Paris, January 29. Messrs. Guillot and de St. Maurice, deputies of the city of New Orleans, on being presented by General Lafayette, delivered the address and flag to Mr. Odillou-Barrot, prefect of the Seine who has missed to award the latter an honorable place among the decorations of the great hall of the Hotel-de-ville.

The QUARTERLY REVIEW says: -- Men in administration, at this time, whether Whig or Tory, must, we are willing to believe, have the same interest, and aim at the same end:-that of public safety and the public good. There is no occasion to suppose in them any extraordinary degree of patriotism or private virtue, -as mere men, and public ones, their interest and their duty coincide. Being sane men, they can take no other course, -no other is possible for them. The present ministry have to extricate themselves from the nets which they have laid for others, but in which they are now taken; much is to be unsaid that they have said; much to be undone, that they have done, or compelled others to do; much to be done which they would have prevented the former administration from doing. Their opponents will not seek to render this more unpulatable than it must needs be, neither will they place any embarra-sments in their way; and there are no difficulties or dangers before them but what wisdom and courage may re-

As the right old royalist exhorted his son to stand by the crown, though it should be hanging upon a bush, so ought the conservative party, to stand by the government at this time. T ey will lend no aid to ruinous reductions, unjust re trenchments, or rash experiments; but they will not act upon the tactics of a factious opposition; they will cordially support them in those strong measures which the situation not only of Ireland but of England calls for, and they will not oppose any such alterations in the system of representation as may be made without danger, and with the fair probability of removing some evil. or producing some good,

FROM THE LATE EUROPEINTEL-LIGENCE.

The debate respecting the choice of a soveinterests of that prince. A letter written from exclamations of "Death to the Prince of Orange! Long live Beauharmais! Down with the French government!" were uttered in the streets by paid agents, and in the taverus and clubs by the new military chiefs, and re-echoed by the journalists, white every method was employed to influence the Deputies and inflame the populace. The connection of the Duke of Lenchtenberg with the family of Bonaparte (Louis Bonaparte's son by Hortense Beauharnais being his first cousin) is given as the reason of the objections of the French government-Should he be elected, it is supposed that the Diplomatic Commissioners of France and England will quit the country, and that France will adopt immediate measures of hostility. The prominent candidate of another party is the Duke of Nemours, to whose election the French government has also refused its consent, but in less positive terms. "Should this prince be chosen," says a Brussels on the 28th Jan. says;

The Allies, who must understand the true meaning of this reasoning, and cannot be blind to the consequence, will protect-France will persist. As to Poland, he thought it important that his barrier should again be erected against the measures of the northern hords. He said that Prussia yie'ded with reluctance to the partition of Poland, that Austria viewed it with extreme regret, and that he had heard even the least liberal Austrian diploma lots express a wish that Poland should recove her rights. He should, therefore, have counsel
