and whose sense of justice and prudential policy in the natu. ralization of foreigners is a guarantee for the continuance of the rights of naturalized citizens.

Rome too was early awike to the importance of miture Zation; and during the whole period of their republican career, when at her highest grandeur, invited and honored (oregnees); and entrusted to them; the highest offices in the republic; for even Cicero was a naturalized citizen; so were Virgil, Martial and Lucan, the poets; Livy and Tactius, the historians; so did the letter which may be destined to me, you will be cateful to place it under an envelope bearing the supersistence. Roman emperors, Adrian, Trajan, Aureitus and others-

But the Ramans erred in the decline of their glory incorporating under their naturalization availant, nati no and countries. Conquest made a colorit entitled to the privileges of Rome; and corruption effected a harter of the rights of a Roman. The privileges of a crizen could be bought and sold: and hence they became worthless and injurious-fatally injurious on account of the engrmous extent of the empire -Not so was it with Athens, whose state-men confined their citizenship to residents within their own immediate jurisdic tion, who acted with and for Athens; and not merely paid her a tribute. Rome theref ire sunk under her corrupt systom: for those who bought her privileges, sold her invocests.

Vattel in his Law of Nations has the same opinions. He considers one's nountry to be that state of which one is a snember, not that where his parents resided at the period of this higher, no responsible parents resided at the period of this higher, for a negacy is bound in duty and distinct the costs and the lawyers less—adopted by the costs and the lawyers less and lawyers less and the lawyers less and lawyers less and lawye his birth: for a person is bound in duty and inferest to his birth: for a person is bound in duty and inserest to serve that state of which he is inseed on actual member in preference to that of which his parents may have been members, or that which he may voluntarily or compulsorily amounted to atticle 7 of the ordinance relating to the lease of dysters stands approved August 24, 1926; but I is not an actual member of any state unless he enjoys also privileges of a citizen of that states he is therefore not bound to serve it. But when he shall become an actual member he must serve that state in preference to all others.

Wo fins and Grotius coincide in this opinion; and Vatte, and they consider in full the tenets of expatriation and allegiance, which international law holds to be velantary with the woods. any individual-to be the reserved right of every member of a community, no matter what restrictions the shorteighted or narrowminded policy of the legislatures or rulers of any nation may impose. And this doctrine was and has been practically enforced by all our ancestors who colonized the river.

It is singularly thought by many that America only has laws of naturalization. This is an egregious error. There is not a civilized nation in Europe that has not some mode of naturalizing subjects; and whenever a constitution has been add the woods.
