Civil War. At the beginning of the Civil War the national works in Charleston harbor were commanded by Major Robert Anderson. In consequence of the secession of South Carolina, Dec. 20, 1860, and the preparations made by that State to seize the United States forts in the harbor, he evacuated Fort Moultrie Dec. 26, 1860, and concentrated his forces at Fort Sumter. Reinforcements sent out in the Star of the West were prevented from landing, the ship being fired on off Morris Island Jan. 9, 1861. On April 11, 1861, Major Anderson refused a demand by General O. T. Beauregard to surrender; and on April 12 and 13 sustained a bombardment from batteries at Fort Moultrie, Fort Johnson, Cumming's Point, and elsewhere. He surrendered April 13, no casualties having occurred on either side. The fort was held by the Confederates until the evacuation of Charleston, Feb. 17, 1865.

Fort Ticonderoga. See Ticonderoga.

Fortuna (fôr-tū'niä). [L., 'fortune.'] 1. In ancient Italian mythology, the goddess of good luck, corresponding to the Greek Tyche.—2. An asteroid (No. 19) discovered by Hind at London, Aug. 22, 1852.

Fortunate Islands, The. [L. Fortunatæ insulæ; Gr. ai tōn makáron nḗson, Islands of the Blest.] An ancient name of the Canary Islands. The Fortunate Islands, Islands of the Blest, or the Happy Islands were originally imaginary isles in the western ocean where the souls of the good are made happy. With the discovery of the Canary and Madeira islands the name became attached to them.

The Carthaginian fleet (under Himilco) appears to have turned homewards from this point and to have touched at the Island of Madeira, which was described on their return in such glowing language that others undertook the voyage, until the Senate, being afraid of an exodus from Carthage, forbade all further visits to "the Fortunate Islands" on pain of death.

Etton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 22.

Fortunatus (fôr-tū-nā'tus). The hero of a popular European chap-book. When in great straits he receives from the goddess Fortune a purse which can never be emptied. He afterward takes from the treasure-chamber of a sultan a hat which will transport its wearer wherever he desires. These enable him to indulge his every whim. The earliest known, and probably original, version was published at Augsburg in 1509. It has been retold in all languages, and dramatized by Hans Sachs in 1553 and by Thomas Dekker in 1600. Tieck in "Phantasus," and Chamisso in "Peter Schlemihl," have also utilized this legend. Uhland left an unfinished narrative poem, "Fortunatus and his Sons." See Old Fortunatus.

Fortunatus, Venantius Honorius Clemens. Born at Ceneda, near Treviso, Italy, about 530; died after 600. A Latin poet, bishop of Poitiers. He was the author of 300 hymns, among them "Vexilla regis prodeunt," and probably "Pange lingua."

Fortune (fôr'tūn). A short poem erroneously attributed to Chaucer by Shirley. Its subtitle is "Ballade de Visage [sometimes written Village] sauns Peynture" ("The Face of the World as it really is, not Painted"). It is based partly on Boethius and partly on a portion of the "Roman de la Rose."

Fortune. A painting by Guido Reni, in the Accademia di San Luca, Rome. The goddess is represented nude, smiling, sweeping over a globe. From her raised left hand hangs a purse from which money falls. A Cupid clings to her flowing hair and to the scarf which floats behind her.

Fortune. A ship which arrived at Plymouth, Mass., Nov. 11, 1621, from London, bringing out 35 colonists and a patent, granted June 1, 1611, by the president and council of New England to John Pierce and his associates, allowing a hundred acres to be taken up for every emigrant, and empowering the grantees to make laws and set up a government. Winsor.

Fortune, The. A London theater built in 1599 for Henslowe (the pawnbroker and money-lender) and Alleyne (the comedian). It stood in the parish of St. Giles, Cripplegate, and in the street now called Playhouse Yard, connecting Whitecross street with Gilding Lane. It was a wooden tenement, which was burned down in 1621, and was replaced by a circular brick edifice. In 1649 a party of soldiers broke into the edifice and pulled down the building.

Fortune Bay. An inlet of the Atlantic, on the southern coast of Newfoundland.

Fortunes of Moll Flanders. A novel by De-foe, published in 1722. It is the history of a profligate woman who reforms before her death.

Fortunes of Nigel (nig'el), The. A historical novel by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1822. The scene is laid in London during the reign of James I.

Fortunio (fôr-tū'ni-ō). A fairy tale of ancient but unknown origin. Fortunio is the daughter of an aged nobleman, in whose stead she offers her services to the king, disguised as a cavalier. A fairy horse named Comrade, and seven servants, Strongback, Lightfoot, Marksman, Fine-ear, Boisterer, Gormand, and Tippler, aid her to slay a dragon and regain the treasures of the king.

Fortuny (fôr-tū'nē) y Carbo, Mariano José Maria Bernardo. Born at Réus in Catalonia, June 11, 1838; died at Rome, Nov. 21, 1874. A Spanish genre painter and aquafortist. He followed the course at the Academy de Bellas Artes at Barcelona. He studied first in the manner of Overbeck, in which he excelled his master Claudio Lorenzalez, but his true style was developed by seeing the lithographs of Gavarni. He gained the grand prix de Rome 1857. He followed the expedition to Morocco, where he developed his taste for Arabian subjects. After several visits to Paris, Florence, Naples, Madrid, Seville, Granada, and even England, he established himself in Portici; then returned to Rome, where he died suddenly at the age of thirty-six. Among his works are "Interior (Maturesque)," "Cour de maison à Tangier," "Intérieur de bazar," "Exercices à feu en présence de la reine d'Espagne," "Fantasie arabe," "La baie de Portici."

Fort Wadsworth. A fort on Staten Island, situated on the western side of the Narrows at the entrance of New York harbor.

Fort Wagner. A fortification on Morris Island: one of the defenses of Charleston. It was retaken by the Federals under Gillmore, Sept. 6, 1863.

Fort Wayne (fōrt wān). A city and the capital of Allen County, Indiana, situated at the head of the Maumee River, in lat. 41° 4' N., long. 85° 4' W. It is a leading railway, manufacturing, and business center of northern Indiana. A United States fort was built here by General Wayne in 1794. Population (1890), 35,393.

Fort William. 1. A place in Inverness-shire, Scotland, near the head of Loch Eil and the foot of Ben Nevis, and the entrance to the Caledonian Canal. At one time it was regarded as the key of the Highlands. It was unsuccessfully attacked by the Highlanders in 1746.

2. The fortress of Calcutta.

Fort William Henry. A fort in the modern town of Caldwell, at the head of Lake George, New York. It was surrendered by the English to the French and Indians under Montcalm in Aug., 1757.

Fort Winthrop. A fort on Governor's Island: one of the defenses of Boston harbor.

Fort Worth. A city and the capital of Tarrant County, Texas, in lat. 32° 47' N., long. 97° 14' W. It has manufactures of flour, etc., and is an important center for stock. Population (1890), 23,076.

Forty Thieves, The. 1. One of the tales of the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments." See Baba, Ali.—2. A play by George Colman the younger, produced in 1805.

Forum Boarium (fō'rum bō-ā'ri-um). [L.] The early cattle-market of ancient Rome. It was bounded on the north by the area called the Velabrum, on the east by the Palatine, on the south by the Aventine at the extremity of the Circus Maximus, and on the west by the Tiber. It is said that at an early date gladiatorial shows were given here, and that human sacrifices were made by burial alive. Upon this forum fronts the temple of Fors Fortuna (so-called Fortuna Virilis), and in it stands the circular monument long popularly called the temple of Vesta. A number of other important temples stood on it in antiquity, among them that of Ceres, whose remains are incorporated in Santa Maria in Cosmedin. The Forum Boarium was within the Servian Wall.

Forum Julium (fō'rum jō'li-um). [L.] The earliest of the imperial fora of ancient Rome, designed to relieve the crowding of the Forum Romanum. It was begun by Julius Caesar, and practically adjoined the northern side of the Forum Romanum at its eastern end. It was surrounded with porticos, and its central area was occupied by a richly adorned peripteral temple of Venus Genetrix. Some finely arched and vaulted chambers of the inclosure exist near the southwest angle; they were probably offices for legal business.

Forum of Augustus. The second of the imperial fora of ancient Rome. It adjoined the northeast side of the Forum Julium, and was very large, rectangular in plan except that a corner was cut off at the southeast, and that a semicircular exedra indented each long side. It was inclosed by very massive walls nearly 100 feet high, and surrounded by porticos splendidly adorned with marble statues and incrustation. Toward the northeastern end of the central area rose the temple of Mars Ultor, colonnaded on three sides, and having an apse at the back. The existing remains include very impressive stretches of the inclosing wall, one of the entrance-arches, now called Arco de Pantani, and some columns and walls of the temple.

Forum of Nerva. The fourth of the imperial fora of ancient Rome, a long narrow area between the Forum of Vespasian and the Forum of Augustus. It was also called Forum Transitorium because an important thoroughfare from the northeast passed through it to the Forum Romanum, and Forum Palladium from the temple of Minerva which it contained. Temple and forum were dedicated by Nerva in 97 A. D. The temple was hexastyle prostyle, with columns on the flanks and an apse at the back. Part of the cella wall toward the apse remains in place, together with two Corinthian columns of marble of the interior range of the forum, with richly ornamented entablatures, returned to the wall behind the columns. Over the entablature there is an attic on which is an effective sculptured relief of Minerva. The temple remained almost perfect until 1606, when Paul V. destroyed it to use its marbles in the Chapel of St. Paul in Santa Maria Maggiore.

Forum of Trajan. The largest and the furthest north of the imperial fora of ancient Rome, adjoining the northwest side of the Forum of Augustus, and lying between the northeastern declivity of the Capitoline Hill and the Quirinal. It consisted of three parts: the forum proper, the huge Basilica Ulpia, and the temple of Trajan, with its colonnaded inclosure. Between the temple of Trajan and the Basilica Ulpia rises the column of Trajan, beneath which was the emperor's mausoleum. To create an area for this lavish monumental display, Trajan cut away a large ridge of tufa which extended from the Capitoline to the Quirinal. The forum proper was a large rectangle surrounded by columns—a double range on the sides, and a single range toward the Forum of Augustus and the Basilica Ulpia. From each side, behind the porticos, projected a large hemicycle with booths or offices in several stories. Trajan's forum was entered from that of Augustus by a splendid triumphal arch, many of whose sculptures now adorn the arch of Constantine. The forum was adorned with numbers of statues in bronze and marble, and all its buildings were roofed with gilt bronze.

Forum Olitorium (fō'rum ō-li-tō'ri-um). [L., 'vegetable-market.'] The vegetable-market of ancient Rome. It occupied the southern extremity of the Campus Martius, beneath the Capitoline Hill, stretching into the Velabrum, and separated from the Forum Boarium only by the Servian Wall. In the Forum Olitorium stood three temples side by side, two of which are identified as the temples of Spes and Juno Sospita, whose remains are built into the Church of San Niccolò in Carcere.

Forum Pacis (fō'rum pā'sis) ('Forum of Peace'), or Forum of Vespasian. The third of the imperial fora of ancient Rome. It was the furthest south of the imperial fora, and lay behind the Basilica Emilia, which fronted on the Forum Romanum. It was built to inclose the temple of Peace which was dedicated by Vespasian in 75 A. D. in honor of the taking of Jerusalem, and is described by Pliny as one of the four finest buildings of Rome. In it were dedicated the spoils of the Jewish temple, represented on the arch of Titus; and here too Vespasian placed the works of art taken by Nero from Delphi and other Greek cities. A massive stretch of the exterior wall of this forum still stands, near the western end of the basilica of Constantine, with a fine flat-arched doorway of travertine.

Forum Romanum (fō'rum rō-mā-num). The famous Roman forum which from the time of the kings formed the political center of ancient Rome. Beginning in a hollow on the eastern slope of the Capitoline Hill, its long and comparatively narrow area stretched in a direction south of east beneath the northern declivity of the Palatine. Its western end was occupied by the tabularium, or office of the archives, in front of which stood the temples of Concord and of Vespasian. On its southern side were the temple of Saturn, the Basilica Julia, the temples of Castor and Pollux and of Vesta, and on its northern side the arch of Septimius Severus, the Curia, the Basilica Emilia, and the temples of Antoninus and Faustina and of Romulus. In the middle of the eastern part rose the temple and rostra from which Cicero spoke were at the western end. The remains of all these buildings are considerable, and the area has been excavated and restored as far as possible to its ancient aspect.

Foscari (fos'kā-rē), Francesco. Died 1457. Doge of Venice 1423-57. He began in 1426 a war against Filippo Maria Visconti, duke of Milan, which resulted in the acquisition of Brescia, Bergamo, and Cremona in 1427. A second war, which lasted from 1431 to 1433, fixed the Adige as the boundary of the Venetian dominion. A war against Bologna, Milan, and Mantua, in which he was supported by Francesco Sforza and Cosmo de' Medici, resulted in 1441 in the conquest of Lonato, Velaggio, and Peschiera. The close of his reign was troubled by the machinations of his rival Giacomo Loredano. He was compelled to abdicate, after having sustained the loss of his only surviving son, Giacomo, who died in exile as the result of the tortures inflicted on him by the Council of the Ten. He formed with his son the subject of Byron's tragedy "The Two Foscari."

Foscarini (fos-kā-rē'nē), Marco. Born at Venice, Jan. 30, 1696; died there, March 30, 1763. Doge of Venice 1762-63. He wrote "Della letteratura Veneziana" (1752).

He entered the navy in 1812; was promoted lieutenant in 1824; and accompanied Sir Edward Parry's exploring expeditions of 1824-25 and 1827. With Parry and others he made magnetic and other observations, which were published in the "Philosophical Transactions" for 1826. He sailed from Spitzhead April 27, 1828, in command of the Chanticleer, a sloop sent out by the government to the South Seas to determine the ellipticity of the earth by pendulum experiments, and to make observations on magnetism, meteorology, and the direction of the principal ocean currents. During this expedition he was drowned in the river Chagres. He left a number of papers, which form an appendix to the "Narrative of a Voyage to the Southern Atlantic Ocean, in the years 1828, 29, 30, performed in H. M. sloop Chanticleer, under the command of the late Captain Henry Foster, F. R. S., etc. From the private journal of W. H. B. Webster, surgeon of the sloop" (1834).

Foster, John, Baron Oriel. Born Sept., 1740; died at Collon, County Louth, Ireland, Aug. 23, 1828. The last speaker of the Irish House of Commons. He was the eldest son of Anthony Foster of Collon, Louth, lord chief baron of the exchequer in Ireland; entered the Irish Parliament in 1761; was called to the Irish bar in 1766; and was chancellor of the exchequer in Ireland 1784-85, when he was elected speaker of the House of Commons, a place to which he was reelected in 1790 and in 1798. On June 7, 1800, he put the final question from the chair on the third reading of the bill for the legislative union of Ireland with Great Britain. Although an anti-unionist, he obtained a seat in the united Parliament; was chancellor of the exchequer in Ireland 1804-1806 and 1807-11; and was created Baron Oriel of Ferrard in the county of Louth in 1821.

Fountain of Youth, The. A mythical spring supposed by some of the Indians of Central America and the West Indies to exist in a region toward the north called Bimini (which see). Its waters, it was said, would restore youth to the aged and heal the sick. It appears that, before the conquest, the Indians made expeditions to Florida and the Bahamas in search of this spring; and the Spaniards under Ponce de Leon, Narvaez, De Soto, and others penetrated far into the interior, seeking for it, during the early part of the 16th century. Similar myths have been found in India and in the Pacific Islands, and a fountain of youth is described in Mandeville's travels.

Fountains Abbey. A Cistercian monastery of the 14th century, near Ripon, England, now the largest and most picturesque of English ecclesiastical ruins. The great church, almost perfect except for its roof, is in large part in the style of transition from the Norman to the Early English. It has a high, square Perpendicular tower, and a second transept at the extremity of the east end, like Durham. The interior is plain but for its beautiful wall-arcading. Among the monastic buildings are a vaulted cloister of two aisles 300 feet long, a chapter-house, and a refectory.

Fouqué (fō-kā'), Friederich, Baron de la Motte. Born at Brandenburg in 1777; died at Berlin in 1843. A German poet and author. He served in the War of Liberation (1813), and later lived in Paris, Halle (where he lectured on modern history and poetry), and Berlin. In 1808 appeared the drama "Sigurd der Schlängentödtter" ("Sigurd the Dragon-slayer"). "Der Zauberring" ("The Magic Ring") is a romance of the age of chivalry. His principal work is the romantic story "Undine," which appeared in 1811. He was the author of numerous lyrics, among them the patriotic song beginning "Frisch auf zum frohlichen Jagen" (1813).

He erected the building in Hyde Park for the exhibition of 1851. See Crystal Palace.

Fox, Charles James. Born at London, Jan. 24, 1749; died at Chiswick, near London, Sept. 13, 1806. A celebrated English statesman and orator. He was the third son of Henry Fox (afterward Lord Holland) and Lady Caroline Georgina, daughter of the second Duke of Richmond, grandson of Charles II. He studied first at Eton and afterward at Hertford College, Oxford, which he left without a degree in 1766. He entered Parliament as a Tory in 1768, and was a junior lord of the admiralty (1770-73) and of the treasury (1772-1774) in Lord North's ministry. Dismissed by North at the instance of George III., who cordially disliked him on account both of the independent spirit which he displayed in office and of his dissolute habits, he joined the Whig party, with which he was afterward identified. On the formation of Lord Rockingham's ministry in 1782, he was appointed foreign secretary, a position which he resigned on the death of Rockingham in the same year, being unwilling to serve under Lord Shelburne. In 1788 he formed a coalition with Lord North, which brought the so-called coalition ministry into power, with the Duke of Portland as prime minister and North and Fox as home and foreign secretaries. The coalition ministry was defeated in the same year on Fox's India Bill, through the influence of the king, who authorized Lord Temple to say in the House of Lords that whoever voted for the bill was not only not his friend, but would be considered by him as his enemy. Through the enmity of the king he was kept out of office until 1806, when Lord Grenville refused to form a ministry without him, and he was again appointed foreign secretary. He supported the cause of the American colonies in Parliament during the period of the American Revolution, and was the chief instrument in procuring the passage of the Libel Act of 1792. He married in 1795 his mistress, Elizabeth Bridget Cane, otherwise Armistead or Armstead.

Fox, George. Born at Penny Drayton (Drayton-in-the-Clay), Leicestershire, July, 1624; died Jan. 13, 1691. The founder of the Society of Friends. He was the son of Christopher Fox, a Puritan weaver, and in his youth was apprenticed to a shoemaker at Nottingham. About the age of twenty-five he began to disseminate as an itinerant lay preacher the doctrines peculiar to the Society of Friends, the organization of which he completed about 1669. He made missionary journeys to Scotland in 1657, to Ireland in 1669, to the West Indies and North America 1671-72, and to Holland in 1677 and 1684, and was frequently imprisoned for infraction of the laws against conventicles, as at Lancaster and Scarborough 1663-66 and at Worcester 1673-74. He married in 1669 Margaret Fell, a widow, who was a woman of superior intellect and gave him much assistance in the founding of his sect. An edition of his "Works" was published at Philadelphia in 1831.

Fox, Gustavus Vasa. Born at Saugns, Mass., June 13, 1821; died at New York, Oct. 29, 1883. An American naval officer. A. in 1537; became a full fellow in 1539; and proceeded A. M. in 1543. He resigned his fellowship in 1545; became in 1548 tutor to the children of Henry Howard, earl of Surrey (a post which he retained five years); and in 1550 was ordained deacon. At the accession of Queen Mary he fled to the Continent to avoid persecution as a Protestant, and lived during her reign chiefly at Frankfurt and at Basel, where he was employed as a reader of the press in the printing-office of Johann Herbst (Oporinus). He returned to England in 1559, was ordained priest in 1560, and in 1563 was made a prebendary in Salisbury Cathedral and given the lease of the vicarage of Shipton. His chief work is "Actes and Monuments," of which four editions appeared during his lifetime (1563, 1570, 1576, and 1583), and which is popularly known as Foxe's "Book of Martyrs."

Foxe, or Fox, Richard. Born at Ropesley, near Grantham, Lincolnshire, in 1447 or 1448; died probably at Winchester, Oct. 5, 1528. An English prelate. He studied at Oxford, Cambridge, and Paris. While at Paris he entered the service of Henry, earl of Richmond, soon after whose accession in 1485 as Henry VII. he was appointed lord privy seal. He became suffragan bishop of Exeter in 1487, being translated to the see of Bath and Wells in 1492, to that of Durham in 1494, and to that of Winchester in 1501. He founded Corpus Christi College, Oxford, 1515-16.

France (frans). [F. La France; L. Gallia, later Francia, land of the Franks; It. Francia, Sp. Francia, Pg. França, G. Frankreich.] A country of western Europe, capital Paris, bounded by the English Channel, the Strait of Dover, and the North Sea on the north, Belgium and Luxembourg on the northeast, Germany (partly separated by the Vosges), Switzerland (largely separated by the Jura and Lake Geneva), and Italy (separated by the Alps) on the east, the Mediterranean and Spain (separated by the Pyrenees) on the south, and the Bay of Biscay and the Atlantic on the west. It extends from lat. 42° 25' to 51° 5' N., and from long. 7° 39' E. to 4° 50' W. The surface is mountainous in the south and east, level and hilly in the west and north. Besides the frontier ranges (the Pyrenees, Alps, Jura, and Vosges), the chief mountains are the Cévennes in the south, Auvergne in the center, and the mountains of the Côte-d'Or (and their continuations southward). There are also the plateaus of the Morvan and Limousin in the interior, and Ardennes in the northeast. Brittany is broken and hilly. The highest mountain in France is Mont Blanc. The chief river-systems are those of the Seine, Loire, Garonne, and Rhône. Parts of the Schelde, Meuse, and Moselle (Rhine) basins are in France. The largest lakes are Geneva (on the border), Annecy, and Bourget. France is the fourth European country in area and population. The leading agricultural products are grain and wine; next to these are beet-root, fruit and vegetables, and potatoes. The agricultural exports are butter, eggs, poultry, and cattle, especially to England. France has fisheries of oysters, cod, herring, mackerel, etc. The leading mines are iron and coal. Salt and building-stones are produced in large quantities. The chief manufactures are silk, cotton, woollens, linen, lace, chemicals, sugar, pottery, glass, paper, "articles of Paris," etc. The country holds the first rank in silk manufacture, and exports woollens, wine, silks, etc. France is subdivided into 87 departments. The government is republican, administered by a president (term 7 years) as executive, a senate (300 members), and a chamber of deputies (584 members). The prevailing language is French, but Basque is spoken in the southwest, Breton in the northwest, Flemish in the northeast, and Italian by a few in the southeast. The religions supported by the state are Roman Catholic (adherents numbering about 98 per cent. of all), Protestant (chiefly Calvinist), and Jewish. Mohammedanism is supported in Algeria. The following are the principal colonial possessions: in Africa—Algeria, Tunis (a French protectorate), Senegal and dependencies, French Sudan and Ivory Coast, French Congo (Gaboon), Réunion, Mayotte, Nossi-Bé, Sainte-Marie, Obok, Comoro Islands (protectorate), Madagascar (protectorate), French Sahara; in Asia—Pondicherry, Tongking, Cochin-China, Annum (protectorate), Cambodia (protectorate); in America—French Guiana, Martinique, Guadeloupe and dependencies, St. Pierre and Miquelon; in Oceania—New Caledonia, Tahiti, Marquesas Islands, Tubuai Islands, Tuamotu Islands, Wallis, Ralatea, and some small acquisitions. France corresponds partly to the ancient Gaul. It was inhabited in the earliest historic times by the Iberians (Aquitanians and Basques) and Celts (Gauls). Greek colonies were settled at Marseilles and elsewhere in southern France. Roman settlements were made at Narbo B. C. 118, and southern France (Provincia) was acquired by Rome. The conquest of all Gaul was effected by Caesar 58-51 B. C., and the country was subdivided into Roman provinces, becoming Romanized and Christian. It was overrun in the 5th century by the West Goths, Burgundians, and Franks; but an invasion of the Huns under Attila was checked at Châlons (451). The Frankish monarchy (Merovingian) was established under Clovis after his defeat of the Roman governor Syagrius near Soissons in 486. A Saracen invasion was checked by Charles Martel at Tours in 732. Carolingians came into power with the accession of Pepin the Short in 751. Pepin's son Charlemagne was crowned emperor of the West in 800; but the troubles after his death led to a division of the Frankish empire in the treaty of Verdun (843). The settlement of the Northmen in France took place in the beginning of the 10th century, and the accession of the Capetian dynasty in 987. France took a leading part in the Crusades. The power of the crown was increased by various sovereigns, especially by Philip II., Louis IX., Philip IV., and Louis XI. The Hundred Years' War with England extended from about 1337 to 1453. The Valois branch of the Capetian house acceded in 1328, and continued with its branch Valois-Orléans till the accession of the Bourbons with Henry IV. (of Navarre) in 1589. The Huguenot war was lasted from 1562 to the Edict of Nantes, 1598. The power of the crown was greatly developed by Richelieu and Louis XIV. France took a leading part in the Thirty Years' War. There were various combinations of European states against Louis XIV. (the last in the War of the Spanish Succession). France took part in the War of the Austrian Succession. In the Seven Years' War it was defeated by England, losing large possessions in America and India. It aided the United States in the Revolutionary War. The first French Revolution began in 1789, and the republic was established in 1792. Great increase of French territory and power resulted from the wars of the Revolution. The Directory was established in 1795, the Consulate in 1799, and the empire under Napoleon in 1804. Later events are the restoration of the Bourbons (1814); the Hundred Days of Napoleon (1815); the second restoration of the Bourbons (1815); the revolution of July and accession of the Orléans family (1830); the revolution and establishment of the second republic (1848); the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon (Dec. 2, 1851); and the establishment of the second empire under Napoleon III. (1852). France took part in the Crimean war and in the Austrian-Italian war of 1859. In the war of 1870-71 with the Germans (the so-called Franco-German war) France was severely defeated; the empire was overthrown (Sept. 4, 1870), and was succeeded by the third republic; and France was obliged to cede Alsace-Lorraine (1871). This disaster was followed by the Communist civil war of 1871. More recent events have been the extension of French territory or influence in southeastern Asia (war with China, ending 1885), in Tunis and western Africa, and in Madagascar; the Centennial Exposition of 1889; the efforts to overturn the existing republic by royalists, Bonapartists, and Boulangists; the leaning toward Russia (to offset the Triple Alliance); and the Panama imbroglio, culminating in 1892. (See, further, Gaul, Burgundy, Normandy, and the other provinces; Franco-German War and other wars; French Revolution, and Napoleon.) The following is a statement of the incorporation of the provinces of France since the Carolingian period: Gâtinais annexed to the crown 1068; viscounty of Bourges 1100; counties of Amiens and Vermandois (in Picardy) annexed to the crown 1183 (finally about 1479); county of Valois annexed 1215 (final union 1515); Normandy about 1203; Anjou about 1204 (definitely 1480); Maine about 1204 (definitely 1481); Touraine annexed to the crown about 1204 (incorporated about 1584); Narbonne (eastern Languedoc) 1229; Blois and Chartres (in Orléanais) 1234 (Blois finally in possession of the crown 1498); Perche 1257; county of Toulouse 1271; Champagne 1335 (incorporated 1301); Montpellier acquired 1349 (C); Aquitaine 1453; Berry 1465, and definitely 1601; duchy of Burgundy 1479; Brittany 1491 (incorporated 1379); Auvergne incorporated 1532; Bourbon united to the crown 1523; Forez united to the crown 1532; bishoprics of Metz, Toul, and Verdun 1562 (formally ceded 1648); Rouergue 1525; Navarre and Béarn united with France 1589; Bresse, Bugey, and the pays de Gex all in 1601; part of Alsace 1648; Koussillon 1689; Dunkirk 1662; Artois 1659, 1668, 1678; Flanders 1659, 1668, 1678, 1713; Franche-Comté (county of Burgundy) 1674-78; Strasbourg 1681; Orange 1713; Lorraine 1766; Avignon and the Comtat-Venaissin 1791; remaining parts of Alsace about 1791; county of Montbéliard 1793; Nice and its territory and Savoy 1860. Of regions outside of France, Corsica was acquired 1768, Algeria 1830-47. At its height under Napoleon, France included Belgium, Holland, Germany west of the Rhine, northwestern Germany as far as the mouth of the Elbe and Lubek, Valais in Switzerland, Piedmont, Liguria, Tuscany, and Latium; the kingdom of Italy (in northeastern Italy), the Illyrian provinces, and some smaller tracts were governed from France; and in French alliance or under French protection were the Rhenish Confederation (including the kingdom of Westphalia), Dantzig, Switzerland, the duchy of Warsaw, Neuchâtel, the kingdom of Naples, and various minor Italian states. Area of France, 207,301 square miles. Population (1891), 38,343,192. Population of French colonial possessions, estimated, 35,000,000-37,000,000; the entire area is undetermined.

France then—the Western or Latin Francia, as distinguished from the German Francia or Franken—properly meant only the King's immediate dominions. Though Normandy, Aquitaine, and the Duchy of Burgundy allowed homage to the French king, no one would have spoken of them as parts of France. But, as the French kings, step by step, got possession of the dominions of their vassals and other neighbors, the name of France gradually spread till it took in, as it now does, by far the greater part of Gaul. On the other hand, Flanders, Barcelona, and the Norman islands, though once under the homage of the French kings, have fallen altogether away, and have therefore never been reckoned as parts of France. Thus the name of France supplanted the name of Karolingia as the name of the Western kingdom.

France, Jacques Anatole Thibault (known as Anatole). Born at Paris, April 16, 1844. A French poet and miscellaneous writer. He is principally known from his critical articles in "La Vie Littéraire," "Le Globe," "Les Débats," "Le Temps," etc., and his novel "Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard" (1881).

France Antarctique (frôns on-türk-ték'). A name given by the French Huguenots to the short-lived colony on the bay of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 1555-67. Thevet and other authors extended the title to the whole of Brazil, and even to all South America.

France Équinoxiale (frôns ä-kë-noks-yäl'). [F., 'equinoctial France.'] A name given by some authors of the 18th century to French Guiana. It was occasionally used in official documents.

Francesca (frän-ches-kä), Piero della, surnamed di San-Sepolcro (from his place of birth). Born in Italy, 1420; died 1492. An Italian painter. He worked in Florence (1430-40), Arezzo, Rimini, Rome, and elsewhere. He wrote "De prospectiva pingendi."

Francesca da Rimini (frän-ches-kä dä ré-më-në). An Italian lady of the 13th century, daughter of Guido da Polenta, lord of Rimini, and wife of Giovanni Malatesta. The story of her love for Paolo, the young brother of her husband, and their subsequent death (about 1288) at the hand of the latter, has been told by Dante in a famous episode in the "Inferno." Silvio Pellico wrote a tragedy on the subject, and Leigh Hunt a poem. Boker also wrote a tragedy with the same title, which has been successfully played. Noted pictures illustrating the story have been painted by Ingres, Cabanel, Ary Scheffer, George Frederic Watts, and others.

Franceschina (frän-ches-kë-nä). The principal character in Marston's "Dutch Courtesan."

The character of the passionate and implacable courtesan, Franceschina, is conceived with mastery ability. Few figures in the Elizabethan drama are more striking than this fair vengeful fiend, who is as playful and pitiless as a tigress; whose caresses are sweet as honey and poisonous as acornite. Bullen.

Franceschini (frän-ches-kë-në), Baldassare. Born at Volterra, Italy, about 1612; died at Florence, 1681. An Italian painter.

Franceschini, Marcantonio. Born at Bologna, Italy, April 5, 1648; died at Bologna, Dec. 24, 1728. An Italian painter.

Frache-Comté (frôns kön-tä'). [F., 'free county.'] An ancient government of eastern France. It was bounded by Champagne on the north-west, Lorraine on the north, Montbéliard and Switzerland on the east, Gex, Bugey, and Bresse on the south, and Burgundy on the west. It was called in its earlier history Upper Burgundy, and often later was known as the county of Burgundy. Besançon and Dole are the chief towns. The departments of Doubs, Jura, and Haute-Saône correspond to it. It was part of the old kingdom of Burgundy. It became a county in early times and a fief of the empire, was held at different times by Frederick Barbarossa and Philip V. of France, and was definitely annexed to the duchy of Burgundy in 1384. It was conquered by Louis XI. of France in 1477; was ceded by Charles VIII. to the Hapsburgs in 1493, retaining local privileges under Spanish rule; was conquered by Louis XIV. 1668, but restored; and was again conquered in 1674 and annexed to France (formally ceded by treaties of Nimwegen 1678-79).

Franchi (frän'kë), Ausonio; pseudonym of Cristoforo Bonavino. Born at Pegli, near Genoa, Italy, Feb. 24, 1821. An Italian philosophical writer. He became a priest, but in 1849 abandoned the church on account of heterodox opinions, returning to it, however, in 1850. He became professor of philosophy at the University of Pavia in 1860, and professor at the Academy in Milan in 1863. The most notable of his works is "La filosofia delle scuole italiane" (1852), etc.

Franchi, Fabian and Louis del. Twin brothers, characters in Boucicault's play "The Corsican Brothers." The mysterious sympathy between them, a family inheritance, brings Fabian from his country home to Paris to avenge the death of Louis in a duel, revealed to him in a sort of vision at the time of its occurrence. Both parts are played by one actor.

Franci (fran'st). See the extract.

Even so early as the reign of Lewis the Pious, one writer distinguished Franchi and Germani, meaning by the former the people of the Western Kingdom. Gradually the name was, in the usage of Gaul and of Europe, thoroughly fixed in this sense. The Merwings, the Karlings, the Capets, all alike called themselves Reges Francorum; Francus having of course totally changed its meaning in the meanwhile. Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 189.

Francia (fran'shiü). The land of the Franks. The name varied in meaning with the extent of the Frankish power. Western Francia was Neustria, which grew into France. Eastern Francia became Franconia.

As for the mere name of Francia, like other names of the kind, it shifted its geographical use according to the wanderings of the people from whom it was derived. After many such changes of meaning, it gradually settled down as the name for those parts of Germany and Gaul where it still abides. There are the Teutonic or Anstrian Francia, part of which still keeps the name of Franken or Franconia, and the Romance or Neustrian Francia, which by various annexations has grown into modern France. Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 121.

Francia (frän'chü) (Francesco Raibolini). Born 1450; died Jan. 5, 1518. An Italian painter. The name Francia is probably an abbreviation of the full name Francesco. In his own day he was better known as a goldsmith than as a painter, and one of the most successful medalists of the time. In 1508 he came under the influence of Raphael. Of his frescos only two remain, much retouched, in the Oratory of St. Cecilia at Bologna. His easel-pictures and portraits in oil are numerous, and show the tendencies of Perugini and Raphael so strongly that some have long been attributed to one or the other painter.

Francia (frän'së-ä), José Gaspar Rodriguez, called Dr. Francia. Born in Asuncion, 1761; died there, Sept. 20, 1840. A dictator of Paraguay. He was a lawyer, and in May, 1811, was made a member of the governmental junta which was formed after the expulsion of the Spanish governor. He quickly took the lead in affairs; was made consul in Oct., 1811; dictator for three years in 1814; and dictator for life in 1817. From the first he governed with absolute power, and his orders became the only law of the country. Aiming to cut off Paraguay from intercourse with the rest of the world, he restricted foreign commerce to a few absolutely necessary articles. Except in rare instances nobody was allowed to leave the country, and this rule was enforced with the few foreigners who entered it. He regulated agriculture as he pleased, and would not permit the accumulation of wealth. His real or supposed enemies were imprisoned and executed, often secretly and always without any real trial. Primary education was somewhat encouraged, and quarrels with the surrounding powers were avoided, so that during his rule Paraguay had no wars.

Franciabigio (frän-chä-bë-jö), Francesco di Cristofano. Born at Florence about 1480; died there, about 1525. An Italian painter, a pupil and imitator of Andrea del Sarto.

Francis (fran'sis) I. (of Austria; Francis II. of the Holy Roman Empire). [The E. name Francis was formerly also Francis, from OF. Franceis, F. François, Sp. Pg. Francisco, It. Francesco, G. Franciscus, Franz., from ML. Franciscus, Frankish, of France, from Franco, Frank, Francia, France.] Born at Florence, Feb. 12, 1768; died at Vienna, March 2, 1835. Emperor of Austria, son of the emperor Leopold II. whom he succeeded in 1792. He joined in 1793 the first coalition against France, but was forced by the successes of Napoleon in Italy to conclude (Oct. 17, 1797) the peace of Campo-Formio (which see). In 1799 he joined the second coalition against France, but in consequence of the victories of Napoleon at Marengo (June 14, 1800), and Moreau at Hohenlinden (Dec. 3, 1800), he accepted (Feb. 9, 1801) the peace of Lunéville, which in the main confirmed the peace of Campo-Formio. He joined the third coalition against France in 1805, but was forced by the victory of Napoleon at Austerlitz (Dec. 2, 1805) to conclude (Dec. 26, 1805) the peace of Presburg, by which Austria was deprived of Venetia and Tyrol. Having already proclaimed himself hereditary emperor of Austria in 1804, he formally abdicated the crown of the Holy Roman Empire in 1806. He declared war against France in 1809, but was forced by the victory of Napoleon over the archduke Charles at Wagram (July 5-6, 1809) to conclude (Oct. 14, 1809) the peace of Vienna, by which Austria lost 32,000 square miles of territory. His daughter Maria Louisa married Napoleon in 1810. He sided with France against Russia in 1812, joined the Allies in 1813, and acquired by the Congress of Vienna more territory than he had lost in his previous wars with France.

He joined the Holy Alliance in 1815, and the remainder of his reign was devoted to a policy of reaction under the guidance of Metternich.

Francis I. Born at Cognac, France, Sept. 12, 1494; died at Rambouillet, France, March 31, 1547. King of France, son of Charles, count of Angoulême, and cousin-german of Louis XII. He succeeded to the throne in 1515. In the same year he conquered by the victory of Marignano (Sept. 13-14) Milan, the sovereignty of which he claimed by inheritance through his great-grandmother Valentina Visconti. In 1516 he concluded a concordat with the Pope which rescinded the pragmatic sanction of 1438, and vested in the crown the right of nominating to vacant benefices. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the imperial dignity in 1519, and the remainder of his reign was chiefly occupied by four wars against his victorious rival, the emperor Charles V., who advanced claims to Milan and the duchy of Burgundy. During the first war, which broke out in 1521, he was taken captive at Pavia in 1525, and kept prisoner until the peace of Madrid in 1526. During the second war, which broke out in 1527, he was supported by the Pope, Venice, and Francesco Sforza. It was concluded by the peace of Cambray in 1529. The third war broke out in 1536, and was ended by the truce of Nice in 1538. The fourth war, which broke out in 1542, was terminated with the peace of Crespy in 1544, which left him in possession of Burgundy while the emperor retained Milan. During the last two wars his principal ally was Soliman the Magnificent, sultan of Turkey.

Francis II. Born at Fontainebleau, France, Jan. 19, 1544; died at Paris, Dec. 5, 1560. King of France, eldest son of Henry II, whom he succeeded in 1559. He married Mary Queen of Scots in 1558.

Francis I. (Stephen). Born Dec. 8, 1708; died at Innsbruck, Tyrol, Aug. 18, 1765. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Leopold, duke of Lorraine. He married in 1736 Maria Theresa of Austria, who co-reigned he became on her accession in 1740 to the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria. He was elected emperor in 1745.

Francis II. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. See Francis I., Emperor of Austria.

Francis I. Born at Naples, Aug. 19, 1777; died at Naples, Nov. 8, 1830. King of the Two Sicilies, son of Ferdinand I, whom he succeeded in 1825.

Francis II. Born Jan. 16, 1836. King of the Two Sicilies, son of Ferdinand II, whom he succeeded in 1859. He was driven from his dominions (which were annexed to those of Victor Emmanuel) in 1861.

Francis (fran'sis). In Shakspeare's "Much Ado about Nothing," a friar.

Francis, Convers. Born at West Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 9, 1795; died at Cambridge, April 7, 1863. An American Unitarian clergyman and biographer. He became professor of pulpit eloquence at Harvard in 1842, a position which he retained until his death. He wrote the essays on John Eliot and Sebastian Râsie in Sparks's "Library of American Biography."

Francis, James Goodall. Born at London in 1819; died at Queenscliff, Victoria, June 25, 1884. An Australian politician. He emigrated to Tasmania in 1834; removed subsequently to Melbourne; became a member of the lower house of the Victorian legislative assembly in 1859; was commissioner of trade and customs 1863-68; was treasurer of Victoria 1870-71; and was prime minister 1872-74.

Francis, John. Born at London, July 18, 1811; died there, April 6, 1882. An English publisher. He became a junior clerk in the office of the "Athenæum" in Sept., 1831, and was business manager and publisher of that paper from Oct. 4, 1831, until his death. He was prominently connected with the agitation for the repeal of the duty on newspaper advertisements (1853), of the stamp duty on newspapers (1855), and of the paper duty (1861).

Francis, John Wakefield. Born at New York, Nov. 17, 1789; died there, Feb. 8, 1861. An American physician and medical and biographical writer. He published "Old New York" (1857), etc.

Francis, Philip. Born about 1708; died at Bath, March 5, 1773. An Irish author. He took the degree of B. A. at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1728, and after having been for a time curate of St. Peter's, Dublin, went to England, where he obtained the rectory of Skepton in Norfolk in 1744. He was afterward tutor to Charles James Fox, whom he accompanied to Eton in 1757, and was rector of Barrow in Suffolk from 1762 until his death. He published the following translations from Horace: "Odes, Epodes, and Carmen Seculare of Horace in Latin and English" (1742), and "Satires, Epistles, and Art of Poetry" (1746).

Francis, Sir Philip. Born at Dublin, Oct. 22, 1740; died Dec. 23, 1818. The reputed author of "Junius's Letters," son of Philip Francis (1708-73). He was educated at St. Paul's school; became a junior clerk in the secretary of state's office in 1756; was amanuensis to Pitt 1761-62; was first clerk at the War Office 1762-72; went out to India in 1774 as one of the council of four appointed to control the governor-general of India; returned to England in 1781 (having left India in 1780); entered Parliament in 1784; and about 1806 was made K. C. B. He wrote numerous papers, under various pseudonyms, in support of the Whig party, and has been accredited with the authorship of "Junius's Letters," chiefly on the evidence adduced by Charles Chabot, who compared the handwriting of Junius with that of Francis.

Francis Borgia, St. See Borgia, St. Francesco.

Francis Joseph I. Born at Vienna, Aug. 18, 1830. Emperor of Austria, eldest son of the archduke Francis Charles by the princess Sophia, daughter of Maximilian I. of Bavaria. He succeeded to the throne Dec. 2, 1848, on the abdication of his uncle Ferdinand I. He found at his accession wide-spread revolutions in progress in Italy and Hungary. The pacification of Italy was accomplished by the decisive victory of Radetzky over Charles Albert of Sardinia, at Novara, March 23, 1849. The emperor took part in person in the campaign in Hungary, which was subjugated with the assistance of the Russians, whose general, Rüdiger, received the surrender of the Hungarian general Gungey at Világos, Aug. 13, 1849. In 1859 Victor Emmanuel, the successor of Charles Albert, having secured the alliance of France, resumed the struggle for the liberation of Italy. The Austrian forces were overthrown by the French and Sardinians at Magenta June 4, and Solferino June 24, and Austria was forced to give up Lombardy in the preliminary peace of Villafranca July 11, 1859, which was ratified by the peace of Zurich Nov. 10, 1859. In 1864, in alliance with Prussia, he waged a war against Denmark, which resulted in the cession of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauburg from that kingdom. Disagreement over the disposition of these duchies brought about the feeble support of a number of German states, while Prussia secured the alliance of Italy. The Prussians, on July 3, 1866, overwhelmed the Austrian army at Königgratz (Sadowa). In Italy the Austrians were victorious at Custozza, and the Austrian fleet achieved a triumph at Lissa. The emperor concluded peace with Prussia at Prague Aug. 23, and with Italy at Vienna Oct. 3, 1866. Austria was ejected from the German Confederation, and was compelled to give up Venetia. The unsuccessful issue of this war forced upon the emperor a liberal internal policy. The Hungarians were conciliated by the so-called Ausgleich (compromise), effected by Beust and Déak in 1867, by which the Austrian empire was reconstituted on a dualistic basis. In Sept., 1872, during the ministry of Count Andrassy, he concluded with the German Empire and Russia the Dreikaiserbund for the preservation of the European peace. The Dreikaiserbund was practically dissolved at the Congress of Berlin June 13-July 13, 1878, which permitted Austria to occupy the provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina in opposition to the wishes of Russia. In 1883 he concluded the Triple Alliance with the German Empire and Italy. Francis Joseph married in 1854 the princess Elisabeth, daughter of Duke Maximilian of the house of Bavaria. His only son, the crown prince Rudolph, committed suicide (?) Jan. 30, 1889, at Mierling, near Vienna. The archduke Charles Louis, brother of Francis Joseph, became heir to the throne, but he renounced his right in favor of his son the archduke Francis Ferdinand, who is now the heir apparent. He was born at Graz in 1863.

Francis of Assisi (äs-së'zë), Saint (Giovanni Francesco Bernardone). Born at Assisi, Italy, in 1182; died at Assisi, Oct. 4, 1226. A celebrated Italian monk and preacher. He turned, after a serious illness in his youth, to a life of ascetic devotion, and in 1210 founded the order of the Franciscans, whose rule was formally confirmed by Honorius III. in 1223. After a visit to Egypt in 1219, on which he preached before the sultan, he retired as a hermit to Monte Alverno, where, according to the legend, he experienced the miracle of the stigmata. He was canonized by Gregory IX. in 1228, and is commemorated on Oct. 4.

Francis of Paula (pou'lä), Saint. Born at Paola (Paula), Cosenza, Italy, 1416; died at Plessis-lez-Tours, Indre-Loire, France, April 2, 1507. An Italian monk, the founder of the order of Minims (first called Hermits of St. Francis) in 1436. The statutes of the order were confirmed, and Francis was appointed its superior-general, by Pope Sixtus IV. in 1474.

Francis of Sales (sälz; F. pron. sül). Saint. Born at Sales, near Annecy, Savoy, 1567; died at Lyons, Dec. 28, 1622. A Savoyard, coadjutor-bishop (1599) and later (1602) bishop of Geneva, founder with Madame de Chantal of the order of the Visitation in 1610. He wrote "Traité de l'amour de Dieu," etc. He is commemorated on Jan. 29.

Francisca (fran-sis'kij). A nun in Shakspeare's "Measure for Measure."

Franciscans (fran-sis'kanz). An order of mendicant friars founded by St. Francis of Assisi, Italy, authorized by the Pope in 1210, and more formally ratified in 1223. In addition to the usual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, special stress is laid upon preaching and ministry to the body and soul. Under various names, such as Minorites, Barefooted Friars, and Gray Friars, the order spread rapidly throughout Europe; among its members were Alexander of Hales, Duns Scotus, Roger Bacon, Occam, Popes Sixtus V. and Clement XIV., and other eminent men; and the order was long noted for its rivalry with the Dominicans. Differences early arose in regard to the severity of the rule, which culminated in the 15th century in the division of the order into two great classes, the Observantines or Observants and the Conventuals; the former follow a more rigorous, the latter a milder rule. The general of the Observantines is minister-general of the entire order. The order has been noted for missionary zeal, but suffered considerably in the Reformation and the French Revolution. The usual distinguishing features of the garb are a gray or dark-brown cowl, a girdle, and sandals.

Dominic's theologians were called already Frati Predicatori; Francis therefore modestly placed himself and his companions below their order as the Frati Minori, lesser brethren, Minorite Friars. They were both offshoots of the Augustinian monks; both were Austin Friars, whether Black Friars or Grey Friars. The Dominicans were in black; and the Franciscans went in coarse grey gowns, bare-footed and bare-headed.

Morley, English Writers, III. 300.

Francisco (fran-sis'kō). [See Francis.] 1. A lord in Shakspeare's "Tempest."—2. A soldier in Shakspeare's "Hamlet."—3. In Massinger's play "The Duke of Milan," the duke's favorite, a cold, vindictive hyperite.

Franck (frōnk), Adolphe. Born at Liocourt, France, Oct. 9, 1809; died April 10, 1893. A French philosopher. He became professor of international law at the Collège de France in 1856, and founded the "Paix Sociale" in 1858. He published "Le communisme jugé par l'histoire" (1849), "Philosophie du droit pénal" (1844), "Moralistes et philosophes" (1871), and was the editor of "Dictionnaire des sciences philosophiques" (1843-49).

Franck, Sebastian. See Frank.

Francke (fräng'ke), August Hermann. Born at Lübeck, Germany, March 22, 1663; died at Halle, Prussia, June 8, 1727. A German pietistic preacher and philanthropist. He founded at Halle in 1695 an orphan-asylum with which a printing-press and various schools were later combined.

Franco (frän'kō), Giovanni Battista, surnamed Semolei. Born at Udine, 1510; died at Venice, 1561. An Italian painter. His most noted work is a "Baptism of Christ" in the Church of San Francesco della Vigna in Venice.

Franco-German War, or Franco-Prussian War. The war of 1870-71 between France and Germany. The immediate ostensible cause of it was the election of a prince of Hohenzollern to the Spanish throne. The following are the leading events: Declaration of war, July 19, 1870; battle of Weissenburg, Aug. 4, 1870; battle of Worth, Aug. 6, 1870; battle of Spicheren, Aug. 6, 1870; battles around Metz (Colombey-Nouilly, Aug. 14; Vionville, Aug. 16; Gravelotte, Aug. 18); battle of Sedan, Sept. 1; surrender of the emperor and his army at Sedan, Sept. 2; proclamation of the French republic, Sept. 4; commencement of the siege of Paris by the Germans, Sept. 19; surrender of Strasbourg, S. pt. 27; surrender of Metz, Oct. 27; battle of Coulmiers, Nov. 9; battle of Beaune-la-Rolande, Nov. 28; sortie from Paris, Nov. 30; battle of Orléans, Dec. 2-4; sorties from Paris, Jan. 1871; battle of Le Mans, Jan. 12; battle of Le Mans, Jan. 15-17; surrender of Paris, Jan. 28; peace preliminaries at Versailles, Feb. 26; occupation of Paris by German troops, March 1-3; peace of Frankfurt (which see), May 10, 1871.

François (fron-swä'), Duc d'Anjou. Born 1554; died 1584. A son of Henry II. of France, a suitor for the hand of Queen Elizabeth of England.

François, Kurt von. Born at Luxembourg, Oct. 2, 1853. An African explorer. He served through the Franco-German war, in which his father, a German general, fell. In 1883 he accompanied the expedition of Wissmann to the Kassai, and did excellent chartographic work. In 1885 he explored the Lulongo and Tshunapa rivers in company with G. Grenfell. Promoted captain while in Germany, he was sent to Toro-land in 1887, and penetrated beyond Salaga to the country of the Mossi. In 1889 he was placed at the head of the German troops in banaraland, and in 1891 became acting imperial commissioner. He has published "Die Erforschung des Lulongo und Tshunapa" (Leipzig, 1888).

François de Neufchâteau (fron-swä' dë në-shä-tō'). Comte Nicolas Louis. Born at Saffais, Meurthe, France, April 17, 1750; died at Paris, Jan. 10, 1828. A French statesman, poet, and author. He was a member of the Directory 1797-1798, minister of the interior 1797 and 1798-99, and president of the Senate 1804-06.

Franconia (frang-kō'ni-ä), G. Franken (fräng'-ken). [ML. Franconia, G. Franken, land of the Franks.] One of the four great duchies of the old German kingdom; also known as Francia. It lay chiefly in the valley of the Main, but extended west of the Rhine, being bounded by Saxony on the north and Alamanni or Swabia on the south. It broke up into various small districts (the Palatinate, Würzburg, Bamberg, etc.). In the division of the empire under Maximilian, it was made a circle. It now denotes a region whose center is further to the east than that of the ancient duchy. This is divided into Upper, Middle, and Lower Franconia (see below).

France and Franconia are etymologically the same word; the difference in their modern forms is simply owing to the necessity of avoiding confusion, which was avoided in early medieval Latin by speaking of Francia occidentalis and Francia orientalis, Francia Latina and Francia Teutonica. Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 172.

Franconia, Lower, G. Unterfranken und Aschaffenburg. A government district ("Regierungs-Bezirk") in northwestern Bavaria. Capital, Würzburg. Area, 3,243 square miles. Population (1890), 618,489.

Franconian (frang-kō'ni-ou). The German dialect of old Franconian territory in middle and western Germany, Belgium, and Holland, along the whole course of the Rhine from the confluence of the Murg to its mouth. Several minor dialectic divisions are recognized. Upper Franconian comprehends the dialect, called East Franconian, of the old duchy of Franconia Orientalis, and Rhenish Franconian the dialect of the old Franconia Rhenensis. Middle Franconian is the dialect of the Moselle region and along the Rhine from Coblenz to Düsseldorf. With Hessian and Thuringian they form the group specifically called Middle German, but are commonly included in the High German group. Lower Franconian, the progenitor of modern Dutch and Flemish, is the dialect of the lower Rhine region from Düsseldorf to its mouth. With Saxon and Friesian it forms the group specifically called Low German.

Franklin, Benjamin. Born at Boston, Mass., Jan. 17, 1706; died at Philadelphia, April 17, 1790. A celebrated American philosopher, statesman, diplomatist, and author. He learned the printer's trade in the office of his elder brother James, and in 1729 established himself at Philadelphia as editor and proprietor of the "Pennsylvania Gazette." He founded the Philadelphia library in 1731; began the publication of "Poor Richard's Almanac" in 1732; was appointed clerk of the Pennsylvania assembly in 1736; became postmaster of Philadelphia in 1737; founded the American Philosophical Society and the University of Pennsylvania in 1743; and in 1752 demonstrated by experiments made with a kite during a thunderstorm that lightning is a discharge of electricity, a discovery for which he was awarded the Copley medal by the Royal Society in 1753. He was deputy postmaster-general for the British colonies in America 1753-74. In 1754, at a convention of the New England colonies with New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, held at Albany, he proposed a plan, known as the "Albany Plan," which contemplated the formation of a self-sustaining government for all the colonies, and which, although adopted by the convention, failed of support in the colonies. He acted as colonial agent for Pennsylvania in England 1757-62 and 1764-75; was elected to the second Continental Congress in 1775; and in 1776 was a member of the committee of five chosen by Congress to draw up a declaration of independence. He arrived at Paris Dec. 21, 1776, as ambassador to the court of France; and in conjunction with Arthur Lee and Silas Deane concluded a treaty with France, Feb. 6, 1778, by which France recognized the independence of America. In 1782, on the advent of Lord Rockingham's ministry to power, he began a correspondence with Lord Shelburne, secretary of state for home and colonies, which led to negotiations for peace; and in conjunction with Jay and Adams concluded with England the treaty of Paris, Sept. 3, 1783. He returned to America in 1785; was president of Pennsylvania 1785-88; and was a delegate to the constitutional convention in 1787. He left an autobiography, which was edited by John Bigelow in 1863. His works have been edited by Jared Sparks (9 vols., 1836-40) and John Bigelow (10 vols., 1837-1858).

Franklin, Mrs. (Eleanor Ann Porden). Born July, 1795; died Feb. 23, 1825. An English poet, the first wife of Sir John Franklin, whom she married in 1823.

Franklin, Lady (Jane Griffin). Born 1792; died at London, July 18, 1875. The second wife of Sir John Franklin, whom she married Nov. 5, 1828. She fitted out five ships between 1850 and 1857 to search for the missing Arctic expedition commanded by her husband. One of them, the Fox, brought back intelligence of its fate. She was awarded the gold medal of the Royal Geographical Society in 1860, in recognition of her services in the search for the missing explorers.

Franklin, Sir John. Born April 16, 1786; died June 11, 1847. A celebrated Arctic explorer. He was the son of Wilingham Franklin of Spilsby in Lincolnshire. He entered the royal navy in his youth; served at the battle of Trafalgar in 1805, and in the expedition against New Orleans in 1814; commanded the brig Frent in the Arctic expedition under Captain Buchan in 1818; commanded an exploring expedition to the northern coast of North America 1819-22; commanded a similar expedition 1825-27; was knighted in 1829; and was lieutenant-governor of Van Diemen's Land 1836-43. In 1845 he was appointed to the command of an expedition, consisting of the Erebus and the Terror, Captain Crozier, sent out by the British admiralty in search of the northwest passage. The expedition sailed from Greenhithe, May 18, 1845, and was last spoken of the entrance of Lancaster Sound, July 26, 1845. Thirty-nine relief expeditions, public and private, were sent out from England and America in search of the missing explorers between 1847 and 1857. In the last-mentioned year the Fox yacht, Captain Leopold McClintock, was sent by Lady Franklin. McClintock found traces of the missing expedition in 1859, which confirmed previous rumors of its total destruction. From a paper containing an entry by Captain Fitzjames of the missing expedition, it was learned that Franklin died June 11, 1847, having in the previous year penetrated to within 12 miles of the northern extremity of King William's Land.

Franklin, William. Born at Philadelphia, 1729; died in England, Nov. 17, 1813. An illegitimate son of Benjamin Franklin. He was royal governor of New Jersey 1762-76, and sided with the loyalists in the Revolution.

Franklin, William Buel. Born at York, Pa., Feb. 27, 1823. An American general. He was graduated at West Point in 1843, served in the Mexican war, and became a captain in the regular army in 1857 and a colonel in 1861. He commanded a brigade in Heint-zleman's division at the battle of Bull Run July 21, 1861, and commanded a corps at Malvern Hill July 1, and at Antietam Sept. 17, 1862. He led a grand division of Burnside's army at Fredericksburg Dec. 13, 1862, and commanded a division of Banks's army in the Red River campaign of 1864. He resigned in 1866.

Franklin's Tale, The. One of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." It is said in the prologue to be from a Breton lay. The story is that of Boccaccio's fifth novel of the tenth day in the "Decameron," and is introduced also in the fifth book of his "Filippo." It relates the sorrows and triumph of Derigene, the faithful wife of Arviragus. The Franklin who tells the tale is a white-headed Epicurean country gentleman:

"With oute bake mete was nevere his hous,
Of fish and flesh, and that ago pletenous
It shewed in his hous of mete and drynke."

Frankly (frangk'li). A character in Cibber's comedy "The Refusal, or The Ladies' Philosophy."

Franks (frangk's). [Usually explained from the OHG. form, as from OHG. franko*, franko* = AS. franca, a spear, javelin, = Icel. frakki, also frakka (prob. from AS.), a kind of spear; the Franks being thus ult. 'Spear-men,' as Saxons were 'Sword-men' (see Saxon). The notion of 'free' associated with Frank is apparently later.] 1. The name assumed in the 3d century A. D. by a confederation of German tribes (Sicambri, Bructeri, Chamavi, etc.). It was divided by the 4th century into the three groups the Catti, the Ripuarian Franks (dwelling near Cologne), and the Salian Franks (dwelling along the lower Rhine). The Merovingian monarchy of the Salian Franks was established in northern Gaul under Clovis (481-511), and gave origin to the name France. The accession of the Carolingians under Pepin occurred in 751. See Verdun, Treaty of.

2. A name given to Europeans of the western nations by the Turks, Arabs, and other Oriental peoples. The appellation originated at the time of the Crusades, when the Franks (the French), and by extension the other nations of western Europe, became familiar to the Orientals.

He was elected member of Parliament in 1873. His volume of poems, "Les fleurs boréales, etc.," was crowned by the French Academy in 1880. Among his other works are "La voix d'un exilé" (1867), "La légende d'un peuple" (1887), "Papineau" and "Félix Poutre," historical dramas (1880).

Fredegarus (fred-e-gä'ri-us), Latinized from Fredegar. The name assigned to the unknown compiler (there were really three) of an important work on general and early French history, coming down to the year 642. Two of the compilers were Burgundians, one writing in 613 and the other in 658. See the extract.

In spirit and diction the work passing under the name of Fredegarus scholasticus, the contents of which are priceless for the history of the first half of the seventh century, belongs entirely to the Middle Ages. This "Fredegar," gradually compiled by three authors, was continued by more than one hand during the eighth century. Independently of Fredegarus, the substance of his work was carried on a. 727 in the so-called Gesta Francorum, the Latin of which is less barbarous, while its contents are more meagre, than Fredegar's.

Fredegunde (fred'e-gund), or Fredegonda (fred-e-gon'dä). Died 597. A Frankish queen. She was originally the mistress of Chilperic I. of Neustria, whom she married after having procured the assassination of his wife Galeswintha, sister of Brunehild, wife of Sigbert of Anstrasia. This assassination brought on a war between Chilperic and Sigbert, the latter of whom was victorious in battle, but was murdered in 575 by emissaries of Fredegunde. She became regent for her son Clotaire II. in 593, and attacked and defeated Brunehild in 596.

Fredensborg (frä'dens-borg). A village in the north of Zealand, Denmark. The royal palace here, the autumn residence of the king, was built in the style of the French Renaissance in commemoration of the peace of 1720 with Sweden. Of the interior apartments the dioned hall is the most remarkable.

Fredericia (fred-e-rish'ë-ä), or Friedericia (frë-de-rëts'ë-ä). A fortified seaport in Jutland, Denmark, situated at the entrance to the Little Belt in lat. 55° 34' N., long. 9° 46' E. It was defended by the Danes against the troops of Schleswig-Holstein in 1849. Population (1890), 10,042.

Frederick (fred'er-ik) I. [OHG. Friderih, Goth. Frithareiks, lit. 'peace-ruler'; ML. Fredericus, Fridericus, F. Frédéric, It. Federigo, Federico, Sp. Pg. Federico, G. Friedrich.] Born at Karlsruhe, Baden, Sept. 9, 1826. Grand Duke of Baden. He became regent for his imbecile brother in 1852, and succeeded as grand duke in 1856. He married Louise, daughter of William I. of Prussia, in 1856. In the Seven Weeks' War (1866) he sided with Austria.

Frederick III. Born at Hadersleben, Schleswig, March 18, 1609; died at Copenhagen, Feb. 9, 1670. King of Denmark and Norway. He entered into an alliance with Holland, Poland, and Brandenburg in 1657 against Charles X. Gustavus of Sweden. He was totally defeated by Charles Gustavus (who crossed the Little Belt on the ice in Jan., 1658), and was forced to make important territorial cessions at the peace of Roeskilde, Feb. 28, 1658. The war being renewed in the same year by Charles Gustavus, with a view to annihilating the monarchy of Denmark, he defended himself with great spirit until relieved by an allied army under the elector Frederick William of Brandenburg and by a Dutch fleet. He signed, May 27, 1660, the peace of Copenhagen, which in the main confirmed the provisions of the peace of Roeskilde. By a coalition of the clergy with the bourgeoisie against the nobility, he was enabled in 1661 to transform Denmark from an elective limited to a hereditary absolute monarchy.

Frederick IV. Born at Copenhagen, Oct. 11, 1671; died at Copenhagen, Oct. 12, 1730. King of Denmark and Norway, son of Christian V. whom he succeeded in 1699. Shortly after his accession he formed an alliance with Peter the Great and Augustus II., king of Poland and elector of Saxony, against Charles XII. of Sweden, who invaded Zealand and dictated the peace of Travendal, Aug. 18, 1700. On the defeat of Charles at Pultowa in 1709, he renewed the alliance with Peter the Great and Augustus against Charles, and this alliance was subsequently joined by Saxony and Hannover. After the death of Charles before Frederickschal, he concluded with Sweden a separate treaty at Fredericksborg, July 3, 1720, in which Sweden renounced its right of exemption from customs duties in the Sound and abandoned its ally, the Duke of Holstein-Gottorp, who was in the following year deprived of his territories in Schleswig.

Frederick V. Born at Copenhagen, March 31, 1723; died Jan. 14, 1766. King of Denmark and Norway, son of Christian VI. whom he succeeded in 1746. He encouraged the arts and sciences with a liberality which attracted numerous distinguished foreigners to Denmark, including the pedagogue Basedow and the poet Klopstock. He sent, in 1761, Niebuhr and others on a scientific expedition to Egypt and Arabia.

Frederick VI. Born at Copenhagen, Jan. 28, 1768; died at Copenhagen, Dec. 3, 1839. King of Denmark and Norway. He became regent in 1784 for his imbecile father, Christian VII., whom he succeeded in 1808. He adopted at the beginning of the Napoleonic war a policy of strict neutrality. Having joined the Northern Maritime League, Dec. 16, 1800, for the purpose of resisting by force the interference of the English with neutral merchantmen upon the high seas, he suffered, in the war which presently broke out between England and the league, a decisive defeat at the battle of Copenhagen, April 2, 1801. He subsequently joined the Continental League in consequence of the bombardment of Copenhagen, Sept. 2, 1807, and the seizure by the English of the Danish fleet in the midst of peace. He refused to join the coalition against Napoleon in 1813, and for this he was punished by the allied powers with the loss of Norway, which was united with Sweden in 1814.

Frederick VII. Born at Copenhagen, Oct. 6, 1808; died at Glücksburg, Schleswig, Nov. 15, 1863. King of Denmark, son of Christian VIII., whom he succeeded in 1848.

Frederick I., surnamed "The Victorious." Born 1425; died Dec. 12, 1476. Elector Palatine 1451-1476.

Frederick II., surnamed "The Wise." Born Dec. 9, 1482; died Feb. 26, 1556. Elector Palatine 1544-56. He commanded the imperial army against the Turks in 1529 and 1532.

Frederick III., surnamed "The Pious." Born at Simmern, Prussia, Feb. 14, 1515; died Oct. 26, 1576. Elector Palatine 1559-76. He was originally an adherent of the Lutheran faith, but eventually joined the Reformed communion, and in 1563 published the Heidelberg Catechism throughout his dominions.

Frederick IV., surnamed "The Upright." Born at Amberg, Germany, March 5, 1574; died Sept. 19, 1610. Elector Palatine 1592-1610. He joined in 1608 the Protestant Union, of which he was chosen leader.

Frederick V. Born Aug., 1596; died at Mainz, Germany, Nov., 1632. Elector Palatine, son of Frederick IV., whom he succeeded in 1610. He married Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James I. of England, in 1613. In 1619, as the head of the German Protestant Union, he accepted the crown of Bohemia, whose estates were in rebellion against Ferdinand of Austria. He lost both Bohemia and his hereditary dominions in consequence of the defeat of his general Christian of Anhalt by the Imperialists at the battle on the White Hill, Nov. 8, 1620.

Frederick I., surnamed Barbarossa ("Red-beard"; G. Rohbart). The most noted emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, of the Hohenstaufen line, son of Frederick II., duke of Swabia, and nephew of Conrad III., whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 1152. He was crowned emperor at Rome by Hadrian IV. in 1155. His reign was chiefly occupied by wars against the turbulent German nobility and by six expeditions to Italy for the purpose of restoring the imperial authority in the republican cities of Lombardy 1154-55, 1158-62, 1163, 1166-68, 1174-77, and 1184-86. In 1176 he was, in consequence of the defection of the powerful feudatory Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, defeated by the Lombards at the battle of Legnano, and was compelled to accept the definitive peace of Constance in 1183, by which he renounced all regal rights in the cities. (See Lombard League, and Constance, Treaty of.) In 1180 he punished Henry the Lion by putting him under the ban of the empire and depriving him of his fiefs. In 1189 he joined the third Crusade, on which he was drowned in the Kalykadnos in Asia Minor.

Frederick II. Born at Jesi, near Ancona, Italy, Dec. 26, 1194; died at Fiorentino (Firenzuola), Dec. 13, 1250. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Henry VI. and Constance, heiress of the Two Sicilies. Left an orphan in 1198, he was brought up under the wardship of the Pope as feudal superior of the Two Sicilies. He assumed the government of the Two Sicilies in 1208. In 1212 he was brought forward by the Pope as an aspirant to the crown of Germany in opposition to King Otto IV., with whom the Pope had quarreled, and was elected by the Ghibelline party, the traditional supporters of the house of Hohenstaufen, which he represented. He was crowned at Aachen in 1215, Otto having been totally defeated at Bouvines in the year previous. He was crowned emperor at Rome by Honorius III. in 1220. He continued the policy of his house of attempting to perfect the union of Italy and Germany into one empire, in which he was opposed by the Pope and the Lombard League. In 1228-29 he conducted a crusade to the Holy Land, and procured the cession of Jaffa, Sidon, Jerusalem, and Nazareth from the Saracens.

Frederick III., surnamed "The Handsome." Born 1286; died Jan. 13, 1330. King of Germany, son of Albert I., whom he succeeded as duke of Austria in 1308. He was chosen king in 1314 in opposition to Louis IV., by whom he was defeated and captured at Muhlberg in 1322.

Frederick III. (IV. as King of Germany). Born at Innsbruck, Tyrol, Sept. 21, 1415; died at Linz, Austria, Aug. 19, 1493. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. He was elected emperor in 1440, and was the last German emperor crowned at Rome (1452).

Frederick I. Born at Königsberg, Prussia, July 11 (21), 1657; died at Berlin, Feb. 25, 1713. King of Prussia, son of Frederick William, the Great Elector, whom he succeeded (as Frederick III. of Brandenburg) in 1688. He was crowned as the first king of Prussia in 1701. He founded the University of Halle and the Academy of Sciences.

Frederick II., surnamed "The Great." Born at Berlin, Jan. 24, 1712; died at Sans Souci, near Potsdam, Aug. 17, 1786. King of Prussia 1740-86, son of Frederick William I. and Sophia Dorothea, daughter of George I. of England. In the year in which Frederick ascended the throne, the emperor Charles VI. died without male issue. He was succeeded by his daughter Maria Theresa by virtue of the pragmatic sanction (which see), the validity of which was disputed by the Elector of Bavaria and other claimants. Frederick embraced the opportunity presented by the insecurity of her title to invade (1740) Silesia, to part of which he laid claim. He defeated the Austrians at Mollwitz in 1741, and at Chotusitz in 1742, and in 1742 concluded the treaty of Breslau and Berlin, by which in return for the cession of Silesia he withdrew from the alliance which he had in the meantime entered into with France and Bavaria against Austria. In 1744, alarmed by the successes of Austria against France and Bavaria, he entered into a second alliance with those powers, defeated the Austrians and Saxons at Hohenfriedberg in 1745, defeated the Austrians at Soor in 1745, and in 1745 concluded the peace of Dresden, which confirmed the treaty of Breslau and Berlin. To regain Silesia, Maria Theresa formed an alliance with France (1756), joined by Russia, Sweden, and Saxony. Frederick, anticipating the allies, invaded Saxony in 1756. In the ensuing war, called the Seven Years' War, he was supported by England, chiefly in the form of subsidies. He made himself master of Saxony by the defeat of the Austrians at Lobositz in 1756. In 1757 he invaded Bohemia and defeated the Austrians at Prague, but was defeated at Kolin by Marshal Daun, who drove him out of Bohemia. He defeated the French and Austrians at Rossbach and the Austrians alone at Lenzen in the same year. In 1758 he defeated the Russians at Zorndorf. In 1759 he was defeated by the Austrians and Russians at Kunersdorf. Berlin was taken by the Russians in 1760. England withdrew her subsidies in 1761, and Frederick was reduced to desperation. In 1762, however, Elizabeth of Russia died, and fortune changed. Peter III., Elizabeth's successor, concluded peace in 1762, and the defection of France in that year caused Maria Theresa to sign in 1763 the treaty of Hubertburg, which confirmed the treaty of Breslau and Berlin, including that of Dresden. In 1772 he joined with Russia and Austria in the partition of Poland, by which he added Polish Prussia to his dominions. In 1778-79 he took part in the War of the Bavarian Succession (which see). Frederick II., through his military genius and administrative abilities, raised Prussia to the rank of a powerful state. He was a disciple of the French philosophers, and for many years was intimate with Voltaire. He left a number of works, published in 30 volumes 1846-1857.

Frederick III. Born at Potsdam, Oct. 18, 1831; died there, June 15, 1888. German emperor and king of Prussia March 9-June 15, 1888, son of William I. of Prussia (afterward German emperor). He married Victoria, daughter of Queen Victoria, in 1858, commanded the second Prussian army in 1866, and the third army in the Franco-Prussian war, in which he took part in the victories of Weissenburg, Worth, and Sedan.

Frederick I., surnamed "The Warlike." Born at Altenburg, Germany, March 29, 1369; died at Altenburg, Jan. 4, 1428. Margrave of Meissen, Elector and Duke of Saxony. He was the son of the Landgrave of Thuringia, and was made elector and duke of Saxony in 1423 as a reward for his services to the emperor in the Hussite war. His army was defeated by the Hussites at Aussig in 1426. He founded the University of Leipsic in 1409.

Frederick II., surnamed "The Meek." Born Aug. 22, 1411; died at Leipsic, Sept. 7, 1464. Elector and Duke of Saxony, son of Frederick I., whom he succeeded in 1428.

Frederick III., surnamed "The Wise." Born at Torgau, Prussia, Jan. 17, 1463; died at Annaburg, near Torgau, May 5, 1525. Elector of Saxony. He succeeded to the electorate in 1486; founded the University of Wittenberg in 1502; declined the imperial crown and advocated the election of Charles V. in 1519; and protected Luther, who was seized by his order when returning from Worms, where he had been proscribed, and secreted in the castle of Wartburg (1521-22).

Frederick I. Born at Treptow, Farther Pomerania, Nov. 6, 1754; died Oct. 30, 1816. King of Württemberg. He succeeded his father Frederick Eugene as duke of Württemberg in 1797. Having taken part in the second coalition against France, he was deprived by the peace of Lunéville (Feb. 9, 1801) of his possessions on the left bank of the Rhine, for which he was indemnified by a number of monasteries, abbeys, and imperial cities (including Reutlingen, Esslingen, and Heilbronn), and the title of elector. He sided with Napoleon against the third coalition, with the result that his dominions were increased by cessions from Austria and recognized as a kingdom by the peace of Presburg, Dec. 26, 1805. He joined the Confederation of the Rhine July 12, 1806. After the defeat of Napoleon at the battle of Leipsic, he joined the Allies (Nov. 6, 1813). The treaty of Vienna left him in undisturbed possession of his acquisitions.

Frederick, Prince of Wales. See Frederick Louis.

Frederick. In Shakspeare's "As you Like it," the usurping brother of the exiled duke.

Frederick, or Frederick City. A city and the capital of Frederick County, Maryland, 41 miles west by north of Baltimore; the seat of Frederick College. Population (1890), 8,193.

Frederick Augustus I., surnamed "The Just." Born at Dresden, Dec. 23, 1750; died at Dresden, May 5, 1827. King of Saxony. He succeeded his father Frederick Christian as elector in 1763; sided with Prussia and Bavaria against Austria in the War of the Bavarian Succession 1778-79; allied himself with Prussia and Russia against France in 1806; concluded a separate treaty of peace with Napoleon at Posen, Dec. 11, 1806, in accordance with which he entered the Confederation of the Rhine with the title of king; supported Napoleon at the battle of Leipsic in 1813; and was compelled to cede a large part of Saxony to Prussia at the Congress of Vienna in 1815.

Frederick Augustus II. Born May 18, 1797; died in Tyrol, Aug. 9, 1854. King of Saxony. He became co-regent in 1820 with his uncle Anton, whom he succeeded in 1836. He suppressed a revolutionary outbreak in 1849 by means of Prussian troops.

Frederick Augustus. Born at St. James's Palace, London, Aug. 16, 1763; died Jan. 5, 1827. Duke of York and Albany, second son of George III. He was created duke of York and Albany in 1784; commanded the British contingent in the campaigns of 1793-95 in Flanders against the French; was made commander-in-chief of the British army in 1798; invaded Holland in conjunction with the Russians in 1799; and signed the humiliating convention of Alkmaar in 1801, in consequence of an entanglement with Mrs. Mary Anne Clarke, who accepted bribes from officers in return for promises of promotion; but was restored in 1811.

Frederick Charles, Prince of Prussia. Born at Berlin, March 20, 1828; died near Potsdam, Prussia, June 15, 1885. A Prussian general, nephew of William I. of Prussia. He fought with distinction in the war of Prussia and Austria against Denmark in 1864; commanded the first army in the war against Austria in 1866; and commanded the second army in the war against France, 1870-71, entering Metz and Orléans in 1870 and Le Mans in 1871. He was surnamed "the Red Prince."

Frederick Francis II. Born Feb. 28, 1823; died at Schwerin, Germany, April 15, 1883. Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. He succeeded to the grand duchy in 1842; became a general in the Prussian military service in the same year; fought under Baron von Wrangel in the war of Prussia and Austria against Denmark in 1864; commanded a reserve army corps in the war against Austria in 1866; joined the North German Confederation in 1866; and bore an important part in the war against France, 1870-71. His grand duchy became a member of the German Empire in 1871.

Frederick Louis. Born at Hannover, Jan. 6, 1707; died at Leicester House, London, March 20, 1751. Prince of Wales 1729-51, eldest son of George II. He married Augusta, daughter of Frederick, duke of Saxe-Gotha, in 1736, and was father of George III. He was the leader of the opposition against Walpole and the king.

Fredericksburg (fred'ér-iks-bérg). A city in Spottsylvania County, Virginia, 50 miles southwest of Washington. Here, Dec. 13, 1862, was fought one of the severest battles of the Civil War. The Confederates (about 80,000) under Lee, occupying a strong position on the heights, repulsed an attack made on them by the Federals (about 110,000) under Burnside. The Confederate losses amounted to 608 killed, 4,116 wounded, and 673 captured or missing (total, 5,377); the Federal losses amounted to 1,284 killed, 9,600 wounded, and 1,769 captured or missing (total, 12,653). Population (1890), 4,528.

Frederick William, called "The Great Elector." Born at Berlin, Feb. 16, 1620; died April 29, 1688. Elector of Brandenburg 1640-88, son of George William. At his accession he found his dominions wasted by the Thirty Years' War, which was then in progress. By skilful diplomacy and great economy in other directions, he succeeded in ridding his country of foreign soldiery and in raising an army of 30,000 men, which secured for him respectful treatment at the peace of Westphalia in 1648. In 1655, on the outbreak of war between Sweden and Poland, he took sides with the former power against the latter. The Poles were defeated at Warsaw in 1656, and were forced in 1657 to purchase his assistance by recognizing the independence of the duchy of Prussia, which he held as a fief of Poland. He joined an alliance with Holland in 1672, with a view to frustrating the designs of Louis XIV. against that country; an alliance which was subsequently joined by the emperor and Spain. In 1675 at Fehrbellin he defeated the Swedes, who had invaded Brandenburg as the allies of France; but although he made large conquests in Swedish Pomerania, he was compelled by France to return them at the separate peace of St. Germain-en-Laye (1679) in return for the reversion of East Friesland.

Frederick William. Born Aug. 20, 1802; died at Horowitz, near Prague, Jan. 6, 1875. Elector of Hesse. He succeeded to the electorate in 1847, and sided with Austria in the Austro-Prussian war (1866), with the result that his electorate was incorporated with Prussia by the peace of Prague, Aug. 23, 1866.

Frederick William I. Born Aug. 14, 1688; died May 31, 1740. King of Prussia 1713-40, son of Frederick I. He acquired Stettin and part of Pomerania by the peace of Stockholm in 1720, at the close of the Northern War, in which he had taken part against Sweden; and by the establishment of a formidable army laid the foundation of Prussia's military power.

Frederick William II. Born Sept. 25, 1744; died Nov. 16, 1797. King of Prussia 1786-97, nephew of Frederick the Great. He formed an alliance with Austria in 1792 for the purpose of restoring Louis XVI. of France, but concluded the separate peace of Basel with the revolutionary government of France in 1795. He took part in the second and third partitions of Poland in 1793 and 1795 respectively.

Frederick William III. Born Aug. 3, 1770; died June 7, 1840. King of Prussia 1797-1840, son of Frederick William II. He refused to join the third coalition against France in 1805; declared war against France in 1806; signed the treaty of Tilsit in 1807; joined France against Russia in 1812; joined in the War of Liberation in 1813; was present at the Congress of Vienna in 1815; and joined the Holy Alliance in 1815.

Frederick William IV. Born Oct. 15, 1795; died at Sans Souci, near Potsdam, Prussia, Jan. 2, 1861. King of Prussia 1840-61, son of Frederick William III. He was compelled by a revolutionary movement in 1848 to grant a constitution, and in 1849 declined the imperial crown offered him by the German National Assembly at Frankfurt. As he was rendered incompetent to reign by a serious malady, his brother (afterward William I.) became regent in 1858.

Frederick William, Crown Prince of the German Empire and of Prussia. See Frederick III., German emperor.

Friday (fri'dä). [From Frigga, a Teutonic goddess, in part identified with the Roman Venus, AS. Frige dæg, etc., being a translation of the Roman name of this day, dies Veneris, or Veneris dies.] The sixth day of the week. Friday is the Mohammedan Sabbath, or "day of assembly." It is said in the Mohammedan traditions to have been established by divine command as a day of worship for Jew and Christian alike, as being the day on which Adam was created and received into paradise, the day on which he was expelled from it, the day on which he repented, and the day on which he died. It will, according to the same traditions, be the day of the resurrection. In the Roman and Eastern and Anglican churches, all Fridays except Christmas day (when it occurs on Friday) are generally observed as fasts of obligation or days of abstinence, in memory of the crucifixion of Christ, an event which is especially commemorated annually on Good Friday. In most Christian nations Friday is popularly regarded with superstition, and is considered an unlucky day for beginning any enterprise. To spill more or less salt on Friday is considered an especially bad omen. Until recently it was common for criminals under sentence of capital punishment to be executed on Friday: hence Friday is sometimes called hangman's day.

Friday. The native attendant of Robinson Crusoe, in Defoe's novel of that name. He was so named by his master because the latter had saved him from death on that day.

He commanded an expedition in search of the northwest passage in 1576, on which he discovered the bay since known as Frobisher Bay. One of his sailors having brought home a piece of ore supposed to contain gold, he was sent out again in command of two expeditions in search of gold, 1577-78. On both occasions, however, the ore which he brought home proved to be worthless. He fought with distinction against the Great Armada in 1588.

Frobisher Bay. An arm of the ocean extending about 200 miles into Baffin Land, between Hudson Strait and Cumberland Sound. It was until recently called Frobisher Strait.

Frog (frog), Nicholas or Nic. A nickname for the Dutch in Arbutnot's "Law is a Bottomless Pit," in "The History of John Bull."

Frogmore (frog'mör) Lodge. A mansion near Windsor Castle, England. It was the residence of Queen Victoria's mother, and in the grounds is the mausoleum erected by the queen to her husband.

Frogs (frogz), The. A famous comedy by Aristophanes. It was exhibited in 405 B. C., and obtained the first prize.

The plot [of "The Frogs"] is separated into two parts: first, the adventures of Dionysus on his journey to Hades in search of a good poet, Sophocles and Euripides being lately dead; and secondly, the poetical contest of Æschylus and Euripides, and the final victory of Æschylus. These subjects are logically though loosely connected together, but remind us strongly of the dramatic economy of the very poet whom Aristophanes is here attacking so vehemently. No analysis can reproduce the real brilliancy of the piece, which consists in all manner of comic situations, repartees, parodies, and unexpected blunders.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 457.

Fröhlich (frë'lich), Abraham Emanuel. Born at Brugg, Aargau, Switzerland, Feb. 1, 1796; died at Baden, Aargau, Dec. 1, 1865. A German-Swiss poet, best known as a writer of fables (published 1825).

Frohsdorf (fröz'dorf). A village and castle about 30 miles south of Vienna. It is noted as having been the headquarters of the French Legitimist party from 1844 until the death of the Comte de Chambord in 1833.

Froissart (froi'särt; F. pron. frwä-sär'). Jean. Born at Valenciennes, 1337; died at Chinay about 1410. A celebrated French chronicler. Nothing is known of his family or early life beyond the few facts to be gleaned from his own writings. In 1360 he was welcomed to England by his countrywoman Queen Philippa of Hainaut, wife of Edward III. In 1365 he visited Scotland, and in May, 1368, he was at Milan in the company of Petrarch and Chancer. About 1372, after several years spent in travel, Froissart decided to enter the church. The period of his activity as a chronicler extends from 1367 to 1400. His great work is the "Chronique de France, d'Angleterre, d'Escoce et d'Espagne," relating the events of history from 1325 till 1400. It was published before the close of the 15th century, and was thus among the first books to be printed. One of the 6 editions of the 16th century was by Denis Sauvay, historian to Henry II. of France. The best editions in modern times are by Kerwyn de Lettenhove, in 25 volumes (1867-77), and by Siméon Luce, incomplete, in 8 volumes (1860-88).

Froissart, though inferior to Lesceur, and though far less remarkable as a poet than as a prose writer, can fairly hold his own with Deschamps and Machault, while he has the advantage of being easily accessible. The later part of his life having been given up to history, he is not quite so voluminous in verse as his two predecessors. Yet, if the attribution to him of the "Cour d'Amour" and the "Trésor Amoureux" be correct, he has left some 40,000 or 50,000 lines. The bulk of his work consists of long poems in the allegorical courtship of the time, interspersed with shorter lyrical pieces in the prevailing forms. One of these poems, the "Buisson de Jonece," is interesting because of its autobiographical details; and some shorter pieces approaching more nearly to the Fabliau style, "Le Dit au Florin," "Le Débat du Cheval et du Lévrier," etc., are sprightly and agreeable enough.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 104.

Frolic (frol'ik), Sir Frederick. A character in Etherege's comedy "The Comical Revenge."

He (Sir Frederick Frolic) is a man of quality, who can fight at need with spirit and firmness of nerve, but whose customary occupation is the pursuit of pleasure without dignity and without reflection.

Fromentin (frö-môn-tain'), Eugène. Born at St.-Maurice, near La Rochelle, Oct. 24, 1820; died there, Aug. 27, 1876. A noted French genre painter, a pupil of Rémond and Cabat. He visited Algiers 1846-48 and 1852-53, and brought home many sketches from which he painted his characteristic pictures of Oriental life. He was also the author of "Doménique," a successful romance, and of works on art and travel. He was awarded a second-class medal in 1849 and 1867, and a first-class in 1850. He became a member of the Legion of Honor in 1859.

Fronde (frond), The. [F., lit. 'a sling.'] In French history, the name of a party which during the minority of Louis XIV. waged civil war against the court party, on account of the humiliations inflicted on the high nobility and the heavy fiscal impositions laid on the people. The movement began with the resistance of the Parliament of Paris to the measures of the minister Mazarin, and was sarcastically called by one of his supporters there "the war of the fronde," in allusion to the use of the sling then common among the street-boys of Paris. The contest continued from 1648 to 1652, during which Mazarin was driven from power, but soon restored. The opposition to him had degenerated into a course of selfish intrigue and party strife, whence the name frondeur became a term of political reproach.

Front de Bœuf (frôn dé bœf), Sir Reginald. In Scott's novel "Ivanhoe," a brutal and fierce Norman baron who uses his castle of Torquilstone to imprison and torture his enemies, and finally perishes in its flames.

Frontenac (frönt-näk'), Comte Louis de Buade de. Born in France, 1621; died at Quebec, Nov. 28, 1698. A French colonial officer, governor of Canada 1672-82 and 1689-98.

Frontenac was full of faults; but it is not through these that his memory has survived him. He was domineering, arbitrary, intolerant of opposition, irascible, vehement in prejudice, often wayward, perverse, and jealous; a persecutor of those who crossed him; yet capable, by fits, of moderation and a magnanimous lenity; and gifted with a rare charm — not always exerted — to win the attachment of men; versed in books, polished in courts and salons; without fear, incapable of repose, keen and broad of sight, clear in judgment, prompt in decision, fruitful in resources, unshaken when others despaired; a sure breeder of storms in time of peace, but in time of calamity and danger a tower of strength. His early career in America was beset with ire and enmity; but admiration and gratitade hailed him at its close: for it was he who saved the colony and led it triumphant from an abyss of ruin.

Parkman, Discovery of the Great West, p. 47.

Frontino (fron-tō'nō). The name of the horse which Brunello stole from Sacripant and gave to Rogero, and on which the latter overthrew all his opponents. He is mentioned both by Boiardo and Ariosto in the Orlando poems.

Fronto (fron'tō), Marcus Cornelius. Born at Cirta, Numidia; died about 175 A. D. A Roman rhetorician and orator. A collection of his letters was edited by Naber in 1867.

The most characteristic figure of this time is the rhetorician M. Cornelius Fronto of Cirta (probably a. 100-175 A. D.), who held under Hadrian a conspicuous position as an orator, and under Antoninus Pius taught M. Aurelius and L. Verus. He was consul 143 A. D. We possess by him above all the greater part of his correspondence with M. Aurelius both as heir apparent and as emperor. The rhetorician appears in these letters conceited, insipid, laboured, with little genius and much want of taste and pretence, but well informed and an enthusiastic admirer of early Roman literature, which he zealously endeavours to make more generally known; at the same time his character appears honourable, upright, and independent; he never abuses his influential position, is faithful as a husband and friend, and gives fatherly advice to his pupils, whose gratitude subsequently surrounded his name with a brilliant lustre.

Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), II. 213.

Front Range (frunt rānj). The easternmost range of the Rocky Mountains in the State of Colorado.

There he came under the influence of the Tractarian movement, his brother Richard Hurrell Froude being one of its leaders. He became fellow of Exeter in 1842, and took deacon's orders in 1844. For some time he was connected with the High-Church party under Newman. A change in his views caused him to abandon his fellowship and his profession, and he devoted himself entirely to literature, formally resigning his deacon's orders in 1872. In the same year he lectured in the United States on the relations between England and Ireland. In 1874 he was sent on a mission to the Cape of Good Hope. He afterward went to Australia and the West Indies. In 1892 he was elected regius professor of modern history at Oriel College, Oxford, as successor to Freeman. He wrote a "History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada" (1856-70), "The English in Ireland in the Eighteenth Century" (1873-74), "Short Studies on Great Subjects" (1867-77), "Cæsar" (1879), "Oceana" (1886), "The Two Chiefs of Danaboy," a romance (1889), "Life of Lord Beaconsfield" (1890), etc. As executor of Carlyle he published "Reminiscences of Carlyle" (1881), "Life of Thomas Carlyle" (1882).

Fuad Pasha (fō'äd pash'ä), Mehemmed (Mehmed). Born at Constantinople, Jan. 17, 1814; died at Nice, France, Feb. 12, 1869. A noted Turkish statesman. He abandoned in 1835 the practice of medicine for a diplomatic career. In 1843 he was appointed Ottoman commissioner to settle the revolutionary disputes in the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia. He became minister of foreign affairs in 1852.

Owing to the attitude of Russia, whose ill will he is said to have excited by a publication on the question of the holy sepulchers, he resigned in the spring of 1853, but resumed office on the outbreak of the Crimean war later in the same year. He became grand vizir in 1861, a post which he retained until 1866. He introduced European improvements for the sake of the material advantages to be gained from them, but in doing so increased the financial difficulties of the Porte by the adoption of a wasteful and unsound financial policy.

There has been no eruption since 1707. It is a resort of pilgrims, and figures largely in Japanese art. Height, 12,365 feet.

Fulah, or Fula (fö'lä), plural Fulbe. [Light brown, red.] A great African nation, scattered through the Sudan from Senegal to Wadai, and south to Adamawa: their language is called Fulfulde. They are variously classed with the Hamites, the negroes, and, in the Nuba-Fulah group, with the Nubas of the Nile valley. They seem to be essentially Hamitic, having branched off from the Berbers or the Somal. Their color is reddish-brown, nose straight, lips regular, hair curly. Where they are mixed with the negroes the skin is darker, the lips are thicker, the hair is more bushy, and the temperament more merry. In their pure state they are proud and grave. The Futa-Toro or Toucouleurs are a mixture of Fulah and Woloff. Pastoral, industrious, warlike, and intelligent, they rule over the agricultural negro tribes of the Sudan. They are dominant in Gando, Sokoto, Adamawa, Massina, Segu, Kaarta, and Futa-Jallon. In Bornu, Baghirmi, and Wadai they are not strong enough to command. In religion they are Mohammedans, but tolerant, except the fanatic Toucouleurs. They have a national literature, written with Arabic characters. It was in the beginning of this century, under their poet and leader Osman dan Fodio, that they revolutionized the Sudan, spreading Islam, and founding their great kingdoms, which are not yet on the wane. Their language is peculiar by its initial formations. It is spoken in its purest form in Massina and Futa-Toro. Owing to admixtures of neighboring negro languages and Arabic, five dialects are distinguished according to the countries where they are spoken: namely, Futa-Jalon, Futa-Toro, Sokoto, Hausa, and Bornu. Also called Pul, Felata, Filani.

Fulbe. See Fulah.

Fulton. An American war-ship of 38 tons rating, built at New York in 1815. She was designed by Robert Fulton, and was the first war-ship to be propelled by steam. She had central paddle-wheels protected by a double hull, and relied for effective attack not on her broadside of small caliber, but upon a pivoted 100-pounder columbiad. Her bow was strengthened into a ram. She was the prototype of the modern ironclad with its few heavy guns and ram.

Fulton, Robert. Born at Little Britain, Pa., 1765; died at New York, Feb. 24, 1815. An American engineer and inventor. He went to London in 1786 with a view to completing his education as a portrait and landscape-painter under the instruction of Benjamin West, in whose family he remained several years. He abandoned painting in 1793, and devoted himself to civil and mechanical engineering. He removed to Paris in 1794. From 1797 to 1805 he made a number of indifferently successful experiments with a submarine boat and a torpedo, most of which were conducted under the patronage of the French and British governments. He launched a steamboat on the Seine in 1803, which sank from faulty construction. A new boat built with the old machinery made a successful trial trip on the Seine Aug. 9, 1803. Having returned to America in 1806, he built the steamboat Clermont, which began a successful trial trip from New York to Albany on the Hudson River, Aug. 11, 1807. This boat was followed by numerous river-steamers and ferry-boats built under his supervision. In 1815 he launched the war-steamer Fulton. He married in 1806 Harriet, daughter of Walter Livingston, by whom he had four children.

Fuzuli. See the extract.

Up to this time all Ottoman writings had been more or less rugged and unpolished; but in the reign of Selim's son, Suleyman I. (1520-1566), a new era began. Two great poets, Fuzuli and Baki, make their appearance about the same time: the one in the east, the other in the west, of the now far-extending empire. Fuzuli of Baghdad, one of the four great poets of the old Turkish school, is the first writer of real eminence who rose in the Ottoman dominions. None of his predecessors in any way approaches him; and although his work is in the Persian style and taste, he is no servile copier; on the contrary, he struck out for himself a new path, one hitherto untrodden by either Turk or Persian. His chief characteristic is an intense and passionate earnestness, which sometimes betrays him into extravagances; and although few Turkish poets are in one way more artificial than he, few seem to speak more directly from the heart. His best-known works consist of his "Divan," or collection of ghazels, and a poem on the love of Leyli and Mejnun; he has besides some prose writings, which are hardly inferior to his verse. Poole, story of Turkey, p. 312.

His poetry is characterized by its finish of form and loftiness of thought. His poems are mostly serious, sometimes gloomy. The most important of these is his "Royal Crown" ("Kether Malkuth"), a religio-philosophical meditation, which has been translated into almost every European language. Many of his numerous religious poems have been incorporated in the Jewish liturgy. Of his philosophical works, written in Arabic, the principal one is the "Fountain of Life," based on the Neoplatonic system. Its Latin translation, "Fons Vite," is often quoted by Albert the Great, Thomas Aquinas, Giordano Bruno, and others. He also wrote an ethical work, "Introduction for the Attaining of Good Habits of the Soul" ("Tikun Midot ha-Nefesh"), and a collection of proverbs ("Selection of Pearls," "Mibhar ha-Peninim").

Gades (gä'déz), or Gadeira (ga-di'rä). [L. Gades, Gr. Γάδαιρα (pl.), Γάδειρος, orig. Phen., 'enclosure.'] The remotest colony of the Phœnicians in the west. It was founded about 1100 B. C. beyond Gibraltar at the northwestern extremity of an island, about 12 miles long, which lies off the western coast of Spain, and occupied almost exactly the same site as the modern Cadiz. It was the headquarters of the western commerce of the Phœnicians, and contained various temples of the Phœnician gods. See Cadiz.

Gades or Cadiz, which has kept its name and its unbroken position as a great city from an earlier time than any other city in Europe. Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 35.

Of these by far the most important was Gadeira. This town was situated at the northwestern extremity of an island, about twelve miles long, which lies off the western coast of Spain a little outside the straits. A narrow channel, more like a river than an arm of the sea, and now spanned by a bridge, separates the island from the shore, expanding, however, towards its northern end, where it forms itself into a land-locked bay, capable of containing all the navies of the world. Two islets lie across the mouth of the channel at this end, and effectually prevent the entrance of the long rolling waves from the Atlantic. The original city was small, and enclosed within a strong wall, whence the name "Gadir" or "Gadeira," which meant in the Phœnician language "an enclosure" or "a fortified place." It occupied almost exactly the site of the modern Cadiz, being spread over the northern end of the island, the little islet of the Trocadero, and ultimately over a portion of the opposite coast. It contained temples of El, Melkarth, and Ashtoreth or Astarté.

Rauflinson, Thuenela, p. 67.

Gadhels (gad'elz). [See Gael.] That branch of the Celtic race which comprises the Erse of Ireland, the Gaels of Scotland, and the Manx of the Isle of Man, as distinguished from the Cymric branch. See Cymry. Ireland was the first home of the Gaelic branch, whence it spread to Scotland in the 6th century—a portion of the branch, under the name of Scots, having then settled in Argyll. The Scots ultimately became the dominant race, the Picts, an earlier and probably a Cymric race, being lost in them.

After the old way of inventing persons to explain the names of tribes, the name of Gaelic was derived by the ancient Irish clergy from a Gaedhal or Gadelas who lived in the time of Moses. His father, Nial, had married a daughter of that Pharaoh who, in pursuit of the Israelites, was drowned in the Red Sea, and called her Scota because he was himself a Scythian. Their son was said to have been called Gaodhal as a lover of learning, from gaith, which is in Irish "learning," and däl, which is in Irish "love." Morley, English Writers, I. 166.

Gainsborough, Thomas. Born at Sudbury, Suffolk, 1727; died at London, Aug. 2, 1788.

A noted English painter, son of a wool manufacturer. He went to London in his fifteenth year, and studied with Gravelot, an engraver and teacher of drawing, and also at St. Martin's Lane Academy, and with Frank Hayman. In 1745 he returned to Sudbury, where he set up a studio as portrait-painter. He soon removed to Ipswich, remaining there till 1760, when he went to Bath. At the foundation of the Royal Academy in 1768 Gainsborough was one of the original 36 members. In 1774 he left Bath for London. In 1779 he was at the height of his fame. From 1769 to 1783 (except 1772-76) he was a constant exhibitor at the Royal Academy. He sent nothing to the exhibitions after that year, owing to a disagreement with the council. He painted over 300 pictures, more than 220 being portraits. In the National Gallery are his "Musidora," "The Market Cart," "The Watering Place," "Gainsborough's Forest," etc., and five portraits, one of them being Mrs. Siddons. There are five of his portraits in the Dulwich Gallery, and others also in the National Portrait Gallery, at Hampton Court, at Buckingham Palace, and at Grosvenor House, where is the celebrated "Blue Boy," a portrait of Master Buttolph. "Gainsborough probably painted more than one 'Blue Boy,' and there are many copies, but the picture belonging to the Duke of Westminster (in the Grosvenor Gallery) is the most famous of those to which the name has been given." (Dict. Nat. Biog.) He painted George III. eight times. The famous portrait of the Duchess of Devonshire was painted in 1783. The "Girl with Figs" (1782) was purchased by Sir Joshua Reynolds. There are also pictures of his in the galleries of Dublin, Glasgow, Edinburgh, etc.

Galacz. See Galatz.

Galahad (gal'a-had), Sir. The noblest and purest knight of the Round Table. The character was invented by Walter Map in the "Quest of the Grail."

Sir Galahad, Map's ideal knight, was the son of his L'Ancelet and Elaine. The son and namesake of Joseph of Arimathea, bishop Joseph to whom the Holy Dish was bequeathed, first instituted the Order of the Round Table. The initiated at their festivals sat as apostle knights round the table, with the Holy Grail in the midst, leaving one seat vacant as that which the Lord had occupied, and which was reserved for a descendant of Joseph, named Galahad. Whatever man else attempted to sit in the place of Galahad the earth swallowed. It was called therefore the Siege (seat) Perilous. When he became sinful, the Holy Grail, visible only to pure eyes, disappeared. On its recovery depended the honour and peace of England, but only Sir Galahad, who at the appointed time was brought to the knights by a mysterious old man clothed in white, and placed in the Siege Perilous—only the pure Sir Galahad succeeded in the quest.

Morley, English Writers, III. 142.

Galaor (gal'a-ör). The brother of Amadis de Gaul. See Amadis.

Galapagos (gal-a-pā'gos or gā-lā'pā-gōs) Islands. ["Tortoise Islands."] A group of volcanic islands in the Pacific, west of Ecuador, situated near the equator in long. 89°–92° W. Of the 10 principal islands Albemarle is the largest. They were formerly noted for tortoises (Sp. galapagos), and are remarkable for peculiarities of the fauna and flora. They have been in possession of Ecuador since 1832. They were investigated by Darwin in his voyage in the Beagle. Area, 2,490 square miles. Population, about 200.

She hid herself among the willows in order to be followed. In literature, a type of coquetry.—3. A statue animated by Venus in answer to the prayer of Pygmalion. She has nothing to do with the legend of Acis and Galatea. See Pygmalion and Galatea.

Galatea. 1. A prose pastoral with lyrics, by Cervantes, said to have been inspired by the lady who afterward became his wife. It was written about 1583. A second part was promised, but was not written.

Like other works of the same sort, the Galatea [of Cervantes] is founded on an affection which can never be successful, and which, in this particular instance, from the nowise accumulation and involution of the stories in its fable, from the conceited metaphysics with which it is disfigured, and from the poor poetry profusely scattered through it, is more than usually unfortunate. Perhaps no one of the many pastoral tales produced in Spain in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries fails so much in the tone it should maintain. Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 99.

2. A play by John Lyly, printed in 1592.—3. A romantic pastoral by Florian, imitated from Cervantes, published in 1783.

Galatea. A steel cutter yacht designed by J. Beaver-Webb and launched at Port Glasgow, May, 1885. Her dimensions are: length over all, 102.60 feet; length at load water-line, 86.80; beam, 15; beam (load water-line), 15; draught, 13.50; displacement, 157.63 tons. She challenged for the America's cup, and was beaten by the Mayflower in two races, Sept. 7 and Sept. 9, 1886.

Galatea, Triumph of. A famous fresco by Raphael (1514), in the Villa Farnesina, Rome. Galatea, lightly draped, is drawn over the tranquil sea by dolphins, attended by nymphs and sea-gods. Cupids in the air above are piercing with their arrows members of her train.

Galatée (gā-lā-tā'). [F., 'Galatea.'] An opera by Massé, first produced at Paris in 1852. This is the story of Pygmalion and Galatea.

Galatia (gā-lā'shiā). [L. Galatia, Gr. Γαλατία, considered to be ult. connected with Gallia, Gaul.] 1. In ancient geography, a division of Asia Minor, lying between Bithynia and Paphlagonia on the north, Pontus on the east, Cappadocia and Lyeaonia on the south, and Phrygia on the west; formerly a part of Phrygia. It was conquered and settled by a confederation of Gallic tribes in the 3d century B. C., and was made a Roman province in 25 B. C. Theodosius subdivided it into Galatia Prima and Galatia Secunda.

2. A name of Gaul: called specifically Celtic or Roman Galatia.

Galatians (gā-lā'shianz), Epistle to the. One of the epistles of the apostle Paul, written to the Galatian churches probably about A. D. 56. Its chief contents are a vindication of Paul's authority as an apostle, a plea for the principle of justification by faith, and a concluding exhortation.

Galba (gal'bā), Servius Sulpicius. Born Dec. 24, 3 B. C.; died at Rome, Jan. 15, A. D. 69. A Roman emperor. He became pretor in 20 and consul in 33; carried on a war in Gaul against the Germans in 39; and became governor of Africa in 45, and governor of Hispania Tarraconensis in 61. In 68, learning that Nero had given secret orders for his assassination, he joined the insurrection of C. Julius Vindex, and was proclaimed emperor. Vindex was defeated, and killed himself, but Galba ascended the throne in consequence of a revolt in his favor of the pretorians at Rome. His refusal of the donatives which had been promised in his name, and his adoption of Piso Licinianus as his successor instead of Salvius Otho who had hoped to be appointed, provoked a revolt among the pretorians which resulted in his assassination and the elevation of Otho.

Gale (gāl), Roger. Born 1672; died June 25, 1744. An English antiquary, son of Thomas Gale, dean of York.

Gale, Theophilus. Born at King's Teignton, Devonshire, England, 1628; died at Newington, London, in Feb. or March, 1678. An English nonconformist divine. Galicia (ga-lish'iā; Sp. pron. gā-lē'thē-ā). [L. Gallicia, from Gallaci, also Callaci, a Celtic tribe.] An ancient province and captaincy-general in northwestern Spain. It is bounded by the ocean on the north and west, Asturias and Leon on the east, and Portugal on the south, and comprises the modern provinces of Coruña, Lugo, Orense, and Pontevedra. It belonged to the Suevi in the 5th and 6th centuries; later it was part of the Gothic kingdom, and then it fell to the Moors. It became a dependency of Leon, and thereforward followed the fortunes of Leon and Castile, except about 1065-73, when it was an independent kingdom.

Galicia (ga-lish'iā). [G. Galizien, Pol. Halicz.] A crownland of the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary. Capital, Lemberg. It comprises the titular kingdoms of Galicia and Lodomeria, the grand duchy of Cracow, and the duchies of Auschwitz and Zator. It is bounded by Russia (partly separated by the Vistula) on the north, Russia on the east, Bukowina on the south-east, Hungary (separated by the Carpathians) on the south-west and south, and Austrian Silesia and Prussia on the northwest. The Carpathians occupy the south; in the north and east are plains. Galicia belongs mostly to the basins of the Vistula and Dniester. It produces grain and timber in large quantities, and there are petroleum, coal, iron, lead, zinc, and salt-mines. It sends 63 representatives to the Austrian Reichsrath, and has a diet of 151 members. The inhabitants are largely Slavs—Poles in the west, Ruthenians in the east—but over 10 per cent. are Jews, and there are 100,000 Germans. The religions are the Roman Catholic and Greek. The principalities of Halicz and Vladimir (Galicia and Lodomeria) became prominent in the 12th century, and were involved in the affairs of Hungary, Poland, and Russia. Galicia was acquired by Poland in the 14th century, and by Austria in 1772. The republic of Cracow was formed in 1815 and suppressed in 1846. Galicia was the scene of a bloody insurrection of the peasantry against the Polish nobility in 1846. Area, 30,307 square miles. Population (1890), 6,607,816.

Galignani (gā-lēn-yā'nē), John Anthony. Born at London, Oct. 13, 1796; died at Paris, Dec. 31, 1873. Galignani, William. Born at London, March 10, 1798; died at Paris, Dec. 12, 1882. French publishers. Their father, Giovanni Antonio Galiziano, returned to Paris shortly after 1795, and in 1801 he started a monthly which soon became a weekly paper. In 1814 he began to issue guide-books, and started "Galignani's Messenger," which circulated widely among English residents on the Continent. The sons carried on the publishing business after their father's death in 1821, and issued reprints of many English books. In 1852 William was naturalized, Anthony remaining a British subject. In 1852 their reprints were stopped by the copyright treaty. They were liberal contributors to British charities, and built a hospital at Neuilly for indigent English. William left money and a site at Neuilly to build the Retraite Galignani Frères for a hundred printers, booksellers, etc., or their families. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Galilee (gal'i-lē). In the Roman period, the northernmost division of Palestine. It was bounded by Phenicia and Cele-Syria on the north, the Jordan valley on the east, Samaria on the south, and the Mediterranean and Phenicia on the west. It comprised Upper Galilee (in the north) and Lower Galilee (in the south), and corresponded to the ancient territories of Asher, Naphtali, Zebulon, and part of Issachar. It now belongs to Turkey.

Gallienus (gal-i-ë'nus), Publius Licinius Valerianus Egnatius. Died at Milan, 268. A Roman emperor, son of Valerian. He was admitted to a share in the government on the elevation of his father in 254, and became sole emperor on the capture of the latter by the Persians in 260. He made no effort to secure the release of his father, but devoted himself to a life of indolence and profligacy, while the frontiers of the empire were everywhere invaded by the barbarians, especially by the Goths and the Persians. He appears to have undertaken a tardy expedition against the former in 267, when he was recalled by the insurrection of Aureolus, whom he shut up in Milan. He was murdered by his own soldiers while pressing the siege of that city.

All these inroads of the Goths occurred under the reign of the Emperor Gallienus, that celebrated poco curante who took both the captivity of his father (Valerian) and the rapid dismemberment of his Empire with such charming composure and serenity. "Egypt," said one of his ministers to him, "has revolted." "What of that? Cannot we dispense with Egyptian flax?" "Fearful earthquakes have happened in Asia Minor, and the Goths are ravaging all the country." "But cannot we do without Lydian salt-petre?" "When Gall was lost he gave a merry laugh and said, "Do you think the Republic will be in danger if the Consuls' robes cannot be made of the Gaulish tartan?" Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 59.

Gama, Vasco da. Born at Sines, Alemtejo, Portugal, about 1469; died in Cochin, India, Dec. 24, 1524. A celebrated Portuguese navigator. Having been appointed to the command of an expedition fitted out by Emanuel of Portugal with a view to discovering an ocean route to the East Indies, he sailed from Lisbon, probably July 8, 1497, doubled the Cape of Good Hope Nov. 20 or 22, 1497, arrived at Calicut on the Malabar coast of India, May 20, 1498, and returned to Lisbon in Sept., 1499. He commanded a second expedition to India in 1502-03, during which he established a factory in Mozambique. He was made viceroy of India in 1524. His voyage is celebrated in the "Lusiad" of Camoens.

Gamala (gam'a-lā). A city in Galilee, opposite Tiberias, on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee. It stood on a hill which was compared to the back of a camel, from which possibly its name is derived (Heb. gamāl, camel). It was fortified, and formed one of the centers of insurrection during the war of Judaea with Rome. It is identified with the modern Qal'at el-Hoqa.

Gamaliel (ga-mā'li-el). [Heb., 'my rewarder is God.'] There are several Gamaliels mentioned in the Talmud as descendants of Hillel, who held the dignity of president of the Sanhedrin and of patriarch (nasi) of the Jewish community in Palestine after the fall of Jerusalem. See Hillel. Gamaliel "the elder" was the grandson of Hillel. The laws emanating from him breathe a mild and liberal spirit. He dissuaded the Jews from taking strict measures against the apostles (Acts v. 34), and is described as "a doctor of the law, had in honor of all the people." He was a teacher of the apostle Paul. Another Gamaliel, grandson of the preceding, president of the Sanhedrin 80-118 A. D., was the first to assume the title of patriarch. He maintained his authority with great energy and even severity, was a good mathematician, and was favorable to the study of Greek.

Gamaliel Pickle. See Peregrine Pickle.

Gamarra (gä-mär'rá), Agustin. Born at Cuzeo, Aug. 27, 1785; killed at the battle of Yngavi, in northern Bolivia, Nov. 20, 1841. A Peruvian general. He served first against the patriots, joined them in 1821, and was prominent during the remainder of the war for independence. In 1828 he invaded Bolivia by order of Lamar, forced the treaty of Piquiza, and was made grand marshal. In June, 1829, he aided in the deposition of Lamar, and was made provisional president, holding the office until Dec. 20, 1833. In the complicated turmoils of 1834-35 Gamarra took a prominent part, and was finally driven from the country. In 1837 he joined the Chileans against the Peruvian-Bolivian confederation, invaded Peru, defeated Santa Cruz, Jan., 1839, and in Aug. of that year was elected constitutional president of Peru. In 1841 he declared war on Bolivia, was defeated, and killed.

He was admitted to the Paris bar in 1859, and in 1869 was elected to the corps législatif, where he acted with the Irreconcilables. On the surrender of Napoleon III. at Sedan, he joined in the proclamation of the republic, Sept. 4, 1870; and on Sept. 5 became minister of the interior in the Government of National Defense. Having been appointed member of a delegation, consisting of Crémieux, Glais-Bizoin, and Fourichon, previously commissioned by the central government at Paris to organize the national defense outside the capital, he escaped from Paris in a balloon, Oct. 8 (the city being completely invested by the Germans), and joined his colleagues at Tours on the following day. Assuming a virtual dictatorship, he negotiated a loan of 250,000,000 francs with English capitalists, and organized the two armies of the Loire under Generals Aurelle de Paladines and Chanzy, and the army of the north, commanded in turn by Generals Bourbaki and Faidherbe. He was, however, unable to prevent the capitulation of Paris, Jan. 28, 1871, and, Feb. 6, 1871, withdrew from office in consequence of a disagreement with the central government. He then became a member of the National Assembly, and in 1876 of the new Chamber of Deputies, of which he was president 1879-81. He was premier Nov., 1881, Jan., 1882.

Game at Chess, A. A comedy or satirical drama by Thomas Middleton, produced before or by 1624.

The actors at the Globe had produced Middleton's "Game at Chess," in which the action is carried on by black and white pieces, representing the Reformed and Romanist parties. The latter, being the rogues of the piece, are foiled, and are "put in the bag." The Spanish envoy's complaint was founded on the fact that living persons were represented by the actors, such persons being the King of Spain, Gondomar, and the famous Antonio de Dominis, who, after being a Romish bishop (of Spalatro), professed Protestantism, became Dean of Windsor, and after all died in his earlier faith, at Rome. On the ambassador's complaint, the actors and the author were summoned before the council, but no immediate result followed; for, two days later, Nethercole writes to Carleton informing him that "the comedy in which the whole Spanish business is taken up, is drawing £100 nightly."

Doran, Eng. Stage, I. 25.

Gamelyn (gam'e-lin), Tale of. A poem added to the list of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" by Urry. It is supposed that Chaucer had it in hand to use as material for some poem of his own, and that it was reproduced as his by scribes who found it among his papers.

It found its way at last into dramatic form, through Lodge's "Rosalynde," in Shakespeare's "As You Like It," and Shakespeare himself is said to have played his version of the part of Adam Spencer, who appears also in Gamelyn.

He graduated in 1831 at Brown University, in which institution he was tutor 1831-35, professor of rhetoric and English literature 1835-51, and professor of history and political economy 1851-64, when he resigned. He wrote a life of Roger Williams (1846).

Gammer Gurton's Needle. A comedy by Bishop Still. It was acted at Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1566, and printed in 1575. Owing to Warton's mistake in supposing that it was printed in 1551, it was for some time thought to be the first English comedy. "Ralph Roister Doister" preceded it.

As for the story, it is of the simplest, turning merely on the losing of her needle by Gammer Gurton as she was mending her man Hodge's breeches, on the search for it by the household, on the tricks by which Diceon the Bedlam (the clown or "vice" of the piece) induces a quarrel between Gammer and her neighbours, and on the final finding of the needle in the exact place on which Gammer Gurton's industry had been employed.

Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., pp. 55, 56.

Ganda (gän'dä), or Baganda (bä-gän'dä). An important African nation occupying the northwestern shore of Lake Victoria. They call themselves Baganda, their country Buganda, and their language Luganda. By the Suahili they are called Waganda, their country Uganda, and their language Kiganda. The royal family is of the Huma tribe of the Galla nation. The people are Bantu, and form one of the finest-looking and most advanced branches of the race. Their conical huts are made of grass. The villages are surrounded by quadrangular stockades. The principal fruit is the banana. The women are more numerous than the men, owing to the custom of raiding neighboring tribes, killing or selling the men, and keeping the women. Before the advent of Europeans, the Baganda were already well clad in native bark cloth, which is fast being superseded by imported cotton cloth. Marriage of near relatives is allowed, but tattooing and circumcision are forbidden. The king governs with the aid of feudal governors, of a premier (called katikoro), of three ba-kungu (ministers), and of the lu-chiko, or parliament, composed of the grandees. No idols are worshiped, but the spirit of the water, Lubadi, and the genii are invoked and propitiated. Since the establishment of the English mission in 1872, and of the Catholic mission in 1873, much progress has been made, and Christianity is now predominant. In 1890 the Baganda accepted the protectorate of the British East African Company. After a civil war between Catholics and Protestants, the company withdrew, and the British government took effective control in 1893. See Uganda, Mtesa, Mwangi.

Garcia, or Garzia (gär-thé'ä), or Garcias (gär-thé'äs). Born at Tudela, 958; died 1001. King of Navarre 995-1001. He was surnamed "the Trembler" on account of his nervousness before battle; and was the author of the saying "My body trembles at the dangers to which my courage is about to expose it." He defeated the Moors under Almanar in the battle of Calatañazor in 998.

Garcia (gär-sé'ä), Aleixo or Alejo. Died in Paraguay about 1526. A Portuguese, or possibly a Spaniard, who early in the 16th century was left on the coast of southern Brazil, near Santa Catharina, by one of the exploring ships which touched there. He lived for years among the Indians, and about 1524, accompanied by several hundred of them, made an expedition westward or northward, penetrating beyond the Paraguay and perhaps reaching the confines of Peru. Returning with a large amount of gold, he was murdered by his companions. The accounts of this expedition are very vague, and have been discredited by some historians.

Garcia, Diogo. Born at Lisbon about 1471; died in Spain about 1535. A Portuguese pilot. He entered the service of Spain, and there are indications that he was on the coast of South America as early as 1512, possibly as far south as the Plata. In 1520 he commanded an expedition to the coast of Brazil and the Plata. Ascending the Paraná, he met Sebastian Cabot, quarreled with him, and in 1528 returned to Spain. It is conjectured that he was subsequently in the Indian Ocean, and that he discovered there the island bearing his name.

Garcia (gär-thé'ü), Gregorio. Born in Cozar about 1560; died in Baëza, 1627. A Spanish Dominican author. He traveled for twelve years in Spanish America, part of the time as a missionary among the Indians. He published "Origen de los Indios del Nuevo Mundo" (Valencia, 1607; Madrid, 1727) and "Predicacion del Evangelio en el Nuevo Mundo viviendo los Apostoles" (Baëza, 1625). His "Monarquia de los Incas del Peru" was never published, and is probably lost.

Garcia, Manuel. Born at Madrid, March 17, 1805; died at Paris, 1879. A Spanish teacher of singing. His application of the laryngoscope and his "Mémoire sur la voix humaine" (1840) may be said to be the foundation of all subsequent investigations of the voice. (Grove.) He went to London in 1850, and was professor at the Royal Academy of Music.

Garcia, Manuel del Popolo Vicente. Born at Seville, Spain, Jan. 22, 1775; died at Paris, June 2, 1832. A Spanish singer, composer, and musical instructor. He founded a famous school of singing in London in 1823. He wrote 19 Italian, 17 Spanish, and 7 French operas (Fétis).

He studied at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, of which society he was elected master in 1525. In 1528 he was sent by Henry VIII. on a mission to the Pope in reference to the proposed divorce between the king and Catharine of Aragon. He was made secretary of state in 1529; was appointed bishop of Winchester in 1531; and was elected chancellor of the University of Cambridge about 1540. Although constantly employed on diplomatic missions to the courts of Rome, France, and the emperor, his chief service to Henry consisted in a learned defense of the Act of Supremacy, published in 1535 under the title "De vera obedientia oratio." In the reign of Edward VI. he resisted the ecclesiastical policy of Cranmer, in consequence of which he was committed to the Tower and, in 1552, deprived of his bishopric. He was restored to liberty at the accession of Queen Mary, who appointed him lord high chancellor of the realm in 1553. In conjunction with Bonner he was the chief instrument in bringing about the persecution of the Protestants in the early part of Mary's reign.

Gargantua (gär-gan'tü-ä; F. pron. gär-goi-tü-ä') and Pantagruel (pan-tag'rö-el; F. pron. pon-fä-grü-el'), The Life of. A satirical work in prose and verse by Rabelais. Gargantua is a giant with an enormous appetite, and his name has become proverbial for an insatiable eater. The misspelling Gargantua, originated by Pope in his edition of Shakspeare's plays ("As you Like it," iii. 2), has been followed by some other editors. (Furness) There was a chapbook, popular in England in the 16th century, giving the history of the giant Gargantua, who accidentally swallows five pilgrims, staves and all, in his salad. See Pantagruel and Panurge.

He [Rabelais] edited too, and perhaps in part rewrote, a prose romance, "Les Grandes et Inestimables Chroniques du Grant et Enorme Géant Gargantua." This work, the author of which is unknown, and no earlier copies of which exist, gave him no doubt at least the idea of his own famous book. The next year (1532) followed the first instalment of this—"Pantagruel Roi des Dipsodes Restitue en Son naturel avec ses Faictes et Prouesses Espouventables." Three years afterwards came "Gargantua" proper, the first book of the entire work as we now have it. Eleven years, however, passed before the work was continued, the second book of "Pantagruel" not being published till 1546, and the third six years later, just before the author's death, in 1552. The fourth or last book did not appear as a whole until 1564, though the first sixteen chapters had been given to the world two years before. This fourth book, the fifth of the entire work, has, from the length of time which elapsed before its publication and from certain variations which exist in the MS. and the first printed editions, been suspected of spuriousness. Such a question cannot be debated here at length. But there is no external testimony of sufficient value to discredit Rabelais's authorship, while the internal testimony in its favour is overwhelming. Saintsbury, Short Hist. of French Lit., p. 185.

Gargaphia (gär-gä'fä-ä). The Vale of. The vale where the mythical Actæon was torn to pieces by his own hounds. It was used by Jonson as the scene of "Cynthia's Revels."

Population (1881), 345,629.—2. A protected state in India, situated west of British Garhwal. Area, 4,164 square miles. Population (1891), 241,242.

Garibaldi (gä-rö-bäl'dö), Giuseppe. Born at Nice, July 4, 1807; died on the island of Caprera, near Sardinia, June 2, 1882. A celebrated Italian patriot. Exiled from Italy for political reasons in 1834, he went to South America, where he was employed in the service first of the republic of Rio Grande do Sul and afterward in that of Uruguay, 1836-48. In 1849 he entered the service of the Roman Republic, which was abolished in the same year. In 1850 he went as an exile to the United States, where he was naturalized as a citizen, and where for a time he followed the occupation of a candle-maker on Staten Island. He returned to Italy in 1854, and settled as a farmer on the island of Caprera. He commanded an independent corps, known as the "Hunters of the Alps," in the Sardinian service during the war of Sardinia and France against Austria in 1859. Secretly encouraged by the Sardinian government, he organized, after the conclusion of peace, an expedition against the Two Sicilies for the purpose of bringing about the union of Italy. He descended upon Sicily with 1,000 volunteers in May, 1860, and after having made himself dictator of Sicily crossed to the mainland, where he expelled Francis II. from Naples and entered the capital Sept. 7, 1860. He retired to Caprera on the union of the Two Sicilies with Sardinia and the proclamation, March 17, 1861, of Victor Emmanuel of Sardinia as king of Italy. Striving for the complete unification of Italy, he organized an expedition against Rome in 1862, but was defeated and captured by the Sardinians at Aspromonte in Aug. He was again in arms against the Pope in 1867, and was defeated by the French and papal forces at Mentana in Nov. In 1870-71 he commanded a French force in the war against the Germans.

Garraway's Coffee House. A noted London coffee-house standing for two centuries in Exchange Alley, Cornhill. Tea was first sold here; the promoters of the South Sea Bubble met here; and sales of drugs, mahogany, and timber were held here periodically. It was frequented by people of quality, and "as a place of sale, exchange, auction, and lottery it was never excelled" (Thornbury). The original proprietor, Thomas Garway, was a tobacconist and coffee dealer.

Garrick (gär'ik), David. Born at Hereford, England, Feb. 19, 1717; died at London, Jan. 20, 1779. A celebrated English actor. He was educated at Lichfield Grammar School; went to London in 1737, traveling with Dr. Samuel Johnson, one of whose pupils he had been at Edial; and was entered at Lincoln's Inn. He went into the wine business, however, with his brother. The partnership was soon dissolved, and his love of the stage induced him to make it his profession. He made his first appearance in public in 1741. Having played several minor parts, he made, on Oct. 19, his famous appearance as Richard III., which was an immediate success. In 1742 he went to Dublin, where he was well received. In 1745 he again went to Dublin, and was joint manager there with Sheridan. In 1747 he undertook the management of the Drury Lane Theatre with tact, having bought a half interest. He brought out plays, including 24 of Shakspeare's, creating new parts and playing the principal old ones. His repertoire was large and he was very versatile, his range extending from Hamlet to the extremes of low comedy in Abel Druggier and light comedy in Archer. One of his favorite characters was Don Felix in "The Wonder," which he played for the first time Nov. 6, 1756, and for the last time at his last appearance, June 6, 1776. He retired with a considerable fortune to Hampton. He wrote farces and comedies and alterations of old plays (especially with Colman), together with many prologues, epigrams, etc. He played with all the foremost actors of his time. He was a great actor and successful manager, and enjoyed the friendship of the most noted men of his day. Johnson said of him that "his death eclipsed the gaiety of nations."

Garrick Club. A London club instituted in 1831 for the patronage of the drama, and as a rendezvous for men of letters. Since 1864 it has occupied a house in Garrick street.

Garrison (gar'is-on), William Lloyd. Born at Newburyport, Mass., Dec. 10, 1805; died at New York, May 24, 1879. A noted American abolitionist. He learned the trade of a printer, and eventually became a journalist. In 1831 he began at Boston the publication of the "Liberator," a journal advocating the abolition of slavery at the South, which he conducted until its discontinuance in 1865. In 1832 he founded at Boston an abolition society, which became the model for similar societies all over the North. Shortly afterward the American Antislavery Society was founded, of which he was president 1843-65.

Garrod (gar'od), Alfred Henry. Born at London, May 18, 1846; died Oct. 17, 1879. An English zoölogist. He studied at Cambridge, where he became a fellow of St. John's College in 1873; became professor to the Zoological Society in 1871; was appointed professor of comparative anatomy at King's College, London, in 1874; and became professor of physiology at the Royal Institution in 1875. He is best known for his studies in the anatomy of birds. His papers were edited by W. A. Fortescue in 1881.

Garrow Hills. See Garro Hills.

Garston (gar'ston). A town in Lancashire, England, situated on the Mersey 5 miles southeast of Liverpool. Population (1891), 13,444.

Garter, Order of the. See Order.

Garth (gärth), Caleb. A character in George Eliot's novel "Middlemarch."

Garth, Sir Samuel. Born in Bowland Forest, Yorkshire, 1661; died at London, Jan. 18, 1719. An English physician and poet. He studied at Cambridge (Peter-house) and Leyden, and established himself in London in the practice of medicine. Among his works is "The Dispensary" (1699), a poem which ridicules apothecaries, and records the first attempt to establish dispensaries for outdoor patients. It passed through many editions.

Garuda (Hind. pron. gar'ü-dä). In Hindu mythology, a bird or vulture, half bird half man, on which Vishnu rides.

Garumna (ga-rum'nä). The Latin name of the Garonne.

Garve (gär've), Christian. Born at Breslau, Prussia, Jan. 7, 1742; died at Breslau, Dec. 1, 1798. A German philosopher, moralist, and translator. He was professor (extraordinary) of philosophy at Leipsic 1770-72.

Gasca (gäs'kä), Pedro de la. Born at Barco de Avila, Castile, 1485; died at Valladolid, Nov., 1567. A Spanish lawyer. In 1546 he was sent to Peru as president of the audience, with extraordinary powers, to put down the rebellion of Gonzalo Pizarro. He managed by peaceful means to win over many of the rebels. Centeno, Valdivia, and Benalcazar joined him; and Pizarro's forces finally deserted on the field of Sacahuana, near Cuzco, April 9, 1548. Pizarro and his lieutenant, Carbajal, were captured and executed, and Gasca treated the rebels with great severity. While the country was still in a state of confusion he slipped away (Jan., 1550), leaving the government in the hands of the audience. On his return to Spain he was made bishop of Palencia, and in 1561 was promoted to the see of Sigüenza.

Gascoigne (gas-koin'), Sir Bernard (Bernardo or Bernardino Guasconi). Born at Florence, 1614; died at London, Jan. 10, 1687. A military adventurer and diplomatist, of Italian parentage. He came to England and fought for Charles I.; returned after the Restoration; and was appointed English envoy to Vienna in 1672 to negotiate a marriage between the Duke of York and the Archduchess Claudia Felicitas. He wrote "A Description of Germany, etc."

Gascoigne, George. Born in Bedfordshire (?), England, about 1535; died at Stamford, England, Oct. 7, 1577. An English poet. His chief works are "The Steele Glas" and "The Complaint of Philomene" (1576). Works edited by E. Arber 1868.

He [Gascoigne] is supposed to have been born about 1536, and if so, he was little over forty when he died in 1577. His father, a knight of good family and estate in Sussex, disinherited him; but he was educated at Cambridge. He was not at both universities, was twice elected to Parliament, travelled and fought abroad, and took part in the famous festival at Kenilworth. His work is, as has been said, considerable, and is remarkable for the number of first attempts in English which it contains. It has at least been claimed for him (though careful students of literary history know that these attributions are always rather hazardous) that he wrote the first English prose comedy ("The Supposes," a version of Ariosto), the first regular verse satire ("The Steel Glass"), the first prose tale (a version from Bandello), the first translation from Greek tragedy ("Jocasta"), and the first critical essay (the above-mentioned "Notes of Instruction"). Most of these things, it will be seen, were merely adaptations of foreign originals; but they certainly make up a remarkable budget for one man. Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 16.

Gascoigne, Sir William. Died in 1419. An English judge. He was made chief justice of the King's Bench by Henry IV. about 1400. According to a tradition, followed by Shakspeare in "Henry IV.," he committed Prince Henry to prison when the latter struck him for venturing to punish one of the prince's riotous companions.

Gascoigne, William. Born about 1612; died in the battle of Marston Moor, July 2, 1644. An English astronomer, inventor of the micrometer.

He invented methods of grinding glasses, and Sir Edward Sherburne states that he was the first who used two convex glasses in the telescope. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Gasconade (gas-kö-näd'). A river in Missouri which runs north and joins the Missouri below Jefferson City. Length, about 200 miles.

Gascony (gas'kö-ni), F. Gascogne (gäs-köny'). [ME. Gasconie, Gascon, from OF. and F. Gasconie, Sp. Vasconia, from LL. Vasconia, from Vascones, the inhabitants. See Basques.] An ancient duchy of France, capital Auch, forming part of the old government of Guienne and Gascony. It was bounded by Guienne on the north, Languedoc and Foix on the east, Béarn and Navarre on the south, and the Bay of Biscay on the west. It comprised the departments of Landes, Gers, and Hautes-Pyrénées, and parts of Haute-Garonne, Lot-et-Garonne, and Tarn-et-Garonne. It formed the Roman province of Aquitania Tertia or Novempopulania; was a duchy in the middle ages; and was united in 1652 to Guienne, the fortunes of which it generally followed.

Gaskell (gas'kel), Mrs. (Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson). Born at Chelsea, London, Sept. 29, 1810; died at Alton, Hampshire, England, Nov. 12, 1865. An English novelist. She removed on her marriage in 1832 to Manchester, where she obtained material for those of her novels which describe the life and trials of the manufacturing classes. Her best novels have been translated into French. Among them are "Mary Barton" (1848), "Ruth" and "Cranford" (1853), "North and South" (1855), "Cousin Phillis" (1865), "Wives and Daughters" (1866), etc. She published in 1857 a "Life of Charlotte Brontë."

Gasparin (gäs-pä-rän'), Comte Adrien Étienne Pierre de. Born at Orange, France, June 29, 1783; died there, Sept. 7, 1862. A French politician and agriculturist.

Gasparin, Comte Agénor Étienne de. Born at Orange, France, July 10, 1810; died at Geneva, May 4, 1871. A French political writer and politician, son of A. E. P. de Gasparin. His works include "Les États-Unis en 1861" (1861), "L'Amérique devant l'Europe" (1862), "La France, nos fautes, nos péchés, notre avenir" (1872), etc.

He was professor successively at Breslau, Greifswald, Gießen, and (1868) Heidelberg. His works include "Geschichte der protestantischen Dogmatik in ihrem Zusammenhange mit der Theologie überhaupt" (1854-67).

Gassendi (gäs-sen'dé; F. pron. gäs-san-dé), or Gassend (F. pron. gäs-son'), Pierre. Born at Champtercier, Basses-Alpes, Jan. 22, 1592; died at Paris, Oct. 24, 1655. A celebrated French philosopher, physicist, and astronomer. He studied theology, and became professor of theology at Digne in 1613, and of philosophy at Aix in 1616. In 1645 he became professor of mathematics at the Collège Royal at Paris. He sought to connect the philosophy of Epicurus with Christian theology and modern science. Among his works are "Disquisitiones antiscientias" (1643), "De vita, moribus, et placitis Epicuri" (1647), "Syntagma philosophia Epicuri" (1649), "Syntagma philosophicum."

Gasser (gäs'ser), Hans. Born at Eisentratten, Carinthia, Oct. 2, 1817; died at Pest, April 24, 1868. An Austrian sculptor.

Gasser von Valhorn (gäs'ser fon väl'horn), Joseph. Born at Prägraten, Tyrol, Nov. 22, 1816. An Austrian sculptor.

Gastein (gäs'tün). A valley in the crownland of Salzburg, Austria-Hungary, south of Salzburg. It is famous for its picturesque scenery. At Wildbad Gastein there are hot springs.

Gastein, Convention of. A treaty concluded between Austria and Prussia at Wildbad Gastein, Aug. 14, 1865, by which the duchies recently conquered from Denmark were disposed of as follows: Lauburg was definitely surrendered to the King of Prussia for two and a half million rix-dollars, while the sovereignty of Holstein and Schleswig was to be held by Austria and Prussia in common, Austria administering Holstein and Prussia Schleswig.

Gate of the Lions. See Mycenæ.

Gate of the Mountains. The gorge in which the Missouri breaks through the Rocky Mountains, about 40 miles above Great Falls, Montana.

Gates (gäts), Horatio. Born at Malden, England, in 1728; died at New York, April 10, 1806. An American general. He served as captain under Braddock in the expedition against Fort Duquesne in 1755, and at the close of the old French and Indian war settled in Berkeley County, Virginia. At the beginning of the Revolutionary War he accepted a commission as adjutant-general in the Continental army (1775), and in 1777 succeeded Schuyler as commander in the north. He defeated Burgoyne in the second battle of Stillwater, Oct. 7, 1777, and on Oct. 17 received the surrender of Burgoyne at Saratoga. In Nov., 1777, he was made president of the board of war and ordinance, a position which he used to further an intrigue with the clique known as the "Conway Cabal," consisting of Thomas Conway and others, to supplant Washington in the chief command of the army. In June, 1780, he was appointed to the command in the south, and on Aug. 16, 1780, was totally defeated by Lord Cornwallis at Camden, South Carolina. He was afterward succeeded by General Greene.

Gates, Sir Thomas. Died after 1621. A colonial governor of Virginia. Along with Captain Newport and Sir George Somers he sailed from England in May, 1609, in charge of 500 emigrants destined for Virginia. During the voyage the Sea Venture, in which he sailed, was separated from the rest of the fleet by a hurricane and stranded on the rocks of Bermuda. The passengers of the Sea Venture constructed two new vessels, and reached Virginia May 24, 1610. Having in the meantime been sent to England with a report of the condition of the colony, he returned to Virginia in Aug., 1611, with 300 new emigrants. In the same year he assumed the office of governor, a position which he held until 1614, when he returned to England.

Gateshead (gäts'hed). A parliamentary and municipal borough in Durham, England, situated on the Tyne opposite Newcastle. It has important manufactures. Population (1891), 85,709.

Gath (gath). [Heb., 'wine-press.'] One of the five confederate cities of the Philistines, the birthplace of the giant Goliath. It was conquered by David, turned by Rehoboam into a fortress, taken by Hazaël, king of Damascus, and destroyed by Uzziah, and then vanishes from history. Its position is uncertain, but it is possibly the modern Tell es Saï.

Gatha (Skt. gät'hä; Avestan gä'thā). [Song.] In Sanskrit, a religious verse, but one not taken from the Vedas. Such verses are interspersed in the Sanskrit Buddhist work called "Lalitavistara," composed in a dialect between the Sanskrit and Prakrit, and have given their name to this the Gatha dialect. The oldest portion of the Avesta consists of Gathas or hymns believed to go back, at least in part, to Zarathushtra himself.

Gâtinais (gä-té-nä'), or Gâtinois (gä-té-nvä'). An ancient territory of France. Capital, Nemours. It lay south of Paris, partly in Île-de-France, partly in Orléanais, and is comprised in the departments Loiret, Nièvre, Yonne, and Seine-et-Marne. It was united to the French crown under Philip I. in 1063.

Gatineau (gā-tō-nō'). A river in Canada which, flowing southward, joins the Ottawa nearly opposite Ottawa. Estimated length, 400 miles.

Gatley (gat'li), Alfred. Born at Kerridge, Cheshire, 1816; died at Rome, June 28, 1863. An English sculptor.

Gatling (gat'ling), Richard Jordan. Born in Hertford County, N. C., Sept. 12, 1818. An American inventor. He took the degree of M. D. about 1849, but never practised his profession. He is chiefly known as the inventor of the Gatling gun, the first specimen of which was constructed in 1862.

Gatshina (gā'chē-nā). A town, the private property of the czar, situated in the government of St. Petersburg, Russia, 28 miles south-southwest of St. Petersburg. The palace, a favorite residence of Alexander II., built in 1770, is of great size, in a simple Renaissance style. The main building, of three stories, is connected by colonnaded galleries with one-story buildings surrounding a court. There are about 600 rooms, including ample state apartments, and a theater. Population (1892), 12,000.

Gatty (gat'i), Mrs. (Margaret Scott). Born at Burnham, Essex, June 3, 1809; died at Ecclesfield, Yorkshire, Oct. 4, 1873. An English writer, wife of Rev. Alfred Gatty, vicar of Ecclesfield. Her best-known works are stories for children ("Aunt Judy's Tales," 1859, etc.). She edited "Aunt Judy's Magazine" 1866-73.

Gauchos (gou'chōz). Peasantry and herdsmen of mixed Indian and white blood, in the Platine states of South America. They are skilful horsemen, accustomed to a roving life, and readily lend themselves to lawless enterprises. They have thus become prominent in the civil wars of that region, following any leader who gives them excitement and plunder. In war their hands move with great celerity, easily avoiding regular forces.

Gauden (gā'den), John. Born at Mayland, Essex, 1605; died Sept. 20, 1662. An English prelate, appointed bishop of Exeter in 1660, and translated to the see of Worcester in May, 1662. He graduated at Oxford; became vicar of Chippenham in 1610; was chaplain to the Earl of Warwick; was appointed dean of Bocking, Essex, in 1641; and was chosen a member of the Assembly of Divines in 1643, but was not allowed to take his seat. He wrote "Cromwell's Bloody Slaughter House, etc." (1660), "Tears of the Church" (1659), "Ἰερά Δάκρυα. Ecclesie Anglicanæ Suspiria, or the Tears, Sighs, Complaints, and Prayers of the Church of England," etc. See Eikon Basilike.

Gauhati (gou-hä'tō). A town in Assam, British India, situated on the Brahmaputra about lat. 26° 11' N., long. 91° 40' E. Population, 12,000.

Gaul (gäl). [F. Gaule, Sp. Galia, Pg. It. Gallia, G. Gallien, from L. Gallia, from Gallus, a Gaul.] 1. In ancient geography, the country of the Gauls; in an inexact use, France. It was divided into Cisalpine Gaul and Transalpine Gaul, and is often taken as equivalent to Transalpine Gaul.

Neither . . . is France even yet coextensive with Gaul. If Britain includes Scotland as well as England, Gaul includes Belgium and Switzerland as well as France.

Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 165.

The name "Gaul" has never fully died out as the designation of France. How does the case stand in what was so long the common language of Europe? The most pedantic Ciceronian never scrupled to talk familiarly about Anglus and Anglia; but Francus and Francia are hardly known except in language more or less formal. Gallus, Gallia, Galliarum Rex, are constantly used by writers who would never think of an analogous use of Britannus and Britannia. In ecclesiastical matters Gaul has always remained even the formal designation. The Gallican Church answers to the Anglican, the Primate of the Gauls to the Primate of All England. Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 165.

2. One of the four prefectures of the later Roman Empire. It comprised the dioceses of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, and corresponded to Spain, Portugal, a small strip of Morocco, France, Belgium, Switzerland, Holland and Germany to the Rhine, England, Wales, and the south of Scotland.

3. A diocese of the later Roman prefecture of Gaul. It was included between the Atlantic, the English Channel, the North Sea, the Rhine, the Alps, the Mediterranean, and the Pyrenees.

4. An old name of Wales, as in "Amadis de Gaul."

This general opinion, that Wales was the country of Amadis, was not an unnatural one, since Gauls and Galla, in old English, was the name for Wales as well as France: — "I say Gallia and Gaul — French and Welsh — soul-curer and body-curer," exclaims the host in the "Merry Wives of Windsor" (act iii. scene i.) while addressing the French doctor and the Welsh parson.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 355.

Gaul, Cisalpine. [L. Gallia Cisalpina (or Citerior).] In ancient history, that part of Gaul lying on this side the Alps (that is, from Rome, on the southern side of the Alps). It extended from the Alps southward and eastward. A Roman colony was founded at Sena Gallia 282 B. C. Part of the country was reduced between the first and second Punic wars, Milan and Como being captured, and the conquest was completed 201-191 B. C. It was made a Roman province, and was incorporated with Italy 43 B. C.

Gaul, Cispadane. [L. Gallia Cispadana.] In ancient geography, the part of Cisalpine Gaul this side (south) of the Po.

Gaul, Transalpine. [L. Gallia Transalpina.] In ancient geography, that part of Gaul which lay beyond the Alps (that is, north and north-west of the Alps from Rome). It comprised in the Roman period Narbonensis, Aquitania, Lugdunensis, and Belgica. Its ancient inhabitants were Gauls, Iberians, and Germans. Many remains of older inhabitants have been discovered, especially in the center of Gaul (Auvergne, etc.). The Gallic antiquities are especially numerous in the north (Brittany). Some Greek colonies were planted in early times in the south (see Marseilles). The Roman settlements were made first in the southeast, in the end of the 2d century B. C. (see Proence and Narbonensis). Gaul was thoroughly conquered by Julius Cesar 58-51 B. C. Augustus divided it into four provinces. Christianity was introduced in the 2d century. A division of the diocese of Gaul into 17 provinces was made in the 4th century. It was invaded by the Suevi, Alans, Vandals, West Goths, Burgundians, and Franks in the 5th century. See further under France.

Transalpine Gaul, as a geographical division, has well-marked boundaries in the Mediterranean, the Alps, the Rhine, the Ocean, and the Pyrenees. But this geographical division has never answered to any divisions of blood and language. Gaul in Cesar's day, that is, Gaul beyond the Roman province, formed three divisions — Aquitaine to the south-west, Celtic Gaul in the middle, and Belgic Gaul to the north-east. Aquitaine, stretching to the Garonne — the name was under Augustus extended to the Loire — was Iberian, akin to the people on the other side of the Pyrenees; a trace of its old speech remains in the small Basque district north of the Pyrenees. Celtic Gaul, from the Loire to the Seine and Marne, was the most truly Celtic land, and it was in this part of Gaul that the modern French nation took its rise. In the third division, Belgic Gaul, the tribes to the east, nearer to the Rhine, were some of them purely German, and others had been to a great extent brought under German influences or mixed with German elements. There was, in fact, no unity in Gaul beyond that which the Romans brought with them. Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 57.

Gaul, Transpadane. [L. Gallia Transpadana.] In ancient geography, the part of Cisalpine Gaul beyond (north) of the Po.

Gaul (gäl), Gilbert. Born at Jersey City, N. J., 1855. An American artist, known as a painter of battle-scenes.

Gauls (gälz). [L. Galli.] The leading division of the Celtic race. In historical times they occupied Transalpine and Cisalpine Gaul. Galatia was settled by them in the 3d century B. C.

Gaunt (gänt or gänt), John of. See John of Gaunt.

Gauntlet (gänt'let or gänt'let), Emilia. The virtuous heroine of Smollett's "Peregrine Pickle." Peregrine falls in love with her.

Gauntlett (gänt'let), Henry John. Born at Wellington, Salop, in 1806; died Feb. 21, 1876. A noted English organist, composer, and musical editor. For more than forty years he composed and edited psalm and hymn tunes, besides writing criticisms and reviews for musical periodicals.

Gaur, or Gour (gour). A ruined city in Bengal, India, near the Ganges south of Malda. From the 13th century it was the usual capital of the Mohammedan viceroys of Bengal and kings of Bengal. It fell into ruins from about 1575.

Gaur (in Afghanistan). See Ghur.

Gaurisankar. Mount Everest.

Gaurus (gä'rus), modern Monte Barbaro (mōn'te bär'bä-rō). In ancient geography, a mountain in Italy, 7 miles west of Naples. Here, 342 (343? or 340) B. C., the Romans under Valerius Corvus defeated the Samnites.

Gauss (gous), Karl Friedrich. Born at Brunswick, Germany, April 30, 1777; died at Göttingen, Germany, Feb. 23, 1855. A celebrated German mathematician, appointed professor of mathematics at Göttingen in 1807. His works include "Disquisitiones arithmetice" (1801), "Theoria motus corporum coelestium" (1809), "Atlas des Erdmagnetismus" (1810), "Dioptrische Untersuchungen" (1813), etc.

Gaussen (gō-soñ'), François Samuel Robert Louis. Born at Geneva, Aug. 23, 1790; died at Geneva, June 18, 1863. A Swiss Protestant theologian. His chief work is "La Théopneustic" (1840).

Gausta (gous'ti). The highest mountain in southern Norway, about lat. 59° 50' N. Height, 6,180 feet.

Gautama (gou'tā-mā). [Skt.] The family name of Buddha. (See Buddha.) The Pali form is Gotama.

Gauti (gä'ti). [L. (Jordanes) Gautigoth, Gr. (Ptolemy) Γαῦροι, AS. Geatas, ON. Gautur.] A Germanic tribe in the southern part of the Scandinavian peninsula, nearly coincident with the present Swedish province Gotland (Swedish Götaland), where they are mentioned by Ptolemy. They are the Geatas of the Anglo-Saxon Beowulf, and are not to be confounded with the Goths. They ultimately formed a constituent part of the Swedes.

Gautier (gō-tyā'), Marguerite. The principal character in Dumas's "La dame aux camélias."

Gautier, Théophile. Born at Tarbes, Aug. 31, 1811; died at Neuilly, Oct. 22, 1872. A French poet, critic, and novelist. He graduated from the Lycée Charlemagne in Paris, studied painting for a while, and then entered into the romantic movement in French literature. His first book, "Poésies" (1830), was followed by "Albertus" (1833), "Jeune France" (1835), "Mademoiselle de Maupin" (1835). From 1837 to 1845 he was art and dramatic critic for "La Presse." A series of twelve papers, "Exhumations littéraires," appeared in "La France Littéraire" (1834 and 1835), and in the "Revue des Deux Mondes" (1844); they were published in book form as "Les grotesques" (1844). This work and the "Rapport sur les progrès de la poésie française depuis 1830," published in "L'Histoire du romantisme" (1854), show Gautier at his best as a critic. Two masterpieces in literary criticism are his papers on Lamartine and Charles Baudelaire. In 1845 he went over to the editorial staff of the "Moniteur Universel," later "Journal Officiel," and was identified with that sheet until his death. As a result of his travels in Spain (1840), Belgium and Holland (1845), Italy (1850), Constantinople and Athens (1852), and Russia (1858), he wrote his "Voyage en Espagne" (1843), "Zigzags" (1845), "Italia" (1852), "Constantinople" (1854), "L'Orient," "Trésors d'art de la Russie ancienne et moderne" (1860-63), "Loin de Paris" (1864), "Quand on voyage" (1865), and "Voyage en Russie" (1866). He found also in foreign climes materials for such novels as "Milltona" (1847), "Arria Marcella" (1852), and "Le roman de la momie" (1856). He wrote "Fortunio" for the "Figaro" (1837), and "Le Capitaine Fraacasse" for "La Revue Nationale" (Dec, 1861, — June, 1863). Other stories of his are "La toison d'or," "Omphale," "Le petit chien de la marquise," "Le nid de rossignols" (1833), "La morte amoureuse" (1836), "La chaîne d'or," "Une nuit de Cléopâtre" (1845), "Jean et Jeannette" (1846), "Les roués innocents," "Le roi Candale" (1847), "La belle Jenny," "Le pauvre de tigre" (1864-1865), "Spirite" (1866), "Ménagerie intime" (1869), "Partie carrée," "Mademoiselle Dafné," "Tableaux de siège," etc. For the stage Gautier wrote "Le Tricorne enchané," "Pierrot posthume" (1845), "La Juive de Constantine" (1846), "Regardez mais n'y touchez pas" (1847), "L'Amour soufflé où il veut," etc. His works of pure fantasy are "Une lame du diable" (1839), and themes for ballets, as "Gizelle" (1841), "La péri" (1843), "Gemma" (1854), and "Sakountala" (1858). Gautier's poems from 1833 to 1838 were gathered under the title "La comédie de la mort." His later poetical compositions appeared as "Emaux et camées" (1852). Besides collaborating on "L'Histoire des peintres" (1847), Gautier wrote independently "Le salon de peinture de 1847," "L'Art moderne" (1852), "Les beaux-arts en Europe" (1852), and "Histoire de l'art théâtral en France depuis vingt-cinq ans" (1860). Scattered sketches by Gautier have appeared since their author's death, under the collective titles "Fusains et eaux-fortes," "Tableaux à la plume," and "Portraits contemporains."

Gaveston (gav'es-ton; F. pron. gä-ves-tōñ'), Piers. Executed June 19, 1312. The favorite of Edward II. of England. He was the son of a Gascon knight in the service of Edward I., and was brought up in the royal household as the foster-brother and playmate of Prince Edward, over whom he acquired a complete ascendancy. He incurred the enmity of the barons by his insolent and supercilious bearing, and was banished by Edward I. in 1307, but was recalled on the accession of Edward II. in the same year. He was created earl of Cornwall in 1307, and in 1308 acted as regent of the kingdom during the king's absence in France. His conduct, however, so irritated the barons that, in spite of the protection of Edward, he was again forced into exile in 1308-09 and 1311-12. His recall in 1312 provoked a rising of the barons, in the course of which he was captured and executed.

Gavroche (gäv-rōsh'). In Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables," a street Arab. He has become a type.

Gawain, or Gawayne (gä'wän). Sir. One of the principal knights of the Round Table, in the Arthurian cycle of romance. He appears first in Geoffrey of Monmouth as Walwain (Gallicized Gawayne), and then in nearly every one of the romances. He is known as "the courteous." Chretien of Troyes gives him the first place among the knights. The poem "Sir Gawayne and the Grene Knight," from the French metrical romance of Perceval, is assigned to about the year 1300; it has been republished by the Early English Text Society. There was another knight of this name who served under Amadis of Gaul and achieved great deeds.

Gay (gā), Claude. Born at Draguignan, March 18, 1800; died at Paris, Nov. 29, 1872. A French naturalist. From 1830 to 1842 he was employed by the Chilean government in a detailed topographical and scientific survey of that country. Besides studying and collecting plants, animals, and minerals, he amassed rich historical material. The results were published in the "Historia física y política de Chile" (Paris and Santiago, 24 vols. and 2 of atlas, 1843-51), and in a large map of Chile. Gay returned to Paris in 1843. He subsequently traveled in Russia and Tatar, and studied the mines of the United States.

He graduated at Harvard in 1714, and in 1718 became pastor at Hingham, Massachusetts, where he remained until his death. He entertained liberal theological views, and is regarded by some as the father of American Unitarianism.

Gay, John. Born at Barnstable (baptized Sept. 16, 1685); died at London, Dec. 4, 1732. An English poet. Among his chief works are "The Fan" and "The Shepherd's Week," a series of eclogues depicting rustic life "with the gilt off" (1714), "The What-dye-call-it," a farce (1715), "Trivia, or the art of Walking the Streets of London" (1716), "Poems" (1720; including "Black-eyed Susan"), "The Captives," a tragedy (1724), "Fables" (1727), "Acis and Galatea" (1732), and "The Beggar's Opera" (1728). This "Newgate pastoral" made his great reputation. The representation of "Polly, a sequel, was forbidden by the lord chamberlain. This prohibition became a party question, and the "inoffensive John Gay became one of the obstructions to the peace of Europe." The sale of the book was great.

Gay, Joseph. The pseudonym of John Durant Brevall.

Gay, Madame (Marie Françoise Sophie Nichault de Lavalette). Born at Paris, July 1, 1776; died March, 1852. A French novelist. Her chief novels are "Léonie de Montbrense" (1813), "Anatole" (1815), "Les malheurs d'un amant heureux" (1818).

Gay, Sydney Howard. Born at Hingham, Mass., May 22, 1814; died at New Brighton, Staten Island, June 25, 1888. An American journalist and author. Gayatri (gā'ya-trē). [Skt.] An ancient meter of twenty-four syllables, generally arranged as a triplet of three divisions of eight syllables each; also, a hymn in the Gayatri meter and then the Gayatri par excellence, i. e., Rigveda III. lxii. 10. This is: "Tat savitur varenyam bhargo devasya dhimahi Dhiyo yo nah prachodayāt" ("Let us meditate on the excellent radiance of the heavenly quickener, and may he stimulate our understandings"). This is a very sacred verse, repeated by every Brahman at his morning and evening devotions. From being addressed to Savitri or the Sun as generator, it is also called Savitri. Originally a simple invocation of the sun, later times have attached to it a deep mystical import. It is so holy that copyists often refrain from transcribing it.

Gay Head (gā hed). A promontory at the western extremity of Martha's Vineyard, Massachusetts, lat. 41° 21' N., long. 70° 50' W.

Gayless (gā'les), Charles. The impecunious

Gay-Lussac (gā-lū-sāk'), Joseph Louis. Born at St.-Léonard le Noblat, Haute-Vienne, Dec. 6, 1778; died at Paris, May 9, 1850. A distinguished French chemist and physicist. He made the first balloon ascensions for scientific purposes in 1804, and is especially noted for his researches on chemical combination, iodine, cyanogen, etc. He enunciated the law that gases combine with each other in very simple definite proportions.

Gaymar (gā'mār), Geoffrey. An English chronicler who translated Geoffrey of Monmouth into Anglo-Norman verse about 1146. He continued it by adding a metrical "History of Anglo-Saxon Kings."

Gaynam (gā'nām), or Garnham (gār'nām), Dr. See the extract.

One of the most notorious of the Fleet parsons was Dr. Gaynam or Garnham, popularly known as the Bishop of Hell, "a very lusty, jolly man," who, being asked at a trial, where he gave evidence, whether he was not ashamed to come and own a clandestine marriage in the face of a Court of Justice, replied, bowing to the Judge, "Video meliora, deteriora sequor." On another occasion, when questioned as to his recollection of the prisoner, he said: "Can I remember persons? I have married 2,000 since that time."

Forsyth, Novels and Novelists of the 18th Cent., p. 145.
Gay Saber (gā' or gā sā-bār'). [Pr. 'Gay Science.'] A guild formed by the magistrates of Toulouse in 1323, with the purpose of restoring the Provençal language and culture, which had nearly died out. It was called originally "Sobregaya Companhia dels Sept Troubadours de Tolosa" ("The very gay company of the seven troubadours of Toulouse"). The first meeting was held May 1, 1324.

The concourse was great, and the first prize was given to a poem in honor of the Madonna, by Ramon Vidal de Besalú, a Catalan gentleman, who seems to have been the author of the regulations for the festival, and to have been declared a doctor of the Gay Saber on the occasion. In 1355 this company formed for itself a more ample body of laws, partly in prose and partly in verse, under the title of "Ordenanzas dels Sept Senyors Mantenedors del Gay Saber," or Ordinances of the Seven Lords Conservators of the Gay Saber, which, with the needful modifications, have been observed down to our own times, and still regulate the festival annually celebrated at Toulouse, on the first day of May, under the name of the Floral Games.

He entered the Union army, and became brigadier-general of volunteers April 25, 1862; took part in the battle of Cedar Mountain, Aug. 9, 1862; and commanded a division at Chancellorville, Gettysburg, Lookout Mountain, and in Sherman's march to the sea. He was governor of Pennsylvania from 1867 until two weeks before his death.

Gebal (gē'bal). A maritime city of Phenicia, situated on a hill close to the Mediterranean, north of Beirut; the ancient Byblus and Arabic Jebel. It was one of the earliest of the Phenician settlements, and second only in importance to Tyre and Sidon. Its inhabitants, the Gebalites, are mentioned as skilful in hewing stones (1 Ki. v. 18) and in ship-building (Ezek. xxvii. 9). It was the birthplace of Philo, the translator of Sanchuniathon; but it was most celebrated as the oldest seat of the cult of Adonis, to whom the city was sacred, and after whom the river it stands on was named. Gebal is mentioned as a kingdom paying tribute to Assyria in the annals of Tiglath-Pileser II. and Esarhaddon. It was taken by Alexander the Great. Later it became a Christian see. The modern Jebel has only a few hundred inhabitants. The excavations carried on there by Kenan unearthed numerous tombs and sarcophagi and the substrations of a large temple, perhaps that of Adonis.

Gébelin, Court de. See Court de Gébelin.

Geber (gā'ber): probably identical with Abu Musa Jabir ben Haijan. Died about 776. An Arabian alchemist. He occupies a position in the history of chemistry analogous to that held by Hippocrates in that of medicine. The theory that the metals are composed of the same elements, and that by proper treatment the base metals can be developed into the noble, which was the leading theory in chemistry down to the 16th century, is clearly defined in his writings. The titles of 500 works reputed to be from his pen are known, of which the following have appeared in print: "Summa perfectionis," "Liber investigationis," or "De investigatione perfectionis," "De inventione veritatis," "Liber Fornacum," and "Testamentum."

It was founded by Hannover to rival Bremerhaven. The neighboring Geestendorf is now united with it. Population (1890), 15,452.

Geez (géz). The ancient language of Abyssinia. Since about 900 A. D. it has ceased to be a spoken language, and survives only in the usage of the church and of scholars. Its place was taken as the popular speech by two of its dialects, Tigré and Tigriña. In the southern part of Abyssinia a kindred language, Amharic, was spoken, which has since become the speech of the entire country. Geez and the related languages and dialects employ a syllabic character nearly related to that found in the Sabeen and Hymaritic inscriptions of South Arabia. It is a Semitic language with an intermixture of African words. Among the Semitic dialects it is most nearly related morphologically to Assyrian, and in vocabulary to Arabic. It is often called Ethiopic.

Geffard (zhe-frär'), Fabre. Born at Anse Veau, Haiti, Sept. 18, 1806; died at Kingston, Jamaica, Feb. 11, 1879. A Haitian general and politician. Gehenna (gē-hen'ä). [Gr. Γέεννα; the Greek representation of the Hebrew Gē Hinnóm, or more fully Gē bené Hinnóm.] The valley of Hinnóm, or of the children of Hinnóm, situated south of Jerusalem and north of Jebel Abn Tor; also called Hill of the Tombs, of the Field of Blood, or of Evil Counsel. The name of the valley occurs first in the description of the boundaries of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 16). In the times of Ahaz and Manasse children were offered here to Moloch, in consequence of which the valley was called Topheth ('abomination'), and was polluted by Josiah (2 Kl. xiii. 10). In later times it became the prototype of the place of punishment, and was considered as the mouth of hell. In this sense it is used in the Talmud and in the New Testament.

Geibel (gē'bel), Emanuel von. Born at Lübeck, Oct. 17, 1815; died there, April 6, 1884. A German lyric poet. He studied at Bonn and Berlin, and afterward went to Athens as tutor in the household of the Russian ambassador. He returned to his native city in 1840, in which year his first book of poems appeared. In 1841 appeared "Zeitstimmen" ("Voices of the Time"), in 1846 "Zwolf Sonette für Schlewig-Holstein" ("Twelve Sonnets for Schlewig-Holstein"), in 1848 "Juniuslieder" ("Songs of Junius"). In 1852, at the invitation of the king, he went as honorary professor in the faculty of philosophy to Munich. In 1856 appeared "Neue Gedichte" ("New Poems"), in 1864 "Gedichte und Gedenkblätter" ("Poems and Leaves of Thought"). After the death of the king, Maximilian II., he was obliged in 1865 to resign his position and to return to Lübeck. "Heraldorfsrufe" ("Herald Calls") appeared in 1871, and "Spätherbblätter" ("Late Autumn Leaves") in 1877. Besides these volumes of poems, he is the author of several dramas, the most important of which, "Sophonabe," appeared in 1870. An epic, "Konig Sigurds Brautfahrt" ("King Sigurd's Courtship Journey"), dates from 1846.

Geinitz (gē'nits), Hans Bruno. Born at Altenburg, Germany, Oct. 16, 1814. A German geologist and paleontologist, professor of mineralogy and geognosy at the Polytechnic School at Dresden. He has published numerous technical works.

Geisenheim (gē'zen-hīm). A small town in the province of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, on the Rhine, in the Rheingau, east-northeast of Bingen. The Schloss Johannisberg is near the town.

Geisligen (gē'sling-en). A town in the Danube circle, Württemberg, at the foot of the Swabian Alp, 33 miles southeast of Stuttgart. Population (1890), 5,276.

Geissler (gē'sler), Heinrich. Born at Igelschieb, Saxe-Meiningen, Germany, May 26, 1814; died at Bonn, Prussia, Jan. 24, 1879. A German mechanic, maker of physical and chemical apparatus at Bonn, and the inventor of Geissler's tubes, an apparatus in which light is produced by an electric discharge through rarefied gases. It is used with the induction-coil, and consists of a sealed tube with platinum connections at each end, through which the electric spark is transmitted. The color and intensity of the light depend upon the nature of the gas with which the tube is charged.

Gela (jē'lā). [Gr. Γέλα.] In ancient geography, a city on the southern coast of Sicily, on the site of the modern Terranova, 55 miles west of Syracuse. It was founded by Rhodians and Cretans about 690 B. C., and rose to importance in the 6th and 5th centuries B. C., founding Agrigentum in 582. It was destroyed by the Carthaginians in 495, rebuilt by Timoleon, and destroyed by the Mamertines about 282 B. C. Æschylus died here.

Gelasius (jē-lā'si-us) I. Bishop of Rome 492-496. He was the first pope to claim for his office complete independence of emperors and councils in matters of faith, and sought in vain to heal the schism between the Eastern and Western churches. He wrote "De duabus in Christo naturis adversus Eutychem et Nestorium," etc.

Gelasius II. (Giovanni da Gaëta). Died at Cluny, France, Jan. 29, 1119. Pope 1118-19. He refused to yield to the demands of the emperor Henry V. in the matter of investiture, whereupon the emperor elevated Gregory VIII and expelled Gelasius, who died in the convent of Cluny.

Gelder (chél'der), Aart de. Born at Dordrecht, 1645; died there, 1727. A Dutch painter, a pupil of Rembrandt.

Gelderland, or Guelderland (gél'dér-land), or Guelders (gél'dérz), D. Gelderland (chél'dér-länt), G. Geldern (gél'dern), F. Geldre (gél'dr). A province of the Netherlands. Capital, Arnheim. It is bounded by the Zuyder Zee on the northwest, Overijssel on the northeast, Prussia on the southeast and south, North Brabant on the south, and South Holland and Utrecht on the west. It became a countship in the 11th century, and a duchy in the 14th. It was incorporated by the emperor Charles V. in the realm of the Netherlands in 1543. It joined the Union of Utrecht in 1579, except Upper Gelderland, which was afterward (1713) ceded in great part to Prussia. Area, 1,965 square miles. Population (1891), 520,210.

Geldern (gél'dern). A town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, situated on the Niers 28 miles northwest of Düsseldorf. It was formerly the capital of the duchy of Gelderland. Population (1890), 5,536.

Gelée (zhé-lā'), Claude. See Claude Lorrain.

Gelimer (gél'i-mér or jél'i-mér), or Gilimer (gil'i-mér or jil'i-mér). The last king of the Vandals in Africa. He usurped the throne of Hilderic in 530 A. D., and was himself defeated and taken prisoner by the Byzantine general Belisarius in 533-534. He graced the triumph of Belisarius at Constantinople in the same year, and spent the rest of his life on an estate in Galatia, which was given him by the emperor Justinian. The date of his death is unknown.

Gell (gel), Sir William. Born at Hopton, Derbyshire, 1777; died at Naples, Feb. 4, 1836. An English archaeologist and traveler. In 1801 he visited and explored the Troad. He became a chamberlain of Queen Caroline of England in 1814. He published "Topography of Troy" (1804), "Pompeiana" (an account of the discoveries at Pompeii), "The Topography of Rome and its Vicinity," etc. He lived at Naples and Rome.

Gellatley (gél'at-li), David. A half-witted servant, a character in the novel "Waverley" by Walter Scott.

Gellert (gél'ert). In Welsh tradition, the faithful hound of Llewelyn. He was killed by his master, who, seeing him come toward him covered with blood, thought that he had killed the child he was set to guard. A huge wolf was found under the overturned cradle dead—slain by the dog. Llewelyn, overcome with remorse, buried Gellert honorably, and erected a monument to his memory. The place, Bethgellert, in North Wales, is still shown. This story, with slight differences, was current in very ancient times in Persia, India, China, and elsewhere.

Gellert (gél'ert), Christian Fürchtegott. Born at Hainichen, near Freiberg, Saxony, July 4, 1715; died at Leipzig, Dec. 13, 1769. A German poet. He was the son of a clergyman. He studied theology at Leipzig, where he was docent and subsequently professor of philosophy, in which post he died. He was the author of the romance "Das Leben der schwedischen Gräfin G." ("The Life of the Swedish Countess G.," 1746), and of several comedies, among them "Die zärtlichen Schwwestern" ("The Fond Sisters"), "Die Betschwestern" ("The Devotees"), and "Das Loos in der Lotterie" ("The Chance in the Lottery"). His fame, however, rests upon his sacred songs and his fables, which have become classics. "Fabeln und Erzählungen" ("Fables and Tales") appeared in 1746, "Geistliche Oden und Lieder" ("Sacred Odes and Songs") in 1757. His lectures at Leipzig, where he may be said to have set the literary tone and to have fashioned the taste of the time, attracted attention throughout Germany. His works were published at Leipzig in 1839 in 10 vols.; his letters at Leipzig in 1861; his diary at Leipzig in 1862.

Gellius (jél'i-us), Aulus. Born perhaps about 130 A. D.; lived in the 2d century. A Roman grammarian, author of "Noctes Atticæ" in twenty books (first printed 1469). Of the eighth book only the table of contents survives. His work is valuable as a conscientious account of all that he could learn about archaic literature and language, laws, philosophy, and natural science.

Geinhausen (geln'hou-zen). A small town in the province of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, on the Kinzig 23 miles east-northeast of Frankfurt-on-the-Main. It was formerly an imperial city, and contains a ruined imperial palace.

Gelon (jē'len). [Gr. Γέλων.] Died about 478 B. C. A Sicilian ruler, tyrant of Gela (491) and later of Syracuse (485). He defeated the Carthaginians at Himera in the autumn of 480.

Gelves, Marquis of. See Carrillo de Mendoza y Pimentel, Diego.

Gemara (ge-mä'ra). [Aram., 'completion,' 'perfection.'] The complement or commentary to the Mishnah (which see), being its dialectical analysis, discussion, and explanation. Its relation to the Mishnah is that of exposition to thesis. The two together constitute the Talmud. See Talmud.

Gembloux (zhōn-blō'). A town in the province of Namur, Belgium, 25 miles southeast of Brussels. Here, in 1578, Don John of Austria defeated the Dutch. Population (1891), 4,019.

Gemini (jem'i-ni). [L., 'twins,'] A zodiacal constellation, giving its name to a sign of the zodiac, lying east of Taurus, on the other side of the Milky Way. It represents the two youths Castor and Pollux sitting side by side. In the heads of the twins respectively are situated the two bright stars which go by their names — Castor to the west, a greenish star intermediate between the first and second magnitudes; and Pollux to the east, a fall yellow star of the first magnitude. The sun is in Gemini from about May 21 till about June 21 (the longest day).

Geminiani (jā-mē-nē-ā'nō), Francesco. Born at Lucca, Italy, 1680; died at Dublin, 1761 (1762?). An eminent Italian violinist, resident in England (except 1748-55, when he lived in Paris) from 1714 until his death. He published "Art of Playing the Violin" (1740).

Gemistus (je-mis'tus), or Plethon (plē'thon), Georgius, or Gemistus Plethon. ["George the Full," so surnamed on account of his great learning; Gr. Γεώργιος ὁ Πλεθών or ὁ Πλάτων.] Lived in the first half of the 15th century. A celebrated Byzantine Platonic philosopher and scholar, probably a native of Constantinople. He was present at the Council of Florence, 1438, as a deputy of the Greek Church, and was influential in spreading the knowledge of the Platonic philosophy in the West.

Gemma. See Alphacca.

Gemmi (gem'mē), Die. A pass in the Bernese Alps, Switzerland, south of the Lake of Thun, leading from Kandersteg (Bern) to Bad Leuk (Valais). Highest point, 7,553 feet.

Gemünder (ge-mün'der), George. Born at Ingeltingen, Würtemberg, April 13, 1816. A German-American violin-maker.

Genappe (zhē-nap'). A village in Belgium, 18 miles south of Brussels: often mentioned in the Waterloo campaign.

Genazzano (jā-nat-sā'nō). A town in the province of Rome, Italy, 26 miles east of Rome. Population, about 4,000.

Gendebien (zhōnd-byān'), Alexandre Joseph Célestin. Born at Mons, Belgium, May 4, 1789; died Dec. 6, 1869. A Belgian statesman. He settled at Brussels as a lawyer in 1811, and Sept. 25, 1833, became a member of the provisional government which effected the separation of Belgium from Holland.

Gendron (zhōn-drōn'), Auguste. Born at Paris, 1818; died there, July 12, 1881. A French painter, a pupil of Paul Delaroche.

Genelli (gā-nel'lē), Bonaventura. Born at Berlin, Sept. 28, 1798; died at Weimar, Germany, Nov. 13, 1868. A German painter.

Genesee (jen-e-sē'). [Amer. Ind., 'pleasant valley,'] A river in western New York, which rises in Potter County, Pennsylvania, and flows into Lake Ontario 7 miles north of Rochester. It is noted for its falls (at Rochester, 95 feet; Portage Falls, 110 feet; and several others). It gives name to a geological epoch. Length, about 200 miles.

Genesis (jen'e-sis). [Gr. γένεσις, origin, beginning.] The first book of the Old Testament. It records the creation of the world, the flood and the ensuing dispersion of races, and gives a more detailed history of the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The traditional view ascribes the authorship to Moses. Most modern scholars, however, find in it various periods of authorship, and particularly two chief sources, the so-called Jehovistic and Elohistic. According to the latter view, the dates of composition fall chiefly within the periods of Judah and Israel (about the 8th century B. C.), the last redaction occurring perhaps after the return from Babylon. In Hebrew the book is designated by its first word, B'reshith, 'In the beginning'; the title Genesis was supplied in the early Greek translation.

Genesius (je-nē'si-us), Josephus, or Josephus Byzantinus (of Byzantium). Lived about 950. A Byzantine historian. He wrote, by order of the emperor Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus, a history of the Eastern Empire from 813 to 886. This work, which is written in Greek, and entitled Βασιλικὴ Βιβλία Δ, was discovered in MS. at Leipsic in the 16th century, and, although an indifferent compilation, attracted much attention because it covers a period for which there are few other sources. The first printed edition appeared at Venice (1733) in the Venetian Collection of the Byzantines.

Genesta (je-nes'tā). A cutter designed by J. Beaver-Webb and launched at Glasgow, April, 1884. Her dimensions are: length over all, 96.40 feet; length, load water-line, 81 feet; beam, 15 feet; beam, load water-line, 15 feet; draught, 13 feet; and displacement, 141 tons. She won 19 prizes in England in 1884. She was built expressly for the race for the America's cup, but was beaten by the Puritan in two races, Sept. 14 and Sept. 16, 1885.

Genêt (zhe-nā') (originally Genest), Edmond Charles. Born at Versailles, France, Jan. 8, 1765; died at Schodak, N. Y., July 14, 1834. A French diplomatist, brother of Madame Campan. He was appointed minister to the United States in Dec., 1792, and arrived at Charleston, S. C., in April, 1793. On the refusal of Washington to join France in the war of the revolutionary government against England, he sought to compel the President to change his attitude by popular agitation, commissioned privateers, and ordered that prizes should be condemned by the French consuls in the United States. He was superseded at the request of Washington, but remained in the United States and settled in the State of New York.

Genetyllis (jen-e-til'is). [Gr. Γενετυλλίς.] In Greek mythology, a goddess, protectress of births, a companion of Aphrodite (Venus). The name is also used as an epithet of Aphrodite and Artemis (Diana). In the plural, Genetyllides, it is applied to a body of divinities presiding over nativity, and attached to the cortege of Aphrodite. Also called Gennaides.

Geneura. See Guinvere and Ginevra.

Geneva (je-nē'vā), F. Genève (zhe-nāv'), G. Genf (genf), It. Ginevra (jē-nā'vrā). A canton in Switzerland, lying between the Lake of Geneva and Vand on the north and France on the east, south, and west. It sends 5 members to the National Council. About 51 per cent. of the population are Roman Catholics, and about 48 per cent. Protestants. The language of 85 per cent. of the population is French. Area, 108 square miles. Population (1888), 105,509.

Geneva. [F. Genève, G. Genf, It. Ginevra; the Roman Genēva: of Celtic origin.] The capital of the canton of Geneva, Switzerland, situated at the southwestern extremity of the Lake of Geneva, where the Rhône issues from it, in lat. 46° 13' N., long. 6° 10' E. It is the wealthiest city in the country, and one of the most important. It has a large trade, and manufactures watches, jewelry, musical boxes, etc. The two parts of the city are connected by the Pont du Mont Blanc and other bridges. The cathedral was consecrated in 1024, but was modified in the next two centuries. The exterior is marred by a Corinthian portico built in the last century. The interior presents good work of the transition from Romanesque to Pointed, and possesses good late-Pointed carved stalls and some fine monuments, notably those of the Rohan family in the 17th century. The beautiful Flamboyant Chapelle des Macchabées is of the 15th century. The monument to Duke Charles II. of Brunswick (died 1873) is a modified reproduction of that to Can Signorio della Scala at Verona. It is hexagonal, and consists of three stages: the lowest a group of massive columns supporting an entablature, the middle one gracefully arcaded and containing a sarcophagus with a recumbent effigy of the duke, and the highest a pinnacled and pedimented canopy upon which is an equestrian statue of the duke. The structure is surrounded by a wall upon which are square piers with tabernacles containing statues of noted Guelphs. The piers are connected by an elaborate grating of metal. The total height is 66 feet. Other objects of interest are the hôtel de ville, the university, the Musée Rath (picture-gallery), and the Musée de l'Ariana. The city is a favorite center for tourists. Geneva was a town of the Allobroges in the 1st century B. C.; later it was a Roman city. It was the capital of the early Burgundian kingdom, and it belonged to the Franks, to the later Burgundian kingdom, and to the empire in succession. In the middle ages it was under the influence of the bishops of Geneva and the counts (later dukes) of Savoy. It was allied with Fribourg in 1518, and with Bern in 1526. The Reformation was officially introduced in 1535; and it became a center of the Reformation under the lead of Calvin 1536-64. The republic of the Savoyards in the so-called "escalade" of 1602 is still celebrated in the city. It was incorporated with France in 1798. The city and canton entered the Swiss Confederation in 1815. A liberal constitution was adopted in 1847. Geneva was the birthplace of Rousseau. Population (1888), 52,638; including suburbs, 78,482.

Geneva. A village in Ontario County, New York, situated at the northern extremity of Seneca Lake, 38 miles southeast of Rochester: the seat of Hobart College (Protestant Episcopal). Population (1890), 7,557.

Geneva, Lake of, or Lake Lemán. [F. Lac de Genève, or Lac Léman, G. Genfersee, L. Lemanus (or Lemannus) Lacus.] The largest lake of Switzerland, bordering on Haute-Savoie (France) and the cantons of Geneva, Vaud, and Valais. Length, 45 miles. Greatest width, 8½ miles. Area, 225 square miles. Height above sea-level, about 1,230 feet.

Geneva Convention. An international convention of various European states held at Geneva, Switzerland, Aug., 1864, designed to lessen the needless suffering of soldiers in war. It provided for the neutrality of the members and buildings of the medical departments on battle-fields.

Geneva Tribunal. A tribunal of arbitration provided for by the treaty of Washington for the settlement of the Alabama claims (which see).

Genevieve (jen-e-vēv'). The heroine of a poem by Coleridge, entitled "Love." The poem is sometimes called by her name.

Geneviève (zhen-vyāv'). L. Genovefa, Saint. Born at Nanterre, near Paris, about 422; died at Paris, Jan. 3, 512. The patron saint of Paris, reputed to have saved the city from Attila by her prayers in 451.

Geneviève, G. Genoveva or Genovefa (gā-nō-fā'fā'), of Brabant, Saint. The wife of Count Siegfried of Brabant. She is the subject of a popular medieval legend, according to which she lived about the middle of the 8th century, and was the wife of the palatine Siegfried. She was falsely accused by the major-domo Golo of adultery, and was sentenced to be put to death. Abandoned in a forest by the executioner, she lived six years in a cave in the Ardennes, together with her son, who during infancy was nourished by a roe. The roe, being pursued in the chase by Siegfried, took refuge in the cave, and led to the reunion of Geneviève and her husband, who had in the meantime discovered the treachery of Golo.

Geneviève, Sainte, Church of. See Panthéon. Genèvre (zhe-nāv'), Mont. A pass in the Cottian Alps, leading from France (department of Hautes-Alpes) to Italy (province of Turin). Height, about 6,560 feet.

Genenbach (geng'en-bäch). A small town in Baden, on the Kinzig 17 miles southeast of Strassburg. It was formerly independent.

Genoa (jen'ō-ā). A province in the compartimento of Liguria, Italy. Area, 1,582 square miles. Population (1891), 811,278.

Genoa. [Formerly Genau, Jean, etc., from OF. Gene, F. Gènes, Sp. Pg. Genova, It. Genova, MGr. Γένοα, Γενόα, G. Genna, from L. Genua.] A seaport, capital of the province of Genoa, Italy, situated on the Gulf of Genoa in lat. 44° 25' N., long. 8° 55' E.: from its magnificent situation surnamed "La Superba." It is the leading seaport of Italy. The imports include sugar, coal, iron, etc. It has a large harbor protected by piers. The cathedral dates from the 14th century, but with older and French elements incorporated. The western façade, of black and white marble, has recessed early-Pointed doors, with foliage-capitals. Some of the column-shafts are twisted. On the south side there is a canopied porch with Romanesque sculpture. The interior contains interesting paintings, inlaid choir-stalls, and tombs, and a domed baptistry with sculptured altar and tabernacle, carvings by Sansovino, and a Romanesque façade. The Church of San Giovanni di Prè, built by the Knights of St. John in the 13th century, is of two stories with pillars and round arches. The crypt is interesting, in both architecture and sculpture resembling the English Romanesque. The Campo Santo is a great quadrangle filled with roses, surrounded by a massive two-storied cloister containing many beautiful sculptured tombs. In the middle of one side there is a handsome domed circular chapel; the gallery around the dome is supported by 16 Doric columns of black marble 27 feet high. This monumental burial-place was begun in 1338. The Palazzo del Municipio, formerly Palazzo Doria, is a 16th-century late-Renaissance building. The façade has two tiers of pilasters and an entablature, and is flanked by terraces with graceful balustraded arcades. The Palazzo Ducale now serves for various public offices. The medieval prison-tower remains. The façade is an imposing work of the Renaissance, with columns and statues. Other objects of interest are various other palaces, the statue of Columbus, and the churches of Santa Maria in Carignano and of San Matteo. Genoa existed from Roman times. It became a republic and a great maritime power in the middle ages, the rival of Pisa and Venice, having extensive trade and settlements in the Levant, the Crimea, the western Mediterranean, etc. The dogate was established in 1339. Genoa gained a great naval victory over Pisa at Meloria in 1284; took part in the Crusades; was defeated by Venice in 1380; was liberated from the French by Andrea Doria in 1528; lost its possessions to the Turks and others; was taken by the French in 1684 and by the Imperialists in 1746; ceded Corsica to France in 1768; was transformed into the Ligurian Republic in 1797; was unsuccessfully defended by Masséna against the English and Austrian forces in 1800; was incorporated with France in 1805; capitulated to the English in 1814; was annexed to Sardinia as a duchy in 1815; and was the scene of an insurrection in 1849. Population (estimated, 1891), 210,000.

Gentilesse (jen-ti-lés'). A poem by Chaucer. It not only occurs independently, but is quoted in Scogan's poem addressed "unto the Lordes and Gentilmen of the Kinges house"; hence this poem of Scogan's was included in Chaucer's collected works.

Gentili (jen-tê'lê), Alberico. Born at Sanginesio, Ancona, Jan. 14, 1552; died at London, June 19, 1608. An Italian jurist, one of the earliest authorities on international law. He resided in England from 1580, and taught law at Oxford. From about 1590 he lived in London.

Still more important were the services of Gentili to the law of nations, which he was the first to place upon a foundation independent of theological differences, and to develop systematically with a wealth of illustration, historical, legal, biblical, classical, and patristic, of which subsequent writers have availed themselves to a much greater extent than might be inferred from their somewhat scanty acknowledgments of indebtedness. His principal contributions to the science are contained in the "De Legationibus," the "De Jure Belli," and the "Advocatio Hispanica." The first of these was the best work upon embassy which had appeared up to the date of its publication. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Gentilly (zhôn-tê-yê'). A town in the department of Seine, France, situated directly south of the fortifications of Paris. Population (1891), commune, 15,017.

Gentz (gents), Friedrich von. Born at Breslau, Prussia, May 2 (Sept. 8?), 1764; died near Vienna, June 9, 1832. A German publicist and diplomatist, in the Prussian and later in the Austrian service. He was chief secretary at the congresses of Vienna (1814-15), Aix-la-Chapelle (1818), Carlsbad and Vienna (1819), Troppan (1820), Laibach (1821), and Verona (1822). His chief work is "Fragmente aus der neuesten Geschichte des politischen Gleichgewichts" (1804).

Gentz, Wilhelm. Born at Neuruppin, Dec. 9, 1822; died at Berlin, Aug. 23, 1890. A German painter, a pupil in Paris of Gleyre and Couture. He traveled extensively in Spain, Morocco, Egypt, Asia Minor, and elsewhere in the East. Among his works are "Funeral near Cairo" (Dresden Gallery). "Entry of the German Crown Prince into Jerusalem in 1869" (National Gallery), "Christ among the Pharisees and Publicans" (Cherwitz), "Halt of Caravan" (Stettin).

Genzano (jen-zâ'nô). A small town in Italy, 17 miles southeast of Rome.

Geoffrey (jêf'ri) (Starkey), surnamed "The Grammarian." [ML. Galfridus Grammaticus.] Flourished about the middle of the 15th century. A Norfolk preaching friar, compiler of the "Promptorium Parvulorum" (which see). Other works also are attributed to him.

Geoffrey. Died in 1212. Archbishop of York, natural son of Henry II. and a woman named Ykenai or Hikenai. He was appointed bishop of Lincoln in 1173, a post which he exchanged in 1182 for that of chancellor of England. He aided his father against his rebellious half-brothers 1173-74, fought with distinction in the war against France 1187-89, and was the only one of Henry's children present at his death-bed (1189). He was nominated archbishop of York by Richard I. in 1189, and in 1207 was banished by John for opposing the latter's oppressive taxation.

Geoffrey, Count of Brittany. Born Sept. 23, 1158; died Aug. 19, 1186. The fourth son of Henry II. of England and Eleanor. He joined his brothers in their revolt against their father. He married Constance of Brittany, by whom he was the father of Prince Arthur.

Geoffrey Crayon, Gent. See Crayon.

Geoffrey of Anjou, surnamed Plantagenet. Born Aug. 24, 1113; died Sept. 7, 1151. Count of Anjou, son of Fulk V. He married, in 1129, Matilda, daughter of Henry I. of England, and widow of the emperor Henry V. He waged war successfully against Stephen of Blois for the possession of Normandy, which he claimed through his wife, and accompanied Louis VII. to the Holy Land in 1147. He derived his surname from the plant named genêt, a species of broom, which he wore as a plume on his helmet.

Geoffrey of Monmouth. [Lat. Galfridus (Galfridus) Monemutensis.] Born, probably at Monmouth, about 1100; died at Llandaff in 1152 or 1154. An English chronicler. He may have been a monk at the Benedictine monastery at Monmouth. He was in Oxford in 1129, where he met Archdeacon Walter (not Walter Map), from whom he professed to have obtained the foundation of his "Historia Regum Britannie." In 1152 he was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph, having been ordained priest in the same year. It does not appear that he visited his see. The "Historia Regum Britannie" was issued in some form in Latin from the British or Cymric MS. by 1139; the final edition, as we now possess it, was finished in 1147. The first critical printed edition is "Galfridi Monemutensis Historia Britonum nunc primum in Anglia novem codd. MSS. collatis, ed. J. A. Giles" (1844). The publication of this book marks an epoch in the literary history of Europe; in less than fifty years the Arthurian and Round Table romances based upon it were naturalized in Germany and Italy, as well as in France and England. It is thought that Geoffrey compiled it from the Latin Nennius and a book of Breton legends now perished. It was abridged by Alfred of Beverley; and Geoffrey Gaimar and Wace translated it into Anglo-Norman about the middle of the 12th century. Layamon and Robert of Gloucester translated Wace into semi-Saxon or transition English, and later chroniclers used it as sober history. Shakspeare knew the legends through Holinshed. Geoffrey also wrote a Latin translation of the prophecies of Merlin. A life of Merlin has also been ascribed to him, perhaps incorrectly. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Geoffrin (zhô-frañ'), Madame (Marie Thérèse Rodet). Born at Paris, June 2, 1699; died at Paris, Oct. 6, 1777. A noted leader of Parisian literary society. She was not a highly educated woman, but possessed an extraordinary power of reading character, and was equally a favorite with royalty and with the fashionable, literary, and artistic circles of France and Germany.

Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire (zhô-frwâ'san-tê-lâr'), Etienne. Born at Étampes, April 15, 1772; died at Paris, June 19, 1844. A noted French zoologist and comparative anatomist. He became professor of zoology at the Jardin des Plantes, at Paris, in 1793; joined the Egyptian expedition in 1798; was one of the founders of the Institute of Cairo, and made important scientific investigations and collections; and in 1809 was appointed professor of zoology in the Faculty of Sciences at Paris. His zoological views led to a famous dispute with Cuvier. His published works are numerous.

Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire, Isidore. Born at Paris, Dec. 16, 1805; died at Paris, Nov. 10, 1861. A French zoologist, son of Etienne Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire. He became professor at the Museum of Natural History at Paris in 1841, and in the Faculty of Sciences in 1850.

Geoffry (jêf'ri). Bishop of Coutances. Died at Coutances, Feb. 3, 1093. A Norman prelate, one of the chief supporters of William the Conqueror.

Geok-Tepe, or Gök-Tepe. A former stronghold of the Tekke Turkomans, situated in Asiatic Russia about lat. 38° N., long. 57° 30' E. It was captured by the Russians under Skobeleff in Jan., 1881.

George (jôrj), Saint. [Gr. Γεώργιος, I. Georgios; from Gr. γεωργός, a farmer; F. Georges, George, It. Giorgio, Sp. Pg. Jorge, G. George.] A Christian martyr, a native of Cappadocia and military tribune under Diocletian, put to death at Nicomedia in 303. The details of his life and death are unknown, and even his existence has been doubted. He was honored in the Oriental churches, and in the 14th century, under Edward III., was adopted as the patron saint of England, where he had been popular from the time of the early Crusades: for he was said to have come to the aid of the Crusaders against the Saracens under the walls of Antioch, 1089, and was then chosen by many Normans under Robert, son of William the Conqueror, as their patron. Many legends were connected with his name during the middle ages, the most notable of which is the legend of his conquest of the dragon (the devil) and the delivery from it of the king's daughter Sabra (the Church). He was the "Christian hero" of the middle ages.

George, Saint, and the Dragon. A painting by Raphael (1506), in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. The saint, clad in armor and riding a white horse, charges the monster and transfixes him with his spear as he turns to flee. St. George wears the insignia of the Garter.

George I. Born at Hanover, March 28, 1660; died at Osnabrück, June 11, 1727. King of Great Britain and Ireland 1714-27, son of Ernest Augustus, elector of Hanover, and Sophia, granddaughter of James I. through Elizabeth Stuart, queen of Bohemia. He married his cousin Sophia Dorothea, daughter of the Duke of Zelle, in 1682, and succeeded his father as elector of Hanover in 1698. His mother died May 28, 1714. On the death of Queen Anne, Aug. 1, 1714, he succeeded to the English throne by virtue of the Act of Settlement, passed by Parliament in 1701, which, in default of issue from Anne and William, entailed the crown on the electress Sophia and her heirs, being Protestant. He was crowned at Westminster Oct. 20, 1714. He nominated at his accession a Whig ministry, with Townshend as prime minister, to the exclusion of the Tory party, which he regarded with suspicion as the stronghold of the Jacobites and of the Roman Catholics. In Jan., 1715, he dissolved the Tory Parliament left by Queen Anne, and by a liberal use of the crown patronage secured a large Whig majority in the new Parliament, which convened in March following. In Sept., 1715, a Jacobite rising took place in Scotland under the Earl of Mar, who was subsequently joined by the Pretender. The rebellion was speedily put down by the Duke of Argyll, but the excitement which it produced was taken advantage of to pass the Septennial Act, providing for septennial instead of triennial parliaments, thus enabling the new dynasty to become firmly settled on the throne before a new election of Parliament. In 1717 he further strengthened his position by concluding the Triple Alliance with France and Holland, which guaranteed the Hanoverian succession, and which was joined by the emperor in the following year. In 1717 Stanhope was appointed prime minister: he was succeeded in 1721 by Walpole, who held office during the remainder of the reign.

George II. Born at Hanover, Nov. 10, 1683; died at London, Oct. 25, 1760. King of Great Britain and Ireland 1727-60, son of George I. and Sophia Dorothea. He married Wilhelmina Charlotte Caroline of Ansbach Sept. 2, 1705; was declared Prince of Wales Sept. 27, 1714; and succeeded to the throne of Great Britain and Ireland and to the electorate of Hanover on the death of his father, June 11, 1727. He continued his father's domestic policy of favoring the Whigs, and retained Walpole as prime minister until 1742. His foreign policy was chiefly dictated by his anxiety for the safety of Hanover amid the contending powers on the Continent. He maintained an alliance with Maria Theresa of Austria in the first and second Silesian wars (1740-42 and 1744-45), and commanded the Pragmatic army in person at the victory of Dettingen over the French, June 27, 1743. In 1745 a Jacobite rising took place in Scotland under the Young Pretender, who was totally defeated by the Duke of Cumberland, second son of George II., at the battle of Culloden, April 27, 1746. In June, 1751, hostilities broke out between England and France in America. The probability of a French attack on Hanover induced George II. to conclude a treaty for the mutual guarantee of the integrity of Germany with Frederick II. of Prussia at Westminster Jan. 17, 1756. In the same year Frederick commenced the third Silesian or Seven Years' War, in which England sided with Prussia. The Duke of Cumberland was defeated by the French at Hastenbeck, July 26, 1757, and driven out of Hanover. The accession to power of the coalition ministry under Pitt and Newcastle, June 29, 1757, gave, however, a new aspect to the war. The Duke of Cumberland was replaced by Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, who regained Hanover in 1758; and the last years of the king's reign saw the British armies victorious in India and in Canada, and the British fleet in control of the seas.

George III. Born at London, June 4, 1738; died at Windsor, Jan. 29, 1820. King of Great Britain and Ireland 1760-1820, son of Frederick Louis, prince of Wales, and Augusta, daughter of Duke Frederick II. of Saxe-Gotha. He succeeded to the throne of Great Britain and Ireland and to the electorate of Hanover on the death of his grandfather, George II., Oct. 25, 1760, and married Charlotte Sophia of Mecklenburg-Strelitz Sept. 8, 1761. His domestic policy was characterized by a prolonged and partly successful effort to break the power of the Whig party, which had maintained control of the government under his two predecessors, and to restore the royal prerogative to the position which it had occupied under the Stuarts. He was involved in the war of the American Revolution and the Napoleonic wars. His most notable prime ministers were Lord North (1770-82) and the younger Pitt (1783-1801 and 1804-06), both of whom consented to shape their policy in the main in accordance with the demands of the king. At his accession he found the Seven Years' War in progress, of which the French and Indian war in America formed a part. He concluded the peace of Paris with France, Spain, and Portugal, Feb. 10, 1763, by which England acquired Canada from France and Florida from Spain.

The arbitrary and oppressive financial policy which he adopted toward the American colonies after the return of peace caused the outbreak of the American Revolution in 1775. The war which ensued was practically ended by the capitulation of Cornwallis Oct. 19, 1781; and the independence of the colonies was acknowledged by the peace of Versailles Sept. 3, 1783. The legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland was effected Jan. 1, 1801. In 1793 war broke out between England and the revolutionary government in France, which, with a short interruption in 1802-03, was continued until the downfall of Napoleon and the restoration of the Bourbons. During 1812-15 a war was also carried on against the United States. After several temporary attacks of mental derangement, the king became hopelessly insane in 1811, and during the rest of his reign the government was conducted under the regency of the Prince of Wales (afterward George IV.).

George IV. Born at London, Aug. 12, 1762; died at Windsor, June 26, 1830. King of Great Britain and Ireland 1820-30, son of George III. and Charlotte Sophia of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. He contracted an illegal marriage with Mrs. Fitzherbert, Dec. 21, 1785, and, April 8, 1795, married his cousin Caroline Amelia Elizabeth of Brunswick. While prince of Wales he cultivated the friendship of the opposition leaders, including Fox and Sheridan, and gained the ill will of his father by his extravagance and dissolute habits. He was appointed regent when his father became insane in 1811, and succeeded him on the throne of Great Britain and in the kingdom of Hanover, Jan. 29, 1820. On his appointment to the regency he abandoned his former Whig associates and allied himself with the Tories. He refused to permit his queen to be present at the coronation, and, June 6, 1820, instituted proceedings in the House of Lords for a divorce on the ground of infidelity. The proceedings were subsequently abandoned for want of evidence. The chief event of his reign was the passage of the Catholic Emancipation Act during the ministry of the Duke of Wellington, April 13, 1829.

George V. Born at Berlin, May 27, 1819; died at Paris, June 12, 1878. King of Hanover, son of Ernest Augustus whom he succeeded in 1851. He sided with Austria in 1866, with the result that his dominions were annexed by Prussia in the same year.

George I. (Christian Wilhelm Ferdinand Adolphus). Born at Copenhagen, Dec. 24, 1845. King of the Hellenes, the second son of Christian IX. of Denmark. He was elected king of the Hellenes by the Greek National Assembly, March 30, 1863, at the instance of the great powers, which, in order to secure his acceptance of the proffered dignity, were induced to restore the Ionian Islands to Greece. The principal event of his reign has been the incorporation in 1881, through the intervention of the great powers, of the greater part of Thessaly and a small part of Epirus with Greece. He married the grand duchess Olga, daughter of the grand duke Constantine, Oct. 27, 1867.

George, surnamed "The Bearded." Born Aug. 27, 1471; died April 17, 1539. Duke of Saxony, son of Albert the Brave whom he succeeded in 1500. He was educated for the priesthood, and is chiefly noted for his opposition to the Reformation, which was favored by his uncle, the Elector of Saxony. He attended the disputation between Eck and Luther at Leipsic, July 4-14, 1519, and subsequently himself engaged in debate with Luther. He sought in vain to prevent, by imprisonment and execution, the spread in his dominions of the principles of the Reformation, which were adopted by his brother Henry who succeeded him in the duchy.

George, Prince of Denmark. Born April 23 (21?), 1653; died Oct. 28, 1708. The husband of Queen Anne of England, whom he married July 28, 1683. He was the second son of Frederick III. of Denmark and Sophia Amalia, daughter of the Duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg, grandfather of George I. of England.

George of Cappadocia. Born probably at Epiphania in Cilicia about 300 A. D.; suffered martyrdom at Alexandria in 361. An Arian bishop of Alexandria 356-361.

George of Cyprus. Died 1290. A learned Byzantine writer. Though a layman, he was elevated to the patriarchate of Constantinople in 1283; he resigned in 1289. He adopted the name of Gregory at his elevation. He is the author of a number of works, mostly theological, including an autobiography in Greek, which was published at Venice in 1753 by J. F. Bernard de Rubens under the title "Vita Georgii Cyprii."

George of Laodicea. A Semi-Arian bishop of Laodicea. Concerning his age little is known, except that he was an occupant of the episcopal chair in 330, and that he was still an occupant of it in 361. He headed the Semi-Arian party at the Council of Selencia in Isauria in 359.

George the Pisidian, L. Georgius Pisides (jē-ōr'ji-us pis'i-dēs) or Pisida (pis'i-dā). A Byzantine poet who lived about the middle of the 7th century. He is described in the manuscripts of his writings as a deacon, record-keeper, and keeper of the sacred vessels in the Church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, and appears to have accompanied the emperor Heraclius on his first expedition against the Persians (622). Among his extant works are an epic poem treating of this expedition.

George of Trebizond. Born in Crete, April 4, 1396; died at Rome about 1486. A celebrated humanist. He became professor of Greek at Venice about 1428, and subsequently removed to Rome, where, about 1450, he became a papal secretary. He was an ardent advocate of the Aristotelian system of philosophy, in opposition to his contemporary, the Platonic philosopher Gemistus Plethon. He translated many of the Greek classics into Latin, and wrote "Rhetorica" (1470), "Comparationes Philosophorum Platonis et Aristotelis" (1523), etc.

George, Cape. See St. George, Cape.

George, Henry. Born at Philadelphia, Sept. 2, 1839. An American writer on political economy and sociology. He went to sea at an early age, and in 1855 settled in California, where he became a journalist. In 1879 he published his chief work, "Progress and Poverty." He removed in 1880 to New York, where he was an unsuccessful candidate of the United Labor Party for the mayoralty in 1886, and where he shortly afterward founded a weekly paper called the "Standard." Besides "Progress and Poverty" he has published "The Land Question" (1883), "Social Problems" (1884), "Protection or Free Trade" (1886), and other works.

George, Lake. [Named from George II. in 1755 by William Johnson.] A lake in the eastern part of New York. Its waters are carried by Ticonderoga creek into Lake Champlain. It is inclosed by mountains, and is noted for its picturesque scenery. It was the scene of military operations in the French and Indian and Revolutionary wars. A series of engagements was fought here Sept. 8, 1755: in the morning the French force under Dieskau defeated the English under Williams, etc.; and in the afternoon the English under Lyman (nominally under Johnson) defeated Dieskau at the head of the lake. The Indians called it Horicon, the French St. Saerement. Length, 36 miles. Width, 1 to 4 miles.

George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield. A "pleasant conceited comedy" by Robert Greene, licensed 1595, printed 1599. It is thought to be founded on an early prose romance, "The History of George-a-Green," preserved in Thom's "Early Prose Romances." It also owes something to the ballad "The Jolly Pinner of Wakefield with Robin Hood Scarlet and John." George a Green, a "flunsher of the Bower," is introduced by Jonson in "The Sad Shepherd."

George Barnwell, or The London Merchant. A tragedy by George Lillo, produced in 1731. It is founded on an old ballad preserved by Ritson and Percy.

George Bay (Nova Scotia). See St. George Bay.

George Dandin (zhorzh don-dān'), ou le mari confondu. A comedy by Molière, first played July 19, 1660. George Dandin is a man of humble origin whose money procures him the doubtful honor of a marriage with Angélique, a woman of noble birth. She and her lover turn the tables upon him whenever he seeks to convict them of their guilt, and even force him to apologize. He addresses to himself the well-known reproach "Vous l'avez voulu, vous l'avez voulu, George Dandin, vous l'avez voulu" ("You would have it so"). His name is a synonym for a weak husband.

Georges (zhorzh), Mademoiselle (Marguerite Georges Wemmer). Born at Bayeux, France, about 1786; died at Paris, Jan., 1867. A French actress, especially famous in tragedy.

George Sand. See Sand, George.

Georgetown (jōr'j-ton). [Named from George II. of England.] 1. A port of entry, forming part of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, situated on the Potomac 2½ miles west-northwest of the Capitol. It is the seat of Georgetown College (Roman Catholic), chartered as a university in 1815. Georgetown was founded in 1751, and incorporated as a city in 1789. Its charter was repealed in 1871, and it was incorporated with Washington in 1878. Now called West Washington. Population (1890), 14,046.

2. The capital of Scott County, Kentucky, 18 miles east of Frankfort: the seat of Georgetown College (Baptist). Population (1890), 5,864.—3. A seaport and the capital of Georgetown County, South Carolina, situated on Winyaw Bay 54 miles northeast of Charleston. Population (1890), town, 2,895; village, 4,978.—4. Formerly the Dutch Stabroek. A seaport and the capital of British Guiana, situated on the Demerara near its mouth. Population (1891), 53,176.

George Wilkes (jōrj wilks). A trotting stallion by Hambletonian (10), dam Dolly Spanker. Next to Electioneer he was the most successful sire among Hambletonian's sons.

Georgia (jōr'jiā). [Russ. Grusia, Pers. and Turk. Gurjistan.] A designation (non-official) of a region in Transcaucasian Russia, nearly corresponding to the modern governments Yelisabetpol, Koutais, and Tiflis. It is almost identical with the ancient Iberia. Georgia was conquered by Alexander the Great, but soon after his death became an independent kingdom. It was at its height about 1200, and had a flourishing literature. It was subdivided in the beginning of the 15th century, and was annexed by Russia in 1801. The Georgians are a very handsome race, of the purest Caucasian type.

Georgia. [Named from George II. of England.] One of the Southern States of the United States of America. Capital, Atlanta. It is bounded by Tennessee and North Carolina on the north, South Carolina (from which it is separated by the Savannah River) and the Atlantic Ocean on the east, Florida on the south, and Alabama (from which it is separated in part by the Chattahoochee River) on the west. The surface is level in the north, undulating in the center, and mountainous in the north. It is one of the chief cotton-producing States. Other leading products are lumber, rice, etc. The chief minerals are gold, iron, and coal. The recent development of its manufactures, particularly of cotton, woollens, and iron, is notable. There are 137 counties. It sends 2 senators and 11 representatives to Congress, and has 13 electoral votes. Georgia was settled by a chartered company of English colonists under Oglethorpe in 1733; became a royal province in 1752; was one of the thirteen original States (1776); seceded Jan. 19, 1861; and was readmitted June, 1868. It is called the Empire State of the South. Area, 59,475 square miles. Population (1890), 1,542,180.

Georgia, Gulf of. An inlet of the Pacific Ocean, separating Vancouver Island from British Columbia. It is connected with Queen Charlotte Sound on the north and the Strait of Juan de Fuca on the south. Length, about 250 miles. Greatest width, about 30 miles.

Georgian Bay (jōr'jian bā). The northeastern portion of Lake Huron, from the main body of which it is separated by the Manitoulin group of islands and Cabot's Head. Length, about 120 miles. Width, about 50 miles.

Georgics (jōr'jiks). [L. Georgica carmina, agricultural poems.] A poem by Vergil, in four books, treating of agriculture, the cultivation of trees, domestic animals, and bees.

The subject is treated with evident love and the enthusiasm which belongs to thorough knowledge, and glorified and idealized as much as its character permitted, so that even the didactic parts are not essentially different in tone from those which are purely poetical. The poem has thus been rendered the most perfect of the larger productions of Roman art-poetry.

Teufel and Schaebe, Hist. Rom. Lit., I. 432.

Georgium Sidus (jōr'ji-um si'dus). [NL., 'George's star.'] A name for the planet now called Uranus, given by its discoverer, Sir William Herschel, in honor of George III., but not accepted by astronomers.

Georgswalde (gä'orgs-väl-de). A town in northern Bohemia, 36 miles east of Dresden. Population (1890), commune, 8,754.

Gepidæ (jep'i-dē), or Gepids (jep'idz). [L. (Vopiscus) Gepidæ, Gr. (Procopius) Γηπαδες.] A Germanic tribe, a branch of the Goths, who first appear in history in the reign of Probus, in the 3d century. Their original home was apparently on the Baltic, on the islands at the mouth of the Vistula, whence they joined the general Gothic movement southward. Later they had conquered Dacia, where they were, however, practically annihilated shortly after the middle of the 6th century by the allied Lombards and Avars.

Probably the Thervings and Greutungs were the only people to whom the name of Goths in strictness belonged. There was, however, a third tribe, the Gepids, whom the other two recognized as being, if not exactly Goths, at any rate their nearest kinsfolk, and as having originally formed one nation with them.

Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 7.

Gera (gä'rä). The capital of Reuss (younger line), Germany, on the White Elster 34 miles south-southwest of Leipsic, noted for varied manufactures. Population (1890), 39,599.

Gerace (jä-rä'che). A town in the province of Reggio di Calabria, Italy, in lat. 38° 21' N., long. 16° 17' E., near the site of the ancient Locri Epizephyrii.

Geraint (ge-ränt'). One of the knights of the Round Table. He appears in the Mabingion, in the romance "Geraint the Son of Erbin," which is a Welsh version of Chretien de Troyes's "Erec et Enide." Tennyson has used the story in "Geraint and Enid," one of the "Idylls of the King."

Gerald de Barry or Barri. [L. Gerardus, Geraldus, Giraldus; F. Gérard, Gérard, Girard, Girault; It. Gerardo, Gherardo, Giraldo; G. Gerhard, Gerold.] See Giraldus Cambrensis.

Geraldine (jer'al-din) the Fair. [Fem. of Gerald; It. Giraldia, G. Gerhardine.] The lady celebrated in the sonnets of the Earl of Surrey, identified with Lady Elizabeth Fitzgerald.

Geraldini (jä-räl-dē'nē), Alessandro. Born in Italy, 1455; died at Santo Domingo, 1525. A prelate and scholar. He served as a soldier, subsequently took orders, and about 1485 was made tutor to the Spanish princes. He met Columbus at court, and is said to have favored his schemes. In 1520 he was appointed bishop of Santo Domingo. He wrote a Latin description of his journey thither, and of the island, published after his death with the title "Itinerarium ad regiones sub æquinoctiali plaga constitutas" (Rome, 1631).

Géramb (zhe-roñ'), Baron Ferdinand de. Born at Lyons, April 17, 1772; died at Rome, March 15, 1848. A French Trappist, procurator-general of the order. He published "Pèlerinage à Jérusalem et au mont Sinaï" (1836).

Gérando (zhā-roñ-dō'), Joseph Marie de. Born at Lyons, Feb. 29, 1772; died at Paris, Nov., 1842. A French philosopher and politician. He wrote "Histoire comparée des systèmes de philosophie" (1803), "Du perfectionnement moral" (1824), etc.

Gerard (jē-rärd'), surnamed "The Blessed." Born about 1040; died about 1120. The founder of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, guardian of a hospital at Jerusalem about 1100.

Gerard (jer'ärd), Alexander. Born at Aberdeen, Scotland, Feb. 17, 1792; died there, Feb. 22, 1836. An English soldier and explorer. He served in India as an engineer, making extended surveys. He ascended several peaks and passes of the Himalayas, reaching the height (on Mount Tabigang) of 19,411 feet.

Gérard (zhä-rär'), Cécile Jules Basile. Born at Pignans, Var, France, June 14, 1817; drowned in West Africa, 1864. A French officer, lion-hunter, and traveler in Africa: author of "La chasse au lion" (1855), "Le tueur de lions" (1856), etc.

Gerard (jer'ärd), Charles, Earl of Macclesfield. Died Jan. 7, 1694. A Royalist commander in the civil war in England. He commanded the Royalist forces in South Wales 1644-45; was appointed lieutenant-general of the king's horse and captain of the king's body-guard in 1645; was created Baron Gerard of Brandon in 1645; was appointed vice-admiral of the fleet in 1648; was created earl of Macclesfield in 1679; was banished in 1685 for conspiring against the king; returned to England with the Prince of Orange in 1688; and was sworn of the privy council and made lord president of the council of the Welsh marches, and lord lieutenant of Gloucester, Hereford, Monmouth, and North and South Wales, in 1689.

Gerasa (jer'ä-sä), modern Jerash (je-räsh'). In ancient geography, a city of the Decapolis, Palestine, 56 miles northeast of Jerusalem. It contains many antiquities. The forum, which is oval and 300 feet long, is surrounded by a range of Ionic columns, many of which still stand with their entablature. From it extends a great colonnaded street, intersecting the entire city, and crossed at right angles by another. Over 100 columns still stand along the street. They seem to have formed a series of porticos with galleries above. Among the remains are those of a great temple, the cella of which (66 by 78 feet) is in great part standing, together with many columns of the peristyle. A theater has 28 tiers of seats still remaining above ground, with one precaution, to which vaulted passages give access. In the back wall of the precinct there are small chambers, perhaps boxes. A gallery surrounds the top of the caen. A smaller theater on the same site is equally perfect and interesting.

Gerba. See Jerba.

Gerhardt (gär'härt), Paul (Paulus). Born at Gräfenhainichen, near Wittenberg, Saxony, March 12 (?), 1607; died at Lübben, Prussia, June 7, 1676. A German sacred poet. He studied at Wittenberg, and lived subsequently at Berlin as a tutor until 1657, when he went as a clergyman to Wittenwalde. In 1657 he was made deacon of the Nikolai church in Berlin, a position which he was compelled to renounce in 1666 because he refused to comply with the command of the elector to refrain from teaching from the pulpit the dogmas of Lutheranism as against Calvinism. In 1668, nevertheless, he was called as archdeacon to Lübben, a post which he occupied from the spring of 1669 until his death. His first church hymns were published in 1648. In 1667 appeared the first complete edition of 120 hymns. A historical and critical edition was published at Berlin, 1864.

Géricault (zhä-rë-kô'), Jean Louis André Théodore. Born at Rouen, France, Sept. 26, 1791; died at Paris, Jan. 18, 1824. A French painter. His most noted work, "The Raft of the Medusa" (1819), is in the Louvre. He resided for a time in London.

Germain (jër-män'), George Sackville, first Viscount Sackville (Lord George Sackville 1720-70, Lord George Germain 1770-82). Born Jan. 26, 1716; died Aug. 26, 1785. An English soldier, third son of the first Duke of Dorset, created Viscount Sackville in 1782. He served (as colonel) in Flanders 1743-45; was first secretary to the lord lieutenant and secretary of war for Ireland 1761-66; was appointed major-general in 1755, lieutenant-general in 1757; joined in the descent on the French coast in 1758; served as second in command under Marlborough in Hannover in the same year; and succeeded to the chief command on Marlborough's death. He fell into disgrace on account of blunders committed at the battle of Minden (Aug. 1, 1759), and was dismissed from the army.

German Confederation, G. Deutscher Bund (doit'sher bönt). The confederation of German states constituted by the Congress of Vienna in 1815, replacing the ancient empire, each state remaining independent in internal affairs. Austria (which entered the confederation for her German dominions, Upper and Lower Austria, Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Salzburg, Tyrol, Vorarlberg, Styria, Carinthia and Carniola, Gorz, and Trieste) had the lead. Other members were Prussia, Bavaria, Württemberg, Saxony, Hannover, Baden, Hesse-Cassel, Saxe-Weimar, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Oldenburg, Brunswick, Nassau, Saxe-Altenburg, Saxe-Meiningen, Saxe-Hildburghausen, Saxe-Coburg, Saxe-Gotha, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, the Hohen-zollerns, Liechtenstein, Anhalt-Dessau, Anhalt-Köthen, Waldeck, Reuss (elder line), Reuss (younger line), Lippe, Schaumburg-Lippe, Hesse-Homburg, Lübeck, Frankfurt, Bremen, and Hamburg. Several minor changes took place in the composition of the confederation. The Diet met at Frankfurt-on-the-Main. The King of the Netherlands entered the confederation for Luxembourg, and the King of Denmark for Helstein and Lauenburg. The Prussian provinces of East and West Prussia and Posen were not included. The confederation was dissolved as one result of the war of 1866, and was replaced by the North German Confederation.

Germanicus (jër-man'i-kus), Cæsar. Born 15 B. C.; died near Antioch, Oct. 9, 19 A. D. A Roman general, son of Nero Claudius Drusus and nephew of the emperor Tiberius. He conducted three campaigns against the Germans 14-16, and in the latter year defeated Arminius in a great battle on the Campus Idistavicus between Minden and Hameln. He was recalled through the jealousy of the emperor, received a triumph at Rome in 17, and in 18 was appointed to the command of the eastern provinces. He is said to have been poisoned at the instance of the emperor.

German Milton, The. A name sometimes given to Klopstock.

German Ocean. See North Sea.

German Plato, The. A name sometimes given to Jacobi.

German-Roman Empire. See Holy Roman Empire.

Germans (jër'manz). [L. Germani.] An important Teutonic race inhabiting central Europe: the inhabitants of Germany. At the beginning of the Christian era the Germans occupied central Europe eastward to the Vistula, southward to the Carpathians and Danube, and westward to beyond the Rhine. Among their chief tribes were the Sueti, Lombards, Vandals, Hernali, Chatti, Quadi, Ubi, and Cherusci. After the epoch of migrations in the 3d and 4th centuries, many tribes, as the Franks, Burgundians, Lombards, and Vandals, settled permanently in other regions, and became merged in the new French, Italian, and Spanish nations. In the east the Germans were displaced by Slavs, although important parts of this region have since been Germanized. Since about the 12th century the Germans have called themselves die Deutschen. In medieval and modern times they have occupied a region which has had many political changes, but which has remained of substantially the same extent for centuries. The former Roman-German Empire contained various lands not inhabited by Germans. At the present time the Germans form the great majority in the reconstituted German Empire; they number over one fourth of the inhabitants of Austria-Hungary, chiefly in the western and northwestern parts; there are about 1,000,000 Germans in the Baltic provinces and elsewhere in Russia; and over two thirds of the Swiss are of German race and language.

German Southwest Africa. A German dependency situated between the Orange River and Angola, and between the Atlantic and long. 21°-25° E. It covers 330,000 square miles, with about 150,000 inhabitants, of whom 1,000 are white. North of the Swakop River the country is called Herero- or Namaland; south of it Great Namaland or Namaqualand. The soil is arid, yielding only scant pasturage. In the Kunene valley (Ovampo-land) alone can land suitable for agriculture be found. The hopes of discovering rich mines have not yet been realized. The best harbor of the coast, Walvisch Bay, is British. Five German companies are still at work here—the Colonization Society; the Settlement Company, which is trying to settle German and South African colonists; a private cattle-raising company, with imperial subsidy; and the West African Company and Southwest African Company, which are largely or wholly English. This colony began with the purchase, by F. A. S. Luderitz, of some land around Angra Pequena. Over this Germany hoisted her flag in 1884, claiming at the same time all the coast between the Orange River and Cape Frio. Herero-land was annexed by treaty in 1885, was lost in 1888, and was regained by force in 1889. Portugal in 1886 and England in 1890 recognized the present boundaries. Heric Witbooy, a civilized chief of the Nama Hottentots who had never submitted to the German authorities, was defeated in 1893.

German town (jër'man-toun). A former borough of Pennsylvania, since 1834 a part of Philadelphia, situated 6 miles north-northwest of the old state-house. Here, Oct. 4, 1777, the Americans under Washington were repulsed by the British, the loss of the Americans being about 1,000, that of the British over 600.

Germanus (jër-mä'nus), Saint F. St. Germain l'Auxerrois. Born at Auxerre about 378; died at Ravenna, Italy, about 448. A French prelate, bishop of Auxerre.

Germanus, Saint of Paris. Born at Autun, France, about 496; died about 576. A French prelate, bishop of Paris. The Church of St. Germain-des-Prés (Paris) was named from him.

Germany (jër'ma-ni). [ME. Germanie, OF. Germanie, Sp. Germania, It. Germania, from L.

Germania, Gr. Γερμανία, from L. Germani, Gr. Γερμανοί, Germans. Another name appears in the obs. E. Almain, Almayne, from F. Allemagne, Sp. Alemania, Pg. Almania, It. Almagna, Ml., Almanzia, Almanzia, from Almanni, Almanni, the Alamanni (which see). A third name is the obs. E. Dutehland, ME. Duchetland, D. Deutschland, G. Deutschland.] A country of central Europe. The country has been of widely different extent, and the name of different significance, at different times. The present Germany, or the German Empire (G. Deutsches Reich), one of the great European powers, is bounded by the North Sea, Denmark, and the Baltic Sea on the north, Russia and Austria-Hungary on the east, Austria-Hungary (partly separated by the Sudetic Mountains, Riesengebirge, Erzgebirge, and Alps) and Switzerland (separated mainly by the Rhine and Lake of Constance) on the south, and France (partly separated by the Vosges), Luxembourg (separated by the Moselle and Our), Belgium, and the Netherlands on the west. It extends from lat. 47° 16' to 55° 54' N., and from long. 6° 52' to 22° 53' E. The northern part belongs to the great northern plain; the middle and southern parts are generally hilly and mountainous. The chief mountains are the Alps, Black Forest, Vosges, Swabian and Franconian Jura, Fichtelgebirge, Erzgebirge, Tauern, Thüringerwald, Harz, mountains of Westphalia and the Rhine, Riesengebirge, and Bohmerwald. The chief rivers are the Rhine (with the Moselle, Neckar, and Main), Ems, Weser, Elbe, Oder, Vistula, and Danube. The main products are grain, beet-root, hemp, flax, and wine. There are mines of iron, coal, salt, copper, zinc, lead, silver, etc., and important manufactures of cotton, woolen, linen, iron, steel, sugar, beer, etc. Germany contains 26 states: Prussia, Bavaria, Württemberg, Baden, Saxony, Hesse, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Oldenburg, Brunswick, Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, Saxe-Meiningen, Saxe-Altenburg, Waldeck, Lippe, Schaumburg-Lippe, Reuss (elder line), Reuss (younger line), Anhalt, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, Hamburg, Bremen, Lübeck, and the "Reichsland" Alsace-Lorraine. The government is a constitutional monarchy; the King of Prussia is hereditary German emperor. The legislature consists of a Bundesrat of 58 members and a Reichstag of 397 members. The language of the great majority is German; other nationalities are Poles, Lithuanians, Wends, Czechs, Danes, French, and Walloons. The religion of a large majority is Protestant; about 35 per cent. are Roman Catholics. The foreign dependencies are Togoland, Kamerun, German Southwest Africa (protectorate), German East Africa (protectorate), Kaiser Wilhelm's Land (a protectorate in Papua), Bismarck Archipelago (protectorate), Solomon Islands, and Marshall Islands. The present empire replaced the North German Confederation, and is based on treaties between that body and the different South German states. William I., king of Prussia, was proclaimed emperor at Versailles, Jan. 18, 1871. The empire was one result of the successful war with France in 1870-71. Recent events have been the "Kulturkampf," the rise of the Social Democrats, the union of the three emperors (of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia), replaced by the Triple Alliance (Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy), the acquisition since 1884 of foreign dependencies and "spheres of influence," and the retirement of Bismarck in 1890. (See Germania, Holy Roman Empire, and German Confederation; also Prussia, Bavaria, and the different states.) Area, 2,873,738 square miles. Population (1890), 49,423,470.

He (Tacitus) includes in Germany all the countries lying north of the Danube and west of the line of the Vistula, as far as the Arctic Regions; taking in Bohemia, Silesia, Poland, Pomerania, and a vast number of Slavonian districts besides, over an area about three times as large as that which is now allowed to the Teutonic stock.

Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 41.

Germersheim (ger'mers-him). A fortified town in the Palatinate, Bavaria, situated at the junction of the Queich with the Rhine, 8 miles southwest of Spire. It is an important strategic point, and was the scene of a defeat of the French under Beauharnais by the Austrians under Wurmser, July 19 and 22, 1793. Population (1890), 6,078.

Germinal (zhär-mě-näl'). [F., 'the germinating.'] The name adopted in 1793 by the National Convention of the first French republic for the seventh month of the year. It consisted of 30 days, beginning in the years 1 to 7 with March 21, and in the years 8 to 13 with March 22.

Germinal Insurrection. The insurrection ("bread riots") at Paris against the Convention, 12th Germinal, year III (April 1, 1795).

Gero (gä-rō). Died May 20, 965. A German hero. He was made margrave of the Ostmark in 939, and compelled the Slav tribes between the Elbe and the Oder to acknowledge his suzerainty. He is referred to in the "Nibelungenlied."

Gérôme (zhä-róm'), Jean Léon. Born at Vesoul, Haute-Saône, May 11, 1824. A celebrated French painter, a pupil of Paul Delaroche. He studied in Italy 1844-45, and later traveled in Turkey, Egypt, and elsewhere. He became professor of painting at the Academy of Fine Arts in 1863. His first appearance at the Salon was in 1847. His works include "Madonna and St. John" (1848), "Anacreon with Bacchus and Cupid" (1848), "Bacchus and Cupid Intoxicated" (1850), "Greek Interior," "Souvenir of Italy" (1851), "View of Pestum" (1852), "An Idyl" (1853), "Russian Concert," "Aze of Augustus" (1855), "Egyptian Recruits crossing the Desert," "Mennon and Sesostris," "Camels at a Watering-place" (1857), "Gladiators saluting Caesar," "King Candaules" (1859), "Phryne before the Tribunal," "Alcibiades in the House of Aspasia," "Rembrandt Etching" (1861), "Prisoner" (1863), "Reception of Siamese Ambassadors at Fontainebleau," "Prayer" (1865), "Cleopatra and Caesar," "Door of Mosque of El-Hacamy" (1866), "Slave Market," "Clothing Merchant," "Death of Caesar" (1867), "Seventh of December, 1815" (1868), "Jerusalem," "Cairo Peddler," "Promenade of the Harem" (1869), "Rex Tibicun," "Santon at the door of a Mosque," "Women at the Bath," "Bashi-Bazouks Dancing," "Return from the Chase" (1878), "Slave Market in Rome," "Night in the Desert," "Danse du bâton" (1884), "Great Bath at Brusa" (1885), etc. C. C. Perkins, Cyclopedia of Painters and Paintings.

Gerona (här-rō'nä). 1. A province in Catalonia, Spain, bounded by France on the north, the Mediterranean on the east, and Barcelona and Lerida on the south and west. Area, 2,272 square miles. Population (1887), 305,539.—2. The capital of the province of Gerona, situated on the Ter 55 miles northeast of Barcelona. It has a cathedral which dates from the 14th and 15th centuries. The roof is remarkable in that it covers in a single span, with a vault of 73 feet, the entire width of nave and aisles of the sanctuary. There is a 14th-century cloister, with beautiful capitals. The town is noted for its sieges, especially those of 1808 and 1809 by the French. Population (1887), 15,497.

Gerónimo (je-rōn'i-mō). A North American Indian, chief of the Chiricahua band of the Apache tribe. He commanded a party of hostiles who were pursued first by General George Crook and afterward by General Nelson A. Miles in 1886. He was captured in the summer of that year, and was sent to Fort Pickens, Florida.

Géronte (zhä-rōnt'). In French comedy, a common name for a credulous and ridiculous old man. Originally, as in Corneille's "Le menteur," he was old and not ridiculous, but the Gérontes in Molière's "Le médecin malgré lui" and "Les fourberies de Scapin" became a type. Regnard introduces a Géronte in "Le joueur," "Le retour imprévu," and "Le légataire universel."

Gerontius (je-rōn'ti-shi-us). A British general in the army of the usurper Constantine. He rebelled against his master in 409, and proclaimed one Maximus emperor. He drove Constantine's son, Constans, out of Spain, and, when Constans was captured by the insurgents at Vienna, ordered him to be put to death. He was eventually abandoned by his troops, and, being surrounded by a superior enemy, put himself to death.

Gerrard (je-rärd'). 1. The real name of the King of the Beggars in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Beggars Bush." He goes under the name of Clause.—2. The "gentleman dancing-master" in Weyerher's comedy of that name. He is a perfumed coxcomb who, to conduct an intrigue with Hippolyta under the nose of her father and dnuenna, is induced to assume the rôle of a dancing-master.

Gerrha (jer'hä). In ancient geography, a city of Arabia Felix, situated on the Persian Gulf. It was important in the 7th and 6th centuries B. C., under the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians.

Gerry (ger'i), Elbridge. Born at Marblehead, Mass., July 17, 1744; died at Washington, D. C., Nov. 23, 1814. An American statesman. He was a member of the Continental Congress 1776-80 and 1783-85; a delegate to the Constitutional Convention in 1787; member of Congress from Massachusetts 1789-93; commissioner to France 1797-98; governor of Massachusetts 1809-12; and Vice-President 1813-14. During his governorship the legislature of Massachusetts restricted the State in an arbitrary manner (1811), to procure a majority for the Democrats in the elections for State senators. It was erroneously thought that the restricting was undertaken at his instigation (whence arose the word "gerrymander," in allusion to the fancied resemblance between a salamander and a map of the new districts of the State).

Gers (zhär). A department of southern France, capital Aneh; part of the ancient Gascony. It is bounded by Lot-et-Garonne on the north, Tarn-et-Garonne and Haute-Garonne on the east, Haute-Garonne, Hautes-Pyrénées, and Basses-Pyrénées on the south, and Landes on the west. Area, 2,425 square miles. Population (1891), 261,684.

Gersau (ger'sou). A village in the canton of Schwyz, Switzerland, on the Lake of Lucerne near the Righi. It was a republic from 1390 to the wars of the French Revolution.

Gerson (zher-sōn'), Jean Charlier de. Born at Gerson, Ardennes, Dec. 14, 1363; died at Lyons, July 12, 1429. A noted French theologian. He was chancellor of the University of Paris, and was prominent in the councils of Pisa and Constance, striving for the unity of the church and for ecclesiastical reforms. In 1419 he went to Lyons, where he died. The authorship of the "De imitatione Christi" (which see) has been attributed to him.

Jean Charlier, or Gerson, one of the most respectable and considerable names of the later mediæval literature. Gerson was born in 1363, at a village of the same name in Lorraine. He early entered the Collège de Navarre, and distinguished himself under Peter d'Ailly, the most famous of the later nominalists. He became Chancellor of the University, received a living in Flanders, and for many years preached in the most constantly attended churches of Paris. He represented the University at the Council of Constance, and, becoming obnoxious to the Burgundian party, sought refuge with one of his brothers at Lyons, where he is said to have taught little children. He died in 1429. Gerson, it is perhaps needless to say, is one of the numerous candidates (but one of the least likely) for the honour of having written the "Imitation."

Gersoppa, Falls of. A cataract in the river Shiravati, India, which here breaks through the western Ghats about 100 miles southeast of Goa. Height, 960 feet (in four falls).

Gerstäcker (ger'stek-er), Friedrich. Born at Hamburg, May 10, 1816; died at Brunschwiek, May 31, 1872. A German writer and traveler. In 1837 he went to America, where he traveled extensively until 1843, when he returned to Germany and adopted literature as a profession. During 1849 to 1852 he made a journey around the world. In 1860-61 he traveled in South America. In 1862 he accompanied the Duke of Coburg-Gotha to Egypt and Abyssinia. In 1867 he was in the United States, Mexico, and Venezuela, returning to Germany in 1868. His last years were spent in Brunschwiek. He was a voluminous writer of novels, tales, and stories of adventure in all parts of the world. Bearing upon America are, among others, "Streif- und Jagdzüge durch die Vereinigten Staaten von Nordamerika" ("Rambling and Hunting Excursions through the United States of North America," 1844), "Die Regulatoren in Arkansas" ("The Regulators of Arkansas," 1845), "Die Flusspiraten des Mississippi" ("The River Pirates of the Mississippi," 1848), "Amerikanische Wald- und Strombilder" ("American Forest and Stream Pictures," 1849), "Wie ist es denn nun eigentlich in Amerika?" ("How is it then, really, in America?" 1853), "Nach Amerika" ("To America," 1855), "Kalifornische Skizzen" ("California Sketches," 1856). His collected works appeared after his death in 44 volumes (1872-79).

Gerster (gär'ster), Eitelka. Born at Kaschau, June 16, 1856. A Hungarian singer (soprano). She was a pupil of Madame Marchesi at Vienna, and made her first appearance in 1876 at Venice as Gilda in "Rigoletto." She has sung with success in all the principal cities of Europe. She came to America in 1878, 1880, and 1887. In 1877 she married Pietro Gardini, her director.

Gertrude (gër'tröd), Saint. Died March 17, 659. An abbess of Nivelles in Brabant. She was the daughter of Pippin of Landen, majordomo to Clovis II, and Ita. On the death of Pippin, Ita built a cloister at Nivelles, which included both a monastery and a nunnery, and Gertrude became abbess of the latter. She is commemorated throughout Brabant on March 17.

Gertrude, Saint, surnamed "The Great." Born in Germany, Jan. 6, 1256; died 1311. A German mystic. She was placed in the convent of Helfta at the age of five, and studied the liberal arts with great zeal until her twenty-fifth year, when, in consequence of supernatural visions, she began to devote herself to the study of the Scriptures and the writings of the fathers. Her visions are recorded in her "Insinuationes divine pietatis," the first printed edition of which appeared in 1662. She is commemorated Nov. 15.

Gertrude. 1. In Shakspeare's "Hamlet," the mother of Hamlet, and queen of Denmark. She is a weak woman whose share in her second husband's crime is doubtful. She dies accidentally of poison prepared for Hamlet.

2. The ambitious, extravagant daughter of the goldsmith in Marston, Chapman, and Jonson's "Eastward Hoe."

Gertrude of Wyoming. A poem by Thomas Campbell, published in 1809.

Gertruydenberg, or Gertruidenberg (gër-trōi'den-berg), D. Geertruidenberg (gär-trōi'den-berg). A town in the province of North Brabant, Netherlands, 25 miles southeast of Rotterdam. It was the scene of an unsuccessful conference June 10-July 25, 1710, designed to terminate the war between Louis XIV. and the Allies.

Louis agreed to give up—(1) to the Dutch, ten fortresses in Flanders as a barrier; (2) to the Empire, Luxembourg, Strasburg, Brisach; (3) to the Duke of Savoy, Exilles and Fenestrelles; (4) to England, Newfoundland. But though he would allow the Archduke Charles to be King of Spain, he refused to assist the Allies to expel Philip from Madrid.

Acton and Ransome, Eng. Polit. Hist., p. 128.

Gerund, or Gerundio, Friar. See Fray Gerundio.

Gervais (zher-vä'), Paul. Born at Paris, Sept. 26, 1816; died at Paris, Feb. 10, 1879. A French zoölogist and paleontologist. He was at first assistant to Blainville at the Jardin des Plantes, and became professor and dean of the faculty of natural sciences at Montpellier in 1846, professor at the Sorbonne in 1865, and professor of comparative anatomy at the Jardin des Plantes in 1868.

Gervase (jër-väs), or Gervaise (jër-väz'), of Canterbury. Born about 1150; died early in the 13th century. An English monk and chronicler. He wrote a history of the archbishops of Canterbury to the accession of Hubert; a chronicle of the reigns of Stephen, Henry II., and Richard I.; a "Mappa Mundi," showing the bishops' sees, monasteries, etc., in each county of England; etc.

Gervase, or Gervaise, of Tilbury. Born probably at Tilbury, Essex; died probably about 1235. An English historical writer. He was called, without foundation, a grandson of Henry II. He became a favorite of the emperor Otto IV., and wrote for his amusement "Otia Imperialia" (about 1211), a valuable medley of the tales and superstitions of the middle ages.

Gervex (zher-vä'), Henri. Born at Paris, 1848. A French painter, a pupil of Cabanel, Fromentin, and Brisset; a member of the impressionist school. Among his paintings are "Diane of Endymion" (1875), "Retour du bal" (1879), "Le mariage civil" (1881; a decorative panel for the mairie of the 19th arrondissement at Paris), "Bassin de La Villette" (1882; for the same building), "La femme au masque" (1886), "La République française" (1890; at the Salon of the Champ-de-Mars).

Gervinus (ger-fë'nös), Georg Gottfried. Born at Darmstadt, Germany, May 20, 1805; died at Heidelberg, March 18, 1871. A celebrated German historian and critic. He became professor (extraordinary) at Heidelberg in 1835, and professor of history and literature at Göttingen in 1836; was one of the seven professors driven from that university in 1837 for protesting against the suspension of the constitution of Hanover; and became honorary professor at Heidelberg in 1844. His works include "Geschichte der poetischen National-litteratur der Deutschen" (5th edition, "Geschichte der deutschen Dichtung," 1871-74: "History of German Poetry"), "Shakspeare" (4 vols. 1849-50), "Geschichte des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts" ("History of the Nineteenth Century," 1856-66), etc.

Geryon (jĕ'ri-on), or Geryones (jĕ-ri'ō-nĕz). [Gr. Γερών or Γηρύωνες.] In Greek mythology, a monster with three heads or three bodies and powerful wings, son of Chrysaor and Callirrhoe, dwelling in the island of Erythia in the far west. He possessed a large herd of red cattle guarded by Eurytion (his shepherd) and the two-headed dog Arminus. Hercules carried these cattle away, and slew Geryon.

Gês (zhās), or Crans (kränz). A race of Brazilian Indians in northern Goyaz and western Maranhão: so named by ethnologists because the names of their numerous clans generally end in gê ('father, ancestor') or cran ('son, descendant'). The Portuguese of Maranhão called them Timbiras. Among the best-known clans are the Apinagês, Gnapinagês, and Macamaerans. In all the language is essentially the same. They are large, strong, and often handsome Indians; lead a wandering life during the dry season, but have fixed villages and small plantations for the rainy months; never use hammocks, but sleep on raised beds made of sticks; and, in a wild state, go entirely naked. Until about 1830 they were continually at war with the whites. Latterly the Apinagês and some others have been drawn into mission villages. They still number many thousands. Von Martius united the Gês with the Cayapôs, Chavantes, Acroás, Tecunas, and many other tribes in eastern, central, and northern Brazil, in what he called the Gês or Crans stock; but this classification has been generally abandoned, and the true position of the Gês is doubtful.

Geselschap (gâ-sel'schap), Eduard. Born at Amsterdam, March 22, 1814; died at Düsseldorf, Jan. 5, 1878. A genre painter, a pupil of the Düsseldorf Academy. His works, of which the earlier are of a romantic character, include "Gotz von Berlichingen before the Council of Heilbronn" (1842), "Finding of the Body of Gustavus Adolphus" (1848), "Night Camp of Wallenstein's Soldiers in an Old Church" (1849). Gesenius (ge-sĕ'ni-us; G. pron. gâ-zâ'nĕ-ös). Friedrich Heinrich Wilhelm. Born at Nordhausen, Prussia, Feb. 3, 1786; died at Halle, Prussia, Oct. 23, 1842. A noted German Orientalist and biblical critic, professor at Halle from 1810. His works include "Hebraisches und chaldaisches Handwörterbuch" ("Hebrew and Chaldaic Lexicon," 1810-12; translated by Edward Robinson), "Hebraische Grammatik" (1813), Hebrew "Thesaurus" (1821-1858), translation of and commentary on Isaiah (1820-21), "Phœnicia monumenta" (1837), etc.

Gesner (ges'ner), Johann Matthias. Born at Roth, near Nuremberg, Bavaria, April 9, 1691; died at Göttingen, Aug. 3, 1761. A German classical scholar. He became professor of rhetoric in the University of Göttingen in 1731. He edited a number of Latin classics, including Quintilian (1738), Claudian (1759), Pliny the Younger (1739), and Horace (1752).

Gesner (incorrectly Gessner), Konrad von. Born at Zurich, Switzerland, March 26, 1516; died at Zurich, Dec. 13, 1565. A celebrated Swiss naturalist and scholar. He became professor of Greek at Lausanne in 1537, and was afterward professor of physics at Zurich. Among his works are "Bibliotheca universalis" (1545-55), "Historia animalium" (1550-87), "Opera botanica" (published by Schmeidel 1753-50).

Gesoriacum (jes-ō-ri'ā-kum). An ancient seaport of Gaul: the modern Boulogne.

Gessi (jes'sĕ), Romolo. Born at Ravenna, Italy, April 30, 1831; died at Suez, May 1, 1881. An African traveler. In the Egyptian service, and under Gordon Pasha, he surveyed the Nile above Dufile, and established the fact that the Albert Nyanza belongs to the system of the Nile. Later he became governor of Bahrel-Ghazal. In 1880 he returned with his troops to Khartoum, but floating vegetation prevented the progress of his steamer until Marm came to his relief in 1881. His notes have been published by his son in "Sette anni nel Sudan egiziano" (Milan, 1891).

Gessler (ges'ler), Hermann. In Swiss legendary history, an imperial magistrate in Uri and Schwyz, shot by Tell in 1307, according to the "Chronicon Helveticum." See Tell, William.

Gessner (ges'ner), Salomon. Born at Zurich, Switzerland, April 1, 1730; died there, March 2, 1788. A Swiss idyllic poet, landscape-painter, and engraver. His works include "Idyls" (1756), "Death of Abel" (a prose idyl, 1758), "The First Boatman" (1762).

Gesta Romanorum (jes'tā rō-mā-nō'rūm). [L., 'deeds of the Romans.']. A popular collection of stories in Latin, compiled, perhaps in England, at the end of the 13th or the beginning of the 14th century.

This compilation long retained its popularity; was printed as early as 1473; reprinted at Louvain a few months later; again in 1480; translated into Dutch in 1484; printed again in 1488; and went through six or seven editions in this country during the succeeding century. The earliest printed Latin texts contained 150 or 151 sections. In the next following editions the number quickly rose to 181, and these 181 tales form the commonly received text. There was a German edition at Augsburg in 1489 containing only 95 tales, of which some are not in the accepted Latin version. In like manner, including tales not in the Latin anonymous text, there is an English series of 43 or 44 sections. . . . The name of the work, "Gesta Romanorum" (Deeds of the Romans), commonly applied to any records of the history of Rome, is justified by little more than the arbitrary, but not invariable, reference of tale after tale to the life or reign of Roman emperors, ancient or then modern, as Conrad, or Frederic, or Henry II. The book itself refers to the "Gesta Romanorum" as simply the Annals of Rome. Thus one tale, to illustrate "the Sin of Pride," begins with the sentence, "We read in the 'Gesta Romanorum' of a prince called Pompey," and proceeds to tell about Cæsar and Pompey, adding a moral in the usual form. It may be that a first collection of these tales was, like this one, in accordance with the title, and gave only illustrations out of Roman history, each with its ready-made moral or "application" added for the preacher's use; but that by the addition of more striking marvels and much livelier matter, with omission of familiar bits of ancient history, the original convenient form of Story and Application and the original name also being retained, the work itself was developed to its later shape. Morley, English Writers, III. 364, 367.

Geta (jĕ'tā), Publius Septimius. Born at Milan, May, 189; assassinated by order of Caracalla, Feb., 212. Second son of Septimius Severus and Julia Domna, brother of Caracalla, and joint emperor with him 211-212.

Getæ (jĕ'tĕ). [Sometimes in E. form Getes; L. Getæ, Gr. Γεταί. The name is not connected with that of the Gauti or that of the Gothi or Goths.] In ancient history, a Thracian people dwelling in the modern Bulgaria, and later in the modern Bessarabia.

In ancient times the countries north of the Danube mouths were inhabited by a people called Getes (in Latin Getæ). . . . The poet Ovid was sent to live among this people when Augustus banished him from Rome. Now in the third century after Christ the Goths came and dwelt in the land of the Getes, and to some extent mingled with the native inhabitants; and so the Romans came to think that Goths and Getes were only two names for the same people, or rather two different ways of pronouncing the same word. Even the historian Jordanes, himself a Goth, actually calls his book a Getic history ["De rebus Geticis"], and mixes up the traditions of his own people with the tales which he had read in books about the Getes. In modern times some great scholars have tried to prove that the Getes really were Goths, and that the early territory of the Gothic nation reached all the way from the Baltic to the Black Sea. But the ablest authorities are now mostly agreed that this is a mistake, and that when the Goths migrated to the region of the Danube it was to settle amongst a people of a different race, speaking a foreign tongue. Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 19.

Gethsemane (geth-sem'a-nĕ). [Heb., 'oil-press'; Gr. Γεθησημανή.] In New Testament history, a garden or orchard east of Jerusalem, near the brook Kedron.

Getty (get'ti), George Washington. Born at Georgetown, D. C., Oct. 2, 1819. A Union general in the Civil War. He graduated at West Point in 1840; fought with distinction in the Mexican war; served in the artillery at Yorktown, Gaines's Mill, Malvern Hill, South Mountain, and Antietam; became brigadier-general of volunteers Sept. 25, 1862; participated in the Rappahannock campaign 1862-63, being engaged at Fredericksburg and in the defense of Suffolk, Virginia; served in the defense of Washington in July, 1864, and in the Shenandoah campaign; and was present at Lee's surrender, April 9, 1865. He became colonel in the regular army, July 28, 1866, and commanded the troops along the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad during the riots of 1877.

Gettysburg (get'iz-bĕrg). A borough and the capital of Adams County, southern Pennsylvania, 36 miles southwest of Harrisburg. It is the seat of Pennsylvania College (Lutheran) and of a Lutheran theological seminary, and has a national cemetery on the field of the battle fought here July 1-3, 1863. Population (1890), 3,521.

Gettysburg, Battle of. A victory of the Federals under General Meade over the Confederates under Lee at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, July 1-3, 1863. General Lee, while invading Pennsylvania, was compelled to retreat by the Army of the Potomac under General Meade, which was threatening his rear. He decided to venture a battle, expecting in case of victory to march on Washington, and in case of defeat to secure a direct line of retreat to Virginia; and gave orders for his army to concentrate at Gettysburg. On July 1 the Federal advance under Major-General Reynolds met the Confederate advance at Gettysburg. An engagement ensued, in which both sides were reinforced. Reynolds was killed, and was succeeded by General Howard, who maintained his position on Cemetery Hill, south of the town. General Meade arrived during the afternoon. On the 2d the Federal army occupied a strong position in the form of a semicircle with its convex center toward Gettysburg, and including the elevations of Cemetery Hill and Round Top. About noon Lee began a general attack on the Federal center and left, which was followed by an attack on the right. He lost the day in every quarter. The battle on the 2d demonstrated that the key to General Meade's position was Cemetery Hill, which was defended by a battery of about 80 guns. Accordingly, on the 3d, General Lee massed upward of 100 guns on Seminary Ridge, with which he opened on Cemetery Hill about 1 P. M. The bombardment, which lasted an hour and a half, was followed by two grand assaults, which were repulsed. General Lee retired on the 4th. The forces engaged during this three days' battle numbered between 70,000 and 80,000 on each side. The Federal loss was 2,834 killed, 13,709 wounded, and 6,643 missing, making a total of 23,186. The total Confederate loss was 31,621. See Pickett.

Geulincx (gĕ'links or zhĕ-launks'), Arnold. Born at Antwerp, 1625; died at Leyden, 1669. A Cartesian philosopher, the founder of the metaphysical theory of occasionalism. He studied at Louvain, and became a teacher of philosophy there in 1646, but was deprived of his position in 1652 on account of his attacks upon scholasticism. He then went over to Protestantism, and in 1665 became professor of philosophy at Leyden.

Gévaudan (zhâ-vō-dōn'). An ancient district in Languedoc, France, capital Mende, nearly corresponding to the department of Lozère. It was a viscounty in the middle ages, and was acquired by France in the reign of St. Louis (1258).

It provided for the mutual restitution of conquered territory and the appointment of three commissions to settle the titles to the islands in Passamaquoddy Bay, and to establish the northern boundary of the United States as far as the St. Lawrence, and thence through the Great Lakes to the Lake of the Woods. The American commissioners were John Quincy Adams, James Bayard, Henry Clay, Jonathan Russell, and Albert Gallatin; the British commissioners were Lord Gambier, Henry Goulburn, and William Adams.

Gherardesca (gā-rār-des'kā), Ugolino della. Died 1289. An Italian partizan leader in Pisa. He conspired to obtain the supreme power, and was imprisoned in 1274, but escaped and joined the Florentines who were then at war with Pisa, and effected his return by force. He subsequently led the Pisans unsuccessfully against the Genoese and the Florentines. He was forced to abandon his own party, the Ghibellines, and seek aid from the Guelphs. He was finally overthrown, and with his two sons, Gaddo and Uguccione, and two nephews was starved to death in prison. His story forms a celebrated episode in the "Inferno" of Dante.

Gherardi del Testa (gā-rār'dē del tes'tā), Count Tommaso. Born at Terrieuola, near Pisa, Italy, 1818; died near Pistoja, Italy, Oct. 13, 1881. An Italian dramatist. Several of his plays were produced by Ristori in Paris.

Ghibellines (gib'e-lin-z). [Also written Gibelines, Ghibellins; from It. Ghibellino, the Italianized form of G. Waiblingen, the name of an estate in the part of the ancient circle of Franconia now included in Würtemberg, belonging to the house of Hohenstaufen (to which the then reigning emperor Conrad belonged), when war broke out about 1140 between this house and the Welfs or Guelphs. It is said to have been first employed as the rallying cry of the emperor's party at the battle of Weinsberg.] The imperial and aristocratic party of Italy in the middle ages; opposed to the Guelphs, the papal and popular party.

Ghiberti (gē-ber'tē), Lorenzo. Born at Florence about 1378; died at Florence, 1455. An Italian sculptor. He learned the goldsmith's craft from his stepfather Bartolo Michelozzi, who called himself Lorenzo de' Bartoli. He first made himself known as a painter by his work on the frescoes of the palace of Carlo Malatesta at Rimini. He was recalled from Rimini in 1401 to compete for the doors of the baptistery at Florence. The trial of skill lay between Ghiberti and Brunelleschi of Florence, Quercia and Valdambrini of Siena, and Niccolò d'Arezzo and Simone from Coll' in the Val d'Elsa. Ghiberti won, and the first door was begun in 1403 and finished in 1424. During these twenty-one years twenty artists, among whom were Donatello and Piero della Francesca, assisted in modeling and casting the work. Its completion was immediately followed by an order to make the remaining door of the baptistery. This, the great work of his life, was begun in 1424 and finished in 1447. The subjects were selected, at the request of the deputies, by Leonardo Brunni (Aretino). When Ghiberti finished these doors he was about seventy years old. In the meantime he had received and executed many commissions for statues, bas-reliefs, and goldsmith's work, and had also spent some time in Rome. As a goldsmith he made the miters of Popes Martin V. (1419) and Eugenius IV. (1434).

Ghika (gō'kā). A princely family, of Albanian origin, which furnished many rulers to Wallachia and Moldavia in the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries.

Ghilzais (ghel'ziz). A warlike clan in eastern Afghanistan, between Kabul and Kandahar.

Ghirlandajo (gēr-lān-dā'yō), Il (originally Domenico Bigordi or Corradi). [Surnamed il Ghirlandajo, the garland-maker, probably from his father's being a goldsmith.] Born at Florence, 1449; died there, Jan. 11, 1494. A Florentine painter, also noted as a mosaicist. He was the founder of a famous school of painting, and the teacher of Michelangelo. His frescos in Florence are in the Palazzo Vecchio (1481) and the church and refectory of Ognissanti (1480), the Sasseti Chapel in Santa Trinità (1485), the choir of Santa Maria Novella (his masterpiece, about 1485-88), and the Church of the Innocenti (1488). In 1483 he was called to Rome to aid in decorating the Sistine Chapel. Among his pictures are two "Holy Families" at Berlin, "Adoration of the Shepherds" in the academy at Florence (1485), "Madonna and Saints" at San Martino, Lucca, and "Madonna and Child with Saints," "St. Catharine of Siena," and "St. Lawrence" in the Pinakothek at Munich. His brothers Davide and Benedetto are also noted as assisting him.

Gibbon (gib'on), Edward. Born at Putney, Surrey, April 27, 1737; died at London, Jan. 15, 1794. A famous English historian. He was a grandson of Edward Gibbon, who was one of the most prominent of the directors of the South Sea Company, and who, when the bubble burst, lost the greater part of his fortune, which, however, he later repaired. His health in childhood was poor, and his instruction irregular. He entered Oxford (Magdalen College) in April, 1752, but left the university after a residence of fourteen months. At this time he became a Roman Catholic, a creed which he soon afterward renounced. In June, 1753, he was placed under the care and instruction of Pavillard, a Calvinist minister at Lausanne, where he remained with great profit until Aug. 1758, when he returned to England. At Lausanne he fell in love with Susanne Curchod (afterward Madame Necker and mother of Madame de Staël), but on his return to England the affair was broken off by his father. He served in the militia 1759-70, attaining the rank of colonel. From Jan. 1763, to June, 1765, he traveled in France, Switzerland, and Italy. In 1774 he was elected to Parliament. In Sept., 1783, he established himself at Lausanne, where he resided for the remainder of his life. His great work is "The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," still the chief authority for the period which it covers, and one of the greatest histories ever written. The first volume appeared in 1776 and the last in 1788. He also wrote "Memoirs of my Life and Writings."

After various adventures she appeared at Munich, where she became the mistress of the old king Ludwig of Bavaria. She was naturalized, and received the titles of Baronne de Rosenthal and Comtesse de Landsfeld. She controlled the king completely, and was virtually ruler of Bavaria, a position in which she displayed ability and wisdom. After about a year, however, owing to hostility between the liberal and conservative students of the university, the former of whom she had patronized, a riot occurred and her life was in danger. She caused the university to be closed, when an insurrection took place and the king was forced to abdicate, March 21, 1848, and she was banished. After various adventures she married George Trafford Heald at London in July, 1849. She was summoned for bigamy, but fled to Spain. Heald is said to have died in 1853. In 1851 she arrived in New York, where she attracted much attention and drew crowded houses. In 1853 she married P. P. Hull in San Francisco. In 1859 she devoted herself to visiting outcast women, and labored among them till she was stricken with paralysis.

Gippsland (gips'land). A region in southeastern Victoria, Australia.

Gipsies (jip'siz). [Orig. Egyptians, later Gipcians, Gipsies, the Gipsies being popularly supposed to be Egyptians.] A peculiar vagabond race which appeared in England for the first time about the beginning of the 16th century, and in eastern Europe at least two centuries earlier, and is now found in every country of Europe, as well as in parts of Asia, Africa, and America. The Gipsies are distinguishable from the peoples among whom they rove by their bodily appearance and by their language. Their forms are generally light, lithe, and agile; skin of a tawny color; eyes large, black, and brilliant; hair long, coal black, and often ringleted; mouth well shaped; and teeth very white. Ethnologists generally concur in regarding the Gipsies as descendants of some obscure Hindut tribe. They pursue various nomadic occupations, being tinkers, basket-makers, fortune-tellers, dealers in horses, etc.; are often expert musicians; and are credited with thievish propensities. They appear to be destitute of any system of religion, but traces of various forms of paganism are found in their language and customs. The name gipsy is also sometimes applied to or assumed by other vagrants of like habits.

Gipsy's Warning, The. An opera by Sir Julius Benedict, with words by Linley and Peake. It was produced at Drury Lane, April 19, 1838.

Giraldus (hë-räl'dä). [Sp.] A weather-vane in the form of a statue.] The bell-tower of the cathedral at Seville, Spain: so called from the figure of Faith which forms the weather-vane upon its summit. To the height of 250 feet the tower is Moorish, with rich windows and surface-decoration; the ornate belfry, 100 feet high, in recessed stages, above this, was built in 1578. The tower is 50 feet square at the base. The tower of the Madison Square Garden in New York city is, in general, a copy of it.

Giraldi (jê-räl'dê), Giovanni Battista, surnamed Cintio or Cinthio. Born at Ferrara, Italy, Nov., 1504; died at Ferrara, Dec. 30, 1573. Girbaden (gir'bä-den), Castle of. An imposing ruin with a massive square donjon, near Grendelbrueh, in Lower Alsace, said once to have possessed 14 gates and 14 courts. The inner fortress is of the 10th century, the outer castle of the early 13th. The great hall has fine windows framed between clustered colonnettes.

Girgashites (gër'gā-shits). See the extract.

As for the Girgashite who is coupled with the Jebusite (Gen. xv. 21), his place has been already fixed by the ethnographical table of Genesis. He there appears between the Amorite and the Hivite, and consequently in that northern part of the country in which the Hivites were more especially found. Further than this conjecture alone can lead us. Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 122.

Girgeh (jër'je). 1. A province of Upper Egypt. — 2. A town in the province of Girgeh, situated on the Nile in lat. 26° 18' N. Population (1882), 14,819.

Girgenti (jër-jen'tê). A province in southwestern Sicily. Area, 1,172 square miles. Population (1891), 337,983.

Girgenti. The capital of the province of Girgenti, Sicily, situated on the Girgenti, near the coast, in lat. 37° 18' N., long. 13° 34' E.: the ancient Roman Agrigentum and the Greek Akragas. See Agrigentum. The site is of high archaeological interest from its abundant remains of Doric temples and other Greek structures dating from before the Carthaginian conquest. All the temples belong to the finest period of architecture. The so-called temple of Concord is one of the most perfect surviving monuments of Hellenic antiquity. It is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 13 columns, on a stylobate of 3 steps, measuring (steps included) 64 by 138 feet. The base diameter of the columns is 4 7/8 feet, their height 22 3/4. There are two columns in antis in both pronaos and opisthodomos. It stands practically complete, except the roof, and is most imposing in effect. The temple of Hera Lacinia, of the first half of the 5th century B. C., is now a ruin. It is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 13 columns, measuring (steps included) 64 by 138 feet. The base diameter of the columns is 4 feet, their height 21. The cella had two columns in antis in both pronaos and opisthodomos, and retains a portion of the base of the cult statue. The temple of Zeus (Jupiter) is a very large 5th-century Greek Doric temple of unusual plan. It was pseudoperipteral, with 7 engaged columns on the fronts and 14 on the flanks, and measured 350 feet in length, 180 in width, and 120 in height. The interior of the cella was surrounded with pilasters supporting an epistyle, upon which stood telamones to receive the ceiling-beams. There was a pronaos and an opisthodomos, lighted by windows between the semi-columns. In the eastern pediment there was a gigantomachy in high relief, in the western an Iliupersis. The temple of Castor and Pollux is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 13 columns, measuring (steps included) 51 by 111 feet. The base diameter of the columns is 3 3/8 feet, their height 21 7/8. Only four columns of the northwest angle are standing, with their entablature and a portion of the pediment. The rough stone has a coating of fine stucco, upon which the painted decoration was executed. The temple of Heracles is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 15 columns, measuring (steps included) 73 by 241 feet. The columns were about 33 feet high (4 1/2 diameters). There were inner porticos before both pronaos and opisthodomos. Fragments of its polychrome decoration are preserved at Palermo. The pretor Verres attempted to steal its cult statue, but was forcibly hindered by the citizens. The city has a cathedral and a museum. It was for a time a Saracen possession, and was a rich bishopric in the middle ages. Its seaport, Porto Empedocle, has a large export of sulphur. Population (estimated, 1891), 24,000.

Gladstone (gläd'stōn), William Ewart. Born at Liverpool, Dec. 29, 1809. An eminent British statesman, financier, and orator. Both his parents were natives of Scotland, his father, Sir John Gladstone, Bart., a Liverpool merchant, being descended from an old Scottish family named Gledstones (i. e. "hawkstones"). He was educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford, graduating in 1831 with highest honors both in classics and mathematics (a double first-class). He was returned to Parliament in 1832, in the first election after the passing of the Reform Bill, as Tory member for Newark, a pocket borough of the Duke of Newcastle. His exceptional political abilities were at once recognized by his party, and in the short-lived administration of Sir Robert Peel (Dec., 1834—April, 1835) he was made first a junior lord of the treasury, and then under-secretary for the colonies. On the return of Peel to office in Sept., 1841, he was appointed vice-president of the Board of Trade, and had the principal share in working out and expounding the elaborate scheme of tariff revision that was then adopted. In June, 1843, he became president of the Board of Trade, with a seat in the cabinet. In Jan., 1845, he left the ministry on account of the proposed grant to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth; he felt that he could not support this officially because it was at variance with opinions he had published, although he now could and subsequently did support it as a private member. The Peel ministry was reorganized in Dec., 1845, and he was secretary of state for the colonies till it fell in June, 1846. Six and a half years then elapsed before he again held office, and during that period (especially in the earlier years of it) he was gradually borne along, in spite of his native Conservative instincts, toward the political Liberalism of which he was latterly the most conspicuous exponent. In Dec., 1852, a coalition ministry of Whigs and Peelites was formed under the Earl of Aberdeen, Gladstone taking what appears to have been his strongest role—that of chancellor of the exchequer. He held the same office at first in the Liberal ministry of Lord Palmerston, formed Feb., 1855, but retired with the other Peelites in a few weeks. During 1855-59 he was sent by the Conservative ministry on a special mission as lord high commissioner extraordinary to the Ionian Islands. From June, 1859, to July, 1866, he was again chancellor of the exchequer under Lord Palmerston and Earl Russell, and after Palmerston's death he was leader of the House of Commons. The defeat of a reform bill which he introduced brought the Tories back to power, to pass themselves an important reform measure: but on Dec. 9, 1868, he reached the highest dignity attainable by a British subject—that of prime minister. This distinguished position he has occupied no less than four times—Dec., 1868, to Feb., 1874; April, 1880, to June, 1885; Feb. to July, 1886; and Aug., 1892, to March, 1894, when the "Grand Old Man" retired from office on account of his advanced age and failing physical powers. Besides being prime minister and first lord of the treasury, he was also chancellor of the exchequer during his first administration and part of his second, and lord privy seal during his third and fourth. The history of his various ministries is the history of the British empire for the time. One of the first measures which he carried as premier was the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and the condition of Ireland has throughout his leadership of a quarter of a century in office or in opposition been the object of his peculiar concern. He prepared and introduced (1836 and 1837) two bills for providing that country with a separate legislature: but both were defeated (see Home Rule Bills). With the exception of about a year and a half, he has sat continuously in the House of Commons since 1832. He retired from Newark in Jan., 1846, because his views had diverged from those of its patron, and subsequently represented the University of Oxford (1847-65), South Lancashire (1865-68), Greenwich (1868-8), and Midlothian (or Edinburghshire) since 1880. He is understood to have been offered a peerage on more than one occasion, but has declined that honor, remaining "The Great Commoner." Although by far the most prominent man in the politics of his time, he has found leisure for considerable contributions to literature. His publications include "The State in its Relations to the Church" (1838), "Letters on the State Persecutions of the Neapolitan Government" (1851), "Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age" (1858), "Juventus Mundi" (1869), pamphlets on "The Vatican Decrees" (1874, 1875) and "Eulgaric Horrors" (1876, 1877), "Homeric Synchrisim" (1876), "Gleanings of Past Years" (1879), etc., besides various articles in magazines and reviews.

Glaire (glär), Jean Baptiste. Born at Bordeaux, France, April 1, 1798; died at Issy (Seine), Feb. 25, 1879. A French Orientalist and theologian. He published "Lexicon manuale Hebraicum et Chaldaicum" (1830), etc.

Glais-Bizoin (glä'bē-zwän'), Alexandre. Born at Quintin, Côtes-du-Nord, France, March 9, 1800; died at Lamballe, Côtes-du-Nord, Nov. 6, 1877. A French politician, opposition member of the Chamber of Deputies, and member of the Government of National Defense 1870-71.

Glaisher (glä'shēr), James. Born at London, April 7, 1809. A British meteorologist and aeronaut. He was an assistant at the Cambridge observatory 1833-36, and director of the magnetic and meteorological work at Greenwich observatory 1840-71. He founded the Royal Meteorological Society and became its first president in 1867. He made many balloon ascensions, reaching in 1862 the height of 37,000 feet. His works include "Travels in the Air," "Factor Tables" (1879-83), etc.

Glaize (glüz), Auguste Barthélemy. Born at Montpellier, Dec. 15, 1807. A French painter. Among his works are frescos in the churches of St. Sulpice, St. Jacques du Haut-Pas, and St. Merri at Paris. He has been successful in lithography and pastel.

Glaize, Pierre Paul Léon. Born at Paris, Feb. 3, 1842. A French painter, a pupil of his father, A. B. Glaize, and of Gérôme.

Glamis (glämz), Castle. An ancient castle near Strathmore, Scotland, seat of the Earl of Strathmore. It is associated with Shakspeare's "Macbeth."

Glamorgan (glä-môr'gan). A county of South Wales. Capital, Cardiff. It is bounded by Brecknock on the north, Monmouth on the east, Bristol Channel on the south, and Carmarthen on the west. It has important coal and iron deposits. Area, 808 square miles. Population (1891), 687,147.

Glamorgan. In British legend, the glen of Morgan, a spot in Wales where Morgan, the grandson of Lear, was killed.

Glamorgan Treaty. A treaty made with the Roman Catholics of Ireland by the Earl of Glamorgan (afterward Marquis of Worcester), acting (but apparently without authority) as agent of Charles I., Aug. 25, 1645. It made important concessions to the Roman Catholics in return for military aid.

Glanvill, or Glanvil (glän'vil), Joseph. Born at Plymouth, England, 1636; died at Bath, England, Nov., 1680. An English divine. He was a voluminous author. His best-known work is "The Vanity of Dogmatizing" (1661; enlarged, "Scepisis Scientifica," 1665). In this he is thought to have anticipated the electric telegraph and Hume's theory of causation.

Glanville (glän'vil), Ranulf de. Died 1190. Chief justiciar of England. He was sheriff of Yorkshire 1163-70; became sheriff of Lancashire in 1173; with Robert Stuteville defeated the Scots at Alnwick July 13, 1174; and was one of the most important persons in the kingdom during the remainder of the reign of Henry II.

Glaphorne (glap'thörn), Henry. Known to have written between 1639 and 1642. An English dramatist. Among his plays are "Argalus and Parthenia," "Albertus Wallenstein," and "The Ladies Privilege." "The Parasite, or Revenge for Honor" was licensed in 1653 as by Glaphorne. It was printed later with Chapman's name; the latter had nothing to do with it, but it may have been revised by Glaphorne.

Glareanus (glä-rä-ä'nös), originally Heinrich Loriti. Born at Mollis, Switzerland, 1488; died at Freiburg, 1563. A Swiss humanist. He was crowned poet laureate by the emperor Maximilian in 1512, became professor of belles-lettres in the Collège de France in 1521, and subsequently founded a school for belles-lettres at Freiburg in Breisgau. He favored the Reformation for a time, but was induced by the disturbances at Basel in 1529 to withdraw his support. He published "De geographia liber" (1527), "Helveticæ descriptio" (in verse), numerous studies on Latin authors, etc.

Glärner Alps (glär'ner alps). A mountainous group in the cantons of Uri, Glarus, and Grisons, Switzerland, extending from the Reuss eastward to the Rhine. Its highest peak is the Tödi.

Glärnisch (glär'nish). A mountain in the canton of Glarus, Switzerland, southwest of Glarus. Highest point, 9,583 feet.

Glarus (glä'rös), or Glaris (glä-röcs'). A canton of Switzerland, bounded by St.-Gall on the north and east, Grisons east and south, and Schwyz and Uri on the west. The surface is almost entirely mountains. Cotton is manufactured. The canton sends two members to the National Council. It joined the Swiss Confederation in 1352. Area, 267 square miles. Population (1888), 33,825.

Glarus. A capital of the canton of Glarus, Switzerland, situated on the Linth 34 miles southeast of Zurich. It has flourishing manufactures. Population (1888), 5,401.

Glas (gläs), John. Born at Auchtermuchty, Fife, Sept. 21, 1695; died at Perth, Nov. 2, 1773. A Scottish clergyman, founder of the sect of Glassites or Sandemanians.

Glasgow (glas'gō). A seaport in Lanarkshire, Scotland, situated on the Clyde in lat. 55° 52' N., long. 4° 18' W., the largest city in Scotland and second city in Great Britain; next to Liverpool and London, the principal British seaport. It is the terminus of several transatlantic lines of steamers (Anchor, Allan, State). It is especially famous for iron and steel ship-building, being the chief British city in this regard. It manufactures chemicals, cotton goods, woolen goods, iron, sewing-machines, machinery, etc.; has a great trade in coal; and has important bleaching and dyeing works. The cathedral, founded in the 12th century, was finished in the 15th, but is chiefly in the Early English style, with very numerous but small insets in the choir-story, traceried windows in the aisles, narrow transepts with great windows, square chevet, and central tower and spire. The interior is effective; it has a flat wooden ceiling, and all the windows are filled with modern Munich glass. The crypt is of unusual beauty; it is admirably vaulted, and its 65 columns possess finely carved capitals. The cathedral measures 330 by 70 feet; height of nave, 90. The length is the same as that of St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York. Glasgow University was founded in 1450. The present large building, 265 by 530 feet, in a modified Early English style, with tall central tower and spire, was first occupied in 1870; it is by Sir G. Gilbert Scott. Glasgow became a royal burgh about 1175. For parliamentary purposes it is arranged in seven divisions, each returning one member to the House of Commons. Population (1891), 683,198.

Glasse (gläs), Mrs. Hannah. The author of a popular book called "The Art of Cookery." It was published in 1747, and at one time its authorship was attributed to Dr. John Hill. Mrs. Glasse wrote other books on similar subjects. The ironical proverb "First catch your hare," attributed to her, is not in "The Art of Cookery," but was probably suggested by the words "Take your hare when it is cased," i. e., skinned.

Glassites (gläs'its). A religious sect in Scotland, founded by John Glas (1695-1773). See Sandemanians.

Glassius (glash'i-us), Salomo (Salomon Glass). Born at Sondershausen, Germany, 1593; died at Gotha, Germany, July 27, 1656. A noted German theologian and biblical critic, professor of theology at Jena, and superintendent of the churches and schools of the duchy of Saxe-Gotha. He wrote "Philologia sacra" (Jena, 1623), etc.

Glastonbury (glas'ton-ber-i). [ME. Glastonbury, Glasconbury, Glaesconbury, Glasconbury, AS. Glastingaburh, city of the Glastings.] A town in Somerset, England, 21 miles south of Bristol. Its abbey, founded in Roman times, was refounded under Ine in the 8th century. The great early-pointed church, of which the picturesque ruins exist, was begun by Henry II, and desecrated by Henry VIII. It was 528 feet long. The fine chapel of St. Joseph, at the east end, is the oldest portion. The Abbot's Kitchen, of the 11th century, is of interest. The plan is square, with abundant buttresses, but the high stone roof is octagonal; it terminates in a tower. There are four huge fireplaces. Several other interesting structures belonging to the abbey have been converted to modern uses. Glastonbury is associated in legend with Joseph of Arimathea, who is said to have visited it and, in sign of possession, planted his staff, which took root and became the famous Glastonbury thorn that bursts into leaf on Christmas eve. The Isle of Avalon, where Arthur was buried, is also here. See Avalon.

There is something very odd in an English gentile name suddenly displacing the British name; there is something suspicious in the evident attempts to make the English and British names translate one another, in the transparent striving to see an element of glass in both. Glastingaburh, it must be borne in mind, is as distinctly an English gentile name as any in the whole range of English nomenclature; Glastonbury is a mere corruption; the syllable which has taken a place to which it has no right in Huntingdon and Abingdon has in Glastonbury been driven out of a place to which it has the most perfect right. The true origin of the name lurks in a grotesque shape, in that legend of Glasteing and his sow, a manifestly English legend, which either William of Malmesbury himself or some interpolator at Glastonbury has strangely thrust into the midst of the British legends. Glasteing's lost sow leads him by a long journey to an apple-tree by the old church; pleased with the land, he takes his family, the Glasteingas, to dwell there.

Freeman, English Towns, p. 95.

Glastonbury Thorn. See Glastonbury.

Glatigny (glä'ten-yé'), Albert. A French poet of the school of Villon. He lived as a strolling actor, and died young (15th century). Among his poems is the "Ballade dea enfans sans souci."

Glatz (gläts), Bohem. Kladsko (kläd'skō). A town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, on the Neisse 50 miles south-southwest of Breslau. It is strongly fortified, and has been frequently besieged and taken. Population (1890), 11,643.

Gleim (glīm), Johann Wilhelm Ludwig. Born at Ermsleben, near Halberstadt, Germany, April

2, 1719; died at Halberstadt, Feb. 18, 1803. A German poet. He studied jurisprudence at Halle, and was subsequently tutor in Potsdam, secretary to Prince William in the second Silesian war, secretary to Prince Leopold of Dessau, and finally canon in Halberstadt, where he died. His fame rests principally upon the "Preussische Kriegslieder von einem Grenadier" ("Prussian War Songs by a Grenadier"), which appeared during 1757-58, and in the latter year were collected and published with a preface by Lessing. A collection of Anacreontic songs, "Versuch in scherzhaften Liedern" ("Essays in Humorous Poetry"), had already appeared in 1744. In 1772 appeared, further, "Lieder für das Volk" ("Songs for the People"), in 1773 "Gedichte nach den Minnesingern" ("Poems after the Minnesingers"), and in 1779 "Gedichte nach Walther von der Vogelweide" ("Poems after Walther von der Vogelweide"). His collected works were published 1811-13, in 7 volumes, to which was added an eighth in 1811.

Glenvarloch, Lord. See Olifaunt, Nigel.

Glessariae (glē-sā'ri-ē). [L., sc. insulæ, 'amber islands.'] See the extract.

The principal district for the tide-washed amber was the coast between the Helder and the promontory of Jutland. From the Rhine to the estuary of the Elbe stretched a chain of islands, called Glessariae and Electrides by the ancients, which are now much altered in number and extent by the incessant inroads of the sea. Here a Roman fleet in Nero's time collected 13,000 lbs. of the precious "glessum" in a single visit; and the sailors brought home picturesque accounts of the natives picking up the glassy fossil at the flood-tide and in the pools left by the ebb; "and it is so light," they said, "that it rolls about and seems to hang in the shallow water."

Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 60.

Gleyre (glär), Charles Gabriel. Born at Chevilly, Vaud, Switzerland, May 2, 1806; died at Paris, May 5, 1874. A Swiss historical painter.

He commanded the schooner Reeder in the Mexican war, and accompanied Perry's expedition to Japan in 1853-55. He commanded the third division of the fleet in the attack on Port Fisher in Dec., 1864, and Jan., 1865. He was promoted Rear-admiral in 1870.

Glister (glis'tēr). In Middleton's play "The Family of Love," a doctor of physic.

Globe, The. A celebrated London theater built by Richard and Cuthbert Burbage in 1599. When their "Theatre" in Shoreditch was taken down, the materials were carried to Bankside and used in the erection of the Globe. It was hexagonal in shape and open to the sky in the middle, the stage and galleries only being covered with a thatched roof. Over the door was the sign of the house, Hercules supporting a globe. The interior was arranged on the plan of the inn yards where entertainments had formerly been given. It was circular and had three galleries. At the back of the stage were two columns which supported a gallery about 10 or 12 feet high, and between these hung the curtain. On the stage itself sat a dozen or twenty gallants who paid sixpence extra for the privilege. The Globe was a public theater—that is, not under the patronage of any great personage. Shakspeare played here, and he with Hemminge, Condell, and others shared in the profits. It was a summer house, Blackfriars being the winter house of the same company. The Globe was burned in 1613, but immediately rebuilt at a cost of £1,400. It was pulled down during the Puritan régime in 1644, and the site is now occupied by Barclay and Perkins's brewery. Shakspeare wrote exclusively for the Blackfriars and Globe theaters, and most of the plays of Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, Ford, Massinger, Chapman, and others were first performed there. The present Globe Theatre in Wyeh street was built in 1863.

Glockner (glok'ner), or Grossglockner (grōs-glok'ner). A mountain in Austria-Hungary, on the confines of Tyrol, Carinthia, and Salzburg. It is the highest peak in the easternmost division of the Alps, and is celebrated for the extensive view it commands. It belongs to the group of the Hohe Tauern. Height, 12,454 feet.

Glogau (glō'gon), or Grossglogau (grōs-glō'gon). A fortified town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, situated on the Oder 57 miles northwest of Breslau; formerly the capital of the now extinct principality of Glogau. It was stormed by the Prussians in 1741, and was held by the French 1806-14. Population (1890), 20,529.

Glogau, Ober-. See Uberglogau.

Glommen (glōm'men). The largest river of Norway, flowing into the Skager Rack at Fredrikstad. Length, about 350 miles. Near its mouth it forms the cataract Sarpfos.

Gloriana (glō-ri-ā'nā). The Faerie Queene in Spenser's poem of that name. She also represents Queen Elizabeth considered as a sovereign. See Belphebe.

Glossop (glōs'op). A town in Derbyshire, England, 12 miles east of Manchester. It has manufactures of cotton, etc. Population (1891), 22,414.

Gloster (glōs'tēr), or Gloucester, Earl of. A character in Shakspeare's "King Lear," the father of Edgar and Edmund.

The subordinate plot of Gloster and his sons was probably taken from an episodic chapter in Sidney's "Arcadia" entitled "The Pitiful State and Story of the Paphlagonian unkind King and his kind Son; first related by the son, then by the blind father."

Hudson, Introduct. to King Lear.

Gloucester (glōs'tēr). [Also formerly Gloster; ME. Gloucester, Gloucestre, Gloueccastre, AS. Gleawceaster; from L. Glevum, the Roman name, and AS. ceaster, city.] 1. A county in west midland England. It is bounded by Worcester and Warwick on the north, Oxford, Berks, and Wilts on the east, Wilts and Somerset on the south, Monmouth on the west, and Hereford on the northwest. It includes the Cotswold Hills, the Forest of Dean, and the vales of Gloucester and Berkeley. Its five divisions each return one member to the House of Commons. Area, 1,243 square miles. Population (1891), 599,974.

2. The capital of Gloucestershire, England, a city and county of itself, and a parliamentary borough, situated on the Severn in lat. 51° 52' N., long. 2° 16' W.: the British Caer-glowe and Roman Glevum. It is an important commercial town. The cathedral is in its present form a Perpendicular building almost throughout, except in the lower part of the nave, but is of much earlier foundation. The plan is early Norman. There is a high central tower, covered with tracery, and a long, projecting Lady chapel. There is an excellent 15th-century porch, with statues over the arched entrance. The arches and circular pillars of the nave are impressive, and the choir is one of the richest examples of the Perpendicular style. The whole east end is occupied by a great window with fine glass, the wall-spaces are covered with paneling, and the vaulting rests on a perfect network of ribs. The choir is assigned to 1351, and is held to prove that the Perpendicular style originated here. The dimensions of the cathedral are 320 by 114 feet; height of nave, of choir 86. The Perpendicular cloister, with beautiful fan-vaulting and its arcades filled with glazed tracery, is the finest of its type in England. The chapter-house and crypt are Norman. Gloucester resisted the Royalist army under Charles I. in 1643. It sends one member to the House of Commons. Population (1891), 39,444.

Glevum was a town of great importance, as standing not only on the Severn near the place where it opened out into the Bristol Channel, but also as being close to the great Roman iron district of the Forest of Dean. Wright, Celt, p. 136.

Gloucester. A city and seaport in Essex County, Massachusetts, situated on the peninsula of Cape Ann in lat. 42° 37' N., long. 70° 40' W. It is the chief seat of cod and mackerel fisheries in the United States, and exports granite. It was unsuccessfully attacked by the British in 1775 and 1814. Population (1890), 24,651.

Gloucester, Earl of. See Robert.

Gloucester City. A city in Camden County, New Jersey, situated on the Delaware 4 miles below Philadelphia. It has a track for horse-racing. Population (1890), 6,564.

Glove, The. An old French story told by Peter Ronsard. It has been retold in many forms. It is that of the knight De Lorge (in the time of Francis I.), whose mistress dropped her glove over a barrier among some lions, and commanded her lover to get it for her as a test of his courage. Revolted at her cold-blooded inhumanity, the knight leaped down, secured the glove, and threw it in her face. Schiller, Leigh Hunt, Browning, and others have made the story familiar.

Glover (gluv'ér), Catherine. The Fair Maid of Perth in Scott's novel of that name.

Glover, John. Born at Houghton-on-the-Hill, Leicestershire, Feb. 18, 1767; died at Launceston, Tasmania, Dec. 9, 1849. An English landscape-painter, one of the founders of the Royal Water-Colour Society and of the Society of British Artists. In 1831 he emigrated to Australia.

Glover, Mrs. Julia. Born at Newry, Jan. 8, 1779; died at London, July 16, 1850. An English actress. She was the daughter of an actor named Betterton, who claimed descent from Thomas Betterton. She had "an admirable vein of comedy." Diet. Nat. Biog.

Glover, Richard. Born at London, 1712; died there, Nov. 23, 1785. An English poet. He was the son of a Hamburg merchant, and entered into business with his father. His chief work, an epic poem, "Leonidas," appeared in 1737. He enlarged it and republished it in 1770, and it has been translated into French and German. Its success was partly due to its usefulness to the opponents of Walpole. He also published "London, etc." (1739), "Boadicea" (a tragedy, 1753), "Medea" (1761), and "The Athenaid," an epic in 30 books, published in 1787 by his daughter.

Glover, Robert. Born at Ashford, Kent, 1544; died at London, April 10, 1588. An English genealogist, appointed Somerset herald in 1571. He left a large number of manuscripts, which have been used by later writers.

Glover, Stephen. Born at London, 1812; died there, Dec. 7, 1870. An English composer and teacher. He wrote over fifteen hundred popular songs, ballads, and pianoforte pieces.

Gloversville (gluv'érz-vil). A village in Fulton County, New York, 40 miles northwest of Albany. It is the chief seat of the manufacture of buckskin gloves and mittens in the United States. Population (1890), 13,864.

Glub-dub-drib. A land filled with magicians, visited by Gulliver, in Swift's "Gulliver's Travels."

Gluck (glök), Christopher Willibald. Born at Weidenwang, near Neumarkt, Bavaria, July 2, 1714; died at Vienna, Nov. 15, 1787. A celebrated German operatic composer, son of a member of the household (keeper of the forests) of Prince Lobkowitz. He studied music at Prague, Vienna (1736), and Milan (1738-45), producing (1741-45) a number of successful operas; in 1745 went to England as composer of operas for the Haymarket; and returned to Vienna in 1746, where he acted for a time as singing-master to Marie Antoinette, who later rendered him important aid in the production of his works in Paris. His most celebrated works are "Orfeo ed Euridice" (1762), "Alceste" (Vienna, Dec. 16, 1767), "Paride ed Elena" (1769), "Iphigénie en Aulide" (1773), "Armide" (1777), "Iphigénie en Tauride" (1779).

Glücksburg (gliiks'börg). A bathing-place in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, 6 miles northeast of Flensburg.

Glückstadt (glük'stät). A seaport in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, situated on the Elbe 29 miles northwest of Hamburg. It was unsuccessfully besieged by the Catholics in the Thirty Years' War in 1627 and in 1628. Population (1890), commune, 5,958.

Glukhoff (glü'chöf). A town in the government of Tchernigoff, Russia, situated in lat. 51° 41' N., long. 35° 53' E. Population (1890), 17,625. Glumdalca (glum-dal'kä). In Fielding's burlesque "Tom Thumb the Great," a captive queen of the giants, beloved by the king, but in love with Tom Thumb.

Glumdalclitch (glum-dal'klich). In Swift's "Gulliver's Travels," a giantess of Brobdingnag. She is Gulliver's nurse, and, though only nine years old, is nearly 40 feet high. Her attentions were extremely humiliating to him.

Glycas (gli'käs), Michael. A Byzantine historian. Concerning his age nothing is known with certainty, except that he lived after 1118. He was probably an ecclesiastic, and is the author of a history of the world from the creation to 1118 A. D. This work is written in a clear and concise style, and its author is ranked among the better Byzantine historians. The best edition is by Bekker in the Bonn collection of the Byzantines, 1836.

Gnomic Poets. See the extract.

The term Gnomic, when applied to a certain number of Greek poets, is arbitrary. There is no definite principle for rejecting some and including others in the class. It has, however, been usual to apply this name to Solon, Phocylides, Theognis, and Simonides of Ceos. Yet there seems no reason to exclude some portions of Callinus, Tyrtaeus, Mimnermus, and Xenophanes. These poets, it will be observed, are all writers of the elegy. Some of the lyric poets, however, and iambographers, such as Simonides of Amorgos and Archilochus, have strong claims for admission into the list. For, as the derivation of the name implies, gnomic poets are simply those who embody . . . sententious maxims on life and morals in their verse; and though we find that the most celebrated masters of this style composed elegies, we yet may trace the thread of gnomic thought in almost all the writers of their time.

Symonds, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 126.

Gnosus. See Cnosus.

Gnostics (nos'tiks). [From Gr. γνωστικός, knowing, whence J. L. Gnosticus, a Gnostic.] Certain rationalistic sects which arose in the Christian church in the 1st century, flourished in the 2d, and had almost entirely disappeared by the 6th. The Gnostics held that knowledge rather than faith is the road to heaven, and professed to have a peculiar knowledge of religious mysteries. They rejected the literal interpretation of the Scriptures, and attempted to combine their teachings with those of the Greek and Oriental philosophies and religions. They held that God was the unknowable and the unapproachable; that from him proceeded, by emanation, subordinate deities termed enoi, from whom again proceeded other still inferior spirits. The Gnostics were in general agreed in believing in the principles of dualism and Doetism and in the existence of a demiurge or world-creator. Christ they regarded as a superior eon who had descended from the infinite God in order to subdue the god or con of this world. Their chief seats were in Syria and Egypt, but their doctrines were taught everywhere, and at an early date they separated into a variety of sects.

Gnotho (nō'thō). A clownish old fellow anxious to put away his old wife and take a younger one, according to the provisions of "The Old Law," in Massinger, Middleton, and Rowley's play of that name.

He remained in that country until 1751, as professor of mathematics at the University of Lima; subsequently he had charge of the college for midshipmen at Cadiz, Spain. He was the author of several treatises on earthquakes and astronomy, a work on Spanish America, and a history of the French Academy of Sciences.

Godin des Odonais (gō-dan' dāz ö-dö-nā'), Isabel. Born in Riobamba, Peru, 1728; died at Saint-Amand, France, after 1788. The wife of Jean Godin des Odonais, whom she married in 1743. In 1769 she started with her brothers and a small company to descend the Napo and Amazon and join her husband in Cayenne. The boat was lost, and all the party perished except Madame Godin, who wandered alone in the forest for 9 days. When she was finally found by some friendly Indians her hair is said to have become white. The governor of Omaguas sent her down the river, and she rejoined her husband after a separation of 19 years.

Godin des Odonais, Jean. Born at Saint-Amand, 1712; died there, 1792. A French naturalist, cousin of Louis Godin, whom he accompanied to Peru in 1735. He remained there as a professor in the College of Quito, studying the flora and Indian languages. In 1750 he went to Cayenne, explored that colony, Brazilian Guiana, and the Amazon, and finally returned to France in 1773. He published several works on the plants, animals, and Indian languages of South America.

Godiva (gō-dī'vā). [ML. Godiva, from AS. God-gift, gift of God; equiv. to Dorothea or Theodora.] Flourished about the middle of the 11th century. The wife of Leofric, earl of Chester, celebrated in the annals of Coventry, Warwickshire, England. She was a woman of great beauty and piety, the benefactress of numerous churches and monasteries. According to the legend, she begged her husband to relieve Coventry of a burdensome toll, and he consented on the condition that she should ride naked through the market-place. This she did, covered only by her hair, and won relief for the people. In some versions of the story, the people were commanded to keep their houses, and the people were miraculously struck with blindness. Her festival is still celebrated at Coventry.

Godkin (god'kin), Edwin Lawrence. Born in Ireland, Oct. 2, 1831. An American journalist and author. He came to the United States as correspondent of the London "Daily News"; was admitted to the New York bar in 1838; became editor and proprietor of the "Nation" 1845-63; and became an editor and a proprietor of the "Evening Post" in 1881. He has published a "History of Hungary" (1856), etc.

Godman (god'man), Frederick Du Cane. Born about 1840. An English naturalist. In 1870 he published the "Natural History of the Azores." Shortly after he planned an elaborate scientific survey of Mexico and Central America, acquiring by purchase, and by employing collectors, immense series of specimens of the plants and animals of those regions. These have been described in the "Biologia Centrali-Americana," edited by Godman and Salvin; 110 numbers have been issued up to 1891.

Gododin (gō-dō'din). A British tribe living in Northumberland and southeastern Scotland: the Roman Otadini.

Gododin, The. A Welsh poem by Aneurin, on the seven days' battle of Catteracth in 603. The author was probably present at the battle. It consists, in its present form, of over 900 lines, and has been several times translated, either wholly or in part. Gray's "Death of Boel" is part translation part imitation of a portion of it. The Rev. John Williams ab Ithel translated the whole and published it in 1852, and portions of it have been translated by Henry Morley. See Aneurin.

Gödöllö (göd'öl-ölé). A town of Hungary, 15 miles northeast of Budapest. Here, April 6, 1849, the Hungarian insurgents under Görgey defeated the Austrians under Prince Windischgrätz.

Godolphin (go-dol'fin), Sidney, first Earl of Godolphin. Born in Cornwall, England, probably about 1635; died Sept. 15, 1712. An English statesman and financier. He became page of honor to Charles II. in 1662; was appointed master of the robes in 1678; represented Htclston in the House of Commons 1668-79; represented St. Mawes 1679-81; and was first lord of the treasury 1690-97 and 1700-01. During the reign of William III. he kept up a secret correspondence with James II. at St.-Germain. He became in 1702 premier and lord high treasurer, in which capacity he vigorously supported Marlborough during his absence on the Continent in the War of the Spanish Succession. He was created earl of Godolphin in 1706, and was dismissed from office in 1710 at the fall of the Marlboroughs.

Godolphin Barb, The. One of the three Oriental sires from which the thoroughbred horse is derived. See Darley Arabian and Byerly Turk. He was probably a barb foaled about 1729 and brought from Paris in the reign of George II. He died in 1753. The traditions surrounding this horse were woven into a novelette by Eugene Sue in 1825. -From the Godolphin springs the Matchem branch of the thoroughbred horse.

Godoy (gō-doi'), Manuel de, Duke of Alcudia. Born at Badajoz, Feb. 12, 1767; died Oct. 7, 1851.

A Spanish statesman. He obtained the favor of Queen Maria Louisa and Charles IV., and rose rapidly to an important position in the state. He became duke of Alcudia and lieutenant-general in 1792, prime minister in 1793, and in 1795, for securing a peace with France, received the title "Prince of the Peace." He signed the treaty of San Ildefonso with France Aug. 29, 1796; married Maria Theresa of Bourbon in 1797; and resigned from the ministry in 1798. In 1801 he commanded the army against Portugal and secured the treaty of Badajoz. He was made generalissimo and high admiral of Spain. He attached himself to Napoleon, and signed the treaty of Fontainebleau (which see). Meanwhile he had become an object of popular hatred, which burst out in a riot (March 18, 1808), from which he narrowly escaped. His arrest was ordered, but he escaped through Napoleon's influence, and lived later at Rome and Paris.

God Save the King (or Queen). The English national anthem: words and music probably composed by Henry Carey. It was first performed in 1740. It is sometimes attributed to John Bull (1607): it has also been assigned a Scottish or French origin. The tune was adopted in France in 1776, and was afterward used as the Danish, Prussian, and German national air. Beethoven introduced it in his "Battle Symphony"; Weber has used it in three or four compositions. The American national hymn, "My Country, 'tis of Thee," was written by Dr. Samuel Francis Smith, and published in 1843: the music is that of "God Save the King."

Godunoff (gō-dö-nof'), Boris Feodorovitch. Born 1552; died April 13, 1605. A Russian czar. He was the chief member of the regency during the reign of the imbecile Feodor Ivanovitch (1584-98), who was married to Godunoff's sister Irene. He was elected to the throne on the death of Feodor in 1598, having, it is said, previously caused the death of the czarevitch Dmitri.

Godwin (god'win), or Godwine. Died April 14, 1053. Earl of the West Saxons. He accompanied Cnut on his visit to Denmark in 1019, and is said to have fought with distinction in an expedition against the Wends. He shortly after married Gytha, a relative by marriage of Cnut, and in 1035 was appointed earl of the West Saxons. On the death of Cnut in 1035 he at first supported the cause of Harthacnut, but afterward espoused that of Harold, with whom he was probably implicated in the murder of the English atheling Alfred, half-brother of Harthacnut and son of Emma by her first husband, Ethelred the Unready. In 1042 he was instrumental in procuring the election of Edward the Confessor in opposition to the Danish prince Svend Estrithson. He married his daughter Edith or Eadgyth to Edward in 1045. His position, however, as the most powerful subject in the kingdom excited the jealousy of the court, and he was exiled in 1051, but was recalled in the following year.

Godwin, Francis. Born at Havington, Northamptonshire, England, 1561; died 1633. An English bishop and author. He was appointed bishop of Llandaff in 1601, and was translated to the see of Hereford in 1617. His chief work is "A Catalogue of the Bishops of England" (1601).

Godwin, Mrs. (Mary Wollstonecraft). Born at London, April 27, 1759; died at London, Sept. 10, 1797. An English author. She was employed by Johnson as a reader and translator, and for five years assisted in this way her family, who were very poor. In 1791 she first met William Godwin, and after one or two other connections, especially with Gilbert Imlay, who deserted her, she went to live with him in 1796. The expectation of a child induced them to marry in 1797. The birth of the child (who was the second wife of the poet Shelley) proved fatal to her. Her chief work was "Vindication of the Rights of Woman" (1792).

Godwin, Parke. Born at Paterson, N. J., Feb. 25, 1816. An American journalist and author. He was connected with the New York "Evening Post" 1837-53 (except one year), a connection which he renewed in 1865. He has published "History of France" (1853), "A Biography of William Cullen Bryant" (1853), etc.

Godwin, William. Born at Wisbeach, England, March 3, 1756; died at London, April 7, 1836. An English novelist, historian, and political and miscellaneous writer. His father was a dissenting minister, and he became one himself, preaching from 1777 to 1782, when his faith in Christianity was shaken by study of the French philosophers, and he devoted himself to literature. He was a sympathizer with the French Revolution, and became the representative of English radicalism. He married Mary Wollstonecraft in 1797, though he objected to marriage on principle. His works include "Inquiry concerning Political Justice, etc." (1793), "History of the Commonwealth" (1824-28), the novels "Caleb Williams" (1794), "St. Leon" (1799), "Mandeville" (1817), etc. He also published histories of Rome, Greece, and England, a "Pantheon," and "Fables" under the pseudonym of Edward Baldwin. Compare Godwin, Mrs. (Mary Wollstonecraft).

Goes e Vasconcellos (goiz ê vas-kôn-sâl'ôs), Zacharias de. Born at Valeuça, Bahia, Nov. 5, 1815; died at Rio de Janeiro, Dec. 28, 1877. A Brazilian statesman. He was repeatedly elected deputy, and was senator from 1864; was president of several provinces, including the newly created province of Paraná, the government of which he organized in 1853; was a member of several ministries; and was three times premier (1861, 1864-65, and 1866-68). During the last period the war with Paraguay was at its height. In politics he was a moderate conservative.

Goethe (gô'te), Johann Wolfgang von. Born at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, Aug. 28, 1749; died at Weimar, March 22, 1832. A famous German poet, dramatist, and prose-writer: the greatest name in German literature. His father, Johann Caspar Goethe (1710-82), was a well-to-do man who had the title of imperial councillor. His mother was Katharina Elizabeth Textor (1731-1808), the daughter of a magistrate. His early education was under the personal direction of his father. In 1765 he matriculated at Leipsic for the study of jurisprudence. In the autumn of 1768 he returned ill to Frankfurt, and in 1770 went to the University of Strasburg. In this year occurred a love-affair with Friederike Brion (died 1813, unmarried) at Sesenheim, and the beginning of his friendship with Herder. In 1771 he obtained the degree of licentiate of law, and returned to Frankfurt. In 1772 he went as a practitioner in the imperial chamber of justice to Wetzlar, where he met Charlotte Buff, the Lotte of "Werther." Six months later he suddenly left Wetzlar and returned to Frankfurt. In 1774 began his friendship with Lavater and F. H. Jacobi, and, more important still for its consequences, that with Karl August, duke of Saxe-Weimar. In 1774-75 he was engaged for a short time, in Frankfurt, to Anna Elizabeth Schönemann (married in 1778 to the Baron von Turkheim: died 1817), the "Lili" of his lyrics. In 1775, at the invitation of Karl August, who had succeeded to the dukedom, Goethe went to Weimar, where he subsequently lived; in 1776 he was made privy councillor of legation, with a vote in the ducal council; in 1778 he was with the duke in Potsdam and Berlin; in 1779 he was made privy councillor; in 1782 he was ennobled and made president of the ducal chamber; and in the summers of 1785 and 1786 he was in Karlsbad. From there, in Sept., 1786, he set out for Italy, whence he did not return to Weimar until June, 1788. His connection with Christiane Vulpius (died 1816), to whom he was married in 1806, began in this year. In 1789 his son August was born (died at Rome in 1830). Goethe revisited Venice in 1790, and later, on business of state, was in Breslau. He became director of the ducal theater in Weimar in 1791, which position he held until 1817. In 1792 he accompanied the duke into the field against France, and was with him at the siege of Mainz in 1793. His close friendship with Schiller, which ended only with the death of the latter in 1805, began in 1794. After 1794 he devoted himself entirely to literature. Goethe's life in its literary phases may be considered under four periods. The first of these, the "first poetical period," extends from youth to the time of his arrival in Weimar (1775). The chief works of this period are the plays "Die Leiden des Verliebten" ("The Caprices of the Lover"), "Die Mitschuldigen" ("The Accomplices"), both in Alexandrines; "Götz von Berlichingen," a tragedy which established his fame as a poet (1773); "Die Leiden des jungen Werther" ("The Sorrows of Young Werther"), a novel (1774); "Clavigo," "Stella," both tragedies; poems to "Lili," and other lyrics; "Götter, Helden und Wieland" ("Gods, Heroes, and Wieland"), a satire (1774)—all belonging to the "Storm and Stress" period of German literature. The "second poetical period" extends from his arrival in Weimar to the beginning of his friendship with Schiller (from 1775 to 1794). It includes the operas "Erwin und Elmire" and "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1775: both rewritten in 1787), the first book of "Wilhelm Meister" (completed 1775), the final metrical version of "Iphigenie" (1787, on his return from Italy: it had been acted in 1779 in prose), "Die Geschwister" ("The Brother and Sister," 1787: a drama which had been written in 1776), "Egmont" (1778), "Torquato Tasso" (in verse, 1790: a prose version had been completed in 1781), "Reinecke Fuchs," a poem (1794), and numerous shorter poems. The third period covers his friendship with Schiller (from 1794 to 1805). It includes the "Römische Elegien" ("Roman Elegies," 1795: they appeared in Schiller's periodical "Die Horen"), "Venedianische Epigramme" (1796: they appeared in Schiller's "Musenalmanach"), a series of satiric epigrams "Die Xenien," written by Goethe and Schiller (1797: in the "Musenalmanach"), "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre" (1796: begun in 1777), "Herermann und Dorothea" (1797), "Die Natürliche Tochter" (1803), "Geschichte der Farbenlehre" ("History of the Doctrine of Colors," 1805: final form 1810), "Die Braut von Korinth." The fourth is the period of his old age, from 1815 to 1832. It includes "Faust," first part (1818), "Die Wahlverwandtschaften" ("Elective Affinities," 1809), "Aus meinem Leben, Dichtung und Wahrheit" ("From my Life; Poetry and Truth") (first part 1811, second 1812, third 1814, fourth 1831), and his scientific work. In 1814 he began to write the Oriental poems afterward published as "Der Westöstliche Divan." "Des Epimenides Erwachen," a drama, was produced at Berlin in 1815. In 1816 was completed the first volume of the "Italienische Reise" ("Italian Journey"), followed in 1817 by a second, in 1829 by a third, their material being the letters written from Italy to friends in Weimar, among them Herder and Frau von Stein. He also began this year his treatises on Germanic art in the periodical "Kunst und Alterthum" ("Art and Antiquity"), which were continued down to 1828. In 1817 appeared the first of the series of essays on scientific subjects, "Zur Naturwissenschaft" ("On Natural History"), continued down to 1824. "Wilhelm Meister's Wanderjahre" appeared in 1821 (in its final shape in 1829). In 1821 was published the first part of the so-called "Zahme Xenien" ("Tame Xenia"), and a second in 1823. In 1831 the second part of "Faust" was completed, only a few months before his death. The tragedy of "Faust," the greatest of his productions, is in reality a literary epitome of his life, since it had occupied him at times for nearly sixty years. In 1772 scenes of a prose "Faust" were written, fragments of which were retained in the later poetic version. The earliest rimed scenes of the first part are from 1773-75. In 1790 a first edition, with the title "Faust, ein Fragment," was published at Leipsic. About 1797 he again took up the first part, which was completed in 1806, and published at Tübingen in 1808. As regards the second part, the idea of the "Helena," ultimately printed as the third act of the completed second part, was conceived before 1776. It was not, however, worked out until 1826, and in 1827 was published with the title "Helena, eine classisch-romantische Phantasmagoria." The complete second part first appeared in the first volume of the "Nachgelassene Werke" ("Posthumous Works," 1833). His own editions of his collected works are "Schriften" (Leipsic, 1787-90, in 8 vols.), "Neue Schriften" (Berlin, 1792-1830, in 7 vols.), "Werke" (Tübingen, 1806-08, in 12 vols., to which was added a thirteenth in 1810), "Werke" (Stuttgart and Tübingen, 1815-19, in 20 vols.), "Werke" (1827-1831, in 40 vols.). To these are to be added "Goethe's nachgelassene Werke" (1832-34, in 15 vols., with 5 vols. more in 1842). A chronological table of all his writings was edited by Hirzel, Leipsic, 1834. Lewes's "Life of Goethe" (1855) is the standard English work on the subject. Last edition, 1890.

Goetz von Berlichingen. See Götz von Berlichingen.

Goffe (gof), William. Born about 1605; died at Hadley, Mass., 1679. An English Parliamentary commander, one of the judges of Charles I. He lived in New England in concealment after 1660.

Gog (gog). In Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix., a ruler in the land of Magog, mentioned as the prince of Mesheeh and Tubal. In Rev. xv. 8, Gog and Magog appear as two allied warring tribes. They were formerly regarded as connected with the invasion of the Scythians in western Asia, but of late Gog has been identified with Gagn, referred to in the annals of the Assyrian king Assurbanipal (668-626 B. C.) as the mighty ruler of a warlike tribe in the territory of Sahl, north of Assyria.

Gog and Magog. The names given to two effigies in the Guildhall, London. They are now thought to be intended for Gogmagog and Corineus. The original statues stood there in the days of Henry V. They were burned in the Great Fire, and new ones were put up in 1708. The older ones were made of wickerwork, pasteboard, etc., and were carried in procession at the lord mayor's show.

Gogmagog (gog'ma-gog), or Goëmot, or Goëmagot. A legendary king of the giants. He was killed by Corineus, a follower of Brut.

Gogmagog Hills. A spur of the chalk range about 3 miles southeast of Cambridge, England.

Gogo (gô'gô), or Gogha (gô'gâ). A seaport in the district of Ahmedabad, Bombay, British India, situated on the Gulf of Cambay in lat. 21° 40' N., long. 72° 12' E.

Gogo (gô'gô), or Wagogo (wâ-gô'gô). A Bantu tribe settled in the center of German East Africa, between Usagara, Usango, and Uyanzi. The country is called U'gogo, the language Kigogo. U'gogo is a plateau, 3,500 feet high, with arid and woodless soil. The Wagogo are numerous and warlike. Their weapons are bows, arrows, assegais, lances, and clubs. Many of their neighbors seek refuge among them. Despite their central location, they are not given to traveling and trading.

Gogol (gô'gol), Nikolai Vassilievitch. Born in the government of Pultowa, March 31 (N. S.), 1809; died at Moscow, March 4 (N. S.), 1852.

A Russian novelist and dramatist. He was educated in a public gymnasium at Pultowa, and subsequently in the lyceum, then newly established, at Niejinsk. In 1831 he was appointed teacher of history at the Patriotic Institution, a place which he exchanged in 1834 for the professorship of history in the University of St. Petersburg; this he resigned at the end of a year, and devoted himself entirely to literature. In 1836 Gogol left Russia; he lived most of the time in Rome. In 1837 he wrote "Dead Souls" (which see). In 1840 he went to Russia for a short period in order to superintend the publication of the first volume of "Dead Souls," and then returned to Italy. In 1846 he returned to Russia, and fell into a state of fanatical mysticism. One of his last acts was to burn the manuscript of the concluding portion of "Dead Souls," which he considered harmful. He also wrote "Evenings at the Farm," "St. Petersburg Stories," "Taras Bulba, a Tale of the Cossacks," "The Revizor," a comedy, etc.

Gogra (gog'rî), or Gogari. A sacred river of India, flowing southeast and joining the Ganges about 35 miles above Patna. Length, about 600 miles.

Gold Coast. A British crown colony in West Africa, extending for about 350 miles along the coast of the Gulf of Guinea, about long. 5° W.-2° E. Chief town, Accra. The Danish settlements at Accra, etc., were transferred to Great Britain in 1850, and the Dutch claims in 1871. The colony was reconstituted in 1876. Area, 29,401 square miles (38,685 including the protectorate). Population, estimated, 1,500,000.

Golden Ass, The. [L. Metamorphoseon, seu de Asino Auroco, Libri XI.] A romance of a fantastic and satirical character, by Apuleius, written in the 2d century: probably his earliest work. It imitated a portion of the "Metamorphoses" of Lucian. The best-known episode in it is that of Cupid and Psyche, which was taken from a popular legend or myth. Some of the adventures of Don Quixote and of Gil Blas are drawn from this source, and Boccaccio has used many of the comic episodes. The author relates the story in his own person. His dabbling in magic results in his transformation into an ass, in which form, however, he retains his human intelligence.

Its readers, on account of its excellence, as is generally supposed, added the epithet of "golden." Warburton, however, conjectures, from the beginning of one of Pliny's epistles, that Aurea ("golden") was the common title given to the Milesian and such tales as strollers used to tell for a piece of money to the rabble in a circle: "Assen para et accipe auream fabulam." These Milesian fables were much in vogue in the age of Apuleius.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 96.

Golden Bull. [So named from its golden seal.] A bull published at the Diet of Nuremberg by the emperor Charles IV. in 1356. It was the electoral code of the empire, determining the prerogatives and powers of the electors, and the manner of the election of the King of the Romans. See Andrew II. and Metz.

Golden City. A name sometimes given to San Francisco.

Golden Fleece. In Greek mythology, the fleece of the winged ram Chrysomallos, the recovery of which was the object of the expedition of the Argonauts. Chrysomallos was given by Nephele, the repudiated wife of Athamas, king of Thessaly, to help her children Phrixos and Helle to escape from the persecutions of Ino, Athamas's second wife. During the flight

Helle fell into the sea and was drowned, while Phrixus escaped to Colchis, where he was hospitably received by King Aetes. Phrixus sacrificed the ram at Colchis to Zeus, and gave its golden fleece to Aetes, who fastened it to an oak-tree in the garden of Arce.

Golden Fleece, Order of the. See Order.

Golden Gate, The. [So named by Drake in 1578 (?).] A strait connecting San Francisco Bay with the Pacific Ocean. Width, about 2 miles.

Golden Gate, The. A gate in the wall of Theodosius, Constantinople, now walled up because of a Turkish tradition that the conqueror of Constantinople is destined to enter through it. It consists of three arches between two huge towers of white marble. The great central arch was reserved for the passage of the emperor.

Golden Horn. An inlet of the Bosphorus, forming the harbor of Constantinople, and separating Pera and Galata from the main part of Constantinople (Stambul). Length, 5 miles.

Golden House. [L. domus aurea.] The palace of Nero in ancient Rome, which occupied the valley between the Palatine and the Esquiline, and connected the palaces of the Cæsars with the gardens of Mæcenæ. It was built after the great fire of 64 A. D., and was so large that it contained porticos 2,800 feet long and inclosed a lake where the Colosseum now stands. The forecourt contained a colossus of Nero 120 feet high. The profuse splendor of this residence is described by Suetonius and Tacitus. It was further adorned by Otho, but the remains are scanty, as most of its site was restored to public use by the Flavian emperors, who built on it the Colosseum and the baths of Titus.

Golden Legend. [L. legenda aurea.] 1. A collection of biographies of saints, compiled by James of Voragine in the 13th century, and printed by Caxton 1483.—2. A dramatic poem by Longfellow, published in 1851. It forms, with the "Divine Tragedy" and "New England Tragedies," a trilogy. Sir Arthur Sullivan wrote music for Longfellow's words, and it was produced as a cantata at Leeds in 1886.

Golden Mount, The. See the extract.

From its yellow sand the Janiculum Hill has been sometimes known as the Golden Mount, a name which survives in the title of the church at its summit, which is called S. Pietro in Montorio (monte d'oro).

Goldsmith (gól'smith), Oliver. Born at Pallas, County Longford, Ireland, Nov. 10, 1728; died at London, April 4, 1774. A noted English poet, novelist, dramatist, and miscellaneous author. In 1749 he obtained the degree of B. A. at Trinity College, Dublin. In 1752 he studied medicine at Edinburgh. He was extremely poor, and after a roving and not very creditable existence, both in England and on the Continent (he returned from Feb. 1755, to Feb. 1756, traveling chiefly on foot), he returned in great destitution to London, where he tried to practise medicine. His miserable appearance was against him, and he finally settled down as a literary hack. By 1759, however, he began to attract attention as a writer. He wrote for "The Critical Review," "The British Magazine," "The Lady's Magazine," "The Busybody," "The Bee," and other periodicals. Among his works are "Enquiry into the Present State of Public Learning in Europe" (1759), "The Citizen of the World, etc." (1762; from the "Public Ledger," etc.), "A History of England, etc." (1764), "The Traveller" (1765), "The Year of Wakefield" (a tale, 1766), "The Good-natured Man" (a comedy, 1768), "The Roman History, etc." (1769), "The Deserted Village" (a poem, 1770), "The History of England from the Earliest Times, etc." (1771; abridged 1774), "She Stoops to Conquer, etc." (1774), "Retaliation" (a poem, 1774), "A History of the Earth and Animated Nature" (1774). "Little Goody Two Shoes" is attributed to him. He translated Scarron's "Comic Romance" (1776) and other French works, and with Joseph Collyer abridged Plutarch's "Lives" (1762).

Goldsmith's Maid. A bay trotting mare by Abdallah (15). Her racing career extended from 1876 to 1878. In 1871 she captured the great trotting record from Dexter (2:17) by a mile in 2:17. This she afterward lowered to 2:14, and lost to Rarus (2:13) in 1874.

Gompertz (gom'perts), Benjamin. Born at London, March 5, 1779; died July 14, 1865. An English astronomer and actuary, of Hebrew descent. He was one of the founders of the Astronomical Society, and became actuary of the Alliance Assurance Company in 1824. "Some years previously he had worked out a new series of tables of mortality for the Royal Society, and these suggested to him in 1825 his well-known law of human mortality, which he first expounded in a letter to Francis Baily. The law rests on the a priori assumption that a person's resistance to death decreases as his years increase, in such a manner that at the end of equally infinitely small intervals of time he loses equally infinitely small proportions of his remaining power to oppose destruction." (Dict. Nat. Biog.) He was a brother-in-law of Sir Moses Montefiore.

Gondavo. See Gandavo.

Gondibert (gon'di-bért). A poem by Sir William Davenant, published in 1651.

"Gondibert," his [Sir William Davenant's] greatest performance, incurred, when first published, more ridicule, and in later times more neglect, than its merits deserve. An epic poem in elegiac stanzas must always be tedious, because no structure of verse is more unfavourable to narration than that which almost peremptorily requires each sentence to be restricted, or protracted, to four lines. But the liveliness of Davenant's imagination, which Dryden has pointed out as his most striking attribute, has illuminated even the dull and dreary path which he has chosen; and perhaps few poems afford more instances of vigorous conceptions, and even felicity of expression, than the neglected "Gondibert."

Sir Walter Scott, Dryden, Works, III, 101.

Gondo (gon'dō), Ravine of. A wild gorge of the Alps, in the Simplon Pass.

Gorboduc (gôr'bô-duk). A mythical king of Britain. His story, with that of his sons Ferrex and Porrex, is told in the early chronicles.

Gorboduc, who succeeded to the crown of Britain soon after the death of Lear, profited so little by the example of his predecessor that he divided his realm during his life between his two sons, Ferrex and Porrex, whose bloody history is the subject of the first regular English tragedy: it was written by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville (Lord Buckhurst), was acted in 1561, and afterwards printed in 1565, under the name of "Gorboduc." Sir Philip Sidney says that this drama climbs to the height of Seneca, and Pope has pronounced the much higher eulogy that it possesses "an unaffected perspicuity of style, and an easy flow in the numbers: in a word, that chastity, correctness, and gravity of style which are so essential to tragedy, and which all the tragic poets who followed, not excepting Shakspeare himself, either little understood or perpetually neglected." Both in the drama and romance, the princes, between whom the kingdom had been divided, soon fell to dissension, and the younger stabbed the elder; the mother, who more dearly loved the elder, having killed his brother in revenge, the people, indignant at the cruelty of the deed, rose in rebellion, and murdered both father and mother. The nobles then assembled and destroyed most of the rebels, but afterwards became embroiled in a civil war, in which they and their issue were all slain.

Gordian (gôr'di-an). See Gordianus.

Gordianus (gôr'di-â'nus) I., Marcus Antoninus, surnamed Africanus, Anglicized Gordian. Born about 158 A. D.; died at Carthage, 238. Roman emperor. He was descended from a wealthy and illustrious Roman family, and acquired great popularity by his largesses to the populace. He became procurator of Africa in 237, and when, in 238, a rebellion broke out in his province against Maximinus, he was forced by the insurgents to assume the purple. His elevation was confirmed by the Roman senate. He associated with himself in the government his son Gordianus II. The younger Gordianus was defeated and slain before Carthage by Cappellianus, governor of Mauretania, whereupon the elder Gordianus put himself to death after a reign of only six weeks.

Gordianus II., Marcus Antonius. Born 192 A. D.; died near Carthage, 238. Roman emperor, son and associate of the preceding.

Gordianus III., Marcus Antonius Pius. Born about 224 A. D.; died in Mesopotamia, 244. Roman emperor. He was the grandson of Gordianus I. on his mother's side, and was proclaimed Caesar on the death of the two Gordians in Africa in 238. (See Gordianus I.) He became sole emperor in the same year, on the assassination by the pretorians of the two Augusti, Pupianus and Balbinus, who had been appointed by the senate to succeed Gordianus I. He undertook an expedition against Persia in 242, under the guidance of his father-in-law, the veteran soldier Misitheus, after whose death he was murdered by the pretorian prefect Philip, who usurped the throne.

In 1860 he was attached to the British force under Sir James Hope Grant operating with the French against China, and in 1863 took command of a Chinese force, called the Ever Victorious Army, against the Taiping rebels. He put down the rebellion in thirty-three engagements, and resigned his command in 1864, receiving from the emperor the yellow jacket and peacock's feather of a mandarin of the first class. He was governor of the Equatorial Provinces of central Africa in the service of the Khedive of Egypt 1874-76; was created pasha by the khedive in 1877; and in the same year was promoted lieutenant-colonel in the British army. He was governor-general of the Sudan, Darfur, the Equatorial Provinces, and the Red Sea littoral 1877-79, in which capacity he stamped out the slave-trade in his district. He acted as adviser of the Chinese government in its relations with Russia in 1883; went as commanding royal engineer to Mauritius 1881-82; and was commandant of the colonial forces of the Cape of Good Hope in 1882. In 1884 he was sent by the British government to the Sudan to assist the khedive in withdrawing the garrisons of the country, which could not be held any longer against the Mahdi. He was besieged by the Mahdi at Khartum, March 12, 1884, and was killed in the storming of the city, Jan. 26, 1885.

Gordon, George, fourth Earl of Huntly. Born 1514; died 1562. A Scottish statesman. He held important offices under James V.; with Home defeated an English force at Hadden Rig, Aug. 24, 1542; on the murder of Cardinal Beaton succeeded him as lord high chancellor (1546); and held a command and was taken prisoner at the battle of Pinkie (1547). He opposed the policy of the queen regent, and finally deserted her. He favored the Catholic cause. Under Mary he was in disfavor, and was finally denounced as a rebel. He attacked the queen's forces at Corrichie, Nov. 5, 1562, but was defeated, and died from the effects of the battle.

Gordon, George, fifth Earl of Huntly. Died May, 1576. A Scottish statesman. He was a favorite of Mary, and an ally of Bothwell, and became lord high chancellor in 1566. He was implicated in the murder of Darnley.

Gordon, Lord George. Born at London, Dec. 26, 1751; died Nov. 1, 1793. An English agitator, third son of Cosmo George, third duke of Gordon. He entered Parliament in 1774. In 1779 he became president of the Protestant Association, formed to secure the repeal of the Bill of Toleration, passed in 1773 for the relief of Roman Catholics. At the instance of the society a large number of the opponents of the bill met in St. George's Fields, and marched in a body to the House of Commons simultaneously with the presentation by Gordon of a petition praying Parliament to repeal the bill. A riot ensued, which was quelled by the troops June 8, 1780. Gordon was tried in 1781 for complicity in the riots, but was acquitted for want of evidence.

Gordon, George Hamilton, fourth Earl of Aberdeen. Born at Edinburgh, Jan. 28, 1784; died at London, Dec. 14, 1860. A British statesman. Gotham (gō'tham). 1. A parish in Nottinghamshire, England, 6 miles south of Nottingham. The simplicity of its inhabitants, which has passed into a proverb, is said to have been simulated to avert a king's anger. The "foes of Gotham" are mentioned as early as the 15th century in the "Towneley Mysteries"; and at the commencement of the 16th century a collection of stories, said to be by Dr. Andrew Borde, was made about them, not, however, including the following, which rests on the authority of nursery tradition:

Three wise men of Gotham
Went to sea in a bowl;
And if the bowl had been stronger
My song would have been longer.

Hallivell, Nursery Rhymes.

2. A name given to the city of New York.

Gotham Election, A. A farce by Mrs. Centlivre, produced in 1715.

A seaport and the capital of the laen of Gothenburg and Bohus, Sweden, situated on the Göta, near its mouth, in lat. 57° 41' N., long. 11° 55' E.; the second city of Sweden. It was founded by Gustavus Adolphus about 1619. Its commercial importance dates from the Napoleonic wars. The chief manufactures are sugar, machinery, cotton, and beer. It has become notable in recent years for its licensing system for the decrease of intemperance. Population (1890), 104,657.

Gothenburg and Bohus (bō'hös). A maritime laen of Sweden, bordering on the Skager Rack and Cattegat. Area, 1,952 square miles. Population (1890), 297,824.

Gothia (gō'thi-ä). See Septimania.

Gothic (goth'ik). The language of the Goths. The Goths spoke various forms of a Teutonic tongue now usually classed with the Scandinavian as the eastern branch of the Teutonic family, though it has also close affinities with the western branch (Old High German, Anglo-Saxon, etc.). All forms of Gothic have perished without record, except that spoken by some of the western Goths (Visigoths), who at the beginning of the 4th century occupied Dacia (Wallachia, etc.), and who before the end of that century passed over in great numbers into Mæsia (now Bulgaria, etc.). Revolting against the Roman Empire, they extended their conquests even into Gaul and Spain. Their language, now called Moesogothic or simply Gothic, is preserved in the fragmentary remains of a nearly complete translation of the Bible made by their bishop, Wulfila (a name also used in the forms Ulfila, Uphila, Ufilas), who lived in the 4th century A. D., and in some other fragments. These remains are of a high philological importance, preceding by several centuries the next earliest Teutonic records (Anglo-Saxon and Old High German).

We do not know how much of the Bible Wulfila translated into Gothic. One ancient writer says that he translated all but the books of Kings, which he left out because he thought that the stories of Israel's wars would be dangerous reading for a people that was too fond of fighting already. It is quite in accordance with what we know of Wulfila's character that he should have felt some uneasiness about the effect that such reading might have on the minds of his warlike countrymen; but one would have thought that the books of Joshua and Judges would have been even more likely to stimulate the Gothic passion for fighting than the books of Kings. Probably the truth is that Wulfila did not live to finish his translation, and no doubt he would leave to the last the books which he thought least important for his great purpose of making good Christians. The part of Wulfila's Bible that has come down to us consists of a considerable portion of each of the Gospels, and of each of St. Paul's Epistles, together with small fragments of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. Six different manuscripts have been found. The most important of these was discovered in the sixteenth century in a monastery at Werden in Germany. After having been in the possession of many different owners, it was bought in 1662 by the Swedish Count de la Gardie, who gave it the binding of solid silver from which it is commonly called Codex Argenteus, or Silver Book; it is now in the University of Upsala, and is regarded as one of the choicest treasures possessed by any library in Europe. It is beautifully written in letters of gold and silver on purple parchment, and contains the fragments of the Gospels. Of the other five manuscripts one was discovered in the seventeenth century in Germany, and the rest in Italy about seventy years ago.

Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 63.

Gotland (island). See Gotland.

Gotland (got'h'land), Sw. Gotland, or Gottland (got'länd), or Götaland (yē'tä-länd). Historically, the southern division of Sweden, comprising the modern provinces (laen) Malmöhus, Kristianstad, Blekinge, Kronoberg, Jönköping, Kalmar, Östergötland, Halland, Gothenburg and Bohus, Elfsborg, and Skaraborg, and the islands Gotland and Öland. This and the land of the Swedes proper grew into the kingdom of Sweden during the middle part of the middle ages.

Gothofred. See Godfrey.

Goths (goths). [See first quotation below.] An ancient Teutonic race which was established in the regions of the lower Danube in the 3d century. A probable hypothesis identifies them with the Gotoes or Gutones who dwell near the Baltic; but there is no reason to believe in their relationship with the Getae, and no proof of their Scandinavian origin. They made many incursions into different parts of the Roman Empire in the 3d and 4th centuries, and gradually accepted the Arian form of Christianity. The two great historical divisions were the Visigoths (West Goths, the Greutungi) and the Ostrogoths (East Goths, the Thervingi). A body of Visigoths settled in the province of Mæsia (the present Servia and Bulgaria), and were hence called Mæsotho; and their apostle Wulfila (Ulfilas) translated the Scriptures into Gothic. (See Gothic.) The Visigoths formed a monarchy about 418, which existed in southern France until 507, and in Spain until 711. An Ostrogothic kingdom existed in Italy and neighboring regions from 493 to 553. The so-called Tetraxitic Goths are mentioned in the Crimea as late as the 18th century. By extension the name was applied to various other tribes which invaded the Roman Empire.

A fragment of a calendar contains the word Gut-thi-uda, 'people of the Goths.' The word thiuda is the same as the Old-English thiod, meaning people; and from the compound Gut-thiuda, and from other evidence, it may be inferred that the name which, following the Romans, we spell as Goths was properly Gutans—in the singular Gut. Like all other names of nations, this word must originally have had a meaning, but it is very difficult to discover what that meaning was. It has often been asserted that the name of the Goths has something to do with the word God (in Gothic guth). We might easily believe that an ancient people might have chosen to call themselves "the worshippers of the Gods"; but although this interesting suggestion was proposed by Jacob Grimm, one of the greatest scholars who ever lived, it is now quite certain that it was a mistake. It seems now to be generally thought that the meaning of Gutans is 'the (nobly) born.' Bradley, Story of the Goths, pp. 4, 5.

The Goths are always described as tall and athletic men, with fair complexions, blue eyes, and yellow hair—such people, in fact, as may be seen more frequently in Sweden than any other modern land. A very good idea of their national costume and their general appearance may be gained from the sculptures on "The Storied Column," as it is called, erected at Constantinople by the Emperor Arcadius in honour of his father Theodosius, which represents a triumphal procession including many Gothic captives. Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 9.

Gotland (got'länd), or Gotland (goth'land), or Gottland (got'länd), or Gutaland (yē'täländ). An island of the Baltic, 60 miles east of Sweden, to which it belongs. The surface is generally level. The chief occupations are agriculture, cattle-raising, lime-burning, and quarrying. The chief place is Visby. The island was a medieval commercial center. Its possession was long disputed by Denmark. In 1645 it was permanently united to Sweden. Length, 70 miles. Area, 1,175 square miles. Population (1893), estimated, 51,141.

It is true that the southern province of Sweden is still called Gotland; but the Gautar (called Geatas by the Anglo-Saxons), from whom this province took its name, were not identical with the Goths, though doubtless nearly related to them. On the other hand, the island called Gotland, in the Baltic, was anciently called Gutaland, which seems to show that its early inhabitants were really in the strict sense Goths; and, according to the Norse sagas and the Anglo-Saxon poets, the peninsula of Jutland was anciently occupied by a branch of the Gothic people, who were known as Hrêth-gotan, or Reidgotar.

Götterdämmerung (gēt'ter-dem'ne-röng). [G., 'twilight of the gods.] The fourth part of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen," first performed at Bayreuth Aug. 17, 1876. Gröce.

Gottfried von Strassburg (got'frēt fon sträs'börg). A Middle High German epic poet. He lived at the end of the 12th and the beginning of the 13th century, but the exact years of his birth and death are unknown. He belonged to the burgher class, as appears from the title "Meister" used in the MSS. About 1210 he wrote, after French originals, the epic poem "Tristan und Isolde," which, however, he did not live to complete. It was subsequently continued by Ulrich von Türheim (1233-1266) and Heinrich von Freiberg, who wrote about 1300.

Göttingen (gēt'ting-en). A town in the province of Hannover, Prussia, situated on the Leine in lat. 51° 33' N., long. 9° 56' E. The university (Georgia Augusta) was founded by George II. of England (Electo of Hannover) in 1734, and opened in 1737. Seven of its professors (Ewald, Gervinus, Doblmann, Albrecht, Weber, and the brothers Grimm) were expelled by King Ernest Augustus in 1837 for their opposition to the suspension of the constitution of 1833. It has a library of over 500,000 volumes. Population (1890), 23,689.

Gottschalk (got'shällk), Latinized Gotescalcus (gō-tes-kal'kus). Died about 868. A German theologian. He was sent as a child to the convent of Fulda, and subsequently entered the Benedictine convent at Orbais, where he was ordained. His doctrine of twofold predestination (i. e. of some to eternal life and of others to eternal death) was condemned by the Synod of Mainz in 848, and he was deprived of his priestly functions. The rest of his life was spent in prison in the convent of Hantvillers.

Gottschalk, Louis Moreau. Born at New Orleans, May 8, 1829; died near Rio de Janeiro, Dec. 18, 1869. A popular American pianist and composer, son of an Englishman and a Frenchwoman. He made extensive professional tours in Europe and in North and South America, and enjoyed great popularity.

Gottschall (got'shäll), Rudolph von. Born at Breslau, Prussia, Sept. 30, 1823. A German dramatist, poet, novelist, and miscellaneous writer. Among his works are "Die Göttin" (1852), "Carlo Zeno" (1853), "Deutsche Nationalliteratur" (1853), the plays "Pitt and Fox," "Katharina Howard," "Amy Robsart," etc.

Gottsched (got'shed), Johann Christoph. Born at Juditten, near Königsberg, Feb. 2, 1700; died at Leipsic, Dec. 12, 1766. A German critic and writer. He was educated at Königsberg, and subsequently went to Leipsic, where (1730) he was made professor of philosophy and poetry, and where he died. His services to German literature are principally critical. He was the reorganizer in Leipsic of the literary society, Die deutsche Gesellschaft, which afterward became a sort of academy. In 1725 he edited the journal "Die vernünftigen Tadelrinnen" ("The Rational Censors"), which was continued after 1727 under the title "Der Biedermann" ("The Honest Man"). A "Redekunst" ("Art of Rhetoric") appeared in 1728. His critical views were first systematically presented in "Versuche einer kritischen Dichtkunst für die Deutschen" (1730). This was followed from 1732 to 1744 by a series of essays on literary history and the German language. In 1734 appeared "Weltweisheit" ("World-Wisdom"), an exposition of the theories of Wolff, the leader of German rationalism. In 1748 appeared "Deutsche Sprachkunst." On the drama he exercised an important influence by his advocacy of French classicism. Through his efforts the old harlequin "Hanswurst" was banished from the German stage. His "Deutsche Schaubühne" ("German Stage," 6 vols.) appeared 1740-45. His principal original poetical work is the tragedy "Der Sterbende Cato" ("The Dying Cato," 1732). From 1730 to 1740 he exercised a sort of literary dictatorship in Germany. After the latter date his influence rapidly declined. He became involved in a number of literary disputes in which he was worsted. On the stage he was caricatured under the name "Tadler" ("Faultfinder"), and a witty lampoon held him up to ridicule.

Götz (gôts), Johann Nicolaus. Born at Worms, Germany, July 9, 1721; died at Winterburg, Nov. 4, 1781. A minor German poet. He studied theology at Halle 1739-42, and subsequently filled various ecclesiastical offices. He is noted for wit and elegance of expression rather than for depth of sentiment. His collected works, with a biography by Ramlar, appeared at Mannheim in 1785 (new ed. 1807).

Götz of the Iron Hand. A name given to Götz von Berlichingen.

Götz von Berlichingen (gôts fon ber'lich-ingen). A play by Goethe. The first sketch was finished in 1771. In 1773 he rewrote and published it. In 1804 he prepared another edition for the stage; it has not been played since. It is treated in the manner of a Shaksperian historical drama. See Berlichingen.

"Götz von Berlichingen," the subject of which was an old German baron of the time of Maximilian, grandfather to Charles V., who revoked the law of duel. Götz, for contravening his ordinance in this, lost his right hand. A machine was made and fitted to his arm, whence he was called "iron hand." He was a real character, and has left memoirs of himself. This curious feature joined itself alongside of "Werther" and "The Robbers" (Schiller), this delineation of a wild, fierce time, not as being the sketch of what a rude, barbarous man would appear in the eyes of a philosophical man of civilized times, but with a sort of natural regret at the hard existence of Götz, and a genuine esteem for his manfulness and courage! By this new work Goethe began his life again; he had struck again the chord of his own heart, of all hearts. Walter Scott took it up here, too, and others. But the charm there is in Goethe's "Götz" is unattainable by any other writer. In Scott it was very good, but by no means so good as in "Götz." It was the beginning of a happier turn to the appreciation of something genuine.

Carlyle, Lects. on the Hist. of Lit., p. 196.

Gouda (gon'dä), or Ter-Gouwe (ter-gou'), or Ter-Gouwe. A town in the province of South Holland, Netherlands, situated at the junction of the Gouwe and Yssel, 12 miles northeast of Rotterdam. It is noted for its bricks and pipes, and has large markets for cheese and other dairy products. The museum and the Groote Kerk are of interest. Population (1891), 20,087.

Goudimel (gō-dē-mel'). Claude. Born at Vaison, near Avignon, about 1510; killed at Lyons in the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day, Aug. 24, 1572. A noted French composer and teacher of music. He set to music some of the Psalms in their French version by Marot and Beza (1565).

Gough (gof), Alexander Dick. Born Nov. 3, 1804; died Sept. 8, 1871. An English architect and engineer. He devoted himself especially to ecclesiastical architecture.

Gough, Hugh, first Viscount Gough. Born at Woodstown, Limerick, Ireland, Nov. 3, 1779; died near Dublin, March 2, 1869. A British general. He was commander-in-chief in China 1841-42 and in India 1843-49, commanding in person in the Sikh wars 1845-49.

Gough, John Bartholomew. Born at Sandgate, Kent, England, Aug. 22, 1817; died at Philadelphia, Feb. 18, 1886. A noted Anglo-American orator, distinguished particularly as a temperance lecturer in America and Great Britain. He came to the United States in 1829, and began lecturing in 1843. He visited England in 1853, 1857, and 1878. He published an "Autobiography" (1846), "Sunshine and Shadow" (1881), etc.

Goujet (gô-zhâ'), Claude Pierre, Abbé. Born at Paris, Oct. 19, 1697; died at Paris, Feb. 1, 1767. A French historical and miscellaneous writer. His works include "Bibliothèque française, ou histoire littéraire de la France" (1740-59), "Bibliothèque des auteurs ecclésiastiques" (1736), "Origine et histoire de la poésie française, etc." (1745), etc.

Goujon (gô-zhôn'), Jean. Born about 1515 (?); died probably between 1564-68. A celebrated sculptor of the French Renaissance period. Nothing is known definitely of his life. In 1540 he is mentioned as working on Saint-Maclou at Rouen; the little door of this church ascribed to him dates, however, from a later period. In 1541 he left Rouen for Paris, where he joined Pierre Lesot in the decoration of Saint-Germain l'Auxerrois. From Paris he went to Rouen, where the architect Bullant was reconstructing the chateau. The "Victory" of Ecouen is well known. At about this time he is thought to have developed a tendency toward the Huguenot party. From 1547 to 1550 was his first period of work on the Louvre, then under reconstruction by Pierre Lesot. (See Louvre and Pierre Lesot.) To it belong the escalier (staircase) of Henry II, the figures of the cells-bernef, the Caryatides du Louvre, and the figures of the Fontaine des Innocents. In 1550 Goujon went to Anet to work on the chateau of Diane de Poitiers, which was then building by Philibert de l'Orme. The Diane Classeruse (traditionally representing the great Diana herself, which stood in the courtyard of the chateau, is now in the Louvre. Before 1560 he completed the decoration of the Louvre. After 1560-61 his name disappears from the list of "Maîtres Maçons" working with Pierre Lesot. He is supposed to have been shot on his scaffold in the court of the Louvre during the massacre of St. Bartholomew (1572).

Goulburn (gôl'bèrn). A city in Argyle County, New South Wales, Australia, 105 miles southwest of Sydney. Population (1891), 10,916.

Goulburn (gôl'bèrn), Henry. Born at London, March 19, 1784; died near Dorking, Surrey, Jan. 12, 1856. An English politician. He was chancellor of the exchequer 1828-30, home secretary 1834-1835, and chancellor of the exchequer 1841-46.

Gould (gôld), Augustus Addison. Born at New Ipswich, N. H., April 23, 1805; died at Boston, Sept. 15, 1866. An American naturalist, especially noted as a conchologist. Among his chief works are "Invertebrate Animals of Massachusetts" (1841), "Mollusca and Shells of the U. S. Exploring Expedition under Capt. Wilkes" (1852).

Gould, Baring. See Baring-Gould.

Gould, Benjamin Apthorp. Born at Boston, Sept. 27, 1824. A noted American astronomer. He was long employed in astronomical work in connection with the United States Coast Survey; was director of the Dudley Observatory at Albany, 1855-59; and from 1870 to 1885 had charge of the National Observatory at Cordoba, Argentina. This observatory was organized by him, and during his directorship it issued the most important series of astronomical reports that have appeared in South America. He founded and edited an astronomical journal at Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Gould, Hannah Flagg. Born at Lancaster, Mass., 1789; died at Newburyport, Mass., Sept. 5, 1865. An American poet. She removed with her parents in 1800 to Newburyport, where she spent the remainder of her life.

Gould, Jay. Born at Roxbury, Delaware County, N. Y., May 27, 1836; died at New York, Dec. 2, 1892. An American capitalist. He began life as a surveyor; became engaged in the lumber business; and about 1857 became connected with a bank in Stroudsburg, Pennsylvania. He subsequently became president of the Rutland and Washington Railroad, but soon resigned and went to New York, where he became president of the Erie Railway. His manipulation of this road in connection with James Fisk, Jr. (who was vice-president and treasurer), became notorious. He was obliged to restore to the English bondholders securities representing $7,550,000. He was later identified with the Western Union Telegraph Co., and with the extensive railroad combinations in the southwestern States known as the "Gould system." He left property valued at $72,000,000.

Gould, John. Born at Lyme-Regis, Dorset, England, Sept. 14, 1804; died at London, Feb. 3, 1881. An English ornithologist. He began life as a gardener at Ripley Castle, Yorkshire, and became taxidermist to the London Zoological Society in 1827. He illustrated the "Century of Birds from the Himalayan Mountains," and published "Birds of Europe" (1832-37), "Birds of Australia" (1840-48), "Monograph of the Trochilidae" (1849-61), "Birds of Great Britain" (1862-73), etc. He illustrated these works with nearly 3,000 plates.

Gounod (gô-nô'), Charles François. Born at Paris, June 17, 1818; died at St.-Cloud, Oct. 18, 1893. A French composer. He entered the Conservatoire in 1836, took the second prix de Rome for his cantata "Marie Stuart et Rizzio" in 1837, and in 1839 took the grand prix for his cantata "Fernando." He at one time thought of entering the church. After some years of study he produced his "Messe Solennelle in G," some numbers of which were brought out by Hullah in London in 1851. From 1852 to 1860 he was conductor of the "Orphéon" in Paris. "Faust" was produced at the Théâtre Lyrique, March 19, 1859, and placed him at once in the first rank of his profession. Among his other operas are "Sapho" (1851), "Le médecin malgré lui," from Molière's comedy (1852), "Philémon et Baucis" (1860), "La reine de Saba" (1862), "Mireille" (1864), "Roméo et Juliette" (1867), "Cinq-Mars" (1877), "Polyeucte" (1878), etc. He also wrote much church music, an oratorio ("La rédemption," 1882), the religious work "Mors et vita" (1885), and many single songs and pieces, besides a great deal of music for the Orphéonistes.

Gour. See Gaur.

Gourgaud (gôr-gô'), Baron Gaspard. Born at Versailles, France, Sept. 14, 1783; died at Paris, July 25, 1852. A French general. He took part in most of the Napoleonic campaigns, and accompanied Napoleon to St. Helena in 1815. He published, with Monthlon, "Mémoires de Napoléon à Sainte-Hélène" (1823).

Gouvion-Saint-Cyr (gô-vyôn'sân'sêr'), Laurent. Born at Toul, France, April 16, 1764; died in the south of France, March 17, 1830. A French marshal. He gained the victory of Polotsk in 1812, and was minister of war 1815 and 1817-19.

Govan (gûv'an). A western suburb of Glasgow, Scotland.

Govardhana (gô-vâr-dhâ'nâ). In Hindu mythology, a mountain in Vrindavana which Krishna induced the cowherds to worship instead of Indra. The god in rage sent a deluge to wash away the mountain and its people, but Krishna held up the mountain on his little finger to shelter the people, and Indra, baffled, did homage to Krishna.

Governor's Island. A small fortified island, belonging to the United States, situated in New York harbor about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of New York.

Gow (gou), Nathaniel. Born at Inver, Perthshire, March 22, 1766; died at Edinburgh, Jan. 17, 1831. A Scotch violinist and composer.

Gow, Niel. Born at Inver, Perthshire, March 22, 1727; died there, March 1, 1807. A Scotch violinist and composer, father of Nathaniel Gow. He was the author of several popular Scotch airs.

Gower (gou'êr). 1. A character in Shakspeare's "Henry IV.," part 2, and in "Henry V.," an officer in the king's army.—2. In Shakspeare's "Pericles," a character who appears as chorus.

Gower, John. Born about 1325; died in the priory of St. Mary Overies, Southwark, 1408. An English poet. Little is known of his early life, but he appears to have lived in Kent and to have been a man of wide reading. He was well known at court in his later years. His principal work the "Confessio Amantis" (written in English, probably in 1386, was originally dedicated to Richard II., but in 1394 he changed the dedication to Henry of Lancaster (afterward Henry IV.). Caxton printed it in 1483. Among his other works are "Speculum Meditantis" (written in French, recently found) and "Vox Clamantis" (a poem written in Latin, begun in 1381). After the accession of Henry VI., Gower, then an old man, added a supplement, the "Tripartite Council." It treats of occurrences of the time, and the strength of its aspirations and teaching caused Chaucer to call him "the moral Gower." "Ballades" and other poems (mostly in French) were printed in 1818.

Gower. A peninsula in Glamorganshire, Wales, which projects into Bristol Channel. The majority of the inhabitants are of Flemish or Norman origin.

Gowrie (gou'ri), Carse of. A low-lying tract of fertile land in Perthshire, Scotland, extending along the north bank of the Tay, for about 15 miles, between Perth and Dundee.

Gowrie Conspiracy. A conspiracy against the life or personal freedom of James VI. of Scotland, by John Ruthven (earl of Gowrie), Alexander Ruthven, and others. It resulted in the death of the leaders in a struggle with the king's followers at Perth, Aug. 5, 1600.

Goya (gô'yâ). A town in the province of Corrientes, Argentine Republic, situated near the Paraná about lat. 29° 10' S., long. 59° 20' W. Population, about 4,000.

Goyanás (gô-yâ-nâs'). A race of Indians formerly occupying the Brazilian coast between Angra dos Reis and the island of Cananea, and, inland, the country about the present city of São Paulo. They lived in the open lands, were savages of a low grade, subsisted by hunting and fishing, and practised little or no agriculture; commonly they dwelt in caves. The Goyanás were enemies of the Tupi hordes, but readily made friends with the whites, and were among the first to whom Anchieta and Nobrega preached. The Goyatácás (which see) appear to have been of the same race. It has been supposed that the Camés and other mixed tribes are partly derived from them. Also written Goyanias, Goyanaes, and (by a double plural) Goyanazes or Goyanaees.

Goyanna (gô-yân'nâ). A town in the state of Pernambuco, Brazil, situated on the river Goyanna, near the sea, about 50 miles north of Recife. Population, about 5,000.

Goyás (gô-yâs'). An extinct tribe of Brazilian Indians who lived in the region between the Tocantins and Araguaia. Their women wore gold ornaments, which led the first Portuguese explorers to the discovery of rich gold-mines. The city and subsequently the captaincy (now state) of Goyaz were named from them. Also written Goyayas, and (a double plural) Goyazes or Goyazees.

Goyatácá (gô-yâ-tâ-kâ'), or Goyotacá (gô-yô-tâ-kâ'). A sub-stock of the Tapiya race of Brazilian Indians; so called by Martius because he believed that the ancient Goyatácás were of the same group. It includes the Caropós, Macunis, Patachós, and other hordes in northeastern Minas Geraes, southern Bahia, and Espírito Santo.

Goyatácás (gô-yâ-tâ-kâs'). [So called by the Tupís, from guyatá, to run, and ká, to be: 'runners.'] A tribe of Brazilian Indians which, at the time of the conquest, occupied the open lands near the coast in what is now the eastern part of the state of Rio de Janeiro. They were wandering savages, in customs and apparently in language allied to the Goyanás (which see). For many years they were dangerous enemies of the whites. Also written Goyataees, Guyataees, and (a double plural) Guyataees, Goyataees, and Goyataees; hence Campes dos Goyataees, abbreviated to Campes, the name of a city.

Goya y Lucientes (gô'yâ y lû-thê-on'tes), Francisco. Born at Fuendetodos, near Saragossa, Spain, March 31, 1746; died at Bordeaux, France, March 16, 1828. A noted Spanish painter and etcher. Among his works are portraits, satirical works, representations of bull-fights, etc. He is also known as a caricaturist and satirist. He has been called "the Hogarth of Spain."

Goyaz (gô-yâz'). 1. A state of Brazil, lying east of Matto Grosso and north of Minas Geraes. Area, 288,546 square miles. Population (1888), 211,721.—2. The capital of the state of Goyaz, situated on the river Vermelho in lat. 16° 26' S., long. 49° 49' W.; formerly called Villa Boa de Goyaz. Population, about 8,000.

Goyeneche (gô-yâ-nâ'châ), José Manuel. Born at Arequipa, Peru, June 13, 1775; died at Madrid, Spain, Oct. 15, 1846. A Spanish general. In 1808 the junta of Seville sent him to South America to receive from the viceroys and presidents their oaths of allegiance to Ferdinand VII. He remained in Peru, and from 1809 to 1813 commanded the Spanish armies in Charcas (now Bolivia), where he repeatedly defeated the revolutionists. Returning to Spain in 1813, he assisted in the final expulsion of the French; was made lieutenant-general and count of Guañil; and later was counselor of state, senator, and commander in several provinces. In 1846 he was made a grandee of Spain.

Gozan (gô'zan). In biblical geography, a district and city in northern Mesopotamia, mentioned in the euneiform inscriptions.

Gozan (gôz-loñ'), Léon. Born at Marseilles, Sept. 1, 1803; died at Paris, Sept. 14, 1866. A French novelist and dramatist. He wrote "Le notaire de Chantilly" (1836), "Le médecin du Peq" (1839), "Le dragon rouge" (1843), "Histoire de cent trente femmes" (1833), "Balzac en pantoufles" (1846); a familiar memoir of great interest, Gozan having been Balzac's secretary, and "La folle du N° 16" (1861) and "Le vampire du Val-de-Grâce" (1862), two pseudo-medical studies, besides many other tales, and about 15 plays, which were not so successful as his novels.

Gozo, or Gozzo (gô'sô). An island in the Mediterranean Sea, belonging to Great Britain, 4 miles northwest of Malta; the ancient Gaudos. Area, 20 square miles. Population (1891), 18,921.

Gozzi (gô'sô), Count Carlo. Born at Venice, Dec. 13, 1720; died April 4, 1806. An Italian dramatist and satirist.

With Gozzi it had likewise the effect of leading to a new style of comedy, by the introduction of those fairy dramas which had such an astounding run, during several years, at Venice, and which are now completely forgotten, except indeed by the Germans, who, on their revival, conferred upon Count Gozzi the title of the first comic writer of Italy. Simoni, Lit. of the South of Europe, 1. 532.

Gozzi, Count Gasparo. Born at Venice, Dec., 1713; died at Padua, Italy, Dec. 26, 1786. An Italian critic and littérateur, brother of Carlo Gozzi. He wrote "Osservatore veneto periodico" (1768), etc.

Gozzo. See Gozo.

Gozzoli (got'sò-lè), Benozzo. Born at Florence, 1420; died at Pisa, 1498. A Tuscan painter. His chief work is the mural paintings in the Campo Santo, Pisa.

Graaf (gräf), Regnier de. Born at Schoonhoven, Netherlands, July 30, 1641; died at Delft, Netherlands, Aug. 17, 1673. A physician and anatomist, author of works upon the pancreas, the generative organs, etc. His works include "De natura et usu succi pancreatici" (1663), "De noumullis circa partes genitales inventis novis" (1668), "Tractatus de virorum organo generationi inservientibus, etc." (1668), "De mulierum organo generationi inservientibus, etc." (1672), etc. The Graafian follicles were named from him.

Grabow-on-the-Oder (grä'bô-on-thê-ô'der). A town in the province of Pomerania, Prussia, situated on the Oder 2 miles north of Stettin. Population (1890), 15,703.

Gracchus (grak'us), Caius Sempronius. Killed at Rome, 121 B. C. A Roman politician, younger brother of the younger Tiberius Gracchus. He served under his brother-in-law Scipio Africanus Minor in Spain, and was questor in Sardinia 126-123, when he was elected tribune of the people. He renewed the agrarian law passed by his brother Tiberius, and brought forward a series of resolutions looking to the substitution of a pure democracy for the existing aristocratic republican form of government, securing the support of the proletariat of the capital by the regular distribution of grain at the expense of the state. He was reelected to the tribuneship in 122, but failed of election in 121, in consequence of the opposition among all classes to his project of extending the rights of citizenship to the Latins. He was killed in a disturbance which ensued in the city.

Gracchus, Tiberius Sempronius. Born about 210 B. C.; died middle of 2d century B. C. A Roman magistrate, distinguished as a general in Spain and Sardinia, father of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus.

Gracchus, Tiberius Sempronius. Born in 168 or 163; died 133 B. C. A celebrated Roman politician, son of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus and Cornelia, daughter of Scipio Africanus Major. He married Claudia, daughter of Appius Claudius, and was the brother-in-law of Scipio Africanus Minor, whom he accompanied in his expedition against Carthage. He was appointed questor in 137, and as such served under the consul C. Hostilius Mancinus in the Numantine war in Spain. He was elected tribune of the people for 133. At this period the class of independent farmers of small holdings was rapidly disappearing from Italy. The land was being absorbed by the latifundia of the rich, and cultivated by slave labor; and the peasantry were forced to seek refuge in the cities, especially Rome, where they swelled the ranks of the unemployed. Gracchus sought to bring about a greater subdivision of the land and to restore the class of independent farmers by reviving, with some modification, the Licinian law, passed in 367 but allowed to fall into abeyance, which limited the amount of public land that each citizen might occupy. His proposals were carried in the comitia tributa in spite of the opposition of his colleague, who was deposed. At the end of his term he tried, contrary to the constitution, to secure reelection, and a disturbance arose in consequence, in which he was killed with 300 of his followers by the optimates under P. Scipio Nasica.

Grace (gräs), William Gilbert. Born July 18, 1848. An English cricketer. He is especially distinguished as a batsman, but has the reputation of being the best all-round player hitherto known. By profession he is a physician.

Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners. An autobiographical work by Bunyan, published in 1666.

Grace Contract, The. The name given to an arrangement made between the government of Peru and the foreign holders of bonds of that nation, represented by Mr. Michael Grace. It was ratified by the Peruvian congress Oct. 25, 1889, and provided that the bonds, amounting to about $250,000,000, should be canceled. The bondholders received in return all the state railroads for 66 years, and important privileges connected with them, together with all the guano in Peru up to 3,000,000 tons, except that on the Chincha Islands; the government also promised to pay the bondholders 80,000 pounds sterling annually for 30 years. The bondholders agreed to complete certain unfinished railroads and to repair the existing ones within a given time. The "Peruvian Corporation," formed to take charge of the railroads, etc., also took possession of the Cerro de Paseo silver-mines, transferred to it by Mr. Grace, who had received the concession.

Graces, The Three. [Gr. Χάρεις, pl. of Χάρις = L. Gratia, E. Grace.] In classical mythology, personifications of grace and beauty, daughters of Zeus by Hera (or Ennomie, or Eunomia, etc.), or of Apollo by Æglo (or Euanthe). The names generally given to them are Euphrosyne, Aglaia, and Thalia. In Sparta and in Athens only two Graces were recognized.

Graces, The Three. An antique undraped marble group preserved in the Opera del Duomo at Siena, Italy. It is the foundation of many of the Renaissance and modern representations of the subject.

Gracian (grä-thë-in'), Baltasar. Born at Calatayud, Spain, about 1584; died at Tarragona, 1658. A Spanish Jesuit preacher and man of letters, head of the College of Tarragona. He is noted chiefly as a supporter of "Goniorism," or the so-called "polished style." See Góngora.

Gracias, or Gracias á Dios (grä'thë-äs ä-dë-ös'). [Sp., 'thanks to God.'] A town in Honduras, Central America, 76 miles west of Comayagua. It was founded in 1536, and was the first seat of the Audiencia of the Confines, and hence the capital of Central America, 1545-49. Population, about 4,000.

Gracias á Dios, Cape. [Sp., 'thanks to God.'] A headland on the coast of Nicaragua, Central America, projecting into the Caribbean Sea about lat. 15° N. It was discovered and named by Columbus in Sept., 1502.

Graciosa (grä-së-ô'zä). One of the Azores Islands, situated in lat. 39° 5' N., long. 28° W.

Gracioso (grä-thë-ô'sô). A popular addition made by Lope de Vega to the stock characters of Spanish comedy. He was a comic character, sometimes half buffoon, like the "fantastical person" of the contemporary English stage. Not seldom, and especially in Moreto's comedies, he is at the very core of the play. Morley, The Playgoer, p. 325.

Gradgrind (grad'grind), Thomas. A retired merchant in Dickens's "Hard Times." He is "a man of facts and calculations," in his own words, and is so practical that he is hardly human. "Now, what I want is facts. Teach these boys and girls nothing but facts. Facts alone are wanted in life. Plant nothing else, and root out everything else. You can only form the minds of reasoning animals upon facts; nothing else will ever be of any service to them. This is the principle on which I bring up my own children, and this is the principle on which I bring up these children. Stick to facts, sir!"

Gradiska, or Gradisca (grä-dis'kä). A town in the crownland of Görz and Gradiska, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Isonzo 22 miles northwest of Trieste. The principality was finally united to the Austrian house in 1717. Population (1890), commune, 3,352.

Gradius ad Parnassum (grä'dus ad pär-nas'-um). [L., 'steps to Parnassus.'] 1. A Greek or Latin dictionary which indicates the quantities of vowels; used as a guide in exercises of verse composition.—2. A Latin work on composition and counterpoint, by Johann Joseph Fux (1725).—3. A French work on the art of pianoforte-playing, with 100 studies, by Clementi, finished in 1817.

Grafton (graf'ton). A town in Worcester County, Massachusetts, situated on the Blackstone River 34 miles west-southwest of Boston. Population (1890), 5,002.

Grafton, Dukes of. See Fitzroy.

Grafton, Richard. Died about 1572. An English chronicler, printer to Edward VI. both before and after his accession to the throne. See the extract.

In 1537 Grafton, in association with a fellow-merchant, Edward Whitechurch, caused a modification of Coverdale's translation to be printed, probably by Jacob van Meeteren, at Antwerp. The title-page assigned the translation to Thomas Mathews, who signed the dedication to Henry VIII., and it is usually known as Mathews's Bible. Tat Mathews was the pseudonym of John Rogers, the editor. No printer's name nor place is given in the book itself. . . . In November, 1538, Coverdale's corrected English translation of the New Testament, with the Latin text, was "prynted in Paris by Frances Regnault . . . for Richard Grafton and Edward Whitechurch, citizens of London," with a dedication to Cromwell. This is the earliest book bearing Grafton's name. Grafton and Whitechurch chiefly concentrated their attention on the folio Bible, known as "the Great Bible." A license to print the book in Paris had been obtained at Henry VIII.'s request from Francis I. . . . An order was issued by the French government, 13 Dec. 1538, stopping the work and forfeiting the presses and type. Grafton escaped hastily to England. Many printed sheets were destroyed by the French authorities, but the presses and the types were afterwards purchased by Cromwell and brought to England. There the work was completed and published in 1539. Grafton was the printer of the first Book of Common Prayer in 1549, and of the edition of 1552. In 1552 and 1553 he printed "Actes of Parliament." Dict. Nat. Bio.

Gragas (grä'gäs). [ON. Grágyis: grá, gray, and gäs, goose.] The name given to several private compilations of Icelandic law, civil and canon, under the commonwealth. There are two principal collections that bear the title, the Konungsbók (Icel. Konungsbók) and the Stadarskóla-bók (Icel. Stadarskóla-bók), both from the 13th century. The name was probably applied to offset the Norwegian Gullfjodir, 'gold feather,' used of the old code of the Frostu-thing.

Gragnano (grän-yä'nô). A town in the province of Naples, Italy, 17 miles southeast of Naples. Population (1881), 8,611.

Graham (gräm), James, fifth Earl and first Marquis of Montrose. Born in 1612; died May 21, 1650. A noted Scottish statesman and soldier. He served in the Presbyterian army at the beginning of the civil war, but afterward joined the king, by whom he was made lieutenant-general in Scotland in 1644. He defeated the Covenanters at Tippermuir Sept. 1, and at Aberdeen Sept. 13, 1644, and at Inverlochy Feb. 2, Auldern May 9, Alford July 2, and Kilsyth Aug. 15, 1645. He was defeated by David Leslie at Philiphaugh, Sept. 13, 1645, and expelled from Scotland. He afterward entered the service of the emperor Ferdinand III., by whom he was made a field-marshal. In 1650 he conducted an abortive Royalist descent on Scotland, and was captured and executed.

Graham, James, second Marquis of Montrose: surnamed "The Good." Born about 1631; died Feb., 1669. A Scotch nobleman, second son of James, first Marquis of Montrose.

Graham, Sir James Robert George. Born at Naworth, Cumberland, June 1, 1792; died at Netherby, Cumberland, Oct. 25, 1861. A British statesman. He was first lord of the admiralty 1830-1834, home secretary 1841-46, and first lord of the admiralty 1852-55.

Graham, John, of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee. Born about 1649; died July 27 or 28, 1689. A Scottish soldier. He served in the Dutch army under the Prince of Orange, returning to Scotland in 1677. In 1678 he was appointed captain of a troop of dragoons, and was ordered to enforce certain stringent laws that had been enacted against the Scottish Covenanters. The severity with which he executed his orders provoked a rising, and the Covenanters defeated him at Drumelglo June 1, 1679. In 1689 Claverhouse raised a body of Highlanders to fight for James II. against William III., and July 27, 1689, gained the battle of Killiecrankie, but fell mortally wounded.

Graham (grä'am), Sylvester. Born at Suffield, Conn., 1794; died at Northampton, Mass., Sept. 11, 1851. An American vegetarian, best known as an advocate of the use of unbolted ("Graham") flour.

Graham (grām), Thomas. Born at Glasgow, Dec. 20, 1805; died at London, Sept. 11, 1869. A noted Scottish chemist. He was professor of chemistry at University College, London, 1837-55, when he became master of the mint. He is famous for his discovery of the law of diffusion of gases (1834). He published "Elements of Chemistry" (1842), etc.

Graham (grā'am), William Alexander. Born in Lincoln County, N. C., Sept. 5, 1804; died at Saratoga, N. Y., Aug. 11, 1875. An American politician. He was United States senator from North Carolina 1841-43, governor of North Carolina 1845-49, secretary of the navy 1850-52, and Whig candidate for Vice-President in 1852.

Grahame (grām), James. Born at Glasgow, April 22, 1765; died near Glasgow, Sept. 14, 1811. A Scottish poet. His chief work is "The Sabboth" (1804). He also wrote "Wallace: a Tragedy" (1799), "British Georgics," etc.

Graham-Gilbert, John. Born at Glasgow, 1794; died near Glasgow, June 4, 1866. A Scotch painter, best known from his portraits. He became a member of the Royal Scottish Academy in 1829.

Grahamstown (grā'amz-toun). A town in the Southeastern Province, Cape Colony, in lat. 33° 14' S., long. 26° 33' E. Population (1891), 10,498.

Graian Alps (grā'an alps). A group of mountains on the borders of Savoy (France) and Piedmont (Italy), lying between the Cottian Alps on the south and the Pennine Alps on the north. The highest summit is the Gran Paradiso (13,320 feet).

Grail, or Graal (grāl). In medieval legend, a cup or chalice (called more particularly the holy grail, or sangreal), supposed to have been of emerald, used by Christ at the Last Supper. In this vessel Joseph of Arimathea caught the last drops of Christ's blood as he was taken from the cross. By Joseph, according to one account, it was carried to Britain. Other accounts affirm that it was brought by angels from heaven and intrusted to a body of knights, who guarded it on the top of a mountain; when approached by any one not perfectly pure, it vanished from sight. The grail having been lost, it became the great object of search or quest to knights errant of all nations, none being qualified to discover it but a knight perfectly chaste in thought and act. The stories and poems concerning Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table are founded on this legend, and it has been still further developed in modern times. In the "Parsifal" of Wolfram of Eschenbach the grail is a precious stone confided by angels to the care of a religious brotherhood, "The Chevaliers of the Grail."

The probable genesis of the Arthurian legend, in so far as it concerns French literature, appears to be as follows. First in order of composition, and also in order of thought, comes the Legend of Joseph of Arimathea, sometimes called the "Little St. Graal." This we have both in verse and prose, and one or both of these versions is the work of Robert de Borron, a knight and trouvère possessed of lands in the Gatinais. There is nothing in this work which is directly connected with Arthur. By some it has been attributed to a Latin, but not now producible, "Book of the Graal," by others by Byzantine originals. Anyhow it fell into the hands of the well-known Walter Map, and his exhaustless energy and invention at once seized upon it. He produced the "Great St. Graal," a very much extended version of the early history of the sacred vase, still keeping clear of definite connection with Arthur, though tending in that direction. From this, in its turn, sprang the original form of "Percevale," which represents a quest for the vessel by a knight who has not originally anything to do with the Round Table. The link of connection between the two stories is to be found in the "Merlin," attributed also to Robert de Borron, wherein the Welsh legends begin to have more definite influence.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 35.

Grain Coast (grān kōst). That part of the coast of Liberia, western Africa, which extends from about long. 8° to 11° W.; so called from the exportation thence of grains of paradise.

Grainger (grān'jēr), James. Born probably at Duns, Berwickshire, in 1721 (?); died at St. Christopher, West Indies, Dec. 16, 1766. A Scottish physician and poet. After 1753 he settled in London, where he became intimate with Johnson and other famous men. In 1759 he went to the West Indies. He published a number of works, including essays, etc., on medicine. Among his poems are an "Ode on Solitude" (in Dodsley's collection, 1755), and "The Sugar Cane" (1764). He translated part of Ovid's "Epistles" (1758), and the "Elegies of Tibullus" and the poems of Sulpicia (1759). He assisted, with others, Charlotte Lennox in her translation of Brumoy's "Théâtre des Grecs" (1759).

Grammichele (grām-mē-kā'le), or Granmichele (grām-mē-kā'le). A town in the province of Catania, Sicily, 30 miles southwest of Catania. Population (1881), 11,804.

Grammont (grām-mōn'), Flem. Geertsbergen (gārts'berg-en), or Geraerdsbergen. A manufacturing town in the province of East Flanders, Belgium, situated on the Dender 22 miles west-southwest of Brussels. Population (1890), 10,891.

Gramont (grā-mōn'), Duc Antoine III. de. Born 1604; died at Bayonne, France, July 12, 1678. A French marshal, brother of Philibert de Gramont. He served with distinction in Flanders and Holland. He married a niece of Cardinal Richelieu. His "Mémoires" were published in 1716.

Gramont, Duc Antoine Agénor Alfred de. Born at Paris, Aug. 14, 1819; died at Paris, Jan. 18, 1880. A French diplomatist and politician. He was ambassador at Vienna 1861-70, and minister of foreign affairs May-Aug., 1870.

Gramont, Comte Philibert de. Born 1621; died 1707. A French nobleman at the court of Louis XIV., and after 1662 at that of Charles II. of England. His "Mémoires" were written by Anthony Hamilton in 1713.

Grampians (grām'pi-anz), or Grampian Hills or Mountains. A mountain system in Scotland, extending northeast and southwest in the counties of Argyll, Perth, Inverness, Forfar, Kincardine, Aberdeen, and Banff. Highest summit, Ben Nevis (4,406 feet). The name is very loosely used.

Gran (grān), Hung. Esztergom (es'ter-gom). A royal free city, capital of the county of Gran, Hungary, near the junction of the Gran and Danube, 25 miles northwest of Budapest. It is noted for its cathedral. Population (1890), 9,349.

Granada (grā-nā'dā; Sp. pron. grā-nā'thā). A former kingdom of Spain, comprising the three modern provinces of Almería, Granada, and Málaga. The region was conquered by the Saracens in 711. In 1238, after the disruption of the realm of the Almoravids, a Moorish kingdom of Granada was established which was a vassal of Castile. A long war with Ferdinand and Isabella ended in 1492 with the capture of Granada, and with the fall of the city the Moorish power in Spain came to an end.

Granada. A province in southern Spain, bounded by Cordova, Jaen, and Albacete on the north, Murcia and Almería on the east, Almería and the Mediterranean on the south, and Málaga on the west. It is traversed by the Sierra Nevada. Area, 4,937 square miles. Population (1887), 484,341.

Granada, Moorish Karnattah. The capital of the province of Granada, Spain, situated on the Jenil, on spurs of the Sierra Nevada, in lat. 37° 13' N., long. 3° 41' W. It is famous for the Alhambra (which see). The Generalife is a Moorish royal villa with extensive and lovely gardens, higher up the hill than the Alhambra. The graceful arcades and delicate arabesques are Alhambraic, as is the arrangement in the chief court of the tank to reflect the flowers and the perspective of arches. The cathedral, in the classical style, with late-pointed vaulting, was finished in 1500. The interior is spacious and well proportioned. The north door, the Puerta del Perdón, is a good example of ornate Renaissance design. The Capilla Real, south of the cathedral, was built before it, as a mausoleum for Ferdinand and Isabella, in the florid-pointed style of their reign; it has a superb sculptured retable, at the sides of which are remarkable kneeling portrait-statues of Ferdinand and Isabella. Their tomb (the tomb of the "Catholic kings") is an altar-tomb in marble, perhaps the most beautiful in the world, richly yet soberly decorated with figure-sculpture and arabesques, and with four griffins at the angles. The fine recumbent figures of the king and queen are clad in their royal robes. Beside this tomb is that, similar but even more elaborately ornamented, of their daughter Juana and her husband Philip. The details are admirable, but the monument is overloaded. The work is Italian. Granada was a large and powerful Moorish city, the capital of the kingdom of Granada. It was besieged and taken by the Spaniards in 1491-92. Population (1887), 73,006.

Granada. The capital of the department of Granada, Nicaragua, Central America, situated on Lake Nicaragua 25 miles southeast of Managua. It was founded in 1524, and was the capital of Nicaragua until 1856. Population, about 12,000.

Gran Chaco (grān chā'kō), El. [From the Quichua chacu, the animals collected by a roundup: in allusion to its numerous Indian tribes.] An extensive but ill-defined region in South America, in the Argentine Republic, Bolivia, and Paraguay. It is bounded on the east by the river Paraguay, 19° 30' S.; the river Salado is generally regarded as its southern limit; northward it extends to about lat. 18° 5' S.; and westward it extends to the highlands at the base of the Andes. Estimated area, 275,000 square miles. Formerly the name included all of eastern Bolivia to the Guaporé and Beni, which would make the area over 500,000 square miles. The Chaco is very imperfectly explored, and has few inhabitants except wild Indians. Most of the surface is flat, and portions are subject to periodical inundations. A few white settlements have been formed, principally in the Argentine portion.

Granger, James. Born at Shaston, Dorset, in 1723; died at Shiplake, Oxfordshire, April 4, 1776. An English writer and print-collector. He matriculated at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1743, but took no degree. He took holy orders, and was presented to the vicarage of Shiplake. About 1773 he made a tour through Holland. He wrote "A Biographical History of England . . . with a preface showing the utility of a collection of engraved portraits, etc." (1769). This was continued with additions at different times till in 1824 the work had increased to 6 volumes. In 1806 another continuation appeared from materials left by Granger and the collections of the Rev. Mark Noble, who edited it. The wholesale destruction of illustrated biographical works necessary to accomplish this gave rise to the term grangerize.

Previously to the publication of the first edition of Granger's work in 1769, five shillings was considered a liberal price by collectors for any English portrait. After the appearance of the "Biographical History," books ornamented with engraved portraits rose in price to five times their original value, and few could be found unutilized. In 1856 Joseph Lilly and Joseph Willis, booksellers, each offered for sale a magnificent illustrated copy of Granger's work. Lilly's copy, which included Noble's "Continuation," was illustrated by more than thirteen hundred portraits, bound in 27 vols. imperial 4to, price £42. The price of Willis's copy, which contained more than three thousand portraits, bound in 19 vols. fol., was £33 10s. It had cost the former owner nearly £200. The following collections have been published in illustration of Granger's work: (a) "Portraits illustrating Granger's Biographical History of England" (known under the name of "Richardson's Collection"), 6 pts. Lond. 1792-1812, 4to; (b) Samuel Woodburn's "Gallery of over two hundred Portraits . . . illustrative of Granger's Biographical History of England, &c.," Lond. 1816, fol.; (c) "A Collection of Portraits to illustrate Granger's Biographical History of England and Noble's continuation to Granger, forming a Supplement to Richardson's Copies of rare Granger Portraits," 2 vols. Lond. 1820-23, 4to. Dict. Nat. Biog.

the division of substances into conductors and non-conductors, and had an important bearing upon the discovery of the electric battery.

Gray, Sir Thomas. Died about 1369. An English writer (in Latin), author of "Scalacronica." See the extract.

The "Scalacronica" opens with an allegorical prologue, and is divided into five parts. Of these part i., which relates the fabulous history of Britain, in based on "Walter of Exeter's" Brut (i. e. on Geoffrey of Monmouth); part ii., which reaches to Egbert's succession, is based upon Bede; part iii., extending to William the Conqueror, on Higden's "Polychronicon"; and part iv. professes to be founded on "John le vikeir de Tilmouth que escript le Ystoria Anrea." There are several difficulties connected with the prologue; the chief are its distinct allusions to Thomas Otterburn, who is generally supposed to have written early in the next century (Scala-chron. pp. 1-4). According to Mr. Stevenson many incidents in part iv. are not to be found in the current editions of Higden. Mr. Stevenson considers the book to assume some independent value with the reign of John; but its true importance really begins with the reign of Edward I. It is specially useful for the Scottish wars, and narrates the exploits of the author's father in great detail (Scala-chron. pp. 123, 127, 138, etc.). The author is tolerably minute as to Edward II.'s reign (pp. 180-53), and the rest of the book (pp. 153-203) is devoted to Edward III. The detailed account of the French wars from 1355-61 angests the presence of the writer (pp. 172-200). The history breaks off in 1362 or 1363. Dict. Nat. Biog., XXIII. 21.

Gray, Thomas. Born at London, Dec. 26, 1716; died at Cambridge, July 30, 1771. An English poet. He was sent to Eton as an oppidan in 1727, forming an intimacy there with Horace Walpole. In 1734 he was admitted as a pensioner at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and in 1739 went abroad with Walpole on "the grand tour." He returned and settled at Cambridge, where he resided chiefly after 1741, though he spent a part of every summer with his mother at Stoke Pogis. He became professor of modern history at Cambridge 1768. In 1757 he refused the laureate-ship. His best-known work is the "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" (1751). His other principal works are "Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College" (1747), "Progress of Poesy" (1757), "The Bard" (1758). His poems and letters were edited by W. Mason in 1775; the letters by Mitford 1843-54; and the works, with life, by E. W. Gosse, in 4 vols., in 1882.

Great Synagogue, The. See the extract.

Accordingly we find that a new form of the theory started up in the sixteenth century, and gained almost undisputed currency in the Protestant churches. According to this view, the Canon was completed by a body of men known as the Great Synagogue. The Great Synagogue plays a considerable part in Jewish tradition; it is represented as a permanent council, under the presidency of Ezra, wielding supreme authority over the Jewish nation; and a variety of functions are ascribed to it. But the tradition never said that the Great Synagogue fixed the Canon. That opinion, current as it once was, is a mere conjecture of Elias Levita, a Jewish scholar contemporary with Luther. Not only so, but we now know that the whole idea that there ever was a body called the Great Synagogue holding rule in the Jewish nation is pure fiction. It has been proved in the clearest manner that the origin of the legend of the Great Synagogue lies in the account given in Neh. viii.-x. of the great convocation which met at Jerusalem and subscribed the covenants to observe the law.

It. Grecia, from L. Græcia (whence LGr. Γρακία), from Græcius, Greek, from Gr. Γραικός, pl. Γραικοί, orig. applied to the inhabitants of Epirus, etc. The common Greek name for the country was Hellas, Ἑλλάς; for the inhabitants Hellenes, Ἕλληνες. The AS. name was Cræca land, Græca land, Græcland, D. Griekland, G. Griechenland, land of the Greeks.] A country in southeastern Europe—(a) Ancient Greece: the country of the Hellenes. In the widest sense the name includes the Greek colonies in Asia Minor, Sicily, Africa, etc.; in its restricted and more usual meaning it is the peninsula south of the Cambrian Mountains, with the neighboring islands. Peninsular Greece comprised Thessaly, Epirus, Central Greece (including Acarnania, Ætolia, Doris, Western Locris, Eastern Locris, Phocis, Boeotia, Attica, and Megaris), and Peloponnesus (including Corinthia, Sicyonia, Phliasia, Achaia, Elis, Arcadia, Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia). The chief islands were Crete, Rhodes, Cos, Samos, Chios, Lesbos, Tenedos, Imbros, Samothrace, Thasos, Lemnos, Scyros, Eubœa, Salamis, Ægina, the Cyclades, Thera, Cythera, and the Ionian Islands (including Zacynthus, Cephalonia, Ithaca, Leucas, Corcyra, etc.). Cyprus was sometimes included, and in later times Macedonia and Thrace. The surface is mostly mountainous. The following are some of the more important facts and incidents of ancient Greek history: Dorian invasion of the Peloponnesus about 1100 B. C.; commencement of the hegemony of Sparta 6th century; Persian wars 500 to about 449; hegemony transferred to Athens about 477; Peloponnesian war 431-404; hegemony of Sparta 404-371; of Thebes 371-362; hegemony of Macedonia commenced 338; rise of Ætolian League and renewal of Achaean League about 280; independence of Greece proclaimed by Flaminius 196; final subjection of Greece to Rome 146; Greece made (in great part) into the Roman province of Achaia 27 B. C. Greece formed part of the Eastern Empire. (See further below, and under the various cities; also Persian Wars and Peloponnesian War.) (b) Modern Greece: a kingdom, capital Athens, lying between the Turkish empire on the north, and the sea on the east, south, and west, and including the Ionian Islands, Eubœa, the Cyclades, and some smaller islands. It includes the ancient Peloponnesus, Central Greece, southeastern Epirus, and nearly all Thessaly, and contains 16 nomarchies: Attica and Boeotia, Eubœa and the Sporades, Phthiotis and Phocis, Acarnania and Ætolia, Achaia and Elis, Arcadia, Laconia, Messenia, Argolis and Corinth, the Cyclades, Corfu, Cephalonia, Zacynthus, Arta, Tricala, and Larissa. The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy, with a chamber of deputies (207 members). The prevailing religion is that of the Greek Church. The inhabitants are chiefly Greeks (with some Albanians and Wallachians). In the later middle ages Greece was subject to the Venetians and other foreign rulers; it was conquered by Venice 1685-87, and reconquered by the Turks in 1715. More recent events are the revolution of 1821-29; the establishment of a kingdom in 1832; the revolution of 1833; the grant of a constitution in 1844; the revolution and the deposition of Otto in 1862; the election of George I. in 1863; and the cession of Arta, Tricala, and Larissa by Turkey in 1881. Area, 25,041 square miles. Population (1889), 2,187,208.

Greek Empire. See Eastern Empire.

Greek Independence, War of. The Greek revolts against the Turks, which broke out in the Morea, and in Wallachia and Moldavia, in 1821. The war was noteworthy for the Greek exploits by sea, the aid rendered by Lord Byron and other Philhellenists, the Turkish atrocities in Chios, and the interference of the powers and their victory over the Turkish fleet at Navarino in 1827, and the final Russo-Turkish war of 1828-29, which secured the independence of Greece.

Greene, Maurice. Born at London about 1696; died at London, Dec. 1, 1755. An English organist and composer, principally of church music. His chief work is "Forty Select Anthems" (1743).

Greene, Nathaniel. Born in Warwick Co., R. I., May 27, 1742; died near Savannah, Ga., June 19, 1786. An American general. He distinguished himself at Trenton, Princeton, Brandywine, Germantown, Monmouth, and elsewhere; succeeded Gates in command of the southern army in 1780; conducted the retreat from the Catawba to the Dan in 1781; and commanded at Guilford Court House, Hobkirk's Hill, and Eutaw Springs in 1781.

Greene, Nathaniel. Born at Boscawen, N. H., May 20, 1797; died at Boston, Nov. 29, 1877. An American journalist, brother of Charles Gordon Greene. He founded, in 1821, the Boston "Statesman," which became a prominent organ of the Democratic party in Massachusetts, and was postmaster of Boston 1829-40 and 1845-49. He translated a number of French, German, and Italian works.

Greene, Robert. Born at Norwich, England, 1560; died at London, Sept. 3, 1592. An English dramatist, novelist, and poet. He was educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree in 1583. He was subsequently incorporated at Oxford. After leaving the university he seems to have led a dissolute life abroad for some time. In 1592, after 10 years of reckless living and hasty literary production, he died after "a debauch of pickled herrings and Rhensh," deserted by all his friends. Gabriel Harvey attacked him shortly after his death in "Four Letters and Certain Sonnets, etc." Meres, Chettle, Nashe, and others defended him, and Nashe, who had also been attacked, published his "Strange News," directed more against Harvey than in defense of Greene. The quarrel was prolonged. Greene's fame rests mostly on the songs and elegies which are interspersed through his prose works. His principal works are tracts and pamphlets, "Mamilla, etc." (entered on "Stationers' Register" 1580), "Gwydonius, the Carle of Fancie" (1584), "Arbusto, the Anatomie of Fortune" (1584), "Planetomachia" (1586), "Euphues, his Censure to Philantus, etc." (1578), "Perimedes the Blacke-Smith" (1588), "Pandosto: the Triumph of Time, the historie of Dorastus and Fawnia" (1588), "Alcida" (licensed 1588), "Menaphon, etc." (1589; this appeared as "Greene's Arcadia" in 1599), "Greene's Mourning Garment, etc." (1590), "Greene's Never too Late" (1590), "Greene's Farewell to Folly" (1591), "A Notable Discourse of Cosnage" (in 3 parts; 2 in 1591, the third in 1592), "Greene's Greatworth of Wit, etc." (published at his dying request; licensed 1592). His plays are "Orlando Furioso," "A Looking Glass for London and England" (with Lodge), "The Honourable History of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay," "James the Fourth," "Alphonsus, King of Aragon," and "George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield." Dyce collected and edited his works 1831-48.

Greenland (grën'land), Dan. Grönland (grën'länd). [Discovered by Norsemen about 900. So named, it is said, in 986 by Eric the Red with the intent of attracting immigrants from Iceland by this alluring name.] An island in the north polar regions, belonging in part to Denmark, northeast of North America. It extends from Cape Farewell, in about lat. 60° N., northerly to beyond 82° N. In the interior is a plateau covered with an ice-cap, with the highest point about 10,000 feet. The coast is indented with fjords. There are some settlements in Danish East Greenland and Danish West Greenland. Trade is a Danish monopoly. Recent explorers have been Kane, Hall, Nares, and Greely (in the extreme north), Nansen (who traversed Greenland in 1888), and Peary (who explored the northern ice-cap in 1891-02, and visited the same region in 1893-95. It was visited by Eric the Red and colonized by him in 986. It was rediscovered by Davis in 1585, and recolonized by the Danes in 1721. Estimated area, 512,000 square miles. Population (mostly Eskimos) (1890), 10,516 (309 of them Europeans) in the Danish territory, with probably a few hundreds more elsewhere.

Gregory (grĕg'ō-ri), Saint, surnamed "The Illuminator" (in Armenia called Gregor Lusavoritch). [ME. Gregorie, F. Grégoire, It. Sp. Pg. Gregorio, G. Gregorius, Gregor, L. Gregorius, from Gr. Γρηγόριος, lit. 'watchful.'] Born at Valarshabad, Armenia, about 257; died 332. The founder and patron saint of the Armenian Church. He was consecrated patriarch of Armenia about 302.

Gregory I, Saint, surnamed "The Great." Born at Rome about 540; died there, March 12, 604. Pope 590-604. He was descended from an illustrious Roman family, probably the Anicijans; studied dialectics, rhetoric, and law; entered the civil service; and about 574 was appointed pretor urbanus by the emperor Justin. Retiring from this office in order to consecrate himself to an ecclesiastical life, he employed the wealth left him at his father's death to establish six monasteries in Sicily and one at Rome, and in the last-named foundation he himself became a monk. About 579 he was sent as papal apocrisarius to Constantinople by Pelagius II. He returned to Rome in 585, and in 590 was elected pope. He restored the monastic discipline, enforced the rule of celibacy of the clergy, arranged the Gregorian modes or chant, and displayed great zeal in propagating Christianity. It is said that when a monk he saw some heathen Anglo-Saxon youths exposed for sale in the slave-market at Rome, and that on ascertaining their nationality he exclaimed, "They would be indeed not Angli, but angeli (angels), if they were Christians!" He would have gone himself as a missionary to Britain, but was restrained by the Pope. In 597 he sent Augustine, accompanied by 40 monks, to Ethelbert, king of Kent, who was baptized with 10,000 of his subjects in the space of a year. His memory is stained by an adulatory letter of congratulation to the usurper and murderer Phocas on his accession to the imperial throne, written with a view to gaining his support in a dispute with the patriarch of Constantinople. He was the author of numerous homilies on Ezekiel and the Gospels, "Moralia," "Regula (or Cura) Pastoralis," "Dialogues," "Letters," "Liber Sacramentorum," "Liber Antiphonarius," etc. The best edition of his works is the "Benedictine" (1765).

Next to Leo I. he [Gregory I.] was the greatest of the ancient bishops of Rome, and he marks the transition of the patriarchal system into the strict papacy of the middle ages. Schaff, History of the Christian Church, III. 328.

Gregory II, Saint, Pope. Died Feb. 10, 731. Pope 715-731. He sent Boniface as missionary to the Germans 719, and opposed the iconoclasm of Leo the Isaurian. He is commemorated by the Roman Catholic Church on Feb. 13.

Gregory III, Saint. Died Nov., 741. Pope 731-741. He convoked at Rome, in 732, a council which denounced iconoclasm and confirmed the worship of images. He is commemorated on Nov. 28.

Gregory IV. Died Jan., 844. Pope 827-844. He attempted to adjust the quarrel between the three rebellious sons of Louis le Débonnaire and their father, with the result that he offended both parties, and also the French bishops.

Gregory V. (Bruno of Carinthia). Died Feb. 18, 999. Pope 996-999. He was elected through the influence of his uncle, the emperor Otto III., and was the first German pope. He was expelled in 997 by the Roman senator Crescentius, who procured the elevation of the antipope John XVI. He was restored the next year on the appearance of Otto in Italy with an army, and the execution of Crescentius and John.

Gregory VI. (Johannes Gratianus). Died at Cologne about 1048. Pope 1045-46. He had as rival claimants to the papal dignity Benedict IX. and Sylvester III. All three were deposed in 1046 by the emperor Henry III., who placed Clement II. in the apostolic chair.

Gregory VII. (Hildebrand). Born at Saona (or Soano), Tuscany, about 1020; died at Salerno, Italy, May 25, 1085. Pope 1073-85. He was of obscure origin, assumed the Benedictine habit at Rome, and became chaplain of Gregory VI., whom he accompanied in his exile. He entered the monastery of Cluny in 1048, and in 1049 was invited to Rome by Pope Leo IX. He was created cardinal archdeacon about 1050, from which time he almost uninterruptedly conducted the temporal policy of the curia until his own elevation. He procured the election of Nicholas II. and of Alexander II., whom he succeeded in 1073. The grand object of his policy was to establish the supremacy of the papacy within the church, and of the church over the state. He issued a decree against lay investitures (i. e., the investiture of the clergy with the secular estates and rights of their spiritual benefices by the temporal power) in 1075, and in 1076 cited Henry IV. of Germany to Rome to answer to the charge of simony, sacrilege, and oppression. Henry, enraged at this assumption of authority, declared the deposition of Gregory, who retorted by excommunicating Henry. Henry was suspended from the royal office by the disaffected German princes in alliance with the Pope at the Diet of Tribur in Oct., 1076, but did penance before the Pope at Canossa Jan. 25-27, 1077, and received a conditional absolution. The excommunication was, however, renewed in 1078, and war ensued. Henry defeated (1080) Rudolf of Swabia, put forward as king by the papal party in Germany, appointed Clement III. antipope (1080), captured Rome (1084), and besieged Gregory in the castle of St. Angelo. Gregory was rescued by Robert Guiscard (1084), but died in exile.

Gregory VIII. (Maurice Bourdin). Died 1125. Antipope. On the death of Paschal II. in 1118, the party at Rome adverse to the emperor Henry V. elected Gelasius II., while the emperor elevated Gregory VIII. Gelasius died in 1119, and his party elected Calixtus II. The emperor subsequently made his peace with Calixtus and abandoned Gregory, who was imprisoned by Calixtus in 1121 and kept in confinement until his death.

Gregory VIII. Died Dec. 17, 1187. Pope Oct.-Dec., 1187.

Gregory IX. (Ugolino, Count of Segni). Born about 1147; died at Rome, Aug. 21, 1241. Pope 1227-41. His reign was occupied by the struggle between the Ghibellines and the emperor Frederick II. on the one hand, and the Guelphs and the Pope on the other.

Gregory X. (Teobaldo di Visconti). Born at Piacenza, Italy; died at Arezzo, Italy, Jan. 10, 1276. Pope 1271-76.

Gregory XI. (Pierre Roger de Beaufort). Born in Limousin, France; died at Rome, March, 1378. Pope 1370-78. He terminated the "Babylonish Captivity" at Avignon by removing to Rome in 1377.

Gregory XII. (Angelo di Corrado or Corario). Born at Venice about 1325; died as cardinal bishop of Porto, Oct. 18, 1417. Pope 1406-1415. He was elected by the Roman cardinals in 1406 in opposition to Benedict XIII., who reigned at Avignon, and together with whom he was deposed by the Council of Pisa in 1409. He refused to yield until 1415, when he resigned at the Council of Constance.

Gregory XIII. (Ugo Buoncompagni). Born at Bologna, Italy, Feb. 7, 1502; died April 10, 1585. Pope 1572-85. He introduced the Gregorian calendar in 1582.

Gregory XIV. (Nicolo Sfondrati). Pope 1590-1591.

Gregory XV. (Alessandro Ludovisi). Born at Bologna, Italy, 1554; died July, 1623. Pope 1621-23. He founded the Congregation of the Propaganda in 1622.

Gregory XVI. (Bartolommeo Alberto Cappellari). Born at Belluno, Italy, Sept. 18, 1765; died at Rome, June 1, 1846. Pope 1831-46. Popular insurrections took place in the Papal States at the beginning of his reign, which were suppressed only by means of Austrian intervention.

Gregory of Nazianzus, or Gregory Nazianzen, Saint, surnamed Theologus ('theologian'). Born at Nazianzus, Cappadocia, about 325; died about 390. One of the fathers of the Eastern Church. He was the leader of the orthodox party at Constantinople in 379, and was made bishop of Constantinople in 380.

Gregory of Nyssa, Saint. Born probably at Caesarea, Cappadocia, about 335 (331?); died about 395 (400?). A father of the Eastern Church. He was a younger brother of Basil the Great, by whom he was made bishop of Nyssa, Cappadocia, in 372. He opposed Arianism, and was banished in 375 by Valens, on whose death in 378 he was restored to his see. His works have been edited by Migne and others.

Gregory of Tours, Saint (Georgius Florentinus). Born at Clermont, Auvergne, France, about 540; died at Tours, France, Nov. 17, 594. A Frankish historian. He became bishop of Tours in 573. His chief work is a "Historia Francorum" in 10 books, the chief authority for the history of the Merovingians to 591.

Gregory Thaumaturgus (thá-ma-tér'gus), Saint (Theodorus). Born at Neocaesarea, Pontus, about 210; died about 270. One of the fathers of the Eastern Church. He was for many years bishop of his native city, and received the surname Thaumaturgus ('wonder-worker') on account of the numerous miracles he was reputed to have performed. His extant works consist of one epistle, a panegyric oration on Origen, and a paraphrase of the book of Ecclesiastes.

Gregory. 1. In Shakspeare's "Romeo and Juliet," a servant to Capulet.—2. In Fielding's "Moek Doctor," the name given to the character called Sganarelle in Molière's "Le médecin malgré lui," from which it is taken. He is a fagot-maker who pretends to be a doctor.

Gregory, David. Born at Kinnairdie, Banffshire, Scotland, June 24, 1661; died at Maidenhead, Berkshire, England, Oct. 10, 1708. A Scottish astronomer. He became professor of mathematics at Edinburgh in 1683, and was "the first professor who publicly lectured on the Newtonian philosophy" (Dict. Nat. Biog.). In 1691 he was appointed Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, and became a fellow of the Royal Society in 1692. He wrote "Astronomie physice et geometricae elementa" (1702), edited the works of Euclid (1703), and left several treatises in manuscript. Various papers by him were published in the "Transactions" of the Royal Society.

Gregory, Duncan Farquharson. Born at Edinburgh, April 13, 1813; died there, Feb. 23, 1844. A Scottish mathematician. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1838; became a fellow of Trinity in 1840 and assistant tutor in 1842; and was the first editor of the "Cambridge Mathematical Journal."

Gregory, James. Born at Drumoak, near Aberdeen, 1638; died at Edinburgh, Oct., 1675. A Scottish mathematician, elected professor of mathematics at Edinburgh in 1674. He wrote "Vera circuli et hyperbolae quadratura" (1667), "Exercitationes geometricae" (1668), etc.

Gregory, John. Born at Aberdeen, June 3, 1724; died at Edinburgh, Feb. 9, 1773. A Scottish physician, grandson of James Gregory (1638-75). He was elected professor of medicine at Edinburgh in 1766.

He entered Parliament in 1741; became a lord of the admiralty in 1744; was a lord of the treasury June, 1747, Nov., 1755; was treasurer of the navy Nov., 1756-62 (with a seat in the cabinet in 1761); became secretary of state for the northern department in May, 1762; and became first lord of the admiralty in Oct. of that year. From Oct., 1761, to Oct., 1762, he was leader of the House of Commons. He became premier in April, 1763, and retained office until July, 1765. He presented Wilkes, and opposed the repeal of the Stamp Act. He obtained the nickname of "the Gentle Shepherd" in an encounter with Pitt. "He interposed in defense of Dashwood's proposition of an additional duty on cider, and reminded the house that the profusion with which the late war had been carried on necessitated the imposition of new taxes. He wished gentlemen would show him where to lay them. [On his repeating this question in his querulous, languid, fatiguing tone, Pitt, who sat opposite to him, mimicking his accent aloud, repeated these words of an old ditty, "Gentle shepherd, tell me where!" and then, rising, abused Grenville bitterly." Dict. Nat. Biog.]

Grenville, or Greynville, Sir Richard. Born about 1541; died Sept., 1591. A British naval hero. He was a cousin of Sir Walter Raleigh. In 1585 he commanded a fleet of 7 vessels which took part in the colonization of Virginia. In 1591 he was vice-admiral in the fleet of 16 ships under Lord Thomas Howard which sailed to the Azores to intercept the Spanish treasure-ships. While the English were at anchor off Flores, a Spanish fleet of 53 sail appeared, and Howard put to sea to avoid it. Grenville, however, refused to follow, and when, later, he rashly attempted to pass through the Spanish fleet, was becalmed and was attacked by about 15 of the largest vessels. He maintained a hand-to-hand fight for 15 hours, and only surrendered when all but 20 of his 150 men were slain. He died a few days after the battle.

Grenville, Richard Plantagenet Temple Nugent Brydges Chandos, second Duke of Buckingham and Chandos. Born at London, Feb. 11, 1797; died there, July 29, 1861. An English historian. He was known as Earl Temple 1812-22, and as Marquis of Chandos 1822-33, when he succeeded his father as duke. He was member of Parliament for Buckinghamshire 1818-30, and was lord privy seal 1841-42. He introduced into the Reform Bill in 1832 the clause known as the Chandos clause, which extended the franchise in counties to £50. He wrote "Memoirs of the Court and Cabinets of George III." (1853-55), "Memoirs of the Court of England during the Regency" (1856), "Memoirs of the Court of George IV." (1859), "Memoirs of the Courts and Cabinets of William IV. and Victoria" (1861), etc.

Grenville, Richard Temple (later Grenville-Temple), Earl Temple. Born Sept. 26, 1711; died Sept. 12, 1779. An English politician, brother-in-law of Pitt. He was first lord of the admiralty under the Duke of Devonshire 1756-57, and lord privy seal under Pitt and Newcastle 1757-61. He was a patron of Wilkes, and was thought by some to be the author of the "Letters" of Junius.

Grenville, Thomas. Born Dec. 31, 1755; died at London, Dec. 17, 1846. An English politician (Whig) and diplomatist, best known as a book-collector. He bequeathed over 20,000 volumes to the British Museum.

Grenville, William Wyndham, Baron Grenville. Born Oct. 25, 1759; died at Dropmore, Bucks, England, Jan. 12, 1834. An English statesman, son of George Grenville. He entered Parliament in 1782; was appointed paymaster-general of the army in 1783; was chosen speaker of the House of Commons about 1789; was created Baron Grenville in 1790; and was secretary for foreign affairs in Pitt's ministry 1791-1801. In 1806 he combined with Fox to form the ministry of "All the Talents," of which he was premier. The death of Fox in the same year weakened the ministry, and Grenville was compelled to resign in 1807.

Grenville Channel. A narrow channel between the mainland of British Columbia and Pitt Island. Length, 50 miles.

Gresham (gresh'am), Sir Thomas. Died at London, Nov. 21, 1579. An English financier. He was employed to negotiate loans for the government both at home and abroad, and was knighted by Queen Elizabeth I. in 1559. He founded the Royal Exchange in 1565, and Gresham College in 1575, which was opened in 1596. He observed and commented on the tendency of the inferior of two forms of currency in circulation to circulate more freely than the superior, which has been named from him Gresham's Law.

Gresham, Walter Quinton. Born at Lanesville, Ind., March 17, 1832; died at Washington, D. C., May 28, 1895. An American politician, jurist, and general. He was admitted to the bar in 1853, and joined the Union army at the beginning of the Civil War, serving as a division commander in Blair's corps before Atlanta, and being brevetted major-general of volunteers March 13, 1865. He was United States judge for the district of Indiana 1869-82; was postmaster-general 1882-81; was secretary of the treasury in 1884; and became secretary of state in Cleveland's cabinet in 1893.

He was a fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and vice-president of the college 1840-69. He published "Fasti temporis catholici, etc." (Part I, 1852), "General Tables of the Fasti catholici, or Fasti temporis perpetui, from B. C. 4004 to A. D. 2000" (1852), "Origines calendarie hellenicæ" (1854), etc.

Greta Hall (grē-tā hāl). The residence of Southey. It is in the vale of Keswick, Cumberland.

Gretchen (greh-ēn; G. pron. grāt-ēhen). [G., a dim. of Margaret.] The principal female character of Goethe's "Faust." She is a simple girl of the lower ranks of life, charming in her innocence and confiding love for Faust.

He has never created anything sublimer than this ideal picture of innocence, simplicity, warmth and depth of affection; her maidenly reserve at the outset, the spirit of noble purity which breathes around her, her little world of domestic duties, the truly feminine instinct with which she tends her little sister, the natural grace with which she reveals her feelings, the naive love of ornament natural to the girl of the people; and then the first shadows which fall on this transparent soul, the misgivings roused by Faust's bold address, the prementiment of danger and involuntary shudder at Mephisto's presence, her pious anxiety about the spiritual welfare of her lover, her devotion and utter self-surrender to him, her inability to refuse him anything, and then all the fell consequences of her weakness, madness, prison, and death—a fearful transition this from the idyllic to the tragical.

Scherer, History of German Literature, II. 327.

Grethel (greh-ēl; G. pron. grā-tel), Gammer. The fictitious narrator of "Grimm's Tales."

Gretna Green (gret-nā grēn). A farmstead near the village of Springfield, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, 8 miles northwest of Carlisle. The name was afterward applied to the village, which became notorious for the celebration of irregular marriages contracted by runaway parties from England. These marriages were rendered invalid (unless one of the parties has resided for some weeks in Scotland) by an act passed in 1856.

Grétry (grā-trē'), André Ernest Modeste. Born at Liège, Belgium, Feb. 8, 1741; died at Montmorency, near Paris, Sept. 24, 1813. A French composer. His works include the operas "Le Huron" (1768), "Lucile" (1769), "Le tableau parlant" (1769), "Zémire et Azor" (1771), "L'Amant jaloux" (1778), "L'Épreuve villageoise," "Richard Cœur de Lion" (1784), "Guillaume Tell" (1791), "Lisbeth" (1797), etc. He also wrote several books, "Mémoires ou essais sur la musique" (1789), "De la vérité," etc. (1803), etc.

Greuze (grēz), Jean Baptiste. Born at Tournus, France, Aug. 21, 1725; died at Paris, March 21, 1805. A genre and portrait painter, pupil at Lyons of Gremdon, and in Paris (1755) of the Académie. In 1755 he went to Italy with the Abbé Gougenot. In 1767 he retired to Anjou, whence he returned to exhibit pictures in his studio. He amassed a large fortune, which was lost in the Revolution. Neglected by the public, which admired only the new school of David, he passed his last years in misery and neglect.

Grève (grāv), Place de la. The place of execution of ancient Paris. Until the creation of the Place du Carrousel, it was the largest open square in the city; was also used as a market; and was the point most intimately associated with the business of the city. For this reason it was chosen for the location of the Hôtel de Ville, which now stands there. The space in front of it, formerly the Place de la Grève, is now called Place de l'Hôtel de Ville. Besides being the place for the execution of criminals, innocent victims have been shot here in nearly every revolution that has occurred in Paris. Its name (the strand) was given it on account of its position on the bank of the Seine. The Quai de la Grève was one of the three earliest ports, as they were called, of Paris: it doubtless dates from Roman times.

Greville (grev-īl). A conceited and obstinate lover of Miss Harriet Byron in Richardson's "Sir Charles Grandison."

Greville, Charles Cavendish Fulke. Born April 2, 1794; died at London, Jan. 18, 1865. An English diarist, grandson of the fifth Lord Brooke, and, on his mother's side, grandson of the third Duke of Portland. He was secretary of Jamaica and clerk of the privy council. For 40 years he recorded in his diary his impressions and intimate knowledge of contemporary English politics and politicians. These "Memoirs" were published after his death by Henry Reeve: first series, 1817-37 (3 vols. 1875), second and third series, 1837-60 (3 vols. 1885, 2 vols. 1887).

Greville, Fulke, first Lord Brooke. Born at Beauchamp Court, Warwickshire, 1554; died Sept. 30, 1628. An English poet and statesman. He studied at Jesus College, Cambridge; became a favorite of Queen Elizabeth; and was an intimate friend and the biographer of his kinsman Sir Philip Sidney. He became secretary for Wales in 1583; treasurer "of the wars" in March, and of the navy Sept., 1598; chancellor of the exchequer in 1614; and commissioner of the treasury in 1618. He was stabbed, Sept. 1, by a servant, Ralph Haywood, one of the witnesses to his will, to whom he failed to leave a legacy. His epitaph, composed by himself, was: "Fulke Greville, servant to Queen Elizabeth, councillor to King James, and friend to Sir Philip Sidney." His works were reprinted by Grosart (1870).

Gréville (grā-vēl'), Henry. The pseudonym of Alice Maria Céleste Durand.

Greville (grev-īl), Robert, second Lord Brooke. Born 1608; died March 2, 1643. An English Parliamentary general in the civil war, only son of Fulke Greville. He defeated the Earl of Northampton at Kington, near Banbury, Aug. 3, 1642; was appointed in Jan., 1643, commander-in-chief of the counties of Warwick, Stafford, Leicester, and Derby; captured Stratford-on-Avon in Feb.; and was killed at Lichfield. He wrote "The Nature of Truth, etc." (1640), and other works.

Greville, Robert Kaye. Born at Bishop Auckland, Durham, Dec. 13, 1794; died near Edinburgh, June 4, 1866. A British botanist. He published "Scottish Cryptogamic Flora," "Flora Edinensis" (begun 1823), "Icones illicum" (with Hooker; begun 1820), "Alge Britannicæ" (1830), the botany of India and of British North America in the "Edinburgh Cabinet Library," etc. He was an opponent of slavery and a supporter of the cause of temperance.

Grévy (grā-vē'). Albert. Born at Mont-sous-Vaudrey, department of Jura, Aug. 23, 1824. A French statesman, brother of François Paul Jules Grévy. He was elected to the National Assembly in 1871, and to the Chamber of Deputies in 1876. He was civil and military governor of Algeria 1879-81.

He was a deputy to the Constituent Assembly 1848-49, to the Legislative Assembly 1849-51, and to the Corps Législatif 1868-70; and was president of the National Assembly 1871-73, and of the Chamber of Deputies 1876 and 1877-79. He succeeded Mac-Mahon as president of the French republic in 1879; was reelected in Dec., 1885; and was compelled to resign in 1887, owing to the traffic which his son-in-law Wilson carried on in offices and decorations.

Grew (grō), Nehemiah. Born 1641; died March 25, 1712. An English botanist, noted for his studies in vegetable anatomy and physiology. He graduated at Cambridge (Pembroke Hall) in 1661, and took the degree of doctor of medicine at Leyden in 1671. In 1677 he became secretary of the Royal Society, and edited the "Philosophical Transactions" (Jan., 1678, -Feb., 1679). His chief work, "The Anatomy of Plants," was published in 1682.

Grey (grā), Charles, first Earl Grey. Born at Howick, 1729; died there, Nov. 14, 1807. An English general. He became colonel and king's aide-de-camp in 1772; joined Howe in America in 1776 with the rank of major-general; defeated Anthony Wayne near Paoli, Sept. 20, 1777; commanded a brigade at Germantown Oct. 4, 1777; captured New Bedford and Martha's Vineyard in 1778; returned to England in 1782; and was appointed commander-in-chief in America—an appointment which the eloe of the war rendered inoperative. In 1793 he was appointed with Jervis (later Earl St. Vincent) commander of an expedition to the French West Indies. They reduced Martinique in March, and St. Lucia and Guadeloupe in April, 1794.

Grey, Charles, second Earl Grey, and Viscount Howick. Born at Fallodon, near Alnwick, Northumberland, March 13, 1764; died July 17, 1845. An English Whig statesman. He became first lord of the admiralty under Grenville in 1806, foreign secretary on the death of Fox, and was dismissed from office in March, 1807. He remained out of office for many years. In Nov., 1830, he undertook the formation of a ministry, which, after an appeal to the country (1831) and a temporary resignation of office (May 9-18, 1832), passed the Reform Bill of 1832 (June, 1832). In Aug., 1833, he carried a bill abolishing slavery throughout the British empire, and in 1834 passed the Poor Law Amendment Act. He resigned in July, 1834.

Grey, Elliot. The principal character in Lester Wallack's play "Rosedale," created by him.

Grey, Sir George. Born 1799; died Sept. 9, 1882. An English statesman, grandson of Charles, first Earl Grey. He was under-secretary for the colonies 1834-39, judge-advocate-general 1839-41, home secretary under Lord John Russell 1846-52, colonial secretary 1854-1855, and home secretary under Palmerston and Russell 1855-58 and 1862-66.

Grey, Sir George Edward. Born at Lisburn, Ireland, April 14, 1812. A British colonial governor and author. He was governor of South Australia 1841-46, of New Zealand 1846-54, of Cape Colony 1854-1861, and of New Zealand 1861-67. He has published "Polynesian Mythology" (1855), etc.

Grey, Henry, Duke of Suffolk and third Marquis of Dorset. Executed 1554. An English nobleman, father of Lady Jane Grey by his second (?) wife, who was the elder daughter of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, and Mary Tudor, younger sister of Henry VIII. See Grey, Lady Jane.

Grey, Lady Jane. Born at Broadgate, Leicestershire, England, about 1537; beheaded at London, Feb. 12, 1554. The daughter of Henry

Grey (marquis of Dorset and duke of Suffolk) and great-granddaughter of Henry VII. of England. She was the pupil of Bishop Aymer and of Roger Ascham. At the age of 15 she was able to write in Greek, Latin, Italian, French, and German, and was studying Hebrew. She was married to Lord Guildford Dudley in May, 1553, as a part of the plot for changing the succession of the crown from the Tudors to the Dudleys after the death of Edward VI.; was proclaimed queen in July, 1553; was arrested in Nov., and afterward condemned for treason; and was executed on Tower Hill with her husband, Feb. 12, 1554. She has been made the subject of tragedies by Rowe (1715), Laplace (1745), Madame de Staël (1800), Brifant (1812), Soumet (1844), Tennyson (1876), etc.

Grey, Thomas, first Marquis of Dorset. Born 1451; died Sept. 20, 1501. An English nobleman, son of Sir John Grey, Lord Ferrers of Groby, and Elizabeth Woodville (afterward queen of Edward IV.). He was created earl of Huntingdon in 1471, and marquis of Dorset in 1475. In 1471 he took part in the murder of Prince Edward, son of Henry VI. On the accession of Richard III. he fled, and joined the party of Henry of Richmond (afterward Henry VII.). He was on the Continent until after the battle of Bosworth.

Grey, Sir William. Born 1818; died at Torquay, May 15, 1878. An English statesman. He was lieutenant-governor of Bengal in 1867-71, and governor of Jamaica 1874-77.

Greycoat School or Hospital. A school at Westminster, London, situated on the east end of Rochester Row, facing Greycoat Place. It is so named from the color of the clothing worn by the inmates. It was founded in 1698 by Queen Anne for the education of 70 poor boys and 40 poor girls. Thornbury.

Grey Friars (grā frī-ārz), or FraTri Minores (frā-tī mī-nō-rēz), or Minorites (mī-nōr-īts). In the Roman Catholic Church, one of the mendicant orders, founded by St. Francis of Assisi. Also called Franiscans. The other orders are Dominicans (Friars Major, Friars Preachers, or Black Friars), Carmelites (White Friars), and Augustinians (Austin Friars). The order of Grey Friars was established by Pope Honorius III. in 1223. In London the Grey Friars were located in Ludgate street, where Christ's Hospital (Bluecoat School) afterward stood. The monastery was founded by John Ewin, a mercer, in 1225. The choir of Grey Friars Church was built by Joyner, lord mayor in 1239, and the nave was added by Henry Walings. The church was rebuilt in 1306 by Margaret, queen of Edward I. In 1421 Sir Richard Whittington gave the monks a large library. It was a favorite place of burial for members of the royal family for many years. Grey Friars was surrendered in 1538, and (except a few traces of the monastic residence, which may still be seen in Christ's Hospital) was swept away in the great fire of 1666.

was a judge of the State Supreme Court of Ohio 1836-42. He wrote "Nature and Tendency of Free Institutions" (1848).

Grimké, Sarah Moore. Born at Charleston, S. C., Nov., 1792; died Dec. 23, 1873. An American abolitionist, sister of T. S. Grimké. She wrote "Letters on the Condition of Woman and the Equality of the Sexes" (1839), etc.

Grimké, Thomas Smith. Born at Charleston, S. C., Sept. 26, 1786; died near Columbus, Ohio, Oct. 12 (11?), 1854. An American lawyer and lecturer. He graduated at Yale in 1807, and was a member of the State senate of South Carolina 1826-30. He was a prominent member of the American Peace Society, and was one of the pioneers in the cause of temperance reform. He wrote "Addresses on Science, Education, and Literature" (1831).

Grimm (grim), Friedrich Melchior, Baron. Born at Ratisbon (Regensburg), Bavaria, Dec. 25, 1723; died at Gotha, Germany, Dec. 19, 1807. A noted German-French critic, man of letters, and diplomat, long resident in Paris, and a member of the most brilliant literary society of the period. He was made a baron of the empire and minister of the Duke of Gotha at the French court in 1776, and minister of Catherine II. of Russia at Hamburg in 1795. His works include "Lettres sur Omphale" (1752), "Le petit prophète de Boehmischbroda" (1753), "Correspondance littéraire, philosophique et critique adressée à un souverain d'Allemagne" (first part 1813, second part 1812, third part 1813, with a supplement 1814), "Correspondance inédite de Grimm et Diderot," etc. (1829).

Grimm, Herman. Born at Cassel, Jan. 6, 1828. A German critic and author, son of Wilhelm Grimm. He studied at Berlin and Bonn, and has been since 1873 professor of the history of art in the University of Berlin. His most important works are "Das Leben Michelangelos" ("Essays" (1859 and 1865, new series 1871 and 1875), "Das Leben Rafaels" (1872), "Vorlesungen über Goethe" (1877). He is the author, besides, of the novel "Unüberwindliche Mächte" ("Unconquerable Powers"), and of "Novellen" ("Stories").

Grimm, Jakob. Born at Hanau, Jan. 4, 1785; died at Berlin, Sept. 20, 1863. A German philologist and writer. He studied jurisprudence at Marburg. In 1805 he went to Paris to assist Savigny, whose pupil he had been. The following year he was at the military school in Cassel. In 1808 he became librarian to the King of Westphalia. After 1814 he lived and labored with his brother Wilhelm in the closest association. They were together librarians at Cassel; 1830 to 1837 professors at Göttingen; subsequently again at Cassel; and 1841 on the invitation of the king settled in Berlin. In 1812 and 1815 they published jointly the well-known book of fairy tales "Kinder- und Hausmärchen" ("Children's and Domestic Tales"), in 1816 "Deutsche Sagen" ("German Legends"), and after 1852 worked together on the great "Deutsches Wörterbuch" ("German Dictionary"). Jakob's independent work consists of an essay, "Poesie im Recht" (1816), expanded 1823 into "Deutsche Rechtsalterthümer." Beginning with 1829, his "Deutsche Grammatik" ("German Grammar") appeared. This last is the fundamental work in comparative Germanic philology, of which specific branch he may be called the founder. Its principal terminology originated with him, and one of its most characteristic phases, that of the relative correspondence of consonants, was first formulated by him, and bears the name of Grimm's Law. In 1835 appeared another great work, the "Deutsche Mythologie." His minor works, "Kleinere Schriften," appeared at Berlin, 1864-82, in 6 vols.

Grimm, Ludwig Emil. Born at Hanau, Prussia, May 14, 1790; died at Cassel, Prussia, April 4, 1863. A German painter and etcher, brother of Jakob and Wilhelm Grimm.

Grimm, Wilhelm. Born at Hanau, Feb. 24, 1786; died at Berlin, Dec. 16, 1859. A German philologist and writer. He was the brother of Jakob Grimm, with whom he lived and was frequently associated in joint authorship. Like his brother, he studied jurisprudence at Marburg. Owing to ill health he had, however, no permanent position up to 1814, when he went with Jakob as librarian to Cassel. Their subsequent career is one. (See Jakob Grimm.) Wilhelm married, and Jacob did not. He did the chief work in the collection of fairy tales which owe their particular style to him. An independent work was "Die Deutsche Heldensage" ("The German Heroic Legend," 1829).

Grimma (grim'mä). A town in the district of Leipsic, Saxony, on the Mulde 17 miles south-east of Leipsic. It contains a noted school and an electoral castle. Population (1890), 8,957.

Grimmelshausen (grim'mels-hou-zen), Christoph von. Born at Gehlhausen, Prussia, 1625; died at Reichen, in Baden, Aug. 17, 1676. A German writer. His parents belonged to the peasant class. Until the peace of Westphalia, in 1648, he was a soldier, but subsequently is supposed to have traveled in Holland, France, and Switzerland. He was afterward in the service of the Bishop of Strasburg, and ultimately magistrate at Reichen, where he died. His principal work, and the most important of its class in German literature, is the romance "Der abenteuerliche Simplicissimus Teutsch, das ist: Beschreibung des Lebens eines seltsamen Vaganten genant Melchior Sternfels von Fuchshaim" ("The Adventuresome Simplicissimus: That is, Description of the Life of a Strange Vagabond named Melchior Sternfels von Fuchshaim," 1639).

Grimmsby, or Great Grimmsby. See Great Grimmsby.

Grim's Dyke, or Grimesditch. See the extract.

The Belge were of the same Celtic family as the Kymry and the Gauls. But coming later from the continent they brought with them its latest civilization, and, as settlers, perhaps for centuries, in the lowlands between the Somme and the Scheldt, they had acquired the instinct of throwing up dykes and earthworks. The actual occupants of Hampshire, Sussex, and Kent were subdued or driven out, and the great fortified fosse, Grim's Dyke, which encloses Salisbury and Silchester was at once the rampart and the march of the new nationality.

Pearson, Hist. Eng., I, 6.

Grimmel (grim'zel), The. A pass over the Bernese Alps, Switzerland, leading from Meiringen, Bern, to Obergestelen, Valais. It was the scene of the repulse of the Austrians by the French in 1799. Height, 7,150 feet.

Gringore (grän-gör'), or Gringoire (grän-gwär') (originally Gringor), Pierre. Born in Normandy, 1475-80; died 1544. A French satirist and dramatic writer. Among his works are "Saint Loys" (a mystery), "Les folles entreprises" (a series of monologues), "La chasse du cerf des cerfs," "Le coqueluche," etc.

It is to him that we owe the only complete and really noteworthy tetralogy, composed of cry, sottie, morality, and farce, which exists to show the final result of the mediæval play—the "Jeu du Prince des Sots." Gringore first emerges as a pamphleteer in verse, on the side of the policy of Louis XII. He held the important position of maître sotte in the company of persons who charged themselves with playing the sottie, and Louis perceived the advantages which he might gain by enlisting such a writer on his side.

He wrote "Die Vegetation der Erde" (1872), etc.

Griselda (gri-zel'dä), or Griseldis, or Grissel. A character of romance, noted for the patience with which she submitted to the most cruel ordeals as a wife and mother. The subject has been variously treated by Boccaccio, Chaucer, Dekker, and other writers. The song of "Patient Grissel" appeared about 1565, and a prose history shortly after. "From whatever source derived, 'Griselda' appears to have been the most popular of all the stories of the 'Decameron.' In the fourteenth century the prose translations of it in French were very numerous; Legrand mentions that he had seen upwards of twenty, under different names, 'Miroir des dames,' 'Exemples de bonnes et mauvaises femmes,' etc. Petrarch, who had not seen the 'Decameron' till a short time before his death (which shows that Boccaccio was ashamed of the work), read it with much admiration, as appears from his letters, and translated it into Latin in 1373. Chaucer, who borrowed the story from Petrarch, assigns it to the Clerk of Oxenforde in his 'Canterbury Tales.' The clerk declares in his prologue that he learned it from Petrarch at Padua; and, if we may believe Warton, Chaucer, when in Italy, actually heard the story related by Petrarch, who, before translating it into Latin, had got it by heart in order to repeat to his friends. The tale became so popular in France that the comedians of Paris represented, in 1393, a Mystery in French verse, entitled 'Le Mystère de Grisseldis.' There is also an English drama called 'Patient Grissel' entered in Stationers' Hall, 1599. One of Goldoni's plays, in which the tyrannical husband is king of Thessaly, is also formed on the subject of Grisseldis." Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, II, 146.

Gros (grô), Antoine Jean, Baron. Born at Paris, March 16, 1771; drowned himself in the Seine, near Paris, June 25, 1835. A French historical painter. He studied first with his father, a miniature painter; in 1785 entered the atelier of David; and visited Italy in 1793. He was especially inspired by Rubens and Van Dyck. Gros came into relations with Bonaparte at the time of the Italian campaign, and painted his portrait in the "Ponte d'Arcole." He was appointed on the commission which selected the works taken to France from the conquered cities of Italy. On his return to Paris he painted "Les pestiférés de Jaffa" (1804), "Charge de cavalerie à la bataille d'Aboukir" (1806), and other similar works. He was made baron by Napoleon I., and became a member of the Institute in 1816. He exhibited in 1827 "Le portrait de Charles X.," and in 1835 "Hercule et Diomède." The criticism upon this work brought on an attack of melancholia, and he drowned himself. He exhibited at the Salons from 1797 to 1835.

Grosclaude (grô-klöd'), Louis. Born at Locle, Switzerland, Sept. 26, 1788; died at Paris, Dec. 11, 1869. A Swiss genre painter. He studied with Regnault. Many of his works were bought by the King of Prussia.

Grosseteste (grôs'test), Robert. Died 1253. An English divine and scholar, elected bishop of Lincoln in 1235. He studied at Oxford and Paris; later became chancellor at Oxford and (1224) first rector of the Franciscans there; and was appointed archdeacon of Wilts (1214, 1220), archdeacon of Northampton 1221, and later archdeacon of Leicester. He also held the prebend of Emplingham in Lincoln cathedral. He was energetic in reforming abuses in his diocese. In 1239 he fell into a protracted quarrel with the chapter of Lincoln over his right of visitation, which was finally settled by the Pope in his favor. His career throughout was marked by a vigorous defense of his rights and the right against all opponents, including king and Pope. A notable instance of this was his refusal (1253), on the ground of unfitness, to induct into a canonry at Lincoln the Pope's nephew Frederick di Lavanga. Grosseteste was a voluminous writer, and long exerted a great influence upon English thought and literature.

Robert Grosseteste, a man of spotless orthodoxy, and unquestionably the first English scholar of the age. Without any advantages of birth or person, Grosseteste had already begun to mount the ladder of fame. The son of a mere peasant, he was generally described by a nickname which in Latin was rendered Capula, or Grossum Caput, and in English Greathead, or Grothead. The date of his birth is unknown, and it is not certain whether he took his degree in arts at Oxford or at Paris. Before becoming a lecturer in the Franciscan convent, he had been successively appointed to the archdeaconries of Chester, Wilts, Northampton, and Leicester, and he seems to have held the last two of these preferments until the year 1231. Lyte, Oxford, p. 29.

Grotfend (grô'te-fent), Georg Friedrich. Born at Münden, near Cassel, Prussia, June 9, 1775; died at Hannover, Prussia, Dec. 15, 1853. A noted German philologist and archaeologist, professor (later corrector) of the gymnasium at Frankfurt-on-the-Main (1803-21), and director of the lyceum at Hannover (1821-49). He is especially noted for his labors on the decipherment of the cuneiform inscriptions. His works include "Nene Beiträge zur Erläuterung der persopolitanischen Keilschrift" (1837), "Rudimenta lingue Umbrice" (1835-38), "Rudimenta lingue Osce" (1838), etc. See the extract.

The clue to the decipherment of the [cuneiform] inscriptions was first discovered by the successful guess of a German scholar, Grotfend. Grotfend noticed that the inscriptions generally began with three or four words one of which varied, while the others remained unchanged. The variable word had three forms, though the same form always appeared on the same monument. Grotfend, therefore, conjectured that this word represented the name of a king, the words which followed it being the royal titles. One of the supposed names appeared much oftener than the others, and as it was too short for Artaxerxes and too long for Cyrus, it was evident that it must stand either for Darius or for Xerxes. A study of the classical authors showed Grotfend that certain of the monuments on which it was found had been constructed by Darius, and he accordingly gave to the characters composing it the value required for spelling "Darius" in its old Persian form. In this way he succeeded in obtaining conjectural values for six cuneiform letters. He now turned to the second royal name, which also appeared on several monuments, and was of much the same length as that of Darius. This could only be Xerxes; but if so, the fifth letter composing it (r) would necessarily be the same as the third letter in the name of Darius. This proved to be the case. Sayce, Anc. Monuments, p. 13.

Groth (grôt), Klaus. Born at Heide, in Holstein, April 24, 1819. A German dialect poet. He wrote in 1853 the first volume of "Quickborn" ("Living Spring"), poems of popular life, in the "Platt-Deutsch" (Low German) dialect. He had not had a university education, but was given the doctor's title "honoris causa" by the University of Bonn in 1856. In 1857 he became docent at Kiel, where he was subsequently made professor. Two volumes of "Vertelln" (narratives in prose) appeared in 1855 and 1859. A second volume of "Quickborn" followed in 1872; "Ut min Jungspardies, drei Vertelln" ("From my Youthful Paradise, Three Stories") in 1876. "Briefe über Hochdeutsch und Plattdeutsch" ("Letters on High German and Platt-Deutsch") appeared in 1858; "Über Mundarten und Mundartliche Dichtung" ("On Dialects and Dialect Poetry") in 1873.

He studied theology at the Copenhagen University, and was first a tutor, and subsequently (1808) again in Copenhagen, where he published the same year "Nordens Mythologi" ("Mythology of the North"), and the succeeding year "Optrin af Kjømpelivets Undergang i Nord" ("Scenes from the Close of the Heroic Age in the North"). In 1810 he was chaplain to his father at Udby, but returned to Copenhagen in 1813, after the latter's death. In the following years he wrote many historical and religious articles in periodicals, and numerous poems. He also translated Saxo and the Heimskringla into Danish, and in 1820 made a free version of Beowulf. In 1821 he was appointed parish priest at Præsto, but went the following year to Copenhagen as chaplain. In 1825, in consequence of a violent expression of opinion in "Kirkenes Gjenmaal" ("The Answer of the Church," namely, to a work by H. N. Clausen on Catholicism and Protestantism), he was prosecuted for damages and fined, and resigned his position. From 1829 to 1831 he was in England engaged in the study of Anglo-Saxon literature. In 1839 he became pastor of the little hospital church of Vartov, in Copenhagen, where he remained until his death. On the fiftieth anniversary of his priesthood the title of bishop was given him. He was a most prolific writer in almost all departments of literature, and published more than 100 volumes.

He was in his early years a tutor, but was enabled by his patron, the count palatine Georg von Schönborn, to go to Holland, when (1638) he matriculated at Leyden, where he subsequently studied and taught. He returned to Glogau in 1643, but again (1646) left to travel in Italy and France. In 1650 he became syndic of his native town, where he died. He wrote odes, sonnets, and hymns, but his fame is based principally upon his dramas. He was the author of 5 tragedies: "Leo Armenius" (1650; written in 1646), "Katharina von Georgien," "Candide und Celine," "Carolus Stuardus" (1657; written in 1649), and "Papinianus" (1659). More important still are his comedies "Peter Squentz" (1657) and "Horribilicribrifax" (1663), both written between 1647 and 1650. A third comedy, "Die geliebte Dornrose," written in the Silesian peasant dialect, was first acted in 1660 as the interlude to a comic operetta, "Das verliebte Gespenst" ("The Enamoured Ghost"). Two other operative plays are "Majuna" and "Piastus." In addition to these, he translated a Latin religious drama and several comedies from Italian and French. He has been styled "the German Shakspeare."

Gryphon (grif'on). 1. A legendary monster, with its lower part that of a lion and its upper that of a bird of prey.—2. See Aquilon.

Guacanagari (gwä-kän-ä-gä-ré'), or Guacanahari (gwä-kän-ä-ä-ré'). Died about 1496. An Indian chief of the district of Marien, on the northeast coast of Haiti. He was very friendly to Columbus, who left a small colony near his village (Jan., 1493); this was destroyed by hostile Indians, who also attacked Guacanagari. He remained faithful to the whites, but in 1495 his subjects rebelled on account of the tribute exacted by the conquerors. Guacanagari fled to the mountains, where he died miserably.

Guacharos (gwä'eh-ä-rös), Cave of the. [Sp. Cueva de Guacharos.] A cave near Caripe, state of Bermudez, Venezuela; so named because it is inhabited by the birds called guacharos (Steatornis caripensis). It was visited and described by Humboldt.

Guachires. See Guaiqueris.

Guachis (gwä-shé'z'). [So called by the Guaycurus; said to mean 'slippery feet.'] A tribe of Indians of southern Matto Grosso, Brazil, now nearly or quite extinct, owing to the practice of infanticide among them. They were formerly powerful. The Guachis appear to be the same as the Guaxarapos or Guasarapos mentioned by old writers (also Guararapos and Guarapayos). Their relations are doubtful. Also written Guachies, Guaxis.

Guadalajara (gwä-dä-lä-hä'rä). 1. A province in New Castile, Spain, bounded by Segovia, Soria, and Saragossa on the north, Teruel on the east, Cuenca on the south, and Madrid on the west. Area, 4,870 square miles. Population (1887), 201,496.—2. The capital of the province of Guadalajara, situated on the Henares 33 miles northeast of Madrid. Population (1887), 11,235.

Guadalajara. The capital of the state of Jalisco, Mexico, situated about lat. 21° N., long. 103° 10' W. It was founded in 1542, is the third city of Mexico in size, and contains a cathedral and a university. Population (1892), 95,000.

Guadalajara, Audience of. See Nueva Galicia.

Guadalaviar (gwä-THä-lä-vē-är'). A river of eastern Spain which flows into the Mediterranean near Valencia.

Guadalcazar, Marquis of. See Fernandez de Cordova, Diego.

Guadalquivir (gä-däl-kwiv'er; Sp. pron. gwä-THäl-ké-ver'). [From Ar. gwädi-el-kebir, the great river.] A river in southern Spain, flowing into the Atlantic 17 miles north-northwest of Cadiz; the ancient Bætis. Length, about 300 miles; navigable to Seville. Cordova is also on its banks.

Guadalupe (gwä-THä-lö'pä). A town in the province of Caeceres, Spain, situated at the base of the Sierra Guadalupe about 60 miles east of Caeceres. The Hieronymite convent of Santa Maria is a noble foundation, royally endowed. The buildings are very extensive. The church is massive, in Pointed architecture, with a sumptuous retable and many tombs. The sacristy is reputed one of the finest in Spain; it contains paintings by Zurbaran and by Luca Giordano. There are two fine cloisters—one in the Moresco style, the other Pointed. Population (1887), 2,964.

Guadalupe (gä-dä-löp'; Sp. pron. gwä-THä-lö'pä). A river in southern Texas which joins the San Antonio, about 10 miles from its mouth. Length, about 250 miles.

Guadalupe-Hidalgo (gwä-THä-lö'pä-è-däl'gö). A town in the federal district, Mexico, 3 miles north of Mexico. It is celebrated for its chapel on the spot where the Virgin is said to have appeared to a shepherd. By a treaty signed here Feb. 2, 1848, Mexico ceded a large territory, comprising the modern California, Nevada, Utah, most of Arizona, a large part of New Mexico, and parts of Colorado and Wyoming, to the United States.

Guadeloupe (gä-de-löp'; F. pron. gwäd-löp'). An island of the West Indies, belonging to France, intersected by lat. 16° 15' N., long. 61° 30' W. It consists of two parts separated by a narrow channel—Guadeloupe proper or Basse-Terre in the west, and Grande-Terre in the east. The former is mountainous, the latter generally low. The chief product is sugar. The capital is Basse-Terre; the largest place, Pointe-à-Pitre. The island, with Marie-Galante, La Désirade, Les Saintes, St.-Bartholomew, and part of St.-Martin, forms a government. It was discovered by Columbus, Nov. 4, 1493; was colonized by the French in 1635; was several times taken by Great Britain; and was finally secured to France in 1815. Area, 618 square miles. Population (1889) of Guadeloupe, 142,294; of Guadeloupe and its dependencies, 166,899.

Guadet (gä-dä'), Marguerite Elie. Born at St.-Emilion, near Bordeaux, France, July 20, 1758; guillotined at Bordeaux, June 15, 1794. A French Girondist leader, deputy to the Legislative Assembly in 1791, and to the Convention in 1792.

Guadiana (gwä-THä-ä'nä or gwä-dē-ä'nä). A river of Spain and Portugal, forming in part of its course a boundary between the two countries; the ancient Anas. It flows into the Atlantic in lat. 37° 9' N., long. 7° 18' W. In a portion of its upper course it flows for many miles underground. Length, over 400 miles.

Guadix (gwä-THĒP'). A town in the province of Granada, Spain, 30 miles east-northeast of Granada. It has a cathedral and a ruined castle. Population (1887), 11,989.

Guaduas (gwä'ghwäs). A town in the department of Cundinamarca, Colombia, situated about lat. 5° S., long. 74° 50' W. Population, about 8,000.

Guagues. See Quaquas.

Guahan (gwä-hän'), or Guam (gwäm), or San Juan (sän nü-än'), Sp. Guajan (gwä-ñän'). The southernmost and largest of the Ladronez, Pacific Ocean, intersected by lat. 13° 26' N., long. 144° 40' E. Principal place, Agaña. Population (1887), 8,561.

Guaharibos (gwä-ä-rē'bös). A tribe of Indians of the Carib stock, in southern Venezuela, living about the head waters of the Orinoco and Caura. Formerly numerous and formidable, they are now reduced to a few hundred, who stand in great fear of the whites and have little intercourse with them.

Guahibos (gwä-è'bös). An Indian tribe of the upper Orinoco valley. They were formerly powerful, but are now reduced to a few thousand, near the Orinoco, between the Meta and the Vichada. They are nomadic, rarely passing two nights in the same place; live by hunting and fishing and on wild fruits; and are savages of a low grade. About 1770 a few were gathered into mission villages, but they soon returned to the plains, and have remained inveterate enemies of the whites. Their color is lighter than that of most Indians. Their linguistic relations are doubtful. Also written Guaybas, Guajinos, Guahivos.

Guaicas, or Guaycas. See Quaquas.

Guaicuris, or Guaikeris. See Guaiqueris.

Guaimis (gwä'mēs). An Indian tribe of south-eastern Costa Rica, near the Bay of Chiriqui, on both sides of the central Cordillera. Their language appears to have some relation to that of the ancient Chibchas of New Granada.

Guaikeris (gwī-kā-rēs'). A tribe of Indians which formerly occupied the island of Margarita and the adjacent parts of Venezuela. They are supposed to have been of Carib stock. Their descendants live in the same region, but speak only Spanish. Also written Guaerites, Guaicuris, and Guaichires.

Guaira, La. See La Guayra.

Guajira (gwā-nō-rā), or Goahira (gwā-ē-rā). A peninsula, partly in Venezuela and partly in Colombia, projecting into the Caribbean Sea northwest of Lake Maracaibo.

Guajivos. See Guachibos.

Gual (gwāl), Pedro. Born at Caracas, Jan. 31, 1784; died at Guayaquil, Ecuador, May 6, 1862. A Venezuelan statesman. He was a lawyer; joined the patriots in 1810; occupied many important civil and diplomatic posts; was one of the leaders of the insurrection against Monagas in 1858; and was vice-president and president ad interim in 1860.

Gualdo Tadino (gwāl-dō tā-dō-nō). A town in the province of Perugia, Italy, 21 miles east-northeast of Perugia. Near this place, at the ancient Tagine (Tadinum), Narses defeated Totila in 552. It has a cathedral. Population (1881), commune, 8,477.

Gualuguay (gwā-lā-gwī'). A town in the province of Entre Rios, Argentine Republic, situated on the river Gualuguay 120 miles north by west of Buenos Ayres. Population (1889), 11,000.

Gualeguaychú (gwā-lā-gwī-chō'). A town in the province of Entre Rios, Argentine Republic, situated on the river Gualeguaychú 115 miles north of Buenos Ayres. It was founded in 1883. Population (1889), about 14,000.

Guam. See Guahan.

Guamanga (gwā-mān-gā), or Huamanga (wā-mān-gā). A city of Peru, now called Ayacucho.

Guamas (gwā-mās'). An Indian tribe of the Orinoco valley, on the Apuré. They were formerly numerous, had large villages, were agricultural, and were skilled in the manufacture of pottery and other objects. They were perhaps of Tupi stock. The tribe is nearly extinct.

Guamos. Same as Guamas.

Guanabacoa (gwā-nā-bā-kō-ā). A town in Cuba, 5 miles east of Havana. It is the residence of many Havana merchants, and a sea-bathing resort. Population (1887), 11,144; with the suburbs, 23,043.

Guanahani (gwā-nā-ā-nē'). The first island discovered by Columbus in his voyage of 1492, and consequently the first American land seen by modern Europeans. It was described as low and flat, covered with trees, surrounded by reefs, and having a lake in the center. It was certainly one of the Bahamas, near the middle of the group, but its exact identity cannot now be determined with certainty. The weight of opinion inclines to Watling's Island; but various writers have supposed it to be Cat Island, Samana, Acklin, Mari-guana, or Grand Turk.

Guanajuato (gwā-nā-ā-ō-tō). 1. A state of Mexico, bounded by San Luis Potosí on the north, Querétaro on the east, Michoacan on the south, and Jalisco on the west. It is noted for the richness of its silver-mines. Area, 12,546 square miles. Population (1892), 1,057,228. Also written Guanajuato.

2. The capital of the state of Guanajuato, situated about lat. 21° 1' N., long. 100° 55' W. It is the center of an important silver-mining region. Population (1890), 52,112.

Guanare (gwā-nā-rā). A town, capital of the state of Zamora, Venezuela, 218 miles southwest of Caracas. It was founded in 1593. Population, about 5,000.

Guanas (gwā-nās'). A tribe of South American Indians at present established in the southern part of the state of Matto Grosso, Brazil, near Miranda. They are divided into several subtribes, known as Layanas, Terenas, and Quimiquinas. Physically and intellectually they are one of the finest tribes in South America, living in well-ordered villages, excelling in primitive arts, and subsisting mainly by agriculture. They are now reduced to a few thousand, who live in friendly relations with the Brazilians. Under the name Chamus or Chanes they were known in the 18th century, on the western side of the Paraguay, where the Jesuit authors mention them as early as 1645. Their language is closely allied to that of the Moxos of the river Mamoré, of which tribe they are probably an offshoot. They belong to the great Arawak stock.

Guancavelica. See Huancavelica.

Guanches (gwānch-ēz). The Berber tribe which inhabited the Canary Islands, West Africa. The colonization of these islands by the Guanches may have taken place before the Arabian invasion. The Guanches belonged to the red-haired variety of Berbers, and embalmed their dead, whom they preserved in caves like the Egyptians. They also used alphabetic and hieroglyphic characters in writing their language. Spanish has completely superseded the Guanch language, but it is said that the rural population still shows many Berber features and customs.

Guanes (gwā-nās'). An ancient Indian tribe of Colombia, which occupied the mountainous region in what is now the southern part of the department of Santander. They had attained some degree of civilization, and resisted the Spanish conquerors with great valor. Their descendants may be traced in the mixed races of the same region, and it is said that some wild horses to the east were derived from them.

Guano Islands (gwā-nō ī-lāndz). Islands off the coast of Peru, noted for their deposits of guano. They comprise the Lobos Islands, Chincha Islands, etc.

Guap. See Yap.

Guapey (gwā-pāy'), or Guapay (gwā-pī'). A river in Bolivia which rises near Cochabamba, and unites with the Mamoré.

Guaporé (gwā-pō-rā'), called in its upper course Itenez (ē-tā-nāz'). A river in western Brazil and on the Brazilian and Bolivian border. It unites with the Mamoré in lat. 11° 54' 13' S. Length, over 900 miles.

Guaranys (gwā-rā-nēs'). [Warriors.] A powerful race of South American Indians who, at the time of the conquest, occupied most of the region now included in Paraguay, together with portions of Uruguay and of the Brazilian coast to Santa Catharina. They were divided into numerous tribes and villages with different names, not bound together by any permanent league, but having essentially the same language and customs. The Guaranys cultivated manioc and other plants, had well-ordered towns, and practised rude arts: it does not appear that any of them were cannibals. Generally they received the whites as friends, and, though Spanish tyranny provoked some revolts, they were easily subdued. Among them the Jesuits established their most important missions. From this race, mingled with the Spaniards, was derived the modern population of Paraguay, where a corrupt form of Guarany is still the common language. In that country only the so-called Caás of the upper Paraná remain in a wild state. The name is loosely used for semi-civilized Indians of Tupi stock in Argentina, Uruguay, and southern Brazil. The Guarany language has a considerable literature, including a newspaper. Also written Guaranis or Guaranies.

Guarany stock. See Tupi stock.

Guaratinguetá (gwā-rā-tēn-gwā-tā'). A town in the state of São Paulo, Brazil, situated on the Parahiba 120 miles west by north of Rio de Janeiro. Population, about 5,000.

Guaraunos (gwā-rā-ō-nōs or wā-rā-ō-nōs), called by the English of Guiana Warraus, or Guaraus (wā-rā-ōs'). A tribe of South American Indians about the mouth of the Orinoco. Formerly they seem to have been confined to the swampy lands of the delta, where they built their houses on piles or in trees; latterly they have occupied portions of the higher lands. They have plantations, but subsist mainly on fish and fruits. Their language is very distinct from that of surrounding tribes. The Guaraunos are friendly to the whites. A few thousand remain.

Guarayos (gwā-rā-yōs'). [Quichua: huara, breeches, yoc, without; naked.] A tribe of Bolivian Indians occupying the partly wooded plains northeast of Santa Cruz de la Sierra. They are an offshoot of the Guaranys of Paraguay, speaking nearly the same language, but have occupied their present position during historical times. They are described as a fine race, light in color, and having beards. They are friendly to the whites, hospitable, and of good morals. A few thousand remain.

Guarayos. A name sometimes, but improperly, applied to the Itenes and other savage Indians of northern Bolivia.

Guardafui (gwār-dā-fwē'), or Gardafui (gār-dā-fwē'), Cape. A cape in the northeastern extremity of the Somali country, Africa, lat. 11° 50' 30' N., long. 51° 16' 10' E.; next to Ras Hafun, the easternmost point of Africa.

Guardi (gwār-dē), Francesco. Born 1712; died 1793. A Venetian painter.

Guardia (gwār-dē-ā), Tomás. Born at Bagaces, Guanaacaste, Dec. 17, 1832; died July 7, 1882. A Costa-Rican general. He headed the revolt of 1870 which deposed Jimenez and made Carranza president; but Guardia, though nominally remaining military commander, was really the chief of state. From Aug. 8, 1870, to May 8, 1876, he was president.

Guardian (gār'di-an), The. 1. A play by Massinger, licensed in 1633, played in 1634, and published in 1655.—2. A comedy by Abraham Cowley, acted at Cambridge in 1641 for Prince Charles. It was printed in 1650, and rewritten as "The Cutter of Coleman Street" in 1658.—3. A periodical published at London in 1713, and edited by Steele. It comprised 176 numbers (51 of them by Addison). It followed the "Spectator," and was inferior to it.

Guardian Angel, The. A novel by Oliver Wendell Holmes, published in 1868.

Guardiola (gwār-dē-ō-lā) Santos. Born about 1810; assassinated Jan. 11, 1862. A general and politician of Honduras. He was a rough and cruel soldier who, after serving under Malespin and against Walker, was president of Honduras from Feb. 17, 1856. His administration was, on the whole, good, though his previous acts had won for him the title of "the Tiger of Central America."

Guarico (gwār-ē-kō). Originally, in 1492, the Indian town in Haiti governed by Guanaenagari.

The name was transferred to the modern city near the same place, now known in English as Cape Haitien.

Guarini (gwā-rē-nē), Giovanni Battista. Born at Ferrara, Italy, Dec. 10, 1537; died at Venice, Oct. 4, 1612. A noted Italian poet and diplomatist, professor of belles-lettres at Ferrara. He was in the service of the Duke of Ferrara, and later in that of Tescany and that of Urbino. His chief work is the pastoral drama "Il pastor fido" (1785).

Guarionex (gwā-rē-ō-nāg). Died after 1510. An Indian chief of the region or "province" of Maorix, in the central part of Haiti. He received Columbus hospitably in 1494, and remained friendly to the whites until 1498, when he headed a revolt. Defeated, he fled to the country of Mayabancx, but was eventually captured and held as a hostage.

Guarneri (gwār-nā-rē'), Latinized Guarnerius (gwār-nō-ri-us), Andrea. Born at Cremona, Italy, about 1630; died after 1695 (?). A noted Italian violin-maker.

Guarneri, Antonio Giuseppe. Born at Cremona, June 8, 1683; died 1745. A celebrated Italian violin-maker, nephew of Andrea Guarneri.

Guastalla (gwās-tāl-lā). A small town in the province of Reggio nell' Emilia, Italy, situated at the junction of the Crostolo with the Po, 19 miles northeast of Parma. The duchy of Guastalla (previous to 1621 a county) passed to Don Philip of Spain, along with Parma, in 1748, to Pauline Borghese in 1805, to Maria Louisa in 1815, and to Modena in 1818.

Guatemala (gā-tē-mā-lā; Sp. pron. gwā-tā-mā-lā), incorrectly Guatimala (gwā-tē-mā-lā). A republic of Central America. Capital, Guatemala. It is bounded by Mexico on the north and northwest, British Honduras, the Gulf of Honduras, and Honduras on the east, Salvador on the southeast, and the Pacific Ocean on the southwest. The surface is generally mountainous. The chief product is coffee. It is divided into 22 departments. The executive is vested in a president, and legislation in a national assembly. Most of the people are Roman Catholics, but other cults are tolerated. Guatemala was conquered by Pedro de Alvarado, the lieutenant of Cortés, in 1524-26. After a short connection with Iturbide's Mexican empire, it formed part of the Central American confederation from 1823 to 1839, when it was established as an independent republic. It has had several wars with Salvador and Honduras. Area, about 49,000 square miles. Population (1893), 1,510,326.

Guatemala, or Santiago de Guatemala (sān-tē-ā-gō dā gwā-tā-mā-lā), sometimes called New Guatemala (Sp. Guatemala la Nueva). The capital of the republic of Guatemala, situated about lat. 14° 36' N., long. 90° 27' W. The chief building is the cathedral. The city was founded in 1775, soon after the destruction of Old Guatemala. Population (1893), 71,527.

Guatemala, Audience of. See Confines, Audience of the.

Guatemala, Old, or Antigua (ān-tē-gwā). A town of Guatemala, 24 miles west-southwest of New Guatemala. The original city of Guatemala, founded 1524, was destroyed by a flood from the Volcan de Agua 1541; refounded on a new site 1542, it was almost completely destroyed by the great earthquake of July 29, 1773; the capital was then removed to its present site, but the town of Antigua grew up about the ruins of the second city. Population, about 10,000.

Guatemala, Presidency of. The region in Central America which, during the colonial period, was subject to the jurisdiction of the Audience of the Confines or of Guatemala. See Confines. As originally limited, in 1545, it embraced all the present states of Central America, the Isthmus of Panama, Yucatan, and Chiapas, the capital, after 1549, being at Guatemala. In 1548 Yucatan was placed under the Audience of Mexico, and in 1550 the isthmus was united to Peru. From 1561 to 1576 the Central American colonies were made subject to New Spain (Mexico). In 1570 the Audience of the Confines was again established at Guatemala, and thereafter the presidency included the present Central American countries (except portions of the east coast which subsequently fell into the hands of the British), together with Chiapas, now a state of Mexico. After 1680 Guatemala was ruled by captains-general, who were also generally presidents of the audience, but had independent powers similar to those of the viceroys of New Spain and Peru. The provinces, corresponding to the present republics, were ruled by governors who, to a certain extent, were subject to the captain-general.

Guatemotzin (gwā-tā-mōt-zēn'), or Guatemoc (gwā-tā-mōk). ["Swooping eagle."] Born about 1497; died in Tabasco early in 1525. The last Aztec sovereign of Mexico. He was nephew of Montezuma II., and was elected to the throne on the death of Cuitlahuatzin (sept. 15:20); defended Mexico against Cortés in the famous siege, May-Aug. 1521; was captured Aug. 13; and was subsequently tortured in the hope that he would give up concealed treasure. In 1524 he was forced to go with Cortés on the march to Honduras; on the way he was accused of treachery and hanged. Also written Guatemotzin, Quattemotzin, Quattemoc, etc.

Guatescos. See Huastecos.

Guatos (gwā-tōs'). A South American Indian tribe in the swampy regions of the upper Paraguay River. Formerly they were very numerous and warlike; they are now reduced to a few hundred about the mouth of the São Lourenço tributary. The Guatos resemble Europeans in color, and have short beards. They live almost entirely in canoes, fishing and hunting, making rude huts in the swamps, and retiring to higher lands only during the floods. They have long been friends of the Brazilians, and aided them in the war with Paraguay 1865-70. Their linguistic relations are doubtful.

Guatusos (gwá-tó'sós). A tribe of Indians in northern Costa Rica, on the streams which flow into Lake Nicaragua. They practise agriculture, are enemies of the whites, and have always retained their independence. By their language they appear to constitute a distinct stock. Only a few hundred are left. Many of the older writers have erroneously supposed that the Guatusos were descended from Mexicans brought to this region by the Spaniards, or from the bucaniers. Also written Muatsoos.

Guaviare (gwá-vé-á-rá). A river in Colombia and Venezuela, joining the Orinoco about lat. 4° N., long. 68° 10' W. Length, about 725 miles.

Guaxaca. See Oajaca.

Guaxarapos, or Guasarapos. See Guachis.

Guayana. See Guiana.

Guayanas. Same as Guanas.

Guayaquil (gwá-á-kél'), or Santiago de Guayaquil (sán-té-í-gó dá gwá-á-kél'). The chief seaport and most populous city of Ecuador, situated on the river Guayaquil in lat. 2° 12' S., long. 79° 52' W.: an important commercial place. Population (1890), 44,772.

Guayaquil, Gulf of. An inlet of the Pacific Ocean, west of Ecuador.

Guayas (gwá'ás). A maritime province of Ecuador. Capital, Guayaquil. Area, 8,220 square miles. Population, 98,042.

Guaybas. Same as Guahibos.

Guaycurus (gwá-kó-rós'). A tribe of South American Indians, on the river Paraguay, in Brazil, near the Paraguayan frontier: now commonly known to Brazilians as Cadiucios, properly the name of one of their clans. The Paraguayans call them Mbayas. They are powerfully built, brave, and warlike. Formerly they were very numerous and nomadic, living by hunting and fishing and by robbing other tribes. They acquired horses from Spanish stock, and became skillful horsemen. They were long a terror to the whites and to surrounding tribes. The few hundred remaining live in villages under Brazilian rule. It is doubtful if this was the tribe of the same name known in the Chaco region in the 17th and 18th centuries. Also written Guacurus, Guaycurus, Guaycurus, etc.

Guaycuru stock (gwá-kó-ró'stok), sometimes called the Chaco stock. A well-defined group of South American Indian tribes, nearly all of which inhabit the region west of the river Paraguay, between 19° and 29° S. lat., known as the Gran Chaco. It includes the Guaycurus, Mocoibis, Tobas, the extinct Abipones, and many others, all of more or less nomadic habits, warlike, and living largely by rapine. The Jesuit missionaries could make little impression on them, and a few only, on account of weakness, have submitted to white influence. They resemble North American Indians in their coppery color. The different tribes speak closely allied languages.

Guaymas (gwá'más). [Prob. an Opata name.] A tribe, now extinct (as such), formerly living on the coast of the Gulf of California in Sonora. From them the town of Guaymas derives its name. The Guaymas were almost exterminated, in the second half of the 18th century, by the Seris. Their language is said to be a dialect of the Pima.

Guaymas. A seaport in the state of Sonora, Mexico, situated on the Gulf of California in lat. 27° 56' N., long. 110° 36' W. Population, about 6,200.

Guaynos (gwá'nós). An ancient Indian tribe of northeastern South America, south of the Orinoco, from whom the great region called Guiana is said to have derived its name. The Guianas of the upper Orinoco, or the Guianas of British Guiana (both of Arawak stock), may be their descendants.

Guayra (gwá-rá' or gwá-rá). The name given by the Spanish conquerors of Paraguay to the region bordering the upper Paraná. The name was loosely applied, sometimes including both sides of the river above the great fall, at other times denoting the region to the east and southeast of the river, including the present disputed territory of Misiones, and portions of Paraná, Santa Catharina, and Rio Grande do Sul in Brazil and of Corrientes in Argentina. Until the 19th century it was legally or practically included in the government of Paraguay, and the Jesuits had important missions there.

Guayra, La. See La Guayra.

Guayrá Cataract. See Sctæ Quedas.

Gubbio (gób'hé-ó). A cathedral city in the province of Perugia, Italy, at the foot of Monte Calvo 20 miles north-northeast of Perugia: the ancient Iguvium or Eugubium. It has manufactures of majolica. The Etruscan Tables (which see) are here, and other Umbrian antiquities; and there are various remains of antiquity in the neighborhood. The Palazzo dei Consoli is a building of the early 14th century, one of the most massive examples of Italian medieval civic construction. With its tower and its battlements, it recalls the Florentine Palazzo Vecchio. This Umbrian town was destroyed by the Goths. It was independent in the middle ages. Population, about 5,000.

Guben (gób'ben). A town in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated at the confluence of the Lubis with the Neisse, about Guelphs, or Guelphs (gwélf's). [From Guelpho, lt. form of G. Welf, a personal name.] The papal and popular party of Italy in the middle ages: opposed to the Ghibellines, the imperial and aristocratic party. The Welfs (Guelphs) were a powerful family of Germany, so called from Welf I. in the time of Charlemagne. His descendants, several of whom bore the same name, held great possessions in Italy; through intermarriage were at different times dukes of Bavaria, Saxony, and Carinthia; and founded the princely house of Brunswick and Hanover, to which the present royal family of England belongs. The names Welf and Waiblingen (Guelph and Ghibelline) are alleged to have been first used as war-cries at the battle of Weinsberg in 1140, fought and lost by Welf VI. against the Hohenstaufen emperor Conrad III. The contest soon ceased in Germany, but was taken up on other grounds in Italy, over which the emperors claimed supreme power; and the names continued to designate bitterly antagonistic parties there till the end of the 15th century. See Ghibellines.

Guido d'Arezzo (gwē'dō dä-ret'sō), often called Guido Aretino (ä-re-tē'nō), or Fra Guittone, or Guy of Arezzo. Born at Arezzo, Italy, probably about 990; died near Arezzo about 1050. An Italian Benedictine monk. He is celebrated for his reforms in musical notation. He went to Rome at the invitation of Pope Benedict VIII, probably in 1022, and again in the time of Pope John XX., to explain his method of teaching music. He seems to have written most of his works at the monastery of Pomposa in the duchy of Ferrara, where he remained for some time teaching his method to the monks and choir-boys. He was afterward made abbot of the monastery of Santa Croce at Avellano, near Arezzo, where he is believed to have died. Guido has been credited with a number of inventions and discoveries, some of which obviously cannot have been his. He wrote the "Micrologus," the "Antiphonarium," "De arteificio novi cantus," "De divisione monochordi secundum Boetium," and other works on musical subjects.

It appears certain that Guido invented the principle upon which the construction of the Staff is based, and the F and C Clefs; but that he did not invent the complete 4-lined Staff itself. There is strong reason to believe that he invented the Hexachord, Solmisation, and the Harmonic Hand; or, at least, first set forth the principles upon which these inventions were based. Finally, it is certain that he was not the first to extend the Scale downwards to F ut; that he neither invented Diaphonia, Discant, Organum, nor Counterpoint; and that to credit him with the invention of the Monochord and the Polyplectrum is absurd. Grove, Dict. Music. IV. 661.

Guido Reni. See Reni.

Guido y Spano (gwē'dō ē spä'nō), Carlos. Born at Salta, March 8, 1832. An Argentine politician and poet. Guillotín (gē-yō-tān'), Joseph Ignace. Born at Saintes, France, May 28, 1738; died at Paris, March 26, 1814. A French physician, wrongly regarded as the inventor of the guillotine. As deputy to the Constituent Assembly, 1789, he proposed that all capital punishment should be by decapitation, a privilege till then reserved for the nobility, and suggested that decapitation could be most quickly and humanely performed by a machine. The device actually adopted as a result of this suggestion was prepared by a German mechanic named Schmidt under the direction of Dr. Antoine Louis, perpetual secretary of the Academy of Surgery, and was first used April 25, 1792, for the execution of a highwayman named Pelletier. The machine was first named louis or louisette, but after a while Guillotin's name was attached to it. Guillotin was not, as has been asserted, executed in his own machine, but died a natural death.

Guimaraes, or Guimaraens (gē-mā-rīns'). A town in the province of Minho, Portugal, situated on the Ave 30 miles northeast of Oporto. The castle is a battlemented ruin with a huge central keep, inaccessible save by a wooden bridge, and square angle-towers connected by curtains. Population, about 8,000.

Guinart (gē-nārt'), Roque. A noble in Cervantes's "Don Quixote." He was a real character, his name being Pedro Rocha Guinarda.

Guinaus. See Guaynos.

Guinea (gin'i). [Formerly Ginnie, Ginny, etc.; F. Guinée, Sp. Guiné, etc.]: named from the African Ginnie, or Jinnie, a town and kingdom in the Niger district.] That part of western Africa which lies along the coast from Cape Roxo (or about lat. 12° N.) to Cape Negro (or about lat. 16° S.), and extends indefinitely inland. It includes, besides native states, British, French, German, and Portuguese colonies, Liberia, and part of the Kongo Free State. It is divided into Upper or North Guinea, and Lower or South Guinea (separated by the Kamerun Mountains or the equator). The name is sometimes used in a more restricted sense. See Liberia, Gold Coast, etc.

Guise, Cardinals and Dukes of. See Lorraine.

Guise, Duchy of. A former duchy of northeastern France, which took its name from the town of Guise, and corresponded to the northern part of the department of Aisne. It was situated in the government of Picardy. Formerly it was a county. It was famous in the 16th and 17th centuries as a duchy in the hands of the Guise family, a branch of the house of Lorraine.

Guise (giz), Martin. Died Jan. 21, 1829. An English naval officer who in 1818 entered the service of Chile, under Cochrane, as captain. He did efficient service in the war for independence, and on the retirement of Cochrane (1821) was appointed to organize the navy of Peru. By blockading the port of Callao he forced the surrender of the last Spanish post, Callao Castle, Jan. 19, 1826. Admiral Guise was killed in the attack on Guayaquil.

Guiteau (gē-tō'), Charles. Born about 1840: hanged at Washington, June 30, 1882. An American assassin. He was a pettifogging lawyer of French-Canadian descent at Chicago, and on Garfield's election to the presidency went to Washington to seek the office of American consul at Marseilles, which he did not obtain. Excited by this failure, and by the political conflict between Garfield and Roscoe Conkling, he shot the President fatally at Washington, July 2, 1881.

Guizot (güz-zō' or gü-zō'), Madame (Élisabeth Charlotte Pauline de Meulan). Born at Paris, Nov. 2, 1773; died at Paris, Aug. 1, 1827. A French writer, first wife of F. P. G. Guizot, whom she married in 1812. She wrote "Éducation domestique, ou lettres de famille sur l'éducation" (1826), etc.

Guizot, François Pierre Guillaume. Born at Nîmes, Oct. 4, 1757; died at Val-Richer, in Normandy, Oct. 12, 1874. A distinguished French historian and statesman. At the age of 12 he left his native city for Geneva, and in 1805 he took up the study of law in Paris. In 1812 he became assistant professor of literature at the Sorbonne, and later was called to the new chair of modern history. His early publications are "Du gouvernement représentatif et de l'état actuel de la France" (1816), "Des conspirations et de la justice politique" (1821), "Des moyens de gouvernement et d'opposition dans l'état actuel de la France" (1821), "De la peine de mort en matière politique" (1822), etc. These pamphlets brought about his resignation from his professorship. Devoting himself exclusively to historical research, he published his "Histoire du gouvernement représentatif," "Essais sur l'histoire de France," "Collection des mémoires relatifs à la révolution d'Angleterre," "Collection des mémoires relatifs à l'histoire de France," "Histoire de la révolution d'Angleterre depuis l'avènement de Charles I. jusqu'à la restauration de Charles II., etc." His courses of lectures at the Sorbonne, delivered 1828-30, appeared under the titles "Cours d'histoire moderne," "Histoire générale de la civilisation en Europe," and "Histoire générale de la civilisation en France." In 1830 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies. After the revolution of July, 1830, he became minister of the interior, and, with the exception of a few months in the year 1840 spent as French ambassador to England, remained almost continuously minister in various capacities until he fell from power, Feb. 23, 1848, on the eve of Louis Philippe's abdication. He had been prime minister for the 8 years preceding his downfall, but had made himself so unpopular that he failed to be elected to the National Assembly of 1848. The latter part of his life was spent in retirement. Besides the works already mentioned, Guizot translated Shakspere, and published "Washington" (1840), "De la démocratie en France" (1849), "Discours sur l'histoire de la révolution d'Angleterre" (1850), "Méditations et études morales" (1851), "L'Amour dans le mariage" (1855), "Guillaume le Conquérant," "Edouard III. et les bourgeois de Calais," "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de mon temps" (1858-68), "L'Église et la société chrétienne en 1861" (1861), "Discours académiques" (1861), "Trois générations" (1861), "Histoire parlementaire de France" (1863), "Méditations sur l'essence de la religion" (1864), "Méditations sur l'état actuel de la religion chrétienne" (1865), "Mélanges biographiques et littéraires" (1868), "La France et la Prusse responsables devant l'Europe" (1868), "Méditations sur la religion chrétienne dans ses rapports avec l'état actuel des sociétés et des esprits" (1868), "Mélanges politiques et historiques" (1869), "Le duc de Broglie" (1872), "Les vies de quatre grands chrétiens français, Saint-Louis, Calvin" (1873, incomplete), and "Histoire de France racontée à mes petits-enfants" (1870-75).

Gujarat. See Guzrat.

Gujranwala (guzh-ran-wā'lä). 1. A district in the Panjab, British India, intersected by lat. 32° 15' N., long. 74° E. Area, 2,587 square miles. Population (1881), 616,892.—2. The capital of the district of Gujranwala, situated in lat. 32° 10' N., long. 74° 14' E. Population, about 20,000.

Gujrat (guzh-rāt'), sometimes written Guzerat. 1. A district in the Panjab, British India, intersected by lat. 32° 40' N., long. 74° E. Area, 1,973 square miles. Population (1881), 689,115.—2. The capital of the district of Gujrat, situated in lat. 32° 35' N., long. 74° 7' E. Here, Feb. 22, 1849, the British under Gough defeated the Sikhs.

Gula (gō'lä). In Assyro-Babylonian mythology, the name of the wife of Adar, the god of war and the chase. She is styled "the great lady" who presides over life and death. Those who break contracts are threatened with her vengeance. Nebuchadnezzar dedicated to her two temples at Babylon and three at Borsippa.

Gulf Stream, The. An oceanic current, originating from the Atlantic Equatorial Current, which is made up of two arms, one of them issuing through the Florida Strait from the Gulf of Mexico, the other running westward along the northern face of the island of Cuba. The united stream follows the Atlantic coast northeastward with a velocity of from 2 to 5 miles an hour, gradually expanding in breadth and diminishing in depth, but distinctly perceived for many degrees beyond the eastern edge of Newfoundland. Its comparatively high temperature (10 to 20 degrees above that of the surrounding ocean), rapid motion, and deep-blue color make the Gulf Stream a most remarkable phenomenon, and even more interesting than the Kuroshio, the corresponding current on the Asiatic coast of the Pacific Ocean. The Gulf Stream, doubtless, exerts a certain influence in modifying the climate of the British Isles, France, and other parts of western Europe, but to what extent is not yet definitely known. On the other hand, it is certain that its effect is not so great as was formerly supposed, and that some of its assumed workings are rather to be credited to the regular oceanic drifts. See articles on Kuroshio and Sargasso Sea.

Gülhané. See Abdul-Medjid.

Gulistan (gō-lis-tān'). [Pers., 'the rose-garden.'] The most celebrated and finished work of the Persian poet Sadi. It is a kind of moral work in verse and prose, consisting of 8 chapters on kings, derivishes, contentment, taciturnity, love and youth, decrepitude and old age, education, and the duties of society, the whole intermixed with stories, maxims, philosophical sentences, and puns.

Gull (gul), Sir William Withey. Born at Thorpe-le-Soken, Essex, Dec. 31, 1816; died Jan. 29, 1890. A noted English physician, appointed physician extraordinary to the queen in 1872 (ordinary in 1887). He received a baronetcy for the skill with which he treated the Prince of Wales in 1871.

Gullians (gul'iqnz). A name sometimes given to the followers of William III. of England.

Gulliver, Lemuel. The ostensible recounter of "Gulliver's Travels."

Gulliver's (gul'i-vérz) Travels. A social and political prose satire, in the form of a book of travels, written by Jonathan Swift, and published in 1726. It consists of 4 voyages—to Lilliput, to Brobdingnag, to Laputa, and to the country of the Houyhnhnms. Lemuel Gulliver is an honest, blunt English sailor.

"Gulliver's Travels" owes most of its external shape to the "Vera Historia" of Lucian, itself a travesty of lost works on geography. The French poet Cyrano de Bergerac (1620-1655) had written a "Voyage à la lune" and a "Histoire comique des états et empires du soleil," from which Fontenelle had borrowed some hints. Several slight points which Swift used he is said to have taken from a tract by Francis Goodwin, Bishop of Llandaff. There can be no doubt, moreover, that the particular narrative manner of Defoe, whose "Robinson Crusoe" had appeared in 1719, produced an effect upon Swift. All these critical speculations, however, are rather curious than essential. Swift, always among the most original of writers, is nowhere more thoroughly himself than in his enchanting romance of Lemuel Gulliver. Whether we read it, as children do, for the story, or as historians, for the political allusions, or as men of the world, for the satire and philosophy, we have to acknowledge that it is one of the wonderful and unique books of the world's literature.

Gosse, Hist. Eng. Lit., p. 160.

Gull's Hornbook, The. A book by Thomas Dekker, published in 1609. It gives a graphic description of the manners of Jacobean gallants. The tract is to some extent modeled on Dedekind's "Grobianus." It is Dekker's best-known work.

Gümüş-Khana. ['Silver house,'] A town in Asiatic Turkey, about 40 miles south of Trebizond.

Gundamak. See Gandamak.

Günderode (gün'de-rö-de), Karoline von. Born at Karlsruhe, Baden, Feb. 11, 1780; committed suicide at Winkel, near Mainz, July 26, 1806. A German romantic poet, author of "Gedichte und Phantasien" (1804), "Poetische Fragmente" (1805), etc.

Gundlach (gönd'läeh), Johann Christoph. Born at Marburg, Hesse-Cassel, July, 1810. A German naturalist who, since 1839, has resided in Cuba. He is well known for his numerous contributions to Cuban ornithology and entomology.

Gundobad (gun'dö-bad), or, erroneously, Gundebald (gun'de-bald). Died 516. King of the Burgundians 473-516. He became a patrician of Rome in 473, and in the following year succeeded his father Gundioch as king of the Burgundians, dividing the sovereignty with his brothers Godegisel, Chilperic, and Godomar I. To 500 he was defeated by Chlodwig (Clovis), king of the Franks, through the treachery of Godegisel, and was expelled from his kingdom. He subsequently recovered his throne, deposed Godegisel, and, as his two other brothers had in the mean time died, reunited the Burgundian dominions under his sway. He formed an alliance with Chlodwig, and, although an Arian, educated his sons Sigmund and Godomar II. in the Roman Catholic religion, which was the faith of his subjects. He drew up a code of laws, which was named, after him, "Lex Gundobada."

Gunduk. See Gandak.

Gundulf (gun'dulf), L. Gundolphus (gun-dol'fus). Born in the diocese of Ronen about 1024; died March 8, 1108. A Norman prelate. In 1059 he became a monk in the abbey of Bec, where he became a friend of Anselm and of Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, by whose assistance he was elevated to the see of Rochester, March 19, 1077. He was the architect of the cathedral of Rochester (some of his work still exists), of a castle at Rochester, of St. Leonard's Tower and a nunnery at Malling, and of the White Tower in London Tower.

Gunib (gu-nib'). A plateau in Daghestan, Caucasia; scene of the last resistance to Russia and the capture of Shamyl in 1859.

Gunnerus (gön-nä-rös), Johann Ernst. Born at Christiania, 1718; died 1773. A Norwegian botanist, bishop of Trondhjem. He described the flora of Norway.

Gunning (gun'ing), Elizabeth, Duchess of Hamilton and afterward of Argyll. Born in 1734; died May 20, 1790. A celebrated beauty. She married James, sixth duke of Hamilton, in 1752, and in 1759 she married John Campbell, marquis of Lorne, afterward fifth duke of Argyll. Compare Gunning, Maria.

Gunning, Maria, Countess of Coventry. Born in 1733; died Oct. 1, 1760. A celebrated beauty, daughter of John Gunning of Castle Coote, County Roseommon, Ireland. She and her sister Elizabeth went to London in 1751, and were at once pronounced to be "the handsomest women alive." They were followed by crowds wherever they went, and Maria, who was the better-looking, was mobbed one evening in Hyde Park. The king gave her a guard to protect her, and she once walked in the park for two hours with 2 sergeants of the guard before her and 12 soldiers following her. In 1752 she married George William, sixth earl of Coventry. "The beautiful Misses Gunning" were painted a number of times, and there are many engravings from these portraits.

Gunning, Mrs. (Susannah Minifie). Born in 1740 (?); died at London, Aug. 28, 1800. An English novelist. She married John Gunning, the brother of the beautiful Gunning sisters. He was colonel of the 65th regiment of foot and lieutenant-general. He had one daughter, Elizabeth, and owing to her flirtations (in which her mother took her part) she and her mother left his house. Many squibs and satires were written on the ensuing complication, which Walpole called "the Gunningiad." Both Susannah Gunning and her daughter wrote a number of novels. The latter married Major James Plunkett, and died in Suffolk, July 20, 1823.

Gunnison (gun'is-son). A river in western Colorado, tributary of Grand River, which it joins near lat. 39° N.

Gunnison Cañon. A remarkable cañon in the Gunnison River, 15 miles in length.

Gunpowder Plot. In English history, a Roman Catholic conspiracy having for its object the destruction of James I. and the lords and commoners in the Parliament House, London. The leaders were Catesby, Percy, Digby, Winter, Guy Fawkes, and others. It was foiled by the arrest of Fawkes, Nov. 4, 1605. See Fawkes.

Gunter (gun'ter), Edmund. Born in Hertfordshire, England, 1581; died at Gresham College, London, Dec. 10, 1626. An English mathematician, professor of astronomy in Gresham College from 1619. He invented the chain, line, quadrant, and scale that are named from him "Gunter's chain," etc.

Henry Briggs was his colleague for a year; and their association doubtless led to Gunter's "Canon Triangulorum; or, Table of Artificial Sines and Tangents, to a radius of 100,000,000 parts to each minute of the Quadrant," 1620. This was the first table of its kind published, and did for sines and tangents what Briggs did for natural numbers. In these tables Gunter applied to navigation and other branches of mathematics his admirable rule "The Gunter," on which were inscribed the logarithmic lines for numbers, sines, and tangents of arches; and he showed how to take a back observation by the cross-staff, whereby the error arising from the eccentricity of the eye is avoided. . . . He was the first who used the words cosine, cotangent, etc., . . . and also introduced the use of arithmetical complements into the logarithmical arithmetic (Briggs, Arith. Log., cap. 15). De Morgan (Arith. Books, xxv.) favors Gunter's claim to the invention of the decimal separator.

Dict. Nat. Biog.

Günther (gün'ter). In the Nibelungen epic, a Burgundian king, brother of Kriemhild and husband of Bruneilde.

Günther, Albert Karl Ludwig Gotthilf. Born at Esslingen, Württemberg, Oct. 3, 1830. A German-English zoölogist, particularly noted for works on herpetology and ichthyology. He became assistant in, and in 1875 director of, the zoological department of the British Museum. He has published "Catalogue of the Colubrine Snakes" (1858), "Catalogue of the Batrachia Salientia" (1858), "Reptiles of British India" (1864), "Catalogue of Fishes" (1859-70), "The Gigantic Land-tortoises" (1877), "Introduction to the Study of Fishes" (1880), "Report on the Shore-fishes, etc., of the Voyage of the Challenger" (1887-88), etc.

Günther, Anton. Born at Lindenau, near Leitmeritz, Bohemia, Nov. 17, 1783; died at Vienna, Feb. 24, 1863. A German philosopher and Roman Catholic theologian. Among his works are "Vorschule zur spekultativen Theologie" (1828), "Die Juste-Milieu in der deutschen Philosophie gegenwärtiger Zeit" (1838).

Günther, Johann Christian. Born at Striegau, Silesia, Prussia, April 8, 1695; died at Jena, Germany, March 15, 1723. A German poet. His collected poems were published 1724-35.

Guntram (gun'tram), or Gontran (gon'tran). Died March 28, 593. King of the Franks. He received the sovereignty of Orleans and Burgundy on the death of his father Cloataire I. in 561, while the rest of the Frankish dominion was divided among his brothers Charibert, Sigebert, and Chilperic, who received Aquitaine, Austrasia, and Neustria respectively. In 567, on the death of Charibert, he became sovereign also of Aquitaine. He sided alternately with Sigebert and Chilperic in the great feud which was kindled by their queens, and which was continued by their descendants.

Guntur, or Guntoor (gun-tör'). A town in the governorship of Madras, British India, situated in lat. 16° 17' N., long. 80° 27' E.

Günzburg (günts'börg). A town in Swabia and Neuburg, Bavaria, at the junction of the Günz and Danube, 15 miles east by north of Ulm. Population (1890), 4,114.

Gurley (gér'li), Ralph Randolph. Born at Lebanon, Conn., May 26, 1797; died at Washington, D. C., July 30, 1872. An American clergyman and philanthropist, agent, after 1822, of the American Colonization Society.

Gurnah (gör'nä). The site of the chief neropolis of ancient Thebes in Egypt.

The excavations in Upper Egypt, which have proved so barren of all information concerning the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Dynasties, have brought to light much concerning the Seventeenth. In the tombs at Gurnah have been found the remains of a whole array of court functionaries, thus betraying the existence of a thoroughly civilized state. Mariette, Outlines, p. 24.

Gurnall (gér'nal), William. Born near Lynn, Norfolk, 1617; died at Lavenham, Suffolk, Oct.

12, 1679. An English clergyman, author of "The Christian in Complete Armour" (1655-62).

Gurney (gér'ni), Edmund. Born at Horsham, Surrey, March 23, 1847; died at Brighton, June 23, 1888. An English psychologist. He graduated at Cambridge in 1871, and became a fellow of Trinity in 1872. He studied music, medicine, and law. In 1880 he published "The Power of Sound," and in 1887 "Terminum Quid: Chapters on Various Disputed Questions," a collection of his philosophical papers. He was one of the founders of the Society for Psychical Research, and published some of the results of his investigations as "Phantasms of the Living" (1886).

Gurney, Sir Goldsworthy. Born at Treator, Cornwall, England, Feb. 14, 1793; died at Reeds, Cornwall, Feb. 28, 1875. An English inventor. Among his inventions are the oxyhydrogen blowpipe, the lime-magnesium (Drummond) and oil-gas lights, the high-pressure steam-jet, the tubular boiler, a steam-carriage, etc.

Gurney, Joseph John. Born at Earlharn Hall, near Norwich, England, Aug. 2, 1788; died there, Jan. 4, 1847. An English philanthropist, a minister of the Society of Friends. He was an associate of Mrs. Fry in prison reform, and of Clarkson and Wilberforce in the antislavery movement. He wrote "Notes on Prison Discipline" (1819), "Evidences, etc., of Christianity" (1827), etc.

Gurth (gérth). In Sir Walter Scott's novel "Ivanhoe," a swineherd and bondsman of Cedric.

Gurton, Gammer. See Gammer Gurton's Needle.

Gurwal, or Gurhwal. See Garhwal.

Gushington (gush'ing-ton), Angelina. The nom de plume of Charles Wallwyn Radcliffe Cooke.

Gushington, Impulsia. The nom de plume of Helen Selina Sheridan, Lady Dufferin.

Gusmão (gözh-näñ'), Alexandre de. Born in Santos, Brazil, 1693; died at Lisbon, Portugal, Dec. 30 or 31, 1753. A Portuguese statesman. Most of his life was passed in Europe, where he was an influential minister under several Portuguese kings. The treaty of 1750, which settled the limits of the Spanish and Portuguese possessions in America by uti possidetis, was due mainly to him.

Güssfeldt (güs'felt), Paul. Born at Berlin, Oct. 14, 1840. A German scientific traveler. In 1873, in association with Falkenstein, Soyaux, Linder, Pechuel-Löschke, and Dr. Bastian, he led an expedition to west-central Africa, but failed in his effort to explore the far interior. A rich harvest of scientific collections and observations was brought back in 1875, and published in journals as well as in "Die Loango Expedition" (Leipzig, 1879). In 1876 Güssfeldt explored the eastern desert of Egypt in company with Dr. Schweinfurth. His journeys in the Andes of Chile and Argentina and in the Bolivian highlands (1882-83) resulted in several important discoveries. In Feb., 1883, he made an unsuccessful attempt to reach the summit of Aconagua, one of the highest peaks of the Andes, although he attained an elevation of upward of 21,000 feet.

Gustavus (gus-tä'vus or gus-tä'vus) I., or Gustavus Vasa (vä'sä). [NL. Gustavus, F. Gustave, It. Gustavo, G. Gustar, Sw. Gusta, Dan. Gustav.] Born at Lindholm, Upland, Sweden, May 12, 1496; died at Stockholm, Sept. 29, 1560. King of Sweden 1523-60. He was the son of Erik Johansson (hence called Gustavus Erikson) of the house of Vasa, and descended on the mother's side from the house of Sture, two of the most influential noble families in Sweden. He received a careful education, chiefly at the court of his kinsman, the regent Sten Sture the younger, under whom he served against the Danes at the battle of Brännkyrka in 1518. In the negotiations which followed this Swedish victory, he was sent as a hostage to Christian II. of Denmark, by whom he was treacherously carried off to Denmark. He escaped in 1519, and on the massacre of Stockholm, in which 90 of the leading men of Sweden, including the father of Gustavus, were executed by Christian II., headed a revolt of the Dödecarlians in 1520, and captured Stockholm in 1523, in which year a diet at Strängnäs chose him king (June 6) and repudiated the Kalmar union with Denmark. He favored the Reformation in opposition to the Roman Catholic clergy, who had supported the Danes during the war for freedom; and in 1527, at the Diet of Westera, procured the passage of measures placing the lands of the bishops at his disposal, and granting the liberty of preaching the new doctrine.

Gustavus II. Adolphus. Born at Stockholm, Dec. 19, 1594; died Nov. 16, 1632. King of Sweden 1611-32, son of Charles IX. and Christina of Holstein, and grandson of Gustavus I. He inherited at his accession three wars from the previous reign, namely, with Denmark, Russia, and Poland. He concluded peace with Denmark at Knared, Jan. 29, 1613; compelled Russia to cede Kexholm, Karelen, and Ingermanland at Stolbowa, March 9, 1617; and, through the mediation of Richelieu, concluded an armistice of 6 years with Poland, Sept. 26, 1629, with a view to invading Germany, where the recent victories of the emperor over the Protestant princes under Christian IV. of Denmark threatened both France and Sweden, the former by the increase of the power of the house of Austria, and the latter by the destruction of the equilibrium between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism in the north of Europe. Leaving the conduct of the government in the hands of his chancellor, Axel Oxenstierna, he landed in Pomerania with 15,000 men, July 4, 1630; concluded a formal treaty of alliance with France at Barwalde in Jan., 1631; defeated Tilly at Leipsic, Sept. 17, 1631; and gained the victory of Lützen over Wallenstein, Nov. 16, 1632, but fell in the battle.

Gustavus III. Born at Stockholm, Jan. 24, 1746; died at Stockholm, March 29, 1792. King of Sweden 1771-92, son of Adolphus Frederick. He crushed the power of the royal council, consisting of nobles, by a coup d'état in 1772, which reduced it from the position of a co-regent to that of an advisory committee. He carried on war with Russia 1788-90, and was murdered as the result of a conspiracy among the nobles.

Gustavus IV. Adolphus. Born Nov. 1, 1778; died at St. Gall, Switzerland, Feb. 7, 1837. King of Sweden 1792-1809, son of Gustavus III. Contrary to the interests of his country, he bitterly opposed Napoleon, and in 1808 became involved in war with Russia, which conquered Finland, and was deposed by a military conspiracy.

Gustavus Adolphus Union. [G. Evangelischer Verein der Gustav-Adolf-Stiftung.] A union of various Protestant churches in Germany, for the purpose of assisting Protestants in Roman Catholic countries, founded after the bi-centennial celebration of the battle of Lützen (1632).

Güstrow (güs'trō). A town in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany, situated on the Nebel in lat. 53° 48' N., long. 12° 11' E. It has a trade in wool, and contains a cathedral and an ancient ducal castle. Population (1890), 14,568.

Gutenberg (gō'ten-berg), Johannes or Henne (originally Gensfleisch). Born at Mainz about 1400; died about 1468. The inventor of printing. His claim to this invention has been much disputed. (See Coster.) He was the son of Friele Gensfleisch and Else Gutenberg, and took his mother's name. In 1420 his father was exiled, and various legal proceedings growing out of this show that Gutenberg was in Strasburg in 1434. In 1436 he was sued before the court at Strasburg for breach of promise of marriage. His claim to be the inventor of printing rests mainly on a legal decision rendered at Strasburg Dec. 12, 1439, from which it appears that he entered into partnership with certain persons to carry on various secret operations, one of which involved the use of a press with an attachment conjectured to have been a type-mold. In 1450 he formed a partnership with Johann Fust, a money-lender, which terminated in 1455. Fust demanded payment of money loaned; in default of this, seized all of Gutenberg's types and stock; and carried on the business himself, with Peter Schoffer (later his son-in-law) as manager. Gutenberg continued his work with inferior types.

Gütersloh (gü'ters-lō). A town in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, 33 miles east of Münster. It is the center of the "pumpernickel" region, and exports hams and sausages.

Guthlac (gōth'lāk), Saint. Born about 673; died at Crowland, April 11, 714. An English hermit who for about 15 years lived with a few companions at Crowland. The church reared by Æthelbald over his relics grew into Crowland Abbey.

Guthrie (guth'ri). The capital of Oklahoma Territory and of Logan County, situated about 30 miles north of Oklahoma. Population (1890), 2,788.

Guthrie, James. Born near Bardstown, Ky., Dec. 5, 1792; died at Louisville, Ky., March 13, 1869. An American politician, secretary of the treasury 1853-57.

Gutierrez Vergara (vār-gá'rá), Ignacio. Born in 1806; died Nov. 3, 1877. A Colombian politician. He was a lawyer; deputy to several congresses; governor of Cundinamarca; and minister of the treasury 1857-61. In 1861, as a leader of the conservatives, he assumed executive power and attempted to defend Bogotá against the revolutionist Mosquera, but was defeated and for a time banished.

Gutium (gū'shi-nū). See the extract.

The northern plateau was inhabited by a mixture of uncultivated tribes at the earliest period of which we have any knowledge, and was known under the general name of Gutium or Gūti (Kutu in Assyrian), first identified by Sir H. Rawlinson with the Goyim of Gen. xiv. 1. Gutium comprised the whole country which stretched from the Euphrates on the west to Media on the east; the land of Nizir, with the mountain of Rowandiz, on which the ark of the Chaldean Noah was believed to have rested, being included within it. Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 90.

Gutnic (gōt'nik), or Gutnish. [G. Gutmisch.] The Swedish dialect of the island of Gotland in the Baltic. Old Gutnic is a sharply differentiated dialect of Old Swedish, preserved in runic inscriptions from the viking age (700-1050) to the 16th century, and in several MSS. from the 14th century. With Swedish and Danish it forms the group specifically called East Norse.

Guts Muths (gōts' mōts), Johann Christoph Friedrich. Born at Quedlinburg, Prussia, Aug. 9, 1759; died at Schnepfenthal, near Gotha, Germany, May 21, 1839. A German educator, teacher of gymnastics at Schnepfenthal. He wrote "Gymnastik für die Jugend" (1793), "Handbuch der Geographie" (1810), "Turnbuch für die Söhne des Vaterlandes" (1817), etc.

Gutzkow (gōts'kō), Karl. Born at Berlin, March 17, 1811; died at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, Dec. 16, 1878. A German dramatist and author. He studied theology and philosophy at Berlin. In 1831 appeared his first work, "Forum der Journal Litteratur." He was subsequently engaged in journalistic work in Stuttgart, and afterward traveled abroad and lived for short periods in various places in Germany. In 1835 appeared "Wally, die Zweiflerin" ("Wally, the Skeptic"), which cost him, on account of the religious views expressed, a three months' imprisonment at Mannheim. From 1847 to 1850 he lived at Dresden as a dramatist. In the mean time he had again been active as a journalist, and had written besides a number of critical works and essays. In 1852 he founded, in Dresden, a weekly journal. From 1860 to 1864 he was secretary at Weimar of the Schiller foundation. Loss of health compelled him to relinquish this position in the latter year. Among his many novels are "Die Ritter vom Geist" (1850-52), "Der Zauberer von Rom" (1859-1861), "Hohenschwangau" (1868), etc. His principal dramas are "Zopf und Schwert" ("Periwig and Sword," 1843), "Das Urbild des Tartuffe" ("The Prototype of Tartuffe," 1844), "Uriel Acosta" (1846), "Der Königsleutnant" ("The King's Lieutenant," 1849).

Gützlaß (güts'läf), Karl. Born at Pyritz, Pomerania, Prussia, July 8, 1803; died at Hong-Kong, Aug. 9, 1851. A German missionary in China, and Sinologist. His chief works are "China Opened" (1838), "Geschichte des chinesischen Reichs" (1847).

Guy, or Gui (gi or gē), or Guido (gwē'dō), of Lusignan (lū-zēn-yōn'). [ML. Guido, F. Guy, It. Guido, Sp. Guido, G. and D. Guido.] Died 1194. King of Jerusalem. He was descended from an ancient reigning family in Poitou, and in 1180 married the Marchioness of Montferrat, Sibylla, daughter of Amalric (Amaury), king of Jerusalem. He succeeded to the throne in 1186 on the death of Baldwin V., the son of Sibylla and the Marquis of Montferrat. In 1187 he was conquered and imprisoned by Saladin, by whom he was released on renouncing his claim to the throne. This renunciation he subsequently disregarded, and in 1192 transferred his claim to the kingdom of Jerusalem to Richard I. of England in exchange for Cyprus, in which he became the founder of a new Frankish kingdom.

Guy of Warwick. A legendary hero of English romance. The legends concerning him seem to have been first put in shape by an Anglo-Norman poet of the 12th century. In the 14th century they were first considered authentic history by the chroniclers. Peter Langtoft and Walter of Exeter wrote his history about 1308. Many poems as well as short ballads have been written upon the subject. His most popular feat was the killing of the giant Colbrand, a Danish champion, with whom he fought a duel to decide the war between Athelstan and the Danes who were besieging him at Winchester. He then returned to Warwick, where he had left his wife, the daughter of the Earl of Warwick, in right of whom he assumed the title. He resided near her castle as a hermit, and lived on her aims without making himself known to her; and she only discovered his identity when he sent her their wedding-ring, begging her to attend his death-bed. See Warwick.

Guy (gi), Thomas. Born about 1645; died at London, Dec. 27, 1724. An English bookseller and philanthropist. He founded Guy's Hospital (London) in 1722, and endowed other charitable institutions.

Guyenne. See Guienne.

Guy Mannerling (gi man'ēr-ing). A novel by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1815.

Guyon (gi'on; F. pron. gē-ōn'), Madame (Jeanne Marie Bouvier de la Motte-Guyon). Born at Montargis, Loiret, April 13, 1648; died at Blois, June 9, 1717. A French mystic, one of the founders of quietism. She married Jacques de la Motte-Guyon at 16 years of age. In 1695 she was imprisoned for her religious opinions, and later was banished to Blois. She wrote "Moyen court et très facile pour l'oraison" (1688-90), "Les torrents spirituels" (1704), "Poésies spirituelles" (1689), autobiography (1720), translation of the Bible (1713-15), etc.

Guyon (gi'on), Sir. The personification of temperance in Spenser's "Faerie Queene," bk. ii.

Guyot (gē-ō'), Arnold Henry. Born near Neuchâtel, Switzerland, Sept. 28, 1807; died at Princeton, N. J., Feb. 8, 1884. A Swiss-American geographer and scientist, professor of geography and geology at Princeton from 1855. He published a series of school geographies, "Earth and Man" (1849), etc.

Guy's Hospital. A London hospital situated in St. Thomas's street, south of the Thames, not far from London Bridge. It was founded, with other charities, by Thomas Guy, a bookseller of London.

Guzerat (guz-e-rāt'), or Gujarat (guzh-g-rāt'). A region in British India, bordering on the Arabian Sea, about lat. 20°-24° 45' N., long. 69°-74° 20' E. It comprises the northern districts of the governorship of Bombay, the Gaikwar's dominions, and other native states.

Guzerat (in the Panjab). See Gujrat.

Guzman (gōth-mān'), Fernando Perez de. Born in 1405; died in 1470. A Spanish poet and chronicler. He served for a time at the council-board and in the army of John II., king of Castile, but eventually retired to private life and devoted himself to literature. His chief work is "Cronica del señor don Juan Segundo deste nombre, rey de Castilla," etc. (1564).

Guzman, Gonzalo Nuño de. Born at Portillo; died at Santiago de Cuba, Nov. 5, 1539. The second governor of Cuba. He was one of the conquerors of the island, regidor of Santiago, and after the death of Velasquez became governor, April 27, 1527. On account of his avarice and cruelty he was removed, Nov. 6, 1531, but again obtained the place and retained it until 1537.

Guzman (gōth-mān'), Joaquin Eufrazio. Born in Costa Rica, 1801; died in Salvador about 1870. A Central American general and politician. He served under Malespin, and was vice-president in his administration, but declared against him in Feb., 1845, and assumed the presidential office until the end of the term in 1848. Subsequently he was a leader of the liberals in the Salvadorian Congress.

Guzman, Luis Henriquez de. See Henriquez de Guzman.

Guzman, Nuño or Núñez Beltran de. Born at Guadalajara, Spain, about 1485; died there, 1544. A Spanish lawyer and soldier. He was long encomendero at Puerto de Plata, España. In 1526 he was appointed to settle and govern Pánuco, in northwestern Mexico; and by his encroachments on the territory of Cortés, and of Narvaez on the north, caused much trouble. In 1528 he was made president of the first audience of Mexico, virtually ruling the country until 1531. He did all he could to injure Cortés, and made himself odious by arbitrary acts and extortion. In 1530 he conquered the region on the Pacific coast long known as New Galicia. Guzman was deposed by a new audience, Jan., 1531, and was subsequently disgraced and heavily fined.

Guzman, Ruy Diaz de. Born in Paraguay, 1544; died after 1612. The first historian of Paraguay. The greater part of his life was spent in the province of Guayra, where he became military governor. His "Historia Argentina" describes the conquest of the Platine States, and brings the history of the colony down to 1575. The work was first published in the "Angelis Collection," 1836.

Guzman Blanco (blān'kō), Antonio. Born at Caracas, Feb. 29, 1828. A Venezuelan soldier and statesman. He was prominent in the federalist revolts 1859-63, and on the triumph of his party became first vice-president under Falcon in 1863. The latter was deposed by a revolution in 1868. Guzman Blanco headed a successful counter-revolution in 1870, and (Falcon having died) became president. By successive re-elections he retained the office until 1882, and his influence was strong under subsequent administrations until 1888.

Guzman de Alfarache. A romance by Mateo Aleman, named from its hero. It is "nearly of the same age as 'Don Quixote,' and of great genius, though it can hardly be ranked as a novel or a work of imagination. It is a series of strange, unconnected adventures, rather dryly told, but accompanied by the most severe and sarcastic commentary. The satire, the wit, the eloquence and reasoning, are of the most potent kind; but they are didactic rather than dramatic. They would suit a homily or a pasquinade as well [as] or better than a romance. Still there are in this extraordinary book occasional sketches of character and humorous descriptions to which it would be difficult to produce anything superior." Hazlitt.

As it has reached us, it is divided into two parts, the first of which was published at Madrid in 1599. Its hero, who supposed himself to be the son of a decayed and not very reputable Genoese merchant established at Seville, escapes, as a boy, from his mother, after his father's ruin and death, and plunges into the world upon adventure. He soon finds himself at Madrid, though not till he has passed through the hands of justice; and in that capital undergoes all sorts of suffering, serving as a scullion to a cook, and as a ragged errand-boy to whomsoever would employ him; until, seizing a good opportunity, he steals a large sum of money that had been intrusted to him, and escapes to Toledo, where he sets up for a gentleman. But there he becomes, in his turn, the victim of a cunning like his own; and, finding his money nearly gone, enlists for the Italian wars. His star is now on the wane. At Barcelona he again turns sharper and thief. At Genoa and Rome he sinks to the lowest condition of a street beggar. But a cardinal picks him up in the last city and makes him his page; a place in which, but for his bold tricks and tricks, he might long have thriven, and which at last he leaves in great distress, from losses at play, and enters the service of the French ambassador. Here the First Part ends. . . . In 1605 the genuine Second Part appeared. It begins with the life of Guzman in the house of the French ambassador at Rome, where he serves in some of the most dishonorable employments to which the great of that period degraded their mercenary dependents.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., III. 99.

Gwalior (gwä'lē-ōr). 1. A protected state of India, of irregular outline, lying between the Northwest Provinces on the northeast and the states of Rajputana on the west. It is ruled by the Sindhia dynasty; their forces were defeated in 1803 and 1843. Area, 29,000 square miles. Population (1891), 3,375,774.

2. The capital of the state of Gwalior, situated in lat. 26° 13' N., long. 75° 10' E. It is the seat of Jain and early Hindu antiquities, and is noted for its fortresses. Population (1891), 104,083.

Gwamba (gwäm'bä). A Bantu tribe occupying the vast tract between Zululand and the Sabi River, mostly in Portuguese East Africa, but also represented in Transvaal. Scattered tribes are found as far north as Lake Nyassa, where they are called Batonga, which is the nickname given them by the Zulus. They call themselves Magwamba, and their language Shigwamba. This language differs more from Chwana and Suto than from Zulu. The Boers call them Knobnos because of their custom, now abandoned, of producing a string of fleshy knobs down their noses. A Swiss mission has been very successful in teaching these natives.

Gwendolen Harleth. See Harleth.

Gwilt (gwilt), Joseph. Born at Southwark, London, Jan. 11, 1784; died at Henley-on-Thames, Sept. 14, 1863. An English architect and archæologist. He published an "Encyclopædia of Architecture" (1842), etc.

Gwyn, or Gwinn (gwin), Nell or Eleanor. Born at Hereford (?), Feb. 2, 1650; died Nov. 13, 1687. An English actress, mistress of Charles II. There is little information as to her early life. Her first known appearance on the stage was in 1665. She was a great favorite with the public, as she was gay and sprightly and played piquant, bustling parts. Her dancing was much admired. After various adventures with other lovers besides the king, she left the stage in 1682. The king retained his affection for her till his death. She had two children by him: Charles Beauclerk (1670) (afterward Duke of St. Albans), and a second son, James (1671). Large sums of money, and Bestwood Park (Nottingham), Burford House (Windsor), and other gifts, were bestowed on her.

For tragedy she (Nell Gwyn) was unfitted: her stature was low, though her figure was graceful; and it was not till she assumed comic characters, stamped the smallest foot in England on the boards, and laughed with that peculiar laugh that in the excess of it her eyes almost disappeared, that she fairly carried away the town, and enslaved the hearts of city and of court. She spoke prologues and epilogues with wonderful effect, danced to perfection, and in her peculiar but not extensive line was, perhaps, unequalled for the natural feeling which she put into the parts most suited to her. She was so fierce of repartee that no one ventured to allude sneeringly to her antecedents. She was coarse, too, when the humour took her; could curse pretty strongly, if the house was not full; and was given, in common with the other ladies of the company, to loll about and talk loudly in the public boxes, when she was not engaged on the stage.

Doran, Eng. Stage, I. 62.

Gya. See Gaya.

Gyaman (gyä-män'). A Nigritic tribe of the Gold Coast, West Africa, situated north of Kumassi, and speaking a language of its own.

Gye (gī), Frederick. Born at London, 1809; died at Ditchley, Dec. 4, 1878. An English manager of opera. He undertook the management of Covent Garden in 1869, and retained it till 1877, when his son Ernest Gye assumed control. See Albani.

Gyges (gī'jēz). King of Lydia, a contemporary of the Assyrian king Asurbanipal (668-626 B. C.), and a founder of a new dynasty. Pressed by the Cimmerians, he invoked the help of Asurbanipal, and submitted to his supremacy. Afterward he allied himself with Psammetichus, king of Egypt, against Assyria, and seems to have fallen in one of the repeated attacks of the Cimmerians, who were no longer checked by the Assyrian power, in about 653. "According to the legend in Plato, Gyges, a herdsman of the king of Lydia, after a terrible storm and earthquake, saw near him a chasm in the earth, into which he descended and found a vast horse of brass, hollow and partly open, wherein lay a gigantic corpse with a golden ring. This ring he carried away, and discovered unexpectedly that it possessed the miraculous property of rendering him invisible at pleasure. Being sent on a message to the king Candaules, he made the magic ring available to his ambition: he first possessed himself of the person of the queen, and then with her aid assassinated the king, and finally seized the sceptre." Grote.

Gyidesdzo (gyēd-ās-d-zō'). A tribe of North American Indians on Price Island, northwest of Millbank Sound, British Columbia. See Tsimshian.

Gyitgaata (gyēt-gä'ä-tä), or Kitkada, or Kitkaet. A tribe of North American Indians on Grenville Channel, British Columbia. Their name signifies 'people of the poles' (from their salmon-weirs). See Tsimshian.

River.] A tribe of North American Indians on upper Skeena River, British Columbia. See Nasqa.

Gymnopædiæ (jim-nō-pē'di-ē). [Gr. γυμνοπαῖδια.] See the extract.

The feast of the Gymnopædiæ, or naked youths, was one of the most important at Sparta (Pausan. III. xi. § 7). It lasted several days, perhaps ten. It was less a religious festival than a great spectacle, wherein the grace and strength of the Spartan youth were exhibited to their admiring countrymen and to foreigners. The chief ceremonies were choral dances, in which wrestling and other gymnastic exercises were closely imitated, and which served to shew the adroitness, activity, and bodily strength of the performers. These were chiefly Spartan youths, who danced naked in the forum, round the statues of Apollo, Diana, and Latona. Songs in celebration of the noble deeds performed by the youths, as the exploits of Thyrea and Thermopylae, formed a portion of the proceedings at the festival.

Rawlinson, Herod., III. 451, note.

Gymnosophists (jim-nos'ō-fists). A sect of ancient Hindu philosophers who lived solitarily in the woods, wore little clothing, ate no flesh, renounced all bodily pleasures, and addicted themselves to mystical contemplation: so called by Greek writers. By some they are regarded as Brahman penitents; others include among them a set of Buddhist ascetics, the Shamans.

Haarlem, or Harlem (här'lem). [D. Haarlem (formerly Haerlem, Harlem), OD. Haralem, ML. Harlemum.]

The capital of the province of North Holland, Netherlands, on the Spaarne 4 miles from the North Sea, and 11 miles west of Amsterdam. It has various manufactures, and is especially celebrated for its flower-gardens. The Groot Kerk (of St. Bavo) is an impressive cruciform structure of the 15th century. The tower is 255 feet high. The interior possesses a brass choir-screen and fine carved stalls and pulpit. The organ, built in 1738, is famous as one of the finest existing. Haarlem was formerly the residence of the Counts of Holland. It was seized by the insurgent peasants in 1492; was invested by the Spaniards in Dec. 1572; surrendered in July, 1573; and was retaken by William of Orange in 1577. It was an art center in the 17th century. Population (1894), 56,803.

Haarlemmer Polder (här'lem-mer pöl'der). A plain in the province of North Holland, Netherlands, between Haarlem, Amsterdam, and Leyden. It was formerly the Haarlemmer Meer or Lake, 26 miles in length, formed in the 16th century and communicating with the Y and the Old Rhine. This was drained in 1840-53. Population of the district, about 16,000.

Haas (hä's), Johannes Hubertus Leonardus de. Born at Hedel, North Brabant, March 25, 1832; died at Brussels, Aug. 16, 1880. A noted animal-painter. He was a pupil of Van Oos at Haarlem, and went to Brussels in 1857. His "Trio of Donkeys" is at the Lisbon Gallery; "Castle on the Rhine," "Cows at Pasture," and "Three Comrades" at the National Gallery, Berlin; "Pasture" at the Brussels Museum; and "Cattle" at the Kunsthalle, Hamburg.

Haase (hä'ze), Friedrich. Born at Berlin, Nov. 1, 1826. A German actor. He first appeared on the stage at Weimar in 1846, and played successively at Potsdam, Berlin, Prague, Karlsruhe, Munich, Frankfurt, and elsewhere. He visited America in 1839 and 1882-83. He is one of the most popular of German actors.

Habab (hä'bäb'). An African tribe wandering as nomadic herdsmen over the pasture-lands northwest of Massowah, between the Bogos and the Beni Amer. In physical appearance they and the Beni Amer show more affinity with the Cushitic Bedja or Bisharin; but their dialects belong to the same cluster as Tigré and Amharic, the base of which is Semitic. In religion the Hababs are said to be now Mohammedan, although within recent times they still made a profession of Ethiopian Christianity. See Tigré.

Habakkuk (ha-bak'uk or hab'a-ku). [Cf. Assy. hambakūqm, name of a plant.] A Hebrew prophet. Nothing authentic of his life is known, and he therefore has become the subject of many legends. Thus, in the apocryphal book "Bel and the Dragon," he is carried through the air by an angel from Judea to Babylon to feed Daniel. The book of his prophecies, consisting of 3 chapters, holds the eighth place among the minor prophets. The first two chapters bear on the wickedness reigning in the country and the growing power of the Chaldeans; the third chapter is a lyric ode representing God as appearing in judgment. Habakkuk exhibits poetical genius of high order. His prophecy is constructed dramatically in the form of a dialogue between himself and Jehovah. The lyric ode ranks, for sublimity of poetic conception, picturesqueness of imagery, and splendor of diction, with the highest which Hebrew poetry has produced. He prophesied most probably in the reign of Jehoiakim (609-597 B. C.).

Habana. See Havana.

Habassin. An old name of Abyssinia.

Habberton (hab'ér-ton), John. Born at Brooklyn, 1842. An American writer, author of "Helen's Babies" (1876), etc.

Haco. See Hakon.

Hadad (hä'dad). A Syrian deity. The name is applied in the Bible to several persons. See Ben-hadad.

Hadad occupied a higher position than Saul. He was, as I have said, the supreme Baal or Sun-god, whose worship extended southward from Carchemish to Edom and Palestine. At Damascus he was adored under the Assyrian name of Rimmon, and Zechariah (xii. 11) alludes to the cult of the compound Hadad-Rimmon in the close neighborhood of the great Canaanitish fortress of Megiddo. Coins bear the name of Abd-Hadad, "the servant of Hadad," who reigned in the fourth century at Hierapolis, the later successor of Carchemish; and, under the abbreviated form of Dada, Shalmaneser speaks of "the god Dada of Aleppo" (Khalman).

Sayce, Anc. Babylonians, p. 56.

Hadad-rimmon (hä'dad-rim'on). A place mentioned in Zech. xii. 11 as situated in the valley of Megiddo, where a lamentation took place. The lamentation is referred by some to the fall of Josiah in the battle with Necho of Egypt near Megiddo (609 B. C.), and Hadad-rimmon is then taken as a place identified with the modern village Rumanneh, south of Lejun, which is considered as representing the ancient Megiddo. By others the lamentation of Hadad-rimmon is explained to mean the rites connected with three Syrian divinities similar to the mourning over the death of Adonis in Phœnicia and elsewhere.

Hadai (hä-di'), or Adaize (ä-dä'z'). A tribe of the Caddo Confederacy of North American Indians. See Caddo.

Haddington (had'ing-ton), or East Lothian (öst lö'thi-an). A maritime county of Scotland, bounded by the Firth of Forth and the North Sea on the north, Berwick on the south-east and south, and Edinburgh on the west. Area, 271 square miles. Population (1891), 37,485.

Hades (hä'déz). [Gr. ᾍδης or Ἅϊδης.] 1. In Greek mythology: (a) The lord of the lower world, a brother of Zeus, and the husband of Persephone (Proserpine). He reigned in a splendid palace, and, besides his function of governing the shades of the departed, he was the giver to mortals of all treasure derived from the earth. In art he was represented in a form kindred to that of Zeus and that of Poseidon, and bearing the staff or scepter of authority, usually in company with Persephone. As the god of wealth he was also called by the Greeks Pluto; and he is the same as the Roman Dis, Orcus, or Tartarus. (b) The invisible lower or subterranean world in which dwelt the spirits of all the dead; the world of shades; the abode of the departed. The souls in Hades were believed to carry on there a counterpart of their material existence: those of the righteous without discomfort, amid the pale sweet blooms of asphodel, or even in pleasure, in the Elysian Fields; and those of the wicked amid various torments. The lower world was surrounded by fiery and pestilential rivers, and the solitary approach was guarded by the monstrous three-headed dog Cerberus to prevent the shades from escaping to the upper world.

2. In the Greek New Testament and in the revised English version, indefinitely, the state or abode of the dead: often taken as equivalent to purgatory, the intermediate state of the dead, or to hell.

Hading (ä-dän'), Jane Alfrédine Tréfourét, known as Jane Hading. Born at Marseilles, Nov. 25, 1859. A noted French actress. She made her first appearance, when only 3 years old, as little Blanche in "Le bossu." This part was usually represented by a doll. From the time she was 14 years old she played a variety of parts, at first in operetta, until finally, in 1885, she made her appearance at the Gymnase in Paris as an exponent of high comedy.

Hadley, James. Born at Fairfield, Herkimer County, N. Y., March 30, 1821; died at New Haven, Conn., Nov. 14, 1872. An American scholar, professor of Greek in Yale College 1851-72. He published a "Greek Grammar" (1861). An "Introduction to Roman Law" (1873), a volume of "Essays" (1873), and a "Brief History of the English Language" (1879), were published after his death.

Hadley, John. Born April 16, 1682; died Feb. 14, 1743. A noted English mathematician and mechanician. He improved the reflecting telescope, and in 1730 invented the reflecting quadrant. His claim to the latter invention has been disputed, Thomas Godfrey, of Philadelphia, having proposed a similar apparatus in the same year.

Hadramaut (hä-dra-mät'). A region in southern Arabia, of undefined boundaries, extending along the Indian Ocean between Dahna on the north, Mahra on the east, and Yemen on the west; recently explored by Bent.

Hadrian (Popes). See Adrian.
Hadrian (hä'dri-an), sometimes Adrian (Publius Ælius Hadrianus). Born at Rome, Jan. 24, 76 A. D.; died at Baiae, Italy, July 10, 138. Roman emperor 117-138, nephew of Trajan whom he succeeded. Renouncing the policy of conquest, he abandoned the new provinces of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria, and established the Euphrates as the eastern boundary of the empire. In 119 he began a progress through the provinces, in the course of which he began the construction of the wall that bears his name against the Picts and the Scots in Britain, and from which he returned about 131. He promulgated the "Edictum Perpetuum," a collection of the edicts of the pretors by Salvius Julianus, in 132. In 132 a revolt was occasioned among the Jews by the planting of the Roman colony of Ælia Capitolina on the site of Jerusalem, which was suppressed in 135.

Hadrianople. See Adrianople.

Hadrian's Mole. See Angelo, Castle of Sant'.

Hadrian's Villa. An assemblage of ancient ruins, near Tivoli, perhaps the most impressive in Italy. It included the Greek and Latin theaters, so called, an odonm, thermæ, a stadium, a palace, several temples, spacious structures for guards and attendants, and many subsidiary buildings and devices. Of most of these there are extensive remains; and here were found many of the fine statues now in Roman museums.

Hadrian's Wall. A wall of defense for the Roman province of Britain, constructed by Hadrian between the Solway Firth and the mouth of the Tyne.

The military genius of Hadrian is attested by the wonderful "Picts' Wall," of which the ruins still extend for miles between Tynemouth and the estuary of the Solway. The merit of the work has been claimed for Severus, for the generals who in the fifth century brought temporary help to Britain, and even for the native princes whom their masters had abandoned to the enemy. But after a long debate the opinion now prevails that the whole system of defence bears the impress of a single mind, and that the wall and its parallel earthworks, its camps, roads, and stations, were designed and constructed by Hadrian alone.

Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 312.

Hadrumetum (had-rö-më'tum), or Adrumetum (ad-rö-më'tum). In ancient geography, a Phœnician (later a Roman) colony, generally identified with the modern Susa, Tunis, situated on the Gulf of Hammamet 70 miles south by east of Tunis.

Hagiographa (hä-ji-og'ra-fä). [Gr. ἁγία γραφή, sacred writings; Heb. Ketüvim, writings.] The Greek name of the last of the 3 Jewish divisions of the Old Testament. They are variously reckoned, but usually comprise the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles.

The third section of the Hebrew Bible consists of what are called the Hagiographa or "Ketüvim," that is [sacred] writings. At the head of these stand three poetical books. — Psalms, Proverbs, and Job. Then come the five small books of Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, which the Hebrews name the Megilloth, or "rolls." They have this name because they alone among the Hagiographa were used on certain annual occasions in the service of the synagogue, and for this purpose were written each in a separate volume.

Haiti, or Hayti (hā'ti; F. pron. ā-ē-tē'), Sp. Santo Domingo (sān'tō dō-mēng'gō), and formerly Española (es-pān-yō'lā), Latinized as Hispaniola (his-pan-i-ō'lā). An island of the Greater Antilles, and next to Cuba the largest of the West Indian islands. It is separated from Cuba on the west by the Windward Passage, and from Porto Rico on the east by the Mona Passage, and is traversed from east to west by 3 mountain-ranges. It contains mineral and especially vegetable wealth. It is divided politically into the republics of Haiti and Santo Domingo. It was discovered by Columbus in 1492, and in 1493 he established on it the first Spanish colony in the New World. Subsequently it was neglected, and became the prey of freebooters and buccaners. About 1632 French buccaners settled in the western part, which was definitely ceded to France in 1697. Bloody revolutionary and slave revolts in the French colony (1791-93) ended in the supremacy of the blacks. Their leader, Toussaint Louverture, governed the whole island from 1795, and proclaimed its independence in 1801. Temporarily reduced by Leclerc's expedition (1802-03), the blacks, aided by the English, recovered the western part, where Dessalines was emperor 1805-06. Struggles between the blacks and mulattos and between rival leaders led to the division of this part of the island; but it was reunited under Boyer, who in 1822 conquered the Spanish or eastern end. In 1844 the Spanish part became independent, and since then the island has been divided politically into Haiti and the Dominican Republic, the former occupying about one third in the western part. (See these names.) Total area, about 28,250 square miles. Population, estimated, 1,380,000.

Haiti, or Hayti. A republic occupying the western portion of the island of Haiti. Capital, Port-au-Prince. The chief export is coffee. The executive is vested in a president, now elected for 7 years; and legislation is intrusted to an assembly comprising a senate and chamber of representatives. The prevailing language is a debased French, and the nominal religion is Roman Catholic. Independence was proclaimed 1801; Dessalines was emperor 1804-06; the eastern portion of the island was annexed in 1822, and finally separated in 1843; and Souleuvre was emperor 1849-59, under the title of Faustin I. It has suffered continually from revolutions. Area, 10,204 square miles. Population (about nine tenths of which are blacks), estimated, 950,000.

Halley (hal'i), Edmund. Born at Haggerston, Shoreditch, London, Nov. 8, 1656; died at Greenwich, Jan. 14, 1742. A celebrated English astronomer. His father was engaged in the business of soap-boiling in London. He studied at St. Paul's School, and in 1673 entered Queen's College, Oxford, but left the university in 1676 without taking a degree. His astronomical studies were begun in his boyhood (his first communication to the Royal Society was sent before he was 20), and in 1678 he sailed for St. Helena for the purpose of observing the positions of the fixed stars in the southern hemisphere. The importance of observations made during this trip led Flamsteed to name him "the Southern Tycho." On Nov. 7, 1677, he made at St. Helena "the first complete observation of a transit of Mercury." In 1678 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. He was a friend of Sir Isaac Newton, and printed the "Principia" at his own cost. He was assistant secretary of the Royal Society and editor of the "Philosophical Transactions" 1685–93; was appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford in 1710; became secretary of the Royal Society in 1713; and was appointed successor to Flamsteed as astronomer royal in 1721. From Nov., 1698, to Sept., 1700, he explored the South Atlantic in the Paramour Pink (returning once to England) for the purpose of studying the variation of the compass and discovering southern lands, and reached lat. 52° S. In 1701, in the same vessel, he surveyed the tides and coasts of the English Channel. He is best known from his studies of comets. He inferred from his computations that the comets of 1531, 1697, and 1682 were in reality the same body, and predicted its return in 1758, a prediction which was verified by its appearance on Christmas day of that year. This comet has since been known by his name.

Pg. Hamburgo, It. Amburgo, ML. Hamburgum, Hamburga, from G. Hamburg, OHG. Hammaburg.] A free city, forming with its territory a state of the German Empire. The city is situated on the Elbe, at the mouth of the Alster, in lat. 53° 33' N., long. 9° 58' E. It is the most important seaport of Germany, and, next to London, Liverpool, and Glasgow, the chief commercial place in Europe. It trades especially with Great Britain, the United States, and northern Europe; is an important place of embarkation for emigrants; and is the terminus of various steamship lines, including the Hamburg-American to New York. Its exports are grain, iron, fancy goods, butter, hides, etc. The city consists of the Altstadt and Neustadt, and the suburbs of St. Georg and St. Pauli. Altona adjoins it. There are extensive harbors and quays. St. Nicholas, one of the most important of modern churches in the Pointed style, was built by Sir G. Gilbert Scott. The architecture represents the most ornate type of the 13th century, with profuse sculpture inside and out. The length is 285 feet; that of the transepts, 151. The western spire is 473 feet high, and is surpassed in Europe only by the cathedrals of Cologne, Ulm, and Rouen, and the Eiffel Tower. Other objects of interest are the Church of St. Peter, exchange, Johannum (library, museum), Lake Binnen-Alster, Kunsthalle (picture-gallery), zoological garden, and museums. Hamburg was founded about 808, and was the seat of an archbishopric 834–1223. It was one of the chief Hanseatic cities. Its position as a free imperial city was acknowledged in 1510. The Reformation was introduced in 1529. It was incorporated with France in 1810; an attempt at rebellion was punished by Davout in 1813; and it regained its freedom in 1814. It has been successively a member of the Germanic Confederation, North German Confederation, and German Empire. In 1842 it suffered from a fire. It joined the Zollverein in 1888. Population (1890), 323,923; with suburbs, 573,198.

Hameln (hä'meln). A town in the province of Hannover, Prussia, on the Hamel and Weser 24 miles south of Hannover. It is noted in connection with the legendary "piper of Hameln" (see below), and contains the "Rattenfängerhaus." It was the scene of a Swedish victory over the imperialists in 1633. Population (1890), commune, 13,675.

Hameln (hä'meln), or Hamelin (ham'e-lin), Piper of, or The Pied Piper of. In medieval legend, a magician who in the year 1284, for a stipulated sum of money, freed the town of Hameln from a plague of rats by playing on his pipe and leading the vermin, which followed the music, into the river where they were drowned. When the townsman refused to pay the money, the piper returned and, again playing on his magical pipe, led the way through the Bungen-Strasse out of the town, this time followed by 130 children. He led them to a hill called the Koppenberg, into which they all entered and disappeared. The event is recorded in inscriptions on the Rathaus and elsewhere in the town, and was long regarded as historical. The legend has been told in rime by Robert Browning. He apparently founded it on Verstegan's account in his "Restitution of Decayed Intelligence" (1634). Brandenburg, Lorch, and other towns have a similar tradition, and there are Chinese and Persian legends much resembling it.

The capital of the Hampirpur district, situated at the junction of the Betwa with the Junna, in lat. 25° 57' N., long. 80° 12' E.

Hamites (ham'its). [From Ham, the son of Noah.] A race generally counted with the white race, together with their Semitic neighbors and kinsmen, but in which, from the earliest times, 3 varieties (a pale and red-haired, a reddish, and a dark-brown) have been distinguished. The blond type is found among the Berbers; the reddish among the Egyptians and Bedja; the dark-brown or black among the Somal, the Galla, and the Fulbe or Fulahs. In these three the admixture of Nigritic blood is evident. The earliest civilization of mankind (that of Egypt, to which all the others seem to be directly or indirectly indebted) flourished among the Hamites of the reddish type, in the Lower Nile valley. The Hamitic family of languages is generally divided into 3 subgroups: (a) the Libyan or Berber, spoken from the Canary Islands to Egypt; (b) the Egyptian, comprising Old Egyptian and Coptic with its 4 dialects; (c) the Ethiopic, including the Bedja, Dankall, Somali, Galla, Agau, Saho, and Bilin. The Ethiopic is also called Cushitic or Punic. Lately the Fulah cluster has been added by some to the preceding, as prevalently Hamitic. Owing to ethnic and linguistic mixtures with negroes, it is impossible to draw a clear line between Hamitic and Bantu-negro languages or tribes. Even the Hausa and Hottentot languages show traces of Hamitic structure. The Hamitic languages are sometimes called semi- or sub-Semitic. In eastern North Africa they are intermixed geographically with the Semitic; in western North Africa, the Semitic are superposed on the Hamitic. See African Languages (under Africa), Fulah, Hottentot, Berber, Bantu.

Hamitic (ha-mit'ik). See Hamites.

Hamlet (ham'let), or Amlet. A mythical or semi-historical Danish prince whose story, originating in a Danish saga, is given by Saxo-Græmaticus. This story is given in a French version by Belleforest in 1570 in the fifth volume of his "Histoires tragiques." The English translation of this latter was published as "Hystorie of Hamlet," and it was also made into an English play, now lost, that probably served as a starting-point for Shakspeare's "Hamlet." Henslowe mentions a play of this name as represented at Newington Butts, June 9, 1594, which was an "old play." Shakspeare's "Hamlet" was played in 1600 or 1601, and printed first in 1603. It was entered on the "Stationers' Register," July 26, 1602. "A booke called the Revenge of Hamlett Prince Denmarke as yt was latelie Acted by the Lord Chamberleyne his Ser-vantes." This was a very imperfect text, known as the first quarto. The second quarto, published in 1664, was a good text, thought to be as Shakspeare left it. The third quarto, a reprint of the second, appeared in 1665; the fourth in 1611. There is a fifth quarto, undated. No others appeared during Shakspeare's lifetime. The 4 folios are essentially the same text, which differs from the quartos. The German play "Der Bestrafte Brudermord, oder Prinz Hamlet aus Dänemark" ("Fratricide punished, or Prince Hamlet of Denmark") is now thought to be probably a weak copy of the old play preceding the 1603 quarto. It is not known precisely when it appeared, but it was early in the 17th century. (See Shakspeare.) About the character of Hamlet and his real or feigned insanity there has been much controversy. He shows the unfitnes of a thoughtful man who sees both sides of a subject to deal with questions requiring prompt action under extraordinary circumstances.

Hamlet. An opera by Ambroise Thomas, first produced at Paris in 1868. The French words are by Barbier and Carré, after Shakspeare. It was produced in London in Italian as "Amleto" in 1869.

Hammurabi (häm-mürä'bë). The first king of all Babylonia, with residence in the city of Babylon. In his long reign (about 2237-2232 B. C.) he showed himself great alike in war and peace. He drove out the remnants of the Elamitic invaders, united North and South Babylonia (Shumir and Akkad) under his sway, and made Babylon the metropolis of the united kingdom, which it remained during the whole of its existence for nearly 2,000 years, so that he may be termed the founder of the Babylonian empire. After freeing and uniting the country, he turned his attention to its protection and interior prosperity. To obviate the disastrous inundations and at the same time to provide the country with water, he executed one of the greatest works, the excavation of a gigantic canal, named after him nahr-Hammurabi, later famous as "the royal canal of Babylon." Besides this, he constructed a great wall along the Tigris, and erected many temples. Numerous inscriptions of him have survived.

Hampton Court. A royal palace on the Thames 12 miles from Charing Cross, built by Cardinal Wolsey. A great part of the highly picturesque battlemented Tudor buildings in red brick, surrounding 3 courts, still remains. The property originally consisted of about 1,000 acres of more or less barren land belonging to the Knight Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem. It was leased from the Priory of St. John in 1515 by Thomas Wolsey, archbishop of York and primate of England, who erected the original Gothic palace. In 1526 he surrendered the estate to Henry VIII., who added the chapel and great hall 1531-35. In the reign of William III., the great facade, modern state apartments and a gallery for the cartoons of Raphael were added by Sir Christopher Wren. The front on the fine French gardens is later, in the Renaissance style. The great hall, 106 by 40 feet, and 60 feet high, possesses a handsome open-framed roof with elaborate pendants. The state apartments are filled with paintings, many of them noted works. The cartoons by Raphael have been removed to the South Kensington Museum. A part of the palace is now occupied by persons of good family in reduced circumstances. Hampton Court is most intimately associated with James I. and William III., and was a place of imprisonment of Charles I.

Hampton Court Conference. A conference appointed by James I., at Hampton Court, in 1604, to settle the disputes between the Puritan party and the High-Church party in the Church of England. It was conducted on three days (Jan. 14, 16, and 18), and resulted in a few alterations of the liturgy, but entirely failed to secure the objects sought by the Puritans. An important indirect result of it was the revision of the Bible called the King James' or authorized version, which was suggested at that time.

Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute. A training-school for negroes and Indians, situated near Hampton, Virginia, established by General S. C. Armstrong in 1868, and incorporated by the State of Virginia in 1870. Its object is to train young men and women of the negro and Indian races to become teachers among their own people.

Hampton Roads (hamp'ton rödz). A channel connecting the estuary of James River with Chesapeake Bay, situated south of Fort Monroe, Virginia. Here, March 8, 1862, the Confederate ironclad Virginia (Merrimack) destroyed the Federal frigates Cumberland and Congress; and the following day there was a contest between the Virginia and the ironclad Monitor, the former retiring. This was the first engagement between ironclads. See Monitor.

Handel (han'del), George Frederick, G. Georg Friedrich Händel. Born at Halle, Prussia, Feb. 23, 1685; died at London, April 14, 1759. A celebrated German composer. He studied with Zachau, organist of the cathedral at Halle, for 3 years. He then went to Berlin, where his powers of improvisation caused him to be regarded as a prodigy; then to Halle, where his father died. It became necessary for him to support his mother, and he went to Hamburg, where he entered the orchestra of the Opera House as "violino di ripieno." He soon became known, and was made conductor. In 1705 his first opera, "Almira," was produced there. In 1706 he went to Italy. Returning to Germany in 1709, he accepted the position of kapellmeister from the Elector of Hanover, on condition that he should be allowed to visit England, having already received pressing invitations to do so. He first went to London in 1710. His opera "Rinaldo" was produced there in 1711. He undertook the direction of the Italian opera in 1720. Buononcini and Ariosti, both of whom he had known at Halle, also went to London about this time and formed an opposition to him, which gave rise to much feeling and to Byrom's epigram ending

"Strange all this difference should be Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee!"

From 1729-34 he was in partnership with Heidegger at the King's Theatre. In 1737 he became bankrupt. In 1739, when he was about 54, he began to compose the oratorios which made him famous. In 1752 he was attacked by cataract, and was couched three times, but without success. He was nearly if not entirely blind for the rest of his life, but continued to preside at the organ during his own oratorios. His fame increased, and the animosity which had pursued him during his earlier years died away. He is best known by his oratorios "Esther" (1732), "Saul" (1739), "Israel in Egypt" (1739), "The Messiah" (1742), "Samson" (1743), "Judas Maccabæus" (1747), "Joshua" (1748), "Jephthah" (1752), etc. He wrote 23 oratorios, more than 40 operas, "Acis and Galatea" and "Alexander's Feast" (cantatas), besides a great deal of church and chamber music, odes, songs, etc. See his "Life" by Mainwaring, Scholcher, and Chryssander.

He sailed as a missionary for Africa in March, 1882, but shortly returned to England. He was appointed bishop, and returned to Africa in 1884. In 1885 he headed an expedition to open up a route to Victoria Nyanza. With a small party he reached the lake, but was captured by the natives and murdered.

Hanno (han'ö). King of Gaza, one of the five confederate cities of the Philistines. He is often mentioned by the name of Hannu in the Assyrian inscriptions, and was involved in the conflict between Assyria and Egypt, Gaza being the frontier fortress on the Egyptian highway barring the road to the south. He is first mentioned in the annals of Tiglath-Pileser III. (745-727), against whom he rebelled, but at the approach of whose army (about 732) he fled to Egypt. Afterward he allied himself with Sabaco, the Ethiopian king of Egypt (the biblical So, Assyrian Sabe), against Sargon II. (722-705), shared the defeat of Sabaco in the memorable battle of Kaphia (720), and was carried captive to Assyria.

Hanno (han'ö). Lived probably in the 5th century B. C. A Carthaginian navigator who led a colonizing expedition to the western coast of Africa. An account of his voyage is extant in a Greek translation ("Periplus").

"In the flourishing times of Carthage" (no nearer date is known), Hanno and Himilco, two brothers belonging to the dominant clan of Mago, were despatched by the Senate to find new trading stations, and to found new colonies of the half-bred "Liby-Phœnician" population, from whose presence the State was always anxious to be freed. Each admiral was in command of a powerful fleet. Hanno was directed to go south from the Pillars of Hercules, and to skirt the African coast; Himilco was in like manner directed to keep to the coast of Spain. The records of both voyages were long preserved upon tablets in the temple of Moloch; and Hanno's account is still extant in a Greek translation. Himilco's tablet is lost, though it seems to have been extant as late as the fourth century of the Christian era; but its form is known from the "Periplus of Hanno," and its substance is, to some extent, preserved in the extracts of Avienus.

Etton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 20.

Hanno (han'ö), surnamed "The Great." Lived in the 3d century B. C. A leader of the aristocratic party at Carthage, an opponent of Hamilcar Barca and Hannibal.

Hanno, or Anno (an'ö), Saint. Killed 1075.

An archbishop of Cologne. He became chancellor of the empire in the reign of Henry III. and was elevated to the see of Cologne in 1056. In 1069, placing himself at the head of the princes dissatisfied with the administration of the regent Agnes of Poitou, he abduced the young king Henry IV. from Kaiserswerth to Cologne, and usurped the regency.

Hannover (hän-nö'ver), Eng. Hanover (han'ö-vèr), F. Hanovre (ä-növr'). A province of Prussia. Capital, Hannover. The main portion is bounded by the North Sea, Oldenburg, Schleswig-Holstein, and Hamburg (separated from these two by the Elbe) on the north, Mecklenburg and Brandenburg (separated by the Elbe) on the northeast, the province of Saxony on the east, Brunswick, Waldeck, Lippe, Schaumburg-Lippe, and Westphalia on the south, and the Netherlands and Oldenburg on the west. It is nearly cut in two by Oldenburg. South of it is a detached portion, separated by Brunswick, and reaching south to Hesse-Nassau, and there are several minor exclaves. The surface is generally level; the Harz, Weser hills, and Teutoburger Wald are in the south. The chief rivers are the Ems, Weser (with the Aller and Leine), and Elbe. The leading occupation is agriculture. In the south are mines of coal, iron, lead, copper, and silver. There are considerable manufactures. The province is divided into 6 districts—Hannover, Hildesheim, Osnabrück, Lüneburg, Aurich, and Stade. The great majority of the population is Protestant. Hannover formed part of the old duchy of Saxony. The Wolf house, which had acquired Bavaria in 1070, obtained Lüneburg, etc., in 1120. After the deposition (1180) of Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony and Bavaria, his son William obtained (1203) Lüneburg, the Upper Harz, etc. His son Otto was made duke of Brunswick and Lüneburg in 1235, and acquired Celle, Hannover, etc. There were various divisions and reunions, and finally two main lines, Lüneburg and Wolfenbüttel. In 1692 the principality of Lüneburg became the electorate of Hanover. The second elector, George Louis, succeeded to the British throne as George I. in 1714 (founder of the British line of Hanover, Brunswick, or the Guelphs: see George I.). The duchies of Bremen and Verden were acquired in 1719. Hannover was occupied by the French in 1803; was ceded to Prussia in 1805; and was taken from Prussia in 1807. Part of it was allotted to the kingdom of Westphalia in 1807, and another portion in 1810. It was liberated in 1813. By the Congress of Vienna (1814-15) it was raised to a kingdom, and received accessions (East Friesland, Hildesheim, etc.). It entered the Germanic Confederation in 1815. A constitution was given to it in 1833, which was suspended in 1837. Hannover was separated from Great Britain in 1837, Ernest Augustus, duke of Cumberland, succeeding King William of England. An alliance between Prussia, Hannover, and Saxony was formed in 1849. Hannover sided with Austria against Prussia in 1866. It was annexed to Prussia in 1866. The Duke of Cumberland (representative of the house of the Guelphs) resigned his claims on Hannover in 1892, receiving in exchange from Prussia the "Guelph fund." (See Brunswick.) Area, 14,853 square miles. Population (1890), 2,278,361.

Hannover, Eng. Hanover. The capital of the province of Hannover, Prussia, situated on the Leine in lat. 52° 23' N., long. 9° 43' E. Hansard (han'särd), Luke. Born at Norwich, England, July 3, 1752; died at London, Oct. 29, 1828. An English printer, best known from his publication of parliamentary reports. He printed the "Journal of the House of Commons from 1774."

Hanseatic League (han-sē-at'ik lēg), or the German Hanse or Hansa. A medieval confederation of cities of northern Germany and adjacent countries, called the Hanse towns, at one time numbering about 90, with affiliated cities in nearly all parts of Europe, for the promotion of commerce by sea and land, and for its protection against pirates, robbers, and hostile governments. At the height of its prosperity it exercised sovereign powers, made treaties, and often enforced its claims by arms in Scandinavia, England, Portugal, and elsewhere. Its origin is commonly dated from a compact between Hamburg and Lübeck in 1241, although commercial unions of German towns had existed previously. The league held triennial general assemblies (usually at Lübeck, its chief seat); and, after a long period of decline and attempts at resuscitation, the last general assembly, representing 6 cities, was held in 1663. The name was retained, however, by the union of the free cities of Lübeck, Hamburg, and Bremen, which are now members of the German Empire.

Hansen (hän'sen), Heinrich. Born at Hadersleben, Schleswig, Nov. 23, 1821; died at Copenhagen, July 11, 1890. A Danish architectural painter.

Hansteen (hän'stän), Christopher. Born at Christiania, Norway, Sept. 26, 1784; died at Christiania, April 15, 1873. A Norwegian astronomer and physicist, noted especially for his researches in terrestrial magnetism. He published "Untersuchungen über den Magnetismus der Erde" (1819); "Resultate magnetischer, etc., Beobachtungen" (1863), etc.

Hanswurst (häns'vörst). [G., Jack Sausage.] A conventional buffoon in old German comedy. See Gottsched.

He was servant, messenger, spy, intrigant, and conjuror, and was dressed in motley and provided with a cracking whip, like the old gleeman. He was obscene and vulgar, a great eater and drinker, a braggart and a coward. He was the hero of farce and the jester of tragedy, and he even forced his way into Hamburg Opera. . . . He went under different names at different periods, Pickelhering, Harlequin, and Hanswurst being the most frequent. . . . As early as 1708 a German theatre was established in the imperial capital, and its founder, Joseph Strantzky, a Silesian, made extensive use of the characters and plots of Italian farce; he himself acted Harlequin, to whom he gave the old German name of Hanswurst, a title borne occasionally by the clown of the earlier drama. He made him appeal more directly to the Viennese. His Hanswurst came from Bergamo, and both were made to speak in their native dialect. As Arlecchino has his own special costume, made of triangular patches of cloth, so Hanswurst always appeared as a peasant with the characteristic green pointed hat. Scherer, Hist. German Lit. (trans.), I, 398.

Hanuman (han'nō-män). [Skt., lit. 'having (large) jaws.'] In Hindu mythology, a monkey chief who is a conspicuous figure in the Ramayana. He and the other monkeys who assisted Rama in his war against Ravana were of divine origin and superhuman powers. Hanuman jumped from India to Ceylon in one bound, tore up trees, carried away the Himalayas, and performed other wonderful exploits. Accompanying Rama on his return to Ayodhya, he received from him the reward of perpetual life and youth. His exploits are favorite topics among Hindus from childhood to old age, paintings of them are common, and there are temples for his worship.

Hanumannataka (han'ō-man-nat'a-ka). In Sanskrit literature, a drama, by various hands, on the subject of the adventures of the monkey chief Hanuman, written in the 10th or 11th century.

Hanway (han'wā), Jonas. Born at Portsmouth, England, Aug. 12, 1712; died at London, Sept. 5, 1786. An English traveler and philanthropist. He became the partner of an English merchant in St. Petersburg in 1743; and 1743-44 made a mercantile journey to Persia, in which he suffered many misfortunes. He published an account of it in 1753. His later years were occupied with various philanthropic schemes, especially in behalf of poor children. He advocated the establishment of Sunday-schools. He is said to have been the first habitually to carry an umbrella in the streets of London.

Hapi (hä'pē). In Egyptian mythology, the Nile as a deity; the god Nilus.

We can more easily understand the worship of the god Hapi, the Nile. We can readily realize that the Egyptians paid divine honours to the river that brought them all blessings. It is true no special temples seem to have been erected to this god, but we find that gifts were presented to him everywhere, and he was worshipped as a god in hymns and was identified with other gods. La Saussaye, Science of Religion (trans.), p. 411.

Happy Valley, The. In Johnson's "Rasselas," a garden of peace where the Prince of Abyssinia lived. It was almost impossible to get into or out of it. See Rasselas.

Hapsburg (håps'börg; G. pron. häps'börg), or Habsburg (häps'börg) House of. [G. Hapsburg, Habsburg, orig. Habichtsburg, hawk's castle.] A German princely family which derived its name from the castle of Hapsburg (which see), and which has furnished sovereigns to the Holy Roman Empire, Austria, and Spain. The title Count of Hapsburg was assumed by Werner I., who died in 1096. Count Rudolf was elected emperor as Rudolf I. in 1273 and acquired Austria, and founded the imperial line which reigned 1273-91, 1298-1308, 1458-1740. Rudolf IV. became archduke of Austria in 1453. In 1477 the emperor Maximilian I. acquired the domain (except the duchy of the duchal house of Burgundy by marriage with the heiress Mary, and in 1490 had all the Hapsburg possessions united in his hands by the abdication of Count Sigismund. His son Philip the Fair married Joanna the Insane, queen of Spain and Castile. Their eldest son became king of Spain as Charles I. in 1516, and emperor as Charles V. in 1519; their second son Ferdinand received the Austrian crown, to which he added by election the kingdoms of Bohemia and Hungary. The Spanish line was continued by Charles's son Philip II., and reigned 1516-1700. On the abdication of the imperial crown by Charles V. in 1556, he was succeeded by his brother Ferdinand, who continued the imperial line, the last male representative of which was Charles VI. On the death of Charles VI. in 1740, his daughter Maria Theresa succeeded to the Austrian inheritance by virtue of the pragmatic sanction (which see). She married Francis I., grand duke of Tuscany, of the house of Lorraine, who became emperor in 1745, and founded the Hapsburg-Lorraine line, members of which ruled as emperors of the Holy Roman Empire until its abolition in 1806, and have since ruled as emperors of Austria.

Hapsburg Castle. See the extract.

Hapsburg is a castle (built about A. D. 1020) in the Aargau on the banks of the Aar, and near the line of railway from Olten to Zurich, from a point on which a glimpse of it may be had. "Within the ancient walls of Vindonissa," says Gibbon, "the castle of Hapsburg, the abbey of Königsfelden, and the town of Brugg have successively arisen. The philosophic traveller may compare the monuments of Roman conquests, of feudal or Austrian tyranny, of monkish superstition, and of industrious freedom. If he be truly a philosopher, he will applaud the merit and happiness of his own time." Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, p. 213.

Haran (hä'ran). [Heb. Haran, Assyro-Babylonian Harranu, Gr. Xappäv, L. Carra or Charra.] A city in Mesopotamia, situated on the Belias (Belich, ancient Bileichs), a small affluent of the Euphrates, 10 hours southeast from Edessa. The Assyrian meaning of the name is 'road,' probably so called as the crossing-point of the Syrian, Assyrian, and Babylonian trade routes. In the Old Testament it is mentioned in connection with the patriarchs, and Ezekiel (xxvii. 23) speaks of it as a considerable trading center. It is often mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions. It was an ancient seat of the worship of the moon-god Sin; and Nabunaid, the last Babylonian king (555-538 B. C.), relates that Sin, in a dream, commanded him to restore his temple E-hul-hul ('house of joy') in Haran, which was destroyed by the Scythians during their invasion under Asurbanipal. Nabunaid thereupon restored or rather completed the restoration of the temple, and adorned the city. Haran became famous among the Romans, being near the scene of the defeat of Crassus by the Parthians. About the time of the Christian era it appears to have formed part of the kingdom of Edessa. Afterward it came with that kingdom under the dominion of the Romans. In the 4th century it was the seat of a bishop. At present it is a small village inhabited by a few Arab families.

Harmodius (här-mō'di-us) and Aristogiton (ä-ris-tō-jit'on). Killed 514 B. C. Two Athenian youths who killed Hipparchus, tyrant of Athens, in 514. They are represented as entertaining a strong affection for each other, which remained unaltered despite the endeavors of Hipparchus to withdraw that of the young and beautiful Harmodius to himself. Enraged at the indifference of Harmodius, Hipparchus put a public insult upon him by declaring his sister unworthy of carrying the sacred baskets at a religious procession, in revenge for which the youths organized a conspiracy to overthrow both Hipparchus and his brother Hippias. Harmodius and Aristogiton slew the former on the festival of the great Panathenea, but their precipitancy prevented the cooperation of the other conspirators. Harmodius was cut down by the guard. Aristogiton was captured, and, when put to the torture to reveal his accomplices, named the principal friends of Hippias, who were executed. When pressed for further revelations, he answered that there remained no one whose death he desired, except the tyrant. They are represented in a group now in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The statues are copies of the famous archaic bronze originals which stood on the ascent to the Athenian Acropolis. Both figures are striding forward; Aristogiton, a little behind, extends his left arm, over which his chlamys is wrapped, to cover Harmodius's right side. Harmodius, wholly undraped, with right arm raised, is about to strike down the tyrant. Aristogiton's head, though antique, is much later than the body.

He was the son of the Marquis of Carpio, and a nephew of the Duke of Olivares, whom he succeeded in 1643 as prime minister and favorite of Philip IV. He carried on an unsuccessful war against France, Portugal, and the Dutch, which was concluded by the treaty of the Pyrenees in 1659. He is said to have been the ablest minister which Spain produced in the 17th century. His public services were rewarded by the creation of the marquise of Carpio into a dukedom.

Harold (här'öld), surnamed "Blue-tooth" (Harald Blaatand). Died about 985. King of Denmark, son of Gorm the Old whom he succeeded about 935. He obtained the overlordship of Norway on the death of Harold Harfagr, but was forced to recognize the suzerainty of the emperors Otto I. and Otto II, by whom he was made to accept Christianity. He was expelled by his son Svend Forked-beard at the head of the pagan party, and was killed in the fight.

Harold I., surnamed "Harefoot." [ME. Harold, Harald, AS. Harold, Harald, from ODan. Harald, Icel. Haraldr.] Died at Oxford, March 17, 1040. King of the English 1035-40, illegitimate son of Canute by Ælfgifu of Northampton. At the death of his father in 1035, he became a candidate for the English crown before the witan in opposition to Canute's legitimate son Hardicanute, king of Denmark. He obtained by a compromise the region north of the Thames, while Hardicanute obtained that to the south. The absence of Hardicanute in Denmark, however, enabled him to gain many of the latter's adherents, including Godwin, earl of Wessex, and in 1037 he was chosen king over all England. He died during the preparations of Hardicanute for an invasion of England.

Harold II. Born about 1022; died Oct. 14, 1066. King of the English Jan. 6-Oct. 14, 1066, son of Godwin, earl of Wessex, and Gytha. He became earl of East Anglia about 1045; was banished with his father by Edward the Confessor in 1051, and was restored with him in 1052; succeeded his father as earl of Wessex in 1053 (giving up his earldom of East Anglia); and was the chief minister of Edward 1053-66. Probably in 1064 he was shipwrecked on the coast of Normandy and fell into the hands of William, duke of Normandy, who compelled him to take an oath whereby he promised to marry William's daughter and to assist him in securing the succession in England. He married about this time, probably on his return to England, Eadgyth or Aldgyth, widow of Gruffydd, and sister of Eadwine, earl of the Mercians; and on the death of Edward procured his own election as king, Jan. 6, 1066. He defeated his brother Tostig (who had been deposed from his earldom of Northumbria and outlawed in the previous reign) and Harold Hardrada, king of Norway, at Stamford Bridge, Sept. 25, 1066; and was defeated by William, duke of Normandy, and killed at the battle of Hastings or Senlac, Oct. 14, 1066. His mutilated body is said to have been recognized among the slain by his former mistress Edith Swan-neck, and to have been buried by William's order on the coast which he sought to defend, the grave being marked by a cairn of stones.

Harold I., surnamed Harfagr or Haarfager ('Fair-haired?'). Died in 933. King of Norway 860-930, son of Halfdan the Black. He completed the conquest of the jarls, or petty kings, begun by his father, and repressed freebooting, which caused a migration of many of the most famous vikings to Iceland and Normandy (Rollo). In 930 he divided his kingdom among his sons, of whom the eldest, Eric Blodöxe, retained the overlordship.

Harold II., surnamed Graafeld ('Gray-skin?'). Died in 963. King of the Norwegians 950-963, son of Eric Blodöxe.

Haroun-al-Rashid. See Harun-al-Rashid.

Harp (härp). The. A constellation. See Lyra.

Harpagon (är-pä-gōn'). A character in Molière's comedy "L'Avare" (taken from Plautus's "Euclio"), a miser.

Harpon does not absolutely starve the rats; he possesses horses, though he feeds them ill; he has servants, though he grudges them clothes; he even contemplates a marriage-supper at his own expense, though he intends to have a bad one. He has evidently been compelled to make some sacrifices to the usages of mankind, and is at once a more common and a more theatrical character than Euclio. Hallam.

Harpagus (här'pä-gus). A general of Cyrus. According to Herodotus, he was descended from a noble Median house, and was the confidential attendant of Astyages, who charged him with the duty of exposing Cyrus. (See Mandane.) Instead, however, of performing that duty in person, he delegated it to the herdsmen Mitradates, who substituted a still-born child of which his wife had just been delivered. When the identity of Cyrus was discovered, Astyages punished Harpagus by serving up to him as a banquet the flesh of his own son. Harpagus waited until Cyrus had grown to manhood, then incited him to rebel against Astyages, and effected the downfall of the latter by deserting with the army to Cyrus. He was afterward one of the most trusted generals in Cyrus's service, and acted a prominent part in the conquest of Asia Minor.

Harper (här'pēr), James. Born at Newtown, L. I., April 13, 1795; died at New York, March 27, 1869. An American publisher and printer, founder of the firm of Harper and Brothers. He was associated in business with his brothers Joseph Wesley (1801-70) and Fletcher (1806-77).

Harper's Ferry (här'pēr fer'i). A town in Jefferson County, West Virginia, situated at the junction of the Shenandoah with the Potomac, 49 miles northwest of Washington. It is noted for picturesque scenery. It was seized by John Brown Oct. 16, 1859. The Confederates held it from April to June, 1861. Here the Federal commander Miles surrendered to the Confederates (with Federal loss of 11,783) Sept. 15, 1862.

Harpies (här'piz). [Gr. Ἄρπυιαι, the snatchers.] In Greek mythology, winged monsters, ravenous and filthy, having the face and body of a woman and the wings of a bird of prey, with the feet and fingers armed with sharp claws and the face pale with hunger, serving as ministers of divine vengeance, and defiling everything they touched. The Harpies were commonly regarded either as two (Aello and Ocypete) or three in number, but occasionally several others were mentioned. They were originally conceived of simply as storm-winds sent by the gods to carry off offenders, and were later personified as fair-haired winged maidens, their features and characteristics being more or less repulsive at different times and places. The Harpies have been to some extent confounded by modern scholars with the Sirens, who, though of kindred origin, were goddesses of melody, even if of a sweetness that was harmful to mankind, and were represented as women in the upper parts of their bodies and as birds below.

The mummy lies on the bier, attended by Anubis, the jackal-headed god of embalment. The Soul, grasping in one hand a little sail, the emblem of breath, in the other hand the "ankh" or emblem of life, hovers over the face of the corpse. Now this Soul, this "Ba," is a loving visitor to the dead man. It brings a breath of the sweet north wind, and the cheering hope of immortality in the sunny fields of Aahlu. The Greeks, however, misapprehending its nature and functions, conceived of it as a malevolent emissary of the gods, and converted it into the Harpy. We have next the Greek conception of a Harpy, from a fragment of early Greek painted ware found at Daphne. But we have a still finer example in the illustration reproduced from the famous Harpy Tomb in the British Museum. The Harpy is carrying off one of the daughters of Pandarus. She wears a fillet and pendant curls, and, besides the claws of a bird, she has human arms like the Egyptian "Ba," wherewith to clasp her prey. The monument from which this group is copied was discovered by Sir Charles Fellows at Xanthus, in Lycia, and it dates from about five hundred and forty years before our era. Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 187.

Harpignies (är-pën-yé'), Henri Joseph. Born at Valenciennes, July, 1819. A noted French landscape-painter. He was the pupil of Achard, and first exhibited in the Salon of 1853. A number of his works are in the Luxembourg, Douai, Lille, and other museums.

Harpin (är-pän'). A character in Molière's "Comtesse d'Escarbagnas," an attack upon the financiers of the time.

Harpocrates (här-pok'ra-téz). A deity of Egyptian origin, identified with Horus, adopted by the Greeks and Romans.

Harpocration (här-pö-kra'shi-on), Valerius. Lived 2d (4th?) century. A Greek rhetorician of Alexandria, author of a lexicon of the works of the Attic orators (edited by Dindorf 1855).

All that we know of Valerius Harpocration is contained in the brief statement by Suidas that he was a rhetorician of Alexandria; and that besides the "Lexicon to the Ten Orators," which has come down to us, he wrote a book of elegant extracts, which is lost. Even the age at which he flourished is quite uncertain; for while some identify him with the Harpocration who taught Greek to the emperor L. Verus, others recognize in him either the contemporary and friend of Libanius, or the physician of Mendes, mentioned by Athenæus.

In the campaigns of Tiberius they were situated on the lower Elbe, at the base of the Cimbric peninsula. Nothing is known of their ultimate fate.

Harun-al-Rashid (hä-rön'al-rash'id or -räs'héd') ('Aaron the Just'). Calif of Bagdad 786-809, the fifth and the most renowned of the Abbassides. Under him the Eastern califate attained the height of its splendor and power. All the lands from the Jaxartes and the Indus to Gibraltar obeyed his rule, and Bagdad became a center of learning and civilization. Harun made successful expeditions into the Greek empire, forcing the emperor Nicephorus to pay tribute, while he entertained friendly relations with Charlemagne. He is, however, best known from the tales of the "Arabian Nights," in which everything curious, romantic, and wonderful is connected with his name, or is supposed to have happened in his reign.

Harvard (här'vård), John. Born at Southwark, London, 1607; died at Charlestown, Mass., Sept. 14, 1638. A clergyman in the Massachusetts colony, the first benefactor of Harvard College, to which he bequeathed his library of about 300 volumes and half of his estate. He was the son of a butcher of Southwark. London; graduated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1631; and emigrated to New England in 1637. He was for a time assistant pastor of the First Church of Charlestown.

Harvard University. The oldest and largest institution of learning in America, situated partly in Cambridge and partly in Boston, Massachusetts. The college was founded by the general court of the colony of Massachusetts Bay in 1636. Two years later the name Harvard was given to it in memory of John Harvard (see above). The university includes Harvard College, the Lawrence Scientific School, the Graduate School, the Divinity School, the Law School, the Medical School, the Dental School, the School of Veterinary Medicine, the Bussey Institution (a school of agriculture), and the Arnold Arboretum, the first five of which are situated in Cambridge, the last five in Boston; also the University Library, the Museum of Comparative Zoology (popularly known as the Agassiz Museum), the University Museum, the Botanic Gardens, the Herbarium, the Astronomical Observatory, and the Peabody Museum of American Archaeology and Ethnology, all of which are in Cambridge. It is governed by two boards—the corporation, consisting of the president, treasurer, and 5 fellows, in whom is vested the title to the property of the university; and the board of overseers, 30 in number (besides the president and treasurer). Until 1865 the State government maintained a more or less direct control over the overseers, but since then they have been chosen exclusively by the alumni of the college. The number of teachers at present (1894) is 322; of students in all departments, 3,156 (1,656 of them in the college proper). There were also 346 students in the summer schools in 1893. The endowment of the university is over $8,000,000; of its other property, including lands and buildings, over $4,000,000 more. Its annual income is about $1,000,000. Its fellowships and scholarships yield $80,000 a year. The library contains about 450,000 bound volumes, and nearly as many pamphlets and maps.

Harvey (här'vi), Gabriel. Born at Saffron Walden, Essex, 1545 (?); died there, 1630. An English author. He matriculated at Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1566, and in 1570 was elected a fellow of Pembroke. While there he became intimate with Edmund Spenser, who introduces him in "The Shepherd's Calendar" as Hobbinal. He exercised for some years an influence over Spenser's genius, from which the latter, who admired him, freed himself with difficulty. He was of an arrogant, bitter spirit, and was continuously at war with those who surrounded him. This finally culminated in a scurrilous paper warfare with Nash and Greene, which began with Greene's "Quip for an Upstart Courtier," written in retaliation for contemptuous references to himself in the writings of Harvey's brother Richard, to which Harvey replied in his "Four Letters" (1592), vituperating Greene unmercifully. Even the death of Greene, which occurred soon after, did not prevent Harvey's attempts to blacken his character. Nash now began, with great powers of invective and sarcasm, to defend his friend's memory. In his "Strange News" (1593) he proclaimed "open war" against Harvey and his brother. Harvey replied with "Pierce's Supererogation." The warfare continued till in 1596 Nash, hearing that Harvey boasted of having silenced him, "published his famous satire, 'Have with you to Saffron Walden, which he dedicated by way of farce to Richard Lichfield, barber of Trinity College, Cambridge'; and to this Harvey once more rejoined in his 'Trimming of Thomas Nashe' (1597). The scandal had, however, now reached a climax, and in 1599 it was ordered by authority "that all Nashes bookes and Dr. Harvey's bookes be taken wheresoever they may be found, and that none of the same bookes be ever printed hereafter" (Cooper, Athenæ Cant., ii. 306). (Dict. Nat. Biog.) Among his works, besides those mentioned, are "Rhetor. sive 2. Dierum Oratio de Natura, Arte et Exercitatione Rhetorica" (1577), "Ciceronianus, sive Oratio post Reditum habitæ Cantabrigiæ ad suos auditores," etc. (1577), "The Story of Mercy Harvey" (1574-75), "Letters to and from Edmund Spenser" (1579-80), "A Letter of Notable Contents" (1593).

Harvey, Sir George. Born at St. Ninian's, near Stirling, Feb., 1806; died at Edinburgh, Jan. 22, 1876. A Scottish painter, chiefly of landscapes and scenes from Scottish history and life.

Harvey, William. Born at Folkestone, Kent, April 1, 1578; died at London, June 3, 1657. A celebrated English physician, physiologist, and anatomist: the discoverer of the circulation of the blood. He was educated at Canterbury and Cambridge (Gonville and Caius College), where he graduated in 1597; studied at Padua; took the degree of doctor of medicine at Cambridge in 1602; became physician of St. Bartholomew's Hospital in 1609; was Lumleian lecturer at the College of Physicians 1615-56; and became physician extraordinary to James I. in 1618. During the civil war he sided with the Royalists, was at the battle of Edgehill, and went to Oxford with the king. His chief works are "Exercitatio de motu cordis et sanguinis" ("Essay on the Motion of the Heart and the Blood," 1628), "Exercitationes de generatione animalium" (1651).

Harvey, William. Born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, July 13, 1796; died near Richmond, England, Jan. 13, 1866. An English wood-engraver and designer. He illustrated Lane's "Arabian Nights," etc.

Harwich (har'ij). A seaport in Essex, England, situated opposite the confluence of the Stour and Orwell, in lat. 51° 56' N., long. 1° 17' E. It is a summer resort, and the terminus of steam-packet lines to Antwerp and Rotterdam. Population (1891), 8,191.

Harwood (här'wüd), Edward. Born at Darwen, Lancashire, 1729; died at London, Jan. 14, 1794. An English biblical and classical scholar. He wrote "A View of . . . Editions of the Greek and Roman Classics" (1775), etc.

Harz (här'ts), sometimes written Hartz, G. Harz or Harzeberge (här'ts'ge-hër-ge). A range of mountains in Germany, situated in Brunswick, Anhalt, and the provinces of Hannover and Saxony in Prussia: the ancient Silva Hercynia. It is divided into the Upper Harz in the northwest and the Lower Harz in the southeast, and is noted for mineral wealth and picturesque scenery. Among the chief minerals are lead, silver, iron, and copper. The highest summit is the Brocken (3,745 feet). Length of the chain, 60 miles.

Harzburg (här'ts'börg). A small town in Brunswick, in the Harz 26 miles south of Brunswick. It consists of the villages Neustadt, Bindheim, and Schlewecke, and is a noted summer resort. Near it is the Burgberg, with the ruined castle of Harzburg.

Hasan, or Hassan, and Husein (Arabic pron. hä'sen, hö-sän'). Sons of Ali and Fatima, daughter of Mohammed. Ali was Mohammed's cousin, and the first person, after his wife, who believed in him, and was declared by Mohammed his brother, delegate, and vicar. He married Fatima, the prophet's daughter, and his sons Hasan and Husein were favorites with Mohammed, who had no sons, and was expected to name Ali as his successor. At Mohammed's death in 632 Ali was passed over, and Abu-Bekr, Omar, and Othman became successively califs. On Othman's assassination (655) Ali accepted the califate, but was resisted by Moawiyah, who had set himself up as calif, and with whom he fought a bloody but indecisive battle in Mesopotamia. Shortly after Ali was fatally stabbed by an enthusiast in the mosque of Kufa. The Mohammedan world is divided into the two great sects of Shiaks and Sunis. The Shiaks reject the first three califs as usurpers, and begin with Ali as the first lawful successor of Mohammed; the Sunis recognize Abu-Bekr, Omar, and Othman as well as Ali, and regard the Shiaks as impious heretics. Husein, one of Ali's sons, married the daughter of Yezdigerd, the last Sassanian king of Persia, whence Persia became specially connected with the house of Ali. Moawiyah died in 680. His son Yezid succeeded him as calif at Damascus. During Moawiyah's reign, Ali's sons, the imams Hasan and Husein, lived in retirement at Medina; but when Moawiyah died the people of Kufa sent offers to Husein to make him calif. He set out for Kufa with his family and relatives to the number of 80. Then ensued the tragedy of Kerbela, familiar to every Mohammedan. In a battle on the plain of Kerbela, Husein and his men were slain. The women and children were afterward taken in chains to Damascus. The sufferings of the "Family of the Tent," as the imam Husein and his companions at Kerbela are called, and the death of Hasan, who was poisoned by his wife, form the subject of a Persian tazya (see Tazya), or religious drama, resembling the Oberammergau "Passion Play." This drama, which has sprung up within the present century, plays a great part in the religious life of the Persia of today. See "A Persian Passion Play" in Matthew Arnold's "Essays in Criticism."

Hasbeiya (hä's-bä'yä). A town of the Druses in Syria, Asiatic Turkey, 36 miles west by south of Damascus: perhaps the biblical Baal-Hermon.

Hasdrubal (has'drö-bäl), or Asdrubal (as'dru-bäl). A Carthaginian officer of high rank in the army of Hannibal in Italy. He contributed greatly to the victory of Cannæ in 216 B. C. by a cavalry charge on the rear of the Roman infantry after having put the Roman horse to rout.

Hasdrubal, or Asdrubal. Died in Spain, 221 B. C. A Carthaginian general and politician. He rose to prominence as a leader of the democratic party at Carthage in the interval between the first and second Punic wars, and married a daughter of Hamilcar Barca, whom he accompanied to Spain in 238. He subsequently returned to Africa to assume command in a war against the Numidians, whom he reduced to submission. In 229 he succeeded his father-in-law as commander in Spain, where he founded the city of New Carthage, and largely extended the Carthaginian power. He was assassinated by a slave whose master he had put to death.

Hasdrubal, or Asdrubal. Died 203 B. C. A Carthaginian general, son of Hamilcar Barca and brother of Hannibal. He was left in charge of the Carthaginian forces in Spain when Hannibal set out on his expedition to Italy in 218. He maintained the war against the Romans under the brothers Cneius and Publius Scipio with varied success until 212, when, having been reinforced by two armies under Mago and Hasdrubal, son of Gisco, he was enabled to inflict a decisive defeat upon Cneius, who fell in the battle, Publius having been killed a short time previously in a cavalry engagement. He was defeated by Scipio Africanus at Bæcula in 209, and probably in the same year crossed the Pyrenees on his way to join his brother in Italy. He crossed the Alps in 207, but was attacked and defeated by the Romans under C. Nero and M. Livius on the Metaurus in the same year before he could effect a junction with Hannibal. He fell in the engagement, and, according to Livy, his severed head was thrown into the camp of Hannibal by the victorious Romans.

Hasdrubal, or Asdrubal. Died about 200 B. C. A Carthaginian general, son of Gisco. He was sent to Spain with an army in 214, and on the departure about 209 of Hasdrubal, son of Hamilcar, on his expedition to join Hannibal in Italy was left with Mago in command of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. He was defeated with his colleague at Sîpia or Elinga by Scipio Africanus in 206; was in command of an army opposed to Scipio in Africa in 204, when his camp near Utica was fired by the Romans and nearly the whole of his army destroyed; and is said by some authorities to have taken poison to escape the fury of the Carthaginian populace.

Hasdrubal, or Asdrubal. A Carthaginian general. He was commander-in-chief in the war against Masinissa in 150 B. C. Having sustained a decisive defeat, he was punished with exile. He was, however, recalled on the outbreak of the third Punic war in 149, and was placed in command of the forces outside the walls of Carthage. He defeated the consul Manlius in two engagements at Nephesis about 148. He subsequently became commander of the forces within the city, which he defended with great obstinacy against Scipio in 146. He finally surrendered, and, after granting the triumph of Scipio, was allowed to spend the rest of his life in honorable captivity. It is said that at the time of his surrender his wife upbraided him with cowardice, and threw herself and her children into the flames of the temple in which she had taken refuge.

Hasis-Adra (hä'sis-ä'drä). One of the persons in the Izdubar legends, or the Babylonian Nimrod epic, ancestor of Izdubar or Gilgamesh. He is one of the heroes of that poem, and attained immortality and a life with the gods. When Izdubar comes to him and asks him how he obtained this distinction, he relates to him the story of the deluge, which forms a counterpart to the accounts of Berossus and of Genesis. He was living, he relates, in Surripak, an ancient city on the Euphrates (Sippar or Sepharvaim), when Ea, the god of the ocean, apprised him of the decision of the gods to cause a flood, and advised him to build a ship and to save himself, his family, friends, and goods. This he did. When the waters of the flood disappeared he left the ship, which rested on a mountain, and offered a sacrifice to the gods. After this he disappeared, and a voice from heaven informed his companions that he had been translated to the gods to live forever as a reward for his piety. He is therefore rightly termed the "Babylonian Noah." In Berossus he is called Xisuthros, and is represented as the last of the first 10 mythical kings of Babylonia. His name in the inscriptions is also sometimes read Shamash-ur Cit-ur Pir-Napisistim, ("sun" or "fruit" or "product of life").

Hastings, Francis Rawdon, first Marquis of Hastings. Born Dec. 9, 1754; died off Naples, Nov. 28, 1826. An English general. He served in the American war, during which he defeated the Americans at the battle of Hobkirk's Hill in 1781. He was raised to the peerage as Baron Rawdon in 1783; succeeded his father as earl of Moira in 1793; was appointed master-general of the ordnance 1806; was governor-general of India 1813-23; was created marquis of Hastings in 1816; and was governor of Malta 1824-26.

Hastings, Warren. Born at Churchill, Oxfordshire, England, Dec. 6, 1732; died Aug. 22, 1818. An English statesman. He went out to Calcutta as a writer in the East India service in 1750; became a member of the council at Calcutta in 1761; returned to England in 1764; went out as a member of the council at Madras in 1769; and became governor of Bengal in 1772, and first governor-general of India in 1774. In 1781 he expelled Raja Chait Singh, zemindar of Benares, who refused a demand for a war contribution against the Mahrattas; and in 1782 confiscated a portion of the lands and treasure of the mother of the Nawab of Oudh (the Begum of Oudh), who had rendered assistance to Chait Singh. He returned to England in 1785, and in 1787 was impeached on the charge of high crimes and misdemeanors, based chiefly on his conduct in reference to Chait Singh and the Begum of Oudh. The trial opened before the House of Lords in 1788, and resulted in an acquittal in 1795.

Hastings, William, Lord Hastings. Born about 1430; executed at the Tower, London, June 14, 1483. An English Yorkist nobleman. His services in the civil war were rewarded by Edward IV. with many appointments: he was made master of the mint 1461, receiver of the revenues of Cornwall 1463, grand chamberlain of the royal household 1461-63, chamberlain of North Wales 1461-63, lieutenant of Calais 1471. In 1475 he was sent to France with an invading army, and a treaty of peace followed. In 1461 he was created Baron Hastings. He swore allegiance to Edward's eldest son, but was on bad terms with the queen. After the king's death, Gloucester, failing to bring him to agree with his plans, charged him with treason at a council held in the Tower, and he was taken out and beheaded at once. Shakespeare dramatized Sir Thomas More's account of this in "Richard III." His grandson was the first earl of Huntingdon.

Hatasu (hä'tü-sö), or Hatchepset (hät-chep'set). A famous Egyptian queen, daughter of Thothmes I. of the 18th dynasty, and sister and wife of Thothmes II. After the death of the latter she reigned as queen. She was succeeded by her younger brother, Thothmes III.

Her tomb was discovered by Mr. Rhind, in 1841, excavated in the cliff-side, in the near vicinity of her temple; but its identity appears since then to have been forgotten. Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 297.

It has pleased historians to rank Thothmes II. as the immediate successor of Thothmes I., and to place the reign of Queen Hatasu between the reigns of her two brothers, Thothmes II. and Thothmes III. By some she is described as Queen Consort during the reign of Thothmes II., and as Queen-regent during the earlier years of the reign of Thothmes III. By others, and most emphatically by Dr. Brugsch, she is stigmatized as a usurper. As a matter of fact, however, Hatasu was actually Queen, and Queen-regent, during the lifetime of her father. Her accession, therefore, dates from a long time preceding that of her brother, Thothmes II. An important historical inscription sculptured on one of the pylons of the Great Temple of Karnak records this event in eighteen columns of hieroglyphic text, which were copied and translated by the late Vicomte E. de Rougé in 1827. Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 261.

Hatchway (häch'wä), Jack. In Smollett's "Peregrine Pickle," a retired naval officer, the friend and companion of Commodore Truncheon.

Hathaway (hath'a-wä), Anne. See Shakespeare. Hathor (hä'thor). In Egyptian mythology, an important deity, a female counterpart of Osiris, sometimes replacing him, and worshipped in all Egypt. She is with difficulty distinguishable from Isis, like whom she is the patroness of the cow and wears the solar disk with cow's horns. She had a great number of local forms and names.

Hathorne (hä'thörn), William. Born in Wiltshire, England, 1608; died at Salem, Mass., 1681. An American colonial official. He emigrated to America in 1630; settled at Salem in 1636; was a member of the commission appointed by the general court of Massachusetts Bay to treat with the French agent D'Aulney in 1645; was speaker of the general court of Massachusetts Bay 1644-51; and was a member of the board of assistants 1662-79. He was one of the five patriots whom Charles II. ordered to be sent to England in 1696 to answer to the charge of refusing to submit to the authority of the royal commissioners.

Hatras (hä'träs'), or Hathras (hä-thräs'). A trading town in the Aligarh district, North-west Provinces, British India, situated in lat. 27° 36' N., long. 78° 5' E. Population, about 25,000.

Hatshepsu. See Hatasu.

Hattemists (hat'em-ists). A sect in the Netherlands, founded about 1683 by a deposed clergyman, Pontianus van Hattem. The founder was a Spinozist who denied the expiatory sacrifice of Christ and the freedom of the will, and affirmed that sin exists only in the imagination, and is itself its only punishment. The sect disappeared in a few years.

Hatteraick (hat'er-äk), Dirk. A smuggler in Sir Walter Scott's novel "Guy Mannering."

Hatteras (hat'er-as), Cape. A sandy point on the coast of North Carolina, projecting into the Atlantic. Lat. of lighthouse, 35° 15' 14' N.; long., 75° 31' 17' W. Violent storms occur in the vicinity.

Hattingen (hät'ting-en). A town in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, 22 miles northeast of Düsseldorf. Population (1890), commune, 7,248.

Hatto (hät'tö) I. Archbishop of Mainz 891-913. He became regent of Germany on the accession of Ludwik the Child in 900, and continued to exercise a predominant influence in German politics until his death. He sought to strengthen the royal authority at the expense of an unruly nobility, a policy which caused him to be feared and hated by a considerable part of the people. According to a medieval legend, he was carried away by the devil and thrown into the crater of Etna.

Hatto II. Died 969 or 970. Archbishop of Mainz. He became abbot of Fulda in 942 or 943, and in 968 was appointed by the emperor Otto I. to succeed William of Saxony in the archbishopric of Mainz. According to a medieval legend, which was incorporated with the "Magdeburg Centuries," he was eaten alive by mice as a punishment for having burned to the ground a barn full of people caught stealing grain during a famine, whose dying shrieks he likened to the piping of mice. He is further represented as having built the Mouse Tower in the Rhine in a vain endeavor to escape from his assailants.

Hatton, Sir Christopher. Born at Holdenby, Northamptonshire, in 1340; died at Ely House, London, Nov. 20, 1591. Lord Chancellor of England. His relations with the queen were intimate. She appointed him lord chancellor April 25, 1587. He was called "the dancing chancellor," in allusion to the fact that he first attracted the attention of Queen Elizabeth by his graceful dancing at a mask at court.

Hatuey (ä-tö-äy'). Died in 1512. An Indian chief, originally of the district of Guajabá in Haiti. In 1510 or 1511 he and his followers fled from the tyranny of the Spaniards, and established themselves in the eastern part of Cuba. They resisted Velasquez, but were soon defeated, and Hatuey was captured and burned. His story is a favorite theme of Cuban novelists and poets.

Hatun Raymi (ä'tön rä'ímé), or Raymi. The great feast of the ancient Peruvian Indians.

celebrated especially at Cuzeo at the end of August. It was a thanksgiving for the harvest. Prises were offered to the supreme deity and to the sun, moon, and lesser divinities. There were solemn dances and processions from the Temple of the Sun, and the feasting and rejoicing lasted many days. Some authors state that a child or maiden was at times sacrificed during the feast, but this is very doubtful.

Hatun-runas. See Piruas.

Hatvan (hot'von). A town in the county of Heves, Hungary, situated on the Zagyva 32 miles east-northeast of Budapest. Population (1890), 6,979.

Hatzfeld (häts'felt), Hung. Zsombolya (zhomböl'yä). A town in the county of Torontal, Hungary, situated in lat. 45° 48' N., long. 20° 44' E. Population (1890), 9,580.

Hauch (houh), Johannes Carsten v. Born at Frederikshald, Norway, May 12, 1790; died at Rome, March 4, 1872. A Danish poet and dramatist. His childhood was spent in Norway. In 1803 he went to Copenhagen, where he subsequently studied at the university. After taking, in 1821, the degree of doctor, he traveled in Germany, France, and Italy. Six years later he returned to Denmark, and was appointed lector at the Sorø Academy. He was subsequently (1846) for a short time professor in Kiel. In 1851 he was appointed successor of Ohlenschläger as professor of esthetics in the University of Copenhagen, a position which he held until his death. His principal works are the tragedy "Tiberius" and the drama "Gregorius den Syvende," both written during his first journey to Italy; the historical novels "Vilhelm Zabern" (1834), "Guldmagern" ("The Alchemist," 1836), "En polsk Familie" ("A Polish Family," 1839), "Slottet ved Rhinen" ("The Castle on the Rhine," 1845), "Robert Fulton" (1853), "Charles de la Bassière" (1859); and the later dramas "Svend Grathe," "Sostrene paa Kinnekullen" ("The Sisters of Kinnekullen"), "Tycho Brahes Ungdom" ("Tycho Brahe's Youth"), "Aeren tabt og vunden" ("Ifonor Lost and Found"). A volume of lyric poems, "Lyriske Digte," appeared in 1842; "Lyriske Digte og Romancer" ("Lyric Poems and Romances") in 1861; and "Nye Digtinger" ("New Poetical Works") in 1860.

Hauck (hâk), Minnie. Born at New York, Nov. 16, 1852. An American mezzo-soprano singer. She made her first appearance in concert at New Orleans about 1865; in opera at New York in 1868. She has sung with great success in Europe and the United States. She made the success of Bizet's opera "Carmen" at London in 1873: it had not pleased on its first production.

Hausa, or Haussa (hou'sä). A country and nation situated north of the junction of the Niger with the Binne River, in central Sudan. Hausa-land is almost coextensive with the modern kingdom of Sokoto. The Haussas form the most important nation of the Sudan. They belong to the Nigritic branch of the Bantu-negro race, slightly mixed with Hamitic elements. According to their own tradition, their father was a negro and their mother a Berber. The Guber section is of Coptic descent. The Haussas are Mohammedans, semi-civilized, great traders, and able craftsmen. In the slaving times Hausa slaves were in great demand; to-day, Hausa soldiers constitute a large portion of the British and Congo State forces. In the middle ages the Haussas formed a great negro kingdom, which subsequently broke up into small states. About the 16th century the Fulahs or Fulbe began to get a foothold among them, and in 1502 Othman dan Fodio founded in Hausa-land a great Fulah empire. From this, divided among his sons, sprang the modern sultanates of Sokoto, Gando, and Alamawa. The Hausa language is spoken far beyond Hausa-land. It is euphonious, simple and regular in structure, and eminently fit to become a literary language. The principal dialects are those of Katsena (the literary standard), Kano, Guber, and Daura.

Hauser (hou'zer), Kaspar. Died at Ansbach, Bavaria, Dec. 17, 1833. A German founding. He appeared at Nuremberg in 1828, and was taken into custody by the police, to whom he gave his name as Kaspar Hauser. He carried on his person a letter, purporting to have been written by a Bavarian laborer, which stated that the bearer had been found at the writer's door, Oct. 7, 1812. A note was inclosed, which purported to have been written by the mother. It stated that the founding's name was Kaspar; that he was born April 30, 1812; that his father was a captain in the Sixth Cheval-léger Regiment at Nuremberg; and that his mother was a poor girl. The boy said that he had been confined in a dark room all his life, until one night a man placed a letter in his hand and directed him on the road to Nuremberg. He was placed by the city under the care of Professor G. Fr. Daumer, and was subsequently adopted by Lord Stanhope, who sent him to Ansbach. He died in consequence of a wound which he asserted he had received at the hands of an unknown person who had enticed him to a rendezvous by the promise of information as to his origin. His story underwent many romantic changes in popular imagination.

Häusser (hois'ser), Ludwig. Born at Kleeberg, Lower Alsace, Oct. 26, 1818; died at Heidelberg, Baden, March 17, 1867. A German historian, professor at Heidelberg. Havelock the Dane, The Lay of. An Anglo-Danish story, composed before 1300. It contains the legend of the town of Grimsby. There is a French lay called "Le lai d'Havelok le Danois." It is a translation of a French romance called "Le lai de Avelec," written in the first half of the 12th century, and probably founded on an Anglo-Saxon original. It has been edited by Sir F. Madden for the Roxburghe Club (1828), and reprinted for the Early English Text Society by the Rev. W. W. Skeat (1868). Havelock was the son of the Danish king Birka-been. He was put to sea by treachery, and was saved by Grim, a fisherman, who brought him up as his son. Grim was rewarded by the king when the truth was discovered, and with the money given him built Grimsby, or Grim's town.

Havilah (hav'i-lä). In the description of Eden in Gen. ii., a land mentioned as encompassed by the Pishon, one of the four rivers which go out from Eden, and as containing gold and bedolach and shoham stone. As Pishon has been identified with almost all rivers, so Havilah was sought and found in all parts of the earth, notably in Armenia (Colchis) and India. Frederick Delitzsch, who locates Eden in Mesopotamia near Babylonia (see Eden), identifies Havilah with the tract immediately to the south and west of the Euphrates. Havilah is also enumerated in Gen. x. 7 among the sons of Cush, son of Ham; in Gen. x. 29 among the sons of Joktan, a descendant of Shem; and in Gen. xxv. 18 it appears as the southeastern limit of the Ishmaelite Arabs. It perhaps designates the east or southeast of Arabia on the Persian Gulf, in which region, according to Strabo, a tribe by the name of Chauloteans lived, who were neighbors of the Nabateans and Hazarenes. On the other hand, the Analite of the classical writers (Ptoiy, VI. 28), a people with a town Analis (now Zella) on the African coast, south of the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, would answer to the Cushite Havilah.

Haviland (hav'i-land), John. Born at Gundenham, Somersetshire, in 1793; died at Philadelphia, March 28, 1852. An English architect. He studied with James Elmes. In 1815 he went to Russia to enter the imperial corps of engineers. The following year he went to the United States, where he made a study of penitentiary buildings; among them were that at Pittsburgh, the first designed on the radiating principle advocated by Jeremy Bentham; the Eastern Penitentiary at Philadelphia; the Tombs, New York; and the State penitentiaries of

New Jersey, Missouri, and Rhode Island. He also designed the United States Naval Asylum at Norfolk, the United States Mint at Philadelphia, and other public buildings. His prisons were considered standard at the time, and were visited by commissioners from England, France, Russia, and Prussia.

Havre (ä'vr), Le, or Havre, formerly Havre-de-Grâce (ä'vr-dè-gräs'). [F., 'the Haven,' 'the Haven of Grace': a chapel of Notre Dame de Grâce, 'our Lady of Grace,' formerly existed there.] A seaport in the department of Seine-Inférieure, France, situated at the mouth of the Seine in lat. 49° 29' N., long. 0° 7' E. It is the second seaport of France, and the terminus of several steamship lines; has about one fifth of the whole foreign trade of France (especially with America); and is noted for its docks and ship-building yards. The Church of Notre Dame and the museum are of interest. Bernardin de Saint Pierre and Casimir Delavigne were born here. The town was founded by Louis XII.; was developed by Francis I.; was occupied by the English in 1562-63; and was unsuccessfully attacked by the English in 1694. Population (1891), commune, 116,369.

Hawaii (hä-wi'é). The largest and southeast-ernmost of the Hawaiian Islands. The surface is mountainous. It contains the volcanoes Mauna Kea, Mauna Loa, and Kilauea. The chief town is Hilo. Area, 4,210 square miles.

Hawaiian Islands (hä-wi'yan i'landz), or Hawaii, or Sandwich Islands (sänd'wich i'landz). A group of islands in the North Pacific, about lat. 18° 55'-22° 15' N., long. 154° 50'-160° 15' W. Capital, Honolulu. The chief islands are Hawaii, Maui, Oahu, Kauai, Lanai, Kahului, Molokai, Nihaui. The surface is largely mountainous and volcanic. The chief export is sugar; other exports are rice, bananas, and wool. The inhabitants are native Hawaiians (35,000, decreasing), Chinese (15,301), Japanese (12,369), Portuguese (8,692), Americans (1,928), British (1,344), Germans (1,034), etc. The islands were discovered by Gaetano in 1542, and rediscovered in 1778 by Cook (who gave them the name Owhyhee). The government was consolidated by Kamehameha I. (who died in 1819) and idolatry was abolished in 1819; the next year the American missionaries arrived. A constitution was granted in 1840, and a more liberal one in 1887. The government was a monarchy, with king, cabinet, and legislature (consisting of a house of nobles and house of representatives). The queen, Liliuokalani (who ascended the throne in 1891), on Jan. 15, 1893, attempted to force the cabinet to approve a new constitution designed to give greater power to the crown and to the native population. This they declined to do. On Jan. 17, 1893, the queen was deposed by a committee of public safety, and a provisional government was formed, headed by Mr. Sanford B. Dole, which was to retain office until a treaty of annexation with the United States should be concluded. Such a treaty was sent to the Senate by President Harrison, but it was withdrawn by President Cleveland on the ground that the revolution in Hawaii was wrongfully accomplished by the aid of the American minister, Mr. Stevens, and the American naval force, and that the queen should be reestablished on her throne. His effort to accomplish this end by diplomatic means failed. A republic was proclaimed July 4, 1894.

He has written "A Man of Mark" (1890), "Father Stafford," "Sport Royal," "A Change of Air," "The Prisoner of Zenda," "The Dolly Dialogues," "The Indiscretion of the Duchess," etc.

Hawkins, or Hawkyns (hä'kinz), Sir John. Born at Plymouth, 1532; died at sea off Porto Rico, Nov. 12, 1595. An English naval hero. In 1502, 1504, and 1507 he carried cargoes of slaves from Africa to the West Indies and the Spanish main. Several English noblemen, and, it is said, Queen Elizabeth, had a financial interest in these voyages. The trade was a violation of Spanish law, and ultimately Hawkins was attacked by a Spanish fleet in the harbor of Vera Cruz, and escaped with difficulty, after losing most of his ships (Sept. 24, 1568). In 1573 he was made treasurer of the English navy. As rear-admiral he took a prominent part in the defeat of the Spanish Armada (Aug., 1588), and was knighted. He was with Frobisher on the Portuguese coast in 1590, and died while second in command in Drake's expedition to the West Indies.

His chief work is "A General History of the science and Practice of Music" (1776).

Hawkins, or Hawkyns, Sir Richard. Born about 1562; died at London, April 17, 1622. An English naval hero, son of Sir John Hawkins (1532-95). He was early engaged in West Indian enterprises; took part in the defeat of the Armada, Aug., 1588, and in the descent on the Portuguese coast in 1590; and in June, 1593, started on a voyage around the world in the Dainty. After touching in Brazil, he passed the Strait of Magellan, and took and plundered Valparaiso; but he was defeated and captured after a hard fight in San Mateo Bay, Peru, June 22, 1594. Taken to Lima, he was sent to Spain in 1597 and imprisoned until 1602, when he was ransomed. Subsequently he was vice-admiral of Devon, and second in command in Sir Robert Mansell's fleet against the Algerian pirates, 1620-21.

Haymarket Square Riot, The. A riot at Haymarket Square in Randolph street, immediately north of Des Plaines street, Chicago, May 4, 1886, in which 7 policemen were killed and 60 wounded while attempting to disperse a meeting of anarchists. The injuries of the policemen were caused chiefly by a dynamite bomb thrown by some one in the crowd, supposed to have been a person named Schmanbel, who was never arrested. The anarchists August Spies, Adolph Fischer, George Engel, and Albert R. Parsons were hanged, Nov. 11, 1887, for complicity in the riot, while Louis Lingg escaped the gallows by committing suicide in prison. Samuel Fielden and Michael Schwab were committed to prison for life, and Oscar W. Neebe for a term of 15 years.

Haymarket Theatre. A London theater standing in the Haymarket opposite Charles street. Next to Drury Lane no theater in London is so rich in theatrical tradition as "the Little Theatre in the Haymarket." During the patent monopoly it was a kind of chapel of ease or training-house to Drury Lane and Covent Garden. In 1720 one John Potter purchased the site of an old inn, the King's Head, in the Haymarket, and erected there a small theater. The house was leased to a company of French actors, and opened with "La fille à la mode, ou le Bateau de Paris," under the patronage of the Duke of Montague. For some years after it was called "the New French Theatre." Fielding's is the first great name connected with this theater. In 1730 he produced "The Tragedy of Tragedies, or Tom Thumb the Great," and became manager in 1734. In Feb., 1744, Charles Macklin opened the Haymarket with a company largely composed of his own pupils. On April 22, 1747, Samuel Foote assumed the management. In 1766 he obtained a patent for the theater during his lifetime. In 1776 Foote sold the theater to Colman the elder, who managed it till 1794. When Harris became manager in 1820, he demolished the old house (its site is now occupied by the Café de l'Europe), and erected a new one a little farther north. It was opened July 4, 1821, with "The Rivals." The present theater was built in 1880.

Hazael (haz'a-el or hā'zā-el). ['God sees,'] A Syrian officer who, after murdering Ben-hadad II., became king of Damascus about 850 B. C. He was engaged in hostilities with Abaziah, king of Israel, and Joram, king of Judah (2 Ki. viii. 28), and later with Jehu, king of Israel, and seems to have held the kingdom of Israel in a kind of dependence. Toward the close of his life he attacked Judah, taking Gath, and was induced by Joash to retire from Jerusalem only through gifts (2 Ki. xii.). In the cuneiform inscriptions he is mentioned by the name of Haza-ilu. He renewed the war with Assyria first undertaken by Ben-hadad in alliance with Hittites, Hamatites, and Phoenicians, but was defeated by Shalmaneser II. and besieged in his capital, Damascus, in 842. Three years later Shalmaneser again entered Syria, and took some of its strongholds. Haza-ilu, as the name of Arabian kings, occurs in the inscriptions of Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal.

Heavenfield, Battle of (634? 635). A battle fought near the wall of Antoninus in the north of England, where Oswald of Northumbria defeated the Britons under Cadwallon (Cadwalla), who fell in the engagement. According to legend, Oswald entertained a vision of St. Columba, the founder of Iona, in a dream the night before the battle. The apparition shrouded the English camp with its mantle, and said to Oswald, "Be strong, and do like a man: lo! I am with thee." On the morrow Oswald communicated his dream to the army, which, with the enthusiasm born of peril, pledged itself to become Christian if it conquered in the fight: for in the whole Northumbrian host only Oswald and 12 nobles from Iona were Christians. So Oswald, assisted by his soldiers, set up a cross of wood as a standard, and the field of battle was in after times called Heaven's field, in allusion to the miraculous intervention of heaven of which it was the scene.

Heber, Richard. Born at Westminster, England, 1773; died Oct., 1833. An English book-collector, half-brother of Reginald Heber.

Hébert (à-bàr'), Antoine Auguste Ernest. Born at Grenoble, France, Nov. 3, 1817. A French painter.

Hébert, Jacques René, surnamed Le Père Duchesne. Born at Alençon, France, 1755; died at Paris, March 24, 1794. A notorious French revolutionist. He was of obscure parentage and limited education, and at the beginning of the French Revolution was living in poverty at Paris, having lost at least two situations through malversation. On the outbreak of the Revolution he acquired influence in the clubs as a scurrilous and violent but ready speaker and writer, and was chosen to edit a new Revolutionary paper called "Le Père Duchesne" from a popular constitutional paper of the same name. He became widely known in the provinces and in the army under the name of his paper; was a leader of the most violent faction in the Revolutionary Commune after Aug. 10, 1792; and was appointed substitute to the procureur syndic Sept. 2 following. On May 24, 1793, he was arrested by order of the more moderate party in the Commune, but was released in consequence of a demonstration in his favor by the mob. He instituted, in conjunction with Chaumette and Anacharsis Clootz, the worship of the goddess Reason, and organized the ultra-revolutionary party known as the Hébertists or enragés. He was the principal witness before the Revolutionary tribunal against Marie Antoinette, whom he accused of incest with her son, and procured the downfall of Fabre d'Églantine, Desmoulins, and Danton. He was sent to the guillotine by Robespierre, and died amid the jeers of the mob whose passion for blood he had helped to arouse.

Hebrew (hè'brò). The language spoken by the Hebrews, one of the northern or Canaanitic divisions of the Semitic family of languages. It is the language of the books of the Old Testament (with the exception of portions of Daniel and Ezra), and became extinct as a vernacular tongue 3 centuries before the Christian era. It is still the language of the synagogue, and is employed as a scholars' language; has an extensive post-biblical and even modern literature; and is becoming the vernacular of the Jews of Palestine.

Hebrew Melodies. A collection of poems by Lord Byron, published in 1815.

Hebrews (hè'bröz). [Aram. 'ebrayá, Heb. 'ibrí (pl. 'ibrim), a Hebrew, referred to an eponymous Eber or Heber: orig. 'those of the other side' (of the Euphrates).] The members of that branch of the Semitic family of mankind descended, according to tradition, from Heber, the great-grandson of Shem, in the line of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: the Israelites; the Jews.

These tribes, first of all trans-Euphratian, which had become, by crossing the stream, cis-Euphratian, took the generic name of Hebrew ('ibrim, 'those of the other side'), though we do not know whether they took it when they placed the Euphrates between themselves and their brethren who remained in the Paddan-Aram, or whether it was the Canaanites who called them "those from beyond," or, to be more accurate, "those who had crossed the river."

Rosen, Hist. of the People of Israel, I. 76.

Hebrews, Epistle to the. One of the books of the New Testament, addressed to Christians of Hebrew birth dwelling in Rome, or perhaps in Palestine or Alexandria. Its chief object is to present a parallel between the symbolism of the Old Testament dispensation and the life work of Christ. The author is unknown—perhaps Barnabas, or less probably Apollos. The authorship has often been ascribed to the apostle Paul, but this view is contrary to the weight of authority of the early church, and is opposed by most modern scholars. A probable date of composition is about A. D. 65.

Hebrides (heb'ri-déz), or Western Isles. [NL. Hebrides, an error for L. Hebudes (Pliny), var. of Hebudæ, Gr. Ἡβουδαι (Ptolemy), pl. of Ἡβουδα, applied to the principal island.] A group of islands west of Scotland, the ancient Hebudæ (Ptolemy) or Hebudes (Pliny). It comprises the Outer Hebrides (Lewis and Harris, which together form the largest island, North Uist, South Uist, Barra, and smaller islands) and the Inner Hebrides (Skye, Mull, Iona, Eigg, Coll, Tiree, Colonsay, Jura, Islay, and smaller islands). Bute and Arran are also sometimes included in the Hebrides. The islands are noted for picturesque scenery. Politically they form part of Scotland, Lewis (or the Lewes) being in Ross-shire, and the rest of the group partly in Inverness and partly in Argyll. The early Celtic inhabitants were Christianized by Columba. The islands were colonized from Norway in the 9th century; were ceded by Norway to Scotland in 1266; and were ruled by the "Lords of the Isles" in the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries. The inhabited islands number about 120. Area, about 3,000 square miles. Population, about 100,000.

Hebrides, New. See New Hebrides.

Hebron (hè'brón). [Heb., 'association' or 'friendship.'] A city in Palestine, situated on a hill among the mountains of Judah, about 7 hours south of Jerusalem. It is one of the oldest existing biblical towns. According to Num. xiii. 22, it was built 7 years before Zaan (i. e. Tanis, the capital of Lower Egypt), and Josephus says that in his day it was 2,300 years old. Its former name was Kirith Arba (Josh. xiv. 13). It was the home and burial-place of the patriarchs. Afterward it became an important city in the territory of Judah. David resided here the first 7 years of his reign. Later it was taken possession of by the Idumeans, from whom Judas Maccabeus recaptured it (1 Mac. v. 65). At present it has about 10,000 inhabitants, of whom 500 are Jews: the rest are Mohammedans. As the city of Abraham it is called by Mohammedans Al-Halil ('City of the Friend of God'). Upon the traditional site of the burial-place of the patriarchs, Machpelah, a magnificent mosque is erected, accessible only to Mohammedans: a special firman of the sultan was required for the admittance of the Prince of Wales in 1862, the Marquis of Bute in 1866, and the Crown Prince of Prussia in 1869. Dean Stanley and Major Conder have examined the mosque, and described the supposed cave.

Hebrus (hè'brus). [Gr. Ἡβρος.] The ancient name of the river Maritza.

Hecataeus (hek-a-tè'us) of Abdera. A Greek philosopher and historian who lived about 520 B. C. He was a pupil of the Sceptic Pyrrho, and appears to have accompanied Alexander the Great on his Asiatic expedition. He wrote a work on the Hyperboreans, and another on Egypt. Some critics also attribute to him a work on the Jews. An edition of the extant fragments of his works has been published by P. Zorn ("Hecatei Abderite Fragmenta," 1780).

Hecataeus of Miletus. Died about 476 B. C. A Greek geographer and historian. He was the son of Hecatesander, and was descended from an ancient and illustrious family at Miletus. He traveled in Egypt and elsewhere to obtain materials for his works. He tried to dissuade the Ionians from the revolt against the Persians in 500, and subsequently served as ambassador to Artaphernes, whom he prevailed upon to treat the conquered insurgents with mildness. He wrote "Periegesis" (περιήγησις), etc., the extant fragments of which have been edited by R. H. Klausen ("Hecatei Milesii Fragmenta," 1831).

Hecate (hek'ā-tē). [Gr. Ἑκάτη.] In Greek mythology, a goddess akin to Artemis, of Thracian origin. She combined the attributes of Demeter or Ceres, Rhea, Cybele, Artemis or Diana, and Persephone or Proserpine, with whom, as a goddess of the infernal regions, she was to some extent identified, and in this character was represented as practising and teaching through her emissaries sorcery and witchcraft. She played an important part in later demonology.

Hechingen (heh'ing-en). A small town in the province of Hohenzollern, Prussia, situated 31 miles south-southwest of Stuttgart. Population (1890), 3,743.

Hecker (hek'er), Friedrich Karl Franz. Born at Eichersheim, Baden, Sept. 28, 1811; died at St. Louis, March 24, 1881. A German revolutionist, leader with Struve of the insurrection in Baden in 1848. He settled in the United States in 1849.

Hecker (hek'er), Isaac Thomas. Born at New York city, Dec. 18, 1819; died there, Dec. 22, 1888. An American Roman Catholic ecclesiastic. He was at one time a member of the Brook Farm Community. He became a priest in 1849, founded in 1858 the order of the Paulists, of which he was appointed superior, and established the "Catholic World" in 1865.

Heckewelder (hek'e-wel-der), John Gottlieb Ernest. Born at Bedford, England, March 12, 1743; died at Bethlehem, Pa., Jan. 21, 1823. A Moravian missionary among the Indians.

Heckmondwike (hek'mond-wik). A town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, England, 8 miles southwest of Leeds. Population (1891), 9,709.

Hekla, or Hekla (hek'lā). [Icel. Hekla, short for Old Icel. Heklu-fjall, fell or hill of the hood (sc. of snow?); heklu, gen. of hekla, a cowed or hooded froek.] A volcano in the south-western part of Iceland, 70 miles east of Reykjavik. It is noted for the frequency and violence of its eruptions. Height, 5,108 feet.

Hector (hek'tor). [Gr. Ἑκτωρ.] In Greek legend, the son of Priam and Hecuba; champion of the Trojans, and the principal character of the Iliad on the Trojan side. He was slain by Achilles, who, in his chariot, dragged Hector's body thrice round the walls of Troy. He is introduced by Shakspeare in his "Troilus and Cressida."

Critics, old and new, have felt the remarkable contradictions in the drawing of this famous hero (Hector), and yet none of them have ventured to suggest the real explanation. Even Mure and Mr. Gladstone confess that in our Iliad he is wholly inferior to his reputation; "he is paid off," say they, "with generalities, while in actual encounter he is hardly equal to the second-rate Greek heroes." Yet why is he so important all through the plot of the poem? Why is his death by Achilles made an achievement of the highest order? Why are the chiefs who at one time challenge and worst him at another quaking with fear at his approach? Simply because in the original plan of the Iliad he was a great warrior, and because these perpetual defeats by Diomedes and Ajax, this avoidance of Agamemnon, this swaggering and "hectoring" which we now find in him, were introduced by the enlargers and interpolators in order to enhance the merits of their favourites at his expense. It seems to me certain that originally the Hector of the Iliad was really superior to all the Greeks except Achilles, that upon the retirement of the latter he made shorter work of them than the later rhapsodists liked to admit, that he soon burst the gates and appeared at the ships, that Patroclus was slain there after a brief diversion, and that in this way the whole catastrophe was very much more precipitated than we now find it. Mahañy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., L. 75.

Hector, Mrs. (Annie French); pseudonym Mrs. Alexander. Born at Dublin, 1825. A British novelist, author of "The Wooing O't" (1873), "Ralph Wilton's Weir" (1875), "Her Dearest Poe" (1876), "The Frères" (1882), "At Bay" (1885), "Mona's Choice" (1887), etc.

Hector, or Ector, Sir. The foster-father of King Arthur.

Hector, or Ector, de Mares, Sir. The brother of Sir Lancelot, and one of the knights of the Round Table.

Hector of Germany, The. A surname of Joachim II. of Brandenburg.

Hecuba (hek'ū-bū). [Gr. Ἑκάβη.] In Greek legend, the second wife of Priam, daughter of Dymas of Phrygia (according to others of Cisseus). She was enslaved after the fall of Troy; witnessed the sacrifice of her daughter Polyxena; and saw the body of her last son, Polydorus, who was murdered by Polymestor, washed to her feet by the waves. On the murderer she took vengeance by slaying his children and tearing out his eyes.

Hecuba. A tragedy of Euripides, exhibited in 425 B. C. It portrays the misfortunes of Hecuba, widow of Priam, king of Troy, the sacrifice of her daughter Polyxena at the grave of Achilles, the murder of her son Polydorus by Polymestor, and the vengeance executed by her upon the latter.

lyxena at the grave of Achilles, the murder of her son Polydorus by Polymestor, and the vengeance executed by her upon the latter.

Heeren (hā'reu), Arnold Hermann Ludwig. Born at Arbergen, near Bremen, Oct. 25, 1760; died at Göttingen, Prussia, March 7, 1842. A German historian, professor of philosophy and later of history at Göttingen. He wrote "Ideen über Politik, den Verkehr und den Handel der vornehmsten Völker der Alten Welt" (1793-96), "Geschichte des Studiums der klassischen Litteratur" (1797-1802), "Geschichte der Staaten des Altertums" (1799), "Geschichte des europäischen Staatensystems und seiner Kolonien" (1809), etc.

Hefe (hā'fe-le), Karl Joseph von. Born at Unterkochen, near Aalen, Würtemberg, March 15, 1809; died at Rottenburg, June 5, 1893. A German Roman Catholic ecclesiastic (bishop of Rottenburg 1869) and church historian. He was appointed professor of ecclesiastical history and Christian archaeology at Tübingen in 1840. His chief work is "Konziliengeschichte" ("History of Church Councils," 1855-74).

Heffernan (hef'er-nān), Mr. Michael. The pseudonym of Samuel Ferguson, under which he wrote "Father Tom and the Pope, or a Night at the Vatican."

Hegel (hā'gel), Georg Wilhelm Friedrich. Born at Stuttgart, Würtemberg, Aug. 27, 1770; died at Berlin, Nov. 14, 1831. A celebrated German philosopher. He was professor at Jena in 1806; edited a political journal at Bamberg 1806-08; was rector of the gymnasium at Nuremberg 1808-16; was professor of philosophy at Heidelberg 1816-18; and succeeded Fichte at Berlin in 1818. His philosophical system was during the second quarter of the 19th century the leading system of metaphysical thought in Germany. It purports to be a complete philosophy, undertaking to explain the whole universe of thought and being in its abstractest elements and minutest details. This it does by means of the Hegelian dialectic, a new logic, the real law of the movement of thought (not a mere form, like syllogistic), the scheme of which is thesis, antithesis, synthesis, the original tendency, the opposing tendency, and their unification in a new movement. By this law the conceptions of logic develop themselves in a long series. This law of the development of thought is assumed to be necessarily the law of the development of being, on the ground that thought and being are absolutely identical. Hegelianism is radically hostile to natural science, and especially to the Newtonian philosophy—that is, to all the methods and scientific results which have sprung from the "Principia." One of the characteristics of Hegelianism is its constant readiness to recognize continuity both as a fact and as acceptable to reason, which other metaphysical systems have often struggled to deny. He published "Phänomenologie des Geistes" (1807), "Wissenschaft der Logik" ("Science of Logic," 1812-16), "Encyclopädie der philosophischen Wissenschaften" ("Encyclopedia of Philosophical Sciences," 1817), "Grundlinien der Philosophie des Rechts" (1821), etc. His complete works, including those on the philosophy of religion, esthetics, the philosophy of history, and the history of philosophy, were published in 18 volumes (1832-41).

Hegel, Karl. Born at Nuremberg, Bavaria, June 7, 1813. A German historian, son of G. W. F. Hegel; professor of history at Rostock (1841), and later (1856) at Erlangen. His chief work is "Geschichte der Städteverfassung von Italien" (1847).

Hegesippus (hej-e-sip'us). [Gr. Ἡγήσιππος.] Died 180 A. D. The earliest historian of the Christian church. He was a Jew by birth, but embraced Christianity, and lived at Rome in his later years. He wrote a history of the Christian church from the passion of Christ down to his own time, fragments of which are extant.

Hegeso (hē-jē'sō), Monument of. [Gr. Ἡγήσῳ.] A monument in Athens, on the Street of Tombs, remarkable for the beauty of its relief-stele of the 4th century B. C.

Hegira. See Hijira.

Hehe (hā'he), or Wahehe (wā-hā'he). A Bantu tribe of German East Africa, northeast of Lake Nyassa, bordering on the Wasango and Mahenge. The country, called Uhehe, is moderately mountainous, and strewn with great boulders. The Wahehe are strong and warlike, using assagais and elliptic shields. They own cattle, but hardly ever eat meat. Their head chief is (1894) Mkuanika. His capital, Kuirenga, is surrounded by a quadrangular stockade.

Heiberg (hī'berg), Johann Ludvig. Born at Copenhagen, Dec. 14, 1791; died there, Aug. 25, 1860. A Danish dramatist and poet. He was the son of the dramatic poet and satirical writer Peter Andreas Heiberg (1758-1841), who, in consequence of several offenses against the press law of 1799, was forced to leave Denmark in 1800, and fled to France, where he remained until his death. The younger Heiberg was educated in Denmark, studying at the Copenhagen University, where he took the doctor's degree in 1817. The same year he went to Paris, and lived there with his father until 1822, when he was appointed lector at the University of Kiel. In 1825 he returned to Copenhagen, and wrote a number of the vaudevilles that have made his name famous in the history of the Danish drama. The most important of these are "Kong Solomon og Jørgen Hattenmager" ("King Solomon and Jørgen the Hatter"), "Aprilsnræne" ("The April Fools"), "Recensenten og Dyret" ("The Critic and the Beast"), "De Udskillige" ("The Inseparable Ones"). After 1827 he edited the weekly journal "Den flyvende Post" ("The Flying Post") and subsequently the "Intelligensblade." In 1828 appeared the national drama, the most important of his greater plays, "Elverhøj" ("The Elf Hill"). In 1829 he was made poet and translator of the royal theater. The following year he was appointed docent in the new military academy, which post he held until 1836. From 1849 to 1856 he was the sole director of the royal theater. Besides his dramatic works and the esthetic criticism contained in the journals mentioned, he wrote many lyric poems and romances. His poetical writings, "Poetiske Skrifter," appeared at Copenhagen in 1862 in 11 vols.; his prose, "Prosaiske Skrifter," at Copenhagen 1861-62, also in 11 vols.

Heide (hī'de). A town in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, 58 miles northwest of Hamburg. Population (1890), commune, 7,444.

Heidegger (hī'deg-er), John James. Born at Zurich in 1659 (?); died at Richmond, Surrey, Sept. 5, 1749. A noted theatrical manager. He managed the Haymarket with Handel 1729-34.

Heidelberg (hī'del-berg). A city in the district of Mannheim, Baden, situated on the Neckar 12 miles southeast of Mannheim. It has considerable trade, and is celebrated for its picturesque surroundings. The castle is a famous monument founded at the end of the 13th century by the count palatine Rudolf I., and enlarged and strengthened by succeeding electors. During the 16th century it received the architectural development which, despite disaster, makes it still one of the richest productions of the German Renaissance. In 1689 and 1693 it was ruined by the generals of Louis XIV., but was subsequently restored. It was finally destroyed by fire from a lightning-stroke in 1764. The ruins are the most imposing in Germany. The picturesque outer walls and towers, now broken and ivy-clad, inclose a large area; but the chief architectural attractions are grouped about the inner court. The Otto Heinrichs Bau, dating from 1556, is the finest example of the early German Renaissance. It consists at present of 3 stories above the basement, with engaged columns and entablatures, and continuous ranges of ornate windows with central mullion. The doorway, surmounted by armorial bearings, is very richly treated; its two entablatures are supported by atlantes and caryatids. The Friedrichs Bau, of 1601, is a good example of late Renaissance work; it has 4 stories—Doric, Tuscan, Ionic, and Corinthian—with statues of emperors and electors in niches. This building is now in part restored as a museum. The university, founded by the elector Rupert I. in 1386, is the oldest in the present German Empire. From 1556 it came under the control of the leaders of the Reformation. The library was plundered and sent to Rome in 1623, and partially returned in 1816; it now consists of over 320,000 volumes. The university was reorganized by the elector Charles Frederick of Baden in 1803. Heidelberg was the capital of the Palatinate from the 13th century to 1720. It was sacked by Tilly in 1622, and by the French in 1689, and was nearly destroyed by the French in 1693. It passed to Baden in 1803. Population (1890), commune, 31,739.

Heiden (hi'den). A village and health-resort in the canton of Appenzell, Switzerland, 8 miles east of St.-Gall.

Heidenheim (hi'den-him). A manufacturing town in the Jagst circle, Württemberg, on the Brenz 44 miles east by south of Stuttgart. Population (1890), commune, 8,001.

Heidenmauer (hi'den-mou-er). A stone rampart on the summit of the Kastanienberg, near Dürkheim, Palatinate, Germany, probably of ancient Teutonic origin, noted in legend and fiction: also other similar prehistoric or Roman remains.

Heidenmauer, The. A novel by Cooper, published in 1832.

Heijn (hin), Pieter Pieterse. Born at Deftshaven, Netherlands, 1577; died 1629. A Dutch admiral. He served as vice-admiral in the fleet of Admiral Willeken at the capture of San Salvador, Brazil, in 1624; defeated the Spaniards in a bloody naval battle in All Saints' Bay, Brazil, in 1626; and captured the Spanish silver fleet, with treasure valued at 12,000,000 gulden, in the Bay of Matanzas, Cuba, two years later. He was subsequently placed at the head of the Dutch navy by the stadtholder Frederick Henry, and was killed while blockading Dunkirk in 1629.

Heilbronn (hil'bron). A town in the Neckar circle, Württemberg, situated on the Neckar 26 miles north of Stuttgart. It has important manufactures and commerce. The Rathaus, Church of St. Kilian, and Deutsches Haus are of interest. It was formerly a free imperial city. Population (1890), commune, 29,941.

Heilbronn, Union of. An alliance between the Swedes and the German Protestants for the prosecution of the war against the Imperialists, concluded at Heilbronn in 1633.

Heil dir im Siegerkranz (hil dër im zë'gerkrants). [G., 'Hail to thee in the conqueror's wreath.'] The Prussian national hymn. It was written by Heinrich Harries in 1790 as a song for the birthday of Christian VII. of Denmark, adapted to the English air "God save Great George the King," and was arranged in its present form for Prussian use by B. G. Schumacher in 1793.

Heiligenstadt (hi'lig-en-stät). A town in the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated on the Leine 27 miles east by north of Cassel. It was the capital of the old principality of Eichsfeld. Population (1890), commune, 6,183.

Heilsberg (hilz'berg). A town in the province of East Prussia, Prussia, situated on the Alle 39 miles south of Königsberg. An indecisive battle was fought here between the French under Soult and the Russians under Benoisgen, June 10, 1807. Population (1890), 5,501.

Heilsbronn, or Kloster-Heilsbronn (klös'ferlitz-bron'). A small town in Middle Franconia, Bavaria, 15 miles southwest of Nuremberg. It contains the remains of a medieval Cistercian abbey.

Heim (äm), François Joseph. Born at Belfort, France, Dec. 16, 1787; died at Paris, Oct. 2, 1865. A French historical painter.

Heimdall (him'däl). [ON. Heimdallr.] In Old Norse mythology, the guardian against the giants of the bridge of the gods, Bifröst, at the end of which he dwelt in Himinbjörg. He was the son of the nine daughters of the sea-gods, Egir and Ran. He possessed the trumpet Gjallarhorn, with which the gods were finally summoned together at Ragnarök, when he and Loki slew each other. As his name and his attributes indicate, he was a god of light.

This god is briefly described by Vigfusson and Powell as follows: "An ancient god is Heimdall, from whom the Amals spring. There are strange lost myths connected with him: his struggle with Loki for the Bristaga necklace; the fight in which they fought in the shape of seals. He is 'the gods' warder, dwelling on the gods' path, the Rainbow. There he sits, 'the white god,' 'the wind-listening god,' whose ears are so sharp that he hears the grass grow in the fields and the wool on the sheep's backs, with his Blast-horn, whose trumpet-sound will ring through the nine worlds, for in the later legends he has some of the attributes of the Angel of the Last Trumpet. His teeth are of gold; hence he is 'stud-endowed.' Curious genealogical myths attach themselves to him. He is styled the son of nine mothers; and as Rig's father, or Rig himself, the 'walking or wandering god,' he is the father of men and the sire of kings, and of earls and eorls and thralls alike. His own name is epithetic, perhaps the World-hov. The meaning of Hallinskidi [another name of his] is obscure." Such is a summary of the most important passages referring to Heimdall. Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 82.

Heimskringla (hims'kring-lä). [ON. heimr, world, and kringla, circle.] The history of the Norse kings, from the earliest mythical times down to the battle of Re in 1177, written by the leclander Snorri Sturluson (1178-1241). It receives its name from its first words, "Kringla heimins," the circle of the world. In subject-matter and literary style it is the most important prose work in Old Norse literature.

Heine (hi'ne), Heinrich. Born at Düsseldorf, Prussia, Dec. 13, 1797; died at Paris, Feb. 17, 1856. A celebrated German lyric poet and critic, of Hebrew descent. Destined for a business career, he was sent, against his own desire, to his uncle Solomon Heine, a banker in Hamburg; but through the latter's assistance he was enabled to study jurisprudence at Bonn, Berlin, and Göttingen. In 1825 he embraced Christianity. He lived alternately in Hamburg, Berlin, and Munich. After 1831 until his death he lived for the most part in Paris, during the last years of his life a great sufferer from an incurable malady. From 1837 to 1848 he received an annuity from the department of foreign affairs. The first collection of his poems, "Gedichte," appeared in 1827, his "Buch der Lieder" ("Book of Songs") in 1827, "Neue Gedichte" ("New Poems") in 1844, and "Romanzero" in 1851. Among his songs are some of the best-known lyrics of Germany: for instance, "Die Lorelei," "Du bist wie eine Blume," "Nach Frankreich zogen zwei Grenadier." He also left a number of characteristic prose works, the most celebrated of which, the "Reisebilder" ("Pictures of Travel"), had appeared in 4 parts from 1826 to 1831. The "Romantische Schule," to which Heine himself as a writer prominently belonged, appeared in 1836. His complete works appeared in Hamburg 1861-63, in 21 volumes.

Heineccius (hi-nek'tsë-ös), Johann Gottlieb. Born at Eisenberg, Germany, Sept. 11, 1681; died at Halle, Prussia, Aug. 31, 1741. A German jurist, professor of philosophy (1720) and later of law at Halle. He wrote "Elementa juris civilis" (1725), "Historia juris civilis" (1733), etc.

Heineken (hi'nek-en), Christian Heinrich. Born at Lübeck, Germany, Feb. 6, 1721; died at Lübeck, June, 1725. A German child, noted for his extraordinary precocity. He is said to have been well versed in the history of the Bible in his second year, and to have learned French and Latin in his third. He is also known as "the Child of Lübeck."

Heinrich. See Henry.

Heinrich von Meissen (hin'rieh fon mis'sen). Born at Meissen, 1250; died at Mainz, 1318. A Middle High German lyric poet. He was a wandering singer. In 1275 he was in the army of Hapsburg; in 1286 at Prague. He is said to have founded at Mainz the first school of "Master Singers," so called, and himself marks the transition from the "Minnesingers" to the later "Master Singers." He is also called Frauenlob, a name given him because of a declared preference in a poetical contest for the title "Frau" (lady, mistress) applied to women, rather than "Weib" (woman, the mere opposite of man). The women of Mainz bore him to his grave, where, at the cathedral, his monument is still to be seen.

Heinrich von Veldeke. See Veldeke.

Heinse (hin'ze), Johann Jakob Wilhelm. Born at Langewiesen, Thuringia, Feb. 16, 1749; died at Aschaffenburg, Bavaria, June 22, 1803. A German romance writer. Among his romances is "Ardinghella und die glückseligen Inseln" (1787).

The actual date of the flight was June 20.

Hel (hel). [ON., a personification of hel, the abode of the dead, = E. hell.] In Old Norse mythology, the daughter of Loki and the giantess Angurboda (ON. Angrubodda), and goddess of Nifheim, or Nifhel, the realm of the dead, below the earth. Originally all the dead went to her. In later mythology only she is horrible in appearance, half blue-black and half flesh-color, and her abode is one of misery to which those alone go who die of age or illness.

Helbon (hel'bon). An ancient name of Aleppo.

Helder (hel'dër), The. A fortified seaport in the province of North Holland, Netherlands, situated on the Marsdiep 40 miles north of Amsterdam. It is an important commercial place, and a Dutch naval station. The great Helder Dyke defends it from the sea. Near it the Dutch under Ruyter and Tromp defeated the English in a naval engagement Aug. 21, 1673; and near it also the English and Russian troops landed in their unsuccessful expedition of 1799. Population (1889), commune, 21,984.

Helderberg (hel'dër-bërg) Mountains. A range of hills west of Albany, New York, an offshoot of the Catskills.

Helen (hel'en). [Gr. Ἑλένη, L. Helena: hence It. Elena, Sp. Helena, Elena, F. Hélène, E. Helen, Ellen, G. Helene.] 1. In Greek legend, the wife of Menelaus, and, according to the usual tradition, the daughter of Zeus and Leda, or, according to another, of Zeus and Nemesis, celebrated for her beauty. Her abduction by Paris was the cause of the Trojan war. Goethe introduces her in the second part of "Faust," and Faustus, in Marlowe's play of that name, addresses her thus:

"Oh! thou art fairer than the evening air Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars!"

Helen of Troy is one of those ideal creatures of the fancy over which time, space, and circumstance, and moral probability, exert no sway. . . . She moves through Greek heroic legend as the desired of all men and the possessed of many. Theseus bore her away while yet a girl from Sparta. Her brethren, Castor and Polydeukes, recovered her from Athens by force, and gave to her Elthra, the mother of Theseus, for bondwoman. . . . She was at last assigned in wedlock to Menelaus, by whom she conceived her only earthly child, Hermione. Paris, by aid of Aphrodite, won her love and fled with her to Egypt and to Troy. In Troy she abode more than twenty years, and was the mate of Deiphobus after the death of Paris. When the strife raged for her sake was ended, Menelaus restored her with honor to his home in Lacedæmon. There she received Telemachus and saw her daughter mated to Neoptolemus. But even after death she rested not from the service of love. The great Achilles, who in life had loved her by hearsay, but had never seen her, clasped her among the shades upon the island Leuké, and begat Euphorion.

Symonds, Studies of the Greek Poets, I, 124.

2. In Sidney's romance "Arcadia," the queen of Corinth. She begs and carries away the wounded body of the knight Amphilus, falsely supposed dead.—3. A waiting-woman to Imogen in Shakspeare's "Cymbeline."—4. In Sheridan Knowles's play "The Hunchback," a lively girl, in love with Modus.

Helen, a Tale. The last novel by Miss Edgeworth, published in 1834.

Helena (hel'e-nä). A Greek painter, daughter of the Egyptian Timon. She is said to have lived in the time of the battle of Issus, and to have painted a picture of that subject. This picture was hung by Vespasian in the Temple of Peace at Rome. The great Pompeian mosaic of the battle of Issus must have been made about this time, and is perhaps a copy of the picture.

Helena. 1. A character in Shakspeare's comedy "All's Well that Ends Well."—2. In Shakspeare's play "A Midsummer Night's Dream," an Athenian lady in love with Demetrius.

Helena, The. See the extract.

The Third Act [of the second part of Goethe's "Faust," in which Helen of Troy is introduced] is known in Germany as "The Helena," not only because it was separately published in 1827 under the title of "Helena: a Classic-Romantic Phantasmagoria," but also because it is a complete allegorical poem in itself, inserted in the Second Part of "Faust" by very loose threads of attachment. Goethe began its composition in 1800.

B. Taylor, Notes to Faust, part 2.

Helena. A tragedy of Euripides, exhibited in 412 B. C., based on the story invented by Stesichorus that only a phantom of Helen appeared at the siege of Troy, the real Helen being in Egypt.

Helena (hel'e-nä or he-lë-nä). The capital of Phillips County, Arkansas, situated on the Mississippi 52 miles southwest of Memphis. It was unsuccessfully attacked by the Confederates July 4, 1863. Population (1890), 5,189.

Helena. A city, the capital of Montana and of Lewis and Clarke County, situated in lat. 46° 36' N., long. 111° 53' W. It is an important business center, and there are gold-mines in its vicinity. It was settled in 1864. Population (1890), 13,834.

Helena, Flavia Julia, Saint. Died about 328. The mother of Constantine the Great. She was, according to some authorities, the daughter of an inn-keeper at Drepanum, Bithynia; according to others, a British or Caledonian princess. She became the wife of Constantius Chlorus, who, on his elevation to the dignity of Caesar in 292, divorced her in order to marry Theodora, the stepdaughter of the Augustus Maximianus Hercules. Subsequently, on the elevation to the purple of Constantine, her son by Constantius, she received the title of Augusta, and was treated with marked distinction. About 325 she made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where she built the Church of the Holy Sepulcher and that of the Nativity.

Helensburgh (hel'enz-bur-ō). A town and watering-place in Dumbartonshire, Scotland, situated on the Clyde 20 miles northwest of Glasgow. Population (1891), 8,405.

Helenus (hel'e-nus). [Gr. Ἑλένης.] In Greek legend, a son of Priam, celebrated as a prophet. Shakspeare introduces him in "Troilus and Cressida."

Helgoland (hel'gō-lānt), or Heligoland (hel'i-gō-land), Friesian Hellige Land. ['Holy Land.'] An island in the North Sea, belonging to the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, situated in lat. 54° 11' N., long. 7° 53' E. It is divided into the Oberland and Unterland. (Close by is the bathing-place, the Düne. It has lobster-fisheries, and is frequented for sea-bathing. The population is of Friesian stock. Formerly it was a heathen sanctuary. It was taken from Denmark by Great Britain in 1807, and ceded to Great Britain in 1814. In 1890 it was ceded to Germany, and attached to the province of Schleswig-Holstein. Near it the Danish fleet repulsed a combined attack of the Prussians and Austrians, May 9, 1864. Length, a little over 1 mile. Population, 2,086.

Heliand (hā'lē-ānd). [OS. Hēliand, AS. Hælend, NIIG. Heiland, the healer, i. e. the Saviour.] An Old Saxon epic poem on the Saviour, written in alliterative verse by an unknown author between the years 822 and 840. It is a Christian poem with old Germanic heathen elements, and is one of the most extensive as it is one of the most important works of early Germanic literature.

Helias, or Helis, or Helyas. The Knight of the Swan. See Swan, Knight of the.

Helicanus (hel-i-kā'nus). The faithful minister of Pericles, Prince of Tyre, in Shakspeare's play of that name.

Helicon (hel'i-kōn), modern Zagora (zā-gō'ra). [Gr. Ἑλικών.] In ancient geography, a mountain-range in Bœotia, Greece, celebrated in mythology as the abode of the Muses. It contained the fountains of Aganippe and Hippocrene. Height, 5,736 feet (?).

Heligoland. See Helgoland.

Heliodorus (hē-li-dō'r-us). [Gr. Ἡλιόδορος, gift of the sun.] Born at Emesa, Syria; lived at the end of the 4th century. A Greek romance-writer, a Christian bishop of Tricea in Thessaly, author of the earliest Greek romance, the "Ethiopia." See Theagenes and Chariclea.

Helioabalus. See Elagabalus.

Heliopolis (hē-li-op'ō-lis), Egyptian An (im), the modern Matarieh (mā-tā-rē'ō). [Gr. Ἡλιούπολις, city of the sun-god.] In ancient geography, a city in Lower Egypt, situated on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile in lat. 30° 8' N., long. 31° 24' E. "It stood on the edge of the desert, about 4½ miles to the east of the apex of the Delta; but the alluvial land of the Delta extended 5 miles further to the eastward to that city, to what is now the Birket-el-Hag." (Rauflinson.) It was a seat of learning ("the university of Egypt") and of the worship of the sun-god Ra.

The site of Heliopolis is still marked by the massive walls that surrounded it, and by a granite obelisk bearing the name of Osirtasen [Iseretesen] I. of the 12th dynasty, dating about 3900 years ago. It was one of two that stood before the entrance to the temple of the Sun, at the inner end of an avenue of sphinxes; and the apex, like some of those at Thebes, was once covered with bronze (doubtless gilt), as is shown by the stone having been cut to receive the metal casing, and by the testimony of Arab history. Tradition also speaks of the other obelisk of Heliopolis, and of the bronze taken from its apex.

Rauflinson, Herod., II. 9, note.

Heliopolis. The ancient name of Baalbec.

Helios (hē'li-os). [Gr. Ἥλιος, ἠέλιος.] In Greek mythology, the sun-god (called Hyperion by Homer), son of the Titan Hyperion and the Titaness Theia. He is represented as a strong and beautiful youth, with heavy, waving locks and a crown of rays, driving a four-horse chariot, rising in the morning from the ocean on the east, among the Ethiopians, driving across the heavens in his glowing car, and descending at evening into the western sea. At night, while asleep, he is borne along the northern edge of the earth in a golden boat to his rising-place in the east. Also called Phaethon (Gr. Φαέθων) for his brilliancy. In later times he was identified with Apollo.

Helius (hē'li-us). Died 68 A. D. A Roman court favorite. He was a freedman of the emperor Claudius, and became steward of the imperial demesnes in Asia. He was one of the agents employed by Agrippina in ridding herself of M. Junius Silanus, proconsul of that province in 55. He was prefect of Rome and Italy during the absence of Nero in Greece 67-68, being invested with full power of life and death even over the senatorial order. He was put to death, with Locusta, the poisoner, and other creatures of the late tyrant, by Nero's successor, the emperor Galba.

Hell (hel), Maximilian. Born at Schemnitz, Hungary, May 13, 1720; died at Vienna, April 14, 1792. An Austrian astronomer. He entered the Society of Jesus about 1738, and was director of the observatory at Vienna 1768-92. In June, 1769, he made, in Lapland, a successful observation of the transit of Venus, of which he published an account ("Observatio transitus Veneris," 1769). He is the author also of a number of other works, including "De parallaxi solis" (1773).

Hellada. The modern name of the Spercheus.

Helladians (he-lā'di-ānz). See the extract.

Otherwise, while Greek was fast becoming the dominant speech of the Empire, the name of Hellas became a geographical expression, the name of a single theme of the Empire, while the name of Hellenes meant only the professors of the fallen faith, whose temples supplied materials for building the temples of the new. When the people of the theme of Hellas, perhaps of a region a little wider than the theme of Hellas, needed a geographical name, the new name of Helladians was coined to express them.

Hellanicus (hel-a-nī'kus). [Gr. Ἑλλάνικος.] An eminent Greek logographer. He was a native of Mytilene, Lesbos, and lived about 450 B. C. Nothing is known with certainty of his personal history. According to an evidently erroneous account by Suidas, he lived with Herodotus at the court of Amyntas. The same doubtful authority states that he died at Perperene, on the coast of Asia Minor, opposite Lesbos. He was a prolific writer, and was held in high esteem by the ancients. His works, fragments only of which are extant, included a history of Attica, a history of the Æolians in Asia Minor and the islands of the Ægean, and a history of Persia, Media, and Assyria from the time of Ninus to his own day.

Hellas (hel'as). [Gr. Ἑλλάς.] In ancient geography, originally a town and small district in Phthiotis, Thessaly, and later the lands inhabited by the Hellenes (see Greece); in a restricted sense, Middle Greece (south of Thermopylæ and north of the Gulf of Corinth), or the districts south of the Ambracian Gulf and the mouth of the Peneius.

Helle (hel'ē). [Gr. Ἑλλη.] In Greek legend, the daughter of Athamas and Nephele. She was drowned in the Hellespont, whence its name ("Sea of Helle").

Hellebore (hel'ē-bōr). A character assumed by Foote in his part of the devil, in his play "The Devil upon Two Sticks": the president of a medical college.

Hellen (hel'en). [Gr. Ἑλλην.] In Greek legend, a king in Phthia (in Thessaly), eponymous ancestor of the Hellenes.

Hellenes (hel'ēnz). [Gr. Ἕλληνες.] 1. The ancient Greeks; properly, the Greeks of pure race: traditionally said to be so called from Hellen, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, the legendary ancestor of the true Greeks, consisting of the Dorians, Æolians, Ionians, and Achæans. — 2. The subjects of the modern kingdom of Greece, or Hellas.

Heller (hel'ler), Stephen. Born at Budapest, Hungary, May 15, 1814; died at Paris, Jan. 14, 1888. A Hungarian pianist and composer for the pianoforte.

Hellespont (hel'es-pont). [Gr. Ἑλλήσποντος, sea of Helle. See Helle.] In ancient geography, the name of the Strait of Dardanelles. (See Dardanelles.) It is celebrated in the legend of Hero and Leander.

Hellevoetsluis (hel-le-vōt-slois'), or Helvoetsluis (hel-vōt-slois'). A seaport in the province of South Holland, Netherlands, situated in the island Voorne, on the Haringvliet, 17 miles west-southwest of Rotterdam. Here, in 1688, William of Orange embarked for England.

Hellin (el-yēn'). A town in the province of Albacete, Spain, situated in lat. 38° 28' N., long. 1° 39' W. It has sulphur manufactures. Population (1887), 13,679.

Hellowes (hel'ōz), Edward. Lived about the last half of the 16th century. An English translator. In 1597 he was groom of the chamber in the royal household, and in 1600 received a pension of 12 shillings a day for life. He translated three works from the Spanish of Guevara.

Helmer (hel'mēr), Nora. The principal character in Ibsen's "A Doll's House." Her husband treats her as if she were a child, and so far unfit for real action that when she begins to meddle with realities she commits a crime. On awakening to a knowledge of her real self, and her husband's false idea that he can be both will and conscience for her, she leaves him.

Helmers (hel'mēr), Jan Frederik. Born at Amsterdam, March 7, 1767; died at Amsterdam, Feb. 26, 1813. A Dutch poet. His chief work is "De Hollandsche Natie" ("The Dutch Nation," 1812).

Helmholtz (helm'hōlts), Hermann Ludwig Ferdinand von. Born at Potsdam, Aug. 31, 1821; died at Berlin, Sept. 8, 1894. A celebrated German physiologist and physicist, especially noted for his discoveries in optics and acoustics. He became military physician at Potsdam in 1843; taught anatomy at the Academy of Art in 1848; was professor of physiology at Königsberg 1849-55; was professor of anatomy and physiology at Bonn 1855-58, and of physiology at Heidelberg 1858-71; and was appointed professor of physics at Berlin in 1871. He invented the ophthalmoscope in 1851. His chief works are "Handbuch der physiologischen Optik" ("Manual of Physiological Optics," 1856-66), "Die Lehre von den Tönenpfindungen" ("The Doctrine of the Sensations of Tone," 1862), "Über die Erhaltung der Kraft" ("On the Conservation of Force," 1847).

Helmond (hel'mont; F. pron. el-mōn'). A town in the province of North Brabant, Netherlands, situated on the river Aa in lat. 51° 28' N., long. 5° 39' E. Population (1889), commune, 9,057.

Helmont (hel'mont), Jan Baptista van. Born at Brussels in 1578; died near Brussels, Dec. 30, 1644. A Flemish physician and chemist. He spent a number of years in France, Switzerland, and England, married a wealthy lady of Brabant, and in 1609 settled on an estate near Brussels, where he devoted himself to chemical investigations. He is said to have been the first to demonstrate the necessity of employing the balance in chemistry, and to have introduced the word "gas" in the terminology of that science. A collective edition of his works appeared as "Ortus medicina" (1648).

Helmstadt (helm'stāt). A village in Lower Franconia, Bavaria, 10 miles west of Würzburg. Here, in the Seven Weeks' War, July 25, 1866, the Prussians defeated the Bavarians.

Héloïse (ā-lō-ēz'). Born about 1101; died at the Paraclet, near Nogent-sur-Seine, France, 1164. A French abbess, celebrated on account of her relations with Abelard. She was a niece of Fulbert, canon of Notre Dame. Abelard became her instructor, and soon her lover and seducer. After the birth of her child he proposed a secret marriage, which was accomplished only after much opposition on the part of Héloïse, for she preferred to sacrifice her own future rather than that of Abelard. She even denied the marriage after it was performed, and retired to the convent of Argenteuil. The enraged Fulbert revenged himself on Abelard by inflicting on him a shameful mutilation. He became a monk, and Héloïse took the veil.

Héloïse. See Nouvelle Héloïse, La.

Helos (hē'los). [Gr. Ἡλος.] In ancient geography, a town in Laconia, Greece, situated near the sea 25 miles southeast of Sparta.

Helots (hē'lōts or hel'ōts). [Gr. ἑλλόται or ἑλλώτες.] A class of serfs among the ancient Spartans who were owned by the state, were bound to the soil under allotment to landholders, and fulfilled all servile functions. The Helots paid their masters a fixed proportion of the products of the ground cultivated by them. They served as light-armed troops in war, and in great emergencies bodies of them were organized as regular or heavy-armed troops, in which case they might be manumitted as a reward for bravery. They were descendants of captives of war, most of them probably of the conquered Achæan aborigines of Laconia; they were very cruelly treated, and often systematically massacred, to keep down their numbers and prevent them from organized revolt.

Help (help). A character, in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," who pulls Christian out of the Slough of Despond.

Helps (helps), Sir Arthur. Born at Streatham, Surrey, July 10, 1813; died at London, March 7, 1875. An English author. He occupied various government positions, and from June, 1860, was clerk of the privy council, enjoying the special confidence of the queen. He is best known for his social essays, "Friends in Council" (1847-59; 3 series), and for his various works on the early history of Spanish America, especially "The Spanish Conquest in America" (1855-61). He also wrote several dramas and romances.

Helsingborg (hel'sing-bōr). A seaport in the laen of Malmöhus, Sweden, situated on the Sound, opposite Elsinore, in lat. 56° 3' N., long. 12° 42' E. Near it is the old castle of Kärnan. Population (1890), 20,410.

Hemicycle of Paul Delaroche, The. An encaustic mural painting adorning the amphitheater of the Ecole des Beaux Arts, Paris. In it are grouped 75 representative artists and figures typifying the art of all periods. The great Greek masters Phidias, Ictinus, and Apelles, enthroned, form the central group. The figures are 23 feet high.

Heming, or Hemminge, John. Born at Shottery, 1556 (?); died at Aldermanbury, Oct. 10, 1630. An English actor. Little is known of his early life, but he seems to have been treasurer of the King's Company of actors. He played in the first part of "Henry IV.," and in Jonson's "Volpone," "Alchemist," and several other of his plays. With Concliff he edited the first folio of Shakspeare in 1623. To this he owes his chief fame. He was principal proprietor of the Globe Theatre and closely associated with Shakspeare, who mentions him in his will.

Henderson, Alexander. Born at Creich, Fife-shire, about 1583; died at Edinburgh, Aug. 19, 1646. A Scottish ecclesiastical and diplomatist, the most capable and most prominent Presbyterian leader of his time. He was minister at Len-chars, Fife-shire, 1613-38, and afterward at Edinburgh. The National Covenant (1638) and the Solemn League and Covenant (adopted in 1643 by the Westminster Assembly, which he attended as a Scottish commissioner) were both drafted by him, and were largely his productions. He presided as moderator at three important general assemblies (1638, 1641, and 1648); at that held at Glasgow in 1638 the Scottish bishops were deposed, and the church was reconstituted as Presbyterian. Henderson had various conferences and even discussions with Charles I. on public (especially ecclesiastical) affairs.

Henderson, James. Born in the north of England about 1783; died at Madrid, Spain, Sept. 18, 1848. An English author. From 1819 to 1821 he traveled in Brazil. Subsequently he was British consul-general at Bogotá until 1836. His principal work is "History of Brazil" (London, 1831).

He belonged to the order of Récollets of St. Francis, went to Canada in 1673, and in 1678 joined La Salle's second expedition to the West. He was despatched by La Salle from Fort Crevecoeur with two men in a canoe, Feb. 29, 1680, to explore the Illinois River and the upper Mississippi. He was captured by a party of Sioux on the Mississippi, April 11, 1680, and during captivity discovered the Falls of St. Anthony. He was rescued by Greysolon du Lhut, arrived at Quebec in 1682, and on returning to Europe was made guardian of the convent of Renty in Artois. He published "Description de la Louisiane" (1683), "Nouvelle découverte d'un tres-grand pays" (1697; in which he claims to have descended the Mississippi to its mouth in 1680—a claim since shown to be false), and "Nouveau Voyage" (1698).

Hennequin (en-ka'n'), Philippe Augustin. Born at Lyons, France, 1763; died at Tournay, Belgium, May 12, 1833. A French historical painter. Henriquez de Almansa (en-ré'keth dääl-män'-sä), Martin. Born in Alcañizes, Spain, about 1525; died at Lima, Peru, March 15, 1583. A Spanish administrator. He was the second son of a Marquis of Alcañizes. He was viceroy of Mexico Nov. 5, 1568, to Oct. 4, 1580, during which period the Inquisition was founded (1571), and the great cathedral of Mexico was established (1573). From Sept. 23, 1581, he was viceroy of Peru. He was an excellent ruler.

Henriquez de Guzman (göth-män'), Luis. Born about 1600; died about 1667. A Spanish administrator. He was count of Alba de Liste and grandee of Spain; was viceroy of Mexico June 28, 1650, to Aug. 1, 1653, and of Peru Feb. 24, 1655, to July 31, 1661. His reign in both countries was rather uneventful. He was just and benevolent, and encouraged learning.

Henriquez de Rivera (ré-vä'rä), Payo. Born at Seville about 1610; died April 8, 1684. A Spanish prelate and statesman. He was a member of the Augustine order; was chosen bishop of Guatemala in 1657; and was translated to Michoacan in 1667, but before reaching his new diocese was made archbishop of Mexico (1668). From Dec., 1673, to Oct., 1680, he was also viceroy. Returning to Spain, 1681, he was appointed president of the Council of the Indies and bishop of Cuenca, but resigned both offices and died in a convent.

Henry (hen'ri) I. [The E. name Henry, formerly also Henric, Heuri, assimilated Herry, now Harry, is from OF. and F. Henri, Sp. Enrique, Pg. Henrique, It. Enrico, from ML. Henricus, from OHG. Heinrik, G. Heinrich, D. Hendrik, etc., chief of the dwelling.] King of Castile 1214–June, 1217, son of Alfonso IX. and Eleanor, daughter of Henry II. of England.

Henry II. Born 1333; died in May, 1379. King of Castile 1369–79, natural son of Alfonso XI. He was known before his accession as count of Trastamare, and ascended the throne by expelling his half-brother, Pedro the Cruel, with the aid of the celebrated captain Du Guesclin.

Henry III., surnamed "The Sickly." Born 1379; died 1406. King of Castile 1390–1406, son of John I. He married Catharine, daughter of John, duke of Lancaster, in 1388, and in 1403 recognized Benedict XIII. as pope in opposition to Boniface IX.

Henry IV., surnamed "The Impotent." Born at Valladolid, Spain, Jan. 6, 1425; died at Madrid, Dec. 12, 1474. King of Castile 1454–74, son of John II. He married Joanna of Portugal, the legitimacy of whose daughter, Joanna, was questioned by the Cortes. He therefore adopted as his heir his sister Isabella of Castile, who married Ferdinand of Aragon in 1469.

Henry I., surnamed Beauclerc. [F., 'fine scholar.']. Born at Selby (?), Yorkshire, 1068; died Dec. 1, 1135. King of England 1100–35, fourth son of William the Conqueror and Matilda. He was elected, on the death of William II., by the witan during the absence of his elder brother Robert, duke of Normandy, on a crusade. He restored the laws of Edward the Confessor, as modified by the Conqueror, recalled Anselm (see Anselm), and suppressed the great fiefdoms, for whom he substituted a class of lesser nobles. He conquered Normandy in 1106 by the victory of Tenchebrai over Robert, who was kept in captivity until his death (1134). He was twice married—first to Matilda, daughter of Malcolm of Scotland, and afterward to Adela, or Adeliza, daughter of Godfrey VII., count of Louvain. His only son, William (born of the first marriage), was drowned in the White Ship in the Channel in 1120.

Henry II. Born in 1133; died July 6, 1189. The first king of England of the house of Anjou (Plantagenet), 1154–89, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, count of Anjou, and Matilda, daughter of Henry I. He claimed the English throne in right of his mother, who had been deprived of the succession by Stephen of Blois. In 1153 he was adopted by Stephen as his successor by the treaty of Wallingford, and acceded to the throne on Stephen's death, Oct. 25, 1154. His possessions outside of England included Normandy and the suzerainty of Brittany, inherited from the Normans; Agjou and Maine, inherited from his father; and Poitou, Guienne, and Gascony, acquired by marriage with Eleanor of Aquitaine (1152). He compelled Malcolm of Scotland to restore the English counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmorland, granted to Malcolm's father by Stephen, and to do homage for the Scottish crown (1157); reduced the Welsh to obedience in 3 expeditions (1155, 1163, and 1165); and conquered the south-eastern part of Ireland (1171). He consolidated and centralized the royal authority by the institution of fiscal, judicial, and military reforms, the chief of which were the improvement of the coinage (1158), the assignment of regular circuits to itinerant justices, the great assize or trial by a jury of twelve knights (which superseded the old modes of trial by battle and by compurgation), the commutation of personal military service for a money payment orutage (1159), the revival of the ancient fyrd or national militia by the assize of arms (1181), and the extension of the jurisdiction of the secular courts to clerical offenders by the Constitutions of Clarendon (1164). His reforms were vehemently opposed by Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, in so far as they related to the church, although after the unauthorized murder of the archbishop by four of Henry's knights (Dec. 29, 1170), and Henry's consequent penance at Becket's shrine in July, 1174, he virtually carried his point. In the last year of his reign a rebellion broke out under his sons Richard and John, assisted by Philip of France, during which he died.

Henry III. (of Winchester). Born at Winchester, Oct. 1, 1207; died at Westminster, Nov. 16, 1272. King of England 1216–72, son of John and Isabella of Angoulême. He succeeded at the age of 9 years, under the regency of William Marshal, earl of Pembroke. His title was disputed by Louis, son of Philip of France, who had been chosen king by the barons opposed to John. The regent defeated Louis's army at Lincoln May 20, 1217, and compelled him to abandon his claim to the crown after having suffered the loss of his reinforcements in a naval battle off Dover, Aug. 24, 1217. After the death of Pembroke in 1219, the government was carried on by the justiciary Hubert de Burgh, supported by Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, until 1232, when Henry personally assumed the direction of affairs. He married Eleanor of Provence, Jan. 14, 1236. Of the French possessions of his house, he retained only Aquitaine and Gascony. His misgovernment and the favoritism which he showed toward foreigners provoked a rising of the barons, who compelled him to accept the Provisions of Oxford in 1258, whereby a series of reforms were carried out by a commission of 24 barons. Henry subsequently repudiated the Provisions of Oxford, whereupon the barons arose in arms under Simon de Montfort, and defeated the king at the battle of Lewes May 14, 1264. He was kept a virtual prisoner by Montfort until the battle of Evesham, Aug. 4, 1265, when he was rescued by his son Edward.

Henry IV. Born at the castle of Bolingbroke, near Spilsby, Lincolnshire, April 3, 1367; died at Westminster, March 20, 1413. The first king of England of the house of Lancaster, 1399–1413, son of John of Gaunt (fourth son of Edward III.) and Blanche, heiress of Lancaster. He was banished by Richard II. in 1398, succeeded his father as duke of Lancaster in 1399, and in the same year returned to England and captured and imprisoned Richard, who was deposed by Parliament at London Sept. 30, 1399. He put down a serious rising under Harry Percy (Hotspur) at the battle of Shrewsbury, July 21, 1403, in which Percy was killed.

Henry V. (of Monmouth). Born at Monmouth, probably Aug. 9, 1387; died at Vincennes, Aug. 31, 1422. King of England 1413–22, son of Henry IV. and Mary, daughter of Humphrey de Bohun, earl of Hereford. He is said on doubtful authority to have been wild and dissolute in his youth, and is so represented by Shakspeare. As king he was able, energetic, and brave. He invaded France in 1415; gained the brilliant victory of Agincourt Oct. 25, 1415; married Catharine of France June 2, 1420; and concluded the peace of Troyes May 21, 1420, by which he was accepted by the French as regent and heir of France.

Henry VI. (of Windsor). Born at Windsor, Dec. 6, 1421; died at London, May 21, 1471. King of England 1422–61, son of Henry V. and Catharine of France. He succeeded to the throne at the age of not quite 9 months, under the protectorship of his uncle John, duke of Bedford, the protectorship being exercised by Bedford's brother Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, during Bedford's absence as regent in France. He was crowned king of France at Paris Dec. 16, 1431, in accordance with the peace of Troyes (see Henry V.) but by 1455 had lost all his possessions in France, except Calais, in consequence of the successes of Joan of Arc and Charles VII. He married Margaret, daughter of René, titular king of Naples and Jerusalem, April 23, 1445. In 1453 he was stricken with insanity, and a contest for the regency ensued between Queen Margaret (supported by the Duke of Somerset) and Richard, duke of York. The Duke of York prevailed, but fell in disgrace on the recovery of Henry in 1454. He thereupon advanced claims to the throne as the descendant of Lionel, elder brother of Henry's ancestor, John of Gaunt, both of whom were sons of Edward III. War broke out in 1455 (see Wars of the Roses, and Edward IV.), and, after many fluctuations of fortune, Henry was deposed by York's son, who was proclaimed king as Edward IV., March 4, 1461. A rising under the Earl of Warwick against Edward in 1470 restored Henry, who had been imprisoned since 1465; but he was recaptured in the same year, and after the final defeat of his party at the battles of Barnet and Tewkesbury, was murdered, it is said, in the Tower of London.

Henry VII. Born at Pembroke Castle, Jan. 28, 1457; died at Richmond, April 21, 1509. The first king of England of the house of Tudor, 1485–1509, son of Edmund Tudor, earl of Richmond, and Margaret Beaufort, through whom he traced his descent from John of Gaunt, son of Edward III. He became head of the house of Lancaster on the death of Henry VI. in the Tower of London in 1471, and, as an object of jealousy to the kings of the house of York, spent the years from 1471 to 1485 in exile, chiefly in Brittany. In 1485 he effected a landing in England, and, having gained the victory of Bosworth Field, Aug. 22, 1485, in which Richard III. fell, was crowned king Oct. 30, 1485. He married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward IV., Jan. 18, 1486, whereby he united in his own person the titles of the houses of Lancaster and York. He defeated the impostor Lambert Simnel (who personated the Earl of Warwick) at Stoke-upon-Trent June 16, 1487, and Nov. 23, 1499, executed the pretender Perkin Warbeck, who personated the Duke of York. Lord Daubeny defeated the rebel Thomas Flamock at Blackheath June 17, 1497. Henry married his son Arthur to Catharine of Aragon Nov. 14, 1501, and his eldest daughter Margaret to James IV. of Scotland in 1502. The Statute of Drogheda, or Poyning's Law, was passed in 1494, and the Cabots discovered North America in 1497. Henry's distinguishing characteristic was his avarice. He accumulated a fortune of £2,000,000, being aided in his extortions by his agents Empson and Dudley.

Henry VIII. Born at Greenwich, June 28, 1491; died at Westminster, Jan. 28, 1547. King of England 1509–47, son of Henry VII. and Elizabeth of York. He ascended the throne on the death of his father April 21, 1509, and June 11, 1509, married Catharine of Aragon, widow of his brother Arthur. He joined the Holy League (which see) against France in 1511. In 1513 he took personal charge of the war in France, and gained with the emperor Maximilian the victory of Guinegate (called the Battle of the Spurs), Aug. 16, 1513. During his absence James IV. of Scotland made war on England in favor of France, and was defeated and killed at Flodden Sept. 9, 1513. He made his favorite Cardinal Wolsey lord chancellor in 1515, and in June, 1520, met Francis I. of France near Calais at the Field of the Cloth of Gold. In 1521 he wrote the "Assertio Septem Sacramentorum" against Luther, which procured for him the title of Defender of the Faith from pope Leo X. After the capture of Francis by the Imperialists at Pavia, he concluded an alliance with France as a counterpoise against the emperor Charles V. (Aug. 30, 1526). In 1527 he instituted proceedings for a divorce from Catharine, alleging the invalidity of marriage with a deceased brother's wife, although a papal dispensation had been properly granted. Enraged at Wolsey's failure to obtain a decree for the divorce from the Pope, he dismissed him from the chancellorship, and bestowed it on Sir Thomas More (1529). At the instance of Cranmer, he obtained opinions from English and foreign universities declaring the invalidity of the marriage and the incompetency of the Pope to grant a dispensation, whereupon he secretly married Anne Boleyn (Jan. 25, 1533), while Cranmer (who had been made archbishop of Canterbury in 1532) declared the marriage with Catharine void (May 23, 1533), and that with Anne Boleyn valid (May 28, 1533). In 1534, in consequence of the refusal of the Pope to grant the divorce, he procured the passage of the Act of Supremacy, which severed the connection of the English church with Rome and appointed the king and his successors protector and only supreme head of the church and clergy of England. He executed More July 6, 1535, for refusing to acknowledge the royal supremacy. At the instance of his new adviser Thomas Cromwell, who was made vicar-general or vicergerent of the king in matters ecclesiastical in 1535, he first suppressed the smaller (1536) and afterward (1539) the larger monasteries, whose property was confiscated. He beheaded Anne Boleyn on the charge of adultery May 19, 1536. He married Jane Seymour May 20, 1536 (she died Oct. 24, 1537). In 1539 he procured the enactment of the Statute of Six Articles (which see). He married Anne of Cleves Jan. 6, 1540. A divorce and the execution of Cromwell followed in the same year, as well as a marriage with Catharine Howard, who was sent to the block on the charge of adultery Feb. 12, 1542. He married Catharine Parr July 12, 1543.

Henry IX., King of England. A title assumed by Cardinal York after the death of his brother, the "Young Pretender."

Henry I. Born about 1011; died Aug. 4, 1060. King of France 1031–60, son of Robert II.

Henry II. Born at St.-Germain-en-Laye, France, March 31, 1519; died at Paris, July 10, 1559. King of France 1547–59, son of Francis I. He married Catharine de' Medici in 1533; conquered the bishoprics of Metz, Toul, and Verdun from Germany in 1552; captured Calais and Guines, the last English possessions in France, in 1558; and was mortally wounded at a tournament in honor of the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth with Philip II. of Spain.

Henry III. Born at Fontainebleau, France, Sept. 19, 1551; died at St.-Cloud, Paris, Aug. 2, 1589. King of France 1574–89, third son of Henry II. and Catharine de' Medici. He was, while prince, styled Duc d'Anjou; defeated the Huguenots at Jarnac and Moncontour in 1569; was elected king of Poland in 1573; and succeeded his brother Charles IX. as king of France in 1574. He sought to maintain a balance of power between the Huguenots and the Roman Catholics, but the favorable peace which he granted to the former in 1576 (the paix de monsieur) occasioned the formation of the Holy League by the Roman Catholics under Henry, duke of Guise, and compelled him to take sides with the Roman Catholic party. The death of his brother, the Duc d'Alençon, in 1584, caused the question of the succession to assume importance, as it left Henry of Navarre, the head of the Huguenot party, heir presumptive to the throne. The Holy League proclaimed the cardinal Charles de Bourbon heir presumptive, which brought on a renewal of the war with the Huguenots in 1585. The victory of Henry of Navarre at Contras, Oct. 20, 1587, was followed by a conspiracy of the leading members of the League to depose the king, whose sincerity was mistrusted. Henry caused the assassination of the Duke of Guise and his brother, Louis de Lorraine, cardinal de Guise, but was forced to take refuge with Henry of Navarre, in whose camp at St.-Cloud he was murdered by the monk Jacques Clément.

Henry IV. Born at Pau, France, Dec. 14 (13?), 1553; died at Paris, May 14 (13?), 1610. King of France 1589-1610, son of Antoine de Bourbon, king of Navarre, and Jeanne d'Albret. He became the head of the Huguenot party on the death of the Prince de Condé in 1569; succeeded to the throne of Navarre in 1572; married Margaret of Valois, sister of Charles IX. of France, at Paris, Aug. 18, 1572; and escaped the general massacre of his partizans inaugurated on the 24th, during the nuptial festivities. (See St. Bartholomew, Massacre of.) The death of the Duc d'Alençon in 1584 left him heir presumptive to the throne of France, but the Holy League refused to recognize his title, and proclaimed the cardinal Charles de Bourbon heir presumptive. War broke out in consequence in 1585. The cardinal was proclaimed king under the title of Charles X. by the League on the death of Henry III. in 1589; but after defeating the Leaguers under the Duke of Mayenne at Ivry, March 14, 1590, and embracing the Roman Catholic religion at St. Denis, July 25, 1593, Henry secured the general recognition of the Roman (Catholic), and was crowned at Chartres, Feb. 27, 1594, although the war was still continued by the League in alliance with Spain. He published the Edict of Nantes (which see) April 13, 1598, and concluded the peace of Vervins with Spain and the League May 2, 1598, which ended the so-called Wars of the Huguenots. He was assassinated by the Roman Catholic fanatic Ravalliac.

Henry V. The name given by the French Legitimists to the Comte de Chambord. See Chambord.

Henry I., surnamed "The Fowler." Born 876; died at Memleben on the Unstrut, Prussian Saxony, July 2, 936. King of Germany 919-936, son of Otto, duke of Saxony. He was elected king on the death of Conrad I., and was the first of the Saxon line of the kings of Germany and emperors of the Holy Roman Empire. He consolidated the German monarchy, enlarged and improved the old fortresses, and put an end to the inroads of the Hungarians, whom he defeated (probably on the Unstrut) in 933.

Henry II., Saint. Born in Bavaria, May 6, 972 (973?); died at Grona, near Göttingen, Prussia, July 13, 1024. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Henry the Quarrelsome of Bavaria. He succeeded Otto III. as king of Germany in 1002, and was crowned emperor in 1014. He made two expeditions to Italy against Arduin, marquis of Ivrea, who had been elected king of Lombardy on the death of Otto. Arduin was overthrown in 1013.

Henry III., "The Black." Born Oct. 28, 1017; died at Bodfeld, in the Harz, Germany, Oct. 5, 1056. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Conrad II, whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 1039. He curbed the power of the feudatories, reduced Peter of Hungary to the position of a vassal, and during an expedition to Rome deposed the three popes Sylvester III., Benedict IX., and Gregory VI., and appointed Clement II., by whom he was crowned emperor on Christmas day, 1046. He raised the imperial power to its highest point.

Henry IV. Born at Goslar, Prussia, Nov. 11, 1050; died at Liège, Belgium, Aug. 7, 1106. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Henry III, whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 1056. The principal occurrence of his reign was the struggle with Hildebrand (see Gregory VII.). He was crowned emperor in 1084 by Clement III., whom he had elevated to the papal see in opposition to Gregory. On the death of Gregory in 1085, his partizans elected Victor III., and Henry in 1090 made a new expedition to Italy to protect Clement. In 1093 his son Conrad rebelled against him, having allied himself with the papal party. Conrad died in 1101, but Henry's younger son, Henry, likewise allied himself with the papal party, and for a time imprisoned his father.

Henry V. Born in 1081; died at Nimwegen, Netherlands, May 23, 1125. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Henry IV, whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 1106. He was crowned emperor in 1111, and in 1122 concluded the Concordat of Worms (which see). He married Matilda, daughter of Henry I. of England, in 1114.

Henry VI. Born at Nimwegen, Netherlands, in 1165; died at Messina, Sicily, Sept. 28, 1197. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Frederick Barbarossa whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 1190. Having inherited the kingdom of the Two Sicilies through his wife Constance in 1189, he undertook an expedition in Italy in 1191 to rescue his inheritance from the usurper Tancred of Lecce; but was compelled to retire to Germany in the same year after an unsuccessful siege of Naples. During this expedition he was crowned emperor at Rome. He subdued the Sicilies in two subsequent expeditions (1194 and 1197), and died as he was about to undertake a crusade to the Holy Land.

Henry VII. Born 1262; died at Buonconvento, near Siena, Italy, Aug. 24, 1313. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of the Count of Luxemburg; he succeeded Albert I. as German king in 1308. He granted the Swiss cantons documentary confirmation of their immediate feudal relation to the empire, and their consequent independence of Austria, in 1309. He was crowned emperor in 1312.

Henry I. Died in July, 1274. King of Navarre 1270-74.

Henry II. Born at Sanguesa, Spain, April, 1503; died at Pan, France, May 25, 1555. Titular king of Navarre. He was an unsuccessful claimant to the throne in 1521.

Henry III., King of Navarre. See Henry IV., King of France.

Henry I. Born at Lisbon, Jan. 31, 1512; died 1580. King of Portugal 1578-80.

Henry, Duc d'Anjou. See Henry III., King of France.

Henry, Prince of Portugal, surnamed "The Navigator." Born at Oporto, Portugal, March 4, 1394; died at Sagres, Portugal, Nov. 13, 1460. Younger son of John I. of Portugal, distinguished for his encouragement of science and geographical discovery. His expeditions rounded Cape Bojador in 1433, discovered Madeira, the Azores, the Senegal, etc.

Henry, Prince of Prussia (G. Friedrich Heinrich Ludwig). Born at Berlin, Jan. 18, 1726; died at Rheinsberg, Prussia, Aug. 3, 1802. A Prussian general, brother of Frederick the Great, distinguished in the Seven Years' War, especially at Prague in 1757, and Freiberg in 1762.

Henry, surnamed "The Lion." Born probably at Ravensburg, Württemberg, 1129; died at Brunswick, Germany, Aug. 6, 1195. Duke of Saxony and Bavaria. He succeeded as duke of Saxony in 1139; received Bavaria in 1155; was deposed and his dominions divided in 1180; and admitted to the emperor in 1181.

Henry of Ghent. Born near Ghent, Belgium, probably about 1217; died at Tournay, Belgium, 1293. A scholastic philosopher, surnamed "Doctor Solennis" ("The Illustrious Doctor").

Henry of Huntingdon. Born about 1084; died 1155. An English historian. His early life was spent at Lincoln, and he became archdeacon of Huntingdon in 1110.

At the request of Alexander, bishop of Lincoln from 1123 to 1147 (Hist. Anglor. Prolog.), he undertook an English history, following Bede by the bishop's advice, and extracting from other chroniclers. The first edition of this work was carried down to 1129, and he continued to add to it at various times, the last edition being brought down to 1134, the year of Stephen's death, which could not long have preceded his own, as we find a new archdeacon of Huntingdon in 1155. The early portion of Henry's "Historia Anglorum" is taken from the usual sources, the "Historia Miscella," "Aurelius Victor," "Nennius," "Bede," and the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle"; he enlarges partly from oral tradition (as in the story of Cnut and the sea), and partly from his own invention. After 1127 he is probably original, and his narrative is written contemporaneously with the events he describes. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Henry of Lancaster. Born about 1299; died at Leicester, May 13, 1361. An English noble, son of Henry, earl of Lancaster (1281 (?)-1345). He commanded under Edward III. in Scotland in 1336; was created earl of Derby in 1337; fought under Edward at Vironfosse; took part in the sea-fight before Sluys; was appointed captain-general in Scotland in 1341; and was lieutenant and captain of Aquitaine May, 1345.-Feb. 1347, defeating the French at Anbroche, Oct. 21, 1345, and gaining many other successes. In 1349 he was created earl of Lincoln, and appointed vice-regent of the duchy of Gascony and of the duchy of Poitou. In 1351 he was created duke of Lancaster, and made captain and admiral of the western fleet. He was engaged in numerous military operations and in diplomatic missions. Among his contemporaries he was famous as a model of knighthood.

Henry of Lausanne; also called Henry of Clugny, Henry the Deacon, Henry the Hermit, etc. Died about 1148. A French itinerant preacher and religious reformer, founder of the sect of the Henricians.

Henry of Marlborough. Flourished about 1420. An English chronicler. He was a chaplain in Dublin, and held the vicarages of Balcaddan and Donabate in Dublin County. His annals (in Latin) cover the history of England and Ireland for the period 1133-1421.

Henry of Trastamare. See Henry II., King of Castile.

Henry IV. A historical play, in 2 parts, by Shakspeare. It was founded on an old play, "The Famous Victories of Henry V." The first part was produced in 1597 and printed in 1598; the second part was produced in 1598 and printed in 1600.

Henry V. A historical play by Shakspeare, acted in 1599, printed 1600. The material was taken from "The Famous Victories of Henry V.," and with the two previous plays completes a trilogy.

Henry VI. A historical play in 3 parts. The first part was acted as a new play in 1592. It was evidently written in 1588-89 by several hands, with additions by Shakspeare. The authors have been said to be Marlowe, Kyd, Peele, and Lodge, and perhaps Greene. (Fleay) The second part is a transcript of a play written about 1589 and published in 1594 as "The First Part of the Contention betwixt the two Famous Houses of York and Lancaster." It is thought to have been written by Greene, Peele, Marlowe, and Lodge, some of it being rewritten by Shakspeare (Fleay) and altered by some illiterate actor. The third part followed. "The true Tragedie of Richard Duke of York, and the Death of Good King Henry the Sixth, etc.," which was the second part of "The Contention," probably mostly by Marlowe, with touches by Shakspeare. These three plays were placed by Heming and Condell in the first collected edition of Shakspeare's plays in 1623.

Henry VIII. A historical play, partly by Shakspeare, who appears to have left it unfinished, the rest being by Fletcher and Massinger. It is founded on Holinshed's "Chronicle" and Fox's "Christian Martyrs," and was produced in 1613. As we have it, it is not the play of that name that was being acted when the Globe Theatre was burned in the same year.

Henry, Joseph. Born at Albany, N. Y., Dec. 17, 1797; died at Washington, D. C., May 13, 1878. An American physicist, especially noted for investigations in electromagnetism. He became secretary of the Smithsonian Institution (Washington) in 1846. Among his works are "Contributions to Electricity and Magnetism" (1839). His collected works were published in 1886.

Henry, Matthew. Born at Broad Oak, Flintshire, Wales, Oct. 18, 1662; died at Nantwich, England, June 22, 1714. An English biblical commentator, son of Philip Henry. He became a nonconformist minister at Chester in 1687, and in 1712 removed to Hlackney. His chief work is the "Exposition of the Old and New Testament" (1708-10). He also wrote "A Method for Prayer" (1710), etc.

Henry, Patrick. Born at Studley, Hanover County, Va., May 29, 1736; died at Red Hill, Charlotte County, Va., June 6, 1799. A celebrated American orator and patriot. He was the son of John Henry, a Scotchman, and Sarah Winston, a descendant of the English family of that name. He was admitted to the bar in 1769. In 1765 he entered the Virginia House of Burgesses, and immediately became the leader in Virginia of the political agitation which preceded the American Revolution. He offered a series of resolutions declaring the Stamp Act unconstitutional, May 29, 1765, and in May, 1773, was associated with Thomas Jefferson, R. H. Lee, and Dabney Carr in procuring the passage of the resolution establishing a committee of correspondence for intercourse with the other colonies. He was a prominent member of the Continental Congress of 1774, and of the Virginia Convention of 1775; was governor of Virginia 1776-79 and 1784-86; and in 1788 was a member of the Ratifying Convention, where he acted with the Anti-Federalists.

Henry, Philip. Born at London, Aug. 24, 1631; died at Broad Oak, Flintshire, June 24, 1696. An English nonconformist divine. His diaries were published in 1882.

Henry, Robert. Born at Murrton, Stirlingshire, Feb. 18, 1718; died at Edinburgh, Nov. 24, 1790. A Scottish historian, author of a "History of England" (1771-93).

Henry and Emma. A poem by Prior upon the model of the old ballad "The Nut Brown Maid."

Henry Clay (hen'ri klā). An American trotting stallion, the founder of the Clay family of trotters. He was by Andrew Jackson, by Grand Bashaw, a supposed Arabian imported from Algiers.

Henry Esmond (hen'ri ez'mond). A novel by Thackeray, published in 1852. The scene is laid in the time of Queen Anne. The book is a reproduction of the manners, thoughts, and literary style which prevailed in England at that period. Henry Esmond, the principal character, is a brave, polished, true, and loyal gentleman, almost too self-sacrificing. He loves Beatrix Esmond, but finally marries her mother, Lady Castlemoore. See Esmond, Beatrix.

Henryson (hen'ri-son), Robert. Born about 1430; died probably before 1500 (Morley). A Scottish poet. He wrote "Schoolmaster of Dunfermline," "Testament of Cressid" (a sort of sequel to Chaucer's "Troilus and Cressida"), "Robene and Makyne" (said to be the earliest English pastoral poem), "Fables of Esop" (probably written between 1470 and 1480), etc. The fables include "The Tail of the Uplandis Mous and the Burges Mous" ("The Country Mouse and the City Mouse"). His collected works were edited by D. Laing (1865).

Henry the Minstrel. See Harry, Blind.

Henschel (hen'shel), Georg. Born at Breslau, Feb. 18, 1850. A musical performer and conductor. He has a barytone voice, and has made a reputation as a concert-singer. He married Lillian Bailey, who is also a singer. He went to England in 1877. In 1881 he was appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1885 he organized the London Symphony Concerts, and appeared for the first time in London as a conductor. From 1880 to 1888 he was professor of singing in Madame Goldschmidt's place at the Royal College of Music, London.

Hensel (hen'sel), Madame (Fanny Cecile Mendelssohn-Bartholdy). Born at Hamburg, Nov. 14, 1805; died May 17, 1847. A pianist and composer, elder sister of Felix Mendelssohn, and wife (Oct. 3, 1829) of W. Hensel, a German painter. She published several books of songs.

Hensel, Wilhelm. Born at Trebbin, Prussia, July 6, 1794; died at Berlin, Nov. 26, 1861. A German historical painter. In 1828 he became court painter. He married the sister of Mendelssohn.

Henselt (hen'selt), Adolf. Born at Schwabach, Bavaria, May 12, 1814; died at Warmbrunn, Silesia, Oct. 10, 1889. A noted German pianist. In 1838 he was made court pianist and teacher of the imperial children at St. Petersburg. He visited England in 1862 and 1867. He, with Liszt, invented and taught the piano technic now in use. He is especially identified with the modern treatment of extensions.

Henshaw (hen'shā), John Prentiss Kewley. Born at Middletown, Conn., June 13, 1792; died near Frederick, Md., July 19 (20?), 1852. An American bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He became rector of St. Peter's, Baltimore, in 1817, and in 1843 became bishop of Rhode Island and rector of Grace Church, Providence. He published a number of theological works, including a volume of "Hymns" (5th ed. 1832).

Henslow (henz'lo), John Stevens. Born at Rochester, England, Feb. 6, 1796; died at Hitcham, Suffolk, May 16, 1861. An English botanist, professor of mineralogy at Cambridge 1822-27, and professor of botany 1827-61. He became rector of Hitcham in 1837. He wrote a "Catalogue of British Plants" (1829), "Principles of Descriptive and Physiological Botany" (1836), "A Dictionary of Botanical Terms" (1857), etc.

Henslowe (henz'lo), Philip. Died in 1616. An English theatrical manager. He began life as servant of the bailiff of Viscount Montague, whose town house was in Southwark. Henslowe took care of the property there, and gradually made money and bought property. He owned the Bear's Head and other inns. In 1585 he bought land on the Bankside, and in 1591 built the Rose Theatre there. In 1592 he began to keep the accounts of his theatrical ventures in his "Diary." In it he gives the dates of new plays and the amounts he paid for them. This diary is of great value to students of the drama. In 1600 he, with Alleyn, built the Fortune Theatre. His "Diary" was edited for the Shakspeare Society (1841).

Hentz (hents'), Mrs. (Caroline Lee Whiting). Born at Lancaster, Mass., 1800; died at Marianna, Fla., Feb. 11, 1856. An American novelist. She wrote "Aunt Patty's Scrap-Bag" (1846), "The Mob Cap" (1848).

Henzada (hen-zá'dá). A district in the Pegu division, British Burma, intersected by lat. 17° 30' N., long. 95° 30' E. Area, about 4,000 square miles. Population, about 480,000.

Hepburn (hep'bern), James, fourth Earl of Bothwell. Born about 1536; died 1578. A Scottish noble, husband of Mary Queen of Scots. He took no part in the murder of Rizzio, and aided Mary, after that event, in her flight from Holyrood, and was her chief supporter. He was the principal in the assassination of Darnley; was tried for the murder, under circumstances which made his conviction practically impossible, and was acquitted. On April 24, 1667, while the queen was returning to Edinburgh, she was met by Bothwell, who, with a show of force, carried her to his castle of Dunbar. He obtained a divorce from his wife early in May, and married the queen soon after (May 15, 1567). They were divorced in 1570. He became a pirate and died insane.

Hephæstion (he-fes'ti-on). [Gr. Ἡφαιστίων.] Lived in the 2d century. An Alexandrian grammarian, author of a work on Greek meters (edited by Gaisford 1810).

Hephæstion. Died at Ecbatana, 325 or 324 B. C. A Macedonian of Pella, the intimate friend and companion of Alexander the Great. He died of fever at Ecbatana, and was mourned by the conqueror with extravagant demonstrations of grief.

Hephestus (he-fes'tus). [Gr. Ἡφαιστος.] In Greek mythology, the god of fire and metallic arts, son of Zeus and Hera, and one of the great Olympians; identified by the Romans with their Vulcan, who became assimilated to him. He was the creator of all that was beautiful and mechanically wonderful in Olympus. Volcanoes were held to be his smithy and the Cyclopes were his journeymen. In art he was represented as a bearded man, usually with the short sleeveless or one-sleeved tunic (exomis) and the conical cap, and holding the smith's hammer and tongs.

Hephzibah (hef'zi-bá). [Heb., 'my delight is in her,'] The wife of Hezekiah, king of Judah; also, a name to be given to the restored Jerusalem (Isa. lxii. 4).

Heppenheim (hep'pen-him). A small town in the province of Starkenburg, Hesse-Darmstadt, 16 miles south of Darmstadt. Near it is the ruined castle of Starkenburg.

Hepameron (hep-tam'e-ron). [Irreg. from Gr. ἑπτά, seven, and ἡμέρα, day.] A book containing the transactions of seven days. The "Hepameron" of Margaret of Angoulême, queen of Navarre (1492-1549), is a collection of stories supposed to have been related during seven days, modeled on the "Decameron" of Boccaccio.

The exact authorship of this celebrated book is something of a literary puzzle. Marguerite was a prolific author, if all the works which were published under her name be unhesitatingly ascribed to her. Besides the poems printed under the pretty title of "Les Marguerites de la Marguerite," she wrote many other works, and the "Hepameron," which was not given to the world until after her death (1558). The house of Valois was by no means destitute of literary talent. But that which seems most likely to be the Queen's genuine work hardly corresponds with the remarkable power shown in the "Hepameron." On the other hand, Marguerite for years maintained a literary court, in which all the most celebrated men of the time, notably Marot and Bonaventure des Périers, held place. If it were allowable to decide literary questions simply by considerations of probability, there could be little hesitation in assigning the entire "Hepameron" to Des Périers himself, and then its unfinished condition would be intelligible enough. The general opinion of critics, however, is that it was probably the result of the joint work of the Queen, of Des Périers, and of a good many other men, and probably some women, of letters.

Heptanomis (hep-tan'ô-mis). [Gr. ἑπτανόμις.] In ancient geography, the part of Egypt extending from about lat. 27° N. to the commencement of the Delta: nearly equivalent to Middle Egypt.

The Heptanomis, or region of the seven provinces or nomes, the northernmost part, is far broader and more productive than the Thebais, which takes its name from Thebes, the southernmost district. In the Heptanomis, about seventy miles by the river above Cairo, on the western bank, stood the city of Ilanes. The site is marked by the extensive mounds around the Arab village of Ahnas-el-Medeeneh, 'Ahnás the capital,' a name probably preserving the remembrance that in earlier times it was the chief town of a province. Poole, Cities of Egypt, p. 37.

Heptarchy (hep'tär-ki). [From Gr. ἑπτά, seven, and ἀρχή, rule.] A name formerly loosely given to the early English kingdoms prior to their consolidation. The number of them, however, was seldom exactly seven, and their union or confederation was partial and temporary. The chief kingdoms were Kent, Wessex, Mercia, East Anglia, Deira and Bernicia (united as Northumbria), and Sussex. See England.

Heptateuch (hep'ta-tük). [From Gr. ἑπτά, seven, and τεύχος, an implement, a book.] The first seven books of the Old Testament. The last two (Joshua and Judges) contain the history of the Jews in the promised land under the theocratic government historically developed in the preceding five (the Pentateuch).

Hepworth (hep'werth), George Hughes. Born at Boston, Mass., Feb. 4, 1833. An American clergyman, lecturer, and writer. He was pastor of the Church of the Unity in Boston 1858-70, and of the Church of the Messiah in New York city 1870-72, when he abandoned the Unitarian and entered the Presbyterian Church. He subsequently occupied the pulpit of the Church of the Disciples, and eventually accepted an appointment on the New York "Herald." He has written "The Whip, Hoe, and Sword" (1864), "The Criminal, the Crime, the Penalty" (1865), etc.

Hera, or Here (hé'rä, -rë). [Gr. Ἥρα, Ἥρη.] In Greek mythology, the greatest feminine divinity of Olympus, queen of heaven, wife and sister of Zeus, and inferior in power to him alone. She was the type of virtuous womanhood, and of the wife and mother. In art she is represented as a majestic woman, fully clad in flowing draperies, characteristically with a crown on her brow, and bearing a long scepter. By the Romans Hera was early identified with their Juno, originally a distinct divinity; and the Latin name is often incorrectly given to the Greek goddess.

Heraclæa (her-a-klë'ä). [Gr. Ἡράκλεια.] In ancient geography, a city of Magna Græcia, situated near the Gulf of Tarentum about lat. 40° 10' N., long. 16° 41' E., near the modern Policoro. It was a Tarentine colony, and was the scene of a victory of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, over the Romans 280 B. C.

Heraclæa, surnamed "Minoa" (Gr. Μίνωα). In ancient geography, a city on the southern coast of Sicily, 18 miles west-northwest of Agrigentum.

Heraclæan Tables (her-a-klë'an tä'blz), L. Tabulæ Heraclæenses. Two fragmentary bronze tablets discovered near Heraclæa in Magna Græcia about the middle of the 18th century, and preserved at Naples. They contain a Latin inscription (a copy of the "Lex Julia municipalis"), and also a much earlier Greek inscription.

Heraclæa Perinthus. See Perinthus.

Heraclæa Pontica (pon'ti-kä). In ancient geography, a city in Bithynia, Asia Minor, situated on the Black Sea in lat. 41° 17' N., long. 31° 25' E.; the modern Bender Ereklî.

Heraclæa Sintica (sin'ti-kî). In ancient geography, a town in Macedonia, situated about lat. 40° 54' N., long. 23° 30' E.; the modern Zeruokhori.

Heraclæa Trachinia (tra-kin'i-î). In ancient geography, a town in Malis, Greece, 10 miles west of Thermopylæ: a Spartan colony.

Heraclidæ. See Heraclidae.

Heraclitus. See Heraclitus.

Heraclionites (he-rak'lë-on-its). The followers of Heraclion, a Valentinian Gnostic of the 2d century, noted as a commentator on the Gospel of John.

Heraclæus. See Hercules.

Heraclian (he-rak'li-an). Died at Carthage, 413 A. D. A Roman general. He assassinated Stilicho in 408 at the instance of the emperor Honorius, for which service he was rewarded with the office of count of Africa. He remained loyal to Honorius during the usurpation of 409 and 410 of Attilius, the creature of Alaric, but revolted in 413, in which year he made an unsuccessful invasion of Italy. He was killed at Carthage by emissaries of the emperor.

Heraclidæ (her-a-klë'dë). [Gr. Ἡρακλῆϊδαι.] 1. The descendants of Hercules; specifically, in Greek legend, certain Achaean chiefs claiming descent from Hercules, who in prehistoric times joined the Dorian migration to the Peloponnesus. The sons of Hercules were said to have been expelled from their heritage in the Peloponnesus by Eurystheus, and to have settled in Attica. The most notable of their descendants who joined the Dorians were Temenus, who in the partition of the conquered territories obtained Argos; Procles and Eurysthenes, who obtained Lacedæmon; and Cresphontes, who obtained Messenia. The invasion of the Peloponnesus by the Heraclidæ in alliance with the Dorians was commonly referred to as the return of the Heraclidæ.

2. A tragedy of Euripides, exhibited about 420 B. C. "It celebrates the honourable conduct of Athens in protecting the suppliant children of Hercules, and her victory over the insolent Argive king Eurysthenes, who invades Attica to recover the fugitives. The play was obviously intended as a political document, directed against the Argive party in Athens during the Peloponnesian war." Mahaffy.

Heraclitus (her-a-klë'tus). [Gr. Ἡράκλειτος.] Born at Ephesus, probably about 535 B. C.; died there, probably about 475 B. C. A celebrated Greek philosopher.

Heraclitus. An elegiac poet of Halicarnassus, a contemporary and friend of Callimachus.

Heraclius (her-a-klë'us). Born in Cappadocia, Asia Minor, about 575; died 641. Emperor of the East. He was the son of Heraclius, governor of Africa, and succeeded to the throne as the result of a conspiracy between his father and Crispus, the son-in-law of the emperor Phocas. In the early years of his reign the empire was terribly ravaged by the inroads of the Avars and the Persians. After having established the Croats and the Serbs in Illyria as a barrier against the former about 620, he annihilated the power of the latter in a series of brilliant campaigns 622-628. The subsequent years of his reign were spent in an inexplicable inactivity, which resulted in the loss of Syria, Palestine, Mesopotamia, and Egypt to the califs.

Héraclius (ä-rä-klë-iüs'). A play by Corneille, published in 1647.

Heras, Juan Gregorio de las. See Las Heras.

Herat (her-ät'). 1. A territory in western Afghanistan, bordering on Persia.—2. A city of Afghanistan, situated near the river Heri-Rud, lat. 34° 20' N., long. 62° 9' E. It is a place of strategic and military importance, defended by a wall and earthwork, and has been called "the key of India." It was often captured in the middle ages; was unsuccessfully besieged by the Persians in 1837-38, and taken by them in 1856; and was taken by Dost Mohammed in 1863, and by Abdurrahman Khan in 1881. It has undergone over 50 sieges. It is the center of a very fertile district, and is a natural emporium of trade. Population, about 30,000.

Hérault (ä-rö'). 1. A river in southern France, flowing into the Mediterranean 31 miles southwest of Montpellier. Length, about 100 miles.—2. A department of southern France. Capital, Montpellier. It is bounded by Aveyron and Gard on the north, Gard on the east, the Mediterranean and Aude on the south, and Tarn on the west, corresponding to part of the ancient Languedoc. Among the leading products are oil and wine. Area, 2,393 square miles. Population (1891), 461,651.

Hérault de Séchelles (ä-rö' de sä-shel'). Marie Jean. Born at Paris, France, 1760; guillotined at Paris, April 5, 1794. A French revolutionist. He was a member of the Legislative Assembly in 1791, of the Convention in 1792, and of the Committee of Public Safety in 1793.

Herbart (her'bärt), Johann Friedrich. Born at Oldenburg, Germany, May 4, 1776; died at Göttingen, Prussia, Aug. 14, 1841. A noted German philosopher, professor at Königsberg (1809) and later (1833) at Göttingen, the founder of a school noted especially for its work in psychology. He published "Lehrbuch zur Einleitung in die Philosophie" (1813), "Lehrbuch zur Psychologie" (1816), "Psychologie" (1824-25), "Allgemeine Metaphysik" (1828-29), "Encyclopædie der Philosophie" (1831). His complete works were edited by Hartenstein (1850-52).

Herbelin (erb-län'), Madame (Jeanne Mathilde Habert). Born in Seine-et-Oise, Aug. 24, 1820. A French miniature-painter. She painted the only miniature admitted to the Louvre.

Herbelot (er-blö'), Barthélemy d'. Born at Paris, Dec. 4, 1625; died there, Dec. 8, 1695. A French Orientalist. He published "Bibliothèque orientale, ou dictionnaire universel" (1697), etc.

Herbert (her'bërt), Edward, Lord Herbert of Cheshbury. Born about 1582; died at London, Aug. 20, 1633. An English philosopher, soldier, diplomatist, and historian. His chief work is "De veritate" ("On Truth," 1624).

Herbert, George. Born at Montgomery Castle, Wales, April 3, 1593; died at Bemerton, near Salisbury, Feb., 1633. An English poet, brother of Edward, Lord Herbert of Cheshbury. He graduated B. A. at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1613, and M. A. in 1616, when he was elected fellow. In 1618 he was prelector in the rhetoric school at Cambridge, and in 1619 he was made public orator. He was much in favor at court, and in his position as orator it was his duty to write all official letters to the government. This brought him much in contact with public men. In 1627 he resigned the post on account of ill health. In 1630 Charles I. presented him to the rectory of Fugglestone with Bemerton, Wiltshire. He repaired Bemerton church, which is said to be the smallest in England. It was restored by Wyatt in 1866. Here he wrote the religious poems for which he is principally remembered, and which were published after his death in a volume called "The Temple: Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations" (1633). In 1670 "more than 20,000 copies had been sold." There have been many editions, the most careful being that of Grosart in his collected edition of Herbert (1874). He also wrote "A Priest to the Temple, or the Country Parson," in prose (1652), etc.

Herbert, Henry William: pseudonym Frank Forester. Born at London, April 7, 1807; committed suicide at New York, May 17, 1858. An Anglo-American miscellaneous writer, author of historical works, novels, translations, etc. He is best known by his works on sports: "Field Sports of the United States" (1849), "Frank Forester and his Friends" (1849), "The Horse and Horsemanship of the United States" (1857), etc.

Herbert, John Rogers. Born at Maldon, Essex, England, Jan. 23, 1810; died at London, March 17, 1890. An English historical and portrait painter. He was elected one of the masters of the government school of design at Somerset House in 1841, and royal academician in 1846. He decorated the peers' robing-room in the House of Lords. His picture "Sir Thomas More and his Daughter" is in the Vernon collection, National Gallery.

Herbert, Sidney, first Lord Herbert of Lea. Born at Richmond, Surrey, Sept. 16, 1810; died at Wilton, England, Aug. 2, 1861. An English statesman, younger son of the eleventh Earl of Pembroke. He was secretary at war 1845-46, 1852-55, and 1859-61, and colonial secretary 1855.

Herbert, Sir Thomas. Born at York, England, about 1606; died at York, March 1, 1682. An English traveler and author. He obtained a place in the suite of Sir Dodmore Cotton, ambassador to the King of Persia, in 1627. After the death of Cotton in the following year, he made an extensive tour of the Persian dominions, and returned to England in 1629. He adhered to the Parliamentary cause during the civil war; was appointed to attend Charles I. during his confinement at Holdenby in 1647; and in the same year was appointed by the king as one of his grooms of the bedchamber. He wrote "A Description of the Persian Monarchy" (1634; reprinted with additions as "Some Yeares Travels into Africa and Asia the Great" in 1638) and "Threnodia Carolina" (1678; reprinted with additions as "Memoirs of the last two years of the reign of that Unparalleled Prince of very blessed memory, King Charles I.," in 1702).

Herborn (her'born). A town in the province of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, 39 miles northeast of Coblenz.

Herculaneum (her-kū-lā'nē-um). [Gr. Ἡράκλειον, city of Hercules.] An ancient city of Campania, near the coast, 6 miles southeast of Naples, directly at the foot of Mount Vesuvius. It was overwhelmed like Pompeii in the eruption of 79 A. D., being covered in this and succeeding eruptions first with mud and then with ashes and lava to a depth of from 70 to 112 feet. The ancient town was forgotten, and modern Resina grew up over its ruins. In 1709 an inhabitant of Resina struck a well which reached the ancient level in the stage structure of the theater, and brought to light sculptures and marble facings. Further search was made, solely for the marbles and works of art, and subsequently excavations were undertaken by the government, but were very ignorantly and irregularly conducted, and the galleries pierced were in great part filled again. Under the French rule (1806-15) systematic explorations were instituted; a little was done between 1828 and 1837; then nothing until Victor Emmanuel caused the resumption of the work in 1860. The most important remains are the theater, basilica, prison, some interesting private dwellings, and portions of several streets paved with lava. In Herculaneum were found a number of carbonized manuscripts on papyrus, some of which have been deciphered, and some of the best-known statues of the Naples Museum, including the Aspinna, Sleeping Faun, Aristides, and busts of Plato and Demosthenes.

Herculano de Carvalho e Araujo (er-kō-lā'nō de kār-vā'l'vō ē ā-rou'zhō). Alexandre. Born at Lisbon, March 28, 1810; died Sept. 12, 1877. A Portuguese poet, historian, and novelist. His works include the poem "A voz do propheta" ("The Voice of the Prophet," 1836), "Historia de Portugal" (1846-53), "Da origem e estabelecimento da Inquisição em Portugal" (1854-55), the novels "Eurico" (1847), "O monge de Cister" ("The Monk of Cister," 1848), etc.

Hercules (her'kū-lēz), Gr. Hercules (her'aklōz). [Gr. Ἡρακλῆς.] In Greek and Roman mythology, a mighty hero, originating in Greek legend, but adopted by the Romans, and worshiped as the god of physical strength, courage, and related qualities. According to the mythical account, his father, Zeus (Jupiter), destined him to the sovereignty of Tyros by right of his mother, Alcmena, granddaughter of Perseus, but was thwarted by Hera (Juno). After Hercules had performed wonderful deeds in behalf of Thebes, his birthplace, Hera consented to his being made immortal, on condition of his accomplishing certain superhuman feats for his rival Eurystheus of Tyros, in which he succeeded. These feats, called the "twelve labors" of Hercules, were as follows: (a) the strangling of the Nemean lion; (b) the killing of the Lernean hydra; (c) the capture of the Ceryneian stag; (d) the capture of the Erymanthian boar; (e) the cleaning of the Augean stables; (f) the slaughter of the Stymphalian birds; (g) the capture of the Cretan bull; (h) the capture of the man-eating mares of Diomedes; (i) the securing of the girdle of Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons; (j) the fetching of the red oxen of Geryon; (k) the procuring of the golden apples of the Hesperides; (l) the bringing to the upper world of the dog Cerberus, guardian of Hades. The subject of this most famous of the Herculean legends (of comparatively late date) is distinguished as the Thyrnthian Hercules from other personifica-tions of Hercules worshiped in different places and countries (as the Cretan or the Egyptian Hercules, etc.), under the same or other names, the attributes of these various personifications being essentially the same, but their legendary history being different. Hercules is represented as brawny and muscular, with broad shoulders, generally naked, or draped merely in the skin of the Nemean lion, the head of the lion being often drawn over that of the hero as a helmet. He is usually armed with a club, sometimes with a bow and arrows. See Izubar (Gisduhar).

It has long been recognized that Heracles was the borrowed Phœnician sun-god; we now know that his primitive prototype had been adopted by the Phœnicians from the Accadians of Babylonia. It is not strange, therefore, that just as in the Greek myth of Aphrodite and Adonis we find the outlines of the old Chaldean story of Istar and Tammuz, so in the legends of Heracles we find an echo of the legends of Gisduhar. The lion destroyed by Gisduhar is the lion of Nemea; the winged bull made by Anu to avenge the slight offered to Istar is the winged bull of Krete; the tyrant Khumbaba, slain by Gisduhar in "the land of pine-trees, the seat of the gods, the sanctuary of the spirits," is the tyrant Geryon; the gems borne by the trees of the forest beyond "the gateway of the sun" are the apples of the Hesperides; and the deadly sickness of Gisduhar himself is but the fever sent by the poisoned tunic of Nessos through the veins of the Greek hero.

Sayerce, As-yria, p. 111.

Hercules. One of the ancient constellations, between Lyra and Corona Borealis, representing a man upon one knee, with his head toward the south, and with uplifted arms. The ancients did not identify the constellation with Hercules; the moderns place a club in one hand and a branch of an apple-tree, with the three heads of Cerberus, in the other. The constellation contains 1 star of the second magnitude, 9 of the third, and 12 of the fourth.

Hercules. A British armored war-ship, launched in 1867. Her dimensions are—length, 325 feet; breadth, 59 feet; displacement, 8,840 tons. She has a water-line belt of armor from 5 feet above to 5 feet below the water-line, a single-decked central citadel, and armored bulkheads at each end. Thickness of armor, 6, 8, and 9 inches. Armament, 8 10-inch, 2 9-inch, and 4 7-inch guns.

Hercules, Pillars of. See Pillars of Hercules.

Hercules and Stag. A notable antique bronze from Pompeii, in the Museo Nazionale, Palermo, Sicily. The figure of Hercules is slender and youthful; he seizes the stag by one horn, and forces him to the ground.

Hercules Buffoon. See Lacy, John.

Hercules (Infant) Strangling the Serpents. A painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds (1788), in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. The child is in the act of throttling the two serpents; Iphicles shrinks back, and Alcmena with attendant rushes in; while Juno appears in a dark cloud above. It was ordered by Catharine II., and symbolizes Russia's struggles, as a new nation, with besetting troubles.

Hercynian Forest (her-sin'i-an for'est). The. [L. Hercynia Silva, Gr. Ἡρκενία ὕλη.] In ancient geography, a mountain-range forming the northern boundary of the then known Europe, and seemingly identified by Aristotle with the Alpine mass. It has been variously represented as in central Germany, and as identical with the Bohmerwald, the Thüringerwald, etc. In modern geography it is usually made to comprise the mountain elevations of central Germany (Wesergebirge, the Harz, the Thuringian and Saxon highlands, Giant Mountains, etc.).

Herdecke (her'de-ke). A town in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, on the Ruhr northeast of Elberfeld-Barmen.

Herder (her'der). Johann Gottfried von. Born at Mohrungen, in East Prussia, Aug. 25, 1744; died at Weimar, Dec. 18, 1803. A German critic and poet of the so-called classical period of German literature. He was the son of a poor school-teacher. Through his own exertions he was able to attend the University of Königsberg, where he supported himself by giving private instruction. From 1764 to 1769 he was a teacher in Riga. In the latter year he went to Paris, where he accepted the position of companion to the young Prince of Holstein on a journey to Italy. He accompanied the latter, however, only as far as Strasburg, where he remained the succeeding year. In 1771 he received a call as pastor to Buckeburg, where he lived until 1776. At the recommendation of Goethe, whom he had known in Strasburg, he was called that year to Weimar as court chaplain and superintendent of the church district, and here, with the exception of a journey to Italy in 1788, he lived until his death. In 1802 he was ennobled by the Elector of Bavaria. His first important works, both of which were published in Riga, were "Fragmente über die neuere deutsche Literatur" ("Fragments concerning the More Recent German Literature," 1767), and "Kritische Walder" ("Critical Forests," 1769). In 1772 appeared, further, the treatise "Über den Ursprung der Sprache" ("On the Origin of Language"). In 1773 he published, in collaboration with Goethe, "Von deutscher Art und Kunst einige fliegende Blätter" ("A Few Flying Sheets on German Style and Art"). In 1774 appeared "Die älteste Frkunde des Menschengeschlechts" ("The Oldest Record of the Human Race"). The most important of his works written in Weimar are "Volkslieder" ("Folk-Songs," 1778 and 1779), called in later editions "Stimmen der Völker in Liedern" ("Voices of the Nations in Songs"); "Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit" ("Ideas on the Philosophy of the History of Mankind," 1784-91); "Briefe zur Beförderung der Humanität" ("Letters for the Advancement of Humanity," 1793-97). The poem "Der Cid" ("The Cid"), written 1802-03, appeared posthumously in 1805. A complete edition of his works was published at Stuttgart, 1827-30, in 60 vols.

Héreau (ā-rō'), Jules. Born at Paris, 1830; died June 26, 1879. A French landscape-painter, noted especially for his figures of animals.

Heredia (ā-rā' dē-ā), José Maria. Born at Santiago de Cuba, Dec. 31, 1803; died at Toluca, Mexico, May 7, 1839. A Spanish-American poet. He lived successively in various parts of Spanish America; was banished from Cuba in 1823 for taking part in an attempted insurrection; passed two years in the United States; and from 1825 resided in Mexico, where he held various judicial offices. His poems have had numerous editions, and many have been translated into other languages; his "Ode to Niagara" is widely known. Many critics consider Heredia the greatest of the Spanish-American poets.

Heredia, Pedro de. Born at Madrid about 1500; died near Cadiz, Jan. 27, 1554. A Spanish soldier. He was the lieutenant of Vadillo, and governor of Santa Marta. He returned to Spain in 1529, and was authorized to colonize and govern the district of Nueva Andalucía, corresponding to northwestern Colombia. He founded Cartagena (Jan. 14, 1533) and other cities, made many expeditions to the interior, and obtained a great amount of gold. In 1537 he was accused of irregularities and sent to Spain, but was restored in 1539. He was again forced to go to Spain to answer charges in 1548 and 1554; on the latter voyage he was shipwrecked and drowned.

Hereford (her'e-fōrd). [ME. Herford, Herford, Herforth, AS. Hereford, army-ford, from here, army, and ford, ford.] 1. A county of south midland England. It is bounded by Shropshire on the north, Worcester and Gloucester on the east, Gloucester and Monmouth on the south, and Wales on the west. The chief industry is agriculture. It is noted for its breed of cattle, and is sometimes called "the garden of England." Area, 340 square miles. Population (1891), 115,849.

2. The capital of Herefordshire, situated on the Wye in lat. 52° 4' N., long. 2° 43' W. It has a trade in agricultural produce. The cathedral is a highly interesting monument, founded 1079, but in large part built in the course of the 13th century. The lady chapel is a beautiful example of Early English, and the great square central tower is effective. The lower part of the nave and choir retains its massive cylindrical Norman piers and round arches with chevron-molding. The work above is later, that in the northwest transept being of especial beauty. There are many fine tombs and beautiful old church furniture. The city had formerly a strong castle. It was the birthplace of Garrick. Population (1891), 20,267.

Herencia (ā-ren'thē-ā). A town in the province of Ciudad Real, Spain, 77 miles south of Madrid. Population (1887), 5,924.

Herencia Ceballos (ā-ren'thē-ā thā-bāl'yōs), Mariano. Born at Cuzco, 1820; died at Huancayo, Feb. 2, 1873. A Peruvian soldier and politician. He was an advanced liberal, took part in various revolts, and was prominent in Congress. He was elected vice-president in the Balta administration, and was acting president after Balta's death, July 26 to Aug. 2, 1872. Soon after he was condemned to banishment, and was shot by the soldiers who were conducting him to the frontier.

Hérens (ā-roin'). Val d', G. Eringerthal (ā'ring-er-tail). An alpine valley in the canton of Valais, Switzerland, situated about 20 miles east of Martigny, noted for its picturesque scenery.

Here (hēr) Prophecy, The. A bit of old English rime, which was preserved by Abbot Benedict. It is connected with the image of a hart set up in 1289 by Ralph Fitzstephen over his house at Here.

The date of the setting up the hart was that of the death of Henry II. and the accession of Richard I., and the probable sense of the lines is: "When thou seest a hart reared up in Here, then shall the English people be divided into three parts: one shall go all too late into Ireland." There John, who was Lord, removed, at his brother Richard's succession to the English crown, the fighting John de Courcy from direction of affairs, and made him an enemy; while Richard's coming crusade, exciting the hopes of the Irish chiefs, caused them to patch up their own quarrels and agree on a combined rising, of which the most notable result was the destruction of the English army at Thurles. The results would have been serious to England if the insurgents had not again fallen out among themselves. Then the prophecy proceeds—"The other into Apulia, with profitable remaining." On his way to the Holy Land, Richard remained at Messina, where, in a quarrel about his sister's dowry, he extorted from Tancred, the last of the Norman kings of Sicily, forty thousand ounces of gold, and betrothed his nephew Arthur of Bretagne to Tancred's daughter. Then of the third division the prophecy adds—"The third in their highest oath, all drawn to vengeance." That is to say, by their oath as Crusaders to avenge the desecration of the Holy Place by the infidel. The last line, as given by Hoveden, is a corruption. This is my own guess at the unsolved riddle of the last part of the Here Prophecy, and, if not in every word right, it seems to give the true general sense.

Morley, English Writers, III. 201.

Herero (he-rā'rō), or Ovaherero (ō-vā-he-rā'rō). A Bantu tribe and language of German Southwest Africa, in what is called Damaraland or Hereroland. They called themselves Ovaherero, and their language Otshihero. By some they are called Cattle-Damaras, in distinction from the Hill-Damaras. The whole life of the Herero is encrossed by his herds of cattle, which he well nigh worships, and by wars with the Nama-Hottentots, whose chief business is periodically to raid Herero cattle. The Ovaherero have been partly Christianized by German missionaries, who have created a considerable literature in Otshihero. This language belongs to the same cluster as that of the Ovambo and Ovimbundu.

Hereroland (he-rä'rö-land). See Herero.

Hereward (her'e-wärd). Flourished about 1070. A noted English outlaw and patriot who defended Ely against the Normans. He was a Lincolnshire man, incorrectly said to have been a son of Leofric, earl of Mercia. In 1070 he joined the Danes, who had appeared in the Humber, and attacked Peterborough and sacked the abbey. He took refuge with his band in the Isle of Ely, from which he was finally driven by William the Conqueror. According to John of Peterborough, he was surnamed "the Wake." Many legends sprang up about his name.

Hereward the Wake. A historical novel by Charles Kingsley, published in 1866.

Herford (her'förd). A town in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, situated at the junction of the Werre and the Aa, 48 miles west-southwest of Hannover. It has manufactures of cotton and flax. It is built around an ancient nunnery. Population (1890), 19,255.

Héricourt. See Belfort, Battle of.

Hering (hä'ring), Constantin. Born at Oschatz, Saxony, Jan. 1, 1800; died at Philadelphia, July 23, 1880. A German-American homeopathic physician. He published "Rise and Progress of Homeopathy" (1834), "Domestic Physician" (1837), etc.

Heringsdorf (hä'rings-dorf). One of the leading watering-places on the Baltic, situated in the island of Usedom, Pommerania, Prussia, 5½ miles northwest of Swinemünde.

Heriot (her'i-ot), George. Born at Edinburgh, 1563; died at London, Feb., 1623. A Scottish goldsmith and philanthropist. He founded Heriot's Hospital at Edinburgh. He is a prominent figure in Scott's "Fortunes of Nigel."

Heri-Rud (her-ë-röd'), or Herat-Rud, or Hari-Rud. A river in northern Afghanistan and on the Persian frontier, which, under the name of Tejend, disappears in the Turkoman steppes, Asiatic Russia, about lat. 37° 30' N., long. 60° E.; the ancient Arius. Length, about 650 miles.

Herisau (hä'rö-sou). The largest town in the half-canton of Appenzell Outer Rhodes, Switzerland, situated on the river Glatt in lat. 47° 23' N., long. 9° 16' E. It manufactures muslin. Population (1888), 12,970.

Heristal, or Heristal. See Herstal.

Herjeå-dalen (her'ye-å-dä'len). A district in the southern part of Jemtland, Sweden.

Herkimer (her'ki-mër), Nicholas. Died at Danube, N. Y., in Aug. 1777. An American Revolutionary general, of German extraction. He commanded the militia of Tryon County, who in 1777 marched to the relief of Fort Stanwix on the Mohawk River, which was besieged by the British. He defeated a detachment of the British at Oriskany in Aug. of that year, but was himself wounded in the battle, and died in consequence of an unskillful surgical operation.

Herkomer (her'kö-mër), Hubert. Born at Waal, in Bavaria, May 26, 1849. An English genre, landscape, and portrait painter. He came to America in 1851 with his father, a wood-carver, but went to England in 1857 and settled in Southampton, where he entered the School of Art. In 1865 he visited Munich, and in 1866 he entered the schools at South Kensington under Frederick Walker. He became a member of the Institute of Water Colors in 1871, and associate of the Royal Academy in 1879. He received the medal of honor, Paris, 1878. In 1873 he settled in Bushey, Hertfordshire, where he established an art school in 1881. He revisited America in 1882, and again in 1883 and 1885. He was appointed Slade professor of art at Oxford as successor to John Ruskin, and became a member of the Berlin Academy in 1885. Perkins, Cyclopedia of Painters and Paintings.

Hermadad (er-män-dä'äd'). [Sp. 'a brotherhood.'] In Spain, originally, a voluntary organization (the Santa Hermadad, or Holy Brotherhood) for the maintenance of public order. The first Hermadad was formed in Aragon in the 13th century, and another in Castile and Leon a few years later, chiefly to resist the exactions and robberies of the nobles. They soon assumed general police and judicial powers, under royal sanction; and at the end of the 15th century the organizations were united and extended over the whole kingdom. The Hermadad was soon after reorganized as a regular national police, which has been superseded in later times by a civic guard on the model of the French gendarmier.

Hermann. See Arminius.

A German archaeologist and philologist, professor at Marburg (1832) and later (1842) at Göttingen. His best-known work is "Lehrbuch der griechischen Antiquitäten" ("Manual of Greek Antiquities," 1841-52).

Hermannsdenkmal (her'mänz denk'mäl). A monument of the chieftain Arminius at Detmold, Germany, dedicated in 1875. The arched pedestal is 100 feet high, and the colossal statue measures 86 feet to the point of the uplifted sword. The figure is of sheet-copper secured to a framework of iron.

Hermannstadt (her'män-stät'). [Hung. Nagy Szécheny, Rumanian Sibiu, L. Cibinium.] The capital of the county of Hermannstadt, Transylvania, situated on the Cibin in lat. 45° 48' N., long. 24° 8' E. It was formerly an important trading center. The majority of the inhabitants are Germans. The Brukenthal Palace (with collections) and the Rathaus are of interest. It was founded by German colonists in the 12th century; was formerly capital of Transylvania; and was the scene of several contests between Hungarians, Austrians, and Russians in 1849. Population (1890), 21,465.

Hermann und Dorothea (her'män önt dor-ö-tä'ä). An idyllic poem by Goethe, published in 1797. The scene is laid about the year 1796, and has a basis of fact in a story connected with the expulsion of several hundred Protestants from his territory by the Archbishop of Salzburg, which occurred in 1731. Hermann is an established citizen of a little town, and represents a settled life as contrasted with the wandering and unsettled life of the fugitive but self-reliant Dorothea exiled from her home, whom he finally wins and marries.

Hermanric (her'män-rik), or Ermanaric (G. Hermanrich). Died 376. King of the East Goths. He was descended from the royal family of the Amal, and ruled over a loosely welded Gothic confederacy extending probably over northern Hungary, Lithuania, and southern Russia. He was defeated by the Huns at the beginning of the migration of the peoples in northern Europe, and fell upon his sword in 376, having, it is said, attained an age of over one hundred years.

Hermaphroditus (her'mä-f'ro-di'tus). [Gr. Ἑρμαφρόδιτος.] In Greek mythology, the son of Hermes and Aphrodite. With the nymph of the fountain Salmacis, in Caria, he was united into one person.

Hermas, Shepherd of. See Shepherd of Hermas. Hermenegild (her'me-ne-gild), Saint. Died at Tarraco, April 13, 585. A West-Gothic prince. He was the son of Leovigild, king in Spain, by whom he was admitted to a share in the government in 573. He rebelled against his father and was put to death. He was canonized by Pope Sixtus V., tradition having pictured him as a champion of the Catholic faith against the Arian, to which his father adhered.

Hermengyld (her'men-gild). The wife of the Constable in Chaucer's "Man of Law's Tale," of whose murder Constance (Custance) was falsely accused.

Hermes (her'mēs). [Gr. Ἑρμῆς.] In Greek mythology, the herald and messenger of the gods, protector of herdsmen, god of science, commerce, invention, and the arts of life, and patron of travelers and rogues; son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Maia, born on Mount Cyllene in Arcadia. He was the guide (psychopompus) of the shades of the dead to their final abode. In art he is represented as a vigorous youth, beardless after the archaic period, and usually but slightly draped, with caduceus, petasus, and talarias attributes. The Roman Mercury, a god of much more material and solid character, became identified with Hermes. The name has also been given to quicksilver.

Hermes, or a Philosophical Inquiry concerning Universal Grammar. A work by James Harris, published in 1751.

Hermes (her'mēs), Georg. Born at Dreierwalde, Westphalia, Prussia, April 22, 1775; died at Bonn, Prussia, May 26, 1831. A German Roman Catholic theologian, founder of the system of Hermesianism, a rationalizing theory of the relation of reason to faith. He wrote "Einleitung in die christkatholische Theologie" (1819-29), "Christkatholische Dogmatik" (1834-36).

Hermesianax (her-me-si'a-naks). Born at Colophon, Asia Minor; lived in the last part of the 4th century B. C. A Greek elegiac poet. Fragments of his works have been edited by Hermann, Bergk, etc.

Hermes of Andros. A statue so named, in the National Museum, Athens. It is, in fact, a sepulchral statue of the 4th century B. C., the finest existing example of idealized portrait-figures of this class.

Hermes carrying the Infant Bacchus. An original statue by Praxiteles, in the museum at Olympia, Greece. The left arm, with the child, rests on a tree-stump, over which is thrown the himation. The right arm was raised, and held some object to amuse the child. It is the finest rendering of a beautiful youthful figure surviving from antiquity.

Hermes (Mercury) in repose. A beautiful Greek original bronze of the school of Lysippus, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The figure leans slightly forward; the expression is one of rest and amiability.

Hermes Trismegistus (tris-me-jis'tus). [Lit. 'Hermes the thrice greatest.'] The Greek name of the Egyptian god Thoth, the reputed author of 42 encyclopedic works on Egypt. A partial collection of Hermetic writings was translated into French by Ménard in 1866.

Hermia (her'mi-ä). In Shakspeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," an Athenian lady, the daughter of Egeus; she is in love with Lysander.

Hermione (her-mi-ö-nē). [Gr. Ἑρμιόνη.] 1. In Greek mythology, the daughter of Menelaus and Helen, and wife of Neoptolemus, and later of Orestes.—2. The wife of the jealous Leontes in Shakspeare's "Winter's Tale." She is the Bellaria of Greene's "Pandosto," the story from which the "Winter's Tale" was taken.

3. A character in Racine's "Andromaque," said to be "the most personally interesting on the French tragic stage."—4. The wife of Damon in the tragedy "Damon and Pythias" by Banim and Sheil.

Hermione, Lady (Lady Erminia Pauletti). A rich Genoese lady in Sir Walter Scott's novel "The Fortunes of Nigel."

Hermiones (her-mi-ö'nēs), Hermionones (her-mi-nö'nēs), or Irminones (her-mi-nö'nēs). [L. (Tacitus) Hermionones, the Latinization of a hypothetical Germanic fundamental name Ermin(e)naz*, a name of the god Tiwaz*, Tiu*, AS. The (in Tiwesdag), ON. Tjör, OHG. Zio, L. Jupiter, Gr. Zeüs. Cf. AS. Tiwesdag.] According to Tacitus, one of the three great divisions of the West-Germanic people, named from their ancestors, the three sons of Mannus, Ingwæones, Hermionones, and Istwæones. The Hermionones comprehended, particularly, the Upper German tribes. The Ingwæones lived by the sea, and included the Lower German tribes. The Istwæones were the tribes of the Rhine region who ultimately formed a principal part of the Franks. The terms are, however, of inexact ethnologic application. Pliny makes a fivefold division in that he gives, besides the three groups of Tacitus, the Vindili and the Pencil-Bastaræ. The names were probably in their first use not ethnologic, but were originally applied to Amphictyonic unions all devoted to the cult, under different attributes, of the old Germanic heaven-god.

Hermitage, The. 1. A palace at St. Petersburg, Russia, founded by Catharine II., originally in the form of a pavilion of moderate size, but rebuilt in the 19th century, especially for a museum, in a neo-Greek style of excellent effect, and forming one of the best-designed museums existing. It measures 375 by 512 feet, and has 2 interior courts. The entrance porch is supported by 10 colossal human figures, and the roof of the grand hall rests on 16 fine monolithic columns. On one side of the building is a copy of Raphael's Loggia in the Vatican, which survives from the old palace. The collection includes important ancient sculpture, the unparalleled discoveries of Greek jewelry, textile fabrics, and other minor antiquities, from the Crimea, and one of the great galleries of paintings of Europe.

2. A fashionable resort at Moscow, Russia. It is a garden on the side of a hill.—3. A chalet built in the valley of Montmorency, France, by Madame d'Épinay as a retreat for Jean Jacques Rousseau. He passed about 6 years here (1751-57), writing then a part of "La nouvelle Héloïse," the "Discours sur l'inégalité des conditions," and a part of his "Dictionary of Music." Grétry died here in 1813.

4. An old house near Nashville, Tennessee, the residence of President Andrew Jackson.

Hermite, Tristan l'. See Tristan.

Hermocrates (her-mok'ra-tēs). [Gr. Ἑρμοκράτης.] Died at Syracuse about 407 B. C. A Syracusan general and politician. He was one of the three generals who in 414 were intrusted with the defense of Syracuse against the Athenians, and who after several spirited but unsuccessful engagements were deprived of their commands. He was one of the commanders of the Syracusan squadron in the naval battle of Cynossema in 411. He was banished in 409, and was killed in an attempt to make himself master of Syracuse.

Hermodorus (her-mö-dö'rus) of Ephesus. A Greek philosopher who is said to have assisted the decemvirs in drawing up the laws of the Twelve Tables at Rome in 451 B. C.

Hermogenes (her-moj'e-nēs). [Gr. Ἑρμογένης.] Born at Tarsus, Cilicia; lived in the second half of the 2d century. A noted Greek rhetorician. His rhetorical treatises were edited (in the "Rhetores Græci") by Walz.

The greatest theologian of the period now under consideration was Hermogenes, the son of Calippus of Tarsus. The year of his birth is not known, but he was only fifteen when the fame of his precocious genius as an extempore speaker led the emperor M. Aurelius to send for him; and he introduced himself by saying, "Behold, I am come to you, O prince, an orator requiring a pedagogue, an orator still looking forward to maturity." Soon after this he became a public teacher of rhetoric.

Hermion (hēr'mōn). [Gr. Ἡρμιών.] A mountain-ridge and the culminating point in the range of Anti-Libanus, Syria, situated about 35 miles west-southwest of Damascus; the modern Jebel-esh-Sheikh. Height, 9,200 feet.

Hermopolis (hēr-mon'this). [Gr. Ἡρμιούπολις.] In ancient geography, a town in the Thebaid, Egypt, situated on the Nile 8 miles southwest of Thebes; the modern Erment. It was a seat of ancient worship, and important ruins remain, notably those of a temple built in the time of Cleopatra.

Hermopolis. See Hermupolis.

Hermopolis (hēr-mop'ō-lis), or Hermupolis (hēr-mup'ō-lis), Magna. [Gr. Ἡρμούπολις μεγάλη, great city of Hermes.] In ancient geography, a city of Egypt, situated near the Nile in lat. 27° 45' N.; the modern Eshmun or Ashmunein. Near it are the tombs and grottoes of Beni-Hassan (which see).

Hermosillo (hār-mō-sel'yō). A city, capital of the state of Sonora, Mexico, situated on the river Sonora about lat. 29° 10' N., long. 110° 45' W. Population (1892), 7,071.

Hermisdorf (herus'dorf), Nieder-. A village and tourists' resort in the province of Silesia, Prussia, 42 miles southwest of Breslau. Population (1890), commune, 7,614.

Hermunduri (hēr-mun'dū-rī or hēr-mun-dū'rī). [L. (Pliny) Hermunduri, Gr. (Strabo) Ἡρμόνδουρα.] A German tribe, a branch of the Suevi, first mentioned by Strabo. They were situated on the Saale eastward to the middle Elbe, and adjoined the Chatti on the west, in the Harz region. They are mentioned under their old name for the last time in the 4th century. They in all probability became, finally, the Thuringians.

Hermupolis (hēr-mup'ō-lis), or Hermopolis (hēr-mop'ō-lis), or Syra (sē'rā). [Gr. Ἡρμούπολις, city of Hermes.] A seaport and the capital of the nomarchy of the Cyclades, Greece, situated on the island of Syra, lat. 37° 26' N., long. 24° 57' E. Population (1889), 22,104.

Hermus (hēr'mus). [Gr. Ἡρμῶς.] In ancient geography, a river in western Asia Minor, flowing into the Gulf of Smyrna 10 miles northwest of Smyrna; the modern Ghedis-Tchai or Sarabat. Length, about 180 miles.

Hernals (her-nälz'). A western suburb of Vienna.

Hernandez (ār-nän'däth), Francisco. Born at Toledo, 1514; died about 1578. A Spanish naturalist. Philip II. sent him to Mexico with the cosmographer Francisco Dominguez to study the natural history of the country. He traveled there from 1570 to 1576, and prepared 16 folio volumes on plants, animals, and minerals; portions of these were published in 1648, 1651, and 1791.

Hernandez Córdoba, Francisco. See Córdoba. Hernandez Giron, Francisco. See Giron. Hernandez de Oviedo y Valdés, Gonzalo. See Oviedo y Valdés.

Hernani, ou l'Honneur Castillan. A tragedy by Victor Hugo, acted, after much opposition, Feb. 25, 1830. See Ernani.

The main subject of "Hernani" is the point of honour which compels a noble Spaniard to kill himself, in obedience to the blast of a horn sounded by his mortal enemy, at the very moment of his marriage with his beloved.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 520.

Hernon (hēr'nōn), William Henry. Born at Greensburg, Ky., Dec. 28, 1818; died near Springfield, Ill., March 18, 1891. An American lawyer. He removed with his parents to Illinois in 1820, and in 1843 entered into law partnership with Abraham Lincoln, which continued in form until the death of the latter. He wrote a "Life of Abraham Lincoln" (1859).

Hernon, William Lewis. Born at Fredericksburg, Va., Oct. 25, 1813; died Sept. 12, 1857. An American naval officer. In 1851-52, being then a lieutenant, he was sent with Lieutenant Lardner Gibbon to make an exploration of the river Amazon and its Peruvian tributaries. The results were published by the United States government as "Exploration of the Valley of the Amazon" (1853, 2 vols.: Vol. I. by Hernon, Vol. II. by Gibbon). Hernon was promoted commander in 1855; took service with the Panama Mail Steamship Company; and perished in the wreck of the Central America, which went down in a cyclone.

Herne the Hunter. A traditional personage supposed to range near an old oak, known as Herne's Oak, in Windsor Park. It was blown down in 1863, and was supposed to be about 650 years old. The queen has planted a young oak on the spot.

Hernici (hēr'nī-sī). In ancient history, an Italian people, allied to the Sabines, dwelling in the Apennines about 40 miles southeast of Rome. Their capital was Anagnia. They were subjugated by Rome 306 B. C.

Hernösand (her'né-sänd). A seaport, capital of the laen of Westernorrland (or Hernösand), Sweden, situated on the island of Hernö, near the mouth of the river Angerman, about lat. 62° 37' N., long. 17° 50' E. It has some manufactures. Population (1890), 5,789.

Hero (hēr'ō). [Gr. Ἥρω.] In Greek legend, a priestess of Aphrodite at Sestos, on the Hellespont, beloved by Leander. See Hero and Leander.

Hero. See Heron.

Hero. The daughter of Leonato, and friend and cousin of Beatrice, in Shakspeare's "Much Ado about Nothing." The real story of the play, the slandering of Hero, is generally left out in the stage version.

Hero and Leander. 1. A poem in 340 verses, ascribed to Musæus. "For grace of diction, metrical elegance, and simple pathos, which avoids all violations of good taste, this little canto stands far before the other poems of the same age. We know nothing of the history of this Musæus, but his imitations of the style of Sappho show that he was later than the poet of Panopolis. He is indirectly referred to by Agathias, who flourished in the first half of the sixth century." K. O. Müller.

The poem of "Hero and Leander" belongs rather to erotic than to epic poetry. Its subject is the well-known story of Hero, the beautiful priestess of Venus at Sestos, and Leander, who was the glory of Abydos on the other side of the water, and who swam across the Hellespont every evening to his fair bride, till at last he was drowned on a winter's night, and his body cast up at the foot of Hero's tower, who, in despair, cast herself down from the battlements, and died by the side of her lover. This tragedy of Hero and Leander, the Juliet and Romeo of the Dardanelles, was of much older date than Musæus. It was well known to Ovid, Virgil, and Statius, and had become a popular love-tale. But Musæus is the author of the most complete version of the story, and he has told it in a manner which will bear criticism. There is no pause in the brief narrative from the beginning, where the lovers meet, like the hero and heroine of Heliodorus and Shakspeare, on a festive occasion, down to the fatal issue of Hero's passion. The poet does not, like the other erotic writers, delight in his opportunity of describing details. There is nothing to shock the most delicate reader, and the grace of the language is sometimes enhanced by a conciseness of expression which would have done credit to a better age. The "Hero and Leander" of Musæus is the dying swan-note of Greek poetry, the last distinct echo of the old music of Hellas.

K. O. Müller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, III, 370. (Donaldson.)

2. A poem of Marlowe and Chapman, based on the poem of Musæus. The first edition consisted of Marlowe's portion, 2 sestiams; the second edition gave the whole poem, the remaining 4 sestiams being written by Chapman after Marlowe's death. Both editions appeared in 1598.

Herod (her'od) I., surnamed "The Great." [Gr. Ἡρόδης.] King of Judea 40-4 B. C. He came of an Idumean family which was converted to Judaism. His father, Antipater, succeeded during the conflict between Hyrcanus II. and his brother Aristobulus II. in obtaining a hold in Judean politics and befriending the Romans. Accordingly when Antipater was appointed by Cæsar in 47 B. C. procurator of Judea, Herod, though only 15 years old, was made governor of Galilee, and shortly afterward of Cæle-Syria. In 40 he had to flee from Judea to Rome, and was appointed by the senate king of Judea. In 37 he took possession of Jerusalem with the aid of the Romans. During the civil war he was on the side of Mark Antony, but after the battle of Actium (31 B. C.) he secured the favor of the victorious Octavianus, who not only confirmed him in his kingdom, but also considerably increased his territory, so that it extended from the sea to Syria, and from Damascus to Egypt. His policy toward Rome was that of cringing servility, though his secret aim may have been the founding of an independent monarchy. His attitude toward the people over whom he ruled was characterized by entire want of understanding of or sympathy with its nature, ideals, and aspirations. His rule was marked by unscrupulous selfishness and bloody despotism. In his family relations he showed himself passionate, jealous, and cruel. At the same time, he was bold, prudent, understanding his opportunities and knowing how to avail himself of them, liberal, and fond of pomp and display. To these qualities may be ascribed his success, and what popularity he obtained. Thus, to strengthen his position he had his benefactor Hyrcanus II. executed, and it was assumed that his brother-in-law Aristobulus, appointed by him high priest, was drowned at his instigation for fear of his great popularity with the people. The people he held in abeyance by bloody terror. Even the magnificent temple begun 20 B. C. and finished in 5 years (Joseph., Antiq., XV, 11) could not gain him the hearts of the outraged people. At the same time with the temple, he erected everywhere theaters, gymnasia, and heathen temples. Even some cities owe their origin to his love of building, notably Caesarea. Samaria was turned by him into a fortress, and named Sebaste. In a fit of jealousy he executed his beautiful wife Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus II., and later his two sons by her, Alexander and Aristobulus, and five days before his death his eldest son by Doris, Antipater. His last order, according to a well-known story, was for the massacre of the nobles immediately after his decease, so that at least his death might cause mourning (Joseph., Antiq., XVII, 6, 5). He died in great agony from a loathsome disease, which drove him to a suicidal attempt, 4 B. C. In Mat. ii. 16, he is represented as having ordered the massacre of the infants of Bethlehem, in order to exterminate the child Jesus, an act which would have been quite in harmony with his character as a superstitious despot and tyrant, but the historicity of which causes chronological difficulties.

Herod Agrippa. See Agrippa.

Herod Antipas (her'od an'ti-pas). Son of Herod the Great, appointed by his father successor to the throne, but invested by the Romans with only the tetrarchy of Galilee. He first married the daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabatheans, but abandoned her to marry Herodias, the wife of his half-brother Herod Philip, and was thus involved in a war with Aretas. At the instigation of his wife he had John the Baptist, who reproached him for his criminal marriage, imprisoned and afterward executed. Jesus called him "the fox." When his nephew Agrippa I. was made king of Judea by Caligula, Antipas, urged by his wife, repaired to Rome also to obtain a kingdom. Agrippa accused him of treachery to Rome, and Antipas was deprived of his principality and banished to Lyons. He was followed thither by his wife, and both died in exile.

Herodes, Atticus. See Atticus Herodes.

Herodians (he-rō'di-anz). A party among the Jews in the time of Christ and the apostles, adherents of the family of Herod. The Herodians constituted a political party rather than a religious sect. Some writers suppose that they were for the most part Sadducees in religion.

Herodianus (he-rō-di-ā-nus), or Herodian (he-rō'di-an). [Gr. Ἡρῴδιανός.] Born about 170 (?) A. D.; died about 240 (?) A. D. A Greek historian, resident in Italy, author of a Roman history for the period 180-238 A. D. (Commodus to Gordian).

Herodianus, Ælius. Born at Alexandria: lived at the end of the 2d century. A Greek grammarian, author of a work on prosody.

Herodias (he-rō'di-as). Lived in the first half of the 1st century. The sister of Herod Agrippa I., wife of Herod Philip, and afterward second wife of Herod Antipas, half-brother of Herod Philip. See Herod Antipas.

Herodotus (he-rod'ō-tus). [Gr. Ἡρόδοτος.] Born at Halicarnassus, Asia Minor, probably about 484 B. C.; died at Thurii, Italy, probably about 424 B. C. A celebrated Greek historian, surnamed "the Father of History." According to the commonly accepted account of his life, gleaned chiefly from his own works, he was the son of Lyxes and Dryo, persons of means and station at Halicarnassus; assisted in the expulsion of the tyrant Lygdamus from his native city; traveled in the Persian empire, Egypt, Asia Minor, and Greece; lived in Samos, and later in Athens; and settled as a colonist in Thurii (probably in 444). He wrote a history in 9 books (named after the nine Muses) of the Persian invasion of Greece down to 479 B. C. It was first printed in the original by Aldus Manutius in 1562; a Latin version by Valla having appeared as early as 1474.

About fifteen manuscripts of the history of Herodotus are known to critics; and of these, several are not of higher antiquity than the middle of the fifteenth century. One copy, in the French king's library (there are in that collection five or six), appears to belong to the twelfth century; there is one in the Vatican, and one in the Florentine library, attributed to the tenth century; one in the library of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, formerly the property of Archbishop Sancroft, which is believed to be very ancient; the libraries of Oxford and of Vienna contain also manuscripts of this author.

Taylor, Hist. Anc. Books, p. 171.

Herod Philip (her'od fil'ip). Died about 34 A. D. Son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, made tetrarch of Auranitis and the neighboring regions in 4 B. C. His wife Herodias deserted him for his half-brother, Herod Antipas.

Hérod (ā-rō'd'), Louis Joseph Ferdinand. Born at Paris, Jan. 28, 1791; died at Paris, Jan. 19, 1833. A noted French composer of comic operas. He took the grand prix de Rome for his cantata "Mlle. de la Vallière" in 1812. His works include "La Gioventù di Enrico Quinto" (1816), "Charles de France" (with Boieldieu; 1816), "Les rosières" (1817), "Le premier venu" (1818), "Les trouneurs" (1819), "L'Amour platonique" (1819), "Le muletier" (1823), "Le roi René" (1824), "Le dernier jour de Missolonghi" (1828), "Emeline" (1828), "Zampa" (1831), "La marquise de Brinvilliers" (1831), "La médecine sans médecine" (1832), "Le pré aux clercs" (1832), "Ludovic" (finished by Halévy; 1833), etc. He also wrote a great deal of music for the pianoforte, and a number of graceful ballads.

Heron (hēr'on), or Hero. [Gr. Ἥρων.] An Alexandrian mathematician of the 3d century B. C., the inventor of "Hero's fountain," in which a jet of water is maintained by condensed air, and of a machine acting on the principle of Barker's mill, in which the motion is produced by steam. Fragments of his works on mechanics have been preserved.

Heron, surnamed "The Younger." A Byzantine mathematician and natural philosopher, probably of the 7th century.

Heron (her'ōn), Matilda. Born at Londonderry, Ireland, Dec. 1, 1830; died at New York, March 7, 1877. An actress. She made her début at Philadelphia (1851), when quite young, as Bianca in "Fazio." Her principal part was Camille. In 1857 she married Robert Stoepl, a musician, and was divorced from him in 1869. Her daughter, Bijou, also an actress, was born at New York in 1863.

Heroopolites Sinus (her-ō-op-ō-lī'tēz sī'nus). [Gr. Ἡροπόλιτις κόλπος, gulf of Heroopolis, from ἦ' Ἡρώων πόλις, city of heroes, a city on the coast.] The ancient name of the Gulf of Suez.

Herophilus (he-rof'i-lus). [Gr. Ἡρόφιλος.] Born at Chaleedon, Bithynia; lived about 300 B. C. A Greek anatomist and physician.

Herostatus (he-ros'tra-tus). [Gr. Ἡρόστρατος.] An Ephesian who set fire to the temple of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus (as it happened, on the night of the birth of Alexander the Great) in order to immortalize himself.

It was remarked by Hegesias the Magnesian that the conflagration was not to be wondered at, since the goddess was absent from Ephesus, and attending on the delivery of Olympias; an observation, says Plutarch, frigid enough to have put out the fire. The stroke of genius in question, however, is ascribed by Cicero, whose taste it does not seem to have shocked, to Timæus of Tauromenium.

Smith, Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology, II. 439.

Herrada, Juan de. See Ruda.

Herran (är-rän'). Pedro Alcantara. Born at Bogotá, Oct. 19, 1800; died there, April 26, 1872. A Colombian general and statesman. He served in the war for independence, and in Peru 1824-26. He subsequently was prominent as a liberal in the civil wars of New Granada, at times as commander-in-chief of the government forces, and was president 1841-45. General Herran was known as the "Húsar de Ayacucho," from a brilliant charge which he made in that battle.

Herrenhausen (her-ren-hou-zen). A royal palace in Hannover. George I. and George II. of England resided there.

Herrera, or Herrera y Tordesillas (er-rä'rä ē tör-dä-sel'väs), Antonio de. Born at Cuellar, Segovia, 1549; died at Madrid, March 29, 1625. A Spanish historian. Philip II. made him chief chronicler of America and one of the chroniclers of Castile, offices which he held until his death. His greatest work is the "Historia general de los hechos de los Castellanos en las islas y Tierra Firme del Mar Oceano," in 8 decades (Madrid, 1601). This includes the history of America, written in the form of annals, from 1492 to 1554, and is the most important of the older works on the subject. Herrera also published a history of the world during the reign of Philip II., and many other works.

Herrera, Fernando de. Born at Seville, Spain, 1534; died at Seville, 1597. A celebrated Spanish lyric poet, surnamed "the Divine," a friend of Cervantes who wrote a sonnet in his honor. His poetical works were published by his friend, the painter Francisco Pacheco, in 1582 and 1619. He also wrote "Relacion de la guerra de Chipre, y suceso de la batalla naval de Lepanto" (1572), and "Vida y Muerte de Tomas Moro" (1592).

Herrera, Francisco, surnamed el Viejo ("the Old"). Born at Seville, Spain, about 1576; died at Madrid, 1656. A Spanish painter, etcher, engraver, and architect. Among his best works is a "Last Judgment," at Seville.

Herrera, Francisco, surnamed el Mozo ("the Young"). Born at Seville, Spain, 1622; died at Madrid, 1685. A Spanish painter, son of Francisco Herrera.

Herrera, José Joaquin de. Born in Jalapa, 1792; died at Taubaya, Feb. 10, 1854. A Mexican general and statesman. An officer in the Spanish army, he followed the defection of Iturbide in 1821, but opposed him as emperor. He was several times minister of war; was president of the Supreme Court; and was temporary president of the republic in 1844. He was elected president Sept. 14, 1845, but was compelled to resign Dec. 30; was second in command under Santa Anna during the war with the United States; and was again president during a peaceful term, May 30, 1848, to Jan. 15, 1851.

Herrera y Obes (är-rä'rä ē ö'bäs), Julio. Born at Montevideo about 1846. An Uruguayan statesman. He was a lawyer and journalist; was minister of foreign affairs in 1872; on the fall of Ellauri (1875) was banished; returned in 1877; and was minister of government under President Tajás. At the end of Tajás's term Herrera was elected president, March 1, 1890, for the term ending Feb. 28, 1894.

Herschel (her'shel). A name given for a time to the planet now known as Uranus, discovered by Sir William Herschel.

Herschel, Caroline Lucretia. Born at Hannover, Prussia, March 16, 1750; died there, Jan. 9, 1848. An English astronomer, sister and collaborator of Sir William Herschel. She published a "Reduction and Arrangement in the Form of a Catalogue in Zones of all the Star Clusters and Nebulae observed by Sir William Herschel."

Herschel, Sir John Frederick William. Born at Slough, near Windsor, England, March 7, 1792; died at Collingwood, near Hawkhurst, Kent, England, May 11, 1871. A celebrated English astronomer and physicist, son of Sir William Herschel. He continued his father's researches on double stars and nebulae, and conducted observations at the Cape of Good Hope 1834-38. His chief work is "Results of Astronomical Observations made 1834-1838 at the Cape of Good Hope" (1847). Among his other works are "Study of Natural Philosophy" (1830), "Outlines of Astronomy" (1849), "Familiar Letters on Scientific Subjects" (1866), etc.

Herschel, Sir William (originally Friedrich Wilhelm). Born at Hannover, Prussia, Nov. 15, 1738; died at Slough, near Windsor, England, Aug. 25, 1822. A celebrated English astronomer, of German birth. He joined the band of the Hanoverian Guards as oboist at the age of 14; deserted and went to England in 1757; was engaged in the teaching of music; and attained considerable success as a violinist and organist. He instructed himself in mathematics and astronomy; and in 1773 constructed a telescope with which he observed the Orion nebula. In 1775 he erected his first large reflecting telescope. On March 13, 1781, he discovered the planet Uranus, naming it, in honor of George III., "Georgium Sidus," a name which was not accepted by astronomers. He was made court astronomer in 1782. On Jan. 11, 1787, he discovered two satellites of Uranus (Oberon and Titania); on Aug. 28, 1789, a sixth satellite of Saturn (Enceladus), and on Sept. 17, 1789, a seventh (Mimas). His great reflecting telescope (tube 39 feet 4 inches long) was erected in 1789. "In nearly every branch of modern physical astronomy he was a pioneer. He was the virtual founder of sidereal science. As an explorer of the heavens he had but one rival—his son." Dict. Nat. Biog.

Hersent (er-soñ'), Louis. Born at Paris, March 10, 1777; died there, Oct. 2, 1860. A French historical and portrait painter. He was a pupil of Regnault.

Heshbon (hesh'bon). In Bible geography, a city in Palestine, about 36 miles east of Jerusalem. It was the capital of Sihon, king of the Amorites, and afterward belonged successively to the Israelites and to the Moabites. It was tributary to Tholmes III. It is the modern Hesban.

Hesiod (hē'si-ōd). [Gr. Ἡσίοδος.] A celebrated Greek poet. He was, according to a poem attributed to him, born in the village of Ascra, in Boeotia, and probably lived about 735 B. C. His youth was, according to the same authority, spent in rural pursuits at his native village. He appears to have lived during the latter part of his life at Orchomenus, where he is said to have been buried. The obscurity in which his life is involved has led some critics to adopt the opinion that the name does not represent an actual person, but is a mere personification of the Boeotian or Hesiodic school of poetry, as opposed to the Homeric or Ionic. Of the numerous works commonly ascribed to him the most important are "Works and Days" and "Theogony." The former is chiefly composed of precepts on rural economy and maxims of morality; the latter is an account of the origin of the world and the birth of the gods.

Hesione (he-si'ō-nē). [Gr. Ἡσιόνη.] In Greek legend, a daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, and Leucippe. She was exposed, as a propitiatory sacrifice, to be killed by a sea-monster sent by Poseidon to devastate the land. Hercules slew the monster and set her free, and, when the promised reward was refused him, took Troy, slew Laomedon and his sons, and gave Hesione to his companion, Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Peucer.

Hesperia (hes-pē'ri-ā). [Gr. Ἑσπερία.] According to the ancient Greeks, the region of the west, especially Italy, and sometimes, according to the poets, the Iberian peninsula.

Hesperides (hes-per'i-dēz). [Gr. Ἑσπερίδες.] In Greek mythology, maidens, guardians of the golden apples which Gaia (Earth) caused to grow as a marriage-gift for Hera. They dwelt in the extreme west, or, according to one account, among the Hyperboreans. According to Hesiod they were daughters of Night; in later accounts, daughters of Atlas and Hesperis, named Egla, Arethusa, Erytheia, and Hesperia.

Hesperus (hes'pe-rus). [Gr. Ἑσπερος.] The evening star, in Greek mythology, son of Astræus and Eos (according to Hesiod). He was regarded as identical with the morning star, and was hence called the "Light-bringer." Compare Phosphorus.

Hesperus. In Arthurian legend, the name given to Sir Pertolope, the Green Knight. Temyson calls him the "Evening Star": his famous combat took place at dawn. See Hesperus, above.

Hesperus, Mount. See Banded Peak.

Hess (hes), Heinrich Maria von. Born at Düsseldorf, Prussia, April 19, 1798; died at Munich, March 29, 1863. A German historical painter, brother of Peter von Hess; noted for his frescoes in Munich.

Hess, Karl Ernst Christoph. Born at Darmstadt, Germany, Jan. 22, 1755; died at Munich, July 25, 1828. A German engraver. Among his best works are "A Charlatan" after Dow, "Ascension of the Virgin" after Guido Reni, portraits after Rubens, and a "Holy Family" after Raphael.

Hess, Peter von. Born at Düsseldorf, Prussia, July 29, 1792; died at Munich, April 4, 1871. A noted German painter of battles and genre scenes, son and pupil of Karl Ernst Christoph Hess, and pupil of the Munich Academy. He served in the campaigns of 1813-15, and went to Greece in 1833 and to Russia in 1839 to make studies for battle pictures ordered by the czar. Among his works are "Battle of Arcis-sur-Aube," "Passage of the Beresina," "French Wagon-train" (National Gallery in Berlin), "Battle of Leipzig," "Battle of Ansterlitz," etc.

Hesse (hes), G. Hessen (hes'sen). A landgraviate of the German-Roman Empire. It lay along the Main and the middle Rhine, and extended northeastward to the Weser. The ancient inhabitants were the Chatti. The landgraves of Thuringia became rulers in Hesse in the 12th century. On the extinction of the Thuringian line in 1247, various claimants appeared. In 1263, by the treaty of Wettin, Henry of Brabant acquired certain possessions, and styled himself landgrave and prince of Hesse, making Cassel his capital. Various acquisitions were made (Giessen, Homburg, etc.). Philip the Magnanimous, landgrave of Hesse, was one of the leaders of the Reformation. At his death in 1567 the country was divided among his four sons, and the lines of Hesse-Cassel, Hesse-Darmstadt, Hesse-Rheinfels (extinguished 1583), and Hesse-Marburg (extinguished 1604) were formed. See below.

Hesse, Grand duchy of. A grand duchy and state of the German Empire. It comprises mainly two separate parts—the northern, consisting of the province of Upper Hesse (Oberhessen), surrounded by Prussia; and the southern, consisting of the provinces of Starkenburg (east of the Rhine) and Rhine Hesse (west of the Rhine), bounded by Prussia on the west and north, and Bavaria and Baden on the east and south. There are also 11 smaller exclaves. The chief physical features are the Odenwald, the Vogelsberg, outliers of the Taunus, and the plains of the Rhine and Main. Hesse has considerable production of wine and flourishing manufactures. The capital is Darmstadt; the chief city Mainz. The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy with a grand duke and a Landtag of 2 chambers. Hesse has 3 representatives in the Bundesrat and 9 in the Reichstag. The religion of the majority is Protestant. The landgraviate of Hesse-Darmstadt was constituted in 1567. (See Hesse, above.) It lost to France the territories west of the Rhine in the wars of the French Revolution; ceded various territories in 1803, but was largely increased by territories from Mainz, the duchy of Westphalia, etc.; entered the Confederation of the Rhine in 1806, and became a grand duchy, receiving territory; joined the Allies in 1813; entered the Germanic Confederation in 1815; ceded the duchy of Westphalia to Prussia in 1815, and made other cessions, but received extensive territories and the towns of Mainz and Worms; and received a constitution in 1820. It sided with Austria against Prussia in 1866, and was obliged to make contributions and cede Hesse-Homburg and portions of Upper Hesse to Prussia, the grand duke being compelled to enter the North German Confederation for his territories north of the Main. From that time it has usually been called Hesse, instead of Hesse-Darmstadt. Area, 2,965 square miles. Population (1890), 992,883.

Hesse (hes'se), Adolf Friedrich. Born at Breslau, Prussia, Aug. 30, 1809; died there, Aug. 5, 1863. A German organist and composer for the organ.

Hesse (es), Jean Baptiste Alexandre. Born at Paris, Sept. 30, 1806; died at Paris, Aug. 7, 1879. A French historical painter, nephew of N. A. Hesse.

Hesse, Nicolas Auguste. Born at Paris, 1795; died at Paris, June 14, 1869. A French historical painter.

Hesse-Cassel (hes'kas'el), or Electoral Hesse, G. Hessen-Kassel (hes'sen-käs'sel), or Kurhessen (kür'hēs-sen). A former landgraviate and electorate which lay north of Hesse-Darmstadt. It was formed in 1567 at the division of the Hessian lands; was occupied by the French in the Seven Years' War; furnished 22,000 troops for the British service against the United States; lost to France in 1795 its territory west of the Rhine; received a few accessions and the electoral dignity in 1803; was seized by the French in 1806; was allotted to the Kingdom of Westphalia in 1807; had its elector restored in 1813; and received part of the principality of Fulda and other territories in 1815, and entered the Germanic Confederation. A constitution was proclaimed in 1831. A constitutional struggle between the liberals and Hasenpflug in 1850 led to the armed intervention of Austrian aid of Hasenpflug. Hesse sided with Austria against Prussia in 1866, and was annexed by Prussia in 1866. The greater portion forms part of the province of Hesse-Nassau.

Hesse-Darmstadt (hes'därm'stüt). A landgraviate of Germany, formed in 1567, now called Hesse. For its history, see Hesse, Grand duchy of.

Hesse-Homburg (hes'hem'börg), G. Hessen-Homburg (hes'sen-hom'börg). A former landgraviate of Germany. It included Homburg-vor-der-Höhe (north of Frankfurt-on-the-Main) and Meisenheim (between the Rhine Palatinate and Birkenfeld). It branched off from Hesse-Darmstadt in 1596; was made subordinate to Hesse-Darmstadt in 1806 and independent in 1815; received Meisenheim in 1816; and entered the Germanic Confederation in 1817. By extinction of the house in March, 1866, it reverted to Hesse-Darmstadt, which in Sept., 1866, ceded it to Prussia. It now forms part of the province of Hesse-Nassau and of the Rhine Province.

Hesse-Nassau (hes'näs'ä), G. Hessen-Nassau (hes'sen-näs'sou). A province of Prussia, formed in 1868. Capital, Cassel. It comprises nearly all Hesse-Cassel, nearly all Nassau, part of Hesse-Homburg, the other cessions made by Hesse in 1866, and those made by Bavaria in 1866. It is surrounded by the Prussian provinces of Saxony, Hannover, Westphalia, and the Rhine, Hesse, Bavaria, Waldeck, and Saxe-Weimar; and there are also several small exclaves. It surrounds Upper Hesse. The surface is generally hilly, and in part mountainous. The soil is generally fertile. Agriculture and industries are flourishing. There are 2 government districts, Cassel and Wiesbaden. Area, 6,068 square miles. Population (1890), 1,664,426.

Hessian (hesh'än). The German dialect of old Hessian territory about the upper Lahn, the Fulda, and the Eder. With Upper and Middle Franconian and Thuringian, it forms the group specifically called Middle German.

Hessians (hesh'anz). The natives or inhabitants of Hesse in Germany. The Hessians as a race are the representatives of the ancient Teutonic people the Catti (Chatti); they formed various minor states in Germany, of which the chief have been Hesse-Cassel (annexed to Prussia in 1866) and the grand duchy of Hesse, called Hesse-Darmstadt previous to 1866.

Hessus (hes'sös), Helius Eobanus. Born at Halgehausen, Hesse, Jan. 6, 1488; died at Marburg, Prussia, Oct. 4, 1540. A German poet. Among his Latin poems are versions of the Psalms and of the Iliad.

Hestia (hes'ti-ä). [Gr. Ἑστία.] In Greek mythology, the goddess of the hearth, daughter of Cronos and Rhea, identified with the Roman Vesta.

Hestia. An asteroid (No. 46) discovered by Pogson at Oxford, Aug. 16, 1857.

Hesvan (hes'van), or Heshvan (hesh'van). [Heb.] The eighth month of the Jewish year, corresponding to the latter part of Oct. and a part of Nov. It has 29 or 30 days. Its fuller form is Mar-hesvan, from Babylonian arab-shamnu (with customary phonetic change), eighth month. Like the other names of the Hebrew months, it was borrowed from the Babylonians about the time of the exile.

Hesychnasts (hes'i-kasts). [Gr. ἡσυχαστής, one who leads a retired life.] A body of monks who lived on Mount Athos during the 14th century, and aimed to attain, by the practice of contemplation and asceticism, perfect serenity of mind, and hence supernatural insight and divine light, with knowledge of the Deity.

Hesychnus (he-sik'i-us). [Gr. Ἠσυχῆος.] Put to death at the beginning of the 4th century. An Egyptian bishop, reputed reviser of the Septuagint and the New Testament.

Hesychnus. Lived in the 6th (or 4th?) century. A Greek grammarian of Alexandria. He compiled a Greek lexicon, edited by Alberti and Ruhken 1740-66, and by M. Schmidt 1857-68.

The most important Byzantine lexicon bears the name of Hesychnus of Alexandria, who appears to have lived in the latter part of the fourth century; but has unquestionably come down to us in modified form, including many additions of a much later date. Hesychnus himself was probably a pagan, and a large portion of these additions consists in Biblical glosses which must have proceeded from the pen of some Christian grammarian. The value of the work is not much enhanced by these later additions. But it is an inestimable aid to the study of the classical authors, especially Homer, because it embodies in a large measure the best traditions of the older grammarians of Alexandria. It was derived immediately by Hesychnus from the dictionary, in five books, by Diogenianus, who lived at Hieraclea, in the Pontus, in the time of Hadrian; and this, again, was an extract from the great dictionary, in ninety-five books, by Pamphilus and Zopyrion, of the school of Aristarchus.

K. O. Muller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, III, 384. [Donaldson.]

Hesychnus, surnamed "The Illustrious." Born at Miletus, Asia Minor; lived at the beginning of the 6th century. A Greek historical and biographical writer.

Hetæria Philike (het-ä-rë'ä fë-lë'kë'). [Gr. ἑταῖρια φιλική.] A secret political society founded at Odessa in 1814 for the purpose of liberating Greece from the Turkish domination. In 1820 it chose as its leader Prince Alexander Hylpsilanti, who in 1821 inaugurated the Greek war for independence.

Heywood, John. Born about 1500; died at Mechlin, Belgium, about 1580. A noted English epigrammatist. He was a sort of court jester, though of good social position, and amused by his powers of repartee. He was a favorite with Queen Mary, but when Elizabeth ascended the throne he retired to Mechlin, where he is supposed to have died. He wrote 3 interludes in which for the first time characters were personal and not mere abstractions, and thus paved the way for English comedy. The best-known of the interludes is the "Four P's": a merry interlude of a Palmer, a Pardoner, a Potycary, and a Pedlar, printed between 1543 and 1547. His "Epigrams and Proverbs" (1562) show both wit and humor, and were very popular. He wrote also "The Play of Love," "The Play of the Wether," etc.

Heywood, Thomas. Born in Lincolnshire, England; died about the middle of the 17th century. A noted English dramatist and miscellaneous writer. He speaks of his residence at Cambridge in his "Apology for Actors," but there is no record of him there. He was an actor, a member of the Lord Admiral's, Earl of Southampton's, Earl of Derby's, Earl of Worcester's, and the Queen's companies. After the death of the queen he went back to the Earl of Worcester's company. He was a prolific writer. Among his plays are "The Four Prentices of London, etc." (produced about 1600; printed 1615), "Edward IV." (in 2 parts), "If You Knew not Me, You Knew Nobody, etc." (1605-06; in 2 parts), "The Royal King and the Loyal Subject" (printed 1637; acted much earlier), "A Woman Killed with Kindness" (acted 1603; printed 1607), "The Fair Maid of the Exchange" (1607), "The Golden Age" (1611), "The Silver Age" (1612), "The Brazen Age" (1613), "The Iron Age" (1632; 2 parts), "The Fair Maid of the West" (acted 1617; printed 1631), "The English Traveller" (printed 1633), "Love's Mistress" (1636), "The Wise Woman of Hogsden" (1638), "Fortune by Land and Sea" (with William Rowley; printed 1655), "The Late Lancashire Witches" (with Richard Brome; 1634). He wrote the lord mayor's pageants for many years. Among his miscellaneous works are translations of Sallust, and selections from Lucian, Ovid, and others; "Troia Britannica," a long heroic poem (1609); "An Apology for Actors" (1612; reprinted with alterations by William Cartwright in 1658, with the title "The Actors' Vindication"); "England's Elizabeth" (1631); "The Hierarchy of the Blessed Angels," a long didactic poem (1635).

Hezekiah (hez-ê-kî'â). [Heb., 'God is my strength.'] King of Judah for 29 years. The date of his accession to the throne is variously given as 727, 726, and 715 B. C. He restored the service of Jehovah, purged the country of the idolatry which was spread under his father Ahaz, and inaugurated a kind of revival of the theocratic spirit. He obtained a series of victories over the Philistines. Concerning his relation to Assyria, accounts are found in the Old Testament as well as in the cuneiform inscriptions. Hezekiah undertook to shake off the Assyrian supremacy under which Judah had groaned since Uzziah. It would seem that Shalmaneser IV. and Sargon were somehow prevented from punishing him. But Sennacherib made two invasions into Judah. The first (702) is briefly related in 2 Ki. xviii., according to which, after Sennacherib had captured all the fortified cities in Judah, Hezekiah submitted and sent to the conqueror at Lachish 300 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold. The prism inscription of Sennacherib relates more fully that he attacked Hezekiah because he kept Padi, king of Ekron, prisoner in Jerusalem; that he took 46 fenced cities and many captives, and gave a part of his territory to the kings of Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza; and that he besieged Jerusalem, shutting up Hezekiah in it "like a bird in a cage." Returning to Lachish, Sennacherib sent a letter through his chief general (tartan) and prime minister (rabshakeh) to Hezekiah, demanding the surrender of the capital. The result of this invasion, as given in the biblical record, was that the Assyrian army of 185,000 troops besieging Jerusalem was smitten by the angel of the Lord in the night, and were "all dead corpses." The Assyrian inscriptions contain no reference to the catastrophe of the army, which is mostly explained to have been caused by a pestilence; but this omission is easily accounted for by national pride. The extraordinary event is corroborated by a tradition preserved in Egypt, and heard 250 years later by Herodotus. The divergences between the biblical and the Assyrian accounts concern more seriously the chronology. According to the biblical account Hezekiah reigned 727-699; for the destruction of the kingdom of Israel in 722 is represented as taking place in his 6th year, and Sennacherib's campaign, which fell in the 14th year of Hezekiah, would have to be put in 713. But Sennacherib did not come to the throne before 705, and the date of the campaign in the inscriptions (701) is therefore preferable. Again, the illness of Hezekiah, his recovery, and the congratulatory embassy from Merodach-Baladan, to whom he showed his rich treasures, are represented in the Bible as happening after the collision with Sennacherib. But this must have occurred before the treasury was emptied to pay the heavy tribute to Assyria (i. e., 704 or 703).

H. H. The pseudonym (for Helen Hunt) of Helen Maria Fiske (Mrs. Hunt; afterward Mrs. Jackson).

Hiawatha (hi-â-wâ'thî or hî-â-wâ'thî). A personage of miraculous birth, known by this name among the Iroquois, and by other names among other tribes of North American Indians. He was sent among them to teach them the arts of peace. "In any form the tale has been known to the whites less than 50 years, and the Onondaga version first had publicity through Mr. J. V. H. Clark, in a communication to the New York 'Commercial Advertiser.' He obtained it from two Onondaga chiefs. Schoolcraft used these notes before they were included in Clark's history, and afterward appropriated the name for his Western Indian legends, where it had no proper place. About the same time, Mr. Alfred B. Street had a few original notes from other Iroquois sources, which he used in his metrical romance of 'Frontenac,' along with some from Schoolcraft. Thus, when Longfellow's 'Hiawatha' appeared, I was prepared to greet an old friend, and was surprised at being introduced to an Ojibwa instead of an Iroquois leader." (W. M. Beachamp, Journal Amer. Folk-Lore, IV, 295.) Longfellow's poem "Hiawatha," published in 1855, was based on Schoolcraft. The latter's "Myth of Hiawatha" was published in 1856, and dedicated to Longfellow.

Hiatus. See Yacoo.

Hibbert Lectures. A foundation instituted by the trustees of Robert Hibbert, a West India merchant, who died in 1849. For many years the trustees applied the funds mainly to the higher culture of students for the Unitarian ministry, but in 1878 resolved to institute Hibbert Lectures, with a view to capable and really honest treatment of unsettled problems in theology, apart from the interest of any particular church or system. Amongst the lecturers have been Max Müller, Page Renouf, Renan, Rhys Davids, Kuenen, Beard, Réville, Pfeiderer, Rhys, Sayce, and Hatch. Chambers's Encyclopaedia, V, 702.

Hibernia (hî-bêr'ni-â), or Ibernia (î-bêr'ni-â), or Ivernia (î-vêr'ni-â). [L. Iibernia, Ivernia, Juverna, Ierna, Ierne; Gr. Ἰουβονία, Ἰεργή; all appar. representing the Old Celtic form of Eriu, Ire-land.] An ancient name of Ireland.

Hibitos (ê-bê'tôs). A tribe of Peruvian Indians on the upper Huallaga, apparently a branch of the Chunches. From about 1676 to 1790 they were gathered into mission villages; later the missions were broken up, the Hibitos returned to a wild life, and nothing is now known of them. Also written Xibitos.

Hibueros (ê-bô-â'rôs), or Higueros (ê-gwâ'rôs). The Aztec name for Central America: sometimes used by Cortés and others before 1530.

Hickathrift (hik'â-thrift), Tom. A mythical strong man.

Tom Hickathrift belongs to the same series as Jack the Giant-killer, one of the popular corruptions of old northern romances. It seems to allude to some of the insurrections in the Isle of Ely, such as that of Hereward, described in Wright's Essays, ii. 91. Spelman, however, describes a tradition, which he says was credited by the inhabitants of Tynley, in which Hickthrift appears as the assessor of the rights of their ancestors, and the means he employed on the occasion correspond with incidents in the following tale. Hollivell, Nursery Rhymes.

Hidalgo de Cisneros y Latorre (ē-dāl'gō dā thēs-nā-rōs ē lā-tōr-rā), Baltazar. Born at Cartagena about 1755; died there, June 9, 1829. A Spanish general and administrator. He commanded various ships and squadrons in the wars with England and France, and was wounded at the battle of Trafalgar. He became lieutenant-general in Nov., 1805. Appointed viceroy of Buenos Ayres by the junta of Seville, he took possession of the office July 30, 1809, but was deposed by the revolution of May, 1810; June 21, 1810, he was forced to leave the country. The Spanish government exonerated him. He held various important posts: was minister of marine Sept., 1818, and director-general of the armada Dec., 1818, until deposed by the revolution of 1820. The revolutionists imprisoned him for some time. From Nov., 1823, he was captain-general of the department of Cartagena.

Hidalgo y Costilla (ē kōs-tēl'yā), Miguel. Born in Guanajuato, May 8, 1753; died at Chihuahua, Ang., 1, 1811. The first leader of the Mexican war for independence. He was cruate of the village of Dolores, where he proclaimed a revolt Sept. 16, 1810. The undisciplined army which he gathered marched toward Mexico and defeated Truxillo Oct. 30, 1810; but it was beaten by Calleja, and Hidalgo fell back on Guadaluara. There he raised his army to 100,000 men, but was again disastrously defeated by Calleja at the bridge of Calderon, Jan. 17, 1811. He resigned, and fled toward the United States, but was captured, tried, and shot.

Hildesheim (hil'des-him). A city in the province of Hannover, Prussia, situated on the Innerste 19 miles southeast of Hannover. It is renowned for its specimens of medieval and German Renaissance buildings. The cathedral is an early-Romanesque monument with a late-Pointed south aisle and north transept. The interior has been barbarized, but preserves some very fine church furniture and a noteworthy sculptured Renaissance roof-loft. The brass doors between the vestibule at the west end and the nave date from 1015, and bear 16 interesting reliefs of the "Fall" and "Redemption." The two-storied cloister is decorated Romanesque. St. Michael's, formerly the Benedictine abbey church, is one of the noblest Romanesque monuments in Germany. It was built early in the 11th century, and somewhat modified in the 12th and 13th. There are double transepts, and a choir at each end, that toward the west standing over a columned crypt. Every third support of the nave is a massive pier; those intervening are columns. The nave has a flat wooden ceiling which is covered with remarkable scriptural paintings of the 12th century. There is a fine Romanesque cloister with pointed vaulting. The church of St. Godehard, one of the most notable of German Romanesque structures, was built in the middle of the 12th century. The choir is French in character. Three massive towers characterize the exterior, and there is a rich sculptured doorway on the northwest. Other objects of interest are the Rathaus, Knoeckenhauer-Amthaus, Wedekind house, etc. Hildesheim became the seat of a bishopric in 815, and was a Hanseatic town. Population (1890), commune, 33,481.

Hillel (hil'el). Born in Babylonia, a descendant of the family of David. President of the Sanhedrin 30 B. C.-9 A. D., appointed by Herod I. He lived in poor circumstances, and went to Jerusalem to study the law under Shemayah and Abtalion, becoming there the reorganizer of Jewish life and the founder of Talmudic Judaism. By his introduction of the seven dialectical rules for the interpretation of the law, he gave its study a rational basis. He also enacted many reforms which affected the whole social fabric of his time. He was the first of the presidents of the Sanhedrin to be honored with the title nasi (i. e., 'prince,' 'patriarch'), and the patriarchate remained thenceforth hereditary in his family until its extinction. He was particularly distinguished for his humility, gentleness, and liberal, humane spirit. From his numerous sayings and maxims may be mentioned "Do not judge thy neighbor until thou hast stood in his place," "Do not believe in thyself till the day of thy death," and the most celebrated, "Do not unto others what thou wouldst not have done unto thyself. This is the whole law: the rest, go and finish."

Hillel II. Patriarch 360 A. D. He introduced definite rules for the calculation and fixing of the Jewish calendar, which still form the groundwork of Jewish reckoning.

He had charge of Devonshire Square Chapel, Bishopsgate street, London, 1837-43. He wrote "Theology, or an Attempt towards a Consistent View of the whole Counsel of God" (1827), "The Work of the Holy Spirit in Conversion Considered" (1830), "Memoir of John Howard Hinton" (1835), etc.; and edited "The History and Topography of the United States" (1830-32).

Hiogo (hē-ō'gō). A seaport in the main island of Japan, situated in lat. 34° 40' N., long. 135° 12' E. It is one of the chief commercial places of Japan, opened to European commerce in 1868. Population, with Kobe (1890), 136,988.

Hioen-Tsang (hē-wen'tsäng'). A Chinese Buddhist pilgrim who visited 110 countries and places in India 629-645 A. D. Of the two works relating to his travels, neither was written by himself. The first is a bibliographical notice, in which his travels form a principal feature, composed by two of his pupils, Hœi-li and Yen-Tsong; the second ("Memoirs of the Countries of the West") was edited by Pien-ki. These works, translated into French by Julien, are an invaluable source for the history of the times. Hioen-Tsang is said to have translated from Sanskrit into Chinese 657 works.

Hipparchus (hi-pär'kus). [Gr. 'Iππαρχος.] Died at Athens, 514 B. C. A tyrant of Athens, son of Pisistratus. He reigned in conjunction with his brother Hippias from 527 to 514, when he was slain by Harmodius and Aristogiton. See Harmodius.

Hipparchus. Born at Nicaea, Bithynia; lived about 160-125 B. C. A celebrated Greek astronomer, the founder of scientific astronomy. He catalogued the stars, invented the planisphere, and made a number of most important discoveries, including the eccentricity of the solar orbit, some of the inequalities of the moon's motion, the precession of the equinoxes, etc.

Hippel (hip'pel). Theodor Gottlieb von. Born at Gerdauen, East Prussia, Jan. 31, 1741; died at Königsberg, Prussia, April 23, 1796. A German humorist. His works include "Über die Ehe" ("On Marriage," 1774), "Lebenslaufe nach aufsteigender Linie" ("Careers according to an Ascending Line," 1778-81), etc. His collected works were published 1827-38.

Hippias (hip'i-as). [Gr. 'Iππίας.] Died about 490 B. C. A son of Pisistratus, whom he succeeded as tyrant of Athens (jointly with Hipparchus) in 527. He was sole ruler from 514, and was expelled in 510.

Hippo, or Hippo Regius (hip'ō rē'ji-us). [Gr. 'Iππών βασιλεύς.] In ancient geography, a city of Numidia, near the site of the modern Bona. Augustine was bishop of Hippo. It was burned by the Vandals in 430.

Hippocrates (hi-pok'ra-tēz). [Gr. 'Iπποκράτης.] Born in the island of Cos about 460 B. C.; died at Larissa, Thessaly, about 377. A famous Greek physician, surnamed "the Father of Medicine." The 87 treatises forming the so-called "Hippocratic Collection" have been edited by Kuhn 1826-27, by Emmeris 1859-65, and by Littré 1839-61 (with translation). See the extract.

The life of Hippocrates is shrouded in a strange mist, considering the extraordinary celebrity of the man. In the late biographies which remain to us, the following facts seem worthy of record. A certain Soranus of Kos, otherwise unknown, is said to have made special researches among the records of the Asclepiad guild, in which Hippocrates was set down as the seventeenth in descent from the god Asclepius, and born on the 26th of the month Agrarian, in the year 460 B. C. The inhabitants were still offering him the honors of a hero. He seems to have traveled about a good deal, particularly in the countries around the northern Aegean, and to have died at an advanced age, at Larissa in Thessaly, leaving two sons, Thessalus and Drakon. Many of his descendants and followers in the school of Kos were called after him—Suidas enumerates seven in all—so that this additional uncertainty of authorship attaches to his alleged writings. The many statues of him agreed in representing him with his head covered, a peculiarity which excited many baseless and some absurd conjectures. Abstracting carefully from the numerous Hippocrates mentioned in contemporary Attic literature, there are two undoubted references to the great physician of Kos in Plato, and one in Aristophanes, which establish the epoch assigned to him in the biographies. He is said to have been instructed by Herodotus of Selymbria, and Gorgias of Leontini, a legend arising merely from the confusing of this Herodotus with another physician who happened to be the brother of Gorgias. There is no vestige of either Herodotus' practice or Gorgias' rhetoric in the extant treatises; but Hippocrates assuredly, like Pericles, trained himself for a large knowledge of his special pursuit by a familiarity with the metaphysics of the day. His alleged study of the great plague at Athens is not corroborated by a comparison with Thucydides' account. The works pronounced genuine by Littré in the large collection of Hippocratic writings which still survive are these: the treatises on "Ancient Medicine," on "Prognosis" (which includes our diagnosis in the largest sense), the "Epidemics" (i. and iii.), the "Treatment of Acute Diseases," the tracts on joints, fractures, and surgical instruments applied to them, on head wounds, and the "Oath" and "Law" of the guild.

Mahaŷy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., II. 47.

Hippocrene (hip'ō-krēn or hip'ō-krē'nē). [Gr. 'Iπποκρήνη.] A fountain on Mount Helicon, Boeotia, sacred to the Muses.

Hippodamia (hip'ō-da-mi'ā), or Hippodameia (hip'ō-da-mi'ā). [Gr. 'Iπποδάμεια.] In Greek legend: (a) The daughter of Enomeus, and wife of Pelops. (b) A daughter of Atrax, one of the Lapithæ. At her marriage with Perithous the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ took place.

Hippodamus (hi-pol'a-mus) of Miletus. [Gr. 'Iπποδάμος.] A Greek sophist, architect, and engineer, who laid out the Piræus, and later constructed Thurion and Rhodes. His work was done on definite principles and according to a carefully devised system which was always followed in laying out new Greek cities.

Hippolyta (hi-pol'i-tē). 1. See Hippolyte.—2. In Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," queen of the Amazons, betrothed to Theseus. She also appears as the bride of Theseus in "The Two Noble Kinsmen."—3. The principal female character in Wycherley's comedy "The Gentleman Dancing Master."

Hippolyte (hi-pol'i-tē). [Gr. 'Iππολύτη.] In classical mythology, a queen of the Amazons. She was the daughter of Ares and Otrera, and wore as an emblem of her dignity a girdle received from her father. This girdle was coveted by Eurystheus, who ordered Hercules to fetch it. Hercules was kindly received at her court and was promised the girdle; but Hera roused the Amazons by spreading the report that their queen was being robbed, and Hercules, believing that Hippolyte was plotting against his life, killed her and carried away the girdle.

Hippolyte. See Hippolyte.

Hippolytus (hi-pol'i-tus). [Gr. 'Iππολύτης.] In Greek legend, the son of Theseus and Hippolyte or Antiope, and stepson of Phædra. Phædra fell in love with him, but was repulsed, and in revenge falsely accused him to Theseus of making improper proposals to her. Theseus called upon Poseidon to avenge him, and, accordingly, as Hippolytus was riding along the shore, the god sent a bull out of the sea against him. His horses were frightened, and he was thrown out of his chariot and dragged until he died. When Theseus discovered the innocence of his son, Phædra killed herself in despair. See Phædra.

Hippolytus. 1. A tragedy by Euripides, exhibited in 428 B. C.

The "Hippolytus" [of Euripides] is our earliest example of a romantic subject in the Greek drama. We are told that it obtained the first place against Iophon and Ion's competition, but we are not told whether or what other plays accompanied it, nor of the plays it defeated. The earlier version of the play was not only read and admired, but possibly copied in the play of Seneca; yet it failed at Athens, chiefly, it is thought, because of the boldness with which Phædra told her love in person to her stepson, and then in person outraged him to his father.

Mahaŷy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 333.

2. A tragedy by Seneca, also called "Phædra," founded upon the same legend.

The "Hippolytus" of Seneca, from which the scene of Phædra's personal declaration to Hippolytus was adopted by Racine in his famous play, is still praised by French critics. It was highly esteemed, and even preferred to the Greek play, in the Renaissance. It was acted in Latin at Rome in 1483, and freely rehandled by Garnier in a French version in 1573. The next celebrated French version was that of Gilbert, Queen Christina's French minister, in 1640. But his very title, "Hippolyte, ou le Garçon insensible," sounds strange, and the play is said nevertheless to have admitted a great deal of gallantry in the hero.

Mahaŷy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 336.

Hippolytus Romanus. An ecclesiastical writer of the 3d century. He was a pupil of Irenæus; appears to have been bishop of Portus Romanus (Porto); and was the leader of a disaffected and schismatic party, orthodox in doctrine and rigoristic in discipline, during the pontificates of Zephyrinus (202-218) and Callistus (218-223). According to a late tradition he died a martyr in Sardinia in 235 or 236. He is commemorated by the Roman Catholic Church on Aug. 22. His chief work is "Philosophumena," written in Greek, a manuscript of which was discovered at Mount Athos in 1842 and published by Emmanuel Miller in 1851.

Hipponax (hi-pō'naks). [Gr. 'Iππώναξ.] Born at Ephesus; flourished during the second half of the 6th century B. C. A Greek iambic poet, generally reckoned as the third (with Archilochus and Simonides); noted as the inventor of the choliambus. He was expelled from Ephesus by the tyrants Athenagoras and Comas, and thereafter resided at Clazomene. He was deformed.

Hiragana. See Katakana.

Hiram (hi'ram), or Huram (hū'ram). [Perhaps shortened from Ahi-ram, exalted brother.] 1. King of Tyre about 1000 B. C., a contemporary of David and Solomon. He raised Tyre to a leading position in the Phœnician confederacy, built many temples, and subjugated Cyprus. He entertained amicable relations with David and Solomon, assisted at the building of the temple at Jerusalem by furnishing materials and artisans, and entered with Solomon into a commercial alliance. The tomb of Hiram is shown on the hillside east of Tyre.

Hiram's reign lasted thirty-four years. He was fifty-three years old at his death, and left his crown to his son Baalazar, or Balezar. A remarkable monument, about three miles distant from the modern Tyre (Sur), but said to have been originally built just outside the eastern gate of the continental town, which thence sloped down to the sea, is known to the present day as "the Tomb of Hiram," and may well have been the actual sepulcher of this ancient king. It is a "grey, weather-beaten" structure, bearing all the marks of a high antiquity. Upon a pedestal consisting of three courses of grey limestone, each three feet thick, and the uppermost a little overhanging the other two, is enclased a tomb or sarcophagus formed out of a single block, which is twelve feet long by six feet high and six feet broad. The sarcophagus is covered over by a heavy lid in the shape of a solid block three feet in thickness, which appears never to have been removed. The tomb, however, has been rifled: a large hole has been broken into the eastern end of the sarcophagus, and its contents, whatever they were, have been removed.

Rauvinsou, Phœnicia, p. 105.

2. A distinguished worker in brass brought by Solomon from Tyre (1 Ki. vii. 13).

Hiram. A town of Portage County, Ohio, 30 miles southeast of Cleveland, the seat of Hiram College (Church of the Disciples).

Hiranyagarbha (hi-ran-ya-gar' bha). [Skt., 'golden germ' or 'golden womb.'] In the Rig-veda, a deity who is said to have arisen in the beginning, the one lord of all beings, who upholds heaven and earth and gives life and breath, and whose command even the gods obey. According to Manu he was Brahma, the first male, formed by the undiscernible First Cause in a golden egg resplendent as the sun. After a year Brahma divided the egg into 2 parts by his mere thought. One part became the heavens, the other the earth; and between them he placed the sky, the 8 regions, and the eternal abode of waters.

Hiren (hi'ren). [A corruption of the Greek Irene.] A trumpet, a character in Peele's play "The Turkish Mahomet and Hiren the Fair Greek." The phrase, "Have we not Hiren here?" which appears in Dekker's "Satiromastix," Chapman's "Eastward Hoe," and a number of 17th-century works, is an allusion to her. Pistol in Shakspeare's 2 Henry IV. appears to apply the phrase to his sword. William Barstede wrote a poem called "Hiren, or the Fair Greek" in 1611.

Hirhor (hër'hor). A high priest of Amun at Thebes, the founder of the 21st (illegitimate) dynasty of Egyptian kings, ruling at Thebes. Brugsch gives his date as 1100 B. C.

Hirlas Horn, The. A Welsh poem, written by Owain, prince of Powys, in the 12th century. The Hirlas horn is "a drinking-horn, long, blue, and silver-rimmed," which Owain fills and drinks to each of his chiefs, with a song.

Hirpini (hër-pä'ni). In ancient history, an Italian people, of Samnite stock, living in southern Samnium in the district near Beneventum.

Hirsau (hir'sou), or Hirschau (hir'shou). A village in the Black Forest circle, Württemberg, situated on the Nagold 21 miles west of Stuttgart. It was noted in the middle ages for its Benedictine monastery, built in the 9th century.

Hirschberg (hirsh'berg). A town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, at the junction of the Zacken and Bober, 60 miles west-southwest of Breslau. It is the center of trade in the Silesian Mountains, and the center of the Silesian linen manufacture. Population (1890), 16,214.

Hirson (ër-sôn'). A town in the department of Aisne, France, on the Oise 33 miles northeast of Laon, noted for basket-making. Population (1891), commune, 6,294.

Hirtius (hër'shi-us), Aulus. Killed near Mutina, Italy, 43 B. C. A Roman politician, a friend of Cæsar, the reputed author of the eighth book of Cæsar's "Commentaries on the Gallic War," and of the history of the Alexandrian war. As consul with Pansa (43) he defeated Antony at Mutina.

Hispalis (his'pa-lis), or Hispal (his'pal). The ancient name of Seville.

Hispania (his-pä'ni-ä). The ancient name of the Spanish peninsula.

Hispaniola. See Española and Haiti.

Hissar (his-sär'). 1. A dependency of Bokhara, central Asia, lying between Russian Turkestan on the north and Afghanistan (separated by the Amu Daria) on the south.—2. The chief town of Hissar, situated on the river Kafirnigan about lat. 35° 25' N., long. 68° 28' E. Population, about 15,000.

Hissar. 1. A division in the Panjab, British India. Area, 8,355 square miles. Population (1881), 1,311,067.—2. A district in the Hissar division, intersected by lat. 29° N., long. 76° E. Area, 3,540 square miles. Population (1881), 504,183.—3. The capital of the district of Hissar, situated in lat. 29° 10' N., long. 75° 46' E. Population, about 14,000.

Hissarlik. See Troy.

Histiæa (his-ti-ë'ä). [Gr. Ἰστιαία.] See Orcus. Histiæus (his-ti-ë'us). [Gr. Ἰστιαῖος.] Executed at Sardis, Asia Minor, 494 B. C. A tyrant of Miletus, a friend of Darius I. of Persia.

Histoire Comique de Francion (ës-twär' kom-ëk' dé fron-syön'). [F., 'Comic History of Francion.'] A fiction by Charles Sorel, chiefly remarkable for the "evidence it gives of an attempt at an early date (1623) to write a novel of ordinary manners." Saintsbury.

Historia Miscella (his-tö'ri-ä mi-sel'ä). See the extract.

This curious farrago of history forms the first part of Muratori's great collection of the "Scriptores Rerum Italianarum." The first eleven books are substantially the work of Eutropius (the familiar Eutropius of our boyhood), and reach down to the death of Jovian. The authorship of the following books is generally attributed to Paulus Diaconus, of Aquileia, who died in 799, and the completion of the work to Landulf the Wise, who flourished in the eleventh century. Without going into the disputed question as to this authorship, it is sufficient to say that the writer, who is confessedly a mere compiler, interweaves large passages from Jornandes, Orosius, the Annalists, and the Ecclesiastical Historians.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 431.

Histriomastix (his'tri-ë-mas'tiks). [LL., 'the player's scourge.'] A play by Marston, produced before 1599, in which year Jonson satirized it in his "Every Man out of his Humour." It was printed in 1610.

Histriomastix, the Player's Scourge, or Actor's Tragædie. A treatise by William Prynne, published in 1632, though dated 1633. The book was designed to promote the total suppression of stage-plays. "Prynne's treatise, as is well known, led to his being summoned before the High Commission Court and Star Chamber, which condemned his book to be burnt, and the author to be expelled from the Bar and his Inn, to stand in the pillory, to lose both his ears, to pay a fine of £5,000 to the King, and to be perpetually imprisoned. . . . For, about the time when the book was published—according to one account on the day before, according to another but shortly afterwards—the Queen and her ladies had themselves acted in a Pastoral at Whitehall." (Ward, Hist. Dram. Lit.) In 1649 a meek retraction, entitled "Mr. William Prynne his Defence of Stage-Plays, or a Retraction of a former Book of his called Histrio-Mastix," was published.

Hit (hit). A town in the vilayet of Bagdad, Asiatic Turkey, situated on the Euphrates about 100 miles west-northwest of Bagdad: the ancient Is. It is famous for its fountain of bitumen. Population (estimated), 2,500.

Hitcheock (hie'h'kok), Edward. Born at Deerfield, Mass., May 24, 1793; died at Amherst, Mass., Feb. 27, 1864. An American geologist, professor from 1825 of chemistry and natural history at Amherst College, and president of the college 1845-54, with the professorship of natural theology and geology. Among his works are "Geology of the Connecticut Valley" (1823), "Elementary Geology" (1840), "Fossil Footsteps" (1848), "Religion of Geology" (1851), "Illustrations of Surface Geology" (1856), "Supplement to the Ichology of New England" (1865), "Elementary and Popular Treatise on Geology" (with Charles H. Hitcheock, 1860), "Anatomy and Physiology" (with Edward Hitcheock, Jr., 1860).

Hitcheock, Roswell Dwight. Born at East Machias, Maine, Aug. 15, 1817; died at Somerset, Mass., June 16, 1887. An American clergyman and theologian. He was appointed professor of church history at Union Theological Seminary (New York) in 1855, and president in 1860. He published "Complete Analysis of the Bible" (1869), "Socialism" (1879), etc.

Hitchin (hie'h'in). A town in Hertfordshire, England, 33 miles north by west of London. Population (1891), 8,860.

Hitchiti (hë-chë-të'). A division of North American Indians. The name is from a Creek word, 'to look up' (i. e., the stream). The language was spoken on the Chatahochee River, Georgia, and spread to Flint River through Georgia and Florida. The Seminoles were a half-Creek and half-Hitchiti speaking people, and probably the Yamassi also. See Creek. Also Echeete, Echita, Ichiti.

Hitopadesha (hi-tö-pa-dä'sha). In Sanskrit literature, the book of "Good Counsel." It was the first Sanskrit book printed in Nagari letters (see Devanagari): edited by Carey, and printed at Serampore in 1803. It had been already translated by Wilkins (Bath, 1787) and Sir William Jones (London, 1799). It is ethico-didactic, and is what the Hindus call a nitisashtra or 'conduct-work'. The plan is simple. The sons of King Sudarshana are vicious. He convokes the wise men, and asks if any one is able to reform his sons. Vishvarshana offers to do so, takes them in charge, and relates to them the stories which make up the collection. The Hitopadesha is not an original work, but an excellent compilation of ancient material. The sources are expressly said to be "the Panchatantra and another work." The author or editor is said to have been Narayana and his patron, the prince Dhavalachandra. The work is at least 500 years old.

Hitteren (hit'ter-en). An island of Norway, west of Trondhjem. Length, 30 miles.

Hittites (hit'tits). An important tribe, descended from Heth, son of Canaan, the son of Ham, settled in the region of Hebron on the hill, and often mentioned as one of the seven principal Canaanite tribes, and sometimes as comprising the whole Canaanite population. Hittite kings are mentioned who seem to have dwelt north of Palestine. About the middle of the 9th century B. C. they disappear from biblical history. Some scholars, however, distinguish the latter as Syrian Hittites, whom they consider a different tribe from the Canaanite Hittites. They have lately been identified with the Kheta of the Egyptians and the Chatti of the Assyrian monuments. These monuments agree with the notices of the Old Testament in depicting the Hittites as a powerful tribe. Thothmes III., of the 18th dynasty, fought with them about 1600 B. C. in Megiddo. Later Seti attacked them about 1350 B. C., and Ramceses II. (the supposed Pharaoh of the oppression), defeated them not long after at Kadesh, on the Orontes. The Kheta are also often referred to in the diplomatic correspondence of Tel-el-Amarna. The Chatti are found early in collision with Assyria. They were defeated by Tiglath-Pileser I. (1120-1100). Asurnazpal (884-860) carried their princes into captivity. Under Shalmaneser II. the Hittites entered into an alliance with Ben-hadad of Syria, but were defeated in the great battle on the plains of Syria, and their city, Carchemish, was taken in 855. Twelve Hittite kings are enumerated as contemporary rulers at this time. Sargon finally put an end to the Hittite independence in 717, when the inhabitants of Carchemish were deported to Assyria and the city was reoccupied with Assyrian colonists. Monuments, supposed to be Hittite, have been discovered since 1872 in Hamath, Aleppo, Carchemish, Cappadocia, Lycæonia, and Ilydia, which would show that the Hittite empire once spread over the greater part of Asia Minor; and it may be that from there they at one time pushed their way into northern Syria. The question whether they formed one race with the Hittites of the Canaanite stock remains an open one. The originators of these Hittite monuments are considered by some scholars to have been a "Mongoloid" race. The art exhibited on these monuments is still of a primitive, rude character. The inscriptions, in hieroglyphic characters, have not yet been deciphered. Of late there is a tendency among some scholars to consider the Hittites as a race speaking a Semitic language akin to Syriac or Aramaic, and to regard the so-called Hittite inscriptions as the work of another people who are, for the time being, called "pseudo-Hittites."

Hittorff (hit'torf), Jacques Ignace. Born at Cologne, Aug. 20, 1792; died at Paris, March 25, 1867. A French architect. His chief work is the Church of St. Vincent de Paul in Paris. He published "Architecture antique de la Sicile" (1826-30), "Architecture moderne de la Sicile" (1826-35), "Architecture polychrome chez les Grecs" (1851), etc.

Hitzig (hit'sig), Ferdinand. Born at Hauingen, Baden, June 23, 1807; died at Heidelberg, Baden, Jan. 22, 1875. A German exegete, professor at Zurich (1833) and later (1861) at Heidelberg. He published commentaries on Isaiah (1833), the Psalms (1835-1836), the minor prophets (1838), Jeremiah (1841), etc.

Hitzig, Friedrich. Born at Berlin, April 8, 1811; died Oct. 11, 1881. A German architect.

He was ordained priest in 1800, and became assistant bishop of New York in 1811 and bishop in 1816. He was one of the founders of the General Theological Seminary at New York city, in which he became professor of pastoral theology in 1821. His most notable publications are "Companion for the Altar" (1804) and "Apology for the Apostolic Order" (1807).

Hobbema (hob'be-mä), Meyndert or Minderhout. Born at Amsterdam, or Koeverdam, about 1638; died at Amsterdam, Dec., 1709. A Dutch landscape-painter. He was influenced in style by Ruysdael. He is noted for his atmospheric effects, tone, and brilliancy. In many of his landscapes figures have been painted by other noted artists. His picture of "The Hermitage, St. Petersburg" (1663) is owned by the New York Historical Society.

Hobbes (hobz), Thomas. Born at Westport (now in Malmesbury), Wiltshire, April 5, 1588; died at Hardwick Hall, Dec. 4, 1679. A celebrated English philosopher. His father, Thomas Hobbes, was vicar of Charlton and Westport. In 1603 Hobbes entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he graduated in 1608. He soon entered the service of William Cavendish (later first earl of Devonshire) as tutor to his eldest son (later second earl of Devonshire), and retained this position until the death of his pupil in 1628. They made a continental tour in 1610. In 1629 he became traveling tutor to the son of Sir Gervase Clifton, and visited Paris and, probably, Italy. He returned to the service of the Cavendishes in 1631 as tutor to the third Earl of Devonshire, with whom, 1634-37, he made an extended tour on the Continent, during which he established friendly relations with many distinguished men, including Galileo, Gassendi, Merseme, and Descartes. Previous to this time (before 1625?) he had served Bacon as amanuensis, and in translating some of his essays into Latin. He lived with Devonshire until 1640, when fear of persecution by Parliament for his political opinions drove him to Paris, where he remained until 1651, when, in the belief that his life was in danger from those who accused him of heterodoxy and even atheism, he fled back to England and became reconciled to the Cromwellian government. For a time in 1646 he instructed the Prince of Wales (later Charles II.) in mathematics. After the Restoration he lived with the Earl of Devonshire. Hobbes was a pronounced nominalist in philosophy, an antagonist of scholasticism, one of the suggesters of the associational psychology, and a leader of modern rationalism. He insisted especially upon the complete separation of theology and philosophy, and the subordination of the church to the state. He is best known from his doctrine that the power of the state is absolute as against the individual—that it is the "Leviathan" that swallows all, a mortal god who, like the Deity, governs according to his pleasure, and gives peace and security to his subjects. His chief works are a translation of Thucydides, "De cive" (1642), "Human Nature, or the Fundamental Elements of Policy" (1650), "De corpore politico" (1650), "Leviathan, or the Matter, Form, and Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil" (1651), "Of Liberty and Necessity" (1654). His collected works were edited by Sir W. Molesworth 1839-45, in 16 vols. (5 in Latin).

Hobbes, John Oliver. The pseudonym of Mrs. Craige.

Hobhouse (hob'hous), John Cam, Lord Broughton. Born at Redland, near Bristol, June 27, 1786; died at London, June 3, 1869. An English politician and writer. He entered Parliament in 1820; became secretary at war in 1832; was appointed chief secretary for Ireland, March, 1833, but soon resigned his office and his seat; reentered Parliament in 1834; and was president of the board of control 1835-41, and again 1846-52. In 1819 he was arrested and committed to Newgate for an anonymous pamphlet ("A Trifling Mistake in Thomas, Lord Erskine's recent Preface, etc."), the publication of which was held to be a breach of privilege by the House of Commons. He was the most intimate friend of Lord Byron, a connection which was formed at Cambridge. They traveled together on the Continent 1809-10. Hobhouse was one of Byron's executors. He was created Lord Broughton in 1851. He wrote "Historical Illustrations of the Fourth Canto of 'Childe Harold'" (2d ed. 1818), "A Journey through Albania, etc." (1813), etc. His "Diaries, Correspondence, and Memoranda" are in the keeping of the British Museum, and cannot be opened until the year 1900.

Hoffman (hof'man), Charles Fenno. Born at New York city in 1806; died at Harrisburg, Pa., June 7, 1884. An American poet and novelist. He was admitted to the bar about 1828, but shortly abandoned the profession of law in order to devote himself to literature. He established the "Knickerbocker Magazine" in 1833, and subsequently became proprietor of the "American Magazine," which he edited for many years. He became insane in 1849, and during the rest of his life was confined in the Harrisburg Insane Asylum. The first collection of his poems, "The Vigil of Faith, a Legend of the Adirondack Mountains, and other Poems," appeared in 1842. A complete edition was published by E. F. Hoffman in 1874.

Hoffmann (hof'män), August Heinrich, commonly called Hoffmann von Fallersleben (fon fäl'lers-lä-ben). Born at Fallersleben, Hannover, Prussia, April 2, 1798; died at the castle of Korvei, near Hörter, Prussia, Jan. 19-20, 1874. A German poet, philologist, and literary historian. He studied at Göttingen and Bonn. In 1823 he was made custodian of the university library at Breslau, and in 1830 professor there of Germanic philology. In 1842, in consequence of the views expressed in his "Unpolitische Lieder" ("Nonpolitical Songs," 1840-41), he was deprived of his position, and for several years had no settled place of residence. He was finally rehabilitated in 1848, in Prussia. In 1853 he went to Weimar, where he engaged, in collaboration with the Germanist Oscar Schade, in the editorship of the short-lived "Weimarsche Jahrbücher für deutsche Sprache, Literatur und Kunst" ("Weimar Annals for German Language, Literature, and Art"). After 1860 he lived at Korvei as librarian to the Duke of Ratibor. Among his many poetical works are "Lieder und Romanzen" ("Songs and Romances," 1821), "Jägerlieder" ("Hunters' Songs," 1828), "Kinderlieder" ("Children's Songs," 1843-47), "Deutsche Gassenlieder" ("German Street Songs," 1843), "Liebeslieder" ("Love Songs," 1851), "Soldatenlieder" ("Soldiers' Songs," 1851-52), "Vaterlandslieder" ("Songs of Fatherland," 1871). Hogarth (hö'gärth), William. Born at London, Nov. 10, 1697; died at London, Oct. 26, 1764. A celebrated English painter and engraver. In 1712 he was apprenticed to Ellis Gamble, a silversmith; in 1718 he turned his attention to engraving; and in 1726 he first became known by his plates for "Hudibras." In 1729 he ran away with Sir James Thornhill's only daughter, and was married at Paddington church. He published in 1733 "The Harlot's Progress," which was soon followed by "The Rake's Progress." In 1735 Hogarth obtained the passage of an act securing the rights of artists to their own designs. In 1736 he painted on the stairway of St. Bartholomew's Hospital "The Good Samaritan" and "The Pool of Bethesda." Among his other pictures are the "Distressed Poet" and the "Enraged Musician" (1741), "Marriage à la Mode" (1745), "Industry and Idleness" (1747). He made a famous journey to France in 1748. In his later years Hogarth indulged in literary compositions, and wrote "The Analysis of Beauty." He painted a number of portraits of himself, the best of which is in the National Gallery, London.

Hogarth is essentially a comic painter; his pictures are not indifferent, unimpassioned descriptions of human nature, but rich, exuberant satires upon it. He is carried away by a passion for the ridiculous. His object is "to show vice her own feature, scorn her own image." He is so far from contenting himself with still life that he is always on the verge of caricature, though without ever falling into it. Hazlitt, Eng. Poets, p. 190.

Hogarth Club. A London club for artists, established in 1870. It has a life class, sketching club, and reading-room.

Hogg (hog), James. Born at Ettrick, Selkirkshire, 1770; died at Eltrive Lake, Nov. 21, 1835. A Scottish poet, called "the Ettrick Shepherd" from his occupation. In 1790 he began to be known as a song-maker, and in 1796 his education had advanced so far that he began to write his verses. In 1802 he made the acquaintance of Scott. In 1810 he settled in Edinburgh with a view of devoting himself to literature, but went to Eltrive Lake in Yarrow about 1816. He was "the Shepherd" in Wilson's "Recreations of Christopher North." Among his poems are "The Queen's Wake" (1813), "The Pilgrims of the Sun" (1815), "Madoc of the Moor" (1816), "The Poetic Mirror, or the Living Bards of Great Britain" (1816; parodies), and "Queen Hynde" (1820). Among his prose works are "The Brownie of Bodsbeck, etc." (1817), and "Winter Evening Tales" (1820). His "Jacobite Relics, etc." (1819-20), are both prose and verse.

He represented the realistic tendency of the Swabian school, and later was influenced by that of the Italian Renaissance. His "Altar of St. Sebastian" (1516), in the Old Pinakothek, Munich, is his masterpiece.

Holbein, Hans, surnamed "The Younger." Born probably at Augsburg, Bavaria, about 1497; died at London, 1543. A German historical and portrait painter and wood-engraver, son of Hans Holbein (1460-1524). He went to Basel in 1515, and matriculated in the painters' guild in 1519. His frescoes in the city hall at Basel, and the "Passion" in the Basel Museum, were painted about 1521-22. In 1523 he painted the portrait of Erasmus at Longford Castle. About 1526 he visited Antwerp to see Quentin Massys, and afterward went to England, where he was lodged at Sir Thomas More's house, near London. In 1528 he went to Basel, and returned to England in 1532, where he remained for the rest of his life. He became court painter to Henry VIII. about 1536. Among his works are a series of 89 sketches in red chalk and India ink, belonging to this period, now in the Windsor collection; a series of designs for wood-engraving, "The Dance of Death," engraved by Hans Lützelburger, published in 1538 and 1547; a portrait of Sir Thomas More (1527); a portrait of Anne of Cleves (1539); a number of portraits of German merchant goldsmiths of the Steelyard, some of which are in Germany; "The Ambassadors" (in the National Gallery, 1533); and portraits of Henry VIII. and of the principal personages of the time. He also designed the title-pages to Coverdale's and Cranmer's Bibles, and painted some important works with religious subjects ("The Last Supper," "The Dead Christ," eight Passion pictures, etc.—all in the museum at Basel; "The Nativity" and "The Adoration of the Magi," at Freiburg-im-Breisgau; "Madonna," with the Meyer family at Darmstadt; "Madonna and Saints," at Solothurn, etc.).

Holberg (hol'berg), Ludvig von. Born at Bergen, Norway, Dec. 3, 1684; died at Copenhagen, Jan. 28, 1754. The father of the Danish drama, and the greatest name in Danish literature. His father, who had risen from a common soldier to the rank of colonel, died when he was still an infant, and his mother when he was 10 years old. He had been intended for the army, but showed such an aptitude for study that he was sent to the Bergen Latin school, and in 1702 he entered the Copenhagen University. Being destitute of means, he soon came back again to Norway, and was tutor in the family of a clergyman at Voss. A year later he again went to Copenhagen, where he studied theology and took his examination, but shortly after returned to Norway and was again a tutor, this time with a clergyman at Bergen. This latter had been a great traveler, and Holberg, through the perusal of the journal he had kept, was inspired with a desire to see the world. He accordingly set out for Holland, but went only as far as Aix-la-Chapelle. The year after he returned to Norway and settled at Christiansand, where he taught French during the winter. The following spring he went to England and remained 2 years, chiefly at Oxford, where he supported himself by teaching languages and music. Returning to Copenhagen, he established himself as docent at the university, but soon after accepted the post of private tutor, and accompanied his charge to Germany. Upon his return to Denmark he was again a tutor until the year after (1710), when he was admitted as a stipendiary at Borch's Collegium in Copenhagen, when he was finally enabled to devote himself to literary work. In 1711 he published his first work, "Introduction til den Europæiske Rigters Historie" ("Introduction to the History of the Nations of Europe"). In 1714 he was made professor extraordinarius, but without a stipend. Shortly after, however, he was made the beneficiary of the "Rosekrantsfund," and was thus enabled to go abroad. He accordingly sailed to Holland; traveled on foot from Brussels to Paris, where he remained for a year and a half; proceeded again, partly on foot, to Marséilles and Genoa, where he fell ill; and afterward went on to Rome, where he remained the whole winter. The following Feb. he set out again for Denmark, making the whole journey from Rome to Paris on foot. In 1718 he was named professor of metaphysics at Copenhagen; later he became professor of Latin and rhetoric, and ultimately (1730) of history and geography. In 1719-20 appeared, under the pseudonym, Hans Mikkelson, the first of his characteristic productions, the comic-heroic poem "Peder Paars." In 1722 he began to write comedies. Up to this year, when the Danish theater was opened with a translation of Molière's "L'Avare," there had been French and German but no Danish theaters in Copenhagen. Holberg was applied to to write Danish comedies, and this year the first of them was produced: "Den politiske Kandestøber" ("The Pewterer Politician"). Five plays were furnished during the year, and ultimately he had written 33. Among the most notable of these, besides the one mentioned, are "Den Stundesløse" ("The Busy Man"), "Erasmus Montanus," "Børselstuen" ("The Lying-in Room"), "Jeppe på Bjerget" ("Jeppe of the Mountain"), "Jacob von Thybo," "Den Vaagselinde" ("The Fickle Woman"). In 1725 he again went abroad, and remained during the winter in Paris. After 1728, the year of the great conflagration in Copenhagen, and during the reign of Christian VI, no more plays were written; but when the theater was reopened in 1747, on the accession of Frederick V., several more were furnished, inferior, however, to his earlier comedies. In 1741 was published in Latin at Leipsic, "Nicholai Klimii iter subterraneum"—in the Danish translation by Baggesen, "Niels Klims underjordiske Reise" ("Niels Klim's Underground Journey"). He was ennobled in 1747. The considerable property that he had accumulated was left, at his death, to the Sorø Academy. He was buried in the Sorø church. Besides the above, he wrote various historical and other works, among them "Danmarks Riges Historie" ("The History of the Kingdom of Denmark") in 3 vols., an autobiography in 3 letters written in Latin, and several humorous epics and lyrics. He has been called "the founder of modern Danish literature."

Holbørn (hø'born). A district in the central part of London. Population (1891), 33,503.

Holbrook (hōl'bruk). John Edwards. Born at Beaufort, S. C., Dec. 31, 1795; died at Norfolk, Mass., Sept. 8, 1871. An American naturalist. He became professor of anatomy in the Medical College of South Carolina in 1824, a position which he retained upward of 30 years. His chief work is "American Herpetology" (1842).

Holcroft (hol'kroft). Thomas. Born at London, Dec. 10 (O. S.), 1745; died there, March 23, 1809. An English dramatist, miscellaneous writer, and actor. He was ridiculed by Gifford in the "Baviad." In 1794, having embraced the principles of the French Revolution, he was indicted for high treason, but after remaining for about two months in Newgate he was discharged without a trial. Among his plays are "The Follies of a Day," a translation of Beaumarchais's "Mariage de Figaro" (produced in 1784, Holcroft appearing as Figaro), "The Road to Ruin" (1792; revived in 1873, and translated into Danish and German), "The Deserted Daughter," founded on Cumberland's "Fashionable Lover" (1795), etc. He also wrote "Tales of the Castle" from the French of Madame de Genlis (1785), "Life of Baron Frederic Trenck, etc." (1788), "A Tale of Mystery" (the first melodrama, 1802), with several novels and translations.

Holder (hōl'dér). Joseph Bassett. Born at Lynn, Mass., Oct. 26, 1824; died in New York city, Feb. 28, 1888. An American naturalist. He was curator of invertebrate zoology, ichthyology, and herpetology in the American Museum of Natural History in New York city from 1870 until his death. He wrote a "History of the North American Fauna" (1882), "History of the Atlantic Right Whales" (1883), "The Living World" (1884), etc.

Hölderlin (hēl'dér-lin). Johann Christian Friedrich. Born at Lauffen, Württemberg, March 20, 1770; died at Tübingen, Württemberg, June 7, 1843. A German poet, author of the romance "Hyperion" (1797-99), lyric poems (1826), etc.

Holderness (hōl'dér-nes). The peninsula between the North Sea and the Humber, in the East Riding of Yorkshire, England.

Holger Danske (hōl'ger dāns'ke). The tutelary genius of the Danes, who, according to the legend, sleeps beneath the Kronborg at Helsingør (the Elsinore of Shakspeare's "Hamlet"), ready to arise when Denmark is in danger. Local legend places him also at Møgeltonder, in North Schleswig.

Holics (hō'lich). A town in the county of Neutra, Hungary, 45 miles north of Presburg. Population (1890), 5,747.

Holinshed (hol'inz-hed), or Hollingshead (hol'ingz-hed), Raphael. Born probably at Sutton Downes, Cheshire; died about 1580. An English chronicler. He is said to have been educated at one of the universities, possibly Cambridge. His great work, "Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland," was begun for Reginald Wolfe, a London printer, whose service he entered as translator early in the reign of Elizabeth. (See the extract.) A second and enlarged edition, edited by John Hooker, was published after Holinshed's death (1587).

About 1548 Wolfe designed a universal history and cosmography, with maps and illustrations. He had inherited Leland's notes, and he himself began the compilation of the English, Scottish, and Irish portions. Holinshed worked for some years under his direction, and had free access to Leland's manuscripts. "After five-and-twenty years travail spent therein," Wolfe died in 1573. No part of the great project was then ready for publication, but three well-known publishers, George Bishop, John Harrison, and Luke or Lucas Harrison, determined to persevere with it, and Holinshed continued his labours in their service. Alarmed at the size the work seemed likely to assume, Wolfe's successors resolved to limit their plan to histories and descriptions of England, Scotland, and Ireland only, and to omit maps. William Harrison was engaged to assist Holinshed in the descriptions of England and Scotland, and Richard Stanhurst to continue from 1569 to 1547 the history of Ireland, which Holinshed had compiled chiefly from a manuscript by Edmund Campion. At length, on July 1578, a license for publishing "Raphael Holinshed's Cronycle" was issued to John Harrison and George Bishop, on payment of the unusually high fee of "xxs and a copy."

Holles (holz), Denzil, Baron Holles. Born Oct. 31, 1599; died Feb. 17, 1679. An English statesman, second son of the first Earl of Clare. He was the brother-in-law of Strafford. In 1624 he entered Parliament, and on March 2, 1629, was one of the two who held the speaker in his chair when he attempted to adjourn the House at the king's order. Two days later he was arrested and sent to the Tower. He refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the courts over what was done in Parliament, and was heavily fined. The sum of £5,000 was voted to him by the Long Parliament as compensation for his losses in the affair. He was an influential member of this Parliament, was one of the members impeached by the king Jan. 3, 1642, and fought for the Parliament at Edgehill and Brentford. Later he became a prominent advocate of peace and an agreement with the king, was opposed to the Independents, and in 1647 was impeached with 10 others by the army. He fled to France, and in Jan., 1648, was expelled from Parliament. On the Restoration he was created Baron Holles, and was ambassador at Paris 1643-66.

Holmes (hōmz), Abiel. Born at Woodstock, Conn., Dec. 24, 1763; died at Cambridge, Mass., June 4, 1837. An American Congregational clergyman and historical writer. He was pastor of a church at Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1792-1832. Author of "Annals of America" (1805; new ed., bringing the narrative down to 1826, 1829).

Holmes, Oliver Wendell. Born at Cambridge, Mass., Aug. 29, 1809; died Oct. 7, 1894. An American poet, essayist, and novelist, son of Abiel Holmes. He was professor of anatomy and physiology in the medical school of Harvard University from 1847 to 1882, when he resigned and was appointed professor emeritus. He contributed to the "Atlantic Monthly" the "Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table" (1857-58), "Professor at the Breakfast-Table" (1859), "Poet at the Breakfast-Table" (1872), and "Over the Tea-cups" (1891); and wrote the novels "Elsie Venner" (1861), "The Guardian Angel" (1868), and "A Mortal Antipathy" (1885). His poems have been collected in "Songs in Many Keys" (1861), "Humorous Poems" (1865), "Songs of Many Seasons" (1874), "Before the Curfew" (1888). He also wrote a number of volumes of essays, and memoirs of Ralph Waldo Emerson (1885) and of John Lothrop Motley (1878).

Holofernes (hol-ō-fēr'nēs). [Gr. Ὁλοφέρνης, also Ὀλοφέρνης, Ὀλοφέρνης.] A general of Nebuchadnezzar: the leading character in the book of Judith (Apocrypha). He was killed by Judith. Holofernes, or Holophernes, 1. A conventional character of Italian comedy: a pedant or pompous schoolmaster.—2. A pedant in Rabelais's "Gargantua and Pantagruel." He teaches Gargantua to say the alphabet backward in 5 years and 3 months.—3. A pompous schoolmaster in Shakspeare's "Love's Labour's Lost," taken from the conventional character of Italian comedy.

As for the notion of certain critics, that Holofernes was meant for a satire upon John Florio, whose "Second Fruits" appeared in 1591, containing some reflections on the indecorum of the English stage, we cannot discover the slightest ground for it. Shakspeare, no doubt, had ample occasion to laugh at the pedantry of pedagogues long before he knew any thing of Florio.

Hudson, Int. to Love's Labour's Lost.

Holst (hōlst), Hans Peter. Born at Copenhagen, Oct. 22, 1811; died June 2, 1893. A Danish poet. After having been successively a teacher and a newspaper editor, he became, in 1875, dramatist to the royal theater at Copenhagen. He founded in 1868 the magazine "For Romantik og Historie," and was the author of "Ude og Hjemme," "Den lille Hornblæser" (1849), etc.

Holst (hōlst), Hermann Eduard von. Born at Fellin, Livonia, Russia, June 19 (N. S.), 1841. A German historian. He came to the United States in 1866, and settled at New York, where he contributed to the press, and in 1869 became assistant editor of the "Deutsch-Amerikanisches Conversations-Lexikon." He became professor of history at Strassburg University in 1872, at the University of Freiburg in 1874, and at Chicago University in 1892. Among his works are "Verfassungsgeschichte der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika" (1878-1885; translated into English as "Constitutional and Political History of the United States"), and "Life of John C. Calhoun" (1884).

Holstein (hol'stīn). The southern part of the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, separated from Schleswig by the Eider and the Baltic Canal. The chief place is Kiel. The surface is generally low. It formed part of the realm of Charles the Great, and was for several centuries ruled by counts of the house of Schauenberg. Schleswig and Holstein were formally united in 1864. In 1460 they passed to the kings of Denmark (Oldenburg line). Holstein continued a fief of the empire; became a duchy in 1474; and was incorporated with Denmark in 1866. The King of Denmark entered the Germanic Confederation for Holstein in 1815. It received representative government in 1831; rebelled against Denmark 1848-50 and 1863-64; and was annexed by Prussia in 1866. See Schleswig and Schleswig-Holstein Wars.

After practicing medicine at the diamond-fields of South Africa (1872), he took to scientific exploration and collecting. He first explored the Trausvaal (1873-74); reached the Zambesi River, via Shoshong, in 1875; and went as far as the Barotse, returning to Europe in 1879. In 1884 he was again at the Cape and on his way to the Zambesi. The looting of his camp by the Mashukulumbé obliged him to return in 1887. His young wife accompanied him on this second exploration of the Zambesi valley, and rendered heroic service. He has written "Seven Years in South Africa" (1880), etc.

Holy Alliance, The. A league formed by the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia in person after the fall of Napoleon, signed at Paris Sept. 26, 1815, and afterward joined by all the other European sovereigns except those of Rome and England. Its professed object was to unite their respective governments in a Christian brotherhood, but its real one was to perpetuate existing dynasties by their joint opposition to all attempts at change. A special clause debarred any member of the Bonaparte family from ascending a European throne. The league came to an end after the French revolution of 1830.

It is celebrated for the ruins of its monastery, founded by Oswald 635, and famous under St. Cuthbert. Length, 3 miles. 2. A name sometimes given to Rügen, and also to other islands.

Holy Land. See Palestine.

Holy League, The. 1. A league between Pope

Julius II., Ferdinand of Aragon, and the states of Venice and Switzerland, formed in 1511 for the purpose of expelling Louis XII. of France from Italy. It was subsequently joined by Henry VIII. of England and by the emperor Maximilian. It was dissolved on the death of Julius in 1513.

2. A league between the emperor Charles V., the archbishops of Mainz and Salzburg, and the dukes William and Louis of Bavaria, George of Saxony, and Eric and Henry of Brunswick, formed at Nuremberg July 10, 1538, for the support of the Roman Catholic faith in Germany in opposition to the Smalkaldie League.—3. A league formed by the Roman Catholics in France in 1576 for the purpose of annihilating the Huguenot party and elevating the Guises to the throne. It owed its origin to the dissatisfaction among the Roman Catholics with the peace of Chastenois (paix de monsieur), concluded in that year, which granted the Huguenots free exercise of their religion in all parts of France except Paris. It was supported by Philip II. of Spain, and was finally overthrown by Henry IV. in 1596.

Holyoke, Mount. The chief point in a low range (Holyoke range) in western Massachusetts, southeast of Northampton. Height, 955 feet.

Holy Roman Empire, or German-Roman Empire, often called the German Empire, G. Römisches Reich deutscher Nation (rém'ish-es rích doieh 'ernät-së-ön'), or Deutsches Reich (doieh'es rích). The realm ruled by the emperor who claimed to be the representative of the ancient Roman emperors, and who asserted (in theory) authority over the nations of western and central Europe: called "holy" from the interdependence of the empire and the church. It comprised in general the German-speaking peoples in central Europe, and it had for a long time a close connection with Italy. Various regions outside of Germany proper were at different times under the empire. It began with Charles the Great, king of the Franks, who was crowned emperor of the West 800, and was succeeded by various Carolingian emperors. By the treaty of Verdun (843) the Carolingian dynasty continued in the eastern part of Charlemagne's empire (i. e. Germany). The German nation grew from the union of Thuringians, Franks, Saxons, Bavarians, Swabians, Lorrainers, etc. The Saxon line of German kings began with Henry the Fowler in 919. The lasting union of Germany with the empire began in 962, when Otto I., king of Germany, became Roman emperor. The Saxon line of emperors continued until 1024. The Franconian line (Conrad IV., Henry III., Henry IV., Henry V.) reigned 1024 to 1125; the Hohenstaufen or Swabian line (Conrad III., Frederick Barbarossa, Frederick II., Conrad IV.) 1138-1208, 1215-54. There was an interregnum from 1254 to 1273. Emperors from the Hapsburg, Luxembourg, and other houses reigned 1273-1437. The continuous line of Hapsburg emperors, who were powerful Austrian rulers, began in 1438. After Maximilian I. and Charles V. the empire degenerated through the 17th and 18th centuries; and Francis II. (Francis I. of Austria) abdicated as the last emperor in 1806. The emperors were elected. The number of electors was fixed at seven by the Golden Bull of 1356—the archbishops of Mainz, Treves, and Cologne, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Saxony, and the Margrave of Brandenburg. Bavaria and Hannover were respectively made electorates in 1623 and 1692, and in the years immediately before the fall of the empire Wurtemberg, Hesse-Cassel, and Salzburg. By Maximilian I. the empire was divided into 10 circles—Burgundian, Westphalian, Lower Rhine, Upper Rhine, Lower Saxony, Upper Saxony, Franconian, Swabian, Bavarian, and Austrian. See German Confederation, Germany, Prussia, Saxony, and the different German states; also Austria.

Holyrood (hól'i-röd) Palace. An ancient royal palace of Scotland, situated at Edinburgh. It was originally an abbey, founded 1123; was several times burned; and was the scene of the murder of Rizzio 1566. It is a large and picturesque castellated structure, in its existing form built chiefly about 1670. The apartments of Mary Queen of Scots are preserved. The palace replaced Holyrood Abbey, to which belonged the fine ruined Early English church, whose tracery, arcades, and other details are admirable. The abbey possessed the ancient privilege of sanctuary, and for debtors this survived until 1880, when imprisonment for debt was abolished.

Holy Sepulcher, Church of the. A church at Jerusalem, consecrated in 336. The original building was in the form of a rotunda, whose shape, at least, survives in the existing complex structure. It assumed various forms in the course of the middle ages, and was in great part rebuilt after a fire in 1808. The chief entrance is from a court on the south, and has handsome recessed pointed Norman-Saracenic arches. In the interior is the sepulcher proper, inclosed in a 16-sided chapel beneath a dome 65 feet in diameter resting on 18 piers, together with a great number of chapels appropriated to different creeds and nationalities, or marking various spots traditionally connected with the Saviour's passion. Much of the 12th-century Church of the Crusaders, originally distinct from the Holy Sepulcher, is included in the existing edifice: it presents beautiful details of the French architecture of the style of transition to the Pointed.

Holy Thorn. See Glastonbury.

Holy War, The. 1. A work by Thomas Fuller, published in 1639; his first important book.—2. A work by John Bunyan, published in 1682.

Holywell (hól'i-wel). A town in Flintshire, North Wales, situated near the estuary of the Dee, 14 miles southwest of Liverpool. Population (1891), 3,018.

Holywell street. A London street parallel to the Strand from Newcastle street to St. Clement Danes Church: so named from a "holy well" in that locality. It is occupied chiefly by book-shops, and was formerly notorious as a place of sale for obscene literature.

Holzminden (hólts'min-den). A town in Brunswick, Germany, on the Weser 40 miles southwest of Hannover. It has a school of engineering. Population (1890), 8,787.

Homam (hóm'mám'). [Ar. sa'd al-homam, the lucky star of the hero.] The third-magnitude star γ Pegasi.

Homburg (hóm'berg), Wilhelm. Born at Batavia, Java, Jan. 8, 1652; died at Paris, Sept. 24, 1715. A chemist of German descent. He discovered boracic acid and "Homburg's phosphorus."

Homburg, or Homburg-vor-der-Höhe (hóm'-börg-for-der-hé'e). A town in the province of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, on a spur of the Taunus 9 miles north-northwest of Frankfort-on-the-Main. It is one of the most frequented watering-places in Germany, noted for mineral springs, formerly for its gaming-tables. It has a castle. It was the capital to 1866 of the former landgraviate of Hesse-Homburg. Population (1890), commune, 8,863.

Homburg. A small town in the Palatinate, Bavaria, 43 miles southeast of Treves.

Home (hóm), Sir Everard. Born at Hull, England, May 6, 1756; died at London, Aug. 31, 1832.

A Scottish surgeon and anatomist. He was a pupil of his brother-in-law John Hunter, and later his assistant. From 1821 he was surgeon to Chelsea Hospital. He wrote "Lectures on Comparative Anatomy" (1814-23), etc.

Home, Henry, Lord Kames. Born at Kames, Berwickshire, Scotland, 1696; died at Edinburgh, Dec. 27, 1782. A Scottish judge and philosophical writer. He published "Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion" (1751), "Elements of Criticism" (1762), and various legal works.

Home, John. Born at Leith, Scotland, Sept. 21, 1722; died near Edinburgh, Sept. 5, 1808. A Scottish clergyman and dramatist, author of "Douglas" (which see). He was settled as minister at Athelstaneford in East Lothian in 1747. His connection with the stage aroused clerical hostility, and proceedings against him were begun in the presbytery: but he resigned in 1757. He also wrote "Agis" (acted 1758), "The Fatal Discovery" (1769), "Alonzo" (1773), "Alfred" (1778).

Home as Found. A novel by Cooper, published in 1838.

Home Counties. A name given to the English counties containing London and in its immediate neighborhood. They are Middlesex, Surrey, Kent, Essex, and Hertford.

Homer (hóm'mér). [L. Homerus, Gr. Ὅμηρος, one who puts together; a hostage; a pledge agreed upon between two parties.] The poet to whom is assigned by very ancient tradition the authorship of the Iliad and the Odyssey, and of certain hymns to the gods ("Homeric Hymns"). Other poems also, as the "Batrachomyomachia" ("Battle of the Frogs and Mice"), were with less certainty attributed to him. Of his personality nothing is known. Seven cities—Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis (in Cyprus), Chios, Argos, and Athens—contended for the honor of being his birthplace: of these, the best evidence connects him with Smyrna. He was said to have died on the island of Ios. The tradition that he lived on the island of Chios, and in his old age was blind, is supported by the Hymn to the Delian Apollo. Modern destructive criticism has led to the doubt whether such a person as Homer existed at all, the great epics which bear that name being supposed to be, in their existing form, of a composite character, the product of various persons and ages. It is altogether probable, however, that the nucleus of the Iliad, at least, was the work of a single poet of commanding genius. (See Iliad, Odyssey, and the quotation below.) Various dates have been assigned to Homer. According to Herodotus he lived about 850 B. C.; others give a later date, and some a date as early as 1200 B. C. His poems were sung by professional reciters (rhapsodists), who went from city to city. (See Homeridae.) They were given substantially their present form by Pisistratus or his sons Hipparchus and Hippas, who ordered the rhapsodists to recite them at the Panathenaic festival in their order and completeness. The present text of the poems, with their division into books, is based upon the work of the Alexandrine critics.

We may assume it as certain that there existed in Ionian schools or fraternities of epic rhapsodists who composed and recited heroic lays at feasts, and often had friendly contests in these recitations. The origin of these recitations may be sought in northern Greece, from which the fashion migrated in early days to Asia Minor. We may assume that these singers became popular in many parts of Greece, and that they wandered from court to court, glorifying the heroic ancestors of the various chiefs. One among them, called Homer, was endowed with a genius superior to the rest, and struck out a plot capable of nobler and larger treatment. It is likely that this superiority was not recognized at the time, and that he remained all his life a singer like the rest, a wandering minstrel, possibly poor and blind. The listening public gradually stamped his poem with their approval, they demanded its frequent recitation, and so this Homer began to attain a great posthumous fame. But when this fame led people to inquire into his life and history, it had already passed out of recollection, and men supplied by fables what they had forgotten or neglected. The rhapsodists, however, then turned their attention to expanding and perfecting his poem, which was greatly enlarged and called the Iliad. In doing this they had recourse to the art of writing, which seems to have been in use when Homer framed his poem, but which was certainly employed when the plan was enlarged with episodes. The home of the original Homer seems to have been about Smyrna, and in contact with both Æolic and Ionic legends. His date is quite uncertain: it need not be placed before 800 B. C., and is perhaps later, but not after 700 B. C.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., 1. 81.

Homer, Winslow. Born at Boston, Feb. 24, 1836.

An American genre-painter. In 1861 he went to Washington, and three times accompanied the Army of the Potomac in its campaigns. His first oil pictures were war scenes; among them is the famous "Prisoners from the Front." In later years he has lived chiefly in New York. He was elected national academician in 1865. He has produced many works in oils, in water-colors, and in black and white. Among his pictures are "The Life-Line" (1884), "Launching the Boat" (1884), etc.

Homeric Hymns. A group of Greek hexameter poems, 5 of considerable length and 29 shorter, anciently ascribed to Homer. Each is inscribed to and relates a legend concerning a god or goddess. The most noted are the "Hymn to the Delian Apollo," in which an account is given of the birth of Apollo and of the ancient festival at Delos (the author describing himself as the blind bard of rocky Chios); the "Hymn to the Pythian Apollo"; and the hymns to Hermes, Demeter, and Aphrodite.

The Homeric Hymns are essentially secular and not religious; they seem distinctly intended to be recited in competitions of rhapsodes, and in some cases even for direct pay; they are all in form preludes . . . to longer recitations, apparently of epic poems, though the longer five are expanded into substantially independent compositions. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., 1. 129.

Homeridæ (hō-mer'i-dē). See the extract and Homer.

In fact, in addition to Creophylus of Samos and Cynæthus of Chios, both of whom are mentioned as friends of Homer, or early preservers of his poetry, the main source of early traditions about Homer seems to be among the clan of Homeridæ, at Chios, who claimed him as their founder, and who recited his epics through Greece. In the Hymn to the Delian Apollo one of these bards speaks of himself, and we know of contests being held among them, such as are described in the alleged contest between Homer and Hesiod.

Home Rule Bills. Two bills introduced into the British Parliament by Mr. Gladstone, the object of which was to provide a separate legislature for Ireland. The first, introduced in 1886, was defeated on the second reading, June 7; the second, introduced in 1893, passed the House of Commons Sept. 1, but was thrown out by the House of Lords Sept. 8, by 419 votes to 41.

Homespun (hōm'spun), Zekiel and Cicely. Brother and sister in Colman the younger's play "The Heir-at-Law." Their names are almost a synonym for rustic worth and simplicity.

Homestead (hōm'sted). A town near Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, noted for the manufacture of steel plates and rails. It was the scene of a strike and shut-down from July to Nov., 1892, which was attended with very serious disturbances. A body of detectives who attempted to gain access to the steel-works in two barges were attacked by the strikers. Winchester rifles and cannon were used in the fight, and oil was poured on the river and set on fire to burn the barges. Many on both sides were killed or wounded.

Home, Sweet Home. A favorite English song. The music is in Bishop's opera "Clari, or the Maid of Milan." It is called a Sicilian air, but is probably Bishop's. The words were written by John Howard Payne.

Homeward Bound. A novel by Cooper, published in 1838.

Homildon (hōm'ldon) Hill. A height near Wooler, in Northumberland, England, where the English under Percy defeated the Scots under Douglas in Sept., 1402.

Homme Armé, L' (lōm ār-mā'). [F., 'The Armed Man'; OF. L'ome armé, L'omme armé.] 1. An old French chanson, the melody of which was used by some of the musicians of the 15th and 16th centuries as the canto fermo of a certain kind of mass called the "Missa L'Homme armé." The origin of the song has given rise to much speculation.—2. A French dance-tune said to date from the 15th century, and printed with sacred words at Antwerp in 1565. Grove.

Homme qui Rit, L'. [F., 'The Man who Laughs.'] A romance by Victor Hugo, published in 1869.

Hompesch (hōm'pesh), Baron Ferdinand von. Born at Düsseldorf, Prussia, Nov. 9, 1744; died at Montpellier, France, 1803. The last grand master of the order of St. John. He was elected in 1797, and was exiled from Malta by the French in 1798.

Homs (hōms), Hums (hums), Hems (hems), or Hims (hims). A city in Syria, Asiatic Turkey, situated on the Oronates about lat. 34° 45' N., long. 36° 43' E.: the ancient Emesa. It was noted in ancient times for its Temple of the Sun; was frequently captured and recaptured; and was the scene of a victory of Aurelian over Zenobia in 272, and of a victory of Ibrahim Pasha of Egypt over the Turks in July, 1832. Population, about 20,000.

Honan (hō-nān'). A province in northern China. Area, 65,104 square miles. Population, 22,115,827.

Honda, or San Bartolomeo de Honda (sān bār-tō-lō-mā'ō dā ōn'dā). A town in the state of Tolima, United States of Colombia, situated on the Magdalena, at the head of navigation, about lat. 5° 12' N., long. 74° 50' W. Population, about 3,800.

Hondekoeter (hōn'de-kō-ter), Melchior. Born at Utrecht, Netherlands, about 1636; died at Amsterdam, April 3, 1695. A Dutch painter of animals, especially of fowls.

Honduras (hōn-dē'ras). [Sp. Honduras, lit. 'depths,' pl. of hondura, depth, from hondo, deep, from L. fundus, bottom. The name is said to refer to the difficulty the first explorers had in finding anchorage off the coast.] A republic of Central America, bounded by Guatemala on the northwest, the Caribbean Sea on the north, Nicaragua on the southeast and south, the Pacific Ocean on the south, and San Salvador on the southwest. Capital, since Nov., 1880, Tegucigalpa; the old capital was Comayagua. The surface is much varied, with numerous mountain-chains, especially in the west, and high, open valleys and plateaus; on the northern coast there are extensive forest-covered alluvions. The climate of the high lands is temperate and healthful; portions of the coast are hot and insalubrious. The valleys are very fertile, and the high plains support large herds of cattle. Gold, silver, etc., are mined, though not on an extensive scale. The principal exports are fruits, cabinet woods, hides, indigo, and precious metals. A large proportion of the inhabitants are Mestizos or Indians. Spanish is the common language, and the prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. The executive is vested in a president elected for four years; congress consists of a single house. Honduras was discovered by Columbus in 1502; was conquered by the Spanish 1523-36; formed a colonial intendencia or province in the captivity of Guatemala; was a state in the Central American union 1823-39; and has since been independent. It has suffered from political revolutions and from wars with Salvador, Guatemala, and Nicaragua. Area, 46,400 square miles. Population (1893), about 380,000.

Honduras, Bay of. An arm of the Caribbean Sea, lying north of Honduras and east of British Honduras and Yucatan.

Honduras, British. See British Honduras.

Hone (hōn), William. Born at Bath, England, June 3, 1780 (1779?); died at Tottenham, near London, Nov., 1842. An English political satirist and miscellaneous writer. His best-known works are "Every-day Book" (1826), "Table-book" (1827-1828), "Year-book" (1829).

Honesdale (hōnz'dāl). A post-borough and the capital of Wayne County, northeastern Pennsylvania, situated 25 miles northeast of Scranton. Population (1890), 2,816.

Honest George. A nickname of George Monk, Lord Albemarle.

Honest Man's Fortune, The. A play by Fletcher, Massinger, and others, acted in 1613. It was first printed in the 1647 folio. Fletcher wrote a poem "Upon an Honest Man's Fortune," printed with the play.

Honest Man's Revenge, The. See Atheist's Tragedy.

Honest Whore, The. A play by Dekker and Middleton, in 2 parts. Part 1 was printed in 1604; the earliest copy extant of part 2 was printed in 1630.

Honeycomb (hun'i-kōm), Henry. A pseudonym of Leigh Hunt. He professes to be a descendant of the Will Honeycomb in the "Spectator."

Honeycomb, Will. One of the imaginary club publishing the "Spectator."

The characters of Will Wimble and Will Honeycomb are not a whit behind their friend, Sir Roger, in delicacy and felicity. The delightful simplicity and good-humoured officiousness in the one are set off by the graceful affectation and courtly pretension in the other.

Hazlitt, Eng. Poets, p. 130.

Honeymoon, The. A comedy by John Tobin, produced in 1805. It is, to some extent, based on Shakspere's "Taming of the Shrew," with ideas from Fletcher and Shirley.

Honeywood. The "good-natured man" in Goldsmith's play of that name. He suffers from a foolish eagerness to please, even wishing to give up the woman he loves to a friend who also loves her. He is cured by Sir William Honeywood, his uncle.

Hondfleur (ōn-flēr'). A seaport in the department of Calvados, France, situated on the estuary of the Seine nearly opposite Havre. It has considerable export trade to England. Formerly it was of much more importance. It was frequently taken and retaken during the Hundred Years' War. Population (1891), commune, 9,450.

Hong-Kong (hōng'kong'). [Properly Hiang-Kiang, fragrant streams.] An island belonging to Great Britain, lying off the province of Kwang-tung, China, near the mouth of the Canton River, in lat. 22° 17' N., long. 114° 10' E. Chief place, Victoria. The surface is mountainous. It was ceded by China to Great Britain in 1842 (confirmed in 1843), and is a crown colony and naval station. It is an important commercial center and free port. The chief exports are tea and silk; the chief import, opium. Area, 29 square miles. Population (1891), 221,441.

Honiton (hōn'itn). A town in Devonshire, England, situated on the river Otter 16 miles east-northeast of Exeter. It has long been noted for the manufacture of lace. Population (1891), 3,216.

Honnef (hōn'nef). A small town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, situated on the Rhine 10 miles southeast of Bonn.

Honolulu (hō-nō-lō'lō). The capital of the Hawaiian Islands, situated on the southern coast of Oahu, in lat. 21° 18' N., long. 157° 52' W. It has the only good harbor in the islands, and is their chief seaport and seat of commerce. It was the center of the revolutionary movement of 1893. Population (1890), 22,907.

Honoré, Rue St.- See Rue St.-Honoré.

Honorina (hō-nō'ri-nā), Justa Grata. A Roman princess. She was the daughter of Constantius III., emperor of the West, and Galla Placidia, and was born about 415 A. D. Detected in her seventeenth year in an intrigue with Eugenius, a chamberlain of the palace, she was sent by her mother to the court of Theodosius at Constantinople, where for sixteen years she was kept more or less closely guarded. She is said to have sent, either before or after her disgrace, a ring to Attila, with the request that he claim her as his bride. Subsequently, in 450, when seeking a cause of quarrel with the Western Empire, Attila sent an embassy to Valentinian, claiming the person of Honorina and her share in the empire. The date of her death is not known.

Honorius (hō-nō'ri-us) I. Died 638. Pope 625-638. He delivered an opinion favorable to Monothelism in a letter to Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, about 634, in consequence of which he was condemned by the sixth ecumenical council, held at Constantinople in 680.

Honorius II. (Peter Cadolaus). Died 1073. Antipope. He was elected by the Lombard bishops, acting under the influence of the empress Agnes, in opposition to Alexander II., and was deposed by the Council of Milan in 1064.

Honorius II. (Lambert di Fagnano). Died 1130. Pope 1124-30. He concluded, while cardinal-bishop of Ostia, the Concordat of Worms with Henry V. (1122). He was elevated to the holy see in opposition to the antipope Celestine III. by the powerful family of the Frangipani. He confirmed the order of the Templars at the synod of Troyes in 1123.

Honorius III. (Cencio Savelli). Died 1227. Pope 1216-27. He confirmed the order of the Dominicans in 1216, and that of the Franciscans in 1223.

Honorius IV. (Giacomo Savelli). Died 1287. Pope 1285-87.

Honorius, Flavius. Born at Constantinople, Sept. 9, 384 A. D.; died at Ravenna, Aug. 27, 423. Emperor of the West. He was the second son of Theodosius, whom he succeeded in the western half of the empire in 395, while his brother Arcadius inherited the eastern half. He was, by the will of his father, placed under the guardianship of Stilicho, whose daughter Maria he married in 398. Stilicho defeated Alaric at Pollentia in 403, and in 406 repulsed the invasion of Radagaisus (who penetrated as far as Florence), but was put to death at the instance of the emperor in 408. In 410 Rome was taken and sacked by Alaric. During the reign of Honorius the West Goths, Franks, and Burgundians settled in Gaul, and the Suevi, Vandals, and Alans in Spain, while Britain and Armenia made themselves virtually independent.

Honthelm (hōnt'him), Johann Nikolaus von. Born at Trier, Prussia, Jan. 27, 1701; died at Montquintin, Luxembourg, Sept. 2, 1790. A German Roman Catholic prelate, bishop in partibus of Myrioptus, and suffragan bishop of Treves; an opponent of Ultramontanism. His chief work is "De statu ecclesie et legitima potestate Romani pontificis" (published under the pseudonym of Justinus Febronius, 1763).

Honvéd (hōn'vād). [Hung. lit. 'defenders of the fatherland.'] The landwehr of Hungary, exclusive of artillery. The name was used in 1848-49 to denote, first the volunteers, and then the entire revolutionary army.

Hooch, or Hoogh (hōch or hōg), Pieter de. Born at Rotterdam about 1632; died at Haarlem, Netherlands, about 1681. A Dutch genre-painter. He was a pupil of Nicolas Berghem.

Hoochow-fu (hō-chou'fō'). A city in the province of Chekiang, China, 53 miles north-northwest of Hangchow-fu: one of the principal centers of the silk industry.

Hood (hūd), John Bell. Born at Owingsville, Bath County, Ky., June 1, 1831; died at New Orleans, Aug. 30, 1879. A Confederate soldier in the Civil War. He graduated at West Point in 1853; entered the Confederate army at the beginning of the Civil War; commanded a division of Lee's army at Antietam and at Gettysburg; commanded a brigade under General Bragg at Chickamauga; was promoted lieutenant-general; and in 1864 succeeded General Johnston as commander-in-chief of the army opposed to General Sherman in Georgia. Abandoning the defensive policy of his predecessor, he attacked General Sherman 20th, 23d, and 28th of July, 1864, but was re-pulsed with heavy loss, and compelled to abandon Atlanta Sept. 1, 1864. He was defeated by General Thomas at the decisive battle of Nashville, Dec. 16, 1864, and was relieved of his command in Jan., 1865.

Hood, Mount. One of the most celebrated summits of the Cascade Range, in Oregon, about lat. 45° 24' N., long. 121° 40' W. Height given as 11,200 feet and as 11,934 feet.

Hood, Robin. A traditional English outlaw and popular hero. He is said to have been born at Locksley, Nottinghamshire, about 1160. He lived in the woods with his band, either for reasons of his own or because he was really outlawed, his haunts being chiefly Sherwood Forest and Barnsdale in Yorkshire. He is also said to have been the outlawed Earl of Huntingdon. He was extravagant and adventurous, and though kind to the poor robbed the rich. According to one tradition the prioress of Kirkley, to whose care he had entrusted himself to be held when he was a very old man, treacherously allowed him to bleed to death. His companions were Friar Tuck, Maid Marian, Little John, Will Scarlett, Allen-a-Bale, and George-a-Greene. He is a favorite subject in ballad tradition, and in fact the ballads are to all appearance the original source of the legends concerning him. He is intimately associated with the May-day festivities. There was a distinct set of sports in vogue at the beginning of the 16th century, called the Robin Hood sports. They portrayed the adventures of Robin and his band, but were finally absorbed in one of the other sports, the "morris," which, being a procession interspersed with dances, had a tendency to absorb the characters of the others. A stop was put to the whole at the Reformation, when penalties were imposed by act of Parliament upon the performers. Ritson, Childe.

Diligent enquiries have been made to ascertain whether the personage known as Robin Hood had a real existence, but without positive results. The story of his life is purely legendary, and the theories in regard to him have never been advanced beyond hypothesis. It is exceedingly probable that such a man lived in the 12th or 13th century, and that the exploits of other less prominent popular heroes were connected with his name and absorbed in his reputation. The noble descent which has often been ascribed to him is in all likelihood the result of the medieval idea that the great virtues existed only in persons of gentle birth. Tuckerman, Hist. of Prose Fiction, p. 48.

Hood, Samuel, first Viscount Hood. Born Dec. 12, 1724; died at Bath, England, Jan. 27, 1816. An English admiral. On Feb. 21, 1759, in command of the Vestal, he captured the French frigate Bellona after a fight of three hours. He was appointed commander-in-chief in North America, April, 1767, returning to England in 1771. In 1780 he became rear-admiral of the blue, and was sent to the West Indies to reinforce Rodney. He was sent to blockade Martinique in 1781, but was prevented from accomplishing his object by a French fleet under De Grasse. On Aug. 28, 1781, he joined Rear-Admiral Graves at New York. He commanded the rear in the fight with De Grasse, Sept. 5, 1781, but was not able to get into action. In Nov. he sailed to the West Indies, where he again met De Grasse. He was commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean in 1793, and took possession of the harbor and forts of Toulon in Aug.; from this position he was driven by the French in Dec. He captured Bastia May 19, 1794.

Hood, Thomas. Born at London, May 23, 1798; died there, May 3, 1845. An English poet and humorist. He began the study of engraving, but soon abandoned the art, and in 1821 became an under editor of the "London Magazine." In 1830 he began the "Comic Annual," and in 1843 "Hood's Magazine." From 1835 to 1837 he lived at Coblenz, and from 1837 to 1840 at Ostend. He wrote "Whims and Oddities" (1826), "Plea of the Midsummer Fairies, etc." (1827), "Lamia" (published 1852), "Dream of Eugene Aram" (1829), "Tynley Hall" a novel (1834), "Up the Rhine" (1834), "Song of the Shirt" (1843), "Bride of Sighs," "Miss Kilmansegg," "Epistle to Rae Wilson," etc.

Hood, Thomas. Born at Waustead, near London, Jan. 19, 1835; died Nov. 20, 1874. An English author, son of Thomas Hood.

Hooft (höft), Pieter Corneliszoon. Born at Amsterdam, March 16, 1581; died at The Hague, May 21, 1647. A Dutch poet and dramatist. He was the son of an Amsterdam burgomaster. He studied at Leyden, having previously traveled extensively in France, Italy, and Germany (1598-1601). In 1609 he was appointed bailiff of Muiden, and in the following years lived during the summer at the castle of Muiden, and in the winter at Amsterdam, in which places he gathered about him the most renowned artists, poets, and learned men of the day, since known in Dutch history as "the Muiden Circle." Hortibonus (hōr-ti-bō'nus), or Hortusbonus (hōr-tus-bō'nus), Is. The pseudonym of Isaac Casaubon. Casaubon in the Dauphinois patois being jardin, the pseudonym is literally "bon jardin" ("good garden").

Horus (hō'rūs), or Hor (hōr). In Egyptian mythology, a solar deity, the son of Osiris and Isis, and the avenger of his father upon Set; called by the Greeks Harpocrates. As Osiris was the sun of night, Horus was the sun of day. As the opponent of Set, he figured as the Elder Horus; as Horus the Child, he was the rising sun. He was generally represented as hawk-headed, and is hardly distinguishable from Ra, like whom he was the lord of Upper Egypt.

The heaven- or sun-god Horus was worshipped almost as generally as Ra. He was honoured in various shapes in Egypt: as Haroeri (the elder), Harpechrud (Harpocrates, the child), as the son of Isis, of Nut, or of Hathor, in many places in Upper Egypt (as at Edfu) and in Lower Egypt. His symbol is the winged sun-disc, and he flies through the air as a hawk. His chief myth is that of the fight with Set. But it is difficult to trace his original form, as he is completely absorbed in the Osiris circle, to which he certainly did not originally belong.

La Saussaye, Science of Religion, p. 408.

Horus. A name given by Mariette to Hor-em-hib, an Egyptian king of the 18th dynasty.

After several insignificant kings came Horus, and with him the series of legitimate princes begins again; but with him there also set in a violent reaction against the fanatical reforms of Amenophis IV. The names of the deposed kings were everywhere chiselled out; their buildings were razed to the ground, and the capital at Tell-el-Amarna was so carefully and patiently demolished that not one stone is left standing. Mariette, Outlines, p. 43.

Horváth (hōr'vāt), Mihály. Born at Szentés, Hungary, Oct. 20, 1809; died at Karlsbad, Bohemia, Aug. 19, 1878. A Hungarian historian and politician, minister of worship and public instruction in 1849. He wrote a "History of the Hungarians" (1842-46), "Historical Monuments of Hungary" (1857, etc.), "History of Hungary" (1859-63).

Hosea (hō-zō'ū), or Hoshea (hō-shē'ū). The first of the "minor prophets." He flourished in the kingdom of Israel under Jeroboam II, and his successors. In his prophecies, which consist of 14 chapters, he represents the relation of Israel to Yahveh (Jehovah) as that of a wife to her husband, and its apostasy as the faithlessness of a wife. In the first division (i.-ii.), which originated during the latter part of the reign of Jeroboam II., these ideas are symbolically expressed and illustrated by the prophet's own experiences in his married life with a faithless woman; the second division (iv.-xiv.), belonging to the period of the kings following, contains, on the basis of the same ideas, a series of discourses in which the sins of the people in all ranks are exposed and censured. Hosea's style is characterized by short and abrupt, sometimes obscure, sentences, full of fervor and strong feeling.

Hosea Biglow. See Biglow Papers.

Hoshangabad (hō-shung'gā-bād), or Hushangabad (hu-shung'gā-bād). 1. A district in the Central Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 22° 30' N., long. 77° 30' E. Area, 4,437 square miles. Population (1881), 488,787.—2. The capital of the district of Hoshangabad, situated on the Nerbudda about lat. 22° 45' N., long. 77° 37' E. Population, about 15,000.

Hoshea (hō-shē'ū), or Hosea (hō-zō'ū). [Heb., 'deliverance,' 'salvation,'] The last king of the ten tribes, successor of Pekah son of Remaliah, whom he assassinated in a revolution, and whose throne he usurped. According to the annals of Tiglath-Pileser III., Pekah was killed by the Assyrian king, and Hoshea (Assyrian Ashd) was appointed his successor. The invasion by Tiglath-Pileser of the Kingdom of Israel, resulting in the capture of many cities, the inhabitants of which were deported to Assyria, is mentioned in 2 Ki. xv. 29. Under Tiglath-Pileser's successor, Shalmaneser IV., Hoshea "conspired" against the Assyrians, seeking an alliance with the Egyptian king Shabaka (biblical So). This led to the destruction of Samaria after a three years' siege by Shalmaneser, and the imprisoning of his last king.

Hosius (hō'shi-us), or Osius (ō'shi-us). Died in Spain about 358. A bishop of the early Christian church in Spain. He was appointed to the see of Cordova about 300, and in 324 was sent by Constantine the Great to Alexandria, with a view to composing the difficulties between Alexander and Arius. He is said by some to have drawn up the symbol of faith adopted at the Council of Nice in 325.

Hosius (hō'sc-ōs), Stanislaus. Born at Craow, May 5, 1504; died near Rome, Aug. 5, 1579. A Polish cardinal, a leading opponent of Protestantism in Poland.

Hosmer (hos'mēr), Harriet G. Born at Watertown, Mass., Oct. 6, 1830. An American sculptor. She studied with Stevenson of Boston, and (anatomy) in the School of Medicine at St. Louis. In 1852 she went to Rome, and studied with Gibson. After 2 years she produced busts of "Daphne" and "Medusa." Among her best-known works are "Enone" (1855), "Zenobia in Chains" (1859), "The Sleeping Faun" (1867), "The Waking Faun," "Beatrice Cenci," "Puck" (1885). The fountain in Central Park, New York, is by her.

Hospenthal (hos'pen-täl). A place on the St. Gotthard Pass, Switzerland, southwest of Andermatt.

Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem, Order of the. A body of military monks, which took its origin from an earlier community, not military in character, under whose auspices a hospital and a church had been founded in Jerusalem. Its military organization was perfected in the 12th century. After the retaking of Jerusalem by the Moslems, these knights defended Acre in vain, took shelter in Cyprus, and in the 14th century occupied the island of Rhodes. In 1522 the island of Rhodes was seized by the Turks, and the knights, after some wanderings, had possession given them of Malta, the government of which island they administered until it was occupied by Napoleon in 1798. The badge of the order was the cross of 8 points, without any central disk, and consisting in fact of 4 barbed arrowheads meeting at their points—the well-known Maltese cross. This is modified in modern times, with slight differences for the different nations in which branches of the order have survived. At different times the order has been called officially Knights of Rhodes and Knights of Malta. It maintains to the present day a certain independent existence. The most famous grand master of the order was La Valette, who successfully defended Malta against the Turks in 1565. That branch of the order called the bailiwick of Brandenburg was revived and recognized as a separate order by the King of Prussia in 1852. The dormant langue of England was revived 1827-31, and is again located at St. John's Gate, Clerkenwell.

Hôtel de Cluny (ō-tel' dē klū-nē'). The palace, in Paris, of the Abbots of Cluny in Burgundy, built in the 15th and 16th centuries, and now a museum of mediæval and Renaissance decorative art. It is a picturesque example of the late-pointed style, with towers, square mullioned windows, high roofs, and tracery-framed dormers. The little chapel is elaborately ornamented. The palace occupies the site of a Roman palace assigned to Constantius Chlorus. Of this the baths survive in part, notably the vaulted frigidarium, 37½ by 65 feet and 59 high, and decorated with rostra.

Hôtel de Rambouillet (dē roñ-bō-yā'). A famous house in Paris, on the Rue St. Thomas du Louvre. It was destroyed together with the street when the Louvre was finished. It was originally the Hôtel Pisani, the residence of the father of Madame Rambouillet. It was noted as being the center of a literary and exclusive circle out of which afterward grew the French Academy. This salon was instituted about 1615 by the Marquise de Rambouillet, who was shocked by the puerile and immoral society of the period. The women assumed the title of "Les précieuses," and proposed to vulgarize the French language. The men called themselves "Esprits doux." They had a vocabulary of their own, and called all common things by uncommon names. They also had a conventional language out of which Saumaise composed his "Dictionnaire des précieuses." Richelieu, Bossuet, Cornille, Descartes, La Rochefoucauld, Balzac, Madame de Sévigné, and others were members of this coterie, and it exerted a good influence. Pedantry and affectation, however, increased, and the gatherings declined in interest, and never recovered from the irony of Molière in "Les précieuses ridicules" and "Les femmes savantes," though it was only the extravagances of a few that he attacked. La Bruyère also took occasion to quarrel with them.

Hôtel des Invalides (ō-tel' dā zañ-vā-jéd'). A great establishment founded in 1670 at Paris for disabled and infirm soldiers. The monumental facade, about 650 feet long, has 3 stories, and is adorned with military trophies and an equestrian statue of Louis XIV. The interior possesses halls adorned with interesting military paintings, and contains the Musée d'Artillerie, which includes a remarkable collection of mediæval and Renaissance armor.—The Church of the Invalides consists of 2 parts—(1) the Église St. Louis and the Dôme, since 1840 the mausoleum of Napoleon I. The nave of the former is adorned with captured battle-flags. The Dôme was built by J. H. Mansart in 1706. In plan it is a square of 198 feet, surmounted by a gilded dome on a circular drum which is 86 feet in diameter, and with its cross and lantern 344 high. The entrance is adorned with 2 tiers of classical columns and a pediment. The tomb of Napoleon is a large monolithic sarcophagus of red granite, placed beneath the dome in an open circular crypt 20 feet deep and 36 in diameter. The walls of the crypt bear allegorical reliefs, and against its 12 piers stand colossal Victories. In alternate intercolumniations are placed 6 trophies, each of 10 flags taken in battle.

Hôtel de Ville (ō-tel' dē vël). A historic building in Paris, of great size, burned by the Commune in 1871, but carefully restored and much enlarged. The original structure was begun in 1533 by an Italian, Domenico da Cortona; this is represented by the central part of the existing facade, which offers a picturesque combination of the Italian and French Renaissance styles. It is of 2 stories, flanked by pavilions a story higher, all with high hip-roofs, and surmounted by a high openwork central tower. The exterior is adorned with much sculpture. The rooms of state display splendid sculptures and wall-paintings by the most distinguished contemporary artists.

Hotho (hō'tō), Heinrich Gustav. Born at Berlin, May 22, 1802; died there, Dec. 24, 1873. A German historian of art, appointed professor at the University of Berlin in 1829. He was director of the collection of prints in the Royal Museum from 1859. He wrote "Geschichte der deutschen und niederländischen Malerei" (1840-43), "Die Malerschule Huberts van Eyck" (1855-58), "Geschichte der christlichen Malerei" (1807-72), etc.

Hot Springs (hot springz). A town and watering-place, capital of Garland County, Arkansas, 48 miles west-southwest of Little Rock. It is noted for its hot springs. Population (1890), 8,086.

Hottentot-Bushmen (hot'en-tot-būsh'men). A South African race. Ethnically Lepsius includes the Hottentots, Bushmen, and Pygmies, with the Bantu, in the negro race, but he classes the Hottentot and Bushman languages with the Hamitic family. He derives the Hottentots from Cushitic Hamites blended with Bantu negroes. Generally the Hottentots, Bushmen, and Pygmies are classed as one race or two separate races. There are striking differences between the Hottentots and the Bushmen in structure and language, but their physical and linguistic kinship seems to be well established. In the Bushmen the distinctive features of the Hottentots with regard to other races are found exaggerated. These peculiar features are (a) the color, that of the Bushmen being brown, that of the Hottentots yellow; (b) the stature, the Hottentots being somewhat shorter than the Bantu, while the Bushmen rank with the Pygmies; (c) the tufted hair; (d) the diminutive and broad nose; (e) the perpendicular forehead; (f) the tapering chin with prominent cheek-bones; (g) the wrinkled skin. Intellectually, the Hottentots and Bushmen are fairly gifted. By no people are the Bushmen more ill-treated than by their nearest of kin, the Hottentots. The Hottentots are pastoral; the Bushmen and Pygmies are exclusively given to hunting. The Hottentots are independent, even aggressive; the Bushmen and Pygmies are timid, and hover, as Helots, on the skirts of the stronger Bantu settlements, which they supply with game. See Khoikhoi, Bushmen, and Africa (with subheadings).

Hottentots (hot'n-tots). [Native name Khoikhoi. Hottentot is supposed to be imitative of stammering, with ref. to the clicking sounds of Hottentot speech.] A nickname given by the first colonists to the natives of the Cape of Good Hope, because of the clicks and other strange sounds of their language. The Hottentots call themselves Khoikhoi, 'the men.' Sometimes this name is used for the Bushmen and Pygmies as well, all three being considered as one race. In this acceptance the name Hottentot-Bushman (which see) is to be preferred.

Hottinger (hot'ting-er), Johann Heinrich. Born at Zurich, Switzerland, March 10, 1620; drowned in the river Limmat, near Zurich, June 5, 1667. A Swiss Orientalist and biblical scholar. He wrote "Thesaurus philologicus" (1644), "Etymologicum orientale" (1661), etc.

Houbraken (hou'brä-ken), Jacobus. Born at Dordrecht, Netherlands, Dec. 25, 1698; died at Amsterdam, Nov. 14, 1780. A Dutch engraver and painter.

Houchard (ō-shär'), Jean Nicolas. Born at Forbach, Lorraine, 1740; guillotined at Paris, Nov. 16, 1793. A French general. He defeated the Allies at Blandschoote Sept. 6-8, 1793, but was defeated at Courtray Sept. 15. This defeat was the cause of his arrest and execution.

Houdan (ō-dōñ'), Luc de. Born at Rennes, 1811; died at Paris, 1846. A French hydrographer. He was a lieutenant in the French fleet in the Rio de la Plata 1840-43, made extended surveys, and published several works on the Plata and Paraná, and on South American hydrography in general.

Houdetot (ōd-tō'), Comtesse d' (Élisabeth Françoise Sophie de La Live de Bellegarde). Born at Paris, 1730; died Jan. 22, 1813. A French lady, known from her intimacy with Rousseau. She is described as Julie in Rousseau's "Nouvelle Héloïse."

Houdin (ō-dañ'), Jean Eugène Robert. Born at Blois, France, 1805; died there, June, 1871. A French conjurer and mechanic. He learned the trade of watch-making, but a friendship with a traveling juggler and a love of works on natural magic turned his attention to conjuring. He constructed the most complicated toys and automata; and in 1845 began a series of juggling exhibitions. In 1855 he received the gold medal at Paris for an application of electricity to clocks. In 1856, at the request of the French government, he went to Algeria to "hoist with their own petard," if possible, the priests who were stirring up the people with their tricks. In this he was successful. He published "Robert Houdin, etc." (1857), "Confidences" (1859), and "Les tricheries des Grecs dévolées" (1861), exposing gambling cheats.

Houdon (ô-dô'n'), Jean Antoine. Born at Versailles, France, about 1741; died at Paris, July 16, 1828. A noted French sculptor. He won the prix de Rome at the age of nineteen, and remained in Italy 10 years, during the period of Winckelmann and the excavations at Pompeii and Herculaneum. While in Rome he made the famous statue of St. Bruno at Sainte-Marie-des-Anges. On his return to France he exhibited in the Salon of 1771 a statuette of Morphée, which gained him entrance to the Academy, and soon after he made his famous "Ecorché," reduced copies of which are well known in the drawing-schools. He visited America with Franklin, and resided with Washington at Philadelphia, where he modeled a bust from which he afterward made his Richmond statue. In 1773 he made busts of Catharine of Russia and of Diderot, and in 1775 busts of Turgot and Gluck, and a statue of Sophie Arnould as Iphigenia. In the Salon of 1781 he entered his nude statue of Diana (which was excluded), the statue of Tourville, and the famous Voltaire of the Théâtre Français. He also made busts of Molière, Rousseau, Franklin, and D'Alembert. His bust of Buffon is perhaps his finest work. In the Revolution he was denounced at the tribunal of the Convention for having a statue of a saint in his atelier, and escaped through the presence of mind of a member who declared that the work was a statue of Philosophy.

Houghton (hou'ton), Baron. See Milnes, Richard Monckton.

Houghton-le-Spring (hô'ton-le-spring'). A town in Durham, England, 7 miles northeast of Durham. Population (1891), 6,476.

Howadji, The. A pseudonym of George William Curtis.

Howard (hou'ird), Catharine. Executed Feb. 12, 1542. Daughter of Lord Edmund Howard, and fifth queen of Henry VIII, whom she married July 28, 1540. She was convicted of adultery and condemned as a traitor.

Howard, Frederick, fifth Earl of Carlisle. Born May 28, 1748; died at Castle Howard, Yorkshire, England, Sept. 4, 1825. An English politician, viceroy of Ireland 1780-82. He was chief of the commissioners sent to America by Lord North in 1778.

Howard, George William Frederick, seventh Earl of Carlisle: earlier Viscount Morpeth. Born at London, April 18, 1802; died at Castle Howard, Yorkshire, England, Dec. 5, 1864. An English statesman. He was chief secretary for Ireland 1835-41; chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster 1850-52; and lord lieutenant of Ireland 1855-58 and 1859-64. He wrote "Diary in Turkish and Greek Waters" (1854), and other works in prose and verse.

Howard, Henry, Earl of Surrey. Born about 1517; beheaded on Tower Hill, London, Jan. 21, 1547. An English poet. He was known in youth as "Henry Howard of Keaninghall," from an estate owned by his grandfather in Norfolk. He received an unusually good education, and from 1530-32 lived at Windsor with the young Duke of Richmond, the natural son of Henry VIII., accompanying the king to France in 1532. He remained at the French court for about a year. In 1541 he was installed Knight of the Garter, and in 1543 joined the English forces at Landrecies with special recommendations from Henry VIII. to Charles V., and a little later was appointed cup-bearer to the king. He was present at the surrender of Boulogne, of which he was made governor in 1545, but was recalled to England the next year. Henry VIII. was ill, and when his death was near, Surrey's father, the Duke of Norfolk, who was premier duke, was suspected of aiming at the throne. A month before the king's death both were arrested, and the Duke of Norfolk, as peer of the realm, was tried by his peers. The Earl of Surrey, however, who had only a courtesy title, was tried by a jury picked for the occasion, who found that he "falsely, maliciously, and treacherously set up and bore the arms of Edward the Confessor, then used by the Prince of Wales, mixed up and joined with his own proper arms." He had borne these arms without question in the presence of the king, as the Howards before him had done since their grant by Richard II. He was tried for high treason and beheaded. His poems were first printed as "Songs and Sonets" in "Tottel's Miscellany" in 1557, with those of Sir Thomas Wyatt. He was the first English writer of blank verse, translating the second and fourth books of the Æneid into this form, and with Wyatt he introduced the sonnet into English literature.

Howard, John. Born probably at Hackney, London, Sept. 2, 1726; died at Kherson, Russia, Jan. 20, 1790. An English philanthropist, celebrated for his exertions in behalf of prison reform. He was appointed high sheriff of Bedfordshire in 1773, and the acquaintance with prison abuses which he gained in the office led to his career as a reformer. After a careful personal inspection of the prisons of England, Scotland, and Ireland, he visited those of Paris, Holland, Flanders, Germany, and Switzerland, and later made a second tour in England. He published "The State of the Prisons in England and Wales, etc." (1777). He made other continental tours of inspection in 1778, 1781, 1783, and 1785, during the last of which he inspected the condition of the lazarettos. His last journey was begun in 1789, when he went to Russia for the purpose of examining the military hospitals. While engaged in this work he was attacked by camp-fever and died. He was buried at Dophinovka. His labors led to many important reforms.

Howard, John Eager. Born in Baltimore County, Md., June 4, 1752; died at Baltimore, Oct. 12, 1827. An American Revolutionary officer and politician. He served at the Cowpens in 1781, and was governor of Maryland 1789-92 and United States senator 1796-1803.

Howard, Oliver Otis. Born at Leeds, Maine, Nov. 8, 1830. A Union general in the American Civil War. He commanded a brigade at the battles of Bull Run and Fair Oaks, a division at the battles of Antietam and Fredericksburg, and an army corps at Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Missionary Ridge, and Chattanooga; and led the right wing of Sherman's army in the march from Atlanta to the sea. He was chief of the Freedmen's Bureau 1865-74, and was promoted major-general in 1866. He retired in 1894.

Howard, Thomas, Earl of Surrey and second Duke of Norfolk. Born in 1443; died May 21, 1524. An English soldier and politician. He defeated the Scots at Flodden Field, Sept. 9, 1513.

Howard, Thomas, Earl of Surrey and third Duke of Norfolk. Born in 1473; died at Kenninghall, Aug. 25, 1554. An English soldier and politician. He became lord high treasurer in 1523, and on the marriage of his niece Catharine Howard to Henry VIII. in 1540, gained great influence at court. Through the influence of his rival the Earl of Hertford, he was ordered for execution on the charge of treason in 1547, but was saved by the death of Henry VIII.

Howard, Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk. Born March 10, 1536; died June 2, 1572. An English politician, son of Henry Howard, earl of Surrey. He was the first subject in England under Elizabeth, inasmuch as there were no princes of the blood and he was the possessor of the highest title of nobility. He was appointed lieutenant of the northern counties in 1559. He aspired to become the husband of Mary Queen of Scots, and joined a conspiracy for her liberation, in consequence of which he was executed on the charge of treason.

Howard, Thomas, Earl of Arundel. Born July 7, 1586; died at Padua, Italy, Oct. 4, 1646. An English nobleman. He was employed in various diplomatic missions; and formed the first large collection of works of art in England, part of which was presented to the University of Oxford by his grandson under the name of the Arundelian marbles.

Howard University. An institution of learning at Washington, District of Columbia, founded in 1867, and designed especially for the higher education of the colored race, but open to all races and creeds. It comprises preparatory, normal, collegiate, theological, medical, law, and industrial courses. It has (1893) 57 instructors and 512 students.

subordinate to the Chancas until both tribes were conquered by the Inca Pachacutec Yupanqui, about 1420. Their descendants are now merged in the general population of Peru.

Huancavelica (wān-kā-vā-lē'kā). 1. A department of central Peru. Area, 10,814 square miles. Population, about 100,000.—2. The capital of the department of Huancavelica, situated about 170 miles southeast of Lima. It was formerly one of the richest cities in Peru, and was noted for its quicksilver mines, now abandoned. Population, about 5,000.

Huancavillcas (wān-kā-vē'l'kās). A powerful tribe of Indians, presumably of Quichua stock, who formerly inhabited the lowlands of eastern Ecuador, between the river Daule and the sea. They were conquered by Huaina Capac about 1500, and, under Inca domination, occupied the same region at the time of the Spanish conquest. Their descendants are merged in the general population of the Guayaquil valley.

Huancayo (wān-kā'yō). A city of Peru, in the southwestern part of the department of Junin, in the valley of Jauja, 10,880 feet above the sea. It gave its name to the constitution promulgated there Nov. 10, 1839, which was finally superseded by that of Nov. 25, 1860. Population, about 5,000.

Huanta (wān'tā). A town in the department of Ayacucho, Peru, about 200 miles southeast of Lima. Population, about 4,000.

Huánuco (wā'nō'kō), or Guánuco (gwā'nō'kō). 1. A central department of Peru, comprehending part of the upper valley of the Huallaga with the adjacent mountains. The mountains are rich in minerals, and the valleys near the Huallaga are covered with forest. Huánuco corresponds to an Inca province or region of the same name. It was settled by Gomez de Alvarado in 1539. Area, 23,000 square miles. Population, about 80,000.

2. The capital of the department of Huánuco, situated near the river Huallaga 170 miles north-northeast of Lima, founded in 1542. Population, about 7,500.

Huánuco Viejo, or Huánuco el Viejo (wā'nō'kō el vē-ā'hō). An ancient Indian town of Peru, about 40 miles west-northwest of the present city of Huánuco. The remains of Incan architecture found here are among the finest in existence. The place was settled by the Spaniards in 1530, but abandoned soon after for the present capital. Some silver-mines in the vicinity were worked in the 18th century.

Huaqui (wā'kō). A place on the Desaguadero River, Bolivia. It is notable for the battle of June 20, 1811, in which the Spanish forces under Goyeneche defeated the patriots of Buenos Ayres and Upper Peru under Castelli.

Huaraca (wā-rā'kā). A great festival of the ancient Peruvians, held at the time of the summer solstice. The youths who had attained sufficient age and strength were then admitted to military rank, with various ceremonies and tests of endurance.

Huaraz (wā-rāth'). The capital of the department of Ancachs, Peru, situated on the river Santa about 200 miles north by west of Lima. Population, about 17,000.

Huarina (wā-rē'nā). A plain at the southeastern extremity of Lake Titicaca, Bolivia. It gave its name to the battle of Oct. 20, 1547, in which Gonzalo Pizarro and his lieutenant Carvajal defeated Diego Centeno.

Huascar (wās'kār), or Inti Cusi Hualpa (in'tō kō'sē wā'pā). Born about 1495 (according to Cieza de Leon, in 1500); died at Andamarea, Jan., 1533. An Inca chief. At the death of his father, Huaina Capac (Nov., 1525), the empire was divided between Huascar and his illegitimate brother, Atahualpa. Huascar had the southern and larger part, with his capital at Cuzco. War broke out between the two, and Huascar was eventually defeated and captured (1532). After Atahualpa was seized by Pizarro he feared that the Spaniards would interfere in favor of his brother, and by his secret orders Huascar was drowned.

Huastecs (wās'teks). A tribe of Indians near the coast of eastern Mexico, in southern Tamaulipas and northern Vera Cruz. By their language they are allied to the Mayas of Yucatan, and those ethnologists who hold that the Mayas came from the north believe that the Huastecs were a tribe left behind during their migration. At the time of the conquest they lived in villages, generally of wooden houses, and practised agriculture. They readily submitted to the whites, and have long been Christianized. Also written Huastecas, Huastecos, and Guastecos.

Hudibras (hū'di-bras). A satirical poem by Samuel Butler, directed against the Puritans, published 1663-78; so called from the name of its hero, who is a Presbyterian country justice. Accompanied by a clerk, one of the Independents, he ranges the country after the manner of Don Quixote, with zealous ignorance endeavoring to correct abuses and repress superstition.

The greatest single production of wit of this period, I might say of this country, is Butler's "Hudibras." It contains specimens of every variety of drollery and satire, and those specimens crowded together into almost every page. The proof of this is that nearly one-half of his lines are got by heart, and quoted for mottoes.

Hazlitt, Eng. Poets, p. 80.

Hudibras, Sir. A rash and melancholy man in Spenser's "Faerie Queene." It is thought that the poet intended to shadow forth the Puritans in this character. See Hudibras.

Hudson (hud'son). [Named from Henry Hudson, who discovered it in 1609.] A river in New York, rising in the Adirondacks in Essex County, New York, flowing south, and falling into New York Bay in lat. 40° 42' N., long. 74° 1' W. It is celebrated for its picturesque scenery, especially in its course through the Highlands and past the Palisades. In its lower course it is called the North River. The Mohawk is its chief tributary. Length, about 350 miles; navigable to Troy, 151 miles. On its banks are Troy, Albany, Kingston, Poughkeepsie, Newburg, Fishkill, Cornwall, West Point, Sing Sing, Yonkers, New York, and Jersey City.

Hudson. A city, river port, and the capital of Columbia County, New York, situated on the east bank of the Hudson, 28 miles south of Albany. Population (1890), 9,970.

Hudson, George. Born at York, England, 1800; died at London, Dec. 14, 1871. An English speculator, known as "the railway king."

Hudson, Henry. Died in Hudson Bay (?), 1611. A noted English navigator. He was, perhaps, grandson of Henry Hudson, one of the founders of the Muscovy Company in 1555. In 1607 he was sent out by that company, in the Hopeful, to sail across the pole to the Spice Islands. He reached the east coast of Greenland (lat. 69°-70°) in June; sailed northward along the coast to lat. 73°; thence went along the ice-barrier to Spitzbergen, reaching lat. 80° 23'; and returned to England, discovering Jan Mayen (named by him Hudson's Touches) on the way. In 1608 he attempted to find a northeast passage. On March 25, 1609, he set sail with the Good Hope and Half Moon, in the service of the Dutch East India Company, with the same object; but his crews mutinied, the Good Hope returned, and with the Half Moon he sailed across the Atlantic to Nova Scotia. Thence he sailed southward, exploring the coast as far as Chesapeake Bay. In Sept. he explored the river afterward named for him, ascending it nearly to the site of Albany. In 1610 he sailed in the Discovery to find a northwest passage, and entered Hudson Strait and Hudson Bay. He wintered on Jamez Bay. On his return his crew mutinied, and on June 23, 1611, he was bound and with 8 others set afloat in a small boat on Hudson Bay. They were never seen again.

Hudson, Henry Norman. Born at Cornwall, Vt., Jan. 28, 1814; died at Cambridge, Mass., Jan. 16, 1886. An American Shaksperian scholar and Episcopal clergyman. He published "Lectures on Shakspeare" (1848), "Shakspeare: his Life, Art, and Characters, etc." (1872), "Studies in Wordsworth" (1874), "Essays on Education, etc." (1883). He edited Shakspeare (11 vols.) in 1851-56 and (20 vols.) in 1880-81.

Hudson, Sir Jeffery or Geoffrey. Born at Oakham, Rutlandshire, England, 1619; died in 1682. A famous English dwarf. He was but 18 or 20 inches high till he was about 30 years of age, when he grew to the height of 3 feet 9 inches. He made his first appearance served up in a pie at the table of the Duke of Buckingham. After the marriage of Charles I. he was a page in the service of the queen. He had many adventures; was a captain in the royal army at the beginning of the civil war; and had his portrait painted by Vandyck. Scott introduces him in "Peveril of the Peak." He was finally arrested in 1682 upon some suspicion connected with the Popish plot, and confined in the Gatehouse prison. He was released, and did not die there as Scott and others state. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Hudson Bay. An inland sea in North America, inclosed by British America on the east, south, and west, and partly inclosed by Southampton Island on the north: called James Bay in the south. It communicates with the Atlantic through Hudson Strait, and with the Arctic Ocean through Fox Channel. Its chief tributaries are the Churchill and Nelson. It was explored by Henry Hudson in 1610. Length, about 1,000 miles. Greatest width, about 600 miles.

Hudson Bay Company. A British joint-stock company chartered in 1670 for the purpose of purchasing furs and skins from the Indians of British North America. Its original possessions, called the Hudson Bay Territory, were ceded to the government in 1870.

Hudson Bay Territory. The territory watered by the streams flowing into Hudson Bay, granted by the streams flowing into Hudson Bay, granted to the Hudson Bay Company in 1670. It was incorporated with the Dominion of Canada in 1870. It is known also as Rupert's Land.

Hudson Strait. A sea passage connecting Hudson Bay on the southwest with the Atlantic on the east: discovered by Sebastian Cabot in 1517. Length, about 500 miles. Breadth, about 100 miles.

Hué, or Hué-fu (hø-ä'fö'). The capital of Annam, situated on the river Hué about lat. 16° 30' N., long. 107° 35' E. It was fortified by French engineers. Population (estimated), 30,000; with suburbs, 50,000.

The capital of the province of Huelva, situated on the river Odiel 54 miles west-southwest of Seville. It has sardine fisheries. Near it is the convent of La Rábida, where Columbus was sheltered and received efficient aid for his voyage. The simple buildings, with the iron cross before the door, the two arched courts surrounded with cells, and the large hall of the prior Marchena, remain very nearly as the discoverer sojourned there. Population (1887), 18,105.

Huelva, Alonso Sanchez de. The name given by Garcilasso de la Vega (1609) to a sailor or pilot who is said to have discovered land west of the Canary Islands about 1484. According to the story, this man died in the house of Columbus after having revealed to him the secret of the discovery. The report, in a much less definite form, and without the name, first appeared in Oviedo's history in 1635. It is now generally discredited.

Huen-Tsang (hwen-tsäng'). See Hsien-Tsang.

Huesca (wes'kä). 1. A province of Aragon, Spain, bounded by France on the north, Lerida on the east, Saragossa on the south, and Navarra and Saragossa on the west. Area, 5,878 square miles. Population (1887), 254,958.—2. The capital of the province of Huesca, situated 40 miles northeast of Saragossa. It was occupied by the Arabs from 713 to 1096, and was probably the ancient Osca. It is noted for its cathedral of the 15th century. The great recessed west door has fine statues and reliefs, and the alabaster retables, sculptured with the Passion of Christ, is by the master who executed that in the Pilar at Saragossa. Hugo (hü'gō; F. pron. ü-gō'), Victor Marie. Born at Besançon, Feb. 26, 1802; died at Paris, May 22, 1885. A celebrated French poet, the recognized leader of the romantic school of the 19th century in France. His childhood was spent partly with his mother in Paris, and partly in Corsica, Elba, Italy, and Spain—wherever his father, an officer in the French army, could gather his family about him. He received his early education from his mother, and also at the hands of an old priest, Laviévre. In 1815 he went to school, and thence to the Lycée Louis-le-Grand in Paris. In 1816 he wrote his first tragedy, "Irtamène." While still at school he began another tragedy, "Athélie," and composed a melodrama, "Inez de Castro," and several poems. He also competed for a prize of the French Academy with a poem, "Sur les avantages de l'étude" (1817). Again, in 1818, he competed with his poems "Sur l'institution du jury" and "Sur les avantages de l'enseignement mutuel." His success encouraged him to send to the Academy of Floral Games at Toulouse "Les derniers bardes," "Les vierges de Verdun," and "Le rétablissement de la statue de Henri IV." (1819), for which he was awarded the principal prize.

In 1820 he took another prize with his poem "Monse sur le Nil," and was made maître les jeux-floraux. In 1819 he had founded a fortnightly review, "Le Conservateur Littéraire": he wrote also for "La Muse Française." His poetical compositions include "Odes et poésies diverses" (1822), "Nouvelles odes" (1824), "Odes et ballades" (1826): of which a revised and enlarged edition appeared in 1828), "Les orientales" (1829), "Les feuilles d'automne" (1831), "Les chants du crépuscule" (1835), "Les voix intérieures" (1837), "Les rayons et les ombres" (1840), "Les châtiements" (1853), "Les contemplations" (1856-57), first series of "La légende des siècles" (1859), "Les chansons des rues et des bois" (1865), "L'Année terrible" (1872), "L'Art d'être grand-père" (1877), second series of "La légende des siècles" (1877), "Le pape" (1878), "La pitie suprême" (1879), "L'Anc" (1880), "Religion et religions" (1880), "Les quatre vents de l'esprit" (1881), third series of "La légende des siècles" (1883), "La fin de Satan" (1886), "Dieu" (1891), "Toute la lyre" (1888-93). As a dramatist Victor Hugo adapted "Amy Robsart" (1825) from Scott's "Kenilworth," and also wrote "Cromwell" (1827), "Marion Desorme" (1829), "Hernani" (1830), "Le roi s'amuse" (1832), "Lucrece Borgia" (1833), "Marie Tudor" (1833), "Angelo" (1835), "Esmeralda" (1836), "Ruy Blas" (1838), "Les Burgraves" (1843), "Torquemada" (1842), "Le théâtre en liberté" (1846), and "Les jumeaux" (1849). Victor Hugo's prose writings are "Hau d'Islande" (1823), "Bug Jargal" (1826), "Le dernier jour d'un condamné" (1829), "Notre Dame de Paris" (1831), "Littérature et philosophie mêlées" and "Claude Gueux" (1834), "Le Rhin" (1842), "Napoléon le petit" (1852), "Les misérables" (1862), "Victor Hugo raconté par un témoin de sa vie" (1863), "William Shakespeare" (1864), "Les travailleurs de la mer" (1866), "L'Homme qui rit" (1869), "Actes et paroles" (1872-70), "Quatrevingt-treize" (1874), "Histoire d'un crime" (1877-1878), "Choses vues" (1887), "En voyage: Alpes et Pyrénées" (1890). He was elected to the French Academy Jan. 7, 1841. His interest in politics and journalism led him to found a newspaper, "L'Évenement," in 1848. After the revolution of the same year he was exiled from France, not to return till the fall of the empire in 1870. He went first to Belgium, in 1852 to Jersey, and in 1855 to Guernsey. Victor Hugo was elected a life member of the French senate in 1876, and the last years of his life were devoted to literary work.

Huguenots (hū'ge-nots). [The name as applied to the Protestants of France was first used about 1560, being apparently imported from Geneva, where it appears to have been for some time in use as a political nickname. Its particular origin is unknown: no contemporary information has been found.] The Reformed or Calvinistic communion of France in the 16th and 17th centuries. The Huguenots were the Puritans of France, noted in general for their austere virtues and the singular purity of their lives. They were persecuted in the reign of Francis I. and his immediate successors, and after 1562 were frequently at war with the Catholics, under the lead of such men as Admiral Coligny and the King of Navarre (afterward Henry IV. of France). In spite of these wars and the massacre of St. Bartholomew (Aug. 24, 1572), they continued numerous and powerful, and the Edict of Nantes, issued by Henry IV. (1598), secured to them full political and civil rights. Their political power was broken with the surrender of La Rochelle in 1628, and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV. (1685), and the subsequent persecutions, forced hundreds of thousands into exile to Prussia, the Netherlands, Switzerland, England, etc. Many settled in the colonies of New York, Virginia, etc., but especially in South Carolina. The name is sometimes applied at the present day to the descendants of the original Huguenots.

Huguenots, Les. An opera by Meyerbeer, first produced at Paris in 1836.

Huges (ig), Victor. Born at Marseilles, 1761: died near Bordeaux, Nov., 1826. A French administrator. He went to Santo Domingo in 1778, was engaged in the revolution of 1789, and was deported to France. The Convention made him commissioner to the French West Indies (1794), where he reconquered Guadeloupe and took St. Lucia and other islands from the English. In his government of Guadeloupe he showed extreme cruelty to those opposed to revolutionary ideas. He fitted out several privateers which preyed not only on the English but on North American commerce, nearly provoking a war between the United States and France (1798). Recalled in Dec., 1798, he was made governor of Cayenne in 1799, finally surrendering to the English Jan. 12, 1800. He was again governor of Cayenne 1817-19.

Huilliches (wēl-yē-chās'). [Araucanian; huilli, southern, and ché, people.] The name given to various hordes of Indians of the Araucanian stock who inhabit that portion of Chile near the Gulf of Aneud. See Araucanians.

Huitziluhuitl (wēt-zē-lē'wōtl). [Nahatl, 'humming-bird.'] Died in 1414. An Aztec sovereign of Tenochtitlan (Mexico) from 1403. He was a son of Acamopichtli, and married a daughter of the Tecpanec chieftain, thus strengthening the alliance between the two tribes. It is said that a regular system of laws was first established during his reign.

Huitzilopochtli (wēt-zē-lē-pōch'tlō). The war-god and principal deity of the ancient Mexicans: "the mythic leader and chief deity of the Aztecs, dominant tribe of the Nahuatl nation" (Bancroft). He was represented by a hideous stone idol, believed by Baudelot and others to be the one now preserved in the museum at Mexico. As he was supposed to be of a very sanguinary disposition, immense numbers of human sacrifices were made before the idol. When his great temple was dedicated, in 1486, it is stated that 70,000 victims (evidently an exaggeration) were slain. It appears that he was also called Mexitli (whence the name Mexico, given to Tenochtitlan).

Hulin, or Hullin (ū-lān'), Comte Pierre Augustin. Born at Paris, Sept. 6, 1758: died at Paris, Jan. 9, 1841. A French general in the Napoleonic wars. He became adjutant-general to Bonaparte in 1796, and general of division in 1802. He presided at the court martial which condemned the Duc d'Enghien in 1804, and in 1812, when governor of Paris, put down the conspiracy of Malet to subvert the empire.

Hull (hul), or Kingston-upon-Hull (kingz'ton-pun-hul'). A seaport in the East Riding of Yorkshire, England, situated at the entrance of the Hull into the Humber, in lat. 53° 45' N., long. 0° 19' W. After London and Liverpool, Hull is the principal port in England. It is an important terminus of steam-packet lines to domestic, continental, and American ports, and a center for extensive fisheries. Trinity Church is one of the greatest of English parish churches, in the Decorated and Perpendicular styles; it exhibits highly interesting tracery. Hull became an important port under Edward I. It was the birthplace of William Wilberforce. Population (1891), 200,044.

Hull. A town in Ottawa County, Quebec, on the Ottawa River opposite Ottawa. Population (1891), 11,265.

An American commodore. He commanded the Constitution, which defeated and captured the Guerrero Aug. 19, 1812.

Hull, William. Born at Derby, Conn., June 24, 1753: died at Newton, Mass., Nov. 29, 1825.

An American general. He served through the Revolutionary War; was governor of Michigan Territory 1805-1814; and surrendered Detroit to the British in 1812.

Hullin. See Hulin.

Hulse (huls), John. Born at Middlewich, Cheshire, March 15, 1708: died Dec. 14, 1790. An English clergyman. He bequeathed estates to the University of Cambridge, which form an endowment for the Hulsean professorship of divinity, for the Hulsean lectures (on the Christian evidences, or in explanation of difficult or obscure parts of Scripture), and for certain Hulsean prizes.

Hulst (hulst). A town in the Netherlands, 16 miles west by north of Antwerp.

Huma, or Wahuma (wā-hō'mā). A pastoral tribe of Galla origin which has given to Karagwe, Uyooro, and Uganda their royal families. In these 3 kingdoms they are found as herdsmen, giving wives to their Bantu neighbors, but keeping otherwise separate. In Uyooro and Karagwe they are honored; in Uganda they are rather despised. Like the Galla, they are a fine-looking race. Everywhere they speak the Bantu languages of their neighbors in addition to their own, which must be of Hamitic structure.

Humahuacas (ō-mā-wā'kās). A tribe of Indians who inhabited the valleys and plateaus of the eastern Andes, in what is now the Argentine province of Junju and southern Bolivia. They made a brave resistance to the Spaniards from 1592 to about 1650, when the remnants were taken to Rioja, farther south; there they soon became extinct as a tribe.

Humahwi. See Humawhi.

Humaita (ō-mā-ē-tā'). A town of southwestern Paraguay, on the river Paraguay 15 miles above its confluence with the Paraná. The river is here greatly narrowed. Humaita and an advanced post to the south, called Curupaity, were strongly fortified by the elder and younger Lopez, and they are memorable for the long siege which they sustained from the Brazilian and Argentine forces during the war of the Triple Alliance. The works were abandoned July 25, 1868, and were dismantled by the Brazilians.

Humawhi (hō-mā'hwē). An almost extinct tribe of North American Indians. See Palatkinian.

Humbaba. See Khumbaba.

Humbe (hōm'be). A Portuguese fort and county capital on the Kibene River, West Africa. Several wars have been fought here between the Portuguese, the Boers, and the natives. The native name is Unkumbi.

Humber (hum'ber). [ME. Humber, Humbre, AS. Humber, Humbre.] An estuary formed by the junction of the Trent and the Ouse, England. It lies between Yorkshire on the north and Lincolnshire on the south. Length, about 40 miles. The chief ports are Hull and Grimsby. It was the boundary of ancient Northumbria (Deira) and Mercia, and a thoroughfare for Norse incursions.

Humbert (hum'bert), It. Umberto (ōm-ber'tō), I., Ranieri Carlo Emanuele Giovanni Maria Ferdinando Eugenio. Born at Turin, March 14, 1844. King of Italy, son of Victor Emmanuel, whom he succeeded in 1878. He commanded, while Prince of Piedmont, a division of General Cialdini's army at Custozza June 24, 1866. The most notable event of his reign is the formation of the Triple Alliance (in 1883).

Humboldt (hum'bōlt; G. pron. hōm'bōlt), Baron Friedrich Heinrich Alexander von. Born at Berlin, Sept. 14, 1769: died there, May 6, 1859.

A celebrated German scientist and author. He studied at the universities of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder and Göttingen, and after traveling in Holland, Belgium, and England continued his studies at the Mining School in Freiberg. From 1792 he was for several years mining engineer at Stehen, near Bayreuth, but resigned the position in 1797 to travel in Switzerland, Italy, and France. In Paris he became acquainted with Aimé Bonpland, with whom he undertook from 1799 to 1804 a scientific journey to South America and Mexico. From 1809 to 1827 he lived for the most part in Paris, engaged in scientific work. After 1827 he took up his permanent residence in Berlin. In 1829, at the instance of the Emperor of Russia, he undertook another scientific expedition, to Siberia and the Caspian Sea. Subsequently, until his death, he lived in Berlin. The results of the American journey were published in a large series of works with the general title "Voyage aux régions équinoxiales du nouveau continent." They include "Relation historique" (1814-25, covering only the first part of the trip), "Essai politique sur la Nouvelle Espagne" (1811), "Essai politique sur l'île de Cuba" (1826-27), scientific monographs, atlases, etc. The "Asie Centrale" and other works describe the Asiatic journey. The "Examen critique de l'histoire de la géographie du nouveau continent, etc.," a work showing great research, was published 1814-34, and "Kosmos" 1845-58. The latter, perhaps the greatest of Humboldt's books, was first published in German. Commonly known as Alexander von Humboldt.

Humboldt, Baron Friedrich Wilhelm Christian Karl Ferdinand von, commonly known as Wilhelm von Humboldt. Born at Potsdam, Prussia, June 22, 1767: died at Tegel, near Berlin, April 8, 1835. A German philologist and author. He studied jurisprudence at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder and Göttingen. He afterward traveled extensively through Europe, and acquired a mastery of the principal modern languages. From 1801 to 1808 he was Prussian minister resident in Rome. The latter year he returned to Berlin, where, as minister of public instruction, he was active in the foundation of the new University of Berlin. Afterward he was minister resident in Vienna and a member of the Vienna Congress. Later he was minister resident in London, and, finally, minister of the interior in Berlin. After 1819 he lived for the most part at Tegel. His principal work, "Ueber die Kawisprache auf der Insel Java" ("On the Kawi Language of the Island of Java"), appeared posthumously at Berlin 1836-40, in 3 vols. The introduction to this work, "Ueber die Verschiedenheit des menschlichen Sprachbaues und ihren Einfluss auf die geistige Entwicklung des Menschengeschlechts" ("On the Difference in the Construction of Language, and its Influence upon the Intellectual Development of the Human Race"), has been published several times separately. "Briefe an eine Freundin" ("Letters to a Friend," Charlotte Diède) appeared first in 1847. His collected works were published at Berlin, 1841-52, in 7 vols. Brother of the preceding.

Humboldt (hum'bōlt) Lake, or Humboldt Sink. A lake in the west of Nevada, with no outlet to the sea.

Humboldt Mountains. A range of mountains in the eastern part of Nevada.

Humboldt River. A river in Nevada, flowing into Lake Humboldt. Length, about 350 miles. Its valley is traversed by the Central Pacific Railroad.

Hume (hūm), David. [The name Hume is the same as Home.] Born at Edinburgh, April 26 (O. S.), 1711: died there, Aug. 25, 1776. A famous Scottish philosopher and historian. He studied at Edinburgh; went to France in 1734, where he remained until 1737, chiefly at La Flèche in Anjou; retired to Ninewells, Berwickshire, in 1740; became a companion to the Marquis of Anandale in 1745, and was dismissed in 1746; became secretary to General St. Clair, by whom he was appointed judge-advocate, and whom he accompanied on an embassy to Vienna and Turin; was appointed keeper of the Library of the Faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh in 1752; visited France 1763-66; and was under-secretary of state 1767-68. He is chiefly celebrated as the expounder of skeptical views in philosophy, which have produced an extraordinary effect upon all metaphysical thinking since his day. He wrote "A Treatise of Human Nature, etc." (1739-40), "Essays, Moral and Political" (1741-42), "Philosophical Essays concerning Human Understanding" (1748; afterward called "An Enquiry concerning Human Understanding"), "Political Discourses" (1751), "An Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals" (1751), "Four Dissertations" (1757), "History of England" (1754-61), "Natural History of Religion" (1757), "Two Essays" (1777), "Dialogues concerning Natural Religion" (1779). Collected works edited by Green and Grose (4 vols., 1874); life by J. H. Burton (1846).

Hummel (hōm'mel), Johann Nepomuk. Born at Presburg, Hungary, Nov. 14, 1778: died at Weimar, Germany, Oct. 17, 1837. A noted German pianist and composer for the pianoforte, author of concertos, sonatas, operas (3), etc. He was a pupil of Mozart, kapellmeister to Prince Esterházy 1804-11, conductor at Stuttgart 1816, and later (1820) conductor at Weimar.

Hummus, The. See the extract.

In the southeast corner of the market-place (C'over Garden), and occupying that portion which was destroyed by fire, are two hotels, known by the strange names of the "Old Hummus" and the "New Hummus." The name is a corruption of "Humour." Mr. Wright, in his "History of Domestic Manners of England," says: "Among the customs introduced from Italy was the hot sweating bath which, under the name of the hot-house, became widely known in England. . . . These 'Humusms,' however, when established in London, seem to have been mostly frequented by women of doubtful repute. . . . They soon came to be used for the purpose of intrigue, which gradually led to their suppression."
Thornbury, Old and New London, III. 251.

Humorists, The. A comedy by Thomas Shadwell, produced in 1671. In this play the word humorist has its early meaning of a capricious person.

Humorous Lieutenant, The. A play by Fletcher, probably produced between 1618 and 1625, printed in 1647.

Humperdink (hōm'per-dingk), Engelbert. Born Sept. 1, 1854. A noted German composer. His opera "Hänsel und Gretel," produced at Weimar Dec. 23, 1893, has earned for him the title of "the modern Wagner."

Humphrey (hum'fri), Duke of Gloucester, called "Good Duke Humphrey." Born 1391: died at Bury St. Edmunds, Feb. 23, 1447. The youngest son of Henry IV. by his first wife, Mary Bohun. He studied at Balliol College, Oxford, and was noted as a patron of learning and a collector of books. He was the founder, by his gifts of books, of the library of that university. In 1420 he was appointed lieutenant of England, and held that office until the return of Henry V. in 1421. On Henry's death Gloucester, though only deputy for Bedford, became practically protector of the young king Henry VI., through Bedford's occupation with affairs in France. In 1422 he married Jacqueline, only daughter of William VI., count of Hainault, to whose estates she had succeeded, but of which she had been deprived; and in 1424 conquered Hainault and was proclaimed its count. In 1422 his marriage with Jacqueline was annulled, and he soon married his mistress, Eleanor Cobham. His protectorate, which was throughout unfortunate, was terminated by the coronation of Henry VI., Nov. 6, 1429. In 1441 he was disgraced through the dealings of his wife with the astrologer Bolingbroke. (See Cobham, Eleanor.) In 1447 he was arrested by order of the king, and in a few days died.

Humphrey, Heman. Born at West Simsbury, Hartford County, Conn., March 26, 1779; died at Pittsfield, Mass., April 3, 1861. An American Congregational clergyman and educator, president of Amherst College 1823-45. He published "Tour in France, etc." (1838).

Humphrey Clinker, The Expedition of. A novel by Tobias George Smollett, published in 1771. It is written in the form of letters.

They [Mr. and Mrs. Bramble on their expedition in search of health] pick up a postilion named Humphrey Clinker, a convert to the new doctrines of Whitefield and Wesley, who afterward turns out to be a natural son of Mr. Bramble himself, and who, after converting Miss Tabitha and Mrs. Winifred [Mrs. Bramble's maid], marries the latter.

Hundred Days, The. The period of about 100 days, from the middle of March to June 22, 1815, during which Napoleon I., after his escape from Elba, made his final effort to reestablish his empire. It ended in the crushing defeat at Waterloo and his abdication.

Hundred Years' War. The series of wars between England and France about 1338-1453. The English, generally victors in these wars down to about 1430 (Crécy, Poitiers, Agincourt, etc.), and rulers of a great part of France, were finally expelled entirely, except from Calais, which they retained for about a century longer.

Hundsrück (hönts'riik). A mountain-range in western Germany, between the Moselle and Nahe, connected with the Vosges.

Hunfalvy (hön'fol-vé), János. Born at Gross-Schlagendorf, Zips, Hungary, June 9, 1820; died Dec. 6, 1888. A Hungarian geographer, brother of Pál Hunfalvy. His chief work is a "Physical Geography of Hungary" (1863-66).

Hunfalvy, Pál. Born at Gross-Schlagendorf, Zips, Hungary, March 12, 1810; died Nov. 30, 1891. A Hungarian philologist and ethnographer.

Hungarian Insurrection. A rising in Hungary against the tyranny of Austria, 1848-49. Kossuth was the chief leader. The overthrow of Metternich, the reactionary minister, at Vienna in March, 1848, was immediately followed by a revolutionary movement in Pest. The emperor Ferdinand was forced to grant a separate Hungarian ministry, but encouraged Jellachich, the Ban of Croatia, to revolt against Hungary. In Oct., 1848, Hungary rose in insurrection. The war continued under the reign of Francis Joseph (who succeeded Dec. 2). The chief Hungarian generals were Gorgei, Klapka, Bem, and Dembinski. In April, 1849, the Hungarians declared their independence, and proclaimed their country a republic, with Kossuth as governor. By the aid of Russian armies the Austrians conquered the country. Gorgei surrendered the main army at Vilagos Aug., 1849, and Kossuth escaped. Austria restored the constitutional liberties of the kingdom in 1867.

Hungary (hung'gä-ri). [ME. Hungarie, Hongarie, OF. Hongarie, F. Hongrie, Sp. Hungaria, It. Ungheria, Ongharia, ML. Hungaria (G. Ungarn), from Hungari, Ungari, Ungri, Ugri, MGr. Ὀγγροι, a name given to the Magyars. The Magyar name of the country is Magyarország.] A country of central Europe: a name used in three distinct, more or less extended senses. (a) The Transleithan division of the Austrian-Hungarian monarchy, including Hungary proper with Transylvania, Croatia and Slavonia, and Fiume. In this sense it is a kingdom united with Austria in a personal union under the emperor, but having its own Reichstag at Budapest: this is composed of a Table of Magnates and a Chamber of Deputies (numbering 453), and legislates in general for the Transleithan division, and in particular for Hungary and Transylvania. In the Hungarian part of the empire less than one half are Magyar, the remainder being Rumanians, Germans, Slovaks, Serbo-Croatians, Ruthenians, etc. As regards religion, the Roman Catholics are more numerous than the Greek Church, Protestants, and Israelites. (For Croatia, Slavonia, Transylvania, see these names; for the empire in general, see Austria.) Area, 125,639 square miles. Population (1890), 17,463,473. (b) Hungary proper and Transylvania (now incorporated with it). This is the main part of the Transleithan division just described. Area, 109,160 square miles. Population (1890), 15,232,153. (c) Hungary proper—that is, the main portion of the Transleithan division, less Transylvania. See Transylvania. In this sense, Hungary is bounded by Moravia (separated by the Carpathians) on the northwest, Silesia (separated by the Carpathians) on the north, Galicia (separated by the Carpathians) on the north and northeast, Bukowina and Transylvania on the east, Servia (separated by the Danube) and Croatia-Slavonia (separated by the Drave) on the south, and Styria and Lower Austria (separated by the Leitha and March) on the west. The Carpathians are in the north and east; the Bakony Wald and spurs of the Alps are west of the Danube. The leading physical features are the great plains of the Danube and Theiss. The country produces large quantities of wheat, barley, rye, Indian corn, wine; the mineral products are coal, salt, iron, lead, copper, silver, gold, etc.; the exports are wheat, flour, barley, live stock, etc. Including Transylvania, Hungary has 63 counties. The capital and principal city is Budapest. The dominant people in Hungary proper are the Magyars. Hungary proper was in part included in Paunpola and Dacia. The settlement of the Magyars under Arpad took place about 895. The Magyars made many attacks on neighboring lands, and were defeated by Henry the Fowler and by Otto the Great on the Lechfeld (955). Hungary was Christianized in the end of the 10th century, and became a kingdom under St. Stephen in 1000. During the next two centuries it increased its territories at the expense of the Slavs. The constitution of the "Golden Bull" was granted in 1222. The country was terribly ravaged by the Mongols in 1241. The Arpad dynasty came to an end in 1301, and was followed by the house of Anjou (1309), under which Hungary came to occupy a commanding position. Louis united the crowns of Hungary and Poland 1370-82; and they were again united under Ladislaus, who died in 1444. War against the Turks was carried on under the leadership of Hunyady (1442-56). Matthias Corvinus reigned 1458-90. The crowns of Hungary and Bohemia were united 1490-1526. On the overthrow of the Hungarians by the Turks at the battle of Mohács in 1526, a great part of Hungary passed to the Turks, and Ferdinand of Hapsburg (later emperor) became king of the remainder (with Zápolya as rival king). Buda was recovered from the Turks in 1686. The sovereignty was made hereditary in the Hapsburg family in 1687; and their Hungarian dominions were ceded by the Turks in 1699 and 1718. An eight years' rebellion terminated in 1711. The revolution of 1848-49, under the leadership of Kossuth, was suppressed with Russian assistance. The dual system of government was established under the leadership of Deak in 1867. Area of Hungary proper, 91,509 square miles. Population (1890), 12,995,116.

Hungu, or Mahungu (mä-hön'gö). A Bantu tribe of Angola, west Africa, stretching in straggling settlements from the head waters of the Dande eastward to the Kuango River. The Mahungu grow coffee, which they sell at Dondo, Loanda, and Ambriz. They speak a dialect of Kongo closely related to Mbamba, and in a lesser degree to Kimbundu.

Hüningen (hü'ning-en), F. Huningue (ü-nañ'g). A town and former fortress of Upper Alsace, on the Rhine 3 miles north of Basel.

Huns (hunz). [LL. Hunni, LGr. Ὀἰννοι, also LL. Chunni, Chuni, LGr. Χοῖννοι, Χοῖνοι; doubtfully identified with the Chinese Hiongnu or Heungnoo, a people who, according to Chinese annals, constituted about the end of the 3d century B. C. a powerful empire in central Asia.] A Mongolian race which, having crossed the Volga about 350 and totally defeated the Alani, united with them and then attacked the Goths, thus compelling the irruption of the Goths into the Roman Empire about 375. The Huns, with various subject tribes, invaded Gaul under the leadership of Attila, and were defeated near Châlons-sur-Marne in 451. (Compare Attila.) The fate of the Huns is uncertain. They were probably merged in the later invaders.

But for one somewhat disputed source of information, all is dark concerning them. That source is the history of China. If the Huns be the Hiongnu, whose ravages are recorded in that history, then we have a minute account of their doings for centuries before the Christian era, and we know, in fact, far more about them than about the inhabitants of Gaul or Britain before the time of Julius Cæsar: if they are not, our ignorance is complete. A learned and laborious Frenchman, M. Deguignes, in the middle of last century, conceived the idea that the Huns might be thus identified, and with infinite pains has written out their history from Chinese sources, and has exhibited it in its connection with that of the various Tartar conquerors, who, since their day, have poured down upon the civilized kingdoms of Europe and Asia and wasted them.

Hodykin, Italy and her Invaders, II. 5.

Huns, White, or Ephthalites. An ancient people in central Asia, near the Oxus. They were so called by the Greeks on account of their civilization. It is supposed that they became established in the region after the great emigration of the Huns. They were finally blended with the Turks.

Hunyady (hōn'yod-i), János. Born at Hunyad, Transylvania, 1387; died at Semlin, Croatia-Slavonia, Aug. 11, 1456. A Hungarian general. He became voivode of Transylvania in 1442, and was chosen regent of Hungary on the death of Ladislaus I. of Poland at the battle of Varna in 1444. His most celebrated exploit was the successful defense of Belgrad against the Turks under Mohammed II. in 1456.

Hunyady was the name the Christians conjured with. When King Sigismund of Hungary was flying from one of his unsuccessful engagements with the Ottoman armies, he met and loved the beautiful Elizabeth Morsiney, at the village of Hunyadé, and John Hunyady was believed to be the fruit of this consolatory affection. "Whatever his parents were," says Knolles, "he himself was a politic, valiant, fortunate, and famous captain, his victories so great as the like was never before by any Christian prince obtained against the Turks; so that his name became unto them so dreadful that they used the same to fear their crying children withal." Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 87.

Hunza (hōn'zā). A small hill kingdom, nominally tributary to Kashmir, situated opposite Nagar along the Hunza River. It joined with Nagar in an insurrection crushed by British troops in 1891. It commands an important route from the Pamirs and Asiatic Russia.

Hunza River, or Kanjat. A small river, north of Kashmir, which unites with the Gilgit.

Huon de Bordeaux (ū-ōn' dē bor-dō'). A French chanson de geste. It supplied Shakspeare with some of the dramatical personæ of "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Huon de Bordeaux, though written in verse as far back as the thirteenth century, is not in its present form supposed to be long anterior to the invention of printing, as there are no manuscripts of it extant. It is said, indeed, at the end of the work, that it was written by the desire of Charles Seigneur de Rochefort, and completed on the 29th of January, 1454; but it is suspected that the conclusion is of a date somewhat more recent than the first part of the romance. The oldest edition is one in folio, without date, and the second is in quarto, 1516. There are also different impressions, in the original language, of a more recent period. Huon de Bordeaux, indeed, seems to have been a favourite romance not only among the French, but also with other nations. The English translation, executed by Lord Berners in the reign of Henry VIII., has gone through three editions, and it has lately formed the subject of the finest poem in the German language. . . . The incidents in the Ueberon of Wieland are nearly the same with those in the old French romance, and are universally known through the . . . translation of Mr. Sotheby.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, i. 294.

Huon Gulf. A gulf in the east of New Guinea.

Hurst (hèrst), John Fletcher. Born near Salem, Md., Aug. 17, 1834. An American bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and a writer on church history. He became professor of historical theology in Drew Theological Seminary (Madison, New Jersey) in 1871, of which institution he was president 1873-1880, when he was elected bishop. He has published a "History of Rationalism" (1865), an "Outline of Church History" (1876), "Short History of the Reformation" (1884), "Short History of the Medieval Church" (1887), "The Success of the Gospel, etc." (1888), etc.

Hurtado de Mendoza (hèr-tā'dō dā mān-dō'thā), Andrés. Born at Cuenca about 1490; died at Lima, Peru, March 30, 1561. A Spanish nobleman, marquis of Cañete, who was governor of Cuenca, and from June 29, 1556, viceroy of Peru. He took vigorous measures against those who had been in rebellion, and for the first time placed the government of the country on a secure footing. Sayri Tupac, the last of the Inca chiefs, was induced to leave his mountain fastnesses and resign his sovereignty.

Hurtado de Mendoza, Garcia, Marquis of Cañete from 1561. Born July 25, 1535; died Oct. 15, 1609. A Spanish administrator, son of Andrés whom he accompanied to Peru in 1556. His father made him governor of Chile 1567-60, where he carried on a successful war with the Araucanians. Returning to Spain, he served in the war with Portugal. He was viceroy of Peru from Jan. 6, 1590, to July 24, 1596. The Marquesas Islands, discovered in 1595 by an expedition which he sent out, were named in his honor.

Hurtado de Mendoza y Luna (ē lō'nā), Juan Manuel, Marquis of Montes-Claros. Born at Seville about 1560; died at Madrid, Oct. 9, 1628. A Spanish administrator, viceroy of Mexico 1603 to 1606, and of Peru Dec. 21, 1607, to Dec. 18, 1615. He was an able and successful ruler. Often called Juan de Mendoza y Luna.

Hurter (hōr'ter), Friedrich Emanuel von. Born at Schaffhausen, Switzerland, March 19, 1787; died at Gratz, Styria, Aug. 27, 1865. A Swiss historian. He was Protestant pastor at Schaffhausen 1825-41. In 1844 he went over to the Roman Catholic Church, becoming an exponent of ultramontaniam. From 1846 (except 1848-52) he was imperial historiographer at Vienna. He wrote "Geschichte Papst Innocenz III. und seiner Zeitgenossen" (1834-42), and "Geschichte Ferdinands II. und seiner Eltern" (1850-64), etc.

Huss (hus; G. pron. hōs), or Hus, John. Born at Husinetz, near Prachatitz, southern Bohemia, July 6, 1369; burned at Constance, Baden, July 6, 1415. A celebrated Bohemian religious reformer. He was the son of well-to-do Czech peasants, and studied divinity and the liberal arts at the University of Prague, where he began to lecture on the writings of Wyclif in 1398. He was appointed dean of the philosophical faculty in 1401, and was rector of the university 1402-1403. In 1402 he became pastor of the Bethlehem Chapel at Prague, where as a popular preacher in the Czech language he spread the doctrines of Wyclif among the populace, and sought to bring about a reformation of ecclesiastical abuses without separating himself from the Roman Catholic Church. He was reelected to the rectorship of the university in 1409. In 1412 he denounced the bull of John XXIII. decreeing a crusade against Ladislaus, king of Naples and Hungary, and with his coadjutor, Jerome of Prague, condemned the sale of indulgences, with the result that he was excommunicated in 1413. He was in 1414 cited before the Council of Constance, where he was arrested in spite of a safe-conduct from the emperor Sigismund, and burned at the stake as a heretic. A complete edition of his works was published in 1558.

Hussars of Junin. [Sp. Húsares de Junin.] A title conferred by Bolívar on the Peruvian cavalry which took part in the battle of Junin. They were commanded by Miller.

Author of "History of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay" (1765-67), "Collection of Original Papers relative to the History of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay" (1769).

Hutchinsonians (huch-in-sō'ni-anz). 1. Those who held the views of John Hutchinson (1674-1737), a secular English writer on theology and natural philosophy. He and his followers interpreted the Bible mystically, regarded it as an infallible source of science and philosophy, opposed the Newtonian system, and laid great stress on the importance of the Hebrew language. The Hutchinsonian school existed till the 19th century.

2. In American history, the followers of Mrs. Anne Hutchinson (died 1643), an antinomian teacher, in the early days of the colony of Massachusetts Bay.

Hutten (höt'ten), Ulrich von. Born at Castle Steckelberg, near Fulda, Prussia, April 21, 1488; died on the island of Ufenau, Lake Zurich, Aug. 23, 1523. A German humanist. Intended for the church, he was in 1498 placed in the monastery of Fulda, whence he fled in 1505. He subsequently studied the humanities at various German and Italian universities, including those of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder and Pavia. He served in the imperial army in 1513; was crowned poet by the emperor Maximilian I. at Augsburg in 1517; entered the service of the Archbishop of Mentz in 1518; joined the Swabian League against Ulrich, duke of Wurtemberg, in 1519; and in 1522 fought unsuccessfully with Franz von Sickingen at the head of the nobility of the Upper Rhine against the spiritual principalities. He was a friend and supporter of Luther; was one of the authors of the "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum" (which see); and was one of the principal satirical writers of his time. Works edited by E. Bocking (1850-70); life by Strauss (1857).

Hutton (hut'n), Charles. Born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, Aug. 14, 1737; died Jan. 27, 1823. An English mathematician, professor of mathematics at the Royal Academy, Woolwich, 1773-1807. Among his works are "Mathematical and Philosophical Dictionary" (1795), "Course of Mathematics" (1795).

Hutton, James. Born at Edinburgh, June 3, 1726; died March 26, 1797. A Scottish geologist and natural philosopher. He wrote "Theory of the Earth, etc." (1795), etc.

Huxley (huks'li), Thomas Henry. Born at Ealing, near London, May 4, 1825; died at Eastbourne, June 29, 1895. A celebrated English biologist. He was educated at Ealing School and at Charing Cross Hospital, London; served as assistant surgeon on board H. M. S. Rattlesnake 1846-50; became professor of natural history at the Royal School of Mines, and Fulerian professor of physiology at the Royal Institution, in 1855; was installed lord rector of Aberdeen University for a term of three years in 1874; was Rede lecturer at Cambridge in 1883; and was president of the Royal Society 1883-1885. Among his works are "Oceanic Hydrozoa" (1859), "Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature" (1863), "Lectures on the Elements of Comparative Anatomy" (1864), "Lessons in Elementary Physiology" (1866), "An Introduction to the Classification of Animals" (1869), "Lay Sermons" (1870), "A Manual of the Anatomy of Vertebrated Animals" (1871), "Critiques and Addresses" (1873), "Physiography" (1877), "A Manual of the Anatomy of Invertebrated Animals" (1877), "The Crayfish" (1880), "Science and Culture" (1881), "A Course of Practical Instruction in Elementary Biology" (with H. M. Martin, 1875), "Essays upon some Controverted Questions" (1892), "Evolution and Ethics" (1893).

Huy (ü-é'), Flem. Hoey. A town in the province of Liège, Belgium, situated at the confluence of the Hoyoux with the Meuse, 17 miles west-southwest of Liège; the medieval Hoium. It has a citadel. The Church of Notre Dame is noteworthy. Population (1890), 14,486.

Huygens, less correctly Huyghens (hi'genz; D. pron. hoi'gens), Christian. Born at The Hague, April 14, 1629; died there, June 8, 1695. A celebrated Dutch physicist, astronomer, and mathematician, son of Constantijn Huygens. He discovered a satellite of Saturn in 1655, and the ring of Saturn in 1659; invented the pendulum clock in 1656; improved the telescope; and developed the wave-theory of light. He wrote "Horologium Oscillatorium" (1673).

Huygens, or Huyghens, Constantijn; L. Huygenius. Born at The Hague, Sept. 4, 1596; died at his estate, Hofwijk, March 28, 1687. A Dutch poet, father of Christian Huygens. He was the son of a state secretary. He studied at Leyden, and subsequently was sent upon various embassies, first to England, then to Venice, and afterward twice again to England, where he was knighted in 1622. In 1625 he succeeded to his father's position. His collected poems appeared for the first time in 1625, under the title "Otia, or Ledighe Uren" ("Otia, or Idle Hours"), later amplified as "Korambloemen," ("Carniflowers," 1658-72) in 27 books. His later poems, ("Cluywerk" ("Cell-Work"), were published in 1841.

Huysum (hoi'sum), Jan van. Born at Amsterdam, April 15, 1682; died there, 1749. A noted Dutch painter of flowers and fruit; in this department the ablest painter of the 18th century.

Hwangho (hwang'hō), or Hoangho, or the Yellow River. The northernmost of the two chief rivers of China. It rises in Kokonor, enters Kansu, traverses part of Mongolia, reenters China, flowing south, east, and northeast, and enters the Gulf of Petchili. It is called "China's Sorrow" from its frequent disastrous floods. Length, estimated, 2,700 miles.

Hwen Tsang. See Houen-Tsang.

Hyacinth (yä-sant'), Père. See Loyson, Charles.

Hyacinthus (hä-sin'thus). [Gr. Ὑάκινθος.] In Greek mythology, a beautiful youth, son of Ameylas, king of Ameyche in Laconia, and Diomedé. He typified the early vegetation of spring. He was killed through jealousy by Apollo (the sun) while the two were playing at quoits on the banks of the Eurotas. From his blood the god caused the hyacinth to spring, and upon the petals of the plant was thought to be marked the exclamation AI ("woe!"). His festival, the Hyacinthia, was observed at Ameyche during three days in July.

Hyades (hi'a-déz). [Gr. Ὑάδες.] A group of nymphs, daughters of Atlas and Æthra, and sisters of the Pleiades. They nursed the infant Zeus (or Dionysus), and as a reward were transferred to the heavens as a part of the constellation Taurus. Their rising with the sun was associated with the beginning of the rainy season. The Romans, through a mistaken etymology, called the constellation "the little pigs" (Succule).

Hybla Heræa (hi'blä he-ré'ä). [Gr. Ἑβλία.] In ancient geography, a city of southern Sicily, about 33 miles west of Syracuse.

Hybla Major (hi'blä mä'jör) or Magna (mag'-nä). [Gr. Ὑβλία ἡ μείζων or μεγάλη.] In ancient geography, a city in Sicily, on the southern slope of Ætna, 11 miles northwest of Catania.

Hybla Minor (hi'blä mi'nör), or Megara Hyblæa (meg'a-rä hi-blé'ä). [Gr. Ὑβλία ἡ μικρά or τὰ Μέγαρα τὰ Ὑβλία.] In ancient geography, a city of Sicily, situated on the east coast about 12 miles north of Syracuse. It is celebrated for the honey produced in the vicinity. Often confounded with Hybla Major.

Hydaspes (hi-das'péz). [Gr. Ὑδᾶσις.] The ancient name of the river Jhelum.

Hyde (hid). A manufacturing town in Cheshire, England, situated near the Tame 6 miles east by south of Manchester. Population (1891), 31,682.

Hyde, Edward, first Earl of Clarendon. Born at Dinton, Wiltshire, Feb. 18, 1608 (O. S.); died at Rouen, France, Dec. 9, 1674. An English statesman and historian. He entered Parliament in 1640; became chancellor of the exchequer in 1643; was the chief adviser of Charles I. during the civil war, and of Prince Charles during his exile; and was lord chancellor of England 1660-67, when he was impeached and banished by Parliament. His chief works are a "True Historical Narrative of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England" (generally termed "History of the Rebellion," 1702-04) and "The Life of Edward, Earl of Clarendon, . . . Written by Himself" (1759).

Hyde, Edward, Viscount Cornbury (later third Earl of Clarendon). Died at London, April 1, 1723. An English politician. He was governor of New York 1702-08.

Hyde Park (hid pärk). A park in Westminster, London, situated 2½ miles south by west of St. Paul's. It is one of the largest of the London parks, extending from Westminster to Kensington, and covering an area of about 390 acres. It originally belonged to the manor of Hyde, the property of the monks of St. Peter, Westminster, which fell into the hands of Henry VIII. at the dissolution of the monasteries. During the Commonwealth, and for 10 years after the Restoration, a large park was leased to private holders. In 1670 it was inclosed with a wall and restocked with deer. It is now the principal recreation-ground of London, and is frequented by rich and poor. It has 9 carriage-entrances and many gates for pedestrians. See Serpentine, St. James's Park, Rotten Row, and Ladies' Mile.

Hyde Park. A former township in Cook County, Illinois, now annexed to Chicago.

Hyde Park. A town in Norfolk County, Massachusetts, situated on the Neponset River 8 miles south-southwest of Boston. Population (1890), 10,193.

Hyderabad (hi'dér-a-bäd'), or Haidarabad (hi'däi-ra-bäd'), or The Nizam's Dominions. The principal Mohammedan state and most important native state in India, situated in the Deccan between the British provinces of Bombay and Madras. Capital, Hyderabad. The surface is a low plateau. The ruling people are Mohammedans. The prevailing languages are Telugu, Marathi, and Kanarese. In 1687 it was made a Mogul province. About 1713 the viceroys (Nizam-ul-Mulk) became independent. In 1748 there was a disputed succession, one of the rivals being supported by Duplex and one by the East India Company. A treaty of alliance with England was made in 1766. In the mutiny of 1857 Hyderabad sided with England. Area, 82,698 square miles. Population (1893), 11,537,040.

Hyderabad, or Haidarabad. The capital of the state of Hyderabad, situated on the river Musi. It is an important commercial center. The cantonment of Secunderabad and the old city Golconda are in the neighborhood. Population (1891), with suburbs, 415,039.

Hyder Ali (hi'dér ä'lö), or Haidar Ali (hi'däi'ä'lö). Died at Chittore, British India, Dec., 1782. A maharaja of Mysore. He was of obscure birth; entered the Mysore army in 1749; became virtual ruler of Mysore in 1759; and usurped the title of maharaja in 1766. The English having formed a league with the Maharrattas against him, in 1767 a war ensued which resulted in the defeat of the English, who were compelled to sue for peace in 1769. In alliance with the French and Maharrattas, he invaded the Carnatic in 1780, but was defeated by Sir Eyre Coote at Porto Novo, Polliloor, and Sholingur in 1781.

Hydra (hi'drö). [Gr. ἵδρα, water-snake.] 1. In Greek mythology, a monstrous dragon of Lake Lerna in Argolis, represented as having 9 heads, each of which, being cut off, was immediately succeeded by 2 new ones unless the wound was cauterized. The destruction of this monster was one of the "twelve labors" of Heracles.—2. An ancient southern constellation, representing a sea-serpent. It is of Babylonian origin, like most of the ancient constellations. It is bounded by the ancient constellations Canis Minor, Argo, Centaurus, Virgo, Corvus, Crater, Leo, and Cancer, and by the modern constellations Sextans and Monoceros (which separates it from Canis Major). It contains 1 star of the second magnitude, and about 400 stars visible to the naked eye.

Hydra. [Gr. Ὑδρα.] An island in the Greek Archipelago, 4 miles from the Peloponnesus. It contains the seaport of Hydra. It was noted for its trade before the war of independence, and took a leading part in that war. Length, 11 miles. Population, about 7,000.

Hydrabad (hi-drä-bäd'), or Haidarabad (hi'däi-rä-bäd'). A city in Sind, British India, on the Indus. It is a manufacturing center. It was founded in 1768. Population (1891), 58,048.

Hydriotaphia, or Urn-Burial. A work by Sir Thomas Browne, published in 1658. "It is a descendant on the vanity of human life, based on the discovery of certain cinerary urns in Norfolk."

Hyères (é-är'). A town in the department of Var, France, near the Mediterranean, on the Riviera, 10 miles east of Toulon; the ancient Castrum Arearum. It is a noted winter health-resort. It was destroyed in the religious wars. Massillon was born there. Population (1891), commune, 14,982.

Hygieia (hi-ji-é'yä), or Hygeia (hi-jé'yä). [Gr. Ὑγιεία, later erroneously Ὑγεία, health.] 1. The goddess of health. She was the daughter of Æsculapinus.—2. An asteroid (No. 10) discovered by De Gasparis at Naples, April 12, 1849.

Hyksos (hik'söz), or Shepherd Kings. The name given to kings of Egypt, of a foreign race, whose rule (about 2000 B. C.) fell between the 13th and the 18th dynasty, and lasted, according to Manetho, for 511 years.

Hyksos is the Egyptian hik-shasu, "chief of the Beduina," or "Shepherds," shasu being the name given to the Semitic nomades of Northwestern Arabia. The Hyksos, however, are called Men or Menti in the inscriptions, Menti being explained in the geographical table of Edfu to be the natives of Syria. In accordance with this, Manetho speaks of Jerusalem as a Hyksos town, and their Egyptian capital, Zoan or Tanis, is connected with Hebron in Numb. xiii. 22. It is possible that their leaders were Mittite princes, though Lepsius believes them to have come from Punt or Southern Arabia; at any rate, their features, as revealed by the few memorials of them that exist, more especially the lion of Sän, belong to a very peculiar and non-Semitic type. Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 31.

The exact nationality of the Hyksos is still a matter of dispute. All we know with certainty is that they came from Asia, and they brought with them in their train vast numbers of Semites who occupied the northern part of Egypt. Comparatively few Hyksos monuments have as yet been discovered. These exhibit a peculiar type of features, very unlike that of the Egyptians. The face is thickly bearded, the hair being curly, with a pigtail hanging behind the head. The nose is broad and sub-quadrate, the cheek-bones high, the forehead square and knitted, the lips prominent and expressive of intense determination. The kindly urbanity so characteristic of the Egyptian face in statuary is replaced by an expression of sternness and vigour. Among the ethnological types presented by the Egyptian art sculptures there is only one which can be compared with that of the Hyksos monuments. This is the type peculiar to the inhabitants of Northeastern Syria, in the district called Nabraria by the Egyptians and Aram-Naharaim in the Old Testament. It was a district of which the centre was Mitanni in the fifteenth and following centuries before the Christian era; and since the cuneiform tablets recently discovered at Tel-el-Amarna have disclosed to us the fact that the language of Mitanni was neither Semitic nor Indo-European, we may perhaps conclude that the population which spoke it was also non-Semitic. However this may be, if we are to regard the so-called Hyksos sphinxes of Sän as reproducing the Hyksos type of countenance, it would follow that the hordes which overwhelmed Egypt in the twenty-third century B. C. were led by princes from Northern Syria.

Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 95.

Hylacomylus. See Waldseemüller, Martin.

Hylas (hi'läs). In classical mythology, a boy who was a favorite of Hercules. He was carried off by the Naiads, who fell in love with him while he was drawing water from a fountain in Mysia.

Hymen (hi'men), or Hymenæus (hi-me-né'us). [Gr. Ὑμν, Ὑμεναῖος.] Originally, a marriage-song among the Greeks. The names were gradually personified, and Hymen was invoked as the god of marriage. He is represented as a taller and more serious youth than Eros, carrying a bridal torch.

Hymettus (hi-met'us). [Gr. Ὑμηττός.] The ancient name of a mountain in Attica, Greece, southeast of Athens; the modern Trelo Vouvi. It was celebrated for honey, and also noted for its marble. Height, 3,368 feet.

Hymir (hé'mir). [ON.] In Old Norse mythology, a water-demon, the giant of the winter sea. He dwelt far in the east, at the end of the heavens, by the sea. The glaciers resounded when he returned home from the chase, and his beard was covered with ice. He was the original owner of the kettle in which the gods brewed ale.

Hyogo. See Hiogo.

Hypatia (hi-pä'shiü). [Gr. Ὑπατία.] A Neoplatonic philosopher of Alexandria, at the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th century, celebrated for her beauty and her unhappy fate.

The celebrity of Theon is obscured by that of his daughter Hypatia, whose sex, youth, beauty, and cruel fate have made her the most interesting martyr of philosophy. After receiving instruction in mathematics from her father, who was a professor at the Museum in his native city, she went to Athens, where she became such a proficient in the Platonic philosophy that, on her return to Alexandria, she presided in the public schools there, and taught at once the mathematics of Apollonius and Diophantus, and the philosophy of Ammonius and Plotinus. Her influence over the studious and educated classes in Alexandria, especially the intimacy which subsisted between her and the prefect Orestes, excited the hatred and jealousy of the narrow-minded and unprincipled archbishop; and Cyril found no difficulty in directing the brutal violence of a superstitious mob against one who was described as an enemy of the faith and its ministers. Handed by an ecclesiastic named Peter, a band of fanatics attacked Hypatia, in the spring of A. D. 415, as she was passing through the streets in her chariot, dragged her to one of the churches, where they pulled her clothes from her back, and then cast her out into the street, pelted her to death with fragments of earthenware, tore her body to pieces, and committed her mutilated remains to the flames.

Hypatia. A novel by Charles Kingsley, published in 1853.

Hyperboreans (hī-pēr-bō'rē-anz). [Gr. Ὑπερβορῆαι, those who are beyond the north wind.] In early Greek legend, a people who lived beyond the north wind, and were not exposed to its blasts, but enjoyed a land of perpetual sunshine and abundant fruits. They were free from disease, violence, and war. Their natural life lasted a thousand years, and was spent in the worship of Apollo. In later times the Greeks gave the name to inhabitants of northern countries generally.

Very elaborate accounts have been given of the Hyperboreans both in ancient and modern times. Hecataeus of Abdera, a contemporary of Alexander the Great, wrote a book concerning them. They are, however, in reality not a historical, but an ideal nation. The North Wind being given a local seat in certain mountains called Rhipæan, it was supposed there must be a country above the north wind, which would not be cold, and which would have inhabitants. Ideal perfections were gradually ascribed to this region. According to Pindar, Hercules brought from it the olive, which grew thickly there about the sources of the Danube (Ol. iii. 249). When the country had been made thus charming, it was natural to attach good qualities to the inhabitants. Accordingly they were made worshippers of Apollo (Pindar, l. s. c.), observers of justice (Hellen. Fr. 96), and vegetarians (ibid.). As geographical knowledge grew, it was necessary to assign them a distinct position, or to banish them to the realms of fable. Herodotus preferred the latter alternative, Damastes the former. Damastes placed them greatly to the north of Scythia, from which they were separated by the countries of the Issedones and the Arimaspi. Southward their boundary was the (supposed) Rhipæan mountain-chain; northward it was the ocean. (Fr. 1.) This arrangement sufficed for a time. When, however, it was discovered that no mountain-chain ran across Europe above Scythia, and that the Danube, instead of rising in the north (compare Pind. Ol. iii. 25 with Istb. vi. 34), rose in the west, a new position had to be sought for the Hyperboreans, and they were placed near the Italian Alps, and confounded with the Gauls and the Etruscans or Tarquinians. A different and probably a later tradition, though found in an earlier writer, is that which assigned them an island as large as Sicily, lying towards the north, over against the country of the Celts, fertile and varied in its productions, possessed of a beautiful climate, and enjoying two harvests a year. In this island it is not difficult to recognize our own country. Rawlinson, Herod., III. 27, note.

Hyperides, or Hypereides (hī-pēr-i'dēz). [Gr. Ὑπερίδης, Ὑπερίδης.] A celebrated Attic orator, a contemporary (and probably a younger contemporary) of Demosthenes, and the son of Glauceippus of the deme Collytus. He supported Demosthenes in his opposition to the Macedonian party; later (324) took part in his prosecution on the charge of bribery by Alexander; was chief instigator of the Lamian war; and was slain at Corinth in 322.

Hyperion (hī-pē'ri-on or hī-pēr-i'on). [Gr. Ὑπερίων.] 1. In Greek mythology, a Titan, a son of Uranus and Gæa. By his sister Theia he was the father of Helios, Selene, and Eos.—2. The seventh satellite of Saturn, discovered by Bond Sept. 16, 1848.

Hyperion. 1. A poetical fragment by Keats, published in 1820.—2. A prose romance by Longfellow, published in 1839. The subjects of the two works are entirely different.

Hyphasis (hif'a-sis). [Gr. Ὑψισίς.] The ancient name of the river Sutlej.

Hypocrite, L'. The name under which "Tartufe" was first played.

Hypocrite, The. A play by Bickerstaffe, in which Cibber's "Non-Juror," an adaptation of "Tartufe," survives. It was produced in 1768.

Hyppolite (ē-po-lēt'). Louis Mondestin Florvil. Born at Cap Haitien, 1827. A Haitian general and politician. He is a mulatto, the son of one of Souloque's ministers. He first attained prominence in the civil war of 1865; was the leader of the sanguinary revolt by which Légitime was defeated; and in Oct., 1889, was proclaimed acting president. In May, 1890, he was elected president for seven years.

Hyrcania (hēr-kā'ni-ā). [Gr. ἡ Ὑρκανία.] In ancient geography, a region in Asia which bordered on the Caspian Sea and the Oxus. It corresponded in part to northern and northeastern Persia.

Hyrcanus (hēr-kā'nus) I., or John Hyrcanus. A Maccabean prince of Judea 135-105 B. C. Under him the political achievements of the Maccabees were consolidated and extended. He cleared the young state of heterogeneous and hostile elements by driving out the Hellenists from Palestine and destroying the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim, thus accomplishing the dissolution of the Samaritans as a separate religious nation. The Idumeans he forced to accept Judaism. He also extended, by successful wars, the boundaries of Judea, and assured its independence. With Rome he entertained friendly relations. His reign was compared to that of Solomon.

Hyrcanus II. The last and most unfortunate of the Maccabean princes. He was of a weak, irresolute character, but, being the elder of two brothers, was at the death of his mother, Salome Alexandra, 69 B. C., appointed king, while to his more energetic but rash brother, Aristobulus II., was bequeathed the high-priesthood. Soon a conflict broke out between the brothers. The helpless Hyrcanus fell into the hands of the crafty Idumean Antipater, father of Herod, whom he adopted as his guide and counselor. Antipater's machinations brought Pompey to Jerusalem in 63 B. C., an event which was the beginning of the end of Judean independence, and resulted in supplanting the Maccabean race by that of Antipater, the Herodians. Aristobulus II. was led as a prisoner by Pompey to Rome, and was there poisoned. The weak Hyrcanus became a tool of Herod. Even of the dignity of the high-priesthood, to which Herod confined him, he was deprived in consequence of mutilation which he suffered at the hands of the invading Parthians. He finally died the ignominious death of a criminal, Herod ordering his execution on the charge of conspiracy, 30 B. C.

Hysmene and Hysmenias (his'mē-nē and his'mē'ni-as). A Greek romance by a certain Eustathius (or Emathius, or Eumathias), written not earlier than the 9th century A. D.

Hystaspes (his-tas'pēz). [Old Pers. Vishtāspa.] See the extract.

Hystaspes, the son of Arsames and father of Darius—the Gustasp of Persian romance—not only occurs in the genealogical lists, Greek and native, but likewise appears in the Behistun Inscription as actually living in the reign of his son and serving under him. According to Ctesias, he was accidentally killed as he was being drawn up by ropes to examine the sculptures which Darius was having executed for his own tomb. I have already noticed the probability that Hystaspes was the real heir to the throne, on the failure of male issue in the line of Cyrus, but waived his right in favour of his eldest son.

Rawlinson, Herod., IV. 257.

Hythe (hīth). [AS. Hīth, the port.] A town in Kent, England, on the Strait of Dover 11 miles west of Dover. It is one of the Cinque Ports, and a military station. Population (1891), 4,351.

Iacchus (i-ak'us). [Gr. Ἴακχος.]

In Greek mythology, a divinity peculiar to Athens, and important from his intimate connection with the Eleusinian mysteries. He was a son of Demeter and Zeus, and a brother of Kora (Proserpine), and personified the male element in nature, as his sister the female. At Eleusis he was looked upon as an intermediary between the great goddesses and their votaries, and presided in person (represented by an image crowned with myrtle and bearing a torch) over the splendid procession from the Eleusinium at Athens to the sekos at Eleusis, and over the mysterious rites in the latter sanctuary. At a comparatively late date Iacchus became Bacchus, who, as a son of Demeter, was entirely distinct from the older Dionysus.

Iachimo (i-ak'i-mō). In Shakspeare's "Cymbeline," a worldly and affected Roman courtier; a brutal villain. He conceals himself in a chest in Imogen's room, and so furnishes himself with details which seem to prove her unchastity.

Iago (i-ā'gō). A character in Shakspeare's tragedy "Othello." He is the ancient of Othello, and is filled with jealousy of his rank and power. His cool and calculating villainy, his speciousness, and his bitter sarcasm form an artistic contrast to the noble and large-natured Othello. In order to revenge himself for the loss of the position as Othello's lieutenant which he failed to secure, (and partly apparently from sheer love of evil), he raises a whirlwind of passion in the latter's breast by adroitly making him believe in the unfaithfulness of Desdemona, to the final destruction of all three.

Iakon. See Yaquina.

Iamblichus (jam'bli-kus). [Gr. Ἰάμβλιχος.] Born at Chalcis, Cæle-Syria; died about 330 A. D. A Syrian Neoplatonic philosopher. He wrote many philosophical and mathematical works, of which only a few have survived. His "Life of Pythagoras" and "Exhortation to Philosophy" were edited by Kiessling (1813-15).

Iapetus (i-ap'e-tus). [Gr. Ἰαπετός.] In Greek mythology, a Titan, son of Uranus and Gæa, and father of Prometheus, Epimetheus, Atlas, and Menætius. He was thrown by Zeus into Tartarus.

Iapygia (i-ā-pij'i-ā). [Gr. Ἰαπυγία.] In ancient geography, a name used vaguely by the Greeks for Messapia or Apulia.

Iapygians (i-ā-pij'i-anz). See the extract.

Under the general name of Iapygians were commonly included three distinct tribes, the Messapians, the Pæncetians, and the Daunians. The first-named are spoken of as the inhabitants of the Iapygian peninsula, eastward of Tarentum and Brundisium (Strab. vi. p. 401). They were generally derived from Crete, strange as it may appear (Strab. vi. p. 405; Athen. xii. p. 522, F.; Plut. Thes. c. 16; Festus, ad voc. Salentini, etc.). Probably they came in reality, like the other inhabitants of southern Italy, from the Peloponnese, where there was a place called Messapee. Ravelston, Herod., iv. 139, note.

Ibadan (ē-bā'dän). A town in the Yoruba country, West Africa, about lat. 7° 20' N., long. 4° 10' E. Population, estimated, 100,000.

Ibarra (ē-bär'rä). The capital of the province of Imbabura, northern Ecuador, about 55 miles northeast of Quito. It was destroyed in 1868 by an earthquake which killed 3,000 of the inhabitants. Population, about 6,000.

Ibea (i-bē'ä). The part of British East Africa under control of the Imperial British East Africa Company. The name is formed from the initials of the above words.

Iberia (i-bē'ri-ä). [L. Iberia, Gr. Ἰβηρία, from Ibères, Ibères, Gr. Ἰβηρες, the inhabitants.] In ancient geography: (a) The peninsula of southwestern Europe, comprising the modern Spain and Portugal. (b) The region bounded by the Caucasus Mountains on the north, Albania on the east, Armenia on the south, and Colchis on the west. It corresponds nearly to the modern Georgia.

Iberian (i-bē'ri-an). A name sometimes given to the mountains in central and eastern Spain.

Iberian Peninsula. The southwestern peninsula of Europe, comprising Spain and Portugal.

Iberians (i-bē'ri-anz). The ancient inhabitants of the Iberian peninsula. See the extract.

For this short, dark dolichocephalic type we may adopt the usual and convenient name "Iberian." Professor Rolleston prefers the term "Silurian," and it has been variously designated by other writers as the Euskarian, Basque, Berber, or Mediterranean race. By some French writers it is called the "Cro-Magnon" type, from a skull, possibly of paleolithic age, found in a sepulchral cavern at Cro-Magnon in Périgord. . . . Before the arrival of the brachycephalic Ligurian race, the Iberians ranged over the greater part of France. We trace them in the valleys of the Seine, the Oise, and the Marne, frequently in association with the remains of the Ligurian invaders. If, as seems probable, we may identify them with the Aquitani, one of the three races which occupied Gaul in the time of Caesar, they must have retreated to the neighbourhood of the Pyrenæes before the beginning of the historic period. It is in this region, mainly in the valley of the Garonne, that their sepulchral caves are the most numerous. . . . The Iberians, a short Southern dolichocephalic race, represented in the long barrows of Britain and the sepulchral caves of France and Spain. The stature averaged 5 feet 4 inches, and the cephalic index 71 to 74. They were orthognathous and swarthy. They are now represented by some of the Welsh and Irish, by the Corsicans, and by the Spanish Basques. Their affinities are African.

His celebrated biographical work, "Deaths of Eminent Men" ("Wafat-ul-Ayyan"), has been translated into English and copiously annotated by Baron MacGuckin de Shane (1842-1871).

Ibn Sina. See Avicenna.

Ibn Tofail (ibn tō'fā'il) (Abu Bekr Ibn el-Tofeil). An Arabian philosopher and physician, a contemporary of the Arabian philosopher and writer Averroës. He lived toward the close of the 12th century in one of the Arabic kingdoms in Spain. He composed a philosophical description of the imaginary voyages of Ibn Yokdhan, translated into Hebrew by Moses Narbonensis, and into Latin by Pococke in 1671. Several English translations were made from the Latin, and one from the original Arabic by Simon Ockley, published in 1711 under the title "The Improvement of Human Reason Exhibited in the Life of Hai Ebn Yokdhan, written by Abu Jaafar Ebn Tophail." See Autobiædæctus.

Ibo (ē'bō). An island seaport and town of Portuguese East Africa, in lat. 12° 23' S.

Ibo (ē'bō), or Igbo (ēg'bō). An important African tribe dwelling at the apex of the Niger delta, and extending thence to the north and east. The chief town, also called Ibo, is an emporium of the palm-oil trade. All the slaves exported from the Niger used to be called Ibo in North America. The Ibo tribe comprises some minor tribes speaking dialects of Ibo, namely, Isoama (the dialect used in missionary books), Elugu, Abadja, and Abo. The Ibo, being a trade language, is used beyond the territory of the tribe. See Iyara and Idzo.

Ibrahim (ib-rā-hēm'). The Arabic form of Abraham.

Ibrahim. Died in 1535. A grand vizir of Turkey. He was the son of a sailor at Parga; was captured by corsairs in his youth; was sold into slavery at Magnesia, and became the property of Soliman II., by whom he was made vizir in 1523. He fought with distinction in the war against Hungary in 1527, and was put to death at the instigation of the sultana in 1535.

Ibsen (ib'sen), Henrik. Born at Skien, Norway, March 20, 1828. A noted Norwegian dramatic poet. He at first studied medicine, but soon devoted himself entirely to literature. His first dramatic attempt, the three-act tragedy "Katilina," was published at Christiania, in 1850, under the pseudonym Brynjolf Bjarme. In the same year he went to Christiania in order to pursue his studies at the university. With A. O. Vinje and Botten-Hansen the bibliographer, young men of his own age, he engaged in the editorship of the short-lived weekly journal "Andrinner," to which he contributed lyrics and satirical pieces. A short saga piece, "Kæmpehojen" ("The Warrior's Mound"), written at this time, was produced upon the stage. On the cessation of the journal the following year, he obtained from the violinist Ole Bull the position of manager in the newly opened National Theater at Bergen, a post which he held until 1857. In 1852, in the interest of the theater, he undertook a short journey to Denmark and Germany to study scenic art. From this period is the historical drama "Gildet paa Solhaug" ("The Banquet at Solhaug"). In 1857 he was called to Christiania as director of the Norwegian Theater. From this year is the historical drama "Fru Inger til Østtraat" ("The Mistress Inger at Østtraat"), which subsequently, however, was almost wholly rewritten. From 1858 is the historical drama "Hermændene paa Helgeland" ("The Warriors at Helgeland"). "Kjærlighedens Komædie" ("Love's Comedy"), the first of the satirical social plays that have particularly made his name famous, was the next important work to appear (in 1862). In 1863 appeared the historic drama "Kongs-Erne" ("The Pretenders"). In 1864, after writing the poem "En Broder i Nød" ("A Brother in Need")—a demand to the people to take up the cause of Denmark, which, however, fell unheeded—he left Norway in a sort of voluntary exile. In Rome in 1866 he completed one of the greatest of his works, the drama "Brand." This was followed the succeeding year (1867) by the dramatic poem "Peer Gynt," also written in Italy. His next work was the satiric comedy "De Uænes Forbund" ("The Young Men's Union," 1867); like all his later works, written in prose. This was followed in 1871 by the long historic drama "Kejsers og Galileers" ("Emperor and Galilean"), which consists of two parts—"Julian's Apostasy" and "Julian the Emperor." In the meantime he had changed his place of residence, first to Dresden, and later to Munich, where he lived until recently, when he returned to Christiania. In 1877 appeared, further, "Samfundets Støtter" ("The Pillars of Society"), another satiric comedy. This was followed in 1879 by "Et Dukkehjem" ("A Doll's House," translated under the name "Nora," in the same vein. His latest plays are "Gjengangere" ("Ghosts," 1881), "En Folkefiende" ("An Enemy of the People," 1882), "Vildanden" ("The Wild Duck," 1884), "Rømsersholm" (1886), "Fruen fra Havet" ("The Lady from the Sea," 1888), "Hedda Gabler" (1890), and "Bygmester Solness" ("Architect Solness," 1892). Among his minor writings are the epic "Terje Vigen" and the long poem "Paa Vilderne" (1860).

Ibycus (ib'i-kus). [Gr. Ἰβύκος.] A Greek lyric poet of the second half of the 6th century B. C., born at Rhegium, Italy. He lived for the greater part of his life at the court of Polycrates of Samos. Fragments of his poems, which were chiefly erotic, have survived. According to the legend, he was murdered at sea, and his murderers were found out through some cranes that followed the ship: hence the "cranes of Ibycus" became a proverb for the agency of the gods in revealing crime.

Ica, or Yca (ē'kā). A town in western Peru, 160 miles south-southeast of Lima. Population (1889), about 9,000.

Ica. A maritime department of Peru. Area, 6,295 square miles. Population, about 60,000.

Icá (ē-sā'), called Putumayo (pō-tō-nī'yō) by Spanish Americans. A river of South America which rises near Pasto, southern Colombia, flows east and southeast through Colombia and Brazil, and joins the Amazon near lat. 3° S., long. 69° W. A portion of the middle course is claimed both by Ecuador and by Peru. Length, about 1,100 miles; navigable for nearly 900 miles. Also written Iza.

Icaria (i-kā'ri-ā). [Gr. Ἰκαρία.] 1. A site in the Rapedosa valley, Attica, Greece, north of Mount Pentelicus, excavated by the American School at Athens in 1888, with the result of the discovery of architectural remains and interesting sculpture, chiefly archaic, and the definitive identification of the site. It is important because here, according to the legend, wine-making and the Dionysiac cult were introduced into Attica by Bacchus himself; and here was born Thespis, who, by the changes he introduced into the old dithyrambic songs, became the originator of the drama, of whose first essays Icaria was the theater. 2. See Icarian Sea.

Icaria. A cooperative community established in 1848 in Texas, removed to Nauvoo, in Illinois, in 1850, and in 1857 to Adams County, Iowa.

Icarian Sea. The part of the Aegean Sea surrounding Samos and the neighboring small island of Icaria. Compare Icarus.

The Icarian sea received its name from the island of Icaria (now Nikaria), which lay between Samos and Myconos (Strab. xiv. p. 915). It extended from Chios to Cos, where the Carpathian sea began.

Rauvinson, Herod., III. 474, note.

Icarus (ik'a-rus). [Gr. Ἰκαρος.] In Greek legend, the son of Dædalus, drowned in the Icarian Sea (named, according to the legend, from him), near Samos, in his flight from Crete, by flying so near the sun that his wings of wax, made by Dædalus, melted. See Dædalus and Icarian Sea.

Iceland (is'land), Dan. Island (ēs'länd). [Formerly Iselaid, Island, from Icel. Island, Dan. Sv. Island, land of ice.] An island in the North Atlantic Ocean, belonging to Denmark, in lat. 63° 23'–66° 33' N., long. 13° 32'–24° 35' W., about 160 miles east of Greenland. Capital, Reykjavik. The surface is generally mountainous. Iceland is noted for its volcanoes and glaciers. Its leading occupation is the raising of cattle. The religion is Lutheran. The legislative government (according to the constitution of 1874) is vested in the king and a local assembly (Althing) with an upper chamber of 12 members and a lower chamber of 24 members; the executive being vested in a governor-general appointed by the king. Iceland was settled in part by Irish monks (from about 795), and was mainly settled by Northerners about 870–930. Christianity was introduced about 1000. The island was united to Norway in 1262, and passed to Denmark in 1380. It was celebrated for its literary productiveness in the 12th and 13th centuries. A new constitution was granted in 1874. Length, 300 miles. Area, 39,756 square miles. Population (1890), 70,927.

Iceland, which had remained undiscovered till long after the days of Charles, was, down to the year 1262, the only absolutely free republic in the world.

Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, p. 185.

Iconium (i-kō'ni-um). The ancient name of Konieh.

Iconoclast. The pseudonym of Charles Bradlaugh.

Iconoclast Emperors. Those Byzantine emperors who were noted for their opposition to image-worship in the Eastern Church. The controversy began with the edict of Leo the Isaurian in 726, and continued until the middle of the 9th century.

Iconoclasts (i-kou'ō-klasts). A sect or party in the Eastern Empire in the 8th and 9th centuries which opposed all use and honor or worship of icons, or images, and destroyed them when in power. The party of Iconoclasts was originated by the emperor Leo the Isaurian, and afterward continued or revived by Constantine Copronymus and other emperors, especially Leo the Armenian and Theophilus. The emperors named treated those who honored icons with great cruelty, and after the death of the last of them the party of Iconoclasts soon became extinct.

Ictinus (ik-tī'nus). [Gr. Ἰκτίνος.] Lived in the middle of the 5th century B. C. A Greek architect, chief designer of the Parthenon. He also designed the temple of Demeter and Persephone at Eleusis, and the temple of Apollo at Bassai, near Phigalia (the sculptures of this temple are among the treasures of the British Museum). Other architects were associated with him in nearly all of these works. Ictinus and Phidias were identified with Pericles in the execution of his great scheme of public works.

Ida (ī'dä). [Gr. Ἰδῆ or Ἰδα.] 1. A mountain-range in Phrygia and Mysia, Asia Minor. At the base of it was the Troad. It was famous in Greek legend especially as a seat of the worship of Cybele. Highest summit, Gargaron (the modern Kaz Dagh, 5,749 feet).

Herodotus appears to have given the name of Ida to the highlands which close in the valley of the Scamander on the left, lying west and south of Bunarbashi.

Rauvinson, Herod., IV. 42, note.

2. The central mountain-range of Crete: the modern Psiloriti. It was the scene of legends of Zeus. Highest point, about 8,000 feet.

Ida (ī'dä). Died 559. A chief of the Angles, the first king of Bernicia. He began to reign in Northumbria in 547. Ida's immediate kingdom did not probably extend south of the Tees, though his power may have been felt beyond that river; for the kingdom of Deira, between the Tees and the Humber, does not seem to have been founded until his death. It is quite possible that Ida's Bernicia did not extend as far as the Tees. He is said to have had six sons by queens and six by concubines (Florence). The consolidation and advance of the heathen power under him and his sons caused a wide-spread apostasy from Christianity among the Picts. He reigned twelve years, and died in 559. On his death Ella (died 588) became king in Deira, and is supposed to have extended his power over Bernicia (Skene). Diet. Nat. Biol.

Ida, or Idda (ē'dä). The chief city of Igar (which see).

Idaho (ī'da-hō). One of the Western States of the United States of America. Capital, Boise City. It is bounded by British America on the north, Montana and Wyoming on the east, Utah and Nevada on the south, and Washington and Oregon on the west, lying between lat. 42° and 49° N., and long. 111° and 117° 10' W. It has 21 counties; sends 2 senators and 1 representative to Congress; and has 3 electoral votes. It contains the Salmon River Mountains, and on the eastern border the Rocky and Bitter Root Mountains. The leading occupations are mining of gold and silver and cattle-raising. It formed part of the Louisiana cession; was originally part of Oregon Territory, and later of Washington Territory; and was organized as a separate Territory in 1863 (including the present Montana and part of Wyoming). The present boundary was settled in 1863, and Idaho was admitted as a State in 1890. Area, 84,800 square miles. Population (1890), 84,385.

Idalium (i-dä'li-um), or Idalia (i-dä'li-ä). [Gr. Ἰδαλίον.] A town and promontory on the coast of Cyprus, sacred to Aphrodite, who was sometimes called Idalia.

Idar (ē'där). A small town in Birkenfeld, Oldenburg, Germany, about 30 miles east of Treves.

Iddesleigh, Earl of. See Northeote.

Iddhi (id'dhi). [The Pali for the Skt. iddhi, success.] In Buddhist theology, the name for the extraordinary powers over matter possessed by the Arhat or Buddhist in the fourth stage of moral perfection. In this stage he has gained the Abhinna, "transcendent faculties of knowledge," the inner eye, the inner ear, knowledge of all thoughts, and recollection of previous existences and Iddhi. Under Iddhi are included: (1) the faculty of reducing the body to the size of an atom; (2) increasing size or weight at will; (3) making the body light at will; (4) reaching any object, however remote; (5) unlimited exercise of will; (6) absolute power over one's self and others; (7) subjecting the elements; (8) the suppression of all desires. See Monier-Williams, "Buddhism," pp. 133–245.

Iden (ī'den), Sir Alexander. The slayer of Jack Cade. He figures in Shakspeare's 2 Henry IV.

Idle (ī'dl). 1. A town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, England, situated near the Aire 9 miles west-northwest of Leeds. It has manufactures of woollens. Population (1891), 7,118.— 2. A tributary of the river Trent, in Nottinghamshire, England. Æthelfrith, king of Northumbria, was defeated and slain in a battle on its banks by Redwald, king of East Anglia, in 617.

Idler, The. A series of essays by Dr. Johnson, published 1758–60 in a newspaper called "The Universal Chronicle."

Idomeneus (i-dom'e-nūs). [Gr. Ἰδομενεύς.] In Greek legend, a king of Crete, one of the leading heroes of the Greek army in the Trojan war.

Idria (id'rē-ā). A town in the crownland of Carniola, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Idrizza 29 miles north-northeast of Trieste: celebrated for its quicksilver-mines, discovered 1497. Population (1890), commune, 5,084.

Idrisi (id'rē-sē), or Edrisi. A noted Arabian geographer of the 12th century. Little is known concerning his life. His principal work, a description of the world, is known by various titles. It is of great importance in the history of geography.

Idro (ē'drō). Lake. A small lake in the province of Breseia, northern Italy, 9 miles northwest of Lake Garda.

Idstedt (id'stet). A village in Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, 5 miles north of Schleswig. Here, July 24 and 25, 1850, the Danes (38,000) defeated the troops of Schleswig-Holstein (27,000).

Idumea. See Edom.

Idun (ē'dön). [ON. Idunn.] In Old Norse mythology, the goddess who had in her keeping, in Asgard, the apples eaten by the gods to preserve eternal youth. Later myths make her the wife of Bragi.

Idylls of the King. A series of poems by Alfred Tennyson, founded on the Arthurian romances. They comprise "The Coming of Arthur," "Gareth and Lynette," "Geraint and Enid," "Merlin and Vivien," "Lancelot and Elaine," "The Holy Grail," "Pelleas and Ettarre," "The Last Tournament," "Guinevere," and "The Passing of Arthur" (published 1859–85).

Idzo (ē'dzō). A people which inhabits the Niger delta, West Africa; also, its language. The territory of the Idzo comprises the Bonny Erass, New Calabar, Akassa, and Okrika townships and dialects, and extends a hundred miles up the Nun branch of the Niger. Sometimes Idzo- and Ibo-speaking settlements are found intermixed, and the two names are easily confounded. All the Idzo and Ibo people are now under British protection.

Ierne (i-ēr'nē). An ancient name of Ireland.

If (ēf). A small island 2 miles west-southwest of Marseilles, noted for its fortress, Château d'If (one of the scenes of Dumas's novel "Count of Monte Cristo"). Mirabeau and Philippe Egalité were confined here.

Iffland (if'fländ), August Wilhelm. Born at Hannover, Prussia, April 19, 1759; died at Berlin, Sept. 22, 1814. A noted German actor and dramatist, director of the national theater at Berlin after 1796, and general royal theatrical director after 1811. His best-known plays are "Die Jäger," "Dienstpflicht," "Die Advokaten," "Die Mundel," and "Die Hagestolzen."

Iffley (if'li). A village near Oxford, England; noted for its church, which is of small size, but in many ways remarkable for the interesting moldings and other details of its early Norman architecture. It has a massive square central tower, also of Norman date.

Igara (ē-gä'ra), or Igala (ē-gä'lä). An African tribe, of the Nigritic branch, settled on the eastern bank of the Niger, between the Ibo and the junction of the Niger and the Binue. Ida is the capital. The language seems to be a mixture of the native Akpotto with Yomba introduced by immigrants. At Ala, Ibo is spoken concurrently with Igara. See Ibo and Idzo.

Igbira (ē-gē'ra). A Nigritic and pagan tribe, dwelling on both banks of the Binue River above its confluence. Fanda, or Panda, is the capital. The Igbira language has two dialects, Hima and Panda; it shows greater affinity with Nupe and Yomba than with Igara. The Panda people have been driven, by the Fulah invasion, from the right to the left of the Binue, into the Akpotto territory. Igu is the chief town of the Hima, on the right bank. The Igbira people are semi-civilized, peaceful, industrious, and prosperous.

Igel (ē'gel). A village in the Rhine Province, Prussia, near Treves. The Igel monument, or Heidenthurm, is one of the most remarkable Roman monuments in northern Europe. It is a funeral monument of the Secundini family, and is assigned to the end of the 3d century. It consists of a tower 16½ feet square at the base, rising above the basement in two stages, crowned by small pediments and a pyramidal finial. Almost the whole surface is covered with reliefs which represent mythological scenes and symbols, and incidents of every-day life.

Igerna (i-gēr'nä), or Igerne (i-gēr'n'), or Ygerne (i-gēr'n'). In the Arthurian cycle of romance, the wife of Gorlois, and the mother, by Uther, of Arthur.

Iglau (ig'lou). A city in Moravia, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Iglava 48 miles west-northwest of Brünn. It has flourishing manufactures of plush, etc. A treaty was concluded here in 1436 between the Hussites and Sigismund, who was recognized as king of Bohemia. Population (1890), 23,716.

Iglesias (ē-glä'sē-ās). A town in the province of Cagliari, Sardinia, Italy, 32 miles west by north of Cagliari. It has a cathedral. Population, 7,000.

Iglesias, José Maria. Born at Mexico City, Jan. 5, 1823. A Mexican politician, lawyer, and author. He was a member of the cabinet of Comonfort in 1857, and of that of Juárez in 1853. He became president of the Supreme Court in 1873, and by virtue of that office assumed the presidency after the downfall of Lerdo in 1876; but the success of Díaz compelled him to give up the office. He is the author of several works on Mexican history.

Iglesias, Miguel. Born at Cajamarea, Aug. 18, 1822. A Peruvian general and statesman. He was minister of war in 1880; took a principal part in the defense of Lima, Jan., 1881; and was captured by the Chileans, but escaped. During the confusion of 1883 he assumed the presidency, and signed (Oct. 20, 1883) a treaty of peace with the Chileans. Cáceres refused to recognize Iglesias, and civil war followed. Cáceres occupied Lima Dec. 1, 1885, and both the leaders resigned the government into the hands of an executive ministry, pending an election which resulted in favor of Cáceres. Iglesias then left the country.

Iglesias de la Casa (ē-glā'sē-ās dā lā kā'sā), José. Born at Salamanca, Spain, Oct. 31, 1748; died Aug. 26, 1791. A Spanish poet. His collected poems were published in 1798. "Offended at the low state of morals in his native city, he indulged himself at first in the free forms of Castilian satire: ballads, apologies, epigrams, and especially the half-simple, half-magical letrillas, in which he was eminently successful." Ticknor.

Igló (ig'lo), or Neudorf (noi'dorf). A mining town in the county of Zips, Hungary, situated on the Hernád in lat. 48° 56' N., long. 20° 33' E. Population (1890), 7,345.

Ignacio (ēg-nā'sē-ō), Joaquim José, Marquis of Inhauma from Sept. 17, 1867, and Viscount 1868. Born at Lisbon, Portugal, July 30, 1808; died at Rio de Janeiro, March 8, 1869. A Brazilian naval officer. He distinguished himself in many actions from 1822; was minister of marine 1861; and commanded the Brazilian flotilla in the Paraguayan war 1867 and 1868. His brilliant passage of Humaitá (Feb. 19, 1868) was his greatest exploit. He became full admiral shortly before his death.

Ignatieff (ig-nā'tyef), Nikolai Pavlovitch. Born at St. Petersburg, Jan. 29, 1832. A Russian diplomatist. He was ambassador at Peking 1859-1863, and at Constantinople 1864-77; was influential in negotiating the treaty of San Stefano in 1878; and was minister of the interior 1881-82.

Ignatius (ig-nā'shi-us), Saint, surnamed Theophorus (L. Deifer, lit. 'God-bearer'). [L., from Gr. Ἰγνάριος, ardent, fiery; F. Ignace, It. Ignazio, Sp. Ignacio, Inigo, Pg. Ignacio, G. Ignaz.] Died between 104-117 A. D. A bishop of Antioch who, according to the tradition, suffered martyrdom under Trajan. He was the reputed author of epistles to the Ephesians, Romans, Polycarp, etc. (edited in "Corpus Ignatianum," 1840).

Ignatius de Loyola. See Loyola.

Ignoramus (ig-nō-rā'mus). A famous acedemical comedy written by George Ruggle, 1615, as a personal satire. It is a mixture of the iambs of Plautus (from whom it was taken through the Italian) and Latin and English prose.

Igor (ē'gor), Song of the Band of. A Russian epic poem, describing the struggle of Igor, prince of Novgorod-Severski, with the pagan hordes from the southwest. It is supposed by some authors to have been inspired by Homer. It is the most ancient of the Russian epics of the middle ages, and the prototype of all. The MS. was burned in the great fire at Moscow (1812). The story had, however, been edited by Pushkin.

Igu (ē'gō). See Igbira.

Iguála, Plan of. See Irbide, Agustín de.

Igalada (ē-gwā-lā'tná). A town in the province of Barcelona, Spain, situated on the Noya 35 miles northwest of Barcelona. Population (1887), 10,201.

Igavium (i-gū'vi-um). An ancient name of Gubbio.

Ijashne (i-jash'ne). [Gujrati for the Pahlavi yajshn, from yaz, yas, to worship by sacrifices and prayers, kindred with Avestan yasna, Skt. yajna, sacrifice.] The name of the ceremony attending, among the Parsees, the solemn recital of the Yasna. See Aesta. In it are used consecrated water, a kind of bread, butter, fresh milk, meat, the branches of the Iloma plant with one of the pomegranate, the juice of the Iloma plant, the hair of an ox, and a bundle of twigs tied together by means of a reed, evidently relics of ancient sacrificial usages agreeing in part with the Brahmanic.

Ikelemba (ē-kā-lēm'bā), or Ikelembé (-be). A southern tributary of the Kongo, which it joins near the equator.

Ikenild Street. See Icknield.

Ilanz (ē'lānts), Romansh Glion (lvē-ōn'). A town in the canton of Grisons, Switzerland, on the Vorder Rhein at the junction of the Lugnetz valley, 17 miles west of Coire. It was the old capital of the Gray League.

Ilchester (il'ches-tēr), formerly Ivelchester (iv'el-ches-tēr). A small decayed town in Somerset, England, situated on the Ye 31 miles southwest of Bath. It was the birthplace of Roger Bacon.

Ilderim (il'de-rim). See Bajazet.

Île-de-France (ēl-dē-frōns'), Isle of France. 1. An ancient government of France. Capital, Paris. It was bounded by Picardy on the north, Champagne on the east, Orléans on the south, and Normandy on the west; and was so called because included between the rivers Seine, Marne, Aisne, Oise, and Oureq. It corresponded to the department of Seine, with a large part of Seine-et-Oise, Seine-et-Marne, Aisne, and Oise, and small parts of Nièvre and Loiret. It was the portion of the country about Paris that was most completely under the control of the kings—i. e., the royal domain.

2. Mauritius. Iletz (ē-lets'k'). A town in the government of Orenburg, Russia, near the junction of the Ilek and Ural. Population, 7,355.

Ilheos (ēl-yā'ōs). A former hereditary captaincy of Brazil, corresponding to the coast from Bahia 50 leagues southward. It was settled in 1535, prospered for a time, but fell into decay, and in the 18th century was incorporated with Bahia.

Ili (ē'lē). 1. A river in central Asia, flowing into Lake Balkash about lat. 45° 40' N., long. 74° 20' E. Length, from 800 to 900 miles; navigable in its lower course.—2. A colonial dependency of China, situated about lat. 36°-49° N., long. 71°-96° E. The surface is elevated. It is divided into the North Circuit (Sungaria) and the South Circuit (East Turkestan).

3. See Kuldja.

Iliad (il'i-ad), The. [Gr. Ἰλιάς, from Ἴλιον, Πίον, Troy.] A famous Greek epic poem, composed, according to tradition, by the poet Homer (see Homer): with its companion poem, the Odyssey, the greatest of epics and "among the most ancient, if not the most ancient, works of the human spirit in a European tongue" (Gardner). The subject of the Iliad is the ten years' siege of Ilium or Troy by the confederated states of Greece under Agamemnon, king of Mycenae, to redress the injury done to Menelaus, king of Sparta, in the carrying off of his wife, Helen, by the Trojan Paris, to whom Helen was given by Aphrodite as a reward for his decision in favor of Aphrodite in the contest of beauty between her, Athene, and Hera. The direct narrative relates only to a part of the last year, leaving the fall of the city untold. The mighty deeds of the Greek Achilles and of the Trojan Hector, son of King Priam, supply some of the chief episodes of the poem.

Ilíniza. See Ilíniza.

Ilissus (i-lis'us). [Gr. Ἰλισσός.] A small river in Attica, Greece, flowing through Athens.

Ilithyia (il-i-thi'yā). [Gr. Ἰλιθία.] In Greek mythology, the goddess who presides over childbirth; corresponding to the Roman Lucina.

Ilium (il'i-um). [Gr. Ἰλιον, ἡ Ἰλιάς.] In ancient geography, a place in Mysia, Asia Minor, identified by the Greeks with the legendary Troy. It was frequently destroyed in prehistoric times; was rebuilt by Greek colonists in the 6th century B. C.; was enlarged by Lysimachus at the end of the 4th century B. C.; and continued (as New Ilium) to late Roman times. Its site has been identified by Schliemann at Hisarlik, about 100 miles north by west of Smyrna. Compare Troy.

Ilkeston (il'kes-tōn). A town in Derbyshire, England, 8 miles northeast of Derby. Population (1891), 19,744.

Ilkley (ilk'li). A watering-place in Yorkshire, England, on the Wharfe northwest of Bradford. Population (1891), 5,767.

Ilkshidites. See the extract.

Egypt, during the ninth and tenth centuries, was the theatre of several revolutions. Two dynasties of Turkish slaves, the Tulunides and the Ilkshidites, established themselves in that country, which was only reunited to the Caliphate of Bagdad for a brief period between their usurpations. Freeman, Hist. Saracens, p. 111.

Ill (ēl). A river in Alsace which joins the Rhine 7 miles below Strasburg. Length, about 125 miles; navigable from near Colmar.

Ilia-tisci (ēl'yā-tēk'sē). One of the names or titles given by the ancient Peruvians to their supreme deity, Uiracocha (which see). Also written Ilia-tici or Ilia-ticci.

Ille (ēl). A town in the department of Pyrénées-Orientales, France, on the Tet west of Perpignan. Population (1891), commune, 3,341.

It is bounded by the English Channel and Manche on the north, Mayenne on the east, Loire-Inférieure on the south, and Côtes-du-Nord and Morbihan on the west. It formed part of the ancient Brittany. Area, 2,596 square miles. Population (1891), 626,875.

Iller (il'ler). A tributary of the Danube, which it joins near Ulm. It forms part of the boundary between Wurtemberg and Bavaria. Length, about 160 miles. Illiberis (i-lib'ē-ris). An important Roman city in Spain, near the modern Atarfé and Granada.

Illiez, Val d'. See Val d'Illic.

Illiger (il'li-ger), Johann Karl Wilhelm. Born at Brunswiek, Germany, Nov. 19, 1775; died at Berlin, May 9-10, 1813. A German naturalist. He edited a "Magazin für Insektenkunde," and published "Prodromus systematis mammalium et avium," etc.

Illimani (ēl-yē-mā'nē). A mountain in the Bolivian Andes, immediately east-southeast of La Paz. Height, 21,030 feet.

Ilíniza (ēl-yē-nē'thā), or Ilíniza (ē-lē-nē'thā). A mountain in Ecuador, about 17,400 feet high. See the extract.

This mountain is probably seventh in rank of the Great Andes of the Equator. It is slightly inferior in elevation to Sangai, and is loftier than Carlinuairazo. It has two peaks, or rather it is composed of two mountains that are grouped together, the more northern of which is the lower, and is called Little Ilíniza. The summits of both are sharp, and during the time of our stay in Ecuador they were completely covered by snow. Whymper, Travels amongst the Great Andes of the Equator, p. 130.

Illinois (il-i-noi' or -noiz'). A confederacy of North American Indians, formerly occupying Illinois and adjacent parts of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Missouri. They were allies of the French, and therefore the Iroquois in 1675 began a long and destructive war against them. The name is from Illini, 'man': their own plural uk was changed by the French to their plural ending ois. Their five principal component tribes were Peoria, Kaskaskia, Cahokia, Tamaroa, and Michigamea. The assassination of Pontiac by a Kaskaskia in 1765 was avenged by the Lake tribes in a war of destruction. The present number at the Quappaw agency, Indian Territory, is only 165. See Algonquian.

Illinois (il-i-noi' or -noiz'). One of the Central States of the United States of America. Capital, Springfield; chief city, Chicago. It is bounded by Wisconsin on the north and Lake Michigan and Indiana on the east, and is separated by the Ohio from Kentucky on the south, and by the Mississippi from Iowa and Missouri on the west. The surface is generally level. The chief mineral products are coal and lead. It is one of the chief states in the production of corn, wheat, and oats, and has flourishing manufactures. It is the first state in mileage of railways, and the third in population; has 102 counties; sends 2 senators and 22 representatives to Congress; and has 24 electoral votes. It was settled by the French at Kaskaskia and elsewhere in 1682; was ceded to Great Britain in 1763, and to the United States in 1783; became part of the Northwest Territory in 1787, and part of Indiana Territory in 1800; was made a separate Territory in 1809; and was admitted to the Union in 1818. Among later events were Black Hawk's war in 1832, and the Mormon troubles, culminating in 1844. Area, 56,650 square miles. Population (1890), 3,253,351.

Illinois. A river in the State of Illinois, formed by the junction of the Des Plaines and Kankakee in Grundy County, 40 miles southwest of Chicago. It joins the Mississippi 16 miles above Alton, and is connected by the Illinois and Michigan Canal with Lake Michigan. Total length, about 500 miles; navigable 245 miles.

Illuminated Doctor, The, L. Doctor Illuminatus (dok'tor i-lū-mi-nā'tus). A surname given to the scholastic philosopher Raymond Lully (1235-1315), and also to the German mystic Johann Tauler (1300-1361).

Illuminati (i-lū-mi-nā'ti). [L., 'the enlightened.'] A name given to different religious societies or sects because of their claim to perfection or enlightenment in religious matters. The most noted among them were the Alumbrados ('the Enlightened') of Spain in the 16th century; an ephemeral society of Belgium and northern France (also called Guérinists) in the 17th century; and an association of mystics in southern France in the 18th century, combining the doctrines of Swedenborg with the methods of the Freemasons.

Illuminator (i-lū'mi-nā-tōr). A surname given to Gregory of Armenia.

Illusion Comique (ē-lū-zyon' kō-mēk'), L'. A tragicomedy by Corneille, issued in 1636, "of the extremest Spanish type, complicated and improbable to a degree in its action, which turns on the motive of a play within a play, and produces, as the author himself remarks, a division into prologue (Act i.), an imperfect comedy (Acts ii.-iv.), and a tragedy (Act v.)" (Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 295).

Illusions Perdus (pār-dū'). Les. [F., 'lost illusions.'] A work by Balzac, in 3 parts, written in 1837-39-43. He drew in it a picture of the feuilletonists which exasperated the press against him.

Illyria (i-lir'i-ā), F. Illyrie (ē-lē-rē'), G. Illyrien (il-lē'rē-en). [Gr. Ἰλλυρία or Ἰλλυρία.] A region on the western coast of the Balkan peninsula, north of Greece proper. Its boundaries are vague. It is included now in Montenegro and parts of the Austrian and Turkish empires. The southern part of it came early under Greek influence. The kingdom of Illyria, with Scodra as its capital, was important in the 3d century B. C., and was overthrown by Rome in 168 B. C. For the ecclesiastical Illyricum and the modern Illyria, see below.

The use of the name Illyria is at all times very vague; but it has a more definite meaning as the name of a kingdom whose capital was Skodra, and which, in the second half of the third century, was a dangerous neighbour to the Greek cities and islands on that coast.

Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 62.

The same remarks apply to the second branch of people occupying the north-west of the Balkan Peninsula, the Illyrians: the last linguistic remains of this branch are preserved in modern Albanian. According to the probable opinion expressed by H. Kiepert (Lehrb. d. alten Geographie, p. 240, f.), this tribe in pre-Hellenic times was widely spread over Greece under the name of Leleges.

Schrader, Aryan Peoples (tr. by Jevons), p. 430.

Illyria. A titular kingdom belonging to the Cisleithan division of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, comprising the five crownlands Carinthia, Carniola, Istria, Triest, and Görz and Gradiska, formed from the Illyrian Provinces ceded to Austria 1815.

Illyrian (i-lir'i-an) Provinces. A state under French control, formed by Napoleon in 1809 out of cessions by Austria. It comprised Carniola, Dalmatia, Istria, Fiume, Trieste, Gorz and Gradiska, and parts of Carinthia and Croatia. Restored 1815.

Illyricum (i-lir'i-kun). [Gr. Ἰλλυρικός.] 1. One of the four great prefectures into which the later Roman Empire was divided. It comprised the dioceses of Macedonia and Dacia, and corresponded generally to Greece, Crete, Macedonia, Albania, and Servia. 2. A diocese of the later Roman prefecture of Italy. It comprised Noricum, Dalmatia, and Panonia (that is, nearly all of Bosnia and that part of Austria between the Danube and the Adriatic).

Ilmen (il'men), Lake. A lake in the government of Novgorod, Russia, about 100 miles south-southeast of St. Petersburg. It discharges by the river Volkhoff into Lake Ladoga.

Inca (ing'kä) Empire. The region ruled by the Incas. At first it was confined to the immediate vicinity of Cuzco. To this were successively added the neighboring valleys, the Titicaca basin, parts of the eastern slope of the Andes, the Peruvian coast, Quito with the neighboring coast-regions, and northern Chile. In its greatest extent, under Huaina Capac, it included nearly all the highlands of Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, and northern Chile. Its length, from the river Ancasmayu, north of Quito, to the river Maule in Chile, was about 2,200 miles. The breadth varied from 400 or more to 100 miles. See Incas.

Inca Manco. See Manco.

Inca Rocca (ēn'kä rōk'kä), called Sinchi Rocca (sēn'kē rō'kä) by Montesinos. The sixth Inca sovereign of Peru. He reigned about the middle of the 14th century, and his conquests were not extensive. He is best known as the founder of public works, remains of which may still be traced at Cuzco. Blas Valera says that he held the crown more than 50 years, but this is very doubtful.

Incas (ing'käz). [Quichua, 'chiefs' or 'lords.'] The reigning and aristocratic order in ancient Peru from the 13th to the 16th century. Markham and others believe that they were originally a tribe or family of the Quichuas who inhabited certain valleys near Cuzco and first became dominant under Manco Capac about 1240. Their own traditions described Manco Capac as a child of the Sun. From him descended the twelve other historical sovereigns of Peru, the last reigning one being Huascar, though the lineage was preserved long after. These sovereigns (the Incas in a restricted sense) always married their own sisters, and the throne was inherited, in general, by the oldest son proceeding from this marriage. Children by their other wives could not, by custom or law, receive the crown, though this rule was broken when Atahualpa inherited a part of the empire in 1533. The rule of the Incas was absolute, but very mild, and may be described as an extreme form of state socialism with a despotic head: lands and a large proportion of goods were held in common. The Incas, as an order, retained all the important civil and military offices, and the sacerdotal offices were confined to them: thus the sovereign was the head not only of the state and the army, but of the priesthood. It has been stated that the Incas used a language distinct from the Quichua, but this is improbable. The word Incas is often used for the whole Quichua race. See Quichuas and Peru.

Ince-in-Makerfield (ins'in-mā'kēr-fēld). A town in Lancashire, England, near Wigan, 17 miles northeast of Liverpool. Population (1891), 19,255.

The Continental Congress assembled here, and Washington was here chosen commander-in-chief in 1775. The building is now used as a museum of relics connected with the history of the country.

Inderab. See Anderab.

Index Expurgatorius (in'deks eks-pēr-gā-tō'ri-us). ['Expurgatory Index.'] Catalogues of books comprising respectively those which Roman Catholics are absolutely forbidden to read, and those which they must not read unless in editions expurgated of objectionable passages. They are prepared by the Congregation of the Index, a body of cardinals and their assistants. Pope Paul IV. published a list of forbidden books in 1557 and 1559. The Council of Trent in 1562 attempted the regulation of the matter, but finally referred it to the Pope. He (Pius IV.) published the "Index Tridentinus" in 1564, often reprinted, with additions, under the title "Index Librorum Prohibitorum."

In 1539 Charles the Fifth obtained a Papal bull authorizing him to procure from the University of Louvain, in Flanders, where the Lutheran controversy would naturally be better understood than in Spain, a list of books dangerous to be introduced into his dominions. It was printed in 1546, and was the first "Index Expurgatorius" published under Spanish authority, and the second in the world. Subsequently it was submitted by the Emperor to the Supreme Council of the Inquisition, under whose authority additions were made to it; after which it was promulgated anew in 1550. Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 422.

India (in'di-ā). [Formerly also Indie (still used, in the plural, in East Indies and West Indies) and Inde; F. Indie, Sp. Pg. It. India, G. Indien, from L. India, Gr. Ἰνδία, from Indi, Gr. Ἰνδοί, the inhabitants.] An extensive region in southern Asia. The name India is and has been used with very different meanings. With the ancients it meant the country of the Indus; later it was extended through the peninsula, and sometimes made to include further India and the northern islands of the Malay Archipelago. In modern times it may mean what is sometimes called Hither or Nearer India, the peninsula whose natural boundaries are the Indian Ocean, the Suliman Mountains, the Himalayas, and the hill-ranges east of Bengal: in this sense it is not so inclusive as the political India (i. e., British India), but includes on the other hand the French and Portuguese possessions. (See Pondicherry, Goa, Mohé, Karikal, Panjim, Daman, Diu.) The name India is also sometimes used for the two peninsulas of Hither and Further India, and sometimes as nearly equivalent to East Indies. The ordinary meaning, however, is British India, or the Indian Empire, officially called India. This includes Bengal, Madras, Bombay, Sind, Aden, Assam, Berars, Ajmere, Central Provinces, Coorg, Northwest Provinces, Oudh, Punjab, Lower Burma, Upper Burma, Andamans, and Quetta and the Bolan, having an area of 964,992 square miles, and a population (1891) of 221,172,952. In addition there are the feudatory native states, including Hyderabad, Mysore, Kashmir, Baroda, states in Rajputana, and states in connection with the Central Provinces, Central India, Panjab, Bengal, Madras, Bombay, Northwest Provinces, etc. Their area is 595,167 square miles, with a population (1891) of 66,050,479. Total area of India, 1,560,159 square miles. Population (1891), 287,223,431. The approximate population of other regions under British supervision, including Sikkim, British Baluchistan, tribes on the Burmese frontier, etc., is about 600,000. The most important exports of India are wheat, rice, cotton, opium, oil-seeds, jute, hides, tea, and indigo. The capital is Calcutta. Government is vested in a secretary of state for India (in London), with a council of about 10 (also in London). In India the government is administered by a governor-general appointed by the crown, a council with a centralized system of governors, etc., for provinces, and commissioners and deputy commissioners for divisions and districts. About three-fourths of the inhabitants are Hindus in religion; Mohammedans come next (over 50,000,000). "To them [the Greeks] for a long time the word India was for practical purposes what it was etymologically, the valley of the Indus. Meanwhile in India itself it did not seem so natural as it seems to us to give one name to the whole region. For there is a very marked difference between the northern and southern parts of it. The great Aryan community which spoke Sanskrit and invented Brahminism spread itself chiefly from the Panjab along the great valley of the Ganges, but not at first far southward. Accordingly the name Hindostan properly belongs to this northern region. . . . It appears then that India is not a political name, but only a geographical expression like Europe or Africa." (J. R. Seeley, Expansion of England, p. 222.) India, mentioned in Esther i. l. viii. 9, as the limit of the territories of Ahasuerus on the east, denotes probably the country surrounding the Indus, the Panjab. The name Indu (Hindu) also occurs in the cuneiform inscription of Nakhsh-i-Rustem. Whether and how India was known to the Phenicians, Hebrews, and Assyro-Babylonians before the Persian kings is uncertain. The view that Ophir, whither the mercantile fleet of Solomon and Hiram went, was in India, has been generally given up. The knowledge of the ancients concerning India, before the expeditions of Alexander the Great and Seleucus I., was in general very limited. West India (India intra Gangem) was to the Greeks and Romans the land east of the Iranian highland and south of the Imaxus. Alexander the Great penetrated India as far as the Hyphasis in the east and the mouth of the Indus in the south. The island of Ceylon was known by the name of Taprobane, or Salike, the inhabitants being called Sala. Still less comprehensive and accurate was their knowledge of East India (India extra Gangem). Alongside of a land of gold, silver, and copper is mentioned a golden peninsula, by which probably Malacca was meant. As names of the islands of the Indian Archipelago occur "the island of the Good God" (γαθοῦ θεοῦ), perhaps meaning Sumatra, and Jabadin, doubtless Java. The chief authenticated facts of Indian history are the following: the passage by Aryan tribes of the northern and northwestern mountain passes, and their settlement in the plains, at an unknown period; founding of Buddhism, 6th century B. C.; conquest of the Panjab by Alexander the Great, 327-325 B. C.; a Greco-Bactrian kingdom in India down to about the 2d century B. C., the so-called Scythian invasions following or accompanying this; Buddhism displaced by Brahmanism, about the 6th century of our era; invasion of Mahmud of Ghazni (the first Mohammedan invasion), 1001; invasion of Timur, 1398; expedition of Vasco da Gama, 1498; permanent settlement of the Portuguese at Goa, 1510; foundation of the Mogul empire by Baber, 1526; reign of Akbar, 1556-1605; formation of the English East India Company, 1600, and of the Dutch East India Company, 1602; rise of the Marhatta power under Sivaji, 1657; death of Aurung-Zeb and beginning of the Mogul decay, 1707; rivalry of French and English in India at its height in the time of Dupleix, about 1748; Clive's victory at Plassey, 1757, followed by the acquisition of Bengal and Behar; acquisitions made under the administrations of Warren Hastings (1772-85), Wellesley, Cornwallis, Minto, Marquis of Hastings, Amherst, Dalhousie; Carnatic annexed, 1801; British (Lower) Burma annexed, 1826 and 1852; first Afghan war, 1838-42; annexation of Sind, 1843; annexation of the Panjab, 1849; Sepoy Mutiny, 1857 (suppressed, 1858); transference of the administration from the East India Company to the crown, 1858; Queen Victoria proclaimed Empress of India, 1877; second Afghan war, 1878-80; annexation of Upper Burma, 1886. Recent events have been the building of the Sind-Quetta Railway toward the Afghan frontier, the acquisition of certain territories in Baluchistan, the suppression of the Hunza-Nagar insurrection in 1891, the Manipur revolt in 1891, etc.

India, British. Same as India, in the present official sense; or, more strictly, that part which is under direct British administration, excluding the native states. See India.

India, Further, or Indo-China (in 'dō-chi-nā), or India beyond the Ganges. The southeastern peninsula of Asia, including Burma, Siam, Cambodia, Cochiu-China, Annam, Tongking, Straits Settlements, etc.

India, Hither or Nearer. The great central peninsula in southern Asia, with the natural boundaries as described under India.

Indiana (in-di-an'ä). [NL., 'land of Indians.'] One of the Central States of the United States. Capital, Indianapolis. It is bounded by Lake Michigan and Michigan on the north, Ohio on the east, Illinois on the west, and Kentucky (separated by the Ohio) on the south. The surface is generally level and undulating. The leading occupation is agriculture. Indiana is one of the chief States in the production of wheat, and the sixth state in population. It has 92 counties; sends 2 senators and 13 representatives to Congress; and has 15 electoral votes. It was settled by the French at Vincennes and elsewhere early in the 18th century; was ceded to Great Britain in 1763, and to the United States in 1783; became part of the Northwest Territory in 1787; and was made a separate Territory in 1800. The battle of Tippecanoe occurred within its limits in 1811. It was admitted to the Union in 1816. Area, 36,350 square miles. Population (1890), 2,192,404.

Indiana. A novel by George Sand, published in 1831.

Indiana. A character in Steele's "Conscious Lovers." Mrs. Cibber made a great hit in this part.

Indianapolis (in 'di-a-nap'ō-lis). The capital of Indiana and of Marion County, situated on the West Fork of White River, in lat. 39° 45' N., long. 86° 6' W., nearly at the geographical center of the State. It is the chief city in the State, and an important railway center, and has a large trade in grain. Among its chief industries are pork-packing and milling. It was laid out in 1821, and was chartered as a city in 1847. Population (1890), 105,436.

Indian Archipelago. See Malay Archipelago.

Indian Council. See Council of the Indies.

Indian Emperor, The, or the Conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards. A play by Dryden, a sequel to "The Indian Queen," produced in 1665.

Indian Empire. Same as British India. See India.

Indian Mutiny, or Sepoy Mutiny. The revolt against British authority in India 1857-58. Its immediate cause was the introduction into the Sepoy army of a new rifle whose use required the touching of grease (on the cartridge): this offended the religious prejudices of the soldiers. The mutiny began at Meerut May 10. The centers of activity were Delhi, Cawnpore (where in July a massacre of the Europeans was ordered by Nana Sahib), and Lucknow. Lucknow's garrison was relieved by Havelock in September, and again by Campbell in November; Delhi was besieged and taken in 1857; Lucknow was finally cooped in March, 1858; and the last resistance was suppressed in 1858. The last Mogul (titular emperor) was banished.

Indian Ocean. The part of the ocean lying between Asia on the north, Africa on the west, the Malay Archipelago and Australia on the east, and an arbitrary line (about lat. 38° S.) connecting the southern extremities of Australia and Africa on the south. Its chief arms are the Bay of Bengal and the Arabian Sea (with the Persian Gulf and Red Sea). It contains Madagascar, Mascarene Islands, Socotra, Ceylon, Andaman Islands, Nicobar Islands, Lakadive Islands, and Maldivo Islands. It receives the drainage of the Zambezi, Euphrates and Tigris, Indus, Ganges, Brahmaputra, Irawadi, and the rivers of the Deccan. Length from the Cape of Good Hope to Tasmania, about 6,000 miles. Average depth, about 14,000 feet.

Indian Queen, The. A tragedy in five acts by Sir Robert Howard and John Dryden, produced in 1664.

Indian Territory. A territory of the United States. It is bounded by Kansas on the north, Missouri and Arkansas on the east, Texas on the south, and Oklahoma on the west. Its surface is generally level and rolling. Herding is the chief industry. It is unorganized. The Indian tribes Cherokee, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles conduct their own affairs. Tahlequah in the Cherokee land is the chief town. The region was acquired in 1803 and 1845. In 1834 it was set apart for the Indians who were removed during this period from their original homes. The portion north of lat. 37° was ceded afterward by the Indians to the United States. In the Civil War the Indians sided with the Confederates. (For the setting apart of Oklahoma, see Oklahoma.) Area (1890), 31,400 square miles. Population (1890), 186,400.

Indians (in 'di-anz) (of North America). The aboriginal inhabitants of North America. They were so named on the supposition that the lands discovered by the early navigators were parts of India: the erroneous name has continued in use, notwithstanding attempts at its correction. Schoolcraft invented for the North Americans the names Algie, to denote the people of the eastern coast; Abanic, for those west of the Mississippi; and Ostic, for those who live between these limits; but no other writer has used them. The latest attempt, equally unsuccessful, calls the North American tribes Aconco-Marañonians—Marañon being a name for the river Amazon, and Aconco a word connected with a Northern myth. Serious mistakes in governmental practice as well as in theories came from errors in the names of the ethnic divisions of North America. Each tribe called itself by a name in its own language which often was metaphorical and varying; and its several neighbors called it in their languages by other names, which, according to their existing relations, might be terms of obloquy, of friendship, or of simple topographic description. The methods adopted by the French, English, Spanish, and Dutch to express the native pronunciation added to the confusion, and a large proportion of these various forms afterward appeared in literature and in statistics, the population (which was itself multiplied through fear or through interest) being sometimes duplicated over and over again, and thus vastly exaggerated in the best official estimates. Subsequently many of the erroneous names disappeared, and then it was inferred that the tribes so named had become extinct. From these errors arose, mainly, the opinion, still generally entertained, that the rapid extinction of the North Americans is without a parallel in history, and that it is due to an inherent defect, styled sera natura, through which civilization is fatal to the part of the human race found in the western hemisphere. The present number of Indians in the United States is about 300,000. The number in British America is not so accurately known, and that in Mexico, being more affected by mixture of blood, is still less determinable. Besides the actually ascertained errors in nomenclature, other considerations affect the questions concerning population, habitat, and migrations, upon which, together with language, a proper classification depends. Before the European invasion the North American tribes had reached a state of quasi-equilibrium, and were sedentary to the extent that their territories were recognized, and, though many of them held districts too large for actual occupancy, the limits were substantially defined. While agriculture had commenced in some parts of the present area of the United States, and was spreading, it nowhere sufficed to replace hunting, which demands enormous areas per capita for support; and the population had not increased, except perhaps in a small part of California, so as to press upon the food-supply. Contrary to the current opinion, the Indians were not nomadic until after the arrival of Europeans, who drove many tribes from their established seats to those occupied by other tribes; and from the same Europeans they procured the horse and firearms, both of which were necessary to a nomadic life under the existing conditions. The wars with the invaders and those occasioned by their pressure, in which firearms were used, were far more destructive than the former quarrels between tribes. The losses and gains of most of the tribes during recent decades are now known with sufficient precision to allow an estimate of the effect of civilization upon them. In this connection it must be noted as important that many individuals of aboriginal blood have disappeared from the numerical strength of tribes, not by extinction but by absorption. From all these considerations it is concluded that the Indian population of North America at the time of the Columbian discovery was not very greatly in excess of that now extant. The Bureau of Ethnology, established by Congress in 1879, has brought the classification and nomenclature of the Indians of North America into system and approximate accuracy. The tribes in British America, Lower California, and the United States, including those found both north and south of the Mexican border and excluding the remainder of Mexico, are divided into 57 linguistic families or stocks, fundamentally differing from each other, and often apparently as distinct as the Aryan and Sryan linguistic stocks. In all the stocks were languages, sometimes but one being now known, sometimes many, the differences between which were such that the speakers failed either entirely or in large part to understand each other. The names assigned to these stocks in this work are those given by the authority who first recognized each particular stock in a publication; and the termination an or ian is now added to each to distinguish between the stock names and tribal names, many of which without such distinction would be identical and confusing. The 57 linguistic families or stocks in the territory mentioned are as follows: Algonquian, Athapascan, Attacapan, Beotlinkan, Caddoan, Chinakuan, Chimarikan, Chimmesyan, Chinookan, Chitimachan, Chumashan, Coahuiltecan, Copehan, Costanoan, Eskimauan, Esselenian, Iroquoian, Kalapooian, Karankawan, Keresan, Kiowan, Kitunahan, Kolushan, Kulapanan, Kusan, Lutuamian, Mariposan, Moquelumnan, Mnskhogean, Natchesan, Palaihnihan, Piman, Pujunan, Quoratean, Salinan, Salishan, Sasteau, Sahaptian, Shoshonean, Siouan, Skittaretan, Takilman, Tanoan, Timuquanan, Tonikan, Tonkawan, Uchean, Waitatpanan, Wakashan, Washoan, Weitspekan, Wishoskan, Yakonan, Yanan, Yukian, Yuman, and Zuñian. These stocks differ widely in the amount of territory occupied, in the number of component tribes, and in the number of individuals identified as belonging to them. Some claimed the combined areas of a number of the present States and Territories of the United States, while the known habitat of others was not more than a modern county or township. Some are differentiated by the language of a single tribe now known; others comprise many tribes, those of the Algonquian stock amounting to 600 separately named divisions, each one of which has been regarded by some authority to be a tribe. Some are extinct, or are represented only by a score of living persons, while others number tens of thousands. The first subdivision of the linguistic stocks, more permanent than temporary alliances or leagues for special purposes, is the "confederacy"; but it is not a constant basis of classification. It is noticed in certain stocks where several neighboring tribes have acted together for a considerable period in an approach to the nationality common in civilization. These confederacies do not embrace all the tribes of any stock, and are not confined to people speaking the same language; indeed, interpreters have been required in the councils of a confederacy between the delegates of the component tribes. In this connection it must be noted that tribes of the same linguistic family are often bitter hereditary enemies, so that language does not afford a political classification. The unit of classification is the tribe, which often is indistinguishable from the village. The latter often extended over a considerable area, and was normally composed of widely separated dwellings, each of them the home of a domestic family, though sometimes several families occupied the same dwelling. Another division is the clan or gens; but, as it is neither political nor ethnic, and as it interpenetrates all other divisions, its title is not mentioned in this work. Those appearing here alphabetically as the names of confederacies and tribes are selected as having been the most used in literature, and are not expressed in the determined scientific transliteration which is required for the above-mentioned 57 linguistic stocks, but in the form most frequently found in publications.

Indies (in 'diz), also formerly Indias (in 'di-anz).

The name given by Columbus and early geographers to the American islands and mainland, then supposed to be a part of Asia; later, when their true nature was known, they were distinguished as the West Indies, and the latter term was eventually retained for the islands now bearing that name. Many writers of the 16th century use the word Indies in a restricted sense for the country now included in Mexico.

Indies, Council of the. See Council of the Indies.

Indigirka (in-dē-gir'kā). A river in eastern Siberia, flowing into the Arctic Ocean about lat. 71° 40' N., long. 150° E. Length, about 900 miles.

Indo-China. See India, Further.

Indo-Europeans (in 'dō-ū-rō-pē'aniz). The races speaking the Indo-European languages; Aryans (which see).

I am compelled to opine that the absence of the ass and the camel, together with the presence of the horse, in the pastoral life of the Indo-Europeans, is in favour of their looking for the original abode of the Indo-Europeans rather in the European than the Asiatic portion of the steppe district. Further, the locality [banks of the Volga] proposed by us for the original home of the Indo-Europeans affords the simplest explanation of the manifold points of contact between the Finns and the Indo-Europeans, in language and in habits, to which we have referred in various passages of this work. Schrader, Aryan Peoples (tr. by Jevons), p. 437.

Indonesia (in-dō-nō'shiū). [NL., 'Indian islands.'] A name for the Malay Archipelago.

Indore (in-dōr'). 1. A native state in India, under the control of the Central India Agency. It consists of various detached tracts, partly in the valley of the Nerbudda. It is also called the Holkar's Dominions, from its Maharatta ruler of the Holkar family. It was founded by an adventurer in the middle of the 18th century. The ruler became a prince feudatory to Great Britain in 1818. Area, 9,625 square miles. Population (1891), 1,099,990. 2. The capital of Indore state, situated in lat. 22° 42' N., long. 75° 50' E. Population (1891), 92,329.

Indra (in'drā). The god who, in Vedic theology, stands at the head of the deities of the middle realm—that of the air. The especial manifestation of his power is the battle which he wages in the storm with his thunderbolt (vajra) against the demon Vritra ('surrounder'), Ahi ('confiner'), Shushna (' parcher'), and others, who in the form of mighty serpents or dragons encompass the waters and shut off their path, as well as that of the light, from heaven to earth. He is originally not the supreme, but the national and favorite, god of the Indo-Aryan tribes, and a type of heroic might exerted for noble ends. He becomes more prominent as Varuna gradually obscured. In later times he is subordinated to the triad Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva, but still is the head of the heaven of the gods. He is the subject of many stories in the great epics and the Puranas.

Indraprastha (in-dra-prast'ha). The capital city of the Pandu princes. The name is still known and used for a part of the city of Delhi.

Indre (and'r). A river in central France, joining the Loire 17 miles west-southwest of Tours. Length, about 150 miles.

Indre. A department of central France. Capital, Châteauroux. It is bounded by Loir-et-Cher on the north, Cher on the east, Creuse and Haute-Vienne on the south, Vienne on the west, and Indre-et-Loire on the northwest. The surface is level. It exports grain. It was formed from the ancient Bas-Berry and parts of Orléanais and Marche. Area, 2,624 square miles. Population (1891), 292,868.

Indre-et-Loire (and'r-ē-lwā'r). A department of France. Capital, Tours. It is bounded by Sarthe on the north, Loir-et-Cher on the northeast, Indre on the southeast, Vienne on the south, and Maine-et-Loire on the west, and was formed chiefly from the ancient Touraine. The surface is generally level. The department is traversed by the Loire, whose valley here is called "the garden of France." It produces grain, wine, hemp, fruit, etc. Area, 2,361 square miles. Population (1891), 337,298.

Indulgence, Declarations of. In English history, royal proclamations promising greater religious freedom to nonconformists. The principal were: (a) A proclamation by Charles II. in 1671 or 1672, providing the suspension of penal laws relating to ecclesiastical matters which were directed against nonconformists. It was rejected by Parliament. (b) A proclamation by James II. in 1687, annulling penal laws against Roman Catholics and nonconformists, and abolishing religious tests for office. The refusal to read this declaration by several prelates led to their trial, and was one of the causes of the revolution of 1688.

Indus (in'dus). [Skt. Sindhu.] One of the chief rivers of India. It rises in an unexplored region among the Himalaya of Tibet, about lat. 32° N., long. 82° E. It flows northwest through gorges in Tibet and Kashmir. Near the northern part of Kashmir it turns south and flows through British India (Panjab and Sind) into the Arabian Sea by a delta in about lat. 24° N. Its chief tributaries are the combined rivers of the Panjab (Jhelum, Chenab, Ravi, and Sutlej, through the Panjab) and the Kabul. Length, about 1,800 miles; navigable from Rori.

Ine (ē'ne), or Ini (ē'nē), or Ina (ī'nā). Died 729. King of the West Saxons 688-726. He conquered Kent in 694, defeated the Cymry of Cornwall in 711, and between 690 and 693 published a series of laws, commonly called the Laws of Ine, which form the earliest extant specimens of West-Saxon legislation. He abdicated in 725 or 726, and, with his wife Æthelburh, made a pilgrimage to Rome, where he died.

Ines de Castro. See Castro, Ines de.

Inexpiable War, The. A war between Carthage and her mercenaries, 241-238 B. C. The latter were unsuccessful.

Infant Phenomenon, The (otherwise Ninetta Crummies). Daughter of Vincent Crummies, the theatrical manager, and a supposed shining light in the profession: a character in Charles Dickens's "Nicholas Nickleby."

Inferno (in-fēr'nō; It. pron. in-fer'nō). The. [It., 'hell.'] The first part of Dante's "Divina Commedia." It is divided into 34 cantos. The poet is conducted by Vergil through the realms of hell to an exit "where once was Eden." From here he visits Purgatory (which see).

Inferum Mare (in-fē-rum mā'rē). [L., 'lower sea.'] See Tyrrhenian Sea.

Inflexible (in-flek'si-bl). An iron-clad British twin-screw double-turreted battle-ship. She was launched in April, 1876. Her dimensions are: length, 320 feet; breadth, 75 feet; draught, 25 feet; displacement, 11,400 tons. The armored region consists of a submerged hull with an armored deck 5 or 6 feet below water-line, and a central rectangular redoubt or bulwark carrying two turrets placed diagonally at opposite corners. She carries four 80-ton guns in the turrets.

Ingaños. See Mocacs.

Ingauni (in-gá'nī). In ancient history, a Ligurian tribe which dwelt in northwestern Italy, on the Gulf of Genoa.

abroad at three different periods. He was elected national academician in 1868. He is noted for his coloring and sensitive reproduction of the moods of nature. Among his works are "After the Storm" (1869), "View near Rome" (1871), "St. Peter's," "The Alterglow" (1875), "Spring" (1881), "Niagara Falls" (1883), "Sunset" (1885).

Innisfail (in-'is-fäl). A poetical name of Ireland. Innocent (in-'ö-sent) I., Saint. Died March 12, 417. Bishop of Rome 402-417. During his pontificate Rome was sacked by Alaric (410). He is commemorated in the Roman Catholic Church on July 28.

Innocent II. (Gregorio de' Papi or Papareschi). Died Sept. 23, 1143. Pope 1130-43. He was elected in an irregular manner by a minority of the college of cardinals on the death of Honorius II., whereupon the majority of the cardinals, refusing to recognize the validity of his election, chose Anacletus II. as antipope. He was forced to seek refuge in France, where Bernard of Clairvaux procured his recognition by the court and the clergy. He was installed in the Lateran at Rome by the emperor Lothair in 1133, but did not gain undisputed possession before the death of Anacletus in 1138.

Innocent III. (Giovanni Lothario Conti). Born at Anagni, Italy, in 1161; died at Perugia, Italy, July 16, 1216. Pope 1198-1216. He was the son of Count Trasimundo, of the house of Conti, and Claricia, a descendant of the house of Scotti at Rome; was educated at Rome, Paris, and Bologna; became a canon of St. Peter's in 1181, and cardinal deacon of St. Sergius and St. Bacchus in 1190; and was crowned pope Feb. 22, 1198. Following in the footsteps of Gregory VII., he made it the chief aim of his ecclesiastical policy to vindicate the papal claim of the supremacy of the church over the state. He forced Philip Augustus of France to take back his repudiated queen, Ingeburga of Denmark, in 1200; instigated the fourth Crusade (1202-04), the chief result of which was the capture of Constantinople from the Greeks and the establishment of the Latin Empire; deposed Otto IV., emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, and in 1215 crowned his former ward, Frederick of Sicily, emperor; compelled in 1213 John of England, who refused to accept Stephen Langton, the papal nominee to the archbishopric of Canterbury, to acknowledge the feudal sovereignty of the Pope and to pay an annual tribute; ordered the crusade against the Albigenses in 1208; and presided at the fourth Lateran Council in 1215. During his pontificate the papal power attained its greatest height.

Innocent IV. (Senibaldi di Fieschi). Died at Naples, Dec. 7, 1254. Pope 1243-54. He inherited from his predecessors a feud with the emperor Frederick II., who had been excommunicated by Gregory IX. in 1239. After the death of Frederick in 1250, and of his son the emperor Conrad IV. in 1254, the struggle was continued with Manfred, the uncle and guardian of Conrad's son, Conradin of Sicily, who inflicted a decisive defeat on the papal troops 5 days before Innocent's death.

Innocent V. (Pietro di Tarantasia). Born in 1225; died at Rome, June 22, 1276. Pope Jan. 20-June 22, 1276.

Innocent VI. (Étienne Albert). Born at Brissac, France; died Sept. 12, 1362. Pope 1352-62. He kept his court at Avignon.

Innocent VII. (Cosimo de' Migliorati). Born at Sulmona, Abruzzi, Italy, 1336; died at Rome, Nov. 6, 1406. Pope 1404-06. He was opposed by the antipope Benedict XIII., who resided at Avignon.

Innocent VIII. (Giovanni Battista Cibo). Born at Genoa, 1432; died July 25, 1492. Pope 1484-92. He was involved in war with Ferdinand of Naples, whose crown he offered to Reinaldus, duke of Lorraine; and kept Zezim, brother of the sultan Bajazet, a close prisoner in consideration of an annual payment of 40,000 ducats and the gift of the sacred spear said to have pierced the side of the Saviour.

Innocent IX. (Giovanni Antonio Facchinetti). Born at Bologna, Italy, 1519; died Dec. 30, 1591. Pope Oct. 29-Dec. 30, 1591.

Innocent X. (Giovanni Battista Pamfili). Born at Rome, 1572; died Jan. 7, 1655. Pope 1644-55. He condemned the treaty of Westphalia in 1651, and the Jansenist heresy in 1653.

Innocent XI. (Benedetto Odescalchi). Born at Como, Italy, 1611; died Aug. 12, 1689. Pope 1676-89.

Innocent XII. (Antonio Pignatelli). Born at Naples, March 13, 1615; died Sept. 27, 1700. Pope 1691-1700.

Innocent XIII. (Michelangelo Conti). Born at Rome, May 15, 1655; died March 7, 1724. Pope 1721-24.

Innsbruck (ins-'brök), or Innspruck. The capital of Tyrol, Austria, situated on the Inn in lat. 47° 17' N., long. 11° 24' E.; the ancient Eni Pons, or Enipontum. It is noted for its picturesque situation. The Franciscan church, or Hofkirche, is a Renaissance building, notable especially for its magnificent monument to the emperor Maximilian I. The kneeling figure of the emperor, in bronze, on a great marble sarcophagus, is surrounded by 28 statues of his ancestors. The sides of the sarcophagus are adorned with 24 reliefs of scenes from the emperor's life, most of them by the Fleming Collins. These reliefs are among the finest sculpture of the 16th century; many of the figures are portraits. The Schloss Amras is a fine castle of the 13th century, refitted and enlarged in the 16th by the archduke Ferdinand. It is now a museum, with very interesting collections, chiefly historical, including medieval and modern weapons, furniture, industrial art, sculpture, and portraits. The 16th-century Spanish saloon is notable, as is the ornate late-pointed chapel. It has several other castles and a university. It was made a city in 1234. Desperate fighting between the Tyrolese and Bavarians occurred here in 1509. Population (1890), 23,320.

Inns of Chancery. Inns subordinate to the Inns of Court (which see). Clifford's Inn, Clement's Inn, and Lyon's Inn (pulled down in 1865, now the site of the Globe Theatre) were attached to the Inner Temple; New Inn and Strand Inn (which have disappeared), to the Middle Temple; Barnard's Inn and Staple Inn, to Gray's Inn; Thavie's Inn and Furnival's Inn, to Lincoln's Inn. Serjeant's Inn, in Chancery Lane, was formerly used by the Society of Serjeants-at-law, but this ceased to exist in 1577.

Inns of Court. Legal societies in London which have the exclusive privilege of calling candidates to the bar, and maintain instruction and examination for that purpose; also, the precincts or premises occupied by these societies respectively. They are the Inner Temple, Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. The first two originally belonged to the Knights Templars (whence the name Temple). These inns had their origin about the end of the 13th century. The inn was originally the town residence of a person of quality. "Before the Temple was leased by lawyers, the laws were taught in hostels, hospitia curie, of which there were a great number in the metropolis, especially in the neighborhood of Holborn; but afterwards the Inns of Court and Chancery increased in prosperity till they formed what Stow describes as 'a whole university of students, practicers or pleaders, and judges of the law of this realm, not living on common stipends as in the other universities, as is for the most part done, but of their own private maintenance.'" Hare, London, I, 59.

Innu (in-'ü-it). See Eskimaun.

Innviertel (in-'fër-tel). The region between the Inn, Danube, and Salzaeh. It was ceded to Austria in 1779, to Bavaria in 1809, and again to Austria in 1815.

Institute of France. [F. Institut de France, often simply Institut.] An association of the members of the five French academies, L'Académie Française, L'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, L'Académie des Sciences, L'Académie des Beaux-Arts, and L'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques. It was established by the Republican Convention in 1795, and is supported by the government. Its purpose is "to advance the sciences and arts of research by the publication of discoveries and by correspondence with other learned societies, and to prosecute those scientific and literary labors which shall have for their end general utility and the glory of the republic." It was originally called L'Institut National, and the name has changed with the various changes in the government. At first the association was installed at the Louvre, but in 1806 it was removed to the Collège des Quatre Nations. There is a general annual meeting on the 25th of October, the anniversary of its founding.

Instituto Historico e Geographico Brasileiro. [Pg., 'Brazilian Historical and Geographical Society.'] A society established at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in 1839, for the encouragement of historical and geographical studies. Since its foundation it has published the "Revista Trimestral," now (1894) numbering over 55 volumes, and containing documents of the highest interest. It possesses a very valuable library.

Insures (in-'sü-brëz). In ancient history, a Gallic people in Cisalpine Gaul, dwelling north of the Po, in the vicinity of Milan. They were finally subjected to Rome in 196 B. C.

Interim (in-'tër-im). A provisional arrangement for the settlement of religious differences between Protestants and Roman Catholics in Germany during the Reformation epoch, pending a definite settlement by a church council. There were three interims: the Ratisbon Interim, promulgated by the emperor Charles V., July 29, 1541, but ineffective; the Augsburg Interim, proclaimed also by Charles V., May 15, 1548, but not carried out by many Protestants; and the Lelpsic Interim, carried through the Diet of Saxony, Dec. 22, 1548, by the efforts of the elector Maurice, and enlarged and published as the Greater Interim in March, 1549; it met with strenuous opposition. Religious toleration was secured for the Lutherans by the peace of Passau, 1552.

Interlaken (in-'tër-lä-kon), or Interlachen (in-'tër-lä-eh-en). A summer resort in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, on the Aare, between Lakes Thun and Brienz, 27 miles southeast of Bern. It is a celebrated tourist center. The chief avenue is the Hoheweg. It contains a casino and an old monastery. Population, about 2,600.

International (in-'tër-nash-'on-al). The. A society (in full, "The International Working-men's Association"), formed in London in 1864, designed to unite the working-classes of all countries in promoting social and industrial reform by political means. Its chief aims were: (1) the subordination of capital to labor through the transference of industrial enterprises from the capitalists to bodies of working-men; (2) the encouragement of men on strike by gifts of money, or by preventing laborers of one locality from migrating to another when the laborers of the latter are on strike; (3) the overthrow of all laws, customs, and privileges considered hostile to the working-classes, and the encouragement of whatever aids them, as the shortening of hours of labor, free public education, etc.; (4) the end of all wars. By 1867 the International had become a powerful organization, though strenuously opposed by the continental European governments; but its manifestation in 1872 of sympathy with the doings of the Paris Commune in the preceding year, and internal dissensions, caused a great loss of reputation and strength.

International African Association. An international commission provided for at the Brussels Conference of 1876. Its object was to be the exploration and civilization of central Africa. National committees were formed in France, Germany, Italy, and elsewhere to cooperate in the work. Its seat was Brussels. Out of it grew the Congo Committee, the International Association of the Congo, and the Congo Free State.

Inwood, William. Born at Highgate about 1771; died at London, March 16, 1843. An English architect. His chief work is St. Pancras New Church, London (1819-22), which is an adaptation of Athenian models, chiefly the Erechtheum.

Io (i'ō). [Gr. 'Ιώ.] In Greek mythology, the beautiful daughter of Inachus, king of Argos, Greece, who was changed by Hera (Juno), in a fit of jealousy, into a white heifer, and placed under the watch of Argus of the hundred eyes. When Argus was killed by Hermes at the command of Zeus, the heifer was maddened by a terrible gadfly sent by Hera, and wandered about until she arrived in Egypt. She recovered her original shape, and bore Epaphus to Zeus. Epaphus became the ancestor of Egyptus, Damans, Cepheus, and Phineus. According to another legend, Io was carried off by Phœnician traders who landed in Argos. The myth is generally explained to be Aah or the moon wandering in the starry skies, symbolized by the hundred-eyed Argus; her transformation into a horned heifer representing the crescent moon.

Greek mythology, too, knew her [Astarte] as Iō and Enropa, and she was fitly symbolized by the cow whose horns resemble the supine lunar crescent as seen in the south.

Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 195.

Iolaus (i-ō-lā'us). [Gr. 'Ιόλαος.] In Greek legend, the charioteer and companion of Heracles.

Iolcus (i-ol'kus). [Gr. 'Ιωλκός.] In ancient geography, a city in Thessaly, Greece, situated on the Pagasæan Gulf near Mount Pelion; the modern Volo. It was the point of embarkation of the Argonauts.

Ion (i'on). [Gr. 'Ιών.] In Greek mythology, the ancestor of the Ionians, the subject of a tragedy by Euripides.

Ion. [Gr. 'Ιών.] 1. A play of Euripides, exhibited about 424 B. C. Its theme is the legend that Ion, eponymous founder of the Ionian race, was the son of Creusa, daughter of Erechtheus, by Apollo.

There is no character in all Greek tragedy like this Ion, who reminds one strongly of the charming boys drawn by Plato in such dialogues as "Charmides" and "Lysis." In purity and freshness he has been compared to Giotto's choristers, and has afforded Racine his masterpiece of imitation in the Joas of the "Athalie." But I would liken him still more to the child Samuel, whose ministrations are painted with so exquisite a grace in the Old Testament.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I, 349.

2. A tragedy by Thomas Noon Talfourd, privately printed in 1835, and produced the next year at Covent Garden. It is properly a dramatic poem, and is the author's masterpiece.

Iona (i-ō-nā), or Icolmkill (i-kōm-kil'). [Originally Hii or I; written Iona by Adamnan, whence, by a blunder, Iona.] An island of the Inner Hebrides, in Argyllshire, Scotland, 1½ miles southwest of Mull, from which it is separated by the Sound of Iona. The cathedral is a small but very interesting building, now roofless, though the masonry is complete. It was founded in the 13th century, but exhibits some details as late as the 10th. Some specimens of plate-tracery in the square central tower are especially curious. St. Martin's and Maclean's crosses near by are interesting examples of the many sculptured Celtic crosses with which Iona formerly abounded. It was an ancient seat of the Druids. Columba founded a monastery here about 565, which became a leading colonizer in the spread of Celtic missions. The Culdees were replaced by Benedictines in the 13th century. The monastery was demolished in 1151. Length, 3½ miles. Population, about 200.

Ionia. See Aenai.

Ionian (i-ō-ni-ā). [Gr. 'Ιωνία.] In ancient geography, a maritime region on the western coast of Lydia and Caria, Asia Minor, with Chios and Samos and the adjacent islands. It comprised on the mainland the cities Phœacia, Clazomenæ, Erythræ, Teos, Lebedus, Colophon, Ephesus, Priene, Myus, Miletus, and later Smyrna. It was colonized in prehistoric times by Ionians from European Greece; was conquered by Cresus in the middle of the 6th century B. C.; passed later to Persia; was the scene of an unsuccessful revolt 500-494; became on the close of the Persian war a dependent ally of Athens; and passed to Persia in 387, and to Macedonia in 334. Later it fell to Perseus and Rome. It was celebrated for its wealth, and for the early development of art, music, philosophy, and literature.

Ionian Islands (i-ō-ni-an i'landz). 1. The collective name of Corfu, Santa Maura, Cephalonia, Zante, Paxos, Ithaca, and Cerigo, and some smaller islands, belonging to Greece. They form the modern nomarchies of Corfu, Cephalonia, Zante, and part of Argolis and Corinth. They were acquired by Venice from about 1400; were annexed to France in 1797; were conquered by the Russians and Turks in 1799; formed the republic of the "Seven United Islands" 1800-07; were annexed to France in 1807; were placed under a British protectorate in 1815; and were ceded to Greece in 1864. See Corfu, Cephalonia, and the other separate islands.

2. In ancient geography, the islands belonging to Ionia in Asia Minor.

Iphicrates (i-fik'ra-tēz). [Gr. 'Ιφικράτης.] Lived in the first half of the 4th century B. C. An Athenian general, noted for his improvements in the equipment of the peltasts. He defeated the Spartans near Corinth 392 B. C.

Iphigenia (if'i-jē-ni-ā). [Gr. 'Ιφιγένεια.] In Greek legend, the daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra (or of Theseus and Helena). According to one legend, when the fleet which was to sail against Troy was becalmed at Aulis, through the anger of Artemis with Agamemnon, the seer Calchas (or the Delphic oracle) declared that the death of Iphigenia was the only means of propitiating the goddess. Agamemnon sent for his daughter, but when she arrived Artemis carried her away in a cloud to Tauris, and a stag (or other animal, or another person) was substituted for her in the sacrifice. While she was at Tauris as a priestess of Artemis, her brother Orestes, accompanied by his friend Pylades, came with the intention of carrying off the celebrated image of the goddess. Iphigenia saved him from being put to death as a stranger, and fled with him and the image. Her story has frequently been made the subject of dramatic poetry.

There were "Iphigenias" by both Æschylus and Sophocles, which were soon obscured by the present play (of Euripides). Both Navvius and Ennius composed well-known tragedies upon its model. Erasmus translated it into Latin in 1524; T. Sibillet into French in 1549. Dolce gave an Italian version in 1560. There are obscure French versions by Rotrou (1640), and by Leclerc and Coras (1675), the latter in opposition to the great imitation of Racine in 1674. Racine's remarkable play, written by a man who combined a real knowledge of Euripides with poetic talent of his own, is a curious specimen of the effects of French court manners in spoiling the simplicity of a great masterpiece. . . . An English version of Racine's play, called "Achilles, or Iphigenia in Aulis," was brought out at Drury Lane in 1700, and the author in his preface to the print boasts that it was well received, though another Iphigenia failed at Lincoln's Inn Fields about the same time. This rare play is bound up with West's "Hecuba" in the Bodleian. The famous opera of Gluck (1774) is based on Racine, and there was another operatic revival of the play in Dublin in the year 1846, when Miss Helen Faucit appeared as the heroine. The version (by J. W. Calcraft) was based on Potter's translation, and the choruses were set to music, after the model of Mendelssohn, by R. M. Levey. I fancy this revival was limited to Dublin. Schiller translated Euripides' play (1790), and there is an English poetical version by Cartwright, about 1867 (with the "Medea" and "Iph. Taur.").

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I, 371.

There yet remains the very famous "Iphigenia" of Goethe for our consideration. This excellent play has been extolled far beyond its merits by the contemporaries of its great author, but is now generally allowed, even in Germany, to be a somewhat unfortunate mixture of Greek scenery and characters with modern romantic sentiment. It therefore gives no idea whatever of a Greek play, and of this its unwary reader should be carefully reminded. Apart from the absence of chorus, and the introduction of a sort of conflant of the king, Arkas, who does nothing but give stupid and unheeded advice, the character of Thois is drawn as no barbarian king should have been drawn—a leading character, and so noble that Iphigenia cannot bring herself to deceive him, a scruple which an Athenian audience would have derided. Equally would they have derided Orestes' proposal, of which Thois approves, to prove his identity by single combat, and still more the argument which Iphigenia prefers to all outward marks—the strong yearning of her heart to the stranger. The whole diction and tone of the play is, moreover, full of idealistic dreaming, and conscious analysis of motive, which the Greeks, who painted the results more accurately, never paraded upon the stage.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I, 357.

Iphigenia. A tragedy by John Dennis, acted at Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1700. The story is taken from Euripides's "Iphigenia in Tauris."

Iphigenia among the Tauri. A play of Euripides, of uncertain date, but certainly belonging to the poet's later period.

Iphigenia at Aulis. A play of Euripides, brought out after his death by his son.

Iphigénie en Aulide. An opera by Gluck, produced at Paris in 1774.

Iphigénie en Tauride. An opera by Gluck, produced at Paris in 1779. The story of "Iphigenia in Aulis" has been set to music by more than 20 composers besides Gluck, and of "Iphigenia in Tauris" by 9 or 10.

Ips, or Ybbs (ips). A town in Lower Austria, situated at the junction of the Ips with the Danube, 58 miles west of Vienna. Population (1890), commune, 4,286.

Ipsambul. See Abu-Simbel.

Ipsara (ip-sā'ra), or Psara (psā'ra). A small island in the Ægean Sea, 12 miles northwest of Scio, belonging to Turkey; the ancient Psyra.

Ipsus (ip'sus). [Gr. 'Ιψός, 'Ιψύς.] In ancient geography, a town in Phrygia, Asia Minor, about lat. 38° 41' N., long. 30° 52' E. Here, 301 B. C., Lysimachus and Seleucus defeated and slew Antigonus.

Ipswich (ips'wich). A seaport and the capital of Suffolk, England, on the Orwell 64 miles northeast of London. It has a grammar-school, refounded by Elizabeth, and was the birthplace of Wolsey. It was plundered by the Danes 991 and 1000. It returns 2 members to Parliament. Population (1891), 57,260.

Ipswich. A river port in Queensland, Australia, situated on the Bremer about lat. 27° 35' S., long. 152° 50' E. Population (1891), 7,625.

Ipswich. A river port in Essex County, Massachusetts, situated near the mouth of the Ipswich River, 25 miles north-northeast of Boston. Population of township (1890), 4,439.

Iquichanos (ē-kē-ehā'nōs). A tribe of Peruvian Indians, of the Quichua race, in the wild mountain region of the department of Ayacucho, west of Huanta. They have retained a form of tribal independence. During the revolution they fought on the side of the royalists, but since they have served the Peruvian government bravely, especially in the war with Chile 1880-83. Also written Yquichanos.

Iquique (ē-kē'kā). A seaport in the territory of Tarapacá, Chile, in lat. 20° 12' S., long. 70° 11' W. Near here, May 21, 1879, occurred a naval battle in which the Chilean ship Esmeralda was sunk by the Peruvian monitor Huascar. Iquique was ceded to Chile in 1883. Population (1885), 15,391.

Iquitos (ē-kē'tōs). A tribe of Indians on the northern side of the upper Amazon, in the region disputed between Ecuador and Peru. Formerly they were found about the rivers Tigre and Nanay, where missionaries preached to them from 1727 to 1768. Some, at least, relapsed into barbarism, and the remnants live on the left side of the Napo. They are naked savages, and use poisoned arrows. Nothing is known of their language. The town of Iquitos, Peru, was named from them. Also written Yquitos.

Iquitos. A town in the department of Loreto, Peru, on the Marañon. Population (1889), about 3,000.

Iraj (ē-rej'). In the Shahnamah, son of Faridun by Arnavaz. In the division of his realm Faridun gave to Iraj, though the youngest Iran, and to Salm and Tur, respectively, the West and Turan. These rose against Iraj, and Tur slew him. He was avenged by Minuchihir, who slew both Salm and Tur. See Saba.

Irak (ē-rāk'). The tract of land which is called Babylonia by Ptolemy, bounded on the north by Mesopotamia, on the west by the Persian Gulf and Susiana, and on the east by Susiana, Assyria, and Media. It was invaded by the Arabs under the first calif, Abu-Bekr, 632-634 A. D.

Ireland (ir'land). [ME. Ireland, Irland, Yrland, Erland (F. Irlande, G. Irland, from E.), AS. Ir-land, Irland, land of the Irish, from ira, gen. of iras, Fräs, the Irish, from Ir. Eire, Ireland, Erin. See Erin and Hibernia.] An island west of Great Britain, forming with it the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Capital, Dublin.

It is bounded by the Atlantic Ocean on the north, west, and south, and separated on the east from Great Britain by the North Channel, Irish Sea, and St. George's Channel. It extends from lat. 51° 26' to 55° 21' N., long. 5° 23' to 10° 28' W. There are mountains near the coast, but the interior is generally level, and abounds in lakes. The leading occupation is agriculture, and chief products cereals, potatoes, etc. The chief manufactures are linen, woolen, spirits, etc. Ireland is divided into 4 provinces (Ulster, Leinster, Munster, Connaught), and subdivided into 32 counties. Government is administered by a lord lieutenant, appointed by the British government for the time being, assisted by a privy council at Dublin and a chief secretary in Parliament. The kingdom is represented by 103 members in the House of Commons, and the peerage, which at present (1894) numbers 176 members, appoints 25 representative peers to sit in the House of Lords. About 76 per cent. of the population are Roman Catholics. The inhabitants are mostly of Celtic descent (except in Ulster). The colonizations of Ireland by Firbolgs, Milesians, and other races are legendary. The following are the leading events and incidents of Irish history: Christianity introduced by St. Patrick, 5th century; settlements on the eastern coasts by the Northmen, 9th and 10th centuries; Danish invasions, ended in 1014 by the victory at Clontarf of the Irish chieftain Brian Boru; conquest of the English Pale made in the reign of Henry II. by Strongbow, beginning in 1169; expedition of Poyning's sent by Henry VII., leading to Poyning's Act, 1494; revolt of the Irish under the Geraldines suppressed by Henry VIII., who took the title of King of Ireland; rebellions during the reign of Elizabeth, under the leadership of Shane O'Neill, later of Desmond, and later of Hugh O'Neill (earl of Tyrone), who was defeated by Mountjoy in 1601; English and Scottish settlement made in Ulster by James I.; the lieutenantcy of Strafford, followed by the "massacre of 1641"; rising put down (1649-50) by Cromwell, who made additional settlements of English and Scots; adherence of Ireland to James II., 1689; battle of the Boyne July 1, 1690; the Irish Parliament declared independent, 1782; unsuccessful rebellion, 1798; Act of Union, ending the separate Irish Parliament and uniting Ireland with Great Britain, carried through under the lieutenantcy of Cornwallis (came into force Jan. 1, 1801); unsuccessful rebellion under Emmet, 1803; Catholic Emancipation passed, 1829; repeal agitation under O'Connell, 1842-44; potato famine of 1846-47, followed by great emigration to America; "Young Ireland" rebellion, 1848; Fenian outbreaks, 1865 and 1867; Land Act, 1870; disestablishment of the Irish Church, 1871; Land Act, 1881; Land League suppressed, 1881; National League organized, 1882; Phoenix Park murders, 1882; Home Rule agitation under the lead of Parnell; introduction by Mr. Gladstone of a Home Rule Bill which failed to pass the House of Commons, 1886; Home Rule Bill passed by the House of Commons, but rejected by the House of Lords, 1893. Area, 32,563 square miles. Population (1891), 4,704,750.

Ireland, John. Born near Wem, Shropshire; died at Birmingham, Nov. 1808. An English author. He worked as a watchmaker in Maiden Lane, London. In 1786 he published the "Letters and Poems" of John Henderson the actor. In 1793 he edited for Boydell "Hogarth Illustrated" (1791). In 1798, as a supplementary volume of this work, he published his "Life of Hogarth," with engravings of some hitherto unpublished drawings. This is the standard biography of Hogarth.

Ireland, Samuel. Born at London; died there, July, 1800. An English author and engraver. Originally a weaver in Spitalfields, London, he later went into business as a dealer in prints and drawings, instructing himself in drawing, etching, and engraving. In 1769 he won a medal from the Society of Arts, and in 1764 exhibited at the Royal Academy for the first and only time. From 1780 to 1785 he etched many plates after Mortimer and Hogarth, also Knysnael (1780) and Teniers (1787). He is best known as the dupe of his son, William Henry Ireland, in the affair of the Shakspeare forgeries.

Ireland, William Henry. Born probably at London, 1777; died there, April 17, 1835. A forger of Shakspeare manuscripts. He is supposed to have been an illegitimate son of Samuel Ireland. He visited Stratford-on-Avon about 1794 with his father, an admirer of Shakspeare, who fully believed a story of the recent destruction of Shakspeare's own manuscripts. On his return to London he began his famous series of forgeries of Shakspeare manuscripts. Among these are a mortgage deed copied on old parchment from a genuine deed of 1612 which had been copied in facsimile by Stevens; Shakspeare's signature on the fly-leaves of old books; a transcript of "Lear"; and extracts from "Hamlet" (the orthography copied from Chatterton's Rowley poems). In Feb., 1795, these documents were exhibited by the elder Ireland at his house in Norfolk street. On Feb. 25 Dr. Parr, Sir Isaac Heard, Herbert Croft, Fye, the poet laureate, and 16 others signed a paper testifying to their belief in their genuineness. To these Ireland added a new blank-verse play "Vortigern and Rowena," in Shakspeare's autograph, and a tragedy, "Henry II.," which he said he had copied from Shakspeare's original, which were examined by Sheridan of Drury Lane and Harris of Covent Garden. On April 2, 1796, "Vortigern" was produced by Kemble at Drury Lane. Its complete failure led to the exposure of the entire fraud, and before the end of the year Ireland published "An Authentic Account of the Shakspeare MSS." He also published a number of ballads, poems, novels, memoirs, and translations. Dict. Nat. Bib.

Ireland Island. One of the Bermudas.

Irenæus (i-rē-nē'us), Saint. Born in Asia Minor; died at Lyons, probably in 202 A. D. A celebrated Greek church father. He was a native of Asia Minor; studied under Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna; removed to Rome about 155; and became bishop of Lyons in 177. He died a martyr during the persecution under the emperor Septimius Severus. He wrote a Greek work against heresies, which is extant in a Latin translation entitled "contra hereticos" (ed. by Stieren 1851-53, and by Harvey 1857).

Irene (i-rē'nē). [Gr. Eipήνη, peace.] Born at Athens about 752; died in Lesbos, Aug. 15, 803. A Byzantine empress. She became the wife of the emperor Leo IV. in 769, and from 780 to 790 was regent for her son Constantine VI., whom she dethroned and blinded in 797. She was deposed and banished by Nicephorus in 802.

Irene. An asteroid (No. 14) discovered by Hind at London, May 19, 1851.

Irene. A tragedy by Samuel Johnson. It was played under the title "Mahomet and Irene," under Garrick's management, Feb. 6, 1749. Garrick played Demetrius.

Irene (ē-rän'). A tragedy by Voltaire, produced March 16, 1778. He was crowned with laurel in his box for this play on the first occasion on which he was able to attend.

Irene, Church of Saint. A church at Constantinople, rebuilt by Justinian, and one of the finest monuments of Byzantine architecture. It is a rectangle with a narthex on the west and an apse on the east. The great dome rests on barrel-vaults, and has a drum pierced with 20 windows; it is lined with mosaics on gold ground. There is an interior gallery resting on beautiful marble columns.

Ireton (ir'ton), Henry. Born in Nottingham, England, 1611; died near Limerick, Ireland, Nov. 26, 1651. An English Parliamentary general, son-in-law of Cromwell. In 1626 he became a gentleman commoner of Trinity College, Oxford, graduating B. A. in 1629. At the beginning of the civil war he was the chief supporter of the Parliamentary interest in Nottinghamshire, and June 30, 1642, was made captain of the Nottingham horse. He attached himself very intimately to Cromwell, with whom he had great influence; was made commissary-general of the horse at Naseby; and married Cromwell's daughter Bridget, June 15, 1646. On Oct. 30, 1645, he was returned to Parliament for Appleby. He took part in the treaty between the commissioners of the army and Parliament. He hoped to lay the foundation of an agreement between the king and Parliament, and to establish the liberties of the people on a permanent basis. When Charles I., however, refused the "Four Bills" Ireton advised the settlement of the affairs of the kingdom without him. In the trial of the king he sat regularly in the High Court of Justice, and signed the warrant for the king's execution. On Aug. 15, 1649, he went with Cromwell to Ireland as second in command, and became his deputy May 29, 1650.

Iriarte, or Yriarte (ē-rē-är'tä), Tomas de. Born at Orotava, Teneriffe, Canary Islands, Sept. 18, 1750; died at Madrid, Sept. 17, 1791. A Spanish poet. His chief works are "La musica" (1779), "Fabulas literarias" (1782).

Iris (i-ris). [Gr. Ἴρις.] In Greek mythology, a female divinity, messenger of the gods, often regarded as the personification of the rainbow.

Iris. An asteroid (No. 7) discovered by Hind at London, Aug. 13, 1847.

Irisarri (ē-rē-sä'rē), Antonio José de. Born at Santiago de los Caballeros, Guatemala, Feb. 7, 1786; died at Brooklyn, N. Y., June 10, 1868. A Spanish-American statesman and author. He settled in Chile, where he took a prominent part in the revolution 1810-15. Subsequently he held various diplomatic posts for Chile, and from 1855 was minister of Guatemala and Salvador to the United States. He edited several journals in various Spanish-American countries, published historical and philological works and a collection of satirical poems, and was a well-known bibliophile.

Irish (i-rish). The language of the native Celtic race in Ireland. It is in age and philological value the most important language of the Celtic family, though its antiquity and importance have been much exaggerated by tradition and patriotism. The alphabet is an adaptation of the Latin. As heretofore printed the letters, like the so-called Anglo-Saxon letters, are usually made to resemble a conventionalized form of the Latin alphabet in use in Britain in the early middle ages. Gaelic is a comparatively recent form of the Irish spoken by the Celts of Scotland. It differs but slightly from the Irish of the same age. Modern Irish is greatly corrupted in pronunciation, as compared with the Old Irish; but it retains in great part the old orthography. As a living speech it is fast going out of use.

Irish Sea. A body of water lying between England on the east and Ireland on the west, and connected with the Atlantic Ocean by the North Channel on the north and St. George's Channel on the south. The Isle of Man is in its center.

Irish Widow, The. A comedy by David Garrick, taken in part from Molière's "Le mariage forcé." It was brought out Oct. 23, 1772. The widow Brady was played originally by Mrs. Barry, for whom the play was written.

Irkalla. See Urugal.

Irkutsk (ir-kötsk'). 1. A government of Siberia, bounded by Yakutsk on the north and east, Trans-Baikal on the southeast, the Chinese empire on the south, and Yeniseisk on the west. Area, 287,061 square miles. Population, 421,187.—2. The capital of the government of Irkutsk, situated at the junction of the Irkut with the Angara, in lat. 52° 17' N., long. 104° 12' E. It was founded in 1652, and is the chief commercial city of Siberia and the seat of the general government, and is noted for its tea trade. It was nearly destroyed by fire in 1879. Population, 50,274.

Irmín (ér'min), or Irmíno (ér'mi-nō). In Germanic mythology, a god, eponymic ancestor of the Herminones.

Irimones. See Hermiones.

Iriminul (ér'min-söl). A Saxon idol cast down by Charlemagne, near Eresburg, about 772. Hermann, or Arminius, the hero of Teutonic independence, was the object of the Saxons' admiration, and they called this idol Irimensaul (Hermann saule, "Hermann's pillar"), from a fancied resemblance of the word. No real connection of the idol with Hermann existed.

The Irimin-Sul, or Column of Hermann, near Eresburg, the modern Stadtberg, was the chosen object of worship to the descendants of the Cherusci, the Old Saxons, in defence of which they fought desperately against Charlemagne and his Christianized Franks. "Irimin," says Sir Francis Palgrave, "In the cloudy Olympus of Teutonic belief, appears as a king and a warrior; and the pillar, the Irimin-Sul, bearing the statue, and considered as the symbol of the deity, was the Palladium of the Saxon nation until the temple of Eresburg was destroyed by Charlemagne, and the column itself transferred to the monastery of Corvey, where perhaps a portion of the rude rock-idol yet remains, covered by the ornaments of the Gothic era." Philip Smith, Hist. World, III, 368.

Irrerius (ēr-nē'ri-us), or Warnerius (wār-nē'ri-us). Lived first part of the 12th century. A noted Italian jurist. See the extract.
