PREFACE.

THIS CYCLOPEDIA OF NAMES is an outgrowth of The Century Dictionary. It was part of the plan of that work to include in its final volume a somewhat fuller appendix of names of persons and places than had before been given in general dictionaries; but as the size of the book increased, it became obvious that this could not be done in the available space, and it was decided to place the appendix in a separate volume. The result, with many modifications of the original scheme, is the present work. It is entirely independent in subject and use, yet serves as a supplement to the dictionary by extending the name-list into regions which the dictionary could not occupy, and by enlarging its encyclopedic field. In character it is primarily a dictionary of proper names, giving their orthography and pronunciation and such explanation of them as is necessary for their identification; and, secondarily, a condensed encyclopedia in its somewhat fuller treatment of several thousands of the more important articles.

The range of names to be included was practically unrestricted, since the object sought was not the presentation of any special class, as in a gazetteer or biographical dictionary, but a general account of all the names excluded, by their nature, from the larger work, so far as this was possible within the prescribed limits. The entries thus comprise not only names in biography and geography, but also names of races and tribes, mythological and legendary persons and places, characters and objects in fiction, stars and constellations, notable buildings and archæological monuments, works of art, institutions (academies, universities, societies, legislative bodies, orders, clubs, etc.), historical events (wars, battles, treaties, conventions, etc.), sects, parties, noted streets and squares, books, plays, operas, and even celebrated gems, vessels (war-ships, yachts, etc.), and horses. Pseudonyms, also, which have literary importance are included. The only condition of insertion has been that the name should be one about which information would be likely to be sought.

All these various groups could not, of course, be presented with equal fullness. The space given to persons and places is relatively much greater than that devoted to any other class, and the others follow in what appeared to be the order of their usefulness to the general reader, whose needs have everywhere been considered in the selection of the names to be defined. Thus, both ancient geography and modern are represented, and the information given in the brief space allowed to the separate articles is historical rather than statistical. The list of geographical names, also, includes, besides towns which are notable from their size, smaller places and localities which are important historically, or as visited by tourists, or for other reasons: the various physical and political divisions of the earth; rivers, lakes, seas, etc.; natural curiosities; and various imaginary places of legend and fiction. The list of personal names, for the same reason, is selected from all times, and not only from actual biography, but also from mythology, legend, and fiction (the last chiefly English). In the matter of dates the usual difficulties, due to different styles of reckoning and to the actual differences (which are very numerous) among the best authorities, have been met and, it is hoped, to a considerable degree overcome. In English biography the dates given in the "Dictionary of National Biography" have, as a rule, been adopted so far as its volumes were available (A to N); and full acknowledgment is here given of the aid received in this and in other ways from that great work. In the brief bibliographies, with few exceptions, only the most important works are given, and these often, for economy of space, with abbreviated titles.

The orthography has, in general, been determined by the established usage in the language from which the name is taken. The correct and, as a rule, the only current spelling of a place-name is the local one, and, within certain limits, of a personal name that which its bearer gives it. There are, however, large groups to which these considerations do not apply. English usage, in many cases of foreign names which were introduced before the present period of greater exactness, has established forms which differ more or less from the present or original native form. Familiar instances of this, in place-names, are Munich for the German München, Flushing for the Dutch Vlissingen, Hanover for the German Hannover, and in personal names Horace, Livy, Pliny, Augustine, for the Latin Horatius, Livius, Plinius, Augustinus, and the commonly accepted Latinized forms of Greek names, as Hercules for Heracles, Plato for Platon, etc. In these cases the desire has been to return to the native form when its difference from the Anglicized spelling is comparatively slight (as in Hannover); but in other cases the conventional English spelling has, as a rule, been accepted. In the case of Greek names, in particular, both geographical and personal, it has seemed best to retain the familiar forms which have come to us through the Latin, and to transliterate other Greek names, not recorded in classical Latin, according to the same system. No transliteration of the Greek can be acceptable which is not complete and consistent: such consistency, however, would produce many forms which are not only without support in English usage, but are also open to the charge of pedantry. There are also many names in regard to which usage differs (there being in fact, as a rule, no proper local usage), or where accepted use may properly be corrected in accordance with a general rule: as, for example, Hudson Bay for Hudson's Bay. Here choice has been made of the simpler or the corrected spelling. Lastly, there is the large group of names taken from languages which do not employ the Roman alphabet, or are without any, and whose sounds have to be represented by some method of transliteration. Here established and familiar transliterations have, as a rule, been adopted; and in other cases the simplest available forms, according to the system, for the languages concerned, used in The Century Dictionary. So far as was possible the use of "accented" letters in transliteration has been avoided, the employment of such marks, in the absence of a generally accepted scientific system, appearing to be distinctly undesirable, especially from a practical point of view.

In the pronunciation the system of notation employed by Professor Whitney in The Century Dictionary has, with slight modifications, been adopted. The marking of the sounds of foreign names might in some cases have been simplified by the use of a notation based upon a different principle; but, since this work was designed to be a companion to the dictionary, it was desirable to avoid, especially in this particular, difference of method. Moreover, the "English" notation is that to which most are accustomed, and which best enables the English consulter of a dictionary to reproduce with a fair degree of accuracy the sounds indicated. In any case, only by the ear can one know the exact sounds of a foreign speech, and only the trained tongue can utter them with precision. This is particularly true of personal and place names, which often have a special character that can not exactly be inferred from the general rules or usages of the languages concerned. The values of the signs used are given in the key: it is necessary only to remark that the natural tendency of an English-speaker to shorten or slur the long vowels of many foreign names has led to the use of the long-vowel signs, to insure the right vowel quality, even in cases where the actual sound is shorter than that indicated by the notation.

No attempt has been made systematically to etymologize all the names in the list: but etymological notes have been inserted under many of the historical names of prime interest, especially those of ancient English origin, and in many other cases where they seemed to be useful. These have been contributed by Dr. Charles P. G. Scott, with additions by some of the other specialists in their several departments—Sanskrit, Semitic, American Indian, etc. Dr. Scott has also aided in the work on the pronunciation, and has criticized the proofs.

The geographical articles have been prepared by Professor Edmund K. Alden, whose work has been supplemented in Mexican and Central and South American geography by Mr. Herbert H. Smith, in African geography by Mr. Heli Chatelain, and in ancient Oriental geography by Dr. Cyrus Adler. Professor W. R. Martin has contributed the articles on Indian and Persian biography, mythology, and literature; Colonel Garrick Mallery, those on North American Indian tribes; Professor Charles A. Young, those on the stars;

Professor William H. Carpenter, those on Teutonic mythology, ethnology, and legend; and Miss Katharine B. Wood, those on English literature and characters in fiction. Professor Carpenter has also written biographical articles on the best-known names in German and Scandinavian literature. The accounts of works of art, noted buildings (generally under place-names), and the articles on classical archaeology were written by the late Mr. Thomas W. Ludlow. Biographical notices of the more important French writers have been contributed by Dr. B. D. Woodward. Dr. Adler has also written numerous articles on Semitic history and antiquities; Mr. H. H. Smith has had charge of the Mexican and South American biography and ethnology; and Mr. Chatelain has written on African ethnology, and has read the proofs especially for the correction of the pronunciation. Many valuable notes on the ethnology and geography of the southwestern States and northern Mexico were received from Mr. Adolphe Bandelier. General assistance in the biographical and historical work has been given by Dr. M. A. Mikkelsen, and valuable aid in the criticism of manuscript and proofs by Rev. George M'Arthur. Whatever degree of typographical accuracy and consistency has been attained is largely due to the proof-readers of The De Vinne Press.

NOTE TO THE REVISED EDITION.

ADVANTAGE has been taken of the opportunity offered in this second edition of the CYCLOPEDIA OF NAMES to revise with care all its more important details, including pronunciation, dates, historical and geographical statements, etc., and to bring its statistical material down to date. Assistance in this labor has been received from most of the contributors mentioned in the preface to the first edition, and from Mr. Louis Heilprin, Professor Angelo Heilprin of the Academy of Natural Sciences at Philadelphia, Dr. Samuel A. Binion, Mr. F. W. Hodge of the Bureau of American Ethnology, and many others. In its plan and the selection of its material this edition is practically identical with the first, no good reason having been found for modifying either in any essential particular: room has, however, been made for the addition of a number of contemporary names, the peculiar utility of this part of the work having been amply demonstrated.

KEY TO PRONUNCIATION.

a as in fat, man, pang.
 ā as in fate, mane, dale.
 ä as in far, father, guard. á as in fall, talk.
 ȃ as in ask, fast, ant.
 ȃ as in fare.
 e as in met, pen, bless.
 ē as in mete, meet.
 é as in her, fern.
 i as in pin, it.
 ī as in pine, flight, file.
 o as in not, on, frog.
 ô as in note, poke, floor.
 ô as in move, spoon.
 ó as in nor, song, off.
 u as in tub.
 ũ as in mute, acute.
 ù as in pull.

ü German ü, French u.
 oi as in oil, joint, boy.
 ou as in pound, proud.
 A single dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates its abbreviation and lightening, without absolute loss of its distinctive quality.
 Thus:
 ȃ as in prelate, courage.
 ȓ as in ablegate, episcopal.
 ȓ as in abrogate, eulogy, democrat.
 ũ as in singular, education.

A double dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates that, even in the mouths of the best speakers, its sound is variable to, and in ordinary utterance actually becomes, the short u-sound (of but, pun, etc.).

 Thus:
 ȓ as in errant, republican.
 ȓ as in prudent, difference.
 j as in charity, density.
 ȓ as in valor, actor, idiot.
 ȓ as in Persia, peninsula.
 ȓ as in the book.
 ũ as in nature, feature.

A mark (˘) under the consonants t, d, s, z indicates that they in like manner are variable to ch, j, sh, zh.
 Thus:
 t as in nature, adventure.
 d as in arduous, education.
 s as in pressure.
 z as in azure.

y as in yet.
 B Spanish b (medial). ȃh as in German ach, Scotch loch.
 G as in German Abensberg, Hamburg.
 H Spanish g before e and i; Spanish j; etc. (a guttural h).
 ñ French nasalizing n, as in fon, ca.
 S final a in Portuguese (soft).
 th as in thin.
 TH as in then.
 D = TH.

' denotes a primary. " a secondary accent. (A secondary accent is not marked if at its regular interval of two syllables from the primary, or from another secondary.)

THE CENTURY CYCLOPEDIA OF NAMES

A (ä). [Lit. '(the) water,' i. e. 'the river'; one of the forms, surviving in river-names, of a common Teut. word, Goth. ahwa, OHG. aha, AS. cá, etc., = L. aqua, water; see aqua and *ewe*², C. D.] A river in northern France which flows into the North Sea between Calais and Dunkirk. Aa. A river in the province of North Brabant, Netherlands, which unites with the Dommel near Herzogenbusch.

Aa. A river in the province of Groningen, Netherlands, which flows into the Dollart.

Aa. A river in the cantons of Lucerne and Aargau, Switzerland, a tributary of the Aare.

Aa. A river in the canton of Unterwalden, Switzerland, which forms the outlet of Lake Sarnen into the Lake of Lucerne.

Aa. A river in the canton of Unterwalden, Switzerland, which flows into the Lake of Lucerne near Buochs.

Aa. A river in Courland, emptying by one mouth into the Gulf of Riga, and by another into the Düna.

Aa. A river in Livonia, about 175 miles long, which flows into the Gulf of Riga.

Aa (ä), Peter van der. A Dutch publisher and engraver who, with his brothers, formed a publishing-house at Leyden about 1682. They edited several collections of travels in Dutch and French.

Aach (äeh). A small town in Baden, about 20 miles northwest of Constance, the scene of an engagement between the French and the Austrians, March 25, 1799.

Aachen (ä'ehen). The German name of Aix-la-Chapelle.

Aageson (ä'ge-son), or Aagesen (-sen), Svend. A Scandinavian writer of the 12th century. His "Compendiosa historia regnm Danie," from King Skjold to Knud VI., is the first connected history of Denmark. Little is known of his life.

Aah-hotep (ä-hö'tep). [Egypt., 'delight of the moon' (Brugsch).] An Egyptian queen, wife of Kames, last king of the 17th dynasty, and mother of Aahmes, first king of the 18th dynasty. Her coffin was found at Thebes in 1869, in the ancient necropolis of No, and was placed in the Balak Museum (now at Gizeh).

Aahmes (ä'mes) I., L. Amasis (ä-mä'sis). [Egypt., 'child of the moon' (Brugsch).] An Egyptian king, the founder of the 18th dynasty and the conqueror of the Hyksos. He lived about 1700 B. C. An inscription on two rock-tablets at Turah and Massarah, commemorating the 23d year of his reign, has been deciphered.

Aahmes II., L. Amasis. An Egyptian king (572-528 B. C. [Brugsch], 570-526 [Sayce]), the fifth of the 26th dynasty. He maintained friendly relations with the Greek states, sending gifts (548 B. C.) for the rebuilding of the burnt temple at Delphi, and establishing at Naucratis Greek commerce and settlement.

Mr. Petrie's excavations show them [Greeks] to have been in possession of the city [Naucratis] from a much earlier period—earlier, perhaps, than the dynasty to which Amasis belonged. What Amasis actually did for the Greeks of Naucratis must, therefore, have been to confirm them in their occupation of that site, and to grant them an exclusive charter whereby they should be entitled to hold it in perpetuity.

A. B. Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 180.

Aahmes. An Egyptian captain who fought against the Hyksos about 1700 B. C. An important inscription in his tomb at El-Kab, near ancient Thebes, has been deciphered.

Aahmes-Nefertari. See Nefertari.

Aalborg (äl'börg). A seaport in the amt of Aalborg, Denmark, situated on the Lijmfjord about lat. 57° 3' N., long. 9° 55' E. It has an important foreign commerce and fisheries. Population (1890), 19,503.

Aalborg. A stift and amt of Jutland, Denmark.

Aalen (ä'len). A town in the Jagst circle, Württemberg, situated on the Kocher about 42 miles east of Stuttgart: an ancient free imperial city. Population (1890), 7,155.

Aalesund (ä'le-sönd). A seaport in the province of Romsdal, Norway, on islands of the western coast, about lat. 62° 28' N. Population (1891), 8,383.

Aali. See Ali.

Aalst. See Alost.

Aalten (äl'ten). A small town in the province of Gelderland, Netherlands, about 30 miles east of Arnhem.

Aar. See Aare.

Aarau (är'ou). The capital of the canton of Aargau, Switzerland, situated on the Aare 24 miles southeast of Basel. It has manufactures of silk, cotton, instruments, etc. Population (1888), 6,809.

Aarburg (är'börg). A small manufacturing town in the canton of Aargau, Switzerland, situated on the Aare about 22 miles southeast of Basel.

Aare (ä're), or Aar (är). A river in Switzerland, rising in the Bernese Oberland near the Grimsel Pass. It traverses the Hasli Thal and forms the Handeck Fall, traverses the lakes of Brienz and Thun, flows through Bern, Solothurn, and Aargau, and joins the Rhine opposite Waldshut. Upon it are Bern, Solothurn, Aarau, and Brugg. Its length is about 170 miles, and it is navigable from Untereisen for small craft.

Aared (ä'red). A group of mountains in Nejd, central Arabia. Also Ared, Arid, Aroudh.

Aarestrup (ä're-ströp), Carl Ludwig Emil. Born at Copenhagen, Dec. 4, 1800; died 1856. A Danish lyric poet, author of "Digte" (1838) and "Efterladte Digte" (1863).

Aargau (är'gou), F. Argovie (är-gö-vö'). A canton of Switzerland, capital Aarau, bounded by Baden on the north (separated by the Rhine), Zürich and Zug on the east, Lucerne on the south, and Basel, Solothurn, and Bern on the west. The language is German, and about half the population is Roman Catholic. It is one of the most fertile of the cantons, has an important trade and large manufactures, especially of cotton, and sends ten members to the National Council. Its area is 542 square miles, and its population (1888) 193,580. In the 13th century it came under the influence of the Hapsburgs, was annexed in part by the Swiss confederates in 1415, became a canton in 1798, and assumed its present form in 1803.

Aarhus, or Aarhuus (är'hös). The capital of the amt of Aarhus, Jutland, Denmark, on the Cattegat. It is the largest town in Jutland, and has important commerce, manufactures, and a cathedral. The bishopric was founded by Otto I. in the 10th century. Population (1890), 33,306.

Aarhus. An amt and stift in Jutland, Denmark.

Aarö (är'ö). A small island of Schleswig, Prussia, in the Little Belt.

Aaron (är'on or ar'on). [Gr. Ἀαρών, Heb. Aharón.] The first high priest of the Israelites, eldest son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi, and brother of Moses and Miriam. He died on Mount Hor at the age of 123 years.

Aaron, Saint. A British martyr who was put to death at Newport, Wales, in the reign of Diocletian.

Aaron. A character in Shakspeare's (?) "Titus Andronicus," a Moor of unnatural wickedness.

Aaron's confessions of his villainies (in "Titus Andronicus," v. 1) will recall to every reader the conversation between Barabas and Ithamore in the third scene of the second act of the "Jew of Malta" [of Marlowe]. The character of Aaron was either drawn by Marlowe or in close imitation of him; and it seems to me more reasonable to suppose that "Titus Andronicus" is in the main a crude early work of Marlowe's than that any imitator could have written with such marked power.

Bullen, Introd. to Marlowe's Works, p. lxxvii.

Aaron ben Asher (är'on ben ash'er). Lived at Tiberias in the first quarter of the 10th century. A Jewish scholar, probably belonging to the Karaitic sect. He completed the Massorah, i. e. the vowels and accents which make up the traditional text of the Hebrew Bible. His contemporary and opponent was a certain Ben Naftali. When these authorities differ, both readings are given in the rabbinical Bibles.

Aarsens (är'sens), Frans van. Born 1572; died 1641. A Dutch diplomatist, one of the foremost politicians of his age, guilty of promoting the condemnation of Barneveldt in 1619. His memoirs are important.

Aasen (ä'sen), Ivar Andreas. Born at Örsten, in Norway, Aug. 5, 1813. A Norwegian philologist, botanist, and poet: author of "Det norske Folkesprogs Grammatik" (1848), "Ordbog over det norske Folkesprog" (1850), later enlarged and issued under the title "Norsk Ordbog" (1873), and other works.

Aasvær (äs'vär). A group of small islands on the coast of Norway, nearly on the arctic circle, the seat of important herring-fisheries.

Ab (äb). The fifth month of the Hebrew ecclesiastical and the eleventh of the civil year; July-August. It was a Babylonian name, adopted by the Jews with the names of the rest of the months after the Babylonian exile. Its etymology is uncertain.

Ababdeh, or Ababde (ä-bäb'de). An African tribe, of Hamitic (Beja) race, living in Upper Egypt and northern Nubia, east of the Nile, about lat. 20°-22° N. Their number is estimated to be about 100,000.

Ababde (ä-bäb'de). A village in Egypt, on the Nile, about lat. 27° 50' N. It is near the site of the Roman city Antinoe.

Abaco (ä'bä-kö), Great, or Lucaya (lö-kä'yä). One of the principal islands of the Bahama group, West Indies, east of Great Bahama. It is about 80 miles long and 20 wide.

Abaco, Little. An island of the Bahamas, northwest of Great Abaco.

Abaddon (a-bad'on). [Heb., 'destruction': synonym of Sheel in the Old Testament (Job xxvi. 6 and xxviii. 22, Ps. lxxxviii. 12).] 1. The destroyer or angel of the bottomless pit: Apollyon. Rev. ix. 11.—2. The place of destruction; the depth of hell. Talmud; Milton, P. R., iv. 624.

Abadites. See Abaddites.

Abad y Queypeo (ä'bäñ ē kā-pä'ö), Manuel. Born in the Asturias about 1770; died in 1824. A Spanish ecclesiastic. Most of his life was spent in Mexico, and in 1809 he was made bishop of Michoacan, driven out soon after by the revolutionists, he returned in 1813. In 1820 he was deposed and sent a prisoner to Spain for opposition to the Inquisition. Released soon after, he became a member of the government junta and bishop of Tortosa. In 1823 he was again imprisoned by the Inquisition, and died in confinement.

Abæ (ä'bē), or Abai (ä'bä). [Gr. Ἀβαι.] In ancient geography, a city of Phocis, Greece, noted for its temple and oracle of Apollo.

Abafi (ä'bo-fē), or Apafi, Michael. Born Sept. 25, 1632; died April 15, 1690. A prince of Transylvania, under the protection of the Porte until 1686 when he made a treaty with the emperor. He was succeeded by his son Michael (born Aug. 14, 1682; died Feb. 11, 1713).

Abailard. See Abelard.

Abakansk (äb-ä-känsk'). A small town in the government of Yeniseisk, Siberia, near the Yenisei, north of Minusinsk, noted for the tumuli and hieroglyphic statues in its neighborhood.

Abaliget (ob'ä-lö-ge't). A village near Fünfkirchen, county of Baranya, Hungary, noted for its large stalactite cave (about 3,000 feet in length).

Abalus (ab'a-lus). An island abounding with amber, said (by Pytheas) to be in the Northern Ocean, and variously identified: probably a part of the Prussian Baltic coast.

Abamonti (ä-bä-mon'tö), or Albamonte (ä-bä-mon'te), Giuseppe. Born about 1759; died Aug. 8, 1818. A Neapolitan statesman, secretary-general under the Cisalpine Republic, 1798, and member of the executive committee at Naples. On the restoration of the monarchy in 1799 he was arrested and condemned to be hung, but was amnestied and returned to Milan, where he again acted as secretary-general until 1805 when he returned to Naples.

Abana (ab'a-nä). In ancient geography, a small river, the modern Barada, which flows through the plain and city of Damascus and is lost in the desert. Also Amana.

Abancay (ä-bän-ki'). A town in the department of Apurimac, Peru, about 110 miles southwest of Cuzco, noted for its sugar-refineries. Population, 3,000.

Abancay River. A small river of Peru, an affluent of the Apurimac, west of Cuzco, and crossed by the road to Lima. It was a military point of great importance in the civil wars of the 16th century. Here Alonso de Alvarado was defeated by the elder Almagro, and with his whole army captured, July 12, 1537. Near the same place Giron defeated Alonso de Alvarado, May 21, 1554.

Abano (ä'bä-nö). A town in the province of Padua, Italy, about 6 miles southwest of Padua, noted for its hot springs (the ancient Aqua Patavinæ or Aponus (Aponi) fons). It is the reputed birthplace of the historian Livy. Population, about 3,000.

Abano, Pietro d' (Petrus Aponus or de Apono). Born at Abano, Italy, 1250 (1246?); died at Padua, 1316 (1320?). An Italian physician and philosopher, denounced by the Inquisition as a magician. He wrote "Conciliator differentiarum que inter philosophos et medicos versantur" (printed 1472), "De venenis eorumque remediis" (printed 1472), etc.

Abarbanel. See Abrabanel.

Abarim (ab'a-rim). A mountainous region or lofty table-land in Palestine, east of the Dead Sea, containing Pisgah and Nebo.

Abaris (ab'a-ris). [Gr. Ἀβάρης.] A mythical Greek sage, surnamed "The Hyperborean," assigned to the 6th or 7th century B. C.

[Abaris] was said to have received from Apollo, whose priest he had been in his own country, a magic arrow, upon which he could cross streams, lakes, swamps, and mountains. This arrow he gave to Pythagoras, who in return taught him his philosophy. Oracles and charms under his name appear to have passed current among the Greeks. According to Pindar he came into Greece in the reign of Croesus. Eusebius places him a little earlier. Probably he was, like Anacharsis, a Scythian who wished to make himself acquainted with Greek customs. [It has been conjectured that the arrow of Abaris is a mythical tradition of the magnet, but it is hardly possible that if the polarity of the needle had been known it should not have been more distinctly noticed.—H. C. R.]
Ravlinson, Herod., III. 29, note.

Abasalo (ä-bä-sä'lö), Mariano. Born in Dolores, Mexico, 1783; died at Cadiz, Spain, 1819. A soldier in the Spanish army who joined the revolutionary movement of Hidalgo in 1810, and was named lieutenant-general of the insurgents. He was captured and sent a prisoner to Spain, where he died in confinement.

Abascal y Sousa (ä-bäs-käl' ē sö'sü), José Fernando. Born in Oviedo, Asturias, June 3, 1743; died in Madrid, June 30, 1821. A Spanish general and statesman, viceroy of Peru 1806-16. He was created Marquis de la Concordia Española del Peru (decree of May 20, 1812), and on his return to Spain was made captain-general.

Abasgi (a-bas'ji), or Abasci (a-bas'i), or Abasges (a-bas'jéz). [Gr. Ἀβασγοί, Ἀβασκοί.] A Scythian people anciently inhabiting a small region in the Caucasus, on the shore of the Black Sea, north of Colchis.

Abasgia (a-bas'ji-ä). The region occupied by the Abasgi; the modern Abkhasia.

Abassides. See Abassides.

Abate. See Abbate.

Abauzit (ä-bö-zé'), Firmin. Born at Uzès, Gard, France, Nov. 11, 1679; died at Geneva, March 20, 1767. A French philosopher and mathematician, a friend of Newton, Rousseau, and Voltaire. His name was used as a pseudonym by Voltaire.

Abayi (ä-bä-yé'). [Heb., 'my father.'] Born about 280 A. D.; died 338. A distinguished Hebrew scholar, surnamed "Nachmani." He was director of a celebrated Jewish academy at Pumbeditha in Babylonia, 333-338, and was held in high esteem for his learning and upright character.

Abb (äb). A town in Arabia, about 80 miles east of Mecha.

Abbadides (ab'a-didz), or Abadites (ab'a-dits). A Moorish dynasty of Seville. It was founded in 1023 by Abul-Kasim, cadi of Seville, and lasted till the capture of the city by the Almoravides in 1091.

Abbadie (ä-bä-dé'), Antoine Thomson d'. Born at Dublin, Ireland, Jan. 3, 1810. A French traveler (in company with his brother) in Abyssinia and the Galla country (1837-48). He published "Géodésie d'une partie de la Haute-Ethiopie" (1860-73), "Dictionnaire de la langue amarinnia" (1881), etc.

Abdemon (äb'dë-mön). See the extract.

The "wisdom" of Solomon is said to have provoked the Tyrians to match their wits against his. Solomon had sent Hiram certain riddles to test his sagacity, and had asked for a return in kind, wagering a good round sum upon the result. The contest terminated in Solomon's favour, and Hiram had to make a heavy payment in consequence. Hereupon, a Tyrian named Abdemon (Abdesmun?) came to the rescue, and vindicated the honour of his country by correctly solving all King Solomon's riddles, and proposing to him others, of which the Israelitish monarch, with all his intelligence, was quite unable to discover the solution. He was thus compelled to refund all the money that Hiram had paid him, and to forfeit a considerable amount in addition.

Abrahanel (ä-brä-bä-nel'), Isaac. Born at Lisbon, 1437; died at Venice, 1508. A Jewish scholar and statesman. His family claimed descent from the royal house of David. He was treasurer of Alfonso V., king of Portugal. On the death of this king he was deprived of his fortune, and being obliged to quit Portugal (1481), went to Madrid, where he remained eight years in the service of Queen Isabella. Forced to quit Spain after the expulsion of the Jews (1492), he proceeded to Naples and entered the service of King Ferdinand, and thence to Sicily and Corfu. He was a writer of distinction in the fields of philosophy and biblical exegesis. Also Abrahanel, Abrahanel, Barbanella.

Abtradatas (ab-ra-lä'tas). A king of Susa, first an enemy, then an ally, of the Persians under Cyrus. In the "Cyropædia" of Xenophon is told as an episode (our earliest sentimental romance) the story of the loves of Abtradatas and his wife Pantheia, which ends with the death of Abtradatas in battle and the suicide of Pantheia and her eunuchs.

Abraham (ä'bra-ham). [Biblical etymology 'father of multitudes' (Gen. xvii. 5); also called Abram, exalted father; possibly abü-râm, my father is the Exalted One. According to some Abraham is an ancient Aramaic dialectic form for Abram.] Flourished 2000 B. C. The first of the patriarchs and the founder of the Hebrew race. Many critical scholars do not consider Abraham a historical figure. The narrative in the 14th chapter of Genesis is especially considered historical and ancient. The date of the events there narrated is fixed by Hommel at 2150 B. C.; according to the usual chronology, 1918 B. C. Abraham is equally revered by Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans. He was buried in the cave of Machpelah (the double cave) at Hebron, now said to be inclosed by the Great Mosque (Haram) of that place.

Abu-rasau or Abram, Abraham's original name, occurs on early Babylonian contract-tablets.

Sayce, Anc. Monuments, p. 53.

Abraham, Plains of, or Heights of. An elevated plain just beyond Quebec to the southwest, along the river, the scene of the battle of Quebec. See under Quebec.

Abraham a Sancta-Clara (ä'brä-häm ä sink'-tä klä'ri). Born at Krähenheimstetten, near Messkirch, Baden, July 2, 1644; died at Vienna, Dec. 1, 1709. Hans Ulrich Megerle (or Megerlin), an Augustinian monk, court preacher at Vienna and satirical writer. He wrote "Judas der Arch-rascal" ("Judas der Erzscheim"), a satirico-religious romance (1686); "Gaek, gaek, Gaek a Ga of a marvellous hen in the duchy of Bavaria, or a detailed account of the famous pilgrimage of Maria Stern in Taxa" (1687), etc. His collected works fill 21 volumes.

Abraham ben Meir ibn Ezra (ä'bra-ham ben mä-er' b'n ez'ri). Born at Toledo, 1092; died 1167. A celebrated scholar of the Jewish-Arabic period in Spain, a philologist, poet, mathematician, astronomer, and Bible commentator. He had a good knowledge of Hebrew and Arabic grammar, and wrote a treatise on Hebrew grammar, "Sefer moznaim" (book of weights); also 150 poems, which are largely used in the Jewish liturgy. He commented on the entire Bible except the earlier prophets; drew the distinction between faith and reason, tradition and criticism; was the first biblical critic; wrote a work on Jewish philosophy and a metrical treatise on the game of chess; and traveled extensively in France, Italy, Spain, Greece, Africa, and England. He was known to medieval scholars as Avenare, said to be a corruption of Abraham Judæus.

Abraham Cupid. See Adam Cupid.

Abrahamites (ä'bra-ham-its). 1. A branch of the Paulicians, named from Abraham (Abraham) of Antioch, its founder.—2. A small sect of Bohemian deists living in the neighborhood of Pardubitz. They rejected nearly all the doctrines of the church, and professed to adopt the religion of Abraham before his circumcision.

Abraham-man (ä'bra-ham-man). Originally, a mendicant lunatic from Bethlehem Hospital, London. The wards in the ancient Bedlam (Bethlehem) bore distinctive names, as of some saint or patriarch. That named after Abraham was devoted to a class of lunatics who on certain days were permitted to go out begging. They wore a badge, and were known as Abraham-men. Many, however, assumed the badge without right, and begged, feigning lunacy. Hence the more common meaning came to be an impostor who wandered about the country seeking alms, under pretense of lunacy. From this came the phrase to sham Abraham, to feign sickness.

Abraham Newland. See Newland.

Abraham's Oak. An ancient oak or terebinth which long stood on the plain of Mamre, near Hebron in Syria, and was believed to be that under which the patriarch pitched his tent. Wheeler, Familiar Allusions.

Abraham the Jew and the Merchant Theodore. A medieval story, invented in support of the worship of images. "Theodore, ruined by a shipwreck and repulsed by his friends, borrows money from Abraham, invoking, as his only security, the great Christ set up by Constantine in the copper-market before the palace at Byzantium. Again Theodore loses all, and again the Jew trusts him. Theodore sails westward, and this time prospers. Wishing to repay Abraham, but finding no messenger, he puts the money in a box, and commits it, in the name of Christ, to the waves. It is washed to the feet of the Jew on the shore of the Sea of Marmora. But, when Theodore returns, Abraham, to try him, feigns that he has not received it. Theodore requires him to make oath before the Christ. And as Theodore, standing before the image, passionately prays, the heart of his benefactor is turned to faith in the surety of the friendless." Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 155.

Absolute (ab'sö-lüt'), Sir Anthony. A famous character in Sheridan's comedy "The Rivals," an obstinate, passionate, self-willed, but generous old man. The following passage exhibits his temper: "Sir Anth. So you will fly out! Can't you be cool like me? What the devil good can passion do? Passion is of no service, you impudent, insolent, over-bearing reprobate! There, you sneer again! don't provoke me! but you rely upon the mildness of my temper—you do, you dog! you play upon the meekness of my disposition! Yet take care, the patience of a saint may be overcome at last! but mark! I give you six hours and a half to consider of this; if you then agree, without any condition, to do everything on earth that I choose, why, confound you! I may in time forgive you." Sheridan, Rivals, ii. 1.

Absolute, Captain. In Sheridan's "Rivals," the son of Sir Anthony, a spirited soldier and persistent lover who appears as the impetuous Ensign Beverley (and is thus his own rival) to win the affections of the romantic Lydia Languish who seems a match with one so suitable as the son of Sir Anthony Absolute.

Abu-Simbel (ä'bö-sim'bel), or Ipsambul (ip-säm'böl). The ancient Aboneis or Abocois, a place in Upper Egypt situated on the Nile about lat. 22° 25' N., famous for its two rock-temples, one large and the other smaller, built in the steep face of a cliff by Rameses II. For the great temple the rock has been cut away to form a smooth façade about 100 feet wide and high, with a cornice of seated cynocephali. Before the façade are four enthroned colossi of Rameses, about 66 feet high, and comparatively perfect except for the splitting away of the head and arms of one. Over the central portal, in a rectangular niche, is a figure of Ra the sun-god. The first chamber of the interior is a large hall with 8 Osiride piers, and mural sculptures portraying the military deeds of Rameses. Beyond is a smaller pillared hall, then a vestibule before the sanctuary, which contains seated figures of Amen, Ptah, Horus, and Rameses himself. From the outer hall 8 lateral chambers, irregularly placed, are reached. The total depth in the rock of this temple is over 200 feet. The façade of the smaller temple displays six rectangular niches containing colossal figures in high relief. Between the two central niches is the portal, which leads to a hall supported by 6 square piers with Hathor capitals. From the hall extends a corridor with two small chambers and a sanctuary. The whole interior is sculptured. On the left leg of the injured colossus of the great temple is a Greek inscription, one of the most ancient specimens of Greek writing, recording that when Psammetichus came to Elephantine, the writers, whose names are given, came to the spot by way of Kerkis. It dates from 592 B. C.

Abusir (ä-bö-sër'). A small town in the Delta of Egypt, south-southwest of Cairo, the ancient Busiris, containing pyramids erected by kings of the 5th dynasty.

Abydos (ä-bi'dos). [Gr. ἡ Ἄβδος.] In ancient geography, a town in Upper Egypt on the west bank of the Nile, near the modern Arabat-el-Madfüeh, about lat. 26° 13' N., long. 31° 52' E., famous for a temple of Osiris built by Seti I., and also for a temple built by Rameses II. The former is described by Strabo as the "Memnonion." The plan is a square facing the northeast, with a large rectangular projection from the back of the southeast side. From the outer court is entered the long first hall, with three ranges of columns, and from it the second hall, with three ranges. Both these great halls are ornamented with reliefs. From the second hall there is access to an extensive series of chambers, corridors, and smaller halls, all decorated with colored reliefs. In one of the corridors is the chronologically important Tablet of Abydos. (See below.) A number of the chambers are covered with false vaults, cut to shape from flat lintels. The temple of Rameses is also dedicated to Osiris. It was a rectangle, preceded by a great inclosed court surrounded by Osiride figures. From the court two spacious central hypostyle halls are entered in succession, and from these open a number of chambers. The gateways were of red and black granite, and one chamber was wholly lined with alabaster. This temple, which was considerably smaller than that of Seti, is in a very ruinous state. See Abydos, Tablet of.

Abydos, or Abydus. In ancient geography, a town in Mysia, Asia Minor, on the Hellespont about lat. 40° 11' N., long. 26° 25' E., noted in the legend of Hero and Leander, and as the location of the Bridge of Xerxes.

Abydos, Bride of. A poem by Lord Byron, published in 1813.

Abydos, Tablet of. An inscription in a corridor of the temple of Seti I. at Abydos, giving a succession of 65 kings beginning with Menes, covering a period of about 2,200 years. A similar tablet containing 18 names, found in the temple of Rameses in 1818, was removed by the French consul-general, sent to Paris, and finally purchased for the British Museum.

Abyla (äb'i-lä). [Gr. Ἄβυλα or Ἄβύλα.] In ancient geography, a promontory in Africa, the modern Jebel Musa or Apes' Hill, opposite Calpe (Gibraltar); the two constitute the famous "Pillars of Heracles." Also Abyla Mons ('mountain') and Abyla Columna ('pillar').

Abyssinia (äb-i-sin'i-ä). [Arabic Habash,

'mixed'; referring to the character of the population.] A country of Africa, part of the ancient Ethiopia, bounded by Nubia and Sudan on the west and north, by the Italian possessions, Danakil country, and Adal on the east, and by the Galla country on the south; area (estimated), 190,000 square miles; population (estimated), 5,000,000. Its inhabitants are Ethiopians, Falasha (the Abyssinian Jews), Gallas, etc.; the prevailing language is Amharic; the prevailing religion that of the Ethiopian (Coptic) Church (founded in the 4th century by Frumentius, bishop of Axum); and the government a feudal monarchy under a Negus or emperor (Negus Negust, 'king of kings'). The present (1893) sovereign is Menelek II., who succeeded to the throne in 1889. The surface of the country consists mainly of table-lands with mountain-ranges reaching an elevation of about 15,000 feet. The climate is temperate and salubrious. The principal exports (through Massowah) are skins, ivory, butter, gums, and mules. The empire is divided into the Kingdoms of Tigre in the north, Anihara, Gofam in the west and center, and Shoa in the south; and there are many outlying territories and dependencies. The chief cities are Ankober, Gondar, and Adowa. Abyssinia was visited by the Portuguese in the 15th and 16th centuries in the search for the kingdom of Prester John. It was broken up into small monarchies down to the time of the adventurer Theodore who consolidated the kingdom, but was overthrown by the British expedition under Napier in 1868. Difficulties with Italy in 1887 and 1888 were followed by a treaty of "mutual protection" in 1889. This protectorate was abrogated by Menelek in 1893. Among the explorers of Abyssinia are Bruce, Gobat, Beke, Parkyns, Stern, and Markham.

Acacians (ä-kä'shiänz). A branch of the Arians, named from Acacius, surnamed "Monophthalmus" ('the one-eyed'), bishop of Casarea (died 363), which occupied a position between that of the Semi-Arians and the extreme Arians (Anomæans).

Academy (ä-kad'e-mi). The. [Fr. Académie.] A public pleasure-ground on the Cephissus, about one mile northwest of ancient Athens, on land said to have belonged, in the time of the Trojan war, to the hero Academus. It was surrounded with a wall by Hipparchus and further adorned by Cimon, the son of Miltiades, who bequeathed it to the citizens of Athens. It was the resort of Plato, who taught in its groves for nearly fifty years, till his death in 348 B. C.

Academy, The. The Platonic school of philosophy down to the time of Cicero; so called from the pleasure-ground above described. It is commonly divided into the Old, the Middle, and the New Academy. The chief representatives of the first were Speusippus, Xenocrates of Chalcædon, Polemo, Crates, and Crantor. The Middle Academy was founded by Arcesilaus about 244 B. C., and the New Academy by Carneades about 160 B. C. Sometimes the academies of Philo and Antiochus are spoken of as the fourth Academy and the fifth Academy, respectively.

Academy, French. [F. Académie française.] An association originating about 1629 in the informal weekly meetings of a few (8) men of letters in Paris, and formally established Jan. 2, 1635, by Cardinal Richelieu, for the purpose of controlling the French language and regulating literary taste. It consisted of forty members, the "forty immortals," the officers being a director and a chancellor, both chosen by lot, and a permanent secretary, chosen by votes. Among the objects provided for in the constitution was the preparation of a dictionary, a grammar, a treatise on rhetoric and one on poetry. In 1694 the first edition of the celebrated "Dictionnaire de l'Académie" appeared, while the seventh appeared in 1878. The Academy was suppressed by the Convention in 1793, but was reconstructed in 1795, under the name of the "Class of French Language and Literature," as part of the National Institute. Its original organization was restored by Louis XVIII. in 1816.

Academy, Royal Spanish. [Sp. Real Academia Española.] An academy founded at Madrid in 1713 by the Duke of Escalona, and established by royal confirmation in 1714. Its object is to cultivate and improve the national language.

[F. l'Académie des beaux arts.] An institution originating in a private association of painters in the 14th century, recognized by royal authority in 1648 under the name of Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and definitively constructed in 1655 by Cardinal Mazarin. At the creation of the National Institute in 1795 it was united with the Academy of Architecture, founded by Colbert in 1671, to form the fourth class of the institute; and since 1819 this class has borne the name of Academy of Fine Arts. It consists of 41 members, 10 honorary academicians, 10 foreign associates, and 40 correspondents. It publishes its memoirs and transactions as well as the "Dictionnaire général des beaux arts."

Academy of France at Rome. [F. Académie

de France à Rome.] A school of fine arts founded at Rome by Louis XIV., where those artists are sent, at the public expense, who obtain the great annual prizes of the Academy of Fine Arts at Paris. See Villa Medici.

Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres. [F. l'Académie des inscriptions et belles-lettres.] An association composed originally of four members, chosen by Colbert from among the members of the French Academy to draw up inscriptions for the monuments erected by Louis XIV. and the medals struck in his honor. It received a separate organization in 1701, which was confirmed by the letters patent of Louis XIV. in 1712, and was suppressed by the Convention in 1793; but at the creation of the National Institute in 1795 its members were incorporated in that body. In 1816 the title was restored by Louis XVIII. for the second class of the Institute. The present Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres consists of 40 members, 10 honorary academicians, and 8 foreign associates, with 50 corresponding members at home and abroad.

Academy of Medicine. [F. l'Académie de médecine.] A French academy founded in 1820 to preserve vaccine matter and act as a bureau of information to the government on sanitation and the public health. It is divided into three sections: medicine, surgery, and pharmacy. It publishes memoirs, and carries on an extensive correspondence.

Academy of Moral and Political Science, The. [F. l'Académie des sciences morales et politiques.] The fourth class of the French National Institute, founded in 1795, suppressed by Napoleon in 1803, and reestablished by Louis Philippe in 1832. It has 40 members, 6 honorary academicians, 6 foreign associates, and 48 corresponding members.

A scientific institution organized in 1812, and incorporated in 1817, possessing a valuable library relating chiefly to natural history, and an extensive collection of specimens in natural history. Its publications consist of a series of "Journals" from 1817 to date, and of "Proceedings" from 1841, besides which it also published "The American Journal of Conchology."

Academy of Sciences, The. [F. l'Académie des sciences.] An institution founded at Paris in 1666 by Colbert, approved by Louis XIV. in 1699, suppressed by the Convention in 1793, and reconstituted in 1795 as a class of the National Institute. It numbers 68 members, 10 honorary academicians, 8 foreign associates, and 100 corresponding members.

Academy of Sciences at Berlin, The Royal. [G. Die königliche Akademie der Wissenschaften.] An institution founded in 1700 by Frederick I. after plans submitted by Leibnitz, and opened in 1711. Its present constitution dates from 1812. It is divided into four sections: physical, mathematical, philosophical, and historical. The regular members are paid, and hold general meetings every Thursday and sectional meetings every Monday. Besides, there are foreign members, not to exceed 24, and honorary members and correspondents. It publishes "Abhandlungen" (till 1803 "Mémoires" and "Nouveaux Mémoires") and "Monatsberichte."

Academy of Sciences at Copenhagen, The Royal. [Dan. Det kongelige danske Videnskabskabernes Selskab.] An academy established as a private society in 1742, and received under the royal protection in 1743. Since 1742 it has published a series of transactions under the name of "Skriver," and since 1823 each of its two classes has also published independent memoirs under the name of "Afhandler."

Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg, The Imperial. An academy projected by Peter the Great with the assistance of Wolf and Leibnitz, and established by Catherine I., Dec. 21, 1725. It is composed of 15 professors, a president, and a director, with four adjuncts, who attend the meetings of the society, and succeed to vacancies. It has published "Commentarii Academici Scientiarum Imperialis Petropolitane" (14 volumes from 1728 to 1747); "Novi Commentarii Academici," etc. (20 volumes down to 1777); "Acta Academicæ," etc., of which two volumes appear annually.

Academy of Sciences at Stockholm, The, or The Royal Swedish Academy. A society, originally private, founded June 2, 1739, and incorporated March 31, 1741, as the Royal Swedish Academy. Its quarterly publications are issued in annual volumes, of which the first 40 (to 1779) form a series known as the "Old Transactions."

Academy, or Society, of Arcadians. A society founded in 1690 in Italy by Giovan Mario Crescimbeni and Gian Vincenzo Gravina. Its chief aim was to establish in literature the simplicity of the shepherds of the fabled golden age of Arcadia.

Acadia (a-kā'di-ā), Acadie (ā-kā-dē'). [Originally Laradia: Acadie is said to have been first used in 1603.] A former French colony in America, bounded by the Atlantic, the Gulf and River of St. Lawrence, and westward by a line running north from the mouth of the Penobscot. It was colonized by France in 1604, on the Bay of Fundy, and ceded to Great Britain by the treaty of Utrecht, 1713 (except Cape Breton). The French settlers in Nova Scotia were deported by the British in 1755.

Acadian Mountains (ā-kā'di-ān moun'tānz). An occasional name of the elevated region included between the Hudson, the lower St. Lawrence, and the Atlantic, and comprising the mountains of Canada, Maine, and the White and Green Mountains.

Acajutla (ā-kā-hōt'lā). A small seaport in Salvador, Central America, about 40 miles west of San Salvador.

Acampichtli, or Acampixtli (ā-kān-pēsh'tlē). [Aztec, 'handful of reeds.'] A chief, or so-called king, of the Aztecs of Mexico, who, according to the most probable chronology, was elected in 1375 and died in 1403. He led the Indians of Tenochtitlan in their wars with Tezpan, and canals and stone houses were first made in his time. His power was very limited.

Acapulco (ā-kā-pōl'kō). A seaport in Guerrero, Mexico, on the Pacific in lat. 16° 51' N., long. 99° 56' W. It has one of the best harbors in the country, and had a large commerce during the 17th and 18th centuries. Population, 5,000.

Acarmania, or Akarnania (ak-ār-nā-ni-ā). [Gr. Ἀκαρνανία.] In ancient geography, a division of Greece, bounded by the Ambracian Gulf on the north, by Amphiloehia on the northeast, by Ætolia on the east (partly separated by the Æheleus), and by the Ionian sea on the west. Its ancient inhabitants were the Leleges and Curetes. They were rude mountaineers, but were regarded as Greeks, and as such were allowed to participate in the Pan-Hellenic games.

Acarmania and Ætolia (ē-tō'li-ā). A nomarchy of modern Greece, having an area of 3,013 square miles. Its capital is Missolonghi. Population (1889), 162,020.

Acaste (ā-kāst'). A character in Molière's play "Le Misanthrope," a gay and brilliant marquis, a lover of Célimène.

Acasto (a-kas'tō). A character in Otway's play "The Orphan," a nobleman, the father of Polydoro and Castalio, retired from the court and living on his estates.

Acastus (a-kas'tus), or Akastos (-tos). [Gr. Ἀκαστος.] In Greek legend, a son of King Pelias or Iolcos, an Argonaut, and one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar. He was the father of Laodameia.

Acawais. See Accuwaes.

Acaxees (a-kaks'ēz). A native tribe (now extinct as such) in the state of Durango in northern Mexico. Traces of their language may yet be detected. They were described, in the last years of the 16th century and in the 17th, when first met with, as rather peacefully inclined, of sedentary habits, and as sorely pressed by their ferocious neighbors the Tepehuans.

Acca. See Acre.

Accad. See Akkad.

Accademia della Crusca (āk-kā-dā'mē-ā del'lä krōs'kā). [It., 'academy of the bran,'] a fanciful name alluding to its professed object of sifting or purifying the Italian language.] An academy founded at Florence in 1582 by the poet Grazzini, with the object of purifying the Italian language and literature. It published in 1812 the first edition of the "Vocabolario degli Accademici della Crusca," long the standard dictionary of the Italian language.

Accadians. See under Akkad.

Acca Larentia (āk'ā lu-ren'shi-ā). A mythical female personage in the early history of Rome, sometimes represented as a public woman who bequeathed her wealth to the citizens of Rome, sometimes as the wife of Faustulus and the nurse of Romulus and Remus. She seems to be of Etruscan origin and connected with the worship of the Lares. Also, improperly, Acca Lavinia.

Accawais (ā-kā-wā-ēz'). An Indian tribe of British Guiana, the small remnants of which inhabit the river-banks near the coast. They are allied in language to the Caribs, but are more savage and wandering in their habits, and are very treacherous. They often attack villages of the more civilized Indians. Also written Accaways, Accowinas, Akavais.

Acco (ak'ō). An old name of Acre.

Acciajuoli (ā-chā-yō-ō'liē), or Acciajoli (ā-chā-yō'liē), Nerio. A member of the Florentine family of that name, created Duke of Athens in 1394. The title was retained by his successors till 1456, when the Turks put an end to the domination of the Latins in Attica.

Acciajuoli, or Acciajoli, Niccolo. Died 1365. A wealthy Florentine banker and statesman. He served for many years as the chief adviser of Joanna, Queen of Naples, and was invested in 1358 with the barony and hereditary governorship of the fortress of Corinth.

When very young he emigrated with his father to Brazil. In 1833 he began the publication of a series of geographical works on the empire, of which he was made official chronicler.

Accius (ak'shi-us), Lucius. Born about 170 B. C.; died at an advanced age. A Roman tragic poet and prose writer, especially notable for his imitations from the Greek, though he dealt also with Roman subjects. Fragments of his tragedies have been preserved. Also Attius. [The forms Accius and Attius probably differ dialectically. In the MSS. that with ce greatly preponderates; on the other hand, in inscriptions the spelling of this name with t is far the more frequent.] Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (trans.), I. 191.]

Acco. See Acre.

Accolon (ak'ō-lon). A character in the "Morte d'Arthur," a knight of Gaul, celebrated for his combat with King Arthur, in which the latter sought to regain his enchanted sword and seaboard of which Accolon had gained possession through the aid of Morgan le Fay.

Accolti (āk-kōl'tō), Benedetto. Born at Arezzo, Italy, 1415; died at Florence, 1466. An Italian jurist and writer, chancellor of the republic of Florence 1459-66. He was the author of a history of the first crusade, "De Bello a Christianis contra Barbaros," etc. (1532), which served as the foundation of Tasso's "Gerusalemme liberata."

Accolti, Benedetto. Born at Florence, 1497; died 1549. An Italian cardinal (and legate in Ravenna) and poet, author of Latin poems collected in "Carmina illustrium Poetarum Italorum."

Accolti, Bernardo. Born about 1465; died about 1535. An Italian poet, son of Benedetto Accolti the elder. See the extract.

The same age gave the name of Unico to Bernardo Accolti, of Arezzo, born before 1466, and who died after the year 1534. Whenever this celebrated poet announced his intention of reciting his verses, the shops were shut up, and the people flocked in crowds to hear him. He was surrounded by flatterers of the first eminance; a body of Swiss troops accompanied him, and the court was lighted by torches. But, as Mr. Roscoe has justly remarked, there wanted one circumstance to crown his glory—that his works had perished with himself. Their style is hard and poor; his images are forced, and his taste is perverted by affectation. He has left us a comedy, La Virginia; some odes and terza rima; some lyric poetry; and some strambotti, or epigrams. Stenonidi, Lit. of the South of Europe, I. 428.

Accolti, Francesco. Born at Arezzo, 1418; died at Siena, 1483. An Italian jurist, professor of law at Bologna and Ferrara, and secretary to the Duke of Milan; brother of Benedetto Accolti the elder. He was one of the most notable jurists of his age.

Accolti, Pietro. Born at Florence, 1455; died at Florence, 1532 (1549?). An Italian cardinal and legate in Ancona (commonly called "Cardinal of Ancona"), brother of Bernardo Accolti. He is said to have had an important part in drawing up the bull against Luther, 1520.

Accomplished Fools, The. See The Tender Husband.

Accoramboni (āk-kō-rām-bō'nē), Virginia or Vittoria. Died at Padua, Dec. 22, 1585. The Duchess of Bracciano, an Italian lady of great beauty and wit. Her first husband, Francesco Peretti, whom she married in 1573, was murdered in 1581 at the instigation, it was said, of Paolo Giordano Orsini, Duke of Bracciano, whom she married. On his death, Nov. 13, 1585, she became involved in litigation with Lodovico Orsini concerning the inheritance, and was murdered by him. These events were altered and adapted by Webster in his tragedy "The White Devil, or Vittoria Corombona" (1612). Her history has been written by Gnoli (1870), and she was made the subject of a novel by L. Tieck, "Vittoria Accoramboni" (1840).

Accorso (āk-kōr'sō), Latinized Accursius (a-kēr'si-us), Buono. Born at Pisa about the middle of the 13th century. A classical scholar and rhetorician, commentator on Cæsar and other Latin authors. Also Buonaccorso.

Acestes (a-ses'tēz). [Gr. Ἀκίστης.] In Greek legend, a son of the Sicilian river-god Crimissus and Egesta (Segesta), a Trojan woman. He figured in the Trojan war, and was introduced by Vergil in the "Æneid."

Ach (äch). See Aa.

Achá (ä-chä'), José Maria. Born about 1805; died at Cochabamba, 1868. A Bolivian revolutionist. He served under Santa Cruz, 1829-33, and under Ballivian in the war against Peru, 1841. In 1858 he was made by President Linares minister of war, but revolted, and in May, 1861, was proclaimed president of Bolivia. He held his post during a period of great disorder until 1865, when he was deposed by another revolution.

Achæa. See Achaia.

Achæan League (a-kē'an lēg). 1. A religious confederation in Achaia, consisting at the time of Herodotus of twelve cities: Pellene, Ægeira, Ægea, Bura, Helike, Ægion, Rhyes, Patre, Phare, Olenos, Dyme, and Tritæa. Later Rhyes and Ægea fell into decay, and their places in the confederacy were taken by Leontion and Keryneia. In 373 B. C. the number of cities was reduced to ten by the destruction of Helike and Bura by an earthquake. A common sacrifice to Poseidon was held at Helike until that town was destroyed, when Ægion became the center of the confederation, and the common sacrifices were held in honor of Zeus Homazyrios and Demeter Panachæa, the chief divinities of Ægion. The confederacy was dissolved by the policy of Philip of Macedon and Alexander.

2. A political confederation of Achæan and other Greek cities extending over the period from 281 B. C. to 146 B. C. After the death of Lysimachus in 280 B. C., the Achæan cities Dyme, Patre, Tritæa, and Phare formed a confederation to resist the Macedonian domination, and were afterward joined by the other Achæan cities, except Olenos and Helike. In 251 B. C. the confederation acquired new strength by the accession of Sikyon, under the leadership of Aratus. In 245 B. C. Aratus was elected strategus of the league, which under his guidance rapidly rose to national importance. In a short time it embraced Athens, Ægina, Salamis, and the whole of Peloponnesus, with the exception of Sparta, Tegea, Orchomenos, Mantinea, and Elis. It was destroyed by the Romans in 146 B. C., and with it fell the last stronghold of freedom in Greece. The Achæan League is remarkable as the most perfect type of federal government which has been handed down from antiquity. The confederation was inseparable, every city having equal rights with the others; in foreign affairs the federal government was supreme. Common affairs were regulated at general meetings held twice a year by the citizens of all the towns. The principal officers were: two strategi (after 255 B. C. only one), who, in conjunction with the hipparchus or commander of the cavalry, and an under-strategus, commanded the federal army, and were intrusted with the conduct of war; a state secretary; and an apparently permanent council of ten demurgi, who appear to have presided at the great assemblies.

Achæi (a-kē'i'). [Gr. Ἀχαιοί.] The Achæans, one of the four principal races of the Greeks. Their chief place of abode were southern Thessaly and eastern Peloponnesus. The name is sometimes extended poetically to all the Greeks. In Homeric times they had a certain preponderance of influence over the other Hellenes.

Achæmenes (a-kem'ē-nēz). [Gr. Ἀχαιμένης. OPers. Makhāmāni, the friendly (Sayee).] The eponymous founder of the ancient Persian royal family of the Achæmenidæ: (the name was later used as a family name, as by one of the sons of Darius Hystaspis. See Achæmenidæ.)

Achæmenidæ (ak-ē-men'i-dē). An ancient royal family of Persia, founded about 600 B. C. The following are the names of its leading members: Achæmenes, Cyrus the Great, Cambyses (Gomates, the Magian usurper), Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes I., Artaxerxes I., Xerxes II., Sogdianos, Darius Ochus, Artaxerxes Mucnon, Ochus, Arses, Darius Codomanos. Also Achæmenidæ, Achæmenides, Achæmenidæ.

Achæus (a-kē'us), or Achaios (a-kī'os). [Gr. Ἀχαιός.] A Greek poet of Eretria in Eubœa, who flourished from about 484 B. C. to 448. He was the author of forty-four dramas, only fragments of which remain. The titles of seventeen are known. He contended with Sophocles and Euripides.

Achaia (a-kā'yä). [Gr. Ἀχαια.] 1. In ancient geography: (a) A small region in southern Thessaly, containing Phthia, hence called Achaia Phthiotis. It was probably the original home of the Achæan race, and it retained its name as late as the time of Herodotus. See the extract.

Achæa Phthiotis was the tract about Mount Othrys. Its sea-board reached from the middle of the Pagasæan gulf to the mouth of the Spercheius. Inland it once extended beyond Pharsalus, called anciently Phthia (Leake, iv. pp. 484, 485); but at this time its northern boundary seems to have been the line of hills stretching from Lake Xynias (Taukië) across to the gulf of Pagasæ, and terminating in the promontory of Pyrrha (Cape Aphakistra). Westward it was bounded by the Dolopians and Enianians.

Rauclinson, Herod., IV. 108, note.

(b) A mountainous district in the Peloponnesus, bordering on the Corinthian Gulf, north of Elis and Arcadia: originally named Ægialus or Ægialeia, that is, "The Coast." (c) The states forming the restored Achæan League, about 280-146 B. C. See Achæan, 2. (d) A Roman province, of uncertain limits, but nearly corresponding to modern Greece, formed probably in the 1st century B. C. Its northern boundary was probably drawn south of Thessaly and Epirus. The province was abolished by Nero, but was reestablished by Vespasian. 2. A medieval Frankish principality in Greece, corresponding generally to the Peloponnesus.

Achaia and Elis (ē'is). A nomarchy in modern Greece. Area, 1,901 square miles. Population (1889), 210,713.

Acheron (ak'ē-ron). [Gr. Ἀχέρων; probably derived from Heb. ah'rōn, the west, i. e. the direction of the setting sun, darkness; hence its connection with Hades.] 1. In ancient geography, the name of several small rivers, of which the chief, the modern Gurla, was in Thesprotia in Epirus. It flowed through the lake Acherusia, received the waters of the Coxytus (the modern Vuvos), and emptied into the Ionian sea.

2. In classical mythology, a river in Hades, and later the Lower World in general.

Acherusia Palus (ak-ē-rō'si-ä päl'us). [L. 'Acherusian bog,' Gr. Ἀχέρουσία λίμνη.] In ancient geography, the name of several small lakes supposed to be connected with the lower world. The most important were the lake through which the Acheron flowed, and one 11 miles west of Naples, the modern Lago del Fusaro. Like Acheron, the name was transferred to the lower world.

Achill, or Achil (ak'il), or Eagle Island. An island in the county of Mayo, Ireland, off the western coast in lat. 54° N., long. 10° W. Area, 80 square miles.

Achilleis (ak-i-lē'is), or Achilleid (ak-i-lē'id). 1. An unfinished epic poem by P. Papius Statius.—2. A part of the Iliad, comprising Books I, VIII, XI-XXII, regarded by some critics as constituting a poem of which the theme is the "wrath of Achilles," and which is distinct from, and older than, the rest of the Iliad. See Iliad. The name "Achilleis" was first applied to these books by Grote.—3. A poem by Goethe.

Achilles (a-kil'ēz). [Gr. Ἀχιλλεύς.] A Greek legendary warrior, son of Peleus and Thetis and grandson of Ææeus, and chief of the Myrmidons, a Thessalian tribe. He is the central hero of the Iliad, which is largely occupied with his quarrel with Agamemnon, leader of the Greek host, and his martial exploits. He was the slayer of Hector, and was himself slain by Paris.

In Achilles, Homer summed up and fixed forever the ideal of the Greek character. He presented an imperishable picture of their national youthfulness, and of their ardent genius, to the Greeks. The "beautiful humanism" of Achilles, his strong personality, his fierce passions controlled and tempered by divine wisdom, his intense friendship and love that passed the love of women, above all, the splendor of his youthful life in death made perfect, hovered like a dream above the imagination of the Greeks, and insensibly determined their subsequent development. At a later age, this ideal was destined to be realized in Alexander.

Symonds, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 20.

Achilles. An opera by Gay produced at Covent Garden in 1733. Colman the elder brought out "Achilles in Petticoats," altered from Gay, in the same year.

Achmet (äch'met) I., or Ahmed (äh'med). Born 1589; died Nov. 22, 1617. A sultan of Turkey, son of Mohammed III. whom he succeeded in 1603. He concluded, Nov. 11, 1606, the peace of Silyatorok with Austria, when for the first time the Turks observed the principles of an international law in their diplomatic relations with Christian nations. In 1612 he concluded an unsuccessful war with Persia.

Achmet II., or Ahmed. Born 1642; died Feb. 6, 1695. A sultan of Turkey, brother of Solyman II. whom he succeeded July 13, 1691. His forces were expelled from Hungary by the battle of Salankemen, Aug. 19, 1691, in which the grand vizir Koprülü the Virtuous was defeated and slain by the Austrians under Louis of Baden.

Achmet III., or Ahmed. Born 1673; assassinated 1736. A sultan of Turkey 1703-30, brother of Mustafa II. whom he succeeded. He was involved by Charles XII. (who, after the battle of Pultowa in 1709, took refuge first in Otechakoff, then in Bender) in a war with Russia, which was ended by the Peace of the Pruth, 1711 (see Pruth); took Morea and the Ionian Islands from Venice, 1715; was defeated at Peterwardein in 1716 and at Belgrad in 1717 by the Austrians under Prince Eugene; and signed the treaty of Passarowitz in 1718 (see Passarowitz). He was compelled by the janizaries to resign, and died of poison in prison.

Achmet, or Ahmed, Bey. Died July 16, 1822. A Turkish commander in the Greek war of independence. He was repulsed by the Greeks, May 27, 1821, in an attack on the fortified post at Valteta.

Achmet, or Ahmed, Kiuprili. Born 1635; died 1676. Grand vizir of the Ottoman empire from 1661 to 1676. He added Candia, Neuhausel in Hungary, and Kamieniec in Poland to the empire.

Achmetha. See Ecbatana.

Achomawi (ä-chö-mä'wi). An almost extinct tribe of North American Indians. See Palatuhian.

Acilia gens (ä-sil'i-ä-jenz). In ancient Rome, a clan or house whose family names were Aviola, Balbus, and Glabrio. Members of the last two families were frequently tribunes of the plebs.

Acireale, or Acireale (ä'chê-re-ä'le). A city in the province of Catania, Sicily, situated on the eastern coast 9 miles north-northeast of Catania. Near it are the grotto of Galatea, the cave of Polyphemus, and the Rocks of the Cyclops. Population, about 22,000.

Acis (ä'sis). [Gr. Ἄκισ.] In classical mythology, a beautiful Sicilian, son of Faunus and Symæthis, beloved by Galatea, and slain by Polyphemus the Cyclops, his unsuccessful rival. He was crushed under a rock, and his blood as it flowed forth was changed into the river Acis.

Acis and Galatea. A pastoral opera by Handel composed in 1720 or 1721. The words are by Gay, with additions from Pope, Hughes, and Dryden. "Acis, Galatea e Polifemo" is another work by Handel composed in Italy in 1708-09. Grece.

Acis et Galatée (ä-sêz' ä-gä-lä-tä'). An opera by Lulli (words by Campistron) produced in 1686.

Ackermann, Johann Christian Gottlieb. Born Feb. 17, 1756; died at Altorf, Bavaria, March 9, 1801. A German medical writer, author of "Institutiones historice medicinæ" (1792), and lives of Hippocrates, Theophrastus, Dioscorides, Aretæus, Rufus Ephesinus, and Galen.

Ackermann, Konrad Ernst. Born in Schweirin, Germany, Feb. 1, 1712; died at Hamburg, Nov. 13, 1771. A noted German actor. He appeared on the stage first in Lüneburg (Jan., 1740), traveled with various companies for several years, and erected and conducted a theater in Hamburg (1764-67). He is regarded as the founder of the German school of acting.

Ackermann, Rudolph. Born at Schneeberg, Saxony, April 20, 1764; died March 30, 1834. A German art-publisher and bookseller in London, son of a coach-builder and harness-maker, whose trade he, for a time, followed. The establishment of lithography as a fine art in England is credited to him.

Acklin Island (ä'k'lin i'land). A long island in the group of the southern Bahamas.

Acla (ä'kli). A town on the Caribbean side of the Isthmus of Panama, probably near the bay of San Blas. It was founded by Pedrarias in 1515, and was the place where Balboa built his ships to be transported across the isthmus in 1517, and where he was executed. The settlement, for a time important, was abandoned before 1580.

Acland (ä'k'land), Lady Christian Henrietta Caroline (commonly known as Lady Harriet). Born Jan. 3, 1750; died at Tetton, near Taunton, England, July 21, 1815. A daughter of the first earl of Ichester, and wife of Major John Dyke Acland whom she accompanied through Burgoyne's campaign in 1777. Her adventures formed a noteworthy incident of the Revolutionary War.

Acland, Henry Wentworth. Born Aug. 23, 1815. An English physician, regius professor of medicine in the University of Oxford. He accompanied the Prince of Wales to America in 1860, and later was appointed his honorary physician.

Acland, John Dyke. Died at Pixton Park, near Dulverton, England, Oct. 31, 1778. An English soldier and politician. As member of Parliament he was a vigorous opponent of the demands of the American colonies, and, as major of the 20th Foot, joined Burgoyne's expedition during the Revolutionary War. He was wounded in the second battle of Saratoga and taken prisoner. During the campaign he was accompanied by his wife. See Acland, Lady.

Aclia-huasi (äk-lyä-wä'se). In the Inca empire of Peru, a general name given to any convent of virgins dedicated to the sun; in particular, the great convent at Cuzco where virgins of royal lineage were kept in rigid seclusion. Its site is now covered by the Roman Catholic convent of Santa Catalina, but remains of the old wall are discernible.

Acemiteæ (ä-sê-mi'te). [L.; Gr. ἀκοιμηταί, 'the sleepless ones' or watchers.] A monastic order founded by Alexander, a Syrian monk, about 430. The day was divided into three parts during each of which one third of the monks carried on their devotions so that the worship in the monastery was unceasing.

Acolastus (ä-k-ä-las'tus). A Latin comedy composed by Gulelmus Fullonius (Willem de Volder), a schoolmaster of The Hague, and translated into English prose and published in 1540 by John Palsgrave with the Latin version: first acted in 1529. It was designed for use in schools, and there were forty different issues of it during the lifetime of the author.

Acolhuas (ä-k-ä-lö'üz). A branch of the Nahuatl tribe of central Mexico, reported by tradition to have preceded the Aztecs in the occupation of the valley of Mexico, and to have been the founders of the Indian settlement at Tezcuco. Also Acolhuans.

Acoma (ä'kö-mä). [Properly Ako, but, with the affix -ma, indicative of tribe or people, corrupted into Acoma or Akoma.] An Indian village of western New Mexico, situated about 14 miles south of the station of Cubero on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad in Valencia County. Acoma was first visited by the Spaniards under Coronado in Sept., 1540, and appears in the chronicles of that time as Acuco (a corruption of Ha-ku-kia).

Acoma. A tribe of North American Indians, about 550 in number, inhabiting the pueblo of the same name in western New Mexico. This and Isleta are the only pueblos occupying the same site since the Spanish invasion in the 16th century. It includes the summer villages of Acomita and Puellito. See Keresan.

Acomat (ä-kö-mä'). In Racine's tragedy "Bajazet," an ambitious vizir.

Aconagua (ä-kon-kä'gwä). A province in central Chile, bounded by Coquimbo on the north, and by Santiago and Valparaiso on the south. Capital, San Felipe. Area, 5,840 square miles. Population (1891), 153,049.

Aconagua, Mount. One of the highest peaks of the Andes, situated in the provinces of San Juan and Mendoza, Argentina, about lat. 32° 31' S., long. 69° 50' W. Height, 22,860 feet (Güssfeldt).

Aconcio (ä-kon'chö), Giacomo. Born at Trent, Tyrol, about 1500; died at London, about 1566. An Italian theologian and engineer, a refugee in England in the time of Queen Elizabeth, to whom he dedicated his "Stratagemata Satanae" (1565). Also Aconzio, Concio, and Latinized Acontius (Jacobus).

Acontius (ä-kon'shi-us). The principal charaeter in the tale of Acontius and Cydippe, told by Aristænetus and by Ovid. "Acontius gathered an orange in the garden of Venus, and having written on the rind the words, 'By Artemis, I will marry Acontius,' threw it in Cydippe's way. She took it in her hand, read out the inscription, and threw it from her. But Artemis heard the vow, and brought about the marriage." William Morris has taken the legend for the subject of one of his poems in "The Earthly Paradise."

Acontius, Jacobus. See Aconzio.

Acordad (ä-kör-tä'tä'). A court established at Querétaro, New Spain (Mexico), for the summary trial of brigands and other criminals. It originated in an old Spanish institution, the Santa Hermandad, which was originally a kind of vigilance committee, was subsequently converted into a regular police force and tribunal, and after 1631 had courts in Spanish America. In 1719 the Querétaro court, or acordad, was given independent powers, and it was ordered that there should be no appeal from it; its officers had jurisdiction throughout New Spain. The court was suppressed in 1813, but its methods are still in vogue in Mexico.

Açores. Same as Azores.

Acosta (ä-kos'tä), Christovão de. Died 1580. A Portuguese traveler and naturalist, author of "Tratado de las drogas y medecinas de las Indias orientales" (1578).

Acosta, Gabriel (later Uriel) de. Born at Oporto, Portugal, about 1591; committed suicide, 1647 (1640?). A Portuguese philosopher and Jewish proselyte from Catholicism. He was excommunicated by the synagogue at Amsterdam on account of rationalism. His autobiography was published under the title "Exemplar vite humane" (1687).

Acosta, Joaquin. Born in Guaduas, Colombia, about 1795; died at Bogotá, 1852. A Colombian soldier and historian. He entered Bolivar's army in 1819, and before his death had attained the rank of general. He was also a member of congress and held important diplomatic posts. Besides traveling and conducting extensive investigations in Colombia, he visited Spain in 1845 to search the archives there, and spent several years in Paris where he published his "Compendio histórico del descubrimiento y colonización de la Nueva Granada" (1848).

Acosta, José de. Born at Medina del Campo, Old Castile, 1540; died at Salamanca, Feb. 15, 1600. A Spanish Jesuit historian and archaeologist.

He went to Peru in 1571, was historiographer of the council of bishops at Lima 1582-83, in 1586 resided for some time in Mexico, returned to Spain in 1587, visited Rome in 1590, was subsequently at the head of the Jesuits' College at Valladolid, was visitor in Aragon and Andalusia, and finally had charge of the College at Salamanca. The first two books of his "Natural and Moral History of the Indies," in Latin, appeared at Salamanca in 1588 and 1589; the entire work in Spanish at Seville in 1590. There are many editions in Spanish, Latin, Italian, French, Dutch, German, and English. He also published the "Concilium Limense" (Rome, 1589), "De pronuntiatione evangelii apud barbaros" (1589), and various theological treatises in Latin.

Acqua (ä'kwä), Cesare dell'. Born at Pirano, Istria, July 22, 1821. A painter of portraits and historical subjects.

Acquapendente (ä'kwä-pen-den'te). A small town in the province of Rome, Italy, 67 miles northwest of Rome.

Acquaviva (ä-kwä-vë'vä). A town in the province of Bari, Italy, 18 miles south by west of Bari. Population, about 8,000.

Acqui (ä'kwë). A town in the province of Alessandria, Italy, the ancient Aque Statiellæ, situated on the Bormida 29 miles northwest of Genoa, noted for hot sulphur baths. It has a cathedral and silk-worm industry. Population, about 10,000.

Acraë (ä'krë). [Gr. Ἀκραί.] In ancient geography, a city of Sicily, a colony of Syracuse, on the site of the modern Palazzolo Aereide (which see).

Acragas, or Akragas (ä'krä-gas). [Gr. Ἀκράγας.] The Greek name of Agrigento.

Acrasia (ä-krä'zi-ä). [Gr. ἀκρασία, intemperance, immoderateness.] In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," a beautiful woman, the personification of intemperance in all things, living in the "Bower of Bliss," in which is everything to delight the senses. She was suggested by Circe and, more directly, by the Alcina of Ariosto.

Acrates (äkrä'tëz). [Gr. ἀκρατής, intemperate.] A male character in the "Faerie Queene," by Spenser, personifying the intemperate love of pleasure.

Acraë (ä'kër or ä'kër), or Saint-Jean d'Acraë. A seaport in Palestine, Asiatic Turkey, on the bay of Acraë about lat. 32° 56' N., long. 35° 4' E.: the ancient Acea, Aeco (Ἀκρά, Ἀκχῶ), the scriptural Achoo, and the later Ptolemais. It is one of the chief ports for the Palestine coast. It was in the territory assigned to the tribe of Asher (Judges i. 31), but was never conquered by the Israelites. Its kings were reckoned next to those of Tyre and Sidon. It was conquered by the Assyrian king Sennacherib and captured and ruined by his grandson Assurbanipal. It was captured by the Arabs in 638, by the Crusaders in 1104, by Saladin in 1187, and by the Crusaders in 1191; and was held by the Knights of St. John until 1291, being the last stronghold in Palestine to hold out for the Christians. Sir Sidney Smith defended it successfully against Napoleon in 1799. In 1832 it was taken by Ibrahim Pasha, and in 1840 by the Anglo-Austrian-Turkish forces. It was named Saint-Jean d'Acre by the Knights of St. John. Population, 8,000.

As Ptolemais, Akko played a most important part in the Græco-Roman age; as Acre, it has been famous in history from the period of the Crusades to times within our own memory. It occupied the north-western extremity of the great bay which indents the Syrian coast north of Carmel, a bay eight miles across and about four miles deep. Its own haven was small and exposed; but on the opposite side of the bay, under Carmel, was the sheltered roadstead of Haifa; and either at Akko or at Haifa vessels could ride securely in almost all sorts of weather. The great importance of Akko was that it commanded the entrance to the broad plain of Esdraelon, conducting to the rich valley of the Jordan, and so was, in a certain sense, as it was often called, "the key of Palestine." Its kings were reckoned next in rank to those of Tyre and Sidon during the Assyrian period; and we find them taking part in the wars which were carried on by Shalmaneser IV. and Sennacherib. Ravelinon, Phœnicia, p. 53.

Acre, Bay of. An indentation on the western coast of Palestine, north of Mount Carmel.

Acrelius (ä-kra'li-ös), Israel. Born at Osteraker, Sweden, Dec. 25, 1714; died at Fellingsbro, Sweden, April 25, 1800. A Swedish clergyman, author of a history of the Swedish colonies in America (1759, Eng. trans. 1874).

Acres (ä'kërs), Bob. A character in Sheridan's comedy "The Rivals," an awkward and simple country gentleman changed into a boasting coward by the sudden excitement of the gaieties of Bath society. His brag and his ludicrous vanity and assurance are combined with a comic trepidation and an uneasy gaiety. The part has been modified by the actors.

Acri (ä'krë). A small town in the province of Cosenza, southern Italy, situated on the Mucuno about 13 miles north-northeast of Cosenza.

Acrisius (a-kris'i-us). [Gr. Ἀκρίσιος.] In Greek mythology, a king of Argos, father of Danaë.

Acrocerania (ak'rö-së-rä'ni-ä), or Acroke-raunia (ak-rö-ke-rä'ni-ä). [Gr. τὰ ἄκρα κερωνία, the thunder-smitten peaks.] In ancient geography, a promontory which projects from the northwestern part of Epirus into the Ionian sea, about lat. 40° 27' N., long. 19° 20' E.: the modern Greek Glossa and Italian Linguetta. The name is sometimes incorrectly extended to the whole range of Ceraunian Mountains (which see).

Acro-Corinthus (ak'rö-kö-rin'thus). A height (over 1,800 feet) covered with ruins, under the northern slope of which lies the city of Corinth, Greece: celebrated for its extensive view. The medieval fortifications form a triple line, 1½ miles in circuit, below the summit. Of the ancient fortifications, the celebrated temple of Apphrodite, and other religious foundations, the remains are very scanty. The most interesting relic of antiquity is the vaulted subterranean well-house of the famed fountain Pirene. The view from the summit is of remarkable grandeur, and embraces many of the storied sites and mountains of Greece.

Acropolis (a-krop'ö-lis). [Gr. ἄκρο-πόλις, the upper city, from ἄκρος, highest, upper, and πόλις, city.] A general name for the citadel of an ancient Greek city, but especially appropriated to that of Athens, famous for the placing on its summit in the 5th century B. C. of the highest achievements of Greek art, the Parthenon and the Erechtheum, with the sculptures which adorned them without and within, and the Propylæa, or monumental gate, inside of the walls at the west end. The Acropolis is a precipitous rock which rises about 260 feet above the city, and extends 1,000 feet from east to west, and 400 in its greatest width. It was the site of the earliest Athens known to history, was strongly fortified, and contained the palace of the king until the expulsion of the Pisistratids. From this time it ceased to be inhabited, and was reserved as sacred ground and as a last refuge in time of danger. It was taken and sacked by the Persians in 480 B. C.; shortly afterward its fortifications were strengthened and completed and its area increased by retaining walls and filling, especially by Cimon, who had much to do with devising the plans for monumental embellishment which were carried out under Pericles. The ancient entrance to the Acropolis was on the southwest, by a narrow, winding path commanded by the battlements above. Among the other monuments of the Acropolis are the pre-Persian temple of Athena, correctly identified and studied by Dörpfeld in 1885, the colossal bronze statue by Phidias of Athena Promachos, and the temple of Wingless Victory. The slopes of the Acropolis were occupied by important foundations, particularly on the south, where lie the Odeum of Herodes, the sanctuary of Æsculapius, and the Dionysiac theater. Under the medieval Franks and Turks the Acropolis was the citadel and abode of the dukes and pashas. The Parthenon was in turn cathedral and mosque; the Propylæa became the palace and government offices; and the Erechtheum, after being a church, was fitted as the pasha's harem. These great monuments remained comparatively unharmed until a late date in the Turkish domination. The Propylæa were shattered by an explosion of gunpowder induced by lightning, the Erechtheum was destroyed by the over-weighting of the roofs in the effort to make them bomb-proof, and the Parthenon was cut in two in 1687, during the Venetian siege of Athens under Königsmark, by a bomb purposely shot into the powder stored in it.

Acropolita (ak'rö-pö-li'tä), George. Born at Constantinople in 1220; died Dec., 1282. A Byzantine historian and diplomat, employed by the emperor Michael Palæologus in the negotiations with Popes Clement IV., Gregory X., John XXI., Nicholas III., and Martin IV., to reunite the Greek and Latin churches. He wrote a history of the Byzantine empire from 1204 to 1261.

Äcs (äch). A village in the county of Komorn, Hungary, situated on the Danube west of Komorn: the scene of several contests between the Austrians and Hungarians in 1849.

Acta Apostolorum (ak'tä a-pos-tö-lö'rum). See Acts of the Apostles.

Acta Diurna (ak'tä di-ër'nä). [L., 'events of the day.'] A Roman "official daily chronicle, which, in addition to official reports of events in the imperial family, and state and city affairs, contained regulations by the magistrates, transactions and decrees of the senate, accidents, and family news communicated to the editors. The Acta were publicly exhibited on a whitened board (albua), which any one might read and copy; and there were men who made a business of multiplying and transmitting such news to the provinces. After a time the originals were placed among the state archives for the benefit of those who wished to consult them" (Seyffert, Dict. of Class. Antiq. Ed. by Nettleship and Sandys). The publication of such news was made official by Cæsar; it ceased, apparently, on the transfer of the capital to Constantinople. The eleven fragments of "Acta (diurna) populii" first published in 1615 (called "fragmenta Dowdelliana," from Dowdell the chief defender of their genuineness) are now regarded as spurious.

Actæon (ak-të'on). [Gr. Ἀκταίων.] In Greek mythology, a hunter, son of Aristæus and Autonoe, daughter of Cadmus, who, having seen Artemis (Diana) bathing, was changed by her into a stag and torn in pieces by his own dogs. Other accounts of his death are given.

Acta Eruditorum (ak'tä e-rö-di-tö'rum). [L., 'acts of the learned': with reference to the Roman 'acta,' or official records. See Acta Diurna.] The first German literary periodical, founded by Otto Mencke at Leipsic, 1682, and discontinued 1782. After his death his son J. E. Mencke became editor. In 1732 the title was changed to "Nova Acta Eruditorum"—a new series edited by another son, F. O. Mencke.

Acta Martyrum (ak'tä mär'ti-rum). See Acta Sanctorum.

Acta Pilati (ak'tä pi-lä'ti). A spurious report said to have been sent by Pilate to Tiberius on the trial and death of Christ.

Acta Sanctorum (ak'tä sang-kö'tö'rum). [L., 'the deeds of the saints': with reference to the Roman 'acta,' or official records.] A name applied generally to all collections of accounts of saints and martyrs, both of the Roman and Greek churches; specifically, the name of a work begun by the Bollandists, a society of Jesuits, in 1643. It now consists of sixty-one folio volumes, including an index published in 1875.

Actium (ak'shi-um). [Gr. Ἄκτιον.] In ancient geography, a promontory on the northwestern coast of Ætarnania, Greece, about lat. 38° 56' N., long. 20° 46' E. The ancient peribolos or sacred inclosure, rectangular in plan and built in opus reticulatum, the seat of the famous Actian games of Augustus, still remains. Recent excavations have laid bare extensive ruins of several successive temples, the latest of which is that dedicated by Augustus after the victory of B. C. 31. A famous naval battle was fought near Actium between Octavius and Mark Antony and Cleopatra Sept. 2, 31 B. C. It was decided by the flight of Cleopatra. Antony's land forces surrendered to Octavius. The victory secured for the latter supreme rule over the Roman dominion.

Actius Syncerus. The academical name of Sanazzaro.

Acton (ak'ton). A suburb of London in the county of Middlesex, 8 miles west of St. Paul's. Population (1891), 24,207.

Acton, Charles Januarius Edward. Born at Naples, March 6, 1803; died there, June 23, 1847. The second son of Sir John Francis Edward Acton. He entered the service of the Pope, was made cardinal in 1842, and played an important part in papal politics, especially in matters relating to England.

Acton, Eliza. Born at Battle, England, April 17, 1799; died at Hampstead, Feb. 13, 1859. An English poet and prose writer, best known as the author of "Modern Cookery" (1845).

Acton, Sir John Francis Edward. Born at Besançon, France, 1736; died at Palermo, Aug. 12, 1811. An officer in the naval service of France and afterward (1799) of Tuscany, generalissimo and prime minister at Naples during the French revolutionary epoch. In December, 1798, after the successes of the French in northern Italy, Acton fled (with the king and queen) to Palermo, but was soon restored to Naples where he established a reign of terror, committing to prison and executing many citizens on the authority of the Junta. In 1804 he was removed on the demand of France.

Acton, Thomas C. Born 1823. An American banker and public official, president of the board of New York police during the draft riots in 1863.

Actors' Vindication, The. See Apology for Actors.

Acts of the Apostles. A book of the New Testament, a continuation of the third gospel (Luke), and, according to a uniform tradition, by the same author. It is a history of the early progress of Christianity after (and including) the ascension of Christ.

Acuco. See Acoma.

Acuña (ä-kön'yä), Cristoval de. Born at Burgos, Spain, 1597; died at Lima, Peru, probably before 1655. A Jesuit missionary and author. He was rector of the College of Cuenca, near Quito. In 1639 he accompanied Pedro Teixeira on his voyage down the Amazon, and in 1641 published at Madrid his "Nuevo descubrimiento del gran río de las Amazonas," which is the first clear account of that river. The original edition of this work is very rare, but there are later ones in various languages. It appears that Acuña visited Rome as procurator of his province before returning to Peru.

Acuña y Bejarano (ä-kön'yä é bá-jä-rä'nö), Juan de, Marquis of Casa Fuerte. Born at Lima, Peru, 1657; died at Mexico, 1734. A Spanish-American soldier and administrator. He was governor of Messina, viceroy of Aragon and Mallorca, member of the supreme council of war, and viceroy of New Spain from 1722 until his death.

Acuña, Hernando de. Died 1580. A Spanish poet and soldier. He served in the expedition of Charles V. against Tunis. At the request of the emperor he translated Olivier de la Marche's "Le chevalier delibéré." His poems were published after his death, under the title "Varias Poesias" (1591).

Acusilaus (a-kü-si-lä'us). [Gr. Ἀκουσίλαος.] An ancient Greek commentator on, or prose paraphrast of, the Theogony of Hesiod. He was born at Argos probably about the middle of the 6th century B. C., and was by some regarded as one of the seven wise men.

Ada (ä'dä). [The Greek form of the Hebrew name.] See Adah.

Adad. See Hadad.

Adafudia, or Adafodia (ä-dä-fö'di-ä). A town in the western part of Sudan, Africa, in lat. 13° 6' N., long. 1° 3' E. Population, about 25,000 (?).

Adam (ad'am). [Heb. Adäm.] 1. The first man; the father of the human race, according to the account of the creation in Genesis.

Like cherub, Adam also was a Babylonian word. It has the general sense of "man," and is used in this sense both in Hebrew and in Assyrian. But as in Hebrew it has come to be the proper name of the first man, so, too, in the old Babylonian legends, the "Adamites" were "the white race" of Semitic descent, who stood in marked contrast to "the black heads" or Accadians of primitive Babylonian. Sayce, Anc. Monuments, p. 31.

2. A character in Shakspeare's "As you Like it," an old and faithful servant of Oliver, but following the fortunes of Orlando. There is a tradition that Shakspeare himself acted this part.

Adam Cupid. A nickname of Cupid in Shakspeare's "Romeo and Juliet" (ii. 1). Some commentators contend that the name should be "Abram" (the quartos (2-5) and folios have "Abraham"), a corruption of "anburn," as "up" is frequently represented with anburn or yellowish hair. Others agree with Upton in the following extract.

Shakspeare wrote "Young Adam Cupid," &c. The printer or transcriber gave us this "Abram," mistaking the d for br, and thus made a passage direct nonsense which was understood in Sh.'s time by all his audience; for this Adam was a most notable archer, named Adam Bell, who for his skill became a proverb. In Much Ado, I, 1: "And he that hits me, let him be clapped on the shoulder, and called Adam."

Upton, quoted in Furness, Var.

Adams, Abraham ("Parson"). In Fielding's novel "Joseph Andrews," a poor curate whose adventures (chiefly ludicrous) in the company of Joseph Andrews and his betrothed, Fanny, constitute a large part of the book. He is a portrait of Fielding's friend Young. His characteristics are given in the following passage.

Mr. Abraham Adams was an excellent scholar. He was a perfect master of the Greek and Latin languages; to which he added a great share of knowledge in the Oriental tongues and could read and translate French, Italian, and Spanish. He had applied many years to the most severe study, and had treasured up a fund of learning rarely to be met with in a university; he was, besides, a man of good sense, good parts, and good nature; but was, at the same time, as entirely ignorant of the ways of this world as an infant just entered into it could possibly be. As he had never any intention to deceive, so he never suspected that a design in others. He was generous, friendly, and brave, to an excess; but simplicity was his characteristic; he did, no more than Mr. Colley Cibber, apprehend any such passions as malice and envy to exist in mankind; which was indeed less remarkable in a country parson, than in a gentleman who has passed his life behind the scenes; a place which has been seldom thought the school of innocence; and where a very little observation would have convinced the great apostolus that those passions have a real existence in the human mind.

Fielding, Joseph Andrews, p. 4.

He was educated at the Charterhouse and at Queen's College, Oxford, where he took his M. A. degree in 1693, and in 1693 obtained a fellowship which he held until 1711. A Latin poem which he published in 1697 on the "Peace of Ryswick" brought him a pension of £300, and he proceeded to qualify himself for the diplomatic service of the government by travel and study on the Continent 1699-1703, visiting France, Italy, Austria, Germany, and Holland. He was under-secretary of state 1706-08; secretary to the lord lieutenant of Ireland (Wharton) 1709-10; secretary to the lords justices on the death of Queen Anne in 1714; secretary for Ireland under the Earl of Sunderland in 1715; a commissioner for trade and the colonies 1716; and secretary of state, April, 1717, to March, 1718. On Aug. 3, 1716, he married the Countess of Warwick. His principal works are his "Letter from Italy," a poem written as he was crossing the Alps in 1701, printed in 1703; "The Campaign," a poem published in 1704; "Remarks on Several Parts of Italy," published in 1705; "Fair Rosamond," an opera, published anonymously in 1707; "Cato," a tragedy, produced at Drury Lane April 14, 1713; "The Drummer," a play, published anonymously in 1716 (acted in 1715); contributions to the "Whig Examiner" in 1710 (five papers); contributions to the "Tatler" from 1709 till 1711 (41 papers were by Addison alone, 24 by Addison and Steele together); and 274 "Spectators" 1711-12: these last were all signed by one of the letters of the word C. L. I. O. (Clio). His most famous character is that of Sir Roger de Coverley, originally sketched by Steele. He contributed to the "Guardian" 51 papers in 1713, and also others to a new "Spectator" in 1714. From Dec., 1715, to June, 1716, he contributed 55 papers to "The Freeholder." The principal editions of his works are Tickell's edition (1721), the Baskerville (1761), an edition by Bishop Hurd (1811), and one by G. W. Greene, New York (1856).

Addison, Lancelot. Born in the parish of Crosby Ravensworth, Westmoreland, 1632; died at Lichfield, April 20, 1703. An English clergyman and writer, father of Joseph Addison. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he was graduated (A. B.) in 1655. He was a zealous royalist and Episcopalian, and at the Restoration was appointed English chaplain at Dunkirk. On the sale of Dunkirk to the French in 1662 he was transferred to Tangier. About 1670 he became a royal chaplain, in 1683 dean of Lichfield, and in 1684 archdeacon of Coventry. His principal works are "West Barbary, or a Short Narrative of the Revolutions of the Kingdoms of Fez and Morocco" (1671), and "The Present State of the Jews (more particularly relating to those of Barbary)," 1675.

Addison of the North. An epithet applied to Henry Mackenzie.

Addison's Walk. A walk in the grounds of Magdalen College, Oxford, said to have been a favorite promenade of the essayist, who in 1689 held a demyship in that college.

Added Parliament. A nickname of the second Parliament of James I. (April-June, 1614), which was dissolved without having passed any acts, on its refusal to grant supplies until the king's imposition of customs and the restoration of the nonconforming clergy ejected in 1604 had been considered.

kritisches Wörterbuch der hochdeutschen Mundart" (1774-86), "Umständliches Lehrgebäude der deutschen Sprache" (1781-82), "Über den deutschen Stil," "Mithridates," and other works, especially on German language and literature.

Aden (ä'den or ä'den). A seaport in Arabia, the ancient Adana, Attana, or Arabia Felix, on the Gulf of Aden, lat. 12° 47' N., long. 49° 59' E., situated on a rocky peninsula connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus. It is an important coaling-station, and a port of call of the Peninsular and Oriental steamships. It was captured by the British in 1839 and annexed. Aden and the settlements adjoining, with the island of Perim, in all 80 square miles, are administered by a political resident, subject to the Bombay government. Population (1891), 41,910. See Arabia.

Aden, Gulf of. An arm of the Arabian sea, lying between Arabia on the north and the Somali Land on the south, and connected with the Red Sea by the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb.

Adenès. See Adenet.

Adenet (äd-nä'). A French trouvère of the 13th century, surnamed "le Roi." Also Adenez, Adenès, Adans. See the extract.

Adenès or Adans le Roi derived his imposing surname from the function of king of the minstrels, which he performed at the court of Henry III., duke of Brabant. He must have been born about the middle of the thirteenth century, and the last probable allusion to him which we have occurs in the year 1297. The events of his life are only known from his own poems, and consist chiefly of travels in company with different princesses and princes of Flanders and Brabant. His literary work is however of great importance. It consists partly of refashionings of three Chansons-de-Gestes, "Les enfances Ogier," "Berte ausgrans Pies," and "Bueves de Commarchis." In these three poems Adenès works up the old epics into the form fashionable in his time, and as we possess the older versions of the first and last, the comparison of the two forms affords a literary study of the highest interest. His last, longest, and most important work is the roman d'aventures of Cleomadès, a poem extending to 20,000 verses, and not less valuable for its intrinsic merit than as a type of its class. Saintsbury, Fr. Lit., p. 93.

Adenez. See Adenet.

Aderbajian. See Azerbaijan.

Aderer (ä-de-rär'), or Aderar (-rär'), or Adrar (ä-drär'). A mountainous region in the Sahara, within the Spanish protectorate and new French "sphere of influence," about lat. 20° N. The chief place in it is Wadan.

Adernò (ä-där-nò'). A town in the province of Catania, Sicily, the ancient Hadranum, about 17 miles northwest of Catania. It contains Sikelian antiquities and a Norman castle. Population, 19,000.

Adersbach (ä'derz-bäch). A village in eastern Bohemia, near the Riesengebirge and the Silesian frontier, about 12 miles northwest of Braunau.

Adersbach Rocks. A labyrinth of fantastic rocks, about 5 miles long, near the village of Adersbach.

Adherbal (ad-her'bal). Died 112 B. C. A son of Micipsa and king of Numidia, in conjunction with his brothers Hiempsal and Jugurtha, in 118 B. C. Hiempsal was slain by Jugurtha and Adherbal fled to the protection of the Romans who restored him in 117. He was again ousted by Jugurtha and slain by him in Cirta.

Adiabene (ad'i-a-bē'nē). [Gr. Ἀδίαβηνή.] A small Assyrian district on the Tigris not far from Nisibis. It was a vassal of Parthia, and succumbed to Rome under Trajan. Its queen, Helen, and her sons Izates and Monabaz, embraced Judaism about the year 13 A. D.

Adi-Buddha (ä'dē-bud'hä). [Skt., 'the primordial Buddha.'] A creation of Buddhism ascribed to the 10th century A. D. He is represented as a being infinite, self-existent, and omniscient, who evolved out of himself by the exercise of the five meditations the five Dhyānibuddhas, while each of these evolved out of himself by wisdom and contemplation the corresponding Bodhisattvas, and each of them again evolved out of his immaterial essence a material world. These emanations bear a resemblance to the Sons or Emanations of the Gnostics. It is hence believed possible that they owe their existence to the influence of Persian Christianity. See Dhyāni-Buddha, Bodhisattva.

Adicia (a-dis'i-i). [Gr. ἀδικία, wrong, injustice.] In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," the wife of the sultan, an unrighteous woman, transformed into a raging tiger.

Adige (ä'de-je), G. Etsch (ech). A river of Tyrol and northern Italy, the Roman Athesis. It rises in the Col de Resca in western Tyrol near the frontier of Grisons, traverses the Vintschtau, flows south through Tyrol into Italy, sends arms to the Po and flows into the Adriatic north of the mouths of the latter. Its length is about 220 miles, and it is navigable for about 180 miles. On it are Trent and Verona. It has formed an important strategic line in the Italian campaigns. Near the Adige and Lago di Garda victories were gained by the Austrians over the French under Schérer in the spring of 1799. The most notable battle was that of Magano, April 5.

Adigetto (ä'dē-jet'tò). A canal or arm of the Adige, which separates from it near Badia, and flows past Rovigo into the Adriatic north of the Po.

Adighe (ä-dē'ghe). A collective name for various disconnected and hostile tribes in the Caucasus. Some are Christian and some Mohammedan.

Adi-Granth (ä'dē-granth). ['The fundamental book.'] The Bible of the Sikhs, compiled by the fifth successor of Nanak, Guru Arjun (1584-1606). He collected in it the poetical pieces of the founder and the three following gurus, and added his own compositions as well as sentences and fragments by Ramamanda, Kabir, Namdev, and others. Additions were made by Govind (1675-1708), the tenth and last guru, who composed, besides a second Granth, "The Granth of the Tenth teign." These books are written in an antiquated Panjabi, called Gurmukhi, that which comes from the mouth of the guru. These, with biographies of the gurus and the saints, and a number of directions as to ritual and discipline, make up the sacred literature of the sect.

Adin (ä'din). [Heb., 'delicately.'] The head of a Hebrew family which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. Ezra ii. 15, Neh. vii. 20.

Adirondack Mountains (ad-i-ron'dak moun'-tänz). A range of mountains in northeastern New York, the highest in the State. The main group is in Hamilton, Essex, Franklin, and Clinton counties, but the name is extended to the whole north-eastern region of New York. The highest peak is Mount Marcy (5,344 feet). Other prominent summits are Mount Dix, Mount McIntyre, Mount Seward, Mount Whiteface, Haystack, etc.

Adirondack Park. A park established by act of the New York legislature in 1892 within the counties of Hamilton, Essex, Franklin, Warren, St. Lawrence, and Herkimer, for the use of the public. Further provision for the park was made by act of 1893.

Adites (ad'its). Early Arabian (Cushite) rulers.

Aditi (ad'i-ti). [Skt., appar. from a-priv, and *diti, bond (√ dā, bind).] Used in the Vedas as an adjective to mean 'unbound,' 'free,' 'limitless,' 'infinite,' 'exhaustless,' and, as a noun, to mean 'freedom,' 'security,' and then 'infinity,' in particular that of the heaven in contrast with the finitude of the earth and its spaces. The last conception personified is the goddess Aditi, the mother of the Adityas. In the post-Vedic literature Aditi is the mother of the gods, daughter of Daksha and wife of Kashyapa, mother of the thirty-three gods, mother of the Tushitas or of the twelve Adityas and the sun, and sister of Agastya. In Aditi the confused and imposing notion of a substratum of all existence seems to have found one of its earliest expressions.

Adityas (ä'dit-yaz). ['Sons of Aditi.'] In the Vedic literature, seven gods of the heavenly light, at whose head stands Varuna, who is the Aditya par excellence. They are Varuna, Mitra, 'the friend,' Aryaman, 'the bosom friend,' Bhaga, 'the liberal,' Daksha, 'the capable,' Ansa, 'the apportioner,' and an uncertain seventh. Mitra and the rest are only a splitting up and reflection of Varuna, the god of the vast luminous heavens, viewed as embracing all things and as the primary source of all life and every blessing. In the Brahmanas and later the Adityas are twelve in number, with manifest reference to the number of the months. The term Aditya is also used from the earliest times as a designation for the sun. See Amesha Spentas.

Adolphus, Frederick, G. Friedrich Adolf. Born May 14, 1710; died Feb. 12, 1771. Duke of Holstein-Eutin, chosen as crown-follower of Sweden 1743. He reigned 1751-71.

Adolphus of Nassau. Born about 1252; killed at Gölheim, Rhine Palatinate, July 2, 1298. A king of Germany, elected 1292 and deposed 1298. He was defeated by his successor Albert I. at Gölheim, 1298.

Adonai (ad-ō-nā'ī or ä-dö-nī'). [Heb. Adōnai, plural of 'adōn, lord.] The name used by the Hebrews in place of the ineffable name Yahveh (Jehovah) wherever it occurs in the Scriptures. See the extract.

It is in accordance with this Masoretic mode of pronunciation that Hebrew is now taught. But there was one word which the Masoretes of Tiberias either could not or would not pronounce. This was the national name of the God of Israel. Though used so freely in the Old Testament, it had come to be regarded with superstitious reverence before the time when the Greek translation of the Septuagint was made, and in this translation, accordingly, the word Kyrios, "Lord," is substituted for it wherever it occurs. The New Testament writers naturally followed the custom of the Septuagint and of their age, and so also did the Masoretes of Tiberias. Wherever the holy name was met with, they read in place of it Adōnai, "Lord," and hence, when supplying vowel-symbols to the text of the Old Testament, they wrote the vowels of Adōnai under the four consonants, Y H V H, which composed it. This simply meant that Adōnai was to be read wherever the sacred name was found. In ignorance of this fact, however, the scholars who first revived the study of Hebrew in modern Europe imagined that the vowels of Adōnai (ä or é, o, and ä) were intended to be read along with the consonants below which they stood. The result was the hybrid monster Yehováh (Jehovah). In passing into England the word became even more deformed. In German the sound of y is denoted by the symbol j, and the German symbol, but with the utterly different English pronunciation attached to it, found its way into the English translations of the Old Testament Scriptures.

Sagee, Anc. Monuments, p. 74.

Adonais (ad-ō-nā'is). An elegiac poem by Shelley, commemorating the death of Keats, published in 1821.

Adonbec. See Saladin.

Adonijah (ad-ō-nī'jā). [Heb., 'my Lord is Jehovah'; Gr. Adōniac.] 1. The fourth son of David. He plotted to obtain the throne in place of Solomon near the close of David's reign. 2. A Levite mentioned in 2 Chron. xvii. 8.

Adonis (a-dō'nis). In ancient geography, a small river in Syria, the modern Nahr-Ibrahim, rising in the Lebanon, and flowing into the Mediterranean about 13 miles north of Beirut.

Adonis (a-dō'nis). [Gr. Adōnis; Heb. and Phen. 'adōn, lord.] In Greek mythology, a youth, a model of beauty, beloved of Aphrodite. He died from the wound of a boar's tusk, received while hunting. According to the entreaties of Aphrodite, Zeus decreed that he should pass half the year in the upper and half in the lower world. Adonis is an oriental deity of nature, typifying the withering of nature in winter, and its resuscitation in summer. By way of Asia Minor his cult came to Greece, then under the Ptolemies to Egypt, and at the time of the Empire, to Rome. The yearly festival of Adonis in the spring was a special favorite with women. In the Old Testament reference is made to the weeping of the women over Tammuz, the Babylonian equivalent of Adonis (Ezek. viii. 14). In the Babylonian Nimrod epic he is mentioned as the beloved of Ishtar (Astarte, the Semitic goddess, corresponding to Aphrodite), being represented there as slain by the goddess herself. See Tammuz.

Adony (od'ony). A small town in the county of Stuhlweissenburg, Hungary, on the Danube about 28 miles south of Budapest.

Adoptive Emperors, The. The Roman emperors Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius; so called because after Nerva, who was elected by the senate on the death of Domitian, each was the adopted son of his predecessor. They constitute the greatest and noblest group of Roman emperors, and the period of their reigns is the happiest in Roman history—according to Gibbon the happiest in the history of the world.

Adoration of the Lamb. A painting by Jan and Hubert van Eyck, in the cathedral of Ghent, Belgium. It is the capital work of the Flemish school.

Adoration of the Magi. Of the paintings with this subject the following are among the most notable: (1) An altarpiece (1528) by Sodoma (Bazzi), in San Agostino at Siena, Italy. It is the painter's masterpiece, admirable in drawing and color. (2) A painting in tempera by Sandro Botticelli, in the Uffizi, Florence. The three kings are portraits of Cosimo, Giuliano, and Giovanni dei Medici. The Virgin occupies a hut among rocks and old ruins. (3) A painting by Titoret, in the Scuola di San Rocco at Venice. The entire scene is lighted by the radiance emanating from the body of the Child. (4) A noted painting by Rembrandt, in Buckingham Palace, London. The Virgin and Child are seated at the right; before them kneel the Magi. Behind are kings and old men, and in the distance a caravan of camels. (5) A picture by Albert Dürer, in the Uffizi, Florence. There is a very delicate landscape background. (6) A painting by Rubens, in the Musée de Peinture at Brussels, Belgium. The Virgin stands in the middle holding the Child erect, with St. Joseph behind her; before them the kings stand and kneel, while their guards and attendants observe the scene from a staircase behind. (7) A painting by Rubens (1624), in the Museum at Antwerp, Belgium. The Virgin appears at the left, holding the Child on a pillow; behind her stands St. Joseph, and in front the kings and their train. The figures are over life-size. (8) A splendid painting by Paolo Veronese, a companion piece to the Marriage at Cana, in the Museum at Dresden. The Virgin is seated, with the Child on her knee; the kings, attended by a numerous train with camels and horses, offer their gifts. (9) The noted "Dombild" of the Cathedral of Cologne, a large triptych by Meister Stephan (died 1451), considered the finest work of the early German school intermediate between purely medieval and Renaissance painting. The side panels bear St. Gereon and St. Ursula, and on the outside is painted an Annunciation.

Adrain (ad'rān), Robert. Born at Carriekfergus, Ireland, Sept. 30, 1775; died at New Brunswick, New Jersey, Aug. 10, 1843. An Irish-American mathematician, a participant in the Irish rebellion of 1798. He escaped to America, taught school in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and was professor of mathematics at Rutgers College from 1810 to 1813, at Columbia College from 1813 to 1825, and at the University of Pennsylvania from 1827 to 1834. He edited Hutton's "Mathematics," and was editor of the "Mathematical Diary" from 1825 to 1829.

Adrammelech, or Adramelech (a-dram'e-lek). [Babylonian Adar-malik, Adar is counselor (ruler, prince).] 1. An idol worshiped, with the sacrifice of children, by the inhabitants of Sepharvaim with whom Sargon, king of Assyria, colonized Samaria. (2 Ki. xvii. 31.) See Adar.—2. A son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. With the help of his brother Sharezer he slew his father in the so-called temple of Nisroch, on his return from his expedition against Hezekiah. (2 Ki. xix. 37, Isa. xxxvii. 38.) This event is mentioned in the Babylonian chronicle (cuneiform).

3. In angelology, one of the fallen angels. Adramyttium (ad-ra-mit'i-um). [Gr. Adramyttion, Adramyttion.] In ancient geography, a town in Mysia, Asia Minor, on the Gulf of Adramyttium about lat. 39° 35' N., long. 26° 55' E. The modern town Adramyti or Edremid lies about 3 miles inland (population, 8,000).

Adramyttium, Gulf of. An arm of the Ægean Sea, on the western coast of Asia Minor, north of Mytilene.

Adrar. See Aderer.

Adraste (ä-drast'). The principal character of Molière's play "Le Sicilien," a young French gentleman who succeeds in carrying off Isidore, the beautiful Greek slave of Don Pèdre, by disguising himself as a portrait-painter; hence the second title of the play, "L'Amour peintre."

Adrasteia (ad-ras-ti'ä). [Gr. Adrāsteia.] 1. A name of Nemesis and of Rhea-Cybele.—2. A Cretan nymph, daughter of Melisseus, to whom Rhea intrusted the infant Zeus to be reared in the Dictæan grotto. Smith, Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog.

Adrastus (a-dras'tus), or Adrastos (a-dras'tos). [Gr. Adrastoc.] In Greek legend, a king of Argos, leader in the expedition of the "Seven against Thebes." He was worshiped as a hero in several places, among them Megara.

Adria (ä'dri-ä). In ancient geography (about the 1st century A. D.), that part of the Mediterranean which lies between Crete and Sicily.

Adria (in ancient Picenum). See Atri. Adria (ä'dre-ä), or Adria Veneta (ä'dre-ä vä-nä'tä). A town in the province of Rovigo, Italy, the ancient Adria, Atria, Hadria, or Hatia, situated near the sea about 16 miles southwest of Venice. It has a cathedral and many antiquities, and has been successively an Etruscan, a Greek, and a Roman town. Population, 7,900.

Adrian (ä'dri-an), or Hadrian (hä'dri-an), I. Pope from 772 to 795. He summoned Charles the Great to resist the encroachments of the Lombard king Desiderius, who had occupied Pentapolis and was threatening Rome; and Charles, after the destruction of the Lombard kingdom, granted anew to him the territories originally bestowed by Pepin, with the addition of Ancona and Benevento. Adrian adopted the view of the Eastern Church with regard to the worship of images, anathematizing all who refused to worship the images of Christ, the Virgin, or the saints. He was the son of a Roman noble.

Adrian, or Hadrian, II. Pope from 867 to 872. He passed a sentence of deposition on Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, which was confirmed at a council of the Eastern Church in 869-70.

Adrian, or Hadrian, III. Pope from 884 to 885.

Adrian, or Hadrian, IV. (Nicholas Breakspear). Born before 1100 at Langley, near St. Albans, in Hertfordshire; died at Anagni, Italy, 1159. Pope from Dec. 4, 1154, to Sept. 1, 1159; the only Englishman who has occupied the papal chair. He was successively a clerk and abbot of the monastery of St. Rufus, in Provence, and in 1146 was created cardinal-bishop of Albano by Pope Eugenius III. Two years later he was sent as legate to Denmark and Norway. As Pope he bestowed the sovereignty of Ireland on Henry II. of England. He quelled the democratic rising of the Roman people under Arnold of Brescia, and procured the execution of the latter in 1155. He compelled William, king of the Two Sicilies, to acknowledge the feudal suzerainty of the Pope. With Adrian IV. began the great conflict between the papal power and the house of Hohenstaufen. He died while preparing to place himself at the head of the forces of the Italian party against the emperor Frederick I.

Adrian, or Hadrian, V. (Ottononi Fiesco). Pope in 1276. He lived only five weeks after his accession to the chair.

Adrian, or Hadrian, VI. Born at Utrecht in 1459; died Sept. 14, 1523. Pope from 1522 to 1523. He studied at the University of Louvain, of which he became vice-chancellor, and was chosen by the emperor Maximilian to be the tutor of his grandson, Archduke Charles, the later emperor Charles V. In 1516 he became bishop of Tortosa and grand inquisitor of Aragon; in 1517 he was created a cardinal by Leo X.; and after the death of Ferdinand he acted for a time as regent of Spain. On his accession to the papal chair Jan. 9, 1522, he corrected various external abuses in the church, but failed in his efforts to check the Reformation.

Adrian. A lord in Shakspeare's "Tempest."

Adrian de Castello, or de Corneto. Born at Corneto, Tuscan, Italy, 1460 (?); died 1521 (?). An Italian ecclesiastic and scholar, nuncio of Innocent VIII. in Scotland in 1488, agent at Rome of Henry VII. of England, collector of Peter's pence in England, and papal protonotary. He obtained in 1492 the prebend of Ealdland in St. Paul's Cathedral, and the rectory of St. Dunstan in the East, but returned to Rome on the death of Innocent VIII. He was made bishop of Hereford in 1502, bishop of Bath and Wells in 1504, and cardinal in 1508. In 1517 he was implicated in the conspiracy of Cardinals Petrucci, de Sauli, and Riario to poison Leo X., and was deprived of his cardinalate (1518) and of his dignities in England. He was probably assassinated. He wrote "Venutio," a poem (1505), "De Vera Philosophia" (1507), "De Sermone Latino et modo Latine Loquendi" (1513), etc.

Adrian (ā'dri-ān). The capital of Lenawee County, Michigan, a manufacturing town situated on the river Raisin about 55 miles southwest of Detroit; sometimes called the "Maple City." Population (1890), 8,756.

Adriana (ā-dri-ā'nā). A character in Shakspeare's "Comedy of Errors": the wife of Antipholus of Ephesus.

Adriana, Villa. See Hadrian's Villa.

Adriano (ad'ri-ān-ō'pl). [Turk. Edirneh, or Edrench.] The capital of the vilayet of Adriano, on the Maritza in lat. 41° 41' N., long. 26° 35' E., a place of great strategic and commercial importance, founded by the emperor Hadrian about 125 A. D., on the site of the ancient Uscudama: the residence of the sultans 1361-1453. It was besieged by the Avars in 586, stormed by the Bulgarians in 922, entered by the Crusaders in 1189, taken by the Turks in 1361, taken by the Russians under Diebitsch in 1829, and occupied by the Russians Jan., 1878. The emperor Baldwin I. was taken prisoner in Adriano by the Bulgars in 1205. Its most notable building is the mosque of Sultan Selim II., a very impressive building of the 16th century. It is preceded by a fine portico of monolithic columns, and flanked by four slender fluted minarets about 200 feet high. The span of the dome (106 feet) is greater than that of Santa Sophia: it rests on four colossal porphyry columns.

Adriano. A vilayet in European Turkey. Population, 836,044.

Adriano, Battle of. 1. A victory of the Goths over the emperor Valens, 378 A. D.—2. A victory of the Slavs over the Byzantines, 551.

Adriano, Peace or Treaty of. A treaty between Russia and Turkey, signed at Adriano, Sept. 14, 1829. Turkey ceded to Russia important fortresses and districts on the northeastern coast of the Black Sea; granted to Russian subjects freedom of trade in Turkey, and freedom of navigation in the Black Sea, Danube, and Bosphorus; confirmed and extended the protectorate exercised by the czar over the Danubian principalities; gave Russia control of a part of the left bank of the lower Danube, and of the Salina mouth of that river; and recognized the independence of Greece.

Adula (ā-dū'lā), or Rheinwaldgebirge (rīn-vāld-ge-bēr'ge). A group of the Alps in the western part of the canton of Grisons, Switzerland, the source of the Hinter-Rhein. The highest point is the Rheinwaldhorn, 11,150 feet.

Adule, Adulis. See Zulla.

Adulis Bay. See Annesley Bay.

Adullam (ā-dul'am). [Heb., possibly 'retreat'; Arabic adāla, turn aside.] A city and cave in the territory of Judah in the low country: originally a Canaanite city. The cave was used by David as a hiding-place. It has been identified with the modern Ad-el-mā, 10 miles northeast of Hebron; falsely identified by tradition with Khareftān near Bethlehem.

Adullam, Cave of. The cave to which David withdrew from Gath. 1 Sam. xxii. It was capable of affording shelter to four hundred men. See above.

Adullamites. In English history, the group of Liberals who seceded from the Whig party and voted with the Conservatives when Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone introduced a measure for the extension of the elective franchise in 1866. They received the name of Adullamites from their being likened by Mr. Bright to the discontented persons who took refuge with David in the Cave of Adullam. The party was also known collectively as "The Cave" and "The Cave of Adullam."

Advance (ad-vāns'), The. The vessel in which Elisha Kane explored the arctic regions in search of Sir John Franklin. See Kane.

Adventure (ad-ven'tūr), The. 1. The ship of the pirate Captain Kidd.—2. The ship in which Captain King (associated with Fitzroy) explored the coasts of South America, 1826-30.

Adventures of Five Hours, The. A play by Sir Samuel Tuke, an adaptation of Calderon's "Los Empeños de Seis Horas," made by the advice of Charles II., and printed in 1662.

Adventures of an Atom, The. A political satire by Smollett, published in 1769.

Æacides (ē-as'i-dēz). A descendant of Ææus, especially Æchilles.

Ææus (ē-ā-kus). [Gr. Αἰακός.] In Greek mythology, the son of Zeus and Ægina, renowned for his justice, and made a judge in the lower world. He was the grandfather of Æchilles.

Ædhan. See Aidan.

Ædon (a-ē'don). [Gr. Ἄδων.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of Pandarus of Ephesus. According to Homer she was the wife of Zethus, king of Thebes, and the mother of Itylus. Inspired by envy of Niobe, the wife of her brother Amphion, who had six sons and six daughters, she formed the design of killing Niobe's eldest son, but by mistake destroyed her own son Itylus. To relieve her grief she was changed by Zeus into a nightingale.

Ædvi (ed'ū-i). A Celtic people living in central Gaul, west of the Sequani between the Saône and the Loire. Their capital was Bibracte (Augustodunum, Autun). They were allies of the Romans, but joined in the revolt of 52 B. C. Also Hedui.

The Ædvi, friends and brothers, as they delighted to be called, of the Roman people, held the highest place among the nations of central Gaul. Their friendship and brotherhood was acknowledged by the Romans themselves. It was a special badge of distinction. Rome had many allies; the Ædvi were her only brothers. The brothers of Rome were naturally the first among the nations of Gaul to find their way into the Roman Senate.

Ægadian Islands (ē-gā'di-an ī'landz). See Ægæes.

Ægeon (ē-jē'on). [Gr. Αἰγαῖον.] See Briareus.

Ægæos (ē-gā'lē-os). [Gr. Αἰγαῖος.] In ancient geography, a mountain-range in Attica separating the Athenian and Eleusinian plains. It ended in a promontory (Amphiale) opposite Salamis. From it Xerxes witnessed the battle of Salamis.

Ægates (ē-gā'tēz). [L.] In ancient geography, a group of small islands west of Sicily: the modern Ægæian Islands. They comprise Favignana, Maritimo, Levanzo, and Formica, and belong to the province of Trapani, Sicily. Near them was gained the Roman naval victory over the Carthaginians, 241 B. C.

Ægean Sea (ē-jē'an sē). [L. Mare Ægeum, Gr. Ἰόνιον πόντος, or τὸ Αἰγαῖον πόντος, so called, according to Strabo, from Αἶγαι, Ægæ, a town in Eubœa; according to others (erroneously) from Αἰγίς, Ægeus.] That part of the Mediterranean which lies between Greece on the west, European Turkey on the north, and Asia Minor on the east, and communicates with the Sea of Marmora and thence with the Black Sea by the Strait of Dardanelles. It contains many islands, as Eubœa, the Cyclades, the Sporades, Samos, Chios, Mytilene, Samothrace, Thasos, etc. Its chief arms are the Gulf of Nauplia, the Saronic Gulf, the Channels of Eriop and Talanta, and the Gulfs of Lamia, Volo, Saloniki, Cassandra, Monte Santo, Contessa, Saros, Adramyti, Smyrna, Scala Nova, Mendelia, and Kos. Its chief tributaries are the Salembria, Vardar, Struma, Maritza, Sarabat, and Mendere. Its length is about 400 miles, and its greatest width over 200 miles. See Ægeus.

Ægeon (ē-jē'on). A character in Shakspeare's "Comedy of Errors": a merchant of Syracuse.

Ægeus (ē'jūs). [Gr. Αἰγεύς.] In Greek legend, the father of Theseus, and king of Athens. He threw himself into the Ægean Sea (whence, according to tradition, the name) through grief at the supposed loss of his son.

Ægidi (ā-gē'dē). Ludwig Karl. Born at Tilsit, April 10, 1825. A German jurist, publicist, and politician, professor of jurisprudence in the University of Bonn (1868), and professor of jurisprudence in the University of Berlin (1877).

Ægidius (ē-jid'i-us). 1. A Roman commander in Gaul under Majorianus (457-461). After the death of the emperor he maintained an independent sovereignty, possibly with the title of king, at Soissons. He was voluntarily chosen king of the Franks during the temporary exile of the unpopular Childeric. 2. See Giles, Saint.

Ægidius a Columnis (ē-jid'i-us ā kō-lum'nis). Born at Rome about 1247; died 1316. A scholastic philosopher, general of the Augustine order, surnamed "Doctor Fundatissimus."

Ægina (ē-jī'nā), or Aigina (ī'gi-nā). [Gr. Αἴγυα.] In Greek mythology, the daughter of Asopus, the river-god, beloved by Zeus, and carried by him to the island of Ægina (whence, according to tradition, its name).

Ægina, or Aigina. An island of Greece, in the Saronic Gulf of the Ægean, lat. 37° 45' N., long. 23° 26' E. It was colonized by Dorians, and was an important commercial state and center of art in the 6th and 5th centuries B. C. In 456 B. C. it was subjugated by Athens, and now belongs to the monarchy of Attica and Boeotia. Its length is 9 miles. Population, about 6,000.

Ægina, or Aigina. The capital of the island of Ægina, situated on the western coast: population, about 3,000. The temple of Athena at Ægina was a monument famous for both architecture and sculpture. It was a Doric peripteros of 6 by 12 columns, the cella having pronaos and opisthodomos with 2 columns in antis. Twenty-two columns, with their entablature, are standing. Each pediment was filled with a group of sculpture representing a combat between Greeks and Trojans under the presidency of Athena, who is the central figure. The major part of these sculptures has been recovered, and is included in the collection of the Æginetan Marbles (which see) at Munich. Though appearing older, the temple is ascribed to the early part of the 6th century B. C. Of the temple of Aphrodite but one of the great Doric columns, very similar to those of the temple of Athena, but larger, is standing, but the plan has been in part recovered. The temple was hexastyle.

Ægina, Gulf of. See Saronic Gulf.

Ægineta, Paulus. See Paulus Ægineta.

Æginetan Marbles (ē-jī-nē'tan mār'blz). An important collection of sculpture from the temple of Athena in Ægina, now in the Glyptothek at Munich. These sculptures were discovered in 1811, and consist for the most part of the remains of the series of statues from both pediments of the temple. Five figures survive from the eastern pediment, and 10 from the western, which is probably complete. Both groups represent the exploits of Greek heroes in the Trojan war, with Athena as the central figure. They belong to an artistic period immediately before the time of full mastery, and thus, while in many particulars admirable, preserve some archaic features, as the rigid smile on the expressionless faces, and the stiffness of attitude of some of the figures. The date generally accepted is about 475 B. C.; but this is not definitely established. These sculptures were restored by Thorwaldsen.

Ægipan (ē'jī-pan). [Gr. Αἰγίπαν, the goat Pan.] In Greek mythology, the goat Pan, in some forms of the myth identical with Pan, and in others different from him. He is called the son of Zeus and Ægæa, Pan's wife, and also the father of Pan.

Ægir (ā'jir). [ON. ægir, AS. gágor, the sea.] In Old Norse mythology, the cœg of the ocean. He was the principal water-demon and by race a giant, but personifies the more propitious characteristics of the sea. He is also called Hler (ON. Hler) and Gymir. His wife is Ran.

Ægis (ē'jis). [L. ægis, < Gr. αἰγίς, the ægis, also a rushing storm, hurricane.] In Greek mythology, originally the storm-cloud enveloping the thunderbolt, the especial weapon of Zeus. It afterward came to be regarded as: (a) The skin of the goat Amalthea, the foster-mother of Zeus, which the latter took for defensive armor in his war with the Titans. (b) A terrible weapon wrought by Hephestus after the fashion of a thunder-cloud fringed with lightning, intrusted by Zeus to Apollo and to Athena, and a characteristic attribute of the latter. In art the Ægis is represented as a sort of mantle fringed with serpents, generally worn over the breast, but sometimes held extended over the left arm, or thrown over the arm to serve as a shield. The Ægis of Athena, except in the most primitive representations, bears in the midst the head of the Gorgon Medusa, and is usually covered with scales like those of a serpent.

Ægisthus (ē-jis'thus). [Gr. Αἰγισθος.] In Greek legend, a son of Thyestes and cousin of Agamemnon: he seduced Clytemnestra, and procured the murder of Agamemnon. In the "Agamemnon" of Æschylus (Clytemnestra, incited to the act by Ægisthus, commits the murder.

Æglamour (ē'glā-mōr). The Sad Shepherd in Jonson's play of that name. He grieves at the reported drowning of the shepherdess Earine.

Ægle (eg'lē). [Gr. Αἴγλη.] In Greek mythology: (a) A naiad, mother of the Graces. (b) One of the Hesperides.

Ægospotami (ē-gos-pot'a-mī). [Gr. Αἴγος ποταμοί, 'gout's rivers.'] In ancient geography, a small river and a town of the Thracian Chersonesus, about lat. 40° 20' N., long. 26° 33' E., noted as the place of a naval victory of the Spartans under Lysander over the Athenians, 405 B. C., which led to the close of the Peloponnesian war.

Ægyptus (ē-jip'tus). [Gr. Αἴγυπτος.] In Greek mythology, a son of Belus and twin brother of Danans. He received from Belus the sovereignty of Arabia and conquered Egypt. See Egypt.

Ælfheah (alf'heāf), or Saint Alphege (al'fej). Born 954; died April 19, 1012. An Anglo-Saxon prelate, made bishop of Winchester in 984 and archbishop of Canterbury in 1006. He was captured by the Danes in 1011, and held for ransom. This he at first agreed to pay, but afterward refused, and in consequence was slain.

Ælfred. See Alfred.

Ælfric (alf'rik). Born about 955; died about 1020 A. D. An English (Anglo-Saxon) abbot, surnamed "Grammaticus," author of homilies (edited by Thorpe 1844-46), a Latin grammar and glossary, a treatise on the Old and New Testaments, "Hepateuchus," etc. There has been much discussion with regard to his identity, and it is still in dispute.

Ælfthryth (alf'thryth), L. Elfrida (el-frī'dā). Born about 945; died about 1000. An Anglo-Saxon queen, daughter of Ordgar, ealdorman of Devon, wife first of Æthelwald, ealdorman of the East Anglians, and, after his death, of King Eadgar by whom she was the mother of Æthelred II. She is said to have caused the murder of her stepson Eadward at Corfe, in order to secure the election of Æthelred.

Ælia Capitolina (ē'li-ā kap'i-tō-lī'nā). In ancient geography, a Roman colony established by Hadrian, 134 A. D., on the site of Jerusalem. Ælia was the family name of Hadrian: a temple was dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus in the place (hence the name).

Ælia gens (ē'li-ā jenz). In ancient Rome, a plebeian clan or house whose family names and surnames were Bala, Catus, Gallus, Gracilis, Lamia, Ligur, Pretus, Sejanus, Staienus, Stilo, and Tubero. To this gens belonged the emperor Hadrian and the Antonines, whom he adopted.

Ælian (ē'li-an). See Ælianus, Claudius.

Ælianus (ē-li-ā'nus), Claudius. A Roman rhetorician of the 2d century A. D., said to have been born at Præneste, Italy. His extant works are Ἰστορία, commonly called "Varia Historia," "a collection of 'ana' containing anecdotes of every kind, historical, biographical, antiquarian, put together without any method or connection, and, perhaps, not intended for publication" (K. O. Müller); and Ἐπι τῶν ζῴων ἰδιότητος (De Animalium Natura), "On the Peculiarities of Animals," a work similar in form to the preceding.

Ælianus Tacticus (ē-li-ā'nus tak'ti-kus). Lived about 100 A. D. A writer, probably a Greek residing at Rome, author of a work in Greek on the military tactics of the Greeks and the constitution of a Roman army.

Ælla (al'ā), or Ella (el'ā). Died 588. King of the Deirans from 559 to 588, the son of Ifa, ealdorman of the Deirans. He cast off the supremacy of the Bernicians at the death of Ida.

Æmilia (ē-mil'i-ā). [Fem. of Æmilius.] 1. In the fourth book of Spenser's "Faerie Queene," a lovely lady "rapt by greedie lust" into the power of a cannibal giant who held Amoret also captive. She was saved by Belphoebe.—2. In Shakspeare's "Comedy of Errors," the wife of Ægeon, acting as the abbess of Ephesus.

Æmilia gens (ē-mil'i-ā jenz). One of the most ancient patrician houses at Rome, probably of Sabine origin, which regarded as its ancestor Mamercus, called Æmilium on account of his persuasive language, who was variously represented as the son of Pythagoras, or of Numa, or as the descendant of Ascanius. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was L. Æmilius Mamercus (in 484 B. C.). Its family names are Barbulus, Buca, Lepidus, Mamercus or Mamercinus, Papius, Paulus, Regillus, and Scaurus.

Æmilium (ē-mil'i-us). [A Roman name said to be from Gr. αἰμύλιος, flattering. See Æmilia gens.] In Shakspeare's (?) "Titus Andronicus," a noble Roman.

Æmilium Paulus. See Paulus.

Æneas (ē-nē'as). [Gr. Αἰνείας.] In classical legend, a Trojan prince, son of Anchises, king of Dardanus, and Aphrodite. The traditions about him vary. According to Homer, being robbed of his cattle by Achilles, he took sides, with his Dardanians, against the Greeks, played an important part in the war, and after the sack of Troy, and the extinction of the house of Priam, reigned (as did also his descendants) in the Troad. In post-Homeric traditions he is sometimes represented as absent from the sack of Troy, sometimes as seeking refuge, on the admonition of Aphrodite, in Mount Ida, and carrying his father thither on his shoulders (with other variations), and as settling in the peninsula of Pallene, or in the Arcadian Orcomenes. Most of the traditions, however, represent him as landing in Italy, and becoming the ancestral hero of the Romans. See Æneid.

Æneas Sylvius. See Pius II.

Æneid (ē-nē'id), or Æneis (-is). An epic poem, in twelve books, by Vergil, recounting the adventures of Æneas after the fall of Troy, founded on the Roman tradition that Æneas settled in Latium and became the ancestral hero of the Roman people. The hero, driven by a storm on the coast of Africa, is hospitably received by Dido, queen of Carthage, to whom he relates the fall of Troy and his wanderings. An attachment between them is broken by the departure of Æneas, in obedience to the will of the gods, and the suicide of Dido follows. After a visit to Sicily, Æneas lands at Cumæ in Italy. In a descent to the infernal regions he sees his father, Anchises, and has a prophetic vision of the glorious destiny of his race as well as of the future heroes of Rome. He marries Lavinia, daughter of Latinus, king of the Latini, and a contest with Turnus, king of the Rutuli, the rejected suitor, follows, in which Turnus is slain. The poem is a glorification of Rome and of the emperor Augustus, who, as a member of the Julian gens, traced his descent from Julius (sometimes identified with Ascanius), the grandson of Æneas. The poem was completed, but not finally corrected, at the death of the author in 19 B. C.

Ænesidemus (en-ē-si-dē'mus). [Gr. Αἰνεσίδημος.] A celebrated Greek skeptical philosopher of Cnossus (or Ægae) in Crete, a younger contemporary of Cicero.

Æolia (ē-ō'li-ā). See Æolis.

Æolian Islands (ē-ō'li-an'īlandz). The ancient name of the Lipari Islands.

Æolians (ē-ō'li-anz). The Æoles or Æolii, one of the four great divisions of the Greek race. They occupied from an early period a large part of northern Greece and the western part of Peloponnesus, and also migrated to Asia Minor, settling in the region named for them Æolis, and in Lesbos.

Æolis (ē-ō'lis), or Æolia (ē-ō'li-ā). [Gr. Αἰολία, Αἰολία.] In ancient geography, originally the western coast of Asia Minor between the river Hermus and Lectum. Later it extended along Troas.

Æolus (ē-ō-lus). [Gr. Αἰώλος.] 1. In Greek mythology, the god of the winds, which he confined in a cavern.—2. The son of Hellen, and the eponymic founder of the Æolian race.

Æpinus (ā-pē'nös) (Franz Maria Ulrich Theodor Hoch). [G. Hoch, high; Gr. αἰψός, high, steep, whence Æpinus.] Born at Rostock, Germany, 1724; died at Dorpat, 1802. A German-Russian physicist, author of "Tentamen theorie electricitatis et magnetismi" (1759), etc.

Æpinus, Johann (originally Hoch). Born at Ziesar, Prussia, 1499; died at Hamburg, May 13, 1553. A German Protestant theologian, an opponent of Melancthon, and author of a work "De Purgatorio."

Æqui (ē'kwī). In ancient geography, a tribe living in Latium, east of Rome and north of the Hernici, often allied with the Volseians and at war with the Romans. They were finally subdued about 300 B. C.

Ærius (ā-ē'ri-anz). A reforming, Arian, sect of the 4th century; so called from their leader Ærius. They maintained that a presbyter or elder does not differ from a bishop in authority, repudiated prayers for the dead, and rejected church fasts. This sect was the forerunner of modern Presbyterianism.

Ærius (ā-ē'ri-us). A presbyter of Sebastia, in Pontus, Asia Minor, who lived in the middle of the 4th century A. D., and was the founder of the Ærians.

Ærøe (ā-rē-e), or Arrøe (ār'rē-e). An island of Denmark, in the Little Belt, south of Fünen. Length, 15 miles. Area, 33 square miles. Population, about 11,000. Its chief town is Ærøeskjöbing.

Aerschot, or Arschot (ār'skot). A town in the province of Brabant, Belgium, on the Demer about 23 miles northeast of Brussels. Population (1890), 6,234.

Aertzen (ärt'sen), Pieter. Born at Amsterdam about 1520; died 1573. A Dutch historical painter. Among his works is a Crucifixion, in Antwerp.

Æscanes (es'ka-nēz). A character in Shakspeare's "Pericles"; a lord of Tyre.

Æschines (es'ki-nēz). [Gr. Αἰσχίνης.] An Athenian philosopher, a contemporary and disciple of Socrates. The three extant dialogues ascribed to him are spurious.

Æschines. Born 389 B. C.; died in Samos 314 B. C. A famous Athenian orator, the political antagonist of Demosthenes, son of Atrometus (Tromes), of the deme of the Cothocida, and Glaucotea. He served in the campaigns at Nemea in 368, at Mantinea in 362, and at Tamyne in 349; was a tragic actor and a clerk to the assembly before he appeared about 348 as a public speaker; was twice an envoy to Philip of Macedon, 346; was twice accused (once 343) by Demosthenes of having accepted bribes from the king, but saved himself; and was defeated (339) in a trial which he brought against Ctesiphon for having proposed that Demosthenes should be rewarded for his public services with a golden crown, and, as a consequence, went into exile. He finally settled in Rhodes, where he is said to have established a school of eloquence. His extant orations are "Against Timarchus" (345), "On the Embassy" (343), and "Against Ctesiphon" (330).

Æschines the Orator. A Greek statue from Herculaneum, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples, of high rank among works of its class. The orator stands quietly, his arm wrapped in his mantle; the expression is preoccupied, but full of dignity.

Æschylus (es'ki-lus). [Gr. Αἰσχύλος.] Born at Eleusis, Attica, in 525 B. C.; died at Gela, Sicily, in 456 B. C. The greatest of the Greek tragic poets. He was the son of a certain Euphorion, and fought in the great battles of the Persian war, being wounded, it is said, at Marathon in 490 B. C. In 485 B. C. he gained his first tragic victory; in all he gained thirteen. In 468 he was defeated by Sophocles. In the same year he quitted Athens, according to Plutarch, in mortification at his defeat, and went to the court of Hiero at Syracuse, at whose invitation he had already once before visited Sicily and written a local piece called the "Ætneans." Æschylus was the father of the Greek tragic drama. Of his plays there remain 72 titles, over 60 of which seem genuine, but only 7 are extant: the "Suppliants," the "Persæ," the "Seven against Thebes," the "Prometheus Vinculus," and the Orestæan trilogy, consisting of the "Agamemnon," "Choephori," and "Eumenides."

Æsculapius (es-kū-lā'pi-us), or Asklepius (asklē'pi-os). [Gr. Ἀσκληπιός.] In Greek mythology, the god of medicine, son of Apollo and Coronis. He was killed with a thunderbolt by Zeus, because Pluto complained that Hades was being depopulated. At the request of Apollo, he was, after death, placed among the stars. He is commonly represented as an old man with a beard, his usual attribute being a staff with a serpent coiled around it. The common offering to him was a cock.

Aeshma Daeva (ā-esh'mā dā-ā'vā). The demon of anger in Avestan mythology, identified with the Asmodeus of the Book of Tobit.

Æsir (ā'sir). The collective name for the gods of Scandinavian mythology. There were 12 gods and 26 goddesses, dwellers in Asgard.

Æson (ē'son). [Gr. Αἰών.] In Greek legend, the father of Jason, and stepbrother of Pelias, who excluded him from his share of the kingdom of Thessaly. When Pelias, on the reported return of the Argonauts, attempted to kill him, he committed suicide. According to Ovid, he was rejuvenated by Medea after the return of the Argonauts.

Æsop, or Esop (ē'sop). [Gr. Αἰσώπος, L. Æsopus.] 1. According to tradition, a Greek fabulist of the 6th century B. C., represented as a dwarf and originally a slave. Samos and other places claimed the honor of being his birthplace. After obtaining his freedom he visited Lydia and Greece. Of the so-called fables of Æsop there have been several editions; but they are all spurious. Indeed, he is probably not a historical personage. "Some of the fables attributed to him are drawn from Egyptian sources older by eight hundred years than the famous dwarf who is supposed to have invented them. The fable of 'The Lion and the Mouse' was discovered by Dr. Brugsch in an Egyptian papyrus a few years ago. 'The Dispute of the Stomach and the Members' has yet more recently been identified by Professor Maspero with an ancient Egyptian original." (Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 223.) He was represented in later art as deformed, "perhaps to indicate his nearer approach to the lower animals and his peculiar sympathy for their habits. Such is the conception of the famous statue now in the Villa Albani at Rome."

2. A Greek historian of the 7th or 8th century A. D., author of a life of Alexander the Great.

Æsop, Clodius. A Roman tragic actor, a contemporary and intimate friend of Cicero, regarded by Horace and others as the equal of the great actor Roscius.

Æstii (es'ti-i). See the extract.

North of the Slavs, and intimately connected with them, the Prusso-Lettish branch of languages was situated; these tribes are first mentioned as the Æstii of Tacitus (c. 45) on the amber coast, then as the Galinde and Sudini of Ptolemy, the neighbours of the Venede. Mulenhoff makes it probable that "the stock collectively spread from the south or south-east, so that the swampy district of the Pripet was once its natural boundary to the south, and the original basis of its diffusion."

Schrader, Aryan Peoples (tr. by Jevons), p. 428.

Æthelbald (ath'el-bald), or Ethelbald (eth'el-bald). Died 757. King of the Mercians from 716 (718 ?) to 757, son of Alweo, grandnephew of Penda, and successor of Ceolred. He was acknowledged overlord of the English as far as the Humber, 731; took the West-Saxon town of Somerton, 734; ravaged Northumbria, 740; was defeated by his West-Saxon underking, Cuthred, at the battle of Burford, 754; and was killed by his ealdormen, 757.

Æthelbald, or Ethelbald. King of the West Saxons 858-860, son of Æthelwulf. He married his father's widow, Judith of France, who on his death returned to France and married Baldwin, afterward count of Flanders. From this last union was descended Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror.

Æthelberht (ath'el-berht), or Ethelbert (eth'el-bert), Saint. Born 552 (?); died Feb. 24, 616. King of Kent from 560 to 616, son of Eormeric, and great-grandson of Hengist. He was defeated by the West Saxons under Ceawlin and Cutha at the battle of Wimbeldon, 583; married Bertha or Bereia, a Christian princess, daughter of Charibert, king of the Franks; gradually established his overlordship over the English south of the Humber after the death of Ceawlin, 593; received St. Augustine at the Isle of Thanet, 597; and was converted and vigorously supported Augustine. He issued the first of the Anglo-Saxon codes, 602.

Æthelberht, or Ethelbert. King of the West Saxons 860-866, son of Æthelwulf.

Æthelburh (ath'el-borh), L. Ethelburga (eth'el-bér'gá), Saint. Died 676 (?). Abbess of Barking, Essex. She is commemorated on Oct. 11.

Æthelflæd (ath'el-flad), or Ethelfleda (eth'el-flé-dá). Died in 918 (?). The eldest daughter of King Alfred. She married Ethelred, ealdorman of the Mercians. During his life they had equal rule, and after his death, in 911 or 912, she was sole ruler. She is known as "the Lady of the Mercians."

Æthelfrith (ath'el-frith), or Ethelfrid (eth'el-frid), or Edilfrid. Died 617. King of the Northumbrians from 593 to 617, son of Æthelric, whom he succeeded. He defeated Aidan (Edhan) at the battle of Dægsastan (probably Dawstone), 603; defeated the Welsh at the battle of Chester, 613, massacring about twelve hundred of the two thousand monks from Bangor Yscoed, who were praying for the success of the Welsh; and was defeated and killed by Redwald at the battle of the Idle, 617.

Æthelred (ath'el-rád), or Ethelred (eth'el-red), or Ethered (eth'e-red), I. King of the West Saxons from 866 to 871, son of Æthelwulf.

Æthelred, or Ethelred, II. Born 968; died at London, April 23, 1016. King of England, surnamed "The Unready" ('lacking counsel'), son of Edgar and Elfrida. He succeeded to the throne 979, instituted the payment of "danegeld" 991, ordered a general massacre of the Danes 1002, was deposed 1013, and was restored 1014.

Æthelstan. See Athelstan.

Æthelwulf (ath'el-wulf), or Ethelwulf (eth'el-wulf), or Athulf. Died Jan. 13 (June 13?), 858. An Anglo-Saxon king, son of Eegberht (king of Wessex, ruler of Sussex, Kent, and Essex, and overlord of Mercia, East Anglia, Northumbria, Wales, and Strathclyde), whom he succeeded in 839. In 842 he was defeated by the Danes at Charmouth, but in 851 repulsed them with great slaughter at Ockley in Surrey. In 856 he married a second wife, Judith, the daughter of Charles the Bald. The West Saxons revolted under his son Æthelbald to whom he surrendered the government of Wessex, retaining only his overlordship.

Æther (æ'thër). [Gr. Aîθήρ.] In Greek mythology, the son of Chaos and Darkness, and the brother of Night, Day, and Erebus; or, according to Hesiod, the son of Erebus and Night, and the brother of Day. By Day he was the father of Land, Heaven and Sea; by Earth, of the Giants and Titans and the vices which destroy the human race. According to the Orphic hymns, he is the soul of the world from which all life springs. In later times he was regarded as the broad expanse of heaven, the abode of the gods.

Æthiopia. See Ethiopia.

Æthiopia. See Thyagenes and Chariclea.

Æthiopsis (æ-thí'ô-pis), or Lay of Æthiopia. A Greek epic poem of the Trojan cycle, by Arctinus of Miletus, the oldest certainly known epic poet (about 776 B.C.); so named from one of its heroes, Memnon the Æthiopian. It was a continuation of the Iliad, reaching "from the death of Hector to that of Achilles, and telling of the arrival of the Amazons and the Æthiopians to aid Troy."

Ætians. See Ætius and Anomeans.

Ætíon (æ-é'shi-on). [Gr. Æτίων.] A noted Greek painter, probably a contemporary of Apelles. His picture of the "Marriage of Alexander and Roxana" was famous in antiquity.

Ætíus (æ-é'shi-us), or Aetios (-os). [Gr. Æτίος.] Born at Antioch, in Cæle-Syria; died at Constantinople, 367 A. D. A Syrian theologian, surnamed "The Atheist," the founder of a sect of extreme Arians, called Ætians from him, Eunomians from his disciple Eunomius, and Anomeans. The Ætians "were the first to carry out the doctrines of Arius to their legitimate issue, and in opposition both to Homoousians and Homoiousians maintained that the Son was unlike, ἀνόμοιος, the Father" (whence the name Anomeans).

Ætíus. Born at Durostorus (Silistria) about 396; killed at Rome, 454. A Roman general, commander-in-chief under Valentinian III. He gained many victories over the West Goths, Franks, Burgundians, and other northern invaders, and is famous for his victory over Attila, near Châlons-sur-Marne, 451. He was put to death by the emperor.

Ætíus. Born at Amida, Mesopotamia; flourished about 500 A. D. A Greek writer, author of a medical work in sixteen books (Latin translation 1542). Though essentially a compilation, it is one of the most valuable books of antiquity on medicine.

Ætna (æ'tnâ). A Latin didactic poem erroneously attributed to Vergil. It combats the popular mythical theory of the causes of volcanic action.

Ætna, Mount. See Etna.

Ætolia (æ-tó'li-ä), or Aitolia (i-tó'li-ä). [Gr. Αἰτωλία.] In ancient geography, a district of Greece, bounded by Epirus and Thessaly on the north, Doris on the northeast, Locris on the east and southeast, the Corinthian Gulf on the south, and Acarnania on the west. It now forms part of the nomarchy of Acarnania and Ætolia.

Ætolian League (æ-tó'li-an lég). A confederacy of Greek tribes whose constitution was copied from that of the Achaean League. It waged war against Macedonia 323 B. C., against the Gauls 279, and against the Achaean League 220, and was allied with Rome 211-192. It was dissolved in 167 B. C.

Afanasieff (ä-fä-nä'si-ef), Aleksandr. Born 1826; died 1871. A Russian archaeologist, author of "Russian Popular Stories." "Poetical Views of the Old Slavonians about Nature," etc.

Afar and Afar country. See Danakil and Danakil Country.

Afer (ä'fër), Domitius. Born at Nîmes, France; died 60 A. D. A Roman orator, a teacher of Quintilian. In A. D. 26 he conducted the accusation for the government against Claudia Pulchra, the cousin of Agrippina, and in A. D. 27 appeared against Varus Quintilius, her son.

Affenthal (äff'en-täl). A village near Baden, in Baden, noted for its red wine.

Afre (äfr), Denis Auguste. Born at St. Rome, Tarn, France, Sept. 27, 1793; died at Paris, June 27, 1848. A French ecclesiastic, appointed archbishop of Paris in 1840. He was mortally wounded in the insurrection of 1848, at the barricades, June 25, while attempting to admonish the insurgents.

Afghanistan (af-gan-is-tän'). A country of Asia, bounded by Asiatic Russia and Bokhara north, India and Kabristan east, Baluchistan south, and Persia west, and extending from about lat. 29° to 37° 30' N., and long. 61° to 72° E. The limits of the ameer's rule are ill defined. The chief divisions are Kabul, Herat, Kandahar, Afghan Turkestan, and Jelalabad. The ameer of Kabul is its absolute sovereign. The prevailing religion is Mohammedanism. Afghanistan became independent of Persia under the Durani dynasty in 1747. Under its ruler, Dost Mohammed, war broke out with the British in 1838. The latter captured Kandahar, Ghazni, and Kabul (1839), establishing a new ameer; but in 1841 the British agent was massacred, and the British army was annihilated in 1842 in retreating in the Kurd-Kabul Pass. General Pollock ended the war in 1842. In 1873, under the ameer Shere Ali, war again broke out with the British, who captured Jelalabad and Kandahar. Shere Ali fled, and Yakub Khan was proclaimed in 1879. A massacre of the British resident at Kabul was followed by an invasion under General Roberts, and Yakub Khan abdicated. The latter's brother Ayub Khan in 1880 defeated the British forces, but under General Roberts they relieved Kandahar in 1880, defeated Ayub Khan, and recognized Abdurrahman Khan as ameer. Various disputes arose regarding the boundary between Afghanistan and the Russian possessions. The Russians seized Penjeh in 1885, and war was narrowly averted. An Anglo-Russian commission arranged the delimitation of the northern frontier in 1886-87. Recent occurrences have been revolts of the Ghilzais and other tribes. Area (estimated), 279,000 square miles. Population (estimated), 4,000,000, including the Afghans proper, Pathans, Hindkis, Hazaras, Kataghans, etc.

Afghan Turkestan. A region between the Oxus and the Hindu-Kush Mountains, subject to the ameer of Kabul; a vague term.

Afghan wars. British wars with Afghanistan in 1838-42 and 1878-80. See Afghanistan.

Afghan (af'gan). 1. One of an Iranian race forming a large part (about 3,000,000) of the inhabitants of Afghanistan. The native name is Pushtānah (pl.).—2. One of the languages of the Aryan family, spoken by the Afghans or natives of Afghanistan, and called by them Pushtu or Pukhtu.

Afinger (äff'ing-er), Bernhard. Born at Nuremberg, Bavaria, May 6, 1813; died at Berlin, Dec. 25, 1882. A noted German sculptor.

Afium-Karahissar (ii-fë-üm'kä-rä'his-sär'), or Karahissar. [Turk., 'black castle of opium.'] A town in the vilayet of Khodwendikyar, Asiatic Turkey, about lat. 38° 33' N., long. 30° 28' E.; the native city of Othman, founder of the Turkish empire. Near it is the site of the ancient Synnada. Population, 20,000 (?).

Afranius (a-frä'ni-us), Lucius. A Roman comic poet, an imitator of Menander, living about 100 B. C. Fragments of his works are extant.

Afranius Nepos, Lucius. A Roman general, an adherent of Pompey. He was consul 60 B. C., was opposed to Caesar in Spain 49 B. C., and died in Africa 46 B. C.

Afrasiab (ä-frä-si-äb'). In the Shahnamah, son of the Turaman king Pesheng and a descendant of Tur, the son of Feridun. The obligation to blood-revenge for the death of Eraj, who had been killed by Tur and his brother Salnu, was the ground of the long struggle between Iran and Turan. A great part of the Shahnamah is taken up with the account of the wars waged by Afrasiab with Iranian sovereigns until he at last escapes from Iram, who had bound him, into the lake of Urmiah. As Afrasiab is induced to raise his head above the waters, he is caught with a lasso by Hom, who gives him over to Kalkhosrav, who beheads him. Afrasiab is the Franrasyan of the Avesta.

Africa (af'ri-kä). [F. Afrique, G. Afrika, Sp. It. Pg. Africa, L. Africa (whence Gr. Ἀφρική, the prop. Gr. term being Λιβύη, Libya), prop. adj. (sc. terra), from Afer (pl. Afri), an inhabitant of Africa, orig. with reference to the country of the Carthaginians, from whom the term was received.] 1. A continent of the eastern hemisphere, next to Asia the largest grand division of the world, bounded by the Mediterranean on the north (which separates it from Europe), the Isthmus of Suez (which connects it with Asia), the Red Sea (which separates it from Asia), and the Indian Ocean on the east, the Southern Ocean on the south, and the Atlantic on the west. It extends from lat. 37° 20' N. to lat. 34° 50' S., and from long. 17° 31' W. to long. 51° 22' E. Its principal political divisions are Morocco, Algeria, Tunis, Tripoli, Barca, Fezzan, Egypt, the Mahdi's dominions (in the eastern Sudan), Abyssinia, the Italian possessions, British East Africa, German East Africa, British protectorates in the interior, the Portuguese possessions on the east and west coasts, British South Africa (Cape Colony, Natal, etc.), the Orange Free State, the South African Republic, the German possessions in west Africa (Kamerun, Togo-land, Damaraland, etc.), the Kongo Free State, the French Kongo, the British possessions in west Africa (Sierra Leone, Gold Coast, etc.), the French sphere of influence in western Africa (including the western Sahara), Senegal, Liberia, the Spanish coast, and various native states in the Sudan (Bambara, Gando, Sokoto, Bornu, Adamawa, Wadai, etc.). The more distinctive physiographic features of the continent are to be found in the Atlas Mountains, the Sahara, the great equatorial forests, the lake region (Albert Nyanza, Victoria Nyanza, Tanganyika, etc.), and in the south-central plateau. Principal rivers: Nile, Kongo, Niger, and Zambesi (with the Victoria Falls, the "African Niagara"). Africa has at least one active volcano, the Mfumbiro; highest elevation of the land, the glacier-cloved volcanic Kilimanjaro. Its inhabitants are chiefly of the negro race, with Kairs, Hottentots, Copts, Arabs, Moors, Berbers, and some Europeans. The prevailing religions are Mohammedanism, various forms of paganism, the Coptic Church, and the Abyssinian Church. The name "Dark (continent)" has been given to it as the least-known of the earth's grand divisions. Its northern portions were early seats of civilization, and part of the Roman Empire; but much of its interior is still unexplored. It was circumnavigated by the Phenicians as early as the 7th century B. C. Coast-line exploration was undertaken by the Portuguese in the middle of the 15th century, and the Cape of Good Hope was doubled by Da Gama (1497). Explorations (interior) have been made since the last part of the 18th century by Bruce, Mungo Park, Hornemann, Burckhardt, Denham, Clapperton, Lanier, Oudney, Rebmann, Barth, Richardson, Overwey, Vogel, Livingstone, Burton, Speke, Grant, Baker, Stanley, Schweinfurth, Mauch, Nachigal, De Brazza, Floh, Wissmann, Serpa Pinto, Cameron, Rohlfis, Leuz, Du Chaila, Emin Pasha, and others. Recent events are the founding of the Kongo Free State, and the partitioning among various powers (Great Britain, France, Germany, Portugal, Italy, Spain, etc.) of immense districts especially in the interior and along the eastern and western coasts: this so-called "scramble for Africa" began about 1884. (See Spheres of Influence.) The length of Africa is 4,970 miles, its breadth about 4,700 miles, its area (estimated, Petermann), 11,508,733 square miles, and its population (estimated, Petermann's), 163,953,000.

African names. In most purely African languages the names of tribes, languages, and countries, as first heard and written by travelers, colonists, authors, and cartographers, appear not in their naked form, but adorned with prefixes or suffixes, which distinguish the name of one member of the tribe from many, the tribe from the language, and the country from both tribe and language. Strictly speaking, the only correct way would be to use the prefixes and suffixes as the natives do. This, however, is impossible, because the languages are not yet suffielently known, and because a specialist alone could master the great variety of prefixes and suffixes. Therefore Dr. Lepsius and Dr. R. N. Cust, and many after them, prefer to use the stem of the word, as will be ascertained, and add to it, respectively, "man," "men," "tribe," "language," "country." Thus, Ganda man (instead of M-ganda), Ganda tribe or people (instead of Bu-ganda), Ganda language (instead of Lu-ganda), and Ganda-land (instead of Bu-ganda). Uganda, as generally written, is the Shuhili form of Bu-ganda. In this dictionary the tribe and the dialect will generally be found under one name, the word-stem. In the case of suffixes, which are used in a few Nigritic and in the Hottentot and Hamitic languages, there is no difficulty; for the initial syllables are not affected, and can be readily found in the dictionary. Thus in Mandi-ngo, of the Nigritic branch, the stem is Mandi or Mande, and -ngo is a suffix. In the Hottentot name Nama-qua, the suffix -qua signifies people or tribe; and it is better to say Nama tribe or people. The greatest difficulty is met with in the Bantu languages, where every noun has a prefix for the singular and another for the plural. The following rules will be found useful: In a general way, and in cases of doubt, the prefix Mu- may be considered to signify 'person' (man, woman, or child), Ba- or Wa- to signify people, U- to signify country, and Ki- to signify language. Thus, Mu-gogo, a Gogo man; Wa-gogo, Gogo people; U-gogo, Gogo-land; Ki-gogo, Gogo language. Generally speaking, too, the plural prefix Ama- (or tribe) is used among the Kafirs in South Africa, Ova- in West Africa, between Benguela and Waldisch Bay, A- or Akua- from Loanda to the Lunda country, Eshi- (Ezi-), Bashi-, and Bena- from the Kongo district of Angola due east to Nyangwe, Ba- in the Kongo basin and central Africa generally, Wa- in East Africa. The prefixes of most frequent occurrence, in proper names, are: Man: Mu-, Um-, Mo-, M-; seldom Ki-, Tshi-, Ka-, Mushi-, Mukua-. People: Ba-, Wa-, Ova-, A-, Mu-, Ama-; seldom I-, Tu-, Eshi- or Bashi-, Akua-. Language: Ki-, Tshi-, Shi-, Si-, Se-; seldom U-, Lu-, Di-. Land: Bu-, U-; seldom Le-.

Examples:

	Man.	People.	Language.	Land.
Ganda:	M-ganda.	Ba-ganda.	Lu-ganda.	Bu-ganda.
Luba:	Mo-luba.	Wa-luba.	Ki-luba.	U-luba.
Gogo:	Mu-gogo.	Wa-gogo.	Ki-gogo.	U-gogo.
Gwamba:	Mo-gwamba.	Mw-gwamba.	Shi-gwamba.
Suto:	Mo-suto.	Ba-suto.	Sb-suto.	Le-suto.
Mbangala:	Ki-mbangala.	I-mbangala.	U-mbangala.
Mbunda:	Oshi-mbunda.	Ovi-mbunda.	U-mbunda.
Langue:	Mushi-lange.	Bashi-lange.	Kishi-lange.
Ngola:	Mukua-ngola.	Akua-ngola.	Di-ngola.

African languages. Our knowledge of African languages is not yet sufficient to warrant a final, or even a generally acceptable, classification. Specialists contradict each other as soon as they begin to classify. The English-speaking public still holds to the temporary classification of Dr. R. N. Cust in his "Modern Languages of Africa," which is simply that of Fr. Müller in his "Grundriss der Sprachwissenschaft." German Africanists show, of late, a preference for that of Dr. Lepsius in the introduction to his "Grammar of Nuba." Somewhat modified, this will probably be that of the future. Our classification tries to combine the nomenclature of Dr. Cust, generally followed in English books, with the facts, which give more support to the system of Lepsius. The main question is about the relation of Bantu and Negro.

I. Purely African languages.

- (1) Negro languages:
 - (a) Bantu languages (pure).
 - (b) Nigritic or Sudan-negro languages (mixed).
 - (c) Nuba-Fulah or Pul languages (mixed).
- (2) Hottentot, Bushmen, or Batua languages:
 - (a) Hottentot languages, } in South Africa.
 - (b) Bushmen languages, }
 - (c) Pygmy languages, in central Africa.

II. Hamitic languages:

- (a) Egyptian.
- (b) Libyan or Berber languages.
- (c) Ethiopian or Kushitic languages.

III. Extra-African languages.

- (1) Semitic languages:
 - (a) Pure Arabic (Egyptian, Maghreb, Sudani, and Muscat dialects).
 - (b) Mixed (Amharic, Tigré, etc.).
 - (c) Malay languages (Madagascar).
 - (2) Aryan languages.
 - (a) English, in South Africa and Liberia. } Pure.
 - (b) French, in Algeria. }

English Creole (in West Africa, Kru-English).
Portuguese Creole (Cape Verde Islands; S. Thomé and Principe Islands).
Dutch Creole (Boers and Hottentots).

In the English, Portuguese, and Dutch Creoles, the word-stem is European; much of the phonology, morphology, and syntax is African. For the Semitic and Malay languages, see Arabic, Malay-Polynesian. For the purely African languages, see Bantu, Nigritic, Hamitic, Nuba-Fulah, Hottentot.—African ethnography. Owing to the scantiness of ethnographic data, the linguistic division of Africa is also generally applied to the ethnographic classification. It should, however, be remembered that the two do not cover each other exactly either within a family or group, or from class to class. Thus the Hottentots of Cape Colony have lost their original dialect, and adopted Dutch. The Ba-Kotse, on the Zambesi, have lost their language and adopted the Se-chuana dialect of the Ma-Kololo. The Nuba of Egypt, while retaining many characteristics of their language, have lost nearly all their racial traits, while, on the contrary, the Hausa have given up almost every trace of their first mother-tongue, but are still, racially, pure negroes. As a rule, the names of African tribes and languages or dialects, if stripped of prefixes and suffixes, coincide, and will be found under one title in this dictionary. See Bantu, Nigritic, Hottentot, Hamitic, Nuba-Fulah; also African names and African languages.

2. In ancient geography, a part of northern Africa which corresponded nearly to the modern Tunis. It comprised the immediate dominions of Carthage. Later it was a Roman province.

North Africa—the only Africa known to the ancients—had seen many rulers come and go since the Arabs under Okba first overran its plains and valleys. Dynasty had succeeded dynasty; the Arab governors under the Khalifs of Damascus and Baghdad had made room for the Houses of Idris (A. D. 788) and Aghlab (800); these in turn had given way to the Fatimi Khalifs (909); and when these schismatics removed their seat of power from their newly founded capital of Mahdiya to their final metropolis of Cairo (968), their western empire speedily split up into the several princedoms of the Zeyris of Tunis, the Beni Hammad of Tilimsan, and other minor governments. At the close of the eleventh century, the Murabits or Almoravides, a Berber dynasty, imposed their authority over the greater part of North Africa and Spain, but gave place in the middle of the twelfth to the Muwahhids or Almohades, whose rule extended from the Atlantic to Tunis, and endured for over a hundred years. On the ruins of their vast empire three separate and long-lived dynasties sprang up: the Beni-Hafs in Tunis (1228–1534), the Beni Ziyari in Central Maghrib (1235–1400), and the Beni Merin in Morocco (1200–1550). To complete the chronology it may be added that these were succeeded in the sixteenth century by the Corsair Pashas (afterwards Deys) of Algiers, the Turkish Pashas or Beys of Tunis, and the Sherifs or Emperors of Morocco. The last still continue to reign; but the Deys of Algiers have given place to the French, and the Bey of Tunis is under French tutelage.

Poolé, Story of the Barbary Corsairs, p. 21.

3. A diocese of the later Roman prefecture of Italy. It comprised the Roman provinces of Africa, Numidia, and a part of Mauritania, and corresponded to modern Algeria, Tunis, and Tripoli.

4. See the extract.

Africa meant to the Arabs the province of Carthage or Tunis and its capital, which was not at first Tunis but successively Kayrawan and Mahdiya. Throughout the later middle ages the name Africa is applied by Christian writers to the latter city. Here it was that in 1390 a "grand and noble enterprise" came to an untimely end. "The Genoese," says Froissart, "here great enmity to this town; for its Corsairs frequently watched them at sea, and when strongest fell on and plundered their ships, carrying their spoils to this town of Africa, which was and is now their place of deposit and may be called their warren." It was "beyond measure strong, surrounded by high walls, gates, and deep ditches."

Poolé, Story of the Barbary Corsairs, p. 131.

Agag (ä'gag). [Heb.; of uncertain meaning.] 1. An Amalekite king, spared by Saul, contrary to his vow, and slain by order of Samuel. 1 Sam. xv.—2. A character in Dryden's "Absalom and Achitophel," a satire of Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, a magistrate who received the declaration of Titus Oates. He was afterward found in a ditch dead and mutilated, hence the allusion (see def. 1).

Agamemnon (ag-a-mem'nön). [Gr. Ἀγαμέμνων.]

1. In Greek legendary history, the son of Atreus, king of Mycenæ, and the most powerful ruler in Greece. He led the Greek expedition against Troy, and on his return was slain, according to Homer, by Ægisthus, according to Æschylus, by his wife Clytemnestra, who was incited to the deed partly by jealousy of Cassandra, and partly through fear on account of her adultery with Ægisthus.

2. The greatest of the tragedies of Æschylus. The scene is laid in Argos, in the palace of Agamemnon, at the time of the king's return from the capture of Troy; the catastrophe is the murder (behind the scenes) of Agamemnon and Cassandra (whom he has brought captive with him) by the queen Clytemnestra urged on by her paramour Ægisthus. Tragedies with this subject have been written also by Seneca, Alfieri, and Lemercier.

Agamenticus (ag-a-men'ti-kus). Mount. A hill, 673 feet high, in York County, near the southwestern extremity of the State of Maine. The locality was the site of one of the earliest English colonies in Maine, led by Gorges and others, in 1631.

Agésilaus (a-je-si-lä'us) II., or Agésilaos (-os). [Gr. Ἀγσιλάος.] Died in Egypt in the winter of 361-360 B. C. King of Sparta from 399 to 361 B. C., a son of Archidamus II. of the Euryptid line, by his second wife Eupolia, and half-brother of Agis II. whom he succeeded. In 396 he came to the relief of the Asiatic Greeks against Persia, and in the following year defeated the satraps Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus. In 394, as he was preparing to enter the heart of the empire, he was called home by the ephors to take part in the Corinthian war, stirred up against Sparta by Persian gold. In 394 he defeated the troops of the allies at the battle of Coronea in Bœotia. In 393 he ravaged Argolis, in 392 the Corinthian territory, and in 391 reduced the Acarnanians. In 369 he maintained the unweakened Sparta against the attacks of four armies. He was present at the battle of Mantinea in 362, and in 361 he crossed with a Lacedæmonian army of mercenaries into Egypt.

Agger of Servius Tullius. [L. agger, mound, rampart.] An especially important stretch of the Servian Wall of Rome, extending from the Colline Gate, on the site of the present Ministry of Finance, across the low ground to the Esquiline Gate, adjoining the existing Arch of Gallienus, at the foot of the Esquiline. In the middle of the Agger there was a third gate, the Porta Viminalis. The Agger consisted of a great mound of earth, in front of which there was a ditch 30 feet deep and 100 wide. The mound had a very massive retaining-wall in front, rising 30 feet above the top of the ditch, and a lighter wall at the back. An impressive length of the front wall is standing, close to the railway-station.

Agni (ag'ni). [Skt.=L. ignis, fire.] In Hindu mythology, the god of fire. In the Veda he is the conveyer of the sacrifice, messenger and priest of men, their protector against the horrors of the darkness, the defender of the home. As one of the chief divinities of the Vedas great numbers of hymns are addressed to him, more than to any other god. He is one of the three great deities Agni, Vayu (or Indra), and Surya, who preside respectively over earth, air, and sky.

Agni Purana (ag'ni pü-rä'nä). A Purana (so named as supposed to have been communicated by Agni to Vasishtha) devoted to the glorification of Siva, but of very various contents, ritual, cosmical, ethical, military, legal, medical, rhetorical, grammatical, taken largely from earlier works. It is quite modern, and has no legitimate claim to be regarded as a Purana.

Agora (ag-ö-rä), The. [Gr. ἀγορά, assembly, market-place.] A large irregular area in Athens, entered beneath the northeast angle of the Colonus Agoræus hill, on which stands the so-called Theseum, by the broad portico-bordered Dromos street running to the Dipylon Gate, thence passing along the base of the "Theseum" hill, and extending one branch north of the Areopagus, and another around the western end of the Areopagus, and between the Pnyx and the Acropolis. This last portion was especially the political agora, while the portion north of the Areopagus was more particularly the original commercial agora or market-place, embracing as well a number of religious foundations, the famous portico, the Basilicos, Eleutherios, and Poikile, and the Bouleuterion or senate-house. The position of the new agora or oil-market is fixed by its existing Gate of Athena Archegetis: much of its inclosure also remains, south of the Stoa of Hadrian, and further east than the old agora. The great Stoa of Attalus II. undoubtedly faced on part of the commercial agora, and the so-called Stoa of the giants is within the area of the agora.

Agoracritus (ag-ö-rak'ri-tus), or Agorakritos (-tos). [Gr. Ἀγοράκριτος.] A Greek sculptor, a native of Paros, the favorite pupil of Phidias and the rival of Alcamenes. His most famous statue was a Nemesis, probably represented by a little statue in the Lateran.

A district of the division of Agra, intersected by lat. 27° N., long. 78° E. Area, 1,850 square miles. Population (1881), 974,656.—3. The capital of the division and district of Agra, situated on the Jumna about lat. 27° 10' N., long. 78° E. It is a military and commercial center, and exports raw silk, sugar, and indigo. It was the capital of the Mogul empire during the last part of the 16th and the first part of the 17th century, and was captured by the British in 1803. The English in Agra were besieged in the fort by the mutineers, Aug.-Oct., 1857. Population, including cantonment (1891), 168,662. Among the noted buildings of Agra are: (1) The palace of Akbar, massively built of red sandstone, richly sculptured, and exhibiting in its hotel-construction the marks of Hindu influence on the Indian-Saracenic style. (2) Adjoining lies the palace of Shah Jehan, half a century later in date, and forming a strong contrast in its white marble architecture, its dentellated arcades, and its inlaid work of arabesques and flowers in colored stone. (3) The Pearl Mosque, another notable foundation of Shah Jehan. The entire size, including the cloistered court, is only 187 by 234 feet, but the building is a gem of Mogul artistic design and execution. (4) The tomb of Itmad ud-Daulah, built under Jehangir, in the early 17th century. By its inlaid work in stone, possibly of Italian derivation, it marks an epoch in the Indian-Saracenic style. The exterior forms a single story with octagonal towers at the angles, and is surmounted by a square central pavilion with three arcades to a side, widely projecting bracketed cornice, and a domical roof. All the openings of the monument except the central portal are closed by marble slabs pierced in geometrical patterns of marvelous delicacy. (5) The Taj-Mahal (which see).

Aguirre, Lope de. Born at Oñate, Asturias, about 1508; shot Oct. 27, 1561. A Spanish adventurer who early in life drifted to America, and for twenty years led such a scandalous life in Peru that he was known as "Aguirre the madman." He was engaged in several rebellions, was outlawed, and joined the expedition of Pedro de Ursua in search of El Dorado and the kingdom of the Omaguas on the upper Amazon (1559). Ursua and his lieutenant Vargas were murdered by Aguirre and others at Machiparo, near the present site of Tabatinga on the upper Amazon, Jan. 1, 1561, and Fernando de Guzman (whom Aguirre afterward murdered) was made general with Aguirre as his lieutenant. From this time the expedition became a piratical cruise so wild that it bordered on insanity. The band declared themselves rebels, or maraonens, and proceeded down the Amazon, plundering Indian villages, fighting with one another, and committing every horrible crime; reaching the island of Margarita July 20, 1561. There Aguirre murdered the governor and others, robbed the royal treasury, and then made a descent on the mainland of Venezuela. He was captured at Barquisimeto, and shot by his own maraonens.

Ahab (ä'hab). [Heb. Ahab (Gr. Ἀχάβ), father's brother.] King of Israel, according to the traditional reckoning, 918-896 B. C., but according to some scholars 876-854 B. C.: the son and successor of Omri. He married Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre, and permitted the worship of Baal and Astarte in Samaria, alongside of that of Yahveh. By this, as well as by his luxury and wickedness in the matter of Naboth's vineyard, he provoked the anger of the prophets, more especially of Elijah. He engaged in a war with Benhadad of Damascus, whom he defeated in his second campaign, but whose life he spared. No reason for this is given in the Old Testament, and the act was denounced by the prophets. The reason of this act is found in the cuneiform inscriptions where we find that Shalmanezar II. in 854 B. C. fought with the kings of Damascus, Hamath, and with Ababu Sirla'a who is identified by most scholars with Ahab of Israel. The presence of the common enemy Assyria no doubt induced Ahab to make peace with Benhadad of Damascus. After the disappearance of danger from Assyria he made an alliance with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and carried on another campaign against Damascus, but was killed in a battle at Ramoth Gilead. The Old Testament contains considerable information concerning this period, which is supplemented by the cuneiform inscriptions and the Moabite stone. Ahab continued Samaria as the capital of Israel, but dwelt in Jezreel, which he greatly beautified.

Ahaggar (ä-hag'gär). A large plateau and mountainous region in Sahara, intersected by lat. 23°-24° N., long. 5°-6° E. The chief place in it is Ideles.

Ahalya (ä-hal'yä). In Hindu legend, the wife of the Rishi Gautama, and very beautiful: according to the Ramayana the first woman made by Brahma and given by him to Gautama. She was seduced by Indra. Gautama expelled Ahalya from his hermitage and deprived her of her preëminent beauty or, as others state, made her invisible. Rama restored her to her natural state and reconciled her to her husband. Kumarila Bhatta explains this seduction as Indra's (the sun's) carrying away the shade of night.

Ahanta (ä-hän'tä). A district on the Gold Coast of Africa, about long. 2°-3° W.

Ahantchuyuk (ä-hänt'chö-yök). A division of the Kalapooian stock of North American Indians, formerly on and about Pudding River, Oregon. The name was applied to them by the Cata-pooya. See Kalapooian. Also called French Prairie Indians, and Pudding River Indians.

Ahasuerus (ä-haz-ü-ë'rus). [Heb. Ahashve-rösh, Pers. Khschjārsha ('mighty' and 'eye'?).] Xerxes, who ruled 486-465 B. C., mentioned in Ezra iv. 6 and throughout the book of Esther. The Ahasuerus of the book of Daniel (ix. 1), who is called the father of Darius the Mede, cannot have been Xerxes; he has been variously identified with Astyages and Cyaxeres. See Xerxes.

Ahasuerus. 1. A name given to the legendary "Wandering Jew" (which see).—2. A prose drama by Edgar Quinet, published in 1833, founded on the legend of the Wandering Jew.

Ahava (ä'hä-vä). The name of a place and river or canal in Babylon at which the Jews who formed the second expedition which returned to Jerusalem with Ezra assembled. Its exact location is unknown. Ezra viii. 15.

Ahaz (á'haz). [Heb., 'possessor.'] King of Judah, according to some 735-715 B. C., according to others 734-728 or 742-727 B. C. The last date seems most probable. He was a contemporary of the prophet Isaiah. On his accession to the throne, which took place in his youth, Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, formed a conspiracy against him. Contrary to the advice of Isaiah he sought the assistance of the Assyrian king, to whom he paid homage and tribute. This latter fact is mentioned both in the Bible and the cuneiform inscriptions. In the latter he is called Iauhazi, which would indicate that his name is shortened from Jonhaz. His tribute to Assyria had the desired result, Tiglath Pileser attacking Rezin and Pekah. This policy culminated in the entire destruction of the kingdom of Israel. Ahaz was succeeded by his son Hezekiah.

Aix (ä). A small island off the western coast of France, 11 miles south of La Rochelle, the scene of several encounters between the French and British.

Aix (äs). [L. Aqua Sextia, Springs of Sextius (C. Sextius Calvinus, a Roman proconsul, its founder).] A city in the department of Bouches-du-Rhône, France, about lat. 43° 33' N., long. 5° 25' E. It is the seat of an archbishopric, and has a cathedral, a museum, an academy, and baths. It was colonized by the proconsul C. Sextius Calvinus 123 B. C., and became renowned for its baths. In its vicinity Marius defeated the Teutones and their allies with great slaughter 102 B. C. It became the capital of Provence, and a famous literary center, and was the temporary residence of the emperor Charles V. in 1536. Prior to the Revolution it had one of the chief provincial parliaments. It has an extensive trade in olive-oil and fruits, and manufactures of silks, etc. Aix contains a cathedral, of very early foundation, with Romanesque nave and later aisles and choir. The curious porch has antique columns, and cedar-wood doors of 1504, very delicately sculptured. A baptistery of the 6th century opens on the south aisle; it has eight Roman columns. Population (1891), 22,924.

Aix, or Aix-les-Bains (äs-lä-bän'). A town in the department of Savoie, France, the ancient Aque Gratianna or Aque Allobrogum, situated near Lake Bourgot, 8 miles north of Chambéry, renowned since Roman times for its hot sulphur springs. It has an arch of Campanus. Population (1891), commune, 6,296.

Aix-la-Chapelle (äs-lä-shä-pel'), G. Aachen (ä'chen). [Named from its mineral springs (L. aquæ), known from the time of Charlemagne, and the chapel (F. chapelle) of the palace.] A city in the Rhine Province, Prussia, about lat. 50° 46' N., long. 6° 5' E., an important commercial and railway center. It has large manufactures of cloth, needles, cigars, machinery, etc., and a noted cathedral, a bathhouse, famous hot sulphur springs, and a museum (the Suermondt).

It was founded by the Romans as a watering-place, was a favorite residence and the northern capital of Charles the Great (who died here), and became a free imperial city. From Louis the Pious to Ferdinand I. it was the crowning-place of the German emperors (hence called the "seat of royalty," etc.), and it was also the seat of numerous diets and councils. It was captured by the French in the revolutionary period, and was granted to Prussia in 1815. The cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle consists of the famous polygonal monument founded by Charlemagne in 796, and a beautiful Pointed choir of the 14th century. Charlemagne's structure was inspired by San Vitale at Ravenna and similar Italian buildings. It is 16-sided, about 105 feet in exterior diameter, with a dome 104 feet high and 45 in diameter over the central portion. The eight gables around the dome are 13th-century additions. The dome is supported by eight massive piers, and the surrounding ambulatory is two-storied. The marble throne of Charlemagne, in which his body sat for over 350 years, is now in the upper gallery. The mosaic on gold ground in the dome is modern. The choir is of light and elegant proportions; it is ornamented with medieval statues of Charlemagne, the Virgin, and the apostles, and with good modern glass. The chapels are interesting, and there is a fine late-Pointed cloister. The bronze doors of the west portal, which opens between two low cylindrical towers, date from 804. The bathhouse, or town hall, is a structure of the 14th century, interesting as incorporating what remains of the palace of Charlemagne, including the lower part of the west tower. The Kaisersaal, a great vaulted hall extending the entire length of the upper story, contains eight historical frescoes designed by Rethel, which rank among the finest examples of their class. The council-chamber is adorned with imperial portraits. Population (1890), commune, 103,470.

Aix-la-Chapelle. A governmental district of the Rhine Province, Prussia. Population (1890), 564,577.

Aix-la-Chapelle, Congress of. A congress of the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, assisted by the ministers Castlereagh and Wellington from Great Britain, Richelieu from France, Metternich from Austria, Nesselrode and Kapodistrias from Russia, and Hardenberg and Bernstorff from Prussia. The convention signed Oct. 9, 1815, provided for the immediate withdrawal of the army of occupation from France. The congress expressed the reactionary purposes of the Holy Alliance, and received France into the European concert.

Aix-la-Chapelle, Peace of. 1. A treaty (May 2, 1668), between the Triple Alliance (England, the Netherlands, and Sweden) on one side, and France on the other, acceded to by Spain, by which France returned Frenche-Comté to Spain and received twelve fortified towns on the border of the Spanish Netherlands, among them Lille, Tournay, and Oudenarde.—2. A treaty (Oct., 1748) which ended the war of the Austrian succession. The basis of peace was the mutual restitution of conquests, except in the case of Austria, which ceded Parma, Piacenza, and Guastalla to the Spanish infant Don Philip and confirmed Prussia in the possession of Silesia. The pragmatic sanction was confirmed in Austria.

Aizani. See Azani.

Aja (ä'jä). In Hindu mythology, a prince of the solar race, the son of Raghu or of Dilipa, son of Raghu.

Ajatasatru (ä-jä-tä-sat'rö). A king of Kasi (Benares), mentioned in the Upanishads, who was very learned and, though a Kshatriya, taught the Brahman Gargyabalaki.

Ajax (ä'jaks). [Gr. Aiag.] In Greek legend: (a) The son of Telamon and half-brother of Teucer, and one of the leading Greek heroes in the Trojan war, famous for his size and physical strength and beauty. According to Homer he was, next to Achilles, the bravest of the Grecian host. He several times engaged in single combat with Hector and gained the advantage over him, and was always a terror to the Trojans. There are various accounts of his exploits after the war and of his death. According to the common poetical tradition, he died by his own hand. The decision of Agamemnon (on the advice of Athena) to award the arms of Achilles to Odysseus drove Ajax mad, and in his insanity he furiously attacked and slew the sheep of the Greeks, imagining them to be his enemies. Shame for this conduct drove him to suicide. According to other accounts he was murdered. From his blood was said to have sprung up a purple flower bearing on its leaves the letters ai, the first letters of his name and also an exclamation of woe. His story was dramatized by Sophocles. (b) A Locrian legendary king, son of Oileus, and one of the heroes in the Trojan war: often called the Lesser Ajax.

Ajax, Sir. See the extract.

Sir Ajax seems to have been a title imposed on Sir John Harrington, for a very meritorious attempt to introduce cleanliness into our dwellings. . . . In 1596, he published, under the name of Misacmos, a little treatise called, "A new discourse of a stale subject, or the Metamorphosis of Ajax," of which the object was to point out the propriety of adopting something like the water-closet of the present day. As the nature of his subject led him to lay open the interior of our palaces and great houses, offence was taken at his freedom: he lost, at least for a time, the favour of Elizabeth (his godmother), and was banished from court. His gains, from his well-timed labours, were apparently confined to the honour of contributing to the merriment of the wits, Shakspeare, Jonson, Nabbes, and many others, who took advantage of his own pun (a-jakes), and dubbed him a knight of the stool: under which title he frequently appears in their pages.

Gifford, Note to Jonson's "The Silent Woman," l. 447.

Ajigarta (ä-jë-gär'tä). The poor Brahman Rishi who sold his son Sunahsepa to Rohita to be a substitute for Rohita, King Harishandra having vowed that if he obtained a son he would sacrifice him to Varuna, and Rohita having been the son given.

Ajmir, or Ajmere (äj-mër'). A province in Rajputana, British India, intersected by lat. 26° 20' N., and long. 74° 30' E. It is under the supervision of the governor-general of India, and was ceded to the British in 1818. Area, 2,711 square miles. Population (1891), 542,358. Also Ajmer.

Ajmir, or Ajmere. The capital of the province of Ajmir, about lat. 26° 29' N., long. 74° 40' E. The Mosque of Ajmir was founded in the early 13th century, and is one of the first established in India. It occupies the spacious square court of a Jain temple, whose old colonnades of graceful and well-carved columns remain in place around the walls and support a series of low domes. The great beauty of the monument lies in the screen of seven keel-shaped Mohammedan arches carried across the west side of the court in front of the colonnade. This screen is covered with bands of Kufic and Togra inscriptions separated by diaper-work, admirable in decorative motive, and cut with great delicacy. Population (1891), 68,843. Also Ajmeer.

Ajodhya (ä-jöd'hä'yä). A suburb of Faizabad, Oudh, British India, on the site of an important ancient city.

Ajunta (ä-jun'tä), or Adjunta. A small place in the Nizam's dominions, India, about 55 miles northeast of Aurangabad, celebrated for its cave-temples. The Buddhist vihara, or monastery, is known as Cave No. 16. It is rock-cut, in plan a rectangular hall about 65 feet square, with a hexastyle portico preceding the portal. At the back is a rectangular pillared shrine, in which is an enthroned figure of Buddha. The sides are bordered by 16 small cells for the recluses. The hall has an interior peristyle of 20 fine columns, with cubical corbeled capitals. The columns and flat ceiling are carved with rich arabesques, and the walls are covered with interesting paintings of Buddhist scenes. The monument dates from the 5th century A. D., and is typical of a large class of similar viharas. Sometimes, as in the Great Vihara at Bagh, a shala or school, in form a pillared hall separate from the main foundation, is attached to the vihar.

Akabah (ä-kä-bä'). A haven in Arabia Petraea, at the head of the Gulf of Akabah, about lat. 29° 33' N., long. 35° 24' E. Near it were the ancient Elath (Elana) and Ezion Geber.

Akbar, or Akber (äk'bër: Hindu pron. uk'bër), or Akhbar, originally Jel-al-eddin Mohammed (je-läl'ed-dën' mö-häm'ed). [Ar., 'very great.'] Born at Amarkot, Sind, India, Oct. 14, 1542; died at Agra, India, Oct. 13, 1605. A great Mogul emperor in India, 1556-1605. He was born during the exile of his father Humayun. After twelve years Humayun recovered the throne of Delhi, but died within a year, when in 1556 Akbar succeeded him, ruling at first under the regency of Bairam Khan. In his eighteenth year he threw off this yoke. By war and policy he consolidated his power over the greater part of India. He put an end to the conflict between Afghan and Mogul, and sought to reconcile Hindu and Mohammedan. He interested himself in various religions, Brahmanism, Buddhism, Mazdaism, and Christianity, and even sought to establish a religion of his own. He sought to better his subjects by measures of toleration and improved social laws. He permitted the use of wine, but punished intoxication; tried to stop widow-burning; permitted the marriage of Hindu widows; forbade the marriage of boys before sixteen and of girls before fourteen; to gratify his Hindu subjects prohibited the slaughter of cows; had his lands accurately surveyed and statistics taken; constructed roads; established a uniform system of weights and measures; and introduced a vigorous police. He was sometimes harsh and cruel, and is charged with poisoning his enemies. The rebellion of his son Selim, later known as Jahangir, was a Mohammedan uprising against Akbar's apostasy. The rebellion was suppressed, and Akbar returned to the faith. He was probably poisoned at the instigation of Jahangir.

Akiba (ü-ké'bü) ben Joseph ('Akiba son of Joseph'), or simply Rabbi Akiba. Executed 132 (?) A. D. The most distinguished Jewish personage in the 2d century. There are many legends about him. He introduced a new method of interpreting the oral law (Halacha) and reduced it to a system (Mishna). He took an active part in the rebellion which broke out against Hadrian under the leadership of Bar-Cochba (132 A. D.) and suffered death by torture for his share in this unsuccessful uprising.

Akita Ken (á-ké'tü ken). A ken in the north-western part of the main island (Hondo) of Japan. Its chief town is Akita. The population of the town is about 30,000.

Akka (ák'ká). A tribe of pygmies discovered by Miani and Schweinfurth in central Africa, between the Nepoko and Aruwimi rivers. Their average height is 1.33 meters, complexion light brown, hair scanty and woolly, head large, nose flat, arms long, legs short, and hands well formed, but not the feet. They are expert hunters, live in temporary grass huts of beehive shape, and keep no domestic animals, save chickens. Also called Tikke-Tikke, or, in Bantu speech, Wambuti.

It seems possible, therefore, that at an epoch when the Sahara was still a fertile land, and the Delta of Egypt an arm of the sea, a race of men allied to the Bushmen ranged along the southern slopes of the Atlas mountains, and extended from the shores of the Atlantic on the one side to the banks of the Nile on the other. Of this race the brachycephalic Akkas and other dwarf tribes of Central Africa would be surviving relics. They were driven from their primitive haunts by the negro invasion, and finally forced into the extreme south of the continent by the pressure of the Bantu or Kafir tribes.

Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 148.

Akkad, or Accad (ák'kad or ak'ad). One of the four cities of Nimrod's empire (Gen. x. 10) in Shinar or Babylonia: in the cuneiform inscriptions it is usually the name of a region.

The kings of Babylonia and those of Assyria who conquered Babylonia call themselves "king of Sumer and Akkad," whence it is usually assumed that Sumer denominated southern Babylonia and Akkad northern Babylonia. The boundaries of this district are not certain, but it seems to have lain between the Tigris and the Elamitic and Median mountains, its northern limit being the upper Zab. The name of a city, Agade, was discovered in an inscription of Nebuchadnezzar, which is held by some to be identical with the city of Akkad. Agade was the residence of the earliest-known Babylonian king, Sargon I. (about 3800 B. C.). Cyrus mentions this city as still existing in his time. Friedrich Delitzsch considers it part of the city of Sepharvaim; other scholars, however, doubt the identification. Akkadian is the name given to the people and dialect of Akkad. The people were supposed to be a non-Semitic tribe and their language agglutinative; the literature in this dialect consisted chiefly of magical incantations. This theory has been strongly defended by Oppert and Haupt. Joseph Halévy and others hold that this non-Semitic people and language never existed and that the writing is simply a cryptography or secret writing invented by the priests to lend a greater mystery to their sacred writings. The most recent theory is that the so-called Akkadian dialect is simply an older form of Sumerian and should be called Old Sumerian. (See Sumeria.) Akkadist is the name given to a person who believes in the real existence of the Akkadian dialect and people: the opponents of this school are called anti-Akkadists.

Her crew and equipments were English. She cruised 1862-64, destroying American shipping, and was sunk by the Kearsarge, off Cherbourg, June 19, 1864.

Alabama claims. Claims for damages preferred by the United States against Great Britain for losses caused during the Civil War by the deprivations on American commerce of vessels—the chief of which was the Alabama—fitted out or supplied in British ports under the direction of the Confederate government. The adjustment of these claims was provided for by the treaty of Washington, concluded May 8, 1871, which referred them to a tribunal of arbitration to be composed of five members, named respectively by the governments of the United States, Great Britain, Italy, Switzerland, and Brazil. The tribunal assembled in Geneva, Switzerland, Dec. 15, 1871, and was composed of the following arbitrators: Count Federico Sclopis, of Italy; Baron Itajuba, of Brazil; Jacques Staempfli, of Switzerland; Charles Francis Adams, of the United States; and Lord Chief Justice Sir Alexander Cockburn, of Great Britain. The agent for Great Britain was Lord Tenterden, the counsel Sir Roundell Palmer; the agent for the United States, J. C. Bancroft Davis, the counsel William M. Everts, Caleb Cushing, and Morrison R. Waite. Count Sclopis was elected president, and Alexandre Favrot, of Switzerland, secretary. After having received the cases of the contending parties, the tribunal adjourned till June 15, 1872. The United States claimed, in addition to direct damages, consequential or indirect damages; while Great Britain contended against any liability whatever, and especially against any liability for indirect damages. Sept. 14, 1872, the decision of the tribunal was announced, a gross sum of $15,500,000 in gold being awarded the United States in satisfaction for all claims. The Geneva tribunal is of importance in the history of international law on account of the rules relating to neutrals which it adopted to guide its action.

Alabama Claims Commission. A commission of representatives of Great Britain and the United States, for the settlement of the Alabama claims. Its members were Earl de Grey and Ripon, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir Edward Thornton, Sir John Macdonald, and Professor Montague Bernard, for Great Britain; and Hamilton Fish, Robert C. Schenck, Samuel Nelson, Ebenezer R. Hoar, and George H. Williams, for the United States. They concluded the treaty of Washington, May 8, 1871. Aladdin (a-lad'in). In the story of "Aladdin or the Wonderful Lamp," in the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments," the son of a poor widow in China, who becomes possessed of a magic lamp and ring which command the services of two terrific jinns. Learning the magic power of the lamp, by accidentally rubbing it, Aladdin becomes rich and marries the Princess of Cathay through the agency of the "slave of the lamp" who also builds in a night a palace for her reception. One window of this palace was left unfinished, and no one could complete it to match the others. Aladdin therefore directs the jinns to finish it, which is done in the twinkling of an eye (hence the phrase "to finish Aladdin's window"; that is, to attempt to finish something begun by a greater man). After many years the original owner of the lamp, a magician, in order to recover it, goes through the city offering new lamps for old. The wife of Aladdin, tempted by this idea, exchanges the old rusty magic lamp for a brand-new useless one (hence the phrase "to exchange old lamps for new"), and the magician transports both palace and princess to Africa, but the ring helps Aladdin to find them. He kills the magician, and, possessing himself of the lamp, transports the palace to Cathay, and at the sultan's death succeeds to the throne.

A celebrated king of the West Goths, 395 (?)–410, a member of the princely family of Ballin. He served under Theodosius as commander of the Gothic auxiliaries in the war against Eugenius and Arbogastes in 394, left the Roman service on the death of Theodosius, being elected king of the West Goths about the same time; invaded Greece in 396, and was compelled by Stilicho to retire to Epirus in 397; was appointed prefect of eastern Illyricum by Arcadius; invaded Italy in 408, and fought a drawn battle at Pollentia in 402 or 403, with Stilicho, who allowed him to escape to Illyricum; was made prefect of western Illyricum by Honorius; invaded Italy a second time in 408; and after twice besieging Rome captured and sacked it Aug. 24, 410. He died while preparing to invade Sicily and Africa, and was buried, with a vast treasure, in the bed of the river Busento.

Alaric II. Died near Poitiers, France, 507 A. D. A king of the West Goths, 484–507, defeated and slain by Clovis. He ordered the compilation of the code "Brevarium Alaricianum" or "Corpus Theodosii" (so named from the six books of the Theodosian code which it contains).

Alaric Cottin. See Cottin.

Alarodians (al-ä-rō'di-anz). See the extract.

In Tubal and Meshech we must see representatives of the so-called Alarodian race, to which the modern Georgians belong. This race was once in exclusive possession of the highlands of Armenia, and the cuneiform inscriptions found there were the work of Alarodian princes who established a kingdom on the shores of Lake Van. About B. C. 600 Aryans from Phrygia entered Armenia, overthrew the old monarchy, and imposed their rule upon the indigenous population. The bulk of the Armenians, however, still belong to the older race, though the language they have adopted was that of their invaders. The Alarodian is a family of inflectional languages, of which the Georgian in the Caucasus is the chief living representative. Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 50.

Albi, or Alby (äl-bé'). The capital of the department of Tarn, France, situated on the Tarn; the ancient Albiga. It has a cathedral (of St. Cecilia) and an archiepiscopal palace, and is the seat of a bishopric. It was a stronghold of the Albigenses, to whom it gave their name. The cathedral is a unique monument, massively built of brick, with the base of its walls sloped outward, the openings all high above the ground, and otherwise fitted to serve not only as a church but as a citadel. It is chiefly of the 14th century. It has a massive and lofty western tower, and a beautiful florid triple porch on the south side, lavishly carved in stone. The interior, without aisles or transepts, is 262 feet long, 62 wide, and 58 high, surrounded between the buttresses by 2 tiers of chapels. The celebrated 15th-century roof-loom and choir-screen are rich with delicate tracery and excellent figure and foliage sculpture. The roof and walls are covered with Italian frescos dating from about 1505. Population (1891), commune, 20,903.

Albigenses (äl-bi-jen'séz). A collective name for the members of several anti-sacerdotal sects in the south of France in the 12th and 13th centuries; so called from Albi, in Languedoc, where they were dominant. They revolted from the Church of Rome, were charged with Manichaean errors, and were so vigorously persecuted that, as sects, they had in great part disappeared by the end of the 13th century. A crusade against them was preached by Pope Innocent III, in 1208, and was led by Arnold of Cîteaux and Simon de Montfort. The war of extermination, which lasted for several years, was one of the bloodiest in history. Their doctrines are known chiefly from the writings of their orthodox enemies. Also called Cathari, and by many other names.

Albigensis (äl-bé-zhwä'). A former district of Languedoc, France, comprised in the modern department of Tarn.

Alboin (äl'boin). Died at Verona in 573. King of the Lombards from about 553 (560?) to 573, son of Alduin, whom he succeeded. He destroyed the kingdom of the Gepide (566), and married Rosamunda, daughter of the slain king Cunimund. In 568 he conquered Italy as far south as the Tiber, and established the kingdom of the Lombards with Pavia as its capital. He was murdered at the instigation of Rosamunda, whom, at a carousal, he had ordered to drink from her father's skull. She is said to have employed for this purpose a common soldier (Helmichis, Alboin's shield-bearer) whom she first allowed to become her paramour, and to whom she then offered the choice of perishing through the jealousy of Alboin or of becoming his murderer. This story is probably unhistorical.

Alcántara, Francisco Martin. Born in the province of Estremadura, probably about 1480; killed at Lima, Peru, June 26, 1541. A Spanish soldier, half-brother of Francisco Pizarro on the mother's side. He left Spain with Pizarro in 1529, and was with him during part of the conquest of Peru. He received a large inheritance which was unjustly taken from the younger Almagro. Alcántara was killed with Pizarro.

Alcántara, Doctor of. An operetta by Julius Eichberg produced in Boston in 1862, "the most successful work of any pretensions with an exclusively American reputation" (Grove).

Alcántara, Knights of. A religious and military order in Spain, created about 1156 by the brothers Don Suarez and Don Gomez de Barrientos to combat the Moors. In 1177 it was confirmed by Pope Alexander III. as a religious order of knighthood under Benedictine rule. It took its name from the fortified town of Alcántara, with whose defense it was intrusted about 1213, having hitherto been known as the order of the Knights of San Julian del Peryero. In 1494-95 the grand mastership was vested in the crown, and in 1540 the knights received permission to marry. In 1835 the order ceased to exist as a spiritual body, though it still remains in its civil capacity.

Alcazava Sotomayor, Simão de. Born about 1490; died on the east coast of Patagonia early in 1536. A Portuguese explorer, from 1522 in the service of Spain as a naval officer. In 1534 he fitted out, at his own expense, two vessels and 240 men, with the object of reaching Peru by the Straits of Magellan. Leaving San Lúcar Sept. 21, he touched at the Abrolhos Islands, Brazil, and arrived at the Straits in Jan., 1535; attempting to pass, he was driven back by a storm, and wintered at Puerto de los Lobos (probably St. Joseph's or St. Matthew's Bay). Thence he led a land expedition which crossed the country to the Andes and was the first to explore the Patagonian plateau. Alcazava himself was obliged by sickness to return to the ship, where he was shortly after murdered in a mutiny. Also Alcazaba, Alcazora, Alcazoba.

Alcedo (äl-thä'PHÖ). Antoniode. Born at Quito, 1735; date of death not recorded. A Spanish brigadier-general (1792) and geographer, son of Don Dionisio de Alcedo y Herrera, best known for his "Diccioneo geográfico-histórico de las Indias occidentales ó América" (Madrid, 1786-89, 5 vols.). There is an English translation by Thomson, London, 1812-15. He served during part of his life in America.

Alcedo y Herrera (äl-thä'PHÖ ē er-rä'rä), Dionisio de. Born at Madrid, 1690; died there, 1777. A Spanish administrator. From 1706 to 1752 he was almost constantly in Spanish America in various civil capacities. As president and captain-general of Quito (1725-37) he received the French commission sent to measure an arc of the meridian. From 1743 to 1749 he was captain-general of Tierra Firme and president of Panama. He published some works of considerable importance on the geography and history of South America.

Alceste. See Alcestis.

Alceste (äl-sést'). The principal character in Molière's comedy "The Misanthrope": a disagreeable but upright man who scorns the civilities of life and the shams of society. Wycherley has taken him as the model of his rude and brutal Manly in "The Plain Dealer."

Alcester, Baron. See Scymour, Sir Frederick.

Alcestis (äl-ses'tis), or Alceste (äl-ses'tē). [Gr. Ἀλκίστις, or Ἀλκίστη.] In Greek legend, the daughter of Pelias and wife of Admetus, king of Phere in Thessaly. When her husband was stricken with a mortal sickness she sacrificed her life for him, in accordance with the promise of Apollo that by this means he should be saved. According to one form of the legend she was allowed to return to the upper world by Persephone: according to another she was rescued by Hercules. She is the subject of a play by Euripides.

The Alcestis is a curious and almost unique example of a great novelty attempted by Euripides—a novelty which Shakspeare has sanctioned by his genius—I mean the mixture of comic and vulgar elements with real tragic pathos, by way of contrast. The play is not strictly a tragedy, but a melodrama, with a happy conclusion, and was noted as such by the old critics, who called the play rather comic, that is to say, like the new comedies in this respect. The intention of the poet seems to have been to calm the minds of the audience agitated by great sorrows, and to tone them by an afterpiece of a higher and more refined character than the satyric dramas, which were coarse and generally obscene.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 325.

Alchemb (äl-kemb'). [Ar.] A rarely used name for the second-magnitude star α Persei, usually called Mirfak, and sometimes Algenib.

Alchemist, The. A comedy by Ben Jonson acted by the King's Servants in 1610: a satire on the reigning folly of the time, the search for the philosopher's stone. It observes strictly the unities of time and place, and, in point of intellectual power, is regarded as the first of Jonson's plays. "The Empiric," a droll, was founded on it in 1676, and "The Tobaccocon," a farce, in 1771. It was entered in the Stationers' Register in 1610, but was not published till 1612.

Alchfrith (älch'frith), or Alchfrid (-frid). A son of Oswin, king of the Northumbrians, and Eanfild, daughter of Eadwine. He was created under-king of the Deirans by his father; married Cyneburh, daughter of Penda, king of the Mercians; and joined his father in the defeat of Penda, 655, near the river Winwady. He made unsuccessful war against his father, and probably fled to Mercia.

Alchiba, or Alkhiba (äl-kē-bä'). [Ar., 'the tent,' a name given by some of the Arabians to the constellation Corvus.] The seldom used name of the fourth-magnitude star α Corvi, which, however, is not the brightest in the constellation.

Alchymist (äl-chē-mēst'). Der. An opera by Spohr, composed about the end of 1829, and first performed at Cassel July 28, 1830. The libretto by Pfeiffer is based on a story by Washington Irving.

Alcibiades (äl-si-bi'ä-dēz). [Gr. Ἀλκιβιάδης.] Born at Athens, about 450 B. C.: killed at Melissa, Phrygia, 404 B. C. A celebrated Athenian politician and general, the son of Cleinias and Deinomache, and a pupil and friend of Socrates. After his father's death at the battle of Coronea he was brought up in the house of Pericles, who was his kinsman. He became leader of the radical party about 421; commanded the Athenian League 420-415; was appointed a commander of the expedition against Sicily in 415; and was accused of profanation in Athens, and fled to Sparta, in the same year, becoming an open enemy of Athens. In 412, having become an object of suspicion at Sparta (his death had been resolved upon), he went over to the Persians. He was soon recalled by the Athenian army, and commanded the Athenians in the victory over the Peloponnesians and Persians at Cyzicus 410, and in other successful battles. His failure at Andros and the defeat of his general at Notion in 407 caused him to be deposed from his command. After the battle of Ecospotami he sought refuge with Pharnabazus in Phrygia where he was treacherously put to death. He was celebrated for his great beauty and talents, and also for his self-will and unbridled insolence and capriciousness.

Alcibiades. A tragedy by Thomas Otway produced in 1675.

Alcibiades. A pseudonym used by Alfred Tennyson in "Punch."

Alcida: Greene's Metamorphoses. A pamphlet by Robert Greene, licensed in 1588, probably published in 1589. It consists of stories exposing the evils of women's pride and vanity.

Alcidamas (äl-sid'ä-mas). [Gr. Ἀλκίδαμας.] A

Greek rhetorician, a native of Elæa in Asia Minor. He was a pupil of Gorgias, and between 432 and 411 B. C. resided at Athens where he gave instruction in eloquence, being the last of the purely sophistical school of rhetoricians. Two extant declamations are ascribed to him.

Alcide (äl-séd'), Baron de M . . . A pseudonym used 1833-35 and in 1864 by Alfred de Musset.

Alcides (äl'si-dēz). A patronymic of Heracles, who was a descendant of Alcæus.

Alcina (äl-chē'nä). A fairy, the embodiment of carnal delights, in Boiardo's "Orlando Innamorato" and Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso": the sister of Logistilla (reason) and Morgana (lasciviousness). When tired of her lovers she changed them into trees, beasts, etc., and was finally, by means of a magic ring, displayed in her real senility and ugliness. Compare Acrasia, Arnida, and Circe.

Alcinous (äl-sin'ō-us). [Gr. Ἀλκίνοος.] In Greek legend, a king of the Phæaciens, in the island of Seberia, mentioned in the Odyssey. A considerable part of the poem (Books VI.-XIII.) is devoted to the events of Odysseus's stay in his dominions.

Alciphron (äl'si-fron). [Gr. Ἀλκίφρων.] Lived probably in the last part of the 2d century A. D. A Greek epistolographer whose identity is uncertain, Alciphron being, perhaps, an assumed name. The letters attributed to him "are about 100 in number, and are divided into three books. They represent classes of the older Greek community, and are valuable from the glimpses which they give of social life, the materials being mostly derived from the remains of the middle and new comedy. The most lively are those supposed to be written by celebrated hetære, especially those from Glyceria to Menander. The style is a careful imitation of the best Attic" (K. O. Muller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, III.). (Donaldson.) Alciphron. A character in Thomas Moore's romance "The Epiurean," published in 1827.

Moore also wrote a poem with this title, published in 1839.

Alciphron, or the Minute Philosopher. A philosophical dialogue by Bishop Berkeley, written to expose the weakness of infidelity. It was composed while Berkeley was at Newport, R. I., and was published in 1732.

Alcira (äl-thē'rä). A town in the province of Valencia, Spain, on an island of the Júcar 20 miles south of Valencia. Population (1887), 18,448.

Alcmæon (älk-mē'ōn). [Gr. Ἀλκμαίων.] In Greek legend, the son of Amphiarans and Eriphyle and the leader of the Epigoni in the expedition against Thebes. In accordance with the command of his father, given when he joined the first expedition against Thebes, and the advice of the oracle, he slew his mother, and was driven mad and pursued by the Furies in consequence. Having, under false pretenses, obtained from Phœgeus the Arcadian the necklace and robe of Harmonia (see Harmonia) for his wife Callirrhoe, he was waylaid and slain by Phœgeus's order.

Alcmæon. A Greek natural philosopher, born at Crotona, Italy, in the 6th century B. C., especially noted for his discoveries in anatomy.

Alcmæonidæ (älk-mē-on'i-dē). A noble family of Athens, a branch of the family of the Neleidæ which came from Pylos in Messenia to Athens about 1100 B. C. Among the more notable members of the family are Alcmæon, an Athenian general in the Cirthæan war; Megacles, a son of Alcmæon, and a rival of Pisistratus; Clithenes, the legislator, son of Megacles; Pericles, the celebrated Athenian statesman, great-grandson of Megacles; and the scarcely less famous Alcibiades, cousin of Pericles. The family was banished for sacrilege about 596 B. C., on account of the action of the Alcmæonid archon Megacles who 612 B. C. put to death the participants in the insurrection of Cylon while they clung for protection to the altars. They returned through an alliance with Lycurgus, carried on with varying fortunes a struggle with Pisistratus and the Pisistratidæ, and were finally restored in 510 B. C.

Alcman, or Alkman (älk'man), or Alcmæon.

[Gr. Ἀλκμάν, or Ἀλκμαιών.] The greatest lyric poet of Sparta. He flourished about the middle of the 7th century B. C., and was probably brought to Greece as a slave, in youth, from Sardis. "His six books contained all kinds of melos, hymns, pæans, prosodia, parthenia, and erotic songs. His metres are easy and various, and not like the complicated systems of later lyricists. On the other hand, his proverbial wisdom, and the form of his personal allusions, sometimes remind one of Pindar. But the general character of the poet is that of an easy, simple, pleasure-loving man. He boasts to have imitated the song of birds (fr. 17, 67)—in other words, to have been a self-taught and original poet." (Mahaffy, Hist. Greek Lit., I. 176.) Fragments of his writings are extant.

Alcmene (älk-mē'nē), or Alkmene. [Gr. Ἀλκμήνη.] In Greek mythology, the wife of Amphitryon and mother, by Zeus, of Heracles.

Alcobaça (äl-kō-bä'sä). A small town in the province of Estremadura, Portugal, 50 miles north of Lisbon. It contains a Cistercian monastery, founded in 1148, and believed to have been the largest of the order. The buildings now serve as barracks.

prelate and scholar, successively bishop of Rochester, Worcester, and Ely, and founder of Jesus College, Cambridge, 1496.

Alcofribas Nasier (äl-kō-frē-bä'ni-syā'). An anagrammatic pseudonym of François Rabelais, once or twice shortened to the first word only.

Alcolea (äl-kō-lä'ä). A locality in the province of Cordova, Spain, on the Guadalquivir 8 miles northeast of Cordova, where, Sept. 23, 1868, the Spanish revolutionists, under Serrano, defeated the royalists. The battle resulted in the overthrow of Queen Isabella.

Alcor (äl'kōr). [Ar., but uncertain; said to signify 'the rider.'] A small fifth-magnitude star very near to Mizar (ζ Ursæ Majoris). It is easily seen with the naked eye if the eye is normal, but not otherwise; hence sometimes used as a test of vision. It is called Alcore in the Latin version of the "Almagest."

Alcoran. See Koran.

Alcorn (äl'kōrn), James Lusk. Born Nov. 4, 1816; died Dec. 20, 1894. An American politician, founder of the levee system of the State of Mississippi, Republican governor of Mississippi 1870-71, United States senator 1871-77, and unsuccessful candidate for governor in 1873.

Alcott (äl'kōt), Amos Bronson. Born at Wolcott, Conn., Nov. 29, 1799; died at Boston, March 4, 1888. An American philosophical writer and educator, one of the founders of the school of transcendentalists in New England. He was son of Joseph Chatfield Alcox, a small farmer and mechanic, and Anna Bronson; the family name was originally spelled Alcocke. His youth was spent in peddling books and other wares, interrupted by school-teaching, chiefly in Virginia and North and South Carolina. He returned to New England in 1823, and soon after opened an infant school in Boston where he later (1834-37) conducted a well-known school in which the instruction was based upon the principles of self-analysis and self-education, the efforts of the teacher being directed to the development of the individuality of the pupil. He retired to Concord 1840, where he was intimately associated with Emerson, Hawthorne, Thoreau, and Channing, and became dean of the Concord School of Philosophy. His chief works are "Orphic Sayings" contributed to the "Dial" (1840), "Tablets" (1848), "Concord Days" (1872), "Table-Talk" (1877), "Sonnets and Canzonets" (1882).

Alcott, Louisa May. Born at Germantown, Pa., Nov. 29, 1832; died at Boston, Mass., March 6, 1888. An American author, daughter of A. B. Alcott. She was a teacher in early life and an army nurse in the Civil War. Among her works are "Little Women" (1868), "Old-Fashioned Girl" (1869), "Little Men" (1871), "Aunt Jo's Scrap-Bag" (1872-82), "Rose in Bloom," etc.

Alcoy (äl'koi'). A city in the province of Alicante, Spain, lat. 38° 42' N., long. 0° 27' W.: an important manufacturing center (paper, etc.). It was the scene of a bloody insurrection of the Internationale in July, 1873. Population (1887), 30,373.

Alcudia (äl-kō'vri-ä). A seaport on the northern coast of Majorca, Balearic Islands, formerly the chief fortress of the island. Population, about 2,000.

Alcudia, Duke of. See Godoy, Manuel de.

Alcuin (äl'kwīn), AS. Ealhwine (eälh'wi-ne). Born at York, England, 735; died at Tours, May 19, 804. An English prelate and scholar, abbot of Tours; also known as Albinus, Flaccus, and Albinus Flaccus. He was educated at York, and settled on the Continent in 782, on the invitation and under the protection of Charlemagne. He was master of the school of the palace and served as general superintendent of Charlemagne's schemes of ecclesiastical and educational reform. At the council of Frankfort in 794 he led the opposition to adoptionism, which the council condemned; and at the synod of Aachen (Aix-la-Chapelle) in 799 he persuaded Felix, the leader of the adoptionists, to recant (his second recantation). Alcuin wrote on a great variety of subjects, including theology, history, grammar, rhetoric, orthography, dialectics, etc. About 802 he revised the Vulgate. He was also a poet.

Alcyone (äl-si'ō-nē). [Gr. Ἀλκυώνη.] 1. In classical mythology: (a) The daughter of Æolus and wife of Ceyx. After the loss of her husband she cast herself into the sea and was changed into a kingfisher. (b) A Pleiad, daughter of Atlas and Pleione.—2. A greenish star of magnitude 3.0, the brightest of the Pleiades.

Alcionius (äl-si'ō-ni-us), or Alcionius, Petrus. Born at Venice, 1487; died at Rome, 1527. An Italian scholar, corrector of the press of Aldus Manutius, and professor of Greek at Florence; author of "Medicis legatus, sive de Exilio" (1522), etc.

Aldabella (äl-dä-bel'lä). 1. The wife of Orlando in Ariosto's poems, the sister of Oliviero and Brandimarte and daughter of Monodantes; in the old French and Spanish poems called Alda and Auda.—2. A character in Milman's play "Fazio": a handsome shameless woman who beguiles Fazio when he becomes rich, and after his execution is condemned to imprisonment in a nunnery for life through the interposition of Bianca, the wife of Fazio.

Aldabra Island (äl-dä'brä). A small island in the Indian Ocean, belonging to Great Britain, in lat. 9° 23' S., long. 46° 15' E.

Aldan (äl-dän'). A river in the government of Yakutsk, Siberia, which rises near the Yablonoi Mountains, and joins the Lena about lat. 63° N., long. 130° E. Its length is about 1,300 miles.

Aldan Mountains. A spur of the Stanovoi Mountains, in eastern Siberia, near the river Aldan.

Aldana (äl-dä'nä), Lorenzo de. Born in Estremadura about 1500; died at Arequipa, Peru, probably in 1556. A Spanish soldier who served with Alvarado in Guatemala and Peru, and in 1536 went with Juan de Rada to reinforce Almagro in Chile. In 1554 he was with Alonso de Alvarado in the campaign against Giron, and shared in the defeat at the Abancay (May 21, 1554). Authorities are not in accord as to the date of his death, Calancha placing it in 1571.

Aldborough (äl'd'bur'ō, locally ä'bro). A small town in Yorkshire, England, the ancient Isurium, 16 miles northwest of York, noted for its Roman antiquities (the pavements, foundations, etc., of the ancient city).

Aldborough, or Aldeburgh. A watering-place in Suffolk, England, 21 miles northeast of Ipswich. Population (1891), 7,467.

Aldea Gallega do Ribatejo (äl-dä'ä gäl-lä'gä dö rē-bä-tä'zhō). A town in the district of Lisbon, Portugal, near the Tagus 8 miles east of Lisbon.

Aldebaran (äl-de-bä-rän' or al-deb'a-rän). [Ar. al-dubārān, the follower or the hindmost, because in rising it follows the Pleiades.] The standard first-magnitude red star α Tauri. It is in the eye of the animal, and is the most conspicuous member of the group known as the Hyades. Also often called Pollucium (which see).

Aldegonde. See Sainte-Aldegonde.

Aldegrever (äl'de-grä-fer), or Aldegraf (äl'de-gräf), Heinrich. Born at Paderborn, Prussia, 1502; died at Soest, Prussia, 1562. A German engraver and painter.

An American naval officer, appointed captain Jan. 2, 1863, commodore July 25, 1866, and rear-admiral June 19, 1871, and retired March 31, 1872. He served in the Mexican war, and commanded the Richmond in the New Orleans campaign of 1862, and the Brooklyn in Mobile Bay, 1864, and in the attacks on Fort Fisher.

Alden, John. Born in England, 1599; died at Duxbury, Mass., Sept., 1686. One of the "Pilgrim Fathers," a cooper of Southampton, who was engaged in repairing the Mayflower and became one of the party which sailed in her. He is said to have been the first to step on Plymouth Rock, though this honor is also assigned to Mary Chilton. He settled at Duxbury and in 1621 married Priscilla Mullens. The incidents of their courtship form the theme of Longfellow's "Courtship of Miles Standish." He was a magistrate in the colony for more than 50 years, and outlived all the other signers of the Mayflower compact.

Alden, Joseph. Born at Cairo, N. Y., Jan. 4, 1807; died at New York, Aug. 30, 1885. An American educator. He was professor of Latin (later of rhetoric and political economy) in Williams College 1835-53, professor of mental and moral philosophy at Lafayette College 1853-57, president of Jefferson College, Cannonburg, Pennsylvania, 1857-62, and principal of the Albany, New York, Normal School 1867-72. He was also for a time editor of "The New York Observer," and was a prolific writer, chiefly of juvenile literature.

Aldersgate (äl'ders-gät). A gate in old London wall which stood in the reëntering angle of the old city between Newgate and Cripple-gate and at the junction of Aldersgate street and St. Martin's lane. It is called Ealdred's gate (Ealdredesgate) in the (Latin) laws of Ethelred.

Aldershot (äl'dēr-shot). A town on the border of Surrey and Hampshire, England, 34 miles southwest of London, noted for its military camp (established 1855). Population (1-91), 25,595.

Aldfrith (äl'd'frith), Ealdfrith (eäl'd'frith), or Eahfrith (eäh'frith). Died 705. King of the Northumbrians, an illegitimate son of Oswiu, and brother of Ecgfrith, whom he succeeded in 685.

Aldgate (äl'd'gät). [Originally Alegate: meaning probably 'a gate open to all,' or 'free gate.'] The eastern gate of old London wall, situated near the junction of Leadenhall street, Houndsditch, Whitehall, and the Minories. It must have been one of the 7 double gates mentioned by Fitz Stephens (who died 1191), not one of the Roman gates. The great road to Essex by which provisions were brought to the Roman city crossed the Lea at Old-ford and entered the city with the Eormine (Ermine) street, not at Aldgate but at Bishopsgate. Aldgate may have been opened in the reign of King Edgar, or that of Edward the Confessor, but probably dates from the first years of Henry I., at which time Bow Bridge across the Lea at Stratford is supposed to have been built by his queen Matilda.

Aldhelm (äl'd'helm), Saint. Born 640 (?); died at Douling, near Wells, England, May, 709. An English scholar and prelate, made bishop of Sherborne in 705. His best-known works are "De laude virginitatia," in prose, and a poem "De landibus virginum."

Aldiborontephoscophornio (äl'di-bō-ron'tē-fos'kō-fōr'ni-ō). A character in Henry Carey's burlesque "Chronohotonthologos." It was given as a nickname to James Ballantyne the printer, on account of the solemn pomposity of his manner, by Sir Walter Scott. See Rigdom Junnidos.

Aldiger (äl'di-gēr). In Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," a Christian knight and the brother of the enchanter Malagigi.

Aldine (äl'din) Press. The press established at Venice by Aldus Manutius. See Manutius.

Aldingar (äl'ding-gär), Sir. A ballad concerning a false steward who sought to take away the honor of his queen. In the ballad with this title from the Percy MS. the queen's name is Elinore, the wife of Henry II., but the story occurs repeatedly in connection with historical personages of nearly all the European nations.

Our conclusion would therefore be, with Grundtvig, that the ballads of Sir Aldingar, Ravensgar, and Mernering, and the rest, are of common derivation with the legends of St. Cunigund, Gundeborg, &c., and that all these are offshoots of a story which, "beginning far back in the infancy of the Gothic race and their poetry, is continually turning up, now here and now there, without having a proper home in any definite time or assignable place."

Child, Eng. and Scottish Ballads, III. 241.

Aldingar. The prior of St. Cuthbert's Abbey in Sir Walter Scott's poem "Harold the Dauntless."

Aldini (äl'dē-nē), Count Antonio. Born at Bologna, Italy, 1756; died at Pavia, Italy, Oct. 5, 1826. An Italian statesman, minister of the Italian republic and kingdom under the Napoleonic régime.

Aldini, Giovanni. Born at Bologna, Italy, April 10, 1762; died at Milan, Jan. 17, 1834. An Italian physicist, professor of physics at Bologna, brother of Antonio Aldini and nephew of Galvani.

Aldo Manuzio. See Manutius.

Aldo (äl'dō), Father. In Dryden's play "Limberham, or the Kind Keeper," an abandoned but kind-hearted old debauchee.

Aldobrandini (äl-dō-brän-dē'nē). A celebrated Florentine family, originally from the village of Lasciano, near Pistoja, established in Florence since the 12th century. Among its more important members are Giovanni A. (1525; died at Rome, 1573), an Italian cardinal, son of Silvestro A.; Giovanni Francesco A. (1546-1601), a papal general, nephew of Pope Clement VIII.; Pietro A. (1571-1621), an Italian cardinal, grandson of Silvestro A.; Silvestro A. (born at Florence, Nov. 23, 1499; died at Rome, Jan. 6, 1558), an Italian jurist; and Tommaso A. (1540?-72), an Italian man of letters, son of Silvestro A., author of a Latin translation of Diogenes Laertius.

Aldobrandini, Ippolito. See Clement VIII., Pope.

Aldred (äl'dred), or Ealdred (e-äl'dred), or Alred (äl'red). Died at York, England, Sept. 11, 1069. An English ecclesiastic, made bishop of Worcester in 1044 and archbishop of York in 1060. About 1050 he was sent on a mission to Rome by Edward the Confessor, and in 1054 to the court of the emperor Henry III. to negotiate for the return of Edward the Etheling from Hungary. He was the first English bishop to make the pilgrimage to Jerusalem (1068). According to one account (Florence of Worcester) he crowned Harold in 1066, but the ceremony was probably performed by Stigand. He submitted to William I, whom he crowned 1066 and over whom he is said to have exercised considerable influence.

Aldrich (âl'drich or âl'drij), Henry. Born at Westminster, England, 1647; died at Oxford, England, Dec. 14, 1710. An English divine, writer, musician, and architect, dean of Christ Church, Oxford, from 1689; author of a logical compendium (1691) which long remained a popular text-book (ed. by Mansel).

Aldrich, Nelson Wilmarth. Born at Foster, R. I., Nov. 6, 1841. An American politician, member of Congress from Rhode Island 1879-81, and Republican senator from Rhode Island 1881-.

Aldrich, Thomas Bailey. Born at Portsmouth, N. H., Nov. 11, 1836. An American poet, novelist, and journalist, editor of "Every Saturday" (Boston, 1870-74), and of the "Atlantic Monthly" 1881-90. His works include "Bells" (1856), "Ballad of Babie Bell" (1856), "Pamphina, and other Poems" (1861), "Poems" (1863, 1865), "Cloth of Gold, and other Poems" (1874), "Flower and Thorn" (1876), "Story of a Bad Boy" (1876), "Marjorie Daw, and other Poems" (1873), "Prudence Falfrey" (1874), "Flower and Thorn: Later Poems" (1876), "The Queen of Sheba" (1877), "Rivermouth Romance" (1877), "The Stillwater Tragedy" (1880), "From Ponkapog to Pesh" (1883), "Mercedes, and Later Lyrics" (1883), "Wyndham Towers" (1889), "The Sisters' Tragedy, and other Poems" (1891).

Aldridge (âl'drij), Ira. Said to have been born at Bellair, near Baltimore, about 1810; died at Lodz, Poland, Aug. 7, 1866. A negro tragedian, surnamed the "African Roscius," in early life valet of Edmund Kean. Among his chief parts was Othello.

Aldringer (ält'ring-er), or Aldringen (ält'ring-en), or Altringer (ält'ring-er), Count Johann. Born at Thionville (Diedenhofen), Lorraine, Dec. 10, 1588; killed at Landshut, Bavaria, July, 1634. An Imperialist general in the Thirty Years' War. He succeeded Tilly as commander of the army of the League in 1632, and distinguished himself under Wallenstein at Nuremberg.

Aldrovand (al'drô-vand), Father. A Dominican, the warlike chaplain of Lady Eveline Benger in Sir Walter Scott's novel "The Betrothed."

Aldrovandi (âl-drô-vân'dê), L. Aldrovandus (al-drô-vân'dus), Ulisse. Born at Bologna, Italy, Sept. 11, 1522; died at Bologna, May 10, 1605. A celebrated Italian naturalist, appointed professor of natural history at Bologna in 1560. At his instance the senate of Bologna established in 1568 a botanical garden, of which he was appointed director. He also served as inspector of drugs, in which capacity he published "Antidotarii Bononiensis-Epitome" (1574). His chief work is a "Natural History" in 13 volumes, especially notable on account of the profusion and excellence of its illustrations. The last 7 volumes were published after his death.

Aldstone (âld'stun), or Aldstone Moor, or Alston Moor. A town in Cumberland, England, 20 miles southeast of Carlisle. Population (1891), 3,384.

Alexander (âl-eg-zan'dêr). [Gr. Ἀλέξανδρος.] See Paris.

Alexander III., surnamed "The Great." Born at Pella, Macedonia, in the summer or autumn of 356 B. C.; died at Babylon, May or June, 323 B. C. A famous king of Macedon and conqueror, son of Philip and a pupil of Aristotle. He fought at the battle of Cheronæa in 338; succeeded to the throne in 336; subjugated Thrace and Illyria in 335; and conquered and destroyed Thebes and subdued opposition in Greece in 335. In 334 he started on his eastern expedition; gained the victory of Granicus in 334 and of Issus in 333; captured Tyre and Gaza, occupied Egypt, and founded Alexandria in 332; overthrew the Persian Empire at Arbela in 331; conquered the eastern provinces of Persia 330-327; and invaded India in 326. He returned from India to Persia 325-324. He became a hero of various cycles of romance, especially in the middle ages. See Alexander, Romance of.

Alexander. A Greek, or native of Lyncestis in Macedonia (whence his surname "Lyncestes"), implicated with his brothers in the murder of Philip, 336 B. C. Because he was the first to do homage to Alexander the Great, the latter pardoned him and raised him to a high position in the army, but afterward put him to death for a treasonable correspondence with Darius.

Alexander. A celebrated commentator on Aristotle of the end of the 2d and beginning of the 3d century A. D., a native of Aphrodisias in Caria, whence his surname "Aphrodisiensis." He was also called "the Exegete." More than half of his numerous works are extant. The most notable is a treatise on Aristotle's views concerning fate and freewill.

Alexander, surnamed Balas (the Semitic ba'al perhaps signifies 'lord'). Killed in Arabia, 146 B. C. A person of low origin who usurped the Syrian throne in 150 B. C. He was overthrown in battle by Ptolemy Philometor and was murdered by an Arabian emir with whom he had taken refuge.

Alexander I. Died 326 B. C. King of Epirus, son of Neoptolemus and brother of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great. His youth was spent at the court of Philip of Macedonia, who made him king of Epirus. On her repudiation by Philip, Olympias sought refuge with Alexander, and it was at his marriage with Philip's daughter Cleopatra in 336 B. C. that Philip was assassinated by Pausanias. In 332 B. C. Alexander crossed over into Italy to aid the Tarentines against the Lucanians and Brutii. He was treacherously killed by some Lucanian exiles at the battle of Pandosia.

Alexander II. King of Epirus, son of Pyrrhus and Lanassa, the daughter of Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuse. He succeeded his father in 272 B. C. He was dispossessed of Epirus and Macedonia by Demetrius, whose father, Antigonus Gonatas, he had deprived of Macedonia; but Epirus was recovered by the aid chiefly of the Acarnanians.

Alexander, surnamed Jannæus (Hob. Jannai, an abbreviation of Jonathan). Born 128 or 129 B. C.; died 78 B. C. King of the Jews from 104 till 78 B. C., a younger son of John Hyrcanus.

Alexander, surnamed "The Paphlagonian." An impostor, a native of Abonoteichos (Ionopolis in Cappadocia), who flourished about the beginning of the 2d century. He posed as an oracle and wonder-worker, and attained great influence. His tricks were exposed by Lucian.

Alexander, Saint. Died at Alexandria, April 17, 326. The patriarch of Alexandria from 312. He condemned the heresy of Arius in his dispute with Alexander Balaenlis, and attended the Council of Nicea in 325 with his deacon St. Athanasius.

Alexander. A Greek medical writer born at Tralles in Lydia, in the 6th century.

Alexander I. Bishop of Rome, successor of Evaristus. Eusebius in his history gives as the date of his accession the year 109 A. D., in his chronicle, the year 111 A. D. In both works he is assigned a reign of ten years.

Alexander II. (Anselmo Baggio, M. L. Anselmus Badajus). Born at Milan; died April 20, 1073. Pope from 1061 to 1073, successor of Nicholas II. He strove to enforce the celibacy of the clergy and the extravagant pretensions of the papacy. His election did not receive the imperial sanction, and an antipope, Honorius II. (Cadolanus, bishop of Parma), was chosen by a council at Basel, but was later deposed by a council held at Mantua. Alexander was succeeded by Hildebrand under the name of Gregory VII.

Alexander III. (Rolando Ranuci of the house of Bandinelli). Born at Siena, Italy; died Aug. 30, 1181. Pope from 1159 to 1181. He carried out successfully the policy of Hildebrand in opposition to Frederick Barbarossa and Henry II. of England. Three antipopes, Victor IV., Pascal III., and Calixtus III., elected in 1159, 1164, and 1168, respectively, were confirmed by the emperor and disputed the authority of Alexander, who was compelled to seek refuge in France from 1162 to 1165. The contest between the pope and the emperor ended in the decisive defeat of the latter at the battle of Legnano, May 29, 1176. In 1177 a reconciliation took place at Venice, and in 1178 the antipope Calixtus III. abdicated. The contest with Henry II. of England ended in the humiliation of the king and the canonization of Thomas à Becket, who represented the papal claims of supremacy.

Alexander IV. (Count Rinaldo di Segni). Died at Viterbo, Italy, May 25, 1261. Pope from 1254 to 1261. He attempted to unite the Greek and Latin churches, established the Inquisition in France in 1255, and encouraged the orders of mendicant friars. The last years of his pontificate were spent at Viterbo, whither he had been driven by the factional struggles in Rome.

Alexander V. (Pietro Philarghi). Born at Candia; died at Bologna, May 3, 1410. Pope from June 26, 1409, to May 3, 1410. He was elected by the Council of Pisa, after the deposition of Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII., with the understanding that he should reform the abuses of the church. He was, according to the general belief, poisoned by Balthasar Cossa, his successor under the name of John XXIII.

Alexander VI. (Rodrigo Borgia). Born at Nativa in Valencia, Jan. 1, 1431; died Aug. 18, 1503. Pope from Aug. 11, 1492, to Aug. 18, 1503. He was made cardinal and vice-chancellor in 1456 by his uncle Calixtus III., whom he also succeeded as archbishop of Valencia. His election to the pontificate is ascribed to bribery. His efforts were directed toward the aggrandizement of the temporal power of the papacy at the expense of the feudal vassals of the church, and toward the foundation for his family of a great hereditary dominion in Italy. In the furtherance of these plans two of his five illegitimate children by Rosa Vanozza (Cesar and Lucretia Borgia) played important parts. May 4, 1493, Alexander issued his bull dividing the New World between Spain and Portugal. In 1494 he unsuccessfully opposed the entrance of Charles VIII. into Naples, but in 1495 he joined the league between the emperor, Milan, Venice, and Spain, which drove Charles from Italy. May 23, 1498, the execution of Saronarola took place by his order, and in 1501 he instituted the censorship of books. He was poisoned, it is said, by a cup of wine intended for Cardinal Corneto.

Alexander VII. (Fabio Chigi). Born at Siena, Feb. 13, 1599; died May 22, 1667. Pope from April 7, 1655, to May 22, 1667. He was a patron of learning and art, and a poet. He promulgated a bull against the Jansenists, and, in 1662, in a conflict with Louis XIV., was deprived of Avignon. During his pontificate occurred the conversion to the Catholic faith of Christina, queen of Sweden, after her abdication (1654) of the Swedish crown.

Alexander VIII. (Pietro Ottoboni). Born at Venice, 1610; died Feb., 1691. Pope from 1659 till 1691. He condemned the doctrine of "philosophical sin," as taught by the Jesuit Bouquet of Dijon; assisted Venice against the Turks; and enriched the Vatican library by the purchase of Queen Christina's collection of books and manuscripts.

Alexander of Hales. Born at Hales, Gloucestershire, England; died 1245. A noted English theologian and philosopher, surnamed "Doctor Irrefragabilis." He lectured at Paris and was a member of the order of Franciscans. His chief work is "Summa Theologie" (printed 1475).

Alexander has acquired a place in the roll of medieval writers mainly by the accidents of his historic position. He was among the first to approach the labour of expounding the Christian system with the knowledge not only of the whole Aristotelian corpus, but also of the Arab commentators. He thus initiated the long and thorny debates which grew out of the attempt to amalgamate the Christian faith with a radically divergent metaphysical view. Liedie Stephen, Dict. Nat. Biog.

Alexander I. Born 1078 (?); died at Stirling, Scotland, April 27, 1124. A king of Scotland, the fourth son of Malcolm Canmore and Margaret, sister of Edgar the Ætheling, and brother of Edgar whom he succeeded in 1107. He married Sibylla, a natural daughter of Henry I. of England.

Alexander II. Born at Haddington, Scotland, Aug. 24, 1198; died in Kerrera, Scotland, July 8, 1249. A king of Scotland, son of William the Lion whom he succeeded in 1214; surnamed "The Peaceful." He joined the English barons against John.

Alexander III. Born at Roxburgh, Scotland, Sept. 4, 1241; died near Kinghorn, Fife, Scotland, March 16, 1286. A king of Scotland, son of Alexander II. whom he succeeded in 1249. His army defeated the Norwegians in 1263, and aided Henry III. of England in 1264.

Alexander I. Born at St. Petersburg, Dec. 23, 1777; died at Taganrog, Russia, Dec. 1, 1825. Emperor of Russia, son of Paul whom he succeeded in 1801. He encouraged education and science, and the introduction of Western civilization; carried out many reforms, including the abolition of serfdom in the Baltic provinces; and promoted trade and manufactures. In 1805 he joined the coalition against Napoleon; was present at the battle of Austerlitz; joined Prussia against Napoleon in 1806; signed the Peace of Tilsit in 1807; and conquered Finland in 1808. A successful war was waged with Turkey 1806-12. In 1812 Napoleon invaded Russia (see Napoleon). Alexander was a leader in the coalition against France 1813-14; was present at the battles of Dresden and Leipzig in 1813; entered Paris in 1814; took part in the Congress of Vienna; became king of Poland in 1815; again entered Paris in 1815; formed the Holy Alliance in 1815, and took part in the conferences of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1818, Troppau in 1820, Laibach in 1821, and Verona in 1822. He married a princess of Baden.

Alexander II. Born April 29, 1818; died at St. Petersburg, March 13, 1881. Emperor of Russia, son of Nicholas I. whom he succeeded in 1855. He concluded the treaty of Paris 1856; proclaimed the emancipation of the serfs 1861; reorganized the army and the departments of administration and justice; and developed commerce and manufactures. He suppressed the Polish insurrection 1863-64, and carried on war with Turkey 1877-78. During the latter part of his reign he was closely allied with Germany and Austria. The attacks of the Nihilists led him to enter upon a reactionary policy in 1879, and he was finally assassinated by them. He married a princess of Hesse.

Alexander III. Born March 10, 1845; died at Livadia, Crimea, Nov. 1, 1894. Emperor of Russia, son of Alexander II. whom he succeeded March 13, 1881. He continued the reactionary policy of his father's reign. A meeting of the emperors of Russia, Germany, and Austria, at Skiermiewice in Poland, Sept., 1884, cemented the personal union of these rulers for the time, but since the formation of the Triple Alliance (which see) in 1883, Russia has become a virtual ally of France. Alexander opposed Prince Alexander of Bulgaria at the time of his overthrow in 1886, and refused to recognize his successor Prince Ferdinand. (For the chief events in his reign, see Russia.) He married Princess Dagmar of Denmark in 1866.

Alexander I. Born April 5, 1857; died Nov. 17, 1893. Titular prince of Battenberg, the second son of Prince Alexander of Hesse. He served in the Hessian army, and in the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78 in the Russian army. He was elected prince of Bulgaria April 29, 1879; suspended constitutional government there 1881-83; became by the revolution at Philippopolis, Sept., 1885, prince of Eastern Rumelia also; commanded in the repulse of the Servian invasion, Nov., 1885, at the battles of Slivnitsa, Dragoman Pass, Tsaribrod, and Piro; became governor-general of Eastern Rumelia April, 1886; and was overthrown by a conspiracy at Sofia Aug. 22, 1886, and abducted to Reni on the Danube. He was restored at the end of August by a counter-revolution, but abdicated in the beginning of Sept., 1886.

Alexander Bey. See Scanderbeg.

Alexander, Archibald. Born in Virginia, April 17, 1772; died at Princeton, N. J., Oct. 22, 1851. Alexander, Mrs. See Hector, Annie.

Alexander, Campaspe, and Diogenes. A comedy by John Lyly, printed in 1584, and reprinted as "Campaspe" in that year and in 1591. It is usually known by the latter title.

Alexander, Romance of. One of the most famous romances of the middle ages. Callisthenes, a companion of Alexander, wrote an account of the Asiatic expedition of Alexander, but it is lost. His name, however, is attached to a fabulous account which is supposed to have been written in Alexandria in the early part of the 3d century. There are three Latin translations of this pseudo-Callisthenes: one by Julius Valerius, before 340; the "Itinerarium Alexandri"; and the "Ilistoria de prellis," by Archbishop Leo; and on these the later ones are based. It was translated into Syriac and Armenian in the 5th century. The Persians and Arabs made use of the myth, and in the 11th century Simeon Seth, keeper of the Imperial wardrobe at the Byzantine court, translated it back from the Persian into the Greek.

[This] was translated into Latin, and from Latin even into Hebrew, by one who wrote under the adopted name of Jos. Gorionides, had very wide popularity, and became the groundwork of many French and English poems. Gerald de Barri mentions the Latin version which professed to be by an Esopus or a Julius Valerius, and had a fictitious dedication to Constantine the Great. In the year 1200 Gauthier de Chatillon turned it into an Alexandreis, which was one of the best Latin poems of the Middle Ages; and, again, in 1236 Arolinus Qualichinus turned it into Latin elegiac verse. . . . A score of French poets worked upon the subject, and by translation and expansion produced that romance of Alexander of which the great French exemplar was composed in or near the year 1184 by the trouvère Lambert II Cort, or le Court, of Chateaudun, and Alexandre de Paris, named usually from Paris where he dwelt, and sometimes from Bernay where he was born. There are only fragments of the earliest French poem upon this subject, written in the eleventh century in octosyllabic verse by Alberic [Aubry] of Besançon. The larger and later romance of Chanson d'Alexandre is of 22,606 lines in nine books, and the twelve-syllabled lines are of the sort now called, as is generally supposed from their use in this poem, Alexandrines. . . . There is a German Alexandreis, written in six books, by Rudolph of Hohenhaus, a Swabian, between the years 1220 and 1254. Ulrich von Eschenbach translated the Alexandreis of Gauthier de Chatillon. The Alexander romance was adopted in Spain, Italy, and even in Scandinavia. An admirable free translation into English metre was made in the thirteenth century by an unknown author, who has been called Adam Davie. . . . But few mistakes can be more obvious.

Morley, English Writers, III. 286.

[Lamprecht, a priest, translated the French of Aubry, or Alberic, of Besan, on, into German, and called it the Alexanderlied, in the 12th century (about 1130). The Alexandreis of the Austrian Siegfried was written about 1250. In the 15th century he again appeared as the hero of prose romances in Germany. Alexander myths are to be found in many other of the old French poems, and he becomes a knightly conqueror surrounded by twelve paladins. The poems do not properly form a cycle, as they are quite independent of one another.]

Alexander Column. A column erected at St. Petersburg in 1832 in honor of Alexander I. The polished shaft of red granite, 84 feet high and 14 in diameter, is remarkable as the greatest modern monolith. It supports a Roman-Doric capital of bronze, on which is a die bearing a figure of an angel with the cross. The pedestal is adorned with reliefs in bronze. The total height is 154½ feet.

Alexander Cornelius (kôr-nô'lius). A Greek writer of the 1st century B. C., a native either of Ephesus or of Cotiaum in Lesser Phrygia; surnamed "Polyhistor" from his great learning. During the war of Sulla in Greece he was made prisoner and sold as a slave to Cornelius Lentulus, who brought him to Rome to become pedagogue of his children. He received the Roman franchise and his gentile name either from Cornelius Lentulus or from L. Cornelius Sulla. He died at Laurentum in a fire which destroyed his house. He wrote a geographical-historical account in 42 books of nearly all the countries of the ancient world, and many other works, of which only the titles and fragments have been preserved.

Alexander Jagellon (jä-gel'lon). Born in 1461; died in 1506. King of Poland and grand duke of Lithuania, second son of Casimir IV. of Poland. He succeeded to the grand duchy at the death of his father in 1492, and was elected king of Poland at the death of his brother John Albert in 1501. He married Helena, daughter of Ivan III. of Russia, but was almost incessantly at war with his father-in-law. In his reign the laws of Poland were codified by John Laski.

Alexander Karageorgevitch (kä-rä-gä-or'ge-vich). [Karageorgevitch, son of Blaek George. See Czerney.] Born at Topola, Servia, Oct. 11, 1806; died at Temesvar, Hungary, May 2, 1885. A son of Czerny George, elected prince of Servia in 1842 and deposed in 1858. He was succeeded by Prince Miloseh Obrenovitch, who was in turn succeeded by his son Michael in 1860. Alexander made repeated attempts to regain the throne, and was accused of complicity in the murder of Prince Michael in 1868 and imprisoned, but was soon pardoned.

Alexander Nevski (nev'ski), Saint. Born at Vladimir, Russia, 1219; died Nov. 14, 1263. A Russian national hero and patron of St. Petersburg, prince of Novgorod and grand duke of Vladimir. He defeated the Swedes in 1240 on the Izhora, a southern affluent of the Neva (whence his surname Nevski), and the Livonian Knights on the ice of Lake Peipus, 1242. He is commemorated in the Russian Church Nov. 23.

Alexander Nevski, Cloister or Monastery of. A famous foundation of Peter the Great at St. Petersburg. The large church, though by a Russian architect, is basilican in plan, with transepts and an Italian dome at the crossing. The exterior is sober in design and ornament; the interior is of lavish richness in marbles, jewels, and paintings. The shrine of the saint, in massive silver, is 15 feet high without the angel-supported canopy.

Alexandre le Grand (äl-ek-sön'dr lê grôn). A tragedy by Racine, produced in 1665. It was the cause of a serious quarrel between Moliere and Racine, who both loved the same woman, an actress who played the part of Axiane.

Alexandretta (äl-eg-zan-dret'ä), Turk. Skanderun, or Iskanderun (from Arab. Iskander, Alexander (the Great)). A seaport in the vilayet of Adana, Asiatic Turkey, on the Gulf of Iskanderun in lat. 36° 35' N., long. 36° 10' E., founded by Alexander the Great in 333 B. C.

Alexandria (äl-eg-zan'dri-ä), Arab. Iskanderiyeh. A famous seaport of Egypt, founded by Alexander the Great in 332 B. C. (whence its name). It is situated at the northwestern extremity of the Delta on the strip of land which lies between the Mediterranean and Lake Mareotis. The modern city occupies what was anciently the island of Pharos, together with the isthmus now connecting it with the mainland where the ancient city stood. Alexandria was the capital of Egypt during the Ptolemaic period, and became an important seat of Greek culture and learning. In 30 B. C. it was annexed by Rome. It ranked as the second city of the Roman Empire, and continued to be the chief commercial city under the Byzantine empire. It was an important center of Christianity, and the seat of a patriarchate. In 641 it was taken by the Saracens under Amr, and was entered by the French in 1798, who were defeated near here by the British in 1801. (See Abukir.) The present city was largely rebuilt under Mehemed Ali. It was bombarded by a British fleet of eight ironclads under Sir Frederick Seymour, July 11, 1882, and defended by the insurgents, and was taken by the British July 12. Population (1882), 208,755.

After the time of Alexander, Grecian literature flourished nowhere so conspicuously as at Alexandria in Egypt, under the auspices of the Ptolemies. Here all the sects of philosophy had established themselves; numerous schools were opened; and, for the advancement of learning, a library was collected, which was supposed, at one time, to have contained 700,000 volumes, in all languages. Connected with the library there were extensive offices, in which the business of transcribing books was carried on very largely, and with every possible advantage which royal munificence on the one hand, and learned assiduity on the other, could insure. Nor did the literary fame of Alexandria decline under the Roman emperors. Domitian, as Suetonius reports, sent scribes to Alexandria to copy books for the restoration of those libraries that had been destroyed by fire. And it seems to have been for some centuries afterwards a common practice for those who wished to form a library, to maintain copyists at Alexandria. The conquest of Egypt by the Saracens, A. D. 640, who burned the Alexandrian Library, banished learning for a time from that, as from other countries, which they occupied.

[This library (according to many writers who discredit its sacking by the Arabs) was entirely destroyed under Theophilus, A. D. 391.]

Alexandria. A small town on the coast of Asia Minor, near the island of Tenedos. It contains important ruins of Roman thermae. The structure measured 270 by 404 feet in plan, and had on three sides long halls, with columns, inside of which were smaller subdivisions. The walls of the interior were incrustated with ornamental marbles, and the vaults ornamented with glass mosaics. It is believed to date from the reign of Hadrian.

Alexas (ä-lek'sas). A minor character in Shakspeare's "Antony and Cleopatra," an attendant of Cleopatra.

Alexei. See Alexis.

Alexiad (ä-lek'si-ad), The. See the extract.

By the command of the Empress Irene, Nicephorus Byrennius, who had married her daughter the celebrated Anna Comnena, undertook a history of the house of Comneni, which has come down to us with the title "Materials of History." Anna herself continued her husband's work when she retired after his death to the leisure of a convent. The imperial authoress entitled her book "The Alexiad." As its epic name denotes, it is mainly a prolix biography of her father Alexis I. It is in fifteen books, and includes the period from 1069 to 1118. The work is interesting in itself to the student of history, but it is most generally known as having supplied Sir Walter Scott with the subject and some of the materials for the last and feeblest of his romances.

Alexios. See Alexius.

Alexis (ä-lek'sis). [Gr. Ἀλέξιος.] Born at Thuri, Magna Græcia, Italy, about 390 B. C.; died about 288 B. C. A Greek dramatist, a master of the "middle comedy." He was a prolific writer, the author of 245 plays. Fragments of these, amounting to 1,000 lines, are extant. He was brought as a youth to Athens, and was a citizen of that city.

Alexis, or Alexei. Born in 1629; died in 1676. Czar of Russia, son of Michael Féodorovitch, the founder of the house of Romanoff, whom he succeeded in 1645. He waged a war with Poland from 1654 to 1667, acquiring possession of Smolensk and eastern Ukraine. In a war with Sweden from 1655 to 1658 he conquered a part of Livonia and Ingermanland, but was forced by domestic troubles to relinquish this territory at the treaty of Cardia, June 21, 1661. He extended his conquests to eastern Siberia, codified the laws of the various provinces of Russia, and, by beginning to introduce European civilization, prepared the way for his son Peter the Great.

Alexis, or Alexei. Born at Moscow, Feb. 18, 1690; died in prison at St. Petersburg, July 7, 1718. The eldest son of Peter the Great and father of Peter II. He was condemned for high treason and imprisoned.

Alexius (a-lek'si-us), Saint. A saint (probably mythical) said to have been born at Rome about 350 A. D. According to the legend, he fled from his bride, a lady of high rank, on the wedding evening to the porch of the Church of Our Lady of Edessa, where he lived in chastity for seventeen years. He afterward returned to Rome and lived unrecognized in his father's house. He is commemorated in the Roman Church on July 17, and in the Greek on March 17.

Alexius, Saint. A Roman saint of the 5th century, said to have been a senator. He was the founder of the Alexians or Cellites.

Alexius I. Comnenus (kom-nō'nus), Gr. Alexios Komnenos. Born at Constantinople in 1048; died in 1118. Byzantine emperor from 1081 to 1118, nephew of Isaac Comnenus. He supplanted, by the aid of the soldiery, the emperor Nicephorus, who retired to a monastery, and defended the empire against the Petchenegs, the Turks, and the Normans. In his reign occurred the first Crusade. His life has been written by his daughter Anna Comnena. See Alexiad.

Alexius II. Comnenus, Gr. Alexios Komnenos. Born in 1168 (?); died in 1183. Byzantine emperor from 1180 to 1183, son of Manuel whom he succeeded. He was deposed and strangled by Andronicus.

Alexius III. Angelus (an'je-lus), Gr. Alexios Angelos. Died in 1210. Byzantine emperor from 1195 to 1203. He usurped the throne of his brother Isaac II., but was deposed by an army of Crusaders who besieged Constantinople and reinstated Isaac II. with his son Alexius IV. as colleague. Alexius III. died in exile.

Alexius IV. Angelus, Gr. Alexios Angelos. Died in 1204. Byzantine emperor in 1203 and 1204, son of Isaac II. Angelus. He was put to death after a reign of six months by Alexius V.

Alexius V., or Alexios, surnamed Dukas Murtzuphlos. Died in 1204. A Byzantine emperor. He usurped the throne of Alexius IV. in 1204, but was driven from Constantinople by the Crusaders who had resolved on the partition of the empire. He was arrested in Morea, tried for the murder of Alexius IV., and executed.

Alexius I. Comnenus, Gr. Alexios Komnenos. Died in 1222. Emperor of Trebizond from 1204 to 1222, grandson of the Byzantine emperor Andronicus I. At the capture of Constantinople by the Crusaders in 1204 he made himself master of Trebizond, which he raised from the position of a province of the Byzantine empire to that of an independent empire.

Alexius II. Comnenus, Gr. Alexios Komnenos. Died in 1330. Emperor of Trebizond from 1297 to 1330, son of Joannes II. whom he succeeded.

Alexius III. Comnenus, Gr. Alexios Komnenos. Died in 1390. Emperor of Trebizond from 1349 to 1390, son of Basilus by Irene of Trebizond.

Alexius IV. Comnenus, Gr. Alexios Komnenos. Died in 1446. Emperor of Trebizond from 1417 to 1446, son of Manuel III. and Eudocia of Georgia.

Aleyn, or Alain. [ME.: the mod. Allen.] See the extract.

The good-livers go to service and are fed by the Holy Graal. The sinners, on the contrary, not being thus fed, beg Joseph, Joseph's son, to pray for them; and he orders Ibron's twelfth son, Aleyn or Alain le Gros, to take the net from the Graal table, and fish with it. He catches one fish, which the sinners say will not suffice. But Aleyn having prayed satisfies them all with it, and is thenceforward called the Rich Fisher. Joseph dies and his body is buried at "Glay," while his son transmits the Graal to Aleyn. By Aleyn's instrumentality the leper king Galafres, of the land of Fereynze, is converted and christened Alphasan. He is healed by looking upon the Graal, and builds Castle Corbenic, which is to be the repository and shrine of the Holy Cup, as Vespasian was healed by looking on the Veronica.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 167.

Alfieri (äl-fē-ä'rē), Cesare, Marquis di Sostegno. Born at Turin, Aug. 13, 1796; died at Florence, April 17, 1869. A Piedmontese statesman and political reformer, for a short time premier in 1848.

Alfieri, Count Vittorio. Born, of noble parents, at Asti in Piedmont, Jan. 17, 1749; died at Florence, Oct. 8, 1803. A celebrated Italian dramatist. At nine years of age he was placed in the Academy at Turin, at thirteen began the study of civil and canonical law, which he soon abandoned, and at fourteen came into possession of large wealth. From 1767 to 1773 he roamed adventurously over Europe, returning to Turin in the latter year. In 1775 his play "Cleopatra" was successfully produced. He then went to Tuscany to complete "Philip II." and "Polynices," two tragedies originally written in French prose, which he now versified. While in Florence he formed a connection with the Countess of Albany, which endured for twenty years. He resided for a time in Rome, leaving it in 1783 for a period of travel; on his return he joined the countess in Alsace, living with her there and in Paris, where he went in 1787 to oversee a complete edition of his works. In 1792, at the outbreak of the Revolution, they returned to Florence where he passed the last eleven years of his life. He left 21 tragedies and 6 comedies, besides 5 odes on American Independence, various sonnets, and a number of prose works, among which are a "Panegyric on Trajan," "Essays on Literature and Government," and a "Defense of Louis XVI.," which includes a satirical account of the French Revolution. His tragedies are "Philip II.," "Polynices," "Antigone" (the sequel of "Polynices"), "Virginia," "Agamemnon," "Orestes," "The Conspiracy of the Pazzi," "Don Garcia," "Rosamunda," "Mary Stuart," "Timoleon," "Octavia," "Meropé," "Saul," "Agis," "Sophonisba," "Myrrha," two tragedies on the elder and younger Brutus, and two on the subject of Alcestis. "Abel," which he called a "tragedy-ode," is a sort of mixture of lyric and tragic poetry. He wrote six comedies which he attempted to make a vehicle for his political sentiments. They are satirical, not dramatic. They are "One," "Few," "Too Many," "The Antidote," "La Finestrina," and "The Divorce." They were never played. He also wrote an autobiography. He was a strict observer of dramatic unities, and left out all secondary characters. His bold, vigorous, lofty, and almost naked style founded a new school in Italian drama. His works were first collected and published after his death by the Countess of Albany. The edition is in 35 volumes, published at Pisa 1805-15. Thirteen volumes contain his posthumous works.

Alfinger (äl'fing-er). Ambrosio de. Died 1532. A German soldier, appointed in 1528 agent of the mercantile house of the Welsers (of Augsburg), which held Venezuela as a hereditary fief on condition of completing the conquest of the country for Castile and colonizing it. After ravaging the vicinity of Lake Maracaybo, he marched into the highlands of New Granada, and had nearly reached the rich country of the Chibchas when he died from a wound by an Indian arrow. His inroads were marked by horrible cruelties.

Alföld (äl'föld). [Hung. 'lowland.'] The great central plain of Hungary.

Alfonso (äl-fon'sō) I., or Alphonso, or Alonzo (ä-lon'zō). Born 693; died at Cangas, 757. King of Asturias 739-757, surnamed "The Catholic" on account of his zeal in erecting and endowing monasteries and churches. He was a son of Pedro, duke of Biscay, a descendant of the Visigothic kings, and son-in-law of Pelayo, king of Asturias, whose son Favila he succeeded. He is said to have wrested Leon, Galicia, and Castile from the Moors.

Alfonso II., or Alphonso. Died in Oviedo, 842. King of Asturias 791-842, surnamed "The Chaste." He defeated Mohammed, the Moorish governor of Merida, in 830.

Alfonso III., or Alphonso. Born 848; died 912. King of Asturias and Leon 866-910, surnamed "The Great," eldest son of Ordoño I. His reign was filled with internal struggles and external conflicts, especially with the Moors, over whom he was almost uniformly victorious. His successes extended his dominions from the Duero to the Guadiana. In 910 he abdicated in favor of his son Garcia on account of civil wars raised by his sons.

Alfonso IV., or Alphonso. Died 933 (?). King of Leon 924-927 (?), surnamed "The Monk," eldest son of Ordoño II. He abdicated, on the death of his wife, in favor of his brother Ramiro, and retired to a cloister, was taken prisoner at Leon in an attempt to regain the throne, was blinded, and was confined till his death in the monastery of St. Julian.

Alfonso V., or Alphonso. Born 994; died 1027. King of Leon and Castile 999-1027, son of Bermudo II. whom he succeeded. He recaptured Leon, which had been lost during his minority, and was killed at the siege of Viso.

Alfonso VI., or Alphonso. Born 1030; died 1109. King of Leon and, as Alfonso I., of Castile, surnamed "The Valiant," son of Ferdinand the Great whom he succeeded in Leon in 1065. He succeeded his brother Sancho in Castile in 1072. From 1068 until 1072, when Sancho died, the brothers were at war, and in 1071 Alfonso was defeated and taken prisoner at Valpelle (Golpelierra). In 1065 he captured Toledo from the Moors and was himself defeated near Zalaca by Yussuf ibn Tashlyn in 1086. His reign witnessed the exploits of the Cid.

Alfonso VII., King of Leon and Castile. See Alfonso I. (of Aragon).

Alfonso VIII., or Alphonso (Alfonso Raymond). Born 1106; died at Tremada, Aug., 1157. King of Leon and, as Alfonso II. (or III.), king of Castile, 1126-57, son of Urraca, daughter of Alfonso VI. (and wife of Arraca, daughter of Raymond of Burgundy, her first husband). He extended the frontiers of Castile from the Tagus to the Sierra Morena Mountains, and proclaimed himself emperor of Spain in 1135.

Alfonso IX., or Alphonso. King of Leon 1188-1230, son of Ferdinand II. He gained a brilliant victory over Mohammed ibn Hud at Merida 1230. He was married first to Theresa, daughter of Sancho I. of Portugal, and later to Berengaria, daughter of the king of Castile; both marriages were dissolved by the Pope as being within the degree of affinity prescribed by the canon law.

Alfonso IX., or Alphonso (also reckoned as VIII. and as III.). Born 1155; died 1214. King of Castile 1158-1214, surnamed "The Noble" or "The Good," son of Sancho III. He was defeated by the Moors at Alarcos in 1195, and in alliance with Aragon and Navarre defeated the Moors at Las Navas de Tolosa in 1212.

Alfonso X., or Alphonso. Born 1221; died at Seville, April 4, 1284. A celebrated king of Leon and Castile, 1252-82, surnamed "The Wise" and "The Astronomer," son of Ferdinand III. He laid claim to the duchy of Swabia, and twice unsuccessfully attempted to secure the imperial crown: the first time he was defeated by Richard of Cornwall, and the second by Rudolf of Hapsburg. From 1261 to 1266 he waged war with the Moors with varying fortune. He was dethroned by his son Sancho in 1282. Alfonso is celebrated as the author of the code "Las Siete Partidas," the basis of Spanish jurisprudence, and for the Alphonsine tables, a act of astronomical observations compiled at his command.

[Alfonso] first made the Castilian a national language by causing the Bible to be translated into it, and by requiring it to be used in all legal proceedings; and he first, by his great Code and other works, gave specimens of prose composition which left a free and disencumbered course for all that has been done since, a service, perhaps, greater than it has been permitted any other Spaniard to render the prose literature of his country.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 41.

Alfonso XI., or Alphonso. Died March 26, 1350. King of Leon and Castile 1312-50, surnamed "The Avenger" from his severity in repressing internal disorder: son of Ferdinand IV. He defeated the Moors of Morocco and Granada at Rio Salado, Oct. 29, 1340.

Alfonso XII., or Alphonso. Born at Madrid, Nov. 28, 1857; died at El Pardo, near Madrid, Nov. 25, 1885. The son of Isabella II., proclaimed king of Spain Dec., 1874. He landed in Spain Jan., 1875, and suppressed the Carlist rebellion in 1876. In 1883 he visited Germany, and was insulted by a mob in Paris on his return.

Alfonso XIII., or Alphonso. Born at Madrid, May 17, 1886. The son of Alfonso XII., proclaimed king under the regency of his mother (Maria Christina, daughter of the archduke Karl Ferdinand of Austria) on the day of his birth.

Alfonso I., King of Naples. See Alfonso V. of Aragon.

Alfonso II., or Alphonso. Born 1448; died Nov. 19, 1495. King of Naples 1494-95, eldest son of Ferdinand I. and Isabella. He defeated the Florentines at Poggio 1479, and the Turks at Otranto 1481. Having rendered himself obnoxious to his subjects, he abdicated (Jan. 23, 1495) in favor of his son Ferdinand II., when Charles VIII. of France threatened his capital.

Alfonso I., or Afonso (äf-fon'sô), or Alphonso. Born about 1110; died Dec. 6, 1185. The first king of Portugal, son of Henry of Burgundy, count of Portugal, and Teresa of Castile. On his father's death in 1112 he became, under his mother's tutelage, count of Portugal, and was declared sole ruler in 1128. In that year he made successful war upon his mother, who refused to yield up the government, and upon her ally, Alfonso VIII., from whom he wrested the independence of Portugal. He was proclaimed king by his soldiers, probably after the victory over the Moors at Ourique, July 26, 1139; took Santarém from the Moors in 1146; captured Lisbon in 1147; and was taken captive near Badajoz in 1167 by the Leonese and made to pay a heavy ransom (the surrender of all his conquests in Galicia).

Alfonso II., or Afonso, or Alphonso. Born April 23, 1185; died March 25, 1223. King of Portugal 1211-23, surnamed "The Fat." He defeated the Moors at Alcaer do Sal in 1217.

Alfonso III., or Afonso, or Alphonso. Born May 5, 1210; died Feb. 16, 1279. King of Portugal 1248-79. During his reign Algarve was incorporated in Portugal.

Alfonso IV., or Afonso, or Alphonso. Born at Coimbra, Feb. 8, 1290; died May 28, 1357. King of Portugal 1325-57, surnamed "The Brave" and "The Pierce." He consented to the murder of Ines de Castro, secretly married to his son Pedro, who, in consequence, headed a revolt against his father. See Castro, Ines de.

Alfonso V., or Afonso, or Alphonso. Born 1432; died at Cintra, Aug. 28, 1481. King of Portugal 1438-81, surnamed "The African" from his conquests in Africa: son of King Duarte (Edward). He defeated the Moors in Africa in 1458 and 1471, and was defeated at Toro in 1476 by Ferdinand the Catholic.

Alfonso VI., or Afonso, or Alphonso. Born 1643; died Sept. 12, 1683. King of Portugal, second son of John IV. He succeeded to the throne in 1656 and was deposed in 1667.

Alfonso I., or Alphonso. King of Aragon and Navarre 1104-34, and, as Alfonso VII., king of Leon and Castile. He married Urraca, daughter and heiress of Alfonso VI. of Leon and Castile, in 1103. In 1118 he conquered Saragossa from the Moors.

Alfonso II., or Alphonso. Born 1152; died 1196. King of Aragon 1163-96, son of Raymond V., count of Barcelona, and Petronilla, daughter of Ramiro II. of Aragon; especially noted as a patron of Provençal poetry.

Alfonso III., or Alphonso. Born 1265; died June 18, 1291. King of Aragon 1285-91, surnamed "The Magnificent," son of Pedro III. He granted in 1287 the "Privilege of Union" by which his subjects were permitted to bear arms and the right was given of citing the king himself before the Cortes.

Alfonso IV., or Alphonso. Born 1299; died 1336. King of Aragon 1327-36, surnamed "The Good." His entire reign was occupied by a war with the Genoese about the possession of Corsica and Sardinia.

Alfonso V., or Alphonso. Born 1385; died at Naples, June 27, 1458. King of Aragon and, as Alfonso I., king of Sicily and Sardinia and of Naples; surnamed "The Magnanimous." He was the son of Ferdinand the Just, whom he succeeded in 1416 as king of Aragon and of Sicily and Sardinia. In 1420 he was adopted as heir and prospective successor by Joanna I. of Naples, but was disinherited in 1423 in favor of Louis of Anjou. He captured Naples in 1442, seven years after the death of Joannin, and enforced his claim to the succession. He was a patron of learning and a model of chivalric virtues.

Alfonso I., or Alphonso, of Este. Born 1476; died Oct. 31, 1534. Duke of Ferrara 1505-34. He commanded the papal troops in the war of the League of Cambrai in 1509, and fought against Pope Julius II. at Ravenna in 1512. He married Lucretia Borgia in 1501.

Alfonso, Count of Poitou. Died 1271. Brother of Louis IX. of France, and ruler of Poitou and Toulouse.

Alfonso de Cartagena. See Alphonso a Sancta Maria.

Alford (âlf'ord), Henry. Born at London, Oct. 10, 1810; died at Canterbury, England, Jan. 12, 1871. An English divine, biblical scholar, poet, and general writer, a graduate and fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and dean of Canterbury 1857-71. He was the author of a noted edition of the Greek Testament (1849-61), "New Testament for English Readers" (1867), "Poems," "The Queen's English" (1866), etc.

Alford (originally Griffiths), Michael. Born at London, 1587; died at St. Omer, Aug. 11, 1652. An English Jesuit, author of various works on ecclesiastical history.

Alfort (âl-fôr'). A town in the department of Seine, France, on the Marne southeast of Paris, the seat of a national veterinary school established 1766. Population (1891), commune, 7,984.

Alfred (al'fred), or Ælfred (alf'räd), surnamed "The Great." Born at Wantage, Berkshire, 849; died Oct. 28, 901. King of the West Saxons 871-901, fifth and youngest son of Æthelwulf, king of the West Saxons, and his wife Osburh (daughter of Osloe his cup-bearer), and brother of Æthelred whom he succeeded. He fought against the Danes in the defensive campaign of 871, serving under his brother Æthelred at Ashdown, Basing, and Merton, and commanded as king at Wilton. In 878 he decided before the Danes to Athelney, but later obtained a decisive victory over them at Ectandun. By the treaty of Wedmore, which followed, Guthrum consented to receive baptism and to retire north of Watling Street. Alfred fortified London in 883, and carried on a defensive war with the Danes 894-897, which ended in the withdrawal of the invaders, and in which, by the aid of ships of improved model, the English for the first time gained a decided naval advantage over the vikings. His success against the Danes was due largely to his reform of the national fyrd or militia, by which half the force of each shire was always ready for military service. His administration was also marked by judicial and educational reforms. He compiled a code of laws, rebuilt the schools and monasteries, and invited scholars to his court. He was himself a man of learning, and translated into Saxon the "Ecclesiastical History" of the Venerable Bede, the "Epitome of Universal History" of Paulus Orosius, and the "Consolations of Philosophy" by Boethius, and corrected a translation of the "Dialogues" of Gregory the Great. The popular accounts of his life abound in legends which are devoid of historical foundation.

It is not surprising that the great services of Alfred to his people in peace and in war should have led posterity to ascribe every institution, of which the beginning was obscure (such as the law of frank-pledge, the distribution of hundreds and tithings, and trial by jury), to his contrivance, till his fame has become almost as fabulous in legislation as that of Arthur in arms.

Italian.

Alfred the Great. A historical play by J. Sheridan Knowles, produced in 1831.

Alfred, or Alredus (al-rê'dus), or Aluredus (al-ô-rê'dus), of Beverley. Lived about 1143. An English chronicler, author of "Annales sive Historia de gestis regum Britannie libris ix. ad annum 1129," a work occupied chiefly with the fabulous history of the country, and for the most part a compilation from earlier authorities.

Alfred, Prince (Duke of Edinburgh). Born Aug. 6, 1844. The second son of Queen Victoria: duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha (1893). He was elected king of Greece in 1862, but declined the offer.

Al-Gazali (âl-gâ-zâ'lê), or Algazel (âl-gâ'zel), Abu Hamid Mohammed. Born at Tus, Persia, 1058 (1059 ?); died 1111. An Arabian philosopher and theologian, for a time professor of theology and director of the school at Baghdad. He wrote "The Destruction of the Philosophers" and other works in defense of Moslem orthodoxy against the followers of Aristotle and other Greek philosophers.

It appears that he contested the fundamental principles of the Platonic and Aristotelian schools, and denied the possibility of a known connexion between cause and effect; thus making a prelude to the celebrated argumentation of Hume.

Whewell, Hist. Ind. Sciences, I. 251.

Algebar (al'je-bâr). [Said to be from Ar. al, the, and jabbâr (Syr. gabara), giant.] 1. An Arabic and poetical name of the constellation Orion.— 2. Occasionally used to designate Rigel (β Orionis), the brightest star in the constellation.

Algeciras, or Algeziras (âl-nâ-thê'râs). [Ar. al-jazira, the island or peninsula.] A seaport in the province of Cadiz, Spain, 6 miles west of Gibraltar: the ancient Portus Albus. It has a considerable coasting-trade. It was the landing-place of the Arabs under Tarik in 711; was retaken from the Moors by Alfonso XI. of Castile in 1344 (?); and was the scene of engagements, July, 1801, between the British and Franco-Spanish fleets. It contains a notable aqueduct built by the Moors. The arches are pointed, elegant in profile, and of considerable height and span. The highest piers, in the middle, have on each side curious ogival flying buttresses. Population (1887), 12,331.

Algeiba, or Algieba (al-jê'bâ). [Ar., said to represent al-jeb-bah, the forehead; but if so a misnomer, as it is in the shoulder of the constellation.] The second-magnitude double star γ Leonis. By Ulugh Beigh the name Algieba was applied to three stars, η , ζ , and ζ Leonis.

Algemesi (âl-nâ-mâ'sê). A town in the province of Valencia, Spain, 20 miles south of Valencia. Population (1887), 7,441.

Algenib (al'je-nib). [Ar. al-jênib al-faras, the flank of the horse.] The third-magnitude star γ Pegasi, at the extremity of the wing. The same name is also often given to a Persei, better known as Mirfak. See also Alchemb.

Algenubi (al-je-nô'bi). [Ar. ra's al-'asad al-janûbbi, the head of the lion, the southern: opposed to al-samâi, the northern.] A name used, though rather rarely, for the third-magnitude star ϵ Leonis.

Alger, William Rounseville. Born at Freetown, Mass., Dec. 30, 1822. A Unitarian clergyman and author. Among his works are "Introduction to the Poetry of the Orient," "Metrical Specimens of the Thought, Sentiment and Fancy of the East" (1856), "Friendships of Women" (1867), etc.

Algeria (al-jê'ri-î). [Ar. al-jazira, the island or peninsula; F. Algérie, G. Algerien.] A country in northern Africa, the ancient Numidia and eastern Mauritania, organized as a colonial possession of France in 1834 (conquest begun in 1830). It is bounded by the Mediterranean on the north, by Tunis on the east, by Sahara on the south, and by Morocco on the west, and is traversed by the Atlas range. It comprises three distinct regions: the Tell, or mountainous and cultivated region, in the north; the steppe region, with various shots, or brackish lakes, in the center; and the Sahara, which extends indefinitely southward. The leading industry is agriculture, but the country also contains considerable mineral wealth (especially iron and copper), and exports wheat, barley, oats, wine, olive-oil, esparto grass, wool, fruits, and live stock. It is divided into three departments: Algiers, Oran, and Constantine, each with a civil territory and a military territory. The capital is Algiers. The government is vested in a governor-general appointed from France, in the French Corps Legislatif, and in a Superior Council. Each province sends 1 senator and 2 deputies to the French Assembly. The prevailing religion is Mohammedanism, and the inhabitants are chiefly Berbers, Arabs, Europeans (largely French and Spaniards), Jews, Moors, and descendants of Turks. The country was annexed by Rome in large part in the 1st century B. C.; was conquered by the Vandals in the 5th century, and by the Saracens in the 7th; passed into the possession of the Turks in 1519; and was a piratical power from the 16th to the 19th century, becoming independent of Turkey in 1710. The office of dey was established in 1600. Defeated by the United States in 1815. Conquest by France, begun in 1830 with the taking of Algiers, was continued by the taking of Constantine in 1837, the subduing of the Kabyles, and the capture of Abd-el-Kader in 1847. Various insurrections occurred in later years. Area (excluding the Algerian Sahara), about 180,000 square miles. Population (1891), 4,124,732. See Corsairs.

Algesiras. See Algeciras.

Alghero (âl-gâ'rô), or Algheri (r-ô). A seaport in the province of Sassari, Sardinia, in lat. 40° 34' N., long. 8° 19' E. It has a cathedral. Population, about 9,000.

Algiers (al-jêr'z). [F. Alger, Sp. Pg. Argel, It. Algeri, G. Alger. See Algeria.] A seaport, the capital of Algeria, situated on the Bay of Algiers in lat. 36° 47' N., long. 3° 3' E., founded by the Arabs about 935. It consists of a lower or European and an upper or Moorish quarter, and contains the Kasbah, or ancient fortress of the deys, situated about 500 feet above the sea, numerous mosques, a Catholic cathedral, and several Protestant churches. The harbor is spacious, safe, and well fortified. Algiers is a favorite winter health-resort. It was unsuccessfully attacked by Charles

V. in 1541; bombarded by the British in 1816; and occupied by the French in 1830. Population (1891), 82,585. See Corsairs.

'Algiers' is in Arabic 'Al-Gezair' ("the islands"), said to be so called from that in its bay; or, more probably, 'Al-Gezair' is a grammarian's explanation of the name 'Tzeir' or 'Tzier,' by which the Algerians commonly called their city, and which is, I suspect, a corruption of the name of the Roman city Caesarea (Augusta), which occupied almost the same site. It should be remarked that the Algerians pronounce the gim hard: not 'Al-Gezair.' Europeans spell the name in all sorts of ways: Arger, Argel, Argeil, Algél, &c., down to the French Alger and our Algiers.

Poole, Story of the Barbary Corsairs, p. 13.

Algiers. The middle province or department of Algeria. Population (1891), 1,468,127.

Algiers. A manufacturing suburb of New Orleans, situated on the Mississippi opposite New Orleans.

Algoa Bay (al-gō'ā bā). A bay on the southern coast of Cape Colony, Africa.

Algol (al'gol). [Ar. al-ghūl, the ghoul or demon.] The remarkable second-magnitude variable star β Persei, in the head of Medusa, who is the monster referred to in the name.

Algonquian (al-gon'ki-an). [Algonquin (in) and -ian.] A linguistic stock of North American Indians, which formerly occupied an area larger than that of any other stock in North America, reaching from Labrador to the Rocky Mountains and from Churchill River of Hudson Bay at least as far south as Pamlico Sound in North Carolina.

There were breaks in the continuity of its territory in and near the State of New York where an area was occupied by Iroquoian tribes, and one in Newfoundland where the Beothukan family dwelt. An advance to the south beyond the contiguous tribal territories was made by the Shawano or Shawnee tribe which had early separated from the main body. The Cheyenne and Arapaho, two allied tribes of this stock, also separated from their kindred on the north and forced their way west through hostile tribes across the Missouri River to the Black Hills country of South Dakota, and more recently into Wyoming and Colorado, thus forming the advance of the Algonquian stock in that direction, leaving the Siouan tribes in their rear and confronting those of the Shoshonean stock. In the immense area occupied by this stock the number of tribes which sometimes have been called villages, and sometimes were composed of several neighboring villages, was very large. Hundreds of names of these subordinate divisions with their situations are known, and also several confederacies which are more frequently mentioned by a collective name than by the names of the tribes composing them. Among these confederacies are the Abnaki, Illinois, Pennacook, Powhatan, and Siksika. The Cheyenne and Arapaho and the Sac and Fox, though essentially confederacies, are not designated as such under a special title. Excluding the five confederacies just mentioned, the principal tribes are Algonquin, Arapaho, Cheyenne, Conoy, Cree, Delaware, Fox, Kickapoo, Mahican, Massachusset, Menominee, Miami, Micmac, Missisaga, Mohegan, Montagnais, Montauk, Munsee, Nanticoke, Narraganset, Nauset, Nipmuc, Ojibwa, Ottawa, Pamlico, Pequot, Piankishaw, Pottawotomi, Sac, Shawano, Wampanoag, and Wappinger. The Algonquian stock numbers now about 95,000, of whom about 60,000 are in Canada and the rest in the United States. As its tribes were met by the first French, English, and Dutch immigrants and for generations were closely connected with the colonial and revolutionary history of North America, the literature relating to them fills many volumes. Brief allusions to prominent historic events appear under some of the tribal names.

Algonquin, or Algonkin (al-gon'kin). [A French contraction of Algonquin, a word of the Algonkin language signifying 'those on the other side of the river,' i. e. the St. Lawrence River.] A collective term for a group of tribes of North American Indians of the valleys of the Ottawa River and of the northern tributaries of the St. Lawrence, to near Quebec. They were early allies of the French in fighting the Iroquois by whom many were driven west where they became known as Ottawa. Some returned to Three Rivers, Quebec. There are about 4,700 in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

Algorab (al-gō-rāb'), or Algores (al'gō-rēs). [Ar. al-ghurāb, the raven.] The third-magnitude star δ Corvi. See Achiba. In this constellation the lettering of the stars does not at all correspond to their present brightness.

Algrind (al'grind). An anagram of Grindal, in Spenser's "Shepherd's Calendar."

Al-Hakim ibn Otta (āl-hā'kēm ib'n ot'tā). Died about 780. An impostor who appeared as a prophet in Mero, the capital of Khorasan, in 774, surnamed Al-Mokenna (Mocanna, or Mukanna), "The Veiled One." He destroyed himself about 780 to avoid capture by an army which had been sent against him by the calif Mahdi. He has been made the subject of a poem by Moore, "Mokaona, or the Veiled Prophet of Khorasan."

Al-Hakim (āl-hā'kēm) II. Born about the beginning of the 10th century; died Sept. 30, 976. Calif of Cordova 961-976, famous as a patron of literature and learning. He collected a large library (said to have contained 600,000 volumes), which formed the nucleus of the celebrated academy of Cordova, and founded colleges, mosques, and hospitals.

Alhama de los Baños (āl-lā'mā dā lōs bān'yōs). A town and watering-place, containing hot sulphur springs, in the province of Granada, Spain, 26 miles southwest of Granada. It was taken from the Moors in 1482. Population (1887), 7,899.

Alhama de Murcia (ā-lā'mā dā mōr'thē-ī). A town in the province of Murcia, Spain, 17 miles southwest of Murcia, noted for its sulphur springs. Population (1887), 7,203.

Alhamarides (ā-lā-mār'idz). The last Moorish dynasty in Spain. It ruled in Granada from the middle of the 13th century until 1492.

Alhambra (al-ham'brā). [Ar. al-hamra'u, red.] A great citadel and palace founded in the 13th century above the city of Granada, Spain, by the Moorish kings. The hill enclosed by this once formidable fortress is 2,600 feet long and 700 wide; the high and thick walls are strengthened by great square towers, and there is a strong inner citadel. The palace, a large part of which was destroyed by Charles V. to make room for a Renaissance structure, is the finest example of Moorish art, and gives its name to the Alhambraic style. It consists of galleries and rather small rooms surrounding arched courts beautiful with fountains, flowers, and subtropical vegetation. The key-note of the style is the delicacy and elaboration of detail of its interior decoration, which is formed especially of endlessly varied arabesque patterns and Moslem inscriptions impressed on plaster or executed in wood, and delicately yet brilliantly colored. All is on a rather small scale; but the little marble columns are very finely cut, the coupled Ajimez windows are lovely in proportions and ornament, and the research of artistic effects of perspective is noteworthy.

Alhazen (āl-hā'zen). Born at Bassora; died at Cairo, 1038. An Arabian mathematician, author of commentaries on the "Almagest" of Ptolemy, a treatise "On Twilight," a "Thesaurus Optice," etc.

Alhena (al-hen'ā). [Ar. al-hen'ah, a ring or circlet.] The third-magnitude star γ Gemmorum, in the foot or ankle of Pollux. It is sometimes called Almeisam.

Ali (ā'lē). Born at Mecca about 600; killed at Kufa, 661. A cousin german and adopted son of Mohammed, and the fourth calif, 656-661; surnamed "The Lion of God." He was the son of Abn Talib, uncle of Mohammed, and he married Fatima, daughter of the Prophet. He was defeated by Moavya, the founder of the Omniad dynasty, and assassinated. His sons Hassan and Hussein, who tried to regain the califate, were killed in 669 and 680 respectively. Their followers brought about the great schism which divides the Moslem world into two sects, the Sunnites and the Shiites. The latter, which include Persians and most of the Mohammedans of India, regard Ali as the first rightful calif, and venerate his sons as martyrs. He wrote lyric poems ("Diwan"), and a collection of proverbs is attributed to him.

Ali. Brother of the prince in the story of "Prince Ahmed and the Fairy Pari-Banou," in "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments." He marries the Princess Nourounihar.

Ali Bey. Born in Abkhazia about 1728; died 1773. A Mameluke bey, ruler of Egypt, who declared himself independent of the Porte in 1768. He made many conquests in Arabia, Syria, etc., and was taken prisoner in battle in 1773.

Ali Bey. See Badia y Leblich.

Ali Pasha. Born at Tepeleni, Albania, 1741; beheaded at Janina, Feb. 5, 1822. An Albanian who became pasha of Janina in 1788. He subdued the Suliotes in 1803 and was made governor of Rumelia. He intrigued with France, Russia, and Great Britain against Turkey, and was compelled by the Turks to surrender at Janina, and assassinated.

Ali Pasha. Born at Constantinople, 1815; died Sept. 6, 1871. A Turkish statesman and diplomatist, several times grand vizir since 1855. He was especially distinguished as the promoter of various reforms in the Turkish government.

Aliata. See Comanche.

Ali Baba (ā'lē bā'bā). A character in "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments," in the story "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves": a poor wood-cutter who, concealed in a tree, sees a band of robbers enter a secret cavern, and overhears the magic words "open sesame" which open its door. After their departure he repeats the spell and the door opens, disclosing a room full of treasures with which he loads his asses and returns home. His brother Cassim, who discovers his secret, enters the cave alone, forgets the word "sesame," and is found out and cut in pieces by the robbers. The thieves, discovering that Ali Baba knows their secret, resolve to kill him, but are outwitted by Morgiana, a slave.

Ali Baba. An opera by Cherubini, founded on his "Koukourgi," produced at Paris 1833.

Alibamah, or Alibami, or Alibamo. See Alibamu.

Alibamu (ā-lē-bā'mō). [In the form Alabama, as the name of one of the United States, commonly but incorrectly translated 'here we rest'; the name is first mentioned as that of a chief met by De Soto.] A tribe of the Creek Confederacy of North American Indians. The French came into conflict with them in 1702. There is now an Alibamu town on Deep Creek, Indian Territory, and some of the tribe live near Alexandria, Louisiana; over 100 are in Polk County, Texas. (See Creek and Muskogean.) Also Alibamo, Alibamah, Alibami.

Alibaud (ā-lē-bō'). Louis. Born at Nimes France, May 2, 1810; guillotined at Paris, July 11, 1836. A Frenchman who attempted to assassinate Louis Philippe, June 25, 1836.

He served with the Earl of Worcester's players, the Earl of Nottingham's, or the Lord Admiral's, company, and Lord Strange's players, and also engaged in various enterprises with Philip Henslowe. He is frequently mentioned with praise by contemporary writers. His name first appears as an actor in a list of the Earl of Worcester's players in 1586, and he was said by Nash in "Pierce Penilesse" in 1592 to be one of the four greatest English actors. His last known appearance was in 1603-04 when he delivered a reception address to James I. He is said to have excelled in tragedy. He built, with Henslowe, the "Fortune" Theater in 1600, in which he played at the head of the Lord Admiral's company. He began to build Dulwich College in 1613, and personally managed its affairs after its completion.

All Fools, or All Fools but the Fool. A tragi-comedy by Chapman, printed in 1605. It was first called "The World on Wheels" and registered in 1599. It is considered the best of his comedies.

It is celebrated for its quicksilver-mines, which were worked by the Romans and Moors and are now crown property. Population (1887), 8,165.

Almagest (äl'mä-jest), The. See the extract.

The best known of the works of Ptolemy is his "Great Construction of Astronomy" (μεγάλη σύνταξις τῆς ἀστρονομίας) in thirteen books. To distinguish this from the work on astrology in four books only, or the "four-book construction" (τετραβιβλίος σύνταξις), the lengthened treatise on spherical astronomy was called ἡ μεγίστη σύνταξις ("the greatest construction") or simply ἡ μέγιστη, from which the Arabs, by prefixing their article, framed the title Tabrir al Magisti, under which the book was published in A. D. 827, and from this is derived the name Almagest by which Ptolemy's great work is familiarly known. . . . The first book lays down the mathematical principles of his system. . . . The second book deals with the problems connected with the determination of the obliquity of the sphere. In the third book he fixes the length of the year at 365½ days and explains his celebrated theory of excentrics and epicycles. The fourth book treats of the moon, criticising the results obtained by Hipparchus. In the fifth he describes the astrolabe of Hipparchus with which that astronomer discovered the moon's second inequality, called by Bullialdus the evectio. The sixth book treats of eclipses. The seventh treats of the stars, with reference to their movement from west to east, which Hipparchus had established; but by reducing this motion from 45° to 30° in a year Ptolemy increases the error of his predecessor. In the eighth book he gives, with slight variations, the celebrated catalogue of the stars drawn up, as we have seen, by Hipparchus, and introduces also a description of the Milky Way. The ninth book treats of the planets in general; the tenth of Venus; the eleventh of Jupiter and Saturn. In the twelfth he gives us the progressions and retrogradations of the planets, and in the thirteenth he discusses their movements in latitude, and the inclinations of their orbits.

Almagro (äl-mä'grö). A town in the province of Ciudad Real, Spain, 14 miles southeast of Ciudad Real. It has noted lace manufactures and is the center of a district producing the wine of Valdepeñas. Population (1887), 8,712.

Almagro, Diego de. Born probably at Aldea del Rey, about 1475, but according to some accounts a founding in Almagro, 1464; executed July 10 (12?), 1538. A Spanish soldier, one of the conquerors of Peru. He went to Panama with Pedrarias in 1514, and in 1525 joined Pizarro and Luque in an enterprise for conquest toward the south. He was in Panama when Pizarro discovered the coast of Peru in 1532; but when, after his return from Spain, Pizarro sailed for Peru (Jan., 1531), Almagro followed, late in the same year, with three vessels and 150 men, and joined him at Cajamarca about the middle of February, 1533, after the death of Atahualpa. Here a violent quarrel (the second) between them took place; but a reconciliation was effected and Almagro took an active part in the march on Cuzco. In 1535 he was sent to conquer Chile, of which he was made governor. He went as far south as Cogninbo, but finding nothing of the coveted riches, turned back, laid claim to Cuzco as the territory assigned to him, and seized the city by surprise (April 8, 1537), capturing Hernando and Gonzalo Pizarro. He was attacked by Alonso Alvarado, who was captured with his whole army July 12, 1537. Almagro was finally defeated by Alonso Pizarro at Las Salinas, near Cuzco, April 26, 1538, and he was soon after captured, tried, and beheaded.

Almagro, Diego de, surnamed "The Youth" or "Lad." Born at Panama, 1520; executed at Cuzco about Sept. 25, 1542. Son of Diego de Almagro and of an Indian mother. He accompanied his father to Chile (1535-36) and after his death lived in poverty at Lima. The conspirators who killed Francisco Pizarro (June 26, 1541) had met at his house, but it does not appear that he was actively engaged with them. They, however, proclaimed him governor of Peru, and part of the country submitted to him; but the royalists under Vaca de Castro defeated him at Chupas, Sept. 16, 1542. He was arrested next day and soon after beheaded.

Aloidae (a-lō-i'dē), or Aloiadae (a-lō-i'a-dē), or Aloadæ (a-lō'a-dē). [Gr. Alōiadaí, Aloiádaí, Aloiádaí, sons of Aloeus.] In Greek mythology, two giants, Otus and Ephialtes, sons of Poseidon by Iphimedeia, wife of Aloeus. Each of the brothers measured 9 cubits in breadth and 27 in height at the age of nine years, when, according to the Odyssey, they threatened the Olympian gods with war, and attempted to pile Mount Ossa on Olympus and Pelion on Ossa, but were destroyed by the arrows of Apollo. According to Homer they kept Ares imprisoned for thirteen months, until he was secretly liberated by Hermes. By some writers they are represented as having survived the attempt on Olympus, and as having fallen victims to their presumption in suing Ephialtes for the hand of Hera, and Otus for that of Artemis. In the island of Saxos, Artemis, in the form of a stag, ran between the brothers, who, aiming simultaneously at the animal, slew each other. In Hades, as a further punishment, they were tied to a pillar with serpents, and perpetually tormented by the screeching of an owl.

It is traversed by the Vosges; soil generally fertile, producing grain, wine, tobacco, etc., and it has important iron- and coal-mines, and large manufactures of iron, cotton, etc. It is divided into 3 districts, Upper Alsace, Lower Alsace, and Lorraine. Its government is vested in the imperial government and in a provincial committee of 58 members. It sends 15 deputies to the Reichstag. The prevailing religion (78 per cent. of the population) is Roman Catholic. The prevailing language is German, except in Lorraine, where French is chiefly spoken. It was ceded by France to Germany in 1871, as a result of the Franco-German war. Area, 5,668 square miles. Population (1890), 1,603,506.

Alsatia. The Latin name of Alsace.

Alsatia (al-sä'shiä). Formerly a cant name (Alsace being a debatable ground or scene of frequent contests) for Whitefriars, a district in London between the Thames and Fleet street, and adjoining the Temple, which possessed certain privileges of sanctuary derived from the convent of the Carmelites, or White Friars, founded there in 1241. The locality became the resort of libertines and rascals of every description, whose abuses and outrages, and especially the riot in the reign of Charles II., led in 1697 to the abolition of the privilege and the dispersion of the Alsatians. The term Alsatia has in recent times been applied offensively to the English stock-exchange, because of the supposed questionable character of some of its proceedings. The name first occurs in Shadwell's plays "The Woman Captain" (1680) and "The Squire of Alsatia" (1688). See Whitefriars.

Alvarado (äl-vä-rä'ñō), Alonso de. Born at Burgos about 1490; died in Peru, 1556. A Spanish cavalier who in 1513 joined Cortez and served in the conquest of Mexico. Of his early life nothing is known. In 1534 he went to Peru with Pedro de Alvarado (who was not related to him), remained with Pizarro, and was sent to conquer Chachapoyas, a region on the upper Marañon. Called back by the revolt of Inca Manco, he was detached with 400 men to relieve Cuzco. Alvarado, meanwhile, had seized that city, and Alvarado's refusal to acknowledge him led to a battle at the river Abancay, July 12, 1537, where Alvarado was defeated and captured with his whole force. He escaped from Cuzco at the end of the year, joined Pizarro, and commanded his cavalry at the battle of Las Salinas, April 26, 1538, capturing Almagro next day. He then returned to Chachapoyas and carried his conquests eastward to the Huallaga. He joined Vaca de Castro in 1541, took part in the campaign against the younger Almagro, and was at the battle of Chupas, Sept. 16, 1542. Soon after he went to Spain, received the title of marshal, and returned with Gasca in 1546. He was a judge in the military court which condemned Gonzalo Pizarro and Carbajal to death. Gasca made him governor of Cuzco, and in 1553 he was sent to govern Charcas, where he put down a rebellion. On the rebellion of Giron, Alvarado marched against him with 1,000 men (Nov., 1553), but was defeated at Chuquiaguá, near the river Abancay, May 21, 1554. It is said that the mortification of this defeat caused his death.

Alvarado, Diego de. Died in Spain, 1540. A Spanish soldier, either brother or uncle of Pedro de Alvarado, who went with him to Peru in 1534.

Alvarado, Pedro de. Born in Badajoz, 1485; died at Guadalajara, Mexico, June 4, 1541. A Spanish cavalier, famous as a companion of Cortés in the conquest of Mexico. He went to the West Indies in 1510, and in 1511 joined the expedition of Velasquez to Cuba, where he received a grant of land. In 1518 he commanded a vessel in the expedition of Grijalva to Yucatan, and in the following year followed Cortés in the Mexican conquest. He was present at the seizure of Montezuma, and when Cortés went to meet Narvaez, Alvarado was left in command of the force at Mexico. During Cortés's absence the Mexicans rose and besieged the Spaniards. In the disastrous nocturnal retreat (the noche triste), July 1, 1520, Alvarado commanded the rear-guard and escaped with difficulty, saving his life, according to the tradition, by leaping a great gap in the causeway, at a spot still called "Alvarado's Leap." In the subsequent operations and the siege of Mexico he took a prominent part. In Dec., 1523, he was sent with 420 Spaniards and a large force of Indians to conquer Guatemala; after a desperate battle with the Quiché Indians near Quezaltenango, he marched to Utatlan, burned that town after conquering the inhabitants (April, 1524), defeated another army near Lake Atitlan, and founded the old city of Guatemala, July 25, 1524. He returned to Spain to meet charges of defrauding the royal treasury and was acquitted, and returned to Guatemala in 1530 as governor, with a large number of colonists. In 1534 he headed an expedition of 400 men against Quito, claiming that that region was not included in the grant made to Pizarro, and was thus open to conquest. Landing on the coast, he led his men over the mountains in a terrible march, during which large numbers perished. Near Riobamba he met the forces of Almagro and Benalcázar, and was induced to retire, receiving, it is said, a large sum of gold from Pizarro; most of his men remained. Returning to Guatemala, he took part in the conquest of Honduras, which was added to his government. In 1540 he went to Mexico, was engaged in subduing a revolt in Jalisco, and died there from wounds received by a fall with his horse.

omberis" (1791). His writings were collected in ten volumes in 1812.

Allyattes (a-li-at'öz). [Gr. Ἀλυάττης.] A king of Lydia who reigned about 617-560 B. C., the father of Croesus. He made various conquests in Asia Minor, and carried on war against Cyxares of Media. His tomb, north of Sardis, near Lake Gygea, was one of the most notable monuments of antiquity.

If the measurements of Herodotus are accurate, and modern travellers appear to think that they do not greatly overstep the truth, the tomb of Allyattes cannot have fallen far short of the grandest of the Egyptian monuments. Its deficiency as respects size must have been in height, for the area of the base, which alone our author's statements determine, is above one-third greater than that of the Pyramid of Cheops. As, however, the construction was of earth and not of stone, a barrow and not a pyramid, it would undoubtedly have required a less amount of servile labour than the great works of Egypt, and would indicate a less degraded condition of the people who raised it than that of the Egyptians in the time of the pyramid-builders. Racineon, Herod., I. 363.

Allypius (a-lip'i-us). The (unidentified) author of a Greek treatise on the elements of music. "The work consists wholly, with the exception of a short introduction, of lists of the symbols used (both for voice and instrument) to denote all the sounds in the forty-five scales produced by taking each of the fifteen notes in the three genera (diatonic, chromatic, enharmonic)." *Smith, Dict. Amadis of Gaul (am'ä-dis öv gäl). The legendary hero of a famous medieval romance of chivalry, the center of a cycle of romances: the oldest of the heroes of chivalry. He is represented as the illegitimate son of Perion, king of Gaul, and Elisena, princess of Brittany. He was exposed soon after birth, by his mother, to the sea in a cradle; was picked up by a Scottish knight; was educated at the court of the king of Scotland; and fell in love with Oriana, daughter of Lisnarte, king of England, whom he eventually married. After being knighted he returned to Gaul, and during the rest of his life performed there and elsewhere a number of wonderful exploits.

It is to Herberay that the famous romance of Amadis of Gaul owes most of its fame. According to the most probable story, the Amadis was originally translated by the Spaniard Montalvo from a lost Portuguese original of the fourteenth century. There is absolutely no trace of a French original, the existence of which has been assumed by French critics. In form the Amadis is a long prose roman d'aventures, distinguished only from its French companions and predecessors by a somewhat higher strain of romantic sentiment, and by a greater abundance of giants, dwarfs, witches, and other conduits, which, even in its most luxuriant day, the simpler and more academic French taste had known how to do without. It had been continued in the Spanish by more than one author, and was a very voluminous work when, in 1540, Herberay undertook to give a French version of it. He, in his turn, had continuators, but none who equalled his popularity or power. . . . The book became immensely popular. It is said that it was the usual reading book for foreign students of French for a considerable period, and it was highly thought of by the best critics (such as Pascal) of its own and the next generation. It had moreover a great influence on what came after it. To no single book can be so clearly traced the heroic romances of the early seventeenth century. Saintsbury, Fr. Lit., p. 236.

Amadis of Greece. A continuation of the seventh book of "Amadis of Gaul," though it is the ninth, not the eighth book of the series. It was in Spanish, and said to be by Feliciano de Silva. It relates the exploits of the son of Lisuarte of Greece who was the son of Esplandian, the son of Amadis (of Gaul).

[Mr. Southey] has mentioned that in Amadis of Greece may be found the original of the Zelmae of Sidney's "Arcadia," the Florizel of Shakespeare's "Winter's Tale," and Masque of Cupid in the "Faery Queene." Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 378.

Amalek (am'a-lek). A grandson of Esau and prince of an Arab tribe; also, the people descended from him. In biblical history the Amalekites are represented as a nomadic tribe. In the time of Abraham they are mentioned as inhabiting the district southwest of the Dead Sea (Gen. xiv. 7); in the Mosaic period they are spread out over the entire desert of et-Tih as far as the Egyptian boundary and the Sinaiic peninsula (Ex. xvii. 8-16; Num. xiii. 30); later they extended their settlements into the territory of the tribe of Ephraim (Judges xii. 15). They attacked the Israelites when wandering through the desert, were driven off by Joshua, and were doomed to extermination (Ex. xvii. 8-16; Deut. xxv. 17-19). Saul defeated them but did not annihilate them (1 Sam. xxx.), and the last of them were killed by 503 Simonites on the mountain of Seir (1 Chron. iv. 43).

Amalekites (am'a-lek-its). See Amalek.

It has manufactures of paper, macaroni, etc., and contains a cathedral (see below) and a Capuchin monastery (now a hotel). It was founded, according to tradition, in the 4th century, had at first a republican constitution under elective princes, and became an important commercial center in the middle ages. It contained the oldest MS. of the Pandects (which see), and was the birthplace of Gioja, inventor of the compass. The cathedral is a picturesque church in the Norman-Saracenic style, in masonry of alternate dark and light courses, essentially of the early 13th century. There is a three-aisled vestibule of two bays; the nave has mosaics, antique columns, and a richly carved and gilded roof. The crypt contains the relics of St. Andrew. The bronze doors of the chief portal, which bear several reliefs, were cast at Constantinople in 1066. Population, about 5,000.

Amazon (äm-ä-zon). [Pg. Rio Amazonas, Sp. Río de las Amazonas, F. Fleuve des Amazones, G. Amazonenstrom; formerly Orellana; in its upper course Marañon or Tunguragua, in its middle course Solimões.] The principal river of South America, and the largest in the world. It has two chief head streams. One is the Marañon (Tunguragua) which rises in Peru about lat. 10° 30' S.; the other is the Ucayale (which has for its southernmost head stream the Apurimac). The Ucayale rises in Peru about lat. 15° S. The Marañon (Amazon) flows northwest between ranges of the Andes, turns east near lat. 5° S., enters Brazil about long. 70° W., and after discharging water through several narrow channels into the Lower Tocantins or Pará River, thus cutting off the island of Marajó, flows into the Atlantic near the equator. It is connected on the north with the Orinoco by the Cassiquiare and Negro. The basin of the Amazon comprises about 2,500,000 square miles. Its leading tributaries are, on the north, the Napo, Ica, Japurá, and Negro; on the south the Huallaga, Javary, Jutahy, Juruá, Purús, Madeira, Tapajós, and Xingú. Its length, to the source of the Apurimac, is probably about 3,300 miles, though often given as 4,000. It is navigable about 2,300, for steamships about 2,200 miles. The width of the main mouth is 50 miles; and at the Peruvian frontier the river is 1 mile wide. The mouth was discovered by Pinzon in 1500, and Orellana descended it in 1541. Steamers first plied on it in 1853. In 1867 it was made a free highway to all nations.

Amazonas (ä-mä-zö'näs). The largest state of Brazil, capital Manaus, occupying the north-western part of the country and bordering on Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia. It is largely occupied by forests. Area (claimed), 753,439 square miles. Population (1888), 80,654.

Amazonia (äm-ä-zö'ni-ä). A name sometimes given to the valley of the Amazon.

Amazons (äm-ä-zonz). [L. Amazon, Gr. Ἀμαζών, a foreign name of unknown meaning; according to Greek writers, from ἀ-priv., without, and μαζός, a breast: a popular etymology, accompanied by, and doubtless originating, the statement that the right breast was removed in order that it might not interfere with the use of the bow and javelin.] 1. In Greek legend, a race of women supposed to have dwelt on the coast of the Black Sea and in the Caucasus Mountains. The Amazons and their contests were a favorite theme in Grecian art and story. They were represented as forming a state from which men were excluded, as devoting themselves to war and hunting, and as being often in conflict with the Greeks in the heroic age.

But it is in the famous legend of the Amazons that we must look for the chief evidence preserved to us by classical antiquity of the influence exercised by the Hittites in Asia Minor. The Amazons were imagined to be a nation of female warriors, whose primitive home lay in Kappadokia, on the banks of the Thermodon, not far from the ruins of Boghaz Keui. From hence they had issued forth to conquer the people of Asia Minor and to found an empire which reached to the Ægean Sea. The building of many of the most famous cities on the Ægean coast was ascribed to them,—Myrina and Kyme, Smyrna and Ephesus, where the worship of the great Asiatic goddess was carried on with barbaric ceremonies into the later age of civilized Greece. Now these Amazons are nothing more than the priestesses of the Asiatic goddess, whose cult spread from Carchemish along with the advance of the Hittite armies. She was served by a multitude of armed priestesses and eunuch priests; under her name of Ma, for instance, no less than six thousand of them waited on her at Komana in Kappadokia. Certain cities, in fact, like Komana and Ephesus, were dedicated to her service, and a large part of the population accordingly became the armed ministers of the mighty goddess. Generally these were women, as at Ephesus in early days, where they obeyed a high-priestess, who called herself the queen-bee. When Ephesus passed into Greek hands, the goddess worshipped there was identified with the Greek Artemis, and a high-priest took the place of the high-priestess. Sayce, Hittites, p. 78.

2. A fabled tribe of female warriors said to have existed in South America. The report originated in an Indian myth which was found from the West Indies to Paraguay, and still exists among the Caribs and others: it is interesting from its relation to the Old World myth.

Amazons, The. An earlier English form of the Portuguese name of the Amazon River, still in occasional use.

Amazons, Battle of. See Battle of Amazons.

Ambrose (am'brōz), L. Ambrosius (am-brō'zi-us), of Alexandria. Died about 250. A Roman nobleman, a friend of Origen.

Ambrose, L. Ambrosius, Saint. Born at Trèves, Gaul, probably 340; died at Milan, April, 397. One of the fathers of the Latin Church. He was educated at Rome, appointed consular prefect in Upper Italy about 369, and elected (while a civilian and unbaptized) bishop of Milan in 374. He was the champion of the Catholics against the Arians and pagans. For his cruelty in the massacre of Thessalonica the emperor Theodosius was excommunicated by Ambrose and forced to do penance. Among his works are "De officia ministrorum," "Hexameron," hymns, etc. He is the reputed author of the Ambrosian ritual.

He was elected, while still an unbaptized catechumen and governor of the province, to the post of Bishop of Milan, having entered the church with his troops to quell the fury of the partisans of the two rival candidates. While he soothed the people with his wise words, a little child, so the story runs, suddenly called out "Ambrose is Bishop"; the words were caught up and carried round the church by the rapturous acclamation of the whole multitude. Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 187.

Ambrose, Isaac. Born at Ormskirk, Lancashire, England, 1604; died 1664. An English nonconformist divine and devotional writer, author of "Looking unto Jesus" (1658).

Amelia (a-mē'liä). Born Aug. 7, 1783; died Nov. 2, 1810. An English princess, the fifteenth and youngest child of George III.

Amelia. The heroine of Fielding's novel of that name (published 1751), a virtuous and devoted wife, said to be the portrait of Fielding's own wife. She is represented as having suffered an injury to her nose (like Mrs. Fielding), which impaired her popularity among Fielding's readers. Thackeray considered her "the most charming character in English fiction."

Amelia. See Scotley, Amelia.

Amelia Island (a-mē'liä i'land). A small island off the northeastern coast of Florida.

Amélie-les-Bains (ä-mā-lē'lā-bän'). [Formerly Arles-les-Bains: the name was changed in 1840 in honor of the wife of Louis Philippe.] A health-resort in the department of Pyrénées-Orientales, France, 20 miles southwest of Perpignan. It has sulphur springs.

Amennds for Ladies. A play by Nathaniel Field, published in 1618.

Amenemhat (ä-men-em'hät) I., Se-hotep-ab-Ra. An Egyptian king, the founder of the 12th dynasty, who reigned about 2466 B. C. (Brugsch). He was a successful ruler and general, and founded the temple of Amun in Thebes. There is considerable documentary evidence concerning his reign. Also Amenemha.

Amenemhat II., Nub-kau-Ra. An Egyptian king, the third of the 12th dynasty, who reigned about 2400 B. C., and of whom little is known. Also Amenemha.

Amenemhat III., Maa-en-Ra. An Egyptian king, the sixth of the 12th dynasty, who reigned about 2300 B. C. (Brugsch). He constructed Lake Moeris and the Labyrinth. (See Moeris, Labyrinth.) Inscriptions of his time have been found on the rocks in the peninsula of Sinai. There is also a mark (with an inscription) on the rocks of Senneh showing the height of the inundation of the Nile in the 14th year of his reign. (See Nile.) Also Amenemha.

Amenemhat IV., Maat-kheru-Ra. An Egyptian king, the seventh of the 12th dynasty, who reigned about 2266 B. C. (Brugsch). Also Amenemha.

Amenhotep (ä-men-hō'tep) I., or Amenophis (am-e-nō'fis), Ser-ka-Ra. An Egyptian king, the second of the 18th dynasty, who reigned about 1666 B. C. (Brugsch). He was successful in campaigns in Ethiopia (Kush) and Libya. Also Amenhetp.

Amenhotep II., or Amenophis, Aa-kheperu-Ra. An Egyptian king, the seventh of the 18th dynasty, who reigned about 1566 B. C. (Brugsch). He made a successful campaign in Asia, which is commemorated in an inscription in a temple at Amadah in Nubia. There are also inscriptions bearing his name in the temple of Amun at Karnak. Also Amenhetp.

Amenhotep III., or Amenophis, Maat-neb-Ra. An Egyptian king, the ninth of the 18th dynasty, who reigned about 1500 B. C. (Brugsch). He was a successful warrior and a great builder. The two colossal statues of Memnon near Thebes are portrait-statues of him. See Memnon.

Amenophis III. was as great in peace as in war. In his reign Egypt lost none of her military prestige, and from some large scarabæi—one of which is in the Gizeh Palace—we learn that under his rule Egypt stretched from Mesopotamia to the country of Kero in Abyssinia. At the same time that he consolidated the empire left him by preceding monarchs, Amenophis raised along the banks of the Nile monuments which for their grandeur and the perfection of their workmanship are unsurpassed. The temple at Gebel-Barkal, in the Sūdān, was erected by this king; so also was that at Soleb, near the third cataract—and souvenirs of him may be found at Assiut, Elephantine, Gebel-Silsileh, El-Kab, Tōrah, the Serapeum at Memphis, and Serbit-el-Iladim. He added considerably to Karnak, and built that portion of the temple at Luxor that bears his name. He also erected on the left bank of the Nile—opposite to Luxor—a sacred edifice which once must have been one of the most important in Egypt. Destroyed completely by causes unknown to us, all that is now left of it are the two enormous colossi—called by the Arabs Sānamat—which originally stood at the entrance. Mariette, Outlines, p. 39.

Amenhotep IV., or Amenophis, Khu-n-Aten ('splendor of the sun's disk'). An Egyptian king, the tenth of the 18th dynasty, who reigned about 1466 B. C. (Brugsch). He was an innovator in religion, substituting the new worship of Aten (the sun's disk) for that of Amun and the other Egyptian deities. He also moved the capital from Thebes to a place in middle Egypt, the modern Tel-el-Amarna.

Ameni (ä-mā'nē), or Amenemhat. An Egyptian official under Usertesen I. An inscription recording the events of his life has been found in a rock-tomb at Beni-Hassan. It contains a reference to a famine which has, by some, been supposed to be that which occurred during Joseph's sojourn in Egypt.

Amenities of Literature. A work by Isaac D'Israeli, completed in 1841.

Amenti (a-men'tē). In Egyptian mythology, the under world; the world of the dead.

Ameria (a-mē'ri-ä). The ancient name of America in Italy.

America (ä-mer'i-kä). [It. Sp. Pg. America, F. Amérique, G. Amerika; from NL. America (1507), after Americus Vesputius (It. Amerigo Vespucci), an Italian explorer. See Vespucci.] The western continent or grand division of the world, including North America, South America, and adjacent islands. See

North America and South America. It was visited by the Northmen about 1000 (?) and was discovered by Columbus in 1492. The mainland was probably reached by Cabot in 1497. (See Columbus, Cabot.) The name America was proposed by Waldseemüller (a teacher of geography in the college of Saint-Dié among the Vosges) in a treatise called "Cosmographie," published in 1507. Length, about 10,500 miles; greatest breadth, over 3,000 miles. Area (estimated), about 15,700,000 square miles. Population (estimated 1891), 121,715,000.

America. A wooden keel schooner-yacht designed and built by George Steers of New York, for Commodore J. C. Stevens of the New York Yacht Club, in 1851. Her original dimensions were: length over all, 100 feet 6 inches; length on water-line, 90 feet 4 inches; beam, 22 feet 6 inches; draught, 11 feet 6 inches. In 1851, at the time of the World's Fair in London, Commodore Stevens, having crossed the Atlantic in the America, entered her in the race of Aug. 22 open to yachts of all nations for a £500 cup. The course was around the Isle of Wight, and the America beat the whole fleet of 18 yachts by about 7 miles. Aug. 28 she sailed a race with the English schooner Titania over a 40-mile course, beating her out of sight. The cup (£500) which she won in 1851 was given (1857) to the New York Yacht Club and made a prize open to challenge by yachts of all nations. There have been (1893) eight unsuccessful attempts to recover it.

Ameshas Spentas, mod. Pers. Amshaspands. [Pers., 'Immortal Holy Ones.'] The seven supreme spirits of Avestan theology. At their head, as their creator, stands Ahuramazda. The others are moral or physical abstractions. They are Volu Manuh, 'good mind,' Asha Vahishta, 'best righteousness,' Khshathra Vairya, 'the wished-for kingdom,' Spenta Armaiti, 'holy harmony,' Haurovatat, 'wholeness, saving health, Ameretat, 'immortality.' In the later religion they became guardian geniuses respectively of the flocks, fire, metals, the earth, waters, and trees. They are related to Ahuramazda as are the Adityas in Vedic theology to Varuna. See Adityas.

Amestris (a-mes'tris). See the extract.

Amestris, the daughter of Otanes according to Herodotus, of Onophas according to Ctesias, was the favourite wife of Xerxes, and bore him at least five children. Her crimes and cruelties are related by Ctesias at some length, and are glanced at by Herodotus. She may be the Vasthi of Esther, whose disgrace was perhaps only temporary. She lived to a great age, dying, as it would seem, only a little before her son Artaxerxes.

Rawlinson, Herod., IV. 258.

Ameto (ä-mä'tö). A prose idyl of Boccaccio, with poetical interludes. Seven nymphs over whom Ameto, a young hunter, presides recount the story of their loves, and each story concludes with eclogues, which were the first in the Italian language.

Amie (ä'mi). In Ben Jonson's "Sad Shepherd," a gentle shepherdess in whose mouth are put the words:

I grant the linnel, lark, and bullfinch sing,
But best the dear good angel of the Spring,
The nightingale. ll. 2.

Amiel (ä'mi-el). In Dryden's "Absalom and Achitophel," a character intended for Edward Seymour, speaker of the House of Commons, who was an adherent of the Prince of Orange and the head of the house of Seymour.

Amiel (ä-më-el'), Henri Frédéric. Born at Geneva, 1821; died 1881. A Swiss scholar and poet, appointed professor of esthetics and of French literature at the Academy of Geneva in 1849, and of moral philosophy in 1853. Parts of his "Journal intime" were published after his death (2 vols. 1882-84). He studied at Berlin 1844-48.

Amiens (ä-më-an'). The capital of the department of Somme, France, situated at the junction of the Selle with the Somme in lat. 49° 55' N., long. 2° 18' E.: the ancient Samarobri-va. It was the capital of ancient Picardie and is now one of the leading manufacturing and commercial centers of France. The cathedral of Amiens, begun in 1220, is in purity and majesty of design perhaps the finest extant medieval structure. It is 469 feet long, 213 across the transepts, and about 150 in height of nave-vaulting. The incomparable façade has 3 huge porches covered with the richest sculpture, 2 galleries, the lower arcaded, the upper filled with statues of kings, and a great rose and gable between two low square towers. The transepts have superb roses 40 feet in diameter above traceried arcades filled with colored glass. The great portal of the south transept is famous for its sculpture. The interior is simple and most impressive. The 110 late-Pointed choir-stalls are probably unexcelled, and the radiating apsidal chapels are of exceptional beauty. The slender wooden central spire is 361 feet high. Population (1891), 83,654.

Amiens, Battle of. A victory gained Nov. 27, 1870, by the Germans under Manteuffel over the French. It was followed by the taking of Amiens Nov. 28, and the surrender of its citadel Nov. 30.

Amiens, Council at. See Amiens, Mise of.

Amiens, Mise of. The award pronounced Jan. 23, 1264, by Louis IX. of France, to whom the question as to the obligation of Henry III. to observe the Provisions of Oxford had been referred at the Council of Amiens, Dec. 16, 1263.

By this award the King of France entirely annulled the Provisions of Oxford, and all engagements which had been made respecting them. Not content with doing this in general terms, he forbade the making of new statutes, as proposed and carried out in the Provisions of Westminster, ordered the restoration of the royal castles to the king, restored to him the power of nominating the officers of state and the sheriffs, the nomination of whom had been withdrawn from him by the Provisions of Oxford; he annulled the order that natives of England alone should govern the realm of England, and added that the king should have full and free power in this kingdom as he had had in time past. All this was in the king's favor. The arbitrator, however, added that all charters issued before the time of the Provisions should hold good, and that all parties should condone enmities and injuries arising from the late troubles. Stubbs, Early Plantagenets, p. 202.

Amiens, Treaty of. A peace concluded at Amiens, March 27, 1802, between Great Britain on one side, and France, Spain, and the Batavian Republic on the other. England restored all conquests except Ceylon and Trinidad, the Ionian Republic was acknowledged, the French were to abandon Rome and Naples, and Malta was to be restored to the Knights of St. John.

Amiens (ä'mi-enz). In Shakspeare's "As you Like it," a gentleman in attendance on the duke.

Amin (ä-mën'). The eldest son of Harun-al-Rashid in "The Three Ladies of Bagdad" in "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments." He marries Amine.

Amina (ä-më'mä). The principal character in Bellini's opera "La Sonnambula."

Aminadab (ä-min'ä-dab). A name often used by the older dramatists to designate a Quaker.

Aminadab Sleek. See Sleek, Aminadab.

Amine (ä-mën'). 1. In the story of "Sidi Nouman" in "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments," the wife of Sidi Nouman. Her habit of eating only a few grains of rice, at table, arouses his suspicions, and he discovers her feasting at night with a ghoul.

2. In the story of "The Three Ladies of Bagdad" in "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments," Zobeide's sister. Without knowing his rank, she marries Amin, eldest son of Harun-al-Rashid.

Aminta (ä-min'tä). A pastoral drama by Tasso, produced in 1573.

But an epoch in the history of the pastoral drama is marked by the Aminta of Torquato Tasso, acted at Ferrara in 1573. This celebrated poem is simple in plot; but its design is allegorical, and the Arcadia presented is a reflexion of the Ferrara court, the poet himself appearing as one of the shepherds (Tirsi). Ward.

Aminte (ä-mant'). 1. See Cathos.—2. The neighbor of Sganarelle in Molière's "L'Amour Médecin."

Amintor (ä-min'tor). One of the principal male characters in Beaumont and Fletcher's play "The Maid's Tragedy." His weakness and irresolution in love are explained, but not compensated for, by his fantastic loyalty to his king.

Amiot, or Amyot (ä-më-ö'), Joseph. Born at Toulon, France, 1718; died at Peking, 1794. A French Jesuit missionary (in China) and Orientalist. He wrote "Mémoires concernant l'histoire, les sciences, et les arts des Chinois" (1776-91), "Dictionnaire tatar-manchou-français" (1789), etc.

Amirkot, Amerkote (äm-ër-köt'). A town in Sind, British India, 94 miles east of Haidarabad.

Amis et Amiles (ä-mës'ät ä-më'les). A chanson de geste, in 3,500 lines, dating probably from the 12th century. Its theme is the adventures of two noble fellows Amis and Amiles. They escape the treachery of the felon knight Hardré; the niece of Charles, Lubias, is bestowed on Amis, and his daughter, Bellicent, falls in love with Amiles; the latter is accused of treason by Hardré, and is saved by Amis who fights in his stead and slays his accuser; and Amiles and Bellicent are married. Amis, having forsworn himself in aiding Amiles, is punished by an attack of leprosy, of which he is cured by the blood of the children of Amiles who are slain by their father for this purpose: the children, however, are miraculously restored to life. Also known as Amys and Amyloun.

Amis et Amiles is the earliest vernacular form of a story which attained extraordinary popularity in the middle ages, being found in every language and in most literary forms, prose and verse, narrative and dramatic. This popularity may partly be assigned to the religious and marvellous elements which it contains, but is due also to the intrinsic merits of the story. The chanson . . . is written, like Roland, in decasyllabic verse, but, unlike Roland, has a shorter line of six syllables and not assonanced at the end of each stanza. Saintsbury, Fr. Lit., p. 16.

Amis (ä'mis) the Parson. A comic poem in Middle High German, composed by an Austrian (Der Stricker), probably about 1230.

Amistad (ä-mës-tät'n) Case. The case of the United States against the Spanish vessel Amistad. This vessel, while coming from Africa in 1839 with a cargo of kidnapped negroes, was seized by the negroes near Cuba and taken to the coast of Connecticut, and there captured by a United States vessel. On a libel for salvage the United States Supreme Court held on appeal that the negroes were free and not pirates.

Amisus (ä-mi'sus). The ancient name of Sam-sun.

Amlet (äm'let), Dick or Richard. In Vanbrugh's comedy "The Confederacy," a gamester, the son of a garrulous old woman who combines the trade of selling paint, powder, and toilet luxuries to ladies with a less respectable one. He attempts with her assistance to pass himself off as a fine gentleman, but only produces the impression of a footman raised from the ranks.

Amlet, Amleth. Same as Hamlet.

Amlet, Mrs. See Amlet, Dick.

Amlwch (äm'lök). A seaport in Anglesey, Wales, 56 miles west of Liverpool, noted for its (Parys) copper-mines. Population (1891), 5,567.

Amman (äm'män), Jost. Born at Zürich, Switzerland, about 1539; died at Nuremberg, March, 1591. A Swiss wood-engraver and painter. He came to Nuremberg in 1560, where he probably worked until his death. He is chiefly known for his engravings, especially his wood-engravings, and left no less than 550 prints, of which the most noted are a set of 115 wood-prints of arts and trades, printed at Frankfurt in 1586.

Ammerland (äm'mer-länd). A small district in the western part of the grand duchy of Oldenburg, Germany.

Ammersee (äm'mer-zä). A lake in Upper Bavaria, 10 miles long, traversed by the Ammer. It lies west of the Starnbergersee.

Amnianus (am-i-ä'nus) Marcellinus. Born at Antioch, Syria, about 330 A. D.; died about 395. A Greek historian, author of a history of Rome (in Latin), covering the period 96 A. D.—378. The part for 96—352 is lost. He wrote probably between 380—390.

Ammon. See Amun.

Ammon (am'on). The eponymic ancestor of a people, the children of Ammon, or Ammonites, frequently mentioned in the Old Testament; according to the account in Genesis, the son of Lot by his younger daughter was Ben-Ami (Gen. xix. 38).

Ammon, or Amon, or Amun, Saint. Born about 285, in lower Egypt; died 348. The founder of the settlement of hermits in Nitria. See Nitria.

Ammon (äm'mön), Christoph Friedrich von. Born at Bayreuth, Bavaria, Jan. 16, 1766; died at Dresden, May 21, 1850. A German Protestant preacher and rationalistic theologian. He was appointed professor (1789) at Erlangen, later (1794) at Göttingen, and again (1804) at Erlangen.

Ammon, Friedrich August von. Born at Göttingen, Sept. 10, 1799; died May 18, 1861. A German ophthalmologist, son of C. F. von Ammon. He became professor in the surgical and medical academy at Dresden in 1829, and royal privy medical counselor in 1844.

Ammonias (a-mö'ni-as). [Gr. Ἀμμωνίας.] An architect who, according to an epigram of the Anthology, restored the Pharos of Alexandria in the time of the emperor Anastasius, about the end of the 5th century A. D. He is also credited with the construction of an aqueduct.

Ammonius (a-mö'ni-us). Born about 170 A. D.; died after 243. An Alexandrian philosopher, the founder of the Neoplatonic school, surnamed "Saccas" or "Saccophorus" ("the sack-bearer"), from his occupation, in early life, as a porter. Plotinus, Longinus, and Origen were his pupils. According to Porphyry he was born a Christian, but this is denied by Eusebius and Jerome.

Ammonius. An Alexandrian philosopher, of the second half of the 5th century A. D., a commentator on Aristotle.

Ammonoosuc (am-ö-nö'suk), Lower. A river in New Hampshire, about 100 miles long, which rises near Mount Washington and joins the Connecticut 7 miles north of Haverhill.

Amol (ä-möl'), or Amul (ä-möl'). A city in the province of Mazanderan, Persia, situated on the Heraz in lat. 36° 20' N., long. 52° 23' E. It was very important in the middle ages. Population, 10,000.

Amometus (am-ö-mé'tus). A Greek writer of uncertain date, author of a poetical description of a nation of "Attacori," dwelling beyond the Himalayan range, resembling the ancient account of the Hyperboreans.

Amon (ä'mon). In Old Testament history: (a) A governor of Samaria in the time of Ahab (Amos vii.). (b) The son of Manasseh and king of Judah 642-640 B. C. He was assassinated through a court conspiracy, and was succeeded by his son Josiah.

Amon. See Amun.

Amon, or Aimon, or Haymon. See Aymon.

Amontons (ä-mön-töü'), Guillaume. Born at Paris, Ang. 31, 1663; died Oct. 11, 1705. A French physicist. He was the inventor of a system of telegraphy by means of signals from one station to another through a series.

Amoo. See Amu-Daria.

Amoor. See Amur.

Amor (ä'mor). [L. 'love.'] Same as Eros.

Amoraim (ä-mö'rä-ém). [Aram., 'expounders.'] The rabbis who commented upon the Mishna, and thus evolved the Gemara, which with the Mishna constitutes the Talmud. The period of the Amoraim begins after the death of the patriarch rabbi Judah I. and extends to the close of the Talmud, i. e., about 200-500 A. D.

Amoret (am'ö-ret). 1. In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," the twin sister of Belphebe, the impersonation of the grace and charm of female beauty. Brought up by Venus in the Courts of Love, she becomes the wife of Sir Scudamore, but is not insensible to the passion of Corliambo (sensual love). (See Bustrane.) Also Amoretta.

2. In Fletcher's "Faithful Shepherdess," a shepherdess in love with and loved by Perigot, and enduring many trials with sweetness and constancy.

Amoretta (am-ö-ret'ä). See Amoret, 1.

Amorgos (a-mör'gos). [Gr. Ἀμοργός.] An island, 21 miles long, in the Ægean Sea, one of the Cyclades, 16 miles southeast of Naxos. It is mountainous and fruitful. Population, about 2,000.

Amorites (am'ö-rits). [Probably from Heb. amir, mountain-top, the mountaineers (Num. xiii. 29).] A name used in the Old Testament in general for the Canaanites as well as for a subdivision of the Canaanites. Biblical critics assert that in the set of documents known as J (Jabvist) all the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Palestine are called Canaanites, while in the documents known as E (Elohist) (by others R=Redactor) they are called Amorites. This general use of the term Amorite finds further confirmation in the recently suggested reading of a geographical term in the cuneiform inscriptions, mat Amurri, country of the Amorites, which denominates in the inscriptions Phœnicia and Syria in general, particularly Palestine: it was previously read mat Aharri. Even in the restricted sense it is obvious that they were one of the chief races of Canaan. As early as the 13th century B. C. they seem to have been antagonists of the Hittites. They appear on the Egyptian monuments as Amuru; they lived east of the Jordan where Sibon and Og, their kings, were defeated by Moses. The land thus conquered became the property of the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh. Those west of the Jordan were conquered by Joshua, and their territory was given to the tribe of Judah.

Amorous Bigot, The. A comedy by T. Shadwell, produced in 1690.

Amorous Complaint Made at Windsor, An. A poem attributed to Chaucer.

Amorous La Foole, Sir. See La Foole.

Amorous Prince, The. A play by Mrs. Aphra Behn, adapted from Davenport's "City Night-Cap," produced and printed in 1671.

Amorphus (a-mör'fus). In Ben Jonson's comedy "Cynthia's Revels," a traveler and affected talker. He is a liar and braggart, and an arbitrator of quarrels, but no fighter.

Amory (ä'mö-ri), Blanche. In Thackeray's novel "Pendennis," a worldly, frivolous, and selfish girl, whose real name is Betsy. She encourages any man, even the French cook, and, while posing as a tender, delicate flower, makes every one about her as uncomfortable as possible.

For this young lady [Blanche Amory] was not able to carry out any emotion to the full; but had a sham enthusiasm, a sham hatred, a sham love, a sham taste, a sham grief, each of which flared and shone very vehemently for an instant, but subsided and gave place to the next sham emotion. Thackeray, Pendennis, II. xxxv.

Amory, Thomas. Born 1691 (?); died Nov. 25, 1788. An English writer, author of "Memoirs containing the Lives of several Ladies of Great Britain, etc." (1755), "Life of John Bunce, Esq." (1756-66), etc. He has been called the "English Rabelais."

"John Bunce" is virtually a continuation of the memoirs. The book is a literary curiosity, containing an extraordinary medley of religious and sentimental rhapsodies, descriptions of scenery, and occasional fragments of apparently genuine autobiography. "The soul of Rabelais," says Hazlitt (who never gets names right), "pass'd into John (Thomas) Amory." Leslie Stephen, Dict. Nat. Biog.

Amos (ä'mos). [Heb.] 1. A Hebrew prophet, a contemporary of Isaiah and Hosea, and a native of Tekoa, near Bethlehem.—2. One of the books of the Old Testament, the third of the minor prophets.

The humble condition of a shepherd following his flock on the bare mountains of Tekoa has tempted many commentators, from Jerome downwards, to think of Amos as an unlettered clown, and to trace his "rusticity" in the language of his book. To the unprejudiced judgment, however, the prophecy of Amos appears one of the best examples of pure Hebrew style. The language, the images, the grouping are alike admirable; and the simplicity of the diction, obscured only in one or two passages by the fault of transcribers (iv. 3; ix. 1), is a token, not of rusticity, but of perfect mastery over a language which, though unfit for the expression of abstract ideas, is unsurpassed as a vehicle for impassioned speech. W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, p. 125.

Amos, Sheldon. Born about 1835; died near Alexandria, Egypt, Jan. 2, 1886. An English jurist and publicist. He was professor of jurisprudence at University College, London, 1867-79, and author of "Capital Punishment in England" (1864), "Codification in England and the State of New York" (1867), "Difference of Sex as a Topic of Jurisdiction and Legislation" (1870), "Policy of the Contagious Diseases Acts Tested" (1870), "A Systematic View of the Science of Jurisprudence" (1872), etc.

Amosis. See Amasis.

Amoskeag (am-os-keg'). See Pennacook.

Amour Médecin (ä-mör' mä-dsä-n'), L. A comedy by Molière, produced in 1665 at Versailles. In this play he ridicules pedantry and charlatanism in the medical profession, against which he had a spite.

Amoy (ä-moi'). A seaport in the province of Fukkien, China, situated on the island of Amoy opposite Formosa, in lat. 24° 27' N., long. 118° 4' E. It is a free haven, and has one of the best harbors in the country. It exports tea, sugar, opium, etc. It was captured by the British in 1841, and became open to British commerce in 1842. Population (1888), 96,000.

Amoymon. See Amaimon.

Amper. See Ammer.

Ampère (ou-pär'), André Marie. Born at Lyons, Jan. 22, 1775; died at Marseilles, June 10, 1836. A French physicist and mathematician, famous for his investigations in electro-dynamics. He was professor at the Polytechnic School in Paris and later in the Collège de France, and a member of the Academy of Sciences. His chief works are "Recueil d'observations electro-dynamiques" (1822), and "Théorie des phénomènes electro-dynamiques."

Ampère, Jean Jacques Antoine. Born at Lyons, Aug. 12, 1800; died at Pau, France, March 27, 1864. A French literary historian, son of A. M. Ampère, professor in the Collège de France, and a member of the French Academy. He was the author of "Histoire littéraire de la France avant le 12^{me} siècle" (1839-40), "Histoire romaine à Rome" (1856-64), "Histoire de la formation de la langue française," "L'empire romain à Rome," "La Grèce, Rome, et Dante."

Ampezzaner (äm-pet-sä'ner) Alps. A group of the Dolomite Alps on the borders of southern Tyrol and Italy.

Ampezzo (äm-pet'sö). The upper valley of the Boita, situated in Tyrol and the Italian border 26 miles southeast of Brixen. Its chief town is Cortina di Ampezzo (or Ampezzo di Calore). Population (commune), about 3,000.

Ampezzo. A town in the province of Udine, Italy, 32 miles northwest of Udine. Population, about 2,000.

Ampfing (ämp'fing). A village in Upper Bavaria, 5 miles west of Mühldorf.

Ampfing, Battle of. 1. See Mühldorf.—2. A victory gained by the Austrians under Archduke John over the French, Dec. 1, 1800.

Amphialus (am-fä-lus). [From a Gr. name Ἀμφιάλος.] In Sidney's "Arcadia," the valiant and virtuous son of the wicked Cæropea, and the lover of his cousin Philoclea.

Amphiarus (äm'fi-ä-rä-us). [Gr. Ἀμφιάραος.]

In Greek mythology, a seer and hero of Argos, who took part in the Argonautic expedition, the hunt of the Calydonian boar, and the expedition of the Seven against Thebes.

Amphiareion (am'fi-a-ri'on). A sanctuary and oracle of Amphiaraus, near Oropus, in Bœotia, Greece. Amphiaraus was one of the Seven who marched against Thebes, and was here swallowed up by the earth at the will of Zeus, to save him in his flight. The sanctuary occupies a narrow area on the bank of a torrent; it includes a temple and altar, a large portico, a long range of bases for votive statues, and a theater whose plan and stage-structure are interesting. All the existing ruins are of Hellenistic date. The oracle enjoyed great renown, and the deified seer had a high reputation for healing sickness. Excavations have been made here since 1834 by the Archaeological Society of Athens.

Amphictyony (am-fik'ti-on-i), or Amphictyonic League (am-fik'ti-on'ik lēg). [From Gr. ἀμφικτύωνες, dwellers around, neighbors.] In Greek history, a league of peoples inhabiting neighboring territories or drawn together by community of origin or interests, for mutual protection and the guardianship in common of a central sanctuary and its rites. There were several such confederations, but the name is specially appropriated to the most famous of them, that of Delphi. This was composed of twelve tribes, and its deputies met twice each year, alternately at Delphi and at Thermopylæ. Its origin dates back to the beginnings of Grecian history, and it survived the independence of Greece. It exercised paramount authority over the famous oracular sanctuary of the Pythian Apollo and over the surrounding region, and conducted the Pythian games; and it constituted, though in an imperfect way, a national congress of the many comparatively small and often opposed states into which Greece was divided.

Amphilocheus (am-ti'ō-kus). [Gr. Ἀμφίλοχος.] In Greek legend, a seer, son of Amphiaraus and brother of Alemaon; one of the Epigoni.

Amphion (am-fi'on). [Gr. Ἀμφίων.] In Greek mythology, a skilful musician, son of Zeus and Antiope, twin brother of Zethus, and husband of Niobe. The brothers slew Dirce, who had ill-treated their mother, by causing her to be dragged to death by a bull. They took possession of Thebes, and when the walls were building, the stones moved of their own accord to their places under the influence of Amphion's lyre.

Amphipolis (am-fip'ō-lis). [Gr. Ἀμφίπολις.] In ancient geography, a city in Macedonia, on the Strymon, 3 miles from the Ægean, in lat. 40° 48' N., long. 23° 51' E. Originally a Thracian town, it was colonized by Athens about 436 B. C., and was captured by Sparta in 424 B. C. Near it the Spartans under Brasidas defeated the Athenians under Cleon 422 B. C. It later became a Macedonian and then a Roman possession.

Amphissa (am-fis'sā). [Gr. Ἀμφίσσα.] In ancient geography, a town of the Ozolian Locris, Greece, 10 miles northwest of Delphi.

Amphitrite (am-fi-tri'tē). [Gr. Ἀμφιτρίτη.] 1. In Greek mythology, the goddess of the sea, daughter of Nereus and Doris, and wife of Poseidon. — 2. An asteroid (No. 29) discovered by Marth, at London, March 1, 1854.

Amphitruo. See Amphitryon.

Amphitryon (am-fit'ri-on), or Amphitruo (am-fit'ri-ō). [Gr. Ἀμφιτρίων.] In Greek legend, a son of Alceus, king of Troezen, and husband of Alcmena. To secure Alcmena (who would not wed him until the death of her brothers, who were slain by the Taphians, was avenged) he undertook, for his uncle Creon, to catch the Taumessus fox, which by a decree of fate could not be captured, by the help of an Athenian dog which fate had decreed should catch every animal it might pursue. Fate extricated itself from this perplexity by turning both animals into stone. He attacked the Taphians, but could not overcome them so long as the chief Pterelaus, who was rendered immortal by one golden hair, lived. Cometho, daughter of Pterelaus, cut off this hair for love of Amphitryon, and he perished. The application of the name Amphitryon to a host is from that part of the story where Jupiter assumes the former's shape in order to visit Alcmena. He gives a feast and is interrupted by the real Amphitryon. This gives rise (in Molière's comedy) to a dispute which is settled by the phrase "Le véritable Amphitryon est l'Amphitryon ou l'on dine" (he who gives the feast is the host).

Amphitryon, or Amphitruo. 1. A play of Plautus "with a mythological (comic-marvelous) plot, treated with complete mastery over the language and with sparkling humor. Its original and the time of its composition are unknown" (Teuffel und Schwabe).

It is more of a burlesque than a comedy, and is full of humour. It is founded on the well-known fable of Jupiter and Alcmena, and has been imitated by Molière and Dryden. Its source is uncertain; but it is probably from Archippus, a writer of the old comedy (415 B. C.). Its form suggests rather a development of the Satyric drama. Cruetwell, Hist. of Roman Lit., p. 44.

2. A comedy by Molière, produced in 1668: a version of Plautus's play.— 3. An opera by Sedaine, produced in 1781.— 4. A comedy by Andrieux, produced in 1782.

Amphitryon, or The Two Socias. A comedy by Dryden, performed in 1690: an altered version of Molière's play.

Amplepuis (on-ple-pwē'). A town in the department of Rhône, France, 29 miles northwest of Lyons. It has manufactures of cotton and muslin. Population (1891), commune, 7,113.

Ampsvarii (amp-si-vā'ri-i), or Amsivarii. [L. Ampsvarii (Tacitus); cf. L. Amsia, the Ems.] A German tribe described by Tacitus as originally neighbors, in the region of the Ems, of the Chauvi who had driven them out. In the year 58 A. D. they appeared on the Rhine whence they were dislodged by the Romans, and were thought to have been annihilated. They reappeared, however, in the 4th century in incursions into Roman territory. They were ultimately merged in the Franks.

Ampthill (ampt'hil). A small town in Bedfordshire, England, 40 miles northwest of London.

Ampthill, Baron. See Russell, Odo William. Ampudia (äm-pō'dē-ä), Pedro de. A Mexican general, in command of the Mexican army on the Rio Grande at the beginning of the Mexican war, 1846. As commander at Monterey he surrendered to General Taylor Sept. 24, 1846.

Ampurdan (äm-pör-dän'). A valley-plain in the province of Gerona, Spain, in the vicinity of Figueras.

Amraoti (äm-rä-ō'tē), or Amrawati (äm-rä-wä'tē). A district in East Berar, Haidarabad Assigned Districts, India, intersected by lat. 21° N., long. 78° E. Area, 2,759 square miles. Population (1881), 575,328.

Amraoti. A town in Amraoti district, lat. 20° 56' N., long. 77° 44' E.

Amraphel (äm'rā-fel). A king of Shinar (southern Babylonia) who, allied with Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and two other kings, marched, in the time of Abraham, against the five kings of the Vale of Siddim (Gen. xiv.). He is identified by some with Hammurabi who reigned about 2300 B. C., by others with his father Sin-muballit, whose name is sometimes read Amrapal: all this is, however, very uncertain.

Amri (äm'ri). In the second part of Dryden and Tait's "Absalom and Achitophel," a character intended to represent Heneage Finch.

Amrita (äm-rē'tā). [Sometimes Amreeta; Skt. amrita, prop. adj., immortal, = Gr. ἀμβροτος, whence ult. E. ambrosia.] In Hindu mythology, a god (masc.); the water of life (neuter); ambrosia. In the latter sense the term is variously applied in the Vedas, but especially to the soma juice. In later legend it was the water of life produced at the churning of the ocean by the gods and demons. The Ramayana, the Mahabharata, and the Puranas give the story with variations. The gods, worsted by the demons, repaired to Vishnu, asking new strength and immortality. He bade them churn the ocean for the Amrita and other lost treasures. Collecting all plants and herbs, they cast them into the sea of milk, which they churned, using Mount Mandara as a churning-stick and the serpent Vasuki as a rope, while Vishnu himself was the pivot. From the sea came the sacred cow, Surabhi, Varuni, goddess of wine, Parijata, the tree of paradise, the Asparas, the moon, poison, Sri, the goddess of beauty, and Dhanvantara, physician of the gods.

Amrit (äm'rēt). A ruined town on the coast of Phœnicia, 30 miles north of Tripolis: the ancient Marathus. It contains important antiquities. The Burj el-Bezjak is an ancient Phœnician tomb built of huge blocks of stone. It is square, with a plain massive cornice, and terminated in a pyramid, now ruined. The original height was 52 feet. It contains two chambers, one over the other, with niches for corpses. Another tomb at Amrit is one of the most elaborate of surviving Phœnician works. The base is square and on it rest three superposed circular drums, each smaller than that below. The top drum terminates in domical form, and the two upper drums have a cornice of combined dentils and serrations. A molding of concave curve connects the lowest and middle drums. On the corners of the base stand four rude lions, issuing from the lowest drum. The height is about 32 feet. The so-called "monolithic" house is a structure with walls for the most part hewn from the solid rock. It is isolated by the cutting away of the rock behind. The chief front is about 97 feet long and 20 high. The interior shows holes for wooden ceiling-beams. The Maahed is an old Phœnician temple consisting of a small cella, open on one side to exhibit the sacred image, and raised on a square base or die. The roof is a great slab hewn to the form of a flat arch on the under side, the whole forming a miniature and simplified Egyptian temple. The total height is 23 feet. The cella was originally surrounded by a colonnaded court. There are also ruins of a stadium with ten tiers of seats, on one side all rock-hewn, on the other partly built up of masonry. It now measures 99 by 411 feet, but has probably lost some of its length.

Amritsar (äm-rit'sār), or Umritsir (üm-rit'sēr). A division in the Panjab, British India. Area, 5,354 square miles. Population (1881), 2,729,109.

Amritsar. A district in the division of Amritsar, intersected by lat. 31° 30' N., long. 75° E. Area, 1,574 square miles. Population (1881), 893,266.

Amritsar, or Umritsir (üm-rit'sēr). The capital of the Amritsar district and division, in lat. 31° 40' N., long. 74° 45' E.: one of the most important commercial and manufacturing cities in northern India. It is the religious center of the Sikhs, and contains a Sikh temple attended by 500 to 600 priests. Population, including cantonment (1891), 136,766.

Amru ben-el-Ass (äm'rō ben-el-äs'), or Amer. Died about 663 A. D. An Arab general and statesman. He conquered Syria during the reign of the calif Abu-Bekr, and Egypt 639-641, in that of Omar. By his statesmanlike reorganization of the conquered provinces, and by the excellence of his administration, he did much to reconcile the inhabitants to Islam. The story that, at the taking of Alexandria, he gave the order to destroy the celebrated Alexandrine library, is probably unhistorical.

Amru-el-Kais (äm'rō-el-kīs'). Lived at the beginning of the 7th century. An Arabian poet, hostile to Mohammed. His "Moallakat" was translated by Sir W. Jones, 1782.

Amrum (äm'röm), or Amrom (äm'röm). One of the North Friesian Islands in the North Sea, west of Schleswig. Its length is 6 miles.

Amsancti, or Ampsancti, Vallis (äm-sänk'tē vāl'les). A valley in the province of Avellino, Italy, near Frigento, in lat. 41° N., long. 15° 7' E., noted for its sulphurous lake and cave.

Amsdorf (äms'dorf), Nikolaus von. Born at Torgau, Germany, Dec. 3, 1483; died May 14, 1565. A German Protestant reformer. He was the intimate friend of Luther, whom he accompanied to Leipsic in 1519 and to Worms in 1521, and whom he aided in the translation of the Bible. He was instrumental in introducing the Reformation into Magdeburg in 1524, into Goslar in 1528, and elsewhere; was consecrated bishop of Naumburg by Luther in 1542, but was driven from his see in 1546 in the Smalkaldic war, and was a prominent opponent of Melancthon in the adiaphoristic controversy.

Amsler (äms'ler), Samuel. Born at Schinznach, Aargau, Switzerland, Dec. 17, 1791; died at Munich, May 18, 1849. A German engraver. Among his noted works are the "Triumphal March of Alexander the Great" (after Thorwaldsen), the "Triumph of Religion in the Arts" (after Overbeck), etc.

Amsteg, or Amstäg (äm'stäg). A village in the canton of Uri, Switzerland, situated on the St. Gotthard route 27 miles southeast of Lucerne.

Amstel (äm'stel). A small river in the Netherlands, which flows through Amsterdam and empties into the Y.

Amstelland (äm'stel-länt). Formerly, the name given to the region which lies near the Amstel.

Amsterdam (äm'stēr-dam). [Orig. Amstelledamme, dam of the Amstel.] A city in the province of North Holland, Netherlands, built on marshy ground (traversed by canals connected by numerous bridges) at the junction of the Amstel and Y, in lat. 52° 22' N., long. 4° 5' E.: the chief commercial city and the capital of the Netherlands, and one of the leading seaports of Europe. It has communication by the North Sea Canal and North Holland Canal with the North Sea. It is a market for colonial products, including sugar, coffee, spices, rice, tobacco, etc., has ship-building industries and important manufactures of sugar, sails, tobacco, beer, etc., and is especially famous for diamond-cutting and -polishing. It was founded at the beginning of the 13th century, became of great importance on the decline of Antwerp about 1555-95, and was the first commercial city of Europe in the 17th century. It was entered by the French in 1795, and belonged to the French Empire 1810-13. It contains various important buildings, museums, etc. Population (1891), 426,914.

Amsterdam. A city in Montgomery County, New York, situated on the Mohawk 30 miles northwest of Albany. It has important manufactures of knit goods. Population (1890), 17,336.

Amsterdam. A small uninhabited island in the Indian Ocean, in lat. 37° 51' S., long. 77° 32' E.

Amsterdam, New. An old name for New York (city).

Amstetten (äm'stet-ten). A small town in Lower Austria, situated on the Ips 28 miles east by south of Linz.

Amucu (äm-mö-kö'), Lake. A small lake in British Guiana, about lat. 3° 40' N., connected with the Essequibo and, through the Branco, with the Amazon. According to Schomburgk this was the so-called Lake Parima connected with the myth of El Dorado.

Amu Daria (äm-mö'där'yä), Ar. Jihun (jē'hön), or Gihon. The principal river of Central Asia: the ancient Oxus. It rises as the Ak-Su in the eastern Pamir near the frontier of eastern Turkestan; flows generally west to near long. 66° E., separating in part of its course Bokhara from Afghanistan; flows then northwest, and empties by a delta into the southern part of the Sea of Aral. It is generally thought to have emptied into the Caspian Sea in ancient and even in medieval times. Among its tributaries are, among those on the right, the Wakash (or Surghab) and Kafirgana; and on the left, the Pandja, Koksha, and Kunduz. At Tcharjdji it is crossed by the Transcaspian Railway. Its length is about 1,400 miles, and it is navigable by vessels about 300 miles.

Amun (äm'mön). [Egypt., 'the hidden or veiled one.'] An Egyptian deity. He is variously represented as a ram with large curving horns, as a being with a ram's head and a human body, and as a man enthroned or standing erect. In art his figure is colored blue. On his head he wears the royal aynbul and two long feathers, and in one hand he carries a scepter and in the other the sign of life. His chief temple and oracle were on an oasis in the Libyan desert near Memphis. Also Amen, Ammon, Amon, and Hammon. See the extract.

But after the rise of the Theban dynasty the supreme form under which Ra was worshipped was Amun, "the hidden one." In course of time he absorbed into himself almost all the other deities of Egypt, more especially Ra and Khnum. He reigns over this earth, as his representatives, the Pharaohs, over Egypt, and inspires mankind with the sense of right. He is called Khem as the self-begetting deity, "the living Osiris" as the animating principle of the universe. On his head he wears a lofty crown of feathers, sometimes replaced by the crowns of Upper and Lower Egypt or the ram's head of Khnum, and Mut and Khnum form with him the trinity of Thebes.

Stoyce, Anc. Empires, p. 63.

Amunátegui (ä-mö-nä'tä-gwë), Miguel Luis. Born Jan. 11, 1828; died Jan. 22, 1888. A Chilean historian, associated, in the production of most of his works, with his brother, Gregorio Victor Amunátegui. Among these are "Memoria sobre la reconquista española" (1850), "Compendio de la historia política y eclesiástica de Chile" (1856), "Descubrimiento y conquista de Chile" (1863), "Los precursores de la independencia de Chile" (1872-73).

Amur, or Amoor (ä-mör'). A river in Siberia formed by the junction of the Shilka and Argun, about lat. 53° N., long. 121° E. It flows generally southeast, then northeast, and then east, and it enters the Gulf of Saghalin. In part of its course it forms the boundary between Siberia and Manchuria. Its chief tributaries are, on the right, the Sungari and Usuri; on the left, the Zeya, Bureya, Kur, Gorin, and Im. Its length, including the Argun, is about 2,700 miles, and it is navigable for about 2,400 miles.

Amur. A province in eastern Siberia, situated north of the river Amur, ceded by China to Russia in 1858. Its capital is Khabarovka. Area, 172,848 square miles. Population (1891), 87,705.

Amurath (ä-mö-rät') I., or Murad. Born 1319; killed Aug. 27, 1359. Sultan of Turkey 1359-89, son of Orkhan. He completed the organization of the Janizaries, begun by his father, and was the first of the Ottoman sultans who made conquests in Europe. In 1361 he occupied Adrianople, which he made the capital of his European dominions, took Sofia in 1382, and defeated the princes of Serbia and Bosnia in the battle of Kosovo 1389. He was killed after the engagement by a wounded Serbian who, it is said, started from among the dead and plunged a dagger into his breast as he surveyed the field of battle.

Amurath II., or Murad. Born about 1403; died 1451. Sultan of Turkey 1421-51, son of Mohammed I. He unsuccessfully besieged Constantinople in 1423, carried on war against the Hungarians under Hunyady and the Albanians under Scanderbeg, defeated the Hungarians at Varna in 1444 and Kossova in 1448, and subdued the Morea in 1446.

Amurath III., or Murad. Born 1546; died 1595. Sultan of Turkey 1574-95, son of Selim II. He continued the war against Austria with varying success, and took Luristan, Georgia, Shirvan, Tabriz, and part of Azerbaijan from Persia in 1590.

Amurath IV., or Murad. Born about 1611; died 1640. Sultan of Turkey 1623-40. He captured Bagdad from the Persians in 1638.

Amurath V., or Murad. Born 1840. Sultan of Turkey May to Aug., 1876, nephew of Abdul-Aziz. He was dethroned Aug. 31, 1876.

Amussat (ä-mü-sä'). Jean Zuléma. Born at St. Maixent, Deux-Sèvres, France, Nov. 21, 1796; died May 14, 1856. A French surgeon and surgical writer, author of "Torsion des artères" (1829), etc. He invented a probe used in lithotomy.

Amyas Leigh, Sir. See Leigh.

Amyclæ (ä-mi'klë). [Gr. Ἀμύκλαι.] In ancient geography, a town in Laconia, Greece, 3 miles south of Sparta, the legendary seat of Tyndareus. It long retained its Achaean population. According to a tradition the inhabitants of Amyclæ had been so often alarmed by false reports of the hostile approach of the Spartans that all mention of the subject was forbidden; hence when they did come no one dared to announce the fact, and the town was captured. "Amyclæan silence" thus passed into a proverb.

Amygone (ä-mi-mö'në). [Gr. Ἀμύγονη.] In Greek legend, a daughter of Danaus.

Amynta (ä-min'tä). A character in D'Urfé's romance "Astrea."

Amyntas (ä-min'tas) I. [Gr. Ἀμύντας.] Died about 498 B. C. King of Macedonia, son of Alceas, and fifth in descent from Perdicæas, the founder of the dynasty. He presented earth and water in submission to Megabazus, whom Darius, on the return from his Scythian expedition, had left at the head of 80,000 men in Enrope.

Amyntas II. King of Macedonia 394-370 B. C., nephew of Perdicæas II. He succeeded his father in Upper Macedonia; obtained the crown of Macedonia proper in 394 by the murder of Pausanias, son of the usurper Acropus; was driven from Macedonia by Argæus, the son of Pausanias, supported by Bardylis, an Illyrian chief; and was restored by the Thessalians, with whom he had taken refuge.

Amyntas III. Died 336 B. C. King of Macedonia 360-359, grandson of the preceding. He was an infant at the death of his father 360 B. C., and was excluded 359 B. C. from the throne by the regent, his uncle Philip, at whose court he was brought up, and whose daughter he married. He was executed by Alexander the Great for a conspiracy against the king's life.

Amyntas, or The Impossible Dowry. A pastoral drama of the Italian type by Thomas Randolph, first printed in 1638. It has no connection in plot with Tasso's "Aminta."

Amyntor, Gerhard von. A pseudonym of Dagobert von Gerhardt, a German novelist.

Amyot (ä-mö-ö'), Jacques. Born at Melun, France, Oct. 30, 1513; died at Auxerre, France, Feb. 6, 1593. A French writer. He was tutor to Charles IX. and Henri of Anjou, grand almoner, bishop of Auxerre, and commander in the Order of the Holy Ghost. He is known chiefly by his translations of "Theagenes and Chariclea" (1547), of the works of Diodorus Siculus (1554), of "Daphnis and Chloë" and Plutarch's "Lives" (1559), and of Plutarch's "Morals" (1572).

Amyot, Joseph. See Amiot.

Amyraut (ä-mé-rö'), or Amyraut (L. Amyraldus), Moise. Born Sept., 1596; died 1664. A French Protestant theologian, professor at Saumur 1633-64. He was charged with Arminianism, and although he was acquitted at the synods of Alençon (1637) and Charenton (1644), the "Formula Consensus Helvetica" (1657) was directed chiefly against him.

An or On. See Heliopolis.

Anabaptists (an-a-bap'tists). [From Gr. ἀναβαπτίζω, rebaptize.] Those Christians who hold baptism in infancy to be invalid, and require adults who have received it to be baptized on joining their communion. The name is best known historically as applied to the followers of Thomas Münzer, a leader of the peasants' war in Germany, who was killed in battle in 1525, and to those of John Matthias and John Boeckel, or John of Leyden, who committed great excesses while attempting to establish a socialistic kingdom of New Zion or Mount Zion at Munster in Westphalia, and were defeated in 1535, their leaders being killed and hung up in iron cages, which are still preserved in that city. The name has also been applied to bodies of very different character in other respects, probably always in an opprobrious sense, since believers in the sole validity of adult baptism refuse to regard it as rebaptism in the case of persons who had received the rite in infancy. It is now most frequently used of the Mennonites. See Mennonites.

Anabara (ä-nä-bä-rä'). A river in Siberia which flows into the Arctic Ocean west of the Lena.

Anabasis (ä-nab'a-sis). [Gr. ἀνάβασις, a going up, an expedition inland.] A celebrated account by Xenophon, in seven books, of the campaign of Cyrus the Younger against Artaxerxes II. of Persia, and the retreat of the 10,000 Greeks, 401-399 B. C., after the death of Cyrus at Cunaxa. See Cyrus.

The title means "a march up (from the coast)" into the interior, and properly applies only to the first part, as far as the battle at Cunaxa. . . . Cyrus was killed (Sept., 401). The remaining and larger part of the work ought rather to be called catabasis, the march down to the sea. Soon after the death of Cyrus, the Persian satrap Sisaphernes treacherously seized five of the Greek generals. The Greeks were now in terrible danger. That night Xenophon—who had not hitherto been either an officer or a private soldier, but simply an "unattached" volunteer, . . . awoke the surviving leaders, and in a midnight council of war gave them heart, by his plain earnest eloquence, to take measures for the common safety. Next day, formed in a hollow square with the baggage in the center, they began the retreat. Moving along the Tigris, past the site of the ancient Nineveh and the modern Mossul, they came into the country of the Carduchi, or Kurds, who, like modern Kurds, rolled down stones on them from the top of their mountain-passes; then through Armenia and Georgia. At last one day—in the fifth month—Feb., 400 B. C.—Xenophon, who was with the rear guard, heard a great shouting among the men who had reached the top of a hill in front. He thought they saw an enemy. He mounted his horse, and galloped forward with some cavalry. As they came nearer, they could make out the shout: it was "The sea! the sea!" There, far off, was the silver gleam of the Euxine. After the long, intense strain of toil and danger, the men burst into tears: like true Greek children of the sea they knew now that they were in sight of home. Two days' march brought them to the coast at Trapezus, a Greek city, the modern Trebizond; there they sacrificed to the gods, especially to Zeus the Preserver and Heracles the Guide. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 110.

Anabasis of Alexander the Great. An important historical work by Arrian, in seven books, all of which, with the exception of a few pages, has survived. It begins with the accession of Alexander, and describes his campaigns and victories.

Anacáona (ä-nä-kä'ö-nä). [A Haitian name meaning "golden flower."] An Indian princess, sister of Bohechio and wife of Caonabo, eponyms of Haiti when it was discovered by Columbus (1492). After the capture and death of Caonabo she counseled submission to the Spaniards, and herself received Bartholomew Columbus with great hospitality (1498). She succeeded her brother Bohechio as ruler of his tribe, and friendly relations with the whites continued until 1603: in that year she entertained Ovando and his forces, but in the midst of a festival in their honor they attacked her village, massacred a great number of Indians, and carried her to Santo Domingo, where she was hanged.

Anacapri (ä-nä-kä'prë). 1. The western part of the island of Capri, Italy.—2. A small town on the island of Capri.

Anacharsis (an-a-kär'sis). [Gr. Ἀναχάρσις.] A Scythian prince, brother of Saulius, king of Thrace, a contemporary of Solon. He visited Athens where he obtained a great reputation for wisdom. On returning to Thrace he was slain by his brother. By some he was reckoned among the seven sages.

Anacharsis Cloutz. See Cloutz.

Anacletus (an-a-klë'tus), or Cletus (?), I., Saint. Died 91 (?) A. D. Bishop of Rome, said by some to have been elected 83 A. D.

Anacletus II. Antipope in opposition to Innocent II., 1130-38.

Anaconda (an-a-kon'djü). A city in Deerlodge County, Montana. Population (1890), 3,975.

Anacreon (a-nak'rë-on). [Gr. Ἀνακρέων.] Born in Teos about 563 B. C.; died about 478 B. C. A famous Greek lyric poet who sang chiefly the praises of love and wine. He was driven with his townspeople, by Harpagus, from Teos to Abdera; thence he went to the court of Polycrates in Samos, and later to Athens. "He was the courtier and laureate of tyrants. He won his first fame with Polycrates, at whose death Hipparchus fetched him to Athens in a trireme of fifty oars. Between Bacchus and Venus he spent his days in palace; and died at the ripe age of eighty-five at Teos, choked, it is reported, by a grape-stone—a hoary-headed roué." Symonds, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 318.

The great body of his fragments, and the numerous copies of his poems, speak of love as an engrossing amusement, of feasting as spelt by earnest conversation, nay even of old age with a sort of joyful regret. . . . His poetry is no longer the outburst of pent-up passion, but the exercise of a graceful talent, the ornament of a luxurious leisure. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 197.

Anacreon. An opera in two acts by Cherubini, words by Mendouze, produced in Paris Oct. 4, 1803.

Anacreon of the Guillotine. A nickname of Barère de Vieuzac.

Anacron Moore. A nickname of Thomas Moore.

Anacreon of Persia. A surname given to Hafiz.

Anadarko, Anadarko. See Nadaaku.

Anadoli. See Anatolia.

Anadyomene (an'a-di-om'e-në). [Gr. Ἀναδιόμηνη, rising (from the sea).] A surname of Aphrodite, in allusion to her origin from the sea.

Anadyr, or Anadir (än-ä-dër'). A river in eastern Siberia, which flows into the Gulf of Anadyr about lat. 65° N. Its length is about 450 miles.

Anadyr, Gulf of. An arm of Bering Sea, east of Siberia.

Anagni (än-nän'yë). A town in the province of Rome, Italy, 36 miles southeast of Rome; the ancient Anagnina, capital of the Hernici. It has a cathedral and has often been the residence of the popes. Population, about 8,000.

Anahuac (ä-nä'wäk). [Nahuatl, signifying "within the water."] A name originally used to designate the low water-bordered coastal lands (tierras calientes) of Mexico, and now generally applied to the greater part of the central table-land, or to that portion of it, in the region of the City of Mexico, which holds the valley lakes (Texcoco, Chalco, etc.), and extends eastward to the mountain wall of Popocatepeti and Ixtacihuatl. Anahuac has been stated to be the name for the supposed Indian "empire" of the Mexicans at the time of the Spanish conquest. This is, however, an error, as there was no empire, but only a confederacy of warlike tribes. The name has, therefore, no political, hardly even a definite geographical, significance.

Anaides (ä-nä'dëz). [Gr. ἀναίδης, shameless.] In Ben Jonson's "Cynthia's Revels," a fashionable ruffler and impudent ruffian. Thomas Dekker imagined that in this character he was caricatured. Others, however, think Marston was intended.

Anaitis (ä-ni'tis), Anait (ä-nit'). A Syrian goddess whose worship was introduced into Greek mythology. She was variously identified with Artemis, Aphrodite, Cybele, etc. In Egyptian mythology she appeared under the name Ana, Antha.

Anak (ä'nak). [Heb., 'long-necked,' i. e. 'giant.'] In the Old Testament, the progenitor of a tribe or race of giants, the Anakim (which see), or a collective name for this tribe itself.

Anakim (än'a-kim). In the Old Testament, the sons of Anak, a race of giants dwelling in southern Palestine.

People saw survivors of the ancient indigenous populations, anterior to the Canaanites (Emim, Zomzomin, Anakim), in individuals of lofty stature whom they believed were to be found in certain particular places. But popular imagination revels in giants; it willingly creates them. These Anakim were surrounded by legends; they sometimes called them refaim (the dead, the giants, the phantoms, the heroes); a plain to the southwest of Jerusalem bore their name, and they were confounded with the Titanic races buried under the sea.

Renan, Hist. of the People of Israel (trans.), I. 191.

Anam. See Annam.

Anambas Islands (ä-näm' büs i' landz). A group of small islands east of the Malay Peninsula and west of Borneo.

Anammelech (a-nam'e-lek). [Babylonian Anu-malik, Ann the counselor.] A divinity of the Babylonian Sepharvites, whose worship they continued to practise in Samaria (2 Ki. xvii. 31). Anu was the god of heaven, and stood at the head of the Babylonian pantheon.

Anandagiri (ä-nan-da-gē'rē). A follower of Sankara. He lived about the 10th century and wrote a Sankara vijaya ('triumph of Sankara'), in which are related at length the polemics of the master against forty-eight different sects. It is an apocryphal romance of no historic worth.

Anandalahari (ä-nan-da-lä'ha-rē). [Skt., 'the wave of joy.'] A poem ascribed to Sankara. It is a hymn of praise to Parvati, wife of Siva, mingled with mystical doctrine.

Ananias (an-a-ni'as). [Gr. Ananias, Heb. Hananiah.] A Jewish Christian of Jerusalem who with his wife Sapphira was struck dead for fraud and lying. Acts v.

Ananias. A Jewish Christian of Damascus, a friend of Paul.

Ananias. A Jewish high priest 48-59 A. D., before whom St. Paul was tried.

Ananias. In Ben Jonson's comedy "The Alchemist," a hypocritical puritan deacon of Amsterdam.

Ananieff (ä-nän'yef). A town in the government of Kherson, Russia, in lat. 47° 47' N., long. 29° 57' E. Population, 13,312.

Ananus (an'a-nus). High priest of the Jews, the son of Seth. He was appointed by Cyrenius and removed by Valerian, and is apparently the Annas mentioned in the gospels.

Ananus. High priest of the Jews, son of the preceding. He held office for three months in 62 A. D., and was removed by King Agrippa at the demand of the Pharisees because of his attempt to revive Sadduceism, and was put to death 67 A. D. by the Zealots.

Anapa (ä-nä'pä). A seaport and naval station in the Black Sea district, Caucasus, Russia, on the Black Sea in lat. 44° 55' N., long. 37° 20' E. Population (1889), 10,614.

Anaquito (ä-nä-kē'tō). A plain about a mile from Quito, Ecuador, where the army of Gonzalo Pizarro defeated that of the viceroy Vasco Nuñez Vela aided by Benaleazar, Jan. 18, 1546. Vela was killed, and Benaleazar severely wounded.

Anargha Raghava (a-när'ghä rä'gha-vä). A drama of the 13th or 14th century by Murari Misra, of which Raghava or Rama is the hero.

Anarkali (än-är'kä-li). An important suburb of Lahore, British India.

Añasco (än-yäs'kō), Pedro de. Born at Lima, 1550; died at Tucuman, April 12, 1605. A Peruvian Jesuit. He left several works on the language of the Indians among whom he had labored.

Anasitch (ä-nä-sich'). A tribe of the Kusan stock of North American Indians. It formerly had a village on the south side of Coos Bay, Oregon. The survivors are on the Siletz reservation, Oregon. See Kusan.

Anastasia (an-as-tä'shi-ä), Saint. 1. A Christian martyr slain during the reign of Nero (54-68 A. D.). She is said to have been a pupil of St. Peter and St. Paul. Her martyrdom is commemorated on April 15.

2. A Christian martyr who perished in the persecution by Diocletian 303 (?) A. D. The date of her commemoration in the Latin Church is Dec. 25, in the Greek Dec. 22.—3. Died 597. A Greek saint who lived in Alexandria disguised as a monk for 28 years.

Anastasian Law. A law of the emperor Anastasius I. (506), directed against usurers.

Anastasio (an-as-tä'shi-nis) I., Saint. [Gr. Anastasio.] Bishop of Rome 398-402. He condemned the writings of Origen, and excommunicated Rufinus, the antagonist of Jerome and advocate of Origen, although he is said to have acknowledged that he did not understand the controversy.

Anastasio II. Pope 496-498. He endeavored to put an end to the schism between the sees of Constantinople and Rome arising from the dispute concerning precedence, and wrote a letter of congratulation to Clovis, king of the Franks, on his conversion to Christianity.

Anastasio III. Pope 911-913.

Anastasio IV. (Conrad). Pope 1153-54. His administration was disturbed by the movements of Arnold of Brescia and his followers.

Anastasio I., surnamed Dicorus. Born at Dyrachium about 430; died 518. Byzantine emperor 491-518. He was raised to the throne by an intrigue with the empress Ariadne whom he married after the death of the emperor Zeno, her husband, without male issue. As a Eutychian he opposed the orthodox who rose in arms under Vitellianus but were bought off by the faithless promise of a general council.

Anastasio II. (Artemius). Byzantine emperor 713-716. He was deposed by the fleet which he had sent to the coast of Syria to destroy the naval stores of the Arabs, but which was repulsed, mutinied under its commander John, and proclaimed Theodosius III. emperor. He was put to death in 721 (719?) by Leo III. for conspiring against the throne.

Anastasio. Died 753. Patriarch of Constantinople 703 (728?)-753. He was elected by the influence of the emperor Leo Isaurus, and favored the Iconoclasts, for which he was excommunicated by Pope Gregory III.

Anastasio, surnamed Bibliothecarius ('The Librarian'). Died 886. Librarian of the Vatican and abbot of Sta. Maria Trans-Tiberim at Rome. He was sent to Constantinople to arrange a marriage between the daughter of Louis II, and a son of Basil of Macedonia in 869, and while there assisted the papal ambassador in attendance at the eighth ecumenical council by his knowledge of Greek. His fame rests upon his numerous translations from the Greek and his supposed connection with the "Liber Pontificalis" (which see).

Anastasio Grün. See Auersperg.

Anasuya (a-na-sö'yä). [Skt., 'charity.'] In Hindu mythology and drama: (a) The wife of the Rishi Atri, very pious and austere, and possessed of miraculous powers. When Sita visited Atri and herself at their hermitage in the forest south of Chitrakuta, she gave Sita an ointment with which to keep herself beautiful forever. (b) A friend of Shakuntala.

Anathoth (an'a-thoth). In biblical geography, a city of Benjamin in Palestine, the birthplace of Jeremiah. The traditional site is Kenet el-Uat, about 10 miles northwest of Jerusalem; but the true site is probably Anata, about 3 miles northeast of that city.

Anatolia (an-a-tō'li-ä). [Turk. Anadolu, NGr. Ἀνατολή, eastern land.] A large region of Asiatic Turkey, nearly identical with Asia Minor. There was a theme (province) of Anatolia in the Byzantine empire situated in the interior of Asia Minor.

Anatomy of Abuses, The. A work by Philip Stubbes, published in 1583 in two parts. It is a curious account of the social customs of the time.

Anatomy of Melancholy, The. A famous work by Robert Burton (1577-1640), published in 1621, under the pseudonym "Democritus Junior," and frequently republished and abridged. The sixth edition is the last which contains changes by the author; it was published shortly after his death from an annotated copy. The work is the result of many years of humorous study of men and of books, and abounds in quotations from authors of all ages and countries. It is divided into three parts which treat (1) of the causes and symptoms of melancholy, (2) of its cure, and (3) of erotic and religious melancholy.

Its literary history is rather curious. Eight editions of it appeared in half a century from the date of the first, and then, with other books of its time, it dropped out of notice except by the learned. Early in the present century it was revived and reprinted with certain modernizations, and four or five editions succeeded each other at no long interval. The copies thus circulated seem to have satisfied the demand for many years, and have been followed without alteration in a finely-printed issue of recent date. Sainsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 429.

Anaxagoras (an-aks-ag'ō-ras). [Gr. Ἀναξαγόρας.] Born at Clazomenae, Ionia, about 500 B. C.; died at Lampsacus, Mysia, about 428 B. C. A Greek philosopher, for a long time resident in Athens where he became the friend and teacher of Pericles, Thucydides, and Empirides, and whence he was banished on a charge of impiety. He is reckoned as a disciple of Anaximander and is famous as the first of the old Greek natural philosophers to introduce intelligence or reason (νοῦς) as a metaphysical principle in the explanation of the world. He regarded it not as creative but as regulative, as that which brought order out of the original chaos. Fragments of his writings have been preserved.

Anaxarchus (an-aks-är'kus). [Gr. Ἀναξαρχός.] A Greek philosopher of Abdera, a disciple of Democritus, who flourished about 350 B. C. He attended Alexander in his Asiatic campaigns, and is said to have conspired the king after the murder of Cleitus by maintaining that a king can do no wrong.

Anaxarete (an-aks-är'e-tē). [Gr. Ἀναξαρέτη.] In Greek legend, a maiden of Cyprus whose lover Iphis in despair hung himself at her door. For her indifference Venus changed her into a stone statue. The story is also told with changed names.

Anaxilaos (an-aks-i-lä'ns). [Gr. Ἀναξίλαος.] A Pythagorean philosopher and physician of the 1st century B. C., banished as a magician from Italy by Augustus 28 B. C.

Anaxilaos, or Anaxilas (an-aks'i-las). Died 476 B. C. Tyrant of Rhegium about 494 B. C.

Anaximander (an-aks-i-man'dēr). [Gr. Ἀναξίμανδρος.] Born at Miletus about 611 B. C.; died about 547 B. C. A Greek physical philosopher (the second of the Ionian school) and mathematician, a friend and pupil of Thales. He taught that the principle (ἀρχή, a word which he first used in this sense) of things is a substance of indeterminate quality and limitless quantity (ἄπειρος), "immortal and imperishable," out of which all things arise and to which all return. This substance, according to some accounts, he regarded as having a nature intermediate between that of water and air. He was probably the author of the first philosophical treatise in Greek prose.

Anaximenes (an-aks-im'e-nēz). [Gr. Ἀναξίμενης.] Born at Miletus; lived in the 6th century B. C. A Greek philosopher, the third of the Ionian school, a contemporary and friend of Thales and Anaximander, and usually reckoned as a disciple of the latter. He regarded air as the principle (ἀρχή) of things.

Anaximenes. Born at Lampsacus; lived in the 4th century B. C. A Greek rhetorician, historian, and companion of Alexander the Great: the probable author of an extant treatise on rhetoric (Ῥητορική πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον), the only existing work on the subject prior to Aristotle.

Anaya (ä-nä'yä), Pedro Maria. Born at Huichapan, 1795; died at Mexico, March 21, 1854. A Mexican general. He joined the Spanish army as a cadet in 1811, followed the defection of Iturbide in 1821, and became a captain under Villola in Nicaragua, 1823. In 1833 he became brigadier-general. Adhering to the federalist party, he was forced to leave the country. He invaded Tabasco in Nov. 1840, with federalist forces from Texas and Yucatan, but was defeated at Cometan, May 15, 1841, and fled to Yucatan. Under Herrera (1845) he was minister of war. He adhered to Santa Anna, and while the latter was resisting the advance of Scott, was acting president April 2 to May 20, 1847. He commanded the Mexican force of 800 men which defended the convent of Churubusco, and only surrendered after his ammunition was exhausted (Aug. 20, 1847). In 1852 he was secretary of war under Arista, served three days in the administration of Ceballos, and on Santa Anna's restoration (1853) was made postmaster-general, a position which he held until his death.

Ancachs (än-kächs'). A maritime department of Peru, north of Lima, corresponding to the colonial intendencia of Huaylas.

Ancæus (an-sē'us). [Gr. Ἄγκαιος.] In Greek classical legend: (a) A son of Poseidon. He was told by a seer that he would not live to enjoy the wine from a vineyard which he had planted. He, however, lived to have wine of his own growth and, in scorn of the prophet, raised a cup of it to his mouth. The seer replied, "There is many a slip between the cup and the lip," and at the same instant a tumult arose over a wild boar in the vineyard. Ancæus put down the cup, and was killed in an attempt to destroy the animal. (b) A son of the Areadian Lyncæus, and one of the Argonauts. He was killed in the Calydonian hunt.

Ancelot (öns-lō'), Jacques Arsène François Polycarpe. Born at Havre, France, Feb. 9, 1794; died at Paris, Sept. 7, 1854. A French dramatist, elected a member of the Academy in 1841. He was the author of "Louis IX." (1819), "Le maire du palais" (1823), "Fiesque" (1824), "Olga" (1828), "Elizabeth d'Angleterre" (1829), "Marie de Brabant" (1825), "Épîtres familières," etc.

Andocides (an-dos'i-dêz). [Gr. Ἀνδοκίδης.] Born at Athens, 467 (?) B. C.; died about 391 B. C. An Athenian politician and orator. See the extract.

Andocides . . . was banished from Athens in 416, on suspicion of having been concerned in a wholesale sacrifice,—the mutilation, in one night, of the images of the god Hermeus, which stood before the doors of houses and public buildings. He made unsuccessful application for a pardon, first in 411 B. C., during the reign of the Four Hundred, then, after their fall, in 410, when he addressed the Assembly in the extant speech On his Return. From 410 to 403 he lived a roving merchant's life in Sicily, Italy, Greece, Ionia, and Cyprus. In 402 the general amnesty allowed him to return to Athens. But in 399 the old charges against him were revived. He defended himself in his extant speech On the Mysteries (so called, because it deals partly with a charge that he had violated the Mysteries of Eleusis) and was acquitted. During the Corinthian war he was one of an embassy sent to treat for peace at Sparta, and on his return made his extant speech On the Peace with Lacedæmon (390 B. C.), sensibly advising Athens to accept the terms offered by Sparta. The speech Against Alcibiades which bears his name is spurious. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 117.

Andrea (än-drâ'vî), Francisco José Soares de. Born at Lisbon, Jan. 29, 1781; died at Rio de Janeiro, Oct. 2, 1858. A Portuguese-Brazilian general, a supporter of Brazilian independence. He went to Brazil in 1808; was adjutant-general in the Cisplatine campaign of 1827; commandant of Pará 1831; president and commandant of Pará 1835; and president of Santa Catharina 1839, of Rio Grande do Sul 1841, of Minas Geraes 1843, of Bahia 1845, and again of Rio Grande do Sul 1848. He attained the rank of marshal in the army, and was created baron of Caçapava.

Andrea, Girolamo. Born at Naples, April 12, 1812; died at Rome, May 14, 1868. An Italian cardinal and diplomatist. His liberalism in religion and politics (especially his leaning toward Italian unity) led to his suspension (1866) from his dignities by the papal Curia; but he was reinstated after a humble submission in 1867.

Andrea Doria. See Doria.

Andrea Pisano. See Pisano.

Andrea del Sarto. See Sarto.

Andréa (än'drâ), Jakob. Born at Waiblingen, Württemberg, March 25, 1528; died at Tübingen, Jan. 7, 1590. One of the chief Protestant theologians of the 16th century, appointed professor of theology and chancellor of the University of Tübingen in 1562. He was the principal author of the "Formula Concordiæ," and wrote over one hundred and fifty works, chiefly polemical.

Andréa, Johann Valentin. Born at Herrenberg, Württemberg, Aug. 17, 1586; died at Stuttgart, June 24, 1654. A German Protestant theologian and satirical writer, grandson of Jakob Andréa. He was the author of "Menippus," a satire (1648), and works on the so-called Rosicrucians.

Andréa, Laurentius, or Andersson, Lars. Born 1480; died 1552. A Swedish reformer, chancellor of Gustavus Vasa. Together with Olaus Petri he translated the Bible into Swedish (1526), and was the principal agent in introducing the Lutheran Reformation to the diet of Westeraas, 1527. In 1540 he was charged with having failed to disclose a conspiracy against the king, and was sentenced to death, but bought a pardon.

Andreas Islands (än-drâ'ô-nov'î-landz). A group of the Aleutian Archipelago.

Andreasberg (än-drâ'âs-berg), or Sankt Andreasberg. A town and summer resort in the province of Hanover, Prussia, in the Harz 28 miles northeast of Göttingen. It has important silver-mines.

Andred's weald (an'dredz wêld), or Andred's wold (an'dredz wôld), modernized forms of AS. Andredes weald (än'drâ-des wêald). A forest in England which formerly extended through a large part of Kent, Surrey, Sussex, and Hampshire, and is now represented by the Weald. See the extract.

The Andred's-Wold comprised the Wealds of Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, taking in at least a fourth part of Kent, "the Seven Hundreds of the Weald," and all the interior of Sussex as far as the edge of the South Downs, and a belt of about twelve miles in breadth between the hills and the sea. Lambarde describes the Weald of Kent as being "stuffed with hearbes of deere and droves of hogges," and adds that "it is manifest, by the Saxon Chronicles and others, that beginning at Winchelsea it reached at length an hundred and twenty miles towards the west, and stretched thirty miles in breadth towards the north." Ellon, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 104, note.

Andrew (an'drō), Saint. [Formerly also Andrew, Andro; ME. Andreu, OF. Andreu, F. Andrieu, André, LL. Andreas, Gr. Ἀνδρέας, lit. 'manly,' from ἀνδρῆς (andros), a man.] Lived in the first half of the 1st century A. D. One of the twelve disciples of Jesus, a brother of Simon Peter and an apostle to the Gentiles. He is honored by the Scotch as their patron saint, and by the Russians as the founder of their church. He suffered martyrdom by crucifixion. His symbol is the so-called St. Andrew's cross (X). He is commemorated in the Roman, Greek, and Anglican churches on Nov. 30.

Andrew I. King of Hungary 1046-60. He carried on wars with the Germans 1046-52, and with his brother Bela. In the latter war he was killed.

Andrew II. King of Hungary 1205-35 (1236?). He took part in the fifth Crusade in 1217, and "gave his people a constitution which organized a state of anarchy by decreeing in his Golden Bull (1222) that if the king should violate the privileges of the nobility they should be permitted to resist him by force, and such resistance should not be treated as rebellion" (Duruy, Middle Ages, p. 491).

Andrew III. King of Hungary 1290-1301, grandson of Andrew II., and the last of the Arpad dynasty. On the murder of Ladislaus III. (IV.), the Pope claimed Hungary as a fief of the church, and invested Charles Martel, son of the King of Naples, with it, who was, however, defeated by Andrew at Agram, 1291.

Andrew, James Osgood. Born in Wilkes County, Ga., May 3, 1794; died at Mobile, Ala., March 1, 1871. An American bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The fact that he was a slave-owner led to a dispute in the church which resulted in the formation of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, 1846.

Andrieux (ou-dre-é'), François Guillaume Jean Stanislas. Born at Strasburg, May 6, 1759; died at Paris, May 9, 1833. A noted French dramatist. He was the author of "Les étourdis" (1787), "Molière avec ses amis" (1804), "La comédienne" (1816), "Irritus" (1830), etc.

Andriscus (an-dris'-kus). A pretended son of Perseus, king of Macedonia, and a claimant to the throne, defeated and sent captive to Rome 148 B. C.

Androclus (an'drō-klus). Lived in the 1st century A. D. A Roman slave noted for his friendship with a lion. According to the story, Androclus was condemned to be slain by wild beasts, but the lion which was let out against him refused to touch him, and it was found that the animal was one which the slave, while escaping from his master in Africa, had found suffering from a thorn in his foot, and cured.

Andromache (an-drom'a-kē). [Gr. Ἀνδρομάχη.] In Greek legend, the wife of Hector and, after his death, of Neoptolemus, son of Achilles, and later of Helenus, brother of Hector. She was the daughter of Eetion, king of Thebe in Cilicia, who, with his seven sons, was slain by Achilles when he captured Thebe.

Andromache. A play of Euripides. See the extract.

The Andromache . . . is one of the worst constructed, and least interesting, plays of Euripides. The date is uncertain, as it was not brought out at Athens, perhaps not till after the poet's death, and is only to be fixed doubtfully by the bitter allusions to Sparta, with which it teems. It has indeed quite the air of a political pamphlet under the guise of a tragedy. It must, therefore, have been composed during the Peloponnesian war, possibly about 419 B. C. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I, 337.

Andromachus (an-drom'a-kus). [Gr. Ἀνδρόμαχος.] A physician of the emperor Nero (called "the elder," to distinguish him from his son), the first to bear the title of "Arehiatr," or chief physician. He was the inventor of a celebrated medicine and antidote (called from him "theriaca Andromachi").

Andromaque (ou-drō-māk'). 1. A tragedy by Racine, produced in 1667.—2. An opera by Grétry, produced at Paris 1780.

Andromeda (an-drom'e-dä). [Gr. Ἀνδρομέδη.] In Greek legend, the daughter of Cepheus and Cassiopeia. She was exposed to a sea-monster, was rescued by Perseus, and was changed, after her death, to a constellation.

Another myth, seemingly so diverse—the story of the slaying of the dragon by Perseus and the rescue of Andromeda—was localised by the Greeks on the Phœnician coast. It proves to be a lunar eclipse myth, ultimately Babylonian, a Greek translation of the Phœnician version of the combat of Bel Merodach with the dragon Tiamat, and the rescue of the moon goddess Istar from the black dragon who threatened to devour her.

Taylor, Aryans, p. 303.

Andromeda. A northern constellation surrounded by Pegasus, Cassiopeia, Perseus, Pisces, Aries, etc., supposed to represent the figure of a woman chained. The constellation contains three stars of the second magnitude, of which the brightest is Alpheratz.

Andromède (ou-drō-mäd'). A play by Corneille, first acted in 1650.

Andronica (än-drō-nē'kä). One of the handmaids of Logistilla (Reason) in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso." She represents fortitude.

Andronicus (an-drō-ni'kus) I. Comnenus. [MGr. Ἀνδρόνικος Κομνηνός.] Born about 1110; died at Constantinople, Sept. 12, 1185. Byzantine emperor 1183-85, grandson of Alexius I. Comnenus. Having contrived to get himself appointed regent during the minority of Alexius II., he put the prince and his mother, the empress Maria, to death, and ascended the throne; but his cruelty and debauchery brought about a popular insurrection under Isaac Angelus, who put him to death after subjecting him to every species of indignity and torture.

Andronicus II. Palæologus. Born about 1259; died 1332. Byzantine emperor 1282-1328 (?), son of Michael Palæologus. During his reign the empire was ravaged (1306-08) by the revolt of the Catalan Grand Company, a body of Spanish mercenaries employed against the Ottoman Turks, and (1321-28) by a civil war with his grandson Andronicus III., by whom he was dethroned and compelled to retire to a cloister.

Andronicus III. Palæologus. Born about 1296; died June 15, 1341. Byzantine emperor 1328-41, grandson of Andronicus II., whose throne he usurped. He carried on war with the Ottoman Turks, who (1326-38) detached nearly the whole of Asia Minor from the empire.

Andronicus, Livius. Born at Tarentum about 284 B. C.; died about 204. An early Roman dramatic poet (Greek by birth) and actor, the first writer who "clothed Greek poetry in a Latin dress." He was brought as a prisoner of war to Rome 272 B. C., and sold as a slave to M. Livius Sasinator. He was manumitted and earned his living as a teacher of Latin and Greek. For his pupils' use he translated the Odyssey into Latin Saturnian verse. His plays, also, were translated from the Greek.

Andronicus, Marcus. In Shakspeare's "Titus Andronicus," the brother of Titus and tribune of the people.

Andronicus, Titus. See Titus Andronicus.

Andronicus, surnamed Cyrrhestes (from his birthplace). A Greek astronomer, born at Cyrrhus, Syria, in the 1st century B. C., the builder of the "Tower of the Winds" (which see) at Athens.

Andronicus of Rhodes. A peripatetic philosopher and commentator on Aristotle, who flourished during the 1st century B. C. He was head of the peripatetic school at Rome about 58 B. C.

Andros (an'dros). [Gr. Ἄνδρος.] The northernmost island of the Cyclades, Greece, situated in the Ægean Sea 6 miles southeast of Eubœa, anciently a possession successively of Athens, Macedonia, Pergamus, and Rome. Its length is 25 miles, and its greatest width 10 miles, and its surface is mountainous. Its chief product is silk. Population, about 22,000.

Andros. A small seaport, capital of the island of Andros, on its eastern coast.

Andros. A group of islands in the Bahamas, named from the chief island of the group, about lat. 24° 45' N., long. 78° W.

Andros (an'dros), Sir Edmund. Born at London, Dec. 6, 1637; died at London, Feb. 27, 1714. An English colonial governor of New York 1674-81, and of New England (including New York) 1686-89. When the charters of the colonies were revoked he was conspicuous in an attempt to seize the charter of Connecticut (1687), which probably succeeded. (See Charter Oak.) He offended the colonists of New England by his tyranny and was seized April 18, 1689, in Boston and sent to England for trial; but the colonists' complaints were dismissed. He was governor of Virginia (where he founded William and Mary College) 1692-98, and governor of the island of Jersey 1704-06.

Androscoggin (an-dros-kog'in). A river whose head streams rise in northern New Hampshire and northern Maine, and which drains Lake Umbagog and the Rangeley Lakes, and joins the Kennebec 5 miles north of Bath. Its total length is about 175 miles.

Androtion (an-drō'ti-on). [Gr. Ἀνδροτίων.] An Athenian orator, a contemporary of Demosthenes and a pupil of Isocrates. All of his work has perished with the exception of a fragment preserved by Aristotle. He was attacked by Demosthenes in one of his early orations.

Andrugio (än-drō'jō). In Marston's "Antonio and Mellida," the noble but turbulent Duke of Genoa. He utters the famous speech beginning, "Why, man, I never was a prince till now."

Andrussoff (än'drös-sof), or Andrussovo. A village in the government of Smolensk, Russia, noted for the treaty of Andrussoff in 1667 between Russia and Poland, by which the latter ceded Kiev, Smolensk, and eastern Ukraine.

Andujar (än-dō-ür'). A town in the province of Jaen, Spain, situated on the Guadalquivir 44 miles northeast of Cordova. It was the scene of an engagement between the French and Spanish, July 18-20, 1808. The Convention of Bailen was signed here in 1808, and here in 1823, by decree, the French assumed superiority over the Spanish authorities. Near it was the Celtiberian Ulturgis (?). Population (1887), 15,214.

Andvari (änd'vä-rē). [Old Norse.] In Old Norse mythology, a dwarf who lived in the water in the form of a pike. He was caught by Loki and forced to give up his treasure, ultimately called from its possessors the Nibelung Hoard. On the last ring, the Andvaranaut, later the Ring of the Nibelungs, he laid the curse of destruction to all who should own it.

Anegada (ä-ne-gä'dä). The northernmost of the Virgin Islands, British West Indies, in lat. 18° 45' N., long. 64° 20' W. Its length is 10 miles.

Anel (a-nel'), Dominique. Born 1679; died about 1730. A French surgeon. He introduced improvements in the operations for aneurism and fistula lachrymalis.

Anelida and Arcite (a-nel'i-dä and är'sit'). An unfinished poem by Chaucer. It was among those printed by Caxton, and is mentioned in both Lydgate's and Thynne's lists of Chaucer's works, in the latter as "Of Queen Anelida and False Arcite." There are passages in it from Boccaccio's "Teseide," and the "Thebaid" of Statius was also drawn upon. Chaucer tells us that he took it from the Latin, and says at the close of the prologue: "First follow I Stace and after him Corinne."

To Corinne or Corineus, whoever he or she was, he owed the inspiration of this poem. Miss Barrett (Mrs. Browning) modernized the poem about the middle of the 19th century. Anelida was the Queen of Armenia. In the poem is included "The Complaint of Fair Anelida upon False Arcite," occasioned by the fact that the Theban knight (who is not the true Arcite of the "Knight's Tale") deserted her for another. The poem breaks off at the end of her complaint.

Anerio (ä-nä-rë-ö), Felice. Born at Rome about 1560; died about 1630. An Italian composer of sacred music who succeeded Palestrina, on the latter's death, as composer for the papal chapel.

Anethan (än-toñ'), Julius (Jules) Joseph, Baron d'. Born at Brussels, April 24, 1803; died there, Oct. 8, 1888. A Belgian Conservative politician, premier 1870-71.

Anethou, Pic d'. See Nethou.

Aneurin (än'ü-rin). Flourished about 600 A. D. (?). A Welsh bard, son of a chief of the Otadini or Gododin (a sea-coast tribe dwelling south of the Firth of Forth), and author of the epic "Gododin" (which see), the chief source of the very scanty information about him. He has been thought to be identical with Gildas the historian, or to be the son of Gildas (who was sometimes called Euryn y Coed Aur).

Aneurin's great epic itself is wanting in all precision of detail. It is the history of a long war of races, compressed under the similitude of a battle into a few days of rain, like the last fight in the Volupsa.

Eltou, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 346.

Anfossi (än-fos'së), Pasquale. Born at Naples, 1736; died at Rome, 1797 (1795?). An Italian operatic composer, author of "L'Incongnita perseguitata" (1773), etc.

Angami-Naga (än-gä'më-nä'gä). A savage and warlike tribe in northern Assam.

Angara (än-gä-rä'). (Upper Angara and Upper Tungusta.) The chief tributary of the Yenisei, in southern Siberia. It rises northeast of Lake Baikal, traverses Lake Baikal, flows northwest and west, and joins the Yenisei above Yeniseisk. Its length is about 1,300 miles. It is navigable throughout almost its entire course.

Angel (än'jel), Benjamin Franklin. Born at Burlington, Otsego County, N. Y., Nov. 28, 1815; died at Geneseo, N. Y., Sept. 11, 1894. A lawyer and diplomatist, commissioner to China (1855) under President Pierce, and minister to Sweden and Norway under President Buchanan.

Angelica (än-jel'i-kä). 1. In Boiardo's "Orlando Innamorato" and Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," a beautiful but coquettish and faithless princess, daughter of Galaphron, king of Cathay. His unrequited love for her was the cause of Orlando's madness.—2. The principal female character in Congreve's play "Love for Love," a witty and piquant woman, and the author's favorite character.—3. A character in Farghar's comedy "The Constant Couple," and also in its sequel, "Sir Harry Wildair."

Angelic Brothers. A community of Dutch Pietists, in the 16th century, who believed that they had attained that state of angelic purity in which there is "neither marrying nor giving in marriage": founded by George Giehtel.

Angelo, Michel. See Michelangelo.

Angelo (än'je-lö). 1. In Shakspeare's "Measure for Measure," the duke's deputy.

The actor is here required to represent a man who is too little for the great, bold, and dangerous projects of an ambitious selfishness; too noble for the weak errors of a vain self-love, who wavers negatively between the two, who aspires after honour, who would be a master in his political vocation, a saint in his moral life, but who, in the hour of temptation, is found as false and tyrannical in the one as he is hypocritical and base in the other.

Gervinus, Shakspeare Commentaries (tr. by F. E. Bunnell, [ed. 1880], p. 500).

2. In Shakspeare's "Comedy of Errors," a goldsmith.

Angelo. A prose drama by Victor Hugo, first represented at the Théâtre Français, Paris, April 28, 1835. The scene is laid in Padua in the middle of the 16th century. It was translated into English by G. H. Davidson, and produced in London as "Angelo and the Actress of Padua."

Angelo, Sant', Castle of. The remodeled mausoleum of Hadrian in Rome. It is a huge circular tower about 230 feet in diameter on a basement about 300 feet square, with medieval chambers and casements excavated in its solid concrete, and three Renaissance stories added on its summit to serve the purposes of a citadel. Originally the mausoleum possessed a superstructure surrounded with columns and statues, and crowned with a cone of masonry. It is connected with the Vatican quarter by the Pont Sant' Angelo, built by Hadrian in 136, which originally had seven arches; two are now built up. Also Hadrian's Mole.

Angelus Silesius (än'je-lus si-lë'shi-us) (Johannes Scheffler). Born at Breslau, Prussia, 1624; died at Breslau, July 9, 1677. A German philosophical poet, author of "Cherubinischer Wandersmann" (1657), etc.

Angelus, The. A celebrated painting by J. F. Millet (1859). The time is evening; two peasants, a man and a woman, at the sound of the Angelus bell from a distant church, stop their work and stand in the field praying with bowed heads. In 1889 it was bought at auction by the American Art Association for $50,650 francs, which included tax, auctioneer's fees, etc. It was sold in 1890 to the agents of M. Chauchard for $150,000. He has signified his intention of presenting it to the Louvre at his death.

Angerona (än-je-rö'niä), or Angeronia (ni-ä). In Roman mythology, a goddess whose attributes and powers are not definitely known. She was, perhaps, the goddess who releases from (or causes) anguish and secret grief. Her statue stood in the temple of Volupta (sensual pleasure), and she was represented with her finger upon her bound and sealed lips.

Angers (änzh-ä'). The capital of the department of Maine-et-Loire, France, situated on the Maine 5 miles from the Loire, in lat. 47° 28' N., long. 0° 33' W.: the Roman Juliomagus or Andecavia (Andegavia or Andegavum), a town of the Andecavi or Andes, a Gallie tribe. It has an extensive trade and varied manufactures. It was formerly the capital of Anjou, and the seat of a university and a military college. It suffered severely in the Huguenot and Vendean wars. The cathedral of Angers is an interesting monument of the Angevin Pointed style, characterized particularly by the vaulting, which rises so much in every bay as to approach a domical form. There is a fine early sculptured west portal; the nave is 54 feet wide and 80 feet high; and there are long transepts, but no aisles. It contains splendid 13th-century glass, a beautiful wall-arcade beneath the windows, and very extensive and notable 14th-century tapestries bequeathed by King René. The castle, completed by St. Louis, is a huge trapezoid about half a mile in circuit, with seventeen massive cylindrical towers bossing its walls. Within the inclosure remain portions of the Renaissance palace of the counts of Anjou as well as the dungeons and many other interesting memorials of the medieval fortress. It is characterized by the liberal inclusion and free Latinizing of technical and vernacular English and Norman or Anglo-French terms.

Anglo-Saxon (äng-glö-sak'son). [ML. Anglo-Saxones, more correctly written Anglosax- ones, pl., also Angli Saxones or Angli et Saxones, rarely Saxones Angli. The term frequently occurs in the charters of Alfred and his successors (chiefly in the gen. pl. with rex) as the general name of their people, all the Teutonic tribes in England; but it is sometimes confined to the people south of the Humber. The same term is used by foreign chroniclers and writers in Latin from the 8th to the 12th century, with the general meaning. 1. (a) Literally, one of the Angle or 'English' Saxons. The name is sometimes restricted to the Saxons who dwelt chiefly in the southern districts (Wessex, Essex, Sussex, Middlesex—names which contain the form of Saxon—and Kent) of the country which came to be known, from a kindred tribe, as the land of the Angles, Engla land, now England, but usually extended to the whole people or nation formed by the aggregation of the Angles, Saxons, and other early Teutonic settlers in Britain, or the whole people of England before the Conquest. (b) pl. The English race; all persons in Great Britain and Ireland, in the United States, and in their dependencies, who belong, actually or nominally, nearly or remotely, to the Teutonic stock of England; in the widest use, all English-speaking or English-appearing people.—2. The old Portuguese colony of Angola, founded in the boundaries of the ancient native kingdom of Angola, and called "Reino e Conquistas de Angola."—4. The modern Portuguese province of Angola, comprising the old kingdoms of Kongo, Angola, and Benguela, the new district of Mossamedes, and the latest accessions between the Kuangu and Kassai rivers. This province extends along the west coast of Africa from 6° to 17° south latitude, and inland as far as the Kuangu, Kassai, and Zambesi rivers. Its area is about 400,000 square miles; its population from three to five millions. The administration is in the hands of a governor-general, residing at Loanda, with district governors of Kongo, Benguela, and Mossamedes. Every district is subdivided into "concelhos" (counties) under military "chefes"; and the concelhos are subdivided into divisions under commanders, who are either natives or white traders. Angola is ruled by the same laws as Portugal, and the natives have exactly the same legal standing and right to vote as the white Portuguese. Angola is the only central African possession which has a large white population (about 6,000) and in which agriculture is flourishing on a large scale. See Kimbundu, Umbundu, Ngola, Kongo.

It was bounded by Maine on the north, by Touraine on the east, by Poitou on the south, and by Brittany on the west. It comprised the department of Maine-et-Loire and small portions of adjoining departments. Anjou was united with Touraine in 1044, and with Maine in 1110. By the marriage of Geoffrey Plantagenet with Matilda, heiress of Henry I., Anjou, England, and Normandy were united in 1154 when Henry II. founded the Angevin house (Plantagenet). Anjou was conquered by Philip Augustus of France about 1204, and was united subsequently with Naples and Provence. It was annexed to the French crown in 1480 by Louis XI.

Anjou, Counts and Dukes of. The origin of the countship is referred to Ingelger, seneschal of Gâtinais, who in 870 received from Charles the Bald that portion of the subsequent province of Anjou which lies between the Maine and the Mayenne. Among his descendants are Fulke, count of Anjou, a Crusader, who became king of Jerusalem 1131, and Fulke's son Geoffrey le Plantagenet, who married Matilda, the daughter and heiress of Henry I. of England, and founded the English royal house of Plantagenet. (See Henry II.) The second house of Anjou was a branch of the royal family of France. King John of England forfeited his French fiefs to Philip Augustus about 1204, and Anjou passed into the hands of Charles, the brother of Louis IX. Charles established the house of Anjou on the throne of Naples in 1266. His son Charles II. of Naples gave Anjou and Maine to his son-in-law, Charles of Valois, and from 1290 the counts of Valois took the title of duke of Anjou and count of Maine. The son of Charles of Valois became king of France, as Philip VI., 1328, uniting Anjou to the crown. King John bestowed

It on his son Louis in 1356. The second house of Anjou became extinct in the direct line on the death of Charles, brother of René, 1481. The title of duke of Anjou has also been borne without implying territorial sovereignty, by Charles VIII. of France, by the four sons of Henry II., by the second son of Henry IV., by the two sons of Louis XIV., by Louis XV., and by Philip V. of Spain.

Anomæans (an-ō-mē'anz). [Gr. ἀνόμοιοι, unlike, dissimilar.] A sect of extreme Arians in the 4th century. They held that the Son is of an essence not even similar to that of the Father (whence their name), while the more moderate Arians held that the essence of the Son is similar to that of the Father, though not identical with it. It was founded at Antioch, and was led by Aetius, and after him by Eunomius, whence its members were also called Aetians and Eunomians. Its tenets were finally condemned at the Council of Constantinople (381). See Eudoxians.

Anonymous Cuspiniani (ā-nou'ī-mus kus-pin-i-ā'nī). [NL., 'the anonymous (manuscript) of Cuspinian.'] See the extract.

Anonymous Cuspiniani is the uncouth designation of the mysterious MS. (also edited by Koncalli) which is our most valuable authority for the last quarter-century of the Western Empire. The MS. of this chronicle is in the Imperial Library at Vienna. It was first published by a certain Joseph Cuspinianus, a scholar of the Renaissance (who died in 1523), and hence the name by which it is technically known. It begins with a mere list of names of Consuls, very fragmentary, and of no great value. With the year 378, the point where St. Jerome's chronicle ends, "the Anonymous of Cuspinian" becomes more valuable. He begins to insert much fuller notices of passing events, and is exceedingly precise in mentioning the day of the month on which each event occurred. It would not probably be too much to assert that at least half of the dates recorded by historians who write of the accessions and depositions of the Roman Emperors in the fifth century, are due to the Anonymous Cuspiniani.

Hordgkin, Italy and her Invaders, II, 211.

Anson (an'son), George (Lord Anson). Born at Shugborough, Staffordshire, April 23, 1697; died at Moor Park, Hertfordshire, June 6, 1762. A celebrated English admiral. He entered the navy in 1712, became a captain in 1724, and from 1734 to 1735 was generally cruising on the coast of Carolina. In 1740 he commanded a squadron of six ships sent to the Pacific. Two ships were driven back by storms, one was lost at Cape Horn, and two others were destroyed as unseaworthy. In the remaining vessel, the Centurion, of 60 guns, he nearly destroyed the commerce of the Spanish colonies on the Pacific coast, blockaded ports, and even sacked and burned towns. He then crossed the Pacific, captured the Spanish treasure-ship on its way from Manila to Acapulco (June 20, 1743), obtained booty to the value of £500,000, and reached England by the Cape of Good Hope in June, 1744. He was made rear-admiral, and in 1746 vice-admiral of the blue, with the command of the Channel fleet. On May 3, 1747, he intercepted a French convoy off Cape Finisterre, and gained a brilliant victory. In reward he was created Baron Anson. Thereafter he was engaged in organizing the navy, and was first lord of the admiralty from June, 1751, until Nov., 1756, and again from June, 1757, until his death. In June, 1761, he attained the highest naval rank as admiral of the fleet.

Anthemius. Emperor of the West 467-473 (472 ?), son of Procopius and son-in-law of the eastern emperor Marcian. He was nominated emperor of the West by the eastern emperor Leo, on the application of Ricimer for a successor to Majorian, and was confirmed at Rome. He became the father-in-law of Ricimer in 467, and was killed in a civil war which broke out between them.

Anthia (än-thi'ä). [Gr. Ἀνθία.] The heroine in the romance "Ephesiaca," by Xenophon of Ephesus.

Anthology, The. [Gr. ἀνθολογία, LGr. also ἀνθολόγιον, a flower-gathering, hence a collection of small poems, from ἀνθός, a flower, and ἵερον = lead, gather, read.] A collection of several thousand short Greek poems by many authors, written for the most part in the elegiac meter. In it every period of Greek literature is represented, from the Persian war to the decadence of Byzantium. The first Anthology was compiled by Meleager of Gadara in the 1st century B. C.; to this additions were made by Philippos of Thessalonica about 100 A. D. In the collection by Agathias of Myrina (6th century) the poems are (for the first time) arranged by subjects. See the extract.

The Greek Anthology brings together epigrams and short pieces ranging over about 1,000 years,—from Simonides of Ceos (490 B. C.) to the sixth century of our era. Maximus Planudes, a monk of Constantinople (1330 A. D.), put together a collection, founded on that of Agathias (550 A. D.), in seven books. This was the only one till, in 1606, the scholar Saumaise, better known as Salmasius, found a manuscript in the library of the Elector Palatine at Heidelberg, containing another Greek Anthology, put together by Constantinus Cephalas about 920 A. D. This is now known as the Palatine Anthology; and it is now seen that Planudes had, in large measure, merely rearranged or abridged it. Love, art, mourning for the dead, the whole range of human interests and sympathies, lend leaves to this garland of Greek song. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 160.

Antho (an'thon), Charles. Born at New York, Nov. 19, 1797; died at New York, July 29, 1867. An American classical teacher, professor of Greek in Columbia College. He edited Lemprière's "Classical Dictionary" (1841), and compiled a "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities" (1845), and various classical text-books.

Anthony (an'tō-ni), or Antony (an'tō-ni), Saint, "The Great": L. Antonius. Born at Coma, Upper Egypt, about 251 A. D.; died about 356. An Egyptian abbot, called (by Athanasius) the founder of asceticism. He early adopted an ascetic mode of life, and in 285 retired altogether from the society of men, living first in a sepulcher, then for twenty years in the ruins of a castle, and finally on Mount Colzini. His sanctity attracted numerous disciples, whom he gathered into a fraternity near Kaym, which at his death numbered 15,000 members. He was a friend and supporter of Athanasius. He was often (according to his own belief) sorely tempted in his solitude by the devil, who appeared in a great variety of forms, now as a friend, now as a fascinating woman, now as a dragon, and once broke through the wall of his cave, filling the room with roaring lions, howling wolves, growling bears, fierce hyenas, and crawling serpents and scorpions—scenes frequently depicted in Christian art. (See Temptation of St. Anthony.) His bones, discovered in 561 and brought first to Alexandria, then to Constantinople, and finally to Vienna in southern France, are said to have performed great wonders in the 11th century, during an epidemic of "St. Anthony's fire," an erysipelatous distemper, also called the "sacred fire." His day is Jan. 17 in the Roman Church.

Anthony (an'tō-ni), Henry Bowen. Born at Coventry, R. I., April 1, 1815; died at Providence, R. I., Sept. 2, 1884. An American journalist and statesman. He was a graduate of Brown University 1833, many years editor of the Providence "Journal," Whig governor of Rhode Island 1849-51, Republican United States senator 1859-84, and several times president pro tempore of the Senate.

Anthony, Susan Brownell. Born at South Adams, Mass., Feb. 15, 1820. A social reformer, and agitator in behalf of female suffrage, temperance, and the civil rights of women.

Anthony of Padua, Saint. Born at Lisbon, Aug. 15, 1195; died near Padua, June 13, 1231. A Franciscan monk, theologian, and preacher in France and Italy. He taught at Montpellier, Toulouse, and Padua. According to the legend, he one day preached to a school of fishes and was heard with attention. In the Roman calendar his day is June 13. There is a noted painting of him by Murillo in the cathedral of Seville. The figure of the saint was cut from the picture by a thief in 1874, but was recovered in New York, and replaced very skillfully. There is also a painting of Anthony by Murillo in the museum at Seville. The saint kneels, with one arm about the infant Saviour, who is seated before him on an open book.

Antibes Legion. A foreign battalion at Rome during the French occupation of the city, supported by Pope Pius IX. It was formed at Antibes and composed chiefly of Frenchmen.

Antiburghers (än'ti-bēr-gērj). The members of one of two sections into which the Scotch Secession Church was split in 1747, by a controversy on the lawfulness of accepting a clause in the oath required to be taken by burghesses declaratory of "their profession and allowance of the true religion professed within the realm and authorized by the laws thereof." The Antiburghers denied that this oath could be taken consistently with the principles of the church, while the Burghers affirmed its compatibility. The parties were reunited in 1820.

Anticant, Dr. Pessimist. A pseudonym of Thomas Carlyle.

Anti-Corn-Law League. An association formed in 1839, with headquarters at Manchester, to further the repeal of the British corn-laws. Among the leaders were Cobden, Bright, Villiers, Joseph Hume, and Reebuck.

Anticosti (an-ti-kos'ti). A thinly inhabited island of British America, situated in the Gulf of St. Lawrence in lat. 49°-50° N., long. 61° 40'-64° 30' W. It is swampy, rocky, and unfruitful. Its length is 135 miles and its greatest width about 35 miles.

Anticyra (an-tis'i-rā). [Gr. Ἀντικύρα, Ἀντικύρα, earlier Ἀντικύρα.] 1. In ancient geography, a city in Phocis, Greece, situated on the Corinthian Gulf in lat. 38° 23' N., long. 22° 38' E. It is noted for the hellebore (the ancient remedy for madness) obtained in its neighborhood.—2. A city in Thessaly, Greece, situated on the Sperchios in lat. 38° 51' N., long. 22° 22' E. It, also, was noted for its hellebore.—3. A city in Loeris, Greece, situated near Naupactus in lat. 38° 24' N., long. 22° E.

Antietam (an-tē'tam). A small river in southern Pennsylvania and western Maryland, which joins the Potomac 6 miles north of Harper's Ferry. On its banks near Sharpsburg, Sept. 17, 1862, a battle (called by the Confederates the battle of Sharpsburg) was fought between the Federals (87,164, of whom about 60,000 bore the brunt of the battle) under McClellan, and the Confederates (40,000 according to Lee, 45,000 to 70,000 according to Pollard, 97,000 according to McClellan) under Lee. The total loss of the Union army was 12,469 (2,910 killed); of the Confederates, 25,899. Other estimates of the Confederate loss are 9,000 to 12,000. Lee retreated across the Potomac on the 18th. The battle is variously described as a Federal victory and as indecisive.

Anti-Federal Party. In United States history, the party which opposed the adoption and ratification of the Constitution of the United States, and which, failing in this, strongly favored the strict construction of the Constitution. Its fundamental principle was opposition to the strengthening of the national government at the expense of the States. Soon after the close of Washington's first administration (1793) the name Anti-Federal went out of use, Republican, and afterward Democratic-Republican (now usually Democratic alone), taking its place. Also called Anti-Federalist Party.

Anti-Federalists. See Anti-Federal Party.

Antigone (an-tig'ō-nē). [Gr. Ἀντιγόνη.] In Greek legend, a daughter of Œdipus by his mother Jocaste. She accompanied Œdipus, as a faithful daughter, in his wanderings until his death at Colonus; she then returned to Thebes. According to Sophocles, Œdipus, the son of Creon (who in other accounts was then dead), fell in love with her. Contrary to the edict of Creon, she buried the body of her brother Polynices, who had been slain in single combat with his brother Eteocles, and (according to Sophocles) was shut up in a subterranean cave where she perished by her own hand. Œdipus also slew himself. Other accounts of her life and death are given.

Antigone. 1. A celebrated tragedy by Sophocles, of uncertain date.—2. A tragedy by Alfieri, a sequel to "Polynices," published in 1783.

Antigonidæ (an-ti-gon'i-dē). [Gr. Ἀντιγονίδαι.] The descendants of Antigonus, king of Asia, one of the generals of Alexander the Great. The principal members of the family were Demetrius I. (Poliorectes), king of Macedonia (died 293 B. C.), son of Antigonus, king of Asia; Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia (died 239 B. C.), son of Demetrius I.; Demetrius of Cyrene (died 250 B. C.), son of Demetrius I.; Demetrius II, king of Macedonia (died 229 B. C.), son of Antigonus Gonatas; Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia (died 220 B. C.), son of Demetrius of Cyrene; Philip V., king of Macedonia (died 170 B. C.), son of Demetrius II.; and Perseus, king of Macedonia, conquered by the Romans 168 B. C.

Antigonish (an-tig'ō-nēsh'). A seaport, capital of Antigonish County, Nova Scotia, situated on George Bay 38 miles east of Pietou.

Antigonus (an-tig'ō-nus). [Gr. Ἀντιγονος.] Born about 80 B. C.; executed at Antioch 37 B. C. A king of Judea who reigned 40-37 B. C.: the last Maccabean king. He was defeated by Herod, the son of Antipater, and put to death by Antony as a common malefactor.

Antigonus. Born about 382 B. C.: killed at the battle of Ipsus, 301 B. C. One of the generals of Alexander the Great, surnamed "The One-Eyed." After the death of Alexander he received the provinces of Greater Phrygia, Lycia, and Pamphylia. He carried on war against Perdiccas and Eumenes, made extensive conquests in Asia, assumed the title of king in 306, and was overthrown at Ipsus by a coalition.

Antigonus. 1. In Shakspeare's "Winter's Tale," a lord of Sicilia.—2. In Fletcher's "Humorous Lieutenant," an old and licentious king.

Antigonus Carystius (ka-ris'ti-us). Born in Carystos, Eubœa (whence his surname): lived about 250 B. C. A Greek writer, author of a work relating to natural history, portions of which are extant, valuable as containing quotations from lost writings.

Antigonus Doso (dō'son). [Gr. Δώσαν, 'Going-to-Givo': a surname said to have been applied to Antigonus "because he was always about to give, and never did."] Died 220 B. C. King of Macedonia 229-220 B. C., nephew of Antigonus Gonatas, and son of Demetrius of Cyrene, the grandson of Antigonus, Alexander's general. He was appointed guardian of Philip, son of Demetrius II., and on the death of Demetrius (229 B. C.) he married his widow, and ascended the throne. He supported successfully Aratus and the Achaean League against Cleomenes, king of Sparta, and the Ætolians, and defeated the former at Sellasia 221.

Antigonus Gonatas (gon'a-tas). Born about 319 B. C.: died 239 B. C. Son of Demetrius Poliorettes, and king of Macedonia 277-239. He suppressed the Celtic invasion and was temporarily driven from his land by Pyrrhus 273.

Antigua (än-tē'gwā). 1. An island in the colony of the Leeward Islands, Lesser Antilles, British West Indies, in lat. (St. John) 17° 6' N., long. 61° 50' W. It was discovered by Columbus in 1493, and settled in 1632. It exports sugar, rum, molasses, etc. The chief town is St. John. Length, 28 miles. Area, 108 square miles. Population, with Barbuda and Redonda (1891), 36,810.

2. See Guatemala, Old.

Anti-Jacobin, or Weekly Examiner, The. A paper originated Nov. 20, 1797, by George Canning and contributed to by his friends, principally John Hookham Frere and George Ellis. It was edited by William Gifford, and the last number appeared July 9, 1798. Its avowed purpose was to ridicule the doctrines of the French Revolution and their advocates in England.

Anti-Jacobin Review, The. A monthly periodical started in 1798 by John Gifford: it came to an end in 1821. It had no connection with Canning's paper, and the names of the distinguished authors of the latter do not appear in it.

Antihuenó (än-tē-wā-nō'), or Antigüenú (än-tē-gwā-nō'). An Araucanian Indian of Chile who, in 1559, was made toqui or war-chief of the tribe. In 1563 he defeated and killed a son of the governor Villagra at Mariquén, attempted to take Concepcion but failed, and drove the Spaniards from Cañete and Arauco, but was defeated and killed in an attack on Angol in 1564.

Anti-Libanus (an'ti-lib'a-nus), or Anti-Lebanon (an'ti-leb'a-non). [Gr. Ἀντιλίβανος.] A mountain-range of Syria, parallel to and east of the Lebanon range, and separated from it by the valleys of the Orontes and Litany. Its highest peak is Mount Hermon.

Antilles (än-til'lez or än-tel'). [Sp. Antillas, F. Antilles, G. Antillen.] A general name for the West Indies, excluding the Bahamas. The Greater Antilles comprise Cuba, Jamaica, Haiti, and Porto Rico; the Lesser Antilles comprise the remainder, to which the name was formerly restricted. See West Indies.

Antilochus (an-til'ō-kus). [Gr. Ἀντιλόχος.] In Greek legend, a son of Nestor conspicuous in the Trojan war. He was a close friend of Achilles and was chosen to break to him the news of Patroclus's death. Memnon (or, in another account, Hector) slew him and Achilles avenged his death, as he did that of Patroclus. The three friends were buried in the same mound, and were seen by Odysseus walking together over the asphodel meadows of the under world.

Anti-Macchiavel (an'ti-mak'i-a-vel). An essay by Frederick the Great, respecting the duties of sovereigns, intended to confute the "Princeipe" of Macchiaveli. It was written before he became king, and was issued by Voltaire at the Hague in 1740.

Antimachus (an-tim'a-kus). [Gr. Ἀντίμαχος.] In Greek legend, a Trojan warrior mentioned in the Iliad.

Antimachus. A Greek epic and elegiac poet of Claros, a part of the dominion of Colophon (whence he was called "The Colophonian"), who flourished about 410 B. C. His chief work was the "Thebais," a voluminous epic poem. His elegy on Lyde, his wife or mistress, was highly praised in antiquity. He also published a special edition of Homer. "The Alexandrian critics constantly quote him, and greatly admired him, and he may fairly be regarded the model or master of the Alexandrian epic poets." Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 146.

Anti-Masonic Party (an'ti-mā-son'ik pār'ti). In American politics, a political party which opposed the alleged influence of freemasonry in civil affairs. It originated in western New York after the kidnapping of William Morgan in 1826, who had threatened, it was said, to disclose the secrets of the order. A national convention nominated Wirt for the presidency in 1831; but the organization was soon after absorbed by the Whigs. Anti-Masonic influence continued for some time powerful in local matters. An American Party, organized in 1875, revived the principles of the Anti-Masons, but has had very few adherents.

Antin (än-tan'), Duc d' (Louis-Antoine de Pardailan de Gondrin. Born 1665; died at Paris, Dec. 2, 1736. A French courtier, legitimate son of Madame de Montespan. He gained the favor of Louis XIV. and the dauphin, and was a member of the regency under the Duke of Orleans.

Antinori (än-të-nô-rë), Marchese Orazio. Born at Perugia, Oct. 28, 1811; died at Marefia, Aug. 26, 1882. An African traveler and zoologist. After a successful career as scientist and patriot, and a journey through Syria and Asia Minor, he went to Egypt in 1859. He explored, with Poggia, the Upper Nile regions (1860-61) and returned to Italy with rich collections. He was one of the founders of the Italian Geographical Society. In 1869 he explored Bogo-land, north of Abyssinia. In 1876 he led an important scientific expedition into Shoa and established the station Marefia where he died. The thorough zoologic exploration of Shoa is due to him.

Antinous (an-tin'ô-us). [Gr. Ἀντίνοος.] Born in Bithynia, Asia Minor; lived in the reign of Hadrian 117-138 A. D. A page, attendant, and favorite of the emperor Hadrian. He drowned himself in the Nile, probably from melancholy. Of the many representations of Antinous in ancient art, the statue from the villa of Hadrian, in the Capitoline Museum, Rome, is considered the finest. It represents a well-formed nude youth whose bowed head and melancholy look seem to portend his untimely fate. There is a colossal statue of Hadrian's favorite in the Vatican, Rome, in the character of Bacchus, ivy-crowned and holding a staff or scepter. The head, somewhat stern in expression, is among the finest of the type. The full paludamentum is modern, the ancient drapery having been in bronze.

Antioch (an'ti-ok). [L. Antiochia, Turk. Antakia; Gr. Ἀντιόχεια, named from Ἀντίοχος, Antiochus, father of Seleucus.] A city in the vilayet of Aleppo, Syria, Asiatic Turkey, situated on the Orontes about 15 miles from the Mediterranean, in lat. 36° 11' N., long. 36° 10' E. It was founded by Seleucus about 300 B. C., was the capital of Syria until 65 B. C., and rose to great splendor. It was called "the Crown of the East," and "Antioch the Beautiful." Under the early Roman Empire it was a famous emporium, the most important after Rome and Alexandria, and one of the earliest and most influential seats of Christianity, the center of a patriarchate. It was the scene of a serious riot in A. D. 387, suppressed by Theodosius. It was often ravaged by earthquakes (especially in A. D. 115, 341, 458, 507-508, 525-526), was destroyed by Chosroes in 540 and by the Saracens in 638, and was besieged and taken by the Crusaders in 1098. From 1099 until its capture by the Egyptian sultan in 1268 it was the seat of a Christian principality. It passed to the Turks in 1516. It is now an unimportant town (Antakia) with few relics of antiquity. In 1872 it was devastated by an earthquake. Population, 12,000.

Antioch. In ancient geography, a city in Asia Minor, situated on the borders of Pisidia and Pamphylia in lat. 38° 16' N., long. 31° 17' E., founded by Seleucus. It received a Roman colony and was called Caesarea. It is noted in St. Paul's history.

Antioch College. An institution of learning, at Yellow Springs, Greene County, Ohio (incorporated in 1852). It is controlled by the Disciples of Christ.

Antioche. A chanson de geste of the group entitled "Le Chevalier au Cygne." It narrates the exploits of the Christian host in attacking and then defending Antioch.

Antioche (on-të-ôsh'), Pertuis d'. An arm of the Bay of Biscay, west of the department of Charente-Inférieure, France, between the islands of Ré and Oléron.

Antiochus (an-ti'ô-kus) I. [Gr. Ἀντίοχος.] Died about 30 B. C. King of Commagene, a petty principality between the Euphrates and Mount Taurus, capital Samosata, at one time a part of the Syrian kingdom of the Seleucidae. He concluded a peace with Pompey 64 B. C., and later (49 B. C.) supported him in the civil war with Caesar.

Antiochus II. King of Commagene, successor of Mithridates I. He was summoned to Rome and executed, 29 B. C., for having caused the murder of an ambassador sent to Rome by his brother.

Antiochus IV., surnamed Epiphanes. A king of Commagene, apparently a son of Antiochus III. He was a friend of Caligula, who in A. D. 38 restored to him the kingdom of Commagene, which had been made a Roman province at the death of his father A. D. 17. Subsequently, however, he was deposed by Caligula, but was restored on the accession of Claudius, A. D. 41. He was finally deprived of his kingdom A. D. 72.

Antiochus I., surnamed Soter. [Gr. σωτήρ, deliverer.] Born about 323 B. C.; killed 261 B. C. King of Syria 280 (281?)-261, son of Seleucus Nicator. It is said that when he fell sick, through love of Stratonice, the young wife of his father, the latter, on the advice of the physician Erasistratus, resigned Stratonice to his son, and invested him with the government of Upper Asia, allowing him the title of king. On the death of his father, Antiochus succeeded to the whole of his dominions, but relinquished his claims to Macedonia on the marriage of Antigonus Gonatas to Phila, the daughter of Seleucus and Stratonice.

Antiochus II., surnamed Theos. [Gr. θεός, divine, = L. divus, as an imperial title.] Killed 246 (247?) B. C. King of Syria, son of Antiochus I. whom he succeeded in 261 B. C. He became involved in a ruinous war with Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, during which Syria was further weakened by the revolt of the provinces of Parthia and Bactria, Arsaces establishing the Parthian empire about 250 B. C., and Theodotus the independent kingdom of Bactria about the same time. Peace was concluded with Egypt 250 B. C., Antiochus being obliged to reject his wife Laodice, and to marry Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy. On the death of Ptolemy (247 B. C.), he recalled Laodice, who shortly caused him to be murdered, and also Berenice and her son. The connection between Syria and Egypt is referred to in Daniel xi. 6.

Antiochus III. Born about 238 B. C.; died 187 B. C. King of Syria 223-187 B. C., surnamed "The Great," the most famous of the Seleucidae. He was the son of Seleucus II., and grandson of Antiochus II., and succeeded his brother Seleucus Ceraunus at the age of fifteen. His surname "The Great" was earned by the magnitude of his enterprises rather than by what he accomplished. He subdued his rebellious brothers Molo and Alexander, satraps of Media and Persis, 220 B. C., and was forced (after having undertaken an aggressive war against Ptolemy Philopator) by the battle of Raphia, near Gaza, to relinquish his claims to Coele-Syria and Palestine 217 B. C. He defeated and killed Achaens, the rebellious governor of Asia Minor, 214 B. C.; attempted to regain the former provinces Parthia and Bactria 212-205 B. C.; and was compelled to recognize the independence of Parthia 205 B. C. The victory of Panceas, 198 B. C., gave him the Egyptian provinces of Coele-Syria and Palestine. He, however, made peace with Ptolemy Epiphanes, to whom he betrothed his daughter Cleopatra, promising Coele-Syria and Palestine as a dowry. He conquered the Thracian Chersonese from Macedonia 196 B. C.; received Hannibal at his court 195 B. C.; carried on a war with the Romans 192-189 B. C., who demanded the restoration of the Egyptian provinces and the Thracian Chersonese; was defeated at Thermopylae 191, and at Magnesia 190; and sustained naval losses at Chios 191, and at Myonesus 190. He purchased peace by consenting to the surrender of all his European possessions, and his Asiatic possessions as far as the Taurus, the payment of 15,000 Eubæan talents within twelve years, and the surrender of Hannibal, who escaped, and by giving up his elephants and ships of war. Antiochus was killed by his subjects in an attempt to plunder the rich temple of Elymais to pay the Romans, an event which, as also his defeat by the Romans, is supposed by some to be referred to in Daniel xi. 18, 19.

Antiochus IV., surnamed Epiphanes. Died 164 B. C. King of Syria 175-164 B. C.; son of Antiochus III. He reconquered Armenia, which had been lost by his father, and made war on Egypt 171-168 B. C., recovering Coele-Syria and Palestine. The policy of Antiochus of rooting out the Jewish religion, in pursuance of which he took Jerusalem by storm 170 B. C. (when he desecrated the temple) and again in 168 B. C. led to the successful revolt under Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, 167 B. C.

Antiochus V., surnamed Eupator. [Gr. εὐπάτωρ, of a noble sire.] Died 162 B. C. King of Syria 164-162 B. C., son of Antiochus IV. whom he succeeded at the age of nine years, under the guardianship of Lysias. He concluded a peace with the Jews, who had revolted under his father, and was defeated and killed by Demetrius Soter (the son of Seleucus Philopator) who laid claim to the throne.

Antiochus VII., surnamed Sidetes. Died 121 B. C. King of Syria 137-128 B. C., second son of Demetrius Soter. He carried on war with the Jews, taking Jerusalem in 133 B. C., after which he concluded peace with them on favorable terms and was killed in a war with the Parthians.

Antiochus VIII., surnamed Grypus. [Gr. γρυπός, hook-nosed.] Died 96 B. C. King of Syria 125-96 B. C., second son of Demetrius Nicator.

Antiochus XIII., surnamed Asiaticus. King of Syria, the son of Antiochus X.; the last of the Seleucidae. He took refuge in Rome during the mastery of Tigranes in Syria 83-69 B. C.; was given possession of the kingdom by Lucullus 69 B. C.; but was deprived of it by Pompey 65 B. C.

Antiochus. 1. In Shakspeare's "Pericles," the king of Antioch.—2. In Massinger's "Believe as You List," the king of Lower Asia, a fugitive, the son of a daughter of Charles V. of Portugal.

Antiochus of Ascalon. Born at Ascalon, Palestine; lived in the first half of the 1st century B. C. An eclectic philosopher, founder of the so-called fifth Academy. He studied under the Stoic Mnesarchus and under Philo, and while Cicero was studying at Athens (79 B. C.) acted as his instructor. He attempted to revive the doctrines of the old Academy.

Antiope (an-ti'ô-pë). [Gr. Ἀντιόπη.] In Greek legend: (a) A daughter of the Boeotian river-god Asopus, and mother by Zeus of Amphion and Zethus. In other accounts she is the daughter of Neptunus of Hyria. She was imprisoned and ill-treated by Dirce upon whom she took vengeance in a frightful way. See Dirce. (b) A sister or daughter of Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons, and wife of Theseus.

Antioquia (ün-të-ô'kë-ä). 1. A department, capital Medellin, in the western part of the Republic of Colombia. The surface is generally mountainous; the chief occupation is mining. Area, 22,316 square miles. Population (1892), 560,000.—2. A town in this department, situated on the Cauca about lat. 6° 35' N., long. 76° 7' W. Population (1892), 10,000.

Antiparos (an-tip'ä-ros), or Oliaros (ô-li'ä-ros).

Antipas, Herod. See Herod Antipater.

Antipater (an-tip'ä-tër). [Gr. Ἀντίπατρος.] Died 319 B. C. A Macedonian general. He was a pupil of Aristotle, served as minister and general under Philip of Macedonia, and was appointed by Alexander regent of Macedonia 334 B. C. He suppressed the Thracian rebellion under Memnon 331; gained a victory over the Spartans near Megalopolis 331; was superseded as regent by Craterus, and ordered to conduct an army of recruits to Babylon in 323; received the regency of Macedonia at the death of Alexander in 322; defeated the revolted Athenians and their allies at Cranon in 323; invaded Etolia in 323; and was appointed regent of the empire on the death of Perdicas in 321.

Antipater, surnamed "The Idumean." Died 43 B. C. Procurator of Judea, governor of Idumea, and the father of Herod the Great. He secured, by his participation in the Alexandrine war (48 B. C.) the confirmation by Caesar of his political tool Hyrcanus as high priest 47 B. C., and was himself appointed procurator of Judea about 46 B. C.

Antipater. Died 4 B. C. Son of Herod the Great by his first wife Doris. He is described by Josephus as a "mystery of wickedness," and was put to death for conspiring against the life of his father, after having previously succeeded, by arousing his father's suspicions, in bringing about the death of Alexander and Aristobulus, Herod's sons by Mariamne, his second wife.

Antipater, L. Cælius. Lived about 123 B. C. A Roman jurist and historian, a contemporary of C. Græchus, and the teacher of L. Crassus the orator. He wrote a history of the second Punic war, "loaded with rhetorical ornament but important in substance," fragments of which are extant.

Antiphanes (an-tif'ä-nëz). [Gr. Ἀντιφάνης.] A Greek comic poet who lived between 404 and 330 B. C. He was the most distinguished writer of the so-called middle comedy, a period in the development of Greek comedy extending from about 390 to 338 B. C.

Antiphellos (an-ti-fel'os). [Gr. Ἀντιφέλλος.] In ancient geography, a town on the southwestern coast of Lycia, Asia Minor. It contains a Lycian necropolis of rock-cut tombs, which are architecturally important because the façades are in exact reproduction of a framed construction of square wooden beams, with doors and windows of paneled work, and ceilings of round poles laid closely together. These tombs evidently represent ancient dwellings, and the imitation is carried out in some of the interiors. There is also an ancient theater, the cavea of which is well preserved, with 23 tiers of seats.

Antiphilus (an-tif'i-lus). [Gr. Ἀντιφίλος.] Lived in the second half of the 4th century B. C. An Egyptian painter.

Antiphilus of Ephesus (an-tif'ô-lus ov ef'ë-sus), and Antiphilus of Syracuse (sir'ä-küs). In Shakspeare's "Comedy of Errors," twin brothers, the first of a violent and the latter of a mild nature.

Antiphon (an'ti-fon). [Gr. Ἀντιφών.] Born at Rhamnus, Attica, about 480 B. C.; executed at Athens, 411 B. C. An Athenian orator and politician, the oldest of the "ten Attic orators." He was a member of the aristocratic party, and was condemned for his share in establishing the government by the 400. Fifteen of his orations are extant.

Antiphon was the ablest debater and pleader of his day, and in his person the new Rhetoric first appears as a political power at Athens. He took a chief part in organizing the Revolution of the Four Hundred, and when they fell was put to death by the people (411 B. C.) after defending himself in a masterpiece of eloquence. Of his 15 extant speeches, all relating to trials for homicide, 12 are mere sketches or studies, forming three groups of four each, in which the case for the prosecution is argued alternately with the case for the defence.

Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 111.

Antipodes Islands (an-tip'ô-dëz i'landz). A cluster of small uninhabited islands in the South Pacific, in lat. 49° 42' S., long. 178° 43' E.; so called from their nearly antipodal position to Greenwieh (near London).

Antipodes (an-tip'ô-dëz), The. A comedy by Richard Brome, printed in 1640.

Antipolis (an-tip'ô-lis). [Gr. Ἀντιπολις.] The ancient name of Antibes, in France.

Antipsara (an-tip'sa-rä). A small island near Ipsara.

Antiquary (an'ti-kwä-ri), The. 1. A comedy by Shakerley Marmion, printed in 1641. Part of O'Keefe's play "Modern Antiques" was taken from this, also D'Urfé's "Malam Fieffe," in which Sir Arthur Oldlove is a copy of Veterano the Antiquary.

2. A novel by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1816; so named from its principal character, Jonathan Oldbuck the Antiquary.

Anti-Rent Party (an-ti-rent' pä'r'ti). In United States politics, a party in the State of New York which had its origin in dissatisfaction among the tenants under the patroon system in the eastern part of the State. The tenants refused to pay rent in 1830, resisted force, and a few years later carried their opposition into politics. The matter was settled by compromise in 1850.

Antis (än'tëz), or Campas (käm'paz). The ancient Indian inhabitants of Anti. They were conquered by the Inca Yahuar-huacac in the 14th century. Their few descendants live in the forests about the head waters of the Ucayale, and are closely related to the Chunchos (which see). They live in huts and wear a long cotton robe.

Antisana (än-të-sä'nä). A volcano of the Ecuadorian Andes, 35 miles southeast of Quito. Ascended by Whymper in 1880. Height (Whymper), 19,335 (Reiss and Stübel, 18,885) feet.

It [Antisana] was formerly supposed to be the only great mountain, anywhere in the world, immediately upon the Equator, and it has become improbable that a loftier one will ever be discovered exactly upon the Line.

Whymper, Travels amongst the Great Andes of the Equator, p. 228.

Antisana. A village on the slope of Mount Antisana, one of the highest inhabited spots in the world. Height (Whymper), 13,306 (Reiss and Stübel, 13,370) feet.

Anti-Semitic Party. A political party whose chief aim is to hinder the spread of Hebrew (Semitic) influence in public affairs. Such parties have representatives in the Austrian Reichsrath and the German Reichstag.

Antistates (an-tis'ta-tëz). [Gr. Ἀντιστάτης.] A Greek architect, associated with Callæstrus, Antimachides, and Perinus in planning and beginning the great temple of Zeus at Athens in the time of Pisistratus (about 560 B. C.). This work was interrupted by the downfall of Pisistratus, resumed by the Roman architect Cosmatius in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164 B. C.), and finished by the emperor Hadrian. The unfinished building was compared by Aristotle with the pyramids of Egypt.

Antisthenes (an-tis'thë-nëz). [Gr. Ἀντισθένης.] Born at Athens about 444 B. C.; died at Athens after 371 B. C. An Athenian philosopher, founder of the school of the Cynics. He was a pupil of Socrates and taught in a gymnasium at Athens.

Anti-suyu (än'të-sö'yö). [Quechua, 'country of the Antis.'] A name given by the Incas to that portion of their empire which lay east of Cuzco. It included Anti, and many other provinces inhabited by various tribes.

Antonines (än'tö-ninz). Age of the. In Roman history, the period of the reigns of Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius. It was generally characterized by domestic tranquillity. See Adoptive Emperors.

Antoninus (än-tö-ni'nus), Itineraries of. Two accounts of routes in the Roman Empire, said to have been edited in the time of (Antoninus) Caracalla. One related to routes in Europe, Asia, and Africa; the other to maritime routes. See Itineraries.

Antoninus, Marcus Aurelius. See Marcus Aurelius.

Antoninus, Pillar of. See Column of Marcus Aurelius.

Antoninus, Wall of. See Wall of Antoninus.

Antoninus Liberalis (än-tö-ni'nus lib-ë-rä'lis). Lived about 150 A. D. A Greek grammarian, author of a collection of tales of metamorphoses (ed. by Koeh 1832).

Antoninus Pius (än-tö-ni'nus pi'us) (Titus Aurelius Fulvus Boionius Arrius). Born near Lanuvium, Italy, Sept. 19, 86 A. D.; died at Lorium, Italy, March 7, 161 A. D. Emperor of Rome 138-161 A. D. He was consul and proconsul in Asia under Hadrian, and was adopted by Hadrian in 138. His reign was marked by general internal peace and prosperity. (See Adoptive Emperors.) It "was one of those periods which have been pronounced happy because they are barren of events, and the placid temper of the prince gave him the full enjoyment of the felicity of his people" (Smith, Hist. of the World).

Antonio (än-tö-në-ö), Sant', Church of. A remarkable church in Padua, Italy, built by Niccolò Pisano in the 13th century, and combining pointed forms with seven Byzantine domes modeled after those of St. Mark's at Venice. The aisles and chapels have groined vaults, and pointed and round arches are used together. The church contains fine paintings and tombs, and several magnificent chapels, among them the Cappella del Santo, whose marble reliefs are among the most notable of the Renaissance, and the Cappella San Felice, in the Venetian pointed style, with admirable 14th-century frescoes.

Antonio, Nicoláo. [NL. Nicolaus Antonius.] Born at Seville 1617; died 1684. A Spanish bibliographer and critic. He was appointed by Philip IV. his general agent at Rome in 1659, and was made fiscal of the royal council at Madrid about 1677. He was the author of the "Bibliotheca Hispanica," an index of Spanish authors from the time of Augustus. It is in two parts, each of two folio volumes. He also published "Bibliotheca Hispanica Nova" (1672), and "Bibliotheca Vetus" (1696).

Antonio (än-tö-ni-ö). 1. In Shakspeare's "Merchant of Venice," the princely merchant who gives to the play its name. He is of a sensitive, susceptible, melancholy nature, with a presentiment of evil and danger. Being obliged to borrow money of Shylock to meet the needs of Bassanio, his friend, he is induced to sign a bond agreeing to forfeit a pound of flesh if he does not repay the money within a specified time. Not being able to pay, he nearly loses his life to satisfy the demands of the Jew. See Shylock.

2. In Shakspeare's "Tempest," the usurping duke of Milan.—3. In Shakspeare's "Two Gentlemen of Verona," the father of Proteus.—4. The brother of Leonato, governor of Messina, in Shakspeare's "Much Ado about Nothing."

5. A sea-captain devoted to Sebastian, in Shakspeare's "Twelfth Night."—6. In Middleton's play "The Changeling," a secondary character who pretends for his own purposes to be an idiot or a changeling: from him the play takes its name.—7. In Webster's tragedy "The Duchess of Malfi," the steward of the household of the Duchess of Malfi. He is secretly married to her, an offense for which he is murdered by her brothers.—8. In Otway's play "Venice Preserved," a foolish speechmaker and senator whose buffooneries were intended to ridicule the first Earl of Shaftesbury. The part is omitted from the acting play on account of its indecency.—9. One of the principal characters in Marston's "Antonio and Mellida" and "Antonio's Revenge," the son of Andrugio, in love with Mellida.—10. In Tomkis's comedy "Albumazar," an old gentleman, supposed to be drowned, who returns in time to frustrate the schemes of the thievish Albumazar.—11. In Dryden's tragedy "Don Sebastian," a young Portuguese nobleman, a slave at the time the play begins. Dorax calls him "The amorous airy spark, Antonio."

Antonio and Mellida. A tragedy in two parts by Marston, printed in 1602. It had been played in 1601 and ridiculed by Ben Jonson in "The Poetaster," and "Cynthia's Revels." The second part is also known as "Antonio's Revenge."

Antonius, Saint. See Anthony.

Antonius, Marcus. See Antonius, Mark.

Antonius (än-tö-mi-us), Marcus. Born 143 B. C.; killed at Rome, 87 B. C. A Roman orator, consul 99 B. C., and censor 97. He was put to death by the Marian party.

Antony (än'tö-ni). A tragedy by Alexandre Dumas, produced in 1831.

Antony, Saint. See Anthony.

Antony, Mark, L. Marcus Antonius. Born about 83 B. C.; died at Alexandria in Aug., 30 B. C. A Roman triumvir and general, grandson of Marcus Antonius the orator. He served in Palestine and Egypt; was questor in 62 and tribune in 59; became a prominent adherent of Caesar; and was expelled from Rome and fled to Caesar, who thereupon commenced the civil war. He commanded the left wing at the battle of Pharsalia; was master of the horse in 47, and became consul in 44. He engaged in intrigues after Caesar's death, and was denounced by Cicero; fled from Rome; formed with Octavian and Lepidus the 2d triumvirate in 43; defeated Brutus and Cassius at Philippi in 42; summoned Cleopatra to Asia, and later followed her to Alexandria; and renewed the triumvirate in 40 and 37. From about 40 he lived chiefly in Alexandria with Cleopatra; conducted an unsuccessful expedition against Parthia; was defeated by Octavian at Actium 31; and fled to Egypt, where he committed suicide.

Antony and Cleopatra. A tragedy by Shakspeare, written and produced in 1607, entered on the Stationers' Register in 1608, and printed in 1623. It was founded on North's "Plutarch," and in it Shakspeare has followed history more minutely than in any other of his plays. The subject has been used by Dryden in "All for Love," and by Fletcher and Massinger in "The False One." The character of Mark Antony is incomparably stronger in Shakspeare's play than in the others. Dryden makes him a weak voluptuary entirely given up to his passion for Cleopatra.

Antony Love, Sir, or The Rambling Lady. A comedy by Southey, printed in 1684. Sir Antony is the rambling lady herself, who in male attire swaggers, fights duels, hobbles with the men, and follows one whom she loves to France.

Antony of Padua. See Anthony.

Antraigues (än-träg'). A small picturesque town in the department of Ardèche, France, west of Privas.

Antraigues (än-träg'), Comte d' (Emmanuel Louis Henri de Launay). Born at Ville-Neuve, Ardèche, France, about 1755; assassinated near London, July 22, 1812. A French politician, author of "Mémoires sur les États-Généraux, etc." (1788). He was a deputy 1789, emigrated in 1790, and was later employed in various diplomatic missions.

Antrim (än'trim). A county in Ulster, Ireland, bounded by the Atlantic on the north, by the North Channel on the east, by Down on the south, and by Londonderry and Lough Neagh on the west. It is hilly on the coast. The chief city is Belfast. Antrim was largely colonized from Scotland. Area, 1,191 square miles. Population (1891), 427,968.

Antrim. A town in County Antrim, 13 miles northwest of Belfast. Near it are Antrim Castle, Shane's Castle, and an ancient round tower, an unusual example of this characteristic type of medieval Irish structure. It is 95 feet high and 18 in diameter at the base, and tapers to the top, which is covered with a conical shell replacing the original one, which was destroyed by lightning. The small, low door is raised about 10 feet above the ground, and has monolithic jambs and lintel. Antrim was the scene of a royalist victory over the Irish insurgents, June 7, 1798. Population, about 2,000.

Antuco (än-tö'kö). A small place in Biobio, Chile, about lat. 37° 30' S. From it one of the chief passes (6,890 feet high) over the Andes leads to the Argentine Republic.

Antwerpen (ant'wërp). [Flem. Antwerpen, G. Antwerpen, F. Anvers, Sp. Amberes.] A province of Belgium, bounded by the Netherlands on the north, by Limburg on the east, by Brabant on the south, and by East Flanders on the west. The chief cities are Antwerp and Mechlin. Area, 1,093 square miles. Population (1893), 739,889, principally Flemish.

Antwerp. A seaport of Belgium, and the capital of the province of Antwerp, situated on the Schelde 60 miles from the North Sea, in lat. 51° 13' N., long. 4° 24' E. It is the chief commercial city of Belgium and one of the principal seaports of Europe, and also a strong fortress. It has extensive quays and docks, and is the terminus of the Red Star Steamship Line to New York, and of other steamship lines. The city was founded by the 7th century, and its most flourishing period was from the 14th to the 16th century. It suffered severely from the Inquisition, the "Spanish Fury" of 1576, and the "French Fury" of 1583. It was besieged by the Duke of Parma in 1584 and taken in 1585. The town was occupied by the French in 1794, and was recovered from France in 1814. The citadel was taken, after a siege, by the French under Gérard from the Dutch under Chassé in 1832. The cathedral of Antwerp is the most important church in the Low Countries. It was begun in 1352, and finished early in the 16th century. The exterior is marked by the graceful north tower and spire of the west front, 402 feet high. The south tower is incomplete. Over the crossing is a curious pyramidal stepped erection with a pointed bulbous top; to expose this to view the roofs of nave, choir, and transepts terminate at the quadrangle of the crossing, which produces a strange effect. The windows are very large and richly traceried, but the general impression is bare. The simple interior is highly impressive, with admirable perspectives. It contains Rubens's famous paintings, the "Descent from the Cross," the "Elevation of the Cross," and the "Assumption." The dimensions are 384 by 471 feet, length of transepts 222, height of vaulting 130. The Musée Plantin-Morétus is a unique collection of everything pertaining to the early days of printing and to its later development in the house of the noted printer Plantin, who opened his office in 1555. The house itself is a highly interesting example of a Renaissance dwelling of the better burgher class, with its old furniture, tapestries, and ornaments, combined with business offices. It is built around a quaint court. The old printing-office, the proprietor's office, and the salesroom are preserved complete. Among the ninety portraits in the house are fourteen by Rubens and two by Van Dyck. Population (1893), 240,343.

Anu (ä-nö). In Hindu mythology, a son of King Yayati and Sarnisitha. When the curse of old age and infirmity was pronounced upon Yayati by Sukra, the father of his wife Devayani, Sukra consented to transfer it to any one of Yayati's five sons who would consent to bear it. Anu was one of the four who refused, and in consequence was cursed by his father, the curse being that his posterity should not possess dominion—a curse apparently not fulfilled.

Anu (ä-nö). The supreme god of the Assyro-Babylonian pantheon. He was especially the god of heaven, and his consort Antu the "mother of the gods." His ancient seat of worship was in Uruk and later in Ur. In the time of the Assyrian ascendancy his cult fell into the background, though theoretically he maintained the first place in the hierarchy of the Assyro-Babylonian divinities.

Anubis (a-nü'bis). [Gr. Ἄνουβις.] In Egyptian mythology, the son of Osiris: often identified by the Greeks with Hermes. He is represented with a jackal's head, and was the ruler of graves and supervisor of the burial of the dead.

Anukis (ä-nö'kis). In Egyptian mythology, a goddess personifying the lower hemisphere: the same as Anki.

Anunaki (ä-nö-nä'ki). In Assyro-Babylonian mythology, the spirits of the earth. With the Igigi, spirits of heaven, they constitute the "host of heaven and earth," subordinate to the higher gods, especially to Anu, the supreme god of heaven.

Anupshuhar (ä-nöp-shö'här). A town in the Northwestern Provinces, British India, situated on the Ganges 70 miles southeast of Delhi.

Anuradhpura (ä-nö-radh-pö'rä). A sacred city of northern Ceylon, 60 miles west of Trincomalee.

Anville (on-vël'), Jean Baptiste Bourguignon d'. Born at Paris, July 11, 1697; died at Paris, Jan. 28, 1782. A French geographer and cartographer. He was the author of "Atlas général" (1737-80), "États formés en Europe" (1771), etc.

Anwar-i-Suhail (än-wär'ö-sü-hil'). [Pers., 'Lights of Canopus.] The Persian version of the so-called "Fables of Bidpai or Pilpay," made about 1494 A. D. by Husain Waiz al-Kashifi. It is a simplified recast of that by Nasr Allah of Ghazni, made about 1130 from the Arabic Kalilah and Dimnah of Abdallah ibn al-Mogaffa, which in turn was made from the Pahlavi version by Barzoi of the Indian original, from which the Sanskrit Panchatantra and Itihasadesha were derived. The star Canopus is taken as representing wisdom.

Anything for a Quiet Life. A play by Thomas Middleton, printed in 1662.

Anzasca (än-tsis'kä). Val d'. A picturesque Alpine valley in the province of Novara, Italy, east of Monte Rosa.

Anzin (än-zän'). A town in the department of Nord, France, 3 miles west of Valenciennes, the center of a coal-mining region. Population (1891), commune, 11,538.

Anzio, Porto d'. See Antium.

Aogemadaeca. A Parsi tract inculcating resignation to death; so called from its initial Avesta word aogemaidē, 'we come.' It has the appearance of an Avesta text with Pahlavi translation and commentary.

Aomori Bay (ä-ö-mö'ri bā'). A large bay at the northern extremity of the main island of Japan.

Aonia (ä-ö-ni-ä). [Gr. Ἀωνία.] In ancient geography, a district in Bœotia, Greece. The name is often used as synonymous with Bœotia.

Aornus (ä-ör'nus). [Gr. Ἀορνός.] In ancient geography, a rock stronghold, situated near the Indus (near the river Kabul?), taken by Alexander the Great from native defenders 327 B. C.

Aosta (ä-ös'tä). [F. Aoste.] A town in the province of Turin, Italy, situated on the Dora Baltea in lat. 45° 45' N., long. 7° 20' E., at the terminus of the Great St. Bernard and Little St. Bernard routes; the Roman Augusta Prætoria. It was the ancient capital of the Salassi, and became a Roman colony under Augustus. It has a cathedral and important Roman antiquities. The cathedral is of the 11th century, with later medieval and modern restorations. There are two imposing towers at the sides of the apse, and several interesting tombs in the plain interior. The Pretorian Gate (porta della Trinità) of the ancient Roman walls survives in fair condition. There are three arched passages: that in the middle is 27 feet wide, those on the sides 74. The space between the two faces is nearly 40 feet. The arches are surmounted by a frieze and a range of corbels. There is also a Roman triumphal arch, an interesting and well-preserved monument. It is 84 feet wide and 65 high, with a single arch 28 feet high between coupled unfluted Corinthian columns. The arch has a Doric entablature, with triglyphs at the angles. The attic is destroyed. Population, about 5,000.

Aosta, Duke of. A title of Amadeus, king of Spain.

Aosta, Valley of. The upper valley of the Dora Baltea in northwestern Italy.

Apaches (ä-pä'cház). [From the Cuchan and Maricopa c'pach, man, here applied in the sense of 'enemy.'] A people of the southern division of the Athapascan stock of North American Indians. In 1568 they occupied northwestern New Mexico, and between that date and 1629 roamed over the upper Gila drainage-area in southwestern New Mexico. In 1799 their range was from central Texas nearly to Colorado River, Arizona, and they have subsequently extended their raids as far south as Durango, Mexico. The names by which the principal Apache tribes and subtribes have been known to history are Arivajpa, Chiricahui, Coyotero, Faraone, Gileño, Jicarillo, Lipan, Lanero, Mesquero, Mimbreno, Mogollon, Naisha, Pinal Coyotero, Tehikun, and Teheishi. The Apaches are now on reservations in Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma, and number about 6,200. See Athapascan.

Apafi. See Abaji.

Apalacha. See Apalachi.

Apalache. See Apalachi.

Apalachi (äp-ä-lä'chä), or Apalache (-che), or Apalacha (-chä). A tribe of North American Indians, known since 1526, formerly dwelling in and around St. Mark's River, Florida, and northward to the Appalachian range. In 1688 the towns of the tribe or division were mentioned in a petition to Charles II. of Spain. About 1702 they were broken up and scattered, and are now extinct or absorbed. Also Apalachee. See Muskogean.

Apamea (ap-ä-mö'ä). [Gr. Ἀπάμεια.] In ancient geography, a city in Phrygia, Asia Minor, in (about) lat. 38° 3' N., long. 29° 55' E.: the modern Dinair or Denair.

Apamea. In ancient geography, a city in Syria, situated on the Orontes 50 miles southeast of Antioch: the medieval Famieh, and the modern Qal'at el Mudig, originally called Pharnake.

Apappus (a-pap'pus). See the extract.

At Assuan, at El-Kab, at Kasr-es-Syed, at Sheik Said, at Zawit-el-Meitin, at Sakkarah, and at Sin the name of Apappus frequently appears; and it may also be seen sculptured on the rocks at Wady Magharah, and at Hammamat, a station on the road between Kench and Kossef. The name Apappus signifies, in Egyptian, a giant, and this may be the basis of a tradition which describes him as being nine cubits high, and also says that he reigned a hundred years. Mariette, Outlines, p. 11.

Apastamba (ä-pas-tam'blä). The author of Sutras connected with the Black Yajurveda and of a Dharmashastra. To him or his school are ascribed two recensions of the Taaittiriya-samhita.

Apaturia (ap-ä-tü'ri-ä). [Gr. Ἀπατούρια.] In Greek antiquity, the solemn annual meeting of the phratries for the purpose of registering the children of the preceding year whose birth entitled them to citizenship. It took place in the month Pyanepsion (November), and lasted three days. The registration took place on the third day.

Apava (ä'pa-vü). In the Brahmapurana and the Hariwansa, Apava performed the office of the creator Brahma, and divided himself into two parts, male and female. These produced Vishnu, who created Viraj, who brought into the world the first man.

Apeldoorn (ä'pel-dörn). A small town in the province of Gelderland, Netherlands, situated on the Grift and Dieren Canal 17 miles north of Arnhem. Near it is the castle of Loo.

Apellas (a-pel'as). [Gr. Ἀπέλλος.] Lived about 400 B. C. A Greek sculptor.

Apelles (a-pel'ez). [Gr. Ἀπέλλης.] A famous Greek painter of the time of Philip and Alexander. Three cities claimed to be his birthplace, Colophon, Ephesus, and Cos. He was a pupil first of an otherwise unknown Ephoros, and later of the famous Pamphilos of Sikyone. In him there was that blending of Doric and Ionic elements to which the best results of Greek civilization may generally be traced. His greatest work, and perhaps the most perfect picture of antiquity, was the Aphrodite Andromene, originally painted for the temple of Æsculapius in Cos. It was afterward bought by Augustus for 100 talents and placed in the temple of Caesar in Rome. In Nero's time the nearly ruined picture was copied by Pantheus. Apelles's model was supposed to have been Pantheus, the mistress of Alexander, or Phryne. From some expressions in an obscure text it has been supposed to have been a half-length figure, and the subject was painted by Titian in this way in the Bridgewater picture.

Apelt (ä'pelt), Ernst Friedrich. Born at Reichenau, Saxony, March 3, 1812; died at Jena, Oct. 27, 1859. A German philosophical writer, professor of philosophy at Jena. He was the author of "Epochen der Geschichte der Menschheit" (1845, 2d ed. 1852), "Theorie der Induktion" (1854; "Religionsphilosophie" (1860), etc.

Apemantus (ap-e-man'tus). In Shakspeare's "Timon of Athens," a cynical and churlish philosopher.

Diogenes, in Lily's "Alexander and Campaspe," sat to the poet for Timon's contrast, the cynic Apemantus; the quick striking epigrammatic answers to questions which seem to be inserted here and there too much for the sake of eliciting witty replies, are quite on this model. The description of this antique fool is so perfect in its way that it is supposed Shakspeare must have seen the short sketch of a cynic which in Lucian's "Public Sale of Philosophers" is put into the mouth of Diogenes.

Gervinus, Shakspeare Commentaries (tr. by F. E. Bunnett, ed. 1880), p. 781.

Apennines (ap'e-ninz). [F. Apennins, It. Apennini, G. Apenninen, etc.; L. Apenninus or Apenninus.] The central mountain system of Italy. It forms the backbone of the peninsula and extends from the Ligurian Alps in the neighborhood of Savona south-eastward to the extremity of the peninsula. Its length is about 800 miles and its average height about 4,000 feet. The highest point is Monte Corno (9,585 feet), in the Gran Sasso d'Italia.

Apenrade (ä'pen-rä-de). A seaport in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, on the Apenrade Fjord 35 miles north of Schleswig. Population (1890), commune, 5,361.

Apepa (ä-pä'pä). A shepherd king of Egypt who ruled at Avaris (Zoan) about 1700 B. C.: probably the Aphobis of Manetho, and perhaps a contemporary of Joseph.

Apepi (ä-pä'pé). In Egyptian mythology, the great serpent, the embodiment of evil (Typhon).

Aper (ä'per), Aperiu (ä-per-ä'), Apurair (ä-pö-ä'ri). A name of an ancient people mentioned in the Egyptian records, and supposed by some to be the Hebrews, but probably an "Erythrean people in the east of the nome of Heliopolis, in what is known as the 'red country' or the 'red mountain'" (Brugsch).

Apfelstedt (äp'fel-stet). A small river in Thuringia which joins the Gera south of Erfurt.

Aphobis. See Apepa.

Aphraates (af-rä'téz). Jacob. Lived in the 4th century. One of the fathers of the Syrian Church, surnamed "The Persian Sage." After his conversion he lived in Edessa and later in Antioch. He was an opponent of Arianism, and is the author of a collection of homilies.

Aphrodisias (af-rö-dis'ias). [Gr. Ἀφροδιᾶς.] An ancient town of Caria, situated on the Menander; the modern Ghera. It contains the remains of an ancient hippodrome which coincide on one side with the city walls. Both ends are semicircular. The length is 919 feet, the breadth 270; the arena is 747 by 98 feet. There are 26 tiers of seats, divided into sections by flights of steps and bordered above by an arched gallery. There is also a Roman temple of Venus, which is comparatively well preserved. It is Ionic, octastyle, pseudodipteral, with 15 columns on the flanks, in plan 60 by 119 feet. The peristyle columns are 35½ feet high.

Aphrodite (af-rö-dī'té). [Gr. Ἀφροδίτη, associated by popular etym. with ἄφρος, foam, as if 'foam-born' (cf. Anadyomene.)] In Greek mythology, the goddess of love and wedlock, according to one legend daughter of Zeus (Jupiter) and Dione, according to another risen from the foam of the sea at Cyprus, whence she is called Kypris. Many scholars give her an Asiatic origin and connect her with the Phœnician Astarte (Assyro-Babylonian Ishtar) who corresponds to her. She was originally conceived as a power of nature, and later specifically as the deity of reproduction and love. She sometimes appears as the wife of Hephestus (Vulcan), and in her train are her son Eros (Amor) and the Graces. The chief seats of her worship were Paphos, Amathus, and Idalion on the island of Cyprus, Cnidus in Asia Minor, Corinth, and Eryx in Sicily. Among plants the myrtle, rose, and apple were especially sacred to her; among animals the ram, leopard, dove, and swan. Of her representations in art the most famous are the replica of her statue of Cnidus by Praxiteles in the Glyptothek of Munich, the original statues of Melos in the Louvre, of Capua at Naples, the Medicean in Florence, and the Capitoline in Rome. The Romans identified Aphrodite with Venus, who was originally a Latin goddess of spring.

Aphrodite, Temple of. See Egina (Greece).

Aphroditopolis (af-rö-dī-top'ö-lis). [Gr. Ἀφροδιτοπολίς, 'city of Aphrodite.'] The name of several cities in ancient Egypt.

Aphthartodocetæ (af-thär-tö-dö-sö'té). [MGr. Ἀφθαρτοδοκῆται, from Gr. ἀθάρατος, incorruptible, and δοκῆν, teach.] A Monophysite sect which existed from the 6th to the 9th century or later. They held that the body of Christ was incorruptible even before the resurrection, and that he suffered death only in a phantasmal appearance. From this they are sometimes called Phantasiasts, a name more properly belonging to the Docetæ, who denied even the reality of Christ's body.

Aphthonius (af-thō'ni-us), Ælius Festus. Lived about 300 A. D. A Greek rhetorician. He was the author of four books "de metris," which Marius Victorinus, about the middle of the 4th century, incorporated in his system of grammar.

Apia (ā'pi-ā). An old name of the Peloponnesus.

Apia (ā'pē-ā). A municipality and seaport, chief town of Upolu, Samoan Islands, situated in lat. 13° 49' S., long. 171° 48' W. It is the center of German commerce in the western Pacific, and is under the supervision of the German, British, and American consuls. On March 15, 1889, a hurricane visited the harbor of Apia, destroying the American men-of-war Vandalia and Trenton, and the German men-of-war Adler and Eber, with several merchant vessels. The American Nipsic and the German Olga were beached. Many lives were lost.

Apicás (āp-ē-ā-kās'). The name of two Indian tribes of Brazil. (1) A horde of the Tupi race which, in historical times, has lived on the Upper Tapajós and Arinos; they are an agricultural people, and skilful canoe-men; now reduced to a few thousand. (2) A small tribe on the Tocantins, which, by its language, appears to be allied to the Caribs.

Apianus (ā-pē-ā-nōs), Petrus: Latinized from his German name, Peter Bienewitz (G. biene, L. apis, a bee). Born at Leysnick, 1495; died there, April 21, 1552. A German mathematician and cosmographer. He was professor of mathematics at Ingolstadt, and was created by Charles V. a knight of the German Empire. He wrote an astronomical work, but is best known for his volumes on cosmography, which contain some of the earliest maps of America.

Apicata (ap-i-kā'tā). In Ben Jonson's play "The Fall of Sejanus," the wife of Sejanus, who put her away for Livia.

Apician (a-pish'ian), Marcus Gabius. A famous Roman epicure who lived during the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. Having, it was said, spent one hundred million sesterces (about $3,600,000) in procuring and inventing rare dishes, he balanced his accounts and found that he had only ten million sesterces ($360,000) left. Unwilling to starve on such a pittance, he destroyed himself.

Apinji (ā-pēn'jō). A small Bantu tribe of the French Congo, between the Ba-Kele and the Ashango.

Apion (ā'pi-on). [Gr. Ἀπίων.] A Greek grammarian and commentator on Homer, who flourished about the middle of the 1st century A. D.

Apis (ā'pis). [Gr. Ἄπης, Egypt. Hapi, the hidden one.] The Bull of Memphis, worshipped by the ancient Egyptians. He was supposed to be the image of the soul of Osiris, and was the sacred emblem of that god. Sometimes he is figured as a man with a bull's head. "There were many signs necessary for an Apis; . . . for instance, spots in the shape of a triangle on the forehead, and a half-moon on the breast. If such an Apis was discovered, it was led with rejoicings into Memphis, it was carefully tended, and after its death was buried with great costliness. He was zealously worshipped and gave oracles. He was looked on as the second life, or the son of Ptah, the soul or image of Osiris, born of a virgin cow. After his death he became Osiris-Apis or Serapis." La Sauvage, Science of Religion (trans.), p. 405.

Apo (ā'pō). A volcano in the central part of Mindanao, Philippines, over 10,000 feet high.

Apocalypse, The. See Revelation.

Apocrypha (ā-pok'ri-fā), The. [LL. apocrypha, neut. pl. (se. scripta) of apocryphus, from Gr. ἀποκρύφω (neut. pl. ἀπόκρυφα, se. γράφω or βιβλία), hidden, concealed, obscure, recalcitrant, hard to understand; in eccles. use, of writings, anonymous, of unknown or undetermined authorship or authority, unrecognized, uncanonical, spurious, pseudo; from ἀποκρύπτειν, hide away, conceal, obscure, from ἀπό, away, and κρύπτειν, hide, conceal.] A collection of fourteen books subjoined to the canonical books of the Old Testament in the authorized version of the Bible, as originally issued, but now generally omitted. They do not exist in the Hebrew Bible, but are found with others of the same character scattered through the Septuagint and Vulgate versions of the Old Testament. They are: First and Second Esdras (otherwise Third and Fourth Esdras or Ezra, reckoning Nehemiah as Second Ezra or Esdras), Tobit or Tobias, Judith, the Rest of Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch (as joined to Jeremiah), parts of Daniel (namely, Song of the Three Children, the History of Susanna, the Destruction of Bel and the Dragon), the Prayer of Manasses, and First and Second Maccabees. Most of these are recognized by the Roman Catholic Church as fully canonical, though theologians of that church often distinguish them as deuterocanonical, on the ground that their place in the canon was decided later than that of the other books, limiting the name Apocrypha to the two (last) books of Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses, and other books not in the above collection, namely, Third and Fourth Maccabees, a book of Enoch, an additional or 151st Psalm of David, and eighteen Psalms of Solomon. With these sometimes are included certain pseudographic books, such as the Apocalypse of Baruch and the Assumption of Moses. The name Apocrypha is also occasionally made to embrace the Antilegomena of the New Testament. The Greek Church makes no distinction among the books contained in the Septuagint.

Apodaca (ā-pō-dā'kā), Juan Ruiz de. Born at Cadiz, Feb. 3, 1754; died at Madrid, Jan. 11, 1835. A Spanish naval officer and administrator, ambassador to England 1808, captain-general of Cuba 1812-16, and viceroy of New Spain (Mexico), Aug., 1816, to Aug., 1822. By energy combined with a spirit of conciliation, he in a great measure repressed the revolutionists, defeating Mina, who was captured and executed (Nov., 1817), and driving Vicente Guerrero to the mountains. When Iturbide rebelled (1821) the viceroy was obliged to temporize, and the insurgents had gained important successes before he left. For this reason he is surnamed "the Unfortunate."

Apolda (ā-pōl'dā). A town in the grand duchy of Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, 9 miles northeast of Weimar. It has manufactures of hosiery, woolen goods, machinery, dyes, bells, etc. Population (1890), 20,880.

Apollinare in Classe (ā-pol-lē-nā're in clās'se), San. [See Classis.] A church at Ravenna, Italy, begun in 534, the most important existing early-Christian basilica in Italy. In plan it is 93 feet by 173, measuring inside, with nave and aisles separated by 24 gray marble columns with round arches, and a raised semicircular tribune. There is a clearstory of double round-arched windows, and the wooden roofs are open. The narthex, now walled up, originally had open arcades. Nave and aisles have painted medallion-friezes of busts of the bishops and archbishops of Ravenna. The vault and walls of the tribune are covered with splendid mosaics of the 6th and 7th centuries. The picturesque circular campanile is of brick, 120 feet high, with many round-arched windows.

Apollinare Nuovo (ā-pol-lē-nā're nō-ō'vō), San. A church at Ravenna, Italy, built by Theodoric in the 6th century. In plan it is 115 by 315 feet, with a single raised apse (bema), and a handsome narthex with a portico. The nave, 51 feet wide, with fine coffered ceiling, has 24 columns brought from Constantinople; the Corinthian capitals are surmounted by heavy Byzantine abaci. Above the arcades of the nave the walls are covered with very beautiful 6th-century mosaics.

Apollinarians (ā-pol-i-nā'ri-anz). A religious sect deriving their name from Apollinaris the Younger, bishop of Laodicea in the 4th century. Apollinaris denied the proper humanity of Christ, attributing to him a human body and a human soul, or vital principle, but teaching that the Divine Reason, or Logos, took in him the place which in man is occupied by the rational principle.

Apollinaris (ā-pol-i-nā'ris), Saint. See the extract.

The mythical founder-bishop of the Church of Ravenna was Saint Apollinaris, a citizen of Antioch, well versed in Greek and Latin literature, who, we are told, followed Peter to Rome, was ordained there by that Apostle, and eventually was commissioned by him to preach the Gospel at Ravenna. Before his departure, however, he had once passed a night in St. Peter's company at the monastery known by the name of the Elm ("ad Ulmum"). They had slept upon the bare rock, and the indentations made by their heads, their backs, and their legs were still shown in the 9th century.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 444.

Apollinaris, surnamed "The Younger." Died about 390. Bishop of Laodicea, and founder of the sect of the Apollinarians.

Apollinaris Fountain (ā-pol-i-nā'ris foun'tān). A mineral spring near Neuenahr, 25 miles northwest of Coblenz, Prussia, discovered in 1853. Its waters are largely exported.

Apollinaris Sidonius. See Sidonius, Apollinaris.

Apollino (ā-pol-lē-nō). A statue in the tribune of the Uffizi, Florence. It is an antique copy from a Greek original, probably of the 4th century B. C., representing an effeminate type of the youthful Apollo standing easily and gracefully.

Apollinopolis Magna (ā-pol-i-nop'ō-lis mag'nā). An ancient city of Egypt, near Edfu. See Edfu.

Apollo (ā-pol'ō). [Gr. Ἀπόλλων, Doric Ἀπέλλων; associated in popular etym. with ἀπολλύναι, destroy, to which notion some of his attributes are due; prob. of Eastern origin. See quotations.] In Greek and later in Roman mythology, one of the great Olympian gods, the son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Leto (Latona), representing the light- and life-giving influence, as well as the deadly power, of the sun, and often identified with the sun-god Helios. He was the leader of the Muses, god of music, poetry, and healing, and patron of these arts; a mighty protector from evil, all-seeing, and hence the master of prophecy; also the destroyer of the unjust and insolent, and ruler of pestilence. In art he was represented in the full majesty of youthful manhood, in most of his attributions unclothed or but lightly draped, and usually characterized by the bow and arrows, the laurel, the lyre, the oracular tripod, the serpent, or the dolphin. He was the father of Æsculapius, to whom he granted his art of healing. Apollo was honored, both locally and generally, under many special titles, of which each had its particular type in art and literature: as, Apollo Citharædus (Apollo who sings to the accompaniment of the lyre), equivalent to Apollo Musagetes, the conductor of the Muses; Apollo Sarcoctonos (the lizard-killer), etc.

The oldest epigraphic form of the name of Apollo is Aplu, which corresponds to the Semitic Ablu, the "son" of heaven, which was one of the titles of Tammuz the Syrian sun-god. Taylor, Aryans, p. 304.

Beyond the boundaries of the Allobroges, the Gallic Apolo appears to have been known all over the Celtic world, and he bore several names, of which the most important were Maponos, Gramos, and Toutiorix. Three inscriptions in honour of Apollo Maponos have been discovered in the north of England, and in one of them, found near Ainstable, in Cumberland, he is called Deus Maponos, without any allusion to Apollo. Fortunately the name Maponos offers no difficulty; it is the same word as the old Welsh mapon, now maibon, 'boy or male child,' which occurs, for example, in a Welsh poem in the Book of Taliessin, a manuscript of the 13th century; it is there applied to the infant Jesus, in a passage describing the coming of the Magi to him at Bethlehem. Thus it seems certain that some of the Celts worshipped an Apollo whom they described as an infant, and this is borne out by a group of inscriptions at the other extremity of the Celtic world of antiquity: I allude to the ancient province of Dacia, and especially Carlsburg and its neighbourhood, in Transylvania, where we find him styled Deus Bonus Puer Posphorus, Apollo Pythius, Bonus Puer Posphorus, or Bonus Deus Puer Posphorus. Our Maponos is in all probability the Bonus Puer attested by these inscriptions. Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 22.

Apollo Belvedere (ā-pol'ō bel-vā-dā're). A famous statue in the Vatican, Rome. It is a fine antique copy of a Greek original in bronze—possibly an offering set up at Delphi (it may be in connection with the Diana of Versailles, in the Louvre), in commemoration of the divine aid which (by a natural convulsion) repelled the Gallic hordes from the Delphic sanctuary in 279 B. C. The god stands as a vigorous youth, undraped except for a chlamys clasped round the neck and thrown over the extended left arm, apparently having just discharged an arrow whose flight he watches. The theory that the left hand held an ægis is not supported.

Apollo Chresterios (ā-pol'ō kres-tē'ri-os). [Gr. Ἀπόλλων χρηστήριος.] Apollo of oracles.

Apollo Citharædus (ā-pol'ō sith-ā-rē'dus). [Gr. κithαρῳδός, one who plays on the cithara, a harper.] 1. A statue in the Vatican, Rome. The god, strongly feminine in type, advances laurel-crowned and draped in long tunic and himation, as he touches the strings of his lyre. An attempt has been made to connect this statue with Nero's musical successes in Greece.

2. A notable antique marble statue in the Glyptothek, Munich. The figure is shrouded in full draperies of feminine type, including the long tunic with diplois. The lyre is held high against the left shoulder. The head is of late character.

Apollo Club. A famous club held in the 17th century at the Devil Tavern near Temple Bar. It was frequented by Ben Jonson, Randolph, Herrick, and others.

Apollo of Tenea. An archaic Greek statue in the Glyptothek at Munich, probably representing not Apollo but an athlete. It is important in sculpture as representing a type in a class, unknown until late years, of early Greek undraped statues characterized by the awkwardness of artistic infancy.

Apollo of Thera (thē'riā). A statue of Apollo in the National Museum, Athens, a typical example of youthful manhood in Greek archaic sculpture. The figure is undraped.

Apollo Sauroctonos (ā-pol'ō sā-rok'tō-nos). [Gr. σαυροκτόνος, the lizard-slayer.] A statue in the Vatican, Rome. The god is represented as a beautiful youth, undraped, graceful, and feminine, about to transfix with a dart a lizard (a method of divination) which ascends a tree-trunk on which he leans. It is a reproduction of a work in bronze by Praxiteles.

Apollo Slaying the Python. A noted painting by Turner, in the National Gallery, London.

Apollodorus (ā-pol'ō-dō'rus). [Gr. Ἀπολλόδοτος.] Born at Athens; flourished about 404 B. C.

The first of the great school of Greek painters, an elder contemporary of Zeuxis and Parrhasius. Pliny mentions a priest in adoration and an Ajax struck by lightning by this master. He seems to have been the first important painter to abandon the old schematic arrangements for the actual relations of nature. This was undoubtedly due to the discovery of perspective associated with the scene-painter Agatharchus and the philosophers Democritus and Anaxagoras.

In a word, they [the Egyptians] discovered the laws of chiaroscuro, and with them the art of foreshortening, which is, in fact, perspective applied to the human figure. Greek tradition ascribes these great discoveries to an Athenian named Apollodorus, who flourished about four hundred and thirty years before our era. Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 94.

Apollodorus. Born at Carystos, Eubœa; lived about 300-260 B. C. A Greek comic poet of the new Attic comedy. "He is remarkable as having afforded Terence the models of two plays, the 'Hecyra' and 'Phormio'."

Apollodorus. Lived about 140 B. C. An Athenian grammarian, author of an (extant) "Bibliotheca," an important work on Greek mythology.

Apollodorus. Born at Damascus; died in the reign of Hadrian (117-138). An architect, the designer of the Forum and Column of Trajan at Rome, and of the stone bridge over the Danube about 105 A. D. He was banished and put to death by Hadrian.

Apollonia (ap-ō-lō'ni-ā). [Gr. Ἀπολλωνία, from Ἀπόλλων, Apollo.] In ancient geography, a city of Illyria, situated near the mouth of the Aous in lat. 40° 40' N., long. 19° 25' E.

Apollonia. In ancient geography, the port of Cyrene, Africa, in lat. 32° 56' N., long. 22° E.: the modern Marsa Susa.

Apollonia. In ancient geography, a town in Palestine, situated on the Mediterranean between Joppa and Cæsarea: the modern Arsuf.

Apollonia. In ancient geography, a city of Thrace, situated on the Black Sea in lat. 42° 26' N., long. 27° 44' E.: the modern Sizoboli.

Apollonia. A station on the British Gold Coast, West Africa.

Apollonius (ap-o-lō'ni-us). [Gr. Ἀπολλώνιος.] Lived in the time of Augustus. A noted Alexandrian grammarian, author of a "Homerice Lexicon" (ed. by Bekker 1833).

Apollonius, surnamed Dyscolus. [Gr. δῦσκολος, ill-tempered.] Born at Alexandria: flourished during the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius. A celebrated Alexandrian grammarian. Only a few of his numerous works are extant; that "On Syntax" (ed. by Bekker 1817) is the most famous. He and his son, Ælius Herodian, are called by Priscian the greatest of grammarians. He is said to have lived in extreme poverty.

Apollonius, surnamed Molon. Born at Alabanda, Caria: lived about 80 B. C. A Greek rhetorician, an instructor of Cicero and Cæsar.

Apollonius, surnamed Pergæus (from his birth-place). Born at Perga, Pamphylia, Asia Minor: lived in the second half of the 3d century B. C. A Greek geometer educated at Alexandria, surnamed "The Great Geometer." His chief work is a treatise on "Conic Sections" (ed. by Halley 1710) in eight books, of which the first four are extant in Greek and all but the eighth in Arabic.

Apollonius, surnamed Rhodium ('of Rhodes'). Born at Alexandria or at Naucratis, about 235 B. C. A Greek epic poet, author of the "Argonautica." Being unsuccessful in Alexandria, he went to Rhodes (whence his surname) where he lectured on rhetoric, but later returned to the former city.

Apollonius. Born at Tralles, Caria: flourished, probably, at the beginning of the 1st century A. D. A Greek sculptor who, with his brother, carved the so-called Farnese Bull (which see).

Apollonius, surnamed Tyanæus (from his birth-place). Born at Tiana, Cappadocia, Asia Minor, about 4 B. C.: died about 97 (?) A. D. A Pythagorean philosopher and reputed magician and wonder-worker, whose life and supposed miracles have often been compared with those of Christ. "He studied first in the Greek schools at Tarsus, and was led to the adoption of the Pythagorean philosophy. This he combined with the legerdemain practised in some of the Asclepeia, and a journey to the old seats of magic in Babylonia and Persia, and to the confines of India, initiated him into the theurgic practices of the East." His life by Philostratus, which is largely, if not wholly, fabulous (and which was doubtless written for a controversial purpose), presents striking similarities with that of Jesus. Divine honors were paid to him in the 3d century, and his bust was placed by Alexander Severus in his lararium with those of Abraham, Orpheus, and Christ.

Apollonius of Tyre. 1. A Stoic philosopher living in the reign of Ptolemy Auletes, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius as the author of a work on Zeno, and by Strabo as the author of another work which seems to have been a résumé of the philosophers and their writings from the time of Zeno.—2. The king of Tyre, in the romance named for him (which see).

Apollonius of Tyre, History of. An old Greek romance of uncertain date and authorship. Antiochus, king of Syria, to prevent his daughter's marriage, demands of her suitors, as the price of her hand, the solution of a riddle containing an allusion to his incestuous passion for her. This is accomplished by Apollonius of Tyre, whom Antiochus then seeks to slay. Apollonius escapes, marries the daughter of another king, and returns to take the sovereignty of Syria. The rest of the tale is occupied with the adventures of his daughter and wife.

Besides the Latin prose version already mentioned, the romance, or history, of Apollonius (of Tyre) was translated into Latin verse about the end of the twelfth century, by Godfrey of Viterbo, who introduced it in his Pantheon, or Universal Chronicle, as part of the history of Antiochus the Third of Syria. It was also inserted in the Gesta Romanorum which was written in the fourteenth century, and became soon after the subject of a French prose romance, which was the origin of the English Kyng Apolnye of Tyre, printed by Wynkin de Worde in 1510. It was from the metrical version, however, of Godfrey of Viterbo that the story came to Gower, who has told it with little variation in his Confessio Amantis. Gower is introduced as speaking the prologue to each of the five acts of Pericles, Prince of Tyre; whence it may be presumed that the author of that play derived his plot from the English poet. The drama of Pericles, as is well known, has been the subject of much discussion; the composition of the whole, or greater part, of it having been attributed to Shakspeare by some of his commentators, chiefly on the authority of Dryden.

Duntlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 81.

Apollo (a-pol'os). [Gr. Ἀπόλλων, a shortened form of Ἀπολλώνιος.] Flourished about the middle of the 1st century A. D. An Alexandrian Jew who came to Ephesus about 49 A. D., where he was converted by Aquila and Priscilla. He went to meet Paul at Corinth, and was with Paul at Ephesus when the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written. He was a man of great ability and attainments, and the attachment of his immediate disciples to him was such as almost to create a schism in the church.

Apollyon (a-pol'ion). [Gr. Ἀπολλίων, rendering the Heb. Abaddon; prop. adj. ἀπολλίων, destroying.] The angel of the bottomless pit mentioned in Rev. ix. 11. He is introduced by Bunyan in the "Pilgrim's Progress," and has a terrible combat with the pilgrim Christian.

Apologia Socratis. See Apology of Socrates.

Apologie for Poetrie. A work by Sir Philip Sidney, written in 1580 or 1581, published in 1595 after his death. It is a plea for the poet's art. Also Defence of Poetrie.

Apology for Actors, An. A work in three books by Thomas Heywood, published in 1612, and reprinted in 1658 by William Cartwright, with some alterations, under the title of "The Actors' Vindication."

Apology of Socrates. Plato's version of the defense of Socrates before his judges. (See Socrates.) A similar work attributed to Xenophon is spurious.

Apopi. See Apici.

Apostate (a-pos'tāt), The. A surname of the Roman emperor Julian.

Apostate, The. A tragedy by Richard Lalor Sheil, produced in 1817. Junius Brutus Booth was celebrated as Pescara in this play.

Apostle Islands (a-pos'i-l'landz). A group of islands in the southwestern part of Lake Superior, belonging to Wisconsin.

Apostle of Andalusia, The. Juan de Avila.

Apostle of Ardennes, The. St. Hubert.

Apostle of Brazil, The. The Jesuit José de Anchieta.

Apostle of Free Trade, The. Richard Cobden.

Apostle of Germany, The. St. Boniface

Apostle of Infidelity, The. Voltaire.

Apostle of Ireland, The. St. Patrick.

Apostle of Peru, The. The Jesuit Alonso de Barceña.

Apostle of Temperance, The. Theobald Mathew.

Apostle of the English, The. Augustine the missionary to England.

Apostle of the French, The. St. Denis.

Apostle to the Friesians, The. St. Willibrod, missionary to Friesland.

Apostle of the Gauls, The. St. Ireneus.

Apostle of the Gentiles, The. St. Paul.

Apostle of the Highlanders, The. St. Columba.

Apostle of the Indians, The. John Eliot.

Apostle of the Indies, The. St. Francis Xavier.

Apostle of the Iroquois, The. F. Piquet.

Apostle of the North, The. 1. Ansgar.—2. Bernard Gilpin, an evangelist on the English border.

Apostle of the Peak, The. William Bagshaw, a preacher of Derbyshire.

Apostle of the Picts, The. St. Ninian.

Apostle of the Scots, The. John Knox.

Apostle of the Slavs, The. St. Cyril.

Apostles' Creed, The. A primitive creed of the Christian church, not of apostolic origin, but a product of the Western Church during the first four centuries, not now assignable to any individual author. It was originally a baptismal confession, and was intended to be a popular summary of apostolic teaching.

Apostolic Canons. Certain ordinances and regulations, usually reckoned as eighty-five in number, belonging to the first centuries of the Christian church, and incorrectly ascribed to the apostles.

Apostolic Constitutions. A collection of difficult instructions, relating to the duties of clergy and laity, to ecclesiastical discipline, and to ceremonies, divided into eight books. They profess to be the words of the apostles, written down by Clement of Rome, but are considerably later than apostolic times.

The first six books, which have a strong Jewish-Christian tone, are the original basis, and, according to recent investigations, were composed, with the exception of some later interpolations, at the end of the third century, in Syria (or Asia Minor). The seventh and eighth books, each of which, however, forms an independent piece, are later additions, and date from the beginning of the fourth century, at all events from a period before the Council of Nicea (325). The collection of the three parts into one whole may be the work of the author of the eighth book.

Schaff, History of the Christian Church, II. 185.

Apostolic Council, The. The first conference or synod of the Christian church. It was held at Jerusalem 50 (51?) A. D. by the churches of Jerusalem and Antioch to settle the personal relation between the Jewish and gentile apostles, to divide the field of labor between them, to decide the question of circumcision, and to define the relation between the Jewish and gentile Christians. Acts xv.

Apostolic Fathers, The. Those Christian writers who were contemporary with any of the apostles. They are Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, Hermas, and Papias.

Apostolics (ap-os-to'l'iks), or Apostolicals (ap-os-to'l'i-kalz). In Spanish history, a political party which supported the Catholic Church and absolute government. It dated from the restoration of the Bourbons, and lasted till about 1833, when it was absorbed by the Carlists.

Apostolus (ap-os-tō'li-us), Michael. [MGr. Ἀποστόλιος.] Died in Crete about 1480. A Greek scholar of Constantinople, who fled to Italy in 1453.

Apostool (ä-pos-tōl'). Samuel. Born 1638: died about the beginning of the 18th century. A Dutch anabaptist preacher at Amsterdam. He became involved in a dispute in 1662 with his colleague Hans Galenus, who maintained that Christianity is not so much a body of dogma as a practical life. The formation of two parties, Galenists and Apostoolians or Apostolists, resulted, which were reunited in 1801 under the name Mennoites.

Apotheosis of Augustus. The largest existing cameo, in the Cabinet des Médailles, Paris. It is of Roman workmanship, and is carved in a sardonyx nearly a foot across. There are 26 figures, among them Augustus, Æneas, Julius Cæsar, Tiberius, and Caligula.

Apotheosis of Venice. A masterpiece of Paolo Veronese, in the middle of the ceiling of the Sala del Maggior Consiglio of the ducal palace at Venice.

Apoxymenos (a-pok-si-om'e-nos). [Gr. ἀποξυμένως, scraping oneself (i. e. with the strigil).] The athlete with the strigil, a notable statue in the Vatican, Rome. It is an antique copy of a celebrated bronze of Lysippus, embodying that master's canon of the proportions of the human figure.

Appalachee Bay (ap-a-lach'ē bā). An arm of the Gulf of Mexico, on the western coast of Florida, about lat. 30° N., long. 84° 15' W.

Appalachee Indians. See Apalachi.

Appalachia (ap-a-lach'i-ā). A region of 4,500 square miles in area in the western part of Virginia, lying west of the valley of Virginia.

Appalachian Mountains (ap-a-lach'i-ān or ap-a-lā'eh-i-an moun'tainz). [Named from the Appalachee or Apalachi Indians.] A great mountain system in the eastern part of North America, which extends from the Gulf of St. Lawrence to northern Alabama: often, but less properly, called the Alleghany Mountains, from its chief division. The system comprises the mountains of Gaspé Peninsula (St. Anne Mountains, Shickshock Mountains), the White Mountains, the Green Mountains, the Hoosac Range, the Taconic Range, the Adirondacks, the Helderberg Mountains, the Catskills, the Shawangunk Mountains, the Blue Ridge, the Alleghenies proper, South Mountain, the Blue Mountains, the Laurel Hill and Chestnut Ridge ranges, the Black Mountains, the Stone Mountains, the Bald Mountains, the Cumberland Mountains, the Great Smoky Mountains, the Cuka Mountains, and some lesser groups. It contains large deposits of coal and iron. It is cut by the Connecticut, Hudson, Delaware, Susquehanna, Potomac, Kanawha, Tennessee, and other rivers. Its length is about 1,500 miles, and its greatest width (in Pennsylvania) about 150 miles. Its highest point is Mitchell's Peak, in North Carolina, which is 6,710 feet high.

Appalachicola (ap-a-lach-i-kō'lī). A river of western Florida, formed by the union of the Flint and Chattahoochee, which flows into St. George's Sound, Gulf of Mexico, in lat. 29° 45' N., long. 85° W. It is about 90 miles long and is navigable.

Appalachicola Bay. An arm of St. George's Sound, at the mouth of Appalachicola River.

Appiani (áp-pè-á-né). Andrea. Born at Milan, May 23, 1754; died at Milan, Nov. 8, 1817. A noted Italian fresco-painter.

Appian Way, L. Via Appia. The most famous of the ancient Roman highways. It ran from Rome to Brundisium (Brindisi), and is probably the first great Roman road which was formally undertaken as a public work. It was begun in 312 B. C. by Appius Claudius Cæcus, the censor, who carried it as far as Capua. The next stage of the work extended it to Beneventum, and it probably did not reach Brundisium until 244 B. C., when a Roman colony was inaugurated there. At present the Appian Way, for a long distance after it leaves Rome, forms one of the most notable memorials of antiquity in or near the Eternal City, bordered as it is by tombs and the ruins of monumental buildings. Long stretches of the pavement remain perfect, and show that the width of the roadway proper was only 15 feet.

Appiano (áp-pè-á-nó). An Italian family, rulers of Piombino from the 14th to the 17th century. Its founder was Jacopo I., lord of Pisa 1392-98.

Appius and Virginia (ap'i-us and vér-jin'i-á). A tragedy by Webster, printed in 1654. See Appius Claudius (under Claudius), and Virginia. The story, originally told by Livy, forms the first novel of the nineteenth day in the "Pecorone di Giovanni Fiorentino" published in 1378, and was reproduced in Painter's "Palace of Pleasure" (first ed. 1566) two centuries later. There is a version of it in the "Roman de la Rose," Chaucer tells it in "The Doctor's Tale," and Gower embodied it in his "Confessio Amantis." There was an earlier play, "The Tragical Comedy of Apius and Virginia," by an unknown author whose initials were R. B. It was probably acted as early as 1563, though not printed till 1575. John Dennis also wrote a tragedy with this name in 1700.

Appius Claudius. See Claudius.

Apricena (á-pré-chá-ná). A town in the province of Foggia, Italy, 25 miles north of Foggia. Population, about 5,000.

Apries (á-pri-éz). [Gr. Ἀπρίης, in LXX Οὐαφρή, Heb. Hophra, Egypt. Uahabra.] A king of Egypt, the Pharaoh Hophra of the Bible, who reigned about 590-570 B. C.

Nebuchadnezzar was still king of Babylon, while Apries had (in B. C. 588) succeeded his father, Psamatik II., as monarch of Egypt. The feud between the two powers was still raging, and Apries, about B. C. 570, determined on an invasion of Syria both by sea and land, with the object of aggrandizing his own country at the expense of the Babylonians. Herodotus tells us that his fleet engaged that of Tyre, while his land army attacked Sidon. Diodorus adds that he defeated the combined navies of Phœnicia and Cyprus in a great sea-fight, after which he took Sidon, and made himself master of the entire Phœnician seaboard. Raeclinson, Phœnicia, p. 182.

April (á'pril). [ME. Aprile, Aprille, etc. (AS. rarely Aprilis), also and earlier Aperil, Averel, Acerille, OF. Averil, F. Avril = Pr. Sp. Pg. Abril = It. Aprile = D. April = MHG. Aprille, Abrille, Abrelle, Aprill, G. April = Dan. Sw. April, from L. Aprilis (sc. mensis, month), April; usually, but fancifully, regarded as if from aperilis*, from aperire, open, as the month when the earth 'opens' to produce new fruits.] The fourth month of the year, containing thirty days. With poets April is the type of inconstancy, from the changeableness of its weather.

Apsaras (ap'sa-ras), pl. Apsarases. In Hindu mythology, one of a class of female spirits which reside in the breezes. They are wives of the Gandharvas, have the power of changing their forms, are fond of dice, and give good fortune in play. They are seldom mentioned in the Rígvéda, while in the Atharvaveda they are objects of fear, regarded as occasioning madness, and incantations are used against them. Later works mention various classes with distinctive names. They are distinguished as datrīka, 'divine,' or laukika, 'worldly,' the former ten, the latter thirty-four. These, like Irvasi, fascinated heroes, and like Menaka and Rambha, allured sages from their devotions. The Apsarases are Indra's hand-maidens, and conduct to his heaven warriors fallen in battle, where they become their wives.

Apsethus (ap-sé'thus). See the extract.

According to the Philosophumena, Simon of Gëttim in Samaria called himself a God, in imitation of a certain Apsethus who in Libya trained some parrots to say, "Apsethus is a god," and then let them loose. They flew abroad, all over Libya and as far as Greece. He obtained divine worship. But a clever Greek found out the trick, caught some of the parrots, and taught them to say, "Apsethus shut us up, and taught us to say, 'Apsethus is a god.'" He let them fly to Libya. Upon which the Libyans burned Apsethus as an impostor. This is an old story told of Hanno the Carthaginian.

Milman, Hist. of Christianity, II. 54, note.

Aquila. An early Christian who, with his wife Priscilla, was employed at Ephesus in instructing Apollos, who, though "instructed in the way of the Lord," needed to have it "more accurately set forth."

Aquila. Born in Pontus; lived about 130 A. D. A Jewish proselyte, surnamed "Ponticus" from his birthplace. He was a disciple of Rabbi Akiba, and made a slavishly literal translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, which superseded the Septuagint among Greek-speaking Jews.

Aquila (ä'kwë-lä), Johannes Kaspar. Born at Augsburg, Bavaria, Aug. 7, 1488; died at Saalfeld, Nov. 12, 1560. A German Protestant theologian, an assistant of Luther in the translation of the Old Testament. He became pastor at Saalfeld in 1527, and was outlived by Charles V., 1548, for his violent opposition to the Interim, but saved himself by flight, returning after the treaty of Passau (1552) to his pastorate at Saalfeld.

Aquila (ä'kwë-lä). A province in the compartment of Abruzzi and Molise, Italy; formerly called Abruzzo Ulteriore II. Area, 2,484 square miles. Population (1891), 374,882.

Aquila, or Aquila degli Abruzzi. The capital of the province of Aquila, situated on the Aterno in lat. 42° 21' N., long. 13° 25' E. It is the seat of a trade in saffron, and the center of important routes over the Apennines. It was built by the emperor Frederick II. Here, June 2, 1424, the Aragonese under Braccio da Montone were defeated by the allied (papal, Milanese, and Neapolitan) army under Jacob Caldora; Braccio was mortally wounded. Population, about 20,500.

Aquila et Antinous (ak'wi-lä et an-tin'ö-us). [L., 'the Eagle and Antinous.'] A northern constellation situated in the Milky Way nearly south of Lyra, and containing the bright star Altair. It has for its outline the figure of a flying eagle carrying in its talons the boy Antinous, the page of the emperor Hadrian.

Their fame in arms o'er all the world was blown.

Aquileia (ä-kwë-lä'vä), mod. also Aglar (äg-lär'). A town in the crowland of Görz and Gradiska, Austria-Hungary, situated near the head of the Adriatic, 22 miles northwest of Trieste. It contains a cathedral (11th century). It was one of the chief cities of the Roman Empire, an emporium, and the key of Italy on the northeast, colonized by Rome about 181 B. C. In 452 A. D. it was destroyed by Attila's forces. It was the scene of various church councils, and became the seat of an important patriarchate in the 6th century. Population, about 2,600.

The bishoprics which have most historical importance are those which at one time or another stood out in rivalry or opposition to Rome. Such was the patriarchal see of Aquileia, whose metropolitan jurisdiction took in Como at one end and the Istrian Pola at the other. The patriarchs of Aquileia, standing as they did on the march of the Italian, Teutonic, and Slavonic lands, grew, unlike most of the Italian prelates, into powerful temporal princes. Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 171.

Aquilin (ak'wi-lin). The horse of Raymond, in the "Jerusalem Delivered" by Tasso. His sire was the wind.

Aquilia gens (a-kwil'i-jenz). In ancient Rome, a patrician and plebeian clan or house of great antiquity, whose family names under the Republic were Corvus, Crassus, Florus, Gallus, and Tuscus.

Aquilius (a-kwil'i-us), Manius. A Roman general, consul 101 B. C., and commander in the war against the slaves in Sicily. He was accused of maladministration 98 B. C., but acquitted, and was defeated in the war against Mithridates 88 B. C., and barbarously slain.

Aquilo (ak'wi-lö). [L.] The north wind.

Aquinas (a-kwi'näs), Thomas, Saint, or Thomas of Aquino. Born at Rocca Secca, near Aquino, Italy, 1225 or 1227; died at Fossa Nuova, near Terracina, Italy, March 7, 1274. A famous Italian theologian and scholastic philosopher, surnamed "Doctor Angelicus," "Father of Moral Philosophy," and (by his companions at school) the "Dumb Ox." He entered the Dominican order; studied at Cologne under Albertus Magnus; and taught at Cologne, Paris, Rome, Bologna, and elsewhere. His followers were called "Thomists." His chief work is the "Summa Theologicæ." His complete works were published in 1787, and under the auspices of Pope Leo XIII., in 1853.

Aquino (ä-kwë'nö). A town in the province of Caserta, Italy, 55 miles northwest of Naples; the seat of a bishopric. It was the birthplace of Juvenal, and Pescennius Niger, and gave his name to Thomas Aquinas.

Aquitaine (ak-wi-tän'). [F., also in another form Guienne or Guylene; from L. Aquitania.]

An ancient division of southwestern France, lying between the Garonne and the Loire. A West-Gothic kingdom was founded there in the first part of the 5th century. It was conquered by Clovis 507-511, became a duchy about 700 (?), and was thoroughly conquered by Charles the Great, and made a kingdom (including all southern Gaul and the Spanish March) for his son Louis. In 838 Neustria was united to it, and it became soon after a duchy and one of the great fiefs of the French crown. Gascony was united to it in 1052. In 1137 it passed temporarily to France, by the marriage of Eleanor with Louis VII. of France, but in 1152 was united (by the marriage of Eleanor with Henry) to Normandy and Anjou, and in 1154 to England, which retained it under John. It became nominally a French fief in 1258 (?), and was freed from French vassalage and granted to Edward I. in 1360. Part of it was recovered from the English in the reign of Charles V., but was won back by Henry V. It was finally conquered by the French 1451-53. It included (as Guienne) properly Bordelais, Rouergue, Périgord, Quercy, Agenois, and Bazadois, and comprised nearly the modern départements Gironde, Dordogne, Lot, Lot-et-Garonne, and Aveyron. Compare Guienne.

Aquitania (ak-wi-tä'ni-ä). [L., named from the Aquitani, a people of Gaul.] The southwestern division of Gaul, as described by Julius Cæsar, comprising the region between the Pyrenees and Garonne. By Augustus it was extended to the Loire northward, and made a Roman province. See Aquitaine.

Arabella Zeal. See Zeal.

Arabgir (ä-räb-gër'), or Arabkir (ä-räb-kër'). A town in Asiatic Turkey, about lat. 39° N., long. 38° 40' E. Population, 25,000.

Arabi Pasha (ä-rä'bê'pash'ä), Ahmed. Born about 1837. An Egyptian officer and revolutionary leader. He organized the national party of Egypt in opposition to the Anglo-French control; took part in the deposition of the ministry in 1881; and became minister of war in 1882. He withdrew the budgets from the English and French controllers, an act which resulted in the bombardment of Alexandria by the English, July 11, and the defeat of Arabi Pasha at Tel-el-Kebir, Sept. 13, 1882. He was taken prisoner at Cairo, and exiled to Seylon.

Arabia (ä-rä'bi-ä), Turk. and Pers. Arabistan (ä-räb-ê-stän'). [Also Araby, Arabia, from F. Arabie; probably 'the desert' (Heb. arabäh); L. Arabia, Gr. Ἀραβία, Sp. Pg. It. Arabia, G. Arabien, etc.] A peninsula with the shape of an irregular triangle between Persia, Syria, Egypt, and Ethiopia, bounded on the west by the Red Sea and the Gulf of Suez, on the south by the Gulf of Aden and the Arabian Sea, on the east by the Gulf of Oman and the Persian Gulf, and on the north by a portion of Syria. The Greeks and Romans divided Arabia into A. Petrea (the stony), A. Deserta (the desert), and A. Felix (the happy). Modern geographers recognize from 8 to 12 districts.—the Sinaitic peninsula; the Hedjaz, along the coast of the Red Sea, including the Haram (i. e., the sacred territory of Mecca and Medina); Yemen, on the southern coast of the same sea (biblical Sheba); Hadramaut or Hazaraveth, the province next to Yemen, situated toward the Indian Ocean; Oman and Ilajar, the northern and southern halves of the coast on the Persian Gulf; Nejd, or Central Arabia; and the Syrian desert. The area of the country is about 1,200,000 square miles; one third of this is a sandy desert. It has few permanent rivers, the rivulets that flow from the hills losing themselves in the sand. It contains palm-trees and meadows, and is especially famed for its spices. The high plateau of the Nejd, which rises from 3,000 to 4,000 feet above the level of the sea, is the home of the swiftest horses and camels. The principal seaports are Jiddah, in Hedjaz, with about 30,000 inhabitants; Muscat, the key to the Persian Gulf, in Oman, with 20,000 inhabitants; and Aden, the key to the Red Sea, in Yemen, with 42,000 inhabitants. Other important cities are Mecca and Medina, with 45,000 and 20,000 inhabitants respectively. The population is about 5,000,000, of whom one fifth are Bedouins or dwellers in tents, the remaining four fifths being sedentary. The races which have peopled the country are divided into three sections: the old, "lost" Arabs (al Arabu l-baidah), who are supposed to have lived in the mythical prehistoric period; the pure Arabs (al Arabu l-arabah), who claim to be descended from Qahtan (i. e., the Yoktan of the Old Testament Gen. x. 25); and the mixed Araba (al Arabu l-mutarabah), who claim to be descended from Ishmael. The period preceding the era of Mohammed is characterized by the formation of local monarchies and federal governments of a rude form. The religion of that period had elements of fetishism, and animal and ancestor worship. The Koran enumerates ten idols of pre-Islamic times. But in the midst of the old idolatry there had arisen some perception of a supreme god, Allah, the other gods being termed his children. Mecca with its Kaaba was the center of Arab worship under the guardianship of the noble tribe of Korcish. Out of Mecca and the Korcishites came Mohammed (570-632), who by his new religion consolidated the Araba into a theocracy, so that on his death the Arab peninsula was, with a few exceptions, under one scepter and one creed. He was succeeded (632) by Abu-Bekr, the father of his favorite wife, Ayesha, his title being caliph, or successor. Abu-Bekr was followed by Omar (634-644), who conquered Syria, Persia, and Egypt. He was followed by Othman (644-656), who in turn was succeeded by Ali, the prophet's nephew and son-in-law. All of these except Abu-Bekr died at the hands of assassins. Next came the dynasty of the Omayyads (661-750), with fourteen princes, having their capital at Damascus. During the reign of Yezid I., the second prince (679-683), a rebellion took place which split the Mohammedan world into two great sects, the Sunnites and Shiites. The Omayyads conquered other portions of Asia and Africa, and even invaded France (732). Their most important achievement was the conquest of Spain in 711, under the reign of Walid I. (705-715), the sixth of the dynasty. Spain soon became independent of the main Arab realm (later under the Moors). In the Orient the Omayyads succumbed to Ibrahim and his brother, Abul Abbas, who founded the dynasty of the Abbassides (750-1258). During this period the Arabian power reached its highest point. The most celebrated rulers of this dynasty were Abu Jaffar, surnamed Al-Mansur (754-775), founder of Baghdad, the capital of the Abbassides, and Harun-al-Rashid (786-809), who is well known in Arabic literature, and who had diplomatic relations with Charlemagne. But it was under the Abbassides that the disintegration of the Arabic empire began. In 909 the Fatimites (i. e., the descendants of Ali and Fatima, the daughter of Mohammed) established themselves in northern Africa, and founded in 972 the califate of Egypt, with Cairo as its capital. The dynasty of the Abbassides came to an end with the capture of Baghdad by the Mongols in 1258. Hedjaz in the west and Yemen in the south are Turkish provinces. Oman is an independent sultanate. Nejd and other districts are under the influence of the Wahhabites, a politico-religious faction named after Mohammed bin-Abdul Wahhab, who arose about 1740 as a reformer. Aden has been held by the English since 1839.

Arabia Deserta (ä-rä'bi-ä de-zër'tä). [L., 'uninhabited Arabia.'] In ancient geography, the northern and central portions of Arabia.

Arabia Felix (ä-rä'bi-ä fê'liks). [L., 'flourishing Arabia.'] In ancient geography, the region in the southeast and south of Arabia, or perhaps the peninsula proper.

Arabia Petrea (ä-rä'bi-ä pe-trê'ä). [L., 'rocky Arabia.'] In ancient geography, the northwestern part of Arabia.

Arabian Gulf. The Red Sea.

Arabian Sea. A part of the Indian Ocean, nearly corresponding to the ancient Mare Erythraeum, which is bounded by Africa on the west, Arabia on the northwest, Persia and Baluchistan on the north, and India on the east, and is connected with the Red Sea by the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, and with the Persian Gulf by the Strait of Oman. Its chief arms are the Gulfs of Aden, Oman, Cutch, and Cambay; its islands, Sokotra, and the Lakkadiv Islands.

Arabian Nights' Entertainments, or A Thousand and One Nights. A collection of Oriental tales of which the plan and name are very ancient. The source of some of the stories has been traced, others are traditional. Maslud in 943 speaks of a Persian work "A Thousand Nights and a Night." Mohammed-bin-Ishäk in his Al Fihrist in 987 alludes to it as well known to him. In the course of centuries it had been added to and taken from to a great extent, and in 1450 it was reduced to its present form in Egypt, probably in Cairo. The tales show their Persian, Indian, and Arabian origin. The modern editions are Antoine Galland's, in Paris in 1704-17, in twelve volumes, an inaccurate translation; E. W. Lane's English translation, which is scholarly, published in 1840; Payne's English translation, 1882-84; and Sir Richard Burton's English translation, in ten volumes, printed by the Kamashastra Society, for subscribers only, at Bembay, in 1858-89. Five volumes were added in 1857-88. Lady Burton issued an expurgated edition for popular reading at London, 1886-88, in six volumes.

Arabic (ar'ä-bik). One of the Semitic family of languages, of which, with the Hinyaritic and Ethiopic languages, it constitutes the southern branch. It is the language of the Koran, and has largely contributed from its vocabulary to Persian, Hindustani, and Turkish, and in a less degree to Malay, Spanish, and other tongues. This Semitic language invaded Africa long after its sister language, the Punic, had disappeared.

It came in by Suez, across the Red Sea, and over the Indian Ocean from Muscat. It has superseded the Hamitic Egyptian, spread over the Sahara to Lake Chad and the Senegal, and in East Africa it has strongly impregnated the Suahili. In Morocco, Algeria, Tunis, and Tripoli it is the superior language, and from one end of the Sudan to the other it is the sacred language of the Mohammedans. Nowhere in Africa is the Arabic spoken in its classical form, but in a variety of dialects, the principal of which are the Egyptian, the Maghreb, in Northwest Africa, the Sudani in the Sudan, and the Muscat dialect in East Africa.

Arabicus Sinus (a-rab'î-kus sí'nus). A Roman name of the Red Sea.

Araby. See Arabia.

Araby (ar'a-bi). A poetical form of Arabia.

Aracajú (ä-rä-kü-zhō'). The capital of the state of Sergipe, Brazil, situated near the coast, 190 miles northeast of Bahia. Population, about 3,000.

Aracan. See Arakan.

Aracati, or Aracaty (ä-rä-kü-tē'). A seaport in the state of Ceará, Brazil, in lat. 4° 35' S., long. 37° 48' W. Population, about 6,000.

Aracena (ä-rä-thē'nä). A town in the province of Huelva, Spain, 53 miles northwest of Seville. Population (1887), 6,040.

Arachne (a-rak'nē). [Gr. Ἀράχνη, identified with ἀράχνη, a spider.] In Greek legend, a Lydian maiden who challenged Athene to a contest in weaving, and was changed by her into a spider.

Arachosia (ar-a-kō'shi-jī). In ancient geography, a region in ancient Persia corresponding to part of the modern Afghanistan.

Ara Cœli, Church of. [L., 'altar of heaven.'] See Santa Maria in Ara Cœli.

Arad (or'od). New. A town in the county of Temes, Hungary, across the river from Old Arad. Population (1890), 5,555.

Arad, or Old Arad. A royal free city in the county of Arad, Hungary, situated on the Maros in lat. 46° 12' N., long. 21° 16' E.; a railway center, the chief emporium in southeastern Hungary, and an important fortress. It has a large trade in grain, wine, tobacco, spirits, and cattle. In the revolution of 1849 it played an important part; it was taken from the Austrians after a long siege; was surrendered by the Hungarians Aug. 1849; and was the scene of the military executions by Haynau, Oct. 6, 1849. Population (1890), 42,052.

Aradus (ar'a-dus). See Arvad.

Araf (ä'ráf), Al. [Said to be derived from Ar. arafa, part. divide.] The partition between Heaven and Hell described in the Koran (Surah vii. 44). It is variously interpreted. "Some imagine it to be a sort of limbo for the patriarchs and prophets, or for the martyrs and those who have been most eminent for sanctity. Others place here those whose good and evil works are so equal that they exactly counterpoise each other, and therefore deserve neither reward nor punishment; and these, say they, will on the last day be admitted into Paradise, after they shall have performed an act of adoration, which will be imputed to them as a merit, and will make the scale of their good works to preponderate. Others suppose this intermediate space will be a receptacle for those who have gone to war without their parents' leave, and therein suffered martyrdom; being excluded from Paradise for their disobedience, and escaping hell because they are martyrs." Hughes, Dict. of Islam.

Arafat (ä-rä-fät'). A sacred mountain of the Mohammedans, situated about 15 miles southeast of Mecca, Arabia.

Arafura Sea (ä-rä-fō'rä sē). That part of the ocean which lies north of Australia, east of Timor, and southwest of Papua.

Arafuras. See Alfurus.

Arago (är'a-gō; F. pron. ä-rä-gō'), Dominique François. Born at Estagel, near Perpignan, France, Feb. 26, 1786; died at Paris, Oct. 2, 1853. A French physicist and astronomer, noted especially for his experiments and discoveries in magnetism and optics, and for his skill as a popular expounder of scientific facts and theories. He was engaged with Biot in geodetic measurements in the Pyrenees and Balearic Islands 1806-1808; was imprisoned by the Spaniards and later by the Algerines as a spy, and finally released in 1839; became a member of the Academy and professor of analytical geometry at the Polytechnic School in 1839; lectured in Paris on astronomy 1842-45; and was appointed chief director of the observatory and perpetual secretary of the Academy in 1830. In the same year he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and in 1848 a member of the provisional government. With Gay-Lussac he was the founder (1816) of the "Annales de Chimie et de Physique." He is best known, popularly, from his "Eloges historiques" upon deceased members of the Academy, which he delivered as secretary of that body.

Arago, Étienne. Born at Perpignan, France, Feb. 9, 1802; died at Paris, March 6, 1892. A French dramatist, journalist, politician, and poet, brother of Dominique François Arago; author of "Les Aristocrates" (1847), etc.

Arago, Jacques Étienne Victor. Born at Estagel, near Perpignan, March 10, 1790; died in Brazil, Jan., 1855. A French traveler and writer, brother of Dominique François Arago; author of "Voyage autour du monde" (1843), etc.

Aragon (ar'a-gon). An ancient kingdom, now a captaincy-general of Spain, capital Saragossa, bounded by France on the north, by Catalonia on the east, by Valencia on the south, and by New Castile, Old Castile, and Navarre on the west, comprising the provinces of Huesca, Saragossa, and Teruel. It is traversed by mountains and intersected by the Ebro. During the middle ages it was one of the two chief Christian powers in the peninsula. In 1035 it became a kingdom; was united to Catalonia in 1137; rose to great influence through its acquisitions in the 13th and 14th centuries of Valencia, the Balearic Islands, Sardinia, and the Sicilies; and was united with Castile in 1479 through the marriage of Ferdinand of Aragon with Isabella of Castile. Area, 17,973 square miles. Population (1887), 910,830. Formerly also Arragon.

Aragon. A river, about 125 miles long, which rises in the Pyrenees, flows west and southwest through Aragon and Navarre, and joins the Ebro at Milagro.

Aragona (ä-rä-gō'nä). A town in the province of Girgenti, Sicily, 8 miles north of Girgenti. There are sulphur-mines in its vicinity. Population, about 9,000.

Aragua (ä-rä-gwä). A noted valley in northern Venezuela, east of Lake Valencia. It gave name to a former province of Venezuela.

Araguari (ä-rä-gwä-rē'). A river in northern Brazil which flows into the Atlantic north of the Amazon.

Araguaya (ä-rä-gwä'ä). A river of central Brazil which rises about lat. 18° 30' S., flows north, is separated in its middle course for a long distance into two arms, and joins the Tocantins about lat. 6° S. Its length is about 1,000 miles, and it is navigable for about 750 miles.

Araish. See El-Araish.

Arakan, or Aracan (ä-rä-kän'). A division in the northern part of British Burma, ceded to the British in 1826. Population, 488,565.

Arakan. A decayed city in the division of Arakan, in lat. 20° 42' N., long. 93° 24' E.

Araktcheieff (ä-räk-chä'yef), Count Alexei. Born Oct. 4, 1769; died at Grusino, government of Novgorod, Russia, May 3, 1834. A Russian general and minister of war (1806), the organizer of the military colonies in Russia 1822-25.

Aral Sea (ar'al sē), or Sea of Khuzarism. A brackish inland sea of Russian Central Asia, in lat. 43° 42' - 46° 44' N., long. 58° 18' - 61° 46' E. It receives the waters of the Amu-Daria and Sir-Daria, but has no outlet and is thought to have been formerly dry, the Amu-Daria and Sir-Daria then discharging into the Caspian Sea. The Aral is generally shallow (maximum depth 37 fathoms), and is veiled by storms. Its length is 225 miles, greatest width 185 miles, height above sea-level about 160 feet, and area 24,500 square miles. It is decreasing in size.

Aram (ä'ram), or Aramea, or Aramæa (ar-ame'ä). [L. Aram, Gr. Ἀραμ, Heb. אַרָם; L. Arāmæa (sc. regio).] The common etymology 'highland' is very doubtful. The biblical name of the country extending from the western frontiers of Babylonia to the highlands of western Asia. The inhabitants of this country are called Arameans. The Septuagint and Vulgate render the name by Syria. The Old Testament mentions six divisions of the country, among them being Aram Naharaim (Gen. xxiv. 10, & c., of the two rivers; Mesopotamia, probably the territory between the Euphrates and the Chabor where the Judean exiles were settled (2 Ki. xvii. 6); Paddanaram, probably the designation for the flat country in northern Mesopotamia; and Damascus. In the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions the names Aramu, Arimu, and Arumu are used, but only of Mesopotamia and the peoples on the western bank of the Euphrates. The principal river of Aram was the Orontes. The Arameans were in race, language, and religion Semitic. As early as the period of the Judges an Aramean king extended his conquests to Palestine (Judges iii. 8, 10). David took Damascus from them, but Solomon was obliged to restore it. The last king of Damascus, Rezin, allied himself with Pekah, king of Israel, against Judah, but succumbed to Tiglath-Pileser of Assyria (745-727 B. C.). Aram Naharaim appears on Egyptian monuments and in the Tel-el-Amarna tablets under the form Naharina. Thothmes I. and III. and Amenophis III. conquered it several times; but after repeated attacks it finally fell to the Assyrians. The Arameans became an important factor in the Assyrian state; their language seems to have become the common speech of trade and diplomacy, and gradually supplanted Assyrian in Assyria and Hebrew in Palestine. See also Syria.

Aram (ä'ram), Eugene. Born at Ramsgill, Yorkshire, 1704; died Aug. 6, 1759. An English scholar, executed for fraud and the murder of Daniel Clark, committed in Knaresborough in 1745. He taught at Knaresborough and elsewhere, and was arrested while acting as usher in a private school at Lynn Regis. The testimony of an accomplice, Houseman, through whom Clark's remains were discovered in a cave near Knaresborough, secured Aram's conviction. On his trial he defended himself with unusual ability. He was self-taught, but attained a very considerable knowledge of languages, and has been credited with the discovery of the affinity of the Celtic to other European tongues; he also disputed the then almost universally accepted direct derivation of Latin from Greek. He has been highly idealized in a novel by Bulwer (pub. 1832), and his arrest is the theme of a well-known poem by Hood ("Dream of Eugene Aram"). A play, "Eugene Aram," by W. G. Wills, was produced by Henry Irving in 1873.

Aramea, or Aramæa. See Aram.

Arameans, or Aramæans. See Aram.

Aramaic (ar-a-mä'ik). One of the Semitic family of languages, properly a general term for all the northern Semitic dialects, and so including the so-called Chaldaic or Chaldee, and Syriac or Syrian. Some portions of the "Hebrew" Scriptures (Ezra, and Daniel, and parts of other books) are in Aramaic. Also Aramean.

Araminta (ar-a-ini'tij). 1. In Vanbrugh's comedy "The Confederacy," the wife of Money-trap, an extravagant, luxurious woman with a marked leaning toward "the quality."—2. The principal female character in Congreve's comedy "The Old Bachelor."

Aramis (ä-rä-mēs'). One of the "Three Musketeers," in Dumas's novel of that name. He is the mildest and most gracious of the trio, and finally enters the church. The name is an assumed one, his real name being known only to the captain of the Musketeers.

Aran (ä-rän'), Valle de or Val de. A valley in the Pyrenees, in the province of Lerida, Spain, northeast of the Maladetta group; the source of the Garonne.

Aran, or Arran, Islands (ar'an i'landz). Three islands at the entrance of Galway Bay, western coast of Ireland: Inishmore (length 8 miles), Inishmain, Inishkeer: about lat. 55° N.

Arana, Diego Barros. See Barros Arana, Diego.

Aranda (ä-rän'dä) Count of (Pedro Pablo Abarca y Bolea). Born at Saragossa, 1718; died 1799 (1794?). A Spanish statesman and diplomatist. As president of the Council of Castile he effected the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1765. Later he was ambassador to France.

Aranda de Duero (ä-rän'dä dä dwä'rō). A town in the province of Burgos, Spain, situated on the Duero 57 miles east of Valladolid. Population (1887), 5,719.

Arango y Parreno (ä-räng'gō ē pär-rä'nō), Francisco de. Born at Havana, May 22, 1765; died at Guines, March 21, 1837. A Cuban lawyer. He was twice the representative of Cuba in the Spanish Cortes, was councillor of state, and held other public offices; but he is best known for his numerous works on economical questions connected with Cuba.

Aranjuez (ä-rän-hweth'). A town in the province of Madrid, Spain, situated on the Tagus 28 miles south of Madrid. It was a favorite royal residence, and was the scene of the outbreak of the revolution of March, 1808, which overthrew Godoy and compelled Charles IV. to abdicate. Population (1887), 9,649.

Aranjuez, Peace of. A treaty of alliance against England concluded between France and Spain, 1772.

Aransas Bay (a-ran'zas bā). An arm of the Gulf of Mexico, northeast of Corpus Christi Bay.

Aransas Pass. A strait, the entrance to Aransas Bay.

Arany (or'ony), János. Born at Nagy-Szalonta, Hungary, March 2, 1817; died at Budapest, Oct. 22, 1882. A Hungarian poet. He became professor of the Hungarian language and literature in the Reformed Gymnasium at Nagy-Koros in 1854, director of the Kisfaludy Society in 1860, and member of the Hungarian Academy in 1858 (secretary 1864-78). He was the author of the humorous poem "Az elveszett alkotmány" ("The Lost Constitution," 1843), the epic trilogy "Toldi" (1847-80), etc.

Arany, László. Born at Nagy-Szalonta, March 24, 1844. A Hungarian poet, son of János Arany.

Aranyos (or'on-yōsh). [Hung. arany, gold.] A gold-bearing river in western Transylvania, which flows easterly to join the Maros. Its length is about 80-90 miles.

Aranza (a-ran'zä), Duke. The principal character in Tobin's comedy "The Honey-moon."

Arapaho, or Arapahoe (ä-rap'a-hō). [Properly a plural form; but the plural Arapahoës is used. The name is said by Schoolcraft to signify 'tattooed people.'] A tribe of North American Indians living chiefly on the head waters of the Platte and Arkansas rivers, but also ranging from the Yellowstone to the Rio Grande. There are 1272 at the Cheyenne and Arapaho Agency, Indian Territory, and 855 at Shoshone Agency, Wyoming. See Algonquian.

Arapiles (ä-rä-pē'les). A village near Salamanca, the principal scene of the battle of Salamanca, 1812.

Arar (ä'rär). [L., also Araris.] The ancient name of the river Saône.

Ararat (ar'a-rat). The ancient name of a district in eastern Armenia between the rivers

Araxes and the lakes Van and Urmiah; also used for all Armenia, and for the mountain-ridge in the south of that country. The usual statement that Noah's ark rested on Mount Ararat has no foundation in the Hebrew text, which reads "on the mountains of Ararat." In the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions the country is mentioned under the name Urartu, and many expeditions of the Assyrian kings against it are enumerated. The Greeks called the Armenians Alarodians (Herod. III. 94).

Ararat (ar'á-rat). [Heb. 'Ararát, Samaritan Hararát. The Ar. name is Masís, Turk. Aghri-Dagh, Pers. Kuki-Nuh (Noah's Mountain).] A volcanic mountain which rises in two summits (Great Ararat and Little Ararat) from the plain of the Araxes, in lat. 39° 40' N., long. 44° 20' E.: the traditional resting-place of Noah's ark (see above). It lies on the confines of Russian, Turkish, and Persian Armenia, the summit belonging to Russia. The mountain was partly altered by an earthquake in 1840. It was ascended by Parrot in 1829, and since that time by Bryce and others. The height of Great Ararat is about 17,000 feet (17,325—Parrot); that of Little Ararat, 12,840 feet.

Ararat. A town in Ripon County, Victoria, Australia, situated on Hopkins River 55 miles northwest of Ballarat. It contains gold-fields. Population, about 4,000.

Araros (ar'á-rós). [Gr. Ἀραρός.] An Athenian comic poet, the son of Aristophanes. He brought out his father's "Plutus" 388 B. C., and appeared as an original poet 375 B. C.

Aras (ä-räs'). A river, the ancient Araxes, which rises in Turkish Armenia, flows through Transcaucasia, forms part of the boundary between Russia and Persia, and joins the Kur about lat. 39° 55' N., long. 48° 25' E. Its length is 400–500 miles.

Aratus (a-rá'tus). [Gr. Ἀρατος.] Lived about 270 B. C. A Greek poet, said to have resided during the latter part of his life at the court of Antigonus Gonatas, and to have devoted himself to the study of physics, grammar, and philosophy. He "was the author of an astronomical epic which Cicero translated, entitled 'Prognostics of the Weather' (Diosmeia). It is from Aratus that St. Paul, addressing the Athenians, quotes the words 'For we are also his offspring' (Acts xvii. 28)" (Jobb, Greek Lit.).

Aratus. [Gr. Ἀρατος.] Born at Sicyon, Greece, 271 B. C.; died 213 B. C. A Greek statesman and general. He liberated Sicyon from the usurper Nicicles in 251; was elected strategus of the Achaean League in 245 for the first time; took the citadel of Corinth in 243; was defeated in a succession of campaigns by the Spartans under Cleomenes; formed an alliance with Antigonus of Macedonia, who defeated Cleomenes at the battle of Sellasia 221 B. C.; and carried on an unsuccessful defensive war against the Etolians 221–219 B. C. He composed commentaries in thirty books (all now lost) which brought the history of Greece down to the year 220 B. C. He is said to have been poisoned by Philip of Macedonia.

Arauca (ä-rou'kä). A river in Colombia and western Venezuela, a tributary of the Orinoco.

Araucana (ä-rou-kä'nä). A heroic poem, in thirty-seven cantos, by the Spanish poet Alonso de Ercilla. It is partly a geographical and statistical account of the province of Araucania and partly the story of the expedition for the conquest of Arancania in which the author took part.

Araucania (ä-rou-kä'nä-ä). A region in southern Chile which included the territory south of the Biobio River to the Gulf of Aneu—that is, nearly the modern provinces of Biobio, Arauco, Malleco, Cautin, and Valdivia. See Araucanians.

Araucanians (ar-ä-kä'ni-anz), or Araucanos (ä-rou-kä'nós). [Said to be derived from a verb of their language, aucani, to be savage, unconquerable.] A tribe of Indians in southern Chile. They were very numerous and warlike, and successfully resisted the Incas in the 15th century. From the time when their territory was first invaded by Valdivia (1544) they waged a continual war against the Spaniards. Valdivia himself was killed by them (1553), as was one of his successors, Martin Garcia Loyola (1598), and twice the whites were completely driven from their territory. The tribe still numbers over 20,000. Originally they were roving and very savage, but they now practise agriculture and have considerable herds. Few of them are Catholics.

Arauco (ä-rou'kö). A province (capital Lebu) in southern Chile. Area, 4,248 square miles (formerly larger). Population (1891), 86,236.

Arauco. A fort and town of Chile, south of Concepcion, and originally about 6 miles from the sea; founded by Valdivia in 1552. During the early Araucanian wars it was a post of great importance. Besieged by the Indians, it was abandoned and destroyed in 1553; rebuilt by Mendoza, 1559; again abandoned when attacked by Antihueno, 1563; rebuilt in 1566 and withstood what might be called a continuous siege from 1559 to 1590, when it was removed to the present site on the coast. The modern town is a port of some importance. Population, about 4,000.

Araujo Lima (ä-rou'zhö lë'mä). Pedro de. Born at Antas, Pernambuco, Dec. 22, 1793; died at Rio de Janeiro, June 7, 1870. A Brazilian statesman, regent of Brazil during the minority of the emperor Pedro II., April 22, 1838, to July 23, 1840. The emperor created him viscount of Olinda in 1841, and marquis of Olinda in 1854. He was senator, and several times prime minister (1848–1849, 1857–59, 1862–64, 1865–66).

Araujo de Azevedo (ä-rou'zhö de ä-zä-vä'dö), Antonio de. Born near Ponte de Lima, May 14, 1754; died at Rio de Janeiro, June 21, 1817. A Portuguese statesman and diplomatist. He was made minister of war and foreign affairs, July, 1804, and toward the end of 1807 prime minister. It was by his advice that the Portuguese court fled to Brazil (Nov., 1807). Arrived at Rio de Janeiro (March, 1808), he resigned, remaining a member of the Council of State, and in 1815 was created conde de Barca. In 1814 he was minister of marine, and in 1817 was again called to be prime minister, holding the position until his death.

Araujo Porto-Alegre (ä-rou'zhö pôr'tö-ä-lä'gre), Manoel de. Born at Rio Pardo, Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, Nov. 29, 1806; died at Lisbon, Portugal, Dec. 30, 1879. A Brazilian poet, painter, and architect; author of a collection of poems entitled "Brazilianas."

Arausio (a-rä'shi-ö). [Gr. Ἀραυσίον.] A town of the Cavari, the modern Orange, France.

Aravalli, or Aravali (ar-a-väl'ë), or Aravulli (ar-a-vul'i) Hills. A range of mountains in Rajputana, India, about 300 miles in length, extending from northeast to southwest. Its highest point is Mount Abu (about 5,000 feet).

Arawaks (ä-rä-wäks). A tribe of Indians, now reduced to a few thousand, living in a semi-civilized state in British Guiana, near the coast. Formerly they were very numerous, and they appear to have occupied most of the West Indian islands with the coasts of Guiana and part of Venezuela. At the time of the conquest they had been driven out of the Lesser Antilles by invasions of the Caribs, but were found by Columbus in Haiti, and it is probable that the first Indians discovered by him in the Bahamas were of the same race. The Arawaks were a gentle, well-disposed people, practising agriculture, but with little civilization. They were constantly forced to defend themselves against the Caribs. Also written Arawacas, Arawakas, Arruagues.

Arawan (ä-rä-wän'). An oasis and trading center in the French Sahara, 140 miles northwest of Timbuktu.

Araxes (a-räk'sëz). [Gr. Ἀράξης.] The ancient name of the Aras and perhaps of other streams flowing into the Caspian Sea.

Araxes (Aras) seems to have been a name common in the days of Herodotus to all the great streams flowing into the Caspian, just as Don has been to all the great Scythian rivers (Tan-ais, Dan-aper or Dniepr, Danaster or Dniester, Donau, Don-amb or Dan-ube, &c.), and as Avon is to so many English streams. Ravlinson, Herod., III. 9, note.

Arbaces (är'ba-sëz or är-bä'sëz). [Gr. Ἀρβάκης.] The founder of the Median empire. He reigned about 876–848 B. C.

Arbaces. 1. In Beaumont and Fletcher's "King and No King," the King of Iberia, whose nature is a compound of vainglory and violence.—2. A character in Dr. Arne's opera "Artaxerxes."—3. In Byron's "Sardanapalus," the Governor of Media, who became, in place of Sardanapalus, the king of Nineveh and Assyria.

Arbailu (är-bä-ë'lö). [Assyr., 'city of the four gods.'] Same as Arbela.

Arbasto (är-bas'tö) the Anatomie of Fortune. A novel by Robert Greene, printed in 1584.

Arbate (är-bät'). 1. A character in Molière's comedy "La Princesse d'Élide."—2. A character in Racine's play "Mithridate."

Arbe (är'bä). Slav. Rab (rüb). An island, about 14 miles long, in the Adriatic Sea 35 miles southeast of Fiume, belonging to Dalmatia, Austria-Hungary.

Arbedo (är-bä'dö). A village in the canton of Ticino, Switzerland, 2 miles northeast of Bellinzona. Here, 1422, the Swiss defeated the Milanese ("battle of St. Paul").

Arbela (är-bë'lä). [See Arbailu.] In ancient geography, a town in Assyria, lat. 36° 8' N., long. 44° 4' E., the modern Arbil, Erbil, or Ervil. It was an early seat of the worship of Istar, and a place of considerable importance. Near here, at Gangamela, the Macedonians (47,000 under Alexander the Great) defeated the Persian army (about 1,000,000?) under Darius, in 331 B. C. This battle led to the final overthrow of the Persian empire.

Arber (är'ber). The highest group of the Böhmerwald, situated in Bavaria about 50 miles east of Ratisbon. The height of the Grosser Arber is about 4,780 feet.

Arber's English Garner. A series of selections of English prose and poetry in 10 volumes, printed by Edward Arber from manuscript or printed originals, ranging from 1402 to 1715. They are mostly tracts, poems, and short pieces, given with modern spelling. The series of "English Reprints" follows the original exactly.

Arber's English Reprints. A series of reprints of English prose and poetry in 30 numbers, in 14 volumes (1st ed. 1868), ranging from 1516 to 1712. These are somewhat longer than the pieces printed in the "Garner."

Arbil (är-bël'). See Arbela.

Arblay (är'blä), Madame d' (Frances Burney). Born at Lynn Regis, England, June 13, 1752; died at Bath, England, Jan. 6, 1840. A noted English novelist. She was the daughter of Dr. Burney, the musician, and the wife (married July 31, 1793) of General d'Arblay. She wrote "Evelina, or a Young Lady's Entrance into the World" (1779), "Cecilia" (1782), "Edwy and Elvina," a tragedy (acted March 21, 1795), "Camilla" (1796), "Love and Fashion," a comedy (1800), "The Wanderer" (1814), "Memoirs of Dr. Burney" (1832), "Letters and Diaries" (5 vols. 1842; 2 vols. 1846). From 1786 to 1791 she occupied a subordinate position at court.

Arboga (är-bö'gä). A town in the län of Westerbås, Sweden, situated on the Arboga near Lake Mälär, 76 miles northwest of Stockholm. It was formerly of great importance, the seat of many councils and diets. Population (1890), 4,576.

Arbogast (är'bö-gast), or Arbogastes (är-bö-gas'tëz). Died 394 A. D. A Frankish general in the Roman service. Valentinian II. was slain by his order while participating in the athletic sports of the soldiers, and Eugenius, a client of Arbogast, was proclaimed emperor. He was defeated by Theodosius in 394, on the Frigidus north of Aquileia, and after marching about the mountains for two days fell upon his sword, and so perished.

Arbois (är-bwä'). A town in the department of Jura, France, in lat. 46° 55' N., long. 5° 45' E., famous for its wines. It is the birthplace of Pichégu. Population (1891), 4,355.

Arbois de Jubainville (är-bvä'dézhü-bän'vël), Marie Henri d'. Born at Naney, Dec. 5, 1827. A French archaeologist.

Arboleda (är'bö-lä'thä). Julio. Born in Barbacoas, 1817; died Nov. 12, 1862. A Colombian poet and revolutionist. He early took rank among the first poets of Spanish America, but the manuscript of his greatest work, "Gonzalo de Oyon," was destroyed by a personal enemy, and only portions which had been copied were published. In 1856 he joined the revolt in Antioquia, became its leader, and in alliance with Moreno, president of Ecuador, carried on a war against Mosquera and the federalists. The states of western Colombia adhered to him, and he assumed the supreme power; but in the midst of his success he was assassinated.

Arbon (är'bön). A town in the canton of Thurgau, Switzerland, situated on the Lake of Constance 16 miles southeast of Constance.

Arbrissel or Arbrisselles (är-brë-sel'). Robert d'. Born at Arbrissel or Arbrises, Brittany, 1047; died Feb. 25, 1117. A French ecclesiastic, the founder of the order of Fontevrault. He was appointed vicar-general of the Bishop of Rennes in 1085; became professor of theology at Angers in 1089; and two years later retired to the forest of Craon, where he founded the abbey of De Rota. Later he founded the celebrated abbey of Fontevrault, near Poitiers, after which the order was named.

Arbroath (är-bröth'), or Aberbrothock (äb-ër-bröth'ok), or Aberbrothwick (äb-ër-bröth'ik). A seaport in Forfarshire, Scotland, situated on the North Sea 17 miles northeast of Dundee. It has manufactures of jute, flax, linen, etc. Near it is a ruined abbey, founded in 1178. Population (1891), 22,821.

Arbues (är-bö-äs'). Pedro. Born at Epila, Aragon, 1442; died Sept. 17, 1485. A Spanish Augustinian monk, appointed by Torquemada an inquisitor of Aragon 1484. He was fatally wounded in the night of Sept. 14–15, 1485, as the result of a conspiracy of the relatives of his victims.

Arbuthnot (är'buth-not; Sc. pron. är-buth'not), John. Born at Arbuthnot, Scotland, 1667; died at London, Feb. 27, 1735. A British physician, wit, and man of letters. He studied at Aberdeen and St. Andrews, and was appointed physician extraordinary to Queen Anne Oct. 30, 1705, and physician in ordinary Nov. 11, 1709. The Tory ministry employed him as a political writer, and he joined with Swift, Pope, Gay, and Parnell to form the Scriblers Club about 1714. His chief works are "Law is a Bottomless Pit; or, History of John Bull" (1712), "Memoirs of Martinus Scriblers," mainly Arbuthnot's (1741).

Arbuthnot, Marriot. Born 1711; died at London, Jan. 31, 1794. An English admiral, commander of the fleet in the siege and capture of Charleston in 1780. He became an admiral of the blue in 1793.

Arc (ärk). A river in the department of Savoie, France, which joins the Isère at Chamousset. Its length is about 90 miles.

Arc, Joan of. See Joan of Arc.

Arcachon (är-kä-shön'). A watering-place in the department of Gironde, France, situated on the Bassin d'Arcachon 35 miles southwest of Bordeaux. It is noted as a winter resort, and also as a place for sea-bathing. Population (1891), commune, 7,910.

Arcades (är'ka-dēz). [Gr. Ἀρκάδες, Arcadians.] A mask, by Milton, acted shortly after "Comus" in 1634, and printed in 1645.

Arcadia (är-kä'di-ä). [Gr. Ἀρκάδι, from Ἀρκάς, Arcadian.] In ancient geography, a region in the heart of the Peloponnesus, bounded by Achaia on the north, by Argolis on the east, by Laconia and Messenia on the south, and by Elis on the west. It is nearly surrounded and is intersected by mountains, and was proverbial for its rural simplicity. Its cities Tegea, Mantinea, etc., formed a confederation about 370-360 B.C.

The history of the rise in modern literature of an ideal Arcadia—the home of piping shepherds and coy shepherdesses, where rustic simplicity and plenty satisfied the ambition of untutored hearts, and where ambition and its crimes were unknown—is a very curious one, and has, I think, been first traced in the chapter on Arcadia in my "Rambles and Studies in Greece." Neither Theocritus nor his early imitators laid the scene of their poems in Arcadia; this imaginary frame was first adopted by Sannazaro. Mahaffy, Hist. Classical Greek Lit., I. 420.

Arcadia (är-kä-dē'ä). A nomarchy of modern Greece. Area, 2,028 square miles. Population (1889), 148,285.

Arcadia (är-kä'di-ä). 1. A description of shepherd life, in prose and verse, by Sannazaro, written toward the end of the 15th century. Though itself not a pastoral romance, it appears to have first opened the field to that species of composition.

2. A pastoral romance by Sir Philip Sidney, published in 1590, but written in 1580-81. Its whole title is "The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia." Although the scenes are artificial, the freshness of Sidney's style gives reality and interest to it.

3. A romance by Robert Greene, published in 1589. It is formed on the model of Sidney's celebrated pastoral, which, though it was not printed till some years after the publication of Greene's Arcadia, had been written a considerable time before it. Dundlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, II. 557.

4. A pastoral romance by Lope de Vega, modeled on Sannazaro, which, though written long before, was not printed till 1598.—5. A pastoral play by Shirley, printed 1640, having been acted some time previously. This is a dramatization of Sir Philip Sidney's romance.

Arcadius (är-kä'di-us). [Gr. Ἀρκάδιος.] Born in Spain 383 (377?) A. D.; died May 1, 408. Byzantine emperor 395-408, the elder of the two sons of Theodosius and Flaccilla. He succeeded, under the guardianship of Rufinus, to the eastern half of the empire on the death of his father and the permanent division of the Roman Empire. Rufinus claimed the civil government also of the Western Empire, and was murdered in 395 by Gainas, commander of the Gothic mercenaries at Constantinople, who acted under the instructions of Stilicho, the guardian of Arcadius's brother Honorius, emperor of the West. Arcadius now fell under the influence of the eunuch Eutropius, supported by Gainas. After the death of Eutropius (399) and of Gainas (401) he was governed entirely by his dissolute wife Eudoxia. In this reign Alaric settled with his West Goths in Illyria, and was appointed dux in Illyricum orientale.

Arcady (är'ka-di). An obsolete or poetical form of Arcadia.

Arcagnolo. See Oreagna.

Arc de Triomphe du Carrousel (ärk dè trè-önf' dü kä-rö-sel'). [F., 'triumphal arch of the tilting-yard.'] A triumphal arch built by Napoleon I. at Paris, in commemoration of his victories of 1805-06, in the square enclosed by the Tuileries and the Louvre. It imitates, on a smaller scale, the Arch of Constantine at Rome. It has a large archway between two small ones, flanked by Corinthian columns, an entablature, and a high attic. Reliefs over the small archways represent incidents of the campaigns; over the columns are placed statues of soldiers of the empire, and in the spandrels of the large archway are sculptured Victories. On the summit is a group in bronze representing a four-horse chariot. The height is 48 feet, the width 63.

Arc de Triomphe de l'Étoile (ärk dè trè-önf' dè lä-twäl'). [F., 'triumphal arch of the star.'] A triumphal arch, the largest existing, at the head of the Champs Élysées, Paris. It was begun in 1806 by Napoleon I., but not finished until 1836. The structure is 146 feet wide, 160 high, and 72 deep. Its chief fronts are pierced with a single archway 67 feet high and 46 wide, and the ends have smaller archways. The spandrels of the large archway are adorned with Victories by Pradier, and flanked by large rectangular panels representing military episodes, as do the reliefs of the frieze. Above the heavy cornice there is an attic with shields bearing titles of victories. Against the four piers of the fronts are placed pedestals, upon which are colossal high reliefs representing (east front) triumph of Napoleon and Peace of Vienna (1810), by Cortot; departure of troops for the frontier in 1792, by Rude; (west front) blessings of peace (1815), and resistance of France to invasion (1814), both by Etex. The vaults are inscribed with the names of battles won by France, and of Republican and Imperial officers.

Arcesilaus (är-ses-i-lä'us), or Arcesilas (är-ses-i-las). [Gr. Ἀρκείλαος, Doric Ἀρκείλαος.] Born at Pitane, Æolis, about 316 B. C.; died about 241 B. C. A Greek skeptical philosopher, founder of the second Academy.

Arch (äreh), Joseph. Born at Barford, Warwickshire, England, Nov. 10, 1826. An English social reformer, founder of the National Agricultural Laborers' Union in 1872.

Arch of Augustus, or Porta Romana. A fine simple Roman triumphal arch at Rimini, Italy, built in 27 B. C. in honor of the restoration of the Flaminian Way. It is of white travertine, 45.9 feet high and 28.8 thick, with a single arch 29.5 feet high and 26.9 wide. A Corinthian fluted column on each side of the archway supports an entablature, above which there is a low pediment. In the spandrels are medallions of divinities.

Arch of Constantine. An arch in Rome built 312 A. D. in honor of Constantine's triumph over Maxentius. It has a large central archway between two smaller ones, and four Corinthian columns on each front. The attic bears a long inscription. Much of its abundant sculpture was taken from the destroyed Arch of Trajan; that of Constantine's artists, associated with it, is much inferior.

Arch of Drusus. An arch (wrongly named) built by Caligula to carry an aqueduct for the supply of his thermæ over the Via Appia near the gate of San Sebastiano. It is built of travertine, incrustated with white marble, and decorated with Composite columns, and originally had on each side an entablature and a pediment. The style is very poor.

Arch of Hadrian. A triumphal gateway at Athens, probably built by Hadrian, between the old city and his new quarter. It is 59 feet high, with a single arch 20 feet high. Above the arch there is an attic with three large openings, originally closed. Above the central opening there is a pediment. The arch was decorated on each side with Corinthian columns.

Arch of Janus Quadrifrons. An arch in the Velabrum, Rome, at the northeastern extremity of the Forum Boarium. It is a four-way arch of marble, largely built of older architectural fragments, late in period and degraded in style. The interior is covered with a simple groined vault. The four fronts bear 32 niches for statues of divinities, and on the massive piers 16 blind niches flanking the archways. The attic is destroyed. The structure was used in antiquity as a kind of financial exchange.

Arch of Septimius Severus. An arch in the Roman Forum, dedicated 203 A. D., in commemoration of victories over the Parthians. It is of Pentelic marble, with a central arch and two side arches, flanked by four Corinthian columns on each face. There are panels over the side arches and a frieze above all with reliefs of Roman triumphs. The attic bears inscriptions.

Arch of Titus. An arch in Rome, built in commemoration of the taking of Jerusalem. It has a single archway, the opening flanked on each face by four Composite columns. The spandrels bear Victories in relief, and on the high attic is the dedicatory inscription. The vault is richly coffered and sculptured, and the interior faces of the piers display reliefs of Titus in triumph, with the plunder of the temple at Jerusalem, in which the seven-branched candlesticks are conspicuous.

Arch of Trajan. 1. An arch over the Appian Way at Benevento, Italy, dedicated A. D. 114, and one of the finest of ancient arches. It is of white marble, 48 feet high and 30½ wide, with a single arch measuring 27 by 16½ feet. On each face there are four engaged Corinthian columns, with an entablature, above which is a paneled attic. The arch is profusely sculptured with reliefs illustrating Trajan's life and his Dacian triumphs. There are Victories in the spandrels and dedicatory inscriptions on the central panels of the attic. 2. An arch erected at Aneona A. D. 112. It is of white marble, and stands at the end of the breakwater built by Trajan, and is perhaps the best-proportioned of all Roman triumphal arches. It has a single opening 46 by 29½ feet, two engaged Corinthian columns on the face of each pier, and a high attic above the entablature.

Archangel (ärk-än'jel), or Archangelsk (är-chäng'gelsk). The largest and northernmost government of Russia, bounded by the Arctic Ocean, the White Sea, the Ural Mountains, Finland, and the governments of Vologda and Olonetz. The surface is generally level, sterile in the north and covered with forests in the south. Area, 331,505 square miles. Population (1887), 340,251.

Archangel, or Archangelsk. A seaport, the capital of the government of Archangel, situated on the Dwina near the White Sea in lat. 64° 32' N., long. 40° 33' E.; the chief commercial town in the north of Russia, and long the only Russian seaport. The harbor is open from May to September. Archangel exports grain, flax, linseed, pitch, skins, tar, etc. It was visited by the English in 1553, and an English factory was built. A Russian fort was built in 1584. The town was blockaded by the British in 1854 and in 1855. Population, 17,892.

Archangel Bay, or Gulf of Archangel. An arm of the White Sea near Archangel.

Archas. The person in Fletcher's "The Loyal Subject" who gives to the play its name: a general of the Muscovites whose loyalty is of that exaggerated description that bears all kinds of outrage from an unworthy king. Young Archas, the son of the general, disguises himself as a woman, and takes the name of Alinda.

Archdale (äreh'däl), John. An English colonial official, governor of North Carolina about 1695-96.

Archelaus (är-kö-lä'us). [Gr. Ἀρχέλαος.] One of the Heraclidae, the traditional founder of the Macedonian royal house.

Archelaus. Lived about 450 B. C. A Greek philosopher of the Ionian school, said to have been the instructor of Socrates and Euripides; surnamed "Physicus" ('the physicist') from his devotion to physical science. He regarded heat and cold as the principles of generation.

Archelaus. Died 399 B. C. King of Macedonia 413-399 B. C., the natural son of Perdiccas II. He was a patron of Hellenic art and literature, and attracted to his court Zeuxis, Euripides, and Agathon, and invited Socrates, who declined.

Archelaus. A Cappadocian general in the service of Mithridates. He was defeated by Sulla at Charonea in 86 B. C., and at Orchomenus in 85, and deserted to the Romans in 81.

Archelaus. King of Egypt 56 or 55 B. C., a son of Archelaus of Cappadocia. He became high priest at Comana 63 B. C., and secured the hand of Berenice, queen of Egypt, by representing himself to be the son of Mithridates Eupator. He was defeated and slain by the Romans after a reign of six months.

Archelaus. King of Cappadocia from about 34 B. C. to 17 A. D., a grandson of Archelaus (about 56 B. C.). He owed his elevation to Mark Antony, who was captivated by the charms of Archelaus's mother, Glaphyra. He sided with Antony in the war with Octavian; was suffered, after the defeat of Antony, to retain his kingdom, to which was subsequently added part of Cilicia and Lesser Armenia; and was summoned to Rome by Tiberius, where he was detained till his death.

Archelaus. Died at Vienna, Gaul. Ethnarch of Judea, Samaria, and Idumea about 3 B. C.—7 A. D., a son of Herod the Great. He was deposed by Augustus.

Archelaus. Lived probably in the 1st century A. D. A Greek sculptor. A bas-relief, the "Apotheosis of Homer," carved by him, is in the British Museum.

Archenholz (är'chen-höltz), Baron Johann Wilhelm von. Born near Dantzic, Sept. 3, 1743; died near Hamburg, Feb. 28, 1812. A German historian. He wrote "Geschichte des siebenjährigen Kriegs" (1793, "History of the Seven Years' War"), etc.

Archer (är'chèr), Branch T. Born 1790; died Sept. 22, 1856. A Texan revolutionist and politician. He removed to Texas in 1831, presided over the "consultation" Nov. 3, 1835, was a member of the first Texan congress 1836, was sent to Washington where he became speaker of the House and was secretary of war, 1839-42.

Archer. In Farquhar's comedy "The Beaux' Stratagem," a friend of Aimwell who pretends to be his servant in order to further the success of the stratagem. He carries on various lively adventures on his own account. See Aimwell.

Archer, The. See Sagittarius.

Archer River. A river in Cape York Peninsula, Queensland, Australia, which flows into the Gulf of Carpentaria.

Archias (är'ki-as), Aulus Licinius. [Gr. Ἀρχίας.] A Greek poet, a native of Antioch (from about 120 B. C.). Cicero defended him (61 n. c.) against the charge of assuming Roman citizenship illegally, in an oration (pro Archia poeta) from which chiefly he is known.

Archibald (är'ehi-bäl), Sir Adams George. Born at Truro, Nova Scotia, May 18, 1814; died at Halifax, Dec. 14, 1892. A Canadian politician and jurist, secretary of state for the Dominion of Canada 1867-68, and lieutenant-governor of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories 1870-1873. He was knighted in 1885.

Archidamus (är-ki-dä'mus) II. [Gr. Ἀρχίδαμος.] King of Sparta 469 to about 427 B. C. He led the Peloponnesian army against Athens in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war.

Archidamus III. King of Sparta from 361 to 338 B. C. He defeated the Arcadians and Argives in the "Tearless Battle," 367, and was killed in battle in 338.

Archidamus. A Bohemian lord in Shakspeare's "Winter's Tale."

Archigenes (är-ki-j'e-néz). [Gr. Ἀρχιγένης.] A Greek physician, a native of Apamea in Syria, who practised in Rome in the time of Trajan (98-117 A. D.): the most celebrated of the eclectics. He was the author of a treatise on the pulse, to which Galen added a commentary.

Archilochus (är-kil'ò-kus). [Gr. Ἀρχιλόχος.] A Greek lyric poet of Paros who flourished about 700 B. C. (the date is much disputed). He was famous for his satiric iambic poetry. "The Emperor Hadrian judged that the Muses had shown a special mark of favor to Homer in leading Archilochus into a different department of poetry." (Smith.) The invention of elegiacs was attributed to him. See Callinus.

He [Archilochus] was born of a good family at Paros, but lived, owing to poverty, a life of roving adventure, partly, it appears, as a mercenary soldier, partly as a colonist to Thasos; nor do his wanderings appear to have been confined to eastern Hellas, for he speaks in praise of the rich plains about the Siris in Italy (frag. 21). He was betrothed to Neohule, the youngest daughter of Lycambes, his townsman; but when she was refused him, probably on account of his poverty, he vented his rage and disappointment in those famous satires which first showed the full power of the iambic metre, and were the wonder and the delight of all antiquity. He ended his life by the death he doubtless desired, on the field of battle. In coarseness, terseness, and bitterness he may justly be called the Swift of Greek literature. But even the scanty fragments of Archilochus show a range of feeling and a wide-ness of sympathy far beyond the complete works of Swift.

Mahaffy, Hist. Classical Greek Lit., I. 359.

Archilochus, if not absolutely the inventor, was the creator of these two metres, the iambic and trochaic, as truly as Homer was the creator of the heroic measure.

Synonids, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 279.

Archimago (är'ki-mä'), or Archimago (är-ki-mä'gō). 1. The impersonation of Hypocrisy in Spenser's "Faerie Queene," a magician and a compound of deceit and credulity. He deceives Una by assuming the appearance of the Red Cross Knight, but his falsehood is exposed. The whole story is taken from Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," ii. 12.

2. The personification of Indolence in Thomson's "Castle of Indolence."

Archimedes (är-ki-mē'dēz). [Gr. Ἀρχιμήδης.] Born at Syracuse about 287 B. C.; died at Syracuse, 212 B. C. The most celebrated geometri-cian of antiquity. He is said to have been a relative of King Hiero of Syracuse, to have traveled early in life in Egypt, and to have been the pupil of Conon the Samian at Alexandria. His most important services were rendered to pure geometry, but his popular fame rests chiefly on his application of mathematical theory to mechanics. He invented the water-screw, and discovered the principle of the lever. Concerning the latter the famous saying is attributed to him: "Give me where I may stand and I will move the world" (δός μου στῶν καὶ τὸν κόσμον κινήσω). By means of military engines which he invented he postponed the fall of Syracuse when besieged by Marcellus 214-212, whose fleet he is incorrectly said to have destroyed by mirrors reflecting the sun's rays. He detected the admixture of silver, and determined the proportions of the two metals, in a crown ordered by Hiero to be made of pure gold. The method of detecting the alloy, without destroying the crown, occurred to him as he stepped into the bath and observed the overflow caused by the displacement of the water. He ran home through the streets naked crying heureka, "I have found it." He was killed at the capture of Syracuse by Marcellus.

Archipelago (är-ki-pel'ä-gō), Greek. The various islands and groups of islands in the Ægean Sea. See Ægean Sea.

Archipelago, Indian or Malay. The various islands in the eastern hemisphere lying between Australia and the southeast coast of Asia, including Sumatra, Java, Borneo, Celebes, the Molucca, Lesser Sunda, and Philippine islands.

Archipelago, Duchy of. Same as duchy of Naxos.

Archon (är'kon). In Dryden's poem "Albion and Albanus," a character intended to represent Monk.

Archytas (är-kī'tas) of Tarentum. [Gr. Ἀρχύτας.] Lived about 400 B. C. A Greek Pythagorean philosopher, mathematician, and general, who enjoyed in antiquity a great reputation for his learning and virtues. He was drowned in the Adriatic.

Arçis-sur-Aube (är-sē'sür-ōb'). A town in the department of Aube, France, situated on the Aube 17 miles north of Troyes. It was the birth-place of Danton. Here a battle was fought, March 20 and 21, 1814, between the French under Napoleon and the Allies under Schwarzenberg. Napoleon was unsuccessful in his attempt to prevent the junction of Schwarzenberg and Blücher, and retreated, leaving the route to Paris open, with the intention of attacking the Allies in the rear. Population, about 3,000.

Arçite (är'sit). A Theban knight. For account of him see Chaucer's "Knight's Tale." Dryden's "Palamon and Arçite." The Arçite of Chaucer's "Anelida and Arçite" is not the same knight.

Arco (är'kō). A small town in Tyrol, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Sarea, near Lake Garda, 16 miles southwest of Trent; a noted winter resort. It contains a castle and the town palace of the counts.

Arco della Pace (är'kō del'lä pä'che). [It., 'arch of the peace.'] An arch in Milan, Italy, begun in 1807 in honor of Napoleon, and completed in 1838 in commemoration of the Peace of 1815. There is a large central arch flanked by smaller ones, and each front is ornamented by four Corinthian columns and an entablature. Above the attic is a fine bronze group of the goddess Peace in a six-horse chariot, and at the four angles are mounted Victories. The wall-spaces are covered with sculptured reliefs.

Arco dei Leoni (är'kō dä'ē lä-ō'nē). [It., 'arch of the lions.'] A Roman double-arched gateway in Verona, probably of the 3d century A. D., one arch of which is destroyed. It is of light and graceful proportions. On each side of the arch there is a Corinthian column; above there is a story with three openings between pilasters. The top story had columns with spiral fluting, one of which remains.

Arcole (är'kō-le), or Arcola (är'kō-lä). A village in the province of Verona, Italy, situated on the Alpone 15 miles southeast of Verona. Here a victory was gained by the French (about 15,000 under Napoleon (Masséna and Angereau, division commanders) over the Austrians (about 40,000 under Alvinczy, Nov. 15, 16, and 17, 1796, which prevented the relief of Mantua. It was fought largely in the swamps near Arcole. Population, 2,000 to 3,000.

Ardashir (är-dä-shēr'). The real founder of the Sassanian dynasty, surnamed "i Papakan," the son of Papak. He reigned from 211 or 212 A. D. to 241 or 242. Beginning with Papak's kingdom about Istakhr, he subdued Kerman and Susiana. In 224 he defeated and killed Ardashir, the last Parthian emperor, from which time he called himself "king of kings." While Istakhr was in theory the capital, his real capital consisted of Ctesiphon and Veh-Ardashir (Seleucia), on the opposite bank of the Tigris. The important fact in his career is his effective patronage of the Zoroastrian religion.

Arda Viraf. See the following.

Arda Viraf Namak (är'dä vēräf nä-mäk'). [The Book of Arda Viraf.] A favorite religious book among the Parsis, written in Pahlavi. In the reign of Shapur II., since doubts still existed as to the truth of the Zoroastrian religion, the Dasturs resolved to send one among them to the land of the dead to bring back certainty. Seven were chosen, and these chose three and these again one, Arda Viraf. Viraf drank three cups filled with a narcotic (mang), and slept until the seventh day, during which time he made a journey guided by Sraosha, "the angel of obedience," and Atar Yazad, "the angel of the fire," through heaven and hell. The rewards of the one and the punishments of the other are minutely described. Neither author nor date is known, but the book belongs undoubtedly to Sassanian times.

Ardelia (är-dē'liä). A pseudonym of Anne Finch, countess of Winchelsea.

Arden, Enoch. See Enoch Arden.

Arden (är'den). An English forest which in former times extended through Warwickshire and other midland counties of England. Malone and other editors of Shakspeare have held that the Forest of Arden of "As you Like it" was the Forest of Ardennes in French Flanders. Wherever the scene of the play was laid, it is evident from the allusions to Robin Hood and the bits of description that it is the English forest that Shakspeare meant, though the characters are French.

Arden of Feversham. 1. A tragedy first printed (anonymously) in 1592, and at one time attributed to Shakspeare. According to Fleay, who dates it 1585, there is some ground for attributing it to Kyd. Tieck translated it into German as Shakspeare's work. "It is a domestic tragedy of a peculiarly atrocious kind, Alice Arden, the wife, being led by her passion for a base paragon, Mosbie, to plot, and at last carry out, the murder of her husband. Here it is not that the versification has much resemblance to Shakspeare's or that single speeches smack of him, but that the dramatic grasp of character both in principals and in secondary characters has a distinct touch of his almost unmistakable hand. Yet both in the selection and in the treatment of the subject the play definitely transgresses those principles which have been said to exhibit themselves so uniformly and so strongly in the whole great body of his undoubted plays." Sainsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 424.

2. A tragedy, founded on the earlier one, by George Lillo in 1736. It was played first in 1739. It was practically unfinished and was altered and revised by Dr. John Hoadley in 1762. It was produced in this form in 1790.

Ardennes (är-den'). A department of France, capital Mézières, bounded by Belgium on the north and northeast, by Meuse on the east, by Marne on the south, and by Aisne on the west; formed largely from part of the ancient Champagne. Areopagica (är'ä-pä-jit'i-kä), or Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing. A pamphlet by John Milton, published in 1644. "The most splendid argument, perhaps, the world had then witnessed in behalf of intellectual liberty." Prescott, Hist. Ferd. and Isa., III. 191 (1850).

Areopagus (ä-ré-op'ä-güs). [Gr. Ἀρειος πάγος, 'Martial hill,' i. e. 'Hill of Mars (Ares).'] A low rocky hill at Athens continuing westward the line of the Acropolis, from which it is separated by a depression of ground. On the south side near the top there is a flight of fifteen rock-cut steps, and portions of the summit are hewn smooth to form platforms, doubtless for altars. Upon this hill sat the famous court of the same name, which originally exercised supreme authority in all matters, and under the developed Athenian constitution retained jurisdiction in cases of life and death and in religious concerns, and exercised a general censorship. From the slope of the Areopagus St. Paul delivered his address to the Athenians (Acts xvii.), who were probably assembled on the border of the Agora below. At the base of the steep rock, on the northeast side, there is a deep and gloomy cleft, at the bottom of which lies a dark pool of water. This was the famed Shrine of the Furies (Eumenides). The Areopagus was named from the tradition that here Ares (Mars) was put to trial for the slaying of Halirhotius; here too Orestes received absolution for killing Clytemnestra.

Arequipa (ä-rä-ké'pä). A department in southern Peru. Area, 39,336 square miles. Population, about 180,000.

Arequipa. The capital of the department of Arequipa, Peru, situated on a plain near the foot of the Misti volcano 7,611 feet above the sea, in lat. 16° 24' S., long. 71° 31' W. It is connected by rail with the port of Mollendo, 107 miles distant, and with Lake Titicaca, 218 miles, and another road is building to Cuzco. The plain, watered by irrigation, is very fertile, and the city has a large trade. It is an episcopal town, and the seat of a university and two collegios (schools). Arequipa was founded by Pizarro in 1540. It has frequently suffered from earthquakes, and was almost entirely destroyed by that of Aug. 13, 1868. In 1856 and 1857 the city was in rebellion against the government of President Castilla. The cathedral is a large building which has replaced the original cathedral of 1621, burned in 1844. The very wide front is divided at intervals by large Composite columns, between which there are two superposed orders with their entablatures. The central part of the façade is crowned by a long, low pediment filled with sculptures. In the lower story there is no opening but the great round-arched central portal. The façade is flanked by two excellent towers, which rise above it in two stages, with columns grouped at the angles, and each with a single round arch in every face. The towers are crowned by low pointed spires. Population, about 30,000.

Arequipa, or Misti (mës-té'). A semi-active volcano of the Andes, 19,200 feet high, near the city of Arequipa. Ascended by Pickering.

Ares (ä'rëz). [Gr. Ἄρης.] In Greek mythology, the god of war (son of Zeus and Hera), typical particularly of the violence, brutality, confusion, and destruction it calls forth. The corresponding Roman deity was Mars.

Ares, the warrior-god of the Greeks, has been identified by Professor Sayce with Uras, the warrior-god of the Babylonians, whose title, "the lord of the pig," helps to explain an obscure Greek myth which tells us that Ares slew Adonis by taking the form of a wild boar, the stung-dog being slain by the tusk of winter.

He wrote various astronomical works, including "Über die eigene Bewegung des Sonnensystems" (1837), and "Untersuchungen über die Eigenbewegung von 250 Sternen" (1839).

Argenis (är-'je-nis). A romance by John Barclay, published in 1621: said to have been written in "rivalry of the Arcadia." Argenis is the daughter of King Meliander of Sicily, and the story consists in an account of the war waged for her hand by Lycogenes, a Sicilian rebel, and Poliarclus, prince of Gaul.

We are informed in a Latin life of Barclay that it was a favorite work of Cardinal Richelieu, and suggested to him many of his political expedients. Cowper, the poet, recommends Argenis to his correspondents, Mr. Rose and Lady Hesketh, as "the most amusing romance that ever was written." "It is," says he in a letter to the former, "interesting in a high degree—richer in incident than can be imagined—full of surprises which the reader never foresees, and yet free from all entanglement and confusion. The style, too, appears to me to be such as would not dishonor Tacitus himself."

Dunlop, Hist. Prose Fiction, II, 347.

Argensola (är-'hen-sō-'lä), Bartolomeo Leonardo de. Born at Barbastro, Aragon, 1562; died Feb. 4, 1631. Argentine (är-'jen-tën) Republic, formerly Argentine Confederation. [Sp. República (or Confederación) Argentina, the 'Silver Republic,'] A republic of South America, capital Buenos Ayres, lying between Bolivia and Paraguay on the north, Paraguay, Brazil, Uruguay (separated by the Pileomayo, Paraguay, Uruguay), and the ocean on the east, the ocean and Chile on the south, and Chile (separated from it by the Andes) on the west. It is mountainous in the west, and contains the Pampas in the center, and the Gran Chaco in the north. The chief river system is that of the Rio de la Plata. Its chief products are hides, wool, tallow and other animal products, maize, wheat, flax, linseed, sugar, Paraguay tea, and live stock. There are 14 provinces and 9 territories. The government is vested in a president and a legislature comprising 30 senators and 60 deputies. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic, and the language Spanish. The inhabitants are chiefly Argentines (of Spanish descent), with many immigrants (largely Italian; also Spanish, French, etc.), Indians, and Ganchos. The country was colonized by Spain in the middle of the 16th century. The revolutionary movement began in 1810; independence was proclaimed in 1816 under the name United Provinces of La Plata (changed to Argentine Confederation in 1825); dictatorship of Rosas 1835-52; Buenos Ayres was separated from the confederation 1852-1859; Brazil and Argentina were allied in war with Paraguay 1865-70. By a treaty in 1881 Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego were divided between it and Chile. A financial crash occurred in 1890. The peak of Aconcagua is now within the Argentine boundary. Area, about 1,100,000 square miles. Population, estimated (1892), 4,257,000.

Argonautica (är-'gō-nä-'ti-kä). [L., from Gr. Ἀργοναυτικά, 'deeds of the Argonauts,'] An epic poem by Apollonius of Rhodes. See the extract.

Apollonius Rhodius (194 B. C.) wrote the Argonautica, an epic in four books on Jason's "Voyage in the Argo" to win the golden fleece. It is the work of a learned Homeric scholar who has not the Homeric feeling for the heroic age; it is artificial, and somewhat cold; but there is some fine dramatic painting; the poem is full of literary interest, and is the best of its class that the Alexandrian age has left. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 140.

Argonauts (är-'gō-nätz), The. [Gr. Ἀργοναυται, from Ἄργώ, their ship.] In Greek legend, the heroes who sailed to Colchis in the ship Argo to carry off the Golden Fleece. The expedition took place not long after the Trojan war. Jason was its leader, and it included demigods and heroes from all parts of Greece. See Golden Fleece, Jason, Medea.

Argos (är-'gos). [Gr. Ἄργος.] A city in Argolis, Greece, situated about 5 miles from the Argolic Gulf, in lat. 37° 38' N., long. 22° 43' E.; the leading Dorian city prior to the middle of the 8th century B. C. It remained an important town in later times, was often at variance with Sparta, and flourished under the Romans. It was ruled by the legendary dynasties of Inachus, Danaus, and Pelops. It produced many noted sculptors. It contains the remains of an ancient theater. The upper tiers of seats of the cavea are rock-hewn; below these are tiers of masonry. Twenty tiers in all survive, the lowest consisting of thrones of honor. There are remains of a Roman stage, and of several modifications of the Greek stage-structure. An underground passage ran from behind the proscenium to the middle of the orchestra, as at Etruria, etc. There are important remains of the Heraion, or sanctuary of Hera, the national shrine of Argolis, which lay at some distance from the city. The temple was rebuilt after a fire in the 5th century B. C., a little below the old site, as a Doric hexastyle peripteros about 65½ by 130 feet. The cult-statue was an admirable chryselephantine work by Polyceletus. The Heraion has been in course of excavation since 1892 by the American School at Athens, to which is due nearly all our knowledge of the architectural and sculptural remains of both temples and their peribolos, as well as a very valuable collection of archaic terra-cottas. Population (1889), 9,814.

Argostoli (är-'gos-tō-lë). A seaport and capital of Cephalonia, Ionian Islands, Greece, situated on the western coast in lat. 38° 12' N., long. 20° 29' E. It has a flourishing trade, and is the seat of a metropolitan. Population (1889), 9,085.

Arion (är-i-on). [Gr. Ἀρίων.] A Greek poet of Lesbos who flourished probably about 700 B. C. (later dates are given), and was famous as a player upon the cithara. He lived chiefly at the court of Periander, tyrant of Corinth. According to the legend Arion, while returning from a musical contest in Sicily in which he had been victor, was thrown into the sea by the sailors, but was saved and carried to Tenarus by dolphins which had gathered about the ships to listen to his lyre.

Arion, though a Lesbian by birth, belongs by art rather to the Dorian school. His great work was to give the dithyramb, or choral hymn to Dionysus, a finished choral form, by fixing the number (50) of the cyclic or circular chorus that was to sing it, grouped round the altar, and by dividing the singing and acting parts clearly from each other. We have a fragment by him [also ascribed to another poet], addressed to Poseidon, and telling of Poseidon's servants, the dolphins, who had wafted the poet safely to land, when he had lost his course at sea. A fable grew up that certain wicked sailors had thrown Arion overboard, and that the dolphins, charmed by his songs, had saved him. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 62.

Arion. In Greek legend, a fabulous horse, the offspring of Poseidon by Demeter (or, in other accounts, Gæa or a harpy) who to escape him had metamorphosed herself into a mare. It was successively owned by Copreus, Oncus, Heracles, and Adrastus. It possessed marvelous powers of speech, and its right feet were those of a man.

Arion. A pseudonym of William Falconer.

Ariosto (ä-rö-ös'tö or är-i-ös'tö), Ludovico. Born at Reggio, northern Italy, Sept. 8, 1474; died at Ferrara, Italy, June 6, 1533. A celebrated Italian poet, author of "Orlando Furioso." He was forced by his father, who was commander of the citadel of Reggio, to study law; but at length, being allowed to follow his inclinations, studied the classics, having a strong inclination toward poetry. As early as 1495 he wrote several comedies. Two of them, the "Cassaria" and "Suppositi," were acted about 1512. These attracted the attention of Cardinal Ippolito of Este, who took him into his service, where he remained till 1517, when he entered that of the cardinal's brother, Alfonso, duke of Ferrara, by whom he was employed as governor of the district of Garfagnana 1522-25. The province was distracted by banditti, but his government was satisfactory to his sovereign and his people for three years. He then declined an embassy to Pope Clement VII., and passed the last years of his life at Ferrara writing comedies and correcting his "Orlando Furioso" (which see), publishing the completed edition a year before his death, which was due to consumption. His seven satires, in the Horatian style, were published in 1534, after his death. They are gay, easy, and full of Epicurean philosophy. His comedies are placed next to those of Macchiavelli by most Italian critics.

Ariosto of the North. Sir Walter Scott.

Aristarchus (ar-is-tār'kus), or Aristarchos (-kos). [Gr. Ἀρισταρχος.] Born at Samos; lived between 280-264 B. C. A noted Greek astronomer of the Alexandrian school. His only extant work is a treatise on the magnitude and distance of the sun and moon.

Aristarchus, or Aristarchos. Born at Samothrace; flourished about the middle of the 2d century B. C.; died in Cyprus. A noted Alexandrian grammarian and critic, the most celebrated of antiquity. His most notable work was a recension of Homer. The text he established and his division of the poems into books are substantially those which have come down to us.

Aristarchus, or Aristarchos. An associate of the apostle Paul 51-57 A. D. He was a native of Thessalonica, accompanied Paul in several of his missionary journeys, and was his "fellow prisoner" in Rome. (Acts xix. xxi. xxvii.) He is represented by the Greek Church as bishop of Apamea in Phrygia, and by the Roman as bishop of Thessalonica.

Ariste (ä-rést'). The brother of Chrysale, in "Les Femmes Savantes" by Molière.

Aristeas (ar-is-tē'as). [Gr. Ἀριστεάς.] A Greek poet, assigned to various periods, from the 6th century B. C. to the time of Homer, and the reputed author of an epic poem, the "Arimaspea," in three books. The accounts of his life are fabulous; he is represented as a magician who rose after death, and whose soul could occupy or abandon his body at will.

Aristides, or Aristeides (ar-is-ti'déz). [Gr. Ἀριστείδης.] A Greek writer of the 2d century B. C., author of a romance, the "Milesiaca" or "Milesian Tales," a prose work in six or more books. He was the founder of Greek romance and "the title of his work is supposed to have given rise to the term 'Milesian' as applied to works of fiction" (Smith).

Aristides, or Aristeides (ar-is-ti'déz). Died probably at Athens about 468 B. C. A celebrated Athenian statesman and general, son of Lysimachus; surnamed "The Just." He was one of the ten generals in the year of the battle of Marathon (490), and chief archon in 489; was constantly opposed to Themistocles; and was ostracized in 483. He took part in the victory of Salamis (480), was Athenian commander at the victory of Plataea (479), carried through civic reforms (477), and was chief founder of the Delian League (about 477).

Aristides, or Aristeides, Quintilianus (kwintil-i-ā'nus). The (Greek) author of a treatise on music (printed in the collection of Meibomius 1652) who lived, probably, in the 1st century A. D. His work is the most important ancient book on the subject.

Aristides, or Aristeides, of Thebes. A Greek painter, son or brother, and in either case the pupil, of Nicomachus, and a contemporary of Apelles. He was preëminently the painter of the ἦθος and πάθος, or the expression of the mind and passions of man.

Aristides, or Aristeides, Publius Ælius, surnamed Theodorus. Born at Adriani in Mysia, 117 A. D.; died at Smyrna about 180 A. D. A celebrated Greek rhetorician, a friend and adviser of Marcus Aurelius. His father Eudæmon was a priest of Jupiter, and he himself became a priest of Æsculapius at Smyrna.

Aristippus (ar-is-tip'us). [Gr. Ἀριστίππος.] Born at Cyrene, Africa; lived about 380 B. C. A Greek philosopher, a pupil of Socrates, and the founder of the Cyrenaic School. See Cyrenæics.

Aristippus, or The Jovial Philosopher. A play by Thomas Randolph, printed in 1630.

Aristo (ä-rēs'tō). The brother of Sganarelle, in Molière's "Ecole des Maris."

Aristobolus (a-ris-tō-bō'lus). [Gr. Ἀριστόβουλος.] Lived in the 4th century B. C. A general of Alexander the Great, and the historian of his Asiatic expedition.

Aristobolus. Lived about 160 B. C. An Alexandrian Jew and Peripatetic philosopher.

Aristobolus I. Son of John Hyrcanus, and king of Judea 105-104 B. C. His Hebrew name was Judah. He is said to have been the first of the Hasmoneans to assume the title of king. During his brief reign he extended Judea in the regions of Iturea and Trachonitis, and forced Judaism on the conquered peoples.

Aristobolus II. Died about 48 B. C. Son of Alexander Jannæus, designated by his mother, the queen-regent Alexandra, high priest, while to his elder brother Hyrcanus II. the throne was bequeathed. After her death a contest took place between the two brothers which brought Pompey for the first time to Jerusalem (63 B. C.); he defeated Aristobolus and led him captive to Rome.

Aristobolus III. A Jewish prince, grandson of Hyrcanus II., brother of Mariamne, and thus brother-in-law of Herod I. He was made high priest by Herod, but, fearing his great popularity, Herod had him assassinated (about 30 B. C.). He was the last male representative of the Hasmonean family.

Aristodemos (a-ris-tō-dē'mus). [Gr. Ἀριστόδημος.] Lived in the 8th century B. C. A Messenian national hero in the first war against Sparta. He offered his daughter's life, in response to an oracle, for the preservation of the Messenian state; and when her lover, in order to save her, declared that she was with child by him, killed her and opened her womb to refute the lie. He was made king about 729 B. C.; but although he gained a victory over the Spartans 724 B. C., was unable to continue the war, and killed himself on his daughter's tomb before 722 B. C.

Aristogiton, or Aristogeiton (a-ris-tō-jit'on). [Gr. Ἀριστογείτων.] See Harmodius.

Aristomenes (ar-is-tom'ē-néz). [Gr. Ἀριστομένης.] Lived in the 7th century B. C. A Messenian national hero in the second war against Sparta 645-630 (685-668). He was surprised in Eira, the last stronghold of the Messenians, by the Spartans, and compelled to surrender, but was allowed to depart with his men. He died in Rhodes at the court of his son-in-law Damagetus, and is said to have twice sacrificed the hecatombion, prescribed for one who with his own hand had killed one hundred of his enemies in battle.

Ariston (a-ris'ton), or Aristo (a-ris'tō). [Gr. Ἀριστων.] Born at Chios; died 250 B. C. A Greek Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Zeno and later, according to Diogenes Laertius, of the Platonist Polemo. He was called the "siren" from his eloquence, and "Phalantus" from his baldness. Of the various branches of philosophy he recognized only ethics as a legitimate study.

Aristonicus (a-ris-tō-ni'kus), or Aristonikos (-kos). [Gr. Ἀριστόνικος.] A natural son of Eumenes II. of Pergamus. When Attalus III., the successor of Eumenes, died, bequeathing the kingdom of Pergamus to the Romans, Aristonicus disputed the inheritance with the latter, defeating and taking prisoner P. Licinius Crassus 131 B. C. He was himself defeated and taken prisoner 130 B. C. by M. Perperna; was carried to Rome to adorn the triumph of M. Aquilius, the successor of Perperna; and was beheaded.

Aristophanes (ar-is-tof'a-néz). [Gr. Ἀριστοφάνης.] The greatest of the Greek comic poets. He was born probably between 450 and 446 B. C., and died not later than 380 B. C. He was an aristocrat who ridiculed radicalism and the advanced democracy, but spared the vices of his associates and his party. In matters of religion he was a great defender of orthodoxy against the new physical school, and was never weary of attacking Socrates and Euripides for their breaking up of the old faith (Jahafiy). His first play, the "Revellers" or "Banqueters," was produced in 427 B. C., and obtained the second prize; the "Babylonians" in 426; the "Acharnians" in 425, with the first prize; the "Knights" in 424, with the first prize; the "Clouds" in 423; the "Wasps" in 422, with the second prize; the "Peace" in 419, with the second prize; "Amphiarus" in 414, with the second prize; the "Birds" in 411, with the second prize; "Lysistrata" in 411; the "Thesmophoriazuse" in 410; the first edition of the "Plutus" in 408; the "Frogs" in 405, with the first prize; the "Ecclesiazuse" about 393; and the second edition of the "Plutus" in 388. Of these the "Acharnians," "Knights," "Clouds," "Wasps," "Peace," "Birds," "Lysistrata," "Thesmophoriazuse," "Plutus," "Frogs," and "Ecclesiazuse" are extant.

Aristophanes was not only a great satirist but a great poet. His comedies unite elements which meet nowhere in literature. There is a play of fancy as extravagant as in a modern burlesque; the whole world is turned topsyturvy; gods and mortals alike are whirled through the motley riot of one great carnival. There is a humour as delicate, a literary satire as keen, as the most exquisite wit could offer to the most subtle appreciation. And there are lyric strains of a wild woodland sweetness hardly to be matched save in Shakspeare. Aristophanes clung to the old traditions of Athens with a sort of jovial, unreasoning torism. Demagogues, philosophers, rhetoricians were his abomination. His ideal was the plain, sturdy citizen of the good old school who beat the Persian at Marathon. He claims for himself, and justly, that he is outspoken on the side of virtue against vice. But his personal judgments must be taken with reserve.

Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 100.

Aristophanes of Byzantium. A celebrated Alexandrian grammarian and critic, pupil and successor of Zenodotus and instructor of the great critic Aristarchus. Only fragments of his works have survived. He edited Homer and other Greek poets, and introduced the system of marking accents in order to preserve the true pronunciation of Greek, which was rapidly becoming corrupt.

Aristophanes, The English. Samuel Foote.

Aristophanes, The French. Molière.

Aristophanes' Apology. A poem by Browning, published in 1875. It is the sequel to "Balansion's Adventure."

Aristotle (ar'is-totl). [Gr. Ἀριστοτέλης.] Born at Stagira, in Chalcidice, 384 B. C.; died at Chalcis, in Eubœa, 322 B. C. The most famous and influential of Greek philosophers, the founder of the Peripatetic school. He was the son of Nicomachus, physician and friend of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. In his eighteenth year he went to Athens and became a pupil of Plato, with whom he remained for twenty years. After the death of Plato he went to Apateneus, as a guest of Hermias (whose sister or niece, Pythias, he afterward married), and remained there three years; then he went to Mytilene. In 343 (342?) he was summoned to the court of Macedon to undertake the education of Alexander (afterward "the Great"), then thirteen years old. In 335 (334?) he returned to Athens where he founded his school (see Peripatetic) and produced the greater part of his scientific works. He taught in the Lyceum. On the death of Alexander the uprising against the Macedonians forced Aristotle to flee from Athens to Chalcis in Eubœa, where he died. His numerous writings (the number of which is variously given, but was certainly very large) dealt with all the then known branches of science. They were partly in the form of dialogues, fragments of which have survived ("Eudemus"). These have been called his exoteric ("public," suited for the general public), and his other, more strictly scientific, works his esoteric ("private," suited for private instruction) writings. His extant works (which have been imperfectly preserved) fall into four groups: the logical, the metaphysical and those relating to natural science, the ethical, and the "Poetics" and "Rhetoric." They include the "Topics," "Analytics" ("Prior" and "Posterior"), "Sophistical Refutations," "Rhetoric," "Metaphysics," "Politics," "Poetics," "On Animals," "On Parts of Animals," "On Generation of Animals," "On the Soul," "On Locomotion of Animals," "Meteorologies," "Nicomachean Ethics," etc. Various works ascribed to him are spurious. A genuine treatise by him on the constitution of Athens was discovered in 1891 at the British Museum in a heap of papyrus rolls. The manuscript was probably written later than the 14th year of Domitian (from 95-100 A. D.). It is an almost complete text. The first Latin translation of his works, with notes, is that of the Arabian Averroës (1100; Venice, 1489); the first edition in Greek is that of Aldus Manutius (1495-98). Aristotle's influence upon the development of philosophy and science has been very great, especially during the centuries which preceded the birth of modern knowledge and scientific method. He was "the philosopher" par excellence. His works were the textbooks of the schools, and his opinions on all matters authoritative. See Organon, Nicomachean Ethics, Metaphysics.

Aristoxenus (ar-is-tok'se-nus). [Gr. Ἀριστοξένος.] Born at Tarentum, Italy; lived about 320 B. C. A Greek philosopher of the Peripatetic school, and writer on music; the founder of a school of musicians named, for him, the Aristoxenians.

Arius, or Areius (ar'i-us), or Areios (-os). [Gr. Ἄρειος.] Born in Libya (or Alexandria?) about 256 A. D.; died suddenly in Constantinople, 336 A. D. A celebrated presbyter of Alexandria, the founder of Arianism. See Arians. He was excommunicated for heresy by a provincial synod at Alexandria in 321, and defended his views (which were condemned) before the Council of Nicea in 325.

Arivaipa (ä-rë-vi'pä). A tribe of North American Indians living at the San Carlos agency, White Mountain reservation, Arizona, identified with the Pinaleno, also called the Tehikun, who have been classed as a subdivision of the Chiricahua. See Apaches.

Arizona (ar-i-zō'nä). [Said to be a corruption of Pima or Papago arison, little creeks.] A Territory of the United States, capital Phoenix, bounded by Utah on the north, New Mexico on the east, Mexico on the south, and California and Nevada (partly separated by the Colorado River) on the west, and extending from lat. 31° 20' to 37° N., and from long. 109° to 114° 45' W. Its surface consists of table-lands traversed by mountain-ranges, and it contains important mines of gold, silver, copper, etc. Arizona was explored by the Spaniards in the 16th century, was acquired from Mexico in 1848, and an additional part by the Gadsden Purchase in 1853, and was organized as a Territory in 1863. It has often been disturbed by wars with Apaches and other Indians. Area, 113,020 square miles. Population (1890), 59,620.

Arizpe (i-rëth'pä). [From Opatá ariz, ant.] A town in Sonora, Mexico, formerly the capital of that state, situated on the right bank of the Sonora River. It was probably the site of an Opatá village as early as 1540. The Mission of Arizpe dates from about 1640, and is one of the oldest in the Sonora River valley. At present (1893) the town has not over 4,000 inhabitants.

Arjish-Dagh (är-jësh'däg'). An extinct volcano, the ancient Argæus, the highest mountain in Asia Minor, situated in the vilayet of Angora in about lat. 38° 30' N., long. 35° 20' E. Its height is 13,100 feet.

Arkadia. See Areadia.

Arkansas (är'kan-sä or är-kan'zas). One of the Southern States of the United States, capital Little Rock, bounded by Missouri on the north, Tennessee and Mississippi (separated by the Mississippi) on the east, Louisiana on the south, and Indian Territory and Texas on the west, and extending from lat. 33° to 36° 30' N., and from long. 89° 40' to 94° 42' W. Its surface is in general level or rolling, and hilly in the west, with the Ozark Mountains in the northwest, and is traversed by the river Arkansas. The leading occupation is agriculture and the chief productions are cotton and Indian corn. Arkansas has 75 counties, sends 6 representatives and 2 senators to Congress, and has 8 electoral votes. It was first settled by the French in 1685, formed part of the Louisiana Purchase of 1803, was organized as a Territory in 1819, was admitted to the Union in 1836, seceded May 6, 1861, and was readmitted June, 1868. Area, 53,850 square miles. Population (1890), 1,128,179.

Arkansas. The second largest tributary of the Mississippi. It rises in the Rocky Mountains, flows east through Colorado and Kansas, and southeast through Kansas, Indian Territory, and Arkansas, and joins the Mississippi at Napoleon. Its length is about 2,600 miles, and its extreme width about 1 mile. It is navigable about 800 miles.

Arkansas City. A town in Cowley County, southern Kansas, on the Arkansas River. Population (1890), 8,347.

Arkansas Post. A village in Arkansas County, Arkansas, situated on the Arkansas River 73 miles southeast of Little Rock. It was captured by the Federals Jan. 11, 1863.

Arklow (ärk'lö). A seaport in the county of Wicklow, Ireland, situated at the mouth of the Avoca 39 miles south of Dublin. The Irish insurgents, about 30,000, defeated the royal troops near here June 10, 1798.

Arkona (är-kö'nä), or Arkon (är'kon). Cape. The northernmost point of the island of Rügen, Prussia, projecting into the Baltic Sea. It contained a Wendish sanctuary.

Arkwright (ärk'rit), Sir Richard. Born at Preston, England, Dec. 23, 1732; died at Cromford, Derbyshire, England, Aug. 3, 1792. An English inventor and manufacturer, a barber by trade. He invented the cotton-spinning frame (patented 1769), and established factories at Cromford and elsewhere, being the first to employ machinery on a large scale as a substitute for hand labor in textile manufactures. His claim to the invention was disputed by Hays, or Hayes, a reed-maker at Bolton, in 1785, and a verdict was rendered against him; Hays's claim is now, however, generally conceded to be fraudulent. Arkwright was knighted by George III. in 1786.

Arlanza (är-län'thä). A small river in northern Spain, a tributary of the Arlanzon.

Arlanzen (är-län-thön'). A small river in northern Spain, a tributary of the Pisnerga and tributary of the Douro.

Arlecchino and Arlequin. See Harlequin.

Arles (är'lz). Kingdom of. In medieval history, a kingdom which was formed by the union of the kingdoms of Transjuran Burgundy and Cisjuran Burgundy in 933. In 1032 its territories were annexed to the Holy Roman Empire. (See Burgundy, Cisjuran, and Transjuran.) Cisjuran Burgundy, formed in 879, is sometimes called the kingdom of Arles.

Arles (är'lz, F. pron. är'l). A city in the department of Bouches-du-Rhône, France, situated on the left bank of the eastern arm of the Rhône near its mouth, in lat. 43° 43' N., long. 4° 37' E.: the Roman Arlate or (under Constantine the Great) Constantia. It is especially noted for its antiquities, which include a Roman amphitheater (the largest in France), a Roman theater (where the Venus of Arles was found), a Roman obelisk, a Roman cemetery (Aliscamps), a forum, and a palace of Constantine. (See below.) It was called the "Gallic Rome" from its importance, was a favorite residence of Constantine, was the seat of several church councils, and became the capital of the kingdom of Arles in 879. From 1150 to 1251 it was a republic, and then became subject to Charles of Anjou, and followed the fortunes of Provence. The amphitheater is built of excellent masonry, and is one of the best-preserved structures of the kind. The exterior shows 2 stories of 60 arches, the lower Doric, the upper Corinthian. There were 43 tiers of seats, and 5 concentric corridors. The ancient podium of the arena is almost entire. The axes of the ellipse are 459 and 341 feet. The three square towers are parts of the fortification of the 8th century, erected either by the Moors or by Charles Martel. The Roman theater is of unusual size and richness of ornament. Two Corinthian columns of the back wall of the stage remain standing, with the bases of others, and the lower portion of the wall, with its doors and niches. Some of the tiers of seats also remain, and part of the exterior wall of the cavea, with arches, columns, and rich entablature. The cathedral (of St. Trophimus) has a plain early-Romanesque nave and Flamboyant choir. The remarkable western portal shows a great semicircular arch whose tympanum bears a figure of Christ and the emblems of the Evangelists. Population (1891), 24,288.

Arlincourt (är-län-kör'), Charles Victor Prévot, Vicomte d'. Born at the Château de Mérantris, near Versailles, Sept. 28, 1789; died at Paris, Jan. 22, 1856. A French poet and novelist, author of "Le solitaire" (1821), etc.

Arline (är'lën). The Bohemian Girl, in Balfe's opera of that name.

Arlington, Earl of. See Bennet, Henry.

Arlington (är'ling-ton). A town in Middlesex County, Massachusetts, 6 miles northwest of Boston. Population (1890), 5,629.

Arlington. A village in Alexandria County, Virginia, opposite Washington. It contains a national cemetery.

Arlington House. A mansion on the heights opposite Washington, District of Columbia, in the midst of the national cemetery. It was once the property of General Washington, and descended through Parke Custis to the Confederate general Robert E. Lee who married his daughter in 1831. It was occupied as headquarters by the Union army, the estate being a camp of the troops. It became the property of the United States government.

Arlon (är-lön'), Flem. Aarlen (är'lën). The capital of the province of Luxemburg, Belgium, 15 miles northwest of Luxemburg: the Roman Orolaunum Vicus. Near here the French under Jourdan defeated the Austrians under Beaulieu, April 16 and 17, 1794. Population, (1890), 8,029.

Armada (är-mä'dä), The Invincible or The Spanish. A great fleet sent by Philip II. of Spain against England in 1588. It consisted of 129 (or more) vessels, 19,295 soldiers, and 8,460 sailors, and was commanded by the Duke of Medina Sidonia. It was met and defeated by the English fleet of about 80 vessels, under Lord Howard of Effingham, in the English Channel and Strait of Dover, in Aug., 1588.

Armada (är'mä-däl). A novel by Wilkie Collins, published in 1866.

Armado (är-mä'dö), Don Adriano de. In Shakspeare's "Love's Labour's Lost," a verbose, fantastical Spanish military braggart. His prototype is found in old Italian comedy.

Armageddon (är-ma-ged'on), or Har-Magedon (här-ma-ged'on). [Höb. See the definition.] A name used in Rev. xvi. 16, and signifying 'the mountain of Megiddo.' The reference in the passage in Revelation is probably to Megiddo, but some refer it to the plain of Esdraelon in Galilee and Samaria, famous as a battle-field. See Esdraelon.

Armagh (är-mä'). A county in Ulster, Ireland, bounded by Lough Neagh on the north, Down on the east, Louth on the south, and Tyrone and Monaghan on the west; sometimes called the "Orchard of Ireland." The surface is hilly and undulating, and low in the north and south. Armagh has manufactures of linen and cotton. Area, 512 square miles. Population (1891), 143,289.

Armagh. A city and parliamentary borough in the county of Armagh, 34 miles southwest of Belfast, the seat of an Anglican archbishop (primate of Ireland) and a Roman Catholic archbishop. It was the ancient metropolis of Ireland and a seat of learning. The cathedral of Armagh, the metropolitan church of the Primate of Ireland, is a late-Pointed structure recently well restored. It was sacked by O'Neill in 1504. Population (1891), 8,303.

Armagnac (är-män-yäk'). In medieval history, a district in southern France corresponding in general to the department of Gers. It was made a county in the 10th century, and was united to the crown in the 16th century. The counts and their adherents were conspicuous in the 15th century. See Armagnacs.

Armagnac, Bernard VII., Comte d'. Died June 12, 1418. A French partisan leader of the Armagnacs (which see) in the civil war against the Burgundians. He was made constable and chief minister of France in 1415, and was murdered in prison by the mob shortly after the capture of Paris by the Burgundians.

Armagnac, Jean V., Comte d'. Born about 1420; died 1473. A political agitator, grandson of Bernard VII. He formed an incestuous union with his sister Jeanne Isabelle, which brought upon him the censure of the church and deprivation of his possessions by Charles VII. He was reinstated after the death of Charles, joined the League of the Public Weal against Louis XI. in 1465, and was put to death by the royalists at the capture of the castle of Lectoure.

Armagnac War (in G. often corrupted to Armegeckenkrieg). The contest between the Armagnac mercenaries of the emperor Frederick III. and the Swiss in 1444, which ended in the total defeat of the Armagnacs at St. Jakob on the Birs, Aug. 26, 1444.

Armagnacs (är-män-yäks'), The. 1. The party of the house of Orleans, opponents of the house of Burgundy during the reign of Charles VI.: so named from Bernard of Armagnac, their leader.—2. Bands of lawless mercenaries, consisting chiefly of natives of the county of Armagnac, trained in the civil wars between the Armagnac and Burgundian parties. To rid France of them they were sent by Charles VII. to aid the emperor Frederick III. in enforcing his claims against the Swiss in 1444.

Armançon (är-mön-sön'). A river in France, about 100 miles long, which joins the Yonne east of Joigny.

Armand Tefin. See Rouaric, Marquis de la.

Armande (är-mönd'). One of the learned ladies in Molière's comedy "Les Femmes Savantes." She loves Clitandre, but he loves her sister Henriette who is not a femme savante.

Armande Béjart. See Béjart.

Armanzperg (är'mänz-perg), Count Joseph Ludwig von. Born at Kötzing, in Lower Bavaria, Feb. 28, 1787; died at Munich, April 3, 1853. A Bavarian statesman, president of the regency of Greece 1833-35, and chancellor of state 1835-37.

Armatoles (är'mä-tölz), or Armatoli (är-mä-tö'li). A body of irregular Greek (Christian) local militia, in the employ of the sultans from the 15th century to the Greek revolution in 1821. The Armatoles had existed in the Byzantine empire, and had served, in a measure, to protect the Greek population from the Franks, Albanians, and Servians. The institution was accepted by the sultans and incorporated in their administration. After the Peace of Belgrad (1739) the power of the Armatoles was attacked by the Porte, and it steadily declined. Large numbers of them joined the Greeks in the war of independence.

Armed Soldier of Democracy, The. Napoleon Bonaparte.

Armellina (är-me-li'nä). The shrewd maid-servant of Antonio, in Tomkiss's comedy "Al-bonazar." She is loved and finally won by Trinculo. See Trinculo.

Armenazar de Toledo, Alonso Henriquez de. Born in Navarre, 1543; died in Mexico, Nov. 5, 1628. A Spanish Franciscan friar. He was successively vicar-general of Peru, bishop of Sidonia (1603), bishop of Cuba from 1610 to 1623, and bishop of Michoacan in Mexico from 1624 until his death.

Armenazar (är-män-dä'rëth), José de, Marquis of Castellfuerte. Born at Rivagorza, Navarre, about 1670; died about 1740. A Spanish general. He commanded at the battle of Lagudina in Estremadura, May, 1709, and led the charge which broke the enemy's left at the battle of Villaviciosa, Dec. 10, 1710; commanded in Aragon and took part in the siege of Barcelona; was governor of Tarragona; thence passed to Sicily where he commanded at the siege of Malazzo and bore the brunt of the battle of Francavilla at the head of the royal guards; on his return to Spain was made governor of Guipuzcoa; and shortly after was named viceroy of Peru, reaching Lima in May, 1724. He returned to Spain in 1736.

Armenia (är-më'ni-ä). [F. Arménie, G. Armenien. The name Armenia (Armenia) first occurs in a Persian cuneiform inscription of Darius Hystaspis (521-486 B. C.). Its origin is in doubt. The native name was Biaina, the original of the modern Van.] The classical name of the Hebrew Ararat, Assyrian Urartu, the country which extends from the shores of Lake Van between the Upper Euphrates and Media, forming the juncture between the high plateau of Iran and the table-land of Asia Minor. Its greatest extent was from 37°-49' E. long. and 37° 30'-42' N. lat., or from the Taurus, the northeastern parts of Mesopotamia, and the Kurdish Mountains to the Caucasus and Georgia. The territory east of the Euphrates was called Great Armenia, and that to the west Little Armenia. The country is characterized by gloomy mountains, deep valleys, and a climate very hot in summer and extremely cold in winter. Only two of its mountains are mentioned by the ancients by name: the Taurus, and the Parjades in the north on the boundaries of Pontus. Several important rivers have their source in Armenia: the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Kyros (modern Kuri), and the Araxes (modern Aras). Urartu appears in the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions as one of the countries of Nairi, which subsequently gained the supremacy over the rest. Its kings carried on almost incessant war with Assyria. Expeditions against it with varying results are mentioned by the Assyrian kings Shalmaneser II. (860-824 B. C.), Shalmaneser III. (782-772 B. C.), Assurad III. (772-755 B. C.), and Tiglath-Pileser II. (745-727 B. C.). That it was not permanently and thoroughly subjugated by Assyria is shown by the fact that the murderers of Sennacherib fled (681 B. C.) to that country (Isa. xxvii. 38, 2 Ki. xix. 37). The oldest inscriptions found in Armenia are in Assyrian script and language. Later on, after Sarduris I. (in the Assyrian text Sëduri), 835 B. C., the cuneiform script was employed with the native language. The monuments in this language, known as "Vannic Inscriptions," were deciphered by Professor A. H. Sayce. According to him the people of Urartu constituted one of the Hittite tribes. The language, though inflectional, had no connection with either the Semitic or the Indo-European families of speech, and seems to have been the ancestor of the modern Georgian. As that language was spoken in Armenia as late as 640 B.C., the invasion of the Aryans, who are the forefathers of the modern Armenians, could not have taken place until after this date. After the Assyrian period Armenia became a dependency of Persia and Media. Alexander the Great conquered it along with the Persian empire, and after his death it became a province of the kingdom of the Seleucidae. From 149 B.C. to 428 A.D. the dynasty of the Arsacidae governed it under the nominal supremacy of Parthia and Rome. Then it was ruled by Persian, Byzantine, and Arabic governors until in 859 the dynasty of the Bagratides (descended from a noble Jewish family) arose, which came to an end in 1045. The last refuge of Armenian independence was destroyed by the Mamelukes in 1375. Since then the Armenians have been without an independent state, their country being divided between Persia, Turkey, and Russia. They still have an independent church, with the seat of government at Constantinople. See Ararat.

Armenia Major, Armenia Minor. See Armenia.

Armenian (är-mö'ni-an). 1. An inhabitant of Armenia.—2. The language prevalent in Armenia, and belonging to the Aryan family. It was formerly classed with Persian as belonging to the Iranian group, but is now separated as the sole extant member of an independent Aryan language. See Armenia.

Armentières (är-mö'n-tê-är'). A town in the department of Nord, France, situated on the Lys near the Belgian frontier, 9 miles northwest of Lille. It has manufactures of table-linen and cloth. Population (1891), commune, 28,638.

Armfelt (ärm'felt), Baron (Count) Gustav Mauritz. Born at Åbo, Finland, April 1, 1757; died at Zarskoe-Selo, Russia, Aug. 19, 1814. A Swedish general and statesman, distinguished in the war against Russia 1788-90. Later he was regent, was exiled and restored, and held high commands and offices. He entered the Russian service in 1811.

Armfelt, Karl Gustav. Born in Ingermanland, Nov. 9, 1666; died in Finland, Oct. 24, 1736. A Swedish general. He entered the French service in 1685, returned to Sweden in 1700, was intrusted by Charles XII. with the defense of Finland in 1713, was overpowered by Galitzin at Storkyro in 1714, was sent on a disastrous expedition to the north of Norway in 1718, and was commander-in-chief in Finland at his death.

Armgart (ärm'gärt). A poem (named from its chief character, a woman of great sensibility and imaginative power) by George Eliot, first published in "Macmillan's Magazine" for July, 1871.

Armida (är-mé'dä), or Armide (är-möd'). 1. An enchantress in Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered." She used her charms to seduce the Crusaders from their vows and duty. Her palace, surrounded by magnificent pleasure-grounds, was so luxurious and splendid that "the gardens of Armida" have become a synonym for gorgeous luxury. She also possessed a magic griddle which surpassed even the cestus of Venus in its power. Her voluptuous witchery was finally destroyed by a talisman brought from the Christian army, and Rinaldo, who had been enslaved by her, escaped. She followed him, and he finally defeated her in battle, persuaded her to become a Christian, and became her knight.

2. The title of operas by Lulli (produced in 1686), Traetta (Vienna, 1760), Jommelli (Naples, 1771), Gluck (Paris, 1777), Cherubini (1782), and Rossini (Naples, 1817).

Arminians (är-min'i-anz). The followers of Arminius (Jacobus Harmensen, 1560-1609), a Protestant divine of Leyden. They presented their doctrines in a "remonstrance" (1610; whence they are also called Remonstrants). See Harmensen and Remonstrants.

Arminius (är-min'i-us). [L. Arminius (Tacitus), supposed to represent an early Teutonic form of the mod. G. Hermann.] Born 18 B.C.; died 21 A.D. A German chieftain, prince of the Cherusci, and the liberator of Germany from the Roman dominion. He entered the Roman military service, and became a Roman citizen of the equestrian order. On his return he organized a revolt of the Cherusci, and defeated the governor Quintilius Varus in the Teutoburg forest 9 A.D. He was defeated by Germanicus on the Campus Idistavicus 16 A.D., but succeeded in maintaining the independence of the right bank of the Rhine. He overthrew Marobodus (Marbod), chief of the Suevi, who had made himself master of several neighboring tribes. He was assassinated as the result of a conspiracy against him among the German chiefs.

Armstrong (ärm'ströng), Archibald (Archie). Born at Arthuret in Cumberland, or at Langholm in Roxburghshire; died 1672. The celebrated jester of King James I. He is introduced in Scott's novel "The Fortunes of Nigel."

Armstrong, John. Born in Ireland, 1725; died at Carlisle, Pa., March 9, 1795. An American general. He served in the French and Indian war 1755-56, commanded the expedition against the Indian village of Kittanning in 1755, became brigadier-general in the Continental army March 1, 1776, resigned April 4, 1777, and was a delegate from Pennsylvania to the Continental Congress 1778-80 and 1787-88.

Armstrong, John. Born at Carlisle, Pa., 1758; died 1843. An American general, politician, and diplomatist, son of John Armstrong. He served in the Revolutionary War, and was the author of the "Newburg Addresses" to the army in 1783. He was United States senator from New York 1801-02 and 1803-04, minister to France 1804-10 (part of the time minister to Spain), and secretary of war 1813-14. He was appointed brigadier-general in 1812. Among his works is a history of the War of 1812.

Armstrong, John or Johnnie. A Scottish freebooter, the chief of a band of over 150 men, and the brother, apparently, of the Laird of Manger-ton, the chief of his name. He levied blackmail almost as far as Newcastle, and was a terror to the inhabitants. When, about 1520, James V. undertook to suppress the turbulence of the Border marauders or March men, Johnnie Armstrong, one of the most notorious of them, appeared before him with 36 of his band, well equipped and mounted, and offered his services. The king showed him no favor, but had him and all his men hanged upon trees near Hawick. The injustice of this treatment was the theme of several popular ballads. "Armstrong's Good-Night" was said to have been composed by one of the band. This ballad, with two entitled "Johnnie Armstrong," is to be found in "Child's English and Scottish Ballads." The Scottish champion swordsman whose story is told by Scott in "The Laird's Jock" seems to have been the son of the above-mentioned Laird of Manger-ton. William Armstrong (about 1506) known as "Kinnmont Willie," and William Armstrong (1602?, 1658?) known as "Christie's Will" were both noted freebooters, and belonged to the same family.

Armstrong, Samuel Chapman. Born in the Hawaiian Islands, Jan., 1839; died at Hampton, Va., May 11, 1893. An American officer in the Civil War, founder and principal of the Hampton Institute (Virginia) for negroes and Indians.

Armstrong, William George, Baron. Born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, Nov. 26, 1810. An English engineer and inventor of the Armstrong gun, a breech-loading cannon (1854-58). He was created first baron Armstrong in 1887.

Artagnan (är-tän-yon'), D'. One of the principal characters in "The Three Musketeers" by Dumas, and also in its sequels "Twenty Years After" and "Bragelonne." He is a young Gascon of an adventurous yet practical nature, with a genius for intrigue, who goes up to Paris to seek his fortune with an old horse, a box of miraculous salve given to him by his mother, and his father's counsel. His career is one of hairbreadth escapes (with death, in the end, on the field of battle) in the society of "The Three Musketeers," Athos, Porthos, and Aramis.

Artaguette (är-tã-get'). Killed 1736. A French military leader under Bienville, colonial French governor of Louisiana. He had subdued the Natchez Indians, and was engaged in fighting the Chickasaws, who, in connection with English traders from the Carolinas, defied French authority on the Mississippi, when he was wounded and captured in an attack upon the Chickasaw strongholds. He was burned at the stake.

Artamène (är-tã-män'), or The Grand Cyrus. A romance by Mademoiselle Sëndéry, published in 1650 in 10 volumes. Artamène is intended for the great Condé.

Artaphernes (är-tã-fër'nëz). [Gr. Ἀρταφέρνης.] Lived about 500 B. C. A brother of Darius Hystaspis by whom he was appointed satrap of Sardis. He interfered ineffectually in behalf of Hippias, the expelled tyrant of Athens, and took part in the war against the revolted Ionians.

Artaphernes. Son of the preceding. He commanded, with Datis, the Persian army which invaded Greece in 490 B. C., and led the Lydians in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece in 480.

Artaxaminous (är-taks-am'i-nus). The King of Utopia, a character in "Bombastes Furioso," a burlesque opera by W. B. Rhodes.

Artaxata (är-taks'a-tij). [Gr. Ἀρτάξατα, Arm. Artashat.] In ancient geography, the capital of Armenia in the 2d and 1st centuries B. C., situated in the plain of the Araxes, probably northeast of Ararat. It is said to have been built in accordance with the plan of Hannibal, by Artaxias I., 180 B. C.; was destroyed by Nero's general Corbulo in 58 A. D.; and was restored by Tiridates I.

Artaxerxes (är-taks-ërks'ëz) I. [Gr. Ἀρταξέρξης, Artoξέρξης.] See Artachshast and Ardashir.] King of Persia 465-425 (424?) B. C., son of Xerxes; surnamed "Longimanus" ("the Long-handed") from the excessive length of his right hand. His forces were defeated on sea and land in 449 B. C. in the double action of Salamis in Cyprus. See Artachshast.

There is every reason to believe that he was the king who sent Ezra and Nehemiah to Jerusalem, and sanctioned the restoration of the fortifications.

Laudinsson, Herod.

Artaxerxes II. King of Persia 405-361 (359?) B. C., son of Darius II.; surnamed "Mnemon" (Gr. Μνήμων) from the excellence of his memory. He was defeated by his younger brother Cyrus (who was killed in the battle) at Cunaxa in 401, and concluded the Peace of Antalcidas with Sparta in 387. During his reign the worship of Anaitis was adopted from the Babylonians by the Persians.

Artaxerxes III. King of Persia 361 (359?)-338 B. C., son of Artaxerxes II.; surnamed "Ochus." He reconquered Egypt and reduced Phenicia, and was poisoned by the eunuch Bagoas, his chief minister.

Artemidorus (är'të-mi-dö'rus), surnamed Daldianus ('of Daldis' in Lydia). [Gr. Ἀρτεμίδωρος, gift of Artemis.] Lived about 170 A. D. A Greek writer, author of a work "The Interpretation of Dreams" (ed. by Hercher 1864).

Artemidorus of Cnidos. In Shakspeare's tragedy "Julius Cæsar," a teacher of rhetoric.

Artemidorus of Ephesus. Lived in the 2d century A. D. (?) A Greek geographer.

Artemire (är-tã-mër'). A tragedy by Voltaire, produced in 1720. It was not successful, and the author preserved the best of it in "Marianne," which was produced in 1724.

Artemis (är'të-mis). [Gr. Ἄρτεμις.] In Greek mythology, one of the great Olympian deities, daughter of Zeus (Jupiter) and Leto (Latona), and twin sister of Apollo. She may be regarded as a feminine form of Apollo. She chastised evil with her keen shafts and with deadly sickness, and also protected mortals from danger and pestilence. Unlike Apollo, she was not connected with poetry or divination, but, like him, she was a deity of light, and to her was attributed authority over the moon, which belonged more particularly to her kinswomen Heate and Selene. In art Artemis is represented as a virgin of noble and severe beauty, tall and majestic, and generally bearing bow and quiver as the huntress or mountain goddess. She was identified by the Romans with their Diana, an original Italian divinity.

Artemis. A court lady in Dryden's comedy "Marriage à-la-Mode."

Artemis, Temple of. See Ephesus.

Artemisia (är-të-mish'iä). [Gr. Ἀρτεμισία.] Queen of Caria 352-350 B. C. In memory of her husband Mausolus, she built at Halicarnassus the mausoleum which was reckoned one of the wonders of the world. (See Mausolus.) To give further proof of her affection she is said to have mixed her husband's ashes with a precious liquid and to have drunk the potion so prepared.

Artemisia. Queen of Halicarnassus, and vassal of Persia, distinguished in the battle of Salamis, 480 B. C.

Artemisium (är-të-mish'i-um). [Gr. Ἀρτεμισιον, temple of Artemis.] A promontory in northern Eubœa, Greece, near which occurred an indecisive naval battle between the Greeks under Eurybiades and the Persians under Achæmenes, 480 B. C.

Arthur (är'thur). [ME. Arthur, Arthour, from OF. Arthur (ML. Arthurus, Arturus), from W. Arthur, earlier Artus, conjectured to be from Old Celtic (Old Ir.) art (artta-), stone. The extant Ir. Arthur is from E. or W.] A British chieftain who lived in the 6th century. He fought many battles, and was finally killed at the battle of Mount Badon, near Bath, 520 A.D. He was buried at Glastonbury. In the time of Henry II., according to Geraldus Cambrensis and others, his remains were discovered there. Nennius, a Breton monk, left in the 10th century a short Latin chronicle which is the earliest authentic account we have of him. He is celebrated in Welsh, Breton, and old French romance, but his actual existence and deeds have very little to do with the origin of the cycle of romances to which his name is given, as around him myths relating probably to some remote ancestor or ancestors have crystallized.

Arthur, King. In Fielding's burlesque "Tom Thumb," a "passionate sort of king," husband to Dollalolla, of whom he is afraid, and in love with Glumdalea.

Arthur, Count or Duke of Brittany. Born at Nantes, France, March 29, 1187; killed at Ronen, France, April 3, 1203. Son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, murdered probably by order of his uncle, King John.

Arthurian Cycle of Romances, The. A series of romances relating to the exploits of Arthur and his knights. They were "Breton romances amplified in Wales and adopted at the court of the Plantagenets as the foundation of the epic of chivalry." Geoffrey of Monmouth (about 1140) may perhaps be considered as the source of the legends. He collected or invented in such a manner as to give a chivalric interest to his material, on which the great mass of later romance was based or grafted. From about 1150 poems were sung by wandering minstrels on the adventures of Arthur and his knights. The French prose "Morte Arthur" was not compiled till the latter half of the 13th century, and had not originally this title. It was an abridgment and consolidation, by Rustichello (or Rusticien) of Pisa, of a number of the prose romances which grew from these poems. The English "Morte Arthur" of Sir Thomas Malory is thought to have been translated from some earlier compilation, perhaps that of Hélie de Borron. The stories of Arthur, Guinevere, Merlin, The Round Table, Lancelot, The Holy Grail, Tristan, Perceval, Meliadus, Guiron, Ysaie le Triste, and Arthur de Bretagne are the principal romances both British and French in this cycle. There is a large number of minor poems and prose romances which deal with special episodes.

Artichofsky (är-të-shov'skë), or Arciszewski (ärt-së-shev'skë), Crestofie d'Artischa. Born in Poland about 1585; date of death not recorded. A Polish soldier who entered the service of the Dutch West India Company in 1623, and distinguished himself in the wars with the Portuguese in Brazil, 1631-39. He returned to Holland in 1637, and in Dec., 1638, was sent back in command of a reinforcement, with a rank so high that it conflicted with the powers of the governor, Maurice of Nassau. A quarrel ensued, and in 1639 Artichofsky was ordered back to Holland.

Ashtavakra (ash-tā-va'krā). In Hindu legend, the hero of a story in the Mahabharata. His father Kahoda, devoted to study, neglected his wife. Ashtavakra, though still unborn, rebuked him, and the angry father condemned the son to be born crooked (hence the name, from ashtan, eight, and vakra, crooked). At the court of Janaka, king of Mithila, Kahoda was defeated in argument by a Buddhist sage and was drowned in accordance with the conditions. In his twelfth year Ashtavakra set out to avenge his father, and worsted the sage, who declared himself to be a son of Yama sent to obtain Brahmans to officiate at a sacrifice. Kahoda was restored to life, and commanded his son to bathe in the Samanga River, whence the boy became perfectly straight. In the Vishnu Purana some celestial nymphs see Ashtavakra performing penance in the water and worship him. He promises them a boon and they ask the best of husbands. When he offers himself, they laugh in derision at his crookedness. He cannot recall his blessing, but condemns them to fall into the hands of thieves.

Asia (ā'shiĭ or ā'zhiĭ). [F. Asie, G. Asien. Perhaps from the Semitic stem acū, to go out, going out, rise of the sun: G. Morgenland.] 1. A continent of the eastern hemisphere, the largest grand division of the world. It is bounded by the Arctic on the north, Bering Strait (which separates it from North America) on the northeast, the Pacific on the east, and the Indian Ocean on the south. The Red Sea separates it from Africa, to which it is joined by the Isthmus of Suez (now pierced by a canal), and the Mediterranean, Black, and Caspian seas separate it in part from Europe. The European boundary is vague, but is roughly represented by the Ural and Caucasus. Asia extends from lat. 1° 16' N.-77° 40' N., and long. 26° 3' E.-169° 40' W. The chief divisions of the mainland are Korea, Asiatic Russia, the Chinese empire, the French possessions and protectorates, Siam, British India, Afghanistan, Persia, Turkey, and Arabia. With the ancients the name also embraced the few parts of Africa known to them, and it was only after the Nile began to be considered as a dividing river that the countries west of it were separated from Asia, while Egypt was still included in it. Moreover, the knowledge of the ancients with regard to Asia did not reach far beyond the boundaries of the Perso-Macedonian empire. The parts south of the Himalayas were called India, those to the north Scythia. The west was termed Upper and Lower Asia, the Tigris being the dividing line between both. In the books of the Maccabees "Asia" designates the parts of the kingdom of the Seleucids excepting Syria, i. e., the greatest part of Asia Minor; in the New Testament the Roman province, namely, the western part of the peninsula of Asia Minor, with Ephesus as capital, which was bequeathed to the republic by Attalus, king of Pergamon (133 B. C.). In Asia, it is assumed, "stood the cradle of mankind"; according to legends of the oldest Asiatic nations, in the region of the Hindukush. Western Asia was, and is still, occupied by Semites. The Indo-Germanic branch of the human family occupied in ancient time the highland of Iran and the basins of the Oxus and Jaxartes, while Asia Minor was the meeting-point of both Semites and Aryans. Asia was the seat of many splendid ancient civilizations (the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Indian, Chinese, etc.), and in it originated the great religions of the world, Judaism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism. Parts of it have in all ages been the theater of notable conquests. In modern times it has to a considerable extent fallen under the control of the Turks, Russians, British, and French. The principal physiographic divisions of Asia are the Siberian and Turanian lowlands (steppes, in part), the desert regions of Arabia, Persia, and Mongolia, the plateau of the Deccan, and the vast mountain complex which centers about the Pamir and in various branches traverses the greater part of the continent south and southeast of Turkestan and Siberia. Mount Everest, in the Himalaya, 29,002 feet, is the culminating point of the globe. Rivers of the first magnitude are numerous, the longest being the Yangtze, Yenisei, and Obi. Area, with islands (estimated), 17,255,890 square miles. Population (estimated), 825,954,000.

Asia Minor (mī'nor). [L., 'lesser Asia'; F. Asie Mineure, G. Kleinasion.] A peninsula of western Asia which lies between the Black Sea and the Sea of Marmora on the north, the Ægean Sea on the west, and the Mediterranean Sea on the south. The eastern boundary is vague. The chief divisions in ancient times were Mysia, Lydia, Caria, Lycia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Phrygia, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Galatia, Lycæonia, Cilicia, Cappadocia, and Pontus. (See these names.) It is a part of Asiatic Turkey, and corresponds generally to Anatolia. The surface is in the main a plateau, traversed by the Taurus and other ranges. The chief rivers are the Sakaria, Kizil-Irmak, Sihun, Mendere, and Sarabat. It was the seat of Troy, Lydia, and other ancient powers, and of Ionian Greek civilization; and its possession has been disputed by Persia, Macedonia, Syria, Rome, the Byzantine empire, Parthia, the Saracens, the Seljuks, and the Turks.

Asia Minor contained anciently, according to Herodotus, fifteen races or nations. Of these four occupied the southern region; namely, the Cilicians, the Pamphylians, the Lycians, and the Carians; four lay to the west of the great table-land, either upon or very near the coast, the Carians, the Lydians, the Mysians, and the Greeks; four bordered on the Euxine, the Thracians, Mariandynians, Paphlagonians, and Cappadocians; and three, finally, dwelt in the interior, the Phrygians, the Chalybes, and the Matieni. . . . Such were the political divisions of Asia Minor recognized by Herodotus. A century later Ephorus made an enumeration which differs from that of Herodotus but in two or three particulars. "Asia Minor," he said, "is inhabited by sixteen races, three of which are Greek, and the rest barbarian, not to mention certain mixed races which are neither the one nor the other. The barbarian races are the following:— Upon the coast, the Cilicians, the Lycians, the Pamphylians, the Bithynians, the Paphlagonians, the Mariandynians, the Trojans, and the Carians; in the interior, the Pisidians, the Mysians, the Chalybians, the Phrygians, and the Milyans.

Aslauga's Knight (a-slou'gaz nit). [G. Aslauga's Ritter.] A story by Baron de La Motte Fouqué, published in German in the autumn of 1814, and translated into English in Carlyle's "German Romance." Aslauga is a spirit chosen by the knight in preference to any earthly lady-love. She appears to him at important moments in his career, and he dies fancying himself clasped in her arms and shrouded in her wonderful golden hair.

Asmai (Abu Saïd Abd-el Melek ibn Koraïb El-Asmai). Born at Basra about 740 A. D.; died about 830. An Arabian littérateur and preceptor to Harun-al-Rashid. He probably wrote the romance "Antar."

Asmodeus (as-mô-dê'us or as-mô'dê-us). [Heb. Asmodai: derived by some from Heb. šamad, to destroy; probably of Persian origin.] In later Jewish demonology, a destructive demon. In the book of Tobit he is said to have loved Sara and to have destroyed in succession her seven husbands, appearing as a succubus on their bridal nights. He is hence jocularly spoken of as the destroyer of domestic happiness. When, however, Sara was married to the son of Tobit, Asmodeus was driven away by the fumes from the burning heart and liver of a fish (hence the allusion in "Paradise Lost," iv. 168). King Solomon, in his search for the mysterious and miraculous Shamir, ordered Asmodeus, who knew the secret, to be brought to him. He resisted the summons violently, upsetting trees and houses. A poor widow begging him not to injure her little hut, he turned aside so sharply that he broke his leg and has been a "diable boiteux" (lame devil) ever since. Le Sage made him the hero of his romance "Le Diable Boiteux," from which Foote took his play "The Devil on Two Sticks." He appears in the former as the companion of Don Cleofas, whom he takes with him in his wonderful flight over the roofs of Madrid, showing him by his diabolical power the insides of the houses as they fly over them. In the novel he is a witty, playful, malicious creature. He is also introduced in Wieland's "Oberon."

Asoka (a-sô'kä), or Piyadasi (pi'yä-da-si). A king of the Maurya dynasty of Magadha, son of Bindusara, and grandson of Chandragupta, B. C. 263-226. In consequence of a quarrel with his father, he went away to Rajputana and the Panjab. Returning at the moment of his father's death, he massacred his brothers and obtained the throne. In time he extended his sway over Hindustan, the Panjab, and Afghanistan, while he claimed to rule also over South India and Ceylon. Converted by a miracle, he openly adopted Buddhism and became the Buddhist Constantine. Especially noted are his edicts enjoining the practical morality of Buddhism, which are engraved in different Prakrit dialects on pillars or rocks in various parts of India. Princeps, their first decipherer, and Lassen refer them to the time of Asoka, but Wilson thinks they were engraved "at some period subsequent to B. C. 205."

Asola (ä-sô'lä). A small town in the province of Mantua, Italy, 19 miles northwest of Mantua.

Asotus (a-sô'tus). [Gr. ἄσωτος, prodigate.] In Ben Jonson's "Cynthia's Revels," a foolish and prodigal coxcomb, the parasite of Amorphus whom he imitates in every way.

Aspar (as'pär). Died 471. A general of the Eastern Empire, the son of Ardaburius. He was an Alan by extraction. As early as 424 he went with his father on the expedition to Italy which overthrew the usurper Joannes and established the young Valentinian on the throne of his uncle Honorius. He was consul in 434. "He was called 'First of the Patricians'; he stood on the very steps of the throne, and might have been Emperor himself, but he was an Arian." Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, II. 450.

Asparagus Gardens, The. A low place of public entertainment, not far from Pimlico. It is to this that Brome refers in his "Sparagus Garden" (which see).

Aspasia (as-pä'shi-ä). [Gr. Ἀσπασία, lit. 'welcome.'] Born at Miletus, Ionia; flourished about 440 B. C. A celebrated Milesian woman of great talents and beauty, who removed to Athens in her youth, and became the mistress of Pericles. Her house was the center of literary and philosophical society at Athens, and her ascendancy over Pericles was such that the war with Samos in behalf of Miletus, 440 B. C., was frequently ascribed to her influence. She was also said to have written part of Pericles's famous funeral oration over the soldiers who fell in the campaign of 431 B. C. She was accused by the comic poet Ipcrimippus of impurity 432 B. C., but was saved by the intervention of Pericles, whose eloquence and personal influence procured her acquittal. After the death of Pericles, 429 B. C., she attached herself to Lysicles, a democratic leader. The son of Pericles by Aspasia was legitimated by a decree of the people, took his father's name, and was executed, with five other generals, after the victory of Arginuse.

Aspasia, or Aspatia. One of the principal characters in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Maid's Tragedy." She is betrothed to Amintor and is deserted by him.

Aspen (as'pen). A silver-mining town in Pitkin County, Colorado, west of Leadville. Population (1890), 5,108.

Aspendos (as-pen'dos), Aspendus (-dus). [Gr. Ἀσπενδος.] In ancient geography, a city of Pamphylia, Asia Minor, on the Eurymedon about lat. 36° 58' N., long. 31° 16' E. It contains a Roman theater, which is the best preserved of all ancient structures of the kind. The cavea is quite intact. There is also a Roman aqueduct which crosses the valley by a long range of arches.

Asper (as'pér). [L., 'rough, harsh.'] 1. In Ben Jonson's "Every Man out of his Humour," a character which he designed as a portrait of himself.

He is of an ingenious and free spirit, eager and constant in reproof, without fear controlling the world's abuses. One whom no servile hope of gain, or frosty apprehension of danger, can make to be a parasite, either to time, place, or opinion.

Jonson, in Dram. Pers. Every Man out of his Humour.

2. The pseudonym of Johnson in the "Rambler," and under which he abused Garriek.

Asperg (äs'pér), or Asberg (äs'berg). A town in the Neckar circle, Würtemberg, 9 miles north of Stuttgart. Population, about 2,000.

Assassins, The. A military and religious order in Syria, founded in Persia by Hassan ben Sabbah about 1090. A colony migrated from Persia to Syria, settled in various places, with their chief seat on the mountains of Lebanon, and became remarkable for their secret murders in blind obedience to the will of their chief. Their religion was a compound of Magianism, Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism. One article of their creed was that the Holy Spirit resided in their chief and that his orders proceeded from God himself. The chief of the sect is best known by the denomination old man of the mountain (Arabic sheikh al-jabal, chief of the mountains). These barbarous chieftains and their followers spread terror among nations far and near for almost two centuries. In the time of the Crusades they mustered to the number of 50,000, and presented a formidable obstacle to the arms of the Christians. They were eventually subdued by the sultan Eibars about 1272.

Assaye, or Assye (äs-si'). A village of Haiderabad, British India, about lat. 20° 18' N., long. 75° 55' E. Here 9,500 British under Wellesley (Duke of Wellington) defeated more than 50,000 Mahattas Sept. 23, 1803. The loss of the British was about 1,800.

They number 3,008, and live in the northwest territory of British North America and also in Montana. See Sioux and Stout.

Assiniboine, or Assiniboin. A river in the southern part of British America, which joins the Red River of the North at Winnipeg, Manitoba. Length, about 500 miles.

Assini (äs-sé-né'). [F.] See Assini.

Assisi, or Asisi (äs-sé'sé). A town in the province of Perugia, Italy, 12 miles southeast of Perugia, famous as the birthplace of St. Francis: the Umbrian Assisium. It is also the birthplace of Proterius and Metastasio. Near it are Roman ruins. It contains a temple of Minerva, a fine Roman hexastyle Corinthian portico, with its low pediment complete, now attached to the Church of Santa Maria della Minerva, of which the vaulted cella still forms the chief part. The temple dates from Augustus, and is good in its proportions and the details of the ornament. The Church of San Francesco, begun 1228, consists of two parts, the Upper Church and the Lower Church. The former, 225 feet long, consists of a single nave of five bays with a rose-window of great beauty. The walls are covered with frescos, chiefly by Cimabue (story of the Old and New Testaments) and Giotto (life of St. Francis). The latter series is famous, and exhibits in the highest degree the painter's individuality, dramatic quality, and directness of conception. The Lower Church is wider than the other, low and crypt-like; it contains interesting tombs, fine painted glass, and many frescos, among them some of Giotto's most admired works. The chief of these are the Virtues and the Glorification of St. Francis, and a beautiful Madonna, on gold ground.

Assiut, or Assiout. See Sint.

Assize of Clarendon. An English ordinance, issued in 1166 (12 Hen. II.), which introduced changes into the administration of justice.

Assizes of Jerusalem. Two codes of laws, drawn up under the authority of Godfrey de Bouillon, the first crusading king of Jerusalem, and in force under the Christian sovereignty in Jerusalem and in Cyprus. One code had jurisdiction over the nobility, the second over the common people. Both were conceived with a wisdom and enlightenment beyond their age, and were based on contemporary French law and customs.

Assize of Northampton. An English ordinance, a reissue and expansion of the Assize of Clarendon, issued at Northampton in 1176 (22 Hen. II.), drawn up in the form of instructions to the judges. The new articles relate to tenure, reliefs, dower, etc.

Assmannshausen (äs'mäns-hon-zen). A village in the province of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, situated on the Rhine 16 miles west of Mainz, celebrated for its red and white wines.

Associated Counties, The. In English history, a name given to the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Hertford, Cambridge, Huntingdon, and Lincoln, because they combined, 1642-46, to join the Parliamentary side in the civil war, and to keep their territory free from invasion.

Assollant, or Assolant (ä-sö-loh'), Jean Baptiste Alfred. Born at Anbusson, March 20, 1827; died at Paris, March 4, 1886. A French novelist and journalist. He brought a charge of plagiarism against Victorien Sardou, alleging that the latter's play "Oncle Sam" was taken from Assollant's "Scènes de la Vie des Etats-Unis." The charge was referred to a commission of authors who gave a verdict in favor of M. Sardou.

Assommoir (ä-som-mwär'), L. [F., 'the bludgeon.'] A novel by Zola, published in 1877.

Assos (as'os). [Gr. Ἄσος.] In ancient geography, a city situated on the Gulf of Adramyttium, Mysia, in lat. 39° 29' N., long. 26° 22' E. The site is now occupied by the Turkish village of Behram. It was thoroughly explored and excavated by the Archaeological Institute of America 1881-82, with the important result of illustrating the architectural and topographical development of a minor Greek city with a completeness comparable with the body of information supplied by Pompeii concerning Roman towns under somewhat similar conditions. The remains studied include very extensive fortifications of successive periods, temples ranging from the archaic Doric to foundations dating within the Christian era, a theater, baths, porticos, a gymnasium, private dwellings in great variety, a remarkable and highly adorned street of tombs, and a Greek bridge.

Assouan. See Assuan.

Assuan, or Asswan, or Assouan (äs-swän'). A town in Upper Egypt, situated on the Nile near the first cataract, in lat. 24° 5' N., formerly supposed to be on the tropic of Cancer: the ancient Syene. It is noted for its granite. It was the place of banishment of Juvenal.

Assuay. See Azuay.

Assumption. See Assunzion.

Assumption of the Virgin. 1. A masterpiece of Titian in the Accademia, Venice, one of the most renowned of existing paintings. The Virgin ascends toward the throne, wafted on glowing clouds and surrounded by ranks of rejoicing angels. The apostles look up in amazement from the earth below.

2. A powerful painting by Titian, in the cathedral of Verona, splendid and characteristic in coloring.—3. Frescos by Correggio in the dome of the cathedral of Parma, Italy. They occupy the entire octagon, and are famous for their grace and the beauty of their color and golden light. They are now damaged by moisture.

4. A painting by Rubens, in Antwerp Cathedral, Belgium. The Virgin, surrounded by angels, is borne up to heaven in glory; the apostles and women are gathered about the empty tomb below. The coloring is less brilliant than is usual with Rubens.

5. A painting by Perugino, in the Accademia, Florence. The Virgin is in face and form one of Perugino's most beautiful figures; the four saints in the foreground, too, are admirable.

6. A large and important painting by Guido Reni, in Bridgewater House, London.—7. A fine fresco by Gaudenzio Ferrari, in the Church of San Cristoforo at Verelli, Italy. The figures of the Father, the Virgin, the angel, and the apostles, especially, are of grand conception.

8. A painting by Murillo, in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. The Virgin floats upward, resting on clouds, with bands of cherubs above and below her. This picture excels in the qualities of grace and purity of expression which characterize many of Murillo's works.

9. One of the most admired paintings of Guercino (1623), in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. The Virgin, with face uplifted, is borne upward on a cloud, surrounded by angels. The apostles stand about her tomb below.

Assur (äs'ör), or Ashur (ash'er). [See Assyria.] 1. The original name of Assyria and of its earliest capital.—2. See Asur.

Assye. See Assaye.

Assynt (as'int). Loch. A lake, 7 miles long, in the southwestern part of Sutherland, Scotland, noted for its picturesqueness.

Assyria (ä-sir'i-i). [OPers. Athura, Gr. Ἀσσυρία, L. Assyria, F. Assyrie, G. Assyrien; in the cuneiform inscriptions Assur; in the Old Testament Asûr.] An ancient Asiatic state, which at the period of its greatest power covered a territory of about 75,000 square miles, bounded by Armenia on the north, the Lower Zab on the south, the Zagros Mountains on the east, and the Euphrates on the west. In Gen. x 2 the name is given to a small district about 25 by 17 miles on the left bank of the Tigris. The name of the country was derived from that of the city Assur, situated about 50 miles south of the modern Mosul and marked by the ruins of Kileh-Sherkat. This city is not mentioned in the Old Testament, but it survived Nineveh, being still in existence in the time of Cyrus, the conqueror of Babylon. The name, besides being given to the city and country, was also applied to the national god, being always spelled Ashur in this connection. The Persians called the city Athura. The Greeks comprised in the name Assyria, or its shortened form Syria, the entire territory between Babylonia and the Mediterranean, sometimes applying it even to Babylonia. The northern and eastern portions of the country were mountainous, but the greater part was flat, being an extension of the Babylonian plains. Its principal rivers were the Tigris, the Upper and Lower Zab, the Kurub, the Khoser, and the western Khabur. It was a fertile country, and abounded in all sorts of animals: among others, the stag, roebuck, wild bull, and lion. The hunting of the lion was the favorite sport of the Assyrian kings. According to Genesis (x. 8-12, 22) the Assyrians were descendants of Shem and emigrants from Babylon. Their Semitic-Babylonian origin is fully attested by their sculptures and inscriptions. Their language is, apart from a few dialectical and orthographical variations, identical with Babylonian, and closely akin to Hebrew. Assyria derived its civilization from Babylonia. Its religion was the same as that of the mother-country, with the exception of the national god Assur, who was placed at the head of the pantheon. Assyrian architecture was a slavish copy of that of Babylonia. Although stone abounded in the former, bricks continued to be used in imitation of the practice in Babylonia, where no stone existed. The Babylonian emigrants who established Assyria probably set out about 2000 A. C. The first Assyrian rulers of whom we hear were Belkapanu, Ismi-Bagan, and his son Samsi-Ramman (1816 B. C.). For the next 300 years nothing is known of the condition of Assyria. In the 15th century B. C. Assyria was involved in a war with Babylonia, then under the rule of the non-Semitic Kassites. War continued between the two countries for a long time with varying success. Finally, however, Assyria became supreme and Babylonia the vassal state. The chief maker of Assyria's glory was Tiglath-Pileser I. (1120-1100 B. C.), who conquered the city of Babylon, other cities of Babylonia, and penetrated as far as the Mediterranean. His more important successors were Asur-dan II. (930-911 B. C.); Asurnazirpal (884-860 B. C.); Shalmaneser II. (860-824 B. C.) who came in contact with Damascus and Israel; Tiglath-Pileser III. (Phul in the Old Testament) 745-727 B. C., whose power extended to the confines of Egypt and who put the crown of Babylon on his head; Sargon (722-705 B. C.), the conqueror of Samaria, who defeated the Egyptians at Raphia; Sennacherib (705-681 B. C.); and Esarhaddon (680-668 B. C.). These last two kings mark the height of Assyrian power, and Esarhaddon was enabled by his conquests to add to his name the title king of Upper and Lower Egypt and Ethiopia. Under Asurbanipal (the Sardanapalus of Greek writers), 668-626 B. C., the decline of the empire began. In some respects this reign was most prosperous and brilliant: it was the golden age of art and literature. Under this reign too Susa was conquered and destroyed. But signs of the approaching break-up were seen in the constant uprisings of the oppressed nations. The downward course was rapid. Once, about 625, Assyria succeeded in repelling the attack of the Medes and Persians under Phraortes, but when his son Cyaxares in union with Nabopolassar of Babylon repeated the attack (608 B. C.), Nineveh fell and the Assyrian power entirely disappeared.

Assyrian Canon. See Eponym Canon.

Ast (äst), Georg Anton Friedrich. Born at Gotha, Germany, Dec. 29, 1778; died at Munich, Oct. 31, 1841. A German philologist and philosophical writer.

Astacus (as'tä-kus). [Gr. Ἀστακος.] In ancient geography, a Greek colony in Bithynia, Asia Minor, near Nicomedia.

Astare (as-tär'té). See Ashtoreth.

Astarte. The woman guiltily beloved by Manfred (in Byron's "Manfred"), and for whom he suffers an undying remorse.

Astell (as'tel), Mary. Born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England, 1668; died 1731. An English writer. She was the author of "A Serious Proposal to Ladies," published anonymously (1694-97). The "proposal" was for the erection of a monastery or home of religious retirement, to be conducted under the rules of the Church of England: a scheme which later brought upon its author considerable abuse, as in the "Tatler" (32), where she appears under the name of Madonella.

Aster (äs'ter), Ernst Ludwig von. Born at Dresden, Oct. 5, 1778; died at Berlin, Feb. 10, 1855. A German military engineer. He planned the fortresses of Coblenz and Ehrenbreitstein.

Asterabad. See Astrabad.

Asterius (as-té'ri-us). 1. Lived in the first part of the 4th century A. D. An Arian theologian of Cappadocia.—2. Lived about 400 A. D. A bishop of Amasia, in Pontus, noted as a writer of "Homilies."

Asterope (as-ter'ö-pé). [Gr. Ἀστρόπη.] One of the Pleiades, composed of two stars, each of 7½ magnitude, and just too faint to be seen by most eyes without telescopic assistance. It is sometimes regarded as the "lost Pleiad," though more usually Pleione is so considered. See Pleiades.

Asti (äs'tê). A city in the province of Alessandria, Italy, the ancient Asta Pompeia, situated at the junction of the Borbone and Tauaro 28 miles southeast of Turin. During the middle ages it was a powerful republic. It has important trade, and is noted for the wines produced in its vicinity. It is the birthplace of Alferi. It has a cathedral chiefly of the 13th century. The fine façade has alternate courses of white stone and red brick, with three trefoil-headed sculptured doorways. There is a handsome lateral porch with statues, an octagonal lantern, and a square, round-arched campanile. The transepts have pentagonal ends, and apses on the east side. Population, about 17,000.

Astié (äs-tê-ä'). Jean Frédéric. Born at Nérac, Lot-et-Garonne, France, Sept. 21, 1822. A French Protestant clergyman, and writer on theological, philosophical, and historical subjects. He was pastor of a French-Swiss church in New York 1848-53, removed to Paris, and later (1856) became professor of theology and philosophy at Lausanne. Among his works is a "Histoire de la république des Etats-Unis" (1865).

Astier (äs-tê-ä'), Paul. In Daudet's "Struggle for Life," an unscrupulous egoist.

Astle (as'l). Thomas. Born Dec. 22, 1735; died at Battersea Rise, near London, Dec. 1, 1803. An English paleographer and antiquary, appointed keeper of the records in the Tower of London in 1783. He wrote "The Origin and Progress of Writing" (1784), etc.

Astley (ast'li), Sir Jacob, afterward Baron Astley. Born 1579; died at Maidstone, England, Feb. 1652. An English royalist general in the first civil war. He served at Edgehill, Gloucester, Naseby, and elsewhere, and was defeated and taken prisoner at Stow in 1646.

Astley, Philip. Born at Newcastle-under-Lyme, England, 1742; died at Paris, 1814. A well-known horse-tamer. He began as a cabinet-maker; joined Elliott's regiment of light horse in Holland as a rough-rider in 1759; and finally settled in London, and developed a prosperous business as the proprietor of circuses there and in other cities. The circus and hippodrome, well known as "Astley's," was situated on the Surrey side of the Thames, not far from Westminster Bridge; it is now known as "Sanger's Amphitheater."

Astolat (as'tô-lat). In the Arthurian romances, a name of Guildford, Surrey, England.

Astolfo, or Astolpho (as-tol'fô). 1. An important character in the Charlemagne romances and in the "Orlando Innamorato" and "Orlando Furioso." The most notable of his knightly feats and adventures is his journey to the moon, where he enters the Valley of Lost Things, and among a mass of broken resolutions, lovers' tears, days lost by idlers, etc., finds Orlando's lost wits in a vessel larger than all the others. He was permitted to take them back to Orlando. Pope, in the "Rape of the Lock," speaking of the same place, says:

"Where the heroes' wits are kept in ponderous vases,
And beaux' in snuff boxes and tweezer cases."

He was also the possessor of a wonderful horn which spread universal terror when it was sounded.

2. The King of Lombardy in an episode in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso." He is introduced from the "Tale of Astolpho and Jocundo," two men who, finding their wives false, took a remarkable method to procure a true one.

Astolphus. See Aistulf.

Aston (as'ton), Antony. Flourished about 1712-31. An English actor, prompter, and dramatic writer.

Aston Hall. An old hall in the Elizabethan style, near Birmingham, England, recently repaired and now a museum, having been sold by the owner, Mr. Charles Holt Bracebridge, to the town of Birmingham. This is said to be the original of Irving's "Bracebridge Hall."

Aston Manor. A manufacturing town immediately north of Birmingham, England. Population (1891), 64,639.

Astor (as'tor), John Jacob. Born at Walldorf, near Heidelberg, July 17, 1763; died at New York, March 29, 1848. A German-American merchant. He emigrated to the United States in 1783, established himself shortly at New York in the fur trade, became the first regular dealer in musical instruments in the United States, and speculated in New York realty and, during the war of 1812, in government securities. He conceived the scheme of connecting the fur trade with the Pacific by a line of trading-posts extending from the Great Lakes along the Missouri and Columbia, at whose mouth he founded Astoria in 1811. At his death his fortune was estimated at $20,000,000. He left $400,000 for founding the Astor Library.

Astor, William Backhouse. Born at New York, Sept. 19, 1792; died at New York, Nov. 24, 1875. An American capitalist, son of John Jacob Astor. He gave $550,000 to the library founded by his father.

Astor, William Waldorf. Born 1848. A diplomatist and author, grandson of William Backhouse Astor. He was United States minister to Italy 1882-85, and is the author of "Valentino" (1885), "Sforza" (1889).

Astor Library. A library in the city of New York, founded by John Jacob Astor, and opened in 1854. It is a reference library only, and contains about 260,000 volumes.

Astor Place Riot. A serious riot in New York, May 10, 1849, between the partizans of the actors Edwin Forrest and Macready. The latter was acting at the time in the Astor Place Opera House. It was suppressed by the militia. Twenty-two were killed and thirty-six wounded.

Astoreth. See Ashforth.

Astorga (äs-tor'gä). A town in the province of Leon, Spain, the ancient Asturia Augusta, situated on the Tuerto 29 miles southwest of Leon. The Roman city walls are still in large part perfect, and present a curious spectacle with their long series of projecting semicircular towers which do not rise above the curtains. Population (1887), 5,350.

Astorga (äs-tor'gä), Baron Emmanuele d'. Born at Naples, Dec. 11, 1681; died in Bohemia, Aug. 21, 1736. An Italian musician, composer of a celebrated "Stabat Mater" (1713), a pastoral opera, "Dafne," etc.

Astoria (as-tô'ri-ä). The capital of Clatsop County, Oregon, situated on the Columbia 75 miles northwest of Portland: founded as a fur-trading station by John Jacob Astor (for whom it was named) in 1811. Its leading industry is salmon-canning. Population (1890), 6,184.

Astoria. A former village of Long Island, New York, now a part of Long Island City.

Astrabacus (as-trab'ä-kus). [Gr. Ἀστράβακος.] See the extract.

The hero-temple of Astrabacus is mentioned by Pausanias in his description of Sparta (III. xvi. § 5). An obscure tradition attaches to him. Astrabacus, we are told, and Alopecus his brother, sons of Irbus, grandsons of Amphithenes, great-grandsons of Amphicles, and great-grandsons of Agis, found the wooden image of Diana Orthia which Orestes and Iphigenia had conveyed secretly from Tauris to Lacedaemon, and on discovering it were stricken with madness (ib. § 6). The worship of Astrabacus at Sparta is mentioned by Clemens (Cohort. ad Gent. p. 35). It is conjectured from his name (literally 'ass-keeper') that he was "the protecting genius of the stable." Rauwinson, Herod., III. 433, note.

Astrabad (äs-trä-bäd'), or Asterabad (äs-ter-ä-bäd'). A province of northern Persia, adjoining Mazanderan on the west. Population (estimated), 80,000.

Astrabad, or Asterabad. The capital of the province of Astrabad, situated in lat. 36° 50' N., long. 54° 25' E. It was formerly an important town. It was captured by Timur in 1384. Population (estimated), 5,000 to 15,000.

Astrabad Bay, or Gulf of Ashraf (äsh-räf'). The southeasternmost bay of the Caspian Sea.

Astræa, or Astrea (as-trê-ä'). [Gr. Ἀστραία, fem. of ἀστρος, starry.] 1. In classical mythology, the goddess of justice, daughter of the Titan Astræus and Eos, or of Zeus and Themis. In the golden age she lived among men, and in the brazen age was the last of the gods to leave them. She departed for the sky where she shines as the constellation Virgo.

2. An asteroid (the fifth) discovered by Hencke at Driesen, Dec. 8, 1845.—3. See Astrée.

Astræa, The Divine. A nickname of Mrs. Aphra Behn.

Astræa Redux (as-trê-ä rê'duks). [L., 'Astræa brought back.'] A poem by Dryden celebrating the restoration of Charles II., first published in 1660.

Astrakhan (äs-trä-ähän'). A government of southeastern Russia, surrounded by the governments of Saratoff and Samara, the Kirghiz Steppe, the Caspian, Caucasia, and the province of the Don Cossacks. It is largely a barren steppe. Area, 91,327 square miles. Population 932,539.

Astrakhan. The capital of the government of Astrakhan, situated on an island in the delta of the Volga, about lat. 46° 25' N., long. 47° 55' E. It has extensive commerce by the Volga and Caspian, and is the chief port for the latter; it has also a large transit trade with Persia and Transcaucasia, various manufactures, valuable fisheries, etc. It was formerly the capital of a Tatar state, and was conquered by Russia 1554. Population, 73,710.

Astrea. See Astræa.

Astrée (äs-trê-ä'). A pastoral romance by Honoré D'Urfé. See the extract.

In imitation of Montemayor and Cervantes, whose romances had been so popular in the peninsula, Honoré D'Urfé (1667-1625), a French nobleman, wrote his Astrée, a work which, under the disguise of pastoral incidents and characters, exhibits the singular history of his own family, and the amours at the court of Henry the Great. The first volume, dedicated to that monarch, appeared, probably in its second edition (no copy of the first edition is known), in 1610, the second part in the same year, and the third, which is addressed to Louis XIII., was given to the world four or five years subsequent to the publication of the second. The Duke of Savoy was depositary of the fourth part, which remained in manuscript at the death of the author, and was transmitted to that event to Mademoiselle D'Urfé. She confided it to Baro, the secretary of her deceased relative, who published it two years after the death of his master, with a dedication to Mary of Medici, and made up a fifth part from memoirs and fragments also placed in his hands. The whole was printed at Rouen, 1647, in five volumes. . . . For more than forty years it furnished the subject for nearly all dramatic compositions (Segraisiana, p. 144-5), while poets confined their efforts to expressing in verse what D'Urfé had made the personages of his romance utter in prose.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, II. 378, 392, note.

Astrolabe (as'trô-läb). The, or The Conclusions of the Astrolabe. An unfinished prose treatise by Chaucer, written by him for the instruction of his son Lewis, then ten years old. It is inferred that it was written in 1391. This is not proved, however; and of the child nothing more is known than that in the introduction to this treatise Chaucer mentions him by name and gives his reasons for the "ending" of the work for him. It contains some very slight autobiographical allusions, but is essentially a translation of the work of the Arabian astronomer Messahala (8th century) from a Latin version.

Astrolabe Bay. An arm of the Pacific Ocean, on the northeastern coast of Papua.

Astroni (äs-trô'nê). The crater of an extinct volcano 5 miles west of Naples.

Astropaliá (äs-trô-pä-lê-ä'). A modern Greek name of Stampalia.

Astrophel (as'trô-fel). 1. The name assumed by Sir Philip Sidney in the series of sonnets entitled "Astrophel and Stella," which is his greatest literary work. These sonnets, 110 in number, chronicle the growth of Sidney's love for Stella (Penelope Devereux, sister of Essex, afterward Lady Rich). See Stella.

2. An elegy written by Spenser on the death of Sir Philip Sidney.

Astruc (äs-trük'), Jean. Born March 19, 1684; died at Paris, March 5, 1766. A French medical writer and professor. His most celebrated work is "Conjectures sur les mémoires originaux, dont il paroît que Moyses s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genèse" (Brussels, 1753), in which he divided the book of Genesis into two parts on the basis of the use of Elohim or Yahveh (Jehovah) as the name of God, holding that this difference in usage pointed to the fact that Genesis was made up of two parallel, independent narratives. His memoir formed the starting-point of modern criticism of the Pentateuch.

Astudillo (äs-tô-ähêl'yô). A small town in the province of Palencia, Spain, 26 miles southwest of Burgos.

Astulphus. See Aistulf.

Astura (äs-tô'rjä). 1. A small river south of Rome, which rises near Velletri and flows into the Mediterranean.—2. A small town near the mouth of this river.

Asturias (äs-tô'rê-äs). [L. Asturia, from Astur, pl. Astures, the name of the people.] An ancient province of northwestern Spain, officially called Oviedo since 1833. See Oviedo. It was the nucleus of the Spanish kingdom. The Christian kingdom of Asturias was founded about 718 by Pelayo, and was merged in the kingdom of Leon in the 10th century.

Asturias, Prince of. A title of the heir to the Spanish throne, first assumed in 1388.

Astuyages (as-ti-ä-jéz). [Gr. Ἀστύαγες; in the inscriptions Ishturequ according to Abydenus, in Eusebius Astahages, supposed to represent Zend Aj-dahak, the biting snake.] The son and successor of Cyaxares, king of the Medes 584-549 B. C. In the latter year Cyrus the Great deposed him and united Media with Persia. According to Herodotus, Astuyages was the grandfather of Cyrus.

Astyanax (as-ti-ä-naks). In Greek legend, the son of Hector and Andromache. Also called Seamandrius.

Astypalæa (as'ti-pä-lê-ä'). The ancient name of Stampalia.

Asuncion (ä-sön-thê-ôn'), or Assumption (ä-sump'shon). [Sp. Asuncion, Assumption (sc. of the Virgin).] The capital of Paraguay, situated on the Paraguay in lat. 25° 16' 29" S., long. 57° 42' W., founded by Juan de Ayolas Sept., 1536. It was taken by the Brazilians Jan. 5, 1869. Population (1887), 34,072.

Asur (as'er). The ancient national god of Assyria. Also Assur.

The form of religion prevalent in Assyria is wholly Babylonian, with one important exception. Supreme over the old Babylonian Pantheon rises the figure of a new god, the national deity of Assyria, its impersonation Assur. Assur is not merely primus inter pares, merely the president of the divine assembly, like Merodach: he is their lord and master in another and more autocratic sense. Like the Yahveh of Israel, he claims to be "king above all gods," that "among all gods" there is none like unto himself. Sayce, Anc. Babylonians, p. 122.

Asura (a'sö-rä). [Skt., from asu, spirit, and so 'spiritual.'] A word designating especially the difference between celestial and mundane existence, and then a spirit of life, God; later, a demon, as if a-sura, a not-god, whence by popular etymology sura, god.

Asurbanipal (ä-sör-bä'ni-päl). [Assyrian Äs-ur-bani-pal, the god Ashur creates or makes the son.] King of Assyria 668-626 B. C., son of Esarhaddon and grandson of Sennacherib, the last of the great kings of the vigorous Sargonide dynasty. The Greeks called him Sardanapalus; in the Old Testament (Ezra iv. 10) he is mentioned under the name Aseanappur (which see), 'the great and majestic.' His reign was marked by great external prosperity and splendor, and the flourishing of art and literature, but also by frequent revolts and disturbances, which shook the huge empire to its foundations, and foreboded its near fall, which took place a score of years after his death (608 B. C.). At the beginning of his reign he had to suppress a revolt in Egypt instigated by the deposed Ethiopian king Tahaka or Tarqu (the Tirhakah mentioned in the Old Testament—2 Ki. xix. 9, Isa. xxxvii. 9). But the most significant uprising was that of the coalition of Babylonia, Arabia, Ethiopia, Phœnicia, and Palestine, brought about by his own brother Shamash-shum-ukin (the Greek Sardanachinos), the viceroy of Babylonia, which was also quelled by Asurbanipal. Of his victories and conquests may be especially mentioned the capture and destruction of Susa, after many expeditions, between 646 and 640 B. C. Asurbanipal held together the Assyrian empire under his iron scepter with great rigor, not shrinking from the most atrocious cruelties, inflicting punishment on so-called "rebels." Under his protection and promotion Assyrian art, especially architecture, attained the height of its development, and literature celebrated its golden age. Being of a literary turn of mind, or, as he expresses himself, "enlowed with attentive ears" and inclined to the study of "all inscribed tablets," he caused the collecting and receding of the whole cuneiform literature then in existence, and the tablets, well arranged and marked, were deposited in the royal library of his palace. A great part of this library was discovered in the ruins of that palace on the mound of Kuyunjik, and transferred to the British Museum, and to it is due the larger part of our present knowledge of Assyrian history and civilization.

Asur-bel-nisesu (ä'sör-bel-nē-sä'sö). [Assyrian, 'the god Ashur is the lord of his people.'] King of Assyria about 1480 B. C. He is the first Assyrian king about whom some definite and certain knowledge is preserved. He is mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions as having entered into a treaty with Karaindash, king of Babylonia.

Asur-dan (ä'sör-dän) I. [Assyrian, 'the god Ashur is judge.'] King of Assyria about 1208-1150 B. C. He conducted a victorious campaign against the Babylonian king Zamma-shum-iddina, and conquered many cities. He had the temple of Anu and Ramman in the city of Assur, which was threatening to fall, torn down, without, however, rebuilding it. This was done by Tiglath-Pileser I. (1120-1100 B. C.).

Asur-dan II. King of Assyria about 930-911 B. C., son and successor of Tiglath-Pileser II.

Asur-dan III. King of Assyria from 772-754 B. C. The most interesting event recorded of his reign is the mention of an eclipse of the sun at Nineveh in 763. As this is confirmed by the calculations of astronomers, who fix the date thereof on the 15th of June, 763, it has served as a basis for the establishment of the whole chronology of western Asia.

Asur-etil-ilani-ukinni (ä'sör-ä-täl-äl-lä'nē-ö-kē'nē). [Assyrian, 'Asur, the lord of gods, has established me.'] King of Assyria from 626 B. C., son and successor of Asurbanipal. Under him began the downfall of the Assyrian empire, inaugurated by an invasion of the Scythians. How long he reigned is not known. His son and successor Sin-shar-ishkun ('the moon-god has established the king'), the Sarakoa of the Greeks, was the last king of Assyria.

Asur-nadin-sum (ä'sör-nä'dēn-söm). [Assyrian, 'Asur is the giver of the name,'] Eldest son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria 705-681 B. C. He was established by his father king of Babylonia, but was made captive by Hallus, king of Elam.

Asurnazirpal (ä'sör-nä'zēr-päl). [Assyrian Äs-ur-naçir-pal, Asur is the protector of the son.] King of Assyria 884-860 B. C. He was one of the greatest and most warlike of Assyrian kings, and inaugurated a period of prosperity and power of the Assyrian empire. He made numerous and successful campaigns especially to "the countries of Nairi" (see Armenia) and Syria, and extended the boundaries of Assyrian dominion westward. His victorious expeditions were marked, according to his own annals, by atrocious cruelties and barbarous devastations. He also distinguished himself by works of peace. He rebuilt Calah, which he made his capital, adorning it with a temple of Adar (the god of war), his favorite divinity, and a palace for himself, and constructed a canal. The ruins of his buildings excavated show a great advance in architecture and sculpture over the preceding period.

Asur-nirari (ä'sör-nē-rä'rē). [Assyrian Äs-ur-nirari, the god Asur is my helper.] King of Assyria 754-745 B. C.

Asvalayana. A Sanskrit author, represented as a pupil of Saunaka. He was the author of a ritual treatise, the Asvalayanasutras.

Asvamedha. [Skt., 'the horse-sacrifice,'] A ceremony the antiquity of which reaches back into Vedic times. It was then performed by kings desirous of offspring. As described in the Mahabharata, it implied that he who instituted it was a conqueror and king of kings. A horse of a particular color was consecrated and let loose to wander for a year. If the liberator of the horse subdued all the countries through which the horse passed, he returned with the horse in triumph, and a great festival was held, at which the horse was sacrificed really or figuratively. It was believed that a hundred Asvamedhas would enable the offerer to dethrone Indra.

Asvatthaman. In Hindu mythology, a son of Drona and Kripa, and a general of the Kauravas. He and two others were the sole effective survivors of the Kaurava host after the great battle of the Mahabharata.

Asvin (äs'vin). In Vedic mythology, properly an adjective meaning 'provided with horses,' 'consisting of horses,' in which sense it is used in a number of Vedic passages. As a substantive signifying 'horse-tamer' it is applied to Agni and to Agni and Indra, and as a masculine dual, Asvinau, 'the two charioteers,' to two gods of light, who are the first to appear in the eastern sky upon a golden chariot drawn by winged steeds, or birds. They are deliverers, bestowers of gifts, healers, and already in the Veda are the physicians of the gods. Later they are the constant attendants of Indra and paragons of beauty. They also appear as the Twins in the zodiac. They are the Dioscuri, the Castor and Pollux, of Greco-Roman mythology.

As You Find It. A comedy by Charles Boyle, the fourth earl of Orrery, printed in 1703.

As You Like It. A comedy by Shakspeare, which existed in some shape in 1600. Furness, Malone and others (Fleay, Hunter, etc.) think it was produced in 1599. No copy of it is known to exist earlier than the folio of 1623. It was founded on Lodge's romance "Rosalynde." In the comedy the characters of Touchstone, Audrey, and Jacques are Shakspeare's, otherwise he has followed Lodge quite closely.

There is on this Date of Composition a happy unanimity, which centers about the close of the year 1599; if a few months carry it back into 1598 or carry it forward almost to 1601, surely we need not be more clamorous than a parrot against rain over such trifles.

Furness, App. to As you Like it, p. 304.

Ata. An ancient Egyptian king, the fourth of the 1st dynasty.

Atacama (ä-tä-kä'mä), Desert of. An extensive rocky and rainless region in the northern part of Chile.

Atacama. A northern province of Chile, capital Copiapó. It is rich in copper, nitrates, silver, gold, salt, and various minerals. Area, about 28,000 square miles. Population (1891), 67,205. Atacama was formerly a maritime department of Bolivia. It is largely a rocky waste. It was occupied by the Chileans in 1879.

Atahualpa (ä-tä-wäl'pä), or Atahualpa, or (erroneously) Atabalipa (ä-tä-bäl'li-pä). Born probably at Cuzco about 1495; executed at Cajamarca, Aug. 29, 1533. An Inca sovereign of Peru, son of the Inca Huaina Capac. His mother was Tuta-Palla, a native of Quillaco, or according to others Pacchac, a princess of Quito. By the Inca laws he was illegitimate, and his younger half-brother, Huascar, was heir to the throne; but when Huaina Capac died (Nov., 1525) he left the northern part of the kingdom, or Quito, to Atahualpa, Huascar retaining the rest. A war broke out between the two (1530), and resulted in the defeat and capture of Huascar (spring of 1532), leaving Atahualpa master of the whole empire. He was on his way from Quito to be crowned at Cuzco when he met Pizarro and his soldiers at Cajamarca (Nov. 15, 1532). A friendly interview was arranged, and Atahualpa entered the great square of Cajamarca with many thousand unarmed attendants. Suddenly the Spaniards fell on them, massacred a great number, and seized Atahualpa (Nov. 16). The Inca offered to fill a room half full of gold as a ransom, and an amount equal in value to $15,000,000 was actually collected. Meanwhile Pizarro attempted to treat with Huascar, but Atahualpa privately sent orders to have him slain. Charged with this, and with attempting to incite an insurrection against the Spaniards (a charge afterward shown to be false), he was tried and executed by strangling.

Atakapa (ä-tä-kä'pä), or Tuckapa (tuk'a-pä). A tribe of North American Indians. See Atacapan.

Ataki (ä-tä-kä'). A small town in the northern part of Bessarabia, Russia, situated on the Dniester.

Atala (ä-tä-lä'). A romance by Chateaubriand which first appeared in the newspaper "Le Mercure de France" in 1801. The scene is laid in North America. Atala, the daughter of a North American Indian chief, falls in love with Chactas, the chief of another tribe, who is a prisoner, delivers him from death, and dies in the desert with him. She has been brought up in the Christian faith and vowed to virginity by her mother, and is faithful to this vow through incredible temptations, and finally poisons herself in despairing fanaticism.

Atalanta (at-a-lan'tä), or Atalante (at-a-lan'tē). [Gr. Ἀταλάντη.] 1. In Greek legend, a maiden whose story appears in two versions: (a) In the Arcadian version, a daughter of Zeus by Clytemene, exposed by her father in infancy, suckled by a bear, brought up by a party of hunters, and developed into a beautiful and swift huntress. She took part in the Calydonian boar hunt, was the first to strike the boar, and received from Melenger the head and skin as prize of victory. She was also connected with the Argonautic expedition, and married Meleager. (b) In the Bosnian version, a daughter of Schœneus, son of Athamas, of great beauty and very swift of foot. She was warned by an oracle not to marry, and rid herself of her suitors by challenging them to a race, overtaking them, and smiting them with a spear in the back. Hippomenes, however, overcame her by throwing before her in the race three golden apples given to him by Aphrodite, which she stooped to pick up, and so failed to win. Because Hippomenes failed to give thanks to Aphrodite, the goddess changed the pair into lions.

2. An asteroid (No. 36) discovered by Goldschmidt at Paris, Oct. 5, 1855.

Atalanta in Calydon (kal'i-don). A classical tragedy by Algernon Charles Swinburne, published in 1864.

The truest and deepest imitation of the spirit of Æschylus in modern times is not to be sought in the stiff formalism of Racine or Alfieri, but in the splendid Atalanta in Calydon of Mr. Swinburne, whose atheism brings him to stand in an attitude between human freewill and effort on the one side, and ruthless tyranny of Providence on the other, not approached in poetry (so far as I know) from Æschylus's day down to our own.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 277.

Atalantis (at-a-lan'tis). The New. See New Atalantis.

Ataliba (at-a-lē'bä). In Sheridan's translation of Kotzebue's "Pizarro," the king of Quito (Inca of Peru).

Atalide (ät-ä-lē'd'). In Racine's tragedy "Bajazet," a princess in love with Bajazet. She kills herself on hearing of his assassination, instigated by her rival Roxana, reproaching herself with being in some sort the cause.

Atali Tsalaki. See Cherokee.

Atall (at'äl). In Cibber's comedy "The Double Gallant," the son of Sir Harry Atall. He courts Clarinda under the disguise of Colonel Standfast, falls in love with Silvia and makes love to her as Mr. Freeman, and finally discovers that she is the woman to whom he had been betrothed by his father years before.

Atall, Sir Positive. In Thomas Shadwell's comedy "The Sullen Lovers or The Impertinents," a foolish knight who pretends to understand everything, and will not permit any one in his company to understand anything. He is a caricature of Sir Robert Howard.

Atargatis (at-är-gä'tis). [L., from Gr. Ἀτάργαιος, a Syrian goddess whose name appears also in the form Derceto, Gr. Δερκετώ.] A goddess of the Hittites, worshipped in Carchemish, corresponding to Ashtoreth (Astarte) of the Canaanites (Assyro-Babylonian Ishtar). At Ascalon she was worshipped under the name of Derceto in the form of a woman terminating in a fish. She also had a temple in Ephesus, and her numerous retinue of priestesses, which the Greeks found there, is supposed to have given rise to the myth of the Amazons.

Ataulf, Ataulphus. See Ataulf.

Atawulf (at'a-wulf). Died 415 (417). King of the West Goths, brother-in-law of Alaric I. whom he succeeded in 410. He evacuated Italy in 412; conquered Aquitaine in Gaul; evoked a treaty with the emperor Honorius, whose sister Placidia he married in 414; crossed into Spain to subdue a revolt of the Vandals and Suevi against the empire; and was assassinated at Barcelona. Also written Ataulf, Athaulf, Adaulf, Ataulphus, etc.

Under Alaric's successor, Athaulf, the first foundations were laid of that great West-Gothic kingdom which we are apt to look on as specially Spanish, but which in truth had its first beginning in Gaul, and which kept some Gaulish territory as long as it lasted.

Freeman, Hist. Geog.

Atbara (ät-bä'rä). The largest tributary of the Nile with the exception of the Blue Nile. It rises near Lake Dembea in Abyssinia, flows in a north-westerly direction, and joins the Nile south of Berber. Its chief affluent is the Takazze. Length, about 500 miles.

Atcha. See Atka.

Atchafalaya (äch-af-ä-lä'ä). An outlet of the Red and Mississippi rivers, in southern Louisiana, about 150 miles long.

Atcheen, or Atchin. See Achin.

Atchinsk (ä-chēnsk'). A town in the government of Yeniseisk, Siberia, situated on the Tehulym 100 miles west of Krasnoyarsk. Population, about 7,000.

Atchison (äch'i-son), David R. Born at Frog-town, Ky., Aug. 11, 1807; died in Clinton County, Mo., Jan. 26, 1886. An American politician. He was Democratic United States senator from Missouri 1843-55, president pro tempore of the Senate, and pro-slavery leader in the Kansas troubles of 1856-57.

Atchison. The capital of Atchison County, Kansas, situated on the Missouri 21 miles north-west of Leavenworth. It is an important railway center, and has manufactures of flour, machinery, etc. Population (1880), 13,963.

Ate (ä'tē). [Gr. Ἄτη, a personification of ἀτή, strife.] 1. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Zeus (Homer) or of Eris, strife (Hesiod); the goddess of infatuation or reckless crime. For entrapping Zeus in a rash oath, at the birth of Hercules, she was hurled from Olympus to earth, where she continues to work mischief, walking over the heads of men without ever touching the ground. Behind her go the Litai (Prayers), daughters of Zeus, who are ready, if besought, to repair the evil she has done. In later forms of the myth she became an avenger of unrighteousness like Dice and Nemesis.

2. In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," a hag, a liar and slanderer, friend of Duessa.

Atella (a-tel'ä). In ancient geography, a town in Campania, Italy, 10 miles north of Naples. See Aversa.

Atellan plays (a-tel'an pläz). Early Roman comedies so named from Atella, a small town in Campania, from which they were derived. Originally simple and coarse farces, they were gradually raised to (burlesque) comedy.

Atellanæ fabulæ (at-e-lä'në fab'ü-lë). See Atellan plays.

Aten (ä'teu). In Egyptian mythology, the sun's disk. The worship of Aten was introduced by Amenhotep IV.

The son and successor of Thothmes IV. found it necessary to support himself by entering into matrimonial alliance with the king of Naharina. The marriage had strange consequences for Egypt. The new queen brought with her not only a foreign name and foreign customs, but a foreign faith as well. She refused to worship Amun of Thebes and the other gods of Egypt, and clung to the religion of her fathers, whose supreme object of adoration was the solar disk [Aten]. The Hittite monuments themselves bear witness to the prevalence of this worship in Northern Syria. The winged solar disk appears above the figure of a king which has been brought from Birejik on the Euphrates to the British Museum; and even at Boghaz Keui, far away in Northern Asia Minor, the winged solar disk has been carved by Hittite sculptors upon the rock. Sajce, Hittites, p. 21.

Atena (ä-tä'nä). A small town in the province of Salerno, Italy, 45 miles southeast of Salerno.

Aterno (ä-ter'nö). The upper course of the river Pescara, in central Italy.

Atessa (ä-tes'sij). A town in the province of Chieti, Abruzzi, Italy, 24 miles southeast of Chieti. Population, about 10,000.

Atfalati (ät-fä'lä-ti). A division of the Kalapooian stock of North American Indians, formerly living from about Wappatoo Lake to the present site of Portland, Oregon, but now on Grande Ronde reservation. They numbered 28 in 1890. Atfalati is the name which they give themselves. Also called Follati, Sualatine, Tualatin, Tuheadati, Twatati, Wappatoo.

Ath (ät), or Aath (ät), or Aeth (ät). A town in the province of Hainaut, Belgium, situated on the Dender 30 miles southwest of Brussels. It has a flourishing trade and manufactures. Formerly it was a fortress, and has several times been besieged. Population (1890), 19,868.

Athabasca (ath-a-bas'kä). [N. Amer. Ind., 'place of hay and reeds': properly Athapasca.] A provisional district in the Northwest Territories, Canada, lying north of Alberta and east of British Columbia.

Athabasca, or Elk River. A river in British North America which rises in the Rocky Mountains, flows generally northeast, crosses the western end of Athabasca Lake, and unites with Peace River to form Slave River. It is properly the upper course of the Mackenzie. Length, about 600 miles.

Athabasca Lake. A lake in British North America, about lat. 59° N., long. 110° W. It receives the Athabasca River, and its outlet is by the Slave River through the Mackenzie to the Arctic Ocean. Length, 230 miles. Breadth, 20-30 miles.

Athabasca Pass. A pass over the Rocky Mountains, in British North America, between Mounts Brown and Hooker.

Athabascans. See Hookers.

Atha-ben-Hakem. See Mokanna.

Atha Melik (ä'thä mä'lik), Ala-ed-Din (ä-lä-dën'). Born in Khorasan, Persia, about 1227; died at Bagdad, 1282. A Persian historian, author of "Conquest of the World."

Athalaric (a-thal'a-rik), or Athalaric (a-thal'rik). Born 517; died 534. A Gothic prince, son of Euthelric or Eutharie and Amalasintha, daughter of Theodoric I. On Theodoric's death in 526 he became king of the East Goths in Italy under Amalasintha's regency.

Athalia. 1. An opera by Handel, produced in 1733.—2. An opera by Mendelssohn, produced in 1844.

Athaliah (ath-a-li'ij). [Heb., 'Yahveh is mighty.'] The daughter of Ahab, king of Israel, and Jezebel, and wife of Jehoram, king of Judah. On the death of Jehoram and that of his son and successor, Ahaziah, she usurped the throne of the kingdom of Judah about 843 B. C. (Duncker). In order to remove all rivals she put to death all the male members of the royal house, Joash alone escaping. She was put to death by command of Jehoiada about 837 B. C. (Duncker).

Athalie (ä-tä-lë'). [F. for Athaliah.] A tragedy composed by Racine for the scholars of Saint-Cyr, but not performed there. The subject was from sacred history, and it was his last dramatic work. It was written at the instigation of Madame de Maintenon, was first performed in 1690 (printed in 1691) at Versailles with choruses, and has since been produced from time to time with music by various great composers. Athalie was one of Rachel's greatest parts.

Athamas (ath'a-mas). [Gr. Ἀθάμας.] In Greek legend, a son of Æolus, king of Thessaly, and Enarete, and king of the Myiæ in the Boeotian Orchomenus. He was the father, by Nephelæ, the cloud-goddess, of Phrixus and Helle. He united himself with Ino, daughter of Cadmus, and was thereupon abandoned by Nephelæ, who in revenge brought a drought upon his land and carried away her children through the air on a golden-fleeced ram. In the transit Helle fell into the sea, thereafter named for her "Hellespont." He was later visited with madness by Hera, and slew his son Learchus and persecuted Ino who, with her other son Melicertes, threw herself into the sea. Finally he settled in a part of Thessaly named for him the "Athamian plain," and wedded Themisto.

Athanagild (a-than'a-gild), L. Athanagildus (a-than-a-gil'dus). Died 567 A. D. A king of the West Goths. He ascended the throne in 554 by the aid of a Byzantine fleet, and in return for this service reeded to the emperor Justinian all the seaboard towns from Valencia to Gibraltar. Of his two daughters Brunehilde and Galeswintha, the former was married to Sigebert, king of Austrasia, and the latter to Chilperic, king of Neustria.

Atharic (a-than'a-rik). Died 381. A chief of a tribe of West Goths in Dacia. He was defeated by the emperor Valens in 369, and remained quiet six years, when the pressure of the Huns compelled him to take up arms once more against the empire. He died at Constantinople, whither he had gone to conclude a treaty with Theodosius.

Athanasian Creed. One of the three great creeds of the Christian church, supposed at one time to have been composed by Athanasius. The name was probably given to it during the Arian controversy in the 6th century, Athanasius being the chief upholder of the system of doctrine opposed to the Arian system. It is included in the Greek, Roman, and English services, but is not retained in the American Book of Common Prayer. It is also called "Quicumque vult," from its first words.

Athanasius (ath-a-nä'shi-us), Saint. Born at Alexandria about 296 A. D.; died there, 373. One of the fathers of the Christian church, and the chief defender of the orthodox faith against Arianism; surnamed "The Father of Orthodoxy." He was made a deacon by Alexander, the patriarch of Alexandria, in 319; accompanied Alexander to the Synod of Nice in 325; secured by his eloquence and zeal the formulation on the part of the synod of the Nicene Creed against the Arians; was made patriarch of Alexandria in 328; was deposed by the Synod of Tyre in 335, and exiled to Treves by Constantine I. in 336; was reinstated by Constantine II. in 338; was deposed by Constantius in 340, taking refuge with Julius I., bishop of Rome, through whose influence his doctrines were approved by the synods of Rome (341) and Sardica (343); returned to Alexandria in 346; was condemned by the Council of Milan in 355, and again expelled by Constantius in 356; returned in 362 and was expelled by Julian in the same year, taking refuge in Upper Egypt; returned to Alexandria in 364; and was expelled by Valens in 365, returning in 366. His works were edited by the Benedictines (1698), and by Migne in the "Patrologia." His memory is celebrated in the Eastern and Latin churches on May 2.

Athapscan (ath-a-pas'kan), or Tinneh (tinä'). A linguistic stock of North American Indians, in three primary divisions, the northern, the Pacific, and the southern. The northern division includes tribes of British North America and Alaska, among which are the Ah-tena, Kaiyuh-khotana, K'mia-khotana, Koyukukhotana, Kutchin, Montagnais, Montagnards, Taknili, and Unakhotana. The Pacific division is composed of tribes of Washington, Oregon, and California, including the Chasta Costa, Chetco, Hupa, Kalts'ereatunne, Kenesti, Kwalihiokwa, Kwatami, Mielkwutne tunne, Mikono tunne, Naitunne tunne, Ovilapsh, Quincetunnetun Saiaz, Toeme, Teetlestean tunne, Tlatskanai, Tolowa, Tutu, and Yukitec. The southern division consists of the various Apache and Navajo tribes in Oklahoma, New Mexico, Arizona, and Mexico. While some of the Oregon tribes have fought the United States, its more notable opponents have been the Apache, under such famous leaders as Cochise, Mangus, Colorado, and Geronimo. The present (1895) number of this stock is 32,809, of whom about 8,595, constituting the northern division, are in Alaska and British North America; about 895, comprising the Pacific division, are in Washington, Oregon, and California; and about 23,409, belonging to the southern division, are in Oklahoma, Arizona, New Mexico, and Colorado. Besides these are the Lipan and some refugee Apache in Mexico. For the Athapascan proper, see Montagnais.

Atharvan (a-thär'van). In Vedic mythology, the priest of fire (Agni) and Soma, and then, viewed as a definite person, the first priest in primeval times who brings down fire from heaven, offers soma, and prays. With miraculous powers he subdues the demons, and he receives from the gods heavenly gifts. As a singular or as a plural the word also designates 'the spells of Atharvan,' the Atharvaveda.

Atharvaveda (a-thär-vä-vä'dä). [Skt., 'Veda of the Atharvans.'] The fourth of the Vedas. It never attained in India the high consideration of the other Vedas, or came to be universally acknowledged as a Veda. To the student, however, its interest is only second to that of the Rik. It is a historical, not a liturgical, collection. It goes by a variety of names, which seem at least in part fabricated to give it a dignity to which it had no fair claim. It was called the Veda of the Atharvans and the Angirases to bring it into connection with ancient and venerated Indian families, and "Veda of the Atharvans" has come to be its most famillar name. It is also called Brahmaveda, where brahmu means 'sacred utterance' in the sense of 'charm, incantation.' It comprises nearly six thousand verses in about seven hundred and thirty hymns, which are divided into twenty books. The first eighteen books are arranged upon a like system, of which the length of the hymn is the principle. A sixth of the mass is not metrical, but consists of prose akin to the Brahmanas. Of the remainder one sixth is found also in the Rik, and five sixths are peculiar to the Atharvan. As compared with the first nine books of the Rik, the tenth book of the Rik and the Atharvan are the product of a later period. In the former the gods are regarded with love and confidence; in the latter with cringing fear. The Atharvan knows a host of imps and hobgoblins, and offers them homages to induce them to abstain from harm. The most prominent characteristic is the multitude of incantations spoken by the person to be benefited or by the sorcerer for him. The Atharvan seems in the main of popular rather than of priestly origin, and forms an intermediate step to the superstitions of the ignorant mass.

Athaulf. See Atarulf.

Atheist, The, or The Second Part of The Soldier's Fortune. A comedy by Otway, first acted in 1684.

Atheist's Tragedy, The, or The Honest Man's Revenge. A play by Cyril Tourneur, conjectured (by Fleay) to have been acted between 1601 and 1604, and printed in 1611. It was founded on Boccaccio's "Decameron," vii. 6.

Athelard of Bath. See Adelard.

Athelney (ath'el-ni), Isle of. [AS. Æthelmgay, 'isle of nobles.'] A marsh near Taunton, Somersetshire, England, the refuge of Alfred the Great in 878. He founded here a Benedictine abbey in 888.

Athelstan (ath'el-stan), or Æthelstan. Born 895; died 940. King of the West Saxons and Mercia 925-940, a son of Edward the Elder; surnamed "The Glorious." He defeated the Danes and Celts at Brunanburgh in 937. Through the marriage of his sisters, he was brother-in-law to Charles the Simple, king of the West Franks; Louis, king of Lower Burgundy; Hugh, the Great Duke of the French; and the emperor Otto the Great.

Athelstane (ath'el-stän). In Sir Walter Scott's novel "Ivanhoe," the Thane of Corningsburgh, snitor of Rowena, called "The Unready," from the slowness of his mind.

Athens. See Athene.

Athenæum (ath-e-në'um). [Gr. Ἀθήναον.] A famous school or university at Rome, founded by the emperor Hadrian. It was named for Athens, and was situated on the Capitoline Hill.

Athenæum, The. A London club established in 1824. It was designed for the "association of individuals known for their scientific or literary attainments, artists of eminence in any class of the Fine Arts, and noblemen and gentlemen distinguished as liberal patrons of Science, Literature, or the Arts." Its headquarters are at 107 Pall Mall, S. W.

Athenæus (ath-e-në'us). [Gr. Ἀθήναος.] A Greek grammarian, rhetorician, and philosopher of Naxos, Egypt, who flourished about 200 A. D.; author of "Deipnosophistæ" (ed. by Meineke 1859). See Deipnosophistæ.

Athenagoras (ath-e-nag'ö-ras). [Gr. Ἀθηναγόρας.] Born at Athens; flourished about 176 A. D. A Greek Platonist philosopher and Christian, author of an apology or intercession in behalf of the Christians, addressed to the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Commodus. He states and refutes the accusations of atheism, cannibalism, and incest made against the Christians in his day. A treatise on the resurrection of the dead is also attributed to him.

Athenais. See Endocia.

Athene (a-thë'në), or Athene (-nä). [Gr. Ἀθήνη, Ἀθήνα.] In Greek mythology, the goddess of knowledge, arts, sciences, and righteous war; particularly, the tutelary deity of Athens; identified by the Romans with Minerva. She personified the clear upper air as well as mental clearness and acuteness, embodying the spirit of truth and divine wisdom, and was clothed with the ægis, symbolizing the dark storm-cloud, and armed with the resistless spear—the shaft of lightning.

Professor Max Müller, for instance, had identified Athene, the great deity of the Ionian Greeks, with the Vedic dahana, the "dawn" creeping over the sky. The philological difficulty was considerable, and scholars are now inclined to believe that Athene was not the dawn but the lightning. Taylor, Aryans, p. 305.

Athene Parthenos (a-thë'në pär'the-nos). [Gr. Ἀθήνη παρθένος, Athene the virgin.] A notable Roman reduced copy, in the National Museum, Athens, of the great chryselephantine statue of Athene by Phidias in the Parthenon. Artistically the copy is poor, but from its evidently careful reproduction of details it is historically highly important.

Athene Polias (a-thë'në pol'i-as). [Gr. Ἀθήνη πολιὰς Athene, guardian of the city (Athens).] A notable original Greek statue, in the Villa

Albani, Rome. The goddess, in her usual full drapery and egia, has a lion-head drawn over her head in place of a helmet. The proportions are somewhat short, as in the older sculpture, and the statue is dated by experts in the 5th century B. C.

Athene, Temple of. See Assos, Egina, Athens, Syracuse.

Athenian Bee, The. An epithet applied to Plato, a native of Athens, in allusion to the sweetness of his style.

Athenion (a-thē'ni-on). A leader in the second servile insurrection in Sicily, 103-99 B. C. He is said to have been the commander of banditti in Cilicia, where he was captured and sold as a slave into Sicily. He was chosen leader of the insurgents in the western part of the island, made an unsuccessful attack on Lilybæum, joined Tryphon (Salvius), king of the rebels, by whom he was for a time thrown into prison, fought under Tryphon in the battle with L. Licinius Lucullus, and on the death of Tryphon became king. He was slain in battle by the hand of M. Aquillius who put down the revolt.

Athenodorus (a-then-ō-dō'rus). [Gr. Ἀθηνοδόρος.] Born at Tarsus, Asia Minor; lived in the 1st century B. C. A Stoic philosopher of Tarsus, a friend of the emperor Augustus; surnamed "Cananites," from Cana, in Cilicia, his father's birthplace.

Athenodorus. A Greek statuary, one of the collaborators on the group of the "Laocoön." He was a son and pupil of Agesander of Rhodes. See Laocoön.

Athens (ath'enz). [Gr. Ἀθήναι, Homer (Odyssey, vii. 80) Ἀθήνη, L. Athenæ, F. Athènes, G. Athen, It. Atene; origin unknown; traditionally from Ἀθήνη, the goddess.] The capital and largest city of Greece and the chief city of Attica, situated about 5 miles from its seaport Piræus (on the Saronic Gulf), in lat. 37° 58' N., long. 23° 44' E. The ancient city grew up around the Acropolis. The other noted hills were the Areopagus and Phnyx. Long walls joined the city to its port. The modern city has extended northeastward toward Lycabettus, and contains, besides the palace and government buildings, a university, a museum, and foreign (American, French, German, etc.) schools for classical studies. Athens was founded, according to the old account, by an Egyptian colony led by Cecrops. It became the chief place in Attica, with Pallas Athene as its especial divinity, and was ruled by kings, among whom Erechtheus, Theaeus, and Codrus were famous. It was then (from the legendary date B. C. 1132) ruled by the nobles (Eupatrids), and had archons as magistrates, who were successively perpetual, decennial, and after 683 B. C. annual. The laws of Draco were enacted in 624 B. C., and those of Solon in 594 B. C. Pisistratus became tyrant in 560, and his sons were expelled in 510. The reforms of Cleisthenes (509) made Athens a pure democracy; popular assemblies of all citizens made the laws. The glorious period began with the Persian wars, in which Athens took a leading part, as at Marathon 490, and Salamis 480. The city was temporarily held by the Persians in 480. Under Themistocles, immediately after, the long walls were built. Athens became the head of the Confederacy of Delos in 477 (?), and for a short period had an extensive empire and was the first power in Greece. The "Age of Pericles" (about 461-429) was noted for the adornment of the city. The Peloponnesian war, 431-404, resulted in the displacement of Athens by Sparta in the hegemony of Greece. Athens was taken by Sparta in 404 and an aristocratic faction was put in power; but moderate democracy was restored by Thrasybulus in 403. Athens under Demosthenes resisted Macedon, but was overthrown at the battle of Charonea 338, and was generally after this under Macedonian influence. It was subjugated by Rome in 146 B. C., and pillaged by Sulla in 86 B. C. It continued to form part of the Roman and later of the Byzantine empire. Conquered by the Latin Crusaders in 1205, it became a lordship and soon a duchy under French, Spanish, and Italian rulers successively till its conquest by the Turks in 1456. It was devastated by a Venetian bombardment in 1687, and also in the War of Liberation in 1821-27. It became the capital of the new kingdom of Greece in 1834. Population (1889) 107,251. (See Greece, Peloponnesian War, Persian Wars, Solon, Pericles, etc.) The following are among the important structures of the ancient and the modern city: Dionysian Theater, a theater on the southern slope of the Acropolis, where all the famous Greek dramas were produced. It was originally of wood, and was not completed in stone until about 340 B. C. The existing remains of orchestra and stage-structure are modifications of Roman date. The front wall of the stage bears excellent reliefs of Bacchic myths. The diameter of the cavea is about 300 feet; it has one pre-emption, and is divided by radial stairways into 13 wedge-shaped sections. The lowest tier consists of seats of honor cut from marble in the form of chairs. Gate of the Oil-Market, or New Agora, a gate built with gifts from Julius Cæsar and Augustus. The west front is Doric, tetrastyle, the columns, 26 feet high and 4 in base-diameter, still supporting their entablature and pediment. The middle intercolumniation, for the passage of vehicles, is 11½ feet wide, the others 4½. Long walls, two massive fortification walls extending from the ramparts of the city to those of the Piræus, at a distance apart, except near their diverging extremities, of about 550 feet. (See above.) They made the ports and the metropolis practically one huge fortress, and assured Athenian supplies by sea while rendering possible Athenian naval triumphs at times when the Spartans held their land without the walls. They were destroyed when Athens fell before Sparta toward the end of the 5th century, but were restored in 338 B. C. by Conon. The long walls follow the crests of the group of hills southwest of the Acropolis, and run southwest. The northern wall, which was the longer, measured about 5 miles. There was at least one cross-wall to guard against the forcing of the passage.

On most maps there is shown a third wall, called the Phaleric wall, starting from the south side of Athens, near the Ilissus, and extending to the east side of the Bay of Phalerum. No vestige of such a wall has, however, been discovered, nor has any trace of an ancient port been found at the so-called Old Phalerum, at the eastern end of the bay. It is very improbable that such a wall ever existed, and it is safe to assume that Phalerum lay at the western end of the bay. Old Temple of Athena, between the Erechtheum and the Parthenon. Its foundations were recognized and studied by Dörpfeld in 1885. It was Doric, peripteral, hexastyle, with 12 columns on the flanks, and measured 70 by 137 feet. A number of the columns, capitals, and other architectural elements are built into the north wall of the Acropolis. The temple had a large cult-cella toward the east, behind which there was a treasury with two chambers opening on a vestibule. A notable authority (Penrose) combats Dörpfeld's restoration, and suggests that the temple may have been Ionic, of 8 by 16 columns; but the Dörpfeld theory may be taken as demonstrated. This temple remained standing certainly until 406 B. C., and probably until the reign of Hadrian and later. It is of unusual historical and archaeological importance. Panathenæic Stadium, a stadium still practically complete except for its sheathing of marble. The arena measures 109 by 670 feet, and is bordered on its long sides and its semicircular east end by the slopes which supported the seats (about 60 tiers) for the spectators. There were at intervals 29 flights of steps to give access to the seats. Academy of Sciences, a beautiful building in Pentelic marble, lately completed in the classical Greek style for the accommodation of a learned body modeled after the French Institute. Convent of Daphni, a convent founded by the French dukes of Athens in the 13th century. (See also Arch of Hadrian; Dexileas, Monument of; Erechtheum; Hegeso, Monument of; Lycabettus, Choragic Monument of; Nike Apteros, or Wingless Victory, Temple of; Odeum of Herodes; Olympieum, or Temple of Olympian Zeus; Parthenon; Propylæa; The-seum; Tower of the Winds.) The topographical features of ancient Athens are described under their names.

Atkinson (at'kin-son). Edward. Born at Brookline, Mass., Feb. 10, 1827. An American economist and statistician. He is the author of "Our National Domain" (1879), "Cotton Manufacturers of the United States" (1880), "Railroads of the United States," etc.

Atkinson, Henry. Born in North Carolina, 1782; died at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., June 14, 1842. An American general. He defeated the Indians at Bad Axe River in Black Hawk's war, 1832.

Atkinson, Thomas Witlam. Born in Yorkshire, England, March 6, 1799; died at Lower Walmer, Kent, Aug. 13, 1861. An English artist and traveler. He was the author of "Oriental and Western Siberia" (1858), "Travels in the Regions of the Upper and Lower Amoor" (1860), etc.

Atkinson, Sergeant. A character in Fielding's "Amelia." With his devotion to Booth and Amelia, and his self-sacrificing generosity, he is an embodiment of goodness of heart.

Atkins (at'kinz), Richard. Born 1615; died 1677. An English writer on the history of printing; author of "The Original and Growth of Printing, etc." (1664).

Atkyns, Sir Robert. Born in Gloucestershire, 1621; died Feb. 18, 1709. An English jurist, and chief baron of the exchequer; author of "Parliamentary and Political Tracts" (1734), etc.

Atlanta (at-lan'tā). The capital of Georgia and of Fulton County, situated in lat. 33° 45' N., long. 84° 25' W. It is an important railway center, and has an extensive trade in cotton, tobacco, etc., and manufactures of cotton, iron, flour, etc. It is the seat of Atlanta University (colored), founded about 1845. Atlanta was taken by Sherman Sept. 2, 1864, and was partly burned previous to his departure on his "March to the Sea" (Nov. 15, 1864). It became the State capital in 1868. There was a cotton exposition at Atlanta in 1881. Population (1890) 65,533.

Atlanta, Battle of. A victory gained east of Atlanta, July 22, 1864, by the Federals under Sherman over the Confederates under Hood (who had made a sortie from the city). Federal loss, about 3,600 (including General McPherson).

Atlantes (at-lan'tēz). [Pl. of Ἀτλάς.] In Greek architecture, colossal male statues used instead of columns to support an entablature.

Atlantes (ät-län'tes). A magician, in Boiardo's and Ariosto's "Orlando," who lived on Mount Carena in a castle surrounded with a wall of glass where he educated the young Rogero.

Atlantic (at-lan'tik). The capital of Cass County, Iowa, situated on East Nishnabotone River 47 miles east of Omaha. Population (1890), 4,351.

Atlantic City. A seaside resort in Atlantic County, New Jersey, 60 miles southeast of Philadelphia. Population (1890), 13,055.

Atlantic Ocean. [F. Mer Atlantique, G. Atlantisches Meer, L. Atlanticum mare, Gr. τὸ Ἀτλαντικὸν πέραλος, ἢ Ἀτλαντικὴ θάλασσα, the sea of Atlas, originally applied to the sea beyond Mount Atlas in northwest Africa, from Ἀτλάς (Ἀτλάτης), Mount Atlas.] That part of the ocean which is bounded by the Arctic Circle on the north, Europe and Africa on the east, the Antarctic Ocean on the south, and America on the west. It is sometimes regarded as terminating at lat. 40° S., the part southward being reckoned as belonging to the so-called Southern Ocean. Its chief currents are the Gulf Stream, East Greenland Current, Labrador Current, Equatorial Current, South Connecting Current, Guinea Equator, and Brazilian Current. Length, 10,000 miles; average breadth, 3,000 miles; average depth, about 13,000 feet.

Atlantis (at-lan'tis). [L. Atlantis, Gr. ἡ Ἀτλαντὶς νῆσος, the Atlantic Isle, from Ἀτλάς, Mount Atlas.] A mythical island in the Atlantic Ocean, northwest of Africa, referred to by Plato and other ancient writers, which with its inhabitants was said to have disappeared in a convulsion of nature.

Atlantis, The New. See New Atlantis.

Atlas (at'las). [Gr. Ἀτλάς, lit. 'the supporter' (of the sky), from ἀ- euphonic and τλάω (τλα-) (= L. tollere), bear up, support.] 1. In Greek mythology, a Titan, brother of Prometheus and Epimetheus, son of Iapetus and Clymene (or Asia), and father (with Pleione) of the Pleiades and (by Ethra) of the Hyades, and also (in Homer) of Calypso. According to Hesiod he was condemned by Zeus, for his part in the battle of the Titans, to stand at the western extremity of the earth, near the dwelling-place of the Hesperides, upholding the heavens with his shoulders and hands. His station was later said to be in the Atlas Mountains in Africa. According to some accounts he was the father of the Hesperides; also a king to whom the garden of the Hesperides belonged. The details of the myth vary greatly.

Ideler has shown (see Humboldt's "Aspects of Nature," vol. I, pp. 144-146, E. T.) that there was a confusion in the Greek mind with respect to Atlas. The earlier writers (Homer, Hesiod, &c.) intended by that name the Peak of Teneriffe, of which they had some indistinct knowledge derived from Phœnician sources. The later, unacquainted with the great Western Ocean, placed Atlas in Africa, first regarding it as a single mountain, and then, as their geographical knowledge increased, and they found there was no very remarkable mountain in North-western Africa, as a mountain chain. Herodotus is a writer of the transition period. His description is only applicable to the Peak, while his locality is Africa—not, however, the western coast, but an inland tract, probably south-eastern Algeria. Thus his mountain, if it is to be considered as having any foundation at all on fact, must represent the eastern, not the western, extremity of the Atlas chain.

Ravlinson, Herod., III, 159, note.

2. The fourth-magnitude star 27 Pleiadum, at the eastern extremity of the "handle" of the group.

Atlas, Witch of. See Witch of Atlas.

Atlas Mountains. A mountain system in Morocco, Algeria, and Tunis, sometimes regarded as limited to Morocco. Its highest summit, Jebel Ajashi, in Morocco, is 14,600 feet high. Length, about 1,500 miles.

Atm (ätm), Atmu (ät'mö), or Tmu (tmö). In Egyptian mythology, the setting sun, a double of Ra, represented in human form, worshipped at Northern On, or Heliopolis.

Atna. See Ahtena.

Atna (at'nä) River, or Copper River. A river in Alaska which flows into the Pacific west of Mount St. Elias.

Atnah (at'nä). [From a Takulli word meaning 'stranger.'] A tribe of North American Indians dwelling on Fraser River, British Columbia: to be distinguished from the Ahtena of the Athapascan stock. See Salishan.

Atoui. See Kauai.

Atossa (a-tos'sä). [Gr. Ἀρσασα.] 1. The daughter of Cyrus, king of Persia, and wife successively of Cambyses, Smerdis, and Darius Hystaspis.

Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, and wife successively of her brother Cambyses, of the Pseudo-Smerdis, and of Darius, is known to us chiefly from Herodotus and Æschylus. There is no mention of her in the Inscriptions, nor by any historical writer of repute, except Herodotus and such as follow him. According to one account she was killed by Xerxes in a fit of passion.

Ravlinson, Herod., IV, 256.

2. A poetical name given to the first Duchess of Marlborough by Pope in his "Moral Essays."

Atrato (ä-trä'tö). A river in Colombia which flows into the Gulf of Darien in lat. 8° N., long. 77° W. Its length is about 275 miles, and it is navigable for over half its course.

Atrebates (a-treb'a-tēz or at-re-bä'tēz). In ancient history, a tribe of Belgic Gaul, dwelling chiefly in the later Artois. It joined the confederation against Julius Cæsar. One branch dwelt in Britain near the Thames.

Adventurers from Gaul probably led the way into England; and the names Brigantes and Parisi in Durham and east Yorkshire, Cenomanni in East Anglia, and Atrebates in Berkshire, belong equally to the continental districts of Brezeng, Paris, Maine, and Arras. There is some reason, from local names and language, to connect these Gaulish tribes with the Kymric rather than with the Erse variety of the Kelts.

Pearson, Hist. Eng., I, 5.

Atrek (a-trek'), or Attruck (a-truk'). A river in northern Persia, and on the boundary between Persia and the Transcasian territory of Russia. It flows into the Caspian Sea in lat. 37° 30' N., long. 54° 10' E. Length, about 250 miles.

Atrous (ä-trös). [Gr. Ἀτρεΐς.] In Greek legend, a king of Mycene, son of Pelops and father of Agamemnon. He slew the sons of Thyestes and was slain by Ægisthus.

Atri (ä'trē). A town in the province of Teramo, Abruzzi, Italy, 14 miles southeast of Teramo: the ancient Adria or Hadria.

Atri (ä'trē). A river in Bengal, British India, which joins the Ganges at Pubna.

Atri (ä'trē). In the Veda, one of the most frequently named rishis of primeval times. He enjoys the help of Indra, Agni, and the Asvins in all kinds of need. He frees the sun from the power of the asura Svarbham. He is one of the seven rishis (in the sky the seven stars of the Great Bear). To him are ascribed a number of hymns in the fifth Mandala of the Rigveda.

Atridae (ä-tri'dē). The sons of Atrous, Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Atrides (ä-tri'dēz). [Gr. Ἀτρεΐδης, a patronymic, from Ἀτρεΐς.] A son of Atrous, especially Agamemnon.

Atropatene (at'rō-pa-tē'nē). In ancient geography, a mountainous district of Media, corresponding in general to the modern province of Azerbaijan, Persia.

Atropos (at'rō-pos). [Gr. Ἀτροπος, inflexible, from ἀ- priv. and τρέπειν, turn.] In Greek mythology, that one of the three Mæreæ (Gr. Μοῖραι), or Fates, who severs the thread of human life. See Fates.

Atsugé (ät-sö-gä'). An almost extinct tribe of North American Indians. Also called Hat Creek Indians, Pakawadi. See Palaihnihan.

Attacapan (ät-tak'a-pän). A linguistic stock of North American Indians, named from the Atakapa, its principal tribe. In 1885 but eight individuals of the entire stock, all members of the Atakapa tribe, were known to survive. Of these, three resided at Lake Charles, Calasieu parish, Louisiana, the remainder in western Texas. The other tribes of the stock were the Coco and Heyeketi. The Atakapa were accused of cannibalism, and their tribal name is derived from a Choctaw term signifying 'man-eater.'

Attacapas. [Pl.] See Attacapan.

Attakapas (a-tak'a-pä). A popular name for a district in southern Louisiana comprising the parishes of St. Mary's, St. Martin's, Vermilion, Iberia, and Lafayette.

Attalia (at-a-li'ti). The ancient name of Adalia.

Attalus (at'a-lus) I, or Attalos (-los). [Gr. Ἀτταλος.] Died 197 B. C. King of Pergamon 241-197. He carried on war with the Galatians, Syria, and Macedonia, and was allied with Rome in the latter part of his reign. Votive groups were set up by him on the Acropolis at Athens, in honor of his victory over the Gauls. These groups, of figures of about half life-size, were: (1) Battle of the Gods and Giants; (2) Combat between Athenians and Amazons; (3) Victory of Marathon; (4) Destruction of the Gauls by Attalus. Four figures from these groups are in the Museo Nazionale at Naples: a Fallen Giant, a Dead Amazon, a Fallen Persian, and a Dying Bearded Gaul.

Attalus II., or Attalos. Born 220 B. C.; died 138 B. C. King of Pergamon 159-138, son of Attalus I. He was an ally of Rome.

Attalus III., or Attalos. Died 133 B. C. King of Pergamon 138-133 B. C., nephew of Attalus II. By his will he left his kingdom to the Romans.

Attalus, or Attalos. Died about 336 B. C. A Macedonian general, assassinated by order of Alexander the Great.

Attalus. Lived about 325 B. C. A Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great.

Attalus, Flavius Priscus. Emperor of the West. He was probably an Ionian by birth, was prefect of Rome when the city was taken by Alaric in 409, and was proclaimed emperor by Alaric in opposition to Honorius. He was deposed by Alaric in 410, and was banished to Lipari by Honorius in 416.

Attar (ät-tär'), or Athar (Mohammed ibn Ibrahim Ferid-Eddin). Born near Nishapur, Persia, 1119; died 1202 (1229?). A Persian poet and mystic. He wrote forty poetical works, admired for elegance of style and insight into the Sufi doctrines. He is said to have been killed at a great age by a Mongol soldier.

Attendorn (ät'ten-dorn). A town in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, situated on the Bigge 43 miles northeast of Cologne. Population, about 2,000.

Atterbom (ät'ter-bom). Peter Daniel Amadeus. Born at Åsbo, Östergötland, Sweden, Jan. 19, 1790; died July 21, 1855. A Swedish poet, professor (first of philosophy and later of esthetics) at Upsala. He was the leader of the Phosphorists (which see), editor of the "Phosphoros," and later of the "Poetisk kalender." He wrote "Lycksalighetens O," a romantic drama (1824-27, "The Fortunate Island"), "Svenska sinre och skilder" (1841-55, "Swedish Seers and Bards"), etc.

Atterbury (ät'er-bër-i), Francis. Born at Milton, Buckinghamshire, March 6, 1662; died at Paris, Feb. 15, 1732. A noted English divine, politician, and controversialist. He was appointed bishop of Rochester and dean of Westminster 1713, and banished as a Jacobite in 1723.

Attercliffe (ät'er-klif). A small town in Yorkshire, England, northeast of Sheffield.

Attersee (ät'er-zä), or Kammersee (käm'mer-zä). The largest lake of Upper Austria, situated in the Salzkammergut 20 miles east of Salzburg. Its outlet is by the Ager into the Traun. Length, about 13 miles.

Attic (at'ik). One of the dialects of ancient Greek, spoken in Athens and the surrounding district (Attica). It was the most highly cultivated of the Hellenic dialects.

Attica (ät'i-kä). [Gr. ἡ Ἀττική, earlier Ἀκτική, from ἀκτῆ, a headland, a promontory.] In ancient geography, a division of central Greece, bounded by Bœotia (partly separated by Cithæron) on the northwest, the Gulf of Egripos (separating it from Eubœa) on the northeast, the Ægean on the east, the Saronic Gulf on the southwest, and Megaris on the west. It contains several mountains (Cithæron, Parnes, Pentelicon, and Hymettus) and the plain of Attica watered by the Cephissus and Ilissus. Its chief city was Athens, with whose history it is in general identified.

The names of the Attic tribes were Erechtheis, Ægeis, Pandionis, Leontis, Acamantis, Gencis, Cecropis, Hippothontis, Æantis, and Antiochis; the heroes being Erechtheus, Ægeus, Pandion, Leos, Acamas, Æneus, Cecrops, Hippothoon, Ajax, and Antiochus. The order given is that observed upon the monuments.

Ravlinson, Herod., III, 266, note.

Attic Muse, The. An epithet of the Greek historian Xenophon.

Atticus (at'i-kus), Titus Pomponius. Born at Rome, 109 B. C.; died March, 32 B. C. A Roman scholar and bookseller, an intimate friend of Cicero, best known from the letters addressed to him by the great orator. His chief work was "a synchronistic Roman history in the somewhat meagre form of tables, probably with the addition of the contemporary history of foreign peoples which had acquired importance in connection with that of Rome, and, as a supplement, the pedigrees of the chief Roman families" (Teuffel und Schnebe, Hist. Rom. Lit. (tr. by G. C. W. Warr), I, 263).

Atticus Herodes, Tiberius Claudius. Born at Marathon, Greece, about 104 A. D.; died about 180. A celebrated Greek rhetorician and public benefactor. He erected at his own expense many public works at Athens, Corinth, Olympia, and elsewhere, and restored several decayed towns in various parts of Greece.

Attigny (ä-tën-yé'). A small town in the department of Ardennes, France, situated on the Aisne 22 miles south by west of Mezières, important in the Merovingian and Carolingian periods.

Attike. See Attica.

Attila (at'i-lä). [LL. Attila, OIG. Azzilo, Ezzilo, MHG. G. Etzel, Icel. Atli, Hung. Ettele.] Died 453 A. D. A famous king of the Huns, son of Mundzuk and brother of Bleda, together with whom he ascended the throne in 433; surnamed the "Scourge of God" by medieval writers, on account of the ruthless and widespread destruction wrought by his arms. On the death (assassination?) of his brother in 445 he became sole ruler and extended his sway over German as well as Slavonic nations, including the East Goths, Gepidae, Alani, Heruli, Longobards, Thuringians, and Burgundians. He laid waste the provinces of the Eastern Empire south of the Danube 442-447, exacting from Theodosius II. a tribute of six thousand pounds of gold, and establishing the annual subsidy at two thousand pounds; laid claim to one half of the Western Empire as the betrothed husband of Honoria, the sister of Valentinian, who years previously had sent him her ring and the offer of her hand in marriage; invaded Gaul in 451, in alliance with Genseric, king of the Vandals, and was defeated in the same year by the Roman general Aetius with the aid of the West-Gothic king Theodoric at Châlons-sur-Marne; invaded Italy in 452, destroying Aquileia, but retired without attacking Rome, being, according to the legend, dissuaded from sacking that city by Pope Leo I.; and died, probably from the rupture of a blood-vessel, on the night of his marriage with a Gothic maiden named Ildico or Hilda. He appears in German legend, notably in the Nibelungenlied, as Etzel, who, in his turn, is the Atli of the heroic lays of the elder Edda. Between Etzel and Atli there are differences as well as correspondences. According to the Edda, Atli, who married Gudrun, the widow of Sigurd (the Siegfried of the Nibelungenlied), possessed a kingdom in the South. He is, however, nowhere called a king of the Huns. Hindaland, located in the south of Germany, is here a possession of Sigurd's ancestors, the Volsungs, and he himself is frequently called the "Hunnish." In the Nibelungenlied the land of the Huns is located in the east, and belongs to Etzel as king. In the later legend, as in this case, the whole external circumstances of Attila have been transferred to Etzel, and the historical and legendary person are regarded as one. Atli, on the other hand, has nothing in common with Attila, although the Old Norse material apparently came originally from German sources. There are other differences between the Germanic Atli and Etzel that are not due to the confusion of the latter with Attila the Hun. The earliest material of the legend was probably from two separate sources, a German and a Gothic, which were ultimately fused together. The crushing defeat of the Burgundians by Attila, 451, by transference made what was probably at bottom only a feud between two families into the fearful climax in the second part of the Nibelungenlied.

Attila. 1. A tragedy by Corneille, produced in 1667.—2. An opera by Verdi, produced in Venice in 1846.

Attila, or The Triumph of Christianity. An epic poem in twelve books, by W. Herbert (London, 1838), with a historical preface, on the career of Attila from his defeat on the Catalaunian plains (451) till his death (453).

Preternatural machinery, both celestial and infernal, is supplied on a liberal scale. The most useful part of the book to a historical student is the second half of it, "Attila and his Predecessors, an Historical Treatise." Here all the materials for writing the life of Attila are collected with great industry, but there is no sufficient separation between the precious and the vile.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, II, 40.

Attinghausen (ät'ting-hou-zen). A small village in the canton of Uri, Switzerland, situated on the Reuss 20 miles southeast of Lucerne, celebrated in the William Tell legend.

Attis. See Atys.

Attius. See Accius.

Attius (at'i-us), or Attus (at'us), Navius. An augur under Tarquinius Priscus.

This augur forbade the king to carry out his intention of creating three new centuries of horsemen, which were to have been called after his own name, and placed on an equal footing with the Famines, Titenses, and Luceres. Tarquin, in mockery of the augur's art, said:—"Tell me now by thy auguries whether the thing I have now in my mind may be done or not." "It may," replied Attius Navius, after he had consulted the gods by augury. "Well, then," rejoined the king, "it was in my mind that thou shouldst cut this whetstone in two with this razor." The augur took the razor and severed the whetstone; Tarquin desisted from his scheme, and learnt to respect the omens. The whetstone and razor were buried under a sacred covering in the Comitium, and a veiled statue of Attijus Navius was afterwards set up over the spot.

Atwater (ät'wä-tër), Lyman Hotchkiss. Born at New Haven, Conn., Feb. 17, 1813; died at Princeton, N. J., Feb. 17, 1883. An American clergyman, educator, and editor of the "Princeton Review." He was appointed professor of mental and moral philosophy at Princeton in 1854, and later (1869) of logic and moral and political science.

Atwood (ät'wüd), George. Born 1746; died at London, July 11, 1807. A noted English mathematician. On leaving Cambridge (1784), after having been fellow and tutor of Trinity College, he was given a sinecure as patent-searcher of the customs by William Pitt as an indirect remuneration for executing the calculations connected with the revenue. He wrote "A Treatise on the Rectilinear Motion and Rotation of Bodies, etc." (1784), "A Dissertation on the Construction and Properties of Arches" (1801), etc. In the former of these works occurs the first description of the well-known "Atwood's machine" for exhibiting the action of gravity.

Atys, or Attis (ät'is). A mythical personage in the worship of the Phrygian goddess Cybele (Rhea), son of the Lydian supreme god Manes, or of Nana, daughter of the river-god Sangarius, and beloved of Cybele. He met his death in early youth at a pine-tree, which received his spirit, while from his blood sprang violets. A tomb was raised to him on Mount Dindymus, in the sanctuary of Cybele, the priests of which had to be eunuchs. A festival of orgiastic character, lasting three days, was celebrated in his honor in the spring. A pine-tree covered with violets was carried to the shrine of Cybele as a symbol of the departed Atys. Then, amidst tumultuous music and the wildest exhibition of grief, the mourners sought for Atys on the mountains. On the third day he was found, and the rejoicing which followed was as extravagant as the mourning which preceded. The myth may be considered as the counterpart of the Greek legend of Aphrodite and Adonis, which itself is borrowed from the Semitic legend of Tammuz and Ishtar. According to Rawlinson the name means "under the influence of Atë," i. e., 'judicially blind.'

Au. See Aa.

Aubagne (ö-bänny'). A town in the department of Bouches-du-Rhône, France, situated on the Huveaune 10 miles east of Marseilles. Population (1891), 8,154.

Aucassin et Nicolette (ô-ka-sah' â nè-kô-let'). 1. A French romance of the 13th century, named from the hero and heroine. See the extract.

The finest prose tale of the French middle ages, Aucassin et Nicolette. In this exquisite story Aucassin, the son of the Count of Beaucaire, falls in love with Nicolette, a captive damsel. It is very short, and is written in mingled verse and prose. The theme is for the most part nothing but the desperate love of Aucassin, which is careless of religion, which makes him indifferent to the joy of battle, and to everything except "Nicolette ma tres-douce mie," and which is, of course, at last rewarded. But the extreme beauty of the separate scenes makes it a masterpiece. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 147.

2. An opera by Grétry, first produced in 1780. Auch (ôsh). The capital of the department of Gers, France, situated on the Gers in lat. 43° 38' N., long. 0° 36' E.: the ancient Elinberum or Eliberis, later Augusta Ausorum, a flourishing town, capital of the Ausei. It was the chief town of Gascony and Armagnac, and the seat of an archbishop. It has a large trade in wine, brandy, etc., and various manufactures. The cathedral of Auch, begun under Charles VIII. in the florid pointed style, is one of the most interesting churches of southern France. The classical portico was added by Louis XIV. The imposing interior, 347 feet long and 87 high, displays fine Renaissance glass and 113 16th-century choir-stalls carved with figures in rich niches and canopies, which are among the handsomest in France. Population (1891), 14,782.

During the American Revolution he served in the English army, attaining the rank of lieutenant. Later he served with distinction in India (1781-97), at the Cape and in Egypt (1800-03), and in the latter year was made a Knight of the Bath. In 1806 he was promoted to brigadier-general and commanded a force sent to aid Beresford at Buenos Ayres. On arriving there he found that the city had been recovered by the Spaniards and Beresford had surrendered. Unable with his force to retake Buenos Ayres, he attacked Montevideo and took it by storm after a bloody fight (Feb. 3, 1807). Auchmuty was shortly after superseded by General Whitelock, under whom he served in the disastrous campaign against Buenos Ayres. In 1808 he became major-general, and from 1810 to 1813 he served with distinction in India and Java. In 1821 he was appointed commander-in-chief in Ireland.

Audefroy le Bastard (ôd-êr-wâ' lê bâs-târ'). See the extract.

By far the best of them [romances] are those of Audefroy le Bastard, of whom nothing is known, but who, according to the late M. Paul in Paris, may be fixed at the beginning of the thirteenth century. Audefroy's poems are very much alike in plan, telling for the most part how the course of some impeded true love at last ran smooth. They rank with the very best mediæval poetry in colour, in lively painting of manners and feelings, and in grace of versification. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 63.

Audenaerde. See Oudenaerde.

Audh. See Oudh.

Audhumla (ou-dum'lä). [Icel.] The cow, in the Old Norse cosmogony, from whose udders flowed the milk which nourished the first created being, the giant Ymir, and his race. She licked out of the salty ice a being, Buri, whose son, Borr, was the father of Odin.

Audians (â-di-anz). A monastic sect founded by Audius or Audæus, a Syrian, in the 4th century. Audius, after unsuccessful attempts to improve the morals of the clergy, separated from the church and was irregularly appointed bishop. Various heretical opinions were attributed to the sect.

Audience. [Sp. Audiencia.] Originally, a superior court of Spain. The audience as established in the Spanish colonies of America had very extensive powers, frequently in legislative and administrative matters as well as in judicial ones. In the latter respect it was the superior of crown governors, but inferior to the viceroys. In criminal suits its decisions admitted of no appeal; in civil cases an appeal lay to the Council of the Indies only where the amount involved was large. The audience properly consisted of four oidores (auditors or judges), one of whom, as president, virtually ruled the rest. In regions governed by a viceroy, the president of the audience commonly exercised the viceregal functions in case of a temporary vacancy. Elsewhere, as in Charcas, he governed the country as a province, subject to a viceroy in another place. The audiences could appoint temporary governors and remove them; in the case of crown governors and captains-general, their powers were often so nearly balanced by those of the audience as to give rise to constant disputes. The first audience established in America was that of Santo Domingo; later there were audiences of Panama, Los Reyes (Lima), Cofines (central America), New Spain, Charcas, Chile, Bogotá, etc. See these names.

D., son of Orestes who deposed the emperor Julius Nepos, and seized the government of the empire, while he had the title of emperor conferred on his son. Augustulus was compelled by Odoacer to abdicate after the defeat and death of his father at Pavia. He was called Romulus from his maternal grandfather, a Count Romulus of Noricum, while Augustus is known to have been a surname at Aquileia." (Smith, Hist. of the World.) Augustus was popularly changed to the diminutive Augustulus in derision of the emperor's youth.

Augustus (ä-gus'tus). [L., 'reverend,' 'venerable,' orig., prob., 'consecrated by augury.'] A title conferred by the senate in 27 B. C. upon Octavianus, the first Roman emperor. It was assumed by succeeding emperors, at first on the suggestion of the senate, but later as an official title. Until the time of Marcus Aurelius, who bestowed it upon Lucius Verus, and later upon Commodus, it was held only by the reigning emperor. Under Diocletian the title was held both by the emperor of the West and the emperor of the East, their colleagues assuming the title of Cæsar.

Augustus (Gaius Octavianus), called later Gaius Julius Cæsar Octavianus. Born at Vellitru (?), Latium (or at Rome?), Sept. 23, 63 B. C.; died at Nola, Campania, Aug. 19, 14 A. D. The first Roman emperor, son of C. Octavianus by Attia, daughter of Julia, the sister of Julius Cæsar, made by Julius Cæsar his chief heir. After Cæsar's death he went from Epirus to Rome (spring of 44 B. C.); gained the influence of Cicero, the senate, and the people against Antony; was reconciled with Antony, and formed with him and Lepidus the second triumvirate in 43; took part in the proscription of 43, and in the victory over Brutus and Cassius at Philippi in 42; carried on the Persian war 41-40; became more closely allied with Antony (40), and ruler over the West; renewed the triumvirate in 37; subdued Sextus Pompey in 36; and defeated Antony and Cleopatra at Actium in 31, remaining sole ruler of the Roman dominion. In 28 he was made Princeps Senatus, and received the title of "Augustus" in 27. Augustus preserved the republican forms, but united in his own person the consular, tribunician, proconsular, and other powers. His generals carried on various wars in Spain, Africa, Germany, etc., but the Roman advance in the last-named country received a definite set-back through the defeat of Varus by Arminius in 9 A. D. Under Augustus Roman literature reached its highest point, and the temple of Janus was closed. The birth of Jesus Christ also occurred in his reign.

Augustus, G. August (ou'göst). Born July 31, 1526; died Feb. 12, 1586. Elector of Saxony 1533-86, brother of Maurice whom he succeeded. Austin. The capital of Texas and of Travis County, situated on the Colorado River in lat. 30° 18' N., long. 97° 40' W. It is a railroad center and the seat of a State university and other institutions. It was founded by Stephen F. Austin, pioneer (1793-1836). Population (1890), 14,475.

Austin Friars. The monastery of the Friars Eremito of the order of St. Augustine, on the north side of Broad street, Old London, founded by Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford and Essex, in 1253. The ground was considered especially sacred, and the tombs were equal in beauty to those of Westminster Abbey. Here were buried Hubert de Burgh; Edmund Plantagenet, half-brother of Richard II.; those who fell in the battle of Barnet; Richard Fitz Alan, earl of Arundel, beheaded 1397; the Earl of Oxford, beheaded 1463; and Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, beheaded 1521. At the dissolution the spire was destroyed and the monuments sold by the Marquis of Winchester. The nave was walled up, and is now used as a church by the Dutch residents of London. It was damaged by fire in 1862. Little of the old church remains in the present building. The order is also called Augustinians.

Austral Islands (äs'tral'ä'landz). See Tubuai Islands.

Australasia (äs-trä-lä'shü or -zhü). [NL., 'southern Asia,' from L. australis, southern, and Asia.] A division of Oceania, comprising Australia, Papua, Tasmania, New Zealand, New Caledonia, Bismarck Archipelago, and some lesser islands: often regarded as comprising only the Australian colonies of Great Britain, including New Zealand, Tasmania, and Fiji: sometimes equivalent to Oceania.

Australasian Federation. A proposed federal union of the British Australian colonies. A deliberative body, the Federal Council, met in 1886. A national convention at Sydney in 1891, under the presidency of Sir Henry Parkes, adopted resolutions and drafted a "Bill to constitute a Commonwealth of Australia." This bill is (1893) under consideration by various colonial parliaments.

Australia (äs-trä'liä). formerly New Holland. [F. Australie, G. Australien, NL. Australia, 'Southland,' from L. australis, south, southern.] An island-continent and possession of Great Britain, south of Asia, extending from lat. 10° 41' to 39° 8' S., and from long. 113° to 153° 30' E. It is bordered by the Pacific on the east, by the Indian Ocean on the northwest, west, and southwest, and is separated from Papua by Torres Strait on the north, and from Tasmania by Bass Strait on the south. Its principal natural features are mountains along the eastern and southern coasts (Australian Alps, Blue Mountains, Liverpool Range, etc.), the Murray River system in the southeast, the lake district in the south, and extensive desert regions in the interior. The chief products are wool, wheat, maize, and other cereals, hay, cotton, sugar, wine, etc. It is also rich in gold, silver, copper, and coal. Its political divisions are Victoria, New South Wales, Queensland, South Australia (with Northern Territory), and Western Australia, and its chief cities, Melbourne and Sydney. In 1606 it was visited by Spanish and Dutch explorers, and was explored by Cook 1770-77. The first settlement was at Port Jackson in 1788. Gold was discovered in 1851. Among the explorers of Australia have been Bass, Flinders, Oxley, Sturt, Eyre, Leichardt, Burke, Wills, Stuart, Warburton, Forrest, Giles, etc. Area, 2,944,628 square miles. Population, chiefly of British descent (1891), 3,118,125; aborigines, about 55,000.

The natives of Australia were all, when discovered, and still (when uninfected by the teaching of missionaries) remain, on much the same low level of civilization. The men, like the animals of this continent, appear in some respects to belong to an older world than ours. They are not only in an extremely rudimentary stage of material culture, but they show few if any signs of ever having been in a much higher condition. No people have less settled homes; destitute of the forms of agriculture practiced by the natives of the other South Sea Islands, the tribes wander over large expanses of country, urged by the necessities of the chase, and attracted, now here, now there, by the ripening of wild berries or by the presence of edible roots. Houses they have none, and their temporary shelters or gnyehns are of the rudest and most fragile character. Nothing can more clearly demonstrate their barbarous condition than the entire absence of native pottery and of traces of ancient pottery in the soil. They have scarcely made any progress in domesticating animals. Their government is a democracy of the fighting men, tempered by the dictates of Birraark or sorcerers, and by the experience of the aged. Yet their social customs, rules of marriage, and etiquette are of a complexity apparently more ancient than even the similar rules among North American Indians, Kaffirs, and Poly-nesiens.

Lang, Myth, etc., H. 1.

Australian Alps. A mountain-range in the eastern part of Victoria and New South Wales, nearly parallel with the coast, containing the highest point in Australia, Mount Kosciusko, 7,336 feet.

Austrian Pyrenees. See Pyrenees, Australian.

Austrasia (äs-trä'sia or -zia). [ML., from OHG. ostar, eastern. See Austria.] The eastern kingdom of the Merovingian Franks from the 6th to the 8th century A. D. It embodied an extensive region on both sides of the Rhine, with Metz as its capital.

Austria (äs'tri-ä). [G. Österreich, F. Autriche, ML. Austria; from OHG. Ostarrîh, G. Oesterreich, eastern kingdom.] 1. An archduchy in the western part of Austria-Hungary, comprising the crownlands of Upper and Lower Austria (which see); the nucleus of the Hapsburg dominions. The emperor is its hereditary archduke. It was originally the Ostmark formed by Charles the Great 799, destroyed by the Magyars, reerected by Henry I. in 928, and made a duchy in 1156. Until 1246 it was under the Babenberg dynasty (which see), and came under the rule of the Hapsburgs in 1282. Salzburg was united with it administratively from 1814 until 1849.

2. The eastern division of the ancient Carolingian kingdom of Italy, corresponding to the later Venetia.—3. The Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary, comprising Upper Austria, Lower Austria, Salzburg, Tyrol and Vorarlberg, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Görz and Gradiska, Istria, Trieste, Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Galicia, Bukovina, and Dalmatia.—4. The dominions of the house of Hapsburg, called officially the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. See Austria-Hungary.—5. Same as Austrasia.

Austria, Lower. [G. Nieder-Österreich or Österreich-unter-der-Enns.] A crownland in the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary, forming the eastern portion of the archduchy of Austria. It is bounded by Bohemia and Moravia on the north, Hungary on the east, Styria on the south, and Upper Austria on the west. It is mountainous in the south, and is traversed by the Danube. The chief city is Vienna. The prevailing language is German, and the prevailing religion Roman Catholic. Area, 7,654 square miles. Population (1890), 2,661,799.

Austria, Upper. [G. Ober-Österreich or Österreich-ob-der-Enns.] A crownland in the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary, capital Linz, forming the western portion of the archduchy of Austria, bounded by Bavaria and Bohemia on the north, Lower Austria on the east, Styria and Salzburg on the south, and Bavaria and Salzburg on the west. It is mountainous, especially in the south, and is traversed by the Danube. The inhabitants are Germans, and the prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. Area, 4,631 square miles. Population (1890), 785,831.

Austria, House of. See Hapsburg, House of.

Austria-Hungary (äs'tri-ä-hung'gä-ri) (officially, the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy; loosely and popularly, Austria). [G. Österreich-Ungarn, or Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie.] An empire of Europe, capital Vienna, one of the "Great Powers," bounded by Germany (partly separated from it by the Erzgebirge and Sudetic Mountains) and Russia (partly separated from it by the Vistula) on the north, Russia and Rumania on the east, Rumania (separated from it by the Carpathians), Servia (partly separated from it by the Danube), and Montenegro on the south, the Adriatic Sea and Italy (mainly separated from it by the Alps) on the southwest, and Switzerland and Germany (partly separated from it by the Inn and the Böhmerwald) on the west. It extends from lat. 42° to 51° N., and from long. 9° 30' to 26° 26' E. Politically the monarchy is divided into the Cisleithan division, comprising Upper Austria, Lower Austria, Tyrol and Vorarlberg, Salzburg, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Kustenland, Dalmatia, Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Galicia, and Bukovina, which are represented in the Reichsrath, which meets at Vienna, and is composed of an Upper House, and a Lower House of 353 members; and the Transleithan division, comprising Hungary (including Transylvania), Croatia-Slavonia, and Fiume, represented at Budapest by the Diet, composed of a House of Magnates, and a House of 453 Representatives. Legislation for the monarchy as a whole is vested in the Delegations (60 members from each of the two parliaments). Bosnia and Herzegovina are administered by Austria-Hungary. The government is a constitutional hereditary monarchy. The inhabitants belong to various races whose relations are exceedingly complicated. The Slavs (Czechs, Poles, Ruthenians, Slovaks, Slovenes, Servians, and Croatians) lead, numerically forming about one half of the whole; the Germans constitute one fourth, the Magyars less than one sixth, and the Ru-mans about one fifth-enth. There are also Jews, Bulgarians, Armenians, Italians, Gipsies, Ladins. The religion of the majority is Roman Catholic; there are several millions of Protestants, and about an equal number belong to the Greek Church. The country produces grain of all kinds (especially wheat), wine, beets, potatoes, fruits, timber, hemp, flax, tobacco; has manufactures of iron, glass, cotton, linen, wool, and silk; and is very rich in mineral resources, including gold, silver, quicksilver, iron, coal, lead, copper, salt, zinc, and coal. It is on the whole unfavorably situated for commerce. The south and west of Austria belonged to the Roman Empire. The country was at various times overrun by the Goths, Huns, Lombards, Avars, etc. The nucleus was the March of Austria, which was erected by Charles the Great, remade by Henry the Fowler, and constituted a duchy in 1156. To this Styria was united in 1192. The Babenberg dynasty (which see) was extinguished in 1246, and was followed after some years by the Hapsburg line. (See Hapsburg.) Rudolf of Hapsburg (the ruler of various districts in Switzerland, Alsace, Swabia, and Breisgau) was elected emperor of Germany in 1273. In 1282 he conferred Austria, Styria, and Carniola (having wrested them from Ottocar II. of Bohemia in 1276) upon his sons. Carinthia was acquired in 1335, Tyrol in 1363, and Trieste in 1382. The continuous line of Hapsburg emperors of Germany began in 1438. Austria was made an archduchy in 1453, Bohemia, with Moravia, Silesia, and Lusatia, was added to the Hapsburg dominions in 1526. In the same year began the rule of the Hapsburgs in Hungary, at that time mainly in the possession of the Turks, who were not completely dispossessed until 1718. Austria took the leading part in the Thirty Years' War, and at its close (1648) had to cede her possessions in Alsace to France; she also took part in the War of the Spanish Succession, and acquired in 1714 the Spanish (Austrian) Netherlands, Milan, Mantua, Naples, and Sardinia (the latter was exchanged for Sicily in 1720). By the treaties of 1735 and 1738 Naples and Sicily were ceded to the Bourbons, part of northwestern Italy was ceded to Sardinia, and Austria received Parma and Piacenza. The accession of Maria Theresa in 1740 led to the War of the Austrian Succession. The greater part of Silesia was ceded to Prussia in 1742; and by the treaty of 1748 Parma, Piacenza, and Guastalla were ceded to Don Philip. Austria also took a leading part in the Seven Years' War. By the first partition of Poland, 1772, she acquired Galicia and Lodomeria. Bukovina was acquired in 1777, and Bavaria ceded the Innviertel in 1779. War was waged with France 1792-97. By the treaty of Campo-Formio, 1797, Austria lost the Austrian Netherlands and Lombardy, but received Venice, Venetia, Istria, and Dalmatia. New Galicia (afterward lost) was obtained in the third partition of Poland, 1795. War with France was carried on 1793-1801, resulting in the treaty of Lunéville (1801), by which the previous treaty was confirmed. Members of the Hapsburg family received cessions in the arrangements of 1803. The emperor Francis took the title of "Emperor of Austria" in 1804. A disastrous war with France broke out in 1805, and Austria was forced to cede (1805) Tyrol, Vorarlberg, Breisgau, various territories in Swabia, etc., Venetia, Dalmatia, etc., to France and French allies, and received Salzburg and Berchtesgaden. The dissolution of the German Empire took place in 1806. War with France again occurred in 1809, and Austria ceded in the same year Carniola, Trieste, Croatia, part of Carinthia, etc., Salzburg, the Innviertel, etc., and part of Galicia, to Napoleon. Austria joined the Allies against Napoleon in 1813. By the Congress of Vienna (1815) she regained many of her former dominions, including Tyrol, the Illyrian territories, Venetia, and Lombardy. She became the head of the German Confederation (1815-66), a member of the Holy Alliance, and a leader in the European reactionary movement. Revolutionary movements in Austrian and Italian dominions 1818-19 were repressed, and a rebellion in Hungary which took place at the same time was subdued with the aid of Russia. The Republic of Cracow was annexed in 1846. By the war of 1850 against France and Sardinia, Austria lost Lombardy and her influence in Italy. She joined with Prussia in a war against Denmark in 1864. In 1866 Prussia, in alliance with Italy, made war upon Austria, and completely defeated her at Königgratz. She was obliged to retire from the Germanic Confederation and to cede Venetia to Italy. The formation of the dual monarchy took place in 1867. In 1878 the administration of Bosnia and Herzegovina was given to Austria-Hungary. In 1883 Austria entered into the Triple Alliance with Germany and Italy. Area, 249,942 square miles. Population (1890), 41,350,204.

Austrian Hyena. The. A nickname given to Julius Jakob von Haynau, from his cruelties in Italy and Hungary. His flogging of women at the capture of Brescia, and his severity to the defeated Hungarians in 1849, roused such indignation that he barely escaped with his life when on a visit to the brewery of Barclay and Perkins, London.

Austrian Rigi. A name sometimes given to the Schafberg in Austria.

Austrian Succession, War of the. The war between Austria and England on the one side, and France, Bavaria, Prussia, Spain, Sardinia, etc., on the other, which broke out on the succession of Maria Theresa (daughter of the emperor Charles VI.) to the Austrian lands in 1740. The states whose adherence to the Pragmatic Sanction (which see) Charles VI. had secured took up arms to despoil Maria Theresa of her dominions. The conflict with Prussia which was terminated in 1742 is known as the first Silesian war (which see). England became allied with Austria 1741, and King George II. defeated the French at Dettingen 1743. The second Silesian war, in which Saxony, originally the ally of Prussia, joined Austria, followed in 1744-45. French victories were gained at Fontenoy 1745, Rocoux 1746, and Lawfeld 1747. The American phase of the war between England and France is known as King George's war. The expedition of the Young Pretender in Scotland and England 1745-46 was a diversion in the French favor. Russia joined Austria in 1747. The war was ended by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle 1748, and a mutual restitution of conquests, except in regard to Austria, which came out of the struggle with the loss of Silesia, as well as of Parma and Piaccenza.

Austrian Switzerland. A name sometimes given to the Salzkammergut in Austria, on account of its picturesque scenery.

Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. [G. Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie.] The official name (since 1867) of Austria-Hungary.

Austro-Prussian War. See Seven Weeks' War.

Austro-Sardinian War. See Italian War of 1859.

Auteuil (ô-tèy'). A former village, now a portion of Paris, situated on the right bank of the Seine east of Boulogne, noted as the place of residence of Boileau, Molière, Helvetius, Talleyrand, Thiers, and other distinguished people.

Authentic Doctor, The. A title given to the schoolman Gregory of Rimini (died 1358).

Author (â'thor), The. A comedy by Foote, produced and printed in 1757. See Cadwallader.

Author's Farce, The. A play by Fielding, produced in 1730, and revived in 1734, with amusing ridicule of the Cibbers.

Autire (ou-ti-râ'), or Hoteday (hō-te-dâ'). A tribe or division of North American Indians which lived in the valley of the Shasta River, California. In 1851 it had 19 villages with an estimated population of 1,140. See Sastean.

Autocrat of the Breakfast-table, The. A series of papers by Oliver Wendell Holmes, published serially in the first twelve numbers of the "Atlantic Monthly," and together in 1858. The autocrat (Holmes himself) discourses on matters in general with a genial philosophy from his position at a boarding-house breakfast-table. He used this signature also in other works.

Autodidactus (â'tô-di-dak'tus), The, or the Natural Man. [Ar. Hai-Ibn-yoqtân; L. autodidactus, 'self-taught.'] A psychological romance by the Arabian philosopher Ibn-Tofaïl (died 1188). In it the author "supposes a child thrown upon a desert island at its birth, and there growing to manhood, who comes by himself to the knowledge of nature, not only in its physical but also in its metaphysical aspect, and even of God." A Latin translation was published in Europe by the English Orientalist Edward Pococke under the title "Philosophus Autodidactus" (1671). It was translated into English by S. Ockley (1711), and into German by J. G. P. (Prilius), 1726.

Autolykus (â-to-l'i-kus). [Gr. Αυτολύκος.] Born at Pitane, in Æolis: lived about 350 B. C. A Greek astronomer, author of treatises "On the Motion of the Sphere" and "On Fixed Stars."

Autolykus. In Greek legend, a son of Hermes (or Dædalion) and Chione, and father of Anticleia, the mother of Odysseus. He was a famous thief, and possessed the power of making himself and the things that he stole invisible, or of giving them new forms.

Autolykus. In Shakspeare's "Winter's Tale," a witty thieving peddler, a "snapper up of unconsidered trifles." He indulges in grotesque self-mockery and droll soliloquizing on his own sins.

Automedon (â-tom'e-don). [Gr. Αὐτομέδων.] In Greek legend, the son of Diodes, and, according to Homer, the comrade and charioteer of Achilles. In another account, he had an independent command of ten ships in the Trojan war. Vergil makes him the companion in arms of Pyrrhus, son of Achilles.

Autran (ô-trôn'), Joseph Antoine. Born at Marseilles, June, 1813: died there, March 6, 1877. A French poet, author of "La Fille d'Eschyle," a tragedy which gained him a seat in the Academy.

Autriche (ô-trêsh'). The French name of Austria.

Autricum (â'tri-kum). The Roman name of a town of the Celtic Carnutes: the modern Chartres.

Autronia gens (â-trô-ni-ÿ jenz). In ancient Rome, a clan or house whose only known family name is Prætus. The first member of this gens who obtained the consulate was P. Autronius Prætus, 65 B. C.

Autun (ô-tuñ'). A city in the department of Saône-et-Loire, France, situated on the Arroux 42 miles southwest of Dijon: the ancient Augustodunum (whence the name). It contains many Roman antiquities, the medieval Cathedral of St. Lazare, theological seminoaries, and collections, and has varied manufactures and some trade. The Roman town, which was the seat of a noted school of rhetoric, was destroyed by Tetricus in 270, and rebuilt by Constantius Chlorus and Constantine: later it was sacked by northern invaders, Saracens, Normans, etc. The cathedral is in great part early Romanesque, with fine western pyramid-capped towers flanking a beautiful porch of two bays, in which opens the round-arched portal, with an impressive Last Judgment in its tympanum. The ornamental details of the interior are largely copied from the local Roman remains. There is a lofty 15th-century spire at the crossing; its great stone pyramid is hollow from base to apex. Among the Roman remains are the Porte d'Arroux, a Roman gateway of fine masonry, with two large arches flanked by small ones, and surmounted by an arcade of high, narrow arches between Corinthian pilasters; the Porte St. André, a Roman gateway of similar character to the Porte d'Arroux, but more massive, with two large and two small arches below, and an upper arcade of ten arches displaying Ionic pilasters; and the temple of Janus, so called, a massive square Roman tower, in reality a defensive outwork of the ancient fortifications. It has two tiers of openings. Population (1891), commune, 15,157.

But the special glory of which Autun was specially to boast itself, the possession of the Flavian name, has utterly passed away; but for the witness of Eumenius itself, the world might have wholly forgotten that Autun had ever borne it. Autun has been for ages as little used to the name Flavia as Trier has been used to the name of Augusta. Freeman, Hist. Essays, 4th ser., p. 97.

Autunois (ô-tü-nwâ'). A former division of Burgundy, corresponding in general to the modern department of Saône-et-Loire and part of Côte-d'Or.

Auvergne (ô-vârny'). [From Arvernii.] An ancient government of France. It was bounded by Bourbonnais on the north, Lyonnais on the east, Languedoc on the southeast, Guienne on the southwest, and Limousin and Marche on the west; corresponding to the departments of Puy-de-Dôme and Cantal, and part of Haute-Loire. Capital, Clermont. It was a county and then a duchy, and was finally united to the French crown in 1532.

Auvergne, Countess of. A minor character in Shakspeare's "Henry VI.," part 1.

Avallenau, The. [Poem 'of the apple-trees.'] See quotation under Avallon. A poem ascribed to the ancient Merlin. "The poem is considered by Mr. Stephens to be founded on a tradition of seven score chiefs who were changed to sprites in the Wood of Celyddon, to have been written in the latter part of the reign of Owain Gwynedd, and to contain distinct historical allusion to affairs of the years 1165-1170. It includes also a notion of the return of Cadwallader, which was one of the inventions of Geoffrey of Monmouth, set afloat by the wide popularity of his fictitious history. Apple-trees were chosen by the poet because, after Geoffrey's history appeared, Fairy-land was known among the bards as Ynys yr Avallon, the Island of the Apple-trees, which English romancers, not knowing the meaning of Avallon, or not being so much impressed as the Welsh by the beauty of a blossoming apple-orchard, called 'the woody isle of Avallon.'" Morley, Eng. Writers, III. 256.

Avallon (â-vâl-lôn'). A town in the department of Yonne, France, on the Cousin 27 miles southeast of Auxerre: the Roman Abailo. Gives name to a red Burgundy wine. Population (1891), commune, 6,076.

Avalokiteshvara (â'va-lô-ki-tâsh'wa-ra). [Skt., 'the Lord who looks down from on high.'] One of the two Bodhisattvas (see that word), the other being Manjushri, who had become objects of worship among the followers of the Great Vehicle at least as early as 400 A. D. They are not mentioned in the Pitakas, or in the Lalita Vistara, or in the older Nepalese and Tibetan books, and are the invention of Buddhists seeking gods to replace those of the Hindu Pantheon. Avalokiteshvara is the personification of power, the merciful protector of the world and of men. Somewhat later his power was separated from his protecting care, and the former more specially personified as the Bodhisattva Vajradhara, 'the bearer of the thunderbolt,' or Vajrapani, 'he who has the thunderbolt in his hand,' both formerly epithets of Indra. This new being, with the other two Bodhisattvas, forms the earliest triad of northern Buddhism, Vajrapani being the Jupiter Tonans, Manjushri the deified teacher, and Avalokiteshvara the spirit of the Buddha present in the church. These beings and one or two other less conspicuous Bodhisattvas had become practically gods, though the original teaching of Gautama knew nothing of God, taught that Arahats were better than gods, and acknowledged no form of prayer.

Avalon (av'a-lon), or Avallon, or Avelion (a-vel'ion), or Avilion (a-vil'ion). [W. Ynys yr Afallon, island of apples.] In Celtic mythology, the Land of the Blessed, or Isle of Souls, an earthly paradise in the western seas. The great heroes, such as Arthur and Ogier le Dane, were carried there at death, and the fairy Morgana or Morgan le Fay holds her court there. It is often called the Val of Avalon or Avilion.

Of all the qualities of Tir Tairngire abundance of apples, the only important fruit known to the northern nations, seems to have been the only one which conveyed the highest notion of enjoyment. Hence the soul-kingdom was called by the Welsh the island of apples. Ynys yr Avallon, and sometimes Ynysvitrin or Ynysvutrin, Glass Island, a name which identifies it with the Tenticonic Glasberg. When these names passed into other languages untranslated, so that their meaning became obscured or forgotten, the kingdom of the dead was localized at Glastonbury, the Anglo-Saxon Glaestinga burh. There, according to legend, Arthur lies buried; but another popular tradition has it that he was carried away to the island of Avalon by his sister the fairy Morgana, the Morgue la Fae of French Romance. . . . In the romance of Ogier le Danois, when Ogier, who Morgue la Fae determines shall be her lover, arrives at the palace of Avalon, he finds there besides Morgana her brother King Arthur, and her brother Auberon, the Oberon of fairy romance, and Mallabron, a sprite of the sea. Encyc. Brit., V. 325.

Avalon Peninsula (av'a-lon pē-nin' sū-lä). The peninsula at the southeastern extremity of Newfoundland, on which St. John's is situated, connected with the rest of the island by a narrow isthmus.

Avebury (â'ber-i), or Abury (â'ber-i). A small village in Wiltshire, England, 6 miles west of Marlborough, noted for its megalithic antiquities. Near by is the barrow called Silbury Hill.

Avedik (av'e-dik). Lived about 1700. A patriarch of Armenia who, at the instance of the French ambassador, was deposed by the Porte and exiled to Chios. See the extract.

Hammer mentions the banishment of the Armenian patriarch to Chios, for opposing the influence of France, and asserts that he was kidnapped by order of the French ambassador, and carried to the isle of St. Marguerite, near Antibes, where he died. But it appears that this patriarch, whose name was Avedik, was not in reality taken to St. Marguerite, but was secretly transported from Marseilles to the abbey of Mont St. Michel, where he was entrusted to the safe keeping and zealous teaching of the monks, in whose custody he remained completely secluded from the world for three years. He was then removed to the Bastille. The terror of imprisonment for life in that celebrated place overcame his fortitude, and he declared himself a convert to Catholicism, yet he was detained in France until his death. The complaints of the sultan against this outrage on the law of nations caused the French ambassador at Constantinople to deny the transaction, and he even attempted to persuade the Porte that the Spaniards were the man-stealers who had kidnapped the unfortunate Avedik. At last, to avoid a rupture with Turkey, Louis XIV. formally announced that Avedik was dead, though he was still languishing in a French prison. Finlay, Hist. Greece, V. 239, note.

Aveiro (ä-vä-rö). A district in the northwestern part of the province of Beira, Portugal.

Avellaneda (ä-vä-lyä-nä-ñä), Alonso Fernandes de. The name assumed by the writer of a spurious "second volume of the Ingenious Knight Don Quixote de la Mancha," which appeared in 1614 before the genuine "second part" by Cervantes was published. Its authorship has been assigned to Luis de Alinga, the king's confessor, and also to Juan Blanco de Paz, a Dominican friar. The book contains vulgar abuse of Cervantes, and is in turn ridiculed by him in the later chapters of "Don Quixote."

Avellaneda y Arteaga (ä-vä-lyä-nä-ñä ä ärtä-ä-gä), Gertrudis Gomez de. Born in Puerto Principe, Cuba, March 23, 1814; died in Madrid, Feb. 2, 1873. A Cuban authoress. Most of her life was passed in Spain, where she was twice married. Her lyrics are greatly admired. She wrote several successful dramas. Of her novels the best-known are "Dos Mujeres," "Espatolino," and "El Mulato Sab," a kind of Cuban "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Some of her works are published over the pseudonym "La Peregrina."

Avesnes (ä-vän'). A town in the department of Nord, France, situated on the Helpe 26 miles southeast of Valenciennes. It was fortified by Vauban. Population (1891), 6,495.

Avesta (ä-ves'tä). The Bible of Zoroastrianism and the Parsis. The name comes from the Pahlavi avistak, which possibly means 'knowledge.' The name "Zendavesta" arose by mistake from inverting the Pahlavi phrase Avistak va Zand, 'Avesta and Zand,' or 'the Law and Commentary,' Zand, 'knowledge, explanation,' referring to the later version and commentary in Pahlavi. The present Avesta is but a remnant of a great literature. It includes (1) the Yasna, a collection of liturgical fragments and of hymns or Gathas; (2) the Vispered, a liturgical collection; (3) the Vendidad, a collection of religious laws; (4) the Yashts, mythical fragments devoted to various Mazdayasuan divinities; and (5) different prayers known under the names Nyayish, Afringan, Gah, Sirozah, and six various other fragments. The Yasna, 'sacrifice, worship,' is the chief liturgical work. In it are inserted the Gathas, 'hymns,' verses from the sermons of Zoroaster. These are written in an older dialect. They form the oldest and most sacred part of the Avesta. The Vispered contains invocations to "all the lords" (vispe ratavö). The Yashts (from yashti, 'worship by praise') are twenty-one hymns to the divinities, "Yazatas or Izads." The Vendidad, or 'law against the daevas or demons' (vidaeva data), is a priestly code like the Pentateuch. The present form of the Avesta belongs to the Sassanian period. According to the record of Khusrö Anoshirvan (A. D. 531-579), King Valkhash, one of the last of the Arsacide, ordered a search for all surviving writings, and required the priests to aid with their oral tradition. The texts were reedited under successive Sassanian rulers, until under Shapur II. (A. D. 309-379) the final redaction was made by his prime minister Atur-pat Maraspand.

Avesta (ä-ves'tä). A mining town in Kopparberg län, Sweden, situated on the Dal-elf 38 miles southeast of Falun.

Avianus (ä-vi-ä'nus), or Avianus (-ni-us), Flavius. A Latin fabulist, probably of the 4th century A. D. He wrote forty-two fables in the manner of Æsop, in elegiac meter. The collection was used as a school-book, and was augmented, paraphrased, and imitated.

Avicbron. See Salomon ibn Gebirol.

Avicenna (äv-i-sen'ä) (a corrupt form of Ibn Sina). Born at Afshena, Bokhara, Ang., 980; died at Hamadan, Persia, 1037. The most celebrated Arabian physician and philosopher, author of commentaries on the works of Aristotle, and of treatises on medicine based chiefly on Galen; surnamed the "Prince of Physicians." His works, most of which are brief, number over 100. His writings upon Aristotle were held in great esteem, and his "Canon of Medicine" (Canon Medicinæ, in Ar. Kitab el-qânûni fi-tibbi, 1593; L. trans. by Gerardus Cremonensis, 1595) was long regarded in Europe as one of the highest authorities in medical science.

Avicenna (Ibn Sina) was at once the Hippocrates and the Aristotle of the Arabians; and certainly the most extraordinary man that the nation produced. In the course of an unfortunate and stormy life, occupied by politics and by pleasures, he produced works which were long revered as a sort of code of science. In particular his writings on medicine, though they contain little besides a compilation of Hippocrates and Galen, took the place of both even in the universities of Europe; and were studied as models at Paris and Montpellier till the end of the 17th century, at which period they fell into an almost complete oblivion. Whewell, Ind. Sciences, I. 279.

Avidius Cassius. General under M. Aurelius. Avienus (ä-vi-é'nus), Rufus Festus. Lived probably about 370 A. D. A Roman poet. He wrote "Descriptio orbis terræ" (based on the "Periegesis" of Dionysius), "Ora maritima" (a description of the western and southern coasts of Europe), "Aratea phenomenæ" (a poetical translation of the "Phenomena" [Gr. φαινόμενα] of Aratus), "Aratea prognostica," etc.

Avigliana (ä-vél-yä'nä). A small town in the province of Turin, Italy, 14 miles west of Turin.

Avigliano (ä-vél-yä'nö). A town in the province of Potenza, Italy, situated on the Bianco northwest of Potenza. Population, 13,000.

Avignon (ä-vén-yön'). [In E. formerly Avinion; F. Avignon, It. Avignone, L. Avenio(n)-, Avenio(n)-, Gr. Ἀβινών.] The capital of the department of Vaucluse, France, situated on the east bank of the Rhône, in lat. 43° 57' N., long. 4° 50' E.; the Roman Avenio; called the "Windy City" and the "City of Bells." It has a large trade in madder and grain, and manufactures of silk, etc., and is the seat of an archbishopric and formerly of a university. It was a flourishing Roman town, and is celebrated as the residence of the popes 1309-78, to whom it belonged until its annexation by the French in 1791. At that time it was the scene of revolutionary outbreaks, and of royalist atrocities in 1815. It is associated with the lives of Petrarch, Laura, and Rienzi. Population (1891), 43,453. The cathedral of Avignon is in great part of the 11th century. There is an octagonal lantern with a dome of Byzantine appearance, and pointed barrel-vaulting. The sculptured tombs of Popes John XXII. and Benedict XII. and the papal throne remain in the church, which is much modernized. The palace of the popes is an enormous castellated pile, built during the 14th century, with battlemented towers 150 feet high and walls rising to a height of 100 feet. Much remains in the interior, though now difficult of access owing to the use of the palace as barracks. The Pope's Chapel and that of the Inquisition are both frescoed, the latter by Simone Martini.

Avila. A province of Spain, bounded by Valladolid on the north, Segovia and Madrid on the east, Toledo and Cáceres on the south, and Salamanca on the west. It is a part of Old Castile. Area, 2,931 square miles. Population (1887), 193,093.

Avila. The capital of the province of Avila, situated on the Adaja 58 miles northwest of Madrid. It has a cathedral and university.

The cathedral is of early-Pointed work, in part castellated for defense. The effect of both exterior and interior is plain and somewhat heavy: the good tracery of windows and cloister is much blocked up to exclude the light, in the prevailing Spanish fashion. There are some beautiful sculptured tombs, and remarkable carved choir-stalls. The town walls are medieval. The circuit is practically complete. With its gates, very numerous semicircular towers, and its crowning of pointed battlements, it is one of the most picturesque of existing examples of the kind. Population (1887), 19,935.

Avila (ä-vé-lä), Alonso de (often written Alonso Dávila). Born about 1485; died after 1537. A Spanish soldier and adventurer in America. He went to America, where his name first appears as commander of one of Grijalva's ships in the expedition of 1518 to the Mexican coast. In 1519 he joined Cortés, was one of his most trusted captains, marched with him to Mexico and against Narvaez, and in 1521 was his agent to the Audience of Santo Domingo, where he obtained important concessions. In June, 1522, he was sent to Spain with treasure and despatches: near the Azores his ships were captured by French corsairs, and the treasure was lost. Avila managed to have his despatches sent to Spain, but was himself kept a prisoner for several years. Finally ransomed, he returned to Spain, was appointed contador of Yucatan, and set out for that region as second in command of the expedition of Montejo (1527). Arrived there, he was appointed to lead an expedition to a region on the west coast, in search of gold. He provoked conflicts with the Indians, was unable to return, and, after terrible sufferings, made his way to Trujillo in Honduras. In 1537 he was engaged in another unsuccessful expedition to Yucatan.

Avila, Gil Gonzalez de. See Gonzalez Davila.
Avila, Juan de. Born at Almodóvar del Campo, Spain, 1500; died May 10, 1569. A Spanish pulpit orator who preached forty years in Andalusia, whence his surname "Apostle of Andalusia." Chief work: "Epistolario espiritual" (1578).

Avila, Pedro Arias de, generally called Pedriarías (pä-drä-ré-as). Born at Arias, Segovia, Spain, 1442; died at Leon, Nicaragua, March 6, 1531. A Spanish soldier and administrator. After serving with distinction in the Moorish wars of Spain and Africa, he was sent (1514) with a large fleet and over 1,500 men to Darien as governor of Castilla del Oro, superseding Balboa, whom he imprisoned and tried on various charges. A reconciliation was effected, but later (1517) Balboa was accused (probably falsely) of planning a rebellion, tried, and executed in the governor's presence. Pedriarías's government was marked by rapacity and cruelty. In 1519 he founded Panama and made it his capital. He aided, or at all events encouraged, the enterprise of Pizarro and Almagro in search of Peru; but on the failure of the first expedition relinquished his share, forcing the partners to pay him an indemnity. In consequence of numerous complaints, Pedriarías was transferred to the governorship of Nicaragua in 1526.

Avila y Zuñiga (ä-vé-lä ē thö-nyé-gä), Luis de. Born at Placencia, Spain, about 1490; died after 1550. A Spanish historian. He wrote "Commentarios de la guerra de Alemaña, hecha por Carlos V., 1546-47" (1547).

Avilés (ä-vé-läs'). A seaport in the province of Oviedo, Spain, in lat. 43° 38' N., long. 5° 56' W. Population (1887), 10,235.

Avilés y del Fierro (ä-vé-läth ē del fē-er-rō), Gabriel, Marquis of Avilés. Born about 1745; died at Valparaiso, Chile, 1810. A Spanish soldier and administrator. He was colonel and afterward general in the Spanish army in Peru; took part in suppressing the rebellion of Tupac Amaru (1780-81); commanded the forces against Diego Tupac Amaru (1783); and was one of the judges who condemned the rebels to torture and death. He was successively president of Chile (1795 to 1799), viceroy of Buenos Ayres (1799 to 1801), and viceroy of Peru (1801 to 1806), attaining the military grade of lieutenant-general. He died while on his way from Peru to Spain.

Avilion. See Avallon.

Avisa (a-vi-sä). A volume of short poems by Henry Willoughby or Willoughby. It was first printed in 1594, and prefixed to the second edition in 1596 are some verses which allude to Shakspeare's "Rape of Lucrece." The poems exemplify the character of a chaste woman resisting all the temptations to which her life exposes her.

The singular book known as Willoughby's Avisa, which, as having a supposed bearing on Shakspeare, and as containing much of that personal puzzlement which rejoices critics, has had much attention of late years, is not strictly a collection of sonnets; its poems being longer and of differing stanzas.

Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 111.

Avisio (ä-vé-sē-ō). An alpine valley in southern Tyrol, east of the Adige, and east and south of Botzen. It is subdivided into the Cembra, Fiemme, and Fassa. Length, 60 miles.

He wrote "The Ancient and the Present State of the University of Oxford" (1714), "Parergon Juris Canonici Anglicani; or a Commentary by way of Supplement to the Canons and Constitutions of the Church of England" (1726), "New Pandect of Roman Civil Law" (1734), etc. He was a graduate of Oxford (New College), and was expelled and deprived of his degrees in 1714 for slandering the university.

Ayllon, or Aillon (äl-yön'), Lucas Vasquez de. Born about 1475: died in Virginia, Oct. 18, 1526. A Spanish lawyer, judge of the Audience of Santo Domingo from 1509. In 1519 he was sent by the Audience to Cuba to prevent Velasquez, governor of that island, from interfering with the expedition of Cortés in Mexico, but was unsuccessful. In 1520 he received a license to explore the coast of Florida, and sent a caravel there under Gordilla. Satisfied by his reports, Ayllon went to Spain, received a royal cedula to explore and settle 800 leagues of coast, and after sending a preliminary expedition under Pedro de Quesos (1525) he sailed from Hispaniola in June, 1526, with three ships and people for a colony. After running along the coast he fixed his settlement, called San Miguel, at the point where the English afterward founded Jamestown, Virginia. There he died of a fever, and quarrels in the colony led to its abandonment.

Aylmer (äl'mër), John. Born at Tivetshall St. Mary, Norfolk, England, 1521: died at Fulham, near London, June 3, 1594. An English prelate, made bishop of London March, 1577. He was installed archdeacon of Stow in June, 1553, but on account of his heretical opinions was obliged to take refuge at Strasburg and Zurich until the accession of Elizabeth. He was an opponent of Puritanism, and was bitterly attacked in the Martin Marprelate tracts. His administration of his office made him exceedingly unpopular. He is supposed to be the "Morrell" ("the proude and ambitious pastour") of Spenser's "Shepherd's Calendar."

Aylmer, Lake. A lake in British America, northeast of Great Slave Lake.

Aymarás (ä-mä-ráz'). [Originally applied to a small branch of the Quichuas, but by mistake transferred to this tribe.] A race of Indians, anciently and properly called Collas, who, in the earliest recorded times, occupied the region about Lake Titicaca and the neighboring valleys of the Andes. They had attained a considerable degree of civilization before they were subdued by the Incas in the 13th and 14th centuries. They dwelt in stone huts, had flocks of llamas, and practised agriculture. Their most formidable arms were slings and bolas or weighted lassos. Their language is related to the Quichua, and it has been supposed that this was the original stock from which the Quichuas and Incas were derived. The Aymarás are still very numerous, forming three fourths of the population of Bolivia, with a few in southern Peru. They speak their own language and cherish their ancient traditions, but are nominally Catholics.

Aymer de Valence. Died 1324. The third son of William of Valence, half-brother of Henry III. He succeeded to the earldom of Pembroke in 1296; led, as "Guardian of Scotland," the van in the attack on Robert Bruce in 1306; defeated the Scots at Methven; and was defeated by Bruce at Loudon Hill (1307). Under Edward II. he was one of the chief opponents of the favorite Gaveston; but he joined the king's party when Gaveston, after his capture in Scarborough Castle, was put to death, notwithstanding the fact that Pembroke had promised him his life.

Aymer, Prior. In Scott's "Ivanhoe," the prior of Jorvaulx Abbey, a fat and cautious voluptuary who is captured by Locksley.

Aymestrey, or Aymestry (äm'stri). A small place in Herefordshire, England, northwest of Leominster, noted for its limestone.

Aymon, or Aimon (ä'mön), or Haymon (hä'mön). A partly imaginary character who appears in the old French romances, a prince of Ardennes, of Saxon origin, who took the title of Duke of Dordogne. He was the father of Renand (Rinald), Guiscard (Guicciardo), Alard (Alardo), and Richard (Richardetto), the "four sons of Aymon" whose adventures were written in a chanson de geste of the 13th century (first printed in 1493), supposed to be by Huon de Villeneuve, under the title of "Les Quatre Fils d'Aymon" (which see). The brothers appear in Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," Pulci's "Morgante Maggiore," Boiardo's "Orlando Innamorato," Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," and other French and Italian romances.

Ayscue (äs'kü), Sir George. Died about 1672. An English admiral, distinguished in the wars against the Dutch. Of his early life nothing is known. In 1646 he was a captain in the English fleet, and was one of those who adhered to the Parliament. In 1649 he was engaged on the Irish coast as admiral, and in 1651 was sent by Cromwell to America, in command of a squadron; he reduced Barbadoes and other islands which had remained faithful to the royalists, visited the coast of Virginia, and returned to England in 1652. On July 3, 1652, he had a fight with a large Dutch fleet in the Downs, and on Aug. 16 he encountered De Ruyter's fleet off Plymouth, both sides claiming the victory. From 1658 until the Restoration he was in Sweden, and on his return was made commissioner of the navy. He subsequently served against the Dutch, was captured in the engagement off the north Foreland, June, 1666, and only released when peace was declared, Oct., 1667.

Azamgarh. See Azingarh.

Azangaro, or Asangaro (äs-än'gä-rö). A village of the department of Puno, Peru, in the basin of Lake Titicaca. In the time of the Incas it was an important place, and there are traditions that it was the hiding-place of a vast amount of their treasures. It was the center of operations of the revolutionist Tupac Amaru (1780), and he also is reported to have buried treasure in the village. To archaeologists Azangaro is especially interesting for an ancient building, the Sondor-huasi, which was the residence of an Inca officer. It presents the only instance which has come down to us of the thatched roofs used by the Incas; this, far from being a rough covering, is an elaborate work of art and very serviceable.

Azani (a-zä'ni), or Azation (a-zä'ni-ou), or Aizani. [Gr. Azaros.] In ancient geography, a city of Phrygia, Asia Minor, situated in lat. 39° 16' N. Its ruins are near the modern Chavdur-Hissar.

Azanza (ä-thän'thä), Miguel José de. Born at Aviz, Navarre, 1746: died at Bordeaux, France, June 20, 1826. A Spanish statesman and soldier. When a young man he traveled extensively in Spanish America. In 1793 he was minister of war. From May, 1798, to May, 1800, he was viceroy of New Spain (Mexico). He was minister of finance under Ferdinand VII., afterward member of the supreme junta, and presided over the junta at Bayona in favor of Joseph Bonaparte. Under Joseph he was successively minister of justice, of the Indies, and of ecclesiastical affairs. After the fall of the Bonapartes he lived in retirement at Bordeaux. Mexicans call him "the Bonapartist viceroy."

Azara (ä-thä'rá), Felix de. Born at Barbanzales, Aragon, May 18, 1746: died in Aragon, 1811. A Spanish naturalist and traveler, brother of Don José Nicolo de Azara. He entered the army and attained the rank of brigadier-general, taking part in the Algiers expedition, in which he was wounded (1775). From 1781 to 1801 he was in Paraguay as one of the commissioners to settle the boundaries between the Spanish and Portuguese possessions, and he devoted much of his time to studying the geography, history, and zoology of this region. The results were published in French, in a work on the quadrupeds of Paraguay and the Rio de la Plata, and in his "Voyage dans l'Amérique méridionale" (Paris, 1800, 4 vols. 8vo, with atlas).

Azara, José Nicolo de. Born 1731: died 1804. A Spanish diplomatist and art connoisseur, brother of Felix de Azara.

Azariah. See Uzziah.

Azay-le-Rideau (ä-zä'lè-rè-dö'). A small town in the department of Indre-et-Loire, France, near Tours. It contains a chateau, a very fine example of the Renaissance manor-house of the 16th century, with cylindrical flanking towers, high roofs, and dormer-windows.

Azazeel. See Azazel.

Azazel (a-zä-zel'). A name which occurs in the ritual of the day of atonement, Lev. xvi. 8, 10-26. The high priest had among other ceremonies to cast lots upon two goats. One lot was inscribed "for Yahveh" (Jehovah), the other "for Azazel." The goat upon which the lot "for Yahveh" fell was offered as a sacrifice, while on the goat upon which the lot "for Azazel" had fallen the high priest laid his hands and confessed all the sins of the people. The goat was then led by a man into the desert, "unto a land not inhabited," and was there let loose. The authorized version renders Azazel on the margin by "scape goat"; the revised version has Azazel in the text and "or dismissal" on the margin. Various explanations of the word have been offered, such as, for instance, that it meant the goat sent away or let loose (taking it as a compound of ez ozel), or the place to which the goat was sent. The probable and plausible explanation, adopted by nearly all modern critics, is that which takes it as the proper name of an evil spirit popularly supposed to have its dwelling in the wilderness. This view is supported by the antithesis in which Azazel is put to Yahveh. The rite may be considered a survival of an older stage of religious belief, perhaps Egyptian, Azazel being a substitute for Typhon, who was also conceived as living in the desert. In Arabic writers (Qazwini, Hariz, etc.) Azazel is described as one of the jinns (genii) who for their transgression were taken prisoners by the angels. Azazel grew up among them and became their chief, until he refused to prostrate himself before Adam, when he became Iblis (despair), the father of the Shaitans (evil spirits, Satans). This is echoed in Milton's "Paradise Lost," where Azazel is represented as the standard-bearer of the infernal hosts, cast out from heaven and becoming the embodiment of despair. The identification of Azazel with Satan is also met in some of the church fathers. The etymology of the name is obscure.

Azazel (a-zā'zi-el). 1. In Faust's "Miraculous Art and Book of Marvels, or The Black Raven," the name of one of the chief princes of the infernal kingdom, of which Lucifer is the king.—2. A seraph in Byron's "Heaven and Earth." He loves Anah, a mortal, whom he carries away from earth.

Azacapuzalco (äz-kä-pöt-zäl'kō), or Azacapuzalco, or Azcapozalco. [Nahuatl, from ezcatl, the ant.] A village of Mexico about 5 miles northwest of the capital, with which it is connected by horse-ears. It was an old Aztec town, founded by the Tepepanes on the western side of the lake of Tezcuco in 1168. At the time of the conquest it was the great market of Mexico, where there was a regular sale of produce and slaves. Cortés and his army took refuge there after the flight of the noche triste. It was the scene of a battle between the Spanish forces and those of Iturbide, Aug. 19, 1821: both sides claimed the victory.

Azaglio (äz-zäl'yō), Marchese d' (Massimo Taparelli). Born at Turin, Oct. 24, 1798; died at Turin, Jan. 15, 1866. An Italian statesman and author. Azhi Dahaka (ä'zhi da-hä'kü). ['Destroying serpent.'] Originally, the cloud-serpent of Aryan mythology, the destroying serpent of the Avesta; later, in the heroic myths of the Iranians, an old king of Iran. In Firdausi, as Dahak, Dabhak, or Tohhak, he is the son of an Arab chief Mir-das and dwells in Mesopotamia. He makes a league with Ahriman, who prompts him to compass the death of his own father and succeed him. Ahriman feeds Dahak with flesh, though man had before lived on fruits. In return he wishes to kiss Dahak upon the shoulders, whence there grow in consequence two serpents. Each day two men are killed that the serpents may be fed with their brains. Attacking Iran, Dahak puts Jem to flight, slays him in China, and seizes the kingdom, which he holds during a thousand years of oppression and misrule. Overthrown by Kave and Feridun, he was chained by the latter in Mount Demavend, whence it is believed that he will at the end of time escape to spread destruction and be slain by Keresaspa.

Azrael (az'rā-el). In Jewish and Mohammedan angelology, the angel who separates the soul from the body at the moment of death, for which he watches.

Aztec Calendar Stone. See Stone of the Sun.

Aztecas (az'tek-az). [Said to be derived from Nahuatl aztlan, place of the heron; but with equal probability from the name of a clan (the 'Heron' clan) which left its name to the place.]

A surname of the Mexican branch of Nahuatl Indians of central Mexico. The name "Aztecs" has been much misused, every sedentary tribe having been conceived to be descendants of the people so named. In fact, they were a band of Indians who had gradually drifted into the valley of Mexico, from the north (probably), and who, harassed by tribes of their own linguistic stock which had preceded them in the occupation of the shores of the lagoon of Mexico, finally fled to some islands in the midst of its waters for security. Improving upon this already secure position, they held their own, and in the end turned upon their neighbors. From these petty tribal wars resulted, in the course of the 15th century, the confederacy between the Aztecs, the Tezcuans, and the Tecpancans, which became at last formidable to all the aborigines of central Mexico up to the year 1519, when Cortés put an end to the power of the confederates of the valley plateau of Mexico. The word Azteca was only a surname, not the original designation of the tribe; and the supposed connection of the Mexicans with the New Mexican Pueblos can only be admitted when it is proved that the Pueblo languages are of one stock, and that that stock is radically connected with the Nahuatl of central Mexico.

Aztecs. See Aztecas.

Aztlán (äzt-län'). [Nahuatl, 'place of the Heron.'] A mythical site where the Aztecs are said to have dwelt, or whence they are represented as having started on their journey to the southward. Its location is not yet defined.

He published "Sistema universale dei principj del diritto marittimo dell' Europa" (1795), "Dizionario della giurisprudenza mercantile" (1780-88), "Histoire de Sardaigne" (1802), etc.

Baader (bä'der), Franz Xaver von. Born at Munich, March 27, 1765; died at Munich, May 23, 1841. A German scholar, appointed honorary professor of philosophy and speculative theology at the University of Munich in 1826; chiefly known from his philosophical writings. He devoted himself at first to the study of medicine and the natural sciences, held the position of superintendent of mines in Munich (1797), and published various scientific and technical works. His philosophy was conceived under Roman Catholic influences, and was theosophical in character. His philosophical works have been collected, under the editorship of Franz Hoffmann, in 16 volumes (1850-60).

Baal (bā'al). [Phen. and Heb. ba'al, lord, master.] The supreme god of the Canaanites. The Assyro-Babylonian form of the name is Bēlu, Bel. He was conceived as the productive power of generation and fertility, his female counterpart Ashtoreth (Astarte, Ishtar) being the receptive. His statue was placed on a bull, the symbol of generative power, and he was represented with bunches of grapes and pomegranates in his hands. He was also worshiped as the sun-god, and was represented with a crown of rays. Offerings made to him were incense, bulls, and on certain occasions human sacrifices, especially children (Jer. xix. 5). The favorite places of his altars were heights and roofs of houses (Jer. xxxii. 29). His cult, like that of Ashtoreth, was attended by wild and licentious orgies. The various names and epithets of Baal occurring in the Old Testament and elsewhere were derived from his various aspects and the localities in which he was worshiped. So Baal Zebub (in the New Testament Beelzebub, 'lord of flies') in Ekron; Baal Gad ('lord of good luck') in Baal Gad (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7), the modern Banias at the foot of Mount Hermon; Baal Peor, from the mountain in Moab. His general name among the Moabites was Chemosh (which see). Moloch ('king') was his name especially among the Ammonites. In Tyre he was worshiped as Melarth ('king of the city'), identified by the Greeks with Hercules. He was Baal Berith ('lord of the covenant') in the confederacy of Shechem. Like the Hebrew Jah and El and the Assyro-Babylonian Bēlu, Baal entered largely into the composition of proper names. So, among numerous others, the names of the two celebrated Carthaginian generals in the Punic wars, Hannibal ('Baal is gracious') and Hasdrubal ('Baal is helpful'). The worship of Baal was introduced into Israel under Ahab and his wife, who was a Phœnician princess.

Baal. A king of Tyre. He is mentioned in the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions as having been made king of Tyre by Esarhaddon (king of Assyria 680-668 B. C.), but rebelled against him and joined Tirhakah, the Ethiopian king of Egypt. On his expedition against Egypt, Esarhaddon forced Baal to submit to the Assyrian sovereignty. Under Assurbanipal (603-562 B. C.) Baal renewed his rebellion against Assyria, but was again obliged to submit.

Baalath (bā'al-ath). A town of Dan, situated probably on the site of the modern Bel'ain, about 2 miles north of Beth-horon.

Baalbec, or Baalbek (bāl'bek), or Baalbak (bāl'bak). ['The city of Baal' or of 'the sun'; Old Syriac Ba'aldal; the modern Al-Bukaa (the valley).] An ancient city of Syria, situated on the slope of Anti-Libanus 34 miles northwest of Damascus: the Greek Heliopolis ('city of the sun'), famous for its ruins. It was a center of the worship of Baal as sun-god, whence both the original and the Greek names. The city was a Roman colony (Colonia Julia Augusta Felix) under Augustus, and was adorned (great temple) by Antoninus Pius. Its fall began with its capture by the Arabs, and it was totally destroyed by an earthquake in 1750. The site is famous for the ruins of the two great temples on its acropolis. The older portions of the acropolis wall, made of huge stones, are of Phœnician or kindred origin, and date from the time when the worship of Baal was still supreme. All the structures, except the parts of the wall mentioned, are late Roman in time, and are very effective from their grouping, their great size, and the beauty of the materials. Baalbec has been known to Europeans since the 16th century, and its monuments have been studied and drawn by many explorers.

Baal Peor (bā'al pē'or). See Baal.

Baan (bān), or Baen, Jan van der. Born at Haarlem, Feb. 20, 1633; died at Amsterdam, 1702. A Dutch portrait-painter. His son Jacob der Baan (born at The Hague, March, 1672; died at Vienna, April, 1700) also practised the same art.

Baanites (bā'an-its). The followers of Baanes, a Paulician of the 8th and early part of the 9th century.

Baar (bär). A town in the canton of Zug, Switzerland, 15 miles northeast of Lucerne.

Babenhause. A small town in the province of Starkenburg, Hesse, on the Gersprenz 15 miles southeast of Frankfurt-on-the-Main.

Baber (bā'bēr), or Babar (bā'bār), or Babur (bā'bör) (Zehir-Eddin (or Zahir al din) Mohammed). Born Feb. 4, 1483; died Dec. 28, 1530. A great-grandson of Timur: the founder of the so-called Mogul empire in India. He succeeded his father in Ferghana in 1494, conquered Kashgar, Kunduz, Kandahar, and Kabul, and in 1525 and 1526 India. He wrote in the Fatar language memoirs afterward translated into Persian and from that into various Western languages.

This dynasty is commonly known as Mogul, both in and out of India; but Baber was for all practical purposes a Turk. His memoirs were written in Turkish; his army was chiefly Turkish; and he always speaks of the real Moguls with extreme dislike. The cause of the misnomer is that the name Mogul is in India loosely applied to all strangers from the North, much in the same way as that of Frank is, throughout the eastern world, to all strangers from the West. It is even applied to the Persians, with hardly more reason than the Persians themselves have for calling the Ottoman Turks Romans.

Babes in the Wood. See Children in the Wood.

Babeuf (bā-bēf'), or Babœuf, François Noël: pseudonym Caius Gracchus. Born at St. Quentin, France, 1760 (1762?); died at Paris, May 28, 1797. A French agitator and communist. He founded a journal called "La Tribune du Peuple" (1794), in which he advocated absolute equality and community of property. In 1796 he organized a conspiracy against the Directory for the purpose of putting his theories into practice, but was betrayed, and executed, together with his principal accomplice, Darthé. His system of communism, known as Babœvisme, is set forth in his principal works, "Cadastré perpétuel" (1789) and "Du système de population" (1794).

Babi (bā'bē), or Babists (bā'bists). A Persian sect of Mohammedans, so called from bab, 'a gate,' the name assumed by the founder of the sect, who claimed that no one could come to know God except through him. It was founded about 1843 by Seyd Mohammed Ali, a native of Shiraz. On the accession of the shah Nasr-ed-Din 1848, the sect broke out into revolt, proclaiming the Bab as universal sovereign, and was put down only after several Persian armies had been routed. The Bab was executed 1850. An attempt on the life of the shah in 1852 by three Babists occasioned a terrible persecution, in spite of which the sect survives. The Babi form a pantheistic offshoot of Mohammedanism, tinged with Gnostic, Buddhist, and Jewish ideas, inculcate a high morality, discontinuance polygamy, forbid concubinage, asceticism, and mendicancy, recognize the equality of the sexes, and encourage the practice of charity, hospitality, and abstinence from intoxicants of all kinds.

Babylon (bab'i-lon). In ancient geography, the capital of Babylonia, situated on the Euphrates in lat. 32° 30' N., long. 44° 30' E.; Babel. The etymology of the name is, as ascertained by many passages in the cuneiform inscriptions, bab-ili, gate of god. The explanation of Gen. xi. 9, "confusion," from the Hebrew batul, is, as in many other instances, based on a popular etymology. Its Persian name was Babirus. It was situated in the south on the Euphrates, and its ruins are spread out on both sides of the river. Babylon was one of the oldest cities of Mesopotamia (compare Gen. x. 10), and was the undisputed capital of Babylonia at the time of the Elamite conquest (2300 B. C.), remaining till the end. As capital of the country it shared in all its vicissitudes, and was the principal aim of the Assyrian invasions. It was first conquered by the Assyrian king Tukulti-Adar about 1300 B. C.; then by Tiglath-Pileser I. about 1110 B. C. Of Salmanneser II. (860-824 B. C.) and his son and grandson it is recorded that they victoriously entered Babylon and sacrificed there to the gods. It was customary with the Assyrian kings, in order to be recognized as fully legitimate kings, to go to Babylon and there perform the mysterious ceremony termed by them "seizing the hands of Bel." Sennacherib sacked it 600 B. C., and completely razed it to the ground. His son and successor Esarhaddon undertook, eleven years later, the restoration of the city. But it was under Nabopolassar, the founder of the new Babylonian empire, 625-604 B. C., and especially under his successor Nebuchadnezzar, 604-561 B. C., that it became "Babylon the great." The ruins, now covering both banks of the Euphrates, are those of the Babylon of these kings and their successors, and convey some idea of its former magnitude and splendor. Nebuchadnezzar, who took more pride in the buildings constructed under his auspices than in his victorious campaigns, concentrated all his care upon the adorning and beautifying of his residence. To this end he completed the fortification of the city begun by his father Nabopolassar, consisting in a double inclosure of mighty walls, the inner called Ingur-Bel (Bel is gracious), the outer Vemitti-Bel (foundation of Bel). The circumference of the latter is given by Herodotus (178 ft.) as having been about 55 miles (480 stades), its height about 340 feet, and its thickness about 85 feet. Ctesias (in Dioid. Sicul. II. 7 ff.) gives somewhat smaller numbers. According to both these writers the wall was strengthened by 250 towers and pierced by 100 gates of brass (compare also Jer. i. 15; II. 53, 58). The city itself was adorned with numerous temples, chief among them Esacila ("the high-towering house"), temple of the city and of the national god Merodach (Babylonian Marduk) with his spouse Ziranip. In the neighborhood of it was the royal palace, the site of which was identified with the ruins of Al-Kasr. Sloping toward the river were the Hanging Gardens, one of the seven wonders, the location of which is in the northern mound of ruins, Babil. The temple described by Herodotus is that of Neba in Borsippa, not far from Babylon, which Herodotus included under Babylon, and which also in the cuneiform inscriptions is called "Babylon the second." This temple, which in the mound of Birs Nimrod represents the most imposing ruin of Babylonia, is termed in the inscriptions Ezida ("the eternal house"), an ancient sanctuary of Neba (Assyrian Nabu), and was restored with great splendor by Nebuchadnezzar. It represents in its construction a sort of pyramid built in seven stages, whence it is sometimes called "temple of the seven spheres of heaven and earth," and it is assumed that the narrative of the "tower of Babel" in Gen. xi. was connected with this temple. Concerning Babylon proper Herodotus mentions that it had wide streets lined with houses of three and four stories. In the conquest of Cyrus, 538 B. C., the city of Babylon was spared. Darius Hystaspis razed its walls and towers. Xerxes (486-465 B. C.) despoiled the temples of their golden statues and treasures. Alexander the Great wished to restore the city, but was prevented by his early death. The decay of Babylon was hastened by the foundation in its neighborhood of Seleucia, 300 B. C., which was built from the ruins of Babylon. The last who calls himself in an inscription "king of Babylon, restorer of Esacila and Ezida," was Antiochus the Great (223-187 B. C.). In the time of Pliny (23-79 A. D.) Babylon was a deserted and dismal place. In the figurative language of the Apocalypse Babylon is used for the city of the Antichrist.

Babylonian Captivity. 1. The period of the exile of the Jews in Babylon: usually reckoned as 70 years, though the actual period from the destruction of the temple and Jerusalem to the return was not more than 50 years. In 605 B. C. Nebuchadnezzar attacked Jerusalem and carried off many prisoners. In 597 the city was again attacked and the king Jehoiachin, his household and 10,000 of the flower of the nation, were carried away. In 586 the city was captured after a siege, the city and temple were burned, and the inhabitants massacred. The survivors were carried off to Babylonia. This was the beginning of the Babylonian captivity proper. In 536, Cyrus, after capturing Babylon, granted the exiles permission to return; and a colony of 42,300 persons availed itself of the privilege.

2. That period in the history of the papacy in the 14th century when the popes, exiled from Italy, lived at Avignon under French influences. Their stay in France lasted about 70 years.

Babylonica (bab-i-lon'i-kā). An ancient romance in thirty-nine books, by Iamblichus, a Syrian rhetorician of the time of Trajan. It existed in manuscript until near the end of the 17th century, when it was destroyed by fire. An epitome of it is given by Photius. It narrates the adventures of two lovers, Rhodanes and Sinonis, in their flight from King Garmus of Babylon, and their attempt to evade his two eunuchs, Damas and Saca, sent in pursuit of them.

Baca (bā'kā), Valley of. [Heb., valley of balsam-trees?]. A valley, referred to in the Old Testament (Ps. lxxxiv. 6), probably El-Bake'ia, between Jerusalem and Bethlehem.

Bacairis, or Bakairis, or Bacahiris (bā-kā-ē-rēz'), or Bacuris (bā-kō-rēz'). An Indian tribe of central Brazil, living about the head waters of the Xingú and Juruena. A few hundred have submitted to the whites and serve as herdsmen and laborers. They have no intercourse with the wild Bacairis, who are much more numerous. The latter, who were first visited by Von den Steinen in 1886, go naked, live partly by agriculture, and have permanent villages. By their language they are classed with the Carib stock.

Bacapa, Saint Ludovico. [Pima, from rakhi, ruined building or house.] An abandoned mission in southeastern Arizona, founded in the latter part of the 17th century, and often confounded with Vaepa (now Matape) in central Sonora.

Bacchæ (bak'ē), The. [Gr. Βάχχα, the Bacchæ-nals.] A play of Euripides, assigned to a late period in the life of the dramatist. It was composed for the court of Archelaus, and is founded on the punishment of Pentheus, "who, with his family, jeers at the worship of Dionysus, and endeavors to put it down by force. His mother Agave, and her sisters, are driven mad into the mountains, where they celebrate the wild orgies of Bacchus with many attendant miracles. Pentheus, who at first attempts to imprison the god, and then to put down the Bacchæ-nals by force of arms, is deprived of his senses, is made ridiculous by being dressed in female costume, and led out by the god to the wilds of Cithæron, where he is torn in pieces by Agave and other priestesses" (Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 373).

Bacchiadæ (ba-kī'a-dē). [Gr. Βακχιάδαι.] A ruling family of Corinth, a branch of the Heraclidæ: so named from Bacchis, king of Corinth 926-891 B. C. They ruled Corinth first under a monarchical form of government, then as a close oligarchy from 926 B. C. till their deposition by Cypselus, about 657 B. C.

Bacchiglione (bāk-kē-lyō'ne). A river in northeastern Italy which flows past Vicenza and Padua and empties into the Gulf of Venice. Length, about 80 miles.

Bacchus (bak'us). [L., Gr. Βάκχος, another name of Dionysus, the god of wine; also one of his followers or priests. Also called Βακχίος, prob. related to βάκχω, shout, with allusion to the noisy manner in which the festival of Dionysus was celebrated.] In classical mythology, a name of Dionysus, the son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Semele, and the god of wine, personifying both its good and its bad qualities. It was the current name of this god among the Romans. The orgiastic worship of Bacchus was especially characteristic of Æolia, where his festivals were celebrated on the slopes of Mount Cithæron, and extended to those of the neighboring Farnassus. In Attica the rural and somewhat savage cult of Bacchus underwent a metamorphosis, and reached its highest expression in the choragic literary contests, in which originated both tragedy and comedy, and for which were written most of the masterpieces of Greek literature. Bacchus was held to have taught the cultivation of the grape and the preparation of wine. In early art, and less commonly after the age of Phidias, Bacchus is represented as a bearded man of full age, usually completely draped. After the time of Praxiteles he appears almost universally, except in archaic examples, in the type of a beardless youth, of graceful and rounded form, often entirely undraped or very lightly draped. Among his usual attributes are the vine, the ivy, the thyrsus, the wine-cup, and the panther.

Bacchus and Ariadne. A noted painting by Titian (1523), in the National Gallery, London. Bacchus descends from his leopard-chariot, attended by satyrs and maenads, while Ariadne turns away startled. The background is of woodland, meadow, and sea, glowing with color and light, harmonious, and beautiful in form.

Bacchylides (ba-kil'i-dēz). [Gr. Βακχυσίδης.] A Greek lyric poet of the second rank, living in the 5th century B. C., a native of Iulis in the island of Ceos, a nephew and pupil of Simonides and a contemporary and rival of Pindar. He lived for a time at the court of Hiero in Syracuse. Fragments of his works have survived.

Bacon (bä'kon), Anthony. Born 1558; died May, 1601. An English diplomatist, son of Sir Nicholas Bacon by his second wife, and brother of Francis Bacon. He attached himself (1593) to the Earl of Essex, and followed his fortunes until his death, acting for seven years as his private foreign secretary.

Bacon, Delia. Born at Tallmadge, Ohio, Feb. 2, 1811; died at Hartford, Conn., Sept. 2, 1859. An American writer, sister of Leonard Bacon. Her best-known work is the "Philosophy of the Plays of Shakespeare Unfolded" (1857), in which she attempted to prove that the plays attributed to Shakspeare are the work of Francis Bacon and others.

Bacon, Ezekiel. Born at Boston, Mass., Sept. 1, 1776; died at Utica, N. Y., Oct. 18, 1870. An American jurist and politician. He was member of Congress from Massachusetts 1807-13, and first comptroller of the United States Treasury 1813-15.

Bacon, Francis. Born at York House, London, Jan. 22, 1561; died at Highgate, April 9, 1626. A celebrated English philosopher, jurist, and statesman, son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, created Baron Verulam July 12, 1618, and Viscount St. Albans Jan. 27, 1621; commonly, but incorrectly, called Lord Bacon. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, April, 1573, to March, 1575, and at Gray's Inn 1575; became attached to the embassy of Sir Amias Paulet in France in 1576; was admitted to the bar in 1582; entered Parliament in 1584; was knighted in 1603; became solicitor-general in 1607, and attorney-general in 1613; was made a privy counselor in 1616, lord keeper in 1617, and lord chancellor in 1618; and was tried in 1621 for bribery, condemned, fined, and removed from office. A notable incident of his career was his connection with the Earl of Essex, which began in July, 1591, remained an intimate friendship until the fall of Essex (1600-01), and ended in Bacon's active efforts to secure the conviction of the earl for treason. (See Essex.) His great fame rests upon his services as a reformer of the methods of scientific investigation; and though his relation to the progress of knowledge has been exaggerated and misunderstood, his reputation as one of the chief founders of modern inductive science is well grounded. His chief works are the "Advancement of Learning," published in English as "The Two Books of Francis Bacon of the Proficiency and Advancement of Learning Divine and Human," in 1605; the "Novum organum sive indicia vera de interpretatione nature," published in Latin, 1620, as a "second part" of the (incomplete) "Instauratio magna"; the "De dignitate et augmentis scientiarum," published in Latin in 1623;

"Historia Ventorum" (1623), "Historia Vitæ et Mortis" (1623), "Historia Densi et Rari" (posthumously, 1658), "Sylva Sylvarum" (posthumously, 1627), "New Atlantis," "Essays" (1597, 1612, 1625), "De Sapientia Veterum" (1609), "Apothegms New and Old," "History of Henry VII." (1622). Works edited by Ellis, Spedding, and Heath (7 vols. 1857); Life by Spedding (7 vols. 1861, 2 vols. 1878). See Shakspeare.

Bacon, John. Born at London, Nov. 24, 1740; died there, Aug. 4, 1799. An English sculptor. Among his works are monuments to Pitt (Guildhall and Westminster Abbey), Dr. Johnson and Howard (St. Paul's), and Blackstone (All Souls, Oxford).

Bacon, Leonard. Born at Detroit, Mich., Feb. 19, 1802; died at New Haven, Conn., Dec. 24, 1881. An American Congregational clergyman, editor, and author. He was pastor in New Haven (1st church 1825-81), professor and lecturer (1871) in New Haven Theological Seminary (1866-81), one of the founders of the "New Englander," and one of the founders and editors of the New York "Independent."

Bacon, Nathaniel. Born 1593; died 1660. An English Puritan lawyer, member of Parliament 1645-60, and master of requests under Cromwell and Richard Cromwell. He was the author of a "Historical Discourse of the Uniformity of the Government of England" (1647-51).

Bacon, Nathaniel. Born in England about 1642; died Oct., 1676. An Anglo-American lawyer, son of Thomas Bacon of Friston Hall, Suffolk, England. He emigrated to Virginia, settled on the upper James, and became a member of the governor's council. He was chosen by the Virginians, who were dissatisfied with Governor Berkeley's Indian policy, to lead an expedition against the Indians, but was refused a commission by the governor. He nevertheless invaded the Indian territory in 1676, but was proclaimed a rebel by Governor Berkeley, was captured, tried before the governor and council, and acquitted. The enthusiasm which Bacon's cause awakened was taken advantage of to demand the abolition of exorbitant taxes, the recently imposed restrictions on the suffrage, and other evils. Having been proclaimed a rebel a second time by the governor, Bacon captured and destroyed Jamestown, but died before he could accomplish his projects of reform.

Bacon, Sir Nicholas. Born at Chiselhurst, Kent, 1509; died at London, Feb. 20, 1579. An English statesman, father of Francis Bacon. He was graduated B. A. at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge in 1527; was called to the bar in 1533; became solicitor of the Court of Augmentations in 1537; attorney of the Court of Wards and Liveries in 1546; and was lord keeper of the great seal from Dec. 22, 1558, to his death, exercising after April 14, 1559, the jurisdiction of lord chancellor.

Bacon, Roger. Born at or near Ilchester, Somersetshire, about 1214; died probably at Oxford in 1294. A celebrated English philosopher. He was educated at Oxford and Paris (whence he appears to have returned to England about 1250), and joined the Franciscan order. In 1257 he was sent by his superiors to Paris where he was kept in close confinement for several years. About 1265 he was invited by Pope Clement IV, to write a general treatise on the sciences, in answer to which he composed his chief work, the "Opus Majus." He was in England in 1268. In 1278 his writings were condemned as heretical by a council of his order, in consequence of which he was again placed in confinement. He was at liberty in 1292. Besides the "Opus Majus," his most notable works are "Opus Minus," "Opus Tertium," and "Compendium Philosophiæ." See Siebert, "Roger Bacon," 1861; Heid, "Roger Bacon's Praktische Philosophie," 1881, and L. Schneider, "Roger Bacon," 1873.

Bactra. See Balkh.

Bactria (bak'tri-ä), or Bactriana (bak-tri-ä-nä). [From Bactra.] In ancient geography, a country in Asia, north of the Paropamisus Mountains on the upper Oxus, nearly corresponding to the modern district of Balkh in Afghanistan. The population was Aryan in race; the capital Zariaspa or Bactra, now Balkh. Bactria was the cradle of the Persian religion which Zarathustra (Zoroaster) reformed about 600 B. C. (?). At a very early period it was the center of a powerful kingdom which was conquered by the Medes, and together with these by the Persians, and then by Alexander. It was a part of the kingdom of the Seleucide, and from 256 B. C. for about 100 years an independent Greco-Bactrian kingdom which extended to the Kabul River and the Indus. Bactria belonged to the Sassanide until about 640 A. D., and has since been under Mohammedan rule.

Bactrian Sage, The. Zoroaster, who was a native of Bactria.

Badajoz (bād-ā-hōs'; Sp. bād-ā-hōth'). A province of Estremadura, western Spain, popularly called Lower Estremadura. Area, 8,687 square miles. Population (1887), 480,418.

Badajoz. The capital of the province of Badajoz, situated on the Guadiana near the Portuguese frontier, in lat. 38° 49' N., long. 6° 56' W.: the Roman Pax Augusta, or Batallium. It is strongly fortified and has a cathedral and castle. It has belonged at various times to the Moors, Castile, and Portugal. It is the birthplace of Morales. Badajoz has often been besieged, the most notable of these events being (1) the unsuccessful siege by the Allies in 1705, when it was defended by the French and Spanish; (2) its siege by the French under Soult, who captured it March, 1811; (3) three sieges by the British, April-May, 1811, May-June, 1811, and March-April, 1812. It was stormed and taken by them April 6, 1812. Population (1887), 27,279.

Badakshan (bād-āk-shān'). A territory in central Asia, about lat. 36°-38° N., long. 69°-72° E., bounded by the Amu-Daria on the north, the Hindukush on the south, and Kunduz on the west, especially noted for its rubies. It is inhabited largely by Tajiks. Capital, Faizabad. Population (estimated), 100,000.

Badalocchio (bā-dā-lok'kē-ō), Sisto, surnamed Rosa. Born at Parma, 1581; died at Bologna, 1647. An Italian painter and engraver, a pupil and assistant of Annibale Carracci.

Badcock (bad'kok), John. A writer on pugilistic and sporting subjects, who wrote between 1816 and 1830 under the pseudonyms of "Jon Bee" and "John Hinds." In 1830 he edited the "Works of Samuel Foote," with remarks, notes, and a memoir (under the name of Jon Bee).

Baddeley (bad'li), Robert. Born probably in 1733; died in 1794. An English actor. He was originally the cook of Samuel Foote, and went on the stage before 1761. He was the original Moses in the "School for Scandal." In his will he left the revenue of his house in Surrey for the support of an asylum for decayed actors, and also the interest of one hundred pounds to provide wine and cake for the actors of Drury Lane Theater on Twelfth Night. This is still done.

Since 1843, then, the term of "Their," or "Her Majesty's Servants," is a mere formality, as there is no especial company now privileged to serve or solace royalty. Mr. Webster, who occupies Garrick's chair in the management of the Theatrical Fund, tells me, that Baddeley was the last actor who wore the uniform of scarlet and gold prescribed for the "gentlemen of the household" who were patented actors; and that he used to appear in it at rehearsal. He was proud of being one of their "Majesties' servants";—a title once coveted by all nobly-aspiring actors. Doran, Eng. Stage, II, 416.

Baddeley, Sophia. Born at London in 1745; died at Edinburgh in 1786. The wife of Robert Baddeley, and an actress and singer.

Balzac (bäl-zäk'), Honoré de. Born at Tours, France, May 16, 1799; died at Paris, Aug. 18, 1850. A celebrated French novelist. After attending school in Tours and Paris he became a lawyer's clerk. His inclination to write was strongly opposed by his family, but, "in order to get his hand in," he composed a dozen novels. These appeared either anonymously or under a nom de plume, and when republished often received an entirely different title. Some of them were excluded by Balzac from the complete collection of his works; others he absolutely disowned. After a disastrous venture in publishing, printing, and type-casting, he sold out his entire stock and fell back on his pen to pay off his debts. His first novel of real merit, "Le dernier Chouan on la Bretagne en 1800," was published in 1829; then followed "La physiologie du mariage" and the first of the "Contes drolatiques" (1830), "La peau de chagrin" (1830), "La femme de trente ans" (1831), "Eugénie Grandet," "Le médecin de campagne," and "l'Histoire des Treize" (1833), "Seraphita," "La recherche de l'absolu," and "Le Père Goriot" (1835), "Le lys dans la vallée" (1836), "Illusions perdues" (1837), "Histoire de la grandeur et de la décadence de César Biotteau" and "Le cabinet des antiques" (1838), etc. For the stage Balzac did not write with success: "Vautrin," "Les Ressources de Quinola," "Paméla Giraud," and "La Mariette" had very short runs; but "Le Faiseur," or "Mercadet," a comedy finished and put upon the stage by d'Emery after Balzac's death, has been included since 1869 in the repertoire of the Théâtre Français. Balzac's ventures in publishing were, as has been said, unsuccessful: "La Chronique de Paris" (1835) lived but one year, and "La Revue Parisienne" (1840) ended with the third number. Returning undaunted to a collective edition of "La comédie humaine," Balzac published "Ersule Mironet" and "Mémoires de deux jeunes mariées" in 1842, "Un ténébreuse affaire" in 1843, "Albert Savarus," "Un début dans la vie," "La muse du département," and "Modeste Mignon" in 1844; but he did not complete the task he had undertaken. "Les Chouans" and "Une passion dans le désert" are the only parts extant of the "Scenes de la vie militaire." His latest productions, "Les parents pauvres" ("La cousine Bette," "Le cousin Pons," and "Les paysans"), are among his best. On March 14, 1850, he married a widow, Madame Hanska, member of a noble Polish family, with whom he had opened a correspondence in 1833, and whom he had subsequently met in Vienna, Geneva, and St. Petersburg. He died in Paris, just after his return from the wedding-trip. Balzac is considered the chief of the realistic school of French novelists.

Balzac, Jean Louis Guez de. Born at Balzac, near Angoulême, 1597; died there, Feb. 18, 1654. A noted French writer. He published "Letters" (1624), "Le Prince" (1631), "Discours" (1644), "Le Barbon" (1648), and "Ariatippe." He is regarded as the foremost prose-writer of his time.

Banbury (ban'bér-i). A town in Oxfordshire, England, situated on the Cherwell 22 miles north of Oxford. Its ancient cross, noted in nursery rhyme, was destroyed in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth. It was famous for its ale and cakes, and for its cheese which was proverbially regarded as consisting of nothing but "paring." Hence the allusions in "Shakespeare and other writers to persons thin as a Banbury cheese. Insurgents were defeated here by troops of Edward IV. in 1469. It was twice besieged in the civil war. Population (1891), 12,767.

Banbury Man. A Puritan. From the frequent allusions in the writers of the 16th and 17th centuries, the town would seem to have been chiefly inhabited by them. Swift speaks of a Banbury saint, meaning a particularly rigid or even hypocritical Puritan. The name or epithet "Banbury" was applied in a depreciatory sense before the Puritan times. Thus Latimer, in a letter to Henry VIII. about 1528, speaks of "laws, customs, ceremonies and Banbury glosses," apparently meaning "silly," "useless."

Banks Strait. A strait separating Tasmania from the Furneaux Group to the northeast.

Banks's horse. A celebrated trick-horse named Morocco, the property of a man named Banks who lived about the beginning of the 17th century. He could perform tricks with cards and dice and dance at his master's command. In 1600 or 1601 Banks is said to have made him "override the vane of St. Paul's Cathedral" in the presence of an enormous crowd. The first mention of him occurs about 1590. He is alluded to by Raleigh, Armin, Gayton, and many others, and there are references to him in the plays of the period.

Sir Kenneth Digby says, "He would restore a glove to the due owner, after the master had whispered the man's name in his ear; would tell the just number of pence in any piece of silver coin newly showed him by his master." Banks showed his horse upon the continent, and in France had a narrow escape from the Capuchins, who suspected him of being in league with the devil. There was a report that he fell a victim to a similar suspicion at Rome. Ben Jonson, in his epigram, speaks of "Old Banks the juggler, our Pythagoras, Grave tutor to the learned horse; . . ."

Hudson, Note to Love's Labour's Lost.

Bannister, John. Born at Deptford, England, May 12, 1760; died at London, Nov. 7, 1836. A noted English comedian, the son of Charles Bannister.

Bannock (ban'ok). [Pl., also Bannocks; a corruption of Pan-iti, the tribal designation used by the people themselves.] A tribe of North American Indians, also called "Robber Indians." It was divided into two geographically distinct divisions, the first of which claimed the territory between lat. 42° and 45°, and from long. 113° to the main chain of the Rocky Mountains; while the second division, or northern Bannock, claimed all of the southwestern portions of Montana, into which they had been forced by the Blackfeet. The southern branch was by far the more populous. In 1869 the Bannock of Salmon River numbered but 350, in 50 lodges, having been largely reduced by smallpox and the irruptions of the Blackfeet. Upon the establishment of Wind River reservation in 1869, about 600 southern Bannock were placed on it, and in the same year 600 others were assigned to Fort Hall reservation. Most of the latter subsequently wandered away, but in 1871 returned with the Shoshoni and scattered Bannock of southeast Idaho. There are now (1893) 514 on Fort Hall reservation, and 75 on Lemhi reservation, Idaho. (See Digger and Shoshonean.) Also Banack, Banatte, Bonack, Boonack, Phonack, Panasht, Panauque, Ponack, Ponashka, Punnak.

Banquo (bang'kwô). The thane of Lochaber in Shakspeare's tragedy "Macbeth." He is a general in the king's army, with the same rank as Macbeth, and with the same ambitions, but is of a quieter nature and more discretion. He is killed by order of Macbeth on account of the future promised to him by the Weird Sisters, namely that Banquo's posterity should reign. In one of the most powerful scenes of the play his ghost appears to the guilty Macbeth while unseen by the other banqueters.

Banquo and Fleance, though named by Holinshed, followed by Shakspeare, are now considered by the best authors to be altogether fictitious personages. Chalmers says, "History knows nothing of Banquo, the thane of Lochaber, nor of Florence his son." Sir Walter Scott observes that "early authorities show us no such persons as Banquo and his son Fleance; nor have we reason to think that the latter ever fled further from Macbeth than across the flat scene according to stage direction. Neither were Banquo and his son ancestors of the house of Stuart." Yet "Peerages" and "Genealogical Charts" still retain the names of Banquo and Fleance in the pedigree of the Royal Houses of Scotland and England. Furness, Shak. Var.

Banswara (bân-swâ'râ). A small tributary state in Rajputana, British India, about lat. 23° 30' N., long. 74° 30' E.

A London undertaker who, in 1863, in a pamphlet entitled "A Letter on Corpulence," recommended a course of diet for the reduction of corpulence, which has been named from him "banting." The diet recommended was originally prescribed for Banting by William Harvey, and consists of the use of lean meats principally, and abstinence from fats, starch, and sugar.

Bantry (ban'tri). A seaport in County Cork, Ireland, situated near the head of Bantry Bay. 39 miles west-southwest of Cork. Population, about 2,000.

Bantry Bay. An inlet of the Atlantic on the southwestern coast of Ireland, in County Cork. Length, 25 miles.

Bantu (bân'tô). The homogeneous family of languages spoken, with the exception of the Hottentot, Bushman, and Pygmy enclaves, throughout the vast triangle between Kamerun, Zanzibar, and the Cape of Good Hope. Bantu (or ora-ndu, ba-tu, a-tu) signifies in almost all these languages 'the people,' and has therefore been adopted to denote the whole family. All the Bantu languages are clearly derived from one mother-tongue. Though they differ in the vocabulary, their grammar is practically one. Although subdivided into hundreds of dialects, the Bantu family contains relatively few great national languages. Such languages are, in South Africa, the Kafir and Zulu, the Se-chwana, the Shi-gwamba; on the north and south of the Kenene River, a large cluster of dialects characterized by the prefix Ora- or Ori-; the Angola language, from Loanda to the Kuango River; the Kongo language, from the Lifune River to Sette Kama, and from the Atlantic to Stanley Pool; the Lunda language; the Kiboku or Kioko language, from the confluence of the Kassai to its source and beyond; the great Luba (and Langa) language, from the confluence of the Luebo and Kassai rivers to Lake Bangweolo; the Ki-lole, in the horseshoe bend of the Kongo River; the Ki-ike, from the equator over Stanley Pool to lat. 7° S.; the Fan, in northern French Gabon and southern German Kamerun; the Lu-ganda, on Victoria Nyanza; the Kinyanja, on Lake Nyassa; the Kua language, in Mozambique; and Ki-suahili, from Zanzibar to the far west, northwest, and southwest. The term Bantu is also used to denote 'a race.' The negroes of both the Bantu stock and the Nigrific branch are physically one race, and the difference is almost purely linguistic. See Nigrific, Nuba-Fulah, Hamitic, Khoikhoi, and African languages, African ethnography (under Africa).

Banville (boñ-vêl'), Théodore Faullain de. Born March 14, 1823; died March 13, 1891. A French poet, dramatist, and novelist. He was the son of an officer in the navy, and early devoted himself to literature, publishing in 1842 a volume of verse, entitled "Les Cariatides" which attracted attention. He published "Odes Funambulesques" (1857), etc., and also wrote extensively for the stage. His most successful play, "Gringoire," was published in 1866. In 1882 appeared "Mes Souvenirs," in which he portrayed some of his contemporaries.

Baphomet (baf'ô-met). The imaginary idol or symbol which the Templars were accused of worshipping. By some modern writers the Templars are charged with a depraved Gnosticism, and the word Baphomet has had given to it the signification of baptism of wisdom (as if from Gr. βαπτις, baptism, and μῆτις, wisdom), baptism of fire; in other words, the Gnostic baptism, a species of spiritual illumination. But this and the other guesses are of no value. The word may be a manipulated form of Jahomel, a name which took strange shapes in the middle ages.

Baps (baps), Mr. In Charles Dickens's novel "Dombey and Son," a dancing-master, "a very grave gentleman."

Baptist, The. See John.

Baptista (bap-tis'ti). In Shakspeare's "Taming of the Shrew," a rich gentleman of Padua, the father of Katharine.

He was Democratic member of Congress from Mississippi 1853-61; joined the Confederate army at the outbreak of the Civil War; and rose to the rank of brigadier-general. He fell while leading an assault of his brigade on the Federal position at the Peach Orchard in the second day's fight at Gettysburg.

Barksted (bärk'stéd), or Barksted (bärk'stéd), William. Flourished about 1611. An English actor and poet. His name appears instead of Marston's on "The Insiatate Countess" in some copies, and for this reason, and on account of "Hiren" (which see), he is noticed.

We know little of Barksted, but it is probable that he is to be identified with the William Barksted, or Backsted, who was one of Prince Henry's players in August 1611 (Collier's "Memoirs of Edward Alleyn," p. 89), and belonged to the company of the Prince Palatine's players in March 1615-16 (ibid., p. 126). He is the author of two poems, which display some graceful fancy (though the subject of the first is ill-chosen),—"Myrrha the Mother of Adonis," 1607, and "Hiren and the Fair Greek," 1611.

Barlaam (bär'lä-äm), Bernard. Died about 1348. A Calabrian monk, of Greek descent, a scholar of high repute in his day, noted for the part he took in various theological disputes, especially for his attack upon the Hesychasts of Mount Athos. In 1339 he was sent by the emperor Andronicus III, on a mission to the Pope in connection with the desired reunion of the Latin and Greek churches. He became associated with Petrarch and other scholars, and was instrumental in the restoration of Greek learning in the West.

Barlaam, Saint. An Eremite of Sinai, counselor of Josaphat, in the romance "Barlaam and Josaphat."

Barlaam and Josaphat. A romance, written probably by St. John of Damascus (Damasceus), a Syrian monk, in the 8th century, translated into Latin before the 13th century. It recounts the adventures of Barlaam, a monk of the wilderness of Sinai, in attempting (successfully) to convert Josaphat (or Josaphat), the son of a king of India, to Christianity and asceticism. The incidents of the story were probably taken from an Indian source. That part of the plot of Shakspeare's "Merchant of Venice" which relates to the choosing of the casket came originally from this romance, through the "Speculum Historiale" of Vincent of Beauvais (about 1290), the "Cento Novelle Antiche," sixty-fifth tale, Boccaccio's "Decameron," the "Golden Legend," and the "Gesta Romanorum." An English translation of this was printed by Wynkyn de Worde about 1510-15, which contained the "Story of the Three Caskets." It is considered probable that Shakspeare read one of Richard Robinson's reissues (there were six between 1577 and 1691). Rudolf von Ems wrote a poem of the same name and subject in the 13th century, probably based on Damascenus.

Barlæus (bär-lé'us) (Gaspard van Baerle). Born at Antwerp, Feb. 12, 1584; died at Amsterdam, Jan. 14, 1648. A Dutch historian. He was a professor of logic at the University of Leyden (1617), and of philosophy and rhetoric at the Athenæum in Amsterdam (1631). His "Retum per octennium in Brasilia et alibi nuper gestarum" (Amsterdam, 1647; 2d ed., with additions by Piso, Cleves, 1660) is one of the standard authorities on the wars between the Dutch and Portuguese in Brazil.

He collected an important library of Americana, which was sold at auction in 1890, and edited, with Henry Harrisse, "Notes on Columbus," 1866 (privately printed).

Barlow, William. Died 1568. An English Protestant prelate and controversialist, bishop successively of St. Asaph, St. David's, Bath and Wells, and Chichester. He was at one time a violent opponent of Cardinal Wolsey, and also attacked the church in a series of pamphlets which he afterward repudiated.

Barlow, William. Born at St. David's, Wales; died 1625. An English ecclesiastic, archdeacon of Salisbury, son of William Barlow, bishop of St. David's. He wrote "The Navigators' Supply"

(1597), a work on navigation treating largely of compasses. "Science is indebted to Barlow for some marked improvements in the hanging of compasses at sea, for the discovery of the difference between iron and steel for magnetic purposes, and for the proper way of touching magnetic needles, and of cementing loadstones." Diet. of Nat. Biog.

Barnabas (bär'na-bas), Saint. [Aram., 'son of prophecy.'] The surname of the Cyprian Levite Joseph, or Joseph, an apostle of the Christian church. He was one of the first to sell his land for the benefit of the common fund; introduced Paul after the latter's conversion; taught, with Paul, at Antioch; undertook, with him, a missionary journey to Cyprus and various cities in Asia Minor; was sent, with him, to Jerusalem by the church at Antioch to consult the apostles and elders on the question of circumcision; and, when about to undertake a second missionary journey with Paul, separated from him, owing to a difference arising out of Barnabas's determination to take his sister's son, Mark, with him. He was, according to the legend, martyred at Cyprus, G. L. D. His day is celebrated by the Greek, Roman, and Anglican churches on the 11th of June, and his symbol is a rake, as his day comes in the time of the hay harvest. It was formerly a great feast among the English people.

Barnabas, The Epistle of. An anonymous epistle, containing no mention of the readers for whom it was intended, dating from an early period of the church. It was intended for persons in danger of Judaizing, and emphasizes the separation of Christianity from Judaism. Its authorship was ascribed to Barnabas (the apostle) in the early church; but some modern critics assign it to a post-apostolic writer, perhaps a converted Jew of Alexandria.

Barrios (bär're-ös), Gerardo. Born at San Salvador about 1810; died there, Aug. 29, 1865. A Central American general. He was an adherent of Morazan, and took part in the war in Nicaragua in 1844. In 1857 he commanded the Salvadorian troops sent to Nicaragua against Walker. The same year he returned and fomented an unsuccessful revolution against President Campos. In 1860 he became president of Salvador by regular election, but was deposed in 1863 by Carrera, president of Guatemala. In 1865 he attempted a war against Dueñas, the successor whom Carrera had imposed, but was captured and shot.

Barrios, Justo Rufino. Born at San Marcos, Quezaltenango, Guatemala, about 1834; died near Chalchuapa, Salvador, April 2, 1885. A statesman of Guatemala. After 1867 he opposed President Cerna, and in 1871 took a prominent part in his overthrow. From June 4, 1873, until his death Barrios was, by successive elections, president of Guatemala. He secured order and prosperity, initiated railroads, telegraphs, and other improvements, and secured religious freedom. In 1882-83 he visited the United States and Europe. His scheme of forcing a confederation of the Central American states led to a war with Salvador. Barrios invaded that country, and was killed in an assault on Chalchuapa.

Barron (bar'on), James. Born in Virginia about 1768; died at Norfolk, Va., April 21, 1851.

An American commodore. When in command of the Chesapeake (1807) he refused to surrender three alleged British deserters demanded by Captain Huoiphreys of the British ship Leopard, and was attacked (in time of peace) and captured (June 22). The Chesapeake was taken unprepared, and fired only one gun during the action. Barron was court-martialed, and deprived of his rank and pay for five years. On his return to duty he was refused an active command, with the result that a duel was fought between him and Commodore Decatur (who had opposed him) in 1820, and the latter was killed.

Barron, Samuel. Born in Virginia, 1765; died Oct. 29, 1810. An American commodore, brother of James Barron. He commanded a squadron in the Tripolitan war in 1805.

Barros (bär'rös), João de. Born at Vizeu, Portugal, 1496; died near Pombal, 1570. A noted Portuguese historian. He wrote "O Imperador Clarimundo," a romance of chivalry; "Asia" (1552-1615), a history of Portuguese conquests in the Orient; and other works.

The Asia is the first great work which contains authentic information relating to the rich and extensive countries separated from Europe by such an immense expanse of waters, and of which, previous to the inquiries of our author, we possessed such very vague and contradictory accounts. He is still considered as the chief authority and foundation for subsequent writers, not only in their history of all Portuguese discoveries and of the earliest communications of Europe with the East, but in all geographical and statistical knowledge relative to the Indies.

De Sismondi, Lit. of South of Europe, II, 562.

Barros Arana, Diego. Born at Santiago in 1830. A Chilean historian. His first treatise, "Estudios históricos sobre Vicente Benavides y las Campañas del Sur," appeared in 1850, and since then he has published a succession of important works. Among his best-known works are the "Historia de la independencia de Chile" (Santiago, 1854 to 1858, 4 vols.), "El General Freire," "Vida y viajes de Hernando de Magallanes," and "Historia general de Chile" (8 vols., 1884 et seq.). He served first under De Kuyter, but entered the French service at the beginning of the war with Holland. As his ignoble birth prevented promotion in the regular navy, he became captain of a privateer, but so distinguished himself against the Dutch and English that Louis XIV. appointed him successively lieutenant, captain, and (1697) commander of a squadron.

Bartan (bâr-tân'). A small town in Asia Minor, situated on the Black Sea 48 miles north-east of Ereklî.

Bartas (bâr-tâ'), Guillaume de Salluste du. Born at Montfort, near Auch, 1544; died 1590. A French poet. He served under Henry of Navarre in war and diplomacy, and died from wounds received at the battle of Ivry. His most noted work is "La première semaine" or "La création." It passed through thirty editions in a few years, and was translated into English by Sylvester. He also wrote "Judith," "Uranic," "La seconde semaine," etc.

All that was wanting to make Du Bartas a poet of the first rank was some faculty of self-criticism; of natural verse and imagination as well as of erudition he had no lack, but in critical faculty he seems to have been totally deficient. His beauties, rare in kind and not small in amount, are alloyed with vast quantities of dull absurdity. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 211.

Bartholomew Fair. 1. A fair formerly held at Smithfield, London, on St. Bartholomew's day, Aug. 24 (O. S.). It was first held in 1133; in 1691 it was shortened from 14 to 4 days; in 1753, owing to the change in the calendar, it was held on the 3d of Sept.; in 1810 it was removed to Islington; and in 1855 it came to an end. It was originally the great cloth-fair of the kingdom and a market for all kinds of goods. Its provision for popular amusements, however, gradually destroyed its character as a market, and it became simply an occasion for unbridled license. The Bartholomew pig, so often alluded to in old writers, was a chief dainty at the fair.

2. A comedy by Ben Jonson, acted first in 1614 and published in 1631. It is a satire on puritanism, and naturally roused opposition; after the Restoration, however, it was received with applause. See Busy, Zeal of the Land.

Bartholomew's Hospital. A hospital in Smithfield, London, founded in 1123.

Bartholomew the Great, Saint. A church in the city of London, founded in 1123, and chiefly in the Norman style. The existing church consists of the choir, transepts, and one bay of the nave; the remainder of the nave, which was probably later, was destroyed by Henry VIII. The handsome Decorated Lady chapel was long used as a factory, but has lately been re-purchased and restored. The church was founded by Ra-here, and his tomb is on the north side of the sanctuary; it is of a later date than his effigy which is placed upon it.

Basel (bā'zel), F. Bäle (bäl). The eleventh canton of Switzerland, divided into the two half-cantons of Basel-Stadt and Basel-Land. Area, 177 square miles. Population (1888), 135,690.

Basel, F. Bäle (bäl), and formerly Basle. [LL. Basilia.] The chief city of the half-canton of Basel-Stadt, the third in size in Switzerland. It is situated on the Rhine at its bend northward, in lat. 47° 33' N., long. 7° 36' E., and comprises Great Basel on the left and Little Basel on the right bank of the river. It contains a university, and is the chief commercial and banking city of the country, and has also important manufactures, especially of silk ribbons. It is the ancient Roman basilia; became a part of the German Empire in 1032; joined the Swiss Confederation in 1501; and early sided with the Reformation. It has long been noted as a literary and art center. Its many contests with the land of Basel ended in war in 1831, the interference of the Federal troops, and the separation of the two half-cantons in 1833. The cathedral of Basel, an interesting building of red sandstone, with twin openwork spires, was founded in 1019 and rebuilt in the middle of the 14th century. The north portal, with statues and reliefs, belongs to the original structure. The west front is of the 14th century. The spacious interior contains a noteworthy roof-loft, medieval church furniture, and some historic tombs. The cloister is large and picturesque. The Rathaus, or town hall, is a picturesque battle-ment building erected in 1508, in a late-pointed style. It has an interior court, with a belfry, and a quaint little spire on the ridge of the roof. It is arched below, and in the second story has a series of rectangular windows in groups of three, the central lights the highest. The façade bears curious mural paintings. The council-chamber is well decorated. Population (1893), 75,114.

Basel, Confession of. 1. A Reformed confession, drafted by Ecolampadius, and revised by Myconius, published in 1534.—2. The first Helvetic Confession (which see).

Basel, Council of. A council held at Basel July 23, 1431.—May 7, 1449, the last of the three great reforming councils of the 15th century. It was called by Pope Martin V. and by his successor Eugenius IV.; had as its main objects the union of the Greek and Latin churches, the reconciliation of the Bohemians, and the reformation of the church; deposed (June 25, 1439) Eugenius IV., who refused to acknowledge its authority; and elected (Oct. 30, 1439) Amadeus, duke of Savoy, pope, who took the name of Felix V. (resigned 1449). The ultramontanes reject this council altogether, while the Gallican Church acknowledges the first twenty-five of its forty-five sessions.

Basel, Treaty of. 1. A treaty concluded April 5, 1795, between France on the one hand, and Prussia on the other. Prussia agreed to withdraw from the coalition against France, which was to continue in possession of the Prussian territory west of the Rhine until peace should be concluded with the empire, while a line of demarcation fixed the neutrality of northern Germany. In a secret article it was stipulated that, on conclusion of a general peace, if the empire should cede to France the principalities west of the Rhine, Prussia should cede its territory in that district, and receive compensation elsewhere.

2. A treaty concluded July 22, 1795, by which Spain ceded Santo Domingo to France.

Basel-Land (bā'zel-länd). A half-canton of Switzerland, bounded by Alsace on the north-west, Baden (separated by the Rhine) on the north, Aargau on the east, and Solothurn and Bern on the south. It sends three members to the National Council. The language is German, and the prevailing religion Protestant. It was separated from Basel-Stadt in 1833. Area, 163 square miles. Population (1888), 61,941.

Basel-Stadt (bā'zel-stät). A half-canton of Switzerland, composed of the city of Basel and three villages on the right bank of the Rhine. The language is German. Population (1888), 73,749.

Basento (bā-sen'tō), or Basiento (bā-sē-en'tō). A river in southern Italy which flows into the Gulf of Taranto 27 miles southwest of Taranto: the ancient Casuentus. Length, about 90 miles.

Baserac (bā-se-räk'). A village of Opatá Indians situated on the upper Yaqui River in eastern Sonora, south of Babispe. It contains the ruins of a once important Jesuit mission, founded about 1642.

Basevi (bā-sā'vē), George. Born at London, 1794; died at Ely, Oct. 16, 1845. An English architect. His chief work, the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge, was begun by him in 1837, continued by R. C. Cockrell, and completed by E. M. Barry in 1874. He was accidentally killed while inspecting the western bell-tower of Ely Cathedral.

Basford (bās'fōrd). A manufacturing town in Nottinghamshire, England, situated on the Lene 3 miles north-northwest of Nottingham. Population (1891), 30,383.

Bashan (bā'shan). [Gr. Βασάν, Heb. Bashán, soft or rich soil.] A district of Palestine east of the Jordan, reaching from the river Arnon in the south to Mount Hermon on the north, and bounded on the west by the Hauran. At the time of the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan the whole of this region was inhabited by the Amorites. It was conquered by the Israelites and allotted to the tribe of Manasseh (Num. xxiii. 33, Deut. iii. 13, Josh. xiii. 29 ff.), and afterward its inhabitants were deported to Assyria (2 Ki. xv. 30). During the Roman period the country was divided into five provinces: Iturea and Gaulonitis (modern Jaulan), and to the east of these Batanea, to the northeast Trachonitis (modern Lajah) and Hauranitis. The fertility of the country is proverbially mentioned in the Old Testament (Deut. xxxii. 14, Ps. xxii. 12, Jer. l. 19, Micah vii. 14).

Bashful Lover, The. A play by Massinger (licensed in 1636). In some old catalogues it is ascribed to B. J., or Ben Jonson: in Fleay's opinion, through some confusion with the "City Madam."

Bashi (bā-shē') Islands. A group of small islands between Formosa and Luzon in the Philippines.

Bashi-Bazouk (bāsh'i-ba-zōk'). [Turk. bashi-bozouq, one who is in no particular dress or uniform, an irregular soldier or civilian, from bashi, head, head-dress, dress and appearance, and bozouq, spoilt, disorderly, bad, from boz, spoil, damage, destroy.] A volunteer and irregular auxiliary serving in connection with the Turkish army for maintenance, but without pay or uniform. Bashi-bazonks are generally mounted, and because unpaid frequently resort to pillage. They are also at the command of municipal governors, and when detailed to accompany travelers or expeditions, through the country they expect not only to be "found," but to be suitably rewarded with bakshish.

Bashkirs (bāsh'kērz). A tribe of mixed Finnish and Tatar race, inhabiting the governments of Orenburg, Perm, Samara, Ufa, and Vyatka, in Russia. Subjugated by Russia in the 18th century. Numbers (estimated), 75,000 Sunnite Mohammedans.

Basil (bā'zil or baz'il), L. Basilus (ba-sil'i-us). [Gr. Βασίλειος or Βασίλειος, kingly, royal; L. Basilus, It. Sp. Basilio, F. Basilie.] Born at Caesarea, in Cappadocia, 329 A. D.; died there, Jan. 1, 379. One of the fathers of the Greek Church, bishop of Caesarea and metropolitan of Cappadocia 370-379; surnamed "The Great." He studied at Constantinople under Libanius, and at Athens in the schools of philosophy and rhetoric, in the company of his friend Gregory Nazianzen, and then returned to Caesarea as a rhetorician. About 361 he retired to Pontus and entered upon the monastic life. In 364 he was made presbyter, and in 370 bishop. He was a powerful supporter of the orthodox faith in the struggle with Arianism, and a distinguished preacher. His works include commentaries on the Scriptures, five books against Eunomius, homilies, etc. The standard edition is that of Garnier (1721-30), reprinted by Migne (1857). His festival is celebrated in the Roman and Anglican churches on June 14, and in the Greek Church Jan. 1.

Basil, L. Basilus. A native of Ancyra, and bishop of that city 336-360: one of the leaders of the Semi-Arians. He was deposed in 360 by the Synod of Constantinople, and exiled to Illyricum, where he probably died.

Basil I., L. Basilus. Born 813 (826?); died 886. Byzantine emperor 867-886, the founder of the Macedonian dynasty; surnamed "The Macedonian." He was of obscure origin, but succeeded in winning the favor of Michael III., by whom he was raised to the dignity of Augustus in 866, and intrusted with the administration of the empire. Having in the mean time incurred the enmity of Michael, he assassinated the emperor and usurped the throne 867. He improved the administration of the empire, drove the Saracens out of Italy in 885, and began the collection of laws called "Constitutiones Basilicæ," or simply "Basilica," which was completed by his son Leo.

Basil II., L. Basilus. Born about 958; died 1025. Byzantine emperor 976-1025; surnamed "The Slayer of the Bulgarians." He was the elder son of Romanus II. of the Macedonian dynasty, succeeded, with his brother Constantine, the usurper Joannes Zimisceus, and is notable as one of the greatest generals of the time. He began a war with Bulgaria in 987, which resulted in 1018 in the incorporation of that kingdom with the Byzantine empire.

Basil, I. Basilios. A Bulgarian physician and monk, the leader of the heretical sect of the Bogomiles. He was put to death by burning in 1118.

Basilan (bä-sē'lä'n). An island of the Sulu Archipelago, west of Mindanao. Length, 41 miles.

Basilicata (bä-sē-lē-kä'tä). A compartmento of southern Italy, containing one province, Potenza. See Potenza.

Basilicon Doron (ba-sil'i-kon dö'ron). [Gr. βασιλικὸν δῶρον, the royal gift.] A work on the divine right of kings, written by James I. of England and VI. of Scotland.

Basilides (bas-i-lī'dēz). [Gr. Βασιλίδης.] A noted Gnostic of the 2d century (died about 138 A. D.), probably a Syrian, the founder of a heretical sect. See Basilidians. About his life little is known. He appears to have taught in Alexandria and elsewhere in Egypt, and perhaps in Persia. He claimed to be a disciple of Glanctas, an interpreter of Peter, and to be in possession of the secret traditions of that apostle. He wrote commentaries on the gospel in twenty-four books, extracts from which have been preserved.

Basilidians (bas-i-lī'd'i-anz). The followers of Basilides, a teacher of Gnostic doctrines at Alexandria, Egypt, in the 2d century. They discouraged martyrdom, kept their doctrines as secret as possible, were much given to magical practices, and soon declined from the asceticism of their founder into gross immorality. "The Gnosticism of Basilides appears to have been a fusion of the ancient sacerdotal religion of Egypt with the angelic and demagogic theory of Zoroaster." Milman, Hist. of Christ., II, 68.

Basilisco (bas-i-lis'kō). A character in the old play "Soliman and Perseda," referred to in Shakspeare's "King John," i. 1, 244: a boaster whose name has become proverbial.

Basiliscus (bas-i-lis'kus). [Gr. Βασίλισκος, a little king.] Emperor of the East 475-477 A. D. He was the brother-in-law of Leo I. by whom he was appointed commander of the expedition to Carthage against Genseric, king of the Vandals, in 468. He was defeated, and was banished by the emperor to Thrace. He deposed Zeno, Leo's successor, but was himself deposed by Zeno, and died in prison. In his reign the great library of Constantinople was destroyed by fire.

Basiliskos (bas-i-lis'kos). Ptolemy's name for the first-magnitude white star α Leonis, now ordinarily known as Regulus, a Latin translation of Basiliskos.

Basilus. See Basil.

Basilus (ba-sil'i-us), Valentinus. A noted German alchemist, who lived about the beginning of the 15th century. He made important discoveries in chemistry, notably those of antimony and muriatic acid. Author of "Cursus triumphantis Antimonii."

Basilus. The lover of Quiteria in Cervantes's "Don Quixote." He gets her away from Camacho by a stratagem. See Camacho.

Basilus. The Prince of Arcadia, in love with Zelmane, in Sidney's romance "Arcadia."

Basing, Baron. See Scater-Booth, George.

Basing House (bä'zing hous). A former residence of the Marquis of Winchester, situated east of Basingstoke. It is famous for its long defense by the Royalists against the Parliamentarians, in the English civil war. It was taken by Cromwell Oct., 1645, and destroyed.

Basnage de Beauval, Jacques. Born at Rouen, Aug. 8, 1653; died at The Hague, Dec. 22, 1723. A French Protestant theologian and historian, pastor at Rotterdam and The Hague, and diplomatist. His chief historical works are "Histoire de l'église depuis Jésus-Christ jusqu'à présent" (1699), "Histoire des Juifs," etc. (1706), "Dissertation historique sur les duels et les ordres de chevalerie" (1720), "Histoire de la religion des églises réformées" (1690).

Basque Provinces. The provinces of Vizeaya, Guipuzcoa, and Alava, in Spain, united to Castile in the 13th and 14th centuries. Part of Navarre is also comprised in the district of the Basques. The Basque district in France comprises the arrondissements of Bayonne and Mauléon, in the department of Basses-Pyrénées. See Basques.

Basques (bäs'kz). A race of unknown origin inhabiting the Basque Provinces and other parts of Spain in the neighborhood of the Pyrenees, and part of the department of Basses-Pyrénées, France.

The singular Basque or Enskarian language, spoken on both slopes of the Pyrenees, forms a sort of linguistic island in the great Aryan ocean. It must represent the speech of one of the neolithic races, either that of the dolichocephalic Iberians, or that of the brachycephalic people whom we call Auvergnats or Ligurians. Anthropology throws some light on this question. It is now known that the Basques are not all of one type, as was supposed by Retzius and the early anthropologists, who were only acquainted with the skulls of the French Basques. Broca has now shown that the Spanish Basques are largely dolichocephalic. The mean index of the people of Zaros in Guipuzcoa is 77.62. Of the French Basques a considerable proportion (37 per cent.) are brachycephalic, with indices from 80 to 83. The mean index obtained from the measurements of fifty-seven skulls of French Basques from an old graveyard at St. Jean de Luz is 80.25. The skull shape of the French Basques is therefore intermediate between that of the Auvergnats on the north, and that of the Spanish Basques on the south.

Bassæ (bas'é). [Gr. Βάσαι.] A place in Arcadia, Greece, near Phigalia. It is noted for its ruined temple of Apollo Epicurius, built in the second half of the 6th century B. C. by Ictinus, the architect of the Parthenon. It is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 15 columns, in plan 41 by 125 feet, the cella with pronaos and opisthodomos of two columns in antis. In the interior of the cella six piers project from each side wall, their faces formed by Ionic three-quarter columns. A portion toward the back of the cella has no piers, and has a door in the side wall facing the east: it is probable that this was the cella proper, and that the main part of the cella was merely a monumental court, open to the sky—a unique arrangement. The famous frieze, about two feet high (now in the British Museum), surrounded the interior of the cella, above the architrave; it is in high relief, and represents combats of Greeks with Amazons and with Centaurs.

Bassam (bäs-säm'; F. pron. bäs-son'), or Great Bassam. A place on the Ivory Coast, Upper Guinea, Africa, in French territory.

At sixteen years of age he went to Paris where he partly supported himself by entering the postal service. He entered the atelier of Cabanel, with whom he remained until 1870. During the war he enlisted in a company of francs-tireurs. After the war was over he returned to Damvillers to paint. On returning to Paris he supported himself by working for the illustrated papers. Returning to Damvillers in the summer of 1873, he painted his grandfather's portrait, which was one of the successes of the Salon of 1874. He received a third-class medal in 1874. In the Salon of 1875 his "First Communion" gained a second-class medal. In 1880 he exhibited the great picture of Joan of Arc, now in the Metropolitan Museum of New York.

Bastille (bas-tē'l'), The. [In spelling and pronunciation to mod. F.; from ME. bastile, bastille, bastole, bastel, etc., from OF. (and mod. F.) bastille, from ML. bastile, pl. bastilia, a tower, fortress, from bastire (whence OF. bastir, F. bâtir = Pr. OSP. bastir = It. bastire), build, of unknown origin; referred by Diez to Gr. βαστάζω, raise, support.] A celebrated state prison in Paris. The first stone was laid April 22, 1370. There were at first only two round towers 75 feet high, flanking the city gate. Afterward two more were added to the north and south and a parallel line was built to the west; four others were afterward added to these. These towers were united by walls of the same height and a moat dug around the whole, forming a quadrangle, the inner court of which was 162 feet long and 72 feet wide. The towers of the Bastille as a state prison reached their culmination during the ministry of Richelieu (1624-42), when Leclerc du Tremblay was commandant. In the reign of Louis XI. cages of iron had been constructed, and the vaults beneath the towers, being on a level with the water in the moat, were especially dreaded. From the beginning of the revolution the Bastille was an especial mark for the vindictiveness of the populace. On July 14, 1789, it was attacked by a mob which, after several unsuccessful attempts, forced it to surrender. De Launey, the commandant, was disarmed and conducted toward the Hôtel de Ville; at the Place de Grève he was killed and his head mounted on a pike. After the first anniversary of the fall of the Bastille (July 14, 1790) the old building was razed. See Place de la Bastille.

Baston (bas'ton), Robert. An English poet, born near Nottingham toward the end of the 13th century. He was a Carmelite monk, and prior of the abbey of Scarborough.

He [Baston] is said to have been taken to Scotland by King Edward II. to celebrate the English triumphs, but he was captured by the Scotch, and they required of him as ransom a panegyric upon Robert Bruce. His "Metra de Illustri Bello de Banockburn" were appended by Hearne to his edition of Fordoun's "Scotichronicon." Morley, English Writers, VI, 159.

Basutoland (bäs-sō'tō-land). A native colony in South Africa, capital Maseru, under the direct administration of the British imperial government. It is bounded by the Orange Free State on the west and north, Natal on the east, and Cape Colony on the south. Its surface is mountainous, and it is traversed by the Orange River. Its inhabitants are Basutos (allied to the Kafirs). It is governed by a British resident commissioner and the high commissioner for South Africa. In 1868 it was taken under British protection; was annexed to Cape Colony in 1871; was at war with the British 1880-82; and was taken under direct British control in 1884. Area, 10,293 square miles. Population (1891), 218,902.

Bastwick (bast'wīk), John. Born at Writtle, in Essex, 1593; died 1654. An English physician and Protestant theological controversialist. He was imprisoned and fined by the Star Chamber in 1634 on account of his "Flagellum Pontificis," and in 1637 for his "Lettre of Dr. John Bastwicke" in which he roundly denounced episcopacy. He was released in 1640 and his fine returned to him.

Batalha (bä-täl'yä). A town in the district of Leiria, Portugal, situated on the Liz north-northeast of Lisbon. It is famous for its Dominican monastery, which was begun in 1388 and finished in 1515. It is the great exemplar of the Portuguese florid Pointed style, and though not the architectural marvel that it has been called, is beautiful and interesting. The church, in proportions a cathedral, has a lofty and dignified interior, not over-ornate. There is no triforium. To the south opens the Founder's Chapel, with a rich octagonal lantern and the royal tombs. The unfinished chapel of Dom Manuel, behind the choir, is massive in design and marked by exuberance of surface-ornament. The same style characterizes the cloister, the intricate tracery of whose arches is unparalleled elsewhere. Population, about 3,000.

- Batrachomyomachia (bat'ra-kō-mi-ō-mā'ki-ē). [Gr. Βατραχομυομαχία, the battle of the frogs and mice.] An ancient Greek mock epic, in hexameters, of which 316 lines are extant. It was formerly attributed to Homer, and by some modern critics to Pizres, brother of Artemisia, queen of Caria.
- The plot is witty, and not badly constructed. A mouse, after escaping from the pursuit of a cat, is slaking its thirst at a pond, when it is accosted by a frog, King Puff-cheek, the son of Peleus (in the sense of madly), who asks it to come and see his home and habits. The mouse consents, but the sudden appearance of an otter terrifies the frog, and makes him dive, leaving the mouse to perish, after sundry epic exclamations and soliloquies. A bystander mouse brings the tidings to the tribe, who forthwith prepare for war, and arm themselves, sending a formal declaration to the frogs. The deliberations of Zeus and Athena, as to what part they will take in the war, are really comic, and a very clever parody on Homer. Then follows quite an epic battle, with deliberate inconsistencies, such as the reappearance of several heroes already killed. The frogs are worsted, and the victorious mice are not even deterred by the appearance of an army of crabs to assist the defeated frogs. The German destructive critics think the extant poem was put together from fragments of earlier mock epics of the same kind. But of this we have no evidence.

- Bavaria (ba-vá'ri-ä), G. Bayern or Baiern (bi'ern), F. Bavière (bäv-yär'). [ML. Bararia, from Boarii, a tribe connected in name with the Boii. See Bohemia.] A kingdom of southern Germany, the second in area and population of the states of the German Empire. It consists of two unequal and disconnected parts, the larger eastern and the smaller western. The former or main portion is bounded by Prussia on the northwest, the Thuringian states on the north, the kingdom of Saxony on the northeast, Bohemia (separated by the Bohmerwald) on the east, Upper Austria and Salzburg on the east, Tyrol (separated by the Alps) on the south, Lake Constance on the southwest, and Würtemberg, Baden, and Hesse on the west. It extends from lat. 47° 16' to 50° 33' N., and from long. 9° to 13° 48' E. The western portion is the Palatinate, west of the Rhine, bordering on Hesse, Prussia, and Alsace-Lorraine. The country produces wheat, rye, oats, and other cereals, hops, potatoes, tobacco, wine, flax, etc.; has mines of coal, iron, and salt; and has important and varied manufactures. It exports timber, wine, hops, grain, beer, etc. Bavaria contains 8 government districts (Regierungs-Bezirke): viz., Upper Bavaria, Lower Bavaria, Palatinate, Upper Palatinate and Ratisbon, Swabia and Neuburg, Upper Franconia, Middle Franconia, and Lower Franconia. The capital is Munich. The government is a constitutional hereditary monarchy, with a king, an upper house, and a chamber of 159 deputies. Bavaria sends 6 representatives to the Bundesrat and 48 to the Reichstag, and furnishes 2 army corps to the imperial army. Over seven tenths of the population are Roman Catholic. The early inhabitants were formerly identified with the Boii. The southern part belonged to the Roman Empire. The League of the Boarii was formed from various German tribes. Bavaria was ruled by its dukes, the Agilolfinger, from about 560-788. It came under the supremacy of Austrasia, and in 788 its duke, Tassilo III., was deposed, and it was incorporated with the Frankish empire. Later it was one of the four great German duchies (and extended farther to the east and south — e. g., to Italy — than at present). The duchy of Bavaria passed to Welf IV. (I.) in 1070. In 1180, after the fall of Henry the Lion, it was granted by Frederick Barbarossa to the (present) Wittelsbach dynasty. It was one of the circles of the empire. Duke Maximilian I. received the electoral dignity in 1623. The Upper Palatinate was annexed in 1628. The Rhine Palatinate was united with Bavaria in 1777. In 1806 Bavaria became a kingdom and joined the Confederation of the Rhine. It was obliged to cede territory by the imperial delegations enactment of 1803, but received Würzburg, Bamberg, Augsburg, etc., and in 1805 Tyrol and other territories. It received Salzburg, etc., in 1809, but was obliged to cede Tyrol and Salzburg in 1815. In 1813 it joined the Allies. It received a constitution in 1818. It sided with Austria in 1806, was the scene of several conflicts, and was obliged to pay an indemnity and make a small cession of territory to Prussia. It made a treaty with the North German Confederation in 1870, and entered the German Empire in 1871. Area, 29,282 square miles. Population (1890), 5,594,982.
- Bavaria. A bronze statue, 67 feet high, in the Theresienwiese, near Munich, designed by Schwanthaler. It was built by order of Ludwig I., and was finished in 1850. It stands before the Ruhmeshalle (Hall of Fame) and holds a wreath above its head. There is an interior ascent by a spiral iron staircase of sixty steps to the head, through apertures in which there is a fine view.
- Bavaria, Lower, and Bavaria, Upper. See Lower Bavaria and Upper Bavaria.

Among his works are "Kantonierbilder" (1860), "Österreichische Garnisonen" (1863), "Anno Nenn und Dreizehn" (1865), a number of social-political novels, as "Der Kampf ums Dasein" (1869), and the dramas "Lady Gloster" (1869), and "Der wunde Fleck" (1875).

Bayern. The German name of Bavaria.

Bayerwald. See Bayrischer Wald.

Bayes (bāz). A character in Buckingham's farce as "The Rehearsal," a dramatic coxcomb. He was at first called Bilboa, and was intended to ridicule Sir Robert Howard; but the piece having been laid aside for several years, and Sir Robert having meanwhile become a very good friend of Buckingham, the character was altered to fit Dryden, who at this time appeared a fit object for satire. The name Bayes refers to the laureateship.

Bayes no Poetaster. See Two Kings of Bratford.

Bayes's Troops, Like. A phrase referring to the foot-soldiers and hobby-horses who fight a battle in Buckingham's "Rehearsal." When all are killed it is a question how they are to go off the stage, Bayes replies: "As they came on, upon their legs." Whereupon they are obliged to revive and walk off.

Bayeux (bā-yé'). [F. Bayeux, LL. Baiocæas, Baiocæsses, Bayocæsses, L. Badiocæsses, Gr. Βαϊοκάσιοι, orig. a Celtic tribe name, explained as 'great conquerors,' otherwise as 'blond-haired.'] A town in the department of Calvados, Normandy, France, situated on the Aure 17 miles northwest of Caen; the Roman Augustodurus. It was the chief town of Gallic Baiocæsses, was called Baiocum or Baiocæsses (whence the modern name) in the early middle ages, and was the capital of the Frankish Baiocæssinus, later Bessin. It is famous for the Bayeux Tapestry (which see). The cathedral of Bayeux is a very handsome structure of the 12th and 13th centuries. Beaumanoir (bō-mā-nwā'), Jean de. Lived in the middle of the 14th century. A French knight of Brittany. He is celebrated as the French commander in the "Battle of the Thirty" (which see), 1351, between Ploemel and Jossefin, Brittany.

Beaumanoir, Sir Lucas de. In Sir Walter Scott's novel "Ivanhoe," the grand master of the Knights Templar. He seizes Rebecca and tries her as a witch.

Beaumanoir, Philippe de. Born about 1250; died Jan. 7, 1296. A French jurist. He was bailli at Senlis in 1273, and at Clermont in 1280, and presided at assizes held in various towns. His chief work, highly esteemed in the study of old French law, is "Contumes de Beauvoisis" (edited by De la Thaumassière 1690, and by Beugnot 1842).

Beaumarchais (bō-mār-shā'), Pierre Augustin Caron de. Born at Paris, Jan. 24, 1732; died there, May 18, 1799. A French polemic and dramatic writer. He was the seventh child of Charles Caron, master clock-maker. After an elementary schooling, he joined his father in the trade. Subsequently he assumed the name of Beaumarchais, in accordance with a usage prevalent in that century. His claim to the invention of a new escapement in clock-work being disputed, young Caron appealed to the Academy of Sciences and to public opinion, thereby attracting also the attention of the court. On the death in 1770 of the celebrated financier Duverney, who had taken Beaumarchais into partnership, a question of inheritance occasioned litigation. Beaumarchais conducted his own case, and to vindicate himself published four "Mémoires" (1774-75) replete with wit and eloquence, which made him famous. His earlier attempts to write for the stage, "Engénie" and "Les Deux Amis, ou le Négociant de Lyon," were failures. "Le Barbier de Séville" waited two years to be presented to the public, and the first performance, Feb. 23, 1775, was not very successful. Subsequently he altered and greatly improved the comedy. "Le Mariage de Figaro," begun in 1775 and completed in 1778, was suppressed for four years by the censure of Louis XVI. It was given for the first time April 27, 1784, and was immediately successful. It is the masterpiece of French comedy in the 18th century. His later plays, "Tarare" and "La Mère Coupable," barely deserve mention. During the War of American Independence Beaumarchais sent to the United States a fleet of his own, carrying a cargo of weapons and ammunition for the American colonists. His poverty during the latter part of his life was largely due to the difficulty he experienced in recovering payment from the United States. Beaumarchais is the hero of one of Goethe's plays, "Clavigo" (which see).

Beaumaris (bō-mār'is). [OF. beau marais, fair marsh. Formerly called Bornover.] A seaport and watering-place in Anglesea, Wales, situated on Beaumaris Bay 47 miles west by south of Liverpool. It has a castle, a large 13th-century fortress, built by Edward I. The long, low line of the interior walls is impressive, with their many towers, surmounted by the huge cylindrical towers of the main structure. The central court is extremely picturesque, surrounded by ruins of the chapel and the great hall, with finely tracered windows, and of the interesting residential buildings profusely draped with ivy. Population (1891), 2,202.

In the latter year he went to Berlin, and in 1752 to Paris. His works brought him two periods of imprisonment in the Bastille and the active enmity of Voltaire.

Beaumont (bō-mōn'). [F., 'fair mount'; L. Bellus Mons, or Belmontium.] A town in the department of Ardennes, France, situated on the Meuse 14 miles southeast of Sedan. Here, Aug. 30, 1870, the Germans under the Crown Prince of Saxony defeated a division of MacMahon's army.

Beaumont (bō'ment, formerly bū'ment), Basil. Born 1669; died Nov. 27, 1703. An English rear-admiral. He perished in the Downs in a terrible storm which destroyed 13 vessels, with 1,500 seamen.

Beaumont (bō-mōn'), Elie de. See Elic de Beaumont.

Beaumont (bō'mont, formerly bū'mont), Francis. Born at Grace-Dieu, Leicestershire, in 1584; died March 6, 1616, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. An English dramatist and poet. He entered Oxford Feb. 4, 1596, at the age of twelve. In 1600 he entered the Inner Temple, but apparently did not pursue his legal studies. In 1602 he published "Salmacis and Hermaproditus," a poem after Ovid (his authorship of this poem is doubted by Bullen). His friendship for Ben Jonson probably began shortly after this, and from 1607 to 1611 his commendatory poems were prefixed to several of Jonson's plays. In 1613 Beaumont produced "A Masque for the Inner Temple," and about that time he married Ursula, daughter of Henry Isley of Sundridge in Kent. His close personal and literary intimacy with John Fletcher dated from about 1607. They lived together not far from the Globe Theatre on the Bankside, sharing everything in common. Till 1616 (1614, Bullen) they wrote together. The discussion of the separate authorship of the plays will be found under Fletcher, John. The induction and the first two Triumphs in "Four Plays or Moral Representations in One" are usually ascribed entirely to Beaumont.

Beaumont, Sir George Howland. Born at Dummow, Essex, England, Nov. 6, 1753; died Feb. 7, 1827. An English patron of art, connoisseur, and landscape-painter, one of the founders of the National Gallery at London.

Beauty and the Beast. [F. La Belle et la Bête.] A story in which a daughter (Beauty), Zémire, to save her father's life, becomes the guest of a monster (Azor), who, by his kindness and intelligence, wins her love, whereupon he regains his natural form, that of a handsome young prince. The French version by Madame de France de Beaumont was published in 1757. She probably derived the plot from Straparola's "Piaçevoli Notti," a collection of Italian stories published in 1550. There have been many English versions, of which the most noteworthy is Miss Thackeray's. The story gave Gretry the subject for his very successful opera "Zémire and Azor."

Beauvais (bō-vā'). The capital of the department of Oise, France, situated on the Thérain 43 miles north-northwest of Paris. It is the ancient Caesaromagus, the capital of the Bellovaei, a Belgic tribe whence its later name Bellovacum or Belvacum (modern Beauvais). In the middle ages it was a countship. Beauvais was defended against the English in 1433; and against Charles the Bold of Burgundy by the citizens under Jeanne Thachette in 1472. Many church councils have been held there. It is an important industrial and commercial center, and has manufactures of Gobelin tapestries, carpets, cotton, woollens, lace, buttons, brushes, etc. The cathedral of Beauvais is a fragment consisting merely of choir and transepts, begun in 1225 with the intention of surpassing all other existing churches. The plan failed owing to stunted expenditure on the foundations, which proved too weak for the stupendous superstructure. The choir, presenting the most beautiful 13th-century vaulting and tracery, is 104 feet long and 157 from vaulting to pavement. It possesses superb medieval glass. The great transepts are Flamboyant. Population (1891), 19,382.
