strong case. But it is a peculiar one. Lord ELDON at first refused the application, and then granted it in the special circumstances. The instruments were two promissory notes, upon which the suit was brought against executors. Lord ELDON, in delivering judgment upon that case, threw out many observations as to what might appear on an inspection. The notes, he said, might be duplicates; they might have important variations; some question might arise on the stamps, and they might, at any rate, said his lordship, be given up at the hearing; for an indemnity will not do; at least that is questionable. Yet he held all this matter of surmise not to be enough; for he required the defendant to state in what respect the inspection of the notes was material for his defence, and upon affidavits of circumstances impeaching their genuineness, he thought enough appeared to warrant an order that the defendant should not be compelled to answer till he had obtained the inspection. It must be admitted, that there the thing sought, and in substance allowed to be inspected, was not any matter collateral, but the very instrument on which the title of the plaintiff rested, and which could only be the title of the defendant by failing to support that of the plaintiff. His Lordship may have considered the instruments as a sort of title common to both parties; but it could only be so by the one party setting them up, and the other impeaching them on flaws discoverable by inspection. It must, however, be observed that this was a kind of case in which, at law, inspection would have been given.

In this case, therefore, I can, upon the whole, see no reason for coming to a different conclusion from that at which His Honour arrived, when he refused inspection of those parts of the corporation's title, as being theirs, and not the plaintiff's, and not common to both.

503. HENRY BROUGHAM. Speech on the Courts of Common Law. (Feb. 7, 1828; Hans. Parl. Deb., 2d ser., § VIII, 188). Whatever brings the parties to their senses as soon as possible, especially by giving each a clear view of his chance of success or failure, and, above all things, making him well acquainted with his adversary's case at the earliest possible moment, will always be for the interests of justice, of the parties themselves, and indeed, of all but the practitioners. It is the practitioners generally, that determine how the matter shall proceed, and it may be imagined that their own interests are not the last attended to. The seeming interest of two parties disposed to be litigious, in many cases appears to be different from the interests of justice, although their real interest, if strictly examined, will not unfrequently be found to be the same. Now, justice is embarrassed by the disingenuousness of conflicting parties; justice wants the cases of both to be fully and early stated; but both parties take care to inform each other as little as possible, and as late as possible, of their respective merits. One tells as much of his case as he thinks good for the furtherance of his claim, and the frustration of the enemy's — so does the other, only as much of his answer as may help him, without aiding his adversary; and the judge is oftentimes left to guess at the truth in the trick and conflict of the two. The interest of the Court of Justice being to make both parties come out with the whole of their case as early as possible, the law should never lend itself to their concealments. This remark extends to the proof as well as the statement of the case; an intimation of what the evidence is may often stop a cause at once.

In Scotland, the law in this respect is better than ours, for no man can produce a written instrument on trial without having previously shown it to his adversary. For want of this salutary rule I have often seen the most useless litigation protracted for the sole benefit of practitioners. I was myself lately engaged in a cause, the circumstances of which will give the House an idea of the mischief. I was instructed not to show a certain receipt to the opposite party, as my client, the defendant, meant to nonsuit his adversary in great style, as he would call it. Well, the plaintiff, (an executor), stated his case, and called his witnesses to prove the debt. I did not take the trouble to cross-examine, which would have been quite unnecessary. Equally so was it to address the jury. I acknowledged the truth of all that had been sworn on the other side, but added that it was all useless, as I happened to have a receipt for the money, which had been paid to the testator. This, of course, put an end to the case. The sum sought to be recovered did not exceed twenty pounds, and the expenses could not have been less than a hundred.

504. Common Law Practice Commissioners. Third Report (1831), p. 45. By law, no profert is required to be made and consequently no oyer can be demanded of any instrument, except private deeds, letters testamentary, and letters of administration. If there are other cases, they are unfrequent and obscure. The following are consequently excluded: records and public writings of whatever description, private writings under seal but not falling within the legal definition of deeds (for example, a sealed will or a sealed award), and private writings not under seal of whatever description; and even of private deeds a numerous class is excepted, viz., such as take effect either by livery of seisin or by operation of the statute of uses. . . . The whole of this practice appears to be too strict, too intricate, too prolix, and in some parts of it obscure and unsettled. It is strongly calculated to give rise to technical difficulty and formal objection, and tends in some other respects also to produce unnecessary delay and expense. The truth is that the law of profert and oyer was originally devised in reference to a state of things that no longer exists; being altogether founded on that method, now for so many ages obsolete, of oral pleading between litigants actually confronting each other in open Court. . . . The present practice of profert and oyer, though in its present form chargeable with many defects, is in its principle of the highest importance. It is manifestly essential to the interests of justice that a party against whom his own written instrument or the instrument of another person is pleaded should have the means of inspection, and, if necessary, of procuring a copy before he is called upon to answer. . . .

We can see no good reason why, in every case in which profert would be required of a bond or other deed, it should not also be made of any other instrument of whatever description, which is either alleged to be or which may be presumed to be in writing. Such an alteration of the law would prevent the delay, expense, and uncertainty which attends an application to the Court or a judge, and place the whole practice on this subject on a more simple and uniform as well as a more equitable footing.

506. SWEDISH-AMERICAN TELEPHONE CO. v. FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO.

208 Ill. 562; 70 N. E. 768

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Cook County; E. F. DUNNE, Judge. Action by the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York against the Swedish-American Telephone Company and another. From a judgment adjudging the telephone company and its officers and attorney guilty of contempt, they appeal. Affirmed.

This is an appeal from an order, entered by the Circuit Court of Cook county on January 9, 1904, in a certain suit in assumpsit, brought by the appellee against the appellant the Swedish-American Telephone Company, imposing a fine upon said telephone company of $25, and imposing a fine upon the appellant Fayette S. Munro of $1,050, for contempt of court in refusing to comply with an order for the production of the ledger and journal of the telephone company, and all sheets and memoranda, which were a part thereof, showing the entries or memoranda contained therein, "which pertain to money expended as compensation to employés of the said defendant for services rendered during the time covered by the policy of insurance issued by the plaintiff to said defendant, to wit, from the 7th day of June, A.D. 1901, to the 7th day of June, A.D. 1902, inclusive, within 10 days from this date, upon plaintiff giving to the defendant 24 hours' notice, said examination to take place at the office of defendant's attorney, room 734, 159 La Salle street, Chicago, Illinois," which said order was entered on the 27th day of November, 1903.

The suit in assumpsit was begun on January 6, 1903, by the appellee, the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, against the said telephone company. . . . The consideration, stated in the contract of insurance or indemnity, was twofold: First, the sum of $84 as a premium; and, second, a promise by the telephone company to pay an additional premium, to be computed upon a percentage of its pay roll, to wit, a sum of money equal to $\frac{42}{100}$ of 1 per cent. of the total amount that the telephone company should expend during the period covered by the insurance contract for labor and services of its employés employed on its premises in Chicago. The amended or additional count averred that the pay roll at the end of the year June 7, 1902, exceeded the sum of $20,000, etc. . . . It was thereupon, on December 16, 1903, ordered by the Court that the telephone company, its president, secretary, and attorney, should each appear before the Court within three days from that date to show cause why they and each of them should not be attached and be punished for contempt. . . . The objections were overruled by the Court; to which action of the Court the telephone company took exception. . . .

Fayette S. Munro, for appellants. O. W. Dynes, for appellee.

MAGRUDER, J. (after stating the facts). The order punishing the appellants herein for contempt of court was made under and in pursuance of section 9 of chapter 51 of the Revised Statutes (Hurd's Rev. St. 1901), in regard to evidence, etc. Section 9 is as follows: "The several Courts shall have power in any action pending before them upon motion, and good and sufficient cause shown, and reasonable notice thereof given, to require the parties, or either of them, to produce books or writings in their possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue." . . .

Second. The contention of the appellant company is that section 9 of chapter 51, as above quoted, does not confer upon the Circuit Court power to compel the production of documents prior to the trial of the case, but should be construed to apply only to the production of documents at the trial of the case. It is also contended by the appellant company that the proper method for a party litigant to obtain evidence pertinent to the issue and in the control of his adversary is by a bill of discovery, or a subpœna duces tecum.

The language of section 9 does not limit the time when books or writings are to be produced to the trial of the cause. On the contrary, the several Courts are given power to require the production of such books or writings "upon motion and good and sufficient cause shown," whether before the trial, for the purpose of preparing for the same, or at the trial, to be used as evidence. The contract of the parties here provides that the appellee shall have the right and opportunity to examine the books of the assured "at all reasonable times." We see no reason why an examination of the books at a time before the trial, in order to prepare for trial, is not as much an examination at a reasonable time as an examination of the books upon the trial itself. At common law, in an action ex contractu, where the instrument sued upon was in the possession of the defendant, and where the plaintiff was either an actual party or a party in interest, and was refused inspection of the instrument upon request, the Court was authorized to grant a rule on the defendant to produce the documents, or give the plaintiff a copy, when the production was necessary to enable him to declare against the defendant. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (15th Ed.) § 559. In the case at bar, from the very nature of the contract between the parties, the only method by which the amount due to the plaintiff below could be ascertained was by an examination of the defendant's books, and the parties, in view of this situation, have expressly agreed that the plaintiff should be entitled to such examination. Without that examination the appellee would not be able to set up in its declaration the amount of premium due to it, because such amount is dependent upon the amount paid as compensation to the employés of the telephone company. There may be expressions in the case of Lester v. People, supra, which limit the production of the books of the opposite party to the trial of the cause; but a careful examination of the language in that case will show that it was not intended to make such limitation, provided a proper showing was made that the books contained entries tending to prove the issues.

Nor do we think that it was necessary to file a bill of discovery in order to secure an examination of the books. In Lester v. People, supra, it was said in reference to section 9 above quoted, as follows: "The evident purpose and design of this statute was to furnish to a party litigant a speedy and summary mode by which, under the order of the Court, to obtain written evidence, pertinent to the issue, which might be in the possession and control of his adversary, and thus obviate the necessity of a bill of discovery, seeking the same end." . . . Section 9 was intended in actions at law to be a substitute for the bill of discovery. The order provided for in that section may be made "in any action pending before them" (the courts). The words, "in any action pending before them," exclude the idea that the evidence sought to be obtained can only be acquired by a bill of discovery. "Any action" includes a suit at law as well as a bill in chancery. . . . The judgment of the circuit court of Cook county is affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

507. REYNOLDS v. BURGESS SULPHITE FIBRE CO.

SUPREME COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1902

71 N. H. 332; 51 Atl. 1075

ACTION by Elizabeth Reynolds, administratrix, against the Burgess Sulphite Fibre Company. . . . Bill in equity. The bill alleges that the plaintiff has commenced an action at law against the defendants to recover damages for negligently causing the death of the plaintiff's intestate by furnishing him for use in his employment improper, unsuitable, and dangerous machinery; that on April 9, 1899, while the intestate was in the employ of the defendants, he was killed by falling against the governor of an engine; that the engine gave indications, by an unusual noise, that it was in a defective condition, and, shortly afterward the strap on its connecting rod broke, and caused the connecting rod to break through the outer casing with a loud crash, and thereby caused the intestate's fatal fall; that the broken pieces of the strap are in the defendants' possession; that, to properly prepare the plaintiff's action at law for trial, it is necessary that these pieces should be examined by the plaintiff's attorneys, and also by competent persons, with a view of testifying; and that the defendants, though requested, have refused to permit such examination. The prayer is for a discovery of the pieces of the broken strap, and for an inspection of the same by the plaintiff's attorneys and such other persons as she may desire. The defendants filed a demurrer, which was sustained pro forma, subject to the plaintiff's exception.

Crawford D. Hening, for the plaintiff. Chamberlin & Rich and Orville D. Baker (of Maine), for the defendants.

Chase, J. — Whatever may have been the fact prior to 1842 (Laws 1832, c. 89, s. 9; Dover v. Portsmouth Bridge, 17 N. H. 200), there can be no doubt that, ever since that date, courts of this State have possessed full equity powers in respect to discovery. R. S., c. 171, s. 6; G. S. c. 190, s. 1; G. L. c. 209, s. 1; P. S. c. 205, s. 1. . . . It is necessary to have in mind the origin, purpose, and general nature of this remedy.

"The common law laid down as a maxim, 'Nemo tenetur armare adversarium suum contra se'; in furtherance of which principle it generally allowed litigant parties to conceal from each other, up to the time of trial, the evidence on which they meant to rely, and would not compel either of them to supply the other with any evidence, parol or otherwise, to assist him in the conduct of his cause." Best, Evidence, s. 624; 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, s. 329. A different rule grew up in equity. . . . Unless the equitable remedy of discovery has been superseded by the provision of some plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law, or is not applicable to a case of tort like that alleged in the plaintiff's action at law, — points that are hereinafter considered, — it is certain that the defendants, through their officers and agents, might be compelled in a suit like the present one to discover the form in which the strap was constructed, the character of the workmanship by which and the materials from which it was made; in short, all the facts within their knowledge, information, or belief tending to show that it was defective. If they had in their possession a plan of the strap or of the broken pieces, they might be compelled to produce it for examination by the plaintiff. Why, then, may they not be compelled to produce the broken pieces themselves?

Two reasons are suggested: One — positive, and, if well founded, substantial — that the defendants' right to possess and control the property, growing out of their ownership of it, cannot be infringed in this way; and the other — negative, and not applying to the merits of the question — that there is no precedent for a discovery and inspection of such property.

(1) The defendants say that this case is not within this equitable jurisdiction, because the discovery and inspection sought is of articles of personal property belonging to them, in which the plaintiff has no right of property or possession. The gist of the action at law, in aid of which this suit was brought, is the negligence of the defendants in furnishing the plaintiff's intestate, their employee, with improper, unsuitable, and dangerous machinery for use in his employment. It is a necessary inference from the allegations of the bill that the "improper, unsuitable, and dangerous" element in the machinery existed in the strap on the connecting rod of the engine. This broke and, it is alleged, caused the intestate's death. The alleged unsuitableness of the strap may be due to inadequacy of size, error in form, imperfection in construction, or inferiority of the materials from which it was made. An inspection of the fragments will evidently aid in determining whether there was one or more of these defects in it, and if so, which. . . . The bill alleges that the plaintiff cannot properly prepare her action at law for trial without an inspection and examination of them. By reason of the demurrer, this allegation must be taken as true.

It must be admitted that the defendants' right of property in the broken strap will be interfered with to some extent if they are required to produce it, and allow the plaintiff and others to examine it. But such interference will not differ in kind or degree from that which occurs when a party is required to produce his letters, deeds, plans, other documents, or books for inspection. The rights of the defendants arising from the ownership of the strap are no more sacred than would be their rights arising from the ownership of a plan of the strap, if they had one. The infringement of property rights in such cases is justified upon the ground that it is necessary to the administration of justice. Such necessity is alleged by the plaintiff and admitted by the defendants. It is apparent that an examination of the strap will afford a better means of ascertaining the truth in respect to its suitableness or unsuitableness for the office it was to perform than any possible description or plan of it could afford, and the necessity for an inspection of it is correspondingly greater than the necessity for an oral description or a plan. . . .

(2) The defendants' second objection is because the discovery and inspection are sought for the purpose of having the broken strap examined by persons with a view of enabling them to testify as experts in the action at law. This objection must also be overruled. It is evident that expert testimony may be competent upon the issue to be tried, whether it relate to the form of the strap, the manner of its construction, or the character of the materials from which it was made. The defendants have ample opportunity to procure such testimony. Justice requires that the plaintiff shall also have an opportunity to have the strap examined by persons in whose skill and scientific knowledge she has confidence. There cannot be a fair trial of the case unless such opportunity is given to the plaintiff. Indeed, it may be that she cannot establish her right — if she have one — without having the opportunity. . . .

(3) The defendants place much reliance upon their third point, viz., that the equitable remedy for discovery cannot be invoked in aid of an action at law for a personal tort. They do not question, and, in view of the authorities, cannot question, the proposition that discovery may be had in aid of actions of tort relating to property, such as trover, detinue, trespass, waste, etc. But they say that a defendant cannot be called upon to implicate himself directly or indirectly in a personal tort, because it would tend to show moral turpitude, and so is inconsistent with principles of natural justice. . . . If the absence of authorities is entitled to any weight, it is, under the circumstances, very slight. Cases for personal torts arising from the action of the defendant, — wilful torts, so to speak, — in which the defendant could make discovery without incriminating himself, must, from the nature of the case, be very rare. It is possible that there have been none excepting Macaulay v. Shackell, and cases of like nature that have been decided in accordance therewith without again raising the question. Cases for negligence were not common prior to the middle of the last century. The use of steam and electricity, and the commercial activity consequent thereon, have immensely multiplied cases of this kind. Lord Campbell's act for giving compensation to the families of persons killed by the negligence of others was enacted in 1846. Eight years later a procedure bill was passed, largely through the agency of Lord Campbell (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125), by which, among other things, it was provided that either party to a civil action in the superior courts shall be at liberty to apply to the Court or judge for a rule or order for the inspection by the jury, or by himself, or by his witnesses of any real or personal property, the inspection of which may be material to the proper determination of the question in dispute." . . . In passing, it may be remarked that if the act and the reason of its enactment do not show that its author understood that courts of equity had jurisdiction to order an inspection of real or personal property when such inspection was material to the proper determination of an issue, it certainly shows that he felt there was a necessity for such inspection in the administration of justice. The act relieved parties from the necessity of resorting to equity for discovery, and reasonably accounts for the absence, in England, of bill of discovery in aid of actions at law for negligence since that time. . . . If Macaulay v. Shackell and Wilmot v. Maccabe, 4 Sim. 263, are not authorities in favor of the maintenance of the plaintiff's bill, the general principles governing the remedy of discovery certainly justify its maintenance. The case may be a new case in specie, so far as discovery is concerned, but it belongs to a class to which the remedy of discovery is applicable.

(4) It has been suggested that this is a "fishing bill," and should be dismissed for that reason. The plaintiff is not endeavoring to ascertain what defence the defendants contemplate making, nor facts that exclusively relate to the defendants' case, but is seeking discovery of facts that will enable her to prove her case. It is not a fishing bill.

(5) The defendants further say that the statutes of the State removing the disability of parties as witnesses (P. S., c. 224, s. 13), authorizing the taking of depositions before trial (P. S., c. 225), and giving the court authority to order a view at the trial (P. S., c. 227, s. 19), furnish a full, complete, and adequate remedy at law for obtaining the testimony which the plaintiff seeks, and so ousts the court of its equitable jurisdiction. If these statutes have such effect in cases where the testimony sought may be obtained under them, which is doubtful, . . . it does not appear that the plaintiff could obtain by virtue of them an inspection of the broken strap prior to the trial. . . .

Exception sustained. All concurred.

TITLE V. SYNTHETIC RULES

509. Introductory. The various Quantitative or Synthetic rules[1] may best be classified for practical purposes under four heads; the first and second concern testimonial evidence only; the third concerns all kinds of evidence whatsoever, as well as all material forming a part of the issue itself; the fourth concerns circumstantial evidence only.

I. First, there are rules as to the Number of Witnesses required; the question throughout being whether a single witness is in certain situations sufficient, and if not, what other evidence will suffice therewith.

II. Secondly, there are rules as to the Kind of Witness required; the question here being whether for certain issues a certain kind of witness must always be present among the general mass of evidence; practically, the only kind of necessary witness recognized in our law is the eye-witness.

III. Thirdly, there is a rule of Verbal Completeness, i.e. that the whole of a document or of an oral utterance must be offered, in order that any part of it may be received.

IV. Fourthly, in the Authentication of documents (i.e. proving their genuineness, or due execution), there are rules which declare certain kinds of circumstantial evidence to be insufficient or necessary.

SUB-TITLE I. NUMBER OF WITNESSES REQUIRED

510. History.[2] It is well known that in the civil law of Continental Europe, the great rival of the English common law, its process of proof rested fundamentally on a numerical or quantitative system. By that system, a single witness to a fact was in general not sufficient; specific numbers of witnesses were in certain cases required; and in some regions, and for some purposes, the weight to be given to each witness' testimony was measured and represented in numerical values, even by counting halves and quarters of a witness; and this system continued in force down to comparatively recent times. In the English common-law institution of jury trial, on the other hand, it was completely otherwise. At common law, there was but a single instance, and that a borrowed and modern one, of almost accidental and of anomalous origin (the rule in perjury), in which a numerical rule existed; what little else there is to-day of that sort has come into our system either by express statutes (all but one dating since 1800), or by the filtration of civil-law rules through the Court of Chancery, or by local judicial invention. The reason of this contrast, and of our successful resistance to the civil-law rules, and the causes of our freedom from a principle of evidence now generally acknowledged to be unsound and deleterious, form a history worth examining.

(1) It has been doubted whether the Roman law in its prime (that is, before 300 A.D.) proceeded upon a numerical system in its treatment of witnesses. But it is clear that by the time of the Emperor Constantine, and also in the later codification of the Emperor Justinian, which served as a sufficient foundation for the Continental civil law, the Roman law had adopted the general rule that one witness alone was insufficient upon any material point. This rule later came to be adopted in the Continental civil law, founded in part on the Roman law. But, long before this, it had become a part of the canon or ecclesiastical law, which for much of its material was accustomed to draw upon the Roman law. The ecclesiastical law developed the numerical principle freely, and elaborated many specific rules as to the number of witnesses necessary in various situations; against a cardinal, for example, twelve or perhaps forty-four witnesses were required. It is enough to note that its general and fundamental rule was that a single witness was in no case sufficient. In the Church's system, however, this rule received an additional sanction, over and above the mere precedent of Roman law, from the law of God as revealed in Holy Writ; for passages in the Bible, both in Old and New Testaments, were confidently appealed to as justifying and requiring this rule by Divine command; and this sanction sufficed to give to the numerical system of the ecclesiastical law an overbearing momentum and a sacred orthodoxy which must be considered in order to appreciate the force against which in due time the common-law judges had to struggle.[1]

[2] Abridged from the present Compiler's "Treatise on Evidence" (1905), Vol. III, § 2032.

The truth was, however, that at this time of the Papal Decretals, and even after the end of the Middle Ages, the rule precisely accorded with the testimonial notions of the time. It was not, in its spirit, an invention of the ecclesiastical lawyers, nor yet a mere continuance of Roman precedent; it was a natural reflection of the fixed popular probative notions of the time, — notions which prevailed as well in the sturdy, self-centred island of England as on the Continent at large. The prevalence and meaning of this underlying notion must now be examined.

(2) Civilization, needless to say, almost began over again with the invasion and settlement of southern and western Europe by the Gothic hordes in the 400s and 500s. Primitive notions prevailed once more, and the slow process of development had to be repeated, — repeated for the law as well as for other departments of life. Much Roman law remained in the South, and a large body of it was received in a mass in Germany in the 1500s; but this affected chiefly specific rules; the popular and general instinctive legal notions had to grow once more out of primitive into advanced forms.

Now one of the universal and marked primitive notions is that of the oath as a formal act, mechanically and ipso facto efficacious (like the ordeal and the trial by battle), and quantitative in its nature. This notion is merely one particular phase of the entire system of formalism inherent in the stage of intellectual development at which our Germanic ancestors were in that epoch. It is a matter of the whole spirit of the times, not of a particular or local belief.

> Professor Andreas Heusler, "Institutions of Germanic Private Law," (1885) I, 45, 49, 52: ". . . By 'legal formalism' I mean that condition of legal thought in which the sensibly perceivable is accepted as the only or at least the dominant element producing legal effects, and the inward circumstances of a spiritual sort — dispositions, volitions, purposes, and the like — are excluded or forced into the background. In this larger sense the term 'formalism' is ordinarily not taken; we are apt rather by that term to mean merely the notion that transactions which are to have legal significance must have a prescribed form, i.e. a certain mode of utterance or action which is alien to the speech or doing of ordinary life. This external aspect of 'formalism' is, however, only the half of that which I here include by that name; the other half is what may be called the inward formalism, and it consists in this, that the substantial effect, the intrinsic value of the incidents of legal life, is estimated by (as it were) stencils fixed by law. Thus, for example, we contrast the formal and the rational theory of proof, and under the former we class the rule that for full proof a single witness does not suffice, but that two credible witnesses are necessary. Where lies the formalism here? This rule has nothing to do with 'form' in the narrow sense noted above; the real element of formalism in it is that (by reason of long experience with the untrustworthiness of witnesses) a rule of thumb has been made, which denies to the judge his free discretion in the estimation of testimony and lays down a fixed law, not trusting to the often deceptive valuation of each man's credibility, character, and the like, but finding its security in the external mark of numbers."

The oath, then, in the Germanic epoch is but a single product of the pervading formalistic conception of procedure and of proof. All through the Saxon and Norman times, the oath is a verbal formula, which, if successfully performed without immediate disaster, is conceded to be efficacious per se, and irrespective of personal credit. It follows, too, since the performance of this act is in itself efficacious, that the multiple performance of it, if persons can be obtained who will achieve this, must multiply its probative value proportionately. This numerical conception is inherent in the general formalism of it. Thus, again, all through these times, the oath is for greater causes sworn by greater numbers, sometimes six-handed, or twelve-handed, or twenty-four-handed; that is, a degree of greater certainty is thought to be attained, not by analyzing the significance of each oath in itself and relatively to the person, but by increasing the number of the oaths. An oath was one oath; and though as between persons of inferior and superior rank certain differences were sometimes recognized, yet in general and between persons of the same rank one oath was equal to any other oath, with no distinctions based on their testimonial equipment for the case in hand. In short, whatever varieties of probative situations present themselves, the only expedient that suggests itself seems to be some change in the number of oaths.

Little by little, to be sure, a newer idea develops. Numerous oaths may be required to overcome certain strong masses of (what we should now call) presumptive evidence. The classes of cases in which oaths are allowed operative force per se are diminished. Most important of all, witnesses may be examined briefly before being allowed to take the oath, and witnesses showing a total lack of knowledge may not be allowed to swear; and of a piece with this comes the separate examination of witnesses swearing on the same side, for a conflict in their stories when separately examined resulted in discrediting their oaths. But these steps of progress in popular conceptions of the nature of proof are only slow and gradual, — much more so than one might suppose. The merely superstitious and extreme notion of a witness' oath dies out; but the mechanical, quantitative, formal conception persists for many centuries:

Professor J. B. Thayer, "Preliminary Treatise on Evidence," 23: "We read [in a case of cui in vita, in 1308], that they were at issue issint eesti qui mieulx prove mieulx ay, and the tenant proves by sixteen men, etc., and the demandant by twelve; and because the tenant's proof 'fuit greindr than the demandant's, it was awarded,' etc. If we take Fitzherbert's account to be accurate, it might appear that the twelve men on each side cancelled each other and left a total of four to the credit of the tenant, a result which left his proof the better."

It is surprising to us to-day to note how long this conception of the oath (i.e. of a single testimonial assertion) persisted. As a popular notion and instinctive mental attitude it was still in almost full force in the 1500s, at the time when the conflict of the common law and the ecclesiastical system came upon the stage. Even to-day, among juries in some places, there is no doubt a mere counting of oaths or witnesses. This trait has been very well phrased by Sir James Stephen:

Sir James Stephen, "History of the Criminal Law," I, 400: "The opinion of the time [before 1700] seems to have been that, if a man came and swore to anything whatever, he ought to be believed, unless he was directly contradicted. . . . The juries seem to have thought (as they very often still think) that a direct unqualified oath by an eye- or ear-witness has, so to speak, a mechanical value and must be believed unless it is distinctly contradicted. . . . If the Court regarded a man as a 'good' (i.e. a competent) 'witness,' the jury seem to have believed him as a matter of course, unless he was contradicted; though there are a few exceptions. . . . The most remarkable illustration of these remarks is to be found in the trial of the five Jesuits. . . . [Chief Justice Scroggs says:] 'Mr. Fenwick says to all this, "Here is nothing against us but talking and swearing." But, for that, he hath been told (if it were possible for him to learn) that all testimony is but talking and swearing; for all things, all men's lives and fortunes, are determined by an oath, and an oath is by talking, by kissing the Book, and calling God to witness to the truth of what is said.' . . . Scroggs was right as to what it [the practice of juries] actually was, and to a certain extent still is. It is true that juries do attach extraordinary importance to the dead weight of an oath."

(3) There was, therefore (and this is at once the sum of the foregoing and the key to the ensuing history), in the English common-law Courts of the 1500s, nothing at all of repugnance to the numerical system already fully accepted in the ecclesiastical law. The same popular probative notion there prevailed among judges, juries, and counsellors as on the Continent. They were equally prepared and accustomed to weigh testimonies by numbers, and therefore would see nothing fallacious in a rule declaring one witness not enough, and requiring specified numbers of witnesses. And this adoption was in fact frequently demanded of the common-law Courts. The conflict between the ecclesiastical and the common-law Courts was at its last and perhaps its crucial stage, — a conflict important in other respects to the rules of evidence. The methods of the ecclesiastical Courts were forming those of the Courts of chancery and of admiralty; the ecclesiastical lawyers were a distinguished and powerful body; their influence was notably felt in politics and in political trials; and there was no way of yet knowing whether their system and not the common-law system might ultimately preponderate in the shaping of English jurisprudence.[1] The attempt was now repeatedly made to fix upon jury trials at common law the fundamental rule of the ecclesiastical law, and it is apparent, from the utterances recorded as late as the early 1600s, that there was no certainty that the attempt would not succeed.

(4) But the attempt failed, — and failed absolutely. After the middle of the 1600s there never was any doubt that the common law of England in jury trials rejected entirely the numerical system of counting witnesses and of requiring specific numbers. The only exception to this — the case of perjury — "proves the rule," because it was not established until the early 1700s, when the rejection of the numerical system had been already definitely accomplished.

(5) What, then, was the reason why the common-law Court, in their system of evidence for jury trials, declined to number witnesses like the ecclesiastical Court, and to lay down the rule that a single witness was insufficient? Briefly, the different nature of the tribunal. The situation which would call for such a rule simply did not exist for the common-law judge. The case of having merely one witness could not arise; for the jurymen were already witnesses to themselves, as well as triers. It is unnecessary here to do more than recall that vital circumstance which has in so many ways affected the history of our rules of evidence, namely, that the jury, until at least the early 1700s, were in legal theory entitled to avail themselves of information contributed personally by themselves and obtained independently of the witnesses produced in Court; and that during the 1500s and 1600s this joint quality of witnesses and jurors still obtained practically for a more or less considerable part of their evidential material.[1] The situation was, therefore, radically different for the common-law judge and the ecclesiastical judge. The former need not and could not measure the witnesses that appeared before him. He could not declare one insufficient and two or more necessary, for this was not all the evidence. There was always, besides the witnesses produced in Court, an indefinite and supplementary quantity of evidence existing in the breasts of the jurors. There were (as Fortescue says) twelve other witnesses besides the one produced before the bar; and, as to the extent of the evidential contribution of these others, the judge did not know and had no right to know what it amounted to. It was therefore impossible and preposterous for him to attempt to declare insufficient and to reject the one or more witnesses produced in Court. The jury might still go out and find a verdict upon no witnesses (of the ordinary kind) at all. Judicial rules of number would thus be wholly vain and out of place. Such was the logical and necessary answer to any attempt to introduce the numerical system in jury trials.

(6) There did come into our law, however, sooner or later, a few specific rules of the numerical sort; all of them being of the simple type that declares a single witness insufficient and requires additionally either a second witness or corroborating circumstances. Some of these — namely, the Chancery rule requiring two witnesses to overcome a denial on oath, the rule requiring two witnesses to a will of personalty, and the rule requiring two witnesses to a cause for divorce — existed only in the practice of the ecclesiastical Courts or that of chancery founded upon it; and wherever they came over into American common-law Courts, they were direct borrowings. Others, namely, the rule requiring an accomplice or a complainant in rape, or the like, to be corroborated, are either express statutory inventions or plain judicial creations; in either case modern innovations, as well as local in the United States, and not a part of the inherited common law. There remain two specific rules — the rule in treason and the rule in perjury — which do come down to us as inheritances; though these also are in strictness not common-law rules, the one being statutory in origin, and the other an indirect grafting from the ecclesiastical law.

(7) For the policy of a numerical, or of any quantitative system nobody at the present day finds anything to be said. The probative value of a witness' assertion is utterly incapable of being measured by arithmetic. All the considerations which operate to discredit testimony affect it in such varying ways for different witnesses that the net trustworthiness of each one's testimony is not to be estimated, either in itself or in reference to others' testimony, by any uniform numerical standard. The personal element behind the assertion is the vital one, and is too multifarious to be measured by rule. "Testimony," as Boyle well said, "is like the shot of a long-bow, which owes its efficacy to the force of the shooter; argument [i.e. circumstantial inference] is like the shot of a cross-bow, equally forcible whether discharged by a giant or a dwarf." The cross-bow notion of testimony — the notion that one shot is as forceful as any other shot — can find no defenders to-day.

511. INDIANAPOLIS STREET R. CO. v. JOHNSON

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA. 1904

163 Ind. 518; 72 N. E. 571

FROM Boone Circuit Court; SAMUEL R. ARTMAN, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Johnson against the Indianapolis Street Railway Company for damages for personal injuries. From a judgment on a verdict for $3,125, the defendant appeals. Transferred from the Appellate Court under § 1337u, Burns 1901. Affirmed.

F. Winter, S. M. Ralston, and W. H. Latta, for appellant. W. J. Beckett, for appellee.

JORDAN, J. . . . The Court gave to the jury what apparently is a carefully prepared charge, but certain parts thereof are criticized by counsel for appellant. By the third instruction the jury was advised that, in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover, she must prove by a preponderance of all of the evidence all the material allegations contained in the complaint. Immediately following this statement, the Court, in the same instruction, stated to the jury that "the preponderance of evidence does not depend upon the number of witnesses, and does not mean the greater number of witnesses. It does depend upon the weight of the evidence, and means the greater weight of the evidence." (Our italics.)

Appellant criticizes that part italicized, for the reason asserted that it does not state the law correctly, and was an invasion of the province of the jury. They assert that where the witnesses are equally credible in respect to their character, the preponderance of the evidence does depend upon the number of witnesses, and that the preponderance thereof is necessarily determined by the greater number of witnesses.

As a general rule, the preponderance of the evidence in a case does not depend upon or mean the greater number of witnesses testifying upon the matter or matters in issue. Counsel mistake the law in their contention that where the witnesses in a case are equally credible in respect to their character, then, in such case, the preponderance of the evidence depends upon the number of witnesses testifying. This certainly is not the true test in any case. Any number of witnesses may be of equal credibility and possess equal information, and still differ greatly in the amount or weight of their evidence. The authorities generally affirm that the number of witnesses are not to be counted by the jury or Court trying the case in order to determine upon which side is the preponderance, but the evidence given by them is to be weighed, and the preponderance thereof does not depend on the greater number of the witnesses in the particular case. Wray v. Tindall (1874), 45 Ind. 517; . . . Village of North Alton v. Dorsett (1895), 59 Ill. App. 612; Bishop v. Busse (1873), 69 Ill. 402. . . . The instruction in question is not open to the objections urged by counsel for appellant. . . .

We find no available error, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

512. Summary. The common law, then, in repudiating the numerical system, lays down three general principles:

(a) In general, the testimony of a single witness, no matter what the issue or who the person, may legally suffice as evidence upon which the jury may found a verdict.

(b) Conversely, the mere assertion of any witness does not of itself need to be believed, even though he is unimpeached in any manner; because to require such belief would be to give a quantitative and impersonal measure to testimony:

(c) As a corollary of the first proposition, all rules requiring two witnesses, or declaring one witness insufficient without corroboration, are exceptions to the general principle.

There are several such exceptions. But they are connected by no system; they depend in part on local statutes or decisions, and no one of them is extensive or complicated enough to merit scientific study. It is here neither feasible nor profitable to take them up. A brief enumeration of the chief ones will suffice. They may be classified according to whether they apply (a) to a certain issue (i.e. to any witness on that issue), or (b) to a certain kind of witness (i.e. to that kind of person on any issue).

A. Issues. 1. In treason, one witness alone is not sufficient; there must be two witnesses testifying to the same overt act.

2. In perjury, one witness to the falsity is not sufficient; his testimony must be corroborated.

3. In sundry crimes, by local statutes, one witness alone is not sufficient; he must be corroborated.

4. In chancery cases, where the allegations of the bill are denied, one witness alone is not sufficient to sustain them; this leads into several complicating details.

5. In testamentary cases one witness to the execution is not sufficient; statutes prescribe two or three. In Pennsylvania, following the English ecclesiastical rule, these may be any competent persons. Elsewhere, they must be attesting witnesses; this rule has been examined ante, Nos. 351–358. — For a nuncupative will, a specific number is everywhere prescribed. For a revocation or alteration statutes sometimes prescribe a specific number. — For the contents of a last will, similar rules are found.

B. Persons. 1. An accomplice's testimony alone is not sufficient, in most jurisdictions; it must be corroborated by additional evidence.

2. A woman-complainant's testimony, in rape, seduction, bastardy, breach of marriage-promise, etc., is not sufficient, in many jurisdictions; there must be corroborating evidence.

3. Sundry kinds of persons' testimony, in various jurisdictions, is not sufficient without corroboration.

4. The confession of a respondent in divorce is not sufficient, without corroboration.

5. The extra judicial confession of an accused in a criminal case is not sufficient, without corroboration, in most jurisdictions.

SUB-TITLE II. KINDS OF WITNESSES REQUIRED

513. Introductory. The distinction between the preceding sort of Quantitative rules and the present sort is that those require a specified number of witnesses, while these require a specified kind of witness. For example, a rule requiring that among the evidence of a certain fact there should always be the testimony of a white person, or the testimony of a male person, or the testimony of a military officer, or the testimony of a citizen, would be a rule of the present sort.

In fact, however, rules of this sort are almost wholly lacking in our law. They rest upon the assumption that, no matter how strong and complete the remainder of the evidence may be, a particular kind of testimony will always be, for the subject in hand, relatively so valuable that it should be indispensably required in every case whatever. There has been practically no attempt to establish such a rule except for one class of testimony, namely, eye-witnesses, or, more loosely, direct testimony. Even for that class, there is to-day no universally accepted rule making an eye-witness indispensable. This type of rule is opposed to the genius and traditions of the common law.

There are three supposed rules of this sort: (1) The rule that all eye-witnesses of a crime must be produced and used by the prosecution; (2) The rule that the "corpus delicti" of a crime must be evidenced by direct testimony: (3) The rule that a marriage by informal consent must be evidenced by an eye-witness; this last rule has such relations to the substantive law that space does not suffice to examine it here.

514. Rex v. Simmonds. (1823. 1 C. & P. 84. Larceny). Hullock, B.—Though the counsel for the prosecution is not bound to call every witness whose name is on the back of the indictment, it is usual for him to do so; and if he does not, I, as the judge, will call the witness, that the prisoner's counsel may have an opportunity of cross-examining him.

515. STATE v. BARRETT

Supreme Court of Oregon. 1898

33 Or. 194; 54 Pac. 807

From Multnomah; Melvin C. George, Judge.

George Barrett was convicted of manslaughter and appeals. Reversed.

For appellant there was a brief and an oral argument by Mr. Wilson T. Hume.

For the State there was a brief and an oral argument by Messrs. Cicero M. Idleman, Attorney-General, Russell E. Sewall, District Attorney, and Roscoe R. Giltner, Deputy District Attorney.

Mr. Justice Bean delivered the opinion.

The defendant was convicted of the crime of manslaughter, for shooting and killing one Williams in a saloon conducted by himself and one Levison, and brings this appeal to reverse the judgment. . . .

1. . . For this reason the judgment of the Court below must be reversed, and a new trial ordered. But as there are other questions in the case, which may arise on another trial, it is thought proper to notice them briefly at this time.

2. The district attorney having closed the case for the State without calling any of the persons who were in the saloon at the time of the homicide, on the ground that they were the associates and employés of the defendant, and in his opinion their testimony would be unworthy of belief, although one of them was then in custody in default of an undertaking to appear and testify on behalf of the State at the trial, and another was on bail for that purpose, the defendant's counsel moved the Court to require such persons to be called as witnesses for the State. The Court declined to do so, and the defendant excepted. The parties referred to were then called by the defense, and testified, and the ruling of the Court in not compelling the State to produce them on the stand is assigned as error.

" There is a diversity of judicial opinion as to whether, in a criminal case, the prosecuting officer is compelled to call as witnesses all the persons present at the commission of the alleged crime. There are some early English cases which seem to lay down the rule with more or less distinctness to that effect. Reg. v. Holden, 8 Car. & P. 606; Reg. v. Chapman, 8 Car. & P. 558; Reg. v. Stroner, 1 Car. & K. 650; Roscoe, Criminal Evidence, 139. And in this country it is the rule, in Michigan and Montana, that the prosecuting officer is bound to show the res gestae, or entire transaction, by calling all the obtainable witnesses present at the time, unless it appears that the testimony of those not called would be merely cumulative: People v. Germaine, 101 Mich. 485; Territory v. Hanna, 5 Mont. 248; State v. Metcalf, 17 Mont. 417. But this doctrine is denied and repudiated, and we think rightfully, by a great majority of the Courts in which the question has come up for adjudication: State v. Martin, 2 Ired. 101; Selph v. State, 22 Fla. 537; State v. Eaton, 75 Mo. 587, 593; Bozeman v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 503; Kidwell v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 264; Williford v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 414; Morrow v. State, 57 Miss. 836; Carlisle v. State, 73 Miss. 387; State v. Cain, 20 W. Va. 679.

. . . It probably came into use in England at a time when the right of a defendant in a criminal case to be represented by counsel, or to have witnesses appear and testify in his behalf, was either denied entirely, or very much abridged. Under such circumstances, it was, of course, important that the prosecution be compelled to prove the entire transaction, and to call all the witnesses present at the time, whether they would testify for or against the defendant. But these restrictions upon the rights of a defendant do not, and never did, exist in this country. Here the right of the accused to appear by counsel, and to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, is everywhere recognized, and generally guaranteed by the fundamental law. There is therefore no necessity for requiring the State to call all the persons who were present when the offense was committed, or any particular number of them. The rights of the defendant are not in any way abridged by a failure to do so. He has the assistance and advice of counsel selected by himself, if able to employ one, and, if not, appointed by the Court, and compulsory process for obtaining witnesses at the public expense. In addition to this, the State is bound to make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt; and if the prosecuting officer does not call sufficient witnesses for that purpose, or if any unfavorable inference can be drawn from his failure to call any witness, the defendant is not likely to suffer by the omission; and if he calls only such witnesses as are favorable to the State, the defendant has a right to call any others which he may suppose will relate the facts favorable to him.

It does not seem to us, therefore, that the State should be compelled to call and vouch for a witness, even though it be evident that he knows all about the facts, when the prosecuting officer, acting in good faith, and under his official oath, is of the opinion that he will, by false swearing, or by the concealment of material facts, attempt to establish the innocence of the accused. . . .

The judgment of the Court below is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Reversed.

516. Sir Matthew Hale. Pleas of the Crown. (ante 1680. II, 290). I would never convict any person for stealing the goods "cujusdam ignoti" merely because he would not give an account how he came by them, unless there was due proof made that felony was committed of these goods. I would never convict any person of murder or manslaughter, unless the fact was proved to be done, or at least the body found dead, — for the sake of two cases, one mentioned in my lord Coke's P. C. cap. 104, p. 232, a Warwickshire case, another that happened in my remembrance in Staffordshire.

517. Commonwealth v. Webster. (Massachusetts. 1850. 5 Cush. 295, 308, and Bemis' Rep. 473). Shaw, C. J. The prisoner at the bar is charged with the wilful murder of Dr. George Parkman. This charge divides itself into two principal questions, to be resolved by the proof: first, whether the party alleged to have been murdered came to his death by an act of violence inflicted by any person; and if so, secondly, whether the act was committed by the accused. Under the first head we are to inquire and ascertain, whether the party alleged to have been slain is actually dead; and, if so, whether the evidence is such as to exclude, beyond reasonable doubt, the supposition that such death was occasioned by accident or suicide, and to show that it must have been the result of an act of violence. When the dead body of a person is found, whose life seems to have been destroyed by violence, three questions naturally arise. Did he destroy his own life? Was his death caused by accident? Or was it caused by violence inflicted on him by others? In most instances, there are facts and circumstances surrounding the case, which, taken in connection with the age, character, and relations of the deceased, will put this beyond doubt. In a charge of criminal homicide, it is necessary in the first place by full and substantial evidence to establish what is technically called the corpus delicti, — the actual offense committed; that is, that the person alleged to be dead is in fact so; that he came to his death by violence and under such circumstances as to exclude the supposition of a death by accident or suicide and warranting the conclusion that such death was inflicted by a human agent; leaving the question who that guilty agent is to after consideration. . . .

It has sometimes been said by judges that a jury ought never to convict in a case of homicide unless the dead body be found and identified. This, as a general proposition, is undoubtedly true and correct; and disastrous and lamentable consequences have resulted from disregarding the rule. But, like other general rules, it is to be taken with some qualification. It may sometimes happen that the dead body cannot be produced, although the proof of the death is clear and satisfactory; as in a case of murder at sea, where the body is thrown overboard in a dark and stormy night, at a great distance from land or any vessel; although the body cannot be found, nobody can doubt that the author of that crime is chargeable with murder.

518. BUEL v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN. 1899

104 Wis. 133; 80 N. W. 78

ERROR to Circuit Court, Sawyer county; JOHN K. PARISH, Judge.

Eugene Buel was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

J. B. Alexander and V. W. James, for plaintiff in error. C. E. Buell, First Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MARSHALL, J. — The evidence produced on the trial established or tended to establish the following: Peter F. Nelson, an unmarried man of about 24 years of age, who had resided for a considerable length of time prior to the 17th day of September, 1896, with the plaintiff in error, Eugene Buel, a man of about 36 years of age, near the Indian reservation in a thinly-settled district in Sawyer county about nine miles from the village of Hayward, — in August, 1896, was charged by one Wettenhall with being guilty of having sustained criminal relations with the latter's daughter, and being the cause of her supposed condition of pregnancy. That resulted in Wettenhall and Nelson meeting a day or two thereafter, by appointment, at the village of Hayward, where Wettenhall insisted on Nelson marrying the daughter, which he declined to do. Soon thereafter, on the same day, on hearing that he was about to be prosecuted respecting the charge of causing the pregnancy of the Wettenhall girl, Nelson fled from the county and thereafter remained in hiding till about the 16th day of September following, when he met Buel, by appointment, at a railway station a short distance from Hayward, from which point the two traveled together to Hayward, arriving there about daylight on the succeeding day. The purpose of the trip to Hayward was to enable Nelson to draw some $400 which he had in the Sawyer County Bank and then leave the county before his presence at Hayward could become sufficiently known to lead to his arrest. Pugh, the cashier of the bank, was called upon by Nelson and Buel at his house before daylight on the day named and informed of the purpose of Nelson as stated, and that he intended to go to Chicago by way of Ashland. Pugh acceded to the request to immediately get the money for Nelson and to aid in keeping his presence in Hayward secret, and thereupon went to the bank and obtained such money, Buel and a policeman going with him, and Nelson remaining at the house. Pugh returned to his house with the money and paid it to Nelson, whereupon the latter and Buel immediately departed, going in the direction of Buel's home. The last that was seen of Nelson alive, he was in the company of Buel a few miles from the latter's home on the day in question. The day of the occurrence related, Buel was observed traveling on the road from Hayward towards his home alone, carrying a satchel, and later in the day he left his home with a pail and gun under the pretense that he was going to carry a lunch to Nelson; and still later the same day he returned home in a nervous condition and reported that Nelson complained that he had been chased by Indians. After the disappearance of Nelson as related, he did not write to any of his old neighbors or acquaintances as he was accustomed to do when away from home. . . . In July of the next year after the occurrences detailed in the foregoing, the remains of a human being were found lying on the back in a bunch of thick bushes a few miles from where Nelson was last seen with Buel and within about one-half a mile from an unoccupied homestead claim of Buel, and somewhat further from such a claim which belonged to Nelson. The location of the discovery was in an out of the way place some four miles from any inhabited building except an old logging camp about a mile and a half away, which was occupied by a watchman. It was near an old Indian trail and the usual route from Buel's place of residence to his homestead claim. The fragments of the skull indicated that either before or after death it was broken in by some crushing blow or blows. The shoes were on the feet and the clothing was sufficiently preserved to show the color. No money or thing of value was found near the remains except a pocket-knife, which was identified as one of two knives that had been sold by a merchant in Hayward, one of which was sold to Nelson. The trousers and shoes found on the remains were similar to those worn by Nelson. . . . Evidence was produced to explain or discredit much of the evidence of the circumstantial evidentiary facts mentioned, and to impair the probative force of circumstances established, pointing to the guilt of Buel. The jury found him guilty of murder in the first degree and judgment was entered accordingly.

The evidence was all circumstantial, but that does not count strongly against the conviction, since a conviction may as well rest on circumstantial evidence as on direct evidence, if it has the necessary probative power to convince the mind beyond a reasonable doubt of the existence of each of the elements requisite to make out the charge and exclude to a moral certainty every other reasonable hypothesis. . . .

It appears to be strongly urged that the verdict was not warranted by the evidence as to the corpus delicti, because, on that subject there must be positive evidence, or circumstantial evidence of such probative power as to convince the mind beyond the possibility of error. To support that contention, State v. Davidson, 30 Vt. 377, was cited to our attention, where it is said that "the cases all hold that where the corpus delicti is attempted to be shown by circumstantial evidence, it must be positively established so as to exclude all uncertainty or doubt from the minds of the jury; not that each particular circumstance must be of that conclusive character, but all combined must produce the same degree of certainty as positive proof." That must be construed to mean that circumstantial evidence is competent and sufficient to establish every element of the corpus delicti if as convincing as positive or direct evidence. It recognizes the sufficiency of circumstantial evidence, and as to each element of the subject under consideration. . . .

There are many authorities that might be cited to support the doctrine that positive evidence is required to establish at least the element of death by criminal means, and in many legal opinions language is used which would indicate a holding that positive evidence must go further and establish the fact of identity. In Ruloff v. People, 18 N. Y. 179, it was stated as the undisputed law, that no one should be convicted of murder upon circumstantial evidence unless the body of the person supposed to have been murdered has been found, or there be other clear, irresistible proof that such person is actually dead. Baron Parke, in Reg. v. Tawell, a case not easily found reported in the books, but referred to in Will's Circumstantial Evidence (3d Ed.) 181, and contained in Trials for Murder by Poisoning, compiled by Brown (1883), used substantially the same language, and the conclusion was reached that as to the death of the party supposed to have been murdered, positive evidence is necessary. Such appears to be the fair reading of the early New York cases, but that is denied, or if not denied overrruled, in more recent decisions. . . .

This Court has spoken in no uncertain language on the subject under consideration. No question in regard to it is open in this State. A reference to authorities elsewhere is here made because of the importance of the question in this case, and to demonstrate the universality of the doctrine here applied. . . . There are many striking illustrations of this doctrine in the books. In Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 212, the body of the murdered man was destroyed by fire so that no part of it was ever discovered but some pieces of bone, not recognizable as human bones. In State v. Ah Chuey, 14 Nev. 79, the body was destroyed by fire beyond recognition. So in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, the body had been dissected and many parts of it completely destroyed, particularly in the head, leaving no part that could be positively said to have been a part of the body of the supposed murdered man. . . .

So it may be taken as the settled law that the corpus delicti in criminal homicide, and each element of it, may be established by circumstantial evidence, and that no greater degree of certainty is required than in regard to the fact of the guilt of the person charged. Any language in State v. Davidson, supra, indicating that the former element must be established with such certainty as to exclude any doubt on the question, is not correct. True, the initial question when criminal homicide is charged is, was a human being deprived of life by criminal means? and the next question, was he the person alleged to have been murdered? And such questions, particularly the first, because of their supreme importance, require, ordinarily, stronger evidence than the questions which follow. Such importance is obvious from the well-known fact that convictions and executions have taken place, and thereafter the persons supposed to have been murdered have been discovered alive. The more important the question in any case, the greater the proof required to establish moral certainty in the mind, but when that certainty is established, whether by circumstantial or direct evidence, the fact itself must be said to be established. Enough has been said to show that there was ample evidence in this case to go to the jury on every element of the corpus delicti, and that the assignments of error on that subject cannot be sustained. . . .

[Judgment reversed on other grounds.]

SUB-TITLE III. VERBAL COMPLETENESS

520. Algernon Sidney's Trial. (1683. 9 How. St. Tr. 817, 829, 868). [Seditious libel. Mr. Williams, his counsel, had instructed the accused: "In the evidence against you for your writing, take care that all that was writt by you on that subject be produced, and that it be not given in evidence against you by pieces, which must invert your sense;" on the trial, one of the passages read against Sidney from his manuscript was: "The general revolt of a nation from its own magistrates can never be called rebellion." At the trial, Sidney, arguing against using these passages piecemeal, said]:

My lord, if you will take Scripture by pieces, you will make all the penmen of Scripture blasphemous. You may accuse David of saying, "There is no God," and accuse the Evangelists of saying, "Christ was a blasphemer and a seducer," and the Apostles, that they were drunk.

Jeffries, L. C. J. — "Look you, Mr. Sidney, if there be any part of it that explains the sense of it, you shall have it read. Indeed, we are trifled with a little. It is true, in Scripture it is said, "There is no God"; and you must not take that alone, but you must say, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." Now here is a thing imputed to you in the libel; if you can say there is any part that is in excuse of it, call for it.

521. Thomas Starkie. Evidence. (1824. 7th Am. ed.) II, 549. Of all kinds of evidence, that of extrajudicial and casual observations is the weakest and most unsatisfactory. Such words are often spoken without serious intention, and they are always liable to be mistaken and misremembered, and their meaning is apt to be misrepresented and exaggerated. I once heard a learned judge (now no more), in summing up on a trial for forgery, inform the jury that the prisoner, in a conversation which he had had with one of the witnesses, had said, "I am the drawer, the acceptor, and the indorser of the bill." Whilst the learned judge was commenting on the force of these expressions, he was, at the instance of the prisoner, set right as to the statement of the witness, which was that the prisoner had said, "I know the drawer, the acceptor, and the indorser of the bill." Had the witness, and not the judge, made the mistake, the consequences might have been fatal. The prisoner was acquitted.

522. Tilton v. Beecher. (N. Y. 1875. Abbott's Rep. II, 837.) Neilson J.) on certain quotations being cited to him). When you and I were boys, we found that general principle cited in all the text-books very much after the form that you have put it. . . . Perhaps the best statement of that has been given in Starkie on Evidence, to the effect that this kind of testimony is dangerous, first, because it may be misapprehended by the person who hears it; secondly, it may not be well-remembered; thirdly, it may not be correctly repeated.

523. Commonwealth v. Keyes. (Massachusetts. 1858. 11 Gray 323, 324). Merrick, J. It is undoubtedly the general rule that whenever the statements, declarations or admissions of a party are made subjects of proof, all that was said by him at the same time and upon the same subject is admissible in his favor, and the whole should be taken and considered together. This is essential to a complete understanding of what he intended to express by the particular phrases and language which he used. To give effect to general statements, without regard to the qualifications with which they are accompanied, and by which they may be materially modified, would manifestly lead to error, and be likely to be directly productive of injustice. All therefore is to be heard and weighed before it can be affirmed that the force and effect of language, whether written or spoken, are fully and justly apprehended. In the construction of contracts, the same principle prevails, requiring that each particular part shall be examined and considered, in order to learn and comprehend the scope and purport of the whole. All writings, whether of a public or private character, are to be subjected to the same kind of scrutiny. No provision of a statute, however minute, is to be overlooked when searching for the design and object of the Legislature in its enactment, and in considering how it ought to be interpreted and explained; just as particular covenants in a deed, or devises in a will, are to be construed according to the intent of the parties in the one case, and of the testator in the other, so far as it can be ascertained by bringing into view all the expressions and provisions contained in these respective instruments.

Topic 1. Compulsory Completeness

525. SUMMONS v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF OHIO. 1856

5 Oh. St. 325

MURDER by poisoning. One Mary Clinch, a witness at the first trial, had since died. Thomas A. Logan was offered, on the third trial, to prove her former testimony. . . . He testified that he was present at the first trial, and was the student and clerk of Judge Walker, one of the counsel for the State; that he heard all the testimony given by Mary Clinch, and thought he had taken it all down in writing, and could give the substance of all she testified from his recollection, aided by reference to his notes. On cross-examination as to this point, he stated that he took down, as nearly as possible, the substance of all that Mary Clinch testified on examination, cross-examination, re-examination, and in rebutter. That he recollected, without reference to his notes, the main points of her testimony, and recollected the substance of all of it, by refreshing his recollection with his notes. That he could not say he took everything, but he thought he took the substance of everything. That the cross-examination was rapid, but Judge Walker frequently stopped the witness, Mary Clinch, to enable him to get it all down. . . . Logan was then requested by counsel for the State to give the testimony of Mary Clinch from his recollection, refreshed by his notes, which he had with him in court, but the notes were not offered in evidence. Defendant's counsel objected. The objection was overruled, which was excepted to. . . .

The charge of the Court as to the evidence of Logan, detailing the testimony of Mary Clinch, was as follows: . . . "Mr. Logan's testimony is to be received with the greatest caution; and we have no hesitation in ruling that a witness, called to narrate the evidence of a deceased witness, should recollect the order and connection of the testimony, so far as such order and connection are necessary to convey an accurate understanding of what the deceased said and meant, and the influence and credit to be given to the testimony. But we are not prepared to say, that if Mr. Logan has failed to give the substance of all Mary Clinch's evidence, that therefore you must entirely reject his testimony; provided that, taking his testimony and that of the other witnesses who have detailed what she testified to, you are satisfied that you have the substance, correctly, of all her testimony." . . .

The jury found the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree. . . . To reverse this judgment, the present writ of error is prosecuted, and the following matters are assigned for error:

1. The Court admitted Thomas A. Logan to repeat the testimony of Mary Clinch, a witness who testified at a former trial, and since deceased. . . . 3. The Court directed the jury, "That, if they were satisfied from the testimony of all the witnesses, that they had before them the substance of all the evidence of the deceased witness, the testimony must be considered." . . .

F. T. Chambers, N. C. Read, and R. B. Hayes, for plaintiff in error.

R. B. Hayes, submitted the following points and authorities on behalf of plaintiff in error: . . . 11. Such testimony is not admissible in criminal cases, unless the very language of the deceased witness can be repeated by the person who undertakes to give it. . . .

C. P. Wolcott, Attorney-General, submitted the following points and authorities for the State: . . . Though it was formerly held that the testimony of a deceased witness could not be proved except in his very words, yet such is not the general modern rule. . . . The position taken by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, that unless the person called to prove the former testimony can state the substance of all of it, he is an incompetent witness, does not seem to be sanctioned by reason, or borne out by the authorities. . . .

Bartley, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court. . . .

1. Is it essential to the competency of the testimony in question, that it be a narration of the statements of the deceased witness ipsissimis verbis?

The doctrine, that the testimony must be in the words of the deceased witness, appears to have taken its origin from a dictum of Lord Kenyon, in the case of Rex v. Jolliffe, 4 Term, 385, as follows:

"The evidence which the witness gave on a former trial, may be used in a subsequent one, if he die in the interim, as I remember was agreed on all hands, on a trial at bar in the instance of Lord Palmerston; but as the person who wished to give Lord Palmerston's evidence could not undertake to give his words, but could merely swear to the effect of them, he was rejected."

This remark of Lord KENYON, which appears to have been thrown in rather by way of illustration than otherwise, has been adopted by some elementary writers on evidence, and given as the true rule. . . .

In Massachusetts the rule requiring the statements of the deceased witness at a former trial to be ipsissimis verbis, is laid down in its utmost strictness in the case of the Commonwealth v. Richards, 18 Pick. 434. And in Warren v. Nicols, 6 Met. 261, the doctrine was affirmed, HUBBARD, J., dissenting. In the latter case, however, the majority of the Court drew a distinction between giving the substance of the deceased witness' testimony and the substance of his language; requiring only that his language should be stated substantially, and in all material particulars, and not "ipsissimis verbis." It is not very easy to perceive how this distinction can be reconciled in this regard, with the decision in the case of the Commonwealth v. Richards. . . .

In Ohio it has been settled, in a well-considered decision in the case of Wagers v. Dickey, 17 Ohio, 440, that it is sufficient for the witness to give the substance of what the deceased witness testified on the former trial. . . .

There would seem to be no sound reason for subjecting it [former testimony] to a rigid rule amounting to its almost total exclusion, which is inapplicable in other cases where testimony showing words spoken or the statements of a party or other person is admissible. In prosecutions for perjury, the testimony of the accused upon which perjury is assigned is not required to be "ipsissimis verbis," but allowed to be given in substance; so with the declarations of a co-conspirator, declarations made "in extremis" or the admissions or confessions of a party. So also with testimony of a verbal slander, or the declarations or statements of a party or witness, offered for purposes of contradiction or impeachment. . . . What sufficient reason can exist for a departure from the rule in case of the testimony of a deceased witness on a former trial? . . . It is apparent, from a review of the decisions on this question, that the weight of authority is very decidedly against the rule which requires an exact recital of the words used by the deceased witness. The difficulty which appears to have troubled courts so long on the question, has been a controversy about words, rather than facts. The efficacy of the testimony consists, not in the mere words used, but the matters of fact stated by the deceased witness. If the facts stated by the deceased witness on the former trial, can be narrated with substantial accuracy in all their material particulars, there would seem to be no good reason for cavil about the very words. . . .

There is a distinction, however, between narrating the statements made by the deceased witness and giving the effect of his testimony.

This distinction may be illustrated thus: If a witness state that A, as a witness on a former trial, proved the execution of a written instrument by B, that would be giving the effect, which is nothing else than the result or conclusion produced by A's testimony. But if the witness states that A testified that he had often seen B write, that he was acquainted with his handwriting, and that the name subscribed to the instrument of writing exhibited was B's signature, that would be giving the substance of A's testimony, though it might not be in the exact words. . . . While, therefore, a witness should not be trammeled by a rule restricting him to the words used by the deceased witness, he should not be allowed the latitude of giving the mere effect or result of the deceased witness' testimony.

2. Was there error in the charge of the Court to the jury, that if they should find that Logan had not stated the substance of all that the deceased witness had sworn to on the former trial, they should not, for that reason, exclude it from their consideration, provided that by taking this testimony in connection with the testimony of other witnesses, they were satisfied that they had the substance of all the testimony given by Mary Clineh on the former trial? . . . Shall the testimony be excluded because it can not all be given by one witness, when it can be all, with equal accuracy and certainty, had, in distinct parts, from two witnesses? The requirement of the rule is satisfied, provided all that the deceased witness had sworn to be given the jury. There can be no substantial reason for requiring it all from one witness. . . .

Judgment of the District Court affirmed, and Friday, the 17th day of April next, appointed as the day for the execution of the sentence.

526. STATE v. LU SING

34 Mont. 31; 85 Pac. 521

Appeal from District Court, Gallatin County; W. R. C. Stewart, Judge. Lu Sing was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Staats, for appellant. Albert J. Galen, Attorney-General, and E. M. Hall, Assistant Attorney-General, for the State.

Holloway, J. Lu Sing was convicted of murder of the first degree, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial. . . .

E. H. Williams, a policeman in the city of Bozeman, who arrested the defendant soon after the homicide was committed, testified for the State, over the objection of the defendant, to a part of a conversation which took place between himself and the defendant on their way to and at the city jail. The witness testified that the defendant spoke English very poorly, and that he could not understand all that defendant said, but did understand the defendant's statement: "If I kill him, me good man. If I no kill him, no good." And again: "If me no kill him, me no good man; and if Tom Sing dead, me die happy." Defendant moved to strike out the testimony of the witness, on the ground that he had not understood all that the defendant said to him and ought not to be permitted to testify to a portion only. The motion was denied, and error is predicated on this ruling.

In support of his contention, counsel for appellant cites People v. Gelabert, 39 Cal. 663, decided in 1870, and State v. Buster, 23 Nev. 346, 47 Pac. 194, decided in 1896. The opinion in People v. Gelabert is very brief and cites no authorities in support of the conclusion reached. The reason given for the conclusion goes to the weight, rather than to the competency, of the evidence. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, §214, is cited, not, however, in support of the conclusion reached by the Court, but in support of the oft-repeated declaration of Courts and text-writers that evidence of extrajudicial confessions should be received with great caution, because of the danger of mistake of the witness arising from his misapprehending what the defendant said, his unintentional misuse of a particular word; or, if the witness does not remember the exact words used by the defendant, his failure to express in his own language the meaning intended to be conveyed by the defendant; and, finally, because of the infirmity of memory. But all of this is directed to the weight, rather than the competency, of the evidence, and it is well for the trial Court to warn the jury as to the caution to be exercised respecting this character of evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 3390, subd. 4) as indicated above, as was fully done by the trial Court in this case. . . .

No fault is found with the authorities which hold that where the State offers only a part of the conversation embodying a confession, the defendant has a right to have the whole of the conversation before the jury; but the great weight of authority and reason hold that merely because a witness did not hear all of the conversation, or did not understand it all, does not render incompetent what he did hear or understand. The evidence goes to the jury for what it is worth. Its value may be greatly impaired by the fact that the witness heard or understood only a part of what was said. But where the jury is cautioned, as was done in this case, there can be no error in the reception of the evidence, merely because the witness can give only a portion of what was said. Westmoreland v. State, 45 Ga. 225; . . . 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2100; Wharton's Criminal Evidence, § 688. Long after the decision in People v. Gelabert was rendered, the Supreme Court of California held to this same doctrine announced by the Courts above. People v. Daniels, 105 Cal. 262, 38 Pac. 720; People v. Dice, 120 Cal. 189, 52 Pac. 477. There cannot be any reason advanced for the admission of the testimony of witnesses who heard only a part of a conversation which will not apply equally to the testimony of a witness who heard it all but only understood or remembered a portion of it. We think the evidence was properly admitted. . . .

The judgment and order are affirmed. Affirmed.

527. READ v. HIDE. (1613. Coke's Third Institute, 173). . . . It was resolved that no exemplification ought to be of any letters patent or of any other record, or of the inrolment thereof, but the whole record or the inrolment thereof ought to be exemplified; so that the whole truth may appear, and not of such part as makes for the one party and nothing that makes against him or that manifesteth the truth.

528. VANCE v. REARDON

CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA. 1820

2 N. & McC. 299, 303

TROVER for a slave, claimed by the plaintiff under a sheriff's sale under an execution on a judgment against William Harville, at Orangeburgh, in 1806. The plaintiff produced a paper purporting to be an exemplification of the proceedings, certified by the clerk. It contained a literal copy of the process, (being within the summary jurisdiction), the judgment and the first execution. This execution was for $95, including debt, interest, and costs, and was entered in the sheriff's office the 5th November, 1806. Instead of a literal copy of the second execution, the clerk furnished only an abstract, containing the names of the parties, the amount of debt, interest, and costs, with a memorandum of an entry in the sheriff's office, 2d July, 1808; and a return of "nulla bona," without date; and also, that a third execution was signed, 19th March, 1808. There was also a similar abstract of a third execution, entered in the sheriff's office, 19th March, 1808, on which the following return was stated to have been made, "levied on a negro man named Joe, sold the same on the 4th April, 1808, purchased by William Vance, for $251.10." The certificate of the clerk to these exemplifications was in these words: "I, Samuel P. Jones, Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas, for the district of Orangeburgh, do hereby certify, that the two sheets of paper hereunto annexed, do contain a true copy (or extract), of the proceedings in a certain cause, wherein Robert Tutle is plaintiff, and William Harville is defendant," etc. Upon closing this evidence the motion was made for a nonsuit by the defendant, on the ground, that the exemplification was only legal evidence so far as it professed to give a copy of the proceedings, and there being only an abstract of the execution, under which the sale, if any, was made, the plaintiff had failed in the proof of property. This motion was overruled. . . .

The defendant moved for a new trial on the following grounds: . . . 2. Because the Court erred in admitting the exemplification in the form presented as evidence of the second and third executions. . . .

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

JOHNSON, J. . . . The next question arises out of the admissibility of the exemplifications so far as they profess only to give extracts of the proceedings in relation to the second and third executions, under the latter of which the levy and sale is alleged to have been made.

The Act of the Legislature of 1721, P. L. 117, 1 Brev. Dig. 315, authorizes attested copies of all records, certified by the clerks of the Courts, to be given in evidence. . . . It appears to me obvious that the Legislature never intended by the term copies, to make extracts evidence; the terms themselves are of different import, and besides the mischief of confounding them appears to me too manifest to need exposure. A party is not presumed, nor is he bound, to know what evidence his adversary will adduce against him; and if he [the adversary] be permitted to extract from a record only so much as he may deem necessary to his own side of the question and to give it in as evidence, he will always take care to leave out that which makes against him. By the same rule, the opposite party would have the same right to extract so much as was subservient to his side of the question, which, from the specimen of extraction furnished by this case, would produce inexplicable difficulties. Thus, in this case, we find that on the first fi. fa., when only $95 was due, $110 had been paid, and yet an alias issued, and also a pluries; and, as if to force conviction upon me of the necessity of a literal copy, the extract represents the pluries to have been entered in the sheriff's office on the 19th March, 1808, and the alias, which must necessarily precede it, as having been entered on the 2d July, 1808, nearly four months after.

But it has been argued, that these extracts were permissible as prima facie evidence of the existence of such judgments and executions. I confess I do not understand how this sort of evidence can apply to a case, when the Court sees from the evidence produced, that better and more ample proof of the fact does exist, and is in the power of the party. And it appears to me to be at war with that universal rule, that the best evidence should always be adduced, and can only apply when there is no higher evidence.

I think, therefore, these abstracts were inadmissible, and if admitted, they proved nothing, and the motion ought to be granted.

NOTT and HUGER, JJ., concurred.

COLCOCK, J., dissented. . . . If it were necessary, to the support of plaintiff's case, that the exemplification should be considered as complete, I conceive, by a critical examination of it, it will be found to be so. . . . It is apparent that the officer professes to set forth all that is within and without the papers in the case, except that he does not repeat the words of the second and third executions. And this I did consider, and do still consider, as wholly immaterial, for if it had been found, upon their being set forth, that there had been any error, it was amendable, and would be amended by the Court to perfect the sale; see the case of Toomer v. Purkey, 1 Con. Rep. 323, which is only a repetition of what has often been decided in our Courts. Now if it is immaterial whether the words were those which, according to the forms of our proceedings, ought to have been used, I am at a loss to conceive why they should have been put down, to the great trouble of the officer and expense of the party.

Again, is there any prescribed mode and form of exemplification? I know of none. It is admitted that in exemplifications the whole is exemplified. But much depends on the purposes for which they are to be used. It is said, Something is kept back. I ask if the officer does not say what that is? I think he does, as plainly as if he had said that "I deem it unnecessary to repeat the body or formal part of the execution; but I give you all the endorsements thereon, and these it is to be observed, cite the only important parts of the execution." . . .

Bay, J., concurred with Colcock, J.

Simons, for the motion. Hunt, contra.

529. PERRY v. BURTON

111 Ill. 138

Appeal from the Superior Court of Cook county; the Hon. John A. Jameson, Judge, presiding.

Mr. Edmund S. Holbrook, for the appellants. Messrs. Moore & Browning, for the appellees. Messrs. G. & W. Garnett, for the Louisville Banking Company.

Mr. Chief Justice Scholfield delivered the opinion of the Court:

This was a bill for the partition, as first drawn, of a tract of eighty acres of land in Cook county, and to quiet the title thereto. The tract was entered by Isaac Cook on the 30th of November, 1835, and he conveyed the undivided half thereof to Asa M. Chambers and Sheldon Benedict, by warranty deed, on the 7th of February, 1836. In November, 1848, Benedict conveyed his interest in the tract to Chambers, and on the 10th of November, 1871, Chambers conveyed his interest in the tract to the appellants, James S. Perry and John N. Henderson. No question is made as to any of these conveyances, except that by Benedict to Chambers. The deed effecting that conveyance was lost, and its execution and contents were proved by oral evidence only, and counsel for appellees insist that such evidence was not sufficiently full and satisfactory.

We can not concur in this view. The facts that the deed was executed and was afterwards lost were clearly proved. . . . His testimony as to the contents of the deed, we think, is sufficiently full. A witness testifying to the contents of a lost deed is not to be expected to be able to repeat it verbatim from memory. Indeed, if he were to do so, that circumstance would, in itself, be so conspicuous as to call for an explanation. . . . All that parties, in such cases, can be expected to remember is that they made a deed, to whom, and about what time, for what consideration, whether warranty or quitclaim, and for what party. To require more would, in most instances, practically amount to an exclusion of oral evidence in the case of a lost or destroyed deed. The evidence here meets the requirements suggested, and in the absence of contradiction or impeachment, was sufficient to authorize the Court to decree upon the faith of it.

530. TILTON v. BEECHER

City Court of Brooklyn, N. Y. 1875

Abbott's Rep. II, 270

[Action for criminal conversation.]

Mr. Evarts (cross-examining). Look at this article, Mr. Tilton, . . . and say if it was written by you and published in your newspaper. A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Shearman. — It is an article entitled, "Mr. Tilton's Rejoinder to Mr. Greeley."

Mr. Fullerton. — If we have the sermon, let us have the text.

Mr. Beach. — I think it is the rule, sir, that where an answering letter is read, the letter to which it was a reply should be read also.

Judge Neilson. — That is the rule. Perhaps if counsel will look at it they can judge whether it is material.

Mr. Evarts. — Your Honor, we understand exactly what the rule is. All that can be claimed by our learned friends is that it gives them a right to read any part of the paper to which is it a reply, if they see fit. They cannot make us read it.

Judge Neilson. — I have had occasion to say that where one party puts a paper in they were at liberty to read a part of it. But it was deemed all put in by them, and the other side could read any portion of it they thought proper.

Mr. Fullerton. — That does not present this case.

Mr. Evarts. — How does it fail to present this case? Supposing it is all in, are we obliged to read it all? . . . I do not understand that we are obliged to read the whole article to get at the point which is important to us.

Judge Neilson. — The whole must be deemed put in by you.

Mr. Evarts. — That may be.

Judge Neilson. — And you read such part as you now think proper, and they can afterwards call attention to other parts. I think that will answer.

531. PARNELL COMMISSION'S PROCEEDINGS

SPECIAL COURT, LONDON. 1888

Times' Rep. pt. 1, p. 236, pt. 2, pp. 28, 104, 109; pt. 23, p. 60

[The Land League and its leaders were charged with encouraging outrage and crime, and numerous speeches of the leaders were offered to prove this; repeated discussion took place, during the trial, as to the fair and proper way of using the passages relied upon. In the Attorney-General's opening, the following statements were made.]

Attorney-General. — I have not got the whole of the speeches; I have only reports. A man may speak for two hours, but I may have only a few lines of his speech.

President HANNEN. — If you have not got the whole of them, it will be open to Sir Charles Russell [for the opposite side] to correct you by referring to such reports as do exist; but what you do use [in your opening address] you will put in the whole of it [in evidence later].

Attorney-General. — Without exception, the whole extract at my command of every speech I read shall be put in. . . .

[Then at a later day, when certain speeches were put in evidence by Sir H. James from constables' notes, Mr. Healy having claimed that "the proper course is to read the entire speech,"]

President HANNEN. — It is not necessary for you, Sir Henry, to read the whole speech, but only those portions on which you rely. . . . The only regular course is this (and whatever it leads to, it must be followed): You, Sir Henry, will call attention to what you consider the material parts of the speech, and Sir C. Russell can on cross-examination refer to other portions which he may consider, and, if necessary, the cross-examination can be postponed until he has had an opportunity of seeing the full speeches. . . .

[Shortly afterwards, the counsel for the Times proposed an arrangement by which copies of all the reports of speeches were to be prepared and underlined and furnished to all parties for convenient reference.]

Mr. Healy. — Some of the speeches made would cover two or three columns if taken verbatim, but they have been condensed [in the constable's notes] into three or four sentences. What is the intention with regard to them?

Sir H. James. — We can only present the short report in those cases, because that is all we have got. . . . [On a still later occasion,

Mr. Reid, the counsel for Mr. O'Brien, read passages from his speeches showing his opposition to criminal methods, and was interrupted by the] Attorney-General. — You have omitted a passage which precedes that.

Mr. Reid. — I thought the rule was that what you wished to read should be read subsequently.

Attorney-General. — I was only suggesting that the course which has been pursued on every other occasion by Sir Charles Russell and yourself should be pursued now.

President HANNEN (to Mr. Reid). — This question arose before, and there was great complaint on your part that the Attorney-General did not read all, and then you read, or Sir C. Russell read something. But I have laid down the rule that, unless you can come to a compromise, the true rule is for you to read what you attach importance to and for the other side to do the same.

Topic 2. Optional Completeness

532. THE QUEEN'S CASE. (House of Lords. 2 B. & B. 297. 1820.) ABBOTT C. J. — The conversations of a party to the suit, relative to the subject-matter of the suit, are in themselves evidence against him in the suit, and if a counsel chooses to ask a witness as to anything which may have been said by an adverse party, the counsel for that party has a right to lay before the Court the whole which was said by his client in the same conversation, — not only so much as may explain or qualify the matter introduced by the previous examination, but even matter not properly connected with the part introduced upon the previous examination, provided only that it relate to the subject-matter of the suit; because it would not be just to take part of a conversation as evidence against a party without giving to the party at the same time the benefit of the entire residue of what he said on the same occasion.

533. PRINCE v. SAMO

7 A. & E. 627

THIS was an action for malicious arrest on a false suggestion that money was lent by defendant to plaintiff, when it had been in fact given. The plaintiff called his attorney as a witness; he happened to have been present at the trial of a prosecution for perjury instituted by the plaintiff against a witness in the action wherein he had been arrested. The defendant's counsel inquired of him, in cross-examination, whether the plaintiff had not, on the trial for perjury, stated that he himself had been insolvent repeatedly, and remanded by the Court. This question was not objected to. On his re-examination, the same witness was asked whether plaintiff had not also on that occasion, given an account of the circumstances out of which the arrest had arisen, and what that account was, for the purpose of laying before the jury proof that the arrest was without cause, and malicious, of both which facts there was scarcely any, if any, evidence whatever. This question, expressly confined to that purpose, was whether plaintiff did not say, in the course of his examination, that the money was given, and not lent. To this question the defendant's counsel objected, not on account of its leading form, but because the defendant's having proved one detached expression that fell from the plaintiff when a witness does not make the whole of what he then said evidence in his own favour. . . .

DENMAN, L. C. J. (after stating the case as above).—My opinion was that the witness might be asked as to everything said by the plaintiff, when he appeared on the trial of the indictment, that could in any way qualify or explain the statement as to which he had been cross-examined; but that he had no right to add any independent history of transactions wholly unconnected with it. . . . Upon the whole, we think it must be taken as settled that proof of a detached statement made by a witness at a former time does not authorize proof by the party calling that witness of all that he said at the same time, but only of so much as can be in some way connected with the statement proved. . . . We cannot assent to [the rule as stated in the above passage of the opinion in The Queen's Case]. We will merely observe that it was not introduced as an answer to any question proposed by the House of Lords, and may therefore be strictly regarded as extrajudicial; that it was not necessary as a reason for the answer to the question that was proposed; that it was not in terms adopted by Lord Eldon or any of the other Judges who concurred; that it was expressly denied by Lords Redesdale and Wynford; and that it does not rest on any previous authority.

534. PEOPLE v. SCHLESSEL. (1909. 196 N. Y. 476, 90 N. E. 44). WILLARD BARTLETT, J.—In respect to the right of a party against whom part of an utterance has been put in evidence to complement it by putting in the remainder, in order that the Court may completely understand the total tenor and effect of the utterance, Professor Wigmore correctly states that the right is subject to a threefold limitation: (a) No utterance irrelevant to the issue is receivable; (b) no more of the remainder of the utterance than concerns the same subject and is explanatory of the first part is receivable; (c) the remainder thus received merely aids in the construction of the utterance as a whole, and is not in itself testimony. 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2113.

535. DEWEY v. HOTCHKISS

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1864

30 N. Y. 497, 502

ACTION for the price of goods sold and delivered. The plaintiff's clerks proved from his account-books items amounting to $1,269.72. The defendant having, on the cross-examination, shown that the books so produced, were the plaintiff's books of original entry, read therefrom certain items of credit, amounting to $152.09; and the plaintiff's counsel, thereupon, offered to read from the said books, other charges against the defendant, which had not been proved by the plaintiff's witnesses. The defendant objected to the reading of these entries, but the referee overruled the objection, and an exception was taken.

The items so admitted amounted to $137.49, and were allowed by the referee, who reported a balance due the plaintiff of $299.62. And the judgment entered on his report having been affirmed at general term, the defendant took this appeal.

Clark, for the appellant. Strong, for the respondent.

Hogeboom, J. — The plaintiff's account-books, it is conceded, were properly in evidence. In connection with the oral testimony of the clerks, they established the larger part of the plaintiff's claim. Being in evidence, the defendant availed himself of them, to prove thereby credits in his own favor. There were equally well established, whether they were in the plaintiffs' handwriting or not. The plaintiffs had brought them forward as their books, claiming for them authenticity and credit, and could not deny their admissibility and force, even when they operated against themselves. In using them for his purpose, the defendant apparently traveled over their entire contents, selecting his items wherever he pleased, without reference to dates or subject-matter, or their connection or relation to the charges read by the plaintiffs. Thus, he selected from the day-books three different items, each of considerable amount, of the respective dates of 2d May 1848, 22d March 1849, and 27th October 1849. He selected from the cash-book eight different items, ranging between the dates of 21st July 1848, and 19th November 1851. He had, therefore, used the whole of the books indifferently for his purpose. He had taken the entire account between the plaintiffs and the defendant, adopted it for his own benefit, and was not, I think, at liberty to renounce it, where it made against him. . . . The books constituted one entire series of accounts between these parties, and, for the purpose of this case, may be regarded as if they contained nothing else whatever — indeed, as if they had all been presented in court by the plaintiffs on a single paper or account current. In such case could the defendant be permitted to cull particular entries from the account and exclude the residue? I think not.

The rule that a party whose oral declarations, in a conversation are improved in evidence by his adversary, is not thereby permitted to introduce in his own favor disconnected portions of the same conversation having reference to distinct and independent matters, has no close application to such a case; 1st, Because the account must be regarded as the single, entire and continuous statement of the party offering it, presenting his version of the true state of the business transactions between the parties, — not necessarily entitled to credit in every part, if discredited by other evidence, but admissible for the consideration of the jury; 2d, Because the defendant, having adopted the whole statement by ranging through its entire scope and contents, has given currency to the whole, and has made it necessary to examine and take in the whole, in order to determine how far the portions rejected by him bear upon, affect, or qualify the portions selected. There is no evidence that the portions of the account introduced by the plaintiff, after those introduced by the defendant, do not materially qualify the effect of the latter items, and do not in fact relate to the same precise subject-matter.

536. ATHERTON v. DEFREEZE

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN. 1902

129 Mich. 364; 88 N. W. 886

ERROR to Shiawassee; SMITH, J. Submitted January 7, 1902. Decided January 28, 1902. Replevin by John J. Atherton against Aaron Defreeze. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. J. Kellogg (John T. McCurdy, of counsel), for appellant. Martin V. B. Wixom, for appellee.

GRANT, J. — This is an action of replevin for two horses, and originated in justice's Court. Plaintiff derived his title from one Susan Whitman by a bill of sale. . . . The title to the horses was the issue, and upon this the testimony was conflicting. . . .

One Miller, who formerly owned the horses, testified that he sold them to Mrs. Whitman, and that, after the suit was brought, he had a conversation with defendant; that defendant asked him what he knew about the case; that witness told him that, at the time of the sale, defendant said that the cows, for which he exchanged the horses, belonged to Mrs. Whitman; and that defendant said it looked as though he would get beaten. On cross-examination by the defendant's attorney, the witness, in reply to the question, "What else did he say?" said: "He said he was so blind he couldn't see; and I asked him about how much the colts were worth, and he said about $300, and, if he didn't get them, he would go to the poorhouse." Plaintiff's attorney moved to strike out the answer as incompetent, immaterial, and not relative to the issue. The Court denied the motion; holding the answer "competent as testing the recollection of the witness, and as a conversation between him and the defendant."

The motion should have been granted. . . . Parts of a conversation having no reference whatever to the issue upon trial, are not admissible under the rule that a party is entitled to the entire conversation. The rule means only that he is entitled to the entire conversation bearing upon the subject in controversy. Ten subjects may be talked about in one conversation. When one of the ten is the subject of litigation, it is not competent to put in evidence the conversation about the other nine. Defendant's blindness and poverty had nothing to do with the title to the property. . . .

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

Hooker, C. J., Moore and Montgomery, JJ., concurred.

Long, J., did not sit.

537. LOMBARD v. CHAPLIN

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. 1903

98 Me. 309; 56 Atl. 903

On motion and exceptions by defendant. Exceptions sustained. Motion not considered.

Case for personal injuries which the plaintiff alleged she sustained while driving upon a public street, April 22, 1902, in the City of Portland, by reason of the defendant's negligence in the operation of his automobile. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff and assessed the damages at six hundred dollars. After the verdict, the defendant, besides the usual motion for a new trial, excepted to the rulings of the presiding justice in refusing to admit in evidence, upon defendant's request, a certain letter in the plaintiff's possession. The letter was written by the defendant to the plaintiff's husband, and from it the defendant claimed that plaintiff's counsel had cross-examined him in such a manner as to get a part of it before the jury, to his prejudice. The exceptions appear in the opinion.

Frank H. Haskell and Enoch Foster, for plaintiff. . . . Wm. C. Eaton, for defendant.

Sitting: Emery, Whitehouse, Strout, Savage, Powers, Spear, JJ.

Spear, J. — This is an action in which the plaintiff seeks to recover damages of the defendant for alleged negligence on his part in running and operating the automobile, in which he was riding, so carelessly that the horse which the plaintiff was driving became frightened and ran away, throwing the plaintiff from her carriage and causing her to be injured. The case comes up on motion and exceptions by the defendant, but, as the exceptions must be sustained, it becomes necessary to consider the motion.

It appeared from the development of the evidence in the case that the defendant had written a letter to Dr. Lombard, husband of the plaintiff. This letter was in the possession of the plaintiff's counsel and used by him in connection with his cross-examination of the defendant, and the question is, was it such a use as made the exclusion of the whole letter, when offered later by the defendant, a matter of exception?

The plaintiff's counsel, during the cross-examination of the defendant, passed the letter to the defendant with the following inquiries:

Q. — "Will you look and see if you recognize that letter?" A. — "That is my signature."

After putting several other interrogatories, — . . .

Q. — "That was over two hundred feet away and the horse was running directly towards you?" A. — "I said that was my idea of the way she was running."

Q. — "When did you say that?" A. — "I just said it."

Q. — "Did you ever say it to anybody before to-night?" A. — "I don't remember."

Q. — "Did you write it to Dr. Lombard?" A. — "What?"

Q. — "That the horse was running furiously toward you?" A. — "I think I did. You have it in your hand. . . ."

Did the putting in evidence a part of the letter, as above shown, entitle the defendant to the right to put in the whole letter? We think it did.

1. It is claimed that the whole letter is inadmissible, even if a part of it had been put in evidence, as it was a self-serving, not self-disserving, statement made to a third party. If the writer of the letter was a witness only, it is true that the letter could be used only to contradict him and impeach his credibility, and not for the purpose of proving or disproving any fact material to the issue involved. But when the writer is also a party, this rule does not apply, for every statement in his letter, to whomsoever written, may be taken as an admission to prove or disprove any fact relevant to the issue. In the former case, where the writer is a witness only, his letter would be admissible only to contradict his present testimony. But in the latter case, where the writer is also a party, his statement may be used to contradict his present testimony, or as an admission of fact if material to the issue. In the case at bar, the extracts from the defendant's letter could not have been used to contradict his present testimony, for no such contradiction appeared or was claimed; hence they must necessarily have been used as admissions of fact on the part of the defendant.

2. Considering this letter then as an admission previously made by the defendant, did counsel for the plaintiff, by introducing a part of it, thereby give the defendant the right to introduce the balance? We think he did. This Court in Storer v. Gowen, 18 Maine 176, have held that,

"It is a principle well settled that the admissions of a party, when given in evidence, must be taken together as well what makes in his favor as against him. Both are equally evidence to the jury, who will give every part of the testimony such credence as it may appear to deserve." Hammatt v. Emerson, 27 Maine, 308, 336, 46 Am. Dec. 598.

In an early decision in Massachusetts, Whitwell v. Wyer, 11 Mass. 91, this is the language of the Court:

"Where you rely upon a confession you must take it all together."

And the same Court says in O'Brien v. Cheney, 5 Cush. 148:

"The general principle for which the defendant contends, namely, that, when the admission of a part is offered in evidence, he is entitled to have the whole of what he said on the subject, at that interview, stated as a part of the evidence, is correct and is not denied."

See also Adam v. Eames, 107 Mass. 276; Dole v. Wooldredge, 142 Mass. 161. In regard to the admission of the defendant, the Court say in Mattocks v. Lyman, 18 Vt. 102:

"That the whole declaration of the party made at one time, as well that in his favor as that which is against him, must be received and weighed."

And in Moore v. Wright, 90 Ill. 473, the Court holds that,

"Where a party's admissions are called for, the party calling for the same is bound to take all the other party said upon the occasion concerning the matter in dispute, whether it makes for or against him."

It is unnecessary to make further citations. The above, we think, is a fair statement of the practice both in this country and England with respect to the admissibility of admissions as testimony. . . .

In Maine the whole of an oral admission is admissible, although it may contain a reference to matters entirely impertinent to the issue to be tried, if so connected that it cannot be separated from the whole. It was so held in Lord v. Moore, 37 Maine, 217, 218. . . .

Exceptions sustained.

SUB-TITLE IV. AUTHENTICATION OF DOCUMENTS

538. Horne Tooke's Trial. (1794. 25 How. St. Tr. 78). [High treason. A book purporting to be the minutes of the Constitutional Society, at a meeting of March 28, 1794, with Mr. Tooke as chairman, was offered to be read by the prosecution, after some evidence of the handwriting.]

Mr. Tooke. — Is the insertion of my name in that book evidence of my being present at the time?

Lord Chief Justice Eyre. — It is certainly evidence to go to the jury of your being present.

Mr. Tooke. — My name being found in any book! That will be the most extraordinary evidence I ever heard of. The bulk of the trash that is to be found in that book I never saw or heard of before. But that every time that my name is to be found in the book, that that is to be evidence that I was present is a most extraordinary proposition. If I wrote my name in the book, that would be evidence that I was there when I wrote it; but my name being written in a book does not prove my being there when it was wrote. . . . If this evidence were to be admitted in a charge of high treason, and it should therefore follow that I partake of whatever is over or under my name, it would be the most extraordinary evidence that ever was admitted in a Court of justice.

Lord Chief Justice Eyre. — You are perfectly right, if the state of the evidence depended entirely upon your name being found in a book in possession of a Daniel Adams; undoubtedly, in order to prove your being present at these meetings, they must go a great deal farther — they must show that these are the books of the society, they must give probable evidence that these were books which you had access to, which you acted upon, and that you gave credit to the entries that were in it by some conduct of yours. This is only one step toward the evidence, to fix you with being a person present at this meeting. . . .

Mr. (later L. C.) Erskine (arguing against the reading of the treasonable paper).—Would it be said that this should be read as evidence against the prisoner before his connexion with it is proved to have had an existence? I take the reason of that to be this — and I take the reason of it to be founded in great wisdom, in that which in my opinion forms the glory of the English law in all its parts, in an acquaintance with the human character, in the recognition of all that belongs to the principles of the human mind, in the recollection of our wise ancestors that men are not angels, — that they carry about them (and your lordships even carry about you) all the infirmities of humanity, and that it therefore shall not be permitted to make a strong impression upon the minds of men by reading matters at which . . . the mind of man revolts, and so in the course of a long trial the jury afterwards cannot discharge from their recollection what they have heard. They do not remember with precision whether that which was read was brought home to the prisoner; and then they mix up in their imagination and recollection matters which they may disapprove with disapprobation of the person who is on trial before them. I take that, with humility to be the principle. . . . It must be brought home to the person who is to be affected by it, before it is suffered to be read; for after it is read, the effect is had, and that is the danger I complain of.

L. C. J. Eyre. — If the question is whether it is now to be read, I think the objection is good. If the question is whether it is evidence admissible, not yet to be read, but to be read or not as other evidence shall bring the matter of it sufficiently home to the prisoner, then the objection is ill-founded.

539. Wilson v. Betts. (1847. New York 4 Den. 201, 213). Bronson, C. J. In the ordinary affairs of men, it is very often assumed, without proof, that he whose name has been affixed to a written instrument placed it there himself. But when the signing becomes a matter of legal controversy, it must be established by proof.

540. Stamper v. Griffin. (1856. Georgia. 20 Ga. 312, 320). Benning, J. No writing can be received in evidence as a genuine writing until it has been proved to be a genuine one, and none as a forgery until it has been proved to be a forgery. A writing, of itself, is not evidence of the one thing or of the other. A writing, of itself, is evidence of nothing, and therefore is not, unless accompanied by proof of some sort, admissible as evidence.

541. Siegfried v. Levan. (1820. Pennsylvania. 6 S. & R. 308, 311). Duncan, J. This was an action for debt on bond; the plea, non est factum. The plaintiff gave evidence, as stated in the bill of exceptions, and then offered the bond (of which he had made profert and given oyer) to the jury in evidence; this was objected to, and the Court sustained the objection, and would not suffer the bond to be read in evidence. The exception to be considered is to this opinion of the Court. . . .

The mistake arises from supposing that the Court, in suffering the deed to go in evidence to the jury, decide the issue; nothing can be more unfounded. . . . All that is done by the Court, in admitting the deed in evidence, is this: That if the execution of the deed is proved by the subscribing witness, the party has made out a prima facie case, — not a conclusive one; or, in cases where recourse is had to the secondary evidence, that the collateral proof is such that a jury might presume [i.e. infer] the execution; and then these facts are submitted to the jury to exercise their own judgment, to draw their own conclusion of the sealing and delivery. . . . If the bond is proved by the subscribing witness, it is read in evidence. Why? Not because the Court pronounce, by admitting it in evidence, that it is the deed of the party; but because the party has given evidence of its execution. So, where the execution is to be made out by facts and circumstances, it is admitted, not because the Court draw any conclusion of the fact in issue, but because some evidence is offered from which the jury might presume [i.e. infer] the fact in issue, the sealing and delivery of the bond.

If there be no evidence of the execution, the Court will not permit the bond to be read in evidence. But if there be any fact or circumstance tending to prove the execution or from which the execution might be presumed, then like other presumptive evidence it is open for the decision of the jury.

542. Modes of Authenticating Documents.[1] Some of the various possible modes of proving a document's genuineness are, of course, never questioned to be sufficient to entitle it to go to the jury. Those about which question has arisen are only certain kinds of circumstantial evidence. It will be necessary therefore to eliminate at the outset the kinds of evidence as to which there is no dispute from the present point of view.

Evidence may be of three different sorts, namely, "real evidence," testimonial evidence, and circumstantial evidence.

(1) Autoptic proference (or "real evidence"), occurs, for the execution of writings, when the act of writing is done in the presence of the tribunal. The sufficiency of this is plain.

(2) Testimonial evidence is always regarded as sufficient; the only questions being the ordinary ones as to the qualifications of the witness by knowledge. Ordinary admissions of a party are a sort of evidence always regarded as sufficient to admit a document to the jury, but they are to be distinguished from judicial admissions.

(3) Circumstantial evidence is of various sorts; and first, of those not here involved:

(a) Style of handwriting, i.e. similarity between that of the document and that of the person alleged as its maker, is a sort of circumstantial evidence undisputed in its sufficiency; the controversies have arisen over the proper modes of proving the fact of similarity.

(b) Sundry circumstances preceding or following the act of writing may be appealed to as evidence. For example, if an unsigned writing is left in a room with pen and ink, and Doe goes alone into the room, then comes out with fresh ink-marks on his hand, and the writing is then found to bear his name in signature, this would be regarded, no doubt, as sufficient evidence to go to the jury; it is the same sort of evidence that might be used to prove a murder or any other act done in that room. For evidence of this sort there seem to be no specific rules of sufficiency.

(c) The remaining sorts of circumstantial evidence are those which give rise to quantitative rulings of sufficiency. They consist of groups of circumstances, each by itself perhaps insufficient, but all combined amounting in common experience to a sufficiency. They fall, roughly, under four heads: (A) Age; (B) Contents; (C) Custody; (D) Signature or Seal.

544. MIDDLETON v. MASS

CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA. 1819

2 N. & McC. 55

THIS was an action of trespass, to try the title to a tract of land originally granted to Wm. Bull, in 1737. The grant to Bull was produced on the part of the plaintiff, and he then offered in evidence a deed from Bull to James Oglethorpe, under whom he claimed, and from whom he deduced a title, dated in 1739, which had been proved before a magistrate, and recorded in the auditor's office, a few days after its execution; but he offered no proof of its execution, nor did he prove any possession of the land, or any act of ownership over it, by himself or any other person, through or from whom he deduced his title: so that the question was, whether it was admissible as an ancient deed, without proof of its execution? The presiding judge being of opinion that it was not, the plaintiff then offered to prove that the deed had been in the possession of himself and those under whom he claimed, for more than thirty years, and contended that it ought to be admitted on this proof; but the Court thought otherwise, and the plaintiff was nonsuited. A motion was now made to set aside the nonsuit, on the ground that the deed ought to have been received in evidence, as an ancient deed, on proof of the possession of the deed, alone, for the time mentioned.

JOHNSON, J. — Until this case occurred, I did not suppose that this question admitted of any doubt; for the converse of the proposition contained in the motion, is certainly recognized in the case of Thompson v. Bullock, 1 Bay, 357, and the practice, so far as I have been conversant with it, accords with that view of it. But the question is made, and I understand that there is some diversity in the practice in the different parts of the State, and in the opinions entertained by the bar on the subject; it becomes, therefore, necessary to consider it and to put it to rest.

Mr. Justice BULLER, in his introduction to the law relative to trials, at Nisi Prius, 56, from whence the whole doctrine is drawn, says, if the deed be thirty years old, it may be "given in evidence, without any proof of its execution." "There ought," he adds, "to be some account given of the deed, where found, &c." Regarding this as a finished sentence, it would seem to follow, that it was only necessary to show, that the deed had been in the possession of the party claiming under it, or in a place where, from the nature of its provisions, it would probably be deposited; and this is doubtless a correct conclusion, so far as it relates to a peculiar species of writings which are, in some measure, to be regarded as public property, and partake in some degree of the character of records. . . . It is not, therefore, the place only, where an ancient deed is found, that always makes it evidence, but it is when the possession is according to the provisions of the deed. Vide Phillips, 349. Dunlap's Ed. and note a.

Independent, however, of authority, it appears to me the reason and propriety of the rule is apparent, and the more so from the only reason which I have seen in opposition to it. It is because old things are hard to be proved. Now, if this be a good reason, it operates with a twofold force on the opposite side of this question: for it is certainly more difficult, to say the least of it, to disprove an old thing than to prove it, especially when in most cases the party would be called on to do so without notice of its antiquity or the necessity of doing it. Policy requires, that the possession of individuals to their landed estates should be shielded by every legitimate means; for it is, in truth, the sheet anchor of the right of a great proportion of the citizens of this country, to such property And hence it is, that after a lapse of thirty years, when it may be reasonably presumed, that the witnesses to the deed are dead, or in the transitory state of the community, they are removed without the knowledge of the party, the law will presume the legal execution of the deed in favor of a possession, according to its provisions. . . . No such indulgence is due to him who, as in the present case, neglects for almost a century to assert his claim, by one single act of ownership. The doctrine contended for on the part of the motion might in its consequences be productive of incalculable mischiefs; for, although it is not now usual to enter upon a course of villainy the fruits of which are not to be reaped for thirty years to come, yet establish the rule contended for, and it opens the door, and many will no doubt find an easy entry. On the other hand, it is conceived, that no such mischiefs can ensue. Apprize the owner of the danger to which he is exposed, he has the power, and will avert its consequences.

The motion must be discharged.

545. McGUIRE v. BLOUNT

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. 1905

THIS case was begun in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Florida, to recover in ejectment certain lands described in the declaration. The defendants answered, and issues were joined as to the right of possession of the lands in question. Upon the trial, after the testimony was submitted and the cause argued, the Court instructed the jury to find for the defendants. . . .

The petitioners, who were plaintiffs in the original case, sought to recover the tract of land as the heirs of one Gabriel Rivas. The tract originally owned by him consisted of about three hundred "arpents" of land near the city of Pensacola, Florida. The defendants at the trial undertook to defeat the plaintiffs' right of recovery, not by establishing a perfect title in themselves, but relied upon showing the divestiture of the plaintiffs' title as heirs of Gabriel Rivas. . . .

The defendants sought to show, by the production of certain ancient documents, bound together, styled a protocol, that Gabriel Rivas' will had been established by proceedings had during the Spanish control of Florida, which showed that Rivas, who had received the lands in controversy by grant of November 10, 1806, from Morales, intendant, etc., of Spain, had died on April 28, 1808, his will being probated by certain proceedings approved by the Governor of Florida, on May 2, 1808. . . . These original documents, evidencing the probate of the will of Rivas and the sale of the lands, including those in controversy, were presented to this Court, having been admitted in testimony at the trial against the objections of plaintiffs under the stipulation that they came from the custody of the surveyor general of the United States, keeper of the archives.

Mr. Benjamin Micou, with whom Mr. Hilary A. Herbert, Mr. E. T. Davis and Mr. Simeon S. Belden, were on the brief for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William A. Blount in propria persona, and for other respondents, and with whom Mr. A. C. Blount, Jr., was on the brief.

Mr. Justice Day (after stating the case as above) delivered the opinion of the Court.

Many objections are urged to the authenticity and admissibility of these documents as well as to the regularity of the proceedings under the Spanish law. The production of the originals of these documents has given the Court an opportunity to inspect them. They bear upon their face every evidence of age and authenticity. There is nothing about them to suggest that they have been forged or tampered with. They present an honest as well as ancient appearance and come from official custody. To such public and proprietary records the Courts have applied the rules of admissibility governing ancient documents. 3 Wigmore, Evidence, § 2145, and notes. With reference to such documents and records it is only necessary to show that they are of the age of thirty years and come from a natural and reasonable custody; from a place where they might reasonably be expected to be found. 3 Wigmore, §§ 2138 and 2139. While the testimony tends to show that these documents were subjected to various changes of possession during the transition of the government of Florida from Spain to the United States and upon the evacuation of Pensacola during the civil war, there is nothing to establish that they were ever out of the hands of a proper custodian. Nor is there proof to show that the originals were lost, or any evidence of a fraudulent substitution of a made-up record in the interest of parties to be benefited thereby.

In view of the frequency with which these proceedings have been given express or tacit recognition in subsequent official investigations and conveyances of the lands, corroborating the inference of genuineness to be gathered from the appearance and history of these documents, and the possession of the lands conveyed, we have no question that the Court properly admitted them in evidence.

546. INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER CO. v. CAMPBELL

Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. 1906

43 Tex. Civ. App. 421; 96 S. W. 92

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; A. W. Seeligson, Judge. Action by R. A. Campbell against the International Harvester Company of America. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cobbs & Hildebrand and Wm. Aubrey, for appellant. Davis & McFarland, for appellee.

NEILL, J. — This suit was brought by appellee against the appellant to recover $660 damages for a breach of contract of employment. The appeal is from a judgment for $570 in favor of the appellee. . . .

The second assignment of error is that "the Court erred in permitting plaintiff to testify, over the objections of defendant that a letter alleged to have been written by defendant to J. D. Cameron as follows, viz.: 'We have received your letter, also Mr. Campbell's references which are good. You are on the ground, employ him' — as appears more fully by defendant's bill of exceptions No. 1."

The bill of exceptions discloses a number of objections to the testimony, but as the proposition under the assignment embraces only one, it alone will be considered. It is: "In order to admit parol evidence of the contents of a letter, its genuineness must be established." This proposition involves only the establishment of the genuineness of the letter. If, then, there was sufficient evidence of its genuineness to admit its contents in evidence, the assignment should be overruled, regardless of any other objection that may have been urged upon the trial to the introduction of such testimony, for no other objection is presented for our consideration.

The genuineness of a writing may be proved by indirect or circumstantial evidence, as other facts; and in some instances, this is the only character of evidence that can be adduced. Before the testimony complained of was introduced, it was shown by the testimony of appellee that the letter in question was written on one of the International Company's letterheads; that Mr. Cameron, the agent of the company, showed him the letter about the first of June, 1903; that the signature was the same as that affixed to a letter he had received from the company a few days before and to other letters of the company written to Mr. Boldic, its traveling agent. The defendant and its attorney had been duly notified to produce the letter upon the trial, or that secondary evidence would be introduced to prove its contents. It was not denied by defendant or its counsel that such letter had been written, or was in their possession. The only challenge to plaintiff was: "You must show the genuineness of such letter before you can prove its contents." These circumstances, when taken in connection with the contents of the letter, fully meet the challenge.

Upon the subject of authentication of a writing by its contents, Wigmore on Evidence, § 2148, observes:

> "If Doe is the sole person who knows the circumstances of a certain event, and if a letter arrives purporting to be from Doe and stating those circumstances, and the statements appear by subsequent development to be accurate, it would be a simple matter, for the law, as well as for common sense, to deem that sufficient evidence of Doe's authorship had been furnished."

Campbell was seeking employment from the company; its agent, Cameron, had written informing the company of the fact; Campbell's references had been sent to the company; a letter is received in reply written from the company's office in Chicago, on one of its letterheads, bearing the same signature as other letters of the company to its agent, in which it is said: "We have received your letter, also Mr. Campbell's references, which are good." As no one, save the company, could have received the letter and references mentioned in the letter received by Cameron, and shown to plaintiff, its contents, when taken in connection with other facts, are, under the principle quoted, cogent evidence of its genuineness. We by no means wish to be understood as holding that the mere contents of a written communication, purporting to be a particular person's, are of themselves, sufficient evidence of genuineness, for the contrary is the rule. . . .

The judgment is affirmed.

547. Barham v. Bank of Delight. (1910. 94 Ark. 158, 126 S. W. 396). Frauenthal, J. — As a general rule, a letter that is offered in evidence must be authenticated by proving the genuineness of the signature of the writer. But when a letter is received in the due course of mail, and purports to be in answer to a letter that was previously duly addressed and mailed, the presumption arises that such letter is the genuine instrument of the purported writer; it is then sufficiently authenticated to go to the jury; and, upon its genuineness being denied, it then becomes a question of fact for the jury to determine as to whether the letter is genuine or not. 3 Wigmore on Evidence, 2153; Lancaster v. Ames, 103 Me. 87.

Court of Appeals of West Virginia. 1905

57 W. Va. 49; 49 S. E. 1005

Error to Circuit Court, Rueker County. Action by W. H. Cobb against the Glenn Boom & Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

This is an action of assumpsit brought in the Circuit Court of Tucker county, wherein the plaintiff claims that he entered into an executory contract with the defendant by which he purchased from it 800 acres of land, lying in Randolph county, at $15.00 per acre, and that after the making of said contract, the defendant sold the timber on said land to another person, thereby rendering it impossible for it to carry out its contract with him; and claiming damages in the sum of $5,000. The defendant pleaded non-assumpsit, and filed an affidavit denying that it signed or authorized the signing of the telegrams in the declaration mentioned, and upon this issue the case was tried. After the plaintiff introduced all his evidence, the Court, upon motion of the defendant, excluded it from the jury, and instructed them to find a verdict in favor of the defendant. The jury returned a verdict as instructed, and the Court rendered judgment thereon, and it is this judgment that we are now asked to review. . . .

To establish his case plaintiff relies upon certain letters and telegraphic communications, which, in order to get a more complete understanding of the case, are here given in extenso:

"Sunbury, Pa., Nov. 25, 1901. W. H. Cobb, Esqr., Elkins, W. Va. Dear Sir: — Your valued communication of 22nd inst. just at hand. . . . But we do not think the price you offer ($12.50) per acre for the land on Otter Creek side is sufficient for it. . . . Yours truly, Glenn Boom & Lumber Co. per W. H. Sager, Secty."

"Elkins, W. Va., Nov. 27th, 1901. To W. H. Sager, care Glenn Boom & Lumber Co., Sunbury, Pa. Wire best cash price on Otter Creek land. My order about limit. W. H. Cobb."

"Sunbury, Pa., Nov. 27th, 1901. Fifteen dollars. W. H. Sager."

"Elkins, W. Va., Nov. 27, 1901. To W. H. Sager, care Glenn Boom & Lumber Co., Sunbury, Pa. Will take Otter Creek land at price named. W. H. Cobb."

"Sunbury, Pa., Nov. 28th, 1901. To W. H. Cobb, Elkins, W. Va. Our Mr. Chester will reach Elkins Monday to consult with you. Letter today. W. H. Sager."

"Sunbury, Pa., Nov. 28th, 1901. W. H. Cobb, Elkins, W. Va. Dear Sir: Your telegram of 27th rec'd. Our Mr. Chester will reach Elkins about Monday evening to arrange terms of sale with you and enter into agreement with you if satisfactory all around. Yours truly, W. H. Sager, Secty Glenn Boom & Lumber Co."

The Court sustained the objection to the introduction of all the telegrams, except the first one mentioned, sent by the plaintiff to Sager, care of the defendant, inquiring the price of the land, and also sustained the objection to the introduction of the letter dated November 28, 1901.

W. B. Maxwell and J. P. Scott, for plaintiff in error. A. Jay Valentine and L. Hansford, for defendant in error.

SANDERS, Judge (after stating the case as above). . . .

1. While these letters and telegrams constitute a complete contract between the parties to them, yet, if they were written and sent by some person other than the one who is sought to be charged, it is necessary that the authority of the person writing and sending them should be shown. The defendant filed an affidavit with its plea as provided by § 40, c. 125 of the Code, denying that it signed or authorized the signing of the telegrams which are claimed to have been received by the plaintiff. . . . The secretary not having authority by virtue of his office to make such a contract as is relied upon by the plaintiff for the basis of this suit, the defendant cannot be held liable by reason of the letters and telegrams sent by Sager, unless he had, at the time, express authority from the corporation to make sale of this land, or unless he was held out by the defendant in such a way as to make it apparent that he had such authority, or unless the contract was ratified by the defendant. . . .

It is claimed that the letter of the 25th day of November, 1901, addressed to the plaintiff and signed by Glenn Boom & Lumber Co., per W. H. Sager, Secty., shows that negotiations were pending for the sale of this land, and that the telegrams sent by Sager to the plaintiff in reply to the plaintiff's telegram, having come from the proper place, and the proper officer of the defendant, raises the presumption that they were directed to be sent by the defendant. There is no such presumption arising from the facts in this case. While the letter shows that it was signed by the defendant, per Sager, Secretary, yet that does not show that Sager had authority to sign it. . . .

2. But even if Sager had been shown to have authority to make this sale for the defendant, the telegrams sent by Sager were not proper to be admitted as evidence, because their genuineness had not been shown. There is nothing to show that they had in reality been written and signed by Sager. From the authorities there is some difficulty in determining what are original telegrams within the meaning of the rule that the best evidence must be produced. . . . "Of course, there must be competent proof that the alleged sender did actually send or authorize the sending of the message in question. . . . In proving a contract by telegrams, the best evidence is the telegram containing the offer as received at the point of destination and the dispatch containing the acceptance as delivered for transmission." Jones on Evidence, § 209.

Now, in this case, the plaintiff adopted the telegraphic system as a means for making the contract here relied upon, and made inquiry of Sager as to what he would take for the land in question, to which Sager replied, giving him the price, which plaintiff accepted. Now, in accordance with the above authority, the best evidence is the telegrams of the plaintiff as received at their destination and the telegram of Sager at the place at which it was delivered for its transmission. But then, again, there is no evidence, as we have noticed above, that Sager, in sending the telegrams, was acting as the agent of the defendant, and, of course, for that reason they were inadmissible.

It is argued that the telegrams are without the jurisdiction of the Court, and, even if this is true, it does not authorize the introduction of copies of them until their genuineness has been shown, and the authority of the person sending them to do so. If such a message as the plaintiff claims was sent to him, he could have shown the authenticity of it when delivered to be telegraphed to him, and then show, that, as it was delivered to the telegraph company, it was transmitted and delivered at the place of destination. But whether a copy is introduced or the original, it is necessary that the genuineness of it should be shown before it becomes competent evidence. "A dispatch or a copy of a dispatch purporting to have been sent by A. B., as Cashier, to C. D., cannot be read in evidence without first proving that it was genuine paper, that is, that it was written and sent by the party whose name it bears." National Bank v. Bank, 7 W. Va. 544. And also see Smith & Whiting v. Easton, 54 Md. 138; Jones on Evidence, § 209. There being no evidence to show or tending to show that these telegrams which were claimed to have been sent by Sager were signed by him and delivered to the telegraph company for transmission, the Court committed no error in rejecting them.

For the foregoing reasons we find no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, and it must, therefore, be affirmed. Affirmed.

549. BARRETT v. MAGNER

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1908

105 Minn. 118; 117 N. W. 245

ACTION in the Municipal Court of Minneapolis to recover possession of certain personal property or $355, its value. Defendant Daniel J. Molan alone answered. The case was tried before CHARLES L. SMITH, J., and a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of defendant. From an order denying their motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appealed. Reversed and new trial granted.

March 30, 1907, appellants sold to B. J. Magner, in consideration of $525, a team of horses and a set of harness. Magner paid $100 cash and executed a chattel mortgage upon the team and harness, and upon three other horses, two other sets of harness, and a wagon, as security for the deferred payments. The mortgage was duly filed in the office of the city clerk of Minneapolis, April 2, 1907. The following May 22d respondent Molan purchased from Magner the team which had been sold to him by appellants, and this action was brought in replevin to recover possession of the team. Molan claimed to be an innocent purchaser, without notice of appellants' mortgage, and upon the issues presented recovered a verdict in the trial court. One of the issues at the trial was that appellants had given Magner permission to sell the team, and that he had accordingly acted upon appellants' suggestion and sold the team to Molan, without conveying to him knowledge of the fact that the mortgage was in existence. Magner testified that after he had purchased the team from appellants, and before he knew anything about Molan, he had a personal conversation with Mr. Zimmerman, which took place on or about the 10th or 12th of April, at which he told Mr. Zimmerman that one of the horses was balky; that he could not do anything with it so far as hauling heavy loads was concerned, and that he (Magner) wanted to get rid of the team; that appellants would have to take it back or let him sell it; that Zimmerman had replied: "Let them go. Sell them, if you can." After this conversation Magner advertised the team for sale in the Minneapolis newspapers, and in response Molan appeared as a prospective purchaser. Before any deal was closed, Magner called up appellants on the telephone and asked to talk with Zimmerman, and his testimony on that point is as follows: "They said he was out, and I says: 'Can I talk with him?' And they brought some one to the telephone. Whoever it was, it was supposed to be him. I don't know whether it was or not. I couldn't swear to it. I had occasion, prior to the month of May, 1907, to call up Barrett & Zimmerman at different times over the 'phone. . . . Q. — Whom did you ask for over the 'phone? A. — I asked for Mr. Zimmerman, and received the reply that he was out, but that they would call him in; and I waited until they answered again, and some one else came to the 'phone, and I told him who I was, and I said, 'I have a chance to sell that team,' and he said, 'Go ahead, sell them,' if I wanted to." This testimony was objected to upon the ground that it was incompetent, that no proper foundation was laid, and that it was not shown that Mr. Zimmerman had any authority with reference to the matter under consideration.

Lewis, J. (after stating the case as above). . . . Was it error to receive in evidence a telephonic conversation testified to by Molan as having taken place between himself and Moses Zimmerman, appellants' manager? . . .

Appellants make the point that it does not appear from the telephone conversation whether Magner referred to the team which he had bought, and which is involved in this action, or not; that the evidence is not sufficient to identify Zimmerman as the party at the other end of the telephone. In the case note to Planters' Cotton Oil Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Company (Ga.) 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1180, the authorities upon this subject have been collected and carefully analyzed, and the editor states as a general proposition:

"When the admissibility of a telephonic communication depends upon its having been made with a particular individual, and not merely with a person connected with a certain office or place of business, it is clear that the identification of the office or place of business will not be sufficient to lay the foundation for the admission of the telephonic communication, unless under the circumstances of a particular case the identification of the office amounts to a practical identification of the individual."

For instance, in R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Potter, 36 Ill. App. 590, the testimony of a witness that he inquired by telephone of the railroad telegraph office, where the consignees generally got their information, with reference to a certain shipment, and that some one answered giving him the information he sought, was held sufficient to show prima facie that the answer came from an agent of the railroad company, and to make it admissible against the railroad company. . . .

However, when the communication is of such a nature as to require identification of the individual, there must be evidence of such identity, in addition to the mere fact that the witness asked for a connection with his place of business, and that when the connection was made some one who claimed or assumed to be such person responded. This is illustrated by the case of Oberman Brewing Co. v. Adams, 35 Ill. App. 540. It was there held error for the Court to admit the testimony of the plaintiff to the effect that he called up the brewery over the 'phone, and that the individual at the other end of the wire assured him that the party inquired about had authority to purchase goods on credit; the witness having admitted that he did not recognize the voice of the individual who spoke with him through the 'phone, as he never knew any of the people connected with the brewery company. . . . While the identification of the voice of the party responding at the 'phone has, in many cases, been held sufficient to establish identification prima facie, it does not follow that the recognition of the voice is the exclusive means of identifying the party. Surrounding circumstances may be taken into account. Davis v. Walter & Son, 70 Iowa, 465, 30 N. W. 804; Wolfe v. Mo. P. Ry. Co., 97 Mo. 473, 11 S. W. 49, 3 L. R. A. 539, 10 Am. St. Rep. 331; Godair v. The Nat. Bank, 225 Ill. 572, 80 N. E. 407, 116 Am. St. Rep. 172; Wigmore on Evidence, § 2155.

Magner had already testified that soon after making the purchase of the horses he found that one of them was balky; that he then had a personal conversation with Mr. Zimmerman, and told him the condition of the horse, and that he wanted to get rid of the team; that Mr. Zimmerman would have to take it back, or let him sell it; and that Zimmerman told him to sell them if he wanted to. Assuming that the sale was consummated entirely by Zimmerman as appellants' manager, and that such a personal conversation had taken place, we are inclined to the opinion that sufficient ground was laid for the introduction of the evidence as to the telephone conversation. While Magner did not identify Zimmerman as the person who answered the telephone, a failure in that respect did not necessarily make the conversation inadmissible. Had there been no previous personal conversation, a failure to identify the party under such circumstances might not be sufficient to make it admissible prima facie. Afterwards, in the course of the trial, Mr. Zimmerman testified that he never had any conversation whatever with Magner, either personally or by telephone, and that he had never in any way consented that the mortgaged property might be sold free from the mortgage. But, conceding that such denial conclusively overcame the effect of the evidence already introduced, no motion was made to strike it out, and, so far as the question now before the Court is concerned, we hold that the evidence was competent. Conkling v. Standard Oil Co. (Iowa) 116 N. W. 822. . . .

The jury returned a general verdict in favor of defendant. It was error to submit to the jury the question of the sufficiency of the description in the mortgage, for the reason discussed in the second branch of the opinion; and, it being impossible to determine upon which ground the jury based the verdict, a new trial must be granted. Peterson v. C., M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 36 Minn. 399, 31 N. W. 515.

Debt on a judgment recovered in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. The witness called to prove an examined copy of the judgment, stated, that at the request of an attorney in Dublin, he went to the building where the four courts are held, and there compared the copy produced with a parchment roll produced by the attorney.

Lord Ellenborough deemed this evidence insufficient, without either showing that the original came from the proper place of deposit or out of the hands of the officer in whose custody the records of the Exchequer were kept.

Courthope, for the plaintiff, suggested, that from the contents of the copy, it would appear, that the original was a record of the Exchequer.

Ellenborough, L. C. J.—It must in the first place be proved by the witness that the original came out of the proper custody; this cannot be shown by any light reflected from the record itself, which may have been improperly placed where it was found.

It then appeared, that the records of the different courts in Dublin were all kept in one room, but in different presses.

Ellenborough, L. C. J.—Since the records are kept in different presses, the same difficulty still presents itself; it is very distressing to strain the rules of law, when evidence might so easily have been procured. If the witness had stated, that the record came out of the hands of the proper officer, it would have been sufficient. The evidence must be launched by proving that the document came either from the proper person or proper place; till then I cannot look upon it as a record. To admit this evidence would afford a precedent for laxity of proof in other cases.

Plaintiff nonsuited.

Topic 4. Authentication by Official Seal

552. J. C. Jeaffreson. A Book about Lawyers. (1867) I, 21. The Great Seal. In days when writing was an art almost entirely confined to religious persons, sealing was a far more important and efficacious means of testifying the genuineness of documents than it is at present. . . . In the feudal ages any needy clerk who had turned his attention to caligraphy, could have perpetrated forgeries in perfect confidence that they would endure the scrutiny of the most accurate and skilful of living readers. But the necessity for sealing placed almost insuperable obstacles in the way of those who were best qualified and most desirous to triumph over right by fictitious deeds. It was no easy matter to procure seals of any kind; it was very difficult to obtain for dishonest ends the temporary possession of well-known seals. . . . Great barons, ecclesiastical dignitaries, secular and religious corporations, had distinctive seals at an early date; but they were confided to the care of trusty keepers, and were guarded with jealousy. When an official seal was used, its keeper brought it with reverential care from its customary place of concealment, and it was not applied to any document without satisfactory cause shown why its sanction was required. An obscure tamperer with parchments could not hope to lay his hand on one of these important seals. If he procured an impression of a respected seal, he could not obtain a fac-simile of the original. Seal-engraving was an art in which there were but few adepts; and the artists were for the most part men to whom no rogue would dare propose the hazardous task of counterfeiting an official device. . . . The forger of deeds in older time had not overcome all difficulties, when he had surreptitiously obtained a seal. The mere act of sealing was by no means the simple matter that it is now a days. To place the seal on fit labels rightly placed, and in all respects to make the fictitious deed an accurate imitation of the intended deeds to which the particular seal of a particular great man was applied, were no trifling feats of dexterity ere scriveners had congregated into fraternities, and law-stationers had been called into existence. To get a supply of suitable wax was an undertaking by no means easy in accomplishment. Sealing-wax was not to be bought by the pound or stick in every street of feudal London. Cire d'Espagne — sealing-wax akin to the bright, vermilion compound now in use — was not invented till the middle of the sixteenth century. William Howe assures his readers that "the earliest letter known to have been sealed with it was written from London August 3, 1554, to Heingrave Philip Francis von Daun, by his agent in England, Gerrand Herman," and long after that date the manufacture of sealing-wax was a secret known to comparatively few persons. In feudal England there were divers adhesive compounds used for sealing. Every keeper of an official seal had his own recipe for wax. Sometimes the wax was white; sometimes it was yellow; occasionally it was tinged with vegetable dyes; most frequently it was a mess bearing much resemblance to the dirt-pies of little children. But its combination was a mystery to the vulgar; and no man could safely counterfeit a sealing-impression who had not at command a stock of a particular sealing-earth or paste, or wax. Eyes powerless to detect the falsity of a forger's handwriting could see at a glance whether his wax was of the right colour. Moreover, this practice of attesting private deeds by public or well-known seals gave to transactions a publicity which was the most valuable sort of attestation. A simple knight could not obtain the impression of his feudal chieftain's seal without a formal request, and a full statement of the business in hand. The wealthy burgher, who obtained permission to affix a municipal seal to a private parchment, proclaimed the transaction which occasioned the request. The thriving freeholder, who was allowed the use of his lord's graven device, had first sought for the privilege openly. "Quia sigillum meum plurimis est incognitum" were the words introduced into the clause of attestation; and the words show that publicity was his object. And to attain that object the seal was pressed in open court, in the presence of many witnesses.[1]

553. Chief Baron GILBERT. Evidence. p. 19 (ante 1726). The distinction is to be made between seals of public and seals of private credit; for seals of public credit are full evidence in themselves, without any oath made; but seals of private credit are no evidence but by an oath concurring to their credibility. Seals of public credit are the seals of the King, and of the public courts of justice, time out of mind.

554. THEORY OF AUTHENTICATION BY SEAL.[2] — When a document bearing a purporting official seal — a notary's certificate of protest, for example — is offered in court, then, if the Court accepts it for the offered purpose, this involves the assumption of four things; namely,

(1) that there is an official of that name,

(2) that this is genuinely his seal's impression,

(3) that this seal-impression was affixed by him; and, furthermore,

(4) that it is allowable to receive his hearsay official statement as testimony to the fact stated by him.

The first three of these elements go to the matter of the genuineness of the document; that is to say, the document purports to be that of J. S., a notary, asserting a certain fact, and the net result of the first three elements is that we accept as a fact that J. S., a notary, did make this written assertion. If there were a signature only, with no seal, and the document was similarly accepted, the second and third elements would merge (i.e., the purporting J. S.'s signature is accepted as written by him); it is only in the case of a seal that they are distinct (for it might be his seal's impression yet and another person might have affixed it). Thus it is that the second and third elements are always judicially united, i.e., any presumption of genuineness, whenever made, covers both elements; there is no case presuming the seal's impression to have been of his seal but not affixed by him, nor vice versa.

Hence, in effect, the situation, for seal or signature alike, is reducible to the following elements and is so in practice treated: (1) that there is an official of that name; (2) (3) that this document was genuinely executed by him. The remaining element (4), that this hearsay statement of his is admissible, is obviously concerned with the Hearsay rule only, and may therefore be dismissed as having no present relation with the principle of Authentication.

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1816

2 Conn. 85, 90

ASSUMPSIT on a charter party; plea in bar, a judgment of the same cause in the Supreme Court of Denmark, at Copenhagen, affirming a judgment of the Sea Court. A purporting copy of this record was offered. The record was authenticated by the great seal of Denmark. There was no certificate that the decree, &c. offered in evidence, was a copy of record, but below the seal was the signature Colbiornsen, without any addition of his official character. The translator of the record, deposed, that he knew the seal attached to the original to be the royal seal of the kingdom of Denmark. J. M. Forbes, Esq. agent of the United States at Copenhagen, certified, that the signature at the foot of the record was that of the counsellor of conferences, Colbiornsen, chief judge of the highest court. To the admission of this record the plaintiff objected.

The Court also instructed the jury, that if they should find the document shown in evidence of the proceedings in the court of Denmark to be genuine, — and it was to be presumed to be genuine until the contrary was shown, — their verdict upon the second issue should be for the defendant. The jury having found a verdict for the defendant on both issues, the plaintiffs moved for a new trial; and the questions arising on such motion were reserved for the consideration and advice of the nine judges.

The case was very fully discussed, by Dagget and Cleaveland, in support of the motion, and by Law and Brainard, contra.

The former contended, among other points, which, from the decision of the Court, it has become unnecessary to state, 1. That the writing given in evidence as the record of a court in Denmark, was not properly authenticated as a genuine document. Moses v. Thornton, 8 Term Rep. 303. Henry v. Adey, 3 East. 221. 2. That admitting the document to be genuine, yet it was not a legal exemplification. It does not purport to be a copy of an original record; nor does it appear from extrinsic evidence that it was so. 2 Cranch, 237, 8. 8 Term Rep. 307, 8. It is signed by an individual, without any addition to show that he was an officer of the court, or if he was, that he was then acting in his official capacity. Nor does it appear, by whom or by what authority the seal was affixed. . . .

On the other side, it was insisted, 1. That the record of the Danish court being authenticated under the national seal, was proved by the highest evidence which could be given. The affixing of a national seal to an instrument, is symbolical language, importing absolute verity, which the courts of other nations judicially take notice of, and give credit to. Swift's Ev. 8. Peake's Ev. 73. (q). 4 Dall. 416. . . .

SWIFT, Ch. J. . . . It is contended for the plaintiffs, that this record ought not to have been admitted in evidence, because it is not duly authenticated, and does not appear to have been certified by any officer having power to do it. But this Court does not know the form of making up, attesting or certifying their record. If it appear to be a judicial proceeding under the great seal, it is to be presumed, that all the formalities required by their law, have been complied with. This appears to be the record of a judgment rendered in a court of the kingdom of Denmark, under the great seal of the king. This seal proves itself, and the Court is bound to take judicial notice of it. This is all the evidence required by our law to prove a foreign judgment, and the record was properly admitted. . . .

I would not advise a new trial.

GOULD, J. . . . It is first objected that the record in question is not duly authenticated, — i.e. not accompanied with sufficient evidence of its being genuine. But, in the proof of foreign documents, there must from the nature and necessity of the case be some ultimate limit, beyond which no solemnity of authentication can be required. And the public national seal of a Kingdom or sovereign State is, by the common consent and usage of civilized communities, the highest evidence and the most solemn sanction of authenticity, in relation to proceedings either diplomatic or judicial, that is known in the intercourse of nations. The seals of foreign municipal courts, on the contrary, must be proved by extrinsic evidence. . . . In the present case, the proof of the genuineness of the record, given in evidence, is, in point of solemnity, the highest possible, the national seal of the kingdom of Denmark. And, as if the production of the seal were not, of itself sufficient; its genuineness has been proved by evidence aliunde, to which there was no objection. . . .

But there is no evidence, it is said, that the seal was affixed by a proper officer. Assuming the seal to be genuine, that fact must of course be presumed, unless the contrary is shown. For any higher evidence of the fact, appearing upon the face of the record, than the seal itself imports is impossible, and to require extrinsic evidence of it would be to subvert the rule itself that a national seal is the highest proof of authenticity, and as such, is taken notice of, judicially, by Courts of justice in other States.

The Danish record, then, was clearly admissible; and if so, I am at a loss to discover how the direction to the jury could have been substantially otherwise than it was; except, indeed, that, in relation to the genuineness of the seal, it was somewhat more qualified in favor of the plaintiffs than it might have been. . . .

The other judges concurred, except GODDARD, J., who declined acting, having been of counsel in the cause.

New trial not to be granted.

557. WALDRON v. TURPIN

SUPREME COURT OF LOUISIANA. 1840

15 La. 552

APPEAL from the Court of the First Judicial District.

This is an action on two promissory notes for five hundred and ninety-three dollars and twenty-three cents, and five hundred and ninety-five dollars and thirty-seven cents, signed by White, Turpin & Nephew, a commercial firm residing and doing business at Grand Gulf, in the State of Mississippi, dated the 7th April, 1838, payable on the 15th of November, and 1st of December following, to the order of the plaintiffs, at the Grand Gulf Railroad and Banking Company, in Mississippi, and protested for non-payment at maturity. . . . The defendant pleaded the general issue, and avers that he is no way liable to pay said notes; and that one of them has been extinguished by a draft given by him. He prays to be dismissed from said suit.

The principal question, on which the whole case turns, is embraced in a bill of exceptions, taken by the defendant's counsel to the admissibility of the protest of the notes in evidence, to prove demand of payment at the place where made payable, on the ground that the signature and official capacity of the notary or justice of the peace, who purports to have made the protest, was not, and should be first proved. The Court overruled the exception, and admitted the protests to go in evidence, without such preliminary proof, wherefore the defendant's counsel took his bill of exception to the opinion of the Court.

There was judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appealed.

Wharton, for the plaintiffs, insisted on the affirmance of the judgment. He contended that, by the commercial law, it was not required to prove signatures, or the authority of notaries to protest bills and notes. That in aid of commerce, this preliminary proof was dispensed with.

T. Slidell, for the defendant, argued, . . . that there was no evidence authenticating the signature and capacity of the notary; but the Court, as defendant contends, improperly permitted the introduction of said protests.

MORPHY, J.—This action is brought on two promissory notes, dated at Grand Gulf, in the State of Mississippi, drawn to the order of plaintiff, by the firm of White, Turpin & Nephew, of which defendant was a member, and made payable at the Grand Gulf Railroad and Banking Company, in that State. Defendant pleaded the general issue and novation, as to one of the two notes. Judgment being rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, this appeal was taken. To prove the demand at the place mentioned in the body of the notes sued on, two documents were offered in evidence, purporting to be notarial protests of the notes. Their introduction was opposed, on the ground that no proof had been adduced of the signature and official capacity of the person who made them. This objection having been overruled by the judge, a bill of exceptions to his opinion was taken, to which our attention has been particularly requested.

We understand the general rule on this subject to be, that the signature and official capacity of persons assuming the character of public officers in foreign countries, must be proved when contested in a court of justice. The different States of the Union must, we apprehend, be viewed in the light of foreign countries, with regard to each other, so far as their municipal laws, and the individual sovereignty retained by each of them, are concerned; and the Courts of one State can have or be presumed to have no more knowledge of the signature and capacity of the public officers of another State than of any other foreign country.

To the above rule there exists an exception as regards notarial protests of foreign bills of exchange. It has been introduced in aid of commerce, founded wholly upon the custom of merchants and public convenience; it has been acknowledged and maintained by the Courts of law, and such protests receive credit everywhere without any auxiliary evidence. We are now asked to extend this exception to the protests of two notes, executed and payable in the State of Mississippi, and to receive such protests as evidence per se, of a demand of payment at the indicated place. No adjudged cases have been shown to us, nor have we been able to find any in which the extension contended for has been allowed, nor do we see any good reason why it should. The importance and almost universal use of bills of exchange as the means of remittances from one country to another; the great commercial facilities they have found to offer; and the delay and trouble of procuring evidence from distant places are among the grounds upon which this exception has grown up. They do not apply to promissory notes, or other moneyed obligations, more limited in their circulation and general usefulness to foreign trade.

We are then of opinion that the documents objected to are improperly admitted, and do not establish a demand of payment at the place mentioned in the notes. Without this no recovery can be had. 3 Mart. N. S. 423; 10 Id. 552.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the judgment of the District Court be avoided and reversed, and that there be judgment as in a case of nonsuit; the plaintiffs and appellees paying the costs in both courts.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1831

INFORMATION praying for additional punishment for one convicted for the third time of larceny. The prior convictions were to be proved. It was objected that the exemplification of the record of the conviction, before the Supreme Judicial Court in Middlesex, certified by the clerk, under the seal of the Court, was not properly authenticated without the certificate of the chief justice, that the person certifying was the clerk duly authorized, and that it was not competent evidence of such conviction to go to the jury. On this point the prisoner's counsel remarked, that the clerk is appointed by the Supreme Court; that his certificate used before another tribunal, in a different place, has no validity "proprio vigore," because the judges of other courts have no means of knowing whether he is the clerk lawfully appointed, or a usurper of the office; and that the seal of the Court, without a clerk's signature, is insufficient, for a stranger might get possession of the seal.

SHAW, J. C.—Without expressing any opinion as to the requisites for giving authenticity to records of other governments and states so as to entitle them to be received as evidence in this commonwealth, the Court are of the opinion, that a copy of the proceedings of any court of record in this Commonwealth, certified to be a true copy of the record of such court, by the clerk of such court, under the seal thereof, is competent evidence of the existence of such record in every other judicial tribunal in the Commonwealth.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Cook County; the Hon. L. C. COLLINS, Judge, presiding. Appellees, as vendors, filed their bill for specific performance against appellant, as assignee of one Harpold, vendee of certain lands in Manitou county, State of Michigan. . . .

On the hearing there was offered in evidence a transcript of certain proceedings in chancery in the Circuit Court of Mackinac county, Michigan. . . . The transcript of the proceedings in chancery in the Circuit Court of Mackinac county, relating to the matter of guardianship referred to above, is certified by only the clerk of that court, the judge not having added his certificate that the clerk's attestation is in due form. A decree was entered for complainants, as prayed.

Edwin C. Crawford, for appellant. . . . The records of the proceedings of a Court of another State must be proved, in a suit in this State, by the attestation of the clerk of the former court and the seal of the same, together with a certificate of the judge of said court that said attestation is in due form. F. W. Becker, for appellees. . . . The act of Congress on evidence is not exclusive. . . . Section 13, chapter 51, of the Revised Statutes, supplements it, and the common law rule as to transcripts of record of a Court in this State introduced in another court in this State is the same as in Massachusetts. Commonwealth v. Phillips, 11 Pick. 27 [ante, No. 559]. . . .

Per Curiam:—The transcript of the Chancery Court of Michigan which authorized the guardian to make the sale and approved the contract is attested by the certificate of the clerk, under the seal of the Court. The attestation is not in accordance with the act of Congress, which requires the presiding judge to certify the attestation of the clerk is in due form. The admission of that transcript in evidence is assigned as error.

Prior to 1872 there was no statute in this State providing for the manner of attestation of the judgments of the Courts of another State to make the same evidence in the courts of this State. In the absence of such legislation this Court held, in numerous cases, that where a judgment of a foreign State was sought to be introduced in evidence in the courts of this State it was necessary that it should be attested by the clerk, under the seal of the Court, together with a certificate of the presiding judge that the attestation was in due form. Among the cases declaring such rule we refer to Brackett v. People ex rel., 64 Ill. 170.

By section 13, chapter 51, of Hurd's Statutes, enacted in 1872, it was declared by the Legislature of this State that "the papers, entries and records of Courts may be proved by a copy thereof, certified under the hand of the clerk of the Court having the custody thereof, and the seal of the Court, or by the judge of the court if there be no clerk." Since that legislation, the question of the admissibility in evidence of the transcripts of records of the Courts of other States has been frequently before this Court. . . .

Before the enactment of 1872 the records of judgments of Courts of this State, when offered in evidence in other Courts of this State, were attested as at common law. There was no statutory provision on the subject. At common law the manner of authentication was by certificate of the officer having custody of the record, or by exemplification, — that is, affixing the Great Seal of State. It has been universally held a sufficient authentication of a record of a judgment of a Court of a State, when offered in evidence in another Court of the same State, that it be certified by the clerk, under the seal of the Court. This was evidence at common law, and was the rule in this State when the act of 1872 was adopted. So far as the admissibility of evidence was concerned, section 13 of chapter 51 made no new rule with reference to domestic judgments. That section changed no rule of law by adding to or limiting the admissibility of evidence of domestic judgments within the Courts of this State from what the rule was at common law. The intention of the Legislature could not have been to declare as a rule of evidence that which had immemorially existed. By the enactment of section 13 of chapter 51 there is no limitation as to the class of judgments to be so authenticated, and the language used includes both domestic and foreign judgments.

The Act of Congress as to the manner of authentication of judgments of sister States does not abrogate common law proof, and is not exclusive. The States may pass laws as to what shall be evidence of foreign records within their Courts, not inconsistent with the Acts of Congress yet waiving some of the requirements of that act. Ordway v. Conroe, 4 Wis. 45; Goodwyn v. Goodwyn, 25 Ga. 203; Karr v. Jackon, 28 Mo., 316; Dean v. Chapin, 22 Mich. 275; Ex parte Povall, 3 Leigh, 816; Kingman v. Cowles, 103 Mass. 283.

The record of the Chancery Court of Michigan, though not certified in accordance with the Act of Congress, was authenticated in consonance with section 13 of chapter 51 of the Revised Statutes, and was admissible in evidence. . . .

We find no sufficient evidence in the record to justify the vendee in his refusal to perform the contract. The decree of the Circuit Court will therefore be affirmed. Degree affirmed.

562. WILLOCK v. WILSON

178 Mass. 68; 59 N. E. 757

CONTRACT on a judgment obtained in the District Court of Shawnee County, Kansas, Third Judicial District, by the plaintiff, a resident of the State of Missouri, against Edwin E. Wilson, of this Commonwealth, and William B. Johnson, of the State of Vermont, copartners, having a usual place of business in Boston in this Commonwealth. Writ dated August 14, 1899.

At the trial in the Superior Court, before HARDY, J., the plaintiff offered in evidence a certificate of the proceedings in the Kansas court. . . . The certificate of proceedings purported to be attested by the clerk of the above named Kansas court, but was signed "A. M. Callaghan, Clerk District Court, by J. F. Curtis, Dep. Clerk." There was also a certificate of the judge of the court that A. M. Callaghan was the clerk of that court; but no certificate or other verification as to J. F. Curtis, who signed the certificate, and no signature or certificate by A. M. Callaghan. There was a third certificate, purporting to be by "A. M.

Callaghan, Clerk of the District Court of the Third Judicial District of Shawnee County in the State of Kansas," that the judge signing the preceding certificate was the judge of that court. This certificate was also signed "A. M. Callaghan, Clerk District Court, by J. F. Curtis, Deputy Clerk." These certificates were under the seal of the Kansas court.

The certificate of the judge was as follows: "State of Kansas, Shawnee County, ss. I, Z. T. Hazen, Judge of the District Court in and for the county and State aforesaid, and of the Third Judicial District, do hereby certify that A. M. Callaghan, whose name is subscribed to the foregoing certificate of attestation, now is, and was at the time of sealing the same, the clerk of said court whereof I am the judge, and the keeper of the records and seal thereof, duly elected, commissioned and qualified as such clerk. The signature to the above certificate is in his handwriting, and said attestation is in due form of law and made by the proper officers. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, at Topeka in said State and county, this second day of March, 1899. Z. T. Hazen, Judge of the District Court." The seal of the court was attached. . . .

The defendant objected to the admission of the certificate of proceedings in evidence, but the judge admitted it and the defendant excepted. The defendant requested the judge to rule that upon all the evidence the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The judge refused so to rule and found for the plaintiff; and the defendant, Wilson, alleged exceptions.

J. E. Kelley, for Wilson. E. C. Bates, for the plaintiff.

Hammond, J.—This is an action on a judgment rendered by a court in the State of Kansas against the defendant Wilson, of this Commonwealth, and one Johnson, of the State of Vermont. . . . At the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence a certificate of the proceedings in the Kansas Court. . . .

2. The defendant further objected to the admission of the certificate upon the ground that it was not properly authenticated, because it does not appear that the judge who signed it was the sole or presiding justice of the court, and because the attestation of the records is made by the deputy clerk. The Federal statute upon this subject requires that the records shall be proved "by the attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with the certificate of the judge, chief justice or presiding magistrate that the attestation is in due form." Rev. St. U. S. 1878, § 905. The officers are the judge and the clerk. The judge in his certificate in this case says that Callaghan is the "clerk of said court whereof I am the judge." He uses the definite article, "the judge," in the very language of the statute; and the fair inference is that he is the sole judge of the court, and the proper person to sign the attestation. But the certificate as to the records is not signed by the clerk, but by a deputy clerk. The statute requires that the attestation shall be made by the clerk. An attestation by a deputy clerk is not within its terms. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 506; Morris v. Patchin, 24 N. Y. 394; Sampson v. Overton, 4 Bibb 409; Lothrop v. Blake, 3 Pa. St. 483; Ensign v. Kindred, 163 Pa. St. 638. And that would be so even if the State in which the Court existed had given to the deputy clerk the same power to certify as to the clerk. To hold otherwise would leave it in the power of the State to change the Federal statute in respect to the persons who should certify the records under it, or, in other words, to modify or control an Act of Congress, where by the Constitution of the United States that Act was supreme. Lothrop v. Blake, 3 Pa. St. 483.

Nor is this defect cured by the certificate of the judge that the attestation is in the handwriting of the clerk, and that the attestation is made by the proper officers. The only thing to which, under the statute, the judge can certify, is that the "attestation is in due form." This is a certificate simply that in the attestation the forms in use in the State from which the record comes have been observed, and this is necessary, because the Courts of one state do not officially know the forms in use in another State. The certificate of the judge as prescribed by the statute is that the attestation of the clerk is in due form, but he is not authorized to certify that the certificate of the deputy clerk is of equal validity with that of the clerk in the State where made. Morris v. Patchin, ubi supra. It follows that the record was not attested by the proper officer, and that it was not admissible under the Federal statute.

3. But that statute was passed for the purpose of prescribing the kind of proof of the existence of a record of a court in one State upon which a sister State might insist before it could be called upon to give to the record the full faith and credit imposed by the Federal Constitution; and it is well settled that the method of authentication therein prescribed is not exclusive. Neither the Federal Constitution nor the statute forbids the States from authorizing the proof of records in other modes in their own State courts, providing always, of course, that the State statute, if put into force, shall not have the effect of excluding a record authenticated according to the requirements of the Federal statute. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 505; Kingman v. Cowles, 103 Mass. 283.

It remains to be seen whether the record was admissible under our own statute, which, so far as material, is as follows: "The records and judicial proceedings of any court of another state . . . shall be admissible in evidence . . . when authenticated by the attestation of the clerk, prothonotary, or other officer having charge of the records of such court, with the seal of such court annexed." Pub. St. c. 169, § 67. It is not necessary, under this statute, that there should be any certificate by the judge of the court; although in Capen v. Emery, 5 Metc. 436, his certificate under seal of the court that the court in which the judgment was rendered was abolished, and the records transferred to his court, was taken as evidence of those facts. The clerk is the proper custodian of the records of a court, and the seal of the court attached to his certificate attests the possession of the records in the person who certifies, and a record so certified is admitted under our statutes without further proof. But where the certifying officer is other than the clerk it should appear by the certificate or otherwise that he has "charge of the records." Kingman v. Cowles, ubi supra. The person attesting the records in this case is the deputy clerk acting in the name of the clerk. It should, therefore, be made to appear somewhere that the deputy clerk is in charge of the records. Upon looking into the attestation, it appears that they are under the custody of the clerk; and the judge certifies under the seal of the court that the clerk "is the keeper of the records and seal," and it is nowhere stated that the records are at any time in the custody of the deputy clerk. The attestation, therefore, does not appear to have been made by the person having the charge of the records, within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 169, § 67.

It is true that the judge certifies that the signature is in the handwriting of Callaghan, the clerk, and that the attestation is in due form and made by the proper officers. We hardly see how it happened that if the clerk desired to make an attestation himself, and was present, with pen in hand, to do it, he concluded to affix the name of the deputy clerk, so as to make it appear not as his own personal act, but as that of his deputy acting for him; and the most natural explanation of the judge's certificate is that he took a printed form to be used by him when the attestation was signed by the clerk, and inadvertently signed it without erasing or modifying the printed clause. At any rate, even if we are to consider the certificate of the judge as evidence of the statements therein contained, it still appears that the attestation is, in form and in law, not the clerk's own personal act, but the act of his deputy in the name of the clerk. The further statement of the judge that the attestation is in due form and made by the proper officers, especially when taken in connection with the statement that the clerk is the keeper of the records, falls far short of a statement that the person personally making the attestation, namely, the deputy clerk, is the one having charge of the records. The result is that the attestation did not meet the requirements of the federal or State statute, and the record was not admissible. . . .

Exceptions sustained.

563. Mode of Authenticating when Genuineness is not Presumed; Certificates of Attestation; Statutes Presuming Genuineness.[1] Suppose, now, that the seal or signature is one of a kind which does not sufficiently evidence its own genuineness, — a tax-collector in another State, for example. Its genuineness therefore remains to be proved by testimony. The inconvenience of producing a witness who of his knowledge can testify to the genuineness of the seal or signature would be intolerable, and a resort to hearsay testimony in the shape of official statements has long been accepted as proper. But who is the appropriate officer to make such statements? Naturally, at common law, that chief officer, at the source of executive power, who knows what persons have been appointed and what are their seals or signatures. He must also know their duties and be authorized to certify to these, because the document, being usually offered as a hearsay statement, must appear to have been made under an official duty. Finally, the certifying officer must himself have such a seal as is presumed genuine, because otherwise the process of certifying would only have to be repeated anew. Such a seal, at common law, would practically be the seal of State only, for foreign officers at least, though for domestic officers it might be one of a lower grade. It will thus be seen that at common law, whenever a seal not itself presumed genuine is to be authenticated otherwise than by testimony on the stand, two distinct rules are always involved in practice; namely, the admissibility of the hearsay certifying officer's statement (ante, Nos. 427–442), and the genuineness of his purporting certificate.

In other words, two questions must be answered: (1) What higher officer is authorized to certify to the authority of the lower office, the official incumbency of the person exercising it, and the genuineness of the document purporting to be executed by him; and (2) Is this higher officer's purporting certificate to be presumed genuine? The one requirement might be satisfied without the other, for example, (1) a judge of court might be a proper officer to certify to a clerk's authority to copy the records and to the genuineness of a copy purporting to be by the clerk; but (2) the judge's own purporting certificate might not be sufficiently authenticated by his seal if from a foreign State, though it might be from the domestic jurisdiction; and resort might further be required to the seal of State, which would be presumed genuine. Now it is the Authentication principle which answers the second question, and the Hearsay exception which answers the first question.

The matter is further complicated by the circumstance that most statutes dealing with the subject provide in the same section for both sets of rules, i.e. they not only declare the higher officers authorized to certify to other official documents, but also declare how far up the process must be continued before reaching a seal which will be presumed genuine. For example, they may provide that a city tax-collector's certified copy may be authenticated by the mayor's certificate under city seal, and this in turn by the seal of the governor, or chancellor, or secretary of State under seal of State. Every such statute includes a declaration of the Authentication rule as well as of the rule of the Hearsay exception.

The following English statute is an example of the few that keep the two principles distinct: 1845, St. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113, § 1. "Whereas it is provided by many statutes . . . [that various official documents, corporation proceedings, certified copies, etc., shall be admissible when duly authenticated], and whereas the beneficial effect of these provisions has been found by experience to be greatly diminished by the difficulty of proving that the said documents are genuine, and it is expedient to facilitate the admission in evidence of such and the like documents," it is enacted that whenever any certificate, official document, etc., is receivable in evidence, it shall be admitted if it "purport to be sealed or impressed with a stamp, or sealed and signed, or signed alone, as required, or impressed with a stamp and signed, as directed by the respective Acts . . . without any proof of the seal or stamp, where a seal or stamp is necessary, or of the signature of the official character of the person appearing to have signed the same, and without any further proof thereof, in every case in which the original record could have been received in evidence."

PART II. RULES OF EXTRINSIC POLICY

565. Introductory. Rules of Extrinsic Policy (ante, No. 1) forbid the use of certain kinds of evidence because their use would contravene some extrinsic policy of substantive law or of general ethics which is regarded as more important for the time being than is the investigation of truth by this particular means.

The most natural grouping of these rules of Extrinsic Policy is that which regards them according as they are absolute or conditional.

The former class of prohibitions would be such as are invariably and impersonally enforced by the Court, like other rules of evidence; the latter would be such as are applied only on demand of the person who is supposed to be affected in his interests by the extrinsic policy in question and to be protected by the rule from an injury to that interest.

The latter class of rules — the rules of Privilege — have features in common, which sharply distinguish them from the former. The former class is practically non-existent; it can hardly be said that there are any definite and well-established rules of exclusion of that type; they have usually been discountenanced in judicial opinion. The rules of the latter class, on the contrary, are numerous and well established, and affect in a marked degree the daily course of proof in litigation.

TITLE I. RULES OF ABSOLUTE EXCLUSION

566. Stevison v. Earnest. (1875. Illinois. 80 Ill. 513). Scholfield, J. (answering an objection that certain records offered in evidence were obtained in violation of law): It is contemplated, and such ought ever to be the fact, that the records of Courts remain permanently in the places assigned by the law for their custody. It does not logically follow, however, that the records, being obtained, cannot be used as instruments of evidence; for the mere fact of [illegally] obtaining them does not change that which is written in them. . . . Suppose the presence of a witness to have been procured by fraud or violence, while the party thus procuring the attendance of the witness would be liable to severe punishment, surely that could not be urged against the competency of the witness. If it could not, why shall a record, although illegally taken from its proper place of custody and brought before the Court, but otherwise free from suspicion, be held incompetent?

567. WILLIAMS v. STATE

Supreme Court of Georgia. 1897

100 Ga. 511; 28 S. E. 624

Error from City Court of Macon; J. P. Ross, Judge.

Sarah Williams was convicted of violating the Sunday liquor law, and brings error. Affirmed.

Marion Harris, for plaintiff in error. Robt. Hodges, Solicitor-General, for the State.

LUMPKIN, P. J.—1. On the trial of this case in the court below, Jenkins, a detective, was introduced as a witness in behalf of the State. It appeared from his testimony that on Sunday morning, the 2d day of August, 1896, Mose Lucas and Jessie Bunkley (both colored) came to his house in Macon, and woke him up; Lucas saying that, if he "wanted to catch those parties down on Third street selling whisky, now was the time." He gave to Lucas "a silver quarter, marked with a cross," and "an empty half-pint whisky flask, with a file on the neck thereof," and to Bunkley "a silver ten-cent piece, marked with a cross on the woman's head." Both then went on down the street, in the direction of the house of Sarah Williams, the accused. "In about five minutes these two men came out of Sarah's back yard, and Mose Lucas handed [Jenkins] the same bottle that [he] had given him, and in the same condition, except that it was full of whisky." As to what then transpired, Jenkins testified: "I called Police Officer Charley Moseley, and we went to Sarah's house. We went in, and I walked up to Sarah and put my hand in her apron pocket, took out her purse, and found these two pieces of money in it. The two pieces of money are the same I marked and gave to Lucas and Bunkley. I then searched her house, and found a gallon jug of blackberry wine, and three bottles, to wit, two quart bottles and one half-gallon bottle. One of the bottles was nearly full of whisky, another had only the bottom covered with whisky, and the third, the half-gallon bottle, was full of something that looked like whisky, though I have never opened it, and do not know for certain what it contains. . . . I had no search warrant to search either the defendant or the house." Moseley, the police officer, who also appeared at the trial as a witness, corroborated Jenkins as to the account above given of the search made by them, and the finding and seizure of the marked coins and the liquor, and identified a small tin funnel as having also been found at the same time. The "jug of wine, the half-gallon bottle of whisky, the quart bottle of whisky, partly used, and the other bottle of whisky, which contained a little bit in the bottom of it," together with the tin funnel and "the twenty-five cent and ten cent pieces of silver money," were then tendered in evidence by the State, and admitted over objection by the accused.

All of the testimony of Jenkins and Moseley with regard to the search of the person and premises of the accused, and the seizure of the articles above enumerated, was also specifically objected to on the grounds that this evidence "was obtained under the circumstances just narrated, and particularly that it was obtained from defendant and her house without a search warrant; that this search was an illegal search and seizure, in violation of the constitutional rights guarantied to defendant, as a citizen of the State and of the United States, under paragraph 16 of the bill of rights of the State constitution of 1877, and under the United States Constitution; that this was a constitutional right of defendant, to be secure, in her person, property, home, and effects, from such unlawful, unreasonable, and outrageous searches and seizures."

The position assumed by counsel for the accused does not present for determination a new question. That evidence pertinent and material to the issue is admissible, notwithstanding it may have been illegally procured by the party producing it, was early settled by the English courts. The case of Legatt v. Tollervey, 14 East 302, to this effect, decided in 1811, followed a previous ruling made in Jordan v. Lewis (1739), the substance of which is stated in a note, as the report of the latter case in 2 Strange 1122, was meager and imperfect. And such was the rule observed in subsequent decisions. Caddy v. Barlow, 1 Man. & R. 275; Stockfleth v. De Tastet, 4 Camp. 10; Robson v. Alexander, 1 Moore & P. 448. In this country the question certainly arose as early as 1841. Com. v. Dana, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 329. There it was insisted that the issuing of a warrant authorizing a search of the premises of the accused, who was suspected of having in his possession lottery tickets, invaded his constitutional right to be secure against unreasonable searches and seizures, and "that the seizure of the lottery tickets and materials for a lottery, for the purpose of using them as evidence against the defendant, [was] virtually compelling him to furnish evidence against himself, in violation of another article in the declaration of rights." But WILDE, J., speaking for the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, summarily disposed of this contention by saying:

"Admitting that the lottery tickets and materials were illegally seized, still this is no legal objection to the admission of them in evidence. If the search warrant were illegal, or if the officer serving the warrant exceeded his authority, the party on whose complaint the warrant issued, or the officer, would be responsible for the wrong done; but this is no good reason for excluding the papers seized as evidence, if they were pertinent to the issue, as they unquestionably were. When papers are offered in evidence, the Court can take no notice how they were obtained, whether lawfully or unlawfully, nor would [it] form a collateral issue to determine that question;" citing Legatt v. Tollervey and Jordan v. Lewis, supra, and adding, "We are entirely satisfied that the principle on which these cases were decided is sound and well established."

Such has been the view since entertained, and consistently adhered to, by the Massachusetts court. Com. v. Lottery Tickets, 5 Cush. 369, 374; Com. v. Intoxicating Liquors, 4 Allen 593, 600; Com. v. Welsh, 110 Mass. 359, 360; Com. v. Taylor, 132 Mass. 261, 262; Com. v. Henderson, 140 Mass. 303, 305; Com. v. Keenan, 148 Mass. 470, 472; Com. v. Ryan, 157 Mass. 403, 405; Com. v. Tibbetts, 157 Mass. 519, 521; Com. v. Hurley, 158 Mass. 159; Com. v. Brelsford, 161 Mass. 61, 64; Com. v. Welch, 163 Mass. 372; Com. v. Smith, 166 Mass. 370, 376.

It may here be remarked that no distinction is, or should be, observed between an unauthorized search of the person, and one which merely involves an invasion of the citizen's constitutional right to be secure in his "houses, papers and effects"; for none is recognized either by the federal or by our State constitution, the right to be secure in the lawful possession and enjoyment of property evidently being regarded as no less sacred than the citizen's right to immunity from an unreasonable search of his person. In Welch's Case, just cited, it appeared that an officer unlawfully seized an object which a daughter of the accused was carrying under the folds of a loose dress, suspecting it to be a bottle of whisky, over the protest of the accused, who was present; but, though the knowledge so acquired by the officer was thus wrongfully obtained, he was nevertheless permitted to testify that the object she was carrying was, "in size and shape, like a quart bottle." In State v. Flynn, 36 N. H. 64, No. 599, the Court was called upon to pass on the same constitutional questions raised in Dana's Case, supra, and unhesitatingly adopted as sound the conclusions reached by the Massachusetts court; holding that

"evidence obtained by means of a search warrant is not inadmissible, either upon the ground that it is in the nature of admissions made under duress, or that it is evidence which the defendant has been compelled to furnish against himself, or on the ground that the evidence has been unfairly or illegally obtained, even if it appears that the search warrant was illegally issued." . . .

Mr. Greenleaf evidently regarded the admissibility of evidence of this character as no longer a vexed, but as a definitely settled, question; for in his treatise on the Law of Evidence (section 254a) he thus briefly deals with the subject:

"It may be mentioned in this place that though papers and other subjects of evidence may have been illegally taken from the possession of the party against whom they are offered, or otherwise unlawfully obtained, this is no valid objection to their admissibility, if they are pertinent to the issue. The Court will not take notice how they were obtained, — whether lawfully or unlawfully, — nor will it form an issue to determine that question."

Almost identically the same language is to be found in 2 Taylor, Ev. (9th Ed.) § 922. The correctness of the view announced by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the earlier part of this century has long been acquiesced in. In more recent years a few attempts have been made in this country to overturn this now well-established rule of evidence. They have, however, met with anything but success. In Illinois, South Carolina, Alabama, Missouri, Connecticut, and Arkansas, the Courts of last resort have declined to venture a departure from this sound doctrine. See Gindrat v. People, 138 Ill. 103, wherein it was held that which ruling was followed in the later cases of Siebert v. People, 143 Ill. 571, and Trask v. People, 151 Ill. 523. . . .

"the fact that evidences of the commission of a crime are found by a mere private detective on an unauthorized search of a party's rooms will not, of itself, render the evidence thus found incompetent against the party in whose possession the articles are found, if such evidence is otherwise competent."

Irrespective of the many respectable authorities above referred to, and speaking for ourselves, we are satisfied that the contention of the accused, that her constitutional rights were infringed by the ruling of the trial judge admitting the evidence complained of, ought not to be sustained. As we understand it, the main, if not the sole, purpose of our constitutional inhibitions against unreasonable searches and seizures, was to place a salutary restriction upon the powers of government. That is to say, we believe the framers of the constitutions of the United States and of this and other States merely sought to provide against any attempt, by legislation or otherwise, to authorize, justify, or declare lawful, any unreasonable search or seizure. This wise restriction was intended to operate upon legislative bodies, so as to render ineffectual any effort to legalize by statute what the people expressly stipulated could in no event be made lawful; upon executives, so that no law violative of this constitutional inhibition should ever be enforced; and upon the judiciary, so as to render it the duty of the courts to denounce as unlawful every unreasonable search and seizure, whether confessedly without any color of authority, or sought to be justified under the guise of legislative sanction. For the misconduct of private persons, acting upon their individual responsibility and of their own volition, surely none of the three divisions of government is responsible. If an official, or a mere petty agent of the State, exceeds or abuses the authority with which he is clothed, he is to be deemed as acting, not for the State, but for himself only; and therefore he alone, and not the State, should be held accountable for his acts. If the constitutional rights of a citizen are invaded by a mere individual, the most that any branch of government can do is to afford the citizen such redress as is possible, and bring the wrongdoer to account for his unlawful conduct. The office of the Federal and State Constitutions is simply to create and declare these rights. To the legislative branch of government is confided the power, and upon that branch alone devolves the duty, of framing such remedial laws as are best calculated to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of such rights, and as will render the same a real, and not an empty, blessing. With faithfully enforcing such laws as are thus provided, the responsibility devolving upon the executive and judicial branches must necessarily end. We know of no law in Georgia which renders inadmissible in evidence the fruits of an illegal and wrongful search and seizure, nor are we aware of any statute from which it could be logically gathered that the admission of such evidence violates any recognized principle of public policy. Whether or not prohibiting the Courts from receiving evidence of this character would have any practical and salutary effect in discouraging unreasonable searches and seizures, and thus tend towards the preservation of the citizen's constitutional right to immunity therefrom, is a matter for legislative determination. . . . We have therefore reached the conclusion that for no reason assigned by the accused, or disclosed by the record brought to this court, should her conviction be set aside.

Judgment affirmed.

TITLE II. RULES OF CONDITIONAL EXCLUSION (PRIVILEGE)

568. History.[1] To understand the history of Testimonial Privileges, we must consider the history of Testimonial Duty, to which all such privileges are exceptions. And the history of testimonial duty is united with the history of the process used for compelling attendance, and of jury trial in general.

It must be kept in mind that, up to the 1400s, the modern witness is practically unknown in jury trials, and that not until the 1500s is he a common figure in the trial and an important source of information for the jury.[2] Even in Coke's time, in the early 1600s, it is a comparatively recent feature that he is alluding to when he remarks "most commonly juries are led by the depositions of witnesses." Up to that period the jury had fulfilled the double capacity of triers and of witnesses; their own knowledge of the affair, acquired as neighbors of the parties or by searching about for evidence before the trial, had been a chief source of that information which is nowadays furnished to them by ordinary witnesses.

In the meantime the ordinary modern witness — i.e., the person who happens to know something on the matter in issue — was gradually appearing, and was asked by the party to come and contribute his help, or he came of his own motion and interest in the cause. But he could not be compelled to come. A marked feature of the primitive Germanic law was the failure to recognize any general testimonial duty. There must be some specific pledge of faith beforehand (as in the case of the deed-witness or transaction-witness) to bear testimony for the party when called on.[3] This tradition was inherited by our law, and was at the period in question (the end of the 1400s) still a living force.

But more than this. The ordinary witness (such as we now know him) was not only not compelled; he was not welcomed. There was a radical and strict discouragement of maintenance. And the man who comes to labor privately with his neighbors on the jury by generally urging his influence in favor of one of the parties was not carefully distinguished from the man who comes merely to tell them what he knows of the facts. He is, in either case (they thought), trying to make them decide for one of the parties rather than the other; he is a meddler. This feature of the thought of the times is perhaps difficult nowadays to conceive. But it contains the whole explanation of the ordinary witness' position in the 1400s.

The result of this rooted opposition to whatever bore the semblance of maintenance was that anybody who was not somehow concerned as a party or a counsel in the cause ran the risk, if he came forward to testify to the jury, of being afterwards sued for maintenance by the party against whom he had spoken.[1] "If he had come to the bar out of his own head and spoken for one or the other," says a judge in 1450,[2] "it is maintenance, and he will be punished for it. And if the jurors come to a man where he lives, in the country, to have knowledge of the truth of the matter, and he informs them, it is justifiable; but if he comes to the jurors or labors to inform them of the truth, it is maintenance, and he will be punished for it." Thus the state of things was that the person informing the jury must (if he would escape a charge of maintenance) either be an interested party, or his counsel or his servant or tenant or relative — in short, so situated that "the law presumes him bound to be with the party"[3] — or he must have been officially called upon, either by summons as a juror or deed-witness, or by the express request of the jury or of the judge — in short, by "compulsion of law";[4] since "what a man does by compulsion of law cannot be called maintenance."[5] This state of things lasted well on into the 1500s.[6]

But gradually it became intolerable, as may be imagined. By that time the jury was less and less able to do justice to the cause through the means of its own neighborhood-knowledge. The summoning of deed-witnesses and transaction witnesses with the jury (a method in any event available in only certain classes of cases) had through its cumbrousness fallen into disuse. No other form of compulsory summons than that appropriate to jurors and these quasi-jurors was known in tradition.[7] The doctrine of maintenance was a harsh obstacle in the way of obtaining by persuasion the attendance of any other persons capable of giving material information. In these conditions, the trend of the law was naturally marked out by the circumstances.

The lead was furnished by the existing qualification, already noted, that "what a man does by compulsion of law cannot be called maintenance." Create a general compulsion of law for all persons whose information may be needed or desired as useful by the parties, and the obstacle to getting witnesses would be removed. Let an order of the judge, commanding such a person's appearance, be obtainable, as of course, before the trial, and the risk of a charge of maintenance would be removed, and no man need fear to come forward as a witness. Such was the expedient which was plainly dictated by the exigency; and such, beyond a doubt, was the genesis — slow though the creative process was — of that no one could be compelled, or even suffered, to testify to a fact, unless when that fact happened he was solemnly 'taken to witness'"). It has been pointed out by Professor Glasson ("Histoire du droit et des institutions de la France, 1895, VI, 540") that the liability of the witness, if his oath were challenged as false by the opponent, to vindicate himself by judicial combat, was a serious one, and naturally prevented the recognition of any legal obligation to appear as a witness; and he notes the contrast in the ecclesiastical courts, where the testimonial obligation already existed.

the notable statute of Elizabeth, in 1562–3, by which a penalty was imposed and a civil action was granted against any person who refused to attend, after service of process and tender of expenses.

> St. 5 Eliz. c. 9, § 12: "If any person or persons upon whom any process out of any of the courts of record within this realm or Wales shall be served to testify or depose concerning any cause or matter depending in any of the same courts, and having tendered unto him or them, according to his or their countenance or calling, such reasonable sums of money for his or their costs or charges as having regard to the distance of the places is necessary to be allowed in that behalf, do not appear according to the tenor of the said process, having not a lawful and reasonable let or impediment to the contrary, that then the party making default" shall forfeit £10 and give further recompense for the harm suffered by the party aggrieved.

No doubt a process had been issued on demand, increasingly often, in the preceding generation; but this appears as the first definite recognition of the general right to have that process and the general duty implied by it. This statute did for testimony at common law what John de Waltham's subpœna had done for testimony in chancery, more than a hundred years before, by an expedient almost precisely similar.[1]

This statute of Elizabeth, then, which in our day appears merely to supply a means of getting a hold upon persons who are not willing to testify, and typifies the duty of being a witness, appears in its inception as serving also a different and more restricted purpose. By giving a command to those who were willing enough, but were timorous, it represented their right to come and to testify, unmolested by the apprehension of maintenance-proceedings. Of a legal duty to attend or to give testimony, it can hardly be said that there is at this stage any settled recognition. The effort is rather merely to create a freedom to attend. As this freedom came to be exercised more and more generally, and the ordinary witness became, by the 1600s, the chief source of the jury's information, the notion of a duty was naturally developed from and added to the notion of a freedom or right.[1] In the next century, and hardly before then, do we find a plain recognition of the duty.

[1] "He first framed it in its present form, when a clerk in Chancery, in the latter end of the reign of Edward III [about 1375]; but the invention consisted in merely adding to the old clause 'quibusdam certis de causis,' the words 'et hoc sub pœna centum librorum nullatenus omittas;' and I am at a loss to conceive how such importance was attached to it, or how it was supposed to have brought about so complete a revolution in equitable proceedings; for the penalty was never enforced, and if the party failed to appear, his default was treated (according to the practice prevailing to our own time) as a contempt of court, and made the foundation of compulsory process" (Campbell, "Lives of the Chancellors," 5th ed., I, 259). The learned writer would not have been "at a loss to conceive" the importance of the expedient, if he could have been acquainted with the modern researches into the history of witnesses. There had been before that time no compulsion; and the "pœna" of "centum libri" effectually supplied the compulsion. We may well understand that a "revolution in equitable proceedings" was by this "sub pœna" clause brought about. This and the statute of Elizabeth mark an epoch in the history of legal theory and practice. The history of the subpœna is further noticed in Leadam's Introduction to "Select Cases in the Star Chamber," p. xxii (Selden Society Publications, vol. XVI).

And it is noticeable that there are two stages of development, for the duty of attendance to be sworn comes earlier than the duty of disclosure of knowledge. The obligation to attend and bear testimony generally had been settled; but for some time afterwards there appears still to be lacking the full conception that the answer to a specific question on the stand can be compelled; and that all desired facts are bound to be disclosed.[2] The history of the various claims of exemption, from that time onward, shows that the final achievement was in the early 1600s distinctly a new one:

> Sir Francis Bacon, in the Countess of Shrewsbury's Trial, 1612, 2 How. St. Tr. 769, 778: "You must know that all subjects, without distinction of degrees, owe to the king tribute and service, not only of their deed and hand, but of their knowledge and discovery. If there be anything that imports the king's service, they ought themselves undemanded to impart it; much more, if they be called and examined, whether it be of their own fact or of another's, they ought to make direct answer."

But as yet there was one important step to be taken. The statute of Elizabeth had apparently intended to provide only for civil causes. In criminal causes, the date when process began to be issued for the Crown's witnesses does not appear; though presumably it preceded the time of Elizabeth's statute. But the accused in a criminal cause was not allowed to have witnesses at all, — much less to have compulsory process for them. By the early 1600s this disqualification began to disappear, and the accused was occasionally allowed to put on witnesses, who spoke without oath. After two generations, and by 1679, under the Restoration, the judges began to grant him, by special order, compulsory process to bring them; and finally, at slow intervals, in 1695 and in 1701, he was guaranteed this right by general statutes.[3] This guarantee was afterwards embodied in most of the constitutions of the United States.[4]

In the remaining important field of jurisdiction, the Court of Chancery, the general doctrine becomes a part of English history at a time when it was already in part achieved in another system of law. When the Chancellors

[1] 1599, Dobson v. Crew, Cro. Eliz. 705 (bond to give testimony; the Court said that, even apart from the bond, "he is compellable by the law").

[2] As late as about 1630, a clerk of the Star Chamber, Hudson, is found writing ("Treatise on the Star Chamber," part III, § 21, Hargraves' Collectanea Juridica, II, 209) that "the great question hath been, whether a witness which in examination will not give any answer shall be compelled to make answer to the interrogatories; . . . [and Lord Chancellor Egerton] gave me answer, that he knew no law to compel a witness to speak more than he would of his own accord."

[3] 1695–6, St. 7 & 8 W. III, c. 3, § 7 (persons indicted for treason and misprision "shall have the like processe of the court where they shall bee tryed, to compell their witnesses to appeare for them att any such tryal or tryals as is usually granted to compell witnesses to appear against them"); 1702, St. 1 Anne, c. 9, § 3 (requires that witnesses produced for the accused in felony shall be sworn); the latter statute was treated by implication as authorizing compulsory process: 1824, Starkie, Evidence, I, 86.

[4] The usual provision is that in criminal cases the accused shall have the right to "compulsory process for obtaining witnesses" (or, "process to compel the attendance of witnesses") "in his favor" (or, "in his behalf").

in the 1400s were forming the procedure of their court after the model of the ecclesiastical law, they found a doctrine "de testibus cogendis" long canvassed as a theoretic principle in the system from which they borrowed. There had indeed been a time when that system was passing through a development something like our own, — at least, when the compellability of witnesses was a new thing; the decretals of the 1200s indicate this;[1] and a final settlement had not been reached when the English Court of Chancery began to flourish, and to borrow the Continental rules.[2] But the Chancellors, without waiting, pushed the principle to the extreme test of practicality, and invented the keen compulsory weapon of the subpœna writ. This gave them more than a century's start of the common-law Courts in the recognition of a definite testimonial compulsion and duty.

For three hundred years, then, the fundamental maxim has been that the public (in the words sanctioned by Lord Hardwicke) has a right to every man's evidence. We may start, in examining the various claims of exemption, with the primary assumption that there is a general duty to give what testimony one is capable of giving, and that any exemptions which may exist are so many derogations from a positive general rule.

569. INTRODUCTORY. KINDS OF PRIVILEGE, SUMMARIZED. The kinds of exemption which are accorded to a person in respect of his testimonial duty may be grouped under two heads, according as they exempt him either merely from the task of travelling to and attending the court where his testimony is desired, or, having attended, from disclosing a certain part of his knowledge. An exemption of the first sort — which may be termed viatorial privilege — may and sometimes does result in an exemption also of the second sort, i.e., from giving any testimony whatever; but this is rather an accidental and not an intended effect — as appears when a witness is exempted from attendance at the court-room, but is nevertheless still liable to testify before a commissioner sent to take his deposition at his residence. An exemption of the second sort, which may be termed testimonial privilege, or Privilege proper, never includes or effects an exemption of the first sort.

The viatorial privilege consists in exempting the witness from attendance until three conditions are fulfilled: first, he is to have notice that his testimony is required, and be summoned to attend; secondly, he is, in some cases, to receive in advance an indemnity for his expenses; and, thirdly, he is to be excused where his health or other sufficient circumstance constitutes an inability to attend.

[1] "Corpus Juris Canonici," Decretal. II, 20 (de testibus et attest.), 21 (de testibus cogendis); Glasson, cited supra, note 8.

[2] That law seems to have suffered an arrest of development, and never to have reached explicitly the complete conception of a testimonial duty. "The canon law recognized a public duty and liability to bear witness, . . . although to be sure the earlier doctrine had partially refused this recognition, for criminal cases in general, or at least for the accusatio-proceeding in particular" (Hinschius, "Kirchenrecht," 1897, VI, pt. 1, § 364, p. 97, note 1). The modern Church jurists, in regard to the coercion of a witness, "incline to hold it allowable, at least when proof cannot be supplied in any other manner" (Droste, "Canonical Procedure," tr. Messmer, 1887, § 66). Even in modern French criminal procedure (which is founded on canon-law methods), a witness who refuses on the stand to answer a specific question cannot be compelled (Bodington, "French Law of Evidence," 1904, p. 116).

The testimonial privileges fall naturally under two heads, according as the disclosure which they affect is a topic or class of facts in his knowledge, or is a communication from or to another person, irrespective of its subject.

The concededly privileged topics are some half-dozen in number, although others have been from time to time sought to be added to the list.

The privileged communications, as universally conceded, are those made by persons holding a certain confidential relation, — in particular, that of husband and wife, attorney and client, fellow-jurors, and government and informer; to these are added, in some jurisdictions, the relations of priest and penitent, and physician and patient; and occasionally sundry other additions have been attempted.

SUB-TITLE I. VIATORIAL PRIVILEGE

570. BRADDON'S TRIAL

(1684. 9 How. St. 1127, 1167.)

Mr. Thompson. Call Mr. Fielder, and Mrs. Mewx, and Mr. Lewes.

Lewes appeared.

Crier. Lay your hand on the book.

Lewes. My lord, I desire my charges may be paid, before I swear.

L. C. J. Jefferies. Pr'ythee, what have I to do with thy charges? I won't make bargains between thee. If you have any evidence to give, and will give it, do; if not let it alone.

Lewes. My lord, I shall not give any evidence till I have my charges.

L. C. J. Braddon, If you will have your witnesses swear, you must pay them their charges.

Mr. Braddon. My lord, I am ready to pay it, I never refused it; but what shall I give him?

L. C. J. Nay, I am not to make bargains between you, agree as you can.

Mr. Thompson. My lord, we are willing to do what is reasonable. You, Lewes, what do you demand?

Lewes. He can't give me less than 6*s*. a day?

L. C. J. Why, where dost thou live?

Lewes. At Marlborough.

L. C. J. Why, canst thou earn 6*s*. a day by thy own labour at Marlborough?

Lewes. My lord, I am at 40*s*. or 3*l*. a week charge with my family and servants.

L. C. J. What trade art thou?

Lewes. A stapler.

L. C. J. And does your trade stand still while you are in town?

Lewes. Yes, to be sure it can't go well on.

L. C. J. Well, I say that for you, you value your labor high enough,

I know not what your evidence may be, but, Mr. Braddon, you must pay your witness, if you will have him.

Mr. Braddon. I will, my lord, very readily. What will you have? I have paid you something already.

Lewes. Give me 20*s*. more then. You can't give me less.

Then Mr. Braddon paid him 20*s*., and he was sworn.

571. WEST v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN. 1853

1 Wis. 210, 230

THE plaintiff in error was indicted at the April term of the circuit court for the county of Fond du Lac, for the seduction of Eliza Pierce. Before the trial commenced, the defendant, by his counsel, moved the Court for an attachment against one Ashel Brooks, on whom a subpœna, as a witness in behalf of the defendant had been regularly served, and who had been in attendance as such witness, in obedience to said subpœna, during that term, but had left and gone home the day before the application was made. No fees had been paid or tendered the witness, and it appeared that his testimony was material to the defense. The motion was denied by the Court, on the ground that no fees had been paid or tendered to the witness by the defendant. To which decision of the Court, the defendant excepted. . . .

SMITH, J.:—It is alleged for error, that before the trial commenced, the defendant, by his counsel, moved the Court for an attachment against one Ashel Brooks, who, it appeared, had been duly subpœnaed to attend as a witness on behalf of the defendant, and who had been in attendance, but had left and gone home the day before the trial; which said motion was overruled by the Court, on the ground that no fees had been paid or tendered to the witness. . . .

1. It was, anciently, the commonly received practice, in the common law courts, that no counsel should be allowed the defendant upon his trial upon the general issue, in any capital crime, unless some point of law arose, proper to be debated. . . . At different times afterwards, the rule was so modified by acts of parliament, as to admit the examination of witnesses on oath, in behalf of the defendant, in particular cases; until at length, it was declared by statute (1 Ann. St. 2 c. 9), "that in all cases of treason and felony, all witnesses for the prisoner should be examined upon oath, in like manner as the witnesses against him." . . . And in conformity with the full equity of the rule, the Constitution of the United States, and of this State, declares "that in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to be heard by himself and counsel for assistance in his defense, and to have compulsory process to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf." . . .

The right to compulsory process, secured by the provisions of the Constitution, above referred to, cannot be taken away by legislative enactment, and ought not to be hampered by judicial construction. The Legislature, so far from attempting to restrict this right, have expressly recognized it, and provided ample means for its full enjoyment. Section 8 of chapter 146 of the Wisconsin Revised Statutes, page 724, is in the following words: "It shall not be necessary to pay or tender any fees to any witness who is subpœnaed in any criminal prosecution, but every such witness shall be bound to attend, and be punishable for nonattendance, in the same manner as if the fees allowed by law had been paid him." By no rule of construction, can this section be restricted to witnesses subpœnaed on behalf of the State. It is evidently enacted in aid of the constitutional guaranty above mentioned, and includes, as well the witnesses for the defendant, as those for the State.

2. But, it is urged, that this section of the statute, if held to refer to witnesses summoned on behalf of the defendant, is repugnant to that provision of the Constitution, which provides that "the property of no person shall be taken for public use, without just compensation therefor." The time and labor of attendance of the witness are said to be as much property, within the meaning of the Constitution, as are chattels or land. . . . But, in no just sense, can the requisition upon the citizen of his attendance upon the Courts to testify as a witness, be considered as the taking of private property for public use, within the meaning of the Constitution. The object of that provision in the fundamental law, was to protect the citizen from the grasping demands of government, not to absolve him from any of those various personal duties which every good citizen owes to his country; such as the performance of militia duty, obedience to the call of the proper authority for his personal service in suppressing a riot, the apprehension of a felon, affording assistance to officers in making arrests when resisted, and the like. There are very many instances in which the citizen is required to perform personal service, or render aid to his government, without other compensation than that of his participation in the general good, and his enjoyment of the general security and advantage which result from common acquiescence in such obligations on the part of all the citizens alike, and which is essential to the existence and safety of society. . . . We hold, therefore, that a witness is bound to obey the process of subpœna in a criminal prosecution, as well on the part of the defendant as on that of the State, without payment or tender of fees.

3. But it does not follow that the refusal by the Court, to grant an attachment against the witness for non-attendance, is error. The award of the attachment rests in the sound discretion of the Court, to whom application was made, and whose process is disobeyed. It is somewhat like a motion for continuance, or new trial, and other like matters addressed to the discretion of the Court, the refusal of which is not necessarily error, and only becomes so when that discretion is clearly abused, to the manifest injury of the party, or to the perversion of justice. No such abuse, nor indeed any abuse of discretion, appears in this case. It is true, the defendant in his affidavit, alleges that the witness was material. But he does not apply for a continuance on account of his absence; he does not state that he cannot prove the same facts by other witnesses, or that he cannot safely proceed to trial without his testimony; nor does any fact appear, that in the least evinces an improper exercise of the discretion of the Court. All that does appear is, that the Court assigned an erroneous reason for its judgment, which may, for aught that is apparent upon the record, have been correct.

572. PEOPLE v. DAVIS

SUPREME COURT OF NEW YORK. 1836

15 Wend. 602, 608

THE defendant was brought up on an attachment for disobedience to a subpœna served upon him to attend as a witness for the plaintiff in a cause of Kelley v. De Forrest, noticed for trial at the Warren circuit, on the first Tuesday of June last. The defendant was duly subpœnaed on the 26th May, (13 days before the circuit), at the city of New-York, where he resided. Ten dollars were given to him to pay his expenses. He did not attend. Being brought into court, interrogatories were filed, to which he answered. . . .

The substance of the answers is that he is entirely insolvent, and had, when subpœnaed, delivered up all his property without reserve, into the hands of his assignees under the insolvent law, except what was exempt from execution; that he had a wife and three children for whom he provided, and that two of his children were at the time when the subpœna was served, and up to the time of the circuit, so sick as to render it improper for him to leave them; that his family were wholly dependent on his daily labor for their daily support, and that they must have suffered, if left, for the common necessaries of life; that his wife was unable to attend the children alone during nights, and he could not procure her any assistance; that the ten dollars which he received as witness's fee would not, as he believes, have defrayed his expenses of travel by the public conveyances; that he advised with his friend, and leaving the fees with him, procured him to write to the plaintiff's attorney, stating his excuse. . . .

COWEN, J.—It was the duty of the witness to obey the subpœna; and he is guilty of a contempt in disregarding it, and must be punished unless he has furnished us with a legal excuse. Both insolvency and poverty in the witness are sworn to by himself and Mr. Lamb, who was one of his assignees. But it is scarcely necessary to observe that these form no excuse in the abstract. If received at all it must be in connection with the situation of the family, or as showing the utter inability of the defendant to defray his expenses. In rendering these excuses of sickness and extreme poverty, while we are not disposed to deny the validity of either if clearly made out in a proper degree, we cannot allow the witness to judge for himself. Were we to stop and be content with his telling us in this general way, "some of my family were so sick that, with want of assistance and considering our poverty, I deemed it improper to leave home," we should surrender our own judgment. . . . The process of subpœna demands great and extraordinary efforts on the part of the witness to obey. It commands him expressly to lay aside his business and excuses; and, while it lays him under severe obligations, it clears away obstructions in the path of obedience; the witness was always privileged from arrest on civil process in going, staying, and returning. It is not denied that serious sickness in his family, such as would prevent a prudent father or husband from leaving home on his own important business, would save him from the imputation of a contempt and, perhaps from an action. But such a cause ought clearly to be shown to the Court. . . . Above all, where the summons allows him full time, he should struggle to get ready, as he would to go abroad on his own pressing business. If inevitably disappointed, after exhausting every reasonable expedient, he ought certainly to be excused from the payment of a penalty which presupposes some degree of neglect, at least. Witnesses are the summary instruments of investigation in all our common-law courts. It is not until a positive disability is apparent that their domestic examination will be received as a substitute for their actual presence. The important right of oral examination and cross-examination is at stake; and every good citizen, if he could be supposed to regard nothing beyond his own rights, should struggle for the front rank in the order of obedience. The least we can say of the case before us is, that it presents an unpleasant contrast to all this; great diligence, from first to last, in devising colorable excuses, without lifting a finger in preparation to go forward.

The defendant must be fined, and the fine ought, at least, to be so large as to indemnify the plaintiff Kelley against the expenses of the last circuit, with the costs of this proceeding.

573. STATUTES. California. P. C. 1872, § 1330. (No person is obliged to attend out of the county of residence or of service of subpœna, unless a subpœna is indorsed by the trial judge's order, or a judge of the Supreme or Superior Court, on affidavit of the party "stating that he believes" the evidence to be material and attendance necessary.)

United States. Revised Statutes, 1878, § 870. (No witness is compellable to attend for a dedimus deposition "out of the county where he resides, nor more than forty miles from the place of his residence." No witness subpœnæd to depose under a dedimus potestatem "shall be deemed guilty of contempt for disobeying . . . unless his fee for going to, returning from, and one day's attendance at, the place of examination, are paid or tendered to him at the time of the service of the subpœna.")

Ibid. § 876. (In civil cases, a subpœna shall not run more than one hundred miles from the place of the Court, if the witness lives out of the district of the Court.)

574. DIXON v. PEOPLE

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1897

168 Ill. 179; 48 N. E. 108

APPEAL from the Appellate Court for the Third District; — heard in that court on appeal from the Circuit Court of Sangamon county, the Hon. JAMES A. CREIGHTON, Judge, presiding.

At the January term, 1895, of the Circuit Court of Sangamon county, the case of Olive Purdy against the city of Springfield was on trial. It was a suit for damages for injury caused by a defective sidewalk. The appellant, Dr. J. N. Dixon, was called as an expert witness on the part of the city, and testified that he was a physician and surgeon; that he had practiced, as such, twenty-one years, and nineteen of them in Springfield; that he was a surgeon for five railroads running into said city, and had been such surgeon from two to seventeen years; and that he was a graduate of regular schools of medicine, and had been practicing general surgery for eighteen years. The witness was then asked this question: "Dr. Dixon, suppose a patient, . . . what would you say as to such injuries being the probable results of such fall?" This question the witness declined to answer, stating the following, as his reason for so declining: "On the ground that an expert witness is entitled to a different and greater compensation than an ordinary witness is allowed, and that an expert is not required to give expert testimony without compensation as an expert, unless a reasonable compensation shall have been paid or provided for. My reasonable fee for an expert or professional opinion in this case is $10.00. I have not been paid, nor offered anything for compensation for my expert or professional opinion in this case, nor has said compensation been in any way promised to me or provided for. On the contrary, it has been expressly refused. Therefore I decline to testify until such fee is provided for." It was conceded, that the witness knew nothing about the facts of the case, and was called as an expert only. It was also conceded, that the charge of $10.00 as a fee, if a legal one, was reasonable, but that the city had no means provided for paying such fee, and had not promised to pay the same. The witness was brought into court by a regular subpœna, the same as any ordinary witness. . . .

In answer to a further question by the Court the witness stated, that he was not willing to testify, although informed by the Court that it was his duty to do so; and the witness refused to answer the question. . . . Thereupon the Court found him guilty of contempt, and, for such contempt, fined him in the sum of $25.00. This order, fining the witness, was excepted to, and his counsel made a motion for remission of the fine, which motion was overruled by the Court. To the order overruling the motion exception was taken, and an appeal was brought to the Appellate Court. The Appellate Court has affirmed the judgment of the Circuit Court and given a certificate of importance. The present appeal is prosecuted from such judgment of affirmance so entered by the Appellate Court.

Conkling & Grout, for appellant. . . . In England the statute of 5 Eliz. chap. 9 [ante, No. 565] doubtless formulated a pre-existing custom, and provided that witnesses should be paid, according to their countenance and calling, a reasonable sum. . . . There seems to be a reasonable distinction between the case of a witness called to depose to a fact and one who is called to speak to a matter of opinion depending on his skill in a particular profession or trade. The former is bound, as a matter of public duty, to speak to the fact which has occurred within his knowledge; but the latter is under no such obligation, and is selected by the party to give his opinion, merely, and he is entitled, therefore, to demand a compensation for loss of time. 2 Phillips on Evidence, (4th Am. ed.) 828. . . .

The English practice is now settled that extra compensation to scientific witnesses may be taxed. . . . The question as to what constitutes the "reasonable costs and charges" of a witness under the statute of 5 Eliz. was left in former times very much to the discretion of the tax officers. . . .

James M. Graham, State's Attorney, for the People. . . . It will be well to bear in mind from the outset that at common law no witness fees were paid, and that in the absence of a statute authorizing it no fees can now be taxed as costs or recovered. . . . A professional witness in the discharge of his duty as a good citizen is, like any other person, whether he be laborer, merchant, broker, manufacturer or banker, compellable to attend in obedience to process and to testify as to what he may know, whether it be observed facts or accumulated knowledge acquired by study and experience. . . .

Mr. Justice MAGRUDER delivered the opinion of the Court:

The question in this case is, whether a physician, who has been subpœnaed and is interrogated as an expert witness only, can be punished as for a contempt for refusing to testify, when no compensation, greater than that allowed to an ordinary witness, has been paid to him or promised to him.

The question here involved has never been directly decided by this Court. . . .

1. At common law no witness fees were paid. Costs are a creature of the statute, and, in the absence of a statute authorizing it, no fees can now be taxed as costs or recovered. (3 Blackstone's Commentaries, 366; Constant v. Matteson, 22 Ill. 546; Elmer v. Eimer, 47 id. 373; Smith v. McLaughlin, 77 id. 596; County Commissioners v. Lee, 3 Col. Ct. App.

177.) Section 47 of chapter 53 of the Revised Statutes of this State provides that "every witness attending in his own county upon trials in the court of record shall be entitled to receive the sum of one dollar for each day's attendance and five cents per mile each way for necessary travel." There is also a provision for paying witnesses from a foreign county in criminal cases. As, therefore, such fees only can be taxed as costs, as are provided for in the statute, and as only such witness fees, as are specified in said section 47, are provided for in the statute, it is manifest, that no extra compensation for the services of an expert witness, testifying to a matter of opinion, can be taxed as costs against the defeated party.

Many of the cases in England, which are referred to as sustaining the doctrine that such expert witness may be allowed an extra fee for his services are based upon the statute of 5 Eliz. chap. 9, which enacted that the witness must "have tendered to him according to his countenance or calling his reasonable charges." Greenleaf in his work on Evidence (15th ed. § 310) says, that "in this country these reasonable expenses are settled by statutes, at a fixed sum for each day's actual attendance, and for each mile's travel, from the residence of the witness to the place of the trial and back, without regard to the employment of the witness, or his rank in life." Our statute treats all witnesses alike, regardless of their "countenance or calling," whether they be physicians, or lawyers, or ordinary citizens, so far as the question of the taxation of their fees as costs is concerned. . . .

It follows, that, in this case, the Court could not fix a compensation to be paid to appellant, nor order his fee of $10.00 to be taxed as costs nor order the party calling the witness to pay or secure to him compensation.

2. It is claimed, however, that, in a civil suit, a witness, who is called to testify as an expert only, should not be punished for contempt in refusing to testify because no compensation is provided for his professional opinion other than ordinary witness fees.

The grounds upon which the right to such extra compensation on the part of expert witnesses has been sustained have generally been three in number.

[1] The first ground is that the time of the expert witness is more valuable than the time of ordinary men and that, by attendance at court to give his testimony, such a witness meets with a loss of time. . . . Loss of time, as a ground for claiming extra compensation for services as a witness, applies as well to all ordinary witnesses as to expert witnesses. It is conceded that when any witness, whether he is an expert witness or not, is acquainted with any facts which bear upon the matter in controversy in a litigation, he is obliged to testify; and a distinction is drawn between the testimony of an expert witness who is acquainted with the facts about which he testifies, and an expert witness who is called upon to give his opinion, in reply to a hypothetical question, without any knowledge of facts. Manifestly, the witness who goes to court and testifies as to the facts of which he knows is subjected to a loss of his time as much as a witness who goes there to testify as an expert upon a mere matter of opinion.

[2] The second ground upon which the claim for such extra compensation is based is that the skill and accumulated knowledge of the expert are his property, and that a man's property should not be taken without just compensation. . . . There is no infringement here to a property right. It may be conceded that in a certain sense the knowledge of the physician, acquired by special study, is property; but the question here is, not so much whether certain knowledge is property, as whether the requirement that he shall answer a hypothetical question is a taking of his property. Where he is required to make an application of his knowledge to a particular case, so as to secure a particular result, — such as, for instance, the curing of a disease or the healing of a wound, — then he would undoubtedly be entitled to compensation. A physician or surgeon cannot be punished for a contempt for refusing to make a post mortem examination unless paid therefor; nor can he be required to prepare himself in advance for testifying in court, by making an examination, or performing an operation, or resorting to a certain amount of study, without being paid therefor. But when he is required to answer a hypothetical question, which involves a special knowledge peculiar to his calling, he is merely required to do what every good citizen is required to do in behalf of public peace and public order. . . .

[3] If the precedent is once established that expert witnesses must be paid a reasonable compensation for their testimony, then it will not be long before such testimony will be offered to the highest bidder. The temptation will be to give opinions in favor of that party to the suit who will pay the highest price. The testimony of expert witnesses will thus become partisan and one-sided. The theory upon which such witnesses are required to testify in cases like this is that they are "amici curiæ," and that, testifying under the sanction of an oath, they do so, not with intent to take the part of either contestant in the suit, but with a view to arriving at the truth of the matter, and for the purpose of aiding the Court to pronounce a correct judgment. . . . Moreover, if a physician is to be allowed extra compensation as an expert witness, then men pursuing other occupations which require special experience will have the same right to demand extra fees. A banker will claim that he has earned extra compensation, a merchant will make the same claim, and so with men engaged in other branches of business. It will be easy to say in such cases that the testimony called for is the result of special knowledge and required skill, and therefore should be paid for. Almost every law suit involves testimony which is in the nature of opinion, in addition to testimony which speaks of the mere facts within the knowledge of the witness. For instance, A sells B a certain quantity of wheat, and delivers the same, and sues for the price of the wheat. One witness testifies as to the contract, which he heard the parties make. Another testifies to the delivery of the wheat, which he saw delivered. These witnesses testify to actual facts heard and seen. But still another witness, who may know nothing about the facts, may yet be required to state the value of the wheat at the time of the contract, or at the time of the delivery; and he may be required to testify from his knowledge of the market prices of wheat, as given in the market quotations. Such a witness, however, as to the value, and as to market prices, is not regarded as an expert witness who is entitled to extra compensation. . . .

It can make no difference whether the suit in which the witness is called upon to testify is a suit between private parties, or is a suit between the State and an alleged criminal. In either case the object is to promote public justice, and to aid the due administration of justice. It is just as important to the peace and good order of society that private controversies should be settled upon correct proofs, and in accordance with truthful testimony, as that criminals who violate the laws of the State should be punished. It is the duty of the ordinary witness and of the expert witness to testify as to facts within his knowledge which bear upon the decision of controversies in the courts. Such duty devolves upon him as a citizen; and in view of the protection which he receives from the laws of the country, in the matter of his personal liberty, and in the matter of the protection of his property, this duty devolves as much upon a physician who is required to testify as an expert witness in answer to hypothetical questions as it does upon the ordinary witness testifying to facts within his knowledge.

Accordingly, the judgments of the Appellate Court and of the Circuit Court are affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

Applications for Orders Quashing Subpœnas.

De Lancey Nicoll and John M. Bowers, for petitioners. Henry L. Stimson, United States Attorney.

Ward, Circuit Judge. This is a motion to quash and set aside subpœnas served on witnesses Shaw and McLaughlin; the subpœna ticket being in the following form:

"U. S. Grand Jury:—By virtue of a writ of subpœna to you directed and herewith shown, you are commanded and firmly enjoined that laying all other matters aside, and notwithstanding any excuse, you be and appear in your proper person before the grand inquest of the body of the people of the United States of America for the Southern district of New York at a Circuit Court to be held at the United States Court and Post Office Building, room 119, fourth floor, in the city of New York in and for the said Southern district on the 18th day of January, 1909, at 10:30 o'clock in the forenoon of the same day, to testify all and everything which you may know generally on the part of the said United States. And this you are not to omit under the penalty of two hundred and fifty dollars.

"Dated this 4th day of January, 1909.

"By the Court, Henry L. Stimson, U. S. Attorney."

There were struck out of the printed form the words "to give evidence in a certain cause now depending in the said court between the United States of America and," and the word "generally" substituted. The statutory form of subpœna in the State of New York (section 612, Code Cr. Proc.) contains a similar provision to the one struck out, viz., to appear "as a witness in a criminal action prosecuted by the people of the state of New York against." The form of subpœna in the Federal courts is not prescribed by law. The only regulation on the subject is section 877, Rev. St. U. S. . . .

The form used in this district indicates at least a general intention that a witness shall be informed of the matter about which he will be called upon to testify. I think it is proper that he should be. . . . It is quite clear that the ordinary citizen called upon to testify in the strange environment of the grand jury room under the interrogation of the United States attorney will be quite unable to assert his rights, even if he knows what they are. He ought to have an opportunity to consult counsel and be advised of the extent of his right to refuse to testify, and of the way in which to protect himself against giving testimony that might incriminate him.

The United States attorney contends that in this country the grand jury has an inquisitorial power to investigate of its own motion, and that in some instances the utmost secrecy may be necessary to the success of its inquiry, and that the protection of witnesses may safely rest on the presumption that neither the grand jury nor the United States attorney will do anything unfair or oppressive. [To this it may be answered that] It would also contribute greatly to the success and celerity of some investigations if the authorities had an unlimited right to search and seize persons, houses, and papers. But the right of the citizen against such proceedings is not left to depend upon any such presumption. He is guaranteed against unreasonable searches and seizures by the fourth amendment to the Constitution. So it would unquestionably speed the detection and conviction of crime to compel suspected persons to testify; but no principle of our law is better settled than that this cannot be done.

The subpœna being the Court's writ, it is the duty of the Court, consistently with existing statutes, to regulate the use of it. It is not a question of the nature of the particular subject now under consideration by the grand jury, nor of the fairness of the present United States attorney and his assistants and of the present grand jury; but the question is to determine the practice to be followed in this district in all cases by all United States attorneys and grand juries, a matter concededly of the utmost moment.

It is pointed out [on behalf of the Government] that the grand jury may often be unable to name any person as connected with the subject that it is investigating of its own inquisitorial power, and, if it cannot subpœna witnesses without meaning some person, the inquiry must be altogether abandoned. I think the answer to this is that it can in such a case state in the subpœna the subject of its inquiry, and so fix some definition of and limit to the examination to which the witness may be subjected. This was done in the subpœna issued out of this court in the case of United States v. Kimball, (C. C.) 117 Fed. 156. It must be admitted that there is a strange absence of authority upon the subject; but Justice Brown, in Hale v. Henkel, 201 U. S. 43, 65, said:

"We deem it is entirely clear that under the practice in this country, at least, the examination of witnesses need not be preceded by a presentment or indictment formally drawn up, but that the grand jury may proceed, either upon their own knowledge or upon the examination of witnesses, to inquire for themselves whether a crime cognizable by the Court has been committed, that the result of their investigations may be subsequently embodied in an indictment, and that in summoning witnesses it is quite sufficient to apprise them of the names of the parties with respect to whom they will be called upon to testify, without indicating the nature of the charge against them." . . .

It is quite in line with his view that, if the witness cannot be apprised of the name of the person so charged, he should be informed of the subject about which he will be called upon to testify. . . .

The motion to quash and set aside the subpœnas is therefore granted.

SUB-TITLE II. PRIVILEGED TOPICS

576. DOE dem. EGREMONT v. DATE

QUEEN'S BENCH. 1842.

3 Q. B. 609, 621

EJECTMENT for lands in Somersetshire. The lessor of the plaintiff, George, Earl of Egremont, claimed under the demise of Charles, late Earl of Egremont, who died in 1763, leaving his will dated 30th July, 1761. By the will, lands were devised to George O'Brien, late Earl of Egremont, for life, with limitations over in remainder, under which remainder the lessor of the plaintiff was now entitled as tenant in tail. . . . In order to show that the lands in question were part of the lands devised, and had been the property of the devisor, it was proposed to prove that they had been held by the tenant for life, the late George O'Brien, Earl of Egremont, as landlord.

The evidence opened in support of this was a rent book, belonging to the late tenant for life, and now in the hands of his executor, Colonel Wyndham, in which was an entry of the receipt of rent for his property, by the steward of the tenant for life, in 1800. A subpœna duces tecum, to produce the book, was served on Colonel Wyndham: and (by consent of the parties) Mr. Murray, Colonel Wyndham's attorney, appeared for him, with it. . . . He then objected to produce the rent book, on the ground that it was a document relating to the title of Colonel Wyndham; but the learned judge overruled the objection; and the book was produced. Verdict for the plaintiff.

Sir W. W. Follett, Erle, Crowder, and Montague Smith showed cause. First, even if the witness was not compellable to produce the book, that is no ground for a new trial on the application of one of the parties. The book being, in itself, legitimate evidence, what right has the party against whom it is produced to make the objection? The only person injured, if any, is the owner of the book: but he is not the party making the application.

Lord DENMAN, C. J.—Surely injustice is done to the defendant if that is admitted in evidence against him which ought not to have been admitted. It seems very difficult to say that such a situation is not to be reviewed.

Kelly, Bere and Butt, contra. . . . Even where the judge directs the witness to produce the evidence, if the witness still refuse, all that the judge can do is to punish him for contempt; and yet, if the judge improperly refuse to order the evidence to be produced, it is admitted that this is a ground for a new trial.

PATTESON, J.—Taking that to be so, it shows only that a party to the suit has a right to complain that the judge has not exercised on his behalf the power which ought to have been exercised; but, where a judge refuses to protect a witness from giving the evidence, that is not a decision against either party in the cause. . . .

Lord DENMAN, C. J.—With respect to the preliminary point, I may perhaps have expressed myself too strongly during the argument, considering the case of Marston v. Downes, 1 A. & E. 31, which was not present to my mind at the moment. I must own, however, that I am not altogether satisfied with the principle of that decision. Perhaps I might be inclined to put the argument thus. A party to a suit has a right to insist that no evidence shall be produced against him, except such as can be given legally. Now, if a witness be compelled by a judge at Nisi Prius to produce a title-deed which he is legally entitled to withhold, it strikes me that the party to the suit against whom the evidence is produced, is affected by that which ought not to have been laid before the jury. . . .

These observations, however, are only thrown out for the purpose of indicating a doubt upon a question of considerable importance, which seems to me to have arisen quite unnecessarily in this case. For I have not the least doubt that the witness was compellable to produce the book in question. . . .

COLERIDGE, J.: . . . I must say that I entertain great doubt whether we could have reviewed the decision of the learned judge. There is a very broad distinction between cases where the privilege has been allowed, and those where it has been disallowed. In the former case, a party has been precluded from proving that which he was entitled to prove. In the latter case, the party whose privilege has been disallowed has no "locus standi in banco." I recollect a case on the western circuit, in which I was retained as counsel for a witness, to resist his being compelled to produce some evidence. Mr. Justice PARK, who was perfectly familiar with the course of practice at Nisi Prius, would not for a moment allow me to appear in that character. He said, "I must be left to take care of the witness, and I alone; I shall not hear counsel on his behalf." If counsel cannot be heard for a witness at Nisi Prius, certainly he cannot be heard for that witness in banc. And, if the witness cannot call upon us to review the decision, can the party to the cause do so? Legitimate evidence has been produced against him: he is not prejudiced by that, and can have no ground of complaint.

577. GREAT WESTERN TURNPIKE CO. v. LOOMIS

(1865. NEW YORK. 32 N. Y. 127, 138.)

LOOMIS, J.—Strictly speaking, there is no case in which a witness is at liberty to object to a question. That is the office of the party or of the Court. The right of the witness is to decline an answer, if the Court sustains his claim of privilege.

When the question is relevant, it cannot be excluded on the objection of the party, and the witness is free to assert or to waive his privilege. But when the question is irrelevant, the objection properly proceeds from the party, and the witness has no concern in the matter unless it be overruled by the judge.

Topic 1. Privilege for Party-Opponent in Civil Cases

578. History. It is a little singular that the oldest and once the most firmly established of all the privileges should be also the most obscure in its history and precise mode of origin. That the party-opponent in a jury-trial at common law was not compellable to be a witness seems unquestioned, since the beginning of recorded trials, though it is not explicitly stated until the late 1700s. On the other hand, that a party-opponent in chancery was compellable to answer interrogatories under oath, like any witness, is equally clear, from the beginning of systematic chancery-practice. The absence of a privilege in chancery is easily explainable; because the Chancellor merely adopted the system of the ecclesiastical Courts, in this as in so many other respects; and the ecclesiastical practice regarded as compellable the party, no less than other persons. But why was this not done in common-law trials also? Before the statute of Elizabeth, which virtually created compulsory process for witnesses in jury-trials, it is easy to see that a party-opponent was not compellable to appear; but, after that time, from the middle of the 1500s, why were not parties summoned by subpœna like other desired witnesses, as they were in chancery?

How readily the common-law practice has been grafted with the chancery rule, may be seen from the circumstance that this very measure was taken in Massachusetts by the colonists, two centuries before the general reform of the law in that direction.[1]

As to the policy of such a privilege, it is amazing that there should have been so long a continuance in its recognition. The very denial of it in chancery, alongside of its recognition at common law, was an anomaly and an absurdity; and the great commentator himself had long ago pointed out[2] that "it seems the height of judicial absurdity that in the same cause between the same parties in the examination of the same facts a discovery by the oath of the parties should be permitted on one side of Westminster Hall and denied on the other." The benighted doctrine of the common-law Courts could not prevail, when the force of reason and common sense was once brought to bear, and, by the middle of the 1800s, statutes had everywhere abolished the privilege. There were four modes in which the privilege might conceivably apply, though the statutes dealt expressly with two only. These four were: (1) The party's personal testimony; (2) Documents in his possession; (3) Premises or chattels in his possession; (4) His own corporal condition.

(1) Personal testimony. The common-law rule was abolished by statutes dating from the second half of the 1800s. A few of these statutes, indeed, particularly in the Southern States and in special classes of litigation, had before that date made the opponent compellable, but not competent, as a witness; but the great majority employed a single enactment to declare him both competent and compellable.

[1] 1641, Mass. Body of Liberties (Whitmore's ed.) § 26 (every man may have help in pleading his cause, but "this shall not exempt the partie himself from answering such questions in person as the court shall thinke meete to demand of him").

[2] Blackstone, Commentaries, III, 382.

The statutory enactments are usually of two sorts, corresponding to the two purposes that were to be accomplished. One of these was the recognition of the right to compel the opponent to testify at the trial; this was in most jurisdictions provided in express terms. The other was the securing of the right to discovery of his evidence before trial (ante, Nos. 497–500). This was usually accomplished by authorizing the filing of written interrogatories, and thus transferred to common-law Courts the chancery method of a bill of discovery. But this latter measure virtually accomplished also, at the same time, the former purpose; for the answers to these interrogatories could be put in at the trial as his admissions, without actually calling him to the stand; hence, in a few jurisdictions, this latter mode remains as the only one, and is regarded as sufficiently attaining both ends. In most jurisdictions, both modes are provided for, as they should be, by separate statutes.

(2) Documents. By the middle of the 1800s, statutes began to be passed, in nearly every jurisdiction, effectually annulling the common-law privilege and providing a means for compelling disclosure. These statutes, like those compelling the opponent's oral testimony, of which indeed they were the historical associates, either directly required production at the trial, or authorized inspection before trial, in the manner of a bill of discovery, or made both these provisions. The effect was to destroy the common-law privilege entirely, except as far as the limitations of the chancery rule for discovery were in some statutes maintained. Under the principle of these statutes, it has usually and properly been held that the simple method of subpœna duces tecum (which was indeed the earliest proceeding for this purpose), instead of the more formal motion to produce, may be used for compelling production of documents by the opponent at the trial."

581. WANEK v. WINONA

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1899

78 Minn. 98; 80 N. W. 851

ACTION in the District Court for Winona county to recover $10,050 for personal injuries. The case was tried before SNOW, J., and a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $4,000. The Court made an order granting a motion for a new trial, unless plaintiff should consent to a reduction of the verdict to $3,000 and otherwise denying the motion. Plaintiff consented to the reduction, and from the order defendant appealed. Reversed.

The alleged injuries were sustained October 19, 1898. The plaintiff's notice of his claim for damages was served on the city November 14, 1898. This action was commenced December 9 of the same year, and defendant's application for a physical examination was made May 1, 1899, the first day of the term at which the action was tried. The complaint alleged that the injuries would be permanent, and the existence or nonexistence of at least some of the injuries could only be ascertained by a physical examination of plaintiff's person. The trial Court denied the application upon the grounds, as shown by his memorandum: First, that he had no power in any case to order a party to submit to a physical examination of his person; and, second, even if he had the power, he would, in the exercise of his discretion, have refused, under the circumstances of the case, to grant defendant's application.

W. A. Finkelnburg and O. B. Gould, for appellant. The overwhelming weight of authority sustains the power of the Court, as a matter of right, to order an examination. . . .

H. M. Lamberton and Brown & Abbott, for respondents. The Court had power in its discretion to deny the application for an examination. Hatfield v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 33 Minn. 130. It is true that where the Court has discretion, but refuses to exercise it on the ground that such discretion does not exist, error is committed. But the reason for the rule is that if the discretion had been exercised, it might have been in favor of the complaining party. Leonard v. Green, 30 Minn. 496; Seibert v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 58 Minn. 58. In this case the denial was on the merits. The Court has, however, no power to grant such examination. Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250; . . . Peoria v. Rice, 144 Ill. 227; Cole v. Fall Brook, 159 N. Y. 59.

Mitchell, J. (after stating the case in part as above). 1. We are very clearly of the opinion that the Court has the power, in a case of this kind, to order the plaintiff to submit to a physical examination of his person. We shall not go into any extended discussion of a question which has been so much and so often discussed by Courts and text writers. Upon both principle and reason we are of opinion that in a civil action for physical injuries, where the plaintiff tenders an issue as to his physical condition, and appeals to the Courts of justice for redress, it is within the power of the trial Court in the exercise of a sound discretion, in proper cases, upon an application reasonably made, under proper safeguards designed to preserve the rights of both parties, to order such an inspection, and to require the plaintiff to submit to it under the penalty of having his action dismissed in case he refuses to do so.

We are aware that there are some eminent authorities to the contrary. But, with all due deference to them, we cannot avoid thinking that they base their conclusion upon a fallacious and somewhat sentimental line of argument as to the inviolability and sacredness of a man's own person, and his right to its possession and control free from all restraint or interference of others. This, rightly understood, is all true, but his right to the possession and control of his person is no more sacred than the cause of justice. When a person appeals to the State for justice, tendering an issue as to his own physical condition, he impliedly consents in advance to the doing justice to the other party, and to make any disclosure which is necessary to be made in order that justice may be done. No one claims that he can be compelled to submit to such an examination. But he must either submit to it, or have his action dismissed. Any other rule in these personal injury cases would often result in an entire denial of justice to the defendant, and leave him wholly at the mercy of the plaintiff's witnesses. In very many cases the actual nature and extent of the injuries can only be ascertained by a physical examination of the person of the injured party. Such actions were formerly very infrequent, but of late years they constitute one of the largest branches of legal industry, and are not infrequently attempted to be sustained by malingering on the part of the plaintiff, false testimony, or the very unreliable speculations of so-called "medical experts." To allow the plaintiff in such cases, if he sees fit to display his injuries to the jury, to call in as many friendly physicians as he pleases, and have them examine his person, and then produce them as expert witnesses on the trial, but at the same time deny to the defendant the right in any case to have a physical examination of plaintiff's person, and leave him wholly at the mercy of such witnesses as the plaintiff sees fit to call, constitutes a denial of justice too gross, in our judgment, to be tolerated for one moment.

2. The next question is whether there was an abuse of discretion in denying plaintiff's request. . . . We are of opinion that the trial Court erred in not granting defendant's application.

We discover no other error in the record, but for this one the order appealed from must be reversed, and a new trial granted. It is so ordered.

Topic 2. Privilege for Anti-Marital Facts

583. Sir Edward Coke. Commentary upon Littleton, 6b (1629). . . . Note, it hath been resolved by the justices that a wife cannot be produced either against or for her husband, "qua sunt duæ animæ in carne una;" and it might be a cause of implacable discord and dissention between the husband and wife, and a meane of great inconvenience; but in some cases women are by law wholly excluded to bear testimony, as to prove a man to be a villain.

584. Lady Ivy's Trial. (1684. Mossam v. Ivy, Howell's State Trials, X, 555, 628.) [Lady Ivy's title rested on certain deeds, said to have been forged by her procurement. Mrs. Duffett had testified that her husband, now dead, was the forger, and had been paid for it by Lady Ivy. The defence now offers to impeach Mrs. Duffett, by her husband's deposition.] Sol. Gen. — My lord, I submit what I offer for my client to the judgment of the Court. But that which I would say now, is this: We have here the husband's oath concerning this matter, that this woman who now takes upon her to swear these forgeries and things, told him she could have £500 if she would swear against my Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. JEFFREYS — Is that evidence against the wife?

Sol. Gen. — He is now dead, it seems; but here is his oath.

L. C. J. — Pray, consider with yourself; could the husband have been a witness against the wife about what she told him upon an information for that offence of subornation?

Sol. Gen. — No, my lord, I think not.

L. C. J. — Could the wife be an evidence against the husband for the forgery?

Sol. Gen. — No, my lord, she could not; and yet she swears it upon him here.

L. C. J. — That is not against him, man; he is out of the case; but against my Lady Ivy; and how can the oath of the husband be evidence here? . . .

Sol. Gen. — Suppose, my lord, that both husband and wife were brought as evidence against my Lady Ivy, were that good?

L. C. J. — Certainly, that were very good.

Sol. Gen. — Why then, my lord, one of them says, that she saw such and such things done by Lady Ivy, and by him for her; and the other says, such things were not done, but she confessed she could have £500 to swear they were done; shall not this evidence be admitted to contradict the other?

L. C. J. — Why, good Lord! gentlemen, is the philosophy of this so witty, that it need be so confidently urged? Is it good logic, that because they both were good witnesses against my Lady Ivy, therefore, either of them is a good witness against the other? Shall the husband's oath be read against the wife, to fix a crime upon her? Sure you do not intend this shall pass for argument, but to spend time. . . . Nay, be not angry, Mr. Solicitor; for if you be, we cannot help that neither. The law is the law for you as well as me.

Sol. Gen. — My lord, I must take the rule from you, now.

L. C. J. — And so you shall, Sir, from the Court, as long as I sit here; and so shall everybody else, by the grace of God. I assure you I care not whether it please or displease. . . .

They would have read her husband's oath, he being dead; but that is no point of evidence at all neither; for in case the man were alive, it would not be evidence what he should have heard his own wife say. If both of them indeed had been heard together, and testified against my Lady Ivy, it had been good evidence; or they both might have testified for her. But by the law the husband cannot be a witness against his wife, nor a wife against her husband, to charge them with anything criminal, except only in cases of high treason. This is so known a common rule, that I thought it could never have borne any question or debate.

585. REX v. ALL SAINTS

6 M. & S. 195

UPON appeal the sessions confirmed an order for the removal of Esther Newman, otherwise Esther Willis, from the parish of Cheltenham, in the county of Gloucester, to the parish of All Saints, in the city of Worcester, subject to the opinion of this Court on the following case:

The appellants having produced the pauper, the counsel for the respondents began their case by calling a witness, named Ann Willis, for the purpose of proving that she had been married in Ireland to one George Willis. The counsel for the appellants objected to the competency of this witness, declaring themselves prepared with evidence of the subsequent marriage of the same George Willis to Esther the pauper; but the Court determined to admit the witness.

Scarlett and Campbell, in support of the order of sessions, argued that Ann Willis was a competent witness to prove her marriage with George Willis. . . . In order to maintain this position it was not necessary to dispute the rule that husband and wife cannot be witnesses for each other, nor against each other, provided the rule were limited to cases where the interest of husband and wife is the matter in controversy, as where either of them is party to the record. But suppose an issue between A. and B., and A. calls a witness, who proves certain facts, and also calls the wife of that witness, with a view of confirming his evidence; if the wife, instead of confirming, should contradict her husband, this testimony, according to the argument below at the sessions, must be rejected, otherwise it may tend to shew her husband guilty of perjury. But would it not be a strange anomaly in the law, if the competency of a feme covert to be a witness should depend upon whether her evidence would or would not agree with the evidence of her husband, his interest not being in litgation? It seems, indeed, as if some such doctrine had led to the decision of Rex v. Cliviger, 2 T. R. 263, where, upon a question touching the settlement of A. and B. his wife, A. having denied a former marriage with C., C. was held an incompetent witness to prove that marriage.

Jervis, Taunton, and Twiss, contra, argued that Rex v. Cliviger was decisive of this question . . . for although in that case the husband was one of the parties included in the order of removal, and had been called as a witness, and denied his former marriage, in which respect it differs from the present case, yet having been decided upon the principle that the law does not permit husband and wife to give evidence that may even tend to criminate each other, that decision entirely disposes of the present case.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH, C. J.—With the best attention I have been able to give this case, I cannot discover any incompetence of the first wife to give evidence touching the fact of her marriage. . . . She affirmed that he was her husband. How does this criminate him? Does it contradict anything which he had sworn to before, so as to involve him in the crime of perjury? Not at all. Does it even relate to a matter on which he had given previous evidence? By no means. . . . The objection rests only on the language of the King v. Cliviger, that it may "tend to criminate" him; for it is not an immediate tendency, inasmuch as what she stated could not be used in evidence against him. . . . If we were to determine, without regard to the form of proceeding, whether the husband was implicated in it or not, that the wife is an incompetent witness as to every fact which may possibly have a tendency to criminate her husband, or which connected with other facts may perhaps go to form a link in a complicated chain of evidence against him, such a decision, as I think, would go beyond all bounds.

And there is not any authority to sustain it, unless, indeed, what has been laid down, as it seems to me, somewhat too largely, in Rex v. Cliviger, may be supposed to do so. I would observe that by the present decision the Court does not mean to break in on the rule, founded in the policy of the law, that husband and wife shall not be permitted to be witnesses for or against or to criminate each other.

Bayley, J.—There was no objection arising out of the policy of the law because by possibility her evidence might be the means of furnishing information and might lead to inquiry and perhaps to the obtaining of evidence against her husband. It is no objection to the information that it has been furnished by the wife. . . .

I am not sure that the import of the expression "tendency to criminate" was very accurately defined in that case [of R. v. Cliviger]. It was probably not understood as meaning that the wife's evidence could be used against her husband, for we know that this could not be so. . . . Nothing which the wife proved on this occasion could be the direct means of founding a prosecution against her husband, although it might afford the means of procuring evidence against him; but such a collateral consequence is not a sufficient objection.

Abbott, J. — I also am of opinion that this witness's testimony was well received, and ought not to have been struck out. . . . It may properly be said of her evidence that it has not any tendency to criminate him, provided that expression be understood with the limitation which I affix to it, that is, to criminate him in the course of some proceeding in which a crime is imputed to him. . . . Order of Sessions confirmed.

586. State v. Briggs. (Rhode Island. 1869. 9 R. I. 361.) Durfee, J. — Some of these cases recognize the distinction, suggested in the cases of Rex v. All Saints [ante, No. 585] and Rex v. Bathwick, between testimony which is directly criminative and that which is criminative only when connected with other testimony, — a husband and wife being deemed competent witnesses to give testimony, in collateral cases which relate to the other, when it is of the latter, but not when it is of the former description. But upon principle we find no satisfactory ground for the distinction. The supposed disqualification of husband and wife to give, in collateral cases, testimony directly criminative of each other, is said to rest on the policy of avoiding dissensions between husband and wife; and, if so, the disqualification ought to be complete, for such dissensions, differing only in degrees of virulence, would be likely to result from testimony which tends to criminate, as well as from that which is directly criminative. There are logically only two alternatives, — either to exclude the testimony entirely, or to admit it to any extent in collateral proceedings, provided that no use can afterwards accrue therefrom in any direct proceeding. We think it the better rule, subject to such proviso, to admit the testimony. . . .

[However] if we accord to the witness the privilege of objecting to testify on the ground that the testimony, if given, will criminate, or tend to criminate, a husband or wife, we think that, there is no sound principle of public policy which requires that we should go still further, and put it in the power of a third person, by objecting when the witness does not object, to defeat, it may be, a just claim, or escape a merited punishment.

We concur in the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Bayley in Rex v. All Saints, that a husband or wife, objecting to give such testimony, would be entitled to the protection of the Court.

587. CALDWELL v. STUART

Supreme Court of South Carolina. 1832

2 Bail. 574

Action of trover for the recovery of certain slaves, which the plaintiff claimed by parol gift from the defendant's testator, who was her stepfather. The only witness to prove the gift was Mrs. Stuart, the widow of the testator, and she was objected to, as incompetent by reason of her relation to the testator. The presiding judge overruled the objection; and the plaintiff obtained a verdict, which the defendant now moved to set aside, on the ground that the testimony of the widow ought to have been excluded.

Johnson, J.—We are very clearly of opinion that Mrs. Stuart was properly admitted as a witness. The rule, which excludes the wife from giving evidence for, or against the husband, is founded, in some degree, upon the legal identity of the husband and wife. . . . Domestic quiet and harmony of families have suggested the propriety of excluding it where it would be volunteered. . . . Neither the rule, nor any of the reasons upon which it proceeds, have any the most remote application here. The husband is no party; he has ceased to have any interest in temporal concerns. The defendant, the executor, represents the interests of the creditors, legatees, or distributees, as the case may be, and not the husband's. There is no danger of matrimonial discord; nor is there any violation of confidence. She has only disclosed what the husband intended should be known. Without it, his intention in making the gift would have been defeated.

O'Neall, J., concurred. Motion refused.

588. STATE v. WOODROW

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. 1905

58 W. Va. 527; 52 S. E. 545

Error to Circuit Court, Mineral County. William Woodrow was convicted of murder in the second degree, and brings error. Reversed.

Frank C. Reynolds, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney-General, Frank Lively, and O. A. Hood, for the State.

BRANNON, P.—William Woodrow was indicted in Mineral County for the murder of his child, Ruth Elizabeth Woodrow, and was sentenced to the penitentiary for eight years upon a verdict of murder in the second degree. The deceased was a baby 14 months of age, and was in the arms of its mother, at her breast, when a pistol shot killed it, the ball passing through the baby's head and wounding the mother, according to her evidence. The accused offered a plea in abatement to quash the indictment, on the ground that his wife had been examined before the grand jury; but the plea was ejected. On the trial the wife of the accused gave evidence at the instance of the State against her husband, over his protest. Was the wife a competent witness against him? . . .

Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, vol. 1, § 1153, says that, "if personal violence is inflicted on the wife by the husband, she from necessity may, or, if required, must, testify to it in a criminal proceeding against him for the battery; and he may do the like if she beats him." This ancient rule of the common law is stated in all the books. The sole question in this case is: Does this case come within the exception to the rule; that is, was the prisoner's act of shooting the child a crime against the wife?

It was not violence to her person. It was not a crime against her person corporeally. Such it has to be under this exception. It is true that there has been considerable difference of opinion as to what instances fall within this exception. Some cases hold that bodily violence to the wife is not the only case under the exception. For instance, cases of bigamy, and other cases, have been held to fall within the exception. The books must be resorted to for full discussion. . . . I can safely say that the great bulk of American decision is that, to come within the exception, the case must be one of personal violence to the spouse. Bassett v. U. S., 137 U. S. 496; Baxter v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 31 S. W. 394; Crawford v. State (Wis.) 74 N. W. 537, 829; Commonwealth v. Sapp (Ky.) 14 S. W. 834. And I repeat that those cases, like bigamy and others that do not actually involve violence to the person, which are held within the exception, are cases where the wrong is to the individual particularly and directly injured by the crime for which the husband is prosecuted. . . . An enormous wrong this murder was to the mother in a moral point of view, in an emotional point of view, in a sentimental point of view, in a pathetic point of view, under emotions of the heart which move human beings, owing to the relation of mother and child. We are apt to consider this terrible crime as a greater one against the mother than to any other living human being. Still, in a physical point of view, the homicide did not touch the person of the wife, but was only a crime against her as one member of the community — I mean in the eye of the law. Remember that Woodrow was tried for killing the child, not for shooting his wife. . . . The homicide of the child is one distinct crime; the shooting of the mother another distinct crime. The close connection of the two in time and circumstances does not blend the results of the ball, and make the killing of the child a personal or corporeal violence to the mother. . . .

Necessity, the want of another witness, is pleaded for the admission of the wife's evidence in this case. That was the parent of the common-law exception. But that exception may often arise and call as loudly as in this case. Suppose the husband should kill a grown child in the privacy of the home, there being no other witness of the fact but the wife; would this necessity admit her evidence? Suppose he would there kill the wife's grown sister or any one else; would she be competent? I say not. If there were other witnesses present, would she be competent? I suppose not, as the necessity would not then exist. Then, the evidence would be competent or incompetent according as there was, or was not, another witness than the wife. . . . Therefore we conclude that the evidence of Woodrow's wife was improperly used against him. . . .

We reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial, and remand the case for such new trial.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting).—The judgment is reversed because of the admission of the testimony of the wife of the accused on his trial. On the question of its admissibility I am compelled to differ from the majority of the Court, though I am in perfect accord with all their rulings as to other phases of the case. Therefore I would affirm the judgment.

By the common law, husband and wife were not competent witnesses either for or against each other. This was the general rule. There was an exception to it, first declared in Lord Audley's Case, [ante, No. 584]. . . . The existence of this exception to the general rule of the common law is generally admitted by the Courts of this country. People v. Green, 1 Denio, 614; . . . Davis v. Commonwealth, 99 Va. 838. In the case last cited the rule is stated as follows: "At common law the wife was a competent witness to testify against her husband in relation to offenses alleged to have been committed by him upon her." . . .

For the State, it is insisted that, under this exception to the common-law rule, the evidence of the wife is admissible under the circumstances of this case. . . . Whether the exception is broad enough to make the wife a competent witness against the husband, under the circumstances of this case, involves a consideration of the reason or principle upon which that exception stands. All the authorities say it arises "ex necessitate rei." What sort of necessity is its basis? In Bentley v. Cook, 3 Doug. 422, Lord MANSFIELD said > "that necessity is not a general necessity, as where no other witness can be had, but a particular necessity, as where, for instance, the wife would otherwise be exposed without remedy to personal injury."

In Soule's Case, 5 Greenl. 407, MELLEN, C. J., said:

"From the general rule some exceptions have been established, founded on the necessity of the case. For instance, if a wife could not be admitted to testify against the husband as to threatened or executed violence and abuse upon her person, he could play the tyrant and brute at his pleasure, and with perfect security beat, wound, and torture her at times and in places when and where no witnesses could be present nor assistance be obtained."

Wigmore on Evidence, § 2339, says:

"That was commonly placed on the ground of necessity; that is, a necessity to avoid that extreme injustice to the excluded spouse which would ensue upon an undeviating enforcement of the rule." . . .

The nature of the necessity being thus disclosed, is it applicable to the case of a wrong done by either spouse to an infant child? Plainly it appears that this necessity grows out of the privacy and seclusion in which such wrongs may be perpetrated. The husband is master of his home. The law terms it his castle. From it he may exclude all except members of his family. There he has the right to require the presence and continuance of his wife and children. In the secret recesses of his mansion they are bound by duty to stay. Against his will they are not entitled to have others present. He is entitled to the custody and control of his children. He may make them utterly dependent upon him for their support, by denying to strangers the right to give them employment and to receive them within their doors. His right to their custody is admitted to be superior to that of the mother, even when the parents are living separately from each other. Is it possible that the law will not permit the wife to reveal the brutality and inhumanity of the husband to children of such tender years as to make them incompetent as witnesses? If she cannot, what remedy is there in the law for their protection? . . . To say it is not an injury and a wrong to her is to set at defiance the laws of nature. The lowest orders of the animal kingdom will not only protect their young, but will, as a rule, sacrifice life itself for their safety. Men and women who have the true natural instincts, and in whom the parental affection is normal, undepraved, and unrestrained by viciousness, will make any sacrifice, even that of their personal safety and lives, for the protection of their children. No sacrifice can be greater than that of the child. In subjecting Abraham to the final and highest test of his faith, God required him to offer up his son; and the highest ideal of sacrifice is embodied in the scriptural declaration: "God so loved the world that he gave His only begotten Son," etc.

Any interpretation of the common law which ignores natural rights is not to be entertained, for its object is the vindication of such rights. . . . If we say that disqualification goes so far as to prevent the wife from testifying against the husband concerning a wrong done to a helpless child, to whose voice the Courts will not, and cannot, listen, we must say that reasons of public policy shall be paramount to natural right. . . .

The Courts of this country seem to hold that nothing short of personal violence to the husband or wife will make one a competent witness against the other, under the common-law exception. Brock v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 335. . . . In none of these cases, however, did the necessity of admitting the testimony appear. Some were charges of rape, perpetrated on the wife before marriage and when she was not the wife. Others were charges of bigamy, which the Court said were not offenses against the wife, but against the marital relation. One was for incest committed with the daughter of the wife, stepdaughter of the accused. None of these cases, in the facts presented, come up to the exigency of this one. In each of them there was, or ought to have been, some competent witness, without calling the wife. . . .

Having thus considered the circumstances and the principles of law relating to them, I am firmly convinced (1) that the killing or wounding of a child, too young to protect itself by its testimony, is, in law, a wrong to the parent, affecting the person and liberty, and so making the parent a competent witness against the other spouse on his trial for the crime; and (2) that, independently of any wrong to the parent, he or she is a competent witness against his or her wife or husband, as the case may be, on trial for the offense, ex necessitate rei.

SANDERS, J. (dissenting).—I do not agree that the evidence of the wife is incompetent, and therefore concur in the dissenting opinion of Judge POFFENBARGER. I think the case entirely free from error, and would affirm the judgment.

589. RHEA v. TERRITORY

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS OF OKLAHOMA. 1909

3 Okl. Cr. 230; 105 Pac. 314

APPEAL from District Court, Canadian County; C. F. IRWIN, Judge. William H. Rhea was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

At the March term, 1907, of the District Court of Canadian county, the grand jury returned an indictment against Wm. R. Rhea, hereinafter called "defendant," charging him with the murder of Arthur Newall. Said cause was tried at the July term, 1907, of said court, and the defendant was found guilty of manslaughter. A motion for a new trial was presented and overruled, and the punishment of the defendant was fixed by the Court at 30 years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, and sentence was pronounced accordingly. The case is regularly before us on appeal.

FURMAN, P. J. . . .

Third. Counsel in their brief say: "Plaintiff in error next complains that the Court erred in giving the following instructions: 'The jury are instructed that by the laws of the Territory a wife is not a competent witness against her husband in a criminal case, and that the Territory has no power to compel her to testify, nor will she be allowed voluntarily to do so; but she can be used in behalf of the defendant when called by him, the defendant having that right if he desires to use the same.'" The record shows that the above instruction was given by the Court after the prosecution had closed its opening argument, and while defendant's counsel was making his closing speech to the jury. It was contended, and the appellant now contends, that the giving of the instruction was inopportune and constitutes prejudicial error.

In support of this contention, counsel cite State v. Hatcher, 29 Or. 313, 318, from the Supreme Court of Oregon. The Supreme Court said:

"The record discloses that the defendant's counsel, in their argument to the jury, maintained that the deceased was killed while attempting to commit a forcible felony on the defendant's wife. The district attorney, replying thereto, said in substance: 'There were but three persons present at the tragedy — the defendant, his wife, and the deceased. That the voice of the deceased was hushed in death. That the State could not call Mrs. Hatcher as a witness, and it was in the power of the defendant to have produced her. That she could have told all about the affair. That, if present, her testimony would have been adverse to the defendant, otherwise he would have secured her attendance; but failing to do so is proof that her testimony would have been against the defendant.' The defendant's counsel objected to this language, for the reason that the absence of the defendant's wife was no evidence of his guilt; but, the objection having been overruled, an exception was allowed."

In passing upon this question, the Supreme Court said:

"First, the record fails to disclose that the defendant's wife was, at the time of the trial, within the reach of the process of the Court; and, second, it is also silent as to whether she had consented to become a witness for her husband, for without such consent upon her part she could not be compelled to testify. Hill's Ann. Laws Or. 1892, § 1366. In criminal actions the accused shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness, provided his waiver of said right shall not create any presumption against him; but when he offers himself as a witness he becomes subject to the ordinary rules of cross-examination. Ibid., § 1365; State v. Abrams, 11 Or. 169, 8 Pac. 327, supra. If no presumption of the defendant's guilt can be invoked by reason of his failure to testify in his own behalf, how can such a presumption be created in his failure to produce his wife as a witness, when she cannot be compelled to testify without her consent?"

Upon this ground this decision was correct, because under the statute of Oregon the right of the husband to use his wife as a witness depended upon her consent. We have no such statute. Therefore upon this ground the case cited has no application. Section 5495, Wilson's Rev. & Ann. St. 1903, is as follows: "Except as otherwise provided in chapters 68 and 69, of the statutes of Oklahoma, the rules of evidence in civil cases are applicable also in criminal cases; provided, however, that neither husband nor wife shall in any case be a witness against the other except in a criminal prosecution for a crime committed one against the other, but they may in all cases be witnesses for each other, and shall be subject to cross-examination as other witnesses, and shall in no event on a criminal trial be permitted to disclose communications made by one to the other except on a trial of an offense committed by one against the other." From this it is seen that no restriction or limitations are placed upon the right of the husband to place his wife upon the stand to testify in his behalf. She has no more right or power to refuse to testify when so placed upon the stand than any other witness would have.

The other ground upon which the decision in Hatcher's Case is based is not supported by reason. The attempted analogy between the failure of the husband to call his wife as a witness in his behalf, and his failure to take the stand as a witness for himself, fails because in the latter instance there is a mandatory, arbitrary statute forbidding that any reference shall be made to such failure or that any inference of guilt shall be drawn therefrom. There is no such provision in the statute making the wife a competent witness for her husband. We decline to be bound by a precedent which is based upon an attempted judicial amendment of a statute. For these reasons we do not recognize the case of Hatcher v. State as an authority in point.

The statute of Texas is similar to ours. Under that statute the Texas Court of Appeals, in Mercer v. State, 17 Tex. App. 476, said:

"We do not think the remarks of the prosecuting attorney, in his closing argument to the jury, which are complained of by the defendant, were beyond the scope of the legitimate argument. It was disclosed by the evidence that the defendant's wife must have known important facts bearing directly upon the issue in the case, and that she was within easy reach of the process of the Court. She could have explained fully the occurrence testified about by his two daughters when he got his gun and said he would blow his brains out. She could have testified, perhaps, to many other facts which would have shed light upon this horrible transaction. It was not within the power of the prosecution to adduce her testimony, because, being the defendant's wife, she was not permitted under the law to testify against him in this case. He alone could call for her testimony, and compel its production. Her knowledge of the facts, whatever that knowledge might be, was at his command — was within his reach; and without he produced it, or consented to its production, it was a sealed book, which no human tribunal has the power to open against him. Under these circumstances, we think the prosecuting attorney was justified in the remarks complained of, and that the Court did not err in its action in relation thereto."

Counsel in their brief say: "It is true that where a party suppresses testimony, induces the witnesses to leave the jurisdiction of the Court, to swear falsely, or suppress some fact in his knowledge, or commits other acts of bad faith in connection with his cause, the same may be considered as a circumstance in the case; but never can the reliance of the defendant upon a legal right be impugned as bad faith or be distorted into evidence against him." The instruction given simply informed the jury that the defendant had the legal right to call his wife as a witness in his behalf, if he so desired. We cannot see how this could have injured the defendant. Telling a jury what the rights of a defendant are cannot deprive him of them; but counsel contend that it pointed out a defect in the defendant's case. They say: "Coming from the bench, a solemn declaration of law which they must consider in their deliberations, it was particularly harmful to the defendant, and, while it came in the form of an instruction of the Court, the purpose that it really served was that of an argument to the jury pointing out a defect in defendant's case." In a number of States the husband is denied the right to place his wife on the witness stand in his behalf in a criminal case. This was the law in that part of the State which was known as Indian Territory, prior to statehood. This often caused juries to sympathize with a defendant upon trial, because he was deprived of the testimony of his wife. It was therefore only fair to the Territory that the jury should have been informed that if the wife of the defendant was not placed upon the witness stand, or if no effort to have this done had been made, it was not the fault of the Territory, but was because the defendant did not desire it to be done. If inferences might be drawn, unfavorable to the defendant, from his failure to place his wife upon the witness stand or his failure to make any attempt to secure her testimony, they would be justified by the law. This is the principle upon which the case of Mercer v. State, 17 Tex. App. 452, hereinbefore quoted, was affirmed. In fact, the principle is of universal application. In Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 1, § 285, we find the following:

"The nonproduction of evidence that would naturally have been produced by an honest and therefore fearless claimant permits the inference that its tenor is unfavorable to the party's claim. Even since the case of the chimney sweeper's jewel, this has been a recognized principle (1722, Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Strange 505): 'A chimney sweeper's boy, finding a jewel, took it to the defendant, a jeweler, for appraisal; but the defendant would not restore it. In an action of trover, in proving the value, the Chief Justice (Pratt) directed the jury that, unless the defendant did produce the jewel and show it not to be of the finest water, they should presume the strongest against him, and make the value of the best jewels the measure of their damages, which they accordingly did.'"

Mr. Wigmore then cites an unanswerable array of authorities to support the principle announced. It would have been improper, under our practice, for the Court to have suggested to the jury what inferences they might draw from the failure of the defendant to place his wife upon the witness stand or to attempt to do so. The duty of the Court ended in stating the law. Argument upon the law and the facts is always for counsel.

Counsel for the defendant make no objection as to the sufficiency of the testimony. It is therefore not necessary for us to discuss the evidence further than to say that the guilt of the defendant was the only rational conclusion at which an intelligent and honest jury could arrive. In fact, we see no rational escape from the verdict rendered.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

592. Commissioners of Common Law Procedure. Second Report, p. 13 (1853). A more difficult question [than that of admitting them in each other's favor] arises when we proceed to consider whether it should be made competent to an adverse party to call a husband or wife as witness against one another. The case would no doubt be of rare occurrence; when it did, it would in the greater number of instances be where husband and wife have separated and are on bad terms with one another. In such cases the mischief apprehended from the interruption of domestic happiness becomes out of the question. But suppose the husband and wife living together on the usual terms; here the identity of interest between them will deter an adverse party from calling one against the other, except under very peculiar and pressing circumstances and when the fact to be proved is certain in its character and clearly within the knowledge of the witness. . . . But if there be such a fact in the knowledge of one of two married persons, so material to the cause of the adverse party as to make it worth his while to run the risk of calling so hostile a witness, it becomes matter of very serious consideration whether justice should be allowed to be defeated by the exclusion of such evidence. It is clear that nothing but an amount of mischief outbalancing the evil of defeated justice can warrant the exclusion of testimony necessary to justice. What, then, is the mischief here to be apprehended? The possibility of resentment of a husband against a wife for testifying to facts prejudicial to his interest. But it is obvious that such resentment could only be felt by persons prepared to commit perjury themselves and to expect it to be committed in their behalf. Such instances, we believe, would be very rare; and we do not think that a regard to the feelings of individuals of this class, or the amount of mischief likely to arise from a disregard of them, is sufficient to compensate for the loss which in many cases may result from the exclusion of the evidence. . . .

The conclusion to which the foregoing observations leads us is that husband and wife should be competent and compellable to give evidence for and against one another on matters of fact as to which either could now be examined as a party in the cause.

Topic 3. Privilege for Self-Criminating Facts

593. History.[1] In the history of this great privilege, two distinct and parallel lines of development must be kept in mind. The first is the history of the opposition to the "ex officio" oath of the ecclesiastical Courts; the second is the history of the opposition to the criminating question in the common-law

[1] [Abridged from the present Compiler's Treatise on Evidence (1905), Vol. III, § 2250.]

Courts, i.e., of the present privilege in its modern shape. The first part begins in the 1200s, and lasts well into the 1600s; the second part begins in the early 1600s, and runs on for another century.

I. Under the Anglo-Saxon rule, the bishops had sat as judges and entertained suits in the popular courts. But William the Conqueror, before 1100, had put an end to this. His enactment required the bishops to decide their causes according to the ecclesiastical law; whence sprang up a separate system and a double judicature. By a century later, the papal power and the regal power were in hot conflict over the delimitation of their jurisdictions.

The opposition had nothing to do with any objection to the general process of putting a man on his oath to declare his guilt or innocence; they concerned only the questions (a) who should have the right to do this, and (b) how it should be done. Moreover, the former of these things is alone at first concerned; later, the second comes to dominate in importance. Three stages are fairly well marked; namely, (1) to Elizabeth's time, (2) to Charles I's, (3) and afterwards.

1. (a) Who should have the rights of jurisdiction? This was in the 1200s and 1300s the great question. The statute "De Articulis Cleri" settled the line of ecclesiastical jurisdiction over laymen by confining it to causes matrimonial and testamentary; and this in substance prevailed till the end of church Courts in England. Under Henry VIII the foreign and papal domination of the church was repudiated. Thenceforward the struggle of jurisdiction is against Elizabeth's own High Commission Court, and not against a foreign and papal power.

(b) In the other important respect, namely, how the church Courts should proceed, there is, as yet in the 1200s and 1300s, apparently no hostile feeling based on the oath administered in the church Courts, — known as "jusjurandum de veritate dicenda."

This oath, nevertheless (which we may call the inquisitional oath, as distinguished from the compurgation oath), was then, for the church, an innovation. Hitherto, the trial by compurgation, or formal swearing of the party with oath-helpers, and the trial by ordeal, had been the common methods of ecclesiastical trial and decision. But in the early 1200s, under the organizing influence of Innocent III, one of the first great canonists in the papal chair (1198–1216), new ideas were rapidly germinating in church law. The trial by ordeal was formally abolished by the church in 1215. The trial by compurgation oaths "was already becoming little better than a farce." Anarchy and violence were rampant over Europe. Justice in the old-fashioned mode was inefficient. There was a decided need of improvement in procedure.

One of the marked expedients in this improvement was the inquisitional or interrogatory oath, introduced and developed in the early 1200s, chiefly by the decretals of Innocent III. The time-worn compurgation oath had operated as a formal appeal to a divine and magical test or "Gottesurtheil;" there was no interrogation by the tribunal; the process consisted merely in daring and succeeding to pronounce a formula of innocence, usually in company with oath-helpers. But the new oath pledged the accused to answer truly, and this was followed by a rational process of judicial probing by questions to the specific details of the affair, after the essentially modern manner. The former oath operated of itself as a decision, through the party's own act; the latter merely furnished material for the judge with which to reach a personal conviction and decision. This was an epochal difference of method. Indeed, the radical part played for the progress of English procedure, by the new jury trial in the 1200s and 1300s, was paralleled, in a near degree, not only for ecclesiastical procedure, but also for the secular criminal procedure of the Continent, by this inquisitional oath of the 1200s.[1]

There was a distinction of real consequence (upon which everything came later to turn), regarding the different preliminary conditions upon which a party could be put to this or any other oath. There must be some sort of a presentment, to put any person to answer. But must that come from accusing witnesses or private prosecutors or the like (corresponding to our notion of a "qui tam" or a grand jury)? Or might it be begun by an official complaint (somewhat like our information "ex relatione" by the attorney-general)? Or might the judge "ex officio mero" summon the accused and put him to answer, in hopes of extracting a confession which would suffice? And in the last method, must the charge at least be brought first to the judge's notice "per famam," or "per clamosam insinuationem," "common report" or "violent suspicion"? Such were the questions of procedure which later formed the essential subject of dispute. It is enough here to note that the third method of trial — the "inquisitio," or proceeding "ex officio mero" — became a favorite one for heresy trials; and that its canonical lawfulness in some shape was supported by clear authority. About the year 1600, there came to be in England much pamphleteering anent this; and a formal opinion of nine canonists declared the lawfulness of putting the accused to answer on these conditions: "Licet nemo tenetur seipsum prodere [i.e., accuse], tamen proditus per famam tenetur seipsum ostendere utrum possit suam innocentiam ostendere et seipsum purgare." Thus, on the one hand, it was easily arguable that, in ecclesiastical law, the accused could not be put to answer "ex officio mero" without some sort of witnesses or presentment or bad repute; and in this sense an oath "ex officio" (as it came to be called) might be claimed (as it was claimed) to be a distinct thing from the same oath when exacted on proper conditions, and to be therefore canonically unlawful. But, on the other hand, it is plain to see, also, how, in the headlong pursuit of heretics and schismatics under Elizabeth and James, the "ex officio" proceeding, lawful enough on Innocent III's conditions about "clamosa insinuatio" and "fama publica," would degenerate into a merely unlawful process of poking about in the speculation of finding something chargeable. In short, the common abuse, in later days, of the "ex officio" proceeding led to the matter being argued, in English Courts and in popular discussion, as if this oath were either wholly lawful or wholly unlawful; though, in truth, by the theory of the canon law, it might be either, according to the circumstances of presentment.

Thus, the emphasis of controversy now shifted. It had in the 1300s concerned jurisdiction; it now concerned methods. The Court of High Commission of course followed ecclesiastical rules; the Court of Star Chamber did likewise, in what concerned the procedure of trial.

2. The Court of Star Chamber seems to have raised no special antagonism during the 1500s, nor until James' time, in the next century. Nor did the Court of High Commission, under the first five commissions. But in 1583, the sixth was issued, with Archbishop Whitgift at the head, — a man of stern Christian zeal, determined to crush heresy wherever its head was raised. He proceeded immediately to examine clergymen and other suspected persons, upon oath, after the extremest "ex officio" style. From this time onwards there is much concerning this oath. The right to examine in this fashion, wherever the case was within its jurisdiction, seems to have been conceded under Henry VIII and Elizabeth, all through the 1500s. But as James' reign went on, and its practices became arrogant and obnoxious, so its use of the "ex officio" oath came to share the burden of criticism and discontent which that procedure in the ecclesiastical Courts excited. The common-law Courts seem to have found no handle against its oath-procedure, even after Coke's accession to the bench. But though there was no explicit judicial condemnation, there was, after a time, more than one formal questioning of it.

3. But its time in the kingdom was now drawing to an end; and the trial which seems to have precipitated the crisis came in 1637. John Lilburn, an obstreperous and forward opponent of the Stuarts (popularly known as "Free-born John"), constituted somewhere between a patriot and a demagogue, had the obstinacy to force the issue. Lilburn was whipped and pilloried for refusing to take the oath. But in 1640 the sentence was vacated, by the House of Commons, and he was later granted £3000 in reparation. Lilburn's case, together with those of Prynne and Leighton (whose grievances were of another sort), were sufficiently notorious to focus the attention of London and the whole country. The Long Parliament (after eleven years of no Parliament) met on November 3, 1640. Lilburn was on the spot that day with his petition for redress. In March, 1641, a bill was introduced to abolish the Court of Star Chamber, as well as (then or shortly after) a bill to abolish the Court of High Commission for Ecclesiastical Causes. These were both passed July 2–5 of the same year; and in the latter statute was inserted a clause which forever forbade, for any ecclesiastical Court, the administration "ex officio" of any oath requiring answer as to matters penal.

II. But what, in the mean time, of the common law, and of jury trial? Thus far the controversy here examined had been purely one of ecclesiastical jurisdiction and ecclesiastical methods of presentment. The common-law Courts had concerned themselves with it simply by virtue of their superior authority to keep the church Courts and other Courts to their proper boundaries. There was no feature of objection to the compulsion, in itself, of answering on oath; the objection was as to who shall require it, and how it shall be required. Wherever, in other proceedings, it was thought appropriate to have the defendant's oath, there was no hesitation in requiring it. All through the 1500s the statute-book records the sanction of oaths to accused persons. Most notably, every accused felon was required to be examined by the justices of the peace, and his examination to be preserved for the judges at the trial precisely as was done on the Continent at the same period; and, so far as appears, not a murmur was ever heard against this process till the middle of the 1700s; and no statutory measure was taken to caution the accused that his answer was not compellable, until well on in the 1800s. The everyday procedure in the trials of the 1500s and the 1600s, and almost the first step in the trial, was to read to the jury this compulsory examination of the accused. Furthermore, as the trial goes on, the accused, in all this period of 1500–1620, is questioned freely and urged by the judges to answer; he is not allowed to swear, for the reasons already noted, but he is pressed and bullied to answer. A striking example is found in the jury trial of Udall, in 1590, for seditious libel; and the significant circumstance is that Udall, who before the ecclesiastical High Commission Court, a few months previous, had plainly based his refusal on the illegality of making a man accuse himself by inquisition, has here, before a common-law jury with witnesses charging him, no such claim to make:

> Udall's Trial. (1590), 1 How. St. Tr. 1271, 1275, 1289: Udall pleaded not guilty; and after argument made and witnesses testifying, Judge CLARKE: "What say you? Did you make the book, Udall, yes or no? What say you to it, will you be sworn? Will you take your oath that you made it not?" declaring this to be a favor; Udall refused, and the judge finally asked: "Will you but say upon your honesty that you made it not?" Udall again refused; Judge CLARKE: "You of the jury consider this. This argueth that, if he were not guilty, he would clear himself;" then, to Udall: "Do not stand in it; but confess it."

Finally, however, in 1637–41, came Lilburn's notorious agitation; and in 1641, with a rush, the Courts of Star Chamber and of High Commission were abolished, and the "ex officio" oath to answer criminal charges was swept away with them. With all this stir and emotion, a decided effect was produced, and was immediately communicated, naturally enough, to the common-law Courts. Up to the last moment, Lilburn had never claimed the right to refuse absolutely to answer a criminating question; he had merely claimed a proper proceeding of presentment or accusation. But now this once vital distinction came to be ignored. It began to be claimed, flatly, that no man is bound to incriminate himself, on any charge (no matter how properly instituted), or in any Court (not merely in the ecclesiastical or Star Chamber tribunals). Then this claim came to be conceded by the judges. By the end of Charles II's reign, under the Restoration, there was no longer any doubt, in any court;[1] and by this period, the extension of the privilege to include an ordinary witness, and not merely the party charged, was for the first time made. But the privilege, until well on into the time of the English Revolution, remained not much more than a bare rule of law, which the judges would recognize on demand. The spirit of it was wanting in them. The old habit of questioning and urging the accused died hard, — did not disappear, indeed, until the 1700s had begun.[2]

The privilege, too, creeping in thus by indirection, appears by no means to have been regarded as the constitutional landmark that our own later legislation has made it. In all the parliamentary remonstrances and petitions and declarations that preceded the expulsion of the Stuarts, it does not anywhere appear. Even by 1689, when the Courts had for a decade ceased to question it, and at [2] While this was passing in England, the precisely contemporary struggle, across the Channel, is in marked contrast, with its fatally opposite results; for the Council of Louis XIV, then upon the draft of the great criminal Ordonnance of 1670, was fixing, for a century to come, the French rule of compulsory self-crimination. Hitherto this had rested simply on traditional practice; now it was confirmed by statute. the English Revolution the fundamental victories of the past two generations' struggle were ratified by William in the Bill of Rights, this doctrine is totally lacking. Whatever it was worth to the American constitution-makers of 1789, it was not worth mentioning to the English constitution-menders of 1689.[1]

But we are of opinion that, however this difference may have been commented on in some of the decisions, there is really, in spirit and principle, no distinction arising out of such difference of language.

SUB-TOPIC A. SCOPE OF THE PRIVILEGE

596. PAXTON v. DOUGLAS

16 Ves. Jr. 239, 242; 19 id. 225

THE plaintiffs filed the bill as creditors of Peter Douglas, deceased, on behalf of themselves and all the other creditors, &c., an exception was taken to the Master's Certificate, that he had allowed interrogatories for the examination of Charles Christie; claiming as a bond creditor of Douglas. The interrogatories, as allowed by the Master, inquired, 1st, generally as to the consideration for the bond for 2600*l.*; whether money, goods, &c.: 2dly, whether Christie was not before and at the date of the bond entitled to four-sixteenths parts of the ship Belvidere, in the service of the East India Company; and was not the commander of the said ship; whether Douglas did not contract for the purpose of such shares for 2400*l.*: whether that was a fair price: whether it was paid; as to the circumstances of payment, &c.: 3d, whether Douglas, or his nephew James Peter Fearon, at the same time made some and what proposal or offer to purchase from him the command of the said ship, for any and what sum; and how such sum was to be paid and secured: 4th, whether he treated, or made, or concluded, any and what bargain with Douglas or Fearon, for the sale of the command to Fearon for the sum of 2600*l.* or any other and what sum: 5th, whether, and when he (Christie,) resigned the command: and was not Fearon, and when, and by whose recommendation or procurement, appointed to the command: 6th, whether he had, or not, proved the bond under a Commission of Bankruptcy against Fearon; and if not, why?

[1] The real explanation of the Colonial conventions' insistence on it would seem to be found in the agitation then going on in France against the inquisitional feature of the Ordonnance of 1670. There appears no allusion, in Elliot's Debates on the Constitution, to the contemporary French movement; but the delegates who had been over there must have known of it. The proposals of reform laid before the French Constitutional Assembly from the Provinces, in 1789, show how strong was the popular agitation in France.

Christie objected to answer these interrogatories; on the ground that his answer might criminate himself; and subject him to a forfeiture under the East India Company's Bye-Laws; declaring, that no owner or part-owner of any ship, or any commander, or other person, shall directly or indirectly sell, or take any gratuity or consideration, nor shall any person or persons buy, pay, or give, any gratuity or consideration, for the command of any ship or ships, to be freighted to the Company; and in case any such contract, payment, or gift, shall be made, the commander, or intended commander, concerned therein, shall from henceforth be incapable of being employed, or of serving the Company in any capacity whatsoever. . . .

Mr. Richards and Mr. Rouple, for the Report, insisted that . . . some of the interrogatories, the first, for instance, going to the consideration, generally, could not be objected to.

Eldon, L. As these interrogatories are framed, this party can not be compelled to answer.

Robertson's Rep. I, 208, 244

[Treason. A cipher letter was placed before the witness, who had been secretary to the defendant, and he was asked by]

Mr. McRea (for the prosecution). — Do you understand the contents of that paper?

Mr. Williams (for the defendant). — He objects to answer. He says that, though that question may be an innocent one, yet the counsel for the prosecution might go on gradually, from one question to another, until he at last obtained matter enough to criminate him. If a man know of treasonable matter, and do not disclose it, he is guilty of misprision of treason. . . . The knowledge of the treason, again, comprehends two ideas, — that he must have [1] seen and understood [2] the treasonable matter. To one of these points Mr. W. is called upon to depose; if this be established, who knows but the other elements of the crime may be gradually unfolded so as to implicate him?

Marshall, C. J. (sanctioning the witness' refusal). . . . According to their [the prosecution's] statement, a witness can never refuse to answer any question unless that answer, unconnected with other testimony, would be sufficient to convict him of a crime. This would be rendering the rule almost perfectly worthless. Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict any individual of a crime. It appears to the Court to be the true sense of the rule that no witness is compellable to furnish any one of them against himself. It is certainly not only a possible but a probable case that a witness, by disclosing a single fact, may complete the testimony against himself, and to every effectual purpose accuse himself as entirely as he would by stating every circumstance which would be required for his conviction. That fact of itself might be unavailing; but all other facts without it would be insufficient. While that remains concealed within his bosom, he is safe; but draw it from thence, and he is exposed to a prosecution. The rule which declares that no man is compellable to accuse himself would most obviously be infringed by compelling a witness to disclose a fact of this description. What testimony may be possessed, or is attainable, against any individual, the Court can never know. It would seem, then, that the Court ought never to compel a witness to give an answer which discloses a fact that would form a necessary and essential part of a crime which is punishable by the laws.

598. WARD v. STATE

2 Mo. 120

Error from the Circuit Court of St. Louis County.

The case appeared by the record to be, that at the late term of the Circuit Court for the county of St. Louis, the grand jury for said county caused a subpœna to be issued for said Ward, to appear before them and testify generally, without saying in what particular matter or cause he was to testify. Ward accordingly appeared, and was sworn to give evidence to the grand jury. He went before the grand jury to testify. The first question asked by the foreman of the grand jury was this: "Do you know of any person or persons having bet at a faro table in this county, within the last twelve months?" To which the witness answered, "I do." The foreman then desired the witness to tell what persons or person have so bet, other than himself, and not naming himself. The witness declined answering, saying that he could not answer without implicating himself. Ward was then directed by the Court to answer the requirements of the grand jury, but not to name himself as a better; which he refused, alleging that to answer thus would implicate himself. Whereupon the Court committed him to prison, till he should consent to give the evidence required, and till the further order of the Court. A writ of error is sued on, a supersedeas asked for. . . .

McGirk, J. (after stating the case as above). Was the witness right in refusing to answer the question on the ground that the answer would implicate himself?

The record shows that the game of faro is played with cards, by one person as banker against any number of persons, each person playing for himself, without any aid from the others, against the banker; and that there is no common interest among those persons playing against the banker. Thus it appears that each player against the bank is separate and independent of all others. The inquiry made by the grand jury is "Tell who bet at the game of faro, not naming yourself." The answer of the witness is (supposing him to be A) that "if I tell that B, C, and D played, it will be either full or partial evidence that I played." This is the whole argument of the case, — an argument which I think is totally untenable in law and reason.

I understand the rule laid down by Chief Justice Marshall, in Burr's Trial, 245 [ante, No. 597] to be the true rule of law. It is this, that it is the province of the Court to judge whether any direct answer to the question that may be proposed will furnish evidence against the witness. If such answer may disclose a fact which forms a necessary and essential link in the chain of testimony, which would be sufficient to convict him of any crime, he is not bound to answer it, so as to furnish matter for that conviction. . . . The question is, "Who did you see betting at faro except yourself?" It is believed that a direct answer in the negative to this would be, "I saw no one bet at faro." This answer, I think, all will allow, does not accuse him. But suppose his answer must be, that he saw B bet at faro, can it not be true that B bet, yet he, the witness, did not? Does the mere fact that one man saw another commit crime, prove in law or reason that he who saw the crime committed was a participator?. . .

But in this case it is said, if the witness is bound to tell who bet at the game, without naming himself, then those persons who are named will be examined as to the fact, whether he bet; and if the witness is not compelled to name who did bet, then they will remain unknown to the grand jury, and cannot be examined whether the witness bet. I understand this doctrine to be grounded more on the fear of retaliation than on any sound principle of law. Will the law permit a man to keep offences and offenders a secret, lest the offenders should in their turn give evidence against him?

I have looked into the cases cited at the bar, and I am unable to perceive any principle, in any of them, which ought to vary the foregoing opinion. . . .

The supersedeas is refused in this case; and also in the case of Kembly v. The State.

599. STATE v. FLYNN

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1858

36 N. H. 64

THE respondent was indicted for keeping for sale a large quantity — to-wit, ten gallons — of intoxicating liquor, not being an agent for the sale of such liquor, and the liquor not being domestic wine, &c., contrary to the statute, &c. Upon the general issue the State introduced evidence tending to show that A. P. Colby, an assistant marshal of the city of Manchester, acting under a warrant issued by the police court of said city, which was not produced or offered as evidence, went with assistants to the place occupied by the respondent, on Elm street, in Manchester, and there made search for spirituous liquors. The respondent's counsel then objected to the admission of any evidence of the facts ascertained upon such search, upon the ground that the statute for the suppression of intemperance, so far as it purports to authorize a search for spirituous liquors, particularly the fourth section of the statute, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and of this State, and any evidence obtained under such unconstitutional enactment is inadmissible, because it is in the nature of admissions made by the respondent under duress, and the respondent is thus compelled to furnish evidence against himself; but the Court admitted the evidence. The jury having found a verdict against the respondent, his counsel move for a new trial, by reason of said decision.

Morrison, Fitch, and Stanley, for the respondent. . . . II. By the 15th article of the bill of rights of this State it is declared that "no subject shall be compelled to accuse or furnish evidence against himself." The effect of the act of 1855 is to do this. It compels the individual against whom the complaint is made to submit to a search of his premises for the purpose of procuring evidence which is rightfully his, and subject to his sole control, and which he is not to be compelled to furnish or yield to others, to be used against himself, and which he has the right to keep back and withhold, or to resist the sworn officers of the law in the execution of a precept, and then allows the evidence obtained upon such search to be given against him. . . .

Stevens, Solicitor, for the State. . . . We are at a loss to see in what way the production of the evidence, the facts obtained on the search, can be regarded as an admission or confession on the part of the respondent, or as evidence furnished by him. The discovery or production of the evidence is no more an admission by the accused than it is a denial of the offence charged. . . . There is no restraint upon his person, and no control over his mind. . . . It cannot be seriously contended, that because the accused is prevented from concealing or destroying the instruments or indicia of his offence, because he is so closely pursued that he finds no time or opportuntity to remove the strongest evidence of his guilt, — the weapon with which he struck, the bloody garment, the spoil of his theft or robbery, the tools or instruments of counterfeiting, — or that they are taken from him by force, or discovered by search, and produced in evidence, he is thereby admitting his guilt, or furnishing evidence against himself.

Ball, J.— The objection made in this case does not go so far as to insist that all evidence obtained under a search-warrant is incompetent. . . . Its ground is, rather, that information obtained by means of a search-warrant, in a case not authorized by the Constitution, is not competent to be given in evidence, because it has been obtained by compulsion from the defendant himself, in violation of that clause of the Constitution which provides that no person shall be compelled to furnish evidence against himself. . . . It seems to us an unfounded idea that the discoveries made by the officers and their assistants, in the execution of process, whether legal or illegal, or where they intrude upon a man's privacy without any legal warrant, are of the nature of admissions made under duress, or that it is evidence furnished by the party himself upon compulsion. The information thus acquired is not the admission of a party, nor evidence given by him, in any sense. The party has in his power certain mute witnesses, as they may be called, which he endeavors to keep out of sight, so that they may not disclose the facts which he is desirous to conceal. By force or fraud access is gained to them, and they are examined, to see what evidence they bear. That evidence is theirs, not their owner's. . . . It does not seem to us possible to establish a sound distinction between that case, and the case of the counterfeit bills, the forger's implements, the false keys, or the like, which have been obtained by similar means. The evidence is in no sense his. . . .

The objections being overruled, there must be Judgment on the verdict.

600. UNITED STATES v. CROSS

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. 1892

20 D. C. 365

MOTION by defendant for a new trial on a case stated and bill of exceptions combined, on indictment for murder. Judgment affirmed. . . .

The defendant was indicted for murdering his wife on the first day of October, 1889. . . . Exception No. 42 was to the admission of the record in the Marshal's office as to the height of the defendant. It seems that he was called into a room in the Marshal's office, and his measurement taken, and that was done after he was convicted at the first trial. . . . It appeared that Mr. Carroll was the clerk, and testified that there is a book kept in the office of the Marshal in which all the measurements of convicted persons are kept, and a description of the convicted persons written down and furnished the Department of Justice. They are required to keep that book and the practice was for somebody to take the measurement and call it out to him, and he reduced it to writing. He identified the book produced as the one used, and then gave the measurement of the defendant. That was objected to on several grounds.

Messrs. C. Maurice Smith and Joseph Shillington, for defendant. . . . To show the height of the defendant they called William Carroll, a clerk in the Marshal's office. He testified that it was customary in the office to take the measurement of all prisoners after they had been sentenced. He had before him the record in which all measurements thus taken is kept, on one page of which appeared the measurement of the defendant in the witness' own handwriting. He did not make the measurement himself, but it was called out to him by the one who did, and witness took down what was thus called out. The admission of this testimony was doubly objectionable. . . . Second, it was compelling the defendant to furnish evidence against himself. . . . The phrase, "be a witness" is broad enough without any unnatural construction to include the testimony of acts and facts as well as of words. The true meaning and intent certainly are that no accused person shall be compelled to say or do anything tending to criminate himself in any criminal prosecution against him. . . .

The United States Attorney, for the District of Columbia, and Mr. Charles A. Armes, Assistant Attorney for the United States.

COX, J. (after stating the case as above). . . . There is still a further objection made to it and that is, that it is an effort to compel the defendant to give evidence against himself. It must be remembered that when this measurement was taken, the defendant was convicted, and, therefore, it was not taken with the view to a trial or for use upon a trial. There does not seem to be any reason why it could not be used after it had been taken under the circumstances stated. It could not be contended that the knowledge of the size or height of a man acquired in any other way, for instance by a tailor, could not be used when at the time it was not taken for the purpose of being used as testimony, and it seems to us that a record taken as this was, for a lawful purpose and under the rules of the office, might be made use of afterwards. It does not seem to us that it is compelling the defendant to give evidence against himself, although some cases that have been cited to us go very far in that direction. There was one case holding that it was error for the prosecuting officer to compel the prisoner in court to put his foot into a vessel filled with mud in order to measure it and identify it. That is well enough. It was held in another case that where the officer compelled the defendant to put his foot in certain tracks that were discovered, in order to identify him, that was wrong, as it was compelling him to give evidence against himself, and evidence of that kind so secured, could not be used. We think that is going very far; it is rather too fine. What would be the consequence if such evidence should be entirely excluded? You could not compel a person after his arrest to empty his pockets and disclose a weapon, when the most vital evidence on the part of the Government, in a homicide case, is the possession of the deadly weapon. Could you not compel him to open his pocket-book and exhibit papers that might be conclusive in the case of a forgery, or anything of that sort? We think that officers having a prisoner in custody have a right to acquire information about him, even by force, and that, for example, when his photograph is taken or his measurement taken, it is simply the act of the officers and is not compelling him to give evidence against himself.

Judgment affirmed.

601. Downs v. Swann. (Maryland. 1909. 111 Md. 53, 73 Atl. 653.) Schmucker, J. — The right of the police authorities to employ the Bertillon process for the identification of convicted criminals has been recognized in most, if not all, of the jurisdictions in which the subject has received consideration; although several Courts and text writers have either questioned or denied the right to subject to that process persons accused of crimes before their trial or conviction. . . . In Shaffer v. United States, 24 App. D. C. 417, . . . Shaffer had been arrested by the police of the district upon a charge of murder, and upon his trial the prosecution offered in evidence his photograph, taken for purposes of identification by the police officer who had him in custody after his arrest. The evidence was objected to on behalf of the prisoner, and, in passing upon the objection on appeal, the Court in their opinion say: . . . "This objection is founded upon the theory that the use of the photograph so obtained is in violation of the principle that a party cannot be required to testify against himself, or to furnish evidence to be so used. But we think there is no foundation for this objection. In taking and using the photographic picture there was no violation of any constitutional right. We know that it is the daily practice of the police officers and detectives of crime to use photographic pictures for the discovery and identification of criminals, and without such means many criminals would escape identification or conviction. It is one of the usual means employed in the public service of the country, and it would be a matter of regret to have its use unduly restricted upon any fanciful theory of constitutional privilege. . . . It could as well be contended that a prisoner could lawfully refuse to allow himself to be seen while in prison by a witness brought to identify him, or that he could rightfully refuse to uncover himself, or to remove a mark in Court, to enable witnesses to identify him as the party accused, as that he could rightfully refuse to allow an officer, in whose custody he remained, to set an instrument and take his likeness for the purposes of identification." . . .

For the reasons mentioned in this opinion we will affirm the order appealed from; but we must not be understood by so doing to countenance the placing in the "rogues' gallery" of the photograph of any person, not a habitual criminal, who has been arrested but not convicted on a criminal charge, or the publication under those circumstances of his Bertillon record.

602. Holt v. United States. (1910. Supreme Court. 218 U. S. 245, 31 Sup. 6.) Holmes, J. . . . Another objection is based upon an extravagant extension of the Fifth Amendment. A question arose as to whether a blouse belonged to the prisoner. A witness testified that the prisoner put it on and it fitted him. It is objected that he did this under the same duress that made his statements inadmissible, and that it should be excluded for the same reason. But the prohibition of compelling a man in a criminal Court to be witness against himself is a prohibition of the use of physical or moral compulsion to extort communications from him, not an exclusion of his body as evidence when it may be material. The objection in principle would forbid a jury to look at a prisoner and compare his features with a photograph in proof. Moreover, we need not consider how far a Court would go in compelling a man to exhibit himself. For when he is exhibited, whether voluntarily or by order, and even if the order goes too far, the evidence, if material, is competent. Adams v. New York, 192 U. S. 585.

603. Ex Parte KNEEDLER

243 Mo. 632; 147 S. W. 983

Ex parte petition by Forrest E. Kneedler for a writ of habeas corpus directed to Louis Nolte, Sheriff of the City of St. Louis. Petition denied, and petitioner remanded.

Habeas corpus to discharge petitioner from the custody of the sheriff of the city of St. Louis, who holds petitioner under a capias issued on an information based upon the following statute: . . . "Any person operating a motor vehicle who, knowing that injury has been caused to a person or property, due to the culpability of the said operator, or to accident, leaves the place of said injury or accident, without stopping and giving his name, residence, including street and street number, and operator's license number to the injured party, or to a police officer, or in case no police officer is in the vicinity of place of said injury or accident, then reporting the same to the nearest police station, or judicial officer, shall be guilty of a felony." . . . Laws 1911, p. 328, § 12. The information charges in the first count that one Ernest Combs was in charge and control of, and operating and managing, an automobile upon a street in the city of St. Louis, and then and there, by accident, struck, run over, and killed one Frank Farrar with such automobile, and that he, knowing that such injury had been caused, did then and there unlawfully and feloniously leave the place of such accident without stopping and giving his name, residence, and license number. . . .

The only question involved is whether or not the Act in question is constitutional. . . .

Kent Koerner and Glendy B. Arnold, for petitioner. Seebert G. Jones and Forrest G. Ferris, for respondent.

FERRISS, J. (after stating the case as above). The statute in question is section 12 of an act of the Legislature, approved March 9, 1911 (Session Acts 1911, p. 322), and comprising in all 16 sections, containing minute regulations and restrictions upon the use of motor vehicles on public streets and highways. . . . The section in controversy was enacted for the purpose, doubtless, of preventing those controlling and operating automobiles from concealing their identity by immediate flight from the scene of accident, and also to secure necessary aid for the injured. Therefore it requires those in charge of the vehicle to remain at the place of accident, or give their names and addresses before leaving.

There can be no question but that this Act, including section 12, is a reasonable exercise of the police power. The petitioner does not contend otherwise. His contention is that, whether reasonable or not as a police measure, it is invalid, because it violates the constitutional provision that "no person shall be compelled to testify against himself in a criminal cause." The argument is that the driver may be charged with the crime of culpable negligence, and that the information exacted by the statute in question may be used as evidence to establish his connection with the injury.

The statute is a simple police regulation. It does not make the accident a crime. If a crime is involved, it arises from some other statute. It does not attempt in terms to authorize the admission of the information as evidence in a criminal proceeding. The mere fact that the driver discloses his identity is no evidence of guilt, but rather of innocence. State v. Davis, 108 Mo. 666. On the contrary, flight is regarded as evidence of guilt. In the large majority of cases, such accidents are free from culpability. If this objection to the statute is valid, it may as well be urged against the other provisions, which require the owner and chauffeur to register their names and number, and to display the number of the vehicle in a conspicuous place thereon, thus giving evidence of identity, which is the obvious purpose of the provisions. St. Louis v. Williams, 235 Mo. 503.

We have several statutes which require persons to give information which would tend to support possible subsequent criminal charges, if introduced in evidence. Persons in charge are required to report accidents in mines and factories. Physicians must report deaths and their causes, giving their own names and addresses. Druggists must show their prescription lists. Dealers must deliver for inspection foods carried in stock. We held a law valid which required a pawnbroker to exhibit to an officer his book, wherein were registered articles received by him, against his objection based on this same constitutional provision. We held this to be a mere police regulation, not invalid, because there might be a possible criminal prosecution in which it might be attempted to use this evidence to show him to be a receiver of stolen goods. City of St. Joseph v. Levin, 128 Mo. 588. If the law which exacts this information is invalid, because such information, although in itself no evidence of guilt, might possibly lead to a charge of crime against the informant, then all regulations which involve identification may be questioned on the same ground. We are not aware of any constitutional provision designed to protect a man's conduct from judicial inquiry, or aid him in fleeing from justice.

But, even if a constitutional right be involved, it is not necessary to invalidate the statute to secure its protection. If, in this particular case, the constitutional privilege justified the refusal to give the information exacted by the statute, that question can be raised in the defense to the pending prosecution. Whether it would avail, we are not called upon to decide in this proceeding.

The petitioner relies upon State ex rel. v. Simmons Hardware Co., 109 Mo. 118, wherein we held a statute invalid which required an officer of a corporation to answer, under oath, whether the corporation had violated the statute concerning trusts and combinations, and where the statute further made a violation of such trust statute a crime. The distinction between that case and this is obvious. There the information relates directly to a crime created by the same statute, and is necessarily incriminatory, if the answer is in the affirmative. In re Conrades, 112 Mo. App. loc. cit. 41. This distinction was pointed out, also, in the Levin Case, supra.

Our attention is called to the case of People v. Rosenheimer, 70 Misc. Rep. 433, 128 N. Y. Supp. 1093, wherein the Court of General Sessions held a similar act invalid. This decision was affirmed by a divided court, three to two, in the Appellate Division. 146 App. Div. 875, 130 N. Y. Supp. 544. We regard the dissenting opinion by Ingraham, P. J., as sustained by the better reasoning. Similar statutes have been passed in Maine, New Jersey, Michigan, Florida, California, and other States. Our attention is called to no decision upon the question involved here by any Court of last resort. . . .

We cannot hold invalid this statute, imposing a proper restriction, because of its suggested possible relation to a possible criminal prosecution.

It is ordered that the petitioner be remanded.

Brown, P. J., and Kennish, J., concur.

604. HALE v. HENKEL

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. 1906

201 U. S. 43; 26 Sup. 370

THIS was an appeal from a final order of the Circuit Court, made June 18, 1905, dismissing a writ of habeas corpus, and remanding the petitioner, Hale, to the custody of the marshal.

The proceeding originated in a subpœna duces tecum, issued April 28, 1905, commanding Hale to appear before the grand jury at a time and place named, to "testify and give evidence in a certain action now pending . . . in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, between the United States of America and the American Tobacco Company and MacAndrews & Forbes Company, on the part of the United States, and that you bring with you and produce at the time and place aforesaid:

"1. All understandings, agreements, arrangements, or contracts, whether evidenced by correspondence, memoranda, formal agreements, or other writings, between MacAndrews & Forbes Company and six other firms and corporations named, from the date of the organization of the said MacAndrews & Forbes Company. . . ."

Petitioner appeared before the grand jury in obedience to the subpœna, and, before being sworn, asked to be advised of the nature of the investigation in which he had been summoned. . . . After stating his name, residence, and the fact that he was secretary and treasurer of the MacAndrews & Forbes Company, he declined to answer all other questions in regard to the business of the company, its officers, the location of its office, or its agreement or arrangements with other companies. He was thereupon advised by the assistant district attorney that this was a proceeding under the Sherman Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraint and monopolies. . . . The witness still persisted in his refusal to answer all questions. He also declined to produce the papers and documents called for in the subpœna: . . . Third. Because they might tend to incriminate him.

Whereupon the grand jury reported the matter to the Court, and made a presentment that Hale was in contempt. . . . The circuit judge held him to be in contempt, and committed him to the custody of the marshal until he should answer the questions and produce the papers. A writ of habeas corpus was thereupon sued out. . . .

Mr. De Lancey Nicoll, with whom Mr. Junius Parker and Mr. John D. Lindsay were on the brief for appellant, in this case and in No. 341, argued simultaneously herewith. . . . A corporation is entitled to the same immunities as an individual. It cannot be compelled to incriminate itself. Wigmore on Evidence, § 2259; Logan v. Penna. R. R. Co. 132 Pa. St. 403; Santa Clara County v. Railroad Company, 118 U. S. 394;

King of Sicilies v. Willcox, 7 St. Tr. (N. S.) 1049. By the express provisions of the Sherman Act corporations are deemed to be persons. Section 8. A corporation can only be examined through its officers, directors or agents. In the present case the Government undertook deliberately by that method to compel the corporation to submit to examination, not as a witness, but by forcing one of its officers and directors to produce its books and papers for the sole purpose of ascertaining whether or not the corporation had committed a crime under the Sherman Act. The rule that the protection of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments is the personal privilege of the witness and cannot be claimed for the benefit of another has no possible application to the case of an officer, director or agent of a corporation who seeks to secure to the corporation its constitutional rights and immunities; for these rights can only be asserted through its officers, directors and agents.

In this view the witness is not seeking to invoke the privilege of another, but the corporation itself invokes its own privilege in the only manner and by the only means it can employ for that purpose. . . .

Mr. Henry W. Taft, Special Assistant to the Attorney-General, with whom The Attorney-General and Mr. Felix H. Levy, Special Assistant to The Attorney-General, were on the brief, for the United States. . . .

The protection of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments is based alone upon the personal privilege of the witness. The objections urged by the witness cannot be relied upon for the benefit of the corporation of which he is an officer. . . . While sporadic cases look in a different direction, there have been many decisions, both in this country and in England, in which the courts have refused to permit the privilege to be asserted by an officer or employee in behalf of a corporation of which he is the representative. New York Life Insurance Co. v. People, 195 Ill. 430. . . .

Mr. Justice Brown, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the Court.[1] . . .

1. Appellant invokes the protection of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution, which declares that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," and in reply to various questions put to him he declined to answer, on the ground that he would thereby incriminate himself. . . . The interdiction of the 5th Amendment operates only where a witness is asked to incriminate himself, — in other words, to give testimony which may possibly expose him to a criminal charge. But if the criminality has already been taken away, the amendment ceases to apply. The criminality provided against is a present, not a past, criminality, which lingers only as a memory, and involves no present danger of prosecution. To put an extreme case, a man in his boyhood or youth may have committed acts which the law pronounces criminal; but it would never be asserted that he would thereby be made a criminal for life. It is here that the law steps in and says that if the offense be outlawed or pardoned, or its criminality has been removed by statute, the amendment ceases to apply. The extent of this immunity was fully considered by this court in Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, [post, No. 621] in which the immunity offered by Rev. Stat. § 860 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 661) was declared to be insufficient. In consequence of this decision an act was passed applicable to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission in almost the exact language of the act of February 25, 1903, above quoted. This act was declared by this Court in Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, [post, No. 622] to afford absolute immunity against prosecution for the offense to which the question related, and deprived the witness of his contitutional right to refuse to answer. Indeed, the act was passed apparently to meet the declaration in Counselman v. Hitchcock, that "a statutory enactment, to be valid, must afford absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offense to which the question relates."

[1] [Points 2, 3, and 4 are the only ones here involved. Point 1 concerns the topic of No. 623, post, — Ed.]

We need not restate the reasons given in Brown v. Walker, both in the opinion of the Court, and in the dissenting opinion, wherein all the prior authorities were reviewed, and a conclusion reached by a majority of the court, which fully covers the case under consideration. . . .

The further suggestion that the statute offers no immunity from prosecution in the State courts was also fully considered in Brown v. Walker, and held to be no answer. The converse of this was also decided in Jack v. Kansas, 199 U. S. 372, ante, 73, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 74, — namely, that the fact that an immunity granted to a witness under a State statute would not prevent a prosecution of such witness for a violation of a Federal statute did not invalidate such statute under the 14th Amendment. The question has been fully considered in England, and the conclusion reached that the only danger to be considered is one arising within the same jurisdiction and under the same sovereignty. Queen v. Boyes, 1 Best & S. 311; King of Sicilies v. Willcox, 7 St. Tr. N. S. 1049, 1068; State v. March, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 526; State v. Thomas, 98 N. C. 599, 2 Am. St. Rep. 351, 4 S. E. 518. The entire question of immunity is also exhaustively treated in Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 2255-2259. . . .

2. It is further insisted that, while the immunity statute may protect individual witnesses, it would not protect the corporation of which appellant was the agent and representative. This is true. But the answer is that it was not designed to do so. The right of a person under the 5th Amendment to refuse to incriminate himself is purely a personal privilege of the witness. It was never intended to permit him to plead the fact that some third person might be incriminated by his testimony, even though he were the agent of such person. A privilege so extensive might be used to put a stop to the examination of every witness who was called upon to testify before the grand jury with regard to the doings or business of his principal, whether such principal were an individual or a corporation. The question whether a corporation is a "person" within the meaning of this amendment really does not arise, except, perhaps, where a corporation is called upon to answer a bill of discovery, since it can only be heard by oral evidence in the person of some one of its agents or employees. The amendment is limited to a person who shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; and if he cannot set up the privilege of a third person, he certainly cannot set up the privilege of a corporation. As the combination or conspiracies provided against by the Sherman anti-trust act can ordinarily be proved only by the testimony of parties thereto, in the person of their agents or employees, the privilege claimed would practically nullify the whole act of Congress. Of what use would it be for the Legislature to declare these combinations unlawful if the judicial power may close the door of access to every available source of information upon the subject? Indeed, so strict is the rule that the privilege is a personal one that it has been held in some cases that counsel will not be allowed to make the objection. We hold that the questions should have been answered.

3. The second branch of the case relates to the nonproduction by the witness of the books and papers called for by the subpœna duces tecum. The witness put his refusal on the ground, . . . finally, because they might tend to incriminate him. . . .

Having already held that, by reason of the immunity Act of 1903, the witness could not avail himself of the 5th Amendment, it follows that he cannot set up that amendment as against the production of the books and papers, since, in respect to these, he would also be protected by the immunity Act. We think it quite clear that the search and seizure clause of the 4th Amendment was not intended to interfere with the power of courts to compel, through a subpœna duces tecum, the production, upon a trial in court, of documentary evidence. As remarked in Summers v. Moseley, 2 Cromp. & M. 477, it would be "utterly impossible to carry on the administration of justice" without this writ. The following authorities are conclusive upon this question: Amey v. Long, 9 East, 473; Bull v. Loveland, 10 Pick. 9; United States Exp. Co. v. Henderson, 69 Iowa 40, 28 N. W. 426; Greenleaf, Evidence, 469*a*.

If, whenever an officer or employee of a corporation were summoned before a grand jury as a witness he could refuse to produce the books and documents of such corporation, upon the ground that they would incriminate the corporation itself, it would result in the failure of a large number of cases where the illegal combination was determinable only upon the examination of such papers.

Conceding that the witness was an officer of the corporation under investigation, and that he was entitled to assert the rights of the corporation with respect to the production of its books and papers, we are of the opinion that there is a clear distinction in this particular between an individual and a corporation, and that the latter has no right to refuse to submit its books and papers for an examination at the suit of the State. The individual may stand upon his constitutional rights as a citizen. He is entitled to carry on his private business in his own way. His power to contract is unlimited. He owes no duty to the State or to his neighbors to divulge his business, or to open his doors to an investigation, so far as it may tend to criminate him. He owes no such duty to the State, since he receives nothing therefrom, beyond the protection of his life and property. His rights are such as existed by the law of the land long antecedent to the organization of the State, and can only be taken from him by due process of law, and in accordance with the Constitution. Among his rights are a refusal to incriminate himself, and the immunity of himself and his property from arrest or seizure except under a warrant of the law. He owes nothing to the public so long as he does not trespass upon their rights. Upon the other hand, the corporation is a creature of the State. It is presumed to be incorporated for the benefit of the public. It receives certain special privileges and franchises, and holds them subject to the laws of the State and the limitations of its charter. Its powers are limited by law. It can make no contract not authorized by its charter. Its rights to act as a corporation are only preserved to it so long as it obeys the laws of its creation. There is a reserved right in the Legislature to investigate its contracts and find out whether it has exceeded its powers. It would be a strange anomaly to hold that a State, having chartered a corporation to make use of certain franchises, could not, in the exercise of its sovereignty, inquire how these franchises had been employed, and whether they had been abused, and demand the production of the corporate books and papers for that purpose.

The defense amounts to this: That an officer of a corporation which is charged with a criminal violation of the statute, may plead the criminality of such corporation as a refusal to produce its books. To state this proposition is to answer it. While an individual may lawfully refuse to answer incriminating questions unless protected by an immunity statute, it does not follow that a corporation, vested with special privileges and franchises, may refuse to show its hand when charged with an abuse of such privileges. . . .

4. Although, for the reasons above stated, we are of the opinion that an officer of a corporation which is charged with a violation of a statute of the State of its creation, or of an Act of Congress passed in the exercise of its constitutional powers, cannot refuse to produce the books and papers of such corporation, we do not wish to be understood as holding that a corporation is not entitled to immunity, under the 4th Amendment, against unreasonable searches and seizures. A corporation is, after all, but an association of individuals under an assumed name and with a distinct legal entity. In organizing itself as a collective body it waives no constitutional immunities appropriate to such body. Its property cannot be taken without compensation. It can only be proceeded against by due process of law, and is protected, under the 14th Amendment, against unlawful discrimination. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 154, and cases cited. . . . We are also of opinion that an order for the production of books and papers may constitute an unreasonable search and seizure within the 4th Amendment. . . .

Applying the test of reasonableness to the present case, we think the subpœna duces tecum is far too sweeping in its terms to be regarded as reasonable. . . .

Of course, in view of the power of Congress over interstate commerce, to which we have adverted, we do not wish to be understood as holding that an examination of the books of a corporation, if duly authorized by act of Congress, would constitute an unreasonable search and seizure within the 4th Amendment.

But this objection to the subpœna does not go to the validity of the order remanding the petitioner, which is, therefore, affirmed.

Mr. Justice HARLAN, concurring:

I concur entirely in what is said in the opinion of the Court in reference to the powers and functions of the grand jury and as to the scope of the 5th Amendment of the Constitution. I concur also in the affirmance of the judgment; but must withhold my assent to some of the views expressed in the opinion. It seems to me that the witness was not entitled to assert, as a reason for not obeying the order of the Court, that the subpœna duces tecum was an infringement of the 4th Amendment. . . . In my opinion, a corporation — "an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law" — cannot claim the immunity given by the 4th Amendment; for it is not a part of the "people," within the meaning of that Amendment. Nor is it embraced by the word "persons" in the Amendment. . . .

Mr. Justice MCKENNA, concurring:

I concur in the judgment, but not in all the propositions declared by the Court. . . . There are certainly strong reasons for the contention that, if corporations cannot plead the immunity of the 5th Amendment, they cannot plead the immunity of the 4th Amendment. . . .

Mr. Justice BREWER, dissenting:

. . . The corporation of which the petitioner was an officer was chartered by a State, and over it the general government has no more control than over an individual citizen of that State. Its power to regulate commerce does not carry with it a right to dispense with the 4th and 5th Amendments, to unreasonably search or seize the papers of an individual or corporation engaged in such commerce, or deprive him or it of any immunity or protection secured by either Amendment.

I am authorized to say that the Chief Justice concurs in these views.

605. JOHN H. WIGMORE. Note on Hale v. Henkel. (1906. I Illinois Law Review, 43.) The Privilege of a Corporation against Self-Crimination. — In the Tobacco Trust Cases, Hale v. Henkel and McAlister v. Henkel, the Federal Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice BROWN, has declared itself for the first time upon two important points in the law of evidence, and has at the same time effectually recanted, upon another, an obiter dictum which has for two decades been disturbing the precedents and leading a few State Courts astray.

The latter point is that the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution, forbidding unreasonable searches and seizures, is distinct in scope from the Fifth Amendment, which grants the privilege against self-criminating testimony — a distinction which was ignored in Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616, where documents obtained by search were declared to be not usable in evidence under the Fifth Amendment; and that therefore when the privilege under the Fifth Amendment has been destroyed by an immunity statute, documents obtained from the accused whether by search-warrant or by subpœna, are not prevented from use in evidence by the Fourth Amendment.

Of the other two points — the novel ones — the first is that the officer of a corporation cannot plead the privilege of the corporation in refusing to produce its documents which are in his custody; this, however, was inevitably the law, and merely receives primal recognition in that Court. But, secondly, it is further declared in the opinion that a corporation cannot set up the privilege against self-crimination in refusing to produce its books, since "there is a clear distinction between an individual and a corporation." It may be questioned whether this was necessary to the decision, and whether the grounds stated are intended to make the proposition an unqualified one. But the language is express; and the ruling seems to be the first one of its kind in any jurisdiction.

What does it teach, as to the practical method for going about to procure this sort of evidence against corporations, in the proceedings now so common? The prosecutor or investigator, it is obvious, has his choice at the outset between two modes. Either he may call upon the corporation directly for its documents, or he may demand them of an officer of the corporation. If he takes the latter course, he must inevitably give immunity to the officers personally, supposing that he is a prosecuting attorney; and he runs a great risk of producing the same effect, if he is an investigating commissioner, under the recent ruling in the Chicago Packers' Case (noticed elsewhere). But if he takes the latter course, demanding from the corporation directly, he avoids these disadvantages; for the corporation has no privilege to refuse (under Hale v. Henkel, supra), and the officers, not having been personally subjected to the demand, cannot invoke their privilege, and therefore do not benefit by the immunity clause. Thus both the corporation and (most important) the officers remain liable to prosecution. Is not this the practical lesson to be drawn from these decisions?

Yet it remains to ask whether the Court's opinion has not left a vital point still unnoticed. That point is this: The privilege began, continued, and now exists at common law, independently of statute; the Constitution merely guarantees it against legislative alteration; did the Supreme Court, then, mean to say that a corporation was and is not within the privilege at common law? or did they mean to say merely that the Constitutional guarantee of it to all "persons" does not include corporations? If they meant the former, then no immunity needs to be given to, nor can be claimed, by a corporation; and Courts are free to exact everything from a corporation. But if they meant the latter, then the privilege stands, for corporations, until abolished by the Legislature; hence, if the Legislature has not abolished it, the corporation may still claim it; and hence also, if the Legislature in abolishing it has chosen (unnecessarily, to be sure) to grant immunity as an inseparable gift annexed therewith, the corporation will get the immunity when forced to relinquish the privilege. The importance of this distinction in the current attempts to investigate corporate conduct is obvious. But we doubt whether any certain light upon it is to be found in Hale v. Henkel.

Sub-topic B. Claim of the Privilege

607. Bembridge's Trial. (1783. 22 How. St. Tr. 143.) Mr. Bearcroft (arguing for the defence). It is true he was examined in a mode of inquiry in which it was not improper, perhaps, to examine him; but it cannot be doubted that the persons who did examine him saw that the questions that they put upon that occasion tended to criminate the person under that examination. What does your lordship do in that situation? What does every judge do, even down to the lowest justice of the peace, even to committee-men upon elections, whenever a question of that sort is asked of a witness? "Stop; understand that you are at your own discretion whether you will answer that question or not; you need not accuse yourself." The law of England is that no man is bound to accuse himself; and the man who administers that law best always takes care to give that caution.

608. Mayo v. Mayo. (1876. Massachusetts. 119 Mass. 290, 292.) It is within the discretion of the Court, and the usual practice, to advise a witness that he is not bound to criminate himself, where it appears necessary to protect the rights of the witness.

609. CLOYES v. THAYER

Supreme Court of New York. 1842

3 Hill 564, 566

Action on a promissory note bearing date November 27th, 1835, payable to bearer, made by the defendants and transferred to the plaintiff by Isaac Hovey, the payee. The defendants pleaded the general issue, and gave notice, in general terms, that they would prove the note to have been given to Hovey upon a usurious consideration. . . . The defendants' counsel called Isaac Hovey as a witness, and asked him if he was the original holder of the note. The witness declined answering the question, for fear, as he said, that his reply might form a link in the chain of evidence to convict him of a criminal offence. The circuit judge required the witness to answer the question and to testify in relation to the receipt by him of the alleged usury; giving as the reason for his decision that it was not an offence to take usury when the note in question was executed. The plaintiff's counsel excepted. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendants; and the plaintiff now moved for a new trial on a bill of exceptions.

T. Jenkins, for the plaintiff. B. D. Noxon, for the defendants.

Nelson, C. J. — The Court erred in compelling the payee of the note to answer questions tending to criminate himself. It was expressly held in Burns v. Kempshall (24 Wend. 360), that the answer in a like case might tend to subject him either to a penalty or to an indictment for a misdemeanor.

But the error is not available to the plaintiff. The privilege belongs exclusively to the witness, who may take advantage of it or not at his pleasure. The party to the suit cannot object. He has no right to insist upon the privilege and require the Court to exclude the evidence on that ground. The witness may waive it and testify, in spite of any objection coming from the party or his counsel. If ordered to testify in a case where he is privileged, it is a matter exclusively between the Court and the witness. The latter may stand out and be committed for contempt, or he may submit; but the party has no right to interfere or complain of the error. It would be otherwise if the Court allowed the privilege in a case where the witness had not brought himself within the rule, as the [cross-examining] party would then be improperly deprived of his testimony.

Upon the other ground, however, viz., that the notice given with the plea was defective under the statute of 1837, a new trial must be granted for the error in compelling the plaintiff to be sworn and give evidence on the question of usury. . . . New trial granted.

610. State v. Kent, alias Pancoast. (1896. 5 N. D. 516, 67 N. W. 1052.) Bartholomew, J. — With respect to an ordinary witness, counsel in the case have no legal interest in the matter of his protection. It is purely a question between the witness and the Court. Cloyes v. Thayer, 3 Hill, 564 [ante, No. 609]; Southard v. Rexford, 6 Cow. 254. Not only must the witness claim the privilege in person, but he must state under oath that the answer will tend to criminate him. See 1 Roscoe, Criminal Evidence, 232 et seq. . . .

This case, however, presents a still further complication, in that the witness was also a party, and a party most vitally interested. Generally speaking, a party to an action in Court speaks through his counsel. It is the right and duty of counsel to protect his client at every point. These considerations led the Court of Appeals in New York, in People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 571, and in the Supreme Court of Iowa, in Clifton v. Granger, 86 Iowa 573, to hold that this privilege could be claimed by counsel when the witness was also a party. But there is a practical difficulty in such a holding that was not discussed in either of these cases. The claim of privilege, when made by counsel alone, even when, as in this case, counsel says, "The privilege is claimed by both counsel and the defendant," is not, and cannot be, supported by the oath of the witness. This, as we have seen, is demanded both by authority and reason, and we can conceive of no sufficient ground to support an exception in favor of a party. State v. Wentworth, 65 Me. 234. No doubt, counsel have the right, in protecting their clients, to raise the point, and call the attention of the Court to the matter, and demand that the witness be apprised of his rights, and given an opportunity to make the claim under oath, if he so elect. We think this would be the proper method of raising the point in these cases. Of course, the witness might do it without the intervention of counsel.

611. REGINA v. GARBETT

CROWN CASES RESERVED. 1847

2 C. & K. 474, 492; 2 Cox Cr. 448; 1 Den. Cr. C. 276

FORGERY. The first count of the indictment charged the prisoner with forging a bill of exchange for £50, with intent to defraud William Booth. . . .

In the course of the trial, S. Martin, for the prosecution, proposed to give in evidence the examination of the prisoner on the trial of the civil action of Blagden v. Booth, at the Kingston Spring Assizes, 1847. . . . On that trial, the prisoner was called as a witness for the defendant; and, in his examination in chief, he had said: "This is my signature to the bill as drawer. The bill is made payable to my order. The acceptance was on it when I handed it to Mr. Phillips (the second endorser)." His cross-examination was as follows, as was proved by Mr. Corfield, the short-hand writer, by his short-hand notes: —

The stamp was never out of my possession till it was handed to Mr. Phillips.

Had you Mr. Booth's authority to accept it? — I had not.

Where did you get the stamp? — I purchased it at a shop in London, and from that time the stamp has never been out of my possession. I never received a penny for it.

Never mind what you received for it, — when was the "William Booth" put upon it? — Between the Friday and the Sunday.

What Friday and Sunday? — I believe it was between the last Friday and the last Sunday in November.

After the 21st? — Certainly after the 21st.

After the 21st of November, 46? — Certainly.

Did you communicate with Mr. Booth on the subject? — Not in any way.

Have you never done so? — Yes, I believe last Saturday week I saw Mr. Booth.

Lord DENMAN. — Was that the first time? — The first time, my Lord.

Mr. Chambers. — Why! did he not write you a letter? — Never, I never heard of his writing me a letter until I came into this Court by accident.

Until you came by accident, — what do you mean? — I came into Court in pursuance of a subpœna served three hours ago.

Who served you three hours ago? — A gentleman.

Where were you three hours ago? — At my office in King William Street, in the City.

Who is the man, — do you know him? — I do not, but I believe he is a clerk to Mr. Stuart.

Where is your office do you say? — My place of business is in King William Street.

What are you? — An attorney and solicitor.

Did you know what you came here to prove? — I did not until I came into the box.

Do you know what you are attempting to prove? — I do.

Do you mean to say it is a forgery? — It is not his handwriting.

Not in his handwriting. Who accepted it then? — I am in the hands of the Court.

Lord DENMAN. — It must be answered.

The Witness. — I state, my Lord, that I filled the bill up at Mr. Phillips's request in his own drawing-room, and handed it to him, and have never received a penny for it.

Mr. Chambers. — I ask you who did that? (pointing to the bill.) — Not Mr. Booth.

Did Mr. Phillips? — No.

Who was present when the bill was filled up? — Mr. Phillips alone.

Were there only you two present? — Mr. Booth was not present when "William Booth" was written. William Booth had been written before I filled it up in Mr. Phillips's drawing-room.

Who was present when "William Booth" was written? — I won't say — only myself.

Was any one else? — I cannot say.

I ask you to tell me whether any other person was present when "William Booth" was written besides yourself? — I believe a clerk.

What clerk? — That I decline to say.

Mr. Chambers. — My Lord, I press the question.

Lord DENMAN. (To the witness.) — That other person or you must have written it? — Precisely so.

You knew that when you uttered it? — When I handed it to Mr. Phillips I did know it and Mr. Phillips knew it too.

By Mr. Chambers. — Who was the other person? I ask the question, and I submit, my Lord, it is a proper question.

Lord DENMAN. — It must be answered.

Montagu Chambers, for the prisoner, objected to those parts of the cross-examination being given in evidence which followed the prisoner's declining to answer, and applying to the Court for protection, and the decision of Lord DENMAN, C. J., that he must answer the question.

Montagu Chambers (for the prisoner). I submit that the prisoner, when he was a witness on the trial of the case in Blagden v. Booth, was not bound to answer the question then put, which he demurred to answering, and was illegally compelled to answer.

Willes (for the prosecution). When a witness, in giving this evidence, even inadvertently states a part of a transaction, and it is essential to truth and justice that he should answer the whole, he must do so. Here the witness knew what he came to prove; he does not take advantage of his privilege, but makes certain statements to the advantage of one party, and then wishes to say no more, and insist on his privilege, which he cannot be allowed to do, as the plaintiff has a right to the whole truth.

(ROLFE, B. — If the witness says, on his oath, that he believes the answer will criminate him, can you compel him to give the answer after that? WILDE, C. J. — I have known judges over and over again tell the witness he must answer. PARKE, B. — It must appear to the judge that the answer really has some tendency to criminate the witness.)

S. Martin. — I submit that the judge has a discretion.

1. The case was afterwards considered by the judges, when a majority of their Lordships held the conviction wrong, being of opinion, that, if a witness claims the protection of the Court on the ground that his answer would tend to criminate himself, and there appears reasonable ground to believe that it would do so, he is not compellable to answer; and if obliged to answer notwithstanding, what he says must be considered to have been obtained by compulsion, and cannot afterwards be given in evidence against him. Their Lordships did not decide (as the case did not call for it) whether the mere declaration of a witness on oath, that he believed that the answer would tend to criminate him, would or would not be sufficient to protect him from answering, where sufficient other circumstances did not appear in the case to induce the judges to believe that the answer would tend to criminate the witness.

2. Their Lordships, also held, that it made no difference in the right of the witness to protection that he had before answered in part; — their Lordships being of opinion that he was entitled to claim the privilege at any stage of the inquiry, and that no answer forced from him by the presiding judge (after such a claim) could be afterwards given in evidence against him.

612. STATE v. THADEN

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1890

43 Minn. 253, 255; 45 N. W. 447

MITCHELL, J. — The defendant was jointly indicted with two others (Partello and Tall) for forgery in the second degree, by putting off as true upon one Christianson a false and forged promissory note purporting to have been executed by one Linstad. He demanded and was granted a separate trial, and the State called, as a witness in its behalf, Linstad, the person whose name was alleged to have been forged.

The first error assigned is the ruling of the trial Court in compelling this witness to answer certain questions, he having previously declined to do so, claiming that the same might tend to criminate himself. While no principle of the common law is more firmly established than that which affords a witness the privilege of refusing to answer any question which will criminate himself, yet its application is attended with practical difficulties. . . . The problem is how to administer the rule so as to afford full protection to the witness and at the same time prevent simulated excuses. All the authorities agree to the general proposition that the statement of the witness that the answer will tend to criminate himself is not necessarily conclusive, but that this is a question which the Court will determine from all the circumstances of the particular case, and the nature of the evidence which the witness is called upon to give. But the question on which the cases seem to differ is as to what we may call the burden of proof; some holding that the statement of the witness must be accepted as true, unless it affirmatively appears from the circumstances of the particular case that he is mistaken, or acts in bad faith, while other cases hold that, to entitle a witness to the privilege of silence, the Court must be able to see from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the evidence called for, that there is reasonable ground to apprehend danger to the witness, if he is compelled to answer. . . . The difference is theoretical, rather than practical; for it would be difficult to conceive of an instance where the circumstances of the case, and the nature of the evidence called for, would be entirely neutral in their probative force upon the question whether or not there was reasonable ground to apprehend that the answer might tend to criminate the witness. After consideration of the question and an examination of the authorities, our conclusion is that the best practical rule is that laid down in some of the English cases, and adopted and followed by Chief Justice Cockburn, in Reg. v. Boyes. . . . To this we would add that, when such reasonable apprehension of danger appears, then, inasmuch as the witness alone knows the nature of the answer he would give, he alone must decide whether it would criminate him. This, we think, is substantially what Chief Justice Marshall meant by his statement of the rule in the Burr trial (Robertson's Rep. I, 243):

> It is alleged that he [the witness] is and from the nature of things must be the sole judge of the effect of his answer; that he is consequently at liberty to refuse to answer any question, if he will say upon his oath that his answer to that question might criminate himself. . . . [But] there is no distinction which takes from the Court the right to consider and decide whether any direct answer to the particular question propounded could be reasonably supposed to affect the witness. There may be questions no direct answer to which could in any degree affect him; and there is no case which goes so far as to say that he is not bound to answer such questions. . . . When two principles come in conflict with each other, the Court must give them both a reasonable construction so as to preserve them both to a reasonable extent. The principle which entitles the United States to the testimony of every citizen, and the principle by which every witness is privileged not to accuse himself, can neither of them be entirely disregarded. They are believed both to be preserved to a reasonable extent, and according to the true intention of the rule and of the exception to that rule, by observing that course which, it is conceived, Courts have generally observed; it is this: When a question is propounded, it belongs to the Court to consider and decide whether any direct answer to it can implicate the witness; if this be decided in the negative, then he may answer it without violating the privilege which is secured to him by law. If a direct answer to it may criminate himself, then he must be the sole judge what his answer would be; the Court cannot participate with him in this judgment, because they cannot decide on the effect of his answer without knowing what it would be, and a disclosure of that fact to the judges would strip him of the privilege which the law allows and which he claims.

Applying this rule to the case at bar, it is very clear that no error was committed in compelling the witness Linstad to answer the questions. The sole object of the evidence sought to be elicited from him was to prove that his signature to the note was forged, and not genuine. For the purpose of proving this, counsel for the state exhibited the note to him, and asked if the name affixed was his signature. This the witness declined to answer, on the ground that it might criminate himself, and the Court held that he need not answer the question. Counsel then, with the evident purpose of proving the same fact indirectly, asked the following questions: "Have you ever seen this note before?" The witness replied, "I refuse to answer that question, because it may criminate myself;" or, as subsequently expressed, "it might have a tendency to criminate myself." The Court having ruled that he must answer, the witness replied, "Yes." Counsel then asked him, "When?" to which the witness interposed a claim of privilege in the same form as before, and, the Court having again ruled that he must answer, he replied, fixing the time he had first seen the note at a date subsequent to the date of the alleged uttering by the defendant.

Whether the rulings of the Court were consistent in sustaining the witness' claim of privilege as to the first question, and overruling it as to the other two, is immaterial. There was not a thing, either in the circumstances of the case as then presented to the Court, or in the nature of the questions, to suggest any reasonable apprehension of danger to the witness from being compelled to answer. The very nature of the offence charged against defendant negatived the idea of the witness being a party to it, and there was nothing in the character of the evidence sought to be elicited from him that would reasonably suggest any real or appreciable danger that it would or could tend to inculpate him in any other offence. The answers themselves, when given, show that they had no such effect. . . . Order affirmed.

613. PEOPLE v. TYLER

SUPREME COURT OF CALIFORNIA. 1869

36 Cal. 522, 530

AT the trial the defendant did not avail himself of the right conferred by this Act to offer himself as a witness on his own behalf. During the argument of the case, the District Attorney called the attention of the jury to the fact that the defendant had not testified in his own behalf, and argued and insisted before said jury that the silence of the defendant was a circumstance strongly indicative of defendant's guilt. Defendant's counsel objected to this course of argument, and requested the Court to require the District Attorney to refrain from urging such inference, but the Court declined to interfere, and intimated that the law justified the counsel in the course pursued. Counsel thereupon continued to urge before the jury that the silence of the defendant was a circumstance tending strongly to prove his guilt, and the counsel for the prisoner excepted. At the close of the argument of the case to the jury, the defendant's counsel asked the Court to give to the jury the following instruction: "The jury should not draw any inference to the prejudice of the defendant from the fact that he did not offer himself as a witness in his own behalf. It is optional with a defendant to do so or not, and the law does not intend that the jury should put any construction upon his silence unfavorable to him." The Court refused to give the instruction, and defendant excepted. The action of the Court in the premises is claimed to be erroneous. . . .

SAWYER, C. J. (after stating the case as above). If, at the trial, when, for all the purposes of the trial, the burden is on the People to prove the offense charged by affirmative evidence, and the defendant is entitled to rest upon his plea of not guilty, an inference of guilt could legally be drawn from his declining to go upon the stand as a witness, and again deny the charge against him in the form of testimony, he would practically, if not theoretically, by his act declining to exercise his privilege, furnish evidence of his guilt that might turn the scale and convict him. In this mode he would indirectly and practically be deprived of the option which the law gives him, and of the benefit of the provision of the law and the Constitution, which say, in substance, that he shall not be compelled to criminate himself. If the inference in question could be legally drawn, the very act of exercising his option as to going upon the stand as a witness, which he is necessarily compelled by the adoption of the statute to exercise one way or the other, would be, at least to the extent of the weight given by the jury to the inference arising from his declining to testify, a crimination of himself.

Whatever the ordinary rule of evidence with reference to inferences to be drawn from the failure of parties to produce testimony that must be in their power to give, we are satisfied that the defendant, with respect to exercising his privilege under the provisions of the Act in question, is entitled to rest in silence and security upon his plea of not guilty, and that no inference of guilt can be properly drawn against him from his declining to avail himself of the privilege conferred upon him to testify on his own behalf; that to permit such an inference would be to violate the principles and the spirit of the Constitution and the statute, and defeat rather than promote the object designed to be accomplished by the innovation in question.

614. COMMONWEALTH v. WEBSTER. (1850. Massachusetts. 5 Cush. 295, 316.) SHAW, C. J. — Where probable proof is brought of a state of facts tending to criminate the accused, the absence of evidence tending to a contrary conclusion is to be considered, — though not alone entitled to much weight; because the burden of proof lies on the accuser to make out the whole case by substantive evidence. But when a pretty stringent proof of circumstances is produced, tending to support the charge, and it is apparent that the accused is so situated that he could offer evidence of all the facts and circumstances as they existed, and show, if such was the truth, that the suspicious circumstances can be accounted for consistently with innocence, and he fails to offer such proof, the natural conclusion is that the proof, if produced, instead of rebutting would tend to sustain the charge. But this is to be cautiously applied, and only in cases where it is manifest that proofs are in the power of the accused not accessible to the prosecution.

EXCEPTIONS from Superior Court, Middlesex County; JOHN C. CROSBY and WM. F. DANA, Judges.

Elizabeth Richmond was convicted of murder, and excepts. Exceptions overruled.

J. J. Higgins, District Attorney, for the Commonwealth. R. W. Gloag, for defendant.

RUGG, J. — The defendant was indicted for murder. . . .

. . . 10. A number of people were in the house of the defendant during the period of time within which the decedent might have met his death. It was claimed that all of these persons had been called as witnesses. Commenting on this in the course of his argument, the district attorney used this language: "Is there anybody in this case whose presence or absence is unaccounted for except the one party charged with the crime? My brother . . . urges upon you the utter futility of our putting these people on the stand and asking them the pregnant question: 'Did you kill Stewart MacTavish?' . . . He utterly failed to apprehend the significance of that question, for every person that was in that house that we could find — and he candidly and frankly says we have brought them all before you — every person but one has told you under oath that they did not kill Stewart MacTavish. This is significant." Objection was made to this argument by counsel for the defendant, and the Court stated: "That will be taken care of in the charge." Thereupon the district attorney proceeded: "You have been told that the defendant is not to be prejudiced because she did not take the stand. . . . That is the last thing in the world I shall ask of you — to infer anything from the fact that she did not take the stand. And what I have just said has no relation to that except the bare fact that everybody but she has testified under oath that they did not kill MacTavish." Defendant's counsel again addressed the Court, asking that the argument be stopped. The district attorney proceeded: "If she has in her power or control any evidence which will explain where she was on Thursday night, if she has any friends that could come here and tell you where she was and what she was doing, if she has any means whatever of putting before you any evidence showing where she was and she fails to do it, we are entitled to call your attention to that failure, and you are entitled to use it as you see fit. . . . I am not asking you to infer anything from the fact that she did not take the stand. You have no right to do that. . . . But if she has within her possession or control any evidence to show that she is innocent, if she has such evidence that an innocent person would produce I am authorized to call your attention to her failure to do so, and you are entitled to consider it in this case." In the charge, the jury were instructed that although the defendant was permitted to testify in her own behalf, at her own request, she was not obliged to do so, and her failure to do so did not create any presumption against her and should not prejudice her in any way. Accurate instructions were given as to inferences which might be drawn from the defendant's failure to call other witnesses whose evidence might tend to exonerate her. At the close of the charge, the defendant's counsel asked a specific ruling that the district attorney had no right to make the argument above quoted, but the Court refused to give it.

Under the Federal Constitution and that of this Commonwealth, no person can be compelled in a criminal case to be a witness or furnish evidence against himself. Const. U. S. Amend., art. 5; Const. Mass. pt. I, art. 12. Rev. Laws, c. 175, § 20, cl. 3, provides that a defendant in any "criminal proceeding shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be allowed to testify; but his neglect or refusal to testify shall not create any presumption against him."

The fact that any defendant declines to avail himself of the privilege of testifying conferred by the statute cannot be permitted to create any presumption against him. Courts guard sedulously the constitutional and statutory rights of defendants in this respect. Attempts to infringe upon the privilege of silence thus secured to persons charged with crime are carefully checked. Com. v. Harlow, 110 Mass. 411; Com. v. Maloney, 113 Mass. 211; Com. v. Costley, 118 Mass. 1–27; Com. v. Scott, 123 Mass. 238; Com. v. Finnerty, 148 Mass. 162; Com. v. Smith, 163 Mass. 411–433; Com. v. Johnson, 175 Mass. 152. Two different courses of dealing with cases, where there has been any infraction of this rule, appear to be followed by the Courts of the several States. Some hold that any reference to the subject in argument must be presumed to do irreparable harm to the defendant, and that there must be a new trial granted unless by conduct or consent there has been a waiver of the right. The industry of the counsel for defendant has collected a large number of such cases. . . . It will be found on examination that most of these decisions rest on a statute which in express terms forbids any comment or reference to the fact in argument by either counsel. Some Courts, which have adopted this rule, seem to be breaking away from it and following a less stringent one. Blume v. State, 154 Ind. 343–354, and cases cited. Other Courts hold that, where such reference has been made and is either withdrawn or is corrected by the charge of the Court, then it does not constitute reversible error.

It is the general rule in trials of both criminal and civil causes that where an improper argument is addressed to a jury the attention of the Court should be called to it at once. Unless it is a plain breach of propriety, the Court may in his discretion either direct the objectionable argument to end forthwith or permit it to proceed, but in any event the subject must be adequately covered in the charge with such emphasis as will correct any erroneous effect. . . . No sound reason appears why this rule of practice should not apply to unwarranted arguments by a defendant to take the stand in his own behalf. It is a common knowledge that defendants may testify if they desire. Where they do not take advantage of this privilege, frequently counsel for defendants refer to the statute and to the constitutional provisions, in order to explain conduct which might otherwise seem strange to the jurors. While this does not open the door to the district attorney to reply, it shows that the subject itself is one which does not have inherent tendency to harm a defendant. The fact that a defendant has not testified cannot be banished from the observation of the jury, and it is proper that his counsel may suggest the reason for it. It is always the duty of the Court to state the law touching the matter.

It is possible that the argument of the district attorney inferentially called attention to the fact that the defendant had not testified; but it was a pertinent proposition for him to discuss that every person, so far as known, save her, had testified, who had been in such relation to the premises where the remains of the murdered man were found as to have had opportunity to commit the crime. This was germane, not for the purpose of creating a presumption against the defendant by reason of her failure to testify, but to the end that the jury might consider the circumstance that everybody else, who could have done the deed, was accounted for, if the testimony was believed. The immediate disclaimer of the district attorney of intent to urge any inferences from her failure to testify, coupled with the plain instruction of the Court in the charge in accordance with the statute and decisions abundantly protected the rights of the defendant. It must be assumed that the jury understood and acted upon the directions given by the Court. Com. v. Cunningham, 104 Mass. 545. Exceptions overruled.

617. Arthur C. Train. "The Prisoner at the Bar." (1908. 2d ed. p. 159.) What naturally interests "O. C." [1] and his fellow jurors most of all is the defendant's own story of how he came to be involved in the transaction out of which the charge against him arises. For the first few days he very probably gives such explanations rather more credit than they deserve, for he is sympathetically inclined to believe that the prisoner is more likely to be the victim of circumstances than guilty of an act of moral turpitude. The eager attitude of some of the complainants likewise gives him an excuse for believing them to be actuated by more than a mere desire to see justice done and to have the truth prevail. He is inclined to look for hidden motives for every prosecution.

This gradually wears off and his attention becomes centred on the defendant himself. Will he put in a defence? Will he testify in his own behalf? What will he say? Little by little "O. C." gets to inventing defences to fit the facts established against the prisoner by the People's case. Meantime he is learning a little law. That "the People must prove the defendant's guilt beyond every reasonable doubt," and "that no unfavorable inference must be drawn as against the defendant from his failure to testify in his own behalf." "O. C." has some difficulty with the "reasonable doubt." . . . But that he shall not permit himself to be prejudiced against a defendant by the latter's refusal to testify is a much more difficult matter. He knows it to be the law, and he tries hard to obey it, but in a majority of cases he cannot escape the subconscious deduction that if the defendant were innocent he would not hesitate to offer an explanation.

As time goes on and he gains in experience, it becomes even harder to follow the instructions of the judge in this respect. He discovers that the district attorney cannot prove the prison record or bad character of the defendant unless the latter subjects himself to cross-examination by taking the witness stand, and hence is likely to suspect that any defendant who does not testify is an ex-convict. Three jurors out of five will convict any man who is unwilling to offer an explanation of the charge against him. How they reconcile this with their oath it would be hard to understand, if they were accustomed to obey it literally in other respects. The writer has heard more than one talesman say, in discussing a verdict, "Of course we couldn't take it against him, but we knew he was guilty because he was afraid to testify." . . .

Now to any fair-minded American it must seem almost rudimentary justice that the accused should have a chance to tell his own story. That in itself is a sufficient reason for the rule [permitting him to testify]. Just why, theoretically, if a defendant does not see fit to give an explanation and subject himself to cross-examination, the jury should not be permitted to draw an unfavorable inference is not so clear.

Experience has demonstrated that an innocent man need have no fear about taking the stand. Jurors sympathize with a defendant who is subjected to a withering fire of questions, and do not expect him to be able to give a lucid account of himself since the day of his birth, or to explain without the minutest contradiction every detail in the evidence against him. But they do want him to deny his guilt, and to give them an opportunity to "size him up." On the other hand, the slightest word of explanation may suffice to change the whole complexion of a case. In the old days, the guiltiest of criminals could, almost with impunity, shield himself behind his lawyer's eloquent assertion that his client had a "perfect defence," but that the law "had sealed his lips." Today in the vast majority of cases the prisoner who does not take the stand is doomed. Out of three hundred defendants tried by the writer's associate, Mr. C. C. Nott, twenty-three failed to take the stand in cases submitted to the jury; of these twenty-one were convicted, one was acquitted, and as to one the jury disagreed.

Sub-topic C. Waiver of the Privilege

618. East India Co. v. Atkins. (1719. Chancery. 1 Stra. 168, 176.) Lord Chancellor Parker (holding valid a covenant to give discovery). It is a negative privilege that is allowed by the law, that a man may, if he please, refuse to discover a matter that will subject him to penalties. It is only a privilege, not a natural right, for then he would shake that natural right whenever he saw fit to make such discovery. If a man will waive such a privilege, surely he may; it is not a thing prohibited by the law. The reason why he is not obliged to discover is a want of right in the other party to oblige him to it; but if he will make a discovery, he may, nor is any rule of justice or natural right broken by it. Is it unjust that the whole case should be laid before the Court? If the party has not done anything contrary to his duty, an answer can do him no harm. And why should not this Court carry it so far, when there can be no prejudice unless the party is a knave? And if he be one, shall a Court of equity protect him?

620. FITZPATRICK v. UNITED STATES

178 U. S. 304; 20 Sup. 944

This was a writ of error to review the conviction of Fitzpatrick, who was jointly indicted with Henry Brooks and William Corbett for the murder of Samuel Roberts, on March 13, 1898, at Dyea, in the Territory of Alaska. . . . The Court thereupon proceeded to the trial of Fitzpatrick. . . .

A writ of error was sued in forma pauperis.

Mr. A. B. Brown, Mr. Julius Kahn and Mr. Alexander Britton, for plaintiff in error. Mr. Solicitor General, for the United States.

Mr. Justice Brown, delivered the opinion of the Court. . . .

The murder took place at Dyea, Alaska, just outside the cabin of Roberts. . . . Defendant himself was the only witness put upon the stand by the defence, who was connected with the transaction; and he was asked but a single question, and that related to his whereabouts upon the night of the murder. To this he answered: "I was up between Clancy's and Kennedy's. I had been in Clancy's up to about half-past twelve or one o'clock — about one o'clock, I guess. I went up to Kennedy's and had a few drinks with Captain Wallace and Billy Kennedy, and I told them I was getting kind of full and I was going home, and along about quarter past one Wallace brought me down about as far as Clancy's, and then he took me down to the cabin and left me in the cabin, and we wound the alarm clock and set it to go off at six o'clock, and I took off my shoes and lay down on the bunk and woke up at six o'clock in the morning, and went up the street."

On cross-examination the government was permitted, over the objection of defendant's counsel, to ask questions relating to the witness's attire on the night of the shooting, to his acquaintance with Corbett, whether Corbett had shoes of a certain kind, whether witness saw Corbett on the evening of March 12, the night preceding the shooting, whether Corbett roomed with Fitzpatrick in the latter's cabin, and whether witness saw any one else in the cabin besides Brooks and Corbett. The Court permitted this upon the theory that it was competent for the prosecution to show every movement of the prisoner during the night, the character of his dress, the places he had visited and the company he had kept.

Where an accused party waives his constitutional privilege of silence, takes the stand in his own behalf and makes his own statement, it is clear that the prosecution has a right to cross-examine him upon such statement with the same latitude as would be exercised in the case of an ordinary witness, as to the circumstances connecting him with the alleged crime. While no inference of guilt can be drawn from his refusal to avail himself of the privilege of testifying, he has no right to set forth to the jury all the facts which tend in his favor without laying himself open to a cross-examination upon these facts. The witness having sworn to an alibi, it was perfectly competent for the government to cross-examine him as to every fact which had a bearing upon his whereabouts upon the night of the murder, and as to what he did and the persons with whom he associated that night.

Indeed, we know of no reason why an accused person, who takes the stand as a witness, should not be subject to cross-examination as other witnesses are. Had another witness been placed upon the stand by the defence, and sworn that he was with the prisoner at Clancy's and Kennedy's that night, it would clearly have been competent to ask what the prisoner wore, and whether the witness saw Corbett the same night or the night before, and whether they were fellow occupants of the same room. While the Court would probably have no power of compelling an answer to any question, a refusal to answer a proper question put upon cross-examination has been held to be a proper subject of comment to the jury, State v. Ober, 52 N. H. 459; and it is also held in a large number of cases that when an accused person takes the stand in his own behalf, he is subject to impeachment like other witnesses.

If the prosecution should go farther and compel the defendant, on cross-examination, to write his own name or that of another person, when he had not testified in reference thereto in his direct examination, the case of State v. Lurch, 12 Oregon 99, is authority for saying that this would be error. It would be a clear case of the defendant being compelled to furnish original evidence against himself. State v. Saunders, 14 Oregon 300, is also authority for the proposition that he cannot be compelled to answer as to any facts not relevant to his direct examination. . . .

There was no error committed upon the trial prejudicial to the defendant, and the judgment of the District Court is therefore Affirmed.

Sub-topic D. Removal of the Privilege by Grant of Immunity

621. COUNSELMAN v. HITCHCOCK

Supreme Court of the United States. 1892

142 U. S. 547; 12 Sup. 195

On the 21st of November, 1890, while the grand jury in attendance upon the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois was engaged in investigating and inquiring into certain alleged violations, in that district, of an act of Congress entitled "An Act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, c. 103, 24 Stat. 379, and the amendments thereto, approved March 2, 1889, c. 382, 25 Stat. 855, by the officers and agents of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co., and by the officers and agents of the Chicago, St. Paul & Kansas City Railway Co., and by the officers and agents of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co., and the officers and agents of various other railroad companies having lines of road in that district, one Charles Counselman appeared before the grand jury, in response to a subpœna served upon him, and after having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

"Q. — Your name is Charles Counselman?

"A. — Yes, sir.

"Q. — You are the sole member of Charles Counselman & Co.?

"A. — Yes, sir.

"Q. — Engaged in the grain and commission business in the city of Chicago?

"A. — Yes, sir.

"Q. — Have you been a receiver of grain from the West during the past two years?

"A. — Yes, sir.

"Q. — Over what roads did you ship grain received by you during the present summer of 1890?

"A. — The Rock Island and Burlington, principally.

"Q. — From what States was most of the grain shipped?

"A. — From Kansas and Nebraska, I think. . . .

"Q. — Have you during the past year, Mr. Counselman, obtained a rate for the transportation of your grain on any of the railroads coming to Chicago, from points outside of this State, less than the tariff or open rate?

"A. — That I decline to answer, Mr. Milchrist, on the ground that it might tend to criminate me.

"Q. — During the past year have you received rates upon the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific from points outside of the State to the city of Chicago, at less than the tariff rates?

"A. — That I decline to answer on the same ground.

"Q. — I will ask you the same question with reference to the Burlington.

"A. — I answer in the same way." . . .

Thereupon, after a hearing, the Court on November 25,1890, adjudged Counselman to be in contempt of court, and made an order fining him $500 and the costs of the proceeding. . . . On December 18, the Circuit Court, held by Judge GRESHAM, delivered an opinion (44 Fed. Rep. 268), and made an order adjudging that the District Court was in the exercise of its rightful authority in doing what it had done, . . . discharging the writ of habeas corpus, and adjudging against Counselman the costs of the proceedings. He excepted to the order and appealed to this Court, and an order was made admitting him to bail pending the appeal. . . .

The statutes upon which the right to compel answers was rested were as follows: U. S. Rev. St. 1878, § 860, re-enacting St. Feb. 25, 1868, c. 13: "No pleading of a party, nor any discovery or evidence obtained from a party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding in this or any foreign country, shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture, except for perjury committed in discovering or testifying as aforesaid; St. 1887, Feb. 1, c. 104, § 9, 24 Stat. 379: In any action against a common carrier for damage under this statute, the privilege is not to excuse from testimony; "but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding;" Ib. § 12 (similar, for investigations by the Interstate Commerce Commission); St. 1891, Feb. 10, c. 128, amending St. 1887, Feb. 1, c. 104, § 12: Upon investigations by the Interstate Commerce Commission, where the aid of the Circuit Court is required to obtain testimony, "the claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying; but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding."

Mr. John N. Jewett and Mr. James C. Carter, for appellant.

Mr. Assistant Attorney-General Parker and Mr. G. M. Lambertson, for appellee. . . . Section 860 of the Revised Statutes takes away from the witness the right to refuse to answer on the ground that such answer might tend to criminate him. . . . In several cases in the Federal courts this statute has been construed as holding that the witness is not protected by the Constitution from being compelled to give testimony called for, though it might implicate him in a crime, as he is fully protected by statute against the use of such testimony on his trial. . . .

Mr. Justice BLATCHFORD, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the Court. . . . It is an ancient principle of the law of evidence, that a witness shall not be compelled, in any proceeding, to make disclosures or to give testimony which will tend to criminate him or subject him to fines, penalties, or forfeitures. . . . It remains to consider whether § 860 of the Revised Statutes removes the protection of the constitutional privilege of Counselman. . . .

Any evidence which might have been obtained from Counselman by means of his examination before the grand jury could not be given in evidence or used against him or his property in any Court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture. This, of course, protected him against the use of his testimony against him or his property in any prosecution against him or his property, in any criminal proceeding, in a court of the United States. But it had only that effect. It could not, and would not, prevent the use of his testimony to search out other testimony to be used in evidence against him or his property, in a criminal proceeding in such court. It could not prevent the obtaining and the use of witnesses and evidence which should be attributable directly to the testimony he might give under compulsion, and on which he might be convicted, when otherwise, and if he had refused to answer, he could not possibly have been convicted. The constitutional provision distinctly declares that a person shall not "be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself;" and the protection of § 860 is not coextensive with the constitutional provision. Legislation cannot detract from the privilege afforded by the Constitution. We are clearly of opinion that no statute which leaves the party or witness subject to prosecution after he answers the criminating question put to him, can have the effect of supplanting the privilege conferred by the Constitution of the United States. Section 860 of the Revised Statutes does not supply a complete protection from all the perils against which the constitutional prohibition was designed to guard, and is not a full substitute for that prohibition. In view of the constitutional provision, a statutory enactment, to be valid, must afford absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offence to which the question relates. . . . Section 860, moreover, affords no protection against that use of compelled testimony which consists in gaining therefrom a knowledge of the details of a crime, and of sources of information which may supply other means of convicting the witness or party. . . .

From a consideration of the language of the constitutional provision, and of all the authorities referred to, we are clearly of opinion that the appellant was entitled to refuse, as he did, to answer. The judgment of the Circuit Court must, therefore, be Reversed, and the case remanded to that Court, with a direction to discharge the appellant from custody, on the writ of habeas corpus.

622. BROWN v. WALKER

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. 1896

161 U. S. 591; 16 Sup. 644

THE petitioner had been subpœnaed as a witness before the grand jury, at a term of the District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania, to testify in relation to a charge then under investigation by that body against certain officers and agents of the Allegheny Valley Railway Company, for an alleged violation of the Interstate Commerce Act. Brown, the appellant, appeared for examination, in response to the subpœna, and was sworn. After testifying that he was auditor of the railway company, and that it was his duty to audit the accounts of the various officers of the company, as well as the accounts of the freight department of such company during the years 1894 and 1895, he was asked the question: "Do you know whether or not the Allegheny Valley Railway Company transported for the Union Coal Company, during the months of July, August and September, 1894, coal from any point on the Low Grade division of said railroad company to Buffalo at a less rate than the established rates in force between the terminal points at the time of such transportation?" To this question he answered: "That question, with all respect to the grand jury and yourself, I must decline to answer for the reason that my answer would tend to accuse and incriminate myself." The grand jury reported these questions and answers to the Court (BUFFINGTON, District Judge) and prayed for such order as to the Court might seem meet and proper. Upon the presentation of this report, Brown was ordered to appear and show cause why he should not answer the said questions or be adjudged in contempt; and upon the hearing of the rule to show cause, it was found that his excuses were insufficient, and he was directed to appear and answer the questions, which he declined to do. Whereupon he was adjudged to be in contempt and ordered to pay a fine of five dollars, and to be taken into custody until he should have answered the questions.

The following statute had been passed in consequence of the decision in Counselman v. Hitchcock [ante, No. 621]: St. 1893, Feb. 11, c. 83, 27 Stat. 443: "No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements and documents before the Interstate Commerce Commission, or in obedience to the subpœna of the commission, whether such subpœna be signed or issued by one or more commissioners or in any cause or proceeding, criminal or otherwise, based upon or growing out of any alleged violation of the act of Congress, entitled 'an act to regulate commerce,' approved Feb. 4, 1887, or of any amendment thereof, on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before said commission, or in obedience to its subpœna, or the subpœna of either of them, or in any such case or proceeding: Provided, that no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying." . . .

The petitioner appealed from the order. . . .

Mr. James C. Carter, for appellant. Mr. George F. Edmunds, for appellee.

[The testimony was held to be compellable, and the ruling below affirmed, by a majority of the Court, FULLER, C. J., HARLAN, BREWER, PECKHAM, and BROWN, JJ.; dissenting opinions being filed by FIELD, J., and by SHIRAS, J., for GRAY and WHITE, JJ., also. The following extracts exhibit the various reasonings accepted.]

BROWN, J. . . . If the object of the provision be to secure the witness against a criminal prosecution, which might be aided directly or indirectly by his disclosure, then, if no such prosecution be possible, — in other words, if his testimony operate as a complete pardon for the offense to which it relates, — a statute absolutely securing to him such immunity from prosecution would satisfy the demands of the clause in question. . . .

It can only be said, in general, that the clause should be construed, as it was doubtless designed, to effect a practical and beneficent purpose, — not necessarily to protect witnesses against every possible detriment which might happen to them from their testimony, nor to unduly impede, hinder, or obstruct the administration of criminal justice. . . . The same answer may be made to the suggestion that the witness is imperfectly protected by reason of the fact that he may still be prosecuted and put to the annoyance and expense of pleading his immunity by way of confession and avoidance. This is a detriment which the law does not recognize. There is a possibility that any citizen, however innocent, may be subjected to a civil or criminal prosecution, and put to the expense of defending himself; but, unless such prosecution be malicious, he is remediless, except so far as a recovery of costs may partially indemnify him. He may even be convicted of a crime, and suffer imprisonment or other punishment before his innocence is discovered; but that gives him no claim to indemnity against the State, or even against the prosecutor, if the action of the latter was taken in good faith, and in a reasonable belief that he was justified in so doing. . . .

[After noting that Congress has power to enact such a statutory amnesty to apply in State courts, and that the statute in question was intended as a general one:] But, even granting that there were still a bare possibility that, by disclosure, he might be subjected to the criminal laws of some other sovereignty, that, as Chief Justice COCKBURN said in Queen v. Boyes, 1 B. & S. 311, in reply to the argument that the witness was not protected by his pardon against an impeachment by the House of Commons, is not a real and probable danger, with reference to the ordinary operations of the law in the ordinary courts, but "a danger of an imaginary and unsubstantial character, having reference to some extraordinary and barely possible contingency, so improbable that no reasonable man would suffer it to influence his conduct." Such dangers it was never the object of the provision to obviate. . . .

The fact that the testimony may tend to degrade the witness in public estimation does not exempt him from the duty of disclosure. A person who commits a criminal act is bound to contemplate the consequences of exposure to his good name and reputation, and ought not to call upon the courts to protect that which he has himself esteemed to be of such little value. The safety and welfare of an entire community should not be put into the scale against the reputation of a self-confessed criminal, who ought not, either in justice or in good morals, to refuse to disclose that which may be of great public utility, in order that his neighbors may think well of him. The design of the constitutional privilege is not to aid the witness in vindicating his character, but to protect him against being compelled to furnish evidence to convict him of a criminal charge. If he secure legal immunity from prosecution, the possible impairment of his good name is a penalty which it is reasonable he should be compelled to pay for the common good. If it be once conceded that the fact that his testimony may tend to bring the witness into disrepute, though not to incriminate him, does not entitle him to the privilege of silence, it necessarily follows that, if it also tends to incriminate, but at the same time operates as a pardon for the offense, the fact that the disgrace remains no more entitles him to immunity in this case than in the other. . . .

The danger of extending the principle announced in Counselman v. Hitchcock is that the privilege may be put forward for a sentimental reason, or for a purely fanciful protection of the witness against an imaginary danger, and for the real purpose of securing immunity to some third person, who is interested in concealing the facts to which he would testify. Every good citizen is bound to aid in the enforcement of the law, and has no right to permit himself, under the pretext of shielding his own good name, to be made the tool of others, who are desirous of seeking shelter behind his privilege.

While the constitutional provision in question is justly regarded as one of the most valuable prerogatives of the citizen, its object is fully accomplished by the statutory immunity, and we are, therefore, of opinion that the witness was compellable to answer, and that the judgment of the Court below must be Affirmed.

Shiras, J. (dissenting). . . . All that can be said is that the witness is not protected by the provision in question from being prosecuted, but that he has been furnished with a good plea to the indictment, which will secure his acquittal. But is that true? Not unless the plea is sustained by competent evidence. His condition, then, is that he has been prosecuted, been compelled presumably, to furnish bail, and put to the trouble and expense of employing counsel and furnishing the evidence to make good his plea. . . .

Nor is it a matter of perfect assurance that a person who has compulsorily testified, before the commission, grand jury, or court, will be able, if subsequently indicted for some matter or thing concerning which he testified, to procure the evidence that will be necessary to maintain his plea. No provision is made in the law itself for the preservation of the evidence. Witnesses may die or become insane, and papers and records may be destroyed by accident or design. . . .

Another danger to which the witness is subjected by the withdrawal of the constitutional safeguard is that of a prosecution in the State courts. The same act or transaction which may be a violation of the interstate commerce act may also be an offense against a State law. Thus, in the present case, the inquiry was as to supposed rebates on freight charges. Such payments would have been in disregard of the Federal statute; but a full disclosure of all the attendant facts (and, if he testify at all, he must answer fully) might disclose that the witness had been guilty of embezzling the moneys intrusted to him for that purpose, or it might have been disclosed that he had made false entries in the books of the State corporation in whose employ he was acting. These acts would be crimes against the State, for which he might be indicted and punished, and he may have furnished, by his testimony in the Federal court or before the commission, the very facts, or, at least, clues thereto, which led to his prosecution.

Field, J (dissenting). . . . It is contended, indeed, that it was not the object of the constitutional safeguard to protect the witness against infamy and disgrace. It is urged that its sole purpose was to protect him against incriminating testimony with reference to the offense under prosecution. But we do not agree that such limited protection was all that was secured. As stated by counsel of the appellant, "it is entirely possible, and certainly not impossible, that the framers of the Constitution reasoned that, in bestowing upon witnesses in criminal cases the privilege of silence when in danger of self-incrimination, they would at the same time save him in all such cases from the shame and infamy of confessing disgraceful crimes, and thus preserve to him some measure of self-respect." . . . It is true, as counsel observes, that "both the safeguard of the Constitution and the common-law rule spring alike from that sentiment of personal self-respect, liberty, independence, and dignity which has inhabited the breasts of English-speaking peoples for centuries, and to save which they have always been ready to sacrifice many governmental facilities and conveniences. In scarcely anything has that sentiment been more manifest than in the abhorrence felt at the legal compulsion upon witnesses to make concessions which must cover the witness with lasting shame, and leave him degraded both in his own eyes and those of others. What can be more abhorrent . . . than to compel a man who has fought his way from obscurity to dignity and honor to reveal crimes of which he had repented, and of which the world was ignorant?" The essential and inherent cruelty of compelling a man to expose his own guilt is obvious to every one, and needs no illustration. . . . The counsel for the appellant justly observes that "the proud sense of personal independence which is the basis of the most valued qualities of a free citizen is sustained and cultivated by the consciousness that there are limits which even the State cannot pass in tearing open the secrets of his bosom."

624. STATE v. MURPHY

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN. 1906

128 Wis. 202; 107 N. W. 470

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Milwaukee County; ORREN T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

William Murphy was convicted of bribery, and the trial Court certified certain questions to the Supreme Court. Questions answered.

On February 1, 1904, an information was filed against the defendant charging that on the 17th day of June, 1899, he then being an alderman of the city of Milwaukee, Wis., solicited and received from Oscar F. Davis $80 for the purpose of inducing accused to vote in favor of a then pending ordinance allowing said Davis's firm to lay a side track across certain streets in said city of Milwaukee. After reversal of the first conviction (124 Wis. 635) the action was again brought to trial, the defendant having interposed both a plea of not guilty and a plea in bar, for that, before a grand jury sitting on the 9th day of January, 1902, charged with the duty of investigating such offenses, defendant attended and gave testimony as to the transactions, matters, and things alleged in the information, by reason whereof the defendant claimed he could not be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture therefor.

The case being reached for trial, defendant's attorney's . . . called the clerk of the grand jury and produced his minutes, showing that defendant was produced as a witness, sworn, and was asked and answered questions; that the minutes of testimony read thus: "Ald. Wm. Murphy, alderman Third Ward, serving second term, sworn: Know Fred Schultz, J. M. Clarke, Mr. Walker. Know of no alderman or public official demanding or receiving money to support any contract, special privilege, or franchise. Never had conversation with Schultz, or any other newspaper man, about special privilege for electric signs." . . . Thereupon defendant testified that he was subpœnaed, sworn, and examined by the district attorney; . . . "I answered these questions under oath. . . . I answered fully all questions asked me while a witness before the grand jury." . . . On cross-examination he stated that . . . he did not volunteer any evidence, only answered what he was asked and gave his testimony because he was subpœnaed to go before them and was asked questions by the prosecuting attorney, but freely and voluntarily. . . .

Thereupon, on motion of the district attorney, the Court directed the jury to find a verdict in favor of the State, which they accordingly did, and to which action defendant duly excepted. Then the trial upon the plea of not guilty proceeded and defendant was convicted of the charge set forth in the information.

Thereupon the Court, deeming that certain questions were doubtful and important, certified the following for answer, viz.: "(1) Was the evidence, all of which is herewith certified sufficient to immune the defendant under the provisions of section 4078, Rev. St. 1898, as amended by chapter 85, p. 106, Laws of 1901? [1] (2) Did the Court err in directing a verdict against the defendant and in favor of the State on the special plea in bar herein, under the evidence? . . ."

L. M. Sturdevant, Attorney General, A. C. Titus, Assistant Attorney General (Francis E. McGovern, District Attorney, and Guy D. Goff, Assistant District Attorney, of counsel), for the State. J. M. Clarke and Hoyt, Umbreit & Olwell, for defendant.

Dodge, J. (after stating the facts). In presenting the first question

[1] Wisconsin Sec. 4078, Stats. 1898, as amended by ch. 85, Laws of 1901, is as follows: "No witness or party in an action brought upon the bond of a public officer, or in an action by the state or any municipality to recover public money received or deposited with the defendant, or in any action, proceeding or examination, instituted by or in behalf of the state or any municipality, involving the official conduct of any officer thereof, shall be excused from testifying on the ground that his testimony may expose him to prosecution for any crime, misdemeanor or forfeiture. But no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter or thing concerning which he may testify, or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in such action, proceeding or examination, except a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony."

certified, counsel have discussed many general considerations bearing upon the purpose and scope of this immunity statute which, in its exact form and words, originated with Congress in Act Feb. 11, 1893, c. 83, 27 Stat. 443, U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3173.

1. The counsel for the State insists that its only purpose is to enable the obtaining of evidence which by the fourth and fifth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States a witness is privileged to withhold but for such a statute, hence that it must be construed as intending to grant immunity only broad enough to accomplish that result; only such as must be granted in order to evade the constitutional privilege of silence as to self-criminatory facts.

But must we assume that the statutory immunity is no broader than the constitutional privilege of a witness to withhold evidence which may be used against him in a criminal case? . . .

In the Packers' Case (U. S. District Court N. D. Ill., March 21, 1906) 142 Fed. 822, the Court expressed its views upon the relative scope of the constitutional privilege and the statutory immunity thus: "Now, in my judgment, the immunity law is broader than the privilege given by the Fifth Amendment, which the act was intended to substitute. The privilege of the Amendment permits a refusal to answer. The act wipes out the offense about which the witnesses might have refused to answer. The privilege permits a refusal only as to incriminating evidence. The act gives immunity for evidence of or concerning the matter covered by the indictment [testimony] and the evidence need not be self-incriminating. The privilege must be personally claimed by the witness at the time. The immunity flows to the witness by action of law and without any claim on his part." . . .

It is upon a presumption in favor of a strictly limited intent in this legislation that counsel for the State bases a contention that unless a witness resists answering a question, at least to the extent of asserting that the answer may tend to criminate him and that he claims his constitutional privilege to refuse answer, no immunity from prosecution is earned by him. To this position there are two answers: First, that the statute in terms imposes no such limitation upon the immunity, for it assures it to any person who "may testify," not who may be compelled to testify or who may testify after first refusing or protesting and asserting his constitutional right. Doubtless no criminal can immune himself by volunteering evidence without lawful demand. But a more obvious answer is that the law, giving the prosecuting officers and the investigating tribunal the power and right to demand the answer; the subpœna commanding attendance; the administering the oath, and the putting the question, deprive the witness of any privilege to withhold the information, or to effectively protest, and notify him that the tribunal absolutely demands the testimony. A declaration that he would like to assert that privilege if he had it when by the very proceeding he is warned, that he has it not, would be so entirely futile as to be puerile. What sense in his asking whether the information is insisted on when all the steps taken constitute most unambiguous insistence? Why assert a privilege when he has none? That he has none is certain, if this statute be given effect according to its terms, for it precludes the possibility of any "criminal case" in which his testimony can be "against" him in the sense forbidden by the Fifth Amendment to the Federal Constitution and, in identical words, by section 8, art. 1, Wis. Const. Walker v. Brown, supra; Hale v. Henkel (decided March 6, 1906) [ante, No. 623]. . . . We are satisfied that the circumstances under which defendant was called on to give his testimony were such as to entitle him to invoke such immunity from prosecution and punishment as the statute confers, and need not discuss the question whether one can by his own initiative and volition, without demand by any authorized person or tribunal, seek shelter under this law.

2. Another position founded on the same premise is that, because the constitutional privilege is to refrain merely from giving evidence against himself, a witness is immune from prosecution only when he gives evidence which is adverse to him. The difficulty with this position is, again, that the statute makes no such limitation; it in terms confers immunity when he testifies at all "concerning a transaction, matter or thing for, or on account of, which" prosecution may be attempted. Indeed, if limited as counsel contends, the immunity would not be as broad as the constitutional privilege, for the latter is to refuse to answer a question at all if any answer the witness might give to such question might tend to criminate him. That is by no means satisfied by immunity only when the answer given does tend to charge him with the particular crime to which he pleads it.

3. Another suggestion is made to the effect that, unless the witness tells the truth, he cannot be said to testify concerning that of which he speaks. This would involve a highly technical and unusual meaning for the word "testify," which ordinarily means the making of any statement under oath in a judicial proceeding. 8 Words & Phrases, pp. 6932, 6933. The statute itself, however, refutes any such meaning, for it expressly reserves the right to prosecute for perjury "in giving such testimony," thus recognizing that the word "testimony" is used in a sense broad enough to include statements which are false. Whatever general rules of construction should apply to this statute, whenever immunity is claimed under it, the question arises whether defendant did, in any reasonable sense, testify concerning the transaction, matter, or thing for or concerning which he is prosecuted. The strongest evidence is defendant's own testimony that he was asked "if I received any money for my vote on special privileges, bay windows, side tracks, electric light, street railway extensions — I, or any of the aldermen or city officials." This he answered in the negative. The charge in the information is that he did, on June 17, 1899, ask, solicit, demand, and receive from one Davis $80 in money for the purpose of influencing the action of the common council and of himself to grant, and vote in favor of granting privilege to lay railroad track over and across a certain public street. Did he testify concerning that transaction, matter, or thing? The very statement of the situation seems to suggest a negative answer. . . .

When that answer "No" was given, the progress of investigation to discover from this witness anything concerning the transaction now charged was checked at the very threshold, unless, indeed, the grand jury had some other information of it, so as to enable specific inquiry of the witness. We are persuaded that we should but travesty the statute should we hold that a declaration that he could give no evidence of any transactions within a general class constituted testimony concerning one. . . . For the reasons stated we are satisfied that there was absolutely no evidence that defendant did, before the grand jury, testify or produce any evidence of or concerning any transaction, matter or thing for which he is prosecuted in this case; hence that the evidence was not sufficient to immune him, and the first question certified must be answered in the negative. . . .

We answer the first question: No. We answer the second question: No. . . .

MARSHALL, J. . . . I concur in the answers to the questions certified for decision, but dissent, most emphatically, from the general exposition of the immunity statute which precedes the treatment of the particular points involved.

In view of the fact that in recent years there has been apparently great need for a vigorous prosecution and certain punishment of offenders and a significant awakening of appreciation in that regard, we must assume that the Legislature had no other purpose in passing the immunity statute than to give aid in that respect. In that light, the law, as construed in the opinion by my Brother DODGE, seems to be a most absurd enactment. If the Legislature had devoted the most careful study to the subject of how best to furnish offenders an easy method of escaping the consequences of their wrongdoing: of practically, in great measure, paralyzing the administration of justice in criminal matters, it could hardly have been more successful, if the intent embodied in the immunity law is as suggested in the opinion on file. . . . The purpose of the immunity statute was to take the place of the constitutional privilege against self-incriminatory evidence. It was designed to open the doors in just so far as such privilege would otherwise hold them closed by the right of silence. Its scope, therefore, coincides with such privilege, stopping not short of it, nor going beyond it.

The exposition of the federal statute by Justice Humphrey in the Packers' Cases, quoted from by my Brother DODGE, viewed as applicable to statutes of which ours is a type, I believe, goes altogether too far, and will not stand the test which will be applied to it.

(1) The statute does not wipe out the offense about which the witness might have refused to answer. It creates a bar to a prosecution for the offense. The offense with its attendant moral turpitude is left just the same, but by force of the statute the public is remediless.

(2) The statute is not broader than the constitutional guaranty for which it was intended to be a "substitute." The very idea of a substitute suggests the limitation of one as that of the other. In other words, that they are equivalents, one being exchanged, by force of the law, for the other.

(3) The statute does not immune because of evidence given other than that of a self-incriminatory character; such as without the statute would be obscured by the constitutional privilege of silence.

(4) For the statute to operate there must be evidence under real compulsion, not mere right of compulsion. That is, there must be coercion to the extent of the witness being called to testify under such circumstances that he would be liable to punishment as standing in defiance of the Court if he refused to do so. In that situation only does the law relieve him from the necessity of expressly claiming his privilege. Until the law then lays its hand on the party so that resistance would be a defiance of the Court, the statute does not intervene. . . .

KERWIN, J. — I concur in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice MARSHALL, in so far as it expresses dissent from the view that our own immunity statute is broader than the constitutional privilege of silence as to self-incrimination; and I concur in the view that the statute operates only in cases where evidence is given under real compulsion and concerns, in some respect, an event giving rise to a criminal prosecution, against the witness.

WINSLOW, J. (concurring). I agree fully with the conclusions reached, but not with some of the reasoning. . . .

In my judgment the immunity statute is as broad as the privilege which it was passed to obviate, and no broader. In order to gain the immunity the witness must, in my opinion, be compelled to testify. He could waive his constitutional privilege by testifying voluntarily, he can likewise waive his statutory immunity by doing the same thing. I do not think that compelling a person to appear by subpœna can properly be considered as compelling him to testify. It was not so considered with regard to the constitutional guaranty. A person might be compelled by subpœna to attend, but might testify voluntarily when so in attendance, and thus waive his privilege. In like manner I think he may waive his immunity. Otherwise the statute becomes a snare to the prosecution and a means of avoiding the just consequences of crime. I do not mean by this that it is necessary for the witness to refuse to answer, but simply that he should make known the fact that he does not testify voluntarily but only in obedience to the command of the law and the Court. When this has been done he gains immunity from prosecution on account of the transaction or matter concerning which he testifies, and not before.

In this case, therefore, I think there was no immunity on two grounds:

First, because the defendant testified voluntarily before the grand jury. He was not compelled to testify. Second, because he did not give any testimony concerning the transaction or thing for which he is now being prosecuted.

625. HEIKE v. UNITED STATES. (1912. Supreme Court. 227 U. S., — 33 Sup. 226.) HOLMES, J. . . . In favor of the broadest construction of the immunity act, it is argued that when it was passed there was an imperious popular demand that the inside working of the trusts should be investigated, and that the people and Congress cared so much to secure the necessary evidence that they were willing that some guilty persons should escape, as that reward was necessary to the end. The Government on the other hand maintains that the statute should be limited as nearly as may be by the boundaries of the constitutional privilege of which it takes the place.

Of course there is a clear distinction between an amnesty and the constitutional protection of a party from being compelled in a criminal case to be a witness against himself. Amendment V. But the obvious purpose of the statute is to make evidence available and compulsory that otherwise could not be got. We see no reason for supposing that the act offered a gratuity to crime. It should be construed, so far as its words fairly allow the construction, as coterminous with what otherwise would have been the privilege of the person concerned. We believe its policy to be the same as that of the earlier act of February 11, 1893, c. 83, 27 Stat. 443, which read: "No person shall be excused from attending and testifying," etc. "But no person shall be prosecuted," etc., as now, thus showing the correlation between constitutional right and immunity by the form. That statute was passed because an earlier one, in the language of a late case, "was not coextensive with the constitutional privilege." American Lithographic Co. v. Werckmeister, 221 U. S. 603, 611. Compare Act of February 19, 1903, c. 708, § 3, 32 Stat. 848. To illustrate, we think it plain that merely testifying to his own name, although the fact is relevant to the present indictment as well as to the previous investigation, was not enough to give the petitioner the benefit of the act. See 3 Wigmore, Evidence, § 2261.

SUB-TOPIC E. POLICY OF THE PRIVILEGE

627. MARQUIS OF NAYVE'S TRIAL. (Bourges, 1895. Albert Batailles. "Causes Criminelles et Mondaines de 1895," p. 8.) [Murder of the accused's child. The accused was a man of the best family and breeding, living at Grenoble. He was born before his parents' marriage. In 1875 he had made a rich marriage with Mlle. de Baudreuille. This lady had already in 1871 an illegitimate child, the fruit of a rape; the sum of 60,000 francs had been settled on this boy — named Menaldo — by his grandfather. By the marriage there were two sons. The wife's boy was brought up alone and privately, at Orleans. As time went on, he learned (apparently) of his parentage, grew discontented, and wished to rejoin his mother. In September, 1883, the boy was placed in a private school at Chambéry, near Grenoble; but he was still discontented and kept running away. On October, 1885, the Marquis went to Chambéry and took the boy away. About November 1, he started with him on a hurried journey into Italy, but without revealing to any one his destination. On November 9, he took the boy from Naples to Castellamare (along the coast of the bay), and they started to walk that evening from Castellamare to Sorrento, along the cliff road.

The boy was never again seen alive. The next day his mangled body was discovered at the foot of the rocks, by some fishermen. A few days later the Marquis notified his wife, from Marseilles, that the boy had strayed over the cliff and been drowned. An inquest had been held on the body, by the Naples authorities; but no clue to its identity was found, and the Marquis had left Italy without notifying the police.

For some ten years nothing further transpired. But in 1895, domestic dissensions broke out. The wife of the Marquis wrote to a magistrate, requesting his protection against her husband's violence, and charging that he had in 1885 killed her boy at Naples. The present trial then ensued, in October, 1895.

The accused was first put on the stand. Presiding Judge LAUVERJAT conducted the examination. The following passage deals with the Marquis' story of the supposed accident.]

J. — The road from Castellamare to Sorrento abuts on the sea, passing Torella, Serodio, Vico Equense, and Meta, and then strikes Sorrento, $17\frac{1}{2}$ kilometers distant. You met several hackmen on the way?

N. — Oh, I must have met 3000 or 4000 persons. There is not a road more frequented by excursionists.

J. — Why did you go on foot?

N. — Because that is some of the most wonderful scenery in Italy. . . . We walked slowly, stopping now and then to admire the views.

J. — Especially the view near Fusarella? Don't deny it, for two policemen saw you. (Sensation.)

N. — Oh, that was a spot 400 meters from the precipice.

J. — Excuse me, it was exactly above the precipice. (Sensation.)

N. — At 1.30 P.M. we arrived at Sorrento, where we lunched and visited the harbor. Then we went 3 kilometers further, to get a view of the island of Capri. Then, about 4 P.M. we took a carriage for Sorrento, and went on back to Meta.

J. — That is entirely controverted by the witnesses. You were on foot when you passed Meta. On the way back you were offered a carriage there, and you refused it.

N. — It was not till we got to Meta that we started to walk again. After resting, we started about 4.30 P.M. towards the Scutari headland. There we admired the view. It was growing dark, but we could still see our way.

J. — Some hackmen, who passed you, were surprised to see you on foot at such an hour with a child, who looked tired. Why did you refuse the carriage offered you? It would have cost only 2 or 3 francs.

N. — I wanted to enjoy the view.

J. — What view? It was dark.

N. — Excuse me. Vesuvius was in full eruption. The sight was one of incomparable beauty. . . .

J. — From Meta to Vico Equense is about 8 kilometers?

N. — At Vico Equense we had coffee. It was not quite dark; Zarilli, the man at the café, had not yet lit up.

J. — This café-keeper also observed that the boy was very tired. And no wonder; since morning you had dragged the poor fellow along with you. Zarilli was astonished to hear you refuse the carriage. What time was it when you reached the Fusarella precipice?

N. — About 6.30 P.M.

J. — The precipice is a frightful one. The road runs at the top more than 60 meters from the bottom.

N. — Oh, the whole road from Castellamare to Sorrento is like that. You can see the path very plainly.

J. — What time did you reach Vico Equense?

N. — About 5.30 or 6 P.M.

J. — Then how was it that the witness Periaro, who was walking on that road with Romano, met you and the boy about 8? They say that Menaldo [the boy] was two or three paces behind you, and seemed exhausted. . . . A third hackman, Savarese, met you and the boy, about 8; also a fourth, Balsamo, a hundred meters from the precipice; he offered to drive you to Castellamare. Why did you refuse?

N. — I did not want to ride; I wanted to see the view. . . .

J. — What happened then? Did you put the boy up on a ridge of rocks to have him admire the view, and then let him fall over? Or did you just give him a push? Whichever way you did it, it would sustain a charge of murder.

N. (quietly). — I will tell you just how it happened. . . . I stepped off the road for a few moments, and then came back. The boy was no longer there. My first thought was that he had run away. I called out, I ran after him for about 2 kilometers. I met a workman, and asked him if he had seen a little boy. He said he had not. In my running I had nearly got to Castellamare. My heart was beating fit to break. I went back over the road to where I had missed the child, but I could hear nothing, except the sound of the waves and the distant calls of the fishermen.

I spent an hour and a half thus, searching in vain. Then I resumed my route to Castellamare, with a sad heart. What could I do? Inform the magistrate? I thought of that. But the publicity would disgrace my wife before our boys. Every father will understand my feelings. There was nothing for me to do but to flee. . . . So I returned to Castellamare, and went directly on to Naples and Marseilles. I had at least saved my wife's honor. . . . And so here I am in the dock, simply because I left Italy without telling of the affair.

J. — What was your first thought about the boy?

N. — That he must have fallen over the cliff.

J. — But in your examination before the magistrate, you added: "I looked over, and could see nothing below." Are you sure that you saw nothing? Wasn't it true that you did see something? (Sensation.) The child had not fallen into the sea, as you hoped; his corpse was down there on the rocks. You hadn't known about the rocks. That was the terrible proof of your crime, and when you saw it, that was why you ran away! (Sensation.)

N. — I fled to save the honor of my wife.

J. — There were boats down in the water at the foot. You heard the voices of the fishermen, you yourself said. Why did you not call out to them?

N. — It was too far for them to hear me.

J. — You claim to have looked for the child along the road for some two hours. Well, the boy fell over about 8 P.M., and about 8.30 a hackman, Vollano, met you alone, hurrying towards Castellamare, and evading the lights of his carriage. . . . You took the first train for France. You were well rid of a child who was a burden to you, and the 60,000 francs in trust for him reverted to your wife and thus became your community property, to go afterwards to your children. Now, there was a French vice-consul at Castellamare; why did you not seek his help?

N. — I should have had to reveal my wife's disgrace.

J. — But it is not necessarily a shameful thing to have a natural child, — certainly not a life-long shame. Besides, you are a natural child yourself, and you haven't ever shown any shame over it! (Sensation.)

N. — My case was not the same at all; I had been legitimized by my parents' subsequent marriage. . . .

On the third day, the bailiff produced and exhibited to the jurors the articles found on the dead boy's person — a little black hat, white stockings, black breeches, shoes, a bloody shirt in tatters. The Marquis sat reading documents, after making the following statement.]

N. — I do not know what inferences you are going to make from my behavior here. If I show indifference, you will say that I am hard-hearted. If I weep, you will say that I am acting a part. I do not know what to do.

J. — Do just as you wish, only be sincere about it.

[The assistant judge then read the Naples report of the expert testimony about the rocks at the foot of the precipice. The testimony showed that they could not be seen, and that a person leaning over the heavy parapet would believe that there was a direct drop into the sea from the edge.]

J. — Now, if the child had fallen or thrown himself over the edge, he could not have been killed instantly. Yet you abandoned him to possible death, without trying to rescue him. That is the sort of heart you have! It was abominable!

N. — Yes, in any other circumstances, it would have been abominable to act thus. But at that time I had only a single thought, — to escape and keep silence, for the honor of my children. . . .

J. — Why did you wait till reaching Marseilles to telegraph to your wife? Why did you not telegraph to her the very night of the boy's disappearance?

N. — Well, he wasn't my child! (Sensation and much excitement.)

J. — He was Madame de Nayve's child!

N. — She had never asked me to keep her advised of what was happening to him. (Extreme excitement in Court.)

J. — So I suppose that you expected her to write to you before you would condescend to let her know that her child had disappeared, — run away in the uttermost part of Italy, with a few coppers in his pocket, when he found that you were going to take him back to France. Disappeared, you call it. Why should he run away?

N. — Twice already he had run away from the academy.

J. — But he was then in France, where the people spoke his language and he could manage to get along. . . . Did you not later admit to your wife that, to get rid of little Menaldo, you had pushed him over the cliff and then escaped?

N.— No. And she never invented that lie either. It was the priest, Abbé Rosselot, who invented it.

J. — Well, your wife is no fool, is she?

N. — No, but she is under that priest's influence.

[At this moment, the defendant was overcome by emotion, and sank to his seat, sobbing aloud, clasping his hands to his head, and weeping copiously.]

Albert Danet (counsel for defence). The defendant is quite at the end of his endurance. For the last three days he has been grilled here, and his most tender sentiments have been wrung at every moment by your examination.

J. — But I consider that I have not exceeded the limits of propriety. . . .

[On November 5th the jury retired, and after a few minutes of deliberation returned with a verdict of Not Guilty.]

628. Sir James Fitzjames Stephen. History of the Criminal Law. (1883. I, 342, 441, 535, 542, 565.) In the old ecclesiastical Courts and in the Star Chamber [the "ex officio" oath] was understood to be and was used as an oath to speak the truth on the matters objected against the defendant — an oath, in short, to accuse oneself. It was vehemently contended by those who found themselves pressed by this oath that it was against the law of God, and the law of nature, and that the maxim "nemo tenetur prodere seipsum" was agreeable to the law of God, and part of the law of nature. In this, I think, as in most other discussions of the kind, the real truth was that those who disliked the oath had usually done the things of which they were accused, and which they regarded as meritorious actions, though their judges regarded them as crimes. People always protest with passionate eagerness against being deprived of technical defences against what they regard as bad law, and such complaints often give a spurious value to technicalities when the cruelty of the laws against which they have offered protection has come to be commonly admitted. . . .

Our privilege against self-crimination is one of the most characteristic features of English criminal procedure, and it presents a marked contrast to that which is common to, I believe, all continental countries. It is, I think, highly advantageous to the guilty. It contributes greatly to the dignity and apparent humanity of a criminal trial. It effectually avoids the appearance of harshness, not to say cruelty, which often shocks an English spectator in a French court of justice; and I think that the fact that the prisoner cannot be questioned stimulates the search for independent evidence. During the discussions which took place on the Indian Code of Criminal Procedure in 1872, some observations were made on the reasons which occasionally lead native police officers to apply torture to prisoners. An experienced civil officer observed, "There is a great deal of laziness in it. It is far pleasanter to sit comfortably in the shade rubbing red pepper into a poor devil's eyes than to go about in the sun hunting up evidence." This was a new view to me, but I have no doubt of its truth. The evidence in an English trial is, I think, usually much fuller and more satisfactory than the evidence in such French trials as I have been able to study. . . .

The following account of the French practice is given by M. Hélie: "The magistrate who puts questions to the accused and asks explanations from him has the right to interrogate him for the purpose of extracting his excuse or his confession of guilt. He should, without harassing or confusing him, but at the same time while requiring a disclosure, encourage his freedom of utterance. He should, in short, with the most complete impartiality, seek solely to get at the truth. The interrogatory must be neither an argument nor a combat; that is by means of the issue. The main object is to ascertain the theory of the defence, and thus to determine the details of the issue and the points therein which are to be established." He adds, that though the interrogatory is not essential, yet the President can interrogate the accused either before or after the witnesses are heard, the former being the common course. . . .

Whatever may be the law on the subject, the fact unquestionably is that the interrogation of the accused by the President is not only the first, but is also the most prominent, conspicuous, and important part of the whole trial. Moreover, all the reports of French trials which I have seen, and I have read very many, suggest that the views taken by M. Hélie as to the proper object of the interrogatory, and the proper method of carrying it on, are not shared by the great majority of French Presidents of Cours d'Assises. The accused is cross-examined with the utmost severity, and with continual rebuke, sarcasms, and exhortations, which no counsel in an English court would be permitted by any judge who knew and did his duty to address to any witness. This appears to me to be the weakest and most objectionable part of the whole system of French criminal procedure (except parts of the law as to the functions of the jury). It cannot but make the judge a party — and what is more, a party adverse to the prisoner; and it appears to me, apart from this, to place him in a position essentially undignified and inconsistent with his other functions. . . .

This comparison of French and English criminal procedure naturally suggests the question, Which of the two is the best? To a person accustomed to the English system and to English ways of thinking and feeling there can be no comparison at all between them. However well fitted it may be for France, the French system would be utterly intolerable in England. . . . The whole temper and spirit of the French and the English differs so widely, that it would be rash for an Englishman to speak of trials in France as they actually are. We can think of the system only as it would work if transplanted into England. It may well be that it not only looks, but is, a very different thing in France. . . . The best way of comparing the working of the two systems is by comparing trials which have taken place under them. For this purpose I have given at the end of this work detailed accounts of seven celebrated trials, four English and three French, which afford strong illustrations of the results of the two systems. It seems to me that a comparison between them shows a superiority of the English system even more remarkably than any general observations which may be made on the subject. In every one of the English cases, the evidence is fuller, clearer, and infinitely more cogent than it is in any one of the French cases, — notwithstanding which, far less time was occupied by the English trials than by the French ones, and not a word was said or a step taken which any one can represent as cruel or undignified.

629. Wisconsin Branch, American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology. Report of the Committee on Trial Procedure. 1910. A majority of our committee believe that the provision in § 8, Art. I of our Constitution that "No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself" has outlived its usefulness, and should be abolished, and that thereby one hiding-place of crime would be destroyed. We have obtained the views of many active lawyers and judges on this question; and a large majority of those consulted have expressed the opinion that no innocent person would suffer and that more guilty ones would be detected and convicted if this provision could be repealed. . . .

The Constitutional provision does not so much stand in the way of the detection and punishment of crime of the lower orders (for the lower criminals no doubt would cunningly add perjury to their other crimes), as it prevents the obtaining of evidence to convict those guilty of offences such as bribery, grafting, rebating, violation of laws against combinations and similar offences, that threaten even more than the grosser crimes the foundations of good government and good order; nor so much even as it interferes at times with the obtaining of evidence in civil cases necessary to the redress of civil wrongs which may also involve some of the participants in liability to criminal prosecution. To overcome such interferences, we are fast acquiring immunity statutes, such as § 4078 granting immunity to witnesses testifying in actions brought on bonds of public officers or by the State or municipality to recover public money or property or involving official conduct, and § 4078b relating to witnesses in actions by the State to recover fees, taxes, penalties, forfeitures, etc., from the railroads, and § 4078d relating to miscarriages, etc., and other similar statutes. Cases in which such immunity is claimed have become somewhat frequent in this State. A case of national importance involving the same claim was the Packers' Case, U. S. v. Armour, 142 Fed. 808. The term "immunity bath" has become something of a reproach to our criminal procedure.

We recommend that this Institute urge upon the Legislature an amendment of the Constitution striking out the provision that "No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself;" and at the same time urge the enactment of legislation such as is suggested by "Exhibit F" hereto annexed.

We believe that a resolution to so amend the Constitution would fare better when submitted to a vote of the people if it also provided for legislation for protection of the accused about as follows: "Resolved that § 8, Art. I of the Constitution of Wisconsin be amended by striking out the words 'nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'Nor shall any person be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself until he shall first have the benefit of legal counsel to be provided as the Legislature may enact.'"

Exhibit F. A bill to amend section 4786, Wisconsin Statutes. "Section I. Section 4786, Wisconsin Statutes, is hereby amended to read: Section 4786. The magistrate before whom any person is brought upon a charge of having committed an offence shall, as soon as may be, examine the complainant and the witnesses to support the prosecution, on oath, in the presence of the party charged, in relation to any matters connected with such charge which may be deemed pertinent. He may also examine the accused and any one suspected of complicity in the offence charged; but in such case and in case any witness shall claim that his testimony may tend to incriminate himself, the accused and any witness so claiming shall have opportunity to procure counsel in attendance before giving testimony, and if destitute of means to do so, the magistrate shall appoint and secure the attendance of counsel at the expense of the county before proceeding with the testimony."

630. Arthur C. Train. Courts, Criminals, and the Camorra. (1912. p. 19.) One of the most sacred rights guaranteed to those of us who can afford to pay for it under the law is that of not being compelled to give evidence against ourselves or to testify to anything which might degrade or incriminate us. . . . Now, this is all very fine for the chap who has his lawyer at his elbow or has had some similar previous experience. He may wisely shut up like a clam and set at defiance the tortures of the third degree. But how about the poor fellow arrested on suspicion of having committed a murder, who has never heard of the legal provision in question, or, if he has, is cajoled or threatened into "answering one or two questions"? Few police officers take the trouble to warn those whom they arrest that what they say may be used against them. What is the use? . . . As his oath, that such a statement was voluntary, makes it ipso facto admissible as evidence, the statutes providing that a defendant cannot be compelled to give evidence against himself are practically nullified. . . .

The struggle to keep the peace and put down crime is a hard one anywhere. It requires a strong arm that cannot show too punctilious a regard for theoretical rights when prompt decisions have to be made and equally prompt action taken. . . . From the time a man is arrested until arraignment he is quizzed and interrogated, with a view to inducing him to admit his offence or give some evidence that may help convict him. Logically, why should not a person charged with a crime be obliged to give what explanation he can of the affair? Why should he have the privilege of silence? Doesn't he owe a duty to the public the same as any other witness? If he is innocent he has nothing to fear; if he is guilty — away with him! The French have no false ideas about such things, and at the same time they have a high regard for liberty. They merely recognize the fact that there is a point at which the interest of the public and its liberty is bound to conflict with the interest of the individual and his freedom to do as he likes. And we instinctively recognize this, too, just as everybody does. We merely cheat ourselves into thinking that our liberty is something different from French liberty because we have a lot of laws upon our statute books that are there only to be disregarded and would have to be repealed instantly if enforced.

Take, for instance, the celebrated provision of the penal laws that the failure of an accused to testify in his own behalf shall not be taken against him. Such a doctrine flies in the face of human nature. If a man sits silent when witnesses under oath accuse him of a crime, it is an inevitable inference that he has nothing to say — that no explanation of his would explain. The records show that the vast majority of accused persons who do not avail themselves of the opportunity to testify are convicted. Thus, the law which permits a defendant to testify in reality compels him to testify, and a much invoked doctrine of liberty turns out to be a privilege in name only. In France or America alike a man accused of crime sooner or later has to tell what he knows — or take his medicine. It makes little difference whether he does so under the legalized examination of a "juge d'instruction" in Paris or under the quasi-voluntary interrogations of an assistant district attorney or police inspector in New York.

631. John H. Wigmore. A Treatise on the System of Evidence in Trials at Common Law. (1905. Vol. III, § 2251.) Is the fundamental policy of the privilege against self-crimination a sound one? It has been over-worshipped and too liberally applied by the Courts. But, assuming these excesses to be corrected, is its fundamental policy correct? It represents one of two opposing systems which divide the world's practice; and its claims cannot be disposed of by superficial views or by experiences temporarily unfavorable. . . .

(1) For the preliminary inquisition of one not yet charged with an offence, the claims of the privilege seem valid. This aspect of it seems to have been ignored by Bentham. Yet it was historically this situation which gave rise to the privilege. The system of "inquisition," properly so called, signifies an examination on mere suspicion, without prior presentment, indictment, or other formal accusation; and the contest for one hundred years centred solely on the abuse of such a system. In the hands of petty bureaucrats, whether under James the First, or under Philip the Second, or in the twentieth century under an American republic, such a system is always certain to be abused.[1] The whole

[1] That these abuses are the creature of no one country or time may be seen from the extent to which the moral instincts of certain American officers were sapped by the insidious example, set before them in the Philippine Islands, of principle of the grand jury presupposes a formal and deliberate accusation, based on probable cause, before any person is called to answer for a crime. No doubt a guilty person may justly be called upon at any time, for guilt deserves no immunity. But it is the innocent that need protection. Under any system which permits John Doe to be forced to answer on the mere suspicion of an officer of the law, or on public rumor, or on secret betrayal, two abuses have always prevailed and inevitably will prevail; first, the petty judicial officer becomes a local tyrant and misuses his discretion for political or mercenary or malicious ends; secondly, a blackmail is practiced by those unscrupulous members of the community who through threats of inspiring a prosecution are able to prey upon the fears of the weak or the timid. The modern system of formal indictment needs no defence. In this aspect the privilege against self-crimination is, in history and in policy, its just complement, in so far as it exempts all persons from being compelled to disclose their supposed offences before formal process of charge is had.

(2) When we come to the case of an accused duly charged by indictment and now placed on trial, we reach a somewhat different set of considerations. Here the question is merely whether he shall be required to disclose all that he knows of the crime already charged against him. None of the considerations applicable to the foregoing situations have here any bearing. What is there to exempt the accused from simple and straightforward answers of denial, confession, or explanation? There are, to be sure, what the great jurist so plainly and truly stigmatized as the "old woman's reason" and the "fox-hunter's reason;" and there are also the false shibboleths of torture and the like, but these can only succeed in affecting us through the old rhetorical device of calling a thing by epithets which do not belong to it. So far as Bentham's argument goes, i.e., for the individual case, it is irrefutable. Assuming this man to be guilty, there is no good reason to exempt him.

There is no escape from this fundamental truth, so long as we confine ourselves to the assumption on which it rests. That assumption is that the person charged is guilty. But assume him innocent, and a different problem is presented, — a problem to which Bentham's arguments did not do justice. The truth is that the privilege exists for the sake of the innocent, — or at least for reasons irrespective of the guilt of the accused. The real objection is that any system which permits the prosecution to trust habitually to compulsory self-disclosure as a source of proof must itself suffer morally thereby. The inclination develops to rely mainly upon such evidence, and to be satisfied with an incomplete investigation of the other sources. "It is far pleasanter," said the officer in India to Sir J. Stephen (quoted above) "to sit comfortably in the shade, rubbing red pepper into a poor devil's eyes, than to go about in the sun hunting up evidence." The exercise of the power to extract answers begets a forgetfulness of the just limitations of that power. The simple and peaceful process of questioning breeds a readiness to resort to bullying and to physical force and torture. If there is a right to an answer, there soon seems to be a right to the expected answer, — that is, to a confession of guilt. Thus the legitimate use grows into the unjust abuse; ultimately, the innocent the so-called "water-cure" for extracting information. Of deplorable degeneracies, the most remarkable instance is that sons of the American Commonwealth should have attempted publicly to defend this cowardly practice, which made martyrs of its victims and degraded its practitioners to the brutal level of Alva and his cohorts.

are jeopardized by the encroachments of a bad system. Such seems to have been the course of experience in those legal systems where the privilege was not recognized.

The insidious effects of the practice in this respect may be seen in the history of the Holy Inquisition. Although the rules of the ordinary penal law of the church, even in "ex officio" inquisitions, declared a confession insufficient per se for condemnation, and hedged it about with rules, yet as soon as these rules were relaxed in the special procedure of the Holy Inquisition, the whole effort degenerated into the procurement of a confession.[1] "A confession dispensed with all other investigation and all further proceedings either by the party-accuser (when the cause was begun by complaint) or by the judge (when it was "ex officio"). One can thus understand with what zeal it was sought for in inquisitional proceedings." [2]

It may be conceded that the Continental practice is efficacious in detecting guilt. But it must also be conceded that it leads to or is found united with a spirit of petty judicial license and browbeating, dangerous to innocence, and capable of great abuses in our own community, if it once obtained a sanction. For the sake, then, not of the guilty, but of the innocent accused, and of conservative and healthy principles of judicial conduct, the privilege should be preserved.

SUB-TITLE III. PRIVILEGED RELATIONS

633. Introductory. In general the mere fact that a communication was made in express confidence, or in the implied confidence of a confidential relation, does not create a privilege. This rule is not questioned today. No pledge of privacy, nor oath of secrecy, can avail against demand for the truth in a court of justice. Accordingly, a confidential communication to a clerk, to a trustee, to a commercial agency, to a banker, to a journalist, or to any other person not holding one of the specific relations hereafter considered, is not privileged from disclosure.

But this was not always so. In the trials of the 1600s, the obligations of honor among gentlemen (and the English bench and bar were peculiarly dominated by that standard) were often put forward as a sufficient ground for maintaining silence. By the middle of the 1700s it seemed as though this notion would prevail, at any rate in certain worthy cases. The same point of view is also plain at that time in the treatment of the privilege for attorney and client, which was then supposed to rest upon the honorable obligations of the attorney, rather than upon objective considerations of policy. But a stricter view of justice finally dominated, and in the notorious Duchess of Kingston's Case [1] the older point of view was definitely abandoned and the new one thoroughly promulgated.

Since any privilege is an exception to the general liability of every person to give testimony to all facts inquired of in a court of justice, and since preponderance of extrinsic policy alone can justify the recognition of any such exception, four fundamental conditions may be predicated as necessary to the establishment of a privilege against the disclosure of communications between persons standing in a given relation. (1) The communications must originate in a confidence that they will not be disclosed; (2) This element of confidentiality must be essential to the full and satisfactory maintenance of the relation between the parties; (3) The relation must be one which in the opinion of the community ought to be sedulously fostered; and (4) The injury that would inure to the relation by the disclosure of the communications must be greater than the benefit thereby gained for the correct disposal of litigation.

These four conditions being present, a privilege may be recognized; and not otherwise. That they are present in most of the recognized privileges is plain enough; and the absence of one or more of them serves to explain why certain privileges have failed to obtain the recognition sometimes demanded for them. In the privilege for communications between Attorney and Client, for example, all four are present; and the doubt which Bentham has raised as to the policy of that privilege fixes upon the only condition therein open to dispute, namely, the fourth. In the privilege for communications between Husband and Wife, all four conditions are again present; and the chief variance of judicial opinion in defining the privilege (i.e., in holding, as some do, that the protection extends to all communications, or, as others do, to confidential communications only) is due to a question as to the fulfilment of the first condition. In the privileges for communications between Jurors and between Informer and Government, the four conditions are clearly present. In the privilege (denied at common law) for communications between Physician and Patient, the fallacy of recognizing it lies in the incorrect assumption that the second condition is generally present. In the privilege (doubted at common law) for communications between Priest and Penitent, the objection to its recognition has probably lain in a tacit denial (in England) of the third condition. In the privilege (sometimes urged) for communications sent by telegraph, the reluctance to recognize it has apparently been due to a perception that no one of the four conditions is thoroughly fulfilled.

These four conditions must serve as the foundation of policy for determining all such privileges, whether claimed or established.

Topic 1. Attorney and Client

635. GREENOUGH v. GASKELL. (1833. Chancery. 1 Myl. & K. 98, 103.) BROUGHAM, L. C. — The foundation of this rule is not difficult to discover. It is not (as has sometimes been said) on account of any particular importance which the law attributes to the business of legal professors, or any particular disposition to afford them protection (though certainly it may not be very easy to discover why a like privilege has been refused to others, and especially to medical advisers). But it is out of regard to the interests of justice, which cannot be upholden, and to the administration of justice, which cannot go on without the aid of men skilled in jurisprudence, in the practice of the Courts, and in those matters affecting rights and obligations which form the subject of all judicial proceedings. If the privilege did not exist at all, every one would be thrown upon his own legal resources. Deprived of all professional assistance, a man would not venture to consult any skillful person, or would only dare to tell his counsellor half his case. . . .

636. ANDERSON v. BANK. (1876. Chancery. L. R. 2 Ch. D. 644, 649.) JESSEL, M. R. — The object and meaning of the rule is this: That as, by reason of the complexity and difficulty of our law, litigation can only be properly conducted by professional men, it is absolutely necessary that a man, in order to prosecute his rights or defend himself from an improper claim, should have recourse to the assistance of professional lawyers, and it being so absolutely necessary, it is equally necessary, to use a vulgar phrase, that he should be able to make a clean breast of it to the gentleman whom he consults with a view to the prosecution of his claim, or the substantiating his defence against the claim of others; that he should be able to place unrestricted and unbounded confidence in the professional agent, and that the communications he so makes to him should be kept secret, unless with his consent (for it is his privilege, and not the privilege of the confidential agent), that he should be enabled properly to conduct his litigation. That is the meaning of the rule.

637. STATUTES. California (C. C. P. 1872, § 1881). There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: . . . 2. An attorney cannot, without the consent of his client, be examined as to any communication made by the client to him, or his advice given thereon in the course of professional employment; [amended by the Commissioners in 1901 by adding]: nor can an attorney's secretary, stenographer, or clerk, be examined, without the consent of his employer, concerning any fact the knowledge of which has been acquired in such capacity; but no communication is privileged under this subdivision when the same was made with the intention that it should be communicated to any person having an interest adverse to the client, or when the same was made in furtherance of a crime or fraud then being perpetrated or in contemplation.

Ibid., § 1882 [added by amendment of the Commissioners in 1901]: Consent to the giving of such testimony as is mentioned in section 1881 is conclusively implied in the following cases: 1. When the person who made any communication mentioned in that section testifies, without objection on his part, as to such communication or any part thereof, the person to whom such communication was made may be examined fully, in the same action or proceeding, as to such communication; 2. When a person employs an attorney to prepare his will, the attorney may, in any proceeding for the probate or revocation of probate of such will, testify, as to the contents of such will if lost or destroyed, and as to all information and instructions received by him from the testator, in the course of the preparation or execution of such will, and relating thereto.

638. CRAIG dem. ANNESLEY v. ANGLESEA

EXCHEQUER, IRELAND. 1743

17 Howell's State Trials, 1139, 1225, 1229

[THE preliminary facts of this case are stated ante, No. 267. It was proposed to show that the defendant, Marquis of Anglesea, by supporting the criminal prosecution for murder against the plaintiff, James Annesley, had tried to put the plaintiff out of the way, and had expressed such plans in an interview with Mr. Giffard, a solicitor. This solicitor had often been employed by the defendant, but for six months had had no affairs of his in hand, and did not expect to be employed again. On May 1 the plaintiff had killed a person, — by accident, as he claimed. On May 2, the defendant, hearing of it, sent for Mr. Giffard, and told him to go and conduct the prosecution, not disclosing the defendant's name, and incidentally made certain remarks, now offered in evidence.]

Mr. Harward (of counsel for the plaintiff). My lord, the conversation Mr. Giffard had with lord Anglesea was to this purpose; Mr. Giffard is an attorney of reputation in England, and as such has been twenty years or thereabouts employed by this noble earl in his business, as he had occasion for him. When my unfortunate client was to be tried at the Old Bailey, that was the time lord Anglesea had greatest occasion for this Mr. Giffard; and it will appear to your lordship that lord Anglesea disclosed his intentions to him in this manner: "I am advised that it is not prudent for me to appear publicly in the prosecution, but I would give 10,000*l.* to have him hanged. Mr. Jans my agent shall always attend you. I am in great distress; I am worried by my wife in Ireland; Mr. Charles Annesley is at law with me for part of my estate, and," says he, "If I cannot hang James Annesley, it is better for me to quit this kingdom and go to France, and let Jemmy have his right, if he will remit me into France 3,000*l.* a year; I will learn French before I go."

Mr. Daly (of counsel for the defendant) objects to Mr. Giffard's being examined, since as an attorney he was to keep the secrets of his client, and if he is a gentleman of character, he will not, and as an attorney he ought not to disclose them.

Mr. Recorder (for the defendant). My lord, formerly persons appeared in court themselves; but as business multiplied and became more intricate and titles more perplexed, both the distance of places and the multiplicity of business made it absolutely necessary that there should be a set of people who should stand in the place of suitors, and these persons are called attornies. Since this has been thought necessary, all people and all courts have looked upon that confidence between the party and attorney to be so great that it would be destructive to all business if attornies were to disclose the business of their clients. In many cases men hold their estates without titles; in others, by such titles, if their deeds could be got out of their hands, they must lose their fortunes. When persons become purchasers for valuable considerations, and get a deed that makes against them, they are not obliged to disclose whether they have that deed. Now, if an attorney has to be examined in every case, what man would trust an attorney with the secret of his estate, if he should be permitted to offer himself as a witness? If an attorney had it in his option to be examined, there would be an entire stop to business; nobody would trust an attorney with the state of his affairs. The reason why attornies are not to be examined to anything relating to their clients or their affairs is because they would destroy the confidence that is necessary to be preserved between them. This confidence between the employer and the person employed, is so sacred a thing, that if they were at liberty, when the present cause was over that they were employed in, to give testimony in favour of any other person, it would not answer the end for which it was instituted. The end is, that persons with safety may substitute others in their room; and therefore if you cannot ask me, you cannot ask that man; for everything said to him, is as if I had said it to myself, and he is not to answer it.

Mr. Prime Sergeant Malone (for the defendant): The mutual confidence between client and attorney require the preservation of secrecy; and as the client cannot be supposed to be qualified to distinguish what is, or is not necessary to his cause, if he should be mistaken, and entrust his attorney with what the attorney should be of opinion was unnecessary, yet surely his attorney ought not to reveal it. As clients are not versed in law affairs, they must be informed by their attorney, for which purpose they must tell them their whole case, and this necessity creates a confidence between them. . . . There seems to be no difference whether the conversation relates to the principal cause in which the attorney is concerned, or to a collateral action, in which he is not; it is in either case grounded on the confidence that arises from the attorney's being employed, and therefore ought not to be disclosed.

Mr. Serjeant Tisdall (for the plaintiff). If he is employed as an attorney in any unlawful or wicked act, his duty to the public obliges him to disclose it; no private obligations can dispense with that universal one, which lies on every member of the society, to discover every design which may be formed, contrary to the laws of the society, to destroy the public welfare. For this reason I apprehend, that if a secret, which is contrary to the public good, such as a design to commit treason, murder, or perjury, comes to the knowledge of an attorney even in a cause wherein he is concerned, the obligation to the public must dispense with the private obligation to the client.

Mr. Harward (for the plaintiff). I take the distinction to be, that where an attorney comes to the knowledge of a thing that is "malum in se," against the common rules of morality and honesty, though from his client, and necessary to procure success in the cause, yet it is no breach of trust in him to disclose it, as it can't be presumed an honest man would engage in a trust that by law prevented him from discharging that moral duty all are bound to, nor can private obligation cancel the justice owing by us to the public.

Bowes, L. C. B. . . . Admitting the policy of the law in protecting secrets disclosed by the client to his attorney, to be, as has been said, in favour of the client, and principally for his service, and that the attorney is "in loco" of the client, and therefore his trustee, does it follow from thence, that everything said by a client to his attorney falls under the same reason? I own, I think not; because there is not the same necessity upon the client to trust him in one case as in the other; and of this the Court may judge, from the particulars of the conversation. Nor do I see any propriety in supposing the same person to be trusted in one case as an attorney or agent, and in another as a common acquaintance. . . . But where the client talks to him at large as a friend, and not in the way of his profession, I think the Court is not under the same obligations to guard such secrets, though in the breast of an attorney.

Mounteney, B. — Mr. Recorder hath very properly mentioned the foundation [of the privileges] . . . that an increase of legal business, and the inabilities of parties to transact that business themselves, made it necessary for them to employ (and as the law properly expresses it, "ponere in loco suo") other persons who might transact that business for them; that this necessity introduced with it the necessity of what the law hath very justly established, an inviolable secrecy to be observed by attornies, in order to render it safe for clients to communicate to their attornies all proper instructions for the carrying on those causes which they found themselves under a necessity of intrusting to their care.

If this original principle be kept constantly in view, I think it cannot be difficult to determine either the present question or any other which may arise upon this head; for upon this principle, whatever either is, or by the party concerned can naturally be supposed, necessary to be communicated to the attorney in order to the carrying on any suit or prosecution in which he is retained, — that the attorney shall inviolably keep secret. On the other hand, whatever is not, nor can possibly by any man living be supposed to be, necessary for that purpose, that the attorney is at liberty, and in many cases — as particularly, I think, in the present case — the attorney ought to disclose. . . .

For God's sake, then, let us consider, what will be the consequence of the doctrine now laid down [by the defendant] and so earnestly contended for, that such a declaration made by any person to his attorney, ought not by that attorney to be proved? A man (without any natural call to it) promotes a prosecution against another for a capital offence; he is desirous and determined, at all events, to get him hanged; he retains an attorney to carry on the prosecution, and makes such a declaration to him as I have before mentioned (the meaning and intention of which, if the attorney hath common understanding about him, it is impossible he should mistake); he happens to be too honest a man to engage in such an affair; he declines the prosecution; but he must never discover this declaration, because he was retained as an attorney. This prosecutor applies in the same manner to a second, a third, and so on, who still refuse, but are still to keep this inviolably secret. At last, he finds an attorney wicked enough to carry this iniquitous scheme into execution. And after all, none of these persons are to be admitted to prove this, in order either to bring the guilty party to condign punishment, or to prevent the evil consequences of his crime with regard to civil property. Is this law? Is this reason? I think it is absolutely contrary to both. . . . The declaration now offered to be proved is of that nature, and so highly criminal, that, in my opinion, mankind is interested in the discovery; and whoever it was made to, attorney or not attorney, lies under an obligation to society in general, prior and superior to any obligation he can lie under to a particular individual, to make it known.

Dawson, B. . . . Nothing that came properly to the knowledge of the attorney in defence of his client's cause ought to be revealed. I will suppose an unknowing man to have twenty deeds by him, and he delivers them all to his attorney to see which were relative to the suit; he looks them over, and finds not half of them to be relative thereto. I apprehend the attorney is not compellable to disclose the contents of any one of those deeds. . . .

And I think, the Court must, in this case be satisfied, first, that what came to this man's knowledge was not necessary to his client's affairs; and in the next place, that the client could not think it necessary. . . . The motive for carrying on the prosecution against the plaintiff is said to be, because he has a right to the estate the defendant was in possession of. Can any man think that this was necessary to tell the attorney, or that the defendant could have thought it so? What was necessary, or what a man might have thought necessary, ought not to be disclosed. But if the defendant in this case had done anything further, he has trusted him, not as an attorney, but as an acquaintance.

Evidence admitted.

TRESPASS for taking two mares, a chaise and chaise harness. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and filed a brief statement alleging that he attached them as the property of David Winch. At the trial, before WILDE, J., it appeared, that the plaintiff claimed the property under a bill of sale from Winch. The defendant to prove the bill of sale fraudulent, offered in evidence the deposition of Samuel Ames, Esq., a counsellor at law in Providence. The plaintiff objected to the admission of the deposition, on the ground that Mr. Ames was employed in the transaction testified to by him, as the attorney of Winch and the plaintiff, and that all he knew in relation to it, was communicated to him in that capacity. The only evidence that Mr. Ames was so employed, was the deposition in question. Mr. Ames, in his deposition, testified that on April 6, 1831, Winch desired him to draw a conveyance of certain property attached to the Fenner tavern stand in Providence, to the plaintiff, to whom he had contracted to sell it; that he accordingly drew the conveyance; that his impression was, that a small portion of the consideration was to be paid very soon, but that the residue, amounting to the sum of $400 or $500, was secured to Winch by the plaintiff's negotiable note indorsed by one Wesson, which note also the deponent drew. The deponent further testified, that on April 30, 1831, Winch again called upon him, and informed him, that he was about to leave Providence with the purpose of residing in the State of New York; that he owed old debts in Massachusetts to a much larger amount than the value of his property; that he also owed a considerable sum in Providence, for which he was recently indebted; that his intention was, to convert what salable property he had, particularly a pair of horses and a carriage or carriages, into money, as soon as he could obtain a fair price for them, and with the proceeds to pay his Providence creditors; and that in the meantime his Massachusetts creditors pressed him, and as soon as he left Rhode Island for New York, would undoubtedly attach and sacrifice his horses and carriage or carriages. The deponent further testified, that he understood Winch, that he had left them with the plaintiff for sale, with the intention from the proceeds from the sale, to give preference to, and pay his Providence creditors, and that he wished to cover them, as far as possible, from attachment by his Massachusetts creditors; that, on the whole, as Winch had come from Massachusetts poor, and the credits he had obtained in Providence had been the means of his acquiring what little property he had, the deponent thought his preference of his Providence creditors would not be unfair, and accordingly informed him, that he was willing to draw a mortgage deed from him of the horses, carriage or carriages, to any person he might select; that Winch said, that he had perfect confidence in the plaintiff, and that the deponent accordingly drew such a mortgage deed. . . .

The objection to the admission of this deposition was overruled, and the plaintiff thereupon became nonsuit. If this ruling was wrong, the nonsuit was to be taken off, and a new trial granted; otherwise, judgment was to be rendered on the nonsuit.

The cause was argued in writing.

Merrick and Bottom for the plaintiff. . . . Where counsel are consulted as to what will the be legal effect and consequences of any particular instrument of conveyance, they are as much guarding the rights of their clients and protecting their property, as when litigation is actually in progress; and communications made by clients, in both cases, are entitled to the same privileges. The current of the decisions, and all the elementary treatises, put the rule strictly on the ground of professional consultation. They do not limit it to consultations on questions in actual or immediately contemplated litigation. It is the character of the communication which is to be considered. . . .

Newton, Lincoln and Child for the defendants. . . . It is a forced construction of this deposition to infer from it, that any application was made by Winch for legal advice in the defence of any suit. None was then pending, and it was only among the events which were possible, that any suits would be instituted. Winch certainly could not have asked legal advice, whether his creditors could commence suits. It was not his purpose to defend, if they were commenced. The conveyance of property would not affect, in any manner, the right of any creditor to recover judgment for his debt, although it might defeat the collection of it. It does not appear, that Winch asked legal advice of Mr. Ames, on any subject, or that the latter gave any legal advice; and the burden of proof is on the plaintiff, to show that Mr. Ames acted in a professional capacity. The business could have been done as well by any other person as by an attorney at law. . . .

Shaw, C. J. — The only question for the Court in the present case, is, whether the deposition of Mr. Ames was properly admitted in evidence; and this depends upon the further question, whether the matters testified to by him were to be considered as within the rule of privileged communications. . . . There are many cases, in which an attorney is employed in transacting business, not properly professional, and where the same might have been transacted by another agent. In such case the fact that the agent sustains the character of an attorney, does not render the communications attending it, privileged; and they may be testified to by him, as by any other agent.

We cannot perceive that the communications were made to [the attorney, Mr. Ames,] by Winch with the purpose of instructing him in any cause, or engaging him in the conduct of any professional business, or of obtaining any legal advice or opinion. If the disclosure of his views and purposes, in the conveyance of property proposed to be drawn, was not, as stated in some of the books, a mere "gratis dictum," the only purpose seems to have been to satisfy Mr. Ames' mind, and remove any scruple that he might entertain, as to the character of the transaction, and to convince him, that whatever might be the legal character of the act, it was not intended with moral turpitude. It did satisfy him, that he was not to be engaged in a conspiracy to cheat, and induced him to consent to draw the deed. Here was no legal advice asked, no opinion requested as to the effect and operation of such a conveyance in point of law, and none given. We are therefore necessarily brought to the conclusion, that either these disclosures were made without any particular motive, or if there was a purpose, connected with the proposed draft, it was to satisfy Mr. Ames' mind, upon a point of fact, not for the information of his own in point of law, and in either event they are not to be deemed privileged communications, which the witness was prohibited from disclosing.

The whole deposition therefore was rightly admitted, and conformably to the case agreed, the nonsuit must stand.

ACTION of assumpsit on an account annexed to the writ.

At the trial in the court of common pleas, before HOAR, J., the defendant called Stephen Holman, as a witness, and proposed to inquire of him as to a conversation between him and the plaintiff, which took place in the office of Milton Whitney, Esq., an attorney of this court, before the commencement of the suit. The witness having stated that at the time of the conversation, he was a student at law in Whitney's office; that the plaintiff called there for professional advice; that he did not know but the plaintiff supposed him to be Mr. Whitney; and that the conversation was relative to the plaintiff's claims against the defendant, as to which the plaintiff consulted the witness; the judge ruled, that it was not competent for the witness to testify as to any statements then made to him by the plaintiff, for the purpose of obtaining professional advice.

Whitney was not present at the conversation; he was not the attorney for the plaintiff in this suit; and it did not appear that the plaintiff had ever before consulted him. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleged exceptions. . . .

METCALF, J. — The testimony of the witness was excluded, probably, either on the ground that he was a student in an attorney's office, and therefore the communication made to him by the plaintiff was privileged, as if made to the attorney himself, or on the ground that the plaintiff supposed that the witness was an attorney at law. But, in our judgment, the testimony ought not to have been excluded on any ground. . . . Lord BROUGHAM says, (1 Mylne & Keen 103,) "the rule is established out of regard to the interests of justice, which cannot be upholden, and to the administration of justice, which cannot go on, without the aid of men skilled in jurisprudence, in the practice of the courts, and in those matters affecting rights and obligations, which form the subject of all judicial proceedings. If the privilege did not exist at all, every one would be thrown upon his own legal resources." Such being the reason of the rule which protects communications made to attorneys and counsel, the Court should apply the rule to those cases only which fall within that reason. And it is truly said, in Harrison on Evidence, 36, that as the rule operates to the exclusion of evidence, the Courts have always felt inclined to construe it strictly and narrow its effect. We believe the rule is correctly stated in Foster v. Hall, 12 Pick. 93; viz. that it "is confined strictly to communications to members of the legal profession, as barristers and counsellors, attorneys and solicitors, and those whose intervention is necessary to secure and facilitate the communication between attorney and client; as interpreters, agents, and attorneys' clerks."

The witness, in this case, was not of the legal profession, and though he was a student in an attorney's office, yet it does not appear that he was either the attorney's agent or clerk for any purpose. Many students at law are never either the one or the other. Some of the members of this Court never were. If the plaintiff's communication was made to the witness in his capacity as a student in Mr. Whitney's office, it is not privileged; Andrews v. Solomon (Peters C. C. 356); nor if it was made on the supposition that the witness was Mr. Whitney or some other attorney at law (Fountain v. Young, 6 Esp. R. 113).

641. MITCHELL'S CASE

COMMON PLEAS, NEW YORK. 1861

12 Abb. Pr. 249

APPEAL from an order of commitment for contempt. Mr. Mitchell was an attorney and counsellor-at-law, and was, as such, retained by, and acting for, one McKechnie, who was the defendant in an action brought by J. H. McCunn and J. Moncrief, in the Court of Common Pleas for the city and county of New York, to recover from McKechnie the possession of a certain lot of land in that city.

Upon the trial of that action before his honor, Judge BRADY, one Bettz was examined as a witness for the defendant, and upon examination testified that he, Bettz, claimed the title to the land, that the defendant, McKechnie was his tenant, and that he, Bettz, was defending the action as landlord of the defendant; and being asked whether he had in his possession any old deeds, leases, or assignments relating to the land, he answered that he had received from his grantors a certain old lease and other papers, which he had kept in his possession until a few days before the trial, when he had delivered them to John W. Mitchell, his attorney, and the attorney of the defendant in the action; and being asked to produce the said old lease and other papers, he answered that he was unable to do so, because they were in Mr. Mitchell's possession. Mr. Mitchell was then in court, acting as the attorney and counsel of the defendant on the trial. He was thereupon called as a witness by the plaintiffs, and on his examination, being asked: "Have you in your possession any old leases or deeds relating to this property, placed there by Mr. Bettz?" replied, that he had some papers of Mr. Bettz's, but that he did not know what they were; and on being requested by the Court to examine the papers and see, he declined to do so, objecting on the grounds that he was privileged from testifying as to such matters, they having come to his knowledge from his client, that he had not been subpœnaed, and that he had had no notice to produce the papers. During a brief suspension of the proceedings pending this examination, Mr. Mitchell delivered the bundle of papers to Mr. Bettz, with a suggestion that he carry them to the office of his counsel. After the proceedings were resumed, this fact appearing upon the continued examination of Mr. Mitchell, the plaintiffs applied for an attachment for contempt against him; but it was finally arranged that the application should be suspended, and the case adjourned, upon a stipulation that Mr. Mitchell should appear on the adjourned day with the papers in the same. On the same day Mr. Mitchell was served by the plaintiffs with subpœna duces tecum, requiring him to produce the papers on the adjourned day. After the adjournment, the parties appeared on the 27th of May, and Mr. Mitchell, being called to the stand and asked if he had brought with him the bundle of papers in question, replied that he had. Being requested to look at them, and inform the Court whether they had related to the lands in suit, he refused to do so. The Court thereupon ordered the witness to be committed for ten days to the county jail, for contempt of court. From this order the present appeal was taken. . . .

DALY, F. J. — Before the important change in the law requiring a party to an action to be examined as a witness at the instance of the adverse party, the general principle was recognized, that no one in a court of law could be compelled to give evidence against himself. . . . The principle of exemption was applied in its broadest extent to parties to actions at law, who could not be compelled to give evidence; and in respect to the production of documentary testimony, as a party to an action was not bound to give evidence, he could not be required to produce papers to be used against him as evidence; and if a paper had been deposited by him with his attorney, the attorney's possession was deemed the possession of the party, and the attorney could not be required to produce it, nor even any other person having the temporary possession of it in right of the party. If a document was in the possession of the party to an action at law, or in the possession of his attorney, all that could be done was to give him notice to produce it; and if he failed to do so, the other party was at liberty to give secondary evidence of its contents; or if the production of the document itself was essential, and he would not produce it, the Court would, if he was a defendant, strike out his answer, or if a plaintiff, nonsuit him — a practice introduced into courts of law from the Court of Chancery. But the attorney might be called, and was bound to answer whether or not he had the paper in his possession, that the other party might be enabled to give secondary evidence of its contents, which he could not do until he had first shown that he was unable to produce it; and though the attorney could not be required to disclose the contents of the paper, his examination might be carried at least so far as to show, with reasonable certainty, that the document in his possession was the one respecting which the other party proposed to give evidence. . . . The rule was also well established, that neither a party nor his legal adviser would be compelled in a court of justice to disclose the confidential communication which had passed between them in respect to the matter upon which the party had sought professional advice. The principle which appears to have been recognized as far back as the days of Elizabeth (Cary's R., 127, 88, 89), was not confined to courts of law, but was equally acted upon by the Court of Chancery, where the aid of that court was sought to compel a discovery of evidence. On an application for a discovery, a Court of equity would neither compel nor permit a solicitor to disclose what his client had communicated to him in professional confidence, nor compel the production of letters which had passed between them, or through intermediate agents upon the business, containing or asking legal advice or opinions, nor cases prepared at the instance of the client for the opinion of the counsel. . . .

Such was the state of the law before the enactment of the provision compelling parties to action to be examined as witnesses at the instance of an adverse party. The provision has brought about a very material change.

1. But before proceeding to inquire into the effect of the enactment upon the question of privilege, it is very plain, that by the law, as it stood before this change was made, the conduct of Mr. Mitchell amounted to a contempt. His refusing to produce papers acknowledged to be in his possession, for the reason that it would be a breach of his privilege as attorney for the defendant, was assuming the right of determining for himself the question of privilege, which was not his province, but that of the Court; and his disobedience of the order of the judge to produce them, was a very plain case of contempt, upon the authority of the cases that have been cited. It was a contempt to wilfully deprive the Court of the means of determining whether the principle of protection extended to the papers in his possession or not, and it would not be the less a case of contempt, even assuming that, upon what was stated to the Court, a case of privilege was shown; for though a judge should decide erroneously upon the question of privilege, the order he makes is nevertheless to be obeyed. If it were otherwise, it would always be in the power of a witness to withhold evidence whenever he thought fit to consider himself privileged.

2. But Mr. Mitchell was mistaken, since the enactment above referred to, in supposing that he had any privilege at all. The exemption of the attorney was never regarded as his personal privilege, but as existing purely for the protection of his client. . . . He was, in this respect, in the language of Chief Baron Gilbert, "considered as one and the same person with his client" (Gilbert on Evidence, 138); and if, by a change in the law, a party to an action has no longer any privilege, it follows as a matter of course, that his attorney can have none. The provision in question declares, that "a party to an action may be examined as a witness, at the instance of the adverse party, and for that purpose may be compelled to testify in the same manner, and subject to the same rules of examination, as any other witness." This sweeps away the rule of the common law, that parties to actions should not be compelled to give evidence against themselves; and every privilege, either of the party of or his attorney, that was founded upon it, is gone. I suppose that the protection that was extended to the confidential communications between attorney and client remains unaffected, as the reason upon which that rule was founded is as applicable now as it was before; but with this exception, a party to an action, or his attorney, are no longer privileged to withhold testimony. A party to an action may be compelled, by a subpœna duces tecum, to produce papers and documents, upon the trial, to be read in evidence. . . . When the Code, therefore, declares that a party to an action may be compelled to testify in the same manner, and subject to the same rules of examination, as other witnesses, it is obvious that the meaning is, that whatever may be required of other witnesses may be required of him. If they must produce books and papers, so must he; and if he has placed them in the possession of his attorney, agent, or any other person, the one who has them in actual custody may be compelled to bring them before the court, to be used as evidence. . . . The general rule of courts of equity that wherever the client may be called upon to produce papers, the attorney, if they are in his possession, may be required to produce them, is the proper rule, now that parties to actions are made witnesses.

There may possibly be cases in which the deposit of a document with an attorney for advice and counsel, may bring it within the rule of protection; though I can conceive of none, if the client would himself be bound, if he had it in his possession, to produce it as a witness. In this case, however, there could be no pretence that the papers in question were left by the witness Bettz with Mitchell for professional advice and counsel, as Mitchell declared that he could not tell what they were without examining them; nor, when first interrogated respecting them, whether he had them in his possession or not, without looking into a bundle of papers which he had with him in court. He was, therefore, either ignorant of their nature and contents, or else he stated what was untrue. We are bound to presume the former; and if he did not therefore know what they were, the fact that they were left with him in professional confidence would not protect them. . . . Mr. Mitchell did not declare that the papers had been left with him by Bettz for professional advice or assistance, but he put his objection on the ground that to produce them would be a breach of his privilege as attorney for the defendant. They were not placed in his hands by the defendant, but by the witness Bettz; and if any privilege could exist, it must have been as the attorney of Bettz, who, as the owner of the land, was defending the suit against his tenant; but he had no privilege either as the legal adviser of Bettz, or as the attorney of the defendant. Either of them could have been examined as witnesses, and required, if they had the papers in their possession, to produce them; and he could have no privilege where they had none.

Upon both grounds, therefore, it was a case of contempt: first, because it was right of the judge to determine whether there was any privilege or not, and the duty of the witness to be governed by his decision; and secondly, because he had no privilege entitling him to withhold the papers in his possession from being given in evidence.

L. R. 9 Exch. 298

RULE to vary an order for inspection, made at Chambers by KEATING, J., in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the defendants' negligence, whilst he was traveling as a passenger on their line. The document of which inspection was ordered comprised, amongst others, two reports, dated respectively the 15th of December, 1873, and the 4th of February, 1874, made to the defendants by Mr. Jackson, their medical officer, after examining the plaintiff. The examinations to which the reports referred were held, and the reports were made, before any action had been commenced or any communication made by the plaintiff's attorney, but after a claim for compensation had been made by the plaintiff and in consequence of that claim. The rule was to vary the order by excluding these reports.

Pritchard shewed cause. The decisions in the Courts of Queen's Bench and the Common Pleas, with respect to this class of documents, are not altogether consistent; in this Court there is no reported decision.

(Bramwell, B. — The distinction is this; where an accident happens, and the officials of the company in the course of their ordinary duty, whether before or after action brought, make a report to the company that report is subject to inspection; but where a claim has been made, and the company seek to inform themselves by a medical examination as to the condition of the person making the claim, inspection of that report is not granted; that practice has been constantly followed in this Court.)

Pritchard. — In Fenner v. London & South Eastern Ry. Co. (post), which was a considered judgment, and is the latest case on the subject, a wider rule was adopted, and it was laid down that a document of this nature is not privileged unless it is in the nature of instructions for the brief, which the judge will ascertain by examination of the document itself. That rule was acted upon in the present case by Keating, J., who perused the reports before he made the order for their inspection. That rule is not inconsistent with Woolley v. North London Ry. Co., Law Rep. 4 C. P. 602. It must be admitted that the rule acted on in the later case of Cossey v. London, Brighton & South Coast Ry. Co., Law Rep. 5. C. P. 146, would exclude these reports; but Fenner v. London & South Eastern Ry. Co., Law Rep. 7. Q. B. 767, is later than both of these cases, and was decided after a full consideration and review of them and of numerous other authorities.

F. M. White was not called on to support the rule.

Bramwell, B. — We have to choose between the decision of the Queen's Bench and that of the Common Pleas, and we follow the latter, which is in conformity with the practice of this Court. The rule must be made absolute.

Pigott, B. — The case of Cossey v. London, Brighton & South Coast Ry. Co. lays down a clear, broad, and intelligible principle, which there is no difficulty in acting upon; but if that is departed from, and the matter is made to turn upon the discretion of the judge, there can be no certainty in the practice.

Cleasby and Amphlett, BB., concurred.

Rule absolute.

Note. — (1). Fenner v. London and South Eastern R. Co. Blackburn, J. — This was a rule obtained by Mr. Willis, to vary an order made by me at chambers, for the inspection of certain documents, scheduled by the officer of the defendants. Before me at chambers, the only affidavit used was that of Mr. Noden, the goods manager of the defendants. The material part of this affidavit was as follows: —

"That the company have in their possession, or under their control, the following letters or documents, relating to the matters interrogated to, or the matters in dispute in the action: A way-book kept at Battle station; telegram from Fenner to Breach, dated the 21st of October: letter from Neek and Donaldson (Neek and Donaldson were the plaintiff's attorneys) to defendant's general manager; 25th, letter from E. B. Noden, defendants' goods manager, to Breach, station-master. . . . With the exception of the letters received from the plaintiff or his attorney, the way-bill, guard's report, and the telegrams from the plaintiff, I object to procedure, or allow inspection of, any of the foregoing documents, writings, or letters, on the ground that they were not written or made in the ordinary course of the duty of the person or persons writing or making them, but were made confidentially for the purpose of, or with a view to, litigation, and resisting the plaintiff's claim." . . .

The view which I took of the matter at chambers was that the general rule is, that a litigant is entitled to a discovery of all the documents in his adversary's possession which are relevant to his case, subject to some exceptions. . . . I am still of the opinion which I formed at chambers, that the inspection should be granted. . . . The principle, however, I think, to be derived from all the cases is that, where it appears that the documents are substantially rough notes for the case, to be laid before the legal adviser, or to supply the proof to be inserted in the brief, the discretion of the Court should, as a general rule, be to refuse the inspection. Where the documents fall short of that, it should, as a general rule, be granted.

Woolley v. North London Ry. Co. (L. R. 4 C. P. 602) is an authority that a report sent by the subordinate to his superior, in consequence of a general order to report, is not privileged, whether it was made before or after the litigation began; and I cannot think that such a report would be the more privileged because it was specially asked for. . . .

Hannen, J. — I agree in the principles explained by my Brother Blackburn, and by which he intended to be guided in the exercise of his discretion. Supreme Court of Kansas. 1903

Error from District Court, Miami County; Jno. T. Burris, Judge.

Action by Bridget Allen and Mary Cunningham against John Sheehan and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Sheehan brings error. Reversed.

The defendants in error, Bridget Allen and Mary Cunningham, commenced an action against John Sheehan, the plaintiff in error, and their codefendants in error, to partition real estate which had been the property of Richard Collins, then deceased. It was alleged that all the parties to the suit were tenants in common of the land by virtue of being heirs of the former owner. John Sheehan answered, claiming sole ownership and possession of one tract described in the petition, under a deed from Richard Collins, executed and delivered in consideration of board and washing to be furnished, and stated sums of money to be paid to him, during the remainder of his lifetime. The plaintiffs replied that the deed mentioned was invalid because at the time of its execution the grantor was of unsound mind, and charged John Sheehan with fraud and undue influence in procuring it. After a trial, judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, the court holding the deed to John Sheehan being null and void. . . . This proceeding in error was commenced to reverse the judgment of the District Court. . . .

Frank M. Sheridan, for plaintiff in error. N. W. Wells and E. J. Sheldon, for defendants in error.

Burch, J. — On the trial a number of nonexpert witnesses were permitted to express opinions concerning the mental capacity of Richard Collins to execute the Sheehan deed. Two of these were attorneys at law, and, upon examination as to the basis of their opinions, disclosed fully the details of transactions and conversations in which Richard Collins had consulted them as attorneys. One of these attorneys justified his disclosure as follows:

"Q. — He consulted you as an attorney, did he not? That is your business? A. — Yes, sir; that was my business. Q. — And he employed you to ascertain about the patents on his lands, did he not? A. — Yes, sir; he did. Q. — And you consulted with him about his plan of having Sheriff Butts take charge of his land? A. — Well, I didn't consult with him nor advise with him about that. He simply came and talked to me about it, and told me about it. The fact is that, after I discovered the condition he was in, I never accepted any fee from him for what I had done in getting the patent or the writing of letters, or the investigation in regard to the lands he claimed from his wife; and I did not consider that the relation of attorney and client existed at all, for I didn't consider that he was capable or competent to make that sort of a contract. Q. — Well, if he had been, and had these talks with you, you would have considered the relation of attorney and client to have subsisted, wouldn't you? A. — Possibly.

The other attorney, who had at one time conducted some litigation for Richard Collins, and who, about the time of some of the transactions revealed, was in the receipt of fees from him for legal services, made the following explanation:

"Q. — He came to your law office, did he? A. — Yes, sir. Oh, I would occasionally meet him here. I remember of meeting him twice on the road, but generally at my law office. Q. — And he came there to consult you as an attorney? A. — No, sir; he never paid me any attorney fee, nor I never asked him for any, and never intended to charge him any. Q. — He came there, I presume, with the idea that he was counselling with you? A. — I think so; yes, sir; I think that was his idea. Q. — And you had these talks and conversations throughout that time about these matters? A. — Yes."

The statute relating to the competency of witnesses in cases of this character is as follows: "The following persons shall be incompetent to testify: . . . Fourth. An attorney, concerning any communication made to him by his client in that relation, or his advice thereon, without the client's consent." Gen. St. 1901, § 4771. Under this statute the relation of attorney and client must exist, to make the communication privileged.

But the payment of a fee is not the test of that relation. In the case of State v. Herbert, 63 Kan. 516, 519, it is said:

"While the payment of a retainer or fee is the best evidence that the relation of attorney and client exists, such payment is not absolutely essential. If an attorney is consulted in his professional capacity, and he allows the consultation to proceed, and act as adviser, the fact that no compensation was paid, or that the consultation was ended and the relation broken, would not remove the seal of secrecy from the communications made." . . .

In this case Richard Collins twice sought out an attorney for the purpose of obtaining legal advice and assistance upon matters he deemed of importance. In each case the attorney consulted accepted his confidences as an attorney at law engaged in the practice of his profession, and obtained from him information imparted upon the faith of that relation. One of these attorneys conceded that Richard Collins acted upon a belief in the existence of such relation. The other conceded that he himself at the time acted in good faith upon such a belief to the extent of procuring a patent, writing letters, and investigating a title. Therefore neither one will be allowed to profane the relation after his client's death. . . .

If the witnesses had founded their opinions upon observations made in common with others in a nonprofessional capacity, or upon facts which did not come to their peculiar knowledge because their professional opinions and guidance had been sought, they might have shown themselves to be competent to testify. . . . In State v. Fitzgerald, 68 Vt. 125, 34 Atl. 429, it was determined that under certain circumstances a lawyer could testify regarding his client's intoxication. The following is from the opinion: "Counsel on both sides, in their briefs, have treated the knowledge that the attorney obtained in respect to the respondent's condition as privileged. We think, however, it cannot be so held. It does not appear that Mr. Cushman learned, or had an opportunity to learn, any fact in respect to the respondent's condition that was not observable by Buckley and by all other persons who saw him during the time of his alleged intoxication. No fact came peculiarly within his knowledge on account of his relation to the respondent as his counsel. This being the case, he was not privileged from testifying to what he observed of the respondent's condition." In this case, however, it is quite clear the witnesses would not have learned the major portion of the facts which they disclosed, or held the most important conversations which they repeated on the witness stand, had they not undertaken to consult with and act for Richard Collins as his attorneys. This being true, they were incompetent to testify as to such facts and conversations. . . .

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. All the Justices concurring.

645. CHAMPION v. McCARTHY

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1907

228 Ill. 87; 81 N. E. 808

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Ogle County; O. E. HEARD, Judge. Suit by Henry McCarthy against Edgar D. Champion and others. From a decree for complainant, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This suit was begun by appellee, Henry McCarthy, filing a bill for the partition of certain lands of John Earl, deceased. The bill alleged that Earl was the owner of certain lands therein described. That he died November 13, 1905, leaving no children nor descendants of a child or children, no widow, and no father nor mother surviving him. . . . The bill alleges that John Earl and Lydia Cheshire, and the deceased brother and the deceased sister of John Earl, and the complainant, were all sons and daughters of Susan Champion, who died March 3, 1893, leaving no other heirs than her sons and daughters and the children of a deceased son and daughter. Complainant claimed in his bill that by the death of John Earl he became seised of an undivided one-fourth of his lands, Lydia Cheshire of an undivided one-fourth, the children of the deceased brother one-fourth, and the children of the deceased sister one-fourth, and prayed for partition. The children of the deceased brother and sister of John Earl answered the bill, denying that complainant was the son of Susan Champion and a brother of John Earl, and denying that he had any interest in the lands described in the bill. . . . A decree was entered for partition in accordance with the master's report and the prayer of the original bill. To reverse that decree this appeal is prosecuted.

The controversy is as to whether the complainant, Henry McCarthy, is an heir of John Earl, deceased, and entitled to an interest in the lands of which he died seised. . . . Susan Champion died in 1893, leaving a will, in and by which she devised to John Earl the real estate in controversy. Complainant claimed to be an illegitimate son of said Susan Champion, born to her in Canada in 1826, before her marriage to Elias Champion. This would make him a half-brother to John Earl, and as such, an heir entitled to a one-fourth interest in the real estate of which John Earl died seised. . . .

Delos W. Baxter testified he was a practicing lawyer and had practiced about twenty-five years. He had held the office of State's Attorney and State Senator. He had known Susan Champion from his boyhood, and also members of her family, including John Earl. He had been employed by Susan Champion in a lawsuit in the early part of his professional career. He testified that in 1886 Susan Champion came to his office with William Stocking, who was the conservator of John Earl, to get him to draw her will; that in transacting the business she talked of her family, and said Henry McCarthy, John Earl, Lydia Cheshire, and Daniel Champion were her children, and also mentioned a child or children of a deceased daughter. Some time after this talk, the witness drew the will, and went with Mr. Stocking to the home of Mrs. Champion to have it executed. On this occasion the witness said Mrs. Champion again told him Henry McCarthy was her son, but that it was not generally known in the neighborhood, and for that reason she did not want his name mentioned in the will. . . .

Sears & Smith and J. C. Seyster, for appellants.

S. W. Crowell and W. J. Emerson, for appellee.

FARMER, J. (after stating the case as above).

It is insisted that the statements Baxter testified Susan Champion made to him in connection with the preparation and execution of her will were privileged communications, and that he should not have been permitted, over the objection of counsel for the grandchildren of Susan Champion, to testify to them. It does not appear from his testimony that the information given by Susan Champion as to who her children were was necessary to be communicated to Baxter to enable him to prepare the will in accordance with her desires. According to his testimony, she knew how she wanted to dispose of her property, and how she wanted her will made. Her statements appear to have been more in the nature of an explanation of her reasons for giving practically the whole of her estate to one of her children. The fact, also, that the communication was made in the presence of another party, would seem to indicate that it was not intended as a confidential communication to her attorney.

In order to render a communication between attorney and client privileged, it must relate to some matter about which the client is seeking advice, or be made in order to put the attorney in possession of information supposed to be necessary to enable him to properly and intelligently serve his client. Where the transaction between the attorney and client is the preparation of a deed or a contract in accordance with the directions of a client, and no legal advice is asked or required, the reasons or motives moving the client to make the deed or contract, if stated to the attorney, are not privileged. De Wolf v. Strader, 26 Ill. 225, 79 Am. Dec. 371; Smith v. Long, 106 Ill. 486; Hatton v. Robinson, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 416, [ante. No. 639].

In Wigmore on Evidence (Volume 4, § 2314) will be found a discussion of the subject of privileged communications relating to the preparations of wills, and the author there announces the rule to be that the fact of the execution of a will, and its contents, are within the rule during the life of the testator, but the rule ceases at his death, and the attorney may then disclose all that affects the execution and tenor of the will. The only exception to this rule, it is said, is the disclosure of facts that would tend to invalidate the will. A large number of cases are cited in the notes to the text in support of the rule announced. . . .

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed. Decree affirmed.

646. In Re CUNNION'S WILL

Court of Appeals of New York. 1911

201 N. Y. 123; 94 N. E. 648

Appeal from Supreme Court, Appellate Division, Second Department.

Proceedings for the probate of the will of John Cunnion, deceased, contested by a daughter of testator. From a decree of the Appellate Division (135 App. Div. 864, 120 N. Y. Supp. 266), affirming a decree admitting the will to probate, the party aggrieved appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 138 App. Div. 922, 123 N. Y. Supp. 1113.

John Cunnion, on September 9, 1907, executed a will. On June 6, 1908, he executed another will. He died on the 16th day of August, 1908. After his death the will of September 9, 1907, was found, but the will of June 6, 1908, could not be found. This proceeding was commenced by a legatee under the will of September 9, 1907, to have the same probated. The probate was contested by a daughter of the testator, and it appeared that the will of September 9, 1907, was duly signed and executed, and that the will of June 6, 1908, was also duly signed and executed, but the contestant was unable to prove the contents of the will of June 6, 1908. Both of the wills were drawn by Francis L. Maher, the attorney of John Cunnion, and he was present when each of them was executed. When the will of June 6, 1908, was executed, it was signed in the presence of the subscribing witnesses and Maher read to such witnesses in the presence of the testator an attestation clause in the usual form, and such attestation clause which followed the signature of the testator was then signed by the witnesses in the presence of the testator. The subscribing witnesses did not know the contents of the will. Maher as a witness in this proceeding was asked: "Q. I ask you to state the contents, all that you can remember." The attorney for the proponent then objected to the witness answering the question on the grounds that it is not "the best evidence of the contents of a written paper; the paper should be produced; and also, as privileged under section 835 of the Code." . . .

John J. Curtin, for appellant. Michael F. McGoldrick, for respondent.

Chase, J. (after stating the facts as above). There was no effort in this proceeding to prove the will of June 6, 1908, as a lost will. It is not even claimed before us that the will was inadvertently lost or mislaid, but the contestant seeks to show the contents of that will that she may claim therefrom an express revocation of all former wills or provisions so antagonistic and inconsistent with the former will as to amount to a revocation. . . . The contents of the will of June 6, 1908, were not shown, and the surrogate was right upon the evidence before him in admitting the will of September 9, 1907, to probate.

The only question now remaining for our consideration is whether the surrogate erred in refusing to allow the testimony of Maher as to the contents of the will of June 6, 1908, because of the prohibition contained in section 835 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

1. Prof. Wigmore, in his work on Evidence, gives an extended statement of the rules relating to privileged communications. He states the rule of the common law excluding communications between attorney and client when legal advice of any kind is sought and given, and in connection therewith discusses the history and policy of such rule, and in referring to wills and testamentary dispositions he says:

"But for wills a special consideration comes into play. Here it can hardly be doubted that the execution and especially the contents are impliedly desired by the client to be kept secret during his lifetime, and are accordingly a part of his confidential communication. It must be assumed that during that period the attorney ought not to be called upon to disclose even the fact of a will's execution, much less its tenor. But, on the other hand, this confidence is intended to be temporary only. That there may be such a qualification to the privilege is plain. That it appropriately explains the client's relation with an attorney drafting a will seems almost equally clear. It follows, therefore, that, after the testator's death, the attorney is at liberty to disclose all that affects the execution and tenor of the will. The only question could be as to communications tending to show the invalidity of the will; i.e., from which a circumstantial inference could be drawn that the testator was insane or was unduly influenced. . . . As to the tenor and execution of the will, it seems hardly open to dispute that they are the very facts which the testator expected and intended to be disclosed after his death; and with this general intention covering the whole transaction it is impossible to select a circumstance here or there (such as the absence of one witness in another room) and argue that the testator would have wanted it kept secret if he had known that it would tend to defeat his intended act." 4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2314.

The reasoning is quite satisfactory, and the rule as stated relating to testamentary dispositions has been substantially adopted in many states as the common-law rule. Doherty v. O'Callaghan, 157 Mass. 90; Graham v. O'Fallon, 4 Mo. 338; Scott v. Harris, 113 Ill. 447; . . . Blackburn v. Crawfords, 70 U. S. 175; Glover v. Patten, 165 U. S. 394; Stewart v. Walker, 6 Ont. L. 594.

2. In reading the decisions of the Courts of this State, it is necessary to remember that prior to September 1, 1877, the common law relating to disclosures of communications and transactions between attorneys and clients prevailed in this State, but from and after that date we have had not only a statute (section 835, Code of Remedial Justice, now Code of Civil Procedure) relating to such disclosures, but also a statute (section 836 of said Code) defining when the statute relating to such disclosures shall apply. The latter statute has been frequently amended so as to extend from time to time the application of the prohibition and to make more clear when and how its provisions can be expressly waived. We are not without authority in this State, in accordance with the rule stated by Wigmore, but the decisions constituting such authority were made in cases where the evidence was offered before the enactment of said sections 835 and 836, or at least before the more recent amendments to said section 836. . . . It is provided by said section 835 as follows: "An attorney or counselor at law shall not be allowed to disclose a communication, made by his client to him, or his advice given thereon, in the course of his professional employment, nor shall any clerk, stenographer or other person employed by such attorney or counselor be allowed to disclose any such communication or advice given thereon." . . . Section 836 as then enacted read as follows: "The last three sections apply to every examination of a person as a witness unless the . . . provisions thereof are expressly waived by the person confessing, the patient, or the client." . . . By chapter 514 of the Laws of 1892, passed May 12, 1892, . . . there was also added thereto the clause relating to an attorney as follows: "But nothing herein contained shall be construed to disqualify an attorney on the probate of a will heretofore executed or offered for probate, from becoming a witness as to its preparation and execution in case such attorney is one of the subscribing witnesses thereto." In 1899 by chapter 53 there was added to the section the words: "The waivers herein provided for must be made in open court, on the trial of the action, or proceeding, and a paper executed by a party prior to the trial, providing for such waiver shall be insufficient as such a waiver. But the attorneys for the respective parties, may prior to the trial, stipulate for such waiver, and the same shall be sufficient therefor." Other amendments not important on this appeal were passed in 1893 and 1904. It is still open to the Courts, when not otherwise provided, to determine what is a communication made by a client to an attorney or counselor or advice given by such attorney or counselor in the course of his professional employment; but, when it is determined that certain testimony is within the provisions of the statute, its application to an examination of a person as a witness is stated in section 836, and a waiver must be made in accordance with the terms of that section, otherwise it cannot be considered by the Courts. It has been held that the prohibition under the common-law rule and also as defined by statute does not apply to a case where two or more persons consult an attorney for their mutual benefit in any litigation which may hereafter arise between them, but that it does apply?

Prior to the amendment of section 836 in 1892, relating to an attorney, this Court in Loder v. Whelpley, 111 N. Y. 239, 248, . . . and in Matter of Coleman, 111 N. Y. 220, 226, 73, referring to the evidence of witnesses who were employed by the testator in their professional capacity to draw a will for him, and to conversations had with them for the purpose of enabling them to execute the instructions of the testator, said: "That these interviews were had in pursuance of and under the sanction of a professional employment, and that communications made by a client under such circumstances to his attorneys were clearly within the protection of the statute, we have no doubt." It was there also held that "the act of the testator in requesting his attorneys to become witnesses to his will leaves no doubt as to his intention thereby to exempt them from the operation of the statute, and leave them free to perform the duties of the office assigned them, unrestrained by any objection which he had power to remove."

This Court has never modified or changed the letter or spirit of the two last decisions from which we have quoted. A short time after such decisions were reported, the amendment to said section 836 in 1892 was passed. . . . It cannot reasonably be doubted that this amendment to section 836 was passed to conform to the decisions from which we have quoted, and to make it clear beyond controversy that when an attorney or counselor becomes a subscribing witness to a will the prohibition of section 835 does not apply to him, and that in case he does not become a subscribing witness to a will the provisions of section 835 are applicable, and that the common-law rule as stated by Wigmore relating to testamentary dispositions is overcome and made of no effect by our statutes. . . . It was held in the federal Circuit Court in Fayerweather v. Rich, 90 Fed. 13, that sections 835 and 836 of our Code do not prevent an attorney who drew the testator's will and a codicil thereto from giving testimony as to the contents of the codicil, and this decision is called to our attention by the appellants. But that decision was expressly overruled and reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, reported as Butler v. Fayerweather, 91 Fed. 458, 33 C. C. A. 625, in which Wallace, J., says: . . . "As the statute now reads, no act of the client except a waiver upon the trial can be treated as a waiver of the prohibition of disclosure; and, except he is an attesting witness to a will, in no case is an attorney permitted to make disclosure in respect to the contents of any documents or other information communicated to him in the course of his professional employment by his client."

If it is the intention of the Legislature that section 835 shall not apply to testimony relating to testamentary dispositions after the death of the testator, it should be so stated in an amendment to such section or to section 836.

The testimony of Maher was properly rejected and the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Cullen, C. J., and Werner, Willard Bartlett, and Hiscock, JJ., concur. Vann and Collin, JJ., dissent. Judgment affirmed.

Topic 2. Husband and Wife

648. Introductory. The privilege for communications between husband and wife is apparently, in time of origin, the second of such privileges to be enforced at common law, and yet the last to be definitely recognized and distinguished. In the second half of the 1600s an instance of its application is found; and yet the explicit statement of the privilege, as a distinct one from any other rule, did not come in England until the statutory reforms of the Common Law Procedure Act, just as the second half of the 1800s was beginning. The explanation of the paradox is that until that time the present privilege for communications between husband and wife had not been plainly separated from the other privilege of husband or wife not to testify to any facts against the other. This latter privilege was fully established by the end of the 1600s. But among the various reasons advanced for its support was the policy of protecting domestic confidence by prohibiting their mutual disclosures. In other words, the true policy of the present privilege was perceived, and yet it was not enforced in the shape of any rule distinct from the old-established privilege of each not to testify against the other as a party or interested in the suit. That the two are distinct is plain; for the privilege not to testify against the other is broader, in the respect that it excludes testimony to any adverse facts even though they have been learned wholly apart from marital confidence, and is narrower, in the respect that it applies only to testimony adverse in its tenor and adverse to a party to the cause or to one in an equivalent position. Nevertheless, the privilege against adverse testimony remained for a long time alone in its recognition. Not until the marital disqualification and the marital privilege against adverse testimony were proposed to be abolished or modified did the existence of this third aspect of the subject begin to be perceived. Accordingly, when the legislators in the various jurisdictions took the first steps, in the period from 1840 to 1870, to reform the other two rules, by abolishing or restricting the disqualification and the other privilege, they invariably preserved by express enactment the present privilege for communications. So this privilege, hitherto existing rather in principle than in rule, practically begins its existence and is defined in its terms by the legislation of that period.

649. MERCER v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF FLORIDA. 1898

40 Fla. 216; 24 So. 144

WRIT of error to the Circuit Court for Jackson county.

The plaintiffs in error were on the 10th day of June, 1897, indicted, jointly with one Westley Bush, in the circuit court of Jackson county, for willfully driving an ox upon a railroad track. . . . Upon the cross-examination of J. E. Brock, one of the State's witnesses, a letter written by him to his wife was exhibited to him by the attorneys for the defendants; and he was asked if he had written such letter, to which he replied, in substance, that he had written the letter, but the following words, "that I never saw the boys that night that the ox was put upon the road," then contained in it, were not put into the letter by him, and were not in it when he sent it to his wife. . . . With this identification of the letter, and by consent of the State attorney as to the time and order of its introduction, it was offered in evidence on behalf of the defendants in rebuttal of the evidence of the witness who wrote the letter; but its admission in evidence was objected to, both by the State and by the witness whose letter it purported to be, upon the ground that, being a letter from the witness to his wife, it was a confidential communication, as between husband and wife, and therefore privileged. This objection was sustained, and the exclusion of the letter is assigned as the ninth error.

John M. Calhoun, for plaintiffs in error.

The Attorney-General and John H. Carter, for defendant in error.

TAYLOR, C. J. (after stating the case as above). Chapter 4029 laws, approved June 4th, 1891, . . . provides: "That in the trial of civil actions in this State neither the husband nor the wife shall be excluded as witnesses" . . . against each other in all cases, civil or criminal, where either of them is an interested party. In neither of these cases decided here, nor in any other State having similar enabling statutes, have we been able to find any declaration that the removal from husband and wife of their incompetency as witnesses because of interest in the cause has the effect of empowering either of them, when they become witnesses, to give illegal or incompetent testimony, by detailing or exposing those transactions or communications that have passed between them in the sacred confidence and trust that should exist between husband and wife, or that the removal of the incompetency of husband and wife as witnesses on the ground of interest removes the inhibition of the law against the exposure in evidence of confidential communications between them.

Such confidential communications between husband and wife have always been regarded as privileged. As Mr. Greenleaf puts it:

"The great object of the rule is to secure domestic happiness by placing the protecting seal of the law upon all confidential communications between husband and wife; and whatever has come to the knowledge of either by means of the hallowed confidence which that relation inspires cannot be afterwards divulged in testimony, even though the other party be no longer living." 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (15th ed.), §§ 337, 334; 254.

Society has a deeply-rooted interest in the preservation of the peace of families, and in the maintenance of the sacred institution of marriage; and its strongest safeguard is to preserve with jealous care any violation of those hallowed confidences inherent in, and inseparable from, the marital status. Therefore the law placed the ban of its prohibition upon any breach of the confidence between husband and wife, by declaring all confidential communications between them to be incompetent matter for either of them to expose as witnesses. The reason of the old rule for rendering interested witnesses incompetent to testify at all in any case to which they were parties was because their interest was supposed to be such a strong incentive to perjury, and, where husband and wife were interested in a cause, both of them were excluded as incompetent witnesses for any purpose, because of their unity of interest; they, in the eye of the law, being regarded as one person, and whenever either was interested both were considered to be equally interested; and the incentive to perjury from such interest was considered to be as strongly operative upon the one as upon the other. But the reason of the rule excluding the confidences between husband and wife as incompetent matter to be deposed by either of them, though they may be competent witnesses to testify to other facts, is found to rest in that public policy that seeks to preserve inviolate the peace, good order, and limitless confidence between the heads of the family circle so necessary to every well-ordered civilized society.

The matter that the law prohibits either the husband or wife from testifying to as witnesses includes any information obtained by either during the marriage, and by reason of its existence. It should not be confined to mere statements by one to the other, but embraces all knowledge upon the part of either obtained by reason of the marriage relation, and which, but for the confidence growing out of it, would not have been known. And the same rule prevails in full force after the marital relation has been dissolved by death or divorce. Where the incompetency as witnesses of husband and wife on the ground of interest has been removed by statute, as is the case here, either of them may testify, for or against the other, to any fact, the knowledge of which was acquired by them independently of their marriage relation, in any manner not involving the confidence growing out of the marriage relation. To this effect, see 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 254a and the cases there cited; also the cases cited in the notes to Commonwealth v. Sapp, 29 Am. St. Rep. 415 et seq.

The letter from the husband to the wife here excluded, however, was not sought to be introduced directly through the wife as a witness to whom it had been written, but, in some manner not disclosed by the record, had found its way to the possession of the attorneys for the defendants, and its offer in evidence was from their immediate custody. There is a considerable array of authorities to the effect that when confidential communications between husband and wife, or between attorney and client, get out of the possession and control of the parties to the confidence, and that of their agents and attorneys, and find their way into the possession and control of third persons, regardless of the manner in which the possession thereof may be obtained by such third persons, then such communications lose the protected privilege of the law, and become competent and admissible evidence. We cannot agree to the correctness of this rule thus broadly laid down by these and other authorities, but think the policy of the law, that forms the foundation of the general rule, is far more strongly upheld and subserved by those authorities that recognize and declare certain classes of communications to be privileged from the inherent character of the communication itself, and that in such cases the privilege attaches to the communication itself, and protects it from exposure in evidence, wheresoever or in whosesoever hands it may be. . . . We think the letter offered in evidence here from the witness Brock to his wife was inherently a confidential communication, and that it was privileged from exposure in evidence, in and of itself, regardless of the custody from which it was produced at the trial, and that its admission in evidence was properly refused. . . .

But, for the error found in the admission of proof as to the character for honesty of the State's witnesses, the judgment of the Court below is reversed and a new trial ordered.

650. SEXTON v. SEXTON

Supreme Court of Iowa. 1905

129 Ia. 487; 105 N. W. 314

Appeal from District Court, Ida County; Z. A. Church, Judge. — Action at law by plaintiff to recover damages from defendant, her father-in-law, for alienating the affections of her husband. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff and James Sexton, Jr., were married in November, 1899, and for some time thereafter continued to live together. One child was born to them, at the time of the commencement of this action three years old. Before the action said James, Jr., had abandoned plaintiff and their child, and was making his home with the defendant, his father. During the trial plaintiff was called as a witness on her own behalf, and to prove that her husband regarded her with affection at and for some time after the marriage, and, further, to prove the subsequent loss or withdrawal of such affection by him, she was allowed to testify to acts, statements, and declarations on his part, addressed to her. To the same end, several letters, written to plaintiff by her husband while absent from home, and produced by her in court, were also allowed to be introduced and read to the jury. To all such evidence the defendant made timely objection, basing the same upon the statute (Code, § 4607), which reads as follows: "Neither husband nor wife can be examined in any case as to any communication made by the one to the other while married," etc. The objections were overruled, and upon such rulings is predicted the only contention for error as presented in argument by counsel for appellant. . . .

F. E. Gill and W. E. Johnston, for appellant. P. W. Harding, for appellee.

Bishop, J. (after stating the case as above). The literal reading of the statute would seem to be quite conclusive against the right to call either the husband or wife to speak from the witness stand respecting communications had between them, no matter what the character thereof or the occasion or purpose. But we are not always restricted to the precise words employed, in getting at the meaning of a statute. And it is the real purpose and intent of the Legislature, as meant to be expressed, to which we are to give force of operation. . . . The privilege of communications between husband and wife, was secured at common law. The rule was not designed to suppress truth, but had its origin in the fact, made clear by experience, that greater mischiefs resulted from the admission of such evidence than were likely to arise from its exclusion. In common, therefore, with other privileges, analogous in character, it was grounded on public policy. . . . That the common-law Courts were not all agreed as to the measure or extent of the privilege must be confessed, and that such lack of uniformity in decision has continued, notwithstanding the principle involved has generally found its way into the statute law of the land, is equally true. Without doubt, however, the latter fact is due in some measure to the difference in phrasing to be found in the enactments as adopted in the various states; some providing for the exclusion of so-called confidential communications only, and others, as in this State, providing in terms that any communication is within the privilege. . . .

We come, then, to the question, what is meant by the expression "any communication" as used in the statute? As we have seen, the privilege is bottomed upon considerations of public policy. Accordingly it would seem that, whatever the form of expression adopted, no more is required than that the confidences inherent in the marital relation, or incident thereto, should be fully protected. Says Mr. Wigmore, in his recent work on Evidence (§ 2336): "The essence of the privilege is to protect confidences only." And this must be true, because there can be no reason arising out of public policy, or otherwise, requiring that every word spoken between husband and wife shall be privileged, irrespective of the presence in which spoken or the subject or occasion thereof. And, within our observation, no Court has ever gone so far as to so hold. The spirit of the rule as enforced at common law, and, within our understanding, the meaning to be gathered from the statute, is that the privilege shall be construed to embrace only the knowledge which the husband or wife obtains from the other, which, but for the marriage relation and the confidence growing out of it, would not have been communicated, or which is of such nature or character as that, to repeat the same, would tend to unduly embarrass or disturb the parties in their marital relations. It is the marital communication, then, that is sought to be protected. . . . Thus it cannot be that words spoken by husband to wife, or vice versa, in the presence and hearing of one or more third persons, and hence in the very nature of things not to be construed as in any marital sense private or confidential, must be held within the protection of the privilege, although clearly within the letter of the statute. . . .

So, too, it cannot be that the rule of privilege must be held to extend so far as to exclude all communications between husband and wife having reference to business relations existing either as between them directly, or as between them — one or both — and others. Certainly as to business relations existing between husband and wife directly, there can be no adverse consideration of public policy Quite to the contrary, public policy, as reflected by statute and by our decisions, permits of such relations to the fullest extent. And it would be shocking to say that a contract thus made, or rights or liabilities thus accruing, could not be enforced because, forsooth, a communication between the parties having relation thereto, and essential to proof, was privileged. The cases are almost unanimously against such a conclusion. Wigmore, § 2336.

To the general proposition thus advanced it is no answer to say that by Code, § 460, husband and wife are made competent witnesses for and against each other in all such cases. That statute goes no farther than to authorize the husband and wife to testify to facts within his or her knowledge, and material or relevant to the issue. It has no relation to the subject of communications made by the one to the other.

"At common law neither husband nor wife could testify in favor of or against the other. General enabling statutes have been passed in many jurisdictions, but these statutes do not affect the rule as to the so-called privileged communications between husband and wife." Elliott on Evidence, § 628. . . .

The distinction between the competency of the husband or wife, when called as witnesses, and the privilege incident to such relation, and the privilege of either against the other's disclosure of communications, is said by Mr. Wigmore to be plain enough:

"And, when the legislators in the various jurisdictions took the first steps . . . by abolishing or restricting the disqualification [as witnesses], they invariably preserved by express enactment the present privilege for communications." Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 2333, 2334.

And again, in § 2228, the same author says:

"So, too, the privilege for confidential communications is not only quite different in scope [from the qualification of husband and wife as witnesses], but stands upon its own sufficient grounds."

Moreover, and for kindred reasons, a literal interpretation of the statute would in many cases forbid an inquiry into the personal wrongs committed by one spouse against the other, and especially where such consisted of a verbal act, or where the statements or declarations accompanying a physical act were necessary to establish the true character of such act. To hold for exclusion in such cases would not only be subversive of the principle of public policy under which the rule of the statute came into existence — that is, the promotion of the interests of the marital relation — but it would be to hold for the equal effectiveness of the privilege as an engine for the suppression of the evidence of wrong, possibly crime. . . .

What has been said foregoing will be sufficient to make clear the reasons for our conclusion that the statute was intended to protect only marital communications. . . . It may be confessed that what are marital communications cannot be answered according to any fixed rule. The varying circumstances of married life are such that the question must be made to depend for its answer upon the peculiar circumstances of the case out of which it arises. Perhaps no better guide for general observance can be found than to say that impliedly all communications between husband and wife are confidential in character, and hence privileged, and that the party asserting the contrary in any given instance must satisfy the Court by the circumstances of the case that grounds for exclusion do not exist.

It being made clear that the rule of privilege is not a rigid one admitting of no exceptions, we have, then, to consider whether, in view of the issue here presented, the testimony of plaintiff, in character as hereinbefore stated, may fairly be said to have been within the rule of exclusion because of marital communications. Looking first to the issue, it is clear that the burden was upon plaintiff to establish, among other things, first, that at the beginning of their married life she possessed the affection of her husband; second, that such affection had been lost to or withdrawn from her. . . . Now, marital affection, or the want of it, is manifested alone by acts, either physical or verbal, and it can be fully proven in no other way than by presenting to the court or jury the relevant doings and sayings of the spouse in question. That physical acts do not come within the rule of exclusion is the declaration of many of the cases. See those collected by Mr. Wigmore in note to § 2337. But this should be accepted with qualification. Knowledge may be as effectively communicated in many cases by physical acts as by words spoken, and, if the knowledge imparted is such in character as to come within the spirit of the rule, no good reason appears for withholding the privilege because of the means of communication adopted. Whatever may be said in respect of this, it is doubtful, to say the least, if testimony of the character in question, whether of physical or verbal acts, and limited to such, should be regarded as communications in any sense employed in the statute. The words spoken or the acts committed have no testimonial value in and of themselves. They are important only as the expression of countenance, the caress, the term of endearment, the word of hope for the marital future — or, on the other hand, the withholding of society, the blow, the curse — may serve to make evident the material fact, from the standpoint of testimonial value, of affection or the want thereof. . . .

But aside from this, and speaking first of testimony intended to establish affection, there can be nothing in the rule of privilege to justify the exclusion of testimony by a spouse bearing upon the existence of such fact; and this, whether the evidence offered be of physical acts or verbal acts. Affection between husband and wife is the rule, and, as we have seen, the law presumes it. Indeed, it is published to the world with the fact of marriage. Accordingly in no sense can it be a matter of marital confidence, and as such subject to be violated by the one testifying to the acts, physical or verbal, commonly understood to be declaratory thereof, in proof of the fact. . . . As applied to a case such as we have before us, it has become a question simply whether there shall be vindicated another principle of public policy by so ordering that that which has been lost may be compensated for. Surely it does not lie in the mouth of one who has entered a family circle to despoil it to plead the privilege of the statute to the sole end that he may escape the consequence of his own unlawful act. It was not intended for his benefit, and every consideration of public policy that enters into it forbids him from making of it a cloak to shield him from being penalized for the mischief he has wrought. . . .

There was no error in admitting the testimony complained of, and the judgment is affirmed.

Topic 3. Jurors

652. Earl of Shaftesbury's Trial. (1681. 8 How. St. Tr. 759, 771.) [Sir F. Withins moved, after the charge to the grand jury, that the evidence be heard in Court; and L. C. J. Pemberton declared that he would grant the motion. The jury then desired to have a copy of their oath,[4] which was given them, and they withdrew. On returning shortly, the following colloquy ensued:]

Foreman. My lord Chief Justice, it is the opinion of the jury that they ought to examine the witnesses in private, and it hath been the constant practice of our ancestors and predecessors to do it; and they insist upon it as their right to examine in private, because they are bound to keep the king's secrets, which they cannot do if it be done in Court. . . .

Mr. Papillon [a juror]: If it be the ancient custom of the kingdom to examine in private, then there is something maybe very prejudicial to the king in this public examination; for sometimes in examining witnesses in private, there come to be discovered some persons guilty of treason, and misprision of treason, that were not known, nor thought on before. Then the jury sends down to the Court, and gives them intimation, and these men are presently secured; whereas, my lord, in case they be examined in open Court publicly, then presently there is no intimation given and these men are gone away. Another thing that may be prejudicial to the king, is, that all the evidences here, will be foreknown before they come to the main trial upon issue by the petty jury; then if there be not a very great deal of care, these witnesses may be confronted by raising up witnesses to prejudice them, as in some cases it has been. Then besides, the jury do apprehend, that in private they are more free to examine things in particular, for the satisfying their own consciences, and that without favor or affection; and we hope we shall do our duty.

L. C. J. Pemberton. — The king's counsel have examined whether he hath cause to accuse these persons, or not; and, gentlemen, they understand very well, that it will be no prejudice to the king to have the evidence heard openly in Court; or else the king would never desire it.

Foreman. — My lord, the gentlemen of the jury desire that it may be recorded, that we insisted upon it as our right, but if the Court overrule, we must submit to it.

[4] The form of oath administered to grand jurors was as follows:

The foreman, by himself, lays his hand on the book, and the marshal administers to him the following oath: "My lord, or sir (as the foreman's name may be), you, as the foreman of this grand inquest for the body of the county of A, shall diligently inquire and true presentment make of all such matters and things as shall be given you in charge; the king's counsel, your fellows', and your own, you shall keep secret; You shall present no one for envy, hatred, or malice; but you shall present all things truly as they come to your knowledge, according to the best of your understanding: So help you God." The rest of the grand jury, by three at a time, in order, are sworn in the following manner: "The same oath which your foreman hath taken on his part, you and every of you, shall well and truly observe and keep on your part: So help you God."

653. PHILLIPS v. MARBLEHEAD

148 Mass. 326; 19 N. E. 547

PETITION to the Superior Court for a jury to assess the damages caused by the taking by the respondent of land of the petitioners, in July, 1886, for the laying out of Atlantic Avenue in Marblehead. The respondent called as a witness one Martin, a member of the board of selectmen of Marblehead in 1886, who testified as an expert to the value of the petitioners' land. Upon cross-examination he testified that the petitioners had in his judgment sustained damage to the amount of three hundred dollars, and no more. The petitioners then offered in evidence, solely for the purpose of contradicting the witness Martin, the record of the board of selectmen of Marblehead made July 27, 1886, showing the laying out of Atlantic Avenue, and the amount of damage therefor, signed by Martin together with the other members of the board. The record contained the statement that the petitioners had sustained damage by the taking of their land to the amount of five hundred and fifty-three dollars, and that that sum was awarded the petitioners. The judge ruled that the record was not admissible in evidence for the purpose named, and the petitioners excepted FIELD, J. . . . While the deliberations of legislative bodies are usually public, the deliberations of judicial or quasi judicial bodies are private, and there are reasons of public policy why they should not be made public, particularly when the purpose to be served is comparatively unimportant. Grand and petit jurors are not permitted to testify to opinions concerning the case expressed in their consultations with one another, and arbitrators are not permitted to testify to the grounds on which they reached the conclusions declared in the award. For the purpose of contradicting a witness, we think that evidence ought not to be received of the deliberations of selectmen acting in a quasi judicial capacity, and that the certificate of the doings of the board of selectmen was rightly excluded.

654. STATE v. CAMPBELL

SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS. 1906

73 Kan. 688; 85 Pac. 784

APPEAL from District Court, Wyandotte County; J. MCCABE MOORE, Judge.

Frank M. Campbell was convicted of bribery, and appeals. Affirmed.

At the June Term of the District Court of Wyandotte County, appellant was convicted of the crime of accepting a bribe to influence his official action as a member of the board of education of Kansas City. He was sentenced to confinement in the State penitentiary for a period of not less than one or more than seven years. From the judgment he appeals. . . .

Hale & Maher, for appellant.

C. C. Coleman, Attorney-General, for the State.

PORTER, J. (after stating the facts). The appellant contends . . . 2. that the Court erred in allowing members of the grand jury which indicted appellant to testify to statements made by him while a witness before the grand jury; . . . that members of a grand jury are prohibited by statute from testifying as to what a witness before that body has sworn to, except for the purpose of impeaching his statements made in court or in a case where a witness is being prosecuted for perjury.

In its testimony in chief, the State introduced four members of the grand jury which returned the indictment, and proved by them certain statements made by appellant while a witness before the grand jury. . . . When this evidence was offered, counsel for appellant objected, and the following took place: "Q. What did Mr. Campbell say in his examination before the grand jury as to who had employed Mr. Gilhaus? By Mr. Wooley: I object to that as incompetent. Testimony taken before the grand jury cannot be reiterated by the grand jury. . . . Mr. Coleman: It is competent as an admission, if it amounts to one. The Court: It may have been voluntarily made, and competent, if shown they are not made under compulsion. He may answer." . . .

The second ground upon which it is contended that this testimony was incompetent is that the statutory as well as the common-law rules prohibit a grand juror from disclosing the testimony of a witness before that body, except for two purposes: (1) To prove whether the testimony of such witness before the grand jury is consistent with or different from his testimony before the court; (2) upon a complaint against such person for perjury, or upon his trial for that offense. Section 91, Code Cr. Proc. (Gen. St. 1901, § 5533), read as follows:

"Members of the grand jury may be required by any Court to testify whether the testimony of a witness examined before such grand jury is consistent with or different from the evidence given by such witness before such Court; and they may also be required to disclose the testimony given before them by any person upon a complaint against such person for perjury, or upon his trial for such offence."

Section 93, Code Cr. Proc. (Gen. St. 1901, § 5535), is as follows:

"No grand juror shall disclose any evidence given before the grand jury, nor the name of any witness who appeared before them, except when lawfully required to testify as a witness in relation thereto; nor shall he disclose the fact of any indictment having been found against any person for felony, not in actual confinement, until the defendant shall have been arrested thereon. Any juror violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

These sections first appear in our statutes in the laws of 1855, and have been subsequently re-enacted without change. It is historical that the territorial Legislature of 1855, often referred to as the "bogus Legislature," adopted the entire statutes of Missouri, substituting the word "Territory" for "State," and making some other slight changes where it was found necessary.

These sections had been construed by the Supreme Court of Missouri in the case of Tindle v. Nichols, 20 Mo. 326, decided in January, 1855, and it is now contended that we are bound by the judicial construction placed thereon. In the Tindle Case, supra, which was an action for slander, defendant justified and answered that plaintiff had sworn falsely in a certain matter before the grand jury. On the trial defendant sought to prove by members of the grand jury what the witness had testified. The Court held that, inasmuch as section 91 specified two classes of cases in which a grand juror may be required to disclose such testimony, it followed that all other cases not enumerated were excluded, and that the words of section 93 "when lawfully required to testify as a witness in relation thereto" had reference only to those two exceptions. We recognize the force of the rule that, where one state adopts a statute from another State, it adopts the construction placed thereon by the Courts of that State. But this is a general rule to which there are numerous exceptions. . . .

The question before us, however, is not whether this statute was in fact adopted from Missouri, about which there can be no dispute, but whether we should be bound by it absolutely. . . . In many of the States the subject is controlled by statute, and provisions almost identical with our statutes are in force. The various statutory provisions of the several States are set forth in a note to § 2360 in Wigmore on Evidence, Vol. 4, p. 3316. From the time the grand jury was first established, the law has surrounded its deliberations and all that transpired before it with secrecy. By the common law, a grand jury was not permitted to disclose how any witness testified before that body or how any member voted. 12 Viner's Abr. 20, tit. Evidence, H, I. The grand juror's oath required him to keep "the State's counsel, his own and his fellows' secret." The purpose of this requirement has been, manifestly: First, to protect the interests of the State, by preventing information reaching the accused which might enable him to escape or induce him to suborn witnesses to prove the contrary of the charges; second, to protect the members of the grand jury, and leave them free to act without fear of consequences to themselves; and, third, to protect witnesses in the same way. Gradually, exceptions to these rules have been allowed; and the first naturally to suggest themselves were those permitting a grand juror to testify what a witness swore to before the grand jury in a prosecution of the witness for perjury, and, again, for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of the witness on a trial of an indictment or in another action. The tendency of modern authorities has been to hold that, when the reasons for secrecy no longer exist, the ancient rules with reference thereto do not apply, and, in all cases where justice or the rights of the public require it, the facts should be disclosed. . . . In Commonwealth v. Mead, 12 Gray 167, it was said: "But, when these purposes are accomplished, the necessity and expediency of retaining the seal of secrecy are at an end." Mr. Wigmore, in his work on Evidence (§ 2362) says: "But what are the limits of this temporary secrecy? The answer is, on principle, that it ceases when the grand jury has finished its duties and has either indicted or discharged the person accused." In a note to the same section, in referring to Tindle v. Nichols, supra, the author characterizes the decision as "clearly unsound and unjust." The Florida Supreme Court, in a well-considered case (Jenkins v. State, 35 Fla. 737), decided in 1895, construed a statute which is in the same language as ours so far as section 93 is concerned. . . . They say: "But, independent of statutory regulation, it has long been established that it is discretionary with the trial court to permit a grand juror to be examined as to what a witness testified to before the grand jury, when competent and the ends of justice require it, and we do not see that our statutes have changed this rule." . . .

Mr. Wigmore, after referring to and criticising the Missouri and Connecticut cases, says:

"There remain, therefore, on principle, no cases at all in which, after the grand jury's functions are ended, the privilege of the witnesses not to have their testimony disclosed should be deemed to continue. This is, in effect, the law as generally accepted today. It is, however, not usually stated in such a broad form. The common phrase is that disclosure may be required 'whenever it becomes necessary in the course of justice.' Disregarding a few local exceptions, this is in practice no narrower a rule than the one above deducible from principle." Vol. 4, § 2362.

The same author disposes of the motion that the two exceptions contained in many statutes should be held to exclude all others. He says:

"It is now universally conceded that a witness may be impeached, in any subsequent trial civil or criminal, by self-contradictory testimony given by him before the grand jury. In the same way, a party to the cause, not taking the stand as a witness, may be impeached by his admissions made in testifying before the grand jury. The occasional statutory sanction for the former of these uses cannot be construed to prohibit the latter, which goes upon the same reasoning. Nor should any of the ensuing legitimate purposes of disclosure be considered to be obstructed by the statutory omission to mention them, else the integrity of common-law principles would tend to be diminished in direct ratio to the ignorance or unskillfulness of the legislature which attempted in any respect to make a declaratory statute." Vol. 4, § 2363.

Appellant, in addition to the Missouri cases, relies upon the old case of State v. Fasset, 16 Conn. 457, which is a leading authority in support of the rule excluding such testimony. This case was decided in 1884, and has been to some extent discredited by that Court in the case of State v. Coffee, supra, decided in 1888. In the latter case the Court use this language:

"Some of the reasons given for keeping the testimony secret are temporary in their nature, and some do not exist, under our practice, where the prisoner is before the grand jury. Nevertheless the oath and the policy of the law have ever regarded the testimony as among the secrets of the grand jury room, not, however, inflexibly so. In State v. Fasset, 16 Conn. 457, the Court notices two exceptions —in prosecutions for perjury, and in case witnesses testify differently on the trial. Perhaps it would be proper to say that the oath has this implied qualification: that the testimony is to be kept secret unless a disclosure is required in some legal proceeding. It does not seem that the policy of the law should require it to be kept secret at the expense of justice. And so the weight of authority outside of this State seems to be that, where public justice or the rights of parties require it, the testimony before the grand jury may be shown. . . . We make these quotations, not for the purpose of showing what the law is in this State, but for the purpose of showing the principles which prevail in other jurisdictions. The case of State v. Fasset, supra, may be regarded as somewhat inconsistent with the broad principles elsewhere enunciated. It is doubtful whether the Court intended to go further than the two exceptions there noticed." . . .

It appears beyond question, we think, that the doctrine of the Tindle Case is opposed to the weight of modern authority, and as its reasoning does not accord with our views, we must decline to be bound by it. The oath provided for grand jurors by our State imposes none of the common-law restrictions of secrecy, required by the statutes of many of the States. While the obligations of the oath are by many of the Courts considered indicative of the policy of the law in those States, the absence of any such requirements in the oath provided by our statute is perhaps of little importance in view of the other obligations as to secrecy imposed by the sections which we are considering. In principle we see no good reason why the statements, admissions or declarations made by a witness before a grand jury should not be disclosed by a member of the grand jury whenever lawfully required to do so, and that a member of the grand jury may be lawfully required to testify "in relation thereto," when after the purpose of secrecy has been effected, it becomes necessary in furtherance of justice or for the protection of public or individual rights. . . .

The judgment will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

Topic 4. Official Secrets

655. HARDY'S TRIAL

King's Bench. 1794

24 How. St. Tr. 199

[Treason. The witness had reported the existence and doings of secret political societies].

Witness. — I did not do it of myself, but by advice; a gentleman recommended me by all means to make a report. It was not to a magistrate.

Mr. Erskine. — Then to whom was it? (Objection was made). I submit he must state the name of the person to whom he communicated it; then have I not a right to subpœna that person? I will then ask [this witness], When did you tell it him? At what place? Who were present? Then I ask that person, Is it true? . . . And if he were to say, I never saw his face [the witness'] till I saw him in court, would not that shake the credit of the witness with any man of understanding? I apprehend it would.

Mr. Attorney-General (opposing) — What is the principle upon which the Court says, You shall never ask where he got that information? . . . A court of justice does not sit to catch the little whispers or the huzzas of popularity; it proceeds upon great principles of general justice. It says that individuals must suffer inconveniences rather than great public mischief should be incurred; and it say that if men's names are to be mentioned who interpose in situations of this kind, the consequence must be that great crimes will be passed over without any information being offered about them, or without persons taking that part which is always a disagreeable part to take but which at the same time it is necessary should be taken for the interest of the public. . . . Nobody will deny but that it is a hard case; but it has become a settled rule, because private mischief gives way to public convenience.

Eyre, L. C. J. — It is perfectly right that all opportunities should be given to discuss the truth of the evidence given against a prisoner; but there is a rule which has universally obtained on account of its importance to the public for the detection of crimes, that those persons who are the channel by means of which that detection is made should not unnecessarily be disclosed. . . .

[As to (1) the person reported to,] I cannot satisfy myself that there is any substantial distinction between the case of this man's going to a justice of the peace or going to a magistrate superior to a justice of the peace. . . .

[As to (2) the person above, advising a report,] I am of opinion the principle extends to that question, because the disclosing who the friend was that advised him to go to a magistrate is a thing which puts that friend in a situation into which he ought not to be put, and into which it is inconvenient to general justice that he should be put. . . . My apprehension is that, among those questions which are not permitted to be asked, are all those questions which tend to the discovery of the channels by whom the disclosure was made to the officers of justice; that it is upon the general principle of the convenience of public justice not to be disclosed; that all persons in that situation are protected from the discovery; and that, if it is objected to, it is no more competent for the defendant to ask who the person was that advised him to make a disclosure than it is to whom he made the disclosure in consequence of that advice, [or] than it is to ask any other question respecting the channel of communication or all that was done under it. . . .

Buller, J. — My lord Chief Justice and my lord Chief Baron both say the principle is that the discovery is necessary for the purpose of obtaining public justice; and if you call for the name of informer in such cases, no man will make a discovery, and public justice will be defeated. Upon that ground, therefore, it is that the informer for the purpose of a public prosecution shall not be disclosed.

656. Michael v. Matson. (Supreme Court of Kansas. 1909. 105 Pac. 537.) Mason, J. — The county attorney was called as a witness by the plaintiff, and was permitted to relate a conversation between Matson and himself relating to the liquor prosecution, before it was dismissed. The defendant objected to this on the ground that his statements to the county attorney, under the circumstances, were privileged. We think the objection should have been sustained, not on the theory that the relation of attorney and client existed, thus rendering the communication incompetent under the statute (Gen. St. 1901, § 4771, subd. 4), but for the reason that the evidence was inadmissible on the grounds of public policy. . . . The interest of the public in protecting the privacy of a communication seems, indeed, greater when it is made to a prosecuting officer in that capacity than when it is made by a client to his attorney. Persons having knowledge regarding the commission of a crime ought to be encouraged to reveal to the prosecuting attorney fully, freely, and unreservedly the source and extent of their information. The possibility that what they say, under such circumstances, will be used against them, tends to impose a natural restraint upon their conduct and to deprive the officer of the benefit of their services. It is said that the privilege based upon this principle applies only to the identity of the informant (4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2374, p. 3333), and such appears to be the English rule; but in this country it has been treated as covering the communication itself.

657. AARON BURR'S TRIAL

United States Circuit Court. 1807

Robertson's Rep., I, 121, 127, 136, 181, 255; II, 536

[Treason. The accused moved for a subpœna duces tecum to the President of the United States to attend and bring certain correspondence with General Wilkinson, material to aid the defence. The counsel for the prosecution did not deny that the President was "as amenable to that process as any other citizen," but claimed that "if his public functions disable him from obeying the process, that would be a satisfactory excuse, 'pro hac vice,'" and that the papers here asked for were State secrets and irrelevant.]

Mr. Botts (arguing for the accused). I can never express, in terms sufficiently strong, the detestation and abhorrence which every American should feel towards a system of State secrecy. It never can conduce to public utility, though it may furnish pretexts to men in power to shelter themselves and their friends and agents from the just animadversion of the law, — to direct their malignant plots to the destruction of other men while they are themselves secure from punishment. In a government of responsibility like ours, where all the agents of the public must be responsible for their conduct, there can be but few secrets. The people of the United States have a right to know every public act, every thing that is done in a public way by their public functionaries. They ought to know the particulars of public transactions in all their bearings and relations, so as to be able to distinguish whether and how far they are conducted with fidelity and ability; and with the exception of what relates to negotiations with foreign nations, or what is called the diplomatic department, there ought to be nothing suppressed or concealed. . . . I will again predict that, if a secret inquisitorial tribunal be established by your decision now, . . . if you determine that we be deprived of the benefit of important written or oral evidence by the introduction of this State secrecy, you lay, without intending it, the foundation for a system of oppression. If these things be established, to go down to posterity as precedents, the inevitable consequences will be that, whenever any man in the United States becomes an object of the vengeance or jealousy of those in power, he may easily be ruined. A wicked executive power will have nothing to do to effect his destruction but to foment divisions in this country, to encourage and excite accusations by its officers, to deny the use of all public documents that may tend to the justification of the accused, or to render the attainment of exculpatory evidence dependent on the arbitrary whim of its prosecuting officers, and he will be condemned to sink without the smallest effectual resistance. . . .

Marshall, C. J. (granting the motion). . . . The exceptions [to the accused's right to process] furnished by the law of evidence, with one reservation, so far as they are personal, are of those [persons] only whose testimony could not be received. The single reservation alluded to is the case of the King. Although he may, perhaps, give testimony, it is said to be incompatible with his dignity to appear under the process of the Court. Of the many points of difference which exist between the First Magistrate in England and the First Magistrate in the United States, in respect to the personal dignity conferred on them by the constitutions of their respective nations, the Court will only mention two.

(1) It is a principle of the English constitution that the King can do no wrong, that no blame can be imputed to him, that he cannot be named in debate. By the constitution of the United States, the President, as well as every other officer of the government, may be impeached, and may be removed from office on high crimes and misdemeanors. (2) By the constitution of Great Britain the crown is hereditary, and the monarch can never be a subject. By that of the United States, the President is elected from the mass of the people, and, on the expiration of the time for which he is elected, returns to the mass of the people again. How essentially this difference of circumstances must vary the policy of the laws of the two countries, in reference to the personal dignity of the executive chief, will be perceived by every one. In this respect, the First Magistrate of the Union may more properly be likened to the first magistrate of a State, — at any rate, under the former Confederation; and it is not known ever to have been doubted but that the chief magistrate of a State might be served with a subpœna ad testificandum. If in any court of the United States it has ever been decided that a subpœna cannot issue to the President, that decision is unknown to this Court. If upon any principle the President could be construed to stand exempt from the general provisions of the Constitution, it would be because his duties as chief magistrate demand his whole time for national objects. But it is apparent that this demand is not unremitting; and, if it should exist at the time when his attendance on a court is required, it would be sworn on the return of the subpœna, and would rather constitute a reason for not obeying the process of the Court than a reason against its being issued. In point of fact, it cannot be doubted that the people of England have the same interest in the service of the executive government — that is, of the cabinet counsel — that the American people have in the service of the executive of the United States, and that their duties are as arduous and as unremitting; yet it has never been alleged that a subpœna might not be directed to them. It cannot be denied that to issue a subpœna to a person filling the exalted station of the Chief Magistrate is a duty which would be dispensed with more cheerfully than it would be performed; but, if it be a duty, the Court can have no choice in the case. If then, as is admitted by the counsel for the United States, a subpœna may issue to the President, the accused is entitled to it of course; and, whatever difference may exist with respect to the power to compel the same obedience to the process as if it had been directed to a private citizen, there exists no difference with respect to the right to obtain it. The guard furnished to this high officer to protect him from being harassed by vexatious and unnecessary subpœnas is to be looked for in the conduct of a Court after those subpœnas have issued, — not in any circumstance which is to precede their being issued. . . .

[As to the argument that reasons of State might forbid the disclosure], there is certainly nothing before the Court which shows that the letter in question contains any matter the disclosure of which would endanger the public safety. . . . If it does contain any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose, which it is not the wish of the Executive to disclose, such matter, if it be not immediately and essentially applicable to the point, will of course be suppressed. . . . Everything of this kind, however, will have its due consideration on the return of the subpœna. . . . I admit, in such a case, much reliance must be placed on the declaration of the President; . . . perhaps the Court ought to consider the reasons which would induce the President to refuse to exhibit such a letter as conclusive on it, unless such letter could be shown to be absolutely necessary in the defence. The President may himself state the particular reasons which may have induced him to withhold a paper, and the Court would unquestionably allow their full force to those reasons.

[To this subpœna, President JEFFERSON responded, without attendance, by a letter to the prosecuting counsel, in which he offered to be examined at Washington by deposition, but explained his non-attendance at Court as follows:] As to our personal attendance at Richmond, I am persuaded the Court is sensible that paramount duties to the nation at large control the obligation of compliance with its summons in this case; as it would, should we receive a similar one to attend the trials of Blennerhasset and others [co-conspirators] in Mississippi Territory, those instituted at St. Louis and other places on the western waters; or at any place other than the seat of government. To comply with such calls would leave the nation without an executive branch, whose agency nevertheless is understood to be so constantly necessary that it is the sole branch which the Constitution requires to be always in function. It would not, then, intend that it should be withdrawn from its station by any co-ordinate authority. . . .

[The President though forwarding the desired letter, added the following:] With respect to papers, there is certainly a public and private side to our offices. To the former belong grants of land, patents for inventions, certain commissions, proclamations, and other papers patent in their nature. To the other belong mere executive proceedings. All nations have found it necessary that for the advantageous conduct of their affairs some of these proceedings at least should remain known to their executive functionary only. He, of course, from the nature of the case, must be the sole judge of which of them the public interest will permit publication.

658. MISSISSIPPI v. JOHNSON. (1866. Federal Supreme Court. 4 Wall. 475, 483.) Attorney-General Stanbery (arguing). If the Court [in Burr's Trial] in saying that the President was amenable to subpœna, was right, the Court was bound, at the instance of the defendant, to follow it up by process of attachment to compel obedience to its lawful order. At that point, however, the Court hesitated, and not a step further was taken towards enforcing the doctrine laid down by the Chief Justice. It then became quite too apparent that a very great error had been committed. I say a very great error, with the greatest submission to the great Chief Justice, who, on circuit, at Nisi Prius, suddenly, on a motion of this kind, had held that the President of the United States was liable to the subpœna of any Court as President.

659. BEATSON v. SKENE

5 H. & N. 838, 853

[LIBEL. The plaintiff, Skene, was a general of cavalry. At the close of the Crimean war he was superseded in command, and resigned. An investigation into the state of the corps was made by General Shirley, whose secretary and commissioner the defendant Beatson was. The defendant reported to his superior that the plaintiff had stirred up mutiny in the corps, and afterwards so testified as a witness before a military court of inquiry held to investigate General Shirley's alleged libel on the plaintiff. For this testimony the plaintiff's suit for libel was brought; and he sought production, in his proof, of the military court's minutes of the defendant's testimony, and of the plaintiff's own letters to the Secretary of War. This production was refused. On a rule nisi granting production,] Bovill and Garth showed cause. First, the learned Judge was correct in refusing to compel the production of the letters and minutes of the Court of Inquiry, the Secretary of State for War having objected to produce them, on the ground that their production would be prejudicial to the public service. It is clear that evidence may be excluded, where the disclosure would be prejudicial to public interests. . . .

Edwin James and Gray, in support of the rule. First, the learned Judge ought to have compelled the production of the letters and minutes of the Court of Inquiry, which the Secretary for War was subpœnaed to produce. The letters were not confidential communications, but were written by the plaintiff in explanation of his conduct, and for the purpose of showing the motives by which he was actuated. There is no authority that under such circumstances the Secretary for War was entitled to withhold them. The case is totally different from that of a confidential report made by a military officer to the Secretary for War, which it is conceded would be privileged.

POLLOCK, C. B. — We are of opinion that it cannot be laid down that all public documents, including treaties with foreign powers and all the correspondence that may precede or accompany them, and all communications to the heads of departments, are to be produced and made public whenever a suitor in a court of justice thinks that his case requires such production. It is manifest, we think, that there must be a limit to the duty or the power of compelling the production of papers which are connected with acts of State. As an instance, we would put the case of a British minister at a foreign Court writing in that capacity a letter to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in this country, containing matter injurious to the reputation of a foreigner or a British subject; can it be contended that the person referred to would have a right to compel the production of the letter in order to take the opinion of a jury whether the injurious matter was written maliciously or not? We are of opinion that, if the production of a State paper would be injurious to the public service, the general public interest must be considered paramount to the individual interest of a suitor in a court of justice; and the question then arises, how is this to be determined?

It is manifest it must be determined either by the presiding Judge or by the responsible servant of the Crown in whose custody the paper is. The Judge would be unable to determine it without ascertaining what the document was, and why the publication of it would be injurious to the public service — an inquiry which cannot take place in private, and which taking place in public may do all the mischief which it is proposed to guard against. It appears to us therefore, that the question, whether the production of the documents would be injurious to the public service, must be determined, not by the Judge but by the head of the department having the custody of the paper; and if he is in attendance and states that in his opinion the production of the document would be injurious to the public service, we think the Judge ought not to compel the production of it. The administration of justice is only a part of the general conduct of the affairs of any State or Nation, and we think is (with respect to the production or non-production of a State paper in a Court of justice) subordinate to the general welfare of the community.

Rule discharged.

660. HENNESSY v. WRIGHT. (1888. Queen's Bench Division. L. R. 21 Q. B. D. 509, 512.) FIELD, J. — There are two aspects of this question.

First, the publication of a State document may involve danger to the nation. If the confidential communications made by servants of the Crown to each other, by superiors to inferiors or by inferiors to superiors, in the discharge of their duty to the Crown, were liable to be made public in a court of justice at the instance of any suitor who thought proper to say "fiat justitia ruat coelum," an order for discovery might involve the country in a war.

Secondly, the publication of a State paper may be injurious to servants of the Crown as individuals; there would be an end of all freedom in their official communications if they knew that any suitor, that as in this case any one of their own body whom circumstances had made a suitor, could legally insist that any official communication, of no matter how secret a character, should be produced openly in a court of justice.

Topic 5. Physician and Patient

662. Duchess of Kingston's Trial. (1776. House of Lords, 20 How. St. Tr. 573.) [Bigamy. Mr. Hawkins, a physician, who had attended the accused and her alleged husband, was asked]: Do you know from the parties of any marriage between them?

Ans.: I do not know how far anything that has come before me in a confidential trust in my profession should be disclosed, consistent with my professional honor.

Mansfield, L. C. J. — If all your lordships will acquiesce, Mr. Hawkins will understand that it is your judgment and opinion that a surgeon has no privilege, where it is a material question in a civil or criminal cause to know whether parties were married or whether a child was born, to say that his introduction to the parties was in the course of his profession and in that way he came to the knowledge of it. . . . If a surgeon was voluntarily to reveal these secrets, to be sure, he would be guilty of a breach of honor and of great indiscretion; but to give that information in a court of justice which by the law of the land he is bound to do, will never be imputed to him as any indiscretion whatever.

663. Commissioners on the Revision of the Statutes of New York. (1836. III, 737.) The ground on which communications to counsel are privileged, is the supposed necessity of a full knowledge of the facts, to advise correctly, and to prepare for the proper defence or prosecution of a suit. But surely the necessity of consulting a medical adviser, when life itself may be in jeopardy, is still stronger. And unless such consultations are privileged, men will be incidentally punished by being obliged to suffer the consequences of injuries without relief from the medical art, and without conviction of any offence. Besides, in such cases, during the struggle between legal duty on the one hand, and professional honor on the other, the latter, aided by a strong sense of the injustice and inhumanity of the rule, will, in most cases, furnish a temptation to the perversion or concealment of truth, too strong for human resistance.

664. GARTSIDE v. CONNECTICUT MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO.

Supreme Court of Missouri. 1882

76 Mo. 446

Appeal from St. Louis Court of Appeals. Affirmed.

This suit was instituted in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, on a policy of insurance to recover a death loss. On the trial judgment was rendered for defendant, which, on plaintiff's appeal to the St. Louis court of appeals, was reversed, and from the judgment of reversal defendant prosecutes an appeal to this Court.

The only question presented on said appeal for determination is, whether a physician, who is called to visit a patient, when introduced as a witness, can be required or allowed to disclose any information acquired by him from such patient either orally, by signs or by observation of the patient after he has submitted himself for examination, which information was necessary to enable him to prescribe for such patient. An affirmative answer reverses, and a negative answer affirms the judgment, and the solution of the question is dependent upon a construction of the fifth subdivision of section 4017, Revised Statutes, which declares that the following persons shall be incompetent to testify, viz: . . . "A physician or surgeon, concerning any information which he may have acquired from any patient while attending him in a professional character, and which information was necessary to enable him to prescribe for such patient as a physician, or do any act for him as a surgeon."

B. D. Lee, for appellant. The Court of Appeals gave too broad a construction to the statute of Missouri relating to the competency of witnesses. It should have been strictly construed. . . . The New York and Michigan authorities cited by plaintiff have no application here. . . .

Jacob Klein, for respondents. The information which a physician is forbidden to disclose consists not merely of the communications made to him by his patient, but of facts which otherwise come to his knowledge by virtue of his professional employment. . . . It might as well be said that information can be gained only through the sense of hearing, as that the information intended to be protected by the statute is only that which the medical person gains through the oral statements of the patient. . . . But the context of the clause puts the matter beyond doubt; there is a studied discrimination in the language applied to the three professions: As to the Attorney, it is the "communication" that is to be withheld. As to the Priest, it is the "confession." As to the Physician, it is the "information," a word more comprehensive than both of the others. . . . All the knowledge that comes to a physician, in regard to his patient, is information.

Again, it is obvious that the purpose of the law was to create entire confidence in the mind of the patient, that his maladies could not be disclosed by the physician. Take the case of a patient who has an ulcer produced by venereal disease. As soon as the eye of the physician rests upon it, he knows what it is, and its origin. It matters not what his patient may say. He may deny its origin, through delicacy; and yet it is by looking at the ulcer that the physician gets his "information." It is the policy of the law to encourage the patient to receive medical aid, and for his friends to assist him; and anything that would prevent so merciful a rule is against public policy. Take, for instance, cases of delirium tremens. It is for the interest of society, and certainly in harmony with every humane principle, that the patient should receive medical attention. But we will say that the physician who is called to attend upon him may be called into court to testify that he had delirium tremens. The fear that such would be the case might deter the friends of the patient from calling a physician, and thus the law would become an engine of inhumanity and cruelty, for in cases of delirium tremens the physician would get "information" in regard to the disease without any "communication" from the patient, unless his incoherent ravings may be considered as communications.

NAPTON, J. (after stating the case as above). It is contended upon the one hand that the above statute was only designed and intended to forbid the disclosure of such information as a physician while attending a patient acquires orally from the patient. It is contended, on the other hand, that the statute forbids, not only information acquired through the ear by oral communication, but also all information acquired through the eye by observation or examination of the patient after he has submitted himself to the care of the physician for examination and treatment. In settling this contention, and in determining the proper construction to be placed on said section 4017, we feel authorized to look at the adjudications in other States having similar statutes. . . .

A kindred statute has been in existence in New York since 1828. . . . This statute has been repeatedly before the Courts of that State for construction, and in a long line of decisions, beginning in 1834, it has been held that the object of the statute was to impress secrecy upon the knowledge acquired by a physician in the sick chamber, whether acquired by conversations had with the patient, or as the result of observation or examination of such patient, and which information was necessary to enable him to prescribe for the patient. . . . In Michigan the statute upon this subject is in the exact words of the New York statute, and the same construction has been put upon it by the Courts of that State, Judge COOLEY delivering the opinion in the case of Briggs v. Briggs, 20 Mich. 34. . . .

It is plausibly argued by counsel that, inasmuch as our statute differs from the New York and Michigan statutes in this, that the words "from the patient" inserted in our statute after the word "acquired," are not to be found in the New York statute, therefore the decisions above referred to are not authoritative. While it is true that the phraseology of our statute is different in the above respect from the New York statute, it is also true that the object intended to be accomplished by both is the same, and the meaning of both is the same when construed with reference to the object intended to be brought about, viz: casting "the veil of privilege" or secrecy over information acquired by a physician while professionally engaged in the sick chamber, and necessary to enable him to prescribe. Information acquired by a physician from inspection, examination or observation of the person of the patient, after he has submitted himself to such examination, may as appropriately be said to be acquired from the patient as if the same information had been orally communicated by the patient. The construction contended for by defendant's counsel, that by the statute a physician is forbidden to disclose only such information as may have been communicated to him orally by his patient, would, in our opinion, nullify the law. To hold that, while under the statute a physician would be forbidden from disclosing a statement made to him by his patient that he was suffering from syphilis; and to allow him to state as the result of his observation and examination of the patient that he was diseased with syphilis would be to make the statute inconsistent with itself. It is doubtless true that a physician learns more of the condition of a patient from his own diagnosis of the case than from what is communicated by the words of the patient; and to say that while the mouth of the physician is sealed as to the information acquired orally from his patient, it is opened wide as to information acquired from a source upon which he must rely, viz: his own diagnosis of the case, would be to restrict the operation of the statute to narrower limits than was ever intended by the Legislature and virtually to overthrow it.

It follows from what has been said that the Circuit Court erred in permitting Drs. Gregory and Bauduy, two physicians, to give in evidence the information acquired by them while attending Gartside, their patient, professionally, although such information was acquired not from what the patient said but from observation and examination.

The judgment of the St. Louis Court of Appeals reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court and remanding the cause, is affirmed, with the concurrence of all the judges.

665. McRAE v. ERICKSON

COURT OF APPEAL OF CALIFORNIA. 1905

1 Cal. App. 326; 82 Pac. 209

APPEAL from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. ALLEN, Judge. Action by Alexander McRae against Charles Erickson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bicknell, Gibson & Trask, for appellants. Edwin A. Meserve and Fred E. Burlew, for respondents.

SMITH, J. — Appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff, and from an order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial. The suit is for damages for injuries received by plaintiff while working for defendants in the construction of a tunnel for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company on the line between Los Angeles and Ventura counties. . . .

The remaining point urged is that the Court erred in excluding the testimony of Dr. Hitt as to a statement made to him by the plaintiff at the defendants' hospital, where he had been taken for treatment; and this is objected to on the two grounds: That there is nothing in the record to indicate that the witness was acting professionally, or with a view to treating plaintiff, or that the information was obtained with a view to treatment, and that the information was, in fact, not "necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient."

1. But the former point, we think, is obviously untenable. The witness was a physician and surgeon, and as such was in charge of the defendants' hospital, and his services were remunerated by assessments upon the wages of the men, so that he was, in effect, employed by the plaintiff. He examined the plaintiff as a physician, and the plaintiff knew that he was examining him as such, and the information sought was obtained from the plaintiff at the time he was examining him, or sometime during the day. The Court below, we think, was right in holding that the communication was made to the witness in the course of professional employment.

2. As to the remaining objection: The question asked the witness was: "If Mr. McRae made any statement to you, explaining how the rock fell, and how it hit him," to which he answered: "He did." The witness was then asked: "Now, state whether he told you how the rock came down and from whence it came," and, the question being objected to, the witness testified that the statement referred to "had nothing to do with his (the plaintiff's) treatment, nor with the examination of him for the purpose of determining his physical injuries"; that "it had no relation whatever to his treatment"; that "it was customary in the hospital to get a record from the patients as to how these things occurred." . . . The objection to the question was thereupon sustained, and the appellants excepted. The Court was not informed as to the effect of the statement sought, otherwise than by the questions above quoted; and from these it cannot be very clearly determined what the statement would have been. If it was as indicated by the first question, the information sought was apparently of a character necessary to the proper treatment of the patient; but information as to the direction or point whence the rock came would seem to have been unnecessary for such purpose, and to this extent, if we have regard to the most obvious sense of the provision of the statute under consideration, the objection of the respondent would seem to have been well taken.

But to give to the statute this narrow construction would equally exclude from its application many, if not most, of the answers to questions usually put, and properly and necessarily put, by competent physicians to patients in cases of this kind, in order to enable them to act for their patients. This, we think, would be to defeat the obvious purpose of the act, which, it is said, "is to facilitate and make safe, full, and confidential disclosure by patient to physician of all facts, circumstances, and symptoms, untrammeled by apprehension of their subsequent and enforced disclosure and publication on the witness stand, to the end that the physician may form a correct opinion, and be enabled safely and efficaciously to treat his patient." Will of Bruendl, 102 Wis. 47, 78 N. W. 169. . . . Though the precise question has not been determined by the Supreme Court of this State, the same view seems to have been commonly taken. . . .

We are therefore of the opinion that the view of the Court below in this case was correct, and that the intention of the statute is to exclude all statements made by a patient to his physician while attending him in that capacity for the purpose of determining his condition. Nor does this construction do violence to the language of the act liberally construed, which we think is to be understood as forbidding a physician to be examined "as to any information acquired in attending the patient, the acquisition of which was necessary (or which it was necessary for him to acquire) in order to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient." Of this necessity, from the nature of the case, the physician must commonly be regarded as the sole judge; for it would be obviously unreasonable to require of the patient the exercise of any judgment with reference to the propriety of the questions asked by his physician, except, possibly, in cases where the materiality of the question is obviously apparent.

We are of the opinion that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

BOOK II. HOW AND WHEN EVIDENCE IS TO BE PRESENTED (PROCEDURE OF ADMISSIBILITY)

TITLE I. THEORY OF ADMISSIBILITY

Topic 1. Multiple Admissibility

667. People v. Doyle. (1870. Michigan. 21 Mich. 221, 227.) Graves, J. Whenever a question is made upon the admission of evidence, it is indispensable to consider the object for which it is produced, and the point intended to be established by it. . . . It frequently happens that an item of proof is plainly relevant and proper for one purpose, while wholly inadmissible for another which it would naturally tend to establish. And when this occurs, the evidence when offered for the legal purpose can no more be excluded on the ground of its aptitude to show the unauthorized fact than its admission to prove such unauthorized fact can be justified on the ground of its aptness to prove another fact legally provable under the issue.

668. GOODHAND v. BENTON

Court of Appeals of Maryland. 1834

6 G. & J. 481

Appeal from Queen Anne's county court. This was an action of Replevin, commenced by the appellee against the appellant, on the 17th day of October, 1831, for negro boy named Bill. Issues were joined upon the pleas of non cepit, and property in defendant.

At the trial the plaintiff read to the jury a bill of sale from Charles M. Stevenson to Mary Ann Burgess, daughter of George B. and Isabella Burgess, dated February 20, 1817, of a negro woman named Rhoda, and a boy Bill, the subject of the present action.

The cause was argued before Stephen, Archer, and Dorsey, JJ.

Spencer, for the appellant. Wm. Carmichael for the appellee. . . .

Dorsey, J., delivered the opinion of the Court. . . . It has been contended by the appellant's counsel, that whether the subject matter of a cross-examination has any relevancy or bearing upon the issues made up in the cause, or has any immediate connection with, or pertinence to, any material testimony offered in relation to such issues, is wholly immaterial; that in a cross-examination for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of a witness, or involving him in contradictions, or showing his ignorance, or the inaccuracy of his memory, he may be interrogated as to any thing and every thing, without reference to its relevancy to the issues which by the pleadings in the cause have been submitted to the jury.

To such an unreasonable, pernicious, and latitudinarian principle, this Court can never yield its sanction. . . .

Having disposed of the question, as far as regards the abstract power of the appellant, in the cross-examination of the witness, let us now apply the principles of our decision to test the accuracy of the Court's opinion in the first bill of exceptions. The witness, Thomas Thomas, in his examination in chief, had testified that he knew Rhoda, the mother of Bill, in 1817, when she lived with George B. Burgess; that his father at the time of his death lived on the farm of Mary Burgess, who was a lunatic, and for whom George B. Burgess was trustee; that the witness, in December, 1817, went to the house of George B. Burgess, who then resided in Church Hill, to settle with Burgess for the rent of the farm, and that while there, he was carried by Burgess into the kitchen, where he saw Rhoda's child, then an infant, of but a few weeks old; that he took out letters of administration on the estate of his father, James Thomas, in June, 1817, and that he did not go to settle with Burgess until after he had taken out letters. And the witness, on being cross-examined, stated that he did not apply to Burgess to know the state of his father's accounts before the date of his letters; that he knew the state of his accounts; that his father was indebted to Burgess for a store account, and for the hire of a negro, and for a store; besides a balance of the rent. That the rent was not settled between him and Burgess; they having differed, the subject was referred, and was before arbitrators two years or more; and that he had never charged his father's estate for the rent, in any account passed by him with the Orphan's court. The plaintiff then produced the letters of administration, dated June 1, 1817.

All this testimony, with the other proof set forth in the bill of exceptions, being before the jury, without objection by either party, the defendant offered to read in evidence the account passed by the witness, and the co-administratrix of his father, before the Orphan's court in June, 1818, containing among other credits the following: "for cash due from said deceased to George B. Burgess, trustee of Mary Burgess, and paid by these accountants, as per account proved, and receipt allowed $226.74:" declaring the object of the testimony then offered, to be, to contradict Thomas Thomas, and impeach the accuracy of his recollection in regard to the passing an account for rent and as to the time expended in investigating the claim before arbitrators; but the Court refused to permit the said accounts being laid before the jury for the purpose for which the same was offered.

As to the correctness of this refusal, we fully concur in opinion with the County Court. The testimony which had been offered on the cross-examination, unless subsequently made competent by the production of the account for a legitimate purpose, was wholly irrelevant and immaterial to the issues in the cause. If the purpose for which the account was offered, was effectuated — if the facts which it was designed to prove were established or admitted — the evidence given on the cross-examination was still left wholly irrelevant, impertinent to the issues, and every material fact proved in relation to them; and being so, no testimony contradictory thereof was admissible to impeach the credit of the witness or show the inaccuracy of his memory. For the purpose, then, for which the account was offered in evidence, we think it clearly inadmissible, and approve of its rejection as made by the County Court. . . .

In the Court's rejection of the account, they do not declare it admissible evidence for no purpose, but simply that it was inadmissible for the purpose for which it was offered. It was still open to the appellant to offer it as evidence for any other purpose, for which it was legally competent. Had the defendant offered the account in evidence generally, without specifying his object, or had stated it to be to contradict or discredit the testimony of the witness given on his examination in chief, in relation to his statement of having seen Rhoda's child, a few weeks old in December, 1817, upon the principles settled by this Court in Davis et al. v. Barney, 2 Gill and Johns. 382, . . . there could not have been a doubt as to its legal admissibility. Connecting it with the proof offered on the cross-examination, it was testimony legally sufficient to have been submitted to the consideration of the jury. . . . The witness, on his examination in chief, had proved that in December, 1817, (after the granting of his letters of administration in the June preceding) he had called on George B. Burgess to settle the rent, and saw there Rhoda's child, Bill (the negro in controversy), then but a few weeks old; and on his cross-examination he deposed, that the rent was not settled between him and Burgess; but that having differed as to the rent, it was referred to arbitrators, and remained before them two years or more. The account passed by the Orphan's court is evidence, that the witness paid the rent anterior to June 18, 1818. All the statements of the witness, therefore, cannot possibly be true. A part of the testimony elicited by the cross-examination was in direct collision with that given on the examination in chief: both could not stand together. It could not be true, that the controversy about the rent was two or more years before the arbitrators, if the reference had been made as stated by the witness. Which statement was true, the jury only was competent to decide. Should they have believed that the subject of the rent was before the arbitrators two or more years, it was within the scope of their powers to conclude that the reference, though continued afterwards, commenced in the lifetime of James Thomas; and that the witness was mistaken in dating his visit to George B. Burgess' house in December, 1817; that in truth it occurred in December, 1816. . . .

Concurring in opinion with the County Court, on both bills of exception, we affirm the judgment. Judgment affirmed.

669. PEGG v. WARFORD

COURT OF APPEALS OF MARYLAND. 1855

7 Md. 582, 607

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for Baltimore county.

This was a case of issues from the Orphan's court, to try the validity of two wills executed by Rachel Colvin, deceased, the one on the 30th of October, 1845, and the other on the 6th of April, 1848. . . . These issues were. . . . Whether the paper of the 6th of April, 1848, was . . . executed by her under the influence of suggestions and importunities of some person or persons, when her mind, from its diseased or enfeebled state, was unable to resist the same? . . .

The caveatee, upon the cross-examination of St. George W. Teackle, a witness produced by the caveators, proved that he (witness) endeavored to get the testatrix, Rachel Colvin, to insert in the will of 1845 the name of Mrs. Mary Ann Ellicott, as a devisee, but the said testatrix refused, upon the ground that Mrs. Ellicott was the only child of a rich father. . . . The caveators then proved by Mrs. Ellicott, a competent witness, that in the year 1847, and in the fall of that year, the defendant, Colvin Warford, called upon her, and in the course of conversation during his visit, asked her if she knew how much her father was worth? to which she replied, "I do not." That Colvin Warford then said he had been to New Jersey, and would tell her how much he was worth, and that he was worth $100,000. . . . The caveatee then offered to examine Mr. Shrope as a witness, and having called him to the stand, he was objected to by the caveator's counsel, and the counsel for the caveatee being asked what they offered to prove by said witness, said, that they offered said witness for the purpose of contradicting Mrs. Ellicott, or impeaching her, by showing that she was mistaken as to the time of said conversation, if any was had, or that the statement of said Warford in said conversation, if it was had, was true. The caveatee then proved by said Shrope that he was one of the assessors of one of the townships of Hunterdon county, New Jersey, where Elisha Warford, the father of Mrs. Ellicott, resided. . . . That in 1852, Colvin Warford called upon him to ascertain what was the amount and value of Elisha Warford's estate, that Elisha Warford was going security upon a bond in Maryland; that witness showed to Colvin Warford the assessment of Elisha Warford's estate, which was $10,000 worth of real estate, and that he owned lands in other places. . . .

To the admissibility of all which testimony of said Shrope, for the purpose for which it was offered, the counsel for the caveators objected, but the Court overruled their objection, and permitted the evidence to go to the jury. To this ruling the caveators excepted. . . .

The verdict was in favor of the caveatee upon all the issues, and the caveators appealed.

The cause was argued before LE GRAND, C. J., ECCLESTON and MASON, JJ.

Henry Winter Davis, Grafton L. Dulany, and John Johnson, for the appellants. . . . The second exception relates to the admissibility of the testimony of Shrope for the purposes for which it was offered. When Shrope was called as a witness and was objected to, and the counsel for the caveatee were requested to state for what purpose they offered him, they said that they offered him for the purpose of contradicting Mrs. Ellicott, or impeaching her by showing that she was mistaken as to the time of said conversation if any was had, or that the statement of Warford in said conversation, if it was had, was true. Now these purposes being legitimate we could make no further objection until the testimony was in. When the testimony was given, we then objected that it did not come up to the purposes for which it was offered, and insisted that it was the duty of the Court below to have it ruled out. Now we say:

1st. That this testimony was inadmissible and utterly incompetent to sustain any one of the purposes for which it was offered. . . .

2d. But conceding the evidence of Shrope was admissible for one or two of the three purposes for which it was offered and admitted by the Court, we still ask for a reversal of the judgment, if for the remaining purpose for which it was offered and let in the proof was not admissible. The purposes were stated in the alternative, and therefore unless the appellee was entitled to the benefit of the proof in support of each and every alternative, he has by the judgment of the Court below obtained an advantage to which he is not entitled. We say that unless it was admissible to establish each one and all of the purposes for which it was offered, the testimony should have been excluded.

William Schley and Reverdy Johnson, for the appellee. . . . The only issue to which the evidence of Mrs. Ellicott had any application, was the second, and the object was to show by it that Miss Colvin was so influenced by the suggestion of the appellee that Elisha Warford was worth $100,000, that no legacy was given to Mrs. Ellicott, the only child of Elisha Warford. It was therefore important that the appellee should contradict this testimony, so far as was in his power. . . . The evidence was properly admitted for what it was worth for the consideration of the jury. . . .

Now what is the meaning of the objection? It is said, that if this testimony was not admissible for any one of the purposes for which it was offered, it was improper to admit it. But this is an entire misapprehension of the law. . . . The objection was a general one, that the testimony was not admissible for the purposes for which it was offered. . . . If admissible for any of the purposes offered, it was properly admitted. . . . The exception was to all the testimony of Shrope, for the purpose for which it was offered. If any part was admissible, the exception pro tanto was too broad. . . .

Our positions therefore, upon this exception, are:

1st. That the evidence of Shrope was admissible for the purpose of showing (should it avail with the other evidence in the case,) that Mrs. Ellicott was mistaken as to the time of the alleged conversation with the appellee.

2d. That it was admissible for the purpose of showing that the representation, if made by the appellee, as to the pecuniary condition of Elisha Warford, was true, and was not a misrepresentation. . . .

3rd. That proof of the fact that the appellee never applied but once, and in 1852, to Shrope for information as to the pecuniary condition of Elisha Warford, was a circumstance which . . . the caveatee was entitled to have submitted to the jury as part of his rebutting evidence. . . .

4th. That it was admissible for all the purposes specified respectively in the preceding points.

5th. That if admissible for any of these purposes, this second exception is not well taken.

6th. That if any part of this evidence was admissible for any one of the purposes indicated, the exception being taken to the whole, cannot be sustained. . . .

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the Court. . . . The second exception relates to the testimony of the witness Shrope. When the caveatee proposed to examine this witness, he was objected to by the other side, but the record does not disclose upon what ground the objection then rested. Such an objection, at such a time, must go to the competency of the witness, and not to the admissibility of his testimony, for until the evidence is offered, no question of admissibility could arise. The legal presumption being in favor of the competency of every witness produced on the stand, no objection to the competency of such witness should be entertained, unless the party making it discloses at the time the ground upon which the objection is based. A mere general, indefinite objection will not avail. Hence the objection in this case, to Shrope, was improperly made, and the caveatee was not bound to state any special purpose for which he was offered, or to show, until the contrary was at least prima facie established, that the party was a competent and legal witness. The facts to be disclosed by this witness, if admissible for any purpose, might have been offered generally, as all legal and pertinent evidence for the most part may be offered. Goodhand v. Benton, 6 Gill & John., 488 [ante, No. 668].

But the caveatee did not avail himself of his legal rights in this particular, but proceeded to assign three several objects in the alternative, for which the evidence was offered, each of which, in the then aspect of the case, was a legitimate subject of proof. By the case of Goodhand v. Benton, [ante, No. 668], it may be regarded as settled, that if evidence offered for a particular purpose, be inadmissible for that purpose, though admissible generally, or for some other object, it may be properly rejected. Acknowledging this principle to be sound, it would follow, that if the evidence of Shrope had been admissible for all the special objects for which it was tendered, though perchance it might be legal evidence for some other purpose, it should have been rejected; and the appellants contend that the principle should be carried to the extent of determining that unless admissible for each and all the several purposes for which it was offered, it should not have been received, and this is the main point involved in this exception.

The testimony of Shrope, if applicable at all to the issues in the case, might have been offered generally, as we have already shown. If it were competent testimony for any purpose, it must be presumed to have been for one or the other of the subjects for which it was alleged to be offered; at least no attempt was made to use it for any other. If it could have been offered for no other purpose, does it not follow that the offer was virtually a general offer, even though, in point of fact, the testimony may not have been legally applicable to all of the points to which it was declared to relate? If there be any reason why the omission to mention all the purposes for which the testimony might be applicable, when you have attempted to name some, would be fatal to its admissibility for the purposes not mentioned, it must be because the opposite party might be thereby misled, and prevented from fortifying himself with rebutting testimony upon the point, in reference to which he may have been led to believe the testimony was not to be used. While the omission to mention all the purposes to which this testimony might relate, might have such an effect, it is difficult to imagine why such a result, or why any other inconvenience could follow from enumerating among the proper purposes for which testimony was offered, others for which it was not. The question resolves itself then into this, was the testimony admissible for any of the purposes for which it was offered?

An attempt had been made on the part of the caveators to show, by Mrs. Ellicott, that Miss Colvin, the testatrix, had been deceived by false representations made by Colvin Warford, as to the pecuniary condition of Elisha Warford, the father of Mrs. Ellicott, by which the latter lost a legacy which she supposes she would otherwise have received. It is said he represented Elisha Warford to Miss Colvin as being worth $100,000. If this were a fact, or if he honestly believed it to be a fact, there was no impropriety in Warford's having mentioned it to Miss Colvin, let his motive for doing so be what it may. The caveatee offered Shrope, at this juncture of the case, as he stated, "for the purpose of contradicting Mrs. Ellicott, or impeaching her, by showing that she was mistaken as to the time of said conversation, if any was had, or that the statement of said Warford, in said conversation, if it was had, was true." . . .

One of the purposes, then, assigned for offering this testimony, was to show that this statement of Warford was made in good faith. The issue thus collaterally arising was simply, Was or was not the statement true, that Elisha Warford was worth $100,000? . . . Shrope surely proved a material part of that sum, and his testimony was therefore clearly admissible. . . .

But it has been said, that as this evidence was received for all or either of the three purposes for which it was offered, unless it was legally applicable to each, the jury might have been misled, and applied it to one of the purposes to which it did not relate. To avoid such a result, it was the duty of the counsel objecting to have pointed out specifically the purpose to which the testimony had no legal application, and to ask its exclusion for such purpose. A general objection to testimony which is per se applicable to the case for any purpose will not be sustained, though inapplicable for other purposes; and such general objection would leave the testimony to go to the jury as if no objection had been made at all; in other words, it would be virtually an offer generally of competent testimony. Under such circumstances, suppose, in argument before the jury in this case, the counsel for the appellee had endeavored to show that besides the testimony's tending to establish that the statement of Warford was true, it also contradicted the previous statements of Mrs. Ellicott, when, in fact, if it had been offered solely for the latter purpose, it would have been rejected as illegal evidence, what would have been the effect? Could the judgment have been reversed upon the assumption that the jury made an improper, instead of a proper application of the evidence? Surely not! We must assume, where evidence has been offered generally, that it will be applied by the jury to the purposes to which it is legally applicable; and if counsel wish to guard against the contingency of a misapplication of the evidence by the jury, they should ask the Court, as has been already said, to point out the branch of the case to which the evidence is not to be applied. . . .

As to the sufficiency of this evidence to establish the fact, we say nothing; it was for the jury alone, upon a properly framed prayer, to say whether the issue was proved or not. . . .

Judgment affirmed.

ECCLESTON, J., dissented.

670. BALL v. UNITED STATES. (United States Circuit Court of Appeals. 1906. 147 Fed. 32, 38.) GILBERT, J.: . . . The trial Court, over the objection of the plaintiff in error, admitted the record of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California of the conviction of the plaintiff in error of said offence. . . .

It is contended that the failure of the trial Court to instruct the jury that the evidence of the prior conviction of the plaintiff in error was to be considered only as tending to affect the credibility of his testimony was error. There was no request for such an instruction, nor was any objection made to the omission of the Court so to instruct, nor is the failure of the Court so to instruct assigned as error. In Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri it is held, contrary to the general rule, that in criminal cases the omission of the Court to charge the jury fully as to any branch of the law of the case, though not requested, is ground for reversal, unless it is clear that no injury could have resulted therefrom. . . . But we think it may be said to be the general rule that the mere omission of the Court, in the absence of a specific request, to limit the effect of evidence admitted only for a certain purpose, is not error.

Topic 2. Curative Admissibility

671. MOWRY v. SMITH

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1864

9 All. 67

TORT to recover damages for an assault and battery.

At the trial in the Superior Court, before AMES, J., the committing of an assault and battery was admitted; and the defendant, for the purpose of showing provocation, introduced evidence to show that the plaintiff had charged him with attempting to pass counterfeit $500 bills at Brighton market, to which the defendant was in the habit of going. The plaintiff denied that he had made this charge, but testified that he said to the defendant, "People do say that you show bad money;" and he was allowed to testify, under objection, that he had seen the defendant frequently show his money at Brighton; that the defendant would take it out in papers, and show it, several thousand dollars at a time.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleged exceptions.

F. H. Dewey, (A. Dadmun with him,) for the defendant. G. F. Hoar, for the plaintiff.

BIGELOW, C. J.—We are at a loss to understand on what ground evidence was introduced at the trial of this case to show that the plaintiff had charged the defendant with passing counterfeit money. Unless this charge was made at the time the alleged assault was committed, and so formed part of the res gestæ, which does not appear by the exceptions, the evidence was clearly incompetent, even in mitigation of damages. Provocation cannot be shown unless it was so recent and immediate as to lead to the inference that the violence was committed under the direct influence of the passion wrongfully excited by the plaintiff, and before there was time for opportunity for it to cool and subside. Avery v. Ray, 1 Mass. 12. Lee v. Woolsey, 19 Johns. 319.

But the introduction of this evidence was not objected to by the plaintiff at the trial. The question then arises, how far the admission of incompetent and irrelevant evidence offered by one party, to which no objection is taken, renders it competent for the opposite party to introduce evidence of a similar character.

There certainly must be some limit beyond which parties cannot be permitted to go, in extending issues of fact and bringing into a case matters which have no essential bearing on its real merits. Without indicating a general rule applicable to all cases of this nature, we think it may be safely said that a party should not be allowed to go farther than to prove facts which have a direct tendency to contradict and control the irrelevant or incompetent evidence which his adversary has introduced into the case. To this extent, it may be properly held that the latter has waived the strict rule of law applicable to such evidence, and is estopped from objecting to the proof of facts, by the opposite party, which can be properly deemed to be contradictory or in rebuttal of those offered by himself. It seems to us that the plaintiff was allowed to transcend this limit at the trial, in the introduction of evidence to which the defendant objected. He was not confined to disproof of the fact that he had charged the defendant with passing counterfeit money, which was the only ground of provocation which the latter had attempted to establish. The plaintiff was allowed to go much further, and to show the distinct and independent fact that the defendant had large sums of money in his possession, which he would take out in papers and show to persons about him, to the amount of several thousand dollars at a time. This was an irrelevant and immaterial fact, which not only had no bearing on the true issue between the parties, but did not tend to contradict or control the evidence which the defendant had introduced in mitigation of damages.

The plaintiff's counsel suggests that the evidence to which objection was taken could have no tendency to injure the defendant, and that not being prejudiced by its admission he has no valid ground of exception. But we cannot regard the evidence in such a light. In connection with the alleged provocation and the testimony of the plaintiff that he had stated that people said that the defendant showed bad money, the evidence offered by the plaintiff was calculated to lead to the inference that the defendant was the possessor of counterfeit money, and thus to disparage his character, and create in the minds of the jury a prejudice against him. Exceptions sustained.

672. PHELPS v. HUNT. (1875. Connecticut. 43 Conn. 194, 199.) LOOMIS, J. — On the cross-examination the plaintiff asked the defendant what he told Goodman about a sale of his goods to one Foskett. . . . This question, being objected to by the defendant, was ruled out by the auditor. It is obvious that this whole subject matter, both of the direct and cross-examination, was wholly irrelevant, and ought not to have been entertained at all. . . .

The plaintiff seems to assume that if the cross-examination was pertinent to the examination in chief it necessarily makes the ruling erroneous. This proposition we do not accept. Where the plaintiff stands on matters "strictí juris," it must appear that the particular ruling complained of was erroneous in law. We cannot hold that it was error in law to rule out, objection being made, what it would have been error to admit, merely because the Court had received without objection matter just as irrelevant before. The maxim, "Similia similibus curantur," has been applied to some extent in the science of medicine, but the principle has never been recognized as applied to the cure of errors in law.

673. Sisler v. Shaffer. (1897. West Virginia. 43 W. Va. 769; 28 S. E. 721.) Dent, J.—To discredit the defendant's testimony, the Court allowed the plaintiff, over the objection of the defendant, to introduce the witnesses Lynch and Wright, who testified that about the same time the defendant had purchased separate bills of lumber of them, and that they had or were about to sue him therefor. This was not a matter material to the issue, about which the defendant ordinarily could be contradicted. His own evidence on the point was irrelevant, but, having introduced it in support of his evidence, the plaintiff had the right to contradict it. "A party who draws from his own witness irrelevant testimony, which is prejudicial to the opposing party, ought not to be heard to object to its contradiction on the ground of its irrelevancy." 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 793; State v. Sergent, 32 Me. 429. Strange cattle having wandered through a gap made by himself, he cannot complain.

Topic 3. Conditional Admissibility

675. ROGERS v. BRENT

10 Ill. 573

This was an action of ejectment, and upon the trial in the circuit court the plaintiff below introduced a patent from the United States, for the premises in question, to Jesse Bowman as assignee of Samuel M. Bowman, dated on the first of May, 1843, which was followed by a deed from Jesse Bowman to Brent, dated December 1st, 1846. The plaintiff then proved the possession of the defendant, and closed his case.

The defendant then offered to prove by the register's certificate, that the land in controversy was entered at the land office by Samuel M. Bowman on the 19th of May, 1840, and that he assigned his certificate of purchase to Jesse Bowman on the 5th of April, 1843. He also offered the record of a judgment in the Lee circuit court, against Samuel M. Bowman, which was entered on the 12th day of September, 1842, upon which an execution was issued on the 28th of the same month, by virtue of which the sheriff levied on the premises in question, and advertised and sold them according to law to Southwick, who obtained a sheriff's deed on the 17th of December, 1844. As each portion of this evidence was offered it was objected to, and ruled out by the Court, and an exception taken. A verdict and judgment were entered for the plaintiff. . . .

The plaintiff in error assigned for errors the several decisions of the Circuit Court in excluding the evidence recited above.

J. O. Glover and B. C. Cook, for the plaintiff in error. . . .

The certificate of the Register was evidence of title in Samuel M. Bowman at the time of the sale of the land on the judgment. . . .

E. S. Leland, for the defendants in error. The certificate of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is not sufficient to prove when the certificate of entry was assigned. The certificate supposed to be assigned, or a certified copy thereof, should have been produced, in order that the Court might see whether the assignment of said certificate is valid. . . . The defendant below was not injured by the exclusion of his offered evidence, because there is no evidence in this case, nor was any offered, to connect him with Southwick's title. . . .

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

CATON, J. . . . It is first necessary to inquire what rights were acquired under the judgment and sheriff's sale and conveyance, as against the patentee and his grantee, and then whether these rights could be asserted and vindicated in this action of ejectment. . . .

Having shown in what way it was competent for Rogers to prove that he did not, in the language of the issue, "unlawfully withhold the possession," it only remains to be seen whether the evidence which he offered, and which was excluded by the Court, tended to prove such a case.

All of the interest which Samuel M. Bowman ever had in the land, whether legal or equitable, passed to Southwick by the sale under the execution and the sheriff's deed, as completely as if the transfer had been by voluntary conveyance and Southwick was as much entitled to a patent in the one case as he would have been in the other. . . . At the time of the assignment by Samuel M. Bowman, he had no interest in the premises except the right of redemption of which the assignee never availed himself, and the sheriff's deed must relate back to the time of the judgment, which was notice to all the world of everything which was legally done under it. The rights acquired by the sheriff's deed stand upon as high ground as if the Patent had been issued to Jesse Bowman without any assignment at all; for as to those rights the assignment was utterly void. The assignor had no interest which he could assign except the right of redemption, and the assignee was bound to know this. A Patent issued under a void assignment could convey no more right than one issued upon a second sale when the first was valid, and in such a case the Supreme Court of the United States has said that the Patent conveys no title.

. . . The question is, not whether the debt's offer of evidence was sufficent of itself to make out the defence, but would it aid to make out the case? Would it tend to prove the defence? Most cases have to be proved by a succession of distinct facts, neither of which standing alone would amount to anything, while all taken together form a connected chain and establish the issue; and from necessity a party must be allowed to present his case in such detached parts as the nature of his evidence requires. It would be no less absurd than inconvenient, when proof is offered in its proper order, of one necessary fact, to require the party to go on and offer to prove at the same time all the other necessary facts to make out the case. Such a practice would embarrass the administration of justice and prove detrimental to the rights of parties. It may be that Rogers was bound to connect himself with Southwick's title before he could insist that the patent was void because obtained in fraud of such title; but he must first prove such title to exist before he could connect himself with it; and this he was not allowed to do. If he was bound to connect himself with Bowman's creditors, to avail himself of the fraud practiced upon them, he must first show that there were such creditors; and the judgment which proved this was ruled out by the Court. It is the right of the party, when he offers evidence in its proper order which proves or tends to prove any necessary fact in the case, to have it go to the jury; for the reasonable presumption is that it will be followed by such other proof as is necessary for its proper connection, and if it is not, it then becomes irrelevant, and as such, if desired, may be withdrawn from the jury. If there is anything to induce the suspicion that the time of the Court is being trifled with, it may be proper to call upon counsel to state the connection which they expect to give the proposed evidence; but this should ordinarily be avoided, as it is often embarrassing for counsel to anticipate their case in the presence of the opposite party.

It may sometimes happen that evidence is offered so out of its proper place as to authorize the Court to exclude it for want of a proper foundation; as, in this case, had the sheriff's deed been offered without the previous proceedings, it might have been properly excluded till the proper foundation for it was shown. No such objection, however, existed in this case. The party commenced at the foundation of his case, and offered to establish the first necessary fact; and, when that was ruled out, he still persisted in offering to prove subsequent parts of his case dependent upon those previously offered and rejected, till his repeated offers had almost the appearance of wrestling with the opinion of the Court. He proceeded as far as duty or propriety required; for it was apparent then, as it is now, that the evidence was ruled out because it was the opinion of the Court that it was not competent to defeat the Patent, by the case which the evidence tended to show, and not because the party did not propose evidence enough. Nor has it been insisted here that the evidence was ruled out because Rogers did not offer to connect himself with Southwick's title, but the whole effort has been to sustain the decision upon the other ground.

We are of opinion that the Court erred in rejecting the evidence offered, and for that reason the judgment is reversed with costs, and the cause remanded. Judgment reversed.

676. Campau v. Dewey. (1861. Michigan. 9 Mich. 381, 422.) Christiancy, J. — On the direct examination, it is true, if the relevancy of a proposed inquiry does not appear, the Court have a right to call on the counsel to state the object of the proposed testimony and the manner in which it is to be made relevant; and the Court may in the exercise of its discretion require a particular statement of the substance of the evidence in connection with which the proposed inquiry is to be rendered pertinent, and, if refused, may reject the evidence. . . .

But on a cross-examination the rule as to relevancy is not so strict; and it would be a very unsafe rule which should allow the Court to reject evidence, which may in any manner be rendered material, because the party proposing it has not volunteered to precede it with a statement of its precise object and of the other facts in connection with which it is to be rendered material. The Court may doubtless, in its discretion, when a question is asked on cross-examination which he thinks cannot be rendered pertinent, require an intimation of its object, and reject the evidence if not given. But this is a discretion which should be very sparingly exercised, and nothing further than a bare intimation should generally be required; for, in many cases, to state the precise object of a cross-examination would be to defeat it.

678. ELLIS v. THAYER

183 Mass. 309; 67 N. E. 325

TORT by a card stripper for injuries in the defendant's mill at East Dedham, from being struck by a loose pulley alleged to have come off a shaft owing to a screw not being tightened properly. Writ dated March 16, 1901. In the Superior Court the case was tried before MASON, C. J. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,200; and the defendant alleged exceptions.

The plaintiff while employed as a card stripper in the defendant's factory, was injured by a loose pulley which came off from a shaft and struck him. The pulley, when in use, is held in its place near the end of the shaft by an iron collar which surrounds the shaft at the end, and is fastened there by a screw which passes through the collar and engages the shaft. There is, or should be, a small slot in the shaft to receive the screw. The evidence tended to show that this screw was not turned up to its place, and that the collar and pulley came off from the shaft because at the time there was nothing to hold them on.

The first exception relates to the admission of testimony. A witness was called to testify that once previously, about four years before this accident, the collar and pulley came off. The judge ruled, subject to the defendant's exception, that the question might be answered on the condition that, unless further evidence should be offered that the machines remained the same, the judge would order it stricken out if called to his attention, and the counsel for the defendant thereupon said, "I will call your honor's attention to it." At the close of the plaintiff's case the attention of the judge was called to the fact that the evidence had not disclosed that the machine remained unchanged, and the judge thereupon ordered the evidence stricken out. This order was made in the absence of the jury, but the judge's attention was not called to the jury's absence, and neither the counsel nor the judge referred to this evidence again until several days after the end of the trial.

S. R. Spring, (H. R. Bygrave with him,) for the defendant. E. Greenhood, for the plaintiff.

Knowlton, C. J. (after stating the case as above). The ruling excepted to was within the discretion of the judge. The meaning and effect of it was, that, for reasons satisfactory to the judge, the testimony might be heard then, with an understanding that it would not be considered as evidence unless afterwards supported by other testimony which would make it competent. Of course, testimony should not be received in this way if it is of a kind which will be likely to prejudice the jury notwithstanding that it is subsequently stricken from the case and an instruction given that they are not to consider it. But sometimes it is convenient and not harmful to receive testimony in this way, and ordinarily the decision of the presiding justice on a question of this kind should be treated as final. The ruling excepted to contemplated striking the evidence from the record in a way which would leave the case as if it never had been presented. This would involve an instruction to the jury to disregard it, unless they already understood the ruling under which it was received; and the defendant's counsel, who undertook to bring the matter to the Court's attention, must have known this. The evidence was subsequently stricken from the record at the defendant's request, and the manner of doing it probably was satisfactory to the counsel at the time. . . . Moreover, if the jury were attentive to the ruling when the testimony was received, they must have known that in the absence of additional proof, it was not to be regarded. We are of opinion that under these circumstances he should not be permitted to have the benefit of an exception founded upon the failure of the judge to instruct the jury about it, when the only exception that he took was to a matter within the discretion of the Court. . . . Exceptions overruled.

679. PUTNAM v. HARRIS

193 Mass. 58; 78 N. E. 747

TORT for alleged negligence in causing the burning over of a woodlot of the plaintiff in Templeton. Writ dated August 8, 1905. In the Superior Court the case was tried before PIERCE, J. . . .

The testimony was conflicting as to whether the fire which started on the defendants' land spread to the plaintiff's land and caused the damage alleged. The defendants had in their employ one McNaughton, who died about a month before the bringing of this action. . . . The plaintiff offered the testimony of Frank L. Putnam, the plaintiff's son, to a conversation between him and McNaughton on the evening of the fire, which was objected to by the defendants and was admitted by the judge against the exception of the defendants. . . . The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $577.54; and the defendants alleged exceptions.

G. R. Warfield, for the defendants. J. P. Carney, for the plaintiff.

LORING, J. — The testimony was admitted under Rev. Laws, c. 175, § 66, and was competent against the defendants if it was shown that McNaughton had authority from them to give the directions in question. Whether evidence of the directions given should be admitted first and the authority shown later, or the evidence of the directions given should be excluded until McNaughton's authority was shown, was a matter to be decided by the presiding judge in his discretion.

It heretofore has been generally laid down that in such a case the exception will not be sustained unless it appears from the bill of exceptions that the evidence was not properly connected. Whitcher v. McLaughlin, 115 Mass. 167; Costello v. Crowell, 133 Mass. 352, where the earlier cases are collected. It is more correct to say that the exception will not be sustained unless the fact that the evidence admitted de bene had not been properly connected afterwards was brought to the attention of the Court and a further ruling on that ground asked for. The rule was so laid down in Brady v. Finn, 162 Mass. 260. See, also, Williams v. Clark, 182 Mass. 316.

But whichever is the true statement of the rule, the exception in question must be overruled. The matter was not subsequently brought to the attention of the Court either by a request to strike out the evidence admitted de bene, or by a request for a ruling that there was no evidence for the jury on this point.

683. FARLEIGH v. KELLEY

SUPREME COURT OF MONTANA. 1903

28 Mont. 421; 72 Pac. 756

APPEAL from District Court, Jefferson County; HENRY C. SMITH, Judge. Petition by Caroline V. Kelley for the probate of an instrument purporting to be the last will of John D. Allport, deceased, to which Lillie Sue Farleigh and others filed objections as contestants. From a judgment for contestants, petitioner appeals. Affirmed. . . . The cause came on for trial before the Court and a jury, and, . . . the jury found against the petitioner, and declared that the instrument offered was not the will of John D. Allport. From an order overruling petitioner's motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken.

T. J. Walsh, B. H. Giles, and Geo. F. Cowan, for appellant. Walsh & Newman, Robert B. Smith, and Chas. R. Leonard, for respondents.

HOLLOWAY, J. . . . 5. Upon the trial the petitioner sought to prove by the witness Nichols that in May, 1899, the subscribing witness Geigerich had come to his office and handed to him the will in controversy, at the same time explaining the circumstances under which he had held possession of the document from the time of its alleged execution. The substance of Geigerich's statement to Nichols was that in October, 1895, Allport had executed the will, and gone with Geigerich to the office of the Butte Hardware Company to leave the instrument with one Kirby; that Kirby was not in, and Allport then handed it to Geigerich and asked him to deliver it to Kirby; that he (Geigerich) put the will away, and forgot about it until May, 1899, when he went to get a paper from a box in which he kept valuable papers, and discovered the will and brought it to Nichols. The offer to prove these declarations by the witness Nichols was excluded.

As we have heretofore seen, Geigerich was, to all intents and purposes, a witness in court, testifying under oath that the facts recited in the attestation clause actually occurred as therein set forth, and the reason for the rule which now excludes these declarations made by him to Nichols is that his declarations not made under oath cannot strengthen the testimony which he has given under oath. . . . The declarations of Geigerich were hearsay, and notably so are his declarations of declarations made to him by Allport.

But it is contended that they should have been received as a part of the res gestæ. They were made nearly four years after the alleged will purports to have been executed, and cannot, therefore, be said to characterize or explain the principal fact, viz., the execution of the will. As to that, they are narrations of a past transaction, and, as such, inadmissible.

But it is contended that they characterize and tend to explain the possession of the will, and for that purpose, at least, were admissible. The evidence was offered en masse — the offer was an entirety; and along with the declarations of Geigerich, explaining his possession, were the declarations made to him by Allport, and these, as offered, were incompetent under any phase of the case. So long, then, as the offer included evidence incompetent, coupled with that which may have been competent, the Court committed no error in excluding the offer in its entirety. It was not the duty of the Court to separate the competent from the incompetent matter, and admit the one and exclude the other. It properly passed upon the order as made, and was not required to do for counsel that which he should have done for himself. Yoder v. Reynolds, 28 Mont. 183, 72 Pac. 417; Clark v. Ryan, 95 Ala. 406, 11 South. 22; Bank v. North, 2 S. D. 480, 51 N. W. 96; Thompson on Trials, 678. . . .

The order overruling petitioner's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

Affirmed.

MILBURN, J. — I concur, although I do not agree with Mr. Justice HOLLOWAY in all that is said in sections 5 and 6 of the opinion.

BRANTLY, C. J., concurs.

684. INDIANAPOLIS & MARTINSVILLE RAPID TRANSIT CO. v. HALL. (1905. Indiana. 165 Ind. 557; 76 N. E. 242.) GILLETT, C. J.: This was an action by appellee to recover for an injury to his person. . . . The record shows that appellee's counsel objected "to Dr. Hylton testifying as a witness in this case as to anything he learned, either by observation or examination, or from the statements of the plaintiff, while he was treating him as a physician." Then follows an offer to prove upon the part of appellant. The offer, as set out in the record, involves various subjects. . . . The record then shows that the Court sustained the objection of appellant, and refused to allow the witness to testify, to which ruling appellant excepted. . . .

The course pursued by appellant's counsel was objectionable in another particular, and that is that the offer to prove what was said was part of a general offer that involved an offer to introduce incompetent testimony. It is the duty of a party to select the competent from the incompetent in offering testimony, and he cannot impose this duty upon the trial Court. . . . The later decisions of this Court uphold the view that a ruling that a witness is incompetent will not excuse the making of a sufficient offer to prove. State ex rel. v. Cox, 155 Ind.

593, 58 N. E. 849; Toner v. Wagner, 158 Ind. 447, 63 N. E. 859. The rules of practice above indicated are not merely arbitrary, but they are rules which experience has demonstrated to be essential to the administration of justice. It is too much to expect that a Court, without even the aid of an apposite question, shall sift out of a long offer to prove, consisting largely of that which is incompetent, an item of proposed testimony which would only be admissible because of certain testimony which had been previously offered by the other side. The sustaining of an objection to the question in such circumstances is not error, and even the [erroneous] indicating by the Court that the witness is incompetent will not dispense with the necessity of an appropriate question and a proper offer to prove. It is only by the method of saving questions above indicated that misapprehensions can be avoided during the course of a trial, and that the Court on appeal can be advised that the ruling was made with a precise understanding of its import.

SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS. 1905

71 Kan. 312; 80 Pac. 629

ERROR from Reno District Court; MATTHEW P. SIMPSON, Judge. Opinion filed April 8, 1905. Affirmed.

Isaac E. Marshall executed a deed purporting to convey a tract of land to two of his sons and the wife of a third son, but reserving a life-interest in the grantor. About two years later he began a suit to set aside the deed, alleging that his signature had been procured by the fraudulent representation, believed and relied upon by him, that the instrument contained a provision making it revocable at his pleasure. Issues were joined and tried, the testimony being largely oral. The Court found generally for the defendants and rendered judgment accordingly, which the plaintiff now seeks to have reversed. . . .

The fraudulent representations relied upon were alleged to have been made by Elmer Marshall, the husband of one of the grantees. The plaintiff testified that after the deed was made he had a conversation with Elmer about deeding back the land, but that he did not, however, talk to him anything about leaving out the condition authorizing a revocation. The question was then put: "What did you ask him?" Thereupon the defendants objected "to any conversation with Elmer after the deed was executed, as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial — not binding on these defendants." The objection was sustained, and the ruling was excepted to, and is now assigned as error. No further questions were asked, however, and no offer was made to explain the purpose of the inquiry already made or to show any specific fact by the witness.

Carr W. Taylor, and J. U. Brown, for plaintiff in error. George A. Vandeveer, and F. L. Martin, for defendants in error.

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

MASON, J. (after stating the case as above). . . . In this condition of the record the action of the Court must be regarded merely as a rejection of the very question asked. The question did not point to any matter of obvious relevancy and materiality, and in the absence of further information the trial Court could not have known that the answer sought to be elicited would be admissible. The ruling cannot be said to have been prejudicially erroneous merely because it may be possible to imagine a conversation between the witness and his son that might properly have been received in evidence.

In volume 2 of the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure, at page 697, it is said:

"To reserve any question on the ruling of the trial Court in excluding testimony, there must be a pertinent question propounded, and, upon objection being made, a statement to the Court of the testimony which it is expected will be elicited by the question, and an exception taken to the ruling thereon."

The proposition is there somewhat too broadly stated, since the question itself may be, and often is, of such a character that in connection with the other proceedings it clearly indicates the materiality of the answer sought and renders superfluous any statement as to what it is expected to be.

On the other hand, a too narrow enunciation of the principle is made in volume 8 of the Encyclopedia of Pleading and Practice, at page 76, where it is said:

"The Court may require counsel to explain the materiality of the answer sought from a witness; and, if this be not done, the exclusion of the evidence is not available on appeal."

This language seems to imply that no statement or explanation need be made unless in response to a demand by the Court. In a doubtful case the Court may well inquire of counsel, as an aid to an intelligent ruling, the purpose of a particular line of inquiry; but it is incumbent upon the attorney conducting an examination to show affirmatively upon his own motion that the testimony he offers is material, assuming himself the risk that if he fail to do so a reviewing court can grant him no relief. As was said in Mitchell v. Harcourt et al., 62 Iowa, 349, 17 N. W. 581:

"The true rule, we think, is that, when it is apparent on the face of the question asked the witness what the evidence sought to be introduced is, and that it is material, this is sufficient; but when this is not apparent, then the party seeking to introduce the evidence is required to state what he expects to prove, and thus make its materiality appear." . . .

The judgment is affirmed. All the justices concurring.

Topic 2. The Objection

687. CADY v. NORTON. (1833. Massachusetts. 14 Pick. 236.) SHAW, C. J.: The right to except [i.e., object] is a privilege, which the party may waive; and if the ground of exception is known and not seasonably taken, by implication of law it is waived. This proceeds upon two grounds: One, that if the exception is intended to be relied on, and is seasonably taken, the omission may be supplied, or the error corrected, and the rights of all parties saved. The other is, that it is not consistent with the purposes of justice for a party, knowing of a secret defect, to proceed and take his chance for a favorable verdict, with the power and intent to annul it as erroneous and void, if it should be against him.

688. MARSH v. HAND

COURT OF APPEALS OF MARYLAND. 1871

35 Md. 123

APPEAL from the Superior Court of Baltimore City.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of the Court.

The cause was argued before BARTOL, C. J., BRENT, ALVEY and ROBINSON, J.

Patrick M'Laughlin and Wm. Pinkney Whyte, for the appellants. William A. Fisher, for the appellee.

BARTOL, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court. . . .

The single question presented by the first bill of exceptions, (the only one properly before us,) is whether the Court below erred in permitting to be read to the jury, as evidence on the part of the defendant, a press copy of a letter from him to the plaintiffs, dated the 25th of January 1862.

The bill of exceptions states that no notice had been given to produce the original; there was no admission or proof that the original had ever been received by the plaintiffs. It is very clear that the copy was not legal or admissible evidence.

The bill of exceptions, however, states that it was offered, and a part of it read to the jury, when the plaintiffs' counsel made their objection. The Court decided that the objection came too late; "that having allowed the first part of the letter to be read, the plaintiffs could not object to the reading of the balance, and that it was too late to object to the admission of the letter, in whole or in part." . . .

The rule is well settled, "that it is the duty of counsel, if aware of the objections to its admissibility, to object to the testimony at the time it is offered to be given," and it has been embodied among the rules of the Superior Court, as follows: Rule 34. "Every objection to the admissibility of evidence shall be made at the time such evidence is offered, or as soon thereafter as the objection to its admissibility shall have become apparent; otherwise, the objection shall be treated as waived." This rule does not appear to us to have been infringed in this case by the appellants. It must have a reasonable interpretation. Its object is to prevent a party from knowingly withholding his objection, until he discovers the effect of the testimony, and then if it turns out to be unfavorable to interpose his objection. Such a course could not be allowed. It is very obvious from reading the bill of exceptions in this case, that such a purpose could not be justly ascribed to the plaintiffs' attorneys. There is nothing to show that they waived their objection or consented to the copy of the letter being read. It was not submitted to their inspection before it was offered, as is the usual and proper course. But it appears that in the hurry of the trial, probably from a momentary inadvertence on their part, a portion of the letter had been read to the jury, when the objection was interposed in good faith and with reasonable diligence. In our judgment it would be too strict and narrow a construction of the rule, to deny them under such circumstances, the right to make their objection.

In our opinion there was error in this ruling; the objection was made in due time, and the evidence ought to have been excluded. . . . And inasmuch as the evidence was not legally admissible and ought to have been excluded, the judgment will be reversed and a new trial ordered.

689. BURDEN OF OBJECTION AS TO TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS.[1] Experience has led to an arrangement by which the existence of the proper qualifications may in some classes of cases be assumed, until the opposing party proves or the witness betrays their absence; while in certain other classes of cases the qualifications are not assumed to exist, but must first be proved to exist by the party offering the witness. Under the former head fall, in general, the elements affecting Organic and Emotional Capacity; under the latter head, those affecting Experiential Capacity, as well as the qualification of Observation (or Knowledge); for the elements of Recollection and Narration, there is no uniform doctrine. For example, the lack of capacity by insanity or idiocy must be shown as a disqualification by the opposing party; lack of capacity by infancy must in theory also be shown by him, though the witness' age and appearance usually serve to change the burden; interest and relationship must be shown, as disqualifications, by the opposing party; while the witness' experience and perception (or, means of knowledge) must be shown, as qualifications, by the offering party.

Mode of Proof of Qualifications. Four ways are distinguishable for ascertaining the qualifications or lack of qualifications of a witness.

(1) The behavior of a witness, in Court during trial, or after being called to the stand but before being sworn or formally questioned, may reveal his incapacity. This, however, would in practice be an available source for the cases only of idiocy, insanity, intoxication, or extreme infancy.

(2) Before the witness is sworn as such, but after he is called and presented, a preliminary questioning of himself may be had, in order to ascertain by his own answers his condition as to qualifications. This questioning (known as "voir dire," when applied to ascertain disqualification by interest) formed originally a distinct stage of the proceeding; and it was perhaps properly so, because the answers of a (supposedly) unqualified person could not form testimony, and because it is convenient to mark definitely the time when the stage of testimony proper begins. But in modern practice (especially under the deplorable custom of administering the oath beforehand to the witnesses in mass) the separation of the two stages is usually ignored. Moreover, in proving the qualifications of experience and knowledge, it was never practiced.

(3) Before the witness is sworn as such, but after he is called and presented, other witnesses may be used to evidence the facts of his incapacity. This is now unusual, since the abolition of interest is a disqualification.

(4) After the witness has been sworn, the progress of his direct examination or cross-examination may disclose his incapacity, and then he may be stopped and his preceding testimony ordered expunged; or, if merely grounds of doubt are disclosed, a questioning on voir dire, or other persons' testimony, may be resorted to.

Time of Objecting to Qualifications. Wherever a plain separation is preserved between the voir dire and the testimony proper, the rule can be strictly enforced that capacity is not to be questioned after the person is once sworn as a witness, except where the opposing party had no prior notice of the disqualifying fact, or where, having notice, he has made due objection but has been unable to prove the fact. But in a Court where the witnesses are customarily sworn as such before any opportunity for questioning is given, this rule cannot be applied. Yet its principle may be carried out by requiring the opponent to make objection and offer proof before the testimony of the witness is begun, — so far at least as the opponent then is aware of any specific ground of objection.

When the testimony is offered in the form of a deposition, the same general principle is applied, i.e., the objection, if the facts were known, must have been made at the time of the taking of the deposition, if it could then have been of any avail. Nevertheless, since the officer taking it has no authority to exclude testimony, in some classes of evidence the objection would be at that time without practical consequences, and hence there is no harm in permitting certain questions to be raised at the trial for the first time, provided the party offering the deposition has not been put in an inconvenient position for lack of the prior objection.

690. ALBERS COMMISSION CO. v. SESSEL

193 Ill. 153; 61 N. E. 1057

APPEAL from the Appellate Court for the Third District; — heard in that court on appeal from the Circuit Court of Macoupin county; the Hon. ROBERT B. SHIRLEY, Judge, presiding.

This litigation arose in the county court of Macoupin county on a claim filed by appellant against the appellee, as executor of Peter J. Hendgen, deceased. The claim was in the form of an account for moneys advanced and commissions earned in the purchase and sale of grain by plaintiff. . . . The only evidence offered in support of the claim in the Circuit Court was in depositions. C. H. Albers, president of the claimant company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, and a stockholder in that company, testified. . . . The book-keeper of the claimant company, also a stockholder in the company, in his deposition testified to substantially the same facts and to conversations or statements made by the deceased during his lifetime; also the deposition of a salesman of the corporation, William P. Hazard, likewise a stockholder in the company.

These depositions were taken in the city of St. Louis some time prior to the hearing upon the claim in the County Court, counsel for the executor being then present but making no objection to the competency of the testimony. Upon the trial in the Circuit Court, upon the offer of the claimant to introduce those depositions, appellee objected upon the ground that each of said witnesses was incompetent to testify in the cause because each was a stockholder of the claimant corporation and defendant was executor of the last will of the deceased, Hendgen. But the Court overruled the objection and permitted the depositions to be read to the jury.

Joseph S. Laurie, for appellant. E. W. Hayes, and Bell & Burton, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice WILKIN (after stating the case as above) delivered the opinion of the Court. . . .

It is conceded by the parties that neither of the above named witnesses was competent to testify in this case, and that the admission of their testimony would have been reversible error, but for the fact, as is claimed, that the objection was waived by a failure to urge it upon the taking of the depositions, and in support of this contention Moshier v. Knox College, 32 Ill. 155, Frink v. McClung, 4 Gilm. 569, Kelsey v. Snyder, 118 Ill. 544, Cassing v. Mortimer, 80 id. 602, and Cooke v. Orne, 37 id. 186, are relied upon.

It will be found, however, upon an examination of these cases, that the last two are not in point, and that in the first two the question arose between living parties as to a common law incompetency of the witnesses, which could have been removed by other evidence, or by the act of the witness releasing his interest. Kelsey v. Snyder was a bill against the administrator of an estate and the heirs of the intestate to declare and enforce a resulting trust in the deceased, and it was there held that the complainant was not competent to testify in her own behalf as to transactions and conversations with the deceased in his lifetime. We there said (p. 549): . . .

"Counsel contends that the objection should have been taken at the time of the taking of the depositions and that it was too late to urge it for the first time on the trial in the Circuit Court, and in support of this he cites Frink v. McClung, 4 Gilm. 569, Goodrich v. Hanson, 33 Ill. 498, and Warren v. Warren, 105 ibid. 568. The objection to a witness on account of interest might at common law be obviated upon the trial by the execution of an instrument having the effect to release that interest, and hence it was required, as held in the cases cited, that an objection on account of interest should be made at the earliest opportunity, so that the party calling the witness might have time, if possible, to obviate the objection by release or otherwise. In Warren v. Warren no objection was taken on the hearing; but this rule did not apply as to objections that were incurable, as, for instance, that the evidence was irrelevant. (Lockwood v. Mills, 39 Ill. 602.) And the philosophy of the rule is stated in Clauser v. Stone, 29 Ill. 114." . . .

These witnesses were absolutely disqualified to testify to the facts sworn to by them, and the objection to their depositions was in apt time at the trial of the case. . . . No hardship would have resulted to the claimant if the objection had been sustained, — first, because the incompetency of the witness was absolute and could not have been removed; and second, if it could be said to have been taken by surprise in not having an opportunity to procure other competent evidence of its claim, it could have asked, and upon a proper showing obtained, a continuance of the case to enable it to produce, upon the final hearing, other competent testimony.

The trial Court erred in holding that the objection came too late. . . .

The judgment of the Appellate Court will accordingly be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice CARTWRIGHT, dissenting.

691. RUSH v. FRENCH. (1874. Arizona. 1 Ariz. 99, 123; 25 Pac. 816.) DUNNE, C. J. — A party wishing the benefit of the remedy must, at the time he complains, show how he is hurt; in the language of the old authorities, he must lay his finger upon the point of objection. . . . He must not merely complain in a general way, and say that to let certain evidence in will hurt his case, and that under the law it ought to be excluded, and leave the judge and opposite side in the dark as to what principle of law he relies on, and compel them to decide haphazard, or else stop the trial of the cause, with a jury waiting, while the counsel examine the whole body of the law, from the earliest judicial expositions down to the latest act of the legislature, to see if they can discover any valid objection, to the testimony. The opposing counsel can make no reply to a general objection, except to throw the whole responsibility upon the judge at once, or else begin systematically and argue that under any possible objection the testimony should come in. Many trials under such a system would practically never end. The effect of it would be to compel one party to fight in the dark, not knowing when his opponent intended to strike, while the other would be free to choose his weapons, and the time and place to use them. Such things may do in love or war, when all things are said to be fair; but life is too short to transact business on such a system in Courts of justice. . . . An objection that the testimony is "irrelevant" without specifying wherein or how or why it is irrelevant will not be considered in the Supreme Court as raising any issue, if the testimony could, under any possible circumstances, have been relevant. An objection that the testimony is "inadmissible" may be disregarded; it amounts to no more than the assertion that the evidence is illegal; the objection should fully and specifically point out how it is inadmissible. When an objection is that the evidence offered is "incompetent and illegal," it is the duty of the Court to overrule it if the evidence was admissible for any purpose. An objection that evidence is "incompetent" does not raise any issue as to whether the question is leading or not. The only way to raise such an issue is to object specifically that the question is leading. . . .

The object of requiring the grounds of objection to be stated, which may seem to be a technicality, is really to avoid technicalities and prevent delay in the administration of justice. When evidence is offered to which there is some objection, substantial justice requires that the objection be specified, so that the party offering the evidence can remove it, if possible, and let the case be tried on its merits. If it is objected that the question is leading, the form may be changed; if that the evidence is irrelevant, the relevancy may be shown; if that it is incompetent, the incompetency may be removed; if that it is immaterial, its materiality may be established; if to the order of introduction, it may be withdrawn and offered at another time, — and thus appeals could often be saved, delays avoided, and substantial justice administered.

692. RINDSKOFF v. MALONE

SUPREME COURT OF IOWA. 1859

9 Ia. 541

APPEAL from Lucas District Court. Tuesday, November 1.

Defendants are the makers and endorsers of a negotiable promissory note. To charge the endorsers, plaintiffs offered in evidence the note and the protest of the notary, showing demand and notice as required by law. "Which (in the language of the bill of exceptions) was the only evidence offered by either party, and the defendant objected to the introduction of said note and protest, which was overruled; the same was received by the Court as evidence, and at the same time defendant (Malone) objected to judgment being rendered against him, and thereupon the Court rendered judgment against all of said defendants." Malone is the payee and endorser of the note, and appeals.

T. B. Perry, for the appellant, cited Code of 1851, §§ 82, 83, 24, 14. . . .

C. C. Cole, with Baker & Edwards, for the appellee, contended that where objection is made to the introduction of evidence in the District Court, it is necessary that the party objecting should state the ground of his objection, so as to afford the opposite party an opportunity to remedy the defect, or this Court will not reverse on any ground not thus taken or assigned. . . .

WRIGHT, C. J. — The only question in this case is, whether the protest of the notary was, under the circumstances, disclosed by the record, properly received in evidence. The objection made to it now is, that it had no seal. That this was requisite we entertain no doubt. (Code, §§ 244, 82, 83.)

But is appellant in a position in this Court to make this objection? It will be observed that the record simply shows that he "objected to the introduction of said note and protest." But why, or upon what ground, is not stated and nowhere appears. Neither was there any motion for a new trial, or any other step taken to call the attention of the Court to this or any other defect in the protest, or variance in the note. In our opinion under these circumstances, the objection cannot avail.

The degree of particularity required in pointing out objections to the testimony, when offered, must depend very much upon the kind of testimony, and the circumstances and attitude of the case. Thus, if it was proposed to prove by parol, a contract which was not performed within one year from the making of the same, it might be sufficient for the record to show that the complaining party objected generally to the competency of such proof, for in such a case the mind of the opposite party and the Court would be directed unerringly to the very point raised. So if the wife should be offered as a witness for the husband in a civil case, or a party to the action should offer himself, the opposite party need show no more than that he objected to the introduction of said witnesses and their testimony. But when the testimony offered is apparently of a kind that is admissible to prove a particular fact or thing, then a general objection should be held to raise the question only of its competency as a kind, and not the technical sufficiency or competency of the particular instrument relied upon. And especially is this true where no such motion for a new trial is made, or objection urged to the sufficiency of the testimony to sustain the judgment.

Now in this case it is claimed, and is true, that the notary had omitted to affix his seal to the protest. In every other respect it is complete and formal. If this objection had been made, it must have availed to exclude the testimony. But if made, the defect might possibly have been cured at once, and in this fact consists the strong reason for requiring the objections in such cases to be specific. The notary would have had the right at the time to affix his seal, and thus every difficulty would have been obviated.

We would not hold parties to a rule too strict in this respect, but we do think some degree of particularity is required. Thus if it had been objected that the protest was not properly authenticated, that it was not properly signed and sealed, we say if the bill of exceptions showed anything of this nature, we should be inclined to give appellant the benefit of any defect in the instrument which would fairly range itself under such objections. Not so, however, when the objection is so general and pointless as in this instance. Thompson v. Blanchard, 2 Iowa 44; Danforth, Davis & Co. v. Carter & May, 1 Ib. 552; Patterson v. Stiles, 6 Ib. 54; State v. Wilson, 8 Ib. 407. Judgment affirmed.

693. TOOLEY v. BACON

70 N. Y. 34

APPEAL from judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, in the fourth judicial department, affirming a judgment in favor of defendant, entered upon the report of a referee. This was an action for money alleged to have been paid and received by Charles C. Bacon, plaintiff's intestate. The answer alleged in substance that all moneys or property which came into the hands of said intestate, belonging to plaintiff, were transferred by the latter with intent to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors. . . .

It was alleged in the answer that the plaintiff placed the funds and property in controversy in the hands of the intestate for the purpose of delaying and defrauding his creditors. After the defendant had given some evidence tending to sustain this defence, the plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, was asked if he had put the property in the hands of the intestate for the purpose and with the intent to delay or defraud his creditors. Counsel for plaintiff objected to the question, and the referee sustained the objection. No ground of objection was specified, but the course of the examination was such that it must have been understood that the objection was to the competency of the plaintiff to answer the question under § 399 of the Code, Bacon being dead.

Z. M. Knowles, for the appellant. The evidence offered upon the question of the intent, with which the transfer was made, was competent, and erroneously excluded. . . .

E. H. Lamb, for the respondent. . . .

EARL, J. (after stating the case as above). . . . That no ground was specified is immaterial now. When evidence is excluded upon a mere general objection, the ruling will be upheld, if any ground in fact existed for the exclusion. It will be assumed, in the absence of any request by the opposing party or the Court to make the objection definite, that it was understood, and that the ruling was placed upon the right ground. If in such a case a ground of objection be specified, the ruling must be sustained upon that ground, unless the evidence excluded was in no aspect of the case competent, or could not be made so. But where there is a general objection to evidence and it is overruled, and the evidence is received, the ruling will not be held erroneous unless there be some ground which could not have been obviated if it had been specified, or unless the evidence in its essential nature be incompetent. (Levin v. Russell, 42 N. Y. 251; Williams v. Sargeant, 46 N. Y. 481.)

We are of opinion that the ruling was right. The plaintiff could not be examined as a witness "in regard to any personal transaction or communication" between him and Bacon. The placing of property in the hands of Bacon was a personal transaction with him, and the intent with which it was done accompanied and characterized the transaction and was an element thereof. . . . When death has sealed the lips of one party the law should seal the lips of the other. . . .

The question, "Did you say to your counsel that you never gave any mortgage to Bacon?" put to plaintiff upon his cross-examination, was not objected to on the ground that it called for a privileged communication, and no material evidence was elicited in answer thereto. . . .

All concur, except CHURCH, Ch. J., and ANDREWS, J., who dissent, on the ground of the exclusion of evidence of plaintiff's intent in the transfer, holding that the question should have been answered.

RAPALLO, J., absent. Judgment affirmed.

694. WOLVERTON v. COMMONWEALTH

SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA. 1821

7 S. & R. 273

ERROR to the Court of Common Pleas of Erie county.

This was a scire facias on a recognisance in the sum of $5000, . . . conditioned that Wolverton would perform the office of sheriff for the county of Erie, for the next three years. The scire facias was for the use of Eli Hart and John Lay, trading under the firm of Hart & Co., and was returnable to December Term, 1817; it alleged, generally, a breach of the condition, . . . setting out a particular breach, that on the first of May, 1817, a certain Edwin Forbes was committed to the jail of the county, and in the custody of the said sheriff, by virtue of an execution issued by George Moore, a justice of the peace, at the suit of Hart & Co., for $117.77, on a judgment obtained by confession, pursuant to the Act of Assembly, and that the sheriff suffered Forbes to escape and go at large. . . .

The plaintiff also offered parol evidence of the existence of an execution against Forbes, "having first given notice to the defendants to produce the said execution; the admission of which said testimony was then and there objected to by the counsel of the defendants, on the ground that a record could not be proved by parol evidence." This objection was overruled by the Court, and the testimony admitted, and an exception taken by the defendants. . . .

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs for the amount due to them by Forbes, for which judgment was entered.

This case was argued at the former term, and again at this term, by Foster, for the plaintiffs in error, and Baldwin, for the defendants in error.

GIBSON, J., delivered the opinion of the Court on all the points but one. TILGHMAN, C. J., having been absent at the argument, and a difference of opinion having arisen between GIBSON, J., and DUNCAN, J., on that point, it was re-argued at this term, before all the judges.

GIBSON, J. . . . The plaintiffs further offered parol evidence of the contents of the execution, on which Forbes (for whose escape the suit was brought) was committed; "having first given notice to the defendants to produce the said execution; the admission of which testimony was then and there objected to by the counsel of the defendants, on the ground that a record could not be proved by parol evidence." The objection in this Court is, that parol evidence was inadmissible, before the execution was shown to have come to the defendants' possession, or to be lost or destroyed.

And I at once admit that if it had been put on that ground at the trial, it ought to have prevailed. But I apprehend there has been a total change of position, since the cause came here. The argument that, to avoid the operation of the rule which excludes parol evidence of the contents of a paper, it was incumbent on the plaintiffs to bring the case within one of the exceptions to it, and that until they did so the objection on general grounds was unremoved, is ingenious, but easily shown to be unsound. . . .

I take it to be an inflexible rule, and one of the utmost value, both in pleading and evidence, that whatever is not denied or made special ground of objection is conceded. Thus, if a party being called on for that purpose opens the particular view with which he offers any part of his evidence, or states the object to be attained by it, he precludes himself from insisting on its operation in any other direction, or for any other object; and the reason is, that the opposite party is prevented from objecting to its competency in any view different from the one proposed. In like manner, a party may be called on to state the particular ground on which he rests an objection to competency, and if it fails him, it is not error to receive the evidence, although it be incompetent on other grounds. Where, therefore, there is a special objection, or, what is the same in effect, a general objection resting, not on collateral circumstances, but on the supposed existence of an abstract principle admitting of no exception, as was the case here, every ground of exception which is not particularly occupied, is to be considered as abandoned. For instance, a deposition is offered, and it is resisted exclusively on the ground, that the witness is interested, or that the evidence is irrelevant; would it not be palpably unjust in a court of error, to listen to an objection, that it did not appear there had been proof of notice, or that the deposition had in all respects been regularly taken? If the defect were pointed out in time, it might be supplied by further proof; or if that were impossible, the party would, at least, be apprised of the danger to ultimate success, which is necessarily incurred by pressing the admission of incompetent testimony. Here, if instead of urging the abstract operation of the rule, the defendants had objected that the case did not fall within the particular exception to it, now relied on, the plaintiffs might have been prepared to show that the execution actually came to the hands of the sheriff, or that it was lost or destroyed; but, as to that, the silence of their antagonists at the trial, had a direct tendency to lead them into a surprise.

For reasons like these, I regret a practice, too frequent in the Common Pleas, of stating the exception generally, without specifying the ground on which it is urged. In such a case, as we cannot judicially know the precise point the Court was called on to decide, we are obliged to let in any objection that can be raised on the face of the record; and hence I have frequently been obliged to consent to reverse, on points that, I had every reason to believe, were never made below. . . .

As, in the case at bar, the objection was made on a supposed abtract inadmissibility of the evidence, independently of collateral considerations, I am of opinion, that the proof of all preliminary facts, which would otherwise have been indispensable, ought to be considered as having been waived. . . .

On all the points, therefore, I am of opinion, that the judgment be affirmed.

Tilghman, C. J. . . . I understand from this record, that the only ground on which the evidence was objected to, was, that a record could not be proved by parol evidence. But the plaintiffs in error now contend, that the evidence was inadmissible, for want of previous proof that the writ had come to the sheriff's hands. I do not think that objection now open; it should have been made below, or the plaintiff may be taken here by surprise. . . .

Duncan, J. (dissenting).—The fact in issue was, whether Edwin Forbes had been committed to the custody of the sheriff, on the execution of Hart & Co., and had escaped from such custody. To prove the execution, the plaintiff below, having proved a notice to the sheriff to produce the execution on the trial, offered a witness to prove its existence and contents. This was objected to, on the ground that parol evidence could not be admitted of a record. . . . The plaintiffs offered the parol evidence, with the proof of notice; to this evidence, thus offered in connection, the defendants objected, on the ground that parol evidence of the execution could not be received. . . .

It was not proved that the paper was lost; it was neither admitted nor proved that it ever came to the hands of the sheriff. What is it then, more or less, than this? That the Court received parol evidence of the execution, without proof of its loss. . . . The objection was to the medium of proof. Parol evidence cannot be admitted of this thing; as a general rule of evidence, this cannot be questioned. If it was admissible, it must be because the case fell within some of the exceptions — its loss, or that it was in the hands of the opponent. He who alleges that his case is excepted out of the general rule, must make it out, that it falls within some of the exceptions of the cardinal rule of evidence. . . .

The plaintiffs in error did not make one objection to the evidence below, and a different one here; that could not be endured. But they object here, as they did in the Common Pleas, that parol evidence ought not to be received of the execution. . . . Here the plaintiffs in error resisted all parol evidence of the execution. . . .

I agree that the plaintiffs in error have failed in all the other exceptions made by them, but this I think they have fully supported.

695. SPENCER v. POTTER'S ESTATE

SUPREME COURT OF VERMONT. 1911

85 Vt.; 80 Atl. 821

APPEAL from Rutland County Court; FRED M. BUTLER, Judge.

Proceedings by Kate Spencer against Jarvis T. Potter's estate. From a commissioner's decision disallowing a claim, petitioner appeals. Reversed and remanded.

This is an appeal from the decision of commissioners on Jarvis T. Potter's estate, disallowing the plaintiff's claim based on a written instrument dated February 17, 1905, purporting to be signed by the testator, and of the tenor following: "I have given this day to my niece, Kate Spencer, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars ($1500), to be paid by the administrator of my estate at my decease. The above is given in consideration of her kind care and attention during my sickness in her home. Her Uncle Jarvis T. Potter." In the court below the plaintiff declared in special assumpsit on said instrument, and the defendant pleaded the general issue, and gave notice thereunder that it should deny the execution of the instrument by the testator.

The testator had lived many years in Burlington and Essex, in this State, and was a tin peddler and later a farmer. His wife died in 1903, and in the summer of 1904 he went to Clarendon, where he lived ever after, and where he had a half-brother, John Spencer, and numerous other relatives, among whom were Sarah R. Spencer Hoag, the executrix, and Albert H. Spencer, children of John Spencer. The plaintiff is the wife of Albert H. Spencer. . . . The testator was accustomed to visit frequently at the homes of his relatives. He was 84 years old when he died in January, 1909. . . .

The testator made a will after the date of the instrument in suit, by which he distributed his estate, amounting to between $5,000 and $6,000, among his relatives into twenty-four parts, leaving one cent to the plaintiff's husband. The defendant claimed that it was never expected nor understood that the care during the testator's sickness at the plaintiff's house should be paid for, and that such services as were rendered were out of personal regard and because of relationship, and while the testator was there on a visit.

There was considerable testimony on both sides on the question of the genuineness of the signature to said instrument, a number of the plaintiff's witnesses testifying their opinion that it was genuine, and a number of the defendant's that it was not genuine. The instrument was admitted "under objection and exception by the defendant." The defendant claimed, and its testimony tended to show, that on October 26, 1904, the testator made a gift to the plaintiff of $100, for which she executed a receipt, which is referred to. The plaintiff's husband testified that the signature to said instrument is the genuine signature of the testator. On cross-examination he testified that a few days after October 6, 1906, he delivered a package to the testator and got his signature to a receipt therefor, and that later the testator demanded to know what the paper was that he signed, and wanted to see it, but that the husband did not show it to him. The defendant then produced the receipt and put it into the case, and in that connection claimed that the signature thereto was procured by Spencer and used by him or some one else as a model from which to copy the testator's signature onto the instrument in suit. On Spencer's redirect examination the plaintiff introduced a letter dated June 2, 1906, with documents pinned to it, for the purpose of showing that the defendant's claim was not correct, and to show that in June, 1906, the instrument in suit was in existence, and had been submitted to an attorney in Cornell University for his opinion, and the letter and the documents pinned to it were limited to that purpose. Said letter purported to come from the law office of Henry L. Allen, Hornorsville, N.Y., and was addressed to "George Alvord, City." In it Mr. Allen, the writer, said he had examined the instrument left with him by Alvord the other day, and had examined some of the authorities on that subject, some of which he indorsed on a separate sheet, together with the instrument and his opinion thereon. Pinned to the letter were two separate sheets containing a copy of the instrument, citation, and discussion of legal authorities, and an opinion that the instrument is valid and enforceable. Spencer had testified that the plaintiff had a relative in the state of New York named George Alvord, to whom said instrument was sent, and that Alvord had submitted it to Henry Allen, an attorney, for an opinion, and that Alvord sent said letter and sheets in a letter of his. To their admission the defendant objected and excepted. . . .

Argued before Rowell, C. J., and Munson, Watson, Haselton, and Powers, JJ.

T. W. Moloney and J. A. Merrill, for appellant. M. C. Webber, for appellee.

Rowell, C.J. . . . It is contended that the Court erred in admitting the letter of June 2, 1906, from Allen to Alvord, and the documents pinned thereto, because not admissible for the purpose offered, as the defendant had not opened up its admission. It is conceded that, in view of the defendant's claim that the receipt for the package was procured for the purpose of using the testator's signature thereto as a model, the plaintiff could show by proper evidence that the instrument was already in existence. But it is contended that she could not import said letter into the case, as it had no probative force in itself, and was between persons not parties here; that the purpose was to show the date of the letter, but that there is no proof of the authenticity of the letter nor that it was ever written by Allen and received by Alvord, nor that the date was correct; that the most the testimony showed was that plaintiff's husband said he received the letter in one from Alvord; that it is, in effect, the testimony of Allen as to the validity of the instrument; and that it was not necessary to resort to the letter and the accompanying documents in order to get evidence before the jury that the instrument was in existence before October 6, 1906, for plaintiff's husband had already testified that he saw the instrument from two to six months after February 17, 1905.

It is to be noticed that no ground of objection was stated to the admission of this letter and the accompanying documents, the exceptions showing only that "to their admission the defendant objected and excepted." This Court has had frequent occasion of late to state and enforce the rule in respect of such exceptions. The last time was in Townshend v. Townshend, 84 Vt. 319, where it is held to be the general rule that objections to the admission of testimony must be such as to indicate the precise point that the Court is asked to rule upon; but that this rule has its exceptions, one of which is, when the offered evidence cannot be material nor relevant in any state of the case, and that is apparent on the face of the question asked or the offer made, a general objection is sufficient. Mr. Wigmore says that "the cardinal principle, no sooner repeated by courts than forgotten by counsel, is that a general objection, if overruled, cannot avail," and "that the only modification of this broad rule is that, if on the face of the evidence in its relation to the rest of the case there appears no purpose whatever for which it could have been admissible, then a general objection, though overruled, will be deemed to have been sufficient." And he sustains his statement of the rule and its modification by reference to many cases. 1 Wigmore Evidence §§ 18, p. 57 et seq. Applying this rule to this exception, it is manifest that it cannot prevail. . . .

[But the judgment on other grounds must be]

Reserved and remanded.

Topic 3. The Ruling

697. HAMBLETT v. HAMBLETT

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1833

6 N. H. 333

APPEAL from the decree of the judge of probate approving and allowing a certain instrument as the last will of David Hamblett, deceased. The defence being that the testator was not of sound and disposing mind, an issue, formed for the purpose of trying that question, came before the jury, August term, 1832. . . .

The appellee also offered in evidence the deposition of Mary Palmer, in which she testified, among other things, that on the day of the execution of the will she was at the house of the testator, and that "his discourse was satisfactory to her." To this part of the testimony the appellant objected. The evidence was admitted, but the Court in their instructions to the jury directed them not to rely upon any evidence of opinion as to the sanity or insanity of the testator, except what was derived from the testimony of the subscribing witnesses to the will. . . .

The jury returned a verdict that the testator was sane, and the appellant moved for a new trial. . . .

Porter, for the appellant. C. H. Atherton, for the appellee.

Parker, J. . . . On the supposition that this testimony of Mary Palmer, to matter of opinion, or rather to matter from which her opinion of sanity is to be inferred, was incompetent — which is not conceded, if sufficiently connected with facts — the question arises whether this furnishes any ground for a new trial, the Court having thus directed the jury.

Upon this subject it did not seem to us, at first, that there could be two opinions. But in Penfield v. Carpenter, 13 Johns. 350, in error, on certiorari to a justice's court, it appeared, that at the trial a witness was called, on the part of the defendant, to testify to the defendant's declarations made to the witness, and the testimony being objected to, the justice decided that the witness might go through with his testimony, and he would then inform the jury what part was admissible, and what not — and the justice informed the jury that this testimony was inadmissible, and that they ought not to take any notice of it as testimony. Another witness was permitted to swear to hearsay, and the justice told the jury that what the witness had sworn was not evidence. The Court reversed the judgment, saying, "the admission of such testimony was illegal and dangerous, and no subsequent caution or advice, by the justice, that the jury ought to disregard what the witnesses had sworn, can cure the irregularity. The law forbids such testimony, because it may have an influence upon honest jurors, who are unconscious of the impressions which they retain, notwithstanding the effort of the Court to obliterate them." . . .

However irregular the proceedings in those cases may have been, and however proper the decisions may be in New York, as applied to their courts of justices of the peace, we cannot adopt the broad principle there laid down, as sound law, applicable to all cases. The reason that the testimony so given in presence of the jury might have an influence, though they are directed to disregard it, would apply with equal force in all cases where anything irrelevant may have crept in during the course of the trial, and would entitle parties to a succession of new trials, until no sentence should have been uttered which by any possibility might have an undue influence, though the jurors were unconscious of any influence. It is apparent that the principle cannot be carried to this extent, and other authorities show it must fall far short of it, even if it can be supported in any degree.

The rule respecting the testimony of interested witnesses, as laid down by Starkie and Phillipps, is that where it is discovered incidentally in the course of a cause that the witness is interested, his evidence will be struck out, although no objection has been made to him on the voir dire. . . . So where evidence which is competent in one view, and yet from its nature or connection proves something else, which would not be competent, and which might possibly have an effect upon the jury, the evidence is admitted, and the jury directed not to regard it as evidence, except for the purpose for which it is admissible. So where the confession of a prisoner implicates others, charged in the same indictment, the whole evidence is introduced, and the jury directed to disregard it as to the others. . . . Cases are of daily occurrence, also, where evidence is admitted, which, from a failure to connect it with other evidence, with which it had a necessary connection in order to be relevant, eventually turns out to be incompetent. The utmost caution cannot always prevent the introduction of evidence, which in the course of the trial is discovered to be clearly inadmissible, and if, in such cases, its introduction was to be regarded as ground for a new trial, on the application of the party objecting, the practice should be to stop the case, and begin de novo to another jury, for however strongly the jury were directed to disregard the testimony, it could not be shown that it had not had an influence upon the verdict, of which the jurors were not conscious — and yet it is not believed, that a practice of stopping a trial upon such account, ever prevailed in any court. . . .

This rule respecting the introduction of incompetent testimony may admit of exceptions. If the testimony be of a nature to excite popular prejudice, and if there is good reason from the verdict to suppose that it must have influenced the jury improperly, notwithstanding the direction of the judge that it was to be disregarded, such case might furnish an exception, and the granting of a new trial be a proper exercise of the discretion of the Court. But in this case, the judge who tried the cause states that there is no ground for supposing that this testimony of Mary Palmer affected the verdict either way, and it was of a nature to have the least possible weight, if no direction had been given in relation to it. . . .

Decree of Judge of Probate affirmed.

698. STATE v. MORAN. (1906. Iowa. 131 Ia. 645; 109 N. W. 187.) WEAVER, J.: Defendant was charged with the larceny of certain horses alleged to have been committed on May 16, 1901. . . . It is true that in some exceptional cases the effect of the admission of improper evidence is regarded as so clearly and seriously prejudicial that its subsequent withdrawal from the jury will not be regarded sufficient to cure the error; but the general rule is otherwise. It is not possible for even the most watchful and careful trial Court to keep from the jury at all times all testimony of an immaterial or incompetent character, and if, upon attention being called thereto, such matter is stricken out, we must under all ordinary circumstances assume that the jury has done its duty, and given it no weight or influence in reaching the verdict.

699. GULLIFORD v. McQUILLEN

SUPREME COURT OF KANSAS. 1907

75 Kan. 454; 89 Pac. 927

ERROR from District Court, Chase County; F. A. MECKEL, Judge. Action by E. F. McQuillen against William Gulliford. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. H. Carpenter, for plaintiff in error. Madden & Doolittle, for defendant in error.

SMITH, J. — Gulliford became the owner of a mill, and, not being himself a miller, employed McQuillen to operate it. . . . An exchange was finally effected with one McClintock of the mill and $2000 for a drug store and dwelling properties, in which the mill was accepted at the value of $18,000. McQuillen thereafter demanded of Gulliford $360 as his commission on the deal, which being refused, he brought suit and recovered judgment for the amount claimed, and Gulliford brings the case here. . . .

The plaintiff below offered evidence tending to impeach the defendant's reputation for truth and veracity, and thereupon the defendant asked a postponement of the trial to enable him to secure the attendance of witnesses in rebuttal thereof, which request the Court granted, and immediately the plaintiff withdrew all the impeaching evidence and the Court instructed the jury to disregard that evidence, and proceeded with the trial. There is no showing that plaintiff's attorney made any reference to this evidence in his argument. Neither was there any reference to that evidence in the instructions complained of. These instructions were general, and were such as are usually given in relation to the weight of the evidence and the credibility of witnesses. No request for an instruction in writing on this subject was made. . . . The judgment is affirmed.

JOHNSTON, C. J., and GREENE, BURCH, MASON, and GRAVES, JJ., concur.

PORTER, J. (dissenting). The whole case turned upon the credibility of the testimony of plaintiff and defendant. Plaintiff had the burden and testified one way. Defendant contradicted him. Plaintiff produced a number of witnesses who testified that defendant's reputation for truthfulness in the neighborhood where he lived was bad. In order to rebut this, defendant required time to procure the attendance of witnesses from his neighborhood, and the Court, recognizing the reasonableness of his request, granted a postponement until next morning. Plaintiff then offered to withdraw the impeaching testimony, which the Court, over the objections of defendant, permitted, and proceeded with the trial. It is true the jury were instructed to disregard the impeaching testimony, but the fact remained that several witnesses had sworn that defendant's reputation was such that he was not entitled to credit, and it is not likely that the jury could or did entirely disregard it.

If the practice indulged in here is proper, I am unable to see why a party may not in any case offer impeaching testimony and withdraw it before the party impeached has offered his rebuttal, and thus prevent rebuttal testimony. It may be said that it can be left to the discretion of the trial Court; but, in view of the situation presented by the record here, and the particular circumstances of this case, I think the action of the Court was an abuse of discretion which prevented defendant from having a fair trial, and that the judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered.

700. JUDICIAL DISCRETION.[1] The term "discretion," as applied to a trial Court's powers, may be used in several senses, which have not been, in our law, as often discriminated or as fully developed as they ought to be.

It may mean (1) that the trial judge is controlled by no fixed rules, but may in each case decide according to good sense and justice without regard to precedents, either by himself or by a higher Court. In this meaning nothing is involved as to the finality of the decision; it may or may not be appealable.

(2) It may mean, on the contrary, that the trial judge decides according to some rule, but that in one or another respect his decision is final; and here it may be final (a) as to the law, i.e. the tenor of the rule, (b) as to the applicability of the rule to the facts, or (c) as to the existence of the facts. The first of these meanings (1) is Discretion in the ordinary sense; the second (2) may be termed Finality of Ruling.

701. NORRIS v. CLINKSCALES

SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA. 1896

47 S. C. 488; 25 S. E. 797

BEFORE EARLE, J., Abbeville, January, 1896. Reversed.

Action in claim and delivery by E. B. Morris, as executor of J. Estelle Clinkscales, against A. J. and T. L. Clinkscales, Jr. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal.

This action for claim and delivery was brought by Jane Estelle Clinkscales to recover from the defendants certain personal property covered by a mortgage, of which she was the assignee. . . . The third exception charges error in the Circuit Judge, "In refusing to allow secondary evidence as to the contents of the receipt signed by Estelle Clinkscales, in which she elected to take under the will of her husband, J. P. Clinkscales, and to give up all claim to the property covered by the mortgages in question, when there was sufficient proof going to show that said receipt had been lost or destroyed by fire." . . .

Mr. Frank B. Gary, for appellants. . . .

Messrs. Parker & McGowan, also for appellants. . . .

Messrs. Graydon & Graydon, contra. . . .

Oct. 26, 1896. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Judge BENET, acting Associate Justice, in place of Associate Justice GARY.

This exception raises two questions: First. Is the exercise of judicial discretion, in regard to the admission or exclusion of secondary evidence, appealable matter to be reviewed by this Court? And second. If appealable and reviewable, did the Circuit Judge, in the case at bar, commit error of law in excluding the secondary evidence offered?

1. Arguing on the first question, counsel for the respondent contend that the admission or exclusion of secondary evidence is a matter solely in the discretion of the Judge, and not appealable; and as authority they cite Congdon v. Morgan, 14 S. C. 588. We do not think that case will bear such a construction. Delivering the opinion of the Court, Mr. Chief Justice MCIVER referred to Floyd v. Mintsey, 5 Rich. 372, and to Berry v. Jordon, 11 Rich. 75, to show that no uniform rule could be established as to the exact amount of evidence necessary to prove the loss of the instrument before secondary evidence of its contents could be admitted. And he added:

"Neither shall we undertake, on this occasion, to lay down an absolute rule upon the subject, for, as it is said in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 558, 'it should be recollected that the object of the proof is merely to establish a reasonable presumption as to the loss of the instrument, and that this is a preliminary inquiry addressed to the discretion of the judge.' Hence, where the case, as presented to us, does not show that the judge has violated any of the established rules of evidence in the conduct and determination of this preliminary inquiry, we cannot say that there was any error on his part in admitting the secondary evidence. In this case we are unable to perceive any such violation of the rules of evidence. . . . (After summarizing the facts), we do not see that there was any error on the part of the circuit judge in holding that the proof of loss was sufficient to let in secondary evidence. . . . The preliminary evidence offered here was certainly much stronger than that which was held to be sufficient in Edwards v. Edwards, 11 Rich. 537."

This is a plain recognition of the fact, that while the preliminary inquiry as to the proof of loss of the instrument is addressed to the discretion of the Judge, the exercise of that discretion will be, in a proper case, reviewed by this Court.

This Court has always, and very properly, been averse to disturbing the exercise of this discretion in the Court below, having always felt assured that the Judges presiding there would seldom, if ever, overstep the limits of their power and act capriciously and arbitrarily. . . . In the recent case of Hobbs v. Beard, 43 S. C. 370, it was held that "the loss of a paper is always a preliminary question addressed to the discretion of the presiding Judge, and his ruling is not ordinarily the subject of review by this Court." (GARY, A. J.) These views accord with the opinions of the Courts both of England and of our sister States, and they arise out of the very nature of the case.

The term "discretion" implies the absence of a hard and fast rule. The establishment of a clearly-defined rule would be the end of discretion. And yet "discretion" should not be a word for arbitrary will or unstable caprice. Nor should judicial discretion be, as Lord COKE pronounced it, "a crooked cord," but rather, as Lord MANSFIELD defined it, the "exercising the best of their judgment upon the occasion that calls for it," adding that "if this discretion be wilfully abused, . . . it ought to be under the control of this Court." The Courts and text writers all concur that by "judicial discretion" is meant sound discretion guided by fixed legal principles. It must not be arbitrary nor capricious, but must be regulated upon legal grounds, — grounds that will make it judicial. It must be compelled by conscience, and not by humor. So that when a judge properly exercises his judicial discretion he will decide and act according to the rules of equity, and so as to advance the ends of justice.

There are two different kinds of discretion that may be exercised by the presiding judge, one of which is appealable, the other not. In the exercise of his exclusive right to decide a matter of fact, or to control the orderly conduct of trials, the discretion of the circuit judge will not be reviewed by this Court. For example, in granting or refusing a new trial on the evidence, or in granting or refusing additional time for argument of counsel, or in deciding whether an admission or confession was made freely and voluntarily, so as to determine its admissibility as evidence, or in permitting a witness to be recalled, or in granting or refusing a motion for a continuance, or the like. In such matters no error of law can be committed, and no appeal can be taken.

But to the appealable class in this State belong all instances of the exercise of discretion which may disclose the commission of error of law. And, without going into detail, it is enough for the purpose of this case to say that in deciding the preliminary question whether or not there has been sufficient proof of the loss of the written instrument to justify the admission of secondary evidence of its contents, it is possible that a Circuit Judge may commit error of law in the violation or misapplication of the rules of evidence; and, therefore, his exercise of discretion may be appealed from. And the appeal will lie, not because of any so-called "abuse of discretion" — a phrase unhappily framed, because implying a bad motive or wrong purpose — but because his ruling may appear to have been made on grounds and for reasons clearly untenable. This principle is recognized in Trumbo v. Finley, 18 S. C. 315, where Mr.

Justice McGowan says that the exercise of a Judge's discretion, "as a rule, will not be disturbed, unless it deprives a party of a substantial right which he can show he is entitled to under the law."

2. In excluding the secondary evidence offered in this case, the Circuit Judge assigned his reasons for his ruling as follows: "The person who had the paper in his possession should have been examined as to the lost paper. Unless it be shown by competent evidence that the paper is lost and cannot be found, then the contents of that paper cannot be gone into. We can introduce secondary evidence only when it is shown that the primary evidence cannot be produced. It may be possible that Mr. Gary found that receipt after he and the witness made the search." In excluding the secondary evidence upon the foregoing grounds, did the Circuit Judge commit error of law? . . . Under the circumstances, we think the Circuit Judge committed error of law in excluding the secondary evidence. . . . As was well summed up by Mr. Justice Whitner, in Berry v. Jourdon, 11 Rich. 76: "The party is expected to show that he has in good faith exhausted, in a reasonable degree, all the sources of information and means of discovery which the nature of the case would naturally suggest, and which were accessible to him." As we understand the ruling of the Circuit Judge in the case before us, he exacted a larger measure of proof and applied a stricter rule of evidence. He held that "the person who had the paper in his possession should have been examined as to the lost paper. . . . It may be possible that Mr. Gary found the receipt after he and this witness made the search." We do not think that the rules of evidence sustain Judge Earle in holding, as a sine qua non, that "the person who had that paper in his possession should have been examined." . . .

We think it proper to add that, measured by the quantum of proof adjudged to be sufficient in numerous cases in our reports, as well as elsewhere, the case before us came fully up to the standard established by the Courts. . . . Our opinion, however, is not based upon the quantum of proof — for that is the Circuit Judge's peculiar province — but on the ruling that "the person who had the paper in his possession should have been examined as to the lost paper," when this rule can only apply where the presumption is that he is in possession of the lost paper. And here that presumption was removed by the same testimony that created it. . . .

702. DE CAMP v. ARCHIBALD

Supreme Court of Ohio. 1893

50 Oh. St. 618; 35 N. E. 1056

Error to the Circuit Court of Hamilton county.

The object of this proceeding was to reverse an order of the Court of Common Pleas of Hamilton county, affirmed by the Circuit Court, remanding the plaintiff in error to custody of the sheriff of the county in a proceeding in habeas corpus, the return of the sheriff showing that the party had been committed to the jail of the county by a notary public for refusing to answer certain questions propounded to him; his deposition being taken at the time before the notary to be used as evidence in an action then pending in the superior court of Cincinnati; the suit being that of Charles A. Costello v. The Post Publishing Company, for an alleged libel published in the paper of the defendant, called "The Cincinnati Post."

The plaintiff in error, Joseph M. De Camp, having been called as a witness by the defendant, was asked, among other questions, the following: "You have stated that you prepared the substance of the article published in the Miami Valley News, and employed somebody else, or got somebody else, to assist you in putting it into shape. I will ask you who that person was." After an exception to the question by the plaintiff as incompetent and irrelevant, the witness answered: "Well, it was not Mr. Costello," — to which the counsel for the defendant said: "That does not answer the question. I did not ask you who it was not, but who it was." To this the witness answered: "Well, I have stated several times that Mr. Costello had nothing to do with that article." He was then asked if he refused to answer the question, and he answered that he did. Thereupon counsel for defendant said: . . . "We expect to show that the person who prepared the article, or assisted Mr. Costello in preparing it, was Otto Reich; that Otto Reich did prepare it, caused it to be typewritten and put in shape for publication, with the knowledge and in consultation with Mr. Costello; that the article itself was scurrilous, indecent, and scandalous, and was the provocation for writing and publishing the article which is complained of in the plaintiff's petition; and therefore we desire the evidence for the purpose of proving, or aiding in the proof of, the above fact." He was then ordered by the notary to answer the question, but refused to do so. . . . At the conclusion of the examination, the notary adjudged the witness guilty of contempt in refusing to answer the above questions, and committed him to the jail of the county, there to remain until he should testify as ordered.

It is claimed that the Court erred in remanding the party on these grounds: (1) That no power is conferred on a notary by the Statutes of Ohio, in taking a deposition, to commit a witness to jail for refusing to answer a question; or, if this be not so, then (2) such power, being judicial in character, cannot be conferred on a notary; and (3) the questions propounded the witness were incompetent and irrelevant, and furnished no ground for a commitment.

Harmon, Colston, Goldsmith & Hoadly, and Follett & Kelley, for plaintiff in error. . . . A notary public, as appears from the sections creating the office and authorizing the appointment of notaries (§§ 110 to 123 inclusive, Revised Statutes), is a ministerial officer, appointed by the governor and removed by the governor in the manner provided in § 110.

That the Legislature could not constitutionally vest such an officer with judicial power, is plain from § 10, art. IV, of the Constitution, and it only remains to be determined whether the power here attempted to be exercised is a judicial power. . . .

Bateman & Harper, for defendant in error. . . . It is claimed that §§ 5252–4, as applied and intended to grant to notaries the power to punish, are in violation of art. IV, § 1, of the Constitution. This assumes that the term "judicial power" embraces all discretionary and judicial functions, or functions in aid of the exercise of judicial power by the courts. This cannot be the meaning intended by this provision of the Constitution. It must be construed in view of the whole practice, and recognized constitutional order of our civil society, previous to the time of the adoption of the Constitution and continued since under it. . . .

It is said that the notary is not an officer of the court. Technically, he is not; but the law authorizes his use in its service, and, when performing such service, he is a subordinate of the court in the exercise of the powers in question, subject to its supervision. . . .

MINSHALL, J. (after stating the case as above).

1. As to the first question, is such power conferred on a notary public by the statutes of the State? . . . The mode of taking testimony by depositions is provided for in the part of our Revised Statutes relating to civil procedure. § 5269 designates the officers before whom evidence in this form may be taken, and includes "a notary public"; § 5252 provides, among other things, that "a refusal to answer as a witness, when lawfully ordered, may be punished as a contempt of the court or officer by whom the attendance or testimony of the witness is required;" and § 5254 provides that "the punishment for the contempt mentioned in § 5252 shall be as follows: When the witness fails to attend in obedience to the subpœna, the court or officer may fine him in a sum not exceeding fifty dollars; in other cases the court or officer may fine the witness in a sum not exceeding fifty nor less than five dollars, or may imprison him in the county jail, there to remain until he submits to be sworn, testifies, or gives his deposition." It is plain that by these sections a notary, as any other officer, empowered to take depositions, may imprison a witness in the jail of the county for a refusal to testify before him when required to do so, and the imprisonment may be until he consents to do so; and this is not inconsistent with the power conferred on him by § 118, Rev. St. This section does not purport to limit the powers of a notary public to those of a justice of the peace in matters of contempt, and is entirely consistent with a statute that confers on him other and greater powers in such matters, as is done by the section above referred to. The fact that this construction seems to render the provision as to notaries, contained in § 119, unnecessary, is of no consequence, when we consider how the statutes of the State have been built up by the annual labors of the Legislature, through a long series of years, and, so long as consistency is preserved by the Legislature in making amendments to the laws, redundancy is a matter of no great moment.

2. It is next maintained that the imprisonment of a witness for refusing to answer a question cannot be conferred on a notary, to be exercised in taking a deposition, because such power is judicial in character, and is conferred by the Constitution upon the Courts of the State. Article 4, § 1. . . . The term "judicial power," as used in the Constitution, is not capable of a precise definition. It is included in the power to hear and determine, but does not exhaust the power. That it embraces the hearing and determination of all suits and actions, whether public or private, there can be no doubt. But we think that it is equally clear that it does not necessarily include the power to hear and determine a matter that is not in the nature of a suit or action between parties. Power to hear and determine matters more or less directly affecting public and private rights is conferred upon, and exercised by, administrative and executive officers. But this has not been held to affect the validity of statutes by which such powers are conferred. State v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 98–109. The term "judicial power" has never been taken with such latitude of construction in the usages and customs of our American commonwealths, and to so extend the jurisdiction of the courts would lead to the most embarrassing results, with little or no compensation whatever. The taking of depositions is not only a very ancient, but, in many instances, necessary, method of obtaining evidence to be used in the trial of a cause. Without such means of obtaining evidence, justice could not in many cases be done, as the attendance of the witness at the trial could not be secured; and, if the witness cannot be compelled by the officer taking the deposition to answer a proper question, the rights of a party might be sacrificed to the perversity of the witness. In States where, as in our own, the power is conferred by statute, it has frequently been exercised by notaries, and sustained by the courts. Dogge v. State, 21 Neb. 273, 278; In re Abeles, 12 Kan. 451; Ex parte McKee, 18 Mo. 599; Proffatt, Notaries, § 98; Giauque, Notaries, § 146. . . .

This seems the first time the question has been presented to this Court, though the statute conferring the power is of long standing. Any abuse is carefully guarded against by the power given any judge, by § 5255, Rev. St., on application of the witness, to discharge him if he find the imprisonment to be illegal.

3. Finally, it is claimed that the questions put to the plaintiff in error as a witness were incompetent, and therefore the commitment was illegal. It might be a sufficient answer to this to say that neither of the questions involved any question of privilege on the part of the witness, and no such privilege was claimed as an excuse for not answering; and it seems well settled that whether the questions are in other respects competent is a matter for the determination of the Court on the trial of the action in which the depositions are being taken. Ex parte McKee, 18 Mo. 599; People v. Sheriff of New York, 7 Abb. Pr. 96; People v. Cassels, 5 Hill 164; Bradley v. Veazie, 47 Me. 85; Rapalje, Contempts, §§ 66, 69, 70; Proffatt, Notaries, 202. Here, however, the evidence sought by the questions seems to have been entirely competent. The action being for a libel, the defendant had the right, in mitigation of damages, to show provocation. He had the right to show a prior publication by the plaintiff of a provoking character, or that the plaintiff had been instrumental in the distribution of such a publication. . . . The defendant had, therefore, the right to know who assisted the witness in the publication and distribution of the article in the Miami Valley News, as such information might have enabled him to connect the plaintiff with the publication and distribution of the article in that paper. Hence, both questions were competent, and should have been answered.

Judgment affirmed.

703. Ex Parte Jennings. (1899. Ohio. 60 Oh. St. 319.) The petitioner, Malcom Jennings, by his petition in habeas corpus seeks to be discharged from a commitment made by a notary public before whom his deposition was being taken in an action in quo warranto pending in this Court. . . . The petitioner had testified that he is the proprietor of "The Jennings News Bureau and Advertising Agency," started about December 1, 1898; that the agency had contracts with newspapers in Ohio. . . . The witness was then asked to furnish a list of the papers circulating in Ohio with which he had such contracts. This the witness refused to do upon the ground that the information sought was not pertinent to the issues in the case in which the deposition was being taken and that the disclosure would be detrimental to the business of the witness. . . . The witness persisting in his refusal to answer, the notary issued his writ to a constable of the township commanding him to arrest the petitioner and commit him to the jail of the county and there to remain until he shall submit to testify. . . .

Shauck, J.: Authority to punish, as for a contempt, a witness who refuses to answer "when lawfully ordered" is conferred upon notaries public by sections 5252 and 5254 of the Revised Statutes. De Camp v. Archibald, 50 Ohio St. 618 [ante, No. 702]. The denial here is not of the power of the officer, but of the lawfulness of the occasion for its exercise. . . . The settled law upon the subject is as stated in Church on Habeas Corpus, section 319: "The law has not invested such officers (notaries public) with arbitrary and omnipotent power to compel a witness to answer all questions however incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, or inadmissible. A refusal to answer such questions is not necessarily a contempt. To have power to commit for contempt, the notary must exercise his functions substantially in the manner and under the circumstances prescribed and contemplated by law. . . ." [The subject here covered by the question was irrelevant and incompetent.] In De Camp v. Archibald, so confidently relied upon to justify this imprisonment, it was clearly pointed out in the opinion that the question which the witness refused to answer was competent. . . .

Petitioner discharged.

704. Ex Parte SCHOEPF

Supreme Court of Ohio. 1906

74 Oh. 1; 77 N. E. 276

[Printed ante as No. 500; Point 1 of the opinion]

705. Dowagiac Manufacturing Co. v. Lochren. (1906. United States Circuit Court of Appeals. 143 Fed. 211.) Sanborn, J.: . . . The examination in this case was proceeding before a special master, to whom the case had been referred, to take the evidence and to report the facts. . . . In Blease v. Garlington, 92 U. S. 1, 7, the Supreme Court ruled that in suits in equity all the evidence sought by either party, whether it was received or rejected by the trial Court, should be elicited, and in case of an appeal, presented to the Supreme Court, to the end that, if that Court were of the opinion that the evidence rejected below should have been received, it might consider it and render a final decree without remanding the suit to procure the rejected evidence. . . .

It is a necessary corollary of this rule of practice, established by the decision in Blease v. Garlington, that it is the duty of an auxiliary Court to elicit and cause to be transmitted to the primary Court not only such evidence as it deems competent and material, but also that which it deems incompetent or immaterial, unless the witness or the evidence is privileged or it clearly and affirmatively appears that the evidence cannot possibly be material or relevant. In no other way can the general rule of practice be made effectual; for, if the auxiliary Court refuses to compel the production of the testimony because it deems it immaterial or incompetent, and the appellate Court should be of a different opinion, the latter Court cannot consider the rejected evidence and render a final decree without remanding for further proof, because the rejected evidence has not been elicited and cannot be presented to it. Moreover, this practice is more logical, rational, and convenient than that which requires the auxiliary judge or Court to determine the admissibility of the evidence which either party seeks to secure; because the Court in which the suit is pending and in which all the pleadings and evidence must be gathered together is far more competent to decide questions of this nature than a distant judge or Court that has but a fragment of the case, and, more than all, because the law imposes upon the primary Court the absolute duty to consider and decide all these questions of the admissibility of evidence and to determine the final result in the suit, — a duty that the Court of original jurisdiction is no more able than the Supreme Court to fairly and wisely discharge, unless all the evidence deemed competent or material by any of the parties to the suit has been produced and presented for its consideration.

These considerations have led us to this conclusion: It is not the duty of an auxiliary Court or judge, within whose jurisdiction testimony is being taken in a suit pending in the Court of another district, to consider or determine the competency, materiality, or relevancy of the evidence which one of the parties seeks to elicit. It is the duty of such a Court or judge to compel the production of the evidence, although the judge deems it incompetent or immaterial, unless the witness or the evidence is privileged, or it clearly and affirmatively appears that the evidence cannot possibly be competent, material, or relevant, and that it would be an abuse of the process of the Court to compel its production. Fayerweather v. Ritch (C. C.) 89 Fed. 529. . . . Strong v. Randall, 177 N. Y. 400, 69 N. E. 721.

Topic 4. The Exception

707. WRIGHT v. SHARP

King's Bench. 1709

1 Salk. 288

A CORPORATION-BOOK was offered in evidence at the assizes to prove a member of the corporation not in possession, and refused. No bill of exceptions was then tendered, nor were the exceptions reduced to writing; so the trial proceeded, and a verdict was given for the plaintiff.

Next term the Court was moved for a bill of exceptions, and it was stirred and debated in Court. It was urged, that the law requires "quod proponat exceptionem suam," and no time is appointed for the reducing it into writing, and the party is not grieved till a verdict be given against him; and the same memory that serves the judges for a new trial will serve for bills of exceptions.

On the other side, it was said, that this practice would prove a great difficulty to judges, and delay of justice; that the precedents and entries suppose the exception to be written down upon its being disallowed, and the statute [1] ought to be construed so as to prevent inconvenience; besides the words of the Act are in the present tense, and so is the writ formed on the Act.

HOLT, C. J. — If this practice should prevail, the judge would be in a strange condition: He forgets the exception, and refuses to sign the bill, so an action must be brought. You should have insisted on your exception at the trial. You waive it if you acquiesce, and shall not resort back to your exception after a verdict against you, when perhaps, if you had stood upon your exception, the party had other evidence, and need not have put the cause on this point. The statute indeed appoints no time, but the nature and reason of the thing requires the exception should be reduced to writing when taken and disallowed, like a special verdict, or a demurrer to evidence; not that they need be drawn up in form; but the substance must be reduced to writing while the thing is transacting, because it is to become a record.

[1] [1285, St. 13 Edw. I, Westminster Second, c. 31: "When one that is impleaded before any of the justices doth alledge an exception, praying that the justices will allow it, which if they will not allow, if he that alledged the exception do write the same exception and require that the justices will put to their seals for a testimony, the justices shall do so; and if one will not, another of the company shall; and if the king, upon complaint made of the justices, cause the record to come before him, and the same exception be not found in the roll, and the plaintiff shew the exception written, with the seal of the justice put to," then if the justice admit his seal genuine, the exception shall be adjudged upon.

The history of the statute is noticed in the following works: 1895, Pollock & Maitland, History of the English Law, II, 663–669; 1838, Chitty, General Practice, IV, c. 1, § 1.]

708. HUNNICUTT v. PEYTON. (1880. Federal Supreme Court. 102 U. S. 333, 353.) STRONG, J. — It is no doubt necessary that exceptions should be taken and, at least, noted before the rendition of the verdict; but the reduction of the bills to form, and the signature of the judge to the bills, required for their attestation, or, as said in the Statute of Westminster, "for a testimony," may be afterwards, during the term. In practice it is not usual to reduce bills of exception to form and to obtain the signature of the judge during the progress of the trial. Nor is it necessary. The Statute of Westminster did not require it. It would greatly and uselessly retard the business of Courts were it required that every time an exception is taken the progress of the trial should be stayed until the bill could be reduced to form and signed by the judge. For this reason it has always been held that it need only be noted at the time it is made, and may be reduced to form within a reasonable time after the trial is over.

709. RUSH v. FRENCH

SUPREME COURT OF ARIZONA. 1874

1 Ariz. 99, 121; 25 Pac. 816

DUNNE, C. J. . . . The cases where we are called on to review rulings on the admission of evidence may be reduced to two classes: 1. When the party objecting was overruled and he appeals. 2. When the party objecting was sustained and the other side appeals.

1. In the first case, where the party objecting was overruled and he appeals, he must show by the record: (1) What the question was, and what answer was given to it, or what the evidence was which was introduced against his objection. This is important because the evidence admitted may not injure him. The answer may have been in his favor. It is not necessary that he should show clearly that he was injured, because that would often be impossible, but he must show that the evidence was admitted against his valid objection, which, it may be, has injured him; for the object of granting a review by this Court is not to determine the abstract questions as to whether the judge below ruled correctly or not, but to give relief in case a party may have been injured by an erroneous ruling. (2) He must set out enough of the evidence to illustrate the point of his objection, and to raise the presumption that he may have been injured; but where error is shown, injury will be presumed, unless the contrary clearly appears. (3) He must show what kind of an objection was made, and to avail him here he must show that the objection as made was good. Then it is for the other party to see that the statement made contains a showing sufficient to sustain the admission of the evidence as against the objection made. The amount of showing the latter party must make depends upon the nature of the objection. If the party objecting interpose merely a general objection, all that is necessary is to show enough to obviate the general objection. If the objection is specific, all that is necessary is to show enough to obviate the specific objection as made. Beyond this, we cannot in reason require him to go. He should defend himself against the particular attack made, but we cannot ask him to fortify himself against all possible attacks which might have been made.

2. In the second case, where the party objecting was sustained, and the other side appeals and asks to have the ruling declared erroneous, the party appealing must see that the record shows: (1) What question he asked or what evidence he sought to introduce; (2) Sufficient of the other evidence to illustrate the admissibility of that offered; (3) That the evidence so offered was excluded; (4) That there is reasonable ground to presume that he may have been injured by such exclusion. The other party must see that the record shows good grounds of exclusion.

710. GRIFFIN v. HENDERSON

117 Ga. 382; 43 S. E. 712

PROBATE of will; appeal. Before Judge CANDLER. Newton Superior Court. April 12, 1902. Henderson, as executor, offered a paper for probate as the will of Mrs. A. C. Brown. A caveat was filed by her daughter, Mrs. Lula D. Griffin. On the trial there was a verdict in favor of the propounder. The caveatrix, among other grounds, objected to the probate of her mother's will, for the reason that the testatrix had made the will under a mistake of fact as to the conduct of the daughter, who was her sole heir at law. Civil Code, § 3262. No demurrer or exception was filed to this ground of the caveat. One of the grounds of alleged error was that the Court refused to permit the caveatrix to testify as a witness to any communications made to her by her mother, or conversations between them. "The Court so ruling, no questions were propounded to the witness (caveatrix); who would have testified that Mrs. A. C. Brown treated her entirely different after her marriage to her husband, Mr. C. M. Griffin, than she had done prior to her marriage," and to other facts which relate to the question of a mistake of fact. . . . A motion by Mrs. Griffin for a new trial was overruled, and she excepted.

Brown & Randolph, L. L. Middlebrook, and J. F. Rogers, for plaintiff in error. J. M. Pace and Foster & Butler, contra.

LAMAR, J. . . . It is expressly stated that no questions were propounded to the witness; and while the motion says what she would have testified, it does not appear that the Court was informed thereof at the time he excluded her; and therefore we are not permitted to consider this assignment of error. No matter how competent a witness might be, a Court will not grant a new trial merely because he was not allowed to testify. It must appear that the excluded testimony was material; and the almost universal rule of practice is that what that material testimony was must be expressly called to the attention of the trial Court at the time of its exclusion. Bigby v. Warnock, 115 Ga. 386 (4); Southern Mutual Insurance Co. v. Hudson, 113 Ga. 438; Freeman v. Menecken, 115 Ga. 1018.

In a few instances there may be one exception, particularly in cross-examinations, where the examining counsel may not know what the answer would be, or is exercising a right to test the witness. But ordinarily the exclusion of oral testimony can be made available as error only by asking some pertinent question, and, if an objection is sustained, informing the Court at the time what the answer would be, so that he can then determine whether the fact is or is not material. It will not do to state thereafter what the witness would have answered. . . . If a new trial should be granted because the answer was excluded, it might happen that on the second trial the question would be again propounded, allowed, and the witness give hearsay, inadmissible, or irrelevant testimony, or the answer might be harmful instead of helpful or the witness may reply, "I do not know," with the result that the time and money of the parties and the country has been wasted for so inconsequent a conclusion. That this is not unlikely to occur is shown by the experience of all practising lawyers, who have often seen a long and heated argument as to the right to ask a question, followed by the laughter of all bystanders when the Court held it competent, and the witness replied that he knew nothing about the matter. Parties can often agree in the presence of the Court as to what the witness would testify, or, if not, the witness or examining attorney can state what the answer would be; and, where the subject-matter is important, the judge may, in his discretion, retire the jury until its admissibility has been settled. We are well aware that the rule may be perverted into a means of getting inadmissible evidence before the jury, or, by forcing their constant withdrawal, retard the trial. The Courts must rely upon the good faith of counsel not to bring about such a result. But it would never do to grant a new trial until it appeared not only that the question was proper, but that the answer was material, and would have been of benefit to the complaining party.

While the rule as to assigning error on the exclusion of testimony is not without its exceptions, the practice in other jurisdictions is substantially that in this State. Railroad v. Stonecipher, 95 Tenn. 311; Omaha Ins. Co. v. Berg, 44 Neb. 522 (3). . . .

The judgment of the lower court refusing a new trial is affirmed.

By four Justices. CANDLER, J., disqualified.

Topic 5. New Trial for Erroneous Ruling

711. JOHN H. WIGMORE. A Treatise on Evidence. (1905. Vol. I, § 21.) An erroneous ruling having been made and excepted to, and the excepting party having received an adverse verdict on the law and the evidence, the great question on appeal then becomes, Shall a new trial be granted because of the erroneous admission or exclusion of the particular piece of evidence? It is a great question, because, although it does not directly involve the tenor of the rules of evidence, yet the whole status of the law of evidence, as well as the efficiency of our methods of doing justice, is dependent upon the answer. Whether that law of evidence shall be a mere means to an end, — the end being a just settlement of particular controversies, — or whether it shall be an end in itself — an end so independent of justice, and so superior thereto, that it must be attained even at the cost of justice, — this depends practically upon whether it can be conceded that an erroneous ruling of evidence is ipso facto a ground for a new trial.

The original and orthodox English rule was plain. An erroneous admission or rejection of a piece of evidence was not a sufficient ground for setting aside the verdict and ordering a new trial, unless upon all the evidence it appeared to the judges that the truth had thereby not been reached:

R. v. BALL, R. & R. 133 (1807). "Whether the judges on a case reserved would hold a conviction wrong on the ground that some evidence had been improperly received, when other evidence had been properly admitted that was of itself sufficient to support the conviction, the judges seemed to think must depend on the nature of the case and the weight of the evidence. If the case were clearly made out by proper evidence, in such a way as to have no doubt of the guilt of the prisoner in the mind of any reasonable man, they thought that as there could not be a new trial in felony, such a conviction ought not to be set aside because some other evidence had been given which ought not to have been received. But if the case without such improper evidence were not clearly made out, and the improper evidence might be supposed to have had an effect on the minds of the jury, it would be otherwise."

Such was the rule in the King's Bench, in criminal as well as in civil cases. Such was the rule in the Common Pleas, plainly stated in Doe v. Tyler (1830, 6 Bing. 561). Such was equally the practice in Chancery,[1]

[1] 1805, L. C. Eldon, in Pemberton v. Pemberton, 11 Ves. 50, 52: "If upon the whole [record] he is satisfied that justice has been done, though he may think that some evidence was improperly rejected at law, he is at liberty to refuse a new trial."

So too, in the Federal Supreme Court, for new trials as distinguished from writs of error; 1828, Story, J., in M'Lanahan v. Ins. Co., 1 Pet. 170, 183: "In such cases, the whole evidence is examined with minute care, and the inferences which a jury might properly draw from it are adopted by the Court itself; if therefore upon the whole case justice has been done between the parties, and the when issues had been sent to a jury in a common law court. All this lasted down to the decade of 1830.

In that decade the Court of Exchequer, in Crease v. Barrett (1835, 1 C. M. & R. 919, 932) announced a rule which in spirit and in later interpretation signified that an error of ruling created per se for the excepting and defeated party a right to a new trial. The new Exchequer rule was speedily accepted in the other courts,[1] and for something more than a generation it remained the law of England, until it was reformed away, for civil causes, in 1875.[2]

The Exchequer rule duly obtained recognition in the United States in a majority of jurisdictions. In its most extreme form, and in language exhibiting in the most radical manner the theory that the rules of evidence form an end in themselves, the new doctrine — which had indeed given sporadic signs of independent growth — was now rapidly promulgated.[3] During the last generation, the Exchequer heresy has clearly gained the ascendance.

There are, to be sure, Courts that still cling to the old-fashioned notion, resting on the orthodoxy of Doe v. Tyler, and refusing to bow the knee to the Baal-worship of the rules of evidence.

712. STATE v. CRAWFORD

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1905

96 Minn. 95; 104 N. W. 822

APPEAL from District Court, Sherburne County; A. E. GIDDINGS, Judge.

verdict is substantially right, no new trial will be granted, although there may have been some mistakes committed at the trial"

[1] 1887, Coleridge, C. J., in R. v. Gibson, L. R. 18 Q. B. D. 537, 540: "Until the passing of the Judicature Acts, the rule was that if any bit of evidence not legally admissible, which might have affected the verdict, had gone to the jury, the party against whom it was given was entitled to a new trial."

[2] 1875, Judicature Act, 1883, Rules of the Supreme Court, Order 39, rule 6: "A new trial shall not be granted on the ground of misdirection or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence . . . unless in the opinion of the Court to which the application is made some substantial wrong or miscarriage has been thereby occasioned on the trial."

[3] 1886, Cobb, J., in Masters v. Marsh, 19 Nebr. 467, 27 N. W. 438, excluding certain books of account: "While I do not think that the books would have proved any fact of the least value in the case had they been properly admitted, yet the party presenting them would scarcely be permitted to escape the consequence of an erroneous ruling on that ground."

1874, Cole, J., in Schaser v. State, 36 Wis. 434: "It may be shown by the most irrefragable proof that the defendant is guilty of the offence charged against him; but this does not justify the violation of well settled rules of evidence in order to secure his conviction."

C. D. Crawford and George R. Palmer were convicted of murder, and Crawford appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest S. Cary and Charles S. Wheaton, for appellant. E. T. Young, Attorney General, C. S. Jelley, and F. T. White, County Attorney, for the State.

JAGGARD, J. — The accused, C. D. Crawford jointly indicted with one George R. Palmer for murder in the first degree, was convicted on separate trial and was sentenced to be hanged. On application of his counsel, a stay of execution was granted. The case comes before this Court upon an appeal from the judgment of the trial court. . . . Crawford and his codefendant, Palmer, knew each other before the night of the murder. Crawford had been in the army and was familiar with the handling of firearms. He and Palmer, together with five other young men, Lundin, Freeman, Bjorquist, Conradson, and Kenner, were riding together on a freight train, in a combination mail and baggage car, with the consent of a brakeman. Crawford, testifying on his own behalf, confirms the narrative of the other eyewitnesses in almost all essential particulars. In substantially his own language, the tragedy occurred as follows: He had said to Palmer, while they were on the car: "Let's hold them up." Palmer replied; "All right; I've a flash light." . . . Both Crawford and Palmer cried out: "Throw up your hands!" Although no one offered any resistance, Crawford fired one shot in the air just to "scare" the prospective victims. At the rear end of the car was a sorting table, about five feet long and four feet wide. Lundin and Bjorquist had lain down on it and had gone to sleep, each lying on his right side, each with his face to the front end of the car. . . . After the first shot was fired, Lundin, lying with one hand in his overcoat pocket, did not get up; but, when Palmer tried to waken him, it seemed to Crawford "as if he kind of raised up a little." Palmer then stepped away and, according to Crawford, said to Crawford, "Wake him up;" according to all other eyewitnesses, "Shoot the son of a bitch." Crawford, then only a few feet away from Lundin, passed the light backward and forward and followed the light with the revolver. He "shot the revolver immediately after Palmer said 'Wake him up.'" . . .

Toward the close of the case of the State there occurred the only matter which is now properly before us upon assignment of error. The record reads: "By One of the Jurors: Q. — I would like the witness a question to ask. The Court: You may ask it. Q. — Mr. Conradson, you say that after he the first shot did fire, and before he did the second shot fire, he did to one side step? Q. — Yes, sir. A. — Now I would like to ask you if your best judgment is if he, after he the first shot did fire, and before he did the second shot fire, he did to one side step that he might the better aim take? A. — Yes, sir; so that he could see Lundin's face better and get out of our line and get a better view of Lundin. Q. — And you say that he careful aim did take? A. — Yes, sir. Q. — And then did you hear the report? A. — Yes, sir. Q. — Now, then, after you the report did hear, did you right away know that Lundin was hit? A. — No, sir. Q. — How long after you the report did hear before you knew that the man on the table sleeping was hit? A. — I didn't know that he was hit. I knew that he didn't get up, and I thought he must be shot. That is all I knew about it."

Counsel for the accused insists that it is the duty of the Court in its sound discretion to allow the juror to ask any proper and competent question: but that it was likewise the duty of the Court in its sound discretion, with regard to the rights of the defendant, to determine whether or not the questions were proper and competent questions before allowing the same to be submitted to the witness, and not to allow incompetent questions to be asked, and that failure to object to this question involving the opinion of this witness was error. In support of this he cites typical authorities to the effect that it is a well-established principle that the rejection of competent and material evidence, or the reception of incompetent and improper evidence, which is harmful to the defendant and excepted to, present an error requiring reversal. Such a ruling affects the substantial rights of the defendant, even though the appellate Court would, with the rejected evidence before it, or with the improper evidence excluded, still come to the same conclusion reached by the jury. The defendant has the right to insist that material and legal evidence offered by him shall be received and submitted to the jury, and to have illegal and improper evidence, which may be harmful, excluded, and have the opinion of the jury upon proper evidence admitted in the case, and upon such evidence only. People v. Wood, 126 N. Y. 249; People v. Greenwall, 108 N. Y. 296. As was said by Earl, J., in the latter case: "A person on trial for his life is entitled to all the advantages which the law gives him, and among them is the right to have his case submitted to an impartial jury upon competent evidence. Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 164." People v. Corey, 148 N. Y. 476, 42 N. E. 1066.

We are satisfied that as a matter of strict technical construction there is no error in this record entitling the accused to a new trial as a matter of right. . . . Accordingly, assuming that the questions and testimony have all the legal faults counsel for the accused contends for, and that the decision of this case is to be rested upon technical rules, the appeal must fail. . . . There are cases in which it would be the more orderly practice for the trial court, in its discretion, to ask the juryman to indicate the point of his inquiry and then to see that the question is properly formulated, as by directing counsel to put it, so as to afford the usual opportunity for objection and exception. Indeed, there is ordinarily no occasion for a juryman to interrogate a witness. In the instant case, however, no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial Court and no reversible error appears in this matter.

The decision in this case, however, is not based upon compliance or noncompliance with technical rules of practice or evidence. Such rules are primarily different from the constitutional guaranties, without the strict observance of which punishment even by a properly constituted court is little better than the punishment by a mob. Matters of mere procedure, however, have no such sanctity. When a court exercises its traditional power to regulate a trial, to pass on the competency, materiality, or sufficiency of evidence, or the propriety of the form of a question, and to revise the action of a jury, it violates no constitutional right; nor does it when it confirms the verdict of a jury. Rules of practice and evidence are primarily designed to secure the orderly administration of the laws of the land. They serve their purpose so far as, and only so far as, they conduce to a fair trial. But, instead of serving as a means of securing justice, they have been made to usurp dominion as if their observation were the end to be attained.

Decisions of many Courts have determined controversies concerning them as if they were the constitutional requirements, as if the object of the law was their evolution into a perfect system, and as if the function of even the highest judicial tribunals was to secure their consistent enforcement. Under the guise of protecting the "rights of the accused," this perversion in the use of these rules has been and must be the source of wrong, alike to the accused and to the public. For, on the one hand, cases involving human lives may arise in which an appellate Court would properly feel that there was imposed on it the duty of setting aside a verdict of conviction and of granting a new trial for errors committed by the trial Court resulting in an unfair trial of the defendant, although no objection or exception was made or taken to the improper admission or exclusion of evidence, or to the improper conduct or ruling of a trial court, because of the mistake or misconduct, neglect, or incompetency of his counsel. The strict application of practice rules would then make a new and fair trial impossible. On the other hand, the exaggeration of the value of such technicalities has opened the doors for the escape of unnumbered and undoubted criminals. "Some of the instances of enforcement would seem incredible, even in the justice of a tribe of African fetish worshipers." 1 Wigmore on Evidence, p. 73.

There is a current impression on part of the profession of law, and of the community in general, that all Courts are hopelessly committed to this apotheosis of an artificial system, as repugnant to common sense as it is subversive of common justice. In point of fact, this is far from being true. The original English rule was that erroneous admission or exclusion of evidence, duly objected to, would not be a basis for new trial if the rest of the testimony be sufficient to warrant the conclusion to which the jury have come. Later, and about 1835, a different rule came to be generally accepted, viz., "that an error or ruling created per se for the defeated party a right to a new trial. It remained the law of England until it was reformed away for civil cases in 1875." In the United States this rule is the law in the majority of jurisdictions, but it is not sustained by the better opinion or reason (1 Wigmore on Evidence, p. 71, § 21), and is distinctly not the law in this State. In State v. Nelson, 91 Minn. 143, 144, 145, Brown, J., says:

"New trials in criminal prosecutions have for many years been granted by the Courts with too much liberality (3 Columbia Law Rev. 433), and to such an extent have the technical rights of accused persons been magnified and upheld, and that, too, in cases where guilt has been overwhelmingly shown, as to result in much public discontent, and to bring the administration of the criminal laws into disrespect. Errors of no vital consequence, at least not affecting materially the substantial rights of the accused, either in the admission or exclusion of evidence, in the instructions of the trial Court to the jury, or alleged misconduct of the prosecuting attorney, have opened prison doors and liberated many criminals. This condition has caused peaceful and law-abiding citizens to become lawless, and to join in the barbarous method of punishing crime by a resort to the Court of Judge Lynch. All such outrages of the law have been attributed in the main to the lax administration of the laws in the criminal Courts, the gravity and tenacity with which they respect the alleged legal rights of the criminal, and the unnecessarily strict adherence to ancient forms and procedure. Remedies have been suggested, among others, that the right of appeal be taken away in such cases; but it is believed that the only appropriate way to quiet the public mind in this respect and restore confidence in the ability of the Courts to administer justice, not only to the criminal, but to society and the State as well, and to overcome the tendency to resort to lynch law, is a prompt and speedy trial, conviction, and certain and unrelenting punishment of the guilty, unaccompanied by the long delays usually incident to the administration of criminal laws, and unaccompanied, too, by too much respect for refined and subtle technicalities. New trials should be granted only where the substantial rights of the accused have been so violated as to make it reasonably clear that a fair trial was not had."

The present case, however, presents neither error nor unfair trial. The substantial rights of the accused have not been violated. . . . The prosecuting attorney without error proved every step in the perpetration of the double felony from its beginning to its end, by testimony the most direct, complete, and conclusive, amounting to a substantial demonstration of the guilt, and of the degree of guilt, of the accused. Not only did four full-grown men, who in the possession of all their faculties had seen in the light held by the prisoner himself, in his presence and in the presence of each other, every act of the tragedy, testify without attack, impeachment, or inconsistency, to every brutal detail; not only were the revolver which shot the bullet and the bullet which was taken from the brain of the dead man produced, identified, and connected with the deceased; but he himself voluntarily took the stand and admitted the robbery and the shooting.

There is accordingly no doubt that the judgment of the trial Court should be, and it is hereby, affirmed; and it is hereby directed, in accordance with the statute (Gen. St. 1894, § 7391), that the sentence pronounced by the trial court be executed. Judgment affirmed.

TITLE III. ORDER OF INTRODUCING EVIDENCE

Topic 1. In General

714. Lord Lovat's Trial. (1746. House of Lords. 18 How. St. Tr. 658.) Hardwicke, L. C. — My lords, the rule for the examination of witnesses in this Court, in either House of Parliament, and everywhere else, is that . . . all questions that are asked, whether touching the matter of fact to be tried or the credibility of the witness, are to be asked at the proper time. The party who produces a witness has a right to go through the examination first, and then the other side cross-examines him; and after that is over, the judge asks him such questions as he thinks proper; unless, as I said before, there be any objections to the questions, or any doubtful matter arises that wants immediately to be cleared up. The same method is to be observed here; and the reason of it, my lords, is that unless your lordships observe this method, you will be in perpetual confusion.

715. Hathaway v. Hemingway. (1850. Connecticut. 20 Conn. 191, 195.) Waite, J. — The rule upon this subject is a familiar one. When, by the pleadings, the burden of proof of any matter in issue is thrown upon the plaintiff, he must in the first instance introduce all the evidence upon which he relies to establish his case. He cannot (as said by Lord Ellenborough) go into half his case and reserve the remainder. The same rule applies to the defence. After the plaintiff has closed his testimony, the defendant must then bring forward all the evidence upon which he relies to meet the claim on the part of the plaintiff. He cannot introduce a part and reserve the residue for some future occasion. After he has rested, neither party can as a matter of right introduce any farther testimony which may properly be considered testimony in chief. . . .

But this rule is not in all cases an inflexible one. There is and of necessity must be a discretionary power, vested in the Court before which a trial is had, to relax the operation of the rule, when great injustice will be done by a strict adherence to it.

716. Rucker v. Eddings. (1841. Missouri. 7 Mo. 115, 118.) Scott, J.: The law has entrusted Courts with a discretion in allowing the parties to a cause to obviate the effects of inadvertence by the introduction of testimony out of its order. This discretion is to be exercised in furtherance of justice, and in a manner so as not to encourage the tampering with witnesses to induce them to prop up a cause whose weakness has been exposed. Where mere formal proof has been omitted, Courts have allowed witnesses to be called or documents to be produced at any time before the jury retire, in order to supply it. So, material testimony ought not to be rejected because offered after the evidence is closed on both sides, unless it has been kept back by trick and the opposite party would be deceived or injuriously affected by it. So, after a witness has been examined and cross-examined, the Court may at its discretion permit either party to examine him again, even as to new matter, at any time during the trial. So, where by an accidental omission plaintiff's attorney does not call and examine a witness who was present in Court, and a non-suit is moved for after he has rested his case, the Court will permit the witness to be examined in furtherance of justice.

This Court is sensible of the disadvantages under which it labors in revising the discretion of the Circuit Courts in matters of this kind, and a strong case must be presented for its interference before it can be induced to disturb the judgment of inferior Courts by revising the exercise of the discretion with which they are entrusted in regard to the relaxation of the rules of evidence. It must be manifest to any one conversant with the trial of causes that the Court before which a trial is had, from having an opportunity of seeing the conduct of parties, of witnessing the difference in the experience of the opposite counsel, and many incidents which cannot be set out in a bill of exceptions and which influence the exercise of its discretion (and properly too), has superior means for a wise and judicious exercise of this power than is possessed by this Court, which is confined entirely to the facts spread upon the record.

717. MUELLER v. REBHAN

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1879

94 Ill. 142

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of St. Clair county; the Hon. WILLIAM H. SNYDER, Judge, presiding.

This was a bill filed May 8, 1875, by Catherine Rebhan, the appellee, against Solomon Mueller and others, to set aside the will of George Christian Mueller (executed on the 14th of March, 1870), who died a few days after the execution of the will. The will was afterwards duly probated. . . .

The ground upon which it was sought to set aside the will were two: 1. It was charged that George Christian Mueller at the time of the making of the will, was mentally incapable, and that he was of weak intellect, not possessed of capacity sufficient to make a valid will. . . . An issue was formed as to the validity of the will, that was submitted to a jury for trial at the January Term, 1877, and resulted in a verdict that the will in question was not the will of the deceased. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendants and overruled by the court, and a final decree entered setting the will aside, and Solomon Mueller appeals to this court.

Mr. W. Winkelman, for the appellant. Mr. James M. Dill, and Mr. W. C. Kueffner, for the appellee.

Mr. Justice DICKEY delivered the opinion of the Court. . . . It is insisted that the Court erred in refusing to permit appellant, after the complainant had closed her testimony as to the sanity of George Christian Mueller at the time of the making of the will, to introduce testimony tending to prove that he was sane and mentally competent. . . .

As a matter of practice the rulings of Courts are not uniform upon this question. In some Courts it is held that neither party is called upon to produce all his testimony in support of any allegation in issue until it has been developed on the trial that an issue on the evidence is made upon that question; the view of such Courts being that where the burden of proof of a given allegation rests upon a party, it is sufficient for that party, in the first instance, to produce proof enough to make a prima facie case, and that he is not required to accumulate other testimony until evidence has been introduced tending to contradict his prima facie case. That rule has not prevailed in the Courts of this State; but the more usual rule is, that the party upon whom the burden of proof rests must, in the first instance, produce all the proof he proposes to offer in support of his allegation; and after his adversary has closed his proof, he may only be heard in adducing proof directly rebutting the proofs given by his adversay. This question of practice must, to a greater or less degree, be left to the discretion of the Court trying the case. This discretion should be exercised in such a manner that neither party shall be taken by surprise and deprived, without notice, of an opportunity of producing any material proof.

In this case, when the appellant closed his proof and rested his case upon the production of the will, the affidavit of the subscribing witnesses and the order of the Court admitting it to probate, appellant was notified (the record shows) that if he desired to produce any additional proof of the sanity of the testator it might be then produced, otherwise the introduction of it would not be permitted after the defendant had closed his case. Appellant, having rested his case upon this prima facie proof, under these circumstances can not be allowed to complain that he was not permitted to cumulate proof upon this subject. An examination of the proof, however, shows that the Court did allow appellant to introduce and prove any and all facts having a tendency to rebut the proof offered by appellee, except in so far as he proposed to interrogate witnesses as to their opinions as to whether the testator was sane. We are led to believe that appellant suffered no injury from this ruling of the Court. . . . The decree of the Circuit Court must be affirmed. Decree affirmed.

718. ANKERSMIT v. TUCK

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1889

114 N. Y. 51; 20 N. E. 819

APPEAL from judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court in the first judicial department, entered upon an order made March 28, 1888, which affirmed a judgment in favor of defendant, entered on a verdict and an order denying a new trial.

This action was brought to recover the possession of eight bales of Sumatra tobacco purchased by the defendant's assignor, as is alleged, by means of false and fraudulent representations as to his solvency, and with the intent not to pay therefor. Upon the trial the plaintiffs gave evidence tending to show that, before making the sale of the goods in question, the defendant's assignor represented and stated that he was solvent and worth $20,000; that his wife had $10,000, which was in the stock at the risk of the business. After the plaintiffs had rested, the defendant's assignor was sworn as a witness for the defendant, and denied that he had made any such representations. Upon the cross-examination he was asked if he had not purchased goods at about that time of various individuals, among whom were Schroeder & Bon, and he testified that he had, but at the time of such purchase in August or September, 1885, Bon did not make any inquiry of him as to his financial condition, and that he did not say to Bon that he was solvent and worth $20,000, and did not state to him that he had $10,000 in his business from his wife, which was at the risk of the business. After he had rested, the plaintiffs called Bon as a witness, who testified that he sold the goods to the defendant's assignor in August or September, 1885, and that, at the time he made a statement as to his condition. The witness was then asked "Did he state to you that he was solvent; and that he was worth $12,000, and that the $10,000 which he got from his wife was at the risk of the business?" This was objected to as immaterial, incompetent and not in rebuttal. The evidence was excluded and an exception taken by the plaintiffs.

Frederick P. Forster, for appellants. Evidence impeaching Moeller's credibility was erroneously excluded. . . . For the purpose of impeaching Moeller the evidence was not competent in chief; it could only be offered at the time it was. . . .

Alfred P. W. Seaman and E. E. West, for respondent. A party is bound to exhaust all his testimony in support of his issue, and to introduce all his evidence before he closes. . . . The evidence was admissible on plaintiff's case, as a matter of right, but its admission in rebuttal was in the "discretion of the court, from the exercise of which discretion no appeal lies." . . . Plaintiffs neglected to produce evidence of contemporaneous representations before they rested, when competent, and when they attempted to prove them on cross-examination of defendant's witness they made the witness their own for that purpose, and being disappointed in the result, they should not be permitted to impeach the testimony they themselves brought out. . . .

HAIGHT, J. (after stating the case as above). The Court at General Term, held that the statement made to Bon and others was competent as evidence in chief, and that the plaintiffs, having rested without introducing it, left its subsequent admission discretionary with the trial Court, and, consequently, that the exception to its exclusion was not well taken. It is doubtless true that the evidence was competent and could have been introduced by the plaintiffs as a part of their affirmative case for the purpose of showing an intent to cheat and defraud, and that their neglect to introduce it at that time deprives them of the right to make use of it as affirmative evidence. But a party has the right to impeach or discredit the testimony of an opponent, and such evidence is always competent. He may contradict the testimony of a witness as to any matters upon which he has been called to give evidence in chief, provided it is not collateral to the issue; if it has reference to statements made to others, his attention should first be called to the time, place and person to whom the statement is claimed to have been made, and if denied, such person may then be called to contradict him, thus discrediting his testimony as a witness. This is what the plaintiffs attempted to do, and we do not understand that it was discretionary with the trial Court to exclude it. . . . The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, costs to abide the event.

All concur. Judgment reversed.

Topic 2. Putting in One's Own Case on Cross-Examination

719. MOODY v. ROWELL

17 Pick. 490

ASSUMPSIT on a promissory note for the sum of $2,750, dated November 1, 1828, payable to John Blaisdell, junior, since deceased, or his order, in five years, with interest, and purporting to be signed by the defendant and indorsed by the payee. The defence rested on the ground, that the signatures of the defendant and of the payee were forged. Henry H. Brown, who was called as a witness for the defendant, was examined as to the handwriting of the payee. On his cross-examination, the plaintiff examined him as to the handwriting of the defendant. The judge did not permit the plaintiff to cross-examine the witness as to the defendant's signature, he not having been questioned on that subject by the defendant. . . .

The verdict was for the defendant; and the plaintiff moved for a new trial.

Saltonstall and Choate, for the plaintiff. . . .

Cushing, for the defendant, to the point, that the party cross-examining a witness, is not authorized to put leading questions as to a matter not inquired of on the direct examination. . . .

SHAW, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court. . . . Upon the question, whether, as a general rule, the cross-examining party is prohibited from putting a leading question to a matter not inquired of by the party calling him, on his examination in chief, there is a diversity of opinion. It was held by Mr. Justice WASHINGTON, that such question could not be put. Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C. R. 580. . . . The same view seems to have been taken by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Ellmaker v. Buckley, 16 Serg. & Rawle 77. But we think the general practice has been otherwise both in England and in this State, and is so laid down by the compilers. 1 Starkie on Evidence (4th Am. ed.) 131;

1 Phillipps on Evidence (6th ed.) 260. . . . So in several recent cases, it has been held that where a witness is called to a particular fact, he is a witness to all purposes, and may be fully cross-examined to the whole case, and no distinction is suggested as to the mode of cross-examination. Morgan v. Brydges, 2 Stark. R. 314; Rex v. Brooke, ibid. 472. . . .

It is most desirable that rules of general practice, of so much importance and of such frequent recurrence, should be as few, simple and practical as possible, and that distinctions should not be multiplied without good cause. It would be often difficult, in a long and complicated examination, to decide whether a question applies wholly to new matter, or to matter already examined to in chief. The general rule admitted on all hands is, that on a cross-examination, leading questions may be put, and the Court are of opinion, that it would be useful to engraft upon it a distinction not in general necessary to attain the purposes of justice, in the investigation of the truth of facts, that it would be often difficult of application, and that all the practical good expected from it may be as effectually attained by the exercise of the discretionary power of the court, where the circumstances are such as to require its interposition. As this was laid down as the general rule of law, the Court are of opinion, that upon this ground the plaintiff, if he shall be so advised, is entitled to have a new trial.

720. PHILADELPHIA & TRENTON R. CO. v. STIMPSON. (1846. Federal Supreme Court. 14 Pet. 448, 461.) STORY, J. (ruling on testimony to an admission, given by the defendant's witness on cross-examination). Upon his cross-examination Winans stated: "I understood there were arrangements made with the Baltimore Company. I heard the company paid five thousand dollars." Now, certainly, these statements, if objected to by the defendants, would have been inadmissible on two distinct grounds. 1. First, as mere hearsay; 2. And, secondly . . . upon the broader principle (now well established, although sometimes lost sight of in our loose practice at trials) that a party has no right to cross-examine any witness except as to facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination. If he wishes to examine him as to other matters, he must do so by making the witness his own, and calling him as such in the subsequent progress of the cause.

721. STAFFORD v. FARGO. (1864. Illinois. 35 Ill. 481, 486.) WALKER, C. J.: [The opponent] has only the right to cross-examine upon the facts to which he [the witness] testified in chief. If he can give evidence beneficial to the other party, he should call him at the proper time and make him his own witness and examine him in chief, thereby giving the other party the benefit of a cross-examination on such evidence in chief. Otherwise the party calling the witness would be deprived of a cross-examination as to evidence called out by the other side, and the party against whom the witness was first called would obtain the advantage of getting evidence under the latitude allowed in cross-examination.

722. NEW YORK IRON MINE v. NEGAUNEE BANK

SUPREME COURT OF MICHIGAN. 1878

39 Mich. 644

ERROR to Marquette. Submitted October 18 and 22. Decided November 21. Assumpsit. Defendant brings error.

W. P. Healy and G. V. N. Lothrop, for plaintiff in error. . . . Wide latitude should be allowed in cross-examining a party charged with fraud in the transaction at issue. . . .

Ball & Owen and Ashley Pond, for defendant in error. . . . Cross-examination must be confined to matters bearing on the direct testimony of the witness. . . .

COOLEY, J. — The plaintiff in error is sued as a maker of three promissory notes and endorser of a fourth, all of which are copied in the margin.[1] By reference to these notes it will be seen that the name of plaintiff in error is subscribed or endorsed by W. L. Wetmore, and the contest has been made over his authority to make use of the name of plaintiff in error as he has done. The New York Mine is a corporation, having its place of operations at Ishpeming in this State. It was organized some fourteen years ago, with Samuel J. Tilden and William L. Wetmore as corporators. Mr. Tilden has had the principal interest from the first, and has always acted as president and treasurer, keeping his office in New York city. Mr. Wetmore has always until this controversy arose acted as general agent with his office at Ishpeming. The board of direction has been made up of these gentlemen with some nominal holders of stock in New York city as associates. . . . The firm of Wetmore & Bro. named in the three notes purporting to be made by the New York Mine, was composed of William L. and F. P. Wetmore, and there was evidence that the New York Mine had had business transactions with that firm to the amount in all of $125,000. . . . It was not claimed on the trial that there had ever been any corporate action expressly empowering Wetmore as general agent to make promissory notes, nor did it appear that he had ever executed any in its name except a few. . . . It was not disputed by the defense that the corporation as such had power to make the notes in suit. The question was whether it had in any manner delegated that power to Wetmore. . . .

Some of the proceedings on the trial require attention, and especially the rule of cross-examination laid down by the circuit judge when Wetmore was on the stand as a witness for the plaintiff. Wetmore was manifestly a willing witness, and made such showing as was in his power in support of the authority which as general agent he had assumed to exercise. But although he was the first witness called, and the case involved nothing but paper made or indorsed by himself, he was not asked respecting his signatures, and the notes were not offered in evidence while he was upon the stand. The reason for this was apparent as soon as the cross-examination commenced, for when the witness was asked any questions concerning the notes, the purpose of which was to show that he had signed or indorsed them without authority and in fraud of defendant, and that he had admitted that such was the fact, objection was at once interposed on behalf of the plaintiff, and the circuit judge, remarking that the witness had given no testimony in reference to the notes, nor had any testimony been introduced by any other party in reference to them, nor had the notes been put in evidence, sustained the objection.

The question of the proper range of cross-examination has been discussed in this State until it would seem that further discussion must be entirely needless. . . . People v. Horton, 4 Mich. 67, and Campau v. Dewey, 9 Mich. 381, would support the ruling of the circuit judge. But those cases have been repeatedly overruled. In Chandler v. Allison, 10 Mich. 460, 473, Mr. Justice CAMPBELL undertook to lay down the proper rule. The object of cross-examination, he there explained, "is to elicit the whole truth concerning transactions which may be supposed to have been only partially explained, and where the whole truth would represent them in a different light. Whenever an entire transaction is in issue, evidence which conceals a part of it is defective, and does not comply with the primary obligation of the oath, which is designed to elicit the whole truth. If the witness were (as he always may be) requested to state what he knows about it, he would not do his duty by designedly stopping short of it. Any question which fills up his omissions, whether designed or accidental, is legitimate and proper on cross-examination. . . . A party cannot glean out certain parts, which alone would make out a false account, and save his own witness from the sifting process by which only those omissions can be detected. There could be no such thing as cross-examination if such a course were allowed. . . . No one can be compelled to make his adversary's witness his own to explain or fill up a transaction he has partially explained already.

One might suppose, after reading this language, that it was written in anticipation of the proceedings in this very case. . . . Here the matter in issue was confined to the single point of Wetmore's authority to make and endorse the paper sued upon. . . . The questions on behalf of the plaintiff had been carefully restricted to that part of the facts which it was supposed would tend in its favor and in respect to which a cross-examination could not be damaging, and were intended, instead of eliciting the whole truth, to conceal whatever would favor the defense. The witness, instead of being required, according to the obligation of his oath, to tell the whole truth, had been carefully limited to something less than the whole; and when questions were asked calculated to supply his omissions, they were ruled out because they did not relate to the precise circumstances which the plaintiff had thought it for his interest to call out. It would be difficult to present a more striking illustration of the error in the rule in People v. Horton than is afforded by this case. For here was the principal actor in the transaction under investigation brought forward as a witness to support his own acts, but carefully examined in such a manner as to avoid having him utter a single word regarding the main fact — though it was peculiarly within his own knowledge — and even his handwriting was left to be proved by another. In that manner he was made to conceal not merely a part of the transaction but a principal part, and made to tell, not the whole truth according to the obligation of his oath, but a small fraction only, — a fraction, too, that was important only as it bore upon the main fact which was so carefully kept out of sight while this witness was giving his evidence. It is true, the defense was at liberty to call the witness subsequently; but this is no answer; the defense was not compellable to give credit to the plaintiff's witness as its own for the purposes of an explanation of facts constituting the plaintiff's case and a part of which the plaintiff had put before the jury when examining him. One of the mischiefs of the rule in People v. Horton was that it encouraged a practice not favorable to justice, whereby a party was compelled to make an unfriendly witness his own, after the party calling him had managed to present a one-sided and essentially false account of the facts, by artfully aiding the witness to give such glimpses of the truth only as would favor his own side of the issue. What has been said on this point has in substance been said many times before. The necessity of repeating it is a singular illustration of the difficulty with which a mischievous but plausible precedent is sometimes got rid of.

The question put to Wetmore on cross-examination, whether he had not admitted his fraud in the issue of this and similar paper, should have been allowed, as bearing directly upon the trustworthiness of his evidence. . . . The judgment must be reversed with costs, and a new trial ordered.

The other Justices concurred.

723. Rush v. French. (1874. Arizona. 1 Ariz. 99; 25 Pac. 816.) Dunne, C. J.: . . . Judge Garber, of Nevada, in Ferguson v. Rutherford, 7 Nev. 390, . . . evolves a clear, definite rule, which everybody can understand, and which any one thoroughly versed in the effect of pleadings can apply, viz., that the one invariable test to determine whether the cross-examination can be permitted is, Does it concern new matter of defence or not? As we understand the purport of this decision, it means that whatever is in mere denial of plaintiff's case may be brought out on cross-examination, whether the witness directly testified concerning it or not; that any such matter is, for this purpose, a fact or circumstance, legitimately connected with the matter testified to; if the witness has testified to any material fact in behalf of plaintiff's case, he may be compelled to disclose on cross-examination all he knows about the plaintiff's case, and everything that will go towards denying and destroying the case set up by plaintiff; that so far as defendant has a right to cross-examine on such matter, he shall have the full benefit of cross-examination, viz., the right to make such examination leading, thorough, and exhaustive, and the fact that the evidence thus educed, while pertinent to the pending matter, will also help defendant's case is no ground for its exclusion. . . .

We have only one objection to the rule as stated by Judge GARBER, and that is the difficulty of applying it with certainty in the hurry of nisi prius trials. The test as to whether matter is or is not new matter of defence is, Can it be given in evidence under a general denial, and very often it is not easy to say, at a moment's notice, whether the matter is new or not, in this sense. The rule would hardly forward business on the trial; there would be the same objection by counsel as to admissibility, the same consumption of time in argument, and the same hesitation on the part of the Court to decide. But there is this advantage, after the trial is over, all parties know just what is necessary to determine whether an appeal will lie or not; they know where the line is drawn; they can look for it, and when they find it, they know that they have struck "wall rock," and that it is useless to go further. This is a great deal better than trusting to some other man's idea of the general equities of the case. Still, it is a very poor substitute for the plain, simple English rule, which avoids all possibility of dispute, saves all contention at the trial, dispatches the business at once, and yet, according to the testimony of our oldest and busiest States, hurts nobody. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court of the United States has discarded the English rule, and has furnished some suggestions for a new rule, which different States have accepted as a basis on which to build up what is called, by way of distinction, the American rule, though it has hardly received an adoption sufficiently general to warrant such a title. These suggestions have been adopted in California and Nevada. . . . We shall adopt the following rules, believing them to be clearly in accordance with the doctrine held in Nevada, and substantially in accordance with the practice in California:

1. When an adverse witness has testified to any point material to the party calling him, he may then and there be fully cross-examined and led by the adverse party upon all matters pertinent to the case of the party calling him, except exclusively new matter; and nothing shall be deemed new matter except it be such as could not be given under a general denial.

2. The fact that evidence called forth by a legitimate cross-examination happens also to sustain a cross-action or counter-claim affords no reason why it should be excluded.

3. The party entitled to cross-examine may waive his rights to do so at the time, and recall the witness and cross-examine him after he opens his case.

724. AYERS v. WABASH R. CO.

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI. 1905

190 Mo. 228; 88 S. W. 608

APPEAL from Circuit Court, Carroll County; JNO. P. BUTLER, Judge.

Action by Montie B. Ayers against the Wabash Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff was struck by a locomotive on defendants' railroad, and suffered personal injuries. He brings this suit for damages. The negligence ascribed to the defendant in the petition is failure to sound the bell or whistle on approaching the point where plaintiff was, and failure of the engineer to use the appliances at hand to stop the train in time to avoid striking the plaintiff after seeing him in a position of peril, or after the engineer, by ordinary care, might have seen him. The petition states that defendant's track was, and had been for many years, a well-recognized public path for pedestrians, with the knowledge and consent of defendant, and that plaintiff was on the track when he was struck, but it omits to say what he was doing, or in what position he was. The answer was a general denial and contributory negligence. . . .

The plaintiff called as a witness the engineer who was operating the locomotive at the time of the accident, and interrogated him on two subjects; that is, asked him how the engine was equipped, and what kind of a day it was. Then the witness was turned over to attorney for defendant for cross-examination, and was examined in regard to the accident, in which examination he stated: That when at his post on a level, straight track he could see from a half to three-quarters of a mile ahead. That this track was level and straight for about a quarter of a mile south of Gates' Crossing. That on this occasion he was at his post on the east side of the cab, looking north. He was running a little over 40 miles an hour. At that speed the train could not be stopped shorter than within 600 or 700 feet. That he did not see the plaintiff until he was within 150 feet of him. The plaintiff was then lying on the west side of the west rail, his body showing about 5 or 6 inches above the rail. As soon as he saw him, he used every effort and means at hand to stop, but it was too late. It was then impossible to stop in time to prevent striking him. The position of the plaintiff on the track was such that the witness could not have discerned him sooner than he did. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence the Court, at the request of defendant, gave an instruction to the jury to find for the defendant. The jury rendered a verdict accordingly, and the judgment for defendant followed. The plaintiff appealed.

John T. Barker and Conkling & Rea, for appellant. Geo. S. Grover, for respondent.

VALLIANT, J. (after stating the case as above). . . . The only question for decision is, was the plaintiff entitled to have his case submitted to the jury under instructions authorizing a verdict in his favor under any view of the evidence? The plaintiff insists that the testimony of the engineer to the effect that he was at his post and looking, yet did not see him until it was too late, and that as soon as he discovered him he did everything possible to avert the injury, is not the plaintiff's evidence, and did not justify the court in giving the peremptory instruction. The proposition is that the engineer was the plaintiff's witness only in reference to the subjects on which he was examined by plaintiff, and as to the rest he was defendant's witness. The question of latitude allowed in cross-examination of an adversary's witness has led to the adoption of one rule in some jurisdictions and a different one in others. A distinguished text-writer on this subject calls one the "orthodox rule," and the other the "Federal rule" (3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1885 et seq.), and quotes for the orthodox rule Fulton Bank v. Stafford, 2 Wend. 483–485:

"When a witness has been sworn in chief, the opposite party may not only cross-examine him in relation to the point which he was called to prove, but he may examine him as to any matter embraced in the issue. He may establish his defence by him without calling any other witness. If he is a competent witness to the jury for any purpose, he is so for all purposes."

For the Federal rule the same text-writer quotes from Judge Story in Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. 448, 461 [ante, No. 720];

"[The answers in controversy were inadmissible] upon the broader principle (now well established, although sometimes lost sight of in our loose practice at trials) that a party has no right to cross-examine any witness except as to facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination. If he wishes to examine as to other matters, he must do so by making the witness his own, and calling him as such in the subsequent progress of the case."

What is there called the "orthodox rule" has always been the rule in this State. Page v. Kankey, 6 Mo. 433; Railroad v. Silver, 56 Mo. 265; State v. Jones, 64 Mo. 391; State v. Soper, 148 Mo. 234. The learned author above named, after an exhaustive discussion of the subject, says, in § 1895: "The rule under consideration is concerned solely with the order of presenting evidential material. The assumption is that the fact may be proved on direct examination at a later stage, and the only question is whether it may be elicited during the earlier stage." That is really the only essential difference in effect between the two rules. Under what is called the Federal rule, the defendant may cross-examine the plaintiff's witness on the subject of his examination in chief, and afterwards, when defendant comes to introducing his evidence, he may recall the witness, and examine him on other subjects, making him as to those matters his own witness. Under our rule the defendant need not wait until the time for introducing his evidence has come, but may examine the witness before he leaves the stand on other subjects; yet as to these other matters he is the defendant's witness. The testimony is the defendant's, and not the plaintiff's. Hume v. Hopkins, 140 Mo. 65; State ex rel. v. Branch, 151 Mo. 622, loc. cit. 641; Anderson v. Railroad, 161 Mo. 411. In such case, if the plaintiff had by other evidence made out a prima facie case, the Court could not take it from the jury on account of testimony brought out by defendant in the examination of the plaintiff's witness touching matters that had not been referred to in the direct examination. Such testimony would be the same, in effect, as if the witness had, as in conformity with the Federal rule, come down from the stand, and been recalled by the defendant after the plaintiff had closed his case. The only difference, as the text-writer above quoted says, is in the order in which the testimony is introduced. Involved in this subject is the question of the right of plaintiff to cross-examine the same witness on the new subject on which the defendant has examined him, and the right of the plaintiff, after having closed his case in chief, to bring out testimony not strictly in rebuttal by examining defendant's witnesses on subjects upon which defendant had not examined them. Those questions, however, are not in this case, but they are scientifically discussed by the text-writer above quoted, citing and reviewing numerous decisions on the subject.

It is not clear, however, from the record in the case at bar, that the plaintiff did not make this engineer his witness on the disputed point. He asked him if his engine was equipped with modern appliances, and if it was not a bright day. The only significance of the modern appliances was the facility for stopping the engine, and the only point to be attained in proving that the day was clear was to show that the engineer must have seen the man on the track, if he was at his post and doing his duty. We have thus discussed the subject of the examination of an adversary's witness not because it is a vital question in this case, but because the counsel on both sides have discussed it in their briefs; for, even if all that the plaintiff claims on that point be conceded, and if we disregard entirely the evidence the engineer gave on cross-examination, the plaintiff made out no case for the jury.

There is no statute requiring the defendant to give a signal by bell or whistle on approaching a private crossing. Its duty to do so depends on the circumstances of the case. There was therefore no negligence per se in failing to sound the bell or whistle. . . . The learned trial judge had the right view of the subject.

The judgment is affirmed.

Brace, C. J., concurs. Marshall and Lamm, JJ., concur in the result, but are of the opinion that the engineer put on the stand by plaintiff was plaintiff's witness throughout, and all his testimony in chief, as well as on cross-examination, was to be taken as part of plaintiff's case.

TITLE IV. JURISDICTION; RULES OF EVIDENCE IN FEDERAL COURTS

727. John H. Wigmore. A Treatise on Evidence. (1905. Vol. I, § 6.) By the principle of Conflict of Laws, the law of the forum determines the rules of evidence. In the Federal Courts, their own rules of evidence would therefore ordinarily have prevailed, for the Federal jurisdiction rests upon a sovereignty separate from that of the respective States. Nevertheless, their situation is peculiar, for (apart from the District of Columbia and the Territories) there is not a separate physical territory within which their jurisdiction is exclusive, and, in consequence, the litigation before their trial sessions is commonly in the hands of a body of practitioners which primarily is a State bar and represents local habits and traditions. It would be therefore natural and highly convenient to follow so far as practicable the local rules of evidence. Such was the view of the founders of the Federal Government, who in 1789 directed the Federal Courts to follow local rules except when otherwise directed by Federal legislation: U. S. R. S. 1878, § 721 (repeating St. 1789, c. 20, s. 34): "The laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the Courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

This policy was continued in later enactments, which enlarged the scope of the rule, though they added numerous instances to the exceptions. U. S. R. S. 1878, § 858 (combining statutes of 1862, 1864, and 1865; after enacting certain provisions as to qualifications of witnesses, it continues): "In all other respects the laws of the State in which the trial is held shall be the rules of decision as to the competency of witnesses in the courts of the United States in trials at common law, and in equity and admiralty." [1]

The effect of this legislation may be considered under three heads:

(a) In chancery proceedings, since the statute of 1862, the local State rules are applicable to the "competency of witnesses." But this provision seems to be ignored or narrowly construed in the Federal decisions.

(b) In admiralty proceedings, the Federal Courts originally had their own rules of evidence; but since 1862 the statute directs the adoption of the local State rules.

(c) Common law trials, being expressly named in the statute of 1789, have from the beginning been subject to the rule. Thus in the Federal courts a Federal statute prevails over the State rule upon the same subject,

[1] Amended by St. 1906, June 29, § 3608, Stat. L. Vol. 34, p. 618, so as to read: The competency of a witness to testify in any civil action, suit, or proceeding in the courts of the United States shall be determined by the laws of the State or Territory in which the court is held."

but in the absence of a Federal statute the State rule is followed. The State rules thus made applicable include statutory rules, and they include all the rules of admissibility, even under the words "competency of witnesses" in U. S. R. S. § 858. But by a singular and indefensible construction, criminal cases have been held not to be included under the term "trials at common law" either in U. S. R. S. § 721 or in U. S. R. S. § 858; in consequence of which the Federal rules for criminal trials are determinable by an artificial and unpractical test, which merely creates useless obscurity and complication and ought to be reformed by legislation.

728. WILSON v. NEW ENGLAND NAVIGATION CO.

United States District Court Eastern District, New York. 1912

197 Fed. 88

At Law. Action by James Wilson against the New England Navigation Company. On motion by defendant for a bill of particulars and by plaintiff for an examination and inspection of an object in defendant's possession. Both motions granted.

A. Delos Kneeland, for plaintiff. Charles M. Sheafe, Jr., for defendant.

Chatfield, District Judge. — The plaintiff has alleged injury while at duty on a steam tug belonging to the defendant by scalding from steam escaping out of a throttle valve or pipe, which he alleges was "unsafe, defective, imperfect and improperly constructed and applied." He alleges that the defendant had notice of the "defects, lack of safety and disrepair," and that a part of the machinery which the plaintiff was using was, without negligence on the plaintiff's part, blown out in the harbor of New York through the negligence stated. The defendant has made a motion for a bill of particulars as to the respects in which the valve and piping were unsafe, defective, imperfect, improperly constructed or improperly applied, in what way any of the other machinery was defective or out of repair, and what part of the machinery was blown into the harbor. It now appears that the plaintiff has no evidence that any of the machinery was blown into the harbor, but intended to allege that an explosion occurred while the boat was in New York Harbor. Nor does the plaintiff charge that any of the machinery was out of repair or unsafe, other than the throttle valve and the piping attached thereto. Plaintiff has demanded, by a motion brought on at the same time, examination and inspection of this throttle valve, which he alleges is in the possession of the defendant, before being required to specify any defects or lack of care beyond such as he may attempt to point out from the happening of the accident itself and the conditions under which it occurred.

I. It will be necessary to take up his motion for inspection of this particular article first.

1. It may be assumed that as at common law no power vests in a Court of law to preliminarily examine a witness, or documents, or to require a party to allow the inspection of physical objects, including that of the person of a party, in advance of trial. Iasagi v. Brown, 1 Curt. 401, Fed. Cas. No. 6,993; Carpenter v. Winn, 221 U. S. 545.

2. Nor have the United States Courts any such power unless by statute.

In Ex parte Fisk, 113 U. S. 713, it was held that § 914 of the Revised Statutes [1] (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 684), by which the practice and procedure in cases in the United States Courts are ordered to conform, as near as may be, in civil causes, to the practice and procedure in the State courts, and § 721 of the Revised Statutes [2] (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 581), by which the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution or statutes of the United States otherwise provide, are to be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in courts of the United States, did not allow the examination of a party before a master, according to the laws of the State in which the action was being tried. The Court held this as a conclusion from the language of § 861 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 661), which directs that "the mode of proof in trial of actions at common law shall be by oral testimony and examination of witnesses in open court, except" in the cases named by § 863 and §§ 866 to 870 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 661 and 663–665), inclusive.

The reason for taking the deposition in question was not within the specified situations of either § 863 or § 866, R. S., and the Court therefore said that the provisions of § 861 must be held conclusive, not only as to the method of presenting the testimony of witnesses at the trial, but also as to the power of the Court to procure written testimony for use at the trial in any other way than under the sections above specified.

In Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, personal examination of a plaintiff in order that a surgeon might prepare to testify at the trial of an action for personal injuries was held beyond the power of the United States Courts, without reference to the law of the State in which the case arose. And, although no testimony was to be given until the trial, the court said, as in Ex parte Fisk, supra, that actions in a court of law of the United States must be governed by the rules and exceptions of the United States Courts, as the United States statutes provide.

[1] § 914. Practice and proceedings in other than equity and admiralty causes. The practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil causes, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts, shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding.

[2] [Quoted ante, in No. 727.]

Hence § 721, prescribing the rules for trial, was held not controlling over the conduct of the case prior to trial, while § 914 was held inapplicable to enlarge the power of the United States Courts, so as to grant an examination of the sort asked, as neither §§ 866 et seq. nor § 724 provided for such method of preparation for trial as was asked in that case.

In Camden & Suburban Railway Co. v. Stetson, 177 U. S. 172, however, the decision in the Botsford Case was stated to have been upon the ground that no statute of the State in which the court was held existed allowing such examination, and an examination of the person of the plaintiff, under a statute of the state of New Jersey providing for such examination, in order to enable the witnesses to prepare for oral testimony on the trial, was upheld as within the power of the United States Court. It was intimated that the doctrine of Lyon v. Manhattan Railway Co., 142 N. Y. 298, which upheld, under the New York law, the physical examination of a party called as a witness before trial, could not, under the decision of the Fisk Case, be upheld in a Federal court. But a statute providing for inspection only was in conflict with nothing in the United States statutes, and therefore could be invoked in a case removed into the United States courts.

In the case of Hanks Dental Association v. International Tooth Crown Co., 194 U. S. 303, taken up from the Southern District of New York, the Supreme Court held that the provisions of § 873 of the New York Code (which allow a physical examination of the plaintiff before trial, as a part of the examination of that party for the purpose of perpetuating his testimony under § 870) were contrary to the statutes of the United States. But the Court expressly says that the principle of Camden & Suburban Railway Co. v. Stetson, supra, is correct, and also intimates that the ruling of Ex parte Fisk, supra, is unaffected in any substantial particular.

In Carpenter v. Winn, 221 U. S. 533, the Supreme Court has held that the production of books, papers, memoranda, etc., which under § 724 of the Revised Statutes can be produced by order of Court "in the trial of an action at law," can only be obtained by subpœna or on notice at the trial, and that the provisions of this section leave the right to a bill of discovery unaffected. Hence the Court holds that in an action at law the production before trial of books and papers cannot be ordered upon motion, but that the right to a bill of discovery is not affected, and intimates that every remedy, except a bill of discovery, is prevented by the argument of exclusion, based upon § 861, as in Ex parte Fisk, supra. . . .

3. The application of § 724, R. S., therefore, having been limited to a production of books or writings at the trial, we are necessarily (under the express holding of the Supreme Court in that case that the right of a party to a bill of discovery is not affected by the provisions of § 724) brought to consider whether § 724 does exclude the New York Statutes, § 803,[1] providing for examination of papers and property before trial. We must, therefore, look to the other sections of the Revised Statutes, and in the present case we must consider whether any of these sections prevent the examination of the valve which the plaintiff now seeks to inspect.

As has been said, Ex parte Fisk, supra, and Hanks Dental Association v. International Tooth Crown Co., supra, have held definitely that the examination of parties and witnesses and the taking of testimony, except at the trial, is contrary to the provisions of § 861 and § 863, R. S. In Carpenter v. Winn, supra, the production and examination of books and papers before trial was held impossible because to hold otherwise would be inconsistent with the court's conclusion that § 724 was limited to an order to produce at the trial, and that a bill of discovery could still be filed. But none of these cases except that of Camden & Suburban Railway Co. v. Stetson, supra, seem to have considered a statute with provisions such as § 803, and providing for an examination of the object apart from the examination of a witness.

It will be noted that § 803 of the New York Code applies to "any court of record," and is entirely general in its provisions, and the examination is of itself called a production and discovery. §§ 870 and 873 of the New York Code, on the other hand, have to do with the depositions of a party or person who expects to be a party, and the order for physical examination provides that, "in granting an order for the examination of the plaintiff before trial," the judge may direct him to submit to a physical examination as well. The purpose of the discovery and of these various statutes is to confer power upon the Court to accomplish what seems to be recognized by the Legislatures and by Congress, in so far as the laws have been passed, as desirable to simplify litigation and aid litigants. . . .

The defendant suggests that inspection of an exhibit should not be allowed if the physical examination of the plaintiff is held illegal under the rulings of the Supreme Court. But why should the matter be made one of retribution and not of law? The decision in Ex parte Fisk was followed by an amendment by Congress to § 866, providing that "it shall be lawful to take the deposition or testimony of witnesses in the mode prescribed by the laws of the State." But in Hanks Dental Association v. International Tooth Crown Co., supra, the Supreme Court again held that the language of § 861, viz., "The mode of proof in the trial of actions at common law shall be by oral testimony and examination of witnesses in open court, except as hereinafter provided," was not affected thereby. In Carpenter v. Winn, supra, the words, "in the trial," are now held to mean only "at the trial," and the words, "except as hereinafter provided," are held, in Hanks Dental Association v. International Tooth Crown Co., supra, to mean only in cases where the United States statutes provide for a deposition. In other words, the language of § 861, which says, "mode of proof at the trial," includes the prohibition of any other form of preparation for trial; while in § 866, as amended, "mode prescribed" means the "way of taking down testimony," and cannot be construed as forming any rule as to when the testimony shall be taken. It is difficult to see why the Hanks Dental Association Case should be broadened after the limitation put upon § 861 by the decision in Carpenter v. Winn. To hold, after this last decision, that § 861 prohibits any way of preparing or preserving testimony, except "at the trial," or by certain kind of depositions, would prohibit a witness from going to inspect an object or locality for the purpose of testifying, or, in other words, would compel the production at the trial of everything to be considered by witnesses, and might even shut out testifying from recollection.

[1] New York, Code of Civil Procedure, § 803: A court of record, other than a justice's court in a city, has power to compel a party to an action ending therein, to produce and discover, or to give to the other party, an inspection and copy, or permission to take a copy, of a book, document, or other paper, in his possession or under his control, relating to the merits of the action, or of the defence therein.

4. The present case seems to be of the sort where the plaintiff feels that he has a cause of action, but is in some doubt as to the exact ground for the charge of negligence, because the evidence from which he will attempt to make out his case is in the hands of the defendant. This evidence is not necessarily something which they are retaining for their defense, but is rather evidence which they do not desire the plaintiff to have, even if it be necessary to him for the proving of his case. Under these circumstances, it would seem to be hardship to allow the defendant to prevent the plaintiff from ascertaining what evidence is in existence and will be available to the plaintiff in proving the case which he will be bound to prove; while at the same time the defendant can insist upon the plaintiff's not being allowed to prove his case, unless he states just how he is going to try to charge liability. To deny the motion for inspection might enable the defendant not only to prevent the plaintiff's proving his case, if he has one, but would put him in a position where he might never find out or satisfy the court that he has any case to prove.

II. It also appears that the application for a bill of particulars, while sanctioned by usage and based upon § 531 of the New York Code, is in reality an application to have the plaintiff state his theory of negligence, or state more definitely just what negligent act of the defendant is charged and how he intends to make it out. This is, when properly asked, allowable under the form of a so-called bill of particulars, and the defendant's motion, therefore, should be granted, to the extent of directing the plaintiff to specify the cause of action upon which he intends to recover, in so far as to make certain whether the negligence was in the management and handling of the machinery in question, or whether it was in the previous installation and failure to provide or maintain suitable machinery.

But the plaintiff's motion for inspection should also be granted, and the order will provide that the plaintiff shall serve and file his bill of particulars within 10 days after the inspection is allowed and a proper identification of the valve made. . . .

BOOK III. TO WHOM EVIDENCE IS TO BE PRESENTED

(LAW AND FACT; JUDGE AND JURY)

730. James Bradley Thayer. A Preliminary Treatise on Evidence. (1898. p. 185.) Courts pass upon a vast number of questions of fact that do not get on the record, or form any part of the issue. Courts existed before juries; juries came in to perform only their own special office; and the Courts have always continued to retain a multitude of functions which they exercised before ever juries were heard of, ascertaining whether disputed things be true. In other words, there is not, and never was, any such things in jury trials as an allotting of all questions of fact to the jury. The jury simply decides some questions of fact. The maxim, "ad quaestionem facti non respondent judices, ad quaestionem juris non respondent juratores," was never true, if taken absolutely. It was a favorite saying of Coke, in discussing special verdicts; and in Isaack v. Clark (Rolle, I, p. 132; s.c. Bulst. p. 314; 1613–14) he attributes it to Bracton; but that appears to be an error; a careful search for it in Bracton has failed to discover it. It seems likely that this formula took shape in England in the sixteenth century. But the maxim was never meant to be taken absolutely.

731. Edward Bushell's Trial. (1670. King's Bench. 6 Howell's State Trials, 1000, 1014.) Note by Mr. Howell. "The most usual trial of matters of fact," says Lord Coke (First Inst. 155b), "is by twelve such men ('liberi et legales homines') for 'ad quaestionem facti non respondent judices;' and matters in law the judges ought to decide and discuss, for 'ad quaestionem juris non respondent juratores.'" Upon which passage his learned commentator, Mr. Hargrave, has given the following Note:

"This 'decantatum' (as Lord Chief Justice Vaughan calls it on account of its frequency in the books) about the respective provinces of judge and jury, hath, since Lord Coke's time, become the subject of very heated controversy, especially in prosecutions for State libels; some aiming to render juries wholly dependent on the judge for matters of law, and others contending for nearly a complete and unqualified independence. On the trial of John Lilburne for treason in 1649, high words passed between the Court and him, in consequence of his stating to the jury that they were judges both of law and fact, and citing passages in the Coke upon Littleton to prove it. 2 State Tr. 4th ed. 69 and post. 228, a. In the case of Penn and Meade, who in 1670 were indicted for unlawfully assembling the people and preaching to them, the jury gave a verdict against the directions of the Court in point of law, and for this were committed to prison. But the commitment was questioned; and on Habeas Corpus brought in the Court of Common Pleas, it was declared illegal; Lord Chief Justice Vaughan distinguishing himself on the occasion by a most profound argument in favor of the rights of a jury. Bushell's Case, 1 Freem. 1, and Vaughan 135. However, the contest did not cease, as appears by Sir John Hawles's famous Dialogue between a Barrister and a Juryman, which was published in 1680, to assert the claims of the latter against the then current doctrine decrying their authority. Since the Revolution also many cases have occurred, in which there has been much debate on the like topic. See King v. Poole, in Cas. B. R. temp. Hardwicke 23. Franklin's case, in the St. Tr. Peter Zenger's, ibid. Owen's case, in the St. Tr., and Woodfall's case, 5 Burr. 261."

By attending to the cases before referred to, it will be easy to trace the progress of this controversy on the limits of the jury's province.

732. COMMONWEALTH v. PORTER

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1846

10 Metc. 263

INDICTMENT against the defendant on the Rev. Sts. c. 47, secs. 1, 2, . . . for "selling intoxicating liquors, to be used in and about his house in Cambridge," . . . without being first duly licensed.

At the trial in the Court of Common Pleas, before MERRICK, J., the prosecuting officer introduced record evidence that the defendant had been licensed according to St. 1837, c. 242, sec. 2, "to keep an inn, without authority to sell any intoxicating liquor." He also introduced evidence that the defendant had sold intoxicating liquors. The defendant's counsel contended that the license which was given in evidence was an authority to the defendant to do the acts and make the sales alleged and charged in the indictment, and was a sufficient and legal justification, on his part, for making those sales and doing those acts.

The counsel was proceeding to argue to the jury that such was the true construction of the statute, and the legal effect of said license, when he was stopped by the Court. The Court afterwards ruled, on argument, that the proposition stated by the defendant's counsel was purely a question of law, and as such was to be decided by the Court, and not by the jury; and the Court thereupon rules that the said license did not authorize the defendant to make the sales and to do the acts charged in the indictment, and was no justification to him therefor. . . .

The defendant's counsel contended, and was proceeding to argue to the jury, that sec. 1, of c. 47 of the Rev. Sts. was, by necessary implication, revealed by St. 1837, c. 242; the provisions of the latter statute being incompatible with those of the former. He was again stopped by the Court; and the Court ruled (as before) that this was a question of law, etc., and after argument, further ruled that said section was not so repealed, but remained in full force. And the Court further ruled that the several questions, having been ruled and decided by the Court, as aforesaid, were not open questions to the jury; that no appeal could be allowed from the Court to the jury, upon these several rulings and decisions of the Court; and that therefore the defendant could not be permitted, by himself or his counsel, to argue these questions to the jury, for the purpose of inducing them to overrule or reverse these several rulings and decisions of the Court. . . .

The judge instructed the jury (among other things) that it was their duty to adopt and follow the said several rulings and decisions of the Court, for the purposes of the trial. But he stated to them that they occupied an independent position, and, being required to return only a general verdict, they possessed the power of rendering a verdict in opposition to the said rulings and decisions, whereby they would be in fact overruled and reversed; and that, if the jury should do so, in violation of what the Court had thus prescribed as the rule of their duty, they would in no way be amenable to punishment by the law, or responsible, in any form, to any legal accusation or animadversion, for such proceeding. . . .

This case was argued at the last October Term.

Hallett & Nelson, for the defendant. . . . "It is the right of juries, in criminal cases, to give a general verdict of acquittal, which cannot be set aside on account of its being contrary to law; and hence results the power of juries to decide on the law, as well as on the facts in all criminal cases." Per CHASE, J., 1 Chase's Trial 34; State v. Snow, 6 Shepley 346. . . .

Huntington (District Attorney), for the Commonwealth. . . . In U. S. v. Battiste, 2 Sumner 243, STORY, J., says: "The jury are no more judges of the law in a capital or other criminal case, upon the plea of not guilty, than they are in every civil case tried upon the general issue. In each they have the physical power to disregard the law as laid down to them by the court. But I deny that in any case, civil or criminal, they have the moral right to decide the law according to their own notions or pleasure. It is the duty of the jury to follow the law, as it is laid down by the court. . . ."

Hallett, in reply. It is admitted on all hands, that the jury have the power to determine the law as well as the fact of the case. "And if the law gives them the power it gives them the right also; power and right are convertible terms when the law authorizes the doing of an act which shall be final, and for the doing of which the agent is not responsible." Such was Mr. Hamilton's argument in the People v. Croswell, 3 Johns. Cas. 345, and such was the opinion of BLACKFORD, J., in Townsend v. The State, 2 Blackf. 163. . . . The anomalous cases of libel, under Lord MANSFIELD, were decided after the adoption of our constitution, and were made a state question between the government and the liberty of the press. 3 T. R. 428, note. . . . In all cases but these, the doctrine that, in a criminal trial, the jury, on the plea of not guilty, may determine the law and the fact of the case, has been supported, or not denied, by every English judge, except Chief Justice JEFFRIES, in the trial of Sidney, 3 Hargrave's State Trials, 805. . . .

SHAW, C. J.—This case comes before the court upon a bill of exceptions. And the question is, whether, in a criminal prosecution against the defendant for an alleged violation of the license laws, his counsel have a right to address the jury upon the questions of law embraced in the issue. The effect of the argument for the defendant, when analyzed, appears to be this; that in criminal prosecutions, it is within the legitimate right and proper duty of juries, to adjudicate and decide on questions of law as well as questions of fact; and that although the judge may instruct and direct them upon a question of law, and they fully comprehend and understand those directions, in their application to the facts of the case, yet that they are invested by law with a legitimate power and authority, if their judgments do not coincide with that of the judge, to disregard it, and decide in conformity with their own views of the law. If this were a correct view of the law, it would undoubtedly follow, as a necessary consequence, that in such appeal from the Court to the jury, the counsel on both sides would have a right to argue the questions of law to the jury. But if this proposition is not correct, it does not follow, we think, as a necessary consequence, that the counsel cannot address the jury upon the law, under the direction of the court. They are, in our view, separate and distinct questions, to be separately considered.

We consider it a well-settled principle and rule, lying at the foundation of jury trial, admitted and recognized ever since jury trial has been adopted as an established and settled mode of proceeding in courts of justice, that it is the proper province and duty of judges to consider and decide all questions of law which arise, and that the responsibility of a correct decision is placed finally on them; that it is the proper province and duty of the jury to weigh and consider evidence, and decide all questions of fact, and that the responsibility of a correct decision is placed upon them. And the safety, efficacy, and purity of jury trial depend upon the steady maintenance and practical application of this principle. It would be alike a usurpation of authority and violation of duty, for a court, on a jury trial, to decide authoritatively on the questions of fact, and for the jury to decide ultimately and authoritatively upon the questions of law. And the obligations of each are of a like nature, being that of a high legal and moral obligation to the performance of an important duty, enforced and sanctioned by an oath. . . .

The whole doctrine of bills of exception, now in such general and familiar use, both in civil and criminal proceedings, is founded upon the same great and leading idea. It presupposes that it is within the authority, and that it is the duty of the judge to instruct and direct the jury authoritatively, upon such questions of law as may seem to him to be material for the jury to understand and apply, in the issue to be tried; and he may also be required so to instruct upon any pertinent question of law within the issue, upon which either party may request him to instruct. The doctrine also assumes that the jury understand and follow such instruction in matter of law. This results from the consideration, that if such instruction be either given or refused, it is the duty of the judge to state it in a bill of exceptions, so that it may be placed on the record; and if the verdict is against the party who took the exception, and it appears, upon a revision of the point of law, that the decision is incorrect, either in giving or refusing such instruction, the verdict is set aside, as a matter of course. To this conclusion the law could come, only on the assumption that it was the right and duty of the court to instruct the jury in matter of law, that the jury understood it, and, as a matter of duty, were bound to follow it; so that, if the instruction was wrong, the law assumes, as a necessary legal consequence, that the verdict was wrong, and sets it aside. The law could only assume this, upon the strength of the well known and reasonable presumption, that all persons, in the absence of proof to the contrary, do that which it is their duty to do. It is presumed that the jury followed the instruction of the Court in matter of law, because it was their duty so to do, and therefore, if the instruction was wrong, the verdict is wrong. But if the jury could rightly exercise their own judgment, and decide contrary to the direction of the Court, as they unquestionably may do, in regard to questions of fact, no such presumption would follow; it would be left entirely in doubt, whether the jury had been misled or influenced by the incorrect direction in matter of law, and therefore this would alone be no sufficient ground for setting aside the verdict. But entirely otherwise it is in regard to a matter of fact, in respect to which it is within the proper authority, and is the duty of the jury to exercise their judgment authoritatively and definitely. And should a judge express or intimate any opinion upon a question of fact, however incorrect it might be afterwards found to be, upon a revision by a higher Court, it would not necessarily afford a ground for a new trial; for, it not being the duty of the jury to follow it, there would be no presumption that they had followed it, and therefore it would not, of itself, show conclusively that the verdict was wrong. . . .

[Furthermore, looking at the essential purposes of a Constitution, and the fundamental rights and principles there guaranteed in solid permanence,] it appears to us that the principle contended for would be adverse to all these objects. If a jury has a legitimate authority to decide upon all questions of law arising in the cases before them, and that contrary to the instruction of the judge, in cases where such direction of the judge may be supposed adverse to the views of the law relied on by the accused or his counsel, they would have the same power to decide any question of law, against the opinion and instruction of the judge, when such opinion is in favor of the accused, and find him guilty, where the judge should direct the jury that those facts which the evidence conduces to prove, if proved to their satisfaction, would not warrant a conviction. A case may be supposed, at least for the purpose of illustration, where a high popular excitement should arise and become general in which large bodies of persons might come to be actuated by feelings of honest but mistaken indignation against some supposed wrong, and earnest in the pursuit of the supposed interests of philanthropy; or perhaps numbers may be influenced by more base, interested, and vindictive passions. Under these circumstances, a grand jury, having, as the case supposes, a legitimate and rightful authority to decide on questions of law, contrary to the instructions and charge of the judge, might return an indictment; a traverse jury, in their turn, might convict upon it, though the court before whom it is tried should give them such directions, in point of law, that if they understood and followed them they must acquit the accused. But the case supposes that the law may be rightfully interpreted by a jury which may shift at every trial. What then becomes of the security which every citizen is entitled to, by a steady and uniform, as well as impartial interpretation of the laws and administration of justice, by judges as free, impartial and independent as the lot of humanity will admit? . . .

Whether, therefore, we consider the rules of the common law, or the constitution and law of this Commonwealth, we are of opinion that it is the proper province and duty of the court to expound and declare the law, and that it is the proper province and duty of the jury to inquire into the facts by such competent evidence as may be laid before them, according to the rules of the law for the investigation of truth, which may be declared to them by the court, and find, and ultimately decide, on the facts. . . .

But in thus conducting a jury trial in a criminal case, with a view to the return of a general verdict, it is obvious that the whole matter of law as well as of fact must be stated and explained to the jury, so that they may fully understand and apply it to the facts; because, as we have seen, in the form of the general verdict, they do declare the law as well as the fact. For this purpose, it seems to be necessary, and in our State it is the usual practice, for the parties respectively, by their counsel, to state the law to the jury, in the presence, and subject to the ultimate direction of the judge; because, unless the jury understand the rule of law, with its exceptions, limits and qualifications, they cannot know how to apply the evidence, and determine the truth of the material facts necessary to bring the case of the accused within it. . . . We are of opinion that a party may by his counsel address the jury upon questions of law, subject to the superintending and controlling power of the Court to decide questions of law, by directions to the jury, which it is their duty to follow.

On the whole subject, the views of the Court may be summarily expressed in the following propositions: —

That in all criminal cases, it is competent for the jury, if they see fit, to decide upon all questions of fact embraced in the issue, and to refer the law arising thereon to the Court, in the form of a special verdict.

But it is optional with the jury thus to return a special verdict or not, and it is within their legitimate province and power to return a general verdict, if they see fit.

In thus rendering a general verdict, the jury must necessarily pass upon the whole issue, compounded of the law and of the fact, and they may thus incidentally pass on questions of law.

In forming and returning such general verdict, it is within the legitimate authority and power of the jury to decide definitely upon all questions of fact involved in the issue, according to their judgment, upon the force and effect of the competent evidence laid before them; and if in the progress of the trial, or in the summing up and charge to the jury, the Court should express or intimate any opinion upon any such question of fact, it is within the legitimate province of the jury to revise, reconsider, and decide contrary to such opinion, if, in their judgment, it is not correct and warranted by the evidence.

But it is the duty of the Court to instruct the jury on all questions of law which appear to arise in the cause, and also upon all questions, pertinent to the issue, upon which either party may request the direction of the Court, upon matters of law. And it is the duty of the jury to receive the law from the Court, and to conform their judgment and decision to such instructions, as far as they understand them, in applying the law to the facts to be found by them; and it is not within the legitimate province of the jury to revise, reconsider, or decide contrary to such opinion or direction of the Court in matter of law. To this duty jurors are bound by a strong social and moral obligation, enforced by the sanction of an oath, to the same extent, and in the same manner, as they are conscientiously bound to decide all questions of fact according to the evidence.

It is within the legitimate power, and is the duty of the Court, to superintend the course of the trial; to decide upon the admission and rejection of evidence; to decide upon the use of any books, papers, documents, cases or works of supposed authority, which may be offered upon either side; to decide upon all collateral and incidental proceedings; and to confine parties and counsel to the matters within the issue. . . .

As it appears by the bill of exceptions, that the defendant's counsel were prohibited from addressing the jury upon questions of law embraced in the issue, the Court are of opinion that the verdict ought to be set aside; and the same is set aside, and a new trial granted, to be had at the bar of the Court of Common Pleas.

733. STATE v. GANNON. (1902. Connecticut. 75 Conn. 206, 223; 52 Atl. 727.) HAMERSLEY, J. — Whether such facility for disregarding both law and facts, when some impulse of lawlessness or patriotism assails the integrity of the jury, is a beneficial result of the right to render a general verdict, is a question of politics. How far a juror can justify himself in yielding to such impulse is a question of conscience. But whether it is an essential feature of jury trial as settled by common law, that the Court shall instruct the jury as to what is that law which they must consider with the facts as found by them in reaching a verdict, and that the jury shall accept the law so determined, as the law for the case, in accordance to which they are bound by their oaths to return their verdict, is a question of law. On this question we entertain no doubt. . . .

In 1895, this question was, for the first time, formally passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. The case was decided upon great deliberation. The opinions of Mr. Justice HARLAN, speaking for the majority, and of Mr. Justice GRAY, speaking for the minority, cover the whole range of the controversy. The Court said: "We must hold firmly to the doctrine that in the Courts of the United States it is the duty of juries in criminal cases to take the law from the Court and apply that law to the facts as they find them to be from the evidence." In this conclusion seven of the nine judges concurred. Sparf v. United States, 156 U. S. 51, 102.

It is true that during the formative period of jury trial, and not infrequently in later times, judges in charging juries have used language of doubtful meaning and sometimes of questionable accuracy; that during times of high political excitement some public men of repute have advocated the right of juries to disregard the law; and that a few jurists of eminence have been led, by the practical result in former times of a general verdict in finally concluding the law in criminal cases, into confounding the physical power to disregard the law by the rendition of a general verdict with the duty imposed upon them by law. But we are satisfied that such expressions and views are repugnant to a most essential feature of jury trial and cannot bear the test of thorough examination. They are uniformly rejected by the Courts of the United States, and by the Courts of last resort in nearly all the States, where the question has been discussed.

734. TITUS OATES' TRIAL. (1685. King's Bench. 10 Howell's State Trials, 1079, 1141.) [The notorious Oates, having been the chief informer testifying in the Popish Plot Trials (Whitebread, Fenwick, et al.) is now on trial himself for perjury in those former trials. Part of his defence is that judge and jury at those trials gave him full credit. He now offers to prove the charge given to the jury by the present Chief Justice SCROGGS, when presiding at the former trial.]

Oates [to the reporter]. — Pray will you look into what my lord chief justice Scroggs said when he discharged the jury of Whitebread and Fenwick. . . .

Blayney. — I have found the place, what is it you would ask me about it?

Oates. — Whether my lord chief justice Scroggs did not use these words to the jury? "I do acknowledge that Mr. Oates has given a very full and ample testimony, accompanied with all the circumstances of time and place, against them all;" . . .

Blayney. — There is something to that purpose, my lord. . . .

Oates. — Then will your lordship be pleased to give me leave to mention what was said by your lordship at that time, when you were Recorder of London, about your satisfaction with the evidence.

L. C. J. — Ay, with all my heart. . . . Ay, do so.

Oates. — Says Mr. Recorder of London, . . . when he gave judgment of death upon these five Jesuits and Langhorn (for I now speak of your lordship in the third person,) "Your several crimes have been proved against you; you have been fully heard, and stand convicted of those crimes you have been indicted for."

L. C. J. — I believe I might say something to the same purpose as you have read now . . . but what counsel says at the bar, or what judges say in the Court of their opinion, is no evidence of a fact, of which the jury are judges only.

Oates. — My lord, every judge is upon his oath, and delivers his judgment according to his oath.

L. C. J. — Not as to the fact, but only in points of law, so as to tell the jury what the law is, if the fact be so and so.

Oates. — My lord, it goes a great way with the jury to have the judge's opinion.

L. C. J. — Mr. Oates, deceive not yourself. All this you have insisted on hitherto, has not been to the purpose, nor is any sort of evidence in this case; and therefore do not run away with an opinion of this as evidence. A judge's opinion is of value in points of law that arise upon facts found by juries, but are no evidence of the fact: for judges only do presume the fact to be true as it is found by the jury; and therefore say they, out of that fact so found, the point of law arising is thus or thus. . . . And by the same reason as this, a jury of honest gentlemen here, when I tell them, Here is a plain fact either to convict you, or to acquit you upon this indictment, are not bound to go by what I say in point of fact, but they are to go according to their own oaths, and according to the evidence and testimony of the witnesses. It is not my opinion that is to weigh at all with them, whether you are guilty of this perjury, or are innocent, but the evidence that is given here in Court. Therefore, what my Lord Chief Justice Scroggs said at any of those trials, or what I said, or any other person, that either was of counsel, or a judge on the bench, said as our opinions is but our opinions on the fact as it occurred to our present apprehensions, but is no evidence nor binding to this jury.

735. STATE v. MOSES

2 Dev. 452

INDICTMENT for murder by shooting. The counsel for the prisoner placed his defence upon the total want of credibility in the witnesses for the prosecution. It was argued, first, that the testimony of the principal witness was not credible from its absurdity, for how could a man in a dark night, at the distance of ten steps, see another pull the trigger of a gun. . . . His honor, in his charge to the jury, informed them that the credit they would give to the testimony was a matter exclusively with them, and proceeded to suggest such circumstances as, in his opinion, might be considered by them as tending to shake or support the credit of the witness for the State, and leaving it also to them to give such weight to any other circumstances, which they might remember and the Judge should omit, as they thought proper. In speaking of the first objection, the Judge said, that a man might see by the flash of a gun, even in the night and probably the darker the night the more distinctly; and if they believed from the testimony, that was the case in the present instance, and that seeing a man in the attitude of shooting, with his hand upon the trigger, and even by the flash of the gun, was substantially seeing him pull the trigger; and that if this was the fact in the particular case, then the contradiction relied upon in the testimony of the witness did not exist. . . . The jury returned a verdict of guilty, upon which, the counsel for the prisoner obtained a rule for a new trial, for misdirection. . . .

RUFFIN, J.—The Act of 1796 (Rev. c. 452,) "to direct the conduct of Judges in charges to the petit jury," restrains the judge from giving an opinion whether a fact is fully or sufficiently proved. At the same time, it imposes another duty; which is, to state, in a full and explicit manner, the facts given in evidence, and declare and explain the law arising thereon. . . . An unfair and partial exhibition of the testimony can alone be complained of; and the apprehension of that seems to have induced the passage of the law under consideration. It is not for us to say, whether that apprehension was well or ill founded; or whether the administration of the law would not be more certain, its tribunals more revered, and the suitors better satisfied, if the Judge were required to submit his view upon the whole case, and after the able and ingenious, but interested and partial arguments of Counsel, to follow with his own calm, discreet, sensible and impartial summary of the case, including both law and fact. Such elucidations from an upright, learned and discreet magistrate, habituated to the investigation of complicated masses of testimony, often contradictory, and often apparently so but really reconcilable, would be of infinite utility to a conscientious jury in arriving at just conclusions — not by force of the Judge's opinion, but of the reasons on which it was founded, and on which the jury would still have to pass. If this duty were imposed on the Judge, it is not to be questioned, that success would, oftener than it does, depend on the justice of the case, rather than the ability or adroitness of the advocate.

But such is certainly neither the duty nor within the competency of our Judges. I have already mentioned that it would be difficult for a Judge, surrounded by all the circumstances, to determine exactly what is his duty in this respect, in law and his own conscience. With still less certainty can a revising court lay down any rules a priori, or even apply them, after they are prescribed to cases as they arise. So much of the meaning of words depends upon their context, and of words spoken, upon the tone, emphasis, temper, and manner of the speaker, that it is utterly impossible that the whole can be transferred to paper, so as to enable an appellate tribunal to pass in general upon cases, without imminent hazard of doing injustice to the parties, and casting unmerited reproach upon the intentions of the Judge, and the understanding of the jury. If I were to lay down a rule as growing out of this Act of Assembly, I would say, that it was in general this: That the weight of the evidence is for the jury; they hold the scales for that. But the nature, relevancy and tendency of the evidence, it is competent for the Judge and his duty to explain. He is not only to recapitulate the testimony, but to show what it tends to prove, and he may recapitulate it in such order and connexion, as to give it the effect of proving the fact sought for, if in itself it be sufficient for that purpose. Whether it be sufficient, it is the province of the jury to determine, and by this statute it is their exclusive province; and the Judge cannot give his opinion in aid of theirs, that it is, or is not sufficient. . . .

To apply these observations to the case before us: It is objected here, that the Court below assumed the power of expressing an opinion upon the facts, or expressed such forced inferences from the testimony, as might bias the minds of the jury. The facts to which those parts of the charge apply, were the credit due to several witnesses. The main fact in dispute, on which the issue was joined, was the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. This depended upon the subordinate facts of the veracity or falsehood of the tales of the witnesses. Now this last fact — of credibility, or the want of it — rested again upon other facts which tended to sap or sustain it. . . . In charging the jury, the judge is not obliged to confine himself to delivering the abstract rule, that a witness does impair his credit by refusing to give full evidence; but may, and ought also to call the attention of the jury to the specific misbehavior before their own eyes, a fact in evidence to him and them. Again, if the credit of one witness is assailed upon the ground that he is contradicted by two others, is the Court barely to inform the jury, that if such contradiction exist, it may impair the credit of the first witness, but that they have the right in law to reconcile the testimony, and then act on it? Or may he not mention to them the circumstances, and show how they are contradictory, or how reconcilable, leaving it to the jury, to say, whether in truth, the two tales do, or do not stand together, according to the parts of the transaction to which they relate, or to the meaning of the witnesses? Such a course as this last, seems to me to be right, useful and lawful. . . .

In like manner, the other exceptions are readily disposed of, without my going through them in detail. The whole are regarded as mere suggestions by the Judge to the jury, of the construction of which the words of the witnesses are susceptible, or the inferences which could be deduced from admitted or hypothetical facts; in each case leaving it to the jury to say, what was the true construction, or the true inference. I think this is the legitimate province of a Judge, within the statute under consideration. If I err, the charge of the Judge is an empty pageant, and ceremonial mockery, which may serve for the amusement of the crowd, but instead of aiding the jury, by rescuing the case from the false glosses of powerful advocates, and the misconception of the evidence, as applicable to the legal controversy, will but confound the jury, and still further obscure the truth.

It is to be recollected, that the objection here is not that the charge of the Judge as a whole, was partial or unfair, and therefore that he did not give "a full and explicit statement of the facts in evidence." . . .

There is no such complaint here; the objection on the contrary, is, that any suggestion, however reasonable, and though (without relating to the sufficiency of the proof) it form a part of the most explicit charge, going fully and impartially into the case on both sides, is forbidden to the Judge. That, I think, for the reason I have given, is not so. Consequently, the motion for a new trial was, in my opinion, properly overruled. . . .

Per Curiam. — Let the judgment of the Court below be affirmed.

736. James Bradley Thayer. A Preliminary Treatise on Evidence. (1898. p. 188.) In Massachusetts this change was introduced in 1860 (Gen. St. c. 115, s. 5), in the form that "The Courts shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and the law."

It is not too much to say of any period, in all English history, that it is impossible to conceive of trial by jury as existing there in a form which would withhold from the jury the assistance of the Court in dealing with the facts. Trial by jury, in such a form as that, is not trial by jury in any historic sense of the words. It is not the venerated institution which attracted the praise of Blackstone and of our ancestors, but something novel, modern, and much less to be respected.

In the Federal Courts the common-law doctrine on this subject has always held. "In the Courts of the United States, as in those of England, from which our practice was derived, the judge, in submitting a case to the jury, may, at his discretion, whenever he thinks it necessary to assist them in arriving at a just conclusion, comment on the evidence, call their attention to parts of it which he thinks important, and express his opinion upon the facts. . . . The power of the Courts of the United States in this respect is not controlled by the statutes of the State forbidding judges to express any opinion upon the facts." Gray, J., for the Court, in Vicksburg, etc., R. R. Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 545, 553 (1886).

737. Arthur C. Train. The Prisoner at the Bar. (1908. 2d ed. p. 179.) Let us consider first the conduct of the judge during the trial itself. Theoretically it is his duty, at least in most States of the Union, simply to declare the law governing the case and to rule impartially upon the questions of evidence presented. He is supposed to give no hint of his own opinion as to whether or not the defendant should be convicted, and to refrain from any marshalling of the facts claimed to have been proven by either side in such a way as to influence the verdict of the jury. In England he may and generally does "sum up" the case; in America such a course would usually be a ground for reversal, — his function being limited to an abstract discussion of the law involved, with little reference to the facts save in so far as it may be necessary for purposes of illustrating the way in which the jury shall apply it. . . .

This may be all very well in theory, — but it is very far from what is either followed in practice or, to speak frankly, desirable. What the people want in our criminal courts is, of course, a fair "trial;" but they want a "fair trial" that results in the acquittal of the innocent and the conviction of the guilty, — so long as he is convicted by what they deem fair means. . . . A judge who has sat for ten or fifteen years on the criminal bench is usually keener to detect a liar or see through a "faked" defence than any twelve men drawn indiscriminately from different walks of business activity. A timely question from him may demolish a perjured explanation which, but for his interference, would have acquitted a guilty criminal. Theoretically, it is none of his business. Practically, it is. An inexperienced prosecutor may be so inadequate to the task of coping with some old war-horse of a lawyer that save for the assistance of the Court a rascal would be turned loose upon the community; or, turn about, a stupid lawyer may convict his own client if not prevented by a considerate presiding justice. Theoretically, the judge must let the parties fight it out by themselves. In point of fact, it is his business to even things up. . . .

Under our prevailing doctrines the Court has no right to influence the jury on the facts in the slightest degree, and indeed most judges expressly direct the jury to disregard absolutely any idea they may have obtained of what the Court's opinion may be. This, in the face of the balance of the charge, must often seem paradoxical to the talesman, for few judges entirely succeed in concealing their own views of the case, however hard they may honestly try to do so.

It is quite as foreign to the spirit of our institutions for a judge to interfere with the jury on questions of fact as for a jury to arrogate to itself the decision of points of law. The system is designed to do "justice" by means of its several parts working harmoniously together, but neither part "working justice" by itself. If the judge arrogate the jury's function, the jury becomes superfluous. This is not the intent of the Constitution. There is no real trial by jury when the judge decides the whole matter, and it would be far more dangerous for a single man to act as arbiter of the defendant's fate than for twelve. Yet more or less consciously there is often a tendency upon the part of the criminal bench to lend itself to the success of one party or the other, however positively it may declare and direct to the contrary. . . .

A distinguished member of the bench, now long since deceased, was accustomed to deliver charges so drastic that a defendant charged with a serious offence rarely, if ever, escaped. Upon appeal absolutely no exception could be taken to his remarks, yet nothing more unfair could be conceived of. The record would show that the judge had charged: "If you believe the defendant's testimony you will of course acquit him. He is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved. If you have any reasonable doubt as to his guilt you must give him the benefit of it. On the other hand, if you accept the testimony offered by the people you may and will convict him." Now, nothing on its face would seem to be fairer. What the jury actually heard was: "If [scornfully] you believe the defendant's testimony you will of course acquit him. He is presumed [with a shrug of the shoulders] to be innocent until the contrary is proved. If you have [another shrug] any reasonable doubt as to his guilt, you must give him the benefit of it. On the other hand, if you accept the testimony offered in behalf of the People, you may and WILL convict him!" (The last few words in tones of thunder.)

738. BARTLETT v. SMITH

EXCHEQUER. 1843

11 M. & W. 483

ASSUMPSIT by the endorsee against the drawer of a bill of exchange. The declaration stated, that the defendants, on, &c., made their certain bill of exchange in writing, and directed the same to Mr. John E. Butcher, Dublin, and thereby required the said J. E. Butcher to pay to the order of the defendants, in London, the sum of £17. It then alleged the endorsement of the bill to the plaintiffs. The defendant, by his pleas, denied the drawing and endorsement. At the trial before the Undersheriff of Middlesex, the bill, when produced, appeared to be drawn in Dublin, payable in London, and was stamped as a foreign bill.

On the plaintiff's counsel proposing to read it in evidence, the defendant's counsel objected, on the ground that, although the bill purported to be drawn in Dublin, it was in fact drawn in London, and being therefore an inland bill, required a higher stamp; and proposed to give evidence of that fact. The Undersheriff however said, that as the bill was not objectionable on the face of it, he should allow the case to proceed; on which the defendant's counsel addressed the jury, and afterwards adduced evidence to show that at the time the bill bore date, the drawer was in London: whereupon the Undersheriff left it to the jury to say whether the bill was drawn in London or Dublin, but reserved leave to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit if this Court should think he ought to have received the evidence in the first instance, and to have decided upon it. . . .

The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff,

R. V. Richards, on a former day in this Term, obtained a rule for a non-suit accordingly.

Crowder and Hughes, showed cause. — The evidence tendered was insufficient. . . . In Bire v. Moreau, 2 C. & P. 376, . . . the question was left to the jury. (Alderson, B. — That is leaving to the jury the question whether the document is or is not admissible in evidence. Parke, B. — The under-sheriff surely must decide for himself whether the evidence is or is not admissible.)

R. V. Richards and Meteyard, contra. — The under-sheriff ought to have received the evidence for the purpose of satisfying his own mind as to when the bill was drawn, and deciding upon its admissibility, and not to have left the case to the jury.

Lord Abinger, C. B. — I am of opinion that this rule must be made absolute for a new trial, but not to enter a nonsuit. All questions respecting the admissibility of evidence are to be determined by the judge, who ought to receive that evidence, and decide upon it without any reference to the jury. In all cases where an objection is made to the competency of witnesses, any evidence to show their incompetency must be received by the judge, and adjudicated on by him alone. So, in the present case, evidence offered to impeach the admissibility of the bill, on the ground that it was improperly stamped, should have been received by the judge, and determined by him before the bill was allowed to be read to the jury. When the objection was made that the bill bore a wrong stamp, the Undersheriff ought to have received the evidence to impeach it, before he allowed the bill to be read; and it was for him to say whether the evidence adduced for the purpose was such as to satisfy him or not.

The evidence tendered was for the purpose of showing that the bill ought not to be read at all; and if the Undersheriff rejected it in the first instance, he ought not to have received it afterwards and submitted it to the jury. There ought, therefore, to be a new trial.

PARKE, B. — I am of the same opinion. All preliminary matters of this kind are to be determined by the judge, not by the jury. I well recollect the case of Major Campbell, who was indicted for murder in Ireland; and on a dying declaration being tendered in evidence, the judge left it to the jury to say whether the deceased knew, when he made it, that he was at the point of death. The question as to the propriety of the course adopted in that case was sent over for the opinion of the English judges, who returned for answer that the course taken was not the right one, and that the judge ought to have decided the question himself. New trial.

739. HUTCHISON v. BOWKER

5 M. & W. 535, 541

ASSUMPSIT for the non-delivery of barley. Plea, non assumpsit. At the trial before Lord ABINGER, C. B., it appeared that the action was brought by the plaintiffs, who were corn merchants and factors at Kirkaldy, in Fifeshire, to recover from the defendants, who were corn merchants at Lynn, damages for the non-performance of a contract to supply 400 quarters of barley. To prove the contract, the following letters were given in evidence:

"LYNN, 21st Nov., 1838.

"Messrs. Rt. HUTCHISON & Co., KIRKALDY.

"GENTLEMEN:

"In reply to your favor of 17th inst., we beg to offer you a cargo of about 400 qrs. of good barley, weighing 52lbs. per bl., at 34*s.* per qr. on board. . . . Your most obedient servants,

"A. & J. BOWKER."

To this letter the plaintiffs returned the following answer:

"KIRKALDY, 14th Nov., 1838.

"Messrs. A. & J. BOWKER, LYNN.

"GENTLEMEN:

"We have your favor of 21st current, offering 400qrs. good barley, 52lbs. per bl., at 34*s.* per qr. f. o. b., payment in full by banker's bill at two months, on receipt of bill of lading and invoice: of such offer we accept, expecting you will give us fine barley and full weight. . . .

"We remain, gentlemen,

"Your most obedient servants,

"ROBT. HUTCHISON & Co."

The defendant declined to ship "fine barley." Evidence was given at the trial to show that the phrases "good" barley and "fine" barley were terms well known in the trade, and that fine barley was the heavier. The jury at first found a verdict for the plaintiffs generally, stating their opinion to be, that "the difference was in weight, and that barley would be fine and good at 52lbs. per bushel." The learned Judge asked them to reconsider the verdict, and answer this question, whether there was a distinction in the corn trade between "good" and "fine"? And they then found that there was a difference between good and fine, but that the parties did not understand each other; and they returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, damages 30*l*. Cresswell having on a former day obtained a rule to show cause why this verdict should not be set aside, and a non-suit entered,

Sir F. Pollock (W. H. Watson with him) now showed cause. . . . The words have either a general or a technical meaning. It was found that the word "fine" had a technical meaning, and the obscurity is removed by the verdict. The jury thought that on this contract there could be no misunderstanding amongst merchants. It was a question to be left to the jury, what was the meaning of the word "fine" in the contract. (PARKE, B. — You may ask the jury the meaning of the word "fine" in a mercantile sense, but you cannot go further. The Court is to say what is the meaning of the contract, and whether there has been an acceptance of it.) . . . It is admitted that when the words of a contract are clear and unambiguous, it is for the Court to put a construction upon it; but where the words are either unintelligible, or have both a popular and a technical meaning, it is for the jury to say whether the words were used in a technical or ordinary sense.

Lord ABINGER, C. B. . . . It appears to me that the question as to the interpretation of this contract is a question entirely for the Court, and not for the jury. That they should ever be the judges on such a matter was founded on this, that there might be technical words used in a contract, which the jury might understand, and the Court might not; but it would be contrary to all practice to say, after the terms are explained to the satisfaction of the Court, that the jury are to have the interpretation of the contract, and not the Court. . . . In this case, if they had said they were satisfied that there was no difference in the words, I should then have directed them to find for the plaintiffs; but they told me they were of opinion that there was a difference in the words, but they did not think the contract should be interpreted with reference to that distinction, as the parties did not understand each other. I think that they had no right to assume that. . . .

The meaning, therefore, being left ambiguous, I am of opinion that this rule ought to be made absolute.

PARKE, B. — I am of the same opinion. . . . The law I take to be this, — that it is the duty of the Court to construe all written instruments; if there are peculiar expressions used in it, which have, in particular places or trades, a known meaning attached to them, it is for the jury to say what the meaning of these expressions was, but for the Court to decide what the meaning of the contract was. It was right, therefore, to leave it to the jury to say whether there was a peculiar meaning attached to the word "fine," in the corn market; and the jury having found what it was, the question, whether there was a complete acceptance by the written documents is a question for the judge.

740. HOOPER v. MOORE

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLNA. 1857

5 Jones L. 130

THIS was an action of Detinue, tried before MANLY, J., at the last Fall Term of Caswell Superior Court. . . .

The plaintiff declared for the detention of the slaves Fanny and her children, and alleged title, as administrator with the will annexed of Alexander Moore, under the provisions of that will. The testator lived and died in Halifax county, in the State of Virginia. . . . The defendant claimed the slaves as the administrator of Alexander Moore, Jun'r., and offered evidence to show that . . . the said testator placed in the possession of his grand-daughter and her husband, Alexander Moore, Jun'r., the slave Fanny in question, who is the mother of the other slaves sued for; that Alexander Moore, Jun'r., held the slaves in question for ten years, during which time, he lived in the State of Virginia, and brought them thence to the county of Caswell, where he remained in possession of them until his death in 1852. In order to show the law of Virginia controlling this transaction, the deposition of Woodson Hughes, Esquire, a gentleman of the legal profession in that State, was produced, who deposed that according to the law of Virginia, no inference of a gift could be drawn from the possession of the slaves, under the circumstances of this case. The defendant's counsel insisted: . . . That no statute of Virginia had been offered in evidence, altering the common law; that by the common law a gift was presumed, and that it was the duty of the Court to expound the statute and give the defendant the benefit of the presumption, notwithstanding the deposition of Mr. Hughes, and prayed the Court so to instruct the jury. The Court . . . declined giving the instructions prayed for, but gave in charge the law of Virginia as proved by the deposition of Mr. Hughes, and left it to the jury to decide the question, whether it was a gift or a loan, free from any presumption either way. Defendant again excepted. . . .

Under these instructions, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff; a judgment was rendered thereon, and the defendant appealed to this court.

Norwood, for the plaintiff. Morehead, for the defendant.

PEARSON, J. . . . What is the law of another State, or of a foreign country, is as much a "question of law," as what is the law of our own State. There is this difference, however: the Court is presumed to know judicially the public laws of our State, while in respect to private laws, and the laws of other States and foreign countries, this knowledge is not presumed; it follows that the existence of the latter must be alleged and proved as facts; for otherwise, the Court cannot know or take notice of them. This is familiar learning. In order to give effect to this presumption of a knowledge, on the part of the Court, of the public laws of our State, it is provided that the persons who are entrusted with the administration of justice as a Court, shall be men learned in the law. . . . When an issue of fact involves a question of law, the jury are not entrusted to decide it; but it is the duty of the Court to give to the jury instruction in regard to the law, and it is the duty of the jury to be governed by such instructions. In this way, as much accuracy, and as great a degree of fixedness, in respect to questions of law, is secured, as the nature of the subject admits of.

Such being the case in respect to questions arising about our own laws, it would seem as a matter of course to be likewise so in respect to questions arising about the laws of other States, or of foreign countries, whenever, in the administration of justice, our Courts are called upon to deal with them. The assertion of a contrary opinion is met at once by these considerations, which, as it seems to us, cannot be answered: i.e., if juries are incompetent to decide questions in regard to our own laws, and the Court is required to give them instructions in respect thereto, are they any more competent to decide questions in regard to the laws of other States, or foreign countries? and do not they stand equally in need of instructions in respect to them? If such questions are to be decided by the juries, their decisions cannot be reviewed by the Supreme Court, and where is the security either for accuracy or fixedness? A jury is not a permanent tribunal, and no memorial is kept of its action, except the general conclusion — a verdict; which is binding only between the parties to the particular case.

But it is said our Courts are not presumed to know the laws of other States, or of foreign countries. Admit it; still can it be questioned that the Court is more competent to ascertain and understand such laws, than the jury? or that the jury stand as much in need of instruction in respect thereto, as in respect to our own laws?

Again, it is said the existence of such laws must be alleged and proved as facts. Admit it. But how are they to be proved? To the court, or to the jury? Surely to the court, because they are "questions of law." We are aware that an impression prevails to some extent, that the proof is to be made to the jury. This originated from the expression "to be proved as facts," and many loose dicta are to be met with, scattered through the books, in which these words have been inadvertently added to, so as to make the expression "to be proven as facts to the jury." . . .

If the law be written, and its existence is properly authenticated, the Court, availing itself of the aid of the judicial decisions of the country, puts a construction on it, and explains its meaning and legal effect, and the jury have nothing to do with it, save to follow the instructions of the Court, as if it was our own law. If the law is unwritten, and its existence is presumed or admitted, then the jury have nothing to do with it. For example, if it be presumed, or admitted, that the common law prevails in the State of Virginia, and has not been altered by statute in respect to the particular question, our Court decides what the common law is. . . .

But if the existence of an unwritten law of another State, or foreign country, is not presumed or admitted, then its existence must be proved by competent witnesses, and the jury must then pass on the credibility of the witnesses, and it is the province of the Court to inform the jury as to the construction, meaning, and legal effect of the law, supposing its existence to be proven; and to this end, the Court should avail itself of the judicial decisions of the State or country. . . .

In our case, the Judge below erred in refusing to decide that, according to the common law, a gift was presumed, as is settled by repeated decisions, and in leaving it an open question of fact for the jury upon the deposition of Mr. Hughes.

PER CURIAM. Judgment reversed, and a venire de novo.

741. STATE v. MONICH

COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS OF NEW JERSEY. 1906

74 N. J. L. 522; 64 Atl. 1016

ERROR to Court of Oyer and Terminer, Morris County. Sam Monich was convicted of murder in the first degree, and brings error. Affirmed. The defendant below, having been convicted of murder in the first degree, and thereupon sentenced to death, brings the record of that conviction to this court for review. . . .

The circumstances disclosed in evidence were briefly as follows: The deceased was an able-bodied woman of middle age named Hattie Decker. She was widowed, and lived upon a farm with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Wilbur Kayhart. Between 6 and half-past 6 in the evening of January 16, 1906, after having taken supper with her parents, she took a lighted lantern with the avowed purpose of going from the house to the barn to fasten up her dog. Shortly afterwards, as Mr. Kayhart testified, he heard the firing of two or three shots, went quickly to the door, and found his daughter standing there with the still lighted lantern in her hand endeavoring to enter the house, but unable to do so for want of strength. To him she said: "Oh, Pa, I am shot with a bullet. I am dying." He asked her: "For God's sake, who shot you?" and she answered: "Sam shot me" (meaning the defendant). . . . From this wound she died within a few hours. Kayhart's testimony that she declared the defendant had shot her was admitted over objection, and an exception was thereupon sealed. . . .

Charlton A. Reed, for plaintiff in error. Charles A. Rathbun, for defendant in error.

PITNEY, J. (after stating the case as above). . . . 1. With regard to the function of a Court of review in the premises, Chief Justice GREEN made it plain (26 N. J. L. p. 501), that the question here is not a question of the weight of testimony, but whether there was evidence before the trial Court which warranted it in admitting the evidence. . . . It is entirely manifest that in the case at hand there was abundant evidence to legally justify the determination of the trial Court that the declarations of the deceased that were admitted in evidence were made under the apprehension of impending death. . . .

2. The only other matter requiring discussion is the refusal of the trial Court to charge the jury that

"before the jury can consider declaration made by the deceased as to the person who inflicted the mortal injury in the absence of such person, they must be convinced that the person making the declaration had an absolute conviction that death as an absolute certainty is immediately at hand. If there is the least hope, no matter how faint, the requisite certainty of belief does not exist."

The effect of this instruction would have been to permit the jury to revise the finding of the trial Court upon the question of fact whether the declaration was made under a sense of impending death, and to disregard the declaration if they disagreed with the conclusion of the judge upon this point. Defendant's contention upon this head received some countenance from a dictum of Justice DEPUE (afterwards Chief Justice), in Roesel v. State, 62 N. J. L. 216, 238, where, in discussing the admissibility in evidence of a confession made by the prisoner, he said:

"If there be a conflict of evidence as to whether the confession was or was not voluntary, if the Court decides that it is admissible, the question may be left to the jury, with the direction that they should reject it if upon the whole evidence they were satisfied that it was not the voluntary act of the defendant."

This dictum was based in part upon the charge of Mr. Justice DRAKE to the jury in State v. Guild, and the qualified approval of his instruction contained in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the same case (10 N. J. L. 163, 181, 182). It will be noticed that the language of Justice DEPUE just quoted indicates a permissible practice, not one that the defendant is entitled to have observed. In Bullock v. State, 65 N. J. L. 557, at page 567, the same learned jurist did, however, declare obiter that in cases of doubt the question should be left to the jury with the instruction that they should reject the confession if upon the whole evidence they are satisfied that it was not the defendant's voluntary act.

In other jurisdictions, where the practice is recognized of permitting the jury to review the finding of the trial Court upon a preliminary question of fact on which depends the admission of a declaration or the like, the practice is commonly treated as discretionary with the trial Court. In Massachusetts, for instance, it seems to have been adopted as a matter of grace to the defendant. Commonwealth v. Cuffee, 108 Mass. 285, 288; Commonwealth v. Smith, 119 Mass. 305, 311; Commonwealth v. Nott, 135 Mass. 269, 271; Commonwealth v. Preece, 140 Mass. 276, 277. The opinion of Chief Justice FULLER in Wilson v. United States, 162 U. S. 613, 624, likewise indicates his view that the practice is discretionary. . . .

The question is fairly raised in the present case by the refusal of the trial judge to accede to the request to charge above mentioned; and in our opinion it admits of but one answer. The determination of the question whether a declaration that is offered as a dying declaration was in truth made under a sense of impending death, like the determination of the cognate question whether a defendant's confession was made voluntarily, is for the trial Court, and not for the jury. The question relates to the admissibility of evidence, and like all similar questions is not reviewable by the jury. Whether the deceased spoke the truth when she declared that the defendant had shot her was for the jury's determination. Whether the witnesses who testified that she made such a declaration testified truthfully was likewise for the jury to decide. But, in our opinion, it was not their province to lay aside the evidence of her declarations upon coming to a conclusion that she was not impressed with a sense of impending death when she made them. . . .

The judgment under review should be affirmed.

742. BRIDGES v. NORTH LONDON RAILWAY COMPANY

HOUSE OF LORDS. 1874

ACTION for damages for negligence in causing the death of the plaintiff's husband. Plea, not guilty. The cause was heard before Mr. Justice BLACKBURN at the Middlesex Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1869. . . . B. was in the last carriage of a railway train. Before reaching the station at which he was to alight the train had to pass through a tunnel. In that tunnel there was, first, a heap of hard rubbish lying by the side of the rails, irregular in form and height, then a short sloping piece of ground, then a piece of flat platform, like the main platform, but narrower, and within the tunnel. Beyond these was the main platform itself. The train only partially went up to the main platform, leaving the last two carriages within the tunnel, which had no light within it, and on the occasion in question was filled with steam. The last carriage but one came opposite the narrow platform; the last carriage was opposite the hard rubbish. A passenger in the last carriage but one (was who called as a witness at the trial) heard the name of the station called out in the usual way and got out upon the narrow platform. He then heard a groaning, and proceeding farther back into the tunnel found B. lying on the rubbish with his legs between the wheels of the last carriage, but neither of them had touched him. B.'s leg was broken, and he had received other injuries, from the effects of all which he died. The witness heard the warning, "Keep your seats," and shortly afterwards the train moved on. . . .

Mr. Justice BLACKBURN was of opinion that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants, and directed a nonsuit; but the jury expressing a strong opinion to the contrary, a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, the jury assessing the damages at £1200. The nonsuit was then entered, but leave was reserved to move to enter the verdict for the plaintiff for the damages thus contingently assessed.

A rule was accordingly moved for, and, after argument in the Court of Queen's Bench, was refused. On appeal to the Exchequer Chamber the facts were stated in a case, power being reserved to the judges to draw inferences of fact. The case was heard, and the judgment of the Court below was affirmed by four judges to three.[1] This appeal was then brought.

The Judges were summoned, and Lord Chief Baron KELLY, Mr. Baron MARTIN,[2] Mr. Justice KEATING, Mr. Justice BRETT, Mr. Justice DENMAN, and Mr. Baron POLLOCK attended.

Mr. Henry James, Q. C., and Mr. Kemp (Mr. Snagge was with them), for the plaintiff in error. The question here is, whether there was evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants, which ought to have been left to the jury. . . .

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C., and Mr. Aspinall, Q. C. (Mr. A. G. Shiell was with them), for the defendants in error. The judgment here must be affirmed unless it clearly appears that the deceased man was killed by the negligence of the company's servants. . . . There being no evidence on which the jury could reasonably find, in point of fact, that there had been negligence, there was no necessity for leaving the case to the jury, but the Judge rightly took on himself to say that no case had been made out for the plaintiff and that there must be a nonsuit. . . .

Lord CAIRNS, who presided in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, proposed that the following question should be put to the Judges: Whether in the facts stated in the special case, and having regard to the liberty thereby given to the Court to draw any inference or find any facts from the facts therein stated, there was evidence of negligence on the part of the respondents which ought to have been left to the jury? . . .

Mr. Justice BRETT. — My Lords, before determining whether there is or is not evidence fit to be left to a jury in support of questions, one must know what the questions are which are to be so left. It seems impossible to answer satisfactorily the question whether there was or was not evidence of negligence which ought to have been left to the jury, without first determining the form in which the question of negligence, if left, should be judicially stated to a jury. It is farther necessary, as it seems to me, to consider the formula which should be applied to the facts in evidence, in order to see whether they ought or ought not to be left to the jury. And farther, how much of the dealing with facts is within the province of the Judge, and how much is exclusively within the province of the jury. . . .

What is the direction in point of law which ought to be given to the jury at the trial? . . . The proposition which the plaintiff undertakes to substantiate is that he has suffered injury by reason of the negligence of the defendants or their servants. . . . This direction, however, is not yet sufficient. It requires to be amplified by a legal definition of what amounts to negligence. That definition is, that negligence consists in the doing of some act which a person of ordinary care and skill would not do under the circumstances, or in the omitting to do some act which a person of ordinary care and skill would do under the circumstances. The final and full and strict direction to a jury therefore in such cases is contained in the following questions: Have the defendants or their servants done anything in the conveyance of the plaintiff to his destination which persons of ordinary care and skill under the circumstances would not have done, or have they or their servants omitted to do anything which persons of ordinary care and skill under the circumstances would have done? . . .

Such is the direction to the jury. But before giving this direction it is the duty of the Judge to determine whether there is evidence fit to be left to the jury on each of the propositions which it is necessary that the plaintiff should establish. This being a duty cast exclusively on the Judge, is a question to be decided according to some proposition or rule of law. What is that proposition or rule of law which the Judge is bound to apply to the evidence in order to determine this question of law? It cannot merely be, is there evidence? . . . The proposition seems to me to be this: Are there facts in evidence which if unanswered would justify men of ordinary reason and fairness in affirming the question which the plaintiff is bound to maintain? It may be said that this is so indefinite as to amount to no rule, that it leaves the Judge after all to say whether in his individual opinion the facts in evidence would prove the proposition; but I cannot think so. It is surely possible to admit that reasonable and fair men might come to a conclusion which oneself would not arrive at. And Judges may be able reasonably to say frequently, that although they would not upon the facts have come to the same conclusion to which the jury has come, yet they or he cannot say but that reasonable and fair men might agree with the conclusion of the jury; or, in other words, that, although they would not have arrived at the same conclusion, it is not contrary to reason to have arrived at it.

The Judge must, therefore, before directing the jury in the terms above set forth, first determine the following questions: Are there facts in evidence upon which, if unanswered, men of ordinary reason and fairness might fairly say that the plaintiff had been injured by some act of commission or omission by the defendants or their servants? . . . If the Judge, not deciding the final issues according to his own individual view, but determining according to the propositions last laid down, holds that there is no evidence fit to be left to the jury on some one of the cardinal questions before stated, he must direct the jury as matter of law that there is no case in favour of the plaintiff, or he must nonsuit the plaintiff. . . . If he holds there is evidence on each of the cardinal questions, he must leave the case to the jury according to the direction in point of law before laid down in this opinion. When the Judge has so directed the jury as to the law, he has finished all which it is legal for him exclusively to determine. . . . A judge may be of opinion that the calling out of the name of the station ought not in any way to actuate the passenger; [yet] jury after jury may decide that according to the ordinary understanding both of railway officials and passengers it is an indication upon which a passenger may fairly rely [so] that, directly the train stops, he may, unless he receives some other warning, safely alight. . . . If such decisions may be overruled on the mere ground that the Courts or judges do not agree with them, juries are bound to matters of fact by the view of the judges as to facts. This cannot be. . . .

My Lords, the paramount importance which I attach to the enunciation of a rule of conduct or of decision by your Lordships is, that it will prevent the decisions in these cases from being governed by the many different views taken by different judges of facts of every day occurrence in life, and which no one can say are questions of law. The kind of discussion which may be found in this case in the Courts below, and the differing grounds of decision to be found in so many cases, would not be repeated.

Applying to the question proposed by your Lordships the rule I have submitted to be the right one, I cannot entertain any doubt that there was in this case evidence fit to be left to the jury, and I therefore answer your Lordships' question in the affirmative. . . .

Mr. Baron POLLOCK. — My answer to your Lordships' question is in the affirmative. [After having stated the facts of the case,] . . . The general rule which prescribes the duty of the judge presiding at Nisi Prius, when the question is raised whether, at the close of the plaintiff's case, there is evidence which ought to be left to a jury, is laid down, in the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ryder v. Wombwell, Law Rep. 4 Ex. 32, 38, where the question being whether articles supplied by the plaintiff to the defendant, who was an infant, were "necessaries," the Court said:

"The first question is, whether there was any evidence to go to the jury that either of the above articles was of that description? Such a question is one of mixed law and fact; in so far as it is a question of fact it must be determined by a jury, subject no doubt to the control of the Court, who may set aside the verdict and submit the question to the decision of another jury; but there is in every case, not merely in those arising on a plea of infancy, a preliminary question which is one of law, namely, whether there is any evidence on which the jury could properly find the question for the party on whom the onus of proof lies. If there is not, the judge ought to withdraw the question from the jury and direct a nonsuit if the onus is on the plaintiff, or direct a verdict for the plaintiff if the onus is on the defendant."

This is a clear exposition of the rule, and it has been generally acquiesced in and acted upon, and it follows from it that although the question of negligence or no negligence is usually one of pure fact, and therefore for the jury, it is the duty of the judge to keep in view a distinct legal definition of negligence as applicable to the particular case; and if the facts proved by the plaintiff do not, whatever view can be reasonably taken of them, or inference drawn from them by the jurors, present an hypothesis which comes within that legal definition, then to withdraw them from their consideration.

I commence, therefore, by considering what was the duty of the defendants towards their passengers upon the occasion in question, the non-observance of which would constitute negligence. . . . [Here the learned judge examined the facts and the possible inferences in detail, and continued:]

The plaintiff no doubt is bound to make out her case, and cannot by a bare suggestion challenge its rebuttal, and if what I have stated was all mere speculation, it ought not to have gone to the jury. But if it was an inference which could be fairly drawn from the facts proved in the same manner as things unseen or unproved — which in the eye of the law are the same — are constantly inferred and found as facts by a jury, then the evidence should have been submitted to the jury, together with any which the defendants chose to adduce, and which might have exculpated or further inculpated them according as their witnesses knew more of the occurrence, and confirmed or displaced the evidence for the plaintiff.

Judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed, and the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of £1200.

743. JAMES BRADLEY THAYER. A Preliminary Treatise on Evidence. (1898. p. 208.) This [judicial] function comes into play in supervising and regulating the exercise of the jury's office. Herein lies one of the most searching and far-reaching occasions for judicial control — that of keeping the jury within the bounds of reason. This duty, as well as that of preserving discipline and order, belongs to the judge in his mere capacity of presiding officer in the exercise of judicature. Reason is not so much a part of the law, as it is the element wherein it lives and works; those who have to administer the law can neither see, nor move, nor breathe without it. Therefore, not merely must the jury's verdict be conformable to legal rules, but it must be defensible in point of sense; it must not be absurd or whimsical.

This, of course, is a different thing from imposing upon the jury the judge's own private standard of what is reasonable. For example, when the original question for the jury is one of reasonable conduct, and a Court is called on to revise the verdict, the judges do not undertake to set aside the verdict because their own opinion of the conduct in question differs from the jury's. They are not an appellate jury. The question for the Court is not whether the conduct ultimately in question, e.g., that of a party injured in a railway accident, was reasonable, but whether the jury's conduct is reasonable in holding it to be so; and the test is whether a reasonable person could, upon the evidence, entertain the jury's opinion. Can the conduct which the jury are judging, reasonably be thought reasonable?

This matter has been accurately and neatly handled by Lord HALSBURY, in the House of Lords. A few years before, in Solomon v. Bitton, 8 Q. B. D. 176 (1881), . . . the Court (JESSEL, M. R., and BRETT and COTTON, L. JJ.) had said that the rule in such cases ought not to depend on whether the judge who tried the case was dissatisfied with the verdict or would have come to the same conclusion, "but whether the verdict was such as reasonable men ought to come to." In 1886, in the Metropolitan Railway Company v. Wright, 11 App. Cas. 152 (1886), in a case involving the question of negligence, Lord HALSBURY, in a short and excellent statement, put the matter with precision: "My lords, the facts of this case may, of course, be differently viewed by different minds. . . . Now I think that the principle laid down in Solomon v. Bitton is erroneous, as reported, in the use of the word 'ought.' If a Court — not a Court of Appeal in which the facts are open for original judgment, but a Court which is not a Court to review facts at all — can grant a new trial whenever it thinks that reasonable men ought to have found another verdict, it seems to me that they must form and act upon their own view of what the evidence in their judgment proved. This, I think, is not the law. . . . If the word 'might' were substituted for 'ought to' in Solomon v. Bitton, I think the principle would be accurately stated."

BOOK IV. BY WHOM EVIDENCE IS TO BE PRESENTED

(BURDENS OF PROOF; PRESUMPTIONS)

745. Introductory.[1] In every attempt to explain the principles of the law as to burden of proof and presumption, two things at least present themselves for consideration, — the general process, logical and legal, and the usage of various terms employed. The difficulties exist, not so much from the intrinsic complication or uncertainty of the situation, as from the lamentable ambiguity of phrase and confusion of terminology under which our law has so long suffered.

I. Logical and Legal Process. (1) Burden of Proof; First Meaning: Risk of Non-persuasion. Whenever A and B are at issue upon any subject of controversy (not necessarily legal), and M is to take action between them, and their desire is, hence, respectively to persuade M as to their contention, it is clear that the situation of the two, as regards its advantages and risks, will be very different. Suppose that A has property in which he would like to have M invest money, and that B, with whom the money is now invested, is opposed to having M change the investment to A. M will invest in A's property if he can learn that it is a more profitable object, and not otherwise. Here it is seen that the advantage is with B, and the disadvantage with A; for unless A succeeds in persuading M up to the point of action, A will fail and B will remain victorious; the burden of proof, or, in other words, the risk of non-persuasion, is upon A. This does not mean that B is absolutely safe though he does nothing, for he cannot tell how much it will require to persuade M; a very little argument from A might suffice; or, if M is of a rashly speculative tendency, the mere mention of the proposition by A might without more affect M's action; so that it may be safer in any case for B to say what he can on his side of the question; and thus in fact he, as well as A, has more or less risk, in the sense that there are always chances of A's persuading M, no matter how trifling his evidence and argument. But nevertheless the main risk is really upon A, in the sense that if M, after all said and done, remains in doubt, and therefore fails to pass to the point of action, it is A that loses and B that succeeds; because it is A who wishes the action taken and needed as a prerequisite to accomplish the persuasion of M. The risk of non-persuasion, therefore, i.e., the risk of M's non-action because of doubt, may properly be said to be upon A.

This is the situation common to all cases of attempted persuasion, whether in the market, the home, or the forum. So far as mere logic is concerned, it is perhaps questionable whether there is much importance in the doctrine of burden of proof as affecting persons in controversy. The removal of the burden is not in itself a matter of logical necessity. It is the desire to have action taken that is important.[1] In the affairs of life there is a penalty for not sustaining the burden of proof, — i.e., not persuading M beyond the doubting point, — namely, that M will not take the desired action, to which his persuasion is a prerequisite.

In litigation, the penalty is of course different; the action which is desired of M is the verdict of the jury, the decree, order, or finding of the judge, or some other appropriate action of the tribunal. But so also the action differs in other affairs, according as M is an investor with money to lend, or an employer with a position to fill, or a friend with a favor to grant. Is there no other and more radical difference?

The radical difference in litigation, as distinguished from practical affairs at large, is as to the mode of determining the propositions of persuasion which are a prerequisite to M's action. In affairs at large, these are determined solely by M's notion of the proper grounds for his action, — depending thus on the circumstances of the situation as judged by M. In litigation, these prerequisites are determined, first and broadly, by the substantive law, which fixes the groups of data that constitute rights and duties, and, secondly, more and more in detail, by the laws of pleading and procedure, which further group and subdivide these larger groups of data, and assign one or another sub-group to this or that party as prerequisites of the tribunal's action in his favor. Thus, if A were endeavoring to persuade M to assist him with money because M's brother B had cruelly assaulted and beaten A, M might conceivably exact of A that the latter first prove to him — i.e., persuade him — not merely that B had beaten A, but further that B had not done this in self-defence or by A's consent or in ejecting A from B's premises or otherwise for some reason, legally justifiable or not. In a legal tribunal, on the other hand, the substantive law will define and limit, in the first place, the reasons to be regarded as justifiable, and will thus narrow the total of facts that can in any event be involved; and, in the second place, the law of pleading will further subdivide and apportion these facts. It will inform A that he need persuade the tribunal of two facts only, namely, that A was beaten and it was B who beat him; and that, upon persuading the tribunal of these facts, its action will be taken in his favor, and A's risk of the tribunal's non-action will thereupon cease. It will inform B that at this point the risk of non-action will turn upon him, in the sense that he needs the tribunal's action in order to relieve himself from the consequences of its previous action, and that this action (by way of reversing its provisional action in A's favor) will depend upon his persuading the tribunal as to certain specified facts by way of excuse or justification. Perhaps the same law of pleading may further apportion to A a third set of facts to be the subject of a replication, in case B succeeds in obtaining action in his favor on his plea.

But the groupings defined by the substantive law and the further subdivision by the law of pleading do not necessarily end the process of apportionment by law. Even within a single pleading there are instances in which the burden of proof (in the sense of a risk of non-persuasion) may be taken from the pleader desiring action and placed upon the opponent. In criminal cases, for example, though there is no affirmative pleading for the defence, it is put upon the defendant, in some jurisdictions, to prove the excuse of self-defence; in many jurisdictions in which payment need not be affirmatively pleaded to a contract-claim, the burden of proving payment is nevertheless put upon the debtor; and so in many other instances. The difference of effect between an apportionment under this method and an apportionment by requiring a pleading is merely that, in the latter method, all questions of burden of proof might conceivably be disposed of before trial or the entering into evidence; while by the other method the apportionment is not made until the trial proper has begun. The other method is less simple in the handling; but it has come into more vogue under the loose modes of pleading current in modern times in many jurisdictions.

[1] "In Logic, then, when we speak of the burden of proof, we are not speaking of some merely artificial law, with artificial penalties attached to it. . . . No penalty follows the misplacement of the burden of proof, except the natural consequence that the assertion remains untested, and the audience therefore (if inquiring) unconvinced. . . . There is no 'obligation' on any one to prove an assertion, — other than any wish he may feel to set an inquiring mind at rest or to avoid the imputation of empty boasting. It is a natural law alone with which we are here concerned, — the law that an unsupported assertion may, for all that appears, be either true or false." (Professor Alfred Sidgwick, "Fallacies," 163.)

Test for this Burden; Negative and Affirmative Allegations; Facts peculiarly within a Party's Knowledge. The characteristic, then, of the burden of proof (in the sense of a risk of non-persuasion) in legal controversies, is that the law divides the process into stages, and apportions definitely to each party the specific facts which will in turn fall to him as the prerequisites of obtaining action in his favor by the tribunal. By what considerations, then, is this apportionment determined? Is there any single principle or rule which will afford a general test for ascertaining the incidence of this risk? By no means.

It is merely a question of policy and fairness based on experience in the different situations. Thus, in most actions of tort there are many possible justifying circumstances, — self-defence, leave and license, and the like; but it would be both contrary to experience and unfair to assume that one of them was probably present, and to require the plaintiff to disprove the existence of each one of them; so that the plaintiff is put to prove merely the nature of his harm, and the defendant's share in causing it; and the other circumstances, which would if they existed leave him without a claim, are put upon the defendant to prove. In criminal cases, the innovation, in some jurisdictions, of putting upon the accused the burden of proving his insanity has apparently also been based on an experience in the abuses of the contrary practice. In claims based on written instruments, experience has led in most jurisdictions to a statutory provision, requiring the execution by the defendant to be specially traversed or else taken for admitted, — a step which stops short of changing the burden of proof, but well illustrates the considerations affecting its incidence. The controversy whether a plaintiff in tort should be required to prove his own carefulness, or the defendant should be required to prove the plaintiff's carelessness, has depended in part on experience as to a plaintiff being commonly careful or careless, in part on the fairness of putting the burden on one or the other, and this in part on the consideration which of the parties has the means of proof more available.

There is, then, no one principle, or set of harmonious principles, which afford a sure and universal test for the solution of a given case. The logic of the situation does not demand such a test; it would be useless to attempt to discover or to invent one; and the state of the law does not justify us in saying that it has accepted any. There are merely specific rules for specific cases, resting for their ultimate reasons upon broad and undefined reasons of experience and fairness.

(2) Burden of Proof; Second Meaning: Duty of Producing Evidence to the Judge. We come now to a peculiar set of rules which have their source in the bipartite constitution of the common-law tribunal. Apart from the distinction of functions between judge and jury, these rules need have had no existence. They owe their existence chiefly to the historic and unquestioned control of the judge over the jury, and to the partial and dependent position of the jury as a member of the tribunal whose functions come into play only within certain limits.

At the outset, let us note, then: The opportunity to decide finally upon the evidential material offered does not go to the jury as a matter of course. Each party must first with his evidence pass the gauntlet of the judge. Thus, the judge, as a part of his function in administering the law, is to keep the jury within the bounds of reasonable action. In short, in order to get to the jury on the issue, and bring into play the other burden of proof (in the sense of the risk of non-persuasion of the jury), both parties alike must first satisfy the judge that they have a quantity of evidence fit to be considered by the jury, and to form a reasonable basis for the verdict. This duty of satisfying the judge is peculiar in its operation, because if it is not fulfilled, the party in default loses, by order of the judge, and the jury is not given an opportunity to debate and form conclusions as if the issue were open to them. The present "burden of proof" is therefore a duty towards the judge exclusively, who rules upon it as matter of law.

It operates somewhat as follows:

(a) The party having the risk of non-persuasion (under the pleadings or other rules) is naturally the one upon whom first falls this duty of going forward with evidence; because, since he wishes to have the jury act for him, and since without any legal evidence at all they could properly take no action, there is no need for the opponent to adduce evidence; and this duty thus falls first upon the proponent (a term convenient for designating the party having the risk of non-persuasion). This duty, however, though determined in the first instance by the burden of proof in the sense of the risk of non-persuasion, is a distinct one, for it is a duty towards the judge, and the judge rules against the party if it is not satisfied; there is as yet no opportunity to get to the jury and ask if they are persuaded. The judge, then, requires that the mass of evidence put in be at least enough to be worth considering by the jury.

(b) Suppose, then, that the proponent has satisfied this duty towards the judge, and that the judge has ruled that sufficient evidence has been introduced. The duty has then ended. Up to that point the proponent was liable to a ruling of law from the judge which would put an end to his case. After passing this point he is now before the jury, bearing his risk of non-persuasion. There is now no duty on either party towards the judge, to produce evidence. Either party may introduce it, and doubtless both parties will do so. But there is nothing that requires either to do so under penalty of a ruling of law against him. The proponent, however, still has his other burden of proof, in the sense of the risk of non-persuasion of the jury; i.e., should the jury be in doubt after hearing the evidence of the proponent, either with or without evidence from the opponent, the proponent fails to obtain their verdict upon that issue, and the opponent remains successful.

In this second stage of the trial, then, with the evidence before the jury, the only burden operating is that which concerns the jury, — the risk of non-persuasion; and not that which concerns the judge, — the duty of producing evidence.

(c) Suppose, however, that the proponent is able to go further and to adduce evidence which if believed would make it beyond reason to repudiate the proponent's claim, — evidence such that the jury, acting as reasonable men, must be persuaded and must render a verdict on that issue for the proponent. Here the proponent has now put himself in the same position that was occupied by the opponent at the opening of the trial, i.e., unless the opponent now offers evidence against the claim and thus changes the situation, the jury should not be allowed to render a verdict against reason, — a verdict which would later have to be set aside as matter of law. The matter is thus in the hands of the judge again, as having the supervisory control of the proof; and now he, as matter of law, requires the opponent to produce some evidence, under penalty of losing the case by direction of the judge.

Thus, a duty of producing evidence, under this penalty for default, has now arisen for the opponent. It arises for the same reasons, is measured by the same tests, and has the same consequences as the duty of production which was formerly upon the proponent. There are, however, two ways in which it may be invoked by the judge, differing widely in terms and in appearance, but essentially the same in principle:

(c') In the ordinary case, this overwhelming mass of evidence, bearing down for the proponent, will be made up of a variety of complicated data differing in every new trial and not to be tested by any set formulas. The judge's ruling will be based on a survey of this mass of evidence as a whole; and it will direct the jury on that issue to render a verdict on that mass of evidence for the proponent. The propriety of this has sometimes been doubted by Courts who do not believe the process to be precisely analogous to that of directing a nonsuit for the proponent or of enforcing a presumption, as shortly to be explained; but the better authority gives ample recognition to this process.

(c'') Another mode under which this process is carried out employs the aid of a fixed rule of law, i.e., a presumption, applicable to inferences from specific evidence to specific acts forming part of the issue (rather than to the general mass of evidence bearing on the proposition in issue). If it is a part of the proponent's case, for example, to prove that a person is deceased, and he has offered evidence that the person has been absent, unheard from, for seven years or more, and there is no other evidence on the subject, then the proponent may ask that the jury be directed, if they believe this fact of absence, to take as true the proposition that the person is deceased; if that, moreover, were the only proposition at issue, then the direction would be to find a verdict for the proponent if this fact of absence were believed. The result is the same as in the preceding form of the process (c'), i.e., the opponent loses as a matter of law, in default of evidence to the contrary. This particular form of the process, however (c''), happens to have become known as a "presumption."

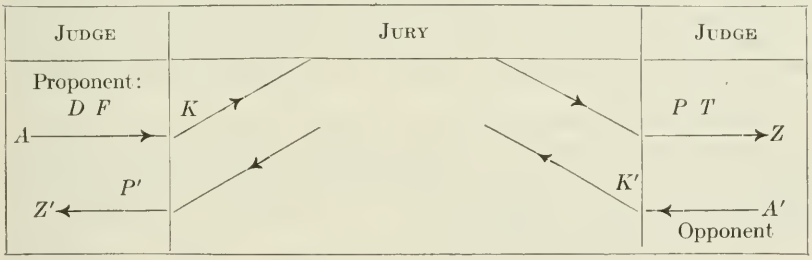
(d) Keeping in mind, then, that a presumption signifies a ruling of law, and that to this extent the matter is in the judge's hands and not the jury's, what is the effect upon the legal situation of the opponent if he does respond to this duty and comes forward with other evidence against the fact presumed? When he has thus fulfilled his duty under the ruling of law, he puts himself out of the hands of the judge and his ruling, and finds himself back again in the hands of the jury. He is precisely where the proponent was in the first place when he fulfilled the duty (then his) of producing evidence and succeeded in getting from the judge to the jury. The case is now open again as to that specific issue, i.e., free from any liability to a ruling of law against either side, and is before the jury, where the original proponent (as ever, when the issue is open to the jury) has the burden of proof in the sense of the risk of non-persuasion of the jury. The important thing is that there is now no longer in force any ruling of law by the judge requiring the jury to find according to the presumption.[1]

(e) Are there any further stages in this possible shifting of the duty of producing evidence? It is conceivable that the proponent may be able to invoke other presumptions, though this is not common. But may not the opponent go further than produce evidence sufficient to remove the presumption? May he not only get the issue opened before the jury again, but also go further and raise what may be termed a counter-presumption in his favor, so that the proponent will find himself in his original position at the opening of the trial, namely, subject to the duty of producing sufficient evidence to go the jury, under penalty, in case of default, of suffering a ruling against him by the judge as a matter of law? This result is possible in principle, and there are instances of it, though rare. For example, a plaintiff, in an action for the burning of his property by the defendant railway-company's negligence, created a presumption of negligence by showing the setting of the fire by sparks from the defendant's locomotive; the duty of producing evidence was thus put upon the defendant, who not only removed it by producing evidence sufficient to go to the jury, but by showing the proper construction, equipment, and inspection of the locomotive was held to have raised a presumption that it had not been negligent and thus to be entitled to a ruling by the judge against the plaintiff, taking the case from the jury.

The various possible stages in the foregoing process may be illustrated by a diagram; it shows in small compass the relation of the stages and the vital distinction between the judge's and the jury's situation for the two kinds of burdens:



Let A = the starting-point of the proponent having the risk of non-persuasion on a given issue;

[1] The following passage from Professor Austin Abbott's article, in the University Law Review, II, 59, will serve to illustrate the general situation involved in this duty of producing evidence: "To use a homely illustration, a civil jury trial may be compared to a game of shuffle-board. The first and nearest to the playery is the field of mere scintillas; if the plaintiff's evidence halts there, he is lost. The next, or middle, field is that of balancing probabilities: if his evidence reaches and rests there, he gets to the jury; but they alone can decide the cause, and they may decide it either way or disagree. The third and last field is that of legal conclusion: if his evidence can be pushed into that division, he is entitled to his victory at the hands of the judge, and the jury cannot draw it into doubt; but before the judge can do so, the defendant has a right to give evidence, and that evidence may bring the plaintiff's evidence back into doubt again, and leave the case in the field of balancing probabilities."

A' = the starting-point of the opponent on the issue;

Z = the point of complete persuasion or proof for the proponent;

Z' = the corresponding point for the opponent. The proponent then finds, as soon as he begins his production of evidence, that at any point between A and K he is subject to a ruling of the judge defeating him for lack of sufficient evidence. After reaching K, and obtaining a judicial ruling in his favor as to sufficiency of his evidence, he is now free from his duty of producing evidence to the judge, and has only his risk of non-persuasion of the jury. But he may be able to reach with his evidence the point P, and invoke again the control of the judge, thus shifting to the opponent the duty of producing evidence. This may be done either by some general rule of presumption that is applicable, or by a specific ruling of the judge upon the mass of evidence adduced. If the duty is thus created for the opponent, he starts from point A' to sustain it. Until he has by some evidence reached point K' he is liable to a judicial ruling defeating him on that issue. If he can reach point K', the duty and liability of satisfying the judge disappears, and he is in the field of the jury again. Here, however, the risk of non-persuasion of the jury is still, as before, upon the proponent for that issue; but neither party has any duty to satisfy the judge. Further, however, the opponent may succeed in reaching point P', at which the judge, either by a general rule of counter presumption or by a specific ruling on the mass of evidence will order a verdict for the opponent, unless the proponent comes forward with more evidence. Thus the proponent again has the liability to produce some evidence, and must again attain point K, in order to come into the field of the jury once more. The process, however, seldom reaches these advanced stages. If the parties cease all production of evidence while the case is between points K and P or K' and P', i.e., when the risk of non-persuasion of the jury comes to be the only and final stage, there are rules for the jury's guidance, namely, the rules for preponderance of evidence and reasonable doubt.

The important practical distinction, then, between these two senses of "burden of proof" is this: The risk of non-persuasion operates only when the case has come into the hands of the jury; while the duty of producing evidence implies a liability to a ruling by the judge disposing of the issue without leaving the question open to the jury's deliberations.

Tests for Ascertaining this Duty to Satisfy the Judge. There is no one test, of any real significance, for determining the incidence of this duty. At the outset the test is furnished by ascertaining who has the burden of proof, in the sense of the risk of non-persuasion of the jury, under the pleadings or other rules declaring what "facta probanda" are the ultimate facts of each party's case. A little later, the test is whether the proponent has by a ruling of the judge (based on the sufficiency of the evidence, or a presumption, or a fact judicially noticed) fulfilled this duty. Later on, it will be whether the proponent, by a ruling of the judge upon a presumption or the evidence as a whole, has created a duty for the opponent; and still later, whether, for the purposes of the judge's ruling, the opponent has satisfied this duty.

It has been suggested that "the test ought in strict accuracy to be expressed thus, namely: which party would be successful if no evidence at all, or no more evidence (as the case may be), were given?" But it is obvious that this is not a test, in any sense of being a useful mode for ascertaining the unknown from the known; it is simply defining and restating in other words the effect of this duty of producing evidence; it says "the burden of proof, in this sense, means that the party liable to it will lose as a matter of judicial ruling if no evidence or no more evidence is given by him;" and this does not solve the main problem of determining in a given case which is the party thus liable to these consequences.

(3) Measure of Persuasion for Jury. Besides the foregoing two things, which affect the parties, there is a third thing, which affects the jury only. What should be the measure of their persuasion, which they must reach in order to be able to say that the burden of proving to them has been fulfilled? The definition of this measure of persuasion is usually considered as a part of the present subject.

II. Meaning of Terms. (1) Presumption is used (besides the above meaning) in several other senses. (a) Presumption, in the old sense, is merely a logical inference, — usually from circumstantial evidence.[1]

(2) Presumption is sometimes said to be conclusive; i.e., after a period of time of adverse possession, a grant of title is "conclusively presumed." Such a rule is one of substantive law, and has nothing to do with rules of evidence. In effect, it says that a certain fact is immaterial in law.

(3) Prima facie is used in two senses. In one sense, it signifies that the proponent has sustained his duty of satisfying the judge (i.e., has reached point K in the diagram). In the other sense, it signifies that he has by his mass of evidence created for the opponent a duty of satisfying the judge (i.e., has reached point P in the diagram). The context alone can show which sense is used by the judge.

(4) Shifting the Burden of Proof. The first burden above described — the risk of non-persuasion of the jury — never shifts, since no fixed rule of law can be said to shift. The law of pleading, or, within the stage of a given pleading, some further rule of practice, fixes beforehand the issuable facts respectively apportioned to the case of each party; each party may know beforehand, from these rules, what acts will be a part of his case, so far as concerns the ultimate risk of non-persuasion. The second kind of burden, however — the duty of producing evidence to satisfy the judge — does have this characteristic referred to as a "shifting." It is the same kind of a duty for both parties; but it may rest (within the same stage of pleading and upon the same issue and during one burden of the first sort) at one time upon one party and at another time upon the other. Moreover, neither party can ascertain absolutely beforehand at what time it will come upon him or cease to be upon him or by what evidence it will be removed, or created, — except so far as a presumption has by a rule of law been laid down as determining the effect attached to certain facts.

In taking up the cases, it will be convenient to use the following order of topics:

I. Measure of Jury's Persuasion.
II. Party's Risk of Non-persuasion of the Jury.
III. Party's Duty of Satisfying the Judge.

---

[1] This is one of the earlier uses of "presumption." Such are Coke's "presumptions, whereof there be three sorts, viz., violent, probable, and light or temerary" (Co. Litt. 6, b). This is what is usually meant by "presumption of fact."

TITLE I. MEASURE OF JURY'S PERSUASION

746. COMMONWEALTH v. WEBSTER

1850. Massachusetts. 5 Cush. 295, 320

Shaw, C. J. (charging the jury). . . . Another rule is, that the circumstances taken together should be of a conclusive nature and tendency, leading on the whole to a satisfactory conclusion, and producing in effect a reasonable and moral certainty, that the accused, and no one else, committed the offence charged. . . . The evidence . . . in case of homicide, must not only prove a death by violence, but must, to a reasonable extent, exclude the hypothesis of suicide, and a death by the act of any other person. This is to be proved beyond reasonable doubt.

Then, what is reasonable doubt? It is a term often used, probably pretty well understood, but not easily defined. It is not mere possible doubt; because everything relating to human affairs, and depending on moral evidence, is open to some possible or imaginary doubt. It is that state of the case, which, after the entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the minds of jurors in that condition that they cannot say they feel an abiding conviction, to a moral certainty, of the truth of the charge.

The burden of proof is upon the prosecutor; all the presumptions of law independent of evidence are in favor of innocence; and every person is presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty. If upon such proof there is reasonable doubt remaining, the accused is entitled to the benefit of it by an acquittal. For it is not sufficient to establish a probability, though a strong one arising from the doctrine of chances, that the fact charged is more likely to be true than the contrary; but the evidence must establish the truth of the fact to a reasonable and moral certainty; a certainty that convinces and directs the understanding, and satisfies the reason and judgment, of those who are bound to act conscientiously upon it.

This we take to be proof beyond reasonable doubt.

Supreme Court of Maine. 1872

60 Me. 209

On exceptions. Case for slander, charging that the defendant accused the plaintiff with the crime of adultery. Plea, general issue, with justification.

The defendant testified that he saw the plaintiff in the act of adultery with a certain woman. This the plaintiff denied by his own testimony, and introduced the deposition of the "particeps criminis," which also denied the charge. The plaintiff requested the presiding judge to instruct the jury that the truth of the statements of the defendant concerning the plaintiff's alleged act of adultery must be made out beyond a reasonable doubt, the same as in the trial of an indictment for adultery in order to constitute a defense. This the Court refused to do; but did instruct the jury that if the defendant made out by a preponderance of testimony, as in ordinary civil suits, that the words spoken by the defendant, concerning the alleged act of adultery by plaintiff, were true, that they should find for defendant, and that the truth of the statements of the defendant concerning the alleged act of adultery by the plaintiff being proved, would be a complete justification of the defendant for uttering the same.

The verdict was for the defendant, and the plaintiff alleged exceptions.

Lebroke & Pratt, for the plaintiff. In civil cases, where a criminal act is so set out in the pleadings as to raise that distinct issue before the jury, the crime charged must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt before the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict; but where no such issue is raised by the pleadings, the jury may decide upon the preponderance of evidence. . . .

J. A. Peters & F. A. Wilson, for the defendant.

Barrows, J.—The plaintiff claims to recover damages of the defendant, because, he says, the defendant falsely charged him with the commission of the crime of adultery. The defendant says the plaintiff ought not to recover damages, because the accusation was not false, but true, and he testified that he saw the plaintiff in the act of adultery with a certain woman. The plaintiff denies this in his testimony, and produces the deposition of the woman, who denies it also. Hereupon he requests the judge to instruct the jury that the defendant in order to maintain the defense must prove the act of adultery upon him beyond a reasonable doubt, the same as if he was on trial for the commission of a crime. The judge refused so to instruct, and, on the contrary, instructed the jury that if the defendant had made out the truth of the charge against the plaintiff by a preponderance of testimony, it was sufficient to entitle him to a verdict; and that proof of the truth of the statements made by the defendant would be a complete justification for uttering them. . . .

Unless the charge made by the defendant against the plaintiff was false, as well as malicious, the plaintiff has no right to recover damages from him. The falsehood of the charge is a necessary element in the plaintiff's case. He cannot complain of any one for speaking of him nothing but the truth. The burden, however, of proving that what he has said is true, rests rightfully enough upon the defendant, not only because he holds the affirmative according to the pleadings, but because of the presumption of innocence. This presumption, as well as whatever testimony the plaintiff may offer to repel the charge, the defendant must be prepared to overcome by evidence. But when he has done this by that measure and quantity of evidence which is ordinarily held sufficient to entitle a party upon whom the burden of proof rests, to a verdict in his favor in a civil case, shall he be required to go further, and in order to save himself from being muleted in damages for the benefit of the plaintiff, free the minds of the jury from every reasonable doubt of the plaintiff's guilt, as the State must in the trial of a criminal prosecution?

We see no good reason for thus confounding the distinction which is made by the best text-writers on evidence, between civil and criminal cases with regard to the degree of assurance which must be given to the jury as the basis of a verdict. In England there was a reason for carrying the distinction thus made between civil and criminal cases, into suits of this description, — which never existed here, — because there, as Lord KENYON remarked in Cook v. Field, 3 Esp. 133, "where a defendant justifies words which amount to a charge of felony, and proves his justification, the plaintiff may be put upon his trial by that verdict without the intervention of a grand jury;" and so penal consequences might in some sort be said to follow the verdict in a civil cause. . . . But we think it time to limit the application of a rule which was originally adopted "in favorem vitae" in the days of a sanguinary penal code, to cases arising on the criminal docket, and no longer to suffer it to obstruct or encumber the action of juries in civil suits sounding only in damages. . . .

It is true, that this distinction has heretofore been carried into civil cases and applied to suits in which it incidentally became necessary to determine, in order to settle the issue which the parties were litigating, whether one of the parties had committed an offense against the criminal law. Hence have arisen in these actions for defamation among others, a series of decisions which, if juries had acted according to their tenor, would have been productive not unfrequently of very unjust results. Practically we do not consider the form of expression used in the instructions to juries in cases of this description as very likely to change the result. We do not believe, if the jury in the present case found themselves inclined to believe upon the whole evidence that the plaintiff was verily guilty, as the defendant had said, that they would have proceeded to assess damages in his favor, because he might have started a reasonable doubt in their minds whether he ought to be convicted of the crime and sent to the State prison, upon that evidence, even had they been so instructed. The practical effect of such an instruction would probably have been to eliminate the doubt from the minds of the jury, not to change the result at which they arrived. But we think it best to recognize what has been justly said to be "well understood, that a jury will not require so strong proof to maintain a civil action as to convict of a crime;" and to draw the line between the cases where full proof beyond a reasonable doubt shall be required and those where a less degree of assurance may serve as the basis of a verdict, where the juror instinctively places it, — making it to depend rather upon the results which are to follow the decision, than upon a philosophical analysis of the character of the issue. . . . A greater degree of caution in coming to a conclusion should be practiced to guard life or liberty against the consequences of a mistake always painful, and possibly irreparable, than is necessary in civil cases, where, as above remarked, the issue must be settled in accordance with one view or the other, and the verdict is followed with positive results to one party or the other, but not of so serious a nature.

Exceptions overruled.

748. BUEL v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN. 1899

104 Wis. 132; 80 N. W. 78

ERROR to review a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sawyer county; JOHN K. PARISH, Circuit Judge. Reversed.

[The accused was charged with the murder of one Nelson, a companion who possessed a sum of money. The facts are given fully in No. 518, ante.]

For the plaintiff in error there was a brief by J. B. Alexander, attorney, and V. W. James, of counsel, and oral argument by Mr. Alexander.

For the defendant in error there was a brief by the Attorney-General, and oral argument by C. E. Buell, first assistant attorney-general.

MARSHALL, J. . . . Evidence was produced to explain or discredit much of the evidence of the circumstantial evidentiary facts mentioned, and to impair the probative force of circumstances established, pointing to the guilt of Buel. The jury found him guilty of murder in the first degree, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The motion to acquit the plaintiff in error and the motion to set aside the verdict for want of sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction were properly denied. Upon each vital question in the case there was credible evidence tending to establish the fact involved, contradicted or explained in many instances, it is true, by other evidence; but it was for the jury to weigh all the evidence and determine where the truth lay. Such determination is conclusive, unless we can say it was not warranted in any reasonable view of the evidence, and we clearly cannot say that. . . .

The Court was specially requested to instruct the jury that before finding the defendant guilty of any crime they should require equally as strong and conclusive evidence of his guilt as would be required by them "as careful and prudent men to enter upon the greatest and most important acts of their lives." The request embodied, substantially, a correct rule of law, which the accused was entitled to have given to the jury, and unless the general charge sufficiently covered it the refusal to grant the request was reversible error. . . .

The use of such expressions as, "the jury before convicting an accused person must be convinced of his guilt with that degree of certainty requisite to lead men to act in the most important affairs of life," or, "in considering the evidence and coming to a conclusion, the jury should exercise all the care, caution, and judgment that men exercise in the most important affairs of life," or the jury "should be convinced only by the same proof as that which would convince men and upon which they would act in the management of the gravest and most important matters, and in arranging the most serious affairs and concerns of life," or the jury "should not convict unless from the whole evidence in the case they have an abiding conviction to a moral certainty that the accused is guilty," are each and all mere explanatory expressions to convey to the minds of jurors the exact meaning of the term "beyond a reasonable doubt" and the degree of certainty which such term calls for. They are generally given as the equivalent of the general expression that, "in order to convict, the jury should be convinced of the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt." The latter expression contains all there is of the rule, and it was given to the jury in this case with commendable fullness. This may be said without expressing an approval of the charge on the subject as a model for clearness.

The general instructions on such subject, found in the different portions of the charge, are as follows: . . . "You will not convict the defendant unless you are satisfied from the whole evidence that the defendant, Eugene Buel, wilfully, feloniously, and with malice aforethought, or with premeditated design to effect the death of Peter F. Nelson, killed and murdered him at the time and place alleged in the information. If each and all of you are satisfied that each and every material thing set out in the information is true and has been proved by the evidence beyond every reasonable doubt, you will convict; if you are not so satisfied you will acquit." . . . "If a reasonable doubt exists in your minds of defendant's guilt of any material allegation set out in the information, your verdict will be not guilty. A reasonable doubt, or doubt to be of avail to this defendant, is a doubt founded upon reason." . . . In view of such full instructions, the question is, Was it error for the Court to refuse to give the explanatory instruction requested?

To say that a failure to explain the meaning of the phrase "beyond a reasonable doubt" is reversible error, is a doctrine that has but very little support in the books. Much discussion is found in the adjudged cases as to whether any attempt to explain it does not tend to confuse. . . .

It is considered that, in this case, the better practice would have been to have given to the jury the explanatory instruction requested; but inasmuch as the subject was covered by clear language in the general charge, the refusal was not reversible error.

749. William Trickett. Preponderance of Evidence, and Reasonable Doubt. (1906. The Forum, Dickinson School of Law, vol. X, p. 76.) Different standards of weight of evidence are imaginable. If the evidence is testimonial the number of witnesses for or against can be counted. Two witnesses swearing to the same fact are stronger than one of them alone. If the evidence is circumstantial, six circumstances equally persuasive of the "factum probandum" are stronger than three of them. The number of the media of persuasion is a measure of their persuasiveness. In the Anglo-American system of jurisprudence, the law seldom prescribes any particular number of pieces of evidence. . . .

But, besides difference in respect to the number of the media of proof, there is a difference in respect to the intrinsic persuasiveness of the same number of media. There are two witnesses. A is mature, observant, careful, free from proneness to exaggeration, truthful. B is young, immature, and untruthful. The statement of A wins a larger credit than that of B. If the evidence is circumstantial, one circumstance may, more cogently than another, persuade of the primary fact. . . .

But let us suppose that the party having the burden has furnished evidence that is enough, in the opinion of the judge, to warrant a jury's belief of the fact. The opposite party then furnishes evidence of a contrary tenor. The two bodies of evidence have been addressed to the same minds, and must be considered and compared by them. If they leave these minds in a state of equilibrium, if these minds are unable to say which of the bodies of evidence is the more persuasive; or if they are able to say that they are equally persuasive, the decision must be against the party who has the so-called burden of proof.

Suppose, however, the evidence is appreciably stronger on one side than on the other. Either, alone, might convince, but neither, contradicted by the other, may be sufficient to convince. Two apparently credible persons testify affirmatively. One, somewhat more credible, testifies negatively. The testimony of the two, or of the one, would have been believed, had it not been contradicted by that of the one or of the two. It is clear that the evidence may leave the jury unconvinced, as to which of the assertions, the affirmative or the negative, is true, although it is conscious that the testimony of the two is somewhat stronger than that of the one, or vice versa. Opposing pieces of evidence may leave doubt, although one piece is stronger than the other, and doubt is not belief. Doubt "means," says Sully,[1] "a pulling of the mind in two directions, that is, a state of discord or conflict due to the action of two incompatible and antagonistic thought tendencies (forces of association). In this case, it is evident, judgment is altogether arrested, or suspended. It is this state of doubt or uncertainty, and not that of disbelief, which is the proper psychological opposite of belief. In belief the mind is at rest, the impulse to inquire is satisfied, and the volitional activity involved in thought is quieted. In doubt, on the other hand, we are in a state of unrest, conflict, or baffled activity."

The text-books and authorities usually inform us that, in civil cases, the decision must be according to the "preponderance of evidence." The persuasion necessary, in such cases, says Wigmore,[2] is "said to be that state of mind in which there is felt to be a preponderance of evidence, in favor of the demandant's. proposition." . . . "In civil issues," says Wharton,[3] "when there are conflicting hypotheses, the judgment must be for that for which there is a preponderance of proof."

But not everything for which some evidence can be adduced, is probable; nor everything for which the affirmative evidence is appreciably stronger than the negative evidence.

A corollary from this rule would be that the juror or the judge must in many cases decide in favor of A or B, the parties to the suit, that a fact did or did not occur, although he does not believe that it occurred or did not occur. A sues B on a note, whose execution B denies. Six witnesses affirm that the signature is in B's handwriting. Five affirm that it is not. No difference in competence, or trustworthiness, between these witnesses appears. Six, however, are more than five. The ordinary man, juror or judge, would say that the evidence "preponderated" in favor of A's proposition. But would the ordinary discreet man believe that proposition? Instead of six let us suppose twenty witnesses, and instead of five let us suppose nineteen. Still there is a preponderance towards A's contention. But would a sensible man necessarily believe that B signed the note, when nineteen men, each equally credible with each of the twenty, said that he did not sign it? In such a state of the evidence, the prudent and careful man would remain in a state of doubt. He would say, "There is one-nineteenth more evidence in favor of B's having signed, than in favor of his not having signed, but I am not convinced that he signed it; I neither believe nor disbelieve that he signed it."

If the rule quoted is to be adopted, it follows that a verdict in a civil case need not, and therefore does not, express the belief, opinion, or conviction of the jury as to the existence or non-existence of the facts which form the issue, but simply as to the existence of the preponderance of the evidence, a totally different matter. There can be evidence that fact X occurred, when it did not occur, and evidence that fact X did not occur, when it did occur, and, for the same reason, there can be more evidence that it occurred than that it did not occur, although it in fact did not occur, and to believe that there is this greater degree of evidence of occurrence than of non-occurrence, is not to believe the occurrence rather than the non-occurrence.

The rule indicated results in palpable absurdity. The object of the law is, or ought to be, to secure the sequence of certain results upon certain objective facts. If B signed the note he ought to be compelled to pay it. It would be, of course, inadmissible to hold that the absolute certainty of the jury that he signed it, should be the preliminary to this compulsion. But would it be too much to hold that the jury should believe, at least in some low degree, that he signed it? Is not the principle abhorrent that B may be coerced into paying a sum of money to A, when the jury does not believe, even in a faint degree, that he promised to pay it, simply because it believes that, of the plaintiff's and defendant's respective pieces of evidence, that of the former is heavier than that of the latter?

What those who have laid down the principle that "preponderance" of evidence will justify and require a decision conformable with it, have failed to realize, is that perception of the preponderance of evidence is quite consistent with want of belief. Of two pieces of very weak evidence, one may preponderate. It might be barely enough to convince, had it not encountered the contradictory evidence. Opposed by the latter, it may be insufficient to generate even the lowest degree of belief. To detect a preponderance of evidence that B signed a note, is neither to believe that he signed it, nor to be logically required to believe that he signed it. It would be fatuous to affirm that a man ought to believe, even faintly, everything the evidence for which is, in his opinion, stronger than the evidence against it.

Sometimes, by some authorities, a distinction is taken between different sorts of civil cases; in some, the rule of preponderance of evidence being laid down, and in others that of belief. Thus Starkie [1] says: . . . "One who seeks to charge another with a debt, must do so by full and satisfactory proof;" and one who alleges payment of debt must furnish "full proof."

In a considerable number of cases the Courts of this State require not a preponderance of evidence, but a satisfaction, a convincing of the judge or jury, not that evidence of a fact preponderates over evidence against it, but that the fact exists. An equitable title to land resting in parol can prevail against the legal title, only when the evidence of it is "clear, satisfactory in character and convincing." The evidence to reform a writing on account of mistake or to set it aside for fraud must be satisfactory. When the allegations in a bill in equity are denied by the answer, the proof must be "clear, precise, and indubitable." These cases hold that a preponderance of evidence, however great, is insufficient to sustain the burden of proof. The evidence must not only preponderate, but it must convince. . . .

There is no measure of the weight of evidence (unless the witnesses or the evidential facts are counted), other than the feeling of probability which it generates. If X hearing A aver a certain fact, and B deny it, believes the fact, or disbelieves it, he, in so doing, appraises the evidence of A as heavier or lighter than that of B. For him, for it to be heavier is for it to produce faith in him. The rule in all civil cases ought to be that the jury should find against the party who has the burden, unless it is persuaded, believes, is convinced, that the facts which he has averred have occurred. . . .

In criminal cases as in the special civil cases adverted to, the Courts formed the habit of advising jurors not simply to be conscious of a preponderance of evidence of guilt, not to believe the guilt, but to have a "clear impression" of it, to be "satisfied" of it, before returning a verdict of guilty.[2] At length, the admonition was given that they should have no "rational doubt;" they should be convinced beyond a "reasonable doubt." . . .

Two important psychological elements appear in these statements: they are belief and doubt. Doubt, as we have seen, is the negation of belief. The question for A is, Did X strike Y? He neither believes nor disbelieves; he is in doubt. To advise A to believe beyond a doubt, is to advise him simply to believe and possibly to believe hard. So long as he believes, he does not doubt. . . . If the admonition to the jury means that the belief of guilt should be strong and not weak, tenacious and pertinacious, despite repeated reflection on and analysis of the evidence, and despite the realization of the gravity of a verdict of guilty, it is intelligible. But the phraseology employed is scarcely to be commended for perspicuousness. What is a "reasonable doubt"? The advice is directed to the juror. He must have the doubt and he must be the critic of it. He is to say whether it is reasonable. But what man ever entertained a doubt, which at the time he believed to be unreasonable? To be convinced that, a doubt of a fact is unreasonable, is to believe the fact. To tell a man that, if he believes beyond a reasonable doubt, he must do so and so, is to tell him that if he believes beyond reasonably not believing, he is to do so and so, — a valuable instruction surely! . . .

A statement of Chief Justice SHAW of Massachusetts has been not infrequently quoted by judges.[3] The jury is to render a verdict of guilty, if it believes the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. And this is the explanation of a reasonable doubt. It is "that state of the case which, after the entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the mind of jurors in that condition that they cannot say they feel an abiding conviction, to a moral certainty, of the truth of the charge. . . . The evidence must establish the truth of the fact to a reasonable and moral certainty, — certainty that convinces and directs the understanding and satisfies the reason and judgment. . . . This we take to be proof beyond a reasonable doubt!"

[1] Evidence, p. 817. [2] Wigmore, Evidence, 3542.

[3] It is quoted in Com. v. Devine, 18 Superior, 431.

The doubt is a "state of the case"! I had imagined that it was a state of the mind. The state of the case, viz., the state of the evidence in the case, leaves the jurors' minds in a condition. What condition? This, viz., that they cannot say, that they have a conviction. I suppose that, if they cannot say that they have a conviction, it is because they have not the conviction. What conviction? It is an abiding conviction. But, what is that? One that has abode, for a considerable time, or one that is going to abide? How long before rendering the verdict must the conviction expressed by it have been formed? A week, a day, an hour, five minutes? If the abidingness is future, by what faculty does the juror know that it is going to abide? By what quality of the conviction does he recognize its longevity? By its strength? By its defiance of past argument in the jury room? Who knows?

But, it is a conviction to a "moral certainty." Is the certainty a different state of mind from the conviction, or is the phrase used to mean, a conviction which is a certainty, that is, a very strong conviction? It would be hypocritical to challenge the usage which speaks of a moral certainty, but it is impossible to see how an ordinary juror is to be aided by being told that if he is morally certain of the prisoner's guilt, he is to convict him. . . .

In order to convict, we are further told, the evidence must produce a "moral certainty of the guilt." But this certainty has some very peculiar powers. It "convinces, and it directs the understanding," it "satisfies the reason and judgment." Certainty is the state of being convinced, but, in Shaw's philosophy, it is the cause of, and therefore different from, the conviction. A moment ago, there was "an abiding conviction to a moral certainty," but now it is a certainty generating a conviction! This certainty (which is not a state, but an actor, a cause) has seemingly, three subjects on which to operate. There is an understanding; there are a reason and a judgment! Or are these three names only for one thing? But, that cannot be, for the operations are different. The certainty convinces and directs the understanding. It does no such thing for the reason or the judgment. Its function is, respecting these, humbler, shall we say, or more exalted? It "satisfies" the reason and judgment! A certainty satisfies! The certainty that one has fallen heir to a million dollars "satisfies," but it does not satisfy the reason; only the cupidity, the desire for happiness. The certainty that X the defendant killed Y satisfies the reason! What is this strange, elusive thing called satisfaction of the reason? And what singular thing is reason, that it should be satisfied by a certainty that the defendant has committed an atrocious crime? Perhaps what is satisfied is the desire to find out who committed it, that is, the official curiosity of the jurors; for which "reason and judgment" are odd names.

Doing the best possible with Chief Justice SHAW'S phrases, all that can be got out of them is this: Before convicting of a crime a juror should be morally certain that he committed it, and this conviction should be the result of a serious consideration of all the evidence.

Professor Wigmore well says, in his noble work on Evidence,[1] "When anything more than a simple caution and a brief definition is given, the matter tends to become one of mere words, and the actual effect upon the jury, instead of being enlightenment, is mere confusion, or, at least, a continued incomprehension."

TITLE II. PARTY'S RISK OF NON-PERSUASION OF THE JURY

751. KENDALL v. BROWNSON

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1866

47 N. H. 186

ASSUMPSIT on a note dated March 28, 1860, signed by the defendant and payable to the plaintiff or order. The defence was payment made by the defendant to the plantiff about a month after the date of the note. The execution of the note was admitted under the rule and not denied on trial; and the only question of fact in the cause was whether the note was so paid. . . .

The plaintiff requested the Court to instruct the jury that on the question of payment of the note the burden of proof was on the defendant. The Court refused so to instruct the jury; but did instruct the jury that upon the whole case the burden of proof was on the plaintiff; that if the defendant had introduced no evidence, the burden of proof would have been supported by the introduction of the note, the signature being proved, or admitted expressly, or under the rule; and that in such case the plaintiff would have had the verdict; but that the defendant having introduced evidence tending to show payment, it was for the jury to determine whether, the note and all other evidence on both sides being considered, the evidence preponderated in favor of the plaintiff; that if it preponderated in his favor never so little, he was entitled to the verdict; that if it preponderated in favor of the defendant, or if it was in equilibrium and did not preponderate either way, the verdict should be for the defendant; that the defendant was entitled to the verdict unless upon the whole case it was more probable than otherwise that the plaintiff was entitled to it.

A verdict was returned for the defendant, which the plaintiff moves to set aside for error in the foregoing rulings and instructions.

H. & G. A. Bingham, for the plaintiff. . . . The defence to the note was payment. In such case the burden of proof is on the defendant. . . .

H. Hibbard, for the defendant. . . . The declaration in assumpsit contains an averment that the claim is not paid. The question of payment may be tried under the general issue. This averment is put in issue by that plea, and it follows as a necessary corollary that the burden of proof as well as the right to open and close is with the plaintiff. Much of the inconsistency in the dicta of the judges in certain Massachusetts cases on this subject, seems to have arisen from inattention to the distinction between two very different things, that is, making a prima facie case and shifting the burden of proof.

PERLEY, C. J. . . . When the plaintiff had produced the note described in his declaration, the execution of it being admitted by the rule, his case was made out, and he was entitled to a verdict, unless his prima facie case was overthrown by evidence coming from the defendant. The defendant did not deny that the note was made on a sufficient consideration, and was originally a valid security; but he undertook to prove that he had paid it, and that was his sole defence. He did not rely on a negative of the plaintiff's prima facie case, but set up in answer to it the affirmative fact of payment. It is true, he said, I gave you this note, and it was a valid contract, which I was bound to perform, and I will prove that I have performed it by payment; and the only fact tried in the cause was whether after the note was made the defendant paid it. Besides other conflicting evidence on this point there was the contradictory testimony of the parties. On this question of fact, had the plaintiff or the defendant the burden of proof? . . .

An examination of the cases bearing on this question, shows clearly, as I think, that in this State it has all along been regarded as a settled general rule of practice in civil actions, that, whenever a party in any stage of the cause, under any form of pleading, sets up an affirmative proposition in answer to his adversary's case, he has the burden of proof to maintain the affirmative fact on which he relies. This general recognition of the rule in practice, and the direct authority of Buzzell v. Snell, 25 N. H. 474, I consider to be decisive of the present question. . . . So far, however, as I have been able to learn, the practice elsewhere is, in substantial agreement with what I suppose to have been our own; and on this particular point all the authorities that I have seen, are unanimous that where a defendant relies on payment, whether under the general issue or a special plea, the burden of proof is on him. . . .

Even if we were at liberty to go beyond the authorities, which to my mind are decisive, and look to the general reason of the thing, I can see no ground for any change in what I understand to be the present rule of the law on this point. The defendant has his election to plead his defence or give it under the general issue. If he sets up an affirmative fact to defeat the plaintiff's case, he ought in reason to assume the burden of proving the fact, whether he elects to show it by special plea, or finds it more for his interest to prove it under a general denial of the plaintiff's case. It is not reasonable that he should be permitted to use the indulgence which the law allows him, of showing an affirmative defence under the general issue, to shift the burden of proving it from himself and throw it on the plaintiff. . . .

My opinion is that the jury should have been instructed that the burden of proof on the question of payment was on the defendant; that the instructions given on that point were not correct; and that consequently the verdict must be set aside.

Doe, J., dissenting. . . . The general issue traverses and denies the truth of every material allegation in the declaration, and, under that issue, the plaintiff must prove every such allegation. . . . In actions on notes, as well as in other actions in assumpsit, the plaintiff must show a breach of contract by the defendant. 2 Greenleaf, Evidence, sec. 174; Chitty on Bills, 573. The breach, being a material fact, the only cause of complaint, and the very gist of the action, alleged by this plaintiff, and being denied by the general issue, must be shown by the plaintiff — that is, if he introduced no evidence tending to show it, he would be nonsuited. He has the burden of proof as to a breach, and there can be no other breach than non-payment. The obligation of proving any fact lies upon the party who substantially asserts the affirmative. . . . The burden of proof is necessarily assigned upon and by the pleadings in the first instance. If there is no proof and no legal presumption upon an issue or a vital branch of an issue, there must be some means of determining which party shall prevail. That party has the burden of proof on an issue, who will fail if there is no evidence on that issue. Judge of Probate v. Stone, 44 N. H. 593; Starkie, Evidence, 534, 8th Am. Ed. The strict meaning of the term, "onus probandi," is this, that if no evidence is given by the party on whom the burden is cast, the issue must be found against him. Barry v. Butlin, 1 Curtis 637. The rule as to the burden of proof determines which party shall prevail when an issue is not maintained by proof or legal presumption. . . .

At the trial of this case, upon the general issue, when the signature was admitted or proved, the note was evidence tending to show a consideration, . . . and a promise to pay on demand; the record was evidence of a demand made by suit, and that demand was evidence of a breach, because the contract could not be performed after that demand. The note, with the aid of the technical rules of law, was proof tending to sustain every material allegation of the declaration. Such proof made a prima facie case for the plaintiff; but it did not throw upon the defendant the burden of introducing evidence of greater weight than that introduced by the plaintiff, and of showing that upon all the evidence on both sides it was more probable than otherwise that he had not broken his contract. If he introduced so much evidence that, upon the question whether he paid the note upon or before demand, all the evidence in the case was in equilibrium, he was entitled to the verdict, because the plaintiff failed to sustain his burden of proving a breach. An equilibrium of evidence is the same as no evidence, and if there was no evidence of a breach, the plaintiff could not recover damages for a breach. . . .

If the defence in this case had been payment made after breach, it would have been in confession and avoidance, admitting a breach and setting up the new, distinct, affirmative fact of subsequent payment in discharge of a cause of action which once existed; the burden of proof would have been on the defendant, and his evidence would have been received under the general issue only by a relaxation of the strict rule of pleading. 3 Blackstone, Commentaries, 305, 306; 1 Chitty, Pleading, 477. But payment before suit, and before, or upon, actual demand, would be a performance of the contract before breach, rendering a breach impossible. The defence was a negative of the plaintiff's case — a denial of the alleged breach — and not in confession and avoidance or discharge; the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, and the defendant's evidence was admissible under the general issue, — not by a relaxation of any rule, but by the strict common law principle in which the general issue had its origin. . . .

"Payment," as well as "discharge," is used in two senses; first, performance of a contract to pay money according to its stipulations; second, extinguishment of a cause of action arising from breach of a contract. "Payment," as generally used in the books, has the latter meaning, and "the defense of payment" is usually of the same import, denoting a new, affirmative, and independent fact set up by the defendant in confession and avoidance, and not a denial of the breach. . . . The difference between the two significations of payment is the difference between the performance of a contract and compensation accepted in satisfaction of a breach of contract; and the distinction is not obliterated by any general and indiscriminate use of language by Courts or authors when their attention is not called to the distinction. The general statement that payment is a defence in confession and avoidance of a cause of action, is shown to be erroneous by a single illustration. If the note in this case was payable within a year from its date, payment before the expiration of the year would not be in discharge of the plaintiff's cause of action, for the plaintiff would never have a cause of action, — there would be no breach, — and the defence of such a payment would be a mere negative of the breach which, upon the general issue, the plaintiff must prove. . . .

It is of some practical importance, as a matter of justice, that promisors should not be deprived of their property by judgment and execution in assumpsit upon the accusation, denied by the general issue, that they have broken their contracts, when, in the equilibrium of evidence, it is as probable that they have not, as that they have, broken them.

752. LISBON v. LYMAN

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1870

49 N. H. 553

ASSUMPSIT, for the support of the pauper wife and children of one Volney C——. Verdict for the plaintiff. Motion of the defendant for a new trial.

The question was, whether Volney had a settlement in Lyman, by derivation from his father Isaac. . . . There was evidence tending to show that, for four years between 1833 and 1851, Isaac had real estate in Lyman, of the value of $150. There was no evidence that any taxes were assessed in Lyman during this time, nor that Isaac paid any taxes. The jury were instructed that taxation would not be presumed; and that it was unnecessary to consider whether he paid taxes, until it was proved that there were taxes to be paid; to which instructions the defendant excepted.

Carpenter, for the defendant. . . . C. W. and E. D. Rand, for the plaintiff.

Doe, J. . . . I. In actions for malicious prosecution, on the point of no probable cause (2 Saunders, Pleading & Evidence, 332; Eastman v. Keazor, 44 N. H. 520), and in actions for not having or not using, knowledge, skill, or care, (Leighton v. Sargent, 27 N. H. 460, 475; S. C. 31 N. H. 119, 136), the plaintiff affirms a literal negative, which, on the general issue, he must prove. Such cases, countless in number, and infinite in form, covering extensive departments of the law of contract and tort, are illustrations not of presumptions or exceptions or peculiar rules, but of the elementary principle which lays the burden of proof on the party having the affirmative of the issue, or, in other words, requires a party to prove his own side of the case.

And there is a great mass of cases, in which, upon the general issue, the plaintiff has the burden of proving that he was careful, and that the defendant was not careful (1 Hilliard on Torts, ch. 4, § 2): as in actions against towns for defective highways. . . . It is to be observed, however, that this burden of proof, in theory, often appears to be more formidable than it is in practice. The ordinary evidence of the plaintiff's damage generally has some tendency to show that it was caused by the faults of the defendant (Leighton v. Sargent, 31 N. H. 136); and evidence going to show that, generally tends to show that it was not caused by the fault of the plaintiff. Hill v. New Haven, 37 Vt. 508.) In an action for driving against the plaintiff on the highway, a sleigh (Lane v. Crombie, 12 Pick. 177), or a car (Gahagan v. R. R. 1 Allen 190; Robinson v. R. R. 7 Gray 92), the plaintiff must prove that he was careful and that the defendant was not careful. Cases involving this double aspect, are among the most common. In such cases, the plaintiff has the affirmative of the proposition that he used reasonable care; and he has the affirmative of the proposition that the defendant did not use reasonable care; for the simple reason that the plaintiff is the party who does affirm, and must affirm, each of the propositions although they are diametrically opposed to each other in form of language. A so-called negative affirmation is an affirmation and not a negation.

In assigning the burden of proof to one party rather than to the other, the law acts upon a better reason than a verbal distinction. The burden is imposed according to a plain principle of natural justice. The party who affirms as part of his case, a fact denied by the other party, has the affirmative, however much literal negation there may be in his affirmation; and it is just that he should be required to prove the essential facts of his case, whether he states them in the form of a negative affirmation or in any other form. Great confusion has arisen among the authorities, from the frequent application of a verbal, instead of the legal, test, of the affirmative of an issue.

"In every issue the affirmative is to be proved. . . . But to this rule there is an exception of such cases where the law presumes the affirmative contained in the issue. Therefore, in an information against Lord Halifax for refusing to deliver up the rolls of the auditor of the exchequer, the Court of Exchequer put the plaintiff upon proving the negative, viz., that he did not deliver them; for a person shall be presumed duly to execute his office till the contrary appear." Bull. N. P. 298. This report of Lord Halifax's case, indicates that the information contained an affirmation that he did not deliver the rolls, and that this alleged non-delivery was the gist of the information, and was traversed in pleading. If such was the case, the prosecutor, affirming non-delivery, had the burden of the proof which the law attaches to the affirmative. But the court attached the burden to the literal, and not to the legal, affirmative, and then shifted the burden by a legal presumption. The literal affirmative was mistaken for the legal affirmative; this mistake placed the burden of proof on the wrong party; that error was corrected by constructing or impressing a legal presumption to transport the burden from the defendant to the prosecutor; and this case of mistaken affirmative, unnecessary circuity, and superfluous presumption, has become a leading authority, and has done much to entangle and obscure a very simple principle of law. . . . By confounding the affirmative of the issue with the literal affirmative, the legal negative is constantly mistaken for the legal affirmative, and undesirable results are reached from which there is no escape except by complex processes and a liberal use of so-called legal presumptions and exceptions to general rules.

To ascertain which party has the affirmative of a proposition, we do not inquire, whether it is expressed in affirmative or negative terms, but we inquire which party affirms the proposition in order to make out his case, and whether it is traversed by the other party. 1 Phillipps, Evidence, 812 (4th Am. Ed.) The rule is elementary. When a plaintiff grounds his right of action upon a negative allegation, he has the burden of proof. 1 Greenleaf, Evidence, § 78. But Greenleaf erroneously says that this is an exception to the general rule. It is merely an application of the general rule. . . .

In the present case, the jury were instructed that taxation would not be presumed; and that it was unnecessary to consider whether Isaac paid taxes until it was proved that there were taxes to be paid. There was no legal presumption that taxes were, or were not, assessed. But the effect of the ruling that it was unnecessary to consider whether

Isaac paid taxes until it was proved that there were taxes to be paid, was, to entirely relieve the plaintiff from the burden of proof as to the payment of all taxes assessed, unless the defendant proved that taxes were assessed; and to put upon the defendant the burden of proving assessment of taxes.

This result was at variance with the rule which attaches the burden of proof to the legal, not to the verbal, affirmative. . . . The paupers who had been supported by the plaintiff, and whose settlement was in controversy, were the wife and children of Volney. The plaintiff's claim was based on the allegation that the paupers had their settlement in Lyman. . . . The plaintiff claimed that Isaac had gained a settlement in Lyman, in the fourth method of Rev. Stats. ch. 65, § 1, by "having real estate of the value of $150, . . . in the town where he" dwelt and had "his home, and paying all taxes duly assessed on him and his estate for four years in succession," while he was "of the age of twenty-one years." The issue on this subject, was, in effect, whether Isaac, for four years in succession, had the four following qualifications: 1, age of 21 years; 2, a home in Lyman; 3, real estate in Lyman worth $150; 4, payment of all taxes duly assessed on him and his estate. If these four requisites existed for four successive years, he had gained a settlement in Lyman; if either of these requisites was wanting, he had not gained such settlement. The plaintiff alleged that Isaac had complied with these four requirements for four years in succession; and this allegation of the plaintiff was denied by the defendant. . . .

The allegation that Isaac paid all taxes duly assessed four years in succession, is not an assertion that he paid taxes; nor is it an assertion that taxes were not assessed; but it is an assertion that he paid taxes four years in succession; or that taxes were not assessed in the years in which he did not pay taxes. The circumstance that the averment is an alternative proposition, does not relieve the plaintiff from the burden of proving either the one or the other of the alternatives. If the averment is put in this form: Isaac paid taxes if any were assessed: it is still an alternative proposition in contemplation of law; its legal effect is not changed by a variation of phraseology. . . . Unless one or the other part of the proposition is proved, the proposition as an entirety is not maintained. It is maintained by proof of either of its parts, but not by proof of neither of them. . . .

II. Was the burden of proof taken from the plaintiff and placed upon the defendant by an exception to the rule, on the ground that the subject-matter was peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant?

When in the nature of things, or the circumstances of the case, it would be more difficult for one party to prove an allegation essential to his side of the cause, if it were true, than it would be for the other party to disprove it, if it were not true, the omission of the latter to produce certain proofs (the omission of the defendant, in a criminal case, to testify, being excepted, laws 1869, ch. 23, § 2) may be evidence against him and in favor of the former; the absence of proof on one side, may be equivalent to express proof on the other. Ela v. Kimball, 30 N. H. 126, 135. . . . The greater the difficulty on one side, and the less the difficulty on the other, the stronger is the inference against the latter and in favor of the former. Rex v. Burdett, 4 B. Ald. 122, 123, 140, 161. It is a matter of degrees, and a matter of fact. . . . But, however that may be, it would seem that nothing less than obvious impracticability on one side, contrasted with obvious feasibility on the other, can authorize the invention of an exception to release a litigant from his duty of proving the essential facts of his case. . . .

For the attempt to establish an exception changing the burden of proof on the ground of the difficulty and facility of furnishing proof, we seem to be largely if not wholly indebted to a rigorous enforcement of the English game laws, and the undue influence of a small governing class asserting their superior rights under peculiar institutions not brought to this country and hostile to our system of society. The authorities supporting the exception, rest upon game-law precedent. . . . When, in a prosecution on the game laws, it was charged that the defendant had killed a partridge, the defendant then and there not having the necessary aristocratic qualification, the burden was put upon him to prove that he did not belong to the inferior class of men disabled by law to kill game. King v. Turner, 5 M. & S. 206; Bac. Abr. title Game; Com. Dig. title Justices of the Peace (B. 43). But when a penalty was claimed of a sailor on the charge that he had left his ship, not having the necessary qualification by license in writing, the burden was not put on him to prove he had a license, but on the other party to prove no license. Frontine v. Frost, 3 B. & P. 302. . . . The value of such authorities must be chiefly historical. If there could be one rule for game killers, and another for sailors, and another for clergymen, the application of these clashing regulations to other classes of men, would be perplexing. . . .

The game-law exception, having been established, was extended to a few other cases; but as it stands in the books, it has no consistent or satisfactory foundation in principle or authority. It has been extended to the liquor laws of this State. State v. Foster, 23 N. H. 348, 352; State v. McGlynn, 34 N. H. 422, 426; State v. Shaw, 35 N. H. 217. In State v. Foster, it was held that if the defendant had been licensed he could readily have produced the license; while to prove the negative the government would have been compelled to summon the town clerk to appear with the records of the town. . . . The introduction of the game-law exception in prosecutions upon the liquor laws of this State, brought to them an unnecessary odium. Its application to them was vastly more arbitrary than its original invention. It relieved the State from proving an essential averment of the indictment, when it not only did not appear to be impracticable for the State to prove it, but when it did appear to be at least as easy for the State to summon the town clerk, as for the defendant to summon witnesses (of whom the town clerk would naturally be one) to prove the signatures and authority of the selectmen. Even if it were a little more difficult for the State to furnish the proof than for the defendant to furnish it, it is not by a trifling difference between two inconsiderable difficulties of proof, that the general rule of the burden of proof can be set aside, and an exception established. Cheadle v. State, 4 Ohio State, 477, 480.

Upon an indictment for hunting deer, or catching fish, or cutting trees, or concealing a slave, without the consent of the owner, the burden is on the government to prove that the defendant was not licensed by the owner. Rex v. Rogers, 2 Camp. 654; Rex v. Allen, 1 Moo. C. C. 154; Rex v. Corden, 4 Burr. 2279; Rex v. Hazy, 2 C. & P. 458; State v. Woodly, 2 Jones, N. C. 276. And in other cases, the State is constantly required to prove a formal negative when the difficulty of proving it, is very great, and the difficulty of disproving it, would be very slight. . . .

The game-law exception has been applied in but very few classes of cases; the number in which it could as well be applied as in those few, is very great. 1 Ben. & H. Lead. C. C. 308–317. It ought to be extended or extinguished. Its present position cannot be sustained. In its partial operation, it is a mere exercise of arbitrary power, destructive of the congruity and unity of the law. . . .

The instruction which relieved the plaintiff of the burden of proving payment of all taxes assessed, and put upon the defendant the burden of proving assessment of taxes, was erroneous, and for this cause there must be a new trial.

753. GULF, COLORADO & SANTE FE R. CO. v. SHIEDER

Supreme Court of Texas. 1895

88 Tex. 152; 30 S. W. 902

Error to Court of Civil Appeals for Third District, in an appeal from Concho County. The suit was transferred to Concho from Runnels County.

This suit was brought by T. D. Shieder against the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe Railway Company to recover damages for injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff's wife in a collision between one of the trains of defendant and the buggy in which Mrs. Shieder was riding at the intersection of a public street with the railroad in the town of Ballinger on the 17th day of April, 1892. . . . The Court below charged the jury that the burden of proof was upon defendant railroad to establish contributory negligence on the part of Mrs. Shieder. This charge is assigned as error. . . .

J. W. Terry and Chas. K. Lee, for plaintiff in error. . . . Where the plaintiff's own case raises a suspicion of contributory negligence, the burden is on the plaintiff not only to show negligence on the part of the defendant, but to show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. . . . In a carefully considered article on the burden of proof, in volume 4 of the Harvard Law Review, pages 48, 49, speaking of the term "Burden of Proof," it is said: "In legal discussion, this phrase is used in two ways; (1) to indicate the duty of bringing forward argument or evidence in support of a proposition, whether at the beginning or later; (2) to mark that of establishing a proposition as against all counter argument or evidence; (3) it should be added, that there is a third indiscriminate usage, far more common than either of the others, in which the term may mean both or either of the first two. . . ." Bearing this distinction in mind, we believe that we can demonstrate both by reason and the great weight, if not substantially all, of the decisions of this State, the following propositions:

First. That the burden of proof on contributory negligence, in the sense of the burden of establishing such issue by a preponderance of evidence, where there is evidence in the case of contributory negligence, whether first offered by plaintiff or defendant, on the whole case has never been held by the decisions of this State to be on the defendant. . . . "Second. . . . That without dissent or dispute, the rule has been qualified to this extent, that where the plaintiff's own case discloses any evidence of contributory negligence, the burden is on him on the whole case. . . .

Guion & Truly, for defendant in error. . . .

DENMAN, Associate Justice (after stating the facts as above). . . . There is much conflict of authority upon the question as whether the burden of proof, upon the issue of contributory negligence, rests upon plaintiff or defendant. The confusion resulting is intensified by the fact that few, if any, jurisdictions can be found in which the decisions of the courts of last resort can be entirely reconciled upon this important question. A careful examination of the cases leads us to the conclusion that much of the apparent conflict in the decisions of any particular State is due to the fact that the Courts, in deciding individual causes, have sometimes relied upon the authority of decisions of Courts holding a different view of the law as to burden of proof; such differences not appearing on the face of the opinions, but lurking in the principle upon which they are based. The two classes of decisions, and the reasons by which they are respectively supported, are essentially antagonistic. They start from different premises, and logically arrive at different results, and therefore the citation of one to support the other generally leads to confusion. Mr. Beach, who undertakes to defend the rule imposing the burden on the plaintiff, asserts that it is supported by "the decided weight of authority," and declares it to be the doctrine in Massachusetts, Maine, Mississippi, Louisiana, North Carolina, Michigan, Oregon, Illinois, Connecticut, Iowa, Indiana, and probably New York, but candidly admits that the contrary is the settled rule in England, the supreme court of the United States, Alabama, California, Georgia, Kentucky, Kansas, Maryland, Minnesota, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Nebraska, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Wisconsin, West Virginia, Vermont, and Colorado, and is the opinion of the text writers. . . .

The rule seems to be well settled that it is not necessary for the plaintiff in his petition to negative, either by facts stated or by express averment, the existence of contributory negligence on his part. . . . We have been able to find no case where such pleading has been required, except in a few of those states where the burden of proof is upon plaintiff to show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. Since these States have changed the well-established and logical rule of evidence at common law, consistency would seem to require a corresponding change in the rule of pleading; but it seems that only a few of them have so ruled. . . . We are of the opinion that the great weight of authority, as well as the reason of the law, is in favor of the rule which imposes the burden of proof upon defendant to establish plaintiff's contributory negligence, and it may be considered the settled law in this State. . . . It is not necessary for us to determine here in what class of cases a special plea of contributory negligence is required, but it seems generally to be admissible in many jurisdictions under the general denial, even where the burden of proof is on defendant.

To the general rule imposing upon the defendant the burden of proof on the issue of contributory negligence there appear to be, in the very nature of things, two well-defined exceptions: First, Where the legal effect of the facts stated in the petition is such as to establish prima facie negligence on the part of plaintiff as a matter of law, then he must plead and prove such other facts as will rebut such legal presumption. The plain reason is that by pleading facts which, as a matter of law, establish his contributory negligence, he has made a prima facie defense to his cause of action which will be accepted as true against him, both on demurrer and as evidence on the trial, unless he pleads and proves such other facts and circumstances that the Court cannot, as a matter of law, hold him guilty of contributory negligence. When he has done this, he has made a case which must be submitted to the jury. For instance, if plaintiff's petition shows that he was injured by defendant's cars while on the track under circumstances which in law would make him a trespasser prima facie, then the law would raise a presumption of contributory negligence against him, for which his petition would be bad on demurrer; and it would be necessary for him to plead some fact or circumstance rebutting such presumption, — such as that he was, after going upon the track, stricken down by some providential cause, — in order to save his petition, and on the trial the burden would be upon him to establish such cause. Second, When the undisputed evidence adduced on the trial establishes prima facie as a matter of law contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, then the burden of proof is upon him to show facts from which the jury upon the whole case may find him free from negligence; otherwise the Court may instruct a verdict for defendant, there being no issue of fact for the jury.

Let us apply these principles to the case at bar. Plaintiff's wife was traveling in a buggy along a public street, when injured. She evidently knew the track was there, for she lived in view of and near the crossing. There is no proof as to whether she saw or heard the engine coming until she crossed the side track, though there was some disputed evidence as to whether the whistle was blown some distance back, and as to whether the bell was ringing as the engine approached the crossing. The testimony showed, that her view of the approaching engine was partially if not entirely obstructed until she crossed the side track, when she appears to have discovered the train and tried to turn her horse, which, becoming frightened by the approaching engine, jumped onto the track.

We have seen that the law raises no presumption of negligence from the fact of injury. Are there any other facts from which a legal presumption of negligence on the part of Mrs. Shieder arises? We think not. . . . No fact or group of facts can be gathered from the plaintiff's pleading or the undisputed evidence, from which the law can be said to raise a prima facie presumption of negligence on the part of Mrs. Shieder, and therefore the case does not come within either of the two exceptions above noticed to the general rule imposing upon the defendant the burden of proof upon the issue of contributory negligence. . . .

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the trial Court correctly charge the jury, that the burden of proof was upon defendant to establish contributory negligence on part of plaintiff's wife. . . .

There are many other assignments of error, none of which we consider well taken. The judgment is affirmed. Affirmed.

754. STATE v. QUIGLEY

SUPREME COURT OF RHODE ISLAND. 1904

26 R. I. 263; 58 Atl. 905

INDICTMENT for murder. Heard on petition of defendant for new trial, and denied.

The defendant, on January 30, 1903, was found guilty of the murder of Abraham A. Camac, October 4, 1902. He now prays for a new trial, alleging . . . that the presiding justice erred in his instructions to the jury. . . . The accused, through his counsel, sets up the defence of insanity of a temporary character, to wit, delirium tremens; alleging that this incapacity existed at the time of the homicide, but had passed away soon after. . . .

To support this defence several witnesses appeared who had known the accused from one to twelve years, and their testimony was to the effect that the accused was accustomed to drink to excess, and on some occasions had shown symptoms which to them indicated delirium tremens. One medical expert, Dr. Ford, made examinations of the accused at various times, at the request of his counsel, and declared it to be his opinion that the accused had delirium tremens or alcoholic insanity on October 4th in an aborted form. . . . The State, in rebuttal, called amongst other witnesses, Dr. Keene, who is in charge of the State Insane Asylum. . . .

The Court charged that upon the issue of insanity the burden of proof is upon the accused, and that the rule of evidence upon this issue is that it shall be proven by a fair preponderance of evidence.

Douglas, J. (after stating the case as above). The first, third, and fourth requests, which were refused, were based upon the proposition that upon the question of sanity or insanity of the accused the burden is upon the State to prove sanity beyond a reasonable doubt.

The question was settled in England in 1843 by the answer of the Judges to questions propounded by the House of Lords, suggested by the case of Daniel M'Naghten, reported in 10 Cl. & Fin. 200. In that case the law was said to be: That if the accused was conscious that the act was one which he ought not to do; and if the act was at the same time contrary to law, he is punishable; in all cases of this kind the jurors ought to be told that every man is presumed to be sane and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crime until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction; and that to establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that at the time of committing the act the party was laboring under such a defect of reason from disease of the mind as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing or as not to know that what he was doing was wrong. . . .

The question has arisen in almost every State of the Union, and in the courts of the United States, and between the decisions of these courts there is a hopeless conflict.

The decisions up to 1882 were collected in an article by Henry Wade Rogers in the Central Law Journal, vol. 14, p. 2. The writer cites, as supporting the view that the burden is upon the accused, the courts of Alabama, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia. To the contrary are cited Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Mississippi, and New Hampshire, while New York is called uncertain. From the report of the trial of Henry K. Goodwin, published in 1887, by the attorney-general of Massachusetts, by authority of law, it appears that the Courts of that State have abandoned the English rule. . . . Georgia has also changed its view, Ryder v. State, 100 Ga. 528, Maryland, Spencer v. State, 69 Md. 28, and New Mexico, Faulkner v. Ter., 6 N. M. 465, where the question has come up for the first time, have adopted the same rule. To the supporters of the English rule named above may be added Nevada, State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 333; South Dakota, State v. Yokum, 11 So. Da. 544; and Utah, People v. Dillon, 8 U. 92. . . . Perhaps the most weighty authority to the contrary is Davis v. United States, 160 U. S. 469. . . . In that case, the Court hold that the burden is upon the prosecution to establish sanity as an ingredient of the crime; and hence, when the presumption of sanity becomes silent on the introduction of evidence against it, proof of sanity beyond a reasonable doubt must be made before the jury can convict.

It would be a fruitless task to review in detail the cases where the question has been considered, for they are divided into two classes, which follow substantially the same two divergent lines of reasoning.

The English rule implies that the question of guilt and the question of insanity raise two distinct issues, and that while both may be involved in the final verdict, the burden of proof upon each issue lies upon different parties. The most complete and forcible statement of the argument in support of this rule which we have found is contained in the opinion of Judge DANFORTH in State v. Lawrence, 57 Me. 574, 581.

The American rule, so-called, holds that in a criminal case there is but one issue and that the burden throughout is upon the prosecution to prove, not only the criminal act, but the capacity of the accused to commit it beyond a reasonable doubt.

We think the first of these positions is the more logical. Sanity is not an ingredient of crime. It is a condition precedent of all intelligent action, as well benevolent as nefarious. It is a quality of the actor, not an element of the act. It is incumbent upon the prosecution to show the commission of the act, and from this showing and its circumstances to sustain the inferences of malice and such emotions as the particular crime may include. But sanity is not one of these inferences. It is a pre-existing fact which may be taken for granted as implied by law and general experience. . . .

It is argued that criminal intent, malice, and premeditation are facts to be proven by the prosecutor; that these can not exist in any insane mind; hence sanity must be proved by the prosecutor. But these are facts of mental condition and action, and they can only be proved by inference from material facts, circumstances, and acts. It is incumbent, therefore, upon the prosecution to prove such material facts, circumstances, and acts as would compel the inference of guilt in a sane person; and this is the limit of his burden. In murder the prosecution must establish the act, and either by inference or additional evidence, malice, and premeditation. If these ingredients of the crime can not exist without sanity, sanity is presumed. All the ingredients of the crime must be proved, and as to these we agree the burden never shifts. But as to sanity it never attaches to the prosecutor. The plea of not guilty by itself does not put the sanity of the accused in issue. He must raise the question otherwise, as all agree, if not by special plea, at least by introducing evidence, and this is confession and avoidance. Confession and avoidance are an admission that the accused performed the act charged and a denial that the act was criminal. They are not, as the argument of several Courts assume, an admission that a crime was committed and the tender of an excuse for committing it. The defence of insanity admits the act but not the crime, just as the pleas of self-defence or of a license do. Upon both these defences we have held the burden to be upon the accused. State v. Ballou, 20 R. I. 607; State v. Beswick, 13 R. I. 211. . . .

We can not doubt that this is the view of the issue which is implied by our statute law, Gen. Laws cap. 82, § 22, which provides: "Whenever, upon the trial of any person upon an indictment, the accused shall set up in defence thereto his insanity, the jury, if they acquit such person upon such ground, shall state that they have so acquitted him," etc. This statute requires the defence of insanity to be set up by the accused, and requires the jury to find specially upon that issue. Under this provision the rules of evidence are as essentially fixed as if a special plea of insanity were required. . . .

The petition for new trial is denied, and the case will be remanded to the Common Pleas Division for sentence.

Charles F. Stearns, Attorney-general, for State. Cooney & Cahill, for defendant.

755. GINN v. DOLAN

SUPREME COURT OF OHIO. 1909

81 Oh. 121; 90 N. E. 141

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Cuyahoga County. . . .

The defendant in error sued to recover on four promissory notes. One of the defenses thereto was want of consideration. On the trial and before argument to the jury, the defendant below, plaintiff in error here, asked the Court to charge the jury that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to satisfy the jury by a preponderance of the evidence, that the notes were given for a valuable consideration; that such burden does not shift to or upon the defendant at any stage of the case; and that, although the presumption is that the notes were given upon a sufficient consideration, yet when other evidence on that subject is offered by the defendant, the burden is on the plaintiff to satisfy the jury upon all of the evidence that there was a consideration for the notes. The Court refused to so instruct the jury and, after the argument, instructed the jury as follows: "The law presumes the existence of a consideration for a promissory note, and this presumption continues until it is shown that there was none. . . . The defendant in this action, in addition to the denial of the execution and delivery of the notes in question, charges that said notes are wholly without consideration. Upon the issues of the absence or want of consideration, the burden of showing this is on the defendant. He must show by a preponderance of the evidence that the notes in question were without consideration." The verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff, and the judgment in the Court of Common Pleas was affirmed by the Circuit Court.

Blandin, Rice & Ginn, for plaintiff in error. Our contention is that while the introduction of the notes in evidence made a prima facie case for consideration, it did not shift the burden of proof upon all the evidence relating to that issue to the defendant and require him to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the notes were without consideration.

It has been a very common error for the Courts of this and other states in their statements of the law to fail to discriminate closely between the burden of proof upon the whole case, and the state of proof at a particular time in the progress of the trial. This error very frequently takes the form of stating that upon certain proofs being introduced, the burden shifts from one side to the other, which is upon all hands conceded to be an inaccurate statement of the law; what does in fact happen is that upon the introduction of certain proofs which are sufficient to make a prima facie case, the burden of producing countervailing proof is cast upon the other party; but the burden upon the whole case and all the evidence still remains upon the party having the affirmative.

This misuse of language has not been confined by the Courts to the statement of the law with reference to the burden of proof upon the question of consideration for a promissory note; but similar statements have been made with reference to every other kind of case which involves a presumption sufficient to make a prima facie case; as, for instance, the presumption of negligence arising from the occurrence of an accident of a particular character or occurring in a particular way; the Courts have said repeatedly as to such cases that upon proof being made by the plaintiff of the occurrence of an accident of that character or of its occurrence in that particular way, the presumption made a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff, and that the burden of proof at such point in the progress of the case shifted to the defendant, and he was required to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that he exercised due care and was not guilty of negligence. Railroad Co. v. Mowery, 36 Ohio St. 418.

But the general rule would seem to be well established in negligence cases by an almost unbroken line of authority, that to rebut and destroy a mere prima facie case, the party upon whom rests the burden of repelling its effect need only produce such amount or degree of proof as will countervail the presumption arising therefrom. In other words, it is sufficient if the evidence offered for that purpose counterbalance the evidence by which the prima facie case is made out or established; it need not overbalance or outweigh it. . . .

We do not understand that any Court has ever given the presumption, attaching to a promissory note, that it was upon a sufficient consideration, when introduced in evidence, any other effect than to make a mere prima facie case. All that the defendant here was required to do was to rebut and destroy a mere prima facie case, and only produce such amount or degree of proof as would countervail the presumption arising therefrom. In other words, it was sufficient if the evidence, offered for that purpose, counterbalanced the evidence by which the prima facie case was made out and established; it did not need to overbalance or outweigh it. . . .

Kerruish & Kerruish, for defendant in error. We submit that in a suit on a promissory note where the defendant sets up in his answer want of consideration, the burden is on him to establish this defense by a preponderance of the evidence. . . . We do not contend that the burden shifts from the plaintiff to the defendant, but we submit that the burden was on the defendant from the beginning to the end of the trial to show want of consideration. . . .

DAVIS, J. (after stating the facts as above). . . . It appears to us that these facts disclose an error of sufficient gravity to require the reversal of the judgment below.

The weight of the evidence, or as it is otherwise expressed, the preponderance of the evidence, may vary from side to side as a trial progresses; but the burden, which rests upon the plaintiff to establish the material averments of his cause of action by the preponderance of all the evidence, never shifts. The party who maintains the affirmative of an issue carries the burden of proof through the whole case, although he may be aided by such a rebuttal presumption of law, or such facts, as would prima facie support his contention. His opponent need not do more than counterbalance the presumption, or prima facie case. It is not necessary that the petition should in terms contain the averment that the note was based on a valuable consideration, because that is presumed. But when consideration is denied in the answer, there is an issue made upon that point, on which the plaintiff has the affirmative, and, the presumption being prima facie only, and not conclusive, the burden of proof necessarily rests upon the plaintiff to show a consideration, by a preponderance of the whole evidence given on the trial of the issue.

The reason of the rule, and some of the authorities which support it, are fully shown in Klunk v. Railway, 74 Ohio St. 125. It would be easy to amplify the citation of authorities (for example, see cases cited 4 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2 ed.), 200, n. 2; Hurley v. Ry. Co., 180 Mass. 370; Bank v. Adams, 70 Vt. 132; Kenny v. Walker, 29 Ore. 41; Owens v. Snell, 29 Ore. 483; 16 Cyc. 932–934), but it would not clarify the proposition to any extent. Indeed, it is not believed that the Courts below would have fallen into this error, but for a misconstruction of Dalrymple, Admr. v. Wyker, Admr., 60 Ohio St. 108. There were only two questions considered in that case. The first one was, whether the defense of want of consideration, as it was there pleaded, was good against a demurrer. This Court held that it was not. But the case having been heard on evidence, the Court proceeded to the second question, namely, whether the evidence adduced by the defendant was sufficient to overcome the presumption of a valuable consideration; and this was the conclusion of the Court: "The evidence then does not overcome the presumption of a consideration arising from the giving of the note. In other words, to say the least, the evidence leaves the case in as much uncertainty as to whether there was, as to whether there was not, a consideration sufficient in law to support the note, and, consequently, the note with the presumption in its favor must prevail." It must be obvious, therefore, that the question involved in the case at bar was not raised by the record in Dalrymple, Admr. v. Wyker, Admr., and was not considered by the Court; and the syllabus of that case cannot be construed as being any broader than the facts of the case would warrant.

It is proper to say further, replying to a suggestion by counsel in argument, that a plea of failure of consideration, or of payment, presents a case very different from this. These defenses, as it were, confess and avoid. They are affirmative defenses, and upon such the burden is upon the defendant from the beginning to the end, just as it is upon the plaintiff here.

The judgment of the Circuit Court and that of the Court of Common Pleas are reversed.

CREW, C. J., SUMMERS, SPEAR and SHAUCK, JJ., concur.

TITLE III. PARTY'S DUTY OF SATISFYING THE JUDGE

Topic 1. Sufficiency of a Mass of Evidence

757. Rex v. Almon. (1771. King's Bench. 5 Burr. 2868.) [Criminal libel. To charge the defendant as the publisher, evidence was offered of a purchase of the libel, imprinted with the defendant's name and bought in his shop.] L. C. J. Mansfield. — This being prima facie evidence of a publication by the master himself, it stands good till answered by him; and if not answered at all, it thereby becomes conclusive so far as to be sufficient to convict him. . . . [It] must stand till contradicted or explained or exculpated by some other evidence, and if not contradicted, explained or exculpated, would be in point of evidence sufficient or tantamount to conclusive. . . . If it be sufficient in point of law, and the juryman believes it [i.e., the fact of purchase], he is bound in conscience to give his verdict according to it.

Mr. Justice Aston . . . laid down the same maxim as being fully and clearly established, that prima facie evidence (if believed) is binding till contrary evidence be produced.

758. Regina v. O'Doherty. (1848. Ireland. 6 State Tr. n. s. 831, 873.) Pennefather, B. (charging the jury, in a prosecution for publishing an article with seditious intent). The publishing them is certainly prima facie evidence against him, as being the registered proprietor [of the newspaper].

A Juror. — There is difference of opinion among the jurors; some hold that, from your lordship stating there being prima facie evidence of the prisoner's guilt, we should at once go to find him guilty; others receiving the phase thus, that your lordship did not mean to convey that it was sufficient [to require that finding].

Pennefather, B. — I did not mean, gentlemen, to direct you or tell you that in point of law, because he was the publisher and proprietor of the paper, he therefore necessarily knew the contents. I did not mean to convey that. But I told you that it was evidence that he did know the contents, and that you were to form your judgment upon the whole of the case, reading the documents and the evidence.

759. GRAY v. JACKSON

51 N. H. 9

Assumpsit, by Calvin Gray against the defendants as common carriers. It was alleged in the declaration that the defendants received of the plaintiff, at Portsmouth, N. H., the sum of $41, to be carried from Portsmouth to Reading, Mass., and there delivered to Nancy Thrasher. By agreement of parties the case was tried by the Court, who found the following facts:

The defendants are expressmen running from Portsmouth to Boston.

They receive, at Portsmouth, besides packages for Boston, packages for all parts of the country, and at the end of their route deliver them to other expressmen to be forwarded. There is no evidence that the defendants have any business connection or arrangement with other expressmen. July 11, 1865, the plaintiff delivered to the defendants, at Portsmouth, a package containing $41, directed to "Miss Nancy Thrasher, Reading, Mass.," a place not upon the defendants' route; and the plaintiff paid the defendants fifty cents as the entire expressage from Portsmouth to Reading. The defendants gave the plaintiff the following writing: "Jackson & Co. Portsmouth and Boston Express. Portsmouth, July 11th, 1865. $41.00. Received of Calvin Gray, package said to contain forty-one dollars, directed to Miss Nancy Thrasher, Reading, Mass., per Jackson & Co. Marden." The plaintiff knew that the defendants carried packages from Portsmouth to Boston, but did not know whether their line extended elsewhere or not. No notice was given him on this point by the defendants, except so far as such notice may have been given by the above writing and the other facts herein mentioned. When the package was delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants, the plaintiff understood that the defendants undertook to carry it to Reading and there deliver it to Miss Thrasher. The defendants understood that they undertook to do nothing more than they afterwards did. There was no conversation on this matter at the time, but the Court finds the understanding of each party to have been as above stated.

The defendants carried the package to Boston, gave it to the agent of the expressman whose route was from Boston to Reading, paid him twenty-five cents, and took his receipt. The Reading expressman appropriated the money to his own use, and has since left this part of the country. The defendants had no business connection with the express from Boston to Reading. About four weeks after July 11th, an agent of Miss Thrasher, to whom the Reading expressman had admitted the receipt of the money but refused to pay it over (virtually acknowledging that he had spent it), went with Miss Thrasher to the Boston office of the defendants, notified the defendants of the non-receipt, and demanded the money. About two weeks later, the plaintiff notified the defendants, at their Portsmouth office, that the money had not been received.

The Court found a verdict for the defendants, and the plaintiff moved for a new trial.

Minot, Tappan & Mugridge, for the plaintiff. C. P. Sanborn, for the defendants.

Doe, J. . . . The defendants have taken upon themselves the public office, trust, and duty of common carriers between Portsmouth and Boston, but not between Boston and Reading. They were under an obligation as common carriers to receive the plaintiff's parcel and carry it to Boston. That was their official duty. Assuming the office, they promise to perform its duties. This is common law. But it was no part of their official duty to carry the parcel to Reading, or to receive it coupled with a contract to carry it to Reading. And when the plaintiff accuses them of violating a contract to carry it to Reading, the plaintiff must prove the contract on which it relies. It is not proved by the official duty of their public employment, because that does not extend beyond Boston. A contract to carry the parcel to Reading must be a mutual understanding of the parties. It may be proved expressly or by implication, by direct or circumstantial evidence, by writing or parol, by words or conduct or usage. . . . There is no law peculiar to this branch of the contract of a common carrier. There is no law in it, except the elementary and general principles applicable to all contracts, that a contract is a mutual understanding, and that a party may be estopped to deny that his understanding was such as he induced the other to believe it to be. All the rest of the question whether by an implied contract a carrier undertook to carry goods beyond his route, is a question of fact to be determined upon the evidence by the tribunal authorized to try the questions of fact involved in the issue.

How can so plain a question of fact be changed into a question of law? In Muschamp v. L. & P. J. R. Co., 8 M. & W. 421 (decided in 1841, and everywhere accepted as the leading case on this subject), it was held to be a question of fact. A parcel directed to a place beyond the defendants' route, and carried by them through their route and forwarded, was afterwards lost. Baron ROLFE "stated to the jury, in summing up, that where a common carrier takes into his care a parcel directed to a particular place, and does not by positive agreement limit his responsibility to a part only of the distance, that is prima facie evidence of an undertaking on his part to carry the parcel to the place to which it is directed: and that the same rule applied, although that place were beyond the limits within which he in general professed to carry on his trade of a carrier." The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendants moved "for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection." In the Exchequer, "Lord ABINGER, C. B. — The simple question in this case is, whether the learned judge misdirected the jury in telling them that if the case were stripped of all other circumstances beyond the mere fact of knowledge by the party that the defendants were carriers only from Lancaster to Preston, and if, under such circumstances, they accepted a parcel to be carried on to a more distant place, they were liable for the loss of it, this being evidence whence the jury might infer that they undertook to carry it in safety to that place. I think that in this proposition there was no misdirection. . . . The question is, Why should the jury infer one of these contracts rather than the other? Which of the two is the most natural, the most usual, the most probable? . . . The whole matter is therefore a question for the jury, to determine what the contract was on the evidence before them. . . .

GURNEY, B. — I think there was no misdirection in this case, and that the jury might fairly infer the contract was such as was stated by the learned judge."

In this explicit manner the undertaking of the carrier to be responsible for the delivery of the parcel beyond his own route was held to be a pure question of fact, to be determined by the jury on the evidence. There was such an undertaking, if both parties so understood it. Whether there was such an understanding, was plainly a question of fact, and no attempt was made to change it into a question of law. It was submitted to the jury by Baron ROLFE, and the only point decided by the Court was, that it was a question of fact which must be submitted to the jury.

When Baron ROLFE told the jury that the evidence in the case was prima facie evidence of such an undertaking, by these words he held the undertaking to be a matter of fact to be proved by evidence. In saying that the evidence was prima facie evidence of the fact, he merely expressed his opinion of the weight of the evidence, in accordance with the general custom of English judges. State v. Hodge, 50 N. H. 519, 522, 525. In their practice, such opinions are given in various forms. Where we should say, "There is some evidence to be submitted to the jury," English judges often say, "The evidence proves," or "The weight of the evidence is," or "From the evidence the inference is," or "The presumption is," or "This is prima facie evidence," or "This evidence shifts the burden of proof," or "This evidence is sufficient to prove the fact unless it is rebutted by the other party." And when exception is taken to such statements, the point intended to be raised by counsel and decided by the Court is, not whether the judge may rightfully give the jury his opinion of the evidence in such forms (that is taken for granted), but whether there is any evidence for him to give his opinion of, and for the jury to give their verdict upon. . . . The opinions of English judges on the weight of the evidence being constantly given in such expressions as "From this evidence the inference (or presumption) is," or "This is prima facie evidence," or other equivalent phrases, these expressions, having been used for ages in the trial of cases by jury, became the common judicial language used in delivering judgment on motions for new trials as well as in summing up to the jury. Muschamp v. L. & P. J. R. Co. is an instance of this practice. On the motion for a new trial, in Muschamp v. L. & P. J. R. Co., Lord ABINGER, delivering judgment, said the undertaking alleged by the plaintiff "is the most likely contract under the circumstances." In saying this he no more undertook to state a rule of law than Mr. Justice BAYLEY did when he told the jury, in King v. Diggles (50 N. H. 520), that "it was not very likely" that an old man would sell his spectacles. . . . "The whole matter," says he, "is therefore a question for the jury, to determine what the contract was on the evidence before them."

But the decision in that case has often been misunderstood. It has been erroneously supposed that the opinions of ROLFE and ABINGER, on the prima facie weight of the evidence, were laid down as law. Through that error, the decision has been taken as the establishment of a peculiar legal principle fixing the liability of common carriers beyond their own routes, although it was held, with remarkable clearness and emphasis, that the whole matter was a question of fact for the jury.

By such a mistake, and others of a similar kind, a plain question of fact may inadvertently be changed into a question of law. The mistake in regard to the doctrine of Muschamp's case, on the point of prima facie evidence, was promoted, and another mistake was disseminated, by the reporters who made the head note of the case, by adding to a summary of the evidence this unfortunate statement: "HELD, that the Lancaster and Preston Railway Company were liable for the loss." If they had said "HELD, by the jury, that the company were liable. HELD, by the Court, that there was evidence competent to be submitted to the jury," they would have made a correct and useful statement of the case. In Angell on Carriers, § 95, it is said that in Muschamp's case "it was held that the company were liable for the loss," from which the reader would understand that it was so held by the Court.

It has been by no means an unusual thing for fact to be turned into law by the English practice of the judge giving the jury his opinion of the evidence. State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 438; Lisbon v. Lyman, 49 N. H. 572; State v. Hodge, 50 N. H. 521. . . .

The simple solution of all the difficulties that have arisen on this subject is, not to hold fact to be law, and not to mistake the opinions of judges on the weight of evidence for opinions on principles of law.

The perplexity of some American authorities, growing out of a misapprehension of Muschamp's case, makes it necessary, in examining all the authorities, English and American, to observe critically how the question arose in each particular case, — whether it was submitted to the jury or any other tribunal as a question of fact, whether the real doctrine of Muschamp's case was understood, whether the attention of the Court was called to the distinction between law and fact . . . [examining them].

These are the principal English cases usually cited on the question of a carrier's liability beyond his own route. They show that, in England, when there is no paper to be construed by the Court as a contract in writing, — when the undertaking of the carrier to carry beyond his own route is to be inferred or implied from circumstantial evidence, — the question is one of fact. They also show that, upon the evidence usually introduced on that question of fact, the jury and the Court habitually arrive at the same conclusion. . . . And with a tendency to allow settled fact to grow into law, and in the absence of a universal habit of critically and inflexibly preserving the distinction between law and fact, it is not unlikely that the finding of the jury, recorded as the head note in Muschamp's case, will eventually be regarded as the statement of a principle of English law. . . .

These [enumerating and stating them] are some of the principal American cases usually cited on the question of the liability of a carrier beyond his own route, in the absence of an express written contract. Some of them are not in point. Many contain nothing but dicta on the subject. Some turn on writings held to be, or treated as, express contracts, the construction of which by the Court shows the understanding of the parties, without the finding of a jury on parol or circumstantial evidence. Some are based on the mistake of supposing that in Muschamp's case the defendants were held liable by the Court as a matter of law. Some are controlled or influenced by the mistake of supposing that in Muschamp's case the opinions of the judges on the prima facie weight of the evidence were opinions on the law. It would seem that in no one of them has the question been held to be, or been treated as, a question of law, where it was claimed to be a question of fact, or where the attention of the Court was called to the distinction between law and fact, — a distinction which has been clouded by misapprehensions of Muschamp's case. In nearly all of them, when there is no decisive contract in writing, it is held to be, or practically treated as, a question of fact. There is much in the American authorities going strongly to show that Lord ABINGER was right, and there is nothing in them having any considerable tendency to show that he was wrong, when he said, in Muschamp's case, "The whole matter is therefore a question for the jury to determine what the contract was, on the evidence before them." . . .

Upon the question of the understanding of the parties in this case, it may be doubtful whether the mere reception by the defendants of the parcel, directed to a place beyond their route, is evidence of an undertaking to carry the parcel to that place, or to be responsible for its carriage beyond Boston. . . . No such mutual understanding, binding the defendants to carry the plaintiff's parcel beyond Boston, was found by the judge who tried the facts in this case. . . .

The judge who tried the case found a general verdict for the defendants, and there must be Judgment on the verdict.

TRESPASS on the Case for negligence. Heard on petition of defendant for re-argument, after denial of its petition for new trial. Petition dismissed.

TILLINGHAST, J. — This case was very fully and carefully considered by the Court before rendering the decision now complained of by defendant's counsel, and, after reading his brief in support of his motion for a re-argument, we fail to see that he has pointed out any error committed by the Court in said decision.

Counsel criticises the rule adopted by the Court that "where the evidence is conflicting, the case is one which is peculiarly within the province of the jury to decide;" contending that under such a broad rule the Appellate Division could in no case consider a petition for new trial, based upon the ground of the verdict being against the evidence, because every case has two sides, and there must of necessity be conflicting testimony in every case. He argues, further, that the law does not contemplate such a rigid rule, and that it is only in cases where the testimony is sufficiently conflicting to make it doubtful where the preponderance may be that the Court would refuse to interfere with the verdict.

The rule which the Court adopted — or rather followed — is, and always has been, the rule which controls in petitions for new trials, not only in this State, but wherever the common law is in force. Questions of fact are for the jury to try and determine. And where the evidence as to the existence of those facts which are put in issue is conflicting, and of such a character that fair-minded men might honestly differ as to the result thereof, the verdict of the jury is final and conclusive. . . .

And this is so, even though the Court or another jury might come to a different conclusion upon the same state of facts. The cases, both reported and unreported, in this State are numerous and uniform in support of this doctrine. See, by way of illustration, Watson v. Tripp, 11 R. I. 98; Boss v. R. R. Co., 15 R. I. 149; East Greenwich Inst. for Savings v. Kenyon, 20 R. I. 110.

The language of the former rescript criticised by counsel, does not mean that where there is merely a technical or nominal conflict in the testimony the Court may not reverse the finding of the jury; for no Court of last resort ever adopts such a rule. A mere scintilla is never sufficient to sustain a verdict, or, according to the modern rule, even to warrant the trial Court in submitting the case to the jury; Commissioners v. Clarke, 94 U. S. p. 284; Bouv. Law Dict. vol. 2, 959–60. Nor is a slight amount of direct and positive evidence on one side sufficient to sustain a verdict based thereon, where the evidence opposed to it is strong and convincing and very clearly of greater weight. All that the Court meant by the use of the language criticised, and all that any Court means thereby — for it is a most common expression in opinions upon petitions for new trials — was that the testimony, the positive and substantial testimony introduced by the respective parties to the case, at the trial thereof, was so conflicting that the Court could not say that the verdict was clearly and palpably wrong. And under the decision of this Court in Johnson v. Blanchard, 5 R. I. 24, which has been repeatedly reaffirmed, a verdict cannot be set aside unless the evidence "very strongly preponderates" against it.

In the opinion of a majority of the Court the evidence in this case did not so preponderate, but on the other hand was sufficient to sustain the verdict. The defendant's motion for re-argument is therefore denied and dismissed.

SUPREME COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE. 1909

EXCEPTIONS from Superior Court, Coos County; PIKE, Judge.

Fred Forbes was convicted of forgery, and he brings exceptions. Overruled.

Indictment, charging that the defendant, on December 4, 1908, "did falsely make and counterfeit a certain American Express money order for the payment of money, purporting to be made and signed by one W. A. Davids, assistant agent, for the sum of $50, . . . with intent that some person should be defrauded." Trial by jury and verdict of guilty. The defendant moved for his discharge upon the ground that there was no evidence upon which it could be found that he falsely made and counterfeited the order in Coos County. The motion was denied, and he excepted. After verdict the Court imposed sentence, but stayed execution pending the determination of the question of law reserved. The State's evidence tended to prove that on Wednesday or Thursday in the week ending August 15, 1908, the defendant was seen in company with one Wilhelm at the Windham Junction station of the Boston & Maine Railroad. The railroad agent at that station does business for the American Express Company, "issuing orders, filling out freight," etc. Wilhelm bought of the agent an express order for $1. On August 15th, after Forbes and Wilhelm had disappeared, the station agent discovered that a book containing twenty blank money orders had been stolen from the office. There was evidence that the theft was committed by Forbes and Wilhelm. All orders of the American Express Company are issued in blank books of twenty or more, each bearing a serial number which has no duplicate. One of the blank orders in the stolen book bore the serial number 8–3265268. After the disappearance of Forbes from Windham Junction, he was next seen at Lancaster, on September 4th. How long he had been there did not appear. While in Lancaster he went into a store and bargained for some clothing, for which he agreed to pay $28, and offered in payment therefor an American Express money order for $50, like the one set forth in the indictment, bearing the serial number 8–3265268, with the addition that it bore upon its back the indorsement "Paul N. Mertha, Jr." . . .

J. Howard Wight, Sol., and Drew, Jordan, Shurtleff & Morris, for the State. Sullivan & Daley and Burritt H. Hinman, for defendant.

Bingham, J. — To sustain a conviction of the crime of forgery, as in other crimes, it should appear that it was committed in the county where the offence is laid; and according to the weight of authority proof of that fact is sufficiently made out to entitle the State to go to the jury, if nothing further appears than that the person charged with the offence is shown to have uttered the forged instrument in the county where the indictment is found. Spencer v. Commonwealth, 2 Leigh (Va.) 751; State v. Poindexter, 23 W. Va. 805; State v. Morgan, 19 N. C. 348; Johnson v. State, 35 Ala. 370; Bland v. People, 3 Scam. (Ill.) 364; State v. Blanchard, 74 Iowa 628; United States v. Britton, 2 Mason 464, 469, 470, Fed. Cas. No. 14,650; Rex v. Parkes, 2 East, Pleas of the Crown, 992; s. c., 2 Russell, Crimes (2d ed.) 371; 2 Leach, Crown Law, 898, 909. In other words, proof that the forged instrument was uttered by the forger in the county where the indictment was found, if unanswered, is sufficient to sustain the verdict of a jury that the crime was there committed.

If this is the law (and we see no reason for thinking that it is not), it would seem that the situation would not cease to present a question of fact for the jury, and become a question of law for the Court, if other evidence should be introduced upon which a contrary finding might be predicated, and that the cases above cited, to the extent that they present a contrary view, are not to be followed. It is said in those cases "that the place where an instrument is found or offered in a forged state affords prima facie evidence, or a presumption, that the instrument was forged there, unless that presumption is repelled by some other fact in the case;" and in Commonwealth v. Costley, 118 Mass. 1, 26, it is said that this is all that was decided in Commonwealth v. Parmenter, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 279, the case relied upon by the defendant. If the terms "prima facie evidence or presumption," as there employed, mean, as we understand they do, that such evidence answers the legal requirements of proof authorizing a submission of the question to the jury (King v. Hopkins, 57 N. H. 334, 359), then it does not follow that, in case countervailing proof is put in evidence, the Court would be warranted in withdrawing the question from the jury; for the weight to be given the evidence is for them to pass upon, and presents no question of law, and if a verdict is rendered which is against the weight of the evidence, the injured party's remedy is to seasonably apply to the trial Court to have the verdict set aside. The true rule, as stated by Wigmore, is: Are there facts in evidence which, if unanswered, would justify men of ordinary reason and fairness in affirming the question which the plaintiff is bound to maintain? If there are, he has passed the judge, and may properly claim that the jury be allowed to consider his case. 4 Wigmore, Evidence, §§ 2494, 2513.

As it is conceded that the defendant forged the order and uttered it at Lancaster, in the County of Coos, there was sufficient evidence from which it could be found that the crime of forgery was there committed; and this, irrespective of the fact whether there was or was not other evidence tending to disprove such a conclusion.

Exception overruled. All concurred.

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1892

140 Ill. 59; 29 N. E. 706

APPEAL from the Appellate Court for the Second District; — heard in that Court on appeal from the Circuit Court of Kane County; the Hon. ISAAC G. WILSON, Judge, presiding.

This is an action on the case begun on April 23, 1888, by the appellee against the appellant company in the Circuit Court of Kane County to recover damages for a personal injury, which resulted in the amputation of one of the appellee's legs and the mangling of the other, in tearing his ribs from the breast bone, in inflicting internal injuries and in completly shattering his nervous system. The plea was not guilty. The first trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $15,000.00. A new trial was granted. The second trial has resulted in verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $14,000.00. This judgment has been affirmed by the Appellate Court, and the judgment of the latter Court is brought here for review by appeal. . . . After the plaintiff below had introduced his evidence and rested, the defendant — the appellant here — moved to exclude the plaintiff's evidence. This motion was overruled, and exception was taken. The action of the trial Court in thus overruling the motion of the defendant to exclude all of the plaintiff's evidence, so made at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, and not afterwards, is the only error now insisted upon by appellant's counsel; except the claim that the damages are excessive.

Williams, Holt & Wheeler, for the appellant. The Circuit Court should have allowed defendant's motion to take the case from the jury, on the ground that by plaintiff's own showing he knew the hazard, and so was not entitled to recover. . . .

A. J. Hopkins, F. H. Thatcher, and N. J. Aldrich, for the appellee. The motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence is in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, and subject to the same rules and requirements. . . .

Mr. Chief Justice MAGRUDER (after stating the case as above) delivered the opinion of the Court. . . .

A motion to exclude the evidence operates as a demurrer to the evidence. Where the defendant demurs to the plaintiff's evidence, he must be held to admit not only all that the plaintiff's testimony proves, but all that it tends to prove. The demurrer not only admits the truth of the testimony demurred to, but all the conclusions of fact which a jury may fairly draw therefrom. The testimony is to be taken most strongly against the party demurring, and whatever inferences a jury would be entitled to draw the Court ought to draw. The object of the demurrer is to refer to the Court the law arising from facts. . . . Hence, if there is evidence tending to prove the issues in favor of the plaintiff, the judgment must be in his favor, or, what amounts to the same thing under the more recent practice, the motion to exclude must be overruled. If, therefore, the record in this case was in such shape as to present for our consideration the question of law whether the evidence, that had been introduced by the plaintiff below when he rested his case, was or was not sufficient to justify a recovery, or establish a cause of action, we would be obliged to examine such evidence in order to determine the question thus presented.

But we do not think that the appellant is in a position to urge before this Court, that the trial Court erred in refusing to sustain its motion to exclude the evidence of the plaintiff below. When the motion was overruled the defendant below did not stand by the motion; on the contrary, it proceeded to introduce testimony to contradict the proofs of the plaintiff; and, after the introduction of its own testimony, it did not renew its motion to exclude, nor did it ask the Court to instruct the jury to find for the defendant, but allowed the case to go to the jury under instructions framed upon the theory that there was such a conflict in the evidence as to justify the jury in passing upon it. Where a defendant, whose motion to exclude plaintiff's evidence, made as soon as plaintiff rests, is overruled, fails to stand by such motion, or to renew it when all the testimony is in, or to request that the jury be instructed to find for the defendant, but introduces testimony of his own to contradict the case made by the plaintiff, and requests that the jury be instructed to pass upon the issues involved and to determine them according to the preponderance of the evidence, he thereby waives his right to object to the action of the Court in overruling his motion, and is estopped from assigning such action as error in a Court of review.

This conclusion necessarily follows from the observations already made upon the nature of such a motion, which operates as a demurrer to the evidence. When a defendant demurs to a declaration and his demurrer is overruled, he has two courses before him. He can either stand by his demurrer and suffer judgment to go against him, trusting to the upper Court to sustain his position, or he can plead to the declaration and go to trial. If he does the latter, he loses any rights which he might have had under his demurrer if he had stood by it. We see no reason why the same rule should not apply in the case of a motion by the defendant to exclude the plaintiff's evidence, when such motion is made as soon as the plaintiff rests his case. A motion of this kind is a substitute for the old practice of filing a demurrer to the evidence, which set out all the facts admitted, and was expressed in the formal language of the ordinary demurrer. The plaintiff then joined in the demurrer, or refused to join therein, according to the ruling of the Court. Inasmuch as the demurrer admits all the facts stated in it to be true, and admits also all the inferences which can be properly drawn from the facts, and merely claims that the testimony is not sufficient in law to enable the plaintiff to maintain his action, the defendant necessarily withdraws his admissions when he neglects to stand by his demurrer after it is overruled, and proceeds to introduce witnesses to contradict the very evidence which he has just admitted to be true. The action of the Court in ruling upon the demurrer to the evidence is based upon defendant's admission that the facts established by the evidence are true. When the defendant no longer admits such facts to be true but tries to prove that they are false, he ought to be held to have waived any error based upon the admissions thus withdrawn. . . . When the testimony of the defendant is introduced the case made by the plaintiff may have been strengthened, and its defects, if any existed, may have been cured. Very often the cross-examination of the defendant's witnesses brings out facts favorable to the plaintiff's cause of action which the latter could not otherwise obtain. When all the evidence is in on both sides, an entirely different case may be presented from that which existed when the plaintiff rested. Even though a motion to exclude plaintiff's evidence made at the close of his case may have been improperly overruled, yet the evidence on both sides when considered all together may show so clearly, that the cause depends upon the effect or weight of testimony, as not only to justify but to require the jury to pass upon it. Would it be right for this Court to reverse a judgment for error in overruling such a motion, if it could plainly see that the case was one for the jury in view of all the testimony presented by both sides, and that it was properly submitted to the jury under instructions applicable to a controverted state of facts? We think not.

If the defendant in this case felt confidence in the position, that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff established no cause of action, it should have stood by its motion. . . . What matters it that it would have been wrong to submit the case to the jury upon the plaintiff's evidence alone, if it was right to submit it upon the plaintiff's evidence and the defendant's evidence together? . . . They [defendant's counsel] nowhere claim, or ask us to hold, that the case was not properly submitted to the jury upon all the evidence presented on both sides. Their sole contention is, that the plaintiff when he rested had not made a case, and that the trial Court erred in not sustaining the motion then made to exclude plaintiff's evidence without reference to the bearing, or effect on the issues, of the evidence subsequently introduced; and that, for this alleged error alone, we must reverse the cause irrespective of anything that occurred after such motion was overruled, and no matter upon what theory or upon what kind of instructions the case was finally submitted. We are unable to concur in this view.

It is claimed that the doctrine herein announced is opposed to the weight of authority. After a careful examination of all the cases decided by this Court, to which we have been referred, we see nothing in them inconsistent with the views here expressed.[1] . . . Under our practice, the trial Court cannot order a peremptory non-suit against the will of the plaintiff, though the motion of the defendant to exclude plaintiff's evidence on the ground of its insufficiency to support a verdict will, when granted, have the same effect as an enforced non-suit and may be almost said to be equivalent thereto. (Poleman v. Johnson, 84 Ill. 269.) Under the English practice, however, the defendant may, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, apply for a non-suit against the plaintiff, if it is claimed that there is not evidence upon which the jury can reasonably and properly find a verdict; and it has been held in several English cases, that the judge may use the evidence introduced by the defendant, in order to determine whether he will grant a non-suit or not, or in order to change his ruling already made upon an application for a non-suit. (Davis v. Hardy, 6 Barn. & Cress. 225; Giblin v. McMullin, Law Rep. 2 Privy Council Appeals, 317.) If, under these authorities, the evidence of the defendant may be considered in connection with that of the plaintiff in order to decide whether or not the plaintiff has made such a case as should be submitted to a jury, then when a record shows that testimony was introduced by both plaintiff and defendant, it should be made to appear to this Court, by proper rulings obtained from the trial Court, that the plaintiff was not entitled to go to the jury upon all the evidence, before we will reverse upon the alleged ground that the case ought to have been taken from the jury. . . .

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Topic 2. Specific Presumptions

765. Cogdell v. R. Co. (1903. North Carolina. 132 N. C. 852; 44 S. E. 618.) Walker, J. — The Court was requested to charge that there was a presumption that the deceased had exercised care, which the Court refused to give, but charged the jury that there was an inference that due care was exercised. The presumption has a technical force or weight, and the jury, in the absence of sufficient proof to overcome it, should find according to the presumption; but, in case of a mere inference, there is no technical force attached to it. The jury,

S. 202, 12 Sup. 591 (1892): The question of the sufficiency of the evidence for the plaintiff to support his action cannot be considered by this Court. It has repeatedly been decided that a request for a ruling that upon the evidence introduced the plaintiff is not entitled to recover cannot be made by the defendant, as a matter of right, unless at the close of the whole evidence; and that if the defendant, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, and without resting his own case, requests and is refused such a ruling, the refusal cannot be assigned for error. — Ed.]

in the case of an inference, are at liberty to find the ultimate fact one way or the other as they may be impressed by the testimony. In the one case the law draws a conclusion from the state of the pleadings and evidence, and in the other case the jury draw it. An inference is nothing more than a permissible deduction from the evidence, while a presumption is compulsory and cannot be disregarded by the jury.

766. STATE v. HODGE

50 N. H. 510

INDICTMENT, for breaking and entering the dwelling-house of one James Call, in the night-time, and stealing a gold watch and chain. Verdict, guilty; and motion of the defendant for a new trial.

The evidence tended to prove the following facts: The house had been broken and entered in the night. The next morning, when the watch and chain were missed, the house occupied by the defendant was searched, and the watch and chain were found (with two bits, a chisel, and a spirit-level, which belonged to Call, and which he had kept in his shop in front of his house) in a straw bed owned by one Howe, the father of Mrs. Call, in a back chamber adjoining the room in which the defendant slept. There was no access to the back chamber, except through a door which led into the defendant's sleeping-room. The back chamber was not hired or occupied by the defendant; but Howe and Call kept sundry things there, and they and others had access to it occasionally. It was not under lock and key. To enter it, it would be necessary to go through the lower kitchen, occupied by the defendant, then through an entry, and up a pair of stairs, and through his sleeping-room. In his bed in his sleeping-room, under the pillows and under the sheets, was found a small piece of upper leather which Call claimed, and which the defendant admitted he had stolen. The defendant also admitted he had stolen some sole leather from Call, which he had used in tapping his boots, saying he had taken the leather to get even with Call. The defendant had worked for Call, and had had some difficulty with him about his labor.

The defendant excepted to the refusal of the Court to instruct the jury that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize a verdict against him.

Burke, for the respondent. In this case, the State relies on the possession, by the respondent, of the articles alleged to be stolen, for conviction on the charge of breaking, entering, and stealing, set forth in the indictment. Possession of stolen goods, which will justify conviction, must be recent and exclusive. . . .

Colby, solicitor for the State.

DOE, J. — The defendant's counsel claims that "the State relies on the possession by the respondent of the articles alleged to be stolen;" that "possession of stolen goods, which will justify conviction, must be recent and exclusive;" that "the State has not actually proved either possession by the respondent of the articles alleged to be stolen, or occupancy of the room in which they were found, much less exclusive possession;" and that the Court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as requested, that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize a verdict against him.

It has been generally understood, that the prisoner's exclusive and unexplained possession of stolen property recently after the theft, raises the presumption that he is the thief, and that this presumption takes the burden of proof from the prosecutor and lays it upon the prisoner. 2 East, Pleas of the Crown, 656; Roscoe, Criminal Evidence, 18; J. F. Stephen, Criminal Law, 303, 304; 1 Bennett and Heard, Leading Cases, 360–372, 1st ed.; and cases cited in 2 Bishop, Criminal Procedure, § 701. When the defendant's possession of stolen property has been the only evidence relied upon to convict him, judges have directed an acquittal because they held the possession was not recent, or was not exclusive, or was explained. Trials have proceeded upon the ground that it was for the Court to determine whether the possession proved was recent enough, or exclusive enough, or explained enough, to shift the burden of proof, and that, if the burden of proof was not thus shifted by the Court, the defendant was entitled to an acquittal. The Court has decided, not whether there was any evidence, however slight, to be submitted to the jury, but whether there was a presumption which shifted the burden of proof. This practice was formerly so common, that it came to be regarded as the application of a rule of law, and is so laid down in many books of high authority.

In this case, the defendant claims that the evidence does not bring him within the supposed rule in relation to possession of stolen property, and that the Court should have ordered his acquittal. It becomes necessary, therefore, to inquire whether there is any such rule of law as has been supposed, and what the rule is, if there is one, and whether this case comes within it.

It is obvious, at the outset, that if there is such a rule, the presumption which it draws from the evidence must be a presumption of law declared by the Court, as distinguished from a presumption of fact found by the jury. The first practical difficulty in the way of making it a presumption of law is the impossibility of inventing a rule by which to determine whether the possession is recent or not. Cockin's Case, 2 Lewin C. C. 235, was an indictment for stealing two sacks, found in the defendant's possession about twenty days after they were missed; COLERIDGE, J., said to the jury:

"If I was now to lose my watch, and in a few minutes it was to be found on the person of one of you, it would afford the strongest ground for presuming that you had stolen it; but if a month hence it were to be found in your possession, the presumption of your having stolen it would be greatly weakened, because stolen property usually passes through many hands."

In a valuable note to this case, the reporter says:

"The question, however, of distance of time and recent possession must be at all times one of fact under the circumstances, and a jury under the judge's direction must decide." . . .

"What shall be considered a recent possession, cannot be absolutely determined by any rule, but must depend not only upon the mere lapse of time, but upon the nature of the articles stolen, and the considerations whether they are of a description likely to pass rapidly from hand to hand, or such as the party might, from his situation in life, or the nature of his vocation, become innocently possessed of." Burrill, Circumstantial Evidence, 448; Best on Presumptions, § 305; Best on Evidence, § 211; 3 Greenleaf Evidence, § 32; 2 Bishop Criminal Procedure, § 701; Bennett & Hurd, Leading Cases, 366, 1st ed. . . .

Is it the duty of the Court, or the duty of the jury, to determine whether, in view of the nature of the property, the possession is recent enough to raise the presumption? This duty has frequently been performed by the Court. Courts governed by precedent can easily find precedent enough to put that duty upon them. But whenever a judge, in the discharge of that duty, undertakes to charge a jury, he practically demonstrates, and virtually admits, that there is no rule of law on the subject. He does not say to the jury, "There is a general rule of law, or a legal presumption, applicable to all kinds of property;" but he must say, in substance, "There is a general rule of law which finds guilt from the recent possession of stolen property; but whether the possession is recent or not, depends upon the nature of the property. There is no general rule of law which divides the infinite varieties of property into three hundred and sixty-five or any other number of kinds, and requires you or me to draw the presumption, from the possession of one kind one day after the theft, from the possession of another kind two days after, and so on to the end of the list; that allotment of time and variety is left to my judgment; and, in my judgment, the time and variety, in this case, are sufficient to raise the presumption; this presumption, found by me, is binding upon you." It is useless to call such a presumption a presumption of law. Call it what we may, it is a presumption of fact. . . .

These [precedents cited] are mere instances and illustrations of the general practice of the judge giving to the jury his opinion on the facts; and this general practice, probably, is the chief origin of the supposed legal presumption drawn from the possession of stolen property. When judges, following the common practice of giving the jury their opinions of the facts and the weight of the evidence, had charged juries year after year, for a great length of time, that possession of stolen property was presumptive evidence of guilt, or raised a presumption of guilt, this form of judicial instruction finally came to be considered as the law of the land. Whether it was matter of fact or matter of law was practically immaterial, the influence of the Court upon the jury being then generally overwhelming in cases that touched no political prejudice or sympathy. Being constantly repeated by the Court, it naturally acquired the position and strength of an established dogma. . . .

To whatever extent matter of fact involved in the issue is held to be matter of law, to that extent the constitutional system of trial by jury is destroyed; and when part is destroyed, the remainder is put in jeopardy. One precedent is held to justify another. Every matter of fact turned into law, opens the way for a further annexation of the province of the jury to the province of the Court, and a gradual absorption. None the less dangerous is the process because it has been going on for a long time. . . .

The English doctrine of presuming malice or criminal intent as a matter of law in certain cases may have grown out of the judicial practice of advising the jury on the weight of the evidence — a practice continued so long that the true character of the presumption as an inference of fact passed into oblivion. Lisbon v. Lyman, 49 N. H. 576. . . . An immense mass of authorities (Burrill, Circumstantial Evidence, 48, 49; 1 Bennett and Heard, Leading Cases, 347–360; 2 ibid. 504–538; 1 ibid. 295–362, 2d ed.) was overthrown by the decision in State v. Bartlett, 43 N. H. 232, 233, 234, where the presumption of malice in homicide was held to be a presumption of fact, and a long step was taken towards the rectification of the doctrine of presumptions, and its establishment upon ground consistent with the constitutional trial by jury. . . . The decision in State v. Bartlett struck out of our books a vast number of ancient and modern authorities, and submitted to the jury, as a question of fact, a subject which had long been studied as a question of law. If, by virtue of that precedent, the law should be still more simplified and sound constitutional principle still further advanced, the profession would be relieved and justice promoted.

Whether the defendant, in this case, had any possession of the watch and chain, at any time, either when they were found or before; whether his possession, if any he had, was recent enough, or exclusive enough, or unexplained enough, to raise a presumption of guilt, — were questions of fact for the jury. There was some evidence to be submitted to the jury on those questions. If the jury found the defendant had the property in his possession after it was stolen, that fact was evidence against him. If they found an absence of explanatory evidence on his side, under circumstances which tended to show he could furnish such evidence, that fact was additional evidence against him. Rex v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 161, 162; 1 Phillipps, Evidence, 598, 599, 4th Am. ed.; J. F. Stephen, Criminal Law, 303. But if those facts were found, there was no presumption of law, nor was the burden of proof shifted. The State, in the indictment, made an affirmation of the defendant's guilt which the defendant traversed in his plea. The State had the affirmative, and the burden of proof which belongs to the affirmative. The question, from the beginning to the end of the trial, was, whether the affirmative allegation of guilt was proved by the testimony introduced on both sides, and by the evidence which consists of the non-production of testimony, not including the refusal of the defendant to testify, if there was such a refusal. The Court rightly refused to instruct the jury as requested.

Judgment on the verdict.

767. ROSS v. COTTON MILLS

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA. 1905

140 N. C. 115; 52 S. E. 121

ACTION by M. C. Ross against the Double Shoals Cotton Mills, for personal injury sustained by plaintiff while operating a lapper in defendant company's mill; . . . heard by Judge M. H. JUSTICE and a jury, at the Spring Term, 1905, of the Superior Court of Cleveland. From a judgment of nonsuit, the plaintiff appealed.

Webb & Mull and D. F. Morrow, for the plaintiff. O. F. Mason and Ryburn & Hoey, for the defendant.

CONNOR, J. . . . The plaintiff, in the employment of the defendant, was on the day of the injury operating a lapper in defendant's cotton mill. The motive power was applied by a belt running over a pulley on the machine attached to another pulley overhead working upon shafting connected with the power. When it was desired to stop the machine for any purpose, the belt was removed or shifted from the tight to the loose pulley by means of the belt shifter. If the machine became choked with the cotton passing through the beater, and it became necessary to clean it, or remove the cotton, it is stopped by throwing the belt from the tight to the loose pulley, this being done by a shifter. If in proper condition it will remain motionless until the belt is thrown back on to the tight pulley. While machine is in motion, there are parts in which the hand of the operator may be put without injury; there are other parts in which the beater shaft revolves very rapidly. Plaintiff's witness, Gilliam, says that two years ago when he left the mill the lapper was all right and in good condition. The plaintiff says that on the 11th day of July, 1904, he was operating the lapper, that it became choked and "the belt ran off the big pulley," that he carded the belt off and put belt grease on it to prevent belt from running off. In five or ten minutes it choked again, that he stopped the machine with the belt shifter and carried some cotton back to the hopper. Champion went to the opposite side, raised the cap from the beater, and the plaintiff put his hand into the beater bars to get the cotton out. The machine, by some unknown means, started and tore his arm off. . . .

With the light afforded us, but one of three possible explanations of the unexpected starting of the machine occurs to our minds; either

Champion accidentally struck the shifter and threw the belt on to the tight pulley, or the plaintiff, in moving about the machine, did so; or there was some defect in the belt or shifter.

It is elementary learning that the defendant is not liable for the movement of the belt, unless, either by the negligent conduct of some employee not a fellow servant or by some defect in the condition of the shifter, it worked back and threw the belt on to the tight pulley. In this condition of the case, what shall be done? The defendant has charge of the machinery and its operation except in so far as the plaintiff, in the discharge of his duty, had such charge. The plaintiff is suddenly and unexpectedly caught in the machine, struck dumb, his arm torn off, paralyzed. Conceding that there is no direct evidence of a defect in the machine or any of its parts, is the plaintiff driven to a nonsuit? Or may he, upon the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur," have his case submitted to the jury to say whether there be actionable negligence which is the proximate cause of his injury? . . .

While the rule has not been, in express terms, often applied in this State, it is by no means new or of unusual application. Professor Wigmore says that, for a generation at least, in England it has been conceded to exist "for some classes of cases at least." In 1865, ERLE, C. J., in Scott v. London Dock Co., 3 H. & C. (Com. L. R. U. S. 134) said:

"There must be some evidence of negligence, but when the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants and the accident is such that, as in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management use the proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care."

The limitations governing the application of the rule are thus stated by Wigmore (§ 2509):

"(1) The apparatus must be such that, in the ordinary instance, no injurious operation is to be expected, unless from a careless construction, inspection or user. (2) Both inspection and user must have been, at the time of the injury, in the control of the party charged. (3) The injurious occurrence or condition must have happened irrespective of any voluntary action, at the time, by the party injured."

The underlying reason for the rule is that usually the chief evidence of the true cause of procedure is practically accessible to the defendant, but inaccessible to the person injured. It is for this reason that in some cases the Legislature has made the fact of injury "presumptive evidence" and in others a "prima facie" case. . . .

To prevent any misconstruction of the circumstances under which or the manner in which this principle applies in the trial of causes, we wish to restate: . . . It does not in any degree affect or modify the elementary principle that the burden of the issue is on the plaintiff. WALKER, J., in Stewart v. Carpet Co., 138 N. C. 60, clearly states the law in this respect:

"The doctrine does not dispense with the requirement that the party who alleges negligence must prove the fact, but relates only to the mode of proving it. The fact of the accident furnishes merely some evidence to go to the jury which requires the defendant 'to go forward with his proof.' The rule of 'res ipsa loquitur' does not relieve the plaintiff of the burden of showing negligence, nor does it raise any presumption in his favor."

The suggestion has been made in argument of cases at this term that, when the rule applies, it is the duty of the Court to instruct the jury that proof which calls the rule into action constitutes a "prima facie" case, or raises a presumption of negligence. This is a misapprehension both of the principle upon which the rule is founded and its application. It must be conceded that expressions are used in cases . . . which give color to the suggestion. . . . So learned and accurate a jurist as Judge GASTON, in Ellis v. Railroad, 24 N. C. 138 (being the first time that we find the rule declared in this Court), refers to it as making out, when applicable, a "prima facie" case. SMITH, C. J., in Aycock v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 323, quotes with the approval the language used in Ellis' case, supra. . . . When a breach of duty is shown which is the proximate cause of the injury, a verdict follows for the plaintiff, unless exculpatory circumstances are shown. It is only, as here, when there is no direct evidence of a defect in the machine, and the physical conditions surrounding the transaction do not ordinarily produce injury, that the occurrence speaks for itself.

Such conditions are shown to exist in this case. . . . The law says that the plaintiff is entitled to have a jury pass upon the physical facts and condition, and to say whether in their opinion he has made good his allegation of actionable negligence. The defendant may, or may not, introduce evidence as it is advised. By failing to do so, it admits nothing, but simply takes the risk of non-persuasion. This is what is meant by "going foreward" with testimony. He, by this course, says that he is willing to go to the jury upon the plaintiff's evidence. . . .

The judgment of nonsuit must be set aside and a new trial had.

New trial.

768. CONTINENTAL INSURANCE CO. v. CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN R. CO.

SUPREME COURT OF MINNESOTA. 1906

97 Minn. 467; 107 N. W. 548

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Winona County, SNOW, J., denying a motion for a new trial, after a trial and directed verdict in favor of defendant. Reversed.

John Moonan, for appellant. Brown, Abbott & Somsen, for respondent.

JAGGARD, J. — This was an action to recover damages caused by a fire set by the engine of defendant and respondent. The plaintiff and appellant, an insurance company, paid the loss on property insured by it and was subrogated to the rights of the insured against the defendant. At the close of the testimony, the Court directed a verdict for defendant. From a motion denying a new trial, this appeal was taken.

The statute of this State (G. S. 1894, § 2700) provides that the owner of property burned by fire thrown from an engine can recover damages from the railroad company without being required to show defects in the engine or negligence on the part of employees. The fact of fire is "prima facie" evidence of negligence. The cases construing this section in this State, and similar statutes in other States, are not harmonious. Many of them hold that it is necessarily for the jury to weigh the statutory presumption of negligence in the balance against the evidence of defendant in rebuttal. Greenfield v. Chicago, 83 Iowa 270, 49 N. W. 95. . . . Hagan v. Chicago, 86 Mich. 615, 49 N. W. 509; 2 Thompson, Negligence, 840. Railway companies argue against this rule that it amounts to judicial legislation, inasmuch as it converts a presumption, rebuttable under the statute, into an unrebuttable one in effect, and that it deprives them in every instance of the right to try the force of the rebuttable evidence against the presumption before the Court, and enables incendiaries in practical result to sell them their crops and improvements at a price fixed by hostile juries.

According to other authorities, rebuttal by proof that the engine was properly constructed, equipped, inspected, maintained, and operated is as broad as the presumption of negligence, and justifies the trial Court in directing a verdict for defendant. Daly v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 43 Minn. 319. . . . 2 Thompson, Negligence, 796, note 30.

In language more picturesque than temperate, Judge THOMPSON has insisted that the rule last stated involves a complete obfuscation of the line which separates the province of the Court and the province of the jury, and that here is a case where evidence of a cogent nature is opposed to the testimony of the agents and employees of a railroad company, who, as experience will show, will, in almost every case swear up to the necessary mark and to whom nothing is more common than to lie on the witness stand:

"In nearly every such case the railway company will come forward with its creatures and prove that the engine was a good one, that it was suitably equipped with appliances to prevent scattering fire; and many Courts have held such evidence to constitute a defence, and, assuming its truthfulness, . . . " 2 Thompson, Negl. 840, 844, 796.

The contrast of the two views was well illustrated and judicially stated in a leading recent case, Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Coats, 115 Fed. 452, 53 C. C. A. 382. THAYER, J., for the majority of the Court, held that where the company produced testimony not directly contradicted, tending to show that the locomotive was properly constructed, equipped, inspected, and operated, it was the province of the jury to determine whether the statutory presumption of negligence was overcome:

"We cannot well understand," he said, "upon what theory the statement of persons who were in charge of a locomotive when it occasioned a disastrous fire, that it was properly and prudently managed, etc., must be accepted by a Court as conclusive, and as overturning, as a matter of law, the presumption of negligence raised by other testimony. It would seem, rather, that the triors of the fact ought, in such a case, to consider how far the interest of such witnesses — their natural desire to absolve themselves from all blame — may have colored their evidence, and how far their statements are consistent with other facts and circumstances which have been proven. If a Court undertakes to weigh such evidence, and say that the witnesses are credible, and also to decide as to the effect of the proof, it plainly assumes the functions of the jury or at least a function which is discharged by the jury in other cases."

On the other hand, SANBORN, J., dissenting, after a reference to a number of cases supporting his views, and a consideration of the nature of rebuttable presumptions, held that:

"The result is that it was in the first instance a question of law for the Court below in this case whether or not the presumption of negligence in the operation of the defendant's locomotive, which arose from the scattering of the sparks or coals and the setting of the fire, was overcome by the testimony for the defendant; and if the testimony of its proper employees that there was no negligence in the operation of the engine was uncontradicted, and was as broad as the presumption, then that presumption was overcome, as a matter of law, and it was the duty of the trial Court to withdraw this charge of negligence from the consideration of the jury on the motion of the defendant."

The opinion of the majority of that Court was followed and approved in all respects in the recent and well-considered case of Atchison v. Geiser, 68 Kan. 281, 75 Pac. 68. . . .

Under the decisions of this State, the rule is that the statute throws the burden of proof upon the defendant to rebut the presumption of actionable negligence on its part, upon proof by the plaintiff that a fire was kindled upon his lands adjoining a railway track by sparks from defendant's locomotive; that the defendant may rebut this presumption by sufficient proof of its non-connection as cause or of such construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of the engine as was required in the exercise of care commensurate with all the circumstances of the particular case. Such rebuttal proof must conform, as to character and extent, to the standard, by which in ordinary cases is measured the propriety of a holding by a trial Court that a defendant, against whom a prima facie case of negligence has been made, is free from fault, as a matter of law. The adequacy of such proof by a defendant must also be determined in view of any other facts appearing in the testimony in addition to those sufficient to give rise to the statutory presumption, which tend to show negligence. Unless the rebutting evidence as to both the facts and the inferences reasonably to be drawn from them is conclusive, the question is for the jury. Burud v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 62 Minn. 243, 64 N. W. 562. . . .

In this case, plaintiffs established the facts sufficient to give rise to the statutory presumption. To rebut this presumption, the defence was: First, that the engine was equipped with the best approved modern appliances for the arrest of sparks and to prevent the escape of cinders, all of which were in the best condition; second, that the engine was operated not only by men of unquestioned skill, but in such manner, at the time in question, as to reduce the discharge of sparks to a minimum; third, that no locomotive can be so constructed and practically operated as to prevent the escape of fire as is claimed to have occurred in this case. We are of opinion that this rebuttal testimony was not sufficient to have justified the trial Court in taking the case from the jury; because, first, the plaintiff introduced affirmative circumstantial evidence of negligence in addition to proof of the facts essential to raise the statutory presumption of defendant's negligence; second, the rebuttal testimony depended in part on evidence of witnesses whose credibility was for the jury; third, it consisted largely (1) of expert testimony, to the effect that no engine could be practically so operated as not to start fires at the distance here involved, which was inconclusive and not entirely consistent, and (2) of expert testimony that the engine was operated in a careful manner, which was based upon too narrow an hypothesis. . . .

The order of the Court is reversed, and a new trial granted.

769. FOSS v. McRAE

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MAINE. 1909

105 Me. 140; 73 Atl. 827

EXCEPTIONS from Supreme Judicial Court, Washington County. Action by Mary E. Foss against Maurice E. McRae and others, executors of the will of Asa T. McRae, deceased. Verdict for defendants, and plaintiff excepts. Exceptions overruled.

Action on an alleged guaranty by the defendants' testator of the payment of some fifty overdue promissory notes transferred by him to the plaintiff. The notes were given by the various promisors to Walter H. Foss, the husband of the plaintiff, and had been by him transferred to the defendants' testator, and later transferred by him to the plaintiff in settlement of matters between them. The record does not disclose the plea nor for whom was the verdict; but presumably the plea was the general issue and that the verdict was for the defendants. To sustain her allegations the plaintiff offered in evidence a typewritten instrument bearing the signature of the defendants' testator of the following tenor:

"Machias, M., April 11, 1907.

"This is to certify that I have this day, in a settlement of business transacted with Mary E. Foss, conveyed and sold to her a lot of notes for which I have received payment in full. And will guarantee them.

(Signed) Asa T. McRae.

Witness: M. E. McRae."

The defendants had seasonably given written notice to the plaintiff of their denial of the execution of this instrument, and at the trial the subscribing witness, who was one of the defendants' executors, testified that at the time of the execution and delivery of the instrument it did not contain the last four words, "and will guarantee them." There was also evidence upon both sides of this issue.

The plaintiff contended that upon this issue the burden of proof was upon the defendants; but the presiding justice instructed the jury as follows:

"So the question is narrowed right down to this: Were those words, the final four words in this paper, written on there when Mr. Asa T. McRae signed that paper? And the burden is upon the plaintiff, Mrs. Foss, or her agents, who conduct the suit, to convince you by the evidence that in fact and in truth those words were upon that paper when signed by Asa T. McRae; and has she done so? She claims that she has, and she first relies upon the circumstances that the words are found to be on the paper now. That is prima facie evidence that they were there when it was signed, but only prima facie. By 'prima facie' we mean that, if nothing more appeared, if that was all there was, just the paper itself, with no contradictions, it would be taken as sufficient evidence that they were there when signed; but, it appearing that it is disputed that they were there, and there being some evidence to the contrary, the burden is still upon the plaintiff throughout to convince you by evidence that, upon the whole, you believe the words were there when signed."

Argued before Whitehouse, Savage, Spear, King, and Bird, JJ.

R. J. McGarrigle, for plaintiff. John F. Lynch and H. H. Gray, for defendants.

Spear, J. (after stating the case as above). . . .

The instructions were correct. The plaintiff, under the notice and rule, was required to prove the execution of the instrument upon which she sought to recover. To accomplish this the subscribing witness was put upon the stand. His evidence clearly developed the real issue in the case. When he had testified to the execution of the paper, as we presume he did under the notice, the plaintiff had established a prima facie case, as the words in dispute appeared upon the face of the paper whose execution had been proven. Had the case stopped here, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover. This is precisely what the presiding justice instructed the jury at this stage of the proceedings. But the case did not stop here. The very witness the plaintiff relied upon to prove execution testified that the disputed words—the substance of the plaintiff's case — were not upon the instrument when he witnessed the defendant's signature. Again, it is apparent, if the case had stopped at this point, the defendant would have been entitled to the verdict, as the testimony of the witness, showing a material alteration, is undisputed, and must therefore prevail. Hence it follows that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff, to entitle her to recover, to proceed further and introduce evidence tending to overcome the testimony of the attesting witness. The issue of alteration now having been raised, it became her duty to assume the burden upon all the evidence of persuading the jury that the words of guaranty were upon the paper when it was executed.

Now, while the burden of evidence may be said to have shifted from the plaintiff to the defendant, when she had made out a prima facie case, and from the defendants to the plaintiff, again, when their evidence had overcome the prima facie case, the burden of proof had not changed at all. It was incumbent upon the plaintiff, in the end, upon all the evidence, however it may have shifted from one side to the other, to establish the truth of the allegation upon which she sought to recover, that the instrument contained the disputed words.

"Burden of proof" and "burden of evidence" are often confused. The phrase "burden of proof" is, in fact, more philosophical than practical. It means generally that a plaintiff, however often the evidence shifts, must, upon the whole, persuade the jury, by legal evidence, that his contention is right. The risk of nonpersuasion is all the time upon him. If he fails to persuade, he loses his case. The risk of nonpersuasion is the burden which he must assume. Exceptions overruled.

BOOK V. OF WHAT FACTS NO EVIDENCE NEED BE PRESENTED

TITLE I. JUDICIAL ADMISSIONS

773. Chief Baron Gilbert. Evidence. (1726. p. 103.) The consent of the parties concerned must be sufficient and concluding evidence of the truth of such fact; for they [the jury] are only to try the truth of such facts wherein the parties differ.

774. Paige v. Willet. (1868. New York. 38 N. Y. 28, 31.) A party who formally and explicitly admits by his pleading that which establishes the plaintiff's right will not be suffered to deny its existence or to prove any state of facts inconsistent with that admission.

775. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co.'s Petition. (1885. New York. 98 N.Y. 447, 453.) (Stipulation as to commissioners of valuation.) Earl, J. — Parties by their stipulations . . . may stipulate away statutory, and even constitutional rights; . . . all such stipulations not unreasonable, not against good morals or sound public policy, have been and will be enforced; and generally, all stipulations made by parties for the government of their conduct or the control of their rights, in the trial of a cause or the conduct of a litigation, are enforced by the Courts. . . . So it is not true that parties cannot enter into stipulations which in some sense will bind and control the action of the Courts.

776. PRESTWOOD v. WATSON

Supreme Court of Alabama. 1896

111 Ala. 604; 20 So. 600

Ejectment by E. Watson, as administrator of the estate of R. E. Jordan, deceased, against J. E. Prestwood and A. J. Fletcher, to recover certain lands, specifically described in the complaint. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed. . . .

On the trial of the cause it was admitted and agreed by and between the attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendants that this case was tried in the same Court, at a former term of the Court, upon an agreed written statement of facts; that said written agreed statement of facts upon which the case was formerly tried, and the bill of exceptions upon which the case was appealed, were lost or mislaid. . . . The plaintiff offered to introduce in evidence a copy of the agreed statement of facts used on the former trial, which was taken from the report of the case as found in 79 Ala. 417. It was shown by the testimony of John Gamble that the foregoing agreement was not signed by the parties or their attorneys, and was made only for that trial, and that several years ago (four or five years) the counsel of defendants notified plaintiff and his counsel that defendants would not abide said agreement in any subsequent trial. The defendants objected to the introduction of said statement of facts upon the following grounds: (1) Said agreed statement of facts was never signed by the parties, or by their attorneys. (2) Said agreed statement of facts was not shown to be made in open Court, or indorsed or entered on the minutes or record of the Court. (3) Said agreed statement of facts was not admissible, nor could the same be alleged or suggested by the plaintiff, against the defendants in this cause, because the same was not signed by the party to be bound thereby. The Court overruled each of the foregoing grounds of objections, allowed said agreed statement of facts to be introduced as evidence, and to this ruling the defendants duly excepted. . . .

There were verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appeals, and assigns as error the several rulings of the trial Court to which exceptions were reserved.

John Gamble and M. E. Milligan, for appellant. . . . The agreed statement of facts on which the former trial of the cause was had is not admissible on a subsequent trial, nor was it conclusive upon the parties. . . .

J. D. Gardner and P. N. Hickman, contra.

Brickell, C. J. A former trial of this case was had in the Court below, on a statement of facts reduced to writing, and by the parties admitted to be true, in open Court.

1. The primary question to be considered is whether, on a subsequent trial, this statement of facts was admissible, and its operation and effect as evidence; for, if it was admissible, and binding and conclusive on the parties, a consideration of many of the exceptions reserved is unnecessary. Agreements of this character, intelligently and deliberately made, — whether made by the parties in person, or by their attorneys or solicitors of record, — are encouraged and favored. Their purpose, generally, is to save costs, and to expedite trials, by relieving from rules of practice which in the particular case are deemed mere hindrances, or the dispensation with mere formal proof, or, as in the present case, the admission of uncontroverted facts, of the existence of which the parties are fully cognizant. . . . Such agreements are sometimes made to avoid continuances, or for some specific purpose, and, by their terms, are limited to the particular occasion or purpose, and, of course, lose all force when the occasion has passed, or the purpose has been accomplished. But if by their terms they are not limited, and are unqualified admissions of facts, the limitation is not implied, and they are receivable on any subsequent trial between the parties.

2. That the agreement was not signed by the parties or by the counsel was not of importance. Their signatures were not necessary to impart to it validity. Private agreements between parties or their attorneys, relating to the proceedings in a pending case, — agreements not made in the presence of the Court, — the rules of practice require, shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be bound thereby.

3. The rule has never been supposed to have any application to agreements or admissions made in the presence of the Court. Upon such agreements or admissions, made verbally, every Court is necessitated to act daily. The refusal to recognize and act upon them would delay the transaction of business, and entail upon counsel and parties much unnecessary labor. The purpose of the rule is to relieve such admissions or agreements from the infirmative considerations attaching to mere oral admissions of facts imputed to the one party or the other, and to avoid the unseemly wrangles, disputes, and contradictions which would ensue if they rested only in memory. Where the agreement or admission is made in the presence of the Court, it is without the purpose or reason, if not without the letter, of the rule. And when made in open Court, and reduced to writing, intended to be used, and used, as an instrument of evidence, and is without limitation as to time or occasion, it cannot be withdrawn or retracted at the mere will of either party. The presence of witnesses to prove the facts stated is waived. If the witnesses had been produced and testified, and they died, or became insane, or removed without the jurisdiction of the Court, on a subsequent trial evidence of their testimony would be admissible. The admission of the facts dispensing with evidence, if it could be disregarded by either party on any subsequent trial, in the event of inability to produce witnesses to establish them, would often convert such admissions into instruments of fraud and injury. When they are made deliberately and intelligently, in the presence of the Court, and reduced to writing, they are of the best species of evidence; and parties cannot be permitted to retract them, as they are not permitted at pleasure to retract admissions of fact made in any form. If they are made improvidently and by mistake, and the improvidence and mistake be clearly shown, the Court has a discretion to relieve from their consequences, — a discretion which should be exercised sparingly and cautiously.

There was no application by either party for relief from the agreement, and neither party should have been bound to give evidence in controversy of the facts therein stated. The loss of the writing rendered admissible secondary evidence of its contents. The best evidence would have been a certified copy of the transcript in this Court on the former trial. Unless by consent, the statement found in the published report of the case was not admissible.

The several instructions given the jury in reference to the recovery of damages for the destruction and removal of timber were erroneous; compensation for use and occupation is the full measure of recovery to which the plaintiff was entitled. Reversed and remanded.

777. STATE v. MARX. (1905. Connecticut. 78 Conn. 18; 60 Atl. 690.) HAMERSLEY, J.: . . . It is true that in the trial of capital offences the Court will and should exercise care and discretion in respect to admissions made by the accused or by his counsel in open Court, and that every conviction should be supported by some evidence produced in Court, and so even a plea of guilty will not ordinarily be accepted. But it is not true that an accused cannot, either by himself or his counsel, in his own interest, admit some facts which, though necessary for the State to establish, may be consistent with his innocence and the defence he maintains. Subject to the reasonable discretion of the Court in the protection of the accused against improvidence or mistake, admissions during the trial by the accused or his counsel as to the genuineness of a document; admissions as to the testimony a witness not produced would give if present, or the fact his testimony would establish, voluntarily made for the purpose of preventing a postponement of the trial; and admissions in the interest of the accused limiting the issue to the material facts upon which alone his successful defence depends, have long been permitted under our practice, and we think their lawfulness and propriety rest upon sound reason. 778. STATUTES. England. Rules of Practice, Hilary Term, 4 Wm. IV (10 Bing. 456), No. 20. Either party, after plea pleaded, and a reasonable time before trial, may give notice . . . of his intention to adduce in evidence certain written or printed documents; and unless the adverse party shall consent, by indorsement on such notice, within forty-eight hours, to make the admission specified, [the offering party may move that the opponent show cause, and] the judge shall, if he think the application reasonable, make an order that the costs of proving any document specified in the notice, which shall be proved at the trial to the satisfaction of the judge or presiding officer, shall be paid by the party so required, whatever may be the result of the cause [provided that the judge] may give time for inquiry or examination of the documents intended to be offered in evidence, and give such directions for inspection and examination, and impose such terms upon the party requiring the admission, as he shall think fit; [and no costs of proving a document shall be allowed] to any party who shall have adduced the same in evidence on any trial, unless he shall have given such notice as aforesaid, and the adverse party shall have neglected or refused to make such admission [or the judge have indorsed the application as not reasonable to be granted].

Illinois. Revised Statutes, 1874, c. 110, § 34, Rev. St. 1845, p. 415, § 14. No person shall be permitted to deny, on trial, the execution or assignment of an instrument in writing, whether sealed or not, upon which any action may have been brought, or which shall be pleaded or set up by way of defence or set-off, or is admissible under the pleadings when a copy is filed, unless the person so denying the same shall, if defendant, verify his plea by affidavit, and if plaintiff shall file his affidavit denying the execution or assignment of such instrument; provided, if the party making such denial be not the party alleged to have executed or assigned such instrument, the denial may be made on the information and belief of such party.

New York. C. C. P. 1877, § 735. The attorney for a party may, at any time before the trial, exhibit to the attorney for the adverse party a paper material to the action, and request a written admission of its genuineness. If the admission is not given, within four days after the request, and the paper is proved or admitted on the trial, the expenses, incurred by the party exhibiting it, in order to prove its genuineness, must be ascertained at the trial and paid by the party refusing the admission; unless it appears, to the satisfaction of the Court, that there was a good reason for the refusal.

779. CARVER v. CARVER

SUPREME COURT OF INDIANA. 1884

97 Ind. 497

FROM the Madison Circuit Court.

M. S. Robinson and J. W. Lovett, for appellants. H. D. Thompson, T. B. Orr, and W. March, for appellee.

ZOLLARS, J.— Action by appellee in relation to real estate; verdict in her favor, and over a motion for a new trial and other motions, judgment upon the verdict that she is the owner, and entitled to the possession, of the undivided one-third of the real estate, and for $125 against appellant William Carver for the detention thereof. . . . This brings us to the question of the sufficiency of the paragraphs of the complainant, as against any of the defendants. . . . The second paragraph is quite lengthy, tedious, and uncertain in detail. The substance of it is as follows: In 1853, appellee's father gave to her lands in Rush County, subject to a small encumbrance, and conveyed it to a trustee, to be held by him until her husband should pay off the encumbrance, when the trustee should convey it to her. In 1854, the trustee, with her consent, sold the land for enough to pay off the encumbrance and $2,500 additional. In the same year, her husband, Ira Carver, and appellant William Carver, purchased land in Henry County, and paid for the same with appellee's $2,500. With her consent, the money was thus applied as an investment for her. The land in Henry County having been sold, appellee's husband, acting as her agent, for her use and benefit, purchased the land in controversy, and paid for the same with the proceeds of the Henry County land. By mistake, the deed for this land was not made to appellee, but to her husband. In 1857, her husband was of weak mind and financially embarrassed. Appellant William Carver, with knowledge of the husband's condition, mentally and financially, and that appellee's money paid for the land, and with the intent to cheat and defraud her out of the land, confederated with the husband, and a justice of the peace, to get her to sign a deed to him, William Carver. To accomplish this, they and each of them, and especially William Carver, represented to her that her husband was overwhelmingly in debt, and that his creditors were about to arrest and imprison him; that he, William Carver, was security for her husband for a large amount; that if she would execute to him a mortgage upon the land to secure him, he would save her husband from arrest and imprisonment, and save the land for her and her children, and that in no other way could this be done. Believing and relying upon these representations, all of which were false, and known to the parties to be false, she signed what they told her was a mortgage. She never made any deed to William Carver, and the deed under which he claims to hold the land is as to her a forgery. During all this time she was the wife of Ira Carver, and continued to be and to live with him as such until 1875, when he died. She had no knowledge of the deed until 1870. . . .

It is conceded by appellants in argument, that Ira Carver, husband of appellee, was the owner of the land described in the second paragraph of the complaint and in the judgment, prior to the 20th day of November, 1857, at which time he made a deed for the same to appellant William Carver. Their whole claim rests upon the deed from him. It is really conceded, too, and shown by the evidence, that appellee, as the widow of Ira Carver, who died in 1875, if she did not join in that deed, is the owner of and entitled to the possession of the undivided one-third of the said real estate, except, perhaps, what may have been sold by Carver. It is contended, however, that she did join in that deed. Whether she did or not, is the main question of fact in the cause.

Prior to the trial, appellants served a notice on appellee, that upon the trial they would introduce in evidence the said deed, which bears the names of appellee and her husband as grantors. Upon the service of this notice, appellee filed her affidavit denying the execution of the deed. Proof of execution having been made, which, to the trial Court, was sufficient to entitle the deed to be read in evidence, it was so read. The third instruction to the jury was as follows: "The defendants have read in evidence a deed purporting to be executed by Ira Carver and plaintiff, Esther J. Carver, conveying said real estate to the defendant William Carver. The burden of proving that the plaintiff . . . executed said deed is upon the defendants, and if the defendants have not proved by a preponderance of all the evidence in the cause that said plaintiff did sign her name to said deed, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict in her favor, no matter how innocent the defendants may have been in their purchase. If, however, you find that Esther J. Carver did sign her name to said deed, then your verdict must be for the defendants, whether the deed bears the true date of its execution or not; and this must be your verdict, though the plaintiff, when she signed said deed, believed it to be a mortgage. You will then see that an important point in controversy is as to whether the plaintiff signed said deed, and this you will determine, as well as all other facts submitted to you, from a careful consideration of all the testimony and circumstances in evidence, for you are the exclusive judges of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, and determine from the evidence what it proves and what it does not prove."

Several objections are urged against this instruction. As related to the deed the argument is, first, that after appellants had made such a case as entitled the deed to be read in evidence, the burden of proof was shifted to appellee to prove the non-execution of the deed; second, that as the execution of the deed seems to have been acknowledged before an officer authorized to take acknowledgments, appellee cannot, in this action, dispute the execution. These two objections are so related that we consider them together.

1.[1] The rule is well settled that in the absence of statutes upon the subject, the grantee, offering a deed in evidence, must prove its execution, whether it has been acknowledged and recorded or not; especially is this so if its execution is put in issue by a plea of "non est factum." The statutes of this State, like those of many of the other States, have made material innovations upon this rule. The code of 1852, in force when this cause was tried, provided that where a writing, purporting to have been executed by one of the parties, is the foundation of, or is referred to in any pleading, it may be read in evidence on the trial of the cause against such party without proving its execution, unless its execution be denied by affidavit before the commencement of the trial, or unless denied by a pleading under oath. . . . Section 304, 2 R. S. 1876, p. 158, provided as follows: "If either party at any time before trial allow the other an inspection of any writing, material to the action, whether mentioned in the pleadings or not, and deliver to him a copy thereof, with notice that he intends to read the same in evidence on the trial of the cause, it may be so read, without proof of its genuineness, or execution, unless denied by affidavit before the commencement of the trial." A failure to deny the execution by a pleading under oath has been held to be so far an admission of the genuineness of the instrument as to preclude its being controverted by proof. This rule would, perhaps, apply to a case like this where the denial is by affidavit. The reason of this ruling, as stated in the earliest decision upon the subject under these statutes, is that the party relying upon the instrument has a right to be forewarned of any contemplated attack upon it. . . . These statutes clearly include deeds, and recognize the rule as we have stated it to be, in the absence of statutes. Their purpose is not to shift the burden of proof, but simply to relieve the party relying upon a written instrument of the burden of making proof of its execution, unless the execution be denied under oath. . . . The affidavit, or plea of "non est factum," throws back upon the other party the burden of proving the execution of the instrument, and thus the parties occupy the position they would have occupied were there no statutes upon the subject.

After making a prima facie case in favor of the execution of the writing, it may be read in evidence. The party making such proof may rely upon it, and in the absence of countervailing evidence, it will be sufficient to make his case. This, however, does not shift the burden of the issue to the party denying the execution. In the case of Fay v. Burditt, 81 Ind. 433 (42 Am. R. 142), it was questioned, whether in any case, it is proper to say that the burden of an affirmative issue shifts in the course of a trial from one party to the other. We think, upon further consideration, that there is no hazard in saying that it does not as to any single proposition, such as to whether or not a written instrument was in fact executed by the party denying the execution. When the execution of an instrument is thus denied, the question is, Did the party thus denying in fact execute it? The party relying upon it has the affirmative of that issue. The burden is upon him to establish that affirmative, and that burden will remain upon him until he establishes it to the satisfaction of the jury, not by a prima facie case alone, but by such proof as will withstand and overthrow all of the evidence to the contrary. There must be more than an equipoise of the testimony; there must be a preponderance in favor of the execution. If, upon the making of a prima facie case, the burden shifts to the other side, then it would follow that when the prima facie case is overthrown by weightier testimony, the burden shifts back again. To say that the burden thus shifts, is to say that it is constantly shifting from the stronger to the weaker side, as the testimony may make one side or the other stronger. Of course, when a prima facie case is made out in a case like this, the burden is upon the other side to meet it, or suffer defeat. . . . This imposition of the burden to meet a prima facie case, or to show matter in avoidance, is not the shifting of the burden of proof as to the fact in issue. Appellants made their defence under the general denial, as they had a right to do under the statute. By introducing in evidence the deed from William to Ira Carver, appellee's husband, and the deed which purports to have been executed by appellee and her husband, they made their defence, as against appellee's claim, dependent upon the validity of the latter deed. The defence thus took the shape of an affirmative defence, a defence of confession and avoidance; a confession of title in appellee as the widow of Ira Carver, and of avoidance, by the deed from her and husband to appellant William Carver. By the notice and affidavit in relation to this latter deed, the burden of proving its execution was clearly thrown upon appellants, and was not shifted from them by their making out a prima facie case.

2. The deed purporting to have been executed by appellee and her husband, apparently, was properly acknowledged and recorded. We cannot hold, however, that the certificate of acknowledgment is conclusive upon appellee. . . . We think, however, that under our statutes since 1852, a certificate of acknowledgment in proper form makes a prima facie case in favor of the execution of the instrument, not only as to innocent third parties, but as to the parties to the instrument also. The statutes require that deeds shall be acknowledged. To entitle a deed to be recorded it must be acknowledged. . . . A record of a deed without such acknowledgment is not competent evidence against any one. An acknowledgment is not essential to the validity of a deed, as between the parties to it, but it is apparent upon an examination of the statutes that, as to all parties, it is a very important matter. It is essential to the record of a deed, and thus becomes the basis of notice by record. The deed may be recorded; the record becomes notice to the world, and may be used as evidence, without the production of the deed or proof of its execution, because the acknowledgment is evidence of the execution. . . . It is provided, however, that neither the certificate of acknowledgment of a deed, nor the record, nor the transcript of the record thereof, shall be conclusive, but may be rebutted, and the force and effect thereof, contested by any one affected thereby. 1 R. S. 1876, p. 368, § 32; § 2954, R. S. 1881. The reasonable construction of these several sections of the statute is, we think, that the certificate of acknowledgment is prima facie evidence of the execution of the deed, and that in all cases where the record is competent evidence, the deed is also competent, without further proof of its execution.

This, however, does not throw the burden of proof upon the party denying the execution. In this case appellants produced the deed, asserting its genuineness. That was denied by appellee. Appellants had the affirmative of the issue, and were bound to establish it by a preponderance of testimony or suffer defeat. The certificate of acknowledgment operated as evidence in support of the genuineness of the deed, and made a prima facie case for appellants, very much as the presumption of sanity operates as evidence in behalf of the State in criminal prosecutions. The burden was upon appellee to meet and overthrow the prima facie case, but the burden was not upon her to prove the non-execution of the deed. The Court below did not err, therefore, in charging the jury that the burden was upon appellants to prove by a preponderance of the testimony that appellee executed the deed.

TITLE II. JUDICIAL NOTICE

782. Introductory. There are various senses in which the term "Judicial Notice" is used. In the orthodox sense above noted, it signifies that there are certain "facta probanda," or propositions in a party's case, as to which he will not be required to offer evidence; these will be taken for true, provisionally, by the tribunal, without the need of evidence. This general principle of Judicial Notice is simple and natural enough. As to the scope of such facts, they include (1) matters which are so notorious that the production of evidence would be unnecessary; (2) matters which the judicial function supposes the judge to be acquainted with, either actually or in theory; (3) sundry matters not exactly included under either of these heads; they are due, for the most part, to the consideration that though they are neither actually notorious nor bound to be judicially known, yet they would be capable of such instant and unquestionable demonstration, if desired, that no party would think of imposing a falsity on the tribunal in the face of an intelligent adversary.

Anomalous Meanings of the Term Judicial Notice. The term Judicial Notice has many applications, distinct from those peculiar to the present purpose.

(1) A usage extending far back in our annals is to apply the term where the question is whether a certain pleading, or a certain averment in a pleading, or greater particularity of averment, is necessary.

(2) Whether a Court, for the purposes of ordering a new trial or otherwise, may give effect to a matter capable of being judicially noticed — i.e., assumed without evidence — but not referred to in the record, or falsely alleged in the pleading, is a question of the power and duty of the Court; but this term has been applied to it.

(3) Whether a Court will take judicial notice of the existence of a foreign State is really a question whether, as a matter of substantive law and judicial functions, a foreign State will in domestic Courts be treated as existing only so far as the Executive so treats it; here the Executive's recognition is the determining element.

(4) Certain rules of evidence, usually known under other names, are frequently referred to in terms of judicial notice. Thus, the admissibility of almanacs is mainly a question whether an exception to the Hearsay rule can be made in their favor; but a Court occasionally makes this exception by saying that the almanac is to be judicially noticed.

(5) Other loose applications of the term, sometimes dealing with matters of substantive law, sometimes with matters of procedure, will occasionally be found. It is unfortunate that the phrase should be so often loosely employed.

783. James Bradley Thayer. A Preliminary Treatise on Evidence. (1898. p. 277.) The maxim that what is known need not be proved, "manifesta" (or, "notoria") "non indigent probatione," may be traced far back in the civil and the canon law; indeed, it is probably coeval with legal procedure itself. We find it as a maxim in our own books,[1] and it is applied in every part of our law. It is qualified by another principle, also very old, and often overtopping the former in its importance, — "non refert quid notum sit judici, si notum non sit in forma judicii." [1] These two maxims seem to intimate the whole doctrine of judicial notice. It has two aspects, one regarding the liberty which the judicial functionary has in taking things for granted, and the other the restraints that limit him.

784. LUMLEY v. GYE. (1853. 2 El. & Bl. 266.) COLERIDGE, J.: Judges are not necessarily to be ignorant in Court of what everybody else, and they themselves out of Court, are familiar with; nor was that unreal ignorance considered to be an attribute of the Bench in early and strict times. We find in the Year Books the judges reasoning about the ability of knights, esquires, and gentlemen to maintain themselves without wages; distinguishing between private chaplains and parochial chaplains from the nature of their employments; and in later days we have ventured to take judicial cognizance of the moral qualities of Robinson Crusoe's "man Friday" (1 Dow, P. C. 672) and Aesop's "frozen snake" (12 Q. B. 624).

785. FOX v. STATE

9 Ga. 373

AT the July Term, 1850, of Bibb Superior Court, John Fox was placed on his trial for larceny from the house. The defendant moved for a continuance for the absence of a witness, William Robards, who resided in Decatur County. On the showing for a continuance, it appeared that the witness had been recognized at the last term of the Court to appear and testify in the cause for the defendant. The defendant stated that he expected to prove by the witness, Robards, that he (witness) heard one Simpson, upon whose testimony the defendant understood the State would mainly rely for conviction, say "that if hard swearing would send the defendant to the penitentiary, that he should go." . . . Robards was confined in jail at the time of the conversation, charged with stealing a horse and buggy. . . . The motion to continue was overruled by the Court, and the trial ordered to progress. The Jury returned a verdict of guilty. Whereupon, counsel for defendant moved the Court for a new trial, on the ground that the Court erred in refusing to grant the continuance.

The Court overruled the motion for a new trial, and remarked "that in overruling the defendant's showing for a continuance, he did not place much confidence in the truth of the defendant's statements — knowing, as he had, for many years, the witness, Simpson, whose testimony was sought to be assailed, and having no special reason to confide in the integrity of Fox, he thought if a witness intended to act out the corruption ascribed to Simpson, he would not be likely to declare his intentions in advance in the presence of others, and the facts disclosed on the trial left his preconceived opinions of the integrity of Fox unchanged." Counsel for the defendant excepted.

Nisbet, J. — The new trial ought to have been granted, because there was error in not allowing the continuance. . . . All proper diligence was used to have the witness at the trial. It is clear that the showing for a continuance was complete.

Why, then, was it not granted? It appears from the record before me, that the presiding Judge gave as reasons for refusing the new trial, that he did not place much confidence in the truth of the defendant's statements. . . . They are not only not sufficient, but develop a ground of action in such cases not warranted by the law. . . . There was, as we have seen, no legal objection to the showing for a continuance. Can the Court, when the showing is sufficient, refuse it on account of his personal knowledge of the character of the party making it, and of the witness whose testimony that party is seeking to assail — a knowledge not drawn from evidence before the Court, but from his private sources of information? He, beyond all controversy, cannot. He has no discretion to act upon such knowledge. The discretion allowed in applications for a continuance must be within the law, and must spring out of, and be bounded by what transpires in the case. It cannot be justified upon what the Court, as a man, may or may not know. Justice is administered according to general rules; rules which, if applicable in a single case, must be applicable in all like cases, no matter who are the parties, or what their character. If the Court may dispense with them because of this personal knowledge of the character of the parties before him in one case, he may in all cases. And this would be equivalent to dispensing with them altogether.

786. KILPATRICK v. COMMONWEALTH

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. 1858

31 Pa. 198

Error to the Oyer and Terminer of Philadelphia.

The plaintiff in error, John Kilpatrick, was indicted in the Court below, for the murder of John McCracken, on October 20, 1857. The prisoner was tried on March 10, 1858, at a Court of Oyer and Terminer, held by the Hon. James R. Ludlow and the Hon. Joseph Allison, the two associate law judges of the Common Pleas of Philadelphia, under the provisions of the Act of February 3, 1843; Judge Ludlow having been duly appointed to hold the Court, for the trial of all issues pending therein. On March 13, 1858, the jury found the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree; and on May 1st, a motion for a new trial having been overruled, sentence of death was passed upon the defendant. . . .

David Paul Brown, Goforth, and Palethorp, for the plaintiff in error. —The Act of 1843, under which the Court was held by the two associate judges, is in conflict with the constitution, Art. 5, § 4, which provides "that the judges of the Courts of Common Pleas shall be justices of oyer and terminer and general jail delivery, for the trial of capital and other offenders therein; any two of the said judges, the president being one, shall be a quorum." . . .

Loughead and Mann, District Attorneys, for the Commonwealth. . . .

The opinion of the Court was delivered by

STRONG, J.—This record presents several questions of the gravest importance. . . . The principal questions relate to the constitution of the Court in which the indictment was tried, and to the instruction which was given the jury. . . . The record exhibits that, at the Court of Oyer and Terminer for the city and county of Philadelphia, John Kilpatrick, the defendant, was indicted, tried, convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced. The first assignment of error is that "it appears by the record that the case was tried by the Hon. James R. Ludlow and Joseph Allison, neither of whom was the President of the Court of Common Pleas; and therefore the said judges had no constitutional right to hold said Court and try the said case; and that the entire proceedings are void and 'coram non judice.'"

We come therefore directly to the inquiry whether two associate judges of the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia — commissioned as such, though learned in the law, can hold a Court of Oyer and Terminer within that county. . . .

1. In Commonwealth v. Zephon, 8 W. & S. 382, the enactment was ruled to be constitutional, and it was held, that in the city and county of Philadelphia, a Court of Oyer and Terminer may be properly holden by two associate judges of the Court of Common Pleas. . . .

2. Upon the argument in this Court a doubt was suggested, whether this question is raised by the record. The doubt was not without reason. Personally we know that Judges Ludlow and Allison are associate justices of the Court of Common Pleas, learned in the law, and that neither of them is the president of that Court. Yet can we judicially take notice of the fact, that neither of them is the president of that Court, when the defendant did not deny it by plea, and when the record does not show it; but, on the contrary, avers that the trial took place at a Court of Oyer and Terminer? Doubtless, there are many things of public interest, things which ought generally to be known, of which Courts will take notice without proof. But whether a Superior Court is bound to know who are the judges of subordinate Courts, and what is the nature of their commissions, is by no means clearly settled. In the English Courts it has been held, that such facts a Court cannot be presumed to know. . . . In the American Courts the question is still an open one, though it has not often arisen. . . . Notwithstanding the doubts, however, which have elsewhere entertained in similar cases, we are disposed to take judicial notice of the facts that, at the time of the trial in the Court below, Judge Thompson was President Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia county, and that Judges Ludlow and Allison, though justices learned in the law, were only associates. The rule is, that Courts will take notice of what ought to be generally known within the limits of their jurisdiction. There seems to us, to be as much reason for our having knowledge of who are in fact the judges of our constitutional Courts, as for our having judicial knowledge of the heads of departments, sheriffs, etc.; knowledge of whom is always presumed.

We discover no error in this record. The judgment is affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1897

69 Conn. 123; 37 Atl. 80

INFORMATION for a violation of the statute relating to "peach yellows," brought to the Supreme Court in New London County and tried to the jury before SHUMWAY, J. Verdict and judgment of guilty, and appeal by the defendant for alleged errors in the rulings and charge of the Court. No error. . . .

Donald G. Perkins, for the appellant (defendant). The statute in question is unconstitutional. . . . If the defendant is right, the constitutionality of the law in this particular depended upon a question of fact whether diseased trees on a man's land caused a substantial injury to his neighbor of such a nature that a law condemning such trees was a reasonable exercise of the police power. The Court erred in its rulings on evidence. . . .

Solomon Lucas, State's Attorney, for the appellee (the State). . . . The legislation on this subject in other States shows the common belief in the dangerous nature of the disease known as "peach yellows." Bulletin No. 11, Dept. of Agriculture, June, 1896. . . .

BALDWIN, J. . . . The Superior Court was also right in refusing to instruct the jury, as requested, that if they should "find that the 'Yellows' is not a contagious disease and the existence of the disease in one tree does not cause it to spread from that tree to other trees, and thus endanger other trees, the property of others, and that a tree so diseased is not a public nuisance, then this statute . . . is unconstitutional and void."

Whether the "yellows" was such a disease as to justify the General Assembly in enacting the statute under which the prosecution was brought, depended on the existence and nature of the disease, and also on the apprehension of danger from it commonly entertained by the public at large. That such a disease existed, and was one of a serious character, ordinarily resulting in the premature death of the tree affected, is a matter of common knowledge, of which the Court had a right to take judicial notice. Century Dict., Peach-yellows, and Yellows; Webster's Internat. Dict., Yellows. Such a disease it was proper for the General Assembly, in the exercise of its police power, to endeavor to suppress, even by the destruction of the trees attacked by it, if there was a reasonable apprehension of substantial danger from allowing them to live, to those who might eat their fruit, or to other peach orchards. . . . The description of this disease given in standard works and government publications, and the legislation in regard to it to be found in the statute books of Delaware, Maryland, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and the Province of Ontario, are amply sufficient to establish as a matter of judicial notice the possibility, if not the probability, that it is a contagious disease. Grimes v. Eddy, 126 Mo. 168, 28 Southwestern Rep. 756. . . .

Judicial notice takes the place of proof, and is of equal force. As a means of establishing facts it is therefore superior to evidence. In its appropriate field it displaces evidence, since, as it stands for proof, it fulfills the object which evidence is designed to fulfill, and makes evidence unnecessary. Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 37, 43; Commonwealth v. Marzynski, 149 Mass. 68.

"The true conception of what is judicially known as that of something which is not, or rather need not, unless the tribunal wishes it, be the subject of either evidence or argument, — something which is already in the Court's possession, or at any rate is so accessible that there is no occasion to use any means to make the Court aware of it." Thayer's Cases on Evidence, 20.

If, in regard to any subject of judicial notice, the Court should permit documents to be referred to or testimony introduced, it would not be, in any proper sense, the admission of evidence, but simply a resort to a convenient means of refreshing the memory, or making the trier aware of that which everybody ought to be aware. State v. Morris, 47 Conn. 179, 180.

The defendant, therefore, had no right to have the jury pass upon the danger of contagion from trees affected by the yellows, as a means of determining the constitutionality of the statute, by such verdict as they might render under the instructions of the Court. It was for the Court to take notice that it was a disease which might be contagious. Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk, 63 Conn. 495, 525, 527. This being established, the validity of the statute became a matter of pure law. . . .

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

788. WINN v. COGGINS

SUPREME COURT OF FLORIDA. 1907

53 Fla. 337; 42 So. 897

IN BANC. Error to Circuit Court, Wakulla County; JOHN W. MALONE, Judge. Action by James W. Coggins and others against A. B. Winn and J. D. Cay, partners as A. B. Winn & Co. Verdict for plaintiffs. From an order granting a new trial, defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded.

The defendants in error brought an action of ejectment on August 17, 1905, in the Circuit Court for Wakulla county, against the plaintiffs in error, to recover the possession of lots 47 and 48 of Hartfield's survey, and lots 97 and 98 of Hopkins' survey, containing 1,440 acres, more or less, in Wakulla county, Fla., and for mesne profits. A plea of not guilty was entered. At the trial the jury rendered a verdict for the defendants. The Court granted a motion for a new trial, the defendants excepted thereto, and by writ of error bring the order granting a new trial here for review. . . .

The plaintiffs then offered in evidence a certified copy of the record of a deed without warranty from John Beard, receiver of the Apalachicola Land Company, purporting to convey the lands in controversy to James Coggins, bearing date January 28, 1858, "pursuant to a decree made at Tallahassee on the eleventh day of April, A.D. 1856, by the Honorable J. W. Baker, Judge of the Circuit Court of the Middle Circuit of Florida, in chancery sitting." . . .

The defendants then objected to the introduction of the deed on the further grounds: . . . (4) that the plaintiffs have not shown, as a predicate to the admission of the deed, the authority which John Beard, receiver, had to execute said deed; (5) that plaintiffs have not shown a valid decree of court authorizing Beard, as receiver, to execute said deed. . . . The Court overrruled all these grounds of objection to the certified copy of the record of the deed except the fourth and fifth. . . .

George B. Perkins, George P. Raney, and Joseph A. Edmondson, for plaintiffs in error.

Nat. R. Walker and W. C. Hodges, for defendants in error.

WHITFIELD, J. (after stating the case as above):

If a deed purports to have been executed by an officer of Court under a decree, and it is sought to use the deed in evidence, the power or authority to make the deed must be shown, unless waived. Simmons v. Spratt, 20 Fla. 495; McGehee v. Wilkins, 31 Fla. 83, 12 South. 228. . . . The introduction in evidence of the certified copy of the record of the deed of conveyance purporting to have been executed under a decree of Court by John Beard, receiver, to James Coggins, was objected to on the ground that the authority to make the deed as receiver was not shown; and, as no evidence of such authority was offered, the certified copy of the record was very properly not admitted in evidence as title to the lands. In the trial of this cause the Court could not take judicial knowledge of a decree rendered by the Court of another county in another cause. See McNish v. State, 47 Fla. 69, 36 South. 176; 4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2579. . . .

CRIMINAL COURT OF APPEALS OF OKLAHOMA. 1909

3 Okl. Cr. 281; 105 Pac. 387

Appeal from Pontotoc County Court; JOEL TERRELL, Judge.

W. C. Rea was convicted of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff in error, hereinafter designated as defendant, was convicted in the County Court of Pontotoc county, on an information charging that, in Pontotoc county, Okla., on July 15, 1908, the said defendant did unlawfully sell, barter, give away, and furnish one Wes Hattox intoxicating liquor, to-wit, alcohol. The cause came on for trial on the 4th day of February, 1909, which resulted in a verdict of guilty. . . . The defendant appeals to this Court, . . . first because the State did not prove the alleged sale to have been made within the period of the statute of limitations. . . .

Bullock & Kerr and Galbraith & McKeown, for appellant.

FURMAN, P. J. (after stating the facts as above).

Even if the burden of proof was on the State to establish the commission of the offense within the statute of limitations beyond a reasonable doubt, we think that it was done in this case. The evidence is as follows: "Q. — Your name is Wes Hattox? A. — Yes, sir. Q. — Where do you live? A. — At Fitzhugh. Q. — You know Will Rea? A. — Yes, sir. Q. — What business is he in? A. — Drug business. Q. — Where? A. — Roff. Q. — Were you in his drug store in July? A. — Yes, sir. Q. — Did you purchase anything? A. — Yes, sir. Q. — What was it? A. — Alcohol. Q. — Is alcohol intoxicating? A. — Yes sir; I suppose it is. Q. — That was in Pontotoc county, Okl.? A. — Yes, sir." From this it is proven that the sale took place in Pontotoc county, Okla. The Court takes judicial notice of the fact that, prior to the incoming of Statehood, on November 16, 1907, such county as Pontotoc county, Okla., was not in existence. Therefore the sale was proven to have been made subsequent to that date. Wigmore on Evidence, vol. 4, § 2575, says: "Domestic Political Organization — Boundaries, Capitals, etc. — So far as the facts of political organization and operation of the State are determined in the law, they are judicially noticed as a part of the law."

Therefore the contention of the defendant, that the case should be reversed because it was not proven that the sale was made within the period of the statute of limitations, is not supported by the law or the evidence. . . . We are therefore compelled to affirm the conviction.

Affirmed.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals. 1909

167 Fed. 789

Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Third Division of the District of Alaska.

John F. Dillon, T. C. West, and Leroy Tozier, for appellant.

Robert T. Devlin, U. S. Attorney, and Benjamin L. McKinley, Assistant U. S. Attorney, for appellee.

Before Gilbert, Ross, and Morrow, Circuit Judges.

Morrow, Circuit Judge. — This is an appeal from a judgment of the United States District Court for the Territory of Alaska, rendered on the 30th day of January, 1908, remanding the appellant to the custody of the appellee as United States marshal, to be dealt with according to law, and dismissing a writ of habeas corpus. . . .

In the assignment of errors there are recitals from which it appears that there was a sentence of death pronounced against the appellant on May 29, 1907; that application was made to the President of the United States for commutation of sentence, and that, pending the determination of the application by the President, application was made to the Governor of Alaska, for a reprieve, which was granted, and the execution of the sentence was stayed to February 1, 1908, between the hours of 6 o'clock a.m. and 6 o'clock p.m.; and that prior to that date the President denied the petition for a commutation of sentence, and the defendant in error was about to execute the sentence of the Court when a petition was presented to the Court for a writ of habeas corpus. . . . It appears that the decision of the President denying the application of commutation of sentence was made known by a telegram signed "Bonaparte." The appellant seeks to raise the question whether this notice of the decision of the President was sufficient in law. The telegram is not in the record, and, as there is no bill of exceptions, this Court would be justified in declining to consider this question; but in view of the serious character of the case, the law upon the subject will be stated: . . .

Facts which are so generally known that every well-informed person knows them, or ought to know them, need not be proven and will be judicially recognized without proof. Taylor on Evidence, § 21, American Notes, 36.

These rules of evidence are founded upon very ancient legal maxims: "Lex non requirit verificari quod apparet curiae." The law does not require that to be verified (or proved) which is apparent to the Court. Baten's Case, 9 Coke 54b. . . . "Quod constat curiae opere testium non indiget." That which appears to the Court needs not the aid of witnesses. 2 Inst. (Coke) 662; Best on Evidence, § 252.

The incumbencies of the more important and notorious offices are judicially noticed. Wigmore on Evidence, § 2576. In the case of Jean Peltier, 28 Howell's State Trials, p. 530, the defendant was indicted for a libel on Napoleon Bonaparte, First Consul of the French Republic, and was tried in the Court of King's Bench in 1803, before Lord ELLENBOROUGH and a jury. In charging the jury, Lord ELLENBOROUGH said:

"That Napoleon Bonaparte was the Chief Magistrate and First Consul of France is admitted; and that the relations of peace and friendship subsist between us and the French Republic, and did so at the time of these publications, is also admitted; and, indeed, they were capable of easy proof, if they had not been admitted. Their notoriety seems to render all actual proof very unnecessary." . . .

The President, in the exercise of his executive power under the Constitution, may act through the head of the appropriate department. The heads of departments are his authorized assistants in the performance of his executive duties, and their official acts, promulgated in the regular course of business, are presumptively his acts. . . . It is generally known that Charles J. Bonaparte was the Attorney-General of the United States and the head of the Department of Justice at the time the decision of the President was made known in this case, and that through that department the decision of the President in a pardon case would, in the regular course of business, be promulgated.

In the absence of the telegram from the record, it will be presumed that it contained all the usual evidences of authenticity, and that it contained sufficient information to enable the Court to ascertain therefrom that the President had denied the application of the plaintiff in error for a commutation of sentence.

The judgment of the Court below is affirmed.

791. PEOPLE v. SCHMITZ

SUPREME COURT OF CALIFORNIA. 1908

153 Cal. xviii; 94 Pac. 419

IN BANK. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; FRANK H. DUNNE, Judge. Eugene E. Schmitz having been convicted of extortion, and the conviction having been reversed by the District Court of Appeals on his appeal, the People apply to the Supreme Court for a hearing and determination of the appeal. Application denied.

Campbell, Metson & Drew, Charles H. Fairall, and John J. Barrett, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Attorney-General, and W. H. Langdon, District Attorney, (Henry & Cobb and J. J. Dwyer of counsel), for the People.

Per Curiam. This is an application by respondent for a hearing and determination of this appeal by this Court, after decision and judgment by the District Court of Appeal for the First District. . . .

The Court is unanimous in the opinion that the District Court of Appeal was correct in its conclusion that the indictment was insufficient, in that it did not show that the specific injury to the property of the restaurant keepers threatened by the defendant was an "unlawful injury." . . . § 520 of the Penal Code provides that the threat must be such as is mentioned in the preceding section, and the preceding section, in subdivision 1 (the only subdivision here applicable), says that the threat must be one "to do an unlawful injury to the person or property of the individual threatened, or to any relative of his, or member of his family." . . . What is meant by the term "unlawful injury"? Giving to such term the broadest meaning possible under the authorities, it can include no injury that is not of such a character that, if it had been committed as threatened, it would have constituted an actionable wrong. . . .

Applying this to the case at bar:

It was within the lawful power of the police commissioners of San Francisco to withhold from the restaurant keepers a license to sell liquors at retail in their restaurant, no matter how great the pecuniary loss thereby caused to the business. It was also lawful for any person, by legitimate persuasion or argument, to endeavor to prevail upon the commissioners to refuse the license, although such person was actuated by a malicious intent to injure the restaurant keepers and cause them pecuniary loss. The conjunction of the lawful persuasion, inducing the lawful refusal of the license, with the malicious motive instigating the persuasion, would not convert the lawful act of refusing the license into an unlawful one, nor make the resulting injury unlawful or actionable. . . .

In this case the indictment charges that the defendant threatened the restaurant keepers that, if money was not paid him, he would prevent them from obtaining or receiving a retail liquor license and thereby destroy or render unprofitable their restaurant business, of which the sale of liquors at retail formed the remunerative part. It is not stated how the defendant proposed to do this, or how it was understood by the parties that he would accomplish it, whether by fair persuasion and lawful influence over the commissioners, or by duress, menace, fraud, or undue influence exercised upon them. This is not a case where it is sufficient to charge an offense in the language of the statute defining it. The Court cannot assume, in the absence of any averment to that effect, that Schmitz was mayor of the city and as such in a position to exercise power and undue influence over the members of the board of police commissioners; or that Ruef, his co-defendant, was a person in practical control of the city government because of his political activity and influence, or otherwise able to exert an undue influence over the board; nor can it be inferred, or presumed, when it is not so charged, that the defendant threatened to prevent the issuance of the license by unlawful means, and not solely by lawful and innocent persuasion and argument. . . .

The attorneys for the respondent . . . introduce their application with the statement that they are convinced that upon a full discussion of the case "it will be found and decided by this Court that levying blackmail upon licensed businesses by the mayor and the political boss of a metropolitan community is a crime under the law of California, and should not go unwhipped of justice." This is a gross misstatement of the case and of the question to be decided, as presented by the indictment. We again emphasize the fact that the indictment does not aver that Schmitz was mayor, or that Ruef was a political boss, or that either of them had any power, or influence, or control over the police commissioners, or that they threatened to use such power, influence, or control in preventing the issuance of a license. . . .

The application for a hearing and determination of this appeal by this Court, after decision and judgment by the District Court of Appeal of the First District, is denied.

792. Letters on the Case of PEOPLE v. SCHMITZ

(1) Chief Justice Beatty. Letter in the Sacramento Bee (April 29, 1908). . . . Though the facts that Schmitz was Mayor and Ruef the political boss of the city may have been as notorious in San Francisco as the fire or the earthquake, no lawyer would contend for a moment that they were facts of which a Court could take judicial notice, in passing upon the sufficiency of the indictment.

If these facts [that Schmitz was mayor and Ruef the political boss] had been alleged in the indictment, then indeed the Court could have considered in that connection the provisions of the charter of San Francisco which empowered the mayor to appoint and remove at will the members of the board of police commissioners, and which invest that board with discretion to issue or refuse licenses to sell liquors at retail. And if by means of these allegations or otherwise it had been made to appear that the defendants had caused the applicants to believe that they could and would influence the police commissioners to reject their application regardless of its merits, I have never doubted that the indictment would have been sufficient. For this would have been a threat to do an unlawful injury — an injury which by reason of the corrupt abuse of official power employed to accomplish it would have been actionable.

But the Court, being obliged, as I have shown, to look exclusively to the force of the indictment in determining its validity, and seeing only a charge against two private persons, could see nothing unlawful in the threatened injury. For it could not be assumed that such private persons could prevent the issuance of the license otherwise than by adducing good reasons why, in the exercise of their discretion, the Police Commissioners should refuse it, — as, for instance, that the applicants were unfit persons, or their house an improper place. To oppose and prevent the issuance of a license on such grounds would be perfectly lawful, in the absence of a corrupt or malicious motive. And therefore the question finally resolved itself into this: Did the purpose of the threat (the extortion of money) convert into an unlawful injury that which in the absence of such motive would not have been criminal or actionable?

Why, it has been asked, could not the Court have taken into consideration the notorious facts that Schmitz was Mayor of the city and Ruef the political boss of the party in possession of the city government? The answer to this question is that . . . the Legislature of California, by a constitutional law, has enumerated the facts of which Courts may take judicial notice in the absence of proof, and by necessary implication has excluded all others, including the fact that any particular person is Mayor or political boss of any particular city. Necessarily, facts which must be proved, where they are matters of proof, must be alleged where they are matter of allegation, as in an indictment.

(2) Francis J. Heney (Assistant District Attorney of San Francisco). Letter in the San Francisco Bulletin (October 31, 1908). In the opinion of Chief Justice Beatty in People v. Schmitz, and his subsequent letter, . . . it is thus, in fact, conceded by the learned Chief Justice that if the indictment had alleged that Schmitz was mayor, it would have been sufficient, because the Court could then have taken judicial notice in that connection of the influence which the mayor possesses officially over the board of police commissioners, and that, therefore, when Schmitz threatened the French restaurant-keeper that he could and would prevent him from securing a license, the intended victim was justified, as a reasonable man, in believing that Schmitz possessed the power, through his official position, to influence the police commissioners, whom Schmitz had appointed and over whom he possessed the power of removal, to reject the French restaurant-keeper's application for a license, regardless of the merits of the application.

Yet the Court's refusal to take notice in this case ignores the plain language of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1875, subdiv. 5, enumerating the kinds of facts of which judicial notice may be taken: "The accession to office and the official signatures and seals of office of the principal officers of government in the legislative, executive and judicial departments of the State and the United States." The Political Code, § 343, provides, "The number and designation of the civil executive officers are as follows: A governor; . . . such other officers as fill offices created by or under the authority of general laws for the government of counties, cities and towns, or of the charters and special laws affecting the same." Surely the Mayor of the City and County of San Francisco, the largest in the State, is a "principal officer" of the executive department of this State, as thus defined. Moreover, in a decision of this Supreme Court rendered in 1896, the broad principle is stated that "the judicial notice which Courts take of matters of fact embraces those facts which are within common knowledge of all, or are of such general notoriety as to need no evidence in their support." . . .

Furthermore, the opinion of the Court indicates that the justices did look into the record of the case to some extent and consequently the Court must have known that the defendant Schmitz was fully apprised, at the time of the trial, of the fact that he was charged with having used the prestige of his official position, together with the prestige of Abe Ruef as political boss, to extort money from the French restaurant keepers under a threat to prevent them from securing the liquor licenses. The case was tried on behalf of the defendant by able and learned attorneys upon this very theory. It cannot be possible, therefore, that any substantial injustice was done the defendant by not alleging these evidentiary facts in the indictment. Surely no substantial injustice was done to the defendant by failing to inform him in the indictment that he was the mayor of this city and county at the time he is alleged to have made the threat and to have extorted the money. He could not have been taken by surprise by our failure to allege that fact, for he is presumed to be sane and to be gifted with at least ordinary senses of sight and hearing and at least an ordinary memory.

(3) JOHN H. WIGMORE. Letter in the Liberator (Vol. I, No. 8, San Francisco, Jan. 30, 1909). I have read the letter of Mr. Heney, and the letter of the Chief Justice, and have re-read the opinion of the Court in People v. Schmitz. The Chief Justice's letter and Mr. Heney's reply turn largely on the legal rule of judicial notice. The learned Chief Justice finds himself iron-bound by the rules of that subject. But the whole spirit of the rules is misconceived by him. Their essential and sole purpose is to relieve the party from proof, — that is, from proof of facts which are so notorious as not to need proof. When a party has not averred or evidenced a fact which later turns out, in the Supreme Court's opinion, to be vital, the rule of judicial notice helps out the judge by permitting him to take the fact as true, where it is one so notorious that evidence of it would have been superfluous. Now these helping rules are not intended to bind him, but the contrary, i.e., to make him free to take the fact as proved where he knows the proof was not needed. Moreover, it follows, since these rules cannot foresee every case new times and new conditions will create, that they can always receive new applications. The precedents of former judges, in noticing specific facts, do not restrict present judges from noticing new facts, provided only that the new fact is notorious to all the community. For example, the unquestioned election of William H. Taft as President of the United States is notorious; but no man named William H. Taft has ever been elected President, and no judicial precedent has noticed the fact. Yet no Court would hesitate to notice this new notorious fact.

The principle is stated in masterly form by Professor James Bradley Thayer, in his "Preliminary Treatise on Evidence" (1898, p. 300): "Practical convenience and good sense demand an increase rather than a lessening of the number of instances in which Courts shorten trials, by making prima facie assumptions, not likely, on the one hand, to be successfully denied, and, on the other, if they be denied, admitting readily of certification or disproof. . . . There is a wide principle, covering some things already mentioned, that Courts may and should notice without proof, and assume as known by others, whatever, as the phrase is, everybody knows. The application of such a principle must, as I have said, leave a great range of discretion to the Courts; only in a large and general way can any one say in advance what are and what are not matters of common knowledge. . . .

Courts may judicially notice much which they cannot be required to notice. That is well worth emphasizing, for it points to a great possible usefulness in this doctrine, in helping to shorten and simplify trials; it is an instrument of great capacity in the hands of a competent judge; and is not nearly as much used, in the region of practice and evidence, as it should be. This function is, indeed, a delicate one; if it is too loosely or ignorantly exercised it may annul the principles of evidence and even of substantive law. But the failure to exercise it tends daily to smother trials with technicality and monstrously lengthens them out."

If, then, a man named Schmitz was notoriously Mayor of San Francisco, and a man named Ruef was notoriously its political boss, at the time in question, that is all that any Court needs; and the doctrine of judicial notice gives it all the liberty it needs. It is conceivable that a trial judge might sometimes hesitate in applying this doctrine of notoriety, because the trial Court might fear that the Supreme Court would not perceive the notoriety. But there never need be any such hesitation in a Supreme Court, if that Court does see the notoriety.

And this is just where the learned Chief Justice is to be criticised.

He does not for a moment ask or answer the question, "Did we actually, as men and officers, believe these facts to be notoriously so?" but refers to certain mechanical rules, external to his mind. What that

Supreme Court should have done was to decide whether they under the circumstances did actually believe the facts about the status of Schmitz and Ruef to be notorious. In not so doing, they erred against the whole spirit and principle of judicial notice.

And Mr. Heney's demonstration that there is nothing in the codes to forbid them is complete; for, of course, the Code of Procedure, in telling them (Section 1875) that "the Courts take judicial notice of the following facts," simply gave them a liberty of belief as to those specified facts, and did not take away their liberty as to other unspecified facts.

But there is a deeper error than this in the learned Chief Justice's letter, and in the Court's opinion. The letter says: "If by means of these allegations or otherwise it had been made to appear that the defendants had caused the applicants to believe that they could and would influence the Police Commissioners to reject their application regardless of its merits, I have never doubted that the indictment would have been sufficient." He stakes his decision on this point. The point is that, in determining the fear caused by the threat, which constituted extortion, the belief of the restaurant-keeper as to Schmitz's and Ruef's power, and not their actual power, was the essential thing. If that is so, then of what consequence was it whether one or the other was Mayor or boss? And of what consequence was it whether those facts were averred or judicially noticed? None at all. The indictment alleged that the threats were made to use influence or power over the Commissioners, and that their purpose was to obtain money by means of (i.e., through fear of) such threats. Obviously, then, the actual power or influence was immaterial; and the belief of the restaurant-keeper, the only material fact, was a question of the evidence on the trial, and not of the legal sufficiency of the indictment. All the lucubrations about judicial notice were therefore beside the point.

The inconsistency of the learned Chief Justice, in thus taking as essential the actual status of Schmitz and Ruef, is further seen in his next paragraph. There he declares "it could not be assumed that such private persons could prevent the issuance of the license otherwise than by adducing good reasons." But why does he assume that, on the contrary, a threat by a Mayor or a boss could prevent the issuance of the license otherwise than by adducing good reasons? He says that if it had appeared that the threats were made by a Mayor and a boss, then this would have sufficed, because, in his own words, their influence to reject the application would have been used "regardless of its merit." See what this means. Suppose that two persons, a Mayor and a private citizen, tell a restaurant-keeper that they will do all they can to induce a Commissioner to revoke the license unless money is paid; for one of these persons the learned Chief Justice immediately assumes that he can and will do this "regardless of its merits"; for the other he says "it cannot be assumed." Why not for one as much or as little as the other? He does not say that the private person could not possibly succeed in influencing the Commissioner corruptly — he merely says that "it cannot be assumed." On the other hand, why assume it for the Mayor? Surely a Mayor might fail in trying to influence an honest Commissioner by a corrupt threat to remove him. In short, either assume that on the facts of the trial a private person might have power to influence corruptly the license; in which case an allegation of his Mayoralty would be superfluous. Or else refuse to assume that a Mayor, merely as such, could and would inevitably influence a Commissioner corruptly; in which case the mere allegation of his being Mayor would not be enough, and judicial notice would not cure. But the Chief Justice says it would be enough! He is plainly inconsistent.

The truth is that the learned Chief Justice, in endeavoring to support his decision, weaves a logical web, and then entangles himself in it. We do not doubt that there are dozens of other Supreme Justices who would decide, and are to-day deciding, in obscure cases, just such points in just the same way as the California case. And we do not doubt that there are hundreds of lawyers whose professional habit of mind would make them decide just that way if they were elevated to the bench to-morrow in place of those other jurists who are now there. The moral is that our profession must be educated out of such vicious habits of thought. One way to do this is to let the newer ideas be dinned into their professional consciousness by public criticism and private conversation.

Such disputations were the life of scholarship and of the law three hundred years ago. They are out of place to-day. There are enough rules of law to sustain them, if the Court wants to do so. And there are enough rules of law to brush them away, if the Court wants to do that.

ALL THE RULES IN THE WORLD WILL NOT GET US SUBSTANTIAL JUSTICE IF THE JUDGES HAVE NOT THE CORRECT LIVING MORAL ATTITUDE TOWARD SUBSTANTIAL JUSTICE.

BOOK VI. THE SO-CALLED PAROL EVIDENCE RULES

795. Introductory.[1] At the outset certain discriminations must be kept in mind: (1) First and foremost, the rule is in no sense a rule of evidence, but a rule of substantive law. It does not exclude certain data because they are for one or another reason untrustworthy or undesirable means of evidencing some fact to be proved. It does not concern a probative mental process, — the process of believing one fact on the faith of another. What the rule does is to declare that certain kinds of fact are legally ineffective in the substantive law; and this of course (like any other ruling of substantive law) results in forbidding the fact to be proved at all. But this prohibition of proving it is merely the dramatic aspect of the process of applying the rule of substantive law.

(2) Next, the matter excluded by the rule is not inherently or even most commonly anything that can be properly termed "parol." That word (in spite of its numerous other derived applications) signifies and implies essentially the idea "oral," i.e. matter of speech, as contrasted with matter of writing. Now, so far as the phrase "parol-evidence rule" conveys the impression that what is excluded is excluded because it is oral — because somebody spoke or acted other than in writing, or is now offering to testify orally —, that impression is radically incorrect. When the prohibition of the rule is applicable, what is excluded may equally be written as oral, — may be letters and telegrams as well as conversations; and where the prohibition is applicable on the facts to certain written material, nevertheless for the very same transaction certain oral material may not be prohibited.

(3) There is no one and undivided parol-evidence rule. There are at least four distinct principles or bodies of doctrine. They concern a common subject — legal acts —, but their content and details are separate and distinct. The case lies very much as if we possessed one term "action" for all the various forms of remedial procedure.

(4) The parol-evidence rule is not the only rule which concerns the use of written things. There are several other rules, with which it has nothing to do, that also have something to say about writings, — the chief of which are the rule about Producing Documentary Originals and the rule about Authenticating Documents.

(5) Finally, it needs to be insisted, in opposition to the popular and natural view which tends to thrust itself forward at trials, that a writing has no efficacy per se, but only in consequence of and dependence upon other circumstances external to itself. The exhibition of a writing is often made as though it possessed some intrinsic and indefinite power of dominating the situation and quelling further dispute. But it needs rather to be remembered that a writing is, of itself alone considered, nothing — simply nothing. It must take life and efficacy from other facts, to which it owes its birth; and these facts, as its creator, have as great a right to be known and considered as their creature has. Granting that there is a writing before us: Has it been brought home to anybody as his act? Was it meant so supersede other materials? Was it essential to the transaction? What external objects does it apply to? These are questions which cannot be answered without looking away from the writing to other data; and until they are answered the efficacy of the writing is merely hypothetical. There is no magic in the writing itself. It hangs in mid-air, incapable of self-support, until some foundation of other facts has been built for it.

In short, then, (1) the parol-evidence rule is not a rule of evidence; (2) nor is it a rule for things parol; (3) nor is it a single rule; (4) nor is is all of the rules that concern either parol or writing; (5) nor does it involve the assumption that a writing can possess, independently of the surrounding circumstances, any inherent status or efficacy.

II. What, then, is the Parol-Evidence rule? It concerns the constitution of legal acts. This requires a brief notice of the nature of legal acts.

Only a small part of conduct is legal conduct, i.e. conduct having legal effectiveness. The conduct which is allowed to have such effect is a legal act.[1]

For the purpose of specific varieties of legal acts — sale, contract, release, and so on —, there are specific requirements, varying according to the subject. But there are also certain fundamental elements, common to all, and capable of being generalized. These elements present problems which run through all the varieties of legal acts, and must therefore be analyzed and discussed in union. What has to be done, therefore, is to compare under one head the principles common to all legal acts, and to take account of the specific variations for specific kinds of acts. This is what the "parol evidence" rule does in our law.

These principles fall into four groups, marking the four possible elements of every legal act: (A), The Enaction, or Creation, of the act; (B), its Integration, or embodiment in a single memorial, when desired;

[1] "There is a very important class of acts in which the legal result follows because that result was itself contemplated and desired as one of the consequences of the act. From the fact that legal results are in contemplation in this class of acts, the Germans call them Rechtsgeschäfte, Frenchmen call them actes juridiques. English lawyers have not yet agreed upon any name for them. The terms 'juristic acts' and 'acts in the law' have been suggested" (Markby, Elements of Law, 3d ed., § 235).

(C), its Solemnization, or fulfilment of the prescribed forms, if any; and (D), the Interpretation, or application of the act to the external objects affected by it. Of these four, the first and the fourth are necessarily involved in every legal act; the second and the third may or not become practically important, but are always possible elements.

A. The Enaction, or Creation, of an act is concerned with the question whether any legal act at all, or a legal act of the alleged tenor, has been consummated; or, if consummated, whether the circumstances attending its creation authorize its avoidance or annulment.

B. The Integration of the act consists in embodying it in a single utterance or memorial, — commonly, of course, a written one. This process of integration may be required by law, or it may be adopted voluntarily by the actor or actors; and, in the latter case, either wholly or partially.

C. The Solemnization of the act concerns the forms which are required by law to attend it in order to give it legal effect. There is no universal formality required in common for all acts. Thus the formalities of attestation, seal, registration, and the like are essential for some but not for other acts.

D. The Interpretation of an act is the application of it to external objects, in the process of defining and enforcing the right or obligation affected by its terms. The words of a legal act are merely the symbols by which the actor indicates the external objects which the act is expected to affect — a lot of land or a barrel of sugar or John Doe the legatee.

For these four elements in the act, the principles are independent of each other, — so independent, indeed, that they sometimes appear to be contradictory; and the chief inherent difficulty in their application arises from the necessity of distinguishing which element and which principle is really involved.

TITLE I. ENACTION OF A LEGAL ACT

796. History.[1] The two chief problems have been that of the finality of the utterance, and that of the correspondence between intent and expression, i.e., how far a formal delivery of a document is essential and decisive, and how far an unexpressed intent can be allowed to overthrow the outward act.

As might have been expected, the progress has been from a strict formalism to a liberal and flexible practicality. The mark of primitive legal standards, throughout all, is formalism, — a characteristic already noted here in its effects upon other parts of the law. It must be kept in mind, for appreciating the traditions against which the modern law has had to struggle.

In earlier times, outward technical form reigned supreme.

Thus it comes down to the succeeding centuries that the technical and unvarying symbol of finality is a delivery of the deed. "Delivery," says Chief Baron Gilbert, in the early 1700s, "is necessary to the essence of a deed, and the deed takes effect from the delivery; so that unless the delivery be proved, there is no perfect proof of the deed." The first signs of flexibility are seen in the concession that a draft deed (an "escrow," or mere scroll), placed in the hands of a second person for subsequent handing to the grantee, is not yet effective. This concession, moreover, is still refused for a draft deed placed directly in the grantee's hands in anticipation of some future event which shall make it effective; there can be no escrow to a grantee, it was said. It has been reserved for very modern times to repudiate this last relic of primitive formalism.

Passing to the problem of intent as competing with expression, it is equally plain that the primitive legal conception was strictly formalistic.

"A strictly formal system of law knows no contrast between the will and the utterance, and no possibility of a contradiction between the two. This is thoroughly the conception of the Germanic law. The utterance is the law's embodiment. No more, and yet no less, than what is uttered can bind or loose. Hence the minute precision with which obligations of debt were written out. . . . Hence the legal proverbs, 'one man one word,' 'the word stands,' 'words make the bargain,' and the like. A necessary result is that mistake in contractual relations receives but scanty consideration. . . . All that a man does is judged alone by its external manifestations and its objective effect, not by his inward motive."[2] In one aspect the history seems to have begun to change at an early stage, — namely, the doctrine of mistake as applied to the contents of the writing. That a man who could not read had sealed a document which had been incorrectly read over to him, was recognized, before the 1400s, as sufficient to relieve him from liability. Perhaps in the earlier cases, the inclination was to restrict it to instances of fraud by the other party to the document, and the Latin maxims used by the judges suggest that they had borrowed something from an alien and more advanced system. But by the 1500s it appears to be conceded that a false reading by a stranger is equally fatal to the deed; and the only controversy then remaining is whether the deed may be valid as to the part correctly read while void as to the part falsely read. For literate persons, there seems never to have been any doubt that a mistake of intent could not avail to avoid the document; and the doctrines of mutual mistake and the like are the product of equity and modern rationalism.

SUB-TITLE I. ACT VOID FOR INCOMPLETENESS

798. THOROUGHGOOD'S CASE (1601. 9 Co-Rep. 137)

If A makes a writing to B and seals it, and delivers it to B as an escrow, to take effect as his deed when certain conditions are performed, it has been adjudged to be immediately his deed, for the law respects the delivery to the party himself, and rejects the words which will make the express delivery to the party upon the matter no delivery. . . . And therewith agrees the report of 19 H. 8. 8. a. and takes the difference when it is so delivered to the party himself, and when to a stranger, as it was there agreed.

799. PYM v. CAMPBELL

QUEEN'S BENCH. 1856

6 E. & B. 370

ACTION on a contract to purchase shares in an invention. The contract was dated Jan. 17, 1854, named the respective shares and prices, and was signed by Campbell, Pym, Mackenzie, and Pritchard.

The defendants gave evidence that, in the course of the negotiations with the plaintiff, they had got so far as to agree on the price at which the invention should be purchased if bought at all, and had appointed a meeting at which the plaintiff was to explain his invention to two engineers appointed by the defendants, when, if they approved, the machine should be bought. At the appointed time the defendants and two engineers of the names of Fergusson and Abernethie attended; but the plaintiff did not come; and the engineers went away. Shortly after they were gone the plaintiff arrived. Fergusson was found, and expressed a favorable opinion; but Abernethie could not then be found. It was then proposed that, as the parties were all present, and might find it troublesome to meet again, an agreement should be then drawn up and signed, which, if Abernethie approved of the invention, should be the agreement, but, if Abernethie did not approve, should not be one. Abernethie did not approve of the invention when he saw it; and the defendants contended that there was no bargain. The Lord Chief Justice told the jury that, if they were satisfied that, before the paper was signed, it was agreed amongst them all that it should not operate as an agreement until Abernethie approved of the invention, they should find for defendant on the pleas denying the agreement. Verdict for the defendants.

Thomas, Serjt., in the ensuing term, obtained a rule nisi for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.

Watson and Manisty, now showed cause. — The direction was correct. . . . If the defendants had signed this as an agreement, they could not have shown that the agreement was subject to a condition. But they may show that the writing was signed on the terms that it should be merely void till a condition was fulfilled; for that shows there never was a contract. . . .

Thomas, Serjt., and J. H. Hodgson, contra. — The very object of reducing a contract to writing and signing it is to prevent all disputes as to the terms of the contract. Here the attempt is to show by parol that the agreement to take this invention was subject to a condition that Abernethie approved; while the writing is silent as to that.

Erle, J. — I think that this rule ought to be discharged. The point made is that this is a written agreement, absolute on the face of it, and that evidence was admitted to show it was conditional; and if that had been so it would have been wrong. But I am of opinion that the evidence showed that in fact there was never any agreement at all. The production of a paper purporting to be an agreement by a party, with his signature attached, affords a strong presumption that it is his written agreement; and, if in fact he did sign the paper animo contrahendi, the terms contained in it are conclusive, and cannot be varied by parol evidence. But in the present case the defence begins one step earlier; the parties met and expressly stated to each other that, though for convenience they would then sign the memorandum of the terms, yet they were not to sign it as an agreement until Abernethie was consulted. I grant the risk that such a defence may be set up without ground; and I agree that a jury should therefore always look on such a defence with suspicion; but, if it be proved that in fact the paper was signed with the express intention that it should not be an agreement, the other party cannot fix it as an agreement upon those so signing. The distinction in point of law is that evidence to vary the terms of an agreement in writing is not admissible, but evidence to show that there is not an agreement at all is admissible.

Crompton, J. — I also think that the point in this case was properly left to the jury. If the parties had come to an agreement, though subject to a condition not shown in the agreement, they could not show the condition, because the agreement on the face of the writing would have been absolute, and could not be varied. But the finding of the jury is that this paper was signed on the terms that it was to be an agreement if Abernethie approved of the invention, not otherwise. I know of no rule of law to estop parties from showing that a paper, purporting to be a signed agreement, was in fact signed by mistake, or that it was signed on the terms that it should not be an agreement till money was paid, or something else done. When the instrument is under seal it cannot be a deed until there is a delivery; and when there is a delivery that estops the parties to the deed, that is a technical reason why a deed cannot be delivered as an escrow to the other party. But parol contracts, whether by word of mouth or in writing, do not estop. There is no distinction between them, except that where there is a writing it is the record of the contract. The decision in Davis v. Jones, 17 Com. B. 625, is, I think, sound law, and proceeds on a just distinction; the parties may not vary a written agreement; but they may show that they never came to an agreement at all, and that the signed paper was never intended to be the record of the terms of the agreement; for they never had agreeing minds. Evidence to show that does not vary an agreement, and is admissible.

800. BURKE v. DULANEY

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. 1894

153 U. S. 228; 14 Sup. 816

THIS action was brought by the testator of the appellees, upon a writing purporting to be the promissory note of the appellant for forty-three hundred and eight dollars and eighty cents, dated Salt Lake City, Utah, August 10, 1883, and payable one year after date, for value received, at the bank of Wells, Fargo & Co. in that city, with interest at the rate of six per cent per annum from date until paid.

The defendant, Burke, denied his liability upon the note, and at the trial below was sworn as a witness on his own behalf. In support of his defence, as set forth in the answer filed by him, he stated the circumstances under which the note was given. He said: "Mr. Dulaney bought this group of mines — the Live Yankee and the Mary Ellen. He came to the Walker House in Salt Lake, and wanted me to run them for him. I said I would not do it unless I got a show to get some interest in the property. He says, I will carry an interest for you, and you can take it if you want it, and if not, you can give it back to me after you see the property." To this testimony the plaintiff objected, and the defendant admitting that the agreement referred to by him was oral, the objection was sustained. To this ruling he excepted. Being asked what he did after giving the note in suit, he answered: "I gave the note. I worked on the property, which was done some time in September; worked the property until March; settled up all of its debts, paid them, notified Dulaney I wanted nothing more to do with the property; that I was going to Idaho Territory, to Cœur d' Alêne mines, and as I was ready to give him a deed at any time he would send me my note. That is all." Objection being made by the plaintiffs to this testimony, the defendant offered to prove "that at the time of the giving of the note and prior thereto, Dulaney, the payee of the note, agreed with Mr.

Burke, the maker of the note, that the note should be given to represent the price of the interest that Mr. Burke was to have, conditioned upon his demanding it after an inspection of the mining property mentioned." He offered also to prove that after inspecting the property and testing it, the defendant notified testator that he did not want the interest; that he was prepared to make a deed for the interest to the latter, and demanded the delivery of his note.

All this evidence was excluded by the Court upon motion of the plaintiffs, to which ruling the defendant excepted. The defendant having stated that the conversation with the testator above referred to, and which was executed by the Court, took place prior to the execution of the note, he offered to prove that at the time the note was made, the same agreement was made orally between him and the testator. This testimony was also excluded, and he excepted. . . .

Mr. W. B. Heyburn, for appellant, submitted on his brief.

Mr. Lehigh Robinson, for appellee. It is not easy to conceive of a more complete contradiction and variation of a promissory note to pay a certain sum, to a certain party, than the contradiction and variation and transformation which would be accomplished by the admission of proof to turn a precise and distinct negotiable note into an option to purchase real estate. . . . "It is a firmly settled principle, that parol evidence of an oral agreement alleged to have been made at the time of the drawing, making, or endorsing of a bill, cannot be permitted to vary, qualify, or contradict, or add to or subtract from the absolute terms of the written contract," Forsythe v. Kimball, 91 U. S. 291, 294. . . . In a suit at law, by the payee against the maker, "evidence is inadmissible to show that the note was not intended to be a promissory note, but was given as a memorandum not to be enforced against the maker." Burnes v. Scott, 117 U. S. 582.

HARLAN, J. — The general rule that a written contract cannot be contradicted or varied by evidence of an oral agreement between the parties before or at the time of such contract, has been often recognized and applied by this Court, especially in cases in which it was sought to deprive bona fide holders of or parties to negotiable securities of the rights to which they were entitled according to the legal import of the terms of such instruments. . . . The authorities cited do not determine the present case. The issue here is between the original parties to the note. And the evidence offered by the appellant, and excluded by the Court, did not in any sense contradict the terms of the writing in suit, nor vary their legal import, but tended to show that the written instrument was never, in fact, delivered as a present contract, unconditionally binding upon the obligor according to its terms from the time of such delivery, but was left in the hands of Dulaney, to become an absolute obligation of the maker in the event of his electing, upon examination or investigation, to take the stipulated interest in the property in question. In other words, according to the evidence offered and excluded the written instrument, upon which this suit is based, was not — except in a named contingency — to become a contract, or a promissory note which the payee could at any time rightfully transfer. Evidence of such an oral agreement would show that the contingency never happened, and would not be in contradiction of the writing. It would prove that there never was any concluded, binding contract entitling the party who claimed the benefit of it to enforce its stipulations. The exclusion of parol evidence of such an agreement could be justified only upon the ground that the mere possession of a written instrument, in form a promissory note, by the person named in it as payee, is conclusive of his right to hold it as the absolute obligation of the maker. While such possession is, undoubtedly, prima facie, indeed, should be deemed strong evidence that the instrument came to the hands of the payee as an obligation of the maker, enforcible according to its legal import, it is open to the latter to prove the circumstances under which possession was acquired, and to show that there never was any complete, final delivery of the writing as the promissory note of the maker, payable at all events and according to its terms. The rule that excludes parol evidence in contradiction of a written agreement presupposes the existence in fact of such agreement at the time suit is brought. But the rule has no application if the writing was not delivered as a present contract. . . .

For the reasons stated, and without considering the case in other aspects, we are of opinion that it was error to exclude the evidence offered by the defendant tending to show that the writing sued on was not delivered to or received by Dulaney as the promissory note of the defendant, binding upon him as a present obligation, enforcible according to its terms, but was delivered to become an obligation of that character when, but not before, the defendant examined and, by working them, tested the mining properties purchased by the plaintiff, and elected to take the stipulated interest in them.

801. STANLEY v. WHITE

SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS. 1896

160 Ill. 605; 43 N. E. 729

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Iroquois county; the Hon. CHARLES R. STARR, Judge, presiding.

This was a bill for partition, filed by Stanley R. White, against John Stanley and others, in the circuit court of Iroquois county. The cause was heard upon the original and amended bills of Stanley R. White, the answers thereto, and the cross-bills of Jane S. Talliaferro, Mark A. Stanley and Dicie A. Warren, and the answers and replications thereto. The testimony was taken before the master in chancery, and upon the filing of his report the Court found all the allegations in complainant's bills and in the cross-bills to be true, and that partition and division ought to be made as prayed in complainant's bills, and rendered a decree accordingly. From that decree defendant, John Stanley, prosecutes this appeal. He objects to that part of the decree awarding partition of the north-east quarter of the southwest quarter of section 33, township 27, north, range 12, west of the second principal meridian. His contention is, that Jane Talliaferro, Mark Stanley and Dicie Warren have no rights in said land, and are not entitled to the one-sixth interest each therein ordered by said decree to be set off to them. He claims that their interests therein they had conveyed to him by a good and sufficient deed prior to the institution of this suit, and he asks that the decree, as to that part of it awarding to said Jane Talliaferro, Mark Stanley and Dicie Warren a one-sixth interest each in said land, be reversed.

The evidence shows that appellant and Jane Talliaferro, Dicie Warren, Mark Stanley and Joseph Stanley, children, and Stanley R. White, grandchild, of Micajah Stanley, who died intestate, are his sole surviving heirs. Among other lands of which he died seized was the land above described. After his father's decease, appellant desired to obtain a conveyance to himself of the interests of the heirs in said land. To that end he had prepared for him the deed here in controversy which bears the date of March 15, 1889, and was signed by Mark A. Stanley and Jennie E., his wife, Jane S. Talliaferro, widow, and Dicie A. Warren and George E., her husband, all of whom admit that they signed the deed with a full knowledge of its contents. Mark A. and Jennie E. Stanley and Jane S. Talliaferro duly acknowledged the deed on July 25, 1889, and it was acknowledged by Dicie A. and George E. Warren on November 1, 1892. The evidence shows that all of the grantors did not sign the deed at the same time, but that some signed at one time and others at other times, and that after the several signings the deed was each time returned either to appellant or to his mother, who was acting for him. The deed has remained under his control ever since the day it bears date. The grantors do not contend there was any fraud, duress or undue influence used to induce them to sign the deed. Their only claim is, that it was the understanding between them and appellant, at the time the deed was executed, that it was not to be operative unless signed by all the heirs of Micajah Stanley.

Morris & Hooper, and Robert Doyle, for appellant: Parties lose control of the deed by leaving it with the grantee. . . . A party is not allowed to show by oral evidence that the delivery was conditional, because this would be to permit him to change the terms of a written instrument by parol. . . .

Kay & Kay, for appellees: John Stanley was a mere agent of the grantors to procure the signatures to the deed, and not in possession of it as a grantee. It never came into his possession for any other purpose on the part of the grantors. . . .

Mr. Justice BAKER (after stating the case as above) delivered the opinion of the Court — The question to be decided is, was there, or was there not, a delivery of this deed by the grantors to appellant? The answer depends upon the answer to the further question, what was the intention of the parties at the time the transaction took place? If the parties intended that a present title should pass, then plainly there was a delivery. If, after appellees had signed and acknowledged the deed, they had merely handed it to appellant for the purpose, solely, of having him get the signatures of the other heirs thereto, that would not have constituted a delivery, but would have been a mere manual transfer of possession, and would not have passed the title. If, however, the deed being ready for delivery, they had given it to him intending at the time to pass a present title, but with the mutual verbal understanding that the deed should subsequently become inoperative and void if the other heirs should refuse to sign it when requested so to do, then there would have been a delivery and the title would have passed, and the grantors could not thereafter set up the non-performance of the condition in order to defeat the deed, but would be concluded by its terms. (Stevenson v. Crapnell, 114 Ill. 19; McCann v. Atherton, 106 id. 31; Weber v. Christen, 121 id. 91.) The latter hypothesis presents the facts shown by the record in this case. The deed, absolute on its face, was properly signed and acknowledged. The grantors were acquainted with its contents, and they deposited it with the grantee, and under his control it has remained ever since. The weight of the evidence shows that when the grantors gave him the deed they thought they were divesting themselves of the title, and intended so to do. Their only concern seems to have been that all the other heirs should do as they were doing, hence the condition was added that if the other heirs refused to sign the deed it should become void. That was the condition, and not that the deed was not to take effect unless signed by the other heirs. . . .

Appellees rely upon Roundtree v. Smith, 152 Ill. 493, . . . as sustaining their contention that there was here no delivery. The Roundtree case differs from the case at bar in this: that there the deeds were given by the grantor to the grantee with the mutual understanding that they were not to take effect until the return by the grantee of certain securities to the grantor, and that the deeds were to remain subject to the latter's control until the securities should be offered and accepted. The securities, however, were not given. We said there, as here, that the intention must govern, and held that there was no delivery because the deeds were not given to the grantee with the intention of then passing the title; that the grantor had never parted with the control over them, and she consequently had a right to demand them back at any time before the transaction was completed. . . .

We are of the opinion that appellant is entitled to the estate in the land in controversy which the deed here in question purports to convey to him.

802. Smith v. Dotterweich. (1911. New York. 200 N. Y. 299; 93 N. E. 985.) Werner, J. . . . There is no subtlety or ambiguity in the law of the subject; but there is difficulty in applying it to some cases in which there may be uncertainty as to the effect of oral testimony upon contracts which are wholly or partly reduced to writing. When the oral testimony goes directly to the question whether there is a written contract or not, it is always competent; but when the effect of the oral testimony is to establish the existence of a written contract, which it is designed to contradict or change by parol, then the spoken word must yield to the written compact. In Benton v. Martin, 52 N. Y. 570, 574, this Court very clearly enunciated the rule, which has always obtained in this State: "Instruments not under seal may be delivered to the one to whom upon their face they are made payable, or who by their terms is entitled to some interest or benefit under them, upon conditions the observance of which is essential to their validity. And the annexing of such conditions to the delivery is not an oral contradiction of the written obligation, though negotiable, as between the parties to it, or others having notice. It needs a delivery to make the obligation operative at all; and the effect of the delivery and the extent of the operation of the instrument may be limited by the conditions with which delivery is made. And so also, as between the original parties and others having notice, the want of consideration may be shown." This quotation sums up the whole of the law applicable to the case at bar in its present state, and outlines comprehensively the rule which has been followed in Bookstaver v. Jayne, 60 N. Y. 146; Grierson v. Mason, 60 N. Y. 394; Reynolds v. Robinson, 110 N. Y. 654; Schmittler v. Simon, 114 N. Y. 176, and other cases, under a variety of circumstances.

The case of Jamestown Business College Assn. v. Allen, 172 N. Y. 291, is a salient illustration of the converse of this rule. There the promissory note was rendered effective and complete by an unconditional delivery. The payee agreed to release the maker, and to cancel the note, upon a future contingency which might or might not arise. That was clearly a condition subsequent which brought the case within the general rule that a contract reduced to writing and complete in its terms, cannot be varied and contradicted by oral testimony. Eighmie v. Taylor, 98 N. Y. 288; Thomas v. Scutt, 127 N. Y. 133; Stowell v. Greenwich Ins. Co., 163 N. Y. 298; Mead v. Dunlevie, 174 N. Y. 108. Thus, to state the difference most concretely, the case at bar is one in which the oral testimony tends to show that the writing purporting to be a contract is in fact no contract at all, while in the case of the Jamestown Business College, the oral testimony was in direct contradiction of the written contract as to the existence and validity of which there was no controversy.

SUB-TITLE II. ACT VOID FOR LACK OF INTENT

804. Thomas Erskine Holland. Jurisprudence. (1886. 3d ed., 99.) It was laid down by Savigny that, in order to the production of a juristic act, the will and its expression must be in correspondence. This view is in accordance with the prima facie interpretation of most of the relevant passages in the Roman lawyers, and is still predominant in Germany, but certainly cannot be accepted as universally true. An investigation into the correspondence between the inner will and its outward manifestations is in most cases impossible, and where possible is in many cases undesirable. . . . Is it the case that a contract is not entered into unless the will of the parties are really at one? Must there be, as Savigny puts it, "a union of several wills to a single, whole, and undivided will"? Or should we not rather say that here, more even than elsewhere, the law looks, not at the will itself, but at the will as voluntarily manifested? When the law enforces contracts, it does so to prevent disappointment of well-founded expectations, which, though they usually arise from expressions truly representing intention, yet may occasionally arise otherwise. If, for instance, one of the parties to a contract enters into it, and induces the other party to enter it, resolved all the while not to perform his part under it, the contract will surely be good nevertheless. Not only will the dishonest contractor be unable to set up his original dishonest intent as an excuse for non-performance, but should he, from any change of circumstances, become desirous of enforcing the agreement against the other party, the latter will never be heard to establish, even were he in a position to do so by irrefragable proof, that at the time when the agreement was made the parties to it were not really of one mind. . . .

The language of systems of positive law upon the point is generally ambiguous, nor is this to be wondered at. The question is practically a new one. The process of giving effect to the free acts of the parties to a contract, rather than to the fact that certain rigidly defined formalities have been complied with, has lasted so long that legal speculation has only recently begun to analyze the free act itself into two factors of an inner will and an outward expression, and to assign to one or to the other a dominant place in the theory of contract. Just as the Romans used, without analyzing them, the terms "velle," "concensus," "sententia," so the modern Codes, though some appear to look rather to the inner will, others rather to its outward expression, as a rule employ language which is capable of being interpreted in either direction. The same may be said of the English cases. In these one constantly meets with such phrases as "between him and them there was no consensus of mind," "with him they never intended to deal;" but one also meets with much that supports the view of the question which we venture to hope may ultimately commend itself to the Courts as being at once the most logical and the most favorable to the interests of commerce. . . . In other words: the legal meaning of such acts on the part of one man as induce another to enter into a contract with him, is not what the former really intended, nor what the latter really supposed the former to intend, but what a "reasonable man," i.e., a judge or jury, would put upon such acts. This luminous principle at once sweeps away the ingenious speculations of several generations of moralists, while it renders needless long lists of subtle distinctions which have been drawn from decided cases.

COMMON PLEAS. 1869

L. R. 4 C. P. 704

ACTION by indorsee against indorser on a bill of exchange for 3000*l.* drawn on the 6th of November, 1867, by one Cooper upon and accepted by one Callow, payable six months after date, and indorsed successively by Cooper, the defendant, J. P. Parker, T. A. Pooley & Co., and A. G. Pooley, to the plaintiff, who became the holder for value (having taken it in part-payment of a debt due to him from A. G. Pooley) before it became due, and without notice of any fraud. The pleas traversed the several indorsements, and alleged that the defendant's indorsement was obtained from him by fraud.

The cause was tried before Bovill, C. J., at the last spring assizes at Guildford. The defendant, who was a gentleman far advanced in years, swore that the indorsement was not in his handwriting, and that he had never accepted nor indorsed a bill of exchange; but there was evidence that the signature was his; and Callow, who was called as a witness for the plaintiff, stated that he saw the defendant write the indorsement under the following circumstances: — Callow had been secretary to a company engaged in the formation of a railway at Sandgate, in Kent, in which the defendant (who had property in the neighborhood) was interested; and the defendant had some time previously, at Callow's request, signed a guarantee for 3000*l.*, in order to enable the company to obtain an advance of money from their bankers. Callow took the bill in question (which was drawn and indorsed by Cooper) to the defendant, and asked him to put his name on it, telling him it was a guarantee; whereupon the defendant, in the belief that he was signing a guarantee similar to that which he had before given (and out of which no liability had resulted to him), put his signature on the back of the bill immediately after that of Cooper. Callow only shewed the defendant the back of the paper; it was, however, in the ordinary shape of a bill of exchange, and bore a stamp, the impress of which was visible through the paper.

The Lord Chief Justice told the jury that, if the indorsement was not the signature of the defendant, or if, being his signature, it was obtained upon a fraudulent representation that it was a guarantee, and the defendant signed it without knowing that it was a bill, and under the belief that it was a guarantee, and if the defendant was not guilty of any negligence in so signing the paper, he was entitled to the verdict. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant.

Sir J. D. Coleridge, S. G., in Eastern Term last, obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the grounds of misdirection and that the verdict was against evidence.

Ballantine, Serjt., Brown, Q. C., and Archibald, showed cause. Two questions arise here, — 1. Whether there was any negligence on the part of the defendant in signing the document as he did. 2. Whether, assuming Callow's evidence to be true, the defendant can be responsible upon an indorsement so fraudulently obtained. In considering the first of these questions, regard must be had to the age and condition of the party. What would be negligence in a merchant or a banker would not necessarily be negligence on the part of a gentleman of great age and impaired physical powers. Negligence must in all cases be a relative term: Lynch v. Nurdin (1 Q. B. 29). Then, as to the second question. It is essential to every contract that there be volition. A man cannot be said to contract when he signs a paper upon a representation and under a belief that he is signing something different from that which it turns out to be; to make a valid and binding contract, the mind must go with the act. . . .

Sir J. D. Coleridge, S. G. Sir G. Honyman, Q. C., and Talfourd Salter, in support of the rule. The fact that the defendant's indorsement on the bill was obtained by a fraudulent representation that he was signing something else, is no answer to the claims of a bona fide holder for value without notice of the fraud. No doubt, as a general rule, fraud vitiates all contracts. But . . . no matter how a bill or note may be tainted with fraud, or even if it has been obtained by duress or by felony, that is no answer to an action at the suit of a bona fide holder for value. . . .

(Byles, J. — If that be right, it can only be with reference to the case of a complete instrument; it can hardly be applicable to the case where a man's signature has been obtained by a fraudulent representation to a document which he never intended to sign.)

Then, the verdict was clearly against the weight of evidence upon the question of negligence. . . .

July 5. The judgment of the Court (Bovill, C. J., Byles, Keating, and Montague Smith, JJ.) was delivered by Byles, J. — This was an action by the plaintiff as indorsee of a bill of exchange for 3000*l.*, against the defendant, as indorser. The defendant by one of his pleas traversed the indorsement, and by another alleged that the defendant's indorsement was obtained from him by fraud. The plaintiff was a holder for value before maturity, and without notice of any fraud. . . . A rule nisi was obtained for a new trial, first, on the ground of misdirection in the latter part of the summing-up, and secondly, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence.

As to the first branch of the rule, it seems to us that the question arises on the traverse of the indorsement. The case presented by the defendant is, that he never made the contract declared on; that he never saw the face of the bill; that the purport of the contract was fraudulently misdescribed to him; that, when he signed one thing, he was told and believed that he was signing another and an entirely different thing; and that his mind never went with his act. It seems plain, on principle and on authority, that, if a blind man, or a man who cannot read, or who for some reason (not implying negligence) forbears to read, has a written contract falsely read over to him, the reader misreading to such a degree that the written contract is of a nature altogether different from the contract pretended to be read from the paper which the blind or illiterate man afterwards signs; then, at least if there be no negligence, the signature so obtained is of no force. And it is invalid not merely on the ground of fraud, where fraud exists, but on the ground that the mind of the signer did not accompany the signature; in other words, that he never intended to sign, and therefore in contemplation of law never did sign, the contract to which the name is appended.

The authorities appear to us to support this view of the law. In Thoroughgood's Case (2 Co. Rep. 9*b*), it was held that, if an illiterate man have a deed falsely read over to him, and he then seals and delivers the parchment, that parchment is nevertheless not his deed. In a note to Thoroughgood's Case, in Fraser's edition of Coke's Reports, it is suggested that the doctrine is not confined to the condition of an illiterate grantor. . . . The position that, if a grantor or covenantor be deceived or misled as to the actual contents of the deed, the deed does not bind him, is supported by many authorities. . . . Accordingly, it has recently been decided in the Exchequer Chamber, that, if a deed be delivered, and a blank left therein be afterwards improperly filled up (at least if that be done without the grantor's negligence), it is not the deed of the grantor: Swan v. North British Australasian Land Company (2 H. & C. 175). These cases apply to deeds; but the principle is equally applicable to other written contracts.

Nevertheless, this principle, when applied to negotiable instruments, must be and is limited in its application. These instruments are not only assignable, but they form part of the currency of the country. A qualification of the general rule is necessary to protect innocent transferrees for value. If, therefore, a man write his name across the back of a blank bill-stamp, and part with it, and the paper is afterwards improperly filled up, he is liable as indorser. If he write it across the face of the bill, he is liable as acceptor, when the instrument has once passed into the hand of an innocent indorsee for value before maturity, and liable to the extent of any sum which the stamp will cover. In these cases, however, the party signing knows what he is doing; the indorser intended to indorse, and the acceptor intended to accept, a bill of exchange to be thereafter filled up, leaving the amount, the date, the maturity, and the other parties to the bill undetermined. But, in the case now under consideration, the defendant, according to the evidence, if believed, and the finding of the jury, never intended to indorse a bill of exchange at all, but intended to sign a contract of an entirely different nature. It was not his design, and if he were guilty of no negligence, it was not even his fault that the instrument he signed turned out to be a bill of exchange. It was as if he had written his name on a sheet of paper for the purpose of franking a letter, or in a lady's album, or on an order for admission to the Temple Church, or on the fly-leaf of a book, and there had already been, without his knowledge, a bill of exchange or a promissory note payable to order inscribed on the other side of the paper. . . . The defendant never intended to sign that contract, or any such contract. He never intended to put his name to any instrument that then was or thereafter might become negotiable. He was deceived, not merely as to the legal effect, but as to the actual contents of the instrument. . . .

For these reasons, we think the direction of the Lord Chief Justice was right.

With respect, however, to the second branch of the rule, we are of opinion that the case should undergo further investigation. We abstain from giving our reasons for this part of our decision only lest they should prejudice either party on a second inquiry.

The rule, therefore, will be made absolute for a new trial.

806. McNAMARA v. BOSTON ELEVATED RAILWAY COMPANY

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1908

197 Mass. 383; 83 N. E. 878

TORT for personal injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff while a passenger on an electric street car of the defendant. Writ in the Superior Court for the county of Suffolk dated August 17, 1905. The answer of the defendant alleged that the plaintiff's cause of action had been released by her "by an instrument in writing over her hand and seal."

At the trial, which was before DANA, J., the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that a fuse burned out upon the car upon which she was near the corner of Washington and Cobden streets in the Roxbury district of Boston and that, in the rush of the passengers to get out of the car, she was injured; that she left the car and reached the sidewalk "in a very weak, hurt condition" and walked to a nearby post, by which she was supported until she took another car to the Dudley Street transfer station, transferred there to the elevated train to Dover street, again transferred there to a South Boston car, that her friends accompanied her to C street, South Boston, but that she went the rest of the way to her home at 702 East Fifth street alone. Her testimony as to what occurred after she arrived at her home and until the defendant's agent came is stated in the opinion.

As to her interview with the agent of the defendant, she testified: "Well, I opened the door and the gentleman walked in and he said to me, 'Are you Mrs. McNamara,' and I said, 'Yes, sir,' and he said, 'You were on the car the accident happened,' and I said, 'Yes, sir,' and I can't remember what he was saying; all I remember of his saying was, 'Have you got any bones or limbs broken,' and I said, 'No,' and he said, 'Well,' he said, 'Are you going to sue the road when you have no bones or limbs broken?' and I said, 'Well, I can't tell what I will do until I see the doctor,' I said, 'I can't explain my, — the way I feel to you.' And he said he had been to the other houses and they all signed the paper, and handed me over the paper, and he said, 'You sign your name there,' and he said, 'Let me see,' he said, 'Has that paper got Margaret Riley signed in it?' and I returned him the paper, and he handed it back again, and I said, 'Well, now, you see my condition, I can't sign my name,' and he said, taking the paper from me, and putting it on a stiff envelope, 'Let me support it for you.' 'Well,' I said, 'It is impossible,' I said, 'I feel so sick,' and I remember of writing my name the best I could. . . . He asked me what doctor I was going to have and I told him my family physician. He put his hand in his pocket and took out a $5 bill and gave it to me, and I said, 'What is this for?' he said, 'That will pay the doctor.' " The testimony then proceeded: "Q. — Now, did he say anything about that paper; did he say anything about that paper being a release of all your claims against the Boston Elevated Railroad? A. — I can't remember of him saying anything. Q. — Now, did you read that paper? A. — No; I don't remember of reading it. Q. — Did he read it to you? A. — I don't remember. Q. — Did he give you any explanation about it at all? A. — I don't remember."

At the close of the evidence a verdict was directed for the defendant on the ground that the release which was in evidence barred the action; and the plaintiff excepted. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

William J. Sullivan and Jas. A. McGeough, for plaintiff. Robert G. Dodge and Alexander Kendall, for defendant.

Loring, J. — We are of opinion that the presiding judge was right in ruling that there was no evidence warranting a finding that the release given by the plaintiff was not binding on her.

It is settled on the one hand that it is no defense to a release that the person signing it neither read it nor understood its contents. Leddy v. Barney, 139 Mass. 394, 396; Rosenberg v. Doe, 146 Mass, 191, 193. This is but an application of the broad principle applied in a similar connection in Grace v. Adams, 100 Mass, 505. On the other hand it is also settled that a release can be avoided if there was a fraudulent misrepresentation as to its contents, and if the party signing it without reading it did so, relying on that misrepresentation. Bliss v. N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R., 160 Mass 447; Peaslee v. Peaslee, 147 Mass. 171. Further, there can be no question of his right to avoid it if he signed it when he did not have "legal competency to act," as it was put by Parker, C. J., in Farnam v. Brooks, 9 Pick. 212, 220.

The plaintiff's evidence here did not go far enough to warrant the jury in finding that the release signed by her was obtained by fraud, or that it was signed by her when she was in such a condition that she did not understand what she was doing; or, as Chief Justice Parker put it, when she did not have "legal competency to act." A fraudulent concealment of the contents of a release is not per se enough to avoid it. . . . The true rule is laid down in Freedley v. French, 154 Mass. 339, namely, that where the person to whom the release is given undertakes to state the contents of it and conceals a part of them, a fraudulent misrepresentation is made out.

1. So far as the representation goes that the defendant's agent had been to the other houses and all the ladies had signed the paper, or that he went to all the houses and they signed (it was put both ways in the testimony), there was no evidence that this was not the fact. Four of the plaintiff's fellow passengers who were put on the witness stand by her testified that they had signed a release. So far as appears, therefore, this statement was true. The statement did not mean that all the other women signed the identical piece of paper signed by the plaintiff. If all of them had signed a release the truth of this statement was made out.

2. The plaintiff did not testify that the defendant undertook to state the contents of the release. She did not testify that the $5 given her was paid to her to pay her doctor and so bring the case within Bliss v. New York Central & Hudson River Railroad, 160 Mass. 447. What the plaintiff testified to was that the defendant's agent said that the $5 given her "will pay for the doctor," not that the $5 was given her to pay the doctor.

3. Lastly, the evidence did not warrant a finding that when she signed the release the plaintiff did not know what she was about, or, as Chief Justice PARKER put it, that she did not have "legal competency to act." . . .

The only testimony which it could be argued went far enough is that of the plaintiff's husband that when he came home "somewhere around 5 o'clock" his wife "was hysterical and not able to give a clear story of the accident." What was in issue was whether she understood what she was doing when she took $5 and gave a release at about 4:15. On the stand she gave an intelligent account of that transaction; her husband testified that between 5 and 6 she "told the doctor how she got hurt, describing how the thing happened." She did not testify that she did not understand the transaction; the farthest that her testimony went was that after the agent left she was "in a very weak condition."

As we have said, the evidence did not, in our opinion, go far enough to warrant a finding that she did not have "legal competency to act" when she signed the release. Exceptions overruled.

807. GRAY v. JAMES

Supreme Court of North Carolina. 1909.

151 N. C. 80; 65 S. E. 644

Appeal from Cook, J., April Term, 1909, of Pitt. This action was originally tried before Lyon, J., at the November Term, 1907. The action was instituted by plaintiff, a subsequent purchaser of the land now in controversy, against J. R. Jenkins, mortgagee of this and other lands, and J. I. James, mortgagor and owner, and his wife, Lucy, et al., to enforce a sale of the mortgaged land in a certain order, as required by the rights and equities of plaintiff as subsequent purchaser. The mortgagee answered, setting up his indebtedness and the mortgage given to secure the same on all the land in controversy and other lands not embraced in plaintiff's deed. The mortgagor answered, and, among other things, alleged that the plaintiff's deed included more land than the agreement and contract between them authorized, and that the excess, to-wit, all that portion lying outside of the town of Oakley, was inserted in the instrument by reason of deceit and fraudulent representations on the part of plaintiff.

Among other things, the defendant (the plaintiff in the issue) testified that he had bargained with the plaintiff Gray concerning the land, and had agreed to sell and convey to him all that portion of the tract of land which lay within the boundaries of the town of Oakley for $600, and a store account amounting to about $20; and that some time after that, when the defendant and his wife were at the house of one Williams, some time between sundown and dark, plaintiff came to them with a deed already prepared, and a justice of the peace with him, and in conversation defendant told him he was only selling the land in town, and plaintiff replied the deed only covered the land in town; "said it was only a plain deed, like we had agreed upon. There was no reading done. Gray [the plaintiff] handed me the deed; I read the deed to where it mentioned E. R. Mizell's corner, and I said to Gray, 'you have the initials wrong,' and he said, 'it makes no difference; it is nothing but a plain deed; I am in a hurry to get back to the store; there is no one there but Mr. Rogers.' I handed the deed to Mr. Whichard. I had confidence in him. I thought he would tell me the truth, or I would not have signed it. Whichard was looking over the deed, and the plaintiff said the same thing to him — that he was in a hurry." No one read the deed to witness. He further testified that he did not know the deed embraced any land outside of the town, or he would not have signed the deed.

Mrs. James, wife of defendant, gave similar testimony as to what took place about reading the deed at the house, of the execution, and further that he had agreed to sign a deed for the land within the town, and said so at the time, and she would not have agreed to the execution otherwise. Mrs. Williams, sister of the defendant, testified that plaintiff Gray said it was not worth while to read the deed; that it was just a plain deed, containing what he bought.

Plaintiff further testified that, some time after executing the deed, he discovered that it was not restricted to the land within the town, but conveyed the entire tract to plaintiff, and same was worth $1,000 to $1,200.

On issues submitted, the jury rendered the following verdict:

1. "Did defendants agree to sell and convey to plaintiff only that portion of their land which is located within the boundary lines of the town of Oakley?" Answer: "Yes."

2. "Were defendants induced to execute the deed of November 16, 1905, containing that portion of their land lying outside the boundary lines of the town of Oakley, by the deceit and false and fraudulent misrepresentations of the plaintiff?" Answer: "Yes."

3. "Is the plaintiff the owner and entitled to the possession of the land described in the complaint?" Answer: "All that part in the town of Oakley."

4. "Does the defendant, J. I. James, unlawfully withhold the possession of said land from the plaintiff?" Answer: "Yes."

5. "What is the annual rental value of said land?" Answer: "Thirty-six dollars."

On such verdict judgment was rendered reforming plaintiff's deed according to the facts established, and directing a sale in a given order, and from that judgment plaintiff appealed. . . .

Jarvis & Blow and Moore & Long, for plaintiff. Moore & Dunn and Skinner & Whedbee, for defendant.

HOKE, J. (after stating the case). The objection chiefly urged for error is the refusal of the Court below to charge the jury "That the evidence in the case does not tend to prove facts sufficient to constitute fraud and deceit, and the jury is instructed, upon the whole evidence, if they believe it, to find the first and second issues 'No.'" But the objection, in our opinion, cannot be sustained. . . . We think it clear that the prayer of plaintiff, above noted, was properly refused by the judge below.

It is true that in an action of this character, the false statements must be such that they are reasonably relied upon by the complaining party. It is also true that when an adult of sound mind and memory, and who can read and write, signs or accepts a formal written contract, he is ordinarily bound by its terms. Floars v. Ins. Co., 144 N. C. 232. In such case it is very generally held that a man should not be allowed to close his mind to facts readily observable and invoke the aid of Courts to upset solemn instruments and disturb and disarrange adjustments so evidenced, when the injury complained of is largely attributable to his own negligent inattention.

Older cases have gone very far in upholding defences resting upon this general principle, and, as pointed out in May v. Loomis, 140 N. C. 357–358, some of them have been since disapproved and are no longer regarded as authoritative; and the more recent decisions, on the facts presented here, are to the effect that the mere signing or acceptance of a deed by one who can read and write shall not necessarily conclude as to its execution or its contents, when there is evidence tending to show positive fraud, and that the injured party was deceived and thrown off his guard by false statements designedly made at the time and reasonably replied upon by him. Some of these decisions, here and elsewhere, directly hold that false assurances and statements of the other party may of themselves be sufficient to carry the issue to the jury when there has been nothing to arrest attention or arouse suspicion concerning them. Walsh v. Hall, 66 N. C. 233; Hill v. Brower, 76 N. C. 124; May v. Loomis, 140 N. C. 350; Griffin v. Lumber Co., 140 N. C. 514. . . .

In Griffin v. Lumber Co., supra, the Court held as follows:

"3. Before signing a deed, the grantor should read it, or, if unable to do so, should require it to be read to him, and his failure to do so, in the absence of any fraud or false representation as to its contents, is negligence, for the result of which the law affords no redress; but when fraud or any devise is resorted to by the grantee which prevents the reading or having read the deed, the rule is different."

And like decision was made in May v. Loomis, supra.

Under these authorities, the judge below correctly ruled that the questions at issue should be submitted to the jury, the evidence bringing the case clearly within the principle stated. . . . There was testimony on the part of plaintiff in denial of defendant's claim; but, for the purpose of the exception, the evidence of defendant must be taken as true, and, as stated, presents a case for the consideration of the jury.

The exceptions to the ruling of the Court in questions of evidence are without merit, and the judgment for defendant is affirmed.

No error.

808. ESSEX v. DAY

SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS OF CONNECTICUT. 1885

52 Conn. 483

SUIT for the correction of certain bonds issued by the plaintiffs, which were in terms payable at the end of twenty years from their date, but which were intended to be issued with a provision that the town might at its option pay them in ten years from date; brought to the Superior Court in Middlesex County. The following facts were found by a committee: On the 25th day of September, 1869, the town of Essex subscribed for four hundred and eighty shares of the capital stock of the Connecticut Valley Railroad Company, and on the 27th day of April, 1870, directed the issue of town bonds to the amount of $48,000 to pay for the stock. . . .

At a special meeting held on the 27th day of April, 1870, a committee had made the following report: "That the town issue coupon bonds of the denomination of one thousand dollars each, numbered from one to forty-eight consecutively, to be payable at the option of the town in ten years from date, and due in twenty, denominated ten-twenty bonds, bearing interest six per cent per annum; the interest payable semi-annually; . . ." The town passed the resolution recommended and the selectmen at once entered upon their duties under it. They did not intend to have the bonds printed as they were printed, as below stated, but did intend that they should be printed so as to be payable at the option of the town in ten years from their date.

The printing of the bonds was procured by James C. Walkley, the president of the railroad company, who attended to that duty for Essex and other towns. He did it for Essex at the request of C. O. Spencer, agent of the town, who gave him a written memorandum which Mr. Walkley gave to the Kellogg & Bulkeley Printing Company, and which called for ten-twenty bonds only. The printing company consulted with Mr. Walkley as to the general form of the bonds, and showed him blank forms of bonds; but the bonds were printed twenty-year bonds by mistake in the printing. The bonds as printed were returned to the agents of the town, and "competent authority" appointed by the selectmen signed them and they were then left with the town treasurer to be sold. There were in all forty-eight bonds of $1,000 each. Of these bonds the four in question in this case were sold about January 1, 1870, to F. A. Tiffany, then a citizen of the town of Essex. Each bond had attached interest coupons payable every six months through the twenty years from date. . . . At the time the town treasurer signed the bonds he signed them supposing they were payable at the option of the town in ten years from their date. He signed them all without reading any of them. The bonds were left with the town treasurer for delivery to purchasers. . . .

At the time Tiffany bought the bonds the then town treasurer, Edward W. Redfield, told him that the bonds were ten-twenty bonds, and at the option of the town could be called in and paid at the expiration of ten years from their date, and that such was the vote of the town in authorizing the issue of the bonds. But Tiffany did not care whether the bonds were redeemable in five, ten, or twenty years, and would have bought them as readily in the one case as in either of the others. Tiffany sold these bonds in the autumn of 1878 to Daniel S. Swan. Before Swan bought them he called upon the then town treasurer in relation to the bonds, and to know what the action of the town would be, and the treasurer told him what the vote of the town was in authorizing the issue of the bonds, and that the town would call them in at the expiration of ten years from their date, and pay them up; and that the town had already called them in, but by mistake they had been called a year too soon. Swan sold these bonds to the defendant April 20, 1880, at a premium of not over two per cent. The defendant at the time of his purchase had full knowledge of the vote of the town in relation to the issue of the bonds, and that the town had called them for payment. . . . On the 25th of February, 1880, the town gave notice by publication in various newspapers that the bonds would be paid at the office of the treasurer on the 1st of April, 1880, and that interest upon them would cease at that time. None of the agents of the town appear to have had any knowledge that there had been a mistake in the issue of the bonds until the town was informed, after February 25, 1880, by the Chelsea Savings Bank, a holder of some of them, that the bonds on their face were twenty year bonds and not redeemable before. . . . Upon these facts the Court (Sanford, J.) rendered judgment for the plaintiffs and for a correction of the bonds by inserting in them an option on the part of the plaintiffs to pay them at the expiration of ten years from their date. The defendant appealed.

G. G. Sill, for the appellant. 1. The mistake arose from the gross negligence of the plaintiffs, and equity will not assist a person whose condition is attributable only to the want of that diligence which may fairly be expected from a reasonable person. . . . 2. If the defendant had the information that could be obtained from inspecting the records of the town, yet he had a right to rely on the recitals and words of the bond. . . .

J. Phelps and M. E. Culver, for the appellees.

Loomis, J. — It is not necessary for us to consider in this case whether the bonds issued by the town are to be regarded as negotiable and therefore protected in the hands of a bona fide holder against the correction which the plaintiffs seek to procure. We may assume for the purposes of this case, that, in the absence of notice on the part of the defendant of the error claimed by the plaintiffs to have intervened in the printing of the bonds, the correction could not be made.

Starting with this assumption, the questions which present themselves for consideration are the following: 1. Have the plaintiffs, through their agents, been guilty of such negligence, either in the original execution and issuing of the bonds, or in the seeking of a correction of the error when discovered, as precludes them from the equitable relief which they seek? 2. Did the first purchaser of the bonds, and afterwards the purchaser from him, and finally the defendant at the time of his purchase, have such knowledge of the error in the bonds, either actual or to be imputed, as gives the plaintiffs a right, as against them, to the equitable relief which they seek? 3. Was the error one of such a character that it can be corrected by a Court of equity? . . .

1. And first — have the plaintiffs been guilty of a fatal negligence? . . . We think therefore that the negligence of the plaintiffs, in the execution and issuing of the bonds, was not of such a character as to preclude all equitable relief against the present defendant. . . .

2. Did the first purchaser of the bonds in question, and afterwards the purchaser from him, and finally the defendant at the time of his purchase, have such knowledge of the mistake, either actual or to be imputed, as gives the plaintiffs a right, as against them, to the equitable relief which they seek? . . . We think the only reasonable view of the matter is, that the defendant knew, or had such information that the law would impute to him knowledge, that the bonds were by mistake issued as twenty year bonds instead of ten-twenty ones.

3. Was the mistake one of such a character that it can be corrected by a Court of equity? It is claimed by the counsel for the defendant that the mistake, in such a case, must be mutual, and the cause of the agreement, and numerous authorities are cited in support of the proposition. This rule, within the limits of its proper application, is founded in reason. If a contract is corrected by a Court of chancery to make it conform to the intention of one of the parties, it is of course forcing a contract upon the other party which he never intended to make, unless his own intent concurred with that of the other party.

But this case is not that of that character nor governed by that rule. A grantor by mistake embraces in his deed a parcel of land that neither party intended to have conveyed. The grantee sees his mistake, but does not call the attention of the grantor to it, and afterwards claims the parcel thus accidentally conveyed. Or a person offers a reward of $100 for the detection and arrest of a burglar, but by mistake and without his notice it is printed $1,000. A man who knows of the mistake arrests the burglar and claims the $1,000. In each of these cases the error is not mutual, but wholly on the one side. What is there on the other? Not mistake, but fraud. That fraud can never stand for a moment in a Court of equity. But suppose the case to be one where, instead of actual fraud, there is merely such knowledge, actual or imputed by the law, as makes it inequitable for the purchaser to retain his advantage. The Court will deal as summarily with that inequitable position of the party, as in the other case with his fraud. . . .

It is however claimed, on the part of the defendant, that the mistake must have been one that induced the contract on the part of the purchaser; that is to say, that the purchaser must have taken the bonds for the very reason that they were twenty year bonds and not ten-twenty ones. But it is obvious that the hardship attending the correction of a contract is all the greater where the other party accepted the contract for the reason that he supposed himself to be acquiring what the correction of it deprives him of. But supposing the purchasers of the bonds in question had taken them in entire indifference as to whether they were twenty year or ten-twenty bonds, and that the defendant was now endeavoring to assert rights under them to which he had before been indifferent, would there be no remedy in equity? Can it be claimed for a moment that equity, which deals with substance and not mere form, which applies reason and not mere arbitrary rules, would see no substantial difference between the case of a party who, when he accepted the contract, was indifferent with regard to a known mistake and so remained, and one who, at first indifferent, was now trying to take an unjust advantage of the mistake?

We conclude, therefore, that there was nothing in the nature of the mistake, or in the relation of the parties to it, that should lead a Court of equity to refuse the relief sought.

There is no error in the judgment.

In this opinion GRANGER and BEARDSLEY, JJ., concurred.

CARPENTER, J. (dissenting). . . . It will be observed that the negotiations related to existing bonds, and not to bonds to be subsequently prepared pursuant to any agreement they might make. There was no contract that the bonds should be of a certain description. Tiffany made no agreement whatever in relation to that matter. As to that he was totally indifferent. The town simply represented that an article which it had to sell was of a certain description. Tiffany neither assented to it nor denied it, as it was of no consequence to him. It was simply a sale of the bonds as they were, without warranty or other agreement. . . . But the plaintiff must not only show that there was such a contract, but also that Swan, a subsequent owner of the bonds, and the defendant, had notice of it when they purchased. In respect to Swan. . . . Here is no verbal agreement between Swan and the town, and there is not the slightest intimation that Swan had any knowledge whatever of any agreement with Tiffany. How is it with the defendant? In respect to him the finding is as follows: "Swan sold these bonds to the defendant April 20, 1880, at a premium of not over two per cent. The defendant at the time of his purchase had full knowledge of the vote of the town in relation to the issue of the bonds, and that the town had called them for payment." What is the effect of such knowledge? It gave the defendant no notice of any contract with Tiffany, and there is no other evidence that he had such notice. . . . The only evidence of such circumstances or implied agreement is the extract from the finding just quoted. If found there it is because the defendant then knew of certain facts. Now it is true that mere knowledge will often subject a man to pre-existing equities; but how it can be regarded as sufficient evidence of a contract, or, in law, as the equivalent of a contract, is beyond my comprehension. . . . These bonds had been in existence ten years; he found them in the market; he knew the claims of the town in respect to them; but he knew at the same time that they were not in fact as the town claimed them to be. Under these circumstances he had a perfectly legal, equitable, and moral right to purchase them, relying upon the liability of the town as therein expressed. A judicial decree changing them to his prejudice is arbitrary and unwarranted, and a decree for which I am sure no precedent can be found.

But suppose that I am wrong as to the facts, and in my conclusions therefrom; even then I say the law will not justify such a decree. . . . "Mistake in matter of law or matter of fact, to be a ground for equitable relief, must be of a material nature, and must be the determining ground of the transaction. . . ." It cannot be said that the mistake concerned the substance of the transaction; it concerned a mere incident, and that an unimportant one. . . .

But I go further, and insist that the probability is that the agents of the town did know of the omission before the bonds were sold, and that they sold them knowingly — in short, that there was no mistake. There is no direct explicit finding that there was a mistake. It is found that a mistake occurred in printing the bond, but the essential thing is, and that is not found, that the mistake was unknown when the bonds were sold and the money received. . . . But did it appear in evidence that they did not? That is the important inquiry; and the report gives us no answer, except by its silence. And such an answer must be regarded as a negative one. . . .

But suppose that I am wrong in this, and that the fact was clearly proved and expressly found, then another question arises. In 1 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, § 146, this rule is laid down: "It is not, however, sufficient in all cases to give the party relief that the fact is material; but it must be such as he could not by reasonable diligence get knowledge of, when he was put upon inquiry. . . ." The slightest diligence would have disclosed the fact. It was only necessary to read the bond to discover the omission. A want of slight diligence in such matters is culpable negligence.

The plaintiff then is in this dilemma, — if its agents read the bond they had knowledge of the mistake and issued the bonds understandingly, and that is fatal to the case; if they did not, they were guilty of culpable negligence, and that is equally fatal.

Fark, C. J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the result to which the majority of the Court have come upon the question whether the plaintiff town exercised its optional right to make the bonds payable at the end of ten years. . . .

I think there is error in the judgment appealed from.

809. MEDLEY v. GERMAN ALLIANCE INSURANCE CO.

Court of Appeals of West Virginia. 1904

55 W. Va. 342; 47 S. E. 101

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County; F. A. Guthrie, Judge.

Action by Lucy A. Medley against the German Alliance Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Watts & Ashby and Chilton, MacCorkle & Chilton, for plaintiff in error. A. W. McDonald, Brown, Jackson & Knight, Linn, Byrne & Cato, and A. B. Littlepage, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, P. The German Alliance Insurance Company complains of a judgment of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County rendered against it, and in favor of Lucy A. Medley, for the sum of $1,732, in an action of assumpsit upon a policy of insurance upon a dwelling house, and personal property therein, for the sum of $1,500; alleging that the Court erred in overruling its motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence, made at the conclusion thereof, and its motion to exclude all the evidence and direct a verdict, made after all the evidence had been introduced; in giving to the jury five several instructions, and each of them; in refusing to set aside the verdict; and in entering judgment thereon.

One of the principal defences to the action, raised by a proper plea, and which forms the subject-matter of instructions given and refused, is the alleged breach of a condition of the policy which reads as follows: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement endorsed hereon or added hereto shall be void . . . if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership; or if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple." No such provision was indorsed on the policy. Mrs. Medley's title to the land on which the building stood is evidenced by a deed by which the Kanawha Valley Bank, a corporation, "doth grant and convey unto" her the lot (describing it,) and which contains, in the habendum clause thereof, the following: "And it is fully understood and agreed between all of the parties herein interested that the said lot of land is hereby conveyed by the parties of the first part to the party of the second part for and during her lifetime and at and after her death the title to the said lot is to pass unto and vest in her children born and unborn."

No written application for the policy was made. The contract of insurance was effected by Thomas Popp, on behalf of the company, as its agent, and G. W. Medley, the husband of the plaintiff, as her agent. The insurance was solicited by the company through Popp, who inquired of Medley, before issuing the policy, as to the person in whose name the deed was, in response to which Medley said: "The deed is deeded to my wife and her heirs, born and unborn." George Medley, a son of the insured, says his father told Popp the property was deeded to his mother and her heirs, and also that there was a lien upon it by deed of trust for $300 in favor of Ben Baer. Both father and son say the agent inquired, not as to the estate or interest of Mrs. Medley in the property, but as to the name of the person to whom it was deeded. Popp's testimony was not taken.

The policy contained the following additional clause, limiting the authority of the agent: "This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions, together with such other provisions, agreements, or conditions as may be endorsed hereon or added hereto, and no officer, agent, or other representative of these companies shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, and as to such provisions and conditions no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured unless so written or attached."

1. In Wolpert v. Northern Assur. Co., 44 W. Va. 734, this Court held that "if an insurance company elects to issue its policy of insurance against a loss by fire without any regular application, or without any representation in regard to the title to the property to be insured, it cannot complain, after a loss has occurred, that the interest of the insured was not correctly stated in the policy, or that an existing incumbrance was not disclosed." . . . The agent of an insurance company, in preparing, or directing the preparation of, an application for insurance, acts for his company, and not for the applicant. He is the agent of the company, and not the agent of the applicant, and, in what he does, binds the company, and not the applicant, if he acts improperly.

"Though the weight of the modern authorities, as well as reason, in my judgment, leads to the conclusion that where an application for a policy, which is filled up by an agent of an insurance company, and signed by the insured on the faith that it has been properly filled up, who has not read the application, though he had an opportunity to do so, if none of the false answers were given by him, but were inserted by the agent of the insurance company either fraudulently or by mistake, where the mistake was not the result of anything said or done by the insured, the insured or assured is not bound by such false answers inserted in the application, but these answers should be regarded as the act of the insurance company, by its agent, and not as the act of the insured. It is true, this position is still controverted by respectable authorities. . . . But outside of Massachusetts the weight of authority now seems to be in favor of the position that, under circumstances above stated, false answers in the application for an insurance will not forfeit the policy, and I concur in this view." Green, J., in Schwarzbach v. Insurance Co., 25 W. Va. 622, 663.

This view is embodied in point 12 of the syllabus of said case. The same doctrine is reiterated in Deitz v. Insurance Co., 31 W. Va. 851. . . .

2. It is denied, however, that this law is applicable to the case in hand, for the reason that the policy contains a clause limiting the power of the company's agent to waive conditions of the policy. As the policy was delivered into the hands of the insured with this clause plainly printed in it, it is said that she had notice of it, and was bound to know, whether she read the policy or not, that the agent had no power to issue a policy upon any other conditions than those stated in it.

It is difficult to see any solid ground for this distinction. . . .

The decisions [supporting it] are founded largely upon that of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. 222, in which Mr. Justice MILLER, delivering the opinion, said:

"If, however, we suppose the party making the insurance to have been an individual, and to have been present when the application was signed, and soliciting the assured to make the contract of insurance, and that the insurer himself wrote out all these representations, and was told by the plaintiff and his wife that they knew nothing at all of this particular subject of inquiry, and that they refused to make any statement about it, and yet, knowing all this, wrote the representation to suit himself, it is equally clear that for the insurer to insist that the policy is void because it contains this statement would be an act of bad faith, and of the grossest injustice and dishonesty. And the reason for this is that the representation was not the statement of the plaintiff, and that the defendant knew it was not when he made the contract, and that it was made by the defendant, who procured the plaintiff's signature thereto. . . . The powers of the agent are prima facie coextensive with the business intrusted to his care, and will not be narrowed by limitations not communicated to the person with whom he deals."

But this is said not to be applicable to the case in hand, for the reason that notice of the agent's want of authority to waive conditions was not brought home to the applicant in that case. It is also said that a limitation in the policy is notice. . . . It is further said that subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as some prior to that of Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, are authority for the position that the limitation clause in the policy is notice. . . . Another one is Assurance Co. v. Building Ass'n, 183 U. S. 308, relied upon by this Court as authority for the decision in Maupin v. Insurance Co. 45 S. E. 1003, and it does actually decide as follows: "Where fire insurance policies contain provisions whereby agents may, by writing indorsed upon the policy or by writing attached thereto, express the company's assent to other insurance, such limited grant of authority is the measure of the agent's power. Where such limitation is expressed in the policy, the assured is presumed to be aware of such limitation." This much of the decision is based upon the prior decisions of that Court hereinbefore referred to and explained, all of which are cases showing either that there was notice in the application prior to the issuance of the policy, or that the principle had only been applied to conditions in the policy, the violation of which subsequent to its issuance rendered it invalid and noneffective. Hence it is clear that the doctrine has been extended in this last case to limits beyond those theretofore defining its application. . . . Moreover, at best, it is only presumptive, not conclusive or actual, notice. In the case last cited, the Court says the assured is presumed to be aware of such limitation. . . .

A large number of the States hold, for one reason or another, that the limitation, expressed in the policy, of the authority of the agent, or prohibition of his authority to waive conditions, has no application to those conditions which relate to the making or inception of the contract, but only to conditions inserted in the contract as actually made, and to be thereafter observed. . . . For this position, decisions by the Courts of Georgia, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, New York, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Texas, Wisconsin, and West Virginia are cited, and there are others. . . . So, in Dewees v. Manhattan Ins. Co., 35 N. J. Law 366, . . . it appears that the only trouble in New Jersey as to this power of waiver is the selection of the proper forum in which to assert it. You cannot have it in a Court of law, but you may have it in a Court of equity. In this State no such difficulty exists. This Court has not been turning the assured round to a suit in equity to have reformation of this contract. . . .

3. The only ground upon which this right of reformation can be denied is laches. How is the person into whose hands the policy of insurance is placed to know whether it has been drawn according to the verbal understanding of the parties, until after he has read it? Is he to reject it upon suspicion? Has he not the right to assume for the time being that it has been properly drawn? As a matter of fact, is it not common knowledge that agents are relied upon to properly prepare the policies, and that they are scarcely ever critically examined before acceptance? There can be no notice until after the reading, and, after the acceptance of the policy, there can be nothing more than a sort of implied notice; and a Court of equity will not hold the party guilty of laches for mere negligence to actually read the policy, any more than it will in the case of a deed. . . .

4. The only new element in this case which could possibly distinguish it from the decisions made by this Court, to which reference has been made (as holding that where the agent of the company issues a policy without having taken any written application therefor, or, having taken one, has incorrectly stated therein the information given to him by the applicant, the company is estopped from relying upon facts, existing at the time the contract was made, differing from those incorrectly stated in the application for the policy) is the alleged notice of want of authority in the agent, conveyed by incorporating the limitation clause in the policy. If this is not notice, there is nothing else in the case which forms the basis of even a pretence that it is to be distinguished from the other cases. Nothing more need be said to show that it is not conclusive, actual notice, irrevocably and unalterably binding the insured. To say so would be to take a position inconsistent with the law relating not only to insurance contracts, but all other kinds of contracts. . . .

In this case the agent of the insured, when solicited to take insurance upon the property, did not say that the title of the insured was the fee-simple estate in the property. He said either "the deed is deeded to my wife and her heirs born and unborn," or that "the property was deeded to Mrs. Medley and her heirs." To any one but a person learned in the law, this would hardly be taken to mean the fee-simple title. To the layman it imports an estate in the heirs. Under the rule in Shelley's Case, the word "heirs" in such deed is a word of limitation, and not of purchase; and the rule involves intricate and fine distinctions, incomprehensible to any person except those who have studied the law. Upon this information, the agent assumed to write in the policy that Mrs. Medley owned the fee-simple title to the lot on which the building stood. Had he put upon that policy the words actually used by the agent of the insured, the company would, no doubt, have made inquiries which would have disclosed the actual state of the title. If the company has been prejudiced, the fault rests with its own agent. Upon the principles hereinbefore referred to, it is clear that no advantage of it can be taken by the company. . . .

Hence the Court did not err in refusing to give defendant's instructions Nos. 3, 4, and 9, which read as follows:

"(3) The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the agent, Thos. Popp, who solicited said insurance, inquired of the agent and husband of the plaintiff as to who owned the property to be insured, and said agent stated to said Popp, in answer to said inquiry, that the deed to said real property was to his wife and her heirs, born and unborn, or to her and her heirs, then the plaintiff is not entitled to a verdict in this case. . . .

For the other error above noted, as well as for insufficiency of evidence to support the verdict, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, a new trial granted, and the case will be remanded.

Reversed.

Note by BRANNON, J.— I agree to the judgment.

1. I do not agree to the opinion excusing one from reading a policy before he accepts it, and excusing him from its conditions because he did not read or understand it. I think that when a man accepts a deed he is bound by its terms. If it departs from the agreement, and he accepts it, he waives the points of departure. The agreement is merged. The deed is a contract; so is a policy of insurance. Weidert v. State Ins. Co., 20 Am. St. R. 809. I do not agree to take from the company the condition that the policy should be void, if the insured owned less than a fee. A company would be willing to take a risk, if the insured owned a fee, but not if he owned only a life estate. . . . The insured is bound to know the meaning of the policy, and cannot plead ignorance of law.

2. I do not agree to allow oral evidence preliminary to the contract to change its terms. The authorities given in Maupin v. Scottish Union, 45 S. E. 1003 (53 W. Va. 557), will sustain this view. That oral evidence is that the agent was told that the deed was to Mrs. Medley and heirs. That in law meant a fee simple, just as the policy says. So, the agent did not write the policy different from the statement, in the eye of the law.

3. I do not agree that the disability of the agent to waive vital conditions extends only to things occurring subsequently to the issue of the policy. It is agreed that an agent may not, after the policy issues, waive conditions; but it is said before it issues, he may waive the duty of the insured to conform thereafter to its requirements, and may waive the presence or existence of essential facts at the date of issue, for instance, that the party has a fee simple. That is, though the company is willing to risk only on the basis of a certain state of things, yet the agent in every place can waive them, and accept another basis, and this in the face of the policy which says that it is issued on the faith of a certain specified basis, and further that no agent can dispense with that basis. This seems to deny right of contract and to be hard and unjust to insurance companies, which are valuable institutions to the country. . . . I have always understood that a purchaser of and is bound to know, whether in fact he does or not, clauses, conditions and limitations, not only in the last instrument in the chain of title, the deed to him, but also away back in any deed in the chain; but here it is proposed to release a party from a condition set before his eyes in the very deed to him. Waldron v. Harvey, 46 S. E. 603, 54 W. Va. 608. An insurance company deals with persons far off, and has to do so by agents. If bound by their waivers, by agreements between the insured and the agents, it would be ruined. It would be subject to oral evidence, sometimes true, oftener false. It is absolutely necessary that it put its terms and conditions in its policy, and if you nullify these, it has no protection. You impair, destroy its contracts. . . .

4. As to the argument that the agent was told one thing as to the title, and wrote another in the policy, and therefore the policy can be reformed, so as to conform to the statement. That makes it conform to what the one side agreed to, but what the other side never agreed to. That forces on the company a contract it never made. Equity never reforms a deed except to correct mutual mistake. Where both sides do agree to the same particular thing, and agree to have an instrument drawn to do that thing, and the scrivener fails to make the document accomplish what both parties intended it to do, equity will reform; but not where both sides never agreed to do that same thing. In the one case you carry out the intention of both sides; in the others, you carry out the intention of one side, but defeat the intention of the other, and make for him a new agreement. In such case equity will rescind, but not reform. Ferrel v. Ferrel, 53 W. Va. 515.

Some of our decisions may seem in contrast with the view above expressed, and if it were not for the recent labored consideration of the whole question by the Supreme Court of the United States in Northern Co. v. Grand View, 183 U. S. 308, I should not be so insistent upon the matters above discussed. . . .

Judge MILLER concurs in this note.

810. BAXENDALE v. BENNETT

Queen's Bench Division. 1878

L. R. 3 Q. B. D. 525

Action commenced on the 10th July, 1876, on a bill of exchange, dated the 11th of March, 1872, for 50*l.* drawn by W. Cartwright and accepted by the defendant, and of which the plaintiff was the holder, and her interest. At the trial before Lopes, J., without a jury, at the Hilary Sittings in Middlesex, the following facts were proved: The bill dated the 11th of March, 1872, on which the action was brought, purported to be drawn by one W. Cartwright on the defendant, payable to order at three months' date. It was indorsed in blank by Cartwright, and also by one H. T. Cameron. The plaintiff received the bill from Cameron on the 3rd of June, 1872, and was the bona fide holder of it, without notice of fraud, and for a valuable consideration. One J. F. Holmes had asked the defendant for his acceptance to an accommodation bill, and the defendant had written his name across a paper which had an impressed bill stamp on it, and had given it to Holmes to fill in his name, and then to use it for the purpose of raising money on it. Afterwards Holmes, not requiring accommodation, returned the paper to the defendant in the same state in which he had received it from him. The defendant then put it into a drawer, which was not locked, of his writing table at his chambers, to which his clerk, laundress, and other persons coming there had access. He had never authorized Cartwright or any person to fill up the paper with a drawer's name, and he believed that it must have been stolen from his chambers.

On these facts the learned judge found that the bill was stolen from the defendant's chambers, and the name of the drawer afterwards added without the defendant's authority; but that the defendant had so negligently dealt with the acceptance as to have facilitated the theft; he therefore ruled upon the authority of Young v. Grote (4 Bing. 253), and Ingham v. Primrose (7 C. B. (N. S.) 82), that the defendant was liable, and directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for 50*l.* and costs. . . .

May 4. Bittleston (Rolland, with him), for the defendant. The question is, whether a blank acceptance, lost by the alleged acceptor, before its delivery to any one, and subsequently filled up by a stranger and put into circulation, can be sued on by a bona fide holder for value. No action can be brought on such an instrument, for it is merely an inchoate bill; and there can be no implied authority to any one to make the bill complete, for it was never intended that it should be issued. . . . Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253, and Ingham v. Primrose, 7 C. B. (N. S.) 82; 28 L. J. (C. P.) 294, will be relied on by the plaintiff, but in those cases the documents were complete. Awde v. Dixon, 6 Ex. 869, is in point for the defendant. There is no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant to make him liable to the plaintiff. . . . Leaving the blank acceptance in an unlocked drawer in his chambers is not that species of negligence which disentitles the defendant from insisting that the bill is invalid. . . .

Jeune, for the plaintiff. The defendant having been guilty of negligence, the plaintiff, being a holder for value, is entitled to recover. . . . In Byles on Bills, 11th ed. at p. 187, the author seems to be of opinion that the writer of a blank acceptance not delivered, but lost or stolen without any negligence on his part, would not be liable; in the present case the defendant has been guilty of such negligence as, according to Ingham v. Primrose, 7 C. B. (N. S.) 82; 28 L. J. (C. P.) 294, would make him liable. In that case the defendant gave the bill to M. to get it discounted, and M., failing to do so, returned it. The plaintiff then tore it in half and threw it into the street. M. picked it up, joined the pieces together, and negotiated it. The jury found that the defendant intended to cancel the bill; he was, however, held liable on the authority of Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253, on the ground that he had led to the plaintiff becoming the holder of it for value.

Bramwell, L. J. — I am of opinion that this judgment cannot be supported. The defendant is sued on a bill alleged to have been drawn by W. Cartwright on and accepted by him. In very truth he never accepted such a bill; and if he is to be held liable, it can only be on the ground that he is estopped to deny that he did so accept such a bill. Estoppels are odious, and the doctrine should never be applied without a necessity for it. It never can be applied except in cases where the person against whom it is used has so conducted himself, either in what he has said or done, or failed to say or do, that he would, unless estopped, be saying something contrary to his former conduct in what he had said or done, or failed to say or do. Is that the case here? Let us examine the facts. The defendant drew a bill (or what would be a bill had it had the drawer's name) without a drawer's name, addressed to himself, and then wrote what was in terms an acceptance across it. In this condition, it, not being a bill, was stolen from him, filled up with a drawer's name, and transferred to the plaintiff, a bona fide holder for value. It may be that no crime was committed in the filling in of the drawer's name, for the thief may have taken it to a person telling him it was given by the defendant to the thief with authority to get it filled in with a drawer's name by any person he, the thief, pleased. This may have been believed and the drawer's name bona fide put by such person. I do not say such person could have recovered on the bill; I am of opinion he could not; but what I wish to point out is that the bill might be made a complete instrument without the commission of any crime in the completion. But a crime was committed in this case by the stealing of the document, and without that crime the bill could not have been complete, and no one could have been defrauded. Why is not the defendant at liberty to show this? Why is he estopped? What has he said or done contrary to the truth, or which should cause any one to believe the truth to be other than it is? Is it not a rule that every one has a right to suppose that a crime will not be committed, and to act on that belief? Where is the limit if the defendant is estopped here? Suppose he had signed a blank cheque, with no payee, or date, or amount, and it was stolen, would he be liable or accountable, not merely to his banker the drawee, but to a holder? If so, suppose there was no stamp law, and a man simply wrote his name, and the paper was stolen from him, and somebody put a form of a cheque or bill to the signature, would the signer be liable? I cannot think so.

But what about the authorities? It must be admitted that the cases of Young v. Grote and Ingham v. Primrose go a long way to justify this judgment; but in all those cases, and in all the others where the alleged maker or acceptor has been held liable, he has voluntarily parted with the instrument; it has not been got from him by the commission of a crime. This, undoubtedly, is a distinction, and a real distinction. The defendant here has not voluntarily put into any one's hands the means, or part of the means, for committing a crime. But it is said that he has done so through negligence. I confess I think he has been negligent; that is to say, I think if he had had this paper from a third person, as a bailee bound to keep it with ordinary care, he would not have done so. But then this negligence is not the proximate or effective cause of the fraud. A crime was necessary for its completion. . . .

Brett, L. J. — In this case I agree with the conclusion at which my Brother Bramwell has arrived, but not with his reasons. . . . It seems to me that the defendant never authorized the bill to be filled in with a drawer's name, and he cannot be sued on it. . . . In this case it is true that the defendant after writing his name across the stamped paper sent it to another person to be used. When he sent it to that person, if he had filled it in to any amount that the stamp would cover, the defendant would be liable, because he sent it with the intention that it should be acted upon; but it was sent back to the defendant, and he was then in the same condition as if he had never issued the acceptance. The case is this: the defendant accepts a bill and puts it into his drawer, it is as if he had never issued it with the intention that it should be filled up; it is as if after having accepted the bill he had left it in his room for a moment and a thief came in and stole it. He has never intended that the bill should be filled up by anybody and no person was his agent to fill it up. Then it has been said that the defendant is liable because he has been negligent; but was the defendant negligent? . . . He put the bill into a drawer in his own room; to say that was a want of due care is impossible; it was not negligence for two reasons, first, he did not owe any duty to any one, and, secondly, he did not act otherwise than in a way which an ordinary careful man would act. . . . In the present case I think there was no estoppel, no ratification, and no negligence, and that the defendant is entitled to our judgment.

BAGGALLAY, L. J., concurred, that the judgment ought to be entered for the defendant.

811. HUBBARD v. GREELEY

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MAINE. 1892

84 Me. 340; 24 Atl. 799

ON Report. This was a real action for the recovery of a tract of land on Mt. Desert Island, containing over forty-six acres, and called the Smallidge Lot. Writ dated February 28, 1888. The defendants claimed title by a regular chain of deeds, all seasonably recorded. Among other deeds they introduced one from Seavy and Clark to T. and R. W. Boyd, dated January 26, 1878, and recorded July 15, 1878, which the plaintiff claimed had been placed in escrow and was improperly delivered.

The plaintiff claimed title from deed of the Boyds, dated May 27, 1876, recorded September 24, 1887; deed of Seavy to Crowell dated September 15, 1874, but not recorded; deed of Clark and Crowell to himself, dated October 1, 1878, recorded August 25, 1879; and deed from Seavy to himself dated September 6, 1887, recorded September 9, 1887.

It was admitted that premises in 1872 belonged to one Swazey, under whom both parties claimed title. By mesne conveyances the title stood February 12, 1874, in Seavy, Clark and Boyds, one-third each. The principal issue between the parties turned on the question whether the plaintiff could properly show that the deed of Clark and Seavy, dated January 26, 1878, had been placed in escrow and was improperly delivered. The defendants, claiming that they were bona fide purchasers for value and without notice, objected to the admission of the evidence offered by the plaintiff on this point. The facts are found in the opinion.

A question of construction of this deed also arose, which is stated in the head note, relating to the quantity of interest in the land conveyed. It was conceded that if the Court decided against the plaintiff on the first question and in favor of the plaintiff upon the second question (one half of the "Smallidge" lot conveyed by that deed, making five-sixths in the Boyds), the plaintiff would be entitled by reason of his conveyances to the remaining one-sixth. . . .

Wiswell, King, and Peters, for plaintiff. A deed delivered without the consent of the grantor is absolutely void; it is like a forged or a stolen deed and passes no title to the grantor which he can part with. The principle, that where one of two innocent parties must suffer, he whose act has caused the loss must bear it, does not apply, because, principally, the depositary is not the agent of the grantor any more than of the grantee; he is simply a person agreed upon by both parties to hold the escrow until the happening of a particular event. Even if he was the agent of the grantor, as has often been insisted upon in argument, but not sustained by the authorities, he would be an agent only with limited authority, which authority is particularly understood by the grantee. There is no negligence upon the part of a person in placing a deed as an escrow in the hands of a responsible person agreed upon by the parties. There is no more equity in favor of the innocent purchaser than there is in favor of the person whose deed has been delivered without his knowledge and against his consent. The case is similar to that of a person who makes a deed, executes it, and keeps it in his possession ready for delivery when certain conditions have been complied with. If such a deed should be stolen for or by the grantor, it could not for a moment be claimed that it would pass any title to the grantee which he could convey to an innocent purchaser.

We think the whole distinction lies in the difference between a voidable deed and a void deed. If a deed is delivered with the consent of the grantor, even if that consent is obtained by fraud or even perhaps by duress, and under such circumstances that the grantor could reinvest himself with the title, yet until the deed is avoided, the title passes and the grantee can transfer that title to a purchaser for value, without notice, who can hold against the person who has been defrauded of his property; this is not true as to a forged deed, a stolen deed, or a deed delivered without the consent of the grantor. . . .

Hale and Hamlin, for defendants.

Walton, J. Whether the grantee named in a deed delivered as an escrow, who has wrongfully obtained it and put it on record, can convey a good title to a bona fide purchaser, is a question in relation to which the authorities are in conflict. In Blight v. Schenck, 10 Pa. St. 285, the Court held, in a full and well-reasoned opinion, that the title of a bona fide purchaser could not be defeated by proof that one of the deeds through which he claimed title was a wrongfully obtained and a wrongfully recorded escrow. The Court rested its decision on the fact that the custodian of an escrow is the agent of the grantor as well as the grantee, and, if one of two innocent persons must suffer by the wrongful act of the agent, he who employs an unfaithful agent, and puts it in his power to do the act, must bear the loss; that the agent has the power to deliver the deed, and, if he delivers it contrary to his instructions, he will be answerable to his principal; and it is therefore reasonable that the latter, and not the innocent purchaser, should bear the loss. In Everts v. Agnes, 4 Wis. 343, the contrary was held. But in the latter case the Court appears to have acted in ignorance of the decision in the former case, and in ignorance of the equitable doctrine upon which it rests, although the former decision was made six years before the latter. This, as it seems to us, was an unfortunate oversight; for the former decision is supported by reasoning so strong, and, as it seems to us, so satisfactory, we cannot resist the conviction that if the attention of the Court had been called to it, and the principles on which it rests, a different conclusion would have been reached; and the subsequent decisions, which have followed the lead of that, would have no existence.

But be this as it may, the authorities all agree that a deed cannot be delivered directly to the grantee himself, or to his agent or attorney, to be held as an escrow; that, if such a delivery is made, the law will give effect to the deed immediately, and according to its terms, divested of all oral conditions. The reason is obvious. An escrow is a deed delivered to a stranger, to be delivered by him to the grantee upon the performance of some condition, or the happening of some contingency, and the deed takes effect only upon the second delivery. Till then, the title remains in the grantor. And if the delivery is in the first instance directly to the grantee, and he retains the possession of it, there can be no second delivery, and the deed must take effect on account of the first delivery, or it can never take effect at all. And if it takes effect at all, it must be according to its written terms. Oral conditions cannot be annexed to it. It will therefore be seen that a delivery to the grantee himself is utterly inconsistent with the idea of an escrow. And it is perfectly well settled, by all the authorities, ancient and modern, that an attempt to thus deliver a deed as an escrow cannot be successful; that in all cases where such deliveries are made the deeds take effect immediately and according to their terms, divested of all oral conditions. And it is equally well settled that, if the delivery is to one who is acting at the time as an agent or attorney of the grantee, the effect is the same. . . .

The principal contention in the present case is whether one of the deeds through which the defendants have derived their title was legally delivered. The deed is from George E. Seavy and Nathaniel H. Clark to Thomas Boyd and Robert W. Boyd. It is dated January 26, 1878, was acknowledged the same day, and recorded July 15, 1878. The plaintiff claims that this deed was delivered as an escrow, and, although acknowledged and recorded, never became operative. Upon the proofs in the case, we do not think such an attack upon the defendants' title is permissible. The proof is that the deed was made and accepted in part payment of a debt owing from the grantors to the grantees, and that it was in fact delivered to one G. C. Bartlette, an attorney at law, who had been employed by the grantees to collect the debt; that Bartlette afterwards sent the deed by mail to the grantees, and that they caused it to be recorded; and that, at the time of the defendant's purchase, the deed had been on record for more than eight years, its validity apparently uncontested and unchallenged. And it is admitted that the defendants are innocent purchasers for value, and, at the time of their purchase, had no notice of the condition of the title other than that disclosed by the record. Under these circumstances, and for the reasons already given, we think the plaintiff is estopped to deny that the deed was legally delivered. We rest our decision upon the ground that the deed was, in fact, delivered to the grantees' attorney as such, and that such a delivery is equivalent to a delivery to the grantee himself; and that, when such a delivery is made, it is not competent for the grantor, or those claiming under him by a subsequent conveyance, to show by oral evidence that a condition was annexed to the delivery, for the nonperformance of which the deed never became operative.

It seems to us that to hold otherwise would render all deeds of little value as evidence of title. Escrows are deceptive instruments. They are not what they purport to be. They purport to be instruments which have been delivered, when in fact they have not been delivered. They clothe the grantees with apparent titles which are not real titles. Such deeds are capable of being used to enable the grantees to obtain credit which otherwise they could not obtain. They are capable of being used to deceive innocent purchasers. And the makers of such instruments cannot fail to foresee that they are liable to be used. And when the maker of such an instrument has voluntarily parted with the possession of it, and delivered it into the care and keeping of a person of his own selection, it seems to us that he ought to be responsible for the use that may in fact be made of it; and that in no other way can the public be protected against the intolerable evil of having our public records encumbered with such false and deceptive instruments.

Another question is, whether the deed conveys the whole or only an undivided half of the grantor's interest in the demanded premises. We think it conveys only an undivided half. . . .

Judgment for plaintiff for one undivided sixth part of the demanded premises, and no more.

PETERS, C. J., VIRGIN, EMERY, FOSTER and HASKELL, JJ., concurred.

812. A. M. KIDD. Delivery in Escrow. (1907. Illinois Law Review, II, 110.) Deeds — Delivery in Escrow. — As one ground for it decision, our Supreme Court, in Blake v. Ogden, 223 Ill. 204, seems to announce the rule that if A executes a deed in which B is grantee and then delivers the deed to a third person upon the condition expressed dehors, the deed itself that it is not to be delivered to B until the death of the grantor's wife, and the deed is delivered to the grantee B in breach of the condition, B, if he had no notice of the condition, will nevertheless obtain a legal title unimpeachable by the grantor in equity after the death of the grantor's wife, although B was a mere volunteer.

Many States hold rigidly to the view that, unless there is a delivery by the holder in escrow according to the terms of the condition, no legal title passes to the original grantee. Therefore, no legal title can pass to any subsequent grantee and it makes no difference whether the original grantee or any subsequent grantee is a bona fide purchaser for value or not (Smith v. South Royalton Bank, 32 Vt. 341; Everts v. Agnes, 6 Wis. 453; Gould v. Wise, 97 Cal. 532; Jackson v. Lynn, 62 N. W. R. 704 (Ia.); Harkreader v. Clayton, 56 Miss. 383). The Supreme Court should perhaps be regarded as repudiating this view.

Mr. Wigmore (4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2420) takes this position: "Whether the act has been completed, or delivered, is not to be determined by the actual intention of the actor, but by the inquiry whether his conduct produced as a reasonable consequence the appearance of finality to the other person." In short, the negligent conduct of the grantor may be made the substitute for an actual intent to deliver free of all conditions. It logically follows that "the very same conduct may constitute a valid legal act as against one person, though at the same time not as against another person." Such a principle, however, does not seem to explain the language used in the principal case; because there was no evidence that the third party selected as the holder in escrow was an improper person or that the grantor was in any degree negligent or failed to use proper precautions. Mr. Wigmore's view would seem to apply to the principal case only provided it were ipso facto negligent to make any delivery at all to a third party on condition. Perhaps some cases go so far. (Schurtz v. Colvin, 45 N. E. R. 527 (Ohio); Quick v. Milligan, 108 Ind. 419.)

It is true that the cases in which the bona fide purchaser is protected in a legal title against the grantor (Schurtz v. Colvin, 45 N. E. R. 527 (Ohio); Blight v. Shenck, 10 Pa. St. 285; Quick v. Milligan, 108 Ind. 419; Hubbard v. Greeley, 84 Me. 340) might proceed (apart from Mr. Wigmore's theory) upon the ground that the delivery contrary to the conditions dehors the deed imposed by the grantor nevertheless passes the legal title to the grantee, which the grantee may pass on to others, but that the original grantee or any subsequent purchaser with notice holds the legal title upon a constructive trust for the original grantor. In this view the only question is, what facts exist which cut off the equity of the grantor. Clearly it is cut off if the grantee or any subsequent purchaser from him is a bona fide purchaser.

In the case at bar, however, the facts do not come up to that. The grantee is innocent of any delivery in breach of the condition. He is not a purchaser for value, but a mere volunteer. Ordinarily this is not enough to cut off an equity. But the situation here is peculiar. The event upon which the grantee was to take was sure to have happened sometime and has in fact happened. It seems pretty hard to say that because of the act of the escrowee unknown to the grantee to be improper, the grantee is to be entirely deprived and the grantor's heir let in. And yet the grantor was doing what he wished with his own, and however little he may have been damaged or inconvenienced, the violation of his expressed wishes cannot be made good to him. The breach of the condition is nothing that can be made good to the grantor in money. In this respect the case is not unlike that where there is a breach by the tenant of a condition to keep the premises insured. Equity will not, under those circumstances, relieve the tenant from a forfeiture for breach of the condition, although the tenant has taken out insurance and though no loss has occurred: Rolf v. Harris, 2 Price 206; Reynolds v. Pitt, 19 Ves. Jr. 134; White v. Warner, 2 Meriv. 459; Green v. Bridges, 4 Sim. 96; Meek v. Carter, 4 Jur. N. S. 992. Then, too, if there be an equity raised in favor of the grantor in any case where the escrowee delivered contrary to the condition, it might seem unadvisable to make a distinction regarding those sorts of conditions the breach of which will raise a constructive trust of the legal title for the grantor and those that will not.

On the whole, therefore, the declaration of the Court in favor of the grantee might very properly have been reserved for further consideration in a case where the question actually arose.

813. Louis M. Greeley. Unauthorized Delivery of Escrow. (1912. Illinois Law Review, VI, 416.) In Forcum v. Elwood, 251 Ill. 301, the Supreme Court holds that where the grantor turns over his deed to a real estate agent to deliver to the grantee, the agent has no authority to deliver the deed to a third person fraudulently impersonating the grantee; and that want of delivery of the deed can be shown to defeat the title of one purchasing in good faith and for value from such third person. The law is clear that a deed delivered by a depositary in violation of the terms and provisions of the deposit or escrow is void for all purposes and that such unauthorized delivery may be shown to defeat the title of a bona fide purchaser for value from the grantee named in the deed. Everts v. Agnes, 4 Wis. 343; Jackson v. Lynn, 94 Iowa 151; Fearing v. Clark, 16 Gray 74; Devlin on Real Estate (3d ed.), § 322.

It is of interest to note that in the case of negotiable paper the contrary rule seems to prevail, and an innocent purchase for value before maturity is allowed to recover, though the instrument was originally delivered by an escrowee in violation of the escrow. Fearing v. Clark, 16 Gray 74; Vallette v. Parker, 6 Wend. 615. (Contra: Chipman v. Tucker, 38 Wis. 43; Roberts v. McGrath, 38 Wis. 52; Roberts v. Wood, 38 Wis. 60.) Under the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, § 16, it is clear the unauthorized delivery by the escrowee would be no defence as against a holder in due course.

814. GUARDHOUSE v. BLACKBURN

PROBATE AND DIVORCE. 1866

THE plaintiffs were residuary legatees under a will of Mrs. Hannah Jameson, who died on August 23, 1863, leaving a will dated May 30, 1851, and a codicil dated April 13, 1852. The defendants were the executors. The will charged the testatrix' three estates with legacies to the amount of $1,300.

The plaintiffs admitted the due execution of the will and codicil, and the only question raised by them was as to whether the words "therein and," at the end of the codicil, were entitled to probate. By their plea they denied that the codicil, as executed, expressed the wishes and intentions of the deceased; and alleged that she, having a mind to alter her will, sent for William Carrick, her solicitor, and gave him instructions for a codicil, which he reduced into writing, and which instructions were pleaded; which, after giving and revoking the legacies mentioned in the codicil as executed, concluded, "And I charge all the said legacies on my personal estate." That the said William Carrick, intending to prepare the said codicil for execution, and to make a few verbal alterations only, wrote out the paper propounded, but that he inadvertently, or by mistake, and without any instructions whatever to that effect from the deceased, wrote the words, "And I direct all the legacies therein and herein given (and not revoked) to be paid out of my personal estate," in lieu of "and I charge all the said legacies on my personal estate." That the effect of the said words, "therein and," which had the effect of discharging the estate of Scales of legacies to the amount of £500, and the estate of Stainton of the payment of legacies to the amount of £800, was not observed by the said William Carrick, nor by the deceased, when she executed the codicil, and that the said paper writing, containing the words "therein and," was not the codicil of the said deceased. William Carrick said in examination: He took the instructions from the testatrix by word of mouth, at her residence, and wrote them down in her presence on the draft. The draft was intended to be copied for execution. From the draft he prepared in her presence a copy for execution for her, varying in a few particulars from the draft, but not in substance, until he came to the words in dispute. He read over the draft to her, and asked if it was as she intended it. She expressed herself satisfied with it. He read the copy over to her, so that she could understand it. She said nothing, but proceeded to execute it. He retained the codicil in his custody until the deceased's death. She gave him no instructions to discharge the real estates of Scales and Stainton from the legacies of £1,300; and he had no instructions from her to insert the words "therein and." He inserted them by inadvertence. Her attention was not particularly directed to them, and his attention was first directed to them after her death.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. (Dr. Tristram with him), for the defendants, contended: First, it was not competent to the Court to vary a will by parol evidence. By so doing, the very object of the Wills Act would be defeated, which was to do away with all evidence except that which appeared within the four corners of the will. Secondly, the Court was asked to do what the deceased could not have done for herself in her lifetime. If she had inserted these words "per incuriam," and had after execution struck her pen through them, they would be restored to probate. Thirdly, there was no case in which a clause had been expunged from probate, unless it had been inserted by fraud. . . .

Dr. Spinks (Mounsey with him), for the plaintiffs, submitted there were two questions for the consideration of the Court. First, was parol evidence admissible to correct the mistake? It was laid down in 1 Williams on Executors, p. 330, 5th ed., that, if a particular clause had been inserted in a will by fraud, without the knowledge of the testator in his lifetime, it ought to be excluded from the probate. There was no distinction in principle, and there ought to be none in practice, in expunging a clause, whether inserted in a will by fraud or by mistake. The function of a Court of Probate was to ascertain what the testator intended to constitute as his will. . . . Secondly, did the evidence of Carrick satisfy the Court of the mistake? It was submitted it was ample to do so.

Sir J. P. Wilde. — The plaintiffs have cited the defendants to bring in the probate of the will and codicil of Mrs. Hannah Jameson, that it may be cancelled. The defendants have propounded these papers for probate; and the plaintiffs contend that the words "therein and" ought to be expunged from the codicil before probate is granted thereof. The effect of these words, which undoubtedly appear in the codicil, and were there, it is admitted, when it was executed, is to discharge certain portions of the real estate from pecuniary legacies of considerable amount, with which they were charged by the will. The ground upon which the Court is asked to expunge them is, that they were inserted by the attorney who drew the codicil by mistake, and without instructions. This is proven to be the fact (if the evidence is admissible, and can be relied upon) by the oath of the attorney, and by a paper which he swears to have been the rough draft of the codicil made by him in the presence of the testatrix, and from her verbal directions. . . . I must premise that the Wills Act has worked a great change in the old testamentary law, as administered by the ecclesiastical Courts on this head. Under that law, a testamentary paper needed not to have been signed, provided it was in the testator's writing; and all papers of a testamentary purport, if in his writing, commanded the equal attention of the Court, save so far as one, from its date or form, might be manifestly intended to supersede or revoke another, as a will superseding instructions, or a subsequent will revoking a former. . . . But the words of the Wills Act, "No will shall be valid" unless executed in a certain manner, obviously exclude the probate of unexecuted intructions altogether, and have rendered it no longer possible to the Court of Probate to treat them as part of a will. . . .

But then comes the question, if the Court cannot now, as it could before the statute, give effect to any provision omitted by mistake from the will, does it still retain the power to strike out any portion of the contents of a duly executed paper on the ground that, although such portion formed part of the paper when executed by the testator, it was inserted or retained by mistake or inadvertence? This is what is asked on the present occasion. Against this being done, it was strongly argued that the Court has no such power. The argument was put on several grounds, and, amongst others, upon the ground that parol evidence was inadmissible upon the question. . . .

The truth is, that the rules excluding parol evidence have no place in any inquiry in which the Court has not got before it some ascertained paper beyond question binding and of full effect. Nor indeed are these rules pressed in the Courts either of law or equity beyond this mark: For if the written document is alleged to have been signed under condition that it should not operate except in certain events, parol evidence has been admitted at law to prove such condition and the breach of it: see Pym v. Campbell, 6 E. & B. 370 [ante, No. 799]. Or if (going further still) some plain and palpable error has crept into the written document, equity formerly, and the Courts of common law now, sanction the admission of evidence to expose the error: see the case of Wake v. Harrop, 6 H. & N. 768. . . . Supposing, then, parol evidence to be admissible in such a case as the present, the question recurs, to what extent is it still open to the Court since the statute, to act upon such evidence, for the purpose of rejecting the whole or expunging any portion of the written testament to which the testator has duly affixed his name? . . .

After much consideration the following propositions commend themselves to the Court as rules which, since the statute, ought to govern its action in respect of a duly executed paper:

First, that before a paper so executed is entitled to probate, the Court must be satisfied that the testator knew and approved of the contents at the time he signed it.

Secondly, that except in certain cases where suspicion attaches to the document, the fact of the testator's execution is sufficient proof that he knew and approved the contents.

Thirdly, that although the testator knew and approved the contents, the paper may still be rejected, on proof establishing, beyond all possibility of mistake, that he did not intend the paper to operate as a will.

Fourthly, that although the testator did not know and approve the contents, the paper may be refused probate, if it be proved that any fraud has been purposely practiced on the testator in obtaining his execution thereof.

Fifthly, that, subject to this last preceding proposition, the fact that the will has been duly read over to a capable testator on the occasion of its execution, or that its contents have been brought to his notice in any other way, should, when coupled with his execution thereof, be held conclusive evidence that he approved as well as he knew the contents thereof.

Sixthly, that the above rules apply equally to a portion of the will as to the whole. . . .

It remains to say a few words on the fifth [proposition]. It is here that the right to derogate from the force of an executed paper approaches and receives its limit. And it is obvious enough, that if the Court should allow itself to pass beyond proof that the contents of any such paper were read or otherwise made known to the testator, and suffer an inquiry by the oath of the attorney or others as to what the testator really wished or intended, the authenticity of a will would no longer repose on the ceremony of execution exacted by the statute, but would be set at large in the wide field of parol conflict, and confided to the mercies of memory. The security intended by the statute would thus perish at the hands of the Court. . . . In the present case, the codicil was proved to have been read over to the testator before the execution thereof; she duly executed the same; and the Court conceives it to be beyond its functions or powers to substitute the oath of the attorney who prepared it, fortified by his notes of the testator's instructions, for the written provisions contained in a paper so executed. The probate will, therefore, be delivered out to the plaintiffs in its present form.

815. Beamish v. Beamish. (Chancery Division, Ireland, 1893. (1894) 1 Ir. Rep. 7, 21.) The President: This principle of proving knowledge and approval was discussed at great length at the bar, and I was pressed with the consideration that there was never a presumption de jure of the fact. Many authorities were cited, all of which I have considered, and I venture to state the following propositions:

1. Knowledge and approval of a will is necessary, and must be proved.

The execution of a will by a competent testator is presumptive and prima facie proof of the fact.

3. If the competent testator has read the will, or heard it read, the presumption is strong and conclusive, unless there are special circumstances attending the execution of the will. . . .

4. Among such special circumstances are fraud, as explained in Fulton v. Andrew, L. R. 7 H. L. 448, and which as so explained includes dereliction of duty, as illustrated in that case and Hegarty v. King, 7 L. R. Ir. 68. . . .

5. Whether read or not, if in any way the contents of the will have been brought to the notice of the testator, the effect is the same: Guardhouse v. Blackburn, L. R. I. P. & M. 116 [ante, No. 814] approved in Harter v. Harter, L. R. 3 P. & M. 11.

6. Even when there has been a reading of the will, but the state of the testator was such that he could not have had an intelligent appreciation of the words, he must be taken to have known and approved of the will if the words have been bona fide used by a person whom he trusts to draw it up for him.

SUB-TITLE III. ACT VOIDABLE

816. STATE v. CASS

SUPREME COURT OF NEW JERSEY. 1889

52 N. J. L. 77

CERTIORARI upon a judgment for the plaintiff Catherine Cass, in an action against S. Cummings to recover $125, the price paid to him for a horse, sold on fraudulent representations as to his speed. Mr. Cass, in the presence of his wife, the plaintiff, stated to the defendant that they desired a horse that could make the distance between Rockland and Orange Valley, between seven and eight miles, in one hour or one and a half hours, and stated that if the horse could not do that they didn't want to buy him; to which the defendant replied that the horse could easily do that. There was evidence that the horse was not able to travel seven or eight miles in one hour or in one hour and a half, and was not fit for the purpose for which he had been bought. It appeared on the cross-examination of the plaintiff that at the time of the sale a written warranty of the horse had been given in the following form: "Newark, April 6, 1887. To one gray horse Charley, which I warrant to be sound and kind with the exception of straining of muscle of left hind leg." The counsel for defendant thereupon moved that all evidence as to representations made by the defendant, other than those contained in the written warranty, be stricken out, on the ground that the agreement of the parties having been reduced to writing, such writing could not be varied or enlarged by parol evidence. The Court denied the motion, and allowed an exception.

REED, J. . . . [The parol evidence rule] is not infringed by the admission of parol testimony which is not intended as a substitution for or an addition to a written contract, but which goes to show that the instrument is void or voidable, and that it never had any legal existence or binding force, either by reason of fraud, or for want of due execution and delivery, or for the illegality of the subject-matter of the contract. Nor is the admission of parol evidence for the purpose of avoiding a written contract on the ground of fraud, confined to such testimony as goes to show that a party was lured to make a contract other than that intended, as by the substitution of one contract for another by trickery, or by misreading a contract to an illiterate person. Parol testimony may be admitted to show that the execution of a written contract was brought about by a fraudulent representation. . . . The elements essential to constitute such fraudulent representation will be considered later, and it is now necessary only to remark that such evidence as will lay a foundation for an action of deceit or a ground for the recission of the contract, is always receivable, although it consists of oral representations.

This point was strenuously denied in the arguments submitted by the counsel for the defendant. His contention was, that fraud in the execution of the instrument could be shown, but that oral representations going to a failure of consideration only could not. The seeming strength of his contention lay in the likeness between the written and the oral facts in the present case, both concerning the quality of the animal sold. The written warranty applied to the soundness and kindness of the horse, and the oral testimony to the speed of the animal. The danger of permitting parol declarations to be proved, which were so nearly related to the subject-matter of the written warranty, was strongly pressed as an evil which the rule of evidence already stated seemed especially designed to prevent. But the distinction between such representations as add to the contract and such as avoid the contract, because of their fraudulent character, is too firmly established in our jurisprudence to be now shaken. As an additional warranty, that is, an addition to the contract, the present representations were clearly inadmissible. So soon, however, as they displayed such features as went to show that through them the contract had been fraudulently induced, and so was unenforceable for that reason, at the election of the defrauded party, the rule excluding parol testimony to enlarge a written contract became inoperative. It is of course obvious, that the fact that there was a written warranty in respect to the soundness and kindness of the animal would be a forcible argument that no other representations as to quality were made. The existence of the written warranty would be useful in determining the probability of the truth of the counter statements of the parties as to the existence or non-existence of the parol declaration. But when the fraudulent affirmations are once proven to exist, the written contract becomes unimportant. This seems to be an elementary principle of the law of evidence. The right to prove fraud, in whatever shape it may exist, to avoid written contracts, has been so uniformly recognized that it can hardly be said to have been the subject of serious judicial discussion. . . . I conclude, therefore, that if the evidence established fraudulent conduct on the part of the defendant, the testimony was properly admitted.

This conclusion leads to the consideration of the testimony received and submitted to the jury. This consideration involves two questions: First, Was the testimony properly submitted to the jury at all? Second, If so, was it submitted under proper instructions? . . . I am convinced that, in assuming that the present case was one in which the falsity of the representation raised the legal inference of fraud, the Court was in error. . . .

For these reasons, I think the judgment below should be reversed.

817. FAIRBANKS v. SNOW

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1887

145 Mass. 153; 13 N. E. 596

THIS is an action upon a promissory note made by the defendant and her husband to the order of the plaintiff. The defendant alleges that her signature was obtained by duress and threats upon the part of her husband. The judge below found for the plaintiff. . . . The judge refused to rule that, if the defendant signed the note under duress, it was immaterial whether the plaintiff knew, when he received the note, that it was so signed. The exception is to this refusal.

HOLMES, J. (after stating the case as above). No doubt, if the defendant's hand had been forcibly taken and compelled to hold the pen and write her name, and the note had been carried off and delivered, the signature and delivery would not have been her acts; and if the signature and delivery had not been her acts, for whatever reason, no contract would have been made, whether the plaintiff knew the facts or not. There sometimes still is shown an inclination to put all cases of duress upon this ground. Barry v. Equitable Life Assurance Society (59 N. Y. 587, 591). But duress, like fraud, rarely, if ever, becomes material as such, except on the footing that a contract or conveyance has been made which the party wishes to avoid. It is well settled that where, as usual, the so-called duress consists only of threats, the contract is only voidable. . . . This rule necessarily excludes from the common law the often recurring notion just referred to, and much debated by the civilians, that an act done under compulsion is not an act in a legal sense. "Tamen coactus volui" (D. 4. 2. 21, § 5; see 1 Windscheid, Pandekten, § 80).

Again, the ground upon which a contract is voidable for duress is the same as in the case of fraud; and is, that, whether it springs from a fear or belief, the party has been subjected to an improper motive for action. But if duress and fraud are so far alike, there seems to be no sufficient reason why the limits of their operation should be different. A party to a contract has no concern with the motives of the other party for making it, if he neither knows them nor is responsible for their existence. It is plain that the unknown fraud of a stranger would not prevent the plaintiff from holding the defendant. . . . The authorities with regard to duress, however, are not quite so clear. It is said in Thoroughgood's case, 2 Rep. 9, that "if a stranger menace A. to make a deed to B., A. shall avoid the deed which he made by such threats, as well as if B. himself had threatened him, as it is adjudged 45 E. 3. 6." . . . But in Y. B. 43 E. III. 6, pl. 15, which we suppose to be the case referred to, it was alleged that the defendant was imprisoned by the procurement of the plaintiff. And we know of no distinct adjudication of binding authority that mere threats by a stranger, made without knowledge or privity of the party, are good ground for avoiding a contract induced by them. . . .

On the case as it is presented to us, we are of opinion that the ruling requested was wrong upon principle and authority.

Exceptions overruled.

A. Norcross & H. C. Hartwell, (C. F. Baker with them,) for the defendant. W. S. B. Hopkins & S. Haynes, for the plaintiff.

TITLE II. INTEGRATION OF LEGAL ACTS

820. History.[1] The history here falls, by a rough division, into three periods: I, from primitive times till the vogue of the seal, in the 1200s; II, then, on English soil, till the statute of frauds and perjuries, in 1678; III, and thence, its modern recognition.

I. In the primitive Germanic notions, at the time of the barbarian invasions and under the Merovingian and Carlovingian monarchies, there was certainly no notion of the indisputability of the terms of a document. The document, even in its most definite type ("carta"), is in the Germanic system merely one of the symbols that entered into the formalism of the transaction, and, like the wand, the glove, and the knife, has an efficacy independent of its written tenor, — which indeed could mean nothing to the parties who employed it. In this stage the "carta" merely plays a convenient part, first, by enabling the formal delivery of the land to be made symbolically away from the premises, and, next, by preserving against future forgetfulness the names of the witnesses. The important and unquestionable fact is that the tenor of the writing does not legally and bindingly establish anything. If the truth of its statement is disputed — the amount of money loaned, the area of land conveyed, the conditions of tenure annexed — the terms of the transaction may and must be proved by calling the witnesses to it, regardless of any contradiction of the writing. The attendant witnesses continued to be, as they had been, the main reliance for the proof of a disputed transaction. The procedure for disputing by the witnesses' oaths the correctness of the document was elaborate and well-settled, and its ultimate settlement might turn upon a wager of battle.

II. The rise of the seal brings a new era for written documents, not merely by furnishing them with a means of authenticating genuineness (ante, No. 552), but also by rendering them indisputable as to the terms of the transaction and thus dispensing with the summoning of witnesses. The vogue of the seal and of the transaction-witness wax and wane, the one relatively to the other.

This legal value of the seal was the result of a practice working from above downwards, from the King to the people at large. It is involved, in the beginning, with the Germanic principle that the King's word is undisputable. Who gives him the lie, forfeits life. The King's seal to a document makes the truth of the document incontestable. This leads, along another line, to the modern doctrine of the verity of judicial records, — to be noticed later. Here, for private men's documents, its significance is that the indisputability of a document sealed by the King marked it with an extraordinary quality, much to be sought after. As the habitual use of the seal extends downwards, its valuable attributes go with it. First, a few counts and bishops acquire seals; and then their courtesies are sought in lending the impress and guarantee of their seal to some document of an inferior person, as serving him in future instead of witnesses. Finally, the ordinary freeman comes usually to have a seal; and his seal too makes a document indisputable — at least, by himself. This extension of the seal begins in the 1000s, and is completed by the 1200s. Thus the old regime of proof by transaction-witnesses disappears by degrees; by the 1300s they are almost superfluous. This means that when a transaction has been made by writing, the parties rely for their future proof no longer on witnesses called in at the time of the transaction, but on the opponent's seal found affixed to the document, which thereby makes its terms indisputable by him as representing the actual terms of the transaction between the parties.

The tool for shaping the new doctrine had now been supplied; and it remained to develop and extend the doctrine. By the time of Coke's commentary upon Littleton and of Sheppard's Touchstone — by the 1600s, on the whole — the modern rule of indisputability is established for all transactions affecting realty. A general policy of regard for the trustworthiness of writing, as against the shiftiness of mere testimonial recollection, was beginning to be consciously avowed, irrespective of any discrimination against the jury. This is a distinctly modern attitude, but it emerges as one of the considerations that finally tended to fix the rule. "Thus you would avoid a matter of record by simple surmise," says Paston, J., in 1430. Coke, of course, furnishes such reflections in plenty, by the time of the 1600s; "it would be full of great inconvenience that none should know by the written words of a will what construction to make or advice to give but it should be controlled by collateral averments." Thus a judicial legislative policy comes to reinforce the other influences.

But, meantime, what of the theory of the rule?

(1) At first, the new principle appears merely as a waiver of ordinary proof, permitting the substitution of another. The man who has sealed a document is not allowed to bring his transaction-witnesses or his compurgators to prove what the transaction really was; he has in advance waived this right.

(2) Alongside of this theory, but playing gradually a more important part, was the theory that a transaction of one "nature" cannot be overturned by anything of an inferior "nature." This is the real lever which helps on the progress to the modern idea. The notion that the document "determines" and merges the whole transaction is winning its way. For two centuries to come this mode of speech — that the writing "dissolves," "discharges," "determines," or "destroys" all other prior or coexisting transactions — is predominant in expounding the theory of the rule. The way is thus prepared for the modern idea of operativeness, forming the third stage of the rule's history.

III. However, one step still remains to be taken. As yet — say, in the 1500s — this theory is applicable to "matter of a higher nature," i.e., specialties, sealed documents, and not to writings as such. How and when did this last extension of ideas occur?

The Statute of Frauds and Perjuries, in 1678, seems to note the modern epoch's full beginning. By the first and third sections the estate was spoken of as "put in writing," and as "assigned, granted, or surrendered, . . . by deed or note in writing." Here were two notable features, practically novel in this relation. The legal act was to be constituted, not merely proved, by the document, and the document might be an ordinary writing, not necessarily a "deed," i.e., under seal. The significance of the statute for the present purpose was in the main, first, that it abolished the practice of creating estates of freehold by oral livery of seisin only, and, secondly, that it permitted the required document (for leases) to be a writing without seal. By the former, it emphasized the constitutive (as opposed to the testimonial) nature of the document; by the latter, it extended the conception of constitutive documents beyond sealed ones to include all writings.

The important consequence was, that for that great mass of transactions which were not affected by the statute, but were none the less put in writing voluntarily by the parties, though not sealed — i.e., transactions for which by the older idea the writing would merely have been "evidence,"— the writing now came to be treated and spoken of as the constitutive thing. The modern view had come into complete existence. A legal transaction when reduced in writing was now to be conceived of as constituted, not merely indisputably proved, by the writing, — and this whether the writing was a requirement of law or merely voluntary, and whether it was sealed or unsealed. The reminiscence of the older idea, in the use of the term "parol evidence," to designate that which was legally inoperative, still persisted as a convenient term of discussion.

SUB-TITLE I. ORDINARY TRANSACTIONS

Topic 1. In General

821. Lilly. Practical Register. (1719, fol. 48; as quoted in Viner's Abridgment, "Contract," G. 18.) If an agreement made by parol to do anything be afterwards reduced into writing, the parol agreement is thereby discharged; and if an action be brought for the non-performance of this agreement, it must be brought upon the agreement reduced into writing, and not upon the parol agreement; for both cannot stand together, because it appears to be but one agreement, and that shall be taken which is the latter and reduced to the greater certainty by writing; for "vox emissa volat litera scripta manet."

822. Knight v. Barber. (1846. Exchequer. 16 M. & W. 66.) (The plaintiff and the defendant had made an oral agreement for the sale of shares; on the same afternoon the defendant signed a memorandum, which was then handed to the plaintiff, reciting the sale, the price, etc.; it was held that this memorandum should have borne a stamp.) Parke, B. — With respect to the first point made by Mr. Baines [for the plaintiff], that there was a distinct parol contract between these parties before the memorandum was signed, if that memorandum was afterwards made and signed by the defendant, and was intended to contain the terms of the contract and to be acted upon by the plaintiff, it became, when it was so acted upon, the real contract between the parties. The parol agreement goes for nothing, if it was intended that it should be reduced into writing and this is afterwards done.

823. Van Syckel v. Dalrymple. (1880. New Jersey. 32 N. J. Eq. 233.) Van Fleet, C. — What was said during the negotiation of the contract or at the time of its execution must be excluded, on the ground that the parties have made the writing the only repository and memorial of the truth, and whatever is not found in the writing must be understood to have been waived and abandoned.

824. BROSTY v. THOMPSON

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. 1906

79 Conn. 133; 64 Atl. 1

Action for the conversion of live stock and other personal property, brought to and tried by the Court of Common Pleas in Fairfield County, Curtis, J.; facts found and judgment rendered for the defendant, and appeal by the plaintiffs. No error.

Clitus H. King and Henry Greenstine, for the appellants (plaintiffs). Edward F. Hall, for the appellee (defendant).

Torrance, C. J. — The plaintiffs and the defendant entered into an oral agreement relating to the sale, by the plaintiffs to the defendant, of a farm and of certain personal property used thereon. Subsequently they executed a written contract embodying the terms of the oral agreement as to the sale of the farm, which was silent as to the personal property agreed to be sold under the oral agreement; and the question, upon the present appeal is, whether the prior oral agreement for the sale of the personal property is available to the defendant upon the facts found. These facts may be summarized as follows: The plaintiffs in April, 1905, owned a farm in this State on which was used the personal property described in the complaint, which personal property was less than $300 in value. The plaintiffs placed the farm and said personal property in the hands of a broker to sell, and he offered it for sale to the defendant for the lump sum of $3,600. The defendant and the broker visited the farm, and examined it and said personal property, and the defendant then told the broker that he would buy the farm and the personal property for $3,600, but that all he could pay down was $300. Subsequently, in the early part of April, 1905, the plaintiffs and the defendant agreed to the following terms proposed by the broker: the plaintiffs to deliver the farm and said personal property to the defendant on May 1, 1905, the personal property to be the defendant's absolutely, and the real estate to be delivered to the defendant under a contract of sale, the terms of which were subsequently embodied by the broker in a writing called Exhibit A, executed by the parties on April 18th, 1905. In said writing the plaintiffs agreed to convey the farm to the defendant by a suitable deed, "upon the following conditions," which may be summarized as follows: (1) the defendant was to pay to the plaintiffs, upon the execution of the writing, $300; (2) he was to pay to them $30 on the first day of May, 1905, and a like sum on the first day of every month thereafter, until the sum of $1,700 should be paid in full; (3) he was to assume and pay the mortgage on the farm, and the interest thereon as it fell due; (4) he was to pay all taxes assessed upon the farm and to keep the buildings insured for a specified amount; and (5) he was to pay interest upon the unpaid portion of the $1,700 at an agreed rate; and finally he was to forfeit all claims to the farm and to all money paid under the agreement, if he failed to make any of the agreed payments.

Upon the execution of the writing the defendant paid to the plaintiffs $300 as agreed, also $20 in payment of the interest due upon the mortgage to July 1, 1905. The writing was silent as to the sale or disposition of the personal property. In this entire transaction the defendant did not meet the plaintiffs but dealt exclusively with the broker. On May 1, 1905, the plaintiffs delivered, and the defendant took, possession of the farm and of the personal property under the foregoing agreement; and shortly thereafter he sold said personal property for $194; notified the broker that he abandoned the contract, and made no further payments thereon.

Upon the trial the plaintiffs admitted that the personal property was part of the subject-matter of the oral agreement between the parties, but claimed that by that agreement the title to the personal property was to remain in the plaintiffs until the title to the farm passed to the defendant. The evidence of the existence and terms of the prior oral agreement for the purchase and sale of the farm and the personal property, came in without objection, apparently; but after it was in, the plaintiffs claimed that "the Court should disregard the evidence, and treat the written agreement as the entire contract between the parties." This claim the Court overruled, and from all the evidence in the case found the facts aforesaid, and that the parties did not intend to embody the entire oral agreement in the written one.

The evidence is not before us, but upon the record as it stands we must assume that it warranted the Court in finding as it has.

The plaintiffs claim that the existence of the written agreement rendered the prior oral agreement between the parties, for the purchase and sale of the personal property, of no avail to the defendant. This claim is based upon the so-called "parol evidence rule," that where parties merge all prior negotiations and agreements in a writing, intending to make that the repository of their final understanding, evidence of such prior negotiations and agreements will be rejected as immaterial. The rule itself is firmly established; Galpin v. Atwater, 29 Conn. 93, 97; Averill v. Sawyer, 62 Conn. 560, 568; Caulfield v. Hermann, 64 Conn. 325, 327; and the only question is whether it is applicable in this case.

We think it is not. Whether the parties intended the writing to embody their entire oral agreement, or only a part of it, was a question for the trial Court, to be determined from the conduct and language of the parties and the surrounding circumstances; and that Court has found that the parties had no such intent, and there is nothing in the record to show that the Court, in reaching that conclusion, erred either in law or in logic. 4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2430. Where the parties do not intend to embody their entire oral agreement in the writing, the rule invoked by the plaintiffs does not apply. Collins v. Tillou, 26 Conn. 368; Clarke v. Tappin, 32 id. 56; Hall v. Solomon, 61 Conn. 476, 482; Averill v. Sawyer, 62 Conn. 560; Chapin v. Dobson, 78 N. Y. 74. That rule does not apply in this case. There is no error.

In this opinion the other judges concurred.

Topic 2. Sundry Applications of the Rule

826. RAMSDELL v. CLARK

SUPREME COURT OF MONTANA. 1897

20 Mont. 103; 49 Pac. 591

THIS action was upon a lease entered into between the respondent (plaintiff below) and appellant (defendant below), on October 20, 1887. Under the terms of the lease, defendant was to take possession of a certain mine, situated in Silver Bow county, and to work and mine the same in "a good workmanlike, and substantial manner, and to the best advantage," for one year, unless he negotiated a sale of the said property within that period. He was to "reduce and smelt the ore therefrom, and concentrate the same," at his own expense, and sell the products, and, after deducting all expenses, he was to pay one-half the net proceeds to the plaintiff. Defendant took possession of the mine on the day of the execution of the lease, but worked the same for a period of six months only. Plaintiff instituted an action against defendant in the district court of Silver Bow county on January 30, 1892. The complaint alleged three breaches of the covenants contained in the lease. As the first breach it averred that defendant had worked the mine for six months, but had failed to pay over to plaintiff one-half of the net proceeds realized from the ores extracted. As a second breach it alleged that defendant had failed to work the mine in a good, workmanlike, and substantial manner during said six months, to the damage of plaintiff in a certain sum. The third breach set forth was that the defendant had failed to work the mine at all after the expiration of said six months, to the damage of plaintiff in a certain sum. The defendant answered the complaint, denying certain of the allegations therein. He also averred that the terms of the lease had been modified as to accounting in respect to concentrates. As a defense to the first breach, it was alleged that an accounting had been had with plaintiff under the lease, as modified on July 10, 1888, and that he (plaintiff) had been paid, and had accepted, in full settlement of his claims, what was found to be due him. A replication was interposed, which, among other denials, set forth that there had never been an accounting, and that the plaintiff had never been paid, and had never accepted, any sum in full settlement for what was due him by reason of the first breach of the lease. The case was tried to a jury.

Upon the trial the defendant introduced in evidence the following receipt: "Dec. 6, '94. G. H. M. Office of W. A. Clark, Butte, Montana, 7–10, 1888. Received of Ramsdell Parrott lease, at the hands of W. A. Clark, five hundred and sixty and 79–100 dollars, payment in full for balance of royalty on ore and supplies. $560.79. [Signed] Joseph Ramsdell." The jury returned a verdict in favor of defendant. A motion was made for a new trial, which was granted. The appeal is from the order granting the motion for a new trial. . . .

Corbett & Wellcome, for appellant. J. W. Cotter and Wm. Scallon, for respondent.

Buck, J.—The appellant . . . objects, however, to the alleged orders in so far as it grants a new trial as to the first and third breaches of the lease. . . . Did the lower Court err in granting a new trial as to the first cause of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint? In this connection it becomes necessary to investigate the law as to the force and effect of a receipt for money paid.

Parsons, in his work on Contracts (8th ed., 1893, vol. 2, p. 671), says:

"A receipt for money is peculiarly open to evidence. It is only prima facie evidence either that the sum stated has been paid, or that any sum whatever was paid. It is in fact not regarded as a contract, and hardly as an instrument at all, and has but little more force than the oral admission of the party receiving. But this is true only of a simple receipt. It often happens that a paper which contains a receipt or recites the receiving of money or of goods, contains also terms, conditions, and agreements or assignments. Such an instrument, as to everything but the receipt, is no more to be affected by extrinsic evidence than if it did not contain the receipt; but, as to the receipt itself, it may be varied or contradicted by extrinsic testimony in the same manner as if it contained nothing else."

Bishop expresses a similar view in his book on Contracts (enlarged ed., 1887, Sec. 176).

From general expressions as to the rules governing a receipt in many opinions, it would seem that some of the Courts have overlooked this dual character of which a receipt is capable. Thus, it is frequently asserted a receipt is not a contract; a receipt for money is only prima facie evidence of the truth of the statements therein contained; the signer of a receipt is not estopped by it; and no qualification is suggested or distinction expressed as to any contractual feature it may possess. This naturally gives rise to confusion on the subject. We shall quote from some of the opinions which have discussed the law pertaining to receipts, particularly as to what recitals therein may be varied or controlled by extrinsic evidence. . . .

Cowen, J., in M'Crea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. 460, 473 (1836): "A release cannot be contradicted or explained by parol, because it extinguishes a pre-existing right. But no receipt can have the effect of destroying per se any subsisting right; it is only evidence of a fact. The payment of the money discharges or extinguishes the debt; a receipt for the payment does not extinguish the debt; it is only evidence that it has been paid. Not so of a written release; it is not only evidence of the extinguishment; but it is the extinguisher itself."

It can be seen from these quotations, supra, that, even keeping in mind the distinction between a receipt regarded as a mere acknowledgment, and as possessing a contractual feature, still the rule of law is not absolutely clear when it is to be applied to the language of each particular receipt. . . . All these cases we have cited, however, recognize the distinction given by Parsons and Bishop. The mere expression contained in a receipt "in full payment" does not necessarily render the paper a contract in the nature of a release or waiver. Whether a receipt possesses any contractual feature or not must often be determined from its entire language, and also, at times, from the language in connection with the circumstances under which it was given. If A, to whom B is indebted in the undisputed sum of $200, is paid by the latter $100, and signs a receipt for the sum of $200, or, mentioning the sum paid, acknowledges payment in full of the debt, nevertheless A, in an action against B for the unpaid balance, without showing any fraud, mistake, or other excuse for having signed the receipt, can contradict it by extrinsic evidence, and show that only $100 was paid. It would only be evidence of B's having paid the debt just as an oral admission proved against A would be. If, however, B has been indebted to A on an account the amount of which has been in dispute between them, a receipt by A definitely specifying the entire account, and acknowledging a sum received as payment in full of the same, would possess a contractual feature; and, in order to contradict or vary the terms of it by extrinsic evidence in so far as it would be a contract, A would be required to observe the rules of law applicable to contracts, and could not treat it in evidence against him as if it were of no greater weight than a mere oral admission on his part.

Let us apply these principles to the receipt given by the plaintiff, and relied upon by the defendant, in the case before us. As to the circumstances under which it was given, Wethey, a witness for defendant, testified that there had been a dispute between plaintiff and defendant as to one or two items of the account due under the terms of the Ramsdell-Parrott lease, and that the last settlement had between them was subsequent to the expiration of the six months during which the defendant had worked the mine. The receipt specifies the lease, and recites that a certain sum has been received by plaintiff as "payment in full for the balance of royalty on ore and supplies." The literal terms of the paper stand admitted, and Wethey's testimony as to it is uncontradicted. It is not suggested that the plaintiff did not actually receive the sum of money specified therein. After the admission in evidence of this testimony and the receipt, the defendant had established a prima facie defense as to the first cause of action. The burden was then upon the plaintiff to destroy the effect of this receipt. He failed to do so. . . .

At the close of the trial, so far as the evidence was concerned, the defendant was entitled to a peremptory instruction that the jury should find in his favor as to the first cause of action.

827. BAUM v. LYNN

SUPREME COURT OF MISSISSIPPI. 1895

72 Miss. 932; 18 So. 428

FROM the Chancery Court of Warren county. Hon. CLAUDE PINTARD, Chancellor. Bill for accounting by Mary Grace Devine Lynn against the executrix of John A. Klein and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant, Ellen Baum, executrix of J. F. Baum, appeals. In May, 1873, John A. Klein was appointed guardian to the appellee by the chancery court of Warren county, and gave bond as guardian in the penalty of $2,000, with George M. Klein and J. F. Baum, appellant's testator, as sureties. . . . The prayer is that the executrix of the guardian be required to render his final account as guardian. . . . Decrees were made against George M. Klein and Ellen Baum, executrix of J. F. Baum, for $2,000. . . .

The objection most strenuously urged to the decree rests upon the following facts, proved or offered to be proved by appellant: The guardian had loaned a part of his ward's money to Mrs. Mary Irving. In June, 1884, the guardian being then dead, and his estate hopelessly insolvent, the appellee, who then resided in the State of Texas, came to this State to look after the estate. On the 16th of June, Mrs. Irving made to her conveyance in the following language:

"This indenture, made and entered into this day, the 16th of June, 1884, by and between Mary Irving, of the city of Vicksburg, county of Warren, and state of Mississippi, party of the first part, and Mary Grace Lynn, of the state of Texas, party of the second part, witnesseth: That whereas, John A. Klein, late of said city of Vicksburg, did, on or about the 14th day of February, 1874, loan the said Mary Irving certain moneys then in his hands as guardian of the said Mary Grace Lynn, then Mary Grace Devine, and whereas, the said Mary Irving now desires to settle in full any balance that may be due by her: Now, therefore, for and in consideration of the premises, and the consideration of the full acquittal, discharge and release of the said Mary Irving from any and all liability to the said John A. Klein as guardian, or the said Mary Grace Lynn for and on account of said loans, and the further consideration of ten dollars in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the said party of the first part does hereby convey and warrant to the party of the second part, her heirs and assigns, in fee simple, the following described real estate in the said city of Vicksburg," describing the property, and concluding with the usual habendum. The appellant took the deposition of Mr. Irving, who was the husband of the grantor, she being now dead, and that of George M. Klein, and of Mr. Smith, the attorney who prepared the conveyance, all of whom testified that the conveyance was made by Mrs. Irving, and accepted by Mrs. Lynn, in full satisfaction and settlement not only of the debt due by Mrs. Irving to Klein as guardian, but also in discharge and settlement of liability on the part of the guardian to his ward, which liability Mrs. Lynn agreed to discharge and release as a part of the consideration for the conveyance. The complainant moved to suppress these depositions, and objected to them when offered in evidence, upon the ground that it was incompetent to vary by parol proof the written contract of the parties as shown by the deed. The depositions were not admitted.

M. Marshall, for appellant. The recital of the consideration in the deed is always open to parol proof. Besides, John A. Klein was not a party to the conveyance, and was at liberty to show its true consideration.

L. W. Magruder, for appellee. Parol testimony cannot be admitted if the statement as to the consideration, from its terms and context, manifestly embraces, or is intended to embrace, the whole agreement; or, if it forms a part of the contract, it cannot be varied. In this case, the consideration is a release of a pre-existing debt. It is like a conveyance by her of her property, and it is apparent, from the deed, what debt is released. The distinction is clearly stated in Cocke v. Blackburn, 58 Miss. 537.

COOPER, C. J. (after stating the case as above). In Gully v. Grubbs, 1 J. J. Marsh. 387, Judge ROBERTSON in an admirable and concise manner states the true principle upon which is based the rule of permitting oral evidence to be introduced to show the true consideration of a deed in opposition to that recited, as well as the limitation of the rule. . . . Judge Robertson illustrates his own views by noting the difference between the mere statement of a fact (e. g. the admission of the receipt of the purchase price) and the vesting, creating, or extinguishing a right (e.g. by the execution of a release), in the following language:

"A party is estopped by his deed. He is not to be permitted to contradict it. So far as the deed is intended to pass a right, or to be the exclusive evidence of a contract, it concludes the parties to it. But the principle goes no further. A deed is not conclusive evidence of everything it may contain. For instance, it is not the only evidence of the date of its execution, nor is its omission of a consideration conclusive evidence that none passed, nor is its acknowledgment of a particular consideration an objection to other proof of other and consistent considerations; and, by analogy, the acknowledgment in a deed is not conclusive of the fact. This is but a fact, and testing it by the rationality of the rule we have laid down, it may be explained or contradicted. It does not necessarily and undeniably prove the fact. It creates no right; it extinguishes none. A release cannot be contradicted or explained by proof, because it extinguishes a pre-existing right. But no receipt can have the effect of destroying per se any subsisting right. It is only evidence of a fact. The payment of the money discharges or extinguishes the debt. A receipt for the payment does not pay the debt. It is only evidence that it has been paid. Not so of a written release. It is not only evidence of the extinguishment, but is the extinguishment itself."

The deed now under examination contains, as is clearly to be seen, no mere recital of a consideration paid or to be paid. Its recital is only of the facts necessary to be stated to intelligently apply the contract of the parties to the subject matter. Having set out the relationship of debtor and creditor, and the history of the transaction from which it arose, the deed then proceeds to state what the parties agreed, contracted, and did in reference to the dissolution of the relationship. Mrs. Irving did something. She conveyed the land to Mrs. Lynn. Mrs. Lynn did something. She released the debt to Mrs. Irving. One transferred a right; the other released a right. If it be said that the release was a mere recited consideration for the conveyance, it may with equal accuracy be replied that the conveyance was a mere recited consideration for the release; and therefore, if one of the terms of the contract may be varied by parol, because it is a consideration, so also may the other for the same reason, and by this process a solemn and executed written contract would be totally eaten away. The true rule is that a consideration recited to have been paid or contracted for may be varied by parol, while the terms of a contract may not be, though the contract they disclose may be the consideration on which the act or obligation of the other party rests. . . . Appeal dismissed.

828. LESE v. LAMPRECHT

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1909

196 N. Y. 32; 89 N. E. 365

ACTION by Louis Lese against Anna Lamprecht, individually, and as executrix of Hugo Lamprecht, From a judgment of the Appellate Division (123 App. Div. 919, 107 N. Y. Suppl. 1132), affirming a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and new trial granted.

This action was brought to compel the specific performance of a written contract made by the defendant's testator in his lifetime with the plaintiff, by which he agreed, at a place and on a day and hour therein named, to convey to the plaintiff a certain piece of real property for the consideration of $7,500. The contract provided that the plaintiff should pay "Five hundred dollars on the execution of this (said) agreement . . . seven thousand dollars in cash on the delivery of the deed, . . ." and said testator agreed, upon receiving such payment, to deliver to the plaintiff "A full covenant warranty deed for the conveying and assuring to him . . . the fee simple of said premises free from all incumbrances . . . and subject to a party wall agreement recorded in the office of the register of the county of New York in Liber 859 of Conveyances at page 375." On the day and hour mentioned in said contract a further contract in writing was entered into by and between the same parties, adjourning the time for closing the title under the original contract to November 3, 1905, at 11 o'clock A. M., at a place therein named, and said contract also provided: "It is understood and agreed that the vendee will pay interest on the balance of the purchase money from the date hereof to November 3, 1905, and that the vendor can remain in possession of the said premises from November 3, 1905 to December 1, 1905, as a tenant at a rental of one dollar ($1.00), title to be closed as of October 5, 1905."

On November 3d, at 11 o'clock A. M., as provided in said further contract, the parties met at the place in said further contract provided. It then appeared that the title to the real property mentioned in the contract was being examined by a well-known firm of attorneys in the city of New York for the purpose of making a loan thereon to the vendee, and that the searches therefor had been made by, but not returned from, the Lawyers' Title Insurance & Trust Company, and the plaintiff asked that the closing of title be held open or adjourned until a later hour of the day, or until the following day. The defendant's testator refused to further adjourn the time for closing title, whereupon, it appearing that there was a mortgage on the property held by a savings bank, the plaintiff stated that if the defendant's intestate would procure a release of the mortgage, he would pay the consideration named in the contract without further delay. The defendant's intestate then tendered a deed without including therewith a cancellation of said mortgage, and demanded the consideration named in the contract, which being refused, he left the office where the contract was to be closed. A few days thereafter, when this action was about to be commenced, the attorney for the defendant's intestate said that he would endeavor to close the title, and arranged for a meeting of the plaintiff and his client at 8 o'clock in the evening of the day in question. The plaintiff and his attorney were eight minutes late in meeting said engagement, and the defendant's intestate refused to consummate the transaction, although he said that he would have done so if the plaintiff had met him at an earlier hour.

The trial Court found: "Third, That on the 5th day of October, 1905, the parties met according to the terms of said contract, and the defendant then agreed to extend the time for closing, at the request of the plaintiff, to November 3, 1905, at 11 o'clock at the same place, and that defendant appeared on said adjourned day November 3d at the appointed place ready and willing to make title, and did then and there tender a duly executed full covenant warranty deed in accordance with the terms of said contract, and that the plaintiff, through his attorneys and representatives, requested a further adjournment, which, however, was refused by the defendant through his attorney. Fourth. That on October 5, 1905, as a condition for the granting of the adjournment until November 3, 1905, it was agreed that no further adjournment should be granted to the plaintiff, and that the title should close absolutely on that day, and that no other agreement to close at any other or future date was entered into by the defendant either personally or through or by his attorney. Fifth. That the case is without proof that consent was obtained for the closing on any other date than November 3, 1905, at which time defendant was ready and willing to convey."

The third and fourth findings are each based in a material part upon oral testimony received, subject to objection and exception, to the effect that prior to, and contemporaneous with, the making of the original written contract the plaintiff agreed with the defendant's testator to accept the title to said real property without a previous discharge of the savings bank mortgage thereon, and to retain a sufficient portion of the consideration specified in the contract to pay said mortgage thereafter, and also that prior to and contemporaneous with the making of the further contract adjourning the closing of said title from October 5th to November 3d it was orally agreed that no further adjournment should be granted to the plaintiff, and in substance that the time mentioned in the contract be made of the essence thereof.

John D. Connolly, for appellant. As it was not expressly stipulated in the contract that time was of its essence; as the subject of the sale did not fluctuate in value, and there had been no change of circumstances, and the delay, if any, did not involve the vendor in any loss, and every act of the vendee was in affirmance of the contract, specific performance should have been decreed. . . . The Court below improperly admitted oral testimony to vary the terms of the written contract. . . .

Arthur J. Westermayr, for respondent. The time for closing the title was adjourned from October 5, 1905, to November 3, 1905, upon the positive understanding that the title would be closed on that date. As a condition for the adjournment, time was made the essence of the contract (Dwark v. Weinberg, 139 N. Y. S. R. 504). The Court below properly admitted testimony as to the mortgage on the property and as to time being of the essence of the contract, although no provisions as to the same were contained in the written adjournment. . . .

CHASE, J. (after stating the case as above). We are of the opinion that such testimony was improperly received. The general rule that oral testimony cannot be received to vary a written contract is well established and generally conceded. It has become a rule of substantive law. It stands as a bar against using oral testimony to overthrow a solemn and deliberate contract, and arises from the presumption that the parties to a contract by placing their engagement in writing intend to avoid the consequences arising from defects of man's memory and the possibly prejudiced statements of interested witnesses.

Contracts are frequently made that are collateral to, but independent of, a written contract, and they can be properly established by oral testimony. Evidence of such contracts is sometimes referred to as an exception to said general rule. It is more accurate to say that collateral and independent contracts can be shown by oral testimony, because it was not the intention of the parties thereto to include such contracts in the writing. Collateral contracts are thus frequently established by oral testimony, because they are collateral; and ambiguous written contracts are explained by oral testimony, because they are ambiguous. The value and integrity of a written instrument is largely dependent upon the fact that it cannot be broken down or modified by a statement of alleged conversations and occurrences leading up to its execution. Where a written contract is clear in its terms, and purports to express the entire arrangement of the parties, and to direct upon all the questions under consideration, it conclusively determines the rights of the parties, and can neither be contradicted, varied, nor explained. Thomas v. Scutt, 127 N. Y. 133; Stowell v. Greenwich Ins. Co., 163. N. Y. 298; Corse v. Peck, 102 N. Y. 513; Brantingham v. Huff, 174 N. Y. 53; House v. Walch, 144 N. Y. 418; Dady v. O'Rourke, 172 N. Y. 447.

In deciding whether a particular promise or agreement is collateral and independent of the principal and written contract it is necessary to determine whether the parties to the written contract intended to include therein all of the promises relating to the subject-matter under consideration. Professor Wigmore, in his work on Evidence, says:

"In deciding upon this intent, the chief and most satisfactory index for the judge is found in the circumstance whether or not the particular element of the alleged extrinsic negotiation is dealt with at all in the writing. If it is mentioned, covered, or dealt with in the writing, then presumably the writing was meant to represent all of the transaction on that element; if it is not, then probably the writing was not intended to embody that element of the negotiation. This test is the one used by the most careful judges, and is in contrast with the looser and incorrect inquiry whether the alleged extrinsic negotiation contradicts the terms of the writing." Wigmore on Evidence, § 2430.

The written contract between the parties now before us provided for a deed free from all incumbrances. It expressly specified one exception to such covenant without including in the written contract a further exception to the effect that the property could be transferred subject to the savings bank mortgage. Again the written contract adjourning the time of closing the title included express agreements binding upon the parties, in connection with the adjournment without expressly making the time to which the closing of title was adjourned of the essence of the contract. In each case the subject-matter upon which the parties contracted included the matter sought to be established by oral testimony. In each case the subject-matter was within the consideration of the parties in making the written contracts; and, in the absence of fraud, it is conclusively presumed that the contracts as written include an accurate and full statement of the intention of the parties. Where a contract is made for the sale of real property, and the time for closing the transaction is not expressly made of the essence of the contract, and where it does not appear from the contract itself and the surrounding circumstances that a delay of a few hours or days would essentially affect carrying out the intention of the parties, Courts of equity may in their discretion compel the specific performance of the contract, even although the party asking for such specific performance has failed to perform his part of the contract in the exact time specified therein, providing such failure has not arisen from bad faith or inexcusable delay. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed.) § 1408; Kahn v. Chapin, 152 N. Y. 305; Hun v. Bourdon, 57 App. Div. 351, 68 N. Y. Supp. 112.

The judgment, therefore, should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

829. HEITMAN v. COMMERCIAL BANK OF SAVANNAH

COURT OF APPEALS OF GEORGIA. 1909

6 Ga. App. 584; 65 S. E. 590

ERROR from City Court of Savannah; DAVIS FREEMAN, Judge.

Action by the Commercial Bank of Savannah and others against J. H. Heitman and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants Heitman and certain others bring error. Affirmed.

The Commercial Bank of Savannah sued O'Connell, Tietjen, Goette, Fetzer, Manning, Heitman, Whatley, Knight, and Koneman, setting up its cause of action in two counts. The first count proceeded against O'Connell as maker and the other defendants as sureties on the following promissory note: "$15,000.00. Savannah, Ga., Feb. 7, 1908. Four months after date I promise to pay to the order of the Commercial Bank fifteen thousand dollars, with interest from January 1, 1908, at 7 per cent. per annum at any bank in Savannah, Ga. Value received." O'Connell signed apparently as a maker, while the others signed apparently as indorsers. In the second count it is alleged that all of the parties whose names appear on the note "signed their names to the said note before the same was delivered to your petitioner with the intention of binding themselves to pay the amount therein named with interest to your petitioner, and, after so signing their names, they delivered the said note to your petitioner in payment of an indebtedness of theirs to your petitioner, and for a consideration paid them by your petitioner as per a letter written by them to your petitioner dated February 7, 1908, a copy of which is hereto attached, and they received from your petitioner the consideration mentioned in the said letter, and delivered the said note with their names thereon to your petitioner as makers, and with the intention and for the purpose of making themselves liable to your petitioner upon the said note as makers thereof." The letter to which reference is made is as follows: "Savannah, Ga., February 7, 1908. To the Commercial Bank, City. Gentlemen: In reference to the security notes given by Mr. G. B. Whatley to your bank and which were indorsed by directors of the Sand Lime Brick Company, we beg to state that we have been unable to get all the old indorsers to indorse a new paper, and we therefore request you to accept the note indorsed by us and inclosed herewith, in payment of the old notes, and turn over the same to us so that we can bring suit to determine the liability of all the indorsers thereon." The names appended to the letter are the same as those appended to the note, and the same as those of the original defendants in the court below.

The only defendants who appeared in any way before final judgment were Heitman, Goette, Manning, and Knight. Goette having died pending the action, the suit as to him was voluntarily discontinued without objection from the other defendants. The three above-named defendants filed in due time an answer, in which the jurisdiction of the Court was admitted, as was also the fact that they executed the note sued on as indorsers, that the plaintiff bank was the lawful holder thereof and had duly protested it for nonpayment, but each and every other allegation of each and every other paragraph of the petition was denied. This answer further set up "that heretofore [the exact date whereof defendants cannot say] they executed as indorsers a note payable to the plaintiff for the sum mentioned in the plaintiff's petition, to wit, $15,000; that it was understood between plaintiffs and these defendants that they were not accommodation indorsers or sureties upon said notes, but indorsers pure and simple, neither of defendants receiving any consideration therefrom. Plaintiff is a chartered bank, and, when said note became due and was not paid, it failed and neglected to protest said note, whereby the indorsers upon the same were released. In addition to the parties defendant hereto, H. H. Peeples, J. S. Howkins, Henry Henkin, and E. M. O'Brien were indorsers upon said note. After said note became due, plaintiff, well knowing that these defendants were released by reason of its failure to protest said notes, undertook to procure defendants to indorse the renewal of said notes. These defendants agreed to and indorsed a renewal upon the condition well understood by plaintiff that each of the indorsers on the old notes would indorse the new one, and that their said indorsement was not to be effective or binding unless each of said indorsers indorsed the same. Three of said original indorsers, to wit, E. M. O'Brien, J. S. Howkins, and Henry W. Henkin, without the knowledge of these defendants, failed and refused to indorse said renewal. Plaintiff, instead of canceling said note, kept the same, and the note was renewed several times, these defendants at all times believing that all of the original indorsers were indorsing the renewal notes, and plaintiff knowing at all times that they had not indorsed and were not indorsing the renewals and concealing these facts from these defendants. On or about the 7th day of February, 1908, these defendants learned for the first time that E. M. O'Brien, Henry Henkin and J. S. Howkins had not indorsed the first or succeeding renewal notes, and plaintiff requested defendants to sign the letter attached as an exhibit to plaintiff's petition and the renewal note attached to said petition. Defendants signed said letter and said note upon the distinct understanding and agreement that plaintiff should procure the indorsement thereon of each of the indorsers on the renewal notes, and plaintiff accepted their signatures to said letter and indorsements on said note on the condition and distinct understanding that it was to procure the indorsement of each of said indorsers, including H. H. Peeples, and that said indorsement should not be binding unless such complete indorsement should be obtained. H. H. Peeples refused and failed to indorse said notes. Plaintiff did not advise defendants of this. It kept said note, and, when payment was refused at maturity, protested the same. Defendants say that said note was an incomplete paper, and defendants were not bound as indorsers or as sureties or in any manner whatsoever; that they had never become liable upon said notes or bound to pay the same; and that they did not promise plaintiff that the sums named in said petition or any other sums should be paid, their indorsement having been conditional and the conditions having never been complied with." Pending the argument on a motion to strike the foregoing answer on the ground that it set forth no sufficient legal defense, the defendants offered the following amendment thereto: "That the preparation of the note sued upon and the letter attached to the petition was plaintiff's undertaking; that it undertook to procure said papers for its own profit and benefit; that these defendants signed said note and said letter on the distinct understanding and condition understood and assented to by plaintiff that neither the letter nor the note was to be complete and binding until H. H. Peeples had signed the letter and signed the note as indorser; that plaintiff procured the signature and indorsement of all the parties whose signature and indorsement it undertook to procure except that of H. H. Peeples. It did not procure his signature and indorsement as it had expressly agreed to do, and, because of its failure to comply with this condition precedent, neither the note nor the letter ever became effective or binding." The court refused to allow the amendment, and granted a motion striking the answer on the ground that no legal defense was set forth therein. This is the first assignment of error in the bill of exceptions. Thereafter, during the same term, which was the first term after the suit was filed, the Court rendered one judgment against all the defendants for the full amount sued for. Four days after this judgment was rendered the defendant Fetzer came into court for the first time, and moved the court to open the judgment which had been rendered and allow him to demur and plead. He offered to pay the costs, but gave no reason for his failure to appear earlier. The Court overruled the motion, and Fetzer assigns error thereon, also excepting to the judgment rendered four days prior thereto. The answer which he offered to file was the same as that which had been filed by the three other defendants and which had been stricken on general demurrer.

Osborne & Lawrence, for plaintiffs in error. U. H. McLaws, Adams & Adams, G. B. Whatley, and J. R. Cain, for defendants in error.

Russell, J. (after stating the facts as above). . . .

This brings us to a consideration of the orders of the Court striking the answer filed by Heitman, Manning, and Knight, and in refusing to allow the amendment thereto.

1. Attention is called to the fact that the second count is a suit against all the defendants as makers, and the note and the letter are set forth as constituting one contract. The letter is as much a part of the contract as the note itself; and the terms of the contract created by the two papers taken together cannot be altered, varied, or contradicted by parol evidence of prior or contemporaneous agreements as to matters covered therein. Ordinarily, however, there can be no doubt that parol or other extrinsic evidence is admissible to show that a writing bearing every earmark of a complete and perfect contract is not in fact a contract at all because of the nonperformance of a condition precedent as to which the writing is silent. This is not varying the terms of a written contract by extrinsic evidence, for the simple reason that it shows that there is no contract in existence; that, therefore, there is nothing to which to apply the excluding rule. The so-called parol evidence rule presupposes the existence of a valid contract; and, on the questions as to whether or not a valid contract is in existence or has been created, generally parol or other evidence dehors the writing is always competent and legal. Accordingly, it may be shown by extrinsic evidence that the writing involved is not a valid or enforceable legal obligation for the reason that it does not possess finality of utterance; that there never has been an agreement that the writing is a completed and finally uttered embodiment of all the terms of a contract presently operative and binding.

A few cases will illustrate and delimit this principle. In the great leading case of Pym v. Campbell, 6 E. & B. 370 [ante, No. 799], it was held that the defendant could show by extrinsic evidence that the writing sued on (on its face a complete and perfect contract for the sale of an interest in a patent) was not binding for the reason that it was signed on an express mutual understanding that it was not to become operative until A. was consulted and approved, and that A. did not approve. The writing did not in any way refer to the necessity for the performance of this condition precedent. In Ware v. Allen, 128 U. S. 590, a writing absolute on its face and signed by both parties was shown by parol evidence to have been signed on condition that it was not to become operative as a presently binding contract until an attorney had been consulted and had approved. . . . In Wilson v. Powers, 131 Mass. 540, a payee of a promissory note was allowed by extrinsic evidence to prove that a writing signed by him and by the maker of the note extending the time of payment was not to become binding until assented to by the surety. . . . In Blewitt v. Borum, 142 N. Y. 357, a contract, relating to the right to sell and manufacture a binder for books, admitted by the defendant to have been signed by him and handed to the plaintiff, was defeated by proof of a parol condition that it was not to become operative until the plaintiff acquired the interest of a third person, which condition the plaintiff had never performed nor had its nonperformance been waived by the defendant. . . . In Burke v. Dulaney, 153 U. S. 228, [ante, No. 800], the maker of a promissory note, given for the purchase price of an interest in a mine, was allowed to show by parol that he delivered the note to the payee on condition that it was not to be binding until he (the maker) had inspected the mine and approved it; that he had inspected the mine and disapproved it, and had demanded back the note.

It will be noted, however, that in none of the cases just mentioned was the condition covered by the writing involved. There is a plain difference between showing by extrinsic evidence the nonperformance of a condition precedent as to which the writing is silent, and showing by extrinsic evidence that the writing is incomplete or not finally uttered because of the nonperformance of a condition stated in the writing to have been performed or to have been agreed upon as unnecessary. In the former case the writing is not contradicted; in the latter it is. If, therefore, due consideration be given to the reasons which justify the existence of the parol evidence rule, the principle which was the foundation of the decisions in those cases must be limited to the extent that where the contract itself as written, agreed upon, and signed specifically states that, upon the performance of a certain condition precedent, the contract shall become complete and binding, and that after that time nothing shall remain to be done by either party preliminary to the complete and final utterance of the writing as a presently binding and all-comprehensive embodiment of the entire agreement, then extrinsic evidence of an agreement as to other conditions would be incompetent. For example, if the written instrument, as agreed upon and signed by both parties, contains a stipulation that it is not to be binding until it is signed by a certain number of persons named therein, and that the signatures of these and these only are to be attached thereto, it would be a violation of the so-called parol evidence rule to allow parol evidence of an agreement that other signatures than the ones named in the contract were to be secured as a condition precedent to its final utterance as a completed legal act. This would be an attempt to contradict a written expression of intention by a less trustworthy method of proof.

And, after all, the real raison d'être of the rule excluding parol or other extrinsic evidence which contradicts or alters a written agreement is to be found in the elementary legal principle that the law looks to express and not abstract intent, and holds a man to the natural and probable consequences of what he has said, and not what he thinks he has said. Words, whether oral or written, are but vehicles for conveying ideas; and language, whether communicated orally or in writing, is the best means we have yet devised whereby men may express to one another their ideas and intentions. This being so, the law concerns itself only with the language used, and not with abstract states of mind wholly uncommunicated. When a man's abstract intention is contradictory of his expressed intention (whether expressed verbally or by written symbols), it is legally immaterial. So, where a written expression of intention fairly construed is unambiguous, the writer is bound by the language he has used, and cannot show that he has an abstract idea in mind at variance with such language. As has been so ably said by Mr. Wigmore:

> "We are to fix the person with such expressed consequences as are the reasonable result of his volition. In other words, the act legally effective will be determined, in respect to the three elements of subject, terms, and finality, by that expression of it which results to the other person in the transaction as the consequence reasonably to have been anticipated under all the circumstances of the volition of the actor." 4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2413.

When a man has put his signature to a writing expressing his assent to the terms thereof, he has done an act to which the law attaches consequences just as definite and ascertainable as if he had committed some act in the domain of torts. Having led the other party to naturally believe that he has fully assented to the terms of the writing, he cannot show that he had in his mind a different idea. Unless this were true, it would be impossible for parties to put their agreements in writing in such manner as that they would possess comprehensiveness and finality — elements so very necessary and important in this day and time when we have removed the common-law rule which disqualified parties as witnesses in their own behalf, but as yet have been unable to perfect human recollection or remedy the impairment thereof created by self-interest. The written embodiment of the agreement is the very res gestæ of the transaction, so to speak, and is more reliable than the subsequent recollection of interested witnesses.

2. We come now to the exact question in this case, which is within a narrow compass, to wit, whether the plea and the proffered amendment alleged the nonperformance of a condition precedent which contradicts either the note or the letter or the contract created by both of them together. The plea and the proffered amendment allege, in substance, that the nine defendants and four other persons, to wit, Peeples, Howkins, Henkin, and O'Brien, were indorsers on a note of a corporation of which all of them were directors; that the nine defendants and Peeples indorsed a renewal of this note on the distinct understanding that all of the old indorsers would indorse the new note before it should be binding or complete; that three of the original indorsers, to wit, O'Brien, Howkins, and Henkin, did not sign the renewal note, but that nevertheless the bank, concealing the fact from the defendants who had signed, kept the renewal note and procured several other renewals thereof, all the while concealing from the defendants signing that all the old indorsers were not signing; that as soon as the nine defendants ascertained that all the old indorsers were not signing the new notes, to wit, on February 7, 1908, the bank requested them to sign the letter prepared by it, and the note sued on and referred to in the letter; that defendants signed the letter and the note on the distinct mutual understanding that neither the note nor the letter would be effective, complete, or binding until the bank had procured the signature of Peeples (who had been signing every renewal note up to that time) to both the letter and the note, and that the bank had never performed this condition precedent. Let it be noted right here that the amended answer does not attempt to set up that the signatures of all the indorsers of the original note were to be obtained to the note and the letter as a condition precedent to the finality of their utterance as complete presently binding legal obligations. Such a defense would have been defective in that it would have sought to set up the nonperformance of a condition precedent the necessity for the performance of which is negatived by the contract itself, and would therefore have violated the rule which has been discussed above. The language of the letter is: "We beg to state that we have been unable to get all the old indorsers to indorse a new paper, and we therefore request you to accept the note indorsed by us and inclosed herewith in payment of the old notes." To prove by extrinsic evidence that all the original indorsers were to sign the note would be directly in the teeth of the letter which states to the contrary.

But, according to the answer and the amendment, all the original indorsers were not to sign, but all the indorsers of the renewal notes:

that is to say, all the original 13 indorsers, except Howkins, Henkin, and O'Brien. Does this contradict anything either in the letter or in the note? The words "all the old indorsers" appearing in the letter mean the 13 original indorsers, and not the 10 indorsers who had signed the renewal note immediately preceding the one in suit. This is evident from the allegation in the plea that the letter was signed at the request of the bank as soon as the defendants discovered that three of the original indorsers had not been signing any of the renewal notes. Peeples had been signing every renewal note up to that time. The language used in the letter is consistent with the idea that its purpose was merely to cover definitely the question which had been mooted up to that time, namely, that in future it was definitely understood that Howkins, Henkin, and O'Brien were not to sign the note or the contract. The word "we" used in the letter is not defined therein otherwise than by the exclusion of the idea that all of the 13 indorsers were to sign; and does not exclude the idea that Peeples was to sign. Suppose Peeples had signed, still the words in the letter, "we have been unable to get all the old indorsers to sign," would have been true. If the letter had stated specifically that "we have been unable to get Peeples, Howkins, Henkin and O'Brien, indorsers on former notes, to sign a renewal note, and we inclose herewith a note signed by us," then the idea that Peeples was to sign could not be set up by extrinsic evidence. Since, however, the fact as to whether or not Peeples was to sign does not appear from the letter or the note, proof by extrinsic evidence that he was to sign as a condition precedent to the final utterance of the written documents as completed legal obligations does not alter, vary, or contradict the terms of the written contract, but shows that there never has been a written contract — possessing the element of finality of utterance — made between the parties.

But, say counsel for the bank: "If this letter means anything, it means that the parties inclose this note to the bank requesting that it be accepted, although all had not signed. It was offered as the complete contract, as the final and complete arrangement. It shows that the writers had undertaken to get all to sign, and is utterly inconsistent with the idea that the bank assumed this obligation. According to the letter, these parties unite in this letter, which they send or deliver to the bank inclosing the note sued on, and state to the bank, in effect, that some of the former parties have not signed and are not going to sign. 'We have been unable to get them to sign, but all have signed who are going to sign, and we request you to accept this note as it is. We inclose it with this request. It is complete so far as we are able or expect to complete it.'" The fallacy in this argument, as we see it, is that it assumes that the letter was sent or delivered to the bank unconditionally. The letter speaks only from the time that it was finally and unconditionally delivered, which time according to the plea has never arrived. If the letter was complete, the note was complete; but, if the letter was not complete, there is nothing to show that the note was complete. Suppose only two of the signatures of the 13 old indorsers were attached to the note and the letter, and that the bodies of these documents were in every respect like they are at present. Could not the 2 indorsers who had signed set up by parol that they signed on the express mutual understanding that the note and the letter were not to be complete until other signatures had been obtained, and that both the letter and the note were delivered to the bank on this condition? Does the letter in its body negative the idea that more than 2 of the 13 old indorsers were to sign it? If not, how does it negative the idea that 10 of the 13 old indorsers were to sign it? The body of the letter is entirely consistent with the idea that any number less than all of the 13 old indorsers were to sign it before it should be complete and binding — before it should speak as the obligation of those who had signed. "'All' means every one, or the whole number of particulars." 1 Words & Phrases, 312. Therefore, when the letter says in its body that not all were to sign, this means simply that not every one was to sign it, but is consistent with the idea that every one except one was to sign it. The only difference between this promissory note and all the other promissory notes in the cases cited above in which the parol condition of additional signatures was allowed is that here we have a letter. But the plea says there is no letter for the reason that it was never complete as a letter, that it was delivered to the bank on a condition to be performed by the bank, and that the bank has never performed this condition.

3. Nor does the fact that there had been a manual tradition of the documents to the bank affect the result. Every case to which reference has been made in this opinion fully recognizes the rule that there may be a conditional delivery of a contract, such as this one, to the obligee, and that proof of failure to perform a condition attached to the act of delivery will invalidate the contract. Take, for example, the case of Moore v. Farmers' Mutual Ins. Co., 107 Ga. 199. The policy of insurance there had been handed over to the insured, and it was in his possession, bearing every earmark of a complete and perfect contract, and yet the Court allowed proof of a parol condition unperformed to defeat recovery on the policy. So in the case of Burke v. Dulaney, 153 U. S. 234, the promissory note was in the manual possession of the payee possessing all the ordinary elements of a complete and perfect contract of that kind, and yet parol proof that delivery was made on a condition which had never been performed was held to defeat a recovery on the note. The rule of the common law, still of force in this State, that there could be no delivery in escrow of a deed to the grantee, does not apply to the species of contract involved in this case. In olden times, when form was everything and substance nothing, and the only method of transferring title to land was by feoffment with livery of seisin, the transfer of title was accomplished by formal ceremony alone. Usually the transferor and the transferee would go together upon the land, and the former would hand to the latter a piece of soil, or place in his hand the hasp or ring of the door, or a rod, or perhaps a glove. This ceremony was symbolic of delivery of the land itself. Thereafter the transferee or feofee had been invested with livery of seisin, and he was the owner of the land. 2 Pollock & Maitland, History of the English Law, 82. When in later times the art of writing gained headway, and came into general use in legal proceedings, the law sanctioned the transfer of title to land by a grant or a deed. Much of the older ceremony formerly attending the transfer of title by feoffment with livery of seisin clung to the new method of transfer by grant or deed. The formal act of delivering the deed to the grantee was a mark of finality back of which the law would not look. Delivery to the grantee must be absolute, and not conditional. To quote again from Mr. Wigmore:

"A conditional delivery in escrow to the grantee has come down to us traditionally as a complete act; the condition being deemed vain. But this is an arbitrary distinction. No reason and no policy justifies it. In England the older rule, as handed down in Coke's treatises, has for more than two generations been repudiated. In the United States it has been generally trenched upon so far as to recognize an escrow to a co-obligor as incomplete. In other respects it is maintained by the authority of the older decisions in most jurisdictions. But it is being gradually cut away, sometimes by subtly recasting the definition of a delivery; and the solid establishment of the contrary rule for contracts and writings in general (i.e., other than sealed instruments — bonds and land deeds, will ultimately efface this last tradition of formalism." 4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2408. . . .

There was no error in entering up one judgment against all the defendants after the plea was stricken. In the second count they were sued as makers of one contract, and judgment could properly be entered up against them accordingly.

Judgment reversed as to Heitman, Knight, and Manning, and affirmed as to Fetzer.

HILL, C. J. (dissenting). — I cannot fully concur in the opinion of the majority of the Court delivered herein. My dissent is not from any proposition of law announced, but from what I conceive to be an erroneous construction of the contract sued on in connection with the allegations of the original plea and the amendment thereto. . . . The question of difference between the majority of the Court and myself is therefore within a narrow compass, and depends upon the interpretation of the terms of the contract and the allegations of the original answer and the amendment.

I do not care to go into any extended argument in the attempt to show the incorrectness of the views of the majority of the Court or the soundness of my own. The question must be determined by reference to the terms of the contract and the allegations of the answer and the amendment. To my mind it is perfectly manifest that the note sued on was offered to the bank by the makers thereof as their final and complete contract, and was so accepted by the bank, and the language of the letter which accompanied the note is utterly inconsistent with the suggestion that the bank assumed any obligation with reference to the note. The makers of this note had undertaken to secure the indorsement of all those who had signed the original note. They had failed to do so, and therefore requested the bank to accept the note indorsed by them, and which was inclosed with their letter, as their complete contract, in lieu of the original note; and, if anything further was necessary to make clear the intention of the makers of the note and the writers of the letter that the bank should accept the note as their final and complete contract than the express request that it would do so, it was the additional request that the bank would send to them the former note in order that they might bring suit to determine the liability of all the indorsers thereon. The defense, therefore, that the bank undertook to secure the indorsement of Peeples on the note as a condition precedent to its completion as a binding contract upon those who had signed it, and who sent it to the bank with the request that it be accepted without such indorsement, is a contradiction of the plain meaning of the contract. If the letter inclosed to the bank had expressly stated that Peeples was not to sign the note and the bank was asked to accept it without the signature and the bank did so accept it, it certainly could not be contended that the makers of the note who had made this request could subsequently be heard to set up the defense that Peeples had not signed the note. The letter accompanying the note does, in substance, state this fact, and make this request. The writers say: "We have been unable to get all the old indorsers to indorse a new paper ['all the old indorsers' included Peeples], and we, therefore, request you to accept the note indorsed by us and inclosed herewith [although Peeples has not signed it], in payment of the old note," etc. After the bank had accepted the note without the signature of Peeples and accepted it at the request of the makers of the note, who called attention to the fact that Peeples as one of the old indorsers had not signed the note, it certainly would be a defense inconsistent with their contract as evidenced by the note and the letter to allow them to make the defense that the contract was not complete because, in fact, the bank had undertaken to secure the signature of Peeples to the note and Peeples in fact had not signed it.

I think the Court did right in refusing to allow the amendment to the answer and in striking the original answer. It was clearly and manifestly an effort to ingraft upon the plain, unambiguous terms of a written contract a parol condition wholly inconsistent therewith and expressly negatived thereby. While the rule is well recognized that a written document may be shown by parol or other extrinsic evidence not to be a contract because of a nonperformance of a condition precedent as to which the writing is silent, yet the essential premise must be clearly established before the conclusion is permitted. The rule should not be extended, but strictly applied. It should not be allowed as a loophole through which to escape contract obligations, and should be construed so as not to destroy, but to preserve, that great safeguard which the law from the earliest times has thrown around written contracts: "Parol evidence is inadmissible to add to, take from, or vary a written contract."

830. ADAMS v. GILLIG

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1910

199 N. Y. 314; 92 N. E. 670

APPEAL from Supreme Court, Appellate Division, Fourth Department.

Action by Catherine Adams against Alexander L. Gillig and others, doing business under the firm name and style of George Kempf's Sons. From a judgment of the Appellate Division (131 App. Div. 494, 115 N. Y. Supp. 999), affirming a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The defendant Gillig is the person to whom the deed hereinafter mentioned was given. The defendants Frank C. Kempf and Nicholas Kempf are contractors, who at the time of the commencement of this action were under contract with the defendant Gillig to do certain work upon the real property described in said deed. When the defendant is hereinafter referred to, the defendant Gillig is intended.

On and prior to June 2, 1908, the plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of a lot of land 100 feet front and about 160 feet in depth, situated on the east side of Elmwood Avenue in the city of Buffalo, and also of two other lots of land fronting on Highland Avenue in said city, and which run back to and adjoin the first-mentioned lot. The lots fronting on Highland Avenue had houses on them, and the lot fronting on Elmwood Avenue was vacant. The immediate neighborhood of said lots, so far as the same have been built upon, is devoted exclusively to residences. The defendant sought to purchase a portion of the plaintiff's lot fronting on Elmwood Avenue, and stated that he desired to purchase the same for residence purposes. The negotiations were carried on with the plaintiff's agents, and the defendant stated to the representative of the plaintiff's agents, and also to the agents themselves, that he intended to build dwellings upon the lot if purchased. The plaintiff's agents communicated to her the statement of the defendant and his offers, and she asked her agents if they were sure the sale would not affect the value of the remaining vacant lot, and she was told by her agents that the defendant would build either single or double houses upon the lot so to be purchased. The representations of the defendant that he intended to build dwellings on the lot to be purchased by him were false and fraudulent and made with the intent to deceive the plaintiff. The plaintiff relied upon the representations of the defendant that he intended to build dwellings upon the lot when purchased, and, believing such statements to be true, executed and delivered to him a deed of 65 feet front and 160 feet in depth in consideration of $5,525.

During all the time that the defendant was negotiating for the purchase of the lot in question, he intended to build a public automobile garage thereon, which fact was unknown to the plaintiff, and which the defendant fraudulently concealed from her. On the day following the purchase of said lot, the defendant instructed his architect to prepare plans for a garage to be built thereon to cover substantially the entire lot, and in less than two weeks thereafter he entered into a contract for the erection of such garage. The plaintiff without delay communicated with the defendant and offered to procure another site for his garage, pay all the expenses he had incurred up to that time, and restore the consideration he had paid for the property if he would reconvey the property to her. This the defendant refused to do. The plaintiff was deceived by said misrepresentations of the defendant, and the construction of the proposed garage will greatly damage the remaining property belonging to the plaintiff. It will decrease the value of the remaining vacant lot on Elmwood Avenue about one-half, and the value of her lots, with houses fronting on Highland Avenue, about one-fourth. The referee found in favor of the plaintiff, and directed a reconveyance of the property.

From the judgment entered upon the report of the referee an appeal was taken to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, where it was affirmed by a divided Court.

Horace McGuire, V. H. Riordan and Paul J. Batt, for appellant. The referee's conclusion of law that the plaintiff was entitled to a rescission of the contract and deed constituted error. . . .

Adelbert Moot, Helen Z. M. Rogers and James W. Persons, for respondent. The conclusion of law that plaintiff was entitled to a rescission of the contract and deed was the necessary and logical result of the facts found. . . .

CHASE, J. — Any contract induced by fraud as to a matter material to the party defrauded is voidable. There are many rules as to what constitutes an inducement by fraud, and also affecting the general statement that any contract will be set aside for fraud, that have been established as necessary to protect the rights of all the parties to a contract, which need not be stated in this discussion, except so far as they affect the particular transaction under consideration. It may be assumed that promises of future action that are a part of the contract between the parties, to be binding upon them, must be stated in the contract. An oral restrictive covenant, or any oral promise to do or refrain from doing something affecting the property about which a written contract is made and executed between the parties, will not be enforced, not because the parties should not fulfill their promises and their legal and moral obligations, but because the covenants and agreements being promissory and contractual in their nature and a part of, or collateral to, a principal contract, the entire agreement between the parties must be deemed to have been merged in the writing. The value of a writing would be very seriously impaired if the rule mentioned in regard to including the entire agreement in such writing is not enforced. . . . The rule is quite universal that statements promissory in their nature and relating to future actions must be enforced if at all by an action upon the contract. . . .

It is not claimed on this appeal that the defendant made promises which became a part of the contract, or that the deed could be reformed by including therein restrictive covenants. The rule in regard to including the entire agreement between the parties in the writing does not take away or detract from the general rule by which a contract can always be set aside for fraud affecting the transaction as to a material fact that is not promissory in its nature. Any statement of an existing fact material to the person to whom it is made that is false and known by the person making it to be false and which is made to induce the execution of a contract, and which does induce the contract, constitutes a fraud that will sustain an action to avoid the contract if the person making it is injured thereby.

We have in this case findings by the trial Court sustained by the record, which show that the defendant purposely, intentionally, and falsely stated to the plaintiff that he desired to purchase a portion of her vacant lot for the purpose of building a dwelling or dwellings thereon. He must have known that if he thereby induced her to convey to him such portion of the lot, and his intention was carried out, it would injure her to an extent in excess of the full consideration to be paid by him to her for such lot. . . .

The simple question in this case is therefore whether the alleged intention of the defendant to build a dwelling or dwellings upon the lot which he sought to purchase is such a statement of an existing material fact as authorizes the Court to cancel the deed because of the fraud. The distinction between a collateral agreement as a part of a contract to do or not to do a particular thing and a statement and representation of a material existing fact made to induce the contract may be further profitably considered. A promise as such to be enforceable must be based upon a consideration, and it must be put in such form as to be available under the rules relating to contracts and the admission of evidence relating thereto. It may include a present intention, but as it also relates to the future it can only be enforced as a promise under the general rules relating to contracts. A mere statement of intention is a different thing. It is not the basis of an action on contract. It may in good faith be changed without affecting the obligations of the parties. A statement of intention does not relate to a fact that has a corporal and physical existence, but to a material and existing fact, nevertheless not amounting to a promise, but which, as in the case under discussion, affects and determines important transactions.

The question here under discussion is not affected by the rules relating to the admission of testimony. As it was not promissory and contractual in its nature, there is nothing in the rules of evidence to prevent oral proof of the representations made by the defendant to the plaintiff. In an action brought expressly upon a fraud, oral evidence of facts to show the fraud is admissible. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 889. This case stands exactly as it would have stood if the plaintiff and defendant before the execution and delivery of the deed had entered into a writing by which the defendant had stated therein his intention as found by the Court on the trial, and the plaintiff had stated her acceptance of his offer based upon her belief and faith in his statement of intention, and it further appeared that the statement was so made by the defendant for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to sell to him the lot, and that such statement was so made by him falsely, fraudulently, and purposely for the purpose of bringing about such sale. . . .

Unless the Court affirms this judgment, it must acknowledge that although a defendant deliberately and intentionally, by false statements, obtained from a plaintiff his property to his great damage, it is wholly incapable of righting the wrong, notwithstanding the fact that by so doing it does in no way interfere with the rules that have grown up after years of experience to protect written contracts from collateral promises and conditions not inserted in the contract. We are of the opinion that the false statements made by the defendant of his intention should under the circumstances of this case be deemed to be a statement of a material, existing fact of which the Court will lay hold for the purpose of defeating the wrong that would otherwise be consummated thereby. We have not overlooked the many authorities called to our attention by the appellant. In Wilson v. Deen, 74 N. Y. 531, Kley v. Healy, 127 N. Y. 555, 561, Gray v. Palmer, 2 Rob. 500, affirmed 41 N. Y. 620, Lexow v. Julian, 21 Hun 577, affirmed 86 N. Y. 638, Gallager v. Brunel, 6 Cow. 346, Gage v. Lewis, 68 Ill. 604, Hacnni v. Bleisch, 146 Ill 262, and many other cases in this and other States, the Court had under consideration representations that were promissory and contractual in their nature, and which, if enforced at all, could only be enforced under the rules relating to contracts. . . .

It is said that this decision will open the door to other litigation. If that is the effect of it, then, so far as the decision asserts power in the Court to prevent dishonesty, false dealing, and bad faith in business transactions, it should be welcomed. It is not the intention of the Court to extend the effect of this decision by implication, or to a case other than one where the facts are clearly found against the defendant. . . . We do not concede the accuracy of the statement made before us on behalf of the defendant to the effect that false statements similar to the one made by the defendant to induce the execution of the deed by the plaintiff are common in business transactions. But if true, and controversies arise over the retention of the fruits of such frauds, and the fraudulent inducement is conceded or proven beyond reasonable controversy, the transactions will not have the approval and sanction of the Courts.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Cullen, C. J., and Gray, Vann, Werner, Willard Bartlett, and Hiscock, JJ., concur. Judgment affirmed.

SUB-TITLE II. JUDICIAL RECORDS

Topic 1. In General

832. Sir F. Pollock and Professor F. W. Maitland. History of the English Law. (1895. II, 666.) The distinction that we still draw between "courts of record" and courts that are "not of record" takes us back to very early times when the King asserts that his own word as to all that has taken place in his presence is incontestible. This privilege he communicates to his own special court; its testimony as to all that is done before it is conclusive. If any question arises as to what happened on a previous occasion the justices decide this by recording or bearing record ("recordantur," "portant. recordum"). Other courts, as we have lately seen, may and, upon occasion, must bear record; but their records are not irrefragable; the assertions made by the representative doomsmen of the shire-moot may be contested by a witness who is ready to fight. We easily slip into saying that a court whose record is incontrovertible is a court which has record ("habet recordum") or is a court of record, while a court whose record may be disputed has no record ("non habet recordum") and is no court of record. In England only the King's court — in course of time it becomes several courts — is a court of record for all purposes, though some of the lower courts "have record" of some particulars, and sheriffs and coroners "have record" of certain transactions. such as confessions of felony.

In the old days, when as yet there were no plea rolls, the justices when they bore record relied upon their memories.[1] From Normandy we obtain some elaborate rules as to the manner in which record is to be borne or made; for example, a record of the Exchequer is made by seven men, and, if six of them agree, the voice of the seventh may be neglected. In England at a yet early time the proceedings of the royal court were committed to writing. Thenceforward the appeal to its record tended to become a reference to a roll, but it was long before the theory was forgotten that the rolls of the court were mere aids for the memories of the justices; and as duplicate and triplicate rolls were kept there was always a chance of disagreement among them. A line is drawn between "matter of record" and "matter in pays" or matter which lies in the cognizance of the country and can therefore be established by a verdict of jurors.

833. Sir Edward Coke. Commentaries upon Littleton. (1628 p. 260.) "Recordum" is a memorial or remembrance in rolles of parchment of the proceedings and acts of a court of justice. . . . And the rolles, being the records or memorialls of the judges of courts of record, import in them such incontrollable credit and veritie as they admit no averment, plea, or proofs to the contrarie; . . . and the reason hereof is apparent, for otherwise (as our old authors say, and that truly) there should never be any end of controversies; which should be inconvenient.

834. SAYLES v. BRIGGS

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1842

4 Metc. 421

TRESPASS upon the case for malicious prosecution. The declaration contained three counts, charging three distinct prosecutions of the plaintiff by the defendant. . . .

To support the third count, the plaintiff gave in evidence a complaint to a magistrate, signed and sworn to by the defendant, charging the plaintiff with forging a record of a magistrate; but he did not give in evidence any warrant issued on said complaint, nor prove that he was arrested and held to answer to the complaint, except by parol testimony. The plaintiff was arraigned before a justice of the peace, who made the following record, and no other, of the proceedings before him: "Berkshire ss. At a justice's court holden before me, at house of Franklin Bartlett, in Adams, on Wednesday, 13th day of February 1839, at one of the clock in the afternoon, Commonwealth vs. Franklin O. Sayles, on the complaint of Peter Briggs, Esq., for forgery. After full hearing in the case, the complainant withdrew his prosecution, and it was thereupon ordered by me the said justice, that the said Franklin O. be discharged." The plaintiff offered parol testimony of the said justice and others, that he was arraigned on all the aforesaid complaints, and pleaded to the same, and that a hearing thereon was had before said justice, who discharged the plaintiff.

The defendant objected to the admission of this testimony. But, as it appeared that no record had been made, by said justice, of the proceedings had before him, except that above set forth; and as it further appeared that said justice was no longer a justice of the peace under the commission held by him at the time of the trial and hearing of said cases before him, and that he had declined to qualify himself as a justice under a new commission which he had since received, and had also declined to make any further record in relation to said proceedings; the judge, before whom the trial was had, ruled that it was competent for the plaintiff to introduce parol evidence, if not contradictory to said record, to prove the issuing of the warrant on the third complaint, and also that the plaintiff was arraigned on all said complaints, and pleaded to the same, and that, upon a hearing before said justice, he was, by said justice, discharged therefrom. The proposed evidence was thereupon admitted, and a general verdict was returned for the plaintiff, which is to be set aside, and a new trial granted, if said ruling was erroneous.

Porter & Rockwell, for the defendant. Bishop & Byington, for the plaintiff.

HUBBARD, J. — To sustain an action for malicious prosecution, it is necessary for the plaintiff to give evidence, by the production of the record, or a true copy of it, of the proceedings and an acquittal of the charge, with the further proof that the accusation was malicious and without probable cause. Bul. N. P. 13-15. Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick. 87. In the present case, . . . the parol evidence, which was admitted to prove the issuing of the third warrant, the arraignment on all the complaints, and the discharge therefrom, was objected to by the defendant, and the question for consideration is, whether it was properly admitted. The ground of the admission was, that it was not contradictory to the record.

A record is a memorial or history of the judicial proceedings in a case, commencing with the writ or complaint, and terminating with the judgment, and the design is, not merely to settle the particular question in difference between the parties, or the government and the subject, but to furnish fixed and determinate rules and precedents for all future like cases. A record, therefore, must be precise and clear, containing proof within itself of every important fact on which the judgment rests; and it cannot exist partly in writing and partly in parol. Its allegations and facts are not the subject of contradiction. They are received as the truth itself, and no averment can be made against them nor can they be varied by parol. . . .

But records, like other documents, are exposed to casualties, and, like them, may also be misplaced or lost; or owing to the accidents which continually occur, the record may not, in a given instance, have been extended from the minutes of the proceedings. And the cases are abundant to show that a lost record, like a lost deed, may be proved by parol; and that the minutes may be introduced, where the record has not been drawn out "in extenso," as containing the elements of the record, and, in truth, for the time being, the record itself. . . . But in the present case, no facts or circumstances were introduced tending to prove either the loss of records, or the existence of any other record than the one produced; nor any minutes, from which another record might be completed. On the other hand, it appears that no record, other than the one in evidence, was ever made, and that no minutes were taken, at the time of the alleged trial, from which such further record could be made. It is impracticable, therefore, to support the introduction of this testimony on the ground that the record or a part of it was lost.

Again, it is argued that this testimony should be received from necessity, as there is no way by which the plaintiff can obtain redress, and that this is the best evidence which now exists. But in my judgment it will be productive of far less mischief for an individual to suffer from the neglect or misfortune of an officer in not making a judicial record than to establish a precedent that the record itself or a part of it may be proved by parol, — that it may speak one language today and another tomorrow, depending on the different witnesses who are called or on their changing recollections. And without prescribing a rule for a case where a magistrate might by the act of God be deprived of the opportunity of making even any minutes of proceedings before him from which a record could be made (if such a case should ever occur), we are of opinion that the want of a judicial record cannot be supplied by parol evidence; and that the rules which apply to the admission of testimony to prove the contents of a lost record, or to the introduction of minutes by which the record may be extended, have no real bearing on a case like the present, where no such loss ever took place and no such minutes ever were made. A party who is to be affected by the record will in the exercise of ordinary care see that it is correctly made up; and if the officer should neglect or refuse to perform his duty, he can be compelled by mandamus to make a true record.

There is, then, no record of an acquittal on the charge contained in the second count, nor of the issuing of a warrant, or of an acquittal, on the third count; and, for the reasons given, the want of such a record cannot be supplied by parol proof.

As the parol testimony ought not to have been admitted, the verdict must be set aside, and a new trial granted.

835. HUGHES v. PRITCHARD

SUPREME COURT OF NORTH CAROLINA. 1910

153 N. C. 23; 68 S. E. 906

APPEAL from Superior Court, Camden County; FERGUSON, Judge. Proceedings by M. E. Hughes, Sr., against D. T. Pritchard to establish a division line. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding which was instituted for the purpose of establishing the dividing line between a tract of land alleged by the plaintiff to be the homestead of the defendant, and an adjoining tract, which was purchased by the plaintiff at a sale under an execution issued against the defendant. In his deed the sheriff conveyed to the plaintiff the tract of land upon which he had levied under the execution, but excepted therefrom the homestead of the defendant.

It appeared that the report of the appraisers, who set apart the homestead to the defendant, could not after diligent search be found in the clerk's office. There was evidence tending to show that an allotment of the homestead had been made by three appraisers, at the request of the sheriff, and that their report was prepared and signed by them. This report was seen in the clerk's office among the papers in the judgment roll of the case in which the execution had been issued. A copy of the report was made, and, after proving the loss of the original report, the plaintiff proposed to prove, by oral evidence and by the copy, the contents of the original report, for the purpose of showing the boundaries of the homestead and the proper location of the disputed line. This testimony was objected to by the defendant, but admitted by the Court.

W. A. Worth and H. S. Ward, for appellant. E. F. Aydlett, J. C. B. Ehringhaus, and Pruden & Pruden, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the case as above). The testimony was clearly competent. The defendant's objection was based upon the ground that oral evidence cannot be received to prove the contents of a judicial record, unless in a proceeding brought to establish the lost or destroyed record, under chapter 11 of the Revisal, and that the record thus restored by proof and the judgment of the Court is the only evidence admissible to show the contents of the lost record. This is a misapprehension of the meaning and scope of that enactment. It is an enabling act, and it was not intended to exclude oral evidence, which was admissible at common law to prove the contents of a lost instrument, whether a deed or the record of a Court. This has been well settled by the decisions of this Court. Mobley v. Watts, 98 N. C. 284; and cases cited in the annotated edition; Cox v. Lumber Co., 124 N. C. 80; Aiken v. Lyon, 127 N. C. 175; Jones v. Ballou, 139 N. C. 526; Wells v. Harrell, 152 N. C. 218. In this case the plaintiff did not depend altogether upon the memory of a witness as to the contents of the report, but introduced an examined copy, or one which had been compared with the original and found to be correct. This is the principal exception of the defendant, and in passing upon it we must sustain the ruling of the Court below. . . .

No error.

836. COTE v. NEW ENGLAND NAVIGATION CO.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1912

213 Mass. 177; 99 N. E. 972

EXCEPTIONS from Superior Court, Bristol County; JABEZ FOX, Judge.

Action by Edmond Cote against the New England Navigation Company. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant brings exceptions. Overruled.

Arthur S. Phillips, of Fall River, for plaintiff. Arthur W. Blackman, of Boston, for defendant.

RUGG, C. J.—This is an action of contract. The declaration alleges that the defendant as common carrier received a log of veneer of the value of $62 shipped to the plaintiff, which it failed to deliver. The only defence now material is that the plaintiff has sued the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Company for the same cause of action, wherein the plaintiff recovered judgment which had been satisfied. The defendant admitted that it transported the veneer. It was undisputed that prior to the present action the plaintiff had brought action against the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Company, in which the declaration was in three counts, the first in contract alleging failure as a common carrier to deliver to the plaintiff the log of veneer valued at $62, the second count also in contract for failure as common carrier to transport oak stain to the value of $13.50, and (the plaintiff alleging doubt as to whether his action sounded in tort or contract) a third count in tort alleging conversion of both the log of veneer and the wood stain, the respective values of which were averred to be the same as in the contract counts. The log of veneer referred to in that declaration was the same as that which is the subject of the present action.

The defendant offered in evidence the full record of the earlier action, which showed judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $13.50, and judgment satisfied. The plaintiff called as a witness the magistrate, before whom that action was tried. Subject to the exception of the defendant, he read from a paper in his possession, which was a motion by the plaintiff to discontinue his action set forth in the first count, and testified that the paper was left with him by the plaintiff's attorney at the trial of the action. Ascertaining on June 17, 1912, that this paper bore no file mark, he directed the clerk of the Court to file the paper, and caused the docket to be amended accordingly, and that the paper was in truth filed on June 19, 1911, which was the date of the trial of that action. The duly certified copy of the record in evidence did not show the filing or allowance of any such motion or any other motion affecting the declaration or the plaintiff's claims under it at the trial. It is to be observed that this testimony did not relate to the matters actually tried out and decided in the action, but merely to the Court record. Plainly, the admission of this evidence was improper. It was said in Wells v. Stevens, 2 Gray 117:

> "No principle is more firmly established than that which excludes oral testimony when offered to vary or contradict written judicial records. The record of a Court of competent jurisdiction imports incontrovertible verity as to all the proceedings which it sets forth as having taken place, and is of so high a nature that no averment can be made against it."

The record failed to show the presentation or allowance of the motion, and no parol evidence was admissible to amplify, modify, or contradict it. This rule is based upon considerations of public policy, and is too well established to require discussion. Kelley v. Dresser, 11 Allen 31; Lund v. George, 1 Allen 403; Sayles v. Briggs, 4 Metc. 421 [ante, No. 834]; Speirs Fish Co. v. Robbins, 182 Mass. 128, 65 N. E. 25.

But the defendant fails to show that it has suffered injury. The defendant in support of its plea of former judgment and satisfaction, offered no other evidence except the record. From this it appeared that the action was not between the same parties as those to the present action. Hence the general rule, that a judgment on its merits in a former action between the same parties is a bar, as to every issue which in fact was or in law might have been litigated, to later action upon the same cause, has no application. There is nothing to indicate that the present defendant is a privy of the defendant in the earlier action. Apparently they are strangers. The defence is different in kind, and is founded on another rule, to the effect that a plaintiff cannot obtain twice satisfaction for the same debt or wrong. The plaintiff as a shipper of merchandise can have but one satisfaction of the debt or claim due to him for the failure to deliver his property, which the defendant undertook to transport as a common carrier. . . . New York Bank Note Co. v. Kidder Press Mfg. Co., 192 Mass. 391, 408; Crow v. Bowlby, 68 Ill. 23; Jenners v. Oldham, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 235. The defence that the plaintiff had already received satisfaction of his debt or claim was an affirmative one, and the burden of proving it rested on the defendant. All it did was to introduce the record of an action, in which the present plaintiff was the plaintiff and another common carrier was the defendant, and in which the declaration sufficiently alleged, by two separate counts in contract, failure to deliver two distinct articles of merchandise and alternatively by one count in tort conversion of the same articles, in which the judgment was general and in which there was satisfaction. One only of these articles was the same as the subject of the present action. This evidence did not sustain the burden of proof as to the issue raised by the defendant. It did not show that the plaintiff had already received payment of the claim sought to be enforced against the defendant. It well might have been that the only issue tried and settled in the earlier case related to the other articles of merchandise and not to that now in litigation. So far as the exceptions show anything touching that matter, they indicate that the value of the log of veneer was not recovered in the earlier case. . . . When the second action is not between the same parties or does not relate to exactly the same claim or demand, then the effect of the prior judgment and its satisfaction can extend no further than the issue in fact litigated and determined. When the record does not demonstrate what issues actually were tried and decided, they may be shown by extrinsic evidence. . . . Sometimes this may appear on the record itself. But it does not in the present case. The party upon whom rests the burden of proof must introduce evidence to show that the matters in truth tried and settled in the earlier case were the same as those sought to be tried again in the second case, before it can be said that the satisfaction of the earlier judgment proves or warrants a finding that the plaintiff has been paid for the claim sought to be recovered in the second action. . . . Newhall v. Enterprise Mining Co., 205 Mass. 585; Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. Kirven, 215 U. S. 252, and cases cited at 257.

The result is that the defendant failed to make out any defence under its answer of satisfaction of judgment for the same claim, and hence suffered no injury by the error in admission of evidence.

Exceptions overruled.

Topic 2. Jury's Verdict

837. VAISE v. DELAVAL. (1785. 1 T. R. 11.) Motion by Law for a rule to set aside a verdict, upon an affidavit of two jurors, who swore that the jury, being divided in their opinion, tossed up, and that the plaintiff's friends won.

Lord MANSFIELD, C. J. — The Court cannot receive such an affidavit from any of the jurymen themselves, in all of whom such conduct is very high misdemeanor. But in every such case the Court must derive their knowledge from some other source; such as from some person having seen the transaction through a window, or by some such other means.

838. OWEN v. WARBURTON. (1807. 1 B. & P. N. R. 326, 329.) MANSFIELD, C. J. — The affidavit of a juryman [to a jury's misconduct] cannot be received. It is singular indeed that almost the only evidence of which the case admits should be shut out; but considering the arts which might be used if a contrary rule were to prevail, we think it necessary to exclude such evidence. If it were understood to be the law that a juryman might set aside a verdict by such evidence, it might sometimes happen that a juryman, being a friend to one of the parties, and not being able to bring over his companions to his opinion, might propose a decision by lot, with a view afterwards to set aside the verdict by his own affidavit, if the decision should be against him.

839. ROBBINS v. WINDOVER

SUPREME COURT OF VERMONT. 1802

2 Tyl. 11

MOTION for new trial, stating that some of the jurors of the jury who tried the cause, after the cause was submitted to them, witnessed or related to others of the panel certain matters and things in relation to the issue not witnessed or related on the trial of the cause in Court. . . .

Chauncey Langdon, for defendant, offered to read the affidavit of one of the jurors. To the reading of this affidavit an objection was taken. . . .

TYLER, Assistant Judge, the Chief Judge being absent, delivered the opinion of the Court.

The defendant rests his motion on two grounds: The first is, that certain jurors of the panel who tried the cause, witnessed or related certain matters and things, in relation to the issue, to others of the panel after the cause was submitted to them, not witnessed on the trial of the cause in Court.

It may be observed here, that it is not alleged that these matters and things had any effect in determining the verdict; and the Court will not in any case set aside a verdict by intendment, where it appears that substantial justice has been done. But the previous question, whether the affidavit of one of the jurors shall be admitted, to show what passed during the investigation of the cause in the jury room, renders any further observation upon what would have been the effect of such testimony, if admitted, unnecessary.

Upon the point in question, the Court are decidedly of opinion, that the affidavit cannot be admitted to be read. The common law requires that the twelve jurors shall unite in a verdict. Whoever considers the variety and intricacy of causes they have to determine, the difficulty of bringing twelve persons of different habits and modes of thinking, and of unequal abilities, fortuitously elected, to concur in opinion, will perceive the wisdom of the Legislature in directing that their deliberations should be secret; for it was to be expected, that in bringing about a union of sentiment in the panel, the subject under consideration would be presented in various lights; that futile objections would be met with inconclusive arguments, theory opposed to practice, and legal science to common sense; that the reputations of witnesses would be scanned, the character of parties too often adverted to, and the whole investigation illustrated by relations of what each juror had heard or known in cases supposed similar; that the warmth of debate would excite an obstinacy of opinion, and a reluctant and tardy assent to the verdict, perhaps drawn from some one, which, on after reflection, might leave in the juror's mind a doubt of its rectitude. It would be of dangerous tendency to admit jurors by affidavit to detail these deliberations of the jury room, to testify to subjects not perfectly comprehended at the time, or but imperfectly recollected. From a natural commiseration for the losing party, or a desire to apologize for the discharge of an ungrateful duty, after the juror had been discharged from office, he would be too apt to intimate, that if some part of the testimony had been adverted to, or something not in evidence omitted, his opinion would have been otherwise, whilst others of the panel, with different impressions or different recollections, might testify favorably for the prevailing party. This would open a novel and alarming source of litigation, and it would be difficult to say when a suit was terminated.

We learn by the cases cited from the books, and from others within the recollection of the Court, that the English judges consider the admission of such affidavits as not common, and of dangerous tendency. . . . But whatever may have been the opinions of the English jurists on this point, the Court consider that the mode of our trials affords so many opportunities for a losing party to have his cause reconsidered by Court and jury, unknown in the mother country, that the reasons operative there, if any exist, for the admission of affidavits of jurymen, exhibiting the deliberations of the jury room, cannot apply here. . . . The affidavit of the jurymen cannot therefore be read in evidence, and consequently the defendant cannot rest on the first ground of his motion. . . .

Motion dismissed, with costs.

Landgon, for defendant. Darius Chipman, for plaintiffs.

840. WRIGHT v. TELEGRAPH CO.

SUPREME COURT OF IOWA. 1866

20 Ia. 195

SUIT to recover damages for the injury sustained by him on account of the casualties aforesaid. The cause was tried to a jury and resulted in a verdict of three hundred and forty-five dollars and sixty-six cents for plaintiff.

The defendant moved for a new trial, based mainly upon alleged erroneous giving and refusing instructions, misconduct of the jury, and newly discovered evidence. In support of the alleged misconduct of the jury, the defendant filed the affidavits of four of the jurors who tried the cause. Each affidavit stated, in substance, that, in order to arrive at the plaintiff's damages, it was agreed that each juror should mark down such sum as he thought proper to allow; that the aggregate should be divided by twelve, and the quotient should be the verdict; which agreement was carried out by each juror, and the quotient thus obtained was returned to the Court as the verdict of the jury. The plaintiff then moved to strike the affidavits of the jurors from the files, because they could not be read as evidence in support of the motion for a new trial. This motion to strike was sustained and the motion for a new trial overruled. The defendant excepted and appeals.

C. Baldwin, for the appellant. Clinton & Sapp, for the appellee.

COLE, J. — The first question presented by the transcript, and argued by the counsel, is, whether affidavits of jurors may be read in support of a motion for a new trial, based upon the alleged misconduct of the jury, in the manner of arriving at the verdict. . . .

[After reviewing the Iowa decisions,] This want of entire or perfect consistency in our own Court, naturally stimulates an inquiry as to the course pursued by other Courts upon the same question. . . . A brief review of them, in view of the importance and frequent recurrence of the question, seems a plain duty. . . .

It was shown in Aylett v. Jewel, 2 W. Black. 1299, by the affidavit of defendant's attorney, that some of the jury had confessed to him that, not being able to agree on their verdict, all the names were written on separate papers, and shook together in a hat, and it was agreed that a majority of the six names first drawn should decide the verdict, and it was so done; but the Court refused to interfere, because there was no affidavit by the jurors, but only hearsay evidence. See also, to same effect, Clark v. Stevenson, 2 W. Black. 803; Mellish v. Arnold, Bunbury 51; Straker v. Graham, 4 M. & W. 721; s. c., 7 Dowl. P. C. 223; Burgess v. Langley, 5 M. & G. 722. But see, contra, Addison v. Williamson, 5 Jur. (Exch.) 466. In Rex v. Simmons, Sayre 35, s. c. Wils., 329, the jury were directed to inquire as to two matters — the act and the intent, but unless they found the defendant guilty of both they should acquit. On the coming in of the jury, who only had found the defendant guilty of the act, the judge understood them to declare their verdict to be guilty, although one of the jurors said at the time, "No intent, no intent." There was much noise in the court room at the time. The affidavits of jurors were afterwards received, in explanation of the whole matter, and thereon the verdict was set aside upon the ground that it was contrary to the directions of the judge in a matter of law. See, also, Sargent v. Deniston, 5 Cow. 106; and Ex parte Caykendall, 6 Ibid., 53. There were two different issues in Cogan v. Ebden, 1 Burr. 383, and the jury agreed to find for plaintiff on one issue, and for defendant on the other; but the foreman gave a general verdict for defendant. The mistake was discovered by the jurors about an hour afterwards, but not till after the judge had gone to his lodgings. The affidavits of eight of them were received as a basis for a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be amended. In King v. Woodfall, 5 Burr. 2661, it was held that, when there is a doubt upon the judge's report, as to what passed at the time of bringing in the verdict, affidavits of jurors may be received upon a motion for a new trial; but an affidavit of a juror cannot be read, as to what he then thought or intended. . . . In Little v. Larrabee, 2 Greenl. 34, the action was a writ of entry, and the Court received the affidavits of jurors to show that they intended to find for the tenant, whereas, by mistakes in the legal terms, they returned a verdict for demandant, and thereon set the verdict aside. . . . That affidavits of jurors will not be received to show that the verdict was obtained by each juror marking down and dividing aggregate by twelve, or by lot, etc., was decided in the following cases: Vaise v. Delaval [ante, No. 837]; Owen v. Warburton [ante, No. 838]; Dana v. Tucker, 4 Johns. 487. That affidavits of jurors will not be received to show the detail of the deliberations of the jury, or that they or one or more of them misunderstood the evidence or instructions, etc., or did not agree to the verdict, etc., see Robbins v. Windover, 2 Tyler 11 [ante, No. 839]. . . .

It is very apparent from this review of the authorities, that each case has been decided, not on any recognized or fixed principle, but upon its own supposed merits, according to individual views of the judge delivering the opinion of the Court deciding the case; and although previous cases are sometimes cited, the question seems very often to have been treated as one of first impression. Under such circumstances, it is, of course, impossible to deduce a general rule from, or state one that will be consistent with, all the cases.

While we do not feel entirely confident of its correctness, nor state it without considerable hesitation, yet we are not without that assurance which, under the circumstances, justifies us in laying down the following as the true rule: That affidavits of jurors may be received for the purpose of avoiding the verdict, to show any matter occurring during the trial or in the jury room, which does not essentially inhere in the verdict itself, as that a juror was improperly approached by a party, his agent, or attorney; that witnesses or others conversed, as to the facts or merits of the cause, out of Court and in the presence of jurors; that the verdict was determined by aggregation and average or by lot, or game of chance or other artifice or improper manner; but that such affidavit to avoid the verdict may not be received to show any matter which does essentially inhere in the verdict itself, as that the juror did not assent to the verdict; that he misunderstood the instructions of the Court; the statements of the witnesses or the pleadings in the case; that he was unduly influenced by the statements or otherwise of his fellow jurors, or mistaken in his calculations or judgment, or other matter resting alone in the juror's breast. That the verdict was obtained by lot, for instance, is a fact independent of the verdict itself, and which is not necessarily involved in it. While every verdict necessarily involves the pleadings, the evidence, the instructions, the deliberation, conversations, debates, and judgments of the jurors themselves; and the effect or influence of any of these upon the juror's mind, must rest in his own breast, and he is and ought to be concluded thereon by his solemn assent to and rendition of the verdict (veredictum — a true declaration). To allow a juror to make affidavit against the conclusiveness of the verdict by reason of and as to the effect and influence of any of these matters upon his mind, which in their very nature are, though untrue, incapable of disproof, would be practically to open the jury room to the importunities and appliances of parties and their attorneys, and, of course, thereby to unsettle verdicts and destroy their sanctity and conclusiveness. But to receive the affidavit of a juror as to the independent fact that the verdict was obtained by lot, or game of chance, or the like, is to receive his testimony as to a fact, which, if not true, can be readily and certainly disproved by his fellow jurors; and to hear such proof would have a tendency to diminish such practices and to purify the jury room, by rendering such improprieties capable and probable of exposure, and consequently deterring jurors from resorting to them. . . .

While it is certainly illegal and reprehensible in a juror, to resort to lot or the like to determine a verdict, which ought always to be the result of a deliberate judgment, yet such resort might not evince more turpitude tending to the discredit of his statement than would be evinced by a person not of the jury, in the espionage indicated by Lord MANSFIELD and necessary to gain a knowledge of the facts to enable him to make the affidavit. At all events the superior opportunities of knowledge and less liability to mistake, which the juror has over the spy, would entitle his statement to the most credit. And if, as is universally conceded, it is the fact of improper practice, which avoids the verdict, there is no reason why a Court should close its ears to the evidence of it from one class of persons, while it will hear it from another class, which stands in no more enviable light and is certainly no more entitled to credit.

Nor does the consideration of the affidavits of jurors, for the purposes stated, contravene sound public policy. It is true, however, that public policy does require that when a juror has discharged his duty and rendered a verdict, such verdict should remain undisturbed and unaffected by any subsequent change of opinion upon any fact or pretext whatever; and, therefore, a juror should not be heard to contradict or impeach that which, in the legitimate discharge of his duty, he has solemnly asseverated. But when he has done an act entirely independent and outside of his duty and in violation of it and the law, there can be no sound public policy which should prevent a Court from hearing the best evidence of which the matter is susceptible, in order to administer justice to the party whose rights have been prejudiced by such unlawful act. In other words, public policy protects a juror in the legitimate discharge of his duty, and sanctifies the result attained thereby; but if he steps aside from his duty, and does an unlawful act, he is a competent witness to prove such fact, and thereby prevent the sanction of the law from attaching to that which would otherwise be colorably lawful.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the District Court erred in striking from the files and refusing to consider the affidavits of the four jurors, that the verdict was determined by each juror marking down such sum as he thought fit, and dividing the aggregate by twelve and taking the quotient as their verdict, pursuant to a previous agreement to accept it as such. These affidavits, uncontradicted, are sufficient to sustain the motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial.

841. CAPEN v. STOUGHTON

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1860

16 Gray 364

PETITION entered at April term 1858 of the Court of Common Pleas in Norfolk, setting forth that in November 1856 a town way was laid out over the land of the petitioners in Stoughton, and damages assessed therefor, by which the petitioners were aggrieved, and the county commissioners, upon their application and after due notice, issued a warrant for a reassessment of the damages by a jury; that a jury was empanelled and the case tried before them; that blank forms of verdict for the petitioners and for the respondents were handed to them by the sheriff; that the jury agreed upon and filled out a verdict for the petitioners, but through mistake omitted to sign it, and signed a verdict for the respondents; that both verdicts were sealed up in one envelope and returned into the Court of Common Pleas; that the petitioners received information from some of the jurors that the verdict returned was in their favor, and so told their counsel, and he, relying on this information, without inspecting the verdict, moved the Court at December term 1857 to accept it, and it was accepted and ordered to be certified to the county commissioners. The prayer of the petition was that this judgment should be vacated, the case brought forward on the docket, and leave given the petitioners to sue out a writ of review. SANGER, J., ruled that, assuming all the facts stated in the petition to be true, the petitioners were not legally entitled to the relief prayed for, and the Court had no discretionary power to grant it; and dismissed the petition. The petitioners alleged exceptions, which were argued in January 1859, and sustained, and the case remitted. . . .

A hearing was had in the Court of Common Pleas at April term 1859, at which AIKEN, J., against the objection of the respondents, allowed three of the persons who had composed the sheriff's jury to testify that, after agreeing on a verdict for the petitioners and filling up a blank form accordingly, the jury by mistake signed the form of verdict for the respondents; and ordered the former case to be brought forward on the docket, and the acceptance of the verdict to be vacated as prayed for. The respondents alleged exceptions to the admission of the testimony of the jurors. . . .

BIGELOW, C. J. . . . We think this case differs essentially from those cited by the counsel for the respondents, in which it has been held, that the testimony of jurors is inadmissible in support of a motion to set aside a verdict on the ground of mistake, irregularity, or misconduct of the jury, or of some one or more of the panel. It has been settled upon sound considerations of public policy that mistake of the testimony, misapprehension of the law, error in computation, irregular or illegal methods of arriving at damages, unsound reasons or improper motives, misconduct during the trial or in the jury room, cannot be shown by the evidence of the jurors themselves, as the ground of disturbing a verdict, duly rendered. . . .

But in the present case the mistake which is proved by the testimony of the jurors is of a different character. It is not one connected with the consultations of the jury, or the mode in which the verdicts were arrived at or made up. No fact or circumstance is offered to be proved, which occurred prior to the determination of the case by the jury and their final agreement on the verdict which was to be rendered by them. But the evidence of the jurors is offered only to show a mistake, in the nature of a clerical error, which happened after the deliberations of the jury had ceased, and they had actually agreed on their verdict. The error consisted, not in making up their verdict on wrong principles or on a mistake of facts, but in an omission to state correctly in writing the verdict to which they had, by a due and regular course of proceeding, honestly and fairly arrived. . . . No considerations of public policy require that the uncontradicted testimony of jurors to establish an error of this nature should be excluded. Its admission does not in any degree infringe on the sanctity with which the law surrounds the deliberations of juries, or expose their verdicts to be set aside through improper influences, or upon grounds which might prove dangerous to the purity and steadiness of the administration of public justice. On the contrary, it is a case of manifest mistake, of a merely formal and clerical character, which the Court ought to interfere to correct, in order to prevent the rights of parties from being sacrificed by a blind adherence to a rule of evidence, in itself highly salutary and reasonable, but which upon principle has no application to the present case. Exceptions overruled.

842. KOCH v. STATE

SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN. 1906

126 Wis. 470; 106 N. W. 531

ERROR to Municipal Court, Milwaukee County; A. C. BRAZEE, Judge.

Edward Koch was convicted of larceny from the person, and he brings error. Reversed.

Plaintiff in error was tried jointly with one Meyers upon an information for robbery and larceny from the person under § 4378, Rev. St. 1898. At the close of the testimony on the evening of November 18, 1904, both parties stipulated, before the jury retired to deliberate on their verdict, that should they agree during the night and after the adjournment of Court, they might write out their verdict, date it, and the foreman sign it, inclose it in an envelope, seal it up, and the foreman take it with him, and the jury retire from the jury room and return their verdict into Court at the opening thereof the following morning. The jury were also told, before retiring, that they were not at liberty to state to any person what their verdict was, until they had delivered it into Court. Before they retired, the Court submitted to them the following forms of verdict: (1) We find the defendants guilty as charged. (2) We find the defendants guilty of larceny from the person. (3) We find the defendants guilty of assault, or, if you find one guilty and one not guilty, then you will so pronounce by your verdict. (4) We find the defendants not guilty. The jury retired at 5:30 P.M. and at about 8:45 P.M. agreed upon a verdict, which was reduced to writing, sealed in an envelope, and placed in possession of the foreman, and the jury then dispersed, and were discharged from the custody of the sheriff who had charge of them while deliberating. At the opening of Court on the following morning, they entered the box and delivered to the Court the following verdict: "Milwaukee, Nov. 18, 1904. We, the jury, find defendant, Mr. Meyers, guilty as charged. We, the jury, find the defendant, Mr. Koch, guilty for larceny and also recommend the Court to be lenient with Mr. Koch. F. A. Woodford, Foreman." Counsel for plaintiff in error moved that the verdict be recorded as read; whereupon the Court replied that it would be recorded, but not until the Court had requested the jury as to what their intentions were when they found plaintiff in error guilty of larceny. Counsel for plaintiff in error also objected to the jury being permitted to orally contradict their written verdict, which objection was overruled, and exception taken. The Court then asked the jury if they meant to find plaintiff in error guilty of plain larceny, or larceny from the person, and the foreman answered: "Guilty of larceny from the person, is the way I understand it." The Court then instructed the clerk to ask each juror whether he meant to find plaintiff in error guilty of larceny, or larceny from the person, and upon being asked the question by the clerk, each juror answered that he meant to find him guilty of larceny from the person, to all of which counsel for plaintiff in error objected, and excepted to the proceedings and rulings of the Court.

Motion for new trial was made and denied, and the Court sentenced Meyers and plaintiff in error each to a term of one year in the Wisconsin State Reformatory; from which judgment and conviction plaintiff in error sued out his writ of error.

W. B. Rubin, for plaintiff in error. L. M. Sturdevant, Atty.-Gen., and A. C. Titus, Asst. Atty.-Gen., for the State.

KERWIN, J. (after stating the facts). The errors assigned raise the following questions for review: . . . third whether error was committed in receiving and changing the written verdict. . . .

3. Error is assigned because the verdict received was a nullity, and could not be amended after the jury had separated. The sealed verdict returned into court found the plaintiff in error guilty of larceny only. There was no finding that he was guilty of larceny from the person, nor of the value of the property taken. It is clear this finding was not sufficient to support the conviction. McEntee v. State, 24 Wis. 43; La Tour v. State, 93 Wis. 603, 67 N. W. 1138; Allen v. State, 85 Wis. 22, 54 N. W. 999. The question, therefore, arises whether the verdict could have been amended upon the facts heretofore stated. It is contended on the part of the State that it was not error to permit the jury, even after separation, to correct and explain their verdict, and several cases are cited, civil and criminal, which, it is claimed, support this position. In State ex rel. Town of White Oak Springs v. Clementson, 69 Wis. 628, 35 N. W. 56, it was held that the jury may, after announcing a verdict, if they see fit and before they are discharged, change the same and render a different one, and that where the jury have manifestly made an omission or mistake in their verdict, the presiding judge may call their attention to that fact, and return it to them for correction. In Victor S. M. Co. et al. v. Heller, 44 Wis. 265, after the jury had returned their verdict, the judge told them they were discharged, but immediately and before they left their seats or communicated with any one called their attention to imperfections in the verdict and put it in the form which they affirmed was intended, and it was signed by the foreman and declared by the jury to be their verdict; it was held that, it being clear that the verdict entered was the one intended, there was no error. . . . In these cases the jury had not separated during their deliberations; the changes in the verdicts being made during the time of deliberation, and before discharged or separation, and while the jury were still together as such. . . . These cases are mainly relied upon here by counsel for the State. But it will be seen from a careful examination of them that they do not reach the question before us.

The cases, however, are not altogether uniform upon this subject. Respectable authority may be found holding that verdicts in criminal. as well as civil, cases, can be amended after separation of the jury. . . . In Allen v. State, 85 Wis. 22, 54 N. W. 999, it was held that a defective verdict in a murder case could not be corrected either by the Court or by reassembling the jury after they had been discharged. In Illinois and Massachusetts, it has been held that in a prosecution for felony it is error for the Court to allow the verdict to be corrected or amended in matter of substance after it has been agreed upon, signed and sealed, and the jury has separated. Farley et al. v. People, 138 Ill. 97, in a trial on charge of larceny, the Court, with the consent of defendants' counsel, given in open Court, directed that the jury be permitted to seal their verdict when arrived at and return the same into Court at the opening session the following day, and on the same afternoon the jury separated and went to their respective homes; returning into Court the following morning and producing what they intended as a sealed verdict of guilty as to both defendants. The verdict, however, failed to fix the term of imprisonment of one defendant. Thereupon the Court directed them to again retire and complete their verdict. Defendant objected, which was overruled. After some delay, the jury brought in a second verdict, finding defendants guilty and fixing the punishment. Judgment was entered on the last verdict, and reversed on appeal on the ground that after the jury had separated they had no further power over their verdict. The Court distinguished the case from separation during the trial, and said:

"This is not the case of a jury having been allowed to separate during the progress of a trial, or coming in contact with the people generally, in which case it must appear that some injury resulted to the defendant, and therefore the authorities cited by counsel for the people have no application." . . .

In Commonwealth v. Tobin, 125 Mass. 206, in a prosecution for felony, the Court said:

"When the jury have been permitted to separate after agreeing upon and sealing up a verdict, there is this difference between civil and criminal cases: In a civil action, if the written verdict does not pass upon the whole case, or the jury refuse to affirm it, the Court may send them out again, and a fuller or different verdict afterwards returned will be good. But in a criminal case, the oral verdict pronounced by the foreman in open Court cannot be received, unless it is shown to accord substantially with the form sealed up by the jury before their separation."

We believe the rule in Illinois and Massachusetts, above cited, is best calculated to elevate the standard of jury trials and preserve the purity and integrity of the jury system. Whatever tends to subject a jury to temptation or improper influence during the trial, and especially after they have retired for deliberation, should be jealously guarded against, to the end that the accused may be protected in his constitutional right of a fair trial by an impartial jury.

In the case before us the verdict agreed upon and delivered into Court was a nullity. . . . The jury agreed upon a verdict, signed and sealed it, and then separated. Their function for deliberation and agreeing upon a verdict ceased as soon as they separated. They had no further office to perform, except to deliver into Court and announce the sealed verdict as the verdict of the jury. They could deliver this verdict orally, but they could not deliver a different verdict, orally or otherwise. Commonwealth v. Tobin, supra. . . . It follows, therefore, that the Court erred in excluding evidence on cross-examination, in permitting the verdict to be amended, and in denying the motion for new trial.

Judgment of the Court below is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SUB-TITLE III. CORPORATE RECORDS

845. UNITED STATES BANK v. DANDRIDGE

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES. 1827

12 Wheat. 65

THIS is a writ of error to the Circuit Court for the district of Virginia. The original action was debt on a bond, purporting to be signed by Dandridge, as principal, and Carter B. Page, Wilson Allen, James Brown, Jr., Thomas Taylor, Harry Heth and Andrew Stevenson, as his sureties, and was brought jointly against all the parties. The condition of the bond, after reciting that Dandridge had been appointed cashier of the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, at Richmond, Virginia, was, that if he should well and truly, and faithfully discharge the duties and trust reposed in him as cashier of the said office, then the obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue. The declaration set forth the condition, and assigned various breaches. Dandridge made no defence; and the suit was abated, as to Heth, by his death. The other defendants severed in their pleas. . . . Stevenson and Allen pleaded, among other pleas non est factum generally, and also special pleas of non est factum, on which issues were joined; and that all the defendants, in various forms, pleaded, that the instrument was not the deed of Stevenson; and further pleaded, that the bond had never been approved, according to the provisions of the 30th article of the rules and regulations of the bank. Issues were also taken on these pleas; and the cause came on for trial upon all the issues of fact.

At the trial, evidence was offered for the purpose of establishing the due execution of the bond by the defendants, and particularly by Stevenson and Allen, and its approval by the plaintiffs. The evidence was objected to, on behalf of the defendants, as not sufficient to be left to the jury, to infer a delivery of the bond, and the acceptance and approval thereof by the directors of the bank, according to the provisions of their charter; and the objection was sustained, the Court being of opinion, that although the scroll affixed by Allen to his name is, in Virginia, equivalent to a seal of wax, and although proof of the handwriting of Stevenson, and the bond being in possession of the plaintiffs, and put in suit by them, and the introduction of Dandridge into the office of cashier, and his continuing to act in that office, would, in general, be prima facie evidence, to be submitted to the jury, as proof that the bond was fully executed and accepted; yet it was not evidence of that fact, or of the obligation of the bond, in this case; because, under the Act of Congress, incorporating the Bank of the United States, the bond ought to be satisfactory to the board of directors, before the cashier can legally enter on the duties of his office, and consequently, before his sureties can be responsible for his non-performance of those duties; and that the evidence in this case did not prove such acceptance and approbation of the bond, as is required by law for its completion. . . .

The Court excluded the whole, and every part of the said evidence from the jury, being of opinion, that the board of directors keep a record of their proceedings, which record, or a copy of it, showing the assent of the directors to this bond, was necessary to show that such assent was given; and if such assent had not been entered on the record of the proceedings of the said directors, the bond was ineffectual, and no claim in favor of the plaintiffs could be founded thereon, against the defendants in these issues.

This cause was very elaborately argued by the Attorney-General and Mr. Webster, for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Tazewell, for the defendants.

STORY, J., for the majority (after stating the case as above). . . . It is admitted, in the opinion of the Circuit Court, that the evidence offered would in common cases, between private persons, have been prima facie evidence, to be submitted to the jury, as proof that the bond was fully executed and accepted. But it is supposed, that a different rule prevails in cases of corporations; that their acts must be established by positive record of proofs; and that no presumptions can be made, in their favor, of corporate assent or adoption, from other circumstances, though in respect to individuals, the same circumstances would be decisive. The doctrine, then, is maintained from the nature of corporations, as distinguished from natural persons; and from the supposed incapacity of the former to do any act, not evidenced by writing, and if done, to prove it, except by writing. . . .

In ancient times, it was held, that corporations aggregate could do nothing but by deed under their common seal. But this principle must always have been understood with many qualifications; and seems inapplicable to acts and votes passed by such corporations at corporate meetings. It was probably, in its origin, applied to aggregate corporations at the common law, and limited to such solemn proceedings as were usually evidenced under seal, and had to be done by those persons who had the custody of the common seal, and had authority to bind the corporation thereby, as their permanent official agents. Be this as it may, the rule has been broken in upon in a vast variety of cases, in modern times, and cannot now, as a general proposition, be supported. Mr. Justice BAYLEY, in Harper v. Charlesworth, 4 B. & C. 575, said, "A corporation can only grant by deed; yet there are many things which a corporation has power to do, otherwise than by deed. It may appoint a bailiff, and do other acts of a like nature." And it is now firmly established, both in England and America, that a corporation may be bound by a promise, express or implied, resulting from the acts of its authorized agent, although such authority be only by virtue of a corporate vote, unaccompanied with the corporate seal. But whatever may be the implied powers of aggregate corporations, by the common law, and the modes by which those powers are to be carried into operation, corporations created by statute must depend, both for their powers and the mode of exercising them, upon the true construction of the statute itself. . . . We do not admit, as a general proposition, that the acts of a corporation, although in all other respects rightly transacted, are invalid, merely from the omission to have them reduced to writing, unless the statute creating it makes such writing indispensable as evidence, or to give them an obligatory force. If the statute imposes such a restriction, it must be obeyed; if it does not, then it remains for those who assert the doctrine to establish it by the principles of the common law, and by decisive authorities. None such have, in our judgment, been produced. . . . If a person acts notoriously as cashier of a bank, and is recognized by the directors, or by the corporation, as an existing officer, a regular appointment will be presumed; and his acts, as cashier, will bind the corporation, although no written proof is or can be adduced of his appointment. In short, we think, that the acts of artificial persons afford the same presumptions as the acts of natural persons. . . .

But the present question does not depend upon the point, whether the acts of a corporation may be proved otherwise than by some written document. . . . In the present case, the acts of the corporation itself, done at a corporate meeting, are not in controversy. . . . The corporation is altogether a distinct body from the directors, possessing all the general powers and attributes of an aggregate corporation, and entitled to direct and superintend the management of its own property, and the government of the institution, and to enact by-laws for this purpose. . . . Assuming, then, that the directors of the parent bank were, as a board, to approve of the bond, so far as it respects the sureties, in what manner is that approval to be evidenced? Without question, the directors keep a record of their proceedings as a board; and it appears by the rules and regulations of the parent bank, read at the bar, that the cashier is bound "to attend all meetings of the board, and to keep a fair and regular record of its proceedings." If he does not keep such a record, are all such proceedings void, or is the bank at liberty to establish them by secondary evidence? In the present case (we repeat it), the whole argument has proceeded upon the ground, as conceded, that no such record exists of the approval of the present bond. The charter of the bank does not, in terms, require that such an approval shall be by writing, or entered of record. It does not, in terms, require that the proceedings of the directors shall generally be recorded; much less, that all of them shall be recorded. It seems to have left these matters to the general discretion of the corporation, and of the directors; and though it obviously contemplates, that there will be books kept by the corporation, which will disclose the general state of affairs, it is not a just inference, that it meant that every official act of the directors should be recorded, of whatever nature it might be. . . . Upon what ground it can be maintained, that the approval of the bond by the directors must be in writing? It is not required by the terms of the charter, or the by-laws. In each of them, the language points to the fact of approval, and not to the evidence by which it is to be established, if controverted. It is nowhere said, the approval shall be in writing, or of record. The argument at the bar, upon the necessity of its being in writing, must, therefore, depend for its support, upon the ground, that it is a just inference of law from the nature and objects of the statute, from the analogy of the board of directors to a corporate body, from principles of public convenience and necessity, or from the language of authorities, which ought not to be departed from. Upon the best consideration we can give the subject, we do not think that the argument can be maintained, under any of these aspects.

MARSHALL, CH. J. (dissenting). I should now, as is my custom, when I have the misfortune to differ from this Court, acquiesce silently in its opinion, did I not believe that the judgment of the Circuit Court of Virginia gave general surprise to the profession, and was generally condemned. . . .

The plaintiff is a corporation aggregate; a being created by law; itself impersonal, though composed of many individuals. These individuals change at will: and, even while members of the corporation, can, in virtue of such membership, perform no corporate act, but are responsible in their natural capacities, both while members of the corporation, and after they cease to be so, for everything they do, whether in the name of the corporation or otherwise. The corporation being one entire impersonal entity, distinct from the individuals who compose it, must be endowed with a mode of action peculiar to itself, which will always distinguish its transactions from those of its members. This faculty must be exercised according to its own nature. Can such a being speak, or act, otherwise than in writing? Being destitute of the natural organs of man, being distinct from all its members, can it communicate its resolutions, or declare its will, without the aid of some adequate substitute for those organs? If the answer to this question must be in the negative, what is that substitute? I can imagine no other than writing. The will to be announced is the aggregate will; the voice which utters it, must be the aggregate voice. Human organs belong only to individuals; the words they utter are the words of individuals. These individuals must speak collectively, to speak corporately, and must use a collective voice; they have no such voice, and must communicate this collective will in some other mode. That other mode, as it seems to me, must be by writing. A corporation will generally act by its agents; but those agents have no self-existing power. It must be created by law, or communicated by the body itself. This can be done only by writing. . . . It is stated in the old books (Bro. Corp. 49), that a corporation may have a ploughman, butler, cook, etc., without retaining them by deed; and in the same book (p. 50), WOOD says, "small things need not be in writing, as to light a candle, make a fire, and turn cattle off the land." FAIRFAX said, "A corporation cannot have a servant but by deed; small things are admissible, on account of custom, and the trouble of a deed in such cases, not by strict law." Some subsequent cases show that officers may be appointed without deed, but not that they may be appointed without writing. Every instrument under seal was designated as a deed, and all writings not under seal were considered as acts by parol. Consequently, when the old books say a thing may be done without deed, or by parol, nothing more is intended than that it may be done without a sealed instrument. It may still require to be in writing. . . . According to the decisions of the Courts of England, then, and of this Court, a corporation, unless it be in matters to which the maxim "de minimis non curat lex" applies, can act or speak, and, of course, contract, only by writing. . . .

It may be said, that although certain things ought to appear in writing, it is not necessary that all the transactions of a bank should so appear; and the assent of the directors to the bonds given by their cashiers, need not appear. Such grave acts or omissions as may justify the suing out a scire facias, to vacate the charter, ought to be evidenced by their records; but such unimportant acts as taking bonds from their officers, need not appear; these may be inferred. I do not concur in this proposition. . . . The counsel for the plaintiffs has sought to escape the almost insuperable difficulties which must attend any attempt to maintain the proposition that a corporation aggregate can act without writing, by insisting that the directors are not the corporation, but are to be considered merely as individuals who are its agents. If this proposition can be successfully maintained, it becomes a talisman, by whose magic power the whole fabric which the law has erected respecting corporations, is at once dissolved. In examining it, we encountered a difficulty in the commencement. Agents are constituted for special purposes, and the extent of their power is prescribed, in writing, by the corporate body itself. The directors are elected by the stockholders, and manage all their affairs, in virtue of the power conferred by the election. The stockholders impart no authority to them, except by electing them as directors. But we are told, and are told truly, that the authority is given in the charter. The charter authorizes the directors to manage all the business of the corporation. But do they act as individuals, or in a corporate character? If they act as a corporate body, then the whole law applies to them as to other corporate bodies. If they act as individuals, then we have a corporation which never acts in its corporate character, except in the instances of electing its directors, or instructing them. . . . The president and directors form, by the charter, a select body, in which the general powers of the corporation are placed. This body is, I think, the acting corporation. . . . The board must keep a record of its proceedings. Were the by-laws silent on the subject, this would be, as I think, rendered indispensable, by the fact, that it is the act of a corporation aggregate. If there must be a record of their proceedings, and even were this necessity not absolute, if the by-laws show that there is one, it follows, that this record, not the oral testimony of the members, or of bystanders, must prove their acts. . . . This record, or an authentic copy of it, must, according to the rules of evidence, be produced, that it may prove itself. May its existence be presumed in this case? The corporation, which claims this presumption, keeps the record, and is now in possession of it, if it exists. No rule of evidence is more familiar to the profession than that a paper cannot be presumed, under such circumstances.

I have stated the view which was taken by the Circuit Court of this case. I have only to add, that the law is now settled otherwise, perhaps to the advancement of public convenience. I acquiesce, as I ought, in the decision which has been made, though I could not concur in it.

846. CHESAPEAKE & OHIO R. CO. v. DEEPWATER R. CO.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS OF WEST VIRGINIA. 1905

57 W. Va. 643; 50 S. E. 890

ERROR from Circuit Court, Raleigh County.

Action by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company against John L. Trail and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the Deepwater Railway Company brings error. Reversed.

A. N. Campbell and Brown, Jackson & Knight, for plaintiff in error. Simms & Enslow and W. P. Hubbard, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. — Although, in form, a proceeding by one railroad company to condemn, for its roadbed, a strip of land owned by another railroad company, which purchased said land for its roadbed, this case is in reality a controversy between said railroad companies over the question of priority of right to appropriate the strip of land in question, and calls for the settlement of principles governing the rights of rival companies contending for the same location for their respective roads.

The conflict is between a branch line of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, called the "Piney Creek Extension," commencing at Prince Station on the main line, and on New river, and running for several miles up Piney creek and its branches, and thence across the divide to the waters of the Guyandotte river, and an extension of the Deepwater Railway, commencing at Glen Jean on Loup creek, another branch of the New river, and not far from Piney creek, and running across the divide to the waters of the Guyandotte river, and thence across the mountains to the Bluestone river. The point of conflict is a place called Jenny's Gap, on the ridge between the waters of New river tributaries and those of Guyandotte river branches. There is space for two locations through this gap, but the one in question is preferable to the other. . . .

A review of the authorities clearly establishes the following principles: First, When the statute does not make the filing of a map or plat of a railroad location a prerequisite to the adoption of it, an appropriation of it may be made without the filing of such maps. . . . Third, A mere survey made by the engineers of a railroad company, not adopted or determined upon by the corporation itself, through its board of directors or otherwise, as the location of the route, does not amount to an appropriation, giving priority of right as against third persons. Fourth, A survey staked out upon the ground as a center line, a preliminary line, or as an actual location, whether delineated on paper or not, if adopted by the corporation as aforesaid, is a location within the meaning of the statute, and the company first making such location has a right to it superior to that of any other company. . . . The application of these principles to the facts must determine whether the applicant is entitled to the right of way through Jenny's Gap.

The record here presents the three distinct issues of

(1) A location by the Deepwater Company before September 11, 1902.

(2) A location by the Chesapeake & Ohio Company, September 11, 1902, and

(3) A location by the Deepwater Company, September 26, 1902. . . .

The directors of the Deepwater Company, on the 26th day of September, 1902, passed a resolution reciting that the engineer had located the company's proposed railroad from Glen Jean up the Dunloup creek to the mouth of Sugar creek, and up Sugar creek, crossing the divide, to Pack's Branch of Paint creek, down that branch and up Paint creek, crossing the divide, to Miller's Camp Branch of the Marsh Fork of Coal river, down that branch to the junction of the same with Surveyor's Fork, up that fork to Jenny's Gap, and through that gap to the waters of Slab Fork, and then on to the Bluestone river as hereinbefore described. . . . This was a formal, specific, and a deliberate adoption of that location by the corporate authorities of the Deepwater Railway Company. This is undisputed. . . . If, prior to the 26th day of September, 1902, the Chesapeake & Ohio Company had not, by corporate action, adopted the same location through Jenny's Gap, the right of the Deepwater Company to that location, by force of the action of its directors on September 26, 1902, is beyond dispute. The defendant in error claims to have adopted the location on the 11th day of September by a resolution passed by its board of directors at a meeting held on that day in the city of New York.

For proof of this, it introduced, over the objection of plaintiff in error, what purports to be a record of the minutes of such meeting, including the adoption of such a resolution. This record is in the form of typewritten sheets, pasted in a regular book of the company kept at Richmond, Va., by the secretary of the company, who testified that he had not attended the meeting, and knew nothing of it or what had been done thereat, other than what was disclosed by the type written matter. This typewritten record on sheets of paper, signed by the president of the company and the assistant secretary, had been received by him and pasted in the minute book, but he did not even say when they had been received. Neither the president, assistant secretary, nor any other person who appears to have attended the meeting was called to testify that such meeting was held and such resolution passed, and nothing was shown by way of excuse for not calling them. Furthermore, it was admitted that both the president and assistant secretary were living, and residing, respectively, in Richmond and Philadelphia. The defendant in error attempts to use this record as evidence to prove its own act in its own favor against a total stranger to it. It is not used for the purpose of establishing any contractual relation between it and the plaintiff in error. It makes no charge against the plaintiff in error. It does, however, make use of this resolution to prove title in itself to a thing which the plaintiff in error says it has not acquired, and to which the plaintiff in error is entitled, unless, by prior acquisition, it has become the property of the defendant in error.

In support of the admissibility of the record for this purpose, upon showing that it was entered in the book by one having authority to do so, it is contended that the records of a private corporation are admissible evidence against all persons to prove its corporate acts. The able counsel for defendant in error say the following is deducible from the authorities as a rule on the subject: "The records of a corporation are admissible to establish a right in it which grows out of its own proceedings, although they may not be admissible to fasten the liability on others." In testing the soundness of this proposition, it is necessary to bear in mind that the decisions relating to the admissibility of such evidence present many distinctions in respect to the subject-matter of the controversy, the relation of the parties to it, and to one another, and the nature of the fact sought to be proved by such evidence.

(1) That the records of a corporation are always admissible against it is perfectly apparent. They are admissions and declarations against its interest, and may be used as such, just as the books, memoranda, letters, and declarations of an individual may be used against him, although not admissible in his favor. Jones, Evidence, § 530; Townsend v. Church, 6 Cush. 279. The cases illustrating this use of corporation records and books can have no possible bearing on the question presented here. Hence no time need be spent in collecting and analyzing them.

(2) When the controversy is between stockholders, concerning their interests in the corporation, and involves the consideration of the acts of the corporation as affecting directly its status and indirectly their interests, the records and books are admissible if authenticated by showing that they are the records and books of the corporation and have been regularly kept as such. This is done by calling as a witness the secretary or other recording officer, if he can be had. This rule rests upon considerations of convenience, and also upon sound legal principle. By becoming a stockholder in a corporation, a person creates, between himself and all other stockholders of the corporation, and between himself and the corporation, a contractual relation, which is affected and controlled, in some degree, by every proper act of the corporation, whether done by its board of directors, its officers, or its mere employees. . . . He is deemed to have known, when he established his relationship of stockholder, that such records and entries would be made, and that they would indirectly relate to and affect his interest. Having access to the books and constructive knowledge of their contents, there is ground for a presumption that he would not have suffered an improper entry to remain in them without objection. Moreover, a relationship closely allied to that of partnership exists between the stockholders of a corporation. Because of the relation of agency existing between copartners, and the right of inspection of the books relating to the partnership business and affairs, the books of a copartnership are admissible evidence in controversies between the members thereof. . . .

(3) Though, according to good authority, there is no legal principle upon which the action can be justified, Courts almost everywhere hold that the records and proceedings of a corporation are admissible to prove, prima facie, against an individual, his membership in it as a stockholder. This rule is stated in Turnbull v. Payson, 95 U. S. 418, 24 L. Ed. 437, as follows:

"A person is presumed to be the owner of stock when his name appears upon the books of the company as a stockholder, and, when he is sued as such, the burden of disproving that presumption is cast upon him."

It was adopted by this Court in Railway v. Applegate, 21 W. Va. 172, without any reference to other authorities for a verification of its soundness. . . . Commenting upon this rule, Morawetz on Corporations, § 76, says:

"While the rule stated in the preceding section appears to be well established by authority, it is difficult to support it by any principle of the common law. The stock-books of a corporation are undoubtedly evidence against it as admissions, but they cannot be admitted on this ground, for the company, against a person who denies that he is a shareholder."

In this the author is supported by Wheeler v. Walker, 45 N. H. 355, and Chase v. Railroad Co., 38 Ill. 215. Though denouncing the rule as indefensible in principle, the Alabama Court enforced it in Semple v. Glenn, 91 Ala. 245, 6 South. 46, 9 South. 265, 24 Am. St. Rep. 894.

A review of the cases will show that, except in a few instances, there was evidence other than the mere appearance of the defendant's name upon the stockbook to show his connection with the company as a stockholder. . . . Railroad Co. v. White, 41 Me. 512, 66 Am. Dec. 257; Railroad Co. v. Sherman, 8 R. I. 564; Vawter v. Franklin College, 53 Ind. 88; Stuart v. Railway Co., 32 Grat. 146; and Turnpike Co. v. McKean, 10 Johns. 154, 6 Am. Dec. 324 — all belong to the class of cases just examined. Very few, if any, of these cases, may be regarded as having enunciated the proposition that, in the absence of proof of a subscription, or other substantial connection of the defendant with the corporation, so as to make him a participant in the enterprise, the presence of his name alone on the books of the company, written there by one of its agents, is prima facie proof of membership. If, however, such doctrine is established, it affords no reason for extending the departure to any other class of cases. It has been denounced as unsound in principle by both Courts and text-writers.

(4) A very numerous class of cases in which corporations have been permitted to introduce their records and books for the purpose of proving their acts is that in which it is necessary to establish only de facto corporate existence, and not existence de jure. For instance, a bank sues on a note, or a railroad company on a contract, and the plea of nul tiel record is interposed, denying that the plaintiff is a corporation. Here proof of corporate existence is required, but it need not be full, nor need the evidence be such as is necessary to prove many kinds of specific corporate acts. Many decisions say that for this purpose it suffices to introduce the charter, act of incorporation, or articles of incorporation, and then proof that the plaintiff has acted as such corporation — carried on a banking business or railroad business. The issue is collateral in its nature. The plea simply requires the plaintiff to establish a status — show that it is what it claims to be. In that question, the other party has no direct, but only an incidental, interest. The fact thus put in issue is distinct from, and practically independent of, the real controversy between the parties. See Way v. Billings, 2 Mich. 397; Insurance Co. v. Allis, 24 Minn. 75; Henderson v. Bank, 14 Miss. 314; Bank v. Harrison, 39 Mo. 433, 93 Am. Dec. 285. . . .

(5) Practically all the cases found in which it has been held that the books and records of private corporations are evidence of their acts and proceedings, as against strangers, belong to this last class. This accounts for the oft-repeated proposition that, for such purposes, such records are admissible in controversies with strangers to the corporation. To say that the same rule must be applied to the determination of a question of vital interest between the corporation and a stranger would ignore the distinction which ought to be made between the cases in which the issue is one in which the stranger has no direct and substantial interest and the case in which the records are offered to prove the very fact which is directly in controversy between them. A corporation may be permitted to appeal to its records to establish a collateral issue without permitting it to introduce self-made and self-serving entries upon its books to prove that which is directly in issue between it and a stranger. That they cannot do so to prove title and claims against strangers has been decided in a number of cases. Jones v. University, 46 Ala. 626; Railroad Co. v. Cunnington, 39 Ohio St. 327; Railroad Co. v. Noel, 77 Ind. 110; Coosaw Mining Co. v. Mining Co. (C. C.) 75 Fed. 860; London v. Lynn, 1 H. Bl. 205, 214. . . . Owings v. Speed, 5 Wheat. 420, 5 L. Ed. 124, is relied upon, but that was a case in which the records of a public corporation were held admissible. It affords no precedent for the admission of records of private corporations. All authorities admit this distinction. Jones on Evidence, § 526; Wigmore, Evidence, § 1661. Even the records of public corporations are not admissible to prove anything but acts of a public nature. Thus, in Attorney General v. Warwicke, 4 Russell 222, it was said: "Private entries in the books of a corporation, which are under their own control, and to which none but the members of the corporation have access, cannot be made use of to establish rights of the corporation against third parties." So, in Marriage v. Lawrence, 3 B. & A. 142, the Court held that "an entry in the public books of a corporation is not evidence for them, unless it be an entry of a public nature."

(6) Counsel for defendant in error base their contention largely upon an observation made in Railroad Co. v. Eastman, 34 N. H. 137, quoted in 2 Thompson, Corporations, § 1921. But as no question calling for such principle arose in that case, the declaration is obiter. Mr. Thompson also says, in volume 6 of his work on Corporations, § 7740, that "the general rule is believed to be that, except for the purpose of proving what the corporation did, or what action its corporators took in effecting the organization, its books and records are not evidence as against a stranger." . . .

. . . The latest, and perhaps the most analytical, work on the subject of evidence, states the proposition in this language:

"The records of the proceedings and acts of an ordinary private corporation are, according to one theory, the constitutive acts of the corporation; they are not the evidence of what is done, but they are what is done, since the proceedings must be in writing." 3 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1661.

The author cites no cases illustrating what he means, but his view seems to be the idea above expressed. If so, expression in another form would be that they are not evidence that a thing was done, but are the evidence of the identity of the thing done; it being granted or proved that something was done because whatever was done was put in writing, and the writing itself is the evidence of it. Proceeding, he says:

"According to the other theory, they are merely entries of the oral doings, and are thus analogous to any ordinary person's contemporary entries of his doings."

This makes them mere memoranda, to be considered as a part of the oral testimony of the clerk or officer who entered them, testifying as a witness that the things purporting to have been done were done. That this is the true interpretation of his language appears from the following:

"The general practical difference between the two theories is as to their effect on the conclusiveness of the entries."

Under the first theory, the written memorial of what was done could not be varied by parol evidence; under the second, it could. This shows that he does not mean to say the record is proof that it was made at the time, in the manner, and by the authority recited therein. Further proof of this is found in a subsequent paragraph of the same section, in which he says:

"Books of entries of corporate proceedings are (as above quoted) ordinarily not receivable under the regular entries exception without calling the clerk or other entrant. But the records of a public officer are admissible under the present exception without calling the entrant, because he is a public officer; and therefore the books of a public corporation (that is, with us, usually a municipal governing body) are receivable without calling the official entrant." . . .

The effort here is to prove title, not by purchase, recovery, or otherwise, from the adverse party, but to show title nevertheless. It is title by appropriation from the public. Shall it be proved by evidence different in character from what is required in other cases? Could title by purchase, in case of conflict between two corporations, be established by the exhibition of a resolution on the books of one of them, on the theory that, as to the other, it was a corporate act, and not a transaction with such other company? . . . Against them stand several holding the contrary. Therefore the weight of authority, reason, and sound legal principles all assert the contrary. . . .

As this evidence must be discarded as inadmissible, nothing reinains to support the claim of a location by the defendant in error on the 11th day of September, 1902. . . .

The conclusions above stated require reversal of the two judgments complained of, setting aside of the verdict, restitution of the land in controversy to the plaintiff in error. . . .

BRANNON, P. (dissenting in part). I cannot concur in that feature of the foregoing opinion or syllabus laying down, as a permanent rule of evidence, that the record of proceedings of the directors of a railroad company is not admissible evidence alone to prove that the directors adopted a particular location for its road. It is an act which can be done alone by the directors. It cannot be done except in regular meeting. The act of adoption is a resolution in its record books. It may not be going too far to say that is the only evidence, if the record be in existence. It is not necessary to say that; but I do say that the resolution on record is competent evidence. It cannot create a debt or liability against a stranger; it cannot operate to take away his right; but where the law demands that the corporation do any act by its directory, that book is competent evidence to prove the doing of that act. Our Code of 1899 says, in chapter 53, § 52: "They shall keep a record, which shall be verified by the signature of the president." That "record" must have force to prove an act demanded of the directors by law. The authorities cited by Judge POFFENBARGER, properly construed, show this. Wigmore, Evidence, says: "No one doubted that the records of a meeting were receivable to prove the doings of a meeting." That is just the case — to prove the adoption of a resolution. In this case, as Wigmore says, this record is in fact not simply evidence of the act, but the very "act itself." 2 Wigmore, Evidence, § 1074 (3). I think the law is well phrased in Sigua v. Brown, 171 N. Y. 496, 64 N. E. 196:

"The books of corporations, for many purposes, are evidence, not only between the corporation and its members, and between its members, but also as between the corporation, or its members, and strangers. They are received in evidence generally to prove corporate acts of a corporation, such as its incorporation, its list of stockholders, its by-laws, the formal proceedings of its board of directors."

Thompson, Corporations, § 7740, will sustain this view. It is not claimed that such a record is conclusive, but admissible, evidence. Thompson says: "The general rule is believed to be that, except for the purpose of proving what the corporation did, or what action its corporators took, in effecting its organization, its books and records are not evidence against strangers." As the location had to be adopted by the directors, under this authority the record is competent to prove what the board did.

TITLE III. FORMALITIES OF LEGAL ACTS

847. John H. Wigmore. A Treatise on Evidence. (1905. Vol. IV, § 2454.) When it is required that a transaction, to have legal effect, must be in writing, the requirement is one of form or solemnity. This principle of Solemnization, or Formality, differs from the two preceding ones in that it does not inquire whether the act was done at all, nor whether it was embodied in a single utterance, but merely whether its form of utterance was sufficient. Stamp, seal, attestation, writing, — all these are different varieties of formality; but the fundamental and most common one, in all modern systems of law, is writing.

That the rule of Written Formality is independent of the rule of Integration, just examined, is plain. For example, a will of land, during the century after it was first required to be in writing, was in all that time not required to be in a single document. So, too, of insurance applications under modern statutes. On the other hand, when the parties have voluntarily reduced their transaction to a single writing, the rule of Integration applies, although the transaction might have been valid without any writing. Whenever, then, the question is whether a transaction, to be valid, must be in writing, not merely oral, it is a question of Written Formality. This question is presented when the parties have used no writing, and is a distinct one from that which arises after the transaction has been done in writing, i.e., from the question of "varying the writing" already dealt with.

What transactions, then, are required by law to be done in writing, as a condition of legal validity? At common law, none, it would seem. The historical surroundings of the common law in its origins were unfavorable to such a requirement.

Even among statutes, there are few of wide scope. These date back to the innovating provisions of the 1500s, by which bargains and sales, as well as wills, of land must be in writing. The next and greatest measure of this kind was the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries, in 1678, which extended the formality of writing to the remaining most important transactions in land and to many classes of contracts and of dealings with personality.

The remaining varieties of Formality in vogue in our law are applicable only to specific kinds of legal acts, e.g., attestation, for wills only; registration, for conveyances only. Hence they are not features common to legal acts in general, and do not fall within the present purview.

TITLE IV. INTERPRETATION OF LEGAL ACTS

848. INTRODUCTORY.[1] General Nature of Interpretation. Standard and Sources of Interpretation. The process of Interpretation is a part of the procedure of realizing a person's act in the external world. It is, in a sense, the completion of the act; for without it the utterance, whether written or oral, must remain vain words. If a person were to be contented with proclaiming his contracts at the top of a mountain, or nailing his deeds to the front gate, he would not need to be concerned with the process of interpretation. But deeds and contracts and wills, if they are not to remain empty manifestoes, must be enforced. They must be applied to external objects. Somewhere possession must be yielded or goods delivered or money transferred. In order that the law may enforce these changes in external objects, the relation between the terms of the legal act and certain specific external objects must be determined, as an indispensable part of the process. In short, the interpretation of the terms of a legal act is an essential part of the act considered as capable of legal realization and enforcement.[2] The only difference is that the actor alone creates the terms of his act, while the interpretation of it, being a part of the enforcement, comes into the hands of the law.

The process of interpretation, then, though it is commonly simple and often unobserved, is always present, being inherently indispensable.

The method of it consists in ascertaining the actor's associations or connections between the terms of the act and the various possible objects of the external world. Those terms may be dramatic or verbal. The lantern of Paul Revere, and the twenty-one guns of a warship's salute, are as much the subject of interpretation as the words of a will. In all cases, the process is that of applying the symbol or word to external objects. Since men cannot go out and instantaneously transform, with the presto of a magician, the existing to the desired state of things, they must embody their will in marks which will serve to point out the effects desired, and then wait for the law, or for some one's voluntary obedience to it, to effect the realization of the effects thus pointed out in advance. The process of interpretation may be compared to a wireless telegraph station. A vessel approaches the coast and perceives the station-pole standing straight above the cliffs. Until the current can be intercepted, it is but a useless rod of steel; it sends no message and accomplishes no purpose. It may have any one of various attunements; and it will

[1] Abridged from the present Compiler's Treatise on Evidence (1905. Vol. IV, §§ 2458, 2459).

[2] Answer of Judges to the House of Lords, 22 How. St. Tr. 301 (1789): "Your lordships ask us, 'whether the sense of the letter be matter of law or matter of fact?' We find a difficulty in separating the sense of the letter from the letter. The paper without the sense is not a letter."

tell nothing until a similar attunement be established by the vessel. To ascertain that attunement, the particular country where it is fixed must be known, and then the official records of its methods and signals must be consulted. Not until then can the station's message be made actual to the vessel.

Such is the process of interpretation. The analogy of the telegraph station illustrates the important distinction between the two great divisions of the process. The first question must always be, What is the standard of interpretation? The second question is, In what sources is the tenor of that standard to be ascertained? Sometimes one or the other of these questions may interpose no difficulty; but both must always be settled.

(1) The standard of interpretation, as involved in legal acts, is the personality whose utterances are to be interpreted. There are practically four different available standards. First, there is the standard of the normal users of the language of the forum, the community at large, represented by the ordinary meaning of words. Next, there is the standard of a special class of persons within the community, — the followers of a particular trade or occupation, the members of a particular religious sect, the aliens of a particular tongue, the natives of a particular dialect, who use certain words in a sense common to the entire class, but different from that of the community at large. Thirdly, there is the standard of the specific parties coöperating in a bilateral act, who may use words in a sense common to themselves and unknown to any others. Finally, there is the standard of an individual actor, who may use words in a sense wholly peculiar to himself; and here the question will naturally arise whether he may insist on his individual standard in the interpretation of the words of a contract, or even of a uniliteral act such as a will. The first inquiry in interpretation, then, is to determine which of these standards is the proper one for the particular act to be interpreted; and for this purpose certain working rules have to be formulated.

(2) The sources for ascertaining the tenor of the standard form the second object of inquiry. Since interpretation consists in ascertaining the associations between the specific terms used and certain external objects, and since these associations must be somehow knowable in order to proceed, the question is where they are to be looked for. So far as the standard of interpretation is solely the normal one of the community, the inquiry is a simple one; the usage of the community (as represented in dictionaries and elsewhere) is the source of information. But that standard (as will be seen) is rarely the exclusive one. The mutual standard of parties to a bilateral act, and for wills the individual standard of the testator, is constantly conceded to control; and it then becomes necessary to search among the prior and subsequent utterances of the party or parties to ascertain their usage, or fixed associations with the terms employed. In resorting to these data, the question then arises whether there is any prohibitive rule of law which limits the scope of search and forbids the use of certain data. These rules, if any, form the second part of the law of interpretation.

Intention and Meaning, distinguished. Before proceeding, however, to these two parts of the subject in order, it is necessary to fix upon a terminology and to avoid misunderstanding in the use of words. When we seek to ascertain the standard and sources of interpretation and thereby discover the actor's association of words with external objects, what is the term, in one word, which describes the object of search? Is it the person's "meaning"? Or is it his "intention"? Over this difference of phraseology has persisted an endless controversy, which, like that of the two knights and the shield at the cross-roads, is after all resolvable mainly into a difference of words only.

The distinction between "intention" and "meaning" is vital. The distinction is independent of any question over the relative propriety of these names; for there exist two things, which must be kept apart, yet never can be unless different terms are used. The words "will" and "sense" may be taken as sufficiently indicative of these two things and free from the ambiguity of the other terms.

Will and Sense, then, are distinct. Interpretation as a legal process is concerned with the Sense of the word used, and not with the Will to use that particular word. The contrast is between that Will, volition, or intent to utter, as the subjective element of an act, making a person responsible for a particular utterance as his, and that Sense or meaning which involves the fixed association between the uttered word and some external object. It has already been seen that by the general canon of legal acts, the person's actual will or intent to utter a given word can seldom be considered for legal purposes. If he has exercised a volition to utter something, then he is responsible for such utterances as in external appearance the utterance he intended, — whether or not he actually intended it. On the other hand, the sense of his word as thus uttered — his fixed association between that symbol and some external object — may usually be given full effect, if it can be ascertained. The rules for the two things may be different.

The law has thus constantly to emphasize the contrast between the prohibitive rule, applicable to the execution of an act, and the present permissive rule, applicable to its interpretation. Judges are desirous, when investigating the sense of the words as uttered by the person, of emphasizing that they do not violate the rule against inquiring whether he actually intended to utter those words. Hence the reiteration of the contrast between "intention" and "meaning":

1789, KENYON, L. C. J., in Hay v. Coventry, 3 T. R. 83, 86: "We must collect the meaning of the testator from those words which he has used, and cannot add words which he has not used."

1833, PARKE, J., in Doe v. Gwillim, 5 B. & Ad. 122, 129: "In expounding a will, the Court is to ascertain, not what the testator actually intended, as con-tradistinguished from what his words express, but what is the meaning of the words he used."

1833, DENMAN, L. C. J., in Rickman v Carstairs, 5 B. & Ad. 663: "The question . . . is not what was the intention of the parties, but what is the meaning of the words they have used."

The common terminology of these judicial explanations is unfortunate, because "meaning" suggests the state of the person's mind as fixed on certain objects, and "intention" bears the same suggestion. The constant exclusion of the state of the person's mind in one aspect and its consideration in another aspect are thus apparently contradictory and irreconcilable. But the terms "will," or "volition," and "sense," serve to avoid this ambiguity. They emphasize the distinction that the will to utter a specific word is one thing, and the fixed association of that word is another thing. Thus the Execution of the act and its Interpretation as executed are kept distinct.

The analogy of other symbols than words will best illustrate how common and fundamental is this difference in other affairs, and how instinctively it is appreciated and applied. Suppose a foreign vessel to be coasting the shore and entering various harbors where the Government maintains a uniform system of harbor-buoys in various colors and shapes, indicating respectively channels, sandbars, sunken rocks, and safe anchorages; here the significance of each kind of buoy is known to be the same in every harbor under Government control. But suppose the vessel to enter a harbor or inlet under the control of an individual or a city having a peculiar and different code of usage for the buoys; here it is immaterial whether a red buoy under the Government system signifies a channel or a sandbar; the vital question for the vessel now is what a red buoy signifies under the code of the local authority, and all other systems of meaning are thrown aside as useless. This illustrates that though, in interpreting a person's (for example, a testator's) words, we are concerned with his individual meaning, as distinguished from the customary sense of words, still we are not dealing with his state of mind as to volition, but with the associations affixed by him to an expressed symbol as indicating to others an external object. That is to say, the local harbor authorities may have "intended" to put a green buoy instead of a red buoy, or to have put the red buoy at another spot; they may have made a "mistake," just as the testator may have intended to use other words; but in both cases the state of mind as to volition, or mistake, is a wholly different thing from the fixed association, according to that individual's standard, between the expressed symbol and some external object.

To illustrate another aspect of the subject, suppose a game of chess to be played by B with his guest A. If the two are of the same nation, their standards of interpretation — for example, as to the shape of each chessman, the allowable moves, and the effect of a move — will be the same. But some nations differ from others in one or more of these respects; so that if, for example, B's national rules allowed a rook to threaten diagonally on the board, A as guest would accept and accommodate himself, as best he might, to this standard of operation. But, though this much might be conceded to B as host, in the adoption of his standards for giving meaning to his acts of moving the chessmen, yet it would remain true that his private intent or volition, as distinguished from the significance of his acts of moving, would be immaterial; so that, for example, his intent to have touched and moved a different piece, or to have placed the piece on a different square, would not be taken into consideration. So, again, if A and B engage in a shooting match, with two targets of 100 yards' and 500 yards' distance, it may be that, after the shooting, A and B will discover that they have not agreed which prize is to be associated with which target, or whether the victory at the 500-yard target is to count for more than the victory at the 100-yard target, and they may have to repeat the match after coming to a common understanding. But in no case would A think of claiming that B, who has hit the 100-yard bull's-eye, could not win because he was really aiming at the 500-yard target and hit the other only by mistake; nor could A have a second trial, on missing the 500-yard target, because by mistake he shot at the 100-yard target.

A person, then, who wills to utter words is like a man placing a buoy, or moving a chessman, or shooting at a target. His will or intent or volition as to the terms of the peculiar utterance is one thing; his sense or meaning attached to the terms actually uttered is a different thing. Whatever may be the rules for the former element of his act, the rules for the latter element are independent of them.

SUB-TITLE I. STANDARD OF INTERPRETATION

850. History.[1] The history of the law of interpretation is the history of a progress from a stiff and superstitious formalism to a flexible rationalism. The marked features of primitive formalism have been already noticed in other aspects. The word of a man is in itself almost a magic formula. The wrong word produces its evil effects in spite of the good will of the party; without the right word, nothing will move, however plainly he seek to express himself. When the brother of Ali Baba forgot the word "sesame," he was powerless to open the door of safety. This inherent potency of words was for primitive minds, as it now is for children, no mere fairy tale, but a reality of life. These notions come down into Coke's time shorn of their first crudeness. But they explain nevertheless the scholastic technicality of those later days. A word was still a fixed symbol. Its meaning was something inherent and objective, not subjective and personal. A man who wrote a document dealt with words as he might deal with a blunderbuss or a carpenter's tool. They had their uses; and he must understand and choose the proper word for the purpose in hand, just as he must take the risk of not handling the gun or the adze in the proper fashion. "Rerum enim vocabula immutabilia sunt, homines mutabilia," sufficiently illustrates the attitude of the times.

This attitude was of course, from the point of view of intellectual development, bound to change gradually. But progress was retarded, in the English judicial world, by three circumstances (with others) particular to that sphere.

One of these was the prejudice (for such it may be termed) in favor of the legal heir, — an instinct naturally strong in a nation whose greatest and most explanatory fact was its dependence upon landed wealth and a system of primogeniture. When a will was to be construed, its effective interpretation was no great matter of concern to the judges, for they would rather than not that its provisions should fail.

Another circumstance was the tendency of the judges to keep the construction of writings out of the jury's hands and reserve it for themselves. Still a third consideration was the practice and the interests of conveyancers. This branch of the profession had accumulated a store of esoteric learning, which labelled each word and phrase with its traditional meaning. This learning would lose half of its mystery and its value if the rigidity of these terms should disappear. The instinct was to treasure the shibboleths of conveyancing; and the pressure of this body of practitioners against any liberality of interpretation must have been heavy.

At the period of the end of the 1700s, then, there is found in the law a settled tradition, bolstered up in artificial survival by considerations such as the above, that the words of a legal document inherently possess a fixed and unalterable meaning. The law had prescribed it. No man, in a document, could think himself entitled to mean what he pleased. Some of the judicial utterances seem now obstinate enough in their blindness.

This notion was barely beginning to give way by the end of the 1700s. Interpretation by local usage, for example, today the plainest case of legitimate deviation from the normal standard, was still but making its way. The individual usage of a testator was in the eyes even of Hardwicke and Thurlow, and of course of Kenyon and Eldon (those reactionaries and mainstays of conservatism), heretical enough. As late as 1821 the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas conceded frankly that "if not in a majority of wills, yet certainly in a great number, the construction is contrary to the probable intent." And yet to give effect to a more flexible principle was to threaten the "landmarks of property," as the Bar was repeatedly warned.

But the law of England was merely passing through the same stages as the law of Rome. It was impossible that it could remain perpetually immovable in the old ruts. And so it emerged into the 1800s with a growing spirit of liberality which could not help conceding something, yet was hampered by the stern tradition. It now conceded that the sense of words is not fixed by rules of law; that the extreme of the old rule had disappeared. But it insisted that when the meaning is "plain" — that is, plain by the standard of the community and of the ordinary reader — no deviation can be permitted. That is, it preserved the old theory to the extent of legally fixing the meaning for the party, however wrongly, unless the wrongness was glaringly plain on the face of the case.

Such is the rule still surviving to us, in many Courts, from the old formalism, namely, the rule that you cannot disturb a plain meaning. The following passages show its phrasing:

Lane v. Stanhope. (1795. 6 T. R. 345, 354.) Lord Kenyon, Ch. J.: It is our duty in construing a will to give effect to the devisor's intention as far as we can consistently with the rules of law; not conjecturing, but expounding his will from the words used. Where certain words have obtained a precise technical meaning, we ought not to give them a different meaning; that would be (as Lord King and other judges have said) removing landmarks. But if there be no such appropriate meaning to the words used in a will, if the devisor's intention be clear and the words used be sufficient to give effect to it, we ought to construe those words so as to give effect to the intent.

Beacon Life & Fire Assurance Co. v. Gibbs. (1862. Privy Council. 1 Moore, P. C. n. s. 73, 98.) Lord Chelmsford: In order to construe a term in a written instrument where it is used in a sense differing from its ordinary meaning, evidence is admissible to prove the peculiar sense in which the parties understood the word; but it is not admissible to contradict or vary what is plain.

851. ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. SHORE

11 Sim. 592, 615

In 1704, Lady Hewley, a Protestant Non-conformist, conveyed estates to trustees for the benefit of "such poor and godly preachers for the time being of Christ's Holy Gospel," and for such poor and godly widows for the time being, of "poor and godly preachers of Christ's Holy Gospel," as the trustees for the time being should think fit; for promoting the preaching of "Christ's Holy Gospel," in such manner and in such poor places as the trustees for the time being should think fit; for educating such young men designed for the ministry of "Christ's Holy Gospel" as the trustees for the time being should approve and think fit; and for relieving such "godly persons in distress," being fit objects of her own and the trustees' charity, as the trustees for the time being should think fit. At the date of the deed, all religious sects tolerated by law believed in the Trinity, but, in the course of time, the estates became vested in trustees, of whom the majority (though called Presbyterians) were Unitarians, and one was a member of the Church of England; and they applied the rents for the benefit of Unitarians. . . .

Dr. John Pye Smith, a witness for the Relators, deposed . . . that the ordinary sense and meaning of the term Presbyterians or Presbyterian dissenters, at or about the time of the foundation of Lady Hewley's charities, was a particular class of separatists from the Establishment, who differed from the two other classes on certain points of external discipline. The Rev. Thomas Scales, for the relators, deposed . . . that the word or term Presbyterian, at the time referred to, was commonly used as the name or description of a class or denomination of English Protestant dissenters, and that they were so large and influential a body as to give a name to all dissenters. These witnesses deposed to the above facts from "tradition and authentic publications"; and gave their opinions, derived from the same sources, as to the meaning, in 1704 and 1707, of "poor godly preachers," &c., &c. . . . The following are the questions propounded to the learned Judges, by the House of Lords:

First, — Whether the extrinsic evidence adduced in this cause, or what part of it, is admissible for the purpose of determining who are entitled, under the terms "godly Preachers of Christ's Holy Gospel," "Godly Persons," and the other descriptions contained in the deeds of 1704 and 1707, to the benefit of Lady Hewley's bounty? . . .

Tindal, C. J. — The general rule I take to be, that where the words of any written instrument are free from ambiguity in themselves, and where external circumstances do not create any doubt or difficulty as to the proper application of those words to claimants under the instrument, or the subject-matter to which the instrument relates, such instrument is always to be construed according to the strict, plain, common meaning of the words themselves; and that, in such case, evidence dehors the instrument, for the purpose of explaining it according to the surmised or alleged intention of the parties to the instrument, is utterly inadmissible. If it were otherwise, no lawyer would be safe in advising upon the construction of a written instrument, nor any party in taking under it; for the ablest advice might be controlled, and the clearest title undermined, if, at some future period, parol evidence of the particular meaning which the party affixed to his words, or of his secret intention in making the instrument, or of the objects he meant to take benefit under it, might be set up to contradict or vary the plain language of the instrument itself. The true interpretation, however, of every instrument being manifestly that which will make the instrument speak the intention of the party at the time it was made, it has always been considered as an exception, or, perhaps, to speak more precisely, not so much an exception from, as a corollary to, the general rule above stated, that where any doubt arises upon the true sense and meaning of the words themselves, or any difficulty as to their application under the surrounding circumstances, the sense and meaning of the language may be investigated and ascertained by evidence dehors the instrument itself; for both reason and common sense agree, that by no other means can the language of the instrument be made to speak the real mind of the party. Such investigation does, of necessity, take place in the interpretation of instruments written in a foreign language; in the case of ancient instruments where, by the lapse of time and change of manners, the words have acquired, in the present age, a different meaning from that which they bore when originally employed; in cases where terms of art or science occur; in mercantile contracts, which, in many instances, use a peculiar language, employed by those only who are conversant in trade and commerce; and in other instances, in which the words, besides their general common meaning, have acquired, by custom or otherwise, a well-known peculiar, idiomatic meaning, in the particular country in which the party using them was dwelling, or in the particular society of which he formed a member, and in which he passed his life. . . . But I conceive the exception to be strictly limited to cases of the description above given, and to evidence of the nature above detailed.

. . . On this account, I think all the extrinsic evidence which was actually given, in the cause, for the purpose of determining who were entitled under the terms "godly preachers of Christ's Holy Gospel" and other expressions used in the deeds, was inadmissible. Such, for instance, as the evidence of Dr. Pye Smith and Dr. Bennett as to the religious opinions of the Presbyterians and of other Protestant dissenters in the time of Lady Hewley; their interpretation of the terms used in the deeds; and their evidence of the religious opinions of Lady Hewley herself. The production also of the will of Sir John Hewley and of Lady Hewley, in proof of the private religious opinions of Lady Hewley, appears to me, both in respect to the point to which they were produced, and to the character of the evidence itself, not admissible by law.

[A majority of the other judges concurred with Tindal, C. J.]

852. Re Jodrell

L. R. 44 Ch. D. 590

The Rev. Sir Edward Repps Jodrell, Bart., who died on the 12th of November, 1882, by his will, made on the 23rd of March, 1868, appointed his wife and two friends whom he named to be his executors and trustees, and gave various specific legacies. . . . By clause 23 the testator directed the trustees to invest the sum of £5000, and to hold the same in trust to pay the income to his cousin, Major George King. . . . By clause 24 there was a similar gift of £5000 to hold in trust to pay the income to his cousin, Georgiana Forde. . . . By clause 25 there was a like gift of £5000 to hold in trust to pay the income thereof to his cousin, Emily MacDonnell. . . . By clause 37 the testator gave as follows: "As to all the residue and remainder of my real and personal estate not hereby effectually disposed of, I direct the same to be equally divided amongst such of my relatives hereinbefore named. . . ."

In an administration action commenced by originating summons on the 13th of March, 1888, . . . the Chief Clerk, on the 15th of March, 1889, certified that . . . the persons named in clauses 23, 24, and 25 were not legitimately related to the testator, but were the legitimate descendants of George Morison King and Mary Margaret Morison Moylan, formerly King, both of whom and the testator's mother were the natural children of Caroline Amelia Morison. . . .

The summons was adjourned into Court, and came on for hearing before Mr. Justice STIRLING, on the 26th of October, 1889.

C. Lyttelton Chubb, for the plaintiffs, the executors and trustees, stated the facts, and said that questions had arisen as to whether persons named in the will as "my cousins," but who were not cousins legally, could take under the residuary clause as "relatives"; . . .

Rigby, Q. C., (Christopher James with him), for Charles Seale Hayne: . . . The testator knew the fact that his own mother was a natural child, and that the persons called "cousins" in clauses 23, 24, and 25 were not in law relatives, but in blood purely. . . .

Sir Henry James, Q. C., Renshaw, Q. C., and Ingle Joyce, the defendants. . . . The mere fact that the testator in his will treated persons who were the children of illegitimate children as his cousins is not sufficient in law to entitle persons who were not really his relatives to take a share. . . .

STIRLING, J. . . . The main question then arises as to the meaning of the words "relatives hereinbefore named"; and as to that, three views have been put forward. The first rests on two elementary rules of construction, viz., that a will is so to be construed as to give effect to each word rather than in a way which will leave some of them inoperative; and that the words are to be taken in their strict and accurate meaning, unless an intention can be inferred to use them in another. The strict and accurate meaning of the word "relatives" is "legitimate relatives." The strict and accurate meaning of the word "named" . . . is "persons mentioned nominatim, if not by all their names, by some at least, either Christian or their surnames." If the testator used the words "relatives" and "named" with those meanings, it is found that the class of persons who would have taken under clause 37, if the testator had died immediately after the execution of his will, consisted of, at most, five persons, viz., Charles Phillip Paul Jodrell, named in clause 12; Charles Seale Hayne, named in clause 20; Emily Higgins, named in clause 21; and Mary Champagne and Blanche Champagne, named in clause 22. . . . The result is that, in the events which have happened, Mr. Charles Seale Hayne is entitled to the whole of the residue.

From this decision several of the legatees who had been excluded appealed. . . .

Lord HALSBURY, L. C. — I am called upon to express an opinion on what is the meaning of this written instrument, and I repudiate entirely the notion of laying down any canon of construction which is to extend beyond the particular instrument that I am called upon to give an interpretation to. . . . The law will allow you, if you choose, expressly and in terms, to leave things to your wife's relations, or to leave things to persons who are not your legitimate descendants; and, inasmuch as the law permits both those things to be done expressly, I myself am wholly unable to understand in what way a Court of construction is called upon to put particular interpretations upon particular words with reference to any supposed presumption that the law makes either way. For myself, I am prepared to look at the instrument such as it is; to see the language that is used in it; to look at the whole of the document, and not to part of it; and, having looked at the whole of the document, to see (if I can) through the instrument what was the mind of the testator. Those are general principles for the construction of all instruments — and to that extent it may be said that they are canons of construction.

But the moment I depart from those general canons of construction applicable to all instruments, and I am overwhelmed with authorities about what particular Judges have thought about other particular instruments, and whether in this or that particular instrument the Judge has been sufficiently satisfied that such and such was the meaning of the testator, I confess myself to be in a hopeless state of confusion. In the first place, I do not know what mental thermometer there is to ascertain what exact degree of certainty is to be obtained. If there is sufficient to establish the meaning, why is it sufficient? And what does that mean? It must mean sufficient in the mind of the particular tribunal that has to decide. . . .

But now I come to construe the particular instrument, and I do not desire to express my meaning otherwise than to use the language of Lord CAIRNS in Hill v. Crook, L. R. 6 H. L. 265, 285, and he says, very truly, I think,

> "If you find that that is the nomenclature used by the testator, taking his will as the dictionary from which you are to find the meaning of the terms that he has used, that is all which the law, as I understand the cases, requires."

It seems to me that that is a very simple test, and, adding only to that the circumstances of the case with which the testator was dealing in order that you may put yourself as much as you can into the position, and diving so into the mind of the person who has made the instrument which you are endeavoring to construe, it appears to me you have all the legitimate materials from which you can deduce what was the meaning of the testator.

Now, applying to the present case those general observations which are applicable to the interpretation of all such instruments, I find that the testator has described a number of persons as his "cousins." . . . When we do come to the word "relative" in section 37 we must find out what the testator has meant by the word "relative." . . . I find, therefore, that the word "relative" is used as a general word applicable to some of the persons whom he has hereinbefore described.

Now, with reference to Major King, Georgiana Forde, and to Emily MacDonnell, this observation applies — I take those as examples, though I believe there are more — those are persons who are not cousins in the strict sense which is insisted on on the other side. They are persons, all three of them, with respect to whom the bar sinister would prevent the actual application in strictness of that language. . . . Did he mean those persons when he spoke of his "relatives"? I confess for myself I cannot entertain the smallest doubt that they were in his mind as relatives. . . . He has, therefore, to use the language of Lord Cairns, given me a dictionary whereby I find that his wife's relatives, the nieces, and his illegitimate cousins are his relatives. . . .

Under those circumstances I cannot entertain a doubt that we ought not to follow the decision of the learned Judge below. I think that the decision was erroneous and must be reversed.

We are also of opinion that the legatees are to take per capita and not per stirpes.

Lindley, L. J. (concurring). . . . I do not propose to deal with decided cases at all. It may be that there were expressions in the documents then before the Court which made the Judges come to conclusions which I cannot arrive at when I come to look at the will and codicils with which I have to deal. I do not consider that a decision which is more or less at variance with other cases is wrong because it is so at variance. Cases of construction are useful when they lay down canons or rules of construction, and they are useful when they put an interpretation on common forms — whether in deeds, wills, or mercantile documents. They may be valuable guides; but when I am told that because something occurs in one will I am to give a precisely similar effect to a similar expression occurring in another will dealing with a different property and in another context, I object altogether to do it. The only principle that I know of is that which has been expressed before. Look at the words, avail yourself of such evidence as is legitimately admissible, and see what the testator has said, and expound it as best you can with reference to what is legitimately before you. . . .

Bowen, L. J. — I am of the same opinion. . . . It seems to me that the law laid down in Hill v. Crook, L. R. 6 H. L. 265, 285, by Lord Cairns is the true law. And although I do not disguise from myself that many judges, from Lord Eldon's time down to the present, judges of the highest authority and of the greatest learning, have used language (so to speak) of warning, and language that amounts to more than Lord Cairns has said — have used language to the effect that you must, before you can include under the name which the law usually appropriates to a legitimate tie persons who stand outside that strict line, find a necessary inference, or a very clear intention to that effect, it seems to me that the only weight one can give to such language is to treat it not so much as a canon of construction as a counsel of caution, to warn you in dealing with such cases not to give way to guesses or mere speculation as to the probabilities of an intention, but to act only on such evidence as can lead a reasonable man to a distinct conclusion. But I protest, that as soon as you see upon the will, read by the light of such extrinsic circumstances as you may survey, what the true construction is, and what the true intention expressed by the testator is, then your journey is performed. You require no more counsellors to assist you; and after once arriving at the journey's end, to pause in giving effect to the true interpretation because, forsooth, the language has not been framed according to some measure or standard of correct expression, which is supposed to be imposed by judges out of regard for social or other reasons, appears to me to be using the language of such learned judges, not as laying down canons for construing a will, but as justifications for misconstruing it. As soon as you once arrive at your journey's end you have no more to do than to give effect to the true construction as you see it. . . .

It seems to me that here the true construction of the will must be that in the term "relatives hereinbefore named" the testator intended to include all those he had before treated as relatives, whether he was correct in law in so treating them or not, and the children of those whom he had referred to in the preceding clauses.

853. TILTON v. AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY

Supreme Court of New Hampshire. 1880

60 N. H. 377

Bill in equity, by the executor of the will of Joseph Tilton, for the interpretation of the third item of the will. Facts found by the Court. The third item is, "I give and bequeath to the Bible Society, Foreign Mission Society, the Home Mission Society, and the Tract Society, five hundred dollars each." There are no societies known by those names. From 1851 until his death in 1864, the testator and his wife were members of the Congregational church and society at Littleton, and were regular attendants at the services and meetings of the church and society.

Subject to the plaintiff's exception, it was proved that during that time, at such meetings, annual contributions were taken for the New Hampshire Bible Society, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the New Hampshire Home Missionary Society, and the American Tract Society (who are defendants claiming the legacies); that when such contributions were taken, they were called collections for the New Hampshire Bible Society, Foreign Missions, the New Hampshire Missionary Society, and the American Tract Society; and that during the same period a similar custom of contribution for the same societies prevailed in the other Congregational churches and societies of this state, the donees being usually designated as the Bible Society, Foreign Missions, Home Missions, and the Tract Society. There was no evidence that the testator had knowledge of the usage in other towns than Littleton, except his connection with the Littleton church and society. Franklin Tilton was a member of the Congregational church and society at Littleton from July, 1858, until his death, was a regular attendant at their meetings, and took part therein, during a part of the time was superintendent of the Sabbath-school, and was familiar with the usages of the church and society. The residuary legatees contend that the bequests of the third item are void for uncertainty. Upon these facts the Court found that the societies for whom the annual contributions were taken were the societies which the testator intended to make legatees in the third item of his will.

Bingham, Mitchell & Batchellor, for the plaintiff and heirs. There are no societies known by the names used by the testator. The defendant societies are neither named nor described in the will; and their names, or descriptions of them or their objects in the will, are essential. . . .

C. R. Morrison, for the societies. . . . A misdescription of the legatee does not render the legacy void, unless the ambiguity is such as to render it impossible, either from the will or otherwise, to ascertain who was intended as the object of the testator's bounty. Smith v. Smith, 4 Paige Ch. 271; Society v. Hatch, 48 N. H. 393, 397. . . .

Doe, C. J.—There is no patent ambiguity. If there had been but one Bible society, the bequest to "the Bible Society" would not have been void for uncertainty.

The question is not whether a plea of misnomer of a party is sustained by proof, nor whether there is a variance between the evidence and the name of a third person set forth in pleading. The question is not by what name any Bible society was known to others, but which one of several Bible societies was intended by the testator. . . . Evidence showing what name was given to a Bible society in its character, what name it used or recognized as its own, and by what name or names it was known to others, tends to prove a name by which the legatee might have been known to the testator, and a name which he might have used in his will to express his intention. But the society intended by him, and identified by competent evidence, is the legatee, by whatever name described in the will, and notwithstanding any other name or names by which it may have been invariably or usually known to others. . . .

The New Hampshire Bible Society being pointed out by such terms in the will as he would be likely to use in describing that society, being the one he would probably mean when he spoke of "the Bible Society," and being found, upon competent evidence, to be the society intended by him, the law does not withhold the legacy from the donee intended by him, and does not give it to those who he meant should not have it.

A person known to a testator as A. B., and to all others as C. D., may take a legacy given to A. B. Samuel may take a legacy given to Edward, the testator having been in the habit of calling him Edward. Parsons v Parsons, 1 Ves. Jr., 266. . . . Case discharged.

Stanley, J., did not sit. The others concurred.

854. MYERS v. SARL

Queen's Bench. 1860

3 E. & E. 306

Action for a sum due on a building contract. By the contract it was provided that "no alteration or additions shall be admitted unless directed by the architects of" the defendants "in writing under his hand; and a weekly account of the work done thereunder shall be delivered to the said architect or the clerk of the works on every Monday next ensuing the performance of such work; and the delivery of such account shall be a condition precedent to the right of" the plaintiff "to recover payment for such addition or alteration." It was contended before the arbitrator, on behalf of the defendants, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for some of the extra work done by him, on the ground that the same was not directed to be done by the architect by any writing under his hand pursuant to the clause in the contract above set out, and also on the ground that no sufficient weekly accounts of such work were delivered by the plaintiff within the meaning of that clause. With respect to the latter objection it appeared in evidence that certain accounts of the extra work were delivered by the plaintiff as and for weekly accounts within the meaning of the contract; and it was contended on his behalf that the term "weekly account," as used in the contract, was a term of art well known in the building trade, and to all builders and architects, and that parol testimony was admissible to prove its meaning.

The admissibility of such evidence was objected to on the part of the defendants. The arbitrator held that the words used were a term of art, and that such evidence was admissible: and he accordingly received the same.

Bovill (Tompson Chitty with him), for the plaintiff. . . . Secondly, the arbitrator was clearly right in admitting parol evidence to explain the term "weekly account," that being, as he has found, a term of art in the building trade. . . .

Lush, contra. — The case is not within the principles upon which parol evidence is admissible to explain written documents. The parol evidence, here, was not restricted to the meaning of an ambiguous word or expression, but was admitted to contradict the plain meaning of the words "a weekly account of the work done thereunder," i.e., under the direction of the architect, and to prove that those words were satisfied by the delivery of accounts of extra work not done under such direction. Grant v. Maddox, 15 M. & W. 737, is distinguishable. Parol evidence was properly admitted, in that case to show that, by the word "year" in the contract there in question, the theatrical year was intended. (BLACKBURN, J. — Does not the principle of that decision show that evidence is admissible to explain that, by a "weekly account of the work," an account of certain portions of weekly work was meant? . . . That is a fair meaning of the words, and it would be contradicted by the parol evidence.)

HILL, J. . . . The question turns upon the meaning to be given, in the contract, to the words "a weekly account of the work done thereunder." Mr. Lush says that the plain, ordinary meaning of these words is a "weekly account of all the work done thereunder." The usage of the trade is proved to be that they mean "a weekly account of the day work done thereunder." We have to determine whether evidence of that usage was rightly received. Now the rule governing the admissibility of evidence to explain the language of contracts is, that words relating to the transactions of common life are to be taken in their plain, ordinary, and popular meaning; but if a contract be made with reference to a subject-matter as to which particular words and expressions have by usage acquired a peculiar meaning different from their plain, ordinary sense, the parties to such a contract, if they use those words or expressions, must be taken to have used them in their restricted and peculiar signification. And parol evidence is admissible of the usage which affixes that meaning to them. The admissibility of such evidence does not depend upon whether the expression to be construed is ambiguous or unambiguous; but merely upon whether or not the expression has, with reference to the subject-matter of the contract, acquired the peculiar meaning.

BLACKBURN, J. — I am of the same opinion. I agree with my Brother HILL that the words of a written commercial contract are to be understood in the sense which they have acquired in the trade to which the contract relates. It is a prima facie presumption that, if the parties to such a contract use expressions which bear a peculiar meaning in the trade, they use them in that peculiar meaning, which can be ascertained only by parol evidence. I do not think that it is necessary, in order to render such evidence admissible, that there should be any ambiguity on the face of the phrase which has to be construed. . . . I take it to be the true rule of law upon the subject that when it is shown that a term or phrase in a written contract bears a peculiar meaning in the trade or business to which the instrument relates, that meaning is prima facie to be attributed to it; unless upon the construction of the whole contract enough appears, either from express words or by necessary implication, to show that the parties did not intend that meaning to prevail. The consequence is that every individual case must be decided on its own grounds. . . .

Consequently, I think that the arbitrator was quite right in admitting the evidence.

Judgment for plaintiff on first point, and for defendants on the second.

855. BROWN v. BYRNE. (1854. Queen's Bench. 3 E. & B. 703.) COLERIDGE, J.—Neither, in the construction of a contract among merchants, tradesmen, or others, will the evidence [of a local usage] be excluded because the words are in their ordinary meaning unambiguous; for the principle of admission is that words perfectly unambiguous in their ordinary meaning are used by the contractors in a different sense from that. What words more plain than "a thousand," "a week," "a day"? Yet the cases are familiar in which "a thousand" has been held to mean "twelve hundred," "a week" "a week only during the theatrical season," "a day" "a working day."

856. WALLS v. BAILEY

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1872

49 N. Y. 463

THIS action was instituted to recover a balance alleged to be due to the plaintiffs for plastering the defendant's house. The work in question was done under a written contract, of which the following is a copy:

"BUFFALO, N. Y., January 18, 1869.

"We hereby agree to do the plastering work of house now being built by George Bailey, on Maine street, at the prices named below, viz.:

"For one coat work, twenty-five cents per square yard.

"For two coat work with hard finish, thirty-three cents per square yard.

"The prices to include all labor and cost of material, we paying said Bailey the invoice price for all laths purchased and supplied by him. All work to be done with the 'International Lime Company's' lime; the laths to be securely nailed before plastering, and all work to be done in a good, workmanlike manner, and to the satisfaction of said Bailey.

"Plastering with hydraulic cement, forty-five cents per square yard, to be done in a good, workmanlike manner, and to the satisfaction of said Bailey.

WALLS & LECK."

The plaintiffs claimed that in determining the number of square yards for which they are entitled to pay, under the agreement, the openings, including doors and windows, are to be measured as plastering. That in rooms plastered with two or three coat work, the part of the work behind the cornice and base-board is to be measured as though actually plastered with two or three coats, though the same was only plastered with one coat. This claim was based on the assumption that at the time the agreement was made it was the custom of plasterers in the city of Buffalo to measure and charge for openings; and for wall not plastered, where the same was covered by a cornice or base-board. The Court allowed proof of such custom to be given on the trial under defendant's objections.

Defendant was called as a witness in his own behalf, and his counsel asked him this question: "When you made the contract had you any knowledge of any custom in Buffalo of measuring openings in measuring plastering?" This was objected to and the Court excluded the testimony. The Court charged that the contract was to be construed with reference to the custom of the place where made, that such custom must be reasonable and public, general and uniform, to which defendant excepted.

The jury found a verdict for the full amount claimed by the plaintiffs.

Benjamin H. Williams, for the appellant. The work was done under a contract clear and unequivocal, which could not be varied by parol proof of a custom. . . . Knowledge of the customs by the party sought to be charged must be shown, and the presumption of such knowledge may be rebutted. . . .

David F. Day, for the respondents. The usage of plasterers in Buffalo was properly proven, and the contract is to be construed in reference to it. . . . Defendant was bound to know the custom of the trade with which he dealt. . . .

FOLGER, J.—The contract between the parties was in writing. By it the plaintiffs were to furnish the material for the plastering work of the defendant's house, and to do the work of laying it on. The defendant was to pay them for the work and material a price per square yard. Of course, the total of the compensation was to be got at by measurement. But when the parties came to determine how many square yards there were, they differed. The query was, the square yards of what? Of the plaster actually laid on, or of the whole side of the house, calling it solid, with no allowance for the openings by windows and doors? . . . Evidence of usage is received, as is any other parol evidence, when a written contract is under consideration. It is to apply the written contract to the subject-matter, to explain expressions used in a particular sense, by particular persons, as to particular subjects, to give effect to language in a contract as it was understood by those who made use of it. The jury, in the case before us, have found the existence of the usage contended for by the plaintiffs, and upon evidence which well sustains the finding. The same evidence shows that the usage was uniform, continuous and well settled. Nor was it one which was in opposition to well settled principles of law, or which was unreasonable. . . .

These views dispose of the points made by the appellant in this court, save the one that the trial Court erred in overruling the question put to the defendant when on the stand as a witness in his own behalf, to wit: "When you made that contract, had you any knowledge of any custom in Buffalo of measuring openings in measuring plastering?" . . . It would seem, however, that upon principle, for a party to be bound by a local usage, or a usage of a particular trade or profession, he must be shown to have knowledge or notice of its existence. For upon what basis is it that a contract is held to be entered into with reference to, or in conformity with, an existing usage? Usage is engrafted upon a contract or invoked to give it a meaning, on the assumption that the parties contracted in reference to it; that is to say, that it was their intention that it should be a part of their contract wherever their contract in that regard was silent or obscure. But could intention run in that way unless there was knowledge of the way to guide it? No usage is admissible to influence the construction of a contract unless it appears that it be so well settled, so uniformly acted upon, and so long continued, as to raise a fair presumption that it was known to both contracting parties, and that they contracted in reference thereto. There must be some proof that the contract had reference to it, or proof arising out of the position of the parties, their knowledge of the course of business, their knowledge of the usage, or other circumstance from which it may be inferred or presumed that they had reference to it. . . . The jury may presume, from all the circumstances of the case, that knowledge or notice existed. . . . It seems then, to come to this: Is the presumption, which the jury may thus make conclusive, or may not that presumption be repelled by express negatory proof of ignorance? When the defendant proposed, by the question which was rejected, to offer evidence tending to show his ignorance of the existence of the usage, he claimed no more than to exercise the right of attempting, by direct evidence, to repel the presumption of his knowledge, which might without that proof, or perhaps in opposition to it, be made from the facts of the case. . . . In this view it was proper for the defendant to put and answer the question rejected.

In my judgment, the trial Court should have admitted the question. For this reason, the judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event of the action.

All concur, except PECKHAM, J., dissenting. Judgment reversed.

857. STOOPS v. SMITH

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1868

100 Mass. 63

CONTRACT against a trader in sewing machines in Worcester on the following agreement signed by him:

"Worcester, August 30, 1866. I promise to pay Walter Stoops the sum of fifty dollars for inserting business card in two hundred copies of his advertising chart; to be paid when the chart is published and the card appears to the exclusion of all others in the sewing machine trade."

The declaration alleged the full performance of the condition by the plaintiff, and the defendant's refusal nevertheless to pay the stipulated sum on demand. The answer alleged that any sum which the defendant agreed to pay to the plaintiff was in consideration of the plaintiff's promise that the copies of the chart should be made of cloth, and be published by posting in the most public and conspicuous places within forty miles of Worcester; that there had been a failure of such consideration; and that the plaintiff made the promise with intent to defraud. . . . The defendant, offered to show that the chart, as understood between them, meant a chart of cloth, to be posted up in two hundred public places near Worcester, and that no chart had been so made and posted. This offer was rejected.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant alleged exceptions.

G. F. Verry, for the defendant. F. H. Dewey and F. P. Goulding, for the plaintiff.

Wells, J. — The writing, upon which this action is brought, contains a promise on the part of the defendant only. It recites, imperfectly and in general terms, the agreement to be performed on the part of the plaintiff, as the consideration upon which the promise of the defendant is made. At the trial, the defendant offered evidence to show the whole arrangement between the parties; particularly the representations of the plaintiff as to the material of which the chart was to be made, and the manner in which it would be published; and contended that he was not bound to pay, because the plaintiff had failed so to make and publish the chart. The Court excluded the evidence, and ruled that no evidence of extrinsic facts was admissible for any purpose.

The alleged representations related to that which was then in the future, and were, in one aspect, of a promissory nature. The principle of law is clear and well settled, that the obligation of a written contract cannot be abridged or modified by or made conditional upon another preceding or contemporaneous parol agreement, not referred to in the writing itself. But it is equally well settled that, for the purpose of applying the terms of the written contract to the subject matter, and removing or explaining any uncertainty or ambiguity which arises from such application, parol testimony is admissible, and has a legitimate office. For this purpose, all the facts and circumstances of the transaction out of which the contract arose, including the situation and relations of the parties, may be shown. The subject matter of the contract may be identified by proof of what was before the parties, by sample or otherwise, at the time of the negotiation. The terms of the negotiation itself, and statements therein made, may be resorted to for this purpose.

. . . The purpose of all such evidence is, to ascertain in what sense the parties themselves used the ambiguous terms in the writing which set forth their contract. If the previous negotiations make it manifest in what sense they understood and used those terms, they furnish the best definition to be applied in the interpretation of the contract itself. The effect must be limited to definition of the terms used, and identification of the subject-matter. If so limited, it makes no difference that the language of the negotiations relates to the future, and consists in positive engagements on the part of the other party to the contract. Their effect depends, not upon their promissory obligation, but upon the aid they afford in the interpretation of the contract in suit. They are not the less effective for the purpose of explanation and definition because they purport to carry the force of obligation. The contract in suit may illustrate this principle in a point that is not in dispute. The defendant agrees to pay fifty dollars "for inserting business card," etc. In applying this stipulation, if the defendant had a business card distinctively known and recognized as such, there would be no difficulty in giving effect to the contract. But the identification of that card would involve the whole principle of admitting parol evidence for the interpretation and application of written contracts to the subject-matter. It could be done only by the aid of parol testimony. Suppose he had several business cards, differing in form and contents, but one was selected and agreed upon for the purpose at the time the contract was signed; or that one had been prepared specially for the purpose. Clearly parol testimony would be competent to identify the card so selected or prepared; and to prove that the parties assented to and adopted it as the card to which the contract would apply. Suppose, thirdly, that no such card had been selected or prepared, but its form, contents and style had been described verbally and assented to, and the plaintiff had agreed to insert it as so described. Such evidence may be resorted to, not for the promise it contains, but for the aid it affords in fixing the meaning and applying the general language of the written contract. The same considerations render the evidence offered by the defendant competent for similar purposes. The term "his advertising chart" requires to be practically applied. The representations of the plaintiff are in the nature of a description of the vehicle by which the publication of the business card was to be effected; and his account of the disposition he proposed to make of the charts was a description of the extent and the sense in which it was to be an "advertising chart." The representations as to the material of which the chart was to be made, and the mode of publication, constitute his description of what "his advertising chart" was. Macdonald v. Longbottom, 1 El. & El. 977. . . .

It follows that the evidence offered by the defendant was improperly excluded. . . . Exceptions sustained.

858. GOODE v. RILEY. (1891. Massachusetts. 153 Mass. 585; 28 N. E. 228.) HOLMES, J. — You cannot prove a mere private convention between the two parties to give language a different meaning from its common one. It would open too great risks, if evidence were admissible to show that when they said five hundred feet they agreed it should mean one hundred inches, or that Bunker Hill Monument should signify the Old South Church. An artificial construction cannot be given to plain words by express agreement.

859. VIOLETTE v. RICE

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT OF MASSACHUSETTS. 1899

173 Mass. 82; 53 N. E. 144

BILL in Equity, filed November 20, 1896, in the Superior Court, against Charles E. Rice and Edward E. Rice, copartners as C. E. and E. E. Rice, and others not material to be named, to reach and apply property in payment of damages for an alleged breach of a contract of employment. Hearing before SHELDON, J., who ordered a decree to be entered dismissing the bill; and, the plaintiff having appealed, reported the case, at the request of the parties, for the determination of this court.

This is a bill in equity to reach and apply property which is alleged to have been conveyed in fraud of the plaintiff, claiming damages for a breach of contract to employ the plaintiff in the part of "Bertha Gessler" in a play called "Excelsior Junior." The contract was in writing, and engaged the plaintiff in general terms "to render services at any theaters," etc.; the plaintiff agreeing "to conform to and abide by the rules and regulations adopted by said Edward E. Rice for the government of said companies." . . . At the hearing evidence was taken de bene that at the time of signing the contract it was agreed that the general word "services" meant services in the particular part named. This evidence ultimately was rejected, and the only question is whether it should have been admitted.

W. R. Sears, for the plaintiff. T. J. Barry, for the defendants, submitted the case on a brief.

HOLMES, J. (after stating the case). We are of opinion that the evidence could not be received. . . The engagement to render services expressed a general employment, which could not be limited to a single part without contradiction; for to give evidence requiring words to receive an abnormal meaning is to contradict. It is settled that the normal meaning of language in a written instrument no more can be changed by construction than it can be contradicted by an avowedly inconsistent agreement, on the strength of the talk of the parties at the time when the instrument was signed. . . . When evidence of circumstances or local or class usage is admitted, it tends to show the ordinary meaning of the language in the mouth of a normal speaker, situated as the party using the language was situated; "but to admit evidence to show the sense in which the words were used by particular individuals is contrary to sound principle." Drummond v. Attorney General, 2 H. L. Cas. 837, 863. "If that sort of evidence were admitted, every written document would be at the mercy of witnesses that might be called to swear anything." Nichol v. Godts, 10 Exch. 191, 194.

The case of Keller v. Webb, 125 Mass. 88, goes a good way, but was not intended, we think, to qualify the principle, settled by the earlier and later Massachusetts cases, some of which we have cited. In that case evidence of conversation was admitted to show that "casks" in a written contract, meant casks of a certain weight. It was assumed that the contract meant casks of some certain weight, but did not state what, and thus that the evidence supplemented, without altering, the written words. A similar explanation applies to Stoops v. Smith, 100 Mass. 63, [ante, No. 857].

The other cases cited do not need particular notice.

Decree affirmed.

860. RICKERSON v. HARTFORD FIRE INSURANCE CO.

COURT OF APPEALS OF NEW YORK. 1896

149 N. Y. 307; 43 N. E. 856

THIS action was founded upon a policy of fire insurance issued to P. Sammet and J. Alexander by the Hartford Fire Insurance Company, payable to the Washington Life Insurance Company, as mortgagee and as its interest might appear, upon premises known as number 160 Mott street in the city of New York. . . . On the first of May, 1890, Sammet and Alexander transferred the property to the plaintiff by a conveyance which described the premises by metes and bounds, and also as "known and distinguished as number one hundred and sixty Mott street," being the same description that there was in the mortgage. At the same time, both policies were transferred to the plaintiff, and the change of interest was duly noted and indorsed thereon by the insurance companies. . . . The trial Court found that, at the date of insurance, "there were two buildings on the lot known as No. 160 Mott street, New York city, viz., a three-story brick building, fronting on the street, twenty-five feet wide by forty-six feet deep, with an extension, and a five-story brick building twenty-four feet wide and thirty-nine feet deep." On the 13th of December, 1890, a fire occurred that injured the three-story building to the amount of a few hundred dollars, but which injured the five-story building to the amount of several thousand dollars. The insurance companies repaired the damage to the former only, and refused to pay any part of the damage to the latter. The complaint was dismissed for the reason that the policy did not cover the rear building, and that the defendant had fulfilled its contract by repairing the damages to the front building. . . .

At the trial, the defendant's manager was asked: "When your company issued this policy on which this action is brought, which building did you intend to insure?" This was objected to as "incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and as calling for a conclusion"; but the objection was overruled and the plaintiff excepted. The witness answered, in substance, that he intended to insure the front building only. He was then asked: "Did you intend to insure more than one building?" and subject to the same objection, ruling and exception, he answered, "No."

George Richards and Thomas McAdam, for appellant. It was error to allow Coit to say what structure he intended to cover by the policy. . . .

William D. Murray, for respondent. All of the evidence to which objection was made was admissible as it was introduced to place the court in the position of the contracting parties, not to vary the terms of the written contract, but, an ambiguity having been raised by the plaintiff, to enable the court to interpret the contract in the light of surrounding facts as they existed at the time of its execution. . . .

VANN, J. . . . The application for insurance was very brief, consisting mainly of the names of persons desiring insurance, and a description of the property to be insured, as "160 Mott," occupied for "stores and dwellings." The company consulted its insurance map before issuing the policy, and thus learned that there were two buildings upon the property, and the general location of each. It also learned the same facts from the clerk who delivered the application. The policy describes the property insured as "the brick building and additions, . . . situate No. 160 Mott street, city of New York, occupied for stores and dwellings." . . . We have a policy which, if it had been read before the fire by a person standing upon the premises and familiar with the buildings and the way they were occupied, would leave him in doubt whether the property insured embraced all the buildings or only a part. For this ambiguity the company is responsible, because it prepared and executed the contract, and the language used is wholly its own. While it is the duty of the Court to so construe the policy as, if possible, to give effect to every word used, if the sense in which they were used is uncertain and the meaning is ambiguous, that meaning should be given which is most favorable to the insured. . . . The trial Court, however, resolved the doubt in favor of the insurer, as it found that the company "intended to insure and did insure only the three-story brick building situate on the front of the lot No. 160 Mott street in the city of New York," and that it "did not intend to insure and did not insure the five-story brick building situate on the rear of the lot No. 160 Mott street, New York city." . . .

In finding the fact, it is reasonable to presume that he was influenced by the testimony of the manager of the defendant in relation to that subject, [stating the testimony excepted to.]

. . . The witness was thus permitted to testify to the secret operation of his own mind, although it had not been communicated to the other party to the contract. He wrote the policy and countersigned it, and in doing so stood for the company. When the Court allowed him to state his intention in issuing the policy, it virtually permitted one party to a written agreement to state what he meant by it, against the objection of the other. The writing, itself, was the best evidence of the intent and meaning of the company. As its meaning was ambiguous, evidence was properly received to place the court in the position of the parties and enable it to appreciate the force of the words they used in reducing the contract to writing. It then became the duty of the Court, sitting without a jury, to decide what the parties, thus situated, meant by the language employed. But one party to a written contract cannot state how he understood it when he signed it, nor testify as to its meaning or as to his intent. That would be a violation of the rule that the writing is the best evidence and would tend to destroy the effect of the promise. What the parties intended should have been gathered from the contract, read in the light of the circumstances surrounding them when they used the doubtful words. Parol evidence was not admissible to show what either party secretly intended, as that would add to or take from the writing which is presumed to express the intention of both.

We think that the evidence above referred to was improperly received and that the judgment appealed from should, therefore, be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

All concur. Judgment reversed.

SUB-TITLE II. SOURCES FOR DETERMINING INTERPRETATION

862. History.[1] It was a part of the stiff formalism of earlier interpretation, not only that the law should fix the meaning of words and phrases, but also that all aids to the meaning must be found in the document itself. It is the document that "speaks," and if the document does not speak for itself, we cannot make other things speak instead of it, — such was the notion. The purely relative nature of words — their necessary association with external objects — was as yet not conceived. They were tangible tools, which must do their own work or remain ineffective. The writing fixed the will of the writer, and to look away from the writing was suggestive only of deviation and uncertainty. "The construction of wills," says Lord Coke, "ought to be collected from the words of the will in writing, and not by any averment [i.e., circumstances] of evidence out of it," and then he recurs to the old apprehension of uncertainty for legal advisers and landed estates, "for it would be full of great inconvenience that none should know by the written words of a will what construction to make or advice to give, but it should be controlled by collateral averments out of the will." A hundred years later, Lord Holt, a conservative by nature, protests in like strain against the newer spirit: "If we once travel into the affairs of the testator, and leave the will, we shall not know the mind of the testator by his words, but by his circumstances; so that if you go to a lawyer, he shall not know how to expound it. Men's rights will be very precarious upon such construction. We must not depart from the will to find the meaning of it in things out of it." The echo of conservatism is heard in Lord Eldon's remark that, "generally speaking, you must construe instruments by what is found within their four corners."

The stages of progress may be marked off somewhat as follows:

(1) Even in Coke's time it was conceded that in case of an equivocation or double-meaning description, outside data could be sought, because "no inconvenience can arise if an averment [of extrinsic data] in such case be taken; for he who sees such will cannot be deceived by any secret invisible averment, for he ought at his peril to inquire." This was at first the sole specific exception.

(2) Little by little it began to be seen that there might be other necessary instances of resort to "things extrinsical" (in Lord Holt's phrase). Lord Cowper and Lord Hardwicke were breakers of new ground in this respect. By the 1800s the weight of opinion conceded what Lord Thurlow had laid down, that not only for an equivocation, but also for any real and insurmountable uncertainty of meaning, resort to extrinsic circumstances for light was permissible.

(3) The truth had finally to be recognized that words always need interpretation; that the process of interpretation inherently and invariably means the ascertainment of the association between words and external objects; and that this makes inevitable a free resort to extrinsic matters for applying and enforcing the document. "Words must be translated into things and facts." Instead of the fallacious notion that "there should be interpretation only when it is needed," the fact is that there must always be interpretation.

863. Sir James Wigram, V. C. Extrinsic Evidence in Aid of the Interpretation of Wills. (1831. Proposition V.) For the purpose of determining the object of a testator's bounty, or the subject of disposition, or the quantity of interest intended to be given by his will, a Court may inquire into every material fact relating to the person who claims to be interested under the will, and to the property which is claimed as the subject of disposition, and to the circumstances of the testator and of his family and affairs, for the purpose of enabling the Court to identify the person or thing intended by the testator, or to determine the quantity of interest he has given by his will. The same (it is conceived) is true of every other disputed point, respecting which it can be shown that a knowledge of extrinsic facts can, in any way, be made ancillary to the right interpretation of a testator's words.

864. Attorney General v. Drummond. (1842. Chancery. 1 Dr. & W. 356.) Sugden, V. C. (interpreting a deed containing the words "Christian" and "Protestant dissenter"). The Court is at liberty to inquire into all the surrounding circumstance which may have acted upon the minds of the persons by whom the deed or will (it matters not whether it was one or the other) was executed. . . . The Court has not merely a right, but it is its duty to inquire into the surrounding circumstances, before it can approace the construction of the instrument itself.

Topic 1. Declarations of Intention

865. Francis, Lord Bacon. Maxims. (circa 1597. Works, Spedding's ed., 1861, vol. XIV, p. 273). Rule XXV. There be two sorts of ambiguities of words; the one is ambiguitas patens and the other is ambiguitas latens.

Patens is that which appears to be ambiguous upon the deed or instrument; latens is that which seemeth certain and without ambiguity for anything that appeareth upon the deed or instrument, but there is some collateral matter out of the deed that breedeth the ambiguity.

(1) Ambiguitas patens is never holpen by averment, and the reason is, because the law will not couple and mingle matter of specialty, which is of the higher account, with matter of averment, which is of inferior account in law; for that were to make all deeds hollow and subject to averment, and so, in effect, that to pass without deed, which the law appointeth shall not pass but by deed. Therefore if a man give land "to I. D. et I. S. hoeredibus," and do not limit to whether of their heirs; it shall not be supplied by averment to whether of them the intention was the inheritance should be limited.

(2) But if it be ambiguitas latens, then otherwise it is. As I grant my manor of S. "to I. F. and his heirs," here appeareth no ambiguity at all upon the deed; but if the truth be that I have the manors both of South S. and North S. this ambiguity is matter in fact; and therefore it shall be holpen by averment, whether of them it was that the parties intended should pass.

(3) Another sort of ambiguitas latens is correlative unto this: for this ambiguity spoken of before is, when one name and appellation doth denominate divers things; and the second is, when the same thing is called by divers names. As if I give lands "to Christ Church in Oxford," and the name of the corporation is "Ecclesia Christi in Universitate Oxford"; this shall be holpen by averment, because there appears no ambiguity in the words: for the variance is matter in fact. But the averment shall not be of the intention, because it does not stand with the words. For in the case of equivocation the general intent includes both the special, and therefore stands with the words; but so it is not in variance; and therefore the averment must be a matter that doth induce a certainty, and not of intention; as to say that the precinct of "Oxford" and of "the University of Oxford" is one and the same, and not to say that the intention of the parties was that the grant should be to Christ Church in the University of Oxford.

866. THE LORD CHEYNEY'S CASE (1591)

5 Co. Rep. 68*a*

[Devise to his son H. and the heirs of his body, and then to T. C..and the heirs male of his body, on condition "that he or they or any of them" shall not alienate. Proof by witnesses that it was "the intent and meaning of the testators" to include under "he or they" his son H. as well as T. C., was excluded.]

He should not be received to such averment out of the will. . . . But if a man has two sons, both baptized by the name of John, and conceiving that the elder, who had been long absent, is dead, devises his land by his will in writing to his son John generally, and in truth the elder is living, — in this case the younger son may in pleading or in evidence allege the devise to him, and if it be denied, he may produce witnesses to prove his father's intent, that he thought the other to be dead, or that he at the time of the will named his son John the younger, and the writer left out the addition of the younger.

867. MILLER v. TRAVERS

8 Bing. 244

In this case the plaintiff, John Riggs Miller, filed his bill against the defendants for the purpose of establishing the will of the late Sir John Edward Riggs Miller, Bart., and for carrying into execution the trusts thereof. . . . The testator by his will, duly executed, devised "all his freehold and real estates whatsoever, situate in the county of Limerick, and in the city of Limerick," to certain trustees therein named and their heirs. At the time of making his will he had no real estate in the county of Limerick, but he had a small real estate in the city of Limerick, and considerable real estates situate in the county of Clare. The real estate in the city of Limerick is admitted to have passed under the devise; but the plaintiff contends that he is at liberty to show by parol evidence that the testator intended his estates in Clare also to pass under the same devise.

TINDAL, C. J. . . . The main question between the parties, and which has formed the principal subject of argument before us, is this, Whether parol evidence is admissible to show the testator's intention that his real estates in the county of Clare should pass by his will? . . . This question arises upon facts, either admitted or proved in the cause, which are few and simple.

The general character of the parol evidence which the plaintiff contends he is at liberty to produce, in order to establish such intention in the devisor, is this; first, that the estate in the city of Limerick is so small and so disproportioned to the nature of the charges laid upon it, and the trusts which are declared, as to make it manifest there must have been some mistake; and in order to show what that mistake was, the plaintiff proposes to prove that in the copy of the will which had been submitted to the testator for his inspection, and had been approved and returned by him, the devise in question stood thus: "All my freehold and real estates whatsoever situate in the counties of Clare, Limerick and in the city of Limerick;" that the testator directed some alterations to be made in other parts of his will, and that the same copy of the will, accompanied with a statement of the proposed alterations, was sent by the testator's attorney to his conveyancer, in order that such alterations might be reduced into proper form; and that upon such occasion the conveyancer, besides making the alterations directed, did by mistake, and without any authority, strike out the words "counties of Clare" and substitute the words "county of" in lieu thereof, so as to leave the devise in question in the same precise form as it now stands in the executed will. The plaintiff further proposes to prove that a fair copy of the will so altered was sent to the testator, who, after having kept it by him for some time, executed the same in the manner required by law, without adverting to the alteration above pointed out.

Upon the fullest consideration, however, it appears to the Lord Chief Baron and myself, that admitting it may be shown from the description of the property in the city of Limerick, that some mistake may have arisen, yet, still, as the devise in question has a certain operation and effect, namely, the effect of passing the estate in the city of Limerick, and as the intention of the testator to devise any estate in the county of Clare cannot be collected from the will itself, nor without altering or adding to the words used in the will, such intention cannot be supplied by the evidence proposed to be given.

It may be admitted, that in all cases in which a difficulty arises in applying the words of a will to the thing which is the subject-matter of the devise, or to the person of the devisee, the difficulty or ambiguity which is introduced by the admission of extrinsic evidence, may be rebutted and removed by the production of further evidence, upon the same subject, calculated to explain what was the estate or subject-matter really intended to be devised, or who was the person really intended to take under the will; and this appears to us to be the extent of the maxim "Ambiguitas verborum latens, verificatione suppletur."

But the cases to which this construction applies will be found to range themselves into two separate classes, distinguishable from each other, and to neither of which can the present case be referred.

The first class is, where the description of the thing devised, or of the devisee, is clear upon the face of the will; but upon the death of the testator it is found that there are more than one estate or subject-matter of devise, or more than one person whose description follows out and fills the words used in the will. As where the testator devises his manor of Dale, and at his death it is found that he has two manors of that name, South Dale and North Dale; or where a man devises to his son John, and he has two sons of that name. In each of these cases respectively parol evidence is admissible to show which manor was intended to pass, and which son was intended to take. The other class of cases is that in which the description contained in the will of the thing intended to be devised, or of the person who is intended to take, is true in part, but not true in every particular. As where an estate is devised called A., and is described as in the occupation of B., and it is found, that though there is an estate called A., yet the whole is not in B.'s occupation; or where an estate is devised to a person whose surname or Christian name is mistaken; or whose description is imperfect or inaccurate; in which latter class of cases parol evidence is admissible to show what estate was intended to pass, and who was the devisee intended to take, provided there is sufficient indication of intention appearing on the face of the will to justify the application of the evidence.

. . . But the case now before the Court does not appear to fall within either of these distinctions. There are no words in the will which contain an imperfect, or, indeed, any description whatever of the estates in Clare. The present case is rather one in which the plaintiff does not endeavor to apply the description contained in the will to the estates in Clare, but in order to make out such intention is compelled to introduce new words and a new description into the body of the will itself. The testator devises all his estates "in the county of Limerick and the city of Limerick." . . . The plaintiff, however, contends, that he has a right to prove, that the testator intended to pass not only the estate in the city of Limerick, but an estate in a county not named in the will, namely, the county of Clare, and that the will is to be read and construed as if the word Clare stood in the place of or in addition to that of Limerick. But this, it is manifest, is not merely calling in the aid of extrinsic evidence to apply the intention of the testator, as it is to be collected from the will itself, to the existing state of his property; it is calling in extrinsic evidence to introduce into the will an intention not apparent from a defective or mistaken description; it is making the will speak upon the face of the will. It is not simply removing a difficulty arising upon a subject on which it is altogether silent, and is the same in effect as the filling up a blank which the testator might have left in his will. It amounts, in short, by the admission of parol evidence, to the making of a new devise for the testator, which he is supposed to have omitted. Now, the first objection to the introduction of such evidence is that it is inconsistent with the rule, which reason and sense lay down and which has been universally established for the construction of wills, namely, that the testator's intention is to be collected from the words used in the will, and that words which he has not used cannot be added.

But it is an objection no less strong that the only mode of proving the alleged intention of the testator is, by setting up the draft of the will against the executed will itself. As, however, the copy of the will which omitted the name of the county of Clare was for some time in the custody of the testator, and, therefore, open for his inspection, which copy was afterwards executed by him with all the formalities required by the Statute of Frauds, the presumption is that he must have seen and approved of the alteration, rather than that he overlooked it by mistake. It is unnecessary to advert to the danger of allowing the draft of the will to be set up as of greater authority to evince the intention of the testator than the will itself, after the will has been solemnly executed, and after the death of the testator. If such evidence is admissible to introduce a new subject-matter of devise, why not also to introduce the name of a devisee altogether omitted in the will? If it is admissible to introduce new matter of devise, or a new devisee, why not to strike out such as are contained in the executed will? The effect of such evidence in either case would be, that the will, though made in form by the testator in his lifetime, would really be made by the attorney after his death; that all the guards intended to be introduced by the Statute of Frauds would be entirely destroyed, and the statute itself virtually repealed. And upon examination of the decided cases on which the plaintiff has relied in argument, no one will be found to go the length of supporting the proposition which he contends for; on the contrary, they will all be found consistent with the distinction above adverted to, — that an uncertainty which arises from applying the description contained in the will either to the thing devised or to the person of the devisee, may be helped by parol evidence; but that a new subject-matter of devise, or a new devisee, where the will is entirely silent upon either, cannot be imported by parol evidence into the will itself. . . .

The cases against the plaintiff's construction appear to bear more closely on the point. In the first place, it is well established, that where a complete blank is left for the name of a legatee or devisee, no parol evidence, however strong, will be allowed to fill it up as intended by the testator. Hunt v. Hort, 3 Bro. C. C. 311, and in many other cases. Now the principle must be precisely the same, whether it is the person of the devisee, or the estate or thing devised, which is left altogether in blank. And it requires a very nice discrimination to distinguish between the case of a will, where the description of the estate is left altogether in blank, and the present case, where there is a total omission of the estates in Clare. . . .

As well, therefore, upon the authority of the cases, and more particularly of that which is last referred to, as upon reason and principle, we think the evidence offered by the plaintiff would be inadmissible upon the trial of the issue, and that it would therefore be useless to grant the issue in the terms directed by the Vice-Chancellor. . . .

Order of the Vice-Chancellor reversed.

868. DOE DEM. SIMON HISCOCKS v. JOHN HISCOCKS

EXCHEQUER. 1839

5 M. & W. 363

EJECTMENT for lands in the county of Devon. At the trial before BOSANQUET, J., at the Devonshire Spring Assizes, 1838, it appeared that the lessor of the plaintiff claimed the premises in dispute under the will of Simon Hiscocks, the grandfather of both the lessor of the plaintiff and the defendant, dated July 7, 1822. . . . By his will, Simon Hiscocks, after devising estates to his son Simon for life, and from and after his death to his grandson, Henry Hiscocks, in tail male, and making, as to certain other estates, an exactly similar provision in favor of his son John for life; then, after his death, the testator devises those estates to "my grandson, John Hiscocks, eldest son of the said John Hiscocks." It is on this devise that the question wholly turns. In fact, John Hiscocks, the father, had been twice married; by his first wife he had Simon, the lessor of the plaintiff, his eldest son; the eldest son of the second marriage was John Hiscocks, the defendant. The devise, therefore, does not, both by name and description, apply to either the lessor of the plaintiff, who is the eldest son, but whose name is Simon, nor to the defendant, who, though his name is John, is not the eldest son. The cause was tried before Mr. Justice BOSANQUET, at the Spring Assizes for the County of Devon, 1838, and that learned judge admitted evidence of the instructions of the testator for the will, and of his declarations after the will was made, in order to explain the ambiguity in the devise, arising from this state of facts; and the verdict having been found for the lessor of the plaintiff, a rule has been obtained for a non-suit or new trial, on the ground that such evidence of intention was not receivable in this case. . . .

Crowder and Bere showed cause, and contended that this was a case of latent ambiguity, which did not arise until the state of the family was proved, and it appeared that the testator had made a mistake in the name of the intended devisee; and the case therefore fell within the established principle, that a latent ambiguity, where no uncertainty appeared on the face of the will itself, might be holpen by extrinsic evidence. . . .

Erle and Butt, contra. . . . The evidence of the testator's intention was not admissible in this case, because it went to show an intention contradictory of one which was plainly expressed in the will, and was capable of an application; or, if not applicable by inquiry into the surrounding circumstances, that the devise was altogether void. . . .

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by Lord ABINGER, C. B. (after stating the case). After fully considering the question, which was very well argued on both sides, we think that there ought to be a new trial.

The object in all cases is to discover the intention of the testator. The first and most obvious mode of doing this is to read his will as he has written it, and collect his intention from his words. But as his words refer to facts and circumstances respecting his property and his family, and others whom he names or describes in his will, it is evident that the meaning and application of his words cannot be ascertained, without evidence of all those facts and circumstances. To understand the meaning of any writer, we must first be apprised of the persons and circumstances that are the subjects of his allusions or statements; and if these are not fully disclosed in his work, we must look for illustration to the history of the times in which he wrote, and to the works of contemporaneous authors. All the facts and circumstances, therefore, respecting persons or property, to which the will relates, are undoubtedly legitimate and often necessary evidence, to enable us to understand the meaning and application of his words. Again, the testator may have habitually called certain persons or things by peculiar names, by which they were not commonly known. If these names should occur in his will, they could only be explained and construed by the aid of evidence to show the sense in which he used them, in like manner as if his will were written in cypher, or in a foreign language. The habits of the testator in these particulars must be receivable as evidence to explain the meaning of his will.

But there is another mode of obtaining the intention of the testator, which is by evidence of his declarations, of the instructions given for his will, and other circumstances of the like nature, which are not adduced for explaining the words or meaning of the will, but either to supply some deficiency, or remove some obscurity, or to give some effect to expressions that are unmeaning or ambiguous.

Now, there is but one case in which it appears to us that this sort of evidence of intention can properly be admitted, and that is, where the meaning of the testator's words is neither ambiguous nor obscure, and where the devise is on the face of it perfect and intelligible, but, from some of the circumstances admitted in proof, an ambiguity arises, as to which of the two or more things, or which of the two or more persons (each answering the words in the will), the testator intended to express. Thus, if a testator devise his manor of S. to A. B., and has two manors, of North S. and South S., it being clear he means to devise one only, whereas both are equally denoted by the words he has used, in that case there is what Lord Bacon calls "an equivocation," i.e., the words equally apply to either manor, and evidence of previous intention may be received to solve this latent ambiguity; for the intention shows what he meant to do; and when you know that, you immediately perceive that he has done it by the general words he has used, which, in their ordinary sense, may properly bear that construction.

It appears to us that, in all other cases parol evidence of what was the testator's intention ought to be excluded, upon this plain ground, that his will ought to be made in writing; and if his intention cannot be made to appear by the writing, explained by circumstances, there is no will. . . . We are prepared on this point (the point in judgment in the case of Miller v. Travers [ante, No. 867]) to adhere to the authority of that case.

Where the description is partly true as to both claimants, and no case of equivocation arises, what is to be done is to determine whether the description means the lessor of the plaintiff or the defendant. The description, in fact, applies partially to each, and it is not easy to see how the difficulty can be solved. If it were "res integra," we should be much disposed to hold the devise void for uncertainty; but the cases of Doe v. Huthwaite, 3 B. & Ald. 632, Bradshaw v. Bradshaw, and others, are authorities against this conclusion. If, therefore, by looking at the surrounding facts to be found by the jury, the Court can clearly see, with the knowledge which arises from those facts alone, that the testator meant either the lessor of the plaintiff or the defendant, it may so decide, and direct the jury accordingly. But we think that, for this purpose, they cannot receive declarations of the testator of what he intended to do in making his will. . . .

Rule absolute for a new trial.

869. WILLARD v. DARRAH

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI. 1902

168 Mo. 660; 68 S. W. 1023

APPEAL from Saline Circuit Court. Hon. RICHARD FIELD, Judge. Reversed.

This is a suit in ejectment for the possession of an undivided one-eighth interest in a tract of land in Saline county, described in the petition.

William Nelson, late of said county, deceased, is the common source of title. He died testate on December 12, 1892, seized in fee simple of the premises; leaving him surviving: three daughters, the defendant, Mariah Darrah, and her two sisters, Nannie Brown and Sarah Bryan; two sons, James Nelson and John Nelson; and four grandsons, Ord Nelson and Corley Nelson, sons of his deceased son Lawrence, and plaintiff John Willard and his brother William Willard, sons of his deceased daughter Elizabeth. By his will the testator devised the premises in question to his said daughter the defendant Mariah Darrah, named therein, his sons James and John; made provision for his other two granddaughters, Nannie Brown and Sarah Bryan, and for his two grandsons, Ord and Corley Nelson, and made the following further devise: "4th. I give, devise and bequeath to my well-beloved nephews, John and William Willard, the following described tracts," . . .

On the trial, the plaintiff introduced parol evidence tending to prove that at the time of his death the testator had a nephew named John D. Willard, and several grandnephews, sons of the said John D., one of whom was named John Willard, and the other named William Willard, and upon these facts claimed that he was pretermitted in said will, and as one of the heirs at law of his grandfather is entitled to the interest sued for in the land devised to the defendant Mrs. Darrah. To meet this claim the defendant introduced evidence tending to prove that the said nephew John D Willard, and the said grandnephews John Willard and William Willard, sons of the said John D., were strangers to the testator, never visited him and never resided near him. That the grandsons John Willard and William Willard lived near their grandfather, owned land adjoining the land described in the fourth clause of the will, that he was very intimate and friendly with them, and repeatedly declared that he had bought this land for them, and also introduced E. M. Edwards, a lawyer, as a witness who testified in substance that he drew the will at the request of the testator, who directed that this land should be given to the said grandchildren John and William Willard, but by mistake he wrote the word "nephews" instead of "grandchildren" in that clause of the will. Without setting out this parol evidence at length, it is sufficient to say, that it appears therefrom, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the testator intended by the fourth clause of his will to devise the land therein described to his well-known and well-beloved grandchildren, the plaintiff John Willard and his brother William Willard, and not to his two grandnephews of the same names, who were not personally known to, or well-beloved of him. The case was tried before the Court without a jury. The Court rejected the evidence of Edwards the scrivener, found the issues for the plaintiff, and from the judgment in his favor the defendant appeals. . . .

W. M. Williams and Duggins & Rainey, for appellant. . . . The grandsons, John and William Willard, being mis-described as nephews, and there being no nephews bearing those names, this creates a latent ambiguity in the will of William Nelson. . . . The incorrect naming in a will of a beneficiary (a granddaughter) creates a latent ambiguity, and extrinsic evidence is admissible to remove it. . . . Where the language of the will is applicable to each of two or more persons or things, it is not only permissible to introduce evidence directly as to the intention of the testator, based upon the circumstances of the case, but evidence of the testator's own declarations may be adduced to show the person or thing intended. . . .

Alf. F. Rector, A. R. Strother and Frank P. Sebree, for respondent. The evidence of Edwards as to the instructions given to him by the testator for drawing the will, and as to the declarations made to him by the testator as to what disposition he intended to make of his property, and as to what provisions he intended to make for his grandchildren, John and William Willard, was all incompetent and was therefore properly excluded. . . . There is no latent ambiguity in the case. . . . There were not two sets of nephews named John and William Willard nor two sets of grandchildren of those names. The terms used can not therefore "apply equally to two different things or subjects." There were two grandnephews and two grandsons of those names, and one nephew named John D. Willard. . . . Giving full effect to the evidence of Edwards, which was excluded by the trial Court, it amounts only to this, that the clear and unambiguous language of the will was a mistake of the scrivener. The Court is now asked, not to construe the will and resolve a latent ambiguity, but to reform the will itself and correct this alleged mistake, and make a will for the testator which he did not make. This can not legally be done. . . .

Brace, P. J. (after stating the case as above). The difficulty in these cases is to determine how far in that direction the Courts may go in order to discover the true intent and meaning of the testator. . . . There is much conflict of judicial opinion on the subject. . . . A learned and able text-writer, from such a review, deduces the following conclusion:

"The two classes of cases, then, in which direct evidence dehors the will appears admissible to show the testator's intention, are these: (1) Where the person or thing, the object or subject of the disposition, is described in terms which are applicable indifferently to more than one person or thing. (2) Where the description of the person or thing is partly correct and partly incorrect, and the correct part leaves something equivocal." . . . (Schouler on Wills, 3d ed., § 576.)

Here the devise is "to my well-beloved nephews John and William Willard"; and it is found from the indirect parol evidence that there are two sets of brothers, each named John and William Willard, — the plaintiff and his brother, "well-beloved" grandsons of the testator, and two grandnephews, not "well-beloved" of him, and having no legal or moral claim on his bounty. As to each of these sets of brothers the description contained in the will is partly correct and partly incorrect. It is correct as to the Christian and surnames of each set. It is correct as to neither in the superadded description of relationship to the testator, as the word "nephew" simpliciter, cannot be held to include grand-nephews, and the inapplicability in this case is re-enforced by the word "beloved" prefixed thereto. So that the description in the will, when it comes to be applied to those only who can possibly have been intended, is just as equivocal in point of fact as if these additional words of description had been omitted, as in the first case supposed. The description of the persons is partly correct and partly incorrect, leaving something equivocal. The description does not apply precisely to either of these two sets of brothers, but it is morally and legally certain that it was intended to apply to one or the other, thus bringing the case within the rule established by the second class of cases, in which direct or extrinsic parol evidence, including expressions of intention, is admissible. Such evidence was therefore admissible in this case, in order to solve a latent ambiguity produced by extrinsic evidence in the application of the terms of the will to the objects of the testator's bounty, to prevent the fourth clause of the will from perishing, and obviate a partial intestacy of the testator. Its effect is not to establish an intention different in essence from that expressed in the will, but to let in light by which that intention, rendered obscure by outside circumstances, may be more clearly discerned, and the will of the testator, in its entire scope, effectuated according to his true intent and meaning.

Hence, we conclude that the Court erred in rejecting the evidence of the scrivener Edwards, and in holding that the plaintiff was not named or provided for in the will of his grandfather, the said William Nelson. The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed.

All concur.

870. Sir James Fitzjames Stephen. Digest of the Law of Evidence. (3d ed. Note XXXIII, to Article 91, Oral Interpretation of Documents.) It is difficult to justify the line drawn between the rule as to cases in which evidence of expressions of intention is admitted and cases in which it is rejected [paragraph 7, illustrations (k), (l), (m), and paragraph 8, illustrations (n) and (o)]. When placed side by side, such cases as Doe v. Hiscocks [ante, No. 868] [illustration (k)] and Doe v. Needs [illustration (n)] produce a singular effect. The vagueness of the distinction between them is indicated by the case of Charter v. Charter, 1871, L. R. 2 P. & M. 315. In this case the testator Forster Charter appointed "my son Forster Charter" his executor. He had two sons, William Forster Charter and Charles Charter, and many circumstances pointed to the conclusion that the person whom the testator wished to be his executor was Charles Charter. Lord Penzance not only admitted evidence of all the circumstances of the case, but expressed an opinion (p. 319) that, if it were necessary, evidence of declarations of intention might be admitted under the rule laid down by Lord Abinger in Hiscocks v. Hiscocks, because part of the language employed ("my son —— Charter") applied correctly to each son, and the remainder, "Forster," to neither. This mode of construing the rule would admit evidence of declarations of intention both in cases falling under paragraph 8, and in cases falling under paragraph 7, which is inconsistent not only with the reasoning in the judgment, but with the actual decision in Doe v. Hiscocks. . . . That part of Lord PENZANCE's judgment above referred to was unanimously overruled in the House of Lords. . . .

Conclusive as the authorities upon the subject are, it may not, perhaps, be presumptuous to express a doubt whether the conflict between a natural wish to fulfil the intention which the testator would have formed if he had recollected all the circumstances of the case, the wish to avoid the evil of permitting written instruments to be varied by oral evidence, and the wish to give effect to wills, has not produced in practice an illogical compromise. The strictly logical course, I think, would be either to admit declarations of intention both in cases falling under paragraph 7, and in cases falling under paragraph 8, or to exclude such evidence in both classes of cases, and to hold void for uncertainty every bequest or devise which was shown to be uncertain in its application to facts.

871. A. M. KIDD. Note on Doe v. Hiscocks. (1912. California Law Review, I, 87.) Wills: Parol Evidence to Explain Ambiguity and Misconceptions. — In the Estate of Donellan (44 Cal. Dec. 462, Sept. 27, 1912), the testatrix left one-fourth of the residue of her property to her niece, Mary, a resident of New York, daughter of her deceased sister, Mary. The evidence disclosed two daughters of the sister, Annie and Mary. Annie, the elder of the two daughters, married in Ireland, came to this country, settled in Brooklyn, New York, and still lived there when the present case arose. Mary never came to this country, and still lived in Ireland. The evidence also showed that testatrix knew of the existence of but one niece; that when Annie was six years old at the time of the death of her father, testatrix wanted her to come and live with her; that testatrix wrote to a Boston relative inquiring about her niece and was referred by the relative to the New York niece; that Annie was called Mary by a relative in Boston with whom she lived when she first came to this country. This was substantially all the evidence, except some hearsay erroneously admitted. The Superior Court held the will applied to Mary, relying upon the maxim that the name controlled the description. The Supreme Court refused to consider this maxim as binding and directed the trial Court to construe the clause to apply to Annie, unless on a rehearing further evidence should require a different decision, upon the ground that testatrix meant the niece who came to this country. . . .

In accordance with the ruling in the Supreme Court in the Estate of Dominici (151 Cal. 181; 90 Pac. 448; 1907), evidence was admitted of the testatrix's statements of intention to the lawyer who prepared the will. While the general rule in construing a will is that all extrinsic evidence is admissible, there is an exception to the rule by the exclusion of declarations of intention. It is considered dangerous to permit the solemn written expression in the will to be affected by other statements of the testator as to what he intended. In one case, however, such statements have always been admitted, — the case of equivocation, where the bequest is to "my niece Mary" and there are two nieces named Mary. In such a case the declarations of the testator are admitted to show which niece was meant. The will in the present case, however, is not one of equivocation but of misdescription; neither niece fits the requirements accurately. One niece satisfies the description by residence but not by name, the other by name but not by residence. Under these facts the English Courts have refused to admit declarations of intention, although it is hard to see why the same principle that applies to "equivocation" should not apply to "misdescription." In fact English judges have been unable to see the distinction.[1] In admitting the statements made by the testatrix to the lawyer in the principal case the Court is in accord with sound theory and authority in this country.

It may be questioned, however, whether this result, commendable as it is on principle, has been achieved without doing violence to § 1340 of the Civil Code. The annotations of the Code Commissioners show that they recognize the conflict in the decisions and deliberately adopted the English rule as established in Doe v. Hiscocks (5 M. & W. 363; 1839).

Topic 2. Falsa Demonstratio

873. Myers v. Ladd. (1861. 26 Ill. 415, 417.) Caton, C. J. — If I give a bill of sale of my black horses, and describe them as being now in my barn, I shall not avoid it by showing that the horses were in the pasture or on the road. The description of the horses being sufficient to enable witnesses acquainted with my stock to identify them, the locality specified would be rejected as surplusage. Nor is this rule confined to personal property. It is equally applicable to real estate. If I sell an estate, and describe it as my dwelling house in which I now reside, situate in the city of Ottawa, I shall not avoid the deed by showing that my residence was outside the city limits. So if a deed describe lands by its correct numbers, and further describe it as being situated in a wrong county, the latter is rejected. The rule is, that where there are two descriptions in a deed, the one, as it were, superadded to the other, and one description being complete and sufficient in itself, and the other, which is subordinate and superadded, is incorrect, the incorrect description, or feature or circumstance of the description, is rejected as surplusage, and the complete and correct description is allowed to stand alone.

874. WINKLEY v. KAIME

Supreme Judicial Court of New Hampshire. 1855

32 N. H. 268

Writ of Entry. The premises claimed are a part of lot No. 97 in the 2d division in Barnstead, containing about forty acres, more or less, of wild land which has never been improved or enclosed by fences. The plaintiff claimed title by devise from Benjamin Winkley of "thirty-six acres, more or less, in lot 37, in second division in Barnstead, being same I purchased of John Peavey," and in proof of title in said Winkley,

[1] "Why the law should be so, in cases where some error of description involving a latent ambiguity has to be corrected, when evidence of the same kind is admitted in what Lord Bacon describes as cases of 'equivocation' (Maxims of the Law, Rule XXIII), I am not sure that I clearly understand, but it has been conclusively so settled by a series of authorities to which we are bound to adhere." Charter v. Charter, L. R. 7 H. L. 364 (1874).

offered: 1. Deed from John Peavey to said Winkley, dated March 25, 1839, of thirty-six acres, more or less, in lot 97, in 2d division, bounded and described in the plaintiff's declaration. . . .

The defendant offered in evidence: 1. Deed from Thomas and Hannah Johnson to him, dated November 14, 1851, of certain lands in Barnstead, being nineteen acres out of lot 97, being same deeded by Benjamin Winkley as collector of taxes to J. G. Kaime, dated May 1, 1801, in common, and of lot formerly owned by Hale and others. . . .

No evidence was offered by either party to show what lands were intended and conveyed by the several deeds offered by them respectively, and whose descriptions are hereinbefore particularly mentioned, except as is in this case expressly stated. A witness for the plaintiff testified that he never knew of John Peavey occupying any such lot as 37 in 2d division, or that there was any such lot. And there was no evidence that there was any such. The plaintiff, in order to show what lands were conveyed by the deeds offered by the defendant Winkley to J. G. Kaime, and T. & H. Johnson to the defendant, . . . offered a witness, who testified that in about 1820 his father, now deceased, was in the occupation of a part of lot 97, not including these premises, and when so in possession stated to the witness that he was in possession under Hale and others. To this last the defendant objected as incompetent, but the same was admitted.

Whereupon it was agreed by the parties that the questions arising in this case be transferred to the Superior Court of Judicature for determination, said Court to order such judgment for the plaintiff or defendant as on the foregoing case shall be proper.

Bellows, for the plaintiff. . . . Leavitt and Bell, for the defendant.

Eastman, J. — The demandant declares for forty acres of land, more or less, of lot No. 97, in the 2d division in Barnstead. The case was turned into an agreed one at the trial, and we take the evidence as finding the facts. The first step in the demandant's title is a devise from Benjamin Winkley to the demandant, of "thirty-six acres, more or less, in lot 37 in the 2d division in Barnstead, being same I purchased of John Peavey." It is apparent that here is a radical difference between the description of the premises demanded and those contained in the devise; the land demanded being a part of lot No. 97, and that bequeathed being a part of lot No. 37. The plaintiff contends that there is a latent ambiguity in the devise, and that the testator intended to bequeath to him the land in lot 97, as set forth in his declaration, and not 37. To prove this, parol evidence was introduced on the trial, tending to show that the lands occupied by Peavey were a part of 97 in the 2d division, and that there is no such lot as 37 in the 2d division in that town.

There is nothing ambiguous in the terms of this devise, but the evidence shows that, as it stands, it cannot take effect, for there is no such lot as No. 37 in the 2d division. The ambiguity is latent; shown so to be by the evidence; and if that stands well with the words of the will, it will be competent, as showing the meaning and intention of the testator. Without going into any extended examination of the question of latent ambiguity at the present time, it is sufficient for the present case to say that it appears to come very properly under the rule of "falsa demonstratio non nocet"; the principle being, that if there is a sufficient description of the land devised, or of the person of the devisee intended by the testator, independent of the erroneous description, the will will take effect. . . . By rejecting the words and figures, "in lot 37," in this devise, it will stand thus, "thirty-six acres, more or less, in 2d division in Barnstead, being same I purchased of John Peavey." What the testator purchased of Peavey is shown to be in the 2d division; is bounded, and answers in all respects to the description in the devise, except the number of the lot. The extrinsic evidence thus manifestly shows what must have been the intention of the testator, and, both upon the doctrine of the authorities and the justice of the case, we think the devise should be made to take effect.

The tenant, then, not showing either title or possession paramount to that of the demandant, must fail, and according to the provisions of the case there must be Judgment for the plaintiff.

875. KURTZ v. HIBNER

55 Ill. 514

BILL for petition by John Hibner and others, children and heirs of John Hibner, deceased, against Charles, Elizabeth and James Kurtz, the latter claiming under a will of John Hibner. The Circuit Court refused to hear parol evidence, to explain the language of the will. The relevant provisions of the will were the following: "Third — I give and bequeath to my daughter, Elizabeth Kurtz, all that tract or parcel of land situate in the town of Joliet, Will County, Illinois, and described as follows: The west half of the southwest quarter of section 32, township 35, range 10, containing eighty acres, more or less, together with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in anywise appertaining." "Seventh — I give and bequeath to my grandson, James Kurtz, all that part or parcel of land described as the south half of the east half of the south quarter section 31, in township 35, range 10, containing forty acres, more or less."

Appellants offered to prove that the testator, at the time of his death owned only one eighty-acre tract, in township thirty-five, which was the one described in the bill; that a mistake was made in drafting the will, by the insertion of the words "section thirty-two," instead of "section thirty-three"; that Charles and Elizabeth Kurtz had been in the actual possession of the tract for a number of years, and upon the repeated promise of the testator in his lifetime, that he would give the same to Elizabeth, had made lasting and valuable improvements, at their own expense, on the land — had fenced it, and erected thereon a dwelling-house, barn and corn cribs, dug wells and set out fruit-trees. Appellants also offered to prove that James Kurtz, at the time of the death of the testator, was in the actual possession of the forty-acre tract, as the tenant of the deceased, and that the draughtsman of the will, by mistake, inserted the word "one," after the words "section thirty," instead of "two," so as to bequeath to James land in section thirty-one instead of section thirty-two. This evidence was rejected by the Court, on the hearing.

Mr. D. H. Pinney, for the appellants. In this case the testator intended to devise land which he owned, the description of which differed from that named in the will, in the number of the section. The devisee could show by extrinsic evidence that the draughtsman of the will, by mistake, inserted the wrong numbers in attempting to describe the land intended to be devised. . . . Parol evidence was admissible on other grounds; for, after rejecting the number of the section, enough remains to show the property intended. . . .

Mr. W. C. Goodhue, for the appellees. Equity, in no proceeding, however direct, affords any remedy against mistakes made in a last will and testament, — mistakes that can only be made out by averment and proof outside of the will. . . . This case presents the simple question of construction. What is the meaning of the will as made by the testator? The description of the land, which is sought to be changed by extrinsic evidence, is too clear to require the aid of such evidence to identify it. There is no ambiguity to be explained.

THORNTON, J. — It has been strongly urged by counsel for appellants, that this evidence should have been received, for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the testator. The law requires that all wills of lands shall be in writing, and extrinsic evidence is never admissible, to alter, detract from, or add to, the terms of a will. To permit evidence, the effect of which would be to take from a will plain and unambiguous language, and insert other language in lieu thereof, would violate the foregoing well-established rule. For the purpose of determining the object of a testator's bounty, or the subject of disposition, parol evidence may be received, to enable the Court to identify the person or thing intended. In this regard, the evidence offered afforded no aid to the Court. . . . The thing devised is certain and specific. Section, township, and range are given. The evidence offered, as to the mistake in the section, would have made a new and different will. . . .

The case of Riggs v. Myers, 20 Mo. 239, is also cited by counsel for appellants. That case is very different from the one under consideration. The testator, in that case, made a full disposition of all his estate, and then described certain lands, locating them in a township in which he owned no lands. The land intended to be devised, was, however, identified, by reference to "the big spring" upon it. In the case before the Court there is no disposition, either specifically or generally, of the lands in the bill mentioned.

We think, therefore, there was no error.

876. Notes Upon Kurtz v. Hibner. Isaac T. Redfield, C. J. (of Vermont; Editor of the Register. 10 American Law Register, New Series, 93; 1871). We regret the necessity of dissenting, so entirely as we must, from the argument and conclusions of the learned judge in the foregoing opinion [of Kurtz v. Hibner.]. . . The Court say, indeed, that the evidence was offered by the appellants for the purpose of showing that the will was by mistake drawn differently from what the testator intended. That precise point was immaterial, and the evidence was not, strictly speaking, admissible for that purpose. That would be to add a new term to the will by making it read, in terms, as the testator would have had it made, if he had recollected the numbers of the sections in which his lands lay, which can never be done. . . . But nothing is more common, or we might say universal, than to receive oral proof to show, that language was used in a peculiar sense, or that one term was used for another, or that an essential term, to make the definition perfect, was wholly omitted, or erroneously stated. . . . One rule upon the subject is so thoroughly established as to have become a maxim in the law, "falsa demonstratio non nocet." The practical meaning of this maxim is, that however many errors there may be in the description, either of the legatee or of the subject-matter of the devise, it will not avoid the bequest, provided enough remains to show, with reasonable certainty, what was intended. . . . In the principal case, there could be no question of the admission of oral evidence to show the state and extent of the testator's property, in order to place the court in the same position the testator was at the time he made the will. No reasonable man could question this upon the decided cases. This being done, it appears the testator had no such land as that described, in the particular sections named. This rendered it clear, absolutely certain, we may say, that the sections named were erroneous and could have no possible operation, and must be rejected. The devise then was the same as if the sections had not been named at all, or had been named, leaving the numbers blank. We are then compelled to fall back upon the remaining portion of the description, "eighty acres of land in range ten, in township thirty-five," and "forty acres of land in range ten, in township thirty-five"; and, upon inquiry, we find precisely such pieces of land in "range ten, in township thirty-five," belonging to the testator. This renders the devise as certain as it is possible to make it. . . . We trust we have not failed to express our views in regard to the foregoing case with all that moderation and respect which is due to the decision of so learned and able a court, and which we most sincerely feel. But that the decision is fatally and flagrantly erroneous there can be no more question or doubt than of the axioms of geometry or the propositions in the most exact sciences.

877. The Same. John D. Caton, J. (of Illinois; American Law Register, ibid. p. 353). I have perused with some care and much interest the reports of the case of Kurtz v. Hibner et al., ante, p. 93, and the editorial note appended, in which the learned editor feels compelled to dissent from the conclusions of the court, as announced in the opinion of Mr. Justice Thornton. The principle involved is of the highest importance, and is worthy of the most careful consideration of the profession. From the best consideration which I have been able to give the subject, I am constrained to the conclusion that the decision of the Court is right, and that the editor has fallen into an error. The great learning and deservedly high reputation of the editor who wrote that note, and the profound respect I have ever entertained for him as an eminent jurist, whose labors have done much to advance the science of the law, have caused me to hesitate long before allowing myself to disagree with him.

The fundamental error of the editor, in my apprehension, consists in his assuming that necessarily the testator designed to devise land to which he had a present existing title. To maintain this assumption we must find that the Court, as a matter of law, must declare that it was impossible for the testator to intend to devise property to which he had not a present title, when there is no expression in the will intimating such a purpose. I have met with no case, and certainly none that has been cited in the editorial note, in which such a doctrine is intimated. While in the particular case we may admit that this is most probably true, we must also admit that it is not necessarily so, and the Court had no warrant for saying, as matter of law, or as a necessary legal conclusion, that such was the case; and hence it had no right to act upon such a conclusion. We may suppose a thousand cases in which the testator would devise a particular piece of land to which he at the time had no title. It is sufficient to suggest the case of an honest mistake as to the ownership, or of a contemplated purchase. At any rate, he had a right to do so, and so it has no doubt been done by ten thousand before him through misapprehension or even caprice. The devise in this will is of "the west half of the south-west quarter, section 32, township 35, range 10, containing 80 acres, more or less." Here then we have the range, the township, the section, the quarter section, and the half-quarter section set down, and nothing more. The description is complete and definite, but we find nowhere a single word of additional description. We find no attempt to duplicate the description as "my" land, or "in the possession of A. B.," or "on which is the Big Spring," or "my land on the Bluff," nor any other single word on which the Court may seize to enable it, with the aid of parol proof, to say that "thirty-two" was a false description, and so reject it, and still determine from the words of the will that section thirty-three was in truth meant. Strike the word "thirty-two" from this description and the whole is left entirely unintelligible, for there is nothing else in the will to supply its place.

I entirely agree with the learned editor, in his definition of the maxim "falsa demonstratio non nocet." He says, "The practical meaning of this maxim is, that however many errors there may be in the description, either of the legatee or of the subject-matter of the devise, it will not avoid the bequest, PROVIDED enough remains to show, with reasonable certainty, what was intended." I have emphasized the latter part of this definition because I think it an important, nay, an indispensable part of it, and which, in its application to the principal case, was quite overlooked in the note. If we reject the false description, which is in the number of the section, and so leave that a blank as the editor in fact does, leaving only a specified eighty-acre tract in an unspecified section in a given township, we have a description which applies alike to no less than 36 different lots, so far as the description goes, and nothing "remains in the will to show with reasonable certainty" which of the 36 tracts was intended. . . .

If in this case the word my had been used instead of the in connection with, or rather in duplication of the description, then indeed there would have been something in the will to construe, and by the aid of parol proof the Court might ascertain what the testator meant when he used it — then there would have been an additional description by which the Court might have determined the subject of the devise, after having eliminated thirty-two. I repeat, without some sort of additional description in the will, the Court had no right to destroy the description, which is clear, precise, and single, and insert an additional description of its own, and then go on and construe it. It is impossible to say that there is a false description where there is but one description which, as in this case, is plain and perfect, without an additional reference or word by which the Court might be enabled to determine what land was in the mind of the testator when he wrote or dictated the description proposed to be eliminated from the will. The central idea on which this doctrine of "falsa, &c.," turns is, that there must be two descriptions of some sort, which facts aliunde, if need be, show are inconsistent with each other, and enable the Court to say satisfactorily which is the true and which is the false description, when it will discard the false and give effect to the true, as if the false description had never been written. . . . The legal acumen for which the editor, with whom I feel compelled though reluctantly to disagree, is so justly celebrated, will, I am satisfied, upon more mature reflection, convince him that he has for once, at least, fallen into an error; and his well-known candor, I am sure, must make him anxious, that if such be the case, it should be pointed out in a courteous and proper way.

878. THE SAME. JOHN H. WIGMORE. Note on Kurtz v. Hibner (1910–11. Illinois Law Review, V, 314). Kurtz v. Hibner. Misdescription of Tracts in a Will. The cases subsequent to Kurtz v. Hibner, 55 Ill. 514, in this State, have now been placed on a footing which is entirely satisfactory. Graves v. Rose, Ill., 92 N. E. 601 (October 12, 1910), places the only real issue squarely where it can be precisely understood and debated. The three dissents leave the issue fairly open for future settlement.

The original problem is: When a description of a tract — e.g., as here, "the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 12" — is found not to fit exactly any land subject to the testator's disposition, but there is other land partly answering the description, what can be done to carry out the devise?

In the first place, it has long been plain that no method which involved setting aside the will on the ground of mistake in drafting would be sanctioned; this would go counter to the principle that the terms of a legal document duly executed must stand as final; and the possible alleviation by applying to wills the equitable methods of "reformation" long used for mutual mistake inter vivos has never been given any countenance.

In the second place, the process of interpretation authorizes a description to be construed as a whole, and permits it to be enforced, even though it does not fit in some details not essential. Therefore, if one of the items of description is "N. W. $\frac{1}{2}$," and the "W" does not fit, but the remainder of the description commends itself as the essential terms in the testator's effort to identify the thing devised, the description will be applied, in disregard of the "W" not fitting. This is a natural consequence of the fact that a descriptive series of terms might conceivably be infinite in detail; that all description, therefore, consists, practically, in the selection of a few details taken as cumulative marks; and that when the cumulation of marks is plain in its identification as a whole, the variance of one or more marks is immaterial. On this principle numerous such devises have been carried out — notably, when the area of the tract or the testator's title was given as one of the marks of description; as in Decker v. Decker, 121 Ill. 341; Whitman v. Rodney, 156 Ill. 116; Huffman v. Young, 170 Ill. 290; Felkel v. O'Brien, 231 Ill. 329; Collins v. Capps, 235 Ill. 560.

But, in the third place, since this process of interpretation must, after disregarding the item that does not fit, be based on remaining items that do fit and are sufficient, the remaining items must be found existing in the words of the will, and cannot be implied into it. This was the part of the principle on which the latest case, Graves v. Rose, above, came to turn, as it was also for the earliest case, Kurtz v. Hibner, according to the explanation of CATON, J., given in his letter in 10 Amer. L. Reg. N. S. 353 [ante, No. 877]. If a description does not contain words such as "my land" or "owned by me" or "being my homestead," or "now occupied by C. J. R.," and if without such a term the remaining items are too vague to identify, then the desired term cannot be implied into the description.

On this point the majority and the minority opinions seem to be squarely at issue. The minority opinion invokes "the presumption that the testator intended to dispose of property which he owned," and maintains that this presumption was virtually the basis of the decision in the chief prior cases sustaining such descriptions. Whether that interpretation of the prior issues is correct does not here matter. We note merely that the effect of such a presumption would be to imply a term into the will, and that the propriety of this is the real issue. Now, it is safe to assert that in our country and generation (differing therein from the Roman custom) testators do mean always to devise only property owned by them, so that the presumption is sound. Hence, as a matter of practical safety in construing wills, the propriety of so implying that term into a will would be justified. It comes down then to a simple question: Shall we adhere rigorously to the theoretical rule against implying terms into a will, or shall we frankly admit an exception on grounds of common experience and practical safety? We are disposed to accept the latter solution.

879. The Same. Henry Schofield. Note on Kurtz v. Hibner (1912. Illinois Law Review, VI, 485). Of course there is no equity jurisdiction to reform wills. Indeed there is no judicial power to reform wills, and, under existing law, an exertion of such judicial power by a court would be usurpation of ungranted judicial power. No one ever has suggested that judicial power to reform wills ought to exist, except Stephen, in the preface to the third edition of his Digest of the Law of Evidence (Thayer, Evidence, 437, note 2); which suggestion seems to have been dropped by Stephen from his later editions. The suggestion evidently was ill considered, though no doubt the legislature of Illinois has the power to authorize the Courts to write wills for the dead, which legislative power may be exercised if enough people ever come to want it.

It often happens that a testator describing his land by the government description leaves out one of the points of the compass, puts in a wrong point, duplicates a point, puts in a wrong fraction, leaves out the right fraction, or duplicates a fraction, or puts in the wrong section number, and the question has arisen whether a testator's mistake of that kind can be corrected by the judicial process of construction. The question is not one in equity jurisdiction at all, but has arisen, and may arise, in courts of law as well as in courts of equity, without any regard to the form of the action at law or the nature of the bill in equity. The question first came up in Illinois in 1870, in Kurtz v. Hibner, 55 Ill. 514, and has been coming up regularly ever since, the last case being Graves v. Rose, 246 Ill. 76, in 1910, where the court divided four to three, Cartwright, J., writing the opinion, and Dunn, J., the dissenting opinion. As is well known, the decision in Kurtz v. Hibner, denying correction, was assailed by Judge Redfield and defended by Judge Caton and by Mr.

Julius Rosenthal. See the literature collected in 4 Wigmore, Evidence, p. 3517, note 6. The Caton-Rosenthal several and not joint defense was identical, viz.: that the court was powerless to insert words of ownership not written in the will by the testator, such as "my land" or "land owned by me." . . . Neither the Supreme Court, nor any judge thereof in a dissenting opinion, ever has adopted the Caton-Rosenthal defense of Kurtz v. Hibner, but, on the contrary, as it seems to me, the rule now is that a will necessarily speaks of the testator's own property at the time of his death; that words of ownership must be implied in every will, and it is not a question of inserting words of ownership, but of striking out words of ownership written in by the law, which striking out is not allowable, unless the text of the will excludes words of ownership, which never has happened and very likely never will happen. (In 4 Wigmore, Evidence, pp. 3514, 3417, quaere whether the learned author has not given too much weight to the Caton-Rosenthal point.)

All the reported Illinois cases are cases where the practical effect of the mistake in the government description in the will was, on the face of things if the mistake was left uncorrected, to devise land the testator did not own instead of land that he did own, or to leave the testator intestate as to a parcel of land that he did own. To try to reconcile the Illinois cases involves a useless mental strain; they are irreconcilable; they stand about evenly divided, half correcting the mistake, and the other half refusing correction, the cases of correction being most of the later ones, commencing in 1887, but the last case refuses correction. The doctrine prevailing now generally outside Illinois is, that a testator's mistake of the kind mentioned ordinarily is correctable by the judicial process of construction by a court of law or by a court of equity, by means of an application of the rule, "falsa demonstratio non nocet," under which, striking out the words of mistake, it commonly happens in most cases that enough descriptive words are left in the will, when aided by evidence of proper extrinsic facts, to identify and pass the land in question the testator did own. But it is said over and over in the Illinois cases that such correction of such a mistake of description in a will "is more than construction, — it is reformation," as by Bailey, J., speaking for the court, in Bingel v. Voltz, 142 Ill. 214, in 1892, and by Vickers, J., dissenting, in Gano v. Gano, 239 Ill. 539, 547, in 1909, and in the last case of Graves v. Rose, 246 Ill. 76, 87, Cartwright, J., speaking for the majority said: "That such a change in a deed, contract or instrument other than a will, to make it conform to the intention of the maker, would be a reformation has never been questioned, and we do not see how it can be called anything different in case of a will." . . .

The evidence of surrounding extrinsic facts that may be called the "stock evidence" to put the judicial process of reformation into play and action to correct a mistake of description in a contract or deed, i.e., evidence of "mistake of the scrivener." (34 Cyc. 910), ordinarily cannot be used at all to aid the correction of a like mistake in a will, deed or other instrument by the judicial process of construction. (4 Wigmore, Evidence, § 2471; 30 Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law, 2 ed., 680.) And in so far as Kurtz v. Hibner and the other Illinois cases deny the right to use evidence of that kind of an extrinsic fact to aid construction, they are sound in principle.

REVIEW PROBLEMS, FOR APPLYING THE RULES OF EVIDENCE[1]

1. The plaintiff receives a letter sent to him by the defendant, and desires to offer it in evidence. (1) May or must he first put in his own letter to which the defendant's was an answer? (2) If he may or must, how can he prove the contents of his own letter, (a) if he has kept a copy, (b) if he has not kept a copy?

2. Upon a trial for illegal liquor-selling, in cross-examining witnesses A and B called by the defendant, (1) may the prosecuting counsel ask each whether he was ever convicted of illegal liquor-selling? (2) If he is allowed to ask, and A refuses to answer, may A be compelled? (3) If B answers that he was not, may the contrary be proved? (4) May the fact of conviction be proved without having questioned A or B at all?

3. In the same case, (a) may the defendant, by witnesses K and L, show the good reputation of witnesses A and B? (b) If so, may the

[1] These problems may be used for review by allotting one to each student and requesting a written report for discussion at the next lecture. Each report should cite the cases in this book exemplifying the rules invoked in the problem, with a brief statement of the question thereby raised: e.g.

No. 39. Offer (1). (a) Whether the testimony involves the contents of the check, and therefore whether the rule for producing the original is applicable at all: Case 331, Lamb v. Moberly.

(b) Even if applicable, whether the pleadings are a sufficient implied notice to produce: Case 310, U. S. v. Doebler.

(c) Whether notice to produce is necessary, if the plaintiff's attorney is the possessor of the check: Case 308, Lawrence v. Clark; Case 311, Eure v. Pittman.

Offer (2). (a) Whether the wife may be called against her husband: Case 586, State v. Briggs.

(b) Whether a privileged communication is involved: Case 650, Sexton v. Sexton.

(c) Whether the oral admission of the check's contents is receivable: Case 335, Slatterie v. Pooley.

(d) Whether the admission may be proved without first inquiring of the plaintiff on the stand whether he made it: Case 226, Adams v. Herald Pub. Co.

In all such reviews, no rule should be stated without the citation of a specific authority most nearly applicable, and a categoric statement of the supposed rule.

Most of the following problems have been culled from the Editor's own examination papers. A few have been added from the volume "Examinations in Law," edited by him in 1900, and containing examination papers from Cornell, Harvard, Iowa, New York, and other Universities.

prosecution, in cross-examining K and L, ask them if they had ever heard that the defendant had sold liquor illegally in Wichita before he came to Chicago?

4. In the same case, (1) the defendant, in cross-examining the principal witness for the prosecution, asks him whether he did not see a license for the sale of liquor nailed on the wall of the defendant's saloon in public view; the judge excludes the question. 21. In the same case, (a) supposing the defendant to answer the question in the negative, can the fact of such an agreement in Kansas City be established by calling other witnesses? (b) Supposing that it could be, would it be proper to do so by asking these witnesses whether they had heard the defendant admit the signing of such an agreement?

22. In the same case, supposing that the defendant had answered the question in the affirmative, and supposing the agreement to have been in writing and now in fact in his possession, how could the prosecution prove its contents?

23. In the same case, supposing the prosecution to desire to prove the illegality of the Kansas City agreement under the laws of Missouri, how could the prosecution prove (1) the Missouri statute defining the crime, and (2) a record of the conviction of the defendant in Missouri for the offence as committed by making this agreement?

33. In the same action, the defendant, to disprove the validity of Diedrich's naturalization, calls the widow of Diedrich, to testify that he often admitted to her that he had in his naturalization application misstated the date of his arrival in Illinois as 1860 instead of 1863. May the testimony be received?

34. On May 31 the Northwestern Elevated Railroad was opened for traffic, and on June 6 a girder, fastened with screwbolts of a certain kind, came loose, and caused an accident in which the plaintiff was injured. May this be proved?

35. At the same trial, the foreman of the defendant's construction gang is called to prove the number of bolts put in each girder. He proposes to use a time-book made by him from daily oral reports of

The plaintiff received from the defendant on May 31 a telegram reading, when translated from cipher: "No. 3 red dropped two points; don't buy forty thousand." In an action for expenses, the plaintiff offers to prove that, for securing greater secrecy of communication, it had always been understood between his principal and himself that on telegraphic orders he was to buy when the telegram read "don't buy," and vice versa. May this be shown?

What is the effect of this ruling?

47. In the same case, the prosecution offers to show (1) that beef similarly treated was furnished by the defendant to the camps in Chattanooga and Tampa, and (2) that the defendant's agent in Cuba, already called as a witness, had admitted that the supply sent to Cuba was so treated. The defendant then shows that A's first husband M had disappeared in 1885, and was reported dead, that in this belief he and A married in 1889, but that on hearing again in 1891 that M had died only in 1890, they repeated the ceremony. It may also be assumed, as a rule of evidence, that the fact of serious disproportion between the amount of his estate, and the sum given to the woman in the contract, raises a presumption of his fraudulent concealment and her ignorance. Suppose (1) a bill for partition by the heirs, making the wife a defendant, (2) an action by the wife to set apart dower from the estate, making the heirs defendants. 92. You have occasion, in suing on a contract made by telegrams, to prove the terms of certain telegraphic communications between the plaintiff and defendant. How do you do it?

93. In an action by A to recover real estate, he offers in evidence the record of a deed to himself contained in the Deed Record from the office of the Recorder of the County. What objection, if any, is sound?

94. A is taken ill while passing through Boston to New Hampshire, and makes his will, devising to his nephew "My farm in Portland, Maine, which I bought from J. S. in 1891." Evidence is offered on behalf of the nephew, in an action to try title, (1) that the person who drew the will inserted by inadvertence "Maine," instead of "Oregon" as directed; (2) that the only land the testator owned was in Portland, Oregon, where he had a son and a daughter, and that here he had bought land from J. S. in 1891; (3) that he had never seen the land, but had bought it through a land agent, who, instead of investing in a farm as ordered, had bought a series of town-lots, which the testator had always believed to be and spoken of as a farm. Is any of this admissible?

95. In the same case, suppose that the first offer, being ruled admissible, is sustained by a witness K. who testifies to the residence of J. S. in Portland, Oregon, and to J. S.'s ownership of the farm there in 1891; that objection is made by the opponent that the deed from J. S. to the testator is not yet proved; that counsel for the nephew declares his intention to produce the deed later in the trial; that the Court thereupon admits K's testimony; and that the deed from J. S. is afterwards not offered, nor is further alluded to by either party, until after verdict for the nephew and on motion for new trial. Can the opponent take advantage of the nephew's failure to prove the deed?

96. In a proceeding to restrain a person from practicing as an attorney without a license, the petitioner, (a) on cross-examination of the respondent, who has taken the stand in his own behalf, asks him whether he did not in 1898 leave the State of New York in order to avoid disbarment proceedings; on objections sustained, (b) the petitioner offers a record of the respondent's disbarment in the Court of Appeals of the State of New York; this is admitted. Are these rulings correct?

97. St. Louis Times, April, 1909: "In a Georgia city a recent traveler, approaching the clerk of the best hotel, said: 'I would like a room.' Responded the clerk: 'You want a dollar or a dollar and a half room?' 'A dollar and a half room.' The guest was given a key to his room, and upon having been shown to it by a bellboy, unlocked the door and found upon a table, conspicuously in the middle of the room, a quart of the best whisky, which probably would have cost him about a dollar and a half anywhere in America. This he put in his pocket, and demurely went his way. It seems that some time later the prohibitionists of the city, having got wind of this evasive method of circumventing the liquor law, employed a detective to go through the same process. He did so, obtained his whisky, and had the proprietor of the hotel arrested for selling the liquor without a license. In court, under the cross-examination of the defendant's attorney, the detective admitted that in the first place he had not purchased any liquor, and that in the second place he carried away the liquor he found upon the table he had hired — whereupon he promptly was arrested for petty larceny."

On the trial of the detective for larceny, can this testimony of his be used against him?

98. Associated Press Dispatch: "Matteawan, N.Y., April 17, 1909. — Dr. Robert T. Lamb, superintendent of the Matteawan Hospital for the Criminal Insane, and who was one of the principal witnesses in the Thaw trial proceedings, had a narrow escape from death yesterday at the hands of John Tohlman, a professor of languages, who was sent to the institution three years ago, after having killed a man. Tohlman struck Dr. Lamb over the head with a steel shovel, three feet long, cutting his head and rendering him unconscious. Luckily, the blow was a glancing one, and the injury inflicted is not serious in character."

If there should be a criminal trial of Tohlman for this assault, could either Dr. Lamb or Professor Tohlman testify?

99. In the same case, if Dr. Lamb should be at the time of the trial still confined to his bed from the injury, can his deposition be taken and used?

100. Associated Press Dispatch: "Mercer, Pa., April 23, 1909. — District Attorney J. Mede Lininger to-day attempted to have Mrs. James H. Boyle, one of the couple held on the charge of kidnaping Willie Whitla, testify before the grand jury. She was taken from the jail to the grand jury room. When her counsel, former Judge Miller, heard of it, he rushed to the room and instructed her to refuse to say a word. She followed his advice. Mr. Lininger then asked Judge Williams to commit the woman for contempt. Judge Williams ruled that neither Boyle nor his wife could be compelled to testify until he decided the question. The first question asked of Mrs. Boyle was, 'Are you married to James H. Boyle?'"

Can the woman be allowed or compelled to testify for the prosecution or for the defence on the trial?

101. Associated Press Dispatch: "Boston, April 15, 1909. — Frank T. Bryson, nineteen years old, of 47 Lincoln road, Nonantum, was held for the grand jury in $3,000, in the Newton court this morning, Judge Kennedy having found probable cause on a charge of breaking and entering. Bryson was arrested about 1:30 o'clock this morning by two policemen who found him hiding near a railroad signal tower opposite the junction of Crafts and Washington streets, Newtonville. They were searching the vicinity in response to a call for aid from Dr. T. F. O'Donnell, whose house is nearby. Margaret Ryan, a servant in the O'Donnell house, had awakened suddenly and saw a man lighting a match at the foot of her bed. Her screams frightened the intruder away and aroused the family. The officers found footprints in the yard, and after they had arrested Bryson they took off his shoes and found that they fitted the marks. The prisoner declared that he had not been near the O'Donnell house, and said that he was on the street at that hour because he had quarreled with his father, who would not admit him to the house. Miss Ryan positively identified him as the man whom she had seen in her room. Bryson has a police record. Entrance to the O'Donnell house was gained through a window opening onto a stairway landing."

How could that "police record" be used on the trial?

102. Brown v. Feldwert (1905), 46 Ore. 363. The defendant signed, without reading it, a paper which was a promissory note. In the hands of a bona fide transferee for value before maturity, can the note be recovered on, in spite of the circumstances of signing it?

104. Gardiner v. McDonough, 147 Cal. 313. The plaintiff and the defendant, dealers in produce, negotiated a sale, of which a memorandum was made reciting a contract for so many "peas" and "pinks," at so much "per 100." A dispute having arisen, one of the parties wishes to show that by the trade usage "peas" signifies "white beans" and "pinks" signifies "pink beans" and "per 100" signifies "per 100 pounds." Is this allowable?

105. Dick v. Zimmermann (1904), 207 Ill. 636, permits a cross-examiner to "elicit suppressed facts which weaken or qualify the case of the party introducing the witness or support the case of the party cross-examining." Is any part of this statement inconsistent with the rule in the Federal Courts?

106. Tifft v. Greene (1904), 211 Ill. 389. It is desired to prove records of tax-sales by certified copy. They are kept in a room in the county building, by a certain official who fills the offices both of county clerk and of clerk of the county court. How would you be able to tell what officer should certify the copies in order to make them admissible?

107. Walker v. Southern R. Co. (1907), Ala., 56 S. E. 952. Bills of lading were made out in triplicate. One was signed by the shipper and filed with the carrier's auditor; another was sent to the shipper with the shipper's signature copied into it; and the third, with the shipper's signature copied into it, was kept in the carrier's freight office. In an action by the shipper against the carrier, which one or ones of these may the shipper use, and on what conditions, if any?

108. Smith v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1904), 177 N. Y. 379. Issue as to the defendant's engineer having rung the bell at the crossing where the plaintiff was injured. The engineer testified that he did, and, further, that the bell was rung automatically at all the prior crossings for several miles up the road. The plaintiff offered witnesses to show that the bell was not ringing at certain of those prior crossings. This was held inadmissible, one judge dissenting. Is the decision or the dissent more sound?

109. In the same case, suppose that the trial Court rules the plaintiff's offer to be admissible, and the evidence is accordingly admitted; but that later in the trial, when a further witness on the same point is offered and objected to, the trial Court, after argument, changes its ruling and orders that the prior testimony on that subject be stricken out. Assuming that the Supreme Court also holds the evidence inadmissible, will the defendant's exception to the original ruling nevertheless be sustained?

110. Champion v. McCarthy (1907), Ill., 81 N. E. 808. Inheritance of J., an intestate, illegitimate son of S. The plaintiff claims as another illegitimate son of S. S. also had legitimate children, by marriage to C. To prove the plaintiff to be son of S., declarations of J., of S., and of deceased members of C's family, are offered. Are they admissible?

111. In a prosecution for perjury committed in testifying on oath before Federal Commissioner of Corporations Garfield, how would you prove (a) the Federal Statute empowering him to administer the oath? (b) the words of the testimony constituting the alleged perjury?

112. The plaintiff's intestate was killed while lawfully riding on a freight train in charge of cattle. A witness offered to testify that the deceased had a ticket from Chicago to Oshkosh; it was objected that the ticket should be produced or accounted for; the objection was overruled. Was this correct? (215 Ill., 158.)

113. Probate of a will; issue of undue influence; what sort of declarations by the testator are admissible? (76 N. E. 678, Ill.)

114. Injury to a mine-workman by the lowering of the cage at a speed exceeding the statutory rate; the statute makes the mine-owner liable for an injury caused by a wilful violation of the statute. The fact that the engineer had "repeatedly lowered the cage" at an excessive speed is offered. Is it admissible for any purpose? (77 N. E. 131, Ill.)

115. "When the direct examination opens on a general subject, the cross-examination may go into any phase of that subject;" said of an accused's conversations. What are the different varieties of rule on the subject? (73 N. E. 601, Ind.; 69 N. E. 919, Ill.)

116. Action on a claim for cigars and liquors. The plaintiff offered an original book, sworn to by the clerk keeping it, and made up by him from tickets punched by a registering machine operated by the salesman, who sent the tickets to the clerk, who made the entries in the book; neither the tickets nor the salesman were produced or accounted for. The book was excluded. Is this ruling correct? (73 N. E. 656, Mass.)

117. Action on an insurance policy; defence, false representations as to health. The insured's statements as to his present condition of health, made pending the application for insurance, were admitted. Can this ruling be supported on any ground? (73 N. E. 592, Ind.)

118. Action on an alleged creditors' agreement in writing; the defendant admitted his signature, but denied his liability, and offered to show that the document had been signed by him and delivered to the plaintiff's agent on the understanding that it should not be binding until a certain proportion of the creditors should also have signed and that these additional signatures had not been obtained. The plaintiff testified that he personally knew nothing of this understanding. Is the defendant liable? (71 N. E. 117, Mass.)

119. News Dispatch: "Evansville, Texas, May 11, 1907. — By marrying August January, a wealthy Nebraska farmer, Garnet Collins today took unto herself as husband the man on whose testimony the Federal authorities expected to send her to jail and also the man who was the innocent cause of the prosecution of the case against her. The girl and her mother, Mrs. J. C., were arrested several days ago on charges of using mails to defraud, on complaint of numerous men over the country who had answered their matrimonial advertisements and sent them money on which to come to them. Their apartments were searched and a number of letters, all speaking of money inclosed, were found. Among the letters were several from January, and in all of them were references to cash forwarded for a trip to Nebraska or to tickets wired. January was immediately sent for by the authorities to come to Evansville and testify; but on his arrival he and the younger Collins woman were quietly married, and the authorities now admit he cannot be forced to testify against her."

On the trial of the mother, (a) Can August January be obliged to testify? (b) Can the daughter be obliged to testify, if the Federal attorney hands her a pardon on calling her to the stand?

which you denied being present at the time of the injury?" (136 Ill. 317; 219 Ill. 222.)

123. Prosecution of M. for receiving stolen goods from one K., well knowing them to have been stolen by K. The prosecution, to prove the theft, offers a written voluntary confession by K., implicating M. Is this admissible? (Ind., 76 N. E. 245.)

124. In the same case, would the confession of K. be deemed voluntary if made to a chief of police while under arrest and in answer to questions?

125. A will was duly signed and attested, and left all the property to a certain woman. In a proceeding to probate the will, contested by the next of kin, one of the attesting witnesses testified that the testator had laughed and said to him, just after the document was executed and the woman legatee had left the room, "This paper is a fake, and it is only done for a purpose." Is this admissible? (187 Mass. 120.)

[1] These Exercises are simple, and are not intended to lead to argument over rules having scientific controversial difficulties. Their aim is merely to give the student his first plunge across the Rubicon. The first actual experience in making or opposing an offer of evidence marks a stage in his development, and the public struggles of each counsel to do one of these simple things is a useful object-lesson to the others.

Each case is allotted to two counsel, — one to make the offer and one to oppose it. A calendar is set. The offering counsel prepares his evidence as he sees fit, but always keeping within the strict limits of the problem as stated. His object is to introduce the described evidence in accordance with the rules applicable. The opponent's duty is merely to be prepared to check any violation of the rules. Each must be ready to cite some authority in the Case-book or Statute-book, when called upon to justify a point of law. Any document designed to be used must, to save time, be submitted to the opponent's inspection before the case is called. No case is expected to take more than ten minutes.
